Dictionary of Paul and His Letters

Editors:

Gerald F. Hawthorne

Ralph P. Martin

Associate Editor:

Daniel G. Reid

InterVarsity Press

DOWNERS GROVE, ILLINOIS 60515

LEICESTER, ENGLAND

InterVarsity Press
P.O. Box 1400, Downers Grove, IL 60515, USA
38 De Montfort Street, Leicester LE1 7GP, England

InterVarsity Press®, U.S.A., is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship®, a student movement active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895.

Inter-Varsity Press, England, is the book-publishing division of the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship (formerly the Inter-Varsity Fellowship), a student movement linking Christian Unions in universities and colleges throughout the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and national activities write to UCCF, 38 De Montfort Street, Leicester LE1 7GP.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are the authors' own translations. Those identified NIV are taken from the American edition of the HOLY BIBLE, NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION®. NIV®. © 1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society, used by permission of Zondervan Publishing House and published in Great Britain by Hodder and Stoughton Ltd. All rights reserved. Those identified RSV are from the Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1946, 1952, 1971 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and used by permission. Those identified NRSV are from the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1989 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and used by permission.

USA ISBN 0-8308-1778-6
UK ISBN 0-85110-651-X

Printed in the United States of America ♾

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dictionary of Paul and his Letters/editors, Gerald F. Hawthorne, Ralph P. Martin; associate editor, Daniel G. Reid.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-8308-1778-6 (alk. paper)
1. Bible. N.T. Epistles of Paul—Criticism, interpretation, etc. 2. Bible. N.T. Epistles of Paul—Dictionaries. 3. Paul, the Apostle, Saint—Dictionaries. I. Hawthorne, Gerald F., 1925- II. Martin, Ralph P. III. Reid, Daniel G., 1949-
BS2650.2.D53 1993
227'.03—dc20 93-36044
CIP

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

19 18 17 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3
07 06 05 04 03 02 01 00 99 98 97 96

InterVarsity Press

Executive Director
Kenneth DeRuiter

Editorial Staff

Editorial Director
Andrew T. Le Peau

Managing Editor
James Hoover

Reference Book Editor
Daniel G. Reid

Editorial Assistants
Kathleen Carlson
Gloria Duncan
Cynthia M. Reid
Rhonda Skinner

Proofreaders
Helen Kelly
Michele Pelton
Robin Sheffield

Production Staff

Production Manager
Nancy Fox

Production Coordinator
Don Frye

Design
Kathy Lay Burrows

Design Assistant
Carla Sonheim

Typesetters
Marjorie Sire, Gail Munroe

Programming Consultant
Richard E. Ecker

Contents

Preface ix

How to Use This Dictionary xi

Abbreviations xiii

Transliterations xxv

List of Contributors xxvii

Dictionary Articles 1

Pauline Letters Index 995

Subject Index 1013

Articles Index 1037

Preface

"It has long been a matter of controversy among New Testament scholars how best we should interpret the theology of Paul." If this remark of W. D. Davies was true when he first made it in 1948, the last several decades have seen no resolving of the matter and very few points of consensus.

Yet areas of agreement are to be found, and they are significant. They range from Paul's Jewish-rabbinic background and the setting of his missionary life and work in a Greco-Roman environment to, and above all, the decisive turning point in his thought and vocation when he became a Christian apostle. To be sure, each of these fields of inquiry has provoked animated discussion, even if there is general agreement among students of Paul that it is within these three sectors of investigation that the ultimate meaning of Paul's life and ministry and its legacy to the subsequent history of the church is to be located.

The present time is surely opportune to harvest the gains of such inquiries, proposals and investigations. We are sufficiently distant from E. P. Sanders's epoch-making volume Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977), rightly praised, if then pertinently criticized, by J. D. G. Dunn (in his essay "The New Perspective on Paul," 1983) as breaking the mold of current Pauline research and posing a new set of agenda questions, to attempt a reevaluation and assessment. The team of essayists who have contributed to the Dictionary of Paul and His Letters mainly stand in the shadow of this major new appraisal of Paul's attitude to the Law, the covenant and the people of Israel, and reflect their reaction, whether positive or cautious, to the "new look" on Paul's gospel of righteousness by faith and the elements of continuity with the ancestral faith.

This perhaps is the chief reason why the ensuing volume should prove serviceable to a new generation of seminary and college students wishing to interact with the "new look" on Paul and his place in Christian and world history. Parish ministers too will value an up-to-date survey of Paul's leading ideas as well as find helpful background data in seeking to place the apostle in his time frame. Key articles, however, show the relevance of the Pauline message to the Christian pulpit today, and would-be preachers will not be slow to glean useful insights based on the best modern scholarship, both critical and conservative. The editors venture to believe that their fellows in the professional guild of teachers and researchers will find here a working tool and a conspectus of bibliographical aids and summarized discussions to assist them in their classroom courses and to provoke further discussion.

Yet a wider audience should equally benefit from a handbook like DPL. Editorial policy has striven to keep in view the needs of a vast company of lay people who are interested in these letters of the New Testament. We have tried to make each contribution readable to and understandable by the educated person-in-the-pew who, we believe, will welcome this comprehensive study of Paul's life and labors, his teaching and influence—and the enduring witness he still stands for, centered on the new life in Christ and the church. If this volume serves to introduce Paul to any who are curious about his role in early Christian history and takes Paul out of the study and the sanctuary into the marketplace and the hectic world where moral values are threatened and ethical decisions made, it will have achieved part of its purpose.

It remains to pay tribute to all who have made possible a venture like this. When two of the editors sat down at a noon meal during the Society of Biblical Literature meetings in 1987 to talk over the possibilities of a dictionary like the present one, we had little idea of the complexity and scope of the task. Subsequent editorial meetings, at SBL conferences and at Wheaton College, were soon to impress us with the vast nature of our undertaking. Yet such occasions were memorable as we wrestled with editorial (and theological) decisions in the interest of making a serviceable volume.

Whether we succeeded, the readers will tell. One thing is clear. We would never have come close to our aim without the willing collaboration of the IVP staff and the army of cooperative contributors whose work we were privileged to edit.

Two names need to be mentioned in this regard. The piece by F. F. Bruce ("Paul in Acts and Letters") was composed within weeks of his lamented death and may represent one of his final contributions to a well-nigh prodigious literary output, chiefly in the field of Pauline studies. The assignment of the major article on "God" was accepted by Donald Guthrie. Alas, he too was to be taken from us before this could even be sketched; yet it was thought fitting if his last written contribution, to crown his life's work, could be assembled from what he had previously written in his New Testament Theology. With family and collegial consent, this has been attempted by one of the editors who has striven to retain as much of Dr. Guthrie's wording as seemed feasible, with a modicum of updating and reworking.

The entire project is issued in the expectation that it will be of service to readers across the world and will represent a not too unworthy contribution to Pauline scholarship, composed by a wide circle of writers who with the editors have sought to discharge their tasks, in the ancient phrase, amore Pauli.

Gerald F. Hawthorne
Ralph P. Martin
Daniel G. Reid

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations
Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly, biblical and ancient literature may be found on pages xiii-xxiii.

Authorship of Articles
The authors of articles are indicated by their first initials and last name at the end of each article. A full list of contributors may be found on pages xxvii-xxix, in alphabetical order of their last name. The contribution of each author is listed.

Bibliographies
A bibliography has been appended to each article. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. Bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's last name.

Full bibliographical information has been supplied whenever possible. In cases where a volume has been published in English on both sides of the Atlantic, only the North American publisher has been listed. Abbreviations used in the bibliographies appear in the tables of abbreviations.

Bibliographies for each Pauline letter include a special listing of commentaries on the respective letter.

Cross-references
The Dictionary has been extensively cross-referenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Four types of cross-referencing will be found:

1. One-line entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed:

Abba. See Adoption, Sonship; God; Son of God.

2. An asterisk after a single word in the body of an article indicates that an article by that title appears in the Dictionary. For example, "Christ*" directs the reader to an article entitled Christ.

3. A cross-reference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article also directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, (see Dying and Rising) directs the reader to an article entitled Dying and Rising with Christ. Such cross-references are used either to prevent the confusion an asterisk might introduce (i.e., Son of God* could refer to either an article on "God" or "Son of God") or to direct the reader's attention to an article of related interest.

4. Cross-references have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

See also JUSTIFICATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

Indexes

Since most of the Dictionary articles cover broad topics in some depth, the subject index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on narrower topics that might, for instance, appear in a standard Bible dictionary. For example, while there is no article entitled "Hellenists," the subject index might direct the reader to pages where the Hellenists are discussed in the articles on "Antioch," "Gentiles," "Hellenism," "Jerusalem" and "Mission."

A Pauline Letters index is provided to assist readers in gaining access to information related to various Pauline texts.

An index of articles in the dictionary allows readers to review quickly the breadth of topics covered and select the ones most apt to serve their interests or needs.

For those who wish to identify the articles written by specific contributors, they are listed with the names of the contributors in the list of contributors.

Transliteration

Hebrew and Greek words have been transliterated according to a system set out in the table of transliterations (xxv). Greek verbs appear in their lexical form (rather than infinitive) in order to assist those with little or no knowledge of the language in using other reference works.

Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

κτλ	etc. (Greek)	n.d.	no date
2d ed.	second edition	n.s.	new series
3d ed.	third edition	NT	New Testament
A	Codex Alexandrinus	o.s.	old series
B	Codex Vaticanus	OT	Old Testament
bis	twice	p. or pp.	page or pages
C	Codex Ephraemi Syri	pace	with due respect to, but differing from
c.	circa, about (with dates); column	par.	parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s) cent.	centur
cf.	confer, compare	passim	elsewhere
chap(s).	chapter(s)	pl.	plural
D	Codex Bezae	Q	Quelle ("sayings" source for Synoptic Gospels)
DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls
e.g.	exempli gratia, for example	repr.	reprint
ed.	edition; editor(s), edited by	rev.	revised
esp.	especially	s.v.	sub verbo ("under the relevant word")
ET	English translation	sy	Syriac
EVV	English versions of the Bible	Tg.	Targum
Gk	Greek	v. or vv.	verse or verses
Heb	Hebrew	v.l.	vario lectio ("variant reading")
i.e.	id est, that is	vol.	volume
km.	kilometer	x	times (2 x = two times, etc.)
LXX	Septuagint	§ or §§	section or paragraph number(s) (usually indicating Loeb Classical Library numbering system for Josephus)
mg.	margin
MS or MSS	manuscript or manuscripts
MT	Masoretic Text (of the Old Testament)	ℵ	Codex Sinaiticus

Translations of the Bible

ASV	American Standard Version (1901)	NEB	New English Bible
AV	Authorized Version (= KJV)	NIV	New International Version
GNB	Good News Bible	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
JB	Jerusalem Bible	REB	Revised English Bible
KJV	King James Version (= AV)	RSV	Revised Standard Version
NASB	New American Standard Bible	RV	Revised Version (1881-85)

Books of the Bible

Old Testament
Gen
Ex
Lev
Num
Deut
Josh
Judg
Ruth
1-2 Sam
1-2 Kings
1-2 Chron
Ezra
Neh
Esther Job
Ps
Prov
Eccles
Song Is Jer
Lam
Ezek
Dan Hos
Joel
Amos
Obad
Jon
Mic
Nahum
Hab
Zeph
Hag
Zech
Mal

New Testament
Mt Mk
Lk
Jn
Acts
Rom
1-2 Cor
Gal
Eph
Phil
Col
1-2 Thess
1-2 Tim
Tit
Philem
Heb
Jas
1-2 Pet
1-2-3 Jn
Jude
Rev

The Apocrypha and Septuagint

1-2-3-4 Kgdms	1-2-3-4 Kingdoms
Add Esth	Additions to Esther
Bar	Baruch
Bel	Bel and the Dragon
1-2 Esdr	1-2 Esdras
4 Ezra	4 Ezra
Jdt	Judith
Ep Jer	Epistle of Jeremiah
1-2-3-4 Macc	1-2-3-4 Maccabees
Pr Azar	Prayer of Azariah
Pr Man	Prayer of Manasseh
Sir	Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus)
Sus	Susanna
Tob	Tobit
Wis	Wisdom of Solomon

The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha

Adam and Eve	Life of Adam and Eve
Ahiq.	Ahiqar
Apoc. Abr.	Apocalypse of Abraham
2-3 Apoc. Bar.	Syriac, Greek Apocalypse of Baruch
Asc. Isa.	Ascension of Isaiah
Apoc. Mos.	Apocalypse of Moses
As. Mos.	Assumption of Moses (or Testament of Moses)
Apoc. Elijah	Apocalypse of Elijah
Apoc. Zeph.	Apocalypse of Zephaniah
Bib. Ant.	Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo
1-2-3 Enoch	Ethiopic, Slavonic, Hebrew Enoch
Ep. Arist.	Epistle of Aristeas
Ep. Diognetus	Epistle to Diognetus
Jos. and As.	Joseph and Asenath
Jub.	Jubilees
Liv. Proph.	The Lives of the Prophets (followed by prophet abbreviated)
Mart. Isa.	Martyrdom of Isaiah
Odes Sol.	Odes of Solomon
Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
Pseud.-Phoc.	Pseudo-Phocylides
Sib. Or.	Sibylline Oracles
T. 12 Patr.	Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs
T. Reub.	Testament of Reuben
T. Sim.	Testament of Simeon
T. Levi	Testament of Levi
T. Judah	Testament of Judah
T. Iss.	Testament of Issachar
T. Zeb.	Testament of Zebulon
T. Dan.	Testament of Dan
T. Naph.	Testament of Naphthali
T. Gad.	Testament of Gad
T. Asher	Testament of Asher
T. Jos.	Testament of Joseph
T. Benj	Testament of Benjamin
T. Abr.	Testament of Abraham
T. Job	Testament of Job
T. Mos.	Testament of Moses (or Assumption of Moses)

Early Christian Literature

Aristides
Apol.	Apologia
Augustine
Civ. D.	De Civitate Dei
Conf.	Confessiones
De cons.	De consensu evangelistarum
Hom.	Homilia
Quaest. Evan.	Quaestiones Evangeliorum
Barn.	Barnabas
Chrysostom
Hom. Mt.	Homilies on Matthew
Regno	De Regno
Clement of Alexandria
Paed.	Paedagogus
Protr.	Protreptikos
Strom.	Stromateis
Clement of Rome
1-2 Clem.	1-2 Clement
Cyprian
Ep.	Epistulae
Cyril of Jerusalem
Cat.	Catechesis
Did.	Didache
Diogn.	Epistle to Diognetus
Epiphanius
Haer.	Haereses
Weights	Treatise on Weights and Measures
Eusebius
Eccl. Theol.	De Ecclesiastica Theologia
Hist. Eccl.	Historia Ecclesiastica
Dem. Ev.	Demonstratio Evangelica
In Ps.	Commentary on the Psalms
Praep. Ev.	Praeparatio Evangelica
Gospels:
Gos. Bar.	Gospel of Bartholomew
Gos. Eb.	Gospel of the Ebionites
Gos. Eg.	Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Heb.	Gospel of the Hebrews
Gos. Naass.	Gospel of the Naassenes
Gos. Pet.	Gospel of Peter
Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
Hippolytus
Apos. Trad.	Apostolic Tradition
Ignatius
Eph.	Letter to the Ephesians
Magn.	Letter to the Magnesians
Phld.	Letter to the Philadelphians
Pol.	Letter to Polycarp
Rom.	Letter to the Romans
Smyrn.	Letter to the Smyrneans
Trall.	Letter to the Trallians
Irenaeus
Haer.	Adversus haereses
Jerome
Ep.	Epistulae
Vir.	De Viris Illustribus
Justin Martyr
Apol. I, II	Apology I, II
Dial. Tryph.	Dialogus cum Tryphone Judaeo
Mart. Pol.	Martyrdom of Polycarp
Origen
Comm. Joh.	In Johannem Commentarius
Comm. Mt.	In Matthaeum Commentarius
Contra Celsum	Contra Celsum
Polycarp
Phil.	Letter to the Philippians
Pseudo-Clementines
Hom.	Homilies
Recogn.	Recognitions
Tertullian
Nat.	Ad Nationes
De An.	De Anima
De Car.	De Carne Christi
De Praesc.	De Praescriptione Haereticorum
De Bapt.	De Baptismo
Marc.	Adversus Marcionem
Pud.	De Pudicitia
Theophilus
Autol.	Ad Autolycum

Classical and Hellenistic Writers and Sources

Aeschylus
Sept. c. Theb.	Septem contra Thebas
Suppl.	Supplices
Ammonius
Adfin. Vocab. Diff.	De adfinium Vocabulorum Differentia
Antipater
Anth. Pal.	Anthologia Palatina
Appian
Mith. W.	Mithridatic Wars
Civ. W.	The Civil Wars

Apuleius
Met. Metamorphoses
Aratus
Phaen. Phaenomena
Aristophanes
Thes. Thesmophorizousai
Aristotle
Cael. De Caelo
Eth. Nic. Ethica Nicomachea
Pol. Politica
Prob. Problemata
Aulus Gellius
Noc. Att. Noctes Atticae
Cicero
De Div. De Divinatione
De Leg. De Legibus
De Offic. De Officiis
De Orat. De Oratore
Phil. Orationes Philippicae
Rab. Perd. Rabirio Perduellionis
Tusc. Tusculanae Disputationes
Corp. Herm. Corpus Hermeticum
Demosthenes
Lacrit. Against Lacritus
Dio Cassius
Epit. Roman History
Hist. Roman History
Dio Chrysostom
De Homero De Homero et Socrate
Disc. Discourses
Or Orationes
Diodorus
Bib. Hist. Bibliotheca Historica
Diogenes Laertius
Vit. Vitae
Dionysius of Halicarnassus
Ant. Rom. Antiquitates Romanae
Epictetus
Disc. Discourses
Diss. Dissertationes
Euripides
Hipp. Hippolytus
Eustathius
on Homer Od. Commentary on Homer's Odyssey
Firmicus Maternus
De Errore Prof.
Rel. De Errore Profanarum Religionum
Galen
De Placitis De Placitis Hippocratis et Platonis
Hesiod
Op. Opera et Dies
Iamblichus
De myst. De Mysteriis
Inscr. Cos The Inscriptions of Cos, ed. W. R. Paton and E. L. Hicks (1891)
Isocrates
Dem. Demonicus
Panath. Panathenaicus
Paneg. Panegyricus
Josephus
Ant. Antiquities of the Jews
J.W. Jewish Wars
Life Life of Flavius Josephus
Ag. Ap. Against Apion
Justinian
Digest Digest of Roman Law
Juvenal
Sat. Satirae
Livy
Epit. Epitomae
Hist. History of Rome
Lucian of Samosata
Herm. Hermotimus
Philops. Philopseudes
Nicolaus of Damascus
Vit. Caes. Vita Caesaris
Orphic Fragments Orph. Frag.
Pausanias
Descr. Description of Greece
Philo
Abr. De Abrahamo
Aet. Mund. De Aeternitate Mundi
Agric. De Agricultura
Cher. De Cherubim
Conf. Ling. De Confusione Linguarum
Congr. De Congressu Eruditionis Gratia
Decal. De Decalogo
Det. Pot. Ins. Quod Deterius Potiori Insidiari Soleat
Deus Imm. Quod Deus Sit Immutabilis
Ebr. De Ebrietate
Flacc. In Flaccum
Fug. De Fuga et Inventione
Gig. De Gigantibus
Jos. De Josepho
Leg. All. Legum Allegoriae
Leg. Gai. Legatio ad Gaium
Migr. Abr. De Migratione Abrahami
Mut. Nom. De Mutatione Nominum
Omn. Prob. Lib. Quod omnis Probus Liber sit
Op. Mund. De Opificio Mundi
Poster. C. De Posteritate Caini
Praem. Poen. De Praemiis et Poenis
Quaest. in Ex. Quaestiones in Exodum
Quaest. in Gen. Quaestiones in Genesin
Rer. Div. Her. Quis Rerum Divinarum Heres sit

Sacr.	De Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini
Som.	De Somnis
Spec. Leg.	De Specialibus Legibus
Virt.	De Virtutibus
Vit. Cont.	De Vita Contemplativa
Vit. Mos.	De Vita Mosis
Philostratus
Vit. Ap.	Vita Apollonii
Pindar
Isth.	Isthmia
Plato
Alc.	Alcibiades
Apol.	Apologia
Crat.	Cratylus
Leg.	Leges
Rep.	Respublica
Soph.	Sophista
Symp.	Symposion
Tim.	Timaeus
Pliny (the elder)
Nat. Hist.	Naturalis Historia
Pliny (the younger)
Ep.	Epistolae
Plutarch
Alex.	De Alexandro
Anton.	De Antonio
Caesar	De Caesar
Conv.	Quaestiones Conviviales
Def. Orac.	De Defectu Oraculorum
Fac. Lun.	De Facie in Orbe Lunae
Gen. Socr.	De Genio Socratis
Lib. Educ.	De Liberis Educandis
Mor.	Moralia
Non Posse Suav.	Non Posse Suaviter Vivi Secundum Epicuram
Pomp.	De Pompeio
Rom.	Quaestiones Romanae
Ser. Num. Pun.	De iis qui sero a numine puniuntur
Polybius
Hist.	Histories
Proclus
In Tim.	In Platonis Timaeum Commentarius
Quintilian
Inst. orat.	Institutio oratoria
Seneca
De Clem.	De Clementia
Ep. Mor.	Epistulae Morales
Sophocles
Elec.	Electra
Stobaeus
Ecl.	Ecloge
Strabo
Geog.	Geography
Suetonius
Claudius	The Twelve Caesars
Domitian	The Twelve Caesars
Julius	The Twelve Caesars
Nero	The Twelve Caesars
Tiberius	The Twelve Caesars
Vespasian	The Twelve Caesars
Tacitus
Ann.	Annales ab excessu divi Augusti
Hist.	Historiae
Thucydides
Hist.	History of the Peloponnesian War
Valerius Maximus
Fact. ac Dict.	Factorum ac Dictorum Memorabilium Libri
Xenophon
Hist. Gr.	Historia Graeca
Mem.	Memorabilia Socratis

Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Texts

CD	Cairo (Genizah text of the) Damascus (Document/Rule)
P	Pesher (commentary)
1Q, 3Q, 4Q etc.	Numbered caves of Qumran yielding written material (e.g., 1Q = Qumran Cave 1); followed by abbreviation or number of document
1QapGen	Genesis Apocryphon from Qumran Cave 1
1QH	Hôdāyôṭ or Thanksgiving Hymns from Qumran Cave 1
1QIsa^{a,b}	First or second copy of Isaiah from Qumran Cave 1
1QM	Milḥāmāh or War Scroll from Qumran Cave 1
1QpHab	Pesher on Habakkuk from Qumran Cave 1
1QS	Serek hayyaḥad or Rule of the Community, Manual of Discipline from Qumran Cave 1

1QSa	Appendix A, Messianic Rule, to 1QS from Qumran Cave 1
1QSb	Appendix B, Rule of Benediction, to 1QS from Qumran Cave 1
3Q15	Copper Scroll from Qumran Cave 3
4Q Ps DanA^{a}	Pseudo-Danielic Writings from Qumran Cave 4
4Q139	Ordinances or commentaries on biblical laws from Qumran Cave 4
4Q169	Pesher on Nahum from Qumran Cave 4
4Q171	Pesher on Psalms from Qumran Cave 4
4Q176	Tanhumim, or Consolations, from Qumran Cave 4
4Q186	(see 4QMess ar)
4Q246	(see 4QPs DanA^{a})
4Q400-407	(see 4QShirShab)
4Q504	Words of the Luminaries from Qumran Cave 4
4Q513-14	Ordinances or commentaries on biblical laws from Qumran Cave 4
4QCryptic	Magical text from Qumran Cave 4
4QEn Giants^{a-e}	1 Enoch fragments from Book of Giants from Qumran Cave 4
4QEn^{a-g}	1 Enoch fragments from Qumran Cave 4
4QEnastr^{a-g}	1 Enoch fragments from Astronomical Book from Qumran Cave 4
4QFlor	Florilegium or Eschatological Midrashim from Qumran Cave 4
4QMess ar	Aramaic "Messianic" text from Qumran Cave 4
4QMMT	Miqsat Ma'aseh Torah (unpublished) from Qumran Cave 4
4QPhyl	Phylacteries from Qumran Cave 4
4QPrNab	Prayer of Nabonidus from Qumran Cave 4
4QPssJosh	Psalms of Joshua from Qumran Cave 4
4QShirShabb	Songs of Sabbath Sacrifice or Angelic Liturgy from Qumran Cave 4
4QTestim	Testimonia text from Qumran Cave 4
4QtgJob	Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 4
4QtgLev	Targum of Leviticus from Qumran Cave 4
4QZodiac	Magical text from Qumran Cave 4
5Q15	New Jerusalem from Qumran Cave 5
11QMelch	Melchizedek from Qumran Cave 11
11QpaleoLev	Copy of Leviticus in paleo-Hebrew script from Qumran Cave 11
11QPs^{a}	Psalms Scroll from Qumran Cave 11
11QTemple	Temple Scroll from Qumran Cave 11
11QtgJob	Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 11

Targumic Material

Tg. Onq.	Targum Onqelos
Tg. Neb.	Targum of the Prophets
Tg. Ket.	Targum of the Writings
Frg. Tg.	Fragmentary Targum
Sam. Tg.	Samaritan Targum
Tg. Isa	Targum of Isaiah
Tg. Neof.	Targum Neofiti I
Tg. Ps.-J.	Targum Pseudo-Jonathan
Tg. Yer. I	Targum Yerušalmi I
Tg. Yer. II	Targum Yerušalmi II
Yem. Tg.	Yemenite Targum
Tg. Esth I, II	First or Second Targum of Esther

Order and Tractates in the Mishna, Tosepta and Talmud Same-named tractates in the Mishna, Tosepta, Babylonian Talmud and Jerusalem Talmud are distinguished by m., t., b. and y. respectively.

'Abot	'Abot	Nazir	Nazir
'Arak.	'Arakin	Ned.	Nedarim
'Abod. Zar.	'Aboda Zara	Neg.	Nega'im
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	Nez.	Neziqin
Bek.	Bekorot	Nid.	Niddah
Ber.	Berakot	Ohol.	Oholot
Beṣa	Beṣa (= Yom Ṭob)	'Or.	'Orla
Bik.	Bikkurim	Para	Para
B. Meṣ.	Baba Meṣi'a	Pe'a	Pe'a
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma	Pesaḥ.	Pesaḥim
Dem.	Demai	Qinnim	Qinnim
'Erub.	'Erubin	Qidd.	Qiddušin
'Ed.	'Eduyyot	Qod.	Qodašin
Giṭ.	Giṭṭin	Roš Haš.	Roš Haššana
Ḥag.	Ḥagiga	Sanh.	Sanhedrin
Ḥal.	Ḥalla	Šabb.	Šabbat
Hor.	Horayot	Šeb.	Šebi'it
Ḥul.	Ḥullin	Šebu.	Šebu'ot
Kelim	Kelim	Šeqal.	Šeqalim
Ker.	Keritot	Soṭa	Soṭa
Ketub.	Ketubot	Sukk.	Sukka
Kil.	Kil'ayim	Ta'an.	Ta'anit
Ma'aś.	Ma'aśerot	Tamid	Tamid
Mak.	Makkot	Tem.	Temura
Makš.	Makširin (= Mašqin)	Ter.	Terumot
Meg.	Megilla	Ṭohar.	Ṭoharot
Me'il.	Me'ila	Ṭ. Yom	Ṭebul Yom
Menaḥ.	Menaḥot	'Uq.	'Uqṣin
Mid.	Middot	Yad.	Yadayim
Miqw.	Miqwa'ot	Yebam.	Yebamot
Mo'ed	Mo'ed	Yoma	Yoma (= Kippurim)
Mo'ed Qaṭ.	Mo'ed Qaṭan	Zabim	Zabim
Ma'aś. Š.	Ma'aśer Šeni	Zebaḥ.	Zebaḥim
Našim	Našim	Zer.	Zera'im

Other Rabbinic Works

'Abot R. Nat.	'Abot de Rabbi Nathan
'Ag. Ber.	'Aggadat Berešit
Bab.	Babylonian
Bar.	Baraita
Der. Er. Rab.	Derek Ereṣ Rabba
Der. Er. Zuṭ.	Derek Ereṣ Zuṭ
Gem.	Gemara
Kalla	Kalla
Mek.	Mekilta
Midr.	Midraš (cited with abbreviation for biblical book; but Midr. Qoh. = Midraš Qohelet)
Pal.	Palestinian
Pesiq. R.	Pesiqta Rabbati
Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana
Pirqe R. El.	Pirqe Rabbi Eliezer
Rab.	Rabbah (following abbreviation for biblical book: Gen. Rab. = Genesis Rabbah)
Ṣem.	Ṣemaḥot
Sipra	Sipra
Sipre	Sipre
Sop.	Soperim
S. 'Olam Rab.	Seder 'Olam Rabbah
Talm.	Talmud
Yal.	Yalquṭ

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

AB	Anchor Bible
ABQ	American Baptist Quarterly
ABR	Australian Biblical Review
ACNT	The Augsburg Commentary on the New Testament
AGJU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums
AGSU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätjudentums und Urchristentums
AJBI	Annual of the Japanese Biblical Institute
AJT	American Journal of Theology
ALGHJ	Arbeiten zur Literatur und Geschichte des hellenistischen Judentums
ALUOS	Annual of Leeds University Oriental Society
AnBib	Analecta Biblica
ANF	Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, (10 vols.; 1951 [c. 1890])
ANRW	Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt
ASNU	Acta seminarii neotestamentici upsaliensis
ATANT	Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments
ATLABibS	American Theological Library Association Bibliography Series
AusBR	Australian Biblical Review
ATR	Anglican Theological Review
AUS	American University Studies
BA	Biblical Archaeologist
BAGD	W. Bauer, W. F. Arndt, F. W. Gingrich and F. W. Danker, Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature
BBB	Bonner biblische Beiträge
BBR	Bulletin for Biblical Research
BCJ	Brown Classics in Judaica
BDB	F. Brown, S. R. Driver and C. A. Briggs, Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament
BDF	F. Blass, A. Debrunner and R. W. Funk, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1961)
BETL	Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium
BG	Berlin Gnostic Codex
BGU	Ägyptische Urkunden aus den Museen zu Berlin: Griech. Urkunden I-VIII (1895-1933)
BHT	Beiträge zur historischen Theologie
Bib	Biblica
BibO	Biblica et orientalia
BibRes	Biblical Research
BibS(F)	Biblische Studien (Freiburg, 1895-)
BibS(N)	Biblische Studien (Neukirchen, 1951-)
BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester
BJS	Brown Judaic Studies
BMI	The Bible and Its Modern Interpreters
BRev	Bible Review
BS	Bollingen Series
BSac	Bibliotheca Sacra
BT	The Bible Translator
BTB	Biblical Theology Bulletin
BU	Biblische Untersuchungen
BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
BZNW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
CAH	Cambridge Ancient History
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
CCWJCW	Cambridge Commentaries on Writings of the Jewish and Christian World 200 B.C. to A.D. 200
CD	Church Dogmatics, Karl Barth
CG	Nag Hammadi Gnostic Codices
CGTC	Cambridge Greek Testament Commentary
CIG	Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum I-IV (1828-1877)
CII	Corpus Inscriptionum Iudaicarum I-II, J. B. Frey (1936-1952)
CIL	Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum I-XI (1862-1943, 2d ed. 1893-)
CNT	Commentaire du Nouveau Testament
ConB	Coniectanea biblica
CRINT	Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum, ed. S. Safrai et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974—)
CT	Christianity Today
CTM	Concordia Theological Monthly
CTR	Criswell Theological Review
CurTM	Currents in Theology and Mission
CV	Communio Viatorum
DJD	Discoveries in the Judaean Desert
DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels
DRev	Downside Review
DSB	Daily Study Bible
DTT	Dansk teologisk tidsskrift
EB	Études bibliques
EBC	The Expositor's Bible Commentary
EBT	Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology

EDNT	Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. H. Balz and G. Schneider
EGT	The Expositor's Greek Testament
EKK	Evangelisch-katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
ELS	Enchiridion Locorum Sanctorum. Documenta S. Evangelii Loca Respicientia
EncJud	Encyclopaedia Judaica
EvQ	Evangelical Quarterly
EvT	Evangelische Theologie
ExpT	Expository Times
FB	Facet Books
FF	Foundations and Facets
FIRA	Fontes Iuris Romani Antejustiniani
FJ	The Foundation of Judaism
FN	Filologia Neotestamentaria
FRLANT	Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments
GBL	Das Große Bibellexikon
GNS	Good News Studies
GNTE	Guides to New Testament Exegesis
GTJ	Grace Theological Journal
HBD	Harper's Bible Dictionary
HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology
HDB	A Dictionary of the Bible (ed. J. Hastings)
HDR	Harvard Dissertations in Religion
Herm	Hermeneia
HeyJ	Heythrop Journal
HNT	Handbuch zum Neuen Testament
HNTC	Harper's New Testament Commentaries
HSS	Harvard Semitic Studies
HTKNT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
HTS	Harvard Theological Studies
HZ	Historische Zeitschrift
IBS	Irish Biblical Studies
ICC	International Critical Commentary
IDB	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible
IDBSup	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Supplementary Volume
IEJ	Israel Exploration Journal
ILS	Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae (Berlin, 1892)
Int	Interpretation
IntC	Interpretation Commentaries
ISBE	International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (rev. ed.)
IVPNTC	InterVarsity Press New Testament Commentary
JAC	Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature
JCBRF	Journal of the Christian Brethren Research Fellowship
JCSR	Journal of Comparative Sociology and Religion
JES	Journal of Ecumenical Studies
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
JJS	Journal of Jewish Studies
JR	Journal of Religion
JRE	Journal of Religious Ethics
JRH	Journal of Religious History
JRS	Journal of Roman Studies
JSJ	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic and Roman Period
JSNT	Journal for the Study of the New Testament
JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplement Series
JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series
JSPSup	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha and Related Literature Supplement Series
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies
JTSA	Journal of Theology for South Africa
KNT	Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
KP	Der Kleine Pauly, ed. K. Ziegler
LAE	Light from the Ancient East, A. Deissmann
Louw-Nida	Greek-English Lexicon, ed. J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida
LQHR	London Quarterly and Holborn Review
LSJ	Liddell-Scott-Jones, Greek-English Lexicon
LTJ	Lutheran Theological Journal
LW	Luther's Works, ed. J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann
MBTh	Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie
MeyerK	Meyer Kommentar
MM	J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-Literary Sources (1930)
MNTC	Moffatt New Testament Commentary
MPAT	A Manual of Palestinian Aramaic Texts
MSB	Monographic Series of Benedictina
NA^{26}	Nestle-Aland, Novum Testamentum Graece 26th ed.
NAC	The New American Commentary
NCB	New Century Bible
NClB	New Clarendon Bible
NedTTs	Nederlands theologisch tijdschrift
NewDocs	New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, ed. G. H. R. Horsley

NICNT	The New International Commentary on the New Testament
NIDNTT	New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology
NovT	Novum Testamentum
NovTSup	Supplement to Novum Testamentum
NRT	La nouvelle revue théologique
NTAbh	Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen
NTD	Das Neue Testament Deutsch
NTG	New Testament Guides
NTOA	Novum Testamentum et Orbis Antiquus
NTR	New Theology Review
NTS	New Testament Studies
OBO	Orbis Biblicus et Orientalis
OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology
OCD	Oxford Classical Dictionary
OTP	The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth
PC	Proclamation Commentaries
PEQ	Palestine Exploration Quarterly
PG	Patrologia graeca, ed. J. P. Migne
PRS	Perspectives in Religious Studies
PTMS	Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series
PTR	Princeton Theological Review
QD	Quaestiones Disputatae
RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum
RB	Revue biblique
RE	Real-Encyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, Pauly-Wissowa
RelS	Religious Studies
RelSRev	Religious Studies Review
RevExp	Review and Expositor
RevQ	Revue de Qumrân
RHPR	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
RQ	Restoration Quarterly
RSB	Religious Studies Bulletin
RST	Regensburger Studien zur Theologie
RTR	Reformed Theological Review
SA	Studia Antiqua
SAJ	Studies in Ancient Judaism
SANT	Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament
SBEC	Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity
SBLASP	Society of Biblical Literature Abstracts and Seminar Papers
SBLDS	SBL Dissertation Series
SBLMS	SBL Monograph Series
SBLSBS	SBL Sources for Biblical Study
SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology
Schürer	E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.–A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes et al. (3 vols.; Edinburgh: 1973-87)
SCJ	Studies in Christianity and Judaism
ScrHier	Scripta hierosolymitana
SE	Studia Evangelica
SEÅ	Svensk Exegetisk Årsbok
SEG	Supplementum Epigraphicum Graecum (Leiden, 1923-)
SESJ	Suomen Ekseegeettisen Seuran Julkaisuja
SIG³	Sylloge Inscriptionum Graecarum (3d ed.; Leipzig, 1915-24)
SJ	Studia Judaica
SJLA	Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology
SJTOP	SJT Occasional Papers
SNTSMS	Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series
SO	Symbolae osloenses
SOTBT	Studies in Old Testament Biblical Theology
SP	Studia Patristica
SPP	Studien zur Palaeographie und Papyruskunde
SR	Studies in Religion
SSEJC	Studies in Scripture in Early Judaism and Christianity
SSRH	Sociological Studies in Roman History
ST	Studia theologica
StBT	Studia Biblica et Theologica
Str-B H.	Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
StudLit	Studia Liturgica
SUNT	Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments
SWJT	Southwestern Journal of Theology
TB	Theologische Bücherei
TD	Theology Digest
TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. G. Kittel and G. Friedrich
TDGR	Translated Documents of Greece and Rome, ed. R. K. Sherk
THKNT	Theologische Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament
TI	Theological Inquiries
TJ	Trinity Journal
TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung
TNTC	Tyndale New Testament Commentary
TPINTC	Trinity Press International New Testament Commentaries
TQ	Theologische Quartalschrift
TRE	Theologische Realenzykopädie

TS	Theological Studies
TSFBul	Theological Students Fellowship Bulletin
TToday	Theology Today
TWOT	Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament
TynB	Tyndale Bulletin
TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift
UBSGNT	United Bible Societies Greek New Testament
USQR	Union Seminary Quarterly Review
VC	Vigiliae Christianae
VoxEv	Vox Evangelica
VT	Vetus Testamentum
VTSup	Vetus Testamentum, Supplements
WA	Weimar Ausgabe
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary
WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament
WW	Word and World
ZBNT	Züricher Bibelkommentare: Neues Testament
ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
ZRG	Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte
ZS: NT	Zacchaeus Studies: New Testament
ZSTh	Zeitschrift für Systematische Theologie
ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

Transliteration

Hebrew

Consonants

א = ’
ב = b
בּ = b̲
ג = g
גּ = ḡ
ד = d
דּ = d̲
ה = h
ו = w
ז = z
ח = ḥ
ט = ṭ
י = y
כ = k
כּ = k̲
ל = l
מ = m
נ = n
ס = s ע = ‘
פ = p
פּ = p̄
צ = ṣ
ק = q
ר = r
שׁ = ś
שׂ = ś
שׁ = š
ת = t
תּ = ṯ

Long Vowels

(ה)ָ = â
ֵ = ê ִ = î
וֹ = ô
וּ = û
ָ = ā ֵ = ē ֹ = ō

Short Vowels

ַ = a
ֶ = e
ִ = i
ָ = o ֻ = u
ֲ = ᵃ
ֱ = ᵉ
ְ = ᵉ
ֳ = ᵒ

Greek

A = A
α = a
B = B
β = b
Γ = G
γ = g
Δ = D
δ = d
E = E
ε = e
Z = Z
ζ = z
H = Ē
η = ē
Θ = Th
θ = th
I = I
ι = i
K = K
κ = k
Λ = L
λ = l
M = M
μ = m
N = N
ν = n
Ξ = X
ξ = x
O = O
o = o
Π = P
π = p
P = R
ρ = r
Σ = S
σ/ς = s
T = T
τ = t
Y = Y
υ = y
Φ = Ph
φ = ph
X = Ch
χ = ch
Ψ = Ps
ψ = ps
Ω = Ō
ω = ō
῾P, ῥ = rh
῾ = h γξ = nx γγ = ng αυ = au
ευ = eu ου = ou
υι = ui

List of Contributors

Alexander, Loveday C. A., Ph.D. Lecturer in New Testament, Department of Biblical Studies, University of Sheffield, Sheffield, England: Chronology.

Arnold, Clinton E., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California, USA: Ephesians, Letter to the; Ephesus; Magic; Power.

Aune, David E., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Christian Origins, Director of Graduate Programs in Theology, Loyola University, Chicago, Illinois, USA: Apocalypticism; Emperors, Roman; Religions, Greco-Roman.

Banks, Robert J., Ph.D. Homer L. Goddard Professor of the Ministry of the Laity, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Church Order and Government.

Barclay, John M. G., Ph.D. Lecturer in Biblical Studies, University of Glasgow, Glasgow, Scotland: Jesus and Paul.

Barnett, Paul W., Ph.D. Bishop of North Sydney, Diocese of Sydney, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia: Apostle; Opponents of Paul; Revolutionary Movements; Tentmaking.

Barton, Stephen C., Ph.D. Lecturer in New Testment, Department of Theology, University of Durham, Durham, England: Social-Scientific Approaches to Paul.

Bauckham, Richard J., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, St. Mary's College, University of St. Andrews, St. Andrews, Scotland: Apocryphal Pauline Literature.

Beasley-Murray, George R., Ph.D. Senior Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Baptism; Dying and Rising with Christ.

Beasley-Murray, Paul, Ph.D. Senior Minister, Victoria Road South Baptist Church, Chelmsford, Essex, England: Pastor, Paul as.

Belleville, Linda L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Literature, North Park Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois, USA: Authority; Enemy, Enmity, Hatred; Moses.

Black, David Alan, D. Theol. La Mirada, California, USA: Weakness.

Blue, Bradley Byron, Ph.D. Academic Dean, Washington College Academy, Washington College, Tennessee, USA: Apollos; Food Offered to Idols and Jewish Food Laws; Law Suit; Love Feast.

Borchert, Gerald L., Ph.D. LL.B. T. Rupert and Louise Coleman Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Light and Darkness; Wrath, Destruction.

Bowers, W. Paul, Ph.D. Deputy Administrator, Accrediting Council for Theological Education in Africa, Nairobi, Kenya: Mission.

Brauch, Manfred T., Ph.D. President, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wynnewood, Pennsylvania, USA: Righteousness, Righteousness of God.

Bruce, F. F., D.D. Late Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, University of Manchester, Manchester, England: Paul in Acts and Letters.

Burge, Gary M., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Barnabas; Intercession; First Fruits, Down Payment.

Calvert, Nancy L., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament Studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Abraham.

Camery-Hoggat, Jerry A., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religion, Southern California College, Costa Mesa, California, USA: Visions, Ecstatic Experience.

Campbell, William S., Ph.D. Head of Religious and Theological Studies, Westhill College, University of Birmingham, Birmingham, England: Covenant and New Covenant; Israel; Judaizers; Olive Tree.

Chamblin, J. Knox, Th.D. Professor of New Testament, Reformed Theological Seminary, Jackson, Mississippi, USA: Freedom/Liberty; Psychology.

Clines, David J. A., M.A. Professor of Biblical Studies, University of Sheffield, Sheffield, England: Image, Image of God.

Comfort, Philip W., Ph.D. Visiting Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Futility; Idolatry; Temple.

Davids, Peter H., Ph.D. Research and Theological Teacher, Langley Vineyard Christian Fellowship, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: James and Paul.

De Lacey, Douglas R., Ph.D. Faculties of Divinity and Oriental Studies, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, England: Gentiles; Holy Days.

Dockery, David S., Ph.D. Dean, School of Theology, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Fruit of the Spirit; New Nature and Old Nature.

Dunn, James D. G., D.D. Lightfoot Professor of Divinity, University of Durham, Durham, England: Romans, Letter to the.

Ellis, E. Earle, Ph.D. Research Professor of Theology, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Ft. Worth, Texas, USA: Coworkers, Paul and His; Pastoral Letters.

Elwell, Walter, Ph.D. Professor of Bible and Theology, Wheaton College Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Election and Predestination.

Erickson, Richard J., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Seattle, Washington, USA: Flesh.

Evans, Craig A., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Prophet, Paul as.

Everts, Janet Meyer, Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Religion, Hope College, Holland, Michigan, USA: Conversion and Call of Paul;

Financial Support; Hope.

Fee, Gordon D., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada: Gifts of the Spirit.

Fowl, Stephen E., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Theology, Loyola College in Maryland, Baltimore, Maryland, USA: Imitation of Paul/ of Christ.

Fuller, Ruth M., Ph.D. Adjunct Professor, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA: Rewards.

Fung, Ronald Y. K., Ph.D. Resident Scholar and Adjunct Lecturer, China Graduate School of Theology, Hong Kong: Body of Christ; Curse, Accursed, Anathema.

Gaffin, Richard B. Jr., Th.D. Professor of Biblical and Systematic Theology, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA: Glory, Glorification.

Gempf, Conrad, Ph.D. Senior Lecturer, LBC Centre for Undergraduate and Postgraduate Theological Studies, Northwood, Middlesex, England: Athens, Paul at.

Green, Joel B., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, American Baptist Seminary of the West and Graduate Theolgical Union, Berkeley, California, USA: Crucifixion; Death of Christ.

Greidanus, Sidney, Th.D. Professor of Preaching and Worship, Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA: Preaching from Paul Today.

Gundry-Volf, Judith M., Th.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Apostasy, Falling Away, Perseverance; Conscience; Expiation, Propitiation, Mercy Seat; Foreknowledge, Divine; Universalism.

Guthrie, Donald, Ph.D. Late Lecturer in New Testament Studies and Vice-Principal, London Bible College, Northwood, England: God.

Hafemann, Scott J., Dr. Theol. Associate Professor of New Testament, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA: Corinthians, Letters to the; Paul and His Interpreters; Suffering.

Hansen, G. Walter, Th.D. Lecturer in New Testament, Trinity Theological College, Singapore, Republic of Singapore: Galatians, Letter to the; Rhetorical Criticism.

Hawthorne, Gerald F., Ph.D. Professor of Greek and New Testament Exegesis, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Marriage and Divorce, Adultery and Incest; Philippians, Letter to the.

Holmes, Michael W., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical Studies and Early Christianity, Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Textual Criticism.

Hunter, W. Bingham, Ph.D. Senior Vice President of Education and Academic Dean, Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA: Prayer.

Hurtado, Larry W., Ph.D. Professor of Religion, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada: Lord; Pre-existence; Son of God.

Keener, Craig S., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Hood Theological Seminary, Salisbury, North Carolina, USA: Man and Woman.

Kim, Seyoon, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Chongshin Theological Seminary, Seoul, Korea: Jesus, Sayings of.

Klein, William W., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado, USA: Perfect, Mature.

Kreitzer, Larry J., Ph.D. Tutor of New Testament, Regent's Park College, University of Oxford, Oxford, England: Adam and Christ; Body; Eschatology; Intermediate State; Kingdom of God/Christ; Resurrection; Travel in the Roman World.

Kroeger, C. C., Ph.D. Adjunct Associate Professor of Classical and Ministry Studies, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA: Head.

Kruse, Colin G., Ph.D. Senior Lecturer in New Testament, Ridley College, University of Melbourne, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia: Afflictions, Trials, Hardships; Call, Calling; Ministry; Servant, Service; Virtues and Vices.

Levison, John R., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, North Park College, Chicago, Illinois, USA: Creation and New Creation.

Lim, David S., Ph.D. Associate Dean and Pew Lecturer on TwoThirds World Theology, Oxford Centre for Mission Studies, Oxford, England: Fullness.

Luter, A. Boyd, Jr., Th.D. Associate Professor of Bible Exposition, Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California, USA: Gospel; Grace; Jealousy, Zeal; Name; Savior.

McGrath, Alister E., Ph.D. Lecturer in Historical and Systematic Theology, Wycliffe Hall, University of Oxford, Oxford, England: Cross, Theology of the; Justification.

McKnight, Scot, Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA: Collection for the Saints.

McRay, John R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Archaeology, Wheaton College Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Antioch on the Orontes.

McVay, John K. Ph.D. (Cand.) Assistant Professor, Pacific Union College, Angwin, California, USA: Head, Christ as.

Maile, John F., B.D. Senior Minister, West Wickham and Shirley Baptist Church, London, England: Exaltation and Enthronement; Heaven, Heavenlies, Paradise.

Marshall, I. Howard, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, Scotland: Lord's Supper.

Martin, Ralph P., Ph.D. Professor, Department of Biblical Studies, University of Sheffield, Sheffield, England: Center of Paul's Theology; Creed; Early Catholicism; God; Hymns, Hymn Fragments, Songs, Spiritual Songs; Worship.

Meye, Robert P., Th.D., Professor Emeritus of New Testament Interpretation and Dean Emeritus, School of Theology, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Spirituality.

Michaels, J. Ramsay, Th.D. Professor of Religious Studies, Southwest Missouri State University, Springfield, Missouri, USA: Paul in Early Church Tradition; Peter.

Mohrlang, Roger, D.Phil. Professor of Religion, Whitworth College, Spokane, Washington, USA: Love.

Morrice, William G., Ph.D. Part-Time Lecturer, University of Durham, Durham, England: Joy.

Morris, Leon, Ph.D. Principal Emeritus, Ridley College, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia: Faith; Forgiveness; Man of Lawlessness and Restraining Power; Mercy; Redemption; Sacrifice, Offering; Salvation; Sin, Guilt; Truth.

Mott, Stephen Charles, Ph.D. Professor of Christian Social Ethics, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA: Civil Authority; Ethics.

Mounce, Robert H., Ph.D. Professor, President Emeritus, Whitworth College, Spokane, Washington, USA: Preaching, Kerygma.

Noll, Stephen F., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Episcopal School for Ministry, Ambridge, Pennsylvania, USA: Qumran and Paul.

O'Brien, Peter T., Ph.D. Vice-Principal and Head of the New Testament Department, Moore Theological College, Newtown, New South Wales, Australia: Benediction, Blessing, Doxology, Thanksgiving; Caesar's Household, Imperial Household; Church; Colossians, Letter to the; Fellowship, Communion, Sharing; Firstborn; Letters, Letter Forms; Mystery; Mysticism.

Onesti, Karen L., Ph.D. (Cand.). Adjunct Professor of Greek Language and Exegesis, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA: Righteousness, Righteousness of God.

Osborne, Grant R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA: Hermeneutics/Interpreting Paul.

Paige, Terence P., Ph.D. (Cand.). Lecturer, Belfast Bible College, Belfast, Northern Ireland: Demons, Exorcism; Holy Spirit; Philosophy.

Painter, John, Ph.D., FAHA. Associate Professor and Reader in Religious Studies, La Trobe University, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia: World, Cosmology.

Patzia, Arthur G., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Director, Fuller in Northern California, Fuller Theological Seminary, Menlo Park, California, USA: Canon; Philemon, Letter to.

Porter, Stanley E., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Fear, Reverence; Holiness, Sanctification; Peace, Reconciliation.

Reasoner, Mark, Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Citizenship, Roman and Heavenly; Political Systems; Purity and Impurity; Rome and Roman Christianity.

Reid, Daniel G., Ph.D. Reference and Academic Books Editor, InterVarsity Press, Downers Grove, Illinois, USA: Angels, Archangels; Elements/Elemental Spirits of the World; Principalities and Powers; Prison, Prisoner; Satan, Devil; Triumph.

Robeck, Cecil M. Jr., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Church History and Ecumenics, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Knowledge, Gift of Knowledge; Prophecy, Prophesying; Tongues.

Rupprecht, Arthur A., Ph.D. Professor of Classical Languages, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Legal System, Roman; Slave, Slavery.

Schmidt, Thomas E., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California, USA: Discipline; Riches and Poverty.

Schnabel, E. J., Ph.D. Dozent, Bibelschule Wiedenest, Freie Theologische Akademie, Bergneustadt, Giessen, Germany: Wisdom.

Schreiner, Thomas R., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Bethel Theological Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Circumcision; Law of Christ; Works of the Law.

Scott, James M., Th.D. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Adoption, Sonship; Restoration of Israel.

Scott, J. Julius, Jr., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical and Historical Studies, Wheaton College Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Immortality; Life and Death.

Seifrid, Mark A., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: In Christ.

Silva, Moisés, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA: Old Testament in Paul.

Simpson, John W. Jr., Ph.D. Theology and Biblical Studies Editor, Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA: Thessalonians, Letters to the.

Stegner, William R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, Evanston, Illinois, USA: Diaspora; Jew, Paul the.

Stein, Robert H., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Bethel Theological Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Jerusalem.

Thielman, Frank, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Divinity, Beeson Divinity School, Samford University, Birmingham, Alabama, USA: Law.

Thompson, Michael B., Ph.D. Lecturer in New Testament Studies, St. John's College, Nottingham, England: Stumbling Block; Strong and Weak; Teaching/Paraenesis; Tradition.

Tidball, Derek J., Ph.D. Head of Department of Mission, Baptist Union of Great Britain, Didcot, Oxfordshire, England: Social Setting of Mission Churches.

Towner, Philip H., Ph.D. Research Fellow, Department of New Testament, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, Scotland: Households and Household Codes.

Travis, Stephen H., Ph.D. Vice-Principal and Lecturer in New Testament, St. John's College, Nottingham, England: Judgment.

Trebilco, Paul, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, Knox Theological Hall, Dunedin, New Zealand: Itineraries, Travel Plans, Journeys, Apostolic Parousia.

Trites, Allison A. Ph.D. The John Payzant Distinguished Professor of Biblical Studies, Acadia Divinity College, Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, Canada: Witness.

Twelftree, Graham H., Ph.D. Minister, Hope Valley Uniting Church, Adelaide, South Australia, Australia: Healing, Illness; Signs, Wonders, Miracles.

Watson, Duane F., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament Studies and Chair of Department of Religion and Philosphy, Malone College, Canton, Ohio, USA: Diatribe.

Winter, Bruce W., Ph.D. Warden, Tyndale House, Cambridge, England: Rhetoric.

Witherington, Ben III, Ph.D. Professor of Biblical and Wesleyan Studies, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio, USA: Christ; Christology.

Wright, David F., M.A. Senior Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, New College, The University of Edinburgh, Edinburgh, Scotland: Homosexuality; Sexuality, Sexual Ethics.

Wu, Julie L., Ph.D. Resident Faculty of New Testament Studies, Logos Evangelical Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Liturgical Elements.

Yamauchi, Edwin M., Ph.D. Professor of History, Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, USA: Gnosis, Gnosticism; Hellenism.

A

ABBA. See ADOPTION, SONSHIP; GOD; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; PRAYER.

ABRAHAM

Paul uses Abraham as a key figure in the development of his argument in his letters to the Galatians* and Romans.* He uses Abraham in a less significant way in 2 Corinthians.* Abraham figured prominently in Jewish literature contemporary with Paul, and these traditions provide a background against which Paul's use of Abraham in his letters may be better understood.

1. Abraham in the OT and Jewish Literature
2. Abraham in Galatians
3. Abraham in Romans
4. Abraham in 2 Corinthians

1. Abraham in the OT and Jewish Literature.

The role played by the patriarchs became increasingly important to the Jewish people after they returned from exile in Babylon. Abraham was one of these important figures whose stature is reflected in extrabiblical Jewish literature and in the NT.

1.1. Abraham in the OT. Later accounts of Abraham are based on the Genesis stories of the patriarch. The depiction of the life of Abraham is found in the first book of the Hebrew Bible, from his inclusion in the genealogy of his father, Terah (Gen 11:27), to his death and burial (Gen 25:7-10). The major events in Abraham's life are his leaving his father and birthplace (Gen 12:1), his sojourns in Egypt and Gerar (Gen 12:10-20; 20:1-18), his battle with the kings (Gen 14:1-16), his meeting with Melchizedek (Gen 14:17-20), God's* covenant with him (Gen 15:7-21; 17:2, 4), his union with Hagar and the birth of Ishmael (Gen 16:1-15), God's commandment of circumcision for Abraham and his descendants (Gen 17:9-14), the promise of the birth of Isaac (Gen 17:15-21), the birth of Isaac (Gen 21:1-7), the proposed offering of Isaac (Gen 22:1-19) and the death and burial of Sarah (Gen 23:1-20).

Four primary themes are found in the Genesis account: the promises from God that Abraham would have many descendants (Gen 12:2; 13:16; 15:5; 17:2, 4; 22:17) and the gift of a land (Gen 12:7; 13:14-15; 15:7), the obedience of Abraham (12:1-4; 17:1; 22:16-18) and the subsequent blessing of all nations through Abraham (Gen 12:3; 22:18).

Within the OT Abraham functions in three primary ways. First, he is the father of the Jewish people (Gen 25:19; 26:15, 24; 28:13; 32:9; 48:15-16; Ex 3:6; Deut 1:8; 6:10; 9:5; 30:20; Josh 24:3; 1 Chron 1:27-28, 34; 16:13; Ps 105:6; Is 41:8; Jer 33:26; Mic 7:20). Second, he is the original source of blessing for the Jewish people (Gen 26:24; 28:4; 35:12; 50:24; Ex 2:24; 6:3-8; 32:13; 33:1; Num 32:11; Deut 1:8; 6:10; 9:5, 27; 29:13; 30:20; 34:4; 2 Kings 13:23; 1 Chron 16:15-16; 2 Chron 20:7; Ps 105:7-11, 42; Is 51:2; Mic 7:20). Third, his name is used to identify the God of the Jewish people as "the God of Abraham" (Gen 28:13; 31:42, 53; 32:9; Ex 3:6, 15-16; 4:5; 1 Kings 18:36; 1 Chron 29:18; 2 Chron 30:6; Ps 47:9).

Abraham functions in three additional noteworthy ways. His obedience to God and his laws (Gen 26:4-5; see also Neh 9:7-8) was the basis for the blessing of his descendants. God's compassion toward the Jewish people is sometimes invoked on the basis of his covenant with Abraham (Deut 9:27; 2 Kings 13:23; Mic 7:18-20). Finally, God brings Abraham out of the midst of idolatry* (Josh 24:2-3).

1.2. Abraham in Early Jewish Literature. The authors of Jewish literature from 200 B.C. to A.D. 200 used many of the same themes found in the OT accounts in accordance with their particular situations. Josephus and Philo portray Abraham as one who assimilates pagan, particularly Hellenistic, culture (e.g., Josephus Ant. 1.8.2 §§166-68; Philo Abr. 88). In other texts Abraham is one who isolates himself from Gentile influence (Jub. 22:16; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 6:4). The authors of these texts have both apologetic and didactic motives. The Jews are instructed to live in their respective situations in the same way that Abraham is portrayed as living in a particular context.

Four major themes are found in these texts. First, the stress on Abraham as a tenacious monotheist, often portrayed as the first of his kind, is prevalent in texts from both Palestine and the Diaspora from 200 B.C. to A.D. 200 (Jub. 11:16-17; 12:1-5, 16- 21; 20:6-9; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 6:4; Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §§154-57; Philo Abr. 68-71, 88; Apoc. Ab. 1-8). Second, God establishes a covenant* with Abraham through which his descendants are blessed (Jub. 15:9-10; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 7:4; 1QapGen 21:8-14) and are shown compassion (Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 30:7; Pss. Sol. 9:8-11; T. Levi 15:4; As. Mos. 3:8-9). However, sometimes one must obey the stipulations of the covenant in order to remain within it (Jub. 15:26-27). Eventually other nations would be blessed as well (Sir 44:21). Third, Abraham's character is extolled. He is righteous (T. Abr. 1:1A), hospitable (T. Abr. 1:1-3A; Philo Abr. 107-110; Josephus Ant. 1.11.2 §196) and virtuous (Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §154; Philo Abr. 68). He is faithful (Sir 44:20; 1 Macc 2:52; Jub. 17:17-18), he loves God (Jub. 17:18) and is even called the friend of God (CD 3:2-4). Josephus maintains that Abraham and his seed are rewarded because of the patriarch's virtue and piety (Ant. 1.13.4 §234). Fourth, Abraham lived according to the Mosaic Law (Jub. 15:1-2; 16:20; Sir 44:20) or the natural/philosophical law (Philo Abr. 3-6). Abraham is alive (4 Macc 7:19; 16:25; T. Levi 18:14; T. Jud. 25:1; T. Benj. 10:6) and praises those who die for keeping the Law (4 Macc 13:13-18). Abraham established the covenant by being circumcised (Sir 44:20). Additionally, Abraham is noted for his powers of intercession (T. Abr. 18:10-11A) and his ascension to the heavens where he receives revelation (Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 18:5; T. Abr. 10—14; Apoc. Abr. 15:4- 30).

2. Abraham in Galatians.

2.1. The Situation in Galatia. From the letter itself it is evident that Gentile Christians were part of the community at Galatia (Gal 4:8) and that some persons came among them who contradicted Paul's gospel and confused these recent converts (Gal 1:7-9; 5:8-10). These persons persuaded Gentile converts to obey stipulations of Mosaic Law* (Gal 3:1-2; 4:8-10), especially circumcision* (Gal 5:2-3; 6:12-13). In view of the evidence in the letter, it seems most likely that Paul's opponents* were Jewish Christians (Gal 4:30; Paul refers to them as preaching "another gospel" in Gal 1:6-9; see Judaizers).

Many scholars have noted that Abraham must have played a central role in the arguments of Paul's opponents. For example, J. C. Beker maintains Paul's opponents were those who thought that the Gentiles'* turning to Christ was not enough. In order to be sure that God's blessing was upon them and that they were true children of Abraham, they had to participate fully in the Torah (Beker, 42-44).

2.2. The Text of Galatians.

2.2.1. Galatians 3:1—3:14. Paul's angry tone is evident from the beginning of his letter to the Galatians, omitting as it does the thanksgiving section usually found in his letters. He calls them "foolish" (Gal 3:1, 3) for having been "bewitched" (Gal 3:1) into obeying the requirements of the Law (Gal 3:2, 3, 5). His scathing questions in Galatians 3:1-5 serve to pinpoint his themes in his discussion which follows.

In his barbed questions, Paul sets up an antithesis between "works of the Law"* (ergōn nomou) and "hearing with faith" (akoēs pisteōs). Did God work miracles among them by their doing "works of the Law" or by their "hearing with faith?" (Gal 3:5). Paul's major concern here is to alert his readers to the contrast between "hearing with faith" and "works of the Law" and for them to consider the gross error into which they have fallen.

Paul's argument from Scripture, which is his answer to his own previous rhetorical questions (Betz, 130), revolves around Abraham: "just as Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness" (Gal 3:6). B. Byrne points out that the use of kathōs ("just as") implies that what follows corresponds to what has just been described (Byrne, 148). Abraham becomes the one who believed in God and, by God's action, was reckoned righteous. This corresponds to the Spirit supplied by God because of the faith of the Galatian believers. The receipt of the Spirit by the Galatian believers is parallel to Abraham's receipt of righteousness* (Barclay, 80; see Holy Spirit).

In using Abraham to discuss the contrast of faith versus works, Paul is using Abraham in a new way. Previously Judaism had viewed Abraham's faith and his works together. For example, in Jubilees Abraham is not only the first to separate from his family and worship* the one Creator God* (Jub. 11:16-17; 12:16-21), but he also observes stipulations of the Mosaic Law such as the Feast of Tabernacles (Jub. 16:20; cf. 22:1-2). In Philo's works Abraham is portrayed as following the natural law (Philo Abr. 275-76). To Philo, the law of nature and the Law of Moses are identical. Only law which was revealed by God, the creator of nature, can really be in accordance with natural law. By following the natural law Abraham becomes an example of obedience to the Law for his descendants (Philo Abr. 6).

Philo is the only one who actually tells us that Genesis 15:6 was interpreted to mean that Abraham believed in the one Creator God in contrast to other gods or philosophies. Genesis 15:6 states "and Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness." Philo describes Abraham by saying "he is spoken of as the first person to believe in God, since he first grasped a firm and unswerving conception of the truth that there is one Cause above all and that it provides for the world and all that there is therein" (Philo Virt. 216). Abraham is the first one to be spoken of in both the LXX and the Hebrew Bible as believing in God. Most often those who spoke of the faith of Abraham spoke of it as faith in the one God (Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §§155-56; Apoc. Abr. 7:10; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 6:4; 23:5) in contrast to idolatry. The law, whether Mosaic or natural (see above), was a necessary corollary to his belief in God. Because Abraham was believed to have embodied these characteristics, he functioned as an ideal representative of the Jewish people.

In Galatians 3:7 Paul commands the Galatian believers to recognize from his proof in Galatians 3:6 (cf. Gen 15:6; Betz, 141) that "it is the people of faith who are the sons of Abraham." Anyone among them who was at all familiar with the traditions of Abraham as the first monotheist and anti-idolater would realize that the Jewish people had interpreted Abraham as the man of faith* all along. This statement of Paul's would ring true. To them the descendants of Abraham—the Jews—would be the people of faith in God.

Paul again uses Scripture to back up his claim that the children of Abraham are those who have faith in God. In Galatians 3:8-9 he states, "And the Scriptures, seeing that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, declared the gospel beforehand to Abraham saying that 'All the Gentiles will be blessed in you.' " Paul personifies the Scripture, saying that it saw in advance that God would justify the Gentiles by faith and declared the gospel beforehand to Abraham that all the Gentiles would be blessed in him (Gal 3:8; Gen 12:3). Paul understands the promise to Abraham that he would be a blessing to the nations (Gentiles) as the anticipatory preaching of the gospel* to Abraham. Because the message of the gospel was that justification* comes by faith, and thus Gentiles were included in justification, the announcement that God would bless the Gentiles through Abraham anticipated the gospel.

In the meantime Paul picks up the other thread of his argument, the "works of the Law" (Gal 3:10). Using Deuteronomy 27:26, Habakkuk 2:4 and Leviticus 18:5 Paul argues that obedience to Law does not bring righteousness. He uses Deuteronomy 21:23 to show that the era of faith has now arrived through Christ's becoming a curse* and providing redemption from the curse of the Law (Gal 3:13; Byrne, 156). It is probable that Paul is dealing here with the very passages that his opponents used in their message in support of the Law (Longenecker, 116-21, 124).

In Galatians 3:14 Paul includes two purpose clauses. Christ became a curse and provided redemption* from the curse of the Law in order that in Christ Jesus the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles (cf. Gal 3:8). The second purpose clause is parallel to the first: "In order that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (3:14b). The Spirit becomes the blessing of Abraham which has come upon the Gentiles (Betz, 143). This blessing is by faith (Gal 3:1-5) in Christ (Gal 3:14). Formerly the promise to Abraham referred to land and descendants. But now the promise refers to the Spirit which is a foretaste of the inheritance of the world to come (Byrne, 156-57). And if the Gentiles in Galatia have the Spirit, which is the blessing promised to Abraham in Christ, they have the sign that they are members of the descendants of Abraham.

What is noteworthy in the letter thus far is that Paul alludes to two aspects of Judaism that are also related to the major traditions about Abraham found in Jewish texts mentioned above: faith and Law. Paul has argued forcefully against the Law. The Gentiles have received the blessing of Abraham, the Spirit, solely according to their faith. If the opponents are using Abraham in their arguments to convince the Gentiles that they must be obedient to the Mosaic Law, especially with regard to circumcision, it would seem that they are aware of the tradition of Abraham's obedience to the Law and are making use of that tradition (see also Hansen, 172).

2.2.2. Galatians 3:15-18. Paul begins this section by referring to an everyday example, namely a person's testament or will, which is neither annulled nor added to once it has been ratified. Paul uses this example to discuss Abraham by showing that the promises, originally made to Abraham and his seed (Gal 3:16), were made not to many but to one, which actually refers to Christ (Gen 12:7; 22:17-18). Paul plays upon the word seed, which, in both Hebrew and Greek (Heb zera'; Gk sperma), is a collective singular (Ellis, 73). The one descendant, Christ, represents not only the fulfillment of the promises to Abraham (Gal 3:8, 14) but also represents the head of the spiritual race and, subsequently, the solidarity of believers. Gentiles, who were formerly considered to be outside of the descendants of Abraham, are now included within the realm of his descendants by virtue of their faith in Christ.

Paul next argues from a chronological standpoint. The Law actually came 430 years after the covenant that God ratified with Abraham (Gal 3:17); in fact the Law was "added" (Gal 3:19). God's promise to Abraham is foundational and unchanging (Gal 3:16, 18). Those who are children of Abraham "in Christ" benefit from the promise and inheritance he received before the coming of the Law.

If the opponents of Paul in Galatia are using the popular tradition that Abraham obeyed the Law (see above), the opponents must also have argued that Abraham was obedient to the Law before it was given by Moses. If this was the example of Abraham which the opponents were giving to the believers in Galatia, Paul must argue forcefully that the Mosaic Law actually came after the promise had been made to Abraham. If the Mosaic Law arrived centuries after the promise to Abraham, then Abraham could not have been obedient to that Law. This new chronology (overturning the rabbinic exegetical "principle" that in the Torah there is no before or after) establishes the priority of Paul's gospel of justification by faith over the opponents' insistence of obedience to the Law.

2.2.3. Galatians 3:19-22. In this section Paul addresses the reasons why Law was necessary (Gal 3:19). It was added because of transgressions until the offspring (Christ) should come to whom the promises had been made (Gal 3:19; cf. Gal 3:16). According to Paul, God gave Abraham this inheritance directly through promise: "For if the inheritance is based on Law, it does not come from the promise; but God granted it to Abraham through the promise" (Gal 3:18). Paul states that the Law, however, was "ordained through angels by means of a mediator" (Gal 3:19). The giving of the Law by angels* was a common Jewish tradition (LXX Deut 33:2; LXX Ps 67:18 Jub. 2:2; 1 Enoch 60:1; also NT, Acts 7:38, 53; Heb 2:2). Paul deviates from the tradition in that he argues that the giving of the Law by angels is taken as a point against the Law. In his contrast between the direct communication of the promises to Abraham and the indirect mediation of the Law, Paul is drawing attention to the inferiority of the Law. Not only is God's promise to Abraham prior to the Law (Gal 3:16-17), but it is superior because it was communicated directly to Abraham without a mediator.

In Galatians 3:20 Paul makes a statement that has long puzzled interpreters of Galatians: "but the mediator is not one, but God is one." The plurality associated with the "mediator" has been understood in several ways (Longenecker, 141-42). Interpreters have searched for Paul's exact referent in his allusion to the plurality of angels who served as mediators involved in giving the Law (cf. Wright for the view that Moses is the mediator). But this is to miss Paul's overall point. The most important item to glean from Paul's statement is that somehow the Law coming through angels via the agency of a mediator implies more than one intermediary in contrast to God, who gave the promise to Abraham and who is one. In reference to Jewish monotheism of the day, this kind of statement, which contrasts the oneness of God* who gave the promise to Abraham with the plurality of intermediaries through whom the Law was given, clearly demonstrates again the superiority of the promise to Abraham over the Law.

It was noted above that popular traditions of Abraham found in Jewish literature included the notion that Abraham was the first monotheist and that he obeyed the Law before it was given. If these traditions were also held by Paul's opponents, their appeal to the example of Abraham probably had something to do with his monotheism and obedience to Law. In Galatians 3:20, using the opponents' own contentions and the popular traditions which linked Abraham to monotheism and Law, Paul demonstrates that the Law is actually second-rate when compared to God's promises to Abraham. Consequently, if the promises are superior to the Law, and if it is through the promises to Abraham that the inheritance comes to those united in Christ (the "one" seed, Gal 3:16), the Law becomes superfluous. Not only does being a descendant of Abraham no longer mean that one has to follow Jewish Law, but obedience to the Law which is based upon a plurality is now a contradiction of the oneness of God.

2.2.4. Galatians 3:23-29. In this section Paul uses the example of the paidagōgos (NRSV "disciplinarian") to explain the function of the Law. The use of a paidagōgos was a prevalent custom in Paul's day. It entailed placing one's child or children under the care or oversight of a trusted slave until the child reached late adolescence. Just what Paul had in mind when he related the paidagōgos to the Law has been much debated. Rather than viewing the paidagōgos in terms of severity as had previously been the case (Betz, 177-78), more recently scholars have concentrated upon positive aspects of the paidagōgos. For example, the guardianship of the paidagōgos protected the charge from outside immoral influences (Young, Gordon). In Galatians 3:24 Paul associates the Law with paidagōgos which functioned "until Christ came, in order that we might be justified by faith" (Gal 3:24). Once faith came, the paidagōgos was no longer necessary (Gal 3:25).

Jewish literature testifies that one of the primary functions of the Law was that it served to separate and protect Israel from her Gentile neighbors (Jub. 20:6-10; 21:21-24; 22:16-19; Josephus Ant. 1.10.5 §192). Another aspect of the Law, particularly circumcision, was to identify the Jewish people (Quaest. in Gen. 3.49; cf. Jub. 15:26). In the context of Paul's letter to the Galatians he speaks primarily of those aspects of Law that were especially known to identify the Jewish people (circumcision, food* laws, and the observation of the Sabbath and festival days; see Holy Days). One way that the Law functioned as a paidagōgos was to guard the Jewish people from outside influences of idolatry and immorality. Paul says that now that faith has come, the Law is no longer necessary. The Law as a protective device in a community like the one at Galatia, where both Gentile and Jewish Christians exist side by side, is obsolete because they all have faith and belong to the same community "in Christ"* (Gal 3:26). Separation by means of Law is now unnecessary. Additionally, the identifying symbol of circumcision is no longer necessary. All the believers in Galatia were now one in Christ Jesus (Gal 3:28). Because the believers in Galatia are one by virtue of their faith in Christ, they are Abraham's descendants and heirs of the promise made to him (Gal 3:29; cf. Gal 3:8).

2.2.5. Galatians 4:1-11. In Galatians 4:1-2 Paul uses the imagery of an heir who, as a child, is under "guardians and trustees" until the date set by his father. Paul is probably referring to practices in Roman law in which guardians were appointed over a minor by the father either in a will or in a court of law (Belleville, 63). The father could also stipulate the age at which the child would no longer be under such guardians. Paul asserts the temporary nature of the Law, and it is apparent that the heir is not in control of his own affairs. In this sense the heir is no better than a slave.*

It is the minors, probably Jews (cf. Gal 3:23, 25; 4:1-2; Longenecker, 165), who were enslaved to the "elements of the world"* (stoicheia tou kosmou). However, now that the "fullness of time has come" (Gal 4:4; cf. Gal 4:2) both Gentiles and Jews are heirs, the Spirit being proof that they are no longer slaves (Gal 4:6-7).

In Galatians 4:8 Paul addresses the Gentiles alone. In the previous age they neither knew God nor were they recognized by God. They were enslaved by things which by nature "were not gods." The phrase "were not gods" is a familiar one in Septuagintal literature where it refers to idols (2 Chron 13:9-10; Is 37:18-19; Jer 2:11-28). Paul accuses them of returning to their former idolatry (Gal 4:9).

In the context of the situation in Galatia, these Gentile believers are being persuaded to obey different aspects of Jewish Law (Gal 5:2-3; 6:12-13; 4:10; see also above). Paul compares their obedience to the Law with their former idolatry (Gal 4:8-9) and to their enslavement under the "elements of the world" (stoicheia tou kosmou). Both obedience to the Law and idolatry are forms of enslavement under these "elements of the world." Obedience to the Law has become tantamount to idolatry.

It was noted above that in Jewish traditions about Abraham he was portrayed as believing in the one Creator God in contrast to other gods or philosophies.* Most often Jews who spoke of the faith of Abraham thought of it as faith in the one God in contrast to idolatry (Jub. 11:16-17; 12:2-8, 16-24; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 6:4; 23:5; Philo Abr. 68-71; Apoc. Abr. 1—8). For Paul both Jewish and Gentile believers are now true children of Abraham (Gal 3:29; 4:6-7). As such they are no longer to be enslaved to the elements of the world, which formerly functioned as Gentile paganism and Jewish Law. In equating the observance of Law with idolatry, Paul makes the Law the ultimate taboo for a true child of Abraham. Like Abraham the anti-idolater, these children of Abraham are to avoid idolatry. In Galatians 4:1-10, however, now that these children of Abraham have a new identity "in Christ," the idolatry to be avoided is obedience to the Law.

2.2.6. Galatians 4:12-20. In Galatians 4:12-20 Paul speaks of the Galatians' response to his first preaching of the gospel and his desire to see them again. In Galatians 4:14 Paul states that when he visited them they welcomed him "as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus." This is the only place in his letters where Paul compares himself to an angel. His commendation of the Galatians for welcoming him as a superhuman being (Longenecker, 192) is cryptic; it may go back to the allusion in Galatians 1:8 or even the story in Acts 14:8-18.

Another major tradition about Abraham is that he was known for his hospitality (T. Abr. 1:2A; 1:10B; Josephus Ant. 1.11.2 §196; Philo Abr. 107), a quality particularly exhibited in Genesis 18:1-8 where Abraham welcomes the three angelic visitors. It may be that in Galatians 4:14 Paul's intention is to imply that the believers in Galatia are true descendants of Abraham by the way that they too show hospitality to others as if they are angels.

2.2.7. Galatians 4:21—5:1. Paul's final discourse on Abrahamic descendants is found in his allegory of Sarah and Hagar (Gal 4:21—5:1). Paul's apparently arbitrary exegesis in this allegory may indicate that this was not his choice of text (Gen 16:15; 21:2-12), but that it was being used by his opponents to their own advantage (Lincoln, 12; Barclay, 91). Paul constructs the allegory around the literal sons of Abraham, Isaac and Ishmael. Hagar is interpreted to represent the covenant of slavery, the Law (Gal 4:24-25). Sarah is interpreted to represent the covenant of freedom (Gal 4:24, 26). Anyone (even those at Jerusalem,* Gal 4:25) who is in bondage to the Law (Gal 4:24) is actually enslaved and will not inherit with the true children. The children of promise, who are born of Isaac (Gal 4:28), are members of the heavenly Jerusalem (Gal 4:26) and are more numerous than those in bondage (Gal 4:27).

Paul concludes the allegory in Galatians 4:28—5:1. He identifies the Galatians as being like Isaac, the children of promise (Gal 4:28). At the present time the persecution they are experiencing is like that which Isaac experienced at the hand of Ishmael (Gen 21:9; Gal 4:29; see also Betz, 249-50). Paul uses Genesis 21:10 as instruction for the present: the Galatians who are being persecuted for not being obedient to the Law are to "cast out" those who are persecuting them (Gal 4:30; Lincoln, 22-29). They are children of the free woman; Christ has set them free from the Law. They are commanded not to submit again to the Law, the "yoke of slavery" (Gal 5:1; see also Gal 4:3, 9).

3. Abraham in Romans.

Most of the discussion of Abraham is found in Romans 4 where Paul uses the patriarch to show how Gentiles as well as Jews can now be righteous before God by virtue of their faith in Jesus Christ. In Romans 9—11 Paul again refers to Abraham in order to show how God's promises to his chosen people have not failed (Rom 9:6).

3.1. The Situation in Rome. Paul's purpose in writing Romans* has been a matter of debate (Donfried; see Rome). It is likely that the house churches (Rom 16:5, 10-11, 14-15) to which Paul writes were influenced to some degree by the Jewish community (Dunn, xlvi, xlvii; Calvert, "Traditions") and struggled over the relationship Gentile Christians now had with God (Rom 4:2, 11-12) especially in light of practices related to Jewish Law (Rom 14:2, 5, 6, 21; Wedderburn, 33-34).

3.2. The Text in Light of Abrahamic Traditions.

3.2.1. Romans 1:1—3:26. After his section of thanksgiving and travel plans (Rom 1:8-15; see Itinerary), Paul announces his thesis statement, proclaiming that the gospel is the "power* of God for salvation to everyone who has faith," both Jew and Greek (Rom 1:16), and that through faith in this gospel the righteousness* of God is revealed (Rom 1:17; Ziesler, 186-87). In Romans 1:1—3:20 Paul shows that both idolatrous and immoral Gentiles (Rom 1:18-32; cf. Jub. 22:11-23; 1 Enoch 91:7-10; although Jews may be idolaters implicitly, see Hays, 93-94), and Jews who boast in their relationship to God and the Law (Rom 2:1- 29, esp. Rom 2:17), are condemned before God (Rom 3:9-20).

In Romans 3:21-26 Paul shows how God has continued to be righteous, but now apart from Law (Rom 3:21 cf. Rom 1:17). Participation in the realm of the righteousness of God (Ziesler, 186-87) is now to be found through faith in Jesus Christ for both Jew and Gentile (Rom 3:22): there is no distinction.

3.2.2. Romans 3:27—4:25. Romans 3:27—4:25 functions both as a clarification of what Paul has already discussed and as an introduction to the example of faith provided by Abraham. Paul uses the principle of Jewish monotheism against a common contention of Jewish particularism. Because God is one, he is the God of both Jews and Gentiles (Rom 3:29). And because God is one, he justifies both Jews and Gentiles on the basis of the same criterion—faith (Rom 3:30). Jews and Gentiles then have equal access to salvation. "This is, in effect, an argument against the law as being in any way necessary for salvation" (Sanders 1977, 489). Through his example of Abraham, Paul will show how his interpretation actually upholds the Law (Rom 3:31).

Paul first identifies Abraham in a strictly Jewish sense as "our forefather according to the flesh" (Rom 4:1) and asks what it was that Abraham "found" (the verb is heuriskō). Several traditions of Abraham depicted him finding the one God (see above; especially Philo Abr. 68-71 and Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 154-57, where he discerns God's existence from the creation). It is generally held that Paul in Romans 1:18-32 is indebted to the Hellenistic Jewish thought that lies behind Wisdom 12—15, if not to that text itself (Dunn, 56-57; Calvert, "Traditions"). Wisdom 13:6-9 speaks of people seeking to find (heuriskō) God. Additional texts which refer to people "finding" (heuriskō) God through intellectual discovery are also present in the LXX (Is 55:6; 65:1), the works of Philo (Spec. Leg. 1.36; Leg. All. 3.47) and the NT (Acts 17:26-27; Rom 10:20). In Romans 4:17 Paul also refers to Abraham as believing in God the Creator (see below). This belief in the one God as the Creator was foundational to Jewish monotheism. Only if the God of the Jews was the Creator was he the one, true God (cf. Sib. Or. Fr. 1.7). In the context of Paul's discussion of idolatry in Romans 1, in his use of "one God" in proving that both Jew and Gentile are justified by faith (Rom 3:29-30) and in his introduction of the example of Abraham, it may be that he expects his readers to assume he will speak of Abraham who "found" the one, true Creator God.

A second natural response of someone who was familiar with the traditions of Abraham would be that not only was he the first monotheist, but that he obeyed the Law (see 1.2 above) even before it was given. Paul foresees this interpretation in his statement in Romans 4:2: "For if Abraham was justified by works, he has something to boast about, but not before God." Paul already used the term for boasting* to describe the boasting by the Jews in reference to their perceived privileged status (Rom 2:17, 23; 3:27). Abraham, who was understood to have been obedient to the Law before it was given and who represented the ideal Jew, could indeed boast—but not before God (Rom 4:2). If Abraham could not boast in his works, who among the Jewish Christians could then be so bold as to boast in their obedience to the Law?

Paul proves why it is that Abraham cannot boast in his works before God by citing Genesis 15:6, "Abraham believed God and it was reckoned to him as righteousness." Abraham becomes a paradigmatic type of how it is that God makes human beings righteous (Sanders 1983, 33). In clarifying what he means by "reckoned" Paul uses the analogy of one who works and to whom wages are paid, not as a gift but as what is due (Rom 4:4), in contrast to one who believes in him who justifies the ungodly (Rom 4:5). All of this is given in order that Paul may answer his first question about what Abraham found. Through his faith Abraham found grace* (Rom 4:4; cf. Gen 18:3; 30:27; 32:5; 33:8, 10, 15; 34:11; 39:4; 47:25, 29; 50:4).

In Romans 4:9-12 Paul shows how Abraham is the father of both the Jews (circumcised) and the Gentiles (uncircumcised). The figure of Abraham was connected with circumcision* in the Jewish world because Abraham was the first to participate in the covenant of circumcision (Gen 17:9-14; Sir 44:20). Referring to the "blessed" whose sins are forgiven (Rom 4:7-8; cf. Ps 32:1-2), Paul asks whether this blessedness is "pronounced on the circumcised alone, or also upon the uncircumcised?" (Rom 4:9). In order to answer the question Paul begins by paraphrasing Genesis 15:6: It was Abraham's faith that resulted in God's forgiveness* because Abraham as a result of his faith was reckoned righteous. Through further rhetorical questions in Romans 4:10-12 Paul proves that Abraham was reckoned righteous while he was uncircumcised (Rom 4:10; cf. Gen 15:6, Gen 17). For Paul circumcision was a seal of the righteousness Abraham had by faith while he was yet uncircumcised (Rom 4:11). Thus Abraham is the father of all those who believe who are not circumcised and who are reckoned righteous (Gentiles; Rom 4:11), and of those who are not only circumcised but who also follow the example of the faith of Abraham while he was still uncircumcised (Jews; Rom 4:12). Whereas circumcision once marked one as a descendant of Abraham (Gen 17:9-14), Paul has shown that by virtue of their common faith in Christ, both Gentiles and Jews have Abraham as their father.

Paul's concern in Romans 4:13-17 is the promise to Abraham and his seed. He states that the promise did not come through the Law but through the "righteousness of faith" (Rom 4:13). What Abraham was to inherit here, as in other Jewish literature, was not just the land of promise but the world (Rom 4:14; Sir 44:21; Jub. 17:3; 22:14; 32:19; Philo Som. 1.175; Dunn, 213). The necessity of the Law for the Jewish people was a major part of their identity. Paul is refuting the idea that in order to be an heir of the promise of Abraham, one has to be Jewish in terms of obedience to the Mosaic Law. Paul further states that if "those of the Law" (hoi ek nomou) are the heirs, then "faith is empty and the promise is nullified" (Rom 4:14). According to Dunn the phrase should be taken to mean those who saw their continuing existence as Jews arising out of the Law, which determined all that was characteristic and distinctive in all that they were and did as God's people (Dunn, 213-14). If those who identify themselves as the people of God by their obedience to the Law are heirs, then faith is empty because it is not the basis for the inheritance. Additionally, the Law brings wrath* and reveals transgression (Rom 4:15).

Most Jews would have seen the function of the Law in a positive light as that which both identified them and separated them from other nations. Instead Paul here points out negative functions of the Law. Paul's gives a further reason why the promise must be according to faith: the promise must be according to grace so that it may be guaranteed to all the descendants of Abraham. It is not only for those Christians who identify themselves as the people of God by virtue of their obedience to the Law (Rom 4:16) but also for those Christians who share the faith of Abraham who is the "father of many nations" (Rom 4:17; 12:3; 22:18). Abraham is not merely the father of the chosen nation Israel.

Abraham's faith is described by two familiar phrases from Jewish literature (Rom 4:17). Abraham's faith was in God's creative ability to call into being that which existed from that which did not exist (2 Apoc. Bar. 21:4; 48:8; Philo Rer. Div. Her. 36; Spec. Leg. 4.187; 2 Macc 7:28). And Abraham had faith in the God "who gives life to the dead" (Rom 4:17). This description of God was also popular in Judaism as is attested by its use to describe the conversion of Gentiles (Jos. and As. 27:10). However in Romans 4:18-22 Paul explains Abraham's faith in the God who gave life to the dead by referring to the Genesis narrative. Abraham's faith in God's promise that he would become the father of many nations (Rom 4:18; Gen 15:5) did not weaken even when he considered his own body which was already "as good as dead" (impotent; Rom 4:19) or when he considered that Sarah's womb was "dead." Paul is describing Abraham's faith in God (Rom 4:21) and his promise of offspring (Rom 4:20) in spite of the physical incapability on the part of the marriage partners, himself and Sarah. Therefore it was written that Abraham's faith was "reckoned to him as righteousness" (Rom 4:21; cf. Gen 15:6 and above), not for the sake of Abraham alone, but for the sake of Paul and his readers as well (Rom 4:23-24). Faith will be reckoned as righteousness to those who believe in him who raised Jesus Christ from the dead, who was handed over to death for their trespasses and raised for their justification (Rom 4:25).

The monotheistic faith of Abraham which was so central in Jewish tradition has been transformed by Paul. The faith of believers who follow after the faith of Abraham is now in the one creator God who raised Jesus Christ from the dead so that they too could be made righteous.

3.2.3. Romans 9—11. In Romans 9—11 Paul proceeds generally to show how it is that God's word to Israel has not failed (Rom 9:6). The foundational patriarch Paul uses in his discussion is Abraham (Rom 9:3-9; 11:1). Paul's first point in his argument is that God's word has not failed because "not all of Abraham's children are his true descendants" (Rom 9:7). For proof he cites Genesis 21:12: "through Isaac descendants will be named for you." Paul further clarifies in Romans 9:8 that the children of the flesh (all ethnic Jews) are not the children of God, but the children of promise are reckoned as the descendants of Abraham (see Israel).

By using Genesis 21:12 Paul is making the point that the Jewish Christians at Rome already know that ethnic descent from Abraham is not the same as being his true descendant. It was through Isaac that Abraham's true descendants were named (cf. Rom 9:10, 13). Neither Ishmael nor the sons of Keturah (Gen 25:1-4) were counted as the true descendants of Abraham. According to Paul's proof, this is because Isaac was the descendant of the promise of God. To further support his argument Paul includes the promise from the angel to Abraham, "About this time I will return and Sarah will have a son" (Rom 9:9; Gen 18:10). Neither Hagar nor Keturah were the women through whom the promise was actualized. Only Sarah, whose childbearing years were long over (Rom 4:19), was the woman through whom God fulfilled his promise of a descendant to Abraham.

Paul's final use of Abraham in Romans occurs in Romans 11:1 where he calls himself "an Israelite, a descendant of Abraham." In view of Paul's previous discussion about the definition of a true descendant of Abraham (Rom 4:13-18; 9:7-8), it is reasonable to assume that here Paul is not simply referring to his ethnic Jewish heritage. Paul continues to argue that God's word has not failed (Rom 9:6) by showing that the stumbling of Israel has brought salvation to the Gentiles (Rom 11:11-13), who have been grafted into the people of God because of their faith (Rom 11:20). In Paul's argument "hardening" has come upon a part of Israel, and in their present unbelief (Rom 11:29) ethnic Jews have been broken off (Rom 11:20). The Jews, however, can be grafted back into the olive* tree (Rom 11:24). This leads Paul to state that with respect to the gospel, ethnic Jews are enemies,* but with respect to their election they are beloved "for the sake of their fathers" (Rom 11:28). In this case Paul gives evidence of knowing the tradition of Abraham's ethnic descendants receiving special consideration (Bib. Ant. 30:7; 35:3). God's original word has not failed (Rom 9:6). Ethnic Jews will also be among the true descendants of Abraham once again, not by virtue of their identity found in obedience to the Law but by reason of their faith. This faith will be after the example of Abraham's faith (Rom 4:17-25), a faith which has been deepened from its starting point in Jewish monotheism to incorporate faith in Jesus Christ (see God).

4. Abraham in 2 Corinthians.

In 2 Corinthians 11:22 Paul, in response to the boasts of his opponents in Corinth, calls himself a descendant of Abraham. Most scholars agree that by designating himself a "descendant of Abraham" Paul has more in mind than ethnic derivation. For example, R. P. Martin suggests that Paul is using the term for himself "as a badge of honor to mark out his Christian self-identity over against his rivals" (Martin, 375).

See also CIRCUMCISION; FAITH; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; GENTILES; ISRAEL; JUDAIZERS; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988); J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); L. L. Belleville, " 'Under Law': Structural Analysis and the Pauline concept of Law in Galatians 3:21—4:11," JSNT 26 (1986) 53-78; H. D. Betz, Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); B. Byrne, Son of God—'Seed of Abraham': A Study of the Idea of the Sonship of God of All

Christians in Paul against the Jewish Background (Rome: Biblical Institute, 1979); N. L. Calvert, "Abraham and Idolatry: Paul's Comparison of Obedience to the Law to Idolatry in Galatians 4:1-10," in Paul and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders (JSNTSup83; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); idem, "Traditions of Abraham in Middle Jewish Literature: Implications for the Interpretation of Paul's Epistles to the Galatians and to the Romans" (Ph.D. diss., University of Sheffield, 1993); K. P. Donfried, ed., The Romans Debate (rev. ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1957); T. D. Gordon, "A Note on ΠΑΙΔΑΓΩΓΟΣ in Galatians 3:24-25," NTS 35 (1989) 150-54; G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians: Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1989); A. T. Lincoln, "Abraham Goes to Rome: Paul's Treatment of Abraham in Romans 4," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (JSNTSup 87; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); idem, Paradise Now and Not Yet: Studies in the Role of the Heavenly Dimension in Paul's Thought with Special Reference to His Eschatology (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: University Press, 1982; repr., Grand Rapids: Baker, 1991); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco, TX: Word, 1986); E. P. Sanders, Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); J. M. Scott, Adoption as Sons of God (WUNT 2.48; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992); A. J. M. Wedderburn, The Reasons for Romans (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); N. T. Wright, "The Seed and the Mediator: Galatians 3.15-20," in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 157-74; N. H. Young, "Paidagōgos: The Social Setting of a Pauline Metaphor," NovT 29.2 (1987) 150-76; J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul (SNTSMS 20; Cambridge: University Press, 1972).

N. L. Calvert

ACCURSED. See CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA.

ACTS. See CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS.

ADAM AND CHRIST

Although references to the OT figure of Adam in the Pauline corpus are by no means extensive, its use is highly significant in that Adam serves as a vehicle to communicate tremendous theological truths about marriage,* sin,* death (see Life and Death), human nature and eschatological hope.* Most importantly, "Adam" stands as a theological counterpart within Paul's christological teaching, with Adam and Christ* as the two halves of an analogy explicitly formulated in both Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15.

This analogy presents Adam and Christ as corporate heads of two contrasting orders of existence and may be taken as one of the most revealing ways in which the apostle's theological thought is expressed: Adam embodies fallen humanity and Christ embodies redeemed humanity. Thus, within these two chapters we see the intersection of several key theological concerns, namely anthropology, christology, soteriology and ecclesiology. It is because of the fact that so many central Pauline themes come together in connection with the Adam-Christ analogy that it could be said to lie close to the heart of Paul's thought (see Center). It is precisely because of its central significance that the Adam-Christ analogy has remained an important focus of NT interpretation over the years.

1. Adam: The Generic Sense of the Term
2. Adam: The Historical Figure
3. Adam: The Typological Figure
4. Adam and the Image of God
5. Adam and the Body of Christ

1. Adam: The Generic Sense of the Term.

The name Adam occurs within the Pauline corpus only seven times (Rom 5:14 [twice]; 1 Cor 15:22, 45 [twice]; 1 Tim 2:13, 14), although some would see a few of the more generalized discussions about "man" (anthrōpos) as also having an Adamic background in Paul's thought. This is due to the fact that the Hebrew term 'ādām can refer to not only "Adam" the individual but to the generic "humankind" as well. It is entirely proper to view Paul's use of Adam as closely connected to a number of other anthropological images and expressions he uses to communicate the Christian experience, the new life found in Jesus Christ. Included among these are: old man/new man (Rom 6:6; Col 3:9-10; Eph 2:15; 4:22-24; see New Nature and Old Nature); outer man/inner man (2 Cor 4:16; Rom 7:22; Eph 3:15); physical man/spiritual man (2 Cor 2:14-16; see Psychology). Related to this larger anthropological sense of Adam are those passages where Paul uses the pronoun "I" in such a way as to suggest that he has in mind Adamic humankind, or humankind outside of the new experience which for believers is found in Christ (see In Christ). A good example of this is found in Romans 7:7-25 where the apostle appears to use the "I" in a corporate sense which demonstrates some overlap with the generic sense of the more explicit Adam motif.

It is virtually certain that the narrative of Genesis 2—3 underlies the use of Adam within the Pauline letters and provides the background for it. The same fascination for the figure of Adam can also be seen in a number of first-century Jewish and Christian documents, including 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch and the Apocalypse of Moses, as Levison has duly noted. Speculation about Adam is also well documented within the Qumran materials and in the writings of Paul's contemporary, Philo of Alexandria. In light of the fact that Adam figures regularly in Gnostic* materials, such as the Nag Hammadi texts, some scholars have attempted to see a link between the Adamic motif and Gnostic ideas of "a second man." Generally, this has not been well received, the evidence probably representing precisely the reverse flow of influence (it is more likely that the biblical theme is taken up by the later Gnostic writers).

All of these relevant background documents help us understand the interest that the tradition of Adam, the first created human being, generated among ancient writers and how they came to rely on it and express it in their writing. When this is recognized the Pauline discussion of the theme is seen to be wholly consistent with other documents of its day, although the specifically christological use to which it is connected distinguishes Paul's treatment. Paul seems to be the first to describe Jesus Christ as "the Last (or Second) Adam" (1 Cor 15:45, 47), a description which points unambiguously to the eschatological character of the apostle's thought.

2. Adam: The Historical Figure.

Clearly the figure Adam was understood by many first-century people to be the first historical person; this explains why Jude 14 (quoting 1 Enoch 1:9) describes Enoch as "the seventh generation from Adam" (NSRV). Luke offers similar assessment when he includes Adam within the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3:38). The historicity of Adam as the first created person appears to have been taken for granted by the apostle Paul, although such historicity is not the primary focal point of the two key Pauline texts which discuss the Adam/Christ motif.

2.1. Adam (and Eve) As Ethical Example(s). The historicity of Adam (and Eve) does, however, seem to underlie teaching within the Pauline letters concerning the man-woman relationship and, by extension, the relationship that exists between Christ and his church. Similarly, the figures of Adam and Eve are used sparingly within the Pauline letters to make a point about authority* within the divine order of creation. In both of these ways the role(s) of Adam (and Eve) as ethical example is preeminent, although the historicity of the first man (and woman) seems to be assumed as part of the ethical argument. The use of Adam (and Eve) as ethical model(s) anticipates the more typological use of Adam within the Adam/Christ analogy in Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15.

2.1.1. Adam (and Eve): Marriage and Sexual Roles. Paul alludes to the story of Adam and Eve in 1 Corinthians 6:16 via his quotation of Genesis 2:24. Although the names of the first couple are not used here, it is clear that they stand as key ethical models for how proper sexual relationships (see Sexuality) between man and woman should function in the life of the church. Paul here emphasizes the importance and sanctity of the sexual union of a man and a woman as a means to exhort the Corinthian believers to a more worthy lifestyle and impress upon them the fact that they belong to the body of Christ (see Body of Christ). The story of Adam and Eve also underlies the advice offered on the union of the marriage* relationship in Ephesians 5:22-33. Here, once again, Ephesians builds on the OT imagery of Adam and Eve and an understanding of their union with that "mystery"* which exists between Christ and the church (especially seen in Eph 5:32).

2.1.2. Adam (and Eve): Sin and the Order of Creation. 1 Timothy 2:13-14 also clearly demonstrates reliance upon the Adam and Eve story of Genesis 2—3. In a section given over to ethical teaching (1 Tim 2:9-15; see Ethics), the argument turns to the story of Adam and Eve in Genesis for scriptural support of an understanding of the authority structure, the order of creation, which exists between men and women (see Man and Woman). The emphasis is on the priority of Adam's creation (1 Tim 2:13) and the priority of Eve's deception (1 Tim 2:14) in the Garden of Eden. Adam and Eve are called into service as normative examples of how men and women should interrelate and what can happen if the proper authority structure is adhered to by subsequent peoples. In short, the point is that 1 Timothy presents Adam and Eve in a specific way, as a means of regulating conduct within the life of the church, particularly in its worship* practices. They are put forward as ethical examples from the past both to follow (as in the case of Eve's proper submission to Adam based upon her creational dependence upon him), and as models of behavior to guard against (as in the case of Eve's deception and its aftermath). Again, the historicity of the Genesis account seems to be taken for granted within this ethical explication of the story.

3. Adam: The Typological Figure.

When we turn to consider the relevant passages in Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15, we find a much more complicated and extended use of Adam by Paul. Here the focus shifts from Adam as a mere historical figure to Adam as a typological or figurative character set over against Jesus Christ (in Rom 5:14 the actual term typos, "type," is used of Adam). Commenting on the significance of Adam in the apostle's thought, C. K. Barrett remarks that "Paul sees history gathering at nodal points, and crystallizing upon outstanding figures—men who are notable in themselves as individual persons, but even more notable as representative figures" (Barrett, 5). Thus we see that in both Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15 Paul juxtaposes Adam and Christ and uses several key features of OT background to communicate christological truths about Jesus Christ who encompasses humanity in himself. We could even summarize Paul's understanding of Christian redemption as the transition from being "in Adam" to being "in Christ" as the saving movement from one sphere of life, one realm of existence, to another. Given the fact that Paul's theology arises out of an eschatological mindset (see Eschatology), with its emphasis on the new creation having supplanted the old (see Creation), it is entirely proper to see the Adam/Christ motif as expressing his teaching concerning what Scroggs has described as "eschatological humanity."

3.1. Adam and Eschatological Humanity. 1 Corinthians 15 is a self-contained discussion of the resurrection* of the dead, the primary purpose of which is not so much to assert the truth of the resurrection of Jesus (since this is assumed), as to explain its significance for the life of the faithful. Thus the chapter deals with the reality of the resurrection of Christ and its implications in the lives of the Christian believers. Within this discussion the Adam/Christ analogy is explicitly used at two points, in 1 Corinthians 15:20-22 and in 1 Corinthians 15:44-49. Christ's resurrection is the event which inaugurates and constitutes his being the "first fruits"* of those who have died (1 Cor 15:20, 23); it is in connection with this idea that the Adam/Christ analogy is initially introduced. It has been suggested (by Thrall) that the christological debate which develops in Corinth arises out of Paul's previous introduction of the Adamic motif (and the Corinthian church's misunderstanding of it). Such an idea is far from certain and assumes a vacillation in Paul's thought which is much more deliberate than this suggests.

3.1.1. Christ As Last Adam: The First Fruits. The first use of the Adam/Christ analogy is introduced by a statement (1 Cor 15:20), built upon the declaration of Christ's resurrection stated in 1 Corinthians 15:3-5. In the second half of 1 Corinthians 15:20 the meaning of Christ's resurrection is amplified—Christ is also the "first fruits of those who are asleep." In this way a new point is injected into the discussion of Christ's resurrection, namely, the unity of the risen Lord with those who believe in him. The resurrection bodies (see Body) of the redeemed (it is important to note that the focus of the discussion is on this "somatic" point) are to correspond to and flow from Christ's in the same way that the harvest corresponds to and flows from the first fruits.

It is to amplify further and explain the relationship between Christ and his believers that the Adam/Christ analogy is used by Paul; the Adam/Christ typology becomes an argument for the certainty of the resurrection of the believing community and (in Lambrecht's words) sets us a "temporal, as well as a causal," relationship between the Lord* and those who believe in him. In 1 Corinthians 15:21-22 Paul sets forth a double parallelism showing this relationship:

21a For since by a man came death,
21b so also by a man came the resurrection of the dead,

22a For as in Adam all die,
22b so also in Christ shall all be made alive.

The two verses should be taken together, as the second serves to clarify the meaning of the first. The essentially eschatological outlook of the analogy is demonstrated by the use of the future passive verb in 22b.

Some debate arises as to the universal salvation implied in verse 22. How much weight should be given to the two uses of "all" in 22b? Is Paul teaching the ultimate salvation of all humankind in Christ in the same way that he asserts the universal death of all humankind in Adam? Most commentators agree that such an idea is incompatible with the rest of Paul's teaching; throughout this letter Paul has spoken of those who perish (1 Cor 1:18; 3:17; 5:13; 6:9; 9:27). In light of this it seems that we are left to limit both (or at least the second) "all" clauses of verse 22 and have them act as modifiers of "in Adam" and "in Christ." Thus we can take the meaning of the verse to be "all who are in Adam die, while all who are in Christ shall be made alive."

3.1.2. Christ As Last Adam: The Life-Giving Spirit. 1 Corinthians 15:45-49 is a quotation of the midrashic commentary on Genesis 2:7. The section is founded on Paul's statement in 44b: "If there is a physical body, there is also a spiritual body" (NRSV). This statement in 1 Corinthians 15:44 is a summary of the preceding paragraph, beginning in 1 Corinthians 15:35, which contains a discussion about the nature of the resurrection body. Paul speaks here of both a sōma psychikon ("physical body") and a sōma pneumatikon ("spiritual body"), effectively outflanking his Corinthian opponents (as Dunn 1973, notes). The exact identification of these opponents has remained a matter of considerable scholarly debate over the years. B. Pearson, however, has identified their use of pneumatikos-psychikos terminology as forming one of the points of friction with Paul. It is in attempting to explain the relationship that exists between these two sōmata ("bodies," both psychikon and pneumatikon) that Paul turns once again to the Adam/Christ analogy in 1 Corinthians 15:45-49.

Paul quotes Genesis 2:7 from the LXX, adding the words "first" and "Adam" to the OT text in order to set up the typological contrast with Christ which follows in 1 Corinthians 15:45b: "the last Adam became a life-giving spirit" (NRSV). In setting up the contrast in the way he has, Paul is addressing the question of the "bodies" of physical and spiritual existence as can readily be seen in the use of the neuter definite articles in 1 Corinthians 15:46 (the antecedent being sōma, "body") instead of masculine ones (which would refer to anthrōpos, "man"). The point is that Adam, in having a "physical body" (NRSV), also became a "living being" (NRSV); Christ, in becoming a "spiritual body" (NRSV), also became a "life-giving spirit" (NRSV). Paul is not merely making an anthropological claim about Christ as "Last Adam" here; his meaning goes beyond that. He is also making a christological statement about the risen Lord who has manifested himself as the regenerating Spirit within the church. The passage in Genesis lent itself toward that purpose, although (as Wright notes) the connection of this christological point with the primary discussion about the "spiritual body" is not immediately obvious.

In a sense, therefore, Paul's use of the Adam/Christ analogy is not entirely consistent. In calling Christ the "life-giving spirit" Paul is making a statement about the work of Christ within the church which has no parallel on the Adamic side of the analogy. The motivating factor in Paul's use of the analogy was his desire to show that a relationship exists between Adam and the rest of humankind. But the wonder of what God had done for humankind through Christ was so great that the Adam/Christ analogy broke down. It was employed by the apostle insofar as it was useful in demonstrating the solidarity of the two Adams with their respective followers, but when it could no longer communicate or contain the message of Christ's life-transforming power in the life of the believer, it was laid aside.

It is significant that both structured references to the Adam/Christ analogy in 1 Corinthians 15 (verses 21 and 45) are followed by passages that speak of Jesus Christ in very exalted terms and are sometimes taken to express a Pauline understanding of preexistence.* Thus, in 1 Corinthians 15:25-28 there is the christological use of Psalm 8:6 and Psalm 110:1, while in 1 Corinthians 15:47-49 there is repeated reference to the "heavenly man." The question then becomes: Is there any relationship between Paul's calling Jesus Christ the "last Adam" and the exaltation/heavenly man language (see Exaltation) ascribed to him in 1 Corinthians 15:25-28 and 47-49? If there is such a relationship, a link might be discovered between Paul's Adamic theology and his belief in the preexistence of Christ, or even a vestigial "Son of man" figure. Many (like Dunn) feel that this is purely speculative and that it presses the evidence too far; we must proceed with caution. In any event, we should not allow the fascinating question of an overlap between preexistence ideas and exaltation/heavenly man language to distract us from the essentially eschatological character of the Christ/Adam analogy as it is found in this letter.

3.2. Adam and the Origin of Sin. Largely because of the narrative of Genesis 3, the figure of Adam has been one of the focal points for discussions about human sinfulness in both Judaism and Christianity (see Sin). Romans 5:12-21 contains the fullest treatment of this theme within the Pauline letters. These verses have exerted an enormous influence upon Christian theology over the centuries as various interpreters have sought to plumb the depths of the apostle's teaching about the origin of sin. Clearly Paul associates the entry of sin and death into the world with the transgression of Adam. Although in Romans 5 he is (presumably) thinking historically of the fall, it is readily apparent that he had far more in mind than a historical assessment of Adam and his rebellious act. In effect, Paul's use of Adam in Romans 5:12-21 is protological (pointing back to the beginning) in its emphasis; Adam serves as a means to describe the entry of sin and death into the world and (by extension) the condition of humankind following that first transgression. There is a shift from a focus on Adam and Christ as corporate persons in 1 Corinthians to their respective acts in Romans 5.

This is not to say that the whole perspective of Romans 5 is simply a retrospective (backward-looking) one, for there is at the same time a real sense in which all that has happened in Adam is transcended by what happens in Jesus Christ, the Last Adam. As Paul says in Romans 5:14, Adam is "a type of the one who was to come" (NRSV). Adam's act of disobedience is contrasted with Christ's act of obedience, which carries with it a promise of future life within the new creation. Indeed, in Romans 5:15-21, within a highly structured section of his argument, Paul goes to great lengths to make it clear that Jesus Christ has met the negative effects of Adam's transgression in every way: transgression is met by obedience, condemnation by justification,* death by life.* The argument a minori ad maius ("from the lesser to the greater") is employed throughout, and the tremendous truth concerning the surpassing of sin and its effects by God's grace* in Christ is emphasized. However, the protological dimension of the Adam/Christ analogy does come to the fore here in a way that it does not in 1 Corinthians 15.

The fact that Romans 5:12 is an unfinished sentence in Greek has led to a variety of attempts to interpret the direction in which Paul's argument was heading. As Danker has noted, part of the dilemma is the difficulty in deciding what the antecedent for the dative relative pronoun hō is (sin, death, Adam or neither, but with the preposition epi [eph'], an idiom meaning "for which reason," "because"). In addition, the Augustinian rendering of Romans 5:12 as "in whom (Adam) all sinned" (Latin in quo omnes peccaverunt) has ever since, for better or worse, governed the church's theological interpretation of the Adam declaration (Cranfield lists six major possibilities for interpreting Rom 5:12d alone and notes that support for each can be found within church history). Bonner laments that Augustine did not "concentrate more upon the rich and profound conception of the antithesis between the two Adams, rather than on the macabre theory of the participation of unbegotten humanity in the first Adam's primal sin" (Bonner, 247).

It is important to note that while Paul does turn to Adam as the means whereby sin enters the world, he does not tell us the means whereby that sin is transmitted from one generation to another. The mechanics are left unexplained, beyond the simple declaration that "all humankind sinned" (a more correct rendering of Rom 5:12). Adam's responsibility for the origin of sin's introduction into the world is affirmed by Paul alongside an affirmation of the individual's responsibility for the presence of sin in his or her life. For Paul both elements (personal guilt and responsibility as well as universal guilt and sin in Adam) are active. This paradox becomes clear by the way in which Paul's thought flows quite freely from the intensely personal statement in Romans 5:12 ("because all men sinned" [NRSV], to the more deterministic statement of Romans 5:19 ("by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners" [NRSV]. Paul's teaching is echoed in 2 Baruch 54:15, 19: "For although Adam sinned first and has brought death upon all who were not in his own time, yet each of them who has been born from him has prepared for himself the coming torment. . . . Adam is, therefore, not the cause, except only for himself, but each of us has become our own Adam" (Charlesworth edition).

4. Adam and the Image of God.

Adamic theology has also had an important role to play in several other key passages within the Pauline letters, notably those, such as the hymnic materials (see Hymns) in Philippians 2:6-11 and Colossians 1:15-20 and the declaration in 2 Corinthians 4:4, which speak of Jesus Christ in terms of his being "the image of God" (see Image). Here the OT background of Adam as one who is created "in the image of God" (morphē is used in Phil 2:6 and eikōn in Col 1:15 and 2 Cor 4:4). The description of the "glory of God (or man)" also figures in the discussion at this point (see Glory). This confluence of imagery and description has recently led some scholars to see the preponderance of "image of God" language found throughout the Pauline letters as another expression of Adamic theology. Dunn (1980), for instance, argues strongly for such an Adamic understanding of the Philippian hymn; Hooker sees an Adamic motif underlying Romans 1:18-32 where the apostle describes humankind's predicament in terms of Adam's fall (Wedderburn offers some clarifications to Hooker's suggestion). In addition, there is some justification for seeing the fall of Adam as underlying the declaration made by Paul in Romans 3:23.

4.1. Image of God: Nature and Existence in Romans 5.

Closely related to this matter is the consideration of how being made "in the image of God" stands as a description of human nature and existence. This is a matter which has long occupied the attention of Christian commentators, many of whom, like Calvin (as R. Prins notes), have concentrated on Paul's letters in addressing the issue. It is interesting to note that the whole of Romans 5, particularly the Adam/Christ analogy in verses 12-21, becomes critical in this regard.

The interpretations of Romans 5 offered by Barth and Bultmann are helpful comparisons on this point, standing as interpretations concentrating on the christological and anthropological halves of the analogy respectively. Thus Barth focuses on the christological element within the analogy and sees the passage as essentially one expressing humankind's nature. Bultmann, on the other hand, focuses on the anthropological element within the analogy and sees the passage as essentially expressing humankind's existence. In short, the crucial question concerns how we understand humankind (Adam) to be made "in the image of God." Is it in Adam or Christ that we truly see "the image of God"? Do we begin with Christ and move to interpret humankind as the image of Christ (Barth's position)? Or do we begin with humankind and move to interpret Christ as the true expression of what the image of God means (Bultmann's position)?

These two interpretative approaches are dependent, in part, on the way in which the two halves of Romans 5 (verse 1-11 and 12-21) are seen to fit together. Thus, Barth effectively places Romans 5:12-21 (with its description of Adamic humankind) within the boundaries of Romans 5:1-11 (which states the real condition of humankind in Christ). Bultmann, on the other hand, grounds Romans 5:12-21 in the lifestyle motivated by Christ's example of faith and stresses that Romans 5:1-11 concerns the paradoxical existence of believers in hope. In other words, Romans 5:12-21 is taken to express this life of the believer more fully, and it is only at that point that the christological component, as it were, is introduced into the scheme.

4.2. Image of God: Stages of Salvation History. Another way to express this essential difference of interpreting the meaning of humankind (be it Adamic humankind or the new humankind in Christ) as being made "in the image of God" is via an illustration of successive stages which are negotiated in salvation history. The eschatological framework which underlies the whole of Paul's thought sees the old age, in the light of the Christ event, as having given way to a new age (as texts such as 2 Corinthians 5:17 demonstrate).

Ziesler sets this out in terms of a possible three-stage scheme in which "original state—fall—restored state" serves as a description of this development. Such a three-stage scheme would tend toward the kind of interpretation offered by Bultmann. However, Ziesler argues that Paul's view of man is so overwhelmingly directed toward the eschatological vision of the Last Adam that such a three-stage scheme becomes irrelevant to any discussion of Paul. He notes that nowhere does Paul talk of Adam in terms of his being "in the image of God" and on that basis suggests that a two-stage scheme is closer to Paul's central teaching. This would trace the steps in salvation history as a simpler movement (fall—restored state) and would tend toward the kind of interpretation offered by Barth.

Is such a radical break between Adam and Christ as the image of God justified? Ziesler's ideas need to be modified somewhat by a more rigorous consideration of 1 Corinthians 11:3-9 where Paul employs the creation story of Genesis as a basis for proper ethical behavior among men and women with respect to covering one's head during worship. The crucial verse is 1 Corinthians 11:7: "For a man ought not to have his head veiled, since he is the image and reflection of God; but woman is the reflection of man" (NRSV). The point here is that Paul shows some flexibility in his usage of "image of God" and is willing to apply the concept broadly if it suits his purposes, even if it is true that the passage does, as Ziesler notes, occur in a non-soteriological context. Nevertheless, we should not overlook the Adamic undertone of this verse—Paul means to say that man, that is, every human being, bears in some way the image and glory (or "reflection" as in the NRSV) of God just as the first Adam did.

This is not to deny that, according to Paul, there is a strong sense in which humankind's glory as the image of God finds its fulfillment in Christ. In Philippians 3:20-21 we find this clearly expressed in terms of the believer's transformation from a "body of humility" into "the body of his (Christ's) glory," and in Romans 8:29 the believer is described as one who is "conformed to the image of his (God's) Son."

4.3. Image of God: Christophany. Is it possible to determine the origin of Paul's understanding of Jesus Christ in terms of the Last Adam and its connection with an "Image of God" motif? There appears to be a close relationship between image-Christophany and descriptions of the risen Lord Jesus Christ which build upon the OT tradition of theophany and are properly described as christophany. This means that those passages where Paul describes or alludes to his own conversion experience and his vision of Christ, can be taken as supplementing an Adamic christology. This brings passages such as 1 Corinthians 9:1; 15:8-10; 2 Corinthians 3:4—4:6; Galatians 1:13-17 and Philippians 3:4-11 into the discussion and sees within them an underlying Adamic theme. Kim argues that this brings together two different bases of christological thought in Paul, a wisdom* christology and an image christology, both of which converge in the person of Jesus Christ, the Second Adam within Paul's thought.

5. Adam and the Body of Christ.

In that Paul viewed humankind as embodied in both Adam and Christ, unredeemed and redeemed respectively, he demonstrated (or contributes to) a conceptual overlap between an Adamic theology and the idea of the body of Christ (see Body of Christ). In other words, this body of Christ is made up of believers who are all joined together so as to form a united humanity, that of the last Adam. Although explicit reference to Adam is not made within the key texts under discussion here, it is clear that fallen Adamic humankind is spiritually reconstituted (Eph 1:10) in Christ in such a way that Adamic language and body of Christ imagery merge. We see this particular emphasis at various points in the Pauline letters, including Colossians 3:12-17 and Ephesians 2:13-18.

In the modern era W. D. Davies has spearheaded investigation into this matter by pointing out the Jewish rabbinic background to such an understanding of Adam and its relevance to a study of Paul's teaching about a corporate Christ. Central to this issue is the recognition that discussion about Adam in these terms is not primarily about humankind per se, so much as about the nation of Israel* viewed from an eschatological perspective, as N. T. Wright argues. The contribution brought by a sense of the corporate, whether it be seen in terms of an Adamic humankind or in terms of the body of Christ, to an analysis of the Pauline letters should not be underestimated. Such a reinterpretation of the OT promises to the nation of Israel in terms of the new creation in Christ seems implied in Galatians 6:15-16, and is certainly made unambiguous within some of the writings of later Christian leaders, such as Justin Martyr who declared that the Christian church is "the true spiritual Israel" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 11.5). However, who constitutes "Israel" is a difficult matter to decide throughout Paul's letters and a one-for-one exchange between the nation and the church cannot be easily sustained, especially in light of difficult verses such as Romans 11:26.

See also BODY OF CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; IMAGE, IMAGE OF GOD; NEW NATURE AND OLD NATURE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, From First Adam to Last (London: A. & C. Black, 1962); K. Barth, Christ and Adam: Man and Humanity in Romans 5 (SJTOP 5; Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1956); G. Bonner, "Augustine on Romans 5,12," in Studia Evangelica V, ed. F. L. Cross (Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1968) 242-47; R. Bultmann, "Adam and Christ According to Romans 5," in Current Issues in New Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of O. A. Piper, ed. W. Klassen and G. F. Snyder (London: SCM, 1962) 143-65; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1975); F. W. Danker, "Romans 5:12: Sin Under Law," NTS 14 (1967-68) 424-39; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. D. G. Dunn, "1 Corinthians 15.45—Last Adam, Life-giving Spirit," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 127-41; idem, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980) xviii-xix, 98-128; M. D. Hooker, From Adam to Christ: Essays on Paul (Cambridge: University Press, 1990); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); L. J. Kreitzer, "Christ as Second Adam in Paul," CV 32 (1989) 55-101; J. Lambrecht, "Paul's Christological Use of Scripture in 1 Corinthians 15.20-28," NTS 28 (1982) 502-27; J. R. Levison, Portraits of Adam in Early Judaism (JSPSup 1; Sheffield: Academic Press, 1988); B. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology in 1 Corinthians (Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1973); R. Prins, "The Image of God in Adam and the Restoration of Man in Jesus Christ," SJT 25 (1972) 32-44; R. Scroggs, The Last Adam (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1966); M. Thrall, "Christ Crucified or Second Adam? A Christological Debate Between Paul and the Corinthians," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 143-56; A. J. M. Wedderburn, "Adam in Paul's Letter to the Romans," in Studia Biblica 1978: III. Papers on Paul and Other New Testament Authors, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSNTSup 3: Sheffield: Academic Press, 1980) 413-30; N. T. Wright, "Adam, Israel and the Messiah," in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 18-40; J. A. Ziesler, "Anthropology of Hope," ExpT 90 (1978-79) 104-9.

L. J. Kreitzer

ADOPTION, SONSHIP

In the Pauline letters the Greek word huiothesia is used either of the Israelites (Rom 9:4) or of believers (Gal 4:5; Rom 8:15, 23; Eph 1:5) as sons of God. There is, however, some disagreement as to how to translate the term, whether as "adoption" or, more generally, as "sonship." This problem must be resolved before the specific background of the term can be discussed.

1. The Meaning of Huiothesia in Paul
2. The Background of Divine "Adoption as Sons" in Paul
3. The Sonship of Believers in Paul

1. The Meaning of Huiothesia in Paul.

The fact that Paul uses huiothesia in the sense of "adoption" has sometimes been denied in favor of the translation "sonship" (e.g., B. Byrne), but the overwhelming lexical evidence hardly supports this contention (see Scott 1992). In Paul, as in contemporary extra-biblical sources, huiothesia always denotes either the process or the state of being adopted as son(s). This is substantiated not only by the univocal and widespread usage of the term in literary and non-literary sources, but also by ancient Greek lexicographers dating to the time of the NT (e.g., Ammonius, Adfin. Vocab. Diff. s.v. apokēryktos). Paul's use of huiothesia obviously appropriates this normal usage of the term, because the construction in Galatians 4:5 is closely paralleled in Hellenistic literature (cf. Nicolaus of Damascus Vit. Caes. 130.55). Hence any attempt to translate the term more generally as "sonship" sets the study of the background off on the wrong foot from the start.

2. The Background of Divine "Adoption as Sons" in Paul.

Among those authors who agree that huiothesia denotes "adoption," there is diversity of opinion as to the background of the term. This is due in part to the fact that Paul seems to be the first to use the term in a theological context (let alone of divine adoption) and yet he never explains what he means by the term. The apostle evidently assumes that his readers would know what was meant by the adoption as sons of God.

2.1. Adoption as a Theological Abstraction. Some scholars treat Paul's concept of adoption simply as an abstraction which is linked with another Pauline concept. In this way the question of background is obviated altogether. For example, H. Hübner takes adoption as a synonym of "freedom" (eleutheria) in the sense of freedom* from the Law.* R. Bultmann and others following him treat adoption as a forensic-eschatological term parallel to "righteousness"* (dikaiosynē). S. Kim considers Paul's concept of huiothesia a secondary deduction of the Damascus Road christophany, in which Paul perceived the risen Lord as the image of God (see Image, Image of God) or the Son of God (see Son of God). Other kinds of abstractions of the concept can be found in the works of N. R. Petersen and D. von Allmen.

2.2. Adoption Against a Greco-Roman Background. When, as is more commonly done, Paul's concept of divine adoption is considered against a Greco-Roman background, it is usually compared either to a particular case of divine adoption in Greco-Roman mythology or to the actual practice of adoption in Greco-Roman jurisprudence.

2.2.1. Divine Adoption in Greco-Roman Mythology. Divine adoption plays very little role in Greco-Roman sources. Outside of Paul huiothesia is not used of such adoptions in the period under consideration. The few unequivocal examples of divine adoption which can be adduced from Greco-Roman sources using other terms of adoption do not provide a background for Paul's concept (cf. the adoption of Heracles by Hera [Diodorus Siculus 4.39.2], that of Alexander the Great by Amon-Zeus [Plutarch Alex. 50.6], that of Solon by Fortune [Plutarch Mor. 318C] and that of the Lybian goddess "Athena" by Ammon-Zeus [Herodotus 4.180]). The mystery religions have sometimes been suggested as a possible background (cf. H. D. Betz), but there is no evidence for divine adoption in the mysteries (see Religions).

2.2.2. Adoption as a Legal Metaphor. Many scholars have suggested that Paul's concept of adoption is a legal metaphor which Paul constructed ad hoc from his Greco-Roman background. Among them, a few have considered it a metaphor drawn from Hellenistic law, because there adoption is an institution connected especially with inheritance, and Galatians 4:5 speaks of the adoption which makes believers heirs (cf. Wenger). More often, however, proponents of this kind of approach (e.g., Lyall, Bruce) have seen Paul's concept of adoption in light of the elaborate Roman ceremony of adoptio, in which the minor to be adopted was emancipated from the authority of his natural father and placed under the new authority of his adoptive father, often for the purpose of social and/or political maneuvering (cf. Kurylowicz). Galatians 4:5 does indeed put redemption* and adoption in parallel, but the notion that the witness* of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in Romans 8:16 reflects the witnesses in the Roman ceremony hardly deserves serious consideration. Circumstantial evidence such as Paul's Roman citizenship* and the prevalence of Roman adoptions in Paul's day also fails to establish the case for a legal metaphor.

2.3. Adoption Against an Old Testament/Jewish Background. The term huiothesia occurs in the NT only in Paul and never in the Septuagint or other Jewish sources. Despite frequent claims to the contrary, however, the concept of adoption—even divine adoption—was certainly known to the OT and Judaism, regardless of whether it was ever actually practiced (see Scott 1992, Malul). Therefore, it is not impossible that the roots of Paul's concept could be found here.

2.3.1. Galatians 4:5. The context of the earliest occurrence of the term, in Galatians 4:5, does in fact give a decisive clue to understanding huiothesia against an OT/Jewish background. For when Galatians 4:1-2 is properly understood not as an illustration from Greco-Roman law but as an allusion to the OT (see Scott 1992), it is clear that Galatians 4:5 is set within a context framed by Exodus typology (Gal 4:1-7): just as Israel,* as heir to the Abrahamic promise (see Abraham), was redeemed as son of God from slavery in Egypt at the time appointed by the Father (Gal 4:1-2; cf. Hos 11:1; Gen 15:13), so also believers were redeemed to adoption as sons of God from slavery under the "elements of the world" (see Elements/Elemental Spirits) at the fullness of time and thereby became heirs to the Abrahamic promise (Gal 4:3-7).

The fact that "the" huiothesia is to be seen here against a particular OT/Jewish background is further substantiated both by Romans 9:4, where the articular term occurs in a list of Israel's historical privileges (cf. Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1), and more specifically, by the broader context of Galatians 3—4 itself, which makes it clear that believers are sons and heirs as they participate by baptism (Gal 3:27) in the Son of God who was sent to redeem them (Gal 4:4-5; cf. Gal 3:13-14). For, strictly speaking, Christ* is the seed of Abraham (Gal 3:16) and the messianic Son of God promised in 2 Samuel 7:12 and 14, respectively. Seen in context, therefore, "the adoption" in Galatians 4:5 must refer to the Jewish eschatological expectation based on 2 Samuel 7:14.

It can be shown that 2 Samuel 7:14 ("I will be to him [the Davidide] a Father, and he will be to me a son") contains an adoption formula (cf. Ex 2:10; Esther 2:7; Gen 48:5), which subsequent Judaism applied not only to the Davidic Messiah but, under influence of New Covenant theology (cf. Hos 2:1, cited in Rom 9:26; see Covenant and New Covenant), also to the eschatological people of God. In accordance with the Deuteronomic framework of Sin-Exile-Restoration (see esp. O. H. Steck), this 2 Samuel 7:14 tradition expects that at the advent of the Messiah, God* would redeem his people from Exile in a Second Exodus; he would restore them to a covenantal relationship; and he would adopt them, with the Messiah, as his sons (cf. Jub 1:24; T. Judah 24:3; 4QFlor 1:11). In fact 2 Corinthians 6:18 actually cites the adoption formula of 2 Samuel 7:14 (+Is 43:6), and that in the context of the same Exodus typology, the same New Covenant theology and in the same generalized form as in the Jewish tradition. As in the 2 Samuel 7:14 tradition, furthermore, Galatians 4:4-6 connects divine adoption with the reception of the Spirit (of the New Covenant) in the heart. Hence, while the context of huiothesia in Galatians 4:5 gives no reason to suspect a Greco-Roman background for the term, the whole line of argumentation in Galatians 3—4, together with Pauline parallels, leads unambiguously to an OT/Jewish background for the term (cf. Rom 9:4) and particularly to the 2 Samuel 7:14 tradition (cf. 2 Cor 6:18). In other words, believers who are thus baptized (see Baptism) into the messianic Son of God and take up his very cry of "Abba!" to the Father (Gal 4:6; Rom 8:15; cf. Mk 14:36) participate with him in the Davidic promise of divine adoption and in the Abrahamic promise of universal sovereignty (cf. Gal 4:1).

2.3.2. Romans 8:15, 23. This interpretation of huiothesia in Galatians 4:5 applies equally to the use of the term in the closely parallel passage of Romans 8. For here, too, participation by adoption in the messianic Son of God who is sent (Rom 8:3; cf. Gal 4:4) is so integrally connected with the reception of the indwelling Spirit that the Spirit can now be called the "Spirit of adoption" (Rom 8:15), the Spirit by which also the righteous requirement of the Law* is fulfilled (Rom 8:4). Like Galatians 4:5, furthermore, the context of huiothesia in Romans 8 contains elements of Exodus typology, and divine adoptive sonship implies heirship with Christ in the Abrahamic promise (Rom 8:17). Unlike Galatians 4:5, however, Romans 8 develops the point that participation in the messianic Son of God by adoption extends not only to the present (Romans 8:15) but, by means of the Spirit, to the future as well (Romans 8:23). For just as Jesus once received the Spirit at his baptism and was pronounced the Son of God (cf. Mk 1:11 pars.), so also believers presently receive the Spirit of adoption at their baptism, the Spirit by which, again, believers share in the Son's cry of "Abba!" to the Father (Rom 8:15). Likewise, just as Jesus as the seed of David was set as messianic Son of God in power* by the Holy Spirit at the proleptic resurrection* of the dead (Rom 1:3-4; cf. 2 Sam 7:12, 14), so also believers, who have the Spirit as the means of resurrection (Rom 8:11), eagerly await their revelation (Rom 8:19), their predestined (see Election and Predestination) resurrection/adoption into the glorified image of the resurrected Son (Rom 8:23, 29; cf. Eph 1:5), when the Son will be the firstborn* among many brothers and sisters (Rom 8:29; cf. Ps 89:27). At that time the sons of God will share in the Abrahamic promise of universal sovereignty as fellow-heirs with Christ the Messiah (Rom 8:17; cf. Rom 4:13; 8:32; Gal 4:1). Hence the present and future aspects of huiothesia in Romans 8 reflect successive stages of participation in the Son by the Spirit and, as such, constitute ways that believers share with the Son in the Davidic promise.

2.3.3. Conclusion: The Place of Adoption in Pauline Theology. In sum, there is a coherent and specific OT/Jewish background of "adoption as sons" (huiothesia) in the Pauline letters: the word occurs four times in the sense of adoption expected by the 2 Samuel 7:14 tradition (cf. 2 Cor 6:18), and that in either a present (Gal 4:5; Rom 8:15) or future aspect (Rom 8:23; Eph 1:5), depending on the christological and salvation-historical moment stressed in each context. Once the word occurs in the sense of the Exodus type which underlies this huiothesia of messianic salvation in the other four occurrences (Rom 9:4; cf. Gal 4:1-2). The whole concept must be seen in light of Paul's restoration theology (cf. Sanders, who, although failing to discuss the full Deuteronomic framework, does unwittingly present a major Jewish alternative to business-as-usual "covenantal nomism" [cf. J. M. Scott, "Gal 3:10"]; see Restoration of Israel).

3. The Sonship of Believers in Paul.

The foregoing interpretation of huiothesia against the background of the 2 Samuel 7:14 tradition provides the logical and necessary starting point for interpreting Paul's more general references to the sonship of believers; for adoption as sons of God provides the means of entry into divine sonship. Hence the Pauline passages which attribute huiothesia to believers also call them "son(s)" (huioi; cf. Gal 3:26; 4:6, 7; Rom 8:14, 19; 9:26) or, without specifying gender, "children" (tekna; cf. Rom 8:16, 17, 21) of God. 2 Corinthians 6:18, under the influence of Isaiah 43:6, explicitly broadens the concept of adoption to "daughters." Hence both males and females are included in Paul's concept of divine "sonship." In Philippians 2:14-15, Paul instructs his readers to "do everything without grumbling and dispute, in order that you may be faultless and pure, blameless children of God in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation." The reference here to the "children" (tekna) of God being "blameless" (amōma) alludes to Deuteronomy 32:5, where because they had sinned, the Israelites are characterized as "blameful" (mōmēta) and as "not his children" (tekna) in the context of the Song of Moses which predicts the Sin-Exile-Restoration. In this way Paul contrasts the situation which led up to the punishment of the Israelites as sons of God with the way in which believers as sons of God should now behave (cf. 2 Cor 6:14—7:1; Rom 8:4, 12-14).

See also BAPTISM; HOLY SPIRIT; SON OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. von Allmen, La famille de Dieu: La symbolique familiale dans le paulinisme (OBO 41; Fribourg: Éditions Universitaires; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981); H. D. Betz, Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Galatians: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribner's, 1951, 1955); B. Byrne, 'Sons of God'—'Seed of Abraham': A Study of the Idea of the Sonship of God of all Christians against the Jewish Background (AnBib 83; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1979); M. Hengel, The Son of God: The Origin of Christology and the History of Jewish-Hellenistic Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); H. Hübner, Law in Paul's Thought (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1984); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); M. Kurlowicz, Die Adoptio im klassischen römischen Recht (SA 6; Warsaw: University of Warsaw, 1981); F. Lyall, Slaves, Citizens, Sons: Legal Metaphors in the Epistles (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1984); M. Malul, "Foundlings and their Adoption in the Bible and in Mesopotamian Documents: A Study of Several Legal Metaphors in Ezek 16:1-7," JSOT 46 (1990) 97-126; N. R. Petersen, Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. M. Scott, Adoption as Sons of God: An Exegetical Investigation into the Background of ΥΙΟΘΕΣΙΑ in the Corpus Paulinum (WUNT 2.48; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992); idem, " 'For as many as are of works of the law are under a curse' (Gal 3:10)," in Paul and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders (JSNTSup; Sheffield: JSOT, forthcoming); O. H. Steck, Israel und das gewaltsame Geschick der Propheten. Untersuchungen zur Überlieferung des deuteronomischen Geschichtsbildes im Alten Testament, Spätjudentum und Urchristentum (WMANT 23; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1967); L. Wenger, "Adoption," RAC 1.100.

J. M. Scott

ADULTERY. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS.

AFFLICTIONS, TRIALS, HARDSHIPS

Paul refers frequently to his trials and afflictions, sometimes cataloging them in his letters. He appears to have found persecution at the hands of the Jews the most difficult of his afflictions to bear. Paul's letters nevertheless reflect a positive attitude toward afflictions.

1. Catalogs of Afflictions
2. Persecution at the Hands of Jews
3. Paul's Attitude Toward Trials and Afflictions

1. Catalogs of Afflictions.

The trials and afflictions which Paul experienced were many and varied, and this is reflected in the catalogs found in his letters (Rom 8:35; 1 Cor 4:9-13; 2 Cor 4:8-9; 6:4-5; 11:23-29; 12:10).

1.1. The Most Comprehensive Catalog. In 2 Corinthians 11:23-29 Paul's trials and afflictions are listed in great detail. The passage falls into four parts, each reflecting a different aspect of these afflictions:

(1) Verses 23b-25: imprisonments, beatings and being near death, including five occasions when he received the thirty-nine lashes (i.e., the maximum allowed minus one) at the hands of the Jews, three times when he was beaten with rods by Gentiles, one stoning and three shipwrecks.

(2) Verse 26: frequent journeys, with their accompanying dangers of rivers, bandits and Jews as well as Gentiles; dangers in the city, in the wilderness and at sea; and dangers from false Christians.

(3) Verse 27: toil and hardship, including sleepless nights (whether as privations or vigils), hunger, thirst, cold and nakedness.

(4) Verses 28-29: anxiety for all the churches.

1.2. Parallels in Ancient Literature. The attitude reflected in the writings of the Hellenistic moralists (e.g., Epictetus Diss. 3.12.10; 4.8.31; Seneca Ep. Mor. 13.1-3; Dio Chrysostom Diss. 3.3) and in some Jewish writings of the period (e.g., Wis 3:5-6; Sir 2:1-5; Jdt 8:25-26; Pss. Sol. 16:14-15; T. Jos. 2:7; 4 Macc 17:11-16) is that hardship functions as a test of character.

Lists of afflictions were used by the Hellenistic moralists to depict serenity in the midst of suffering and to provide a model of endurance for their readers. They believed that sufferings played a part in the divine plan. In these respects they parallel Paul's attitude to hardships and his use of lists of afflictions. However, Paul differed radically from those who minimized the impact of afflictions and saw in their triumph over them a demonstration of their own power.* Paul frankly admitted the distress caused by his afflictions (2 Cor 1:8-9), and gloried in the fact that it was God's power, not his own, which enabled him to endure (2 Cor 12:9-10). These similarities and differences suggest that, if Paul was familiar with the lists of the Hellenistic moralists, he adopted and adapted the genre to suit his own purposes. Such adaptation was influenced by OT traditions about the sufferings of the righteous, by Jewish apocalyptic* ideas of end-time woes, and most importantly by Paul's own theology of the cross.*

2. Persecution at the Hands of Jews.

Of the afflictions which Paul experienced, none receives more attention in his letters than persecution on account of the gospel.* He was persecuted by Jews, Gentiles and false Christians (2 Cor 11:26), but it was persecution at the hand of the Jews to which he referred most frequently (cf., e.g., Rom 15:31; 2 Cor 11:24, 26; Gal 5:11; 1 Thess 2:14-16), suggesting he found this hardest to bear. Paul's letters provide several hints concerning the reasons for this persecution.

2.1. He Preached the Faith He Once Sought to Destroy. According to Acts 9:1-2, Paul formerly persecuted the church with the backing of the high priest. Following his conversion he switched sides and preached the faith he once sought to destroy (Gal 1:23; see Jealousy, Zeal). It is no wonder that the Jewish leaders felt a great antipathy toward him, leading to his persecution.

2.2. He Regarded Cherished Elements of Judaism as Rubbish. Following his conversion Paul underwent a reversal of values. He now regarded the most cherished elements of Judaism as "rubbish" compared with the excellency of knowing Christ (Phil 3:4-8). If he was known to have adopted such an attitude towards Judaism, and to be promoting a similar attitude among others, it is little wonder he drew down Jewish persecution upon his head.

2.3. He Encouraged Jews to Neglect the Law of Moses. Paul strongly rebuked Jewish believers for not being prepared to free themselves from the Law's* demands for ritual purity* when these kept them from sharing table fellowship with Gentiles (Gal 2:11-21). Thus it would not be surprising if he fell foul of zealous Jews who persecuted those of their nation who encouraged violations of the Law.

2.4. He Did Not Preach Circumcision. The reasons why Paul suffered Jewish persecution mentioned so far can only be inferred from hints found in his letters. For this fourth reason we have the evidence of an explicit statement: "Why am I still being persecuted if I am still preaching circumcision? In that case the offense of the cross has been removed" (Gal 5:11 NRSV; see Circumcision).

2.5. He Relaxed Ethical Demands. While Paul would have pleaded guilty to the charges lying behind the reasons for persecution suggested above, he strongly denied the charge that he relaxed ethical demands. It was, as far as he was concerned, a piece of blasphemous slander (Rom 3:7-8). Nevertheless, because this was what his Jewish opponents believed of him, it probably contributed to the reasons why he suffered persecution at their hands.

3. Paul's Attitude Toward Trials and Afflictions.

The apostle did not offer a comprehensive solution to the problem of suffering. However his letters do reveal something of the ways in which he came to understand its meaning.

3.1. The Destiny and Privilege of Believers. When seeking to encourage his converts, Paul reminded them that they had been granted the privilege "not only of believing in Christ, but of suffering for him as well" (Phil 1:29 NRSV). This was something for which they had been destined (1 Thess 3:3-4; cf. 2 Tim 3:12).

3.2. Sharing Christ's Sufferings. Paul believed that his sufferings* filled up what was lacking in Christ's afflictions for the sake of the church (Col 1:24). This should not be taken to mean that there was something lacking in Christ's atoning sacrifice.* Rather Paul shared the sufferings of the Servant-Messiah (see Christ) inasmuch as he too suffered for the sake of the elect in bringing the gospel to them (cf. 2 Tim 2:10).

3.3. The Discipline of Afflictions. One of the fruits of justification* is that believers are enabled to rejoice in afflictions (Rom 5:3). Believers do not find affliction less hurtful than others, but they know that under God's good hand it produces endurance, character and hope* in God* (Rom 5:3-4). It was through despair of life itself that Paul learned not to rely on himself but on God (2 Cor 1:8-9).

3.4. Suffering and Comfort. During the struggle with his "thorn in the flesh" Paul was comforted when the Lord told him that the power of Christ is made perfect in human weakness* (2 Cor 12:8-9). Paul came to understand that one of the reasons why he suffered was that, as he experienced the comfort of God in the midst of his sufferings, so he might be able to comfort others (2 Cor 1:3-7).

See also APOSTLE; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; HEALING, ILLNESS; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; POWER; SUFFERING; WEAKNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. T. Fitzgerald, Cracks in an Earthen Vessel: An Examination of the Catalogue of Hardships in the Corinthian Correspondence (SBLDS 99; Atlanta, GA: Scholars, 1988); A. Fridrichsen, "Zum Stil des paulinischen Peristasenkatalogs. 2 Cor. 11, 23ff.," SO 7 (1928) 25-29; idem, "Peristasenkatalog und res gestae: Nachtrag zu 2 Cor. 11, 23ff.," SO 8 (1929) 78-82; S. R. Garrett, "The God of this World and the Affliction of Paul: 2 Cor 4:1-12," in Greeks, Romans, and Christians: Essays in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe, ed. D. L. Balch, et al. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990) 99-117; E. Kamlah, "Wie beurteilt Paulus sein Leiden?" ZNW 54 (1963) 217-32; C. G. Kruse, "The Price Paid for a Ministry Among Gentiles: Paul's Persecution at the Hands of the Jews," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church: Essays in Honor of Ralph P. Martin, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 260-72; W. Schrage, "Leid, Kreuz und Eschaton: Die Peristasenkatologe als Merkmale paulinischer theologia crucis und Eschatologie," EvT 34 (1974) 141-75.

C. G. Kruse

AGE TO COME. See APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

ALLEGORY. See OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

ALLUSIONS TO OLD TESTAMENT. See OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

AMEN. See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; PRAYER.

ANATHEMA. See CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA.

ANGELS, ARCHANGELS

The English word angel is derived from and is frequently used to translate the Greek word angelos, "messenger." In the Greek translation of the OT (LXX) angelos translates the Hebrew word mal'aḵ, or "messenger." Both angelos and mal'aḵ could be used to refer to either a human or a spiritual emissary. Each of the fourteen usages of angelos (usually plural) in Paul's letters seems to refer to, or assume a comparison with, a supernatural being or beings, either good or evil. Archangelos, or "archangel" (appearing only once in Paul, 1 Thess 4:16), refers to an angel of highest rank, such as the archangel Michael.

1. Angels in the OT and Judaism
2. Angels in Paul
3. Angels and Christology

1. Angels in the OT and Judaism.

Although angels are frequently called mal'aḵîm ("sent ones") in the OT, they may also be referred to as qᵉdōšîm ("holy ones"), bᵉnê 'ĕlîm ("sons of gods"), bᵉnê (hā) 'ᵉlōhîm ("sons of God"), sᵉbā'ôt ("hosts"), mᵉšārᵉtîm ("ministers") or in certain instances they may be given the title śār ("commander," Josh 5:14). Angels in the OT appear as messengers or representatives of the heavenly world, frequently sent by Yahweh himself. They are part of the created order and serve God's purposes, assisting and carrying out important transactions between God and humans, but primarily between God and Israel. They mediate revelation (2 Kings 1:3), come to the assistance of individuals (Gen 16:9), are associated with manifestations of Yahweh (Gen 18; 32:1), serve as part of the heavenly council (Ps 89:6-9) and make up the heavenly army (Deut 33:2; Zech 1:11). An angel is sent to accompany and direct Israel through the wilderness journey (cf. Ex 23:23 and Ex 33:2), and an angel brings judgment against Jerusalem (2 Sam 24:16). In visionary and apocalyptic settings angels take on more distinct roles as manlike figures who guide the seer within visions and serve as interpreters (Ezek 40:3; Zech 1:7-17). In Daniel angels take on a variety of roles, the most notable being that of the great archangel Michael, the protector of Israel (Dan 10:13; 12:1).

The title "angel of the Lord" seems to refer to an angel of rank or stature who carries out special missions for Yahweh. Such an angel appears to Moses in the flaming bush (Ex 3:2), leads Israel out of Egypt and into the land of promise (cf. Josh 5:13-15 and Judg 2:1-5) and appears to Gideon (Judg 6:11) at an hour of crisis.

Jewish texts outside of the OT testify to an expanded understanding of the nature and role of angels in some sectors of Second Temple Judaism. Much of this was simply an extension and development of what was to be found in the OT. Angels protect individuals (1 Enoch 100:5), execute judgment (1 Enoch 56:1-8), act as heavenly scribes (Jub 1:27-29), populate the heavenly court (1 Enoch 14:18-24), take part in the heavenly liturgy (1 Enoch 61:9-13; 4Q400-407), come to the aid of Israel in warfare (3 Macc 6:18-21), are differentiated by rank and name (1 Enoch 61:10; 2 Enoch 20; T. Levi 3), and guide heavenly visions and interpret mysteries (1 Enoch 17—36). One notable new development is the notion of two opposing forces of angelic powers: a force of good angels led by God or an archangel, and a force of evil angels led by an evil angelic power known as Satan, Mastema or Belial.

2. Angels in Paul.

2.1. Angels as Witnesses. In several instances angels are referred to as observers or witnesses of Christ* or believers. In 1 Corinthians 4:9 Paul contrasts the plight of true apostles with that of the Corinthians who, according to their notion of realized eschatology,* had "already become kings" (1 Cor 4:8). In contrast, the true apostles* in their afflictions* and foolishness had become a spectacle to the world, to angels and to humans (1 Cor 4:9). In this case the nature of the angels, whether good or evil, is not immediately clear. Quite possibly Paul is ironically placing the angels alongside the eschatologically complete Corinthians,* who observe the apostles as a curiosity. But the fact that the angels are listed with the "world" (kosmos) and "humans" (anthrōpoi) could suggest that Paul had in mind inimical spirits.

1 Timothy 3:16 has been identified as a piece of preformed tradition, perhaps a hymn,* setting forth a series of contrasts between Jesus' earthly life and his exalted status. The six lines of the hymn form three pairs of contrast between the mundane and spiritual spheres (following an a b b a a b pattern). The third line, "he [Christ] was seen by angels" corresponds with the second and sixth lines: "he was vindicated by (or "in") the Spirit"; "he was taken up in glory." The positive note struck in these three lines would suggest that Christ's appearance before angels refers to his exaltation in the presence of angels of glory who acclaimed honor and praise to the exalted Lord, perhaps in triumphal procession. The notion of angels accompanying God and the exalted Christ reappears in 1 Timothy 5:21, where Timothy is warned "in the presence of God and of Christ Jesus and of the elect angels" to keep the instruction of church discipline.

In 1 Corinthians 11:10 Paul instructs that "a woman should have authority on her head, because of the angels." The context (1 Cor 11:2-26) raises several complex exegetical problems (see commentaries) and calls for broader treatment (see Authority; Head; Man and Woman); here the focus is limited to the nature and role of the angels. Clearly the issue for Paul is right order in worship* where women, as well as men, pray* and prophesy* (1 Cor 11:4-5). The suggestion that the angels, like the "sons of God" in Genesis 6:2, might be sexually tempted by the uncovered heads of women (a woman's hair being a sexual attraction) or that the women would be subject to the assault of evil, demonic angels lacks compelling exegetical support and assumes that the "authority"* on the woman's head is a head covering (see Fee, 490-530). Paul's interest in liturgical order suggests that the angels are concerned with the maintenance of that order. Evidence from Qumran attests to Jewish belief in the presence of angels "in the congregation," for which reason a person with physical defect was to be excluded from the sectarian assembly (1QSa 2:4-10; see Cadbury; Fitzmyer). A similar understanding may have been introduced at Corinth, with "authority" on the woman's head satisfying the angelic requirements for right order. Later, in 1 Corinthians 13:1, Paul refers to speaking "in the tongues of mortals and of angels." This may allude to prophetic speech, or speaking in tongues,* and suggests again a relationship between Spirit-inspired worship and that of the angels.

2.2. Angels as Evil. It is clear that early Christians, like Jews, thought that some angels were evil. Jesus in Matthew 25:41 speaks vividly of "the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels," and while Paul does not employ such striking language, in Romans 8:38 it seems that he does count angels as among the hostile forces of the universe that might threaten to separate believers from the love* of God* in Christ. Paul may have had in mind the angels of the lower spheres of heaven who some may have regarded as blocking access to God, or he may have been referring to the angels of the nations (Deut 32:8; Dan 10:13; Sir 17:17; Jub. 15:31-32) who, as national deities, might be perceived as thwarting the Gentiles'* access to the redemptive love of God in Christ. Ordinarily, however, when Paul speaks of angelic beings inimical to Christ and his people, he employs the variety of names associated with the "principalities and powers"* (note archai in Rom 8:38).

In 2 Corinthians 11:14 Paul warns that even Satan* can disguise himself as an angel of light. Paul takes the Jewish tradition of Satan disguising himself (cf. Life of Adam and Eve 9; T. Job 6:4) and applies it to his opponents at Corinth who had disguised themselves as apostles. In fact, Paul maintains, they are ministers of Satan (2 Cor 11:15). Another metaphorical use of angelos occurs in 2 Corinthians 12:7 where Paul speaks of his "thorn in the flesh"—perhaps a physical disability or illness*—as an angelos Satana, an "angel" or "minister" of Satan.

2.3. Angels as Inferior or Obstructions to the Divine Will. As highly as Paul could regard angels in some contexts—even likening his warm reception by the Galatians to their receiving "an angel of God" (Gal 4:14)—he could also employ angels as foils for the surpassing glory of the gospel* of Christ. Even if Paul "or an angel from heaven should preach a different gospel" (Gal 1:8) from the one they originally had received, it was to be regarded as anathema. Or again, the fact that, as in some Jewish traditions, the Law* had been ordained through angels (Gal 3:19; cf. Acts 7:53; Heb 2:2) and by a mediator sets it in contrast with the work of God in Christ. This notion of the role of angels in giving the Law at Sinai seems to stem from the LXX translation of Deuteronomy 33:2 and is found in later rabbinic interpretation of Psalm 68:18.

The eschatological authority of believers is underscored in 1 Corinthians 6:3 where Paul puts to the Corinthians a rhetorical question: "Do you not know that we are to judge angels—to say nothing of ordinary matters?" (NRSV). The context is one of grievances between believers being taken into a court of law (see Lawsuit). Paul argues from the greater, eschatological role and authority of believers, to the mundane, temporal realm of behavior in social relationships. While it is not certain whether the angels to be judged are good or evil, the more likely interpretation is that Paul was referring to the judgment of evil powers (cf. 2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6). In this case Paul would be reminding the Corinthians that believers, having been exalted with Christ who rules over all powers, will play a role in the final judgment* of those powers.

Colossians 2:18 warns against those who would persuade the Colossians of the necessity of self-abasement and the "worship of angels" (thrēskeia tōn angelōn). This allusion to "worship of angels" is problematic in two respects: (1) whether the genitive "of angels" is to be read as an objective (worship directed toward angels) or subjective genitive (worship led by angels); and (2) in either case, what the religious setting of the practice might have been. The exegetical solution to this problem involves wider issues related to the false teaching at Colossae (see Colossians). If the angels are equivalent to the "elements of the world"* (stoicheia tou kosmou, Col 2:8, 20), they appear to be powers that intrude between believers and the rightful object of worship, God in Christ. Paul would then be warning against a spiritual teaching or practice that dwells on angels to such an extent that they are virtually worshiped—or a teaching that in fact advocates their worship.

If Paul is speaking of worship promoted by angels (subjective genitive), the picture would be one of religious practices of abstinence and spiritual discipline aimed at achieving visionary* experiences in which one shares in the heavenly worship of angels (see Francis). This teaching might be akin to the understanding of worship alluded to in the Qumran* texts in which humans take part in the angelic liturgy (4Q400-407), or to the esoteric Merkabah visionary tradition attested in later Jewish texts in which spiritual adepts penetrate the heavens to the very throne of God and take part in the celestial liturgy (cf. 3 Enoch).

2.4. Angels at the Parousia. When Paul speaks of the parousia of Christ he employs the traditional imagery of the Lord being revealed from heaven "in blazing fire with his powerful angels" (2 Thess 1:7) and of the Lord Jesus coming "with all his holy ones" (1 Thess 3:13). The notion of angels accompanying the divine warrior may be observed in Zechariah 14:5, where on the Day of the Lord, Yahweh will come "and all the holy ones with him"—clearly a reference to the heavenly army (cf. Deut 33:2; 1 Enoch 1:9; Jude 14). In a similar manner, in 1 Thessalonians 4:16 Paul speaks of the "call" of the archangel, along with the "trumpet call of God." It has also been suggested that "the restrainer" mentioned in 2 Thessalonians 2:6, 7 refers to an angelic figure, possibly Michael (cf. Dan 10:13, 20; see Goulder, 99), who restrains evil for the sake of the preaching of the gospel (Marshall, 199-200).

3. Angels and Christology.

Research into the origin of NT christology* has appealed to Jewish angelology as an existing conceptual category of divine agency that would have assisted early Christians in coming to terms theologically with the exalted Christ (see Hurtado). Within Judaism certain principal angels were understood to be in a position of power, honor and authority that was surpassed only by God. Such angels were human-like in form and were known by the names Gabriel (Dan 8:15-26; 10:2-9; 1 Enoch 9:1; 10:9; 40:9-10), Michael (Dan 10:13-21; 12:1; 1 Enoch 9:1; 40:9-10; 1QM 17:6-8; 13:10), Raphael (1 Enoch 10:4; 40:9-10; Tob 12:15), Melchizedek (11QMelch; cf. Ps 82:1-2) and Yahoel (Apoc. Abr. 10:3-4; 11:1-4). These principal angels are probably to be understood in continuity with the angel of the Lord, who appears in the Pentateuchal narratives (cf. Gen 16:7-14; 22:11-18; Ex 14:19-20). The tradition may have received significant impetus from texts such as Ezekiel 1:26-28; 8:2-4, where the "glory of the Lord" appears in human-like form, and Daniel 7:9-14; 10:2-9, where a heavenly "one like a son of man" and chief angels appear. In some Jewish texts of approximately the first century, these principal angels act as chief servants or agents of God, and seem to have contributed to a bifurcation in the Jewish conception of the image of God. The angel Yahoel may have been conceived as a personification of the divine name (Fossum) or an indwelling of that name (Yahweh and El = Yahoel; cf. Ex 23:20-21) in an angelic being (Hurtado). Thus, while other factors must also be considered, a fruitful line of investigation has been uncovered for understanding how early Christians could maintain a continuity with Jewish monotheism and yet speak of and worship Jesus as the pre-existent* Son* of God (see God).

See also ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD; GOD; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; QUMRAN AND PAUL; SATAN, DEVIL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Bietenhard and P. J. Budd, "Angel, Messenger, Gabriel, Michael," NIDNTT 1.101-5; H. Bietenhard, Die himmlische Welt im Urchristentum und Spätjudentum (WUNT 2; Tübingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1951); M. Brauch, Hard Sayings of Paul (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1989) 147-53; I. Broer, "ἄγγελος," EDNT 1.13-16; H. J. Cadbury, "A Qumran Parallel to Paul," HTR 51 (1958) 1-2; G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers: A Study in Pauline Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1956); W. Carr, Angels and Principalities: The Background, Meaning and Development of the Pauline Phrase hai archai kai hai exousiai (SNTSMS 42; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); M. J. Davidson, "Angels" DJG 8-11; idem, Angels at Qumran: A Comparative Study of 1 Enoch 1—36, 72-108 and Sectarian Writings from Qumran (JSPSup 11; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1992); M. Dibelius, Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1909); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); J. A. Fitzmyer, "A Feature of Qumran Angelology and the New Testament," NTS 4 (1957-58) 48-58; J. E. Fossum, The Name of God and the Angel of the Lord: The Origins of the Idea of Intermediaries in Gnosticism (WUNT 1.36; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1985); F. O. Francis, "Humility and Angelic Worship in Col 2:18," in Conflict at Colossae, ed. F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (SBLSBS 4; 2d ed.; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975) 163-95; T. H. Gaster, "Angel," IDB 1.128-34; M. D. Goulder, "Silas in Thessalonica," JSNT 48 (1992) 87-106; W. Grundmann, G. von Rad and G. Kittel, "ἄγγελος κτλ," TDNT I.74-87; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); H. B. Kuhn, "The Angelology of the Non-Canonical Jewish Apocalypses," JBL 67 (1948) 217-32; I. H. Marshall, 1 and 2 Thessalonians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); J. Michl, "Angel," EBT 1.20-28; E. T. Mullen, The Assembly of the Gods: The Divine Council in Canaanite and Early Hebrew Literature (HSM 24; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1980); C. A. Newsom and D. F. Watson, "Angels," ABD I.248-55; C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964).

D. G. Reid

ANTHROPOLOGY. See PSYCHOLOGY.

ANTIOCH ON THE ORONTES

Antioch of Syria, one of the principal cities of the Roman Empire, was the focal point of Christianity as it spread beyond the borders of Palestine to the Diaspora.*

When Paul first arrived in Antioch the city was bustling with activity and excitement, experiencing a time of rebuilding. The year Paul probably arrived, A.D. 43, was the year the city established its Olympic Games. Its population in the first century A.D. was estimated at about 300,000 (Strabo Geog. 16.2.5), which included a large number of Jews (estimates range from 22,000 to 65,000), according to Josephus (J.W. 7.3.3 §43). A huge, wealthy and cosmopolitan city where barriers of religion, race and nationality were easily crossed—and where toleration may have been a matter of civic pride—it was a perfect base of operations for the spread of Christianity. Nicolaus from Antioch, one who had been a proselyte to Judaism and one of the early converts to Christianity, was selected as one of the seven leaders of the Hellenist (see Hellenism) Christians in Jerusalem* (Acts 6:5).

Hellenistic Jewish Christians, fleeing from the persecution that arose in Jerusalem in connection with the martyrdom of Stephen, brought Christianity to Antioch. Soon other refugees who had fled to Cyprus and Cyrene came to Antioch and preached to "Greeks" with considerable success (Acts 11:19-21). These "Greeks" were probably "God-fearers," Gentiles attracted to Jewish monotheism (Acts 10:22; 13:16, 26, 43; 16:14; 17:4, 17; 18:7). Jews of Antioch were numerous and wealthy at this time, endowing splendidly decorated synagogues, and "constantly attracting to their religious ceremonies multitudes of Greeks" (Josephus J.W. 7.3.3 §45).

When the Jerusalem church heard of the growing number of believers in Antioch, they sent Barnabas* who, over a period of time, successfully ministered to the young church (Acts 11:22-24) and eventually invited Paul to join him (Acts 11:25-26). Acts tells us that Paul, the Jew of Tarsus (see Jew, Paul the), and Barnabas, the Levite from Cyprus, ministered together in Antioch for an entire year (Acts 11:26). But for many years thereafter they made this city of heterogeneous cultures the focal point and home base of their missionary activity among Gentiles* (Acts 13:3; 15:22-36; 18:22-23). Besides Jerusalem, no other city of the Roman Empire played as large a part in the life of the early church as did Antioch. It was at Antioch that the term Christian (Christianos, "Follower of Christ") was first used for the disciples of Jesus (Acts 11:26). And it was the Christian believers at Antioch who, during the severe famine (A.D. 45-47) that occurred during the reign of Claudius (Suetonius Claudius 18.2), sent relief to believers living in Judea (Acts 11:27-30).

At some point during Paul's stay in the city, Peter* came to Antioch. In the course of his visit Peter, who had been eating with Gentiles, began to withdraw from table fellowship with them (see Food). From Paul's account of the matter (Gal 2:11-14), Peter's withdrawal coincided with the arrival of a contingent from the Jerusalem church ("certain men" who "came from James") and arose out of fear of "those of the circumcision*" (tous ek peritomēs, Gal 2:12; see Judaizer). It is conjectured that the pressure for Peter to withdraw from fellowship may have arisen out of the Jerusalem church's practical concern for the gospel's outreach to Jews in a climate of rising Jewish nationalism. Nevertheless, Paul saw Peter's withdrawal, and the consequent withdrawal of other Jewish believers—including Barnabas—as hypocritical and destructive of the mission to the Gentiles and of Christian unity (Gal 2:13-14). Thus Antioch became the setting for a significant controversy over a matter of practice that struck at the heart of Paul's gospel.*

According to Eusebius, the first bishop of Antioch was Peter, who was succeeded by Evodius, and then by Ignatius of Antioch, who was martyred very early in the second century, during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98-117; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.36.2; 3.22).

Our knowledge of Antioch is derived from limited archeological excavation but also from a considerable body of ancient literature (Strabo, Evagrius, Procopius, Libanius, the Emperor Julian, John Chrysostom, and especially the Chronographia of John Malalas from the sixth century A.D.). The city covered an area of approximately one by two miles between the Orontes River on the east and Mount Silpius on the west. It was laid out on a Hippodamian grid plan (streets crossing at right angles and buildings placed in the rectangles), typical of Hellenistic cities, with rectangular city blocks of 367 feet by 190 feet. It was surrounded by a wall built by Seleucus I (311-281 B.C.), enlarged probably by Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) and rebuilt by Tiberius (A.D. 14-37).

Beginning in 67 B.C., many important buildings, including a palace and a circus, were constructed by Marcius Rex and Pompey. This building program was continued in 47 B.C. by Julius Caesar, who constructed an aqueduct to provide water for residences built on the side of Mount Silpius. Some remains of these private residences and also of small bathhouses whose construction was facilitated by the building of the aqueduct have been found. At the foot of the mountain Caesar constructed a theater in the monumental center of town and an amphitheater near the southern gate. Somewhere, undoubtedly near the center of town, he built the Kaisareion, perhaps the oldest basilica in the East, for use by the cult of Rome. It bore his name and housed a statue of himself. In Antioch he also rebuilt the Pantheon, which was in a state of deterioration, and built (or reconstructed) a theater on the slope of Mount Silpius.

A colonnaded street, which ran the full length of the city, north to south, and cut Antioch in half, was built by Herod the Great (Josephus, J.W. 1.21.11 §425; Ant. 16.5.3 §148). Augustus Caesar visited Antioch twice and conducted an extensive building program in the city. This he funded by the treasure he found in Egypt after the defeat of Cleopatra and Antony at Actium in 31 B.C. Several temples and other projects attributed to Tiberius were probably only completed by him, actually having been initiated by Augustus.

Some of Tiberius's building activities may have been occasioned by a fire in Antioch during his reign in A.D. 23/24. He built bathhouses in the eastern part of the city, and perhaps also on the island in the Orontes. He is also credited with the expansion of the theater, the construction of monumental gates at each main intersection of the city's streets, and the completion and improvement of the Epiphania, the city's southern section built by Antiochus Epiphanes and named after himself.

Antioch was hit by earthquakes often, two of which occurred in the time of Paul. The first happened on April 9, A.D. 37, during the reign of Caligula, to which Caligula responded quickly and generously, utilizing the considerable surplus left in the treasury at Rome by Tiberius. Substantial building and renovation were conducted as he rebuilt the devastated city. The second earthquake at Antioch, which occurred during the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41-54), also damaged Ephesus, Smyrna and other cities of Asia Minor.

The "Silver Chalice of Antioch" was purportedly discovered there in 1910. It consists of a plain silver inner cup and a heavily gilded outer silver holder. It has been speculated that the reason for making such a beautiful container for such an ordinary cup was that the latter was the cup used by Christ at the Last Supper. However, authorities generally date the cup from the second to the sixth century.

See also BARNABAS; MISSION; PETER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome: New Testament Cradles of Catholic Christianity (New York: Paulist, 1983); F. Cimok, Antioch on the Orontes (Istanbul: Us Tan Tma Merkezi, 1980); Committee for the Excavation of Antioch and its Vicinity, Antioch-on-the-Orontes, eds. G. W. Elderkin et al. (5 vols.; Princeton: University Press, 1934-70); G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria from Seleucus to the Arab Conquest (Princeton: University Press, 1961); idem, Ancient Antioch (Princeton: University Press, 1963); J. D. G. Dunn, "The Incident at Antioch (Gal. 2.11-18)," JSNT 18 (1983) 3-57 [= idem, Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 129-82]; C. H. Kraeling, "The Jewish Community at Antioch," JBL 51 (1932) 130-60; J. H. W. G. Liebeschuetz, Antioch: City and Imperial Administration in the Later Roman Empire (Oxford: Clarendon, 1972); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990) 65-71; W. Meeks and R. Wilken, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era (SBLSBS 13; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1978); D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Christian Antioch: A Study of Early Christian Thought in the East (Cambridge: University Press, 1982).

J. McRay

APOCALYPTICISM

The term "apocalypticism" is a transliterated form of the Greek term apokalypsis, which means "disclosure," "revelation." The author of the Apocalypse, or Revelation of John, was the first Jewish or Christian author to use the term apokalypsis in describing the content of his book, which is essentially a narrative of a series of revelatory visions which disclose the events surrounding the imminent end of the present age: "[This is] the revelation [apokalypsis] of John, which God gave to him, to show to his servants what must soon take place" (Rev 1:1). Following Revelation 1:1, the term apocalypse has been used since the early nineteenth century, when it was popularized by the German NT scholar F. Luecke (1791-1854) as a generic term to describe documents with a content and structure similar to the Revelation of John.

1. Defining Apocalypticism
2. The Origins of Apocalypticism
3. Characteristics of Apocalypticism
4. Paul and Jewish Apocalyptic

1. Defining Apocalypticism.

The term apocalypticism is a modern designation widely used to refer to a worldview which characterized segments of early Judaism from c. 200 B.C. to A.D. 200, and which centered on the expectation of God's imminent intervention into human history in a decisive manner to save his people and punish their enemies by destroying the existing fallen cosmic order and by restoring or recreating the cosmos to its original pristine perfection. Knowledge of cosmic secrets (one of the contributions of the wisdom tradition to apocalypticism) and the imminent eschatological plans of God was revealed to apocalyptists through dreams and visions, and the apocalypses they wrote were primarily narratives of the visions they had received and which were explained to them by an interpreting angel. All extant Jewish apocalypses are believed to be pseudonymous, that is, written under the names of prominent ancient Israelite or Jewish figures such as Adam, Enoch, Moses, Daniel, Ezra and Baruch. Only the earliest Christian apocalypses, the Revelation of John and the Shepherd of Hermas, were written under the names of the actual authors. The most likely reason for the phenomenon of apocalyptic pseudonymity is that it was a strategy to provide credentials and thereby assure the acceptance of these revelatory writings at a point in Israelite history when the reputation of prophets had sunk to an extremely low point. Apocalypticism is therefore a term used to describe the particular type of eschatological expectation characteristic of early Jewish and early Christian apocalypses. The Jewish religious compositions which are generally regarded as apocalypses include Daniel 7—12 (the only OT apocalypse), the five documents which comprise 1 Enoch (1—36, the Book of Watchers; 37—71, the Similitudes of Enoch; 72—82, the Book of Heavenly Luminaries; 83—90, the Animal Apocalypse; 92—104, the Epistle of Enoch), 2 Enoch, 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, 3 Baruch and the Apocalypse of Abraham. Early Christian apocalypses include the Revelation of John (the only NT apocalypse) and the Shepherd of Hermas.

There are four aspects of apocalypticism which need to be distinguished:

(1) Apocalyptic eschatology, a type of eschatology that is found in apocalypses or is similar to the eschatology of apocalypses, characterized by the tendency to view reality from the perspective of divine sovereignty (e.g., the eschatologies of the Qumran Community, Jesus and Paul)

(2) Apocalypticism or millennialism, a form of collective behavior based on those beliefs (e.g., the movement led by John the Baptist, and the revolts of Theudas reported in Acts 5:36 and Josephus Ant. 20.5.1 §§97-98, and the unnamed Egyptian reported in Acts 21:38; Josephus Ant. 20.8.6 §§169-72; J.W. 2.13.5 §§261-63)

(3) Apocalypse, a type of literature in which those beliefs occur in their most basic and complete form, and which centers on the revelation of cosmic lore and the end of the age

(4) Apocalyptic imagery, the various constituent themes and motifs of apocalyptic eschatology used in various ways in early Jewish and early Christian literature

The focus in this article will be on Jewish apocalyptic eschatology and the ways in which Paul adapted some of the basic themes and structures of apocalyptic eschatology into his own theological thought.

2. The Origins of Apocalypticism.

A number of proposals have been made regarding the origins of apocalypticism, and these proposals have often reflected the positive or negative attitude which scholars have had toward the phenomenon of apocalypticism. Following the lead of F. Luecke in the mid-nineteenth century, many scholars have viewed apocalypticism favorably as a development of OT prophecy that perhaps resulted from the disillusionment of the post-exilic period which included subjection to foreign nations and tension within the Jewish community. Other scholars who discerned a sharp break between OT prophecy and later apocalypticism proposed that many of the basic features of apocalypticism originated in ancient Iran and had penetrated Jewish thought during the Hellenistic period (c. 400-200 B.C.), or more generally from the syncretistic tendencies during the Hellenistic period when there was a blending of religious ideas from both west and east.

2.1. The Setting of Apocalypticism. The fact that most apocalypses are pseudonymous has made it difficult to reconstruct the social situations within which they were written and to which they responded. There is nevertheless wide agreement that Jewish apocalypses were written or revised during times of social or political crisis, though such crises may run the spectrum from real to perceived. Focusing his attention on the period 400-200 B.C., Ploeger discerned a split in the post-exilic Jewish community into two sharp divisions, the theocratic party (the ruling priestly aristocrats), which interpreted prophetic eschatology in terms of the Jewish state, and the eschatological party (forerunners of the apocalyptists), which awaited the fulfillment of the eschatological predictions of the prophets. More recently, P. D. Hanson has argued that apocalypticism is a natural development of Israelite prophecy which originated in the intramural struggle between visionary prophets and hierocratic (Zadokite) priests which took place from the sixth through the fourth centuries B.C.

2.2. Eschatology and Apocalypticism. A distinction has generally been made between eschatology* and apocalypticism. Eschatology is a term which began to be used in the nineteenth century as a label for that aspect of systematic theology which dealt with topics relating to the future of the individual (death, resurrection, judgment, eternal life, heaven and hell), and topics relating to corporate or national eschatology, that is, the future of the Christian church or the Jewish people (e.g., the coming of the Messiah, the great tribulation, resurrection, judgment, the Second Coming of Christ, the temporary messianic kingdom, the recreation of the universe). A distinction has often been made between prophetic eschatology and apocalyptic eschatology, which serves the useful function of emphasizing the continuities as well as the changes in Israelite-Jewish eschatological expectation. Following this model, prophetic eschatology was an optimistic perspective which anticipated that God would eventually restore the originally idyllic pristine conditions by acting through historical processes. The Israelite prophet proclaimed God's plans for Israel to both king and people in terms of actual historical and political events and processes. Prophecy sees the future as arising out of the present, while apocalyptic eschatology regards the future as breaking into the present; the former is essentially optimistic, while the latter is pessimistic (Rowley, 35).

2.3. Prophecy and Apocalypticism. The problem of the relationship between prophecy and apocalypticism is one aspect of the problem of the degree of continuity or discontinuity thought to exist between Jewish apocalypticism and earlier Israelite religious and political traditions. It is important to recognize that prophecy and apocalypticism exhibit both elements of continuity and discontinuity. The sharp contrasts often thought to exist between prophecy and apocalypticism are somewhat mitigated by the recognition that prophecy itself underwent many changes and that there are numerous striking similarities between late prophecy and early apocalyptic (Hanson). Late prophetic books which exhibit tendencies that were later to emerge more fully developed in Jewish apocalyptic literature include the visions of Zechariah 1—6 (with the presence of an angelic interpreter), Isaiah 24—27, 56—66, Joel and Zechariah 9—14.

2.4. Wisdom and Apocalypticism. Many scholars have argued that there was a fundamental break between prophecy and apocalypticism. G. von Rad, for example, rejected the view that the primary roots of apocalypticism were to be found in Israelite prophecy. Von Rad described apocalypticism as consisting in a clear-cut dualism, radical transcendence, esotericism and gnosticism, and proposed that apocalypticism arose out of the Wisdom literature of the OT. Themes common to wisdom* and apocalyptic literature, and which suggest the connection between the two types of literature include the following: (1) both sages and apocalyptists are referred to as "the wise" and preserved their teaching in written form, often emphasizing their special "knowledge" and its antiquity; (2) both exhibit individualistic and universalistic tendencies; (3) both are concerned with the mysteries of nature from a celestial perspective; and (4) both reflect a deterministic view of history.

The proposal that Israelite wisdom, not Israelite prophecy, was the mother of Jewish apocalypticism has found little scholarly support in the form in which it was proposed by von Rad. Yet there are undeniably links between wisdom and apocalyptic (Wis 7:27; Sir 24:33), both of which are scribal phenomena. The wisdom tradition in Israel was certainly one of the many influences upon the development of Jewish apocalypticism. Nevertheless it is important to distinguish between two types of wisdom: proverbial wisdom and mantic wisdom. The latter type is related to the role of the "wise" in interpreting dreams as reflected in the biblical traditions concerning Joseph and Daniel, both of whom were able to explain the meaning of ambiguous revelatory dreams through divine wisdom (Gen 40:8; 41:25, 39; Dan 2:19-23, 30, 45; 5:11-12). The figure of the angelus interpres ("interpreting angel") occurs frequently in Jewish apocalypses where he plays the analogous role of a supernatural revealer who is able to reveal the deeper significance of the dreams and visions experienced by the apocalyptist (Dan 7—12; Zech 1—6; 4 Ezra).

2.5. Pharisaism and Apocalypticism. The monumental three-volume work on Judaism by G. F. Moore was based on the assumption that "normative" Judaism of the first few centuries of the Christian era, "the age of the Tannaim," did not include Jewish apocalypticism. Similarly, A. Schweitzer sharply distinguished the teaching of the apocalyptists (and therefore Jesus) from the teaching of the rabbis. However, the Pharisaic emphases on the resurrection, the age to come and the Messiah, make it difficult to distinguish sharply the religious and political concerns of apocalyptists from the Pharisees, even though Pharisees appear to have become disenchanted with many aspects of apocalypticism in the aftermath of the disastrous first revolt against Rome (A.D. 66-73). W. D. Davies has argued that there are several links between apocalypticism and Pharisaism: (1) Both share a similar piety and attitude toward the Torah. (2) Both share similar views on such eschatological topics as the travail of the Messianic era, the gathering of exiles, the days of the Messiah, the New Jerusalem, the judgment and gehenna. (3) Both have populist and scholastic tendencies.

3. Characteristics of Apocalypticism.

3.1. Major Aspects of Apocalypticism. There are a number of features of apocalyptic eschatology upon which there is some scholarly agreement:

(1) The temporal dualism of the two ages

(2) The radical discontinuity between this age and the next coupled with pessimism regarding the existing order and otherworldly hope directed toward the future order

(3) The division of history into segments (four, seven, twelve) reflecting a predetermined plan of history

(4) The expectation of the imminent arrival of the reign of God as an act of God spelling the doom of existing earthly conditions

(5) A cosmic perspective in which the primary location of an individual is no longer within a collective entity such as Israel or the people of God, and the impending crisis is not local but cosmic in scope

(6) The cataclysmic intervention of God will result in salvation for the righteous, conceived as the regaining of Edenic conditions

(7) The introduction of angels* and demons* to explain historical and eschatological events

(8) The introduction of a new mediator with royal functions

These characteristics are not exhaustive, but they serve the useful purpose of focusing on some of the distinctive features of the apocalyptic worldview.

3.2. The Apocalyptic Scenarios. Since narratives that describe the events attending the close of the present era and the inauguration of the future era are essentially a type of folklore, there are many divergent descriptions of expected future events with little consistency between them. In producing a synthesis of the great variety of apocalyptic scenarios found in apocalyptic literature, therefore, the emphasis must be on the more typical features found in such descriptions. Apocalypticism or apocalyptic eschatology centers on the belief that the present world order, which is both evil and oppressive, is under the temporary control of Satan and his human accomplices. This present evil world order will shortly be destroyed by God and replaced with a new and perfect order corresponding to Eden. During the present evil age, the people of God are an oppressed minority who fervently await the intervention of God or his specially chosen agent, the Messiah. The transition between the old and the new ages, the end of the old age and the beginning of the new, will be introduced by a final series of battles fought by the people of God against the human allies of Satan.* The outcome is never in question, however, for the enemies of God are predestined to be defeated and destroyed. The inauguration of the new age will begin with the arrival of God or his accredited agent to judge the wicked and reward the righteous, and will be concluded by the re-creation or transformation of the universe.

*3.3. Limited Dualism. One of the basic features of apocalypticism is the conviction that the cosmos is divided under two opposing supernatural forces, God and Satan, who represent the moral qualities of good and evil (cosmological dualism). However, the Jewish conviction that God is absolutely sovereign implies that he is the originator of evil and that the resultant dualism of good and evil is neither eternal nor absolute (unlike the dualism of ancient Iranian religion), but limited. This essentially limited cosmological dualism was understood in various different but related types of dualistic thought in early Jewish apocalypticism: (1) Temporal or eschatological dualism makes a sharp distinction between the present age and the age to come. (2) Ethical dualism is based on a moral distinction between good and evil and sees humanity divided into two groups, the righteous and the wicked, in a way which corresponds to good and evil supernatural powers. (3) Psychological or microcosmic dualism is the internalization of the two-age schema which sees the forces of good and evil struggling for supremacy within each individual.

3.3.1. Temporal or Eschatological Dualism. The belief in two successive ages, or worlds, developed only gradually in Judaism. The earliest occurrence of the rabbinic phrase "the world to come" is found in 1 Enoch 71:15 (c. 200 B.C.). The doctrine of two ages is fully developed by c. A.D. 90, for according to 4 Ezra 7:50, "The Most High has not made one Age but two" (see 4 Ezra 8:1). The day of judgment is considered the dividing point between the two ages (4 Ezra 7:113): the "day of judgment will be the end of this age and beginning of the immortal age to come."

3.3.2. Ethical Dualism. Daniel 12:10 distinguishes between the "wicked" and the "wise"; Jubilees distinguishes between Israelites who are "the righteous nation" (Jub. 24:29), "a righteous generation" (Jub. 25:3) and the Gentiles who are sinners (Jub. 23:24; 24:28); the Qumran War Scroll similarly distinguishes between the people of God and the Kittim (1QM 1:6; 18:2-3); and the Testament of Asher contrasts "good and single-faced people" (T. Asher 4:1) with "people of two faces" (T. Asher 3:1).

3.3.3. Psychological or Microcosmic Dualism. In this type of dualism the antithetical supernatural cosmic powers, conceived of in the moral categories of good and evil, have an analogous correspondence to the struggle between good and evil experienced by individuals. In some strands of Jewish apocalyptic thought, notably the Qumran Community and the circles which produced the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, it was believed that God created two spirits, the spirit of truth and the spirit of error (i.e., the evil spirit called Belial, 1QS 1:18-24; T. Judah 20:1-5; see Jn 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 1 Jn 4:6), and humans may live in accordance with one or the other; the Prince of Lights controls the lives of the children of righteousness, while the Angel of Darkness has dominion over the children of falsehood (1QS 3:17—4:1; 4:2-11; 1QM 13:9-12). However, even the sins of the children of righteousness are ultimately caused by the spirit of error, for both spirits strive for supremacy within the heart of the individual (1QS 4:23-26; T. Asher 1:3-5; see Seitz). The dominion of the spirit of error is temporally limited, however, for God will ultimately destroy it (1QS 4:18-19). The doctrine that the spirit of truth and the spirit of error strive for supremacy in the heart of each person is similar to the rabbinic doctrine of the good and evil impulses.

*3.4. Messianic Expectation. Messianism was not an invariable feature of all the various eschatological schemes which made up Jewish apocalypticism. During the Second Temple period there were at least two main types of Jewish messianism, restorative and utopian. Restorative messianism anticipated the restoration of the Davidic monarchy and centered on an expectation of the improvement and perfection of the present world through natural development (Pss. Sol. 17), and modeled on an idealized historical period; the memory of the past is projected into the future. Utopian messianism anticipated a future era which would surpass everything previously known. Jewish messianism tended to focus, not on the restoration of a dynasty, but on a single messianic king sent by God to restore the fortunes of Israel (see Restoration of Israel). However, as a theocratic symbol, the Messiah is dispensable, since a Messiah is not invariably part of all Jewish eschatological expectation. No such figure, for example, plays a role in the eschatological scenarios of Joel, Isaiah 24—27, Daniel, Sirach, Jubilees, the Assumption of Moses, Tobit, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Wisdom, 1 Enoch 1—36 [the Book of Watchers], 90—104 [the Epistle of Enoch], 2 Enoch.

3.5. The Temporary Messianic Kingdom. There is little consistency in Jewish apocalyptic regarding the arrival of the kingdom* of God. It was conceptualized by some as the arrival of an eternal kingdom, but by others as a temporary messianic kingdom which would be succeeded by an eternal kingdom (see 1 Cor 15:24). The conception of a temporary messianic kingdom which would function as a transition between the present evil age and the age to come, between monarchy and theocracy, solved the problem of how the transition from the Messiah to the eternal reign of God (where such a conception is present) might be conceived. In Jewish apocalyptic thought generally, the kingdom of God is more centrally important than the figure of a Messiah. A messianic interregnum, therefore, functions as an anticipation of the perfect and eternal theocratic state which will exist when primordial conditions are reinstated forever. This interim kingdom was expected to be transitional since it is depicted as combining some of the characteristics of this age with those of the age to come. In Christian apocalypticism this anticipation of a temporary messianic kingdom is clearly reflected in Revelation 20:4-6, and according to some scholars is also reflected in 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 (see below). The expectation of a future temporary messianic kingdom is found in only three early Jewish apocalypses, the Apocalypse of Weeks, or 1 Enoch 91:1-10; 93:12-17 (written between 175 and 167 B.C.), 4 Ezra 7:26-44; 12:31-34 (written c. A.D. 90), and 2 Baruch 29:3—30:1; 40:1-4; 72:2—74:3 (written c. A.D. 110). Though some have claimed that the conception of a temporary messianic kingdom is found in 2 Enoch 32:2—33:1 and Jubilees 1:27-29; 23:26-31, the evidence is not compelling.

3.5.1. Apocalypse of Weeks. In 1 Enoch 93:3-10 and 91:11-17, an earlier apocalypse inserted into the Epistle of Enoch (1 Enoch 91—104), history is divided into ten weeks (i.e., ten ages), with a nonmessianic temporary kingdom appearing in the eighth week and an eternal kingdom arriving in the tenth week (1 Enoch 91:11-17).

3.5.2. 4 Ezra. According to 4 Ezra 7:26-30, the Messiah will appear in the last days and live with the righteous for four hundred years. The Messiah, together with all other people on earth, will then die and the world will return to seven days of primeval silence. After this the resurrection will occur (4 Ezra 7:32), and the Most High will take his place on the seat of judgment and will execute judgment on all nations (4 Ezra 7:36-43). In 4 Ezra 12:31-34, on the other hand, the Davidic Messiah will sit on the seat of judgment and, after reproving the ungodly and the wicked, will destroy them (4 Ezra 12:32). This judgment exercised by the Messiah is preliminary to the final judgment which will be exercised by God after the arrival of the end (4 Ezra 12:34). Nowhere in 4 Ezra, however, does the Messiah play a role in the eternal theocratic kingdom which is inaugurated with the resurrection.

3.5.3. 2 Baruch. After twelve periods of tribulation (2 Baruch 27:1-5), the messianic kingdom is depicted as a period of phenomenal abundance inaugurated by the appearance of the Messiah (2 Baruch 29:3) and concluded by his return to glory (2 Baruch 30:1). The elect who lived during the messianic kingdom will then be joined by the resurrected righteous, but the souls of the wicked will fear judgment (2 Baruch 30:1-5). The author assumes rather than clearly states the fact that those who lived during the messianic kingdom will experience a transformation into a resurrection mode of existence like the resurrected righteous. In 2 Baruch 39—40 the predicted fall of the fourth kingdom (Rome) will be followed by the revelation of the Messiah (2 Baruch 39:7), who will destroy the armies of the final wicked ruler, who will be brought bound to Zion where he will be judged and executed by the Messiah (2 Baruch 40:1-2). The kingdom of the Messiah will last "forever," that is, until the world of corruption has ended, which means that this kingdom is temporary but of unspecified duration. Finally, in 2 Baruch 72:2—74:3, the warrior Messiah will summon all nations together, sparing some and executing others (2 Baruch 72:2-6). Following this period of judgment will be an era in which Edenic conditions will be restored to the earth (2 Baruch 73:1-7). As in 4 Ezra, the Messiah plays no role in the eternal kingdom which is inaugurated after he is taken up into heaven.

3.6. The Eschatological Antagonist. In Jewish apocalyptic literature there are two traditions of a wicked eschatological figure who functions as an agent of Satan, or Beliar, in leading astray, opposing and persecuting the people of God; both traditions represent historicizations of the ancient combat myth. One tradition focuses on a godless tyrannical ruler who will arise in the last generation to become the primary adversary of God or the Messiah. This Satanic agent was expected to lead the forces of evil in the final battle between the forces of evil and the people of God (1QM 18.1; 1QS 4.18-18; T. Dan. 5:10-11; T. Mos. 8).

The historicization of the combat myth is already found in the OT where the chaos monsters Rahab and Leviathan are sometimes used to symbolize foreign oppressors like Egypt (Ps 74:14; 87:4; Is 30:7; Ezek 29:3; 32:2-4). Several OT traditions provided the basis for the later apocalyptic conception of the eschatological antagonist, including the figure of Gog, the ruler of Magog in the Gog and Magog oracle in Ezekiel 38—39 (see Rev 20:8; 3 Enoch 45:5), the references to a vague "enemy from the north" found in several OT prophecies (Ezek 38:6, 15; 39:2; Jer 1:13-15; 3:18; 4:6; 6:1, 22), and the depicting of Antiochus IV, the "little horn" in Daniel 7—8, as the oppressor of the people of God. The career of the Greco-Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.), whose actions against the Jewish people are described in 1 Maccabees 1:20-61, and 2 Maccabees 5:11-6:11, is presented as a mythologized apocalyptic figure in Daniel 11:36-39, claiming to be God or to be equal with God (Dan 11:36-37; Sib. Or. 5:33-34; Asc. Isa. 4:6; 2 Enoch [Rec. J] 29:4).

Later the characteristics of the eschatological adversary were augmented and embellished by traditions about the Roman emperors* Caligula and Nero, both of whom had divine pretensions which their Roman contemporaries considered tacky and which outraged the Jews. The other tradition concerns the false prophet who performs signs and wonders to legitimate his false teaching (cf. Deut 13:2-6). Occasionally Satan and the eschatological antagonist are identified as the same person, as in Sibylline Oracles 3:63-74 and Ascension of Isaiah 7:1-7, where Nero (= the eschatological antagonist) is regarded as Beliar (= Satan) incarnate.

3.7. The Re-creation or Transformation of the Cosmos. In Isaiah 65:17 and 66:22 the creation of a new heaven and a new earth is predicted. The theme of the re-creation or renewal of creation was taken up into apocalyptic literature as the final eschatological act. Essentially the expectation of a new creation or a renewed creation is a particular application of the two-age schema in which the first creation is identified with the present evil age (or world) and the new or renewed creation is identified with the age (or world) to come. While there are many references to the new creation in Jewish apocalyptic literature, it is not always clear whether the present order of creation is reduced to chaos before the act of re-creation (1 Enoch 72:1; 91:16; Sib. Or. 5.212; Jub. 1:29; 4:26; Bib. Ant. 3:10; Apoc. Elijah 5:38; 2 Pet 3:13; Rev 21:1, 5; see 2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15), or whether the renewal or transformation of the existing world is in view (1 Enoch 45:4-5; 2 Apoc. Bar. 32:6; 44:12; 49:3; 57:2; Bib. Ant. 32:17; 4 Ezra 7:30-31, 75; see Rom 8:21). In many of these passages the pattern for the new or transformed creation is based on the Edenic conditions thought to have existed on the earth before the fall of Adam and Eve.

4. Paul and Jewish Apocalyptic.

4.1. Sources and Problems. Critical scholarship regards the seven generally acknowledged Pauline letters as providing a firm basis for analyzing Pauline theology. These letters include Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians and Philemon. Letters whose authenticity remains in some doubt (2 Thessalonians; Colossians) or whose Pauline authorship is generally rejected (Ephesians; 1 and 2 Timothy; Titus) are used only to supplement data found in the basic corpus of seven letters. The Book of Acts is another important source for our knowledge of Paul's life, but this work too must be used only as a supplement to the core of genuine letters.

One of the major problems in the study of Paul's life and thought is that of determining the extent to which it is appropriate to label Pauline thought as "apocalyptic." There is widespread agreement that Paul was influenced by apocalyptic eschatology, but the extent to which he modified apocalypticism in light of his faith in Christ remains a central problem. Baumgarten holds that Paul demythologizes apocalyptic traditions by consistently applying them to the present life of the community.

Another problem centers on the issue of the origin of Paul's apocalyptic thought. Baumgarten (43-53) has suggested that apocalyptic traditions came to Paul through the Hellenists at Antioch.*

4.2. The Center or Structure of Pauline Thought. The complexity of Paul's theological thought is exacerbated by the fact that the primary evidence for his views is found in occasional letters written in a variety of specific contexts for the purpose of addressing particular problems and issues; they are historically contingent pastoral communications. Further, the basic seven-letter corpus can hardly be regarded as a representative sample of Pauline thought. Despite the difficulties, many attempts have been made to understand the coherence of Paul's thought and on that basis to identify the core or center* of his thought. Some scholars have doubted whether Paul himself thought in terms of such a "core," or whether the evidence from seven occasional letters is adequate for such a task. Some of the more important suggestions for identifying the central message of Paul's thought include: (1) the gospel,* (2) christology,* (3) the death* and resurrection* of Jesus, (4) the theme "in Christ"* (participatory categories), (5) ecclesiology (see Church), (6) justification* by faith (the traditional Lutheran view) and (7) anthropology (F. C. Baur; R. Bultmann). It is evident, however, that many of these topics are closely related to others, so that the choice of a core for Pauline thought becomes a matter of nuance. It is clear, for example, that Paul's polemical doctrine of justification by faith is an aspect of his christology, and that the topics of anthropology and ecclesiology are two ways of looking at individual Christians who at the same time hold membership in the people of God.

Other scholars have proposed that it is more important to identify the structure of Paul's thought. Two of the most important proposals include: (1) salvation history, that is, God, who is the central actor in history, has had an ultimate salvific goal for humanity from the beginning, which originally centered on Israel and ultimately on all who believe in Christ, a structure particularly evident in Romans 9—11; and (2) apocalyptic eschatology. However, salvation history and apocalyptic eschatology must not be considered antithetical, since the latter is simply a more specific and particular version of the former. Further, it is a matter of continuing debate whether these suggestions constitute the horizon or kernel of Paul's thought.

4.3. Paul as a Visionary and Mystic. The authors of apocalypses, though they usually concealed their true identities behind pseudonyms, received divine revelations through visions* and for that reason they structured the apocalypses they wrote as narratives of the visions they had actually received or pretended to receive. There was a close relationship between Jewish merkabah mysticism (based on Ezek 1; see Jew, Paul the; Mysticism) and apocalypticism (Gruenwald), though out-of-body visions were more common in the former and bodily ascensions to heaven more common in the latter. While there is no evidence that Paul himself wrote an apocalypse, he claims to have been the recipient of revelatory visions or ecstatic experiences (Gal 1:11-17; 1 Cor 9:1; 15:8; see Acts 9:1-9; 16:9; 18:9-10; 22:6-11, 17-21; 26:12-18; 27:23-24). In Galatians 1:12 he speaks of his Damascus Road experience as an apokalypsis ("revelation") from Jesus Christ (see Conversion), and in 2 Corinthians 12:1 he speaks of "visions and revelations [apokalypseis] of the Lord," which are presumably descriptions of his own experience. It is likely that Paul is the man of whom he speaks, who experienced a journey to the third heaven where he heard unspeakable things (2 Cor 12:1-10).

4.4. Apocalyptic Scenarios. There are four relatively extensive apocalyptic scenarios in the Pauline letters, three of which center on the Parousia of Jesus (1 Thess 4:13-18; 2 Thess 1:5-12; 1 Cor 15:51-57), and the so-called "Pauline apocalypse," which centers on the coming of the eschatological antagonist (2 Thess 2:1-12). There are also a number of shorter scenarios which appear to be formulaic in character and therefore of pre-Pauline or extra-Pauline origin (1 Thess 1:9-10; 3:13; 5:23).

4.5. Limited Dualism. The Pauline view of the sovereignty of God (Rom 9—11) makes it apparent that he shares the basic dualistic convictions of Jewish apocalypticism during the late Second Temple period.

4.5.1. Temporal or Eschatological Dualism. In continuity with the temporal dualistic thought of Jewish apocalypticism, Paul also contrasted the present evil age with the coming age of salvation* (Gal 1:4; Rom 8:18; 1 Cor 1:26; see Eph 5:16) and believed that he was living at the end of the ages (1 Cor 10:11). Yet Paul considerably modified the sharp distinction usually made in apocalyptic thought between these two ages. Paul understood the death and resurrection of Jesus in the past as cosmic eschatological events that separated "this age" (Rom 12:2; 1 Cor 1:20; 2:6), or "this present evil age" (Gal 1:4), from "the age to come." This present age is dominated by rulers, demonic powers who are doomed to pass away (1 Cor 2:6-7; see Principalities and Powers).

Paul's belief in the resurrection* of Jesus the Messiah convinced him that eschatological events had begun to take place within history, and that the resurrection of Jesus was part of the traditional Jewish expectation of the resurrection of the righteous (1 Cor 15:20-23). For Paul the present is a temporary period between the death and resurrection of Christ and his return in glory in which those who believe in the gospel share in the salvific benefits of the age to come (Gal 1:4; 2 Cor 5:17). This temporary period is characterized by the eschatological gift of the Spirit of God who is experienced as present within the Christian community in general as well as within particular believers who are members of the Christian community (Rom 8:9-11; 1 Cor 6:19; 12:4-11; 1 Thess 4:8; see Holy Spirit). While Paul did not explicitly use the phrase "the age to come" in 2 Corinthians 5:17 and Galatians 6:15, he uses the phrase "new creation,*" a phrase with apocalyptic associations (Is 65:17; 66:22; Rev 21:1). Though the final consummation still lay in the future, for Christians the new age was present because the Messiah had come.

The basic salvation-history framework of Paul's thought incorporates within it the apocalyptic notion of the two successive ages. This is evident in Romans 5:12-21 where Paul schematizes history in terms of the two realms of Adam* and Christ, which are both made part of present experience. Paul therefore made an "already"/"not yet" distinction, indicated by his use of the indicative and imperative in passages such as Galatians 5:25: "If we live [indicative] in the Spirit, let us also walk [imperative] in the Spirit." While the flesh* has been crucified with Christ (Gal 2:20; 3:24; 6:14; Rom 6:2, 6-7, 22; 8:13), the desires of the flesh still pose temptations for Christians (Gal 5:16-18; Rom 6:12-14; 8:5-8). The daily obedience of the Christian provides the continual and necessary authentication of their original act of believing in Christ until the future redemption* of creation and the freedom* of the children of God becomes a reality (Rom 8:19-20).

4.5.2. Spatial Dualism. Ancient Israelite cosmology conceived of a cosmos in three levels: heaven, earth and Sheol. This same conception of the universe was transmitted to early Judaism, though the emphasis on the transcendence of God which characterized late Second Temple Judaism presupposed a sharper distinction between the heavenly world and the earthly world. This spatial dualism (heaven as the dwelling place of God and his angels; earth as the dwelling place of humanity) coincided with temporal or eschatological dualism in the sense that the kingdom of God, or the age to come, was a heavenly reality which would eventually displace the earthly reality of the present evil age. For Paul, "the things that are seen are transient, but the things that are not seen are eternal" (2 Cor 4:18; see Phil 3:20; 2 Cor 5:1-5). There are therefore three cosmic realms: heaven, earth and the region below the earth (Phil 2:10), though the normal focus is on the two primary cosmic realms: heaven and earth (1 Cor 8:5; 15:47-50; see Col 1:16, 20; Eph 1:10; 3:15). Heaven* is where God and his angels dwell (Rom 1:18; 10:6; Gal 1:8; see Eph 6:9), and is the place where Christ is now seated at the right hand of God, a tradition based on the pre-Pauline Christian interpretation of Psalm 110:1 (Rom 8:34; Col 3:1). Heaven is the place from which Jesus will return in the near future as both savior and judge (1 Thess 1:10; 4:16; Phil 3:20; see 2 Thess 1:7; see World, Cosmology).

4.5.3. Ethical Dualism. For Paul the two antithetical cosmic powers were God* and Satan* who respectively represent the moral qualities of good and evil. God is the ultimate source of love* (Rom 5:5; 8:39; 2 Cor 13:14). It is God who has expressed love toward humanity by sending his Son to die an atoning death for them (Rom 5:8). The influence of the Spirit of God, that is, God's active presence in the world, is reflected in such ethical virtues as love, patience, kindness and self-control (Gal 5:22-23). There is an essential similarity between the lists in 1QS 4:2-6, 9-11, in which the virtues* encouraged by the spirit of truth are contrasted with the vices promoted by the spirit of error, and the lists in Galatians 5:16-24, where vices are the products of the flesh, while virtues are the products of the Spirit. Satan is frequently mentioned as the supernatural opponent of God and Christians and as the source of evil in the world (Rom 16:20; 1 Cor 7:5; 2 Cor 2:11; 11:14; 12:7; 1 Thess 2:18).

4.5.4. Psychological or Microcosmic Dualism. Assuming that the structure of Paul's theology is in part the product of his adaptation of Jewish apocalypticism as the framework for understanding the significance of the death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah, that same apocalyptic framework had a profound effect on the way in which he understood the effects of salvation on individual Christians. The basic structure of Jewish apocalypticism consisted of a temporal or eschatological dualism consisting of two ages, the present era (a period of oppression by the wicked), which will be succeeded by a blissful future era. While Jewish apocalypticism had a largely future orientation, Paul's recognition of the fact that Jesus was the Messiah who was a figure of the past as well as the present and future, led him to introduce some significant modifications. The most significant modification is the softening of the distinction between this age and the age to come with his emphasis on the hidden presence of the age to come within the present age.

Paul exhibits a tendency to conceptualize human nature and existence as a microcosmic version of a Christianized form of apocalyptic eschatology. In other words, the apocalyptic structure of history was considered paradigmatic for understanding human nature. In effect the Christian person is situated at the center of history in the sense that in him or her the opposing powers which dominate the cosmos are engaged in a struggle. Just as Paul's Christian form of apocalyptic thought is characterized by a historical or eschatological dualism consisting in the juxtaposition of the old and new ages, so his view of human nature reflected a similarly homologous dualistic structure. This is evident in 2 Corinthians 5:17 (NRSV): "So if anyone is in Christ, there is a new creation: everything old has passed away; see, everything has become new!" Here Paul uses the basic apocalyptic expectation of the renewal of creation (i.e., the inauguration of the age to come) following the destruction of the present evil age as a paradigm for the transformation experienced by the individual Christian who has moved from unbelief to belief. Thus the apocalyptic expectation of an impending cosmic change from the present evil age to the future age of salvation has become paradigmatic for the transformation of the individual believer (see Creation and New Creation).

Since this apocalyptic transformation affects only those "in Christ," the external world and its inhabitants remain under the sway of the old age. The new age is thus concealed in the old age. The phrase "new creation" refers to the renewal or re-creation of heaven and earth following the destruction of the old cosmos (Is 65:17; 66:22; 1 Enoch 91:16; 72:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 32:6; 44:12; 49:3; 57:2; Bib. Ant. 3:10; 2 Pet 3:11-13; Rev 21:1). Bultmann's existentialist understanding of Pauline anthropological terms (i.e., the human person as a free agent responsible for his or her own decisions), and E. Käsemann's apocalyptic or cosmological understanding of Paul's anthropology (i.e., the human person is a victim of supernatural cosmic forces) are not mutually exclusive categories. Paul also conceives of the struggle within each Christian as the conflict between the Spirit and the flesh, as in Galatians 5:16: "Walk in the Spirit and you will not fulfill the desires of the flesh."

4.6. Jesus the Messiah. One of the major obstacles impeding Jewish belief in Jesus as the Messiah of Jewish expectation was the fact of the crucifixion* (1 Cor 1:18-25; Gal 5:11; see Heb 12:2). One of the unsolved problems in the investigation of early Christianity is the reason why early Christians recognized the messianic status of Jesus despite the fact that he fulfilled none of the central functions which the Jewish people expected of the figure of the Davidic Messiah, including his role as an eschatological high priest, a paradigmatic benevolent and all-powerful king, a judge and destroyer of the wicked, a deliverer of the people of God (Pss. Sol. 17; 4 Ezra 12; 2 Apoc. Bar. 40). In the seven undisputed letters of Paul the term Christos, meaning "Anointed One," "Christ," or "Messiah," occurs 266 times, usually as a proper name for Jesus (e.g., "Jesus Christ"), often with some residual titular quality (evident in the name "Christ Jesus)," and occasionally as a name for a specific Messiah, Jesus (Rom 9:5), but never as a general term for an eschatological deliverer within Judaism. In the seven core Pauline letters Christos is never used as a predicate (e.g., "Jesus is the Christ"), Christos is never given a definite article following the name "Jesus" (e.g., "Jesus the Christ"), and Christos is never accompanied by a noun in the genitive (e.g., "the Christ of God"). It is safe to conclude that the messianic status of Jesus was not a matter of dispute or concern to Paul. Paul assumes but does not argue that Jesus is the Messiah (see Christ).

4.7. The Parousia and Judgment. The later OT prophets frequently referred to the Day of the Lord as the occasion when God would judge the world (Amos 5:18-20; Zeph 1:14-16; Joel 2:2). In Jewish apocalyptic literature the inauguration of the eschaton occurs with the coming of God or of an accredited agent of God, the Messiah, to bring both salvation and judgment.* While Paul can speak of "the Day of the Lord" (1 Thess 5:2), and God's role as eschatological judge (Rom 3:6), the center of his eschatological hope has shifted from God to Christ, so that he can speak both of the impending Day of the Lord (1 Thess 5:2), and claim that on that day God will judge the secrets of men by Christ Jesus (Rom 2:16; see 2 Tim 4:1). The Parousia is referred to by Paul both as "the revelation [apokalypsis] of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1:6) and (on the analogy of the OT expression "the Day of the Lord") as "the Day of Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1:8; Phil 1:6; 3:12-21; Rom 14:7-12, 17-18; 2 Cor 5:10; 1 Thess 4:13-18; 1 Cor 15:20-28, 50-58; see Eschatology).

4.8. The Resurrection. For Paul the resurrection* of Jesus was not an isolated miraculous event but rather the first stage of the general resurrection of the righteous dead (1 Cor 15:20-23). As an eschatological event, Paul expects that the resurrection of the righteous will occur when Christ returns (Phil 3:20; 1 Thess 4:13-18; 1 Cor 15:51-53). Those who are raised from the dead will be transformed into a new mode of existence (1 Cor 15:51-53; Phil 3:20-21). A similar expectation occurs in Jewish apocalyptic literature (Dan 12:3; 1 Enoch 39:4-5; 62:15; 2 Enoch 65:10; 2 Apoc. Bar. 49:3). But the resurrection of Jesus, which guarantees the resurrection of believers, is not simply a past event with future consequences. Nor is the death of Jesus simply a historical fact. For Christians, baptism represents a real identification with Christ in both his death and resurrection, signaling death to the old life and resurrection to the new (Rom 6:1-14; 8:10-11; see Col 3:1-3; Eph 2:1-10).

4.9. The Eschatological Antagonist. The Christian doctrine of the incarnation of Christ made it all but inevitable that a Satanic counterpart to Christ would be incorporated into early Christian apocalyptic expectation. In the Synoptic apocalypse the appearance of false Messiahs and false prophets at the end of the age is predicted (Mk 13:21-22; Mt 24:23-24). This figure is called the Antichrist in Johannine literature (1 Jn 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 Jn 7). In Revelation the two major Antichrist traditions, the godless, tyrannical ruler and the false, seductive prophet, are kept separate. The evil ruler is called the Beast from the Sea (Rev 13:1-10; 16:13; 19:20), while the false prophet is called the Beast from the Land, or the False Prophet (Rev 13:11-18; 16:13; 19:20). There is a single extended discussion of the coming of the eschatological antagonist in the Pauline letters (2 Thess 2:1-12), though strangely there are no allusions to this figure elsewhere in the Pauline letters. In 2 Thessalonians 2:1-12 Paul combines into a single figure the two major eschatological antagonist traditions, that of the godless, tyrannical ruler and that of the false, seductive prophet. This person is called both the "man of lawlessness" and the "son of perdition" (2 Thess 2:3; see Dan 11:36-37; Sib. Or. 5:33-34; Asc. Isa. 4:6; 2 Enoch [Rec. J] 29:4), who will install himself in the temple of God, proclaim himself to be God (2 Thess 2:4) and perform miracles to legitimate his claims (2 Thess 2:9; see Mk 13:22; Mt 24:24; Rev 13:13-14; see Signs, Wonders). This eschatological antagonist has not yet appeared because someone or something is restraining him or it (2 Thess 2:7), though there is no agreement regarding whether this restraining force is Satan, the Roman Empire, the Roman Emperor or perhaps some supernatural force. This eschatological antagonist will be slain by the Lord Jesus when he returns in judgment (2 Thess 2:8; see Man of Lawlessness).

4.10. The Problem of a Temporary Messianic Kingdom. The relevance of 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 to the early Jewish and early Christian view of a temporary intermediate messianic kingdom is disputed, though the general view is that there is no clean and convincing evidence that Paul, like the author of Revelation (Rev 20:1-6), expected a messianic interregnum (see Kingdom of God/Christ).

A. Schweitzer summarized Paul's apocalyptic beliefs in this way: (1) the sudden and unexpected return of Jesus (1 Thess 5:1-4); (2) the resurrection of deceased believers and the transformation of living believers, all of whom meet the returning Jesus in mid-air (1 Thess 4:16-17); (3) the messianic judgment presided over either by Christ (2 Cor 5:10) or God (Rom 14:10); (4) the inauguration of the messianic kingdom (not described by Paul, but hinted at in 1 Cor 15:25; Gal 4:26); (5) the transformation of all nature from mortality to immortality* during the messianic kingdom (Rom 8:19-22), and the struggle with angelic powers (Rom 16:20) until death itself is conquered (1 Cor 15:23-28); (6) the conclusion of the messianic kingdom (Paul does not mention its duration); (7) the general resurrection at the conclusion of the messianic kingdom (1 Cor 6:3); (8) the judgment upon all humanity and defeated angels. According to Schweitzer, Paul introduced two resurrections although Jewish eschatology before him knew only a single resurrection, either at the beginning or the end of the messianic kingdom. This modification was motivated by Paul's belief in the death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah. The first resurrection enables believers who have died as well as living Christians to participate in the messianic kingdom, all enjoying a resurrection mode of existence.

Schweitzer's reconstruction of Pauline eschatology is subject to several criticisms. (1) There is no evidence in 1 Thessalonians 4:13-18 or 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 that Paul expected an intermediate messianic kingdom (Wilcke). (2) There is no evidence to indicate that Paul expected a general resurrection of both the righteous and the wicked dead.

There are a number of reasons for thinking that it is more probable that 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 indicates that the Parousia will shortly be followed by the resurrection and judgment, which together will usher in the final consummation of history (Davies 1970, 295-97): (1) For Paul the kingdom of God is an unending kingdom (1 Thess 2:12; Gal 5:21; 1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50; see 2 Thess 1:4-5; Col 4:11). (2) The only text which mentions the "kingdom of Christ" (Col 1:12-13) understands it as a present fact. (3) Paul connects the Parousia with the judgment of the world (1 Cor 1:7-8; 2 Cor 1:14; Phil 1:6, 10; 2:16). It is probable that Paul has essentially historicized the apocalyptic conception of a temporary messianic kingdom in terms of a temporary period between the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus and his Parousia.

See also CREATION AND NEW CREATION; ESCHATOLOGY; KINGDOM OF GOD/CHRIST; MAN OF LAWLESSNESS AND RESTRAINING POWER; QUMRAN AND PAUL; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; RESURRECTION; TRIUMPH; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Baumgarten, Paulus und die Apokalyptik (Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1975); J. Becker, "Erwägungen zur apokalyptischen Tradition in der paulinischen Theologie," EvT 30 (1970) 593-609; J. C. Beker, Paul's Apocalyptic Gospel: The Coming Triumph of God (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); idem, Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); H. D. Betz, "On the Problem of the Religio-Historical Understanding of Apocalypticism," Journal for Theology and the Church 6 (1969) 134-56; V. P. Branick, "Apocalyptic Paul?" CBQ 47 (1985) 664-75; J. J. Collins, ed., Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre (Semeia 14; Missoula: Scholars, 1979); W. D. Davies, "Apocalyptic and Pharisaism," in Christian Origins and Judaism (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962) 19-30; idem, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (3d ed.; London: SPCK, 1970); I. Gruenwald, Apocalyptic and Merkavah Mysticism (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1980); P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); E. Käsemann, "On the Subject of Primitive Christian Apocalyptic," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 108-37; K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic (SBT, 2d ser. 22; Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1970); L. J. Kreitzer, Jesus and God in Paul's Eschatology (JSNTSup 19; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); H. P. Mueller, "Mantische Weisheit und Apoka-lyptik," in Congress Volume (VTSup 22; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 268-93; O. Ploeger, Theocracy and Eschatology (Richmond: John Knox, 1959); G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology (2 vols.; New York: Harper & Row, 1962-65); C. C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (New York: Holt, 1931); M. Smith, "On the History of Apokalypto and Apokalypsis," in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983) 9-20; H.-A. Wilcke, Das Problem eines messianischen Zwischenreichs bei Paulus (ATANT 51; Zurich: Zwingli, 1967).

D. E. Aune

APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE

As with other major figures of the NT, a variety of later works were written in Paul's name or about Paul. They are usually placed in the rather loose category of "New Testament Apocrypha."

1. Letters
2. Acts
3. Apocalypses
4. Prayer

1. Letters.

The letter* was not a popular genre for writers of Christian apocryphal literature, and so, despite Paul's fame as a letter writer, few apocryphal Pauline letters were written. An apparent reference by Clement of Alexandria (Protr. 9.87.4) to a letter of Paul to the Macedonians should probably be understood as a reference to Philippians. The Muratorian Canon (late second century) refers to spurious Pauline letters used by the Marcionites and addressed to the Laodiceans and to the Alexandrians (see Canon). The latter has not survived. In the reference to the letter to the Laodiceans there may be some confusion, since Marcion himself thought that Ephesians was Paul's letter to the Laodiceans. If the reference is to an apocryphal letter which was Marcionite in content, then it cannot be to the Laodiceans which has survived in Latin. This is little more than a patchwork of Pauline phrases, mainly from Philippians* and Galatians,* and must have been composed simply to fill the gap in the Pauline correspondence indicated by Colossians 4:16. It dates from the fourth century or earlier, and in the medieval West was widely regarded as an authentic Pauline letter, though not as canonical.

The apocryphal correspondence between Paul and the Corinthians (known as 3 Corinthians), which includes a letter from the Corinthian church to Paul as well as Paul's reply, probably (though some disagree) originated as part of the Acts of Paul (see below), but also circulated separately. On the basis of the Corinthians' problem about the resurrection* in 1 Corinthians, it represents them as troubled by the Gnostic teaching of Simon Magus and Cleobius and gives, as it were, a Pauline response to second-century Gnosticism.*

The apocryphal correspondence between Paul and Seneca consists of fourteen letters exchanged between Paul and his contemporary, the Roman philosopher and statesman Seneca. It shows Seneca as very impressed by Paul's teaching, and presumably it served an apologetic purpose. It dates from the fourth century.

2. Acts.

For students of Paul and the Pauline tradition, by far the most interesting of the apocryphal Pauline works is the second-century Acts of Paul. Unfortunately, the complete text has not survived. Because three major parts of the work were extracted and circulated as separate works after the Acts of Paul itself had largely fallen out of favor (the Acts of Paul and Thecla, 3 Corinthians and the Martyrdom of Paul), these parts are still extant, but most of the rest of the work survives only in fragmentary form.

The work must have been written in the second half of the second century. According to Tertullian, who was concerned to disallow appeal to the story of Thecla for evidence that Paul permitted women to teach and baptize, the author was a presbyter in Asia, who as a result of the work was removed from office (De Bapt. 17.5). If this account is reliable, it cannot mean that the presbyter was deposed for attempting to pass off his work as Paul's, for the Acts of Paul makes no claim to be written by Paul. It was presumably rather because he attributed to Paul teaching (such as that mentioned by Tertullian or the strong advocacy of sexual abstinence) which was deemed unacceptable. It seems very likely that the author incorporated in his work traditions and legends that already circulated orally in the Pauline churches of Asia Minor. MacDonald has argued that the stories about Thecla, the story of Paul and the lion at Ephesus,* and the story of Paul's martyrdom are folkloric in content and resemble oral narrative in style.

The story of Thecla tells of a young woman of a prominent family in Iconium, who is won over by Paul's message, especially its emphasis on the need to abstain from sexual* relations, and breaks off her engagement. Condemned to be burned at the stake, she is miraculously preserved and accompanies Paul to (Pisidian) Antioch, where she repulses the advances of a city official, is thrown to the wild beasts in the arena and again is miraculously preserved. After this experience Paul permits her to become a teacher, she returns to Iconium, then moves to (Isaurian) Seleucia and spends the rest of her life as a successful evangelist and teacher. Another episode of miraculous deliverance is Paul's experience when thrown to the lions at Ephesus: the lion he encounters is the same he had once baptized, on its request, in Jericho! The Acts included several miracles of healing and resurrection by the apostle. The concluding section recounts his final journey by sea from Corinth to Rome, preaching in Rome, arrest by Nero and martyrdom. (For the correspondence with the Corinthians, see section 1 above.)

Various attempts have been made to identify good historical tradition about Paul behind these narratives. Thecla was most probably a real person, a convert of Paul at Iconium and well remembered as a prominent Christian leader in that area, but it is impossible to tell whether anything else in the stories about her is more than legend. (Conceivably, Ignatius Rom. 5.2. is a reference to the story of Thecla in the arena.) Rordorf has drawn attention to the traditions which the Acts of Paul share (he thinks independently) with the Pastorals,* especially 2 Timothy. Persons who appear in both are Onesiphorus, Demas, Hermogenes, Titus and Luke (both with Paul in Rome in the Acts of Paul, as in 2 Tim 4:10-11). He finds in the Acts of Paul confirmation of the theory that the personal information about Paul in the Pastorals relates to travels which took place after the end of Acts, and concludes that the account in the Acts of Paul of Paul's final journey to Rome (understood as a journey subsequent to that recounted in Acts) and his martyrdom rests on historical tradition.

The physical description of Paul (Acts of Paul and Thecla 3) is well known: "a man of small stature, with a bald head and crooked legs, in a good state of body, with eyebrows meeting and nose somewhat hooked, full of friendliness." The modern impression that this is an unflattering description is mistaken. According to ancient ideas about physiognomy, the hooked nose, bowed legs and meeting eyebrows were regarded favorably, and shortness was not necessarily a disadvantage. The reference to baldness is the most surprising feature, and might preserve a historical memory. Early catacomb paintings depict Paul with little hair.

Much recent study of the Acts of Paul has seen the work as valuable evidence for popular Christianity in Asia Minor in the second century and has focused especially on the role of celibate women, who are prominent generally in the second-century apocryphal Acts and are thus represented in the Acts of Paul especially by Thecla. S. L. Davies argued that the apocryphal Acts were written by Christian women for groups of women vowed to celibacy (widows, virgins who had renounced marriage,* like Thecla, and women who had left their husbands). MacDonald, whose work deals more specifically with the Acts of Paul, accepts that the presbyter mentioned by Tertullian wrote it, but argues that the oral legends he used were stories told by Christian women, for whom they served as justification for their life and ministry as celibates independent of male authority. Others agree with this view of the celibacy espoused by Thecla as an assertion of female independence of patriarchal marriage and patriarchal social structures. MacDonald further argues that these oral legends were also known to the author of the Pastorals (which he dates in the second century), who refers to them in 1 Timothy 4:7 and 2 Timothy 4:17, and wrote to counteract them. The Pastorals' restrictions on the order of widows and women teachers were intended to control and to suppress the activities of celibate women. The Pauline tradition in second-century Asia Minor thus divided between the apocalyptic social radicalism of the women who told the stories of Thecla and the social conformism and patriarchalism of the Pastorals. This feminist approach has opened up valuable new perspectives on the apocryphal Acts, but probably needs to be tested by further study of the theme of celibacy as an ideal for both men and women in the apocryphal Acts in general and in the second-century church.

Paul appears also in a number of later Acts (Acts of Andrew and Paul, Acts of Peter and Paul, Syriac History of Paul, etc.). An otherwise unknown Preaching of Paul is described in Pseudo-Cyprian, De Rebaptismo 17 (3rd century?).

3. Apocalypses.

Two apocalypses of Paul have been preserved, both inspired by Paul's reference to his ascent to heaven* (2 Cor 12:2; see Visions). One is a Gnostic work, probably of the second century, preserved among the Nag Hammadi texts (CG V, 2). It describes Paul's ascent through the heavens, where he sees the judgment of souls in the fourth and fifth heavens, encounters an old man on a throne in the seventh heaven, who threatens to prevent his further ascent, and passes beyond the twelve apostles in the eighth heaven (the Ogdoad) to meet his fellow spirits in the tenth heaven. The work obviously has a Jewish apocalyptic* base, but whereas in a Jewish apocalypse the seventh heaven, containing the throne of God, would be the highest heaven, this work engages in a typically Gnostic polemic against the Jewish God, represented as the demiurge, whose authority Paul escapes. It is also characteristic that Paul, the favorite apostle of many second-century Gnostics, surpasses the twelve apostles. Whether this work is the Gnostic Ascension of Paul to which Epiphanius refers (Haer. 38.2.5) seems doubtful, for the latter refers to only three heavens.

Very different is the Apocalypse of Paul which became the most popular of the extracanonical Christian apocalypses. Originally written in Greek, only a later redaction survives in Greek, but there are early versions in Latin, Syriac, Coptic, Armenian and Arabic. A whole series of Latin redactions, abbreviating, adapting and adding to the text, were made in the early Middle Ages, and one of these was a source for Dante's Divine Comedy. The continuing immense popularity of the work in the medieval period is shown by its translation into most of the European vernacular languages of the Middle Ages. There are various redactions also in other languages, such as Armenian. The Apocalypse of Paul is thus really the name for the whole collection of literature deriving from a Christian apocalyptic work of the patristic period. In addition, there are other influential later apocalypses, such as the Greek and Ethiopic Apocalypses of the Virgin, which were heavily indebted to the Apocalypse of Paul for their content. It would be hard to overestimate the influence which the Apocalypse of Paul has had on the picture of the afterlife, especially hell, in Christian imagination and art.

The earliest extant form of the work, represented by the long Latin version, has an introduction purporting to record the discovery of the work in a house in Tarsus in 388. This would seem to date it at the end of the fourth century. But there are reasons for supposing that the introduction was added to an earlier form of the Apocalypse. In any case, the work is certainly heavily indebted to older sources and apocalyptic traditions, some of Jewish origin, and is closely related to the early second-century Apocalypse of Peter, probably by way of a common source. The Apocalypse of Peter was the most popular account of the fate of the righteous and the wicked after death until the Apocalypse of Paul supplanted it.

The Apocalypse relates how Paul was taken up to heaven and shown the judgment and separation of souls after death, paradise and the heavenly Jerusalem, and hell, whose wide variety of types of punishment for various classes of sinners are described in detail. In response to the prayers of Paul and the archangel Michael, God grants the damned in hell a day's respite from their sufferings on Sunday of each week. Like other apocalypses of this type, the work is concerned both with the justice of hell, which is depicted in order to dissuade its readers from sin, and also with compassion for those condemned to an eternity of torment.

4. Prayer.

A short Prayer of the Apostle Paul (CG I,1) is written on the front flyleaf of Codex I of the Nag Hammadi Library. It is a Gnostic, most likely Valentinian, production. There are some Pauline echoes in a strongly Gnostic framework of thought.

See also PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. Bovon et al., Les Actes Apocryphes des Apôtres (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1981); E. Dassmann, Der Stachel im Fleisch: Paulus in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Irenäus (Münster: Aschendorff, 1979); S. L. Davies, The Revolt of the Widows: The Social World of the Apocryphal Acts (New York: Winston/Seabury, 1980); E. Hennecke, W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen (2 vols.; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989) 2.41-50, 193-243, 644-75; E. Hennecke, W. Schneemeicher, R. McL. Wilson, New Testament Apocrypha (2 vols.; London: Lutterworth, 1965) 2.91-93, 128-41, 322-90, 755-98; M. Himmelfarb, Tours of Hell: An Apocalyptic Form in Jewish and Christian Literature (Philadelphia: University of Philadelphia, 1983); C. Kappler, "L'Apocalypse latine de Paul," in Apocalypses et Voyages dans l'Au-delà, ed. C. Kappler (Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 1987) 237-66; D. R. MacDonald, The Legend and the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983); A. J. Malherbe, "A Physical Description of Paul," HTR 79 (1986) 170-75; W. Rordorf, "Nochmals Paulusakten und Pastoralbriefe," in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament: Essays in Honor of E. Earle Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 319-27; idem, "Tradition and Composition in the Acts of Thecla: The State of the Question," Semeia 38 (1986) 43-52 (this issue of Semeia also contains other relevant articles).

R. J. Bauckham

APOLLOS

Apollos was a trained rhetor, capable of demonstrating from the OT that the Messiah was Jesus. Nonetheless, we read very little about his contribution to the expansion of early Christianity. Quite the opposite; 1 and 2 Corinthians suggest that his training and ministry contributed to problems which necessitated Paul's correspondence.

1. Apollos at Ephesus
2. Apollos and the Divisions at Corinth
3. Summary

1. Apollos at Ephesus.

Although the NT provides little personal information about Apollos, the details that are provided are helpful. According to Acts 18:24-28, Apollos was a Jew from Alexandria. Luke introduces him in connection with Ephesus* and Paul's recent departure from that city. At Ephesus, Priscilla and Aquila heard Apollos speaking in the synagogue. Realizing that Apollos was already familiar with John's baptism, the couple informed him of "the way of God more accurately." The text indicates that they "received him into their house," that is, into the church* meeting in their house (cf. 1 Cor 16:19, written from Ephesus). Subsequently, Apollos ministered in Corinth.*

2. Apollos and the Divisions at Corinth.

Apollos's ministry at Corinth precipitated a number of problems which Paul attempts to resolve in 1 and 2 Corinthians. Recent reports (1 Cor 1:11; cf. 5:1; 11:18) and a letter (1 Cor 7:1) alerted Paul to the fact that the church was divided into four groups, defined by their allegiances to Paul, Apollos, Cephas or Christ (1 Cor 1:12). Paul attempted to defuse this hazardous situation by removing any possible claims of allegiance to himself. Apart from Crispus and Gaius, and the household of Stephanus, none can claim allegiance based on their baptism* at the hands of Paul.

2.1. Apollos and the Sophistic Tradition. Apparently, the most significant schism at Corinth was between those who identified themselves as Paul's and those who affirmed allegiance to Apollos. This is readily seen in 1 Corinthians 3:3-9; 4:6 (see Wallis, Hooker). A careful reading of the Acts 18 text and the Corinthian correspondence provides ample evidence for the nature of the polarity.

Luke provides three pieces of information which are instructive: (1) Apollos is an anēr logios ("an eloquent man"). (2) With respect to his exposition of the OT, he is dynatos ("powerful"). (3) As far as his ability to cite the OT to the synagogue community, he is a man who is epideiknys, "one who shows" that the Messiah is Jesus.

B. Winter (citing the earlier work of Orth) has demonstrated that the term anēr logios connoted rhetorical training and the ability to speak eloquently, or a sophist (see Rhetoric). C. K. Barrett also supports this definition of the term, arguing that it should be translated "an eloquent man" rather than, as others suggest, "learned"; though it is a fault of the ancient world that it often confused the two (Barrett, 22). Apollos was an eloquent man (so AV, NEB, RSV, NRSV) and this term suggests that he is deliberately introduced as a sophist, a virtuoso rhetor. Like logos, dynatos and epideiknymi also connote rhetorical ability (Winter, 15-19 and 160-61) and certainly rhetorical training. All three terms are indicative of the sophistic modus operandi.

The identification of Apollos as "a native of Alexandria" (Acts 18:24) is significant since the sophistic movement thrived in Alexandria during this period (Winter cites, e.g., P. Oxy 2190, Philonic corpus and The Alexandrian Oration [OR. 32] by Dio of Prusa—Vespasian's emmisary to Alexandria).

2.2. Paul at Corinth: Conflict with the Sophists. Apollos's eloquence and sophistic presence in Corinth were undoubtedly contrasted with Paul's unimpressive delivery. In 2 Corinthians 10:10 Paul quotes some at Corinth who condemn Paul for his contemptible speech or unwillingness to speak eloquently. Turning to Paul's word's in 1 Corinthians 1—4, we observe that the real contention between Paul and Apollos was evidently the matter of the ability or willingness of Paul to use eloquence in proclaiming the gospel.* Paul claims that his coming to Corinth was not characterized by sophia logou ("wisdom of speech," 1 Cor 1:17). A number of commentators have taken en sophia logou as a reference to a formal characteristic of skillful speech (which Paul may be taking up as a Corinthian slogan). Paul reiterates that he did not come in such a way as to distinguish himself in eloquence or wisdom (1 Cor 2:1; cf. 1:17). What is primarily at stake is Paul's speaking. Paul is adamant in restating in 1 Corinthians 2:4 that his speech and proclamation were not with eloquence and rhetorical skill.

In these passages logos is seen in a negative light and is associated with rhetorical eloquence. For Paul, a dedication to wise speech may detract from the theology of the cross* and its redemptive power, so that it becomes of no effect. Similarly, sophia is condemned as "of the world*" (1 Cor 1:29; cf. 3:19), merely "human" (vs. divine, 1 Cor 2:5; cf. 2:13 and the variant readings for 1 Cor 2:4 where the same thrust was made), and "of this age" and the "rulers of this age" (1 Cor 2:6; see Principalities and Powers). In contrast to these negative comments, Paul juxtaposes his own understanding of logos/sophia. According to Paul, logos and gnōsis ("knowledge"*) are given by God (1 Cor 1:5). Later, he would affirm that logos sophias ("words of wisdom*") and logos gnōseōs ("words of knowledge") are to be attributed to the Spirit (1 Cor 12:8; cf. 2:13). In this respect, we have two opposing definitions: that of Paul and that of certain Corinthians (see Pogoloff).

2.3. The Sophists at Corinth: Additional Evidence. In addition to the extant non-Christian literature from this period, three additional factors suggest that Corinth was frequented by the sophists who influenced the Christian communities. Paul (unlike the sophists—perhaps Apollos?) came bearing no promise of material benefaction; rather he worked with his hands (see Tentmaker). While Paul defends in principle the apostolic right of financial* support (1 Cor 9:7-14), he refuses to accept support from the Corinthians. According to Paul, by accepting this support he would impede the gospel (2 Cor 11:7-15; 12:13-18). As Paul states, he would not "retail" (kapēleuō) God's word (2 Cor 2:17). This term (from kapēlos, "retailer"), was frequently used to derogate sophists who charged fees for their spiritual or intellectual wares.

Second, Paul showed no concern for luxury and bodily appearance—he was self-disciplined (1 Cor 9:24-27). In contrast, the Corinthians' attitude toward Paul (2 Cor 10:10) was that in addition to his inability (or unwillingness) to speak eloquently, he had a weak physical presence (see Weakness). The sophists (in Alexandria) report of themselves the opposite. According to Philo, the sophists declared themselves to be > men of mark and wealth, holding leading positions, praised on all hands, recipients of honors, portly, healthy, robust, reveling in luxurious and riotous living, knowing nothing of labor, conversant with pleasures which carry the sweets of life to the all-welcoming soul by every channel of sense. (Philo Det. Pot. Ins. 34B)

Third, Paul refused to align himself with any particular group or patron—he baptized no one (with exceptions!). While Paul is dependent upon the benefaction of wealthy home owners (even at Corinth, Acts 18:1-11; cf. 1 Cor 16:19), since the house church was the primary place for Christian gathering, he refuses to be "attached" to a householder. The sophistic modus operandi, on the other hand, suggests a predilection for attachment to the great houses at Corinth (Blue).

3. Summary.

Whether Apollos knew of the Corinthians' proclivity to attach themselves to eloquent teachers is difficult to determine. Moreover, it is impossible to establish the degree to which Apollos adopted the sophist modus operandi. Nevertheless, his presence at Corinth (before he met Paul) certainly did not help the already sensitive relationship between Paul and certain Corinthian believers. Perhaps N. Hyldahl is correct when he observes that it is no accident that we do not hear of Apollos in any of Paul's other letters. After the exchange of letters between Paul and the Corinthians, and Paul's deliberate distancing of himself from the sophists, Apollos's influence in the Pauline churches evidently waned.

See also CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; PHILOSOPHY; RHETORIC; WEAKNESS; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, Essays on Paul (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982) 1-27; B. B. Blue, In Public and in Private: The Role of the House Church in Early Christianity (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Aberdeen University, 1989); F. F. Bruce, Peter, Stephen, James & John: Studies in Early Non-Pauline Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980) 65-85; E. S. Fiorenza, "Rhetorical Situation and Historical Reconstruction in 1 Corinthians," NTS 33 (1987) 386-403; M. D. Hooker, " 'Beyond the Things Which Are Written': An Examination of 1 Cor 4.6," NTS 10 (1963-64) 127-32; N. Hyldahl, "Den korintiske situation—en skitse," DTT 40 (1977) 18-30; E. A. Judge, "The Early Christians as a Scholastic Community," JRH 1 (1960) 4-15; 125-137; idem, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century: Some Prolegomena to the Study of the New Testament Ideas of Social Obligation (London: Tyndale, 1960); B. Kerferd, The Sophistic Movement (Cambridge: University Press, 1981); A. D. Litfin, St. Paul's Theology of Proclamation: An Investigation of 1 Corinthians 1—4 in Light of Greco-Roman Rhetoric (unpublished D. Phil. dissertation, Oxford University, 1983); E. Orth, Logios (Leipzig: Obert Noske Universitatsverlag, 1926); S. M. Pogoloff, Logos and Sophia: The Rhetorical Situation of 1 Corinthians (SBLDS 134; Atlanta: Scholars, 1992); W. C. van Unnik, "First Century A.D. Literary Culture and Early Christian Literature," NedTTs 25 (1971) 28-43; P. Wallis, "Ein neuer Auslegungsversuch des Stelle 1 Kor 4, 6," TLZ 75 (1950) 506-8; A. J. M. Wedderburn, "ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ—1 Kor 1:21," ZNW 64 (1973) 132-134; L. L. Welborn, "On the Discord in Corinth: 1 Corinthians 1—4 and Ancient Politics," JBL 106 (1987) 85-111; B. W. Winter, Philo and Paul among the Sophists: A Hellenistic Jewish and a Christian Response (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Macquarie University, 1988).

B. B. Blue

APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE

Is the perseverance of Christians in faith* and in the grace* of salvation* certain, or might they fall away, be cut off from the benefits of Christ* and come short of final salvation? Paul's response to these questions is disputed.

1. Terminology
2. Continuity in Salvation and the Eschatological

Tension
3. The Significance of Ethical Failure and Unbelief for Continuity in Salvation
4. The Pastoral Letters

1. Terminology.
In theological debate the terms "perseverance (of the saints)," "falling away" and "apostasy" are used in discussing the question of whether it is certain a Christian will remain in faith and salvation. Where Paul's teaching touches this issue we find the similar expressions "steadfast endurance" (in hope, good work; hypomonē [tēs elpidos, ergou agathou], e.g., Col 1:11; 1 Thess 1:3; 2 Thess 1:4; Rom 2:7; 8:25), "remain in faith" (epimenō tē pistei, Col 1:23), "remain in [God's] kindness" (epimenō tē chrēstotēti, Rom 11:22) and, on the other hand, "fall [from grace]" ([ek]piptō [tēs charitos], Rom 11:11; 1 Cor 10:12; Gal 5:4). The "apostasy" (apostasia) in 2 Thessalonians 2:3 refers to a future, widespread rebellion against God's rule through intensified ungodliness apparently prompted by the revelation of "the lawless one"; that is, the "apostasy" is one of the extraordinary phenomena which will precede the Parousia. It is not clear whether Paul has in mind a Jewish rebellion against God, as in traditional apocalyptic understanding (e.g., Jub. 23:14-23), or that of Christians as well (see Man of Lawlessness). In any case, Paul does not use the term to refer specifically to Christian apostasy, or complete abandonment of faith in Christ, during the church age (Marshall 1975, 108).

2. Continuity in Salvation and the Eschatological Tension.

2.1. Continuity in Salvation. Paul can describe the individual's salvation* as already begun but not yet complete. Is it then certain to be completed? The question becomes acute in the face of obstacles posed by evil forces now at work against God's purposes, by persecution and temptation which threaten to break continuity in salvation, and by the prospect of the last judgment.*

The question of the certainty of believers' final salvation depends in part on whether salvation is wholly God's work or whether human beings also contribute to it. For Paul, salvation is by divine grace* alone, and thus is God's work alone. Christians have no contribution to make to salvation such that their failure to do so would jeopardize the final outcome. The command "Work out your salvation with 'fear* and trembling' " (Phil 2:12) refers to the active role of believers in sanctification based on the fact that ("for," gar) "God is the one who is working in you both the willing and the working" (Phil 2:13). This utter dependence on God inspires humility and obedience ("fear and trembling"; see Holiness, Sanctification).

Further, God has purposed to bring believers' salvation to completion. God "predestined [them] to be conformed to the image* of his Son" (Rom 8:29), "chose [them] from the beginning for salvation, . . . called [them] . . . so that [they] may obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess 2:13-14), and "destined [them] not for wrath but for obtaining salvation" (1 Thess 5:9). Paul portrays the divine initiatives in Christians' salvation as a "golden chain" in which each link implies the preceding and bears a promise of the one to follow, the final link being glorification* (Rom 8:29-30). Paul is certain that God's intention will be realized: "the one who began a good work [of salvation] in you will finish [it] until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil 1:6).

Since Paul traces true Christian faith to the eternal election* of God, not to arbitrary human history or human will, he can express certainty that this faith will reach its final goal (differently, Marshall 1975, 100-103). He sees another guarantee of believers' final salvation in the gift of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). This Spirit is the "Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph 1:13), the "Spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead" (Rom 8:11), the "Spirit of life" (Rom 8:2). Paul can describe this divine power* of new, eschatological life* and hope* indwelling Christians (cf. Rom 5:5; Tit 3:5) with the metaphors of the "first fruits"* (Rom 8:23), "deposit [of our inheritance]" (Eph 1:14; 2 Cor 1:22; 5:5) and "sealing" (Eph 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor 1:22). Because of the integral connection between the first fruits and the whole, the gift of the first fruits of salvation can function as a promise that the fullness of salvation will follow. As the deposit obligates the giver to full payment, the Spirit guarantees that God will fully redeem Christians, who are God's possession. Paul plays on the ancient function of the seal when he says that Christians are "sealed with the Holy Spirit [for the day of redemption]," which signifies that they belong to God and come under God's protective care with a view to their final salvation.

These assurances of final salvation are sometimes said to pertain to the church as a whole and not to the individual; in this case the assurances would not rule out the possibility of loss of salvation by some. On the other hand, it is the individual who benefits from God's saving work—by being called to faith, justified,* indwelt by the Spirit, and eventually glorified—and who is thus apparently the one meant to draw assurance from these divine actions. Paul's bold formulation in Romans 8:29-30 suggests that God's saving work will continue unto completion in all those in whom it has begun.

2.2. Continuity and the Eschatological Tension. Even when discussing the real and grave threats to continuity in salvation posed by present afflictions* or trials and the last judgment, Paul expresses certainty of Christians' final salvation. His confidence even reaches a mighty crescendo in his acclamations of God's* faithfulness: "God is faithful!" and "will strengthen you and keep you from the evil (one)" (2 Thess 3:3); God "will not allow you to be tested beyond what you are able [to endure] but will provide ... the way out that you may be able to endure" (1 Cor 10:13), and "will confirm you until the end blameless at the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1:8-9). Paul prays that God may "sanctify you entirely; and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved complete, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess 5:23-24).

Further, Paul compellingly portrays the completion of believers' salvation as certain, despite great hindrances, by arguing from the omnipotent love* of God: "God demonstrated his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom 5:8). With the obstacle of our own estrangement from God overcome, what can prevent God from finishing our salvation? "Since, therefore, we are now justified by his blood, much more shall we be saved through him from the [eschatological] wrath.* For if while we were enemies* we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, since we are [now] reconciled, shall we be saved by his life" (Rom 5:9-10). God's love, seen in the fact that God "did not spare his own Son but gave him up for us all" is the proof that God "will graciously give (charisetai) us all things with him" (Rom 8:32). God's powerful love guarantees that nothing can stand in the way of God's free gift of salvation through Christ in its fullness. Thus "who shall separate us from the love of Christ," which is the power of our salvation? Nothing can! Neither earthly nor superhuman powers (which Paul names in comprehensive lists; see Principalities and Powers), "nor any other created thing." "Rather, through the one who loved us we more than conquer in all these things" (Rom 8:35-39).

This victory of remaining in the love of God, and thus in salvation, a victory attributed to the loving God, extends also to the judgment day when all will meet their final destiny (see Eschatology). On that day the elect will not be convicted as guilty and condemned. For the Christ who loved them and died for them is the same one who was raised and now sits at the right hand of God and makes intercession* for them before the Judge who has already justified them on the basis of Christ's work (Rom 8:33-34). The love of a vindicated and exalted intercessor is surely a supreme guarantee of a positive outcome of judgment for the justified. Paul sums it up: "if God [is] for us, who [is] against us?" (Rom 8:31). That is to say, no challenge to believers' final salvation can be successfully mounted because the omnipotent, loving God has taken their part. The same love of God which guarantees final salvation "has been poured out in our hearts through the Holy Spirit," so that believers now subject to affliction are enabled to have "hope* that does not disappoint" in the eschatological test (Rom 5:5).

Present tribulation and trials do not make Christian hope less sure according to Paul. He even turns them into a positive component in God's plan of realizing salvation. Through God's direction "all things"—Paul means adversities in particular—"work together for good," the supreme good of eschatological salvation (Rom 8:28). Further, Christian suffering* manifests unity with Christ, who suffered and was glorified, and whom Christians will thus also follow in glory* (Rom 8:17). Paradoxically, therefore, believers can "boast"* in afflictions too (Rom 5:3; 2 Cor 12:1-10) because of their positive eschatological significance for the afflicted.

3. The Significance of Ethical Failure and Unbelief for Continuity in Salvation.

God will continue to intervene for the purpose of completing believers' salvation, according to Paul. Nevertheless, it is claimed, believers themselves can block the fulfillment of God's purpose by their misdeeds or unbelief; perseverance is in some degree up to Christians themselves. What, we must then ask, is the relationship between believers' faith and conduct, and God's saving action toward them?

3.1. Ethical Failure and Falling Away. Numerous passages in Paul have suggested to interpreters the possibility of loss of salvation for ethical failure (the problem of "postbaptismal sin" or "postconversion sin"). In 1 Corinthians 8 and Romans 14 Paul says the "weak" are "destroyed" if they eat certain foods, which their conscience* prohibits as foods that are "unclean" or "sacrificed to idols" (see Strong and Weak). "Destruction" could be eschatological here (see Marshall 1975, 113; see Wrath, Destruction). On the other hand, a weaker meaning is suggested both by the nature of the sin (not idolatry [contrast Sanders 1983, 110-11], but violation of conscience) and by the contrastive concern for mutual edification in both contexts (Rom 14:19; 15:2; 1 Cor 8:1; cf. 10:23). The "destruction" could therefore be existential, and consist in a setback in the Christian walk, as supported by the parallel descriptions of the consequences suffered by the weak Christian (sorrow, Rom 14:15; self-condemnation, 14:23; defilement and wounding of the conscience, 1 Cor 8:7, 12) and parallel uses of Paul's terminology in the LXX (e.g., Sir 30:23; 20:21-22).

In 1 Corinthians 11:27-34 Paul criticizes the Corinthians' practice of the Lord's Supper* as a "com[ing] together which results in judgment," and declares that those who partake inappropriately "will be guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord" and "eat and drink judgment to themselves" (1 Cor 11:27). The judgment has already struck: some Corinthians are ill and have died (1 Cor 11:30). This judgment may prefigure their eschatological judgment. Nevertheless, the phrase "will be (estai) guilty" probably has the future tense simply for the sake of emphasis, to stress guilt already incurred (see Gundry-Volf, 101). And, instead of aligning present and future judgments, Paul seems to juxtapose them explicitly: "when we are judged by the Lord, we are chastised so that we might not be condemned with the world" (1 Cor 11:32). Since it is unlikely that Paul presupposes that repentance forestalls future condemnation—some of the guilty have already died—he must take present judgment and future salvation as two sides of the same coin. Chastisement itself can imply exemption from final condemnation because, as in the OT-Jewish tradition of divine paideia ("chastisement," "education"), God's parental chastisement of God's children marks them out as being true children (Deut 8:5; Wis 11:10; also Heb 12:8), who are headed for salvation on the basis of God's faithfulness to the covenants* and promises (see Gundry-Volf, 107-11).

According to 1 Corinthians 5:5 a member of the Corinthian church who is engaged in flagrant sexual misconduct should be "deliver[ed] . . . to Satan,* with the result of the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved at the day of the Lord." Cast out of the church (cf. 1 Cor 5:2), the man might repent under Satan's* destructive influence and thus finally be saved (see Collins, Harris; see Discipline). Though his future salvation is not a foregone conclusion, loss of salvation is not a possibility here. For Paul goes on to indicate that a fornicator in the church is a "so-called brother" (1 Cor 5:11)—that is, one who has not yet converted—and Paul reminds the readers that believers cannot have Christian fellowship* with fornicators (1 Cor 5:9) but must "judge" the falsely professing one and "take the fornicator out" of the community (1 Cor 5:12-13; cf. 5:7-8).

The warning in 1 Corinthians 10:12, "So if you think you are standing, watch out that you do not fall!," seems to suggest the possibility of forfeiting salvation (Sanders 1977, 455), but it may actually have in view false profession of faith in Christ. Some Corinthians mistakenly think that, protected by the Christian sacraments, they can safely participate in idolatrous practices (1 Cor 10:14-22). The wilderness generation, however, illustrates that the mere outward benefit of baptism* and eucharistic food does not protect against divine judgment for idolatry* (1 Cor 10:1-11). Therefore, "If you think you are standing" (i.e., are saved) you must make sure that you really are (i.e., have fellowship* with Christ and not with demons, 1 Cor 10:16-21), if you are not to "fall" (i.e., fail to pass the test of judgment). And God will enable those who take the warning seriously to pass the test (1 Cor 10:13).

In 1 Corinthians 6:9-10 and Galatians 5:19-21 Paul writes that evildoers will not inherit the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God/Christ). Most interpreters think Paul is warning his readers against their own exclusion. On the other hand, in 1 Corinthians 6:1-11 Paul repeatedly contrasts the Corinthians ("the saints") with the people named in the vice list ("the world, the unrighteous"): "and such were some of you, but you were washed, . . . sanctified, . . . justified," and "the saints will judge the world [and] . . . angels." Paul probably wants to reinforce such distinctions in order to motivate the Corinthians to reform their behavior so it will conform to their final destiny (though 1 Cor 6:9-10 may have a secondary, warning character for falsely professing Christians; cf. 2 Cor 12:21; 13:2). In the Galatians' case no warning is called for: they are the ones who oppose the works of the flesh,* and Paul, preacher of the Law*-free gospel, must assure them that he does too, and that one need not embrace the Law to be against the works of the flesh (cf. Gal 5:16-24). Paul is thus apparently speaking in self-defense when he tells the Galatians that those whose lives are characterized by the vices will not inherit the kingdom.

Some texts seem to reveal Paul's apprehension that his own conduct will in some way disqualify him from final salvation. Yet Paul can express confidence of his final salvation (Phil 1:21, 23). It is God's approval of his apostolic service that he does not take for granted. "Lest . . . I might become disqualified [adokimos]" at 1 Corinthians 9:27 probably refers to Paul the apostle* instead of Paul the Christian (cf. 1 Cor 3:13-15). For when Paul uses the language of testing (dok-) of himself, it always has to do with divine approval of his apostolic service. Paul seeks to avoid divine disapproval as an apostle* by subduing his body through the giving up of his rights (to food and drink, pay, a wife).

He does this so as not to "put up an obstacle in the way of the gospel* of Christ" (1 Cor 9:12) but to "become the gospel's partner" in the work of salvation (1 Cor 9:23). This translation of 1 Corinthians 9:23 is preferable to the common rendering, "become a sharer of the gospel['s blessings]," which violates usage of euangelion.

Paul sounds uncertain about his final destiny in Philippians 3:11-12, where he writes "if somehow I may attain the resurrection* from the dead" and "I pursue if also I might obtain." It has been suggested that any uncertainty Paul expresses here pertains to the manner and not the fact of arriving at his final destiny: by martyrdom? Alternatively, Paul's further assertion, "I have been apprehended by Christ," takes the uncertainty out of his obtaining and makes it simply future, as well as suggests its dependence on divine action. Similarly, Paul's hope of attaining to the resurrection can be seen as an expectation expressing dependence on God's action and not as raising doubt about its fulfillment, as Paul's other uses of the expression ei pōs, here translated "if somehow," show (Rom 1:10; 11:14).

In summary, traditionally some Pauline texts have been seen to show the possibility of forfeiting salvation through unethical behavior (see Sanders 1977, 517-18; Sanders 1983, 109-11). But a rereading of these texts suggests that for Paul unethical behavior may call into question the genuineness of one's profession of faith, it may provoke divine chastisement, or it may cause regression in Christian sanctification, but it does not result in actual loss of salvation (see Gundry-Volf, 83-157, 231-60; cf. Gundry, 7-38).

3.2. Unbelief and Falling Away. Other Pauline passages suggest that salvation could remain incomplete because of unbelief in the gospel (Marshall 1975, 108-11, 118-19).

Israel's* "no" to the gospel, despite its election, challenges the significance Paul has attributed to election for the perseverance of believers. But in Romans 9—11, where Paul deals with the matter of unbelieving Israel, he defends the faithfulness of God and explains Israel's present unbelief in terms of God's design for salvation. It includes a "hardening" of part of Israel and a time when finally "all Israel will be saved," when Israel turns from unbelief and the Redeemer removes Israel's ungodliness (Rom 11:23, 26-27; see Restoration of Israel).

Just as the certain completion of God's saving work for the elect does not rule out the temporary exclusion of Israel in unbelief, so also it does not rule out the "cutting off" and not "sparing" of Gentile Christians who do not continue in faith (Rom 11:17- 24). Participation in the benefits of salvation is dependent on faith* in Christ; faith is the only way one can "remain in the kindness," or saving mercy,* of God in Christ. Paul does not concern himself here with the final fate of Gentiles who might be cut off, but he has shown with the example of Israel that regrafting is possible (see Olive Tree).

A clearer statement of the consequences of abandoning faith in the gospel is found in Galatians 5:2-4. If the Galatians embrace the false gospel of justification by works* of the Law, Paul warns, "Christ will not benefit you at all. . . . You are severed from Christ, . . . you have fallen away from grace." In other words, the Galatians would cut themselves off from the hope of salvation. On the other hand, Paul cannot imagine this actually taking place: "have you experienced such great things in vain, if [at all one] really [can experience such great gifts] in vain?" (Gal 3:4). Unless this cryptic verse is a threat that it was all in vain, Paul here thinks of their losing salvation as an impossible possibility. And in the final analysis he is "confident in the Lord" (Gal 5:10) that the Galatians will not make the decisive break with the gospel (and lose salvation). This expression of confidence does not make the danger less real or the warning less urgent, but it finds the way out in the faithfulness of the Lord, through whose intervention Paul anticipates his admonitions achieving their desired result.

If Paul's converts do not stand at the day of Christ, he will have "labored or run in vain" (1 Thess 3:5; Gal 2:2; 4:11; Phil 2:16; see Futility). If some fail the final test, they will either have fallen from a state of grace, or prove that they were not true converts in the first place. Paul's letters show that he could have thought in terms of the latter possibility. He recognizes that his communities include both the genuine and the false (see, e.g., 1 Cor 5:5-13). Paul cannot be sure of the genuineness of the success of his apostolic efforts in the same way that he is confident of the effects of the gospel, the power of God for salvation (cf. Rom 1:16; 15:18; 1 Thess 1:5; 2:13; 2 Cor 4:7; 1 Cor 3:6; 2:4-5; 15:10). Only those who share in the eschatological life imparted through the gospel will withstand the judgment.

The Corinthians may "receive the grace of God in vain" (2 Cor 6:1) and "fail the test" of faith (2 Cor 13:5). For if they continue to contest Paul's apostleship, they imply that their own conversion and salvation through Paul's preaching was a sham. Paul clearly expects his suggestion that they are not saved to evoke their protest, a confirmation of their own faith, and (indirectly) a confirmation of himself. Similarly, Paul suggests that the Corinthians may have "believed in vain" (1 Cor 15:1) in order to shock them with the unsavory implication of the false teaching some had accepted, that "there is no resurrection of the dead" (1 Cor 15:12). Since a message that excludes the physical resurrection of the dead (based on the presumption that resurrection had already occurred in a different sense) cannot truly save anyone who believes in it, such "faith is vain" (1 Cor 15:17-18). Though these verses are often taken to imply the possibility of salvation being lost, their contexts suggest otherwise.

The perseverance which Paul affirms, therefore, can only be "in faith." Only the one who believes in Christ can know assurance of final salvation (Col 1:22-23). Perseverance is not automatic. Estrangement from the gospel through unbelief can break the continuity in salvation and bring its completion into question—or call the genuineness of a person's conversion itself into question. Nevertheless Paul can view the threat of unbelief from the ultimate perspective of his confidence in God, the gracious and faithful giver and finisher of salvation. This perspective enables Paul to hold onto perseverance in this non-automatic sense, always dependent on divine intervention.

4. The Pastoral Letters.

The Pastorals* use the term "endure" (hypomenō, 1 Tim 2:12) to express the idea of perseverance in faith. Contrasting expressions are "desert," "wander away from," "deny the faith" (aphistēmi, apoplanaō apo tēs pisteōs, arneomai tēn pistin, 1 Tim 4:1; 6:10; 5:8).

As regards the problem of abandoning the faith, the Pastorals anticipate such behavior "in later times" (1 Tim 4:1; cf. 2 Tim 4:3-4). But they already know of false teachers who have "missed the mark with regard to the truth/faith" and who "upset the faith" of some in the church (2 Tim 2:18; 1 Tim 6:21). Some "will depart from the faith" (1 Tim 4:1) and "will turn away from hearing the truth" (2 Tim 4:4). Departure from the faith comes from accepting "teachings of demons*" (1 Tim 4:1, referring to the demonic origin of the false teachings) characterized by asceticism, disputes about the Law and speculation (1 Tim 4:3; 1:4, 6-7; Tit 1:10; 3:9), and a denial of the future resurrection (2 Tim 2:18). The love of money and other vices can also accompany such turning away from the faith (1 Tim 6:10; 2 Tim 3:2-5). Exclusion from salvation is implied.

By contrast, Timothy and Titus should resist false teaching and hold fast the true gospel (e.g., 1 Tim 1:3; Tit 1:9, 11), even as Paul has done under pressure of persecution so that he can express confidence in his final salvation (2 Tim 1:12; 4:7-8, 18). Perseverance in the Pastorals, therefore, as elsewhere in Paul, is only by continuance in the true gospel, "in the faith" (as defined in the Pastorals). It is also the case that the Pastorals make the same connection between the present benefits of salvation and its consummation (2 Tim 2:10-11; cf. 2:19) as seen previously in Paul, while they emphasize the significance of human endurance for believers' remaining in salvation (e.g., 2 Tim 2:10, 12). Further, the Pastorals even echo Paul's acclamation of God's faithfulness (in the "faithful saying," 2 Tim 2:11-13) for Christians in danger of "denying Christ" and becoming "faithless" (a temporary state?), while they warn in the same breath against such denial.

The Pastorals indicate that departure from the faith is thus clearly a possible ground for exclusion from salvation. Nevertheless the Pastorals can explain abandonment of faith through the notion of false profession, and not explicitly as falling from a state of grace. Those teachers who "hold the form of religion but deny its power" are not to be accepted as true Christians but are "disqualified [adokimoi] with regard to the faith" (2 Tim 3:5, 8). Likewise, failure to respond to admonition betrays one's true perverted and sinful self (Tit 3:10-11). Such opponents of true teaching still need "repentance so that they may come to know the truth" (2 Tim 2:25), that is, they need to convert.

Paul's delivering Hymenaeus and Alexander to Satan "that they may be taught not to blaspheme" (1 Tim 1:20) suggests treating them as non-Christians in the hope of their conversion (cf. 1 Cor 5:5; 1 Tim 1:13). "They made shipwreck with regard to the faith" (1 Tim 1:19) probably refers not to their personal faith but to faith as such in the gospel, to which they have caused damage. Only genuine Christians belong in the church. As a matter of fact, however, the church includes both those whom "the Lord knows . . . are his" and the others, as in a "big house" which has both "vessels of gold and silver . . . for honor[able use]" and "[vessels] of wood and earthenware . . . for dishonor[able use]" (2 Tim 2:19-20; cf. Rom 9:19-26). One demonstrates that one falls into the former category by "depart[ing] from iniquity" and "cleans[ing] oneself from these" other vessels (2 Tim 2:19, 21). The mixed nature of the community presently (not necessarily all will attain final salvation, for some will go astray) need not cast doubt on the final salvation of genuine believers. With respect to that, according to 2 Timothy 2:19, there is a "firm foundation of God [which] stands." On it are inscribed the words "God knows those who are his." This affirmation grounds the eschatological triumph* of true believers in divine faithfulness.

Nevertheless the possibility that the Pastorals also have in view the apostasy of genuine Christians through abandonment of faith cannot be excluded (cf. Marshall 1975, 128-31). This possibility, however, is also present to a small degree in the undisputed Pauline letters. In light of the preceding comments, therefore, the Pastorals, while they reflect their own specific historical situation, still seem compatible with Paul's thought on perseverance and falling away.

See also AFFLICTIONS, TRIALS, HARDSHIPS; CALL, CALLING; DISCIPLINE; ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION; ESCHATOLOGY; FAITH; GRACE; HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION; JUDGMENT; SALVATION; SIN, GUILT; UNIVERSALISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Y. Collins, "The Function of Excommunication in Paul," HTR 73 (1980) 251-63; M. Goguel, "Les fondements de l'assurance du salut chez l'apôtre Paul," RHPR 17 (1938) 105-44; R. H. Gundry, "Grace, Works, and Staying Saved in Paul," Bib 66 (1985) 1-38; J. M. Gundry Volf, Paul and Perseverance: Staying in and Falling Away (WUNT 2/37; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990; Louisville: John Knox/Westminster, 1991); G. Harris, "The Beginnings of Church Discipline: 1 Corinthians 5," NTS 37 (1991) 1-21; O. Hofius, "Die Unabänderlichkeit des göttlichen Heilsratschlusses: Erwägungen zur Herkunft eines neutestamentlichen Theologumenon," ZNW 64 (1973) 135-45; idem, "Hoffnung und Gewissheit: Römer 8, 19-39," Mitarbeiterhilfe 31 (1976) 3-10; I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God: A Study of Perseverance and Falling Away (Minneapolis: Bethany, 1975); idem, "The Problem of Apostasy in New Testament Theology," in Jesus the Saviour: Studies in New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1990); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983).

J. M. Gundry-Volf

APOSTLE

The office of apostle, by which Paul pointedly referred to himself, is of singular importance in the appreciation of his life and ministry. There has been considerable debate over the social origins of the word apostle and more significantly over the criteria for apostleship and the nature of the authority* which Paul claimed over the Gentile* churches, which others questioned or rejected. The authority of Paul for modern churches and Christians is connected with these issues.

1. Greek Origin of the Word Apostle
2. The Quest for the Origin of the Concept of Apostle
3. The Evidence from Paul's Letters
4. Jesus the Apostle and His Apostles
5. Apostles in Paul's Letters
6. Paul's Apostleship Disputed
7. Conclusion

1. Greek Origin of the Word Apostle

The word apostolos ("apostle") was used only infrequently in the Greek language prior to NT times (see Rengstorf, 407-8). In classical Greek its use is more or less confined to seafaring contexts. Herodotus uses it twice for "messenger," while the LXX has it only once with the same meaning. With the word occurring thirty-five times in the Pauline corpus and eighty times in the NT, it is evident that apostolos must have been very important within the early Christian movement. How then can we account for the rise of this word within the NT and by Paul in particular?

2. The Quest for the Origin of the Concept of Apostle.

Modern study of apostle began with J. B. Lightfoot's essay, "The Name and Office of Apostle" (published as an excursus to his commentary on Galatians in 1890; for a useful survey of the flood of literature which has appeared since see Agnew).

Despite wide-ranging opinions of the origin, character and significance of apostolos within the NT, there is broad agreement that apostolos is used in two main senses—solemn, in the sense of bearing divine authority (e.g., "apostle of Christ Jesus," 1 Cor 1:1), and nontechnical (e.g., "messengers from the churches," 2 Cor 8:23). As we shall see, Paul uses apostolos with these two meanings.

There have been three main views of the origin of the concept of an apostle.

2.1. The Šāliaḥ of Rabbinic Judaism. First noticed by Lightfoot but developed by Rengstorf, this theory draws attention to parallels to the NT apostle in the šālîaḥ, "sent one," found in late rabbinic literature. The šālîaḥ was a surrogate commissioned and sent either by a private individual—for example, to negotiate a marriage (m. Qidd. 2:1; t. Qidd. 4:2; t. Yebam. 4:4)—or as an agent representing the religious authorities in Jerusalem to Jews of the Diaspora (y. Ḥag. 76d). Legally speaking, "The-one-whom-a-person-sends (šālîaḥ) is like the sender" (m. Ber. 5:5). The šālîaḥ's relationship with the sender is primary, the content of the commission secondary.

Since the literature containing šālîaḥ postdates the NT, it has been difficult to establish what relationship may have existed between the šālîaḥ of late Judaism and the NT apostolos. Those who link apostolos with šālîaḥ point to the probability that šālîaḥ predates the literature in which it occurs and also to the frequency of the verbal root šlḥ in the OT (about 700 times, appearing in LXX as apostellein or ex-apostellein. It is noted that apostolos occurs only once in the LXX, translating the participle šālûaḥ in 1 Kings 14:6). Overarching unity of concept is seen in the predominantly secular character of the references of both the OT texts and the rabbinic texts. It seems likely that Paul's nontechnical use of apostolos referred to below is to be traced to the šālîaḥ concept.

A prime example of a text illustrating the conceptual linkage of NT apostolos with šālîaḥ is John 13:16, "Amen, amen I say to you . . . a messenger (apostolos) [is not] greater than the one who sends (tou pempsantos) him" (see also Mk 6:30; Lk 11:49), and recalls the aphorism, "The-one-whom-a-person-sends is like the sender."

2.2. The Apostolos of Gnosticism. W. Schmithals, the chief proponent of the Gnostic (see Gnosis, Gnosticism) background for apostolos, has forcefully declared that ". . . the late Jewish legal institution of the shaliah has not even the least to do with the primitive Christian apostolate" (Schmithals, 105). Schmithals points to the religious use of apostolos in the NT in contrast with the uniformly juridical character of šālîaḥ in the rabbinical literature. Likewise, the predominantly nonreligious use of šlḥ in the OT is seen to be an improbable source for the NT apostle, who as a missionary and eschatological figure is religious in character.

Schmithals proposes that Antioch,* not Jerusalem,* is the source of the apostle concept and that the NT apostle derives from the redeemer myth of the gnostic systems. Schmithals points to two types of redeemers, heavenly and earthly, arguing that the apostles' call and ecstatic experience (receipt of gnōsis) and their worldwide mission identifies them as earthly redeemers. He argues that the NT apostle arose with Paul in the gnostic milieu of Syria.

Schmithals's thesis has received little support. Almost nothing is known about the religious milieu of Syria of the time. He must reconstruct his earthly redeemer figure from Paul's writings. The word apostolos, while used of a heavenly redeemer in Gnostic texts, which in any case postdate the NT, is not used of an earthly redeemer.

2.3. The* Apostoloi *of the NT. J. Munck and A. Ehrhardt reject the šālîaḥ concept for reasons that resemble those of Schmithals mentioned above. This viewpoint argues for the Christian origin of the apostle on the basis that the new faith stimulated the rise of an appropriate leadership figure. According to Munck, "The Christian Apostles are part of something entirely new and dynamic in that the whole Christian religion is something to be spread abroad. . . . Compared with this, the Jewish use of the apostolic idea . . . is as far removed from the Christian usage as a diplomatic envoy is from a missionary to the heathen" (Munck 1949, 100).

Generally speaking, however, this school of thought offers no specific scenario for the emergence of the apostle in the primitive church.

2.4. The Character of Paul's Apostleship. One of the major questions relating to Paul's apostleship is its character and authority. The traditional view that Christ's* call (see Conversion and Call of Paul) on the road to Damascus conferred on Paul the Lord's authority over the Gentile churches, which carries over into the canonical status of his letters for churches today, has been challenged by broader definitions of apostleship. In effect these redefinitions make Paul's apostolic authority in the churches relative and conditional. R. Schnackenburg, for example, argues that Paul found no uniform definition of apostle when he became a Christian and provided no systematic criteria for apostleship, regarding apostles only as "preachers and missionaries of Christ" (Schnackenburg, 302). J. A. Kirk states that "for Paul apostleship is proved, not by any exclusive claim, but by the fruits of those who exercise it" (Kirk, 261) and "the same apostolic ministry, in differing historical circumstances, exists to this day" (Kirk, 264).

3. The Evidence from Paul's Letters.

Since Paul's letters are the earliest writings of the NT, and since he uses apostolos more than any other NT author, all historical investigations of the origin, meaning and significance of the word properly begin with his letters.

However, lest it be thought that the concept of apostle originated with Paul, it should be noted that he writes of "those who were apostles before me" (Gk: tous pro emou apostolous). These apostles were located in Jerusalem (Gal 1:17). The creedal tradition (see Creed) which he repeats to the Corinthians, and which he "received" many years before, mentioned that the risen Lord* appeared [in Palestine] "to all the apostles" before he appeared to Paul (1 Cor 15:7, 8), suggesting that there were "apostles" at or close to the time of Jesus' resurrection.*

This creedal tradition (1 Cor 15:5-9) is helpful in a second respect, namely, that it distinguishes between the Twelve and "all the apostles":

[Christ] appeared	to Cephas,	then to the twelve . . .
Then he appeared	to James,	then to all the apostles.
Last of all he appeared	also to me . . .	the least of the apostles.

There is a symmetry here regarding the appearances of the risen Lord in Palestine. Cephas (see Peter) is placed with the Twelve, and James with all the apostles. Since Cephas is elsewhere referred to as an apostle (Gal 1:18-19; 2:8; cf. 1 Pet 1:1; 2 Pet 1:1), we take it that the Twelve were called apostles but that there were more apostles than twelve, and that among them were James and Paul himself, as he claimed (1 Cor 15:9).

The most logical explanation of this differentiation between the Twelve and the apostles is that the Twelve had been a term applied to the twelve disciples of Jesus from the time of the Galilean mission and that apostles were these and others, who at the first Easter were among those who were commissioned by the risen Lord.

We are able to say, then, that the apostle—so common in Paul's letters—predates those letters and goes back to the first Easter in Palestine, and indeed earlier. The same is true of the notion of the Twelve.

4. Jesus the Apostle and His Apostles.

The origin of the NT phenomenon of the apostle must be sought within the ministry of Jesus. This is a far more likely proposition than that the concept arose abruptly at the first Easter.

In this regard we note sayings which reveal Jesus' consciousness that he was "sent." He said: "whoever receives me receives . . . him who sent (aposteilanta) me" (Mk 9:37 pars.; cf. Mk 2:6 pars.; Mt 15:24; Lk 4:43; Jn 5:36; 9:7; 20:21). For the author of Hebrews Jesus himself is "the apostle . . . of our confession" (Heb 3:1).

Those he chose and called to be with him were in time "sent" to the towns of Galilee "to proclaim" the same message that he proclaimed, namely, the immediacy of the kingdom of God, the sign of which was the casting out of unclean spirits (Mk 3:14; 6:7, 12, 13; cf. Mk 1:14-15, 39). Jesus is conscious that he bears the authority (exousia) of God* as God's representative to fulfill his eschatological will on earth (Mk 2:10; cf. Jn 5:37). In the same way Jesus gave his "authority" (exousia) over the demons to the Twelve as his surrogates (Mk 3:15; 6:7). The tradition that "Jesus appointed twelve . . . that he might send them to preach" and "the apostles returned to Jesus" (Mk 3:14; 6:30) need not be regarded as anachronistic.

The best explanation of the origin of the notion of apostleship is that the šālîaḥ concept was current at the time of Jesus and that he took it, applied it first to himself as "the one sent by God" and then, by extension, to those who were sent by him first to Galilee and then to the Gentiles.

As to "the Twelve" we should regard them as a bridge between the beginnings of the ministry of the historic Jesus and the establishment of early Christianity, as Gerhardsson has argued. This is confirmed in Mark, who shows little redactional interest in the place of the Twelve in the post-Easter church, and yet rather naively refers to the Twelve on a number of occasions (Mk 3:14; 4:10; 6:7; 9:35; 10:32; 11:11; 14:10, 17, 20, 43).

5. Apostles in Paul's Letters.

Broadly speaking, Paul uses the term apostle in two ways: in the nontechnical and in the solemn sense.

5.1. Apostle: Nontechnical. There are two references in Paul's writings to apostle in the nontechnical sense. In the first of these, Paul was writing from Macedonia to prepare the Corinthians for the coming of two men, about whom he writes a brief commendation (2 Cor 8:16-24). The purpose of their visit was to hasten the Corinthians' completion of the collection for the saints in Jerusalem. Paul wrote, "[With Titus] we are sending (synepempsamen) the brother who is famous among all the churches for his preaching of the gospel" and one whom Paul calls "our brother whom we have often tested and found earnest in many matters." Paul declared that these two "brothers" are "messengers [apostoloi] of the [Macedonian] churches" to the church in Corinth (2 Cor 8:23), sent for a practical and financial mission. This use of apostolos appears to resemble the šālîaḥ of later rabbinic writings who might be sent on a mission from Jerusalem to synagogues of the Diaspora.

In the second instance Paul wrote from prison (possibly in Rome) to the church in Philippi explaining that due to illness Epaphroditus was returning to them. Epaphroditus was the Philippian church's "messenger [apostolos] and minister to [Paul's] need" (Phil 2:25). This apostle's role was practical and not directly religious. Once again the similarity between the šālîaḥ concept and the role of Epaphroditus, the apostle of the church of Philippi, seems too close to be coincidental.

These two references support the notion that "messengers (apostoloi) of the churches" were well established in the Pauline churches by the middle fifties of the first century. The most probable explanation for the origin of these apostles is that Paul borrowed the idea from Jewish practice and applied it to his churches.

5.2. Apostle: Solemn. By this we mean "apostles of Christ" (as, e.g., 1 Thess 2:6). These apostles are not sent by ordinary people on a mundane mission. The sender is Christ, the Messiah of God. The overwhelming number of Paul's references to apostle belong to this category, which, however, may be further divided into other apostles and Paul himself.

5.2.1. Other Apostles. There are "apostles before" Paul (Gal 1:17) located in Jerusalem. It is clear from Paul's reflection on his apostolic call en route to Damascus, which we may date in the mid thirties, that there were apostles from earliest times in the primitive church, indeed from the time of the first Easter ("Christ . . . appeared . . . to all the apostles," 1 Cor 15:8).

Were there apostles after Paul? Is there a historical point after which, according to Paul, there were no apostles?

1 Corinthians 15:5-11 bears on these important questions. Paul's words "[Christ] appeared to Cephas, then to the twelve . . . then to more than five hundred brothers . . . then . . . to James . . . then to all the apostles. Last of all . . . he appeared also to me" seems to demarcate a span of resurrection appearances beginning with Cephas and ending with Paul. Paul does not say, "Then he appeared to me" but "Last of all he appeared to me," suggesting a finality of appearances. Paul is able to go on to say "I am the least of the apostles . . . by the grace of God I am [an apostle]" because the apostles are a group limited in number. He can say that he is the "least of the apostles" since he is, in reality, the "last" apostle to whom the Lord "appeared." The first and most basic test of apostolicity is that the claimant has "seen the Lord" (1 Cor 9:1).

The nature of Christ's appearance to Paul was atypical. He did not see the risen Lord in the context of the first Easter in Palestine as the other apostles before him did, but as the glorified heavenly Lord a year or two later. The unusual and much debated phrase, "As one untimely born" (tō ektrōmati, 1 Cor 15:8), whatever it means, reflects Paul's defense of his genuine apostleship despite the isolated and late appearance of the Lord to him. From Paul's standpoint the unusual nature of Christ's resurrection appearance to him serves to mark him out as the end point of such appearances and therefore the end point of apostolic appointment.

The apostles must have been numerous since the creed refers to "all the apostles" (1 Cor 15:7) and Paul can refer to "the rest of the apostles" (1 Cor 9:5). We do not know the exact number except that there were more than twelve who were the core group. The Twelve may have functioned as the symbolic foundation for the new community of the resurrected Christ. The apostles, on the other hand, took their character from their name: they were sent by Christ to go to others. At the missionary meeting in Jerusalem there were two "apostolates" (apostolai), which involved two "sendings": one to the circumcised (see Circumcision), the other to the Gentiles* (Gal 2:7-9).

We know the names of some, but not all the apostles. James is linked with "all the apostles" (1 Cor 15:7; cf. Gal 1:19), suggesting that, while James* was not counted among the Twelve, he was the most honored among the apostles. It is probable that James's relationship as "the brother of the Lord" gave him his special place (cf. Gal 1:19). The "brothers of the Lord," who are unnamed but among whom James would be included, are probably also to be thought of as apostles (see context of 1 Cor 9:5). Clearly John is to be thought of as an apostle (Gal 2:7-9). The link between Barnabas* and Paul also suggests that Barnabas is to be regarded as an apostle (1 Cor 9:6; cf. Acts 14:4). The only others named as apostles in the writings of Paul are his relatives "Andronicus and Junia(s) . . . persons of note among the apostles" (Rom 16:7). If to the Twelve we add James, Barnabas, Andronicus, Junia(s) and Paul (last and least), we know the names of seventeen apostles; but the number was greater.

Paul has a high view of apostles. As founders of churches apostles are pre-eminent persons in early Christianity. Paul declares, "God has appointed apostles first in the church" (1 Cor 12:28; cf. Eph 2:20; 4:11). Moreover, theirs was a prophetic, revelatory ministry, illuminating the meaning of Christ and the gospel.* Paul claims that he and the other apostles enjoyed the revelation of God through the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) to understand the mysteries* of the gospel (Eph 3:1-9; cf. 1 Cor 2:6-16). Apostles made known this revelation of God both verbally and in their writings (Rom 16:25-26; 1 Cor 2:13; Eph 3:3-4).

5.2.2. Paul the Apostle. Paul refers to himself many times as an "apostle." He frequently introduces himself to his readers as "apostle of Jesus Christ" or by similar ascription (1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Eph 1:1; Col 1:1; 1 Tim 1:1; 2 Tim 1:1; Tit 1:1). It is "through Jesus Christ" that Paul has "received apostleship (apostolē, Rom 1:5; cf. Gal 1:1) because Jesus has "called" Paul to be an apostle and "separated" him for the gospel of God (Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1) to bring about the obedience of faith* among the Gentiles (Rom 1:5; 11:13). All of this is due to the risen Christ appearing to Paul "last of all," as the persecutor was travelling to Damascus.

According to S. Kim, Paul alludes frequently to his Damascus Road encounter with Christ. In addition to more readily recognized passages such as 1 Corinthians 9:1; 15:8-10; Galatians 1:13-17; Philippians 3:4-11, there are others (e.g., Rom 10:2-4; 1 Cor 9:16-17; 2 Cor 3:4—4:6; 5:16; Eph 3:1-13; Col 1:23-29). Kim argues that to a remarkable degree the Damascus christophany has colored and shaped Paul's vocabulary and thought.

6. Paul's Apostleship Disputed.

There is no hint in his letters to the Thessalonians that Paul's apostleship was in dispute in the Greek churches at the time of writing (c. A.D. 50-52). Paul feels free to bracket Silvanus and Timothy with himself on equal terms and to include them with him as "apostles of Christ" (1 Thess 2:6; cf. 1 Thess 1:1). But from that time, doubtless due to mounting criticism, Paul became explicit about his status as an apostle (Gal 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Rom 1:1), and was careful to distance himself as an apostle from various coworkers* (1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Col 1:1; cf. Phil 1:1).

By about A.D. 55 Paul acknowledged that his apostleship was in dispute: "If to others I am not an apostle . . ." (1 Cor 9:1). These "others" are probably the Judaizers whose views he may have been echoing in Galatians, when he wrote that he was not an "apostle" only "from and through men" (Gal 1:1). In other words (they said), Paul was nothing more than a šālîaḥ on an errand from the Jerusalem church, a surrogate of others.

Their further criticisms may be detected from Paul's comments in 1 Corinthians 15:8-9 where he affirms his apostleship, even though he was not present when the risen Lord appeared to the apostles before him. Christ's appearance to Paul (they said) was later in time, of a different kind and to him alone. A true resurrection appearance did not occur in his case. He should not be counted among the apostles.

Paul, however, insisted that he was an apostle, notwithstanding his "untimely birth," and that he had seen the Lord in a manner different from others. If he was the "least of the apostles," it was only because he had been a persecutor. But for that he made amends by working "harder than them all." If they preached Christ crucified and risen, so too did he (1 Cor 15:3-5, 11).

6.1. 1 Corinthians: Paul's Apostleship Questioned. Similar defensive tones may be heard earlier in the letter reflecting local questioning of his apostleship: "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?" (1 Cor 9:1).

Here the question does not relate to the historical basis of Paul's claim to be an apostle but to his ministry lifestyle which some found unacceptable in the Greco-Roman environment of Corinth, namely that he did not accept remuneration (see Financial Support; Tentmaking). From his "defense to those who would examine me" (1 Cor 9:3) which follows (1 Cor 9:4-18), it appears that according to some Corinthians his refusal to accept patronage was his tacit recognition that he was not in any true sense an apostle. A genuine apostle would accept full payment.

Nonetheless, this was a factional, unrepresentative complaint. Paul felt able to say "At least I am [an apostle] to you [Corinthians]" (1 Cor 9:3).

6.2. 2 Corinthians: Paul's Apostleship Opposed. Within no more than one or two years, however, questioning of Paul's apostleship by some of the Corinthians had hardened into widespread opposition. This dramatic development is attributable to the recent arrival of a number of self-professed "ministers" or "apostles" (2 Cor 11:13, 23), who had launched a counter mission against Paul and his version of Christianity (2 Cor 2:17—3:1; 11:4, 12; see Opponents). The vocabulary of their ministry emerges from 2 Corinthians and includes such terms as "the word of God," "gospel," "Jesus," "Spirit" and "righteousness" (2 Cor 2:17; 4:1; 11:4, 15).

This was now a far-reaching assault on Paul's apostleship by newly arrived persons who sought to oust Paul from his place at Corinth. They were superior, Paul inferior (2 Cor 11:5, 23), whom Paul mocks as "superlative apostles" (2 Cor 11:5; 12:11). If he has come to them, they have come further (2 Cor 10:12-14—Jerusalem compared to Antioch?). If he is an apostle, where are his "signs,* wonders and mighty works " (2 Cor 12:12)? If he claimed to have "seen" the "Lord" (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8), they boast of an abundance of "visions and revelations of the Lord" (2 Cor 12:1, 7; see Visions), the evidence of which is their ecstatic speech (2 Cor 5:12-13; cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4; see Tongues). Their credentials as "Hebrews . . . Israelites . . . the seed of Abraham" are impeccable, making them superior in every way.

For his part Paul is denigrated as inadequate, powerless, worldly and a "fool" to be "tolerated" (2 Cor 2:17; 3:5; 10:1-6). Paul is a "crafty" (2 Cor 4:23; 12:16), sorry figure as he limps from defeat to defeat (2 Cor 2:14-16; 4:1, 7-8, 16; 6:3-10; 11:23—12:10). What is the proof that "Christ is speaking through" this man (2 Cor 13:3; 10:7; cf. 1 Cor 2:13; 14:36)?

How did Paul answer this devastating attack on his apostleship? Significantly he did not reiterate the Lord's appearances to him (cf. 1 Cor 9:1; 15:8; Gal 1:15-16). His opponents' "visions and revelations of the Lord" (2 Cor 12:1) had stolen that ground from him, at least in the eyes of the Corinthians.

Paul defends his apostleship in 2 Corinthians along the following lines. First, the Damascus Road call by the risen Lord is implicit throughout 2 Corinthians. He was an apostle "by the will of God" (2 Cor 1:1) who used the "authority (exousia) the Lord gave [him] for building up" the Gentile churches (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10; cf. 11:17; 12:19). He exercised "this ministry (of the new covenant, 3:6) by the mercy of God" (i.e., as a result of the Damascus call 2 Cor 4:1; cf. 1 Cor 15:9; Gal 1:15; 1 Tim 1:16). He spoke "from and before God" (ek theou katenanti theou, 2 Cor 2:17; cf. 2 Cor 12:10) and his "competence" to be a "minister of a new covenant" (see Covenant and New Covenant) is from God (hikanotēs . . . ek tou theou, 2 Cor 3:5-6).

If the Damascus Call was the basis of Paul's apostleship, its legitimacy is demonstrated by the quality of his ministry (see Ministry), especially when seen in contrast to the new ministers in Corinth. He "refuse[s] to tamper with God's word" (2 Cor 4:2), unlike those who "peddle God's word" (2 Cor 2:17). Whereas they promote a view of the "righteousness of God" (based on circumcision or other works of the Law? 2 Cor 11:15; see Righteousness, Righteousness of God), Paul is true to the message entrusted to him by God, that God's righteousness is to be found in Christ who became sin for us (2 Cor 5:19-21; cf. 2 Cor 3:9). Despite their claims for themselves and their assault on him, they are "false apostles . . . [servants of] Satan" (2 Cor 11:13-15). Through Paul's ministry, however, there is a church at Corinth, a living "letter from Christ" as proof of Paul's genuineness (2 Cor 3:2-3; 10:7) as an apostle who effectively "persuades" people to become Christians (2 Cor 5:11-13). Christ indeed speaks powerfully through Paul (2 Cor 13:4) and through Paul brings resistant people captive to obey the gospel (2 Cor 10:4-6).

Second, Paul accepted the observation about his weakness,* indeed he expanded upon it, even boasting of his sufferings in three important passages (2 Cor 4:7-8; 6:3-10; 11:23—12:10; cf. 1 Cor 4:9-13; 15:30, 32). Paul proclaimed the one who had become sin,* and that he himself had experienced in his own life, in some measure, the sufferings* of the Jesus whom he preached. Implicit in these catalogs of tribulation (see Afflictions) is the claim that the sufferings of Christ are reproduced in an apostle who is true to him (2 Cor 1:5). Unsaid but perhaps implied is that the powerful triumphalism (see Triumph) of the "superlative apostles" arises from their cross-less gospel (see Cross, Theology of the) and serves only to disqualify them (2 Cor 2:13; 5:16; 11:4). The "falsity" of these apostles lies in their "other" Jesus, their "different" gospel.

7. Conclusion.

The use of the word apostolos is almost completely confined to the NT writings. Since Paul makes more use of the word than other NT writers and his writings are chronologically the earliest, it is clear that study of this word must begin with Paul's letters.

It is evident from Paul's writings, however, that there were "apostles before [Paul]," going back at least to the resurrection appearances of Jesus in Jerusalem and elsewhere in Palestine. The appearance of the apostle vocabulary in the Gospel of Mark makes it likely that the notion of the apostle must be taken back into the Gospel story.

Jesus, followed by Paul and other early church leaders, appear to have been influenced in their use of the word apostle by the Jewish notion of the šālîaḥ who in late Judaism represented persons and institutions to others. While it is clear that nontechnical use of "apostle" by Paul resembles the secular šālîaḥ of later Jewish writings, the technical, or "solemn," use of this word takes on a special character from the unique circumstances associated with the rise of early Christianity.

Galatians,* Romans* and the two Corinthian* letters reflect the rise of opposition to the recognition of Paul as an apostle of Christ. While some of this opposition arose at a local level over personal criticism of Paul, by far the greatest rejection of his apostleship arose from the Judaizers,* who at best sought to classify him as a humble šālîaḥ of the Jerusalem church.

Paul himself sought to establish the limited extent of the numbers of apostles. His careful words that Christ "appeared to me last of all" (1 Cor 15:8) serve to show that while there were apostles before him, there were no apostles after him. According to Paul he is both "the least" and "the last" of the apostles.

Questioning or outright rejection of Paul's authority as an "apostle of Christ" is by no means confined to Paul's own day. Some modern scholars have attempted to broaden the definition of "apostle" in such a way (e.g., as "missionary" or "church planter") that Paul's distinctive authority is dissipated. Paul strenuously resisted attempts to downgrade him in this way. If Paul's apostleship meant and means no more than that, then he had and continues to have little real authority in the churches.

There should be no doubt that Paul based his claim to be an apostle on having seen the risen Lord and having been commissioned by him to go to the Gentiles (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8; Gal 1:11-17). To be sure, he pointed to his effectiveness in establishing churches, his own sufferings as a continuation in history of the sufferings of Christ and to his own integrity, but these served only to legitimize a ministry which had its basis in Christ's confronting him on the road to Damascus. See also AFFLICTIONS TRIALS, HARDSHIPS; AUTHORITY; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; MINISTRY; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PASTORAL THEOLOGY; SIGNS, WONDERS, MIRACLES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. H. Agnew, "On the Origin of the Term Apostolos," CBQ 38 (1976) 49-53; idem, "The Origin of the NT Apostle-Concept: a Review of Research," JBL 105 (1986) 75-96; C. K. Barrett, The Signs of an Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); A. Ehrhardt, The Apostolic Succession in the First Two Centuries of the Church (London: Lutterworth, 1953); idem, The Apostolic Ministry (SJT Occasional Papers 7; Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1958); B. Gerhardsson, The Origins of the Gospel Traditions (London: SCM, 1977); S. Kim, The Origins of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); E. Käsemann, "Die Legitimität des Apostels," ZNW 41 (1942) 33-71; J. A. Kirk, "Apostleship since Rengstorf: Towards a Synthesis," NTS 21 (1975) 249-64; J. B. Lightfoot, "The Name and Office of Apostle" in The Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians (10th ed., 1890; London: Macmillan, 1986) 92-101; J. Munck, "Paul, the Apostles and the Twelve," ST 3 (1949) [= Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1959) 36-68]; K. H. Rengstorf, "ἀπόστολος," TDNT I.407-47; W. Schmithals, The Office of Apostle in the Early Church (Nashville: Abingdon, 1969); R. Schnackenburg, "Apostles Before and During Paul's Time," in Apostolic History and the Gospel, ed. W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970).

P. W. Barnett

APOSTOLIC FATHERS. See PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA. See ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA.

AQEDAH. See DEATH OF CHRIST; SACRIFICE, OFFERING.

ARCHANGELS. See ANGELS, ARCHANGELS.

AREOPAGUS. See ATHENS, PAUL AT.

ARMOR OF GOD. See TRIUMPH.

ARTEMIS. See EPHESUS; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

ASCETICISM. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS.

ASTROLOGY. See ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

ATHENS, PAUL AT

Chapter 17 of the Acts of the Apostles* preserves a speech of Paul in a city traditionally associated with pagan learning. This speech, uniquely constructed to address the historical situation, is also in harmony with Paul's letters, though this has been challenged and is a matter of continuing debate.

1. Paul in First-Century Athens
2. The Athens Speech
3. The Athens Speech and the Letters
4. Conclusions

1. Paul in First-Century Athens.

1.1. The City of Athens: Its Reputation and Piety. It strikes the modern person as ironic that Christians and Jews were regarded by most of the ancient world as "atheists" because of their refusal to recognize the gods. It is with a similar irony that Paul, having walked about the city and having been disturbed by the profusion of idols (Acts 17:16; see Idolatry), calls the Athenians "religious" (Acts 17:22).

The city of Athens, one of the great city-states in fifth-century B.C. Greece, is located in the southeast of the country. By the apostolic era it was no longer a world superpower nor the hub of intellectual activity as it once was, but it did have a legacy from the glories of the past in its civic pride and its reputation for matters of philosophy and piety. Full of idols, as Acts 17 records, Athens was described by ancient authors as a model of "speaking well of the gods"; so religious were the people of Athens, that in that city altars were even set up "to unknown gods" (Pausanias 1.1.4; 5.14.8; Philostratus Vit. Ap. 6.3).

Critics of the historicity of the speeches in Acts have frequently pointed out that none of the strands of extrabiblical evidence specifically mentions the singular "an unknown god," which is necessary for the speech's introduction (Acts 17:23). The phrase "altars to unknown gods," which is mentioned in the literature, is ambiguous, however. With only scant archeological evidence yet recovered, it is too early to conclude from silence that the singular could not have been used (contra Lüdemann, 194).

More significant is the way that the practice of this anonymous worship was linked to themes central to Paul's speech: besides being an indication of religiousness, it also is clearly presented by Diogenes Laertius as a "safety precaution." The thinking was that if the gods were not properly venerated they would strike the city. Hence, lest they inadvertently invoke the wrath of some god in their ignorance of him or her, the city set up these altars to unknown gods (Diogenes 1.110-13). Both the admission of ignorance and the desire to avoid divine catastrophe are used to great effect by Paul in his speech.

1.2. The Mars Hill (Areopagus) Council. It is unclear whether or not Acts is presenting Paul as formally "on trial" in Athens. The phrase "they took him to the Areopagus" (Acts 17:19) could refer either to the Council called by that name or just to the location, a hill after which the Council was named. Since there are good arguments on both sides of this controversy, it is probably best to leave the question open.

Whether it was a formal trial or not the reader should not miss the fact that the speech is a response to a very specific and serious accusation: "He seems to be advocating strange and foreign gods" (Acts 17:18), not very different from the famous charge mounted against Socrates, leading to the death of that great teacher. Luke's comment in Acts 17:21 is ironic: the Athenians are more interested in satisfying their curiosity than they are in preserving "orthodoxy." In Paul's case the charges arise from the Athenians' apparent misunderstanding of Paul's preaching; they appear to have thought he was referring to two gods (note the plural in Acts 17:18b). The terms Jesus and Anastasis ("Resurrection") could be mistaken for the names of a god and his consort.

2. The Athens Speech.

The speech in Acts 17 has been criticized for not being sufficiently Christian (e.g., Dibelius, 57-63). But this negative assessment of the speech is, as shall be seen, superficial. The argument is in reality a devastating attack on both the Athenians and their religion.

2.1. Idol Worship and the True God. Before correcting the Athenians' mistaken impression of the Christian message and satisfying their curiosity, Paul cleverly uses the altar to the Unknown God to defend himself against the charge of preaching strange and foreign gods. In effect Paul says in Acts 17:23: "What I proclaim to you is only that which you yourselves, while openly admitting your ignorance, claim to reverence." Paul is not here saying that what he worships is what they worship* without knowing it. The emphasis in the Greek construction is on the "ignorance" not the "worship." They are right only insofar as they recognize that there is something worthy of worship of which they are ignorant. In this way Paul's defense quickly turns to an attack. The speech goes on to attack various facets of the practice of idol worship: It is wrong to try to locate the Creator of all in a building fashioned by humans (Acts 17:24). It is wrong to try to give gifts to the giver of life (Acts 17:25). It is wrong to try to identify the God who created all nations with any particular city (Acts 17:26; identifying gods with cities was a regular feature of pagan religion). And finally, it is wrong to think that the one who gives life to people can be something that itself has no life, but is shaped by human hands (Acts 17:29).

Thus, far from approving idol worship, the speech asserts that their idol worship (except for their implicit acknowledgment of ignorance) is fatally flawed both in theory and in execution. It is worth noting that parts of these criticisms of idolatry,* while thoroughly Jewish (see Gärtner, passim), were not completely alien to the Stoics or the Epicureans (who are specifically mentioned in Acts 17:18). In addition, these criticisms, in their sharpest form, could be seen as having some bite against Jewish cultic practices as well (see Stephen's speech, Acts 7).

2.2. Natural Revelation and the True God. Dibelius, among others, thought that the speech at Athens teaches a "kinship" between God* and people that is "foreign" to Paul's thinking and to the rest of the NT (Dibelius, 74). But this reading of the speech is untenable. The language used in Acts 17:27 clearly indicates irony and tragedy. People are intended to "seek" God, it is true. The result of this "seeking" we would expect to be "finding." But the verb for "finding" is weakened in three ways. The first is the grammatical construction: the use of the optative mood in Greek introduces a tone of uncertainty, coupled with a phrase (ei ara ge) which is best translated "if perhaps." The "finding" is by no means certain. Second, the force of the verb is weakened by being paired with the colorful verb "groping" (psēlaphaō), a word used in such sources as Homer's Odyssey (9.416) and the Greek version of Deuteronomy (28:29) to mean a "blind feeling around." Third, the verb phrase is followed by the clause "although he is not far." The concessive nature of this clause only makes sense if the "groping" is unsuccessful.

It seems safe to conclude that while the speaker believes that knowledge of God is theoretically possible from nature, yet in practical terms there is little or no hope that this hypothetical possibility will be or has been translated into an acceptable relationship with God. It is hard to imagine a stronger contrast between the God who is in control of all (Acts 17:24-26) and the ironic pathetic state of the human predicament as here described (Acts 17:27): blindly and unsuccessfully groping for someone who stands so close and who desires to be found.

2.3. Pagan Thinking and the True God. Does the citation, with apparent approval, of pagan literature in Acts 17:28 provide evidence of a positive evaluation of paganism? Very likely it does not. There is reason to doubt that the first part of verse 28 is a quotation from any specific pagan work, for there is no consensus as to the alleged source for its wording, although several have been proposed. Probably, then, verse 28a is not a quotation at all, but a statement using common vocabulary and a commonly used form, the triad. While the phrase is one that Greeks and Christians could both affirm, it is much more likely that the triad is meant to be a reminder of the three main prongs in the Jewish attack on idols (they lack life, they cannot move, and they have no real existence) than that the statement is simply taken from a pagan source (Gärtner, 197, 222).

The phrase in the middle of Acts 17:28, while plural in form, is a common method of introducing a single and specific poetic quotation; without question the phrase "for we are his offspring" is a quotation from pagan literature (Aratus Phainomena 5). But the citation is not so much intended to indicate a close relationship between people and God (so, e.g., Haenchen, 525), as it is to show a close resemblance between people and God: since human beings are living, God must also be living; he must be greater, not less, than his creations. This is made clear by the "therefore" which links verse 28 with verse 29.

Thus, as with the words of the inscription, so the quotation from pagan literature is used to demonstrate the errors of the belief system from which it is borrowed. Even the Greeks are aware that there is something or someone worthy of worship of whom they are ignorant; even the Greeks realize that something living can only be truly represented by something living. This utilization of pagan philosophy* and literature to show its own inconsistencies may be something borrowed from Jewish apology, for the quotation from Aratus seems to have been used in a similar way by the Jewish propagandist Aristobulos (fragment 4 in Eusebius Praep. Ev. 8.12).

2.4. Christianity and the True God. The specifically Christian thrust of the speech is confined to the final two verses. In this final section the speaker answers two questions that would be on the minds of the hearers of the speech.

The question that Acts 17:30 is designed to answer is not about the guilt or innocence of the pagans, as Dibelius assumes (Dibelius, 55). The text deals only with the delay of punishment and says nothing about the Athenians' innocence before God. The historical context clarifies the reasoning: the worship of unknown gods was a type of "insurance" for the Athenians, a way of warding off divine catastrophe from some attention-demanding god with whom they were unacquainted. Paul has just argued that their efforts are mistaken and ineffectual. The obvious rejoinder from the audience would be: "If our worship is unacceptable to the unknown god, why is there no catastrophe?" The answer then focuses not on whether the Athenians are worthy of punishment, but why no punishment has followed their alleged errors. The answer is that although divine retribution has not yet come, its delay is not because of their innocent ignorance or precautionary worship, but because God has been merciful. "But now . . . ," the speaker indicates, things will be different. God, who cannot be served with human hands, does not want their offerings, he wants their repentance.

Only after explaining the deficiencies of their attempts at worship does the speech return to the main subject of the gospel message which had been misunderstood earlier (see Acts 17:18). In Acts 17:31 Paul tells the Athenians that, in complete contrast to the lifeless things with which they have chosen to represent the divine, God has appointed a living human being, Jesus Christ.* Jesus' humanity is here emphasized not only to avoid the confusion hinted at in Acts 17:18—he is not to be added to the pantheon—but also as a contrast to lifeless idols.

Any misunderstanding of "Jesus and the Resurrection" as a new god and his consort are dispelled not only by the reference to Jesus as a human being but also by an attempt to make clear what is meant by the resurrection.* This attempt at clarification, it would seem, was only too successful. The Athenians, to whom the idea of physical resurrection would have been repugnant, began to sneer, and the reported speech comes to an abrupt end.

3. The Athens Speech and the Letters.

3.1. Athens and 1 Thessalonians: Convincing and Converting Gentiles. In such an obviously abridged report of a speech by Paul as that found in Acts 17, one should not expect the whole of his gospel message to be reproduced in the detail that we have it in his letters. There is a notable parallel in 1 Thessalonians 1:9-10, however, where Paul writes of the Thessalonians'* response to his message. Their first step was toward monotheism: they "turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God" (1 Thess 1:9), reminiscent of the mainly monotheistic rather than specifically Christian thrust in the Athens speech.

Even more remarkable is the parallel between Acts 17:31 and 1 Thessalonians 1:10. Both speak about the future, but certain, divine judgment* or wrath,* which is linked to Jesus as judge or as the criterion for judgment. And in both cases the resurrection of Jesus by God is brought into view. The differences in content between the two passages are slight and consistent with the fact that the one is directed toward pagans and the other toward those who have become Christians.

3.2. Athens and 1 Corinthians: A Change in Missionary Strategy? It has been argued that the small number of converts in Athens caused Paul to change the character of his preaching, and that this is reflected in such passages as 1 Corinthians 2:1-2 (see the references in Gärtner, 51-53, who does not agree; Stonehouse). But the situations in Athens and Corinth were radically different and called for different emphases. The Corinthians needed to be told that the Christian teachers, whom they exalted overly much, considered themselves as "fools" for Christ (1 Cor 4:10). The Athenians, who already considered Paul a fool—the term they used, spermologos (Acts 17:18), means something like "one who has collected scraps of learning"—needed to be taught about their own ignorance (a theme that also resonates with 1 Cor 3:18-19). Similarly, although Christ is the main subject of the gospel message in both contexts, for the Corinthians it is Christ and his humiliation and crucifixion,* whereas for non-Christians it is Christ and his vindication through the resurrection.

Once these differences are noted, the important similarities between the speech and the letter become clear, especially in terms of the style of argument. In 1 Corinthians more clearly than the other letters, Paul employs the tactic of citing slogans of his opponents with apparent approval, only to add such severe qualifications and restrictions as to reverse the meaning. An example is the Corinthian slogan "All things are lawful for me" (1 Cor 6:12) which is followed by such amendments as to negate its force. This is precisely the tactic used in the Athens speech in regard to Paul's initial apparent praise for their religiousness and worship of the Unknown God. In the end, nothing about their religion is commendable except their implicit acknowledgment that they were ignorant about something.

3.3. Athens and Romans: Natural Theology. The other clear tie-in with Paul's letters is his teaching on the matter of the human response to natural revelation. In the Athens speech natural observations should tell the Athenians that their worship is misguided. The God who created the earth cannot need material gifts; the God who gave life must himself be living, and so on. Indeed, there are clues in their own philosophy and poets that should have turned them to the one true God, yet they have clung to pagan practices and idolatry. What the Athenians need, according to the speech, is not education but repentance. In Romans 1 the point of Paul's discussion is identical: no one is without blame. Romans 1:22-23 might just as well have been written with the Athenians in mind: "Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images."

Both Romans and Acts 17 display the conviction that enough can be known about God from his universe to make human beings reject idolatry. Neither Romans nor Acts 17, however, holds much in the way of hope that people will come to know God by natural revelation alone.

4. Conclusions.

Acts 17:22-31 must be seen in the context of the historical situation of Paul's visit to Athens. It begins as a defense against the accusation brought by the Athenians, but quickly turns to an attack on idol worship. Finally, the speech answers questions that an Athenian audience could be expected to have had, questions not only arising from the speech itself, but from Paul's initial discussions in the marketplace (Acts 17:17).

If the difference in audience is taken into account, the speech shows pronounced affinities with Paul's letters. In terms of content, the presentation of the Christian message to pagan Gentiles is consistent with what we would expect from passages like 1 Thessalonians 1:10, and the ideas about natural revelation are consistent with the teaching at the beginning of Romans. In terms of the style of the argument, it is the similarities between the Areopagus speech and 1 Corinthians that stand out. In terms of his thinking, the way that thinking is expressed and the boldness in meeting opponents on their own geographical and intellectual territory, it is none other than the apostle Paul's voice we hear in the Athens speech.

See also IDOLATRY; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PHILOSOPHY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); H. Conzelmann, "The Address of Paul on the Areopagus," in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (London: SPCK, 1968) 217-30; M. Dibelius, "Paul on the Areopagus," in Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, ed. H. Greeven (New York: Scribners, 1956) 26-77; B. Gärtner, The Areopagus Speech and Natural Revelation (Uppsala: Gleerup, 1955); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); C. J. Hemer, "The Speeches of Acts: II. The Areopagus Address," TynB 40 (1989) 239-59; G. Lüdemann, Early Christianity According to the Traditions in Acts (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); N. B. Stonehouse, Paul Before the Areopagus and Other New Testament Studies (London: Tyndale, 1957). C. Gempf

AUTHORITY

The term exousia (and the related words exousiazō, exesti) is used of "ability," "freedom"* and "right" in the Pauline writings. When applied to Paul himself, exousia refers to a "right" that stems from his commission as apostle* to the Gentiles.* When used of the apostolate, the term carries the sense of faithful transmission and hence guarantor rather than innovator of church tradition. Within the church it has the twofold sense of individual "freedom" and corporate "warrant" that derives from the presence of Christ's* power* with those gathered in his name.*

1. Of Paul
2. Of Other Apostles
3. Of Opponents
4. In the Church

1. Of Paul.

1.1. Source. Paul defines the source of his authority as "given by the Lord*" (2 Cor 10:8; cf. Rom 1:1). This authority stems specifically from his status as "Christ's apostle" (1 Thess 2:6), which gives him the right to exert his personal influence when necessary (1 Thess 2:7). Authority and apostleship are closely linked in Paul's letters. Indeed, his ability to exercise authority stems from his commission as an apostle (see Conversion and Call). Requests are made "through the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., 1 Cor 1:10), discipline is exercised "in the Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., 2 Thess 3:12), household* instructions are given "in the name of the Lord" (1 Thess 4:2; 2 Thess 3:6) and teaching* is rendered "by the word of the Lord" (1 Thess 4:15; cf. 1 Cor 7:10).

1.2. Challenges. There are very few of Paul's letters where his authority is not highlighted. It may be observed in the opening section of his letters where he commonly identifies himself as "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus" (Rom, 1—2 Cor, Gal, Eph, Col, 1—2 Tim, Tit). But Paul's apostolic authority is particularly at issue in his letters to the Galatians* and the Corinthians.* In Galatians we read of Jewish-Christian itinerant missionaries who preach a message of circumcision* (Gal 2:3-4; 5:2-12; 6:12-13) and obedience to the Mosaic Law* (Gal 2:15-16; 3:2; 5:4), and who seek to erode Paul's authority among the Gentile churches by claiming that his apostleship is secondary (Gal 1:1; 1:13—2:10) and his gospel fashioned to be palatable to the Gentiles (Gal 1:11-12; 2:1-10). It is common among interpreters to link these opponents with those from the Pharisaic wing of the Jerusalem church ("Judaizers*"; Acts 15:5) whom James claimed had "gone out" without the church's authority (Acts 15:24) and taught the Gentiles that unless they were circumcised according to the custom taught by Moses they could not be saved (Acts 15:1). In 1 and 2 Corinthians Paul responds to those who challenge his authority by questioning his apostleship on the grounds that he refused financial* support from his churches (1 Cor 9:3-18; 2 Cor 12:13), that he did not carry letters of recommendation (2 Cor 3:1-3), that he was not successful in reaching his own people (2 Cor 3:14—4:4) and that he was an unimpressive speaker (2 Cor 10:10-11). There also seem to have been insinuations that the Jerusalem Collection (see Collection) was merely a smoke screen for Paul's personal gain (2 Cor 8:18-21; 12:16-18).

1.3. Validity. When his authority is challenged, Paul points to the validating marks that he shares with other apostles. Witness to Christ's resurrection* is a primary credential (1 Cor 9:1; cf. 1 Cor 15:7; Gal 1:15-16). While Paul refers to financial* support as a "right" of the apostle (1 Cor 9:3-12; 2 Thess 3:9), it is one he himself waived so as not to hinder receptivity to the gospel (1 Cor 9:12; see Tentmaking) and to undercut rival apostles who preached for financial gain (1 Cor 9:15-18; 2 Cor 2:17; 11:7-12). Paul also referred to the "signs of the apostles" that were evident in the church planting process (2 Cor 12:12). It is difficult to know whether "signs, wonders and miracles" in 2 Corinthians 12:12 defines the content of these apostolic signs or what accompanied them, or even whether they were terms used by his opponents.* The problem is the repetition of "signs" (sēmeia) in the dative plural, which commonly defines instrument or accompaniment ("with signs, wonders and miracles"). Reference, however, to the "working" (kateirgasthē) of signs (by God: an instance of the divine passive voice of the verb), along with the frequency of this type of anacoluthon in Paul (Blass-Debrunner-Funk §467), tips the balance in favor of the former. That his preaching was not merely one of word but of "power and the Spirit" is a recurring Pauline thought (Rom 15:19; 1 Cor 2:4; Gal 3:5; 1 Thess 1:5; see Holy Spirit; Power).

While his opponents seek to legitimize their authority through such formalities as commendatory letters and financial support, Paul turns rather to the birth and continuing existence of a church (1 Cor 9:2; 2 Cor 3:1-2), faithful witness* to the gospel (e.g., 1 Cor 4:1-2; 2 Cor 1:18; 4:5) and endurance of missionary hardships (1 Cor 4:9-13; 2 Cor 4:7-12; 6:4-10; 11:23—12:10; see Afflictions, Hardships, Trials) as the chief evidences of his own apostolic authority. Lack of faithful witness in particular marks one as a "false" apostle (2 Cor 11:13-15) and "accursed" (Gal 1:8; see Curse).

There is some question as to the intent of Paul's second visit to Jerusalem* (Gal 2:1-10). The language of Galatians 2:2 appears to indicate that his purpose was the validation of his gospel: "I placed before those of repute the gospel that I preach among the Gentiles lest I am running or have run in vain." This would seem to imply that Paul viewed his authority as dependent on the approval of "the Twelve." Yet elsewhere in Galatians Paul strenuously denies that his apostleship or his gospel were dependent in any way on human recognition or validation (Gal 1:1, 11-12, 15-17). Much hinges on one's interpretation of "to run in vain." That Paul did not look on the Twelve as having an authority superior to his own is clear from his indifference to their status ("their reputation means nothing to me," Gal 2:6). He, therefore, cannot have in mind the need for apostolic correction or validation. This is confirmed by eis kenon (see Futility), which elsewhere in Paul functions as an adverb of result meaning "without effect" (2 Cor 6:1; Phil 2:16; 1 Thess 3:5). Paul's meeting with "those of repute" in the Jerusalem church suggests rather that he was concerned to know whether the Judaizers' "other gospel" (Gal 1:8) has the support of the Jerusalem apostolate. Paul's mission to the Gentiles and, in the long term, Christianity itself would be compromised and so "without effect" if there were a failure of the Jewish and Gentile wings of the church to agree on the nature of the gospel.*

1.4. Limitations. The scope of apostolic authority was not an unlimited one. Paul sets out definite boundaries for the exercise of his own authority. These boundaries, which were agreed on by Paul and the "pillars" of the Jerusalem Church, amounted to an ethnic division of labor. Paul was to preach to the Gentiles, and James, Peter and John were to go to the Jews (Gal 2:9)—a division that accords with Paul's own commissioning as "apostle to the Gentiles" (Rom 1:5; 15:15-16; Gal 1:16; 1 Tim 2:7; see Mission). Even so, these boundaries were not absolute since Paul's own evangelistic strategy involved an initial outreach in the synagogue (Acts 13:5, 14; 14:1; 17:2, 10; 18:4; 19:8).

Paul also refers to "the limit of the field that God allotted" (2 Cor 10:13). This "limit" was violated in Corinth by interlopers who "overreached" themselves and tried to displace Paul from his rightful mission field (2 Cor 10:12-15). What this "allotted field" amounted to is clearly spelled out in Romans 15:18-20, where Paul speaks of preaching the gospel in uncharted areas so as not to build on another apostle's foundation. Corinth became Paul's "field" not because they were Gentiles per se but because he was the "first to reach" them (ephthasamen, 2 Cor 10:14).

In 2 Corinthians 10:15-16 the concept of territorial fields is introduced. Paul appears to have included within his "field" those churches, like Laodicea and Colossae, that his converts—and not he personally—established (see Colossians). It was Paul's practice to focus his evangelistic efforts on the large urban centers with a view to enlarging his sphere of authority (kata ton kanona, 2 Cor 10:15) to surrounding areas (ta hyperekeina, 2 Cor 10:16) through the evangelistic efforts of his converts (e.g., Acts 19:1-7; cf. Col 1:3-8; see Coworkers). The limiting of Paul's authority to Gentiles that he or his converts were the first to reach may indeed explain why Paul's letters are directed almost exclusively to the Gentile constituency of churches with an explicit Jew-Gentile mix (1-2 Cor, Gal, Eph, Phil, 1-2 Thess). Furthermore, if it is true that no apostle was directly responsible for the founding of the church at Rome,* this may also account for Paul's freedom to address the Roman church in an authoritative fashion (see Romans).

1.5. Exercise. Although Paul views his authority as a warrant that he possessed by virtue of his apostolic commission (Philem 8) and expected his churches to accept without debate (1 Cor 14:37; cf. 1 Cor 7:17), it was nonetheless a right that he usually waived in favor of reasoned argumentation. His relationship to his churches is articulated, with rare exception, in terms of request rather than command. Parakaleō, an appeal by one who has the authority to command but the tact not to (Rom 12:1; 16:17; 1 Cor 1:10; 4:13, 16; 16:15; 2 Cor 2:8; 6:1; 10:1; 12:18; Eph 4:1; Phil 4:2; 1 Thess 4:1, 10; 5:14; 1 Tim 2:1; Philem 9, 10), and erōtaō, a request made between equals (Phil 4:3; 1 Thess 4:1; 5:12; 2 Thess 2:1), is Paul's usual approach to instructing his churches. This approach arose out of his concept of authority as that which aims "to build up rather than tear down" (2 Cor 10:8). Pastoral ministry is conceived in nurturing versus authoritarian terms (2 Cor 1:24, "not that we lord it over your faith but work with you"). The primary images employed are ones that evoke the intimacy of familial relationships—"gentle as a nursing mother" (1 Thess 2:7; cf. Gal 4:19) and "as a father who exhorts and encourages his children" (1 Thess 2:11-12; cf. 1 Cor 4:15; 2 Cor 12:14; see Pastor).

Even so, Paul did on occasion use his authority as a kind of "stick" to warn his "children" what would happen if his requests were not heeded. Paul warns the arrogant at Corinth that he would, if need be, use a "rod" (1 Cor 4:21) and "deal harshly with them" on his return "in accordance with the authority given" to him "by the Lord" (2 Cor 13:10; cf. 2 Cor 10:8; see Discipline).

With churches that had moved beyond the request stage, Paul did not hesitate to exercise his authority. Paul commands the Thessalonian* church "in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" to disassociate themselves from those in their community that refused to work (2 Thess 3:6-15). He similarly orders the Corinthian church, "as one who has already passed judgment," to "hand over to Satan*" a member who was sexually involved with his stepmother (1 Cor 5:3-5; see Marriage, Divorce, Adultery, Incest; Sexuality). In the so-called painful letter, intermediate to canonical 1 and 2 Corinthians (see Corinthians), Paul commands the church to discipline the individual who had publicly challenged his authority (2 Cor 2:5-11; 7:9-13). Yet the conjoining of command and request in 2 Thessalonians 3:12 shows Paul's reluctance to use a hard-line approach ("we command and ask in the Lord Jesus Christ that such people work quietly and earn their own living").

2. Of Other Apostles.

2.1. Authority and Tradition. Apostolic authority was not innovative authority. It resided in a common core of traditions* (see Creed) about the life and teaching of Jesus, carefully preserved and transmitted by the early church. The apostolic task was that of faithful transmission (paredōka) of these traditions (tas paradoseis) to new congregations, rather than origination (1 Cor 11:2; 2 Thess 2:15). The transmission process was both oral and written (2 Thess 2:15).

Paul's letters give us glimpses of the content of these traditions, which included details of the death, resurrection* and appearances of Christ (1 Cor 15:3-8), Jesus' institution of the new covenant* (1 Cor 11:23-26; see Lord's Supper), the teachings of Jesus concerning the end time (2 Thess 2:1-15; see Eschatology) and instruction about ethical conduct (Rom 6:15-18; Phil 4:8-9; see Ethics) and communal responsibilities (2 Thess 3:6-15; cf. 1 Cor 11:2-34).

Paul frequently reminds his converts that he had faithfully transmitted the tradition (1 Cor 15:3; cf. 1 Cor 11:2, 23) and is concerned that his converts find those who, in turn, could faithfully pass it on (2 Tim 2:2). Some churches are praised for "holding to the traditions" just as Paul passed them on to them (1 Cor 11:2; cf. Rom 6:17); others were commanded to do so (Phil 4:9; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6). The role of transmitter versus innovator explains Paul's care to distinguish between when he is drawing on tradition (1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; 11:23-26; 1 Thess 4:15) and when he is not (e.g., "judge for yourselves," 1 Cor 10:15; cf. 1 Cor 7:12, 25, 40; 2 Cor 8:10). Because of the pains taken by the apostles in transmitting the teaching of Jesus, Paul can say that he passed on to his churches what he "received from the Lord" (1 Cor 11:23; see Jesus, Sayings of).

It is puzzling then to understand what Paul means in Romans 2:16 and 16:25 (cf. 2 Tim 2:8) by "my gospel." Given his role as transmitter, in what sense could he speak of the gospel as uniquely his? It is not the content that is original, for he defines his gospel as "Jesus Christ, raised from the dead, descended from David" (2 Tim 2:8). Moreover, the ease with which he can shift between "my gospel," "the gospel" (e.g., Rom 1:1, 9, 16) and "our gospel" (e.g., 2 Cor 4:3) suggests something other than a peculiarly Pauline form of the gospel. Perhaps the key is to be found in Galatians 1:12, where Paul distinguishes between first receiving the gospel by human transmission and, as in his case, by special revelation (see Conversion and Call).

2.2. Authority and Gentile Instruction. As Paul was not an innovator of the kerygma (see Preaching, Kerygma), neither was he an originator of what he preached to the Gentiles. While it is common to think of Paul as departing from the Jerusalem apostolate in preaching to and instructing those for whom he was given a special commission, Paul's own statements indicate otherwise. 1 Thessalonians 1:9-10 represents a summary of Paul's preaching at Thessalonica. The wording (alēthinō, "true"; anamenein, "await"; tōn ouranōn, "the heaven[s]") and phraseology ("to serve God," "to wait for his Son"), uncharacteristic of Paul, suggest that Paul was using the vocabulary of Jewish-Christian missionary preaching rather than introducing something that was distinctively his own. This is also suggested by the language of "turning to God from idols to serve the living and true God" (1 Thess 1:9), which is a typical description of what Gentile conversion to Christianity meant (cf. Paul's Areopagus speech in Acts 17:16-31; see Athens).

A similar conclusion can be drawn from Paul's ethical instruction in 1 Thessalonians 4:1-12, which focuses on what Jews perceived to be the three primary Gentile abuses: sexual immorality (see Sexuality), lack of love* and idleness. The fact that Paul in 1 Thessalonians 4:1 uses technical phraseology for the transmission of tradition to describe this instruction (parelabete), indicates once again that he was not an innovator but merely a transmitter of what was commonly considered to be appropriate and necessary instruction for Gentile converts. Comparison with the conditions put forward at the Jerusalem Council to ease the tension of Jew-Gentile fellowship suggests this as well (Acts 15:19-21).

2.3. Authority and Collegiality. Apostolic authority is grounded ultimately in the call to preach the gospel; and while divisions of labor and allotted "fields" existed, the task of evangelism (see Mission) is viewed by Paul as a cooperative effort and likened to that of farming, where, as "colaborers" (1 Cor 3:9), one "plants" and another "waters" as the Lord assigns (1 Cor 3:5-6).

The evangelistic task, however, was not seen by all as a cooperative one. Paul likens his founding of the church* at Corinth to that of a master craftsman who, having laid the foundation of the building, finds those who have been contracted to build the superstructure departing from the master plan and even tinkering with the foundation (1 Cor 3:10-12). For such, Paul warns, a day of judgment* awaits, when the quality of one's work will be brought to light (1 Cor 3:13-15; see Rewards). It is unclear whether Paul has in mind the Judaizing efforts of the Pharisaic wing of the Jerusalem church (1 Cor 7:18) or perhaps Peter* himself (1 Cor 3:21; cf. 1 Cor 9:5). If Peter is in view, then Corinth is a violation of the division of labor agreed upon by Paul and "the pillars" (Gal 2:9), as well as an encroachment on a "field" that the Lord had assigned to Paul (1 Cor 3:10).

It is not that Paul begrudged sharing the apostolic task. He clearly welcomed other apostles as colaborers. The distinction lies in his understanding of authority. For while Paul could conceive of colaboring, he could not admit the idea of coauthority. Authority, for Paul, resided in the father-child relationship that was established through the church planting process. It was because Paul reached Corinth first with the gospel that he could address them as "beloved children" (1 Cor 4:14). It was this "begetting through the gospel" that gave Paul the right to ask his converts to "imitate" him (1 Cor 4:16; see Imitation) and explains the care Paul took, in turn, to respect James's* allotted field in Jerusalem (Acts 21:20-26).

The Corinthian situation demonstrates that apostolic authority did not exempt one from judgment. "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ," Paul states, "that each may receive in accordance with the good and bad done through the body" (2 Cor 5:10; cf. 1 Cor 3:13-15). Here apostolic status makes no difference, for God does not judge on the basis of position in the church (Gal 2:6). This is clear from Paul's confrontation of Peter at Antioch* "because he was in the wrong" when he withdrew from table fellowship with the Gentiles (Gal 2:11-14).

3. Of Opponents.

Given Paul's view of the apostolic task as one of "colaboring," it is of some consequence to find him referring to "false apostles" (2 Cor 11:13-15; see Apostle; Opponents). Wrong motivation per se did not render someone an opponent in Paul's eyes. As long as "Christ is preached" he could "rejoice" (Phil 1:18; cf. 1 Cor 15:11). Even if some preached Christ "out of envy and rivalry" or "with the intent to stir up trouble" for Paul, this mattered little to him (Phil 1:15-18). Their "falseness" stemmed rather from an erroneous concept of apostleship and hence a wrong exercise of authority. It was specifically those who claimed the credit for missionary work that was not their own (2 Cor 10:15-16), who preached a different gospel (2 Cor 11:4; Gal 1:8) and who encroached on another's field (2 Cor 10:12-14) that Paul labels as "false." Their aim was not that of "colaborer" but of "supplanter," justifying their actions through the claim of better credentials. They brought and solicited letters of recommendation (2 Cor 3:1-3), claimed a superior heritage to Paul's (2 Cor 11:21-22) and boasted of greater spirituality* ("visions* and revelations," 2 Cor 12:1; "signs, wonders and miracles,"* 2 Cor 12:12). Their intent was not to preach the gospel but "to lead astray from a sincere and pure devotion to Christ" (2 Cor 11:3; cf. Gal 1:8). Financial gain (2 Cor 2:17; 11:20) and the desire for dominance ("enslave," "slap you in the face," 2 Cor 11:20) was their motivation. As such they masqueraded as servants* of righteousness* when in fact they were servants of Satan* (2 Cor 11:14-15), not servants of Christ (2 Cor 11:13).

Some have thought that Paul was being unduly harsh in his judgments of these rival apostles. Yet where the gospel and commitment to Christ was at stake, as at Galatia and Corinth, Paul's remarks are in line with judgments made against false prophets in the OT, whose intent was to lead Israel astray from her commitment to Yahweh and the covenant (e.g., Deut 18:20; cf. Jer 28:15-18). The label "opponent" was not given to those who challenged Paul personally but to those who undermined his role as a preacher (see Preaching) and teacher (see Teaching) of the gospel in a particular community. If in the final analysis Christ and his church are served, then personal rivalries are of little account.

4. In the Church.

Authority is not the sole prerogative of the apostle. Paul recognizes both individual and corporate forms of authority in the church. He calls on the Thessalonians to acknowledge "those who stand before them (proistamenous) in the Lord" (1 Thess 5:12). This is an authority that resides in their work rather than in their personal status or position. As such, they are to be held "in high esteem" (1 Thess 5:13). A sphere of authority exists as well for women within the Christian community. In distinction from Greco-Roman and Jewish society, Paul emphasizes mutuality in the marriage* relationship, where both husband and wife relinquish "rights" to one another (1 Cor 7:3-4). As a symbol of their authority, women are called upon to cover their heads when praying and prophesying

(1 Cor 11:10). Considerable scholarly effort has been expended on understanding what Paul means in 1 Corinthians 11:10 by "the woman ought to have exousia on her head." There is much to commend M. Hooker's interpretation that the woman's head covering was a sign of her God-given "warrant" to exercise the functions of praying (see Prayer) and prophesying (see Prophecy) specified in 1 Corinthians 11:5. Alternatively, her head covering might represent her role as "helpmate" within the creation order (1 Cor 11:9), while praying and prophesying express her function in the redemptive order (see Head; Man and Woman).

The church as well possesses authority by virtue of its being the "body" of which Christ is the "head" (Eph 1:22; 4:15-16; 5:23; Col 1:18; 2:19; see Body of Christ). The responsible exercise of corporate authority was something that Paul had great difficulty inculcating in his churches. It is the corporate responsibility of the church to "test" (1 Thess 5:19-21) and "weigh prophecies" (1 Cor 14:29), to warn the idle, encourage the timid and support the weak (1 Thess 5:14), to punish wrongdoing (2 Cor 2:6), to excommunicate in the case of persistent sin* (1 Cor 5:2, 10-13; 2 Thess 3:6, 14-15) and to reinstate the repentant (2 Cor 2:7-8). This authority derives from "the power of the Lord Jesus" that is present with believers "gathered in his name" (1 Cor 5:4; cf. Mt 18:20) and from the possession of the "mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2:16). The enforcing and waiving of penalties for sin was something that the Gentile churches had difficulty administering. On more than one occasion Paul had to rebuke a church for not exercising its authority (1 Cor 5:2; 6:1; 2 Thess 3:6; see Discipline).

Part of the difficulty for the Gentile churches was in understanding the relationship between corporate authority and individual freedom. While Paul is adamant in his insistence that "for freedom Christ has set us free" (Gal 5:1; 1 Cor 10:25, 29; cf. exestin, 1 Cor 6:12; 10:23), he nonetheless warns against its indiscriminate use (e.g., Rom 6:1-23). He is especially concerned that Christian freedom not be taken as a warrant to flout current social conventions (1 Cor 11:6, 13), to blur the distinctions between right and wrong for a "weaker" brother or sister (1 Cor 8:11; see Strong and Weak), to exercise the charismata (see Gifts of the Spirit) without due consideration for good order in worship* (1 Cor 14:33, 40), and the interests of the unbeliever (1 Cor 14:23-25), or to jeopardize Christian witness in the surrounding community (1 Cor 5:1).

See also APOSTLE; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; CIVIL AUTHORITY; CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; DISCIPLINE; FREEDOM; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PASTOR, PAUL AS; POWER; TRADITION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Banks, "Freedom and Authority in Education. II: Paul's View of Authority," Journal of Christian Education 56 (1976) 17-24; C. K. Barrett, "Paul's Opponents in 2 Corinthians," in Essays On Paul (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982) 60-86; E. Best, "Paul's Apostolic Authority—?," JSNT 27 (1986) 3-25; H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (Stanford: Stanford University, 1969); J. D. G. Dunn, "The Relationship Between Paul and Jerusalem According to Galatians 1 and 2," NTS 28 (1982) 461-78 [= idem, Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 108-26]; E. E. Ellis, "Paul and His Opponents: Trends in Research," in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults: Studies for Morton Smith, part 1, ed. J. Neusner (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975); D. M. Hay, "Paul's Indifference to Authority," JBL 88 (1969) 36-44; B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); M. D. Hooker, "Authority on Her Head: An Examination of 1 Cor. XI.10," NTS 10 (1963-64) 410-16; R. P. Martin, "Authority in the Light of the Apostolate, Tradition and the Canon," EvQ 40 (1968) 66-82; K. J. Neumann, "Paul's Use of Authority and Persuasion in the Corinthian Letters," Consensus 5 (1979) 15-23; J. H. Schütz, Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority (Cambridge: University Press, 1975); R. Schnackenburg, "Apostles Before and During Paul's Time," in Apostolic History and the Gospel, ed. W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970) 287-303.

L. L. Belleville

AUTOBIOGRAPHY, PAULINE. See CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; JEW, PAUL THE; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; RHETORICAL CRITICISM.

B

BAPTISM

From references to baptism in Paul's letters it is apparent that he assumes that all believers in Christ* have been baptized. A single example will suffice to show this. Paul's exposition of baptism in Romans 6 commences by citing an objection to his teaching of justification* by faith* apart from the works* of the Law*: "On that basis," says the objector, "why not sin more to give more room for God's* justifying grace*?" Paul answers by appealing to the meaning of baptism: "How can people like us who died to sin* go on living in it?" He continues, "All of us who were baptized to Christ Jesus were baptized to his death," and he concludes, "so you also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus." Self-evidently, "people like us who died to sin," "all of us who were baptized to Christ Jesus," and "you also must consider yourselves dead to sin," include Paul and all his readers, otherwise his argument against the allegedly antinomian effect of the doctrine of justification by faith falls to the ground. Similar examples of the assumption that all Christians are baptized are to be seen in Galatians 3:26-28, Colossians 2:12, 1 Corinthians 12:13 and the exposition of baptismal ethics* in Colossians 2:20—3:15.

Since Paul himself had received baptism, and had reason to believe that all other Christians were baptized, it is clear that the rite existed prior to his conversion.* (The conversion of Paul is commonly dated four years after the death of Jesus.) Since baptism existed prior to Paul's conversion, it is reasonable to view it as coexistent with the inception of the church. That conclusion concurs with the NT evidence as to the baptizing ministry of John the Baptist (Mk 1:4-8), of Jesus (see Jn 3:25-26, 4:1-3), and of the apostles from the day of Pentecost on (Acts 2:37-41), and the missionary commission of the risen Lord, recorded in Matthew 28:19.

1. The Language and Actions of Baptism
2. Baptism and Christ
3. Baptism and the Spirit
4. Baptism and the Church
5. Baptism and Christian Ethics
6. Baptism and the Kingdom of God

1. The Language and Actions of Baptism.

1.1. Baptism "in the Name of Jesus." In Paul's letters, as in the book of Acts, baptism is typically represented as baptism "in the name" of Jesus. This is reflected in a significant manner in Paul's handling of the divisions in the Corinthian* church. He cites its members as saying, "I belong to Paul," "I belong to Apollos," "I belong to Cephas (= Peter*)," "I belong to Christ" (1 Cor 1:12). Paul, with some indignation, asks, "Has Christ been apportioned to any single group among you? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul?" This final question echoes the language of baptism in the name of Jesus; its use in the context suggests that its normal usage is to make a person a follower of Jesus, even to belong to him, and somehow to be involved in his crucifixion* and enjoy a special relation to him.

There has been much discussion as to whether the phrase "in the name of" reflects a Greek or Hebrew (and Aramaic) idiom, for it is found in all three languages. W. Heitmüller showed that while the expression eis to onoma ("in the name") did not appear in Greek classical literature, it was very common in everyday documents with the meaning of "to the account of," alike in banking and commercial sales. He cited with approval A. Deissmann's definition of "in the name of [someone]" as denoting "the setting up of the relation of belonging." Heitmüller added, "Our word 'for,' generally speaking, would rightly reproduce the meaning" (Heitmüller, 105). In using this expression, the name of the person to whom the possession is "made over" naturally follows. According to Heitmüller, then, baptism in the name of Jesus signifies the setting up of the relation of belonging to Jesus.

This explanation, however, is denied by some in favor of a Hebrew origin of the phrase. In Jewish literature, including the OT, an equivalent of the Greek expression is frequently met, namely lᵉšēm (lᵉ = "to," šēm = "name"). The term has a very elastic sense. Basically it means "with respect to," but the context determines it precise connotation. P. Billerbeck gave three illustrations of its use in his discussion of baptism in Matthew 28:19. (1) When pagans were bought by Jews as slaves they were baptized "in the name of slavery," that is, with a view to becoming slaves; when they were set free they were baptized "in the name of freedom," that is, for freedom. (2) An offering is slaughtered in the name of five things: in the name of the offering (i.e., with respect to its intention, whether it be a burnt or sin or peace offering, etc); in the name of God (for his sake and glory); in the name of the altar fires (that they be properly kindled); in the name of the sweet savor (for the delight it gives to God); and in the name of the good pleasure of God (in obedience to his will). (3) An Israelite can circumcise a Samaritan, but not a Samaritan an Israelite, because the Samaritans circumcise "in the name of Mount Gerizim," that is, with the obligation of worshiping the God of the Samaritans who is worshiped there (Str-B, 1054-55). In light of such evidence Billerbeck affirmed: "Baptism grounds a relation between the triune God and the baptized, which the latter has to affirm and express through his confession to the God in whose name he is baptized."

It is evident, therefore, that the Greek and Hebrew usages of "in the name" are remarkably similar in meaning, especially when applied to baptism, and they would be similarly interpreted in Greek-speaking and Hebrew-speaking circles, despite the greater elasticity of meaning in the Hebrew language.

Sometimes one finds in Paul a shorter expression, baptism eis Christon, which can be rendered either as "into Christ" or "to Christ," and is possibly a conscious abbreviation of the full phrase "in the name of Christ" (see Rom 6:3-4; Gal 3:27). Significantly, both the Greek preposition eis and the Hebrew prefix *l*ᵉ can have the meaning "with respect to," and also a final sense or dative of interest, "for" (BAGD, 229; BDB, 514-15). In such cases the context will help to determine its intention.

An important element of interpretation arises in connection with this formula. We have noted Deissmann's affirmation that "in the name" "sets up a relation of belonging." So also Billerbeck affirmed that baptism in the name of the triune God* "grounds a relation between God and the baptized." Who is viewed as the prime mover in establishing this relationship? In the application to baptism both God and humans are involved. The baptizer invokes the name of Jesus over the baptized, and the baptized calls on the name of the Lord* as he or she is baptized (for the former cf. Jas 2:7; for the latter cf. Acts 22:16). It is likely that Paul has both aspects in mind in Romans 10:9. It is universally acknowledged that "Jesus is Lord" is the primitive confession of faith in Christ that was made at baptism; from it all later creeds of the church were developed (see Creed; Worship). But the salvation granted on confession of faith is in virtue of God's once-for-all action in Christ's death* and resurrection,* and his action in the lives of those who believe. The priority of God's action applies in the reconciliation of the world in Christ and in the reconciliation of each believer who accepts it (2 Cor 5:18-21). In baptism, therefore, the Lord appropriates the baptized for his own and the baptized owns Jesus as Lord and submits to his lordship.

1.2. Symbolism and Reality. It is important to observe that Paul never refers to baptism as a purely external rite, whether as a "mere symbol" for confessing faith in Christ, or as a rite that effects what it symbolizes. Admittedly for Paul, as for the whole early church, the symbolic nature of baptism is plain. Most obviously it symbolizes cleansing from sin* (cf. Acts 22:16). And this meaning seems clear in a pericope that is best understood as reflecting early Christian baptismal practice and its significance for the congregation (Eph 5:25-27: see commentaries, esp. Lincoln ad loc.). The actions of stripping off clothes for baptism and putting on clothes after baptism affords a symbol of "putting off" the old life without Christ and "putting on" the new life in Christ, and even putting on Christ himself (Gal 3:27; Col 3:9, 12). The sinking of the baptized beneath water and rising out of it vividly symbolizes sharing in Christ's burial and resurrection (Rom 6:3-4; the baptismal actions lie in the background of Eph 5:14, often regarded by interpreters as a baptismal chant addressed to the newly initiated believers: see commentaries). None of these spiritual realities, however, can be said to happen by the mere performance of appropriate symbolic actions; they depend on God's once-for-all acts in Christ, according to the gospel, and on God's action in believers as they respond to God's call in the gospel. For that reason Paul's use of baptismal language (in 1 Cor 10:1-12) speaks to a situation where the readers imagined that sacramental action carried its effective and operative power irrespective of moral choices. Paul insists, on the contrary, that the OT "sacraments" led to judgment on an idolatrous and immoral generation.

With these considerations in mind we turn to examine Paul's statements in his letters relating to the significance of baptism.

2. Baptism and Christ.

Baptism "in the name of Jesus" is distinguished from all other religious ablutions by virtue of its relation to Christ. Believers are united with Christ in his redemptive actions of death and resurrection, and so pass from the life of the old age to the life of the new (see Dying and Rising).

2.1. Putting on Christ. The relationship between baptism and union with Christ is indicated not only through its administration "in the name of Jesus" but also in Paul's foundational baptismal utterance, Galatians 3:26-27: "You are all children of God in Christ Jesus through faith, for all you who were baptized to Christ clothed yourself with Christ" (see Adoption, Sonship). The statement is shaped by the discussion in the context as to who the children of Abraham* are, for the promise of God that he should inherit the world to come was made to him and his descendants (Rom 4:16). To Jews the answer was plain: they are Abraham's descendants, and any who would be included with them must receive the sign of the covenant* (circumcision*) and live in obedience to the Law of Moses. Paul, on the contrary, maintained that the "offspring" of Abraham, for whom the promise was intended, is Christ and all in union with him. Hence the pertinence of Galatians 3:26: "In Christ Jesus you are all God's children through faith." They are children not merely of Abraham, but of God. For they are "in Christ,"* the unique Son* of God. This has come about "through faith" (Gal 3:26), "for all you who were baptized to Christ clothed yourself with Christ" (Gal 3:27).

We have already noticed the symbolism used in this passage. The imagery of stripping off clothes and putting on fresh ones to indicate a transformation of character is frequent in the OT (cf., e.g., Is 52:1; 61:10; Zech 1:1-5). The symbolism was peculiarly apt for Christian baptism in apostolic times, since it normally took place by immersion, and apparently often in nakedness. (That was insisted on in Jewish proselyte baptism; when women were baptized the Rabbis turned their backs on them while the women entered the water to their neck, and the latter were questioned and gave answers; they had to have their hair loose, to ensure that no part of their bodies was untouched by water. This feature reappears in Hippolytus, The Apostolic Tradition, c. A.D. 215. Cyril of Jerusalem later remarked on the fitness of being baptized in nakedness, as Jesus died on the cross in such a state.)

More important than the symbolism is the reality expressed through it: the baptized "took off" their old life and "put on" Christ, thereby becoming one with him, and so qualified to participate in life in the kingdom* of God (see New Nature and Old Nature). The two statements in Galatians 3:26 and 27 are complementary: verse 26 declares that believers are God's children "through faith," and verse 27 associates entry into God's family upon union with Christ, and Christ sharing his sonship with the baptized. It is an example of Paul's linking faith and baptism in such a way that the theological understanding of faith that turns to the Lord for salvation, and of baptism wherein faith is declared, is one and the same.

2.2. Union with Christ in Death and Resurrection. Because baptism signifies union with Christ, Paul saw it as extending to union with Christ in his redemptive actions, for the Christ who saves is forever the once crucified and now risen redeemer. Such is the message in Paul's exposition of baptism in Romans 6:1-11 (for a survey of interpretation, see Wedderburn).

First, it should be observed that in this passage Paul was not primarily giving a theological explanation of the nature of baptism, but expounding its meaning for life. He is concerned to rebut the charge that the doctrine of justification by faith logically encourages sin. Accordingly he urged that "people like us who died to sin" could not still live in sin, for "death to sin" is the meaning of our baptism. When we were "baptized to Christ Jesus" we were "baptized to his death" (Rom 6:3, echoing Gal 3:27). That is the consequence of becoming one with the Lord who died and rose for the conquest of sin and death. Moreover, "we were buried with him by baptism to death." Note that Paul did not write, "we were buried like him," but "buried with him." That is, we were laid with him in his grave in Jerusalem! So, too, the death he died on the cross was our death also. This entails a different way of looking at Christ's death for the world from what may be expected.

When we read in Romans 5 that Christ died for us while we were still sinners, we think of Christ as our substitute. Here, however, Paul speaks of Christ as our representative. If he died on the cross as our representative, and that death was accepted, then it was accepted as our death, so that when he died, we died (see Death of Christ). He was an effective representative! Taking that a step further, united with him in his death for sin, we rise in him to live the resurrection life. Through the faith expressed in baptism, what was done outside of us (extra nos) becomes effective faith within us. In Christ we are the reconciled children of God.

But a further element is involved in this exposition of baptism. The last two sentences echo Paul's statement of the gospel in 2 Corinthians 5:14-15: "We are convinced that one died for all, therefore all died. And he died for all that those who live might live . . . for him who died and was raised for them." "Those who live" are those who, having learned that Christ died as their representative, thankfully trust him, confess their faith in baptism, share his resurrection life and in gratitude have begun life in Christ to his glory.*

This aspect of baptism—the end of life without God and the beginning of life with God—is explicitly stated in Colossians 2:11-12. Like the Galatians passage, this rebuts an attempt to persuade Christians to submit to circumcision,* but adopts a different approach by emphasizing the needlessness of the rite of Israel, for in Christ they have suffered a more drastic circumcision: "In him (Christ) you were circumcised with a spiritual circumcision, by putting off the body* of flesh* in the circumcision of Christ." Apparently, Paul depicts Christ's death as a circumcision; cutting off the foreskin of the male sex organ is replaced by the tearing of Christ's whole fleshly body, hence his death. In him that happened to us; it happened in baptism understood as our turning-to-God-in-faith. "When you were buried with him in baptism, you were also raised with him." This is not so much an advance on Paul's teaching in Romans 6 as a clarification of what he wrote there. The person who hears the gospel, heeds it, believes it and confesses it in baptism, ends the old life apart from God and begins life in the risen Christ. Colossians 2:12 makes the point: "buried with him in baptism . . . you were raised with him through faith in the power of God who raised him from the dead." Any effectiveness in baptism is due to the power of God operative "through faith." Clearly Paul is talking about conversion-baptism, a baptism that embodies both the gospel and the convert's response to it. Some find Paul's use of "sealing" (in 2 Cor 1:21) to include the latter element, as God certifies his acceptance of the human response.

Yet a third feature is inherent in baptism as Paul expounds it in Romans 6. The baptism which sets forth believers' identification with Christ in his death and resurrection, and the end of life apart from God for life in Christ, calls for renunciation of life unfit for the new age. Roman 6:4, when stripped of its parenthetical clause in the middle, reads, "We were buried with him by baptism for death . . . that we might walk in newness of life." Paul thereby gives the reason the Christian can never willfully "sin that grace may abound;" in Christ's death believers died to sin, in Christ's resurrection they rose, henceforth to live for God who redeemed them in Christ (so 2 Cor 5:15).

3. Baptism and the Spirit.

A major consequence of the rise of modern Pentecostalism and the charismatic movement is to provoke the question of the relation of the rite of baptism to baptism in the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). Most members of those groups view the baptism of the Spirit as radically distinct from baptism in water, and it is the former on which emphasis is laid. The viewpoint is characteristic of the two groups, though for different reasons (see Dunn for discussion in detail); the question is whether Paul made such a distinction.

W. H. Griffith Thomas voiced a doubt commonly heard today: "How can that which is physical effect that which is spiritual?" (Griffith Thomas, 379). From that standpoint some interpreters hold that passages such as Romans 6:1-11; Galatians 3:26-27; Colossians 2:11-12; Ephesians 5:26; and Titus 3:5-7, which all conjoin baptism with "spiritual effects," refer to Spirit baptism, not water baptism, thereby eliminating most of Paul's references to baptism. But such questioning of the relationship between the physical and the spiritual logically draws into question the Pauline emphasis on the incarnation (e.g., Rom 8:3) and the physical death of Christ which results in "the redemption of the body" (Rom 8:23). The corollary of this argument for baptism as solely the work of the Spirit without baptism in water is to make Pauline Christians too ethereal and unrelated to early Christian practices (cf., e.g., Acts 18:8; 1 Pet 3:21).

Galatians 3:26-27 associates baptism with union with Christ. Now Paul makes it clear that people can be "in Christ" only through the Holy Spirit. That is plainly stated in Romans 8:9-11, and is assumed in 2 Corinthians 3:17-19. Clearly Paul associates baptism and unity with Christ and all that follows from it on the basis that for him baptism in water and baptism in the Spirit are ideally one, just as conversion and baptism are part of one process. Accordingly, the sole reference in Paul's letters to baptism in the Spirit (1 Cor 12:13) must surely relate to baptism in the sense that Paul elsewhere uses it: "In one Spirit we were all baptized to one body," and in that body all racial and social barriers are done away. Precisely that is stated in Galatians 3:26-28 in relation to baptism.

The latter half of 1 Corinthians 12:13 is generally rendered, "We were all made to drink of one Spirit" (see Cuming for a reference to baptism in this text). In all likelihood that has in mind the outpouring of the Spirit in the last times (Is 32:15; Joel 2:28-29) and could be paraphrased, "we all received the floodtide of the Spirit" (i.e., we were saturated with the Spirit). That this experience belongs to the beginning of the Christian life hints at an important consideration: conversion is not only the result of human decision, but is enabled by the Spirit. He is not only the fruit of conversion-baptism; he is the real baptizer, the agent who makes baptism what it was meant to be: entry upon life in Christ.

A similar line of understanding is in Titus 3:5, which the NRSV renders "He saved us, not because of any works of righteousness that we had done, but according to his mercy, through the water of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit." The last clause may be rendered, "He saved us . . . through the washing characterized by the new beginning and renewal which the Holy Spirit effects." The text continues, "This Spirit he poured out on us richly," which is an echo of Joel 2:28.

4. Baptism and the Church.

From the beginning baptism in the NT communities was understood as a corporate as well as an individual rite. We have already seen that for Paul this understanding of baptism was axiomatic, and at Corinth it is appealed to as a protest against individualism taken to extreme. To be baptized to Christ was to be baptized to the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:13; see Body of Christ). In Galatians 3:26-27 Paul's thought immediately passes from that of "putting on" Christ in baptism to that of the body in which all distinctions among human beings lose their power. The same connection is apparent in the appeal for behavior worthy of baptism in Colossians 3:5-15, in which the baptismal imagery found in Galatians 3:27 is extensively applied: "You stripped off the old nature and put on the new, which is being renewed . . . according to the image* of its creator [i.e., Christ as the perfect image of God], where there is no longer Greek or Jew, circumcised or uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave* and free, but Christ is all and in all."

The question not infrequently has been raised, "To which church does baptism give entry: to the local or universal church, to the visible or the invisible church?" The question is essentially modern. It would have been inconceivable to Paul. The church* is the visible manifestation of the people of God, whose life is "hidden with Christ in God" (Col 3:3). Baptism is a visible act with a spiritual meaning; it is therefore well adapted to be the means of entry into a visible community of God's people and the body which transcends any one place or time. How to give satisfactory expression to the outward and inward elements, alike of baptism and of the church, is a perpetual pastoral problem; that dilemma, however, challenges believers to reform themselves according to the Word of God rather than to accept laxity of doctrine and practice.

5. Baptism and Christian Ethics.

It is surely significant that the longest exposition of baptism in Paul's letters is given for an ethical purpose (see Ethics). Romans 6:1-14 is filled with appeals for life consonant with participation in the redemption of Christ that lies at the heart of baptism:

> How can we who died to sin go on living in it? . . . We were buried with him by baptism to death . . . that we might walk in newness of life. . . . Our old self was crucified with him that we might no longer be enslaved to sin. . . . You also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus.

This appeal is most extensively developed in Colossians 2:20—3:13. Therein the fact that the believer died and rose in Christ is not only a motive for Christ-like living, but a basis to work out the baptismal pattern of dying to sin and rising to righteousness*:

> Put to death what is earthly in you. . . . Put off all such things . . . seeing that you stripped off the old nature with its practices and put on the new nature. . . . Put on therefore compassion. . . . Above all put on love.

This led G. Bornkamm to affirm that in Paul's writings, "baptism is the appropriation of the new life, and the new life is the appropriation of baptism" (Bornkamm 1958, 50). To give substance to this principle the primitive church construed a system of ethics which is reflected in the practical sections of many of the NT letters, not least in Paul's writings. To this tradition Paul refers at times, notably Romans 6:17: "Thanks be to God that although you once were slaves of sin, you became obedient from the heart to the pattern of teaching to which you were entrusted" (see Creeds). From this it is clear that the believers addressed were instructed in the elements of Christian living that follow from baptism (see further 1 Thess 4:1-7; 2 Thess 3:6, 11-13).

6. Baptism and the Kingdom of God.

The baptism of John the Baptist was essentially an eschatological* rite, anticipating the coming of the Messiah, the Day of the Lord and the kingdom* of God. The baptism of Jesus at his hands saw the inauguration of that kingdom: the heavens were opened, the Spirit descended on Jesus, the voice of God came to him, affirming him as the messianic Servant of the Lord (with Mk 1:11; cf. Ps 2:7; Is 42:1), and his service for the kingdom reached its climax in his death and resurrection. Paul understood Christian baptism as participation in that inauguration of the kingdom of God through Jesus. The baptized shares in the death and resurrection of the Lord that initiated the new age, hence the believer lives in it now. The same truth is expressed by Paul in terms of new creation; when Jesus rose from death the new creation* came into existence in him, hence Paul could say, "If anyone is in Christ there is a new creation: everything old has passed away; see, everything has become new!" (2 Cor 5:17). Christian existence is nothing less than life in the new creation.

Because this is so, the Christian life is a pilgrimage to the consummated kingdom, into which the believer enters by ultimate resurrection. So Paul states in Romans 6:5: "If we have been united with the form of his death, we shall be united with the form of his resurrection"—logically now, and finally in the day of his coming in this kingdom. That is expounded more fully in 1 Corinthians 15, the heart of which is in 1 Corinthians 15:20-28. Interestingly, this means that baptism, like the Lord's Supper,* sets the believer between the two poles of redemption—the death and resurrection of Jesus and the future coming of Jesus; standing in between them the Christian looks back to salvation accomplished, forward to salvation to be consummated, and to the risen Lord in the present for grace to persist to the goal and live worthily of such infinite love.

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; BODY OF CHRIST; CIRCUMCISION; DEATH OF CHRIST; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS; HOLY SPIRIT; IN CHRIST; LIFE AND DEATH; LORD'S SUPPER; NEW NATURE AND OLD NATURE; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; RESURRECTION; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. M. Baillie, The Theology of the Sacraments and Other Papers (New York: Scribners, 1957); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics IV, The Doctrine of Reconciliation, Part 4 (Fragment) (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1969); M. Barth, Die Taufe ein Sakrament? (Zollikon-Zürich: Evangelischer Verlag, 1951); G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (London: Macmillan, 1962); W. Bieder, "βαπτίζω κτλ," EDNT 1.192-96; G. Bornkamm, Das Ende Des Gesetzes, Paulusstudien, Gesammelte Aufsätzen I (München: Kaiser, 1958); idem, Early Christian Experience (London: SCM, 1969); idem, "Taufe und neues Leben bei Paulus (Röm. 6)," in Das Ende des Gesetzes: Paulusstudien. Gesammelte Aufsätze 1 (BET 16; 2d ed.; Munich: C. Kaiser, 1958) 34-50; R. Burnish, The Meaning of Baptism (London: SPCK, 1985); R. P. Carlson, "The Role of Baptism in Paul's Thought," Int 47 (1993) 255-66; P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Catechism: A Study in the Epistles, (Cambridge: University Press, 1940); N. Clark, An Approach to the Theology of the Sacraments (London: SCM, 1956); J. H. Crehan, Early Christian Baptism and the Creeds (London: Burns, Oates & Washburn, 1950); O. Cullmann, Baptism in the New Testament (Chicago: Regnery, 1950); G. J. Cuming, "Epotisthēmen: 1 Corinthians 12.13," NTS 27 (1981) 283-85; G. Delling, Die Zueignung des Heils in der Taufe: eine Untersuchung zum neutestamentlichen Taufen auf den Namen (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1961); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (London: SCM, 1970); W. F. Flemington, The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism (London: SPCK, 1948); P. T. Forsyth, The Church and the Sacraments (London: Independent, 1953); A. Gilmore, ed., Christian Baptism: A Fresh Attempt to Understand the Rite in Terms of Scripture, History and Theology (London: Lutterworth, 1959); W. Heitmüller, Im Namen Jesu, Eine Sprach-und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Neuen Testament, speziell zur altchristliche Taufe (FRLANT 1.2; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1903); F. J. F. Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, Part 1, The Acts of the Apostles (5 vols.; London: Macmillan, 1922-42); R. Jungkuntz, The Gospel of Baptism (St. Louis: Concordia, 1968); G. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit: A Study in the Doctrine of Baptism and Confirmation in the New Testament and the Fathers (London & New York: Longmans Green, 1951); F. J. Leenhardt, Le baptême chrétien, son origine, sa signification (Neuchâtel-Paris, 1946); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); P. C. Marcel, The Biblical Doctrine of Infant Baptism (London: James Clarke, 1953); H. G. Marsh, The Origin and the Significance of the New Testament Baptism (Manchester, 1941); D. Moody, Baptism: Foundation for Christian Unity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1967); W. Mundle, Der Glaubensbegriff des Paulus, eine Untersuchung zur Dogmengeschichte des ältesten Christentums (Leipzig: Heinsius, 1932); J. Murray, Christian Baptism (Philadelphia: Commission on Christian Education [The Orthodox Presbyterian Church], 1952); C. H. Ratschow, Die eine christliche Taufe (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1972); E. Schlink, The Doctrine of Baptism (St. Louis: Concordia, 1972); R. Schnackenburg, Baptism in the Thought of St. Paul: A Study in Pauline Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 1964); J. Schneider, Die Taufe im Neues Testament (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1952); G. Wagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries: The Problem of the Pauline Doctrine of Baptism in Romans 6:1-11 in the Light of its Religious-Historical Parallels (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1967); J. Warns, Baptism: A Study in the Original Christian Baptism (London: Paternoster, 1957); A. J. M. Wedderburn, Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology against Its Graeco-Roman Background (WUNT 1/44; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987); idem, "The Soteriology of the Mysteries and Pauline Baptismal Theology," NovT 29 (1987) 53-72; R. E. O. White, The Biblical Doctrine of Initiation (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1960); World Council of Churches, One Lord, One Baptism (London: SCM, 1960); idem, Baptism, Eucharist, Ministry (Geneva: WCC, 1982); J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology:

Its Origins and Early Development (Nijmegen: Dekker & Van de Vegt, 1962).

G. R. Beasley-Murray

BARNABAS

Barnabas is a Greek name interpreted by Luke as huios paraklēseōs in Acts 4:36 and variously translated as "son of consolation" (KJV), "son of exhortation" or "son of encouragement" (RSV, JB, NIV). Barnabas was the affectionate nickname of a Levite named Joses, or Joseph (Acts 4:36), who became one of Paul's closest colleagues. This use of "son" to indicate a person's character was a common Semitic idiom. However, reconstructing its Hebrew or Aramaic original has proven difficult. "Son of Nebo" (Gk Barnebon) has been suggested by some, but most see the name coming from "son" (bar) "of prophecy" (nᵉḇû 'â; cf. Heb nāḇî', "prophet"). The Greek paraklēsis, which Luke uses in his translation, effectively describes the exhorting, proclaiming functions of the prophet. And this is the sort of man Barnabas was. In Acts 13:1 "prophet and teacher" describes him and a list of other Christian leaders. In Lystra (Acts 14:12) Barnabas is even called "Zeus" by pagan worshippers. In Acts 14:14 he is listed along with Paul as an apostle.*

1. Background
2. Ministry with Paul
3. Writings

1. Background.

Barnabas had originally come from Cyprus (Acts 4:36) and settled in Jerusalem.* His strong Jewish roots as a Levite (Acts 4:36) and his Hellenistic background in the Jewish diaspora* gave him a background similar to Paul's, whose close friend he would become. Along with people like Stephen, Barnabas represents the large number of Hellenistic Jews who had migrated back to Jerusalem. Luke reminds us that during both Jesus' crucifixion and Pentecost many Hellenistic Jews were in the city. Barnabas was one of these. An early tradition stemming from Eusebius (who cites Clement of Alexandria, Hist. Eccl. 1.11.12; 2.1.1) says that Barnabas was one of the Seventy sent out by Jesus (Lk 10). But this is impossible to confirm.

Barnabas owned land in Jerusalem. His first appearance in the NT shows him among the earliest converts, selling his parcel of land and giving the proceeds to the apostles (Acts 4:36). He quickly became a highly admired and respected leader within this circle. When, after the death of Stephen, many of the Hellenists fled north (Acts 8:1), Barnabas stayed in Jerusalem with the apostles.

We also know that Barnabas had family connections in Jerusalem. His cousin (Gk anepsios, Col 4:10, as cousin, not his "sister's son" or nephew, so KJV) was John Mark whose mother, Mary, lived in Jerusalem and hosted the church in her home (Acts 12:12). This explains Barnabas's sympathy for John Mark when the young man turned back during Paul's first missionary tour (Acts 13:13; cf. 15:36-41).

2. Ministry with Paul.

Paul and Barnabas became close associates in the work of ministry. Their shared background in the diaspora and their conservative training as respectively Pharisee and Levite may have made them ready candidates for joint ministry.

2.1. Early Association. When Paul returned to Jerusalem after his conversion and lengthy stay in Arabia, the apostles were understandably cautious about him. But as Ananias had brought Paul into the Christian fellowship at Damascus, so Barnabas trusted the integrity of Paul's conversion (see Conversion and Call) and became his advocate among the Jerusalem leaders (Acts 9:27). With the help of Barnabas Paul was invited into the center of the church's life.

After fifteen days (Gal 1:18) Paul set sail from Caesarea to return to Tarsus while Barnabas remained in Jerusalem. But the church was growing rapidly, especially among the Greeks and Hellenistic Jews, and soon a Christian church was thriving in the city of Syrian Antioch.* The apostles dispatched Barnabas to travel to Antioch and to pastor the fellowship there (Acts 11:22). Under his guidance the church grew even more, with Barnabas respected "as a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and faith" (Acts 11:24). Since Tarsus was nearby and since Paul had become well known in the regions of Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:21-24), Barnabas found Paul and invited him to join the work in Antioch. Together Paul and Barnabas co-pastored the church there for one year (Acts 11:26).

Barnabas also traveled with Paul on the so-called famine visit to Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30). Antioch was the third-largest city in the Roman Empire (next to Rome and Alexandria) and its church, no doubt the wealthiest yet, determined to share its riches with the poorer Christians of Judea. The visit was uneventful, unless of course we allow that Galatians 2:1-10 describes one episode during the visit. This seems appropriate (hence: the South Galatian theory) since both trips are in response to a revelation (Gal 2:2; Acts 11:27-28) and fit well chronologically (see Chronology). Further, Galatians 2:1-10 seems an inadequate parallel to Acts 15. This means that Barnabas witnessed firsthand the dissension concerning circumcision* and, at least at this point, stood with Paul (Gal

2:9). The same cannot be said for another episode which took place after Paul and Barnabas had returned home to Antioch. Peter came to Antioch and mixed freely with the Gentile* Christians; but he withdrew from having fellowship with them when a conservative delegation from Jerusalem appeared (Gal 2:11-13). Worse yet, Barnabas was, in the words of Paul, "carried away by their insincerity" (Gal 2:13). Barnabas was a man with a mind of his own, and it probably surprised Paul to see his colleague stand against him on this still-debated issue of Gentile circumcision.

*2.2. Missionary Travels. Following the famine visit, Acts 13 tells us that the leadership at Antioch had grown (now to include Simeon, Lucius and Manaen, Acts 13:1). Barnabas and Paul (Paul's precedence is not suggested in the text) were commissioned to travel west as missionaries.

2.2.1. The First Tour. The decision to sail to Cyprus may have been influenced by Barnabas since it was his home and he would have known the island well. John Mark's presence in Acts 12:25 and 13:5 implies that he had been in and around Antioch all along and had teamed up with Barnabas and Saul. But when Barnabas and Paul, after their arrival in Pamphylia, decided to leave Perga and climb the mountains toward Antioch of Pisidia, John Mark turned back. Barnabas's later defense of John Mark would prove to be the decision that would separate Barnabas from Paul on subsequent journeys. During this first tour Paul turned out to be the spokesperson for the company, often engaging synagogues in vigorous discussion. Even so, Barnabas was given recognition (and even a divine title in Lystra, Acts 14:12), but he never became the target of violence or stoning.

2.2.2. The Jerusalem Council. Following the first trip west, Barnabas accompanied Paul to Jerusalem* in order to settle the now divisive issue of the Law* and circumcision.* Barnabas is given equal respect with Paul (Acts 15:12) and perhaps his word, as that of a convert and leader prior to Paul, carried important weight. Barnabas was a disciple of the Jerusalem church who was now reporting to his mentors.

2.2.3. The Second Tour. The second tour witnessed the rupture of Barnabas's relation with Paul. Barnabas wanted to give John Mark another chance, but Paul refused (Acts 15:36-41). Luke uses discretion when he writes, "And there was a sharp disagreement (paroxysmos), so that they separated from each other" (Acts 15:39). Once again Barnabas had stood his ground and while Paul assembled a new entourage, Barnabas and John Mark returned to Cyprus where Luke lets their story fall silent.

It seems clear that Paul, Barnabas and John Mark shared a longer working relationship than Acts implies. Paul's reference to Barnabas in 1 Corinthians 9:6 shows not only that the Corinthians knew Barnabas but that Paul continued to respect him. Calvin and Luther were convinced that 2 Corinthians 8:18-19 also referred to Barnabas: "With him (Titus) we are also sending the brother who is famous among all the churches for his preaching of the gospel." Likewise, the mention of John Mark in Philemon 24 and 2 Timothy 4:11 shows that Paul and this younger disciple were later reconciled.

3. Writings.

Tertullian seems to have been the first to suggest that Barnabas wrote the anonymous Epistle to the Hebrews. This claim has merit inasmuch as the letter shows remarkable interest in the details of the Temple, an interest that would befit a Levite such as Barnabas. But his authorship of Hebrews cannot be proven.

*3.1. The Epistle of Barnabas. There also exists a letter called The Epistle of Barnabas (collected among the writings of the Apostolic Fathers) which Origen (Contra Celsum 1.63) and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 2.6, 7) both accepted as canonical since they were persuaded that Barnabas wrote it. Codex Sinaiticus even contains a complete copy of the letter, placing it after Revelation. But scholars today assign the letter to the second century (usually c. 132-35) and have found it difficult to associate it with Barnabas since the text nowhere even mentions his name.

See also ANTIOCH ON THE ORONTES; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; MISSION; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, "Barnabas in Galatians," JSNT 2 (1979) 61-70; P. Benoit, "La deuxième visite de S. Paul à Jerusalem," Bib 40 (1959) 778-92; S. P. Brock, "BARNABAS: HYIOS PARAKLESEOS," JTS 25 (1974) 93-98; F. F. Bruce, Men and Movements in the Primitive Church: Studies in Early Non-Pauline Christianity (Exeter: Paternoster, 1979) 49-85; idem, The Acts of the Apostles (3d ed. rev. and enlarged; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); H. Evans, "Barnabas the Bridge-Builder," ExpT 89 (1977/78) 248-50; B. Gärtner, "Paulus und Barnabas in Lystra. Zu Apg 14,8-15," SEÅ 27 (1962) 83-93; E. Haenchen, Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); R. A. Kraft, Barnabas and the Didache, vol. 3, The Apostolic Fathers, ed. R. M. Grant (New York: Nelson, 1965).

G. M. Burge

BASIC PRINCIPLES. See ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD.

BAUR, F. C. See PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS.

BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING

The four terms benediction, blessing, doxology and thanksgiving and are used in the Pauline letters to describe a range of joyful responses to God's* gracious saving activity in creation* and redemption.* God's action in Christ* is that of grace*; our response should be one of gratitude. Blessing, thanksgiving, benediction and doxology describe that human response.

1. Benediction
2. Blessing
3. Doxology
4. Thanksgiving

1. Benediction.

Although the term benediction has been used in a variety of ways, in recent Pauline study it has come to refer to the apostle's* (opening and closing) greetings in which he indicates his deep prayerful concern (see Prayer) for his readers. Paul's benedictions are both affirmations regarding the grace and peace* of God in which they already participate and (wish-) prayers that they may appreciate and experience these blessings more fully. There is a difference of opinion as to the origin of these stylized expressions—the LXX, early Christian worship* or the sermon.

1.1. Opening Benedictions. Paul's opening salutations or benedictions (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; etc.) remain basically unchanged throughout his letters. They consist of three parts: (1) mention is made of the "grace" and "peace" which the apostle desires, (2) his readers ("you") to know and appreciate more fully, and finally (3) the source of these blessings is spelled out (usually "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"). With deep prayerful concern, the apostle desires that his readers may apprehend more fully the grace of God in which they already stand (cf. Rom 5:2) and the relationship of peace which God has established with them. At the same time Paul may be urging his readers "to renewed Christian living under grace appropriate to the immediate circumstances" (Wiles).

1.2. Closing Benedictions. Paul's concluding benedictions have a general uniformity of phraseology, structure and position (Rom 16:20, 24; Gal 6:18; Eph 6:24; etc.), although they can vary, from the shortest form ("The grace of the Lord Jesus be with you," 1 Cor 16:24) to the long "trinitarian" form of 2 Corinthians 13:14. These benedictions bring the letter to a definitive conclusion and correspond formally to the final wish of the secular letter ("Farewell!"; see Letters, Letter Forms). The concluding benediction, which often picks up the introductory greeting with its reference to the grace of God, also gives expression to Paul's strong desire and strikes a note of confidence.

2. Blessing.

Although the language of blessing (the eulog- word group) occurs sixty-eight times in the NT, the concept receives less prominence here than in the OT where it had considerable significance. The eulog- word group is used by the Synoptics (esp. Luke), Paul and Hebrews in relation to God's saving work in Christ. According to Galatians 3:8-9, 14, the blessing promised to Abraham* has been fulfilled in Paul's gospel with believing Gentiles* being justified (see Justification) by faith* and receiving the gift of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), while in Ephesians 1:3 "every spiritual blessing" is a comprehensive expression to designate the whole of God's saving work in Christ (Eph 1:4-14; cf. Rom 15:29; see Salvation). Most instances of the word group in Paul, however, refer to the human response of praising God for his manifold blessings, especially his work of salvation, and these are the focus of attention in this article. All eight NT examples of eulogētos ("blessed," which renders the Hebrew bārûḵ), five of which appear in Paul, are used in this way. They are instances of "declarative praise" (C. Westermann), where the writer expresses his simple and joyous response (see Joy) to a definite act of God that has been experienced. Paul's eulogies do not express a wish; they describe a fact ("Blessed is God"), as he proclaims that God is the source of blessing.

2.1. Introductory Blessings. Using a typically OT and Jewish prayer* form denoting praise (cf. the doxological conclusions to the books of the Psalter: Ps 41:13; 72:19-20; etc.), Paul introduces two of his letters (2 Cor 1:3-4; Eph 1:3-14; cf. 1 Pet 1:3-5) with an introductory blessing or eulogy (eulogētos, "blessed"). While his introductory thanksgivings focus on God's work in the lives of others, his eulogies praise God for blessings in which he himself participates. The formula with a Jewish background was apparently more apt when he himself came within the circle of blessing.

In 2 Corinthians 1:3-4, an intensely personal paragraph, Paul praises the God of Israel* who is now known to him as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." He is the merciful Father from whom all compassion comes, and this has been demonstrated in a marvelous way by his mighty intervention at a time of extreme need in the apostle's life (cf. 2 Cor 1:8-11).

Ephesians 1:3-14 is a eulogy, or blessing, of considerable length in which Paul praises God for his wide-ranging blessings "in Christ." Using highly exalted language in a long sentence he explains what this means by reference to election, adoption, God's will, his grace, redemption, etc. Here is a profound example of "declarative praise."

2.2. Short Eulogies. On three occasions in Paul's letters, but nowhere else in the NT, short interjections of praise appear (Rom 1:25; 9:5; 2 Cor 11:31). The nearest parallel is the well-known rabbinic interjection after the name of God (e.g., "the Holy One, blessed be he . . ."). Each has the same basic form, "Blessed is . . . for ever"—God is praised as Creator (Rom 1:25) and as the Father of the Lord Jesus (2 Cor 11:31), and Messiah is praised as the one who is [God] over all (Rom 9:5).

2.3. Other References to Blessing. The language of "blessing" occurs in 1 Corinthians 10:16 with reference to the cup at the Lord's Supper* over which the prayer of thanksgiving is offered to God, while in 1 Corinthians 14:16 "bless" refers to praising God in tongues* within the assembly at worship.

3. Doxology.

Doxologies are short, spontaneous ascriptions of praise to God which frequently appear as concluding formulae to prayers, hymnic expressions (see Hymns) and sections of Paul's letters. Their basic structure is threefold. First, the person to whom praise is ascribed is mentioned ("to our God and Father," Phil 4:20). Then follows the word of praise, usually doxa ("glory," or an equivalent), and finally, the doxology concludes with a temporal description, normally an eternity formula ("for ever and ever"). In most cases the doxology is followed by "amen."

The first element in these NT ascriptions of praise is the most variable: the one to whom glory* is given may be expressed by a relative pronoun ("whom," Gal 1:5; "him," Rom 11:36), a Greek participial expression ("God who is able to strengthen you," Rom 16:25) or a simple noun ("the King of the ages," 1 Tim 1:17). The ascription in Philippians 4:20 is particularly appropriate: Paul ascribes glory "to our God and Father." At Philippians 4:19 he used the intensely personal expression "my God" to assure the Philippians that his God would act on his behalf to fulfill all their needs. Now he changes to the plural "our" as he unites himself with his converts in this ascription of praise.

The second element of the doxology is the ascription of "glory" (honor, greatness or power*) which properly belongs to God and is, therefore, rightly ascribed to him. In the OT doxa was primarily the brightness or radiance of God's presence. To give God glory is not to add something to him; rather, it is an active acknowledgment or extolling of what he is or has already done (Ps 29:2; 96:8). Although many doxologies contain no verb, the indicative "is" or "belongs" is presupposed: the doxology is an affirmation rather than a wish. So in Galatians 1:5 glory belongs to God for it was in accordance with his will that the "Lord Jesus Christ . . . gave himself for our sins to set us free from the present evil age."

The third feature of Paul's doxologies is the temporal expression "for ever and ever" (literally, "to the ages of the ages"). This eternity formula, which is unique to the NT (cf. Gal 1:5; 1 Tim 1:17; 2 Tim 4:18), is a more emphatic variation of the common LXX expression which means "for all eternity" in an unlimited sense (cf. Ps 84:5). Paul's ascription of glory to God is not restricted to "this age" but belongs to "the age to come" as well. The spontaneous endorsement of the doxology in Philippians 4:20 is uttered in the "amen" which follows, a response uttered on solemn occasions in the OT to confirm a curse* or adjuration, to accept a blessing or to associate oneself with a doxology. Each of the doxologies which conclude the first four books of the OT psalter (Ps 41:13; 72:19; 89:52; 106:48) ends with an "amen," while prayers and doxologies in the NT are strengthened and endorsed by it (Rom 1:25; Gal 1:5). The "amen" makes it clear that Paul's ascription of praise is not simply a matter of the lips, but is the spontaneous response of his whole being. Elsewhere he strikingly connects believers' response of "amen" to the faithfulness of God who has said yes to all his promises in Christ (2 Cor 1:20).

4. Thanksgiving.

Paul mentions the subject of thanksgiving in his letters more often, line for line, than any other Hellenistic author, pagan or Christian. The eucharisteō word group turns up forty-six times in the Pauline corpus and appears in many important contexts of every letter except Galatians and Titus. The apostle's thanksgiving terms consistently express the notion of gratitude which finds outward, and often public, expression in thanksgiving. By mentioning what God has graciously done in his Son (see Son of God), other Christians are encouraged to thank him also. As thanksgivings abound, so God is glorified (2 Cor 4:15; cf. 2 Cor 1:11).

Pauline thanksgiving approximates what we understand by "praise," for it is broader than the expression of gratitude for personal benefits received. The apostle regularly gave thanks for God's graces effected in the lives of others. Thanksgiving is a response to God's saving activity in creation* and redemption.* It is always the second word, never the first.

4.1. Introductory Paragraphs. The most significant Pauline references to thanksgiving occur in the opening paragraphs where the apostle, sometimes in conjunction with his associates, gives thanks to God for the progress in faith,* love* and hope* of his readers within the Gentile mission* (Rom 1:8; 1 Cor 1:4; 2 Cor 1:11; Eph 1:16; Phil 1:3; Col 1:3, 12; 1 Thess 1:2; cf. 1 Thess 2:13; 3:9; 2 Thess 1:3; cf. 2 Thess 2:13; Philem 4). These paragraphs, which open with a statement of thanksgiving to God, have an epistolary function (see Letters, Letter Forms), that is, they introduce and present the main themes of their letters, usually setting the tone and atmosphere and previewing the content. Many have a didactic function so that either by fresh teaching* or recall to instruction previously given the apostle sets forth theological matters he considers important (see esp. Col 1:9-14). An exhortatory purpose is also present in several of these passages (e.g., Phil 1:9-11). The thanksgivings and petitions which are included give evidence of the apostle's deep pastoral and apostolic concern for the readers (see Pastor).

At the same time Paul reports his actual thanksgivings and actual petitions for the readers. The thanksgivings are directed to God (1 Cor 1:4; 1 Thess 1:2; note "my God" at Rom 1:8; Phil 1:3) who is known to Paul as the "Father of Jesus Christ" (cf. Col 1:3), and they are offered "always" (1 Cor 1:4; Phil 1:4) or "unceasingly" (1 Thess 1:2; 2:13), expressions which refer not to continual prayer* but to the apostle's remembrance of them in his regular times of prayer.

Paul gives thanks for the readers, some of whom were well known to him (the Philippians,* Corinthians* and Thessalonians*), others who had been converted through the ministry of an associate (the Colossians*), while others were outside the sphere of his previous ministry (the Romans*).

The grounds for Paul's thanksgivings were manifold. Frequently the early Christian triad of faith, love and hope (1 Thess 1:2, 3; 2 Thess 1:3; etc.) was the immediate cause, with the prior activity of God being the final cause: the Thessalonians' election (1 Thess 1:4; cf. 2 Thess 2:13-14), God's good work in the Philippians (Phil 1:6), his amazing, gracious activity in Christ in the lives of the Corinthians (1 Cor 1:4-9), and his fitting the Colossians for a share in an eternal inheritance (Col 1:12-14). Particularly striking is the connection between Paul's giving of thanks and the gospel. The outworking of faith, love and hope shows that the gospel has come to the readers dynamically (1 Thess 1:3-5), that they had been called through the gospel (2 Thess 2:14), had the testimony to Christ confirmed in their midst (1 Cor 1:6), had shown their active participation in the gospel (Phil 1:5) or received a hope that was integral to that gospel (Col 1:5). Clearly God had been mightily at work in his gospel.

4.2. Colloquial Uses. Three examples of the verb eucharisteō ("give thanks") express gratitude at a conversational level: Romans 16:4, where Paul is grateful to Priscilla and Aquila for risking their lives on his account (cf. 1 Cor 1:14; 14:18).

4.3. Thanksgivings Said over Food. On six occasions in Paul's letters thanksgiving over food is mentioned, including the reference to Jesus' prayer of thanks over the bread at the Last Supper (1 Cor 11:24; see Lord's Supper). At Romans 14:6 both the Christian who eats meat and the one who abstains do so to the Lord,* for both give thanks to God over their meals (see Food). In 1 Corinthians 10:30 (cf. 1 Tim 4:3, 4) the note of gratitude is struck by Christians who offer their prayer of thanksgiving, recognizing that "the earth is the Lord's and everything in it" (1 Cor 10:26, from Ps 24:1).

4.4. Exhortations to Thanksgiving. Exhortations to thanksgiving appear often in the Pauline letters, particularly in Colossians. Whether private or public, such thanksgiving is to be offered joyfully "in all circumstances" (1 Thess 5:18), for along with prayer and rejoicing this is God's will. Thanksgiving should be the accompaniment of every activity (Col 3:17). A "thankful attitude" (Col 3:15) is inculcated, and it will show itself outwardly and corporately as the readers "sing psalms, hymns and spiritual songs with gratitude" (Col 3:16; see Hymns). In Ephesians 5:20 the continuity of thanksgiving ("at all times"), its corporate nature (Eph 5:19) and the fact that it is the proper outcome of those who are filled with the Spirit (Eph 5:18) are stressed, while in Colossians 2:7 firmness and strength of faith, coupled with thanksgiving, describe the Christian life.

Thanksgiving is regularly and intimately joined together with petitionary prayer (Col 4:2; Phil 4:6). Paul's own petitions for his readers were often tied in with his thanks to God for them (cf. Phil 1:3-6, 9-11). Christian thanksgiving stands in contrast with coarse vulgarity and flippancy of speech (Eph 5:4). Lips given to thanking God should not be used for language that dishonors his name.

4.5. Thanksgivings in Didactic Contexts. The giving of thanks to God should have been the response of all men and women on the basis of their knowledge of him as Creator (Rom 1:21). But they failed to recognize his lordship and glorify him: they were "ungrateful" (cf. 2 Tim 3:2). By contrast, as thanksgivings increase among believers so God is glorified (2 Cor 4:15; cf. 2 Cor 1:11). These may be offered for a variety of reasons, not least for the generosity shown by fellow Christians (2 Cor 9:11, 12).

4.6. Short Expressions of Thanksgiving. "Thanks be to God" is a short expression which occasionally appears in Paul's letters, sometimes as a spontaneous outburst for some great blessing which the apostle or his readers have received from God. Twice they function as introductory thanksgivings (1 Tim 1:12; 2 Tim 1:3), while the remaining instances occur at pivotal points in the letters denoting a change of direction in the apostle's argument (e.g., in a concluding section: Rom 7:25; 1 Cor 15:57; 2 Cor 9:15; and to begin a new theme: 2 Cor 2:14; 8:16). These short expressions of gratitude are like eulogies—examples of "declarative praise."

The grounds for the offering of thanks are wide-ranging: from the personal expression of gratitude offered to Christ for showing mercy* to Paul (1 Tim 1:12), to the triumph* over sin* and death which Christ has effected on behalf of his people (1 Cor 15:54-55, 57; cf. Rom 7:25; see Life and Death) and to the ultimate gift of God's Son (2 Cor 8:16; cf. 2 Cor 8:9).

See also HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; PRAYER; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. G. Champion, Benedictions and Doxologies in the Epistles of Paul (Oxford: published privately, 1934); R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus in der frühen Christenheit (SUNT 5; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967); T. Y. Mullins, "Benediction as a NT Form," AUSS 15 (1977) 59-64; P. T. O'Brien, Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul (NovTSup 49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); idem, "Thanksgiving within the Structure of Pauline Theology," in Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to Professor F. F. Bruce, ed. D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980) 50-66; W. Schenk, Der Segen im Neuen Testament (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1967); C. Westermann, Blessing in the Bible and the Life of the Church (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); G. P. Wiles, Paul's Intercessory Prayers (SNTSMS 24; Cambridge: University Press, 1974).

P. T. O'Brien

BENEFACTOR. See FINANCIAL SUPPORT; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL.

BINDING OF ISAAC. See DEATH OF CHRIST; SACRIFICE, OFFERING.

BLESSING. See ABRAHAM; BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING.

BOASTING. See ABRAHAM; CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; LAW; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE; WISDOM; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BODY

The term sōma ("body") occurs in the Pauline letters a total of ninety-one times, with a rich diversity of meanings. The bulk of the references to sōma in the Pauline letters are expressions of the body/member(s) analogy, particularly as an image of a Christian congregation (notably in Rom 12:4-5; 1 Cor 10:16-17; 12:12-27). In an important modification to the analogy, this body of Christ (see Body of Christ) is described in cosmic terms and united under the headship* of the Lord* Jesus himself (Eph 1:23; 2:16; 4:4, 12-16; 5:23; Col 1:18, 24; 2:19; 3:15). These important theological ideas are largely expressive of the corporate dimension of the somatic metaphor; there is, however, a more personal dimension to the use of sōma in the Pauline letters which is foundational to these ecclesiastical extrapolations which are based upon it. Insofar as these personal references to sōma reflect Paul's teaching concerning the ultimate hope of the individual believer (albeit always within the context of the corporate community), they overlap with his eschatological beliefs of the resurrection.* Paul's use of sōma in this sense is thus an important feature of his eschatology,* essential to his teaching concerning the resurrection and integral to his understanding of salvation* and redemption* in Christ.* The granting of this resurrection body is so timed as to coincide with the parousia of Jesus Christ. As Paul puts it in Romans 8:23, Christians eagerly "wait for adoption, the redemption of our bodies" (NRSV; see Adoption).

1. Sōma: Focal Point of Pauline Anthropology
2. The Mortal Body
3. The Spiritual Body
4. Resurrection of the Dead or Immortality of the Soul?

1. Sōma: Focal Point of Pauline Anthropology.

A proper understanding of Paul's teaching about the body (sōma) is inescapably bound up with the larger issue of his anthropology. What is it that constitutes the human being? How do the various components associated with the human being (body, soul, spirit, flesh) fit together? In the Pauline view is humanity essentially dichotomous or (as 1 Thess 5:23 is sometimes taken to indicate) trichotomous in nature? These questions are exceedingly complex and we need not attempt to solve them here (see Psychology). They have been the subject of considerable discussion over the years with several important studies on the subject readily available (W. D. Stacey and R. H. Gundry are two notable examples). Most scholars now agree that Paul's basic anthropological stance derives from Judaism rather than from the Hellenistic world which tended to see the sōma as evil and something from which to be redeemed; in the Platonic world the sōma was, to cite a well-known Orphic phrase, "a prison-house for the soul (psychē)."

Yet even here the issue of background is not as simple as it might first appear, for R. Jewett argues that much of Paul's anthropological teaching arises directly out of his contact with his Hellenistic (Gnostic?) opponents. In effect, Jewett asserts, Paul borrows many of the terms and concepts of his adversaries in the course of his letters to his churches—the "wall of separation" between Greek and Jewish anthropology rapidly breaks down as a result. This is not an unreasonable thesis, although the extent to which Jewett pursues it is perhaps unwarranted. In any event, the overlap between sōma and psychē in Paul's teaching will not sustain the rigid dualism inherent within much Greek thought of the time. As E. Best remarks, "Man cannot be divided into an 'I' and a 'non-I', a soul and a body; he is a unity and can be regarded as 'body' or as 'soul' " (Best, 217).

2. The Mortal Body.

At several points Paul uses the term sōma as a shorthand expression for the physical body, the material stuff of human existence which is subject to decay and death (see Life and Death) and hence, by definition, mortal. The actual phrase "mortal body" (thnēton sōma) appears only twice in Paul (Rom 6:12 and 8:11, where it is plural). It is also implied twice in a highly stylized passage contrasting the mortal with the immortal (1 Cor 15:53, 54; cf. 2 Cor 5:4). In both instances it is still the body of human beings which is in view. Only rarely does Paul apply the term sōma to other physical bodies. In 1 Corinthians 15:37-40 it is used to describe a variety of physical bodies within the created order (grains of wheat, animals, sun, moon, stars, etc.), and in Colossians 2:17 it is contrasted with shadows (skia) and bears the sense of "substance" or "reality." In 1 Corinthians 15:47-49 the creation imagery of Genesis 2:7 is brought into play as a means of highlighting the mortality of humankind. Here Paul emphasizes that human beings are created "from dust" (ek gēs choïkos), contrasting this mortal existence in Adam with the heavenly one in Christ.

It is sometimes difficult to make sharp distinctions between sōma and sarx ("flesh"*) as terms of human mortality, although the latter is almost always used negatively by Paul to describe the physical side of human beings as they are driven by purely human concerns and interests. Just to demonstrate how fluid the use of terms sarx and sōma can be at times, it is worth noting that in 2 Corinthians 4:11 Paul describes the faithful as manifesting the life of Jesus in "our mortal flesh" (en tē thnētē sarki hēmōn), and in Colossians 1:22 Christ's act of redemption is described as the reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation) brought about in "his body of flesh" (en tō sōmati tēs sarkos autou). Most notable of all is the ease with which the apostle moves from his discussion of sōma in 1 Corinthians 15:35-38 to insert a (somewhat distracting) reference to sarx in 1 Corinthians 15:39, and then goes back to the use of sōma in 1 Corinthians 15:42-44. In the main, however, the sarx acts independently of God and his Spirit,* motivated by a spirit of independence and rebellion, captivated by sin* and ultimately under the eschatological judgment* of God. In other words, here the ethical contrast operative in Paul is not so much between sōma and pneuma, but between sarx and pneuma; the latter pair are presented as mutually exclusive realms in which human beings conduct themselves.

One final question about the mortal body is worth posing. Was the human body originally created by God to be immortal (see Immortality)? Has it become tainted with mortality as a result of sin and disobedience? Much of the answer to this depends on how one interprets the Adam/Christ analogy (see Adam and Christ) of Romans 5 and the original state of humankind implied within it. These matters have perplexed NT scholars for centuries and are impossible even to begin to solve here. M. J. Harris offers a sensible summary answer when he states that Adam: "was created neither immortal (see Gn. 3:22-24) nor mortal (see Gn. 2:17) but with the potentiality to become either depending on his obedience or disobedience to God. While not created with immortality, he was certainly created for immortality" (Harris 1986, 47).

2.1.* Sōma *as an Expression of Paul's Person. Occasionally phrases containing the word sōma are used within the Pauline letters as a personal pronoun, the equivalent of "I," or "me" or "myself." Thus in 1 Corinthians 9:27 Paul describes his self-discipline in athletic terms, "I pummel my body [sōma]"; and in 1 Corinthians 13:3 he can talk about "delivering my body [sōma] to be burned" when it is quite clear that he means "himself." Similarly, in Philippians 1:20 he states his intention that "Christ will be honored in my body [sōma]," again with the sense of "in me" (see Gal 2:19-20 for an equivalent statement).

2.2.* Sōma *as an Expression of the Whole Person. Several passages use expressions containing the word sōma in such a way that it is clear Paul means "person," or "a human being in all his or her wholeness," the "self." A classic example is Romans 8:23 where Paul describes the Christian church as awaiting the future "redemption of our bodies." Paul's belief is that the whole person will ultimately be redeemed, not just their physical body (cf. Rom 8:10-11). Likewise, in Romans 12:1 Paul exhorts his readers to "present your bodies as a living sacrifice," meaning that they are to present the whole of their being to this end (cf. 1 Cor

6:12-20). Thus in many of the instances where Paul uses sōma it is possible to translate it simply with the word "person," perhaps the nearest equivalent in the English language, as in the expression "everybody" (meaning "everyone").

Two writers of significant influence in the modern theological world, R. Bultmann and J. A. T. Robinson, both follow this as a basic approach within their interpretations of sōma as it is used in Paul. It is not without significance that both of these interpreters (as well as others who follow the same line) have gone on to interpret the resurrection theologically by means of existential categories (albeit with different focal points; Bultmann focusing on the individual person and Robinson on the person within social structures). The result is that a physical (or "bodily") resurrection is thought to be neither needed nor desired; they present a dematerialized understanding of the resurrection.

However, not all would agree with the implications of such an approach and would want to defend strongly a more physical understanding of sōma, and by extension a belief in the bodily resurrection which flows from it. R. H. Gundry, for example, argues strongly that although sōma can represent the whole person, it does not necessarily mean the whole person (see M. J. Harris, 120, for discussion). Gundry asserts that the Pauline doctrine of sōma always means a physical body, pointing out that the term is always so used in the LXX (J. A. Ziesler disagrees on this key point and adduces at least seven instances where sōma has a more-than-physical sense; that is, it is occasionally used to indicate a "person"). The precise nuance of sōma in key Pauline passages is often notoriously difficult to determine. As J. D. G. Dunn remarks, "Every time σῶμα appears in Paul modern readers need to be reminded that it does not denote the physical body as such, rather a fuller reality which includes the physical but is not reducible to it" (Dunn 1988, 319).

2.3. The "Body of Sin" and the "Body of Death." Two additional phrases appear in Paul's letters and help us understand what he means by "the mortal body." In Romans 6:6 Paul uses an unusual phrase found nowhere else in the Pauline corpus, "the body of sin" (to sōma tēs hamartias; or "sinful body" RSV). This functions as the equivalent of "the flesh" and means the physical locality through which sin operates in the person. A related phrase occurs in Romans 7:24 where Paul asks the rhetorical question "Who will deliver me from this body of death [ek tou sōmatos tou thanatou toutou]?" Here too the emphasis seems to be on the physicality of Paul's existence, particularly as it is expressed in its mortality. The "body of death" is one that is doomed to die; the larger context of Romans 7 emphasizes the place that sinful disobedience has in causing this death (see Life and Death). R. Jewett posits that Paul has here taken over a phrase from his gnostic* opponents* that is not typical of Pauline theology; he also calls attention to 2 Corinthians 5:8 as a parallel, suggesting that here too Paul is citing the ideas of his opponents in the midst of his discussion.

3. The Spiritual Body.

In 1 Corinthians 15:35 Paul demonstrates how closely connected his doctrine of the resurrection is to the question of its bodily form. The verse has him paraphrasing the Corinthians' concerns in the form of two separate but essentially equivalent questions: "How are the dead raised? With what kind of body do they come?" (See Usami for a discussion of how these two rhetorical questions interlock). The actual phrase "spiritual body" (sōma pneumatikon) occurs only in 1 Corinthians 15:44, although it is implied by the use of the neuter to pneumatikon immediately following in 1 Corinthians 15:46. Precisely what Paul means by "the spiritual body" has been the subject of intense theological and philosophical debate. The comment by G. E. Ladd is a sound starting point for any serious exegetical discussion: "The 'spiritual body' of 1 Cor 15:44 is not a body made of spirit any more than the 'natural' (literally, psychical) body is a body made of psyche. However, it is a literal, real body, even though it has been adapted to the new order of existence which shall be inaugurated at the resurrection" (Ladd, 139).

3.1. The Resurrection and Disembodied Existence. In 1 Corinthians 15:35-41 Paul challenges a belief concerning the resurrection apparently held by the Corinthians. The precise nature of the so-called Corinthian heresy has been one of the most explored issues in twentieth-century NT scholarship and remains one of the most debated topics in Pauline studies. Were the adversaries Paul confronted a gnostic or protognostic group within the congregation, who were importing Greek ideas into their Christian faith? Scholarly discussion about the Corinthian opponents of Paul is extensive, but most agree that eschatological matters, including the resurrection, figured prominently within their thinking (see D. Georgi, B. Pearson, J. H. Wilson, R. Mcl. Wilson and C. K. Barrett for treatments of the Corinthian opponents). Most scholars have approached the question from the standpoint of Paul correcting an over-realized eschatology on the part of the Corinthians. Others, notably B. A. Pearson and R. A. Horsley, have argued that the Corinthians had apparently so identified the resurrection with spiritual existence that they had detached it from any physical context; the resurrection hope thereby becomes a disembodied existence, an asomatic immortality. The question is thus switched from a consideration of an over-realized eschatology as the basis for the Corinthian position; instead it understands the Corinthians to deny the bodily resurrection altogether. On balance it seems the former interpretation has more to substantiate it than the latter, although it must be admitted that the latter position allows a much more natural reading of 1 Corinthians 15:12.

The substance of Paul's correction is to assert forcefully the somatic character of the resurrection and to place this within a future context (see 3.2 below). He asserts the somatic nature of the resurrection by an appeal to analogies drawn from nature: grains of wheat (1 Cor 15:37-38); types of animals (1 Cor 15:39); celestial bodies (1 Cor 15:40-41). The substance of the argument is that in each instance God is able to produce a new order of life (resurrection) but does so in such a way that a correlation to somatic existence is maintained. The phrase translated as "bare kernel" in the RSV (gymnon kokkon) is particularly interesting and has an important parallel in Jewish rabbinic literature (b. Sanh 90b). The image of somatic nakedness also figures in 2 Corinthians 5:3 where Paul uses it to describe existence between the time of death and the granting of a resurrection body at the parousia of Christ (see Intermediate State).

Most scholars accept that the heart of Paul's resurrection belief requires the materiality of the resurrection body (sōma pneumatikon), although it is extremely difficult to know precisely what Paul envisioned this body to be like or what bodily properties he held it to have. However, some (such as Gooch) suggest that this resurrection body is ontologically the same as the disembodied person, and that the logic of Paul's eschatological teaching leads inevitably to a breakdown of the distinction between the two. Effectively the argument here (as we noted in 2.2 above) follows the suggestion of J. A. T. Robinson that the sōma is best understood as constituting "the human person in his or her totality"; a disembodied sōma is not therefore a contradiction in terms. Most scholars (including Reichenbach) would consider this argument terminological sophistry which is contrary to Paul's teaching in the main, and fails to recognize the material meaning of sōma in such passages as 1 Corinthians 15:35.

It may well be that the inability to distinguish properly between a "resurrection of the body" (which Paul clearly affirms) and a "resurrection of the flesh" (which Paul nowhere mentions) is what prompts many such theological discussions. The former gives sufficient weight to the idea of discontinuity within the somatic image while the latter sacrifices too much to the idea of continuity between this mortal body and the resurrection body. In any event, the debate is another illustration of how difficult it is to discuss the material nature of the resurrection body with any degree of precision.

3.2. The Nature of the Resurrection Body. The NT never attempts to describe the nature of Christ's resurrection body, what it looked like or what sort of physical properties it possessed; neither does it offer much detail about what the resurrection body of the believer will be like. This is not unusual in and of itself, in spite of the fact that the only contemporaneous Jewish text which attempts to address this problem in any depth is 2 Baruch 50:2—51:10. At best the NT evidence on such matters is circumstantial, largely drawn from Luke and Acts. It has been suggested on this basis that the risen Lord Jesus was not bound by the laws of physics as we know them, that he was able to materialize (and dematerialize) at will, that it was possible for the disciples to examine his body, that he ate fish and bread only for their sake, etc. The witness of the Pauline letters adds little, if anything, to such discussions. Indeed, J. D. G. Dunn suggests that Luke and Paul may have been at variance on this point: "What Luke affirms (Jesus' resurrection body was flesh and bones) Paul denies (the resurrection body is not composed of flesh and blood)!" (Dunn 1985, 74). Paul does discuss the resurrection body at some length in 1 Corinthians 15, but it is within the context of a theological debate about the nature of the resurrection body of the believers. Yet the two matters are not unrelated. As Harris states, "there is an interesting correspondence between the depiction of Christ's resurrection body in the gospels and Paul's description of the believer's spiritual body" (Harris 1983, 57).

In 1 Corinthians 15:42-49 Paul makes a crucial distinction between the "natural body" (sōma psychikon) and the "spiritual body" (sōma pneumatikon; cf. Phil 3:21). At the heart of the passage is the contrast built upon his Adam/Christ analogy in 1 Corinthians 15:44b-45, which sets forth the proper temporal relationship between the two. In effect Paul is countering a false anthropology being held by the Corinthians with one that understands the resurrection body as both future and somatic (Dunn, 1973, offers a stimulating discussion on this). On the stormy and uncharted seas of describing the resurrection body Paul is attempting to steer a middle course between the Scylla of a crass materialism (equating resurrection with the reanimation of corpses) and the Charybdis of spiritualistic immortality (denying materiality altogether). To avoid the first danger he asserts that it is a spiritual body which will be resurrected; to avoid the second he asserts that it is a spiritual body which will be resurrected. R. J. Sider correctly observes that the use of the psychikos anthrōpos/pneumatikos anthrōpos contrast in 1 Corinthians 2:14-15 lends support to a material understanding of the sōma pneumatikon.

How the maintenance of identity and the preservation of individuality are retained within the resurrection body of the believer are matters which are left largely unanswered by Paul, although his use of the seed analogy in 1 Corinthians 15:35-54 allows for both continuity and discontinuity between the present mortal body and the resurrected body of the believer (both Sider and Harris 1983, 125-33, discuss this at some length).

But how far dare we pursue the matter of somatic continuity? Will sexuality be an integral part of resurrection existence, or will it be an asexual existence like that of the angels? Will persons be able physically to recognize each other? How old will people be within their resurrection bodies—children, teenagers or mature adults? Will the color of hair or eyes remain the same? We may scoff at the naive simplicity of such questions, but they are inevitable given the nature of the sōma image itself. The issue of molecular continuity in the resurrection body is an even more perplexing problem, one which raises a host of new questions in our increasingly technological age. Such matters can, however, serve as a nexus between science and faith if they are allowed to do so. The fact that human beings are able to maintain a continuity even though their physical bodies undergo a constant change of cells challenges us to rethink the meaning of continuity itself (M. E. Dahl, 94, offers an interesting discussion of how physical molecular discontinuity in the present mortal life helps us understand the nature of the bodily resurrection to come). Most conservative scholars would argue that an enduring rationality, a consistency of personality and a persistence of memory are the minimum requirements for the idea of continuity to make sense.

However, Paul addresses none of these matters directly; his aims are much more modest (and all the more frustrating as a result; we would have liked him to offer more insight into these issues which puzzle us!). In short, Paul's line is to assert that the resurrection body, though continuous with the physical body, is not identical with it since it is a spiritual body; his whole argument in 1 Corinthians 15:35-44 pursues this. In the end we are forced to admit that Paul struggled with the limitations of language in the same way that we do today when it comes to describing the nature of the resurrection body. Paul himself acknowledged this, for he asserts in 1 Corinthians 2:9 (paraphrasing Is 64:4) that "what no eye has ever seen, what no ear has ever heard, what never entered the mind of man, God has prepared all that for those who love him" (Moffatt trans.).

4. Resurrection of the Dead or Immortality of the Soul?

One of the classic ways in which discussion about the resurrection has been pursued is by contrasting it with the immortality* of the soul. O. Cullmann, for instance, argued that the two formulations of future hope are mutually exclusive, representing a difference of perspective between Judaism and Hellenism about the afterlife. This either/or distinction has often been accepted as self-evident and is sometimes used polemically to distinguish the Christian hope over against that of the pagan religions of the NT period (as in Acts 17:18, 32). Indeed, in the course of his argument Cullmann contrasts attitudes to the death of Jesus with those to the death of Socrates.

However, it is now recognized that the distinction between resurrection of the body and immortality of the soul is somewhat artificial and does not take into account the teaching of some relevant first-century texts which blur the differences between the two (as Harris argues). Some of the Jewish pseudepigraphic documents, as well as the Dead Sea scrolls from Qumran,* demonstrate how difficult it is to maintain a rigid contrast on this particular point (Barrett, 1979, offers a helpful discussion of Cullmann's book).

As a case in point, the Book of Wisdom (which Paul may well have read) straddles these allegedly incompatible Jewish and Hellenistic conceptualizations of afterlife with little apparent difficulty. This is an especially important text for comparison (NA[26] lists forty-one allusions to the book within the Pauline corpus); it also offers some interesting parallels to Paul's use of the terms athanasia and aphtharsia within his teaching about the resurrection body. For instance, in Wisdom 2:23 the aim of man's creation is stated: "God created man for incorruption (aphtharsia)." At the same time, in language much more characteristic of the dualism associated with Hellenistic thought, we read in Wisdom 9:15 that "the corruptible body weighs down the soul" (phtharton gar sōma barynei psychēn). At several points within the book the idea of immortality is also communicated by means of the term athanasia (Wis 3:4; 4:1; 8:13, 17; 15:3) In short, the Wisdom of Solomon itself should make us wary of phrasing this question of afterlife in terms of a rigid choice between Hellenistic and Jewish conceptions of afterlife.

See also BODY OF CHRIST; FLESH; HOLY SPIRIT; IMMORTAL-

ITY; INTERMEDIATE STATE; LIFE AND DEATH; PSYCHOLOGY; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, "Immortality and Resurrection," in Resurrection and Immortality: Aspects of Twentieth-Century Christian Belief, ed. C. S. Duthie (London: Samuel Bagster & Sons, 1979) 68-88; E. Best, One Body in Christ (London: SPCK, 1955) 215-25; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Charles Scribners's Sons, 1951, 1955) 1.192-203; H. C. C. Cavallin, Life After Death: Paul's Argument for the Resurrection of the Dead in 1 Cor 15 (ConBNT 7,1; Lund: Gleerup, 1974); O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (London: Epworth, 1958); M. E. Dahl, The Resurrection of the Body (London: SCM, 1962); J. D. G. Dunn, "I Corinthians 15:45—Last Adam, Life-Giving Spirit," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. Smalley, (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 127-41; idem, The Evidence for Jesus (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985); idem, Romans 1-8 (WBC 38A; Waco: Word, 1988); E. E. Ellis, "II Cor 5:1-10 in Pauline Eschatology," NTS 6 (1959-60) 211-24; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); P. W. Gooch, "On Disembodied Resurrected Persons: A Study in the Logic of Christian Eschatology," RelS 17 (1981) 199-213; R. H. Gundry, Sōma in Biblical Theology (Cambridge: University Press, 1976); M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal: The Relation between Resurrection and Immortality in New Testament Teaching (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); idem, "The New Testament view of life after death," Themelios 11 (1986) 47-52; R. A. Horsley, "How can some of you say there is no resurrection of the dead? Spiritual Elitism in Corinth," NovT 20 (1978) 203-31; J. Jeremias, "Flesh and Blood Cannot Inherit the Kingdom of God," NTS 2 (1955-56) 151-59; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of Their Use in Conflict Settings (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971) 201-304; G. E. Ladd, Crucial Questions about the Kingdom of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952); R. P. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); C. F. D. Moule, "St Paul and Dualism: The Pauline Conception of the Resurrection," NTS 13 (1966-67) 106-23; B. A. Pearson, The 'Pneumatikos-Psychikos' Terminology in 1 Corinthians (Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1973); B. R. Reichenbach, "On Disembodied Resurrected Persons: A Reply," RelS 18 (1982) 225-29; J. A. T. Robinson, The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology (SBT 5; London: SCM, 1952); E. Schweizer, "σῶμα κτλ," TDNT VII.1024-94; R. J. Sider, "The Pauline Conception of the Resurrection Body in I Corinthians XV.35-54," NTS 21 (1974-75) 428-39; W. D. Stacey, The Pauline View of Man (London: Macmillan, 1956); K. Usami, " 'How are the dead raised?' (1 Cor 15, 35-58)," Bib 57 (1976) 468-93; S. Wibbing, "Body, Member, Limb," NIDNTT 1.232-38; J. H. Wilson, "The Corinthians Who Say There Is No Resurrection from the Dead," ZNW 59 (1968) 90-107; R. Mcl. Wilson, "How Gnostic Were the Corinthians?," NTS 19 (1972-73) 65-74; J. A. Ziesler, "Sōma in the Septuagint," NovT 25 (1983) 133-45.

L. J. Kreitzer

BODY OF CHRIST

The Pauline writings use the exact phrase "the body of Christ" only four times (to sōma tou Christou: Rom 7:4; 1 Cor 10:16; Eph 4:12; sōma Christou: 1 Cor 12:27). Equivalent expressions include "the body of the Lord" (1 Cor 11:27), "his body of flesh" (Col 1:22), "his glorious body" (Phil 3:21), "his body" (Eph 1:23; 5:30; Col 1:24) and "my body" (1 Cor 11:24). Closely related to the above are the terms "the body*" (1 Cor 11:29; Eph 5:23; Col 1:18; 2:19) and "one body" (Rom 12:5; 1 Cor 10:17; 12:13; Eph 2:16; 4:4; Col 3:15). These twenty-one phrases may be classified into the three uses set out in the following outline; significantly, however, they all relate to either the physical body (crucified or resurrected) of Christ* or the metaphorical body of Christ, the church.*

1. The Physical Body of Christ
2. The Body of Christ in Eucharistic Contexts
3. The Body of Christ As a Designation of the Church

1. The Physical Body of Christ.

In Romans 7:4 "the body of Christ," which is the instrument through which believers were rendered dead to and hence free from the Law,* refers to Christ's physical body in which he suffered death on the cross.* Similarly, "his body of flesh*" in Colossians 1:22 is a Hebraism (with Qumran parallels) denoting Christ's physical body, which in death became the means by which God reconciled sinners to himself: the addition "of flesh" insists, against the Colossian* heresy, on the true humanity of the incarnate Jesus. In Philippians 3:21 "his glorious body" stands in antithetical parallelism to "our lowly body" and refers to the resurrection* body with which and in which the Lord Jesus is expected to return from heaven* (cf. Phil 3:20).

2. The Body of Christ in Eucharistic Contexts.

Several times in 1 Corinthians the body concept appears in close conjunction with the eucharist, or Lord's Supper*; the texts reveal a close relationship between the physical body of Christ which was crucified and the church as the body of the risen Christ.

Thus, partaking of the cup and the bread in the eucharist means participation in the blood and the body of Christ (1 Cor 10:16), that is, in the benefits of his death and in fellowship* with him (see Dying and Rising). The strict parallelism between "the body of Christ" and "the blood of Christ" shows that the former refers to the body of Jesus surrendered in death (cf. 1 Cor 11:24) just as the latter refers to his blood shed as atoning blood (cf. 1 Cor 11:25; see Jeremias). Just as there is only one loaf at the eucharist, so those who participate jointly in the single loaf constitute a single body (1 Cor 10:17). The context, with its exhortation to shun the worship* of idols (1 Cor 10:14; see Idolatry), suggests that Paul's point in making use of the body analogy in 1 Corinthians 10:16-17 is not so much the unity of the body made up of Christians as their solidarity as one body in union with Christ which forbids a similar union with demons* (cf. 1 Cor 10:21). This, in turn, implies that the "one body" of 1 Corinthians 10:17 refers to the body of Christ, the church.

A similar shift of meaning from the crucified body of Christ to the church as the body of Christ occurs in 1 Corinthians 11:23-32. The bread at the institution of the Lord's Supper signifies or represents Christ's actual body about to be offered up on the cross (1 Cor 11:24). It follows that to eat the bread in an unworthy manner is to be guilty of "the body . . . of the Lord" (1 Cor 11:27); that this phrase refers to the crucified body of Jesus is rendered certain by its linkage (cf. 1 Cor 10:16) with "the blood [of the Lord]." But in 1 Corinthians 11:29 the expression "not discerning the body" is probably a reference, not to failure to discern in the bread of the eucharist the body of the Lord surrendered on the cross (cf. 1 Cor 11:24, 27), but the failure to recognize in the group of believers gathered at the Lord's Supper the metaphorical body of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 10:17), a failure which resulted in the shameful abuses described in 1 Corinthians 11:17-22 (Bornkamm, 190-95).

3. The Body of Christ As a Designation of the Church. This particular use of the body concept, of which two instances have already been referred to (1 Cor 10:17; 11:29), is unique to Paul in the NT writings. The issues of the origin and nature of the concept will be addressed before examining its usage in the remaining Pauline texts.

3.1. The Origin of the Concept. There have been many suggestions regarding the possible sources of Paul's "body of Christ" idea. (1) The previously fashionable attempt to trace it to the gnostic concept of the primal person, whose body was conceived of as cosmic (H. Schlier, E. Käsemann, R. Bultmann), is generally discarded today because of the lateness (third century A.D.) of the evidence. (2) That the temple of Asclepius in Corinth, with its votive offerings in the form of clay representations of dismembered parts of the body that have been healed, provided the catalyst for the formation of the Pauline image (A. E. Hill) is surely far-fetched. (3) That Paul's phrase "body of Christ" was constructed on the analogy of the phrase "body of Adam*" allegedly implicit in rabbinic usage (see Davies), or at least was probably influenced by the Jewish "body of Adam" idea (R. Jewett) appears doubtful, since no actual examples of the phrase "body of Adam" in rabbinical literature are forthcoming, and it is admitted that "the Jewish body of Adam idea does not provide us with an exact parallel to Paul's sōma Christou [body of Christ] concept" (Jewett, 245). (4) The view (A. E. J. Rawlinson, H. Conzelmann) that Paul derived his expression "body of Christ" from the eucharistic tradition—the sacramentally acquired share in the body of Christ in the eucharist makes the participants the body of Christ—faces the simple objection that "eating the body is not being the body" (Moule, 87). (5) The suggestion that Paul, from the concept of Israel as the bride of God (Jer 2:2) and through new-covenant theology, developed the concept of "the body of Christ" as its parallel for the new Israel, the church (Bass, 530-31), is not very likely, since the more logical line of development is from Israel as the bride of Yahweh to the church as the bride of Christ. (6) The statement that Genesis 2:24—"a man leaves his father and his mother and clings to his wife, and they become one flesh" (quoted in Eph 5:31)—"appears to provide the biblical rationale and the conceptual foundation for the Apostle's understanding, throughout his letters, of the church as the body of Christ" (Ellis, 42) calls to mind C. Chavasse's attempt to locate the origin of the Pauline phrase in the nuptial union of bridegroom and bride in the "one flesh." But F. F. Bruce thinks that "both the eucharistic . . . and the nuptial . . . applications of Paul's thought on this subject are derived from his conception of the church as the body of Christ rather than vice versa" (Bruce 1984, 69 n.141).

Rather than being attributable to a single source, the body of Christ concept is more likely the result of the interplay of several influences.

(1) The comparison of the state (polis) or world-state (cosmopolis) to a body consisting of interdependent members is a Stoic commonplace, and, as Moule (84-85) points out, close parallels to the Pauline use of the analogy are provided, for instance, by Seneca, who addresses Nero as "the soul of the republic [which] is your body" (Seneca De Clem. 1.5.1). He also speaks of Nero as the head, on whom the good health of the body, the empire, depends (Seneca De Clem. 2.2.1), and says "We are limbs of a great body" (Seneca Ep. Mor. 95.52). Philo, with a change of context, says that the High Priest's purpose in offering sacrifice for the nation is "that every age[-group] and all the parts of the nation may be welded into one and the same family as though it were a single body" (Philo Spec. Leg. 3.131).

(2) Paul was familiar with the Hebrew concept of "corporate personality," with its oscillation between the individual and the corporate and its notion of the inclusion of the many in the one: a figure standing at the head (e.g., Adam,* Abraham,* Noah, Moses*) can be regarded as incorporating in his own person those represented by him. It is this idea of solidarity between the one and the many, of the union between believers and Christ, that Paul emphasizes in his presentation of the church as the body of Christ. The analogy between all men and women by natural birth being "in Adam" and all believers by new birth being "in Christ"* (Rom 5:12-21; 1 Cor 15:22, 45) is an important datum of Pauline theology.

(3) The idea of solidarity between Christ and his people finds expression in the teaching of Jesus (Mk 9:37 and par.; cf. Mt 18:5; 25:40), and is clearly implied in the risen Lord's identification of himself with his persecuted people (Acts 9:4). While it is probably impossible to be certain about the precise origin(s) of the Pauline expression, it may be that it was Paul's own coinage, based on the common image of the body in popular philosophy and the Hebrew concept of corporate personality, with the words of the risen Jesus to Paul on the Damascus road providing the germ of the conception in his mind or the catalyst for the formation of the unique Pauline expression (see Kim, 252-56).

3.2. The Nature of the Concept. The body of Christ concept is plainly not used allegorically: in 1 Corinthians 12, for instance, different parts of the body do not represent different individuals or sections of the Corinthian church. It has been said that the phrase "the body of Christ" (meaning the church) "is used realistically, ontologically, and therefore metaphorically or symbolically or analogically" (Richardson, 256-57 n.1), but it is more usual to describe its use as either realistic/ontological or analogical/metaphorical. The realistic understanding of the expression, espoused by such scholars as A. Schweitzer, who thought of the elect as coming into corporeal union with the risen Christ, and J. A. T. Robinson, for whom the church is identified as literally the resurrected body of Christ, violates the clear indication of a comparison given in Romans 12:4-5 and 1 Corinthians 12:12 ("just as . . . so") and, besides, ignores Paul's careful distinction between Christ's resurrection in the past and believers' (yet awaited) resurrection in the future. We may, therefore, with most recent Protestant interpreters, understand the body concept metaphorically, not literally and biologically or mystically.

3.3. The Concept in Paul's Usage. Two stages may be distinguished in Paul's use of the body concept in reference to the church: it is used largely as a simile in 1 Corinthians* and Romans* (the church is like a body), and as a metaphor in Colossians* and Ephesians* (the church is the body of which Christ is the head). "The advance from the language of simile in 1 Corinthians and Romans to the real interpersonal involvement expressed in the language of Colossians and Ephesians may have been stimulated by Paul's consideration of the issues involved in the Colossian heresy" (Bruce 1977, 421).

3.3.1. Earlier Letters: 1 Corinthians and Romans. In 1 Corinthians 6:15 the bodies of believers are said to be "members of Christ"; the word "members" (melē) means "bodily parts" and thus implies that believers are members of the "body" of Christ. However, Paul immediately goes on to speak of his own body as "members [plural] of Christ," which he will not turn into "members [plural] of a prostitute." This shows that here his concern is with the individual believer's relationship with the Lord, and there is no reference to believers as a corporate body.

Later in the letter Paul says to the local congregation at Corinth: "You are the body of Christ" (1 Cor 12:27; the Greek phrase has no article before either "body" or "Christ," but it means the same as if both nouns had the article—this is an instance of the grammatical rule known as "Apollonius's canon"). This metaphor comes as the summary and climax of the preceding fifteen verses (1 Cor 12:12-26), in which the character of the body concept as simile is plainly indicated by the opening statement: "For just as [kathaper] the body is one and has many members, . . . so [houtōs] also is Christ" (1 Cor 12:12; cf. NEB, "For Christ is like a single body . . ." [italics added]). Since Paul does not say "so also is the church" or even ". . . the body of Christ" but simply ". . . (the) Christ," some have derived from this a view of Christ as the whole (totus Christus) of which the various members are parts; but in view of 1 Corinthians 12:27-28 it seems better to regard Paul here as using the figure of metonymy ("Christ" for "the body of Christ") or as having omitted the intermediate logical step: Christ himself may be described as a body with many members since the church is the body of Christ.

Into this one body believers—here the "we all" (hēmeis pantes) seems to refer to a wider group than the "you" (hymeis) of verse 27 and could include all Christians—are baptized in the one Spirit (1 Cor 12:13; the baptizer being, presumably, Christ: cf. Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16; see Holy Spirit). Within this one body there is, by God's design (1 Cor 12:18), a multiplicity of members and functions (1 Cor 12:14-16) which is necessary not only for the body as a whole (1 Cor 12:17, 19-20) but for the members themselves (1 Cor 12:21), all of whom are involved in a solidarity of experience or unity of destiny (1 Cor 12:26). Hence, resentment born of a sense of inferiority (1 Cor 12:15-16) and arrogance arising from a sense of superiority (1 Cor 12:21) are alike out of place. Indeed, the so-called weaker members of the human body are actually indispensable (1 Cor 12:22), and there is at work in the human body, again by God's design (1 Cor 12:24), a certain principle of compensation or complementarity which, Paul implies, provides a pattern for Christian conduct (1 Cor 12:23-25).

The same correlatives as are used in 1 Corinthians 12:12 appear also in Romans 12:4-5: "For as [kathaper] in one body we have many members, . . . so [houtōs] we, though many, are one body in Christ" (RSV). As in 1 Corinthians 12:27, the body simile is applied to the local Christian congregation, with a change in terminology from "the body of Christ" to "one body . . . in Christ"; the latter expression brings out the thought that the organic unity of Christians as a body is grounded in their common incorporation in Christ, but since these two verses in Romans 12 may reasonably be regarded as a summary of the fuller treatment of 1 Corinthians 12:12-26, "one body . . . in Christ" refers to the same reality as "the body of Christ."

In both 1 Corinthians 12 and Romans 12, the theme of the body imagery is that of "one body, many members," of "diversity within unity" of the church as the body of Christ. So far, the body imagery emphasizes primarily the mutual relationships and obligations of believers one to another and secondarily their union with Christ, but leaves undefined the exact relation of the church as the body of Christ to Christ himself: the "head" of the body is in 1 Corinthians 12:21 apparently some self-important member of the local church.

3.3.2. Later Letters: Colossians and Ephesians. Despite appearances, the final words of Colossians 2:17 in the Greek (to de sōma tou Christou) is not a reference to "the body of Christ," but means "the substance [in contrast to the shadow] belongs to Christ." In Colossians 3:15 the believers in Colossae are described as having been called "in one body": they are thus members of a single organism. If, possibly by implication, this organism is identified with the body of Christ, then the same emphasis on the unity of the body of Christ is found here as in the two earlier letters. In Colossians 1:24 the body of Christ is definitely identified as the church, clearly in an "ecumenical" sense, for whose sake the apostle suffers. Colossians 1:18 calls Christ "the head of the body, the church."

The majority view believes (1) that Colossians 1:15-20 is a pre-Pauline hymn which has been inserted into the letter's train of thought, (2) that in it the "body" whose "head"* is Christ is originally the universe or cosmos, and (3) that the words "the church" in Colossians 1:18 are a gloss added by either Paul or the final redactor of the letter so as to reinterpret the original cosmological reference along ecclesiological lines (e.g., Schweizer, 1074-77). This view has, however, been challenged (see, e.g., O'Brien 1982, 48-49) and the verse (Col 1:18) may be understood simply as it stands, with the result that the church as the body of Christ is now definitely related to Christ as its head. Although a few scholars (most notably Ridderbos, 379-83) have argued that "head" and "body" in this and other Pauline texts do not make up a composite metaphor but are to be kept distinct as two independent images, the more natural reading of the present text seems clearly to teach an organic relationship in which Christ as the head exercises control and direction over his body, the church.

In Colossians 2:19 the metaphor brings out the new element of growth: Christ as the head of the body is here the source of the body's growth (ex hou, "from whom [Christ]," rather than ex hēs, "from which [head]," is probably an instance of construction according to sense). The idea which follows of the whole body being knit together and growing together is appropriate in view of the fact that headship involves direction and control. (W. A. Grudem has adduced several texts from Philo and Plutarch as well as Plato which explicitly say that the head is the ruling or governing part of the body; but see Head, Headship).

Thus in Colossians the use of the body metaphor differs from that in the earlier letters in that the explicit application to the believers' mutual relationship is dropped—although the notion of their harmonious union and functioning is implied in the description of Colossians 2:19—and in its place are introduced the headship of Christ and the growth of the church as a living organism.

Whereas in the three letters already dealt with the term "body" is used in other ways as well, in Ephesians* it is employed exclusively in connection with the church. Here the metaphor is even more fully developed than in Colossians, or at least its implications are more explicitly drawn out. In Ephesians 1:22-23 the church is designated the body of Christ, and Christ its "supreme head" (NEB). The text introduces the entirely new element of Christ's filling his body just as he fills the universe. (We take the noun plērōma, "fullness,"* passively and the participle plēroumenou as middle, "filling," rather than passive, "being filled"; cf. Eph 4:10.) In Ephesians 2:16 the "one body" within which both the reconciliation* of Jew (see Israel) and Gentile* to God and the reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles to one another take place is a reference to the church (same as the "one new person" of Eph 2:15) rather than the crucified* body of Christ. In favor of this conclusion are the use of "one body" and not "his body," and the order of the words "[the] both in one body" (tous amphoterous en heni sōmati). The reference here to the unity of the body, not in terms of individuals, but in terms of the two great divisions of humankind (cf. Eph 3:6, which uses a cognate adjective, syssōmos, "concorporate, sharing in the same body"), again presents a new aspect to the use of the body metaphor, but the "one body" is not specifically called the body "of Christ." Similarly, in Ephesians 4:4 the "one body" vitalized by the "one Spirit" (who in Eph 2:18 creates the unity of the "one body" of Jewish and Gentile believers), is separate from the "one Lord" of Ephesians 4:5 and is simply a description of the Christian community as a unity. This unity of the body supplies the motivation for keeping the unity of the Spirit (Eph 4:3).

In Ephesians 4:12-16, where the church is again (cf. Eph 1:22-23) designated the body of Christ (Eph 1:22), the unity of the church is again (as already in Eph 4:4, and in Rom 12 and 1 Cor 12) described in terms of individual members, and their mutual dependence is seen to be necessary for the growth of the body, which is said to be both from Christ (Eph 4:16: ex hou, "from whom," as in Col 2:19) and to Christ (Eph 4:15: eis auton, "unto him"). The meaning appears to be that the growth of the body, which aims at conformity to Christ (eis auton, cf. Eph 4:13), takes place as (1) the body is rightly related to the head (ex hou), holding fast to him (cf. Col 2:19) and receiving nourishment from him (cf. Eph 1:23); and as (2) its members are rightly related to one another, each making its own contribution, according to the measure of its gift and function, to the upbuilding of the whole in love.* (An alternative view, which regards the participles, rendered in the RSV as "joined and knit together," in Eph 4:16 as indicating not the mutual relationship among believers but the relationship between believers on the one hand and Christ on the other, is less probable. Nor is it likely that the "joints" of Eph 4:16 refer to the ministers of Eph 4:11, the thought being that they are the ligaments which bind the church to Christ, as argued for by A. T. Lincoln, ad loc.)

In Ephesians 4:25 the fact that believers are "members one of another" (cf. Rom 12:5), meaning "fellow-members in the one body which is the body of Christ," provides the motivation for honest dealings one with another. In Ephesians 5:23 the actual wording of the Greek describes Christ as "head of the church" and "the Savior of the body" (NEB) and not exactly as "the head of his body, the church" or even "the head of the church, his body" (RSV, NIV), so that it might be argued that here, at least, "head" and "body" do not make up one composite imagery. However, the fact that in Ephesians 5:30 believers are said to be "members of his body" suggests that in Ephesians 5:23 as well, the description of Christ as "the head of the church" involves the correlative figure of the church as his body (cf. Eph 1:22-23; 4:15-16), even though there is no corresponding correlative in the husband-wife relationship (see Man and Woman).

Thus, the body metaphor in Ephesians both combines the earlier expressions of the concept in the other three letters and advances beyond them in presenting the church as filled by Christ and as embracing Jew and Gentile in its unity. Another especially noteworthy feature of the use of the body metaphor in Ephesians is its fusion with other metaphors of the church. The building of the temple* grows (Eph 2:21) while, conversely, the body is built up (Eph 4:16, cf. 4:12). In Ephesians 5:22-33, with the concept of bodily union providing the link (Gen 2:24; Eph 5:31), the figure of the church as the bride of Christ is supplemented by that of the body. The twin aspects of Christ's lordship over the church and his union with her, which are connected with the body concept, are made to serve the interests of illustrating and emphasizing (1) the church's obligation to Christ (the wife [cf. the church as the body] is to be subject to the husband [cf. Christ as the head]) and (2) Christ's love for the church (the husband is to love the wife as his own body, as Christ [the head] loved the church [his body]).

3.3.3. Summary and Conclusion. By way of summary and conclusion the following statements may be derived from Paul's use of the concept of the body of Christ as a designation of the church:

(1) The figure of the body of Christ is applied by Paul to a local congregation (1 Cor 12:27), to Christians who were not necessarily members of the same congregation (Rom 12:4-5; cf. 16:3-15), as well as to a wider group possibly inclusive of all believers in Christ (1 Cor 12:12-13). That Christ, the head of the body, is the exalted, heavenly Lord is beyond doubt (Eph 1:20-21), but to argue that in Colossians and Ephesians "the 'body' image is used to denote a heavenly entity," since his body the church is also where he is, in heaven (O'Brien 1987, 112, 110; but see Church), is to forget the nature of the body of Christ concept as metaphor. When believers are said to be raised and seated in the heavenlies with Christ (Col 3:1; Eph 2:6), this is not done in conjunction with the body image.

(2) The church as the body of Christ is a living organic unity composed of a multiplicity of members (i.e., individual believers, not individual congregations), each necessary to the other and to the growth of the whole (1 Cor 10:16-17; 12:12-27; Rom 12:4-5; Col 1:24; 3:15; Eph 4:16). The unity, from another angle, is a unity between diverse races of the world (Eph 2:16-18).

(3) This "horizontal" dimension of unity is based on the "vertical" unity between the church as the body of Christ and Christ as the head of the church. The church, in terms of its members, enters into union with Christ by baptism* in the one Spirit (1 Cor 12:13; cf. Eph 2:18) and maintains it by participation in the eucharist (1 Cor 10:16-17), so that the source of the church's unity is both Christ and the Spirit (cf. Eph 4:4, 5).

(4) Christ as the head is not only united with the church, his body, as the source of its life, but also stands over it as its absolute ruler (Col 1:18; Eph 1:22-23; 4:15; 5:23) and fills it with all the resources of his power* and grace* (Eph 1:23).

(5) The church grows as its members are properly related to Christ the head and to one another as members of the same body (Col 2:19; Eph 4:16).

(6) The mingling of metaphors may indicate that no one metaphor is sufficient by itself to convey the total message concerning the nature and function of the church. Nevertheless, there can be little reasonable doubt that the picture of the body of Christ, more than any other, represents Paul's maturest reflections on the subject: for, as it has been maintained elsewhere, it is with this particular conception of the church that Paul's charisma (see Gifts) concept is in perfect correspondence, and it is in terms of this particular conception that the Pauline doctrine of the ministry is largely to be understood (see Fung, esp. 15-20).

(7) The image of the church as the body of Christ looks inward (to the mutual relationship of believers as members of the body) and upward (to the relationship between the body and its head) but not outward (to the relationship between the church and the world). The view that Paul regarded the church as an extension of the incarnation in the world is surely excluded by the very fact that the body metaphor maintains a clear distinction between Christ as head and the church as body; such a view also ignores the fundamental difference between Christ as sinless and the church as not yet perfect.*

(8) The body of Christ is usually the locus of the Christian ministry. The gift of evangelism, indeed, is orientated toward outsiders, and the work of "showing mercy*" (Rom 12:8) is a service which reaches beyond the confines of the Christian fellowship. But there can be no denying that Paul's emphasis in speaking of the ministry rests on how the ministry should serve the church and not on how it should serve the world, and that the stated purpose of the church's being equipped by the ministry is not that it may serve the world but that it may upbuild itself (Eph 4:12, 16). By and large it may be said that for Paul "ministry is of the body, for the body, and by the body" (Ellis, 14).

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; BODY; CHURCH; FULLNESS; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; HEAD, HEADSHIP; IN CHRIST; LORD'S SUPPER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. B. Bass, "Body," ISBE 1.528-31; E. Best, One Body in Christ (London: SPCK, 1955); G. Bornkamm, Paul (New York: Harper & Row, 1971); F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); idem, The Epistles to the Colossians, to Philemon and to the Ephesians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); R. Bultmann, New Testament Theology (2 vols.; New York: Charles Scribner's, 1951, 1955) 2.151-52; C. Chavasse, The Bride of Christ (London: Faber, 1940); H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980) 56-57; J. D. G. Dunn, " 'The Body of Christ' in Paul," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (JSNTSup 87; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 146-62; E. E. Ellis, Pauline Theology: Ministry and Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); R. Y. K. Fung, "Ministry, Community and Spiritual Gifts," EvQ 56 (1984) 3-20; W. A. Grudem, "The Meaning of Kephalē ("Head"): A Response to Recent Studies," TJ 11 NS (1990) 3-72; R. H. Gundry, SŌMA in Biblical Theology (SNTSMS 29; Cambridge: University Press, 1976); A. E. Hill, "The Temple of Asclepius: An Alternative Source for Paul's Body Theology," JBL 99 (1980) 437-39; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (New York: Charles Scribner's, 1966); R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms (AGJU 10; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); E. Käsemann, Leib und Leib Christi: Eine Untersuchung zur paulinischen Begrifflichkeit (BHT; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1933); idem, "The Theological Problem Presented by the Motif of the Body of Christ," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 102-21; S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42: Dallas: Word, 1990); C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: University Press, 1978) 47-96; P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); idem, "The Church as a Heavenly and Eschatological Entity," in The Church in the Bible and the World, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987) 88-119; A. Perriman, " 'His body, which is the church. . . .' Coming to Terms with Metaphor," EvQ 62 (1990) 123-42; A. E. J. Rawlinson, "Corpus Christi," in Mysterium Christi, ed. G. K. A. Bell and A. Deissmann (London: Longmans, 1930) 225-46; A. Richardson, An Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament (New York: Harper, 1958); H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975) 362-95; J. A. T. Robinson, The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology (SBT 5; London: SCM, 1952); H. Schlier, Christus und die Kirche im Epheserbrief (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1930); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (London: Black, 1931); E. Schweizer, "σῶμα κτλ," TDNT VII.1024-94; A. J. M. Wedderburn, "The Body of Christ and Related Concepts in 1 Corinthians," SJT 24 (1971) 74-96.

R. Y. K. Fung

BONDAGE. See ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD; LAW; LIFE AND DEATH; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SATAN, DEVIL; SIN, GUILT; TRIUMPH.

BREAD. See LORD'S SUPPER.

C

CAESAREA. See PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE.

CAESAR'S HOUSEHOLD, IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD

The expression "Caesar's household" (kaisaros oikia) appears in a concluding greeting of Paul's letter to the Philippians* (Phil 4:22). The full phrase is "the saints of Caesar's household" and the apostle* mentions that these believers along with other Christians in the place of his captivity send their greetings to the congregation at Philippi. The expression suggests that the gospel* had made significant progress in the city where Paul was in prison*—which may have been Caesarea (Hawthorne) but Rome* seems more likely.

1. The Meaning of Caesar's Household
2. The Gospel and Caesar's Household
3. Caesar's Household and the Greetings of Romans 16

1. The Meaning of Caesar's Household.

The household* of a Roman aristocrat (Gk oikia/oikos, Lat familia) included, in addition to his family, his staff of servants, especially those who were slaves, but also those who had been freed and who had obligations as his clients. Often their duties were specialized, and included all types of domestic service, professional duties (such as medicine and education) and business, literary and secretarial assistance. In the case of the Caesars (see Emperors), their "household" was the equivalent of a modern civil service which provided the experts in most fields of state. Accordingly, the designation "Caesar's household" (called domus Caesaris by Tacitus Hist. 2.92) included not simply the members of the imperial family or relations, but also the great number of slaves and freedmen from whose ranks the imperial service was staffed. These households were scattered throughout the provinces of the Empire, although the largest concentration was in Rome, which seems to have been large enough to include a significant number of converts to the Christian faith.

Although a good case has been made for a Caesarean provenance of Philippians (Hawthorne), as Reicke has put it, Rome may provide "the background for those images used by Paul in Philippians which refer to the political realm (1:27; 3:20)." He adds that the readers would have understood "the reference to Rome and Nero's clients in the greeting from 'those of Caesar's household' (Phil 4:22)" (Reicke, 285). These imperial slaves or freedmen may have been known to the Philippians through their employment as couriers between Rome and the East or on business (see Gillman, 34-35, for speculation about Lydia).

On a Roman provenance, Philippians 1:13, "throughout the whole praitōrion," denotes neither the emperor's palace situated on the Palatine hill, the barracks attached to the imperial palace nor the large permanent camp of the praetorian soldiers, but a body of men, namely, "those forming the praetorian guard." The term could thus describe either the emperor's bodyguard or the praetorian cohorts stationed in the metropolis. On a Caesarean provenance, it refers to "those in all parts of the residence of the provincial governor of Caesarea" (Hawthorne, 35).

2. The Gospel and Caesar's Household.

According to Acts 28:14-15 Paul was met by Roman Christians on his arrival in the imperial city. It is not known exactly how or when the gospel first reached Rome. It may have spread among Jewish believers there soon after Pentecost, or else was first taken to the capital by traders, businessmen or soldiers. Paul's arrival gave fresh impetus to the spread of the gospel (Phil 1:14). Although he was a "bound prisoner," he was able to preach and teach "with all boldness and without hindrance" (Acts 28:31). Soon after his arrival Paul was in touch with "the local leaders of the Jews" (Acts 28:17)—probably the rulers of the synagogues in Rome—and many came to him for the express purpose of hearing his views regarding "the hope of Israel" (Acts 28:20-22).

Caesar's household, because of its servile origins and the eastern responsibilities of the Caesars, contained numbers of Asiatics, many of whom were Jews and who were either slaves* or employed in the imperial court. When the gospel reached Rome and was proclaimed in the many synagogues there, these members of Caesar's household could not fail to hear about Jesus' death* and resurrection.* Further, Paul's daily contact with the soldiers who guarded him led to the introduction of the gospel to "the whole guard." It became evident that his imprisonment, which was "in Christ," was a demonstration of Christ's saving activity and thus contributed to the spread of the gospel not only among the troops but to others as well ("the gospel . . . has become known throughout the whole imperial guard and to everyone else," Phil 1:13). It is not surprising, then, to find Caesar's household well represented in the Christian group in Rome.

3. Caesar's Household and the Greetings of Romans 16. If the letter to the Philippians was sent from Rome and the greetings of Romans 16 sent to Rome three or four years earlier, then it might be asked whether any of "the saints of Caesar's household" were included among the recipients mentioned in the earlier letter. J. B. Lightfoot and, more recently, F. F. Bruce have claimed that "the family of Aristobulus" and "the family of Narcissus" (Rom 16:10, 11) could well have belonged to the imperial household. The latter has been thought to have comprised the slaves of Tiberius Claudius Narcissus, a wealthy freedman of the Emperor Tiberius who was a powerful figure under Claudius but was executed after Nero's accession in A.D. 54. His household would have become imperial property but distinguished from others in the imperial household by the term Narcissiani. Less certain is the position of the family of Aristobulus. Lightfoot and others suggested that he was a grandson of Herod the Great who lived in Rome as a private citizen and, like his elder brother Herod Agrippa I (cf. Acts 12:1), was a friend of the Emperor Claudius. According to Philo, at an earlier date Herod Agrippa I himself was described in exactly these words, a member of "Caesar's household" (Philo Flacc. 35).

See also EMPERORS, ROMAN; PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, Philippians (Peabody, MA: Hendricksen, 1983); F. M. Gillman, Women Who Knew Paul (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 1992); G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (London: Macmillan, 1890) 171-78; B. Reicke, "Caesarea, Rome and the Captivity Epistles," in Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, ed. W. W. Gasque & R. P. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970) 277-86; P. R. C. Weaver, Familia Caesaris: A Social Study of the Emperor's Freedmen and Slaves (Cambridge: University Press, 1972).

P. T. O'Brien

CALENDAR. See HOLY DAYS.

CALL, CALLING

The Pauline letters mention calling in three different connections: the calling of all believers, Paul's calling as an apostle,* and the calling of Israel.*

1. The Calling of All Believers
2. Paul's Calling as an Apostle
3. Israel's Calling as the People of God

1. The Calling of All Believers.

When Paul speaks about calling it is, more often than not, the calling of believers to faith* and salvation* that he has in mind. God* himself is the subject of that call (Gal 1:6; 5:8), even though Paul or some other person might be the human agent through whom God calls.

1.1. Called According to God's Purpose. God calls people according to his own will and purpose (Rom 8:28; cf. 2 Tim 1:9). This calling rests, not upon any works done by the recipients of the call, but upon the purpose and grace* of God alone (cf. 2 Tim 1:9). It is those he has predestined for salvation whom he calls (Rom 8:30), Gentiles as well as Jews (Rom 9:24-26; 1 Cor 1:24), and mostly the lowly not the exalted (1 Cor 1:26).

1.2. Called Through the Gospel. The call of God comes normally through the preaching* of the gospel (1 Thess 1:4-5; 2 Thess 2:14), and the preachers are ambassadors through whom God calls people to be reconciled to him (2 Cor 5:20; see Peace, Reconciliation). This gracious calling was made possible only by the death* of Christ, so Paul speaks not just of God calling people through the preaching of the gospel, but also through the grace of Christ* (Gal 1:6).

1.3. Called to Future Glory. God calls people to share in his own kingdom* and glory* (1 Thess 2:12), to share the glory of Christ (2 Thess 2:14), to obtain eternal life* (1 Tim 6:12) and to share in a glorious inheritance (Eph 1:18).

1.4. Called to Present Privileges and Responsibilities. Those whom God calls to future glory he also calls to enjoy peace with himself (Col 3:15) and in human relationships now (1 Cor 7:15). They are also called to freedom* (Gal 5:13)—from both legalism (trying to establish their acceptability before God by observance of the Law*) and from nomism (regarding the Mosaic Law as a regulatory norm for those already accepted by grace through faith). They are called to be "saints," people set apart for God (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2), and to holy living (1 Thess 4:7). They are to walk worthily of their high calling by practicing humility, patience, love* and unity (Eph 4:1), and by fulfilling with God's power* every good resolve and work of faith (2 Thess 1:11).

1.5. Called to Stay with God in Particular Life Situations. Paul gives a rule of thumb to be followed by the Corinthians: "Let each of you lead the life that the Lord has assigned, to which God called you. This is my rule in all the churches" (1 Cor 7:17 NRSV). People should normally remain in the circumstances in which they found themselves when they first responded to the gospel (whether circumcised* or uncircumcised, whether slave or free, and, Paul implies in the context, whether married* or single). Paul does not regard such circumstances as callings in the sense of Christian vocations, as some have argued. Rather he is saying that the call to faith does not necessitate a change in life circumstances for those who respond to it. Rather, in those circumstances they ought normally to "remain with God" (1 Cor 7:24).

2. Paul's Calling as an Apostle.

Just as believers in general are called to salvation according to God's purpose, so Paul's calling to be an apostle was also according to the purpose of God (1 Cor 1:1; see Dietzfelbinger). This calling meant that Paul's whole life was to be dedicated to the proclamation of the gospel (Rom 1:1), something for which he continued to feel quite unworthy, because he had once persecuted the church of God (1 Cor 15:9; see Conversion and Call of Paul).

Galatians 1:15-16, more than any other text, reveals what was involved in being called to be an apostle* as far as Paul was concerned: "But when God, who had set me apart before I was born and called me through his grace, was pleased to reveal his Son to me, so that I might proclaim him among the Gentiles, I did not confer with any human being" (Gal 1:15-16 NRSV). This text reveals several important aspects of Paul's apostolic calling: (1) He had been chosen by God for this task even before he was born (as had been some of the prophets of the OT, cf. Is 49:1, 5; Jer 1:5; see Prophet, Paul As). (2) His own realization of this calling came to him by a revelation from God at a time determined by God himself. (3) It had nothing to do with anything deserving on Paul's part; it came through God's grace. (4) It involved a revelation by God of his Son Jesus Christ to Paul so that he might preach Christ to others. (5) The preaching ministry to which he was called had a specific scope: to the Gentiles.* (6) It came directly from God, without human mediation.

3. Israel's Calling as the People of God.

One of the problems Paul wrestled with was his own people's resistance to the gospel. How could the Jews, who had been called by God to be his special possession among the nations, reject the good news God sent to them? Writing about this, Paul reveals several aspects of his understanding of Israel's calling (see Israel; Restoration of Israel).

3.1. It Is Irrevocable. Even when confronted by Israel's rejection of the gospel, Paul insists that God had not rejected his people, for, he asserts, the gifts and calling of God are irrevocable (Rom 11:28-29). It must be understood that God's calling now involves Gentiles as well as Jews (Rom 9:24-26).

3.2. It Is a Matter of Grace and Election. To deal with the problem of God's faithfulness to his word in the light of Israel's rejection of the gospel, Paul explains that not every member of the nation of Israel was in fact a member of the elect people (Rom 9:6-7; see Election). A person's status as a true Israelite depended not upon the works of that person, but rather upon the mercy* of God; that is, upon God's election and calling (Rom 9:10-16).

3.3. God's Calling and the Remnant. Even though many Jews had shown, by their rejection of the gospel, that they were not true Israelites, Paul insists that there is a remnant of true Israelites, of whom he is one (Rom 11:1-5). This was the remnant according to the election of grace (Rom 11:5-6).

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION; ISRAEL; PROPHET, PAUL AS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. Dietzfelbinger, Der Berufung des Paulus als Ursprung seiner Theologie (WMANT 58; Neukirchen-Vluyn; Neukirchener, 1985); C. G. Kruse, New Testament Models for Ministry: Jesus and Paul (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1985); I. H. Marshall, "Election and Calling to Salvation in 1 and 2 Thessalonians," in The Thessalonian Correspondence, ed. R. F. Collins (Leuven: University Press, 1990) 259-76; K. L. Schmidt, "καλέω κτλ," TDNT III.487-536. C. G. Kruse

CANON

Any discussion about the canonicity of Paul's letters takes place between two certainties: One is that the apostle Paul wrote letters to a number of individuals and churches; the other is that by A.D. 397 the church had canonized (i.e., accepted as authoritative and normative) fourteen letters attributed to Paul along with the other books which eventually made up the canon of the NT.

What happened between the first and the fourth centuries, however, is open to considerable speculation and debate. Sources for reconstructing this process of recognition of Paul's letters are either non-existent or subject to a variety of interpretations. There is very little scholarly consensus as to what could and did in fact happen. Hypotheses abound, and in many cases we are left with a bewildering number of probabilities.

Schmithals expressed this pessimism rather well when he wrote that "the question as to the form of the earliest collection of Paul's epistles has occupied the exegetes and historians so often and with so much ingenuity that one takes up this question with only slight hope of new convincing results" (Schmithals, 253-54). This study also is complicated by the fact that the concept and process of canonicity is closely related to other issues. R. P. Martin has noted that the questions of how and when Paul's letters found general acceptance cannot be understood, much less answered, apart from the larger framework of Paul's claim to authority, the apostolate and the use of tradition (Martin, 279).

1. Paul and His Letters
2. Between Paul and Clement (c. 60-100)
3. Between Clement and Justin (c. 96-165)
4. Marcion (Mid Second Century)
5. P^{46}
6. The Muratorian Fragment
7. Some Later Church Fathers (c. 150-254)
8. Summary
9. Canonicity

1. Paul and His Letters.

From an uncritical reading of Paul's letters in the NT one can make the following conclusions: thirteen letters (excluding Hebrews) are attributed to Paul; most were occasional or particular, that is, they were written to specific local congregations for a definite purpose (e.g., believers in Rome, Corinth, Philippi, Thessalonica, Colossae, Ephesus, Galatia, etc.); others were written to individuals (Philemon, Timothy and Titus); Paul's letters were read in the church, probably in the context of worship* (1 Thess 5:27; Col 4:16); some were intended to be circulated to other churches (Col 4:16; Gal 1:1); and not all the letters that Paul wrote have been preserved (1 Cor 5:9; 2 Cor 2:4; Col 4:16). At the time of writing Paul had no idea that his letters would be collected or become authoritative and canonical for the universal church (on the history and development of the word canon, cf. Metzger 1987, Appendix I, 289-93).

A critical analysis of Paul's letters, however, questions this simplistic picture. The history of interpretation of the NT in general, and Paul in particular, has suggested some alternate ways of understanding Paul and his letters. For one thing, there is the question of authenticity. Were all the letters attributed to Paul actually written by him? A number of scholars have postulated that certain letters are post-Pauline and probably were written by a "pupil" or "school" of Paul sometime after his death (cf. Patzia and current critical introductions to the NT such as W. G. Kümmel). The letters whose Pauline authorship is disputed are Colossians,* Ephesians,* 2 Thessalonians* and the Pastorals.* If these are indeed Deutero-Pauline, this changes the way one reconstructs the chronology* of the composition and collection of Paul's letters.

Another issue raised by scholars is the editorial and redactional work that has been applied to Paul's letters. Are the Corinthian* letters a combination of several fragments of letters that Paul wrote to Corinth? Is the phrase in 1 Corinthians 1:2, "together with all those everywhere who call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (NIV), an interpolation intended to change the letter from an "occasional" to a "universal" letter, thus making it applicable to a wider body of believers (cf. Dahl, 270)? Was Romans* similarly altered in some manuscripts by omitting the words "in Rome" (Rom 1:7, 15), and did it originally circulate as a shorter letter (chaps. 1—15) with chapter sixteen added later from another piece of Paul's correspondence (cf. Gamble 1977)? Was Ephesians* written as a "circular letter" for the churches in Asia Minor before it found a permanent home in Ephesus? Both the general nature of the letter and the textual problems related to its destination (omitting en Ephesō, Eph 1:1, in some chief textual authorities) suggest such a possibility.

2. Between Paul and Clement (c. 60-100).

Clement, an early bishop of the church in Rome, appears to have been acquainted with several letters of Paul. R. M. Grant suggests that Clement knew 1 Corinthians, Romans, Galatians, Philippians, Ephesians and "perhaps has a definite allusion to Hebrews" (Grant 81-83). R. P. Martin, on the other hand, believes that "at best" Clement knew only four of Paul's letters (Martin, 277). At any rate, we need to remember that Clement may have been aware of more letters than he utilized in his correspondence.

The significance of Clement, however, lies not so much in the number of letters that he referred to as in the fact that his "letter of the Church of Rome to the Church of Corinth" (1 Clement) reflects an acquaintance not only with Paul's letter to the Romans (as we would expect) but 1 Corinthians as well. This means that Clement somehow had access to 1 Corinthians, either from a visit he may have made to Corinth or that this Corinthian letter—and some others—had found their way to Rome. One wonders if this acquaintance with Romans and 1 Corinthians presupposes the existence of a limited collection of Paul's letters.

What happened to Paul's letters in the period between Paul and Clement is shrouded in mystery. There does not appear to be any evidence of a significant knowledge of Paul's letters during this time. The book of Acts (dated in the range of 60 and 85) makes no mention of them even though it focuses on the life of the apostle* Paul. If Paul's letters were treasured during this time (cf. 2 Pet 3:2, 15-16), it is indeed puzzling that there is no further evidence of their use, circulation and collection (cf. Mitton). However, given the fact that Paul's letters ultimately were circulated, collected and canonized, it is obvious that some kind of process was at work during this early stage.

2.1. The Gradual-Collection Theory. It can be legitimately assumed that Paul's letters, because they were occasional, particular and pastoral, would have been valued and preserved by the churches to which they were written. Exceptions could include the "sorrowful letter" to Corinth (2 Cor 2:4), a possible letter to the Laodiceans which is now lost (Col 4:6) and others which may have been written but about which we do not have any knowledge or record.

At some stage, Paul's occasional letters must have been recognized to have a broader or more universal significance. This may have come about because they were soon recognized for their apostolic and pastoral value (Harnack) or through some kind of cumulative effect (Gamble 1985, 36). It appears more likely that each letter of Paul, which would have been read and reread in the church, gradually found its way to other congregations because of its practical significance. They could have been carried and circulated by significant church leaders in the same way that Paul had his letters delivered by such messengers as Timothy and others (cf. 1 Thess 5:27).

The circulation of letters and their limited collection may have begun in such regional areas as Asia Minor (Colossae, Ephesus, Hierapolis, Laodicea), Macedonia (Thessalonica, Philippi) and Achaia (Corinth). Then at some point these regional collections became part of the Pauline corpus (cf. L. Mowry; also Zuntz, 278-79). Unfortunately there is no evidence that such collections existed.

It is difficult to imagine this early circulation and collection of Paul's letters without the guidance of some significant individual(s). The editorial and redactional activity in the Corinthian correspondence, and possibly Philippians and Romans, confirms that someone was working on the letters. Although some scholars have suggested that Paul recognized the timeless value of his own letters and may have initiated this process himself, most recommend individuals such as Luke, Timothy and Onesimus. On the other hand, B. Metzger notes that early in the 1800s, J. Eichhorn "was the first to attribute to Marcion the stimulus to collect the New Testament writings" (Metzger 1987, 18; W. Bauer also saw Marcion as "the first systematic collector of the Pauline heritage"). It appears more likely, however, that Marcion took over an existing list and then edited it to fit his theological agenda.

The process of collecting and editing Paul's letters may have been performed by a "school" of Paul. This envisions a process where, after Paul's death, a group of his disciples or coworkers met together to study his theology in order to pass on the theological traditions that they had inherited from their master. It is suggested that those letters some scholars have designated as Deutero-Pauline were attempts of the school, or certain individuals within the Pauline circle, and under the name of Paul, to interpret, reinterpret and apply Paul's theology to later generations by appealing to Paul's apostolic authority* (Patzia; Schenke).

From this perspective, the utilization of Paul's name and authority would have been especially significant as the church confronted various forms of false teaching and needed to establish "sound doctrine and practice." Certain individuals within the school, like Luke, Tychicus, Onesimus, etc., may actually have been responsible for the writing of some letters. Ephesians often is attributed to Luke (Martin) or Onesimus (Goodspeed, Knox). Suggestions for the authorship and/or final editing of the Pastoral Letters ranges from a Paulinist like Luke (Martin) to Polycarp (von Campenhausen). Most scholars are content to simply designate the author as "the Pastor"—but maintaining that it was someone who stood firmly within the Pauline heritage (cf. Collins); for arguments supporting the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals see Guthrie, 607-49, 1011-28.

Those who follow the Deutero-Pauline line of reasoning usually identify Ephesus as the place for this editorial activity (Goodspeed, Knox, Mitton, P.N. Harrison). Harnack, Zahn and Schmithals suggest Corinth. Thus Schmithals, for example, argues for the publication of a seven-letter Pauline corpus in Corinth as early as the "eighties" (Schmithals, 88, 262). Zuntz (14), Grant (121-124) and Bruce (130) see Alexandria as a likely site. Bruce, following the reasoning of Zuntz, affirms that the corpus shows signs of dependence upon "the traditions of Alexandrian scholarship" (Bruce, 129-30).

All of the above is, of course, quite hypothetical. We are not always sure how much Paul was appreciated and how widely his theology was used in the early church. And, although the reference to "all Paul's letters" in 2 Peter 3:16 (NIV) and reminiscences of Paul in the early Fathers testify to a growing appreciation of Paul—as would the phenomenon of the Deutero-Paulines—the fact remains that there is no evidence for a collection of Paul's letters before the end of the first century (even if 2 Peter is dated to around the turn of the century, the "all" would mean "all" those that were known at the time).

2.2. E. J. Goodspeed's Theory. Part of Goodspeed's reconstruction of the Pauline corpus involves what is commonly referred to as the "theory of lapsed interest" (Guthrie, 647). Rather than a sustained and growing appreciation of Paul, Goodspeed maintained that because Paul's letters were occasional, they had little value for anyone else, and were simply stored in church chests (Goodspeed, 21) and gradually fell into obscurity.

Briefly stated, Goodspeed's theory suggests that there was little apparent interest in Paul between the time of his death and the latter part of the first century. Only after the publication of The Acts* of the Apostles (c. 85) was interest in Paul revived. Anyone reading this history of the early church would be fascinated with Paul and undoubtedly ask questions about the apostle's literary activity. Goodspeed, followed by Knox and Mitton, identified Onesimus (Paul's friend in Philemon and perhaps the same person who was later bishop of Ephesus) as the one who eventually collected and published Paul's letters as a corpus. Ephesians was written as a cover letter for that corpus (see Goodspeed, Knox, Mitton).

This theory is challenged by scholars who have concluded that Paul's letters continued to exert a considerable influence upon the life and theology of the early church after the apostle's death. Guthrie, for example, thinks that someone like Timothy could have been responsible for collecting and publishing Paul's letters (cf. 2 Tim 4:13: "When you come, bring the cloak that I left with Carpus at Troas, and my scrolls, especially the parchments"). And the reference to "all his [Paul's] letters" (2 Pet 3:16) should be taken as proof that at least some of Paul's letters were known to Peter before 68 (Guthrie, 832).

Whether or not one regards Goodspeed's theory as "a romantic embellishment" (Bruce) or "imaginative reconstruction" (Martin, 278) one cannot help but concur with Zuntz who commends Goodspeed for "the liveliness of his imagination and the persuasiveness of his presentation" (Zuntz, 276).

2.3. Summary. From the preceding discussion, the following points emerge:

2.3.1. There is sufficient evidence to conclude that by the end of the first century some of Paul's letters were being circulated and collected in various churches.

2.3.2. The circulation/collection of Paul's letters indicates that they were valued for their universal and not just local significance.

2.3.3. We do not know how and when the editor(s) obtained copies of Paul's letters. The collector/editor may have picked them up during travels or had them sent to a location through the normal process of exchange and circulation.

2.3.4. For those who accept the Deutero-Pauline hypothesis, the collection and further publication of these letters was a deliberate attempt by an individual or individuals within the Pauline school to appeal to Paul's apostolic authority and commend his theology to later generations.

3. Between Clement and Justin (c. 96-165).

An examination of the events and literature of this period sheds some further light on our subject. References and allusions to most of Paul's letters can be found in Ignatius, bishop of Antioch (early second century), and Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna (d. c. 156). Exceptions in Ignatius include 2 Thessalonians, Philemon and the Pastorals, while Polycarp has no allusions to 1 Thessalonians, Colossians, Titus and Philemon.

The writings of Barnabas (late first to early second century), Papias (early second century) and Justin (mid second century) bear no trace of Paul's letters (cf. Grant, 62-107 for more detailed information). Such omissions are puzzling, and caution needs to be taken when arguing from silence. Papias may have omitted quotations from Paul because he treasured oral tradition ("a living and continuing voice") much more highly than written sources, and Justin, an apologist, was not necessarily writing to Christians.

The possession of most of Paul's epistles by many of the church fathers, from Clement to Justin, signifies a further development in the collection of a Pauline corpus. Polycarp, in addition to his own collection, is aware of a similar collection in the Philippian church ("when absent he [Paul] wrote you letters that will enable you, if you study them carefully, to grow in the faith delivered to you," Polycarp Phil. 3.2).

From the above observations it becomes clear that Paul's letters were becoming more widely known and used among the churches. However, there is less certainty regarding the status of a singular collection (or corpus).

A number of scholars feel confident that the collection—and the circulation as a collection—began early in the second century (Bruce, 130; Zahn, according to Metzger 1987, 23; Beare, 520-32). G. Zuntz, although he doubts that Clement would have had access to a Pauline corpus in Rome, believes that "it may conceivably have been circulating in, say, Asia Minor or Egypt for some time; but hardly for long. Thus, A.D. +/- 100 is a probable date for the collection and publication of the Corpus Paulinum; that is forty or fifty years after the Epistles were written" (14).

4. Marcion (Mid Second Century).

This early church leader in Rome was expelled from the church c. A.D. 144 because of his rejection of the OT and what he regarded to be its inferior view of God and the Law. Nevertheless, he remains a crucial figure in our understanding of the collection and canonicity of Paul's letters because of the ten-letter corpus found in his Apostolikon (in Marcion's order: Galatians, 1 Corinthians, 2 Corinthians, Romans, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, Ephesians [which he called the "epistle to the Laodiceans"], Colossians, Philippians and Philemon).

Assessment of the significance of Marcion's list varies considerably among scholars because there is no way of knowing with certainty what his intentions were. It is doubtful that he intended to produce a "closed canon" of Scripture as this term came to be understood by the church at a later date. Harnack and von Campenhausen see him as the first compiler of a list; others believe that he is indebted to an earlier collection or collections. The most we can say is that Marcion's list represents a deliberate selection of Paul's letters, which he viewed as supporting his rejection of the OT. This, in turn, may have driven the church to expand the collection at a later time by including other recognized letters of Paul.

5. P^{46}.

This early manuscript, known as the Chester Beatty Codex (c. A.D. 200), is recognized as the earliest extant copy of the Pauline letters. Although only 86 of its original 104 leaves have survived, it remains a significant witness to the status of the Pauline corpus at the beginning of the third century. It contains Romans (beginning at Rom 5:17), Hebrews, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Ephesians, Galatians, Philippians, Colossians and 1 Thessalonians. Metzger suggests that "the seven leaves lost from the end probably contained 2 Thessalonians but would have been insufficient for the Pastoral Epistles" (Metzger 1981, 64). The inclusion of Hebrews and its frequent agreement with texts belonging to the Alexandrian group of witnesses suggests that it is a product of the Eastern church, probably from Alexandria (Bruce, 130-31; Zuntz, 14).

Without doubt, P^{46} is the most significant tangible piece in the puzzle to reconstruct the Pauline corpus. It may well represent (though it should not necessarily be identified as) the earliest collection of Paul's letters and from which all subsequent collections were made. Nevertheless, there is no way of knowing whether it was representative of the entire Eastern church.

Both Bruce (130) and Metzger (1987, 259) confidently affirm that from the beginning of the second century Paul's letters only circulated as a collection. This means that with the possible exception of Clement of Rome, all subsequent collectors, including Marcion, worked from an early Corpus Paulinum (for detailed discussion on a primitive archetype of the Pauline corpus and P^{46} see the detailed discussion in Zuntz, esp. 14-23). H. Gamble dismisses the idea of a single archetypal corpus as untenable (cf. Gamble 1975, 415; 1989, 208). Aland voices his skepticism even more strongly:

> the opinion that a uniform 'ur-Corpus' of seven Pauline Epistles had been collected by the close of the first century, from which all later witnesses have descended, is nothing but a 'phantasy of wishful thinking'. . . . by about A.D. 90 several 'Ur-Corpora' of Pauline Epistles began to be made available at various places, and that these collections, of differing extent, could have included some or all of the following: 1 and 2 Corinthians, Hebrews, Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians. Eventually other traditional Pauline Epistles were added to the several collections and a more or less stabilized collection finally emerged. (quoted from Metzger 1987, 260-61; cf. also Gamble 1975, 415; 1989, 208)

6. The Muratorian Fragment.

This Fragment, a Latin translation from the seventh or eighth century, was published in 1740 and is named after its Italian discoverer L. A. Muratori (see text and translation in Metzger 1987, 305-7). Its significance for the reconstruction of the collection and canonicity of Paul's letters mainly depends upon its dating. Historically, the Fragment was considered to be the product of the western church (Rome?) near the end of the second century. Included among the NT letters (twenty-two of the present twenty-seven canonical books) are Paul's letters to the Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Galatians, Thessalonians, Romans, Philemon, Titus and "two to Timothy." As such, the Fragment could be a significant testimony to an early collection of Paul's letters. Gamble, however, refers to it as "a puzzling list of letters which perhaps never will be made wholly intelligible" (Gamble 1975, 407).

The enthusiasm for the value of the Fragment has been challenged in recent scholarship. A. C. Sundberg's detailed analysis led him to propose a fourth-century date and an Eastern setting (see similar position.s in von Campenhausen and McDonald). Among Sundberg's objections to an early date for the Fragment are its attitude toward the Shepherd of Hermas and the fact that there are no similar lists until the time of Eusebius in the fourth century.

Not everyone, however, has been persuaded by Sundberg's critique. Both Bruce (158 n.2) and Metzger (1987, 191) are confident that E. Ferguson has adequately refuted Sundberg's arguments against an early date. Thus, in some circles at least, the Fragment is regarded as an authoritative list of NT books in the Roman church by the end of the second century.

7. Some Later Church Fathers (c. 150-254).

Significant individuals during this period include Tatian (c. 110-180), Irenaeus (d. c. 202), Clement of Alexandria (c. 160-215), Tertullian (c. 160-220) and Origen (c. 185-254). The general consensus among scholars is that these Fathers recognized and accepted either thirteen or fourteen (if Hebrews is included) letters of Paul. Tatian appears to reject 1 and 2 Timothy, and neither Irenaeus nor Clement mentions Philemon. Origen often uses the phrase "Paul said" or "Paul says." Thus one can fairly safely conclude that by the middle of the third century there was a broadly uniform consensus with respect to the contents of the Pauline corpus. But final confirmation of this has to await evidence from the following century.

8. Summary.

The following points seem well established.

8.1. After the first century Paul's letters circulated as a collection and not (with possible minor exceptions) as individual letters. Although P^{46} represents the earliest extant evidence of such a collection, it may be only one of several independent collections. The other collections may have included as many as seven, ten, thirteen or fourteen letters of Paul respectively. Some later collections also included "Third Corinthians" and "The Epistle to the Laodiceans."

8.2. References/allusions to Paul's letters by church fathers from the second century onward indicate an increasing appeal to Paul's authority and theology in the church so that by the middle of the third century the content of the Corpus Paulinum was pretty well decided although not yet canonized. Methodologically, we must not assume that the fathers felt obliged to mention all the letters they knew or that they intended to construct a "canon" of authoritative Scripture.

8.3. The significance of the Muratorian Fragment needs to be tempered in the light of criticisms made by Sundberg and others. If it is authentically from the second century, one cannot help being puzzled by the lack of similar lists until the fourth century (McDonald, 139).

9. Canonicity.

Enough has been said above to indicate that the collection of Paul's letters was a significant factor in their ultimate canonicity. Although addressed to specific congregations, they increasingly were valued for their universal applicability and apostolic authority within the first and second century. One can safely conclude that a Pauline corpus of thirteen letters existed by the beginning of the third century. These, along with the Gospels and the other letters which now make up the NT, were declared "canonical" by the Council of Carthage in A.D. 397.

There are a number of confluent factors which led to the canonicity of the entire NT generally and Paul's letters specifically. Externally, there was the problem of false teaching. What Paul faced during his own lifetime, and is reflected in the Pauline corpus, including the disputed letters, became more acute in the post-apostolic age with the development of Gnosticism and other heresies. This continually forced the church to appeal to an authoritative and widely accepted body of literature to define its theology (note the emphasis in the Pastorals on keeping "the faith" and "sound teaching," guarding "the truth" and the "good deposit," etc.). Schmithals has proposed that the earliest collection and editing of Paul's letters was motivated by an attempt to provide a universal body of Paul's letters to serve as an authoritative weapon against Gnosticism (cf. the critique of Schmithals by Gamble 1975).

Marcion played a significant role in the development of the Pauline canon when he published his list of ten Pauline letters in the mid second century. The question whether or not he created this "hyper-Paulinist" list or utilized an earlier collection is secondary to the insight that it provides on the status of Paul and his letters. It may have stimulated the church to clarify and enlarge its position on the content of the Pauline corpus because succeeding lists contain additional letters. However, too little is known about the effects of Marcion's canon to suggest that it forced the church to formulate a canon of its own in opposition to his.

Montanism (c. 140-180), on the other hand, with its claim to new revelations, prophecies and inspiration, undoubtedly made it necessary for the church to establish additional norms of authority.

The internal criteria that determined the canon include such concepts as apostolicity, orthodoxy and catholicity. Since Paul was regarded as a legitimate and inspired apostle by the church, his letters were considered part of the "apostolic deposit of faith" and thus authoritative for the church. This reverence for Paul contributes to the argument for a Deutero-Pauline school which would have appealed to his apostolic authority in addressing the theological needs of later generations (Ephesians, Pastorals).

Nevertheless, there were factors other than the concepts of inspiration and apostolicity at work in the second and third century. Certain apocryphal Gospels, Letters, Acts, etc., claimed to be apostolic (e.g., Peter, Thomas, Philip) but were rejected. Even Paul's "Epistle to the Laodiceans" was judged to be spurious and hence not included among the canonical letters of Paul. The antiquity of a document (i.e., that it was written during the apostolic age), its orthodoxy and its usage in the church also helped to shape the canon. The Muratorian Fragment, for example, rejects the "Shepherd of Hermas" because it was written too recently and cannot be included "among the prophets whose number is settled or among the apostles to the end time" (section 6).

In spite of a general consensus regarding the canonical status of Paul's letters by the end of the second century, there are a few interesting scenarios that continued into and beyond the fourth century. We noted above that the Pastorals were not included in such early collections as those of Marcion or P^{46}. Philemon also is missing from P^{46}, although it, along with 2 Thessalonians, may have been part of the missing seven leaves at the end.

The book of Hebrews had a curious and checkered career. In Alexandria (the eastern church), it was held in high regard, was used in the church and considered to be Pauline. Hence its inclusion in P^{46} as one of Paul's letters. Rome (the western church), on the other hand, doubted Hebrew's apostolic (Pauline) authorship and did not include it among the Pauline letters. This may account for its absence from the Muratorian Fragment, a creation of the western church. According to Bruce, it was not until the fourth century, and only due to the persuasive influence of Athanasius, that Rome consented to include Hebrews in the Pauline corpus (Bruce, 220).

The order or sequencing of Paul's letters varies in most lists. Many group the letters written to churches followed by those written to individuals. Occasionally letters to the same community (Corinth, Thessalonica) appear as a single reference. Other arrangements utilize the principle of decreasing length.

Finally, we should note that there are a number of divergences within the canon of the NT even after the Third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397). Letters like "Third Corinthians" and "The Epistle to the Laodiceans" continued to be used in some churches. Codex Sinaiticus (fourth century) includes Barnabas and The Shepherd of Hermas in its list; Alexandrinus (fifth century) has 1 Clement and 2 Clement 1:1—12:5; and Claromontanus (sixth century) mentions Barnabas, The Shepherd, the Acts of Paul and the Apocalypse of Peter. Thus we do well to heed Metzger who wisely notes, "It would be a mistake to represent the question of the canon as finally settled in all Christian communities by the beginning of the fifth century" (Metzger 1987, 239).

See also APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE; AUTHORITY; PASTORAL LETTERS; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION; TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. E. Barnett, Paul Becomes a Literary Influence (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1941); F. Beare, "Canon of the New Testament," IDB 1.520-32; F. F. Bruce, The Canon of Scripture (Downers Grove: InterVarsity, 1988); H. von Campenhausen, The Formation of the Christian Bible (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); R. F. Collins, Letters That Paul Did Not Write (Wilmington: Michael Glazier, 1988); N. A. Dahl, "The Particularity of the Pauline Epistles as a Problem in the Ancient Church," in Neotestamentica et Patristica: Eine Freundesgabe Herrn Prof. Dr. Oscar Cullmann zu seinem 60. Geburtstag (NovTSup 6; Leiden: Brill, 1962) 261-71; E. Ferguson, "Canon Muratori: Date and Provenance," Studia Patristica 18 (New York: Pergamon, 1982) 677-83; H. Y. Gamble, The New Testament Canon (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, "The Redaction of the Pauline Letters and the Formation of the Pauline Corpus," JBL 94 (1975) 403-18; idem, "The Canon of the New Testament," in The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae (Atlanta: Scholars, 1989) 201-43; idem, The Textual History of the Letter to the Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); E. J. Goodspeed, The Formation of the New Testament (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1926); R. M. Grant, The Formation of the New Testament (London: Hutchinson University Library, 1965); D. Guthrie, New Testament Introduction (rev. ed.; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1990); J. Knox, Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1959); R. P. Martin, New Testament Foundations 2 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986);

L. M. McDonald, The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon (Nashville: Abingdon, 1988); D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1986); B. M. Metzger, Manuscripts of the Greek Bible (Oxford: University Press, 1981); idem, The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance (Oxford: University Press, 1987); C. L. Mitton, The Formation of the Pauline Corpus of Letters (London: Epworth, 1955); L. Mowry, "The Early Circulation of Paul's Letters," JBL 63 (1944) 73-86; A. G. Patzia, "The Deutero-Pauline Hypothesis: An Attempt at Clarification," EvQ 52 (1980) 27-42; E. R. Richards, The Secretary in the Letters of Paul (WUNT 2/42; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); H.-M. Schenke, "Das Weiterwirken des Paulus und die Pflege seines Erbs durch die Paulusschule," NTS 21 (1975) 505-18; W. Schmithals, Paul and the Gnostics (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); A. C. Sundberg, "Canon Muratori: A Fourth Century List," HTR 66 (1973) 1-41; D. Trobisch, Die Entstehung der Paulusbriefsammlung (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989); G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles: A Disquisition upon the Corpus Paulinum (Oxford: University Press, 1963).

A. G. Patzia

CAPTIVE. See PRISON, PRISONER; TRIUMPH.

CATHOLICISM. See EARLY CATHOLICISM.

CELIBACY. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS.

CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY

The endeavor to ascertain whether there is a central organizing principle in Paul's theology has been pursued actively in recent studies. All students agree that Paul's thinking is not so much systematic as "occasional." But there the agreement stops. When we ask about a "Pauline center," or the underlying principle of coherence in Paul's theology, we are faced by a bewildering variety of answers. Usually the suggestions made range from being too narrow to being too wide. Proposals that say no more than "Jesus Christ is the center of Paul's life and thought" or "he saw life under the lordship of Christ" (see Gibbs; Dunn, 369-72) are of course true, but they hardly touch upon the complexity of this man's mind. Nor do they account for the flexibility of Paul's sensitive response to situations he met. The same criticism has to be leveled at proposals that concentrate on single christological titles (e.g., "Son of God," so Cerfaux, 4) or more vaguely on a generalized summary of Christ's saving work (e.g., "christological soteriology," so Fitzmyer, 16).

1. Some Recent Proposals
2. The Need for Criteria
3. Patterns of Pauline Theology
4. The Theme of Reconciliation
5. Conclusion

1. Some Recent Proposals.

The classic Lutheran position (stated by Käsemann, 168-69; but cf. Conzelmann, 159-60, in critique of Bultmann) is to affirm the centrality of justification* by faith.* But this assertion has been challenged in recent times by a variety of interpreters (listed in Plevnik, 461-62).

At the other extreme we encounter suggestions that have been too far-reaching. For example, Sanders draws attention to "two readily identifiable and primary convictions which governed Paul's Christian life: (1) that Jesus Christ is Lord, that in him God provided for the salvation of all who believe . . .; (2) that he, Paul, was called to be the apostle to the Gentiles" (441-42). Again both statements stand out as clearly demonstrable, but they do not bring us directly to the heart of Paul's message.

C. J. A. Hickling accepts these two propositions as essentially accurate but goes on to add a rider: "God has already brought about in Christ a decisive and final transformation of time" (199-214). Hickling's position brings us nearer to the Pauline center, since it recognizes the new age and the new life that came into the world through Christ; and Hickling rightly praises the novelty of divine grace.* Nonetheless, his dualistic framework remains somewhat of an abstraction, requiring to be filled out with personal content and application. J. C. Beker adopts a similar apocalyptic* framework and regards "apocalyptic [as] the indispensable means for [Paul's] interpretation of the Christ-event" (Beker 1980; this entire work is an explication of his seminal essay of 1978). He matches this schema, however, with an interface of Paul's use of "symbolic" terms in applying the conviction he had about the cosmic triumph* of God to particular contingencies in the situations of his readers. This "interaction between coherent center and contingent interpretation" is offered as the key to Paul's hermeneutic, and indeed his theology. The outstanding question remains, however: how can a series of events on a cosmic scale be made normative for, and binding on, various human situations? (Beker's response to this critique is treated in his second edition preface. See too Beker 1990.)

The most comprehensive discussion of a centrum Paulinum, by Plevnik, reverts in its conclusion to a broad spectrum of components which, it is said, go to make up the range of Paul's convictional base, namely:

> Any center of Pauline theology must therefore include all those components of the apostle's gospel: his understanding of Christ and of God, his understanding of God's salvific action through Christ, involving the Easter event and its implications, the present Lordship, the future coming of Christ, and the appropriation of salvation. (Plevnik, 477-78)

Not surprisingly, the conclusion is then drawn that "the center is thus not any single aspect of Christ . . . but the whole Christ." The net is so widely cast that almost everything in Paul's preaching* is included or regarded as equally significant.

2. The Need for Criteria.

Clearly, before entering the field with any further suggestions as to a Pauline center, the question must be asked about the criteria by which any proposal may be justified. There is here the obvious danger of a hermeneutical circle since the criteria are drawn from the same body of data that hypothetically contains the organizing principle; so, it may well be objected that we are selecting criteria which we know in advance will serve the interests of our proposed term. There seems to be no way to escape this dilemma unless we are prepared to abandon the quest and treat Paul's theology as fragmentary responses delivered ad hoc. Yet, provided we continue to test the criteria by the data as they are uncovered and provided we are willing to revise the initial theoretical proposal in the light of the reconstructed criteria, the enterprise is worthwhile and may be honestly and conscientiously pursued. The better way of putting the process then is to speak of a "hermeneutical spiral" by which we rise from one level to a more adequately framed hypothesis as new data are fed into the inquiry and it moves upward and forward.

In general terms the set of criteria needed to determine a Pauline core may include the following: (1) Paul's attested awareness of a central affirmation or cluster of affirmations that embody his chief message: the "center" is thus the primal reality from which he draws his entire theology; (2) the role of tradition which implies that Paul can and did take over preformed creedal statements (see Creeds), hymnic/poetic fragments (see Hymns) and baptismal reminders that he thereby made his own possession (e.g., Phil 2:6-11; Rom 3:24-26; 1 Cor 8:6; see Liturgical Elements). To this truism should be added a factor that is often overlooked (e.g., by Plevnik, 465), that Paul often redacted the tradition where it was deemed to be inadequate or misleading (e.g., on Col 1:15-20); (3) the extent of Paul's correspondence, which is determined by the interpreter's choice of letters claimed to be indisputably authentic. Obviously, if, for instance, Colossians* is held to be Deutero-Pauline, the best that may be claimed is that it represents an extension (and perhaps a modification) of Paul's thought adapted to a new situation arising after his death; and (4) the bid to locate what is unique in Paul so that "anything that is derived from something else in Pauline theology is not the center" (Plevnik, 466, interpreting A. Schweitzer's and Sanders's contributions).

3. Patterns of Pauline Theology.

The basic patterns of Paul's theological teaching, derivable mostly from his generally undisputed letters, are as follows:

3.1. God's Grace. The primacy of God's grace* which takes the initiative and promotes human recovery (Rom 8:29-30; Phil 1:6; 1 Cor 15:10; 2 Cor 5:18-21; cf. 2 Thess 2:13; Eph 2:1-10).

3.2. The Cosmos. Such an operation, while entering human history in the person of Jesus of Nazareth and at a given point of time (Gal 4:4; cf. Eph 1:10), has repercussions that affect the cosmic scene and involve even the mysterious spiritual intelligences often referred to in Paul's worldview (see Angels; Elements; Principalities and Powers). These cosmic forces are regarded as both created by God and alienated from him (Col 1:15-20; cf. Eph 3:9-10; Rom 8:38-39; 1 Cor 8:5-6).

3.3. The Cross. The cross remains crucial to Paul's salvation teaching both as an event in time and as related to creation's recovery and humanity's need as sinners. But with equal insistence Paul regards the cross as the instrument of self-denial by which the "flesh"* is overcome and a new life, cruciform in shape and diaconal in character, is made possible (Gal 2:20; 6:14; see Cross, Theology of the).

3.4. Ethical Imperative. Thus the gap between historical "is"-ness and ethical "ought"-ness has to be bridged (see the texts in Dahl), and a rationale provided for the apostolic claim that the death and resurrection* of the man Jesus impinge upon human activity both as a power to break the stranglehold of evil and as an effectual summons to new life (Rom 6:1-23; Gal 1:4; 5:13-26; 1 Cor 15:20-28, 34; 2 Cor 5:18-21; 1 Thess 5:9-10; see Ethics; Dying and Rising).

3.5. Missionary Mandate. Nor can we overlook the way Paul's theology was bound up with his professed vocation. He was both a Christian and a missionary (see Mission), charged with a mandate to proclaim and live out the saving truth he claimed to have found in Jesus Christ (Rom 1:1-5; Gal 1:15-16; 1 Cor 9:16-18; Rom 10:14-17). Word and life for Paul went hand in hand; and missionary theology meant just as obviously both the kerygma and the way of life Paul exemplified and enacted in his pastoral dealings with awkward people (at Corinth) and ugly situations (at Philippi).

4. The Theme of Reconciliation.

It is the overall theme of reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation), we propose, that meets most of—if not all—these tests (see Martin). This is not to say that the word-group katallass- is prominent in Paul's writings; manifestly it is not. Nor is it claimed that "reconciliation" is used with the same nuance in those places where it does occur; obviously it does not. But the contention stands, namely, that reconciliation provides a suitable umbrella under which the main features of Paul's kerygma and its practical outworking may be set (see Lemcio 1988, 3-17; 1990, 3-11, for a bold assertion of what these features or "categories" were, summed up as "God [who] sent or raised Jesus. A response towards God brings benefits"). Moreover, justice is done to some of the main motifs in Pauline missionary theology.

The term reconciliation has a pre-history in the tradition Paul gladly took over, as in 2 Corinthians 5:18-21 and Colossians 1:15-20. However, he was not content to leave the term open to misunderstanding; and there is form-critical, linguistic and tradition-historical evidence to show how he has changed the word's meaning by subtle editorial adaptations to the surrounding context. In particular, he has disinfected the term of its gnosticizing taint by anchoring reconciliation in the historical events of Jesus' passion and tying in the effect of reconciliation to moral transformation in human lives.

The counterarguments in Paul are always on the level of personal relationships, of which the forgiveness of sins is the great reality shared alike by apostle and people. To that experience he appeals under a variety of images—new creation,* justification,* redemption,* sonship (see Adoption, Sonship), the gift of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and the promise of resurrection.*

Against those enthusiastic followers who believed that their baptism brought the completion of salvation* here and now, and against the intruding teachers who discounted morality as irrelevant once the spirit had been saved, Paul entered the plea of the "eschatological proviso," the "not-yet" of reconciliation which, unlike justification, is still going on and needs to be renewed continually. Hence the call to Christians at Corinth, "Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor 5:20), lest they receive God's grace to no purpose (2 Cor 6:1) and fail to see his proffered forgiveness (2 Cor 2:5-11; 6:11-13). Reconciliation is thus admirably suited to express and safeguard the existential element in Paul's moral theology. God has achieved a final reconciliation of the world but men and women need to learn to live with moral sensitivity and vigilance until the end comes.

The blend of God's deed and Paul's role as a reconciling agent at Corinth and in the note to Philemon illustrates how the transition from historical factuality to ethical obligation may be made. The middle term is Paul's "ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5:18)—the one clear job description Paul has left on record. What God did expressed his great love,* with Christ's cross at the center (Rom 5:1-11). As Paul gratefully rejoiced in that love as a fact of experience, conveyed by the Spirit, he saw his mission as modeling what God had done in recalling the Corinthians to their true allegiance and in urging Philemon* to consider the social implications of the new life on which he had embarked. The skeleton of an adequate ethical theory is here seen in embryo—even if it took Christians eighteen centuries to work out the force and relevance of this admonition.

Equally, the same may be said about the teaching in Ephesians 2:11-22. Here reconciliation takes on a horizontal direction. The inveterate hostility between Jews and non-Jews (see Gentiles) is overcome in the cross of Jesus who has reconciled both groups in one body (see Body of Christ). The "one new person" in place of two suggests the vision of a "third race," a new species of humankind, who in becoming part of the divine family form a microcosm of that new society which is a token in God's design to place all of conscious life under the headship* of the cosmic Christ (Eph 1:10).

5. Conclusion

These far-ranging and distinctive ideas—covering cosmic, personal, societal and ethnic areas of our human story—are nevertheless part of a pattern, whose picture fills the tapestry. The various strands are closely textured and intricately woven together. Yet they are not aimlessly put into a frame. There is an emerging design and a coherent picture. And the most adequate and meaningful title for the result is, we submit, "reconciliation."

See also CHRISTOLOGY; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; JUSTIFICATION; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, "Contingency and Coherence in the Letters of Paul," USQR 33 (1978) 141-50; idem, Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); idem, The Triumph of God: the Essence of Paul's Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1990); L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul (New York: Herder & Herder, 1959); H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1969); N. A. Dahl, "Form-Critical Observations on Early Christian Preaching," in Jesus in the Memory of the Church (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1976) 30-36; T. Deidun, "Some Recent Attempts at Explaining Paul's Theology," Way 26 (1986) 230-42; J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); J. A. Fitzmyer, Pauline Theology: A Brief Sketch (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1967); J. G. Gibbs, Creation and Redemption (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); C. J. A. Hickling, "Centre and Periphery in Paul's Thought," in Studia Biblica III. Papers on Paul and Other NT Authors, ed. E. A. Livingstone (Sheffield: Academic Press, 1978) 199-214; E. Käsemann, New Testament Questions of Today (London: SCM, 1979); E. E. Lemcio, "The Unifying Kerygma of the New Testament," JSNT 36 (1988) 3-17; 38 (1990) 3-11; R. P. Martin, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); J. Plevnik, "The Center of Paul's Theology," CBQ 51 (1989) 460-78; J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought (Oxford: University Press, 1991); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977).

R. P. Martin

CEPHAS. See PETER.

CHAINS. See PRISON, PRISONER.

CHARISMATA. See GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT.

CHILDREN OF ABRAHAM. See ABRAHAM.

CHILDREN OF GOD. See ADOPTION, SONSHIP.

CHRIST

Paul's extraordinarily frequent use of the term Christos calls for explanation. Paul often used the term as a virtual second name for Jesus, or as a way of distinguishing this particular Jesus from others. Various texts also show that Paul was well aware of the larger significance of the term Christos/Māšîaḥ. It is also notable that there are certain ways Paul refrained from using the term Christos; for instance, we never find the phrase "Jesus the Christ." Careful study of the Jewish and Greek background does not explain the frequency and manner in which Paul used the term Christos. His usage is best explained by the fact that Paul received a tradition associating the term Christ with the core of the early Christian message: the death and resurrection* of Jesus (cf. 1 Cor 15:3-4). This received tradition,* coupled with the singular experience Paul had of Christ on the Damascus Road (see Conversion and Call), go far in explaining the distinctive ideas the apostle associated with Jesus being the Christ. There is, however, no clear explanation or rationale for the particular permutations and combinations that we find in Paul's letters where he juxtaposes Christ with various other names and titles. Christos most often seems to appear where Christ's death, resurrection and return are under discussion. The en Christō formula in many ways best encapsulates Paul's view of the condition and position of Christians—they are "in Christ." The use of the term Christos in the disputed Pauline letters differs little from what we find in those letters generally regarded as authentic, except that there is more emphasis on what may be called cosmic christology.

1. Jewish Background
2. Greek Usage
3. Origin of the Christian Christos Usage
4. Pauline Usage
5. The En Christō Formula
6. Christos in the Contested Pauline Letters

1. Jewish Background.

The Greek verbal adjective christos (which came to be used as a noun) and its Hebrew analog māšîaḥ are terms which were used in early Judaism and Christianity to refer to an anointed person set apart for a special task and, in particular, to a royal and/or messianic figure. In the political realm the term was used of Davidic kings (Ps 18:50; 89:20; 132:10-17). In this regard 2 Samuel 7:8-16 is especially crucial as it expresses the hope that God* would provide the ideal Davidic ruler. It should be noted, however, that none of the later OT prophetic books use the term māšîaḥ for the future royal one like unto David (cf., e.g., Zech 9:9-10; 12:7—13:1). Indeed, in Isaiah 45:1 the term refers to Cyrus, and in Habakkuk 3:13 it appears to refer to a presently reigning king. Furthermore, in early Jewish literature the term is found infrequently (cf. Pss. Sol. 18:5; 4QPBless 3; CD 12:23-24; 14:19; 19:10-11; 1 Enoch 48:10; 52:4) and does not seem to have been "an essential designation for any future redeemer" (De Jonge 1966, 147).

There were various forms of messianic expectation in early Judaism, but it does not appear that the terms translated into English as "Messiah" were used with any frequency, and they probably were not technical terms for a future redeemer figure. The messianic hope of early Judaism could incorporate the idea of one or more messianic figures, as in the royal and priestly anointed figures at Qumran (e.g., 1QS 9:10-11; CD 12:22-23), or none at all when it was believed that Yahweh himself would finally rescue his people (e.g., 1QM 11—12).

2. Greek Usage.

It is surprising that the term Christos is used so frequently by Paul (270 out of a total of 531 uses in the NT) and that it seems to be used as a name for Jesus rather than as a title or descriptive term. This is especially remarkable since in the main Paul was writing to Gentiles* who may or may not have been familiar with the Jewish background for this term. In secular Greek usage the term christos simply means an ointment or cosmetic, but apparently it never referred to the one anointed (cf. Euripides Hipp. 516; Moule, 32). A fragment from a manuscript written by Diodorus Siculus (1b;38-39, 4) shortly before the time of Jesus uses the term neochristos to refer to a building "newly plastered." Thus the prolific Pauline use of the term Christos, almost as a name for Jesus, requires an explanation. This is especially so since there was a perfectly good Greek word available for speaking of an anointed person, ēleimmenos (from the verb aleiphō, "anoint"). And in fact Aquila used this term to render the Hebrew māšîaḥ in his Greek translation of the OT.

The suggestion that the term Christos as a surname for Jesus arose in Gentile Christianity, where its original royal or messianic Jewish connotations were no longer understood, fails to explain why Paul, a Jew, is the chief employer of this term among NT writers (Hengel). Paul's understanding of the meaning of the term is clear from 2 Corinthians 1:21 where we find the play on words "God establishes us in Christ (eis Christon) and has anointed us (chrisas)." Yet, strikingly, Paul rarely speaks of the Christ, but rather Iēsous Christos (Jesus Christ) or sometimes Christos Iēsous (Christ Jesus) or even ho Kyrios Iēsous Christos (the Lord Jesus Christ). This usage strongly suggests that before Paul wrote his letters the term Christos was used widely in early Christianity as part of the name of Jesus. Were this not the case, we would expect Paul somewhere to explain to his audience(s) what the term meant. We must consider briefly the evidence that points to a pre-Pauline use of the term Christos for Jesus.

3. The Origin of the Christian Christos Usage.

In one of Paul's earliest letters, 1 Thessalonians, probably written in the 50s if not earlier, a variety of uses of Christos appear. For example, Paul speaks of the "Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess 1:1; cf. 1 Thess 5:23, 28), "Christ" (1 Thess 2:6), "in Christ Jesus" (1 Thess 2:14) and, what was to become one of Paul's favorite phrases, "in Christ" (1 Thess 4:16). This suggests that in the early 50s, and even earlier, the term Christos had already become a virtual name for Jesus and would be recognized as such by Paul's audience in Macedonia. A similar variety of usage and assumptions can be observed in 1 Corinthians. There, for instance, we find not only the phrase "Christ Jesus" (1 Cor 1:1-4) but also "Christ" (1 Cor 1:6) as well as "our Lord Jesus Christ" and "Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor 1:2, 7-10). There is no obvious significance to this variation; all these terms and phrases refer to the same person in his relationship to his people. Detailed studies about Paul's use of the term Christ have made clear that Paul uses the term in a variety of ways and combinations with other names and titles, and only rarely is it possible to explain these permutations. It would appear that there is no theological rationale for Paul sometimes using the phrase "Christ Jesus" rather than "Jesus Christ," or sometimes preferring the phrase "the Lord Jesus Christ" as opposed to "Christ."

It can be shown that Paul uses the term Christos and its variants especially in contexts where he is drawing upon pre-Pauline tradition or is reflecting on the eschatological significance of Christ's death, resurrection and parousia (see Eschatology). These epochal events are the primary reason Paul is willing to call Jesus Christos (cf. Hengel, 146-48). A summary of Paul's theology of Christ can be found in 2 Corinthians 5:14-21. Christ is the one who died—once for all—and was raised so that those whom he has redeemed might live for him. These events bear witness to the self-sacrificial love that Christ expressed for his people and which they in turn are to emulate. Christ then is the great reconciler of humans to God (2 Cor 5:19; see Reconciliation) and of humans to each other (Gal 3:28). It is the climactic salvific events at the close of Jesus' life that especially cause Paul to call Jesus the Christ. The significance of these events for defining the Christ is also made clear by Paul's virtual silence regarding Jesus' miracles. Furthermore, though Paul does draw on the tradition of Jesus' sayings in 1 Corinthians 7 and elsewhere, he does not cite such sayings as of the essence of his gospel* or kerygma (see Preaching, Kerygma), nor as the heart of the early Christian confession of faith about Christ.

It is important to note that when Paul rehearses the paradosis, the sacred "tradition" of early Christians which he and others handed on, he indicates that it included the confession that "Christos died for our sins" (1 Cor 15:3). This extraordinary formula, having no known precedent in early Judaism, is regarded as the heart of Christian faith by Paul, who had learned of it from those who were "in Christ" before him. This means that in the period between A.D. 30 and the point at which Paul received this tradition (surely prior to his missionary journeys) the term Christos was not only being used by Christians as a term having exclusive reference to Jesus, but already it was being closely linked to Jesus' death as the means of eschatological salvation.

It is possible, as Dahl concluded (1974), that this development can be traced back to the fact that Jesus was crucified as a messianic pretender. There is room for doubt about this, however, since the title on the cross may well have read Basileus, Melek and Rex rather than Christos, Māšîaḥ and Christus. It is perhaps more probable that the early and even pre-Pauline use of the word Christos, virtually as a name for Jesus, is explained by the fact that Jesus during his ministry in some way identified himself as God's final agent (Māšîaḥ) and also spoke of his death in terms something like we find in Mark 10:45 (cf. Witherington, 251-56). Perhaps also the early Hellenistic-Jewish Christians knew that the average Greek speaker might easily take the word Christos, like the more familiar term Chrestos (cf. Suetonius Claudius 25, where evidently Christus is read as Chrestus) to be a name, distinguishing this Jesus from others by that name. Furthermore, it is possible that the double name Jesus Christ in part became common because early Christians wished to suggest the royal dignity of their savior and thus gave him a double name like other notable figures of the era, such as Caesar Augustus.

4. Pauline Usage.

Paul, wherever he may have first heard of Jesus being called Christos as a virtual second name, did not lose sight of the fact that Christos was originally likely to have been a title. This is shown by several pieces of evidence. First, Paul never juxtaposes Kyrios with Christos alone, for this would amount to awkwardly combining two titles (Grundmann, 542-43). The one possible exception to this rule is found in Colossians 3:24 where we find tō kyriō Christō douleuete ("you serve/are slaves to the Lord Christ"), but there kyriō may well carry its secular meaning of "master," not divine Lord (cf. Col 3:22-23). Second, Paul never adds a genitive to the term Christos (as may be observed in early Judaism, e.g., "the Anointed of the Lord"). In fact, he does not use the term in any sort of possessive expression, such as "God's Christ" (but cf. 1 Cor 3:23). Neither is Christos ever used as a simple predicate in the Pauline letters. Nor is the expression "Jesus the Christ" ever found (Dahl, 37). In fact, Paul never feels it necessary to state the formula "Jesus is the Christ," nor does he argue for the idea. On the other hand, he among others utilized what is commonly regarded as the earliest of Christian confessions "Jesus is Lord" (Rom 10:9; see Creeds). This evidence strongly suggests that the messiahship of Jesus was not under debate in the Pauline communities, and that Paul himself took it as a presupposition for all other confessions. In his letters he did not, for example, try to demonstrate by prooftexts the messiahship of Jesus. J. D. G. Dunn puts it this way:

> [Paul] makes no attempt to prove that Jesus really is "the Christ" despite his suffering and death. "Christ" is no longer a title whose fitness in its application to Jesus has to be demonstrated. The belief in Jesus as the Christ has become so firmly established in his mind and message that he simply takes it for granted, and "Christ" functions simply as a way of speaking of Jesus, as a proper name for Jesus (so even in 1 Cor. 15.3). (Dunn, 43)

One of the most important ways Paul uses the term Christos is in a daring phrase meant to characterize his preaching: Christos estaurōmenos ("Christ crucified," 1 Cor 1:23). The phrase must have had some shock value for Jewish listeners since there is no conclusive evidence that early Jews expected a crucified Messiah. Crucifixion* was a punishment reserved for the worst criminals and revolutionaries. Jews, on the basis of a certain reading of Deuteronomy 21:23 (cf. Gal 3:13), seem to have understood crucifixion to be a sign that the crucified person was cursed by God. There is no conclusive evidence that Isaiah 53 was ever applied to the Messiah before Jesus' day (the significance of the evidence from Tg. Isa 53 is debatable).

Careful scrutiny of Paul's usage of the term Christ suggests that in the main Paul's meaning was not derived from early Jewish ideas about God's anointed, but rather from traditions about the conclusion of Jesus' life and its sequel, coupled with Paul's own Damascus Road experience. These events forced Paul to rethink what it meant for someone to be the Davidic Messiah (Kim). The fact that Paul and other early Christians used the term Christos to refer to someone who had died on the cross and had risen from the dead, indicates the extent to which the meaning of the term was transformed. Christos brought redemption to his people by dying, rising and being exalted (see Exaltation) to authority* and power* at the right hand of God over all the principalities (see Principalities and Powers). He did not bring redemption by throwing off the yoke of Roman rule during his earthly ministry. In short, Paul has something rather different in mind from what is found in such texts as Psalms of Solomon 17—18 where Messiah is seen as a conquering hero throwing off the yoke of a foreign rule.

Yet it would not be quite true to say as Grundmann does that "the understanding of the Messiah loses its national, political, and religious significance and the significance of the Messiah in human history is attested and expounded. This is the distinctive theological achievement of Paul" (Grundmann, 555). In Romans 15:8 Paul very clearly recounts the fact that Christ became a servant to the circumcision,* and he holds out the hope of the salvation* of many Jews at the eschaton (Rom 11:25-26). Christ is only now a savior to the Gentiles through his ministers and apostles* like Paul (cf. Rom 15:16-18), but in Paul's mind this does not nullify the significance of Christ's prior mission and service to Jews. Indeed, Paul wishes to insist to his largely Gentile audience that salvation is from and for the Jew first and also the Gentile (Rom 1:16; see Israel).

Paul was well aware of early Jewish ideas about Messiah being a Jew born under the Law* (cf. Gal 4:4) and of Davidic ancestry (cf. Rom 1:3), and he is happy to affirm these things of Jesus. There are also various places where Paul referred to the fully human character of this Christos (Rom 5:17-19; Phil 2:7; Rom 8:3). He was also aware that early Jews by and large did not think of Messiah as some sort of superhuman figure, but rather as an exemplary human being especially anointed with God's Spirit (Grundmann, 526; but cf. the parables of 1 Enoch which suggest a more-than-human figure, and possibly the Son of man of Dan 7). Yet here too Paul appears to have gone far beyond the majority of his Jewish contemporaries in his understanding of the Davidic Messiah, for the most natural way to read the grammatically difficult phrase in Romans 9:5 is as follows: "comes the Christ who is over all God blessed forever" (Metzger). This suggests that Paul saw the Christ as not only assuming divine functions in heaven but in some sense properly being called God.* This comports with Philippians 2:11, where Jesus Christos is called by the divine name used in the LXX, kyrios ("Lord"), as well as with Colossians 1:19 ("for in him all the fullness [plērōma] was pleased to dwell"). It should be noted that in Romans 9:5 Paul very clearly speaks of "the Christ," which once more indicates his understanding of the larger significance of the term.

Paul's use of Christos in the salutations of his letters* also points to an exalted view of Jesus. Thus, for instance, in Philippians 1:2 grace and peace are said to come not only from God the Father but also from the Lord Jesus Christ. As Moule puts it, "The position here occupied by Jesus in relation to God, as well as in many other opening formulae of the New Testament letters, is nothing short of astounding—especially when one considers that they are written by monotheistic Jews with reference to a figure of recently past history" (Moule, 150). In these instances Jesus Christ is seen as one who dispenses what only God can truly give—shalom (see Peace, Reconciliation).

Romans 1:16 provides a possible clue indicating why Paul so persistently used the term Christos and occasionally gave hints that it was originally a title, rather than using a term such as Sōtēr ("Savior"*) to refer to Jesus. Though Paul was the apostle to the Gentiles, he wished to continue to affirm to his audience, and perhaps on occasion even stress, that salvation is from the Jews and for the Jews before it is for others. One way of doing this was to continue to juxtapose the two terms Iēsous Christos. Paul, as a Jew, wished it never to be forgotten that Jesus, who is savior of the world, is such only as the Jewish Messiah—the Christos. Thus it may be that Paul's use of the term Christos as a virtual name for Jesus, as well as the manner in which he refrained from using the term, was not just a matter of habit. On the other hand, it was an attempt by Paul to remind an increasingly Gentile church of the Jewish origin and character of the Savior and his salvation.

The term Christos, if studied in the context of its varied uses in the Pauline corpus, reveals how the apostle drew on, amplified, transformed and transcended some early Jewish ideas about the Messiah. For Paul the content of the term Christos was mainly derived from the Christ event and his experience of that event. This led to three elements in his preaching about Christ that were without known precedent in early Judaism: (1) Messiah is called God; (2) Messiah is said to have been crucified, and his death is seen as redemptive; (3) Messiah is expected to come to earth again. Non-Christian Jews did not speak of a crucified Messiah much less of a Second Coming of Messiah. Nor do we have any evidence that early Jews were willing to call the Messiah "God," or one in whom the fullness of deity dwells.

5. The En Christō Formula.

It was probably due to careful reflection on some of the three elements listed above that Paul came to use the phrase en Christō ("in Christ") as he did (see In Christ). En Christō was unquestionably one of Paul's favorite phrases, appearing 164 times in the chief Pauline letters and another half dozen in the form en Christō Iēsou ("in Christ Jesus") in the Pastorals. This total is especially remarkable in view of the fact that other NT writers hardly ever used the phrase (but cf., e.g., 1 Pet 3:16; 5:10, 14). Paul never used the term Christianos ("Christian"), rather en Christō seems to be his substitute for this adjective (cf. 1 Cor 3:1). At other points the phrase en Christō seems to have a more pregnant sense indicating the environment or atmosphere in which Christians live, that is, they are "in Christ." A. Deissmann in his pioneering study Die Neutestamentliche Formel "in Christo Jesu" (1892) argued that this formula had both a local and mystical meaning in which Christ, as a sort of universal Spirit, was the very atmosphere in which believers lived.

A good example of this usage is found in 2 Corinthians 5:17: "If anyone is in Christ, that person (or "there") is a new creation" (cf. Phil 3:8-9; see Creation and New Creation). In fact whole congregations could be said to be "in Christ" in the same way they were said to be "in God" (cf. Gal 1:22 and Phil 1:1 with 1 Thess 1:1). There are a variety of other passages which seem to have a locative sense (1 Thess 4:16; Gal 2:17; 1 Cor 1:2; 15:18). A. Schweitzer in The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (1931), rejecting much of Deissmann's reasoning, argued that the solidarity that Paul envisioned Christians having with Christ and with each other is a corporate one of a quasi-physical nature which occurs through the material rite of water baptism* and not through some subjective experience brought about through faith.* This surely goes beyond the evidence and contradicts such texts as Galatians 2:16 and Romans 5:2. Schweitzer's view seems to have been more indebted to his own understanding of early Jewish eschatology than to Paul.

Paul does speak of Christ being in the believer (Gal 2:20; Rom 8:10), but this is not nearly so characteristic of the apostle as the phrase en Christō. It does not seem possible either to argue that Paul is simply using the language of transfer from one dominion to another or to eliminate completely the locative sense of en Christō in various instances. Nor can these texts simply be explained as another way of saying one belongs to Christ or that things are accomplished for the believer through Christ. Rather, for Paul both logically and theologically the concept of being en Christō is central. One cannot do something for or with Christ unless one is first en Christō. One cannot approach the Father through the Son (see Son of God) unless one is en Christō. If one is en Christō then one is in his body—the ekklēsia (see Church). The effects of being in Christ are varied: human spiritual transformation by means of death to sin,* possession of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), being made a new creation or creature, having one's inner person and mind renewed, being given both hope* and assurance of a bodily resurrection* like unto Christ's, and being united spiritually with a great host of other believers in a living entity Paul likens to a body.*

The christological implications of this use of en Christō have been ably summed up by C. F. D. Moule:

> "if it is really true that Paul thought of himself and other Christians as 'included' or 'located' in Christ; . . . it indicates a more than individualistic conception of the person of Christ . . . a plurality of persons can find themselves 'in Christ', as limbs are in the body." (Moule, 62, 65)

This means that Paul conceives of the exalted Christ as a divine being in whom Christians everywhere can dwell. Put another way, Paul's views on both incorporation into Christ and its result, being in Christ, suggest a view of Christ as a divine being "in" whom all believers can dwell and at the same time a divine being who can be "in" all believers, through the presence of the Spirit.

6. Christos in the Contested Pauline Letters.

In Colossians* and Ephesians* we find a further development of Paul's christology focusing on what is called "the mystery* of Christ." This mystery is that God in Christ has provided salvation and reconciliation for all peoples, Jews and Gentiles, and even for the whole cosmos (see World, Cosmology). The cosmic scope of Christ's role becomes particularly evident in these two letters. It is thus not surprising that these letters place more emphasis on the ongoing role of the exalted Christ than do most of Paul's earlier letters, though reference to Christ's death and resurrection is not absent. In these two letters Christ is seen not only as a personal savior for individuals but also as a cosmic ruler. In Christ is found the storehouse of God's wisdom* and knowledge* (Col 2:2-10), although the mystery is not esoteric since it has to do with Christ's public work on the cross and in both letters the mystery is carefully related to the community of faith. According to Ephesians 1:22 Christ rules over the cosmos for the church, and in Ephesians 5:32 the mystery has to do with the relationship of Christ to his church. Furthermore, the relationship between Christ's headship over both the cosmos and the church becomes evident in the Christ hymn of Colossians 1:15-20, where the two are mentioned in the same breath.

Among the "faithful sayings" that characterize the Pastoral Epistles (see Pastoral Letters), only two add anything new to the concept of Christ revealed in Paul's earlier letters. In 1 Timothy 6:13 Christ's witness is made before Pilate, thus tracing moments of christological significance back to an event prior to Christ's death. Earlier, in 1 Timothy 1:15 we read that Christ "came into the world" for the specific purpose of saving sinners. This theme presses the moments of christological significance even further back into the story of Christ, at least to the inception of Jesus' human life, and possibly alludes to Christ's preexistence (see Christology). The latter idea is expressed elsewhere in Paul, most clearly in the Christ hymns* of Philippians 2:6-11 and Colossians 1:15-20. In 1 Timothy 2:5 the stress is on the humanity of Jesus as the mediator between God and humanity. Finally, it should be noted that the Pastorals reflect a certain predilection for the phrase "Christ Jesus" or occasionally "Christ Jesus" combined with "our Lord."

The study of Paul's use of the term Christos provides a window on the character of Paul's christological thought, but it must be supplemented with detailed study of other important christological ideas such as Lord,* last Adam* and Son of God.*

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; IN CHRIST; LORD; SAVIOR; SON OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963); N. A. Dahl, "The Messiahship of Jesus in Paul," in The Crucified Messiah and Other Essays (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1974) 37-47; M. De Jonge, Christology in Context (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988); idem, "The Earliest Christian use of χριστός. Some Suggestions," NTS 32 (1986) 321-43; idem, "The Use of the Word 'Anointed' in the Time of Jesus," NovT 8 (1966) 132-48; J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); W. Grundmann, "χριστός," TDNT IX.540-62; M. Hengel, " 'Christos' in Paul," in Between Jesus and Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 65-77; J. Jeremias, "Artikelloses Christos," ZNW 57 (1966) 211-15; idem, "Nochmals: Artikelloses Christos in 1K 15.3," ZNW 60 (1969) 215-17; S. E. Johnson, "Christ," IDB 2.567-68; S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); W. Kramer, Christos Kyrios Gottessohn (AThANT 44; Zurich: Zwingli, 1963); S. V. McCasland, "Christ Jesus," JBL 65 (1946) 377-83; I. H. Marshall, The Origins of New Testament Christology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1990 [1976]); B. M. Metzger, "The Punctuation of Romans 9.5," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 95-112; C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: University Press, 1977); F. Neugebauer, "Das Paulinische 'in Christo,' " NTS 4 (1957-58) 124-38; J. Neusner, W. S. Green, E. Frerichs, Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era (Cambridge: University Press, 1987); K. H. Rengstorf, "χριστός," NIDNTT 2.334-43; C. C. Torrey, "χριστός," in Quantulacumque (Kirsopp Lake Festschrift) ed. R. P. Casey et al. (London: Christopher, 1937) 317-24; B. Witherington, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990).

B. Witherington III

CHRIST HYMN.

See CHRISTOLOGY; HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS; PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE; WORSHIP.

CHRISTOLOGICAL MONOTHEISM.

See CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; SON OF GOD.

CHRISTOLOGY

Pauline christology has frequently been discussed under the headings of the prominent titles Paul employed—Christ,* Lord,* Son of God,* Savior*—and prominent analogies such as Adam* and Wisdom.* Important as this christological nomenclature may be, however, it does not engage the full picture of Pauline christology. In an attempt to enlarge on the perspective gained through an account of the individual facets of Paul's christology, this article will focus on the origins of Paul's christology, its narrative framework, its dual focus on the divinity and humanity of Christ, the significance of Paul's christology for the early church and its distinctive contribution in comparison and contrast with other canonical christologies.

1. The Origins of Paul's Christology
2. The Narrative Framework of Paul's Christology
3. The Divinity and Humanity of Jesus Christ in Paul's Christology
4. The Impact and Influence of Paul's Christology
5. The Distinctiveness and Commonality of Paul's Christology

1. The Origins of Paul's Christology.

There are various possible starting points for discussing the sources or origins of Paul's christology.

1.1. Judaism. One approach is to attempt to extrapolate from the NT documents and extracanonical sources Paul the Pharisee's (see Jew, Paul the) beliefs about the coming Messiah. How much of a debt did Paul's christology owe to his pre-Christian messianic beliefs? This enterprise, however, involves a tremendous amount of conjecture not only about messianic faith in pre-A.D. 70 Pharisaism, but also about Paul's unique appropriation of his heritage (for the complexity of the evidence representing the "Judaisms" of Paul's day, see Neusner et al.). Unfortunately, apart from a few references here and there, Paul says little about his pre-Christian beliefs about Messiah. The most one can assume, judging from a text such as Romans 9:5, is that he must have believed in a coming human and Davidic Messiah. While Paul's debt to Jewish messianism, and particularly Pharisaic messianism, was surely greater than this, the evidence for discovering the degree or character of this debt is not available (but see Hengel 1991).

1.2. Hellenism. Another method of ferreting out the origins of Paul's christological thinking has been the religionsgeschichtliche ("history-of-religions") approach. Perhaps the paramount and most influential example of this approach is W. Bousset's classic work Kyrios Christos (1913). There the christology of Paul and the early church is compared with ideas from the Greco-Roman world, particularly those found in its various forms of pagan religious thought. For example, it was assumed that Paul appropriated the title kyrios ("Lord") from pagan usage and so reflected the Hellenizing influence on early Christian thought. An underlying premise of this approach, however, assumes a radical distinction between Hellenism and Palestinian Judaism, an assumption that has been severely discredited by the work of M. Hengel and others (Hengel 1974; see Hellenism). Research has shown, for example, that documents such as Sirach and the Maccabean corpus attest to the influence of Hellenism on Palestinian Jewish thinking about God and other religious matters well before the Christian era.

But apart from these more general considerations, there is evidence that the title kyrios arose from an early chapter in the emergence of the church and was not a product of the later Hellenization of Christianity. The Aramaic cry Marana tha, "Our Lord, come" (1 Cor 16:22; see Liturgical Elements), which surely goes back to Aramaic-speaking Palestinian or bilingual Antiochean Jewish Christians, shows that prior to the writing of Paul's extant letters, Jesus was being invoked and beckoned as a divine Lord who would return to his people. Had early Christians believed Jesus was simply a deceased Palestinian Jewish teacher, this sort of address would never have arisen (cf. Moule, Longenecker). And its preservation in Aramaic, transliterated into Greek, attests to its revered place in early Christian devotion to Christ (see Worship).

1.3. Paul's Conversion/Call and Early Christian Tradition. For reasons such as we have just given, modern research into the origins of Paul's christology has found a more promising approach in examining early christological confessions (see Creed) embedded in Paul's letters and in exploring Paul's own statements about his call/conversion (see Conversion and Call). From this evidence conclusions may be drawn about how that experience and his encounter with early Christian confessions may have shaped his christology.

Galatians 1:11-23 provides the clearest and probably the earliest statement from Paul about his own conversion and its immediate consequences. Here Paul is adamant in stating that he did not receive his gospel* through human beings, nor was it human in origin nor the result of some human instruction he received. To the contrary, Paul claims to have received his gospel by revelation directly from God.* It must be stressed that in this passage Paul is primarily defending the source and substance of his gospel, not his conversion to Christ, and this goes a long way toward explaining the differences that have been noted between this narrative and the Acts accounts, particularly those of Acts 9 and 22. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that Acts does provide us with some reliable data on the matter of Paul's call/conversion. Both in Paul's letters, and certainly in the third Acts account of his conversion/call (Acts 26), it is clear that Paul did not see his commission, mission and essential message as deriving from a human source. We read of no Christian instruction delivered to Saul prior to his Damascus Road experience and, as Acts 26 makes clear, Ananias was not the ultimate source of Paul's commission and mission.* All three elements are traced to his encounter with the exalted Lord. This point is equally clear in Acts 9:15 and, to a lesser but significant degree, in Acts 22:14.

1.3.1. "The Gospel of Christ." The real issue for Paul in Galatians* is not to establish that he is an authentic Christian, or that he received a missionary commission or even to identify the source of the Pauline Gospel; the issue is the content of his gospel. In Galatians 1:7 Paul identifies his gospel with "the gospel of Christ," a gospel which his opponents in Galatia were seeking to pervert. This phrase "the gospel of Christ" could be understood as "the gospel that comes from Christ" or "the gospel of which Christ is the content." The difference is significant, and a clue to Paul's meaning is found within the immediate context when Paul says that "God . . . was pleased to reveal his Son to me" (Gal 1:15-16). Paul appeals to a revelation, the content of which was the "Son of God." This is likely the meaning of "gospel of Christ" in Galatians 1:7 as well. If this is so, then it is germane to this argument that in the accounts of Acts 9 and 22 Ananias does not teach Saul about Jesus Christ. Rather, in Acts 9 he tells him to arise, receive his sight and be baptized, while in Acts 22 Ananias expounds the meaning of Paul's commission. In any event, in light of the word of the Lord that comes to Ananias in Acts 9:15-16, we are probably to understand Ananias as speaking a prophetic word to Paul, not offering mere human instruction or counsel.

Furthermore, whatever Paul may have meant by "the gospel of Christ," he was well aware that subsequent to his conversion he had received traditions about Jesus and his teachings from other Christians, probably including Peter when Paul first visited Jerusalem (Gal 1:18; see Tradition; Jesus, Sayings of). And we can scarcely believe that when Paul went up to Jerusalem* again "after fourteen years," Peter,* James* and John only listened quietly as Paul laid before them the gospel he had been proclaiming among the Gentiles* (Gal 2:1-10). It is reasonably certain that while Paul can say "those leaders contributed nothing to me," their words with Paul amounted to more than simply an endorsement of his commission. Paul's point in Galatians 2 is that his "gospel of Christ," the distinctive and essential insights he received directly from Christ either during or as a result of reflecting on the Damascus Road experience, was left undisturbed. What were the elements that he may have learned from this firsthand encounter on the Damascus Road?

1.3.2. The Risen and Exalted Christ. First, the apostle* learned that Jesus was still alive—though in a form transcending mere flesh and blood. Since Paul was a Pharisee and believed in resurrection,* he probably came to the immediate conclusion that the Christian claims about Jesus having risen must have been true. We know from his statement in 1 Corinthians 9:1, "Have I not seen the risen Lord?" (cf. 1 Cor 15:8), that Paul did draw such a conclusion, whether at his conversion/call or later. In Paul's mind certain things necessarily would have followed from this conclusion. If Jesus after his death* had been exalted in heaven,* then this surely meant Jesus' claims, or at least the claims made about Jesus, had been vindicated. Thus Paul in Romans 1:4 says that Jesus was vindicated as or designated to be the Son of God in power* by his resurrection from the dead (see Life and Death). Inasmuch as Jesus did not reject the claim to be Messiah Paul could have concluded that if Jesus was alive in heaven, then he must be God's anointed one. Why else would God vindicate someone who had died a death by crucifixion,* a death that, in light of early Jewish understanding of Deuteronomy 21:22, meant the crucified was accursed (see Curse, Accursed) by God? As Galatians 3:13 makes clear, Paul came to believe that Christ had become a curse for believers in order to redeem them from the curse of the Law* (cf. 1 Cor 12:3). In short, Paul's experience of a risen and exalted Jesus occasioned a complete reversal of his estimate of Jesus and his crucifixion.

Paul had once regarded Jesus from a purely human point of view (2 Cor 5:16)—a failure, perhaps a fool and certainly not the Jewish Messiah—but after the Damascus Road experience he did so no longer. He now viewed Jesus as the Son of God. This does not mean Paul had no use for apostolic traditions about Jesus or for the actual sayings of Jesus.

1.3.3. The Corporate Christ. The second thing Paul is likely to have deduced from his Damascus Road encounter was that Jesus closely identified himself with the Christians Paul had been persecuting. As Acts attests, the risen Lord asked Saul, "Why are you persecuting me? . . . I am Jesus whom you are persecuting" (Acts 9:4-5; cf. Acts 22:7-8; 26:14-15). This would have suggested to him that the Christians must be God's people. If God's special Son was so closely identifying himself with those whom Saul was persecuting, Saul needed to reevaluate his understanding of the people of God. Far from doing God's will in persecuting Christians, he found himself to be opposing God's Christ and thus opposing God. It is possible that Paul's later theology of the body of Christ (see Body of Christ) owed something to his Damascus Road experience, where he learned that the afflictions* of Christians were also the afflictions of Christ (cf. Robinson, 58; Kim, 252-56).

1.3.4. The Savior Christ. Third, Saul may have learned that he had been saved or converted on the road to Damascus quite apart from his own actions and deserts. Indeed, Christ had laid claim on him in spite of Paul's actions. This could only lead to the conclusion that salvation* in its forgiving* and transforming power was a gift of grace* (see Dunn 1977, 190).

This experience of grace in turn meant that Paul had to assume a new attitude toward the Law. Whereas previously the Law had been the center point of his religious life before God, Christ and the experience of Christ was now the integrating factor in his life. All of life had to be seen through the eyes of Christ, not through the lens of the Law. For Paul, Christ was the terminus of the Law, insofar as the Law might be understood as a means of salvation. Salvation by works,* or even salvation by responding to the initial work and grace of God by obedience to the Mosaic Law (covenantal nomism; see Law), was no longer—if it ever had been—possible. Life before God could no longer be a matter of "do this and you shall live." Rather, it became a matter of a righteousness* received by grace through faith* which enabled one to obey the law of Christ (a different matter from Moses' Law; see Law of Christ) out of gratitude.

Nevertheless, none of this meant that Paul saw no value in the Mosaic Law. Indeed he saw it as holy, just and good, and some of its instruction was seen as a valuable moral guide for Christian living, particularly the narrative portions which could be used in a typological manner (cf. 1 Cor 10). The Law's problem was that while it could often inform a person about what was evil and what was good, it could not enable one to shun the evil or do the good. It could not provide the life and power that was available from Christ through the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), which made possible a lifestyle pleasing to God. In addition the Law, though splendid, had but a partial and fading splendor which was eclipsed by Christ—the fuller and final revelation of God's good and perfect will and character (cf. 2 Cor 3:4-18).

It is not surprising that Paul concentrated on preaching Christ crucified and risen, for in his mind these were the decisive events which had changed the human situation before God. One who formerly had stood under the Law and its condemnation could now in Christ stand under grace and its justification.* If salvation was by grace through faith in the Lord Jesus who was crucified and risen, nothing stood in the way of anyone, Gentiles included, being saved apart from the Mosaic Law. For Paul the removal of the Mosaic Law as a means of right-standing with God, as a way of being saved or working out one's salvation, had broken down the barrier between Jew and Gentile (cf. Eph. 2:14-15). If faith in the risen Lord was the way of salvation, then it could be offered to all without prior religious commitment to the Jewish requirements of circumcision,* food* laws and keeping the whole of Torah.

Paul, according to Galatians 1:16, saw the purpose of his conversion to be his call as a missionary to the Gentiles. This call complemented his experience of God's grace. If one's standing before God was all of grace, there was no reason why grace could not be offered to all without the preconditions of the Mosaic Law. Thus it is quite possible that Paul deduced the heart of his gospel from his conversion experience. When Paul spoke of the revelation (apokalypsis) of Christ (Gal 1:12, 16), or of Christ as the glory* (doxa) of God (2 Cor 4:6), he may have been reflecting the experience recorded in Acts of a blinding light that accompanied the revelation of the risen Lord. In Paul's mind the revelation of Jesus in glory on the Damascus Road probably signaled the arrival of the eschatological age (see Eschatology) in which old things were passing and would pass away and new things were coming into existence (Kim 71-74; cf. also Burton, 42-43). The arrival of the new age initiated for Paul a new christocentric view of the Law and ethics* in general. This was but a part of his larger enterprise of revisioning the story of Israel* in light of the story of Christ.

2. The Narrative Framework of Paul's Christology. The universe of Paul's thought revolved around the Son of God, Jesus Christ. Paul's christology illumined his thought in its entirety, sometimes shedding its light on aspects of his thought that one might have expected would have gone relatively untouched by christology. For instance, who would have expected Paul, in midrashic fashion, to tell his Corinthian listeners that the rock that gave forth water to the Israelites during their period of wilderness wanderings was Christ (1 Cor 10:4)? Here he draws on sapiential ideas about the role of personified Wisdom* in Israel (cf. Wis 11:2-4, "They journeyed through the uninhabited wilderness. . . . When they were thirsty, they called upon [Wisdom], and water was given them out of flinty rock"). Paul's view of Christ was so broad that he could conceive of him as being involved in God's dealings with his people long before he was born and began his earthly ministry. This is apparently because he saw Christ as Wisdom come in the flesh* (cf. 1 Cor 1:24), and therefore whatever had been said of Wisdom in early Jewish thought, including its existence in heaven before creation* (cf. Prov 8; Sir 24; Wis 7), was now predicated of Christ (cf. Witherington 1993, chaps. 7—8).

2.1. Christology and Theology. Two opposite dangers must be avoided in the study of Pauline christology. First is the danger of underestimating the significance and weight of Pauline christology for Paul's thought world. Paul's christology should be seen as a subspecies of his theology. For Paul "Jesus is Lord" is not merely a functional description of Jesus' work since his resurrection. Many, though not all, of the names, titles, roles and functions of God were predicated of Christ precisely because Paul believed that he was dealing with God in Christ, and God as Christ (though in neither respect did Paul define this with the precision of the later church councils). Christ was one way God had manifested himself to the world. Christ could be an object of confession and worship for Paul and other early Jewish Christians precisely because Christ was seen as divine. Paul was not advocating a violation of Jewish monotheism (see God) by advocating the worship* of Christ, because he believed that Christ was divine. L. W. Hurtado has demonstrated that early Jewish monotheism could include the idea of divine agency, which on occasion involved seeing a human figure of the distant past, such as an Enoch or a patriarch, as a divine agent of God (cf. Hurtado, 17-92). In such a context seeing the Messiah as a divine agent of God, or as Wisdom in person, was not such a radical departure from Jewish orthodoxy as has sometimes been thought.

Paul's letters do not present a developed doctrine of the Trinity or a lengthy explanation of the interrelationships in the Godhead, but in predicating divinity of Father, Son and Spirit, Paul provided the raw data for later Christian trinitarianism. Christology was a form of theology for Paul, though by no means the only form. When Paul spoke of Christ handing over the kingdom to the Father "so that God may be all in all" (1 Cor 15:28) he was not dissolving christology into theology (cf. Beker, 200, 344).

Likewise, Paul was not christomonistic, a perspective which regards christology as the exclusive or near-exclusive form of theology. While Paul reenvisioned the world and even God from a christocentric point of view, he maintained a significant place in his theology for the Father and the Spirit. For Paul it was the Father alone who had sent the Son, the Son alone who had died on the cross* and the Spirit alone by whom believers were baptized into the one body of Christ. Paul not only distinguished these three by their functions, but also by their nature—inasmuch as they might be compared to Christ's human nature (i.e., the Father and the Spirit do not have a human nature). Casting Paul's theology as a christomonism fails to appreciate the apostle's differentiation between the distinctive roles, functions and characteristics of Father, Son and Spirit.

Too often discussions of Paul's christology, while recognizing it to be a subspecies of his theology, have approached the subject piecemeal, analyzing christological titles in isolation from one another. The frequent outcome is a display of ideas torn from the fabric of Paul's thought with little accounting for the coherent core of Paul's christology as it was expressed in the contingencies of the situations he addressed. J. C. Beker rightly points to both the coherency of Paul's thought through time and its contingency as it addresses particular situations and concerns. The study of christological titles can be helpful, but it can also be reductionistic, treating elements of Paul's thought as permutations in the history of theological ideas. This approach overlooks the fact that Paul's theological thought is woven together with his ethical and practical thinking as well as with his social concerns. Isolating christology at the cost of neglecting the rest of his thought world often results in an imbalanced picture. The whole of Paul's christology is much greater than the sum of its parts.

2.2. The Fourfold Narrative. A more adequate approach to Paul's christology recognizes its narrative shape (cf. Hays). That is to say, Paul's christology implies a story in which four aspects may be identified: the story of Christ, the story of Israel, the story of the world and the story of God.

2.2.1. The Story of Christ. The narrative structure follows the course of one who was in the very form of God (Phil 2:6) but set aside his divine prerogatives and status in order to take the status of a slave and die a slave's death; for this reason God exalted him. Paul may have derived this much of the story from reflecting on already existing christological hymns* that were part of early Christian worship (cf. Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; Heb 1:2-4; and also Jn 1:1-14). These hymns ascribed to Christ traits that early Judaism had ascribed to personified Wisdom (cf. Witherington 1993, chap. 7). Paul, however, continues the story in relating Christ's ongoing role in heaven and his future return to earth as divine judge* and triumphant* Lord. Thus Paul's story of Christ transcends the more familiar pattern of Endzeit = Urzeit (endtime = primal time). Christ's exalted state does not simply recapitulate his pre-existent state. A few examples will illustrate some of these points.

First, the christological hymn in Philippians 2:6-11 indicates that the career of Christ determines how he should be confessed. Jesus was given a throne name of "Lord" precisely because God highly exalted him as a result of his finished work on earth, which included death on a cross. The dio kai of Philippians 2:9 is crucial, and should be translated "and therefore" or "and that is why." Ever since his death, and precisely because of his earthly life and death as a servant,* Jesus has been highly exalted (see Exaltation) to a place of divine honor and power, and so he is now functioning as Lord. This is why in the present age he may be properly confessed using the divine throne name "Lord."*

Second, the title *Christ became, among early Christians, another name for Jesus. But Jesus was a human being, just as various early Jews seem to have expected Messiah to be. Christ, on the rare occasions when it functions as a title in Paul, refers primarily to the role of Jesus during his earthly career, climaxing in the cross. For this reason Paul can resolve to know nothing among the Corinthians but "Christ crucified" (cf. 1 Cor 1:23). It can also on occasion be used to refer to Christ's roles after his death and resurrection, and even in his pre-existence* (cf. 1 Cor 10:4). Thus it is critical to understand the christological titles within the narrative framework of Paul's story of Christ.

2.2.2. The Story of Israel. A larger story, the story of Israel,* also informed Paul's christology. Jesus was born of woman and born under the Law (Gal 4:4). For Paul this meant a sending of God's Son to be the human Jesus. Moreover, this Son was sent to redeem those under the Law, Israel, a fact that clearly presupposes the lostness of Israel (see Restoration). More importantly, this story of Israel influenced how Paul viewed both the name and the roles of the Christ. He is God's royal and even pre-existent Son, sent to redeem God's people. For it was to Israel that the promise of a Messiah had been made and from Israel the Messiah was to come (Rom 9:4-5). For Paul the sonship of Jesus was another way of speaking of Jesus as a Jewish royal or messianic figure who came to set his people free. For this reason Paul can speak of the gospel as for the Jew first (Rom 1:16).

2.2.3. The Story of the World. The story of Christ and of Israel are a part of yet a larger story, the story of the world.* For Paul the world is fallen (cf. Rom 1) and living on borrowed time; the present form of this world is passing away (1 Cor 7:31; cf. Gal 1:4). On the one hand this fact relativizes relationships and other social realities that may have seemed of paramount importance in the past. On the other hand, the fact of the world's gradual demise makes decisions about the critical issues in life all the more crucial. The world is bent on self-destruction yet longs for liberation, and this is true not just of the human world but of the whole material creation (Rom 8:20-22). In addition, Paul can speak of malevolent supernatural powers (see Principalities and Powers), including Satan* and demons,* who are part of the present age (cf. 1 Cor 10:20-21; 2 Cor 2:11; 4:4).

It is against this dark backdrop and in the very midst of this world that the drama of Israel and her Messiah and the Christian community is played out (cf. Wright, chap. 2).

2.2.4. The Story of God. Transcending the story of the world is the story of the Son as part of the ongoing life of God. This is a story of the interrelationship of Father, Son and Spirit, and it too informs Paul's christology. The story of God is intertwined with the story of the world. The christological hymn of Colossians 1:15-20 (cf. 2 Cor 4:4) indicates that the Son played a role in the creation of all things, including humankind. Thus the role of Christ as redeemer (see Redemption) is part of the divine initiative to reconcile (see Peace, Reconciliation) all things to God. And the Incarnation is part of the story of God. Moreover, the subduing and reconciling of the powers and principalities* is also part of the larger story of God, though this cosmic mission is also intertwined with the story of Christ as redeemer of humankind (1 Cor 15:24). The place of this cosmic christology in Paul's thought is well founded, for whatever one may conclude about the authorship or contingent circumstances being addressed in Colossians,* the elements of this christology were already evident in Paul's christology as it was expressed in 1 Corinthians 15:24-26. Moreover, this is an eschatological story, for in relating God's final action toward his creation, the story is eschatological in both framework and substance (see Eschatology).

3. The Divinity and Humanity of Jesus Christ in Paul's Christology.

3.1. Christ's Divinity. We have already seen that Paul, in appropriating the language of the christological hymns, subscribed to the christological notion that Christ existed prior to taking on human flesh. Paul spoke of Jesus both as the wisdom of God, his agent in creation (1 Cor 1:24, 30; 8:6; Col 1:15-17; see Bruce, 195), and as the one who accompanied Israel as the "rock" in the wilderness (1 Cor 10:4). In view of the role Christ plays in 1 Corinthians 10:4, Paul is not founding the story of Christ on the archetypal story of Israel, but rather on the story of divine Wisdom, which helped Israel in the wilderness.

3.1.1. "Christ . . . the Wisdom of God." Furthermore, it seems likely that the sapiential ideas we find in 1 Corinthians 1:24, 30 and 8:6 blossomed into Paul's concept of the cosmic Christ—not only Lord over land and universe but also involved in its creation. The full flower of this christological wisdom thinking came to expression in the hymn in Colossians 1:15-20 where Christ is said to be the "image* of the invisible God," the "firstborn"* of creation, and the means and goal of creation. Here the qualities that Judaism could attribute to Wisdom are transferred to Christ, as illustrated by a text such as Wisdom of Solomon 7:25-26:

> For she is the breath of the power of God, and a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty; therefore nothing defiled gains entrance into her. For she is a reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness. (NRSV)

While Paul adopted and adapted this understanding of Wisdom to his own ends, the implications of its use are important—the apostle ascribed divine attributes to Jesus Christ.

Did Paul think of Jesus as being divine? Two difficult texts call for investigation: Romans 9:5 and Philippians 2:6-7.

3.1.2. "Messiah . . . God Blessed" (Rom 9:5). This verse comes at the outset of Paul's discussion of the advantages of the nation Israel; but it poses an exegetical problem in the form of punctuation. F. C. Burkitt once said, with some exaggeration, that the punctuation of Romans 9:5 has probably been more discussed than that of any other sentence in literature. Since there is little or no punctuation in the earliest Greek manuscripts, it must be supplied by the reader or exegete. In the case of Romans 9:5 this has resulted in the text being read in various ways (see Metzger). The argument turns on whether Romans 9:5b should be read with the NRSV's "Messiah, who is over all, God blessed forever," or with the NRSV margin's "Messiah, who is God over all, blessed forever" or with the NEB "Messiah. May God supreme over all be blessed for ever." In the latter case 5b becomes a separate sentence from 5a, or at least a separate clause. The JB, NIV and NKJV support the reading "who is over all, God blessed for ever," as qualifying Christ. It appears that both the context and the grammar favor the reading of the NRSV or the NRSV margin.

Romans 9:5a has the phrase ho Christos to kata sarka. As Metzger points out, in the instance of Romans 1:3-4 and elsewhere it is normal to expect a contrast when we come to the phrase kata sarka ("according to the flesh"). So in Romans 1:3-4 the contrast is kata sarka ("according to the flesh") and kata pneuma ("according to spirit"). Kata sarka in Romans 9:5a is unnatural in its present form if the speaker does not go on to say what Christ is according to something else besides the flesh.

Secondly, the phrase "who is" (ho ōn) is normally taken as introducing a relative clause, and 2 Corinthians 11:31 ("who is blessed forever," ho ōn eulogētos eis tous aiōnas) provides a good parallel to Romans 9:5. As N. Turner puts it:

> The text of the N.E.B. simply closes the sentence at 'Messiah' and begins anew with an exclamation 'May God, supreme above all, be blessed for ever!' So it avoids assigning the quality of godhead to Jesus Christ, but it introduces asyndeton and there is no grammatical reason why a participle agreeing with 'Messiah' should first be divorced from it and then be given the force of a wish, receiving a different person as its subject. It would in fact be unnatural to divorce it from its antecedent. (Turner, 15)

It is better to follow the NRSV margin and read, "sprang the Messiah, who is God over all, blessed forever."

Metzger also notes that Pauline doxologies (see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology) elsewhere are always attached to some previous antecedent; they are not asyndetic (i.e., lacking a conjunction). Furthermore, it is almost a universal pattern for doxologies in the Hebrew and LXX to be "blessed be God," not "God blessed," as we have here if one translation is followed. So the likelihood is that "God blessed" does not express a wish that God be blessed forever, but that the Messiah, who is God, is by nature blessed forever (but cf. Dunn 1988, 528-29, 535-36). The early versions also favor the reading represented in the NRSV or the reading listed in the NRSV margin. If it is asked why Paul nowhere else so explicitly calls Christ "God," Metzger's response is a good one.

> The reason why there are so few statements in Paul's epistles bearing on the essential nature of Christ . . . is doubtless connected with a feature often noticed by others, namely that the apostle, for purposes of instruction bearing on Christian nurture, usually prefers to speak of the functional rather than the ontological relationships of Christ. (Metzger, 111-12)

We conclude that in Romans 9:5 Paul calls Christ God, thus demonstrating the extent to which Paul's experience of the risen Lord had caused him to qualify or transform his Jewish monotheism (cf. Wright, 237). This means that Paul had a high christology even before he used the Christ hymn in Philippians 2 (assuming Philippians* is later than Romans,* and that Paul did not already know the Christ hymn before he wrote Romans).

3.1.3. "Who Being in the Form of God . . ." (Phil 2:6-7). A portion of the christological hymn of Philippians 2 must now be explored more fully. The argument turns on several key terms and phrases: (1) morphē ("form"), found in the NT only here and in Philippians 2:7 (except in Mk 16:12 which is part of a later addition to Mark); (2) to einai isa theō ("to be equal with God"); and (3) harpagmos ("a snatching, grasping"; "a desire to acquire").

It is entirely likely that morphē ("form") carries the same general meaning in verse 7 as it does in verse 6. In addition, the alla ("but") at the beginning of verse 7 suggests a contrast is being drawn between the before and after of Jesus becoming human. Morphē has been translated as "form," "appearance," "condition," "status," "image" or "mode of being." If one translates morphē as "status," "condition" or "appearance," it would seem to indicate Jesus' outward form, status, appearance or function, not what he was in his being. It is unlikely that Paul in Philippians 2:7 is saying that Jesus in his earthly ministry merely "looked like" or "appeared to be" or "functioned" as a servant.* Rather, he became this—he was a servant. The parallel between the two states is not exact since the text says that he was in the form of God, but then also took on the form of a servant. Elsewhere Paul clearly states that Jesus became "poor" and generously gave himself to his people (cf. 2 Cor 8:9). For Paul this was part and parcel of the meaning of Christ's taking on the condition and status of humanity.

Second, we note that Paul does not say Jesus was the form of God, but that he was in the form of God. Thus the translation "likeness" in itself seems lexically improbable (unless one imports a Last Adam idea into this text, cf. Rom 5:18-19; 1 Cor 15:45-47). Paul is not calling Jesus the "image" or "likeness" of God. Rather, as G. F. Hawthorne has pointed out, > from earliest Greek texts μορφή was at least used to express the way in which a thing, being what it is in itself, appears to our sense. "Μορφή always signifies a form which truly and fully expresses the being which underlies it" (MM417). Thus, when this word is applied to God, his μορφή must refer to his deepest being, to what he is in himself, to that "which cannot be reached by our understanding or sight, precisely because God is ἀόρατος: in fact the word has meaning here only as referring to the reality of God's being" (Cerfaux, Christ, 305). Μορφὴ θεοῦ, then, may be correctly understood as "the essential nature and character of God." (Hawthorne, 83-84)

We thus translate Philippians 2:6a and 7b, "being in the form (i.e., "character," "nature") of God . . . he went on to take on the character, nature of a servant."

Third, to einai isa theō (Phil 2:6c) has a definite article with it: "the being equal with God." This probably indicates that this second phrase is closely connected to the first, pointing to what Christ already is. But Paul is going to move on to state what that meant for Jesus in view of his later actions.

Fourth, the word harpagmos has been taken to mean either groping for something one doesn't have, perhaps snatching at something, or it has been taken to mean clutching on to something one already has. More likely than either of these two views is that of R. W. Hoover who demonstrates that it means "taking advantage of something that is already rightfully yours." The Christ hymn portrays Jesus in his self-giving. He did not consider being equal with God a matter of taking full advantage of his rights (or glory), but rather (alla) of giving them up and taking on the form of a servant.

We conclude that Philippians 2:6-7 indicates Paul saw Jesus as having preexistence* and equality with God (against Dunn 1980), but that in his preexistence he did not take advantage of all the prerogatives of deity.

Fifth, one more matter needs to be dealt with at this juncture—what does it mean to say Christ heauton ekenōsen, usually translated, "he emptied himself"? Philippians 2:7 begins with the word alla ("but"), probably suggesting a contrast followed by a verb and its object. This may be interpreted to mean either he "stripped himself" or "emptied himself." One may ask, emptied himself of what? Although Hawthorne argues that one cannot determine from this statement alone what Christ emptied himself of (Paul does not say), the context may give some clues. So-called kenotic christology, based chiefly on this text, suggests that Jesus emptied himself of certain divine attributes—omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence—when he became a human being. The text must surely be referring to what Christ did at the point of taking on a human nature, not at his death (cf. Martin 1976, 97). The kenotic view might be thought to derive some support from a text like Mark 13:32, "no one knows . . . not even the Son." Mark 13:32, however, can just as easily be taken to suggest that Jesus limited himself, and to say that Christ limited himself is not the same as saying he emptied himself of various divine attributes. It is also important to remember that Mark 13:32 does not attempt to answer the christological question addressed in Philippians 2.

Thus, it seems likely that Paul in Philippians 2 means one of two things: (1) Jesus emptied himself of the prerogatives and glory* of being divine, or of the right to claim such prerogatives (which Phil 2:6 seems to suggest if we are right about harpagmos). These prerogatives would entail glory and lordship, which belonged to Christ by virtue of his being equal with God. (2) Hawthorne suggests it simply means Jesus totally gave himself, poured himself out, rather than telling us what he gave up. The former seems more likely.

3.1.4. "In Christ." A third category of texts speak of Christ as a sort of omnipresent being in whom believers are included. The evidence cannot be rehearsed here (see Christ; Moule 1977, 62-65), but the essence is that when Paul speaks of believers being "in Christ" he often suggests that Christ has attributes that only a divine being could properly be said to have.

3.1.5. Christ and the Spirit. Finally, our understanding of Paul's view of the divinity of Christ is enhanced by comparing what Paul says about Christ in comparison to what he says about God's Holy Spirit. It has been noted often how closely Paul identifies Christ and the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in his letters—indeed, at points they seem to be identical. Paul can speak of the Spirit coming to believers only because Christ is risen and ascended. For instance, in discussing Jesus' resurrection Paul speaks of Jesus, the last Adam, as a "life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15:45). He is the one who sends the Spirit and without his resurrection and exaltation the Spirit would not have come. Romans 1:3-4 indicates that it was through the power of the Spirit that Jesus was enabled to be Son of God in power. The Spirit empowered him, and he sends that power to believers. It is Christ who makes the eschatological age possible, and that age focuses on him.

Frequently in Pauline thought the functions of Jesus and the Spirit are identified, so much so that being in Christ is simply another way of speaking about being in the Spirit (pace Smalley). Consider the following:

(1) Believers are righteous in Christ (Phil 3:8, 9) but also in the Spirit (Rom 14:17).

(2) Believers have life* in Christ (Col 3:4) but also in the Holy Spirit (Rom 8:11).

(3) Believers have hope in Christ for life to come (1 Cor 15:19) and in the power of the Spirit to give them eternal life (Gal 6:8).

(4) Believers rejoice and have joy* in the Holy Spirit (Rom 14:17) but also in the Lord (Phil 4:4).

(5) Believers have truth* in Christ (Rom 9:1), and truth is also spoken in the Spirit (1 Cor 12:3-6).

(6) Believers have fellowship* in Christ (1 Cor 1:9) but also fellowship of Spirit (2 Cor 13:13).

(7) Believers are consecrated and sanctified (see Holiness, Sanctification) in Christ (1 Cor 1:2) but also in the Spirit (Rom 15:16).

(8) Believers are sealed both in Christ (Eph 1:13) and in the Spirit (Eph 4:30).

This identification between Christ and Spirit is taken even further when Paul ascribes to Christ various features characterizing the Spirit in the OT. Thus, for instance, Psalm 104:29 states that it is the Spirit that gives life (cf. Ezek 31), but in 1 Corinthians 15:45 it is Christ who gives life. This means that at his resurrection and exaltation Jesus assumed the functions previously ascribed to the Spirit. This characteristic of Paul has led some to ask whether he held to a binitarian rather than trinitarian view of God. Is the Lord the Spirit for Paul?

This is in fact what Paul seems to be saying in 2 Corinthians 3:17: "The Lord is the Spirit, for where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom." On the one hand, it is sometimes pointed out that Paul in 2 Corinthians 3:14 identifies Christ with God. This is not quite correct, for Paul in fact says that in Christ the veil is lifted, not by Christ. Throughout this text Paul has in mind the OT context of Exodus 34:34-35. In 2 Corinthians 3:16 it does appear that on the surface Paul is referring to Christ, who is being identified with Yahweh in his role in Exodus. C. K. Barrett notes a subtle distinction: while "the Lord" in 2 Corinthians 3:11 is Christ, the one to whom people turn, the function of removing the veil from over a person's heart is for Paul preeminently the work of the Spirit, as Christ's agent. Christ in 2 Corinthians 3:11 is identified with his agent but only in his activity, and so it is not proper to speak of Paul having a Spirit christology. Rejecting a binitarianism on the part of Paul, Barrett concludes:

> It is certainly true that for Paul Christ the Lord, and the Spirit, were two very closely related terms, each of which was unthinkable apart from the other, since the objective status of being in Christ carried with it the subjective accompaniment of receiving the Spirit, who was manifested in particular gifts . . . ; he was however capable of distinguishing them, as for example in the phrase 'Spirit of Christ' (Rom. viii.9). It is in the realm of action . . . rather than of person . . . that the terms Lord and Spirit are identified. (Barrett 1973, 123)

What Paul is saying, according to Barrett, is that the Spirit is Lord in such situations, illuminating believers and giving them freedom. Another way of looking at this, however, is to assume that Paul is commenting on Exodus 34 in a manner we may paraphrase as follows: "now the 'Lord' in this text is the 'Spirit,' and where the Spirit of the Lord is . . ."

In any case, Paul speaks of "the Spirit of the Lord," which seems to imply a distinction between "Spirit" and "Lord." More clearly in Romans 8:9 the two seem to be distinguished in the phrase "the Spirit of Christ." Thus for Paul the "Spirit of Christ" = "Spirit of God" (cf. Rom 8:8) = "Spirit of the Lord." We must conclude then that the Spirit is Christ's agent, and he functions for Christ, one might almost say, as Christ, here on earth during the church age. This identity in function and effect surely implies the deity of Christ, for from the perspective of the OT it is only God who can send or be a life-giving Spirit.

Nevertheless, so far as their being is concerned, Christ and the Spirit are not to be equated and may even be distinguished in some of their activities. It was Christ, not the Spirit, who died and was raised. It is Christ, not the Spirit, who will return and judge (1 Cor 4:5). It was Christ, not the Spirit, who came in the flesh. In one sense the Spirit is the bridge between believers and Christ on this earth. But it is also interesting how Paul attributes tasks to Christ that in the OT were attributed to the Spirit. In Psalm 33:6 the world is said to have been created by the Spirit, but in Colossians 1:16 we read "by him [Christ] all things are created." In the OT it often appears that the Spirit is simply God on the move in creation and history. What was said of the Spirit is now predicated of the exalted Christ who is on the move and active in his church and in history.

To summarize: in the church age Christ and Spirit are not one but two in identity, but they are one in function because the Spirit is Christ's agent on earth (recalling the Rabbinic adage, "a person's agent [šālîaḥ] is as their self"). This also implies that receiving Christ and receiving the Spirit are simultaneous events. Paul knows no doctrine of a second baptism, for by the Spirit one enters Christ's body, and that is the only occasion which Paul speaks of as being baptized by the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor 12:13; see Baptism).

3.2. The Humanity of the Christ.

3.2.1. Christ as Son. As a preface to examining what Paul meant when he called Jesus Son of David, Last Adam* or a human being, it is helpful to summarize what Paul meant by the term Son of God (see Son of God).

M. Hengel has provided the valuable insight that for Paul " 'Son of God', with its more complicated language, was kept for exceptional usage, at the climax of certain theological statements" (Hengel 1976, 14). By this title Paul signified the unique relationship between the exalted Christ and God. Its further significance for Paul is summed up by I. H. Marshall:

> it is the Son who is the theme of the gospel (Rom. 1:3, 9), and it is by means of this title that Paul emphasizes the supreme value of the death of the One who stood closest to God as the means of reconciling men with God (Rom. 5:10; 8:32; Gal. 2:20; Col. 1.13 f.). . . . For Paul Jesus was God's Son during his earthly life, and . . . it was as God's Son that he died. Consequently, he did not cease to be divine in his earthly existence, and his self-emptying cannot mean that he gave up his divine nature to assume human nature. (Marshall, 644-45)

Romans 1:3-4 is an important christological statement which speaks of the Son in two aspects, his earthly descent and his resurrection glory. Here we focus on Romans 1:3: in the sphere of the flesh (kata sarka), Jesus is said to have been "born of the seed of David" (a phrase we find again at the end of the Pauline corpus in 2 Tim 2:8). This phrase in itself indicates not only Jesus' Jewishness and humanity, but also focuses on the pedigree warranting his title Messiah/Christ. This surely implies some stress on his royalty. The only other place where Paul highlights this fact is Romans 15:12 ("the shoot of Jesse shall come forth"), where he quotes from Isaiah 11:10 (LXX). Romans 1:3-4 indicates two stages of Jesus' career epitomized in what seems to be a primitive christological formula which Paul adopted and endorsed. Jesus' Davidic descent is well attested in various strands of NT material (Mt 1:1; Acts 2:30; Rev 5:5). Paul introduces this christological formulation by appealing to God's promises through the prophets in Holy Scripture (Rom 1:2). Jesus Christ is the promised and prophesied Messiah.

For most Jews it appears that messiah was a term referring to a human being, not divine even if he was given certain divine gifts or authority* (though cf. the picture of the "Elect One" in 1 Enoch 55—69; see Neusner et al.). It is thus appropriate, in a context where messiahship is mentioned, to stress Jesus' humanity born of David's seed. Indeed, it is telling that Paul uses the term Christ of Jesus more than he does any other, suggesting that salvation comes to believers only through one who was human like them, who lived and died for them. The term Christ, coupled with a stress on his crucifixion, characterized Paul's preaching* to a significant degree (cf. 1 Cor 1:23). In order to speak of salvation,* Paul had to stress Jesus' humanity in various ways (cf. Dunn 1977, 43). The story of Jesus (i.e., his death) brought about a redefinition of Paul's understanding of the Davidic Messiah, a process which appears to have taken place prior to the writing of Paul's extant letters (see Christ).

If Paul had no difficulty identifying Jesus as Christ, and Jesus as a human who had died, how did he view Jesus' humanity in general? What little he had to say about this can be summed up in a few short phrases. There is enough to suggest that Paul understood Jesus to have been fully human, but not enough to spell out in any detail how he defined that humanity. This may be because the facts of Jesus and his ministry were assumed knowledge on the part of Paul and his readership. It may also reflect Paul's chosen emphasis in his letters on Jesus' death and resurrection, and issues of life in the Spirit and in the church. Paul was not a Gospel writer or historian; he was a pastoral theologian called upon to deal with matters of theological weight and direct bearing on the issues which arose in the churches (see Jesus, Sayings of; Jesus and Paul).

The christological events of first importance for Paul seem to have been Christ's taking on true human nature and humbling himself to the status of a servant, his death on the cross and his resurrection. The significant events of Jesus' earthly career between his Incarnation and death is scarcely mentioned (cf. 2 Cor 8:9, though this may also refer to the circumstances into which Jesus was born).

3.2.2. Born of a Woman. Paul could affirm that Jesus was born of woman (Gal 4:4). His appearance in this world was as a normal human being, who came forth from his mother's womb into this world. As F. F. Bruce pointed out (195), Paul's word choice (genomenon), is applicable to anyone born of a woman. The text implies nothing peculiar about Jesus' manner of birth. Nor does Paul mention the virginal conception, though we cannot be sure that he did not know of it.

Paul also states in Galatians 4:4 that Jesus was born under the Law. His mother was a Jew and so was he. And when Paul says Jesus was born under the Law "to redeem those who were under the Law" (Gal 4:5), he seems to imply that Jesus' earthly ministry was essentially directed toward Israel.* Paul's apostleship to the Gentiles* may go some distance in explaining why he said so little about Jesus' earthly ministry, which was directed to the lost sheep that made up Israel. When Israel did not respond, a new door was opened to take the gospel to the Gentiles (cf. Rom 9—11). If Christ's death and resurrection was the decisive event for the mission to the Gentiles, it is not surprising that Paul focuses on those events in the story of Jesus that affected and involved the Gentiles.

3.2.3. Born in Human Likeness. In Philippians 2:7 we are told that Christ was born in human likeness (cf. Phil 2:8). In other words, Jesus took on human flesh, becoming a man who was subject to human frailty, even death. Romans 8:3 also comments on this point in similar and carefully worded terms. Jesus condemned sin in the flesh, taking on human flesh to do so. Thus any sort of docetism is ruled out. Jesus was real flesh and blood. But Romans 8:3 is probably worded as it is to indicate that Jesus did not participate in the sinfulness of flesh (see Sin). Barrett stresses:

> One possible suggestion is that Paul distinguished between flesh as it was created by God, and 'flesh of sin', that is, flesh which had fallen under the dominion of sin. Christ (on this view) had perfect, unfallen flesh, which nevertheless was indistinguishable in appearance from 'flesh of sin'; he came in flesh, so that the incarnation was perfectly real, but only in the likeness of 'flesh of sin', so that he remained sinless. (Barrett 1957, 156),

It seems plausible that the very reason the word likeness (homoiōma) is used in Romans 8:3 is intentionally to avoid saying he came in sinful flesh (cf. Cranfield 1979, 381). This is compatible with Paul's emphasis in Romans and elsewhere that Jesus was a new Adam, starting a new creation and race. As such he did not participate in the fallen nature of the old Adam.

Paul may have spoken of Christ as being in the "likeness of sinful flesh" not to deny Jesus' sinlessness (2 Cor 5:21), nor to deny his sinless human nature, but to affirm that he took on human flesh and was like all humans in this respect. Perhaps part of the reason Paul worded Romans 8:3 as he did was because he thought of Jesus as the Paschal lamb (see Sacrifice, Offering, Passover Lamb), metaphorically speaking (cf. 1 Cor 5:7). An atoning sacrifice must be unblemished and spotless. Like Adam, Jesus was born with an unfallen nature that had the capacity to sin; unlike Adam, Jesus remained sinless and so in due course became an unblemished sacrifice.

Paul's letters yield little else about the earthly Jesus except for what is implied in his recital of the Last Supper tradition (1 Cor. 11:23-26; see Lord's Supper). There he indicates Jesus was a person who broke bread, who poured wine, who gave thanks and thus was human, thanking the heavenly Father for such earthly gifts. Paul does not say Jesus ate at the Last Supper, but it is certainly implied. Apart from the references to Jesus' death and burial, indicating he truly died and was resurrected, there is little else that needs mentioning (cf. 1 Cor 15:4).

3.2.4. Last Adam. We turn now to Paul's theme of Christ as the last Adam. It has often been noted that Paul does not call Jesus the Son of man (none of the authors of the NT letters do). This may be due to the Jewish background and meaning of the title. To Gentile ears it may have been too easily assumed to mean simply that Jesus was a real human being, or as a title it may have been considered too obscure or too simple for the Gentile mission and the expanding church (cf. Moule 1977). On the other hand, Paul uses the Adam typology of Jesus and in 1 Corinthians 15:45 calls Jesus the last Adam. Perhaps in Paul's case reflection on Jesus as truly human led to a comparison between Jesus and the first and archetypal human being. In preparation for examining Paul's typology involving Adam and the man Christ, we must first examine certain references to Jesus as the human being.

For instance, in Romans 5:15, in the midst of developing the Adam-Christ typology (see Adam and Christ), Paul writes that just as death came by "the one," Adam, so God's grace and the gift that accompanied it (righteousness, Rom 5:17) came by "the one," Jesus. Again, in 1 Corinthians 15:21 death comes through a human being (anthrōpos), Adam, and the resurrection of the dead comes through a human being (anthrōpos), Jesus. In the later and disputed Paulines, 1 Timothy 2:5 shows a further development along these lines when it speaks of Christ as mediator between God and humans, and he is said to be the human being Christ Jesus. What is Paul's point in saying that grace comes to us, as does resurrection and reconciliation, by a human being? Sin was a human problem that could only be resolved for humanity by a human being. Some may think the efficacy of salvation for humankind was due to Jesus being divine, but Paul wishes to emphasize the opposite. If Jesus had not been human, humanity would not have received grace, resurrection or, as Colossians* and Ephesians* stress, reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation). The extraordinary thing is that the human Jesus died and rose again. God—apart from the mystery of the Incarnation—is not subject to death.

1 Timothy 2:5 goes beyond this in stressing Christ's mediatorial role. Jesus, this text seems to imply, had to be fully God and fully human in order to properly represent God to humans and humans to God. He had to stand on both sides of the fence in order to experience and fully know both the God who grieves over sin and the sinner who causes God grief. In short, for salvation to reach humans, and to redeem humans, it had to be mediated through one who shared in humanity.

The "last" or "eschatological" Adam motif in 1 Corinthians 15:21-23, 44-49 calls for comment in some detail. This passage is quite unlike the other Adam references we find in Paul. Here we have the responsibility for sin and its consequences placed squarely on Adam's shoulders, while Eve is not mentioned. To J. Jeremias we owe the insight that Paul may have avoided using the term "Son of man" because he addressed a Gentile audience (Jeremias, 141-42). But he goes on to stress how Paul appears to know of the "Son of man" tradition because in 1 Corinthians 15:27 Paul makes a messianic application of Psalm 8:6 to Jesus, "for he has made all things subject under his feet." This psalm is well known for the line that shortly precedes the part Paul is quoting—"or the son of man that you care for him" (Ps 8:4).

There are both similarities and differences between Adam the type and Christ the antitype. Both were truly human, both are representative heads of a race and both had a dramatic effect on their physical/spiritual progeny. However, in some ways the differences outweigh the similarities. The powerful effect of Adam's action on all humanity was death (1 Cor 15:21), but the powerful effect of Christ's action was life (in the specific form of the resurrection of the dead). Now the question may be raised, "Is the parallelism in 1 Corinthians 15:22 a perfect one?" In Adam all die. Does the all in 1 Corinthians 15:22b mean that all humans will one day be made alive in Christ? 1 Thessalonians 4:16 makes it quite clear that elsewhere when Paul spoke of human resurrection he meant the resurrection of the dead in Christ. This may also be true of 1 Corinthians 15:22. In fact, 1 Corinthians 15:23 lends strength to this interpretation when it speaks of the resurrection of those "who belong to him." Thus the parallelism of 1 Corinthians 15:22a and 22b is not perfect. Jeremias provides us with the following chart of the pertinent elements in 1 Corinthians 15:44-49 (Jeremias, 142).

15:45	the first Adam	the last Adam
	a living being	a life-giving spirit
15:47	the first human being	the second human being
15:47-48	from the dust of the earth	from heaven

In order to understand Paul's Adam-Christ typology, several things must be borne in mind. First is the idea of collective personality or at least representative headship. In some sense all persons were in Adam—he was humankind and sinned for humanity. The human race died in him. This may suggest the idea of collective personality, that is, in some sense the whole race was present (seminally?) in Adam. Perhaps a better way to view this matter, however, would be to say that as the head and progenitor of the race Adam sinned for all, and thus all human beings felt the effects of this act. By analogy, it is like when a king in an absolute monarchy declares war on a nation. All the king's subjects are then at war with that nation, quite apart from their own individual choices or predilections. The idea in Paul is perhaps of a corporate head who acts for all (cf. Rom 5:12 eph' hō with Col 1:14 en hō).

Secondly, salvation only comes "in Christ." A person must be in Christ to receive the benefits of Christ's work. On the other hand, believers have died and risen in Christ (Rom 6:3-4). The idea of representative headship, when applied to the last Adam, means that Christ as head of a new race performed deeds that subsequently shaped that race. He died in the believer's place as his or her corporate head, just as Adam sinned in humanity's place and for humankind.

It will be seen from the chart above that Jesus is called the last Adam, which does not mean the last human being. Rather, it is an eschatological claim. Christ, as the first fruits* of the dead, is the beginning of a new creation (see Creation and New Creation). But in another sense he is the end and goal of the human race. He is bringing in the last age, the new creation, the end of God's plan.

Further, Jesus is the "second" human being, in the corporate sense. He is the start of a second human race, but with a significant difference. Adam, from one perspective, was strictly an earth creature—he came from the earth, he returned to the earth, and his body and life was natural and physical. Insofar as humanity descends from him, humankind is earthly, physical, contingent and has a natural life in the body. Christ, on the other hand, was from heaven and of heaven. He was not of earth. In what sense? He was also a life-giving Spirit.

Several points may be drawn from this: (1) Christ is not merely living, like Adam; he is life-giving, whereas Adam gave us death. (2) When Paul calls Christ a life-giving spirit he does not mean to imply Jesus had or has no body, but that he lived in a form of life characterized by the Spirit. (3) 1 Corinthians 15:45 ("The first man Adam became a living being") is a quote from Genesis 2:7, except that Paul has added the word "first" and the word "Adam." When Genesis speaks of Adam as a "living being" (Heb nepeš ḥayāh), it does not mean Adam gained a soul, but that God animated his body and he became a living body, a living being (see Psychology). It is unlikely that the Greek psychē in 1 Corinthians 15:45 means soul. Rather, here as in elsewhere in the NT (as with the Heb nepeš), it means "being"—Adam was a living being. (4) When Paul uses the term "spiritual body" (sōma pneumatikon) he does not mean a body consisting of nonmaterial substance, but a body empowered by the Spirit. Notice that Jesus did not become a life-giving Spirit until after he rose from the dead, and the life he gave was everlasting life, unlike the life Adam gave. Moreover, it was given to believers by the Spirit—in part now, in full later.

It could be that Paul derived the raw material for these ideas from Jewish speculation about Adam and the coming Messiah. The Jewish philosopher Philo understood the created humanity of Genesis 1 as an ideal being, a Platonic type, whereas he interpreted the Adam of Genesis 2 in the same way as Paul. In 1 Corinthians 15, however, it is not the first founder of the human race who is the ideal or true model, but the last one. Moreover, never in rabbinic literature is the redeemer described as a last Adam. It would seem that Paul, reflecting on the Christian gospel and the ministry, death and resurrection of Jesus—all in the light of his own revelation of the ascended Lord—modified any previous ideas he may have held.

In closing we turn to Romans 5:12-18. In Romans 5:12 we are told that not only sin, but death, entered the world through Adam. Death came through or because of sin. Paul apparently accepted Genesis 1—3 as a straightforward account of historical events, but here he is concerned with its theological significance. He wishes to add that whatever believers may have inherited from Adam, and whatever effect his sin may have had on humanity, there is a real sense in which human beings dig their own graves. God has not unjustly punished any with death. Nonetheless, it is also true in the primary sense that none of the human race would be dying if Adam had not sinned in the first place. So Paul can add in Romans 5:15, "many died by the trespasses of the one man." Through Adam's transgression death reigned (Rom 5:17), but Paul wishes to make perfectly clear that God's antidote is not merely an equal and opposite reaction. The gift is not like the trespass (Rom 5:17); salvation is not just paradise regained, as if the negativity of sin was counteracted by an equally positive force. If one trespass could effect so much and affect so many, how much more effective was the overflowing grace and gift of righteousness for believers (Rom 5:15). The death penalty followed just one sin, but God's grace came after many sins and, quite apart from what humans deserved, it brought about their right standing with God.

Romans 5:17 implies quite clearly that the life believers have in Christ is not merely more powerful than the death Adam bequeathed to the human race, it is of a wholly different order. As 1 Corinthians 15 makes clear, it comes from the Spirit and heaven, and as such it transcends natural life and triumphs over natural death. Romans 5:10 goes on to point out that Christ's obedience even unto death (his righteous conduct and sinlessness) made possible the undoing of all that was brought about by the first Adam's disobedience (cf. Cranfield 1975, 290; Barrett 1957, 117).

4. The Impact and Influence of Paul's Christology.

4.1. Paul's Christology in His Thought World. We have earlier spoken of how christology, as an aspect of Paul's thought, was the greatest shaping force on the rest of Paul's thought world. This can be shown in a number of ways.

4.1.1. Eschatology. Paul's eschatological outlook was surely transformed once he became a follower of Jesus. There is no evidence that early Jews were expecting two comings of Messiah; yet that is precisely what Paul believed, and it dictated how he viewed the future and the life of believers. The future course of history had for Paul taken on an eschatological character. There was a sense in which the age to come had already arrived, the redemptive effect of God's reign had already broken into space and time in the coming of Christ, but redemption had not yet been completed. The form of this world was passing away (1 Cor 7:31), but it was not yet gone. Powers and principalities could no longer separate the believer from the love* of God in Christ (Rom 8:38) because Christ's death had disarmed the supernatural forces of evil (Col 2:15). Likewise, the inner life of the believer was caught up in the tension between the already and not yet. The believer was already a new creature in Christ (2 Cor 5:17), but had not yet experienced physical resurrection, the full redemption of the body (Rom 8:21-22).

There is likewise no evidence of an early Jewish expectation of an isolated resurrection, much less an isolated resurrection of Messiah prior to the resurrection of believers. Yet on the basis of the story of Jesus' earthly career, that is precisely what Paul proclaimed. This enabled Paul to explain the connection between Christ's resurrection and believers' resurrection (1 Cor 15).

4.1.2. Soteriology. Paul's christology changed the shape of his soteriology. Unless new finds from the Qumran* scrolls change matters, there is no conclusive evidence that early Jews were expecting a crucified Messiah. It was the story of the death and resurrection of Jesus that caused Paul to rethink how salvation would be accomplished. This message was a scandal to Jews and folly to Gentiles precisely because it ran in the face of expectations (1 Cor 1:23). Even in the case of the Suffering Servant of Yahweh referred to in Isaiah 53, there is no firm evidence that anyone in early Judaism prior to the ministry of Jesus had applied that text to the coming Messiah (though cf. Tg. Isa. 53). Furthermore, in light of Deuteronomy 21:23 ("anyone who is hung on a tree is under God's curse" NIV), even if the text had been thought to refer to a suffering Messiah, it is highly unlikely that it was understood to speak of a crucified Messiah.

Salvation also was an already/not yet matter. Already large numbers of Gentiles were being saved, but God had not yet completed his plan of salvation for the Jews (Rom 9—11). Already the believer had right standing and peace with God (Rom 5:1), but that same believer was not yet fully sanctified or glorified, as is clear from the ongoing tension between flesh and spirit in the believer's life (Gal 5:16-26).

4.1.3. People of God. Paul's thinking about the people of God was changed, especially regarding the basis of one's inclusion in that group. If God's people consisted of Jews and Gentiles united in Christ (Gal 3:28), and if that group could be called the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:16; see Israel), then neither heredity nor obedience to Torah could any longer be the basis for securing or maintaining a place in true Israel (cf. Rom 3:23—4:8). In Christ the Law, at least as a means of obtaining or keeping right standing with God, was at an end (Rom 10:4). Paul clearly stated that it was no longer necessary to follow the dietary laws since no food was unclean (Rom 14:14). Thereby for Paul the very basis of fellowship with and marks of identity among God's people were changed.

If the three great pillars of early Judaism—Torah, Temple and territory—are evaluated in light of Paul's theology, we discover how radically Paul had reconceptualized the people of God. We have already spoken of Paul's view of the Law, but what does he say about Temple and sacrifice? On the one hand, it is Jew and Gentile united in Christ that make up the temple* of God's Spirit (1 Cor 6:19; on the individual believer as temple cf. 1 Cor 3:16-17). On the other hand, Christ is the once-for-all sacrificial lamb who made all other literal sacrifices no longer necessary (cf. 1 Cor 5:7). Finally, it is not clear that Paul reaffirmed the territorial doctrine, though it is possible that he made room for such an idea once the full number of Gentiles are saved and then all physical Israel is saved (cf. Rom 11:23-25). It is striking however that in his list of what God promised Israel according to the flesh, land is not mentioned (Rom 9:4-5, unless it is included under "the promises"; cf. Davies). Colossians 1:12 ("inheritance"), on the other hand, may reflect Paul's appropriation of the territorial idea, but there it is apparently transferred to a nonmaterial realm—heaven.

4.1.4. God. Earlier in this article it was pointed out how Paul's vision of God changed as a result of affirming Jesus as the divine and human Christ. Not only were the functions of God as Lord now assumed and exercised by Christ (cf. 1 Cor 15:24-27), but it was Christ who would return to judge the world and even believers (cf. 2 Cor 5:10; 1 Thess 5:4-10). In addition, Paul understood Christ and the Spirit as sharing many of the same functions, their earthly work and effect being seen as virtually interchangeable. Though Paul did not elaborate a trinitarian theology, the raw elements of such a theology were already evident in his letters, especially in his doxologies and benedictions* (cf. e.g., 2 Cor 13:14). Paul only invoked blessing in God's name, but now God had three names by which he could be called (see Wright, 120-36).

4.2. The Wider Impact of Paul's Christology. Paul's christology also seems to have had an impact on early Christianity outside his own writings. Hebrews especially seems to know and draw on Pauline modes of thought about Christ and other matters. It appears that the author of Hebrews had a special indebtedness to elements of Paul's thought as it is known to us in Galatians, and perhaps also 1 Corinthians and Romans (cf. e.g., 1 Cor 15:24-28, 45-49 with Heb 2:6-13; Witherington 1991).

It is worth pondering the possible impact of Paul's christology on the Fourth Evangelist. Not only does the Gospel of John begin with a christological hymn displaying motifs similar to Paul's, but the Gospel also presents a "Pauline" notion of believers being incorporated into Christ (though under a different image, that of the vine and branches of Jn 15). There we also find an exalted view of Christ's sacrificial death, associated with the slaughter of the Passover lamb (cf. e.g., Jn 1:29; Jn 19:28-31). The pneumatology of the Fourth Gospel is also related to the death and resurrection of Christ (cf. Jn 14:18-21) in a way that finds its only full NT parallel in Paul.

Possible Pauline influence, particularly christological, may be present elsewhere in the NT. For instance, in 1 Peter the presence of the "in Christ"* formula, and the use of the phrases "Lord Jesus Christ" or "revelation of Jesus Christ" (1 Peter 1:3, 13; 5:10, 14) may indicate Pauline influence (see Christ). The speech of Paul in Acts 20:18-32 is noteworthy for its Pauline themes, a fact that may be accounted for by the author epitomizing Paul's gospel as it was known from his letters or, if Luke was a firsthand witness to the speech, by recording what he spoke on the occasion (see Hemer). In any event, the author of 2 Peter (3:15-16) testifies to the impact of Paul's letters among the "Petrine" churches of the first century, though he confesses that Paul is difficult to comprehend.

5. The Distinctiveness and Commonality of Paul's Christology.

In discussing the distinctiveness of Paul's christology we need to be reminded that we are not exploring its uniqueness among NT christologies. To pursue its uniqueness would entail discussing what it is that completely sets Paul's christology apart from other NT christologies. Rather, we wish to discuss what characterizes Paul's christology. It can hardly be claimed that there is anything in Paul's christology that is unique, totally without analogy elsewhere in the NT. The preexistence, divinity and humanity of Christ can all be found outside of Paul. The emphasis on Christ crucified is found in the Gospels, as well as in Acts, Hebrews, 1 Peter and elsewhere in the NT. The stress on Jesus' Jewishness, or on his resurrection, also finds analogies. Finally, the idea of Christ as the embodiment of God's Wisdom can be found in Matthew and possibly in the Gospel source Q, though with differing emphases (cf. Witherington 1993).

We have pointed to the absence of any reference to Jesus as Son of man in Paul's christology. In this sense Paul is distinct from the Gospels. But it can also be argued that the most distinct aspect of Paul's christology is his Last Adam typology. This christological theme was not simply an attempt to transpose the Son of man christology into a new key for Gentiles. For one thing, the sources are different; Paul's Last Adam christology draws on Genesis, while the Son of man material in the Gospels draws on Daniel 7 (and less possibly on Ezekiel and the Parables of 1 Enoch). Moreover, the Son of man christology has nothing to do with the founder of a new race of human beings; it is more specifically focused on a representative of and for Israel who comes before the presence of the Almighty and is given dominion. In short, the Last Adam christology is more universal than the Son of man in scope. By comparing and contrasting Christ with the progenitor of the whole human race Paul forged a concept in which both Jews and Gentiles had a stake simply because they were human.

Paul's use of the "in Christ" formula (see Christ; In Christ) to speak of the spiritual union between Christ and Christians is also remarkable. The Pauline idea transcends the use found in 1 Peter or the parallel ideas found in the Fourth Gospel, both in depth and breadth of implication. This formula more than any other explains how Paul viewed the condition of believers—they were "in Christ." This goes well beyond the claim that Christians by God's grace have been conformed to the pattern of Christ's death and resurrection (Rom 6:3-11). Their burial with Christ was a one-time event that occurred in the past at their conversion, whereas their union and communion with Christ is an ongoing reality. Indeed, it was such a profound reality in the apostle's mind that it was incompatible with other forms of union that were spiritually antithetical to it (cf. 1 Cor 6:15-17). The person united to Christ through Christ's body (made up of believers) was one spirit with Christ. This union "in Christ" was also the very basis of Paul's imperatives to imitate the sacred story or character of Christ (cf. e.g., Phil 2:5; 1 Cor 11:1). "In Christ" is a concept developed by Paul in a way and degree without parallel in the NT canon.

Paul's christology has continued to have an impact on the church through the ages, a fact that plays a part in our evaluating it. For Protestants who draw their charter of foundation directly or indirectly from Martin Luther, John Calvin or John Wesley, Paul's christology continues to be central, sometimes even eclipsing the variety of other canonical NT christologies. But that fact is also testimony to the compelling force of Paul's christological vision. It is a christology which cannot be neatly summarized under the headings of the titles Paul employs. The whole of Paul's christology is much greater than the sum of its parts. It is grounded in the sacred story of the Christ, which in turn is grounded in the story of Israel and, by way of the Last Adam christology, rooted in the story of the whole human race.

It is this sacred story of a Jesus who was born of woman, who took on human nature, who died on the cross and who arose from the dead—for the salvation of all human beings—which Paul held in common with the other NT theologians. This shared story, more than any influence of one NT writer upon another, best explains the similarities between the christologies of Paul and the Fourth Gospel or Hebrews or Peter. They all shared this story and, from the evidence of christological hymns and hymn fragments in these works, it appears that they all sang this story in one form or another as they worshipped Christ. Christ crucified and risen, both human and divine, was the core of the gospel these early missionaries proclaimed and taught throughout the first-century Mediterranean world.

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; BODY OF CHRIST; CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; FIRSTBORN; GOD; HOLY SPIRIT; IMAGE; IN CHRIST; JESUS AND PAUL; LORD; PRE-EXISTENCE; SAVIOR; SON OF GOD; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (New York: Harper & Row, 1957); idem, A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians (New York: Harper & Row, 1968); idem, A Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970); R. E. Brown, The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus (New York: Paulist, 1973); F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Galatians (NIGNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); E. DeW. Burton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1920); M. Casey, "Chronology and the Development of Pauline Christology," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 124-34; L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul (New York: Herder & Herder, 1959); C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC; 2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); idem, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959); W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine (Berkeley: University of California, 1974); J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); idem, Romans (WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); idem, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); P. Fredriksen, From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus (New Haven: Yale University, 1988); G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1989); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (Winona Lake, IN: Eisebrauns, 1989); M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); idem, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); idem, The Son of God (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); R. W. Hoover, "The Harpagmos Enigma: A Philological Solution," HTR 64 (1971) 95-119; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); J. Jeremias, "ἀδάμ," TDNT I.141-43; M. de Jonge, Christology in Context: The Earliest Christian Responses to Jesus (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988); S. Kim. The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (London: Macmillan, 1894); R. N. Longenecker, The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity (London: SCM, 1970); J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ (New York: Harper & Row, 1930); I. H. Marshall, "Son of God," NIDNTT 3.644-45; R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians 2:5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); idem, Philippians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976); B. M. Metzger, "Punctuation of Rom. 9.5," in Christ and the Spirit in the New Testament, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 95-112; C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: University Press, 1977); idem, "Further Reflexions on Philippians 2.5-11," in Apostolic History and the Gospel, ed. W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970) 264-76; idem, "The Manhood of Jesus in the NT," in Christ, Faith, and History, ed. S. W. Sykes and J. P. Clayton (Cambridge: University Press, 1972) 95-110; J. Neusner et al., ed. Judaisms and their Messiahs (Cambridge: University Press, 1987); J. A. T. Robinson, The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); S. S. Smalley, "The Christ-Christian Relationship in Paul and John," in Pauline Studies, ed. D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980) 95-105; N. Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1966); B. Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, "The Influence of Galatians on Hebrews," NTS 37 (1991) 146-52; idem, Jesus, Paul and the End of the World (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1992); idem, Jesus the Sage and the Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

B. Witherington III

CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL

Pauline chronology is concerned to establish the sequence and (where possible) the dates of events in Paul's life. It is an area which has attracted much complex theorizing: this article will attempt simply to set out the parameters of the problem as clearly as possible.

1. Sources and Types of Evidence
2. The Outer Framework
3. Chronological Data in the Letters
4. Chronological Data in Acts
5. Integration of the Letters and Acts

1. Sources and Types of Evidence.

There are two main sources for the chronology of Paul, Acts and the letters, and two kinds of chronological indicators, internal and external.

1.1. Internal and External Chronology. Acts provides a narrative account of Paul's ministry which recounts events in a particular sequence and gives some indication (though not as much as we would like) of the lapse of time between one event and another (internal chronology). Acts also from time to time links events in Paul's life with people or events known to historians from sources outside the NT, like the proconsul Gallio at Acts 18:12. These provide the possibility of anchoring the narrative at certain points in relation to the known history of the Roman world (external chronology). Less obviously, the letters also contain some reference to external history (external chronology) and some indications of sequence (internal chronology). In the latter case it is important to clarify the types of data most useful for purposes of chronology. It is tempting to try to sequence the letters on the basis of theological development, but in practice it has proved difficult to avoid subjectivity in this area (Jewett, 75-78). For this reason it seems safer to build up a chronological sequence from concrete indicators such as travel details, and then to use this framework to date the development of Paul's theology, rather than the other way round.

1.2. Primary and Secondary Evidence. The letters were written by Paul himself and thus rank as "primary evidence" in historical terms; Acts by the same token ranks as "secondary evidence" in that it was written about Paul by somebody else. (This is a distinction of principle common to historical practice, not an expression of theological prejudice.) For this reason a number of scholars have argued in recent years that a methodologically sound chronology must proceed by working outward from the evidence of the letters (see especially Knox, Jewett, Lüdemann). In what follows we shall try to distinguish the chronological data that can be deduced from the letters (internal and external) and from the data provided by Acts before attempting a synthesis.

2. The Outer Framework.

We have no independent evidence for the date of Paul's birth, and only tradition for the date of his death. For the NT his life begins with his conversion* and ends with his imprisonment in Rome* (see Paul in Acts and Letters).

2.1. The Beginning. Neither Acts nor the letters tell us much about Paul's life before his conversion (see Paul the Jew), though both agree that his life-changing encounter with the risen Christ was separate from, and later than, the resurrection appearances to the other apostles* (1 Cor 15:3-9; Acts 9:3-5). Both also concur that prior to this Paul was a persecutor of the church (1 Cor 15:9; Gal 1:13; Acts 7:58; 8:1; 9:1-2). Acts states that at the time of the death of Stephen, Paul (Saul) was "a young man" (Acts 7:58), and Galatians 1:14 also implies that the "persecutor" was at least a young adult. This gives us at least a terminus ante quem non: Paul's public career cannot begin before Jesus' death and the events of Pentecost the same year. In what follows we shall assume a date for the crucifixion of A.D. 33 (see Hoehner). This date is also accepted by Jewett as a baseline for Pauline chronology; Lüdemann and Hemer, for different reasons, prefer an earlier date (27 or 30). How long a time elapsed between the events of Acts 2 and Paul's conversion in Acts 9 is not clear, since neither of our major sources gives us any precise chronological information, but we shall work here with the assumption that Paul began his Christian life as a young adult within a year or two of Pentecost A.D. 33.

2.2. The End. The "captivity" letters, traditionally linked with the end of Paul's life, provide little chronological information (see 3.2.5 below). Acts does not narrate Paul's death, but does give a detailed account of Paul's voyage to Rome which can be dated with some precision. The transfer of office from Felix to Festus should probably be dated to A.D. 59 or 60 (see 4.2.7 below). Seasonal data suggest that the year 59 provides the best fit with the journey details of Acts 27, and this suggests that Paul could have arrived in Rome in February 60 (Jewett, 50-52). The two years' captivity of Acts 28:30 would take us to 62, but Luke simply does not tell us what happened after that. A longstanding church tradition associates the martyrdom of Peter and Paul with the persecution of Nero at the time of the great fire of A.D. 64. Clement of Rome (1 Clem. 5), writing at about A.D. 95, says that Paul "bore witness before rulers" after preaching "in the East and in the West," which seems to imply that Paul was able to implement his plan to travel to Spain (Rom 15:28) before his death. The trip to Spain may however be simply an inference from the text of Romans. All we can say is that the evidence we have is consistent with a death in Rome in the early sixties.

2.3. Conclusion. Paul's missionary journeys (see Itineraries) and letters must thus be fitted into a time span of thirty-odd years or less, between the outer limits of A.D. 33 and 64.

3. Chronological Data in the Letters.

The letters provide us with two clear tripartite sequences plus a mass of miscellaneous unsequenced detail.

3.1. Direct Chronological Indicators.

3.1.1. External Chronology. In 2 Corinthians 11:32 Paul mentions that the "ethnarch of King Aretas" was guarding Damascus at the time of his dramatic escape in a basket (2 Cor 11:33). The Nabatean king Aretas IV died between 38 and 40 (probably 39), and Nabatean control of Damascus is unlikely before 37, when the accession of Caligula signaled a new Roman policy toward client kings. This escape must therefore have taken place between 37 and 39/40 (Jewett, 30-33; but Hemer, 264, warns against placing too much reliance on this datum).

3.1.2. The Galatians Sequence. Galatians 1:11—2:14 seems (on the most obvious reading) to yield the following sequence of events:

Gal 1:16	Conversion
Gal 1:16-17	Three-year interval (Arabia, Damascus)
Gal 1:18-20	First Jerusalem visit of 15 days
Gal 1:21—2:1	Interval of 14 yrs (Syria, Cilicia: preaching to Gentiles)
Gal 2:1-10	Second Jerusalem visit for private conference on Gentile mission
Gal 2:11-14	Incident at Antioch (Lüdemann, 75-77, places the Antioch incident just before the conference, but this makes little difference to the chronology overall.)

The writing of Galatians* must have occurred after all the events described, most likely (given the passionate nature of Paul's concern here) quite soon after: and this implies that the founding of the "Galatian" churches (wherever they are) took place before the Jerusalem* conference. Certainly the account of the conference implies strongly that Paul's Gentile* mission* was well established by then: in other words, substantial missionary activity had taken place during the "fourteen years" (Lüdemann, 70-71). Note that Paul does not say that he stayed in Syria and Cilicia for fourteen years, only that he went there (Gal 1:21) and that "fourteen years later" (Gal 2:1) he was back in Jerusalem. What is not clear is how precisely we should take these figures: are the three and fourteen years reckoned inclusively or exclusively? And should the two time spans be read consecutively (3 yrs + 14 yrs = 17 yrs) or concurrently (3 yrs + 11 yrs = 14 yrs in total)? At first sight the consecutive reading seems more natural, but the concurrent cannot be ruled out (Jewett, 52-54; Hemer, 262 n.37).

3.1.3. The Hardship Catalogs. In 2 Corinthians 6:4-10; 11:21-33; and 12:1-10 Paul lists a prodigious series of toils and travels, many of which are not recorded in Acts, including three shipwrecks and several beatings and imprisonments (see Afflictions, Trials, Hardships). No sequence can be reconstructed from these details, but they presuppose several years' travels. Moreover, whatever the identity of the "man in Christ," 2 Corinthians 12:2 indicates that Paul had been a Christian for at least fourteen years. This suggests that at least 2 Corinthians 10—13 must have been written at an advanced stage of Paul's ministry; but there are no good grounds for identifying this "fourteen years" with the "fourteen years" of Galatians 2:1, as Knox proposed (Jewett, 54-55).

3.1.4. Synthesis. We can deduce from Galatians 1:17 that Paul was in Damascus twice, once at or near his conversion, and once on his return from Arabia. It is reasonable to conjecture that the basket episode of 2 Corinthians 11:32 took place on one of these visits, since there is no indication that Paul was operating in this area in his later years. Given that the ethnarch of Aretas must probably be dated between 37 and 39/40 (see 3.1.1 above), it would make sense to date this incident to the time of Paul's departure for Jerusalem, three years after the conversion in 34 or 35. If the fourteen-year span is reckoned consecutively, this would date the conference to 51/52; a concurrent reckoning would bring the conference back to 48/49. Galatians must be written after the conference; 2 Corinthians presupposes several years of ministry.

Summary: consecutive reckoning:
34/35 (A) Conversion, Arabia, Damascus	3 yrs
37/38 (B) Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia Fourteen-year span including mission in Galatia	14 yrs
51/52 (C) Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
TOTAL:	17 yrs
Summary: concurrent reckoning:
34/35 (A) Conversion, Arabia, Damascus	3 yrs
37/38 (B) Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia Eleven-year span including mission in Galatia	11 yrs
48/49 (C) Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
TOTAL:	14 yrs

3.2. The Travel Sequence. The travels and travel plans of the apostle and his associates contain valuable chronological clues, some of which can be sequenced (see Itineraries, Travel Plans).

3.2.1. First Macedonian Journey. 1 Thessalonians seems to have been written from Achaia (1 Thess 1:9) or Athens,* where Paul waited alone for Timothy to return with reassurance from Thessalonica* (1 Thess 3:1-8). Paul wishes to return to Thessalonica himself, but has been unable to do so (1 Thess 2:17). The fact that there are no greetings from other "brothers and sisters" at the end of 1 Thessalonians suggests (though it does not prove) that this letter was written at an early stage in the first Achaian mission, not long after Paul had left Thessalonica. Philippians 4:15-16 makes it clear that Philippi* was evangelized before Thessalonica. The support Paul received in Corinth (2 Cor 11:8-9) may also belong to this first visit, although it could belong to a later visit to Corinth. This yields a sequence of visits as follows: Philippi—Thessalonica—Athens, with believers recorded in Philippi, Thessalonica and Achaia (which could include both Athens and Corinth).

3.2.2. Final Macedonian Journey. The visit to Macedonia which Paul projects in 1 Corinthians 16:5-9, and from which he apparently writes 2 Corinthians 7:5-16, clearly reflects a later journey, when both the Corinthian and the Macedonian churches are well established and Paul is busy organizing the collection.* In 1 Corinthians 16:2-4 Paul is uncertain whether or not he will accompany the collection, but by the time he writes Romans 15:25 (apparently from Corinth) he has made firm plans to go to Jerusalem. The visit to Illyricum (Rom 15:19) may have been made during this last Macedonian tour. At this stage Paul feels that his mission in Europe is fully accomplished (Rom 15:19, 23); despite some apprehensiveness about Jerusalem (Rom 15:30-32), he intends to continue his mission in the west, passing on to Spain via Rome, which he has never visited (Rom 15:22-24, 28-29).

3.2.3. Ephesian Ministry. Between these two tours lies an extended period in Ephesus,* from where Paul writes 1 Corinthians (16:8-9) and where he suffered a life-threatening "affliction" (2 Cor 1:8-11, cf. 1 Cor 15:32). The instructions about the collection in Galatia (1 Cor 16:1) seem to have been made at about this time, perhaps en route for Ephesus, or perhaps by messenger from there: the extant letter to the Galatians contains no such instructions. When he left Ephesus, Paul travelled by way of Troas (2 Cor 2: 12-13), where he preached and (by implication) left a small body of believers.

3.2.4. Galatians. The letter to the Galatians is difficult to place (see Galatians). It is the only letter to mention the conference, and could reasonably be placed soon after it. The collection appears (as Lüdemann plausibly argues, 77-80) as the only condition imposed on Paul by the "pillars" (Gal 2:10), but Paul does not seem yet to be involved with detailed planning for its assembly and delivery. Despite this, Lüdemann dates Galatians at the same time as 2 Corinthians, after 1 Corinthians and three years after the conference (Lüdemann, 83-87). Jewett's date shortly after the conference (Jewett, 103) seems on the face of it more likely. Galatians 4:12-15 contains the incidental information that Paul's initial evangelization of the area was "because of a bodily ailment," which suggests that he was on a journey to (or returning from) another destination at the time. This implies that there was at least one missionary journey (originally intended to go beyond Galatia) before the conference.

3.2.5. Paul's Imprisonments. The "captivity" letters, traditionally linked with Paul's final years in prison in Rome, contain few chronological indicators. Ephesians* and Colossians* are too general to be of much help. 2 Timothy is clearly located in Rome (2 Tim 1:17) and depicts the apostle facing imminent martyrdom (see Pastoral Letters). Philippians and Philemon,* however, may be associated with earlier imprisonments (cf. 2 Cor 11:23): the number and frequency of Paul's visitors suggests Ephesus as a more probable location. However, Hemer (272-76) makes the point that the imperial postal service (cf. Phil 4:22) could have made communications with Rome fast and efficient. Whatever the verdict on this, it is clear that these letters do not provide secure foundations for chronology.

3.2.6. Synthesis. The evidence of Paul's travels makes it clear that Paul undertook at least two major journeys to Macedonia and Achaia. On the initial, founding visit he came round from the north, visiting Philippi first, then Thessalonica, before heading south for Athens and Corinth. On his last journey (which does not rule out the possibility of intervening visits) he came from Ephesus, where he had been working for some time, via Troas and Macedonia to Corinth. On this trip he was supervising the final assembly of the collection, incorporating contributions from the churches in Macedonia and Achaia, which he eventually decided to accompany to Jerusalem. Our last glimpse of Paul is in Romans 15, where he announces his intention to turn west after Jerusalem, visiting Rome (which he has never seen) en route for Spain; but no letter tells us what happened in Jerusalem. The prison letters date traditionally from after this period, though some may come from earlier episodes. The travel sequence thus provided runs as follows:

(D) First journey to Macedonia and Achaia [1 Thess]

(E) Ephesus ministry, time unspecified, perhaps including 2 imprisonments: [?Phil, ?Philem]—Galatians—organization of collection by letter [1 Cor; 2 Cor 1—9; 2 Cor 10—13; message or visit to Galatia]

(F) Final journey, Ephesus to Corinth via Troas and Macedonia, en route for Jerusalem with collection

There are few indicators of time in this material, and no external chronological data.

3.3. Conclusions. Using the letters alone, we are able to construct a surprisingly full picture of Paul's ministry, but the evidence falls short of providing a full chronology. Attempts to achieve greater precision on this basis tend to rely on theological or stylistic development, on which it is difficult to reach general agreement, or to lay greater weight on details than they can properly bear.

The above analysis seeks to set out the minimum chronological information which is clearly stated or implied in the letters. What is not yet clear is how the two sequences relate to each other: are they successive or interlocking? If Galatians 2:10 refers to the institution of the collection, then the last Macedonian journey at least must date from after the conference of Galatians 2:1-10: but how long after it is not clear. We know that the churches in Galatia were founded before the conference, and (purely on the internal evidence of the letters) it seems likely that those in Macedonia and Achaia were too, both because the early letter 1 Thessalonians contains no mention of either conference or collection, and because Paul is unlikely to have delayed many years over fulfilling his obligation (Rom 15:31). This would give an interlocking sequence A B D C E F:

34/35 (A) Conversion, Arabia, Damascus (3 yrs)
37/38 (B) Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia
Fourteen-year span including mission in Galatia and
(D) First Macedonian journey
51/52 (C) Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
(E) Ephesus ministry and organization of collection
(F) Final Macedonian journey, en route for Jerusalem with collection

However, this is a matter of probability only: a successive order is also possible, yielding the sequence A B C D E F:

34/35 (A) Conversion, Arabia, Damascus (3 yrs)
37/38 (B) Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia
Fourteen-year span including mission in Galatia
51/52 (C) Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
(D) First Macedonian journey
(E) Ephesus ministry and organization of collection
(F) Final Macedonian journey, en route for Jerusalem with collection

A reading of the fourteen years (3 + 11 = 14) gives a conference date of 48/49 in both cases, but does not affect the sequence.

4. Chronological Data in Acts.

4.1. Internal Chronology.

4.1.1. The Sequence of Events. Acts, being narrative in form, has to arrange events in a clear sequence, which may be tabulated as follows:

(1) Conversion at Damascus (Acts 9:1-19), escape in a basket (Acts 9:25)
(2) Jerusalem visit 1 (Acts 9:26), to Tarsus via Caesarea (Acts 9:30)
(3) Jerusalem visit 2: from Antioch with famine relief (Acts 11:19-30, 12:25)
(4) First missionary journey: Antioch-Cyprus-Pamphylia-Pisidia-Iconium-Lystra-Derbe-Antioch (Acts 13:1—14:28)
(5) Jerusalem visit 3, conference (Acts 15:1-35)
(6) Second missionary journey: Syria & Cilicia, Phrygia-Galatia-Philippi-Thessalonica-Berea-Athens-Corinth (Acts 15:36—18:17)
(7) Miscellaneous travels: Corinth-Ephesus-Caesarea-"up" to greet the church (= Jerusalem visit 4?)-Antioch-Galatia-Phrygia-Ephesus (18:18—19:20)
(8) Return to Jerusalem:Ephesus-Macedonia-Greece-Macedonia-Troas-Miletus-Caesarea-Jerusalem (Acts 19:21—21:16)
(9) Final Jerusalem visit: arrest in Temple, trial before Sanhedrin under high priest Ananias, removal to Caesarea, two-year imprisonment under Felix (Acts 21:17—24:27)
(10) Journey to Rome: trial before Festus and Agrippa, voyage to Rome, two-year imprisonment (25:1—28:31)

4.1.2. The Passing of Time. Luke is notoriously vague about time: precise travel details alternate with vague indications like "after many days." His episodic style inclines him to focus often on the events of a single day, or to give a detailed timetable for a voyage of a few weeks, while explicit indications of the chronological relationship between one episode and another are rare. The most precise indications of longer time lapses are:

A year in Antioch (Acts 11:26)
"A long time" in Iconium (Acts 14:3)
"No little time" in Antioch (Acts 14:28)
Eighteen months in Corinth (Acts 18:11)
Three months + two years + "a while" in Ephesus (Acts 19:8, 10, 22)
Three months in Greece (Acts 20:3)
Two years in Caesarea (Acts 24:27)
Two years in Rome (Acts 28:30)

Even on a generous estimate, this accounts for no more than eleven out of the thirty possible years of

Paul's ministry. Implicit indicators such as travelling speed and seasonal conditions can also be used, but caution is needed here: thus, for example, Jewett estimates that the second missionary journey (6) should be allowed no less than "three or four years" (Jewett, 57-62), but Hemer (267-69) points out that it is dangerous to assume that we know what was "normal" for Paul: Hemer's own estimate for the same journey is eighteen months (see Travel).

4.2. External Chronology. Acts mentions a number of names and events which provide possible anchor points in Roman history.

4.2.1. The Famine. Acts 11:27-30 speaks of a widespread famine "in the days of Claudius" (A.D. 41-54). External evidence suggests a number of possible dates for this famine: Bruce (276-77) concludes "not later than A.D. 48, and possibly 2 or 3 years earlier." Note that Acts actually describes two events here: the prophecy of Agabus, and a future famine which he correctly predicts. This Jerusalem visit is thus difficult to date precisely and need not have happened before the death of Herod Agrippa which is recounted in Acts 12: "Luke completes one phase of his narrative before going back in time to deal with another phase" (Bruce, 277).

4.2.2. Herod Agrippa. The death of Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:20-23) took place in early March, A.D. 44 (Josephus Ant. 19.8.2 §§ 343-52). This event is related rather loosely as a coda to the Peter story of Acts 12:1-19: compare Luke 3:18-20, where the story of John's imprisonment (related by Mark in a quite different context) is attached by Luke to the baptism story. Similarly here: Acts 12:25 appears to have Saul and Barnabas return shortly after Herod's death, but this arrangement may be topical rather than chronological.

4.2.3. Sergius Paulus. A Sergius Paulus (Acts 13:7) is known from inscriptional evidence to have had a connection with Cyprus (Ogg, 60-65; Bruce, 297), but the data are not sufficient to allow a precise dating.

4.2.4. Claudius and the Jews. There is dispute over the date of the expulsion of Jews from Rome mentioned in Acts 18:2. Dio Cassius (60.6.6) dates Jewish disturbances to A.D. 41, but states that a ban on assembly was imposed because expulsion was impossible. Suetonius (Claudius 25.4) records an expulsion of Jewish agitators (possibly confused with Christians), but gives no date: a later church historian dates it in Claudius's ninth year, A.D. 49. Lüdemann (157-75) argues for the earlier date and has Paul meet Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth in 41; the Gallio incident (which he accepts as genuine tradition) must therefore be dated during a later visit in 51. Most scholars prefer the later date, having Aquila and Priscilla arrive shortly before Paul in 49/50 (Smallwood, 210-16; Jewett, 36-38; Bruce, 390-91).

4.2.5. Gallio. The proconsulship of Gallio (Acts 18:12) is widely regarded as a "pivotal date" (Jewett) for Pauline chronology. Inscriptional evidence means that Gallio's period of office can be dated with some precision to A.D. 51/52: Roman governors took office in early summer. (See Bruce, 394-95; Jewett, 38-40. Ogg, 104-11, gives the relevant inscriptions in full.)

4.2.6. Ananias the High Priest. Ananias (Acts 23:2; 24:1) was appointed in 47. He was sent to Rome in chains in 52 (Josephus Ant. 20.6.2 §131), but since Claudius decided the dispute in the Jews' favor (Josephus Ant. 20.6.3 §136), we can assume that Ananias was restored to his office. No other high priest is mentioned until the appointment of Ishmael (Josephus Ant. 20.8.8 §179), which Josephus links with the transfer of power from Felix to Festus, i.e., around 59/60 [see 4.2.7 below]).

4.2.7. Felix and Festus. Paul's final hearing in Caesarea is linked fairly precisely by Luke with Festus's arrival as procurator (Acts 25:1, 6, 13, 23). Unfortunately, although both Felix and Festus are known from Josephus and other ancient sources, the date of transfer of office cannot be determined precisely. Jewett (40-44) gives a clear account of the data, which can be summarized as follows: Josephus (Ant. 20.8.9 §182) states that when Felix was accused of misdemeanors against the Jews at the end of his term in office, he was protected by Nero because of his brother Pallas. Since Pallas fell from favor in 55, many have assumed that the transfer took place in 54/55. But there is no reason to suppose that Pallas' influence ceased immediately after his demotion (Jewett, 42-43), and the activities which Josephus assigns to Felix's procuratorship (including the Egyptian agitator of Acts 21:38 and Josephus J.W. 2.13.5 §261) seem to require that he was in office several years under Nero (Josephus J.W. 2.13.1-7 §§250-70), that is, after October 54. For this reason many historians prefer a later date: Smallwood (269 n.40) suggests 58/59, Jewett 59 or 60.

4.3. Conclusions. Taken by itself, the evidence of Acts allows us to reconstruct the following tentative chronology:

34/35 (1) Conversion at Damascus (9:1-19), escape in a basket (9:25)
(2) Jerusalem visit 1 "after many days," to Tarsus
41-48 (3) Jerusalem visit 2 (famine relief)
(4) First missionary journey
(5) Jerusalem visit 3, conference

47-51 (6) Second missionary journey: arrival of Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth could be either 41/42 or 49/50. Paul's stay in Corinth at least eighteen months. Hearing before Gallio must be 51-52

(7) Miscellaneous travels: two-and-a-half to three years in Ephesus

56-57 (8) Return to Jerusalem: three months in Greece

57-59 (9) Final Jerusalem visit, two-year imprisonment in Caesarea

59-62 (10) Trial before Festus, voyage to Rome, two-year imprisonment

5. Integration of the Letters and Acts.

5.1. Sequential Integration. Purely in terms of chronological sequence, there is little difficulty in integrating the two sequences derived from the letters with the fuller and more circumstantial narrative provided by Acts. The two sets of data are remarkably coherent: Acts has the same two tripartite sequences, integrated successively A B C D E F. Thus Luke begins with the conversion in Damascus (A = 1), a basket escape from Damascus, and a visit to Jerusalem (B = 2), followed by a withdrawal to Tarsus (Cilicia) and activities in Antioch* (Syria). Acts 9:23 gives a vague "after many days" in place of Paul's "three years," but unless we are to doubt Paul's solemn asseveration (Gal 1:20), the two visits must be regarded as equivalent (Bruce, 241). The planning of this chapter suggests that Luke has grouped all his information about Damascus together in topical fashion.

Some time later (no interval specified, but the arrangement of topics suggests that some years have elapsed) we have a conference on the Gentile mission (C = 5), preceded by missionary activities in the area of Syria, Cilicia and "South Galatia." Whether or not this is the area addressed in Galatians, there is space in this period for the founding of the churches addressed there. The conference is followed by a missionary journey which takes in Philippi, Thessalonica, Athens and Corinth (D = 6), then by an obscure period of travel circling around Ephesus (E = 7), and finally by a carefully planned journey (Acts 19:21) from Ephesus via Macedonia and Achaia to Jerusalem, with a distant intention of visiting Rome (F = 8). The final outcome, with the arrest in Jerusalem and journey to Rome as a captive, fills in the hiatus left at the end of the travel sequence in the letters.

There are however two major problems with this synthesis, one connected with the date of Gallio, and the other with the second Jerusalem visit recorded in Acts 11.

5.2. The Date of Gallio. Acts 18:12 dates Paul's dispute in Corinth securely to the year A.D. 51/52. This event comes after an eighteen-month stay in Corinth (Acts 18:11), so Paul must have been in Corinth at least since January 50. The visit comes at the end of the long missionary journey from Antioch through to Macedonia, which at Paul's normal rate of progression should take three to four years; even on a minimum calculation this would take eighteen months, which means that Paul must have left Jerusalem in 48. But the date of the conference, according to our calculations based on the letters, is fourteen years after the Aretas incident. This cannot be earlier than 37, which means that the earliest possible conference date is 51.

Pushing the crucifixion (and thus Paul's conversion) back to an earlier date will not help: it is the Aretas incident which causes the problem here. Lüdemann, who dates the conference to 47, simply discounts the Aretas date (similarly Hemer). Theoretically we could argue that 2 Corinthians 11:32-33 refers to a different occasion altogether, an unrecorded third Damascus visit: but this seems to be straining credibility. An alternative is to attack the fixity of the fourteen-year time span of Galatians 2:1. Inclusive reckoning can shorten this to thirteen years, and concurrent reading of the three-year and fourteen-year spans means that the conference can be placed as early as 47.

A number of scholars believe, however, that the simplest solution is to reverse the order of the second missionary journey and the conference, giving the sequence A B D C E F. On this view Paul left Corinth soon after Gallio's arrival (July/August 51) to arrive in Jerusalem for the conference in October 51. On the evidence of the letters, as we saw above, this sequence is perfectly feasible (and indeed marginally preferable), and the reversal in Acts is easily explained if we argue that Luke had good Pauline tradition for both the journey and the conference but had no information as to their correct sequence (the letters, as we have seen, provide no such information). In fact it is possible to see a relic of the correct position in Acts 18:22-23, which has all the necessary stages: Jerusalem, Antioch, Galatia and Phrygia, Ephesus (Bruce, 399-400, accepts that Acts 18:22 contains a reference to Jerusalem, although he does not agree that this is the conference visit). Jewett (78-85) lists the scholars who have followed this solution: Jewett himself prefers it, and on this basis is able to integrate virtually every detail from the Acts narrative and the letters into a precise chronology.

5.3. The Famine Relief Visit. The other difficulty of integration concerns Acts' second Jerusalem visit (3). If we identify the conference of Galatians 2 with the one described in Acts 15 (C = 5), we are left with two problems: the accounts of the conferences differ in significant details, and the Acts 11 visit contradicts Paul's express statement in Galatians that the conference visit was only his second visit to Jerusalem. Acts 15 is his third. Of these the first can be explained in a variety of ways (the different accounts may represent different perspectives on the same event), but the second seems intractable: Paul's statement in Galatians is no passing remark, but a solemn asseveration. If Acts 11 is correct, then Paul is being (to put it mildly) economical with the truth.

One simple and longstanding solution to this problem is to argue that the conference described in Galatians 2 took place on the Acts 11 visit (C = 3). Jewett (69-75) lists and describes the various hypotheses which have followed this route. It disposes neatly of both the objections to the C = 5 identification. Acts 15 can be read as describing a later, more formal conference which is not reflected in the letters (Bruce, 29-32), and there is no contradiction with Galatians 1. It does however raise some problems of its own. The stated motivation for the two visits is not the same: we would have to argue that Paul's "by revelation" (Gal 2:2) alludes obliquely to the prophetic basis for the visit described in Acts, and that Paul's stress on a private meeting does not preclude the possibility that the public reason for the visit was quite different (Hemer, 248).

But our immediate concern here is that this identification appears to raise acute problems for chronology. The fourteen-year span of Galatians 2:1 now has to be fitted in between Acts 9 and Acts 11. This is clearly impossible if the conference took place before the death of Herod (Acts 12:23) in 44. The situation is eased if we agree that (as argued at 4.2.1 above) the visit of Acts 11:30 is not closely tied to the events of Acts 12, but is simply reckoned to have happened "in the days of Claudius" (Acts 11:28), that is, somewhere in the period 41-54. Famines are known up to at least 48 (see 4.2.1 above), and a concurrent reckoning of the fourteen years could bring the conference down to this date. But the later we put the conference, the greater the difficulties, given that now both missionary journeys (4 and 6), as well as Paul's eighteen months in Corinth, must be fitted in before Paul meets Gallio in 51/52. Again, some scholars believe that it is simpler to conclude that the Acts 11 visit is out of sequence, most probably because the information Luke received did not enable him to align it correctly with the journey traditions. It may reflect a separate line of tradition from the church at Antioch, which did not originally include Paul, or possibly it may allude to the collection, which Luke does not mention elsewhere.

5.4. Conclusions. The two tripartite sequences deduced from the letters can be integrated with Acts in one of two ways. An interlocking sequence (on the assumption that Luke has reversed the conference and the first Macedonian journey) gives the order A B D C E F, with (3) as a floating tradition reflecting either (C) or (F):

34	(A = 1)	Conversion, Arabia, Damascus (3 years)
37	(B = 2)	Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia
		Fourteen-year span including mission in Galatia and
	(4)	First missionary journey
49-50	(D = 6)	Second missionary journey = First Macedonian journey
50-51		Eighteen months in Corinth, Gallio July 51, conference October 51
51	(C = 5)	Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
	(E = 7)	Ephesian ministry (2 1/2—3 yrs) and organization of collection
56-57	(F = 8)	Final Macedonian journey to Jerusalem with collection
57-59	(9)	Final Jerusalem visit, two-year imprisonment in Caesarea
59-62	(10)	Trial before Festus, voyage to Rome, two-year imprisonment

This schedule enables us to make sense of all the chronological data in the letters and Acts, except for two points at which Luke did not have sufficient information to allow him to sequence his material clearly. He appears to have followed the same procedure as the Gospel writers, who sometimes arrange material topically rather than in chronological sequence. Exactly the same problem occurs in the ancient historians (Josephus, Suetonius), whose vagueness or lack of information about sequence means that first-century chronology can rarely attain a high degree of precision.

If, on the other hand, we follow the order of events as given in Acts, the two sequences must be arranged successively in the order A B C D E F, thus:

34	(A = 1)	Conversion, Arabia, Damascus (3 yrs)
37	(B = 2)	Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia
		Eleven-year span including mission in Galatia
48	(C = 3)	Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
48	(4)	First missionary journey
49	(5)	Acts 15 conference

49-50	(D = 6)	Second missionary journey = First Macedonian journey
50-51		Eighteen months in Corinth followed by meeting with Gallio
	(E = 7)	Ephesian ministry (2 1/2—3 yrs) and organization of collection
56-57	(F = 8)	Final Macedonian journey to Jerusalem with collection
57-59	(9)	Final Jerusalem visit, two-year imprisonment in Caesarea
59-62	(10)	Trial before Festus. voyage to Rome, two-year imprisonment

This results in a very tight timetable between the conference and the meeting with Gallio. An earlier date for the crucifixion (and thus the conversion) would help, but only if we ignore the Aretas datum. If we keep the same sequence but eliminate the famine relief visit (3), this gives an easier schedule, though the time for the second missionary journey is still tight:

34	(A = 1)	Conversion, Arabia, Damascus (3 yrs)
37	(B = 2)	Jerusalem visit 1; to Syria and Cilicia
		Eleven-year span including mission in Galatia and
	(4)	First missionary journey
48	(C = 5)	Jerusalem visit 2, conference, Antioch incident
48-50	(D = 6)	Second missionary journey = First Macedonian journey
50-51		Eighteen months in Corinth followed by meeting with Gallio
	(E = 7)	Ephesus ministry (2 yrs) and organization of collection
56-57	(F = 8)	Final Macedonian journey to Jerusalem with collection
57-59	(9)	Final Jerusalem visit, two-year imprisonment in Caesarea
59-62	(10)	Trial before Festus, voyage to Rome, two-year imprisonment

Given the imprecision of most of our chronological data and the limitations of the evidence, it would be unrealistic to look for a more definitive chronology. Within these limitations, the chronology of Paul is as well founded as any historian would expect for a comparable figure of his time and place.

See also CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; EPHESUS; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; JERUSALEM; PASTORAL LETTERS; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE; ROME AND ROMAN CHRISTIANITY; THESSALONIANS, LETTERS TO THE; TRAVEL IN THE ROMAN WORLD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles: Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary (3d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); K. P. Donfried, "Chronology: New Testament," ABD I.1011-22; J. J. Gunther, Paul: Messenger and Exile: A Study in the Chronology of His Life and Letters (Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1972); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990); H. W. Hoehner, "Chronology," DJG 118-22; R. Jewett, A Chronology of Paul's Life (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. Knox, Chapters in a Life of Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1950); G. Lüdemann, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); G. Ogg, The Chronology of the Life of Paul (London: Epworth 1968); E. M. Smallwood, The Jews under Roman Rule (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976).

L. C. A. Alexander

CHURCH

More than one hundred different terms, metaphors and images are used in the NT to describe God's* people with whom he has entered into a saving relationship in Christ.* In addition to these descriptions several activities are said to characterize Christian believers. Integral to Paul's teaching about the people of God is his use of the important word ekklēsia, a term meaning "congregation," "church," "gathering" or "assembly."

1. Ekklēsia Outside the Bible
2. Ekklēsia in Paul
3. The Origin of the Church
4. Some Images of the Church
5. The Purpose of the Church's Gathering
6. Authority in the Church

1. Ekklēsia Outside the Bible.

1.1. Ekklēsia in the Greek City-State. The term ekklēsia ("assembly"), derived from ek-kaleō ("call out," a verb used for the summons to an army to assemble), is attested from the time of Euripides and Herodotus onward (fifth century B.C.) and denoted the popular assembly of the full citizens of the polis, or Greek city state. During this period it met at regular intervals, though in cases of emergency the term could describe an extraordinary gathering. Every citizen had the right to speak and to propose matters for discussion. Centuries before the translation of the OT and the time of the NT, the term ekklēsia was clearly characterized as a political phenomenon; it was the assembly of full citizens, functionally rooted in the Greek democracy, an assembly in which fundamentally political and judicial decisions were taken (cf. Acts 19:39; where at 19:32 and 41 even an unconstitutional assembly is called an ekklēsia). It was regarded as existing only when it actually assembled (as such it was distinct from the dēmos, "people," "crowd," "populace").

1.2. Ekklēsia in the LXX, Josephus and Philo. In the LXX ekklēsia frequently was a translation of the Hebrew qāhāl, a term that could describe assemblies of a less specifically religious or nonreligious kind, such as the gathering of an army in preparation for war (1 Sam 17:47; 2 Chron 28:14) or the "coming together" of an unruly and potentially dangerous crowd (Ps 26[LXX 25]:5). (Ekklēsia never renders ʿēḏāh, "congregation," which represented the people as a national unit.) Of particular significance are those instances of ekklēsia (rendering qāhāl) which denote the congregation of Israel when it assembled to hear the Word of God on Mt. Sinai, or later on Mt. Zion where all Israel was required to assemble three times a year. Sometimes the whole nation appears to be involved, as when Moses addresses the people prior to their entry into the promised land. Deuteronomy 4:10 describes "the day when you stood before the Lord your God, in Horeb, when he said to me, 'Assemble the people before me to hear my words' " (the LXX uses the term ekklēsia and its cognate verb ekklēsiazō; note also Deut 9:10; 18:16; 31:30; Judg 20:2; etc.). At other times it is only the chief representatives that seem to be present, as with the congregation of tribal leaders, or patriarchal chiefs, at Solomon's dedication of the Temple of Jerusalem (1 Kings 8:14, 22, 55, etc.).

Josephus also used the word frequently (some forty-eight times, of which eighteen are LXX quotations), always of a gathering. These vary in character, for example, religious, political and spontaneous assemblies are mentioned (Josephus Ant. 4.45 §309; Life §268; J.W. 1.4 §654; 1.8 §666). Philo employs the term some thirty times, all but five of which are in quotations from the LXX. These five appear in a classical Greek sense.

So in the Greek and Jewish worlds prior to and contemporaneous with the NT ekklēsia meant an assembly or gathering of people. It did not designate an "organization" or "society." Although it had no intrinsically religious meaning and could refer to meetings that were secular in character, of special significance are those occurrences of ekklēsia in the LXX which refer to the congregation of Israel when it assembled to hear the Word of God.

2. Ekklēsia in Paul.

The word ekklēsia appears 114 times in the NT, with sixty-two instances in Paul (three instances are in Matthew, twenty-three in Acts, twenty in Revelation and in the non-Pauline letters six occurrences). Since Paul's uses all predate the other instances in the NT it is important to determine the meaning he attaches to it in various contexts.

2.1. A Local Assembly or Congregation of Christians. Chronologically, the first use occurs at 1 Thessalonians 1:1 (cf. 2 Thess 1:1) in the greeting to the Christians at Thessalonica: "Paul, Silas and Timothy. To the church (ekklēsia) of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord* Jesus Christ." The term is employed in the same way as in Greek and Jewish circles, that is, like other assemblies (ekklēsiai) in the city, it is described as "a gathering of the Thessalonians." But it is distinguished from the regular political councils by the addition of the words "in God the Father," and from the regular synagogue meetings by the use of the term ekklēsia and the additional phrase "in the Lord Jesus Christ" (Banks). From the closing remarks of the letter it is clear that Paul has in mind an actual gathering of the Thessalonian* Christians. So he requests that his letter "be read to all the brothers and sisters" and that they "greet them all with a holy kiss" (1 Thess 5:26-27).

Other instances of ekklēsia (singular) and ekklēsiai (plural) in Paul's letters also denote a local assembly or gathering of Christians in a particular place: it is thus not a metaphor, but a term descriptive of an identifiable object. In the two Thessalonian letters reference is made to "the churches of God" (2 Thess 1:4) and "the churches of God in Judea" (2:14). Other letters such as Galatians* (Gal 1:2), the two letters to the Corinthians* (1 Cor 7:17; 11:16; 14:33, 34; 2 Cor 8:19, 23, 24; 11:8, 28; 12:13) and Romans* (Rom 16:4, 16) also employ the plural when more than one church is in view (the only exceptions are the distributive expression "every church," 1 Cor 4:17, and the phrase "the church of God," 1 Cor 10:32, in a generic or possibly localized sense). So reference is made to "the churches in Galatia" (Gal 1:2; 1 Cor 16:1), "the churches of Asia" (1 Cor 16:19), "the churches in Macedonia" (2 Cor 8:1) and "the churches of Judea" (Gal 1:22). This suggests that the term was applied only to an actual gathering of people, or to a group that gathers when viewed as a regularly constituted meeting (Banks). Although we often speak of a group of congregations collectively as "the church" (i.e., of a denomination), it is doubtful whether Paul (or the rest of the NT) uses ekklēsia in this collective way. Also, the notion of a unified provincial or national church appears to have been foreign to Paul's thinking. An ekklēsia was a meeting or an assembly. This primary sense of "gathering" comes out clearly in 1 Corinthians 11—14 where expressions are used, such as "when you assemble in church" (1 Cor 11:18) and "to speak in church" (1 Cor 14:35; cf. 14:4, 5, 12, 19, 28).

In one or two NT instances ekklēsia is found as an extension of the literal, descriptive use of "an assembly" to designate the persons who compose that gathering, whether they are assembled or not. This is a natural extension or linguistic development of group words (note our use of the word "team"), and may explain references such as Acts 8:3; 9:31; 20:17. However, two significant observations need to be made: first, the primary use of the word ekklēsia as gathering predominates overwhelmingly in the NT—and indeed through the Apostolic Fathers to the Apologists. Secondly, no theological constructs are made on the basis of these very few extended uses.

It is of particular significance that at the beginning of the two Corinthian letters (1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; cf. 1 Cor 10:32; 11:22; Rom 16:16) the church is described as belonging to the one who brought it into existence, that is, God, or the one through whom this has taken place, namely, Christ. Such an ekklēsia was not simply a human association or a religious club, but a divinely created entity. As in the case of ancient Israel, the gatherings referred to by our term were in order to hear the word of God and to worship.* Paul's reference in Galatians (Gal 1:13; cf. 1 Cor 15:9; Phil 3:6) to his original persecution of "the church of God" does not necessarily contradict this suggestion, since the expression may point to the church at Jerusalem* before it was distributed into a smaller number of assemblies in various parts of Judea, or that it was as the believers met together that the arrests were made—their gathering provided evidence of their Christian associations (cf. Banks).

2.2. A House Church. In a second group of references ekklēsia is again used as a descriptive term of an identifiable object—as distinct from a metaphor—this time of a gathering that met in a particular home, a house-church (see Sociology). On occasion, a whole congregation in one city might be small enough to meet in the home of one of its members, and it must be remembered that it was not until about the middle of the third century that early Christianity owned property for purposes of worship. In other places house churches appear to have been smaller circles of fellowship within the larger group. In addition to Nympha's house in Laodicea (Col 4:15), we know that in Colossae Philemon's* house was used as a meeting place (Philem 2). At Philippi Lydia's home seems to have been used in this way (Acts 16:15, 40), while at Corinth Gaius is described as "host . . . to the whole church" (Rom 16:23; the qualification "whole" would be unnecessary if the Christians at Corinth only met as a single group, and implies smaller groups also existed in the city; cf. 1 Cor 14:23; note also 1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:5).

2.3. A Heavenly Gathering. Of particular significance for our study of the church are those instances in Paul's later letters where ekklēsia has a wider reference than either a local congregation or a house-church, and describes a heavenly and eschatological entity. We begin with Colossians 1:18 where it is stated that Christ is "the head of the body, that is the church." At Colossians 1:24 a similar expression is employed in the context of Paul's sufferings ("on behalf of his body, which is the church"). Most commentators interpret these references in Colossians (and the similar instances in Eph 1:22; 3:10, 21; 5:23-24, 27, 29, 32) of "the church universal, to which all believers belong" (Bauer) and which is scattered throughout the world. But there are two serious criticisms that may be leveled against this view: (1) The term ekklēsia can no longer have its usual meaning of "gathering" or "assembly," since it is difficult to envisage how the worldwide church could assemble, and so the word must be translated in some other way to denote an organization or society. (2) The context of Colossians 1:15-20 which is moving on a heavenly plane suggests it is not an earthly phenomenon that is being spoken of in Colossians 1:18, but a supernatural and heavenly* one.

This is not to suggest that believers have no relationships with one another if they do not gather together in church. As members of the body of Christ or of God's people, they are not only related to Christ himself but also to one another even when separated by time and distance. But the point being made here is that ekklēsia is not the term used in the NT of those wider, universal links. Earlier in the Letter to the Colossians* it had been mentioned that the readers have been fitted for a share in the inheritance of the saints in the kingdom* of light,* and have been transferred from a tyranny of darkness to a kingdom in which God's beloved Son* holds sway (Col 1:12-14). On the one hand, the Colossians are obviously members of an earthly realm (note the exhortations of Col 3:4—4:6 which show they have important earthly responsibilities), and the apostle looks forward to their being presented as "holy, irreproachable, and blameless" before God on the last day (Col 1:22). On the other hand, they are described as presently existing in a heavenly realm. Since they have been raised with Christ, they are to seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at God's right hand (Col 3:1; see Dying and Rising with Christ). Because they live with Christ in this heavenly dimension (note that Christ who is their life is already in heaven, Col 3:1, 3), they are assured that when he appears they will also appear with him in glory* (Col 3:4).

Later references in Ephesians are thought to point in this same direction of a heavenly gathering: it is expressly mentioned that God "made us alive with Christ . . . raised us up with him and seated us in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus" (Eph 2:5-6). The same readers of this circular letter have been "blessed . . . in the heavenly realms with every spiritual blessing in Christ" (Eph 1:3). Again reference is made to Christ's headship* over the "church" (ekklēsia) which is his body (Eph 1:22-23). If the term ekklēsia is to be understood here as "church" or a gathering taking place in heaven, then this would mean that Christians participate in it as they go about their ordinary daily tasks. They are already gathered around Christ, and this is another way of saying that they now enjoy fellowship* with him. Further references in Ephesians (Eph 3:10, 21; 5:23, 25, 27, 29, 32), though usually taken by interpreters to refer to "the church universal," could also be understood as designating that heavenly gathering around Christ.

An important passage outside the Pauline letters where ekklēsia refers to a "gathering" that is both heavenly and eschatological is Hebrews 12:23 where the unusual expression "the assembly (ekklēsia) of the firstborn" appears. Although the heavenly city is still the goal of the Christian's pilgrimage (Heb 13:14), Christians in their conversion have already come to that heavenly assembly.

2.4. The Relationship of Paul's Uses of* Ekklēsia. The NT does not discuss the relationship between the local church and the heavenly gathering. The link is nowhere specifically spelled out. Certainly the local congregation was neither a part of the church of God nor a church of God. This is made plain in several places, including 1 Corinthians 1:2 where the apostle writes "to the church of God which is at Corinth." But we may suggest that local congregations, as well as house groups that met in the homes of Nympha and Lydia, for example, were concrete, visible expressions of that new relationship which believers have with the Lord Jesus. Local gatherings, whether in a congregation or a house church, were earthly manifestations of that heavenly gathering around the risen Christ.

If this heavenly meeting with Christ is a figurative or metaphorical way of speaking about believers' ongoing fellowship with him, then it was appropriate that this new relationship with the ascended Lord should find concrete expression in their regular coming together, that is, "in church." Apparently, the responsibility of meeting together in this way was not immediately obvious to some of the early Christians since they still needed to be exhorted not to forsake "the assembling of . . . [themselves] together" (Heb 10:25).

Men and women were called into membership of this one church of Christ, the heavenly assembly, through the preaching of the gospel. They were brought into fellowship with God's Son (cf. 1 Cor 1:9), and to speak of their membership of this heavenly gathering assembled around Christ is another way of referring to this new relationship with him. They and other Christians were to assemble in local congregations here on earth, for this was an important way in which their fellowship with Christ was expressed. Further, as they came together with others who were in fellowship with him, so they not only met with each other—they also met with Christ himself who indwelt them corporately and individually.

3. The Origin of the Church.

3.1. "The Church of God." It has been claimed that whenever ekklēsia appears by itself it is to be understood as an abbreviation of the original term hē ekklēsia tou theou ("the church of God": 1 Cor 1:2; 10:32; 11:22; 15:9; 2 Cor 1:1; Gal 1:13; plural in 1 Cor 11:16, 22; 1 Thess 2:14; 2 Thess 1:4). Accordingly, the genitive of God is not merely an addition which defines more precisely the preceding word church, but was part of an original fixed formulation. "The church of God" was the self-designation of the early Jerusalem church (1 Cor 15:9; cf. Gal 1:13; Phil 3:6), which understood itself to be the eschatological community of salvation.* The full expression "the church of God" came to be applied to other congregations as well (1 Thess 2:14), including those in the Gentile* mission* ("the church of God which is at Corinth," 1 Cor 1:2; cf. 2 Thess 1:4). The genitive of God indicates that he is the source or origin of the church's life and existence. He summons men and women to himself through the preaching of Christ crucified and forms them into his ekklēsia.

3.2. Christ and the Church. On occasion, Paul mentions Christ in connection with the term ekklēsia: for example, "the churches of Christ greet you" (Rom 16:16). 1 Thessalonians 2:14 ("you became imitators of the churches of God in Christ which are in Judea") shows that Christ has not replaced God as the source of the church's life. God's act of founding the ekklēsia is mediated through Jesus Christ and his gospel. This was true of the ekklēsia in Thessalonica, no less than the churches in Judea. So, the churches of the NT are the congregations of God in Christ, the churches in Jesus Christ (1 Thess 2:14; Gal 1:22), or the churches of Jesus Christ (Rom 16:16).

4. Some Images of the Church.

In addition to his use of the important term ekklēsia

("church, congregation"), Paul employs many significant images and metaphors of God's people in Christ. These images are not always synonymous or coterminous with ekklēsia. For example, the body metaphor can refer to Christians generally in their relationships in Christ, without suggesting that they are members of the same ekklēsia. But often in his letters the apostle applies these images to the same entity as the ekklēsia—for example, the congregation at Corinth. These metaphors have different or nuanced connotations, and therefore it is important to ask what point is being conveyed or taught through the image. More than a hundred are used in the NT generally. We shall confine our remarks to a limited number which throw special light on Paul's understanding of the church. (For a discussion of the wider issues relating to any one image, see the separate entry.)

4.1. The Temple. The figure of the temple is used metaphorically in the NT to denote God's people. The apostle, in particular, develops this picture of the church as the community of the redeemed which, through the sanctifying activity of the Holy Spirit, is constituted as the dwelling place of God: this idea appears in 1 Corinthians 3:16-17; 2 Corinthians 6:16-18 and Ephesians 2:20-22 (cf. 1 Cor 6:19).

4.1.1. 1 Corinthians 3:16-17. In a context where he seeks to combat party strife in the church at Corinth (1:10-17; 3:5-9), Paul uses naos theou ("the temple of God") specifically of the local congregation. By means of the temple imagery he makes plain, first, that the congregation at Corinth is the temple of God because his Spirit dwells among God's assembled people (1 Cor 10:16). Second, the church is itself the dwelling place of God. His tabernacling on earth is not apart from his people; instead, it is an indwelling within them (1 Cor 10:16-17). Third, Paul stresses the unity and holiness of God's temple. All the Corinthians together constitute God's dwelling place, and as such it is holy. To defile it by internal schism, divisions or party spirit is to destroy it, and any attempt to do this will incur divine judgment.*

4.1.2. 2 Corinthians 6:16-18. In one of the clearest statements in his letters about the idea of believers as God's temple, Paul, referring primarily to the members of the congregation at Corinth, states: "we are the temple of the living God." He quotes OT texts which speak of God's presence with his people (Lev 26:12; Ezek 37:27; etc.); however, it may be implied that for the apostle God's dwelling in his people goes beyond OT notions of his "presence with or among" them; now it is an actual "dwelling in" them. Although it is not explicitly stated that this temple is holy, it is clearly implied from the admonition where the Corinthians are exhorted to separate from all that is unclean (2 Cor 6:17, quoting Is 52:11).

4.1.3. Ephesians 2:20-22. The third major temple reference in Paul's letters occurs in a passage where the apostle reminds his Gentile converts that through Christ's death they have been made heirs of God's promises. Here the church is set forth as the heavenly temple—teaching that is akin to the heavenly dimension we have already observed in relation to ekklēsia. According to OT prophecy the temple at Jerusalem was to be the place where all nations at the end time would come to worship and pray* (Is 66:18-20; cf. Is 2:1-5; Mic 4:1-5). The temple imagery here is to be understood in fulfillment of these promises. Through Christ Gentiles have been brought near to God and along with Jews have become the new temple, the place where God's presence dwells. Christ's preeminent place in the temple is stressed: he is the "cornerstone," either the stone at the foot of the building, set in the corner to determine the line of the walls and so of the building as a whole, or the final stone set over the gate which holds the building together. "A holy temple in the Lord" and "a dwelling place of God in the Spirit" (Eph 2:21, 22) are parallel descriptions. The temple is God's heavenly abode, the place of his dwelling. Yet that temple is his people in whom he lives by his Spirit. Believers on earth, recipients of this circular letter, are linked with the heavenly realm in and through the Spirit of the risen Lord. Finally, the metaphor of the body is combined with that of the building to draw attention to the element of growth (Eph 2:21a, 22). Viewed as the temple the church is a dwelling inhabited by God; but from the point of its being a building it is still under construction.

4.2. The Body. The metaphor of the body of Christ (see Body of Christ), employed by Paul to describe the church, is a highly significant one, and is applied to a number of entities and with a range of connotations. It is used by the apostle in his earlier letters of a local congregation (at Corinth), of Christians (at Rome) in their relationships with one another—Christians who were not necessarily members of the same congregation (Rom 12:4-5)—and of a wider group, possibly including all Christians (1 Cor 12:13), that is, all who have been united to the Lord Jesus Christ. In Colossians* and Ephesians,* the body image denotes a heavenly entity*, that is, all Christians united to him. He is their life and is seated in heaven at God's right hand while believers themselves have not only been raised with Christ, but also have been made to sit with him in the heavenly places. We shall treat only those references which throw light on Paul's use of ekklēsia.

4.2.1. The Earlier Letters. At 1 Corinthians 12:12-27, where the apostle is concerned to impress on the Corinthian Christians that they have mutual duties and common interests which they must not neglect, he asserts, "You are the body of Christ and severally members of it" (1 Cor 12:27). Within the body which is one, there is true diversity—a multiplicity of functions which are necessary to its being a real body (1 Cor 12:17-20). Each member with his or her gifts is necessary to the other members for the good of the body as a whole (1 Cor 12:17-21). The Spirit's activity is specifically mentioned: it is through baptism in or by the Spirit (en heni pneumati, 1 Cor 12:13) that members are added to the body of Christ. The Spirit then refreshes them just as he graciously gives them gifts* for the common good (cf. 1 Cor 12:7, 11). The explicit reference to "you" (hymeis) at the conclusion of the paragraph (1 Cor 12:27) makes it plain that this metaphor of "the body of Christ" is predicated of the local congregation (ekklēsia) at Corinth. This church is neither a part of the body of Christ nor "a body of Christ." Such a description is similar to that in the opening words of the letter where the congregation is called "the church (ekklēsia) of God which is at Corinth" (1 Cor 1:2)—it is neither a part of the church of God nor a church of God in Corinth. Yet the statement in 1 Corinthians 12:13 about "we" being baptized into one body suggests that the image of the body of Christ can be used of Christians generally (or at least a wider group than the believers at Corinth). There are thus two entities being referred to by the one expression—the local congregation at Corinth, which is specifically in mind at 1 Corinthians 12:27, and a wider group including Paul and possibly others (the "we" of 1 Cor 12:13). The phrase "the body of Christ" can be used comprehensively of all who are united in him, and also of a particular manifestation of that body, in this case the local congregation. This notion fits exactly with our interpretation of ekklēsia (and the temple motif) where the term can describe a local manifestation (in either a specific congregation or a house church) and a heavenly entity.

At Romans 12:4-5 the body metaphor has reference to believers generally in their relationships with one another (perhaps scattered throughout the capital in Rome*), rather than describing them as a single congregation.

4.2.2. The Later Letters. In Colossians and Ephesians there is an advance in Paul's thought, involving the setting forth of the relationship which the church, as the body of Christ, bears to Christ as head* of the body (note the household code* of Eph 5:22-33 which is an occasion for instruction about the relationship between Christ and the church). The church as the body of Christ occupies a highly significant role in the purposes of God. This is brought out particularly in Ephesians 1:23 where it is asserted that Christ's rule over all things is for, or on behalf of, the church, and at Ephesians 3:10 where it is stated that through the ekklēsia the wisdom* of God is made known even to the cosmic powers (Eph 3:10; see Principalities and Powers). Christ's headship over the church is presented in terms of an organic relationship in which he exercises control over his people as the head of a body exercises control over its various parts. The living relationship between the members is kept in view, while the dependence of the members on Christ for life and power, as well as his supremacy, is reiterated. The element of the body's growth is made plain in Colossians 2:19 and even more so in Ephesians. Its upbuilding is mentioned in the context of unity in diversity; such a growth derives from Christ and leads to Christ as members are rightly related to him as the head, and to one another (Eph 4:1-16). The church as the body of Christ is described as Christ's fullness (Eph 1:23). In one sense it is complete, for it is already a body just as there is already a Lord (Eph 4:4-6). On the other hand, it grows and will be completed on the final day. The body thus partakes of the tension regularly seen in the NT between the "already" and the "not yet," between what it is and what it will be. The body is a present reality and yet it is an eschatological, that is, future, entity.

4.3. The Household. Throughout the NT God's people are regularly spoken of as a family, and a cluster of terms, drawn from family life, is used in discussions of the church and early Christian communities (see Household). God is "Father" (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:9), and those who are redeemed by Jesus Christ are God's children (Gal 4:1-7), with Jesus Christ being the firstborn* of the family (Rom 8:29). Paul speaks in warm terms when he addresses fellow Christians as "brothers" (note, for example, Phil 4:1; adelphoi, lit. "brothers," includes both "brothers and sisters"). The theme of family relationships is particularly prominent in 1 Timothy, where the church (ekklēsia) is described as "the household (oikos) of God, and the pillar and bulwark of the truth" (1 Tim 3:15; cf. Heb 3:1-6). The purpose of this letter as a whole is to indicate "how one ought to behave in God's household." The order of the church is analogous to that of a human household. Members are to treat one another as they would the members of their own family (1 Tim 5:1-2). They are to care for one another in need (1 Tim 5:5, 16), while overseers are to be skillful at managing the household of God, as demonstrated by their skill with, and care for, their own immediate families (1 Tim 3:1-7).

5. The Purpose of the Church's Gathering.
We have seen that coming together is an essential element of the ekklēsia. In many languages today the equivalent word for church is still used in relation to the act of gathering together: so expressions such as "it is time for church," "before [or after] church" or "in church" are used. The sense is always that of Christians congregating for a given reason. What, then, is the purpose of believers gathering together?

5.1. Edification. Although it is almost universally claimed that Christians meet together in church "to worship God," Paul's revolutionary teaching is that they are meant to worship him in every sphere of life (Rom 12:1). Worship terminology is transformed by the apostle and applied to the work of Christ (Rom 3:24-25; cf. Eph 5:2), the preaching* of the gospel* (Rom 1:9; 15:16; Phil 2:17), and the new lifestyle of believers (Rom 6:13, 16; 12:1; Phil 2:17; 1 Thess 1:9-10). It cannot be worship alone, therefore, that brings believers to church (cf. 1 Cor 14:25). Instead of the language of worship, Paul regularly uses the terminology of upbuilding, or edification, to indicate the purpose and function of Christian gatherings (1 Cor 14:3-5, 12, 17, 26; 1 Thess 5:11; Eph 4:11-16). "Edification" (oikodomē), which refers to the growth and progress of believers, is not to be interpreted individualistically. There is a corporate as well as a personal dimension in the apostle's teaching on edification. According to Ephesians 4:7 the Messiah builds his church (cf. the OT promises of God preparing a people for himself: Jer 24:6; 31:4; 33:7) through the people he gives as apostles,* prophets,* evangelists and pastor*-teachers. The focus of attention here is on the ministries of the word (cf. Eph 2:20-22) which are to "equip the saints for works of service for building up the body of Christ" (Eph 4:12). The ultimate goal of this ministry, and therefore the purpose of the gathering, is to prepare believers for full maturity when they meet their Lord (Eph 4:13). Edification occurs through prophecy* (1 Cor 14:3) and other verbal ministries of exhortation, comfort and admonition by congregational members (Eph 4:26; cf. 1 Thess 4:18; 5:11, 14; Eph 4:15). Of primary importance in the process of building up God's people is the regular and systematic exposition of Scripture, together with the teaching of "sound doctrine" by those equipped and appointed for the task (cf. 1 Tim 4:6, 11, 13; 5:17; 2 Tim 2:1-2, 14-15; 4:1-5; Tit 1:9). "When Christians gather together to minister to one another the truth of God in love, the church is manifested, maintained and advanced in God's way" (Peterson, 214; emphasis added). The well-being and strengthening of the congregation is a fundamental aim of the members gathering together.

In 1 Corinthians 11:17-34, although the terminology of "edification" is not used in Paul's discussion of the Lord's Supper* at Corinth, the issue of upbuilding is clearly prominent. The apostle appears to be speaking about different aspects of the same meetings throughout the chapter (ekklēsia occurs in 1 Cor 11:18, 22). The Christian congregation is not an ordinary association or club in which members have the same interests; rather, it is a gathering that arises out of a sharing together in the benefits of Christ's saving work. When the members met together, divisions of a social kind occurred. As long as individuals were preoccupied with consuming their own private meals, they were not holding a meal in honor of the Lord Jesus. By disregarding one another they were negating the very point of Christ's sacrifice for them. He had made it possible for them to share in the life of the age to come, but by their self-centered behavior they had failed to understand their partnership in the body of Christ. Rather than building up or edifying their fellow believers they were showing "contempt for the church of God" (1 Cor 11:22). Thus, by not caring for their fellow believers, they were not worshiping God or serving him acceptably.

5.2. Meeting with Christ. When NT believers met with one another and shared a whole range of ministries of the word in the congregation, so that the body of Christ was edified, they met with Christ himself. As the members sang psalms, hymns* and spiritual songs with gratitude in their hearts, and thus fulfilled the apostolic injunction to let the word of Christ dwell among them richly (Col 3:16; cf. Eph 5:19-20), so Christ himself was present in their midst. "Any gospel-based ministry of encouragement or admonition will be a means by which Christ engages with his people" (Peterson, 198). This would take place when the Scriptures were formally expounded and taught, or when believers informally exhorted one another in the congregation to live out their obedience to the gospel. The model of the NT assembly was the congregation (ekklēsia) of Israel* gathered at Mt. Sinai to hear the word of the Lord. Now, however, under the new covenant there is a significant difference. The Lord himself meets with his people wherever they gather in his name and under his authority.

The assembling of believers "in church" was an appropriate and natural outworking of their relationship with Christ; meeting together in the congregation was obviously an important way in which this relationship with their Lord was expressed.

At the same time, their coming together was a foretaste and anticipation of the life of heaven. Reference has already been made to believers' membership in the heavenly gathering assembled around Christ. The end will bring the assembling of God's children to meet him (2 Thess 2:1), the moment when Christ is glorified in his saints (1 Thess 4:17; cf. 2 Thess 1:12), and when they obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess 2:14). God's ultimate intention for them is the joy* of fellowship, the restoration and enrichment of the relationships so rudely shattered in Eden. In this sense, fellowship with God and his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, was not a means to an end, but the end itself. Every authentic Christian gathering is not simply an expression of the heavenly church as it presently gathers round Christ in heaven; it is also an anticipation of that blessed consummation.

The OT hope for the nations (see Gentiles) was that they too might be united with Israel and with one another in serving God (Is 56:6-7; Rev 7). This hope should be anticipated in the gathering of God's people on earth in the here and now, and fulfilled on the final day. Accordingly, the ekklēsia as it gathers was to keep looking "upward" or "forward," rather than simply "inward" at itself, or even "outward" at the world and its needs.

5.3. Worshiping God? If the worship terminology of the OT has been transformed by the NT writers, especially Paul, so that Christians are urged to worship the Living God in every sphere of life (Rom 12:1), is it appropriate to speak of their gathering together in church for "the worship* of God"? Also, how are we to understand the prayers, praises and thanksgivings which believers offer when they meet together in Christ's name? Should not these responses be viewed as significant elements in the corporate worship of God? If the emphasis is placed upon believers gathering together for the purpose of edification, how did Paul view the relationship between the "horizontal" and the "vertical" dimension of worship?

Central to Christian gatherings was the concern to proclaim and apply the truths of the gospel so as to stimulate and maintain saving faith.* Prayers and praises were clearly part of "the worship of God" as faith responses to the gospel. Yet even these were to be expressed in church in a way that would build up the congregation. Prayers and thanksgivings were not to be purely private, God-directed activities when others were present. Whether inspired or not, they were to be intelligible, for otherwise they would fall short of the fundamental goal of building up other members of the assembly (1 Cor 14:16-17).

It seems "best to speak of congregational worship as a particular expression of the total life-response that is the worship of the New Covenant" (Peterson, 220; emphasis added). As the word of Christ was ministered and received in the congregation, so the body of Christ was built up. Christ himself was encountered in and through the "edification" (oikodomē). And, it was in building up the congregation that God was worshiped and glorified. A wedge should not be driven, therefore, between Paul's understanding of the "vertical" and "horizontal" dimensions of what took place in worship. Edification and worship, for example, were different sides of the same coin. Participating in the upbuilding of the church was an important expression of the believing community's devotion and service to God. It was, as Peterson puts it, an element of believers "engaging with God" (220). Therefore, one part of the meeting could not have been viewed as "worship time" (e.g., prayer and praise), and another part as "edification time," since the apostle's teaching encourages us to view the same activities from both points of view.

6. Authority in the Church.

6.1. Christ's Authority and the Apostolic Word. From Paul's letters it is plain that the churches in his care stood under the authority* of the Lord Jesus Christ. The church is Christ's body. He is its head,* not only in the sense of being the source of its life and power, but also as the one who exercises authority over it. The church of God (in a particular place) has been brought into existence through the proclamation of the apostolic gospel (cf. 1 Cor 1:4-9); its members have come into a living relationship with God's Son through his word. Christ continues to rule their lives by that same word. It is through the gospel that believers stand firm and by which they will be saved (1 Cor 15:1-2).

In the first instance that authority was exercised by Christ's apostles*—initially through their preaching and later through their apostolic writings. They were his witnesses,* emissaries and representatives (2 Cor 5:20), whose tasks were to found, build up and regulate the churches (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10; Gal 2:7-9). They appointed "men of good standing," or deacons (Acts 6:3, 6) and elders (Acts 14:23; cf. Tit 1:5-9), while their teaching was presented as Christ's truth, which was Spirit-given in its content and form of expression (1 Cor 2:9-13; cf. 1 Thess 2:13), and was a norm of faith (2 Thess 2:15; cf. Gal 1:8) and behavior (2 Thess 3:4, 6, 14). The church at Corinth, for example, was to realize that what the apostle wrote to them was a command of the Lord (1 Cor 14:37), while the Thessalonians were bound under oath to read and obey Paul's letters since they came with the authority of Christ himself (1 Thess 5:27; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:14).

6.2. The Authority of the Congregation. The authority of an apostle, however, was not without limit. It came from the risen Lord Jesus Christ, and was to be exercised within the sphere of the apostolic commission, while an apostle was to preach and teach what was consistent with the gospel (1 Cor 15:1-11; Gal 1:6-17).

Congregations, too, had a derived authority. Their elders and leaders were to rule over the church, teaching the members, and urging them to follow the apostolic gospel and traditions* (1 Thess 5:12-13; 1 Tim 3:5; 5:17; cf. 1 Cor 16:15-16). At 1 Corinthians 5, in the context of a serious pastoral problem involving immorality, Paul expects the congregation to make an important decision in relation to the offending Christian. The apostle gives his advice in no uncertain terms: "you are to hand this man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh" (1 Cor 5:5; see Discipline). But the congregation itself is to make the decision. The Corinthians are to assemble, conscious that the guidance and power of the Lord Jesus will be with them as they pronounce a disciplining judgment in his name on their disobedient member (1 Cor 5:4-5; see Church Order and Government).

Concerning the problem of discipline at the Lord's Supper in Corinth (1 Cor 10:14-22; 11:23-32), the apostle Paul lays down a number of principles which he expects the Corinthians to follow. But the actual details, the form of service,* the way in which their errors were to be corrected, lay with the congregation itself. The apostle's instructions were addressed to the whole congregation, not to any particular leader or presiding elder within it (see Pastor).

See also BODY OF CHRIST; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; GENTILES; HEAD, CHRIST AS; HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES; ISRAEL; PASTOR, PAUL AS; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES; TEMPLE; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community: The Early House Churches in Their Historical Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); K. Berger, "Volksversammlung und Gemeinde Gottes. Zu den Anfängen der christlichen Verwendung von 'ekklesia,' " ZTK 63 (1976) 167-207; L. Cerfaux, The Church in the Theology of St. Paul (New York: Herder, 1959); L. Coenen, "Church," NIDNTT 1.291-307; G. Delling, "Merkmale der Kirche nach dem NT," NTS 13 (1966-67) 297-316; R. Y. K. Fung, "Some Pauline Pictures of the Church," EvQ 53 (1981) 89-107; W. Klaiber, Rechtfertigung und Gemeinde (FRLANT 127; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1982); H. Küng, The Church (London: Burns & Oates, 1968); A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); I. H. Marshall, "How far did the early Christians worship God?" Churchman 99 (1985) 216-29; idem, "New Wine in Old Wine Skins: V. The Biblical Use of the Word 'Ekklēsia,' " ExpT 84 (1972-73) 359-64; H. Merklein, "Die Ekklesia Gottes. Der Kirchenbegriff bei Paulus und in Jerusalem," in Studien zu Jesus und Paulus (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987) 296-318; P. T. O'Brien, "The Church as a Heavenly and Eschatological Entity," in The Church in the Bible and the World, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987) 88-119, 307-11; D. G. Peterson, Engaging with God: A Biblical Theology of Worship (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); J. Roloff, "ἐκκλησία," EDNT 1.410-15; K. L. Schmidt, "ἐκκλησία," TDNT III.501-36; W. Schrage, " 'Ekklesia' und 'Synagoge' Zum Ursprung des urchristlichen Kirchenbegriffs," ZTK 60 (1963) 178-202; B. W. Winter, "The Problem with 'Church' for the Early Church," in In the Fullness of Time: Biblical Studies in Honour of Archbishop Donald Robinson, ed. D. Peterson and J. Pryor (Homebush West, NSW: Lancer, 1992) 203-17.

P. T. O'Brien

CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT

During the last half-century Paul's teaching and practice regarding how the Christian communities were ordered and led has undergone frequent investigation. (1) Exegetical work on Paul has rediscovered the charismatic dimension in Paul's approach to church order, developed a more contextual understanding of his approach and emphasized the indigenous leadership of his communities. (2) Socio-historical and sociological investigation of Paul has explored connections between Paul's churches and other first-century institutions, authority* and power,* charisma and its routinization. In addition feminist perspectives on Paul have discussed the role of women in ministry in the light of a cultural analysis of his writings.

What follows is an exegetical survey of Paul's approach to church order and government with a clear sociological interest. It begins by considering distinctive aspects and terminology involved in Paul's approach. This is followed by an examination of the chief metaphors he uses and models he identifies. Attention is then given to key dynamics and roles in the church. Finally the influence of Paul and his colleagues within these congregations will be assessed.

1. Perspective and Terminology
2. Metaphors and Models
3. Dynamics and Functions
4. Remuneration and Commissioning
5. Apostles and Colleagues
6. Conclusion

1. Perspective and Terminology.

1.1. Differences between Modern and Ancient Mentali-ties. For modern people questions of order and government are often of primary interest. Organization and leadership are central concerns in any democratic and bureaucratic-rational society. This is also the case in church life, which is more democratized and bureaucratic than in previous times. In our social and religious arrangements we prize order: it is not only a preoccupation but a virtue, not only a means but an end. We are also fascinated by the issue of leadership, with chains of command, lines of authority and so forth. As a result we are in constant danger of reading the priority we accord these matters into Paul's ideas about the church.* He was certainly concerned that the church conduct itself in an orderly manner and that members were properly cared for and guided. But except where these were inadequate or threatened in some way, he says very little about them. For him they appear to be secondary rather than primary issues. Where more fundamental aspects of church life are given priority, church order and government should largely look after themselves.

1.2. Order as a Secondary Concern. If we begin by looking simply at the basic words Paul uses in speaking about these issues, what first strikes us is the infrequency of terms related to organization and to authority. The word order (taxis), appears infrequently in Paul (1 Cor 14:40; Col 2:5), and only once is it clearly associated with the church, coming at the close of his instructions to the Corinthians about what should happen in their meetings (1 Cor 14:13-40). This usage of order sums up a series of appeals relating to different aspects of the Corinthians' gatherings; appeals designed to prevent confusion from reigning (1 Cor 14:13-19, 22-23, 27-30, 34-35). Interestingly Paul does not use the word in connection with abuses surrounding the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:17-34). The opposite of order is "unruliness" (akatastasia), which is associated with disharmony (1 Cor 14:33; cf. 2 Cor 12:20). Paul never suggests that it is the role of certain people in the assembly to regulate its gatherings. Unlike the Greeks, he does not use the word taxis of an office that is responsible for ensuring that order is maintained (Epictetus 1.29, 39; Josephus Ant. 7.1.5 §36). This is everyone's responsibility as they share what the Spirit grants them (1 Cor 12:7-11) and discern what the Spirit is contributing through others (1 Cor 14:28, 30, 32). The church's "liturgy" is a communal construction. Order stems from a highly participatory and charismatic process and is not determined in advance by a few. Though neither purely spontaneous nor fully egalitarian, it is dynamic and mutually created. It is not constitutive of the church but functional and instrumental.

1.3. Authority as a Background Issue. The idea of authority* is a key sociological category in any discussion of government. It has to do with the way power is interpreted and communicated. The word authority (exousia) appears several times in Paul's writings in a specific sense of a reward for service performed (1 Cor 9:4-6, 12, 18; 2 Thess 3:9), a right he does not take up (2 Cor 11:7-10). Only in two places does Paul use the word more broadly of his own position—never of those in leadership in local churches—and only then when his apostolic link with a church is under challenge (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10). In view of the widespread use of this term in Greek for those in positions of influence over others, Paul's reticence in using the term can only be intentional. At Corinth he certainly wishes to reestablish his unique relationship with the church as its founder (2 Cor 10—13), but he wants to disassociate himself from the authoritarian way the "false apostles" conduct themselves. He does not seek to influence the members by improper means (2 Cor 10:3), boast to them of his preeminence (2 Cor 10:12-15), dazzle the church with rhetoric (2 Cor 11:5-6), or manipulate and control his converts (2 Cor 11:16-19; cf. 2 Cor 1:24). The "authority" God has given him is for "building up" not "tearing down," and he does not wish to use it in a harsh way when he arrives. Indeed he gives the church an opportunity to correct their attitude beforehand so that there will be no conflict when he arrives. This type of authority is basically charismatic, and therefore different from that found in traditional societies or in modern organizations: it is the authority of an unusual founder figure, though one who does not normally assert his position.

2. Metaphors and Models.

Though terms relating to organization and authority are not central to Paul's discussion of church organization or government, he does deploy certain metaphors and identify certain role models to convey what he has in mind. These word pictures and these "living epistles" begin to provide an overall frame of reference or paradigm for Paul's view. They form important components of the symbolic world from which his thinking proceeds.

2.1. Family as the Root Metaphor. Fundamental to interpreting his and his colleagues' relationship to the churches they founded are metaphors and analogies drawn from family life. This is not surprising, for it is the primary language for the relationship between God and his people. Just as God* is viewed as "Father" and believers as "children," so Paul describes himself as a "father" to his "offspring" in the faith (1 Cor 4:14-15; 2 Cor 12:14; 1 Thess 2:11). This should not be viewed as a patriarchal, even purely paternal, affair but as a parental one (see Pastor). Paul also speaks of himself as a "mother" who suffers labor pains (Gal 4:19) and as a nurse who cares for her charges (1 Thess 2:7 cf. 1 Cor 3:2). Instructions to Timothy in the Pastorals (1 Tim 5:2) retain this Pauline emphasis. Though this cluster of metaphors emphasizes the affectionate bond between Paul and his converts, we should not psychologize this as we tend to do in speaking of families today, nor fail to remember the greater influence fathers then had upon their children. This does not entail a childlike dependency of the churches upon Paul. He urged them to "grow up" in Christ and become adults in the faith (e.g., 1 Cor 14:20; Eph 4:14). This involved granting them a considerable degree of autonomy.

Other metaphors in Paul drawn from the world of work, such as builder (1 Cor 3:6-9) and farmer (1 Cor 3:10-15), reveal little by the way of detail about the nature of the relationship between the apostle and his churches. They do, however, stress his fundamental role in starting and designing the church. The metaphor of the body (1 Cor 12:12-27; Eph 4: 1-16), especially the reference to the unifying and structuring role of the "ligaments" (haphai), does tell us something about the central role of key people in the church whose primary responsibility is to help maintain unity and engender growth.

2.2. Primary Models to Follow. Alongside these metaphors Paul points to specific persons who embody his understanding of authority. Chief among these is Christ.* Christ is certainly presented as a model to believers of how they should care for one another (Rom 15:7; Gal 6:1) as well as engage in mutual instruction and work for harmony in the congregation (Col 3:15-16). Significantly these words are addressed to all members of the church, not just to a core group. Paul also presents himself as a model, precisely because he models himself upon Christ (Acts 20:34-35; 1 Cor 4:16; 11:1; Phil 3:17; 4:9). Believers are also encouraged to imitate those among their number who, like Epaphroditus, "almost died for the work of Christ" (Phil 2:28; see Imitation). Even other churches as a whole should be imitated (2 Cor 8:1-7; 1 Thess 1:7-10). Others, like Stephanas and his household who "devote themselves to the service of the saints" (1 Cor 16:15), are not so much held up to be imitated as to be recognized, or to be regarded as the one under whom the people are to "order" their own corporate life. Since the word *household generally refers to slaves, this group in the church at Corinth crosses status lines (see Social Setting). Indeed Paul goes on to say that "everyone who joins in the work, and labors at it" should be so regarded (1 Cor 16:16).

So then, the list of exemplars is open-ended. The criteria for who can become a role model are functional, not formal. It does not depend on a person's being appointed to a position in the church. Paul's emphasis upon models rather than positions itself indicates that it is the person, not the office, that is central for him and that government of the church has more to do with a way of life than a designated post.

Paul does not treat authority, then, as something official or sacral. He views it primarily in relational and functional terms. It does not result in the formation of a leadership elite, formally marked off from others in the church. Only Christ has this distinction and he is the ultimate criterion of who should be regarded as a fundamental role model for others. Aspiring to this is apparently open to a wide range of people, including those with lower social status, and can be embodied in a group as well as individuals.

3. Dynamics and Functions.

The social analysis of institutions is interested in examining their dynamics and functions. In considering Paul, we should stress that it is again important to pay careful attention to his language, especially that used to describe the church's gatherings and those who play a significant part in directing its affairs.

3.1. Range and Diversity of Contributions. For Paul what happens at church gatherings originates in the Spirit and flows through the whole membership for the benefit of all. Everyone is caught up in this divine operation (1 Cor 12:7). The process itself is described through the use of active verbs to stress its dynamic character: contributions to the meetings are "energized," "manifested" and "distributed" by the Spirit (1 Cor 12:7, 11). He uses a variety of nouns to capture the diversity of what takes place. It is an exercise of "gifts"* or "presents," a variety of "services" or "ministries," a range of "activities" or "operations" (1 Cor 12:4-6). The concrete speech events and activities that result from this are listed, with differences, three times in Paul's letters (Rom 12:4-8; 1 Cor 12:8-11; Eph 4:11-13). These lists highlight the versatility and diversity of the Spirit's working. Since, for Paul, everyone in church is under an obligation to discern the validity of contributions to the meeting, "liturgy" is fundamentally the people's work (see Worship). It is not in the hands of one person, a leadership team or a worship committee, even if certain people play a more prominent role in shaping what takes place, for example, those with greater prophetic or spiritual discernment (1 Cor 12:10; 14:30).

3.2. Freedom and Form in the Meetings. Paul does enunciate some guiding principles that should shape members' sensitivity to the Spirit when they come together. Just as in his moral teaching he pursues a principled contextual approach, rather than one based solely on absolutes, so here he exhibits what may be described as a principled charismatic perspective. What takes place should be intelligible, even to outsiders (1 Cor 14:9, 16, 21), constructive or edifying to all the members (1 Cor 14:26; Eph 4:12), under the control of those taking part (1 Cor 14:32), aware of what should have greatest priority (1 Cor 14:6) and be motivated by love* (1 Cor 13:1-3; Eph 4:15). This set of guidelines gives texture to what Paul says about the need for "order" in the meetings. He does not have in mind some spiritual or charismatic free-for-all. If these guidelines are adhered to there is no need for a planned order of service. There is certainly room for the reading of Scripture or apostolic letters,* hymns* and psalms, set doxologies, blessings (see Benediction) and responses, and for creedal confessions or formulas (see Creeds). We do not find here any opposition between the charismatic and liturgical or between spirit and institution, but rather a transcending of these religious and sociological distinctions.

3.3. The Unofficial Nature of Sacramental Rites. The central corporate action in Paul's churches was the Lord's Supper.* This was probably a weekly affair and was undoubtedly a full, not just token, meal. The social dynamics of this corporate action match those just described in connection with other aspects of the church's gatherings. Even where abuses are present that divide the congregation and nullify Christ's presence in the meal, Paul calls upon the whole church to take responsible action (1 Cor 11:22, 27) and upon each person to have a proper discernment of other's needs (1 Cor 12:28, 34). Nowhere in Paul's letters, disputed or undisputed, is anyone identified as the presider or celebrant of this meal. Most probably this was undertaken by the host or hostess of the meeting in whose home the meal was being held. Baptism also took place through other than leading figures in a group (1 Cor 1:14-17).

3.4. Absence of Priests and Clergy. Reference to certain people in the community playing a greater role than others leads us into a consideration of key people within Paul's churches. Koine Greek abounds in terms for people in official positions in organizations. The word priest (hiereus) only appears metaphorically in Paul of a wide range of devotional, compassionate, financial and evangelistic activities (cf. Rom 15:16, 27; Phil 2:17, 25, 30; 2 Cor 9:12), activities in which not only apostles but other Christians engage. This radically desacralizes the role of those who have a significant part to play in the church and sociologically places early Christianity, like post-Temple Judaism, in a distinctive position vis-à-vis other religions. So far as the language for secular offices is concerned, only one of these terms, office (archē), appears in Paul's writings but is used exclusively of the governing role played by Christ in the church (Col 1:18). Instead the language of servanthood dominates.

We should note, however, that this language of servanthood did not always conjure up ideas of lowly people undertaking inferior tasks such as waiting on tables. Servants of important social and political figures had considerable status and carried on high-level managerial and bureaucratic work. It is who is one's "master" that is determinative of a servant's status, and many servants had a higher social standing than free men or women who belonged to socially inferior families. Since Christ is the Lord of Christians, this gives a dignity and respect to their servant work that should be respected (see Servant).

3.5. Emphasis upon Function rather than Position. Alongside the verb serve (diakoneō), or its nominal form servant (diakonos), verbs rather than nouns tend to be used more frequently of those making a fundamental contribution to the church. This means that it is the functions people perform rather than the positions they occupy which is crucial. So, for example, Paul refers to those who "labor," "aid," "admonish" and "teach" (1 Thess 5:12; Gal 6:6). Or, it is the way people have proven themselves (hoi dokimoi) through conflict in the church which marks them out from others (1 Cor 11:19). Where nouns are used, as of those who are "helpers" or "administrators" (1 Cor 12:28), they are sometimes given a lower ranking than those who have more dramatic healing* or miracle-working skills. Apart from the Pastoral letters (e.g., 1 Tim 5:1-2; Tit 1:5-9), the term elders (presbyteroi), referring to older, respected Christians who probably had a corporate responsibility for a cluster of churches in a city, does not occur in Paul's writings (but cf. Acts 14:23). The words episkopoi and diakonoi appear just once in these writings, in the plural and not presumably as titles (Phil 1:1), and as ancillary to the "saints" in general. In the Pastorals,* where more is said about them, they probably respectively refer to persons hosting a house church and their female assistants or wives (1 Tim 3:1-7, 8-13).

3.6. Pastoral Care and Family Experience. As the qualifications listed in the Pastorals indicate, such people as episkopoi and diakonoi should only be encouraged to function as overseers and helpers in the community if they have first proven themselves in their households and are well regarded in their wider community. This suggests that it was the household, not synagogues or voluntary associations, that provided the basic model for leadership in the church. Also that it was the dealings with people, not—except for some aptitude to teach—the manifestation of charismatic gifts (1 Tim 3:1-11; cf. Tit 1:5-8), that was most determinative. This is the background for such hosts of the churches as Titius Justus (Acts 18:7), Aquila and Priscilla (Rom 16:3), Gaius (Rom 16:23), Nympha (Col 3:15), Philemon and Apphia (Philem 1-2). The social status of such people would provide the basis for their having pre-eminence in the group if, like Stephanas and his household, they "devoted themselves to the service of the saints" (1 Cor 16:15-16). This is not to say that traditional authority here replaces charismatic authority, for these people need more than their status to qualify for this responsibility. What we find is a more dialectical approach to authority, one that gives place to but goes beyond purely charismatic or traditional elements.

Notable is the way Paul names women among this pastoral group, indicating that they often played a significant role in congregational life. Women are also involved in the first group, as among the apostles* (Rom 16:6-7 NRSV) and as prophets* (1 Cor 11:5). For him these are the two most fundamental contributions one can make in church (cf. Eph 2:20; 3:5). Women may also have operated as evangelists (Phil 4:3), while among his associates was a wife-and-husband team involved in at least occasional high-level instruction (Acts 18:26). Here Paul rises above the gender as well as status distinctions of his own time.

4. Remuneration and Commissioning.

What kind of reimbursement and acknowledgment did such people receive? We live in a day when people's value is generally indicated by the amount of money they receive and by the official character of the position they hold. This stress upon financial reward and formal position was not without parallel in the first century, but even among other religious groupings these did not have the same significance they possess today. In a consumer-oriented and accreditation-conscious society such factors feature more strongly (see Financial Support).

4.1. Financial Support, not a Salary. The majority of key people in local congregations appear to have worked independently for a living, as Paul himself frequently did. So, for example, Aquila and Priscilla had their own tentmaking business (Acts 18:3), Lydia was a seller of fabrics (Acts 16:14) and Gaius worked as the city treasurer (Rom 16:23). When Paul refers to the setting aside of money for charitable purposes, it is to help the impoverished saints overseas, not to provide support for the ministry of a local person in the church (1 Cor 16:1-4). According to the evidence of the Corinthian correspondence, Paul does not even avail himself of such recompense when he is with a particular congregation, even though it would be proper for him as an itinerant apostle to do so (1 Cor 9:4-15). Yet he does encourage those who consistently benefit spiritually from others' teaching ministry to share materially with them (Gal 6:6; cf. the analogy in Rom 15:27). This may well be the meaning of the injunction in the Pastorals to give a "double honor" (i.e., "ample remuneration") to elders who do their work well, especially those who focus on teaching (1 Tim 5:17). So, while full-time employment by the local church of pastors, teachers, overseers, and so on, was not a feature of congregational life, some support for those who gave time and effort to serving others was appropriate. These people were not full-time professionals in the church but part-time servants of it who occasionally received, but did not necessarily depend on, reimbursement for their efforts.

4.2. Ecclesial Recognition but not Ordination. Ordination, as we know it, does not appear in the Pauline letters. There is reference to laying on hands, but this was a multi-purpose procedure, used for such diverse procedures as receiving the Spirit (Acts 8:17), healing from illness (Acts 9:17), restoring a person to the church (1 Tim 5:22, though many see here a reference to ordination of elders) and commissioning for itinerant service (Acts 13:2; cf. 2 Tim 1:6). While, according to Acts, Paul and Barnabas* are said to "appoint elders" in every church (Acts 14:23), this could have involved ratifying the community's choice, as was earlier the case with the laying on of hands upon the Seven (Acts 6:3-4, see probably also Acts 16:2). The word appoint can certainly be used in this way. When in his undisputed writings Paul identifies certain people in the church in Corinth as having a fundamental contribution to its life, he merely asks the congregation to "order themselves" (hypotassesthe) under such people, and instructs them to extend this attitude "to everyone who joins in the work, and labors at it" (1 Cor 16:16). This suggests a non-formal, community-based recognition, one based on the quality of the ministry people are already engaged in rather than on any external qualifications. Moreover it is always a group that is referred to when the local church is in view, indicating that pastoral work in the congregation was always a corporate rather than solo affair (cf. Acts 20:17).

5. Apostles and Colleagues.

What role did the apostle* and his associates play in ordering and governing the affairs of the churches they founded? From what has been noted already they obviously played a vital role, but in what areas and of what kind? If the relationship between the churches and Paul was an interdependent affair, not independent or dependent, let alone codependent, where and how were the lines drawn and how, sociologically, would we describe this relationship today (see Co-workers)?

5.1. The Extent and Limits of Apostolic Authority. Paul played a visible role in the birth and ongoing life of the churches he founded. With other churches he cannot and does not assume a pre-eminent position (cf. Rom 1:11-13). But he also distinguished between the churches themselves and his work which brought them into existence. This is not the same distinction as that between sodalities and modalities that has become widely used in missionary circles. In sociological terms, a congregation was a "community," an organic phenomenon focusing primarily on the quality of its common life and the overflow of that into the lives of others. Paul's work, and that of other apostles, was an "association," with its primary focus outside itself on evangelism and church planting.

5.2. The Language of Persuasion not Command. So then, the main day-to-day ordering and governing of affairs of Paul's churches lay in the hands of the congregations themselves. In churches, as at Philippi, where things were going relatively well, Paul could address problems without reminding them of his foundational role in their life or of his apostolic authority. In other churches, as at Corinth, where things were not going so well and his role was under challenge, Paul had to remind his converts of his seminal role in their life (1 Cor 4:15) and, from a distance at least, play a more directive part in their affairs. But nowhere does he exhibit an authoritarian stance. Generally in his writings he is more concerned that his converts should "imitate" rather than "obey" him (cf. also 1 Thess 3:6; 1 Cor 11:1; Gal 4:12; Phil 3:17), and his instruction is consistently expressed through the language of an "appeal" (1 Cor 4:16) based on love (Philem 8) rather than, except occasionally, of "command" (cf. 1 Cor 14:37). His rare calls for obedience have more to do with responding appropriately to his loving urgings (2 Cor 2:9), remaining faithful to the gospel* (Philem 21; cf. Phil 2:12) or yielding to the promptings of the Spirit (1 Thess 4:8).

5.3. Christ not Apostles the Fundamental Authority. All this is in accord with certain characteristic features of Paul's method of operation. Having left with them the gospel (1 Cor 15:3), certain basic instruction (1 Thess 4:1) and his own example (Acts 20:34-35)—as well as the OT Scriptures (1 Cor 14:34), certain sayings of Christ (1 Cor 7:10) and several rules operating in all his churches (1 Cor 11:16)—he is confident that his communities now have the resources to mature in their common life. He is there if they need advice on certain matters (e.g., 1 Cor 7:1; 1 Thess 4:13) and will occasionally visit them to see how they are doing (Acts 15:36). In a situation requiring discipline,* he can still "lay down the line," not however as an external, hierarchical authority so much as a significant fellow member whose spirit is present in their deliberations even when he is absent (1 Cor 5:3-5; Col 2:5). Even those with little status have the wisdom to deal with some disputes in the community (1 Cor 6:4-5), though on other occasions the whole church should do so (1 Cor 5:1-5). His aim is to build up the community's ability to look after such matters, "working with" them rather than "lording it over" them (2 Cor 1:24). If he is forced to confront them, the "rod" that he brings is the rod of the "word" (2 Cor 10:3-6), and his preference is to come "with love in a gentle spirit" (1 Cor 4:21). His basic authority stems from the gospel he has been commissioned to preach, not by right from his apostolic commission itself. Only so long as his words reflect that gospel (Gal 1:9), or are in accord with the Spirit (1 Cor 7:40), should his churches give him a hearing. His authority is instrumental not inherent and, though powerful because of God's call, subject to his converts' Christian discernment.

5.4. The Derivative Power of Paul's Colleagues. Associates such as Timothy and Titus have only functional or derived authority, based upon the reputation of the work they have undertaken or upon transmitting Paul's message to his churches. They do not have any automatic right of entry. Often he has to argue their case, pointing out their involvement with him and knowledge of his affairs as well as their fidelity to the apostolic task, sometimes at risk to their own lives (Phil 2:19-23; Col 4:7-8; 1 Cor 8:17, 23; 16:10-11). When visiting churches these colleagues have a role to play but as itinerants (cf. 2 Cor 7:15), not in some resident capacity.

The Pastoral Letters are revealing here. Although there are hints that they reflect a later, more structured state of affairs, Paul's associates still have no settled, formal role in the congregations but an ambassadorial, exemplary one (1 Tim 2:12-15; 6:11-12; 2 Tim 1:8; 2:22-24; 3:10; Tit 2:7). They are to relate to people in the churches in a familial way, reflecting their limited age and experience, rather than from a position of command (1 Tim 5:1-2). They provide instruction on how the churches are to order certain aspects of their worship and govern themselves, but they do not provide regulations to control these (1 Tim 3:6; 2 Tim 2:2-7; Tit 2:1-9). The key roles in the congregations are to be taken up by proven individuals and couples within their own ranks (1 Tim 3:1-13; Tit 1:5-9), which Paul's associates could only help identify through knowledge provided by the churches themselves.

Clearly, for all his close ties with his churches, Paul gave them considerable freedom to develop their own life and to do so in ways that were not identical to one another. Diversity within unity is the rule here as well. To view the Pastorals as changing and routinizing this situation is to ignore the temporary nature of his associates' role in these churches. Some degree of formalizing appears to have taken place, as for example in what is said about women, but this may have been partly induced by certain local problems. For all that, the Pastorals still breathe much the same air as the other Pauline letters.

6. Conclusion.

Did Paul's understanding of church order and government undergo development during his lifetime? Occasional attempts have been made to plot this but, given the summary nature of much that he wrote, and the indirect evidence we have of the contexts he was addressing, it is difficult to draw definite conclusions. No doubt his understanding did grow as he dealt with the different problems he encountered. But the main lines of his approach are clearly discernible in his earliest writings. So while we should always be open to detecting changes of emphasis or even content in his treatment of these issues, we are unlikely to find a great deal or be able to plot a simple learning trajectory. It is easier to identify certain differences between what is said in the undisputed writings and in the Pastorals, though even there more caution is needed than is often exercised.

See also APOSTLE; AUTHORITY; BODY OF CHRIST; CHURCH; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; DISCIPLINE; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; HOLY SPIRIT; HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; MAN AND WOMAN; MINISTRY; PASTOR, PAUL AS; POWER; SERVANT, SERVICE; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community: The Early Churches in Their Historical Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); E. Best, Paul and His Converts (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988); M. M. Bourke, "Reflections on Church Order in the New Testament," CBQ 30 (1969) 161-79; V. Branick, The House Church in the Writings of Paul (Wilmington: Michael Glazier, 1989); U. Brockhaus, Charisma und Amt (Wuppertal: Brockhaus, 1975); J. N. Collins, DIAKONIA: Re-interpreting the Ancient Sources (New York: Oxford, 1990); H. Doohan, Leadership in Paul (Wilmington: Michael Glazier, 1984); K. Giles, Patterns of Ministry Among the First Christians (Melbourne: Collins Dove, 1989); J. Hainz, Ekklesia: Strukturen paulinischer Gemeinde-Theologie und Gemeinde-Ordnung (Regensburg: Pustet, 1972); A. E. Harvey, "Elders," JTS 25 (1974) 315-32; B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); E. Käsemann, "The Cry for Liberty in the Worship of the Church," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 122-37; M. Y. MacDonald, The Pauline Churches: A Socio-historical Study of Institutionalisation in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline Writings (SNTSMS 60; Cambridge: University Press, 1988); W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1983); W. Munro, Authority in Peter and Paul (New York; Cambridge University, 1983); P. Perkins, Ministering in the Pauline Churches (New York: Paulist, 1982); J. H. Schütz, Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority (New York: New York University, 1975); E. Schüssler-Fiorenza, In Memory of Her (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983); E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1964); H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (London: A. & C. Black, 1969); A. Warkentin, Ordination: A Biblical Historical View (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982).

R. Banks

CIRCULATION OF PAUL'S LETTERS. See CANON.

CIRCUMCISION

Paul's insistence that circumcision not be imposed on Gentile* converts led to one of the most serious and fundamental controversies in the early church. The controversy over Paul's stance on circumcision is reflected in Acts 15, the letters to the Galatians* and to the Romans,* Philippians 3 and perhaps Colossians 2.

1. The View of Paul's Opponents on Circumcision
2. Paul's Response to His Opponents
3. The Circumcision of Timothy and Titus

1. The View of Paul's Opponents on Circumcision.

Those who opposed Paul on the circumcision question have traditionally and probably rightly been called Judaizers.* Judaizers were Jews who confessed Jesus as Messiah,* believing also that the Mosaic Law* and particularly the rite of circumcision should be required of Gentiles. The views of the Judaizers are explicitly cited in Acts 15:1, 5 and can be inferred from Galatians, Philippians 3 and Romans 2:25-29; 4:1-12.

1.1. The Scriptures. The Judaizers found support in the OT for their understanding of circumcision, for Genesis 17:9-14 says that circumcision was the covenant sign for the people of God, and that refusal to take on the covenant sign would result in being cut off from the people of God. Moreover, Genesis 17:13 specifies that this covenant is an "everlasting" one. Therefore, the Judaizers probably concluded from Genesis 17 (see also Ex 4:24-26; Lev 12:3; Josh 5:2-9) that circumcision was an indispensable sign of the covenant, and thus they taught that "unless you are circumcised according to the custom of Moses,* you cannot be saved" (Acts 15:1).

1.2. Other Jewish Literature. Evidence from extrabiblical literature also shows that the majority of Jews considered circumcision as necessary for conversion (cf. Esther 8:17 LXX; Jdt 14:10; Josephus Ant. 13.9.1 §§257-258; 13.11.3 §§318-319; 20.2.4 §§38-41; J.W. 2.17.10 §454; Philo Mig. Ab. 89-93). J. Nolland contra N. J. McEleney argues persuasively that in the intertestamental period circumcision was typically required for one to become a proselyte to Judaism. Moreover, during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes Jews had practiced circumcision at the risk of losing their lives (1 Macc 1:60-61; cf. 2 Macc 6—7). Thus any diminution of the rite would naturally inflame both the cultural and religious passions of Jews.

2. Paul's Response to His Opponents.

This brief examination of the OT and the intertestamental period demonstrates that circumcision was considered to be crucial for membership in the people of God. The question that arises is, How could Paul defend the idea that Gentiles could be part of the people of God without being circumcised? Paul marshalled at least four arguments for his position.

2.1. Argument from the Spirit. The presence of the Spirit* in the lives of the Galatian believers, apart from their being circumcised, proved that circumcision was unnecessary for membership in the people of God (Gal 3:1-5). No one could be a part of the new community who has not received the Spirit (Rom 8:9), and since God had seen fit to give the Galatians the Spirit apart from circumcision, it followed that circumcision was not essential for membership among the people of God (cf. Acts 15:8-9).

2.2. Argument from the Scriptures. In order to convince Jewish believers of the tenability of his theology, Paul had to defend his view from the OT. Paul pinned his case on Abraham,* arguing from Genesis 15:6 that Abraham was justified by faith, not by his performance of the Law (Gal 3:6-9; Rom 4:1-8). Indeed, circumcision could not have been decisive for Abraham's entrance into the people of God because Abraham was already righteous in God's sight before he was circumcised (Rom 4:9-12). In this latter passage, Paul claims that circumcision was a "seal" (sphragis) of Abraham's righteousness* by faith gained before he was circumcised, indicating that righteousness does not depend on circumcision. Circumcision as a seal ratifies and confirms one's faith. Abraham was circumcised so that he could be the father of Jewish believers in the covenant God, and his righteousness by faith prior to circumcision made him the father of Gentile believers in Christ (Rom 4:11-12).

2.3. Argument from Salvation History. Paul's view of circumcision raises the question of the place of the Law in salvation history. Granted that Abraham was righteous before he was circumcised, objectors might still point out that the OT commands circumcision. In Galatians 3:15—4:7 Paul provides his perspective on salvation history (cf. also 2 Cor 3:4-18).

The Mosaic covenant, as a means by which the people of God were identified, was never intended to be in force forever. It was a temporary covenant designed for an interim period until the promise that was made to Abraham reached its fulfillment. Now that the Christ has come the promise made to Abraham has been fulfilled, and thus the covenant with Moses is no longer in force. Paul considered circumcision to be part of the covenant with Moses, and so he concluded that since the Mosaic covenant was no longer operative, circumcision was unnecessary. Moreover, the arrival of the new covenant (Jer 31:31-34; Ezek 36:26-27), which is really a fulfillment of the covenant made with Abraham, involved the outpouring of the Holy Spirit who enables believers to fulfill what circumcision in the OT pointed to—inclusion in the people of God. For now the true circumcision, the circumcision of the heart, has become a reality (Rom 2:28-29; Phil 3:3).

In Paul's thinking circumcision and the Law are intertwined in yet another way. Those who think they can be righteous before God by receiving circumcision (Gal 5:2-6; Phil 3:2-11)—that is, by doing the works of the Law*—are deceived. No one can be justified by the works of the Law (Gal 3:1-5, 10-14), for no one can perform perfectly the works required by the Law.

2.4. Argument from the Cross. P. Borgen has also pointed out that for Paul the cross* had replaced circumcision as the way of entrance into the people of God. In Galatians Paul wages a consistent polemic against circumcision and the Law because they diminish the cross (Gal 1:4; 2:21; 3:1, 13; 5:11; 6:12, 14). And the context of Colossians 2:11-14 suggests that Jesus' death is portrayed as his circumcision in Colossians 2:11, indicating that the new circumcision for believers is accomplished in the cross.

3. The Circumcision of Timothy and Titus.

The explanation offered above explains why Paul refused to circumcise the Gentile Titus (Gal 2:3-5). The requirement of circumcision for salvation* was a compromise of the gospel* of grace* and a denial of the arrival of the age of fulfillment. Paul's decision to circumcise Timothy (Acts 16:3) consequently seems inconsistent, and many scholars claim that the incident is not historically credible. The traditional resolution of this problem postulates that Paul did agree to circumcise Timothy since Timothy's mother was Jewish. This would, according to Jewish Law, make Timothy a Jew. According to this interpretation, Paul circumcised Timothy for cultural reasons so that he could bring his Jewish brother with him into synagogues when he preached the gospel.

S. J. D. Cohen, however, has raised three objections to this common resolution. (1) The most natural reading of Acts 16:3 is that Timothy was circumcised because he was a Gentile, not because he was a Jew, for Luke does not inform the reader that Timothy's mother was Jewish in this verse but simply says that "they all knew that his father was Greek." (2) Most interpreters from the second to the eighteenth century believed that Timothy was a Gentile. (3) There is no firm pre-mishnaic evidence that in Jewish circles a son born to a Jewish mother and a Gentile father was considered a Jew.

C. Bryan has shown that Cohen's conclusion is not as convincing as it appears on first examination. Acts 16:1 introduces Timothy by saying that "he was the son of a Jewish woman who was a believer." Since Luke particularly notes that Timothy was the son of a Jewish woman and a Greek father, he has hinted to the reader before he describes Timothy's circumcision in verse 3 that the latter's national status is ambiguous. Moreover, it is difficult to see how the circumcision of Timothy as a Gentile fits the Lukan story line. In Acts 15 Paul has just won a victory over those who would require circumcision of Gentile converts, and in Acts 16:4 he delivers the results of this decree to the churches. It contradicts the Lukan context if in Acts 16:3 he portrays Paul as circumcising the Gentile Timothy contrary to the decree.

Nevertheless, Cohen is right in asserting that there is no evidence contemporary with the NT that sons of a Jewish mother and a Gentile father were legally considered Jewish. Such a fact is not damaging to the theory that Paul circumcised Timothy because the latter was considered to be Jewish. The Rabbinic Law on the status of children born to a Jewish mother and a Gentile father was probably established by early in the second century of the Common Era, and thus it is likely that in the previous century there was ongoing discussion and uncertainty about the status of such cases. Paul agreed to circumcise Timothy because there was some doubt regarding his nationality. He wanted to show that he did not forbid circumcision if there was any connection with the Jewish people. Thus by circumcising Timothy Luke shows that Paul did not forbid Jews from practicing the Law (Acts 21:21-26; cf. 1 Cor 9:19-23). Paul had no animosity toward circumcision as a cultural practice; neither circumcision nor uncircumcision were anything significant in themselves (Gal 5:6; 6:15; 1 Cor 7:19). But when circumcision was required for salvation, then Paul resisted it adamantly.

See also ABRAHAM; LAW; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. G. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethic in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988) 45-60; P. Borgen, "Observations on the Theme 'Paul and Philo': Paul's Preaching of Circumcision in Galatia (Gal 5:11) and Debates on Circumcision in Philo," in The Pauline Literature and Theology, ed. S. Pederson (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1980) 85-102; idem, "Paul Preaches Circumcision and Pleases Men," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 85-102; C. Bryan, "A Further Look at Acts 16:1-3," JBL 107 (1988) 292-94; S. J. D. Cohen, "Was Timothy Jewish (Acts 16:1-3)? Patristic Exegesis, Rabbinic Law, and Matrilineal Descent," JBL 105 (1986) 251-68; G. F. Dowden, "Circumcision of Christ," CQR 162 (1961) 400-407; M. E. Glasswell, "New Wine in Old Wine Skins: VIII, Circumcision," ExpT 85 (1974) 328-32; N. J. McEleney, "Conversion, Circumcision and the Law," NTS 20 (1974) 319-41; R. Meyer, "Περιτέμνω κτλ," TDNT VI.72-84; J. Nolland, "Uncircumcised Proselytes?" JSJ 12 (1981) 173-94; W. O. Walker, "The Timothy-Titus Problem Reconsidered," ExpT 92 (1981) 231-35.

T. R. Schreiner

CITATIONS OF OLD TESTAMENT. See OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY

Roman citizenship was a matter of considerable advantage for travel* in the Mediterranean world of the first century. Paul's Roman citizenship greatly enhanced his ministry. His acquaintance with the issues of citizenship allowed him to use it as a fitting metaphor for participation in the kingdom* of God.

1. Roman Citizenship
2. Heavenly Citizenship

1. Roman Citizenship.

The biblical case for Paul's legal standing as a Roman citizen rests primarily on three texts in Acts. Paul's mention of the Roman citizenship he and Silas enjoyed provides the context for their release from jail in Philippi (Acts 16:37-39). Then at the end of his speech before the people in Jerusalem, Paul's citizenship is once again helpful in allowing for his protection by the Roman garrison from the angry crowd (Acts 22:25-29). At his hearing in Caesarea before Festus over two years later, after Festus offered to conduct a full trial back in Jerusalem, Paul used his right as a Roman citizen to reject the offer and to appeal for trial before Caesar (Acts 25:7-12). Agrippa II mentions this appeal to Festus after Paul testifies before them (Acts 26:32).

*1.1. Paul's Roman Citizenship. Arguments advanced against Paul's Roman citizenship, most recently by Stegemann, have been soundly answered by Hengel. Roman historians also accept Paul's citizenship as most probable. According to traditions preserved in Jerome (Philemon commentary; Vir. 5) and Photius (Quaest. Amphil. 116), Paul's parents were carried off as prisoners of war from the Judean town of Gischala to Tarsus. Presumably enslaved to a Roman, they were freed and granted citizenship. The rights of a Roman citizen included provocatio (the right to appeal after trial), muneris publici vacatio (exemption from imperial duties such as military service), and the right of an accused citizen to choose either a local or a Roman trial. A right that was usually (but not always) honored in the provinces was that Roman citizens were exempt from flogging. The best explanation for Paul's silence about his Roman citizenship in Philippi until after his scourging (Acts 16:22-23) is that he wanted to follow Jesus in suffering* (Phil 3:10-11; Col 1:24; 2 Cor 4:7-10; 6:4-10). It is likely that there were other occasions also in which Paul kept silent and so surrendered this Roman right (2 Cor 11:25). When Paul did claim Roman citizenship (Acts 16:37; 22:25-28), it is most likely that he produced as evidence a birth certificate or certificate of citizenship, which Roman citizens carried with them.

*1.2. Paul's Appeal to Caesar. Against Lyall and Sherwin-White, the evidence favors Garnsey's reconstruction of Paul's appeal not as a provocatio appeal, but as a rejection of one court in favor of another (reiectio). This was a right Paul had as a Roman citizen, subject to Festus's approval. Garnsey notes that Acts 25 is the only example ever cited for evidence of provocatio before trial. Elsewhere such an appeal always occurs after trial. A close reading of Acts 25:9-12 shows that what is at issue is the location for Paul's trial. Paul did not want to be tried in Jerusalem as Festus suggested, for it was there that he was first imprisoned because of Jewish antipathy (Acts 22:22-29) and because it was clear that Festus wanted to please the Jews (Acts 25:9). It is also clear that Paul's rejection of trial in Jerusalem for trial in Rome was not automatically accepted. Festus only agreed after conferring with his advisors (Acts 25:12), for he had the authority to override Paul's plea. What occurred in Caesarea was not a complete trial, therefore, but a preliminary hearing. Paul's appeal to Caesar was not simply because he wanted to go to Rome, but also because he did not want to stand trial in Jerusalem.

*1.3. Implications of Paul's Roman Citizenship. As a Roman, Paul writes of his mission plans with a map of the Roman Empire in mind (Rom 15:19, 24) and gives no indication that he plans to evangelize in places outside the Empire's boundaries. His Roman citizenship shows in his recognition that citizens were accountable for two kinds of taxes, tributum (direct taxes) and vectigalia (sales taxes on slave transactions and customs fees), as Romans 13:7 shows, making use of comparable Greek terms for these taxes. The fact that his section on obedience to the government ends with tax payment shows his own recognition that taxes were a duty (munus) one carried as a citizen, and an unpopular one at that time (cf. Tacitus Ann. 13.50-51). Other language in Romans that perhaps indicates Paul's Roman citizenship includes his allusion to Roman military policy when he describes his apostolic commission in Romans 1:5 and his acknowledgement of the Roman preoccupation with legal matters (Rom 7:1). But in most of Paul's letters he does not give evidence of his Roman citizenship, for to him another citizenship was more important.

2. Heavenly Citizenship.

While explicit language related to heavenly citizenship is rare in Paul, the metaphor of heavenly* citizenship is clearly an influential force in his theology. In both ethical injunctions and eschatological descriptions, it is clear that Paul uses this citizenship to describe the believer's participation in the kingdom of God.

2.1. Ethical Injunctions. Paul's idea of heavenly citizenship is communicated with full cognizance of his church members' participation in their local societies as citizens (1 Cor 5:9-10; Rom 13:1-7). In this sense it is possible that Paul has in mind the legal status of dual citizenship (see Phil 1:27). The fact that Christians are citizens of both earth and heaven leads to Paul's ambassadorial language in 2 Corinthians 5:18-21 and Ephesians 6:19-20. As citizens of heaven, Christians have the responsibility to think consistently with their citizenship (Col 3:1-4) and live holy lives (Rom 13:12-14). Paul's own idea of his heavenly citizenship allowed him to live in a way that freed him to be all things to all people (1 Cor 9:19-23). Paul's doctrine of heavenly citizenship and its implications for living are close to 1 Peter 2:11, although Paul does not use the metaphor of sojourning as strongly as Peter. Philippians 3:20 (in the light of Phil 1:27) provides the best example of heavenly citizenship terminology in Paul. This citizenship here provides the ground for Paul's commands to avoid thinking in an earthly way (Phil 2:3-4; 3:19), and instead to follow his example (Phil 3:17) as befits one who rejoices in God's goodness, praying and thinking in a God-centered way (Phil 4:1-9). The description of Christians' heavenly citizenship in Philippians 3:20 also is linked to the expectation of the parousia and the physical transformation to occur at that time (Phil 3:20-21).

2.2. Eschatological Descriptions. The sense that Christians are headed for a citizenship in the next life is a powerful force in Paul's theology. Thus we see in 1 Thessalonians 4:13—5:24 how an understanding of the rights and destiny of the heavenly citizen leads to a certain pattern of behavior. In Romans 8:12-30, the prospect of participation as a citizen in the new creation* is inextricably linked both to one's status as a child of God and the concomitant behavior that such future citizenship and adoption* necessarily implies for the present. Paul's eschatological understanding of heavenly citizenship includes the conviction that the Christian is not ultimately subject to death, and ought therefore to live for values that will outlast life on earth (1 Cor 15:53-58).

See also CIVIL AUTHORITY; LEGAL SYSTEM, ROMAN; POLITICAL SYSTEMS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. D. G. Dunn, Romans 9-16 (WBC 38B; Waco: Word, 1988); P. Garnsey, "The Lex Iulia and Appeal under the Empire," JRS 56 (1966) 167-89; M. Hengel, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); F. Lyall, Slaves, Citizens, Sons: Legal Metaphors in the Epistles (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1984); A. N. Sherwin-White, The Roman Citizenship (2d ed.; Oxford: Clarendon, 1973); idem, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament: The Sarum Lectures 1960-1961 (Oxford: University Press, 1963; repr. ed., Grand Rapids: Baker, 1978); W. Stegemann, "War der Apostel Paulus ein römischer Bürger?" ZNW 78 (1987) 200-29; H. Strathmann, "πόλις κτλ," TDNT VI.529-35.

M. Reasoner

CIVIL AUTHORITY

Civil authority is the centralized control in society whose power to formulate and to enforce the basic formal rules of the society is granted to it by the groups which possess social power. Paul's teaching regarding civil authority is not direct or comprehensive but comes in the context of correcting misunderstandings of the freedom* of the gospel. He experienced persecution from civil authorities but also appealed to them for protection.

1. Civil Authorities
2. Romans 13:1-7

1. Civil Authorities.

The civil authority ranged from the emperor* to governors (proconsuls, procurators and kings) (representing the emperor) to civil magistrates carrying out local rule (see Political Systems). The local rule in Judea included the high priest and the Sanhedrin.* According to the presentation in Acts,* the role of government in the persecution of Paul came from local authorities (Acts 16:22-24; 24:1-8; cf. 1 Thess 2:2). (The severe punishments in 2 Cor 11:25 may be cases of civil authorities disregarding the limits of their authority.) The incident related in Acts 14:5 has the character of mob action. More commonly, Paul is shown to have found civil authority as a source of deliverance (Acts 23:10). He appeals to his rights as a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37; 21:39; 22:25; see Citizenship). As such he was entitled to trial in Rome for statutory charges (see Legal System). He accordingly appealed to the emperor (Acts 25:10-12, 25). The picture of Roman citizenship in Acts is quite compatible with our knowledge of the mid-century period, which it fits better than it does the situation at the end of the century. In addition it should be noted that serving in municipal office apparently was acceptable conduct for a believer (Rom 16:23).

2. Romans 13:1-7.

The occasion for Paul's mention of civil authority in Romans 13:1-7 most likely was a recurring problem faced by him in his missionary preaching*: the temptation of some to use their Christian freedom in a way deemed to violate responsible social relationships with respect to marriage,* labor and slavery (see Slave, Slavery), or to see themselves as freed from moral codes. As earlier in Romans he had to deal with undue freedom from the Mosaic Law* (Rom 6:15), Paul in Romans 13 deals with undue freedom from civil law.

1 Corinthians 6 provides an example of the element of freedom in Paul's message and its potentiality to create the problem faced in Romans 13. Paul admonishes his readers not to sue one another in the civil courts (see Lawsuit). He reminds them of their eschatological role of ruling the world, and describes the civil authorities as "unjust" (1 Cor 6:1) and "unbelievers" (1 Cor 6:6). In 1 Peter 2:16, a passage parallel to Romans 13:1-7, Peter makes the issue of freedom explicit: "[Subordinate yourselves] as free persons and not using your freedom as a covering for vice, but as slaves of God" (1 Pet 2:16). Although this problem could easily have occurred in the church at Rome,* the occasion as one of responsibility within Christian freedom fits well the interpretation of Romans as a letter dealing with general problems of Christians among Paul's churches. His emphasis upon paying the tribute (phoros, Rom 13:6) would support the churchwide reference since this tax on subject peoples was not collected in the capital.

Other hypotheses regarding the occasion of Romans 13:1-7 suggest special situations in Rome. Tacitus mentions tax protests under Nero in A.D. 58 (Tacitus Ann. 13.50-51). Earlier (c. A.D. 49-50), Claudius had expelled the Jews from Rome for "disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus" (Suetonius Claudius 25.4). The suggestion is made that Chrestus (an alternative spelling for Christus) had been a messianic pretender. With increased turmoil in Palestine, Paul in A.D. 56 warned the Christians, who had close contacts with the Jewish community, against involvement in a repetition of such insurrection or against associated tax protests. The motivation behind such actions of disobedience, it is proposed, would have been a just protest; not vice or antinomianism. The general hypothesis is weakened, however, not only by its speculative character but also by the fact that on the one hand Tacitus cites the tax petitions as an example of Nero's popular spirit of clemency and gives no evidence of insubordination or antigovernment resistance. On the other hand, there is little evidence of later disturbances among Jews in Rome related to the Palestinian turmoil, even during the Jewish Revolts.

The close parallels between Romans 13 and 1 Peter 2:13-17 indicate the likelihood that both authors used common tradition, probably derived from Hellenistic Judaism.

Romans 13:1-7 comes within a framework determined by Romans 12:1-2. Subordination to civil government, particularly in the symbolic act of paying taxes, is an aspect of the call to spiritual worship* in the everyday life of the world. The injunction is to be subordinate (hypotassō, Rom 13:1; cf. Tit 3:1), putting one's own interest below what is required for relationships with the civil authorities. The subordination is a discriminating one supported by conscience* (syneidēsis, Rom 13:5). The civil authorities at all levels are agents of God.* Their service to God is at the same time for the people, restraining evil and promoting their good (Rom 13:4). Paul does not identify his conception of the good (to agathon), but the Hellenistic-Jewish and OT conception of the ruler is pastoral and paternal in character. In a later Pauline text, 1 Timothy 2:2, the civil authorities are said to be instruments of a peaceful order which the author may consider to be instrumental for the missionary task (1 Tim 2:4; see Mission).

The negative perspective on authorities is most clearly implied in Paul's conception of the "principalities and powers,"* angelic beings who have responsibility for God's creation,* including its government (Dan 10:13, 20-21; 12:1), but who, from the Jewish apocalyptic* viewpoint, are fallen. In Romans 8:35, 38-39 Paul links these powers with the persecution of believers. In speaking of angelic powers Paul employs the terminology commonly used for human political powers, but the context is determinative of meaning. It should not be assumed that because Paul employs these terms in Romans 13 or 1 Corinthians 2:8, he is there referring to angelic, cosmic powers and not to human political powers.

See also CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY; EMPERORS, ROMAN; ETHICS; FREEDOM; LAWSUIT; LEGAL SYSTEM, ROMAN; POLITICAL SYSTEMS; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Borg, "A New Context for Romans xiii," NTS 19 (1973) 205-18; C. J. Cadoux, The Early Church and the World: A History of the Christian Attitude to Pagan Society and the State Down to the Time of Constantinus (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1925); C. E. B. Cranfield, A Commentary on Romans 12-13 (SJT Occasional Papers 12; Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1965); J. Friedrich et al., "Zur historischen Situation und Intention von Röm 13, 1-7," ZTK 73 (1976) 131-66; D. Georgi, Theocracy in Paul's Praxis and Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); E. Käsemann, "Principles of the Interpretation of Romans 13," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 196-216; S. C. Mott, Biblical Ethics and Social Change (New York: Oxford University, 1982); B. Reese, "The Apostle Paul's Exercise of His Rights as a Roman Citizen as Recorded in the Book of Acts," EvQ 47 (1975) 138-45; E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, [1947] 1981 reprint); A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament (Oxford: University Press, 1963) 48-119; W. Wink, Naming the Powers: The Language of Power in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984).

S. C. Mott

CLEAN. See PURITY AND IMPURITY.

COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS

The specific campaign which Paul led to collect funds to relieve the poverty of the Jerusalem* church is commonly called "the collection for the saints." While on the surface the general notion of the collection is quite simple, the question of Paul's purpose leads to some complex issues. Paul calls the collection a "fellowship"* (koinōnia, Rom 15:26; see Hainz), "service"* (diakonia, Rom 15:25, 31; 2 Cor 8:20; 9:1, 12, 13), "gift" (charis, 1 Cor 16:3; 2 Cor 8:6, 7, 19), "generous gift" (eulogia, 2 Cor 9:5), "collection" (logeia, 1 Cor 16:1), "liberal gift" (adrotēs, 9 Cor 8:20) and "service that you perform" (hē diakonia tēs leitourgias, 2 Cor 9:12). 2 Corinthians 8:4 uses three terms at once: "they urgently pleaded with us for the privilege (charis) of sharing in this service to the saints" (on the terms, see Dahl, 37-38).

1. The Data for the Collection
2. The Historical Context for the Collection
3. The Purpose of the Collection
4. The Results of the Collection

1. The Data for the Collection.

Paul's second visit to Jerusalem, recorded in Galatians 2:1-10 (and probably Acts 11:27-30; 12:25), resulted in a sort of peace accord that sought to demonstrate the unity of the gospel* alongside a diversity of audience. Paul, it was decided, would work among the Gentiles* while Peter* carried on his ministry among the Jews. The Jerusalem "pillars" asked Paul only that he would continue to remember the "poor" (Gal 2:10). Paul assured them that he was most willing to do so. This exhortation reflects the Jerusalem leaders' perception of the need for the Diaspora* communities to help with the economic problems in Jerusalem, and, indeed, the occasion of Paul's second visit to Jerusalem (which may correspond with the occasion of his receiving this exhortation) was to help in the relief of the "saints" (cf. Acts 11:27-30). Little did the Jerusalem leaders know that their suggestion would become Paul's obsession for nearly two decades. Some scholars have also detected an allusion to the collection in Galatians 6:6-10 (Hurtado).

Evidently, as soon as Paul left Jerusalem and began his second missionary journey throughout the northern Mediterranean, he started a campaign for funds to relieve the poverty of the Jerusalem community ("saints" is Paul's reference to Jewish Christians). (A traditional view of Pauline chronology is assumed here; for another view, see Luedemann.) The next trace we find of his concern comes in 1 Corinthians 16:1-4, where we learn that Paul had been encouraging others among his churches to set aside funds weekly in an orderly fashion so when he arrived there would be a full allotment for the saints. There we also learn that official representatives from each church would accompany the funds to Jerusalem.

Paul's second letter to the Corinthians contains two chapters that are largely devoted to the collection for the saints (2 Cor 8—9). Included in these directions are such things as the need for generosity (2 Cor 8:12; 9:5-11), the goal of equality (2 Cor 8:13-15) and the need for careful administration of the funds (2 Cor 8:18-21). Finally, Paul mentions the collection in his letter to the Romans. At Romans 15:27 he speaks to the ultimate socio-theological purpose of the campaign: "If Gentiles have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings, they owe it to the Jews to share with them their material blessings" (NIV). But Paul may have worried over its reception, for he says, "Pray that I may be rescued from the unbelievers in Judea and that my service in Jerusalem [hē diakonia mou hē eis Ierousalēm] may be acceptable to the saints there" (Rom 15:31). Paul apparently saw the collection as his sacrificial offering to the Jerusalem community (see Hill, 177-78).

The evidence in Acts complements these data. There we learn that Paul was most eager to arrive in Jerusalem before Pentecost (Acts 20:16), although he was unsure of what would happen (Acts 20:22). This latter comment by Luke may well reflect Paul's concern about the response of the Jerusalem church, for Paul thought the credibility of his mission and the unity of the church were at stake. Later, before Felix, Paul says that he had come to Jerusalem "to bring my people gifts for the poor and to present offerings" (Acts 24:17; perhaps Felix thought that Paul still had the money and hoped for a bribe from Paul; cf. Acts 24:26).

From both the book of Acts and Paul's letters we can discern the magnitude of Paul's campaign, for it appears that Paul was able to derive both funds and sponsors from all his churches. Thus he had the following funds and/or people representing his missionary efforts: from the Galatian region (1 Cor 16:1) we hear of Derbe (Acts 20:4) and Lystra (Acts 20:4); from Macedonia (2 Cor 8:1-5; 9:2, 4) we hear of Berea (Acts 20:4), Thessalonica (20:4) and Philippi (cf. Acts 16:16 and 20:6; an inference about the "we" sections of Acts; see Nickle, 68); from Achaia we hear of Corinth (Rom 15:26; 1 Cor 16:1-4); from Mysia and Lydia we hear of Ephesus (Acts 20:4) and perhaps Troas (Acts 20:5-6); it is possible that funds came from Tyre (Acts 21:3-4), Ptolemais (Acts 21:7), and from both Cyprus and Caesarea (Acts 21:16). It is even possible that funds were collected from Rome (cf. Rom 12:13; 15:26 with 2 Cor 8:4; 9:13; and Rom 1:13 with 2 Cor 9:6-10). It is hard to imagine any campaign more embracing of the northern Mediterranean and any project that occupied Paul's attention more than this collection for the saints.

Perhaps the most puzzling aspect of the evidence from Acts is its almost total silence regarding the collection campaign (cf. Acts 24:17). Luke's silence, no doubt, is to be explained by recourse to Luke's designs; he obviously did not think descriptions of it were necessary for his purposes. M. Hengel wryly notes that "Luke does not always say everything that he knows, and when he does, he can mention facts which are important—to us—only in passing" (Hengel, 119). Some have suggested that Luke did not bring it up because it ended in failure or because the collection led to charges that Paul was taking money from the Temple* tax itself. The absence of any reference to it in Acts 15 shows that the collection was largely stimulated by Paul and not by the Jerusalem authorities. They did not seek the Gentile funds; the collection was Paul's attempt to show the unity of the church. It is indeed probable that many Jerusalem leaders did not even see the generous funds as something that demonstrated the unity of the church.

The complexity of the evidence is apparent. Involved in Paul's collection were the credibility of his apostolic mission* and the legitimacy of the Gentile mission (Gal 2:1-10), the recognition of the priority of Israel* in God's redemptive plan (Rom 15:27), the goodwill of Christian communities (2 Cor 8—9), as well as the need for individual Christians to trust in God to supply their needs if they were to give generously (2 Cor 9). It is likely that the collection itself gained different theological arguments as Paul's ministry developed and as his relationship to Jerusalem shifted back and forth.

2. The Historical Context for the Collection.

2.1. Conditions in the Jerusalem Church. The historical occasion for the collection of Paul was the poverty of the Jerusalem church. Scholars have traced several possible causes of this poverty (Martin, 256): (1) the relief of more and more widows (Acts 6:1-7); (2) the pilgrimages to Jerusalem of both the elderly and Galileans, who burdened the communities; (3) the potential problems arising from Jerusalem's early experimentation with communal life (Acts 4:32—5:11); (4) the economic hardships caused by famine (Acts 11:27-30); and (5) the personal stresses due to economic persecutions (cf. Jas 1:9; 2:6-7; 5:1-6). Whatever the underlying reasons, one thing remains sure: the churches in Jerusalem were poor and in need of relief (see Jeremias, 87-144; Goppelt, 25-60). Paul assumed the task of demonstrating his commitment to the founding community in Jerusalem by campaigning for relief funds (see Riches and Poverty).

2.2. Administration of the Collection. The precise mode of administering funds to the mother church seems to have been similar to the procedures of the Jewish Temple tax and its attendant gifts that were annually offered at the feasts of Passover, Pentecost and Tabernacles (see Nickle, 74-99). We now know that Diaspora Jews regularly helped support the Jerusalem Temple by sending in the annual two-drachma tax. Along with this, Jews seemed regularly to have added some supplementary gifts (aparchai; see Sanders, 49-51, 283-308). The Temple tax, so it seems, was carefully monitored and protected by Roman authorities (Josephus Ant. 14.10.2-8 §§190-216) and we can only surmise that the funds Paul was collecting were related somehow to this Temple tax payment. Thus, it is possible that Paul encouraged the Christian communities throughout the Mediterranean to set aside gifts for the Christian community in Jerusalem along with their Temple tax. He, along with sponsors from each church, would accompany the funds and hand them over to the Temple and to the Jerusalem community so as to ensure that each was given to the proper authority.

Paul's evident concern for the administration of the collection may have had two fronts: (1) his concern that the Jerusalem authorities should know for whom the funds were intended and (2) his concern that the Roman authorities might question the legitimacy of such gifts. (We assume that Roman authorities would have been nervous about too much money leaving individual districts.) In a classic essay K. Holl went so far as to argue that the Jerusalem Church exercised its prerogative and right to tax the Diaspora Gentile churches, although his view is seen today as an exaggeration of the situation.

3. The Purpose of the Collection.

Scholars have debated vigorously the precise purpose of Paul's campaign to collect funds for the saints in Jerusalem. Of the various proposals, four can be mentioned.

3.1. Help for the Poor. The traditional viewpoint has been that Paul wanted to help the poor Christians in Jerusalem (cf. Gal 6:10) as a demonstration of the love* of God* that the Gentiles had found in Christ (2 Cor 8:8-9, 19; 9:12-15). In general, the collection was charity in that it might create "equality." As Paul wrote to the Corinthians, the collection was so that "at the present time your plenty will supply what they need, so that in turn their plenty will supply what you need. Then there will be equality" (2 Cor 8:13-14).

Paul teaches elsewhere that love of Christ and others ought to motivate believers to show compassion (Gal 5:6, 14; 6:10; 1 Cor 13; 2 Cor 5:14; Rom 12:13). Thus Paul's motivation is love for the churches of Christ, and in this he follows in a long line of deeds of mercy so typical of ancient Judaism (Ex 23:10-11; Deut 14:28-29; 24:19-22; m. Pe'a 1:2, 4; see Str-B 4.1.536-610; Nickle, 93-95), the teaching of Jesus (Lk 6:20-21; Mt 6:2-4; 11:2-6) and the early church (Acts 2:43-47; 4:32-37; 6:1-7). Paul's campaign could well have been motivated by little more than his Jewish piety and his desire to see the economic stress in Jerusalem alleviated (Nickle, 100-111). Yet other motives are also feasible.

3.2. Unity of the Church. Scholars have recognized that Paul's collection was motivated by more than providing aid for the poor (though that would have been motivation enough). Hand in hand with providing aid, Paul was motivated to demonstrate to Jerusalem that, just as there was one Lord* and one gospel,* so there was one church.* That church was comprised of both Gentiles in the Diaspora and Jews in Judea. Paul wanted to show that his gospel was in harmony with the Jerusalem churches, and so a gift from his churches would demonstrate their thanksgiving to God for the covenant* he had made with Israel. This perspective on the collection is explicitly stated in Romans 15:27: "For if the Gentiles have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings, they owe it to the Jews to share with them their material blessings."

This motivation, no doubt, greatly influenced Paul. Many interpreters have detected some nervousness on the part of Paul, and it was his concern for Jerusalem's acceptance of the collection as a demonstration of their acceptance of his "Law-free" gospel that caused the anxiety (Rom 15:31; see Dunn 1988, 2.879-80). The tension between Paul and Jerusalem, whether or not it was only between Paul and factions in Jerusalem, is well known and well documented and need not be enlarged upon here (cf. Gal; Acts 15; 21:28-29; see Nickle, 112-15; Dunn 1991; see Opponents).

On Paul's part, there was a battle going on over the proper definition of the gospel of Jesus Christ (Galatians). Contrary to Peter's actions at Antioch (Gal 2:11-14) and the message of the Judaizers (cf. Gal 3:1-5), there was but one gospel that was to be accepted by faith* (not by works* of the Law) and this gospel of Christ did not need supplementation from the Law of Moses. Further, there was a continual emphasis upon the internal unity of the church, which is achieved in the Spirit who creates the body* of Christ (1 Cor 12:4-31; Eph 2:11-22). This unity owed its origins, of course, to the Jewish nation (Rom 9:1-5; 10:1-4; 11:1-6, 17-24) and to the Jerusalem community (Rom 15:27; Acts). For these three reasons—the singularity of the gospel, the organic unity of the church, and the temporal priority of the Jewish people in God's redemptive plan—the church should act as a unity. This gave Paul a theological foundation for his collection.

Accordingly, Paul urged his churches to give voluntarily (1 Cor 16:1; 2 Cor 8:3, 8, 11-12; 9:1-5) and generously (2 Cor 8:2-4; 9:6-15) as a demonstration to the Jerusalem churches that the Gentile Christians of the Diaspora wanted to be involved in the relief efforts and, in so doing, to show to the mother church (Acts 24:17) their thanksgiving for their spiritual heritage (Rom 15:27; Dahl). Thus the presented collection would be "proof of your love" (2 Cor 8:24).

In fact, several have observed that the collection was the culminating act of Paul's apostolic ministry in the East (Bartsch). Paul describes the collection as the "fruit" and "seal" of his ministry as he now prepares for a wider ministry to Spain (Rom 15:23-24, 28). We may infer from this that the collection and its successful presentation in Jerusalem were together to be the crowning jewel of the first phase of his apostolic ministry (the only phase he actually completed).

It ought to be observed that Paul's perception(s) of his collection may not have been identical to those of the Jerusalem churches. The Jerusalem believers may well have seen the gifts and funds as obligations on the part of the Gentile churches and as the Gentiles' expression of their dependence upon the founding churches. They may have argued that, since they had salvation-historical priority, they also had rights to support from the newer areas (cf. Rom 15:27; see Holmberg).

3.3. Substitute for Jewish Entry Rites. Although this view has not been held by many, K. Berger argues that the collection itself was seen as almsgiving on the part of the Diaspora Gentile church and, as such, was seen as a substitute action for their sacrifices and circumcision.* Money gifts for Israel were seen as the act whereby the Gentile demonstrated his or her allegiance to the covenant of Abraham* and to the people of Israel (Sir 29:12; 40:24; Tob 4:10-11; 12:9; 14:11; Acts 10:2, 35). According to Berger's hypothesis, the collected funds and gifts were a symbol of the Gentile commitment to Israel and its Law, a visible sign of their recognition of the priority of the Jewish nation in salvation-history. Such would have been Paul's argument if he had so regarded the collection.

3.4. Eschatological Provocation. The unbelief of Israel was problematic to Paul, and he looked and longed for the day when Israel would turn to its Messiah, Jesus Christ.* Paul did not doubt that that day would come (Rom 11:25-26). Paul believed, furthermore, that the salvation* of the Gentiles would turn out for the conversion of Israel (Rom 11:11-24; cf. 11:9-11 in general; see Restoration of Israel). Some have contended that the collection fits into this scheme (Munck; Nickle, 129-142; Bruce, 22-25): the presentation by Paul and his retinue of Gentile sponsors of the funds to the Jerusalem churches would provoke the nation of Israel to believe in the Messiah, for they would see in that act the fulfillment of the promise that the Gentiles would bring gifts to Zion (Is 2:2-4; 60:6-7, 11; Mic 4:13; see McKnight, 47-48). Thus the collection was for Paul an eschatological provocation of Israel; by it he hoped to convert Israel to faith in the Messiah. It is possible that this is the meaning of 2 Corinthians 9:10: borrowing language from Isaiah 55:10, Paul contends that the gifts of the Corinthians will actually turn out to enlarge their harvest (the conversion of Israel?). This view might also lie behind 2 Corinthians 9:11-12, where the increase of thanksgivings could refer to the conversion of Israelites (see Eschatology).

We are probably on firmest ground if we recognize that Paul might have had more than one purpose in conducting the collection for the saints. It may well be that what began as largely an adventure in charity became, as a result of growing tensions, an act of theological unity and eschatological provocation. We can hardly be certain about these matters.

4. The Results of the Collection.

Neither Luke nor Paul tell of the results of the offering of the collection. Paul never mentions it in any of his extant later correspondence. However, Luke records the trip and the period during which the collection was handed over to the leaders. His first few lines may reveal that the collection was received with profound gratitude. Acts 21:17-26 speaks of the church receiving them "warmly" (Acts 21:17). Paul and his retinue greeted the Christian leaders, especially James,* in Jerusalem (Acts 21:18) and Paul then declared what God was doing in the Gentile world (Acts 21:19). Luke states that "when they heard this, they praised God" (Acts 21:20). Then they asked Paul to demonstrate his commitment to the Law and to the Jewish people by undertaking a vow of purification, which he did—perhaps gladly (Acts 21:21-26). We can probably infer from this that the collection was received with gratitude, with perhaps some residual suspicions regarding the Gentile Christians' commitment to the Law* (a suspicion which may have lingered for some time thereafter).

Some scholars, however, have argued that the collection did not accomplish its purposes. The saints remained poor, the act of charity notwithstanding; the tension between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians continued; and the conversion of Israel never took place. The presence of those Gentiles who aided in the collection led to the very occasion for Paul's arrest (Acts 21:29). While we must contend that Israel did not convert, we must also say that it is not entirely clear that Paul saw the conversion of Israel as a major motivation for his collection. Furthermore, there is no evidence that Paul thought all traces of poverty would be eliminated. Paul was realistic enough, we might suppose, to realize that his collection of funds, as large as it may have been, would not alter permanently the economic conditions of Christians. Finally, Paul's gospel may have continued to remain a sore spot for the Jerusalem Christians; but we have no traces in the concluding chapters of Acts that the Jerusalem Christians refused to stand behind him. Relations between Jewish and Gentile churches probably remained in tension, but we must also accept the implications of what such a gift might have communicated. There can be no doubt that the majority of Judean Christians would have been greatly impressed by the generosity of the Diaspora Christians and, therefore, would have drawn the conclusion that the church has one gospel, one Lord and one Spirit—even if that same church was characterized by a considerable amount of diversity.

See also CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; GENTILES; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; LOVE; MISSION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H.-W. Bartsch, ". . . wenn ich ihnen diese Frucht versiegelt habe. Röm 15:28," ZNW 63 (1972) 95-107; K. Berger, "Almosen für Israel," NTS (1976-77) 180-204; F. F. Bruce, "Paul and Jerusalem," TynB 19 (1968) 3-25; N. A. Dahl, "Paul and Possessions," in Studies in Paul (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977) 22-39; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land (Berkeley: University of California, 1974) 195-208; J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); idem, The Partings of the Ways (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); D. Georgi, Remembering the Poor: The History of Paul's Collection for Jerusalem (Nashville: Abingdon, 1992); L. Goppelt, Apostolic and Post-Apostolic Times (London: A. & C. Black, 1970); J. Hainz, Koinonia: 'Kirche' als Gemeinschaft bei Paulus (BU 16; Regensburg: F. Pustet, 1982) 123-61; M. Hengel, Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979) 118-19; C. C. Hill, Hellenists and Hebrews (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 173-78; K. Holl, "Der Kirchenbegriff des Paulus in seinem Verhältnis zu dem der Urgemeinde," in Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1928) 2.44-67; B. Holmberg, Paul and Power (Lund: CWK Gleerup, 1978) 35-44; L. W. Hurtado, "The Jerusalem Collection and the Book of Galatians," JSNT 5 (1979) 46-62; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); G. Luedemann, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 77-100; S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986) 256-58; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1959); K. F. Nickle, The Collection: A Study in Paul's Strategy (SBT 48; Naperville: Allenson, 1966); E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); F. Watson, Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles (SNTSMS 56; Cambridge: University Press, 1986) 174-76; J. R. Willis, "Collection," in Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, ed. J. Hastings (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1916) 1.223-25.

S. McKnight

COLLECTION OF PAUL'S LETTERS. See CANON.

COLOSSAE. See COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE.

COLOSSIAN HERESY. See COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; OPPONENTS OF PAUL.

COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE

Colossians, one of Paul's shortest letters, was written to the infant church at Colossae in the Lycus valley of the province of Asia. This Christian community had not been founded by Paul but came into existence during his Ephesian ministry (c. A.D. 52-55; see Ephesus) through the efforts of Epaphras, one of his colleagues. Although not a theological treatise, Colossians has much to say about the importance of the gospel, the person and work of the Lord* Jesus Christ,* especially as Lord in creation* and author of reconciliation (Col 1:15-20; see Peace, Reconciliation), the people of God, eschatology,* freedom* from legalism and the Christian life.

1. Colossae and Its Citizens
2. The Church at Colossae
3. The Occasion of the Letter
4. The Threat to Faith and the "Colossian Heresy"
5. Paul's Handling of the Colossian Philosophy
6. Some Critical Questions

1. Colossae and Its Citizens.

1.1. The City. The ancient city of Colossae was situated 100 miles east of Ephesus in Phrygia on the southern bank of the river Lycus (in modern Turkey), and its fertile valley produced large crops of figs and olives. Colossae lay on the main road from Ephesus and Sardis to the Euphrates. In the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. it was described as populous, large and wealthy, its commercial significance being due to its wool industry. Later the city declined in importance so that in Roman times it had become a "small town" (Strabo Geog. 12.8.13, though the text is debatable) and had been surpassed by Laodicea and Hierapolis which were also in the Lycus valley. By the time Paul wrote to the Christians living at Colossae the commercial and social importance of the town was already on the wane, though coins and inscriptions attest to the civic life of the town in the second and third centuries A.D.

1.2. Its People. Laodicea, Hierapolis and Colossae belonged to the proconsular province of Asia. Colossae's population consisted mainly of indigenous Phrygian and Greek settlers, but in the early part of the second century B.C. two thousand Jewish families from Babylon and Mesopotamia were settled in Lydia and Phrygia by Antiochus III (Josephus Ant. 12.3.4 §§147-53). According to grave inscriptions in the area Jews had become part of the Asian culture by the first century B.C. So the Colossae of Paul's day seems to have been a cosmopolitan place in which differing cultural and religious elements mingled.

2. The Church at Colossae.

The believers at Colossae, who are addressed as faithful brothers and sisters in Christ (Col 1:2), were not converted through the ministry* of Paul himself. This Christian community had come into existence during a period of vigorous missionary and evangelistic activity (see Mission) associated with Paul's Ephesian ministry (c. A.D. 52-55) recorded in Acts 19. But the apostle himself during his missionary work in Asia Minor had not reached Colossae in the upper valley of the Lycus (cf. Col 2:1). His daily evangelistic "dialogues" held in the hall of Tyrannus in Ephesus were so effective that Luke can claim "all the residents of Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks" (Acts 19:10). While the work was directed by Paul, he was assisted by several coworkers* through whom a number of churches were planted in the province of Asia. Among these were the congregations of Colossae, Laodicea and Hierapolis, which, we infer, were the fruit of Epaphras's evangelistic efforts (Col 1:7; 4:12, 13). Epaphras, a native of Colossae (Col 4:12), who may have become a Christian during a visit to Ephesus, was "a faithful minister of Christ" and as Paul's representative (Col 1:7) he had taught the Colossians the truth of the gospel.*

The many allusions to the non-Christian past of the readers suggest that most of them were Gentile* converts. They had once been utterly out of harmony with God, enmeshed in idolatry* and slavery to sin,* being hostile to God* in mind and godless in their actions (Col 1:21; cf 1:12, 27). They had been spiritually dead because of their sins and "the uncircumcision of . . . [their] flesh"—a statement which indicates they were both heathen and godless (Col 2:13).

But God had effected a mighty change in their lives: he had reconciled them to himself in an earth-shattering event, namely, Christ's physical death* on the cross* (Col 1:22). He had delivered them from a tyranny of darkness and transferred them into a kingdom* in which his beloved Son* ruled (Col 1:13). They now possessed redemption* and the forgiveness* of sins (Col 1:14; 2:13; 3:13).

Because the congregation had received Christ Jesus the Lord as their tradition* (parelabete, Col 2:6) when they accepted the gospel at the hands of Epaphras, they are admonished to conduct their lives as those who have been united to Christ in his death and resurrection.* Since Christ Jesus was a more-than-adequate safeguard against empty human traditions, they are urged to see to it that their way of life and thought conform continually to Christ's teaching (Col 2:6-8).

The picture is therefore drawn of a Christian congregation obedient to the apostolic gospel and for which the apostle* can give heartfelt thanks to God (Col 1:4-6). He knows of their love* "in the Spirit" (Col 1:8) and was delighted to learn of their orderly Christian lives and the stability of their faith* in Christ (Col 2:5).

3. The Occasion of the Letter.

Epaphras had paid Paul a visit in Rome (see 6.2 below) and informed him of the progress of the gospel in the Lycus valley. While much of the report was encouraging (cf. Col 1:8; 2:5), one disquieting feature was the attractive, but false, teaching that had recently been introduced into the congregation and which, if it went unchecked, would subvert the gospel and bring the Colossians into spiritual bondage. Paul's letter then is written as a response to this urgent need. Perhaps Epaphras found it difficult to cope with the specious arguments and the feigned humility of those spreading this teaching, and so needed the greater wisdom of the apostle.

4. The Threat to Faith and the "Colossian Heresy."

4.1. Was There a "Colossian Heresy"? Nowhere in the letter does the apostle give a formal exposition of the "heresy"; its chief features can be detected only by piecing together and interpreting his positive counterarguments. Several recent scholars have questioned whether these counterarguments point to the existence of a "Colossian heresy" at all. They prefer to speak in terms of tendencies rather than a clear-cut system with definite points and suggest that the young converts were under external pressure to conform to the beliefs and practices of their Jewish and pagan neighbors (Hooker). This view rightly stresses Paul's positive statements about the life and stability of the congregation (Col 1:3-8; 2:5) and warns against the danger of arguing in a circle when reconstructing the situation behind Paul's writings. However, in the light of Colossians 2:8-23 with its references to "fullness,"* specific ascetic injunctions (Col 2:21), regulations about food and holy days (see Holy Days), unusual phrases which seem to be catchwords of Paul's opponents and the strong emphasis on what Christ has already achieved by his death and resurrection, it seems appropriate to speak of a "heresy" which had just begun to make some inroads into the congregation.

4.2. Some Distinguishing Marks of the "Heresy." The teaching was set forth as "philosophy"* (Col 2:8), based on "tradition" (paradosis denotes its antiquity, dignity and revelational character), which was supposed to impart true knowledge* (Col 2:18, 23). Paul seems to be quoting catchwords of the opponents in his attack on their teaching: "all the fullness" (Col 2:9); "delighting in humility and the worship* of angels,*" "things which he has seen upon entering" (perhaps "entering into visions"; Col 2:18); "Don't handle, don't taste, don't even touch!" (Col 2:21); and "voluntary worship," "humility" and "severe treatment of the body" (Col 2:23). Further, the keeping of these taboos in the "philosophy" was related to obedient submission to "the elemental spirits of the world" (Col 2:20; see Elements/Elemental Spirits).

4.3. Interpreting These Distinguishing Marks. No complete agreement has been achieved among scholars as to the nature of the teaching. Basically the heresy seems to have been Jewish, because of the references to food regulations, the Sabbath* and other prescriptions of the Jewish calendar. Circumcision* is mentioned (Col 2:11) but did not appear as one of the legal requirements. (Wright argues for an exclusively Jewish background to the heresy.)

But what kind of Judaism? Apparently it was not the more straightforward kind against which the Galatian* churches had to be warned, but was one in which asceticism and mysticism* were featured and where angels and principalities played a prominent role in creation and the giving of the Law.* They were regarded as controlling the communication between God and man, and so needed to be placated by keeping strict legal observances.

A number of important suggestions has been made as to the nature of the Colossian "philosophy," ranging from a pagan mystery cult (Dibelius) and a syncretism of gnosticized Judaism and pagan elements (Bornkamm)—the "worship of angels" (Col 2:18) was regarded as a pagan element in the false teaching, but should be understood as "the angelic worship [of God]"—to Essene Judaism of a gnostic* kind (Lightfoot) and Judaizing syncretism (Lyonnet).

Many recent scholars, however, consider that the false teaching, which advanced beyond Epaphras's elementary gospel, is to be read against the background of ascetic and mystical forms of Jewish piety (as evidenced, for example, at Qumran*). It was for a spiritual elite who were being urged to press on in wisdom and knowledge so as to attain true "fullness." "Self-abasement" (Col 2:18, 23) was a term used by opponents to denote ascetic practices that were effective for receiving visions of heavenly mysteries* and participating in mystical experiences. The "mature" were thus able to gain entrance into heaven and join in the "angelic worship of God" as part of their present experience (Col 2:18).

5. Paul's Handling of the Colossian Philosophy.

Although there is a build-up in Paul's presentation in the first chapter, it is not until Colossians 2:4 ("I am saying this in order that no one may deceive you with persuasive language") that the apostle expressly points to the dangers facing the congregation. He is aware of the methods of the false teachers and issues a strong warning to the Colossians to be on their guard lest they be carried off as spoil (Col 2:8, sylagōgeō, "kidnap, carry off as booty," is a rare and vivid word, showing just how seriously Paul regarded the evil designs of those seeking to influence the congregation); these spiritual charlatans were trying to ensnare them by their "philosophy and empty deceit" (Col 2:8). Although they set forth their teaching as "tradition," Paul rejects any suggestion of divine origin. It was a human fabrication ("according to human tradition") that stood over against the tradition of Christ—the tradition which stems from the teaching of Christ, which also finds its embodiment in him (Col 2:6).

In a magnificent passage of praise exalting Christ as the Lord in creation and reconciliation (Col 1:15-20), Paul asserts that Christ is the one through whom all things were created, including the principalities and powers (see Principalities and Powers) which figured so prominently in the Colossian heresy. All things have been made in him as the sphere, through him as the agent and for him as the ultimate goal of all creation (Col 1:16).

Those who have been incorporated into Christ have come to fullness of life in the one who is master over every principality and power (Col 2:10). They need not seek perfection anywhere else but in him. It is in him, the one in whose death, burial and resurrection they have been united (Col 2:11-12), that the totality of wisdom* and knowledge is concentrated and made available to all his people—not just an elite group.

Christ Jesus is the sole mediator between God and humankind. The Colossians are not to be misled by the false teachers into thinking it was necessary to obey the angelic powers who were said to control the communication between God and humankind. That way was now controlled by Christ who by his death is revealed as conqueror of the principalities and powers (Col 2:13-15; see Triumph).

The apostle's criticisms of the advocates of the Colossian philosophy, with their false notions and aberrant behavior, are devastating (Col 2:16-23). Because of their legalism, the false teachers failed to recognize God's good gifts and his purpose in giving them, namely, that all of them should be enjoyed and consumed through their proper use (Col 2:22). The things covered by the taboos were perishable objects of the material world, destined to pass away when used. The taboos themselves, which belonged to a transitory order (Col 2:17), were merely human inventions that laid no claim to absoluteness but stood over against the revelation of the will of God (cf. Col 2:22). To place oneself under rules and regulations like those of Colossians 2:21 is to go back into slavery again—under the personal forces overthrown by Christ (Col 2:20). By his death he had freed the Colossians from bondage to the principalities and powers. They must not turn their backs on that life-changing event. Although the prohibitions (cf. Col 2:21) carried a reputation for wisdom in the spheres of voluntary worship, humility and severe treatment of the body, these practices were in fact spiritually and morally bankrupt. Such energetic endeavors could not hold the flesh in check. Instead, these self-made regulations actually pandered to the flesh* (Col 2:23).

In his reply to the false teaching Paul expounds the doctrine of the cosmic Christ more fully than in his earlier letters (see Christology). Hints had previously appeared in Romans 8:19-22 and 1 Corinthians 1:24; 2:6-10; 8:6 but a more detailed exposition is given in Colossians 1:15-20 and 2:13-15. Against the false teachers who boasted in their exalted spiritual experiences, their fresh revelations and their participation in the divine fullness, the apostle's criticisms are trenchant: they are arrogant and in danger of being separated from Christ (Col 2:18-19).

In his handling of the Colossian false teaching Paul places his emphasis on realized eschatology* (see especially Col 2:12; 3:1-4). Within the "already-not yet" tension the stress is upon the former, called forth by the circumstances of the letter. The Colossians have a hope laid up for them in heaven (Col 1:5; cf. 3:1-4), they have been fitted for a share in the inheritance of the saints in light (Col 1:12), having already been delivered from a tyranny of darkness and transferred into the kingdom of God's beloved Son (Col 1:13). Not only did they die with Christ; they were also raised with him (Col 2:12; 3:1; cf. 3:3). Although the "not yet" of salvation does feature in the letter (esp. Col 3:4), the "already" needed to be asserted again and again over against those who were interested in "fullness" and the heavenly* realm, but who had false notions about them, believing they could be reached by legalistic observances, a special knowledge, visionary experiences and the like (see Visions). Christ has done all that was necessary for the Colossians' salvation. They had died with Christ, been raised with him and given new life with him (see Dying and Rising with Christ). Let them now zealously seek the things above (Col 3:1-2), that new order centered on the exalted Christ (see Exaltation), and let them as a consequence show true heavenly-mindedness (cf. Col 3:5, 8, 12 and 3:18—4:1).

6. Some Critical Questions.

6.1. Authorship. The letter makes clear that the apostle Paul is the writer, not only in the opening greeting (Col 1:1), but also in the body of the letter (Col 1:23) and at its conclusion (Col 4:18). The character of Paul, as we know it from other letters, shines throughout this letter. There was no dispute over the authenticity of Colossians in the early period of the church, and the letter was included in Marcion's canonical list as well as in the Muratorian canon (see Canon). However, the Pauline authorship has been challenged on a number of occasions in the last one hundred and fifty years. The grounds presented concern the language and style of the letter, and the supposed differences between Colossians and the theology of the main Pauline epistles.

6.1.1. Language and Style. Many of the formal features of Colossians show similarities with the other Pauline letters, including its structure (the introduction, Col 1:1-2; conclusion, Col 4:18; and thanksgiving prayer,* Col 1:3-8), connecting words and phrases (Col 2:1, 6, 16; 3:1, 5) as well as the list of messages and greetings (cf. Col 4:8, 10, 12, 15).

Many expressions are Pauline in style: for example, the superfluous use of "and" after "therefore" (Col 1:9; cf. 1 Thess 2:13; 3:5), phrases like "his saints" (Col 1:26; cf. 1 Thess 3:13) "in regard to" (Col 2:16; cf. 2 Cor 3:10; 9:3), as well as verbs such as charizomai, with the meaning "to forgive" (Col 2:13; 3:13; cf. 2 Cor 2:7, 10). The similarities extend to the theological terminology such as "in Christ"* (Col 1:2, 4, 28), "in the Lord" (Col 3:18, 20, etc.), expressions about being united with Christ in baptism* (Col 2:11, 12), about being freed from the power of the regulations (Col 2:14, 20, 21), the contrast between the old and the new person (Col 3:5-17), and the relation between the indicative and the imperative in exhortations (Col 3:5-17).

Yet there are linguistic differences between Colossians and the other Pauline letters: thirty-four words appear in Colossians but nowhere else in the NT, twenty-eight words do not occur in the other Pauline letters, and ten words Colossians has in common only with Ephesians. But in assessing these statistics it ought to be borne in mind that many of these words appear in the hymnic* paragraph of Colossians 1:15-20 or in interaction with the false teaching, either as catchwords of the Colossian philosophy or as part of the author's polemic. Further, hapax legomena and unusual expressions turn up in considerable numbers in the other Pauline letters; the absence of a word or concept may be due to the different subject matter being discussed.

Characteristic features of style, as distinct from vocabulary, include liturgical material with long clauses introduced by relative pronouns, inserted causal and participial phrases, combined and synonymous expressions ("strengthened with all power," Col 1:11; "praying and asking," Col 1:9), a series of dependent genitives ("the word of truth, of the gospel," Col 1:5) and loosely joined infinitival constructions ("to walk worthily of the Lord," Col 1:10).

These stylistic peculiarities have been understood as evidence of an author who, for all his dependence on Paul, argues differently from the apostle (so Bujard). But such a judgment appears to be unduly negative and presupposes an almost infallible understanding of what Paul could or could not have written. Further, it does not explain the close similarities between Colossians and the generally accepted Pauline letters. Rather, the stylistic peculiarities would seem to have their basis in the letter's content which is clearly connected with the particular situation which necessitated the letter.

6.1.2. Teaching. For scholars such as E. Lohse the supposed theological differences between Colossians and the generally accepted Pauline letters are decisive against the apostolic authorship of Colossians, even if the grounds of language and style are not. Some have argued that the post-Pauline author's christology belonged to a later period of church history when classical Gnostic influences had begun to assert themselves. But it is unnecessary to resort to full-blown Gnostic influences of the second century as a possible background. If a Jewish background of an ascetic mystical kind is likely, then there is no need to look beyond the apostolic age, and certainly Pauline authorship is not ruled out on this account.

The objections to Paul's authorship on the grounds of theology are:

6.1.2.1. Christology. It has been claimed that Colossians develops its christology* on the basis of Colossians 1:15-20 and goes beyond Paul's statements in 1 Corinthians 8:6 and Romans 8:31-39 in its teaching that in Christ the entire fullness of deity dwells "bodily" (Col 2:9) and that he is the "head* of every principality and power" (Col 2:10). But this latter statement spells out the implications of Colossians 1:15-20, which is central to the letter, while Colossians 2:9 applies the words of the hymn to the Colossian situation, making clear how the entire fullness of deity dwells in Christ, that is, in bodily form by his becoming incarnate. The cosmic dimension of Christ's rule is a fuller and more systematic exposition of the theme of Christ's universal lordship than is found in Paul's earlier letters (1 Cor 8:6; cf. Col 1:24; 2:6-10), and it is spelled out in relation to and as a correction of the false teaching at Colossae. There is no need to look for an author other than Paul as the source of such ideas.

6.1.2.2. Ecclesiology. The notion of Christ as the "head of the body, the church" is said to reflect a post-Pauline development. In 1 Corinthians 12:12-27 and Romans 12:4-5 Paul uses the body (see Body of Christ) terminology and its constituent parts to refer to the mutual relations and obligations of Christians. In these references the "head" of the body has no special position or honor; it is counted as an ordinary member (cf. 1 Cor 12:21). In Colossians (and Ephesians) there is an advance in the line of thought, from the language of simile (as in 1 Cor and Rom) to that of a real and interpersonal involvement. This advance has probably been stimulated by Paul's reflection on the issues involved in the Colossian heresy, and is entirely appropriate. Further, the term *church (Col 1:18), while usually taken to refer to the people of God all over the world, the universal or worldwide church where Christ here and now exercises his cosmic lordship, is best understood of a heavenly assembly gathered around the risen and exalted Christ (cf. Col 3:1-4; Eph 2:6). This heavenly gathering with Christ at its center is manifested here and now on earth. The same word church can be used of a local congregation at Colossae or even of a small house community (Col 4:15-16). The congregation in heaven finds its manifestation and becomes visible as the domain of Christ's rule where saints and faithful brothers and sisters in Christ gather (Col 1:2).

6.1.2.3. Eschatology. Future eschatology has receded in Colossians, it is argued, with Colossians 3:4 the only explicit reference to this future event. Instead, spatial concepts are said to dominate, while none of the typically Pauline ideas—Parousia, resurrection of the dead and judgment* of the world—is encountered in the letter. Further, unlike the genuine Pauline letters Colossians states that believers have already been raised with Christ (Col 2:12-13; 3:1), and this serves as the basis of the ethical imperative (see Ethics).

There is indeed an emphasis on realized eschatology in Colossians, but this has been called forth by the particular circumstances. Also, there is future eschatology not only at Colossians 3:4, 6, 24, but at Colossians 1:22, 28 (cf. Col 4:11) as well. Spatial concepts are used in the service of eschatology, while the antithesis between eschatological and transcendent perspectives is found together in the undisputed Paulines and at Colossians 3:1-4. There is an eschatological motivation in Colossians; it may not be dominant but is present nevertheless (Col 3:5 is based on Col 3:1-4 with its eschatological emphasis). At the same time there are other grounds for exhortation than eschatology in the generally accepted Pauline letters.

6.1.2.4. Tradition. The alleged differences in the above-mentioned areas are thought to derive from a "Pauline school tradition" probably based in Ephesus. The post-Pauline author took over the hymn now found in Colossians 1:15-20 and other traditional materials in order to combat heresy in the subapostolic age (Käsemann). Epaphras's name is especially emphasized in the list of greetings in Colossians. This document, which is a kind of pastoral letter, was to provide an apostolic authorization for Epaphras, whose teaching represents the mind of Paul. According to M. Kiley the author of Colossians used Paul's two prison letters (Philippians* and Philemon*) as models for writing a letter of recommendation for Epaphras. The letter, which bears the marks of the "early catholicism"* of the subapostolic age, was intended to show that "Paul's teaching is not strictly limited to the exigencies of time and place" (Kiley, 107). The "author of Colossians affirms to the communities the message of the Apostle in a powerful new formulation" (Lohse, 183).

But in Colossians 1:23—2:5 the gospel gives validity to Paul's ministry; the paragraph does not legitimate the gospel through the apostolic office of Paul and then assert (Col 1:7; 4:7-13) the legitimation of Epaphras because of his relationship to the apostle. Both serve the gospel as coworkers and ministers of that word. No attempt is made in these passages to give an apostolic authorization to Epaphras (or anyone else) because he stands in an apostolic succession and his teaching represents the mind of Paul.

The so-called differences between Colossians and the generally accepted Pauline letters do not constitute sufficient grounds for rejecting the apostolic authorship of this letter. Differences of emphasis there are, but these are best interpreted as being called forth by the circumstances at Colossae.

6.2. Place and Date of Origin. The traditional view that Paul wrote Colossians during his imprisonment in Rome* is more likely than that he penned the letter in Ephesus or Caesarea. No other imprisonment recorded in Acts seems a real alternative (there are difficulties regarding the Caesarean imprisonment of Acts 24:27; but see Philippians). The greetings from colleagues in Colossians 4 suggest they had direct access to him, and this is consistent with the Roman imprisonment of Acts 28:30, while the reference to Onesimus (which brings into account the Letter to Philemon) could be understood in the context of the imperial capital even though some have argued that the distance between Colossae and Rome is an obstacle to its Roman origin. It is precarious to place any weight on the progression in Pauline thought as a criterion for dating Colossians.

If the Roman hypothesis is accepted, then the most likely date is fairly early in Paul's (first) Roman imprisonment, that is, about A.D. 60-61. Those advocating an Ephesian alternative place the letter around A.D. 54-57, or even earlier, A.D. 52-55.

6.3. The Hymn in Praise of Christ. Colossians 1:15-20 is a magnificent passage of praise exalting Christ as the Lord in creation (Col 1:15-17) and author of reconciliation (Col 1:18-20). As to the structure of the hymn* no scholarly consensus has been reached about the number and content of the stanzas. It is better to speak of certain parallels (cf. Col 1:15 and 18), with relative clauses being followed by causal clauses (Col 1:16, 19), the frequent use of "all," and the formal chiasmus in verses 16c and 20 (note also Col 1:17, 18).

Although the backgrounds in pre-Christian Gnosticism and rabbinic Judaism have been suggested as the source of the hymn's ideas, a general Wisdom* milieu in the OT and Hellenistic Judaism (E. Schweizer) is probably correct. But how the predicates and activities ascribed to Wisdom came to be applied to Jesus of Nazareth, recently crucified and risen from the dead, cannot be explained by the background itself.

This hymnic paragraph is not a christological digression or excursus but is clearly central to the context in which it stands. Paul's lengthy prayer* (Col 1:9-14) leads up to the hymn, and themes from it are taken up and applied throughout the rest of the letter (cf. Col 1:19 with 2:9; Col 1:20 with 1:21-23 and 2:15). Although the passage praises Christ, surprisingly the names "Jesus," "Christ" and "Lord" do not appear with it. The stanza simply begins, "He is . . ." However, it is clear that the words of praise can apply to no one else.

The Pauline authorship of the "hymn" has been challenged on linguistic and structural grounds. The arguments for and against Paul's authorship are not decisive either way, so we should accept the passage as authentic. Thus, there has been considerable debate whether the apostle here incorporated an existing "hymn" into his letter. This is possible, but if so he has woven the rest of the letter around it, and the focus on the supremacy of Christ is intended to strengthen the readers and correct the erroneous views of the false teachers. Whether pre-Pauline or not, the passage perfectly suited the apostle's purposes in writing to the Colossians.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE; FULLNESS; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; MYSTICISM; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; TRIUMPH; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: T. K. Abbott, The Epistles to the Ephesians and to the Colossians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1897); F. F. Bruce, The Epistles to the Colossians, to Philemon, and to the Ephesians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); G. B. Caird, Paul's Letters from Prison (Oxford: University Press, 1976); M. Dibelius, An die Kolosser, Epheser, an Philemon (3d ed.; HNT 12; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1953); J. L. Houlden, Paul's Letters from Prison (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (London: Macmillan, 1890); E. Lohmeyer, Die Briefe an die Philipper, an die Kolosser und an Philemon (13th ed.; MeyerK; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1964); E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); R. P. Martin, Colossians and Philemon (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); idem, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon (Int; Louisville: John Knox, 1991); C. F. D. Moule, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Colossians and to Philemon (CGTC; Cambridge: University Press, 1957); P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); A. G. Patzia, Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984); E. Schweizer, The Letter to the Colossians: A Commentary (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1982); N. T. Wright, The Epistles of Paul to the Colossians and to Philemon (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986). Studies: G. Bornkamm, "The Heresy of Colossians," in Conflict at Colossae, ed., F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (2d ed.; SBLSBS 4; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975) 123-45; W. Bujard, Stilanalytische Untersuchungen zum Kolosserbrief (SUNT 11; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1973); G. E. Cannon, The Use of Traditional Materials in Colossians (Macon, GA: Mercer, 1983); M. Dibelius, "The Isis Initiation in Apuleius and Related Initiatory Rites," in Conflict at Colossae, ed. F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (SBLSBS 4; 2d ed.; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975) 61-121; F. O. Francis and W. Meeks, ed., Conflict at Colossae (SBLSBS 4; Missoula: Scholars, 1975); M. D. Hooker, "Were There False Teachers in Colossae?" in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 315-31; E. Käsemann, "A Primitive Christian Baptismal Liturgy," in Essays on New Testament Themes (SBT; Naperville: Allenson, 1964) 149-68; M. Kiley, Colossians as Pseudepigraphy (Sheffield: JSOT, 1986); A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 41; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); S. Lyonnet, "Paul's Adversaries in Colossae," in Conflict at Colossae, ed. F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (2d ed.; SBLSBS 4; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975) 147-61; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns (SNTSMS 15; Cambridge: University Press, 1971); R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ (BZNW 32; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1967); N. T. Wright, "Poetry and Theology in Col. 1:15-20," NTS 36 (1990) 444-68.

P. T. O'Brien

COMMUNION. See COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING.

COMMUNITY. See CHURCH; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL.

CONFESSIONS. See CREED; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

CONSCIENCE

Paul uses the term and idea of "conscience" frequently in his instructions to the Corinthians* on eating meat sacrificed to idols (see Food). Conscience is mentioned in the context of Paul's apostolic ministry. It appears once in connection with Christians' obedience to the state (see Civil Authority) and with Gentiles' doing the Law* by nature. The Pastoral Letters contrast the "good conscience" of Christian ministers with the "defiled" or "seared" conscience of false teachers. Interpreters of Paul express both difference of opinion and some ambiguity regarding the meaning of "conscience" in Paul. This is due not least to the considerable interpretive difficulties faced in many of his uses of the term.

1. Usage and Definition
2. Conscience in Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians
3. Conscience in the Pastoral Epistles

1. Usage and Definition.

In Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians Paul uses the substantive syneidēsis, "conscience," fourteen times and the reflexive verb phrase emautō synoida ti, "I know something against myself," only once (1 Cor 4:4). Syneidēsis appears six times in the Pastorals, usually with an attributive adjective (agathē, "good," or kathara, "pure"). Paul may have taken over the term conscience as a Christian ethical term from the Corinthians (seeing that he uses it first and most frequently in his letters to them, so Pierce, 64-65).

The meaning of syneidēsis varies widely in Greco-Roman antiquity, where it is common since the first century B.C. (cf. the Hebrew lēḇ, "heart," in the OT; see Eckstein, 35-135). R. Bultmann understands the term in Paul as "knowledge shared with oneself . . . of good and evil and of the corresponding conduct" Bultmann, 1.216-17). But H.-J. Eckstein (311-14) argues that syneidēsis in 1 Corinthians and Romans refers uniformly to the inner tribunal which determines whether behavior (in the broad sense, including thinking, willing, speaking and acting) agrees with the moral norms and requirements affirmed by the mind and which testifies of this verdict to the subject. C. A. Pierce's (78) interpretation of conscience as "pain" has been challenged on exegetical grounds.

2. Conscience in Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians.

2.1. Conscience as Universally Human. Paul ascribes conscience to Christians and unbelievers alike. Pagans have a conscience, as evidenced by the fact that "their conflicting thoughts accuse or defend," depending on whether or not their behavior corresponds to "the work of the law written in their hearts" (Rom 2:15). Here Paul understands conscience as an inner tribunal which tests and so helps guide behavior by internalized moral norms.

2.2. Conscience and Moral Norms. The moral norms according to which the conscience tests behavior are a given for the conscience (see Ethics). The conscience does not establish these norms nor provide knowledge* of them. Knowledge of moral norms is prior to the activity of the conscience and not to be equated with the conscience itself (see Eckstein, 312). Norms which are already internalized thus come to the conscience as criteria for its use in evaluating behavior.

The moral norms which the conscience uses are the internalized norms of the subject which may or may not correspond to the will of God. These norms may differ from person to person, with the result that the judgments by different consciences on the same type of behavior will differ (1 Cor 8:7-12; 10:25-29).

2.3. Function of Conscience. The conscience can register the agreement between behavior and norms (Rom 9:1; 2 Cor 4:2; 5:11; also 1 Cor 10:25, 27). As an independent judge over a person's behavior it can also be called as witness to such agreement: "my conscience bears me witness . . ." (Rom 9:1; also 2 Cor 1:12; but not Rom 2:15, where conscience as a phenomenon bears witness). The conscience may, on the other hand, deliver a verdict of disagreement between behavior and norms (1 Cor 10:29b). In Paul the conscience pronounces its verdict on past behavior and also on future behavior (cf. Rom 2:15; 13:5; 1 Cor 8:10; 10:25-29). Conscience thus makes possible "objective" evaluation by oneself of one's behavior. Yet conscience is still an anthropological designation and does not refer to an "authority beyond man" (contra Bultmann, 1.219).

2.4. Conscience and Divine Judgment. Paul distinguishes the verdict of this human tribunal from God's own judgment.* The conscience operates only on the basis of internalized norms, but those norms may not match the standard of divine judgment. Indeed, they can err (e.g., because of lack of knowledge, or because of social pressure or custom [synētheia, cf. the secondary variant syneidēsei], 1 Cor 8:7), as Paul's call for the "renewal of your mind" (Rom 12:2) reminds us. The judgments of the conscience tell whether behavior is truly right in God's eyes only insofar as they are based on norms corresponding to God's will. In the final analysis, for Paul conscience is a neutral faculty and is ultimately only as right as are the norms it uses (which are right if they correspond to God's will). Judgment according to the norms of the conscience is not finally determinative. Only the Lord's judgment is: "I am conscious (synoida) of nothing against myself, but I am not thereby acquitted. Rather the one who judges me is the Lord" (1 Cor 4:4). Thus in Romans 9:1 Paul seeks to back up the testimony of his conscience with his references to Christ and the Spirit: "I am speaking the truth in Christ . . . ; my conscience bears me witness in the Holy Spirit." (But Paul by no means implies here that the conscience operates only under the rule of the Spirit, nor does 2 Corinthians 4:2 support the understanding of the conscience as a "divine voice," vox Dei; see Holy Spirit.)

2.5. Relative Value of Conscience. Paul thus relativizes the conscience in the light of divine judgment. Yet he ascribes to it independent (though relative) value. Paul believes that human beings ought to heed their conscience not only when the internalized norms by which it judges correspond to God's will (cf. Rom 13:5, "be subject . . . on account of conscience"; Maurer [915-16] discusses possible interpretations), but also when those norms neither correspond to nor contradict God's will. For Paul the "integrity" of a person—as the harmonious relationship between one's beliefs and practice—is a value in itself, and the conscience helps achieve such integrity and avoid dissonance.

2.6. "Weak" Conscience. Paul therefore wants to protect the conscience so it can continue to fulfill its function. The conscience of the "weak" (1 Cor 8:10-11; see Strong and Weak), who lack "knowledge" (1 Cor 8:7) and whose conscience thus operates according to faulty norms and can therefore also be described as "weak" (1 Cor 8:7, 12), may be "defiled" (1 Cor 8:7) and "wounded" (1 Cor 8:12) by the strong.* The example of the strong leads the weak to eat meat sacrificed to idols despite the fact that such behavior is not permitted according to their own norms. "Wounding (typtontes) the conscience" apparently suggests damage to the function of the conscience (it fails to preserve one's integrity, though its judgments themselves do not err) through encouragement to use alien norms for its evaluations. The expression "the conscience is defiled (molynetai)" more easily refers to the state of consciousness of those who reckon themselves to have become morally contaminated by eating meat offered to idols (similarly, Jewett, 425; see Food). H.-J. Eckstein (241) takes syneidēsis here to stand for the whole person (pars pro toto) and so sees not merely subjective but objective defilement and wounding of the person. The weak conscience should not be artificially "built up" (Paul says ironically, 1 Cor 8:10; cf. 8:1: "knowledge puffs up") through the adoption of alien norms so as to make judgments which result in people's behaving according to norms contrary to their real convictions. The same concern probably stands behind the injunction to the dinner guest, "don't eat!" on account of the conscience of the one who supplied the information that the meat served was sacrificed to idols (1 Cor 10:28-29; the informer is probably a weak Christian in danger of violating his or her convictions through an artificially built-up conscience).

When these things happen to the conscience there are negative consequences: the weak "stumbles" (1 Cor 8:13; cf. 8:9) and "is destroyed" (1 Cor 8:11). Sin is committed (the sin of acting contrary to one's convictions, Rom 14:23; but not the sin of idolatry, see Gundry Volf, 93) and regression in the Christian life occurs (including "grief" and self-condemnation instead of "peace* and joy*" and upbuilding, Rom 14:15-23). (The parallels with Rom 14 are close, though conscience is not mentioned there; see Bultmann, 1.220.) A properly functioning conscience, on the other hand, helps protect one from these objective and subjective setbacks.

2.7. Qualifications. Paul wants Christians to heed their conscience when it comes to matters where there is freedom for Christians to behave differently as in the case of sacrificial food, even when the conscience uses faulty norms. Paul's intention is to preserve the "integrity" of the person and avoid inner dissonance. He explicitly denies, however, that one person's conscience may judge another person's behavior in the case of matters where Christians disagree (adiaphora): "why should my freedom be judged by another's conscience?" (1 Cor 10:29b; personal "integrity" is not endangered by violation of another's conscience). (Nevertheless, Paul is willing that the trustworthiness of his apostolic conduct [but not the truth of the gospel*] be measured by the consciences of his converts, 2 Cor 4:2; 5:11.)

The conscience may give a positive verdict on a particular behavior as such, but that verdict does not suffice as a justification for engaging in that behavior (possibly against explicit Corinthian claims to the contrary). The "strong" ignore this truth when they eat meat offered to idols in the presence of the weak. Paul would probably say that the conscience's verdict on a particular behavior in a concrete situation must be heard, and that verdict must be based on all the applicable norms before one can engage in that behavior and claim conscience as a witness to its rightness. The green light may turn red when one gets to the intersection, and then one must put on the brakes. Love* and the glory* of God are the norms which determine whether the strong may exercise freedom in a given situation (1 Cor 8:1, 11-13; 10:31-33; cf. Rom 14:15-21).

3. Conscience in the Pastoral Letters.

3.1. "Good Conscience." In the Pastorals the Christian teacher and deacon should be characterized by a "good" (agathē, 1 Tim 1:5, 19), or "clean" (kathara, 1 Tim 3:9; 2 Tim 1:3), conscience. This use of syneidēsis with qualifying adjectives suggests not conscience as a tribunal but as a state of consciousness: consciousness of having behaved in agreement with given norms. Christian ministers must "keep a good conscience" and "keep the mystery of faith with a clean conscience" (1 Tim 1:19; 3:90), and Paul can be said to assert "I serve [God] with a clean conscience" (2 Tim 1:3; cf. Acts 23:1; 24:16). The good/clean conscience ranks alongside keeping faith* and practicing love as prime aims for Christian servants* (1 Tim 1:5, 19; 3:9).

*3.2. "Defiled Conscience." "Rejecting" (apōsamenoi) a good conscience and having a "defiled" (memiantai) and "seared" (kekaustēriasmenon) conscience characterize the false teachers in the Pastoral letters (1 Tim 1:19; 4:2; Tit 1:15). General immorality is apparently not in view, however, for they are not criticized as libertines (though as avaricious and contentious, 1 Tim 6:5; Tit 1:11) but as perpetrators of ascetic teaching (1 Tim 4:3). Their "purity" does not earn them a clean conscience, rather they are said to have "defiled" and "seared" consciences. These labels hardly describe their subjective consciousness—they were no doubt full of satisfaction not guilt (though Roloff, 221-22, suggests that "seared" alludes to the shame which they in fact cannot escape). Do the descriptions instead denote the state of consciousness which they should have because in reality they are "defiled," "detestable, disobedient, unfit for any good deed" (Tit 1:15-16)? We can ask further whether they paradoxically defile themselves by their asceticism (by rejecting what God "created good" and "to be received with thanksgiving," 1 Tim 4:3-4), or whether through their disguised moral faults they "deny [God] by their deeds" (Tit 1:16). Alternatively, should we take the defiled or seared conscience not as consciousness but as an inner judge between right and wrong which has become impaired, or as the brand-mark indicating Satan's* ownership of the false teachers (Kelly, 94)?

Appealing to Hebrews 10:22 and 1 Peter 3:21, some take syneidēsis in the Pastorals as synonymous with "heart," and the "good/clean conscience" as the result of forgiveness* of sins* and the end-time renewal of the heart (so Roloff, 68-70). Along the same line, the "seared" and "defiled conscience" could be identified with the unrenewed heart, and rejection of a good conscience with unbelief in the gospel, whether apostasy* (so Wolter, 217) or false profession might be in view. In any case, in the Pastorals the ideas of "keeping" and not "rejecting" a good conscience, and of "serving God" with a good conscience, relate conscience more to the imperative than to the indicative. Therefore even if we understand conscience here in the terms of "renewal . . . by the new creation in faith" (Maurer, 918), the interest of the Pastoral letters lies in the aspect of human responsibility, in particular, that of Christian ministers.

It is sometimes argued that the "good conscience" of the Pastorals is a support for a bourgeois Christian morality. But this interpretation would be possible only if the text were speaking of human responsibility to live in a Christian way. This view further assumes that the moral code of the Pastorals fits the popular ethos of their day. But W. D. Davies urges caution: "In the Pastorals also the Christian life is a battle and conscience is tied to faith" (676).

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; ETHICS; FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; LAW; LAW OF CHRIST; PSYCHOLOGY; STRONG AND WEAK.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955) 1.211-20; W. D. Davies, "Conscience," IDB 1.671-76; H.-J. Eckstein, Der Begriff Syneidēsis bei Paulus: Eine neutestamentlich-exegetische Untersuchung zum Gewissenbegriff (WUNT 2/10; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983); P. W. Gooch, " 'Conscience' in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10," NTS 33 (1987) 244-54; J. M. Gundry Volf, Paul and Perserverance: Staying in and Falling Away (WUNT 2/37; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990; Louisville: John Knox/Westminster, 1991) 85-97; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of Their Use in Conflict Settings (AGJU 10; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971) 402-46; J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); C. Maurer, "σύνοιδα, συνείδησις," TDNT VII.899-919; C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament (SBT 15; London: SCM, 1958); J. Roloff, Der erste Brief an Timotheus (EKK 15; Zürich: Benziger; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1988); C. Spicq, "La conscience dans le Nouveau Testament" RB 47 (1938) 50-80; J. Stelzenberger, Syneidēsis im Neuen Testament (Paderborn: Schöningh, 1961); W. L. Willis, Idol Meat in Corinth: The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10 (SBLDS 68; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1985); M. Wolter, "Gewissen" II, TRE 13.213-18.

J. M. Gundry-Volf

CONTENTMENT. See MYSTICISM; PHILOSOPHY; RICHES AND POVERTY.

CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL

One of the best known narratives in the NT is the story of Paul's conversion and call to be the apostle* to the Gentiles.* Scholars have often disagreed about whether this experience of Paul is best understood as a conversion or a call to a specific mission* as apostle to the Gentiles. References to Paul's conversion/call experience are found in Galatians 1, Philippians 3, Acts 9, Acts 22 and Acts 26.

1. History of the Interpretation of Paul's Conversion/Call
2. Accounts of Paul's Conversion/Call
3. Some Critical Questions

1. History of the Interpretation of Paul's Conversion/Call.

Several decades ago many biblical scholars would have agreed that Paul's remarkable experience on the road to Damascus was a paradigmatic instance of Christian conversion. Today many biblical scholars would describe the same experience as Paul's unique call to be apostle to the Gentiles. This shift in understanding has set the agenda for many recent studies of Paul's conversion/call.

The traditional way of understanding Paul's Damascus Road experience as a conversion has a long history in Western thought, going back to Augustine and his understanding of his own conversion. William James's psychological study of conversion was heavily dependent on this traditional view. James defined conversion as the process by which a person who struggles with a sense of guilt and inferiority becomes a person with a conscious sense of being right and unified as a consequence of achieving a firmer hold of religious realities. From this traditional perspective Paul's Damascus Road experience is seen as a prime example of conversion. A Pharisaic Jew* who is very conscious of his failure to keep the Law* experiences a profound inner change when it is revealed to him that he can be justified* by faith* in Jesus Christ. The Jewish persecutor becomes the Christian convert who preaches the message of justification by faith in Christ Jesus. Until quite recently, this understanding of Paul's conversion dominated biblical scholarship (see Nock, Stewart).

But in the past few decades this view of Paul's conversion has come under profound suspicion. The biblical scholar who is largely responsible for raising questions about the traditional way of understanding Paul's conversion is K. Stendahl in his book Paul

Among Jews and Gentiles (1976). Stendahl claims that the Western understanding of Paul owes more to the introspective readings of Augustine and Luther than it does to the NT documents. Paul's experience on the Damascus Road was not the inner experience of conversion which Western theology has taken for granted, nor was it a conversion from the works righteousness of Judaism. In fact, Paul's experience on the road to Damascus was not really a conversion at all, according to traditional definitions of conversion. Paul did not change religions nor did he suffer from an inner experience of guilt or despair. Stendahl suggests that Paul's experience is better understood as a call to be the apostle to the Gentiles. Because of this call he begins to ask questions about what happens to the Law now that the Messiah (see Christ) has come and what the Messiah's coming means for relationships between Jews and Gentiles. Paul arrives at a new view of the Law as he answers these questions, not as he struggles with the meaning of the Law in his own life. Paul's Damascus Road experience is part of his unique apostolic call and is not meant to be an example of a Christian conversion.

Stendahl's understanding of Paul's Damascus Road experience as a call and his challenge to traditional understandings of Paul's conversion have created a whole new set of questions for biblical scholars who study Paul's conversion/call: How are we to define conversion and how are modern definitions applied to Paul? Did Paul remain a Jew or did he change religions? Is his experience best understood as a call or a conversion? Is Paul's experience meant to be an example for Christians? How did Paul's conversion/call experience influence his theology? But even more importantly, Stendahl's challenge forced biblical scholars to return to the NT texts about Paul's conversion/call to answer these questions.

2. Accounts of Paul's Conversion/Call.

Accounts of Paul's conversion/call are found in two different places in the NT—Paul's letters and the book of Acts. Galatians 1:11-17 and Philippians 3:4-17 are two passages in which Paul writes about his conversion/call experience. In addition, 1 Timothy 1:12-17 and Romans 7 are sometimes considered autobiographical descriptions of this experience. Acts contains three different accounts of Paul's Damascus Road experience: Acts 9:1-20, 22:1-21 and 26:2-23. One of the issues involved in studying Paul's conversion/call is how to use the NT evidence. Historical research values the letters, which are Paul's own accounts of his experience, over Acts, which is a later interpretation of Paul from a particular perspective. So methodologically it seems best to start with the accounts in Paul's letters and then examine the Acts material. It is also important to ask how the accounts in the letters and Acts are related to each other (see Paul in Acts and Letters).

2.1. Galatians 1:11-17. The autobiographical references in Galatians 1:11-17 are part of Paul's defense of his gospel.* Many scholars see Paul's opponents* as Judaizers,* those who believed that Gentile Christians should keep the Law and be circumcised.* In Galatians Paul argues against these Judaizers and claims that, in Christ, Gentiles should not keep the Law or be circumcised. Paul makes his own experience a part of his argument in order to emphasize the revelatory nature of the Law-free gospel he preaches among the Gentiles.

The divine origin of the gospel Paul preaches (Gal 1:11-12) is also seen in the divine source of Paul's call (Gal 1:15-17). Paul's discussion of the revelation he received (Gal 1:15) is couched in the language of OT prophetic calls (cf. Jer 1:5; see Prophet, Paul as). Such language emphasizes Paul's role as one called to proclaim the word of God and points to the divine origin of the word that is proclaimed. The object of this divine revelation is Jesus Christ; this is the word of God that Paul is called to proclaim among the Gentiles (Gal 1:16). Although Paul relates almost nothing of the events surrounding this revelation he does report that subsequent to this experience he was not influenced by any human agency (Gal 1:16-17). Paul uses the experience of his conversion/call to show that his gospel to the Gentiles is rooted in divine revelation and divine calling (see Call, Calling).

It is in this context that Paul's mention of his earlier life in Judaism (Gal 1:14-15) needs to be understood. There is no human explanation for his experience; nothing prepared him for the revelation he received. The Jew who was so zealous for the traditions* of his ancestors that he persecuted those who believed in Christ is now the champion of a Law-free gospel for the Gentiles. The contrast between Paul's former life as a Jew and his new life as apostle to the Gentiles is seen as evidence for the divine origin of the gospel Paul preaches as apostle to the Gentiles.

2.2. Philippians 3:3-17. The occasion which calls forth Paul's autobiographical statements in Philippians 3:3-17 is not as clear as that of Galatians 1:1-17. But it is probable that Paul is again arguing against Judaizing tendencies in the church. This is suggested by the reference to those who mutilate the flesh* (Phil 3:2) and Paul's claim to be the true circumcision (Phil 3:3). Although Judaizing tendencies do not appear to be a major problem at Philippi, Paul uses his own life as an example of what it means to be the true circumcision. Paul sees his experience as a paradigmatic expression of the great contrast between life under the Law and the transforming grace* of the new life in Christ.

Paul is willing to compare himself with those who think they have reason for confidence in the flesh, for he has even better reasons for such confidence (Phil 3:4-6). Three of Paul's reasons for having confidence in the flesh are based on hereditary factors: he was born a Jew,* circumcised according to the Law and raised as a culturally pure, Hebrew-speaking Jew. Paul's personal convictions while a Jew also gave him reason to boast: his attitude toward the Law was that of the strict sect of the Pharisees, he was a zealous persecutor of the church and was blameless in his observance of the Law. Paul's background establishes him as one who is fully competent to judge any issue involving the Law.

But coming to know Christ Jesus brought about a reversal in Paul's life. His judgment on all these former advantages, everything that he considered gain, is that he now considers it loss (Phil 3:7-8). The result of the conversion/call experience in which Paul came to know Christ is a complete transformation. Being found in Christ means that Paul is no longer found in the Law (Phil 3:9). Now Paul's whole life is shaped by his sharing in Christ's death* and resurrection* (Phil 3:10-11). This process of being transformed in Christ is a continuing process in Paul's life as he responds to the call of God in Christ Jesus (Phil 3:12-14).

Because Paul's experience of conversion/call has resulted in a total transformation of his life, Paul sees his relation to his readers as that of a type to be imitated (Phil 3:15-17). This idea of himself as an example of the life in Christ is the underlying purpose of Paul's account of his experience in Philippians 3:3-17.

2.3. Other Pauline Accounts? Two other passages in the Pauline letters are often considered autobiographical accounts of Paul's conversion: 1 Timothy 1:12-16 and Romans 7:7-25.

1 Timothy 1:12-16 is clearly an account of Paul's conversion. But many scholars do not think Paul wrote 1 Timothy, and so its value as an autobiographical statement is questioned. In this passage, the contrast between Paul's former life and his life in Christ (see In Christ) is again strongly emphasized. But two aspects of this contrast are different from the passages in Philippians and Galatians 1. The first is that there is no mention of Judaism. The second difference is that Paul identifies himself as the foremost of sinners, a judgment Paul does not make in either of the other passages. However, just as it is in Philippians 3, the transformation in Paul's life is held up as an example to believers. Whether or not it is Pauline, this passage certainly represents the Pauline tradition and is useful as evidence of the way Paul's conversion/call experience was understood in the Gentile churches* Paul founded.

The autobiographical character of Romans 7:7-25 is not just disputed, it is the center of a major controversy in Pauline studies. The central issue is how the "I" of Romans 7:7-25 is to be understood. (For a historical summary of the various ways this "I" has been interpreted see Cranfield, 342-47.) Is Paul speaking of his personal experience, either as a Jew or a Christian? Is he speaking in a general way about Jewish, Christian or general human experience? Or is he using the "I" as a way of talking about the Law in a more general sense?

The traditional view of Paul's conversion/call usually understands this passage as Paul's autobiographical account of his pre-Christian experience as a Jew. Romans 7:7-25 is seen as evidence of Paul's feelings of guilt and inferiority as a Jew because he is unable to keep the Law perfectly. But this reading of Romans 7:7-25 is directly contradictory to Paul's statements in Galatians 1 and Philippians 3 about his life as a Jew. So most historical scholars now reject this possibility. Instead they usually understand this passage as Paul examining the Law from a Christian perspective in a general sense; the "I" represents his deep personal involvement in the issue of the Law. A. F. Segal offers a different and compelling interpretation of Romans 7:7-25. He suggests that Paul is describing Jewish-Christian experience with the Law after conversion. Paul uses "I" because he speaks as a Jewish-Christian for Jewish-Christians. The struggle with the Law is a struggle no Christian can win as long as observance of the Law is a serious option in the Christian community. A Law-free gospel is the only solution. Thus Romans 7:7-25 is a description of the personal struggle experienced by any Jewish-Christian who tries to keep the Law as a Christian.

Given the multiplicity of readings of Romans 7:7-25 and the lack of direct biographical information in the text, it seems best not to consider this passage as an account which refers to Paul's conversion/call.

2.4. The Acts Accounts. Paul's letters give us little information about the actual conversion/call event. Instead the Pauline accounts reflect the radical change in Paul's values and commitments when he received a revelation of Christ. But the three accounts in Acts focus on the events surrounding the conversion/call. The fact that the conversion/call account occurs three times suggests that this event has major significance for Luke's narrative. The first account, in Acts 9:1-20, is told as part of the historical narrative; the other accounts, in Acts 22:1-21 and 26:2-23, are contained in Paul's speeches before the Jews and King Agrippa. There has been a tendency in NT scholarship to isolate these conversion/call narratives from the rest of Acts and then to compare them with Paul's accounts. However, it is important to see these passages in their context in Acts. Luke uses them to show the progress of the church from a Jewish to a Gentile community and to justify the Pauline mission* to the Gentiles. Because of Luke's definite apologetic stance, some scholars question the historical reliability of the Acts accounts. It is true that Luke does not have first-hand knowledge of the conversion/call event. But he does have the advantage of a historical perspective and may be able to see the importance of Paul's conversion/call in ways that Paul himself could not.

The events of Acts 9:1-19 mark a major turning point in the narrative of Acts. Here Luke takes a piece of historical storytelling and describes an event of crucial importance for the Christian mission. The story of Paul's dramatic conversion/call is placed just before the story of Cornelius and introduces the beginning of the mission to the Gentiles. At the beginning of Acts 9 Paul is presented as the persecutor of the church, who completely opposes the disciples of the Lord. But as he pursues the disciples to Damascus, his journey is interrupted. Jesus appears to Paul in a vision. The blinding light, the double vocative ("Saul, Saul"), Saul's falling to the ground and the questions he asks clearly mark this extraordinary event as a theophany, similar to the theophanies of prophetic calls. Paul emerges from this experience a different person, but he has not yet received his call. That call comes through a disciple at Damascus, one of the people Paul had been persecuting. The fact that the call comes in a separate vision gives it greater emphasis, but it is still part of the same event. The new description of Saul given through Ananias, indicates that Saul is a "chosen vessel" and has been picked for a particular role. The very name he has persecuted he will now bear before the Gentiles, kings and the people of Israel and will suffer* for its sake. This call is far more than a call which belongs to any believer; it is an apostolic commissioning. Although the Acts 9:1-19 account certainly presents Paul as a person who has experienced a dramatic reversal in his life, it emphasizes his call to be apostle to the Gentiles more than the change in his life.

Acts 22:1-21 and Acts 26:2-23 tell the same basic story but have a different emphasis and seem to be serving a different purpose in the Acts narrative. Both speeches draw attention to Paul's relationship to Judaism and may reflect controversy between Jews and Christians about the validity of the Gentile mission. This emphasis on Paul's relationship to Judaism is especially evident in Acts 22:1-21, where Paul is presented as a pious and loyal Jew. In fact, most of the differences between Acts 9 and Acts 22 can be accounted for by the emphasis on Paul as a devout Jew. This is particularly clear in Paul's report of his commissioning. Here Ananias is also presented as a devout Jew and the call is couched in language acceptable to Jewish sensibilities. The call to go to the Gentiles is not given by Ananias but by Jesus himself in another vision* during a time when Paul is praying in the Temple.* Here there is no doubt that it is the mission to the Gentiles that is the problem for Jewish/Christian relations. When Paul claims that the call to go to the Gentiles came in the Temple, his Jewish listeners create an uproar.

Acts 26:2-23 has an only slightly different emphasis. Here Paul emphasizes his obedience to his call. It is in this passage that the expression "It hurts you to kick against the goads" appears. Even though many interpreters have seen this as a reference to Paul's inner struggle before his conversion, it more probably refers to his future task and the cost of obeying the call he is about to receive. This phrase indicates that the call of Christ will constrain Paul and conform his whole life to the goal of making Christ known among the Gentiles.

Luke has one tradition about Paul's conversion/call which he uses in different ways to further his purposes in the Acts narrative. Paul is the driving force behind Christianity's Gentile mission and Luke uses Paul's conversion/call experience to justify that mission and the Gentile Christianity it produced.

2.5. Paul's Conversion/Call in the NT. Comparing the Acts account of Paul's conversion/call with Paul's own accounts is not as straightforward a task as it might appear. Paul is making comments about his life as he writes letters to various churches. Luke is telling a story with an overarching narrative purpose. Even though historical research values the letters over Acts, the Acts material is essential to understanding the events surrounding Paul's conversion/call experience. What are the major similarities and differences between the material in Acts and Paul's own accounts?

It is important to note that all five accounts of Paul's conversion/call occur in contexts where the relationship between Judaism and Christianity is an issue. In Acts the validity of the Gentile mission is at stake; in Galatians 1, and probably Philippians 3 as well, the validity of Paul's Law-free gospel is the issue. In these contexts the revelatory nature of Paul's conversion/call is stressed.

Paul's former life as a zealous Jew and persecutor of the church and his transformation into a follower of Christ is an important part of all five passages. This theme of the contrast between Paul's former and present life is especially prominent in the autobiographical passages in Galatians 1 and Philippians 3. This strong sense of contrast is one of the arguments for seeing 1 Timothy 1 and Romans 7 also as autobiographical.

All three Acts passages and Galatians 1 describe a call to proclaim Christ to the Gentiles as part of the revelatory experience. But it is noteworthy that Philippians 3 does not even hint at a special apostolic call. Instead, Paul speaks of a general "heavenly call of God in Christ Jesus." Why is a perspective that is so prominent in the other accounts entirely absent from the Philippians 3 account? Perhaps since Paul's Gentile mission and his gospel* to the Gentiles is not being immediately threatened, he does not need to stress the divine origin of his gospel. Another possible explanation is that since Paul is stressing his role as an example to be imitated, he doesn't mention a part of his experience that is so obviously unique to him. If 1 Timothy 1 is taken as genuinely Pauline, another possibility emerges. As the Gentile mission became established and Paul needed to justify his gospel less frequently, Paul himself saw the transformation of his life as the most important part of his experience and understood being an example of the transforming grace of Christ as an integral part of his apostolic role.

The differences between Luke's and Paul's accounts of the conversion/call are rooted in their different purposes. Luke wants to show the progress of the church from the Jewish to the Gentile community; Paul is concerned with his relationship as apostle to the Gentile communities he has founded. But Paul and Luke ultimately understood Paul's conversion/call in similar ways. Both are concerned with the relationship between Jew and Gentile and see Paul's call as apostle to the Gentiles as an important factor in that relationship. Both see Paul's conversion/call as a revelatory and transforming event in Paul's life and the life of the church. And both Paul and Luke see Paul's experience as a model of the transforming grace of God for the church. These similarities make it possible to speak of the NT understanding of Paul's conversion/call experience.

3. Some Critical Questions.

The questions which biblical scholarship addresses to the NT text often challenge traditional assumptions about the text. This is especially true of the questions scholars ask about Paul's conversion/call experience. Not only has Stendahl challenged traditional Western understandings of Paul's experience, but other scholars have challenged Stendahl's interpretation. These challenges have resulted in several critical questions which need to be addressed in any study of Paul's conversion/call experience. The answers to these several questions are all related to the major issue. Is Paul's experience better understood as a conversion or a call?

3.1. Defining Conversion. If the term conversion is to be useful in understanding Paul, it needs to be defined. As Stendahl pointed out, Western definitions of conversion have been strongly influenced by Augustine's and Luther's views of Paul's conversion. These views of conversion dominated early psychological research, which tended to focus on dramatic conversion and understood conversion as a solution to unbearable sin* and guilt. Social scientists as well as biblical scholars have questioned this definition of conversion and have tried to offer models that are more useful to those who seek to understand conversion from either a theological or social-scientific perspective.

Most recent studies of conversion have taken a sociological approach and defined conversion as a person transferring from one community to another (see Social-Scientific Approaches). Such studies also point out that the main characteristic of converts is a predisposition to reinterpret their past from the perspective of their new communities. Conversion represents a conscious choice to socialize to a new group and accept the reality structure of that group (see Berger and Luckmann, 144-50). The analogies between this sociological definition of conversion and Paul's experience are striking. Paul came from a Pharisaic community and entered a community that included Gentiles. This new community helped him understand his revelatory experience and reinterpret his past. This reinterpretation of his past as a Pharisee is evident in Paul's autobiographical accounts in Galatians 1 and Philippians 3; Paul's statements about his past are greatly influenced by his present commitments.

Helpful as these modern sociological definitions are, we need to be careful in applying them to Paul's experience. We simply do not have enough historical data on Paul for an adequate psychological or sociological analysis. We need to be careful not to reduce Paul's unique experience to a formula or let modern studies define his experience. But we can use modern categories to illuminate certain aspects of his experience for us.

3.2. Did Paul Change Religions? Did Paul remain a Jew even after he changed communities? According to a sociological definition of conversion, this would be entirely possible and would answer one of Stendahl's objections to calling Paul's experience a conversion. Stendahl asserts that Paul did not really change religions. He had a new calling, but still served the same God; as a Jew, he was to bring God's message to the Gentiles. His experience led not to a new religion, but to a new understanding of the Law in relation to the Gentiles. When Paul was transformed by his experience, Christianity was not yet defined as a different religion from Judaism, so it might be best to say that Paul changed communities within Judaism.

But this reading of Paul fails to take into account the radical nature of Paul's reinterpretation of Judaism. His claim that Gentiles did not have to be circumcised to enter the Christian community was more than a minor reinterpretation of the Law. In addition, he claimed that he received this new understanding of the Law in a revelatory event that changed his life. These claims got him into trouble even within the Christian community. Comparing Paul to the Pharisaic Christians of Acts 15 and Galatians 2, who wanted Gentile Christians to be circumcised, shows how radical his reinterpretation of Judaism was. Paul left the Pharisaic community and was completely rejected by that community. Paul's claim in Philippians 3:7-8 that he regards his Jewish reasons for confidence as "rubbish" indicates a complete break with his Jewish past. Although the Acts accounts of Paul's experience present him as a devout Jew, they also indicate that Paul's life and values were radically changed by his Damascus Road experience and that he was uncompromising in his insistence that Gentiles need not be circumcised. If Paul's entering the Christian community involved such a radical reorientation of his life and his religious values, it seems misleading to assert that Paul remained a Jew with a new calling. Paul may indeed have thought of himself as a Jew throughout his entire life. But he also insisted on a reinterpretation of Torah so radical that it eventually created a new pattern of religion.

3.3. Conversion or Call? In many ways the question of whether Paul's Damascus Road experience was a call or a conversion is an artificial one. The question itself seems to impose modern categories on ancient descriptions of a complex religious event. But asking the question also allows us to realize that Paul's experience is far too rich to fit neatly into any of our categories. It is both call and conversion. So when we ask if Paul's experience is a call or a conversion, we are not only asking which term best describes Paul's experience, we are also asking whether any single term can do justice to that event.

Paul's call to be the apostle to the Gentiles is central to the accounts in Acts and Galatians 1. But it seems much more important in the Acts accounts, which are seeking to justify the mission to the Gentiles, than it does in Paul's accounts. Paul mentions it in defense of his gospel in Galatians 1, but there is no mention at all of an apostolic call in Philippians 3. This would suggest that Paul himself did not understand his revelatory experience primarily as a call, even though his call to be apostle to the Gentiles was certainly part of that experience. Those who see Paul's experience primarily as a call are probably being more influenced by Luke and his purposes than by Paul's own interpretation of his experience.

The central theme of the autobiographical passages in Galatians 1 and Philippians 3 is the contrast between Paul's former life in Judaism and his present life in Christ. In Philippians 3 Paul claims that this contrast is due to the transforming character of his experience of knowing Christ. This same contrast is also found in all three Acts accounts. Does this evidence of a profound change in Paul's life mean that the Damascus Road experience is best understood as a conversion? The answer to this question depends on how conversion is defined.

The traditional Western understanding of conversion, when imposed on the NT texts, leads to a distorted understanding of Paul's experience. This view of conversion sees Paul as a Jew who struggles with guilt over his failure to keep the Law. Paul says that he was "as to righteousness* under the Law, blameless" (Phil 3:6). It also sees Paul's conversion as an experience of being justified by faith rather than an experience of knowing Christ and being called to proclaim him to the Gentiles. Although this is not a serious distortion of the NT texts, it is still an example of trying to fit Paul into traditional Protestant categories rather than trying to understand the complexities of Paul's experience.

Sociological definitions of conversion seem to be more consistent with the NT descriptions of Paul's experience. If conversion results in a change of communities and a reinterpretation of one's past life, Paul's experience certainly qualifies as a conversion. Even though sociological definitions of conversion do not distort Paul's experience, they do not really do justice to it either. Paul's experience had a powerful revelatory dimension to it and Paul claims that both his experience and the gospel he received were of divine origin. The event which caused him to change communities was a call to be apostle to the Gentiles and the event which caused him to re-evaluate his life was a direct revelation of Christ. Social-scientific definitions of conversion cannot describe these revelatory elements in Paul's conversion experience.

No single term seems to be able to describe the complexities of Paul's Damascus Road experience. Because strong contrasts are part of every account of Paul's experience, it certainly qualifies as some sort of conversion experience. But it is also important to include the revelatory dimensions of Paul's experience and recognize it as an experience of call. In other words, Paul's call to be apostle to the Gentiles is part of a profound and transforming conversion experience. Call and conversion are both aspects of a divine revelation of Christ to Paul. The changes in Paul's life and his mission to the Gentiles are the results of this profound experience of knowing Christ.

3.4. Paul's Experience as a Model for Christians. To what extent is Paul's Damascus Road experience meant to be a model for Christians? In Philippians 3:17 Paul urges his readers to "join in imitating me, and observe those who live according to the example you have in us" (see Imitation). What aspects of his experience is Paul urging his readers to imitate? In answering this question it is important to maintain a distinction between the call and conversion aspects of Paul's experience.

It is interesting that the only passage referring to Paul's Damascus Road experience in which Paul urges his readers to follow his example is the passage in which no mention of his apostolic call is made. There is no indication that Paul ever suggested that anyone imitate him in his role as apostle to the Gentiles. In fact, there is every indication in Galatians 1—2 that Paul saw his call as unique and that he zealously defended his unique mission and perspective. The Acts accounts also present him as the apostle to the Gentiles and give him credit for the early church's Gentile mission. This is why scholars like Stendahl, who see Paul's experience primarily as a call, are suspicious of attempts to make Paul's experience normative for the church.

So what does Paul mean when he urges his readers to "join in imitating me"? In Philippians 3 Paul is reflecting on his personal experience of knowing Christ. Paul discusses knowing Christ in such a way that it can only be something gained in the process of being transformed. All Christians must be part of the community of those being transformed by Christ if they are truly to know Christ. In Philippians 3:14 Paul says that this transformation continues as he follows the "call of God in Christ Jesus." Here Paul is not talking about his apostolic call but about the call to be transformed—one that is addressed to all believers. Being transformed involves "forgetting what lies behind" and "straining forward to what lies ahead." So the dynamic of this transformation is very similar to the dynamic of conversion, in which one completely rethinks the past in the light of present commitments. Paul shares with the Philippian community the "call of God in Christ Jesus" and the experience of being transformed by that call. All Christians must be part of the community of those being transformed by Christ if they are to truly know Christ. When Paul urges the Philippians to imitate him, he is urging them to join him in responding to that call and allowing Christ to transform their lives. Knowing Christ has led to a total transformation of Paul's life and values. It is this experience of being transformed by Christ that Paul urges his readers to imitate.

3.5. Paul's Experience and His Theology. Most scholars either ignore the issue of Paul's experience and dismiss it as irrelevant or see it as the key to understanding Paul's theology. But those who think Paul's conversion/call affects his theology are not in agreement on exactly what influence the experience might have had. A great deal of this lack of agreement stems from the different ways Paul's experience is understood. Those who see it as a call think it has a very different influence on his theology from those who see it as a conversion.

The traditional view of Paul's conversion, which sees it as an experience of being justified by faith, also views the center of Paul's theology as the doctrine of justification* by faith (see Center). Paul arrives at his view of the Law because of his struggle with the Law as a Jew and his subsequent experience of being freed by Christ from this struggle. He rejects the "works-righteousness" of Judaism in favor of the Christian way of justification by faith. Although most biblical scholars no longer define Paul's conversion in the traditional way, this view of the relationship between Paul's experience and his theology is still presented in modified forms (see Theissen, 177-265).

Those who see Paul's experience as a call have a very different view of the relationship of this experience to Paul's theology. For these scholars, the center of Paul's theology lies in his call as apostle to the Gentiles (so, partly, Sanders). This call created questions about the Law for Paul: If Gentiles are now included in the people of God, do they have to keep the Law? What happens to the Law now that the Messiah has come? What does this mean for Jew-Gentile relations and the place of Gentiles in the church? Paul arrived at his view of the Law from answering these questions, not from his experience of the Law before or after his call (see Stendahl, Munck, Dunn).

In recent years scholars who understand Paul's experience as a conversion have linked it to his theology in ways that are quite different from the traditional "justification by faith" model. These scholars think that all of Paul's theology, not just his doctrine of justification by faith, is derived from his Damascus Road experience.

S. Kim takes seriously Paul's claim to have received his gospel "through a revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal 1:12) and argues that Paul's conversion experience on the Damascus road was the source for both his apostolic call and his theological understanding of the gospel. Paul's christology comes from his recognition that the glory of God was revealed in the face of Christ (2 Cor 4:6). This revelation leads to Paul's proclamation of salvation* as a present reality which will be consummated at the eschaton, when the glory* of Christ will be fully visible (see Newman). This Christ is the embodiment of God's plan of salvation that includes both Jews and Gentiles; Christ is the end of the Law.* This is why Paul surrendered his righteousness based on the Law to receive God's righteousness, which is based on faith in Christ. This experience of the reconciling grace of God allowed Paul to develop his distinctive doctrine of the atoning death of Christ as God reconciling (see Peace, Reconciliation) the world to himself through Christ. Seeing this glorified Christ as the image of God who has restored the divine image* and glory lost by Adam* led directly to Paul's conception of believers being conformed to the image of Christ and becoming a new creation.* In other words, Paul really did receive his gospel as part of his conversion experience and all of his theology is derived directly from that experience.

A. F. Segal makes a very strong case for the close connection between Paul's conversion experience, understood from a sociological perspective as a change of communities, and his theology. Paul's understanding of the Law comes from both his conversion experience and his subsequent experience in the Gentile church. Paul's legal principle in Romans 7:4, that those who have died with Christ are dead to the Law, is a metaphor for his own conversion. His experience of radical change led to a radical new evaluation of the Law. Much of his theology of the Law-free gospel was formed in battles with Jewish Christians about the role of the Law in Gentile-Christian communities. Paul's understanding of transformation, which is the result of his conversion experience, plays a crucial role in his understanding of Christian community. All Christians must be part of an evolving, transformed, redeemed community and all who are members of that community are equally members of Christ. In fact all of Paul's theology can ultimately be traced to his experience of conversion: "Having begun with his own personal experience, Paul thereafter expands his theory not simply to involve his own salvation, and the salvation of the Gentiles, but also the entire history of humanity, from Adam to the eschaton" (Segal, 183). Since Paul's life, as well as much of his writings, embodied the solution to the issues facing the earliest church, Christianity received the influence of his personality and was seen as a community of converts. Paul's conversion not only influenced his theology, it defined Christianity.

See also APOSTLE; CALL, CALLING; JEW, PAUL THE; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; MYSTICISM; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PROPHET, PAUL AS; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Berger and T. Luckmann, The Social Construction of Reality: A Treatise on the Sociology of Knowledge (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); H. D. Betz, Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); M. Bouttier, Christianity According to Paul (Naperville, IL: Alec R. Allenson, 1966); C. E. D. Cranfield, Romans: I-VIII (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975); J. D. G. Dunn, " 'A Light to the Gentiles': The Significance of the Damascus Road Christophany for Paul," in Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); B. R. Gaventa, From Darkness to Light: Aspects of Paul's Conversion in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1971); W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience (New York: Collier MacMillan, 1961); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); G. Lohfink, The Conversion of St. Paul: Narrative and History in Acts (Chicago: Franciscan Herald, 1976); R. P. Martin, The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959); J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1977); C. Newman, Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); A. D. Nock, Conversion: The Old and New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo (Oxford: Oxford University, 1933); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (New Haven: Yale University, 1990); K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); J. S. Stewart, A Man in Christ: The Vital Elements of St. Paul's Religion (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1935); G. Theissen, Psychological Aspects of Pauline Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987).

J. M. Everts

CONVERTS. See COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES.

CORINTH. See CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE.

CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE

1 and 2 Corinthians represent at least two of the four or more letters that Paul wrote to his church in Corinth together with the churches in the region of Achaia which surrounded this important Roman city (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1; cf. Rom 16:1). As its founder (cf. 1 Cor 4:14-15; 2 Cor 10:13-14), Paul knew well the church's history, character and problems. 1 Corinthians provides the most detailed example within the Pauline corpus of the way in which Paul applied his theological convictions, especially his christology* and eschatology,* to the practical issues facing the church. In contrast, due to the circumstances which later developed in Corinth with the arrival of Paul's opponents,* 2 Corinthians contains Paul's most sustained apologetic for his apostolic authority* of any of the Pauline letters. In addition, both letters deal with the collection for the saints in Jerusalem, which was so important to Paul (cf. 1 Cor 16:1-9; 2 Cor 8—9; see Collection).

1. The Contents of 1 Corinthians
2. The Contents of 2 Corinthians
3. The City and Its Citizens
4. The Church and Its Apostle
5. Some Critical Questions
6. Theological Themes of 1 and 2 Corinthians

1. The Contents of 1 Corinthians.

1.1. The Salutation. Paul's salutation in 1 Corinthians 1:1-3 is typical of ancient letters in that it first identifies the sender and then the recipients, after which a greeting is extended. Paul's salutation in 1 Corinthians is distinct, however, in that he expands both the identification of the sender (Paul and Sosthenes) and the recipients (to the church in Corinth, "together with all those who are calling upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place," 1 Cor 1:2). On the one hand, joint authorship of an ancient letter is rare. We are not sure who Sosthenes was (cf. the same name in Acts 18:17 for the ruler of the synagogue in Corinth), or what contribution he made in writing the letter, for as 1 Corinthians unfolds it becomes clear that Paul alone is speaking. Moreover, Paul's position as "an apostle of Christ Jesus" is clearly distinguished from that of Sosthenes, who is identified merely as "our brother" (1 Cor 1:1). On the other hand, this is the most extensive elaboration of the recipients found among Paul's letters. In it Paul indicates that he views the church in Corinth to be the center of a cluster of house churches in the surrounding area.

But what is most striking in the salutation are the two supporting clauses which give the general reason both for Paul's writing (i.e., because he has been called by the will of God to be an apostle of Christ Jesus), and for his writing to the Corinthians (i.e., because they too have been called to be "saints" as those "set apart" or "sanctified in Christ Jesus"). In both cases the focus on Christ* in the salutation points forward to the christological foundation of Paul's arguments in 1 Corinthians. The prayer*/wish in 1 Corinthians 1:3, "grace (charis) . . . to you," is a Christianized form and expansion of the typical greeting used in ancient letters: "greetings (chairein) to you."

1.2. The Opening Thanksgiving. Again according to his normal custom, Paul follows his salutation with a thanksgiving for his church in 1 Corinthians 1:4-9 (see Benediction). More than merely a spontaneous expression of personal praise, the thanksgiving introduces the central theme of the letter as a whole (see Letters). Despite the Corinthians' current problems, Paul begins by expressing his gratitude to God* for the sufficiency of their spiritual gifts* (i.e., the concrete expression of the "grace"* of God given to them), since Paul is thereby assured that God has irrevocably called the Corinthians and will therefore sustain them faithfully until judgment* day. Hence, the problem in Corinth is not their spiritual gifts per se, but their attitude toward and use of them (cf. 1 Cor 12—14). As will become clear, the Corinthians are boasting in the very calling and gifts (= grace) for which God alone is to be thanked (cf. 1 Cor 1:26-31; 4:7).

1.3. Responses to Reports About Corinth. 1 Corinthians 1:10 begins the body of Paul's letter and introduces the first major section, which runs from 1 Corinthians 1:10 to 6:20. This section contains Paul's responses to the issues which he has heard about from "Chloe's people" (1 Cor 1:11, i.e., a certain group, most likely from Ephesus, in contact with the Corinthian situation) and from other oral reports (1 Cor 5:1; cf. 16:15-18). In this first major section Paul also attempts to clear up the Corinthians' misunderstanding of his earlier correspondence (1 Cor 5:9, 11).

In the first unit within this section (1 Cor 1:10—6:20), Paul deals with the causes of and the solution to the dissension and rivalry that has developed between some of the Corinthians based on their loyalty to various Christian leaders, including Paul himself (to posit actual divisions or "parties" within the church is too strong a reading of 1 Cor 1:10-12). The many attempts to ascertain the origin and distinctive theological perspective of those who claimed to belong to Paul, Apollos,* Cephas (see Peter) and, more generally, to Christ (1 Cor 1:12) have not been successful. The attempt to read this text as evidence for a pervasive conflict within the early church between Peter, representing the Jewish Christians, and Paul, representing the Gentiles,* as first championed by F. C. Baur, has also failed (see Paul and His Interpreters).

What can be said with confidence is that the root of the problem was the Corinthian addiction to the power, prestige and pride represented in the Hellenistic rhetorical* tradition, with its emphasis on the glory of human wisdom and attainment and its corresponding flagrant and flamboyant lifestyle. It is this Hellenistic "wisdom of the word" (1 Cor 1:17, 20, 26; 2:1; 3:19) that Paul combats by calling attention to the contrary "wisdom"* and "power"* of God as manifested first in the cross* of Christ (1 Cor 1:18-25), then in the calling of the Corinthians themselves (1 Cor 1:26-31), and finally in the intentional nature of Paul's own ministry* and apostolic way of life (1 Cor 2:1-5; 4:1-13).

Yet since "the word of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing" (1 Cor 1:18; cf. 2:14), only those whose hearts have been transformed by the work of the Spirit will be able to accept the true wisdom and power of God as revealed in the gospel* (1 Cor 1:20-24; 2:6-16). Paul therefore warns the Corinthians that their boasting in themselves and in their various spiritual leaders is a dangerous sign that the Spirit is not prevailing in their lives, since they are acting like those who are still "natural" or "unspiritual" (1 Cor 2:14—3:4). Should such an attitude and its behavior continue, they too will thus find themselves under the judgment of God, who will destroy the wisdom of this world* and all those who work to destroy the church* as the temple* of the Spirit, built on the foundation of the cross of Christ (1 Cor 1:19-20; 3:10-23). The Corinthians must consequently repent of their boasting, recognize that everything they have is a gift, and follow in the pattern of their own apostle, whose life of weakness* and suffering manifests both the power of the kingdom* of God and the reality of the cross (1 Cor 1:31; 2:3-5; 4:6-13, 14-21).

The same arrogance and spiritual competition based on one's spiritual gifts and leaders, which some Corinthians had wed to a boasting in the achievements of Hellenistic wisdom (1 Cor 1:10—4:21), had also manifested itself in flagrant immorality within the church and in lawsuits* between fellow believers (cf. 1 Cor 5:2, 6; 6:9). In 1 Corinthians 5:1—6:20 Paul now addresses these problems and their underlying causes.

In the first case Paul responds by exercising his own authority. With the cooperation and consent of the Corinthian church, he disciplines* the man who is living with his father's wife with excommunication for the sake of his ultimate restoration (1 Cor 5:3-5). Paul then proceeds to make it clear that one's new position in and worship* of Christ demand a corresponding purity and separation, not from the world, but within the world (1 Cor 5:6-13), since "the unrighteous will not inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor 6:9). The Corinthians' present status of having been justified* and sanctified (see Holiness) in Christ must work itself out in a corresponding life of growing obedience to the demands of God, for they are the temple of God's own Spirit (1 Cor 6:11, 12-20). Though all things are "lawful" for the believer, the Spirit does not free one from the call to holiness in this age; it frees one for it (1 Cor 6:12).

In the midst of this discussion, Paul addresses the fact that the Corinthians are taking their disputes to the secular courts for arbitration. Here too the Corinthians' spirituality* ought to equip them to express God's wisdom, rather than allowing them to capitulate to the world, especially when they are being equipped as God's people to share in God's ultimate judgment of the world (1 Cor 6:1-6). And in the event that no settlement can be reached, those who are spiritual ought to be willing and able to suffer wrong unjustly for the sake of Christ (1 Cor 6:7-8). As 1 Corinthians 8:1—11:1 and 1 Corinthians 13 will make clear, this is the true way of Christ-like love* and the true expression of one's spiritual power, maturity and giftedness.

1.4. Responses to the Letter from Corinth. Beginning with 1 Corinthians 7:1, Paul turns his attention to the issues concerning which the Corinthians have recently written to Paul for clarification of his views and their implications. Paul's treatment of these matters constitutes the second major section of the letter, which extends to 1 Corinthians 16:12 (cf. the repeated use of the "concerning" formula in 1 Cor 7:1; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1; 16:12).

In 1 Corinthians 7:1-40 Paul discusses marriage* and celibacy. Here he is mindful of the tensions and anxieties caused by living in an evil age between the first and second comings of Christ (1 Cor 7:25-35), and of the God-given physical and emotional needs and desires of his people (1 Cor 7:1-5, 36-38). The basis of Paul's instruction is once again the determinative role that the calling and gifting of God play in one's life (cf. 1 Cor 7:15, 17-24 with 1:26-31). And here again, though Paul himself prefers being single as the way of life most suited to serving God (cf. 1 Cor 7:8, 32-34, 38), the goal is to live, whether married, widowed or single, in the kind of devotion to the Lord that corresponds to God's work in one's life and reflects God's character (cf. 1 Cor 7:19-20, 35).

In 1 Corinthians 8:1—11:1 Paul confronts the problems that have arisen due to the fact that the more knowledgeable within the church are eating food* which has been sacrificed in a pagan temple. These individuals have come to understand that idols* do not actually exist (1 Cor 8:4-6). But their behavior has become a stumbling block for those who do not yet share this understanding, defiling their weaker consciences and destroying their faith (1 Cor 8:7, 9, 11-12). Paul considers such disregard for the disposition of others, based on one's own rights and knowledge, to be a sin not only against them but against Christ himself. Those who truly know God and are known by him will employ their freedom* and knowledge* for the sake of building up others in their faith, even when this entails denying one's own legitimate rights as a believer (1 Cor 8:1-3; 13). This is the "love that builds up," rather than knowledge alone, which merely "makes one arrogant" (1 Cor 8:1).

To support his point Paul illustrates this principle of love by pointing to his own decision to support himself financially while in Corinth (1 Cor 9:1-27; see Tentmaking). Although the Corinthians accepted Paul as an apostle (1 Cor 9:1-2), others criticized him for not exercising his legitimate apostolic right to financial support (1 Cor 9:3-14; see Financial Support) even when this meant much undue hardship and suffering* on Paul's part (cf. 1 Cor 4:11-13). Paul's answer is that he has given up his rights as an apostle for the sake of the progress of the gospel and for the reward God has promised for such acts of love (1 Cor 9:15-18). Paul thus makes himself "a slave to all, that [he] might win the more" (1 Cor 9:19) even though he is free to do as it is appropriate in Christ. This is the training in love that all must engage in, who, like Paul, are called to persevere in self-control in order to pursue the prize of the gospel (1 Cor 9:23- 27).

In chapter ten Paul goes on to warn the Corinthians of what will happen if they too fail to persevere in love, and misuse their knowledge and experience as an excuse for continual immorality and evil (cf. 1 Cor 10:11-12). Like Israel in the wilderness, they will be destroyed (1 Cor 10:1-10). Indeed, God has provided a way of escape from overwhelming temptation, so that there is no excuse for not enduring in the love that is produced by genuine faith (1 Cor 10:13). As an example of this Paul gives theological parameters and practical advice for dealing with the temptation to partake of food offered to idols. This temptation was common among the Corinthians in general, for whom it was a common social practice to eat in the precincts of a pagan temple (see Idolatry). But Paul warns of the inherent spiritual dangers, arguing that even if an idol is "nothing," those who partook of food offered to idols were partaking of the table of demons* (1 Cor 10:14-30). Finally, Paul returns once again to his own apostolic lifestyle of not seeking his own advantage but living to please others for Christ's sake (1 Cor 10:31-32). Here too this is an example for the Corinthians themselves, calling them once more to be "imitators" of him, as he is of Christ (1 Cor 11:1; cf. 4:16; see Imitation).

In 1 Corinthians 11:2-34 and 1 Corinthians 12—14 Paul turns his attention to three matters concerning Christlike behavior in worship*: (1) the relationship between men and women in worship as expressed in the cultural practice of women wearing veils (1 Cor 11:2-16 [see Man and Woman]; unlike his response to the following two problems, Paul here praises the Corinthians and merely writes to give them a theological grounding for their practice), (2) the setting up of class distinctions during the celebration of the Lord's Supper* as an abuse of its very meaning (1 Cor 11:17-34), and (3) the proper use of prophecy* and tongues* in worship (1 Cor 14:1-40) against the backdrop of the significance of spiritual gifts* in general (1 Cor 12:1-31).

In view of Paul's arguments thus far in 1 Corinthians it is not surprising that in each of these cases Paul's approach is to make it clear that true spirituality and giftedness are not compatible with arrogant boasting and competition based on one's place in the body of Christ (see Body of Christ) or in society, or with parading one's gifts before others (cf. 1 Cor 11:18-22; 12:14-26; 14:6-12). Genuine spirituality manifests itself in mutual interdependence and complementarity, both among men and women in view of their distinct roles, and among those within the church due to the variety of their spiritual gifts. The same principles are to be manifest in dealing with their cultural diversity and economic distinctions (cf. 1 Cor 11:11, 33-34; 12:4-31; 14:26-40). And in each case this practical spirituality is grounded in theology, whether that be the creative work of God (1 Cor 11:2-16), the redemptive work of Christ (1 Cor 11:17-34), or the gifting of the Spirit (1 Cor 12—14).

Finally, as "the more excellent way" outlined in 1 Corinthians 13 makes evident, the criterion for establishing the appropriate application of this theology is that of "love,"* the character of which is outlined in 1 Corinthians 13:4-7 (cf. its application in 1 Cor 12:4-11; 14:6-19). Hence, apart from faith in Christ working itself out in love for the body of Christ, participation in the Lord's Supper and apparent possession of spiritual gifts do not ensure one's right standing before God. In fact, they bring one under the judgment of God (cf. 1 Cor 11:16, 27-32; 14:37-38), since only love, as the outward expression of faith* and hope,* remains forever (1 Cor 13:1-3, 8-13). Paul can thus admonish the Corinthians, who pride themselves on their spiritual gifts and experiences, that "since you are eager for spiritual things and experiences, strive that you may abound in building up the church" (1 Cor 14:12).

Having begun by grounding his opening section in the cross of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 1:18-25), Paul now concludes his application of theological truths to practical problems by dealing in 1 Corinthians 15:1-58 with the surety and nature of the future resurrection* in view of the resurrection of Christ. Paul first calls attention in 1 Corinthians 15:1-5 to the death and resurrection of Christ as the center point of the gospel, which Paul had received as the common tradition* of the church and then passed on to the Corinthians as the basis of their salvation. This is the earliest account we have of the contours of the early Christian message and its historical evidence. Paul then supplements this evidence with the recital of Christ's further resurrection appearances. He concludes with his own experience of the resurrected Christ and its consequences for his life as the "least of the apostles" (1 Cor 15:9-11).

In turning his attention to the Corinthians, Paul draws out a threefold significance from the fact of Christ's resurrection. First, no one can conclude that there is no resurrection from the dead (1 Cor 15:12-19, 29-34). Second, Christ's resurrection is the "first fruits"* of what will happen to all "in Christ"* at his second coming when God's "final enemy," death (see Life and Death), is destroyed and all authorities are put back under subjection to the reign of God. Hence, contrary to the Corinthians' belief that they were already experiencing the fullness of the resurrection age to come in their own current life of the Spirit (i.e., their "over-realized eschatology"), the final resurrection is by no means merely an experience of spiritual power and gifting in the present (1 Cor 15:20-28). Rather, it is a qualitatively different bodily existence which can only be gained through the granting of a new, resurrected and spiritual body (1 Cor 15:35-56). Third, believers now live "between" the two resurrections, Christ's and their own. They live in the midst of an age which is still evil, but which can be endured and overcome by the sure confidence that Christ's resurrection experience and victory over death as the "last Adam*" will be shared by them because they are "in Christ" (1 Cor 15:42-54). The practical implication of this hope is that the believer is encouraged to "be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that in the Lord your labor is not in vain" (1 Cor 15:58).

As the last of the matters raised by the Corinthians' letter, Paul ends his responses by outlining his instructions concerning the management of the collection being taken for the poor believers in Jerusalem,* noting his future travel plans, providing a recommendation for Timothy (see Coworkers), and then giving a brief explanation of Apollos's* reason for not visiting Corinth (1 Cor 16:1-12).

1.5. Concluding Remarks. The letter ends with a final series of admonitions and greetings from Paul and those with Paul in Asia (1 Cor 16:13-24). As a fitting capstone to the letter as a whole, these admonitions center on the need for perseverance in one's faith as it works itself out in love (1 Cor 16:13-14) and the corresponding pronouncement of God's judgment on those who "have no love for the Lord," with Paul himself longing for the return of Christ (1 Cor 16:22).

2. The Contents of 2 Corinthians.

2.1. The Salutation. The salutation in 2 Corinthians 1:1-2 follows the same pattern as 1 Corinthians 1:1-3, though in comparison both the identification of the sender and of the recipients are now abbreviated. Paul's apostolic identity by means of the will of God is again expressed, with Timothy now noted as the letter's cosender. But as in the case of Sosthenes, here too Timothy is identified merely as a "brother," once again clearly highlighting Paul's apostolic office. Though there has been considerable discussion concerning whether the first person plurals in 2 Corinthians 1—7 refer to a wider circle of apostles or coworkers* (cf., e.g., 2 Cor 1:19; 8:16-23), the internal evidence of the letter suggests that Paul alone remains the subject and object of the discussion throughout 2 Corinthians, apart from those texts where it is explicitly indicated otherwise (e.g., 2 Cor 3:18; the focus on the Corinthians in 2 Cor 6:14—7:1; 8—9). The recipients of the letter remain the house churches in Corinth and those believers scattered in small groups around this center. The greeting is also the same as in 1 Corinthians.

2.2. The Opening Thanksgiving. But unlike the situation he faced in 1 Corinthians, Paul now finds himself in a new polemical situation in which his own legitimacy as an apostle had been severely called into question at Corinth and still is being doubted by a significant minority within the church (see 4.2 below). This polemical situation and the corresponding apologetic tone which characterizes much of 2 Corinthians are evident from the beginning of the letter. In contrast to Paul's opening thanksgiving in 1 Corinthians 1:4-9, Paul begins 2 Corinthians not by thanking God for God's work of grace among the Corinthians, but by praising God for his work of comfort and deliverance from adversity in his own life (2 Cor 1:3-11). In doing so, Paul uses a formula in 2 Corinthians 1:3 which is typical of Jewish worship ("blessed be God . . .") and which calls attention to blessings in which he himself has participated (see Liturgical Elements). These thanksgivings function in Paul's letters to introduce the main themes of his writing, to express his perspective on them, and to introduce an implicit appeal to his readers in response.

Second Corinthians 1:1-11 thus establishes the apologetic tone and central theme of what is to follow: rather than calling his apostleship into question, Paul's suffering* validates his call.* God has called Paul to suffer in order that through the merciful "comfort" of God's sustaining power and ultimate deliverance, which Paul experiences in his affliction,* he will be able to make God's power and comfort known to others (2 Cor 1:6-7, 10). Paul can thus interpret his own suffering (= "death") in terms of the death of Christ, and his deliverance from this suffering as a type of the resurrection (2 Cor 1:9). As such, these too become a means by which the church is encouraged in its faithfulness in the midst of adversity (2 Cor 1:7). Paul's suffering, being the vehicle through which the comfort God provides is made manifest, is therefore the very mark of his genuine apostolic calling. Paul consequently concludes this section by calling the Corinthians to join him in thanking God for his suffering and deliverance, the very thing his opponents claimed disqualified him as an apostle (2 Cor 1:11).

2.3. Paul's Defense of the Change in His Travel Plans. In the first major section of Paul's letter, 2 Corinthians 1:12—2:13, Paul explains the theological rationale for the recent unexpected change in his travel plans (2 Cor 1:15-16; see Itineraries, Travel Plans). Paul's purpose is to demonstrate that his behavior has been an expression of the sincerity of motives which only God can discern (2 Cor 1:12). Conversely, Paul's actions have not been the result of "fleshly wisdom" (2 Cor 1:12) and the vacillations of one who makes his plans "according to the flesh.*" This may reflect an allegation, apparently made by his opponents, that Paul was guilty of an elaborate scheme to defraud the Corinthians in connection with the collection for Jerusalem and his own practice of preaching for free (2 Cor 1:17; cf. 2:17; 7:2; 8:20-21; 11:7-11; 12:13-18).

Paul's point in 2 Corinthians 1:15—2:4 is that his earlier decision not to visit Corinth on his way to Jerusalem from Macedonia (cf. 1 Cor 16:5-9), but to come directly to Corinth first (2 Cor 1:15), as well as his later decision not to return to Corinth a second time (2 Cor 1:23), were all the actions of one who is "sealed by the Spirit" and is therefore acting in a Christ-like manner. As the full realization of the promises of God (2 Cor 1:19-20), Christ makes it clear that God's purpose in acting toward his people is to establish mercy* before judgment. In the same way, Paul's changes in travel plans were all motivated by his desire to extend mercy to the Corinthians in order to effect their restoration, rather than to come in judgment (2 Cor 1:23-24). Paul changed his travel plans in order to give the Corinthians the chance for repentance (2 Cor 7:8-13), deciding not to come back to Corinth after his "painful visit," but writing the "sorrowful letter" instead (2 Cor 2:1-5). Far from being an expression of fleshly behavior, Paul's changes in plans were thus an extension of God's action in Christ.

In 2 Corinthians 2:5-11 Paul turns his attention back to those Corinthians who have already repented of their disloyalty to Paul in response to his previous "sorrowful letter" (cf. 2 Cor 2:5, 8-9; 7:7-16). Paul admonishes them to follow in his footsteps. Just as Paul acted to extend mercy to the Corinthians, they too should extend mercy to the repentant offender who caused Paul so much pain. They must welcome this one back, lest he be "overwhelmed by excessive sorrow" (2 Cor 2:7). Moreover, just as Paul's actions toward the Corinthians demonstrate his genuine apostolic standing, their willingness to extend mercy to this person takes on the character of a test of their faith* (2 Cor 2:9). Those who have experienced God's mercy have no choice but to extend mercy to those who have sinned against them, but have now repented. Paul therefore ends this section by reminding the Corinthians of the ultimate purpose of his admonitions: to prevent Satan* from using this situation against the church (2 Cor 2:11).

Finally Paul provides the transition to the next major section of his letter by calling attention to his most recent change in plans. When Titus failed to arrive as prearranged, Paul could not use opportunities for ministry in Troas but went to meet with Titus in Macedonia (cf. 2 Cor 7:5-7) because of his overwhelming concern for Titus and his earnest desire to hear the news Titus was to bring from Corinth (2 Cor 2:12-13). In view of 2 Corinthians 11:28 this anxiety over his "brother" and the Corinthians was yet another expression of Paul's greatest suffering as an apostle. This apparently insignificant transition thus calls us back to the central theme of the letter.

2.4. Paul's Direct Defense of His Apostolic Authority. Rather than calling the legitimacy of his apostleship into question, Paul's suffering as related in 2 Corinthians 2:12-13 leads him once again to praise God in 2 Corinthians 2:14, just as it did in 2 Corinthians 1:3-11. Moreover, here too Paul employs a typical Jewish thanksgiving formula in 2 Corinthians 2:14 ("thanks be to God") in order to signal the introduction of the central theme of the next section, which now runs from 2 Corinthians 2:14 to 7:16: "Thanks be to God who always leads us in a triumphal procession (thriambeuō) unto death in Christ, and in so doing manifests the fragrance of the knowledge of him through us in every place" (see Hafemann for a defense of this translation).

Just as in 1 Corinthians 4:9 Paul could picture himself as sentenced to death by God as a spectacle in the Roman arena, and in 2 Corinthians 1:9 as having been given the "sentence of death," Paul now portrays his suffering as an apostle in terms of the Roman triumphal procession in which those taken captive by the victor (like Paul by Christ!) are led like slaves to their death (2 Cor 2:14; see Triumph). Paul thus views his suffering as the divinely orchestrated means by which the knowledge of God is revealed in the world. With this as its introduction, this section sets forth Paul's most detailed defense of his apostolic ministry. Here his defense is aimed at those who called Paul's apostleship into question on account of his suffering (cf. 2 Cor 4:7-15; 6:3-10; 11:23-33), his weak personal appearance (cf. 2 Cor 10:10; 1 Cor 2:1-5) and his commitment to preach the gospel at his own expense. His opponents took these things to be signs of his inferiority as an apostle, of the worthlessness of his message and as part of his scheme to defraud the Corinthians (2 Cor 2:17; 11:7-15; 12:13-19).

At the heart of Paul's self-defense is the twofold argument in 2 Corinthians 2:14—3:6 for his sufficiency and boldness as an apostle.* On the one hand, Paul argues that he is sufficient for the apostolic calling (2 Cor 2:16) precisely because his apostolic life of suffering, as the means of revealing the knowledge of God, brings about the same dual effect in the world that Paul attributed to the word of the cross in 1 Corinthians 1:18-25 (2 Cor 2:15-16). Moreover, unlike his opponents, Paul has willingly taken up this suffering by preaching the gospel free of charge as evidence of his sincerity and divine call (2 Cor 2:17). On the other hand, Paul can point to the Corinthians themselves as additional concrete evidence for his sufficiency, since their own conversion and life in the Spirit, brought about through Paul, testify to the genuine nature of Paul's ministry among them (2 Cor 3:2-3). Paul's ministry of suffering and the Spirit thus combine to support his assertion that his sufficiency is from God and that God has made him a minister of the "new covenant" of the Spirit in fulfillment of Ezekiel 36 and Jeremiah 31 (2 Cor 3:4-6; see Covenant).

In 2 Corinthians 3:7-18, one of the most complex passages in the Pauline corpus, Paul proceeds to compare his role as an apostle of the "new covenant" established by Christ to that of Moses'* role as mediator of the "old covenant" established at Sinai. Such a comparison is necessitated by the fact that in 2 Corinthians 2:16 and 3:5 Paul's sufficiency as an apostle is based on his call according to the pattern of the call of Moses as portrayed in Exodus 4:10 (LXX, ouk hikanos eimi). If Paul has been called like Moses, how then is his ministry different from that of Moses?

Paul answers this question by contrasting the events of Exodus 32—34 and their significance for understanding the nature and purpose of the old covenant to the new covenant in Christ. Paul's main point is that from the very beginning the Law functioned to "kill" Israel* by condemning it for its sinfulness. This was not because the Law itself was somehow deficient, but because the vast majority of Israel was left in a hardened condition so that it was unable to keep the covenant (cf. Ex 32:1-10; 33:3, 5; 34:9). As a result, Israel could not endure the glory of God without being destroyed (cf. Ex 33:3, 5). Moses had to veil himself, therefore, not because the glory* was fading, but so that the effects of God's glory against a stiff-necked people might be brought to an end (katargeō; 2 Cor 3:7, 11-12, in view of Ex 34:29-35). This would make it possible for God's presence to continue in Israel's midst in spite of Israel's hardened nature. The veil of Moses thus becomes a metonomy for the hardness of Israel's hearts under the old covenant (2 Cor 3:14-15).

The "letter" (gramma) of 2 Corinthians 3:6 is therefore the Law* apart from the power of the Spirit, which by itself can only declare God's will and pronounce judgment for not doing it, but cannot empower one to keep it. Only God's Spirit, which is now being poured out in the new covenant as a result of the work of Christ, can "make one alive" (2 Cor 3:6) and bring about this righteousness* (2 Cor 3:8-9). Hence, believers may now encounter in the Spirit the same glory of God that Moses encountered "with unveiled faces" (2 Cor 3:16-17). As a result, rather than being judged and destroyed by the presence of God, they are transformed by it into the very image* of God himself (2 Cor 3:18). Whereas Moses had to veil himself (2 Cor 3:12-13), as an apostle of the new covenant Paul can be bold in his declaration of the gospel because he is confident that he has been called to a ministry of the Spirit (2 Cor 3:8). Inasmuch as Paul's ministry thus mediates the glory of God to those whose hearts have been changed and thus need not fear their destruction, his ministry "outshines" that of the old covenant (2 Cor 3:10-11).

In 2 Corinthians 4:1-6 Paul draws the necessary conclusion from his preceding argument. On the one hand Paul's apostleship is legitimate in that it functions, both through his preaching and his way of life, to make known the "light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor 4:4). This was the purpose of Paul's own call, pictured in 2 Corinthians 4:6 in terms of a new creation in which God "shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (see Conversion and Call). On the other hand, this can only mean that those who reject Paul and his message do so because their own minds have been hardened by Satan, the "god of this age" (2 Cor 4:3-4).

In 2 Corinthians 4:7—6:13 Paul returns once again to the theme of his suffering, this time by both introducing and concluding this unit of thought with the second and third of his "catalogues of suffering" (2 Cor 4:7-15 and 6:3-13 respectively; cf. 1 Cor 4:11-13; see Afflictions). Having argued for the legitimacy and function of his suffering thus far, Paul now addresses the question of the actual necessity for his suffering, which he says in 2 Corinthians 4:7 is to demonstrate that the power and glory that is revealed in him is clearly God's and not his own. The way in which this is accomplished is through Paul's repeated experience of suffering (i.e., "carrying around in our body the death of Jesus," 2 Cor 4:10; "being handed over to death for Jesus' sake," 2 Cor 4:11; and having "death at work in us," 2 Cor 4:12) in order that God's power to sustain him might be seen (i.e., "that the life of Jesus might also be manifested in our [mortal] body," 2 Cor 4:10, 11) and experienced by others (2 Cor 4:12). Paul thus follows in the footsteps of the suffering righteous of the OT (cf. the quote from Ps 115:1 LXX in 2 Cor 4:13) and of the suffering Righteous One, Jesus, both in enduring suffering for the sake of others (cf. 2 Cor 4:15) and in his confidence in God's righteous vindication and reward* in the future (2 Cor 4:14, 16-18).

Paul's confidence in his future vindication, when he will be "at home with the Lord" (2 Cor 5:8), is based on the guarantee of his present possession of the Holy Spirit (2 Cor 5:5). This confidence causes him not only to long with courage for its reality (2 Cor 5:2-4), but also to endeavor to be pleasing to God, knowing that all must appear before the judgment seat of Christ to be recompensed for their deeds (2 Cor 5:9-10). This healthy fear of God also motivates Paul in his ministry and in his defense of his apostleship (2 Cor 5:11), not for his own sake, but in order that the Corinthians might have just cause to be proud of Paul (2 Cor 5:12-15) and to affirm the truth of his gospel of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:14, 16-21; see Peace, Reconciliation).

The consequence of Paul's ministry is then made clear. Those who have been reconciled to God in Christ are a "new creation" (2 Cor 5:17), which in the context entails not only a new relationship with God but also a new, righteous way of life in which one takes on the very character of God in Christ by living one's life for the sake of others (2 Cor 3:18; 4:5, 14-15; 5:21). Rather than rejecting Christ because of his sufferering, as Paul himself formerly did when he regarded Christ from the nonspiritual point of view (i.e., "according to the flesh"), those who have been created anew see both Christ and others in the light of God's purpose of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:16, 19, 21).

Paul concludes this section and at the same time introduces the next by calling those within the Corinthian church who are still rejecting Paul and his message to be reconciled to God and not to presume upon God's grace and mercy. By doing so they will demonstrate that their prior acceptance of God's grace has not been in vain (2 Cor 5:20; 6:1). For as an ambassador for Christ (2 Cor 5:20), Paul, like the servant* in Isaiah 49:8, is called to bring the people back to their God (2 Cor 6:2). The catalog of suffering in 2 Corinthians 6:3-13 functions to support this appeal further by demonstrating again that, rather than calling his legitimacy into question, his opponents should observe that Paul's endurance in the midst of adversity commends him as an apostle. The section therefore ends with yet another appeal to those Corinthians still under the influence of Paul's opponents to be reconciled to Paul (2 Cor 6:11-13).

In view of the fact that the Corinthian church now stands divided over the legitimacy of Paul's apostleship and his understanding of Jesus and the Spirit (cf. 2 Cor 11:4), 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:2 addresses the question of the relationship between believers and unbelievers, the latter of which are now implicitly identified as those who will not repent and be reconciled to Paul as an apostle of the gospel of God. Paul's admonition is straightforward. Based on his understanding of the church as the temple of God (2 Cor 6:16) and the biblical injunction for God's people to separate themselves from idolatry in order to be God's "sons and daughters" (2 Cor 6:17), Paul calls the faithful Corinthians to separate themselves from those among them who continue to reject Paul and his gospel (2 Cor 6:14-15; 7:1).

In 2 Corinthians 7:2-16 Paul resumes his account of the recent events in Corinth, focusing on the good news he received when he finally did meet Titus. Although Paul initially regretted having sent them such a severe reprimand, Paul is relieved by the fact that his letter of rebuke (2 Cor 7:5-8) brought about among the majority of Corinthian believers the kind of godly sorrow which leads to repentance rather than the "worldly grief" which merely brings death (2 Cor 7:9-13). Paul's defense of his apostleship in 2 Corinthians 2:14—7:16 consequently ends with a great expression of joy,* comfort and confidence in the Corinthians as a whole, since their positive response to Paul's previous warnings and to Titus's mission was a sure sign of the genuine nature of their faith and of the bond between Paul and his church (2 Cor 7:2-5, 11-16).

2.5. The Collection. In 2 Corinthians 8:1—9:15 the subject matter changes completely. Paul now takes up the theological foundation and practical administration of the collection* for the believers in Jerusalem* which he had initiated in Corinth, but which due to the problems in the church had not been completed as anticipated (2 Cor 8:6-7, 10-11; 9:2; cf. 1 Cor 16:1-4). The necessity for the collection is based not only on the needs of the church in Jerusalem and the ability of the Corinthians to give (2 Cor 8:14-15) but also on the implications of Christ's own self-giving for those under his lordship (2 Cor 8:8-9). Giving to the needs of others therefore becomes a test of the genuineness of one's faith (2 Cor 8:8, 24; 9:13), with Titus providing an example of just such a genuine faith and the love it produces (2 Cor 8:16-17). Two unnamed, but well-known and respected, brothers will be sent by Paul with Titus to ensure the completion and credibility of the collection to the glory of God (2 Cor 8:18-23; 9:1-5).

In 2 Corinthians 9:6-15 Paul then concludes his discussion of the collection by returning to its theological foundation. The collection is necessary because it expresses the church's trust in God to meet their needs to such a degree that they are willing and able to give cheerfully to others (2 Cor 9:6-9). God is faithful and he will respond to such acts of faith by working to supply the needs of those who give and then by rewarding those who use their resources for the benefit of others (2 Cor 9:8, 10-12). In going forward with the collection the Corinthians will therefore glorify God by affirming with their actions the gospel of Christ (2 Cor 9:13) and causing others to join them in glorifying God (2 Cor 9:12). The collection will also create a unity of prayer* and appreciation between the Corinthians and the church in Jerusalem (2 Cor 9:14), which leads Paul in response to close this section by praising God for his own "inexpressible gift" (2 Cor 9:15).

2.6. Paul's Final Defense and Attack on His Opponents. In the last major section of 2 Corinthians, 10:1—13:10, the tone, style and subject matter again change dramatically from the pastoral admonitions of 2 Corinthians 7:2-15 and chapters 8—9. Here is an aggressive apologetic and counter-attack against those within the church who still oppose Paul (2 Cor 13:5-10) and against his opponents from outside Corinth who stand in the shadows behind them (2 Cor 10:10; 11:4, 12-15, 21-23). The issues are still Paul's personal weakness and suffering (2 Cor 10:1, 10; 11:23-33), his voluntary self-support (2 Cor 11:7-15; 12:13-17) and his apparent lack of charismatic power (2 Cor 12:12; 13:3). Paul's upcoming visit consequently dominates this section in the hope that it will be a constructive time of healing, rather than a time of judgment for the church (cf. 2 Cor 10:2; 12:14, 20-21; 13:1-4).

2 Corinthians 10:1-6 is Paul's final appeal to the church for reconciliation in order that he might not have to "show boldness" in punishing disobedience when he arrives—although he is ready to do so (2 Cor 10:2, 6). In 2 Corinthians 10:7-11 Paul supports this appeal by reaffirming his legitimacy both as a Christian and as an apostle on the basis of the appropriate nature of his recent conduct, including his forceful boasting in his authority over the Corinthians. The appropriateness of Paul's conduct becomes evident once the right criterion for apostolic legitimacy is applied, namely, the concrete evidence of God's own work through him as seen in Paul's apostolic activity of founding the church in Corinth (2 Cor 10:12-18). When Paul lays claim to his authority he is thus not commending himself (2 Cor 10:12) but boasting "of the Lord," of what God himself has accomplished through Paul as evidence of the fact that he is the one whom the Lord "commends" (2 Cor 10:17-18).

Since God has already commended Paul through his apostolic work, the need to boast in one's own behavior or accomplishments is "foolish" (cf. 2 Cor 11:1, 16-21; 12:11). Yet in 2 Corinthians 11:1—12:10 Paul feels forced to do just that in order to counter the claims of his opponents and to win back those who have fallen under their sway. At the heart of the issue is the opponents' claim that they, not Paul, represent and are equal to the "eminent apostles" in Jerusalem. In this section Paul endeavors to show that he is the one who is a genuine apostle, on a par with the leaders of the mother church (2 Cor 11:5; 12:11), while his opponents, claiming some connection with the Jerusalem leaders, are in fact "false apostles" and "deceitful workers" who disguise themselves as "servants of righteousness" (2 Cor 11:12-15). Thus in 2 Corinthians 11:5 and 12:11 Paul compares himself positively with the "eminent apostles," while in 2 Corinthians 11:12-15 he draws the sharpest possible distinction between himself and his opponents.

In this section Paul therefore "boasts" first in his decision to preach the gospel free of charge in Corinth (2 Cor 11:7-12), and then in his other sufferings (2 Cor 11:23-33), as the true marks of his legitimacy as an apostle, only to boast finally in his own spiritual experiences. In this last case, however, Paul is exceedingly hesitant, knowing that this is the epitome of foolishness and the very thing concerning which God has given him a "thorn in the flesh" to keep him from doing (2 Cor 12:6-10). Furthermore, Paul asserts that the real reason his opponents have criticized him for his preaching free of charge, for his suffering and for his refusal to boast in his spiritual experiences is that his lifestyle and practice call their own legitimacy as apostles into question, based as it is on a demand for payment and their own tales of spiritual experiences (2 Cor 11:12). Paul's point is that neither human distinctives nor religious pedigree make one a servant of Christ (cf. 2 Cor 11:21-23), but weakness, since God has declared that his "power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor 12:9).

In 2 Corinthians 12:11—13:10 Paul brings the section to a close by reminding the Corinthians for the last time of his sincerity and apostolic legitimacy, as evidenced in his ministry of the Spirit and his suffering as a result of refusing to burden the Corinthians (2 Cor 12:11-18). Those who are still rejecting Paul must therefore repent in anticipation of his final visit (2 Cor 12:19—13:10). Not to do so will bring them under the judgment of God, since Paul has identified his own person and message with the glory of God in Christ and the true gospel (2 Cor 11:4; 12:21; 13:1-4). The ultimate test of the genuine nature of their faith is thus whether or not they will be reconciled with Paul (2 Cor 13:5-9). Hence, Paul's elaborate self-defense has not been for his own sake, but for the good of the Corinthians (2 Cor 12:19), since Paul is writing "these things while being absent in order that when [he is] present [he] might not have to use his authority severely, which the Lord gave [him] for building up and not tearing down" (2 Cor 13:10).

2.7. Final Greetings. In 2 Corinthians 13:11-13 (14) Paul ends his letter by calling his church to mend its ways, heal its rivalries, and live in unity and peace with one another. This closing appeal is based on the promise that in doing so "the God of love and peace" will be with them.

3. The City and Its Citizens.

More than perhaps any other of the Pauline letters, the sociological characteristics of Corinth, together with the religious and philosophical milieu of the region, influence one's interpretation of 1 and 2 Corinthians. Corinth was located at the foot of the 1,886-foot-high Acrocorinth, on the southern side of the 4.5-mile isthmus that connected the Peloponnese with the rest of Greece and separated the Saronic and Corinthian gulfs. Its location was strategic both militarily and commercially. Corinth controlled the overland movement between Italy and Asia, as well as the traffic between the two ports of Lechaeum, 1.5 miles to the north, and Cenchreae, 5.1 miles to the east. A portage between these two ports, which ran through Corinth, made it possible to avoid sailing the treacherous waters around the Peloponnesus. This portage was facilitated by a paved road across the isthmus, which was built in the sixth century B.C. Corinth was thus known as a wealthy city due to its tariffs and commerce, and as a crossroads for the ideas and traffic of the world (cf. Strabo Geog. 8.6.20-23). In terms of manufacturing it was especially known for its highly treasured bronze ware, one use of which was as "resonance enhancers" in the theater (cf. 1 Cor 13:1; Murphy-O'Connor, 50, 76).

The history of ancient Corinth is the history of two cities. As a political entity Corinth's history reaches back to the eighth century B.C., and until the mid-second century B.C. it flourished as a Greek city-state. But its status as the leader of the Achaean League led to Corinth's destruction by Rome in 146 B.C. Corinth then lay in ruins until 44 B.C., when it was re-founded by Julius Caesar as a Roman colony, after which it quickly rose to prominence once again (cf. Appian Rom. Hist. 8.136). By the first century Corinth had become the foremost commercial center in southern Greece. Beginning in 27 B.C. it was the seat of the region's proconsul and the capital of the senatorial province of Achaia until A.D. 15, when it became an imperial province. It also became famous for its control of the Isthmian games, a biennial athletic competition second only to the Olympian games in importance. This background is reflected in 1 Corinthians 9:24-27 in Paul's use of the athletic metaphor and his emphasis on the imperishable crown reserved for believers. This, for the Corinthians, would be recognized as a contrast with the crowns given in the Isthmian games, which were made out of withered celery plants (cf. Murphy-O'Connor, 17).

As a wealthy hub for commerce and seafarers, Greek Corinth was evidently renowned for its vice, especially its sexual corruption, and for its many religious temples and rites. Aristophanes (c. 450-385 B.C.) even coined the term korinthiazesthai ("to act like a Corinthian," i.e., "to commit fornication") in view of the city's reputation. Plato used the term "Corinthian girl" as an euphemism for a prostitute (Murphy-O'Connor, 56). And although its historical accuracy is disputed, Strabo's account of 1,000 prostitutes in the temple of Aphrodite does reflect the city's image, in which the many temples played their own role in the immoral tenor of its life (cf. Strabo Geog. 8.6.20, first written in 7 B.C. and revised slightly in A.D. 18).

After Corinth was reestablished in 44 B.C. as a Roman city, it received a rapid influx of people. It soon became the third city of the empire after Rome and Alexandria. In addition to the veterans and the many from the lower classes who moved to Corinth, the city was settled largely by "freedmen" from Rome, whose status as manumitted servants was just above that of a slave. The repopulation of Corinth provided Rome a way to ease her overcrowding and the freedmen a chance to take advantage of the socioeconomic opportunity offered by this new city. Moreover, Corinth also boasted a significant community of Jews, who exercised the right to govern their own internal affairs (cf. Acts 18:8, 17). It is listed by Philo as one of the cities of the Jewish Diaspora (cf. Philo Leg. Gai. 281-282), and a lintel inscribed with the words "synagogue of the Hebrews" has been found, though its date cannot be determined with certainty (cf. Murphy-O'Connor, 79). By Paul's day Corinth had thus become a pluralistic melting pot of cultures, philosophies, lifestyles and religions, and had the feel of an economic "boom-town."

Paul's categories of people within the church, listed in 1 Corinthians 12:13 as Jew, Greek, slave* and free, thus reflect the make-up of the city, as do the various Jewish, Roman and Greek names mentioned in the letters (cf. the Jews Aquila, Priscilla, Crispus; the Romans Fortunatus, Quartus, Justus, etc.; the Greeks Stephanus, Achaicus, Erastus). We know from 1 Corinthians 7:20-24 that some of the believers in Corinth were slaves. Furthermore, since no landed aristocracy now existed in Roman Corinth, an "aristocracy of money" soon developed, accompanied by a fiercely independent spirit (so Fee, 2). This class distinction based on wealth is reflected in the tensions and factions that existed during the celebration of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:17-34), since most of the church was apparently from the lower or middle socioeconomic class, with only a few wealthy families represented (cf. 1 Cor 1:26-27; see Sociology).

Roman law, culture and religion* were dominant in Corinth, and Latin was the city's official language, but the Greek traditions and philosophies of the area and the mystery cults from Egypt and Asia were also strongly represented (cf. 1 Cor 1:20-22). Diogenes, the founder of the Cynics, was associated with Corinth and Craneum, a residential area near it. Indeed, it is judged that Corinth was the "most thoroughly Hellenistic city in the NT" (Fee, 4 n.12). The Corinthian theater at the time of Paul held 14,000 people (Murphy-O'Connor, 36) and is reflected in the image behind 1 Corinthians 4:9 and 9:24-25. Moreover, although the accounts which we have of the widespread sexual immorality in Corinth are of Greek Corinth and should not be taken to apply to the Corinth of Paul's day, it is certainly the case that such a problem also came to be prevalent in the new, Roman city due to its character as a crossroads and seaport. 1 Corinthians 5:1-2 and 6:9-20 reflect just such an atmosphere. Finally, in Paul's day Corinth was filled with pagan religious sites (cf. 1 Cor 8:4-6; 10:14, 20-30). Pausanias (d. c. A.D. 180), who gives us our earliest guide book to Corinth in his Description of Greece, Book 2, describes at least twenty-six sacred places for the Greco-Roman pantheon and mystery cults. But it must be kept in mind that much of Corinth was destroyed in an earthquake in A.D. 77, after which there was an extensive rebuilding of the city. For the time of Paul, archaeology has thus far attested a temple of Fortune and temples or shrines to Neptune, Apollo, Aphrodite (on the Acrocorinth), Venus, Octavia, Asclepius, Demeter, Core and Poseidon (cf. Murphy-O'Connor and Wiseman).

4. The Church and Its Apostle.

The church in Corinth was largely, though not exclusively, Gentile, as reflected in their former background in pagan idolatry (1 Cor 6:10-11; 8:7; 12:2) and in the issue of partaking in temple feasts (1 Cor 8:1—11:1). It was also normal for Greeks and Romans to go to secular law courts with their disputes, whereas Jews were forbidden to do so, which helps explain this practice in Corinth (cf. 1 Cor 6:1-6). The acceptance of prostitution discussed in 1 Corinthians 6:12-20 and the attitudes toward marriage reflected in 1 Corinthians 7 are also more in keeping with a Gentile background.

The church* in Corinth met in various houses, since there was no possibility for a public meeting place, such as a synagogue, for a newly constituted religious movement which still lacked government recognition (cf. Rom 16:23). Based on the excavation of the four houses in Corinth from the Roman period (one from Paul's time) and the listing of the fourteen male members of the church in 1 and 2 Corinthians, Murphy-O'Connor estimates the base figure of the Corinthian church to be fifty members (Murphy-O'Connor, 158). But such a gathering of the "whole church" was unusual, since the church usually met in smaller groups in various members' homes (cf. 1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:5; Col 4:15; Philem 2).

4.1. The Problems Behind 1 Corinthians. G. D. Fee's commentary on 1 Corinthians represents the most thoroughgoing presentation of the "apologetic" view of the problems behind 1 Corinthians. In this view the historical situation behind 1 Corinthians is fundamentally one of conflict between Paul and the church as a whole, in which the Corinthians' rejection of Paul's authority as the founder of the church is perceived to be at the heart of their troubles. For Fee, therefore, the most serious division in the church is between the majority of the community and Paul himself (Fee, 8). Paul's language throughout the letter is taken to be combative, and his references to his apostleship are read to be apologetic (cf. esp. 1 Cor 4:1-21; 9:1-27; 15:8-11).

But Paul's purpose in writing 1 Corinthians is best seen not to be primarily apologetic but didactic. Nowhere in the letter does Paul argue for his own authority as an apostle per se, since he continues to bank on the fact that the Corinthians recognize him as their founder (1 Cor 4:15) and as a legitimate apostle, even though others outside the church might not (1 Cor 9:1-2). Rather, Paul writes to "remind" the Corinthians of "his ways in Christ" (1 Cor 4:17) and to call their attention to the fact that as their "father" (1 Cor 4:15) it is his "way," the way of the cross, that is to be imitated (1 Cor 4:16; 11:1). The appropriateness of Paul's suffering is therefore nowhere defended in 1 Corinthians. Instead it functions as the foundational premise for Paul's arguments (cf. esp. 1 Cor 1:10—4:21; 8:1—11:1; 13; 14:18-19), which in turn are based on his parental authority over the Corinthians in Christ (1 Cor 4:14-21). The very fact that Paul can enlist his practice of preaching free of charge to support his hortatory purpose in 1 Corinthians 8—10 indicates that Paul's apostolic lifestyle and authority were still being held in high esteem. If not, Paul's larger argument in 1 Corinthians 8—10, climaxing in his call to imitate him in 1 Corinthians 11:1, would have collapsed. Throughout 1 Corinthians the focus of Paul's arguments is thus on the Corinthians and their behavior, and the mode of Paul's address is not apologetic, but directive. Paul's ability to pronounce authoritative judgments on the Corinthians' behavior throughout the letter is based on his assumption that his apostolic authority is still in place in Corinth. The problems that 1 Corinthians addresses are essentially within the church, and not tensions between the church and its apostle.

4.2. The Problems Behind 2 Corinthians. By the time Paul wrote 2 Corinthians everything had changed. For a while, between the writing of 1 and 2 Corinthians, the church as a whole was in open rebellion against Paul and his gospel due to the influence of Paul's opponents who had recently arrived (cf. 2 Cor 11:4). Since then a significant segment of the church had repented and returned to Paul's side. But Paul's apostolic authority is no longer common ground between Paul and his entire church. There is still a sizeable opposition to Paul among the Corinthians, with Paul's opponents lurking behind them. As a result, the church now stands divided over Paul and his legitimacy as an apostle. This current condition is reflected in the absence of the call to imitate* Paul in 2 Corinthians, in the consistent focus on Paul's own authority as an apostle throughout most of 2 Corinthians, and most clearly in the different ways in which Paul's suffering functions in the two letters. In 1 Corinthians 4:8-13 and 9:1-27 Paul's suffering can be used to support his argument on behalf of the Corinthians, whereas throughout 2 Corinthians Paul must argue for the legitimacy of his suffering itself (cf. 2 Cor 2:17; 11:7-15; 12:13-18). Hence, whereas the problems in 1 Corinthians were within the church, the central problem to be solved in 2 Corinthians is the authority and legitimacy of Paul as an apostle.

4.3. The Source of the Problems in Corinth and Paul's Response. The source of the problems in Corinth, whether in 1 or 2 Corinthians, can be traced back to the Hellenistic culture which so influenced the Corinthians. The key issue was what it meant to be "spiritual" (cf. Paul's use of pneumatikos fourteen times in 1 Corinthians alone, over against only four times in the other undisputed Pauline letters). Even as believers, the Corinthians held on to that part of the Hellenistic body/soul or material/immaterial dualism which disdained the physical world for the "higher" knowledge and wisdom of spiritual existence. Although it is anachronistic to speak of gnostics or gnosticism in Corinth, one may thus speak of an "incipient gnosticism" in the theology of the Corinthians (so Martin, following Bruce; see Gnosis, Gnosticism). Under its influence the Corinthians were prone to intellectual pride, placing a high value on their "knowledge" and spiritual experiences (cf. 1 Cor 1:5; 8:1, 7, 10, 11; 12:8; 13:2; etc.). The result was an attitude of boasting and competition within the church, which was further fed by their cultural arrogance and admiration of the public power, style and polish of the Sophistic rhetorical tradition. Such a disdain for this world could also lead them to consider participation in its law courts and immorality as of no consequence on the one hand (cf. 1 Cor 5:1—6:20), and to the practice of an undue asceticism on the other (cf. 1 Cor 7:1-5).

But equally important, this dualism also provided the conceptual support which made the Corinthians so susceptible to an "over-realized eschatology*" that spiritualized the future resurrection* as already having taken place in their own experience (cf. 1 Cor 4:8; 15). One's present life was therefore viewed as already participating in the fullness of the heavenly reality of the world to come. Such an over-realized eschatology further inflated the Corinthians' estimation of their spiritual knowledge, gifts and religious experiences, especially that of tongues, which they saw as indicating that they too shared the spiritual existence of the angels* (cf. 1 Cor 13:1; 14:37). This in turn led to more boasting and disunity in the church, as well as to the eventual rejection of Paul's legitimacy as an apostle and of his gospel.

Paul's response in 1 Corinthians was decidedly based on the twofold foundation of the OT* and christology* (cf. his OT response to the problem of boasting in wisdom in 1 Cor 1:18—3:23, with direct quotes of the OT in 1 Cor 1:19; 1:31; 2:9; 2:16; 3:19-20). Both make it clear that the power and wisdom of God have now been revealed in Christ and his cross. At the same time Paul's message of the cross (1 Cor 1:17-19) and his own apostolic experience of suffering (1 Cor 4:8-13) demonstrate that the kingdom of God, though here in power, is not yet present in all of its fullness. Hence if suffering and weakness are the essential characteristics of the apostolic ministry upon which the Corinthians' lives are based, then as children of their spiritual father the lives of the Corinthians also ought to be characterized by the power of the cross and not by boasting in their own spiritual attainments or leaders. Paul's most basic advice, therefore, was to "imitate me" (1 Cor 4:16; 11:1).

By the time of 2 Corinthians, however, Paul's opponents had arrived from outside Corinth and had capitalized on the Corinthians' over-realized eschatology, preaching a view of Christ and of the Spirit that the Corinthians were open to receiving (2 Cor 11:4). Instead of calling the Corinthians to endure faithfully in the midst of adversity in hope of their future resurrection and vindication, Paul's opponents promised the Corinthians a life in the Spirit that was characterized by deliverance from suffering and by a steady diet of miraculous experience. They supported their claims to be apostles with letters of recommendation from other churches (cf. 2 Cor 3:1), by their ethnic distinctives as Jews (2 Cor 3:4-18; 11:21-22), and by boasting in their spiritual attainments and supernatural signs, together with their rhetorical abilities (2 Cor 10:10, 12; 11:12, 18; 12:12). Paul's apologetic in 2 Corinthians 3 leads one to posit that they also tied their ministry in some way to the ministry of Moses* and the Law,* although unlike Galatians the issues of ritual purity* and circumcision* are not mentioned in 2 Corinthians. Moreover, Paul's opponents sealed their claims by demanding money from the Corinthians as a sign of the value and legitimacy of their message (2 Cor 2:17). But in order to make these claims and demand this payment they had to attack Paul himself and his apostolic legitimacy, which called both their gospel and their lifestyle into question.

In response, Paul now had to defend his own legitimacy as an apostle in order to establish the veracity of his gospel. Once again he does so by returning to the OT and to christology to demonstrate the necessity and purpose of his suffering in relationship to his ministry of the Spirit under the new covenant.

5. Some Critical Questions.

5.1. Authorship. Both 1 and 2 Corinthians are attributed to Paul in their salutations and show every historical and literary evidence of Pauline authorship. Indeed, the Pauline authorship of 1 Corinthians has never been disputed and the letter is already attested in the 90s by Clement of Rome (cf. 1 Clem. 37:5; 47:1-3; 49:5) and in the first decade of the second century by Ignatius (cf. Ignatius Eph. 16:1; 18:1; Rom. 5:1, etc.). Although 2 Corinthians is not clearly documented until Marcion's canon (A.D. 140), it is undisputed from that point on as part of the Pauline corpus. Even the most critical modern scholarship has consistently accepted these letters as genuine, apart from 1 Corinthians 1:2b and 14:34b-35, which some scholars have argued are non-Pauline interpolations. But the evidence for removing these texts has not convinced the majority of scholars, since no manuscript tradition has ever omitted these verses and both texts can be seen to fit within Paul's flow of thought. Other scholars have argued that the distinct vocabulary and subject matter of 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1 indicate that Paul adopted this passage from a previous Pauline writing, or from a non-Pauline Jewish source (often associated with the Essene movement or Qumran* documents) or from a Jewish-Christian tradition. But even if this hypothesis stands against the views of those who maintain that its distinct character is due to the OT texts which Paul quotes in this section, the passage has been fully integrated by Paul into his own train of thought in 2 Corinthians.

5.2. Unity and Occasion of 1 and 2 Corinthians. Paul's founding of the church at Corinth, recorded in Acts 18, took place in the years A.D. 49-51 as part of Paul's second missionary journey. When Paul left Corinth after eighteen months, the new church was flourishing. Sometime later Paul wrote a letter to the Corinthians from Ephesus,* a document which is no longer extant, in order to deal with some specific ethical issues now being faced by the new believers. But the Corinthians had difficulty understanding Paul's admonitions and, in fact, misapplied them to their context (cf. 1 Cor 5:9-13). The church then sent a letter to Paul by the hands of the messengers listed in 1 Corinthians 16:15-17 in order to receive further clarification. In response to this letter Paul wrote canonical 1 Corinthians. Paul's aim was to clarify his positions and to respond to the other reports he had heard about the serious problems which had arisen in Corinth (1 Cor 1:11; 5:1; cf. 16:15-18; see 4.2 above). The somewhat disjointed and topical nature of 1 Corinthians is due to the fact that Paul is responding in turn to the variety of issues and questions brought to him by the church's letter and to the reports he has heard.

At the time he wrote 1 Corinthians, Paul intended to return to Corinth after staying in Ephesus until Pentecost and then visiting Macedonia (cf. 1 Cor 16:5-8). In the meantime he sent Timothy to visit the Corinthians on his behalf (1 Cor 16:10-11; Acts 19:22). Timothy found the tension between Paul and the Christians at Corinth to have escalated, due most probably to the arrival of opponents of Paul from outside Corinth. In response, Paul set out for Corinth immediately for what became a "painful visit," during which Paul's authority and gospel were severely called into question by the church. Paul himself was opposed and offended by one of its leaders (cf. 2 Cor 2:1, 5-8; 7:8-13; 11:4).

Paul left Corinth under attack, determined not to make another such "painful visit" to the Corinthians (2 Cor 2:1-2). Instead he sent Titus to them with a "tearful letter" of rebuke and a warning as an attempt to win them back (cf. 2 Cor 2:3-9; 7:8-12). The fact that Titus was also to organize the collection (cf. 2 Cor 8:6) indicates, however, that Paul still held out hope for the Corinthians and did not consider them beyond repentance. This "tearful letter" is now lost, though some scholars have attempted to identify it with canonical 1 Corinthians or the four chapters of 2 Corinthians 10—13. But 1 Corinthians is neither severe nor painful enough to qualify, nor does its subject matter fit the nature of the description in 2 Corinthians 2:1-4, since in 1 Corinthians there is no consistent treatment of the theme of the Corinthians' rejection of Paul, the influence of Paul's opponents within Corinth, or the offender of 2 Corinthians 2:5-11.

As Paul waited for Titus to return with his report concerning the impact of this letter, his mind could not rest due to his anxiety over the Corinthian situation (2 Cor 2:12-23). So Paul left Troas to find Titus, and when he did, Titus gave Paul the good news that his "tearful letter" had indeed won back the majority of the Corinthians (2 Cor 7:6-13). Moreover, because the church had responded so positively, Paul could now plan to visit them once again (cf. 2 Cor 2:3; 9:5; 12:20—13:1).

In anticipation of this third visit, Paul wrote canonical 2 Corinthians, or at least chapters 1—9 of the document as we now have it. The fact that the majority of the church had repented and returned to Paul, while a significant segment still resisted his authority and gospel, explains the mixed nature of this section. In it Paul both comforts and encourages the majority of the church, while at the same time defending his apostleship in order to strengthen those who have repented and to win back the recalcitrant minority. Moreover, behind the Corinthians lurk Paul's opponents, whom Paul does not address directly, but who are the most direct source of the problem. Paul's goal in writing, therefore, is to prepare for his next visit to the Corinthians in which he will have to judge those who persist in their rejection of him and his gospel. Paul did in fact return to Corinth (cf. Acts 20:2), where less than a year later he wrote his letter to the Romans.*

In view of this scenario the question of the literary unity of 2 Corinthians has been answered in various ways because of the seemingly abrupt transitions and change of subject matter within the letter. The key issues are the apparent breaks in thought between 2 Corinthians 2:13 and 2:14, 7:4 and 5, 6:13 and 14, and 7:1 and 2; the seemingly separate treatments of the collection in chapters 8 and 9; and the distinct unit of 2 Corinthians 10:1—13:14. If each of these transitions marks out a separate document, 2 Corinthians becomes a composite of the following six major fragments, which were then later unified into a single letter: 2 Corinthians 1:1—2:13 and 7:5-16; 2:14—6:13; 6:14—7:1; 8; 9; 10—13.

A minority of scholars still maintain, however, the literary unity of the entire letter. Those who hold this position attempt to explain the integrity of the transitions within the letter at each point. In addition, they view the changes in subject matter throughout 2 Corinthians as the result of the mixed nature of the Corinthian community. Chapters 10—13 are Paul's last direct defense and attack against his opponents, after primarily addressing the reconciled majority of the church in chapters 1—9, and perhaps after some lapse in time or the arrival of new, menacing information. This is the approach taken in the overview of 2 Corinthians above.

At the other extreme a few scholars have sought to isolate each of these sections as originally part of a separate writing and to assign them to the history of Paul's interaction with the Corinthians outlined above. In this scenario, as we noted, some view 2 Corinthians 10—13 to be part of the "tearful letter;" 2 Corinthians 2:14—6:13 to be part of a lost letter of defense; 2 Corinthians 1:1—2:13 and 7:5-16 to be Paul's letter of reconciliation after Titus' report; 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1 to be part of yet another lost Pauline or non-Pauline writing, part of the "tearful letter," or even part of the "previous letter" of 1 Corinthians 5:9. The growing consensus is that chapters 1—9 are in fact a unified composition written after Paul's encounter with Titus (cf. 2 Cor 7:5-13). Chapters 10—13 are then taken as a subsequent work which was written after a fresh outbreak of trouble in Corinth and appended to the previous section at some time early on in the history of these traditions, since there is no textual-critical evidence that chapters 10—13 ever circulated independently of chapters 1—9 (see, e.g., the commentaries by Martin and Furnish).

5.3. Place and Date. First Corinthians was written from Ephesus between the time Paul left Corinth in A.D. 51-52 and three years later, in the autumn of A.D. 52 to the spring of 55, depending on the following factors: the dating of the edict of Claudius and the term of office of Gallio (cf. Acts 18:2, 12); the time of Paul's departure from Corinth (Acts 18:18); and the subsequent length of his later stay in Ephesus (see Chronology). 2 Corinthians (taken as a whole, or at least chapters 1—9) was completed in the next year or so after 1 Corinthians, and was written from Macedonia.

5.4. Paul's Opponents. The key passages for identifying Paul's opposition in Corinth have traditionally been 1 Corinthians 1:12; 3:22; 9:2-5; 2 Corinthians 3:1-18; 11:4 and 11:22-23. From these texts it is clear that Paul's opponents were Jews who were familiar with the Hellenistic world and espoused Sophist values and rhetorical techniques on the one hand, and relied on their own spiritual heritage as Jews on the other (see 4.3 above). But beyond this bare sketch, the more exact identity and theology of the opponents must remain a matter of scholarly reconstruction, since 1 and 2 Corinthians themselves are our only available evidence, though material from Philippians* (when dated in Paul's Ephesian period) has been introduced by some scholars (see commentaries).

Since the seventeenth century scholars have offered three basic theories concerning the identity of Paul's opponents in 2 Corinthians. These hypotheses have been constructed predominantly by reading Paul's arguments as a direct contrast to the positions of his opponents (the so-called mirror technique). The proposals are basically as follows: (1) gnostics; (2) legalistic Judaizers* on a par with those Paul fought elsewhere; or (3) a mixture of legalistic and gnostic and/or enthusiastic or pneumatic elements of various persuasions (see Opponents; Paul and His Interpreters). These basic positions have repeatedly been refined and combined in various ways, so that Machalet could list no less than eleven different positions on 2 Corinthians between 1908-1940. Since then these three basic positions have again been forcefully argued by R. Bultmann and W. Schmithals (the gnostic hypothesis), C. K. Barrett (the Judaizer hypothesis), and Dieter Georgi (Hellenistic Jewish pneumatics and missionaries of Palestinian origin with a "divine man" [theios anēr] theology centered on Moses).

The only major study of Paul's opponents in general to appear after these studies, J. J. Gunther's St. Paul's Opponents and their Background (1973), offered neither a new methodology nor a clear way out of this scholarly impasse. Gunther's thesis is that the backdrop for Paul's opponents is to be found in the Qumran and Jewish apocryphal writings, so that Paul's opponents were from a mystic, apocalyptic,* ascetic, non-conformist, syncretistic Judaism, more like Essenism than any other group (Gunther, 315). But in his attempt to forge a consensus among the thirteen different views he catalogued, Gunther cast his net so wide that his description becomes nondescript.

Hence, Sumney's recent proposal of a methodology based upon a "minimalist approach" for identifying Paul's opponents is to be welcomed. Sumney's proposal includes: (1) an emphasis on the priority of exegesis in a "text-focused method"; (2) an insistence upon a sound evaluation of proper sources; (3) a "stringently" limited application of the "mirror technique" (i.e., the practice of reading Paul's statements as a direct reflection of his opponents' contrary views); and (4) a rejection of the attempt to approach the text with a previously determined, externally based, reconstruction. But in view of the history of research it is significant that when Sumney applies his method to 2 Corinthians, he offers no new insights into the identity of Paul's opponents. Sumney ends up agreeing basically with the previous proposal of Käsemann that the opponents behind 2 Corinthians 10—13 were pneumatics, rather than Judaizers, gnostics or Georgi's "divine men," and that the short time span between the letter fragments of 2 Corinthians 1—9 and 10—13 leads one to "reasonably conclude" that the opponents in both cases are part of the same group (Sumney, 183).

Today, the gnostic hypothesis has died due to a lack of evidence for gnosticism in the pre-Christian or NT era. And Georgi's proposal has met with serious criticism concerning his reconstruction both of early Jewish missionaries and of their understanding of Moses as a "divine man." The way out of the remaining impasse will be to realize that the Judaizers' concern with the Law* was motivated not only by their desire to uphold their tradition, but also by a desire to gain access to a deeper experience of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). The artificial divorce between the Law and the Spirit, which leads scholars to posit two distinct types of opponents, must therefore be overcome. The question raised by Paul's opponents, based on their Jewish heritage, was essentially the same one being raised by the Corinthians, based on their Hellenistic worldview: how does one participate fully in the power of the Spirit? The opponents' answer was based on a theology of "over-realized glory," in which participation in their gospel, with its tie to the old covenant, was said to guarantee freedom from sin* and suffering in this world. At the center of the debate was the relationship between the old and new covenants as this came to expression in the question of the authority and role of Moses and the Law in regard to Paul's role as an apostle of Christ and mediator of the Spirit (cf. 2 Cor 2:16; 3:4-18).

6. Theological Themes of 1 and 2 Corinthians.

It is striking that most of the commands throughout 1 Corinthians center on some aspect of church unity (cf. 1 Cor 1:10; 3:1-3; 4:14, 16; 5:4, 5, 7, 8; 6:1, 4, 6-7, 18, 20; 8:9, 13; 10:14; 11:33-34; 12:14, etc.). Clearly Paul's primary concern is with the true nature and life of the church, making ecclesiology the most important theme of 1 Corinthians. As the "church of God" (1 Cor 1:1), the Corinthians are "the temple of God," due to their reception of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 3:16-17; 14:24-25); and the "body of Christ,"* due to their submission to the lordship of Christ (1 Cor 6:17; 10:17; 11:29; 12:12-16, 27). But in focusing his attention on the Corinthians as the people of God, the eschatological framework of Paul's theology also stands out in this letter. Throughout 1 Corinthians Paul strives to make it clear that although the kingdom of God has already dawned, as evidenced by the resurrection power of Christ and the pouring out of the Spirit in the lives of the Corinthians (cf. 1 Cor 4:20), it is nevertheless not yet here in all of its fullness, a "proviso" seen clearly in Paul's own suffering and the qualitatively different nature of the future bodily resurrection and the end of age. At the same time, Paul must also make it clear to the Corinthians that although the kingdom of God is not yet present in all its fullness, one's ethical life (see Ethics) as a follower of Christ is still to be controlled by the dawning reality of the age to come in which the power of the Spirit enables one to keep God's commandments (cf. 1 Cor 5:7-8; 6:1-6; 7:29-31; 10:11; etc.). Paul's insistence throughout 1 Corinthians on the inextricable link between faith and obedience is therefore framed theologically by the cross (cf. 1 Cor 1:10—4:21) and the resurrection of Christ (1 Cor 15). In the end, therefore, 1 Corinthians demonstrates that both ecclesiology and eschatology are rooted in one's understanding of Christ "according to the Scriptures" (cf. 1 Cor 15:3-5).

In 2 Corinthians the central theological theme becomes the relationship between suffering and glory as this is determined and illustrated in Paul's apostolic experience. Here too Paul's arguments are grounded throughout in his eschatology and christology, both of which are developed within an OT framework and consistently applied to his own life as an apostle. Paul's point is as simple as it is profound. Rather than calling his legitimacy as an apostle into question, Paul's suffering is the very vehicle which God has ordained to validate his apostleship and to make known the knowledge of his own power and glory, now revealed in the gospel of Christ. Paul's ministry of suffering and of the Spirit does not represent an unresolved tension which calls into question his sufficiency as a true apostle. Indeed both the cross and the resurrection power of God are being revealed through Paul's life of divinely ordained suffering. And although there is no call for all Christians to suffer in either 1 or 2 Corinthians, nor any sign of a martyrdom theology, Paul affirms that whenever God's people are brought into the same kinds of sufferings to which he was called as an apostle, they too will become vehicles for the manifestation of the power of God in the midst of their adversity (cf. 2 Cor 1:7). In support of this main point and his corresponding apologetic for his apostolic authority, Paul outlines the nature of the new covenant in relationship to the covenant at Sinai (2 Cor 3:6-18), the nature of the new creation in the midst of the old (2 Cor 4:6—5:21) and the christological foundation for living for the sake of others because one now lives for the sake of Christ (2 Cor 5:15; 8:1—9:14).

See also APOSTLE; AUTHORITY; BODY OF CHRIST; COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; ESCHATOLOGY; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; GLORY, GLORIFICATION; HOLY SPIRIT; LAW; LORD'S SUPPER; MOSES; OPPONENTS OF

PAUL; POWER; RESURRECTION; RHETORIC; SUFFERING; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1968); idem, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1973); F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Corinthians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971); R. Bultmann, The Second Letter to the Corinthians (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1985); H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); E. Fascher, Der erste Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, Erster Teil (THKNT 7/1; 2d ed.; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1980); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); V. P. Furnish, II Corinthians (AB 32; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984); P. E. Hughes, Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962); F. Lang, Die Briefe an die Korinther (NTD 7; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1986); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); A. Plummer, Second Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1925); A. Schlatter, Paulus, Der Bote Jesus. Eine Deutung seiner Briefe an die Korinther (4th ed.; Stuttgart: Calwer, 1969); C. H. Talbert, Reading Corinthians: A Literary and Theological Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians (New York: Crossroad, 1987); H. Windisch, Der zweite Korintherbrief (MeyerK 6; 9th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970); C. Wolff, Der erste Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, Zweiter Teil (THKNT 7/II; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1982). Studies: L. Belleville, Reflections of Glory: Paul's Polemical Use of the Moses-Doxa Tradition in 2 Corinthians 3:12-18 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1991); D. A. Carson, Showing the Spirit: A Theological Exposition of 1 Corinthians 12—14 (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987); J.-F. Collange, Enigmes de la deuxième épître de Paul aux Corinthiens (SNTSMS 18; Cambridge: University Press, 1972); N. A. Dahl, "Paul and the Church at Corinth according to 1 Corinthians 1:10-4:21," in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, ed. W. R. Farmer et al. (Cambridge: University Press, 1976) 313-35; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); J. J. Gunther, St. Paul's Opponents and their Background: A Study of Apocalyptic and Jewish Sectarian Teachings (NovTSup 30; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); S. J. Hafemann, Suffering and Ministry in the Spirit: Paul's Defense of His Ministry in II Corinthians 2:14-3:3 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); idem, " 'Self-Commendation' and Apostolic Legitimacy in 2 Corinthians: A Pauline Dialectic?" NTS 36 (1990) 66-88; E. Käsemann, "Die Legitimität des Apostels. Eine Untersuchung zu II Korinther 10-13," ZNW 41 (1942) 33-71; C. Machalet, "Paulus und seine Gegner. Eine Untersuchung zu den Korintherbriefen," in Theokratia. Jahrbuch des Institutum Judaicum Delitzschianum, II. Festgabe für Karl Heinrich Rengstorf zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. W. Dietrich et al. (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973) 183-203; P. Marshall, Enmity in Corinth: Social Conventions in Paul's Relations with the Corinthians (WUNT 2/23; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987); W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1983); J. Murphy-O'Connor, St. Paul's Corinth: Texts and Archaeology (GNS 6; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1983); idem, The Theology of the Second Letter to the Corinthians (NTT; Cambridge: University Press, 1991); C. Newman, Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); C. K. Stockhausen, Moses' Veil and the Glory of the New Covenant: The Exegetical Substructure of II Cor. 3:1—4:6 (Rome: Pontificio Instituto Biblico, 1989); J. L. Sumney, Identifying Paul's Opponents: The Question of Method in 2 Corinthians (JSNTSup 40, Sheffield; Sheffield Academic, 1990); G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); J. Wiseman, "Corinth and Rome I: 228 B.C.—A.D. 267," ANRW II.7.1.438-548; F. Young and D. F. Ford, Meaning and Truth in 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987).

S. J. Hafemann

COSMIC POWERS.

See ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

COSMOLOGY.

See WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

COSMOS.

See WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT

In the letters generally accepted as Pauline there are eight occurrences of covenant (diathēkē): Romans 9:4; 11:27; 1 Corinthians 11:25; 2 Corinthians 3:6, 14; Galatians 3:15, 17; 4:24 (cf. also Eph 2:12). Of special note among these are Galatians 4:24 (two covenants), 2 Corinthians 3:6 (the only use in Paul of new covenant, kainē diathēkē, apart from the eucharistic passage in 1 Cor 11:25) and 2 Corinthians 3:14 where we find the only reference to old covenant, palaia diathēkē.

The above references may indicate that covenant was not a dominant theme in Paul's theology, but there is little agreement on this issue. It may be argued that what is generally presumed need not always be explicitly stated. This would certainly apply to covenant theology in the case of someone like Paul, who had been brought up in a Pharisaic tradition (see Jew, Paul the). Again there may have been good reasons why Paul did not use the term more frequently, such as the possibility that his opponents used it and interpreted it differently.

In view of this and being conscious of how basic to NT interpretation are the themes "old and new covenant," we will proceed cautiously by looking at the instances of the term covenant in each of Paul's letters, as far as possible allowing the text to stand by itself without reading too much into it from other parts of the NT.

1. Galatians
2. 1 and 2 Corinthians
3. Romans
4. Conclusion

1. Galatians.

Covenant theology is essentially a way of describing God's relationship with his people. Such a relationship does not exist in a vacuum, but in time and place. Thus a question arises concerning the understanding of divine revelation and activity in history and, more specifically, in relation to the history of Israel. Paul's letter to the Galatians,* though the story of Abraham* is very much part of the discussion, does not give great significance to the history of Israel as such, at least not in the way that Romans does.

In Galatians 3:15-17 Paul, by means of a human example of covenant ratification, seeks to argue for the priority and inviolability of the Abrahamic covenant. Inasmuch as human wills cannot be added to or modified except by the testator, God's covenant with Abraham into which Christians are incorporated in Christ, Abraham's "seed," is neither nullified nor added to by the later Sinai covenant which is subsidiary to it.

Galatians 4:21-32 is a midrashic passage in which Paul may be taking up both the arguments and the scriptural citations of his opponents. Hence some of the content may not be characteristically Pauline, though he doubtless shared elements of belief with other Jewish Christians and Jews. Although Paul speaks here of two covenants (dyo diathēkai), he explicitly describes his use of these two covenants as "allegory." Moreover the impression one receives is not of one covenant being superseded by another, but rather of two parallel covenant options that possibly allegorically refer to two concurrent missions to Gentiles*: (1) a Law-observant one led by Paul's opponents (see Judaizers), and in opposition to (2) that of his own Gentile mission.* The likelihood is that Paul intends the Sarah covenant to signify not Christianity (over against the Hagar covenant, i.e., Judaism) but rather the Law-free Gentile mission. The entire discussion may be seen as two processes of begetting "children of God" (see Adoption, Sonship). In and through the Pauline mission the Galatians received the Spirit "by the hearing of faith*"; no counter mission advocating circumcision* or Law observance for Gentiles could add to, or improve on, the standing of those in Christ by faith. They are exhorted to stand in the freedom* of Christ (Gal 5:1). A Law-observant mission for Gentiles is now treated as an anachronism.

This understanding of the passage releases us from any interpretation that sees Paul as referring to two sequential covenants, the first with Judaism succeeded by the second with Christianity. The problem with the passage, of course, is its midrashic content and Paul's use of allegory. Nevertheless, the important point Paul wishes to stress is that in the begetting of children, the type or quality of the children is dependent on the lineage of their parents. This is in keeping with the general meaning of covenant, which necessarily has at its heart some kind of continuity, even if it may not be an earthly continuity, but only the theological continuity of those begotten by the word of God.

2. 1 and 2 Corinthians.

1 Corinthians 11:25 gives the rendering of Jesus' word at the Last Supper as "this cup is the new covenant (kainē diathēkē) in my blood." Luke also includes the adjective "new," but there is a strong scholarly tradition which regards the Markan form of the words of institution as being the oldest (Jeremias). What is important for our study is whether something substantially different is intended by the addition of the word "new." Maybe it is rather a drawing out of something already implicit in the death* of Christ (see Lord's Supper).

In 2 Corinthians 3:6, in a section of the letter which has spawned numerous divergent interpretations, we find the only other reference to "new covenant" in Paul. In 2 Corinthians 3:14 we meet the sole reference in Paul to "old covenant" (palaia diathēkē). The unique occurrence in Paul of the adjectives old and new in relation to covenant within the Corinthian correspondence probably points to some factor at Corinth which gave particular significance to these designations. For instance, D. Georgi considers that Paul's opponents* introduced the term new covenant. Christian theology has tended, in the past, to see in 2 Corinthians 3 a contrast between the new dispensation and the old. However warranted such a contrast may be, it is not at all clear that such a contrast was the immediate focus of Paul's thought when the letter was sent to the Corinthians. Commentators agree that Paul three times uses an a fortiori ("how much more") argument to contrast the amount of glory* which attaches to two different ministries. Exodus 34 is clearly under discussion here and it may also be true that midrashic interpretations of the passage lie behind Paul's comments. The introduction of Moses* into the discussion has led some interpreters to find here a simple and explicit contrast between the old and new dispensations—hence the strange RSV translation of diakonia as "dispensation" rather than "ministry"!

The context, however, indicates that Paul is grieved that the Corinthians are impressed by letters of commendation from rival missionaries. Paul does not wish to commend himself nor does he need, like some, such letters of commendation. Paul's "letter" is the Corinthians themselves and the author of this letter is Christ; the apostle's letter is written with the Spirit of the living God, not with ink on papyrus (see Holy Spirit).

Paul has in mind Ezekiel 11:19 (36:26) rather than Jeremiah 38:31 (LXX). S. J. Hafemann insists that the heart motif is drawn from the Ezekiel passage, which includes the motif of the Spirit, missing entirely from the Jeremiah text. He also notes that when we take as our starting point the actual passages Paul has in mind, we do not need to posit stark contrasts between ink and spirit, or stone and heart, or even to develop these into a full-blown antithesis between the dispensation of Law* and the new dispensation of gospel.* For Ezekiel the hope of the future work of God in the heart was not seen to alter the validity of the Law. The actual comparison intended here is that Paul understood his ministry to his converts to be the eschatological counterpart to the giving of the Law. Paul sees himself in the ministry* of the gospel to be the Spirit-giver just as Moses was the Law-giver.

The relationship between the activity of God in Moses the Law-giver and in his new activity in Paul the Spirit-giver is best expressed in the qal wahomer, "how much more," type of argument. The movement is from something glorious to something even more glorious. In any case, when Paul says in 2 Corinthians 3:13 that Moses put a veil over his face so that the Israelites might not see to telos tou katargoumenou ("the end of the transitory [splendor?]"), he cannot possibly have been referring to the covenant as transitory since diathēkē is a feminine noun, and the transitory (splendor) is indicated by a neuter participle.

The immediate issue in 2 Corinthians 3—4 is two concepts of Christian ministry. Paul is not addressing the Israelites at Sinai but the Corinthian Christians and his opponents. It is the latter whose thoughts have been dulled and over whose hearts lies a veil. We conclude therefore that despite a unique instance of "old covenant" in this passage, we are not warranted in reading into it the stark contrast of two antithetical ways of salvation, typical of some later Christian theology.

3. Romans.

Covenantal relationship may be implied in Paul's addressing the Romans* as agapētoi theou ("beloved [of God]") and klētoi hagioi ("called [to be] saints"). There are only two explicit references to covenant in the letter, Romans 9:4 and 11:27. In Romans 9:4-5 Paul lists the covenant as one of the privileges belonging to Israel,* along with sonship (see Adoption), glory,* the giving of the Law,* worship,* the promises and the patriarchs. Whether or not we follow the singular reading of "covenant" in P^{46} or the plural "covenants" as supported by the majority of manuscripts, it appears that here Paul has primarily in view the Abrahamic covenant. The focus is on the call and election of Abraham who in Romans 4 was depicted as a paradigm of the believer.

In Romans 11:27 Paul amalgamates two citations from Isaiah 59:12 and Isaiah 27:9 to produce a promise of future redemption for Israel despite her present refusal of the gospel: "this will be my covenant with them, when I take away their sins." The argument concerning the olive tree,* and the theme of Romans 11 generally, is that despite the present enmity as regards the gospel, the election of Israel still stands. "God has not cast off Israel" (Rom 11:1, 7). The covenant is secure and Israel's election is not in doubt, for "the gifts and the call of God are irrevocable" (Rom 11:29).

Though we cannot insist that Paul's theology was covenantal in the sense that he explicitly used covenantal terminology, it may be that there existed at Rome a misunderstanding of the covenant with Israel arising from the success of Paul's Gentile mission (see Campbell). In face of this, Paul focused his thinking in Romans upon the theme of the covenant. Whereas in Galatians Christ is "the seed," in Romans the people of faith are "the seed," and there is continuity "from faith to faith," with the covenant being opened up to include Gentiles also.

4. Conclusion.

R. D. Kaylor argues that the role of covenant functions at two levels in Paul's theology—at the levels of idea and of conviction. Though Paul may not always have had this distinction in mind, Kaylor holds, nevertheless, that the covenant as a conviction functions as a persistent presence and a dominant reality in Paul's life, work and thought.

Had Romans been written prior to Galatians, we might have argued that covenantal or heilsgeschichtlich (salvation historical) thinking is a relic of Paul's Jewish past, eventually to be cast aside. But the issue is very complicated. It centers upon the problem of what "descent from Abraham" means. In the case of Sarah—where discontinuity (and covenant failure) seemed inevitable, God miraculously intervened to provide an heir (cf. Is 54:1). This could be seen to indicate God's maintenance of earthly continuity (cf. Rom 4:19); but in fact it may also be interpreted as the opposite—as the divine activity of the new creation. We should note, however, that in Sarah's case, it is divine creativity in relation to a people of promise. Only later in history did this creativity extend beyond Israel to Gentiles, and even then it will be through Jesus Christ—"of the seed of David."

The covenant concept indicates continuity in the divine purpose in history. It primarily depends on the faithfulness of God (e.g., Romans 3:21-26). But how can one give an adequate explanation of an earthly continuity in faith—Abraham—Isaac—Jesus? In Romans 9:21 Paul argues that it is not those of physical descent alone who are Abraham's children, it is those of physical descent who also share the faith of their father Abraham. Only in Romans 9:22-24 does Paul mention the inclusion of Gentiles. The Gentiles are included not in and of themselves but in and with the faithful in Israel (cf. Eph 2:11-22).

Käsemann rightly insists that right relationship and righteousness* can only be ours in so far as God gives them to us anew every day (i.e., in faith). But does this mean that God's revelation only comes to people in a punctiliar manner, as "a bolt from the blue"? Or does revelation tend to occur in the context of a believing family or of a wider community of faith? The problem with the latter view is that history is not simply the record of divine achievement, but also of human sinfulness. It was Jeremiah's despair at the latter that led him to posit a "new covenant."

Christians have tended to regard Jeremiah's new covenant as the clear basis for the fully developed Christian concept of a new dispensation. This is then frequently read back into Paul's writings via Hebrews. It is however, by no means clear that "new covenant" was a term widely used in earliest Christianity. It is certainly reasonably correct to hold that "old covenant" was a rare concept up to the time of the death of Paul.

For various reasons, it seems, Paul did not frequently use explicit covenant terminology. Yet it does occur at important points in some of his writings. The frequency of "calling,"* "election"* and related terms in 1 Corinthians, for example, may indicate it was significant in Paul's thought. But whatever we conclude from the above, it is clear that when Paul used the terms old or new covenant, he did not include many of the associated ideas of a later more developed Christianity. As W. D. Davies has reminded us, Jeremiah did not look forward to a new Law but to "my law," and that the adjective ḥāḏāš in Jeremiah 31:31, translated kainē by Paul, can be applied to the new moon which is simply the old moon in a new light.

See also ABRAHAM; CIRCUMCISION; CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; GENTILES; ISRAEL; JUDAIZERS; LAW; LORD'S SUPPER; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL; OLIVE TREE; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. B. Agus, "The Covenant Concept—Particularistic, Pluralistic, or Futuristic," JES 18 (1981) 217-30; C. K. Barrett, "The Allegory of Abraham, Sarah and Hagar in the Argument of Galatians," in Essays on Paul (London: SPCK, 1982) 154-69; W. S. Campbell, Paul's Gospel in an Intercultural Context: Jew and Gentile in the Letter to the Romans (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1991); E. J. Christiansen, "Baptism: Covenant Ritual or Conversion Rite? A Study of Ecclesiological Identity and Baptismal Boundaries in Pauline Christianity and Palestinian Judaism" (unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Durham, November 1992); J. Cott, "The Biblical Problem of Election," JES 21 (1984) 199-228; W. D. Davies, "Paul and the People of Israel," NTS 24 (1978) 4-39; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Theology of Galatians," in Pauline Theology, Vol. 1, ed. J. M. Bassler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 160-79; L. Gaston, Paul and the Torah (Vancouver: University of British Columbia, 1987); D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); E. Grässer, Der Alte Bund im Neuen (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1985); S. J. Hafemann, Suffering and the Spirit (WUNT 2.19; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1986); G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians: Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts (JSNTSup 29; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1989); M. D. Hooker, "Paul and Covenantal Nomism," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK) 47-56; J. J. Hughes, "Hebrews 9:15ff and Galatians 3:15ff: A Study in Covenant Practice and Procedure," NovT (1979) 27-96; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); R. D. Kaylor, Paul's Covenant Community: Jew and Gentile in Romans (Atlanta: John Knox, 1988); H. J. Kraus, ed., Der Ungekuendigte Bund (Stuttgart: Kreuz, 1962); S. Lehne The New Covenant in Hebrews (JSNTSup 44; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); U. Luz, "Der alte und der neue Bund bei Paulus im Hebräerbrief," EvTh 27 (1967) 318-36; R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Dallas: Word, 1986); J. L. Martyn, "A Law Observant Mission to Gentiles: The Background of Galatians," SJT 38 (1985) 307-24; idem, "Events in Galatia: Modified Covenantal Nomism Versus God's Invasion of the Cosmos in the Singular Gospel," in Pauline Theology, Vol I, ed. J. M. Bassler (Minneapolis: Fortress 1991) 160-79; idem, "The Covenants of Hagar and Sarah," in Faith and History: Essays in Honor of Paul W. Meyer, ed. J. T. Carroll et al. (Atlanta: Scholars, 1991) 160-92; E. P. Sanders, Paul (Oxford: University Press, 1991); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1991).

W. S. Campbell

COVENANTAL NOMISM.

See LAW; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; WORKS OF THE LAW.

COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS

In Acts and the Pauline letters some one hundred individuals, under a score of titles and activities, are associated with the apostle at one time or another during his ministry. They are participants in his preaching and teaching and in his writing, and they define the apostle's work as a "collaborative ministry" (Harrington).

1. The Identity and Designations of the Coworkers
2. The Classification of Their Activities

1. The Identity and Designations of the Coworkers. The total number of Paul's coworkers has been placed at ninety-five (Redlich) or eighty-one (Pölzl), depending on how broadly one defines the term. When the names mentioned only in Acts and those with unspecified and general relationships to Paul are eliminated, thirty-six coworkers under nine designations can be identified with considerable probability (see chart).

1.1. Long-Term Coworkers. A number of these individuals have a long-term relationship with the apostle. Barnabas,* Mark and Titus are associated with him from the time of his Antiochian ministry (c. A.D. 46; Acts 13:1-3, 5; Gal 2:1, 13). The latter two remain in relationship to his mission* from time to time until the close of his life in c. A.D. 67 (see Pastoral Letters), as do a number who joined him during his mission to Greece: Timothy, Luke, Priscilla (= Prisca) and Aquila, and perhaps Erastus (c. A.D. 50-52; Acts 16:1-3, 10 ["we"]; 18:2; 19:22; Rom 16:3, 21, 23; 2 Tim 1:2; 4:10-11, 19-20; Tit 1:4). Similar are certain associates who initially come into view during Paul's first Aegean ministry: Apollos,* Trophimus and Tychicus (c. A.D. 53-58; Acts 19:1; 20:4; 1 Cor 16:12; Eph 6:21; Col 4:7; 2 Tim 4:12, 20; Tit 3:13). On the probable Caesarean provenance of three letters from prison—Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon (c. A.D. 58-60)—the name Demas may be added, although he abandoned the mission near the end of Paul's life (Col 4:14; 2 Tim 4:10; Philem 24). These ten or so long-time coworkers are complemented by many others who are a part of Paul's mission for shorter periods of time.

Of these long-term associates, five appear as Paul's subordinates, serving him or being subject to his instructions. They are Erastus, Mark, Timothy, Titus and Tychicus (Acts 19:22; Phil 2:19; Col 4:7-8; 2 Tim 4:10-12; Tit 1:5; 3:12; cf. 2 Cor 12:18). Others have a cooperative relationship with Paul but work in relative independence (Apollos, Priscilla and Aquila) or join him only on specific missions (Barnabas, Silas = Silvanus, Mark; cf. Acts 13:1-3; 15:40-41; 1 Thess 1:1).

1.2. Four Frequent Designations. The designations most often given to Paul's fellow workers are in descending order of frequency as follows: coworker (synergos), brother (adelphos), minister (diakonos) and apostle* (apostolos).

1.2.1. Coworker (Synergos). Some of Paul's associates are termed coworkers "of Paul" "in Christ" and for the Christian community (Rom 16:3, 9, 21; 2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25). They are also coworkers "with God" (1 Cor 3:9; 1 Thess 3:2 [D]; see Harnack, 7; but cf. Furnish, 369: "for God") in God's work even though they are God's "servants"* (diakonoi), each of whom "will receive his own reward according to his own toil" (1 Cor 3:8). Coworkers, workers (ergatai) and "those who toil" (hoi kopiōntes) usually are virtually equivalent idioms for a specific group or class and are not used of believers generally. The terms are applied to itinerant or local personnel and are connected with the right to pay or support, as Christ ordained (1 Cor 9:14; 1 Tim 5:18b; cf. Lk 10:7b), including "those who toil in word and teaching" (1 Tim 5:17; 2 Tim 2:6). They are entitled to respect and obedience by the congregation (1 Cor 16:16, 18) and are, at least at times, an appointed group (1 Thess 5:12; cf. Harnack, 1-10). On the other hand, if they become idlers, they should not receive support, for "if anyone does not want to work, neither let him eat," that is, at the community's expense (2 Thess 3:10; cf. Ellis 1993, 7, 10-11, 20-21). However, their ministry was a function of their spiritual gifts, and their support and leadership role was apparently unofficial and had no contractual character.

1.2.2. Brother (Adelphos). The term "brothers," like "slaves"* (douloi), can refer either to Christians generally or to Christian workers. "Brothers" often has the latter connotation when it is used with the article (cf.

	adelphos "brother"	apostolos "apostle"	diakonos "minister"	(syn)doulos "fellow slave"	koinōnos "partner"	ho kopiōn "toiler"	(sy)stratiōtēs "(fellow) soldier"	synaichmalōtos "fellow prisoner"	synergos "coworker"
Achaicus[1]	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)
Andronicus[3]	—	Rom 16:7	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:7	—
Apollos	1 Cor 16:12	1 Cor 4:9	1 Cor 3:5	—	—	—	—	—	1 Cor 3:9
Apphia[1]	(Philem 2)	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Aquila & Prisca	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:3-5
Archippus	—	—	(Col 4:17)	—	—	—	Philem 2	—	—
Aristarchus	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Col 4:10	Philem 24 (Col 4:10-11)
Barnabas	—	Acts 14:4, 14 (1 Cor 9:5-6)	—	—	—	—	(1 Cor 9:7)	—	(Col 4:10-11)
Clement[1]	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Phil 4:2-3
Demas	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Philem 24 (Col 4:11, 14)
Epaphras	—	—	Col 1:7	Col 1:7; 4:12	—	—	—	Philem 23	—
Epaphroditus[1]	Phil 2:25	Phil 2:25	—	—	—	—	Phil 2:25	—	Phil 2:25
Erastus	—	—	(Acts 19:22)	—	—	—	—	—	—
Euodia & Syntyche[3]	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	(Phil 4:2-3)
Fortunatus[1]	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)
Junia[3]	—	Rom 16:7	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:7	—
Justus[1]	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Col 4:10-11
Luke	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Philem 24 (Col 4:11, 14)
Mark	—	—	(2 Tim 4:11)	—	—	—	—	—	Philem 24 (Col 4:11)
Mary[3]	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:6	—	—	—
Onesimus	Col 4:9	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Persis[3]	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:12	—	—	—
Philemon[1]	(Philem 7)	—	—	—	Philem 17	—	—	—	Philem 1
Phoebe[1]	(Rom 16:1)	—	(Rom 16:1)	—	—	—	—	—	—
Quartus[3]	Rom 16:23	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Sosthenes[1]	1 Cor 1:1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Silas	Acts 15:22 (1 Thess 3:2)	1 Thess 2:7	—	—	—	—	—	—	(1 Thess 3:2)
Stephanas[1]	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)	—	—	(1 Cor 16:15-18)
Timothy	2 Cor 1:1 Col 1:1 1 Thess 3:2 Philem 1	— (1 Thess 2:7)	(Acts 19:22) 2 Cor 3:6; 6:4 1 Thess 3:2	— Phil 1:1 2 Tim 2:24	—	2 Tim 2:6	2 Tim 2:3	—	Rom 16:21 (1 Cor 16:10) (1 Thess 3:2)
Titus	2 Cor 2:13 (2 Cor 8:16-23)	—	—	—	2 Cor 8:23	—	—	—	2 Cor 8:23
Tryphaena & Tryphosa[3]	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:12	—	—	—
Tychicus	Eph 6:21 Col 4:7	—	Eph 6:21 Col 4:7	— Col 4:7	—	—	—	—	—
Urbanus[3]	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	Rom 16:9
Paul	—	Rom 1:1 passim	1 Cor 3:5 passim	Rom 1:1 passim	Philem 17	(1 Cor 15:10 passim)	(1 Cor 9:7)	—	1 Cor 3:9
Christ	Rom 8:29 Heb 2:11-12	Heb 3:1	Gal 2:17 cf. Lk 22:27 Rom 15:8	Phil 2:7	cf. 2 Cor 1:5-7	—	—	—	—
Christians generally	Rom 8:29 1 Cor 3:1	—	?Heb 6:10	1 Cor 7:22 Eph 6:6	—	—	—	—	—

[1]Mentioned in only one passage (one letter).
[2]Mentioned only once, with Paul in a greeting.
[3]Mentioned only once, a recipient of Paul's greeting.

Ellis 1993, 13-17). This becomes apparent when "the brothers" are distinguished from "the church" (1 Cor 16:19-20) or from believers generally (Eph 6:23-24; Phil 4:21-22; Col 4:15). It also probably has this sense in Paul's letter from Antioch* (cf. Longenecker, lxxx-viii) to the Galatians: "Paul . . . and all the brothers with me" (Gal 1:1-2); cosenders elsewhere are always fellow workers (1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Phil 1:1; Col 1:1; 1 Thess 1:1; cf. Acts 13:1-3). "The brothers" may refer to workers in local congregations (Phil 1:14; cf. Col 1:2 with 4:15-16; cf. Acts 11:1, 29; 12:17) or to those whose ministry takes on a traveling missionary character (2 Cor 2:13; 8:18, 22-23; cf. Acts 10:23; 11:12).

1.2.3. Minister (Diakonos). The term diakonos occurs in close connection with the above designations (1 Cor 3:5, 9; 2 Cor 6:1, 4) but has a somewhat more specialized meaning. It is probably best rendered "minister" since it refers to workers with special activities in preaching* and teaching,* both among Paul and his coworkers (1 Cor 3:5; 2 Cor 3:6; 6:4; Eph 3:7-8; Col 1:7, 23; 1 Tim 4:6) and among his opponents* (2 Cor 11:15, 23; cf. Ellis 1993, 102-3; Georgi, 27-32). Like "the brothers," the diakonoi serve in local congregations (Rom 16:1; Phil 1:1; 1 Tim 3:8) as well as on missionary circuits and, as teachers, they are mentioned as deserving of pay (Gal 6:6; Longenecker, 278-79).

1.2.4. Apostles (Apostoloi) of Jesus Christ. As ministers are a special kind of worker, so apostles (apostoloi) of Jesus Christ are a special kind of minister. In part they fulfill the same type of work and can be called ministers (cf. 1 Cor 4:9 with 3:5; Eph 3:5, 7). However, in other respects they are a more exclusive category. They are those who have "seen Jesus our Lord" (1 Cor 9:1; cf. 15:5-8), that is, those whom the risen Jesus commissioned, since his appearances seem always to have been coupled with a commission. In this category of apostles were a large number, including "500 brothers" (1 Cor 15:6), an understanding of "apostles of Christ" that is common to the NT, also to Luke-Acts (cf. Ellis 1987, 132-35). Although the term apostles can be used in the NT more narrowly to refer to the Twelve (e.g., Acts 4:35-37; 5; cf. Acts 6:2 with 6:6; 9:27), the limitation of apostles to the Twelve plus Paul is a creation of the later church.

Apostles of Jesus Christ among Paul's coworkers include Apollos, Barnabas and Silas. Apollos is probably included with Paul and Peter in Paul's phrase "us apostles" (1 Cor 4:9; cf. 3:22—4:1) and placed on a par with them. Accordingly, when Apollos is described by Acts (18:24-25; cf. 19:1-7) as "instructed in the way of the Lord" (cf. Lk 3:4; 20:21) and "knowing only the baptism of John [the Baptist]," it is likely that he is identified as an apostle of the earthly Jesus, who continued his apostleship separate from, and without knowledge of, Pentecost and of the Jerusalem events (Acts 1—6). He may well have won the converts in Acts 19:1-7. If his fervor "in spirit" refers to the Holy Spirit, it could be the same Holy Spirit power that was active in the preresurrection apostolic missions (cf. Lk 10). This understanding may explain why in Luke's account Apollos, like the Twelve, remains without a "Christian" baptism,* and it quite likely underlies his later listing as one of the Seventy (ps-Hippolytus, On the Seventy Apostles 50; ANF V.256). His identification as an Alexandrian Jew refers to his birthplace and to his special political and civil rights (cf. Philo Flacc. 53; Leg. Gai. 371; Kasher, 261), and probably has no more to do with his Christian background than Tarsus had to do with Paul's (Acts 18:24; 22:3; see Jew, Paul the). Teaching and preaching in the Aegean area, Apollos remained in occasional association with Paul from the early fifties to the mid-sixties (Tit 3:13).

Barnabas, a native of Cyprus, was a member of the Jerusalem* church in its earliest days (Acts 4:36). He introduced the newly converted Paul to the Twelve, invited his participation in the Hellenist mission at Syrian Antioch,* and with Paul was numbered among the resident "prophets and teachers" there (Acts 9:27; 11:25-26; 13:1). Barnabas and Paul are equated with "the rest of the apostles" at 1 Corinthians 9:5-6; and they are called "apostles" at Acts 14:4, 14, texts that probably refer to those commissioned by Christ and not to "apostles of the churches" (2 Cor 8:23 = commissioned missionaries), a usage that is foreign to Luke-Acts. After working with Paul during the famine visit and on the Cyprus-Galatian mission, together with his cousin Mark (c. A.D. 46-49; Acts 13—14; Gal 2:1, 9), and at the council of Jerusalem (c. A.D. 50; Acts 15:2, 12, 22; cf. Gal 2:13), Barnabas returned with Mark to the evangelization of Cyprus (Acts 15:39). In the fifties he appears to have ministered around the Aegean and in Asia Minor, at times in Pauline congregations, since he is known to Paul's churches at Corinth (c. A.D. 53; 1 Cor 9:6) and at Colossae (c. A.D. 60; Col 4:10). Like Apollos, he is counted by later tradition as one of the Seventy apostles (see above; cf. Clement of Alexandria Strom. 2.20; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.12.1; 2.1.4).

Silas, a prophet in the Jerusalem church who coauthored and distributed the decree of the Council (Acts 15:22-23: grapsantes dia cheiros autōn), joined Paul in his mission to Greece (c. A.D. 50-53; Acts 15:40—18:22). According to 1 Thessalonians 1:1 and 2 Thessalonians 1:1 he was a cosender and plausibly the coauthor of these letters (see 2.2.1 below). Like Mark

(Col 4:10; Philem 24; 1 Pet 5:13; cf. Ellis Making), Silas was later a coworker in the Petrine mission where he also had a writing role as the secretary in composing 1 Peter (1 Peter 5:12). Both he and Paul are termed Roman citizens (Acts 16:37-38), and in 1 Thessalonians 2:6 (Gk 2:7) they are jointly referred to as "apostles of Christ" (Christou apostoloi), an idiom that identifies both as men who were personally commissioned by Christ. With this understanding Silas, like Apollos (see above), is counted as one of the Seventy apostles in church tradition which, in a clear misconception, also makes him a different person from Silvanus. That he, Apollos and Barnabas are called prophets or teachers or ministers does not rule out their apostolic status since Paul can also identify himself with these other ministries (1 Cor 14:37; 4:17; 1 Tim 2:7; Col 1:23; cf. Ellis 1993, 132n, 138-42).

1.2.4.1. False Apostles. The larger circle of "apostles of Christ" included not a few unnamed opponents of Paul who, like Judas, were commissioned by Jesus but turned out to be "ministers of Satan*" (2 Cor 11:15), who preached "another gospel*" (2 Cor 11:4; cf. Gal 1:6; I Tim 4:1) and were thus "false apostles" (2 Cor 11:13). Or did they only make a false claim to have been commissioned by Jesus? Favoring the former view are Paul's earlier (caustic) recognition of their apostolic status (2 Cor 11:5; cf. Ellis 1993, 105-6) and lettered credentials (2 Cor 3:1), and the analogy with Satan. In the Judaism of the period Satan was understood to have been originally an angel* of God, an angel of light (cf. Lk 10:18; Jude 8-9; 1 Enoch 6; Job 1:6; Zech 3:1) who, after his fall, was, with his angels, the invisible power behind earthly rulers (1 Cor 2:8; cf. Dan 10:13; Ezek 28:12-15; 1QM 1:1; perhaps, Rom 13:1 [exousiai]; Is 14:12) and false teachers (CD 12:2-3), and who could disguise himself in his former righteousness (2 Cor 11:14-15; cf. Mt 12:24).

1.2.4.2. Apostles of the Churches. "Apostles of the churches," that is, commissioned missionaries, are also present among Paul's associates. They embrace the unnamed brothers traveling with Titus, including one whose service "in the gospel" was of high renown (2 Cor 8:16-24, 23); Epaphroditus, the "apostle" (apostolos) of the Philippian church to Paul (Phil 2:25), and Andronicus and Junia, probably a married couple who were kinfolk of Paul and "outstanding among the apostles" (episēmoi en tois apostolois, Rom 16:7). Because of this phrase they have sometimes been identified as "apostles of Christ," but that meaning is precluded by the descriptions: (1) This otherwise unknown couple could hardly be described, in comparison with Peter, James or even Paul himself, as "outstanding among the apostles of Christ." (2) Also, if they were "apostles of Christ," the phrase "who were in Christ before me" would be a meaningless redundancy (cf. 1 Cor 15:8). They are, in fact, identified as commissioned missionaries.

1.3. Other Categories of Coworkers.

1.3.1. Paul's Relatives. Near the beginning of his ministry Paul fled from enemies in Jerusalem to Tarsus in Cilicia, the city of his birth, and ministered in that area for about ten years (c. A.D. 36-46; Gal 1:21; Acts 9:30; 11:25; 15:23; 21:39; 22:3). That he had relatives there who sheltered him on his arrival is a reasonable surmise. He was later aided by his sister's son after his arrest in Jerusalem during his collection* visit (c. A.D. 58; Acts 23:16).

In Romans 16:7, 11, 21 Paul mentions six kinfolk (syngeneis = "relatives" not "fellow Jews"), five of whom played a more explicit role in his ministry.* The couple mentioned above, Andronicus and Junia, were very early converts, having been won to Christ before the apostle. Accordingly, they were very likely Jerusalem relatives who were missionaries from that church to Rome. Like Paul, they had suffered imprisonment for the sake of the gospel, although not necessarily at the same time and place (Rom 16:7). Jason (Rom 16:21) is probably none other than the Jason of Thessalonica who was Paul's host and apparently the patron of a house church there (Acts 17:5-9). Equally probable, Sosipater is the fuller name of Sopater, who represented the church of Berea on the collection visit to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4).

That Lucius of Romans 16:21 is to be identified with Luke, the beloved physician and author of Luke-Acts, poses the problem of Paul using one form of his name here and another at Colossians 4:14, Philemon 24 and 2 Timothy 4:11. Nevertheless, it remains quite possible since Luke could be an abbreviated form of Lucius and since Acts places Luke with Paul about this time (Acts 20:5-6, "we").

In mentioning these kinfolk coworkers Paul reveals something of the strategy of his mission. He utilized contacts with his relatives in charting the evangelization of Thessalonica and Berea and, upon their conversion, accepted them as fellow workers in the mission and their homes as house churches for his congregations. If Luke was also a relative, it would not only put to rest the traditional but mistaken view that Luke was a Gentile (cf. Ellis 1987, 52-53) but also explain Paul's mission route to Troas. He travelled there with the intention of adding a confidant to his team who was familiar with the area and was already ministering in Troas (Acts 16:10, "we"). In time he also utilized Luke's gifts to provide a gospel of the words and works of Jesus for reading in his mission congregations (cf. Lk 1:1-4).

1.3.2. Women Coworkers. A remarkable number of women are mentioned as Paul's associates, both in Acts and in his letters (see chart; cf. Fiorenza, Gerberding, Trebilco). Some are called ministers (diakonoi) or coworkers (synergoi) or missionaries (apostoloi), several of whom were engaged in ministries of teaching and preaching (Rom 16:1, 3, 7; Phil 4:2-3; cf. Acts 18:26). Those who "toiled" and "labored" were involved in unspecified church work (Rom 16:6, 12), and others were members of wealthy families who supported Paul as benefactors and who dedicated their homes for use as house churches (Rom 16:15; Col 4:15; Philem 1-2; cf. Rom 16:13, 15-16; Acts 16:14-15, 40: see Gillman).

1.3.3. The Circumcision Party. Ritually strict "Hebraists," or "the circumcision* party," and ritually lax "Hellenists" were in tension within the church virtually from its beginning (Acts 6:1; 11:2-3; 15:1-2, 5). The Hebraists soon divided into two factions, the "Judaizers,"* who insisted that Gentile converts be circumcized and keep the Mosaic regulations (Gal 2:4-5, 12-14; Acts 15:1, 5), and the "orthodox" Hebraists like James who, while carefully observant of Jewish traditions themselves, accepted Hellenist and Gentile believers who were not (Gal 2:9-10; Acts 15:19-21; 21:17; cf. Ellis 1993, 116-28).

Paul firmly opposed the Judaizers (2 Cor 11:22; Tit 1:10), but he sought to work in friendly and appreciative cooperation with the "orthodox" Hebraists, taking collections to their (Jacobean) mission based on Jerusalem (Gal 2:10, mnēmoneuōmen; Rom 15:25-27; 1 Cor 16:3; 2 Cor 8—9; Acts 11:29-30; 24:17). When Hebraist ministers like Silas, a prophet of the Jerusalem church, could accommodate to a Gentile mission, Paul incorporated them into his ministry team (Acts 15:40), and at Caesarea he had among his coworkers two adherents of the circumcision party, Mark and Justus (Col 4:10-11). In this way the apostle sought to maintain the unity of the church within a diversity of praxis (cf. Rom 14; Gal 6:15).

2. The Classification of Their Activities.

Coworkers are almost always present with Paul, and they participated in his mission in a variety of ways. In his traveling they occasionally conducted him (Acts 9:30; 21:16; 27:1, "we"; Acts 28:15) and, more importantly, joined in the task (Gal 2:1; Acts 11:30; 15:2; 19:29). Some accompanied him on the collection visit to Jerusalem as representatives of the various churches (2 Cor 8:19; Acts 20:4-6; cf. 1 Cor 16:3-4).

Affluent believers in various cities, including a number of women (see 1.3.2 above), became hosts to Paul, and some opened their homes for the services of a local congregation (Rom 16:3-5; 1 Cor 16:19; Philem 2; Acts 17:5-7; 18:2-3, 7; cf. Ellis 1989, 139-45). Most important were those gifted coworkers who were Paul's associates in preaching and teaching and those who were secretaries, recipients of and contributors to his letters.

2.1. Associates in Preaching and Teaching. In a manner not entirely clear to us the apostle trained coworkers who were gifted in preaching and teaching (cf. Rom 12:6-8; 1 Cor 12:28; Gal 6:6; Eph 4:11) not only to learn the basic Christian proclamation and the christological interpretation of Scripture but also to enable them to transmit his and the general apostolic message to new converts. That Paul adhered to an agreed apostolic catechesis is evident in Romans 6:17 and 16:17, and when he founded a church, he instructed believers also in his own distinctive Christian doctrines. He admonished his churches to continue in the traditions that he delivered to them and praised them for doing so (1 Cor 11:1; Col 2:7-8; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6). To mediate his teachings Paul utilized, probably from the beginning, a number of coworkers, including gifted local converts as well as those who accompanied him and who were sent out on certain occasions to establish or to give instruction to his churches.

2.1.1. Local Coworkers. Stephanus and other local coworkers at Corinth had a ministry (diakonia) that probably went beyond practical services to include a ministry of the Word (1 Cor 16:15-16; cf. 2 Cor 5:18-19). They and "the brothers" addressed in 2 Thessalonians 2:13 [B] were termed the "first fruits"* (aparchē), a concept that referred (also) to the consecrated firstborn sons, who were set apart for service to God (cf. Ex 22:29 LXX: aparchē; Ellis 1993, 8, 19-20), although in Israel the tribe of Levi served as substitutes for the firstborn of other tribes (Num 3:11-13). Such local workers, preachers and teachers, most of them trained by Paul himself, are mentioned in a number of his letters (Gal 6:6; Phil 4:2-3; cf. 1:1; 1 Thess 5:12-13; 2 Thess 3:6-11). They were at work also in the church at Colossae, which apparently was founded by Paul's "fellow slave," Epaphras (Col 1:7-8; 2:1; 3:16; 4:12, 16).

2.1.2. Coworkers Accompanying Paul. Several coworkers, in particular Timothy, Titus and Tychicus, accompanied Paul and were on occasion sent to teach his churches in his absence. Timothy had been well instructed by the apostle and therefore could be dispatched to Thessalonica to "strengthen and exhort you regarding your faith" (1 Thess 3:2, 6) and later to Corinth to "remind you of my ways in Christ just as I teach [them] everywhere in every church" (1 Cor 4:17). Sometime later Titus and others were delegated to Corinth on a more difficult mission in the confidence that Titus "walks in the same Spirit, in the same steps" as Paul himself (2 Cor 12:18; cf. 8:16, 24). Finally, Titus went to Dalmatia (Tit 3:12; 2 Tim 4:10).

Tychicus was sent as a letter-bearer to the Ephesians (Eph 6:21-22) and others, and to the Colossians (Col 4:7), not only to add a personal dimension to the correspondence but probably also to explain Paul's teachings as the occasion might require. With similar authority he (or Artemas) was appointed to replace Titus in supervising churches on Crete (Tit 3:12) and to serve as Paul's messenger or perhaps surrogate at Ephesus (2 Tim 4:12).

As his mission expanded, Paul depended on coworkers not only to further his evangelistic and teaching ministries but also to assist in his writing.

2.2. Associates in Writing.

2.2.1. Cosenders of Letters. Cosenders—Sosthenes, Timothy, the brothers, Silas—are mentioned in eight of Paul's thirteen letters, Timothy in six of them. In what ways they contributed is not disclosed, but the mention of them in the greetings is hardly ornamental (cf. Conzelmann, 234-35).

2.2.2. Secretaries. A secretary is also in evidence in virtually all of the letters, although he is named only at Romans 16:22: Tertius (see Letters). In all likelihood the secretary was selected from among the believers, perhaps from the household of an affluent convert, and was thus a coworker. His role in ancient letter-writing could vary from taking dictation to being a coauthor. For the Pauline letters it would have varied in accordance with his spiritual gifts, the apostle's confidence in him and Paul's own situation, whether captive or free, traveling or resident in a city. The secretary appears to have had a considerable influence in the composition of the Pastoral Letters* and of a number of other letters (cf. Richards, 128-98; Ellis, Making).

2.2.3. Coauthors. Probably the secretary in 1 and 2 Thessalonians is a coauthor and is to be identified with Silas/Silvanus, who also coauthored the Jerusalem decree (Acts 15:22-23; see 1.2.4 above; cf. Selwyn, 9-17). But the view that the secretary who wrote Colossians, whether Timothy or another, was also the coauthor (so Ollrog, 241-42) is more doubtful.

2.2.4. Recipients of Letters. Particular individuals were of necessity the recipients of Paul's letters, even those that were addressed and intended for the church as a whole. For churches founded by the Pauline mission, these individuals were doubtless persons whom the apostle trusted to read the letter to the congregation. In the case of Colossians and 2 Thessalonians the coworkers, that is, "the brothers" themselves, appear to have been the primary addressees of the letters (Col 1:2; 4:16; 2 Thess 2:1-2; 3:1-15; Ellis 1993, 17-22).

2.2.5. Authors of Traditions in Paul's Letters. Although it is difficult to document, a number of the preformed pieces—confessions, hymns, expositions—that were used by Paul in his letters were also probably the creations of one or more of these fellow prophets and teachers (Ellis, Making; see Creed; Hymns; Liturgical Elements).

Given the numerous and varied contributions of Paul's fellow ministers to his mission, it is clear that they were an essential factor in its accomplishments and that even Paul's letters were not an individual enterprise. These missioners indeed deserve the considered attention of students of Paul. For it does not detract from his greatness to bring into greater prominence those with whom he served, those he was glad to praise and pleased to call his coworkers.

See also APOLLOS; APOSTLE; BARNABAS; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; MAN AND WOMAN; MINISTRY; MISSION; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PASTORAL LETTERS; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, The Pauline Circle (Exeter: Paternoster, 1985); H. Conzelmann, "Paulus und die Weisheit," NTS 12 (1965-66) 231-44; E. E. Ellis, The Making of the New Testament Documents (forthcoming); idem, Pauline Theology: Ministry and Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); idem, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (4th ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993); idem, The Gospel of Luke (NCB; 5th rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); E. S. Fiorenza, "Missionaries, Apostles, Coworkers," WW 6 (1986) 420-33; V. P. Furnish, " 'Fellow Workers in God's Service' [1 Cor 3:9]," JBL 80 (1961) 364-70; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); K. A. Gerberding, "Women Who Toil in Ministry, Even as Paul," CurTM 18 (1991) 285-91; F. M. Gillman, Women Who Knew Paul (ZS: NT; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 1992); A. Harnack, "KOPOS," ZNW 27 (1928) 1-10; D. J. Harrington, "Paul and Collaborative Ministry," NTR 3 (1990) 62-71; A. Kasher, The Jews in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1985); J. Knox, Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (2d ed.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1959); E. Lohse, "Die Mitarbeiter des Paulus im Kolosserbrief," in Verborum Veritas, ed. O. Böcher and K. Haacker (Wüppertal: Brockhaus, 1970); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); W. H. Ollrog, Paulus und seine Mitarbeiter (Neukirchen: Neukirchener, 1979); F. X. Pölzl, Die Mitarbeiter des Weltapostels Paulus (Regensburg: Manz, 1911); E. B. Redlich, S. Paul and His Companions (London: Macmillan, 1913); E. R. Richards, The Secretary in the Letters of Paul (Tübingen: J. C. B.

Mohr, 1991); E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (London: Macmillan, 1946); P. Trebilco, "Women as Co-workers and Leaders in Paul's Letters," JCBRF 122 (1990) 27-36 (cited in NTA 35 [1991] 180).

E. E. Ellis

CREATION AND NEW CREATION

"New creation," kainē ktisis, is an expression Paul uses in 2 Corinthians 5:17 and Galatians 6:15. It is closely related to the expression "new human[ity]," kainos anthrōpos, in Ephesians 2:15, 4:23-24 and Colossians 3:9-10. This expression is not unique to Paul. It, and ideas associated with it, occur in several literary texts and traditions of Second Temple Judaism.

1. Need for a New Creation
2. Scope of the New Creation
3. Characteristics of the New Creation

1. Need for a New Creation.

Many early Jewish interpreters believed that God* had created a good world through the mediation of Wisdom (Prov 8:22-31; Sir 24; Wis 7:22—8:1). Paul identified this Wisdom* with Jesus Christ (1 Cor 1:17-25; Col 1:15-20). Paul also recognized that sin* damages this good creation by subjecting humankind to death (Rom 5:12-14; 1 Cor 15:21-22; see 4 Ezra 7:116-131; 2 Apoc. Bar. 54:13-19; see Life and Death) and the natural world to decay (Rom 8:19-22; see 4 Ezra 7:11-14; 2 Apoc. Bar. 56:6-10; see Futility). Disillusionment with the present state of affairs led many early Jewish interpreters to expect a new creation in a new age to come when the entire creation would be liberated from futility and transformed into its original goodness (e.g., 4 Ezra 7:75; 2 Apoc. Bar. 73—74). For Paul this age would accompany the Parousia, or future appearance, of Jesus (Rom 8:18; Eph 1:9-10; Col 3:1-4; see Eschatology).

2. Scope of the New Creation.

In 2 Corinthians 5:17 Paul suggests that this future reality is already present. There are three options for explaining precisely how the new creation is to be understood: (1) through individual converts; (2) through the community of faith; or (3) through the cosmos as a whole. Each option reflects a different opinion about which particular early Jewish texts and traditions were foremost in Paul's mind when he referred to the new creation.

2.1. Convert. In Genesis Rabbah 39.4, a Gentile convert to Judaism is regarded as a new creation: "Whoever brings a heathen near to God and converts him [or her] is as though he had created him [or her]." Similarly, in the Jewish tale of Joseph and Asenath, a heavenly man says to Asenath, upon her conversion to Judaism, "you will be renewed and formed anew" (Jos. and As. 15:4). It is possible that Paul, like his Jewish counterparts, believed the convert to Christ to be a new creation.

2.2. Community of Faith. In Isaiah 65:17-19 the author parallels a cosmic re-creation with the re-creation of Jerusalem and its inhabitants: "For I am about to create new heavens and a new earth . . . for I am about to create Jerusalem as a joy, and its people as a delight." In Isaiah 66:22-23 the author develops this thought further when he predicts that within this new creation Israel will experience the influx of Gentiles* to worship* God.

Both of these elements—the re-creation of a new community of believers and the influx of Gentiles—underlie two of the Pauline passages which contain references to the new creation or new humanity. In both passages the new creation or new humanity is a communal reality. In Galatians 6:15-16, Paul even parallels the new creation with a specific community, "the Israel* of God." In Ephesians 2:14-16 the new humanity is composed of communities rather than individuals: "in his flesh he has made both groups into one . . . that he might create in himself one new humanity in place of the two."

Concomitantly, in both passages Gentiles are the community included alongside Jews. In Galatians 6:15 the new creation is a community where "neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is anything." In Ephesians 2:11-22 (and Col 3:11) the new humanity is composed of Jews as well as Gentiles "who once were far off" (see Is 57:19). The church, therefore, is a new Israel where Jews and Gentiles are united in peace.*

2.3. Cosmos. Many apocalyptic* Jewish interpreters developed in detail the anticipation of the new heavens and new earth introduced by Isaiah 56—66. The emphases of their developments varied, including: the restoration* of Israel (Jub. 4:26; 1 Enoch 45:4-5); the transformation of the righteous in a final resurrection* (2 Apoc. Bar. 51:1-16); the liberation of the natural world (1 Enoch 51:4-5); and the return of the creation to its original state of goodness (2 Apoc. Bar. 73—74). The persistent conviction of the apocalyptic perspective is that the new age to come will be decidedly different from—and qualitatively better than—the present evil age.

Paul reflects this apocalyptic context when, in 2 Corinthians 5:17-18, he depicts a radical disjuncture between "old things" (ta archaia) and "new things" (kaina). Such words suggest much more than individual transformation. Indeed, Paul argues that God reconciled "all things" (ta panta) through Christ, including presumably the entire natural world. If 2 Corinthians 5:16-17 provides a glimpse of the beginning of the new creation, other passages presage the completion of the new creation. According to Romans 8:18-25 "the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay" (Rom 8:21), while, according to Ephesians 1:10, "all things . . . things in heaven* and things on earth" will be gathered up in Christ (see 1 Cor 15:24-28).

It is not possible to choose definitively between these options. Nor is it necessary, for all three mutually illuminate each other. The convert, as part of a community of faith, enters the cosmic drama of recreation that God inaugurated at the resurrection of Jesus Christ and will bring to completion at the Parousia (see Eschatology).

3. Characteristics of the New Creation.

A study of the Pauline contexts of the expressions "new creation" and "new human[ity]" reveals the two quintessential values that characterize the community of faith. By embodying these values, this community anticipates the final cosmic restoration of creation's goodness.

3.1. Reconciliation. The key concept that accompanies Paul's references to the new creation or new humanity is reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation). The dominant theme of 2 Corinthians 5:17-21 is that believers, who themselves have been reconciled to God, must continue by the apostolic ministry* of proclamation and witness* to bear testimony to the reconciliation of the world to God, which God inaugurated through Jesus. The thrust of Galatians 6:15, Ephesians 2:11-22 and Colossians 3:10-11 is that the new creation and new humanity come about only when peoples once divided are seen to be reconciled in Christ.

3.2. Rejection of Worldly Standards. Reconciliation can occur only when believers cease living and judging others according to worldly standards. The presence of a new creation means that new standards of unity and peace replace old standards of judgment and divisiveness. The racial division of Jew and Gentile, in particular, is based upon an obsolete criterion: "For neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is anything; but a new creation is everything!" (Gal 6:15; cf. Eph 2:11-22). Similarly, individual rivalry has no place in the new creation. Paul's reference to "new creation" in 2 Corinthians 5:17 is polemical; with it he confronts the faulty standards of his opponents at Corinth, who judge him according to worldly standards such as rhetorical* ability and physical strength (e.g., 2 Cor 10:1-11). In the new creation, contends Paul, no one is judged "from a human point of view," for even Christ is no longer judged by human standards (2 Cor 5:16). These new standards apply, not only to ethnic groups or to church leaders, but also to every believer who participates in the new humanity. He or she must put away conduct that characterizes the "old humanity," such as greed, slander and abuse (Col 3:5-9; Eph 4:25-30), and put on the new humanity, "which is being renewed in knowledge according to the image of its creator," that is, which is being restored to its original goodness (Col 3:10; see Gen 1:26). This new humanity is characterized by compassion, patience, truthfulness (Col 3:12-17; Eph 4:23-24; 32) and, once again, by reconciliation of peoples once hostile to one another (Col 3:11).

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; CHURCH; ESCHATOLOGY; NEW NATURE AND OLD NATURE; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; RESURRECTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Baumbach, "Die Schöpfung in der Theologie des Paulus," Kairos 21 (1979) 196-205; N. A. Dahl, "Christ, Creation, and the Church," in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: University Press, 1956) 422-43; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980) 36-57, 119-31; J. D. M. Derrett, "New Creation: Qumran, Paul, the Church, and Jesus," RevQ 13 (1988) 597-608; V. P. Furnish, II Corinthians (AB 32A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984) 309-16, 329-33; G. W. H. Lampe, "The New Testament Doctrine of Ktisis," SJT 17 (1964) 449-62; M. Parsons, "The New Creation," ExpT 99 (1987) 3-4; L. M. Russell, "Partnership in New Creation," ABQ 3 (1984) 161-71; P. Stuhlmacher, "Erwägungen zum ontologischen Charakter der kainē ktisis bei Paulus," EvT 27 (1967) 1-35; L. H. Taylor, The New Creation: A Study of the Pauline Doctrines of Creation, Innocence, Sin, and Redemption (New York: Pageant, 1958).

J. R. Levison

CREATOR. See CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; PRE-EXISTENCE.

CREED

It is not easy to distinguish between "creeds"—the term used of rudimentary confessions of faith expressing Christian conviction—and other types of liturgical material as they appear in the Pauline letters. Clearly a full-scale creed, in the later sense of essential articles of the Christian faith enjoying ecclesiastical sanction, is not discernible in the NT letters. But there are fragments enshrining cardinal beliefs present in the hymns,* baptismal responses and eucharistic forms which Pauline research has brought to light.

1. Marks and Usage of Creeds
2. Central Affirmation of the Creeds
3. Types of Confession

1. Marks and Usage of Creeds.
Some of the telltale marks indicating the presence of creedal formulae are seen in 1 Corinthians 15:3-5: (1) The four-times-repeated "that" (hoti) suggests Paul is consciously citing material forming a set of propositions (e.g., that "Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures"). (2) The vocabulary in these verses is full of rare terms and expressions Paul never uses in other places. (3) The introducing verbs that say that Paul "received" (parelabon) what follows as part of the instruction he had known in his early days as a new believer, and now in turn "handed on" (paredōka) to the Corinthians, are semitechnical terms for the transmission of "holy words" of the faith, both Jewish and Christian (see Tradition). (4) In its content this same passage looks to Isaiah 53 as a passion—and resurrection*—testimonium, and it is argued (by R. H. Fuller) that Paul only uses such scriptural proof of the Suffering Servant when he is consciously indebted to his predecessors.

Creedal formulations and hymnic material are not easy to separate on stylistic grounds (see Liturgical Elements). Bultmann has usefully made the distinction that the early confessions of faith tended to be expressed in simple, succinct sentences like "Jesus is the Christ*" or "Jesus is Lord,*" whereas the hymns represented a longer statement of the person and achievement of Christ (as in Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20) capable of being analyzed in stanzas and sections. But ultimately the distinction is not important since creedal materials and hymnic compositions overlap. We confine our attention here, however, to the former type.

Recent investigation of Paul's use of rhetorical forms and structures in his letters (see Rhetoric) has suggested reasons for his introducing quoted materials, notably creedal fragments. Paul as letter writer put his epistolary compositions together in an artistic way, cleverly designed to make maximum appeal to his readers whom he needed to win over to his theological point of view. One way he chose to do this was to cite creedal material, sometimes with added redactional touches to emphasize or to correct a previously cherished statement, as a common basis he believes will maintain the friendly relationship (Gr. philophronēsis) with his readers. Evidence of this is seen in Romans 1:3-4; 3:24-26; 2 Corinthians 5:18-21 and the hymnic Philippians 2:6-11. It is not surprising that he should employ this device since he is often building his polemical case on what he regarded as "received" Christian convictions which he and his congregations shared. One sure way to recall the errant members to his gospel was to draw out the implications of a "creed" they had accepted but momentarily had deserted because of alien teachings (e.g., 2 Cor 11:12-15; Col 2:8).

2. Central Affirmation of the Creeds.
The Pauline churches were made up of believing men and women whose new life in Christ was oriented to the risen Lord. Paul assumed that whatever the source of the proclamation that brought the saving message, it centered on the resurrection of Christ (1 Cor 15:11). This basic conviction gave the communities a sense of identity in the social world around them (1 Cor 10:32) and a missionary impulse to proclaim and embody the gospel* in that social setting (Gal 1:8-9; 1 Cor 9:19-23; 15:1-2; 1 Thess 2:13). Moreover, possessing a body of Christian truth explains how, from the start, the church was a worshipping community with a devotion that centered on Christ as living Lord (Mt 18:20; 1 Cor 5:4; 16:22).

Gradually this limpid confession of the risen Christ (seen in the later epigraphic motto of the fish, represented in Greek by the code word ICHTHYS, i.e., Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior, the Greek words' initials forming the word for fish, which in turn derives from such passages as Mk 1:17; 6:38-44 and par.; Jn 21:9-14) underwent developments according to the situations in which Christians were encouraged or required to confess their faith. Simple piety, however, still persisted, and in an unsophisticated form believers retained for several centuries an undeveloped faith in Christ's person without much theological refinement.

3. Types of Confession.
The life settings of the Pauline creedal forms are as follows:

3.1. Mission Preaching. With a body of doctrinal and practical beliefs known variously as "the word of life" (Phil 2:16), "the standard of teaching" (Rom 6:17), "the faith" (Col 2:6-7), "the truth" (Col 1:5; 2 Thess 2:13), "the gospel" (Rom 2:16; 16:25; Phil 1:7, 27), Paul's churches confronted the pagan world around them, sought to win over new converts and then to indoctrinate fledgling members. At the core of such mission proclamation was the claim that God has exalted Jesus as sovereign Lord (Rom 10:9-10; see Exaltation) and that faith* is seen primarily as obedience to his authority* (Rom 1:5; 14:9).

3.2. Cultic Worship. As new adherents were led to confess Christ as Lord (Rom 10:9-10) and to accept a new life in him (Col 2:6), it was natural that the honor paid in worship that put the risen Lord at the center would follow. The baptismal confession "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor 12:3; Rom 10:9-10; cf. Eph 5:26) and the Lord's Supper* service which is interpreted by Paul as a "proclaiming" of Christ's death in an eschatological context (1 Cor 11:26) are the clearest ways in which Christ crucified and living, with his parousia anticipated (1 Cor 16:22), was set at the heart of worship* practices in Paul's congregations.

3.3. Opposition. As the Pauline churches met resistance and their beliefs were challenged, first by Jewish debaters and then from within, so the creeds became more nuanced to the situation. The primary creed confessing the messiahship of Jesus gave way to longer expositions hailing his cosmic authority over demonic powers (Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; 1 Tim 3:16; see Principalities and Powers) which were placed in opposition to rival christologies and cosmologies (see World, Cosmology). Part of Paul's response was to build on the Jewish monotheistic credo (Deut 6:4-5; Is 45:22) with its belief in one God* (1 Cor 8:6) and to christianize it with a confession of the lordship of Christ, both pre-existent* (Phil 2:6; 1 Cor 10:4; 2 Cor 8:9) and exalted (Phil 2:9-11; Rom 1:3-4).

See also HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church (London: Oxford University Press, 1943); R. Bultmann, "Bekenntnis- und Liedfragmente im ersten Petrusbrief," Coniectanea Neotestamentica 11 (1949) 1-14; H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confessions (London: Lutterworth, 1949); R. H. Fuller, The Mission and Achievement of Jesus (London: SCM, 1954); G. A. Kennedy, New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1984); R. P. Martin, Worship in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963).

R. P. Martin

CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE

"We preach Christ crucified" (1 Cor 1:23). The centrality of the cross to Paul's proclamation of the gospel is captured in this enormously suggestive phrase from the Corinthian correspondence. Since the early sixteenth century, the phrase "theology of the cross" has come to be used to refer to a theology which centers on the crucifixion.* The origins of the phrase can be traced back to the Heidelberg Disputation (1518), in which Martin Luther contrasted a "theology of glory" (which marginalized the cross of Christ) and a "theology of the cross," which focused on God as he revealed himself in and through the crucified Christ.* For Luther the cross was not merely the basis of human salvation; it was the basis of God's self-revelation in which "true theology and the knowledge of God" alone could be found.

This emphasis on the centrality of the cross has remained a continuing feature of Christian theology, although this fact is perhaps more fully reflected in hymns rather than works of theology. In recent years the theology of the cross has found powerful expression chiefly in the writings of J. Moltmann and E. Jüngel, although with significant contributions from D. J. Hall and others. But what about the Pauline theology of the cross? What role did the cross play in Paul's conception of Christian theology and the Christian life?

1. Defining a Theology of the Cross
2. E. Käsemann on Paul and the Theology of the Cross
3. The Cross and the Attributes of God
4. The Cross and the Resurrection: "Now" and "Not Yet"
5. The Cross and Human Redemption
6. The Cross and the Christian Life

1. Defining a Theology of the Cross.

What is a "theology of the cross"? In one sense, just about every Christian theology could lay some claim to this title in that it makes at least some reference to the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. Even the defective Corinthian theology attacked by Paul appears to have incorporated the cross in its reflections (see Corinthians). However, in its stricter sense a "theology of the cross" can be defined in the following terms (Luz):

1.1. Ground of Salvation. A theology of the cross treats the cross as the exclusive ground of salvation. All other events within the history of salvation (such as the resurrection* of Christ or his coming again in glory*) are seen as being set in their proper context by the cross. Thus, in the case of the Corinthian theology so powerfully criticized by Paul, the resurrection appears to be detached from the cross and treated as relativizing the crucifixion. The theology of the cross negates this relativizing development.

1.2. Starting point of Christian Theology. A theology of the cross declares that the cross is the starting point of authentically Christian theology. The cross is not an isolated individual aspect of theology, but is itself the foundation of that theology. Far from being an isolated chapter in a textbook of theology, the cross both dominates and permeates all true Christian theology, with its thread being woven throughout the entirety of its fabric.

1.3. Center of Christian Thought. A theology of the cross treats the cross as the center of all Christian thought in that from its center radiate Christian statements on ethics, anthropology, the Christian life and so on. The doctrines of revelation and salvation,* so easily detached from one another, converge on the cross.

In this strong sense of the phrase, Paul and Mark (and perhaps 1 Peter) emerge as the leading representatives within the NT corpus of a theology of the cross.

2. E. Käsemann on Paul and the Theology of the Cross. Recent studies of the centrality of the cross within Paul's thought have been dominated by the influence of E. Käsemann, especially his essay "The Saving Significance of the Death of Jesus in Paul." Käsemann argues forcefully for the need to reappropriate the great Reformation insights concerning Paul's theology; more accurately, those of Luther (see Paul and His Interpreters). Standing firmly within the Lutheran tradition of Pauline interpretation, Käsemann declares that any other approach to Paul's theology can at best embrace only some of its many aspects; it is Luther's approach which takes in Paul's theology in its totality (see Center). So what are the basic features of Paul's theology of the cross, according to Käsemann?

In his analysis of the Pauline texts, Käsemann draws a precise distinction between texts which Paul inherits, and which reflect the liturgical and doxological tradition (see Liturgical Elements) of a pre-Pauline tradition,* and those texts which may be argued to owe their origin directly to Paul himself. It is these latter, it is argued, which are more authentically Pauline. To begin with, we may consider those which are argued to derive from an earlier tradition.

Käsemann argues that passages which refer to Christ's death* on the cross as possessing salvific importance largely derive from this earlier tradition. However, he discerns a process of reinterpretation in operation, by which Paul introduces radical new elements into this traditional material. In part, this reinterpretation consists in redirecting attention from the "not-yetness" of the resurrection to the "here and now" of the crucifixion—a key element of his controversy with the Corinthian enthusiasts. Also, Jewish-Christian elements (in Rom 3:24-26) are taken over but redacted to yield a richer meaning (see Käsemann 1980, 91-101). But this reinterpretation is chiefly to be seen in Paul's stress on the justification* of the ungodly. The cross brings home the full seriousness of sin,* declares the powerlessness of fallen humanity to achieve salvation and exposes human delusions of self-righteousness.

Paul's letters include a number of instances of pre-Pauline tradition which Paul has interpreted or redacted. Two such instances are of special importance. Romans 3:24-26 illustrates the general observation that the pre-Pauline tradition lacks the radical emphasis upon the cross which appears to be so typical of Paul himself. More significantly, Paul appears to add an emphasis upon the cross to Philippians 2:6-11, which is generally regarded as a pre-Pauline tradition. The phrase "even death upon a cross" disrupts the scansion of the text, suggesting that it has been added by Paul. The significant modification of this text, which now includes an explicit and important reference to the cross, illustrates Paul's concern to focus his theology on the crucified Christ.

What, then, of those passages which are to be regarded as directly arising from Paul, his personal creations, rather than an inheritance from the pre-Pauline tradition? It is in these that the message of the scandal* of the cross, with all its theological implications, is found in its fullness and distinctiveness. Perhaps the most significant such passage is 1 Corinthians 1:18-31. It is here that one finds Paul's distinctive emphasis upon the fact that God wills to justify the ungodly through the scandalous crucifixion of Jesus as a criminal publicly cursed by God. In particular, Käsemann draws attention to two distinctive features of this theology: its polemical character and its *predisposition toward rejection by the world.

Paul's theology of the cross is polemical, not in that it is directed against false understandings of the nature of God* current outside the church, but in that it counters misunderstandings of the gospel within the church* itself—such as the legalistic piety of Judaizing Christian circles (see Judaizers) or the false views concerning the resurrection current at Corinth. Paul's theology of the cross "was always a critical attack on the dominating traditional interpretation of the Christian message, and it was not by chance that it characterized Protestant beginnings" (Käsemann, 35). And that theology is orientated toward rejection by the world. Käsemann stresses that Paul's personal ministry may be seen as an autobiographical presentation of the impact of the cross in that it evokes affliction, suffering, rejection and persecution (see Afflictions, Trials, Hardships). Wherever the church takes the cross of Christ seriously, it can expect to encounter hostility.

Toward the end of his essay Käsemann introduces an important discussion on the relation between the theology of the cross and preaching,* apparently directed against those who stress the historicity and objectivity of the crucifixion. Faith cannot be allowed to become dependent on mere historical remembrances of a past event (and surely one can detect echoes here of M. Kähler's critique of purely historical approaches to christology*). The death of Christ is significant, not simply as an historical event, but through the preaching of the word (Rom 10:14) and the subsequent evoking of faith.*

Käsemann's approach to Paul's theology of the cross is brilliant and original, and he remains an enormously significant conversation partner in relation to any discussion of Paul's theology of the cross. Some obvious points of criticism of the essay may be noted, centering on his distinction between the pre-Pauline and Pauline components of the corpus.

First, why should one assume that pre-Pauline material is somehow less important than Paul's own sections? The very fact that Paul draws upon an earlier tradition may well indicate that he intended it to be taken with great seriousness, and that those sections were intended to be invested with particular interpretative weight. An obvious example is 1 Corinthians 11:23-25, where Paul clearly wishes his citation from an earlier tradition to possess enough authority* to clinch his argument (see also 1 Cor 15:1-4).

Second, how can anyone be quite so sure as Käsemann that Paul has radically modified earlier material? This question is methodologically related to the question of how a clear distinction may be drawn between traditional and redactional material, which is not necessarily as simple as Käsemann would have us believe. As far as can be seen, Paul does not always modify earlier material; there must always be a degree of doubt concerning the nature, extent and significance of Paul's reworking of the earlier tradition.

Nevertheless, Käsemann's essay, supplemented by a distinguished series of subsequent writings, may be said to have stimulated new interest in the Pauline theology of the cross, especially within German language scholarship, and increasingly within North American writings (e.g., Beker, Cousar). The remainder of this essay attempts a general survey of this theology, in the light of this work.

3. The Cross and the Attributes of God.

The impact of Paul's theology of the cross on the attributes of God is best seen from the analysis of 1 Corinthians 1:18—2:5. This passage appears to be addressed to a community which has lost sight of the centrality of the cross on account of a preoccupation with a quasi-gnostic (see Gnosis, Gnosticism) notion of resurrection* or heavenly existence in the present world. Significantly, Paul appears to make the demand that all talk of the divine attributes should be grounded in the crucified Christ rather than human preconceptions of what counts as "wisdom."* There are strong parallels between the theology of the cross and the doctrine of justification*: just as the world tried to discern God through its own wisdom (1 Cor 1:21), so it sought to attain justification through works of the Law (Rom 3:21-26; see Works of the Law). This is not so much a suggestion that human wisdom is slightly deficient; it is an assertion that there is such a serious flaw in natural human notions of wisdom that humanity totally inverts the relation of "wisdom" and "folly." Christ becomes for us the "wisdom of God" (1 Cor 1:30)—an idea which is perhaps best understood in terms of Christ becoming the paradigm of divine wisdom. The crucified Christ is the interpretative framework for making sense of God.

The passage may be regarded as a powerful demonstration of the freedom of God. God is not bound by the limitations of human categories. Human concepts of wisdom are shown up as spurious, things that humans have invented rather than things that have been revealed. There are parallels here with the related argument developed in Romans 1:19-25, where Paul argues that sinful humans have a natural propensity to confuse the creation with the Creator, substituting created entities for their having been made by God. Paul's argument clearly centers on the fact that humanity has been allowed to define the framework of reference for understanding God, rather than allowing God to establish that framework himself. 1 Corinthians 1:30 implies that human ideas of wisdom,* righteousness,* sanctification (see Holiness, Sanctification) and redemption* are not merely relativized, but are shown to be spurious by the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. It is not simply that God"s ways are not our ways; it is that our ways of thinking preclude us from discerning those ways in the first place.

This point can be understood by considering Paul's discussion of the notion of the "righteousness of God" in relation to the justification of the ungodly (e.g., Rom 3:21-26). Alongside the hints at the covenant faithfulness of God is the notion that God is somehow defined in relation to the justification event. God is one who—despite all the offence given to human notions of justice—justifies the ungodly. Believers are asked to trust in the one "who justifies the ungodly" (Rom 4:5)—that is, God. Just as God justifies the ungodly (thus simultaneously offending and contradicting human ideas of justice and righteousness), so God chooses those who are weak and foolish in the eyes of the world (thus simultaneously offending and contradicting human ideas of wisdom).

The cross—more accurately, the crucified Christ—

thus acts as both the foundation of authentically Christian ways of thinking about God, and as a judge of those ways of thinking about God which humans absorb uncritically from the world around them and unconsciously incorporate into theological reflections. If Käsemann is right, and Paul's theology of the cross is indeed polemical in nature, directed toward inadequate theologies within the church itself, then theology must submit itself to this criterion.

4. The Cross and the Resurrection: "Now" and "Not Yet."

How do the cross and resurrection relate to one another? Käsemann delivered a powerful protest against those who saw the cross and resurrection as "two links in a chain"—the chain in question being the ordered sequence of events which leads from the pre-existence to the final return of Christ, taking in such landmarks as his birth (or incarnation) and ascension en route. As noted above, the theology of the cross insists upon the cross being given priority over all other events in the history of salvation. Käsemann thus declares that the cross and resurrection are to be related as "riddle and interpretation."

This contrasts with the pre-Pauline tradition (e.g., at 1 Cor 15:3-4), in which cross and resurrection are treated as events in sequence. While it could be argued that the cross is the necessary presupposition of the resurrection (in that without Christ's death, he could not have been raised again), this insight is not necessarily theologically significant. It is not that the cross is a chapter in the history of the resurrection in which the resurrection excels the cross in importance. Rather, the resurrection gives meaning to the cross, with the cross being the real center of gravity. One might almost say that the resurrection is a chapter in a book on the theology of the cross. Before Paul, the cross of Jesus formed the question which was answered by the message of the resurrection. The apostle decisively reversed this way of looking at things. In his controversy with the enthusiasts it was precisely the interpretation of the resurrection which turned out to be a problem, a problem which can only be answered in the light of the cross. The situation at Corinth illustrates this point well.

The most reasonable interpretation of the Corinthian situation could be summarized along the following lines. A section of the church had developed ideas which sound similar to those associated with Hymenaeus and Philetus (1 Tim 2:17-18)—that the resurrection has already taken place. This idea of a "realized resurrection" accounts for many of the distinctive themes associated with the situation addressed by 1 Corinthians (see Corinthians). The "not yet" emphasis may be directed against those who believed that they had already attained fulfillment, who were already endowed with spiritual and heavenly voices, and who were already speaking with the tongues* of angels.* Paul's emphasis on the cross appears intended to stress that the cross cannot be bypassed on the way to resurrection. Before sharing in the resurrection life and all its fullness, believers must first pass through the shadow of the cross, which continues to fall across the entire range of Christian existence (see Eschatology).

A similar point emerges from Paul's discussion of baptism, especially as it is found in Romans (Rom 6:1-11). A consistent eschatological reserve is maintained here, as in the earlier Corinthian correspondence. Through baptism, believers are participants in the death of Christ on the cross—and believers shall be participants in his resurrection. Believers have been united with him in his death; they shall be united with him in his resurrection (Rom 6:5). Believers have died with Christ; they shall live with him in his resurrection (Rom 6:8-9; see Dying and Rising with Christ). Baptism* thus does not lead directly to a sharing in the resurrection: sharing in Christ's death is the "here and now" to which sharing in his resurrection is the "not yet." Paul's emphasis on the present sharing of believers in the death of Christ firmly anchors the life of faith to this world and presents heaven as a future reality, present in promise, yet not in fact: non in re sed in spe (Luther).

5. The Cross and Human Redemption.

In turning to deal with the Pauline theology of the cross as it relates to human redemption, one discovers Paul presenting and endorsing ideas which appear to go back to the pre-Pauline tradition. The idea that Christ "died for (hyper) our sins" is deeply embedded within the Pauline corpus (e.g., Rom 5:6, 8; 14:15; Gal 1:4; 2:20). Most significantly, the phrase is cited from the pre-Pauline tradition (1 Cor 15:3) in such a way as to leave no doubt of its considerable authority both for Paul and for his readership. The historic event of the crucifixion is thus overlaid with a significant interpretative element, in which history becomes salvation history. But how is this salvation event to be explored further?

Paul's exposition of the manner in which Christ's death* on the cross is salvific is complex, often intermingling a variety of deeply suggestive and rich images in a very short space. In 2 Corinthians 5:14—6:2 a remarkable set of images is interwoven, to build up a composite picture of the manner in which the cross may be said to redeem us. In Romans 3:24-26, three significant images (to be discussed below) are integrated to give a comprehensive overview of the redemption event. Yet it is difficult to reduce Paul's statements here, or elsewhere, to the neat theories so beloved of certain theologians. For example, Paul's thought at Romans 6:1-11 is clearly participatory; the believer shares in Christ's death now, and will finally share in his resurrection. But in 2 Corinthians 5:21 vicarious language is used: there is an interchange of sin and righteousness between the believer and Christ (Hooker).

Debate has centered on a number of key images used within the Pauline corpus to describe the "benefits of Christ" (Melanchthon). Three may be noted as being of special importance.

1. The Greek word hilastērion is traditionally translated "expiation" or "propitiation," although the term "mercy seat" (cf. Lev 16) is increasingly finding favor among exegetes (see Expiation, Propitiation, Mercy Seat). This technical term occurs only once in the Pauline corpus, making its interpretation as significant as it is difficult, given its pivotal function in Romans 3:24-26. The translation "propitiation" would convey associations of "an action directed towards satisfaction of the divine wrath" (Morris). The strong link between sin and the wrath* of God (e.g., Rom 1:18; 3:5) makes this a strong possibility. To translate the term as "expiation" would imply that the death of Christ "makes amends for sin," suggesting that Christ's death is aimed at the rectification of sin rather than the appeasement of God. "The wrath of God in the case of Jesus' death is not so much retributive as preventative" (Dunn). In the end, this debate must be left open. Christ's death is clearly understood to get to the root cause of sin—however that is understood.

2. The act of God justifying the ungodly. (We have deliberately avoided the noun "justification" to remain faithful to the fact that Paul almost invariably uses the verb. See Justification; Righteousness.) This idea expresses a number of central Pauline ideas: God's powerful, cosmic and universal action in effecting a change in the situation between sinful humanity and God by which God is able to acquit believers, setting them in a right and faithful relation to himself. The death of Christ can be seen as a simultaneous vindication of the character of God and a genuine forgiveness of human sins (Rom 3:26).

3. The idea of "redemption"* (Rom 3:24) has strong links with the world of a slave market or prison. The dominant theme is that of liberation from being "under the power of sin" (Rom 3:9). Sin is here understood as a power or force, which exercises authority and dominion over sinful humanity. The death of Christ snaps this baleful force, enabling humans to achieve the glorious liberty of the children of God (see Adoption, Sonship).

It must be stressed, however, that Paul is not concerned to build up a systematic theology of redemption such as that which is found in many a scholastic theologian. It is the reality rather than any specific theory of the power* of God to deliver from sin through the death of Christ that dominates Paul's horizons. The images used toward this end are illustrative, and one would do well to avoid the selectivity and prioritization that inevitably accompany systematization of the event of redemption. The theology of the cross has much to tell us here, by reminding us that it is the cross, the crucified Christ, that lies at the heart of the Christian gospel,* not a theory.

6. The Cross and the Christian Life.

How does the cross affect the Christian life? It is perhaps here that the full implications of a theology of the cross become clear. For theology becomes spirituality, not spirituality in the vague humanist sense of a means of heightening human religiosity, but in the proper sense of fashioning people who are on the road to becoming spiritual. The cross shapes the Christian life, a fact which Paul develops in a powerful series of autobiographical passages in which he relates the way in which he has been shaped by the cross and conformed to the pattern of the crucified Christ. In a significant series of passages Paul indicates the manner in which the cross may be expected to affect the life of believers. We may pick up the themes in the passages that follow.

6.1. 2 Corinthians 4:7-15. In this list of afflictions,* which bears a significant relationship to the "hardship literature" of the classical period, Paul indicates the manner in which the cross of Christ impresses itself upon his existence. To be a believer is to bear the marks of hardship, conflict and rejection. The key idea is expressed in the enormously evocative sentence "always carrying in the body the death of Jesus" (2 Cor 4:10). For Paul, Christ and his cross are the cause and the paradigm of the suffering of the believer. There is a strong sense of the believer sharing in the life—and hence in the sufferings—of Christ, an idea perhaps expressed most fully at Romans 8:17 (cf. Col 1:24).

6.2. Galatians 6:14. "Far be it for me to glory except in the cross of Christ Jesus, by which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world." This significant passage is concerned with the criticism of those who, for worldly reasons, wish to compel Christians to adopt lifestyles which are alien to the gospel. The world is seen as a power impinging upon the life of believers where it has no authority to do so. The passage implies an organic relation between three crucifixions: those of Christ, Paul and the world. On account of the cross Paul has died to the world, and the world has died to him. "Those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the flesh" (Gal 5:24). The power that the world once exercised over him has been broken. Paul now participates in a new creation* brought into being by the crucifixion, in which the authority and dominion of the world* has been destroyed—no, more than that: the world has been crucified.

6.3. Philippians 3:8-12. This powerful passage builds on the idea of sharing in the resurrection* and sufferings* of Christ on account of the believers' relationship to him. Paul expresses the passionate longing "that I may know him [Christ] and the power of his resurrection, and may share his sufferings, becoming like him in his death" (Phil 3:10). Because Christ has made them his own (Phil 3:12), believers may expect to share in all that he is and has—including both the fellowship of his sufferings, becoming like him in his death, and finally (note the "not yet" element), sharing in the resurrection. It is passages like this which caused Luther to write that "the Christianus must be crucianus." To know Christ is to know his sufferings. Note the idea of "becoming like Christ in his death"; the Greek has perhaps the sense of "being conformed to Christ in his death," so that the Christian life can be thought of as a process of being refashioned and reforged after the image of the suffering Christ.

So how is Paul's theology of the cross to be described? We may say that, for Paul, the cross stands, immovable, as the fundamental reference point of faith. It is from here that faith began, and to here that faith will continually return, to be nourished by the crucified Christ. Through sharing in Christ, the believer shares in his sufferings and death, and will one day—but not yet!—share in his glorious resurrection. And that hope will and must keep us going through faith. Believers may catch glimpses of the heavenly realms, they may even hear the distant voices of angels—but they remain here, committed to Christ crucified, in the midst of a suffering world. The heavenly realms remain in the future, even if their distant music can now be heard. The cross stands as the image of the Christian life in the world, just as it stands for the hope beyond this world, which believers share with Paul.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; CRUCIFIXION; CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA; DEATH OF JESUS; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; JUDGMENT; JUSTIFICATION; RESURRECTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; WEAKNESS; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Barbour, "Wisdom and the Cross in 1 Corinthians 1 and 2," in Theologia Crucis, Signus Crucis: Festschrift für Erich Dinkler, ed. C. Andresen and G. Klein (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1979) 57-71; C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (London: Black, 1965); J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. B. Cousar, A Theology of the Cross (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); G. Delling, Der Kreuzetod Jesu in der urchristlichen Verkündigung (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1972); J. D. G. Dunn, "Paul's Understanding of the Death of Jesus," in Reconciliation and Hope, ed. R. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 137-41; R. Goetz, "The Suffering God: The Rise of a New Orthodoxy," Christian Century 103 (1986) 385-89; D. J. Hall, God and Human Suffering (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1986); A. J. Hultgren, Paul's Gospel and Mission (Philadephia: Fortress Press, 1985); M. J. Hooker, "Interchange in Christ," JTS 22 (1971) 349-61; E. Jüngel, God as the Mystery of the World (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1983); E. Käsemann, "The Saving Significance of the Death of Jesus in Paul," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 32-59; idem, Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); H. W. Kuhn, "Jesus als Gekreuzigter in der frühchristlichen Verkündigung," ZTK 72 (1975) 1-46; U. Luz, "Theologia Crucis als Mitte der Theologie im Neuen Testament," EvT 34 (1974) 116-41; A. E. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross (Oxford: Blackwell, 1985); R. P. Martin, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1989); J. Moltmann, The Crucified God (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1974); L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1955); K. A. Plank, Paul and the Irony of Affliction (Atlanta: Scholars, 1987); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); P. Stuhlmacher, "Eighteen Theses on Paul's Theology of the Cross," in Reconciliation, Law, and Righteousness (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 155-68; D. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991); H. Weder, Das Kreuz Jesu bei Paulus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981).

A. E. McGrath

CRUCIFIXION

A particularly cruel form of execution popular in the first-century Roman Empire. Numerous sources—both Christian and non-Christian—attest to the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth under Pontius Pilate (e.g., Mk 15:1-39 par.; Josephus Ant. 18.3.3 §§63-64; Tacitus Ann. 15.44). Outside the Gospels and Acts Paul is responsible for all but one use of both the verb "to crucify" (stauroō: 1 Cor 1:13, 23; 2:2, 8; 2 Cor 13:4; Gal 3:1; 5:24; 6:14; cf. also "to crucify with" [sustauroō]: Rom 6:6; Gal 2:19) and the noun "cross" (stauros: 1 Cor 1:17, 18; Gal 5:11; 6:12, 14; [Eph 2:16]; Phil 2:8; 3:18; Col 1:20; 2:14). For him, the historical event of Jesus' execution on the cross had enormous theological importance, even if it proved to be a major obstacle in the early Christian mission (see especially the programmatic statements in 1 Cor 1:18-25; Gal 3:1-14).

The practice of crucifixion as a form of execution (or impalement after death) dates back at least to the Persians, and was also utilized by other barbarian peoples (as they were known to Greek and Roman historiographers), including the Assyrians and, later, the Carthaginians. No regular practice of crucifixion is attested among the Jews, though some evidence suggests it was employed as a mode of execution before the time of Herod the Great (Josephus J.W. 1.4.6 §§97-98; Ant. 13.14.2 §§379-83; 11QTemple 64:6-13).

Descriptions of the act of crucifixion are rare in the extant literature of antiquity, primarily due to literary-aesthetic concerns. Greek and Roman authors who wrote about crucifixion underscored its brutality, but did not dwell long on the procedure itself. M. Hengel regards the passion narratives of the canonical Gospels as the most detailed description of their kind, but even they are noticeably brief in their accounts of the execution itself. The Evangelists simply report, "They crucified him" (Mt 27:35 par.), so we must go elsewhere to discover, for example, the tradition that Jesus was nailed to the cross (cf. Lk 24:39[?]; Jn 20:25; Acts 2:23; Col 2:14; Gos. Pet. 6.21; Justin Dial. Tryph. 97).

The available literary evidence suggests three general observations. First, the act of crucifixion was heinously cruel. The procedure itself damaged no vital organs, and it is unlikely that any wounds inflicted in the practice would have resulted in excessive bleeding. The likely cause of the consequently slow death, then, would have been shock or a painful process of asphyxiation as the muscles used in breathing were exhausted.

As a result, Roman citizens were generally spared this form of execution. Crucifixion was largely reserved for those of lower status and, above all, for dangerous criminals and insurrectionists. In Judea crucifixion was generally effective as a deterrent against open resistance to Roman occupation until the Jewish War.

Second, crucifixion was a public affair. Naked and fastened to a stake, cross or tree on a well-traveled route or crossroads, the executed was subjected to savage ridicule by passersby. Moreover, under Roman practice the person crucified was denied burial, the corpse left on the cross as carrion for the birds or to rot. In this way, the general populace was reminded of the fate of those who resisted the authority of the state.

Third, it is clear that no standard form of crucifixion was uniformly practiced. The victim might be bound or nailed to the cross, with or without a crossbeam, in one of a variety of positions. It is not even clear whether crucifixion always took place before or after the death of the subject. The Romans appear to have practiced a more constant form of crucifixion: It included a flogging beforehand; victims often carried the crossbeam to the place of crucifixion, where they were nailed or bound to the cross with arms extended, raised up, and perhaps seated on a sedicula, or small wooden peg (Hengel, 22-32). On the other hand, as Josephus reports, even among the Romans the method of crucifixion was subject to the whims of military leaders (Josephus J.W. 5.11.1 §§449-51).

To date, direct archeological evidence related to the practice of crucifixion is limited to one ossuary discovered in 1968 in northern Jerusalem. It contained the bones of an adult male who had died by crucifixion in the first half of the first century A.D. Initial study of the skeletal remains indicated that a nail had been driven through each of his forearms, and his heel bones had been pierced by a single iron nail. The latter nail was found still embedded in the heel bones of both feet. Wood fragments found at both ends of the nail indicated that the nail first passed through a small wooden plaque, then through the victim's feet, and then into a vertical, olivewood beam. Apparently as a coup de grâce, his shins had deliberately been broken.

A recent reevaluation of the skeletal remains of the ossuary, together with related photographs, casts and radiographs by Zias and Sekeles suggests a number of amendments to those earlier conclusions, however. Most importantly, they determined that the still-intact iron nail had passed from the right side to the left of the right heel bone (calcaneum) only. A different picture of the crucified man emerges, for on this reconstruction the feet were not anchored, one on top of the other, with one nail, but the victim apparently straddled the upright beam. Moreover, finding no clear evidence of traumatic injury to the bones of the forearm or hands, they propose the victim was tied to the crossbeam, not nailed. Finally, they questioned whether the bones of the lower limbs had been broken prior to death.

Although this discovery adds archeological evidence to literary descriptions of crucifixion, it is nevertheless clear that the paucity of direct anthropological evidence of this nature restricts the certainty one might attach to its interpretation.

The negative perceptions associated with crucifixion in the first-century world are suggested by two Pauline texts, 1 Corinthians 1:18-25 and Galatians 3:13. This stigma is grounded not only in the barbaric nature of crucifixion, but also, in a Jewish context, in the linkage of Deuteronomy 21:22-23 with crucifixion already by this period. In its OT context, the Deuteronomic passage—"anyone who is hung on a tree is under the curse of God" (LXX)—refers to the public display of the corpse of an executed criminal. But both Philo and the Qumran community provide evidence that, in first-century Judaism, this text was being used with reference to the practice of crucifixion (Philo Spec. Leg. 3.152; Poster. C. 61; Som. 2.213; 4QpNah 3-4.1.7-8; 11QTemple 64:6-13). Given these data, it would seem that a positive assessment of crucifixion within first-century Jewish circles would have been out of the question.

The theological gravity accorded the cross of Christ,* together with its overwhelmingly positive significance in early Christian circles, stands in stark contrast to this expectation, however. Interestingly, Deuteronomy 21:23 had an apparent role in early Christian reflection on the meaning of the cross, as indicated by the allusions in Acts 5:30; 13:29 and Galatians 3:13-14. The oxymoron thus produced—that the "cursed one" is, in fact, the "Anointed One" (i.e., "Christ")—is emphasized by Paul in his kerygmatic expression "Christ crucified" (christos estaurōmenos) in 1 Corinthians 1:23; 2:2 (cf. Gal 3:1; 2:19).

See also CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; DEATH OF CHRIST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. E. Ellis, " 'Christ Crucified,' " in Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L.L. Morris on His 60th Birthday, ed. R. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 69-75; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Crucifixion in Ancient Palestine, Qumran Literature, and the New Testament," in To Advance the Gospel: New Testament Essays (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 125-46; M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); M. Wilcox, " 'Upon the Tree'—Deut 21:22-23 in the New Testament," JBL 96 (1977) 85-99; J. Zias and E. Sekeles, "The Crucified Man from Giv'at ha-Mivtar: A Reappraisal," IEJ 35 (1985) 22-27.

J. B. Green

CUP. See LORD'S SUPPER.

CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA

Paul uses five different Greek terms, four of which are cognates, for a total of twelve times to express three closely related but clearly distinguishable ideas.

1. Curse As a Human Malediction
2. The Curse of the Law
3. Accursed/Anathema

1. Curse As a Human Malediction.

In its only NT occurrence (Rom 3:14, quoting Ps 10:7 [LXX Ps 9:28; cf. 13:3]), the noun "curse" (Gk ara) denotes "the content of what is expressed in a curse" (Louw-Nida, 33.473). The verb "curse" (Gk kataraomai), whose single Pauline usage appears in antithesis to "bless" (Rom 12:14), goes beyond asking God* to withhold his blessing and indicates rather a calling down of injury or harm on the person(s) being cursed (cf. Deut 28:15-68).

2. The Curse of the Law.

This unique expression (Gal 3:13) refers to the "curse" (Gal 3:10, Gk katara as in Gal 3:13; cf. Louw-Nida, 33.473) pronounced by the Mosaic Law* upon all who fail to observe it completely (Gal 3:10); that "all who rely on works of the law" are under this curse (Gal 3:10 RSV) implies that no one does observe the Law completely. The Greek expression in Galatians 3:10 (hosoi ex ergōn nomou) cannot reasonably be rendered "as many as are nomists (i.e., identify with the old covenant)" (Caneday, 194), if for no other reason than that the Greek phrase ex ergōn nomou in its previous five occurrences (2:16 [3 x]; 3:2, 5) consistently means "by works of the Law." It more naturally has the sense "all who rely on obedience to the law" (NEB) and this, in view of Paul's polemical purposes in Galatians, must include both Jews (the Judaizers*) and Gentiles* (those of the Galatian converts who might yield to the Judaizers' persuasion). It follows that the curse of the Law is envisaged in Galatians 3:10 as resting, not exclusively on Jews, but on Gentiles as well, so that when Christ is said to have redeemed "us" from the curse of the Law "by becoming for our sake an accursed thing [Gk katara; cf. Louw-Nida 33.474]" (Gal 3:13 NEB), the first person plural pronouns are most naturally understood as referring to both Jews and Gentiles. (For other considerations supporting this conclusion see, e.g., Fung, 148-49, cf. 167 n.1, 181; but cf. Wright, 143.)

In arriving at the conclusion stated in Galatians 3:13, Paul has apparently employed the Jewish exegetical principle of "equal category" (Heb gᵉzērâ šāwâ): by (1) bringing together the two Deuteronomic passages (Deut 21:23, cited in Gal 3:13, and Deut 27:26, cited in Gal 3:10), which in the LXX share a common verbal stem between them (Gk katara-; as cited by Paul, both quotations begin with the adjective "cursed" [Gk epikataratos]), and by (2) interpreting the former in terms of the latter, Paul understands the death of Christ (see Atonement) on the cross (see Crucifixion) as a vicarious bearing of the curse which rightfully falls on all who fail to continue in perfect obedience to the Law. Ultimately, however, Paul's application of Deuteronomy 21:23 to the death of Christ is probably determined by his Christian hermeneutical principle of viewing the OT in the light of the Christ event.

Paul's unambiguous statement that "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the Law" by becoming the vicarious bearer of the curse would seem to militate against the suggestion that "the curse of the Law," rather than being an actuality (cf. Gal 3:10), is merely a threat—the negative potentiality associated with Torah-observances, that is, "a 'curse' in case of non-fulfilment" (Stanley, 506, 505). The "curse of the Law" is understood by J. D. G. Dunn, in accordance with his "new perspective on Paul" (cf. Dunn, 183-214) as "the curse of a wrong understanding of the law" (Dunn, 229, cf. esp. 225-32, 237; see Law). This novel interpretation is a logical corollary of Dunn's original exposition of "works of the Law" as denoting "those observances of the law . . . which ought to characterize the good Jew and set him apart from the Gentile" (Dunn, 231). The validity of this interpretation stands or falls with judgments regarding the soundness of Dunn's understanding of "works of the Law" (see Law; Romans; Works of the Law).

3. Accursed/Anathema.

Five times the Greek term anathema ("anathema"; cf. Louw-Nida 33.474) is used to refer to various persons as "(something) accursed" (cf. the sense of the second katara ["curse"] in Gal 3:13, above). To be "accursed/anathema" means to be delivered up to the judicial wrath* of God. Paul's references to his desire that he himself be "accursed" and separated "from Christ" for Israel's sake (Rom 9:3) and to an angel (Gal 1:8-9) as being the possible object of the anathema shows that the church discipline* of excommunication is not in view.

The widely held view that in 1 Corinthians 16:22 the reference is to a ban excluding the unworthy from participating in the Lord's Supper* has rightly been rejected by Fee in favor of its being Paul's final warning to his Corinthian opponents* who might be tempted to disobey the injunctions he has just written them (see Fee, 834-35, 837-39).

The enigma of the blasphemous cry "Jesus is/be cursed!" (1 Cor 12:3) has given rise to a plethora of reconstructed life settings, including the suggestions that the reference is (1) to the readers' (or Paul's own) pre-Christian past; (2) to a confrontation with Jewish persecutors or Roman magistrates; (3) to the radical dualism of Gnostics* at Corinth which exalted the heavenly Christ at the expense of the earthly Jesus; (4) to Christian ecstatics resisting an ecstatic experience coming upon them; (5) to Christian ecstatics yielding to an upsurge of emotion, and giving vent to an expression Paul deemed to be blasphemous. Probably the best solution is (6) to understand the cry not as an actual utterance in a Corinthian church meeting, but as a reference to what those who do not have the Holy Spirit* (i.e., non-Christians, whether Jew or Gentile) say about Jesus, in contradistinction to the Christian confession of Jesus as Lord (see Carson, 24-31; cf. the discussion in Fee, 578-81).

See also DEATH OF CHRIST; LAW; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; WORKS OF THE LAW; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. Bassler, "1 Cor 12:3—Curse and Confession in Context," JBL 101 (1982) 415-18; J. P. Braswell, " 'The Blessing of Abraham' versus 'the Curse of the Law': Another Look at Gal 3:10-13," WTJ 53 (1991) 73-91; F. F. Bruce, "The Curse of the Law," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 27-36; A. Caneday, " 'Redeemed From the Curse of the Law': The Use of Deut 21:22-23 in Gal 3:13," TJ 10 NS (1989) 185-209; D. A. Carson, Showing the Spirit: A Theological Exposition of 1 Corinthians 12—14 (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987) 24-31; T. L. Donaldson, "The 'Curse of the Law' and the Inclusion of the Gentiles: Galatians 3.13-14," NTS 32 (1986) 94-112; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); R. Y. K. Fung, The Epistle to the Galatians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, "Sacred Violence and the Curse of the Law (Galatians 3:13): The Death of Christ as a Sacrificial Travesty," NTS 36 (1990) 98-118; H.-W. Kuhn, "ἀνάθεμα," EDNT 1.80-81; R. P. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation: Studies in 1 Corinthians 12—15 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); C. D. Stanley, " 'Under a Curse': a Fresh Reading of Galatians 3.10-14," NTS 36 (1990) 481-511; W. C. van Unnik, "Jesus: Anathema or Kyrios (I Cor. 12:3)," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 113-26; N. T. Wright, "Curse and Covenant: Galatians 3.10-14," in The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 137-56.

R. Y. K. Fung

CYNICS. See PHILOSOPHY.

D

DAMASCUS ROAD EXPERIENCE. See CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL.

DARKNESS. See LIGHT AND DARKNESS.

DAY OF THE LORD. See ESCHATOLOGY.

DAYS. See HOLY DAYS.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS. See QUMRAN AND PAUL.

DEATH. See DEATH OF CHRIST; LIFE AND DEATH; RESURRECTION; TRIUMPH.

DEATH OF CHRIST

The death of Christ,* often mentioned in tandem with his resurrection,* occupies the central position in Paul's representation of the gospel.* Paul is aware of, employs and develops its redemptive significance through creedal* formulae and hymnic* traditions; he probably has some familiarity with and reminds his readers of the story of Jesus' suffering* and death; and he develops the importance of Christ's passion in contexts related to all aspects of his apostolic message—especially his soteriology and christology,* eschatology* and ethics.* This article is concerned not exclusively but especially with Paul's attribution of atoning significance to the suffering and death of Christ.

1. The Centrality of Christ's Death
2. The Significance of the Cross: A Plurality of Images
3. The Death of Christ and the Purpose of God
4. The Death of Christ and the Human Condition
5. The Crucified Messiah and the Christian Life

1. The Centrality of Christ's Death.

For Paul the cross of Christ was critical for Christian reflection and life, especially as the means by which God has provided for salvation and as the instrument and measure of new life in Christ.

It is of great consequence that the letters of Paul, themselves the earliest extant literary productions of Christianity, already document the central importance of the cross* of Christ. This is true for our understanding of very early Christianity, for it evidences how quickly the followers of Jesus were compelled to grapple with the theological problem of his crucifixion. It is also true for our understanding of Paul, for it reveals the degree to which Paul himself struggled with and valued the cross of Christ, and the degree to which his own thought was at home in Christian reflection understood more broadly in the dawning years of the Jesus movement.

Leaving aside for the moment the variety of traditional materials concerned with Jesus' death which Paul incorporated into his correspondence, one can point to the example of 1 Corinthians. Some twenty-five years after Jesus' crucifixion* Paul writes of the pivotal scandal and folly of the cross (1 Cor 1:18, 23), suggesting the harsh realities encountered in early missionary activity. Historically, Jesus' execution on a cross encouraged an understanding of his death as that of a common criminal, humiliated among his people—indeed, even cursed by God (cf. Deut 21:22-23). How could this Jesus also be the "Anointed One" (i.e., Messiah)? Despite this problem, Paul asserts that, while among the Corinthians, he had "resolved to know nothing . . . other than Jesus Christ and him crucified" (1 Cor 2:2). It is not too much to say that the early church had to come to terms with the cross of Christ precisely because it was this crucified-and-dead Jesus who was being proclaimed as Messiah (Green, 157-74). As a theologian of the cross, Paul played a key role in the exploration of the meaning of the crucified Christ (see Christ; Cross, Theology of the).

It is evident that Paul borrowed from pre-existing Christian tradition* regarding Jesus' passion, and that such traditional materials are incorporated into his correspondence (cf., e.g., the language of the traditioning process in 1 Cor 11:23-25; 15:3-5; cf. Kertelge, 116-24). It is equally transparent that he exercised his own creativity in shaping the tradition. This is not surprising, since one of the primary motivations for his spirited opposition to the Christian movement prior to his encounter with the risen Lord* must have been the contradiction offered by the Christian kerygma as it featured the divine exaltation of the "cursed* one." Paul's embracing "the gospel of Christ" (Gal 1:6-17) entailed a theological conversion* which enabled him to move beyond his initial negative interpretation of the cross; it also suggests one of the influences behind his subsequent reflection on the cross. It is noteworthy that Paul was able to come to terms with the seeming contradiction of a crucified Christ not by denying its perplexing character, but by showing how God vindicated his Christ and filled his apparently ignominious demise with unexpected, positive significance.

On the other hand, Paul's own apostolic experience underscored the degree to which suffering and powerlessness was integral to the Christian life, this in spite of Jesus' resurrection. In the Pauline perspective, apostolic weakness* found its significance in light of the suffering of Christ. Thus, having reminded the Corinthians that among them he had sought only to present Christ and him crucified, Paul goes on to call to their attention his own manner of life while with them: "I came to you in weakness, fear, and much trembling" (1 Cor 2:2-3; cf. Col 1:24). Consequently, we see that a further inspiration for Paul's ongoing translation of the meaning of the cross was his own and the church's life in Christ—life that was no stranger to weakness, opposition and suffering. The importance of the cross for Paul is thus grounded in his encounter with the risen Lord and in the demands of his apostolic ministry.*

1.1. The Cross and Kerygma. How is the centrality of the cross manifest for Paul? It is implied by the phrases he uses to denote the kerygma. Thus in 1 Corinthians 1:18 "the message of the cross" is virtually a synonym for "gospel"; in 2 Corinthians 5:19 "the message of reconciliation" is employed similarly, in a context wherein the salvific event is presented in the parallelism: "And he died for all, so that those who live might live no longer for themselves, but for him who on their behalf died and was raised" (cf. Phil 2:16: "word of life"; Acts 13:26: "word of salvation"; Kertelge, 124-27).

1.2. Formulaic Expressions. A close reading of the Pauline letters also reveals two stereotypical expressions for the atoning significance of the cross (Hengel, 34-39). The first presents the "giving up" of Jesus for the salvation of humankind—either as a divine act (e.g., Rom 4:25: "who was given up on account of our trespasses"; Rom 8:32: "who did not spare his own son, but gave him up on behalf of us all") or as a self-giving (e.g., Gal 1:4: "who gave himself up for our sins"; Gal 2:20: "gave himself up for me"). The second expression, the "dying formula," is found repeatedly—for example, in the celebrated tradition represented in 1 Corinthians 15:3: "Christ died for our sins" (cf. further: Rom 5:6, 8; 14:9; 1 Cor 8:11; 2 Cor 5:14, 15; Gal 2:21; 1 Thess 5:10). Paul's phrase "Christ died for us," according to Hengel, "is the most frequent and most important confessional statement in the Pauline epistles and at the same time in the primitive Christian tradition in the Greek language which underlies them" (Hengel, 37).

This traditional basis is important for showing the degree to which Paul aligns himself with the common faith of the early church. That is, his letters draw on the common vocabulary of the Christian communities; his innovations in theological expression build on the foundation of the shared faith. More particularly, in the face of such antagonism as Paul faced at Corinth and Galatia, his repetition of traditional materials related to the cross serves to indicate how Paul legitimized his authority* in the face of opposition (see Opponents).

1.3. The Story of Jesus. This is not to suggest that Paul was indebted only to the formulaic tradition he shared with early Christianity. There are also hints that he was aware of the story of Jesus' suffering and death, which would also have been handed down to him. Such a reference may lie behind Galatians 3:1, where Paul's language ("Before your eyes Jesus Christ was publicly portrayed as crucified") suggests the graphic quality of his proclamation, opening the possibility that his missionary preaching made use of a passion story. Similarly, his introduction to the tradition of the Last Supper, "in the night when he was delivered up" (1 Cor 11:23-25), presumes a shared knowledge of a narrative context for the eucharistic tradition. Also suggestive are the themes with which Paul describes his own suffering in 2 Corinthians; for example, in 2 Corinthians 6:3-10 he lists the sufferings, grace* and paradoxical aspects of his service in a way that echoes the story of the passion of Christ. Not unlike what one finds in the Gospel of Mark, then, Paul has his own understanding of the "way of the cross," the way of suffering through which one identifies with the manner of Christ's suffering. Finally, while Pauline only in the broad sense, 1 Timothy 6:13 alludes to Jesus' trial before Pontius Pilate in a way that presupposes at least rudimentary knowledge of the passion story. In these and other texts, we recognize that Paul's theology has about it a narrative quality—that is, that he understands Christian experience within the larger mural of God's activity ranging from the formation of God's people to the Parousia, and within this greater narrative and as its centerpiece is the narrative of Jesus' crucifixion. Even though Paul shows little interest in the historical details of Jesus' passion qua historical data, it appears that he was aware of them and was concerned with their significance for Christian faith and life (see Jesus and Paul; Jesus, Sayings of).

1.4. The Pattern of Christ. This again points to the degree to which Paul is ready to posit the cross of Christ as the basis of Christian faith and life. Indeed, Paul's reference to the Last Supper tradition is set contextually within his discussion of the community meal in order to attack the problem of divisions at Corinth (1 Cor 11:17-34; cf. 1 Cor 1:10-17); here a reminder of Jesus' sacrificial self-giving is the basis for Paul's call for a life modeled on the way of Jesus' passion, diaconal in orientation, cruciform in shape (see Lord's Supper).

At Corinth,* as at Colossae,* Paul reflects on the meaning of the crucified Christ in large part so as to counter competing ideas. In the case of his correspondence with the Corinthians, the word of the cross opposes wrong-headed thinking about the nature of present existence, as though this were the time for triumphalism* following the consummation of the new age. Against the "wisdom* of the world" and the status-seeking orientation of his Greco-Roman audience at Corinth, Paul posits the scandalous* cross of Christ as the "power* of God" "to us who are being saved." Social, philosophical, even soteriological norms are uprooted as Paul brings to the foreground "what is weak in the world,*" "what is low and despised in the world"—that is, "Christ crucified" and the community oriented around the crucified Christ (1 Cor 1:18-31).

For the Colossians Paul grounds his presentation of the cosmic Christ—who reconciled the whole cosmos, including the astral powers, to God—in the flesh-and-blood life and death of Christ: "through him God was pleased to reconcile to himself all things . . . by making peace* through the blood of his cross" (Col 1:20; cf. 1:14; 2:13-14; 3:13). Thus Paul both counters a lifestyle oriented around appeasing astral powers as though they were the means of human access to God and, against a quasi-gnostic* spiritualizing of the way of discipleship, affirms in an impassioned way the importance of ethical* behavior in this material world (see Elements/Elemental Spirits).

Elsewhere Paul presents Jesus' death as the culmination of his life. In Philippians 2:6-11 Paul has apparently added to an early hymn to Christ the words, "even death on a cross." Here, Jesus' life as God's obedient Son is at center stage, and this obedience is seen most profoundly in his willingness to embrace rejection, human suffering and a heinous death by crucifixion. In this way, Paul contends that Christ's death "is the fullest expression of [his] life and establishes [for us] the pattern of a life of love and obedience" (Tambasco, 72). In these and many other ways, Paul shows how Christian thought and life build on the foundational event of the cross of Christ.

2. The Significance of the Cross: A Plurality of Images.

Just as Jesus' death lies at the foundation of Pauline theology, so Paul seems never to tire of adding new images to his interpretive vocabulary by way of explicating its significance.

It is true that Paul is much more concerned with laying out the significance of the death of Christ than with its historical circumstances, and he communicates this significance above all in terms of its benefits for humankind. In subsequent theological reflection, these benefits have been developed under the nomenclature of "atonement," and this presents the modern interpreter with two problems.

First, the word itself, atonement, is open to diverse definition. On the one hand, today many trace the meaning of the term back to its roots in Middle English—"at-one-ment"—and so understand the term above all as a synonym for reconciliation (e.g., Fitzmyer). As a consequence, a cleavage is drawn between atonement on the one hand, and notions of expiation,* propitiation and other ideas related to doctrines of substitution or satisfaction on the other; more to the point, the atoning significance of Jesus' death is thus divorced from any consideration on Paul's part regarding the means by which this at-one-ment or reconciliation is achieved (see Peace, Reconciliation).

On the other hand, after centuries of debate it is now difficult to read Paul without the overlay of one or more of the so-called classical theories of the atonement (see Driver, 37-67)—especially the "dramatic theory," which portrays the saving work of Christ as a cosmic drama of conflict and victory (see Triumph); the "satisfaction theory," which presents the cross of Christ as the means by which the barrier between God and humanity is removed, so that through Christ's death "satisfaction" is rendered to God; or the "moral influence theory," which concentrates on the cross as a demonstration to humanity of God's boundless love that is to be emulated. The ascendancy of the "satisfaction theory," with its often-held corollary, penal or forensic satisfaction (i.e., since human beings have been found guilty before God the judge, they must be punished, but Christ is made to suffer the penalty) as the way to understand Paul's theology of the cross has proven especially problematic in contemporary theological discussion. For some, Paul seems to portray God as a sadist who inflicts punishment, and Jesus as the masochist who willingly endures it. Any attempt to sunder the interests and activity of God and Christ—as though the cross is the manifestation of God's wrath but of Christ's mercy—would be problematic on Pauline grounds (see below). And, in fact, it seems highly unlikely that those who formulated the substitutionary interpretation of the death of Christ would recognize this contemporary characterization of their view. This is true even if this classical theory of the atonement has subsequently proven itself susceptible to this problematic reading in some hymnody and popular interpretation (see the helpful discussion in Houts; Beker, 208-11.)

The bulk of this article is given over to an examination of Paul's theology of atonement. First, however, it is important that we come to terms with the more fundamental reality that Paul has no one way of explicating the meaning of the cross. Although the crucified Christ lies at the center of his theology, this central truth is capable of multiple interpretations. In fact, Paul seems capable of tailoring his representation of the significance of the death of Jesus to the needs of his audience in particular, contextualized circumstances (see Driver; Boff, 78-84; Cousar, 82-87). This fact has serious ramifications for the ongoing crosscultural mission of the church, for it suggests that interpreters, in drawing out the significance of Jesus' crucifixion, must continuously seek out metaphors that speak specifically to culture and/or circumstance. In their openness to shaping context-specific ways to communicate the meaning of the death of Christ, contemporary interpreters who would be faithful to Paul will be guided by apostolic testimony to the cross, grounded in the Scriptures and cognizant of the way Paul draws on them in his own hermeneutical enterprise, fully sensitive to the contemporary images and metaphors that carry redemptive meaning, and vitally concerned with the interplay between these three.

Of the several dozen metaphors Paul employs to lay bare the benefits of the death of Christ, only a handful can be mentioned here. These are conveniently brought together in two Pauline texts—2 Corinthians 5:14—6:2 and Galatians 3:10-14.

An examination of the presentation of the effects of Jesus' death in 2 Corinthians 5:14—6:2 underscores the degree to which the manifold categories by which Paul drew out the significance of the cross overlap with one another. Even though reconciliation stands at the center of this passage (2 Cor 5:18, 19, 20), other categories are in the foreground: vicarious substitution ("for us," 2 Cor 5:14, 15), representation (2 Cor 5:14, 21) or interchange (Hooker's term [1974, 1978]), sacrifice* (2 Cor 5:21; cf. Dunn, 42-43), justification (implicitly, 2 Cor 5:19, 21), forgiveness* (2 Cor 5:19) and new creation* (2 Cor 5:16-17). Moreover, the cross and resurrection of Christ appear in tandem as salvific events (2 Cor 5:15).

Reconciliation as a term is not found very often in the Pauline corpus. Apart from this passage it appears in Romans 5:10-11 with reference to the reconciliation of humanity to God; Colossians 1:20 with reference to the reconciliation of the cosmos to God; and in Ephesians 2:16 with reference to the reconciliation of both Jew and Gentile to God and one another. Whether Ephesians is judged to be Pauline or not, its message at this juncture is clearly Pauline, for this notion of "restored relationship" in Paul consistently embraces the dynamic presence of divine love* active to restore the divine-human relationship and extending both a call for and an enablement of persons to exhibit toward one another this same social restoration. Moreover, especially in 2 Corinthians and Colossians, the work of reconciliation is extended to the entire creation (see Center).

In 2 Corinthians 5 Paul's choice of terminology and logic of argumentation is tailored to its context, for here Paul not only needs to counter the triumphalistic boasting of his opponents at Corinth but also to overcome the disharmony between himself and his "children" at Corinth. Rooting the message of reconciliation fundamentally in the sacrificial death of Jesus and asserting that reconciliation entails living no longer for oneself but for Christ (and thus for others), he addresses his first aim. His impassioned appeal to the Corinthians to be reconciled to God (2 Cor 5:20; 6:1-2), followed by an affirmation of his own openheartedness to the Corinthians (2 Cor 6:11-13; 7:2) will, he hopes, accomplish the second goal of restoring his relationship with the Corinthians.

Similarly, Galatians 3:10-14 consists of a convergence of images or theological categories by which Paul expounds the salvific character of the cross of Christ. The larger unit, Galatians 3:1-14, contends that the experience of the Galatians of receiving the Spirit by faith signified the fulfillment of God's promise to bless the Gentiles through Abraham,* and that this fulfillment was made possible through the death of Christ. The benefits of the death of Christ are presented in Galatians 3:10-14 through a combination of images: Christ as the representative of Israel* in whose death the *covenant reaches its climax (Wright, 137-56; cf. the notion of interchange [Hooker]); *justification (Gal 3:11); *redemption (Gal 3:13), evoking exodus and exilic themes (cf. the corollary of *adoption in Gal 3:26-29); substitution ("for us," Gal 3:13); *sacrifice (implicitly, Gal 3:13; cf. Wright, 153); the *promise of the Spirit (Gal 3:14); and the *triumph over the powers (see Principalities and Powers).

This last motif emerges in a similar way in Ephesians 2:14-15, where the Law* appears as a barrier separating Jew and Gentile; there the death of Christ abolishes this "dividing wall." In Galatians, however, the Law is characterized more as a force, like the elemental spirits of this world, holding the Jewish people captive (Gal 4:1, 3). In a context-specific way, then, Paul insists that the death of Christ has triumphed not by denying the Law but by demonstrating its validity and executing the blessing of the covenant.

Taken together, the message of the cross in 2 Corinthians and Galatians (but also elsewhere in the Pauline corpus), raises two issues requiring more explicit elucidation. On the one hand, attention must be drawn to the *apocalyptic significance of the cross: set within apocalyptic horizons, the cross has cosmic repercussions. This is the importance of the use of such language as "new creation" in 2 Corinthians 5:17 and Galatians 6:15, for these texts must be understood not as in some modern translations as individual-focused (e.g., NIV, NAS), but as signifying the role of Jesus' death in the termination of the old epoch and the presentation of the new. The death of Christ marks the end of the rule of the apocalyptic powers (cf. Beker, 189-92; Col 2:15; see Triumph) and deliverance "from the present evil age" (Gal 1:4; see Eschatology). This intrusion of the new world into contemporary life has for Paul far-reaching consequences for those who would follow the crucified Christ and embody in their lives together the new creation revealed in the cross. Old ways of relating to one another (e.g., boasting in a continuous game of one-upmanship in the service of status-seeking) and of drawing lines between Jew and Gentile, slave and free, male and female, are shown to be just that—old, out of date, and judged as such (cf., e.g., Gal 3:26-29; Philem).

On the other hand, we see in Paul's understanding of the cross his ongoing reflection on Israel, and particularly his inclusion of believing Gentiles in the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:10). For Paul, believers, because of their inclusion in the salvific work of Christ, share in the benefits of the new creation and thus in their identity as the people of God. As Paul acknowledges, "I have been crucified with Christ. It is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me" (Gal 2:19b-20a; see Dying and Rising). Even if the question of the eschatological role of Israel in Pauline thought is not thus settled, it is nonetheless apparent that the death of Christ marks the new aeon in which Gentiles may be embraced, in Christ, as children of Abraham (see Israel; Restoration of Israel).

Many other interpretive categories or images might be mentioned from within the Pauline letters, for he makes use of a rich variety of metaphors by way of comprehending the cross and encouraging both understanding and response among his varied audiences. This multiplicity raises a caution against moving too quickly to positing for Paul a single (or any one as the central) theory of the atonement. For him the depths of the significance of the death of Christ can scarcely be plumbed.

3. The Death of Christ and the Purpose of God.

For Paul the question of the meaning of the cross is first a question about God—*theo*logy—and only then a question about anthropology and soteriology. His theology of the cross is rooted in his understanding of the divine purpose, and of God as the primary actor in the drama of salvation* (see God). Although he affirms that Christ "gave himself for our sins in order to set us free from the present evil age," he goes on to affirm that Christ did so "according to the will of our God and Father" (Gal 1:4). That is, Christ's self-giving signifies his identification and solidarity with God's salvific aim. By this affirmation, any attribution to Paul of a view of the atonement that segregates the activity of God from that of God's Son is disallowed. Nevertheless, at center stage stands God's initiative (e.g.): "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor 5:19); "God . . . sent his own Son" (Rom 8:3). Paul's atonement theology is thus rooted in his understanding of God, and especially of God's righteousness,* wrath* and love.*

3.1. The Righteousness of God. The precedence Paul gives to the question about God in his atonement theology is perhaps underscored best in the central but tightly packed passage, Romans 3:21-26. Two questions related to the character of God are raised in the verses preceding this passage (see Cousar, 37-41): (1) What are we to make of God's faithfulness vis-à-vis his covenant promises to the Jewish people? If, as Paul has earlier argued, both Jew and Gentile stand side by side before God as implicated in sin, what are we to make of God's covenantal history with Israel? "Will their faithlessness nullify the faithfulness of God?" (Rom 3:3). (2) If salvation is available outside the Law, should we not engage in evil so that God's goodness may abound all the more (Rom 3:8)? Or, to raise the question in a way more oriented around the character of God, If God's goodness is available to sinners, how can God judge the world? The first is a question about the reliability of God, the second about the moral integrity of God.

These questions place the righteousness of God in the dock, for in the OT "the righteousness of God" is a central affirmation, affirming God's faithful orientation toward the covenant and setting the pattern for the character of Israel's comportment and behavior before God. Paul is not unaware of this. First, he grounds his treatment of these two questions in the prior disclosure of the righteousness of God ("attested by the Law and the Prophets," Rom 3:21). Then he develops his present perspective on God's faithfulness, with clear echoes of occasions of covenant making and covenant keeping in Israel's past (cf. redemption, Rom 3:24; sacrifice of atonement, Rom 3:25 NRSV). Moreover, he does so via a traditional Jewish-Christian formula, demonstrating even more the rootedness of this representation of God's character in the history of God's interaction with the community of God's people.

In this context, Christ's salvific death, as it were, "proves" the reliability and integrity of God. To put it differently, the righteousness of God is manifest in his intervention to bring salvation to a humanity mired in sin.* And it is manifest precisely in the revelation of God in the cross as one who keeps his promises; who does not wink at sin but, through the faithful obedience and sacrificial death of Jesus Christ, redeems all who believe, whether Jew or Gentile; and, thus, who does not introduce a way of salvation that nullifies the Law but that actually upholds it (cf. Rom 3:31). Consequently, Paul affirms that the righteousness of God is revealed in Christ not merely as a description of God in his role as judge, but also and more so as the activity of God oriented around covenant making and covenant keeping; in the death of Christ the righteousness of God is exhibited in God's delivering people from sin (see Righteousness, Righteousness of God).

3.2. The Wrath of God. In some ways God's wrath stands as a corollary to God's righteousness: "since God's fidelity to covenant demands human response and responsibility, wrath is what one experiences when one rejects God's offer of justice" (Tambasco, 33; cf. Travis). It is imperative to recognize, however, that for Paul divine wrath is not a divine property, or essential attribute, but the active presence of God's judgment* toward "all ungodliness and wickedness" (Rom 1:18). The wrath of God is not vindictive indignation or the anger of divine retribution, but the divine response to human unfaithfulness. For Paul God's wrath is future, eschatological (Rom 2:5, 8; 1 Thess 1:10; 5:9; Col 3:6). It is also already present, for God is now handing people over to experience the consequences of the sin they choose (Rom 1:18, 24, 26, 28; cf. Wis 11:15-16; 12:23).

In any attempt to come to terms with Paul's theology of atonement, then, it is vital to keep in mind Paul's understanding of divine wrath. Paul does not portray an angry God requiring mollification. For him divine wrath is a means of underscoring how seriously God takes sin, but it is not an affective quality or "feeling" on God's part. The righteousness of God is effective in the present to save, but as men and women resist it they experience God's righteousness as condemnation (see Wrath, Destruction).

3.3. The Love of God. According to Romans 5:6-8, the death of Christ is the ultimate expression of the boundless love of God: "But God demonstrates his love for us in that while we were still sinners Christ died for us" (Rom 5:8). This affirmation follows on the heels of the claim that the human experience of divine love guarantees that suffering will lead to a hope that will not disappoint (Rom 5:3-5). Three declarations are critical here. First, the love of God for humanity cannot be measured, for there are no anthropomorphic analogues on which to base such a measurement; even though someone might dare to die on behalf of a righteous person (Rom 5:7), Christ died for "the ungodly" (Rom 5:6), for "sinners" (Rom 5:8), for "enemies"* of God (Rom 5:10).

Second, Paul's audience can be certain that their suffering has significance because the suffering of Christ has proven to be so meaningful. Through his death "we have been justified," "saved from the wrath of God," "reconciled to God" (Rom 5:9-11). In the midst of our impotence, Christ took on the measure of our powerlessness and died in our place; as a result of his death, we share in his life, and we find that our own suffering has significance.

Third, in an unusual turn of phrase (Rom 5:8), we are told that God demonstrates his love by means of what Christ did. We might have anticipated that God's love would be manifest best in God's own deed. This way of putting things certifies that "Christ's death does not merely express his own sentiment, . . . but God's; or to put it another way, God's stance toward the world is quintessentially demonstrated in the action of Christ" (Cousar, 45). Once more, then, we find in Paul the unrelenting affirmation of the oneness of purpose and activity of God and God's Son in the cross (see Love).

4. The Death of Christ and the Human Condition. To affirm that Paul's understanding of the death of Christ is profoundly theocentric is not to downplay his interest in the need for atonement from the human side of the equation. Quite the contrary, it is to introduce the sharp contrast Paul sees between God and humanity—that is, between the faithfulness of God and human unfaithfulness (see, e.g., the word play in Rom 1:17-18: God's righteousness [dikaiosynē] versus human unrighteousness [adikia]). Paul's portrait of humanity "before Christ" is that of persons, collectively and individually, ensnared in sin, enslaved to powers from which they are impotent to escape. As with atonement, so with sin Paul is able to draw from a full linguistic arsenal to fill out his description of humankind apart from God.

Of special interest in this brief review of Paul's anthropology is Romans 1:18-32. Here sin (in the broad sense; the language Paul uses in 1:18 is ungodliness and unrighteousness) is identified not with individual acts of wickedness but with a general disposition to refuse to honor God as God and to render him thanks, to substitute things created for the Creator—that is, to turn away from authentic human existence by turning away from God.

Four aspects of Paul's reflections in this passage are of particular significance here. First, Paul is not giving the autobiography of individual persons; he is not bent on outlining how each person in his or her own experience comes to be implicated in sin. Instead, his is a universalistic presentation, a diagnosis of the condition of the human family taken as a whole (cf. Rom 3:9). Second, the acts of wickedness that Paul goes on to enumerate by way of illustration are not themselves the problem. Lust, gossip, envy, deceit, homosexual* activity, rebelliousness toward parents and the rest—these are expressions of sin. Third, within the fabric of Paul's argument, these activities are themselves expressions of the wrath of God. They evidence the moral integrity of a God who takes sin seriously. It is this, God's moral character, that Paul is defending here, and he does so by showing the progression from (1) the human refusal to honor God with its consequent denial of the human vocation to live in relation to God; to (2) God's giving humanity over to its own desires—giving humanity, as it were, the life apart from him it sought; and from this to (3) human acts of wickedness—which, then, do not arouse the wrath of God but are themselves already the consequences of its active presence. Finally, it is remarkable that, for Paul, sin marks a rupture in the divine-human relationship, but also manifests itself in human relations and in relations between humanity and the material creation. Sin, in this broad sense, then, can never be understood as something private or individualistic, for it always manifests itself in relation to others and to the cosmos (see Rom 1:26-32). What is more, Paul recognizes that ungodliness and unrighteousness have as their object their own self-legitimation: humanity embraces a lie (Rom 1:25) and receives a corrupt mind (Rom 1:28), with the consequence that it defines its unjust ways as just.

As a result, it is no wonder that Paul's preaching of and identification with the cross would excite opposition and misunderstanding. A humanity that has turned against itself as it turned against God will not easily sanction so revolutionary a re-ordering of the world as would be required by this accentuation of the crucified Christ. This would call for an apparently topsy-turvy way of understanding what it means to be human, for an inversion of the social system. Power* rooted in powerlessness? This emphasizes the profound role the word of the cross would have in Paul's conception and experience of the Christian life (see 5 below), but also the severity of the predicament to which God's saving activity would have to address itself (see Cross, Theology of the).

5. The Crucified Messiah and the Christian Life.

We come finally to explore more directly the question, How is the death of Christ efficacious? It is clear that for Paul the cross is the means by which God has provided salvation and that it is the instrument and measure of the new life in Christ. How is the cross operative in this way? Paul provides no single answer to this question, though we can ascertain in the Pauline letters certain parameters for this discussion.

5.1. The Atoning Death of Christ. For Paul, Jesus' death is not interpreted by metaphors drawn from the law court, but from within the history of God's covenant with Israel. Thus Paul does not think of Christ's having been punished by execution on the cross so as to satisfy the justice of God (Travis; Tambasco). The cross of Christ can be understood as substitutionary, but within the matrix of the OT conception of sacrifice.*

Although the rationale for the sacrificial system is not worked out fully in the OT, Dunn believes that the notion of "identification" or "representation" is basic to our understanding of it. That is, the sin-offering in some way came to represent the sinners in their sin. Thus, by laying hands on the beast's head in the ritual of sacrifice, sinners identified themselves with the beast, indicating that the beast now represented the sinner in his or her sin (i.e., qua sinner). As a consequence, the sinner's sin was identified with the beast, and its life became forfeit—"just as Christ, taking the initiative from the other side, identified himself with [human beings] in their fallenness (Rom. 8:3), and was made sin (2 Cor. 5:21)" (Dunn, 44).

This logic introduces Christ's dual role in his death—his substitution for humanity before God and in the face of God's justice, but also his substitution for God in the face of human sin.

This use of the language of representation to assist our understanding of substitution is not designed to deny the sense of Christ's having achieved something objective in his death. Indeed, according to Paul, Christ gave himself up for us so that we might live in him (cf. 1 Thess 5:9-10; Rom 8:3-4; 14:9; 2 Cor 5:15, 21; Travis). As significant as the theme of participation in Christ's death (and resurrection) is for Paul (cf., e.g., Phil 3:10), the possibility of such participation is grounded in his first dying "for us."

From where does Paul obtain this mode of interpretation? Attempts have been made in recent decades to find a Greco-Roman background for Paul's thought on the atoning death of Christ—either quite apart from the OT and Second-Temple Judaism (Seeley) or mediated through Hellenistic Judaism (Williams). It is not clear, however, why one must draw such strict boundaries between OT influence and Greco-Roman philosophy, particularly given the degree to which Hellenism and Judaism had coalesced by the beginning of the first century A.D.

It is more probable that the redemptive interpretations of death in Hellenistic Judaism and in Paul are drawn from the common quarry of Israel's Scriptures and sacrificial practices. The sacrificial system of the OT provides a ready source for speculation concerning the relation of innocent death and forgiveness of sins, particularly since during the Second Temple period sacrifices in general were interpreted along redemptive lines. Of course, this is not to suggest that Paul would have been unaware of such martyrological interpretations of death as one finds in texts such as 2 Maccabees 7:37-38 and 4 Maccabees 6:28-29. But these texts themselves develop OT sacrificial and Servant* themes, particularly making use of Isaianic material concerning the Suffering Servant of the Lord (Is 52:13—53:12)—just as did the early church and Paul. Moreover, the degree to which Paul might have been directly indebted to Hellenistic Judaism via the martyr tales of the Maccabean literature is modulated by the strong influence of retributive ideas in those texts. Paul, on the other hand, places a more profound stress on God's initiative in providing the sacrifice, and his evident concern is to establish the universality of Christ's atoning benefits which are not limited to Israelite cultic and memorial rites needing repetition and reenactment (Hengel, 51). In addition to the sacrificial system of the OT, with its concern for maintaining the relationship between God and his covenant people, the Isaianic Suffering Servant and Jewish martyrology, scholars have also found reflections of the Jewish notion of the binding of Isaac in the background of Paul's thought (cf. Tambasco, Dunn, Hengel, Brown, et al.).

As Hengel has argued, it is not enough to peruse the OT and later Jewish texts for precursors to Paul's salvific interpretation of Jesus' death. An influence of significant proportions lies much closer to hand—namely, the interpretation of the cross of Christ mediated through the repetition of the Last Supper in the early Christian communities. Paul himself knows and repeats the eucharistic words of Jesus (1 Cor 11:23-25), words that interpret Jesus' self-giving as redemptive.

5.2. The Death of Christ and Following Christ. According to Paul, the death and resurrection of Christ mark the beginning of a new epoch that reaches forward to the time of Christ's parousia (cf. Hanson). This fundamentally changes the way one understands life in the present. First, awareness that Christ's death and resurrection has instituted a new epoch allows one to envision new life in contrast to old ways of living, and to embrace the power of God requisite for new life. Moreover, considering the present in light of the past motivates believers to act in gratitude for deliverance from slavery to sin. Finally, recognition of this new time encourages believers' further recognition that life in the present is determined by the cross. This means that one effect of the cross is the possibility of restored humanity, restored in its relationships to God, to itself and to all creation. It also means that the definition of existence put forward by sinful humanity has been radically altered, so that those who follow Christ must look to Christ for the expression of restored humanity. "The church whose theology is shaped by the message of the cross must itself take on a cruciform life if its theology is to carry credibility" (Cousar, 186).

What this means practically is related above all to believers taking on themselves the form of obedience to God represented in Christ's life, expressed ultimately in his death. This thought lies behind Paul's use of the hymn to Christ in Philippians 2:6-11. It also lies behind his defense of his own apostolic ministry, his sense that in his weakness* and suffering* he is engaged in the imitation of Christ and participating in the suffering of the Messiah (cf. Pobee, Hanson, Bloomquist).

5.3. The Death of Christ and the Life of God's People. The cross of Christ has as its effect the restoration of humanity in another sense, too. The cross is understood by Paul as a boundary-shattering event (cf. Driver, esp. chap. 13). Thus, Paul can assert in 1 Corinthians that those who follow the example of Christ in his selfless death will not nurture their status-based divisions within the Christian community but will gain a fuller understanding and appreciation of the body of Christ (1 Cor 11:17—12:31; see Body of Christ). This, after all, is a manifestation of the new covenant in Christ's blood (1 Cor 11:25). But Paul can also assert that faithful identification with Christ in his salvific work opposes even more fundamental ethnic, social and sexual boundaries, "for in Christ Jesus you are all children of God through faith" (Gal 3:26; cf. 3:27-29; Eph 2:11-22). In this way too, then, the cross not only enables new life, it also points beyond itself to disclose the norms of that life, and thus it inaugurates the new era wherein the salvific will of God will be realized.

Clearly, the death of Christ occupies center stage in Paul's theology. He draws on an abundance of images by which he explicates its meaning, both by way of excavating the rich resources available to him in Israel's Scriptures and in the common faith of the early church, and by way of relating the message of the cross more directly to his audiences in their diverse backgrounds and with their diverse circumstances. The cross of Christ lies at the intersection of the major avenues of his theology and of his understanding of faithful living before Christ returns. For Paul, believers here and now manifest their obedience to Christ by proclaiming his death until he comes.

See also CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; CHRISTOLOGY; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; CRUCIFIXION; CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; EXPIATION, PROPITIATION, MERCY SEAT; FORGIVENESS; JUSTIFICATION; LORD'S SUPPER; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; REDEMPTION; SACRIFICE, OFFERING, RESURRECTION; SALVATION; SUFFERING; TRIUMPH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); L. G. Bloomquist, The Function of Suffering in Philippians (JSNTSup 78; Sheffield: Academic, 1993); L. Boff, Passion of Christ, Passion of the World: The Facts, Their Interpretation, and Their Meaning Yesterday and Today (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1987); C. A. Brown, "The Peace-Offerings (שלמים) and Pauline Soteriology," in The New Testament and Christian-Jewish Dialogue: Studies in Honor of David Flusser, Immanuel 24-25 (1990) 59-76; C. B. Cousar, A Theology of the Cross: The Death of Jesus in the Pauline Letters (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); J. Driver, Understanding the Atonement for the Mission of the Church (Scottdale, PA: Herald, 1986); J. D. G. Dunn, "Paul's Understanding of the Death of Jesus as Sacrifice," in Sacrifice and Redemption: Durham Essays in Theology, ed. S. W. Sykes (Cambridge: University Press, 1991) 35-56; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Reconciliation in Pauline Theology," in To Advance the Gospel: New Testament Studies (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 162-85; J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative (WUNT 2.33; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1988); A. T. Hanson, The Paradox of the Cross in the Thought of St. Paul (JSNTSup 17; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); M. Hengel, The Atonement: The Origins of the Doctrine in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); M. D. Hooker, "Interchange and Atonement," BJRL 60 (1978) 462-81; idem, "Interchange in Christ," JTS 22 (1974) 349-61; M. Houts, "Classical Atonement Imagery: Feminist and Evangelical Challenges," Catalyst 19 (1993) 1, 5-6; K. Kertelge, "Das Verständnis des Todes Jesu bei Paulus," in Der Tod Jesu: Deutungen im Neuen Testament, ed. K. Kertelge (QD 74; 2d ed.; Freiburg: Herder, 1976) 114-36; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht: Untersuchungen zur urchristlichen Verkündigung vom Sühntod Jesu Christi (2d ed.; FRLANT 64; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963); J. S. Pobee, Persecution and Martyrdom in the Theology of Paul (JSNTSup 6; Sheffield: JSOT, 1985); D. Seeley, The Noble Death: Graeco-Roman Martyrology and Paul's Concept of Salvation (JSNTSup 28; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); S. H. Travis, "Christ as Bearer of Divine Judgment in Paul's Thought about the Atonement," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ. Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids; Eerdmans, forthcoming); A. J. Tambasco, A Theology of Atonement and Paul's Vision of Christianity (ZS: NT; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 1991); H. Weder, Das Kreuz Jesu bei Paulus: Ein Versuch, über den Geschichtsbezug des christlichen Glaubens nachzudenken (FRLANT 125; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981); S. K. Williams, Jesus' Death as Saving Event: The Background and Origin of a Concept (HDR 2; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991).

J. B. Green

DECONSTRUCTION. See HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL.

DEITIES. See IDOLATRY; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

DEMONS AND EXORCISM

In Hellenistic Greek daimones (masculine) and daimonia (neuter) signified semidivine beings with powers of various sorts who could be either good or evil, similar to our popular use of the word spirit. The LXX used demons (daimonia) to designate heathen gods, as an epithet of contempt. Judaism in the Hellenistic era took up the term and used it to designate evil supernatural beings who caused physical harm in all sorts of ways. They also tempted people to idolatry,* witchcraft (see Magic), war and other things which would keep them far from God.* Philo and Josephus, however, were able to follow the older Greek usage (daimōn = god/angel/spirit). Later Hellenistic Jewish literature viewed the demons generally as fallen angels (see Principalities and Powers); they could be called "angels" or "spirits" (pneumata), and were associated more frequently with the work of Satan.*

Early Christianity inherited from Judaism this usage of daimonion, and hence in the NT it was the neuter term which was used almost exclusively (only Mt 8:31 uses the masculine). Paul shared the Jewish-Christian view of demons, though the actual term daimonia appears infrequently (5x, all but one in 1 Cor).

1. Demons
2. Exorcism

1. Demons.

In 1 Corinthians 10:14-22 Paul drew a lesson and warning from Israel's apostasy* in the wilderness (1 Cor 10:1-13; cf. Ex 32:6) with an application to current problems in the Corinthian* church*: namely, that certain Corinthian Christians had been joining pagan feasts held in the temples of their gods (see Religions). They seem to have believed that they could share in such festivities with impunity (1) because they possessed the powerful Christian "knowledge"* that there is only one God and idols are really "nothing" (1 Cor 8:4-7; 10:19) and (2) because their baptism* and "sharing in Christ" (see Fellowship) at the Eucharist (see Lord's Supper) had given them a heavenly status of immunity that was irrevocable regardless of conduct (implied in Paul's counterargument of 1 Cor 10:1-6 and at 1 Cor 10:21-22; cf. 1 Cor 6:12-20; 10:23).

Paul responded that though an idol image lacks any of the potency claimed for it by pagans (1 Cor 10:19), and though the object of their sacrifice* was not really a god (1 Cor 10:20; cf. 1 Cor 8:5-6), yet neither was the act of sacrifice or participation in it a matter of indifference. Behind the attraction of the pagan cultus with its ceremonies, food* (meat was a rarity for most working people) and social life, lay the activity of evil supernatural powers, the daimonia, or demons (1 Cor 10:20-21; cf. 1 Cor 12:2). And in the same way that the "cultic" acts of the Lord's Supper established a new reality, a new covenant* relationship with the universal Lord,* so participation in cult-related eating and drinking ("cup of demons" and "table of demons," 1 Cor 10:21) violated the koinōnia, or communion (see Fellowship) with Christ* and established a new reality in communion with inferior evil powers. Through Paul's correctives the Corinthians were shown the danger of their excesses: that their intemperate actions displayed a dangerous presumption on God's grace parallel to Israel's* sin* in the wilderness, and that they were inviting similar consequences upon themselves.

The theme that pagan sacrifice was dedicated to demons is probably hinted at in Galatians 4:8-10, where it is said the Galatians formerly served "those things which are by nature not gods." However, it is not certain that the word elements (stoicheia, Gal 4:9; see Elements/Elemental Spirits) refers to celestial beings. It could just as well be a derogatory figure of speech, and may have designated the Judaizing religion of the intruders. Scholars are divided as to whether or not Paul signified demonic powers in speaking of the "rulers of this age" (1 Cor 2:6; see Principalities and Powers) who are perishing, who do not have God's wisdom and who were instrumental in bringing about the crucifixion of the Lord of glory (1 Cor 2:8)—though the last characteristic may suggest human government.

Both the use of spirits (pneumata) for demons and the theme of demons drawing humanity away from God through deception as seen in 1 Timothy 4:1 were well known in Judaism and early Christianity. In 1 Timothy the demonic activity is seen to be not only in paganism, but to have moved into the church as well, snaring some with doctrinal deception.

2. Exorcism.

In Acts 16:16-18 Paul and Silas in Philippi were hounded by a slave girl possessed by a spirit which enabled her to prophesy (see Prophecy). She was said to have a "Python-spirit" (Acts 16:16, pneuma pythōna), probably her owners' way of claiming that her prophecy was as good as that at Delphi (pythō- being a Greek designation for Delphi or the god Apollo). She proclaimed, in a fashion reminiscent of some of the demon-possessed who encountered Jesus, that the apostles* were "servants* of the Most High God." It is not clear whether her owners hoped to be paid by the apostles for this free advertising, or whether Luke intended this as a demonic attempt to label and hence gain power over the missionaries. In any case, Paul recognized the source as demonic and expelled the spirit "in the name of Jesus" (Acts 16:19). It is significant that at such an early date exorcism formulas incorporated the name of Jesus, implying that Jesus was already thought of as divine by the early Christians (cf. 1 Cor 1:2, and the invocation of the names of deities in pagan exorcism formulas; e.g., PGM I.27-29, 212, 220-21, 265; II.285-87).

Nowhere in his letters did Paul explicitly mention exorcism; nevertheless, it is plain that he believed evil powers to be at work on the cosmic level (Rom 8:38-39; Eph 6:10-18; see Principalities and Powers), in human society (1 Cor 2:6-8) and in individuals (note his characterization of sin* as an alien power within, Rom 6:17-18; 7:14-20; Eph 2:1-2; cf. 2 Cor 4:4). It is equally clear that he believed Christ had triumphed (see Triumph), and that God would make complete his victory over these forces (Rom 16:20; 1 Cor 15:20-28; Phil 2:9-11; Col 2:15). The Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) brings the benefits of Christ's victory to believers, overcoming the tyranny of evil forces (Rom 8:3-4, 5-9; Eph 6:10-18). It is possible that Paul might have included exorcism among the apostolic "signs" (2 Cor 12:12) or the deeds done by the Spirit's power which he referred to generally (1 Cor 2:4; 12:9-10; Gal 3:5; 1 Thess 1:5).

See also Elements/Elemental Spirits of the World; Flesh; Healing, Illness; Holy Spirit; Magic; Principalities and Powers; Satan, Devil; Triumph.

Bibliography. D. Aune, "Demon," ISBE 1.919-23; H. D. Betz, ed., The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation, Including the Demotic Spells (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1986); F. Brenk, "In the Light of the Moon: Demonology in the Early Imperial Period," ANRW 2.16.3 (1986) 2068-145; C. Colpe et al., "Geister (Dämonen)" RAC 9.546-797, esp. 688-700; H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); M. Dibelius, Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1909); G. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); W. Foerster, "δαίμων κτλ," TDNT II.1-20.

T. Paige

DESTRUCTION.

See Eschatology; Wrath, Destruction.

DEUTERONOMIC PERSPECTIVE.

See Restoration of Israel.

DEVELOPMENT IN PAUL'S THEOLOGY.

See Center of Paul's Theology; Conversion and Call of Paul; Eschatology; Hermeneutics/Interpreting Paul; Jesus and Paul.

DEVIL.

See Satan, Devil.

DIASPORA

The term diaspora refers to the voluntary scattering or dispersion of the Jewish people throughout the ancient world. This voluntary departure from the Holy Land began very early. Technically, diaspora is not exile. The Babylonians carried the leadership of the nation and many of its people into exile after conquering Jerusalem. Thus while the Babylonian Exile was a forced deportation, exile became a voluntary residence outside of Palestine when the Persians allowed the exiles to return home and many chose instead to remain in Babylonia. But after the Romans destroyed the Second Temple in A.D. 70 and the last vestiges of independence were removed in A.D. 132-135, the Jews once again regarded themselves as exiles.

Here the focus is on the voluntary dispersion in the Roman Empire as it existed during the first century A.D. The Roman Diaspora is far more important than the Babylonian Diaspora for understanding Paul and the Judaism* of his time.

1. The Extent and Circumstances of the Diaspora
2. Judaism in the Diaspora and in Palestine
3. Conclusions

1. The Extent and Circumstances of the Diaspora. During the Hellenistic period a great number of Jews were dispersed as Jewish mercenaries, military settlers, slaves and free wage-earners who worked in agriculture or as skilled crafts people. The largest concentrations of Jews outside Palestine were found in the two countries immediately adjacent—Egypt and Syria. Philo reports 1,000,000 Jews residing in Egypt during the first century A.D. (Flacc. 6.8), with Alexandria as their center where they constituted one-eighth of the population and occupied two out of five wards of the city. The large number of Jews in adjoining Cyrenaica should be considered an extension of Egyptian Jewry.

Like Egypt, Syria's population was comprised of a high percentage of Jews, particularly in the great cities such as Antioch and Damascus. And like Syria, a high percentage of the population of Asia Minor was Jewish. Colonies of Jews were also located in the Greek isles of the Eastern Mediterranean and in the cities of Greece and Macedonia. In the West, Jews settled in Carthage in North Africa and in Rome (where they numbered between 40,000 and 60,000 in the first century), as well as in the other cities of Italy (see Philo Leg. Gai. 36; Josephus Ant. 14.7.2 §§110-118).

Throughout the Roman Empire the Jews enjoyed the privilege of religio licita, officially recognized religion. Thus the Diaspora Jews practiced their religion openly and had their synagogues* or, as the Diaspora Jews characteristically referred to them, "prayer houses" (proseuchai). Far from the Temple cult of Jerusalem,* the synagogue served as a meeting place for daily and Sabbath prayer, for instruction in Torah and for various community gatherings. Like other ethnic groups in the empire, Jews in some major population centers, such as Alexandria, were organized into an officially recognized politeuma, a central autonomous organization run by its own board of directors and constituting the numerous synagogues of the city. As we know from records of events in Alexandria in A.D. 38-41, the politeuma could serve as a means for Diaspora Jews to defend their rights against Gentile hostility (Philo Leg. Gai. 132).

While the extent of the Diaspora as well as the social and economic causes for it have often been discussed (see Stern), the significant question today concerns the degree of difference between the Judaism of the Diaspora and that of the Holy Land (see Hellenism).

2. Judaism in the Diaspora and in Palestine.

2.1. The Old Perspective: Inward-Looking Versus Syncretistic. The older view posits an inward-looking, Aramaic-speaking, Torah-centered Judaism in Palestine and an open, Greek-speaking, Hellenistic Judaism in the Diaspora—syncretistic in nature and lax in observance of the Law.*

Greek was the primary language of Diaspora Judaism. Since the second century B.C. the Torah had been available in Greek translation and Diaspora authors wrote mainly in Greek. Moreover, Greek education, with its stress on rhetoric and persuasion and with its gymnasia, fostered an appreciation for Greek culture and an accommodation to it.

The Aramaic-speaking Jews of the Holy Land, on the other hand, resisted the inroads of Hellenism by clinging to the Torah. This older view has been challenged by contemporary scholarship as it has interpreted the literary evidence and recent archeological finds.

2.2. The New Perspective: Points of Convergence. The newer view does not deny a difference between the two Judaisms. Nevertheless, recent scholarship has emphasized points of convergence rather than divergence. Palestinian Judaism was neither self-contained nor monolithic; it was marked by variety and shared points of contact with the Judaism of the Diaspora.

2.2.1. Points of Contact. Diaspora Jews not only paid the Temple tax, but they also made pilgrimages to Jerusalem for the festivals (cf. Acts 2:9-11; see Collection). Some, like Paul, came to Jerusalem to study (see Jew, Paul the). Palestinian Judaism also tried to influence Diaspora Judaism by translating books into Greek. Indeed, the work of translating and editing the Septuagint continued into the second century A.D.

2.2.2. Variety in Palestinian Judaism. The use of Greek in Palestine perhaps best illustrates the variety in first-century Palestinian Judaism. Recent archeological finds point to Greek-speaking communities both in Jerusalem and in Galilee. Greek inscriptions on tombs and ossuaries, as well as Greek names, bear their silent but impressive testimony.

2.2.3. The Intent of Jewish-Greek Literature. A further point of convergence is the apologetic intent of the Greek literature both Judaisms produced. While the writers of the Diaspora employed the forms of Greek literature, they wrote primarily for Jews and for apologetic purposes. The Jewish historian Jason of Cyrene is a good example. Trained in Greek rhetoric and historiography, he wrote his five-volume history of the Maccabean revolt (which formed the basis for 2 Maccabees; see 2 Macc 2:19-25), to gain support for the Maccabean revolt among a readership in the Diaspora and in the Greek-speaking world. At the same time he exalted the piety of the Maccabean age with its strict observance of the Sabbath and the food laws. Jason had probably spent time in Palestine (Hengel 1974, 1.95-99). Quite different in outlook, Philo of Alexandria was philosophical and sought to combine Judaism and philosophy by means of allegory. He too sought to commend Judaism to both Jews and non-Jews. The extensive historical writings of Josephus best represent first-century Jewish-Greek literature from Palestine. Among other purposes, he wrote to commend Jewish history to a Hellenistic audience and to set the Jewish wars in the best possible light.

3. Conclusions.

The older view of two very different Judaisms was a misperception. The evidence for variety within Palestinian Judaism corresponds to the variety attested in the Diaspora. Jason and Philo represent the differences of perspective within Diaspora Judaism, with Jason illustrating the close connection between one strand of Diaspora Judaism and a pietistic variety of Palestinian Judaism. Apparently, Diaspora Judaism could be both lax and strict in its observance of the Torah, as could Palestinian Judaism. Philo, for example, observed the Law and condemned those who did not keep it. Rather than contrast the two Judaisms in terms of geography only, with R. N. Longenecker we should consider the contrast of the two Judaisms in terms of attitude and outlook: "The horizontal cleavage of geography must be noted. But more important is the vertical break between Hebraic and Hellenistic inclinations in both Palestine and the Diaspora" (Longenecker, 28). On the other hand, geography and environment cannot be ignored altogether: the Roman Diaspora was, on the whole, tilted more toward the Hellenistic mindset and assimilation of Greek culture than was the Judaism of the homeland. See also HELLENISM; MISSION; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. J. D. Cohen, From the Maccabees to the Mishnah (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); M. Hengel, Jews, Greeks and Barbarians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); idem, Judaism and Hellenism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); A. Kasher, The Jews in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt (New York: Ktav, 1975); R. N. Longenecker, Paul, Apostle of Liberty (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1964); J. A. Overman, "Who Were the First Urban Christians? Urbanization in Galilee in the First Century," SBLASP (1988); M. Stern, "The Jewish Diaspora," in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life, ed. S. Safrai and M. Stern (CRINT; 2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974) 1.117-83; J. A. Sanders, "Dispersion," IDB 1.854-56; M. Stern, "Diaspora," EncJud 6.8-19.

W. R. Stegner

DIATRIBE

Diatribe was a method or mode of teaching and exhortation used in the ancient schools of philosophy.* It was a facet of the Socratic method in which the teacher, using dialogue and question and answer, led the student from error to truth through censure (of incorrect thoughts and behavior) and protreptic (persuasion to a certain philosophy). Diatribe describes this teaching* activity, and also writings that offer actual school diatribes or use the typical features of the diatribe.

1. Origin and Usage
2. Characteristics
3. Paul's Use of the Diatribe
4. Value for Interpreting Paul's Letters

1. Origin and Usage.

The diatribe originated in both the philosophical circles and the rhetorical schools of the Sophists. It was used by itinerant philosophers who brought philosophy to the masses. Diatribe was once thought to have originated with a Cynic philosopher, Bion of Borysthenes (c. 325-255 B.C.), but this is now questioned. In any case, diatribe was given its main features by Bion's student, Teles. The diatribe came to prominence with the Stoics and, owing to its suspected origin with the Cynics, became known as the Cynic-Stoic diatribe.

Diatribe has been understood as a literary genre or style typical of the preaching of the Cynic and Stoic philosophers, but recent study has shown this to be false. Diatribe was not a part of any school curriculum, nor was it incorporated into rhetorical theory or handbooks. However, though not a literary genre, this oral teaching method could be accommodated to a literary mode. From the third century B.C. onward its typical form was a lecture or written thesis on moral and philosophical commonplaces such as divine providence, self-control and self-sufficiency.

2. Characteristics.

The diatribe has no typical structure or approach. Utilization of the many features of the diatribe depends upon the personality and skill of the speaker or author, and the particularities of the situation being addressed. Diatribe is characterized by rhetorical features of a dialogical nature including the introduction of imaginary opponents or interlocutors, and hypothetical objections and false conclusions. Introducing an imaginary interlocutor can take the form of a series of questions and answers between the author and interlocutor, with either one leading. Hypothetical objections and false conclusions are also commonly placed on the lips of the interlocutor, allowing the author to introduce and clarify typical objections or possible misunderstandings of the argument at hand, and to move to a new phase in the argumentation as a whole. These objections and false conclusions are rejected by the author, often beginning with a phrase like "by no means!" (mē genoito).

Diatribe also relies heavily upon features common to Greco-Roman rhetoric* in general. These include amplification, personification, maxims, chreiai (brief sayings or actions attributed to people), comparisons, historical examples, virtue* and vice lists, parallelism, antithesis, irony, sarcasm and paradox. It shares many characteristics with the philosophical dialogue and rhetorical thesis.

3. Paul's Use of the Diatribe.

Paul's use of the diatribe was fully recognized early in this century, particularly by R. Bultmann. In his dissertation he noted that diatribe was used by the popular philosophers and is also found in Paul's letters. He concluded that in his missionary enterprise Paul was functioning like a Cynic street preacher. However, in light of the teaching function of the diatribe it is more accurate to say that Paul taught his churches in a manner reminiscent of a philosophical-school teacher—through censure and protreptic. Diatribe's confrontive nature would not be conducive to a suitable evangelistic preaching style.

No book of the NT can be described as a diatribe. Rather, some books exhibit diatribal features, and these books are best described as "modes" of diatribe. Paul used diatribe creatively, adapting its features to the needs of the gospel, his congregations, his rhetorical style and the letter genre. Some diatribal elements are found in portions of Paul's letters (1 Cor 6:12-20; 15:29-41; and Gal 3:1-9, 19-22), but are most heavily utilized in the letter to the Romans.*

Diatribe in Romans has been extensively studied by S. K. Stowers, upon whose work most current discussion and this one are based. Romans 1—11 most heavily exhibits diatribal features, including rhetorical questions, personification, comparisons and virtue and vice lists. Two main subforms of diatribe predominate. The first subform is an address to an imaginary interlocutor (e.g., Rom 2:1-5, 17-24; 9:19-21; 11:17-24; 14:4, 10). Paul introduces a Jewish interlocutor who boasts over Gentiles* (Rom 2:17-29) and subsequently dialogues with him (Rom 3:1-9; 3:27—4:2). He also introduces a Gentile interlocutor who boasts over Jews (Rom 11:17-24). The second subform is objections and false conclusions from Paul's arguments drawn by the interlocutor. These often set forth possible misinterpretations of a point, correct them, and lead to other points in the argument. These are often rejected with the phrase "by no means!" (mē genoito) and given accompanying reasons for their rejection (Rom 3:1-9, 31; 6:1-3, 15-16; 7:7, 13; 9:14, 19-20; 11:1, 11, 19-20).

4. Value for Interpreting Paul's Letters.

The full evaluation of the role of diatribe in Paul's letters has aided in their interpretation, particularly in regard to Romans. Since diatribe was a tool of instruction in philosophical schools, it was not used for polemic, but instruction and exhortation. Thus the use of diatribe in Romans does not indicate that Paul is engaging in polemic against Judaism (e.g., Rom 2:17-29) or specific groups within the Roman congregations, but teaching the Romans his gospel prior to his imminent visit (Rom 1:8-15; 15:22-29). Interlocutors are not specific groups, but rhetorical voices that raise possible objections to or misunderstandings of Paul's gospel.*

Also, it has been argued that since Paul is using diatribe in Romans, he is not addressing any concrete situation in the Roman congregations (see Rome). Objections of interlocutors are merely teaching tools. However, teaching through diatribe does not preclude addressing a concrete situation. Knowing several members of the Roman congregations, Paul may be addressing situations in the church through the teachings selected and the approach taken for their presentation. This is certainly true of Galatians* and 1 Corinthians,* where diatribal elements address the situations of respective congregations.

See also PHILOSOPHY; RHETORIC; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE; TEACHING/PARAENESIS; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe (FRLANT 13; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1910); K. P. Donfried, "False Presuppositions in the Study of Romans," CBQ 36 (1974) 332-55; G. L. Kustas, Diatribe in Ancient Rhetorical Theory (with responses), ed. W. Wuellner (Colloquy 22; Berkeley: The Center for Hermeneutical Studies, 1976); T. Schmeller, Paulus und die 'Diatribe' (NTAbh 19; Münster: Aschendorff, 1987); S. K. Stowers, The Diatribe and Paul's Letter to the Romans (SBLDS 57; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1981); idem, "The Diatribe," in Greco-Roman Literature and the New Testament, ed. D. E. Aune (SBLSBS 21; Atlanta: Scholars, 1988) 71-83; B. P. Wallach, "A History of the Diatribe from the Origin up to the First Century B.C. and a Study of the Influence of the Genre upon Lucretius III, 830-1094" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Illinois at Urbana, 1974).

D. F. Watson

DISCIPLINE

Community discipline was an emerging concept and practice among Christian groups of Paul's day. Paul probably borrowed some notions from Jewish groups such as the Pharisees, whose disciplinary procedures he knew well from his early days (see Jew, Paul the). From Paul's letters we learn that occasionally believers engaged in aberrant behavior and were reproved for it or made to suffer temporary isolation from other believers. In the most severe cases, permanent exclusion may have been necessary. Such measures had in view primarily the redemption of the individual and secondarily the holiness of the community.

1. Paul's Background and Experience
2. Evidence of Paul's Disciplinary Practice

1. Paul's Background and Experience.

1.1. Discipline in Qumran and Pharisaic Judaism. The Qumran sectaries developed an elaborate system of penalties intended to safeguard the purity and order of their community. Offenders were subject to immediate public reproof which was to be administered not harshly but "with truth and humbleness and affection" (1QS 5:24-26). The procedure for reproof required witnesses (1QS 6:1; CD 9:2), the number of which varied according to the offense and could be cumulative (CD 9:16-20). If reproof was ineffective or the offense serious, a range of penalties was possible, from short-term reduction in food allowance (1QS 6:25) and exclusion from ritual meals (1QS 7:20), to permanent expulsion from the community (1QS 8:20—9:2). It is not clear precisely who had jurisdiction in disciplinary matters. Some texts speak of the whole community making decisions, but other texts imply a more centralized authority (a group of leaders or a single figure), and it may be that the "community" acted through its leader(s).

Rabbinic traditions suggest that the Pharisees of Paul's time commonly imposed a "ban," a state of social isolation imposed for deviation from ritual purity laws or for heretical views (m. 'Ed. 5:6; m. Mid. 2:2; m. Mo'ed Qaṭ. 3:1). The right to put someone under the ban was originally limited to the Sanhedrin, but some time before the destruction of the Temple it was extended to groups of scribes acting together. The ban was a temporary measure, lasting at least thirty days (b. Mo'ed Qaṭ. 16a), designed to recall the offender to full participation in the community. While under a ban, the offender had to exhibit signs of mourning, and everyone but his immediate family was to keep a "leper's distance" of four cubits from him (b. B. Meṣ. 59b). He could, however, participate in Jewish public life, including Temple worship,* and he could receive instruction. Upon his repentance he was fully restored to the community at the end of the ban period. Rabbinic sources are not clear with respect to complete expulsion from Pharisaic communities in the NT era, but it is reasonable to assume that unrepentant banned persons (cf. t. Dem. 2:9), and heretics like Christians would incur more severe judgment.

1.2. Discipline of Paul by the Jews. The "forty lashes less one" which Paul reports receiving five times at the hands of the Jews (2 Cor 11:24) was a punishment administered by synagogues (see Afflictions). In Paul's case it was probably administered for heretical teaching, although the Mishnah specifies only violations of ritual purity (m. Mak. 3:1-9). The only explicit point of contact between these regulations and Paul's career is the specification of defilement of the Temple as grounds for scourging (m. Mak. 3:2; cf. Acts 21:28, which of course postdates Paul's reference in 2 Cor). The number of lashes was reduced from the stipulation of "no more than forty lashes" in Deuteronomy 25:2-3, presumably in order to safeguard against excessive punishment. Detailed instructions concerning administration of the scourging are offered in Mishnah Makkot 3:10-14. Significantly, the scourging was understood to accomplish atonement for the presumably repentant offender (m. Mak. 3:15; cf. m. Sanh. 6:2). The same tractate of the Mishnah includes a detailed discussion of the place of two or more witnesses in accordance with Deuteronomy 19:15; 17:6.

1.3. Non-Pauline Christian Practices. Insufficient data concerning a pre-Pauline system of community discipline necessitate caution in concluding that Pauline practices were the apostle's own invention or were adapted from Judaism. Luke 17:5 may represent the seed of an originally interpersonal "reproof, apology, forgiveness" formula which is expanded into community action in Matthew 18:15-17 and joined to the ascription of apostolic authority (Mt 18:19-20; 16:18-19; cf. Jn 20:23). The record of Acts suggests that the apostles presided in discipline cases from the earliest times (Acts 5:1-11; 8:20-24). Other pertinent texts from the canonical apostolic literature include the charge to bring back sinners from error (Jas 5:19-20; 1 Jn 5:16-17; Jude 22-23) and the command to keep any "root of bitterness" from springing up within the community (Heb 12:15). 2 John 10-11 calls the community to refuse hospitality to heretics, and 3 John 10 refers to the rebellious Diotrephes who expels believers from the church.

Many of these texts may postdate Pauline material, but it is significant that they display the full range of approaches, from the "early" interpersonal encounter to the "late" notion of centralized authority.* The texts exemplify most and exclude none of the measures employed by Paul. It is, therefore, not unreasonable to suppose that Paul himself made only minimal additions to a disciplinary program which was already in place when he joined the movement.

2. Evidence of Paul's Disciplinary Practice.

The ambiguity of what little evidence we have as well as indications of a non-Pharisaic flexibility preclude the use of words like "program" or "system" for Paul's notions of community discipline. It is possible, however, to gain some insights concerning disciplinary practice in the Pauline churches by examining key texts for evidence of procedural elements, culpable behaviors and intended effects. The key texts, in canonical order, are Romans 16:17; 1 Corinthians 5:1-13; 16:22; 2 Corinthians 13:1-2; Galatians 6:1-5; 2 Thessalonians 3:6-15; 1 Timothy 1:18-20; 5:19-22 and Titus 3:10-11.

2.1. Procedural Elements. It appears from Galatians 6:1-5 that the first step in correction of an erring believer was personal, private and gentle (Eph 4:29-32; Col 3:12-13; 1 Thess 5:14-15; cf. 2 Cor 2:5-11). The stress in these passages on humility and readiness to forgive (see Forgiveness) on the part of the person who admonishes recalls the teaching of Jesus in passages like Matthew 7:1-5; 18:21-35. The notions of self-searching censure and eagerness to effect heartfelt reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation) are practically nonexistent in Qumran and rabbinic sources, but they are pervasive in Paul's letters. It is important, then, that the similarities in procedure between Paul and his Jewish contemporaries not obscure the distinction in spirit. Paul's disciplinary practices were intended as remedial rather than punitive measures, being infused from start to finish with the single-minded desire for the good of the offending individual.

The nature of some offenses or the intransigence of some offenders required that the wider community of believers and its leaders become involved. The command to "take note of" (sēmeiousthe, 2 Thess 3:14) those who are disobedient may be understood as a command to "keep written records concerning" such persons (cf. skopeō, "keep an eye on" dissenters, Rom 16:17). This formal element, employed at Qumran, may have been appropriate in the case of more serious offenses, especially if the accumulation of witnesses would have a bearing on further action. Rebuke or refutation (elengchō) is a common term in the Pastoral Epistles which may include both doctrinal and moral lapses to be corrected by the community leaders (1 Tim 5:20; 2 Tim 4:2; Tit 1:9, 13; 2:15; cf. paideuō, 2 Tim 2:25-26). Either "taking note" or "rebuking" by the community leaders may have constituted "witnesses" as required in the case of elders in 1 Timothy 5:19 and in the case of divisive persons in Titus 3:10-11 ("after a first and second admonition"). Paul equates warnings with witnesses when he writes of his impending third visit to the Corinthians (2 Cor 13:1-2). There is some ambiguity here—for example, were warnings sometimes retroactively (ex post facto) construed as witnesses? This could have provided a flexibility designed to avoid the legal elaborations of the Pharisees and Qumran sectaries. It also would have allowed Paul and his delegates to "troubleshoot" freely with the immature and often contentious local communities.

A survey of the key passages does not strongly support the view that disciplinary action became increasingly centralized and formalized during and after Paul's career. Rather, it appears that a pattern existed during Paul's ministry (and/or after, depending on one's view of the date of the Pastorals; see Pastoral Letters) wherein jurisdiction arose in the community hierarchy according to the severity of the offense. Thus we observe that commonly occurring misbehavior is handled by all believers individually (Gal 6:1-5 and par.), warnings are administered generally by the community (Rom 16:17; 2 Thess 3:6-15), the factious and elders are disciplined by apostolic delegates (1 Tim 5:19-22; 2 Tim 2:25-26; Tit 3:10-11) and the most serious cases are taken up by the apostle* himself (2 Cor 13:1-2; 1 Tim 1:19-20; probably 1 Cor 5:3-4; see below on 1 Cor 16:22). Admittedly, the evidence is too sparse to insist on a rigid structure. It is equally possible that, as in the case of Qumran, the group acted through its local community leaders when problems were brought to their attention, and higher authorities, in this case Paul or his delegates, acted when they deemed it appropriate. As in the case of the witness/warning sequence, the church flexibly adapted contemporary Jewish practice to fit the dynamic spirit of the movement and the occasional aberrations of its local leadership.

When an individual did not respond to warning(s) or committed a serious offense, it was necessary to effect social isolation. The expressions used in the Pauline corpus to convey this idea do not specify what is meant. Romans 16:17 tells believers, "keep away" (ekklinō) from wrongdoers; 1 Corinthians 5:11 and 2 Thessalonians 3:14 enjoin, "do not associate" (mē synanamignysthai) with offenders; 2 Thessalonians 3:6 commands, "set apart" (stellesthai) the disobedient. 1 Corinthians 5:11 is more specific in instructing believers not to eat with those under discipline. Some have suggested that the restriction applies only to ritual meals (as in serious cases among the Qumran sectaries), which in the primitive church were the most powerful sign of inclusion (see Fellowship). But this does not fit Paul's wording when he makes the phrase intensive: "do not even eat with such a one." The parallel is not to be found in Qumran but in the Pharisaic ban, under which the offender was cut off socially from all but his immediate family. As in the case of the ban, the individual was "shamed" (1 Thess 3:14) and, when proven repentant (it is not clear how), welcomed back "as a believer" (2 Thess 3:15; cf. 2 Cor 2:5-11; Gal 6:1).

In several instances it appears that Paul goes beyond measures intended to recall erring individuals and seems to advocate their final expulsion from the community. The key text in this regard is 1 Corinthians 5:1-5. Paul here responds to a case of incest by invoking the name* and the power* of Jesus (1 Cor 5:4) and by twice invoking his own authority* from a distance (1 Cor 5:3-4). All of this is a solemn preface to the dramatic command to "hand this man over to Satan,*" an expression employed similarly in 1 Timothy 1:20. It is clear that the early church understood the realm of Satan to be everywhere outside the fellowship of believers (2 Cor 4:4; Gal 1:4; Eph 2:2) and that Paul's expression here denotes expulsion from the community. That the sentence is reformatory in some sense is confirmed by the fact that Paul ends the pronouncement in 1 Corinthians 5:5 with the express intent that the offender's "spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord" (see Eschatology); similarly, 1 Timothy 1:20 ends, "that they may learn not to blaspheme." But beyond this point there is no consensus among scholars.

Disagreement centers on the phrase in 1 Corinthians 5:5, "for the destruction of the flesh." It is unusual for Paul to use the word "flesh"* (sarx) for bodily existence rather than sinful nature (although he does so in 1 Cor 15:39), and an interpretation which views the phrase as a synonym for a kind of penance may appear to be more in line with 1 Timothy 1:20 and the remedial tenor of other Pauline passages. For several reasons, however, a penitential discipline is untenable: it makes Satan an agent for positive ethical change, it overlooks the unmistakable parallel in 1 Corinthians 11:29-30 to illness (see Healing, Illness) and death (see Life and Death) as judgments* for disobedience, and it misses the allusion to the exceptional circumstances of Job 2:6, where Satan is allowed to visit physical affliction on an individual as God permits. Admittedly, Job is a victim and not an offender, but the point is that Satan has power by divine consent to inflict suffering.* Paul demonstrates his understanding of this in 2 Corinthians 12:7, where his "thorn in the flesh" is a "messenger of Satan"; an evil work which ultimately serves God's purpose (cf. Deut 28:15-68).

In the case of 1 Corinthians 5:5, however, are we to understand that the handing over to Satan will result in death? If so, how could it have been remedial? One possibility is that Paul intends that the person's total exclusion from the community will effect repentance before the end. The person's sinful nature would be destroyed. Another possibility is that the suffering and death of the offender are understood to have an atoning effect, a notion affirmed by the Pharisees with the stipulation that the offender must pronounce a desire for his death to atone for his sins (m. Sanh. 6:2). But there is no other evidence that Paul held such a view. A third possibility is that the punishment would stop short of death if the person repented. This may be what Paul has in mind when in 2 Corinthians 2:5-11 and 7:12 he refers to his previous letter in which he had mentioned an "offender." But interpreters are divided over whether this offender who was disciplined is the same person mentioned in 1 Corinthians 5:5.

In 1 Corinthians 16:22 Paul writes in his own hand "if anyone does not love* the Lord,* let him be anathema" (see Curse, Accursed, Anathema) This should be understood as a pronouncement of judgment against those who reject the gospel or as an exhortation to self-examination, although some have mistakenly taken it as a pronouncement of expulsion for heretics or intransigent wrongdoers. Titus 3:10-11 contains another apparent absolute expulsion: after the second warning Titus is to "avoid" (paraitou) a factious person who is "self-condemned." While this seems to go further than other discipline passages, it may, like 1 Corinthians 16:22, be directed toward those outside the community. Titus 3:9 refers to controversies about genealogies and the Law, making it appear that the person in view was not one of "those who have trusted in God" (Tit 3:8).

2.2. Types of Behavior Which Merit Discipline. Doctrinal deviations which created division in the community were a problem early in Paul's ministry (1 Cor 1:10-11; 11:18-19), and the disciplinary measures in Romans 16:17 and 2 Corinthians 13:1-2 appear to respond to division caused by heterodoxy (cf. Gal 5:2-12). The Pastoral letters are dominated by this concern, and 1 Timothy 1:20 is a clear case in point. Heresy and its consequent factions were an obvious danger to the integrity of local communities and the Christian movement as a whole. It is not clear, however, to what extent aberrant views that did not cause splits could be tolerated.

In the two most lengthy passages, 2 Thessalonians 3:6-15 and 1 Corinthians 5:1-13 (1 Tim 5:19-22 is ambiguous), moral deviations are clearly in view. The charge that some were "idle" in Thessalonica is taken by many interpreters to denote inactivity based on the expectation of an imminent parousia, but Paul makes no explicit connection between this problem and his eschatological concerns (see Thessalonians). It is more likely that Paul's instruction reflects a social situation typical of a large port city, where many laborers were inactive for periods of time and dependent on patrons. Within the community of believers, some appear to have begun to presume upon the Christian goodness of patrons, and the system was in danger of degenerating into freeloading, resentment and division (perhaps echoed in 1 Cor 11:18-19).

In 1 Corinthians 5 Paul is obviously concerned about sexual immorality (porneia/pornos, 1 Cor 5:1, 9, 11; see Sexuality, Sexual Ethics), but he also condemns any "so-called" brother or sister (cf. the lack of negative qualification in 2 Thess 3:15) who is "greedy, or is an idolater, reviler, drunkard or robber" (1 Cor 5:11 NRSV). Many scholars take this list as a random enumeration of pagan vices after the fashion of contemporary moralists. But the fact that the list is expanded in 1 Corinthians 6:9-10 with special attention to sexual and property values suggests that it is consciously directed at the sins of Corinth. The list is representative and not comprehensive; that is, these are not the only offenses subject to discipline (cf. Gal 5:19-21). Although the list does not quantify (how greedy, how much reviling), it gives the impression of a moral accountability that is more strict than the church has practiced throughout most of its subsequent eras. The reason for this ethical rigorism is implied in Paul's allusion to Deuteronomy 17:7 in 1 Corinthians 5:13, "Drive out the wicked person from among you." The opposite of wicked for Paul is not pure in the sense of cultic purity but holy in the sense of the Spirit-controlled life of each member of the unified community (see Holiness). Deviation from holiness would retard the growth of the entire organism (or "leaven the lump," 1 Cor 5:5-8). For this reason, Paul views the types of behavior he lists as particularly dangerous in the life of the church.

2.3. Intended Effects. For the individual offender Paul's practice is clearly intended to produce repentance in an atmosphere of support and forgiveness. For the community, to hold its members accountable through disciplinary measures would maintain the moral integrity of the group. Although Paul does not develop the notion of an apologetic purpose for discipline, his practice in ethical decisions is in line with passages like Matthew 5:16 and 1 Peter 2:12. All of these principles were present at least to some extent in the contemporary Jewish practices which were apparently adapted by the primitive church, albeit in a less systematized form. What makes the Pauline concept of discipline unique and potentially potent, however, is the infusion of Christ-like love* into disciplinary practice.

Philippians 2:1-5, although it does not address discipline directly, expresses concisely the principle behind the scattered Pauline references to the subject. It is the incentive of love, the sharing of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), the humble attitude—that is, the mind of Christ—which makes it possible to hold another person accountable. Thus the secret power of effective discipline is in its reflexive element. That is, the one who holds another accountable is first accountable to be a loving person. When this is true of a community of believers, isolation of an offender will be a compelling remedial force. Ultimately, then, it is not the power of persuasion or coercion that effects recall, but the power of love emanating from a transformed community.

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; OPPONENTS OF PAUL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975) 95-102; G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 194-228; G. Forkman, The Limits of the Religious Community (Lund: Gleerup, 1972); G. W. H. Lampe, "Church Discipline and the Interpretation of the Epistles to the Corinthians," in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, ed. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr (Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 337-61; C. J. Roetzel, Judgment in the Community (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972); R. Russell, "The Idle in 2 Thess 3:6-12: An Eschatological or Social Problem?" NTS 34 (1988) 105-19; A. C. Thiselton, "The Meaning of SARX in 1 Corinthians 5.5: A Fresh Approach in the Light of Logical and Semantic Factors," SJT 26 (1973) 204-28; C. A. Wanamaker, The Epistles to the Thessalonians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990) 279-90; P. Zaas, "Cast Out the Evil Man from Your Midst," JBL 103 (1984) 259-61; idem, "Catalogues and Context: 1 Corinthians 5 and 6," NTS 34 (1988) 622-29.

T. E. Schmidt

DIVINE FOREKNOWLEDGE. See FOREKNOWLEDGE, DIVINE.

DIVINE MAN. See CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; OPPONENTS OF PAUL.

DIVINE SONSHIP. See ADOPTION, SONSHIP; SON OF GOD.

DIVORCE. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST.

DOMINICAL SAYINGS. See JESUS, SAYINGS OF.

DOMINIONS. See PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

DOWN PAYMENT. See FIRST FRUITS, DOWN PAYMENT.

DOXOLOGY. See BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; WORSHIP.

DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST

The theme denoted by this title finds frequent mention in Paul's letters. Both the context and the content of these references show that it held an important place in Paul's thinking, his personal life and his apostolic ministry.

1. Origin and Development of the Metaphor
2. The Eschatological Dimension
3. Baptism as Enactment
4. Rising to New Life in Christ
5. Dying, Rising and Apostolic Ministry

1. Origin and Development of the Metaphor. The best known passage in which this concept appears is Paul's exposition of baptism* in Roman 6:3-4:

> Do you not know that all we who were baptized to Christ Jesus were baptized to his death? We were buried therefore with him through baptism to death, in order that as Christ was raised from death through the glory of the Father so we also might walk in newness of life.

The first sentence of this quotation suggests that this interpretation of baptism did not originate with Paul. He apparently assumes that the Christians at Rome* were acquainted with it. If this conclusion is correct, Paul will have received this teaching as an accepted element of Christian teaching (see Creed), but he grasped its profound significance more than others (as witnessed by its frequency in his writings). Some scholars have suggested that it was taken over from Greek mystery religions, in which initiation was conceived in terms of death and resurrection. From considerations of the late date of the records of these rites and differences of interpretation, particularly as to whether initiates in such cults clearly identified with a deity in death and resurrection or were offered immortality through such ritual experience, the suggestion is highly unlikely (Wagner; Wedderburn; Dunn 1988, 308-10; see Religions, Greco-Roman).

By contrast, others have put forward the idea that it was Paul's experience that caused him to seize on this element of Christian teaching—notably the dramatic nature of his conversion* and the acute sufferings* that he endured in his ministry. Paul's allusion in 2 Corinthians 1:8-10 to a "deadly peril" which he had recently endured led him to write:

> We were so unbearably crushed that we despaired of life itself. Indeed, we felt that we had received the sentence of death, so that we should rely not on ourselves but on God who raises the dead. (2 Cor 1:8-9)

On that text W. E. Wilson commented, "In this terrible experience the presence of Christ had been so strongly with him [Paul] that he felt himself to be going through the very Passion itself, and then, as despair was turned into joy through release, his experience of return to life seemed like being raised with Christ" (Wilson, 564). The same passage was believed by C. E. Faw to have played a decisive part in Paul's thinking; with other interpreters of Paul, Faw saw in it an indication of Paul at last accepting physical death as part of his future (in contrast to the assumption that he would survive to Christ's second coming); from that time on "Paul began to use the metaphor of death and resurrection to explain the various aspects of present religious experiences" (Faw, 296). Without minimizing the fearful nature of the experience Paul referred to in 2 Corinthians 1:8-11, one finds it difficult to believe that it had such a drastic effect on his thinking in light of his description of his sufferings* in the service* of the gospel in 2 Corinthians 11:16—12:10, to say nothing of the doubtfulness of this interpretation of dying and rising with Christ.

Even where it is accepted that the concept of death and resurrection with Christ has deeper roots, there is a persistent tendency among English speaking interpreters to view Romans 6:1-11 as primarily concerned with Christian experience (as distinct from Christian conduct). For example, W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam explained Romans 6 as meaning, "In baptism the believer suffers a death and resurrection like Christ's" (Sanday and Headlam, 154). W. F. Flemington described baptism as "a re-enactment for the believer of what once happened to our Lord" (Flemington, 59). And J. D. G. Dunn views the passage as dealing with death to sin,* of which baptism was but one of three metaphors, the others a simile drawn from horticulture ("planted together in the likeness of his death," Rom 6:5) and the concept of the old and new creation*; he considers that baptism is in view only in Romans 6:4—"through baptism" (Dunn 1970, 139-42).

In reality the fundamental feature that lies behind the exposition of baptism in Romans 6:1-11 is the gospel of the once-for-all death and resurrection of Christ, and what that death and resurrection means for humanity. The very terms of Romans 6:3-4 echo the primitive summary of the gospel in 1 Corinthians 15:3-4, and assume the references to the redeeming power of the death and resurrection of Christ set forth in the earlier chapters of Romans (see esp. Rom 3:25-26; 4:25, 5:6—8:21).

2. The Eschatological Dimension.

More clearly than any other passage, however, the theology that lies behind Romans 6:1-11 is succinctly stated in 2 Corinthians 5:14-21 (see commentaries). The theme is God's reconciliation of the world to himself through Christ's redeeming acts (see Peace, Reconciliation). The objective facts stated therein are that Christ in his death and resurrection acted as the representative of the human race, so that when he died and rose from death all humanity was implicated in those acts. In Christ's death all died, in his resurrection all rose, and through those deeds the new creation came into being. The old age, characterized by sin and death, ended; the new age of righteousness and life began. Admittedly there is an overlap of the two ages (1 Cor 10:11), for the end is not yet, but the realities of the new creation are present in Christ and all united with him (2 Cor 5:17).

This is, of course, eschatological* language, but it is in direct line with the teaching of Jesus that in his ministry of word and deed, climaxed by his death and resurrection, the kingdom* of God was established in this world, in anticipation of its consummation at his Parousia. Accordingly in 2 Corinthians 5:14 the statement, "We have reached the conclusion that one died on behalf of all, therefore all died," must be interpreted as relating to all humanity (see Dunn 1974, 130), not solely to the church (but cf. Martin, 129-33). In 2 Corinthians 5:15 "those who live" are those who have learned that they were included in Christ's death and resurrection, and so have come to share in the resurrection life of the risen Lord. In 2 Corinthians 5:17, since they are "in Christ," they participate in the new creation; for them the old order has passed away, the new world has arrived (see Creation and New Creation).

3. Baptism as Enactment.

This interpretation of the new situation brought about by Christ's redemptive acts clarifies for us Paul's train of thought in Romans 6. His intention is an essentially practical one, namely that of demonstrating that justification* by faith* (expounded in Rom 3—5) does not lead to increase of sin (Rom 6:1); on the contrary, Christ's death and resurrection for humanity have in view death to sin and life* from and for God in his new world. Since baptism* in the name of Jesus means union with Christ (Gal 3:26-27), to be baptized to him means to share his death (Rom 6:3). Hence the baptized are buried with him (Rom 6:3)—they are laid with him in his grave. Sharing, then, with him his resurrection, they are called to "newness of life," that is, life in accord with the new age in God's kingdom. Paul in Romans 6:4 refrains from stating that baptism indicates sharing in the resurrection of Christ, not only because he is arguing against a proleptic eschatology (so Käsemann, 166-67), but he also is intent on emphasizing the ethical meaning of baptism; but in Romans 6:11 he clearly implies the believer's resurrection with Christ ("Reckon yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus"), and he explicitly affirms it in Colossians 2:12: "buried with him in baptism, in which you were also raised with him through faith in the working of God who raised him from the dead."

This last sentence needs to be pondered. Baptism signifies resurrection "through faith in the God who raised Christ from the dead." If Paul is saying that participation in the resurrection of Christ in baptism is through faith, then he most surely implies that participation in Christ's death in baptism also takes place through faith. From that time on, life without God has ended, and a new one in Christ has begun. Here justification through Christ and life in Christ by the Spirit* join hands, for the baptism so interpreted is of one who turns to the Lord in response to the gospel of Christ crucified and risen for the life of the world. Interestingly, the clearest indication in Paul's writings of present participation in the kingdom of God occurs in the introduction to a passage often thought to be a baptismal confession (Col 1:15-20): "He (the Father) has rescued us from the power of darkness and transferred us into the kingdom of his beloved Son" (Col 1:13). "Rescued us . . . transferred us into the kingdom" is another way of expressing the meaning of the believer's dying and rising with Christ.

4. Rising to New Life in Christ.

Because baptism signifies participation in Christ's death and resurrection, and through faith an existential participation in them, it calls for the believer's resolute death to sin and life in accord with the fellowship of the risen Lord (Rom 6:4). But it is not alone a call for such living, but with it comes an assurance of the grace of the risen Lord* and the power* of the Holy Spirit so to live ("as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also should walk" relates to the Holy Spirit as the agent of Christ's resurrection and therefore of the believer's). The link between demand and grace* runs right through Romans 6:1-14; it is spelled out in terms of the Spirit in Romans 8:1-4, and expounded in detail in the lengthy exhortation of Colossians 2:20—3:17. The two aspects of living in light of Christ's death and resurrection and life by the aid of the Holy Spirit are strikingly exhibited in Galatians 5:24-25: "Those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires. If we live by the Spirit, let us also walk by the Spirit."

That conjunction of life in union with the living Lord and life by the aid of the Spirit leads Paul to say, "For me living is Christ, and dying is gain" (Phil 1:21). "Living is Christ" means not only for the sake of Christ, but by the grace of Christ. It is otherwise expressed in the profound utterance of Galatians 2:19-20:

> I through the Law died to the Law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with Christ, and it is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me; and the life that I now live in the flesh I live by faith—faith in the Son of God, who loved me and handed himself over to death for me.

For Paul, the former Pharisee who sought to live in total obedience to the Law and experienced it as a tyranny that held him in thrall, it was an inexpressible relief to know that in Christ's death and resurrection he was released for life in the new age. That element of the theology of redemption* became for him an existential reality: his life under the domination of Law* had ended, and life henceforth was fellowship* with the risen Christ; or, otherwise expressed, the risen Christ was the continuing source of his life, as he daily lived by faith in the Lord who loved him and died for him.

Paul concludes the letter to the Galatians in which this statement appears by summarizing his teaching that through Christ's redeeming work believers are emancipated for life in the kingdom of God. He writes:

> May it never happen that I should boast in anything except the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me and I to the world. For circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but new creation is everything. (Gal 6:14-15)

In what sense does Paul mean that "the world*" has been crucified to him and he to the world? R. C. Tannehill points out that for the apostle the term "world" often has reference to the present evil world in which sin, death and the Law are ruling powers (see Principalities and Powers).

> The world has a structure which determines the life of each individual, and so human life as a whole, and man can only escape from this through an event which breaks into the all-encompassing world of sin and opens the possibility of a new existence in a new world. It is to such an eschatological event that Paul is referring when he speaks of the crucifixion of the world. (Tannehill, 64)

Once again, therefore, Paul here refers to the cataclysmic effect of the death and resurrection of Christ, in which he was implicated before he could know it, and through which life was transformed from the day that he came to know Christ; then it was that in fellowship with the once crucified and now ever-living Lord, he experienced life in the new creation. And that is all that now matters.

5. Dying, Rising and Apostolic Ministry.

Since Paul had died with Christ to the world and now partook of the reality of the new creation, he dedicated all his God-given powers to take this news to every creature. This ministry* he sought to carry out after the pattern of Christ's service of bringing the kingdom of God into the world, namely through death and resurrection. This is revealed with particular clarity in his description of his apostolic ministry in 2 Corinthians 4:8-12. Remarkably, each item of suffering mentioned is balanced by an indication of victory over it, and it is characterized as:

> always carrying about in our body the putting to death of Jesus, in order that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our body. For we are always being handed over to death for the sake of Jesus in order that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our mortal body. (2 Cor 4:10-11)

In his missionary service Paul was constantly being "handed over to death" (a frequent expression in the NT for the death of Jesus), but he also experienced the deliverance of God in a manner analogous to Jesus in his resurrection (see Afflictions). References that compare the apostle's sufferings and deliverances in ministry to the death and resurrection of Jesus are to be found in 2 Corinthians 13:4, Colossians 1:24 and 2 Timothy 2:8-13, but above all in Philippians 3:7-11, where Paul describes what he gave up when he became a Christian and the infinitely greater gain he found in Christ. The passage reaches its apex in Philippians 3:10-11:

> (I want) to know Christ, > and the power of his resurrection, > and the participation in his sufferings, > becoming conformed to his death,
> if somehow I may attain to the resurrection > of the dead.

"Knowing Christ" is here equated with participating in the power of his resurrection and in his sufferings. On this Tannehill comments: "Through participation in Christ's death and resurrection Christ himself is known, for it is in this way that Christ gives himself to the believer and exercises his Lordship over him" (Tannehill, 122). Such knowledge is experienced especially in the service of Christ, and it reaches its goal in the resurrection to the consummated kingdom of God. That, of course, is the ultimate end of the redemption of God in Christ, as Paul never tires of asserting (cf. Rom 14:9; 1 Cor 15:20-28; Phil 2:6-11; Eph 1:7-10; etc.)

See also AFFLICTIONS, TRIALS, HARDSHIPS; BAPTISM; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; DEATH OF CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; LIFE AND DEATH; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Bonnard, "Mourir et vivre avec Jésus-Christ selon saint Paul," RHPR 36 (1956) 101-12; M. Carrez "Souffrance et gloire dans les épîtres pauliniennes," RHPR 31 (1951) 343-53; J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (London: SCM, 1970) 139-42; idem, "Paul's Understanding of the Death of Jesus," in Reconciliation and Hope, ed. R. J. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 125-41; idem, Romans (WBC 38; Waco: Word, 1988) 308-10; C. E. Faw, "Death and Resurrection in Paul's Letters," JBR 27 (1959) 291-98.

W. F. Flemington, The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism (London: SPCK 1948) 59; H. Frankemölle, Das Taufverständnis des Paulus: Taufe, Tod und Auferstehung nach Röm 6 (Stuttgart: KBW, 1970); T. F. Glasson, "Dying and Rising with Christ," LQHR 186 (1961) 186-91; E. Käsemann, Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); C. M. Proudfoot, "Imitation or Realistic Participation? A Study of Paul's Concept of 'Suffering with Christ,' " Int 17 (1963) 140-60; W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam, The Epistle to the Romans (ICC; 5th ed.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1902); E. Schweizer, "Dying and Rising with Christ," NTS 14 (1967-68) 1-14; D. M. Stanley, Christ's Resurrection in Pauline Soteriology (AnBib 13; Rome: Pontifical Institute, 1961); R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1967); G. Wagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1967); A. J. M. Wedderburn, Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology against its Graeco-Roman Background (WUNT 1/44; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987); W. E. Wilson "The Development of Paul's Doctrine of Dying and Rising Again with Christ," ExpT 42 (1930-31) 562-65.

G. R. Beasley-Murray

E

EARLY CATHOLICISM

1. Definition
2. Features
3. Circumstances
4. Evaluation

1. Definition.

The term early catholicism (German Frühkatholizismus) requires some clarification. Its use goes back to F. C. Baur in the nineteenth century; others claim it was first used by W. Heitmüller or E. Troeltsch (see Neufeld). E. Käsemann was probably the first to use the term extensively in recent debate (in 1949; cf. Käsemann 1969, 236 n.1). But it has taken on a special nuance in contemporary discussion, chiefly because of its employment in 1950 by Ph. Vielhauer in a programmatic essay which concluded that Luke-Acts "no longer stands within earliest Christianity, but in the nascent early catholic church" (Vielhauer, 49). I. H. Marshall, after summarizing the contributions of E. Käsemann, H. Conzelmann, E. Lohse and K. Wegenast to the discussion, concludes: "The expression 'early Catholicism' refers to a situation in which primitive apocalyptic expectation has been weakened, and the Church as an institution with an organized ministry and sacraments has begun to replace the Word as the means of salvation" (Marshall, 222-23).

2. Features.

In the above definition the data drawn from Acts are combined with those from the Pastoral Epistles, Ephesians, Jude and 2 Peter to form a composite picture of Christian theology and church life in the period between Paul and the emergence of the "catholic" church in the mid-second century. What features mark the growth of this institution of the church (a picture allegedly taken from the later, i.e., deutero-apostolic, NT books and supplemented from the Apostolic Fathers)?

2.1. Church Order. The organization of the church and ministry* has become developed and structured, with charismatic, Spirit-controlled spontaneity and flexibility (reflected in 1 Cor 12—14) giving way to a regular hierarchical and monepiscopal (i.e., sole bishopric) institution of the ministry, seen in Ignatius and 1 Clement 44 by way of the Pastoral* Letters (see Church Order and Government).

2.2. Faith. The understanding of the faith has been transformed from an outgoing response to the gospel call to the possession of articles of religion which form a once-for-all "deposit" (hinted at in 1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 1:14) to be preserved intact and handed on. The term pistis ("faith") loses its eschatological and existential character and signifies one "virtue" among other qualities of the moral life (as in 2 Tim 3:10; cf. 2 Pet 1:5-7: Jude 3, 20).

2.3. Canonical Authority. The boundaries of the canon are set inevitably by the later church's collecting apostolic writings, especially Paul's letters (2 Pet 3:15-16), and thereby erecting a "formal principle" of canonical authority (sola scriptura) as a bulwark against gnosticism* (which claimed a secret tradition handed down from the apostles) and Montanism (a movement which relied on a direct illumination of and continuous revelation from the Spirit).

2.4. Gospel. The character of the gospel, it is alleged, is changed by these new features. Christian doctrine is objectified and so thereby a church of beati possidentes ("happy possessors"), who rejoice in their "orthodoxy," replaced the earlier Christian charismatic groups, in which the sense of living in the fresh dawn of the fulfillment in the new age is strong (e.g., 1 Cor 10:11: 2 Cor 5:17). The gospel is construed as a "new law" (lex nova) to be obeyed. There is a growing distinction between clergy and laity (as in 1 Clement), and tendencies to sacramentalism appear (evidenced by Ignatius). The unity of the church becomes itself an article of belief, a conviction that some find present in the Pauline letter to the Ephesians* (Eph 4:5).

3. Circumstances.

What brought about this transmutation of earlier NT Christianity? E. Käsemann answers this in one phrase:

the deferment of the parousia (Käsemann 1969, 236-37). He writes, "Early catholicism means that transition from earliest Christianity to the so-called ancient Church, which is completed with the disappearance of the imminent expectation" of Christ's coming. The promise of an imminent second coming of Christ and of a cataclysmic end to the age failed to materialize, with two consequences (see Eschatology). First, the prospect of "church history," which pledges the church to an indefinite period of time on the earth, meant a loss of the existential dimension of the gospel; and a "formal principle" (sola scriptura) was accepted in place of a "material principle" (justification* by faith) in the debate over canonicity. In other words, the issue turned on which books were treated as authoritative, but not by the presence or absence of teaching on God's justification of the ungodly. Rather, the period of "saving history" in the "middle of time" is seen to be closed, and with it the boundaries of canonical authority. Hence the original title of Conzelmann's study, Die Mitte der Zeit (ET The Theology of St. Luke). Luke, as the "theologian of salvation history" and "the first Christian historian," is held responsible for this slide from the primitive Christian apocalyptic understanding of the church's role, associated with Paul.

Second, Käsemann's criterion "by grace alone, by faith alone," enshrined in the teaching of the "justification of sinners," attributed less significance to the catholic elements in the NT and thereby reduced them to a lower level of importance so that the Pauline evangelical substance, seen in Romans* and Galatians,* might shine in clearer light. In that sense early catholicism marks a departure from the apostolic faith, viewed as the essential Pauline gospel of justification and righteousness* by faith.

4. Evaluation.

A number of critical remarks may be offered on this enterprise of finding "early catholic" elements in the NT, and in those of Paul's writings regarded as deutero-Pauline in particular.

We may first inquire whether this analysis of the texts in the Pauline corpus is factually correct. Is it true that the Pastorals and Ephesians (and 2 Peter) contain no reference to the apostolic gospel? We may freely grant that the formulation of the kerygma (see Preaching, Kerygma) has changed in these parts of the NT. This shift in formal expression, vocabulary and mode of statement is indeed related to new situations in the later Pauline or even post-Pauline period. But this does not entail a change in substance, as can be seen from the studies which have shown the essential oneness of the apostolic and post-Pauline kerygma, which is centered in Jesus Christ crucified and risen as the ground of salvation. The inroad of false teaching, reflected in such documents as the Pastorals and Ephesians, led the Pauline writers to express Paul's teaching in a new way; but it is Paul's mind they are seeking to express, not some inferior substitute passed off as Paul's, with an intention to deceive the readers (see Canon).

J. W. Drane argued that the "distinction between the 'early catholic' church and the 'apostolic' church is not so marked as is often supposed" (Drane, 165-78). Käsemann (1969 and especially 1964) has insisted, on the basis of verses like 2 Peter 1:4, that there is "a relapse of Christianity into Hellenistic dualism," in which the world is evil per se and communion with God confers a divine nature on believers. Yet it is likely that the distinctions made by the writer here are moral and eschatological, not metaphysically dualistic; and the author of 2 Peter, a devoted follower of Paul, may be using the opponents' own terms (see Martin 1994).

It may be remarked in general that setting up a criterion and judging all else by a failure to approximate to it brings about an ever-present danger of subjectivism. Hence H. Diem has charged that Käsemann has transformed the gospel from an event to a doctrine. Diem argued that because it is an event of history it must go through transformations relative to new situations and contingencies (Diem, 229-34), a feature elaborated in J. C. Beker's works. A final allegation is that pressed home by J. H. Elliott and I. H. Marshall. They charge that Käsemann fails to see the totality of the gospel, which includes those parts of Scripture for which he has little use. For Elliott "evangelical" can be too narrowly defined and he opts for a larger content which will embrace the so-called "catholic" elements in such matters as church order and discipline. In Marshall's critique the so-called "catholic" elements detected by Käsemann form "essential constituent element(s) of the Gospel" (Marshall, 230-31).

Similarly, Hans Küng pleads for the necessity of both evangelical concentration and catholic comprehensiveness, while conceding that we must give prior place to the "original testimonies" (the Gospels and Paul) over the derived witnesses (e.g., Eph; 2 Peter). Käsemann, he says, is "more biblical than the Bible, more New Testament-minded than the New Testament, more evangelical than the Gospel, more Pauline than Paul" (Küng, 268).

See also AUTHORITY; CANON; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; EPHESIANS, LETTER

TO THE; GOSPEL; PASTORAL LETTERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION; PREACHING, KERYGMA; THESSALONIANS, LETTERS TO THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); idem, The Triumph of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, Heirs of Paul (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke (New York: Harper & Row,1960); H. Diem, Dogmatics (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1959) 229-34; J. W. Drane, "Tradition, Law and Ethics in Pauline Theology," NovT 16 (1974) 165-78; J. H. Elliott, "A Catholic Gospel: Reflection on 'Early Catholicism' in the New Testament," CBQ 31 (1969) 213-23; E. Käsemann, "Paul and Early Catholicism," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 236-51; idem, "An Apologia for Primitive Christian Eschatology" in Essays on New Testament Themes (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964) 169-95; H. Küng, The Living Church (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1963) 268-70; idem, Structures of the Church (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame, 1964) 135-54; I. H. Marshall, " 'Early Catholicism' in the New Testament" in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, ed. R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1974); R. P. Martin, The Theology of Jude, 1-2 Peter (NTT; Cambridge: University Press, 1994); L. Morris, "Luke and Early Catholicism," WJT 35 (1973) 121-36; K. H. Neufeld, " 'Frühkatholizismus'—Idee und Begriff," ZKT 94 (1972) 1-28; J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); Ph. Vielhauer, "On the 'Paulinism' of Acts," in Studies in Luke-Acts: Festschrift in honor of Paul Schubert, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (New York: Abingdon, 1966) 33-50.

R. P. Martin

EARLY CHURCH TRADITION. See PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

EBIONITES. See PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE. See VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE.

EDUCATION OF PAUL. See JEW, PAUL THE; PHILOSOPHY; RHETORIC.

ELDERS. See CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT.

ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION

The closely related ideas of election and predestination are crucial elements in the theological structure of Paul's thinking. If he nowhere develops them as themes, nor even frequently uses the words, that was because they were part of the very fabric of his thinking. When they do occur they are buried deeply within highly complex theological arguments, as indisputable theological givens, connected with other such fundamental ideas (e.g., call,* purpose, will, counsel). In Paul these terms are used primarily as redemptive ideas, but there is evidence that they extended beyond that.

1. The Electing God and His Purposes
2. The Election of God
3. The Predestination of God
4. A Summary Statement of Election and Predestination
5. Final Considerations Concerning Election and Predestination

1. The Electing God and His Purposes.

In order to understand Paul's doctrine of election and predestination one must begin with the doctrine of God,* because it is God who elects, who calls, who purposes and who predestinates. God, and for Paul that term must be understood as embracing Father, Son and Spirit, is the center of his thinking, not as an abstract idea reached after long theorizing, but the Supreme Reality in the universe. Everything that Paul says relates to his idea and experience of God. Yet Paul's theology was not practiced in a vacuum but came to expression in his pastoral dealings with his congregations. They in turn lived in a world influenced by skepticism and uncertainty about life's meaning and the ability of the gods to control evil and answer questions about human destiny (see Worship; Religions).

In theory, then, in order to understand election and predestination one would need to understand everything that Paul said about God, because it is God who elected and predestinated. For present purposes, however, only two aspects of the being of God will be considered—those qualities of God that relate directly to him as the one who elects, and those that relate to him as the one who plans or purposes.

1.1. The Qualities of God Related to Election. The qualities of God that one finds related to election are his love* (Eph 1:4-5; 1 Thess 1:4), mercy* (Rom 9:16), grace* (Rom 11:5), and wisdom* and knowledge* (Rom 11:33). For Paul it is the God of love and mercy, acting graciously and wisely, who is the electing God. This would be enough to silence anyone who might imagine that God was arbitrary and chose without any rationale at all, but Paul takes it one step further.

1.2. The Plan of the Electing God. God's election is part of an overall plan or purpose. This means there is nothing at all arbitrary about election. God has a purpose that was worked out in accordance with his love, mercy and grace, that was wise beyond imagination, and that is to be accomplished by means of election and predestination. Election and predestination are not ends in themselves but means to an end, practical ways of accomplishing God's will. So the merciful and loving God worked out a gracious plan from within the depths of himself, based on his eternal wisdom, that he effects in time by means of election and predestination.

1.3. The Plan of God and Redemption. Paul nowhere develops the full extent of what he means by the purpose or plan of God, but no doubt it covered the whole of God's dealings with the created order. Paul does, however, develop its redemptive aspect. God works everything according to the counsel of his own will, and his will or purpose is redemptive. Consequently, according to that purpose, he calls (Rom 8:28), he works everything together for good for those whom he has called (Rom 8:28), he predestinates those who are in Christ* (Eph 1:11; see "In Christ"), he elects (Rom 9:11) and he makes known his manifold wisdom through the church (Eph 3:11). This purpose of God is inscrutable, for "who has known the mind of the Lord?" (1 Cor 2:16; Rom 11:33-35, quoting Is 40:13 LXX), and, though God's ways and doings are past finding out and embody an ultimate mystery,* one is not left wholly in the dark. The Spirit (see Holy Spirit) has searched out the deep things of God (1 Cor 2:10-11), just as God has searched out the hearts of all human beings (Rom 8:27) and God has revealed these things to believers by the Spirit (1 Cor 2:10, 12). Christ also knows the mind of God and believers have the mind of Christ (1 Cor 2:16). So, although the mind, will and purpose of God are eternal, divine mysteries, it was God's purpose to make this known in all its manifold wisdom, to the extent that it can be known, through the church, which is the body of Christ (Eph 3:11; see Body of Christ).

2. The Election of God.

2.1. The Vocabulary of Election. Three cognate terms are used by Paul when he speaks of election: the verb eklegomai, the noun eklogē and the adjective eklektos. Paul uses the verb eklegomai four times (1 Cor 1:27 [2], 28; Eph 1:4). It is found frequently in classical Greek with the basic meaning in the active voice of "to pick" or "single out" (Xenophon Hist. Gr. 1.6.19; Plato Rep. 535a; Leg. 811a).

In the middle or passive voice it means "to pick out for oneself" or "choose" and is found less frequently in this voice in classical Greek (Plato Alc. 1.121e), but almost exclusively so in the LXX. It is only found in the middle or passive in the NT.

Paul uses the noun eklogē five times (Rom 9:11; 11:5, 7, 28; 1 Thess 1:4; elsewhere in NT, only in Acts 9:15; 2 Pet 1:10). The basic meaning of eklogē is "choice" or "selection," and in secular Greek this word has many shades of meaning, including "balancing an account" (Pap. Ryl. II.157.6) and "quotation from a book" (Antig. Mir. 15).

The adjective eklektos is used by Paul six times (Rom 8:33; 16:33; Col 3:12; 1 Tim 5:21; 2 Tim 2:10; Tit 1:1). It means basically "picked out" or "selected" (Plato Leg. 938.5; Thucydides Hist. 6.100), but can also mean "choice," "excellent" or "pure" (LXX Ex 30:23; Asclepius Ap. Aet. 9.12).

Paul uses these various words in three different ways which must now be considered: the election of angels,* the election of persons and the election of Israel.*

2.2. The Election of Angels. In 1 Timothy 5:4 we read of the elect angels. Nothing more is said of this, so the exact meaning is difficult to determine. It could reflect the idea that some angels defected from God, while some (i.e., the elect) did not. Or it could mean that some angels are "choice," that is, superior to the other angels in some indefinable way.

2.3. The Election of Persons. Paul speaks of the election of persons, whether of groups of individuals, no doubt synonymous with the church* (Rom 8:33; Eph 1:4; Col 3:12; 1 Thess 1:4; 2 Tim 2:10; Tit 1:1), or of a single individual (Rufus, Rom 16:13). There are two passages where Paul elaborates this idea: Romans 8:28-39 and Ephesians 1:3-5.

2.3.1. Romans 8:28-39. Here Paul is addressing the question of God's faithfulness. Seventeen hostile and destructive things are listed and none of them (nor all of them together) can separate the elect (Rom 8:33; "the called" Rom 8:28) from the love of Christ (Rom 8:35; "the love of God in Christ" Rom 8:39). The reason for this is that no one can bring any charge against those whom God has chosen, because it is God who has justified them (Rom 8:34), and if God has justified them and is for them, who can be against them (Rom 8:31)? The complex theological reasoning that lies behind this is compressed into an almost oversimplified list in Romans 8:29-30. Those who were foreknown were predestined to be made like Christ. In order to ensure that this would take place, they were called, justified (see Justification) and glorified (see Glory, Glorification). Although their glorification is future, because it is "in Christ" and Christ is already glorified, Paul could speak of their having been glorified as a certainty. Because of this no one can charge God's elect with guilt. They are already glorified in Christ, even if that glorification, considered historically, lies in the future as the hope of salvation.* For those in Christ it is an accomplished fact.

2.3.2. Ephesians 1:3-5. Here the idea of election is qualified in four ways. It is described as being (1) "in Christ,"* (2) supratemporal ("before the foundation of the world"), (3) redemptive and moral ("to make us holy and blameless before him") and (4) an act of love. The idea of predestination enters in Ephesians 1:5 and appears to be synonymous with the election mentioned in the preceding verse. The goal of predestination is adoption* into God's family.

In the eyes of the world* the thought that God would choose such inconsequential people, as were the early believers, made the idea preposterous. But, according to Paul, God has indeed elected the foolish things of the world, the weak things of the world, the lowly things of the world, the despised things, the things that are not, to confound the wisdom, strength and facticity of those things that are (1 Cor 1:27-28). God's purpose in doing this is that he would be acknowledged as God and that any boasting would be a boast in him (1 Cor 1:29-31). Here election is seen as a purposeful act of God directed to the moral end of keeping his readers' pride in check. The Corinthians are summoned to examine their calling: not many wise, powerful or well-born were among them, primarily because the means God chose to effect his calling and election, namely, the preaching of the cross,* was despised and rejected by the world (1 Cor 1:18-21). To those who believe (1 Cor 1:21), who are the called (1 Cor 1:24), who in humility acknowledge Christ as Lord,* Christ becomes wisdom,* righteousness,* sanctification and redemption* (1 Cor 1:30)—the very power* and wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:24). It is possible that these verses refer more generally to the preaching of the gospel,* which seems weak (see Weakness) and foolish to the world, than to the individuals who believed, in which case there would be another category of Pauline usage for election. That category would be "The election (choice) of the preached message by God to offer salvation to the world."

Putting all this together, election for Paul means that God, as an act of his love, has eternally chosen a group of individuals in Christ to be holy and without blame. This has brought about their adoption* into God's family according to a predetermined plan that included their calling, justification and glorification. Because it is God who has effectuated this plan, with justification the apparent key to understanding it, no one is able to bring any ultimately damaging charge against believers, and nothing or no one is able to drive a wedge between them and the God of love who set the plan in motion and will surely bring it to completion.

2.4. The Election of Israel. Paul speaks specifically of the election of Israel* in Romans 9:11; 11:5, 7, 28. In Romans 9—11 Paul is struggling with the question of Israel's place in God's plan. He knew very well the teaching of the OT regarding God's choosing of Israel and that this covered their entire existence. God chose Israel to make them his treasured possession (Deut 7:6; 14:2). He chose who should be priests among them (Deut 18:5; 21:5), who should be king (1 Sam 17:7-13; 2 Sam 21:6; 1 Kings 8:16) and the city where they should dwell (1 Kings 14:21; 2 Chron 6:6). They were, in fact, his chosen ones (Ps 105:6, 43). So there is nothing new in Paul's speaking of the election of Israel.

What is new is Paul's probing the purpose of God in the election of Israel and locating the essence of God's purpose in his mercy (Rom 9:16), and as independent of Israel's works (Rom 9:11). From this, Paul can move to the larger idea that the Gentiles* were included from the beginning and that Israel was only Israel when it fulfilled God's ultimate purpose (already hinted in Is 56:1-8). So God's promise to Israel was to all who qualified as Israel, which included the Gentiles. Nevertheless, in Paul's day there was still an Israel—a remnant chosen by grace (Rom 11:5)—that experienced the favor of God. But the whole complex history of Israel is a mystery that would only be unraveled in the future when "all Israel will be saved" (Rom 11:26). The gifts and calling of God are irrevocable and Israel is beloved by God because of "the fathers" (i.e., the patriarchs, Rom 11:28-29).

The essence of Paul's difficulty is that he wants to say Israel's election ensured that it would forever stand, and yet it was now being set aside. He solves this by finding a deeper meaning to election in the purpose of God, by finding Israel within Israel, by pointing to himself as a saved Israelite, and by postulating Israel's future redemption. (For an interesting discussion of Israel's unbelief, see Volf, 161-95. For a revisioning of Paul's theology under the thesis that by his christology and pneumatology Paul has redefined the Jewish doctrine of election, see Wright.)

3. The Predestination of God.

3.1. The Vocabulary of Predestination. Paul uses the verb proorizō five times (Rom 8:29, 30; 1 Cor 2:7; Eph 1:5, 11) with the basic meaning of "determine beforehand" or "predetermine." It is not found in the LXX, and in secular Greek it is rare (if existent) before the Common Era. Proginōskō also has strong predestinarian overtones and is used by Paul in Romans 8:29 and 11:2. It has been suggested by some that proorizō and proginōskō are virtually synonymous terms (see Volf, 9; see Foreknowledge).

3.2. The Hidden Wisdom of God Predestined. In 1 Corinthians 2:7 Paul speaks of a secret, hidden wisdom* that has been predestined for the believers' glory. This wisdom is the entire plan of salvation that was unknown to the demonic* forces of this world, who, if they had known about it, would have attempted to thwart it (1 Cor 2:8; see Principalities and Powers). It was God's eternal purpose (eternal, because God is eternal) to effect salvation through the death* of Christ. It was divinely wise because the death of Christ satisfied God's love and justice at the same time, broke the power of evil, transferred believers into God's kingdom* and ultimately saves them. It was God's determination that this be so.

3.3. Persons Predestined to be Like Christ. In a related way Paul speaks of God's predestining persons to be conformed to the image of Christ (Rom 8:29) and adopted into the family of God (Eph 1:5). This was done in accord with the counsel of his will (Eph 1:11), and "in" (Eph 1:11) or "through" (Eph 1:5) Christ. In Ephesians 1:4 Paul parallels this divine ordination with election and defines it as being "before the foundation of the world." In Romans 8:29 the act of predestination appears to follow upon that of foreknowing, with calling consequent upon predestining. In Ephesians 1:11 foreknowledge is not mentioned, but calling follows predestination and is in accord with the counsel of God's will (the "good pleasure of his will," Eph 1:5).

4. A Summary Statement of Election and Predestination.

In summary, Paul teaches that in all of God's dealings with the created order he works according to a predetermined plan, as eternal as himself (but not apart from himself or Christ—the elect one par excellence), in such a way that his own inner being and divine good will are satisfied. That plan has a definite goal: to sum up all things in Christ (Eph 1:10). This encompasses objects, means and ends. The objects include angels, human beings and Israel; the means include the person and work of Christ, and the proclamation of the gospel; the ends are wholly redemptive whether for Israel or for believers (and presumably for the angels, whatever that may mean). The ultimate end is the praise of God's glorious grace (Eph 1:5, 11). With respect to human beings, it is important to emphasize that Paul speaks of the election and salvation of sinners (Rom 5:6, 8), that is, he joins means and end. The good news of the gospel is that humans do not need to work their way into God's favor (indeed, they cannot). Rather, God's grace is given freely (Rom 3:24). This excludes human boasting and results in the eternal praise of God's goodness.

5. Final Considerations Concerning Election and Predestination.

Paul was aware that the doctrines of election and predestination had some problematic elements in them and, although he never dealt with them in any systematic fashion, in the course of his letters he did touch upon the two most prominent difficulties: fairness on God's part and human responsibility, or freedom.*

5.1. The Problem of God's Fairness. For Paul it is axiomatic that God is fair and would never do anything that shows partiality (Rom 2:11; Eph 6:9; Col 3:25). Consequently, election does not mean that some people cannot come to God for salvation, nor that those who are elected are singled out on the basis of any virtue they possess. In fact, the underlying reason Paul develops the doctrine of salvation along these lines is precisely to exclude any boasting or the imagination that election was based on works (see Works of the Law) or virtue. Indeed, God would not have been unfair had he not elected anyone, because all equally deserve God's judgment* due to their sin.* So, if there is apparent unfairness in this doctrine, it is only apparent and not real. In addition, Paul taught that the grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all people (Tit 2:11), and he certainly would have agreed with Peter, "God is not willing that anyone perish, but that all come to repentance." (2 Pet 3:9). If people are not saved, the blame cannot be laid upon God.

5.2. The Problem of Human Responsibility. If a cynical detractor were to ask Paul, "Why does God still blame us? For who resists his will?," Paul can answer in the same sharp way, "Who are you to talk back to God? Shall what is formed say to him who formed it, 'Why did you make me like this?' " (Rom 9:19-21). For those who so misunderstand God as to imagine that God works arbitrarily and on no moral basis whatsoever, let such an answer suffice. But Paul knew very well that election and predestination included human responsibility.

His using Pharaoh as an example is a case in point (Rom 9:16-17). Paul knew that the OT spoke not only of God's hardening Pharaoh's heart (Ex 4:21; 7:3, 4, 13; 9:12, 15-17, 34-35; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:9, 10) but also of Pharaoh hardening his own heart (Ex 8:15, 32; 9:34; 1 Sam 6:6), thus making him responsible for the sins he committed. That God could work his will in and through the acts of humans in such a way that his will was done and yet the human will was not violated, coerced or ignored is fundamental to biblical thinking. (See, e.g., Prov 16:1, 4, 9, 33. This idea is also found in Rabbinic thought, e.g., Pirqe 'Abot 3:19, "All is foreseen, and free will is given, and the world is judged by goodness," dating from somewhat after Paul's day.)

Paul stresses the sovereign freedom of God in order to silence proud human rebellion against God, not to make God appear unreasonable and dictatorial. Conceivably, Paul would argue that it is not necessary that we know exactly how God works his will in and through the responsible acts of our will, and Paul nowhere discusses this. It is enough to know that it is the loving and gracious God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ who calls mortals, sinners that they are, to himself, and that anyone who believes can be assured of salvation. Salvation does not depend on any merit humans might possess but on the electing grace of God that chose believers in Christ before the foundation of the world.

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; CALL, CALLING; FOREKNOWLEDGE, DIVINE; FUTILITY; GOD; ISRAEL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. A. Carson, Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility (Atlanta: John Knox, 1980); L. Coenen, "Elect, Choose," NIDNTT 1.533-43; C. E. B. Cranfield, Commentary on Romans (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); F. Davidson, Pauline Predestination (London: Tyndale, 1946); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (2 vols.; WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); J. Eckert, "ἐκλέγομαι," EDNT 1.416-17; idem, "ἐκλεκτός," EDNT 1.417-19; K. Grayston, "The Doctrine of Election in Rom 8:28-30," SE 2 (1964) 574-83; A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (1950); K. L. Schmidt, "προορίζω," TDNT V.456; G. Schrenk and G. Quell, "ἐκλέγομαι," TDNT IV.144-92; N. Turner, Christian Words (Nashville: Nelson, 1981) 127-34; J. M. Gundry Volf, Paul and Perseverance (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

W. A. Elwell

ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD

The meaning or meanings Paul attached to ta stoicheia (tou kosmou) in the four instances in which he used it (Gal 4:3, 9; Col 2:8, 20; cf. Heb 5:12; 2 Pet 3:10, 12) has been a matter of exegetical debate. Interpreters have usually understood Paul's usage to fall into one of the following semantic fields: (1) basic principles of religious teaching such as the Law*; (2) essential, rudimentary substances of the universe such as earth, water, air and fire; or (3) personal spiritual beings of the cosmos such as demons,* angels* or star deities. Studies of the usage of stoicheia in Greek writings outside the NT have provided evidence for these and other specific usages of the word, though the clear extrabiblical evidence for usage (3) cannot be found in texts dated prior to the second century A.D. In the final analysis, however, exegetical decisions regarding the meaning of stoicheia in Pauline texts must take into account particular usage and context. But interpreters of Paul, even though agreeing on this principle, have not arrived at a consensus.

1. Terminology and Contexts
2. The Elements as Basic Principles
3. The Elements as Essential Components of the Universe
4. The Elements as Spiritual Powers

1. Terminology and Contexts.

In three of the four Pauline usages stoicheia (always in the plural in Paul) is qualified by the genitive tou kosmou, "of the world," and the fourth usage (Gal 4:9), where stoicheia is not so qualified, seems by its proximity to Galatians 4:3 to be nothing more than an abbreviated reference to ta stoicheia tou kosmou. Thus interpreters of Paul must focus on ta stoicheia tou kosmou as a linguistic unit.

This characteristic Pauline usage may be usefully contrasted with the three other usages of stoicheia in the NT. In Hebrews 5:12 the author speaks of ta stoicheia tēs archēs tōn logiōn tou theou, "the basic principles about the elementary aspects of God's message," clearly referring to the basic, rudimentary teachings of the faith. In 2 Peter 3:10, 12, in the context of speaking of the Day of the Lord, it is said that the created order, with its "elements" (stoicheia), will be consumed with fire. Here the reference is clearly the natural substances of which the world is made.

Certain other features of Pauline usage should be noted. In Colossians 2:8-10 Paul refers to a false teaching which is according to ta stoicheia tou kosmou rather than according to Christ,* who is the head of every principality and power. The proximity of ta stoicheia tou kosmou to "principalities and powers"* has led some interpreters to correlate the two categories. Later Paul speaks of the Colossians as having died with Christ "from [apo] the stoicheia tou kosmou" (Col 2:20), who are implied to be associated with encumbering and ineffective religious rules and regulations. The allusion to spiritual disciplines associated with the "worship of angels" in Colossians 2:18 has led some interpreters to see again a parallel between ta stoicheia tou kosmou and angelic powers.

In Galatians ta stoicheia tou kosmou is used first to refer to an aspect of religious experience prior to Christ (Gal 4:3) in which people were subjected to slavery and a status as minors, a situation parallel to the Jewish experience under the Law which Paul has just described (cf. Gal 3:23-25). A few verses later Paul refers to the Galatian Gentiles' religious past when they did not know God,* likening it to an enslavement to the "weak and beggarly" stoicheia (Gal 4:9). This field of power to which they were formerly subject is set in parallel relationships with what Paul calls "those who by nature are not gods" (Gal 4:8). A parallel may thus be observed between Colossians 2:8, 20 and Galatians 4:8-10. In each case the stoicheia are closely associated with religious rules and regulations and in both letters the context is polemical.

The Greek noun stoicheion is related to stoichos, a term we know to have been employed in military contexts in reference to a "row" or "series." In that context stoicheion referred to that which is found in a row or series. But the word came to be applied in many contexts and could refer to the letters making up a word, whether silent or vocal; the basic components of language (letters, syllables, words) and music (notes); the basic rudiments of a subject (what contemporary English speakers would refer to as the ABC's); the basic components, or "elements," of the physical world as understood by ancient philosophers (earth, air, water, fire; cf. Plato Theaet 201e; Diogenes Laertius 7.136, 137; 2 Macc 12:13; Wis 7:17); the stars of the heavens, which are composed of the chief and purest element, fire; the stars as visible gods who, by some accounts, influenced events and the fate of men and women (Ps-Calisthenes 1.12.1); and celestial demons or spirits inimical to humankind (T. Sol. 8:2). (For discussion of these various meanings and references see Delling.)

2. The Elements as Basic Principles.

Could Paul be referring to a basic set of philosophical or religious principles which pressed their claim upon individuals prior to and apart from Christ, and which still threaten to supplant Christ? This approach has had its proponents, including E. D. Burton, C. F. D. Moule and A. J. Bandstra. Moule, while finding a reference to demonic powers "natural" in the context of Colossians 2:8, is led by "the absence of data outside the N.T. for any such sense of στοιχεῖα until later times" to define it as "simply 'elementary teaching'—teaching by Judaistic or pagan ritualists, a 'materialistic' teaching bound up with 'this world' alone, and contrary to the freedom of the Spirit" (Moule, 92). R. N. Longenecker, commenting on stoicheia in Galatians 4:3, 9, finds " 'basic principles' of religion" to be the most satisfactory interpretation in the context of Galatians,* which in the case of Judaism is "the Mosaic Law in its condemnatory and supervisory functions" and for the Galatians was the pagan "veneration of nature and cultic rituals" (Longenecker, 166). Furthermore, he would distinguish this usage from that found in Colossians 2:8, 20. Bandstra has understood the stoicheia as "law" and "flesh" (unregenerate human nature), "two fundamental cosmical forces" which held men and women, whether Jew or Gentile, in their thrall and from which deliverance is available in Christ alone (Bandstra, 70). The kosmos in this case is "that whole sphere of human activity which stands over against Christ and His salvation" (Bandstra, 57).

But many interpreters have been struck with the fact that when Paul speaks of ta stoicheia tou kosmou in both Galatians and Colossians, they appear in a linguistic context in which they are associated with references to personal spiritual forces (angels, principalities and powers, gods who are not gods) and, in Colossians 2:8, set in contrast with Christ. Moreover, the selection of "law" and "flesh" as referents raises questions, for in Paul's vocabulary "sin" and "death" also appear as archetypal powers which determine the plight of humans outside of Christ. And when Paul speaks of believers "dying to/from" something, he can speak not only of the Law (Gal 2:19; cf. Rom 7:2, 4, 6) and flesh (implied in Col 2:11-14), but of dying to sin (as a power, Rom 6:2, 6-7) and to the world (Gal 6:14). Should the lack of evidence that Paul's contemporaries used stoicheia to refer to demonic powers discredit the possibility that Paul used stoicheia in such a manner? This issue needs to be re-assessed (see 4 below).

3. The Elements as Essential Components of the Universe.

E. Schweizer is the most notable proponent of the view that Paul, like some of his contemporaries, used stoicheia tou kosmou to refer to the elements earth, water, air and fire. Schweizer argues that Pythagorean ideas informed the situation at both Colossae and Galatia (see Philosophy). He demonstrates from a number of texts how "from Heraclitus in the sixth century B.C. up to the sixth century A.D., 'the mighty strife among the members' of the world (Aristotle Metaphysics 11.4 [1000ab]) dominates the Greek understanding of the cosmos" (Schweizer 1988, 456). In other words, the four elements, which were originally in equilibrium, were considered to be in "strife," and their imbalance threatened to bring either deluge or conflagration upon the cosmos. Even the Hellenistic Jewish philosopher Philo interpreted the Jewish new year festival as a thank offering to God the peacekeeper (Philo Spec. Leg. 2.190-92) and could view the high priest (Philo Vit. Mos. 2.121, 125, 133) as playing a role in guaranteeing cosmic harmony.

With this background as well as the evidence from Colossians and Galatians, Schweizer suggests a religious milieu in which individuals regarded themselves as living in a world of futility,* bound to this world by the elements which prevented their ascent to heaven.* At Colossae* a syncretistic notion prevailed that one could escape the cosmos by means of ascetic practices that would free the soul from earthly entanglements. Moreover, by worshiping angels (as their pagan neighbors worshiped heroes and demons) they were propitiating the powers who ruled the elements and who could thus assure humans their escape through the lower spheres beneath the moon to reach heaven above. It is against this background that the author of Colossians maintains that Christ is the one through whom believers may "die out from under the elements of the world" and so find deliverance.

Schweizer admits more difficulty in bringing this interpretation to bear upon Galatians, but suggests that the adherence to "days and months and seasons and years" (Gal 4:10; see Holy Days) may be related to a Pythagorean notion that insight into the cosmic order (in this case the divisions of time) would purify the soul. The "ones that are by nature not gods" (Gal 4:8) might then refer to savior heroes of the Galatians' pagan past who were ineffective in providing deliverance. The "elements of the world" were not worshiped but feared; they were not deities or spirits, but earth, water, air and fire. The means of deliverance was asceticism, insight and worship of angels or "gods."

Schweizer's proposal explains Colossians better than it does Galatians, where his solution does not engage Paul's evident concern about the Law and his apparent implication that the Jews too were enslaved to the stoicheia tou kosmou (Gal 4:3). Moreover, in order to maintain Schweizer's view, one must be persuaded that the false teaching Paul opposed at Colossae—and at Galatia—bore further characteristics of Hellenistic philosophy (Pythagoreanism) in syncretistic relationship with Jewish ideas. Such a scenario has been suggested, but other factors need to be considered in determining the nature of the religious notions Paul was opposing.

4. The Elements as Spiritual Powers.

A number of interpreters, perhaps even a majority, have concluded that ta stoicheia tou kosmou refers to spiritual powers of some sort. The options, broadly defined, range from star deities, to demons, to angels of the nations or local tribal and national deities.

4.1. Star Deities and Demonic Powers. The notion that stars and constellations in some sense control the cosmos and human destiny has an ancient lineage, traceable at least as far back as the celestial divination of Old Babylon in the second millennium B.C. (see Rochberg-Halton). In time the stars were associated with spiritual powers and then identified as spiritual powers themselves (see Worship). Plato could speak mythically of the deity of the stars, even calling them "visible gods" (Plato Tim. 40a, 40c, 40d, 41a; cf. the mythic language of Judg 5:20). Diogenes Laertius (third century A.D.) testifies to the Pythagorean notion that the sun, moon and stars are gods because they possess the element of warmth, an essential characteristic of life (Diogenes Laertius 8.28), and he can call the twelve signs of the zodiac ta dōdeka stoicheia, "the twelve stoicheia" (Diogenes Laertius 6.102; cf. PGM 39.18-21).

From Second Temple Judaism there comes ample evidence of speculation about the universe and how the heavenly bodies were related to angels. The Book of the Heavenly Luminaries in 1 Enoch 72—82, a work dating from perhaps the first century B.C., testifies to Jewish astrological ideas and the association of an angel, Uriel, with the stars. This is set within a context in which particular attention is paid to times and seasons (for further texts relating angelic powers with natural elements, including the stars, cf. 1 Enoch 43:1-2; 60:11-12; 80:6; Jub. 2:2). Stephen, in Acts 7:42-43, points to Israel's worship of the "heavenly hosts" (stratia tou ouranou) as evidence of Israel's disobedience in rejecting God's Law, and appeals to Amos 5:25-27 where idolatry and star worship resulted in Israel's exile. It is of some significance that Josephus could say that the woven veil separating the "holy place" from the outer vestibule of the Herodian Temple was "a kind of image of the universe." Its four colors symbolized fire, earth, air and sea, and embroidered upon it was "a panorama of the heavens," excepting "the signs of the zodiac." The latter, however, were represented by the twelve loaves upon the table while the seven lamps represented the seven planets (Josephus J.W. 5.5.4-5 §§212-18). Thus even at the heart of the Jerusalem Temple cultus there were symbols which suggest a necessity of penetrating the heavens in order to reach the throne of God in the Holy of Holies.

The earliest extant extrabiblical Jewish evidence for the word stoicheia being associated with both spirits and stars is later than the first century (second and third centuries A.D.), but it is well attested and may very well represent beliefs contemporaneous with Paul (cf. Lohse, 99 n.41). The Testament of Solomon, a Jewish-Christian work usually dated to the third century A.D., but possibly containing material dating to the first century, testifies to a belief in star spirits called stoicheia. Seven bound spirits appear before Solomon and reveal their identity: "We are the stoicheia, rulers of this world of darkness [kosmokratores tou skotous, cf. Eph 6:12] . . . our stars in heaven look small, but we are named like gods" (T. Sol. 8:2-4).

Thus it is not difficult to imagine a belief system, particularly at Colossae, in which Jewish and Hellenistic ideas would have been intermingled and celestial powers associated with angels, who were revered as controlling the fate of humans. These cosmic powers, which Paul may have called stoicheia tou kosmou, needed placating if humans were ever to escape their bondage to fate. Thus when Paul refers to a "forced piety" (Col 2:23 NEB, ethelothrēskia) characterized by calendrical observances, ascetic practices aimed at visionary experience and the "worship of angels," he may have had in mind a form of religion that venerated the stoicheia either as star deities or as astral bodies in close association with angelic cosmic powers. Paul's proclamation of Christ's triumph* over the principalities and powers (Col 2:15) and his assertion that "all the fullness*" resides in Christ (Col 1:19; 2:9)—rather than in the cosmic forces—may thus be seen as a frontal attack on such theosophical religious notions which may have been an incipient form of gnosticism* (cf. Martin, 90-96). It is interesting to observe that a text from Alexander Polyhistor, of the first century A.D. (see trans. in Schweizer 1988, 458), attests to several Pythagorean practices that bear similarity to the calendrical observances, abstention from certain foods, and worship of angels alluded to in Colossians 2:16-23.

4.2. Local, Tribal Deities. Finally, we may consider the suggestion that stoicheia tou kosmou was Paul's particular way of referring to "local presiding deities" or "national 'gods' " who rule over territories and races. N. T. Wright has argued for this meaning in Colossians, understanding Paul to be engaged in a polemic against Judaism rather than some sort of Jewish-Hellenistic syncretism, and he sees the same meaning operative in Galatians (see Wright, 101-2, 115-16). Following and developing this line of interpretation we could understand ta stoicheia tou kosmou as a broad, inclusive term that embraced the whole host of spiritual beings known individually as principalities, powers, dominions and rulers, the equivalent to the angels or gods of the nations (see Principalities and Powers). In Galatians 4:8 Paul speaks of the Galatians as formerly enslaved to "those beings which by nature are no gods." This analysis of the Galatian Gentiles' former situation resonates with the Jewish notion that the gods of the nations are not really what they appear to be; they are but spiritual powers appointed as national guardians by Yahweh, ultimately subservient to him alone, but falsely regarded as "gods" by the nations. Paul employs this notion elsewhere in 1 Corinthians 8:5 and 10:22 (cf. Deut 32:8-9, 17, 21; Ps 82:1, 6-7). Israel, on the other hand, was God's own possession (Deut 32:9), though he could employ angelic intermediaries in his dealings with his people.

Paul, faced with Judaizers at Galatia, would then be likening Jewish religion governed by the Law to paganism; both were characterized by bondage to religious forces that were but local, national, tribal deities. When the Judaizers* insisted on Gentile Christians submitting to the "works of the Law"—namely, circumcision, food laws and Sabbath observance—they were in effect regarding the triumph of Christ as the victory of one national deity over all others (see Dunn, 135). Thus, when Paul refers in Galatians 3:19 to the Law being "ordained through angels," he may be suggesting that the implication of the Judaizers' message (which may have emphasized the glory of the giving of the Law at Sinai with the accompaniment of angels) is that, rather than understanding Israel to be ultimately God's own possession, the means through which he would bring all nations to himself, they in effect placed Israel back under the intermediate superintendence of an angelic power and reduced God's purposes in history to the inclusion of Gentiles as proselytes in an ethnically restrictive religion. This was in effect to deny the new status of Gentiles in Christ, who now know and are known by the one true God* (Gal 4:9; cf. 1 Cor 8:3). God's oneness and universal sovereignty is now reflected in the universal extension of his blessing of salvation* through his Son,* the seed of Abraham,* to form one people who are neither Jew nor Gentile (Gal 3:28). To insist on "works of the Law"* as entry requirements is to return to the previous epoch in salvation history in which nations and ethnic groups were under the superintendence of the "weak and beggarly" stoicheia tou kosmou, with Israel's own situation characterized as being under the Law as a restrictive pedagogue (paidagōgos, Gal 3:23-25) who kept them from mingling with the nations and falling into idolatry.

This final line of interpretation may emerge as an attractive option for those who are convinced that the "new perspective" (see Paul and His Interpreters) has grasped the root of the matter: that Paul's critique of the Law and its "works" focuses on the misguided definition of the people of God as those who adhere to the boundary-defining works of circumcision,* food* laws and Sabbath keeping (see Holy Days). As in each of the possible meanings of ta stoicheia tou kosmou that we have reviewed, larger interpretive issues come into play and will guide interpreters in deciding what meaning or meanings Paul employed when he used the term.

See also ANGELS, ARCHANGELS; COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; LAW; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. Arnold, Powers of Darkness: Principalities and Powers in Paul's Letters (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1992); A. J. Bandstra, The Law and the Elements of the World (Kampen: Kok, 1964); G. B. Caird, Paul's Letters from Prison (Oxford: University Press, 1976); idem, Principalities and Powers (Oxford: Clarendon, 1956); G. Delling, "στοιχεῖον," TDNT VII.670-83; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Theology of Galatians: The Issue of Covenantal Nomism," in Pauline Theology. Volume I: Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. M. Bassler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 125-46; E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Herm: Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 96-99; R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon (Int; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); C. F. D. Moule, The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (CGTC; Cambridge: University Press, 1957); P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982) 129-32; B. Reicke, "The Law and this World according to Paul: Some Thoughts concerning Gal 4:1-11," JBL 70 (1951) 259-76; E. Schweizer, The Letter to the Colossians (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1982); idem, "Slaves of the Elements and Worshipers of Angels: Gal 4:3, 9 and Col 2:8, 18, 20," JBL 107 (1988) 455-68; F. Rochberg-Halton, "Astrology in the Ancient Near East," ABD I.504-7; N. T. Wright, Colossians and Philemon (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986). D. G. Reid

ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES.

See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

EMPEROR CULT.

See EMPERORS, ROMAN; LORD; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SAVIOR.

EMPEROR WORSHIP.

See EMPERORS, ROMAN; LORD; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SAVIOR.

EMPERORS, ROMAN

Following the cessation of the monarchy with expulsion of the seventh and last Roman king, the Etruscan Tarquinius Superbus in 510/09 B.C., the Roman Republic came into being and flourished until it collapsed during the economic, political and military chaos of the late Republic (133-31 B.C.). Julius Caesar emerged as a military dictator, introducing the autocratic rule which was adopted by his imperial successors. His intentions were thwarted by his assassination by a conspiracy of Republican forces in 44 B.C. At the battle of Actium in 31 B.C., Octavian defeated Antony and took control of the political and military affairs of Rome.

The Roman Imperial Period can be subdivided into the period of the Principate (27 B.C. to A.D. 180), based on a civilian conception of the role of the emperor, followed (after a period of chaos) by the reorganization of the empire under Diocletian (A.D. 284-305) and the period of the Dominate (A.D. 284-476), based on a military model. The last Roman emperor was Romulus Augustulus, who was removed from power in A.D. 476, when the center of power was transferred to the Emperor of the East in Constantinople.

1. Imperial Titles
2. The Foundation of the Principate
3. Early Imperial Dynasties
4. The Functions of the Emperor
5. Emperor Worship
6. Christians and Roman Government

1. Imperial Titles.

The English word emperor is derived from the Latin word imperator, meaning "one in charge, one who gives orders," and was a generic title for Roman military commanders which eventually became a title of honor retaining strong military associations (the related term imperium refers to the right to give orders, or the official power of higher magistrates or the emperor). Julius Caesar used this designation for himself, as did his adopted son and successor Augustus, though he favored the term princeps (meaning "first citizen"). Augustus took the term imperator as a praenomen (Imperator Caesar), and so did his successors. In 27 B.C. the right of imperium maius ("greater imperium") was granted to Augustus for life. Augustus, whose actual name was C. Julius Caesar Octavianus, took over the cognomen ("surname") "Caesar" because he was the adopted son of C. Julius Caesar. Later emperors used the name Caesar as part of their imperial titles (e.g., Lk 3:1 refers to "Tiberius Caesar"), and the term was widely used as a way of referring to the reigning emperor (Mk 12:14 and par.; Jn 19:12-16; Acts 17:7; 25:8; Phil 4:22). Augustus (meaning "venerable") was an honorary title conferred on Octavian by the Senate (he is referred to as "Caesar Augustus" in Lk 2:1) and later was given to his imperial successors. The Greek translation of Augustus was Sebastos ("revered, worthy of honor"), and is used of the emperor in Acts 25:21, 25. The Latin term rex ("king") was never used of the Roman emperor in the West, though the Greek equivalent, basileus, was sometimes used in the eastern part of the empire (1 Pet 2:13, 17; Jn 19:15), though rarely until the second century.

2. The Foundation of the Principate.

Augustus created the imperial system in which he retained the latent powers of an autocrat while giving the appearance of a constitutional monarch. In 27 B.C. Augustus resigned his extraordinary powers and began the process of the theoretical restoration of the Republic, all the while retaining firm control of the state. The Senate, which at this time consisted of about 600 former magistrates, was functionally subordinate to Augustus and to his successors. His achievements are catalogued in the autobiographical inscription Res Gestae Divi Augusti ("Achievements of the Divine Augustus"; see Brunt and Moore). The basis of the power of the princeps was the assumption of tribunician power (tribunicia potestas) by Augustus in 23 B.C., which gave him the right to convene the Senate, the right of veto, the right to initiate legislation and inviolability (sacrosanctitas). This title, sacrosanctitas, had Republican associations and emphasized the non-military nature of his role. He also assumed other important titles such as pater patriae, "father of the country") and pontifex maximus ("High Priest"), with control over the state religion. This system became inoperative under the reclusive Tiberius (A.D. 14-37), while the incompetent Gaius (A.D. 37-41) became the first truly autocratic emperor installed with the backing of the Praetorian Guard (cf. Phil 1:13).

3. Early Imperial Dynasties.

The first century A.D. was dominated by two imperial dynasties, the Julio-Claudian emperors (27 B.C.-A.D. 68) and the Flavian emperors (A.D. 69-96). Two of the first three Julio-Claudian emperors, Augustus (27 B.C.-A.D. 14) and Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) were the adopted sons of their predecessors. Gaius (A.D. 37-41), affectionately nicknamed "Caligula," meaning "little boots," by soldiers when he was a toddler, Claudius (A.D. 41-54) and Nero (A.D. 54-68) were all acclaimed imperator by the Praetorian Guard, an action which the Senate was forced to ratify. The Flavian dynasty was founded by the popular general Vespasian (A.D. 69-79), who arranged to be succeeded by his two sons, Titus (A.D. 79-81) and Domitian (A.D.81-96). Between these two dynasties was a year of political and military upheaval during which three different emperors claimed imperial power in a single year (A.D. 69): Galba, Otho and Vitellius. The six Antonines followed, each adopted by his predecessor, with the exception of the last Antonine, Commodus, the natural son of Marcus Aurelius: Nerva (A.D. 96-98), Trajan (A.D. 98-117), Hadrian (A.D. 117-38), Antoninus Pius (A.D.138-61), Marcus Aurelius (A.D.161-80) and Commodus (A.D. 180-92).

4. The Functions of the Emperor.

In Rome, the princeps was expected to make public appearances at games, theaters and festivals, and (unlike Julius Caesar who used such occasions to read and sign documents) to give the appearance of enjoying such spectacles. During the early empire the primary task of the emperor was to dispense justice through reading and responding to letters and petitions, hearing cases presented orally (Roman citizens like Paul had the right to present their case before the emperor, cf. Acts 25:9-12) and receiving embassies from various cities of the empire (an embassy of Alexandrian Jews to Caligula in A.D. 39/40 is the subject of Philo's Legatio ad Gaium). The responses of the emperor were regarded as setting legal precedent.

In discharging this legal task, the emperor was surrounded by friends (amici) and advisors (concilium) who advised him as he made decisions. There were four types of constitutiones principium, or "imperial enactments": (1) edicta ("edicts"), announcements of the emperor made to the general public articulating orders or policies; (2) decreta ("decrees"), judicial decisions pronounced by the emperor in court; (3) mandata ("mandates"), directives from the emperor to officials in the imperial service (an excellent example of which is the correspondence between Pliny and Trajan); and (4) rescripta ("rescripts"), imperial correspondence consisting of written replies of the emperor either in a separate letter (epistulae principium) or in marginal notes on the original petition (subscriptiones).

5. Emperor Worship.

The imperial cult had religious as well as political dimensions (see Worship). Hellenistic ruler cults, beginning with Alexander the Great, honored living benefactors, primarily dynastic rulers of Hellenistic kingdoms, with isotheoi timai, "honors equal to the gods," in other words, temples, sacrifices, priests, festivals and games. Roman emperors were somewhat more reluctant to accept divine honors (particularly Augustus, Tiberius and Claudius) than Hellenistic rulers. In the eastern empire the living emperor occupied an ambiguous position between gods and mortals. Sacrifices were usually made "on behalf of" the emperor, rather than "to" him, and there is almost no evidence that people prayed to the emperor. Imperial cults were particularly popular in the Roman province of Asia, where a temple to Augusta and Roma was dedicated in 29 B.C.

While the imperial cult in the Greek East focused on the living ruler, in the Roman West the emphasis was on the worship of deified deceased emperors. The posthumous deification of Julius Caesar in 42 B.C., in a law accepted in the Senate (Plutarch Caesar 67.4), was a maneuver of his adopted son and successor Octavian to legitimate his rule with the title divi filius ("son of the god [Julius]"). Thus began the long tradition of the postmortem deification, or apotheosis, of deceased emperors, ritualized in the rite of consecratio. In violation of traditional Roman protocol, two emperors were thought to have applied the term deus ("god") to themselves, Caligula (Philo Leg. Gai. 353), and Domitian (Suetonius Domitian 13.2); neither was posthumously deified by the Senate.

6. Christians and Roman Government.

Early Christians had conflicting views of the empire and its rulers (see Civil Authority). Paul had a positive attitude to the Roman government and its functions (Rom 13:1-7). Paul's conception of the Eschatological Antagonist in 2 Thessalonians 2:4 (see Man of Lawlessness) may have been influenced by the abortive attempt of Gaius to have a statue of himself installed in the Jerusalem Temple (Josephus Ant. 18.8.2 §§261-62; J.W. 2.3.10 §§185-87; Tacitus Hist. 5.9; Philo Leg. Gai. 188, 208-28). Similarly, in 1 Peter 2:13-17 Christians are encouraged to be subject to the emperor and to honor him (here the term basileus, or "king," is used). On the other hand, an extremely negative and diabolical picture of the empire and the emperors is found in Revelation 13 and 17.

See also CAESAR'S HOUSEHOLD, IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD; CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY; CIVIL AUTHORITY; LEGAL SYSTEM, ROMAN; POLITICAL SYSTEMS; ROME AND ROMAN CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. A. Barrett, Caligula: The Corruption of Power (Manchester: B. T. Batsford, 1989); P. A. Brunt and J. M. Moore, Res Gestae Divi Augusti: The Achievements of the Divine Augustus (Oxford: University Press, 1967); D. Fishwick, The Imperial Cult in the Latin West (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1987); M. T. Griffin, Nero: The End of a Dynasty (New Haven and London: Yale University, 1984); K. Hopkins, "Divine Emperors or the Symbolic Unity of the Roman Empire," in Conquerors and Slaves (SSRH 1; Cambridge: University Press, 1978) 197-242; B. W. Jones, The Emperor Domitian (New York: Routledge, 1992); F. Millar, The Emperor in the Roman World (31 BC-AD 337) (Ithaca: Cornell University, 1977); A. Momigliano, Claudius: The Emperor and His Achievement (rev. ed.; Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981); S. R. F. Price, Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor (Cambridge: University Press, 1984); K. Scott, The Imperial Cult under the Flavians (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1936); L. R. Taylor, The Divinity of the Roman Emperor (Middletown, CT: American Philological Association, 1931); S. Weinstock, Divus Julius (Oxford: Clarendon, 1971).

D. E. Aune

ENEMY, ENMITY, HATRED

The terminology of "enemy" (echthros), "enmity" (echthra), "hate" (miseō) and its various related images must be seen within the context of the dualism of Pauline thought. Humanity is divided by Paul into "those who are being saved" and "those who are perishing" (1 Cor 1:18; 2 Cor 2:15); those of the kingdom* of light* and those of the domain of darkness (Col 1:12-13; cf. Gal 1:4); those who belong to Christ and those who belong to this world* (Eph 2:1-10; 1 Cor 2:6-7). The backdrop for this division is the supernatural conflict between the rule of Christ and "the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph 6:12; see Principalities and Powers). It is to the latter categories that the term enemy properly applies.

1. The World and the "Unspiritual Person"
2. The Work of Christ
3. The Church
4. Personal Enemies

1. The World and the "Unspiritual Person."

Paul's warnings against compromise with the world are stringent (e.g., 1 Cor 6:9-10; 10:1-22). This is not because the world itself is evil but because the world is inhabited by the "unspiritual person" who stands in opposition to God* and his Law.* "The thoughts of the unspiritual person [sarx] are hostile [echthra] toward God" (Rom 8:7; cf. theostygēs, "hater of God," Rom 1:30; see Flesh). They are "alienated from God and are enemies [echthrous] because of their evil deeds" (Col 1:21). Their "fruits" include "hatred, strife and jealousy" (Gal 5:20), and their life is characterized by "being hated [stygētoi] and hating [misountes] one another" (Tit 3:3). In this they "follow the ruler of the domain of the air, the spirit who is now at work in those who are disobedient" (Eph 2:2; cf. 2 Cor 4:4; exousia can refer to a sphere of authority, i.e., "kingdom," "domain" or to supernatural, demonic "powers").

2. The Work of Christ.

2.1. Past. One aspect of Christ's redemptive work was that of reconciling enemies. It was "while we were enemies [echthroi]" that "we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son" (Rom 5:10). Paul nowhere designates God as an "enemy" of humanity. It is humanity who is hostile toward God. Nonetheless, God's response to the sinful acts of humanity is "wrath"* (orgē) and the unspiritual person becomes an "object of wrath" (Eph 2:3). So the work of Christ was one of "making peace" between God, whose wrath is directed against sin (Col 3:6), and hostile humanity (Col 1:20-21). The initiator of this peace was God, not humanity. It was God, motivated by "his great love for us" (Eph 2:4), who through Christ "reconciled all things to himself" (Col 1:20; Rom 5:11; 2 Cor 5:18-19; see Peace, Reconciliation).

Christ's work of reconciliation also included putting an end to the age-old hostility between Jew and Gentile* (Eph 2:14-16). This was accomplished by nullifying the Mosaic Law, which historically set Jews apart from their pagan neighbors ("the dividing wall of hostility [echthra]," Eph 2:14), thus "making peace" (Eph 2:15) between Jew and Gentile.

Powers hostile to both God and humanity were dealt with as well. Paul views the ordinances of the Law (and perhaps all moral decrees) as a power "against us" (kath' hēmōn/hypenantion hēmin) because we have failed to discharge its obligations (Col 2:13-14). The Law's power resides in its ability to condemn and kill those who transgress its stipulations (2 Cor 3:7-11). Moreover, all powers and authorities (whether cosmic, angelic or demonic) were made a spectacle of as captive enemy by means of the cross (Col 2:15; see Triumph).

2.2. Present and Future. Christ's ongoing work is pictured as one of "subjecting enemies." "It is necessary," Paul states, "that Christ reign until all his enemies [tous echthrous] have been put under his feet" (1 Cor 15:25; cf. Eph 1:10). The enemies of Christ are broadly defined by Paul as "every rule, authority and power" (1 Cor 15:24). The only power specified is death, which is called "the final enemy" (eschatos echthros, 1 Cor 15:26), but a study of similar phraseology elsewhere indicates that he is thinking primarily of spiritual powers (cf. Eph 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Col 1:16). The term that Paul uses to describe this subjecting process is one that means "to render powerless" (katargeitai, 1 Cor 15:26). In the case of Satan,* though, the language is stronger; for Paul promises the Roman Christians that "the God of peace will soon crush Satan under your feet" (Rom 16:20).

3. The Church.

3.1. Enemies Without. A number of references to enmity in Paul's writings have to do with enemies outside and inside the church.* Enemies without are those who oppose the gospel* (1 Thess 2:2). The Jews (or their leaders), in particular, are singled out by Paul as "enemies" of the church (1 Thess 2:14-15), whose rejection of the gospel incurs God's enmity (Rom 11:28)—though not without hope of Israel's salvation (Rom 11:25-28).

The destiny of the unrepentant enemy of the church is "eternal destruction" and "exclusion from the presence of the Lord" (2 Thess 1:8-9; cf. Phil 1:28). The persistent efforts of especially the Jewish synagogal leadership to prevent the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles result in "God's wrath coming on them" (1 Thess 2:16).

For the church in the midst of persecution, Paul does not offer any immediate hope of deliverance. What is promised is "relief" (2 Thess 1:7) and vindication on Christ's return (2 Thess 1:10, "when he comes to be glorified with his saints"), as well as retribution to their enemies (2 Thess 1:6).

The preeminent external enemy is Satan, who "masquerades as an angel of light" (2 Cor 11:14), often working within the unsuspecting church through servants that Paul labels as "false apostles" and "deceitful workers" (2 Cor 11:13). The church must, therefore, arm itself against "the schemes of the devil" and his "heavenly troops" (Eph 6:10-18). It must also prepare itself for Satan's final trump card, the "man of lawlessness,"* who will be empowered to perform "signs and wonders"* (2 Thess 2:1-12).

3.2. Enemies Within. The enemy can also be found within the ranks of the church. Paul hopes that he will not be labeled an "enemy" (echthros) by telling the Galatians the truth (Gal 4:16). He commands the Thessalonian church not to associate with those who do not work to support themselves. Yet they are not to be regarded as "an enemy" but are still to be looked upon as a "brother"/"sister" (2 Thess 3:6-15).

The identity of the "many who live as enemies (echthrous) of the cross of Christ" in Philippians 3:18 has been intensely debated. The range of suggestions include proselytizing Jews, Jewish-Christian gnostics,* perfectionist Judaizers* (see 4.1 below), and Christian libertines. The contrast Paul makes between his example and how the "many" live, points to Christians. Beyond this, much depends on the relationship of Philippians 3:17-21 to what precedes.

4. Personal Enemies.

4.1. Paul's Enemies. Paul faced serious personal challenges throughout his ministry. The Jews stirred up trouble for him in virtually every city where he preached (Acts 13—17). Their antagonism extended at times to pursuing him from city to city (e.g., Acts 14:19; 17:13). Paul faced Gentile hostility as well (e.g., 2 Cor 11:26), but in his letters stern words of condemnation are reserved for the Jews, who "heap up their sins to the limit" (1 Thess 2:16; see Opponents).

Conservative Jewish Christians from the Jerusalem* church (= "Judaizers") tried to undercut Paul's work by raising doubts about both his gospel and his apostleship (see Apostle). Paul views them as not only personal enemies but enemies of the church because they preach circumcision* and Law-obedience for the Gentiles, in opposition to the gospel of justification* by faith alone. Some have deemed Paul's response as unduly harsh: He wishes that they would "emasculate themselves" (Gal 5:12) and he warns the church to "watch out for those dogs" (Phil 3:2). Their destiny is "eternal condemnation" (Gal 1:9).

Equally harsh are Paul's comments regarding opponents who encroached on his missionary field in Corinth and claimed credit for missionary work that was not their own (2 Cor 10:15-16). Although he does not refer to them as "enemies" per se, Paul does call them "false apostles" and "deceitful workers," who "masquerade as servants of righteousness" when in fact they are "servants of Satan" (2 Cor 11:13-15). The severity of Paul's remarks is initially surprising since he says elsewhere that even if some preach Christ "out of envy and rivalry" or "with the intent to stir up trouble," this matters little to him; for as long as Christ is preached, it is an occasion for rejoicing (Phil 1:15-18). The status of "opponent" or "enemy," however, stems not from personal rivalry but from an attempt to undermine the work of the gospel in a particular community. These so-called apostles are "false" in Paul's opinion because their intent is not to preach the gospel but "to lead astray from a sincere and pure devotion to Christ" (11:3; cf. Gal 1:8). Financial gain (2 Cor 2:17; 11:20) and the desire for dominance ("enslave," "slap you in the face," 2 Cor 11:20) is their motivation.

4.2. God's Enemies. It is important when approaching references to God's wrath and hatred in the NT not to read these in light of corresponding human emotions. God, unlike sinful humanity, is not given to vindictiveness, fitful rages or the urge to retaliate. Divine anger in the NT is a controlled response of a holy being to the sinful actions of humanity; divine hatred is intense aversion toward any sort of wickedness. "Because of such things," Paul says, "God's wrath comes upon those who are disobedient" (Eph 5:6). The essential incompatibility of holiness and sinfulness is evident from the fact that not even God's chosen people can escape from becoming "objects of God's wrath" when they sin (Rom 9:22).

References to God's wrath far outnumber references to his hatred in the NT. Indeed, there is only one reference to divine hatred in the Pauline letters—albeit a widely debated one. In Romans 9:13 Paul cites from Malachi 1:2-3: "Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated [emisēsa]." One of the major difficulties in interpreting this text is that "hate" here is not a divine response to human sin. For it was before the twins were born, or had done anything good or bad, that God "hated Esau" but "loved Jacob." How then is one to understand this divine polarity?

It is clear from the context that what is in view is not Jacob and Esau per se but the nations they represent. Paul is concerned in the broader context with "those of my own race, the people of Israel" (Rom 9:4-5). This is confirmed by Genesis 25:23, cited by Paul in Romans 9:12, which speaks of "two nations" being in the womb and by Malachi 1:2-6, where Israel* (= Jacob) and Edom (= Esau) are specifically addressed. Moreover, what is in question in Romans 9:1-29 is not the destinies of two nations but their functions in salvation history. " 'The older will serve the younger,' just as it is written, 'Jacob I loved but Esau I hated.' " "Hate" and "love"* are therefore not to be equated with "condemnation" and "salvation."* Furthermore, God's love/hate relationship with Israel and Edom is not based on their differing characters or their respective deeds but on God's sovereign will: "not by works but by him who calls" (Rom 9:12).

How then are God's "love" and "hate" to be construed within these contextual restraints? Did God determine before the birth of either nation to love the one and hate the other? Some think that the word "hate" is an instance of the Semitic use of a direct opposite to express a lesser degree of comparison: "God loved Jacob more than Esau." But this does not take into account the overarching theme in Romans 9 of God's sovereign choosing and rejecting. Others have taken "hate" at face value to refer to God's intense animosity toward and ultimate condemnation of Esau/Edom. This, however, overlooks the intimate link in Romans 9:12-13 between "the older serving the younger" and God's hatred of Esau ("as it is written, Esau I hated"). The solution surely lies in seeing that Paul's overall argument in Romans 9:1-29 has to do with corporate "election"* and "rejection" based on promise as opposed to natural descent. Here the very act of choosing the one (= "love") by default results in rejecting the other (= "hate"). That "hate" can be used of the rejection implicit in the action of choosing one party over another is well illustrated by Matthew 4:24, where to choose between two masters is to "love" the one and "hate" the other, and by Luke 14:26, where to choose to follow Christ is effectively "to hate father and mother."

4.3. The Believer's Enemies. Christians are not encouraged by Paul to hate their enemies but are rather commanded to do good to them (Rom 12:21). This includes satisfying their thirst and hunger (Rom 12:20) and in "blessing" them (1 Cor 4:12; Rom 12:14). Believers are forbidden to respond in kind to their enemies (1 Thess 5:15; Rom 12:17). Vengeance is the sole prerogative of God (Rom 12:19). The regularity of this teaching in Paul indicates that it was a standard part of early Christian catechism.

Some think that there is a fundamental contradiction between Paul's "love" ethic and the lex talionis ("an eye for an eye") principle found in the OT. Yet Paul himself cites Leviticus 19:18 ("Do not seek revenge, . . . but love your neighbor as yourself") and Proverbs 25:21-22 ("If your enemies are hungry, give them food to eat; if they are thirsty, give them water to drink") in support of his love dictum (e.g., Rom 12:20; 13:10; Gal 5:14). The point of the OT eye-for-an-eye principle was not retribution but to guarantee legal fairness. Nor is this principle absent from the NT. But it is the prerogative of the secular courts, as ordained by God, and not the church, to ensure due process (Rom 13:1-7; cf. 1 Cor 5:12-13; see Civil Authority).

For Paul, love of one's enemy is grounded in the mercy* of God. Believers are to love their enemies because at one time "we all were enemies [of God]." Yet out of his great love, God sent his Son to die for those who were still his enemies (Rom 5:10). Are believers, as God's children, to do any less?

See also Opponents of Paul; Peace, Reconciliation; Principalities and Powers; Satan, Devil; Triumph; Wrath, Destruction.

Bibliography. J. B. Bedenbaugh, "Paul's Use of 'Wrath Of God,' " Lutheran Quarterly 6 (1954) 154-57; G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers (Oxford: Clarendon, 1956); A. Carr, "The Meaning of 'Hatred' in the NT," The Expositor, 6th Series, 12 (1905) 153-60; J. Piper, 'Love Your Enemies' (SNTSMS 38; Cambridge: University Press, 1979); J. Scharbert, "Enemy," in Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology, ed. J. B. Bauer (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 1.220-24; J. B. Scott, "The Place of Enmity in Scriptural Teaching," in The Law and the Prophets, ed. J. H. Skilton (Nutley, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1974) 128-40; F. L. R. Stachowiak, "Hatred," in Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology, ed. J. B. Bauer (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 1:351-55; K. Stendahl, "Hate, Non-Retaliation and Love," HTR 55 (1962) 343-55.

L. L. Belleville

ENMITY. See Enemy, Enmity, Hatred.

ENTHRONEMENT. See Exaltation and Enthronement; Lord; Triumph.

EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE

The Letter to the Ephesians is unique among the letters attributed to Paul. Its language of worship* and prayer,* the depth and scope of its theology, and the many practical admonitions have led many Christians (including John Calvin) to cherish it as their favorite NT book. The letter's emphasis on the nature of the church and the present dynamic relationship of the exalted Christ* to the church makes it an important and practical book for the church today.

1. Style and Composition
2. Authorship
3. Relationship to Colossians
4. The History-of-Religions Question
5. Destination
6. Life Setting and Purpose
7. Themes in the Letter

1. Style and Composition.

The author's method of composition is characterized by an elevated style that reveals his affection for the subject he is discussing. He also identifies with the beliefs of the early church through his use of traditional material: hymns,* creeds,* liturgical material (see Liturgical Elements) and household codes.* Yet the writer is not content merely to reaffirm what the church is already confessing; he is a fresh thinker and advances his readers' understanding of Christ, the church* and eschatology.*

The first half of Ephesians is well known for its lofty and exalted style. Here the author makes use of the language of worship, prayer and doxology (see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology). The letter begins with an elegantly composed eulogy (berakah) praising God* for the election* and redemption* of his people (Eph 1:3-14). Consisting of one long sentence, the section abounds with participles, prepositional phrases and relative clauses and is punctuated with the refrain-like phrase "to the praise of his glory." In true poetic form, the passage also uses a variety of synonyms to repeat the key thoughts, such as the knowledge,* power* and will of God. Because of these poetic traits, some scholars have regarded this section as an early-Christian hymn (see Lincoln, 10-19, for discussion). The majority of scholars, however, prefer to describe it as the author's own "unified ad hoc composition, a hymnic passage in artistic, rhythmical prose" (Schlier as cited in Schnackenburg, 46). The style is distinctively Jewish and has much in common with the hymns found among the Qumran* scrolls. The switch from the first person plural ("we") to the second person plural ("you") in Ephesians 1:13 has occasioned much discussion, with some contending for an intentional contrast between Jewish Christians ("we") and Gentile* Christians ("you") (Martin, Bruce, Robinson, Barth). Since the discussion of the relationship between Jews and Gentiles does not surface as a major theme until Ephesians 2:11, it is better to take "we" as a reference to all believers and "you" as referring to the readers in particular (Schnackenburg, Lincoln, Percy).

The letter also contains two prayers (Eph 1:15-23; 3:14-21). The first actually consists of an introductory thanksgiving, an intercessory prayer report and a digression extolling the power of God which raised Jesus from the dead. The poetic language used in this praise of God's resurrection* power (Eph 1:20-23) has led some interpreters to regard it as a hymnic quotation, but it more likely reflects the author's own poetic style with possible dependence on early creedal formulations (Lincoln, Schnackenburg). The second prayer properly begins in Ephesians 3:1 but is interrupted by an excursus on Paul's apostleship* to the Gentiles (Eph 3:2-13), a topic extremely relevant to the predominantly Gentile readership. The prayer report consists of one long sentence but is structured around two requests (introduced by hina) and a summarizing request. The prayer reiterates and develops some of the themes of the first prayer (e.g., power, spirit). The exalted language of the prayer leads immediately into a doxology (Eph 3:20-21) praising God for his power effective in the lives of believers.

The first half of the letter is far from a dispassionate theological treatise. It exudes emotion in the praise and worship of the almighty God who loves and responds to his people. The author writes with intense feeling and wants to elicit the same response—praise, worship and prayer—in the lives of his readers.

The letter's most explicit citation of an early Christian hymn appears in Ephesians 5:14 where it is introduced by a technical formula normally used for the introduction to an OT citation (dio legei; cf. Eph 4:8 where it is used to introduce an OT quotation). The original setting of this hymn is thought by most scholars to be the occasion of baptism* (e.g., Lincoln, Martin), but this is rather speculative. Another possible hymnic fragment appears in Ephesians 2:14-18, although this identification is disputed by P. Stuhlmacher who regards it as a Christian midrash on Isaiah 57:19. The formal characteristics of the passage—the unique words, the use of participles, the intensely christological content, the parallelism of the lines, the "we" style that interrupts the "you" style—lead most scholars to conclude that it is indeed hymnic (so Lincoln, Martin, Barth). Therefore, the author's admonition to "speak to one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" (Eph 5:19) appears to be modeled by his own use of hymnic material in this letter. At the beginning of his call to unity in the second half of the letter, the author roots his appeal partly in a confession of the early church: "there is one body and one Spirit . . . one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and father of all" (Eph 4:4-6). It appears that he wants to remind these believers of their common confession as the beginning step to increasing the unity of the churches.

In his composition of the letter, the author also makes use of a literary form commonly identified by scholars as a "household code"* (Eph 5:21—6:9). This form was his vehicle for addressing the relationships within the household: husband-wife, parent-child and master-slave. This passage and Colossians 3:18—4:1 appear to be the first adaptations of this form from Hellenistic Judaism to describe the relationships in a Christian household. The use of the form here varies considerably from Colossians,* particularly in the expanded discussion of the husband-wife relationship modeled on the relationship between Christ and the church.

Although the OT quotations in Ephesians are not numerous (there are only four explicit quotations), there are many allusions evidenced by the author's dependence on OT phraseology, terminology and concepts (see Old Testament Citations). In one quotation of the OT (Eph 4:8), the author uses Psalm 68:18 as an introduction to his discussion of the risen Christ endowing the church with gifted people. The actual citation appears to follow a rabbinic tradition preserved in a later targum that the victorious king "gave" gifts to people rather than "received" them (so the LXX and MT; see Bruce, 340-43). It also shows the writer's knowledge of rabbinic methods of exegesis as he then (in Eph 4:9-10) explains the meaning of the text in terms of a midrash pesher technique. A section of moral exhortation such as Ephesians 5:15-18 reveals the author's indebtedness to the OT wisdom* tradition. References to such items as temple,* redemption,* God's choosing, hope,* mercy,* promise, wisdom, the Father, sons of men, helmet of salvation and many more show how deeply steeped the author was in the OT and how the language of the OT influenced his own composition.

The application of rhetorical criticism to NT documents is still in its infancy stage (see Rhetoric; Rhetorical Criticism), so very little has yet been written on Ephesians from this perspective. A noteworthy beginning is A. T. Lincoln's commentary on Ephesians, which attempts to observe the rhetorical purpose of the flow of thought throughout the letter. He concludes that the writer combines the epideictic and the deliberative rhetorical genres (Lincoln, xli-xlii).

With its variety of literary forms, traditions and sources, Ephesians is far from the straightforward prose of a typical letter of antiquity (see Letters). What, then, is the best way to describe Ephesians? Is it even accurate to call it a "letter"?

E. Käsemann (RGG) described it as a "theological tract" merely dressed up like a letter. H. Schlier called it a "wisdom discourse" focusing on the role of Christ as personified wisdom (Schlier, 21; so also Bruce, 246, but who also sees it as an actual letter). J. Gnilka refers to it as a "liturgical homily" clothed in the form of a letter (Gnilka, 33). Similarly, and most recently, A. T. Lincoln characterizes it as "the written equivalent of a sermon or homily" (Lincoln, xxxix). Nevertheless, he still regards it as an actual letter adapted from the Pauline letter form.

Because Ephesians retains many conventions of the Pauline letter form, it is probably best explained as an actual letter. The language, literary and rhetorical forms, and the traditions employed primarily grant us insight into the concerns of the author in communicating to his readers. The precise nature of the content and composition need to be explained by the background and purpose of the author as well as his perceived understanding of the needs of the readers.

2. Authorship.

Scholarly opinion regarding the Pauline authorship of Ephesians is divided, with perhaps a majority of scholars today holding that the letter was not written by Paul. This situation is rather ironic in that a good number of scholars have esteemed Ephesians as "the crown" of Paul's thought (e.g., C. H. Dodd, J. A. Robinson). On the other hand, W. G. Kümmel can assert, "The theology of Eph makes the Pauline composition of the letter completely impossible" (Kümmel, 360).

The Pauline authorship of Ephesians was not challenged until the late eighteenth century and early nineteenth century. It was the outspoken denial of authenticity by F. C. Baur and his followers, however, which had the greatest influence on the subsequent course of scholarship. Prior to that time Ephesians was universally recognized as Pauline. As early as Ignatius (early second century) the letter was quoted as being from the hand of the apostle.

Until recently, British and American evangelical scholars unanimously affirmed Pauline authorship. Now, some evangelicals are convinced that the evidence of the letter is inconsistent with Pauline authorship. A. T. Lincoln, for instance, concludes, "Everything points instead to a later follower of Paul who used Colossians as the basis for his own reinterpretation of the Pauline gospel" (Lincoln, lxvii). Similarly, R. P. Martin contends that the author was "a well-known disciple and companion of Paul who published this letter under the apostle's aegis either during the apostle's final imprisonment or (more probably) after his death" (Martin, 4). In an earlier writing, Martin identified this person as Luke. The arguments against Pauline authorship have been threefold:

(1) Language and Style. The number of words in Ephesians which are not found in the other Pauline letters is proportionally insignificant. This fact is actually a point in favor of Pauline authorship. The criticism lies more in the observation that many of these unique terms are used in the apostolic fathers, thus giving the letter more of a post-apostolic atmosphere. Since most scholars, however, acknowledge that early church fathers such as Clement knew and used Ephesians, the possibility that the vocabulary of Ephesians influenced these writers needs to be considered more seriously.

The style of writing exhibited in Ephesians has been the greater stumbling block to authenticity. It is often characterized as "pleonastic," that is, a fullness of style seen in the repeated use of prepositional phrases, abundant participles, numerous relative clauses, genitive upon genitive and lengthy sentences. Schnackenburg says that "there is scarcely anything comparable in Paul" (Schnackenburg, 26). What is not often observed, however, is that this unique style predominates in the first half of the letter. It is here where the author intentionally employs a lofty style of eulogy, praise, prayer and doxology. He also appears to be relying on the use of traditional material. This half of the letter does not consist of the straightforward prose, argument or admonition that usually characterizes the Pauline letters. Nevertheless, passages such as Romans 8:38-39 and 11:33-36 demonstrate that Paul was capable of writing in an elevated style similar to what we find in the Qumran hymns. One should not underestimate Paul's resourcefulness in expressing himself.

(2) Theology. Many scholars have contended that there are significant theological divergences in Ephesians compared to the eight recognized letters. Discussion has normally focused on the cosmic christology,* the realized eschatology and the apparently advanced ecclesiology of the letter. Those denying Pauline authorship contend that there is not merely a development in Paul's thought, but an entirely changed perspective revealing a later stage of theological reflection (see Schnackenburg, 26-28; Lincoln, lxii-lxv).

There is no doubt about the development in Ephesians of the cosmic aspect of christology and the heightened emphasis on a realized eschatology. But this emphasis may have been prompted by the writer's concern to build up the readers in light of their ongoing struggle with the principalities and powers (Arnold, 124-29, 145-58, 171; see Principalities and Powers). The teaching of the letter on both of these topics does not represent a break with the apostle's teaching, but the logical extension of his thought. A. T. Lincoln himself has done much to demonstrate that Ephesians is not totally devoid of a futurist eschatology as it was once often charged (see Lincoln, lxxxix-xc; pace A. Lindemann, H. Conzelmann et al.).

Many aspects of the ecclesiology are thought to be discontinuous with Paul and to reflect a later temporal setting: the use of "church" (ekklēsia) in a non-local sense, Christ now seen as "head"* of the church, mention of the apostles* and prophets* as "holy" and as the foundation of the church, etc. Some think that the author of the letter is looking back to the founding years of the church, emphasizing Paul as the guarantor of apostolic tradition, and building on his eschatology (see Schnackenburg, 28).

Each of these objections, however, can be met with a plausible explanation grounded in the lifetime of the apostle. (1) If the letter circulated among a network of churches, as is likely, it would be natural for the writer to use "church" in a more universal sense. (2) Christ as "head" of the church is a clear development over Paul's earlier presentation of the metaphor of the body of Christ, but is not impossible that Paul's thinking developed in this direction. The needs of the Colossian church initially prompted this development, and Paul may have reflected on it further for the benefit of the readers of Ephesians. (3) The description of the apostles and prophets as "holy" (hagios, Eph 3:5; see Holiness, Sanctification) does not necessarily point to a time when they were receiving increasing veneration. "Saints" (hagioi) was the typical Pauline designation for believers. It was used of anyone or anything set apart for a sacred purpose (see Abbott, 82). (4) Although the apostles and the prophets do indeed form the foundation of the church through their foundational witness to the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, they are not presented as dead, gone and off the scene. The resurrected Christ continues to give them to the church (Eph 4:11-12). They are foundational in a dynamic continuing fashion.

In general, more consideration needs to be given to uncovering the plausible life setting of the letter in Asia Minor in the early 60s before recourse is made to the more extreme assumption of a different temporal and life setting toward the end of the first century. Furthermore, it is not irrational to assume that Paul himself could bring further development to his own ideas, especially as his circumstances and the circumstances of his readers would prompt him. Carson, Moo and Morris have recently observed, "What appears to some as impossible for one mind is for others quite a possibility for such a wide-ranging and inventive mind as Paul's" (Carson, Moo and Morris, 307).

(3) The Use of Colossians. Scholars on both sides of the issue have recognized the close similarity in vocabulary, phraseology and thought between Ephesians and Colossians. Many scholars are now contending that there is a formal relationship between the two letters in terms of a one-way literary borrowing. The precise nature of the borrowing and the alleged alteration of the thought of Colossians is considered by some to point decisively away from Pauline authorship. The nature of this relationship will be explored in more detail below.

Since each of these objections to the authenticity of Ephesians can be met with a reasonable explanation, the scales are tipped in favor of the letter being precisely what it claims to be—a letter of Paul—when two other factors are taken into consideration.

(1) Tradition. W. G. Kümmel observes (and must concede) that "Eph is extraordinarily well attested in the early church" (Kümmel, 357). It appears to have been used as a Pauline letter by many of the Apostolic Fathers, including Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Hermas and Polycarp. It was listed as a Pauline letter in the earliest canons, viz. Marcion's (c. A.D. 140) and the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 180; see Canon). Many of the Gnostic* writers quoted it as Paul's own words. A new line of evidence that has not entered the debate thus far is that Ephesians is quoted as Pauline in some of the Nag Hammadi documents (as early as the second century). For instance, Ephesians 6:12 is quoted in the Hypostasis of the Archons as from "the great apostle" (II.86.20-25). The same verse is cited in the Exegesis on the Soul (II.6.131) as the words of Paul.

(2) Autobiographical Information. In addition to the address of the letter which claims Paul as the author (Eph 1:1), Ephesians contains a substantial amount of material presented as a first-person address on the part of the apostle to the readers. The most significant is the reflection on his stewardship of the mystery* (Eph 3:2-6) and the nature of his apostolic ministry* (Eph 3:7-13). The first-person material also extends to the prayers, for example, "I Paul the servant of Christ Jesus [pray] for you Gentiles" (Eph 3:1; see also Eph 1:16; 3:14), his call to unity ("I, the prisoner of the Lord" [Eph 4:1]). Paul also asks specifically that the readers would pray for him (Eph 6:19-20) and then concludes the letter with comments on the role of Tychicus when he comes to them with words that in places exactly parallel the text of Colossians (Eph 6:21-22).

Those who argue in favor of pseudonymity have variously explained the autobiographical material. Most recently, D. Meade has claimed that the literary device of pseudonymity was not only acceptable to early Christians but widely used. He contends that the author of Ephesians, an admirer of Paul, wrote in Paul's name as an attempt to secure the heritage of Paul in the Asia Minor churches after the death of the great apostle. According to Meade, by writing in Paul's name the author was able "to actualize the apostolic doctrine and lifestyle" (Meade, 139-61). Pseudonymity, he argues, "is primarily an assertion of authoritative tradition, not of literary origins" (161). A. T. Lincoln accepts Meade's thesis and attempts to provide additional exegetical support for it. According to Lincoln, "Instead of simply saying that he is passing on Pauline traditions, he [the author of Ephesians] makes it more personal, direct, and forceful by adopting the device of Paul himself appealing to the churches" (Lincoln, lxxxvii).

This thesis makes too strong a dichotomy between authoritative tradition and literary origins without corroborating it with convincing support. Meade's approach has also been criticized for presenting a facile and homogenous picture of ancient Jewish literature that blurs the distinctions of literary genre among the varied documents. With regard to Ephesians, however, the thesis is difficult to sustain in a passage like Ephesians 6:19-20 where Paul asks his readers to pray that he would be emboldened to proclaim the gospel in his prison situation. It is not enough to say that the writer is soliciting the readers' prayers for the progress of the apostolic gospel that is summed up by the image of Paul. The autobiographical information is much more naturally explained by the assumption of authenticity.

3. Relationship to Colossians.

Most scholars who see Ephesians as pseudonymous contend that it depends heavily on Colossians as its primary literary source (e.g., Lincoln, Schnackenburg, Lindemann, Mitton et al.). Some argue that the dependence is based on the author's memory of Colossians (so Schnackenburg, 32), but others contend that the author must have possessed a copy of Colossians which he redacted according to his own interests (so Lincoln, lv; Mitton, 230).

The most extensive point of contact is the commendation of Tychicus (Col 4:7-8; Eph 6:21-22) where there is verbatim correspondence between twenty-nine consecutive words (although kai syndoulos is omitted in Ephesians). Beyond this there are only three additional places where seven words are exactly paralleled and two places where there are five words. This appears to be very slim evidence for the postulation of literary dependence. It seems especially odd that the longest passage reproduced in Ephesians is not from the theological argumentation or paraenesis of Colossians, but about the sending of Tychicus. This passage is even more difficult under the assumption that the Ephesian author is reproducing the text of Colossians from memory.

Proponents of literary dependence put more stock in the similar overall structure and sequence of the letters with much of the same thematic material (e.g., Lincoln, xlvii) and the apparent dependence on certain key terms and concepts expressed in Colossians. Nevertheless, it is argued, the author of Ephesians had his own distinct interests: quite apart from being slavishly dependent, he rearranged and gave fresh expression to his source material to suit his own theological purposes.

One example of this reworking is the digression in Ephesians 3:1-13 on Paul's apostolic ministry, which is said to depend on Colossians 1:23-29. The Ephesian passage sequences many of the same themes as the Colossian text and uses a number of the same (or similar) terms and expressions. Lincoln therefore concludes that the passage "derives from the author's distinctive reworking of the Colossians passage" (Lincoln, 170). In response, it must be said that the conclusion of literary dependence is not demanded by this passage (although it could fit the hypothesis). If the author were using Colossians as source material it is surprising that he did not reproduce more of his source in his writing; he was going far beyond the work of a redactor in his complete refashioning of the material and creative elaboration on it. This passage more likely reflects the same author giving a fresh exposition of a similar theme (with different emphases) a short time later for a different audience.

Many scholars, however, find the theology of Colossians at variance with that of Ephesians. Thus, some suggest that even assuming the authenticity of Colossians (which itself is disputed), it is highly doubtful that Paul could have written Ephesians. This conclusion is based on the way the author of Ephesians alters the theology of Colossians on certain points.

For example, in Colossians 1:27 and 2:2 the content of the "mystery" appears to be Christ, whereas in Ephesians it is the fact that the Gentiles have been made fellow members, with the Jews, of the body of Christ (Eph 3:6; see Body of Christ). But one must ask if this is truly a discrepancy or whether it could possibly be a matter of emphasis in the use of a term which expresses a multi-faceted concept.

In a monograph on the Pauline concept of "mystery," M. Bockmuehl has argued that this use of the term reflects an emphasis on one aspect of the more comprehensive use of "mystery." In other words, it is more a matter of continuity and emphasis rather than discontinuity and a variant theology (Bockmuehl, 202; cf. C. Caragounis, 143: "they are not different mysteria, but wider or narrower aspects of one and the same mysterion—God's mysterion in Christ"). On the relationship of the two letters as a whole, F. F. Bruce comments that the change of perspective from Christ (Colossians) to the church (Ephesians) may go far to account for the different nuances of terms held in common by the two letters (Bruce, 231).

Some significant problems with the postulation of literary dependence still remain: (1) The influential study by H. J. Holtzmann in 1872 concluded that the evidence of some of the parallels pointed more in the direction of the dependence of Colossians on Ephesians. Others, especially Mitton and now Lincoln, have argued that all the parallels point to a one-way dependence of Ephesians on Colossians. A. van Roon, however, has once again brought this hypothesis into question. In his comparison of the two letters he found no indication of literary priority on the part of either letter, but what evidence there was pointed toward the priority of Ephesians (van Roon, 426). Although van Roon's postulation of a third document upon which both were dependent is highly questionable, he does demonstrate the difficulty of proving any literary dependence on the available evidence. (2) If the author of Ephesians did use Colossians as his literary source, it is difficult to explain why he neglected the hymn and omits any use of the polemic against the "heretics" in Colossians 2. (3) The theory does not give sufficient credit to Paul's ability and versatility as a writer and theologian. It is not unreasonable to think of Paul re-expressing, developing and modifying his own thoughts for a different readership facing a different set of circumstances. It seems that one must first prove that Paul was incapable of this versatility.

The traditional view, recently given fresh expression by Carson, Moo and Morris, still seems to have the most evidence in its favor: "The best explanation to many seems to be that the same man wrote Colossians and Ephesians a little later, with many of the same thoughts running through his head and with a more general application of the ideas he had so recently expressed" (308). The precise nature, however, of the relationship between Ephesians and Colossians continues to stand in need of careful research from a literary, linguistic and theological perspective.

4. The History-of-Religions Question.

In the mid-nineteenth century, F. C. Baur argued that Ephesians must belong to the second century because of its dependence on Gnostic* thought. Since then the affirmation of Gnostic influence on Ephesians has been widely promulgated by such writers as R. Bultmann, H. Schlier, E. Käsemann, P. Pokorný, H. Conzelmann and A. Lindemann. They have found Gnosticism evident in such terminology and concepts as the head-body imagery, mystery, plērōma ("fullness"*), aiōn ("age"), archōn ("ruler"), the once-now schema, and the so-called spatial eschatology. More conservative scholars, on the other hand, argued rather for the influence of Gnosticism on the readers of the letter than on the author himself.

In recent years a dramatic shift away from the history-of-religions school's assumption of a pre-Christian Gnostic redeemer myth has taken place in NT scholarship in general, and in the study of Ephesians in particular. In light of new evidence about the origins of Gnosticism, it is now accurate to conclude that the reputed existence of any relatively coherent Gnostic system which would have been capable of influencing either the author of Ephesians or the communities to which the letter was addressed rests on a very weak foundation (Arnold, 12). Scholars are now using phrases such as "proto-Gnosticism" and "incipient Gnosticism" to describe the phenomena in the first-century A.D.

The most productive approach is to examine the local religious traditions which were known to be active and influential at the time the letter was written. For western Asia Minor this would include the phenomena commonly referred to as magic,* the Anatolian religions (such as the cults of Artemis and Cybele), astrological practices and astral religion, and the various other local cults (see Arnold, 5-40; see Religions). A deeper understanding of these traditions provides a firmer basis for interpreting the readers and assessing how Paul may have contextualized his theology to address their needs.

5. Destination.

In 1855 Charles Ellicott wrote, "That the Epistle was addressed to the Christians of the important city of Ephesus seems scarcely open to serious doubt" (Ellicott, 1). Precisely the opposite sentiment is shared by the majority of scholars today.

The letter is traditionally understood to have been written to believers in Ephesus because the city is mentioned in the superscript "To the Ephesians," and the prescript "to the saints who are in Ephesus" (Eph 1:1). The words "in Ephesus," however, are not present in certain manuscripts generally regarded as the most reliable, viz. Sinaiticus (ℵ), Vaticanus (B) and a second-century papyrus (P^{46})—all published after Ellicott wrote his commentary (see Textual Criticism). Further doubt is cast on the authenticity of the words "in Ephesus" because of the impersonal tone of the letter and the general nature of the contents. "Ephesians" does not look like an occasional letter written to one church which Paul had come to know well through his three years of ministry in Ephesus. Thus most interpreters see Ephesians as some form of a circular letter.

Various attempts have been made to explain the sense of Ephesians 1:1 without the addition of a geographical location. Some take the text as it stands in ℵ and B as original and translate it, "to the saints and to those who are faithful in Christ Jesus" (e.g., Schnackenburg, 41). But this leaves us with a very awkward participial expression (tois ousin) which always has a place name following it in prescripts of other Pauline letters (see Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1; Phil 1:1; Col 1:2).

Others resort to some form of conjectural emendation. For example, E. Best supposes that the original text may have been tois hagiois kai pistois en Christō Iēsou ("to the saints and faithful ones in Christ Jesus"). He argues that the address given on the outside of the papyrus roll originally read "to the saints" and was later modified to "to the saints who are in Ephesus (tois ousin en Ephesō)." According to Best this occurred when the Pauline collection of letters was made (late first century) and the collectors realized that this letter did not conform to the rest because it had no geographical location. The phrase was then later carried into the body of the letter (Best, 3251). Against this view, one can say that it does not seem likely that such a process could have happened over the time required without at least a trace in some remaining manuscript evidence.

It is likely that there was some indication of place in the prescript of Ephesians 1:1. The participle ousin expects the subsequent naming of a place. Bruce, persuaded that "in Ephesus" was not original and that the letter has the appearance of a circular letter, conjectures that a space was left after ousin for Tychicus to insert the appropriate geographical name for each of the places to which he delivered a copy of the letter (Bruce, 240; so also Martin, 3-5). Bruce admits that such a practice is difficult to attest for the first century, but nevertheless still finds this argument the most convincing. It is problematic to this view that Ephesus was preserved as the only geographical place name when the letter was presumably written to many other cities along the west coast of Asia Minor (although Tertullian reports that Marcion thought the letter was written to Laodicea—probably Marcion's own conjecture based on Col 4:16).

A. van Roon, followed by A. T. Lincoln, suggested that there were originally two place names—Hierapolis and Laodicea. These writers claim that this has the advantage of explaining the awkward kai (commonly translated "also") which connects "saints" with "faithful" (van Roon, 80-85; Lincoln, 3-4). Apart from the difficulty of no textual evidence to support these locations, this view cannot explain why a scribe—often concerned with smoothing the text—would have let the kai stand in the text (cf. Best, 3250).

We are left with no satisfactory explanation of the original text of Ephesians 1:1 if we assume the reliability of P^{46}, ℵ and B on this reading. This is one point where it may be best to part company with these manuscripts and affirm the accuracy of the widely attested alternative tradition, that is, "in Ephesus" was the original reading. This view is finding an increasing number of supporters (e.g., Conzelmann, Gnilka, Lindemann).

The following arguments support this conclusion: (1) There is still strong manuscript support for the inclusion. The entire Western and Byzantine traditions stand behind it as well as important Alexandrian witnesses, including Alexandrinus. (2) An Ephesian destination was the unanimous tradition of the early church (for references, see Ellicott, 1) and is the only reading known in all the extant versions. (3) There is a reasonable explanation to account for the omission of "in Ephesus." At a very early date, churches in a different location (perhaps Egypt) universalized the address in the prescript by omitting the prescript in copies that were made for their own catechetical (or liturgical) purposes (Gnilka, 7). The contents of Ephesians, as also the book of Romans,* were especially well suited to a broad readership. For the same reason, several witnesses omit "in Rome" (Rom 1:7) in the prescript to the book of Romans. On this passage Metzger notes that the words were eliminated "as a deliberate excision, made in order to show that the letter is of general, not local, application" (Metzger, Textual Commentary, 505). (4) When Paul says in Ephesians 1:15 that he had "heard" of their faith and love, it does not necessarily mean that he does not know them. It could just as easily refer to the progress they had made in the five or so years he had been absent from them. There is probably also a reference here to the many converts that had joined the church since he had been with them. (5) One cannot place too much emphasis on the fact that no greetings are attached since Paul sends no extended greetings to other churches he knew well (see 1 and 2 Corinthians,* Galatians* and Philippians).

Was the letter therefore written exclusively to the one church at Ephesus? Although many interpreters assume that there was one big church present in Ephesus when the letter was written, it is far more likely that there was a network of house churches scattered throughout the city and perhaps also in the nearby villages (e.g., Metropolis, Hypaipa, Diashieron, Neikaia, etc.). Many of these could have been started after Paul left Ephesus. One must not forget that population estimates for first-century Ephesus begin at one-quarter million. Furthermore, Paul may have envisioned and even encouraged the reading of the letter to a broader circle of churches throughout the west coast of Asia Minor (e.g., Pergamum, Laodicea, Colossae and Hierapolis).

The letter was probably a circular letter in the sense that it was intended primarily to circulate among the house churches of Ephesus, its environs and perhaps even more broadly in western Asia Minor (e.g., to the Lycus valley).

6. Life Setting and Purpose.

Of all the Pauline letters, Ephesians is the least situational. This does not mean that the letter fails to address real needs and problems faced by its readers; Ephesians simply does not have the same sense of urgency and response to crisis as do the apostle's other letters. Consequently, a vast array of opinions have been expressed regarding why the letter was written.

Of course, one's view on the authenticity of the letter has a significant impact on how this question is answered. Among those denying the Pauline authorship, a few have seen it as something other than a letter—such as a theological tract, a wisdom discourse or a liturgical homily—as was noted above. N. Dahl has stressed a baptismal setting for the document. He thinks the pseudonymous letter was addressed to some recently founded congregations to remind the young Gentile Christians of the implications of their faith and baptism and to exhort them to live up to their calling (Dahl, 38). R. P. Martin has described Ephesians as "an exalted prose-poem on the theme 'Christ-in-his-church' " (Martin, 5-6). He explains that the document was written in response to the needs of the predominantly Gentile readership to admonish them to appreciate the Jewish background of their faith and thus also their fellow Jewish Christians. He also sees a type of "gnosticizing" teaching that has led the readers into a libertine lifestyle and a fear of astrological fate.

R. Schnackenburg, however, describes Ephesians as a genuine letter. More specifically, he sees it as "a theologically based, pastorally-oriented" pseudonymous letter written to a circle of churches in Asia Minor around A.D. 90 addressing two pragmatic concerns: the internal unity of the congregations and the need for a distinctively Christian lifestyle in a pagan environment (Schnackenburg, 22-35). A. T. Lincoln stresses the temporal setting of the letter in the period after the death of the apostle Paul (Lincoln, lxxxv-lxxxvii). He concurs with D. Meade that many of the problems seen in Ephesians stem from the loss of Paul as a unifying source of authority.* He sees the readers as consequently lacking a sense of cohesion and communal identity once the coordinating activity of the great apostle was gone.

Moving in an entirely different direction, E. J. Goodspeed, later supported by J. Knox and C. L. Mitton, argued that Ephesians was a general letter written toward the end of the first century as an introduction to the collected letters of Paul (see Canon). Mitton concedes that Ephesians may not properly have served as an "introduction" to the letters, but that it sprang from a relationship to the corpus and was used to present the message of the recently assembled Pauline letters comprehensively to a new generation (Mitton, 29). He believes that the writer was well aware of the context of the readers and thus wrote against the current Gnostic threat and the danger of the largely Gentile readership disowning their Jewish heritage (Mitton, 30-31).

There has also been a diversity of opinions offered by those affirming Pauline authorship. C. Ellicott said the letter was not prompted by any special circumstances, but was written to set forth the origin and development of the church for believers in Ephesus.* He contended that Paul wrote the letter in a general way because he intended it for circulation among all the churches coterminous to or dependent on that city (Ellicott, xv-xvi). H. A. W. Meyer described the letter simply as a written discourse by Paul to the predominantly Gentile church in Ephesus to advance their understanding of the glory of their redemption and encourage them to proper conduct in keeping with their faith. He also thought that Paul had in the back of his mind as he wrote the dangers of the possible approach of Gnosticism (Meyer, 307-8).

J. A. Robinson envisioned Paul taking advantage of his own tranquil circumstances (under house arrest in Rome, but with time to think) to write a positive exposition of the heart of his theology—"the doctrine of the unity of mankind in Christ and of the purpose of God for the world through the church" (Robinson, 10-11). Robinson thought the letter was written as an encyclical which would go first to Ephesus and then to the many churches in Asia Minor. E. F. Scott termed the letter "a private meditation," but composed as a letter for the church at Laodicea. Although a positive exposition, the letter addressed a problem of Jew-Gentile disunity in the church and the splintering effect of the heresies that were beginning to surface (Scott, 123-24). These heresies were also promoting a moral laxity and libertinism.

More recently, M. Barth has suggested that Ephesians was written by Paul to Christians in Ephesus, but only those of Gentile origin, "people whom he did not know personally and who had been converted and baptized after his final departure from that city" (Barth, 1.3-4). F. F. Bruce regarded it as a circular letter (with a blank space in Eph 1:1) written as a meditation on the divine "wisdom in a mystery" (so also Schlier, 21-22). Through this Paul also encouraged the Gentile Christians to appreciate the dignity of their calling (Bruce, 245-46).

Among all the viewpoints expressed, a few points of commonality emerge: Gentile believers are strongly in view; there is no specific crisis or problem the letter addresses; the letter gives a positive presentation of the Pauline gospel; and there is a need for the readers to receive teaching and admonishment on unity and a distinctively Christian lifestyle.

Based on the foregoing discussion and conclusions, the life setting and purpose of the letter could be described in the following way: In the period of time since Paul's ministry in Ephesus, the churches of the area had engaged in extensive evangelism among the Gentiles. These new believers lacked a personal acquaintance with Paul but respected his role as apostle. Being converts from a Hellenistic religious environment—mystery religions, magic, astrology—these people needed a positive grounding in the Pauline gospel from the apostle himself. Their fear of evil spirits and cosmic powers was also a great concern, especially the question of where Christ stands in relation to these forces. Because of their pagan past, they also needed help and admonishment in cultivating a lifestyle consistent with their salvation in Christ, a lifestyle free from drunkenness, sexual immorality, stealing and bitterness. Although there were many Jewish Christians (and former God-fearers) in the churches of the region, the flood of new Gentile converts created some significant tensions. Their lack of appreciation for the Jewish heritage of their faith prompted some serious Jew-Gentile tensions in the churches.

Ephesians is therefore a genuine letter, without a specific crisis, but addressed in a pastoral way to a multiplicity of needs shared by the readership. It was written by the apostle Paul to a network of churches in Ephesus, but also intended for a broader readership among the churches of that region.

It has traditionally been regarded as written during Paul's first Roman imprisonment (see also Robinson, Barth, Bruce et al.), but a strong case has also been made for his prior imprisonment in Caesarea (Meyer). It is least likely to have been written during a possible Ephesian imprisonment. A date of A.D. 60-62 is probable.

7. Themes in the Letter.

The main themes of Ephesians could be summarized in the following way (not ordered according to importance):

7.1. The Greatness of God. The letter begins with an exclamation of praise to God.* He is eulogized as the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ and is magnified for all that he has done for his people in and through Christ (Eph 1:3). Most notably, he has chosen for himself a people and has provided them with redemption from bondage and forgiveness of sin. With a rich variety of terminology, Paul stresses that God is fulfilling a grand plan—his "will"—that encompasses the entire sweep of human history. One of the most awe-inspiring characteristics about God is his great love* which prompts him to act on behalf of his people (Eph 1:4; 2:4). His divine power is also brought into bold relief by his act of raising Jesus from the dead (Eph 1:19-20).

7.2. The Exalted Christ. Ephesians is often described as presenting a "cosmic christology." This stems from Paul's stress on the exaltation* of Christ over all his enemies, especially the principalities and powers (Eph 1:21-22) and Christ's role in bringing all of history to completion (Eph 1:10). Nevertheless, the letter speaks of the suffering* of Christ; it was through his blood that redemption* was secured (Eph 1:7) and by the cross that reconciliation* was achieved (Eph 2:16). This letter builds on Paul's previous thought about the relationship of Christ to his church by depicting him as the "head"* of his body (Eph 1:23; 4:15-16) and a bridegroom that nourishes and cares for his bride (Eph 5:29).

7.3. Salvation in its Present Dimension. Ephesians is also often characterized as having a strongly "realized" eschatology.* Although the future aspect of eschatology is not totally absent (see Eph 1:10, 14; 4:30; 5:6, 27), there is a significant stress on salvation as present. This is clearly expressed in Ephesians 2:5, 8 by the perfect tense of sōzō with the emphasis of the perfect on the present state of affairs: "you have been saved and are saved." It is also accented by the declaration that believers have been raised and exalted with Christ (Eph 2:6). This represents a distinctive Pauline development on ideas already present in Romans 6:1-13 (cf. Col 3:1).

Although justification* terminology does not appear in Ephesians (perhaps because there is no Judaizing controversy in the background; see Judaizers), the Pauline emphasis on faith alone apart from works for salvation is clearly expressed (Eph 2:8-9). Christ's work of reconciliation is stressed (Eph 2:16) with the implication that believers now have access to God, their Father (Eph 2:18; 3:12).

7.4. The Status of Believers. Through use of the expression "in Christ"*—which occurs thirty-four times in Ephesians—Paul describes the corporate solidarity of believers with their resurrected and exalted Lord. The syn- ("with") compounds also help express this notion, especially in Ephesians 2:5: he made us alive with Christ, he raised us with him, and he seated us with him. As people who are united with Christ, believers have redemption, forgiveness* of sins,* a heavenly* existence, access to the Father, knowledge of the truth* and the gift of the Holy Spirit (Eph 1:13-14; see Holy Spirit). They possess a new existence created by God and characterized by righteousness* (Eph 4:24).

7.5. The Unity of Jew and Gentile. One of the central messages of the letter is that Christ has effected a reconciliation of Jew (see Israel) and Gentile* by incorporating them into one body through his work on the cross (Eph 2:16; 3:6). Christ has removed all of the obstacles that separated the two groups and resulted in their hostility to one another (Eph 2:12-18). What matters now is the unity of the body of Christ, the church, composed of Jews and Gentiles who have equal access to the Father.

7.6. The Struggle with the Powers. Believers within the young Christian communities in and around Ephesus lived in a culture where magical practices flourished (see Magic). These practices were reinforced by the renowned Artemis cult. Artemis was worshiped as a goddess of the underworld with cosmic supremacy; she bore the six magical Ephesia Grammata on her cultic image. The people of the region had an extraordinary fear of the hostile spiritual "powers." Through magical practices and cultic rituals, people sought relief and deliverance from the dreaded realm of the powers. This fear was not immediately allayed, however, when people became Christians. Demonstrating his sincere pastoral concern, Paul addressed their fear of this realm. More than any other Pauline letter, Ephesians stresses the hostile role of the principalities and powers (see Principalities and Powers) against the church (see Arnold, 167-68).

In contrast to the power of the hostile supernatural realm, Paul emphasizes the superiority of the power* of God and the supremacy of Christ (Eph 1:19-23; 4:8-10; see Triumph). He demonstrates that believers have access to this power by virtue of their union with Christ, thereby enabling them to resist the vicious attacks of the hostile powers (Eph 6:10-20). He regards all these spiritual powers as evil and under the leadership of a being he calls "the devil" (see Satan).

7.7. The Ethical Obligation of Believers. The latter half of the letter is replete with specific ethical guidance for these believers (see Ethics). Paul wants them to rid their lives of vices that characterized their pre-Christian conduct and appropriate the virtues of Christ. He admonishes them to desist from such practices as lying, stealing, sexual immorality, dirty talk, excessive anger, bitterness, greed and many more (see Virtues and Vices). He instructs them on appropriate relationships within the Christian household.*

He affirms that behavioral change is not only possible, it is part of their divine calling and God's purpose for them (Eph 1:4; 2:10; 4:1). They have access to God's power which will enable them to resist temptation (Eph 6:10-18). They are enabled by the risen Christ himself who has endowed the church with gifted people who depend on him for leadership and provision (Eph 4:11-16). Finally, they have an example in Christ himself who modeled self-sacrificial love and service (Eph 5:2; see Servant, Service).

7.8. Apostle to the Gentiles. In a lengthy digression Paul speaks about his apostolic ministry* (Eph 3:1-13). He stresses that he has been given the special responsibility of administering God's grace* (his saving favor) to the Gentiles (Eph 3:2, 7, 8). God revealed to Paul, as he did to all the apostles, his formerly secret plan to extend his favor to the Gentiles through the work of Jesus, the Messiah. On this basis, Paul claims special insight into "the mystery," the saving plan of God disclosed in Christ. He does not want his readers to be discouraged by his recent imprisonment or see it as the result of some crime; he wants them to know that it was for his service to Christ and his ministry to them as Gentiles (cf. Acts 21:17-36; Rom 15:14-32).

7.9. The Church. Ephesians has a strong ecclesiological focus. Paul's teaching in this letter conceptualizes the many churches as a collective whole. In fact, the term ekklēsia is never used of one local church,* but in a universal sense (Eph 1:22; 3:10, 21; 5:23-25, 27, 29, 32). This may be due in part to the fact that a network of churches was addressed (if Ephesians was a circular letter), but more likely Paul is reflecting on the church as a universal, unified organism.

Some have argued that the ecclesiology of Ephesians reflects early catholicism (e.g., Käsemann 1971; see Early Catholicism), but this is to misconstrue the teaching of the letter. The church is still viewed as an organism (thus, the head/body imagery and the teaching on the Spirit) and not as an institution. There is no interchurch organization and no established priesthood to mediate the means of grace (see Bruce, 238-39). All members are involved in the work of the ministry (Eph 4:12, 16).

In this letter Paul depicts the church as a building, the "household of God" (Eph 2:19-22), a growing body in connection to its head which gives leadership and provision (Eph 1:23; 4:16; 5:23), and a bride in relationship to her loving and caring bridegroom (Eph 5:25-32). Each of these images shows continuity with but also advancement on Paul's prior teaching on the church.

See also BODY OF CHRIST; CANON; CHRISTOLOGY; CHURCH; COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; EARLY CATHOLICISM; EPHESUS; EXALTATION AND ENTHRONEMENT; HEAVEN, HEAVENLIES, PARADISE; MAGIC; MYSTERY; POWER; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: T. K. Abbott, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles to the Ephesians and to the Colossians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1897); M. Barth, Ephesians (AB 34; 2 vols.; New York: Doubleday, 1974); E. Best, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, in preparation); F. F. Bruce, The Epistles to the Colossians, to Philemon, and to the Ephesians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); G. B. Caird, Paul's Letters from Prison (NCIB; Oxford: University Press, 1976); H. Conzelmann, "Der Brief an die Epheser," in Die Briefe an die Galater, Epheser, Philipper, Kolosser, Thessalonicher und Philemon, ed. J. Becker et al. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1976) 86-124; C. H. Dodd, "Ephesians," The Abingdon Bible Commentary, ed. F. C. Eiselen et al. (New York: Abingdon, 1928) 1224-25; C. J. Ellicott, A Critical and Grammatical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians (2d ed.; London: Parker & Son, 1859); J. Gnilka, Der Epheserbrief (HTKNT X/2; Freiburg: Herder, 1971); H. W. Hoehner, Ephesians (Grand Rapids: Baker, in preparation); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); A. Lindemann, Der Epheserbrief (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1985); R. P. Martin, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon (IntC; Louisville: John Knox, 1992); H. A. W. Meyer, Critical and Exegetical Hand-Book to the Epistle to the Ephesians (4th ed.; New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1884); C. L. Mitton, Ephesians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973); C. Newman, Ephesians (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, in preparation); P. Pokorný, Der Epheserbrief und die Gnosis (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1965); J. A. Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians (2d ed.; London: Macmillan, 1907); H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser (Dusseldorf: Patmos, 1957); R. Schnackenburg, The Epistle to the Ephesians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1991); E. F. Scott, The Epistles of Paul to the Colossians, to Philemon and to the Ephesians (MNTC; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1930); Studies: C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989); F. C. Baur, Paulus der Apostel Jesu Christi (Stuttgart: Becker & Müller, 1845); E. Best, "Recipients and Title of the Letter to the Ephesians: Why and When the Designation 'Ephesians'?" ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 3247-79; M. N. A. Bockmuehl, Revelation and Mystery in Ancient Judaism and Pauline Christianity (WUNT 2/36; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955) 2.151-53; C. C. Caragounis, The Ephesian Mysterion (CB 8; Lund: Gleerup, 1977); D. A. Carson, D. Moo and L. Morris, An Introduction to the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); N. A. Dahl, "Gentiles, Christians, and Israelites in the Epistle to the Ephesians," HTR 79 (1986) 31-39; E. J. Goodspeed, The Meaning of Ephesians (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1933); H. J. Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe auf Grund einer Analyse ihres Verwandtschaftsverhältnisses (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1872); E. Käsemann, "Epheserbrief," RGG 2.517-20; idem, "The Theological Problem Presented by the Motif of the Body of Christ," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 102-21; J. Knox, Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1959); W. G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament (rev. ed.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1975); D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon (WUNT 39; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1986; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); H. Merkel, "Der Epheserbrief in der neueren exegetischen Diskussion," ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 3156-3246; C. L. Mitton, The Epistle to the Ephesians (Oxford: Clarendon, 1951); E. Percy, Die Probleme der Kolosser- und Epheserbriefe (Lund: Gleerup, 1946, repr. 1964); A. Van Roon, The Authenticity of Ephesians .(NovTSup 39; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974); P. Stuhlmacher, " 'He is our Peace' (Eph. 2:14). On the Exegesis and Significance of Ephesians

2:14-18," in Reconciliation, Law, & Righteousness: Essays in Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 182-200. C. E. Arnold

EPHESUS

The city of Ephesus was situated on the west coast of Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey) at the mouth of the Cayster River. This thriving harbor city ranked with Rome, Alexandria and Syrian Antioch as one of the greatest cities of the Roman Empire. The apostle Paul spent nearly three years of his ministry in this center of Asian life. As many as six of his letters (see 6.) have been reputed to have a connection with Ephesus.

1. Pre-Roman Times
2. The Roman City
3. Artemis Ephesia and Other Deities
4. Judaism in Ephesus
5. The Lukan Account of Paul's Ephesian Ministry
6. The Ephesian Ministry As Seen from Paul's Letters

1. Pre-Roman Times.

According to mythology the city of Ephesus was founded by the Amazons, a race of female warriors. Although little is known about the early history of Ephesus, it was probably inhabited by a combination of Carians, Leleges and indigenous peoples. The Greek city was founded by Ionian colonists led by Androclus, son of the Athenian king Codrus c. 1100 B.C. Half a millennium later (c. 550 B.C.) Croesus, king of the province of Lydia, captured Ephesus. Croesus endeared himself to the people by contributing to the construction of the great temple of Artemis. Ephesus and all of Anatolia soon came under Persian rule which lasted until the combined Greek armies defeated the Persians c. 480 B.C. Ephesus joined the Greek alliance (called the Delian League), but the city revolted in 412 B.C. and sided with Sparta in the Peloponnesian War.

In 334 B.C. Alexander the Great took control of the city, as well as the rest of Asia Minor, on his eastward imperialistic march. Alexander's successor, Lysimachus, replanned Ephesus (c. 294 B.C.) and relocated the population from near the Artemis temple to a site next to the harbor. Here the city remained throughout the Roman and Byzantine periods. Ephesus then came under the control of the successive reigns of the Seleucids, the Ptolemies and finally the kingdom of Pergamum (c. 190 B.C.).

In 133 B.C. Attalus III, king of Pergamum, bequeathed the city to Rome. The city remained under Roman rule except for a brief interlude in which Mithridates VI, king of Pontus, took control of most of Asia Minor in a revolt against Rome. The people welcomed Mithridates as a deliverer because of harsh Roman exactions. He was eventually defeated by the Roman general Pompey in the "Third Mithridatic War" (c. 69 B.C.).

2. The Roman City.

Beginning in the reign of Caesar Augustus and lasting for 200 years, Ephesus experienced a more stable political history which enabled the city to prosper and thrive. Population estimates for the city during this time begin at around 250,000 people.

2.1. The Leading City of Asia. Ephesus may accurately be called the leading city of the richest region of the Roman Empire (Elliger, 101). Politically, the city functioned as the Roman provincial capital of Asia Minor (from 133 B.C.; see Political Systems). Economically, Strabo (14.1.24) called Ephesus "the greatest commercial center in Asia this side of the Taurus river." Similarly, Aelius Aristides (Orat. 23.24) spoke of Ephesus as the most prosperous commercial center of the time, controlling the financial affairs of western Asia Minor. A recent study of Roman milestone markers demonstrates that mileages to other cities in Asia Minor were measured from Ephesus (French, 698-729). Referred to in the inscriptions as "the metropolis of Asia," Ephesus served as the administrative and commercial hub of Asia Minor.

2.2. Institutions and Buildings. Since 1895, archeologists from the Austrian Archeological Institute in Vienna have worked at excavating various parts of the city. The work still continues. Many of the reconstructed edifices which one sees today were erected in the second century and later. Listed below are a few of the important buildings that were present during Paul's ministry.

2.2.1. Theater. One of the most impressive structures in Ephesus was the theater which had a seating capacity of 24,000 people. Situated on the side of a hill, the theater looked upon the beautiful colonnaded street that led directly to the harbor. The theater was the scene of the tumultuous mob assembly provoked by the guild of silver shrine makers for the Artemis cult (Acts 19:30-41).

2.2.2. Prytaneion. Directly across from the State Agora was the prytaneion, or town hall (built in the first century B.C. or first century A.D., so Akurgal, 167). Much of the city's political business was conducted in this center. The building was also used for various ceremonies, banquets and receptions for official guests of the city. Discoveries stemming from the excavation of the building in 1955 have demonstrated that the prytaneion served a strong religious function during Paul's time. Although the goddess Hestia Boulaia was the principal deity worshiped in the prytaneion, there is inscriptional evidence pointing to the worship of Artemis, Demeter, Kore and other deities in this important building (Oster, 1688-91).

2.2.3. Commercial Market (Agora). The commercial market was located in the center of the city near the theater. It measured 110 meters square and was surrounded on all four sides with stoas. Most of the everyday buying and selling of produce and goods took place here. Another market, called the State Agora, was situated at the southeast part of the city across from the prytaneion. Many municipal activities, including the meetings of the law courts, took place in the basilica of this agora.

2.2.4. Baths and Gymnasiums. During the Roman period the city had a number of baths and gymnasiums. The largest complex was located near the harbor. The structure contained two palaestrae (athletic training areas), a bath and a gymnasium, complete with lecture halls and meeting rooms. Another gymnasium was located next to the theater and still another, "the East Gymnasium," at the southeastern corner of the city.

2.2.5. Stadium. The stadium was situated in the north part of the city. It measured 229 meters long and 30 meters wide. Various kinds of ceremonies, including athletic contests, chariot races and gladiatorial fights, took place there. Inscriptional evidence suggests that the stadium was erected during Nero's reign (A.D. 54-68).

2.2.6. Medical School. Literary sources point to the existence of a medical academy in Ephesus which trained doctors. Two of the most important doctors in antiquity, Rufus and Soranus, came from Ephesus. Both worked during Trajan's reign (Elliger, 85-86).

2.3. Festivals and Athletic Contests. Two important festivals were held each year in the city, honoring the patroness deity, Artemis Ephesia. The first, called the "Artemisia," was held in the early spring. In addition to sacrifices to the goddess, there were many musical, theatrical and athletic events. A second festival took place at the end of spring in celebration of the nativity of Artemis (Oster, 1709-10). One of the highlights of this festival was a religious procession through the city.

Another festival of regional importance was the quadrennial "Ephesia." This festival was especially noted for its athletic games. Ephesus also hosted the "Common Games of Asia" (koinon Asias) which had all the usual athletic events.

3. Artemis Ephesia and Other Deities.

"The most prominent and significant cult in Ephesus during the first three centuries of the Roman Empire was incontestably Artemis Ephesia (= Diana Ephesia)" (Oster, 1699). The people of Ephesus regarded the city's relationship to her in terms of a divinely directed covenant relationship.

Her temple, called the Artemision, was originally constructed in the sixth century B.C. This Ionic temple (c. 550 B.C.) was the largest building in the Greek world and was made entirely of marble. It was destroyed c. 350 B.C. The temple was rebuilt with the same dimensions during the first half of the third century B.C. According to Pliny (Nat. Hist. 36.96), the temple measured 220 x 425 feet (55.10 m. x 115 m.) and contained 127 columns, with some rising to a height of 60 feet (17.65 m.). The grandeur and beauty of the temple led Antipater (Anth. Pal. 9.58) to classify it as one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. The Greek historian Pausanias (Descr. 4.31.8) declared that the size of the temple surpassed all known buildings. The ancient site of the Artemision and its meager remains were discovered by J. T. Wood in 1869. In recent years Austrian archeologists have undertaken extensive excavations which have provided much information about the archaic temple and its predecessor.

Inscriptions give evidence that mystery rites were celebrated in the Artemis cult. The celebration of her birth marked one of the major occasions for the performance of the mysteries. We know little about the meaning attached to the mystery rites performed by her devotees. The cult of the Ephesian Artemis also had a close connection with the practice of magic* in the city and region (Arnold, 22-24). The Atticist lexicographer Pausanias (as cited by Eustathius on Homer Od. 19.247) reports that the six magical "Ephesian Letters" (Ephesia Grammata) were inscribed on the cultic image of the Ephesian Artemis. This is part of the reason why Ephesus gained a reputation as being something of a center for magical practices in antiquity.

In spite of the city's special relationship with Artemis, numerous other gods and goddesses were also worshiped there. Egyptian colonists and traders introduced the worship of Sarapis and Isis to Ephesus. Beautiful temples were erected for these deities. Material evidence also points to the veneration of the following deities in Ephesus: Agathe Tyche, Aphrodite, Apollo, Asclepius, Athena, the Cabiri, Concord, Cybele (the Mother Goddess), Demeter, Dionysus, Enedra, Hecate, Hephaestus, Heracles, Hestia Boulaia, Kore, Nemesis, Pan, Pion (a mountain god), Pluto, Poseidon, Theos Hypsistos, Tyche Soteira, Zeus and several river deities (see Religions).

4. Judaism in Ephesus.

Luke records that Paul spent three months preaching in a Jewish synagogue in Ephesus (Acts 19:8). Although archeologists have not yet discovered the synagogue, there is substantial literary evidence and some material evidence of the Jewish presence. According to Josephus there had been a Jewish community in Ephesus since Seleucid times, and this community possessed citizenship (Josephus Ant. 13.3.2 §125). These Jews were exempted from military service and were permitted to send money to the Jerusalem Temple. Most importantly, they were granted the freedom to practice their religion according to their traditions (Josephus Ant. 14.10.11-12 §§223-27; 14.10.25 §§262-64). A few Jewish inscriptions have been found, including one which mentions the officials of the local synagogue.

5. The Lukan Account of Paul's Ephesian Ministry. Luke gives us only a very abbreviated record of Paul's work in Ephesus. He narrates a few episodes that serve to further his own theological agenda, but that also provide us with a fascinating picture of the beginning of the church in this city.

5.1. The Beginnings. Paul first visited Ephesus only briefly on his way to Jerusalem from Corinth (Acts 18:18-22). He had attempted to preach in Ephesus earlier, but discerned clearly that the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) was directing otherwise (Acts 16:6). Paul's preaching was well received by the Jews in the synagogue, and he promised to return. In order to continue the work he had started, he left Priscilla and Aquila, a Jewish-Christian couple.

5.2. Apollos and the Disciples of John. In Paul's absence an Alexandrian Jew familiar with the Jesus tradition came and began speaking in the synagogue (Acts 18:24-28). This man, Apollos,* said to have been fervent in spirit, had not received Christian baptism,* only a baptism associated with John the Baptist's teaching. Priscilla and Aquila took him into their home and provided him with a full account of early Christian tradition. Apollos apparently received their instruction favorably and continued his powerful preaching in Corinth.

Shortly after Paul arrived he encountered twelve men also inadequately instructed in Christian teaching (Acts 19:1-7) and who had not received the Holy Spirit. Priscilla and Aquila apparently had no contact with these men. The men claimed only to be familiar with the teaching of John the Baptist and had received his baptism. Paul baptized them, presumably after instructing them more fully about Jesus. After Paul laid his hands on them, they received the Holy Spirit, prophesied and spoke in tongues.*

5.3. In the Synagogue and the School of Tyrannus. As Paul promised, he returned to the synagogue and taught for three months. The originally warm reception he received turned to hostility toward his preaching, and he was forced to leave the synagogue (Acts 19:8-9).

By this time, a few of the Jews (and probably Gentile God-fearers) had received Christ. Paul took these new believers with him and spoke daily in a lecture hall in the city (scholē Tyrannou, Acts 19:9). The western text adds the historical note that Paul taught between 11:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. With regard to the hall itself, no archeological or inscriptional evidence has yet been discovered to illustrate this point of the narrative (though one pillar in situ has the name Tyrannus, a common name). Many of the people in Ephesus and its environs now had the opportunity to hear the gospel. In fact, Luke says, "all the inhabitants of Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks" (Acts 19:10). Paul made use of this hall for two years.

5.4. Miracles, Jewish Exorcists and Magic. Luke mentions that God accomplished many supernatural works through Paul, although he does not provide us with any specific accounts. People were healed (see Healing) of various illnesses, and demons* were exorcised (Acts 19:11-12).

At the same time, Luke records that there was a group of itinerant Jewish exorcists performing their exorcistic rites in the city (Acts 19:13). Probably because they saw Paul's success, they had added the name of Jesus to their exorcistic formulas. We know nothing of their relationship to the local synagogue, viz., whether they were attached to the synagogue or came from outside and acted independently. Luke tells us of one incident involving the sons of a Jewish chief priest (archiereus), Sceva, who unsuccessfully applied their method to a demonized man and experienced tragic results. They were physically assaulted and hurt by the man with whom they were working (Acts 19:14-16).

Word of this incident spread quickly through the city. Believers who had failed to renounce their occult practices when they were converted now confessed (Acts 19:17-20). They brought their magical books together and burned them. Luke was clearly impressed by the amount and monetary value of their books, estimating the value as equivalent to 50,000 days' wages.

5.5. Hostility from the Artemis Adherents. The rest of Luke's account is taken up with one major incident of hostility against Paul and, indeed, nascent Christianity. An outspoken leader of a local trade union named Demetrius fomented a dramatic mob scene at the theater to protest Paul's preaching (Acts 19:23-41). As a maker of cultic paraphernalia for the local Artemis cult, he foresaw a significant loss of income to his business. He rallied his fellow union workers and soon people from all over the city gathered at the theater to affirm their support of their patroness deity, chanting, "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians." The frenzy in the theater lasted for two hours and was finally quelled by the intervention of the city clerk (grammateus, also attested in local inscriptions). Luke reports that Paul left Ephesus shortly after this incident.

5.6. Churches Begin. One could wish that Luke had disclosed more about the founding of local churches in Asia Minor, but this was beyond the scope of his work. Presumably during this time in which "all Asia heard the word of the Lord" (Acts 19:10), churches were established not only in Ephesus but also by Paul's colleagues in Colossae (Col 1:7) and throughout Asia Minor (e.g., the churches mentioned in Rev 2—3). Given the size of Ephesus and the early tendency toward house churches, it is likely that more than one church was planted in Ephesus. Perhaps a network of house churches came into existence throughout the city and in the local villages (e.g., Hypaipa, Diashieron, Neikaia and Koloe).

6. The Ephesian Ministry As Seen from Paul's Letters. We are able to gain some insight into Paul's Ephesian ministry through scattered references in his correspondence.

6.1. Ephesian Imprisonment? While there is no explicit mention of Paul being imprisoned in Ephesus either by Luke or in the Pauline epistles, the majority of recent scholars postulate that Paul was imprisoned one or more times while he was in Ephesus. Shortly after leaving Ephesus, Paul tells the Corinthians that he had been in prison* frequently (2 Cor 11:23; cf. 1 Clem 5:6). Many have also thought imprisonment was one of the things entailed in his fighting with "wild beasts" at Ephesus (1 Cor 15:32) and part of the hardship he experienced in Asia (2 Cor 1:8). It is therefore quite possible that Paul was imprisoned during his Ephesian ministry.

6.2. Correspondence with Corinth. Paul wrote his first letter to the Corinthians* from Ephesus. He also appears to have written two other letters to the Corinthians, both of which are now lost (cf. 1 Cor 5:9; 2 Cor 2:4), and taken one trip to Corinth from Ephesus. We also know that a delegation from Corinth visited the apostle with a report about the Corinthian church and a list of questions during Paul's Ephesian ministry (1 Cor 16:17). Paul's explicit reference to "fighting with wild beasts" at Ephesus (1 Cor 15:32) should not be taken literally since his Roman citizenship would have prevented such an occurrence. Rather, this is a metaphorical way of referring to the difficulty with his opponents and possible physical injury they may have inflicted on him.

6.3. Philemon and Philippians. If Paul was imprisoned in Ephesus, it is possible that he wrote his letters to Philemon* and to the Philippians* from there. Neither of these letters states where they were written, only that they were written during an imprisonment. Many scholars now accept this view, but there is still no consensus (see Philippians).

6.4. The Epistle to the Ephesians. The majority of scholars discount the tradition that Ephesians was intended for exclusive use by the church(es) of Ephesus. On text-critical grounds, they claim that the appearance of "in Ephesus" in Ephesians 1:1 is a spurious reading. Most are therefore content to describe the document as some kind of circular letter for churches in the Roman province of Asia.

Nevertheless, even if "in Ephesus" is not original in Ephesians 1:1—although there are good arguments in favor of its authenticity—it is still likely that Ephesus was one of the destinations for the letter, if not the primary recipient, because of its standing as the leading city of the region and because of its strategic importance for the Christianity of the province. In a general way then, Ephesians may very well give us a picture of the situation of the churches in Ephesus in the mid first century. Based on Ephesians, it appears that the churches were dealing with a problem of Jew-Gentile disunity (Eph 2:11-22) and were still struggling with the issue of divine power* and evil spirits. The letter also gives evidence of a strong, if not predominantly, Gentile presence in the churches who needed doctrinal instruction as well as ethical exhortation.

6.5. Timothy in Ephesus. Traditionally, 1 Timothy has been taken to be an authentic Pauline letter written to Timothy whom Paul had left as his representative in Ephesus. This view still has much in its favor, although many scholars (e.g., Schnackenburg) are inclined to deny the authenticity of the letter based on linguistic and theological grounds. At a minimum, the letter does appear to have a genuine connection with Asia Minor (and probably Ephesus) and gives us a glimpse of the incursions of false teaching during the latter third of the first century A.D.

See also EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Akurgal, Ancient Civilizations and Ruins of Turkey (6th ed.; Istanbul: Haset Kitabevi, 1985); C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989); E. C. Blake and A. G. Edmonds, Biblical Sites in Turkey (Istanbul: Redhouse, 1977); W. Elliger, Ephesos: Geschichte einer antiken Weltstadt (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1985); D. H. French, "The Roman Road System of Asia Minor," ANRW II.7.2 (1983) 698-29; D. Knibbe and W. Alzinger, "Ephesos vom Beginn der römischen Herrschaft in Kleinasien bis zum Ende der Principatszeit," ANRW II.7.2 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1983) 748-830; R. Oster, "Ephesus as a Religious Center Under the Principate, I. Paganism Before Constantine," ANRW II.18.2 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1990) 1661-1728; R. Schnackenburg, "Ephesus: Entwicklung einer Gemeinde von Paulus zu Johannes," BZ 35 (1991) 41-64; P. Trebilco, Jewish Communities in Asia Minor (SNTSMS 69; Cambridge: University Press, 1991); E. Yamauchi, New Testament Cities in Western Asia Minor (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1980).

C. E. Arnold

EPICUREANS. See PHILOSOPHY.

EPISTLES. See LETTERS, LETTER FORMS.

ESCHATOLOGICAL ANTAGONIST. See APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; MAN OF LAWLESSNESS AND RESTRAINING POWER.

ESCHATOLOGY

Eschatology has traditionally been understood as that branch of theology which is concerned with "final" things. Topics such as the future of the world, the parousia of Jesus Christ, the coming kingdom* of God, the last judgment* of humankind, the resurrection* from the dead, heaven* and hell, the transformation of the cosmos, etc., are all generally considered under its heading. The term eschatology is often used interchangeably with apocalyptic,* although in recent years the latter has been more correctly defined in terms of a distinctive literary genre which may or may not be concerned with temporal "last things" (as J. J. Collins and C. C. Rowland demonstrate). The relationship between chronological history and eschatology has been a major source of scholarly discussion in recent years. G. B. Caird has offered an important linguistic assessment of eschatological language which focuses on the metaphorical sense as primary to its meaning. The result of such an approach is similar to genre investigations, namely that a straightforward equation between temporal "last things" and eschatological literature, particularly apocalyptic texts, is qualified, if not challenged altogether.

Strictly speaking a distinction should be maintained between the two terms apocalyptic and eschatology, despite the fact that much earlier scholarly endeavor uses apocalyptic without knowledge of the genre clarification, inadvertently providing the basis for some modern confusion when these older materials are consulted (see Sturm for an overview; cf. Marshall, Barker). L. Keck has tried to address this problem when he suggests that we take apocalyptic as an adjective "which characterizes a type of theology, not merely a type of eschatology" (Keck, 233). According to Keck, Paul's apocalyptic theology is to be distinguished from his wisdom theology since it arises from a different theological base. This is true, although it is possible to see both types of theology overlapping within the Pauline letters, often within key passages (such as 1 Cor 2—3; Phil 2:5-11; Col 1:13-20).

Paul's place within the area of eschatological theology is central, not least because his writings are among the earliest Christian documents preserved, thus reflecting foundational perspectives on eschatological matters. Most of the standard introductions on Paul have a section dealing with eschatology (H. Ridderbos, D. E. H. Whiteley, G. Bornkamm, F. F. Bruce). In addition, many of the classic interpretative studies of Paul in previous generations were dependent upon critical analyses of his eschatological thought (e.g., A. Schweitzer, G. Vos, E. Käsemann, J. Munck, H. J. Schoeps, W. D. Davies). In the past decade or so several important studies of Pauline eschatology have been produced, most notably that of J. C. Beker (1980). These have served to revitalize interest in the topic and have highlighted how central eschatology is to Pauline studies as a whole.

Paul's eschatology provides the background for many other important topics which constitute the substance of Pauline theology; christology,* pneumatology, ecclesiology, soteriology and anthropology are all built upon the eschatological foundation of Paul's thought. This foundation is all pervading in Pauline studies for it is possible to see eschatological concerns or presuppositions surfacing in virtually every letter within the Pauline corpus (Gal and Philem have been suggested as possible exceptions since they do not contain explicit references to the future Day of the Lord). Eschatological material occurs in a wide variety of contexts within the Pauline letters: creedal,* polemical, pastoral,* ethical,* paraenetic* and personal pericopae all contain such teaching. The importance of Pauline eschatology is evident no matter what one's opinion about the question of the authenticity of some of the letters, namely 2 Thessalonians,* Colossians* and Ephesians* or the Pastorals.* Even if some of these letters within the Pauline corpus are taken to be the work of Paul's followers in a subsequent generation, it is clear that Paul's own eschatological viewpoint helps condition the teaching contained within them (more about this below).

1. The Context of Pauline Eschatology: Jewish Apocalyptic Literature
2. The Contingency of the Pauline Letters
3. The Content of Pauline Eschatology: Some Central Tenets
4. Pauline Eschatology and Christology
5. Pauline Eschatology and Ethics
6. Pauline Eschatology and Jewish Mysticism
7. Social Dynamics in Paul's Eschatological Teaching

1. The Context of Pauline Eschatology: Jewish Apocalyptic Literature.

Recognition of the importance of the eschatological milieu of the NT materials is one of the most important results of twentieth-century investigations by biblical scholars. It needs to be recognized that the production of apocalypses was by no means restricted to Jewish or Christian writers; there are examples from many parts of the ancient Near East. However, it is the apocalypses of the first-century Jewish-Christian world (such as 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch) that are the most important parallels to Paul since it is these materials which are closest to him in terms of date and geographical setting; they therefore afford us the best opportunity of appreciating the eschatological content of Paul's thinking.

In the memorable words of E. Käsemann, "apocalyptic was the mother of all Christian theology" (Käsemann, "Beginnings," 102). Indeed, apocalyptic* has been viewed as one of the keys for unlocking the meaning of the NT as a whole. It is for this reason that Beker has described the apocalyptic worldview as the "coherent center" of Paul's thought and "rejects those construals of Paul's thought that suppress, delimit, or compromise its apocalyptic texture" (Beker 1980, 135). Beker is here following the lead of Käsemann in defining apocalyptic eschatology in terms of a belief in the future, imminent consummation of the world, an event which is triggered by (and at times even equated with) the future parousia of Jesus Christ. At the same time Beker takes the argument a step further than Käsemann did, asserting that Paul's apocalyptic framework is not only the starting point for Paul's thought but constitutes "the indispensable framework for his interpretation of the Christ-event" (Beker 1980, 19). This stands in contrast to Käsemann, who argues that Paul later departs from such an apocalyptically conditioned perspective. In short Beker serves as the advocate for many who would see the long standing debate about the center and periphery of Paul's thought as resolved in favor of the centrality of the apocalyptic-eschatological element of his teaching. The focus of theological discussion is thereby shifted away from earlier arguments about justification* by faith* (e.g., Käsemann) and Christ mysticism* (e.g., Schweitzer) as being the focal point(s) of Paul's theology. As an alternative Beker asserts that "the triumph of God [is] the center of Paul's thought" (Beker 1980, 355), a suggestion which arises directly out of an apocalyptic framework of Paul's thought. Beker summarizes this approach as one which recognizes Paul's thought as an interaction between "contingency" and "coherency" (see Center).

Some scholars have criticized the extent of Beker's approach, however, pointing out that in certain instances he imposed the apocalyptic scheme upon Paul's letters without due consideration to its appropriateness. J. L. Martyn, for example, has argued that Beker's interpretation of Galatians is misdirected and fails to take into account the role that the cross* has in the letter (the letter is not easily fitted into an apocalyptic framework since eschatological material is notably absent within it). Nevertheless, according to Martyn, Galatians forms, as it were, an "apocalypse of the cross," which initiates a cosmic battle between the flesh* and the spirit (as in Gal 5:16-25). (See Beker's response in his preface to 2d ed., Paul the Apostle.) A modification of the basic thesis is in order (as Beker [1991] himself now acknowledges).

Such attempts at interpreting Paul's theology from the standpoint of its eschatological foundation could legitimately be seen as a reaction to the overly realized approach of some interpreters such as Dodd or Bultmann, who build upon the (presumed) loss of an eschatological perspective as the Christian faith spread into the Hellenistic* world. However, this is not to suggest that Paul's viewpoint is completely apocalyptic in substance, merely that it lies within an eschatological framework. Clearly there is, at the same time, a dimension of realized eschatology in Paul's thought which tempers his obviously futuristic teaching (as V. P. Branick argues). Any attempt to contrast what is "present" with what is "eschatological" in Paul's thought misrepresents his position—the two are dynamically interconnected. Recognition of Paul's two-dimensional eschatology (present/future; immanent/transcendent) is particularly important when it comes to determining how the message of Pauline eschatology is applicable to us today. The two dimensions of Paul's thought are sometimes usefully described as the "vertical" and "horizontal" (or the "spatial" and "temporal") planes of his eschatology. The perceived relationship between the spatial and temporal dimensions of Paul's eschatological thought has proven to be one of the great divides among interpreters of Paul; those who emphasize the vertical dimension tend to see the conflict implied by a two-age dualism in cosmological terms (earthly versus heavenly), while those who emphasize the horizontal dimension tend to see the conflict arising out of straightforward chronological considerations (present versus future). A full examination of Paul's letters reveals that he uses the language of both time and space within his eschatological teaching (see Lincoln). The latter should not be neglected nor the former overemphasized; both help constitute Paul's eschatological thought. Even such a passage as Colossians 3:1-6, dominated by "spatial" language, has a wider eschatological vision behind it which hints at its "horizontal" counterpart (see Levison for a discussion).

Over the years considerable discussion has been given over to determining the background sources for Paul's eschatological viewpoint: does it ultimately derive from his Jewish heritage or from the wider Hellenistic world of which he was a part? Most scholars now accept that Paul's Jewish heritage and background, including its twofold division of temporal history into two aeons, the "now" and the "not-yet," is determinative for his eschatological worldview. M. C. de Boer [1989] further subdivides Jewish apocalyptic eschatology by suggesting two tracks: a cosmological-apocalyptic eschatology and a forensic-apocalyptic eschatology. De Boer argues that these correspond respectively to Käsemann's cosmological understanding of apocalyptic and Bultmann's anthropological understanding of it. Be that as it may, for Paul Jewish apocalyptic is a worldview which has had to undergo significant adaptation in light of the crucial event of Jesus' resurrection from the dead. It is the resurrection of Jesus Christ, above all, which conditions and determines Paul's eschatological teaching for it is in the resurrection that the inauguration of the eschaton has truly taken place, the new order begun. While the resurrection is central to it, Pauline eschatology is by no means monolithic in its conceptualization, nor is it uniform in its expression. A great deal of variety characterizes the letters on this score. As W. Baird puts it: "Paul does not have a clear and simple apocalyptic picture of the end. His language is drawn from external sources and is not used consistently" (Baird, 325). Before we turn to consider some of the specifics of Paul's eschatological teaching there is one additional matter of significance which must first be addressed.

2. The Contingency of the Pauline Letters.

One of the most important contributions in recent Pauline studies has been the increased understanding of the contingent nature of the letters which form the Pauline corpus. Even if, as we suggested above, Beker argues that apocalyptic be recognized as the "coherent center" of Paul's thought, he rightly notes that it must be translated into "the contingent particularities of the human situation" (Beker 1980, ix). More than ever before scholarship has come to appreciate how the circumstances surrounding the production of a letter help to contribute to our understanding of its contents. In short, the greater our knowledge of precisely how and why the apostle Paul (or, perhaps one of his followers, in the case of the so-called Deutero-Pauline letters) came to write a given letter, the better our chances of understanding not only its original message, but of interpreting the meaning for us today.

An informed study of the relationship that Paul (or his successors) might have had with the intended congregation better enables us to expound the text as a whole. Unfortunately, the contingent nature of many of the letters is such that we are often left with many key questions unanswered. We simply do not know enough about what actually occasioned the apostle to write to the congregations (or they to him), and are often forced to hypothesize so as to fill in the gaps of our knowledge; we do not even have the complete Pauline corpus to work with (as 1 Cor 5:9 demonstrates). Hypothetical reconstructions of the correspondence between Paul and the various congregations are needed to overcome this problem (as J. C. Hurd's seminal "backward extrapolation" theory about the Corinthian correspondence illustrates). These problems affect virtually all of the letters in the Pauline corpus and involve many theological themes, but become particularly acute in the area of eschatological teaching within several of the undisputed letters. Is Paul responding to questions arising from the congregations concerned? Have they misunderstood (or misrepresented) him? How much of what he writes in reply is dependent upon a common eschatological understanding which he shares with them (or perhaps, even was responsible for imparting to them)? How much of what he writes is designed as conscious corrective? Two examples are worth citing at this point.

2.1. 1 Thessalonians 4:13—5:11: The Premature Death of Christian Believers? The Thessalonian* letters both appear to have been written in response to serious questions raised by the congregation about the death of believers prior to the expected parousia of the Lord (1 Cor 11:30 and 15:18 may hint at the same issue being debated in Corinth). Paul's answer in 1 Thessalonians 4:13—5:11 attempts to deal with this concern and basically asserts that the dead suffer no disadvantage and will be joined with Christ at his coming. The difficulty here is that it is not entirely clear what eschatological beliefs were held by the church at Thessalonica, nor why they were thrown into such theological turmoil by the death of some of the members of the congregation. Did they simply misunderstand what Paul (presumably) had taught them about the future when he helped found the congregation? Or could it be that Paul himself had altered his views about the resurrection in the interim and that he is correcting his earlier teaching within the letter? Part of the problem lies, no doubt, in the imprecise nature of eschatological material itself (Klijn notes that the question of the status of the deceased was a problem common to apocalyptic literature). However, because we do not know the earlier exchange between Paul and the Thessalonians, it is not possible to be sure about the accuracy of any interpretation; it is like trying to listen to one end of a telephone conversation and deduce the matter being discussed.

2.2. 1 Corinthians 7: The Institution of Marriage and Human Sexuality in the Face of the Parousia. In this chapter Paul responds to some questions raised by the Corinthians about sex and marriage* in the lives of Christian believers. It appears that the Corinthians had adopted an ascetic attitude toward sexuality* in light of their belief that full salvation* in Christ had already arrived (in 1 Cor 7:1b Paul cites one of their slogans to this effect). Paul writes to correct this attitude, emphasizing in 1 Corinthians 7:2-6 the mutual obligations and responsibilities of sexual relationships between husbands and wives. This section presents little difficulty as far as eschatological matters are concerned. However, in 1 Corinthians 7:7-40 Paul continues with advice that seems much more conditioned by his views of the imminent parousia of Christ; this is particularly true in 1 Corinthians 7:25-35. There he advises those who are single (for whatever reason) to remain so in light of the "present distress" (1 Cor 7:26) and the "shortening of the time" (1 Cor 7:29). The chapter is an exegetical minefield, but most scholars agree that to some degree Paul's eschatological perspective is coloring his ethical advice to those contemplating marriage. Whatever interpretation is eventually adopted, one must give due consideration to the eschatological backdrop of Paul's thought (see Moiser for an overview).

3. The Content of Pauline Eschatology: Some Central Tenets.

Clearly an eschatological viewpoint underlies the whole of Pauline theology. The extent to which the perspective is determinative and the variety of form and expression which it employs makes it difficult to assess the matter simply. However, the main points may be summarized under the following eight headings.

3.1. The Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth. For Paul, Jesus of Nazareth is without doubt the Messiah, the Christ promised of old. So much is this so that the title "Christ"* (christos) functions almost as if it is the surname of Jesus himself. Several other messianic titles and designations are accorded to Jesus within the Pauline corpus, including Son (of God)* (sixteen times in Rom 1:4, 9; 5:10; 8:3, 29, 32; 1 Cor 1:9; 15:28; 2 Cor 1:19; Gal 1:16; 2:20; 4:4, 6; Eph 4:13; Col 1:13; 1 Thess 1:10), Son of David (two times in Rom 1:3; 2 Tim 2:8) and Lord* (around 275 times, including such important christological passages as 1 Cor 8:6; Phil 2:11). Yet it cannot be forgotten that the appearance of the Messiah was regarded within many writings of first-century Judaism above all as an eschatological event, an indisputable sign that the age to come had arrived. In a sense then, it is true to say that the linchpin of Paul's eschatology is the proclamation of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. At the same time it also needs to be said that the key event which guarantees, or authenticates, that messiahship is the raising of Jesus from the dead, for it is that act of resurrection which demonstrates how the eschatological age has impinged upon the present.

3.2. The Presence of the Eschatological Age. One of the standard features of Jewish apocalyptic literature is the division of time into two aeons (4 Ezra 7:50, "The Most High made not one age but two," is a classic statement of this). Perhaps the most demonstrable way that Paul shows his acceptance of this sort of an eschatological dualism of two aeons is in his use of the phrase "this age" (Rom 12:2; 1 Cor 1:20; 2:6-8; 3:18; 2 Cor 4:4). The corresponding phrase "the age to come," although implied at several points in the Pauline corpus, is never used in the undisputed letters (it does appear in Eph 1:21). The present age is occasionally described as evil (ponēros, Gal 1:4; Eph 5:16; 6:13), and the inhabitants of the world are a "wicked and perverse generation" (Phil 2:15). And yet it becomes clear that Paul believes that the eschatological hope of the future has in some way impinged upon the present. As the apostle declares in 2 Corinthians 5:17, "the old has passed away, behold the new has come." In 1 Corinthians 10:11 he asserts that "the end of the ages has come" (with a deliberate use of the perfect verb katēntēken), and in 1 Corinthians 7:31 he states that "the form of this world is passing away." He describes this eschatological age as a "new creation*"

(kainē ktisis, 2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15). More than this, Paul associates the arrival of the eschatological age with the revelation of Jesus Christ as God's Messiah. Thus he declares in Galatians 4:4 that "when the time had fully come, God sent forth his own Son." All of this is to suggest that Paul's teaching about the presence of the eschatological age must be set against the backdrop of a temporal dualism.

Several related images are used to express this idea of two aeons, including the Adam/Christ analogy of Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15 (see Adam and Christ), and an extended anthropological image involving a contrast between the old self/new self (Rom 6:6; Col 3:9-10; Eph 2:15; 4:22-24); outer self/inner self (Rom 7:22; 2 Cor 4:16; Eph 3:15); physical person/spiritual person (2 Cor 2:14-16; see New Nature and Old Nature). A spatial image involving the use of "heaven"* (ouranos) and its related terms also offers an important means whereby eschatological truth is communicated in the Pauline letters (as Lincoln demonstrates).

The assurance of the present reality of the new age gave rise to an overly realized understanding of Christian existence within some congregations. So certain were they about the reality of eschatological existence now that there seemed little need for any resurrection in the future—the resurrection life was presently being lived (most scholars accept that 1 Cor 4:8; 15:12 and 2 Tim 2:18 can all be exegetically linked as expressive of this overrealized perspective, but see Wedderburn for a dissenting opinion). In the case of Corinth this overrealized enthusiasm seems to have manifested itself in an unhealthy preoccupation with spiritual gifts,* demonstrating how closely allied eschatology and pneumatology were in Paul's time (as Thistleton argues; see Holy Spirit). Surely R. P. Martin is correct at this point in suggesting that 1 Corinthians 15 must not be separated from 1 Corinthians 12—14, particularly within an exegetical framework. It is not difficult to demonstrate that the same dynamic interplay between eschatology and pneumatology persists throughout church history and holds true even today, with appeal to the Pauline letters being made by all sides over the years. Paul counters the enthusiasm of the Corinthians in two major ways: first, by the use of sarcastic rebuke (as in 1 Cor 4:8); second, by forcefully reemphasizing the futuristic dimensions of their common faith (as in 1 Cor 15). Similar overly realized understandings of Christian existence are reflected (and challenged!) in 1 Timothy 2:16-18, 2 Thessalonians 2:2 and (possibly) 1 Thessalonians 4:13. There exists in Paul a dialectic between the present and the future, particularly as it is connected to the concept of salvation.

However, despite the assurance of a present dimension of eschatological hope, it should not be overlooked that for Paul the final revelation of the eschatological age still lies in the future. The ultimate transformation of the world order, the final redemption of the believer (the granting of the resurrection body) and the final judgment are all events which are yet to be awaited. The present is conditioned by both the past (death and resurrection of Jesus Christ) and the future (the awaited parousia at the end of time).

3.2.1. The Kingdom of God/Christ. Although the idea of the kingdom of God/Christ is a standard feature of the Jewish eschatological perspective which Paul shares and is something which clearly underlies much of his ethical teaching, the phrase itself is not a prominent one within the Pauline letters (see Kingdom of God/Christ). Apparently Paul does clearly assume the life and ministry of Jesus Christ to have been in some way the inauguration of the kingdom of God on earth, despite the fact that this is never explicitly stated anywhere within his letters.

Paul tends to talk of the kingdom of God/Christ as if it is something awaited in the future, although occasionally he hints at the present reality of the kingdom in the life of the Christian (as in Rom 14:17 and 1 Cor 4:20). One of his most common statements about the kingdom is that it is something which the believer inherits (as in 1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50; Gal 5:21) as a result of faithfulness; again, clearly it is a future inheritance which is in view. More central within Paul's teaching on the kingdom of God/Christ is the place that the resurrection of Jesus Christ has in bringing the kingdom to bear within human history.

3.3. The Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the Dead. For Paul the resurrection* of Jesus is primarily an eschatological event affirming the fact that the new age has arrived. At the same time it is understandably seen as the vindication of Jesus' death on the cross and is closely associated with Christ's accession to power at the right hand of God (Rom 8:34; see Exaltation), providing the basis for his intercession on behalf of the saints. Despite the fact that the resurrection is for Paul an eschatological act of God, it is never simply a "spiritual" event loosed from the moorings of history or distanced from some sort of physicality. For Paul the resurrection of Jesus clearly involves the risen Lord in some sort of somatic existence, although admittedly it is an existence of a different order.

3.3.1. Romans 1:3-4: Son of God and Resurrection. Most scholars agree that within these two verses we have the apostle alluding to a traditional creedal affirmation (see Creed) about Jesus Christ. Several features of the passage hint at an earlier setting of the declaration, perhaps arising from the Palestinian church. Notable among these are the unusual phrase "according to the Spirit of holiness" and the juxtaposition of Jesus' earthly credentials ("descended from David according to the flesh") with his heavenly status ("designated Son of God in power"). In short, we have here a dual affirmation of Jesus' sonship: he is both Son of David and Son of God.* What is significant in terms of Paul's eschatology is the fact that Jesus' credentials as Son of God are closely linked to his resurrection from the dead. It is no wonder that this passage is sometimes described as reflecting one of the earliest stages of theological reflection among the first Christians, where the resurrection is the act which accords Jesus his status as God's Son. When this consideration is held alongside the fact that the participial form horisthentos in verse 4 (translated as "designated" in the RSV, "declared" in the NRSV) is very difficult to interpret precisely, it is easy to understand how those who advocated adoptionism found the text a key one for their position.

3.3.2. 1 Corinthians 15: An Excursus on Resurrection. In 1 Corinthians 15 we have a semi-independent excursus on the resurrection and its implications for the believer. This is the most detailed discussion of the resurrection within the Pauline corpus. The focus of discussion within the chapter is not whether or not Jesus Christ has been raised from the dead (as is often assumed in popular apologetics), but what the implications of Christ's resurrection are for the believer. Thus 1 Corinthians 15:12 provides an important clue for the discussion as a whole: "Now if Christ is preached as raised from the dead, how can some of you say that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Important insight is here gained about the nature of the controversy at Corinth and the identity of the so-called Corinthian* heresy. Paul is here confronting an overrealized eschatology within the Corinthian congregation, one which suggests that the Corinthians (or at least some of them) believed there was no need for their future resurrection since they had been baptized and were living the resurrection life already. Paul's initial defense of a futuristic eschatology involves his reminding the Corinthians of his earlier teaching on the matter, one built on traditional creedal declarations about the resurrection of Jesus Christ (1 Cor 15:3-7) and his appearance to witnesses. In other words the Corinthians share Paul's acceptance of the resurrection of Jesus Christ as foundational to their Christian faith but differ as to their understanding of its significance for Christian hope.

3.3.2.1. The First Fruits (1 Cor 15:20, 23). Paul uses an illustration drawn from agriculture to demonstrate the connection between the resurrection of Jesus Christ and the resurrection of the believer. In 1 Corinthians 15:20 and 15:23 he describes the risen Lord Jesus Christ as the first fruits* (aparchē), implying that the believer will share in the resurrection life in the same way that the full harvest is related to the initial crop. The important qualifier interjected by means of this agricultural image is that the resurrection existence of the believer is still future and yet to be awaited. The whole image is dependent upon an understanding of a dynamic unity existing between Christ and the believers; whatever happens to the risen Lord Jesus Christ is automatically transferred to the Christian community, albeit within an eschatological context. As M. J. Harris (114) puts it, the first fruits image demonstrates that Christ is "both the pledge and the paradigm of the somatic resurrection of believers."

Paul also applies the aparchē image to his eschatological teaching about the gift of the Holy Spirit* in Romans 8:23, as well as to Jewish/Gentile relationships within the plan of God in Romans 11:16 (the image may also be present in 2 Thess 2:13 depending on the textual variants adopted). A related image, describing the risen Christ as the "firstborn* of the dead" (prōtotokos ek tōn nekrōn), is contained in the pre-Pauline hymn of Colossians 1:15-20.

3.3.2.2. The Adam/Christ Analogy (1 Cor 15:20-21, 44b-45). Paul's use of the Adam/Christ* analogy is one of the most important features of his eschatological teaching in the chapter. Beginning in 1 Corinthians 15:20 the apostle sets up a deliberate contrast between Adam and Jesus Christ as representative figures of humanity. The analogy is further extended in 15:44b-45 where Paul once again appears to correct an overrealized understanding of resurrection existence among the Corinthians. In 1 Corinthians 15:46 he reverses the order in which the physical body and the resurrection body are to appear (the Corinthians may be exhibiting dependence upon the kind of teaching about Adamic mankind found in Philo of Alexandria at this point). The result of this is that Christ is portrayed as embodying what R. Scroggs has described as "eschatological humanity."

3.3.2.3. Death: The Last Enemy (1 Cor 15:26). Within the Pauline letters death is portrayed in both physical and spiritual terms. Thus, it is both the cessation of mortal life (Phil 1:21; see Life and Death) and the state of spiritual separation from God (Rom 7:9-14; Eph 2:1-3; Col 1:21). The destructive power of death is never downplayed in Paul (note the use of katalyō in 2 Cor 5:1), although it is occasionally presented as the doorway of departure to another existence (2 Cor 5:8; Phil 1:23; 2 Tim 4:6). In the midst of his extended discussion on the implications of Jesus Christ's resurrection,

Paul uses an unusual phrase in describing physical death, referring to it as "the last enemy to be destroyed." M. C. de Boer argues that this defeat of death is central to 1 Corinthians 15:20-28, the heart of Paul's eschatological teaching in the chapter. This is a highly evocative image, emphasizing the importance of the cross* for Paul's thought as it hints at a confrontation between Jesus Christ and Death, as if the latter is a personified figure who must be engaged in combat on this cross of Calvary (see Triumph). The figure of Death as an enemy is clearly drawn from Paul's eschatological worldview (similar instances of precisely this sort of personification of death can be found in other Jewish and Christian apocalypses such as 4 Ezra 8:53 and Rev 6:8; 20:13-14; see de Boer, 90-91, for further details).

At the same time the image sets up something of a tension within Paul's teaching on physical death, a tension which can perhaps best be highlighted by considering when it is that Paul views this enemy* to be destroyed. Has it already been accomplished by Christ's death on the cross (as the use of the aorist katargēsantos in 2 Tim 1:10 suggests)? Or is it something which is still to occur in the indefinite future, at the awaited parousia of Christ? Clearly the immediate context of 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 would suggest the latter, although how this is then to be applied to believers and what its implications are for their present ethical conduct are matters which are far from certain. To put it another way, if death and sin are interconnected (as Paul forcefully asserts in Rom 5:12), how is it that the Christian is exhorted to live a life in the present which is freed from the power and effect of sin,* and yet be expected to await the deliverance from death as something in the future? Sin (which is personified in Rom 5:14, 17, 21; 7:8-11, 13-25) is already conquered—yes; but not the physical death that is so intimately associated with it—that must await the future consummation. At the very least we must admit a theological tension being expressed here, although we need not go so far as some do to suggest that Paul is involved in a damaging self-contradiction at this point.

3.4. The Awaited Day of the Lord and Final Judgment. The Day of the Lord (yôm YHWH) is a standard feature in OT prophetic literature, one which Paul takes over and expands within his letters. As far as can be adduced it was originally conceived as a day of future joy, when God would intervene on behalf of his people and save them from calamity, righting injustice and defeating Israel's enemies. However, many of the prophets, such as Amos, Ezekiel, Isaiah, Zechariah, Zephaniah, Malachi and Joel, in an effort to call the people back to true obedience, shifted the focus within their message, proclaiming the Day of the Lord to be not only a time of deliverance but a time of judgment for the nation of Israel as well (see Everson). The idea of an eschatological Day of the Lord can also be found in Jewish pseudepigraphal documents (such as 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch) and in select Qumran* documents (such as 1QM and 1QS). In the Gospels it is most closely associated with Jesus' statements about the coming Son of man, but can be identified within all gospel strata. Paul takes over the Jewish concept of the Day of the Lord, including the twin themes of eschatological salvation and future judgment, within his teaching on the theme. However, he creatively integrates this OT hope with his own developing christology, effectively transforming the "Day of the Lord (Yahweh)" into the "Day of the Lord Jesus Christ." This creativity stands as one of the most important contributions within Pauline eschatology (see 4 below).

3.4.1. The Day of the Lord and the Parousia of Jesus Christ. A variety of expressions are used within the Pauline letters for the eschatological Day of the Lord, particularly as it is used with reference to Jesus Christ. The simple phrase "Day of the Lord" occurs in 1 Thessalonians 5:2 and 2 Thessalonians 2:2; the phrase "Day of the Lord Jesus Christ" in 1 Corinthians 5:5; "Day of the Lord Jesus" in 1 Corinthians 1:8 and 2 Corinthians 1:14; "Day of Christ Jesus" in Philippians 1:6; "Day of Christ" in Philippians 1:10 and 2:16; "the Day" in 1 Thessalonians 5:4 and 1 Corinthians 3:13; "that Day" in 2 Timothy 1:12, 18; 4:8. In addition Paul is the major NT source for the use of the term parousia of the future coming of Jesus Christ (1 Cor 15:23; 1 Thess 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23; 2 Thess 2:1, 8-9). The noun apokalypsis ("revelation") is used in a similar way in 1 Corinthians 1:7 and 2 Thessalonians 1:7. In the Pastorals a significant change in vocabulary appears; the term epiphaneia is used with reference to the appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ in 1 Timothy 6:1; 2 Timothy 1:10; 4:1, 8; Titus 2:13, while the verb epiphainō ("appear") appears in Titus 2:11 and 3:4 (the noun epiphaneia ("appearance") also appears in 2 Thess 2:8). In all three Pastoral letters the immediate context of these verses suggests a future manifestation of the glory* of the Lord Jesus Christ, although the present dimension is also clearly in evidence (especially in 2 Tim 2:10). Several related verb forms are also used within the Pauline corpus to denote this future eschatological event: forms of erchomai ("come") appear in 1 Corinthians 4:5; 11:26 and 2 Thessalonians 2:10; apokalyptō ("reveal") in 2 Thessalonians 1:7; and phaneroō ("make manifest") in Colossians 3:4. The phrase "the Day of redemption" appears in Ephesians 4:30; while to telos ("the end") occurs in 1 Corinthians 1:8; 15:24; 2 Corinthians 1:13; and ta telē in 1 Corinthians 10:11. The future parousia of Jesus Christ is often popularly described as "the Second Coming" or "the Second Advent," although it is worth noting that neither phrase is found within the Pauline letters (nor anywhere in the NT, for that matter); the first attested distinction between a "First Advent" and a "Second Advent" is found in the writings of Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 110), although a close approximation is found in Hebrews 9:28.

At several points in the Pauline letters it appears that traditional declarations of the coming of the Messiah from heaven are cited. Generally these statements are filled with apocalyptic language and imagery, much of it drawn from OT prophetic literature (as in 1 Thess 1:9-10; 4:13—5:11). One of the most interesting is the Greek transliteration of the Aramaic phrase Maranatha found in 1 Corinthians 16:22. The linguistic evidence deriving from a bilingual setting makes this potentially the earliest recorded acknowledgement of the lordship of Jesus Christ. Some dispute remains about how Maranatha should be divided and separated and whether it should be understood as an invocation for the Lord to come (marana tha, "Come, our Lord!") or as a straightforward declaration that he has already come (maran atha, "The Lord has come!"). In any event, the context of the passage is presumably the Lord's Supper* (as in the interesting parallel in Did. 10:6), and it seems reasonable to take the Aramaic phrase to contain at least an element of future fulfillment within it. In short, the ejaculation Maranatha is a prayer, uttered within a liturgical context, that may call for the future parousia of the Lord. The parallel in Revelation 22:20 would support such an interpretation.

3.4.2. The Delay of the Parousia. One prominent school of thought within NT scholarship has held that the nonarrival of the parousia of Jesus Christ created a crisis early within the life of the Christian church. This "delay of the parousia" is sometimes portrayed as triggering the need for a de-eschatologization of the Christian hope, a movement away from Jewish apocalyptic ideas which see the fulfillment of God's promises as taking place in the not-too-distant return of Christ to earth; such a belief is replaced by a more Hellenistic understanding of Christ's "presence" as taking place within the life of the believer. Under the impact of the delayed parousia (so the argument goes), eschatology is necessarily dehistoricized, and the meaning of the future hope was spiritualized and transposed into a more mystical union between Christ and the church. The Pauline materials figure prominently within such theories about the crisis presented by the delay of the parousia, although there is an increasing swell of voices objecting to the assumption that the parousia presented such a theological crisis among the early Christians that is so often supposed (see Aune, Bauckham). Many scholars have concluded that the later Pauline letters (such as 2 Cor 10—13 and Phil) reflect precisely this sort of shift in perspective, a suggestion which raises the question of development within Paul's eschatological thought.

3.4.3. The Question of Development in Pauline Eschatology. Two basic ways of approaching this question have been employed by Pauline scholars. The first is to note the differences (even inconsistencies) between sections of Paul's letters with regard to eschatological matters and suggest that the apostle has changed his mind, or developed in his understanding of the issues, or that his follower(s) responsible for the Deutero-Pauline letters have done so (see Achtemeier and Beker 1991). Generally such an approach involves both a detailed study of Pauline chronology* and careful attention to the polemical contexts in which the letters are written. Indeed, J. W. Drane argues that the diversity of eschatological expression is directly related to the diversity of opponents against whom Paul is writing, although he rejects some of the more radical results of advocates of such an approach. In any event, the dating and circumstances surrounding the production of a letter are crucial in determining whether development of thought is detectable. In the main, the letters of the Pauline corpus are divided by scholars adopting this explanation of development into three groups, representing an increasingly Hellenistic and individualistic understanding of eschatology which occurs over time: (1) Paul's early letters (1 Thess, 2 Thess); (2) Paul's major letters (Rom, 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal); (3) Paul's later letters (Phil, Col, Eph, Philem) (diversity of opinion about the categorization of some letters is common).

The second approach is simply to allow the differences to stand and to explain them as inevitable given the nature of the subject matter; to accept them as the apostle trying to explain the inexplicable and, not surprisingly, creating some real theological tensions within his writing. In the words of C. F. D. Moule, such tensions are "best explained as the result, simply, of the unmanageable dimensions of the Christian verities" (Moule, 4).

In summary, the question of development in Paul's eschatology inevitably involves one in scholarly investigation on at least three separate but interconnected fronts: controversy about the integrity of the Corinthian letters (two, three or four letters?), the chronological order of the letters (notably Phil) and debates about Pauline authorship of some of the disputed letters (namely, 2 Thess, Col and Eph). However, even within the undisputed letters the controversy about development of Paul's eschatological thought arises.

The eschatological teaching contained in 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 has long been one of the major areas of discussion (Gillman offers a survey of interpretation). Many feel that in 1 Corinthians 15 we have Paul giving his clearest expression of the future hope for the believer, associating the granting of the resurrection body with the parousia of Christ (which is expected very soon, during Paul's own lifetime). However, in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 it appears that Paul provides an alternative perspective, one in which the Christian believer is somehow united with Christ at the point of death, and the granting of the resurrection body postponed indefinitely, presumably until the parousia (see Intermediate State). Many scholars have attempted to explain this shift in perspective between the two letters. Dodd, for example, explains the shift to have come about because of Paul's own brush with death, something which, Dodd suggests, took place between the writing of the letters we know as 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians (this trauma is perhaps hinted at in 2 Cor 1:8-11). Many scholars (including F. F. Bruce and E. E. Ellis) would dispute this suggestion, arguing that it is highly improbable that Paul would have changed his mind on so central an issue within the span of a few short weeks or months (the supposed time lag between the writing of the two Corinthian letters). For them the essential teaching contained in 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 is perfectly compatible. Some scholars have attempted to explain the difference between the teaching contained within the two letters by arguing that 1 Corinthians 15 is concerned primarily with a collective eschatology and 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 is concerned primarily with an individualistic eschatology. The fact that so much attention (and variety of interpretation) is given to the problem raised by the eschatology of the Corinthian letters is some indication of its importance within Pauline studies.

Others have sought to identify a development in Paul's eschatological thought even within his earlier letters, namely 1 and 2 Thessalonians. C. L. Mearns, for example, suggests that Paul's earliest eschatological teaching was radically realized and that the death of Christian believers within the Thessalonian congregation forced a radical shift in his understanding of such matters. This sort of approach assumes that the death of believers would have come as something unexpected and theologically worrying to Paul, resulting in him "re-conceptualizing the Parousia in the form of a 'Second Coming.' " (Mearns, 139). While the death of some of the members of the congregation is certainly an issue within the church at Thessalonica (as in 1 Thess 4:13-18), there is little to suggest that this was a result of Paul's own teaching to them. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine that in the approximately twenty years of missionary activity prior to his writing 1 Thessalonians, Paul had not yet been faced with the death of Christians nor worked out the matter theologically.

3.4.4. The Judgment Seat of God/Christ. Paul takes over the standard Jewish expectation that all men and women will be held accountable before God* for their lives (see Travis). There is within Paul's letters a close association between the parousia of the Lord Jesus Christ and the execution of final judgment.* A classic example of this is found in 1 Thessalonians 3:13, where declaration of the parousia is placed within a judgment context "before God" (emprosthen tou theou). In 1 Corinthians 3:12-15 Paul offers an extended passage about the final judgment, using an image of building materials being tested by the purifying fires of "the Day" (1 Cor 3:13). Similar imagery of giving account before God is used in Romans 2:1-11; 14:10-12 and (with reference to Paul himself) in Philippians 2:16. In Romans 2:16 God is said to judge the secrets of humankind by Christ Jesus (dia Christou Iēsou).

In connection with the final judgment at the consummation of this age, Paul speaks explicitly of the judgment seat (bēma) twice within his letters (Rom 14:10; 2 Cor 5:10), building upon the image found in Isaiah 45. The curious thing about this motif is that the judgment seat is described as belonging to God in the first reference and as belonging to Christ in the second. There is some precedent for this fluctuation between God and messianic agent within Jewish pseudepigraphal texts (such as 1 Enoch 37—71; T. Abr. 13:1-2); the same is carried on in Christian writings after Paul, probably under the apostle's influence (e.g., Polycarp Phil 6.2). By extension, the right of judgment is extended to the Christian church* acting as Christ's agents. Thus Paul himself feels able to pass judgment on unethical behavior (1 Cor 5:3-5) and exhorts the church to do the same (1 Cor 5:11-13; see Discipline). He even hints that the saints will execute eschatological judgment over the world* and the angels* (1 Cor 6:2-3).

3.4.5. The Judgment of Satan and His Angels. Satan* is mentioned frequently in the Pauline letters, always as a power hostile to God and malevolent to the saints (Rom 16:20; 1 Cor 5:5; 7:5; 2 Cor 2:11; 11:14; 12:7;

1 Thess 2:18). The terms Tempter (ho peirazōn) and Devil (diabolos) are also used (in 1 Thess 3:5 and Eph 6:11 respectively). This is perfectly in keeping with the eschatological dualism of other Jewish apocalyptic texts which characteristically describe the present age as one in which Satan's power and authority are in evidence. Indeed, Satan is called "the god of this age" in 2 Corinthians 4:4, and "the prince of the power of the air" in Ephesians 2:2. Also in keeping with these apocalyptic texts is a developed angelology, with Satan being supported by a host of figures; in the main Paul conforms to this Jewish usage (see Carr). We find angels (sometimes friendly, but generally hostile) mentioned in passing throughout the Pauline letters (Rom 8:38; 1 Cor 4:9; 6:3; 11:10; 13:1; 2 Cor 11:14; 12:7; Gal 1:8; 3:19; 4:14; Col 2:18; 1 Thess 4:16). Related to this are the references to the "rulers of this age" (1 Cor 2:6-9); the "principalities and powers"* (Rom 8:38; 1 Cor 15:24; Eph 6:12; Col 2:15); "world rulers of this present darkness and spiritual hosts of wickedness in high places" (Eph 6:13); and "the elemental spirits of the universe" (Gal 4:3; Col 2:8, 20). Yet the ultimate judgment and defeat of Satan, together with his angelic minions, is portrayed as a certainty in several key passages, notably Romans 16:20. Thus Paul balances the present and future dimensions of this judgment of Satan, with the cross of Christ being the fulcrum of the scales of justice.

There is considerable fluidity of referents within the language of angelic powers in the Pauline corpus. At times (such as Rom 8:38-39; Col 2:15 and Eph 2:2; 3:10; 6:12) the referent is apparently a spiritual force, while at other times (such as Rom 13:1-7 and 1 Cor 2:6-8) it is clearly a political power that is in view (see Carr, Wink; see Principalities and Powers). The relationship between the two basic categories (spiritual and political forces) inevitably involves one in discussions about Pauline chronology* and the authorship of Colossians* and Ephesians.*

3.4.6. The Judgment of the Man of Lawlessness (2 Thess 2). There has been considerable debate about the identification of the "man of lawlessness (or sin)" mentioned in 2 Thessalonians 2:1-12. The fact that it is found in a letter which is disputed by some as genuinely Pauline has also contributed to the debate. The passage presents significant exegetical dilemmas in its own right, not least the difficulty in determining who the "man of lawlessness"* (2 Thess 2:3) is supposed to represent. Is he a symbol of Satan, or one of his agents? Is he a figure in the tradition of the wicked Antiochus Epiphanes from the days of Daniel, associated with the "abomination of desolation" and the Roman emperor Caligula (Mk 13:14)? Should we identify this figure with the political leadership of Rome, a representative of civil authority or perhaps even with the emperor* himself as the one who brings political upheaval (apostasia)? It seems clear that the underlying imagery for this ungodly figure is found in Ezekiel's passage about the King of Tyre (Ezek 28:1-19), but recognition of this does not necessarily aid in determining who is intended. Association with the antichrist figure in Revelation is understandable given the overall tone of the passage (see Mounce).

Similarly, who or what is "the restraining influence" (2 Thess 2:6-7; see Man of Lawlessness and Restraining Power)? Is it Paul himself (as Cullmann and Munck suggest)? Or is it the need for the gospel message to be proclaimed throughout the world (as Aus argues)? Again, one of the reasons why it is difficult to determine precisely what the author has in mind arises from an exegetical oddity, an unusual phrasing in the Greek text which provides both a neuter expression (to katechon, 2 Thess 2:6) and a masculine one (ho katechōn, 2 Thess 2:7) in successive verses.

In any event, the main thrust of the passage is to place the rise of the "man of lawlessness" within a temporal framework (as in 2 Thess 2:3), while at the same time assert his ultimate defeat by the Lord Jesus at the future parousia.

3.4.7. The Wrath to Come. The coming wrath* (orgē) is mentioned over twenty times within the Pauline letters, the noun appearing both with the definite article and without it. Several other terms and phrases, mostly drawn from the verb krinō ("judge") and its cognates, are also used to express the just execution of judgment by God or his designated agent at the end of the age (see Kreitzer, 99-100, for details). The fact that Paul tends not to associate God directly with the execution of this wrath has prompted some scholars (notably Dodd) to suggest that he depersonalizes wrath. There is some validity to the suggestion, although the phrase "the wrath of God" (hē orgē tou theou) does appear three times (Rom 1:18; Eph 5:6; Col 3:6).

3.5. The Gentile Mission and the Fate of the Jewish Nation. According to his own testimony Paul's calling as an apostle is intimately related to his encounter with the risen Lord Jesus (Gal 1:11-17). While the focus of Paul's "Damascus Road" experience is often placed upon it being his conversion experience, it is important to note that it might be more properly described as his calling to participate in the fulfillment of God's promises to bring all nations to him in the fullness of time (as in Is 49; see Conversion and Call). This means that Paul sees the whole of his subsequent ministry* among the nations (see Gentiles) as taking place within the context of an eschatological act, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Paul's commissioning as the "apostle to the Gentiles" (Gal 2:8) is alluded to throughout Paul's letters (see Kim, 1-31, for details). Clearly Paul sees his own apostolic ministry as part of God's eschatological activity, and an essential component of that activity is the salvation of a people called to be his own (as Wright notes). But how does this affect his understanding of the fate of the Jewish nation (see Israel)? Several key texts deal with precisely this question.

3.5.1. Romans 9—11. C. H. Dodd long ago recognized the special nature of Romans 9—11, suggesting that it was an independent source, possibly a sermon which was inserted by Paul into the letter. Certainly the fact that it is possible to read from Romans 8:38 to 12:1 without a discernible break in thought lends weight to this suggestion. However, many Pauline interpreters feel that Romans 9—11 is an integral part of the overall argument of the letter and do not feel the interpolation approach is warranted. The problem of the fate of the Jewish nation lies at the heart of this section of the letter, but this is anticipated earlier in the letter (as in Rom 3:1-8 and the Abraham image in Rom 4:1-25). Insofar as the section is concerned with the future fate of the Jewish nation, in light of their rejection of Jesus Christ as Messiah, it deals with eschatological matters.

What does Paul feel will ultimately happen to the Jewish nation (his own people)? In Romans 11:26 ("all Israel will be saved") he appears to come close to what might be described as a national universalism. How literally should we take the "all Israel*" (pas Israēl) in Romans 11:26 to be? It is difficult to reconcile such teaching with the theme of justification by faith so strongly emphasized elsewhere in his writing. One way to understand Romans 9—11 is that it reflects an unresolved tension within Paul's own thought, one which cannot quite seem to abandon faith in God's promises to historical Israel, yet one which is challenged by the redefinition of Israel into spiritual terms demanded by the Christ event. Traditionally Israel was seen as the instrument of God's salvation of the Gentile nations (as in Is 40—66); Paul's dilemma is how to maintain belief in this strand of prophetic proclamation in light of Israel's rejection of Jesus Christ. A volcanic eruption has taken place within Paul's thought and the place of Israel within the revised eschatological scheme is like lava that has not yet cooled; it is not yet hardened or fixed, remaining somewhat resilient.

3.5.2. 1 Thessalonians 2:13-16. Since the days of F. C. Baur scholars have often claimed that this pericope breaks the flow of Paul's argument in the letter and have suggested that it is an interpolation, perhaps inserted by a later editor after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. At the heart of such an interpretation is the assumption that the pericope is incompatible with Paul's eschatological teaching elsewhere concerning the fate of the Jewish nation. Competent cases have been made for both possibilities (the section is genuinely Pauline; alternatively, it is a non-Pauline interpolation). To a large degree the argument hinges on whether a historical setting can be determined to fit the judgment on the Jewish nation implied (such as the Jewish Passover riot of A.D. 49).

3.6. The Eschatological Gift of the Spirit. Jewish eschatology traditionally associated the dawn of the age to come with the bestowal of the Spirit of God (see Holy Spirit). Paul carries through this idea, knitting together his doctrine of the risen Lord Jesus Christ as experienced by the indwelling presence of the Spirit of God in the life of the believer. In 1 Corinthians 15:45 the risen Christ, the last Adam, is even described as the "life-giving Spirit" (pneuma zōopoioun). Several images are used to express the role that the Spirit has in the life of the believer. Similar declarations about the impartation of life by the Spirit are recorded in Romans 8:2, 10 and 2 Corinthians 3:6.

3.6.1. The Spirit as First Fruits. Paul explicitly describes the Spirit as the first fruits* (aparchē) in Romans 8:23, paralleling what is said about the risen Christ himself in 1 Corinthians 15:20. This agricultural image is used extensively in the OT (as in Lev 23:10-14).

3.6.2. The Spirit as Guarantee. At several places within the Pauline letters the gift of the Holy Spirit is described as the guarantee (arrabōn) of God (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:14). This unusual term is a Semitic loan word and was well established in Greek as a financial term. It denoted the promise to pay a full balance based upon the handing over of an initial down payment.* The financial metaphor lent itself readily to Paul's doctrine of the indwelling Spirit and is clearly eschatologically conditioned. The essential point is that the believer is assured of his or her ultimate redemption* based upon the present possession of the Holy Spirit.

3.6.3. The Spirit and Inheritance. The language of inheritance also figures within Paul's pneumatology (1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50; Gal 5:21), where it is closely connected to his understanding of covenental blessing and the fulfillment of the promise of God to his people in Abraham.* The idea of the Christian's possession of the Spirit as the basis for the adoption* (huiothesia) as the children of God is declared at several places within the Pauline letters (Rom 8:15; 9:4; Gal 4:5; Eph 1:5). The use of the Greek transliteration of the Aramaic term Abba is linked to this (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). By virtue of the fact that the Christian (by definition) has the Spirit, the status of adoption exists as a present reality. Yet it is not difficult to detect a future dimension to this adoption within the passages, a feature which is consistent with the rest of Paul's eschatological teaching.

3.6.4. The Spirit and Christian Ethical Life. Paul's eschatological perspective informs his ethical teaching, often helping to frame the way in which he describes the Christian as one who is to live his or her life with an eye to the future (see Ethics). In effect this means that Paul's ethical dualism is eschatological in nature, not anthropological (as many advocating a clash with Gnosticism have suggested in the past). For Paul soteriology and eschatology are intertwined, finding the basis of expression through his christology.* For example, in Galatians 1:4 the sacrificial death of Christ is described as the means of believers' deliverance "from the present evil age." Similarly, in Romans 8:4 he defines Christian existence in terms of a "life in the flesh" which has been surrendered for a "life in the Spirit." The Spirit is also spoken of as the power of resurrection existence made operative in the Christian's ethical life (as in Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 2:4-5).

3.7. The Transformation of the Cosmos. One of the standard features of apocalyptic eschatology is the transformation of the created order under the effects of the emerging age to come. This cosmic redemption is also reflected at several key points within the Pauline letters, demonstrating a close connection between the ideas of creation* and redemption* (see Gibbs). Cosmic redemption is also intimately connected to anthropological redemption within the Pauline letters. The destiny of both the created order and the human race are determined by Christ's resurrection from the dead, and both find their fulfillment in his lordship. Thus Paul concludes his short excursus on creation in Romans 8:19-22 with the proclamation that this redemption includes the adoption of his children via the activity of the Spirit (Rom 8:23).

3.7.1. Romans 8:19-23. In the midst of an extended discussion of the effects of Jesus Christ's redeeming action for the Christian we have a short section which describes its cosmic dimensions. Paul here employs the language of Jewish apocalyptic, anthropomorphizing the created order (hē ktisis), and mixing in the image of birth pangs (synōdinei). As D. C. Allison demonstrates, "birth pangs" is something of a technical term within apocalyptic texts, often associated with the tribulations surrounding the advent of the Messiah. Interestingly, Paul also includes the image within the passage on the parousia in 1 Thessalonians 5:3, a section built very much on the traditional OT expectations of the Day of the Lord. It is a common image within apocalyptic sections of the OT (Is 26:16-19; 66:7-14), of the Synoptics (Mk 13:8; Mt 24:8), and it occurs within other apocalypses (4 Ezra 5:1-13, 50-55; 6:21-24; 9:3). Yet the paragraph from Romans is not intended as a detailed teaching about creation as such, but is made to serve as a supporting illustration of Paul's main concern, the "adoption, the redemption of our body" (Rom 8:23 NRSV; see 7.2 below).

3.7.2. Philippians 3:21. In Philippians 3:20-21 we have another example of Paul's concern with the transformation of the believer's physical body into a glorious body by the power* of the resurrection. Yet at the conclusion of this couplet Paul includes a phrase which breaks out of the boundaries of the anthropological imagery and interjects a cosmic note. The resurrection is said to be the power "which enables him even to subject all things to himself." This is similar to the declaration made in 1 Corinthians 15:27 and is built upon Psalm 8:7. Once again the transformation of humankind and the subjection of the cosmos are interconnected ideas.

3.7.3. Colossians 1:15-20. The idea of Christ's role as creator is prominent within the pre-Pauline hymn* of Colossians 1:15-20. This creator motif is also balanced within the hymn by the proclamation of Christ as the agent of redemption (di' autou apokatallaxai, Col 1:20). The cosmic dimension of the redemptive action of Christ on the cross is brought out by the inclusion of ta panta ("all things") and eite ta epi tēs gēs eite ta en tois ouranois ("whether things on earth or in the heavenlies") in verse 20.

3.7.4. Ephesians 1:10. In Ephesians 1:9-10 the mystery* of God's plan of salvation is described as preplanned in Christ and revealed in the fullness of time. The author of Ephesians then includes an unusual verb (anakephalaiōsasthai) to denote the ultimate goal of this plan as it is fulfilled in Christ. This verb carries with it a strongly eschatological note, as well as a cosmological one (it is ta panta, "all things," which is said to be "summed up" in Christ).

3.8* To Telos and To Teleios. The telos word group is used quite extensively within the Pauline letters, often with an eschatological meaning which is perhaps best interpreted in straightforward temporal terms. J. M. Court contends that this is part of the technical language of apocalyptic which Paul adopts. Almost certainly a temporal sense of to telos, "finally," is intended in 1 Corinthians 15:24 where the noun is used to describe the conclusion of a sequence of eschatological events, including the Son's handing over of the kingdom to the Father (although some interpreters take to telos here as a noun). A related occurrence, again bearing a temporal sense, is 1 Corinthians 10:11 where Paul describes his Corinthian audience as those "upon whom the ends of the ages (ta telē tōn aiōnōn) have come." The noun (to telos) is also used in Romans 6:21-22 to denote the contrasting end results of sin* (death) and grace* (eternal life; see Life and Death). To telos is used by Paul to communicate the time of ultimate judgment, as in Philippians 3:9 where the enemies of the cross of Christ are declared in Philippians 3:19 to have their end (to telos) in destruction (see Wrath, Destruction). Similarly, in 2 Corinthians 11:15 the servants of Satan are also said to be heading for an appropriate end (hōn to telos estai kata ta erga autōn); and in 1 Thessalonians 2:16 the Judaizers are condemned as under judgment of the wrath of God which will come upon them "in the end" (eis telos). The term can also be used to denote the time of ultimate redemption, as in 1 Corinthians 1:8, where the Lord Jesus Christ is said to sustain the believing Christians "until the end" (heōs telous).

To telos can also carry the sense of "goal" or "destination," although it is difficult to separate this completely from the temporal sense just discussed. The most celebrated instance of this meaning is Romans 10:4 where the noun is used to describe the effect of Christ's coming upon the Jewish Law: "For Christ is the end (telos) of the Law, that every one who has faith may be justified." It may be that Paul is here reflecting the saying of Jesus recorded in Matthew 5:17, associating the end (to telos) with the idea of fulfillment of the Law* (plērōsai). A similar use of to telos is found in 1 Timothy 1:5.

The neuter form (to teleion) of the adjective teleios is used as an abstract noun in 1 Corinthians 13:10, denoting "that which is perfect or completed" and thus sets up a contrast with the future eschatological age and the present imperfect world. The adjective teleios can also take the sense of "mature" or "adult" and is so used in 1 Corinthians 2:6; 14:20; Philippians 3:15 (see Perfect, Mature). In Ephesians 4:13 and Colossians 1:28 the same term is applied anthropologically to the church and the believer respectively.

4. Pauline Eschatology and Christology.

The interface between Paul's eschatology and his christology* is extensive, particularly as it concerns the role that Jesus Christ has as the executor of God's final judgment. Although Paul does not choose to use the title Son of man (the most prevalent language in the Synoptic Gospels) to express this, he does nevertheless use equivalent ideas and images. Within the Pauline letters OT theophanic traditions about the Day of the Lord become invested with new meaning and are applied to the risen Lord Jesus Christ. This reemphasis generally builds upon a referential shift of "Lord"* from God to Jesus Christ, or on the reapplication of "Day of the Lord" passages to the messianic agent (see Kreitzer, 112-128, for a discussion of eleven key texts where this occurs).

The central feature of Paul's eschatology, the resurrection* of Jesus Christ from the dead, is indisputably a theological declaration, as can be evidenced by the ways in which God is said to be active in Christ's resurrection. At several points within the Pauline letters God the Father is explicitly said to be responsible for Jesus' resurrection (Rom 4:24; 10:9; 1 Cor 6:14; 15:15; 2 Cor 4:14; Gal 1:1; Eph 1:20; Col 2:12; 1 Thess 1:9-10); once it is the God through his Spirit who accomplishes this (Rom 8:11); once it is the "Spirit of holiness" (Rom 1:4); and once it is the "glory of the Father" which raises Jesus (Rom 6:4). Other passages simply use an impersonal verb to denote the resurrection, generally taken to be a divine passive (Rom 4:25; 7:4; 1 Cor 15:4, 12, 20; 2 Cor 5:15; 2 Tim 2:8).

Yet Paul maintains a strong note of subordination of Jesus Christ to God the Father even in the midst of the most exalted christological passages. The two most important examples are 1 Corinthians 15:28c and Philippians 2:11c, lines which round off passages containing eschatological material.

One of the most intriguing features of Paul's eschatology (which anticipates the rise of the doctrine of the Trinity in the church) is the relationship between the risen Lord Jesus and the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is described as "Christ's Spirit" (Rom 8:9; Phil 1:19) and the "Spirit of (God's) Son" (Gal 4:6). At the same time, in other passages the Holy Spirit is clearly "God's Spirit" (1 Cor 3:16; Phil 3:3; 1 Thess 4:8). The overlap between God and Christ (with reference to "the Spirit") is highlighted in 2 Corinthians 3:17, a crux interpretum which it is possible to take in either direction.

5. Pauline Eschatology and Ethics.

It is sometimes suggested that an overemphasis on eschatological matters undermines the need for a strong ethical code for living in the present (see Ethics). Contrary to many popular assumptions about the detachment alleged to be inherent within eschatological teaching, Paul's letters demonstrate a close connection between eschatology and ethical exhortation. This is evident within the earliest of his letters, those written to the church at Thessalonica where Paul confronts a misguided understanding about work which is based upon an erroneous view of the imminent return of Christ (see Kaye). Similarly, the ethical exhortations contained in Romans 12—13 are wholly conditioned by an eschatological perspective; the passage begins with an appeal that the believer not be "conformed to this world but be transformed by the renewal of your mind" (Rom 12:2), and concludes with an extended paragraph warning of the approaching day of Christ (Rom 13:11-14). The same observation can be made about 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 where the eschatological teaching about the implications of a Christian's death are interwoven with the exhortation to gain Christ's approval (1 Cor 5:9).

Indeed, it is possible to see the whole of Paul's ethical teaching as providing instruction about how the Christian is to live in the interval between the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and his future parousia. In the evocative phrase of Sampey, Paul's moral teaching involves teaching the Christian about walking "between the times."

6. Pauline Eschatology and Jewish Mysticism.

We have already mentioned the "horizontal" (or "spatial") dimension of eschatology (see 1 above). This feature of Paul's eschatological thought has received special treatment in recent years, particularly as it relates to the mystical traditions of Judaism. The so-called merkabah mysticism, influential within certain Jewish circles during the NT period, was built upon the opening vision of Ezekiel in which the prophet sees the throne chariot (merkāḇâ) of God in heaven (Ezek 1:26-27). This mystical tradition is widespread within Judaism and has produced a separate subsection of literature which offers a comparative reference point for NT studies. The critical point with reference to Paul's letters comes in the supposed relationship between the apostle's apocalyptic eschatology and his mysticism* (which manifested itself in ecstatic experiences). Some scholars have argued that the distinction between the two (apocalypticism and mysticism) is exceedingly fine, if not altogether artificial. A. F. Segal, for example, has recently argued that Jewish apocalypticism was mysticism in the way it was experienced and that it is entirely proper to speak of Paul as an apocalyptic mystagogue. Crucial to Segal's argument is the contention that in terms of religious experience there is no distinction between apocalypticism and mysticism, despite the fact that the two are clearly distinct literary genres. Several key passages from the undisputed letters are appealed to in support of such an interpretation of Paul.

6.1. 2 Corinthians 12:1-10. Most scholars rightly feel that this curious passage is reflective of Paul's own experience, although not necessarily his conversion/call on the Damascus Road (Acts 9:1-19; 22:1-21; 26:12-23). It is noted that he combines apocalyptic language with a denial of the validity of boasting (1 Cor 12:5-6) and a brief description of the tribulations he must suffer in fulfilling his role as the missionary* to the Gentiles (1 Cor 12:7-10). He does begin this section by describing his experience as a revelation (apokalypsis) from the Lord (1 Cor 12:1).

6.2. 1 Corinthians 9:1. Paul bases a defense of his apostleship (see Apostle) on the fact that he has seen (heōraka) the Lord. The verb is usually taken to mean physical sight, but it is possible to interpret it as ecstatic insight given by means of revelation (similar descriptions of "seeing" the risen Lord occur in 2 Cor 4:4-6).

6.3 Galatians 1:11-17. Here too Paul employs the language of apocalyptic literature choosing to describe his commissioning as an apostle coming to him via a revelation (apokalypsis, Gal 1:12) of Jesus Christ (see Visions). Yet this revelation is not so much a revelation to Paul, but a revelation in him (en emoi, Gal 1:16) suggesting almost an incarnational understanding of the encounter with the risen Christ (cf. Gal 2:20; 6:4). Such highly personalized language could be taken as expressing the mystical and ecstatic experience of the visionary mind (as Segal suggests). However, it is doubtful if that is the way Paul perceived his encounter with Jesus Christ; he associates his sight of the risen Lord alongside the postresurrection appearances found in early Christian tradition* (1 Cor 15:5-7), firmly basing them in objective history and not subjective imagination. His use of the aorist passive verb ōphthē supports this (1 Cor 15:5, 6, 7, 8; cf. 1 Tim 3:16).

6.4 Apocalypticism, Mysticism and Christology. That apocalypticism* and mysticism share the common ground of religious experience seems evident; there is much insight that can be gained into one aspect of Paul's eschatological thought as a result of a comparison of the two. However, too much can be made in straightforwardly equating them, not least the seeming evacuation of Paul's eschatology of any future significance. It is not only the way that the encounter of the risen Lord Jesus is communicated to Paul that is important to him; this is merely the form of the experience. Of at least equal importance is the content of that experience; who is revealed (not only how) is of crucial concern for Paul. As a result perhaps the most helpful contribution that the Jewish mystical tradition has to offer to a study of Paul's eschatology is the fact that it helps provide a context in which Pauline christology can develop. There is much to suggest that the most enduring feature arising from the overlap between apocalypticism and mysticism is the importance of the theme of revealed "glory"* (Heb kāḇôḏ) inherent within them (see Newman for a recent study of this and a critique of Segal's thesis). When applied to christological considerations this allows the shift from a theocentric to an anthropocentric fulfillment to take place. In other words, the common ground of apocalyptic and mysticism within Judaism allows Paul (and others) to see the risen Lord Jesus Christ as the agent of the fulfillment of God's eschatological purposes. The future revelation of Jesus Christ is, in Paul's words, closely connected with the manifestation of the glory of God (1 Cor 3:18; 4:4, 6).

7. Social Dynamics in Paul's Eschatological Teaching. Considerable understanding into Paul's letters has been gained in recent years by applying the insights gained through sociological approaches to the documents (see Social-Scientific Approaches). This has also held true with respect to his eschatological teaching, especially when it is used to assess what W. Meeks has described as the "millenarian beliefs" of the congregations to which Paul responds. D. W. Kuck has carried the investigation a step further, examining the place that the judgment theme has within Paul's Corinthian correspondence and making some important observations about how such a futuristic eschatology functioned socially within the congregation.

Much work is yet to be done on this issue, particularly as it will help explain how eschatological ideas influenced (and perhaps even determined) the beliefs and practices of the congregations. Recognition of the social dimension of eschatological beliefs (see Sociology; Social-Scientific Approaches) also enables us to discover the enduring relevance of Paul's teaching and begin to apply it to our own contemporary problems (as Glasswell points out). This is nowhere more acute for the contemporary situation than in the areas of human sexuality* (matters involving sexual identity and role) and creation (matters involving ecology and the created order). In both instances eschatological perspectives can dictate both the interpretations accepted for these passages and the practices adopted by the Christian church in expressing them.

7.1. Galatians 3:27-28. In recent years this has become one of the most debated passages within the whole of the Pauline corpus, largely because of the implications it has for social conventions. The pericope opens with a declaration about the believing community as having been "baptized into Christ" and having "clothed yourselves with Christ," two images which are powerful symbols of a resurrection theology in Paul. In Galatians 3:28 Paul goes on to assert that unity in Christ transcends various human barriers: ethnic (Jew/Greek), economic (slave/free) and sexual (male/female).

Many would argue that the focus of the passage is on the means of entry into the community of faith, and that there is no difference between male and female on that point. But what does the passage imply about Paul's eschatological understanding of male-female relationships? Is Paul giving a programmatic statement about how human relationships should be conducted in the present, a manifesto for social activism? Or is he caught up in the enthusiasm of the moment and providing us with a visionary's glimpse of what the future ultimately will be like when Christ comes at the parousia to bring everything to its accomplishment? If so, what impact might this have upon the way that women are often assigned lower places of value and service in modern societies? Does not Paul challenge us with, in the enticing phrase of Scroggs, "the eschatological woman," whose place in society must be reassessed if we are to remain true to Paul's eschatological vision?

The "visionary" interpretation has been pursued by many, particularly as it does not necessarily demand that equality of role between men and women in the present order is what Paul intends. On the other hand, it is difficult to restrict the force of Galatians 3:27-28 to the future and not recognize its relevance for the present (see Man and Woman). The social implications (e.g., the role and ordination of women) are wide-ranging. No doubt Galatians 3:27-28 will continue to be a major focal point for contemporary theology (see MacDonald).

7.2. Romans 8:19-23. In these few short verses we have the most extensive discussion within the Pauline corpus about the future of the created order. As we mentioned above (see 3.7), the primary focus of the passage is to illustrate God's ultimate redemption of his children (Rom 8:23). Nevertheless, there clearly is an indication of God's concern for the created order (see Creation and New Creation), despite the fact that it has been tainted and suffers under the effects of Adam's disobedience (Gen 3 underlies the whole passage). God's concern that creation itself is worthy of being transformed and set free should inform our own attitudes toward it. Thus it is possible to integrate fully a protectionist stance toward creation and the environment within Paul's eschatological perspective. Indeed, it could be argued that to do so is to demonstrate our continuing revelation as the children of God (Rom 8:19).

In conclusion, it is clear that Paul's thought is thoroughly conditioned by an eschatological perspective in which Jesus Christ's death and resurrection are seen in some way to inaugurate the long-awaited age to come. Virtually every letter within the Pauline corpus reflects, to a greater or lesser degree, this eschatological viewpoint. Many of the key areas of Pauline teaching, such as ethics, christology and ecclesiology, share as common ground this eschatological perspective. All of this helps to make Pauline eschatology one of the main arenas of modern scholarly debate.

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; APOCALYPTICISM; CHRISTOLOGY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; ETHICS; EXALTATION AND ENTHRONEMENT; FIRSTFRUITS, DOWN PAYMENT; GENTILES; GLORY, GLORIFICATION; HEAVEN, HEAVENLIES, PARADISE; HOLY SPIRIT; HOPE; IMMORTALITY; INTERMEDIATE STATE; ISRAEL; JUDGMENT; JUSTIFICATION; KINGDOM OF GOD/CHRIST; LIFE AND DEATH; MAN OF LAWLESSNESS AND RESTRAINING POWER; MYSTERY; MYSTICISM; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; RESURRECTION; REWARDS; SALVATION; TRIUMPH; UNIVERSALISM; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. J. Achtemeier, "An Apocalyptic Shift in Early Christian Tradition: Reflections on Some Canonical Evidence," CBQ 45 (1983) 231-48; D. C. Allison, The End of the Ages Has Come (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); D. E. Aune, "(Early Christian) Eschatology," ABD II.594-609; idem, "The Significance of the Delay of the Parousia for Early Christianity," in Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation, ed. G. F. Hawthorne (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975) 87-109; R. D. Aus, "God's Plan and God's Power: Isaiah 66 and the Restraining Factors of 2 Thess. 2.6-7," JBL 96 (1977) 537-53; W. Baird, "Pauline Eschatology in Hermeneutical Perspective," NTS 17 (1970-71) 314-27; M. Barker, "Slippery Words: Apocalyptic," ExpT 89 (1977-78) 324-29; R. J. Bauckham, "The Delay of the Parousia," TynB 31 (1980) 3-36; J. C. Beker, Heirs of Paul: Paul's Legacy in the New Testament and in the Church Today (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); idem, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980, 2d ed. 1984); idem, Paul's Apocalyptic Gospel: The Coming Triumph of God (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); idem, "Recasting Pauline Theology: The Coherence-Contingency Scheme as Interpretative Model," in Pauline Theology. Volume I: Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. M. Bassler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 15-24; idem, The Triumph of God: The Essence of Paul's Thought (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); M. C. de Boer, The Defeat of Death (JSNTS 22; Sheffield: Academic, 1988); idem, "Paul and Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology," in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards (JSNTS 24; Sheffield: Academic, 1989) 169-90; G. Bornkamm, Paul (New York: Harper & Row, 1969); V. P. Branick, "Apocalyptic Paul?," CBQ 47 (1985) 664-75; F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977) 300-13; G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980) 201-71; W. Carr, Angels and Principalities (SNTSMS 42; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); J. J. Collins, ed., Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre. Semeia 14 (Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1979); J. M. Court, "Paul and the Apocalyptic Pattern," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 57-66; O. Cullmann, "Le caractère eschatologique du devoir missionnaire et de la conscience apostolique de saint Paul. Étude sur le κατέχον (-ων) de 2 Thess. 2:6-7," RHPR 16 (1936) 210-45; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. W. Drane, "Theological Diversity in the Letters of St. Paul, TynB 27 (1976) 3-26; E. E. Ellis, "II Corinthians V.1-10 in Pauline Eschatology," NTS 6 (1959-60) 211-24; A. J. Everson, "Day of the Lord," IDBSup 209-10; J. G. Gibbs, Creation and Redemption: A Study in Paul's Theology (NovTSup 26; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); J. Gillmann, "A Thematic Comparison: 1 Cor 15:50-57 and 2 Cor 5:1-5," JBL 107 (1988) 439-54; M. E. Glasswell, "Some Issues of Church and Society in the Light of Paul's Eschatology," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 310-19; M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal: The Relation Between Resurrection and Immortality in New Testament Teaching (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); J. C. Hurd, The Origin of 1 Corinthians (2d ed.; Macon, GA: Mercer, 1983); E. Käsemann, "The Beginnings of Christian Theology," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 82-107; idem, "On the Subject of Primitive Christian Apocalyptic," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 108-37; B. N. Kaye, "Eschatology and Ethics in 1 and 2 Thessalonians," NovT 17 (1975) 47-57; L. Keck, "Paul and Apocalyptic Theology," Int 38 (1984) 229-41; S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); B. Klappert, "King, Kingdom," NIDNTT 2.372-90; A. J. F. Klijn, "1 Thessalonians 4.13-18 and Its Background in Apocalyptic Literature," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 67-73; L. J. Kreitzer, Jesus and God in Paul's Eschatology (JSNTS 19; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); D. W. Kuck, Judgment and Community Conflict: Paul's Use of Apocalyptic Judgment Language in 1 Corinthians 3:5—4:5 (NovTSup 66; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); J. R. Levison, "2 Apoc. Bar. 48:42-52:7 and the

Apocalyptic Dimension of Colossians 3:1-6," JBL 108 (1989) 93-108; A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); D. R. MacDonald, There is No Male and Female (HDR 20; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); I. H. Marshall, "Slippery Words: Eschatology," ExpT 89 (1977-78) 264-69; idem, "Is Apocalyptic the Mother of Christian Theology?" in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 33-42; R. P. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); J. L. Martyn, "Apocalyptic Antinomies in the Letter to the Galatians," NTS 31 (1985) 410-24; C. L. Mearns, "Early Eschatological Development in Paul: The Evidence of I and II Thessalonians," NTS 27 (1981) 137-57; W. A. Meeks, "Social Functions of Apocalyptic Language in Pauline Christianity," in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983) 687-705; J. Moiser, "A Reassessment of Paul's View of Marriage With Reference to 1 Cor. 7," JSNT 18 (1983) 103-22; C. F. D. Moule, "The Influence of Circumstances on the Use of Eschatological Terms," JTS 15 (1964) 1-15; R. H. Mounce, "Pauline Eschatology and the Apocalypse," EvQ 46 (1974) 164-66; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1977); C. C. Newman, Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); idem, "Transforming Images of Paul: A Review Essay of Alan Segal, Paul the Convert," EvQ 64 (1992) 61-74; H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); C. C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); J. P. Sampey, Walking Between the Times (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1991); R. Schippers, "Goal, Last, End, Near, Complete," NIDNTT 2.52-66; H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (London: Adam & Charles Black, 1931); R. Scroggs, The Last Adam (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1966); idem, "Paul and the Eschatological Woman," JAAR 40 (1972) 283-303; A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert (New Haven: Yale University, 1990); R. E. Sturm, "Defining the Word 'Apocalyptic': A Problem in Biblical Criticism," in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards (JSNTS 19; Sheffield: Academic, 1989) 17-48; A. C. Thistleton, "Realised Eschatology at Corinth," NTS 24 (1978) 510-24; S. H. Travis, Christ and the Judgment of God (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1987): 31-124; G. Vos, The Pauline Eschatology (Princeton: University Press, 1930); A. J. M. Wedderburn, "The Problem of the Denial of Resurrection in 1 Corinthians XV," NovT 23 (1981) 229-41; D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St. Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1966); W. Wink, Naming the Powers (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); idem, Unmasking the Powers (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); B. Witherington, Jesus, Paul and the End of the World (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1992); N. T. Wright, "Putting Paul Together Again," in Pauline Theology. Volume I: Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. M. Bassler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 183-211.

L. J. Kreitzer

ETERNAL LIFE. See ESCHATOLOGY; IMMORTALITY; LIFE AND DEATH; RESURRECTION.

ETHICS

Paul demonstrated the personal character integral to the new life created by faith* in Jesus Christ as well as the obligations for personal, family, church and social relationships. The radical implications of this new creation* soon to be fully manifest at the Parousia were related to the realities of the continuing present age. The ethical struggle had become universal. The contexts for such teachings were particular situations in his churches, but the "ways in Christ Jesus" apply to all the churches (1 Cor 4:17) and general topics are introduced. Not all admonitions have the same weight, nor does Paul attempt to be comprehensive.

1. The Basis of Ethics in Grace
2. An Ethic of Love
3. The Actor and Thinker
4. The Eschatological Challenge
5. The Tension between the New and the Old
6. Universalizing the Moral Conflict

1. The Basis of Ethics in Grace.

1.1. A New Reality. God's* saving act in Christ's death* and resurrection* is the ground of ethical appeal for Paul. "The old yeast" of vice must be cleaned out "in order that you may be a fresh batch just as you are, without fermentation, because Christ our Paschal Lamb was sacrificed" (1 Cor 5:7). Ethical behavior is to correspond to what God has enabled them to be through Christ's sacrifice.* This ethical appeal has been called the "indicative and imperative" (Bultmann; cf. Gal 5:1, 25), that is, "become in your character and conduct what God's action in Christ has made you to be."

The imperative is not a secondary application of the gospel designed for the spiritually immature. Betz suggests that in Paul's early letters, as in 1 Thessalonians, ethics was a means of preserving the present state of holiness up to the day of judgment* (cf. 1 Thess 5:23). Certainly by the time of Paul's writing Romans the connection of the imperative to the indicative clearly had become implicit. God's claims upon our obedience is "a constitutive part of God's gift" (Furnish). In Romans 6 union with Christ (Rom 6:2-11) compels behavior which is consistent with it (Rom 6:12-23). Even in the section of instruction the indicative breaks through (Rom 6:13). In Philippians, where Paul is confronting rancor by an appeal to Christ's humility and exaltation* (Phil 2:6-11), he does not urge a self-conscious imitation* of Christ, representing a moral ideal. He invokes participation in the ethos of the drama of salvation* which is at the basis of their being as believers (Phil 2:5 may be so understood, but this is the occasion of recent debate; see Imitation; Hymns).

God's power* and sovereignty accordingly dominate ethics. Righteousness* does not make its appearance as the consequence of a life lived for God, except marginally, as in Galatians 5:5. It is the presupposition, as a gift in salvation.

God's grace* empowers the new being created in salvation. "Grace reigns through righteousness for eternal life" (Rom 5:21). God works through the will and actions of believers for God's own purpose (Phil 2:12-13). God's gift creates the integral response of a whole person, whose conduct (Gal 6:4) and fruit* (Gal 5:22) are described in the singular.

1.2. Grace Corresponding to Grace. God's grace is a power within the believers reproducing its own character. The letter to the Ephesians admonishes them to be imitators of God and "gracious to each other just as God in Christ was gracious" to them (Eph 4:32). Their conduct is to be loving because its foundation is the love* expressed in Christ's sacrifice (Eph 4:32—5:2). Paul expresses the relationship organically: since the indicative is union with Christ in baptism, they are bidden to live the life of the risen Christ himself (Rom 6:5-12).

The immeasurable inequality between the recipients of Christ's gift and Christ, who sacrificially gave himself for them, should make the believers gracious to those who are poor. In motivating the church of Corinth to give to the poor Christians in Jerusalem, Paul reminds them that Christ in grace became poor for them although he was rich (2 Cor 8:9). A genuine love will be demonstrated in care for the poor (2 Cor 8:8). 2 Corinthians 8—9 is filled with such correspondence between God's grace and the believers' generosity in contributing to the poor (see Riches and Poverty). God is the actor. Giving to the poor is prompted by God's grace (2 Cor 8:6-7), which enables believers to give even beyond their ability (2 Cor 8:1-4). God's abundant grace provides ample means for every good action; the poor will thank God for the surpassing grace in the givers (2 Cor 9:8, 13-14). The distribution to the poor is a harvest of the seed provided by God; God's grace flowing through them is manifested in the form of justice (2 Cor 9:9-10).

The arrangement which Paul seeks among the Christians in response to God's grace is one of equality (isotēs, 2 Cor 8:13-14). In Hellenistic Judaism the ideal government would distribute for "the necessary needs" of life so that there would be no "excess for luxury" nor lack (Philo Jos. 243; cf. 2 Cor 8:15). That the recipients are the poor and that this standard of justice is applied reveals elements of a social ethic. These two chapters, however, have frequently been neglected in treatments of Paul's ethics. One factor is the interpretation that Paul's concern is missionary diplomacy, validating his mission* by an offering from the Gentiles to the Judean church (see Collection). The logic within these chapters, however, is the social requirements of grace. This applies also to the view that "the poor" (Rom 15:26; Gal 2:10) was a title of the Jerusalem Christians, denoting their piety, not their economic need. Evidence is lacking, however, for such a technical use of the term by Christians at the date of Paul's writing.

1.3. Social Ethic as well as Community Ethic. A further reason for the neglect of 2 Corinthians 8—9 is the view that not only here, but also in general, Paul's social concern is limited to the church; thus his ethic of sharing is a community ethic, not a social ethic. The collection was directed to the poor of the saints (2 Cor 8:4; Rom 15:26). The givers indeed will be praised for "their liberality of sharing to them and to all" (2 Cor 9:13; cf. Gal 6:10). Does this broader designation denote needy people in general, or only the needy among all Christians (not merely those in Judea)?

Indication of a more universal reference is found in other texts which apply to non-believers. In Galatians 6:10 (in a passage which may also relate to the collection for Jerusalem [cf. Gal 6:6; Rom 15:27; but in contrast 1 Cor 9:10-11]), Paul concludes his discussion of giving with the an admonition, "Do good to all people (pros pantas), but especially to the household* of faith." "Doing good" (ergazesthai to agathon) is terminology for kindly concrete acts of helping others. The first part of the phrase is the general principle, followed by the specific application to the church. Some have argued, however, that malista de ("but especially") should be translated with the rare rendering, "that is." The few examples of this usage that have been discovered are ambiguous, however, and differ significantly in form and context (also cf. 2 Cor 1:12).

Loving service to needy non-believers is also evident in Romans 12:13-14. Paul enjoins hospitality in its literal sense of love for or care of strangers (philoxenia), here meaning non-believers since it contrasts the immediately preceding injunction of sharing with fellow Christians ("saints") and the following stipulation of love to one's enemies.* (The last connection is reinforced by the repetition of the verb diōkō: pursue (diōkontes) hospitality and bless persecutors (diōkontas). Eusebius describes Polycarp as showing hospitality to his persecutors (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.15.14). Since Paul does enjoin loving care to non-believers, the more ambiguous references of doing concrete acts of good "for each other and for all" (1 Thess 3:12; 5:15 [v. 15a would strengthen universality]; cf. 2 Cor 9:13) can be understood as pointing beyond and outside the church (cf. Phil 4:5; 2 Tim 2:24; Tit 3:2, 8).

2. An Ethic of Love.

Love is the specific pattern of life by which grace forms the new reality of the believer. The supernatural infusion of love through the Holy Spirit* produces the character upon which eschatological hope about the final judgment* of God is built (Rom 5:3-5). Love is the first fruit* of the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:22).

The most significant question in current scholarship pertinent to Pauline ethics is the place of the Law.* In Galatians 3—5 Paul presents the Law as a slave in sharp contrast to faith as a free woman. The Law also was a slave attendant when we were schoolchildren, having custody over us until we came to maturity with faith. Now we are set free. Love gives full expression to the Law (Gal 5:14) as we bear each other's burdens and thus fulfill the law of Christ (Gal 6:2; cf. "law of faith" in Rom 3:27; see Law of Christ). Some would suggest that the Law is no longer pertinent as a moral authority.* The believer has been freed to consider all kinds of ethical traditions, sifting them by the law of faith* and love.*

Others have argued effectively, however, that what is at stake in Paul's negative treatment of the Law is not the question of the source of moral authority, but that of the grounds of membership in God's community. The parallelism in Galatians 3:24-25 indicates that not being under the slave attendant (the Law) is equivalent to being justified* by faith (cf. Rom 6:14). Those who feel compelled to be circumcised* in order to enter community membership are attempting to be justified by the Law (Gal 5:4; cf. 2:16, 21; 3:11), which is what being "under the Law" means. The question of the remaining moral authority of the Law is left open.

When love is actualized, the other demands of God are fulfilled. Freedom* in Christ is not an opportunity for selfishness, but compels us to be slaves to one other in love (Gal 5:13-14; 1 Cor 9:19). The fulfillment of the Law then is not its termination but the full expression of its principles, purpose and motivation. Good and evil are determinate realities established and revealed by God, rather than, in terms of content, subjectively grounded in the relationship to God by faith. Loving one's neighbor as oneself (Lev 19:18) fulfills the second half of the Decalogue and "any other commandment" (Rom 13:8-10).

Love thus is not a replacement of the Law, but a new motivation, understanding and power for meeting and surpassing its moral demands. The combination is crucial. Obedient deeds of great justice and self-sacrifice which lack the motivation and attitude of love are empty (1 Cor 13:3; cf. Ps 112:9 LXX). The Law was good but weak in the face of the power of sin* (Rom 7:11-17; 2 Cor 3). The Spirit of God sets us free from condemnation, which comes from the weakness of the Law as the result of sin. God's purpose at the same time is that the just requirement of the Law might be fulfilled by those empowered and guided by the Spirit (Rom 8:2-4, 9). The just requirement of the Law, which is in tune with love, remains as a standard of righteous living (cf. also 2 Tim 3:16). It provides a pattern, warning, instruction and exhortation, including matters as specific as sexual* immorality and remuneration of leaders (1 Cor 9:10; 10:6-11; see Financial Support). The law of Christ is the criterion of love which fulfills the Law as it makes that obedience possible. For example, the obligation in the Law of responsibility to the poor is carried out through the grace of God flowing through the believer (2 Cor 9:9-10).

3. The Actor and Thinker.

For Paul the human being is created as a member of the material world and as a member of society. Paul uses *body (sōma) to refer to the person in relationship with his or her environment. As body, one is part of the world and communicates with the world. *Flesh (sarx), when used neutrally, describes human beings in relationship and solidarity with others (e.g., Philem 16). Negatively, flesh represents the sphere of worldliness in which the individuals share and from which they draw their values and goals (e.g., Rom 7:5). It does not refer to an inferior, material part of the individual. The promise that God "will give life also to your mortal bodies" (thnēta sōmata, Rom 8:11; cf. 1 Cor 15:42-44, 53-54) reflects the value placed by Paul upon the body. He thus reinforces the continuity of existence before and after redemption, as well as the individual's relationship to the surrounding world.

In salvation people are called into a new community, which is a new realm of social existence which God is calling forth, a believing and obedient human community founded in God's love and grace (see Church). Community needs are given priority even when they conflict with personal rights and privileges (1 Cor 10:23-24). Love toward those whose conscience remains uninformed restricts freedom in dietary and ceremonial matters that are ethically adiaphora (i.e., "matters of relative indifference"; Rom 14; 1 Cor 8, 10). In such matters Paul gives individuals considerable leeway, and in the pursuit of the good of others seeking one's own good is not excluded (Phil 2:4 [note kai, "also," though the word is textually uncertain]).

For Paul the renewed mind has a critical role in discerning good (Rom 12:2; Phil 1:9-10; 1 Thess 5:21) in conjunction with the instruction of Scripture and common moral traditions. Christ and Paul (who himself emulates Christ) provide patterns for this way of life (1 Cor 11:1; cf. Rom 15:5; see Imitation).

Considerable attention has been given recently to the Pauline use of precepts from Hellenistic moral philosophy, such as the lists of virtues* and vices. In Titus 2:12 the state to which people are brought in conversion is described by the Greek cardinal virtues. Vices define outer boundaries of behavior which are beyond dispute. Some would suggest that the Pauline ethic is distinct only in its christological motivation and empowerment.

Paul's attitude toward non-Christians provides support for that usage even if much of it was through the mediation of Hellenistic Judaism. As illustrated in Romans 1, Paul indeed is highly critical of Gentile morality. His relating morality to nature (physis, Rom 1:26; 2:14; ta kathēkonta, "what is fitting," the Stoic term for what nature teaches, Rom 1:28), however, illustrates his agreement with Hellenistic Judaism that there is an affinity between the morality in God's revealed Law and that disclosed in the created order, which God's people share with the Gentiles. Even in Romans 1 the moral problem for Paul is rooted not in the error of judgment but in a refusal of obedience.

Correspondingly, Paul recognizes knowledge of genuine values by secular people. His followers are to take into consideration "that which is morally good in the judgment of all people" (Rom 12:17; cf. 2 Cor 8:21). They are to conduct themselves becomingly (euschēmonōs) with outsiders (1 Thess 4:12; Rom 13:13). The term implies a common standard of what is decent, and traditional elements of morality are cited in both passages. Paul also conducted himself in a way which would commend him to every human conscience* (2 Cor 4:2; cf. Tit 2:5, 8-10).

4. The Eschatological Challenge.

Christ is King. God has exalted him. Not every knee, however, has yet bowed to him (Phil 2:9-11). The present time for Paul is situated between the initial triumph* of Christ over the powers hostile to God and Christ's securing from them full and final obedience and submission. At the Parousia every power in opposition to the will of God will be destroyed (1 Cor 15:24-26). Even the last of these, death, is already in process of being destroyed (katargeitai, present indicative, 1 Cor 15:26; though some commentators would maintain that the present tense refers to what takes place at the eschaton, v. 24). At present, life is a battlefield of the divine and the demonic.*

There is a divine purpose in history: "that God may be everything in everything" (1 Cor 15:28), the total sovereignty of God over all things (cf. Col 1:20; Eph 1:10). In the end the whole created world with its people, supernatural powers, natural forces and institutions will be conformed to the will of God. The purpose of the life in faith is the glorification of God (Rom 15:5-6).

In this ultimate purpose we have solidarity with the rest of the material world. The fallen creation retains within it a redemptive purpose. It will be set free from corruption at the time when believers' mortal bodies are redeemed from their temporality and weakness* (Rom 8:18-23). The material world thus gains significance. A privatized sphere of salvation is not partitioned off from the rest of creation. In Ephesians and Colossians the church as the body of Christ contributes to the cosmic reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation) of all things to God (Eph 1:22-23). Within it the hostility between Jew and Gentile is overcome (Eph 2:11-22). The church exposes the works of darkness through the word of God and deeds of goodness, justice and truth* (Eph 2:10; 5:8-11; 6:10-17; cf. Col 1:6, 10).

Paul's ethics are strongly influenced by the tension implicit in the belief that the coming new age is present already (Rom 13:11-12), yet only partially. The expectation creates moral seriousness (Rom 13:13-14). The eschatological teaching of 1 Thessalonians 4:13—5:11 is placed in the middle of the ethical sections of the letter so that 1 Thessalonians 5:12 smoothly resumes the thought of 1 Thessalonians 4:12. The eschatological reserve means that while voicing a powerful expression of Christian freedom (1 Cor 3:21-22), Paul also warns that the eschatological time is not yet: Judge not before the final judgment (1 Cor 4:5).

5. The Tension between the New and the Old.
A tension occurs in Paul's teaching. On the one hand he opens up radically new social relationships. In the new Christian existence there is neither male nor female, bond nor free. On the other hand Paul upholds responsibilities for the social institutions which continue. The household* codes enjoin subordination. The overall evaluation of Paul's teaching must keep both elements together.

5.1. The New Reality. The coming of the Spirit in conversion has conspicuous ethical and social consequences in the love, joy, kindness and self-control that it imparts (Gal 5:22-23). Colossians* presents the abolishing of false distinctions among human beings as a renewal of the situation at the creation (see Creation and New Creation). This new nature "is being renewed in knowledge according to the image* of its Creator" (Col 3:10). Redemption in Christ restores human relationships to creation as God intended it (see Adam and Christ).

When a person joins Christ in conversion, "there is a new creation" (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15). One then no longer views other people according to worldly standards but as those for whom Christ has died (2 Cor 5:15-16). The old external distinctions of superior status related to nationality or slavery* cease to exist (Col 3:9-11; cf. Eph 2:14-16). By thus "putting on Christ," "there is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither slave nor free; there is neither male nor female" (Gal 3:27-28). For Paul this equality is based on the direct access every individual has to God (Rom 10:11-12) and the need of all for redemption* (Rom 3:22-24). Each believer is distinctly marked, possessing gifts which differ in function. The gifts are equal in dignity, however, because they derive from the common Spirit (1 Cor 12:4-13).

Some have argued that the canceling of status distinctions relates only to the religious situation of grounds for justification before God. This concern provides the context of Galatians 3:28, for example. Colossians, however, draws direct consequences for human relationships from the abolishing of status distinctions (Col 3:11). "Therefore . . . put on a merciful heart, kindness, humility, patience, bearing with one another and forgiving each other; . . . and in addition to all of these put on love, which is the bond of completeness" (Col 3:12-16).

Paul does radically challenge religious privilege. Through faith in Christ all have access to God, are heirs of Abraham* and are therefore one (Gal 3:26-29). In Ephesians the terminology of the foreigner is used to describe the negative status which is overcome in the new unity in Christ of Jew and Gentile* (Eph 2:11-22). The challenge of religious status is socially significant, however. Religion had been the central status distinction in the social system so that when this distinction falls, other distinctions follow.

5.2. Responsible Conduct While the Old Remains. Paul also enjoins conduct which is much less challenging of the present. He recognizes the continuation of institutional relationships which are less than ideal but which serve to keep a check on sin. Daube argues that Paul's qualification, "I say this as a concession, not as a command" (1 Cor 7:6), is technical language known from concessions to sinfulness in the Jewish background. Thus a more accommodating ethic controls behavior in areas not yet transformed by the higher command. Some suggest that the primary motivation is to protect the reputation and thus the mission of the church (cf. 1 Cor 9:19-23; 1 Tim 2:1-7; 6:1).

In what has been called a "Christian patriarchism," the ongoing unequal relationships of life are not directly challenged. The "Christian" qualification, however, denotes that these instructions (see Households, Household Codes) are framed by the lordship of Christ (e.g., Col 3:17). This stipulation poses opportunity for the application of love, which modifies the tradition significantly. Superiors themselves are required to reciprocate with a care for those who for the time being are in a subordinate position. These subordinate persons have already been told to obey their superiors lovingly. Husbands now are admonished, not to rule their wives, but to love them with a selfless love (Eph 5:25; cf. 5:21). The rights of the husbands are not mentioned; instead the husbands have special obligations (see Man and Woman).

Elements of Paul's own message of freedom were exploited by his opponents.* In 1 Corinthians spiritual enthusiasts claimed to possess already full eschatological privileges. Even now they reigned as kings (1 Cor 4:8). Claiming mystical powers in a spiritual resurrection from the dead (1 Cor 15:12), they were convinced of their freedom and power in the Spirit. Their spiritual achievement could allow either antinomianism (1 Cor 5:1) or asceticism. Urging celibacy, they counseled the married to refrain from sexual intercourse (1 Cor 7:3) or to separate (1 Cor 7:10), especially from a non-Christian spouse (1 Cor 7:12), and the unmarried to remain so (1 Cor 7:8). In view of the end time, Paul does not fully disagree with the avoidance of marriage,* yet he counsels responsibility to the mutual obligations of marriage and the claims of sexual* ethics.

To slaves, who are prompted by these opponents to achieve a higher spiritual status through manumission, Paul's response is that neither slavery* nor man-umission gives superior spiritual status. Slavery is not a disadvantage in relationship before God (1 Cor 7:21-24). The governing principle instead is to live according to the will of God in one's various relationships (Bartchy).

In the household code of Ephesians 5:21—6:9, the mutuality demanded of the masters is grounded in both master and slave having the same Master in heaven (Eph 6:9). The masters are to carry out "the same things" for the slaves that the slaves had been told to do (Eph 6:9): obedience (Eph 6:5) and service (Eph 6:7). (In the household code of Colossians 3:18—4:1 they are to "grant the slaves what is required by justice and equality [isotēs]," Col 4:1.) Slavery similarly is ultimately undercut in Philemon,* where Paul requests that Onesimus be received back, not only as a brother in Christ, but as a brother in social relationships (sarx, "flesh") and as a partner (Philem 16-17).

In 2 Thessalonians social responsibility means supporting oneself by working (2 Thess 3:10). Some interpret the teaching as common morality used to address a typical situation of human frailty. The passage is opened up more fully, however, by seeing eschatological enthusiasm as the motivation leading some Thessalonians to eschew labor; scholars differ, however, as to whether the excitement is over the imminence of Christ's coming or a realized eschatology* (see Thessalonians). The result in either case is abandoning labor as no longer necessary or required. There may be a link with a radical interpretation of Jesus' teaching about anxiety about material necessities (such as may have been associated with the so-called Q source of Synoptic criticism). In this teaching they found the restoration of the Edenic situation of dependence upon God's sustenance apart from labor.

The Pauline response is to describe this group as acting "in a manner which shirks responsibility" (ataktōs, 2 Thess 3:6, 11). Paul's injunction of labor shows that eschatological newness must be qualified by the concession of ongoing organizational principles required by necessities of the created world. The reply to the enthusiasts' rejection of civil authority* had also been a call to order (hypotassō, Rom 13:1, 5; cf. 1 Pet 2:13).

This concession, however, is not a retreat to a bourgeois ethic, which Dibelius saw developed not only here but particularly in the Pastoral letters. Instead a higher level of fulfillment of the new order is achieved by the concession. Concerns for mission (2 Thess 3:7-9; cf. 1 Thess 2:9; 4:11-12) and mutual love prevail. Love provides the context in which the Thessalonian believers are to work with their own hands (1 Thess 4:9, 11; 2 Thess 3:12).

In the Pauline church mutual love in labor is to be expressed not only in providing for one's own needs, but also in working in order to share with those with basic needs (Eph 4:28). Acts 20:34-35 ties these elements together. The standard for possessions is to be sufficiency (1 Tim 6:8). Riches* are not owed to the rich and are futile (1 Tim 6:7). They also are a danger to faith itself (1 Tim 6:9-10). Paul desired that his followers have a devotion to Christ freed from anxiety, which came from being tied more than necessary to the fallen social order, which is passing away (1 Cor 7:32-35). Economic relationships with the social order cannot be avoided, but they should not be overused. Purchases will have to be made but without retaining more than is needed (1 Cor 7:30-31).

6. Universalizing the Moral Conflict.

Evil exists in the order of society (kosmos, "world"*) and exerts an influence upon the individual (Eph 2:1; cf. Rom 12:2, with aiōn). This evil order is comprehensive in society, including necessary economic relationships (1 Cor 7:31), social stratification (1 Cor 1:27-28), status distinctions based on religion (Gal 6:14-15) and its own wisdom* (1 Cor 1:20).

The universal dimensions of evil are even clearer in view of the fallen angelic powers which, particularly in the later Pauline letters, are perceived to control the social order (see Principalities and Powers). Individual sins are patterned not only by the social order but also by "the ruler of the domain of the air" (Eph 2:2; see Satan, Devil). "Our battle is not with flesh and blood, but with the rulers, the authorities, the rulers of this [world's] order of darkness" (Eph 6:12). The background for these supernatural "principalities and powers" (cf. 1 Enoch 61:10; 2 Enoch 20:1) is to be found in the universal care of angels* over the creation (Deut 32:8; 2 Enoch 19:2-5; Jub. 4:15) who are now fallen. Understanding the powers as angels in Pauline thought (cf. Rom 8:38-39; cf. 1 Pet 3:22) is more satisfactory than the position that Paul has demythologized them as dominating principles of existence.

The Pauline understanding of structural evil gives a societal, cosmic and universal dimension to evil. Oppressive forces are not confined to particular communities. They belong to the structure of human community as a whole. The struggle against evil, grounded in Christ's conquest of these powers (Col 2:15; cf. 1:13-16), then deals with factors in the very fiber of social existence. Despite this conquest, for Paul the victory will not be completed by Christ until the end of history (1 Cor 15:24). In Ephesians the church is pivotal in the struggle against the powers of evil (Eph 3:10; 5:11).

The fallen aspect of the social order, and the control of the fallen angelic lieutenants, is not total, however. Earthly authorities are appointed by God and serve God, and this perception still guides normative behavior (Rom 13:1, 4).

Despite the influence of Hellenistic moral philosophy, Paul's view of the cosmos and history give a different cast to his ethical perspective. On one hand for Paul evil deeply penetrates the created order; on the other hand he anticipates final victory based on the present redemptive work of Christ.

At the very basis of Christian faith lies a disruptive claim which throws into disarray the sentiments upon which institutions of social and political life are founded. Not only is the righteousness* of God announced as separate from a standing based on performance of the Law; the resurrection of the crucified Jesus vindicates and exalts as Lord one who was cursed* according to the Law (Rom 1:4; Gal 3:13). The ruler of the world joins company with those in rebellion against that very ruler (Rom 5:6-8; see Georgi).

See also CIVIL AUTHORITY; CONSCIENCE; FREEDOM; HOMOSEXUALITY; HOUSEHOLDS, HOUSEHOLD CODES; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; LAW; LAW OF CHRIST; LOVE; MAN AND WOMAN; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE; RICHES AND POVERTY; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS; STRONG AND WEAK; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. G. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); S. Bartchy, Mallon Chrēsai: First Century Slavery and the Interpretation of 1 Corinthians 7:21 (SBLDS 11; Missoula: Scholars, 1973); M. Barth, "Jews and Gentiles," JES 5 (1968) 241-67; H. D. Betz, "The Foundations of Christian Ethics According to Romans 12:1-2," in Witness and Existence, ed. P. Devenish and G. Goodwin (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1989) 55-72; R. Bultmann, "The Problem of Ethics in the Writings of Paul," in The Old and New Man (Richmond: Knox, 1967 [1924]) 7-32; D. Daube, "Concessions to Sinfulness in Jewish Law," JJS 10 (1959) 1-13; V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); D. Georgi, Theocracy in Paul's Praxis and Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); L. Keck, "Justification of the Ungodly and Ethics," in Rechtfertigung, ed. J. Friedrich et al. (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1976) 199-209; J. Kilner, "A Pauline Approach to Ethical Decision-Making," Int 43 (1989) 366-79; E. Lohse, Theological Ethics of the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); R. N. Longenecker, New Testament Social Ethics for Today (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); S. Rostagno, "The Bible: Is an Interclass Reading Legitimate?" in The Bible and Liberation, ed. N. Gottwald (2d ed.; Maryknoll: Orbis, 1983) 61-73; J. P. Sampley, Walking Between the Times (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); W. Schrage, The Ethics of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); B. M. Styler, "The Basis of Obligation in Paul's Christology and Ethics," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament, ed. B. Lindars and S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 175-87; P. Towner, The Goal of Our Instruction: The Structure of Theology and Ethics in the Pastoral Epistles (JSNTSup 34; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989).

S. C. Mott

EUCHARIST. See LORD'S SUPPER.

EVANGELISM. See APOSTLE; MINISTRY; MISSION; PREACHING, KERYGMA.

EVE. See ADAM AND CHRIST; MAN AND WOMAN.

EXALTATION AND ENTHRONEMENT

The exaltation of Jesus Christ and his enthronement at the right hand of God is a significant theme in Pauline christology. They are not merely a part of that christology but form the essential core which gives significance to everything else. It is the exaltation which reveals the true identity of Jesus, gives ultimate significance to his life and death, and provides the basis for the Christian hope. Paul's own experience of the exalted Christ, his understanding of the elements comprising that exaltation, and his identification of Jesus as Lord have profound implications not only for a full understanding of the person and work of Jesus but also for the present experience and ultimate destiny of the believer.

1. Paul and the Exalted Christ
2. Aspects of Exaltation
3. Exaltation and the Lordship of Christ
4. Implications

1. Paul and the Exalted Christ.

1.1. Paul's Experience. At the heart of Paul's christology,* as represented by his letters, is the exalted Christ. The great majority of references to Christ in Paul concern the exalted one. This is due to the fact that Paul's experience of Jesus Christ, and that of those to whom he wrote, was almost certainly only of the risen and exalted Christ. While it cannot be demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt that Paul never saw or heard Jesus during his ministry (that Paul was brought up and educated in Jerusalem has been argued by W. C. van Unnik), it still seems most probable that this was the case, and that Paul's first encounter with Jesus Christ was the overwhelming and transforming experience on the Damascus Road recorded three times in Acts (Acts 9, 22 and 26) and referred to by Paul himself in 1 Corinthians 9:1, 15:8 (see Conversion and Call).

This encounter with the exalted Lord* formed the dynamic center of his understanding, the starting point of his christology (cf. Kim). Whereas for the original disciples the wonder was that the Jesus whose earthly life they had shared and whose death* they had witnessed had been exalted to lordship, for Paul the amazing thing was that the one to whom had been given the name which is above every name, the preexistent* Son* and now the Lord of glory,* should humble himself by taking human flesh and submitting to death (1 Cor 2:8; Phil 2:6-11). For Paul and those to whom he wrote, the Jesus in whom they trusted, whom they worshipped* and above all whom they experienced, was the exalted Lord.

1.2. Earthly Jesus and Exalted Christ. However, this should not be taken to mean that Paul had little or no interest in, or knowledge about, the historical Jesus (see Jesus and Paul). The lack of reference to the historical Jesus has often been exaggerated. Paul shows himself aware of the birth of Jesus and his descent from both Abraham* and David (Rom 1:3; Gal 3:16; 4:4); he knows of the betrayal of Jesus on the night on which he also instituted a fellowship meal (1 Cor 11:23-25); the crucifixion* is frequently mentioned, a death in which the Jewish leaders were implicated (1 Thess 2:15); he speaks of the burial of Jesus and of the eyewitnesses to his resurrection* (1 Cor 15:4-8). In addition, and contrary to the claims of R. Bultmann, for example, that the teaching of the historical Jesus is virtually absent from Paul's writings, there are numerous points of contact with the teaching of Jesus as depicted in the Gospels, if few verbatim quotations (see Jesus, Sayings of). This rules out the interpretation of 2 Corinthians 5:16 championed by W. Bousset and Bultmann, and followed by numerous continental scholars, which understands this verse as meaning that for Paul the historical Jesus was an irrelevance compared with the crucial significance of the exalted Christ of faith. Rather, Paul is contrasting his preconversion understanding of Jesus with the totally new outlook which has become his as a Christian.

Furthermore, Paul had no doubt as to the personal identity of the earthly Jesus and the heavenly Christ, an identity integral to the gospel he proclaimed. While clearly recognizing different modes of existence (1 Cor 15:44-50), it is clear that for Paul the Jesus who was born, lived a human life and died on a cross, is the one who now sits at the right hand of God and who will return in glory, and this identity forms the basis of Paul's understanding of the future transformation of the believer.

1.3. Paul and the Christology of the Early Church. While Paul speaks with a distinctive voice, and it is possible to define a Pauline christology, his understanding of Christ, including the exalted Christ, is at one with, or is a development of, other NT teaching. This is seen in his use of key OT texts like Psalm 110:1 (1 Cor 15:25) and is shown most markedly in his use of traditional "hymns"* or creedal statements, particularly when speaking of the exaltation of Christ (see, e.g., Rom 1:3-4; 1 Cor 15:3-8; Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; 1 Tim 3:16; see Creeds). Indeed these passages, where he "passes on" what he had "received," form the core of his teaching about the exalted Christ (see Tradition). Although occasionally Paul adapts this traditional material by inserting a word or phrase to make clear his meaning, he does not radically alter their meaning and so shows himself in harmony with the earlier material he uses. Whenever Paul refers to the confession of Jesus as Lord, he is clearly drawing on an early and widespread tradition which was at the heart of early Christian proclamation and confession.

2. Aspects of Exaltation.

There are four aspects of Paul's understanding of exaltation. They are not all present on each occasion when exaltation is the subject; sometimes they are combined and sometimes one idea will include one or more of the others. But for ease of presentation they can be separated out as follows:

2.1. Resurrection. The resurrection* marks the transition from the state of humiliation to that of exaltation. For Paul this was a real space-time event in which the one who had been crucified, was dead and buried, and was raised to newness of life "through the glory of the Father" (Rom 6:4). This involved not just a restoration to life, but to a new, better kind of life, imperishable, powerful and glorious, no longer subject to weakness, sickness, aging or death, a new-creation life over which no other power in the universe had any influence (Rom 6:4-19; 14:9; 1 Cor 15:20-23, 42-44; Col 2:13; 2 Tim 1:10). The resurrection confirmed his divine sonship (Rom 1:3-4), announced God's acceptance of his saving death (Rom 3:21-25; 4:25), attested his exaltation to lordship (Rom 10:9), proclaimed his entry into the power* and glory of his royal reign (Eph 1:19-21) and made possible his return from heaven (1 Thess 1:9-10). Many of these passages, and the ideas associated with resurrection in them, show that, while separable in thought, the four elements (resurrection, ascension, session, Parousia) found in Paul's understanding of exaltation together form a unity; they are four parts of one exaltation. Thus when Paul speaks of the resurrection of Jesus he includes, or implies, all that is meant by exaltation.

2.2. Ascension. This is equally clear when we turn to the ascension. References to the ascension of Jesus per se are relatively rare in Paul, and there is no description of the event as found in Luke 24 and Acts 1. This need not imply, as has been argued by Lohfink, for example, that Paul and the traditions with which he was familiar knew nothing of a resurrection—forty days—ascension scheme. That Paul argues in 1 Corinthians 15 that Jesus had appeared to him in just the same way as he had appeared to the other apostles need not imply that Paul had no knowledge of an ascension. On the contrary, 1 Corinthians 15:8 shows that Paul knew that the appearances of the risen Lord came to an end, and that in some way the appearance to him was unique.

There is no contradiction between Luke and Paul so long as one recognizes that Luke's ascension accounts are not descriptions of the exaltation or glorification of Jesus; rather they describe the departure of the already exalted Lord, whose exaltation coincided with his resurrection, as in Paul (Acts 2:32-36). Equally, while Paul does refer to the descent-ascent of Christ in the quotation of the traditional formula in 1 Timothy 3:16 and in Ephesians 4:8-10, in both these places it is not so much to a visible departure to heaven that he refers, as to the exaltation of the one who humbled himself in the incarnation.

2.3. Session/Enthronement. Although there may be no mention of a visible departure of the risen Lord, Paul does speak of the exalted Christ being in heaven. Exaltation involves being at "the right hand of God." (Paul, like many first-century thinkers, recognized that such language is metaphorical; even now it is difficult to find ways of expressing Christ's supreme authority over all things without using spatial metaphors.) Paul uses this expression only three times (Rom 8:34; Eph 1:20; Col 3:1, drawing on the testimonium of Ps 110:1; cf. Phil 2:9-11). The latter two references emphasize the sovereign authority and power which belong to Christ as Lord over every power in the universe, exercising a reign that will last until every enemy has been subdued (1 Cor 15:24-25; see Principalities and Powers; Triumph). That lordship is also in mind in the context of Romans 8:34, but the thought is added that the exalted Lord makes effective intercession on behalf of God's people. Not only did he die and rise for us, he returned to the Father's side for us also.

2.4. Parousia. The numerous references in Paul's writings to the return of Christ in triumphant glory presuppose his exaltation, especially references to his coming "from heaven" (e.g., Phil 3:20; Col 3:1-4; 1 Thess 4:16). The Parousia will reveal the now hidden glory of the exalted Lord (1 Cor 1:7), his lordship will be universally acclaimed (Phil 2:9-11), and his enemies will all be finally vanquished (1 Cor 15:24-26; see Eschatology).

3. Exaltation and the Lordship of Christ.

3.1. Lord. Kyrios, Lord,* is Paul's title par excellence for Jesus. This is "the name* which is above every name" given to Jesus in his exaltation (Phil 2:9-11), so called because it is God's name. It is the word frequently employed in the LXX to render the name of God, and the Philippians passage is based on Isaiah 45:23, transferring to Jesus words originally referring to Yahweh (see God; Old Testament). For Paul kyrios was the only term which could adequately express what he had come to understand as the person and work of Christ. It was not, however, a Pauline innovation, nor was it a product of Paul's Hellenistic background, although its widespread use in the Greek-speaking world made it especially appropriate. Paul inherited this title from the early Palestinian church, as is shown by its presence in the creedal formulas Paul quotes, and especially the use of the expression maranatha in 1 Corinthians 16:22, where mar- represents the Aramaic equivalent of the Greek kyrios (see Liturgical Elements).

For Paul kyrios is a title of majesty reflecting the regal lordship of the risen Christ over the living and the dead. God made Jesus Lord at the resurrection (Rom 1:4; 6:4; 14:9; Phil 2:10), as a consequence of which he now shares with the Father dominion over all creation and the right to universal adoration. The cosmic role of Christ's lordship, involving his triumph* over the principalities and powers, is expounded most fully in the later letters (Eph 1:21-22; Col 2:15), but it is already present in the earlier writings (1 Cor 15:24-25). The cosmic lordship, to be revealed at the Parousia, is seen and experienced now in Christ's lordship over the church* (Eph 5:23; Col 1:18), and over the individual Christian (note Paul's numerous references to being "servants"* or "slaves"* of Christ, esp. 1 Cor 7:22). This exalted language expresses Paul's belief in the deity of Christ, denoting an equality between Father and Son reflecting their functional unity; yet the distinction between Father and Son is never blurred, and Paul retains the idea of the subordination of the exalted Lord (1 Cor 15:27-28).

Similarly, Paul speaks of the closest possible relation between exalted Lord and Holy Spirit,* while maintaining a distinction between them. Romans 1:4 speaks of the role of the Spirit in the exaltation of Jesus, an exaltation in which "the last Adam*" became "a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15:45). The Holy Spirit, the Spirit of sonship who inspires prayer* in Romans 8:15, is identified with the "Spirit of his Son" in Galatians 4:6 (cf. Phil 1:19), and in Romans 8:9-11 "Spirit of God" and "Spirit of Christ" are interchangeable to the extent that the expression "Christ in you" is equivalent to "Spirit in you." Nevertheless, as Romans 8:11 shows, there is a distinction between the risen Christ and "the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead." Paul's thinking was clearly trinitarian, even in the much discussed 2 Corinthians 3:17-18, whose concise language appears to identify the Lord and the Spirit. In reality Paul is expounding Exodus 34:34, and he should probably be understood as saying that the Lord of whom this passage speaks is the Spirit. Clearly Paul experienced the presence of the Holy Spirit in his life, and was equally aware of the presence of the risen and exalted Lord (Gal 2:20). Thus the exalted Lord is present with and available to the believer through the indwelling Spirit.

3.2. Son. The terms "Son" and "Son of God"* are used less frequently by Paul, and only on occasions with reference to the exalted Christ. Like kyrios, it was passed on to Paul from the early church, and it had widespread currency in the Hellenistic world and in the OT and Judaism, although its messianic connotations in the latter are disputed. Galatians 4:4 implies the pre-existence of the Son; Romans 1:3-4 can be understood in terms of messianic enthronement only, but the reference to "his Son" in Romans 1:3, and the emphasis on "power" and the inclusion of "Lord" in Romans 1:4, point to the exaltation at the resurrection of the pre-existent Son to the status of lordship, thus providing a close parallel to Philippians 2:6-11. 1 Thessalonians 1:10 refers to the Son as the exalted and coming one now in heaven, and 1 Corinthians 15:28 shows that he who, in the preceding verses, reigns until all enemies are put under his feet, is the Son.

3.3. King. Although Paul does not use the word king of Jesus, and only rarely refers to the kingdom, the idea of Christ's kingly rule is present. It is into his kingdom that the believer has been brought (Col 1:13), and as exalted ruler Christ provides for the ministry* of his church (Eph 4:11-12), prays for his people (Rom 8:34; see Intercession), and overcomes all opposition (1 Cor 15:25; see Kingdom of God/Christ).

4. Implications.

Along with his pre-existence, the exaltation of Jesus as understood by Paul has profound implications for the person of Christ. His exalted status could be no higher, as the name he has received could be no higher. As exalted Lord he is given the name which in the LXX translates Yahweh, the name of God himself. He is, therefore, the very "image of the invisible God" (Col 1:15); not that he merely is like God, or reveals God, but in the sense that he shares the nature of God. The OT "Day of the Lord," therefore, quite naturally becomes for Paul "the Day of Christ Jesus" (Phil 1:6; cf. 2 Thess 1:9). Thus he shares with the Father in providing all the blessings of salvation* (1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3). It is in such exalted language that Paul lays the foundation of trinitarian understanding.

Finally, the exaltation of Jesus has profound implications for both the present and the future of the believer. Here and now "in Christ"* the Christian is raised with Christ and "seated with him in the heavenly* realms" (Eph 2:6); even now the Christian is "being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory" (2 Cor 3:18); and the day is coming when his people shall "bear the likeness of the man from heaven" (1 Cor 15:49-57; see Image).

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; GOD; HEAVEN, HEAVENLIES, PARADISE; LORD; PRE-EXISTENCE; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SON OF GOD; TRIUMPH; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Beasley-Murray, "Colossians 1:15-20: An Early Christian Hymn Celebrating the Lordship of Christ," in Pauline Studies, ed. D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980) 169-83; H. Bietenhard, "Lord, Master," NIDNTT 2.508-20; F. F. Bruce, Paul and Jesus (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1974) 77-87; L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul (Edinburgh: Nelson, 1959); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959); J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); idem, "1 Corinthians 15:45—Last Adam, Life-Giving Spirit," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: University Press, 1973) 127-42; M. Hengel, The Son of God (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God (SBT 50; London: SCM 1966); W. G. Kümmel, The Theology of the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1974) 151-71; G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi (SNTSMS 4; Cambridge: University Press, 1967); C. F. D. Moule, The Origins of Christology (Cambridge: University Press, 1977); E. Schweizer, Lordship and Discipleship (London: SCM, 1960); idem, Jesus Christ: The Man from Nazareth and the Exalted Lord (London: SCM, 1987); V. Taylor, The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (London: Macmillan, 1958); J. Ziesler, Pauline Christianity (rev. ed.; Oxford: University Press, 1990).

J. F. Maile

EXAMPLE OF CHRIST. See ETHICS; HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; JESUS AND PAUL.

EXEGESIS. See HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL; JEW, PAUL THE; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

EXILE. See RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

EXORCISM. See DEMONS AND EXORCISM.

EXPIATION, PROPITIATION, MERCY SEAT

These are three translations, each having different connotations, of one Greek word, hilastērion. Paul uses it in Romans 3:25 with reference to the crucified Christ* "whom God put forth [as] hilastērion." Which of the three translations best reflects the interpretation of Christ's death* here? "Expiation" implies the obliteration of sin through Christ's atoning death. "Propitiation" implies that Christ's death appeased divine wrath* called forth by sin.* "Mercy seat" recalls the place in the holy of holies where God's saving mercy* was supremely manifested in atonement for sins accomplished through the OT cult. Christ would therefore be the eschatological antitype of this mercy seat. The question whether Christ's death is seen to avert the wrath of God is the crucial theological point at issue and has been the focus of a long debate. Scholars also disagree over the equally important questions of whether hilastērion implies the sacrificial character of Christ's death and whether this term interprets it in the light of the OT cultic ritual of atonement.

1. Occurrence and Form
2. Hilastērion and Cognates in Classical and Hellenistic Greek Literature
3. Hilastērion in Paul

1. Occurrence and Form.

Romans 3:25 has the only occurrence of hilastērion (and of the hilask- word group) in Paul (in the NT see also Heb 9:5; cf. hilasmos, 1 Jn 2:2; 4:10, and hilaskesthai, Heb 2:17, also of Christ's work). Grammatically hilastērion can be explained either as a neuter substantive ("means of propitiation/expiation," or "mercy seat"), a substantival masculine adjective ("propitiator," "reconciler," "obtainer of mercy"), or a masculine or neuter adjective ("making propitiation/expiation," "able to make propitiation/expiation"). If it is a masculine adjective, it modifies hon and the meaning is that Christ is the propitiatory/expiatory agent or object. Often atonement is used interchangeably with expiation or propitiation in such translations.

2. Hilastērion and Cognates in Classical and Hellenistic Greek Literature.

Inquiry into the meaning of hilastērion and cognates in the NT has engendered much discussion on their use in classical and Hellenistic Greek literature. In the LXX hilastērion usually renders kappōreṯ. It can be taken as a technical term for the "mercy seat," which was located above the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies (see Ex 25:17-22) and was sprinkled with sacrificial blood on the Day of Atonement (see Lev 16). But T. W. Manson (1-4) notes that hilastērion can designate other places (besides the mercy seat) where the action denoted by hilaskesthai takes place (either propitiation or expiation). Others, however, say the term in the LXX originally did not refer to a place but, more generally, to an agency which performs this action (they argue especially from Ex 25:16 [17]); the technical use for "mercy seat" is later (e.g., Büchsel, 319-20). Philo uses hilastērion as a technical term (e.g., Philo Cher. 25); Josephus does not (the adjective occurs in Ant. 16.7.1 182). Hilastērion at 4 Maccabees 17:22 is nontechnical and may be an adjective or noun; it connotes the propitiatory character of the Jewish martyrs' death. Outside biblical and Jewish Greek hilastērion (the neuter noun) means "oblation" (Büchsel, 320), usually in the form of a stele (Dio Chrysostom Or. 11.121; Inscr. Cos 81.347; MM ἱλαστήριον).

In secular Greek the verbs hilaskesthai and exhilaskesthai with a personal object generally mean "appease," "render propitious to oneself." A pagan deity could be propitiated through various human actions (Büchsel, 311). It is often claimed that Israelite religion did not exhibit a crude form of propitiation of Yahweh which amounted to celestial bribery or appeasement of capricious, vindictive wrath (although this may not always be a valid characterization of pagan religion either, cf. Kleinknecht, 385).

Going further, C. H. Dodd in an important article even argued that in Hellenistic Judaism as represented by the LXX, the hilask- word group does not denote propitiation (with three exceptions). He claimed that a shift in the predominant meaning had taken place and that the LXX translators used hilaskesthai, etc. in the sense of "expiate" (when the subject is a human) or "be gracious," "forgive" (when the subject is God). He based his conclusions on (1) comparisons of the hilask- class with other Septuagintal translations of the Hebrew kipper (whose Piel forms are usually rendered by [ex]hilaskesthai), and (2) comparisons of other Hebrew words which are rendered by the hilask- class. In support of the secondary meaning "expiate" for exhi- laskesthai with an impersonal object in secular Greek literature, Dodd appealed to Plato's Laws 862c and the Men Tyrannus inscription (Dittenberger, Sylt., 3d ed., 1042). In line with this shift, then, Romans 3:25 describes Jesus' death not as averting the wrath of God but as delivering from the guilt of sin (Dodd, 94).

Dodd's virtual elimination of propitiation from the LXX has not proved generally persuasive. Critics have rejected his method of defining the hilask- class there as well as his evaluation of the evidence (cf. the discussions by Nicole, Morris, 136-56, and Hill, 23-36). For the meaning "propitiate" they refer to Zechariah 7:2; 8:22; Malachi 1:9 (the three exceptions which Dodd discounts as "contemptuous" or "standard pagan" use); Psalm 105(106):30; Sirach 45:23; Genesis 32:20, and possibly also Numbers 16:46-47; 25:13; Deuteronomy 21:8; 1 Samuel 6:3; 2 Kings 24:4; Psalm 77(78):38; Daniel 9:19 (Th.) (see Hill, 29-30; Morris, 138-40; Nicole, 134-35). Morris (154) notes the common use of exhilaskesthai "in a personal sense" as seen in the constructions with peri with the genitive of person, "to make propitiation concerning a person" (e.g., Ex 30:15-16; Lev 1:4) and with hyper with the genitive of person (once, Ezek 45:17). This focus on the relation between persons Morris takes to favor the meaning "propitiate." Dodd's critics also point to the wrath of God as a prominent theme in the OT and one which appears in the context of hilaskesthai terminology, so that the idea of turning away divine wrath seems to be implied (esp. Morris, 129-36).

Morris (155), however, seems to force the evidence in favor of his view that "the removal of wrath seems to be definitely in view when this word group is used" in the LXX. Often it is difficult to determine exactly what the intention of the action denoted by this terminology is: to avert wrath or to remove the cause of enmity or defilement? The verb exhilaskesthai can have an impersonal object (e.g., "sin," "altar"), which suggests the meaning "forgive," "atone," "expiate" or "cleanse." Rarely is God the object, and sometimes God is the subject of the verb (in the active voice, e.g., Sir 5:6; 2 Chron 6:30), both of which can go against the meaning "propitiate." In the LXX, then, the complex hilask- word group shows itself able to accommodate new meanings (cf. Hill, 36). The main question therefore is whether the original connotations of removal of wrath still adhere to these new usages. The LXX's retention of the terminology for propitiation could suggest that they do. But the change in usage (God as subject; use of an impersonal object) giving rise to other translations suggests that they do not. The context will probably be determinative in each case in deciding whether hilask- implies propitiation or expiation.

3. Hilastērion in Paul.

In the light of the previous discussion on the usage of the hilask- terminology, we must now ask whether hilastērion in Romans 3:25 has the technical sense "mercy seat" and whether it carries the connotations of propitiation and expiation.

3.1. Propitiation and Expiation. Many have repudiated the view that Romans 3:25 pictures Christ's death as propitiatory. O. Hofius (34-39) argues vigorously against that view as contradictory to Paul's understanding of the reconciling event of the cross of Christ. God is only the subject in that event (not the object of a propitiating activity). Human beings are only the objects (not the subjects of a propitiating activity). He points to various Pauline texts in support of both assertions. "God put forth [Christ] as hilastērion" (Rom 3:25). "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor 5:18-21). God "did not spare his own Son but gave him up for us all" (Rom 8:32). "God demonstrated his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom 5:8). In Romans 5:6, 8, 10 human beings are objects of the salvation event of the cross as "sinners," "ungodly" and "enemies* of God" (i.e., those who are at enmity with God, but not, it seems, God with them). Christ's death is not a human being's offering to God which enables God to accept sinners—the cross is not a human achievement; rather it is the act of God in free and gracious love* toward the ungodly. "God . . . reconciled us to himself through Christ" (2 Cor 5:18), and "we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son" (Rom 5:10). God is not reconciled to us.

Proponents of the view that propitiation is a biblical category do not dispute that the Bible presents God as the subject, namely, of the propitiating action (e.g., Morris, 155, 159-60; Nicole, 150-51), both in the OT (Ps 77[78]:38; and in substance Lev 17:11) and in the NT (Rom 3:25 according to their interpretation of this verse). Thus the caricature of propitiation of God as celestial bribery does not apply. For the biblical scheme does not have the chronological sequence characteristic of the pagan understanding: first the human appeasement of divine wrath, then the divine bestowal of favor on humans. Rather the God of the Bible acts out of love to propitiate God's own wrath; propitiation does not turn divine wrath into love (Nicole, 151). Understood in this way, then, the language of propitiation expresses the Godward aspect of atonement: the cleansing of sin affirms the holiness of God.

Advocates of propitiation claim that Romans 3:25-26, using the term hilastērion, expresses this Godward aspect of the atonement in terms of the vindication of God's righteousness* in God's treatment of the sinner. The purpose of putting Christ forth as hilastērion was "for the demonstration of his righteousness, because of the passing over of sins previously committed, through the forbearance of God, so that God might be just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus." Righteousness, dikaiosynē, in this reading of the text, is a divine attribute, as in Romans 3:5.

Critics of propitiation as a misleading term, however, read the text differently. They explain the righteousness of God which is demonstrated not as God's judicial righteousness but as the righteousness which is a gift of God to sinners, that is, salvation as in Romans 3:21-22. The meaning of divine righteousness would thus be in line with OT texts like Psalm 97(98):2. According to this view, when Romans 3:26 describes God as the one who is "just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus" it refers to divine righteousness only in this one sense of saving righteousness, not righteousness as an attribute of God. Further, this verse is interpreted to speak not of God's "passing over" (paresis) former sins, which would cast doubt on God's judicial "righteousness," but of God's "forgiving" them (paresis in the sense of aphesis, "forgiveness"), which exhibits God's saving "righteousness." According to this line of thought, Christ's death here has nothing to do with God's judicial righteousness. Christ did not die to satisfy God's wrath as the precondition for reconciliation (see, e.g., Hofius, 34-39). Rather, Christ's atoning death itself accomplished reconciliation: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor 5:19; see Hofius 1989, 5, 39; also Hofius 1993).

Proponents of propitiation, however, find it difficult to rid Romans 3:25-26 of the notion of righteousness as a divine attribute. Why does the word paresis appear rather than aphesis, the ordinary word for "forgiveness" (even if aphesis is found in the Pauline corpus only at Eph 1:7; Col 1:14)? Does not the former "forbearance" of God contrast with the present demonstration of God's righteousness by dealing with sin? The context seems to move in the direction of the vindication of God's righteousness through Christ's death as a judgment* against sin (Barrett, 79-80). But others understand the righteousness of God which is vindicated not as God's judicial righteousness—as if some abstract ideal of justice is upheld through the satisfaction of divine wrath—but as God's covenant* righteousness in which God fulfills God's covenant obligation by dealing with the covenant people's sin (Dunn, 175). The vindication of God's righteousness would therefore amount to the vindication of God's faithfulness as the God who upholds the covenant with God's people despite their unfaithfulness. This construal of the demonstration of God's righteousness does not imply that Christ's death is propitiatory but expiatory.

Other statements in Paul regarding the death of Christ can be brought to bear on Romans 3:25. God "condemned sin in the flesh*" of Christ on the cross so that sinners might be released from the condemnation of the Law* (Rom 8:3). In his death Christ "became a curse" (Gal 3:13) and suffered the condemnation of God's Law on sinners, for the sinless Christ was "made sin" (2 Cor 5:21) by God, that is, he was caused to stand in the place of sinners. In the view of J. Denney (103), these statements support propitiation because they take Christ's death as divine judgment against sin, judgment which is necessary in order "for God to be at once righteous and a God who accepts as righteous those who believe in Jesus."

Yet Denney wrongly defines divine judgment against sin in terms of propitiation. While it is true that Paul can view Christ's death as the execution of the Law's condemnation which fell on sinners in Christ and as God's own condemnation of sin by delivering the one "made sin" unto death and utter destruction, on the other hand Paul never interprets that divine judgment of sin on the cross as something which appeases an angry, offended God or which inclines God toward sinners. For Paul, God has always been inclined toward the ungodly. This is supremely evident in the cross, where "God is in Christ" bearing the transgressions of the world (2 Cor 5:19) and where the love of God is demonstrated "while we were yet sinners" (Rom 5:8). Paul interprets the cross as God's own suffering of the divine judgment against sin, which is the destruction of the sinner's sinful existence that took place in Christ's death.

Now we must consider the more general argument that the wider context of Romans 3:25 suggests that putting Christ forth as a hilastērion appeases the wrath of God. Namely, in Romans 1:18 we read: "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness." It threatens both Gentile and Jew (Rom 1:18; 2:5). But not only is God's wrath revealed. God's righteousness is also revealed, namely in the gospel (Rom 1:17; 3:21). The way in which Paul parallels wrath and righteousness by using the same verb (apokalyptetai, "is revealed") to denote their revelation suggests a relationship between the two: If those who receive the righteousness of God through faith in Christ are saved from the wrath of God, it must be because Christ has appeased that wrath through his death for them (Morris, 167-70).

While the wrath of God is the horrible cloud which hovers over the existence of all sinners and from which they escape only by receiving the gift of God's righteousness in Christ, Paul does not specify here how Christ's death frees them from such a destiny. He does not define the cross in terms of the wrath of God. Paul probably did conceive of Christ's death as the anticipation of the final eschatological judgment and outpouring of divine wrath. And thus he also probably did think that those who are in Christ will be saved from that wrath because Christ suffered it for them on the cross. Romans 5:9 is compatible with this explanation: "Having now been justified by his blood, we will be saved through him from the wrath." But that still does not mean that Christ's death propitiated God. For Paul the wrath of God is God's judgment (see Rom 2:5; 3:5-6) which destroys all unholiness and sin. In the light of the threatening wrath of God, the need of sinners can be said to be not the transformation of God's attitude toward them but the transformation of their sinful existence before God through its destruction and new creation. This transformation of sinners is precisely the significance Paul sees in the death and resurrection of Christ. And the notion of divine wrath as a judgment consisting in destruction fits well with such a view of the cross. Paul, however, gives us no systematic presentation of the relationship between sin, Christ's death and God's judgment, and the theological questions we might have in that regard can hardly be answered from his letters.

On the other end of the spectrum are those interpreters whose plain distaste for the notion of divine wrath leads them not to hold a propitiatory view of Christ's death. Confronted with the biblical language of divine wrath, they explain it as the ascription to God of what is really impersonal retribution. They point in support to the absolute use of "wrath" (without the qualifying "of God," e.g., Rom 2:5 among many others; see, e.g., Dodd 1932, 20-21). But the NT texts themselves do not support such a separation of wrath from God, which amounts to a kind of fatalism or dualism (Kleinknecht, 423-24) and conflicts with the biblical notion of divine sovereignty (Morris, 133).

In summary, not "propitiatory" but "expiatory" is the more appropriate description of Christ's atoning death as a hilastērion since (1) expiation clearly fits the Pauline understanding of that death as God's own gracious initiative in love toward the ungodly (see further below) as well as God's judgment against sin, (2) the idea of the appeasing of a wrathful God is in tension with Paul's understanding of Christ's death, (3) the context of Romans 3:25 does not require propitiation, and (4) the usage of the hilask- word group in the LXX suggests a development of meaning toward the connotations of expiation. Hilastērion as implying expiation still allows us to understand the death of Christ as a necessary expression of God's holiness in dealing with human sin, yet not to deny that judgment is at once an expression of God's love, because the Son of God is the one who suffered the curse for the sins of all people as God's agent of the reconciliation of sinners to God.

3.2. Mercy Seat. Having discussed whether hilastērion has the connotations of propitiation or expiation, we now need to ask whether Romans 3:25 alludes to the "mercy seat" (kappōreṯ) where the supreme act of atonement took place in the OT sacrificial cult or whether Christ's death is interpreted instead in terms of a noncultic form of atonement. Related questions are: Is Christ's death as hilastērion understood as a sacrifice? and What does a cultic understanding of hilastērion imply theologically about the death of Christ?

The view that the crucified Christ is identified as the eschatological antitype of the mercy seat of Leviticus 16, where atonement for sin is made once for all and reconciliation with God is accomplished, rendering the Temple cult obsolete, has seemed improbable to some. It is argued that the context in Romans 3:25 lacks any indication that hilastērion has the special, technical sense of "mercy seat." Hilastērion does not even have a definite article here which would specify it as something familiar to the readers: "the mercy seat" (contrast the anarthrous use in the LXX and Heb 9:5). Further, the statement that Jesus was "put forward" as hilastērion contrasts with the hiddenness of the OT mercy seat in the holy of holies. And the typological interpretation of "hilastērion . . . in his blood" (Rom 3:25) is found to result in a confusing image in which the blood of Jesus is sprinkled on himself as the mercy seat (e.g., Lohse, 151-52).

But some interpreters (notably Manson, accepted and updated by Davies and Reumann, on the basis of the pre-Pauline tradition in Rom 3:24-26; see Martin, 81-89; Stuhlmacher 1986, 96-100) have not found these criticisms fatal. Hilastērion can have the technical sense of "mercy seat" even without the usual article since it belongs to arguably traditional material which Paul is quoting in verses 24-26a (some exclude verse 24), material which stems from Jewish Christianity and would have been completely unambiguous in that setting. A grammatical argument for the anarthrous hilastērion has also been adduced: according to BDF 252.2 the article can be omitted in formulas and set phrases (noted by Stuhlmacher, but see Friedrich, 62-63). Behind this use of hilastērion for the crucified Christ could stand the early Christian critique of the Temple* and the Law,* whose fulfillment and therefore obsolescence was seen in Jesus Christ. Since Christ's death not only corresponds to but supersedes the ritual of atonement in the OT, the public putting forth of Christ as hilastērion in contrast to the hiddenness of the mercy seat does not damage the typology but brings out its full force. Finally, the typological language is not problematic because it does not intend to conjure up a picture of Christ's blood literally being sprinkled on Christ's body. The OT ritual was not so concrete as that: the blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled into the smoke rising over the mercy seat in a symbolic gesture of the reconciliation achieved through the atonement (Lev 16:13-15). And after all, the ark of the covenant had disappeared and no longer stood in the holy of holies, and the high priest now performed this ritual over only an imaginary mercy seat. The meaning of this event therefore was not seen in its literal but symbolic value. For this reason also in Hebrews Christ can appear as both offering and high priest, another literally impossible notion.

The competing interpretation of E. Lohse, which defines hilastērion in Romans 3:25 in a noncultic sense, appeals to 4 Maccabees 17:21-22. There the martyr death of a few righteous Jews atones for the sins of the whole people. Against Lohse, it is less likely that Jewish Christians would have drawn on this tradition to elucidate the unique and expiatory significance of Christ's death than on the tradition enshrined in the Day of Atonement ritual. The Jewish martyrs' death cannot be set within a firm or long tradition of substitutionary atonement. And this tradition does not easily offer a way to express the singularity of Christ's death (cf. further Stuhlmacher 1986, 101-3).

Given the weakness of the counterarguments and alternatives, the dominance of the meaning "mercy seat" for hilastērion in the LXX, and the Jewish-Christian provenance of the pre-Pauline tradition in which this term is embedded in Romans 3:25, it is likely that hilastērion here means "mercy seat."

The use of hilastērion to describe Christ crucified as a new "mercy seat" thus shows that the traditional material interpreted his death in terms of cultic atonement. Specifically, the Day of Atonement ritual in Leviticus 16 is the theological key to this view of Christ's death, as especially O. Hofius (1989, 39-48) has argued, drawing on H. Gese's and B. Janowski's insights into the OT material. Key elements of Paul's understanding of Christ's death can be linked to this ritual: the atoning death of Christ as an act of God (cf. Lev 17:11), the presence of God in Christ on the cross as reconciler, "inclusive substitution" as the basis of Christ's death for sinners, atonement as a "coming to God through judgment of death," and reconciliation as a new creation.

C. Breytenbach, among others, has recently attacked this interpretation of Christ's death along the line of the Day of Atonement (see esp. Breytenbach 1989, 167-68). While trying to argue that Paul understood reconciliation in noncultic Hellenistic terms, Breytenbach marginalizes the language of atonement in Paul which can easily link the death of Christ with OT cultic atonement. Thus he asserts that it would be unwarranted to take (ex)hilaskesthai and its word group as a central category in Paul's thought since Paul does without that terminology until Romans, and in Romans 3:25 Paul is only quoting pre-Pauline tradition; hilastērion is not his term (Breytenbach 1993, 67). In another step, Breytenbach denies that the pre-Pauline tradition attempts to interpret Christ's death through the Day of Atonement ritual anyway. Such an interpretation is precluded by early Christian rejection of the Temple cult (Breytenbach 1989, 167-68). Stuhlmacher (1991, 349-50) exposes faulty reasoning here, however: while the pre-Pauline tradition does conceive of Christ as the antitype of the OT mercy seat—implying its critique of the enduring validity of the Temple cult—nevertheless the tradition's reference to the blood of Christ as the eschatologically effective means of atonement instituted by God alludes to Leviticus 17:11—revealing the positive influence of OT cultic thought categories. Further against Breytenbach, Stuhlmacher (1989, 57) has judged correctly the importance of the traditional material Paul quotes in Romans 3:25-26a: Paul agrees with the tradition describing Christ as hilastērion (which he interprets according to his gospel) and incorporates it into the christological Kernsatz ("key statement"), which expresses his gospel in Romans 3:25. (For other trenchant criticisms of Breytenbach's view, see Stuhlmacher 1991; Hofius 1990.)

Finally, Romans 3:25 reflects the view of Christ's death as a sacrifice by virtue of its cultic interpretation, though the term hilastērion itself of course depicts Christ as the place of God's atoning presence, not the offering.

See also DEATH OF CHRIST; FORGIVENESS; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; REDEMPTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; SACRIFICE, OFFERING; SALVATION; SIN, GUILT; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1957); C. Breytenbach, Versöhnung. Eine Studie zur paulinischen Soteriologie (WMANT 60; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1989); idem, "Versöhnung, Stellvertretung und Sühne: Semantische und traditionsgeschichtliche Bemerkungen am Beispiel der paulinischen Briefe," NTS 39 (1993) 59-79; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1955); J. Denney, The Death of Christ, ed. R. V. G. Tasker (London: Tyndale, 1956 repr.); C. H. Dodd, "Atonement," in The Bible and the Greeks (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1935) 82-95 (= "ΙΛΑΣΚΕΣΘΑΙ, Its Cognates, Derivatives, and Synonyms, in the Septuagint," JTS 32 [1931] 352-60); idem, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (New York: Harper & Row, 1932); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans 1—8 (WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); H.-J. Eckstein, " 'Denn Gottes Zorn wird vom Himmel her offenbar werden.' Exegetische Erwägungen zu Röm 1:18," ZNW 78 (1987) 74-89; G. Friedrich, "Römer 3,23-26," in Die Verkündigung des Todes Jesu im Neuen Testament (Neukirchen: Neukirchner, 1982) 57-67; N. S. L. Fryer, "The Meaning and Translation of Hilastêrion in Romans 3:25," EvQ 59 (1987) 99-116; H. Gese, "Die Süne," in Zur biblischen Theologie. Alttestamentliche Vorträge (München: Chr. Kaiser, 1977) 85-106; J. Herrmann and F. Büchsel, "ἱλεως κτλ," TDNT III.300-23; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms (SNTSMS 5; Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 23-48; O. Hofius, "2 Kor 5,19a und das Imperfekt," in TLZ 118 (1993) forthcoming; idem, "Sühne und Versöhnung. Zum paulinischen Verständnis des Kreuzestodes Jesu," in Paulusstudien (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989) (= Versuche, das Leiden und Sterben Jesu zu verstehen, ed. W. Maas [Munich: Schnell & Steiner, 1983] 25-46); idem, Review of C. Breytenbach, Versöhnung. Eine Studie zur paulinschen Soteriologie, in TLZ 115 (1990) 741-45; B. Janowski, Söhne als Heilsgeschehen (WMANT 55; Neukirchen: Neukirchener, 1982); H. Kleinknecht, et al., "ὀργή κτλ," TDNT V.382-447; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht (2d ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963); T. W. Manson, "ΙΛΑΣΤΗΡΙΟΝ," JTS 46 (1945) 1-10; I. H. Marshall, "The Development of the Concept of Redemption in the New Testament," in Reconciliation and Hope, FS L. Morris, ed. R. J. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 153-69; R. P. Martin, Reconciliation (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990) 81-89; L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974 repr.) 125-85; R. Nicole, "C. H. Dodd and the Doctrine of Propitiation," WTJ 17 (1955) 117-57; J. Reumann, "The Gospel of the Righteousness of God: Pauline Reinterpretation in Romans 3:21-31," Int 20 (1966) 432-52; P. Stuhlmacher, "Cilliers Breytenbachs Sicht von Söhne und Versöhnung," in Altes Testament und christlicher Glaube, ed. B. Janowski et al. (Jahrbuch für biblische Theologie 6; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1991) 339-54; idem, Der Brief an die Römer (NTD 6; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989); idem, "Recent Exegesis of Romans 3:24-26," in Reconciliation, Law, and Righteousness (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 94-109.

J. M. Gundry-Volf

EXPULSION. See DISCIPLINE.

F

FAITH

Paul's emphasis on faith can scarcely be denied. He uses the noun pistis 142 times, whereas it occurs but 101 times in all the rest of the NT. He also has the verb pisteuō ("to believe") 54 times and the adjective pistos ("faithful," "trustworthy") 33 times. Clearly the faith words featured largely in the Pauline vocabulary. O. Michel points out that the demand for faith was something new beginning with the Christians: "neither Qumran, nor John the Baptist, nor yet the ancient zealot movements made any explicit demand of faith"; by contrast, "Christianity is a unique faith-event" (Michel in Becker and Michel, 599, 605). But for Paul trust in God was of central importance. It is significant that he can speak of becoming a Christian as believing (e.g., Rom 1:16; 1 Cor 1:21). He is not referring to a shallow surface experience but to believing in one's heart (Rom 10:9); and its focus is the God* who raised Jesus Christ* from the dead and inaugurated the new age (see Ljungman).

For Paul the great central truth is that God has acted in Christ to bring about the salvation* of sinners (see Sin). Salvation cannot be merited or earned; it must be received as a gift of grace.* Sinners cannot merit salvation, they can only trust God or, as Paul puts it, have faith in God (or in Christ). It is a distinctively Christian feature that the verb pisteuō ("to believe") is often followed by the preposition epi ("on") or eis ("into"), and Paul follows this usage. This brings out the truth that Christians rest their faith "on" Jesus or are brought "into" union with him. Bultmann cites Romans 10:9 to show that believing in one's heart and "acknowledgment of Jesus as Lord is intrinsic to Christian faith along with acknowledgment of the miracle of His resurrection" (Bultmann TDNT, VI.209).

Faith has many aspects. "It is response to revelation as contrasted with discovery of new knowledge" (Blackman, 222). It implies our recognition that we are sinners and thus unable of ourselves to forsake evil and to do good. Socrates might hold that knowledge and virtue are much the same, so that to know what is right leads people to do what is right, but Paul would not have agreed. For him faith implies both that we have come to see ourselves as sinful and also that we have come to recognize that God has provided for our forgiveness* through what Christ's death has done for us. Faith means coupling the recognition of the impossibility of our achieving our salvation with the acceptance of the truth that God has done all that is necessary. The "good news" is "the power of God for salvation to everyone who believes" (Rom 1:16). And faith means commitment. Those who believe have not only come to see their shortcomings, they have committed themselves to be Christ's people.

1. Faith and the Cross
2. Justification
3. Faith and Law
4. Abraham
5. Faithfulness
6. Faith and the Holy Spirit
7. Faith and the Christian Life
8. Faith and Obedience
9. Faith and the Church
10. The Faith

1. Faith and the Cross.

God's saving work is done in Christ. Paul constantly emphasizes the centrality of the cross,* sometimes by using just that word, sometimes by using some figure to bring out the truth. Thus he speaks of God as effecting "redemption"* and "propitiation" (see Expiation, Propitiation) and immediately adds, "through faith" and "in his blood" (Rom 3:24-25). The latter expression makes it clear that the apostle is referring to the Savior's atoning death,* and the former insists that this does not come to anyone automatically. Faith is the divinely appointed way. Indeed there is "one Lord, one faith" (Eph 4:5); the two go together.

Redemption means the payment of a price to set people free, and we should not miss the importance of freedom* in Paul's understanding of faith. He does not link freedom expressly with the "faith" terminology, but such a passage as Romans 5:16-21 assumes that the believer enters a freedom impossible without faith, which is the gateway to the new age of messianic salvation.

Paul sees what God has done in Christ as central, and he links faith to grace (Rom 4:16). Indeed, he writes to the Ephesians, "by grace you have been saved through faith" (Eph 2:8). Grace is important in understanding faith, for it emphasizes that salvation is a free gift, not a reward for human achievement of any sort, even as a reward for outstanding faith. So, too, it is faith that gives access to the grace in which believers stand and which leads to joy* (Rom 5:2). Paul looks to be of service to the Philippians* for "their progress and joy of faith" (Phil 1:25). And, interestingly, a little later he comments on "the sacrifice and service" of the Philippians' faith (Phil 2:17). Their faith resulted in sacrificial service.* In Christ believers have "boldness and access in confidence through faith in him" (Eph 3:12). Or Paul may stress the divine power*: "that your faith might rest not on human wisdom but on the power of God" (1 Cor 2:5 NRSV; Fee, 96).

2. Justification.

Justification* is the process whereby the sinner comes to be accepted by God. Paul sees the Christian understanding of justification as distinctive in that it rests on what God has done, not on any human achievement. It is appropriated by faith, not relying on human merit. The apostle brings out the central message of the Christian way by saying that the gospel* is "God's power for salvation to every one who believes," and he goes on to say that God's righteousness* is revealed "out of [Gk ek] faith into faith"—faith from first to last! He goes on to cite his great text from Habakkuk 2:4, "the one who is righteous by faith will live" (Rom 1:16-17). The "righteousness of God" comes "through faith in Jesus Christ to all the believers" (Rom 3:22).

God is both just and the justifier of anyone who has faith in Jesus (Rom 3:26). People are justified "out of faith," where the preposition ek indicates the origin; it is out of the faith that reposes in God that people are justified. Being justified they experience the peace* of God (Rom 5:1). Or Paul may vary his way of putting it by saying that one is justified "not from works of Law, but through faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal 2:16; see Works of the Law). He puts emphasis on the truth that believers are justified by faith quite apart from "works of Law" (Rom 3:28). Or he can look to the future when he will be found in Christ "not having my own righteousness which is of the Law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness of God on the basis of faith" (Phil 3:9). Still further in the future, "by faith we eagerly expect the hope of righteousness" (Gal 5:5); this righteousness is the securing of the acquittal on the last great day (see Eschatology) and it is plain that Paul sees faith as important in this connection. This great theme underlines all that Paul wrote. It is basic for him and central to the gospel he spent his life proclaiming. With or without this terminology he constantly puts before his readers the truth it conveys. People can do nothing to merit their salvation, but Paul reiterates the truth that all who come to God in faith receive salvation as a free gift.

3. Faith and Law.

To the Jews of the first century it was a matter of great importance that God had given the Law* to their nation of all the nations on the earth. This was a gift to be treasured and made the basis for the whole of life. But Paul points out that God's promise to Abraham and his descendants was "not through Law . . . but through the righteousness of faith" (Rom 4:13). The promise is made sure to all Abraham's descendants, not on the basis of keeping the Law but on that of faith (Rom 4:16). Law may be distinguished from faith, for "the Law is not of faith" (Gal 3:12). As F. F. Bruce puts it, "Law and faith, for Paul, are unrelated: the gospel calls for faith, but law requires works" (Bruce 1982, 162). Paul is very clear on the primacy of faith; thus he says plainly, "We (the pronoun is emphatic: "we Christians" in distinction from non-Christians) have believed in Christ Jesus so that we are justified by faith in Christ and not by works of Law." Then he adds the strong statement, "because from works of Law no flesh will be justified" (Gal 2:16). Paul finds a place for the Law, but only until faith should be "revealed" as the way (Gal 3:23); Paul can say that faith "came" (Gal 3:25); he sees faith as active.

Paul is interested in the salvation of Jews as well as Gentiles.* E. P. Sanders finds it "clear that one of Paul's major concerns is to assert that salvation is for both Jews and Gentiles and that it must be based on the same ground. That ground cannot be the law and must therefore be faith" (Sanders, 488). The error of ancient Israel* was that it did not seek to attain righteousness by faith, but rather by the way of Law (Rom 9:31-32). Paul was deeply concerned for Israel (Rom 10:1) and it was devastating for him that the Israelites did not come to God by the way of faith in Christ. Their emphasis on law meant that they stumbled, a lapse for which Paul finds a fulfillment of prophecy (Rom 9:33, citing Is 28:16 and 8:14). He does not mean that no Israelites are saved. After all, he himself was an Israelite and he gloried in the fact; and many of his coworkers were Israelites too. But they are saved in the same way as are Gentiles, by faith (Rom 3:30). Law is not the way to salvation. Law shows that men and women are sinners; it does not bring salvation (2 Cor 3:6-16).

Indeed Paul can speak of "a law of faith," which he specifically opposes to a law "of works" (Rom 3:27). It may be paradoxical to speak of "a law of faith," but the expression brings out something of Paul's strong emphasis on the centrality of faith. If people are going to see a "law" as the way to God, then that law assumes that they come to him by faith and not on account of any merits of their own. If those who come by way of Law inherit the blessing, then the promise made to Abraham* is void and that is unthinkable. It would mean that God's promise meant nothing (Rom 4:14). Scripture, Paul says, "has shut up all things under sin so that the promise by faith in Christ Jesus might be given to those who believe" (Gal 3:22). The very Scriptures that the Jews value so highly emphasize sin in such a way that anyone who reads them rightly must see that people cannot achieve salvation by their own deeds. They must turn to the promise, and the promise implies trust in the God whose faithfulness is demonstrated in his covenant promises made to the patriarch and made good in Christ and the church (cf. 2 Cor 1:17-22; see van Unnik).

4. Abraham.

Paul appeals to the example of Abraham,* the progenitor of the people of God (he speaks of him nineteen times). Twice he has a sustained development of the way Abraham was accepted by God, stressing both times that the great patriarch was accepted on no other grounds than faith (Rom 4; Gal 3). For Paul it is significant that Abraham was accepted by God simply because he believed that what God had promised him God would perform. Paul explicitly rules out works as the basis of Abraham's acceptance before God (Rom 4:2). It was Abraham's faith in divine faithfulness that was significant. Genesis 15:6 is a foundation text for Paul and it makes it clear both that Abraham exercised faith and that God accepted him on that basis (Rom 4:3-4; Gal 3:6). If the great patriarch was accepted in this way, then it is obvious to Paul that others who are accepted are accepted in no other way.

The Jews of Paul's day attached enormous importance to circumcision,* a rite which had been introduced for them by Abraham at God's command and as a "sign of the covenant*" (Gen 17:11); indeed, God had said to Abraham, "This is my covenant" (Gen 17:10). But Paul points out that Abraham's acceptance with God took place before he was circumcised, from which sequence he reasons that circumcision does not have the significance attributed to it by the Jews of his day, that is, as an identity marker and badge of their covenant status (Dunn 1988; see Works of the Law). He can speak of Abraham as "the father of circumcision," but he sees this as a fatherhood not for those who are simply circumcised but for those "who walk in the steps of the faith of our father Abraham which he had in uncircumcision" (Rom 4:12).

Faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness (Rom 4:22), a truth that was recorded not simply as a piece of history but "for our sake also who believe on him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom 4:24; see Resurrection). Paul makes this the basis of an argument for the acceptance of Gentiles into the Christian church. It is those who are "of faith [ek pisteōs]" who are "sons of Abraham" (Gal 3:7), those "of faith" who "are blessed with faithful Abraham" (Gal 3:9); this is a truth foreseen in Scripture (Gal 3:8).

Paul regards circumcision as a barrier to salvation when it is claimed as an exclusive privilege (Gal 5:2): it is faith (the faith that works through love) that matters (Gal 5:6). If a person is circumcised out of a zeal for the Law but has no faith, that one is not rightly to be counted among Abraham's children. Not all Abraham's descendants are his true children (Rom 9:7); rather it is those who belong to Christ who are Abraham's offspring and "heirs according to promise" (Gal 3:29). Paul has a noteworthy statement that Christ's redeeming work in becoming "a curse* for us" was "in order that the blessing of Abraham might come to the Gentiles in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:13-14). Faith is the only way.

5. Faithfulness.

"God is faithful" writes Paul, "through whom you were called" (1 Cor 1:9), and this is basic for the whole Christian understanding of God's dealings with his people, in both covenant ages. No human failing can void the faithfulness of God (Rom 3:3). Because God is faithful those whom God calls must reflect the quality they have learned from him, that is, in response to his covenant loyalty. Believers may be referred to as "the faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph 1:1; cf. Col 1:2). The word pistis is generally translated "faith," but on occasion it can signify "faithfulness" (e.g., Gal 5:22). This is surely the case when Paul asks "shall their unbelief make void the faithfulness [pistin] of God?" (Rom 3:3).

It is more difficult when we come to the expression which could literally be translated as "a righteousness of God through faith of Jesus Christ" (Rom 3:22; cf. Rom 3:26; Gal 2:16, 20; 3:22; Phil 3:9). Most agree that we should understand this as "faith in Jesus Christ," though it is possible to see the meaning as "the faithfulness of Jesus Christ" or as "the faith Jesus Christ exercised," taking the words to point to the perfect humanity of Jesus (see Christology). The latter view, which understands the genitive of pistis Christou to be a subjective genitive (i.e., "Christ's faithfulness"), has gained some support among scholars, being argued most influentially by R. Hays (1983, 1991; see Howard ABD, for history of interpretation). The traditional position has argued that the genitive is objective ("faith in Christ"; see, e.g., Dunn 1988, 1991). The issue continues to be debated (for a linguistic and structural perspective on the significance of ek pisteōs and dia pisteōs and the influence of Hab 2:4, see Campbell), but as Dunn has noted, it is telling that if Paul wished to draw attention to the faithfulness of Christ, he missed some opportunities. In Romans 4, for instance, it is the faith of Abraham that is the model, not Christ's faithfulness (Dunn 1988, 1.166; but cf. Longenecker 1990, 87-88). We should probably understand Paul to be referring to faith in Jesus as object, though the other possibilities remind us both that he was faithful to the Father and that he lived by faith.

Paul includes faith in his list of what he calls "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5:22). This may possibly mean that the Holy Spirit* produces saving faith within the believer, but it is much more likely that in this list the word denotes faithfulness, the quality of complete reliability. This will be the case also when the apostle speaks of a series of gifts made to believers and includes "faith, by the same Spirit" (1 Cor 12:9). As these words are preceded by "to another," the apostle* is not referring to saving faith, for that is the common possession of all Christians and not a gift made by the Spirit to one believer over against another. He may be referring to faithfulness, though, of course, elsewhere he speaks of having "all faith so as to move mountains" (1 Cor 13:2), and it may be that it is some such faith of which he writes here (see O. Wischmeyer's classification of this as Wunderglaube over against Kerygmaglaube, i.e., faith in God's miraculous power vs. the believer's saving faith in the gospel). W. Schmithals, it is true, holds that this refers to the controversy with the Gnostics who held that only a limited number of Christians are "pneumatics" ("spiritual"), and that Paul is arguing that all Christians have faith and thus are "pneumatics" (Schmithals, 172-73). But apart from objections that may be urged against Schmithals' general position, it seems that he has not paid sufficient attention to the expression "to another." Paul is not describing the position of all true Christians but is speaking of a gift made only to some of them, though it may be that here, as in 1 Corinthians 13:2, we should see the Spirit's endowment or the charism of healing* power exercised in faith.

6. Faith and the Holy Spirit.

Paul sees faith as the necessary prerequisite for the presence of the Holy Spirit* in the believer. He castigates the Galatians for going back on the faith that had marked their earlier experience and had brought them the gift of the Spirit. He says he has only one question: "Did you receive the Spirit from works of Law or from the hearing of faith?" but then he puts it in a slightly different form: "He who provides to you the Spirit... (does he do it) from works of Law or from the hearing of faith?" (Gal 3:2, 5). In this passage he takes the Galatians* back to the beginning of their Christian experience and reminds them that at that time they had simply believed and that this had resulted in the gift of the Holy Spirit. Supernatural things had happened then and such displays of miraculous power were the result of the coming of the Spirit in response to faith, not to any keeping of the Law. His use of the present tense implies that these things were continuing. God was still providing them with the Spirit and still doing it by faith rather than Law.

Those who believe are "sealed with the promised Holy Spirit" (Eph 1:13), where the metaphor of sealing marks believers out as God's own. God's mark is on them. The same passage goes on to affirm that the Spirit is "the earnest" or "pledge" (arrabōn) of their inheritance. The arrabōn was a down payment (see First Fruits, Down Payment), a pledge that the rest of what was promised would be paid in due course. Paul uses it to bring out the thought that, while the present gift of the Holy Spirit is evidence of salvation now, there is much more to come in the eschatological future.

Paul further says that Christ "redeemed us from the curse of the Law" and that this was "in order that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles in Christ Jesus," and he adds a further clause of purpose, "in order that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal 3:13-14). We should not see faith as a meritorious act which is rewarded by the gift of the Spirit. Rather Paul is saying that there is a divine work in believers and that it is through faith that they receive the gift of the Spirit of God, and so the gift of saving faith (1 Cor 12:3).

He also says that it is "through the Spirit by faith" that believers await "the hope* of righteousness" (Gal 5:5). We should remember also that "faith" is part of the harvest of the Spirit (Gal 5:22) and that God by his Spirit produces the gift of "faith" (1 Cor 12:9). As this gift is made "to another" it is not the saving faith that is the common possession of all Christians that is in mind, but a special gift (charisma). But for our present purpose the important thing to observe is that this kind of faith which is exercised in a ministry of miracle-working powers (see Signs, Wonders, Miracles) is a gift of the Spirit.

Paul speaks of having "the same spirit of faith according as it is written, 'I believed and therefore I spoke' "; he goes on, "we also believe, therefore also we speak" (2 Cor 4:13). His quotation is from Psalm 116:10 and, as R. P. Martin remarks, "Paul's confidence is traced back to a like assurance he found in the psalmist. . . . He regards his spoken ministry as a testimony to his faith—and the psalmist's—in the triumph of life over death" (Martin, 89). It is not easy to see here a specific reference to the Holy Spirit in the sense normally seen in the NT. But by the same token it is not easy to rule out such a reference, for it is clear that the apostle saw himself as acting and speaking under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

7. Faith and the Christian Life.

Paul does not see faith as a kind of passport to salvation, as though we must believe if we are to be regarded as among the saved, and that from then on we must live by our own efforts. He speaks of Christ as dwelling in the hearts of believers "through faith" (Eph 3:17), which points to an ongoing activity, not a fleeting visit.

Faith is not static, but must grow. Paul makes it clear that there are different levels of faith. Some believers, for example, have the faith that moves mountains (1 Cor 13:2; the implication is that this is miracle-working faith, not the faith we may expect every Christian to have; see 1 Cor 12:29, where the questions expect the answer no). The apostle speaks of the Corinthians as "abounding" in faith (2 Cor 8:7), and he looks for that faith to increase (2 Cor 10:15). Similarly, he tells the Ephesians that God has made certain gifts to the church for its edification "until we all attain the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son* of God" (Eph 4:13). The faith of the Thessalonians "grows abundantly" (2 Thess 1:3; cf. 2 Cor 10:15). On the other hand he recognizes that some believers are "weak in faith" (Rom 14:1). Worse are those who profess faith but deny that Christ rose from the dead, for if Christ was not raised from the dead, "your faith is empty" (1 Cor 15:14), or "futile"* (1 Cor 15:17). The mention of "sincere faith" (1 Tim 1:5 NRSV) perhaps indicates that a spurious faith was not unknown (see Volf, esp. sec. VII, for this distinction; see Apostasy, Falling Away, Perseverance).

Faith is linked with other important Christian qualities, notably with love* (as Philem 5). In a noteworthy trio Paul says, "Now there abides faith, hope,* love, these three" (1 Cor 13:13), where the singular verb links the three very closely indeed (unless it simply agrees with the nearest subject [see BDF 135], or else Paul is grouping the three qualities into a unified subject; see Martin 1984, 54-56). These three qualities are linked elsewhere (e.g., Gal 5:5-6; Eph 1:15-18; Col 1:4-5; 1 Thess 1:3). The linkage of faith with hope and love is apparently a truth to which Paul gave frequent expression. And, of course, he links faith with several important Christian virtues when he lists "the fruit of the Spirit"* (Gal 5:22-23). He prays that Christ may dwell in the hearts of the Ephesian* Christians and goes on to the thought that they are "rooted and grounded in love" (Eph 3:17). He brings the letter to the Ephesians to a close with the prayer* that peace and love and faith "from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" might be with the brothers and sisters (Eph 6:23). Or he may link faith with "the hope of the gospel" (Col 1:23).

We should not think of faith as a virtue Christians produce by their own meritorious act. Believers are sinners and quite unable to produce such a quality as saving faith out of their own resources. God bestows it, gives it as a gift (Rom 12:3; cf. 12:6). This accords with the fact that faith is sometimes seen as the basis of the whole Christian life. "We walk by faith" (2 Cor 5:7): faith pervades the whole of the life of the Christian. And Paul has a notable statement when he says that he has "died to the Law" that he might "live for God" and goes on, "I have been crucified with Christ, and no longer is it I that lives, but Christ lives in me; and what I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God" (Gal 2:19-20). There are depths in this statement, but for our present purpose the important thing is that Paul can say that his whole life is lived "by faith in the Son of God." Faith is central to all of his life.

Life is not always peaceful and Paul recognizes the inevitability of conflict between good and evil, which involves the people of God. He makes use of the metaphor of armor a number of times and sees "the shield of faith" as important; with it believers can "quench all the flaming arrows of the evil one" (Eph 6:16). From another point of view he uses the thought of conflict when he urges the Philippians to stand firm and strive "for the faith of the gospel" (Phil 1:27; see 10 below).

8. Faith and Obedience.

In the opening to Romans Paul speaks of the "obedience of faith" (Rom 1:5; 16:26). This has been understood in a number of ways. It is unlikely that it means "obedience to the faith" (Moffatt; surely the article would be used if this were his meaning). "Obedience which consists in faith" or "obedience which springs from faith" are much more likely. For our present purpose the important point is that faith and obedience are linked; we must not take Paul's emphasis on faith to mean that he is doing away with the importance of obedience. Those who really trust Christ will be obedient to his will. "The word of faith" (Rom 10:8) probably is another demand for obedience, with the meaning "the message that calls for obedience."

Paul does not set forth a series of food* laws, but he lived in an age and a place where food laws were not uncommon among religious people. If a Christian had the faith that enabled one to see that food laws were irrelevant, then that Christian might well eat forbidden foods, but "those who have doubts are condemned if they eat, because they do not eat out of faith" (Rom 14:23; Paul adds, "everything that is not of faith is sin"). Faith (or the lack of faith) determines what we may eat! We are not to think of faith as doing away with ethical conduct (see Ethics). Rather faith leads to ethical responsibility, especially where new Christians are concerned (see Idolatry; Strong and Weak).

9. Faith and the Church.

Paul can stress the importance of membership in the heavenly family. "You are all children of God through faith," he writes, and adds, "in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:26), which is probably to be understood not so much of "faith in Christ" (though that is true) as "children of God" and also people "in Christ Jesus" (so Bruce; see Adoption, Sonship). It is faith and not any human achievement that admits believers to membership of the family of God.

Paul expected his converts to be linked in communities of faith. He speaks of the whole church* as "the household* of faith" (Gal 6:10). What characterizes a group of believers to whom he writes is that they have faith. He rejoices that the faith of the Roman Christians is proclaimed throughout the world (Rom 1:8). He says that he has heard of the Ephesians' faith in the Lord Jesus (Eph 1:15), so their faith was also widely known. And, apostolic leader though he was, he looks to be encouraged by the faith of the Roman Christians (Rom 1:12). He plays down the part played by rival Christian preachers and leaders at Corinth.* He says that he has no authority* over the faith of the Corinthians and says firmly, "for you stand by faith" (2 Cor 1:24). The Corinthian Christians had their direct relationship to God by faith and Paul had no authority to interpose himself.

The adjective pistos signifies "faithful" and is used to make the point that God is faithful (1 Cor 1:9; 10:13). But believers may also be said to be faithful, either believers as a whole (Eph 1:1; 1 Tim 4:12), or individual believers such as Timothy (1 Cor 4:17) or Tychicus (Col 4:7). Indeed, Paul maintains that he himself is faithful (1 Cor 7:25; i.e., trustworthy, cf. 1 Cor 4:2).

10. The Faith.

Mostly Paul speaks of faith in terms of trust in Christ or in God. It is the basic attitude that brings people out of their sinfulness into a right relationship with the Deity. So fundamental is faith that the term may be used to categorize the whole Christian way, and the expression "the faith" comes into being, not simply as a way of referring to the trust in Christ that is so basic, but as a means of drawing attention to the whole body of teaching and practice that characterizes the Christian group. It all springs from faith and is an expression of faith, yet it articulates and expresses what Christians believe, their doctrine or "deposit" (a term frequent in the Pastorals*).

Thus Paul can say that he now preaches "the faith" he formerly persecuted (Gal 1:23). He does not mean that he persecuted people for trusting God; he is saying that he persecuted those who accepted the whole Christian system of truth that so strongly emphasized the importance of faith. We should not overlook the fact that faith is so central to Christianity that it can be characterized in terms of that word. But here it is not the simple exercise of trust in Christ that is meant, but the Christian way of belief that results from that trust.

We see this too in such a passage as, "Examine yourselves whether you are in the faith, test yourselves" (2 Cor 13:5). These words seem to mean more than "Test whether you still trust Christ"; they point to an understanding of truth that arises from trust in the Savior. It will be much the same with Paul's exhortation to the Corinthians: "Stand fast in the faith" (1 Cor 16:13), where it is surely the body of Christian teaching that is in mind. The Philippians are urged to contend "for the faith of the gospel" (Phil 1:27), in which we see a very clear use of "the faith" for the doctrinal content of the gospel that was preached (unless we understand the words in the sense "the faith brought about by the gospel"). In the Pastoral letters it is important that people, especially leaders, should be "sound in the faith" (Tit 1:13; 2:2). Paul prophesied that in the last times some "will renounce the faith" (1 Tim 4:1; cf. 4:6). But as his life drew near to its close he could write, "I have kept the faith" (2 Tim 4:7).

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; CREED; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; GOSPEL; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Barth, "πίστις κτλ," EDNT 3.91-98; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Galatians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); O. Becker and O. Michel, "Faith," NIDNTT 1.587-606; E. C. Blackman, "Faith, Faithfulness," IDB 2.222-34; R. Bultmann, "πείθω κτλ," TDNT VI.1-11; idem, "πιστεύω κτλ," TDNT VI.174-228; idem, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Charles Scribners, 1951, 1955) 1.314-30; D. A. Campbell, "The Meaning of ΠΙΣΤΙΣ and NOMOΣ in Paul: A Linguistic and Structural Perspective," JBL 111 (1992) 91-103; K. W. Clements, Faith (London: SCM, 1981); H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament (New York: Harper & Row, 1969) 171-73; J. D. G. Dunn, "Once More, ΠΙΣΤΙΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ," SBL Seminar Papers (Atlanta: Scholars, 1991) 730-44; idem, Romans (2 vols.; WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) 2.124-34; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1981) 591-94; R. Hays, "ΠΙΣΤΙΣ and Pauline Christology: What Is at Stake?," SBL Seminar Papers (Atlanta: Scholars, 1991) 714-29; idem, The Faith of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1—4:11 (SBLDS 56; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1983); M. D. Hooker, "ΠΙΣΤΙΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ," NTS 35 (1989) 321-42; G. Howard, "Faith of Christ," ABD II.758-60; idem, "On the 'Faith of Christ,' " HTR 60 (1967) 459-65; A. J. Hultgren, "The Pistis Christou Formulation in Paul," NovT 22 (1980) 248-63; D. R. Lindsay, "The Roots and Development of the πιστ-Word Group as Faith Terminology," JSNT 49 (1993) 103-18; H. Ljungman, Pistis: A Study of Its Presuppositions and Its Meaning in Pauline Use (Lund: Gleerup, 1964); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41: Dallas: Word, 1990); idem, "The Obedience of Christ in the Early Church," in Reconciliation and Hope, ed. R. J. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 146-47; J. G. Machen, What Is Faith? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); idem, The Spirit and the Congregation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); L. Morris, New Testament Theology (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1986) 82-84; H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids; Eerdmans, 1975) 231-52; E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); W. Schmithals, Gnosticism at Corinth (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); W. C. van Unnik, "Reisepläne und Amen-Sagen. Zusammenhang und Gedankenfolge in 2 Korinther 1:15-24," in Studia Paulina, ed. J. N. Sevenster and W. C. van Unnik (Haarlem: Bohn, 1953); J. M. Gundry Volf, Paul and Perseverance (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); O. Wischmeyer, Der höchste Weg. Das 13. Kapitel des 1. Korintherbriefes (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlag, 1981).

L. Morris

FAITH OF JESUS CHRIST. See FAITH.

FAITHFULNESS OF GOD. See FAITH; GOD; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

FALLING AWAY. See APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE.

FALSE APOSTLES. See APOSTLE; JUDAIZERS; OPPONENTS OF PAUL.

FAMILY. See CHURCH; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES.

FAMINE RELIEF VISIT. See CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; JERUSALEM.

FATE. See MAGIC; WORSHIP.

FATHER. See GOD.

FEAR, REVERENCE

Fear or reverence refers in Paul to the appropriate level of respect and honor to be shown to another, often in light of fulfilling one's service* to God.* It also implies terror at the prospect of failing to fulfill one's obligation. Paul asserts that believers are to show fear or reverence with respect to God and Christ,* the state, and other humans. The relation among these, in Paul's thinking, is that reverence or fear of God constitutes a suitable basis for Christian conduct. Paul's concept of fear or reverence is grounded in the OT idea of fear or reverence not being a completely sinister terror stemming from being subjected to an angry deity. For Paul, fear or reverence reflects an appropriate response in terms of respect, honor and service due to the powerful and holy God who is bound by covenant* to his people. Due reverence demands moral and cultic obedience; disobedience or not showing due respect warrants justifiable terror. Paul uses the words phobos and phobeomai almost exclusively when referring to this concept. (He never uses tremō or eulabeomai/eulabeia, found elsewhere in the NT.)

1. Fear and Reverence of God and Christ

2. Fear and Reverence Directed to the State
3. Fear and Reverence of Humans
4. Fear as a Personality Trait
5. Fear and Trembling

1. Fear and Reverence of God and Christ.
For Paul fear or reverence of God or Christ is foundational for the Christian's relations to God and humanity. Apart from use of the phrase "fear and trembling" (see 5 below), there are four major contexts that define the Pauline concept of fear or reverence of God and Christ.

In Romans 3:18 Paul establishes the verdict that Jew and Gentile* alike stand condemned under sin*; Paul supports this by quoting from the OT, concluding with Psalm 36:1: "there is no fear of God before their eyes." As Cranfield says, this "is a figurative way of saying" that for an individual condemned under sin "the fear of God has no part in directing his life, that God is left out of his reckoning, that he is a practical, whether or not he is a theoretical, atheist" (Cranfield, 1.195). In Romans 11:20 Paul tells his Gentile Roman readers that they should not be arrogant because God has grafted them into the olive* tree and cut off unbelieving Jews; rather, they should fear. Although the Greek word phobos ("fear") is unmodified, in the context "fear of God" is spoken of. The link between fear and reverence as an appropriate response to God and fear or terror for disobedience is well illustrated by these passages.

In 2 Corinthians 5 Paul grounds his confidence regarding the state of believers after death (2 Cor 5:6-10), despite its uncertain nature, in the "fear of the Lord" (2 Cor 5:11). This serves as a transition to his defense of his Corinthian* ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:11-21; see Peace, Reconciliation). Paul concludes with reference to God's promises and the believers' obligation to respond appropriately through cleansing themselves from defilement and perfecting themselves in sanctification, a passage probably influenced by cultic terminology (see Holiness, Sanctification). Sanctification is grounded "in fear of God" (2 Cor 7:1). The word "in" (en) refers to the sphere or arena in which sanctification occurs.

In Colossians 3:22 the author commands slaves* to be genuinely obedient, fearing the Lord. The word lord (kyrios), also used for earthly masters, refers here to Christ, as Colossians 3:24 confirms (O'Brien, 227-28): serving the "Lord" or Christ is the backdrop for all the commands in the Colossian household* code. Similar OT phrasing (e.g., Ex 1:17, 21; Lev 19:14, 32; 25:17; Ps 54:20) is consistent with other features of Yahweh attributed to Christ in Colossians (see Col 1:15-20). Grounding these practical exhortations in the larger sphere of divine service forges links with the OT tradition of service to God. Unlike the chief letters of Paul, and Colossians, Ephesians 5:21 introduces a new "divine" object of fear or reverence by referring directly to being subject to others in the fear of Christ. Even though the believer's fear is directed toward Christ, in distinction from God or the Lord, the sense of "in" (en) to describe the sphere or arena in which the action is performed is similar to the use in 2 Corinthians 7:1. Christian submission exists in the realm of fear of Christ.

2. Fear and Reverence Directed to the State.
In Romans 13:1-7 Paul commends fear of those who are authorities characterized by justice, "just authorities" (see Civil Authority). These authorities are appointed by God to reward good and punish evil behavior. "Just authorities," Paul states, are not an object of terror to the one who does good (Rom 13:3), but are objects of terror to those who do evil (Rom 13:4). In light of these guidelines Paul instructs his readers to give fear or reverence to the one deserving it (Rom 13:7). The relation between fear or reverence as a sign of appropriate behavior, as opposed to fear or terror as a sign of disobedience to God, is well illustrated by the contrasting uses of phobos in Romans 13:3, 4 and 7. Scholars do not agree on whether the "fear" in Romans 13:7 is to be given to the authorities or to God. Paul's advocacy of paying taxes, and his general advocacy of standards of Christian behavior in Romans 12—15, argue for fear of the authorities. Paul's preceding statements, which establish the "just authorities" as servants of God, argue for fear of God. The two concepts are not easily separated. When Paul speaks of fear of authorities, he is speaking of authorities who behave justly and are instituted by God. Since they are God's agents of good on earth, defiance of them incurs judgment,* a judgment endorsed by God and worthy of fear or terror.

3. Fear and Reverence of Humans.
In 2 Corinthians 7:11 Paul chronicles the results of godly sorrow, listing one of these as fear. Although Paul may be referring here to fear of God, the context of Paul's commendation of the Corinthians' change of heart makes it likely that he is referring to their fear of him as apostle,* whether as God's comforter or punisher (1 Cor 4:21). In Galatians 2:12, in recounting his rebuke of Cephas, Paul attributes Cephas's reaction to fear of the party of the circumcision,* a fear resulting in an inappropriate response.

In Ephesians 5:33 the husband is commanded to love his wife as himself, but the wife is told to fear her husband, that is, to show an appropriate reverence and respect befitting her service to God. This is the concluding statement of the household code on the reciprocal relations of husbands and wives (Eph 5:21-33). In 1 Timothy 5:20 fear is a means of condemning sin. It is not said what the object of "fear" is. It could be fear of falling into sin, or it could be fear of God.

4. Fear as a Personality Trait.

The majority of instances in which Paul speaks of fear or reverence are in contexts of a healthy fear or reverence that motivates appropriate behavior in relation to God or Christ, to the state or to other humans (see 1-3 above). There are several instances, however, where Pauline words often translated "fear" or "timidity" refer to a personality trait. These instances do not permit drawing theological conclusions, such as seeing this trait as having its origin in God's character. In many instances, the trait is simply an unfocused anxiety. In Romans 8:15 Paul contrasts two human spirits, one of servitude and one of sonship (see Adoption, Sonship). The former is said to lead "to" (eis) fear. In 2 Corinthians 7:5 Paul confesses to afflictions* without and fears within. Whereas scholars are divided over whether Paul's external troubles are human adversaries or adverse circumstances, the consensus regarding his internal fears is that he is anxious over possible failure at Corinth. In 2 Corinthians 11:3 and 12:20 Paul expresses his anxiety regarding the Corinthians' spiritual choices. In Galatians 4:11 Paul expresses anxiety for his readers on the chance that he has vainly labored for them. And in 2 Timothy 1:7, in a discussion of human traits given by God, Paul contrasts those of power,* love* and wisdom* with "timidity" (deilia, the only use of this word in the Pauline literature).

5. Fear and Trembling.

The phrase "fear and trembling" is unique to the Pauline writings in the NT (1 Cor 2:3; 2 Cor 7:15; Phil 2:12; Eph 6:5).

Many recent commentators, following Michael, have argued for a sociologically based use of "fear and trembling," reflecting an attitude to be displayed toward others. In 1 Corinthians 2:3 and 2 Corinthians 7:15 Paul has "fear and trembling" regarding his own reception by the Corinthians and the Corinthians' rightful performance of their duties toward Titus. This sense is not so evident in the context of Philippians 2:12. After his christological passage of Philippians 2:6-11, regarding Christ's example, Paul tells his audience to be similarly obedient and to work out their salvation with "fear and trembling." Although "salvation"* might mean "spiritual health" (Hawthorne), the normal sense of the Pauline language—supported by the context—is soteriological. Paul is not saying here that, in light of Christ's example of obedience to God, Christians should accomplish their salvation with fear and trembling directed toward other believers; he is endorsing fear and trembling toward God (Silva, 34, "godly fear").

Unlike the above examples, Ephesians 6:5 states that slaves are to show "fear and trembling" toward their earthly masters. The fear is directed toward humans outside the sphere of ecclesial relations, although the addition of the phrase "as to Christ" brings it into harmony with the Colossian household code (see 1 above).

See also CIVIL AUTHORITIES; GOD; HOUSEHOLDS, HOUSEHOLD CODES; LORD; SERVANT, SERVICE; SLAVE, SLAVERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); W. Lillie, "The Pauline House-table," ExpT 86 (1975) 179-83; A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); J. H. Michael, " 'Work out your own Salvation,' " Expositor 9th series, 2 (1924) 439-50; P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco, TX: Word, 1982); S. E. Porter, "Romans 13:1-7 as Pauline Political Rhetoric," Filologia Neotestamentaria 3.6 (1990) 115-39; M. Silva, Philippians (WEC; Chicago: Moody, 1989). S. E. Porter

FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING

The relationship of believers to one another in the common experience of salvation* is chiefly presented in Paul by several Greek word groups (including koinōneō and its cognates, together with the verbs metechō and merizō), along with several words having the prefix syn- and a number of images (e.g., the body) which express the idea of common participation. The focus of attention in this article will be the koinōnia ("fellowship") word group. Much of the key NT teaching on fellowship is found in Paul who uses the verb koinōneō five times out of a total eight occurrences, and the noun koinōnia thirteen times out of nineteen instances (as well as five examples of syngkoinōneō and its cognate noun). Koinōnia, which was used so expansively in the Greek world as to lose much of its shape (it covered all types of common enterprise, including a marriage union and bonds of human friendship), had to do with "having something in common with someone" and was rendered in the NT by "association," "communion," "fellowship," "close relationship," "generosity," "sign of fellowship," "gift," "contribution" and "participation." The NT emphasis is on the participation "in something," particularly objective realities outside and independent of one's existence (Martin), rather than the association "with someone" which is the emphasis on the contemporary notion of "fellowship."

1. Having a Share In
2. Giving a Share In

1. Having a Share In.

In several significant Pauline instances of the koinōnia word group the dominant idea is of believers sharing together in something, often spiritual realities. So 1 Corinthians 1:9 signifies "the fellowship with (literally "of") his Son, Jesus Christ," into which the Corinthians have been called by God (cf. 1 Cor 10:16, where the readers' participation in a common meal is, in some sense, a sharing in the body and blood of Christ). This common sharing of Christ stands over against the party slogans of the Corinthians.* The Philippians,* who share with (syngkoinōnos) Paul in the grace* of God (perhaps this is a reference to the grace of his apostleship, Phil 1:7), have experienced "the fellowship of the Spirit" (Phil 2:1; see Holy Spirit), an expression which is best understood as a participation in the Holy Spirit (an objective genitive) rather than the fellowship which is created by the Holy Spirit (a subjective genitive). Their common sharing in the Spirit should be a decisive factor in their life together (Phil 2:1-4) as "one body in Christ" (Rom 12:5). Similarly, 2 Corinthians 13:13 is best interpreted as the participation in the Holy Spirit rather than that which is created by the Holy Spirit.

Elsewhere in Paul this language of fellowship is used of those who enjoy certain privileges in common: in Romans 11:17 Gentile believers are sharers along with (syngkoinōnos) Jews in the rich inheritance that belongs to Abraham's* children (cf. Rom 15:27), while in 1 Corinthians 9:23 the apostle* speaks of his energetic and single-minded activity "for the sake of the gospel, that I may share (syngkoinōnos) in its blessings." Common experiences of a different kind (1 Cor 10:18, 20) can also be described by the adjective koinōnoi ("sharers").

In the unique expression, "the fellowship (koinōnia) of his sufferings*" (Phil 3:10; cf. 2 Cor 1:7 where koinōnoi, "sharers," is used), Paul's own afflictions are an active participation in Christ's "sufferings" (the genitive is objective, denoting that in which one participates). These afflictions do not refer to Christ's redemptive death on the cross but, like the messianic woes of Jewish apocalyptic* thought, designate the trials (see Afflictions, Trials) in which all Christians share (cf. Acts 14:22; 1 Thess 3:3, 7). By participating in Christ's afflictions, Paul was entering into a deeper personal relationship with his Lord* and thus becoming more like him every day. This fellowship was evidence that Paul was truly one of the Messiah's people, destined for salvation and future glory* (Phil 1:29; Rom 8:17).

A similar note is struck in Philippians 4:14 where it is asserted that the Philippians had "made common cause with" (syngkoinōneō) the apostle in his affliction. By their recent gift (cf. Phil 4:15) they had identified with him in his ministry* and given further evidence of their participation in the apostolic task of proclaiming the gospel* (Phil 1:5).

2. Giving a Share In.

Both the noun koinōnia and its cognate koinōneō are used by Paul in an active sense of "sharing with" another person or group. So the Macedonians assisted the poverty-stricken saints of the Jerusalem* church by their "contribution" (koinōnia), that is, "their generosity" (2 Cor 8:4), even when they themselves were in great financial distress (see Collection). Paul wants the Corinthians to follow this splendid example (2 Cor 9:13).

Similarly, at Philippians 1:5 the apostle states that he is thankful for the Philippians' "partnership in the gospel" (euangelion). This phrase is not to be taken in a passive sense and therefore equivalent to "your faith" (Seesemann), but denotes their active cooperation in the widest sense. Euangelion is a noun of agency describing an activity of furthering the gospel mission* to Gentiles.* Several writers take the term koinōnia to signify "generosity" here, with the Philippians' financial help being a signal instance of this active cooperation.

In his opening prayer* for Philemon,* Paul prays that his colleague's "generosity or liberality" (koinōnia), which arises from his faith, might lead him effectively into a deeper understanding of all the blessings that belong to him and others incorporated into Christ (Philem 6).

Both noun and verb can then designate a concrete form of this generosity and come to signify a "gift," "contribution" (Phil 4:15; cf. Gal 6:6; see Financial Support) and even the "collection" for the needy Christians of the Jerusalem church* (Rom 15:26).

See also BODY OF CHRIST; CHURCH; COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; HOLY SPIRIT; IN CHRIST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Y. Campbell, "κοινωνία and its Cognates in the New Testament," in Three New Testament Studies (Leiden: Brill, 1965) 1-28; J. Hainz, Koinonia. 'Kirche' als Gemeinschaft bei Paulus (BU 16; Regensburg: Pustet, 1982); F. Hauck, "κοινός κτλ," TDNT III.797-809; J. M. McDermott, "The Biblical Doctrine of KOINΩNIA," BZ 19 (1975) 64-77, 219-33; R. P. Martin, The Family and the Fellowship (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979); G. Panikulam, Koinōnia in the New Testament: A Dynamic Expression of Christian Life (AnBib 85; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1979); H. Seesemann, Der Begriff KOINΩNIA im Neuen Testament (BZNW 14; Giessen: 1933); M. J. Suggs, "Koinonia in the New Testament," Mid-Stream 23 (1984) 351-62.

P. T. O'Brien

FINAL JUDGMENT. See ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT.

FINANCIAL SUPPORT

Paul's letters have more to say about the financial support of ministers and fundraising in the church than any other part of the NT. In 1 Corinthians 9 and 2 Corinthians 11—12 Paul explains why he refuses the financial support that is his right as an apostle; and, in his letter to the Philippians, Paul thanks the church for their generous financial support of his ministry. One of the major projects of Paul's ministry was raising money for a collection* that would go to the poor in the Jerusalem* church. He writes extensively about this collection in 2 Corinthians 8—9 and mentions it in Romans 15:25-32, 1 Corinthians 16:1-4 and Galatians 2:9-10. These texts show that for Paul, financial issues always had important theological implications and that requests for money were to be related to the message of the gospel.*

1. Financial Support of Apostles
2. The Collection
3. Money and Mission

1. Financial Support of Apostles.

The issue of financial support is raised in Paul's defense of his apostleship in 1 Corinthians 9 and 2 Corinthians 11—12 (see Apostle). The most striking aspect of Paul's comments is his refusal to accept support from the Corinthian congregation, a refusal which evidently gave rise to considerable misunderstanding at Corinth. Here the connection between money and authority* is at issue. Paul was accused of not having true apostolic authority because he did not receive the usual apostolic support.

1.1. Historical Background to the Issue of Support. The Corinthians probably questioned Paul's authority because they understood Paul's actions in terms of the issue of how teachers and philosophers (see Philosophy) ought to be supported. In contemporary Greek society there was much debate about how philosophers and teachers should support themselves. Most philosophers either charged fees or accepted the patronage of a wealthy individual. The major criticism of this method of support was that it placed a philosopher under obligation to a patron and therefore jeopardized the philosopher's freedom to teach the truth. In Hellenistic society the giving and receiving of benefactions was an extremely important component of the social structure. The wealthy expressed their power by becoming patrons, and since benefaction was the basis of friendship, refusing a gift was an act of enmity. Philosophers who wished to avoid this network of obligation could either beg, as the Cynics chose to do, or work. However, since most of Greek society looked down on those who worked at a trade or begged, not many philosophers chose these methods of support. Those who did gained freedom at the expense of social status.

Seen against this background the Corinthians' misunderstanding of Paul's refusal to accept support makes sense. In refusing support from the Corinthians, Paul could be understood as refusing their friendship or refusing to offer them a chance to share in the ministry* of the gospel. Paul could also be seen as demeaning the Corinthians as well as himself by working at a trade rather than accepting their patronage (see Tentmaking). It is not just Paul's status as an apostle but the Corinthians' status as a congregation that is at issue here. The Corinthians want their apostle to have honor in society and want to share in that honor by supporting him. So they ask whether or not Paul deserves to be honored as a true apostle if he refuses to accept true apostolic support.

1.2. Reasons for Financial Support of Apostles. In 1 Corinthians 9 Paul begins his defense of his apostleship (and his apostolic right to refuse support) by a vigorous defense of an apostle's right to earn a living by the preaching of the gospel.

Paul's authority as an apostle has been challenged, so he starts his defense in 1 Corinthians 9:1-2 by establishing himself as an apostle and reminding the Corinthians that their congregation is the result of his apostolic labors. Paul establishes the fact that he and Barnabas have the same right to material support as the other apostles in 1 Corinthians 9:4-14. Apostles have the right to receive food and drink and to be accompanied by a wife (who would, presumably, also be supported). Like other apostles, Paul has the right not to have to work in order to support himself, but to get his living by the gospel. Paul offers several different arguments to prove his point about an apostle's right to support. He first uses several analogies that show that in everyday life people expect to be supported by their labor. Paul then uses a scriptural example to show that the Law also speaks to this issue and insists that even animals are to be fed from their labors. Even more to the point, he reminds the Corinthians that those who minister in both Jewish and pagan temples get their food from the sacrifices. Supporting those who serve at the altar is part of both Jewish and Hellenistic piety. Christian ministers are no different, which is why the Lord commands that those who preach the gospel are to live by the gospel.

In the argument about apostolic rights to support Paul is defending his apostolic authority. The Greek word exousia, translated "right," can also mean "authority."* Understanding that apostolic authority, rather than apostolic rights, is the major focus of Paul's defense helps explain why Paul also argues that he has the authority to give up his apostolic right to material support. In Paul's discussion about apostolic rights, he has not only established his right to be supported but has also affirmed his authority by his refusal of support. This authority is based on the preaching of the gospel, not on taking financial support. Because he preaches the gospel, he has sown spiritual seed among the Corinthians, seed which has clearly resulted in the congregation which now questions his authority. He has the right to their material benefits, but he is not under any obligation to receive their financial support. His primary obligation is to the preaching of the gospel, and it is from the gospel that he receives his apostolic authority.

1.3. Why Paul Refuses Financial Support. As an apostle Paul's primary obligation is to the gospel itself. One of the signs of this apostolic authority is that for the sake of the gospel he renounces his right to financial support. Paul gives his reasons for his rejection of financial support in 1 Corinthians 9:12, 15-19, 2 Corinthians 11:7-15 and 2 Corinthians 12:13-18.

The first reason Paul gives for not accepting financial support is that he does not want to put a "stumbling block"* in the way of the gospel. Exactly what this "stumbling block" might be is not made clear in 1 Corinthians 9. In 2 Corinthians 11:9 and 2 Corinthians 12:14-18 Paul says that he does not want to burden the Corinthians or take advantage of them in anyway. As their "parent" in Christ he wants to give to them rather than receive from them. Paul's freedom in preaching the gospel also seems to be an issue in 1 Corinthians 9:15-23. Any appearance of greed or obligation to the Corinthian congregation might hurt the cause of the gospel of Christ.

Paul's second reason for refusing financial support is found in 1 Corinthians 9:15-18. Refusing financial support gives Paul a "ground for boasting" in the gospel. Since his primary obligation as an apostle is the preaching of the gospel, he cannot boast about his preaching or the apostolic authority the gospel confers upon him. But he is under no obligation to receive financial support for his preaching. In fact, by refusing financial support he is able to proclaim the gospel even more effectively. This is the reward he seeks. When he preaches the gospel "free of charge" he is a living example of the message he preaches—that God's grace is freely offered to all in Christ. This is why Paul can use his boast of not accepting support to expose the false apostles in 2 Corinthians 11:10-18 (see Opponents). These false apostles show that they are not serving the true gospel, and therefore do not have true apostolic status, when they take advantage of the Corinthians financially. When the truth of the gospel is at stake, Paul is able to boast that he serves only the gospel, not his own financial interests. When Paul refuses financial support, he does so because of his own unique apostolic relationship to the gospel he preaches.

The Corinthians think that accepting financial support shows that one has apostolic status. Paul turns this type of thinking around and ties his authority as an apostle to the gospel he preaches. The fact that he offers this gospel free of charge and refuses financial support rather than put a stumbling block in the way of the gospel proves his true apostolic status. Paul's overall concern as an apostle is to avoid misusing his authority and thereby hurting the cause of the gospel. The single passion of Paul's life—all things for the sake of the gospel—is reflected in his renunciation of financial support.

1.4. Did Paul Always Refuse Support? Paul's correspondence with the Corinthians makes it clear that he did not accept financial support from the Corinthian church. He also appears to have followed this policy during his time in Thessalonica (1 Thess 2:9). But in 2 Corinthians 11:9 Paul mentions that he received support from Macedonian Christians during the time he spent in Corinth. In Philippians 4:10-20 Paul makes a point of thanking the church for their generous gift to him. Their gift has more than met his need, and Paul assures the Philippians that God will also meet their needs. The Philippian church has been Paul's partner in the gospel from the beginning of his ministry, especially during the time he was at Thessalonica. This financial partnership reflects the close bond between Paul and the Philippian congregation. Philippians 4:15 suggests that the Philippians may have been the only church that supported his ministry, although 2 Corinthians 11:8 implies that other churches may also have supported Paul. Why did Paul accept financial support from the Philippians and refuse support when he was at Corinth and Thessalonica?

There is no indication that Paul accepted financial support from the Philippians when he was actually at Philippi. Their support came after he departed and went on to establish other churches. In their giving the Philippians entered into partnership with Paul in the proclamation of the gospel. It appears that Paul did not accept support from any church when he was actively working in that church. But after he had established a church, he expected them to contribute to the cause of the gospel. This is not inconsistent behavior on Paul's part. It is merely another example of Paul putting the gospel first and using money in ways that further the preaching of the gospel rather than hindering it. Even though Paul did not expect financial support from the Corinthian church for his ministry at Corinth, he did expect them to support his work later. This is made especially clear in Paul's pleas that the Corinthians contribute generously to the collection for the saints at Jerusalem.

2. The Collection.

Even though Paul did not ask the churches he worked in to support him financially, he had no hesitation about asking them to contribute to one of his ongoing projects—the collection* for "the poor among the saints at Jerusalem" (Rom 15:26). The collection is mentioned in Galatians 2:10 in connection with Paul's visit to the Jerusalem apostles. As part of the agreement that Paul would go to the Gentiles* and the other apostles to the Jews (see Israel), Paul agrees to "remember the poor" (see Rich and Poor). In Romans 15:25-32 Paul tells the church that he is taking a contribution to Jerusalem before he comes to visit them at Rome. This contribution comes from the saints in Macedonia and Achaia as a grateful response for the spiritual blessings they have received and as a tangible expression of unity between Jew and Gentile in Christ. In 1 Corinthians 16:1-4 Paul also mentions taking the collection to Jerusalem and how contributions to the collection ought to be made. In 2 Corinthians 8 and 9 Paul makes it clear just how important this collection is to him and why the Corinthians ought to give to it.

Even though this collection was of vital importance to Paul, it is not mentioned in the rest of the NT. This is especially surprising in Acts, which does refer to Paul's meeting with the Jerusalem apostles and his final journey to Jerusalem. The only time Acts speaks of Paul bringing money to Jerusalem is in Acts 11:29-30, where the Gentiles send money to Judea at the time of the great famine. But this does not seem to be the collection referred to in Paul's letters, although it may be the prototype of that collection. The Acts 11 event occurs at the very beginning of the Gentile mission before Paul had even established the churches he writes to about the collection. The Acts 15 account of Paul's meeting with the Jerusalem apostles does not include any reference to money or relief for the poor at all. The Acts 21 account of Paul's final journey to Jerusalem sounds very much like the trip Paul mentions in Romans 15:25-32, but again there is no mention of money. Did Paul eventually deliver the collection? Perhaps he did as part of his final journey to Jerusalem, as he implies in Acts 24:17 in his speech before Felix. But on the basis of Acts alone it is impossible to be certain. All of our direct information about the collection comes from Paul's letters.

2.1. Historical Background to the Collection. In his commentary on 2 Corinthians F. W. Danker suggests that the Hellenistic system of patronage is an important historical background to the collection (see 1.1. above). A question often asked about the collection is whether there were any precedents within Judaism for such an activity. Two antecedents are worth considering: the Temple tax and a votive offering.

K. F. Nickle has explored the parallels between the Temple tax and the collection. The Temple tax of one half-shekel was used to support the cult of the Jerusalem Temple. Payment of this tax was obligatory for all Jewish males over the age of twenty, so that the whole Jewish people would be represented in the sacrifices bought with the tax money. In the Diaspora* the tax was collected in a central location and then sent with a large retinue to Jerusalem. The parallels between this tax and Paul's collection are impressive—both were large sums of money that were delivered to Jerusalem by delegates and both were used to represent the unity of God's people. But the differences are also obvious—Paul's collection was for the poor, not the Temple, and there is no indication that it was repeated or obligatory. H. D. Betz suggests that the collection also shows many similarities to a votive offering. The collection can be seen as a thank offering given to God for blessings received. Gifts of thanks to God were also bound up with provision for the poor, just as the collection was.

Neither the Temple tax nor the votive offering alone provides a convincing precedent for Paul's collection. But taken together, they seem to provide precedents for most of Paul's concerns for the collection. What is clear is that Paul gets many of his ideas about money from Judaism and applies those ideas in the churches he serves.

2.2. Fundraising for the Collection. Although Paul mentions the collection in Romans 15 and Galatians 2, he talks about giving money to the collection only in his correspondence with the Corinthian church. He devotes two entire chapters, 2 Corinthians 8—9, to urging the Corinthians to give generously to the collection. In these two chapters Paul's views of how Christians should use their money to glorify God are clearly set forth.

Paul begins his appeal to the Corinthians in 2 Corinthians 8:1-15 by describing the enthusiastic participation of the Macedonians. The Macedonians' liberality is a sign of the grace of God operating among them despite their affliction and poverty. This gift of money signifies their giving of themselves to God and serves as a model for the Corinthians. Paul challenges the Corinthians to prove that their love is genuine, and that they are generous benefactors like the Macedonians, by completing their contribution to the collection. That the Corinthian church had begun to make contributions is clear not only from this passage, but from 1 Corinthians 16:1-4 where Paul advises them to lay aside money for the collection each week. Paul holds up Christ's love for them as the reason they ought to enrich others as they have been enriched. The other reason they should want to contribute is the matter of equality between Christians—those who have abundance should help those in need. Paul is not asking for their money in order to impoverish them. Giving money is an opportunity to thank God for his abundant gifts, especially the gift of Christ, and a chance to show genuine love* for Christ by helping brothers and sisters in need. Paul understands giving as an act of ministry and as an expression of Christian fellowship.

In 2 Corinthians 8:16—9:5, Paul goes on to explain why Titus is returning to help with the collection. Titus is another generous benefactor who can serve as a model for the Corinthians and he has the best interests of the Corinthians at heart. Paul seems anxious that "no one shall blame us about this liberal gift we are administering." This same concern is reflected in 2 Corinthians 12:14-18. Several scholars have suggested that the Corinthians may have thought Paul was enriching himself at their expense by taking up the collection. They may even have accused him of using the collection to support himself even after he had refused their offer of support. Whatever the case, Paul is exceptionally careful to have others supervise the collection and do what is honorable by human standards. The identity of the "famous" brother and the "earnest" brother are the subjects of much debate; but no firm conclusions about their identities can be stated (see Furnish, 433-38, for a more complete discussion). The purpose of the men's coming is to make sure the Corinthians do earnestly attempt to complete their contributions. Paul reminds the Corinthians that if they fail to give what they have promised they will humiliate not only themselves, but Paul and Christ as well. Generous benefaction increases the prestige of the givers and those with whom they are associated, but parsimonious giving is a source of public shame. The Corinthians' participation in the collection project is a sign of their commitment to Paul, as well as to God. The most theologically interesting part of Paul's fund-raising appeal is found in the extended sowing/reaping metaphor of 2 Corinthians 9:6-15. The recognition of the spiritual and financial dimensions of sowing and reaping was a characteristic emphasis of Hellenistic and Jewish thought. Sowing was seen as a sign of trust in God, who could alone guarantee the harvest. In this context, any gift given to God was understood as a thank offering for blessings received. Since all things come from God, the issue is not whether one should sow, but how much one should sow. A thankful giver gives cheerfully and abundantly, knowing that both seed and harvest come from God. When God gives an abundant harvest, it is not only to bless the one who sows but also to enable further giving. God provides everything, including the means to be generous. In fact, since liberal sowing results in a liberal harvest, one can expect progressively larger harvests as one is provided with more seed to be sown. God will not only provide for the needs of the generous giver, but will multiply the giver's resources for even more generous giving. Generous giving glorifies God by providing for the needs of the saints, showing obedience to the gospel of Christ and results in even more thanks being given to God. It also results in intercessory prayer being offered on behalf of the benefactors because of the grace of God manifested through them. Both Jews and early Christians believed the prayers of the poor were especially powerful, so this would be yet another benefit to the generous giver.

In his use of the sowing/reaping metaphor, Paul sums up all the reasons why the Corinthians should give generously to the collection and does not hesitate to appeal to selfish motives as well as noble ones. Generous giving is an act of worship which gives thanks to God for his gifts. Since material and spiritual wealth are both gifts of divine generosity, one should share with others. Generosity will not leave one impoverished, but will allow God to give even more to the giver. The not-so-subtle threat here is that God will not bless those who refuse to give generously. So giving generously is truly in the Corinthians' best interests. They can glorify God and ensure further blessings for themselves at the same time.

2.3. The Theological Significance of the Collection. As the sowing/reaping metaphor shows, Paul regards giving as a theologically significant activity. What particular theological significance did Paul attach to the collection? Paul's discussion in 2 Corinthians 8—9 uses heavily theological language which points to three possible reasons the collection was so significant for Paul: concern for the poor, concern for the unity of Jew and Gentile in the church and concern for the eschatological significance of the Gentile mission.

Concern for the poor was a dominant element in both Jewish and Christian piety. This kind of concern for the poor characterized the ministry of Christ, who became poor so that those who follow him could become rich. This is why Paul can refer to generous giving as a sign of grace* (charis) and as a ministry* (diakonia) of the church. Generous giving to the poor is an integral part of a Christian's response to God's gift in Christ and an act of obedience to the gospel of Christ. This is certainly one of the reasons Paul thinks it is important for the Corinthians to give to the collection.

But the collection is not just a collection for the poor, it is a contribution to "the poor among the saints in Jerusalem"—a tangible expression of the unity of Jew and Gentile in Christ. This may be the most important aspect of the collection for Paul and is reflected in his use of the word "fellowship"* (koinōnia) to refer to the collection. This relationship between the collection and the unity of the church is clearly seen in Galatians 2:9-10. Here the Jerusalem apostles give Paul the "right hand of fellowship (koinōnia)," agreeing that Paul's mission is to the Gentiles and theirs is to the Jews. Paul also agrees to "remember the poor." In the context of the ongoing debate about whether Gentiles should keep the Law, a debate that not only brought Paul to Jerusalem but continued at Antioch* even after his agreement with the Jerusalem apostles, a tangible witness to the grace of God at work in the Gentiles took on tremendous importance. The collection is an expression of the reciprocity that characterizes Jew and Gentile in Christ. The Gentiles have participated in the spiritual blessings of the gospel through the Jews, and they pay off this spiritual debt by being of service to the Jews in material blessings (Rom 15:27). This kind of reciprocity in the gospel reinforced the unity of Jew and Gentile in Christ.

Several scholars, among them J. Munck and K. Nickle, have suggested that the collection also has eschatological* significance as an enactment of Paul's missionary theology (see Mission). Paul believed that the whole people of Israel would not embrace the gospel until "the full number of Gentiles* come in" (Rom 11:25). Paul's role as apostle to the Gentiles was to bring the Gentiles into the gospel so that Israel would turn to God. The collection and the Gentile delegates who accompanied it would fulfill the prophecies about Gentiles coming to Zion with gifts in the last days (Is 2:2-3; 60:5-6; Mic 4:1-2). Since the collection was an unmistakable sign of the salvation* of the Gentiles, it could serve both as verification of Paul's Law-free gospel to the Gentiles and as an instrument of the saving grace of God toward Israel. The only problem with this suggestion about the eschatological significance of the collection is that Paul does not ever mention it when he writes about the collection. For him the major significance of the collection lies in its witness to the unity of Jew and Gentile in Christ and in its contribution to the needs of the saints in Jerusalem.

3. Money and Mission.

Paul claims the right to ask for and receive money on the basis of his apostolic status. However, if receiving money would interfere with his apostolic task, he also claims the right to refuse it. He apparently did not ask for money from a community in which he was currently working, but he had no hesitation about receiving money for his continuing mission or raising money for others from a community he had already established. Is Paul's teaching about money contradictory and/or inconsistent? Not when one realizes that the controlling force in his requests for and refusal of money was the gospel of Christ. When money is being used to further the preaching of the gospel or to express the unity of all Christians in the gospel, Paul does not hesitate to ask for money. But if the receiving of money meant that the gospel might be abused, Paul is willing to refuse the money and to readjust his life for the sake of the gospel.

In Paul's understanding of money the spiritual and material aspects of giving and receiving are closely related. A minister who sows spiritual seed should receive material support from those who have benefited. Since the Gentiles have received spiritual blessing from the Jews, they should respond by blessing the Jews in material ways. Requests for money are rooted in partnership in the gospel; one gives out of thankfulness for the spiritual benefits received. In Paul's letters it is clear that the way Christians use their money should be an extension of the message of the gospel and the ministry of the church.

See also COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; FELLOWSHIP, COM-

MUNION, SHARING; JERUSALEM; MISSION; RICHES AND POVERTY; TENTMAKING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. Bassler, God and Mammon: Asking for Money in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1991); H. D. Betz, 2 Corinthians 8 and 9: A Commentary on Two Administrative Letters of the Apostle Paul (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); N. A. Dahl, "Paul and Possessions," in Studies in Paul: Theology for the Early Christian Mission (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977); F. W. Danker, II Corinthians (ACNT; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); V. P. Furnish, II Corinthians (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1984); D. Georgi, Remembering the Poor: The History of Paul's Collection for Jerusalem (Nashville: Abingdon, 1992); R. F. Hock, Tentmaking and Apostleship: The Social Context of Paul's Ministry (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); R. P. Martin, The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973); J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1959); K. F. Nickle, The Collection: A Study in Paul's Strategy (SBT; Naperville, IL: Alec R. Allenson, 1966).

J. M. Everts

FIRST ADAM. See ADAM AND CHRIST.

FIRST FRUITS, DOWN PAYMENT.

Paul found metaphors both in the Temple* and the marketplace to express how God* had pledged himself to believers, not only in giving his Son,* Jesus Christ,* but also the Spirit. Paul describes the Holy Spirit* as a "first fruit" (Rom 8:23) and as a "down payment" (2 Cor 1:22).

1. First Fruits
2. Down Payment

1. First Fruits.

The Greek term aparchē had a wide currency stretching from the fifth century B.C. through the patristic period. It referred to the first produce or profits that might be given as a gift of thanksgiving. The recipient might be a person or, as in most cases, the Temple. Its use evolved so that any offering—even Temple taxes on the people—could be called aparchē.

1.1. Jewish Temple Sacrifice. The background for Paul's thought comes from the Temple in Jerusalem. Since the land belonged to God, the Israelites were commanded to offer the "first fruit" (LXX aparchē) of flock and field to God for the maintenance of the priesthood and later of the priests and the Temple services (Deut 16:2; 18:4; Num 18:8-12; Neh 10:35-37; 12:44). Once God had received his portion, the people were set free to share in the remainder. The sacrifice of the part thus effected the blessedness of the whole. The harvest could not be enjoyed until Yahweh's portion had been given. This was worked out in particular during the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The feast began when the sickle cut the first grain (Deut 16:9) and these were given at "the place where the Lord your God shall choose," which later became the Temple in Jerusalem. Leviticus 23:9-14 tells how the priest should wave the first sheaf of the harvest before the Lord.

This concept found ready use in the OT as a metaphor for initial devotion to God. Even male children who opened the womb (thus the firstborn of the family) belonged to the Lord (Ex 13:3; Num 18:15). But this was quickly explained as a symbolic ritual (Num 18:15-16), for such children were not to be sacrificed but redeemed with five shekels of silver. The Levites, in turn, took the place of the firstborn in Israel, performing special service before God (Num 8:18), and in their dedication were presented as a wave offering before the Lord (Num 8:11; cf. Lev 23:9-11). Jeremiah similarly uses first fruits as a symbol of Israel: "Israel was holy to the Lord, the first fruits of his harvest" (Jer 2:3; cf. Jas 1:18).

1.2. Paul's Use of the Term. First fruit (aparchē) is a Pauline word. Seven of its nine uses in the NT are found in Paul's letters. He draws on this well-known Jewish metaphor in a variety of ways. When he was thinking about evangelism and the first converts of a region he called them "first fruits" (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:15; cf. 1 Cor 1:16). They were the first fruits of the eschatological harvest among the nations, a promise of the complete harvest to come (cf. Israel as first fruits of humanity in Philo Spec. Leg. 4.180). When he was thinking of redemption* and resurrection* he naturally referred to Jesus Christ as "the first fruits" of those raised from the dead (1 Cor 15:20, 23; cf. 1 Clem 24:1; see Firstborn).

An important use occurs in Romans 11:16. As the whole of the grain harvest was consecrated by the offering of the first sheaf, and as all of the baked bread of Israel was consecrated when a single cake made from the first-ground flour was offered (Num 15:17-21), and similarly as in Leviticus 19:23-25 fruit trees were called "uncircumcised" until an offering was made for them, so in the same way, Paul argues, Israel—even unbelieving Israel—was consecrated by the first fruits that went before (variously interpreted as the patriarchs, Jewish Christians, all the seed of Abraham or even Jesus Christ).

1.3. Romans 8:23. Paul's most interesting theological use of first fruits is found in Romans 8:23 where he refers to the Holy Spirit. Aparchē was often considered a foretaste of good things to come (cf. Barn 1.7). But here Paul reverses the relationship of giver and recipient. The Spirit serves to reassure and sustain believers as God's partial gift of the whole of salvation* awaiting them. But Paul's emphasis here is qualitative: believers can have confidence in the goodness of their salvation because the Spirit represents a portion of what is to come. Indeed, their experience of future adoption* will be just like the Spirit they now possess, but even more so. Paul reserves another term to show the certainty of God's promised gift: arrabōn.

2. Down Payment.

The Greek term arrabōn was a Semitic loanword which stemmed from the commercial vocabulary of Israel (ʿērāḇôn). An arrabōn was a first installment, a deposit, pledge, or a down payment. It represented a part of the purchase price in advance, "a payment which obligates the contracting party to make further payments" (BAGD, 109).

2.1. 2 Corinthians 1:22. Twice in 2 Corinthians Paul strives to build up the confidence of the Corinthians about the certainty of their faith. In 2 Corinthians 1:22 he refers to the Spirit as tangible evidence of God's presence with them and for them. It is a "guarantee" (RSV) that his promises are true. Here, however, he aligns arrabōn with "seal" (sphragis, sphragizomai), implying that this Spirit is not only a pledge for the future but God's mark of ownership. And in this particular case, it is a seal of apostolic ministry.* Paul is having to defend himself against critics who question the apostolic authority* of his work.

2.2. 2 Corinthians 5:5. A second text, 2 Corinthians 5:5, is similar but its theological context is different (contra Martin, 119, who sees eschatological salvation in both 2 Cor 5:5 and 1:22). Paul candidly describes the eschatological tension Christians face as they examine their own mortality ("this earthly tent that will be destroyed") while looking forward to their redemption (the building from God, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens). Here the issue is reassurance in light of death, judgment* and eternal life* (2 Cor 5:1-10). Believers groan and have anxiety as they look forward longingly. But God gives the Spirit as the arrabōn, the guarantee of their future destiny, namely, that their mortality will be swallowed up in life (see Immortality).

2.3. Ephesians 1:14. Paul's most precise description of arrabōn and the Spirit appears in Ephesians 1:14. Note again the union of favorite Pauline concepts: hope,* promise, destiny, seal, arrabōn and inheritance (Eph 1:11-14). The apostle once again describes the "already/not yet" tension of life and speaks of the Spirit as God's down payment on the believer's future. The Spirit is a deposit on "our inheritance—until we acquire possession of it." The Spirit for Paul, then, is an interim gift, a prelude and foretaste of the glory that is to come. The Spirit is not simply to comfort and strengthen believers during the trials of the world; the Spirit is also there to remind them of the future, that they possess identity as aliens in this world as they await their complete glorification (see Glory) in Christ.

2.4. Polycarp. The only occurrence of arrabōn among the early patristic fathers is found in Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians 8:1. Here the Bishop of Smyrna in Asia Minor states that Christ becomes the arrabōn of believers' righteousness.* Polycarp writes: "Let us therefore hold steadfastly and unceasingly to our hope and the guarantee of our righteousness, who is Christ Jesus, 'who bore our sins in his own body upon the tree.' "

See also ADOPTION, SONSHIP; ESCHATOLOGY; FIRSTBORN; HOLY SPIRIT; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Ahern, "The Indwelling Spirit, Pledge of our Inheritance," CBQ 9 (1947) 179-89; J. Behm, "ἀρραβών," TDNT I.475; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Charles Scribners, 1951, 1955) 2.330-40; F. W. Danker, "Consolation in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10," CTM 39 (1968) 552-56; G. Delling, "ἀπαρχή," TDNT I.484-86; E. E. Ellis, "2 Corinthians 5:1-10 in Pauline Eschatology," NTS 6 (1959-60) 211-24; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1981) 549-66; M. J. Harris, "2 Corinthians 5:1-10: A Watershed in Paul's Eschatology?" TynB 22 (1971) 32-57; R. P. Martin, "The Spirit in 2 Corinthians in Light of 'The Fellowship of the Holy Spirit,' " in Eschatology and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of George Raymond Beasley-Murray, ed. H. Gloer (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988) 113-28; C. L. Mitton, "Paul's Certainties. The Gift of the Spirit and Life Beyond Death: 2 Cor 5:1-5," ExpT 69 (1958) 260-63; H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); R. O. Rigsby, "First Fruits," ABD II.796-97; A. Sand, "ἀπαρχή," EDNT 1.116-17; idem, "ἀρραβών," EDNT 1.157-58; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel (2 vols.; New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961) 2.490-93; N. M. Watson, "2 Corinthians 5:1-10 in Recent Research," ABR 23 (1975) 33-36.

G. M. Burge

FIRSTBORN

The word firstborn (prōtotokos) appears eight times in the NT; most references are figurative, although a literal sense occurs at Luke 2:7. The term appears in the plural only at Hebrews 11:28 and 12:23 referring to believers; the remaining instances in the singular always refer to Jesus Christ (see Christ). In the latter contexts, while priority of time is in view (Rom 8:29; cf. the parallel expressions in 1 Cor 15:20; Acts 26:23; Rev 1:5), the notion of supremacy or priority of rank tends to dominate. "Firstborn" appears on three occasions in Paul's letters in a figurative sense with reference to Jesus Christ: Colossians 1:15, 18; Romans 8:29.

1. Firstborn of All Creation
2. Firstborn from the Dead
3. Firstborn Among Many Brothers

1. Firstborn of All Creation.

The expression "firstborn of all creation" (prōtotokos pasēs ktiseōs, Col 1:15) occurs in the opening line of the Colossian* "hymn" (see Hymns) and speaks of Christ's relationship to the creation.* Stripped from its context and from other Pauline statements about Christ, this phrase might be understood to include him among created things (as simply the "eldest" of the "family": prōtotokos in Rom 8:29 has this inclusive sense). The English word firstborn is misleading for it normally suggests someone who is born and therefore created. But this cannot be the significance of the term here since the immediately following words (Col 1:16, beginning with hoti, "because"), which provide a commentary on the title, emphasize the point that he is the one by whom the whole creation came into being. There are no exceptions, for absolutely everything in creation has been made by him. Further, apart from the incompatibility of this thought with the teaching of Paul in general about the person and work of Christ (see Christology), such an understanding is not required by the word prōtotokos ("firstborn") itself.

The term prōtotokos was frequently used in the LXX (130 times), mostly in genealogies and historical narratives, to indicate temporal priority and sovereignty of rank (e.g., Gen 49:3). Frequently it was employed to denote one who had a special place in the father's love. So Israel* is called "my beloved son" (huios prōtotokos mou, literally, "my firstborn son," Ex 4:22), a phrase that expresses the particularly close relation between God and Israel. In Judaism the messianic king, as well as Israel, the patriarchs and the Torah are given this title of distinction (see Str-B and Michaelis).

The title "firstborn," used of Christ in Colossians 1:15, 18, echoes the wording of Psalm 89:27, where God* says of the Davidic king: "I will also make him my firstborn, the highest of the kings of the earth." This title belongs to Jesus Christ not only as the Messiah of David's line, but also as the Wisdom* of God (note the same background to the preceding title "the image* of the invisible God"). While Jewish writers speculated about Wisdom by giving to it a quasi-personal status (it was present with God from all eternity, Wis 9:9; sharing the divine throne, Wis 9:4; existing before heaven and earth, and according to Philo was the "firstborn son," prōtogonos huios: Conf. Ling. 146; Agric. 51; Som. 1.215; the instrument "through whom the universe came into existence," Fug 109), the NT writers knew that they were speaking of a living person, one whom some of them had met personally.

As prōtotokos Christ is unique, being distinguished from all creation (cf. Heb 1:6). He is both prior to and supreme over that creation since he is its Lord.*

2. Firstborn from the Dead.

"Firstborn" (prōtotokos) also occurs in the second section of the "hymn" in the expression "the firstborn from the dead" (prōtotokos ek tōn nekrōn, Col 1:18). While formally parallel to the first instance, "firstborn" here stands at the beginning of the soteriological section in apposition to the preceding expression, "He [Christ] is the beginning" (archē). Archē has to do with primacy, whether in a temporal sense (Mt 19:4, 8; Jn 15:27) or with reference to authority* and sovereignty (Rom 8:38; 1 Cor 15:24; Eph 1:21; 6:12; etc.). In Colossians 1:18 when it is said of Christ that he is "the beginning," it does not mean that he is "the beginning of God's creation" (Rev 3:14) or its first cause, notions that might have applied in the first part of the paragraph (Col 1:15-17), but rather as the one who is "the firstborn from the dead" he is the founder of a new humanity (see Adam and Christ). The meaning of archē is explained in the words "firstborn from the dead," while prōtotokos is here used in an inclusive sense. In Genesis 49:3 the two terms firstborn and beginning appear together to describe the firstborn as the founder of a people (cf. LXX Deut 21:17 and Rom 8:29). The resurrection* age has burst forth and, as the first who has risen from among those who had fallen asleep in death (ek tōn nekrōn), he is the first fruits who guarantees the future resurrection of others (1 Cor 15:20, 23). The hymn had previously asserted Christ's primacy in creation; it now mentions his primacy in resurrection. In both new creation and old the first place belongs to him alone. In accordance with the divine intention he "has become preeminent in everything."

3. Firstborn Among Many Brothers.

"Firstborn" (prōtotokos), which is used inclusively in Romans 8:29, expresses both the unique preeminence of Christ and the fact that he shares his privileges with his brothers and sisters. In a passage which surveys the whole course of God's dealings with his people (Rom 8:28-30), it is affirmed that the new creation, a community of men and women who are being progressively conformed to the image of Christ (who is the image of God, 2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15), is seen from the beginning to have been the object of God's foreknowledge* and foreordaining mercy.* The Father's purpose ("in order that he might be the firstborn among many brothers and sisters") was that his only begotten Son (see Son of God) might not be alone in enjoying the familial privileges but might be the head of a multitude of brothers and sisters (cf. Ex 4:22 where Israel is God's firstborn son) who have been made God's children through him (see Adoption, Sonship). As the resurrected Christ, the first fruits* of those raised from the dead (1 Cor 15:20, 23), he is the pattern of this new humanity of the last age, the firstborn (from the dead) of a new eschatological race of people in whom God's design from the beginning of creation (Gen 1:27; cf. Heb 2:6-7) is at last fulfilled.

See also ADOPTION, SONSHIP; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; FIRST FRUITS, DOWN PAYMENT; LORD; PRE-EXISTENCE; SON OF GOD; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); A. Hockel, Christus der Erstgeborene: zur Geschichte der Exegese von Kol. 1.15 (Düsseldorf, 1965); E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); W. Michaelis, "πρωτότοκος," TDNT VI.871-82; P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); Str-B 3.256-58, 626.

P. T. O'Brien

FLESH

Interpreters have long recognized a complexity in Paul's usage of the Greek word sarx, frequently translated "flesh" in English, and modern linguistics has shed more light on the nature of that complexity. Nevertheless, interpreters of Paul are still prone to speak of "Paul's view of the flesh." But to do so is to beg the question of whether by flesh we mean: (1) the various notions to which that term refers in English usage; (2) the notions referred to by Paul in his use of the term sarx; or (3) one of Paul's more characteristic usages.

Option (1) is of course to be rejected, since it would imply that Paul wrote as a speaker of twentieth-century English. In any event there can be no consistent correlation between the various applications of the English term flesh and those of the Greek sarx as Paul used it. Option (3) is a better choice since it recognizes that even within a single language a word may have numerous "meanings," some mutually unrelated. To speak of "Paul's view of the flesh" would entail selecting one meaning, or "semantic field," from the array to which sarx belongs. This, however, raises the question: Which one? Such a selection would necessitate a different title for this article (e.g., "humanity" or "human rebellion") and would involve the study of the other terms belonging to the chosen field (e.g., world,* body,* human, sin,* spirit,* promise). Option (2), then, is best here; it provides access to all the fields to which the Pauline term sarx belongs. One wonders, however, whether there are other concepts for which Paul might have employed sarx in his letters, but for some reason did not.

1. The Represented Semantic Fields
2. Striking Formal Contextual Features
3. Comparison with Other Judeo-Christian Writers
4. Theological Issues

1. The Represented Semantic Fields.

Paul uses sarx in at least six different applications.

1.1. Physical Matter. Paul uses sarx to refer to the physical matter that makes up the living bodies of humans and animals. The most obvious instance of this application is 1 Corinthians 15:39, where Paul speaks of the various fleshly materials of animals (always living flesh, as opposed to meat). In this context Paul uses sōma, "body," in a manner parallel with sarx (1 Cor 15:38-39; cf. Col 1:22). Elsewhere, in Paul's metaphor "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor 12:7) and in the synecdoche "flesh and blood" (1 Cor 15:50; Gal 1:16; reversed as "blood and flesh" in Eph 6:12; cf. literal use in Wis 12:5), sarx itself refers to physical matter. This point is not always noticed, since the entire expression in each case indicates "trouble" or "humanity," respectively. Similarly, in Paul's expression "fleshly hearts" (kardiais sarkinais, 2 Cor 3:3) sarx is part of an extended metaphor for the lives of the believers. Romans 2:28 (en sarki peritomē "circumcision in the flesh"; see Circumcision) perhaps also belongs in this category, used here as a euphemism, though it could be included under the next category (see 1.2 below; note the qualifier en tō phanerō "externally").

1.2. Human Body. By synecdoche sarx in 1 Corinthians 6:16 envisions the entire body ("Do you not know that whoever is united to a prostitute becomes one body [sōma] with her? For it is said, 'The two shall be one flesh [sarx]' " NRSV, quoting Gen 2:24) (cf. Eph 5:29-30; Col 2:1; 1:22?; 2:11?; Sir 25:26; see Sexuality). Here sarx is placed parallel with sōma, and perhaps also with melos, "member" (1 Cor 6:15), and is contrasted with pneuma, "spirit" (1 Cor 6:17). In this way sōma pulls sarx into its own realm (contrast 1 Cor 15:38-39 in 1.1 above).

Under this category we should also include 2 Corinthians 7:1, where Paul can contrast flesh and spirit as a person's defilable outer and inner aspects respectively (cf. Col 2:5, and with dianoiai, Eph 2:3; see Psychology).

Sarx as human body is also subject to physiological states (see Healing, Illness) and religious rites. Paul first preached in Galatia owing to some bodily ailment (di' astheneian tēs sarkos, Gal 4:13-14; see Weakness), and his opponents there wish to circumcise the believers so as to boast in the condition of their bodies (hina en tē hymetera sarki kauchēsōntai, Gal 6:13, that condition contrasted with the cross* of Christ in Gal 6:14). Paul's usage in 2 Corinthians 7:5, "our sarx had no rest," may be better classed in 1.3 (see the parallel in 2 Cor 2:13-14 where Paul's inner anxieties are the point; cf. Psalm 62:2 LXX [63:1]).

1.3. Human Person, Human Race. In imitation of LXX usage, pasa sarx ("all flesh") in Galatians 2:16 and 1 Corinthians 1:29 (both of which parallel the expression with a human being), and in Romans 3:20, refers to the whole of humanity, or perhaps to an individual (cf. Mt 24:22). More ambiguous is Romans 8:3b ("God sent his son in the likeness of sinful sarx"), which can be read as "in the likeness of sinful humanity." Paul's reference to the entire Jewish nation as "my flesh" (Rom 11:14) arises possibly from certain usages listed under 1.4 (see Israel).

1.4. Morally Neutral Sphere. Forming a group under this rubric are those passages referring to human relationships based on natural birth processes. All of these passages are concerned in some way with Israel, her traditions and her descendants (1 Cor 10:18; Rom 1:3; 4:1; 9:3, 5, 8). Of these references, the contrast between sarx and pneuma in Romans 1:3 is between Christ's natural human existence "from the seed of David," on the one hand, and his divine dignity on the other (cf. 1 Tim 3:16; Phil 2:9-11). In this case a negative shadow is not cast on sarx as is the case elsewhere (see 1.6 below: rebellious human nature).

The occurrences in Galatians 4:23, 29 are more ambiguous however. Paul contrasts Ishmael, the son of the "slave woman" who was born "according to the flesh" (kata sarka), and Isaac, the son of the "free woman" who was born "through the promise." If Paul views Abraham's* first son, Ishmael, as born through his father's rebellious unbelief, sarx would carry a sense more in line with the usage described in section 1.6 ("rebellious human nature"). The subsequent contrast in Galatians 4:29 between the one born kata sarka and the one born kata pneuma (= Holy Spirit*?) tends to confirm this.

To this category also belong references to the natural course and conduct of human affairs: Galatians 2:20, Philippians 1:22, 24, and probably 1 Corinthians 7:28, where a parallel is drawn with kosmos ("world"* 1 Cor 7:31). In Philemon 16 Onesimus' relationship to Philemon is said to have a social dimension (en sarki, "in the flesh") in contrast to a specifically Christian dimension (en kyriō, "in the Lord"). "Our mortal flesh" (tē thnētē sarki hēmōn) in which Christ's life is manifested (2 Cor 4:11; cf Col 1:24), may refer to the human body (see 1.2 above; cf. the parallel with sōma, 2 Cor 4:10), but more likely it is a reference to Paul's natural earthly life. Paul's usage in Romans 6:19 ("I am speaking in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh," astheneian tēs sarkos; contrast Gal 4:13 in 1.2 above) concerns more than bodily weakness (cf. NRSV, "natural limitations"). In 1 Corinthians 9:11 and Romans 15:27 Paul claims that those who impart "spiritual" blessings have a right to fiscal (sarkikos) support.

1.5. Morally Negative Sphere. Here we refer to Paul's use of sarx as applied to the "world," humanity's value systems as they stand in opposition to God's. In Philippians 3:3-4, which prefaces a fine description of a Jewish culture-based value system, and Galatians 6:12 which presupposes it, Paul characterizes the whole as en sarki (see Jew, Paul the). Another value system, based in Hellenistic culture but perverse like the first, is at issue in 1 Corinthians 1:26. Here Paul can characterize the "wise" (sophoi; see Wisdom) as kata sarka, which he sets in parallel with "world" (kosmos) in 1 Corinthians 1:27 (cf. 2 Cor 1:12). Paul is accused of making decisions and living his life by these values (kata sarka, 2 Cor 1:17; 10:2). This he denies; one can live in the midst of such a system without patterning one's methods on it (2 Cor 10:3-4). People, even Christ himself, can be evaluated from this false perspective (kata sarka, 2 Cor 5:16); and of course, hollow boasting is its natural consequence (2 Cor 11:18).

1.6. Rebellious Human Nature. Paul's most characteristic use of sarx, and his most frequent, is his application of sarx to sinful human nature (see Sin). Well over half of these instances occur in Romans,* mostly in Romans 8. All others but one (1 Cor 5:5; cf also 1 Cor 3:3) appear in Galatians.* Correspondingly, in over two-thirds of the many contrasts between sarx and pneuma, sarx refers to fallen human nature. Most of these are found in Galatians 5 and 6 and Romans 8; of the others (Gal 3:3, Rom 7:5, 1 Cor 5:5), Galatians 3:3 is almost programmatic for the whole group (see 4 below).

1 Corinthians 5:5 ("hand this man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh [sarx], so that his spirit [pneuma] may be saved on the day of the Lord" NRSV) is distinct in that it employs pneuma for the human spirit; nevertheless, sarx there does not refer to the body (see Discipline). Depending on how one dates Galatians and the Thessalonian letters (see Chronology), this application is likely a later development for

Paul. He is not here recommending sickness or death but the destruction of rebelliousness, an effect synonymous with the crucifixion* of the flesh, the Spirit's goal in struggling against it (Gal 5:24, 17).

For Paul the unacceptable alternative for believers is to make opportunity for this rebellion to indulge its desires (Gal 5:13, 16, 19-21; 6:8; Rom 13:14). One lives in the rebellious nature, there is nothing good about it, and through it one serves the law of sin (cf. sarx in Rom 7:5, contrasting with Law* and written code; Rom 7:18, in parallel with the ego of Paul himself; Rom 7:25, contrasting with nous "mind"). As mentioned earlier (see 1.4 above), in Galatians 4:23, 29 the contrast is between the one born either by his father's rebellious impatience or by the normal process of human reproduction, on the one hand, and the one who was born by the Spirit's intervention in that process, on the other. The contrast in Galatians 4:23 between sarx and epangelia ("promise") suggests rebelliousness on Abraham's part. Romans 8:1-14 is the classical passage on this subject, where rebellious sarx and the life grounded in it are contrasted with life in the Spirit (see 4 below).

Paul's use of sarkinos in 1 Corinthians 3:1 reads like an ad hominem criticism of gnosticizing believers at Corinth, and probably means "immature" rather than "rebellious."

2. Striking Formal Contextual Features.
Several correlations between formal grammatical structure and "semantic field assignment" are notable:

(1) When Paul uses kata sarka ("according to the flesh") + VERB (e.g., 2 Cor 1:17; 5:16), the semantic field is that of moral negativity (see 1.5 above). On the other hand, when he uses kata sarka + NOUN (e.g., Rom 4:1; 9:3), the semantic field is that of moral neutrality (see 1.4 above). This was noticed by Bultmann (236-37) and is confirmed here (cf. kata anthrōpon, "in an ordinary fashion," 1 Cor 3:3).

(2) Every occurrence of sarx as morally negative (see 1.5 above) lacks the article. This is probably due to the stereotyped prepositional phrases Paul employs. All formal contexts have either the shape kata sarka ("according to the flesh") + VERB (e.g., 2 Cor 10:2, 3) or en sarki ("in the flesh") + VERB (e.g., Phil 3:3, 4; Gal 6:12).

(3) All uses of sarx in the broad sense of "humanity" (see 1.3 above), except one, are formed on LXX style: pasa sarx ("all flesh").

(4) Those uses of sarx which refer to human rebelliousness (see 1.6 above) almost invariably appear with the article. To this category also belongs nearly every instance where sarx is construed as the subject or direct object of a verb (the verb usually being in the form of an abstract noun), unless it is qualified by a possessive personal pronoun, in which case it refers to the human body.

3. Comparison with Other Judeo-Christian Writers.
In the LXX the term seems never to be used either in a morally negative sense (see 1.5 above) or as a designation for human rebelliousness toward God (see 1.6 above). This contrasts with Paul, for whom these two senses account for half of his usage of sarx. The closest parallel to Paul's use of sarx in these senses is 4 Maccabees 7:18. But while that document is contemporary with Paul, the usage in that passage is more in line with the Hellenizing ethical dualism of Philo than with Paul's use.

However, "flesh" (Gk sarx or Heb bāśār) is used in the Qumran scrolls (e.g., 1QS 11:7[?], 9[?], 12; 1QM 4:3) and Jewish apocalyptic (e.g., T. Judah 19:4; T. Zeb. 9:7) to refer to fallen humanity or a cosmic evil sphere. Oddly, the Apostolic Fathers are nearly in line with the LXX here. Even the rest of the NT does not alter this picture by much: it is used once (?) for moral negativity (Jn 8:15) and five times for rebelliousness (mostly in 2 Pet and Jude; cf. 1 Jn 2:16). The employment of sarx, then, to indicate fallen humanity and the evil worldly system of values is a decidedly Pauline phenomenon, with its roots in Jewish apocalyptic.* It is imitated perhaps, but not wholeheartedly adopted by any of the other early Christian writers.

4. Theological Issues.
For theological implications of these data, fields 1.1—1.4 and 1.5—1.6 form two distinct groups: the first indicating a natural aspect of creation* and the latter an opposition toward God.*

4.1. The Flesh as a Natural Aspect of Creation. The employment of the term sarx in 1.1—1.4 (i.e., physical matter, human body, human person/race, morally neutral sphere), especially as the natural sphere in which earthly life is conducted (cf. Rom 1:3), implies that Paul continued to share the Jewish heritage of a high regard for creation. The ontological dualism of Hellenistic thinkers is ruled out in Paul's view, since while the fleshly body, and humanity generally, are weak and open to defilement, they are nonetheless redeemable and subject to resurrection.* On the other hand, Paul's suggestion that both the flesh and the (human) spirit can be defiled (2 Cor 7:1) probably means that he entertained no ethical dualism between higher and lower natures coexistent in and natural to a person. The seemingly negative attitude expressed in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 toward the "body" of earthly existence is not to be taken to imply such a dualistic view.

4.2. Flesh as Opposition to God. R. Jewett has shown how the development of Paul's various conflicts sets the scene for, and explains the inconsistencies in, his use of the term in 1.5 and 1.6 (i.e., morally negative sphere and rebellious human nature).

The following remarks can be made. Galatians 3:2-3 neatly sets forth the dualism which does characterize Paul's peculiar use of sarx. It is a dualism between flesh and spirit in the sense of flesh as an independent reliance on one's own accomplishments over against a spirit of dependence on God and submission to his rule (see esp. Rom 8). In the controversy with nomists in Galatians 3:2-3, this translates into a contrast between "works of the Law"* and "hearing with faith." Dependence upon human value systems and institutions for securing power and position, as well as libertinistic self-indulgence as a means of attaining "life" (Jewett), are likewise manifestations of a rebellious independence from God's promised provision of life and personal worth through faith in Christ. Ironically, then, by trusting in the "flesh" one attains not life but death.

This in fact is an apocalyptic dualism which proleptically views the regenerate Christian as already "in the Spirit" and under the rule of God by faith while still living a "fleshly" existence in this present age. The solution to the tension thus created is the continual putting to death of the flesh and its works. But the "death of the flesh" is abhorrent to a person and can only be endured by virtue of God's promise to have already endowed humanity with resurrection life in Christ (cf. Rom 5:12-21). To die this death, and to "put on" Christ, is to place oneself again, as once in Eden, under the protection and provision of God, to become dependent and trusting. It issues furthermore in a love toward other people which arises out of the assurance of one's own security in Christ (cf. Gal 5:22-26).

See also BODY; HOLY SPIRIT; PSYCHOLOGY; SIN, GUILT; WEAKNESS; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955) 1.232-46; E. R. Goodenough, By Light, Light: The Mystic Gospel of Hellenistic Judaism (New Haven: Yale University, 1935); R. H. Gundry, Sōma in Biblical Theology: With Emphasis on Pauline Anthropology (Cambridge University Press, 1976); D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: Inter-Varsity, 1981); R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of Their Use in Conflict Settings (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); K. G. Kuhn, "New Light on Temptation, Sin and Flesh in the New Testament," in The Scrolls and the New Testament, ed. K. Stendahl (New York: Harper, 1957) 94-113; G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); A. Sand, Der Begriff "Fleisch" in den paulinischen Hauptbriefen (Regensburg: Pustet, 1967); E. Schweizer, R. Meyer, F. Baumgärtel, "σάρξ κτλ," TDNT VII.98-151; H. Seebass and A. C. Thiselton, "Flesh," NIDNTT 1.671-82; W. D. Stacey, The Pauline View of Man in Relation to Its Judaic and Hellenistic Background (London: Macmillian, 1956); A. C. Thiselton, "The Meaning of Σάρξ in 1 Corinthians 5:5: A Fresh Approach in the Light of Logical and Semantic Factors," SJT 26 (1973) 204-28.

R. J. Erickson

FOOD LAWS. See FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; PURITY AND IMPURITY.

FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS

With circumcision,* laws and observances regarding food served as important ritual markers of Jewish identity. The literary evidence (both Jewish and non-Jewish) affirms that Jewish identity was in no small measure determined by how food was prepared, what sort of foods were and were not eaten, and with whom one ate or did not eat. Early Christians ate meals together, and with their early identity with and emergence from Judaism came questions about the appropriateness and necessity of these food laws for followers of Christ. A related problem arose over the appropriateness of Christians eating meat which had been sacrificed to pagan gods.

1. The Setting of Early Christian Gatherings
2. Jewish Food Laws
3. The Incident at Antioch and the Jerusalem Council
4. Meat, Idols and the Christian Gathering

1. The Setting of Early Christian Gatherings.

The early believers met in houses (cf. 1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:5; Philem 2; Col 4:15) not strictly by default (i.e., because there was nowhere else to meet) but deliberately, because the house setting provided the facilities which accommodated the practices of the early communities (see Church). The one feature of the assembly that necessitated a house setting was the common meal, including the Lord's Supper.* Based on the tradition of the Last Supper (Mk 14:17; cf. 1 Cor 11:17-34), which was held in an "upper room," the early Christian meal was an important aspect of the life of the community. The house, in addition to being at the immediate disposal of the community, furnished the facilities for the preparation of common meals. It is no coincidence that when the meals no longer featured in the gatherings, the house setting was no longer necessary. When food preparation and dining facilities were no longer required, a large hall (and later the basilica) was found to be more appropriate for the growing number of Christians.

The nature of the early Christian gatherings—especially for meals—took on added significance when the Gentile converts were included. For a devout Jew to associate with a Gentile, or "sinner," was perilous, as is readily observed in the Gospels when the Pharisees criticize Jesus for having table fellowship with "sinners." Although Law abiding Jews allowed the possibility of restricted table fellowship between a Jew and a non-Jew (i.e., with proselytes, resident aliens and God-fearers), the rules and regulations were so stringent that they did not promote broad associations (see Dunn, 137-48).

2. Jewish Food Laws.

The limits of acceptable table fellowship between a Jew and a Gentile would be determined by two factors: (1) the Deuteronomic laws in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14:3-21, and (2) the various halakoth (hᵃlāḵôṯ, "ways") of the oral tradition. For the most part these laws and traditions primarily concerned the production and consumption of food and the appropriate environment in which consumption took place. J. Neusner has stressed that during the NT era > one primary mark of Pharisaic commitment was the observance of the laws of ritual purity outside of the Temple, where everyone kept them. Eating one's secular, that is, unconsecrated food in a state of ritual purity, as if one were a Temple priest in the cult, was one of the two significations of party membership. Moreover, the agricultural laws, just like the purity rules, in the end affected table-fellowship, namely what one may eat. (Neusner 1984, 57)

After a detailed examination of rabbinical traditions concerning the Pharisees, involving 341 case rulings, Neusner concludes that "no fewer than 229 directly or indirectly pertain to table-fellowship, approximately 67% of the whole" (Neusner 1973, 86). In this respect the Pharisees can be called an "Eating Club" (Neusner 1982).

The meals within the context of Christian house gatherings can be seen as an overt manifestation of reconciliation between the Jews and Gentiles in Christ.* W. A. Meeks observes that by abandoning the standard Jewish regulations governing eating, the "Pauline Christians gave up one of the most effective ways by which the Jewish community had maintained its separate identity in the pagan society" (Meeks, 97). The house church was the venue for the cultural disestablishment which was necessary for the founding of the church in a Jewish-Gentile milieu. While the Gentiles were admonished to respect Jewish sensibilities, the meals served in these house churches confirmed the central message of the gospel* in the Christian community, the message of reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation).

3. The Incident at Antioch and the Jerusalem Council.

In Galatians 2:11-14 Paul describes an event in the life of the church at Antioch,* which corresponds to Luke's emphasis on Jewish-Gentile table fellowship in Acts. The events of Galatians 2 should probably be placed chronologically prior to the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15 and subsequent to the mission of Paul and Barnabas described in Acts 13 and 14 (see Chronology; Galatians; cf. Jerusalem). On this reading of the evidence, the conference described in Galatians 2:1-10 preceded the one described in Acts 15, and the events of Galatians 2:11-14 necessitated the meeting in Acts 15. The purpose of the apostolic decree (Acts 15) should then be seen as directly related to the social problem which arose during Peter's visit to Antioch. The Christians in Antioch regularly gathered together for meals, including the Lord's Supper. Although the church in Antioch is presented as sympathetic to the Gentile mission (Acts 13:1-3), Jewish Christians also participated in the gatherings and meals. Even Peter regularly met and ate with the Antiochian Christians until the dramatic event described in Galatians 2. Paul testifies that a major breach in the church in Antioch was caused by certain men who came from James,* and by implication, from the Jerusalem church (Gal 2:12).

These men are identified as "of the circumcision" (Gal 2:12). In all likelihood these individuals are to be aligned with those mentioned in Acts 15:1 who came from Judea and were members of the party of the Pharisees (Acts 15:5). However, as in Acts 15, we should be cautious not to associate their position too closely with that of James. After all, James certainly voiced disapproval over their conduct (Acts 15:24). It is probable that they had exceeded the terms of their commission. Paul states that before certain men came from James, Peter was in the habit of regularly eating with Gentile Christians; nevertheless the presence of these Jewish Christians from the circumcision party caused Peter* to begin to withdraw from his regular practice altogether.

Paul portrays the church in Antioch as a unified group until the contingent from Jerusalem arrived. The confrontation exposed the problem: Jewish-Gentile table fellowship. The magnitude of the confrontation is obvious: the other Jewish Christians as well as Peter and Barnabas were affected by the Judaizers. Furthermore, such a retreat was evidently the impetus behind the Galatians' desertion from Paul's gospel (Gal 1:6-7). The pressure upon the Jewish Christians to remain faithful to the Law* and their heritage caused these Jewish Christians to force Gentiles to comply with Jewish laws. R. Jewett suggests that in the late forties and early fifties Jewish Christians in Judea were stimulated by pressure from the Zealots to take up a nomistic campaign among their fellow Christians (see Revolutionary Movements). The goal of these Judaizers was to avert the suspicion that they were in communion with lawless Gentiles (Jewett, 205). In Paul's mind they conformed to such pressure in order to "make a good showing in the flesh" and to avoid persecution for the cross* of Christ (Gal 6:12). Regardless of their motives, Paul sees their behavior as blameworthy and intolerable. The truth of the gospel was at stake: in Christ neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is of any avail (Gal 5:6; cf. Gal 6:15), and there can be no distinction based on ethnic heritage, social status or sexual distinction. In Christ all are Abraham's* offspring (Gal 3:26-29).

3.1. The Cornelius Episode. In Acts 10:1—11:18 the story of Cornelius's conversion is told twice. This fact and the length of the story indicate its importance to Luke's narrative. Luke presents two events: the outpouring of the Spirit on the Gentiles and the table fellowship in Cornelius's home. The confirmation of the validity of the Spirit's coming is symbolized by Peter's willingness to eat with a Gentile.

It was Peter's willingness to enter Cornelius's home, to eat at his table, and to live with him that alarmed the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 11:1-3). After all, the implications drawn from the Cornelius episode—that Gentiles could be admitted into the Christian community without undergoing circumcision (Acts 10:45; 11:18) and that table fellowship between Jews and Gentiles was permissible—were avant-garde. In Luke's narrative the obstacle of a Jew associating with the "unclean" was overcome for Peter by the vision he received at Joppa. The Cornelius episode closes with Cornelius, having been baptized with his household, inviting Peter to stay with them for several days (Acts 10:48). Clearly, by portraying Peter's willingness to accept the invitation of hospitality (cf. Acts 16:15), Luke intends to demonstrate to his readers the authenticity of the Gentiles' reception of the Spirit.

Peter's willingness to associate publicly with a Gentile (albeit, a God-fearer) was not welcomed by the Jerusalem church and, in particular, by those of the circumcision. They still held that such behavior was "unlawful" (athemitos), just as Peter had so regarded it prior to the vision. Therefore it is important to understand the force of Peter's words in Acts 10:28, which must be interpreted in light of the criticism voiced by the church in Jerusalem and the continued debate in the early church over the issue of table fellowship. Moreover, we must ask on what grounds (if any) Jewish Christians were forbidden to associate with Gentile Christians. What claims did the Law (the breaking of which Peter calls unlawful) have on the lives of Christians (Jewish and Gentile) in light of the gospel message (in this case, revealed in the vision)?

Oepke comments that with athemitos, "unlawful," we have a reference to "the Pharisaic standpoint overcome in Christianity" (Oepke, 166). Indeed, this was the case in the Jerusalem church: Jewish-Gentile table fellowship was as forbidden as indulging in non-kosher foods. We must conclude that prior to the vision in Joppa, Peter was convinced that eating with a Gentile (= forbidden foods) was against the tradition and that he had not experienced table fellowship with a Gentile (inasmuch as he had never eaten forbidden meat, Acts 10:14). To associate with or visit a non-Jew was seen as unlawful (Acts 10:28). By unlawful Luke was probably referring to the common Jewish antipathy toward associating with Gentiles and not that which is contrary to Torah legislature. Two points lead to this conclusion: (1) Luke is nowhere critical of Jews or Jewish Christians who keep the Law and, although Leviticus 11 makes clear distinctions between clean and unclean foods, the distinction between clean and unclean people is not made (however naturally this might be deduced from passages such as Lev 20:22-26). (2) The commonplace of this association between Gentiles and forbidden foods is seen in our narrative: "Peter's vision, which ostensibly deals with the dissolution of the distinction between clean and unclean foods, . . . is interpreted as signifying the dissolution of the similar, but not identical, distinction between clean and unclean people" (Wilson, 68).

For the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem, however, the issue was not so clear. The implications were obvious to them and potentially damaging to the Jewish traditions. That God had poured out his Spirit on the Gentiles was amazing in its own right. But the legitimacy of Torah was called into question if by this event Jewish believers were to accept (and even have table fellowship with) Gentile Christians—without those Gentiles having undergone circumcision or observed Torah.

This was only the beginning of problems in defining appropriate social relations between Jewish and Gentile Christians. The conflicts reflected in Galatians 2 and Acts 15 were intense and the opinions varied. More often than not, the diverse opinions and tensions resulted in inconsistent behavior even among the leaders. Clearly, a failure to reconcile differences would have nullified the possibility of fellowship, and Christianity would have become as segmented as first-century Judaism.

3.2. The Jerusalem Council. In Acts 15 the issue of the Gentile obligation to the Law is once again raised, as though it had never been discussed in Acts 11. Once again it is Peter who defends the inclusion of the Gentiles, citing his summons to preach to the Gentiles as a defense of his position. James recommends that certain levitical obligations (or possibly Noachic ones [Gen 9], in which case the obligations are to be enforced as a pre-Mosaic code binding on all people) be required of the Gentile Christians: that they abstain from certain things which were repulsive to the Jewish-Christians: from eating what is offered in sacrifice to idols, from what is strangled, from blood and from practicing fornication (Acts 15:29). The solution was an accommodation of Jewish sensibilities without jeopardizing the nature of the gospel (cf. 1 Cor 9:19-23; though whether Paul ultimately saw no conflict with his gospel is debated, since he never appeals to the decree in 1 Cor; see Catchpole; cf. Tomson, 269-74).

4. Meat, Idols and the Christian Gathering.

There are indications that the early church leaders uniformly forbade eating meat sacrificed to idols* (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; Rev 2:20; Did. 6.3). The reason for this was simple: the idol temple seems to have served both as a butcher shop and as a place for sharing a cultic meal. For the most part, meat was either eaten at the temple or sold at the market after a pagan festival, and the association with the pagan gods, which was idolatry to the Christian, was obvious (Theissen, 121-43).

That meat was included in the banqueting in a pagan temple at Corinth is suggested by the dining rooms beneath the Abaton in the Asclepion at Corinth (Murphy-O'Connor, 161-70). Reclining at an idol's temple is envisioned as a problem at Corinth (1 Cor 8:1-10).

Consecrated meat was also included in sumptuous dinners in the homes of the affluent. On occasion this was the case at Corinth (1 Cor 10:27). Plutarch (c. 46-120), who lived near Corinth, records an episode which reflects a private dinner. The venue is the home of Ariston:

> Ariston's cook made a hit with the dinner guests not only because of his general skill, but because the cock he set before the diners, though it had just been slaughtered as a sacrifice to Heracles, was as tender as if it had been a day old. (Plutarch Conv. 6.10.1)

Recent Gentile converts to Christianity would have found it difficult to consider the issue of meat offered to idols independent of its ritual setting; they would eat with a guilty conscience* (1 Cor 8:7). The invitation to dine in the home of an unbeliever could present a dilemma (1 Cor 10:27-30); while the invitation to dine at a temple would only sharpen the issue (1 Cor 8:10).

Evidently, however, not all the Corinthians shared this frustration. Paul, in writing to the Corinthians, takes note of two Christian responses. First, for some meat that had been sacrificed to idols must be avoided and be viewed as a fundamental contradiction to genuine monotheism. From this vantage, eating consecrated meat was taboo and such flirtatious associations hazardous. Second, other Corinthians claimed a "knowledge"* (gnōsis) which denied the existence and/or relevance of idols. The consumption of consecrated meat, from this perspective, did not pose a threat to the monotheism of Christianity (or Judaism) since the existence of other deities was denied: there was only one God.*

In response, Paul affirms monotheism by quoting the Shema (1 Cor 8:4: "There is no God but one" NRSV; see Liturgical Elements) and then places Jesus in the middle of this familiar text (1 Cor 8:6: "Yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things and for whom we exist, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things and through whom we exist" NRSV). In a discussion of meat sacrificed to the idols at Corinth, Paul, it seems, has redefined the Shema christologically, producing what N. T. Wright has called a "christological monotheism" (see God; Christology). This reformulation is intended to answer the problem at hand: the theology of the incarnation (through the lens of the Shema) effectively means love* and concern for the members of God's community. This is Wright's proposal: the Corinthians are admonished to put into practice a Christianized view of the Shema: "there is one God, one Lord, and his people are defined as those who love him, and who love their neighbors as themselves. The allowance for the weak is not a mere ad hoc concession. It arises from the heart of Christian theology itself" (Wright "One God," 49). And for the Christian, the cross of Christ answers those who insist on their rights: eating the consecrated meat could destroy the believer for whom Christ died (1 Cor 8:11).

Lest his readers miss the point, Paul's self-disclosure is intended to serve as a case in point: while he was at Corinth he had the apostolic right to secure support (1 Cor 9:1-23; see Financial Support). Because of the danger of being mistaken for a sophist (see Apollos), Paul denied himself the remuneration for the sake of the community of faith.

See also Circumcision; Conscience; Ethics; Idolatry; James; Law; Peter; Purity and Impurity; Social-Scientific Approaches to Paul; Works of the Law.

Bibliography. D. R. Catchpole, "Paul, James and the Apostolic Decree," NTS 23 (1976-77) 428-44; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Incident at Antioch (Gal 2.11-18)," in Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 129-82; P. F. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lukan Theology (SNTSMS 57; Cambridge: University Press, 1987); R. Jewett, "The Agitators and the Galatian Congregation," NTS 17 (1970-71) 198-212; W. A. Meeks The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1983); J. Murphy-O'Connor, St. Paul's Corinth: Texts and Archaeology (GNS 6; Wilmington: Michael Glazier, 1983); J. Neusner, From Politics to Piety: The Emergence of Pharisaic Judaism (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1973); idem, "Two Pictures of the Pharisees: Philosophical Circle or Eating Club," ATR 64 (1982) 525-57; idem, Judaism in the Beginning of Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); O. Oepke, "ἀθέμιτος," TDNT I.166; G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); P. J. Tomson, Paul and the Jewish Law: Halakha in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles (CRINT 3.1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); W. L. Willis, Idol Meat at Corinth: The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10 (SBLDS; Chico: Scholars, 1985); S. G. Wilson, Luke and the Law (SNTSMS 50; Cambridge: University Press, 1983); N. T. Wright, "Monotheism, Christology and Ethics: 1 Corinthians 8," in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 120-36; idem, "One God, One Lord, One People: Incarnational Christology for a Church in a Pagan Environment," Ex Auditu 7 (1991) 45-58.

B. B. Blue

FOOLISHNESS.

See Cross, Theology of the; Wisdom.

FOREKNOWLEDGE, DIVINE

Paul expresses the concept of divine foreknowledge with the verb proginōskō, "to foreknow." He uses the verb twice, both times with reference to God's activity: "Those whom he foreknew, he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son" (Rom 8:29). "'God has not rejected his people' whom he foreknew, has he?" (Rom 11:2). The prefix pro- in proginōskō indicates that the action of "knowing" takes place "before," that is, before the world was created (cf. Eph 1:4; 2 Tim 1:9), not just before one's own knowledge of God* (Cranfield, 1.431). This divine foreknowledge has been understood either as God's advance knowledge or as God's choosing. Both interpretations are construed soteriologically, based on the contexts in which the notion of divine foreknowledge appears. It is thus explained either as God's knowing beforehand who would believe, on the basis of which God then elects to salvation,* or as God's recognizing or "knowing" a person before the world began, which is itself an act of electing grace.*

1. Divine Foreknowledge as Foresight of Faith
2. Divine Foreknowledge as Election

1. Divine Foreknowledge as Foresight of Faith.

The verb "to foreknow," proginōskō, usually means "to know beforehand" (cf. Acts 26:5; 2 Pet 3:17; Philo Som. 1.2; see further Bultmann, 715-16). When used of God's action, therefore, it could refer to God's eternal foresight of what will come to pass (cf. Wis 8:8 LXX, where this kind of foreknowledge is ascribed to preexistent Wisdom*; cf. Anderson, 311-13, on the biblical material on God's knowledge of all things). The two passages where Paul uses the verb also speak about divine predestination or election.* Thus, it is argued, God's prior knowledge of who will have saving faith* is the basis of God's predestination or election (e.g., Godet, 2.107-10). Divine foreknowledge thus explains why God elects some but not others.

Against this view J. Murray (316-17) argues that Paul writes not of God's foreseeing the faith of persons but foreknowing persons: "whom he foreknew" (Rom 8:29; 11:2). The idea of the foresight of one's faith is not present in the texts. J. Calvin (180-81) rejects the understanding of divine foreknowledge as prescience, that is, of knowing what humans would do, since God's gracious election is unmerited and springs only from God's good pleasure.

2. Divine Foreknowledge as Election.

Rather than referring to speculative or neutral knowledge (i.e., knowledge of who will believe), the Pauline notion of divine foreknowledge is understood by many interpreters as a knowing in the Semitic sense of acknowledging, inclining toward someone, knowledge which expresses a movement of the will reaching out to personal relationship with someone (e.g., Michel, 277). This kind of knowing is illustrated by the meaning of the Hebrew yāḏa', "to know," in texts such as Amos 3:2; Hosea 13:5; and Jeremiah 1:5. The Hebrew verb can come close in meaning to "elect" (see esp. Amos 3:2; also Deut 9:24; Schotroff, 691-94). It is used in the OT for the special relationship of Yahweh to Israel or particular Israelites (see also Ex 33:12, 17; Gen 18:19; Deut 34:10). The Greek verb ginōskō, "to know," can also have the sense of acknowledging, recognizing someone (BAGD, 7). It is used this way in Galatians 4:9 and 1 Corinthians 8:3 to refer to God's "knowledge" of human beings which is the basis for their coming to know or love* God: "Now knowing God, or rather being known by God"; "If anyone loves God, that person is known by God." Although proginōskō is not used, God's knowing human beings here is clearly prior knowledge (prior to their knowing and loving God).

In Paul's use of proginōskō the aspect of pretemporality is added to the Hebrew sense of "know" as "have regard for" or "set favor on." The result is a verb which refers to God's eternal loving election (cf. Bultmann, 715; Sand; the only other NT occurrence of proginōskō for God's activity, in 1 Pet 1:20, also has the sense of election or foreordination; there Christ is the object.)

Paul distinguishes between divine foreknowledge and divine predestination in Romans 8:29: "those whom he foreknew, he also predestined." While foreknowledge denotes the exercise of God's will to establish a special relationship with those whom God graciously elects before all time, predestination expresses God's appointing of them to a specific goal before all time (cf. also the related motif of God's eternal purpose, prothesis, in Rom 8:28). In Romans 8:29 this goal is conformity with the image of the Son, a reference to the final salvation of the elect (see Gundry-Volf, 9-11). Foreknowledge as divine choice is thus the basis of predestination to glorification with Christ (Michel, 277; see Glory, Glorification). Foreknowledge does not have to be understood as foresight of faith in order to be distinguished from predestination.

Again in Romans 11:2 divine foreknowledge has the connotation of God's joining a people to himself in eternity in loving faithfulness. Implicit here is the idea that divine foreknowledge as election implies predestination to salvation. " 'God has not rejected his people' whom he foreknew, has he?" The thought that God might have rejected Israel* is seen to be incompatible with God's foreknowledge of his people. Unbelieving Israel may now be hardened (Rom 11:7), but there is a believing remnant because of God's gracious election (Rom 11:5, 7), and that remnant provides hope that the rest are yet consecrated to God because of their election (Rom 11:16, 28). The divinely "foreknown" people have a destiny of salvation (see Rom 11:25-26), as unlikely as that may have appeared in Paul's day (contrast Calvin, 239, who takes the foreknown people to be members of Israel subject to God's secret election).

See also ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION; GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. W. Anderson, "Foreknow, Foreknowledge," IDB 2.311-14; R. Bultmann, "γινώσκω κτλ," TDNT I.689-719, esp. 715-16; J. Calvin, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Romans and to the Thessalonians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960); C. E. B. Cranfield, Romans (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1967) 2.292-93; F. Godet, Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1882); J. Gundry-Volf, Paul and Perseverance: Staying in and Falling Away (WUNT 2.37; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr; Louisville: John Knox/Westminster, 1990); O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer (KEK 4; 5th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1955); J. Murray, The Epistle to the Romans (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968); A. Sand, "προγινώσκω, πρόγνωσις," EDNT 3.153-54; W. Schotroff, "ידע jd' erkennen," THAT 1.682-701.

J. M. Gundry-Volf

FORGIVENESS

Paul makes little use of words for forgiveness compared to his frequent use of other terms that bring out what Christ has done for believers' salvation.* He seems to have preferred positive imagery like justification* or redemption.* Whatever his reason, he does not employ the terminology of forgiveness very much.

1. The Vocabulary of Forgiveness
2. Forgiveness As Grace
3. Forgiveness As Remission

1. The Vocabulary of Forgiveness.

Paul uses the verb aphiēmi, the normal NT verb for "to forgive," only five times (in the NT it occurs 142 times), and four of those do not refer to forgiveness (they have meanings like "leave"). He uses the corresponding noun aphesis twice only out of its seventeen occurrences in the NT. Another verb, charizomai (which is connected with charis, "grace,"* and which means to "give freely or graciously as a favor" or "remit, forgive, pardon," BAGD) appeals to him more, for he uses it sixteen times, of which ten have the meaning "forgive." We should also notice his use of paresis (Rom 3:25), which has the meaning of "passing over" and signifies at least that the sins to which it refers were not punished. We could say the same about epi- kalyptō, "to cover," which Paul uses in a quotation from the LXX (Rom 4:7). It cannot be said that Paul overlooks this important aspect of Christianity, but he makes rather less use of it than we might have anticipated.

2. Forgiveness As Grace.

Paul uses the verb charizomai in the sense of "forgive" mostly to bring out the truth that Christians ought to be forgiving people. Perhaps, as W. Klassen (136-37) suggests, Paul chose charizomai because of its resonance with charis, "grace," and its personal reference to people rather than to sins.* Thus he writes to the Corinthians about someone they had disciplined and says the man has been punished enough (see Discipline). Now, he goes on, "you should rather forgive [charisasthai] and comfort him" (2 Cor 2:6-7). As his argument proceeds Paul emphasizes the importance of forgiveness as part of the Christian life. "If you forgive anyone, I do too. For what I also have forgiven, if I have forgiven anything, it is for your sake in the presence of Christ" (2 Cor 2:10). The details of the incident that lies behind these words are not clear. But what is abundantly plain is that Paul sees it as very important that both he and the Corinthians should forgive the offender. It is the way of the world to nurture grudges against those they think have wronged them. It is the way of those forgiven by Christ to forgive freely the wrongs people do to them.

The motivation for this is made clear when Paul writes to the Colossians, "forgiving one another . . . as the Lord forgave you, you do also" (Col 3:13). Christians have been forgiven so much that it ill becomes them to hold grudges against those they fancy have wronged them. Paul has the same thought in Ephesians, "forgiving one another, even as God in Christ forgave you" (Eph 4:32). This time he points out the relevance of the work of Christ to the process of forgiveness. Forgiveness in Christ means forgiveness because of all that Christ is and does. Christ died for the forgiveness of his people; how can they then withhold forgiveness for the petty wrongs done to them?

In the one passage where Paul uses this verb of the divine forgiveness, the apostle* refers to the deadness of sinners on account of their misdeeds and "the uncircumcision of (their) flesh." He goes on, God "has made you alive together with him (i.e., Christ), having forgiven us all our misdeeds" (Col 2:13). This clearly means that it is the work of Christ that brings forgiveness about, though Paul does not here say in what way. But that forgiveness of "all our misdeeds" is important is abundantly clear.

There is one more Pauline use of this verb we should consider, namely the passage in which he reminds the Corinthians that he had never been a burden to them and adds, "Forgive me this wrong" (2 Cor 12:13). There is heavy irony here, but we should also notice the politeness of the apostle,* and his readiness to seek forgiveness. For him it is very important that believers act in a spirit of forgiveness and he sets the example (see Imitation of Paul/of Christ).

3. Forgiveness As Remission.

Paul does not make much use of the concept of remission. He sees it as important and speaks of Christ "in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness (or remission, aphesin) of our sins, according to the riches of his grace" (Eph 1:7). The links with redemption and with grace are important, for both are used often to bring out what the death of Christ (see Death of Christ) has done for sinners. So here we see that the forgiveness of sins arises from the atoning death of the Savior.* We have a very similar statement in Colossians, though it lacks the reference to grace (Col 1:14). But it does link redemption with "the forgiveness of sins."

In Romans 3:25 Paul, speaking of God's setting forth Jesus as a propitiatory sacrifice (hilastērion; see Expiation, Propitiation, Mercy Seat), refers to this act as a demonstration of God's righteousness* in "passing over" or "remitting" (paresis) "sins committed in former times." The precise meaning of this verse is debated, with some scholars suggesting that the verse is part of a pre-Pauline formula (Rom 3:24/25-26) originating in Jewish Christianity. The remission of past sins would seem to refer to the sins covered by the sacrificial system of Israel, which God passed over in his forbearance. But now, with the sacrifice of Christ, the final and effective solution has been put forward (see Martin 1990, 84-89; Kümmel).

When he uses the corresponding verb aphiēmi Paul mostly has it in the sense of "leave," "forsake." But once he cites Psalm 31:1 for the words, "Blessed are those whose lawlessnesses are forgiven [aphethēsan] and whose sins are covered" (Rom 4:7). "Blessed" refers to the highest state of felicity, and Paul sees this as brought about by Christ's dealing with the sins of believers—they are seen no more.

For Paul then forgiveness is important, though he does not often refer to it in set terms. But he sees it as significant that, because of what Christ has done, believers' sins are no longer counted against them. And he sees it as important that they translate this into their manner of life, by forgiving others the wrongs they do to them. Most importantly, forgiveness reveals something about the character of God.* He is a God who pardons, not a grim tyrant who holds sinners everlastingly responsible. He sent his Son to die on a cross to effect forgiveness. This surely means more than the remitting of penalty; it points to the establishment of a warm personal relationship with the forgiving God.

See also DEATH OF CHRIST; EXPIATION, PROPITIATION, MERCY SEAT; GRACE; JUSTIFICATION; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; SACRIFICE, OFFERING; SIN, GUILT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, "ἀφίημι κτλ," TDNT I.509-12; W. Klassen, The Forgiving Community (Philadelphia, 1966); W. G. Kümmel, "Πάρεσις und ἔνδειξις," in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte (Marburg: Elwert, 1965) 260-70 (="Paresis and Endeixis: A Contribution to the Understanding of the Pauline Doctrine of Justification," Journal for Theology and the Church 3 [New York: Harper & Row, 1967] 1-13); H. R. Mackintosh, The Christian Experience of Forgiveness (London: Nisbet, 1927); R. P. Martin, "Reconciliation and Forgiveness in Colossians," in Reconciliation and Hope, ed. R. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 104-24; idem, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (2d ed; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); A. Richardson, An Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament (New York: Macmillan, 1951) 348-50; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (2d ed.; London: Macmillan, 1946); W. Telfer, The Forgiveness of Sins (London: SCM, 1959); H. Vorländer, "Forgiveness," NIDNTT 1.697-703.

L. Morris

FORMER LIFE IN JUDAISM. See JEW, PAUL THE.

FREEDOM/LIBERTY

Paul is the "apostle of liberty" (Longenecker). He employs the noun eleutheria ("freedom," "liberty"), the adjective eleutheros ("free") and the verb eleutheroō ("to liberate," "set free"). The use of these terms for proclaiming the gospel* (as distinct from denoting social status, Col 3:11, Eph 6:8) is confined to Galatians, 1-2 Corinthians and Romans; but the concept of liberty permeates all the letters.

1. The Liberating Work of Christ.
2. The Practice of Christian Liberty.

1. The Liberating Work of Christ.

The arch-enemy of liberty is Sin* (hereafter capitalized as a personified power), a tyrannical ruler which holds all humanity in bondage (Rom 3:9; Gal 3:22). To maintain its mastery Sin employs several agencies, notably the flesh,* the Law,* the demonic* powers and death (see Life and Death). Christ comes to liberate human beings from slavery* to Sin and all the powers at its command. Those whom he liberates, far from becoming autonomous, are ushered into a new bondage (Rom 6:12-23): they become Christ's willing slaves (douloi), he becomes their Lord* (e.g., 1 Cor 7:22; Rom 6; Eph 6:6-7).

1.1. Christ's Redemptive Death. "Christ crucified" is "our redemption*" (1 Cor 1:18-31). His death is the ransom price that secures liberation from bondage to Sin (1 Tim 2:6; cf. Tit 2:14). Christians "were bought at a price" (1 Cor 6:20; 7:23)—Christ's sacrificial death (1 Cor 15:3). The final "day of redemption" (Eph 4:30; 1:14; Rom 8:18-25) looks forward to the release accomplished by "his blood" (Eph 1:7; Rom 3:24-25; see Death of Christ).

1.2. Liberation from Bondage to the Law. To be "under Law" is to be "under Sin" (Gal 3:22-23). To purchase freedom for those "under Law" Christ himself was "born under Law" (Gal 4:4-5) and suffered death, "the curse* of the Law," on their behalf (Gal 3:10-13). Such persons are no longer "under Law" but "under grace*" (Rom 6:14); once enslaved to Law, they are now heirs of God (Gal 3:26—4:7), freed by Christ from a "yoke of bondage" (Gal 5:1). Those once bound to the Law are now married to Christ instead (Rom 7:1-6). The Law itself is not jettisoned but wrested from Sin's grip and placed into the hands of a new master. As a tool of Sin, the Law of God is an instrument of destruction (Rom 7:7-13; 1 Cor 15:56); wielded by Christ the Lord through the empowering Spirit, it becomes a means of grace (Rom 7:7-13; 8:2-8). The Spirit grants liberation, not from the "Law" itself (nomos) nor from the "writing" (graphē), but from the "letter" (gramma) or its "curse" (Gal 3:13)—which is what the Law becomes apart from the Spirit and the Christ in whom the Law reaches its appointed goal (2 Cor 3:4-17; Rom 7:6; 10:4; see Law).

1.3. Liberation from the Powers. In giving himself "for our sins," Christ rescues us from the powers of "the present evil age" (Gal 1:4). He "disarmed the powers and authorities" by snatching from them the record of lawbreakers' guilt and "nailing it to the cross" (Col 2:13-15; see Triumph). Moreover Christ saves persons from the powers' destructive use (through human agencies) of the Law itself, and summons them to purposeful lawkeeping under his headship (Gal 4:3, 8-9; Col 2:16-23). Persons "raised with Christ" are rescued from "the ruler of the kingdom of the air" and the "spiritual forces of evil" at his command (Eph 2:1-10; 6:10-18). The ascended Christ takes the hostile powers captive and liberates their former victims for effective service (Eph 4:7-13; 1:21; see Principalities and Powers; Triumph).

*1.4. Liberation from the Flesh. Paul frequently employs the term sarx ("flesh"*) to denote the whole person in rebellion against God and in bondage to Sin. By Christ's incarnation and death, Sin is "condemned . . . in the flesh," and its victims freed from existence "according to the flesh" (Rom 8:3-4). They are no longer "in the flesh" but "in Christ" and "in the Spirit" (Rom 8:1, 9). Persons who belong to Christ "have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires," these being replaced by qualities cultivated by the Spirit (Gal 5:16-26; cf. Rom 8:13). To be freed from the flesh is to be freed from oneself, the fallen self, the self within the old humanity: "Our old self was crucified with [Christ] so that the body under Sin's control might be rendered powerless, that we should no longer be slaves to Sin" (Rom 6:6; see Dying and Rising).

*1.5. Liberation from Death. Sin explains Death's entry into the world (Rom 5:12; see Life and Death). As though repaying a debt, Death becomes Sin's vicegerent, exercising dominion over all human beings on Sin's behalf (Rom 5:12-21). The death that results from bondage to Sin is at the same time the effect of God's wrath* (Rom 1:18-32; 2:5-9; Eph 2:1-3). By his sacrificial death Christ rescues his people from "the wrath to come" (Rom 5:9; 1 Thess 1:10; 5:9); by his resurrection from the dead he offers "eternal life" in place of death (Rom 5:21; 6:23). "The last enemy" is not yet destroyed (1 Cor 15:20-26, 42-58); but those united to Christ and indwelt by his Spirit are already granted "newness of life" (Rom 6:4, 13; 8:1-17).

2. The Practice of Christian Liberty.

The tension between liberty and Law, or freedom and obligation, which marks the current study of Paul, is evident in the Pauline letters themselves (Barrett, 1-16; see Ethics). We shall consider three—Galatians, 1 Corinthians and Romans. Having declared that "Christ has set us free for freedom" (Gal 5:1), Paul enjoins readers not to misuse their freedom (Gal 5:13) but to "fulfill the law of Christ" (Gal 6:2). In 1 Corinthians 8—10 freedom to eat certain meats is qualified by the command to respect the weak. Romans 14—15 addresses a conflict between champions of liberty (the "strong") and defenders of law (the "weak"; see Strong and Weak; Rome).

*2.1. Thralldom to Christ. Slavery to Christ and submission to his Lordship provides the basis for the exercise of liberty.

2.1.1. Galatians. "Am I now persuading men, or God? Or am I seeking to please men? If I were still pleasing men, I would not be a slave [doulos] of Christ" (Gal 1:10). Christ's slave can logically be slave to no one else. Paul's adherence to this principle and Peter's violation of it are equally evident during the crisis at Antioch* (Gal 2:11-14). Paul states that Peter withdrew from table fellowship with Gentiles because he feared the members of the circumcision* party (Gal 2:12): their approval, together with that of James's group, was vital (so he thought) for his theological and social security; thus he allowed them to dictate his actions and, in the process, to override his personal convictions. Despite the risks, Paul "opposed [Peter] to his face" (Gal 2:11), because "the truth* of the gospel" demanded it (Gal 2:5, 14-21) and because slavery to Christ left no room for the fear of others (Gal 1:10). By the same token slavery to Christ frees the believers from bondage to self ("the works of the flesh") and binds them instead to "the law of Christ"* and the power of the Spirit (Gal 5:16—6:10; see Holy Spirit).

2.1.2. 1 Corinthians. As Christ's purchased possession, believers belong neither to themselves (1 Cor 6:20, "you were bought at a price") nor to others (1 Cor 9:19, "free from all people"). Moreover, says Paul, "I myself am not under the Law" (9:20): the doulos of Christ cannot be under a second master, even the Law of God. Yet, Paul continues, "I am not free from God's Law but in thrall to Christ's law [ennomos Christou]" (9:21). Life "in Christ"* (en Christō) provides the essential context for law keeping (ennomos Christou). Persons united to Christ are subject to his law.

2.1.3. Romans. Christ is Lord* of both weak and strong; the conduct of each is ultimately directed to Christ (Rom 14:3-8). The weak cannot logically be enslaved to both Christ and the Law, nor the strong to both Christ and their liberty. Likewise Christ alone is ultimately responsible for them: "Who are you to judge someone else's servant? To his own master he stands or falls" (Rom 14:4). The weak and the strong are relieved of the arduous and inevitably frustrating task of shaping the other into their own image. Yet each is free to assist the other in becoming conformed to the image* of him who alone is master of both.

*2.2. The Responsible Use of Freedom. Interlaced with Paul's declarations of liberty are instructions about its proper use.

2.2.1. Galatians. Freedom incites "the flesh" to destructive ends (Gal 5:13, 15, 19-21), but under the Spirit's direction freedom is employed to serve and support the needy (Gal 6:1-10).

2.2.2. 1 Corinthians. Enlightened as they are by the Spirit (1 Cor 2:6-16), believers recognize that food* and drink are gifts of a benevolent Creator (1 Cor 8:4-8; 10:25-26). "Am I not free?" asks Paul (1 Cor 9:1). He is indeed: he may marry if he so chooses; he has the right to payment for his services; he may enjoy pagan foods without pangs of conscience* (1 Cor 9:3-18; 10:27-30). Yet precisely in face of those gifts Paul sounds a warning: " 'Everything is permissible'—but not everything is beneficial. 'Everything is permissible'—but not everything is constructive" (1 Cor 10:23 NIV; Paul quotes a Corinthian slogan with approval yet qualification). One danger is that believers' freedom will "become a stumbling block to the weak" (1 Cor 8:9), to those who lack the true understanding of God and foods (1 Cor 8:4-8); that they will dare to eat food offered to idols* (1 Cor 8:10); and that they will therefore have acted out of accord with (that is, "violated") their conscience and be "destroyed" as a result (1 Cor 8:7, 11). But there is danger too for Christians whose knowledge gives them liberty to partake of pagan foods. First Corinthians 10:23 applies to these "stronger believers [adelphoi]" as surely as to the "weaker"; indeed, lacking as they do the danger signal of a wounded conscience (1 Cor 8:12), the former may be at greater risk (1 Cor 10:12). While the idols and the sacrifices offered to them amount to nothing, the demons behind them are very real indeed; and they are able to bring people under their dominion and into an intimacy akin to that of the Lord's Supper* (1 Cor 10:19-21). Let both weak and strong learn a lesson from Israel's experience in the wilderness: they all received God's provision and protection; nevertheless the majority fell under judgment on account of their sins (1 Cor 10:1-10). Believers too should be careful how they respond to grace—they who have witnessed its supreme manifestation (1 Cor 10:11). God's grace is at work both in his promise of deliverance (1 Cor 10:13) and in his warning against idolatry (1 Cor 10:14); one cannot rightly claim the word of promise while disobeying the attendant word of command.

2.2.3. Romans. The "strong" perceive the ethical implications of the gospel more clearly than do the "weak." The person who "eats everything" and who "considers every day alike" (Rom 14:3, 5) is the more liberated of the two. For this very reason it is to the strong that Paul appeals. "Accept the one whose faith is weak," he counsels them at the outset (Rom 14:1). As in 1 Corinthians it is especially the conscience of the weaker believer that is to be safeguarded (Rom 14:13-23). It is most significant that Paul, himself one of the strong (Rom 15:1), does not employ his apostolic authority* to impose his personal convictions upon the weak. Nor does he counsel the strong to try by whatever means to convert the weak into the strong. Not for a moment does he ask the strong to renounce their liberty (which would be to repudiate their very being as Christians), but he does challenge them to practice it in a certain way. They are free both to exercise and to restrict their freedom, for they are enslaved to Christ and not to the liberty he has granted them. The strong are free to defend expressions of the very weakness from which they themselves have been liberated. More than that, they are strong enough and free enough actually "to bear the infirmities of the weak" (Rom 15:1 KJV).

2.3. Bondage to Love. "A Christian is a perfectly free lord of all, subject to none. A Christian is a perfectly dutiful servant of all, subject to all" (Luther, 344)—"subject to none" with respect to liberty, "subject to all" with respect to love.* Love brings liberty to its fullest expression (Schlier, 500).

2.3.1. Galatians. "You, my fellow believers, were called to be free. But do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh; rather, be slaves [douleuete] to one another in love. The entire law is summed up in a single command: 'Love your neighbor as yourself' " (Gal 5:13-14). This is "the law of Christ," now inscribed on the heart by the Spirit (Gal 5:22—6:2; cf. 2 Cor 3:1-3). (On the outworkings of this with respect to the triad of 3:28, see Longenecker 1984, Richardson.)

2.3.2. 1 Corinthians. "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (1 Cor 8:1). The gift of the Spirit ("knowledge") must not be divorced from the fruit of the Spirit, especially love (1 Cor 13:1-13). Paul declares: "Though I am free from all, I have made myself a slave [edoulōsa] to all, that I may win the more" (1 Cor 9:19). Normally people are enslaved against their will; here the act of enslavement is voluntary and deliberate, an exercise of Christian liberty: "I have made myself a slave." Now that Paul is "free from all" (for he is Christ's slave), he is free for them (he can "become all things to all people," 1 Cor 9:22). Indeed Christ commands that bondage to himself be expressed by bondage to others ("For we do not preach ourselves, but Jesus Christ as Lord, and ourselves as your slaves [douloi] for Jesus' sake," 2 Cor 4:5). Paul is free to eat food offered to idols, but he is also free to abstain. He has freedom not to exercise his freedom: "A truly emancipated spirit such as Paul's is not in bondage to its own emancipation" (Bruce, 432 n.39). In love for the weaker believer, Paul will if necessary become a vegetarian (1 Cor 8:13); he is a slave to Christ, not to food. "Let no one seek his own good, but the good of the other" (1 Cor 10:24). Thus the statements of 1 Corinthians 10:27, 29b-30, are qualified by the parenthesis of 1 Corinthians 10:28-29a. Yet in refraining from food for the sake of the other's conscience, Paul does not violate his own conscience.* He still adheres to the conviction of 1 Corinthians 10:26 (he has not capitulated to the notion that food belongs to idols or to demons), and he still recognizes his right to the food. His right is relinquished, not invalidated. It is precisely as the one who holds these convictions that Paul acts on behalf of the weaker brother. His decision to refrain is not a loss of freedom but an expression of freedom. By the same token Paul is free to relinquish—as he was free to receive—payment for his services (see Financial Support). He has the right to relinquish his right, for the sake of other people (1 Cor 9:7-23).

2.3.3. Romans. Christ freely receives the diverse expressions of worship and obedience offered by the Jewish and the Gentile* members of his household* (Rom 14:3-8). Christ's unconditional acceptance of both Jew and Gentile is to be mirrored in the conduct of strong and weak toward each other. "Those who eat must not despise those who abstain, and those who abstain must not pass judgment on those who eat; for God has welcomed them" (Rom 14:3 NRSV). "Welcome one another, then, just as Christ welcomed you" (Rom 15:7). Let the strong stop despising the weak; instead, after Christ's example, let them bear their weaknesses even at risk of insult (Rom 15:1-3). Let the weak stop judging the strong for their perceived lawlessness; instead, let them show them the mercy which the covenant God granted to lawless Gentiles (Rom 15:8-12). Such acceptance entails respect for diverse expressions of liberty. The weak and the strong must accept one another as they are, rather than as potential converts to one's own position. "Disputable matters" (Rom 14:1) are almost certain to remain a matter of controversy. But such diversity in the community provides love (agapē, Rom 14:15) its greatest opportunity. Love honors both the liberty which is the concern of the strong (for freedom comes to fullest expression in acts of love), and the law which is the concern of the weak (for "love is the fulfillment of the Law," Rom 13:8-10). The result is the praise of God (Rom 15:5-7).

See also AUTHORITY; CIVIL AUTHORITY; CONSCIENCE; ETHICS; FLESH; FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; FUTILITY; HOLY SPIRIT; LAW; LAW OF CHRIST; LIFE AND DEATH; LOVE; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SIN, GUILT; SLAVE, SLAVERY; STRONG AND WEAK; TRIUMPH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, Freedom and Obligation: A Study of the Epistle to the Galatians (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985); J. Blunck, "Freedom," NIDNTT 1.715-21; F. F. Bruce, The Book of the Acts (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, Vol. 1 (New York: Scribner's, 1951); E. J. Epp, "Paul's Diverse Imageries of the Human Situation and His Unifying Theme of Freedom," in Unity and Diversity in New Testament Theology, ed. R. A. Guelich (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 100-116; R. N. Longenecker, New Testament Social Ethics for Today (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); idem, Paul, Apostle of Liberty (New York: Harper & Row, 1964); M. Luther, "The Freedom of a Christian [1520]," in Luther's Works, Vol. 31, ed. H. J. Grimm (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg, 1957) 327-77; F. Mussner, Theologie der Freiheit nach Paulus (Düsseldorf: Aschendorff, 1976); P. Richardson, Paul's Ethic of Freedom (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1979); H. Schlier, "ἐλεύθερος κτλ," TDNT II.487-502; R. Schnackenburg, "Christian Freedom according to Paul," in Christian Existence in the New Testament (South Bend, IN: Notre Dame, 1969) 31-53.

J. K. Chamblin

FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT

The expression "the fruit of the Spirit" is a metaphor used by Paul to describe virtues* that manifest the realities of life in Christ.* Paul does not speak about the fruit of faith, but he does speak explicitly of the "fruit of the Spirit" (ho karpos tou pneumatos). In Galatians 5:22-23 Paul catalogs the components of the "fruit of the Spirit" as "love,* joy,* peace,* patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control."

1. Similar and Contrasting Metaphors
2. The Context of Galatians
3. Paul's Sources
4. Spiritual Graces
5. Conclusion

1. Similar and Contrasting Metaphors.

Galatians 5:22-23 is the only text that refers to the "fruit of the Spirit," but Paul uses a similar metaphor in other places. He views Christian churches and lives as fields and gardens from which the owner who has spent love and time with them may expect positive results, "fruit unto God" (Rom 1:13; 7:4). In Philippians 1:22 Paul indicates that his continued living will result in "fruit" from his labors. He refers to the Philippians' gift to him as a "fruit" of their love.

Closer to the idea of "fruit of the Spirit" is a reference to the "fruit of the light" (ho karpos tou phōtos), described as goodness and righteousness* and truth* (Eph 5:9). The gospel produces "fruit," accompanying its intended effect (Col 1:6, 10). The "fruit" of the new life in Christ is righteousness (Phil 1:11) and sanctification (Rom 6:21-22; see Holiness).

In a contrasting metaphor, Paul describes those apart from Christ as "unfruitful" (akarpos). Ephesians 5:11 speaks of those who walk in darkness as living unfruitful lives (cf. Rom 6:21). The unregenerate life produces fruit unto death, evidencing negative vices instead of the positive virtues produced by the Spirit (Rom 7:4; Col 3:5-9; Gal 5:19-21).

Paul may well have derived the metaphor of fruitfulness or unfruitfulness from the OT. There Israel is compared to a fruit-bearing tree or vineyard (e.g., Ps 80:8-18; Is 5:1-7; 27:2-6; Jer 2:21; 11:16; 12:10; Hos 14:6; cf. 4 Ezra 9:31-32), and Isaiah can bring indictment against the "vineyard" of the Lord for not bearing its righteous fruit (Is 5:2, 4). When Israel is restored, however, and the Spirit is poured out, the land will be fruitful (Is 32:15-16), and the trees and vine will bear their fruit (Joel 2:18-32).

2. The Context of Galatians.

As mentioned earlier, Galatians 5:22-23 is the primary passage outlining the "fruit of the Spirit." Galatians includes Paul's polemical defense of his apostleship* and the tension between the Law* and Spirit.* The Gentile* believers were seemingly engaging themselves with the Law in a way Paul prohibited, for it threatened to jeopardize "the truth of the gospel*" (Gal 2:11-21). Galatians 5:13-26 exhorts the Galatian believers to live/walk by the Spirit and not follow the fleshly* desires characteristic of those outside the believing community. It was necessary for Paul to show that freedom* from the Law does not by any means do away with the obligations of ethical* living. However, the responsibilities of moral conduct must not be shaped by the dictates of Law but by the operation, enablement and sufficiency of the Spirit (on the Galatian context, see Barclay).

2.1. Flesh and Spirit. In Galatians 5:16, 18 a contrast is made to emphasize actions characterized by the Spirit (pneumati). The exhortation in Galatians 5:16 is an active construction with the dative (pneumati peripateite) translated "walk by the Spirit." The verbal form in Galatians 5:18 is passive, again with the dative, meaning "be led by the Spirit" (pneumati agesthe). The two ideas are very similar when one is illumined by the other. "Walking by the Spirit" means not to gratify the desires of the flesh, while "being led by the Spirit" is the opposite of being under the Law.

The exhortation in Galatians 5:16 establishes parameters for life in the Spirit by establishing opposition to fleshly license; Galatians 5:18 excludes legalism as a guide for the believer. The enablement supplied by the Spirit excludes both legalism and license. Legalism and license are further defined by the lists of vices (Gal 5:19-21) and virtues (Gal 5:22-23; see Virtues and Vices). Paul uses the terms desire (epithymia) and flesh (sarx) to emphasize the contrast in character between the Spirit-controlled life and the life governed by fleshly impulses.

2.2. Shape of Life in the Spirit. The listing of the "fruit of the Spirit" in Galatians 5:22-23 gives positive shape to life in the Spirit, setting it in contrast with the vice list of Galatians 5:19-21. Galatians 5:25, "Since we live by the Spirit, let us walk by the Spirit," provides a summary verse for this section with the repetition of the dative for "Spirit" (pneumati). Paul's emphatic summary is best understood as an exhortation to "keep in step [stoichōmen] with the Spirit."

The context stresses the Spirit's power for motivation and enablement in Christian living. Paul's view of life in the Spirit takes shape in both positive and negative ways. The virtues (the fruit of the Spirit) are genuine examples of the ethical character produced in those who walk by the Spirit.

3. Paul's Sources.

It is highly unlikely that the list of virtues is entirely Paul's creation. One of the strongest influences was the OT. In his letter to the Romans, Paul indicates that love, which is the first virtue in the list of Galatians 5, fulfills the specific commands of the Decalogue (Rom 13:8-10). Paul, however, does not codify in a formal manner the ethical teachings of the OT. Little or no direct influence from the intertestamental period can be firmly established, though it is likely that his overall ethical teaching reflects Paul's rabbinic background (Davies, 177-226). O. Wischmeyer has, however, produced from Hellenistic Judaism an impressive array of parallels to "love."* But as G. D. Fee notes, "the alleged parallels are of dubious value; praise of 'virtue' or 'eros' is not quite the same as an exhortation to ἀγάπη" (Fee, 626).

The list of virtues parallels similar terminology and style in Hellenistic ethics. While the language is similar to Greek thought, Paul does not use the qualities in a Greek way. Some of the concepts and descriptions in the list are more, others less, "specifically Christian." For Paul, however, these virtues are always for the benefit of the community and the upbuilding of the church and not, as in the Greek ethic, merely for character formation. They are always approached from the standpoint of Christian liberty and obedience in Christ.

Although Paul, with the exception of love (agapē), adopts conventional terms, they do not represent "virtues" in the traditional sense but manifestations of divine redemption.* They occur in the Christian community as reflections of Christ's presence in the church by means of the Spirit.

4. Spiritual Graces.

The graces included in Paul's list of the "fruit of the Spirit" must be compared with similar lists in Philippians 4:8 and Colossians 3:12-15. These Spirit-prompted graces go beyond the natural bounds of virtue so that believers, for example, demonstrate love by loving their enemies (Rom 12:14; cf. Mt 5:44). The outworking of these virtues demonstrates the work of the Spirit in believers. There may not, however, be a one-to-one correspondence between these lists and progress in the Christian life. V. Furnish suggests they are not designed to portray the Christian ideal toward which all are to strive, but are rather different ways Paul addresses himself to concrete historical situations to explain how the new life in Christ expresses itself (Furnish, 87). Yet these virtues can be seen as evidence of the work of the Spirit in the development of believers in contrast to "works of the flesh" (Gal 5:19-21). To some extent we can say the virtues are definite marks of the Spirit.

Paul lists nine virtues or graces (not to be understood as an exhaustive list), which make up the "fruit of the Spirit"—the lifestyle of those indwelt and energized by the Spirit (Bruce 1982, 251). The "fruit of the Spirit" is obviously intended as a contrast to the "works of the flesh." The phrase "fruit of the Spirit" indicates that the qualities enumerated are not the results of observing a legal code, but are to be attributed to the power* of the Holy Spirit (Fung, 262-63). The ethical characteristics produced by the Spirit are in sharp contrast to the natural activities and attitudes of the self-centered life.

4.1. Love (Agapē). It is most important that "love"* should stand at the head of the list. This emphasis is present elsewhere in Paul (1 Cor. 13). Love characterizes God,* and when performed by men and women love fulfills the Law (Rom 13:10). It is a self-giving action for the benefit of others, not necessarily an emotion. The best example of such love is, of course, Christ's self-giving on the cross* (Gal 2:20; Eph 5:25).

4.2. Joy (Chara). Although Paul repeatedly exhorts believers to rejoice "in the Lord" (cf. Phil 3:1; 4:4), the only occurrence of the word joy* in Galatians is here in the listing of the fruit of the Spirit. Even in trials, believers may retain the joy of the Lord, which prevents them from giving way to total despair. While love is clearly attributed to God, joy is not so clearly linked, but its character as a divine gift is obvious in other contexts (e.g., Rom 14:17).

4.3. Peace (Eirēnē). Genuine Christian existence demonstrates the peace of God because believers have peace* with God (Rom 5:1). Peace, like all graces in the list, is not a precondition of justification; instead, for Paul justification* is the precondition and root from which these qualities grow. Peace is the tranquillity that is ministered to believers to sustain them in life. H. D. Betz suggests that this initial threefold structure (love, joy, peace) reveals an important element of Paul's ethic: "People cannot be expected simply to act in an ethically responsible way, but they must first be enabled, empowered, and motivated before they can so act" (Betz, 287). Since through the Spirit the love, joy and peace of God are present to believers, they should act appropriately. In Colossians 3:15 Paul's exhortation for peace transcends individual experience. He calls for peace to rule in their corporate experience so that there would be harmony in the congregation (Melick, 301-2).

4.4. Patience (Makrothymia). Patience is a positive value embracing steadfastness and staying power. Patience, or forbearance, is a quality of God (Ps 103:8), and it is to be reproduced in God's people (1 Cor 13:4; Eph 4:2; Col 1:11; 3:12).

4.5. Kindness (Chrēstotēs). The Holy Spirit produces in believers the attitude of gentleness, or kindness, putting love in action. Kindness is a quality of God's gracious attitude and actions toward sinners (Rom 2:4; Eph 2:7; Tit 3:4). Christians have no better way to continue in God's kindness than by showing others the kindness of God (Eph 4:32).

4.6. Goodness (Agathōsynē). Goodness includes the idea of generosity, but focuses on moral excellence. An unusual term, it occurs in the LXX and only four times in the NT. Fung claims that "goodness is an attitude of generous kindness to others, which is happy to do far more than is required by mere justice" (Fung, 268). Such magnanimous generosity is the antithesis to envy (Gal 5:21).

4.7. Faithfulness (Pistis). Pistis may mean either "faith"* or "faithfulness." The context, which lists eight other ethical qualities, indicates that one should expect pistis to denote an ethical quality also. Since God is faithful (Rom 3:3), his people also are to be faithful. The word points to the idea of reliability or trustworthiness.

4.8. Gentleness (Praütēs). This quality combines strength and meekness, denoting strength under control. It lacks any negative sense of an absence of spirit, courage or vigor sometimes associated with the English word gentleness. This spiritual grace is best understood as a humble disposition to the divine will (Burton, 317).

4.9. Self-Control (Enkrateia). This last term is especially important. The idea had been introduced into Greek ethics by Socrates, and by Paul's time the word had become a primary concept in Hellenistic thought. Its place at the end of the list possibly indicates that just as love, the first quality, is the fulfillment of the Law, Christian self-control fulfills the complete demand of Greek ethics.

5. Conclusion.

Whereas the list of vices or "works of the flesh" is unstructured, by contrast the "fruit of the Spirit" are characterized by a structured unity. This unity consists of three sets of three concepts, the most important of which are at the beginning and the end. "Love" at the beginning and "self-control" at the end, represent perfection and completeness. Where the "fruit of the Spirit" are present, it enhances the life of the church and its members. No room remains for the "works of the flesh."

For those at Galatia that fear abandoning Law for Spirit will lead to libertinism, Paul assures that against these things there is no law. Nor are these characteristics to be codified into a new law. These Spirit-given graces do not originate in any form of legalism but are the outgrowth of the Spirit's eschatological activity (Barclay 1991, 119-25).

See also ETHICS; FLESH; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION; HOLY SPIRIT; JOY; LOVE; PEACE; SPIRITUALITY; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. G. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); W. Barclay, Flesh and Spirit: An Examination of Galatians 5:19-23 (Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); H. D. Betz, Galatians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); F. F. Bruce, Commentary on Galatians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); idem, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); E. D. Burton, The Epistle to the Galatians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1921); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); R. Y. K. Fung, The Epistle to the Galatians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1991); W. Longsworth, "Ethics in Paul: The Shape of Christian Life," in The Annual of the Society of Christian Ethics (1981) 29-56; D. J. Lull, The Spirit in Galatia (SBLDS 49; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1980); R. R. Melick, Jr., Philippians, Colossians, Philemon (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1991); E. Schweizer, "Traditional Ethical Patterns in the Pauline and Post-Pauline Letters and Their Development," in Text and Interpretation, ed. E. Best and R. McL. Wilson (Cambridge: University Press, 1979) 195-209; O. Wischmeyer, Der höchste Weg. Das 13. Kapitel des 1 Korintherbriefes (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1981).

D. S. Dockery

FULLNESS

Paul uses fullness (plērōma) with different shades of meaning in both the passive sense "that which is completed or filled" (as object) and the active sense "that which completes or fills up" (as subject).

1. Totality of Space
2. Totality of Quantity
3. Totality of the Law
4. Fulfillment of Time
5. Fullness of Essence

1. Totality of Space.

In 1 Corinthians 10:26, 27 Paul quotes Psalm 24:1 LXX to defend his view that "all contents of the earth" belong to the Lord,* and thus all kinds of food can be eaten.

2. Totality of Quantity.

In Romans 11 Paul refers to "the full inclusion" or "full recovery" of Israel* (Rom 11:12), which will most probably take place soon after "the total number of the Gentiles have come in" (Rom 11:25). In Romans 11:12, although the plērōma is morally neutral, the contrasting parallel, trespass (Gk paraptōma), suggests moral or spiritual consummation. And in Romans 11:25, although it can mean that the Gentiles* have "the whole time of the church" all to themselves (cf. Lk 21:24), the parallel phrase "all Israel" (Rom 11:26) points to "until the great multitude is completed" (cf. Rev 7:9).

In Romans 15:29 the passive sense is used to refer to Paul's desire that the Roman believers share in "the full abundance" of Christ's* blessing" through their financial collection,* not just to bring relief to the famine-stricken in Jerusalem, but also to strengthen the bond between Jews and Gentiles in the church* (Rom 15:24-33).

3. Totality of the Law.

Another passive use is Paul's reference to love* as "the sum of the Law's demands" (Rom 13:10), which believers fulfill wholly because by God's* provision in Christ through his Spirit (see Holy Spirit) sin* has no more power* over them (cf. Rom 8:4, 9-10); the immediate context shows his concern for obedience to the whole Torah (Rom 13:8-10). But it is also possible that it has an active meaning: the Torah has been fulfilled and receives its perfection in love. Love for one's neighbor is the end or complete realization of the Torah (cf. Rom 13:8; Gal 5:14; 6:2; see Law).

4. Fulfillment of Time.

The active sense of plērōma is clearly used with reference to time. In Galatians 4:4 Paul refers to Christ's first advent as "the completion of time (chronos)." This may be one (or the first) of the times (Gk kairos, cf. Lk 21:24; Acts 1:7) or ages (Gk aiōnes, cf. Gal 3:20-21; 1 Cor 10:11; Eph 2:7) which will all find their consummation in God's ultimate objective of uniting all things in Christ (Eph 1:10). Christ is not only the source and sustainer, but also the goal of the history of the whole cosmos. So here in Galatians 4:4 plērōma means the full realization of God's predestined plans revealed in the Scripture (Eph 1:10; cf. Mt 5:17; Mk 1:15; see Election and Predestination).

5. Fullness of Essence.

5.1. Significant yet controversial is the usage in Colossians 1:19 and 2:9. Here plērōma most likely means "the whole total of the Godhead" which was pleased to dwell in the person of Christ (Delling). Some scholars (Lightfoot, Bultmann) think that plērōma is used in Colossians 1:19 as a quasi-technical term borrowed from early Gnosticism* to refer to the space in which the entirety of intermediary beings exist between the creator and his creation.* This assumes that Paul was using a term taken from the Colossian heretics (see Colossians) who, under the influence of gnostic thinking, taught that Christ is only one of the members of the heavenly mediatorial hierarchy. Paul was therefore arguing for the superiority and uniqueness of Christ, that he rules over these beings as the divinity who fills them all.

But apart from the lack of external evidence for early Gnosticism, there is also no internal evidence of a polemic against this alleged false teaching about Christ. So the active sense of plērōma seems best for this text: Christ has all the divine attributes in himself. This fits the OT and Hebraic usage, where the Hebrew equivalent connotes completeness and God who, on the one hand, in his being or glory* fills the whole earth (e.g., Ps 72:19; Jer 23:24; Is 6:3; Ezek 43:5), on the other hand is said to be "pleased to dwell" in a place of his choosing, Zion (Col 1:19, eudokēsen . . . katoikēsai; LXX Ps 67:17; cf. LXX Ps 131:13, 14; Is 8:18; 49:20; see O'Brien). Moreover, Jewish wisdom speculation spoke of Wisdom's universal presence and permeation of all things (Wis 7:24). Colossians 1:19 seems to indicate that the fullness the OT attributed to God and Judaism attributed to Wisdom now dwells in the place of God's choosing, Christ. Other aspects of Wisdom christology* may be detected in the statements about the pre-existent Christ and his role in creation in Colossians 1:15-16 (see Firstborn; Pre-existence; Wisdom; cf. the appropriation of wisdom concepts in the Johannine logos christology, Jn 1:14, 16).

5.2. Another difficult text is Ephesians 1:23 (see Yates, who lists the interpretive options). It seems best to take plērōma as a christological title that is used in apposition to "him" in Ephesians 1:22: Christ himself is the one who has the full measure of the God who fills everything (cf. 1 Cor 15:28). This harmonizes with the use of the verb plēroō in Ephesians 4:10 and the usage in Colossians (Moule).

It seems probable that the passive sense of the church being dwelt in and "completed by Christ" may be meant. Though the immediate context can also suggest that "Christ is being filled by the church," "the church is being filled by Christ" makes better sense since the usage of the imagery of the church as Christ's body (see Body of Christ) focuses on the importance of Christ to the church and not vice versa (Eph 4:13). The church is the receptacle being filled up with the grace* and gifts* of Christ (cf. Eph 4:7-11).

5.3. Plērōma is used in the body metaphor of Ephesians 4:13 to denote the full realization of the unity of all believers in Christ: it attains "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (RSV) in which Christians are no longer easily swayed by false teachings (Eph 4:14).

5.4. The usage in Ephesians 3:19 is possibly similar: the growth in Christian experience is to reach "to the measure of (eis) all the fullness of God."

See also Body of Christ; Israel; Wisdom.

Bibliography. P. Benoit, "Body, Head and Pleroma in the Epistles of the Captivity," in Jesus and the Gospel (London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 1974) 2.51-92; M. Bogdasovich, "The Idea of Pleroma in the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians," Downside Review 83 (1965) 118-30; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Charles Scribner's, 1951, 1955) 2.149-52; G. Delling, "πλήρης κτλ," TDNT VI.283-311; J. Ernst, Pleroma und Pleroma Christi. Geschichte und Deutung eines Begriffs der paulinischen Antilegomena (BU 5; Regensburg: Pustet, 1970); A. Feuillet, "L'église plérôme du Christ d'après Éphés., 1, 23," NRT 78 (1956) 449-72, 593-610; A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990) 72-78; C. F. D. Moule, " 'Fullness' and 'Fill' in the New Testament," SJT 4 (1951) 79-86; P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); P. D. Overfield, "Pleroma: A Study in Content and Context," NTS 25 (1978-79) 384-96; I. de la Potterie, "Le Christ, Plérôme de l'église (Eph 1.22-23)," Bib 58 (1977) 500-524; R. Schippers, "πληρόω," NIDNTT 1.733-41; R. Yates, "A Reexamination of Eph 1:23," ExpT 83 (1971-72) 146-51. D. S. Lim

FUTILITY

In Paul's letters the adjective kenos, and the words mataios (adjective), mataiotēs (noun) and mataioomai

(verb) are the most prominent terms used to convey the general idea of futility, uselessness, or lack of purpose or result. But other words are also used with various degrees of synonymous meaning: eikē, "in vain," "without result"; dōrean, "for no reason," "for no purpose"; akarpos, "unproductive." Kenos and mataios are frequently used together in the LXX (e.g., Job 20:18; Is 37:7; Hos 12:1), in classical Greek (e.g., Sophocles Elec. 324 and Aristotle Eth. Nic. 1.2) and in Hellenistic Greek (e.g., 1 Clement 6). Kenos is used by Paul to signify that which is empty and hollow—hence, pointless and futile. Mataios is employed by Paul to signify that which is vain and useless—hence, ineffective and futile.

1. Futility and the Apostolic Gospel
2. Futility As Human and Cosmic Plight

1. Futility and the Apostolic Gospel.

In Colossians 2:8 Paul uses kenos to describe the enticements of those trying to capture believers with a false teaching or "philosophy" (philosophia), which is nothing but kenē apatē, "empty deceit" or "hollow deception" (cf. Eph 5:6; see 1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 2:16 where kenōphonia, "foolish talk," appears). Paul further characterizes this message as "according to human tradition, according to the elements [or elemental spirits] of the world, and not according to Christ" (Col 2:8).

In contrast, Paul's preaching* was not futile but purposeful and effective because it was about Christ who had died (see Death of Christ) and had been raised to life* again (see 1 Cor 15:14). He made the same claim of effectiveness for his labor among believers (1 Thess 2:1). Paul was concerned that neither his labor nor the faith and suffering* of believers be in vain (kenos, Gal 2:2; 2 Cor 6:1; eikē, Gal 3:4). And he could express confidence that it had not been for nothing, despite threats from within and without (Gal 3:4; Phil 2:16; 1 Thess 3:5; cf. use of eikē, "in vain" or "to no result," in Gal 4:11; 1 Cor 15:2). Paul was confident that he had not received God's grace* "to no effect" or "without result" (1 Cor 15:10; Gal 2:2).

Behind this concern that his labor and proclamation not be in vain seems to lie his self-identity as an apostle conceived along the lines of an OT prophet, or more particularly, the Servant of Yahweh (see Prophet, Paul As). There is substantial evidence that Paul had reflected deeply on Isaiah 49, where the Servant's call (cf. Is 49:1, 5 and Gal 1:15-16) and dual mission to restore Israel* (Is 49:5-6; see Restoration of Israel) and take salvation* to the Gentiles* (cf. Is 49:6 and Gal 2:2) are clearly articulated. There also the Servant expresses doubts about his effectiveness in the mission: "But I said, 'I have labored in vain [LXX kenōs ekopiasa], I have spent my strength for nothing and vanity [LXX eis mataion], yet surely my cause is with the Lord, and my reward with my God' " (Is 49:4). The context and use of kenos and eikē in Galatians suggests that Paul's concern that he not "run" (Gal 2:2) or "labor" (Gal 4:11) in vain echoes the language of the Servant of Yahweh in Isaiah 49:4. The same background may be reflected in Philippians 2:16 (note again the metaphors of labor and running), where the second half of Isaiah 49:4 may stand behind Paul's expression of confidence that his ministry will be vindicated and he will "boast" on the Day of Christ. Thus the purposefulness and effectiveness of Paul's apostolic ministry appear to be directly related to his divine mission to take the good news of God's salvation "to the end of the earth" (Is 49:6) and so serve the eschatological purposes of God. This background may shed further light on Paul's repeated expressions of concern in 1 Corinthians 15 (1 Cor 15:2 [eikē], 10, 14 [kenos 3 times] that his apostleship, his message and the Corinthians' response will have been in vain if the message of Christ's resurrection* is misconstrued along the lines the Corinthians* have taken it. For the resurrection of Christ is the first fruit* (1 Cor 15:20) and guarantee of the future resurrection which epitomizes all that is included in the establishment of God's new cosmic order (1 Cor 15:17-28; see Eschatology) and the end of all futility.

2. Futility As Human and Cosmic Plight.

Paul's use of mataiotēs was very likely informed by the LXX, especially Ecclesiastes. Although the adjective mataios was regularly employed in Greek literature to describe that which is vain or empty, in extant Greek literature mataiotēs is rarely used as compared with the LXX, where it is used frequently with the sense "uselessness," "worthlessness," or "futility" (Bauernfeind, 523). In Ecclesiastes (1:2, 14; 2:1, 11, 15, 17, etc.) the expression appears repeatedly in the negative refrain, mataiotēs mataiotētōn, ta panta mataiotēs. This haunting chorus is difficult to render in English translation due to the numerous connotations of mataiotēs. The traditional rendering, "vanity of vanities, all is vanity," found in many older translations, is being replaced in newer versions with more creative attempts at capturing the meaning (e.g., "meaninglessness" NIV; "emptiness" NEB; "uselessness" TEV; or "Futility, utter futility, . . . everything is futile," Eccles 1:2 REB). Qoheleth points to the futility of all human endeavors which seek to bring lasting satisfaction in and of themselves. One might as well "try and catch the wind" (Eccles 2:11). A person can find permanent meaning and lasting contentment only in God, who transcends human existence and with whom there is no mataiotēs.

Nowhere in the NT is the kind of futility described in Ecclesiastes so clearly reflected as in Romans 8:20. When Paul speaks of the creation* being subjected to futility, he is focusing on the inability of creation to attain the goal for which it was originally designed (see World, Cosmology). When humanity sinned, God subjected creation to the curse of futility and decay (cf. Gen 3:17-19). An alternative view is worth noting, however. C. K. Barrett (166) suggests that mataiotēs in Romans 8:20, building on the LXX's use of mataios to refer to gods or idols (e.g., LXX Ps 30:6), refers to "inferior spiritual powers," or what Paul otherwise calls the "elements* of the world" (e.g., Gal 4:9), to which the created order has been enslaved.

Creation's "fall" was the result of humanity's disobedience as steward of creation. The subhuman creation thus shares in Adam's fallenness "not of its own will"—but neither is it by chance. God subjected it "in hope," and so the way out from under futility is shown to be the eschatological work of God by which he presently redeems and adopts his children (see Adoption), and will ultimately bring them and the created order into the glory* of a new creation, liberated from its slavery to corruption. In the present age, however, all of the creation groans in labor pains as it awaits that redemption.* The children of God groan with the creation (Rom 8:22-23), though by the Spirit they presently experience redemption (Rom 8:15). For the subhuman creation cannot experience its freedom from futility and enter into the newness of the age to come until the "revealing of the children of God" (Rom 8:21) at the end of this age. That coming "glory of the children of God" (Rom 8:21) will be shared by the whole created order; both will be liberated from mataiotēs.

In other places Paul used mataiotēs to depict the human plight as characterized by a futility that has its source in the thought life of fallen humanity. With the Psalmist Paul can characterize the presumptuous "thoughts of the wise" as being futile, nothingness (1 Cor 3:20, quoting from LXX Ps 93:11). In Romans 1 and Ephesians 4 we find a parallel development of this human plight. In Romans 1:21, using the verb mataioomai, Paul argues that the ungodly, having not recognized or honored God, "became futile [emataiōthēsan] in their thinking, and their senseless minds were darkened" (NRSV). Likwise, Ephesians 4:17-18 speaks of the nothingness of the purposes of the Gentiles,* who are those living "in the futility of their minds" because "they are darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of their ignorance and hardness of heart" (Eph 4:17-18, NRSV; cf. Rom 1:21; Wis 13:1). In Romans 1:21-23 Paul's indictment moves from futility to foolishness to idolatry* ("they changed the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of the image of corruptible man, and of birds, . . ." Rom 1:23). Paul's polemic against Gentile idolatry recalls the language of Psalm 106:20, but also that of Isaiah 44:9-20 where the prophet satirizes idols. There, as elsewhere, the LXX associates mataios with idols, or the gods of the nations (see above; in Is 44:9 those who fashion idols are mataioi; cf., e.g., Jer 10:15; 51:18; Ps 31:6). The thought life of the unregenerate is futile and aimless because it is alienated from the life of God and lacks spiritual insight. Thus it produces a life of purposelessness and ineffectiveness, marked by abandonment to licentiousness, greed, and impurity (Eph 4:19; cf. Rom 1:24-32).

See also PROPHET, PAUL AS; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Balz, "μάταιος κτλ," EDNT 2.396-97; C. K. Barrett, The Epistle to the Romans (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1957); O. Bauernfeind, "μάταιος κτλ," TDNT IV.519-24; J. D. G. Dunn, Romans 1-8 (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1988); M. Lattke, "κενός," EDNT 2.281-82; A. Oepke, "κενός κτλ," TDNT III.659-62; E. Tiedtke et al., "Empty, Vain," NIDNTT 1.546-53.

P. W. Comfort

G

GALATIA. See GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE.

GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE

Freedom* and unity in Christ are central themes of Paul's letter to the Galatians. His letter addresses Christians, whose preoccupation with keeping the Law* was splitting their churches along racial lines, separating Jews from Gentiles.* Such splits could not be tolerated because "there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28). This new unity which transcends all racial, social and sexual barriers is based upon the "truth of the gospel*" (Gal 2:5): Christ was crucified to set us free from the curse* of the Law so that we might receive his Spirit (Gal 3:13-14; see Holy Spirit). It is the Spirit, not the Law, who gives us our identity as children of God (Gal 4:6; see Adoption, Sonship). Believers must protect their freedom from slavery to the Law (Gal 5:1) and yet use their freedom to fulfill the Law by serving one another through love* (Gal 5:13-14). We are no longer under the Law that divides us; we are led by the Spirit who unites us. Paul undergirds these central concepts of freedom through the cross of Christ and unity by his Spirit with other complementary themes: an account of his own call to evangelize the Gentiles (Gal 1:13-16), a record of his loyalty to the gospel for the Gentiles in his relationships with the other apostles (Gal 1:17—2:21), an explanation of justification* by faith, not by works of the Law (Gal 2:16; 3:6-12; see Works of the Law), an exposition of OT texts on the Abrahamic* promise and the Mosaic Law in the context of salvation history (Gal 3:6-25; 4:21-31), and a definition of Christian ethics* in terms of the flesh* and the Spirit (Gal 5:13—6:10).

The significance of these central themes in Galatians gives this letter a predominant place in any consideration of Pauline chronology* and theology. The letter has had a profound impact on Christian thought and action throughout the history of the church. Luther called it "my own epistle, to which I have plighted my troth; my Katie von Bora."

1. Galatia
2. Historical Context
3. Literary Forms
4. Contents

1. Galatia.

Paul's letter "to the churches in Galatia" (Gal 1:2) rebuked the recipients for being "foolish Galatians" (Gal 3:1). His letter to the Corinthian church instructed that church to do what he had told "the churches of Galatia" to do concerning the collection (1 Cor 16:1). In a letter to Timothy he informed Timothy that "Crescens has gone to Galatia" (2 Tim 4:10). The geographical location of the churches in Galatia and the ethnic origin of the Galatians referred to by Paul is still a topic much debated by NT scholars. Some (notably, J. B. Lightfoot and H. D. Betz), following the majority of patristic, medieval and Reformation commentators, have argued that Galatians was written to Christians of Celtic (Gaulish) descent who were living in or around Ancyra, Pessinus and Tavium, three cities in northern Asia Minor. Others (notably, E. deW. Burton, F. F. Bruce and R. N. Longenecker) argue that the "churches in Galatia" were planted by Paul, as recorded in Acts 13—14, in Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe in southern Asia Minor and consisted of Gentiles from diverse ethnic origins (Phrygians, Pisidians and Lyconians). The references in Acts 16:6 ("the region of Phrygia and Galatia") and Acts 18:23 ("the region of Galatia and Phrygia") have been claimed as support by both sides in this debate. To understand the background for this debate, it is necessary to review three stages in the history of Galatia: the Celtic invasion, Hellenistic Galatia and Roman Galatia.

1.1. The Celtic Invasion. When an army of Celts (also called Gauls or Galatians by Greek and Latin authors) invaded and subsequently settled in north-central Asia Minor (modern Turkey), they gave their new homeland their own name, Galatia. Those Celts (or Galatians, as they were usually called in Asia Minor), who were of the same ethnic origin as the Celts of France and Britain, had migrated from central Europe to Greece. According to the Roman historian, Livy (A.D. 23-79), they became "inflamed with desire" to cross into the rich land of Asia. Their opportunity came when they were invited by Nicomedes I, king of Bithynia, who needed mercenaries in his campaign to recapture the greater part of Bithynia. In 278 B.C. some 20,000 Galatians waged war on behalf of Nicomedes until all of Bithynia acknowledged his sovereignty. Livy describes those fierce Galatian warriors, who inspired such terror "that the most distant and nearest alike obeyed their orders: . . . tall bodies, long reddish hair, huge shields, very long swords; in addition, songs as they go into battle and yells and leapings and the dreadful din of arms as they clash shields according to some ancestral customs—all these are deliberately used to terrify their foes" (Livy Hist. 38.18.3-9.)

Livy's real purpose in giving this description was to demonstrate the might of Rome in defeating such awesome foes ("how far Roman valor surpasses Gallic madness"). But there must be some truth in his account because other ancient sources describe the way they ravaged western and north-central Asia Minor, and were paid tribute by even the Seleucid kingdom until Attalus I, king of Pergamum, was finally able to defeat them and confine them within fixed boundaries after 232 B.C. Their territory was over 200 miles from southwest to northeast, bounded by Lyconia and Pamphylia to the south, by Bithynia, Paphlagonia and Pontus to the north, by Cappadocia to the east and by Phrygia to the west.

The Galatian people inhabiting this territory consisted of three tribes: the most powerful, the Trocmi, settled in the east around Tavium; to the Tectosages belonged the fortress Ancyra (modern Ankara); the Tolistobogii lived in the area around Pessinus in the western part of the Galatian territory. Each tribe was subdivided into four tetrarchies, each tetrarchy having its own tetrarch, judge, military commander and two subordinate commanders. Representatives from the twelve tetrarchies formed one council which assembled at Drynemetum. The Galatian nobility ruled over the native population. Although the Galatians maintained their own Celtic language, to some extent they adopted the religion of the country. Thus a Celtic invasion from the west was the origin of Galatia in Asia Minor.

1.2. Hellenistic Galatia. Writing in the first century A.D. from a Roman perspective, Livy described the Hellenization of the Galatians: "those forefathers of ours had to do with true Gauls, born in their own land; these are now degenerates, of mixed race, and really Gallogrecians, as they are named" (Livy Hist. 28.17.9). Although the Galatians became known as the "Gallogrecians," Greek-speaking Galatians, they are depicted by the ancient Greek and Latin historians as barbaric warriors, invading and ransacking neighboring countries. They were more influenced by local Phrygian culture and religion than by Hellenization. In Pessinus they participated in the famous ancient temple of the Phrygian goddess, the Mother of gods, called Agdistis. The sanctuary with its porticoes of white marble was an object of great veneration. The priests were called potentates because of the immense power they exercised in their society.

The Galatian form of government became more totalitarian: by 63 B.C. the tribes were no longer ruled by a council and tetrarchs, but by three tribal kings; by 42 B.C. Deiotarus gained control of all Galatia after a civil war. In a series of battles the Galatians fought against the power of Rome. In 190 B.C. they sided with the Seleucid king, Antiochus III, against Rome, but they were defeated at Magnesia in 189 B.C. by Consul Manlius Vulso.

The Galatians began to see the benefits of supporting the Roman cause. So when the Roman general, Pompey, marched against Mithradates V, the Galatians were on Pompey's side. In 64 B.C. Pompey rewarded their support by designating Galatia as a client kingdom and expanding its borders to include regions to the south and east. When in 36 B.C. Galatia was passed to Amyntas, the secretary and general of Deiotarus, the territory included portions of Pisidia and Phrygia. Later Amyntas acquired a large part of Lyconia and was given a section of Cilicia called Cilicia Tracheia and also much of Pisidia and Isauria by Augustus as a reward for his aid in the battle of Actium. As a result the territory of Galatia included a large area in the southern part of Asia Minor that had never been ethnically Galatian. When Amyntas, the last king of Galatia, was killed in battle against the Homanadenses in 25 B.C., Augustus did not entrust the Galatian kingdom to the sons of Amyntas, but instead reorganized it as a Roman province under the authority of a Roman governor. Thus the Galatian kingdom became the Roman province of Galatia.

1.3. Roman Galatia. As a Roman province, Galatia included the original territory (the area from Pessinus in the west to Tavium in the east) with major additions from other regions: Phrygia, Isauria and Pisidia. Such cities and villages as Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe were now within the boundaries of the Galatian province. Portions of Pamphylia formerly belonging to Amyntas were restored by Augustus to Pamphylia and parts of eastern Lyconia and Cilicia Tracheia were transferred to his ally Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. But in 5 B.C. the Galatian province was again enlarged by new annexations: a large section of Paphlagonia to the north was added and about three years later part of Pontus was added and then designated as Pontus Galatica, to distinguish it from the rest of Pontus which did not belong to Galatia.

By analogy with this official Roman designation of Pontus Galatica, it has been inferred that the references in Acts 16:6 and 18:23 should be taken as proper designations for Phrygia Galatica, that part of Phrygia which is included within the province of Galatia, to distinguish it from that part of Phrygia which lay within proconsular Asia (Phrygia Asiana). On this basis, Acts 13:14—14:23 is viewed as an account of the planting of churches in the region of Phrygia Galatica and Acts 16:6 and 18:23 are taken as references to Paul's subsequent visits in the same region. The alternative view that these references in Acts 16:6 and 18:23 describe a visit of Paul in the northern, original territory of Galatia fails to recognize the grammatical construction of these phrases in Acts ("the region of Galatia and Phrygia" indicates one region, not two) and the historical construction of the Roman province of Galatia. It seems that Acts follows the typical Greek practice of describing a Roman province by listing the regions within that province.

Thus in the time of Paul the Roman province of Galatia extended from Pontus on the Black Sea to Pamphylia on the Mediterranean. "The churches of Galatia" addressed by Paul might have been in the northern ethnic territory of the Galatian tribes in the vicinity of the chief cities, Pessinus, Ancyra and Tavium, or they might have been in the southern region of the expanded Roman province of Galatia where, according to the account in Acts 13—14, Paul visited Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. Either a North Galatia or a South Galatia address is theoretically possible as a result of the greatly expanded boundaries of the Roman province of Galatia in the first century A.D.

The Greek geographer Strabo describes the population of the province as a mixed one and distinguishes Galatians, Paphlagonians, Phrygians, Pisidians, Lyconians and Isaurians. Most of these ethnic groups maintained their own languages. But whatever their mother tongues or ethnic backgrounds may have been, all inhabitants of the Roman province of Galatia were considered Galatians. Inscriptions bearing the names of slaves refer to them as Galatians even though none of them has a Celtic name. An inscription (1st century A.D.) of Pednelissus, on the southern edge of Pisidia, designates that city as "the city of the Galatians." Another inscription of Apollonia in the Phrygian region of the province called the residents of that city Galatians. In such places as Athens and Rhodes there are numerous inscriptions on tombstones which designate resident aliens as Galatians even though the names are almost uniformly Greek, though some show a Phrygian background.

It seems that the name of Galatians was widely used as a designation for persons of Phrygian as well as Celtic origin. Although this fact is well attested (see esp. Hemer, 299-305), it is disputed by such reputable authorities as W. Bauer's Greek-English Lexicon and the IDB article on Galatia. The latter insists that "the name of Galatians would hardly be an appropriate designation for all the inhabitants of the Roman province, but rather would evoke special memories of the history of the tribe" (Mellink, 338). But if Galatians were only a designation for pure-blooded Celts, it could only have been applied to a very small number of the Celtic aristocracy. S. Mitchell provides ample evidence to show that > although the nobility seems to have kept distinct from the subject population, the lower class probably intermarried freely and by the second century B.C. has become at least partly amalgamated with it. It is significant that the peasant population at this date was referred to not as Phrygian but as Galatian, although it is quite clear that most of it was of Anatolian origin. (Mitchell, 1058)

Even where Celtic names are found, they are usually in association with Greek, Roman or Phrygian family name types. So the pure-blooded Celt must have been very rare indeed. The entry in BAGD bases its case on Memmon's frequent use of the name of Galatiâns for "the people with a well-defined individuality, who came to Asia Minor from Europe." On this basis it is claimed that Memmon "would certainly never address Lycaonians as Galatians" (BAGD, 150). Presumably, we are to infer that Paul would follow the same practice as Memmon (a questionable inference in itself). Memmon, a contemporary of Paul, wrote a lengthy history of his own city, Heraclea Pontica. The purpose of his references to the Galatians was to show how the Celtic invasion in the third century B.C. weakened his city and reduced its territory. So his references do not establish the proper designation for the residents of the Roman province of Galatia in the first century A.D.

The evidence indicates that the name of the Celtic invaders became the name of honor for many diverse peoples of Asia Minor within the expanded borders of the Roman province of Galatia in the first century A.D. So members of churches anywhere in the Roman province of Galatia would have been regarded as Galatians in Paul's time. The question of their location in North or South Galatia cannot be decided one way or the other simply on a geographical basis and must await further treatment in the discussion of Paul's letter to the Galatians.

Near the end of the first century (c. A.D. 74), Vespasian detached most of Pisidia from the Galatian province. In the second century (c. A.D. 137) the Lyconian portion of the province was transferred to Cilicia and Isauria to form an enlarged province of Cilicia. Then near the end of the third century (c. A.D. 297) the remainder of the southern regions of Galatia were transferred to a new province of Pisidia, with Pisidian Antioch as its capital and Iconium as its second city. The province of Galatia was thus reduced to approximately its ancient ethnological dimensions, the original northern territory of the Celtic invaders. It is not surprising, therefore, that patristic commentators, followed by medieval and Reformation commentators, assumed that Paul addressed his letter to churches in North Galatia since that was the only Galatia there was in patristic times.

1.4. Culture and Religion of Roman Galatia. Galatia was a rural province. The few major cities, notably Ancyra and Pisidian Antioch, and small villages were separated by vast tracts of countryside. The province was normally able to supply its own needs for food by the production of grain, the basic staple of life. Wool was the product that brought wealth to the province. Much of the central and southern area of the country was a huge sheep farm. Strabo informs us that many people made their fortunes from sheep, especially Amyntas, who had three hundred flocks. Many of the decorated tombstones of Galatia depict the same objects: a yoke of oxen with plow and sickles to portray the planting and harvesting of grain, a distaff and bobbin to indicate the care of sheep and weaving of wool, and a vine or bunch of grapes to show that for many the production of wine was important.

The vast areas of farmland and grazing land were crisscrossed by Roman roads which tied the cities and villages together in a remarkably efficient communications system. The Phrygian cult of the Mother of gods was widespread as were temples to Zeus (see Acts 14:13). When Ancyra became the capital of the Roman province of Galatia, the imperial cult was established there. The remains of the temple of Augustus and Roma can still be seen in Ancyra (now Ankara, the capital of modern Turkey).

2. Historical Context.

To understand the central themes of the letter we must consider the historical context: the authorship, addressees and date of the letter.

2.1. Authorship. Paul introduces himself in the first line as "Paul an apostle" (Gal 1:1) and underlines the authority of his decision regarding the problem in the Galatian churches with the words, "Behold, I Paul say to you . . ." (Gal 5:2). His authorship is accepted by all except a few radical critics. Almost all scholars view Galatians as the standard example of Paul's style and theology.

2.2. Addressees. Paul addresses the recipients as his own children (Gal 4:19). To sharpen our focus on these believers we need to consider their location, Paul's relationship with them and the crisis they faced in their churches.

2.2.1. Location of the Churches. Paul addressed his letter to the "churches in Galatia " (Gal 1:2). Scholars are divided regarding the geographical location of these churches (see discussion above). The weight of evidence seems to be in favor of a south Galatian location. In Paul's time Galatia was the name for the entire Roman province, stretching from Pontus in the north to Pamphylia in the south. All the residents of this entire province were properly called Galatians whatever their ethnic origin. Paul normally classified the churches that he founded according to provinces: "churches of Asia" (1 Cor 16:19); "churches of Macedonia" (2 Cor 8:1) or "Achaia" (2 Cor 9:2). So it would be natural for Paul to refer to churches in Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe (all cities within the Roman province of Galatia) as churches in Galatia and to refer to the members of those churches as Galatians. Indeed, there would be no other single name which would be appropriate for them. Since there is no clear evidence that Paul founded churches in north Galatia, it seems best to take the account of Acts 13—14 as a record of the founding of the churches in Galatia which are addressed in Paul's letter to the Galatians. Acts 16:6 and 18:23 refer to subsequent visits by Paul to strengthen those same churches in Galatia.

2.2.2. Paul's Relation to the Churches in Galatia. Paul's description of his first visit to Galatia indicates that he went there because of some repulsive physical illness (see Healing, Illness). Nevertheless, when he preached the gospel there his converts received him as if he were an angel of God, as if he were Christ himself. Their response to Paul was extremely generous. Paul says that if it were possible, they would have given him their own eyes (Gal 4:12-15). When Paul portrayed Christ* crucified, they believed and received the Holy Spirit* (Gal 3:1-2).

2.2.3. The Crisis in the Galatian Churches. Soon after Paul planted the churches in Galatia, they were infiltrated by "troublemakers" who preached a gospel different from Paul's (Gal 1:6-9). The identity of these troublemakers has been the subject of extensive discussion (see Judaizers; Opponents).

It is most likely that they were Jewish Christians who insisted that it was necessary to belong to the Jewish nation in order to receive the blessing of God.* Therefore they required the badges of identity peculiar to the Jewish people: circumcision,* Sabbath observance (see Holy Days) and keeping the Mosaic Law. No doubt they appealed to the example of Abraham's* circumcision in their campaign to persuade the Galatian believers that without circumcision it was impossible to participate in the covenantal blessings promised to Abraham. Probably the intruders had preempted Paul's authority by claiming support from the higher authority* of the original apostles in the Jerusalem* church.

The troublemakers were winning the Galatian converts over to their side. Evidently their message met a need in the Galatian churches. They may well have felt a loss of identity since their faith in Christ excluded them from both their pagan temples and from the Jewish synagogues. So they sought identification with the Jewish people to gain a sense of belonging to God's people. It also appears that they wanted to come under the discipline of the Mosaic Law because they believed that the Law would give them clear guidance in their moral struggle. In any case, they were mesmerized by the message of the intruders and had become negative toward Paul.

2.3. Date. Paul provides an autobiographical sketch of his life from the time of his conversion to the time of writing this letter. A comparison of this autobiography with his other letters and Acts has led to a number of conflicting hypotheses regarding the place of this letter in the chronology* of Paul's life (see Paul in Acts and Letters). These hypotheses can be evaluated on the basis of a consideration of three lines of evidence: (1) the Jerusalem visits; (2) the meaning of "former" in Galatians 4:13; and (3) the location of the churches in North or South Galatia.

2.3.1. The Jerusalem Visits and the Date. The basic point of dispute in the discussion of the Jerusalem visits revolves around the matching of Paul's visits to Jerusalem described in this letter and his visits to Jerusalem described in Acts. Only two visits are mentioned in Galatians: (1) Galatians 1:18, first post-conversion visit; and (2) Galatians 2:1-10, conference visit. Five of Paul's visits to Jerusalem are recorded in Acts: (1) Acts 9:26-30, first post-conversion visit; (2) Acts 11:30, famine relief visit; (3) Acts 15:1-30, conference visit; (4) Acts 18:22, quick visit; and (5) Acts 21:15-17, arrest visit. Of the many attempts to relate the visits described in Galatians to those of Acts, two merit special attention: Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-30; and Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 11:30.

2.3.1.1. Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-30. If we match the Galatians 1:18 (first post-conversion) visit with the Acts 9:26-30 (first post-conversion) visit and the Galatians 2:1-10 conference visit with the Acts 15:1-30 conference visit, then Paul's letter to the Galatians would be placed after the Jerusalem conference described in Acts 15:1-30 (= Gal 2:1-10). Such an equation seems reasonable since both accounts of the conference visit refer to the same issue (the obligation of Gentile converts to keep the Jewish Law), the same participants (Paul and Barnabas* go to Jerusalem to confer with Peter* and James* and others) and the same decision (the requirement of circumcision is not imposed upon Gentile converts).

Two major objections raised against this equation are Paul's omissions under oath in Galatians 1:20 of any reference to the famine relief visit (Acts 11:27-30) or any reference to the "Apostolic Decrees" of the conference (Acts 15:20, 29). Some scholars assert that to hold to the equation of Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 15:1-20 in the light of these two omissions necessarily involves an attack on the truthfulness of Paul's account or the account in Acts or both. Yet such scholars as J. B. Lightfoot and J. G. Machen, who certainly uphold the reliability of both accounts, argue that these two omissions on Paul's part can be explained on the basis that they are not relevant to his discussion in Galatians and therefore Paul was not obliged to record them. Since the point of Paul's autobiography was to record his relationship with the original apostles in Jerusalem, not simply his visits to Jerusalem, it was not necessary for him to refer to the famine-relief visit (Acts 11:27-30) since he did not meet with the apostles then. At least the account in Acts of that visit makes no mention of such a meeting. And it makes sense that Paul would not refer to the "Apostolic Decrees" since they are not viewed in the Acts account as a negation of the major decision not to require circumcision. Therefore, Paul's claim that "those who seemed to be important . . . added nothing to my message" (Gal 2:6) fits with the record in Acts. Since the Galatian Christians were all too eager to come under whatever decrees came from the Jerusalem church, Paul may have decided that any mention of the "Apostolic Decrees" would have been ill advised, unless absolutely necessary. Since he never appealed to the "Apostolic Decrees" in any of his letters, we may conclude that he did not feel obligated to do so (though some have suggested that he may have been out of sympathy with the Decrees). After all, his authority was not based on decrees from Jerusalem but on "revelation from Jesus Christ" (Gal 1:12).

Another criticism of the Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-20 equation is that this equation makes it difficult to explain the withdrawal of Peter and "even Barnabas" from table fellowship with Gentile Christians in Antioch* (Gal 2:11-14) after guidelines for such fellowship were established at the conference according to the Acts account. But even if the conflict in Antioch occurred before the Acts 15 conference, as some scholars suggest, it still is difficult to explain Peter's behavior. We still have to ask why he would withdraw from table fellowship with Gentile Christians in Antioch after the Jerusalem conference described by Paul in Galatians 2:1-10. From Paul's perspective, Peter's conduct is indefensible because it violates the truth* of the gospel which had been defended in the Jerusalem conference.

2.3.1.2. Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 11:27-30. The criticisms of the Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-20 equation have led some to suggest another equation: Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 11:27-30. The benefit of this equation is that it avoids any suspicion that Paul has failed to report all of his visits to Jerusalem after his conversion since in this equation the first two visits in Acts equal the two visits listed in Galatians. And Paul did not refer to the Apostolic Decrees for the simple reason that this letter was written before the Acts 15 conference when those decrees were set forth. This equation also takes at face value the statement in Galatians 1:21, "Later I went to Syria and Cilicia." If Galatians 2:1-20 refers to the Jerusalem conference that came after Paul's mission in Galatia, then Galatia must be read into the statement in Galatians 1:21. But if Galatians 2:1-10 refers to a conference that occurred during the Acts 11:27-30 visit, then the natural reading of the text stands: Paul was only in Syria and Cilicia between the two Jerusalem visits of Galatians 1:18 and 2:1-10.

It is also easy to see similarities between Paul's account of the conflict in Antioch in Galatians 2:11-14 and the conflict in Antioch before the Jerusalem conference described in Acts 15:1-2. Both refer to a conflict over the application of the Jewish Law to Gentile converts and both indicate that the conflict was caused by a delegation from Jerusalem. If these accounts refer to the same event, then it would be reasonable to conclude that Paul wrote Galatians on the eve of the Jerusalem conference of Acts 15:1-20. And if so, then we can identify the conference visit of Galatians 2:1-10 with the famine-relief visit of Acts 11:27-30.

But this identification also faces problems. There is no record of a conference visit in Acts 11:27-30 or even any indication that Paul and Barnabas met with the apostles. Of course, Acts is a selective account, but there is very little evidence in the text for matching the Galatians 2:1-10 visit with the Acts 11:27-30 visit. Even though there are minor differences between Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 15:1-20, at least both passages seem to describe a conference in Jerusalem. Furthermore, if Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 11:27-30, then there were two conferences in Jerusalem. Many scholars have thought that it is highly unlikely that there were two conferences where the same people debated the same issue with the same outcome. This duplication of conferences is unnecessary if the Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-20 equation stands.

2.3.2. The "First" Visit and the Date (Gal 4:13). Paul's reference to the time when he "first preached the gospel" in Galatia (Gal 4:13) has been taken as a clue for the date of the letter. Unfortunately, all sides of the debate claim this clue as support. Even if the term "first" should be taken as a true comparative (the "former" of two), it is by no means clear which visit it designates: it could either refer to the Acts 16:6 visit as the one before the second visit of Acts 18:23, or it could refer to the visit of Acts 13:14—14:23 as the one before the second visit of Acts 16:6, or it could refer to the Acts 13:14—14:21a visit as the one before the return journey of Acts 14:21b-23. So this term does not provide much help in dating the letter to the Galatians.

2.3.3. The Destination and the Date. The question of the date of the letter is related to the question of destination. But it must be admitted that a determination of the destination does not necessarily decide the date. If the framework of Acts is accepted, then a destination of north Galatia means that the letter was written after the so-called second missionary journey (after Acts 18:22), sometime between A.D. 53 and 57. If south Galatia was the destination (as seems more likely in light of the discussion above), the letter could have been written immediately after the first missionary journey and before the Jerusalem conference in A.D. 49. But if the equation of Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-20 is slightly favored by the evidence as argued above, then the letter was written to south Galatia sometime after the Jerusalem conference, anytime between A.D. 50 and 57.

It has often been noted that a comparison of Galatians with 2 Corinthians and Romans shows a similarity of tone and themes, especially related to the controversy over the role of the Jewish Law in Gentile churches. This similarity may indicate that these three letters were written during the same time, a time when Paul faced a fierce struggle for the freedom of his Gentile churches from pressure to succumb to bondage to the Jewish way of life. But attempts to date the letter on the basis of such theological comparisons with other letters have been used to support early (Longenecker) and late (Lightfoot) dates. The subjective approach of such comparisons and the occasional nature of Paul's letters (each letter responds to a specific occasion) render these attempts at best only secondary lines of support for theories in search of firmer ground.

The dating of Galatians is a notorious and for some a fascinating historical puzzle. But the outcome of the protracted debate about the date has little if any effect on the interpretation of the major themes of the letter.

3. Literary Forms.

Considerable attention has been given in recent years to the literary form of Galatians.

3.1. The Form of the Letter. A detailed comparison of Galatians to Hellenistic letters (see Letters, Letter Forms) of the same period indicates that Paul used a standard form of letter called the "rebuke-request" form (see Hansen and Longenecker). Unlike his custom in all the rest of his letters, in Galatians Paul does not follow his salutation (Gal 1:1-5) with any form of thanksgiving. Instead, he expresses astonishment and rebuke: "I am astonished that you have so quickly departed from the one who called you by grace" (Gal 1:6).

The expression "I am astonished" was often used in letters of that time as a rebuke for not meeting the expectations of the writer. The expression of rebuke was usually followed by reasons for the rebuke. Paul scolds his readers for their disloyalty to the gospel (Gal 1:6-10) and undergirds that rebuke with an autobiographical account of his loyalty to the truth of the gospel (Gal 1:11—2:21). Then he rebukes them for their foolishness regarding the gospel (Gal 3:1-5) and undergirds that rebuke by explaining the meaning of the gospel in the light of his exposition of the Scriptures (Gal 3:6—4:11). Letters of rebuke contained requests to set things right. Paul begins his request in Galatians 4:12 with the personal appeal to imitate* him in his stand for the freedom of the gospel. This appeal is strengthened by an autobiographical account of his relationship with the Galatian believers (Gal 4:12-20) and an allegorical treatment of the Abraham story (Gal 4:21-31). The request to stand fast for freedom is then spelled out in a series of specific ethical instructions (Gal 5:1—6:10). Paul underlines the main themes of the letter in his own hand-written subscription (Gal 6:11-18).

3.2. The Structure of the Argument. Recent rhetorical analyses have attempted to explain the methods and structures of Paul's argumentation in Galatians (see Rhetoric; Rhetorical Criticism). They point to many similarities between the structure of Paul's argument in Galatians and the guidelines for rhetoric in the classical rhetorical handbooks. H. D. Betz classifies Paul's argument as an example of forensic rhetoric since he is viewed as adopting the tactics of persuasion used in the law court to address the judge or jury in order to defend or accuse someone regarding past actions. Paul defends himself against accusations (Gal 1:10); at the same time he accuses his opponents of perverting the gospel (Gal 1:7). Using the categories of classical forensic rhetoric, Betz outlines Galatians as follows:

I. Epistolary Prescript (Gal 1:1-5)
II. Exordium ("introduction," Gal 1:6-11)
III. Narratio ("narration," Gal 1:12—2:14)
IV. Propositio ("proposition," Gal 2:15-21)
V. Probatio ("confirmation," 3:1—4:31)
VI. Exhortatio ("exhortation," Gal 5:1—6:10)
VII. Epistolary Postscript-Peroratio ("conclusion," Gal 6:11-18)

But Betz has to admit that he is not able to cite parallels to the exhortation section (Gal 5:1—6:10) from the classical rhetorical handbooks. For this reason G. Kennedy argues that Galatians is best viewed as deliberative rhetoric, since it aims to exhort or dissuade the audience regarding future actions by demonstrating that those actions are expedient or harmful. Paul seeks to dissuade the Galatian believers from following the false teachers by pointing to the harmful effects: severance from Christ and grace* (Gal 5:4), exclusion from the kingdom* of God (Gal 5:21) and a reaping of corruption (Gal 6:8). He underscores the expediency of the course of action which he has exhorted them to follow by giving them the promise of the harvest of eternal life (Gal 6:8) and granting them the benediction upon all those who walk according to "this canon" (Gal 6:16).

It seems best to classify Paul's argument in Galatians as a mixture of forensic and deliberative rhetoric. The rebuke section of the letter (Gal 1:6—4:11) has the characteristics of forensic rhetoric, but at Galatians 4:12 a major rhetorical shift to deliberative rhetoric occurs. Paul is no longer so much concerned to accuse or defend as he is to persuade the Galatian believers to adopt a certain course of action. He begins his appeal to this new course of action in Galatians 4:12: "Become as I am." That exhortation is then supported by the command from the Abraham story to "cast out the slave and her son" (Gal 4:30), clarified by authoritative instructions to stand in freedom (Gal 5:1-12) and defined in specific terms in the ethical exhortation to walk in the Spirit (Gal 5:13—6:10). The following pattern thus emerges:

Salutation (Gal 1:1-5)
Rebuke (Gal 1:6—4:11)
Autobiography (Gal 1:13—2:21)
Argument from Scripture (3:6-29)
Request (Gal 4:12—6:10)
Autobiography (Gal 4:12-20)
Allegory from Scripture (Gal 4:21-31)
Ethical instruction (Gal 5:1—6:10)
Subscription (Gal 6:11-18)

4. Contents.

4.1. Salutation (Gal 1:1-5). Beyond the standard elements of sender, addressees and greetings, present in all his salutations, this opening paragraph contains two significant theological statements which anticipate central themes of the letter. First, in Galatians 1:1 Paul's designation of himself as an apostle* goes beyond his references to his apostolic position in his other letters. His double denial of any dependence on human agency or authority for the legitimacy of his apostleship and his claim to a divine commission place an emphasis on apostolic authority that will be an important feature in his letter. Second, Paul's declaration that the cross* of Christ is the way to freedom from the present evil age (Gal 1:4) sets the cross in the center of his theology, where it stays through to the very end of the letter (Gal 2:19, 21; 3:1, 13; 4:5; 5:11, 24; 6:12, 14). Paul's central argument is that the cross alone is the way of salvation and therefore all attempts to supplement the work of the cross with works of the Law must be totally rejected.

4.2. Rebuke (Gal 1:6—4:11). Immediately after the opening paragraph Paul expresses his rebuke for the Galatians' desertion to a perverted gospel (Gal 1:6) and places anyone who distorts the gospel of Christ under a double curse (Gal 1:7-9). In this way Paul establishes at the outset the ultimate measure of genuine authority: adherence to the one gospel. Paul's recognition that he himself will be judged by the standard of the gospel as a servant of Christ keeps him from seeking human approval (Gal 1:10). The standard of the gospel was not derived from human tradition; it was given by "the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal 1:11-12): Jesus Christ is both the source and the subject of the gospel.

4.2.1. Autobiography (Gal 1:13—2:21). Paul's autobiography is essentially a portrayal of his faithfulness to the one true gospel: he was called by God to preach the gospel (Gal 1:16); he defended the gospel in the Jerusalem conference (Gal 2:1-10) and in the conflict with Peter (Gal 2:11-14); and he embodied the essence of the gospel (Gal 2:15-21). His record as a loyal representative of the gospel stands as the basis of his authority* as an apostle* and as a sharp rebuke to the Galatian believers' disloyalty to the gospel.

The primary point of Paul's story of his call (Gal 1:13-21; see Conversion and Call) is to stress that he was called by God, not by the church, to preach the gospel. Before God's gracious call stopped Paul in his tracks, he was engaged in a campaign to destroy the church of God because of his zealous devotion to the traditions of Judaism (Gal 1:13-14). God's call was not an afterthought; like the prophets of old (see Jer 1:5 and Is 49:1; see Prophet, Paul as), Paul had been set aside from his mother's womb (Gal 1:15). Paul heard the call when God revealed his Son to him so that he would preach Christ to the Gentiles (Gal 1:16). When Paul heard the call, he did not confer with "flesh and blood" or go up to Jerusalem to those who were apostles before him; instead he went into Arabia and then returned to Damascus (Gal 1:16-17). It was only three years later that he first had a short visit with Peter in Jerusalem. Except for James, Peter was the only apostle that Paul saw at that time (Gal 1:18-19). And after that visit he was in the regions of Syria and Cilicia, unknown by face to the church in Judea; they only heard that he was now preaching the faith he had previously tried to destroy (Gal 1:21-24). This part of the story defends Paul's independence from the original apostles. God directly commissioned him to be an apostle to the Gentiles.

But Paul did not work independently. As the next episode in his autobiography shows, he had the full support of those considered most important as leaders in Jerusalem (Gal 2:1-10). As a result of the council in Jerusalem, Paul and Barnabas were given the right hand of fellowship by the leaders of the mother church in support of their mission to the Gentiles. The leaders in Jerusalem did not add anything to Paul's message (Gal 2:6-9). But even though Paul worked to establish a consensus with these leaders, he was not willing to allow arch-conservative Jewish "Christians" (counterfeit Christians, in Paul's eyes) to destroy his mission* to the Gentiles. When there was pressure to get his Gentile companion, Titus, circumcised, Paul refused to give in; he stood for "the truth of the gospel." (As he hopes the Galatian believers will also do when they are pressured to be circumcised.)

In the next episode of his autobiography, Paul describes how he confronted Peter in order to defend the truth of the gospel (Gal 2:11-14). When Peter* visited the church in Antioch,* he followed the custom in the integrated congregation of Christian Jews and Gentiles of eating with Gentile Christians. Undoubtedly his presence at table fellowship with Gentiles was taken as an official stamp of approval on the union and equality of Jews and Gentiles in the church. But when some representatives who were sent by James from the church in Jerusalem came to Antioch, they persuaded Peter to stop the practice of Jews eating with Gentiles in the church. According to Paul, Peter gave in to their demand because he feared those who were circumcised, namely, the Jews. This probably means that he became concerned about the detrimental effect that his table fellowship with the Gentiles would have on the mission of the church in Jerusalem to the Jews. If non-Christian Jews in Jerusalem heard that Peter was eating with Gentiles, they might not only turn away from the witness of the church but also become actively hostile to the church for tolerating such a practice (for social background in Palestine see Revolutionary Movements).

Peter's withdrawal from table fellowship with the Gentiles split the church into Jewish and Gentile factions and by action if not by word compelled the Gentiles to think that they would have to become Jews if they wanted to enjoy table fellowship with the apostles and the mother church. From Paul's perspective, Peter's action was not a legitimate accommodation for the sake of the gospel; it was a compromise of the essential truth of the gospel. Peter was charged with hypocrisy, not heresy. Peter and Paul did not disagree about the truth of the gospel; but Peter's action was inconsistent with his belief in the gospel. By going along with Jewish adherence to the Law, which required the separation of Jews and Gentiles and implied that incorporation into the Jewish nation was necessary for salvation,* Peter had denied the essence of the gospel, which proclaimed that salvation for both Jews and Gentiles was by way of the cross and incorporation into Christ. The conflict in Antioch was a mirror image of the crisis faced by the Galatian believers, since the issue of compelling Gentiles to live like Jews was precisely the central issue for the churches in Galatia.

Paul wraps up his autobiography with a statement that is both intensely personal and at the same time serves as a paradigm for all Christians (Gal 2:15-21). In his own experience as a Jew by birth (Gal 2:15; see Jew, Paul the), he knew that he was justified by faith in Christ, not by works* of the Law (Gal 2:16). By implication it must be clear that those who are Gentile sinners (Gal 2:15) could only be justified by faith* in Christ and not by works of the Law. Paul sought justification* only in Christ, but he was found to be a sinner on the basis of the Law (Gal 2:17) because he was eating with Gentiles. Since his table fellowship with Gentiles was on the basis of common faith in Christ, Christ was blamed for being the agent who caused Paul to break the Law by eating with Gentiles (Gal 2:17). But Paul adamantly rejects any notion that Christ is an agent of sin.* For it is only if the Law which separates Jews and Gentiles were to be rebuilt that then Paul would be proved to be a sinner on the basis of the Law (Gal 2:18). But in fact he has died to the Law, so the Law can no longer be used to condemn table fellowship with Gentiles. His death to Law was accomplished by union with Christ in his death—"I am crucified with Christ" (Gal 2:19).

Death to the Law did not mean moral license but the means for achieving the highest goal—"that I might live to God" (Gal 2:19). This life* to God is empowered by Christ ("Christ lives in me"); it is lived by faith in Christ ("I live by faith in the Son of God"); it is motivated by the sacrificial love of Christ ("who loved me and gave himself for me"). Paul's experience sets forth an either-or choice: either attempt to attain righteousness* "through the Law" and so negate the value of Christ's death (Gal 2:21); or die to the Law by participation in the death of Christ and so live to God by the indwelling life of Christ (Gal 2:19-20; see Death of Christ). Paul sets forth his own experience in Galatians 2:15-21 to prove that participation in the events of the gospel, not adherence to the Law, is the source of life and righteousness. In the next chapter he uses the story of Abraham to prove the same thesis.

4.2.2. Argument from Scripture (Gal 3:6-29). The Abraham argument is introduced by five barbed questions (Gal 3:1-5) which rebuke the Galatians for their foolishness. Implied in these questions is the charge that the Galatians have failed to understand the significance of the message of Christ crucified (Gal 3:1) and have not realized the implications of their experience of the Spirit (Gal 3:2-5). Their past (Gal 3:2, 3) and present (Gal 3:5) experience of the Spirit is indisputable evidence that they are already experiencing the full blessing of God. Paul's questions are posed as sharp antitheses so that the Galatians will be compelled by their own experience of the Spirit to choose the right answer: "Not by observing the Law, but by believing what we heard about Christ crucified!"

The Galatians' expected answer is confirmed by the exposition of Scripture (see Old Testament in Paul). Paul quotes Genesis 15:6 to redefine the basis of Abrahamic sonship. The sign of the covenant—the true sign of Abrahamic sonship—is faith, not circumcision. His second quote from the Abraham story (Gen 12:3 and 18:18) is interpreted as a prophecy of the present experience of Gentile believers. Because Scripture foresaw that it would be by faith that God would justify the Gentiles, it preached the gospel beforehand to Abraham: Gentiles would be included in the blessing promised to Abraham.

The Galatian believers had been lured into thinking that they could be included in the promised blessing of Abraham by keeping the Law* of Moses. But in fact those who are of faith are already in the circle of blessing (Gal 3:9), while those who rely on the works of the Law are under a curse* (Gal 3:10) because Scripture (Deut 27:26) puts all who do not keep all the things written in the book of the Law under a curse. If the Law keepers themselves are under a curse since even they have not kept all the Law, then the risk of incurring a curse is even greater for Gentile believers who accept only certain items of the Law in order to identify with Israel.* Habakkuk 2:4 proves that righteousness by faith is the way to life (Gal 3:11).

But the Law is not of faith because it demands doing works of the Law as the way to life as the quotation of Leviticus 18:5 proves (Gal 3:13). The Law demands perfect obedience (Gal 3:10) and offers life on the basis of this perfect obedience (Gal 3:12), but the Law is incapable of engendering life or righteousness before God (Gal 3:21). The way to blessing is not though the Law but through the cross of Christ. Christ redeemed us from the curse of the Law by becoming a curse in our place (Gal 3:13-14). The Galatian believers had already received the blessing of Abraham when they received the Spirit by believing in the message of the cross (Gal 3:1-2, 14).

Following this contrast of Law and faith, Paul turns to a contrast of Law and promise by sketching out the flow of salvation history. Since the promise of blessing had been given to Abraham and his seed 430 years before the giving of Law, it could not be modified or annulled by the giving of the Law. This argument from history is designed to destroy the synthesis of the Abrahamic promise and Mosaic law which had led the Galatians to turn to the Law as the way to experience the promised blessing. And Paul's messianic definition of seed (Gal 3:16) removes Jewish national boundaries as the limits of the inheritance of the Abrahamic blessing. The link Paul makes between Abraham and Christ bypasses the Mosaic law and the Jewish nation as channels for the reception of the promises to Abraham, with the result that Christ alone is the channel of the promised blessing.

Two rhetorical questions in Galatians 3:19-21 disclose Paul's own awareness that his argument so far would lead his readers to question whether he has denied any purpose to the law ("Why then the Law? . . . Is the Law therefore opposed to the promises of God?"). Paul's description of the negative purpose, temporary function and mediated origin of the law leaves the Galatian converts without any sound reason for turning to the Law (Gal 3:19-25). The focus of Galatians 3:26-29 is the union of the Gentile believers with Christ. The equal status of all believers as "children of God," "Abraham's seed" and "heirs" in Christ renders any attempt to gain superior status by circumcision or Law observance of no value whatsoever. At the beginning and end of his argument from the Abraham story, Paul's main point is that the inclusion of Gentile believers in the people of God is based solely upon their identification with Christ. Identification by race, class or sex no longer has any significance because of identification with Christ.

Paul closes the rebuke section of his letter with a dramatic before-and-after picture (Gal 4:1-11) to contrast the slavery* before and the freedom* after Christ was sent by the Father and accepted by the Galatian believers. Now that they have experienced the Spirit who gives them assurance that they are children of God, it is absurd for them to turn back to live as slaves under the Law. Formerly they were slaves to the gods of this world, now they are children of God. Paul's rebuke ends with an expression of fear that his efforts for them may be in vain (Gal 4:11; see Futility).

4.3. Request section (Gal 4:12—6:10). Paul turns from rebuke to request. The initial request of Galatians 4:12 ("Become as I am!") really amounts to a call for loyalty to the truth of the gospel and decisive resistance against the troublemakers. Paul developed his autobiography to illustrate how at Jerusalem (Gal 2:3, 5) and at Antioch (Gal 2:11-14) he had remained loyal to the gospel and decisively resisted pressures from Jewish Christians similar to those faced by the Galatian churches. Now he turns to autobiography again to strengthen this initial request by reminding the Galatians of the close relationship which they and Paul enjoyed prior to their departure from the gospel.

4.3.1. Autobiography (Gal 4:12-20). Paul's account of the Galatians' previous welcome (as if he were Christ Jesus), even when he was suffering from repulsive illness and their willingness to give him their own eyes, adds great force to his request for renewed identification and imitation. His request that they imitate him is also intensified by contrasting the evil intentions of the intruders with his own concern for his "children" as a mother in labor with unborn children, laboring for them until Christ is completely formed within them (see Pastor).

4.3.2. Allegory from Scripture (Gal 4:21-31). Paul's initial request of Galatians 4:12 is now spelled out by quoting an imperative from the Law itself. If the Galatians are so eager to be under the Law, then let them follow the Law. The "punch line" of the allegory is to command the Galatians through the Law to "cast out the bondwoman and her son" (Gal 4:30; Gen 21:10). Paul interprets Genesis 21 within the framework already established in Galatians 3. Within that framework Paul sees a real correspondence between the historical situation of the two sons of Abraham and the two sorts of descendants of Abraham in his own day, those born according to the flesh and those born according to the Spirit.

But Paul moves from typological interpretation built on historical correspondence to allegorical definitions. Here again, however, the key is the theological framework of Galatians 3. For in that argument Gentile converts were identified as true children and heirs of Abraham in the same sense as Isaac on the basis of the promise given to Abraham and their experience of the Spirit. And in that argument there is a contrast between the Abrahamic covenant and the Sinaitic covenant, which leads to slavery. Thus when Paul redefines the terms in his allegorical treatment of Genesis 21, Sarah (and her counterpart, the Jerusalem above, the true mother Zion) is identified as the mother of the Galatian believers in Christ.

Paul's Hagar = Sinai and Sinai = present Jerusalem equations are problematic. The major difficulty with them is their apparent lack of validity in the face of the fundamental Jewish conviction that the Mosaic Law had been given to the descendants of Isaac at Mount Sinai and had nothing to do with Hagar. The most satisfactory explanation of Paul's allegorical equations is simply stated in Galatians 4:25: "for she is in slavery with her children." Slavery is the common feature that links Hagar (the slave woman), the covenant given at Mount Sinai and the present Jerusalem. Paul had already attributed this feature of slavery to the Mosaic Law (Gal 3:22-24; 4:1-10) and to a certain faction at Jerusalem (Gal 2:4). His allegorization must be seen as a counterattack upon that Jewish-Christian faction within the church at Jerusalem which tried to rob Gentile believers of their freedom by requiring them to be circumcised (Gal 2:3-6) and which was now attempting to do the same thing at Galatia (see Judaizers). It was this actual experience of "troublemakers" in the church that gave rise to Paul's allegorical treatment of the text and is the key to its interpretation.

While the Hagar-Sarah allegory serves primarily as the basis for Paul's biblical appeal to resist the influence of the intruders, it also sets up a conceptual foundation for the ethical instructions of the rest of the letter. The freedom-slavery and spirit-flesh antitheses presented in the allegory set the stage for the ethical appeal to stand for freedom against slavery under the Law and to walk by the Spirit and so overcome the desires of the flesh.

4.3.3. Ethical instructions (Gal 5:1—6:10). The new identity of the Galatian believers leads to a new behavior (see Barclay; see Ethics). By grace they are true children of the free woman (Gal 4:31), born by the power of the Spirit (Gal 4:29). Now they must learn to express their new identity in new behavior. Paul gives instructions about their behavior. But he constantly bases his imperatives on the indicatives of grace:

> For freedom Christ has set you free (indicative). Stand firm (Gal 5:1)!
>
> You were called to freedom (indicative). Serve one another (Gal 5:13)!
>
> We live by the Spirit (indicative). Keep in step with the Spirit (Gal 5:24)!

After the emphatic declaration in Galatians 5:2-12 that faith and Christ, on the one hand, and circumcision and Law, on the other, are exclusive alternatives, Paul's imperative of Galatians 5:13 echoes the command of Galatians 5:1. In both Galatians 5:1 and Galatians 5:13 there is first an indicative statement regarding freedom in Christ, which is then followed by an imperative and a warning. In Galatians 5:1 Paul commands the Galatians to stand fast; in Galatians 5:13 he exhorts them to serve one another in love. The warning of Galatians 5:1 is against a return to slavery under the Law; in Galatians 5:13 it is against giving opportunity to the flesh.

The fact that in Galatians 5:13 Paul warns that the flesh is the danger to freedom in Christ, instead of slavery to the Law, has led many to suppose that Paul begins to attack libertinism and lawlessness in Galatians 5:13. The description of the warfare between the flesh and the Spirit in the verses which follow is understood to confirm this supposition. But in the allegory which precedes this section, Paul identified slavery with both the Sinaitic covenant and the flesh. Those who are according to the flesh, like Ishmael, are identified with those who are proponents of the Sinaitic covenant. And in the subscription which follows this section those who campaign for circumcision boast in the flesh. So it seems best to interpret Galatians 5:13—6:10 in context. Paul has not changed fronts to fight against libertinism in this section. His attack against the works of the flesh is a continuation of his attack against the works of the Law.

The intruders' campaign for circumcision and the Law evidently led to social disorder and a lack of love in the Galatian community. In Paul's list of the works of the flesh these social sins receive the major emphasis. Paul's description of the opposition of the flesh and the Spirit is developed as a way of explaining the Christian's relationship to the Law. The Law is still a central factor in Paul's thinking (Gal 5:14, 18, 23, 6:2). His statement that one who is led by the Spirit is not under Law (Gal 5:18) implies that a life under the Law is a life subject to the desires of the flesh. The works of the flesh, then, are to be seen as the result of living under the Law rather than under the guidance of the Spirit. The result of living under the guidance of the Spirit results in the fruit of the Spirit (see Fruit of the Spirit), against which there is no Law (Gal 5:23). For love fulfills the Law (Gal 5:14), the "Law of Christ"* (Gal 6:2). It is the Spirit, not the Law, which has the power to liberate one from the desires of the flesh.

4.4. Subscription (Gal 6:11-18). In common Hellenistic letters, the author would close the letter by writing a summary of the contents of the letter in his own hand. Paul does that in this letter. The denunciation of the intruders (Gal 6:12-13), the autobiographical statement of personal loyalty to the cross of Christ (Gal 6:14), with the mention of the marks of Christ as evidence of that loyalty (Gal 6:17), and the reminder that circumcision means nothing whereas the new creation means everything (Gal 6:15) all repeat and underscore the main themes of the letter. The first benediction on those who follow his rule, even on the Israel of God (Gal 6:16), his second benediction* (Gal 6:18), the appellation "brothers and sisters" (adelphoi) and the final "Amen" all express Paul's confidence that his request to "stand firm" for freedom in Christ by "keeping in step with the Spirit" will be followed by his Christian readers.

See also ABRAHAM; ANTIOCH ON THE ORONTES; CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; CIRCUMCISION; CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA; ETHICS; FAITH; FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT; GENTILES; GOSPEL; HOLY SPIRIT; JERUSALEM; JUDAIZERS; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; LAW OF CHRIST; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PETER; RHETORIC; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: W. Barclay, The Letters to the Galatians and Ephesians (DSB; rev. ed.; Edinburgh: St. Andrews, 1976); H. D. Betz, Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Galatians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); E. deW. Burton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1921); R. A. Cole, The Epistle of Paul to the Galatians (TNTC; rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); C. B. Cousar, Galatians (Int; Atlanta: John Knox, 1982); G. Ebeling, The Truth of the Gospel: An Exposition of Galatians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); R. Y. K. Fung, The Epistle to the Galatians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); D. Guthrie, Galatians (NCB; London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1973); G. W. Hansen, Galatians (IVPNTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1994); J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (1st ed. 1865; repr: Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1957); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); M. Luther, A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (repr: Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979); J. G. Machen, Machen's Notes on Galatians, ed. J. H. Skilton (Nutley, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1977); F. Mussner, Der Galaterbrief (HTKNT 9; Freiburg, Basel and Vienna: Herder, 1974); W. M. Ramsay, A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (2d ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1900); H. N. Ridderbos, The Epistle of Paul to the Churches of Galatia (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1953); J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Galatians (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1968). Studies: J. M. G. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988); B. H. Brinsmead, Galatians as Dialogical Response to Opponents (SBLDS 65; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1982); C. H. Buck, "The Date of Galatians," JBL 70 (1951) 113-22; J. W. Drane, Paul, Libertine or Legalist? A Study in the Theology of the Major Pauline Epistles (London: SPCK, 1975); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); D. French, "The Roman Road System of Asia Minor," ANRW II.7.2.698-729; G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians: Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts (JSNTSup 29; Sheffield: Academic, 1989); R. B. Hays, The Faith of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1-4:11 (SBLDS 56; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1983); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History, ed. C. Gempf (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990); G. Howard, Paul: Crisis in Galatia: A Study in Early Christian Theology (SNTSMS 35; Cambridge: University Press, 1979); D. Lull, The Spirit in Galatia: Paul's Interpretation of Pneuma as Divine Power (SBLDS 49; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1980); M. J. Mellink, "Galatia," IDB 2.336-38; S. Mitchell, "Population and Land in Roman Galatia," ANRW II.7.2.1053-81; W. Ramsay, The Cities of St. Paul (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1907); idem, St. Paul The Traveller and the Roman Citizen (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1896); R. K. Sherk, "Roman Galatia," ANRW II.7.2.954-1052; S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988).

G. W. Hansen

GENERAL RESURRECTION. See ESCHATOLOGY; RESURRECTION.

GENTILES

"Gentiles" is the common English translation of the Greek term ethnē, which in Paul and elsewhere in the NT is used to refer to nations other than the nation of Israel.* That God now accepts men and women from all nations into full covenant* relationship without the need for conversion to Judaism is an insight given supremely to Paul, and one which threatened deep splits within the early church.

Paul's attitude to the Gentiles is intimately connected on the one hand with his understanding of the status of Israel, and on the other with his experience of a call to be apostle* to the Gentiles. Controversy sparked off by the influx of Gentiles into the church* forced him to explicate an understanding of the relationship between the two groups in God's purposes.

1. Terminology
2. Relations between Jews and Gentiles
3. The Gentile Mission
4. The Status of Gentile Christians in Paul's Theology

1. Terminology.

Neither the Hebrew Bible nor its Greek translation (LXX) developed a specific vocabulary to distinguish the nation of Israel from what we now term the Gentiles. The word ethnos (plural ethnē), "nation," can be quite general and universal, though already in the pre-Christian period it had developed the significance of "nation other than one's own" (cf. the development of terms such as ethnarchēs, "ethnarch," or "ruler of an ethnic minority," and the adjective ethnikos, "national," in Polybius and elsewhere). Thus in the LXX it is used to translate gôy, "nation," normally used of nations other than Israel; and also the word 'ām, also "nation," when that word does not refer to the nation of Israel. But the usage is by no means consistent; and that the term has no necessary pejorative connotations may be seen by the dual use in 1 Peter 2:9-12 "you are . . . a holy ethnos . . . conducting yourselves well among the ethnē."

However, in the Pauline corpus the referent of ethnos is always (apart from the quotation of Gen 17:5 in Rom 4:17-18) the non-Jewish nations, sometimes in explicit contrast to Israel (e.g., Rom 3:29; 9:24) and occasionally in contrast to the church (1 Cor 12:2; Eph 2:11).

Other words occur as close synonyms: laos, "nation," occurs only in OT citations, generally of the Jewish nation but in the plural in Romans 15:11 in parallelism with ethnē. In Romans 9 the referent is transferred from national Israel to the new people of God (see 4 below). Hellēn, "Greek," is contrasted with Ioudaios, "Jew" (or "Judean"), in Romans 1:16; 2:9; 2:10; 3:9; 10:12; 1 Corinthians 1:22; 12:13; Galatians 3:28; Colossians 3:11. But in Romans 1:14 it is contrasted with barbaros, "barbarian," to describe the totality of the Gentile world. The word akrobystia, "foreskin," is used by metonymy in Romans 2:26-27; 3:30; 4:9 (?); Galatians 2:7; Ephesians 2:11; Colossians 3:11. In 1 Corinthians 9:21 anomoi, "those without [the] Law," are contrasted with tous hypo nomou, "those under [the] Law." In 1 Corinthians 6 adikoi, "unjust," or perhaps "unjustified," and apistoi, "unbelieving," "unfaithful" or "untrustworthy," are used to describe those outside the Christian fold; probably with full awareness of the ambiguities. It is not clear whether this is intended to include or exclude Jews. What is clear is that Paul uses whatever terms lie to hand, with no concern for creating a technical vocabulary. More significant is the conceptual distinction between Paul's own kin, heirs to God's promises, and all others, however described.

2. Relations Between Jews and Gentiles.

Although relationships between individuals doubtless covered the full gamut of possibilities, some general perspective is possible.

2.1. Gentile Attitudes Toward Jews. Much has been written on the extent of anti-Semitism in the Greco-Roman world (see Kraft and Nickelsburg chapter 4 for a summary and bibliography; and Stern for the texts). Recent European history makes the task of an impartial assessment of the first-century situation difficult in the extreme. An exhaustive investigation would need to distinguish between Jews in Israel viewed as a nation living in their own foreign country; and Jews of the Diaspora* viewed as close and potentially threatening neighbors. It would also distinguish between the various genres of the texts: the sober reportage of a Strabo, the litigious advocacy of a Seneca or the satirical jibes of a professional humorist like Juvenal. And a constant reminder is necessary that only a small fraction of ancient literature has survived, and that the literati may not anyway be representative of commonly held attitudes.

The conventional picture (based on comments by writers such as Juvenal and Seneca) is that Jews were perceived as arrogant and foolish: they refused to work on the Sabbath (which was a sign of laziness); they circumcised their sons (which was revolting); they had strict food laws and they kept themselves to themselves and rejected the gods (which was misanthropy). It is most unlikely that this was either the official view or even a common one (though see Josephus Ant. 14.10.1 §§186-88; 16.6.8 §§174-76, which may suggest that attitudes became more negative after the Jewish War of 66-70). Officially Judaism was not only tolerated but awarded specific privileges. Jews could and did attain to high positions in the state. Many earlier references describe Jews as a nation of "philosophers" and witness to widespread interest in the Jewish concept of God. To some Jewish monotheism was tantamount to "atheism," because they refused to worship the gods of the empire, and their own God had no form or image (see God). An alternative belief was that they worshipped a man with an ass's head. While there is certainly a great deal in the literature which is deliberately offensive or pokes fun at the Jew, it is also clear that many people were attracted to the lofty ideals which they saw in Judaism.

All apparently anti-Semitic statements in the ancient literature must also be set against a considerable body of comparable statements about other races. While it is possible that (in the main) the Romans did not seem to like the Jews, it is equally true that (in the main) the Romans did not seem to like the Greeks. The diminutive Graeculus was contemptuous and derogatory. The problem is not so much a racial one as it is cultural and social. Prejudices are most commonly and most vehemently expressed when the object of that prejudice is perceived as a threat. Many anti-Jewish statements can be located in specific historic contexts which make it unwise to generalize.

2.2. Jewish Attitudes Toward Gentiles. Again we must beware of the stereotype picture of Jewish attitudes to "sinners of the Gentiles," and recent studies (for instance, those by Hengel and Novak) provide an important corrective. Because of the nature of the Torah's purity* laws, Jews were almost bound to regard Gentiles as ritually unclean, but such ritual uncleanness was not necessarily a bar to friendship and cooperation. It was, in any event, of major significance only for those who wished to enter the Jerusalem Temple (though it is clear that the purification rituals were also performed away from Jerusalem), and all Pharisees outside Israel had to live somehow with the fact that they were themselves permanently contaminated with corpse-uncleanness. The Rabbinic literature (from a later age, but arguably a time when attitudes had hardened more than in the first century) speaks of Jews and Gentiles trading and eating together as a matter of course (e.g. b. Ber. 45a, reinterpreted by the later gemara as referring to uncircumcised proselytes; m. 'Abod. Zar. 5:5). Certain groups within Judaism may have maintained a rigid separation, perhaps especially those who regarded Israel itself as corrupt and themselves as the pure remnant. But even these may not have been as rigid as we would like to think. For all its isolationism, the Qumran* community was clearly in touch with other Jewish groups to whom we may have expected them to be hostile, as some of their correspondence (e.g., 4QMMT) and their center in Jerusalem testify, and it is not inconceivable that contacts with the outside world went wider still. For those living outside the land the probability is proportionately greater.

What non-literary and archaeological evidences we have may be interpreted two ways. Since the epic work of E. R. Goodenough, scholars have been cautiously moving from the earlier perspective (implacable antipathy to all things Hellenistic) toward conceding a far greater tolerance to Greek influence (see Hengel; Goldstein; and, for a spirited defence of the traditional position, Feldman; see Hellenism). Paul's positive use of athletic metaphors supports this view, as would his knowledge of pagan authors, if we could be sure that this was more than just quoting what had already become proverbial.

From the Torah onward in Jewish tradition, distinctions were made between various groups of Gentiles, the "resident alien" in particular being awarded special treatment (Lev 17—26). Based on the covenant of Genesis 9 there developed a number of traditions about the divine laws binding on all humankind (Jub. 7:20-25; Gen. Rab. 34; b. Sanh. 56a; b. 'Abod. Zar. 8:4; etc.). Despite Novak's claim that "there is no convincing evidence that this doctrine was conceived earlier than the Tannaitic period . . . specifically after the destruction of the Temple and the Christian schism" (29), the range of the traditions suggests that the underlying ideas were much earlier. Varying forms of these "Noachide commandments" included prohibitions such as of idolatry, murder, theft, incest, blasphemy and eating the flesh of living animals, as well as the obligation to institute courts of justice (see the extended discussion in b. Sanh. 56a—60a). According to rabbinic traditions (though not for the author of Jubilees) Gentiles who adhered to the Noachide commandments might have a place in the age to come. Such "righteous Gentiles" were however in no sense part of the covenant people.

The position of those who sought closer ties with Judaism (so-called godfearers) is more difficult to assess. Kraabel denied the very existence of godfearers as a distinct group in our period, though the Aphrodisias remains appear now to establish their existence beyond question (see Reynolds and Tannenbaum). Such people would in addition to the Noachide commandments be obligated to keep the laws pertinent to the "resident alien," such as abstention from work on the Sabbath (Ex 20:10-11); from blood (Lev 17:10-16); and from leaven during Passover (Ex 12:18-19). Other food laws, however, and circumcision, are not included in these obligations. Full proselytism was probably more rare and for our purposes is not particularly relevant, since the Gentiles in whom Paul is interested are manifestly not proselytes. It is, however, worth noting that according to the Mishnah (m. Bik. 1:4) even the full proselyte was not entitled to call Abraham* "father."

Finally we need to note that Judaism is not one thing, but a multiplicity. The question "who is a Jew?" continues to vex the Israeli authorities, and its answer for the first century is not simple. Samaritans are clearly to be included within the ambit of the heirs of Abraham and Moses, yet Judean-Samaritan relationships may at times have been worse than Jew-Greek (see Kraft and Nickelsburg, chaps. 2 and 3). We simply do not know how the average Pharisee regarded the Essenes, or any of the many other groups which constituted the phenomenon of pre-70 Judaism, but it is not impossible that a devout Gentile might have been more acceptable as, say, a table partner than an irreverent 'am ha-aretz ("people of the land"), or someone deemed heretical. Nor is it simply a matter of degrees of strictness: where criteria differ, each group will accuse the other of laxity (see Holy Days).

3. The Gentile Mission.

3.1. The NT Apart from Paul. The Gospels record surprisingly few encounters between Jesus and Gentiles. Some sayings appear (humorously?) contemptuous (e.g., Mt 5:47) and there are none even in Luke that are unambiguously positive to Gentiles as a group. It is not unreasonable to suppose that even reports of Jesus' activity in Gentile regions (e.g., Decapolis, Caesarea Philippi) intend the reader to think primarily of activity amongst whatever Jewish groups may have been found there. Peter's response to Cornelius (Acts 10—11) makes clear that whatever Jesus may have taught about the Gentiles, it included none of the Law*-free gospel of Paul. The ending of Matthew's Gospel, however, indicates at the very least a tradition of dominical authority to take the Christian message beyond the bounds of Judaism (cf. also Mk 13:10).

The early chapters of Acts portray no steady move toward acceptance of Gentiles or radical reinterpretation of the Law. Stephen's speech could be regarded as critical of Law observance, but Luke explicitly states that he regards the charge of "changing the customs of Moses" to be false. The acceptance of Cornelius leads to great joy but no clear move toward Gentiles as a group. At the persecution of the Jerusalem church some took the gospel to Gentiles (Hellēnas, Acts 11:20; the alternative reading Hellēnistas, "Greek speaking [Jews]," though favored by NA[26], is hard to square with the trend of Luke's narrative). On the first missionary journey Barnabas and Saul go to the synagogues and only turn to the Gentiles when rejected by Jews (Acts 13:46). However, there is no uncertainty about this move, which "the Lord commanded" (Acts 13:47; on Jervell's suggestion that for Luke it was Jewish acceptance of the message which stimulated the Gentile mission, see Wilson 222-24).

Luke is aware of opposing views within the church. Although it is difficult to assess how much a Gentile would understand the inter-Jewish debate, or think it important, the picture he presents is both clear and cogent. In Acts 15 the debate is over whether becoming a proselyte is necessary to salvation, and its extent indicates that in Jerusalem* at least, the issue was by no means cut and dried at this stage. The resultant restrictions of the apostolic decree, however, seem closer to some versions of the Noachide commandments than to a summary of the whole Torah. In Acts 21:17-26 the issue is different; James and "all the elders" express concern over rumors that Paul is teaching Diaspora Jews to forsake the Torah. The position over Gentiles is reiterated (Acts 21:25), and Paul without demur submits to Jewish halakah.

To Luke a Law-free gospel for Gentiles is the mainstream position, unhesitatingly held to by James,* Peter* and all the Jerusalem authorities.

3.2. Paul and the Gentile Mission. Paul's own references to his work (Rom 1:5, 13; cf. 15:16-19; 16:26) suggest that he saw himself as having a major role and responsibility in God's plan for the world. To see the crucial status of Gentile Christianity in his thought one need not gloss Romans 11:13 with a claim to be the only apostle to the Gentiles, nor assume that Paul thought that every individual in the areas he mentions had heard the gospel. The autobiographical sections in Galatians, 2 Corinthians and Philippians provide further details about his understanding of the Gentile mission. They indicate that he was certainly not alone in evangelizing Gentile regions, and that at least up to the writing of Galatians (and thus well after the meeting of Gal 2) there was no general agreement as to the content of the Gentile gospel (see Mission).

The presence at that meeting of Titus, an uncircumcised Gentile, clearly indicated Paul's belief that circumcision* of Gentiles was no part of the gospel; and, just as clearly, it caused controversy. Whatever the outcome may have been for Titus personally (it is possible that he was indeed circumcised, see the commentaries), the final agreement must have sanctioned

Paul's continuing to preach his particular message among the Gentiles, even if unauthorized opposition to Paul continued (Phil 3:2; perhaps 2 Cor 11:1-6).

In Romans 9—11 there is a more extended reflection on the significance of the Gentile mission. We should beware of seeing this section as "about" the Gentile mission or "about" the Jews; there are good reasons for supposing that the primary topic of Romans 9—11 is the same as that of the whole letter; namely the righteousness* of God which, at least in part, raises the question whether the influx of Gentiles means that he has abandoned his promises to Israel (Rom 9:6; see Wright, chap. 13; see Restoration of Israel). Paul's response begins with a conventional "remnant" theology; but with a double twist: first, that the failure of Israel is actually part of the purpose (and promise) of God (note almost all of the OT passages cited in Rom 9—11); and second, that this was specifically so that God could demonstrate his mercy* and salvation* for the whole world* (Rom 9:24-26; cf. also the many instances of pas ["every," or "all"]). So the ecclesiology of such passages as Ephesians 1:22-23; 2:14-22; 3:9-10, even if they were not written by Paul, only expresses what is already in mind in Romans, and indeed implicit in the "one man" of Galatians 3:28.

The Gentile mission, far from being a contingency plan or reaction to the gospel's failure among the Jews, stands at the heart of the affirmation of the righteousness of the God who "has consigned all of humanity to disobedience, in order that his mercy may extend to all of humanity" (Rom 11:32). Romans 15:7-12 reinforces the point. The Gentile mission is a natural concomitant of the unity of God and of his grace.*

4. The Status of Gentile Christians in Paul's Theology. What does not seem to have been clarified at the Jerusalem meeting is the nature of the relationships between Paul's communities and Jewish Christians. The "men from James" clearly felt that accepting hospitality from such Gentiles was impossible for Torah-observant Christians; and if this issue had not been explicitly discussed in Jerusalem, then it is not improbable that they had good arguments to persuade Peter and Barnabas. "Righteous Gentiles" may indeed be acceptable to God through his grace, but they could not be part of Israel, and relationships with them would continue to defile Torah-observant Jewish Christians. With the growing success of the Gentile mission, this problem and the threat it posed to Jewish-Christian self-identity will have grown ever greater.

Paul's own understanding of the grace of God, however, led him to affirm that there could be no distinction before God between the Christian Jew and the righteous Gentile (cf. Rom 3:29-30). Galatians* is a sustained argument that his converts already enjoy all the blessings of the covenant—they are already children of Abraham* (Gal 3:7, 28-29). Hence for Gentiles to accept the yoke of Torah observance is not simply a matter of indifference, but a denial of God's acceptance of them in the gospel, and therefore a denial of Christ (Gal 5:4). In Galatians then—almost certainly one of the earliest extant letters of Paul—we already see not only a fully developed rationale of the Gentile mission but also a deep conviction about the nature of the church* as the true Israel* of God, with Jew and Gentile on equal standing before God and to each other. Within this perspective it is more likely than not that in Romans 11:26 Paul reiterates his redefinition of "all Israel" (cf. Rom 9:6) as a new people in Christ, wherein is "neither Jew nor Greek" (Gal 3:28; but see Israel).

4.1. The Origins of Paul's "Gospel of the Uncircumcision." The incident at Antioch* (Gal 2) indicates that this perspective was something radically new in the church's self-understanding; and the comparatively rapid disappearance of Jewish Christianity as a major force in the church suggests that the careful integration it presupposes was too soon replaced by a mere Gentile takeover. (Rom 11:1 seems to reflect Paul's fear of precisely such an eventuality.) So remarkable was Paul's insight that much effort has been expended to seek its origins. Paul's own answer is clear but unhelpful: "I received it . . . by a revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal 1:12). Since, according to Luke, a revelation to Peter singularly failed to produce the same effect in his case (Acts 10:1—11:18), it is still worth asking how far we can probe the mechanisms which led to Paul's conclusions (see Conversion and Call). There is no consensus among scholars, and all that can be done here is to suggest some of the factors which may have been influential.

(1) If he did not already inherit it from his Pharisaism, Paul would have derived from his Christian mentors, and his own experience, a realization that descent from Abraham in itself is by no means a sufficient condition for involvement in God's new covenant* (see Jew, Paul the).

(2) Paul's own testimony (Phil 3:5-6; cf. Gal 1:14) indicates that in his eyes there was nothing more that Torah observance could offer for the attainment of true religion. However valid the charge of Pharisaic hypocrisy, it is clear that the Pharisees did represent an acme of Jewish piety. Yet now his Christian experience introduced him to a community with a far greater knowledge of God than he had had; but one which, albeit Jewish, fell far short of his standards of Torah observance.

(3) Paul does not explain why he persecuted the church, but it is hard to imagine that Deuteronomy 27:26 played no part in his pre-Christian thinking. It was surely appropriate that this blasphemer should have been executed in a way which manifested the curse* of God upon him. If this is so, then a re-assessment of the Torah, and of the status of the Israel which had rejected its Messiah, was essential for the Christian Paul.

Such factors, coupled with the experience of Gentiles already in the church, may perhaps help us to understand how Paul came to realize that the world-wide mission of the church entailed not merely a policy of proselytizing, but an awareness that response to Christ, and only to him, is the basis on which God now calls people of every race to fulfill his purpose for his creation.*

See also ABRAHAM; CHURCH; CIRCUMCISION; COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; GOSPEL; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; JEW, PAUL THE; LAW; MISSION; OLIVE TREE; PEACE, RECONCILIATION; PURITY AND IMPURITY; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. G. Gager, The Origins of Anti-Semitism: Attitudes toward Judaism in Pagan and Christian Antiquity (Oxford: University Press, 1983); J. A. Goldstein, "Jewish Acceptance and Rejection of Hellenism," in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, volume 2, ed. E. P. Sanders et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981) 64-87; E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period (13 vols.; New York: Pantheon, 1953-68); M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine During the Early Hellenistic Period (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); idem, Jews, Greeks and Barbarians: Aspects of the Hellenization of Judaism in the pre-Christian Period (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); idem, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); A. T. Kraabel, "The Disappearance of the 'God-Fearers,' " Numen 28 (1981) 113-26; R. A. Kraft and G. E. W. Nickelsburg, ed., Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters (Atlanta, GA: Scholars, 1986) 57-80; S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); D. Mendels, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Nationalism: Jewish and Christian Ethnicity in Ancient Palestine (New York: Doubleday, 1992); D. Novak, The Image of the Non-Jew in Judaism: An Historical and Constructive Study of the Noahide Laws (Toronto: Mellen, 1983); J. Reynolds and R. Tannenbaum, Jews and Godfearers at Aphrodisias (Cambridge: Cambridge Philological Society, 1987); M. Stern, Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism (3 vols.; Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1974, 1980, 1984); F. B. Watson, Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles: a Sociological Approach (SNTSMS 56; Cambridge: University Press, 1986); S. G. Wilson, The Gentiles and the Gentile Mission in Luke Acts (SNTSMS 23; Cambridge: University Press, 1973); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress 1991).

D. R. de Lacey

GIFT OF KNOWLEDGE. See GIFT OF KNOWLEDGE, KNOWLEDGE; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT.

GIFT OF PROPHECY. See GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; PROPHECY, PROPHESYING.

GIFT OF TONGUES. See GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; TONGUES.

GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT

The term "gift(s) of the Spirit" does not occur in the Pauline corpus. Nonetheless, the occasional collocation of "gift" language and Spirit activity (see Holy Spirit), especially in Romans 1:11 and 1 Corinthians 12—14, makes the term a legitimate one. The problems are three: (1) to determine what Paul himself might have understood by the words charismata and pneumatika, since his own usage exhibits a considerable degree of fluidity; (2) to isolate what Spirit activities might legitimately be classified as "gifts of the Spirit," since the texts themselves are neither systematic nor exhaustive; and (3) to identify the nature of the various "gifts" that are mentioned. Part of the problem is to determine whether "gifts of the Spirit" should be limited to the more extraordinary phenomena of 1 Corinthians 12—14 or whether one should also include the "ministries" in Ephesians 4:11, which are called "gifts," but not charismata, and are not directly associated with the Spirit.

1. The Linguistic Data
2. The Texts
3. The Charismata

1. The Linguistic Data.

In most contemporary interpretation and writing on this subject, especially in popular literature, the term "gift of the Spirit" is associated with Paul's use of the word charisma; hence the frequent contemporary use of charismatic to describe people or churches who have experienced the phenomena of 1 Corinthians 12—14. This is not altogether wrong, but it can be misleading.

That Paul qualifies charisma (gift) with the adjective pneumatikon ("spiritual"; i.e., pertaining to the Spirit) in Romans 1:11 is certain evidence that charisma does not automatically mean "spiritual gift." Moreover, there is good exegetical reason to believe that the "charisma of God," which Timothy is urged to "fan into flame" in 2 Timothy 1:6 is none other than the Spirit himself (see Fee 1993). All of this is further complicated by the several listings of "gifts" in Paul's letters and the variety of language used to designate them.

So, for example, (1) in 1 Corinthians 12:4 Paul speaks of the Spirit's charismata, which in 1 Corinthians 12:7 are called "manifestations," while charismata appears again in 1 Corinthians 12:9 (and in 1 Cor 12:28, 29) narrowly confined to "healings,"* only to reappear in 1 Corinthians 12:31 to refer to the broader categories; (2) in 1 Corinthians 12:6 the activities of God* are called energēmata ("workings") which he energei ("works"), yet energēmata occurs again in 1 Corinthians 12:10 as one of the Spirit's "manifestations," and in 1 Corinthians 12:11 the Spirit is said to energein all these things; (3) in 1 Corinthians 12:5 the activities associated with the Lord are called diakoniai ("services"), a word that appears again as a charisma in Romans 12:6-7, but in a context where the Spirit is not mentioned; (4) the "workings of miracles" in 1 Corinthians 12:10 is simply "miracles" in 1 Corinthians 12:28-29; (5) one finds the logos of "knowledge"* in 1 Corinthians 12:8, "knowing all mysteries* and all knowledge" in 1 Corinthians 13:2, and simply "knowledge" in 1 Corinthians 13:8 and 1 Corinthians 14:6; (6) "prophecy"* is a "manifestation" in 1 Corinthians 12:10; prophets themselves are mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12:28-29 (cf. 1 Cor 14:29, 37); but it is not at all clear that "prophecy" is the private province only of some who are called "prophets" (cf. "teachers" and "teaching"* in 1 Cor 12:28 and 1 Cor 14:6, 26). It is fair to say that in both the scholarly and popular literature far greater confidence is often expressed on some of these matters than the evidence itself warrants. Nonetheless, as a beginning point one must at least look at how Paul uses some key words.

1.1. Charisma(ta). The word charisma is a distinctively Pauline word (found elsewhere in the NT only in 1 Pet 4:10 and otherwise rarely in Greek literature at all). On its own the word has nothing to do with the Spirit; it picks up Spirit overtones only by context or by clear qualifiers. The noun has been formed from charis ("grace"*), referring to a concrete expression of grace, which is what it means in its every instance in Paul. Thus in nearly half of its uses charisma designates a variety of ways God's grace has been evidenced among his people. It includes such diverse "gifts" as eternal life* (Rom 6:23; cf. Rom 5:15, 16), the special privileges granted to Israel* (Rom 11:29, referring to Rom 9:4-5), celibacy and marriage* (1 Cor 7:7) and deliverance from a deadly peril (2 Cor 1:11).

On the other hand, the word sometimes refers to certain Spirit activities as "gracious gifts," as for example in Romans 1:11 noted above (Fung considers this a "technical" sense, but without warrant). Thus in 1 Corinthians 1:4-7 God's grace (1 Cor 1:4) finds concrete expression in the rich number of charismata he has bestowed upon this community (1 Cor 1:5, 7). This same usage is picked up in 1 Corinthians 12 (1 Cor 12:4, 9, 28, 30, 31), with specific reference to the Spirit. But here is where the difficulties also begin. In three of these verses (1 Cor 12:9, 28, 30) Paul uses the phrase "charismata ('gifts') of healings," apparently referring to specific instances of physical healing within the community. But in 1 Corinthians 12:4, at the head of this discussion, charismata is associated with the Spirit in a way that seems intended to include what in 1 Corinthians 12:7 Paul terms "manifestations of the Spirit." Thus there seems to be little question that the list of "manifestations" in 1 Corinthians 12:8-10 are to be understood as charismata, gracious bestowments of the Spirit in the gathered community for the sake of building up the people of God (see Church).

More difficult is the recurrence of this word coupled with the imperative at the end of this discussion in 1 Corinthians 12:31, in which Paul urges them "eagerly to desire the greater charismata." For several exegetical reasons (see Fee 1987), this imperative almost certainly does not refer to the preceding potpourri of people, ministries and Spirit manifestations that "God has placed in the church" (1 Cor 12:28). Rather, it is most likely intended to begin the argument on intelligibility and order in 1 Corinthians 14, which is then interrupted so as to place all of these things in the context of love.* When Paul then resumes this imperative in 1 Corinthians 14:1 the word charismata is now replaced with ta pneumatika ("the things of the Spirit"), which have to do, as in 1 Corinthians 12:4-11, with Spirit manifestations in the community gathered for worship.* It is doubtful, therefore, whether in 1 Corinthians 12—14 Paul intends to refer to such people as apostles* and teachers, or to such ministries as helpful deeds and acts of guidance, as charismata. At least in its only specific appearances in this argument the term seems to be limited to Spirit manifestations in the community, and thus probably means something like "concrete expressions of grace manifested through the Spirit's empowering."

The usage in Romans 12:6 is more difficult. Here Paul speaks of "having charismata that differ, in keeping with the charis given to us," where the clear tie of charismata with "grace" is again evident, but the Spirit is not mentioned. Several matters, to be sure, may imply the Spirit's presence: the language about unity and diversity in the body (see Body of Christ), which reflects 1 Corinthians 12; prophecy as the first charisma mentioned in verse 6, which in Paul is a Spirit gifting par excellence; and the similarities of Romans 12—14 with Galatians 5—6, where the Spirit dominates the discussion.

Nonetheless, despite these associations with the Spirit that come from the larger contexts of Romans,* 1 Corinthians* and Galatians,* it is not at all clear that Paul intended the listing in Romans 12:6-8 to be thought of as "gifts of the Spirit" in the same way as the charismata in 1 Corinthians 12—14. This list is so heterogeneous, and covers such a broad range of activities, that the emphasis more likely lies on the "grace of God" here being worked out among the Roman believers in concrete ways (esp. in light of Romans 14—15), rather than on the empowering of the Spirit for such behavior. Thus the list includes two items from 1 Corinthians (prophecy, teaching), plus a further verbal (apparently) charisma (exhorting/encouraging), as well as various forms of serving others within the believing community (service, contributing to the needs of others, giving aid and showing mercy). These latter items in particular seem to move away from the idea of "gifts" per se, at least in terms of Spirit manifestations, to Christian behavior (ethics*), in which the fruit of love finds concrete expression in their midst. Therefore, to include these as "gifts of the Spirit" of the same kind and categories as in 1 Corinthians 12—14 seems to be a case of mixing oranges and apples. For Paul they are clearly charismata; it is less clear that he thought of them also as Spirit giftings.

Finally, in 1 Timothy 4:14 and 2 Timothy 1:6 the charisma (singular) is said to be "in Timothy" and is expressed in contexts referring to Timothy's ministry. In its first instance it probably refers to his "giftedness" for ministry, which came to him through prophetic utterances. In 2 Timothy 1:6, however, the charisma seems more likely to refer to the Spirit himself (Fee 1993), although that in turn probably is a metonymy for Timothy's Spirit-given ministry that came to him "through prophetic utterances."

In sum, charisma does not necessarily refer to Spirit activity; when it does, it seems to refer to specific visible ways in which the Spirit manifests himself in the believing community, granting them "gracious bestowments" to meet their various needs and thus to build them up as the eschatological people of God. One should probably, therefore, make a distinction between "Spirit charismata" and other expressions of charismata that do not necessarily imply visibly evident Spirit activity as such.

1.2. Pneumatika. This term (neuter plural of the adjective pneumatikon; thus literally, "the things of the Spirit") occurs twice in 1 Corinthians 12—14 (1 Cor 12:1; 14:1). The apparent overlap of pneumatika with charismata in 1 Corinthians 14:1 (and 1 Cor 12:31) has already been noted. There has been considerable debate about this apparent interchange. Some have suggested that the words are nearly interchangeable, both of them in this context meaning roughly the same thing; others have suggested that one or the other is the more comprehensive term, with the other serving to designate specific Spirit manifestations; and still others have speculated that one of them might be a Corinthian term, related to their apparently unbridled enthusiasm for tongues,* which Paul is here attempting to bring under control partly in a linguistic way (see Fee 1987 for this discussion).

Since there seems to be little question that the two words have a degree of overlap in this particular context, the best solution to this matter probably lies with taking seriously the root meaning of the two words. If the emphasis in the word charisma is on God's graciousness toward his people, then the emphasis in pneumatika rests with the Spirit nature of the activity to which these various charismata bear witness. Paul would thus be referring to the same phenomena. Diverse charismata of the one Spirit they are indeed; here is how God is currently at work among his people in a variety of ways for the common good. But in the argument in 1 Corinthians 14 the emphasis now lies on these charismata as Spirit manifestations. Here is how the Spirit is at work in them individually (tongues in private for edification; 1 Cor 14:2-3, 14-15) and corporately (prophecy etc.) for their common upbuilding.

This is probably how one is also to understand the ambiguous genitive with which this whole argument begins in 1 Corinthians 12:1 ("now concerning tōn pneumatikōn"). There is considerable debate as to whether this means "spiritual gifts" (neuter) or "spiritual people" (masculine). Most likely the term is neuter (as in 1 Cor 14:1), but probably not meaning "spiritual gifts" as such, which is much too narrow an understanding of this word, but "Spirit matters," which includes "gifts" and their abuse by the "pneumatics" in this community.

1.3. Pneumata. It is more difficult to determine what Paul meant by three occurrences of the plural pneumata (spirits) in 1 Corinthians 12—14: "the discerning of spirits" (1 Cor 12:10), "since you are zealots for spirits" (1 Cor 14:12) and "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" (1 Cor 14:32). The usage in 1 Corinthians 14:12 is so unusual that most English translations consider it to mean the same as pneumatika in 1 Corinthians 14:1 and thus translate it "spiritual gifts" (NIV, NASB, NRSV; cf. GNB, NEB; "manifestations of the Spirit" RSV). That Paul himself believed in a plurality of "good spirits" is emphatically denied by 1 Corinthians 12:4, 8-11: "the same Spirit," "the one Spirit," "the one and the same Spirit." Whether this emphasis also combats a belief in the plurality of spirits on the part of the Corinthians is moot. This curious affirmation in 1 Corinthians 14:12 at least allows as much; but Paul's own use of this language in 1 Corinthians 14:32, where such a meaning does not seem possible, suggests that the meaning lies elsewhere.

The probable solution to these passages is to be found in Paul's apparent conviction that the believer's spirit is the place where, by means of God's own Spirit, the human and the divine interface in the believer's life (see Psychology). Thus the key to this usage probably lies with the context of 1 Corinthians 14:32, where "the pneumata of the prophets" most likely refers to "the prophetic Spirit" by which each of them speaks through his or her own spirit; thus the prophetic utterance, inspired by the divine Spirit, is subject to the speaker and must be "discerned" by others in the community. Perhaps the inelegant translation "the S/spirits of the prophets" might best capture Paul's own intent. In any case, the term refers to "spiritual gifts" only in the most indirect way.

1.4. Dorea. This word, the term for "gift" proper, rarely occurs in Paul, but does appear in Ephesians 4:7. This sentence serves as transition from the Trinitarian basis for unity in Ephesians 4:4-6 (one body, one Spirit, one hope; one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God) to the several-fold ministries God has given to the church for its own health and service to the world. Since the Spirit is crucial to the church's unity (Ephesians 4:3-4), and since three of the ministries listed in Ephesians 4:11 also appeared in the listing in 1 Corinthians 12:28, it is common to see Ephesians 4:11 as giving us yet one more list of "gifts of the Spirit," this time more specifically narrowed to ministries as such.

While there is every reason to believe that Paul considered all such people and their ministries as Spirit-empowered for the task of building up the community, what remains unclear is whether in considering them as "gifts" to the church, he would also have considered all of these ministries as charismata in the sense that word is used in either 1 Corinthians 12 or Romans 12.

2. The Texts.

The difficulty with "organizing" Paul in the matter of spiritual gifts lies not only with the linguistic factors noted above, but also (especially) with the purely ad hoc nature of his letters, which reveal considerable ambiguity of both language and listings. For that reason, rather than to superimpose an outside grid on what Paul was about, one should begin with a look at the texts in their contexts.

2.1. 1 Corinthians 12—14. The rhetorical (see Rhetoric), sometimes polemical, nature of the argument in his passage, especially chapters 13 and 14, suggests that Paul's purpose is primarily corrective, not instructive. Tongues* is clearly the culprit (as 1 Cor 14 makes clear); true spirituality* (in the sense of being a Spirit person) is most likely the issue, and Paul and the Corinthians are at odds on this matter (1 Cor 14:36-37). The latter probably thought of tongues as the language of the angels* (1 Cor 13:1), hence as evidence for the present realization of heavenly existence, with only the sloughing off of the body remaining (hence their denial of the future bodily resurrection,* 1 Cor 15:12). The result was both inordinate zeal for tongues and consequent disorder in their assembly (see Worship).

In his effort to curb their misguided zeal Paul first argues for the necessity of diversity—if the community is truly to be "of the Spirit" (1 Cor 12:4-30). He then argues that no gifting counts for anything if love does not motivate (1 Cor 13:1-13), concluding that, in terms of Spirit manifestations, love demands that they seek after intelligible utterances (1 Cor 14:1-25) and order (1 Cor 14:26-40), if the community is to be built up (1 Cor 14:1-19, 26-33) and outsiders are to be converted (1 Cor 14:20-25). In the process Paul has occasion to list various charismata, ministries and forms of service at seven different points in his argument (1 Cor 12:8-10, 28, 29-30; 13:1-3, 8; 14:6, 26), no two of which are alike (not even 1 Cor 12:28 and 29-30); not only so, but they appear in ways that make systematizing nearly impossible.

2.1.1. 1 Corinthians 12:8-10. The purely ad hoc character of this list is demonstrated both by its order and content. Paul's concern is not with instruction about "spiritual gifts" as such, their number and kinds; rather, he offers a considerable and diverse list so that they will stop being singular in their own emphasis. Thus, tailored to speak to their situation, this list is but representative of the diversity of the Spirit's manifestations.

Attempts to classify the several items are numerous and varied. It has been suggested that they reflect a descending order of value, while others have rearranged the items conceptually (MacGorman). A popular grouping is (1) gifts of instruction (wisdom* and knowledge*); (2) gifts of supernatural power (faith,* healings,* miracles); and (3) gifts of inspired utterance (prophecy,* discerning spirits, tongues,* interpretation of tongues) (Martin). It will be noted that the seventh item ("discernments of spirits") is the one that tends to give trouble to most of these arrangements. If grouping them is legitimate at all, it is most likely to be found in some clues Paul himself has given, by starting the third and eighth items (faith and tongues) with a different word for "another" and without the connective de. If so, then the first two are chosen for very specific ad hoc purposes; "wisdom" and "knowledge" held high court in Corinth. He then adds a random list of five items that have as their common denominator a supernatural endowment of some kind, and concludes with the "problem child" and its companion, tongues and interpretation.

What distinguishes this listing is the concretely visible nature of these items, especially of the last seven. After all, these are not only "gifts," they are manifestations of the Spirit's presence in their midst, most likely chosen because they are, like tongues itself, extraordinary phenomena. It would scarcely do for Paul at this point to attempt to broaden their perspective by listing less visible gifts. That will come in time (especially through the analogy of the body and in the lists in 1 Cor 12:28-30); but for now the emphasis is on the supernatural.

On the other hand, it also includes the message [logos] of wisdom [sophia] and the logos of knowledge [gnōsis]. In this case the language seems to be chosen not because Paul has some supernatural endowment in mind, but because these three words (logos, sophia, gnōsis) are especially high in the Corinthians' understanding of Spirit activity (see 1 Cor 1—3, 8). But their wisdom and knowledge are described by Paul as worldly and defective. For Paul these words are especially to be understood in terms of the cross (1 Cor 1:18-31; 8:11). Thus Paul uses two of their own terms to begin his list of "manifestations" in the assembly that demonstrate the great diversity inherent in the one Spirit's activities. At the same time he reshapes those terms in light of the work of the Spirit so as to give them a significantly different content from that given by the Corinthians—although it is not at all certain what concrete form these may have taken in Paul's own mind.

The other puzzling item in this list is "discernments of spirit," over which there has been considerable debate, whether it has to do with the ability to discern what is truly of the Spirit of God and what comes from other spirits (e.g., Grudem), or with the phenomenon noted in 1 Corinthians 14:29, "and let the others discern (judge rightly) what is said," in which the cognate verb of this noun appears (e.g., Dunn, Fee). Most likely, given Paul's own use of language in 1 Corinthians 14, it refers to both, but particularly to the phenomenon of "discerning, differentiating or properly judging" prophecies in 1 Corinthians 14:29. There are two reasons for taking this position: (1) Both 1 Thessalonians 5:20-21 and 1 Corinthians 14:29, the two places where Paul mentions the functioning of prophecy in the church, call for a "testing" or "discerning" of prophetic utterances; it therefore seems likely, given that the noun used in this passage is the cognate of the verb in 1 Corinthians 14:29, that the same is true here, since it immediately follows "prophecy." (2) These two are followed immediately by "tongues" and "interpretation," the same pattern found again in the instructions on order in 1 Corinthians 14:26-29.

2.1.2. 1 Corinthians 12:27-30. After twice applying his analogy of the body, with emphasis on the need for diversity (1 Cor 12:15-26), Paul concludes this section of his argument with yet another list of gifts and ministries (see Ministry). The emphasis remains the same; the need for diversity. The list itself has several interesting features: (1) He begins with a list of persons (apostles, prophets, teachers), whom he ranks in the order of first, second, third. (2) With the fourth and fifth items ("miracles" and "gifts of healings") he reverts to charismata, taking two from the list in 1 Corinthians 12:8-10. These are both prefaced with the word "then," as though he intended the ranking scheme to continue. (3) The sixth and seventh items ("helpful deeds" and "acts of guidance"), which are deeds of service, are noteworthy in three ways: (a) they are the only two not mentioned again in the rhetoric of 1 Corinthians 12:29-30; (b) nor are they mentioned again in the NT; (c) they do not appear to be of the same kind—that is, supernatural endowments—as those on either side (miracles, healings, tongues).

This list represents a whole range of "ministries" in the church, which were probably chosen for that reason. What one is to make of this mix is not certain. At best one can say that the first three emphasize the persons who have these ministries, while the final five emphasize the ministry itself. That probably suggests that the first three items therefore are not to be thought of as "offices," held by certain "persons" in the local church, but rather refer to "ministries" as they find expression in various persons; likewise the following "gifts" are not expressed in the church apart from persons, but are first of all gracious endowments, given by the Spirit to various persons in the church for its mutual upbuilding.

The question as to whether Paul intended all of these to be "ranked" as to their role or significance in the church is moot. Probably not. He certainly intends the first three to be ranked. One might argue also for the rest on the basis of the "then . . . then" that preface the next two. But that seems unlikely, since (1) he drops the enumeration with the sixth item, (2) the fourth and fifth items (1 Cor 12:28-30) are in reverse order from their earlier listing (1 Cor 12:9-10) and (3) there seems to be no special significance as to whether miracles precedes healings, or vice versa, or whether these precede or follow helpful deeds and acts of guidance. The gift of tongues is last, as always, because it is the problem child—included only after the need for diversity is well heard.

Why he ranks the first three is more difficult to answer; probably it is related to his understanding of the role these three ministries play in the church. It is not so much that one is more important than the other, nor that this is necessarily their order of authority,* but that one has precedence over the other in the founding and building up of the local assembly. In light of 1 Corinthians 14:37 and the probability that those who have taken the lead against Paul are considered "prophets," Paul might also be subordinating such people to the apostle, who is giving them "the Lord's command."

It is no surprise that Paul should list "apostles" first. The surprise is that they should be on this list at all, and that he should list them in the plural. Most likely with this word he is reflecting on his own ministry in this church; the plural is in deference to others who have had the same ministry in other churches (cf. 1 Cor 9:5; 15:7-11). In any case, there is no other evidence that Paul thought of a local church as having some among it called "apostles," who were responsible for its affairs. Moreover, there is no place in Paul where there is a direct connection between the Spirit and apostleship. His apostleship is received "from Christ" (Rom 1:5) and "by the will of God" (1 Cor 1:1); he never specifically suggests it to be a "charism" of the Holy Spirit, as though the Spirit gifted him for this "office" (see Apostle).

The ranking of "prophets" and "teachers" (which appears here for the first time in his letters) is equally difficult. The question is whether Paul is here thinking of specific groups of people known as "prophets" and "teachers," vis-à-vis "apostles" and other members of the community, or whether these are more functional terms, referring to any and all who would exercise these gifts. The similar language in Ephesians 2:20 (apostles and prophets) and Ephesians 4:11 suggests that the terms here are probably designations for certain people—although the emphasis would still be on their function to build up the community. Thus when these words occur again in 1 Corinthians 14, they do so as "prophecy" and "teaching," apparently as spontaneous utterances (1 Cor 14:6, 26), without concern for the person of the prophet or teacher.

The other two new items on this list, helpful deeds and acts of guidance, occur only here in the NT. Both appear to refer to what in 1 Corinthians 12:5 Paul called diakoniai ("services"); whether they are also charismata is moot.

2.1.3. The Remaining Lists. For the most part the remaining listings in 1 Corinthians (1 Cor 13:1-3, 8; 14:6, 26) add little that is new, except for two things: (1) One receives added insight into what Paul understands about "knowledge," by his speaking in 1 Corinthians 13:2 of "knowing all mysteries and all knowledge." In 1 Corinthians 14:6 it appears alongside "revelation," which suggests Spirit-inspired understanding of the ways of God. (2) Revelation, which appears first in 1 Corinthians 14:6, also is listed in 1 Corinthians 14:26 as one of the things that happens in the gathering for worship. Its cognate verb appears in 1 Corinthians 14:30, referring to prophecy. Since the prophetic word in 1 Corinthians 14:24-25 also "reveals" the hidden secrets of the heart of the sinner and leads to conversion, it seems likely that this word, in part at least, indicates something of Paul's own understanding of prophecy.

2.2. Romans 12:6-8. This passage stands near the beginning of the paraenesis (see Teaching, Paraenesis) of this letter. The concern is with a sober estimate of oneself and the need for mutuality and diversity in the community. The three features that make this passage look similar to some things in 1 Corinthians 12—14 are (1) the analogy of the body—as one, with many parts; (2) the fact that the members have charismata given to them (for the building up of the body is implied); and (3) the mention of prophecy as the first of the charismata and the inclusion of teaching as the third item. But after that, nothing is familiar. In contrast to 1 Corinthians, but in keeping with the issues in the Roman church (see Romans), the seven items emphasize not miracles and verbal utterances, but forms of service ("service" itself being one of the items listed). One further item (paraklēsis, "exhortation," NRSV, NASB) is probably a verbal gift, but it also might be another form of serving ("encouraging," NIV). Furthermore, each item is qualified as to the manner in which the utterance/service is to be rendered ("according to the rule of faith," "with sincerity, earnestness, cheerfulness," etc.).

The most difficult item on this list is the sixth, proïstamenos, which is quite ambiguous in Greek, meaning either "to manage/govern" or "to care for/give aid to." In 1 Thessalonians 5:12 Paul used the word to describe those in leadership; its appearance here between "giving" and "showing mercy*" suggests that for Paul it usually carries the sense of "caring for" rather than "leading," even when leadership is in view.

All in all, this list obviously expands how one is to view Paul's understanding of the plural charismata; but it helps very little in assessing whether Paul would also have thought of all of these as "gifts of the Spirit."

2.3. Ephesians 4:11. This list is unique in the Pauline corpus. Three ministries from 1 Corinthians 12:28 are mentioned (apostles, prophets, teachers); these are joined by "evangelists" and "pastors," the latter probably are to be understood in very close relationship with "teacher." Although this list occurs again in a context of Spirit and body (Eph 4:4), these "gifts" are not referred to as charismata, nor are they suggested to be "gifts of the Spirit." They are in fact given to the church by Christ; and they are not spoken of as "gifts" per se. Rather, they are people who function in these ways within the church for the singular aim of "equipping the saints," apparently so that the latter can do the "work of the ministry, for the building up of the body."

The burning question in this list is whether these people are to be thought of in terms of their function or as holders of an office (see Churches, Pauline). In keeping with the prior lists, when ministries of these kinds are mentioned, the emphasis still seems to be on function. In any case, with this list one moves somewhat beyond Paul's own understanding of charismata, either as "Spirit manifestations" or as "forms of service." It is doubtful whether Paul ever considered an "office" in the church as a "spiritual gift," either in terms of a charisma or as a special enduement of the Spirit. That seems to be the reading of these texts from a later time.

3. The Charismata.

Despite the difficulties involved, the various items from these texts may be conveniently grouped under three major headings: Spirit manifestations within the worshipping community; deeds of service; specific ministries. It should only be noted that, whether or not we understand the term "gifts of the Spirit" in its narrower sense (as applying only to Spirit manifestations), the goal of all charismata, in all categories, is the "building up" of the community itself, and individual members within the community. Furthermore, in its first two senses Paul makes a considerable point of the universality of such "gifting" within the Spirit-filled community.

3.1. Gifts As Spirit Manifestations. This is the one certain grouping in Paul's letters in which there is a specific connection between the Spirit and charismata. These appear chiefly to be supernatural manifestations of the Spirit within the community at worship. They can be further grouped into "miracles" as such, and "verbal utterances."

3.1.1. Miracles. Included here are three items from 1 Corinthians 12:9-10, "faith" (= the supernatural gift of faith that can "move mountains"; cf. 1 Cor 13:2), "charismata of healings" (of the physical body; also 1 Cor 12:28, 30) and "workings of miracles" (= all other such phenomena not included in healing). The use of the plurals "gifts" and "workings" for the latter two probably means that these "gifts" are not permanent, but each occurrence is a "gift" in its own right. That such phenomena were a regular part of the apostle's own ministry is evidenced by 2 Corinthians 12:12 and Romans 15:18-19. That they were also the regular expectation of the Pauline churches is evidenced by Galatians 3:5.

3.1.2. Inspired utterance. Included here are "the message of wisdom," "the message of knowledge," "prophecy," "the discernments of S/spirits," "tongues" and "the interpretation of tongues" from 1 Corinthians 12:10; "teaching" and "revelation" from 1 Corinthians 14:6; and (perhaps) "exhortation" from Romans 12:8—it might also include "singing" from 1 Corinthians 14:15 and 26 (cf. Eph 5:19; see Hymns). Attempts to distinguish some of these items from one another are generally futile, as is any distinction between their "charismatic" or "non-charismatic" expression (e.g., teaching or singing).

The "message of wisdom" and "knowledge," for example, is language created by the situation in Corinth. For Paul the "message of wisdom" is the preaching of the cross* (see 1 Cor 1:18—2:16; the terminology occurs nowhere else). "Knowledge," on the other hand, is closely related to "mysteries"* in 1 Corinthians 13:2 and elsewhere stands close to the concept of "revelation" (1 Cor 13:8-9, 12; 14:6). Similarly, prophecy itself is closely connected to "revelation" in 1 Corinthians 14:6, and especially in 1 Corinthians 14:25, 26, 30. Are these to be understood as distinctively different gifts? Or, as seems more likely, do they suggest different emphases for the expression of the prophetic gift, since that too seems to fluctuate between "revealing mysteries" and more straightforward words of edification, comfort and exhortation (or encouragement)? In any case, the use of uninterpreted tongues in the assembly is what brought forth the whole argument, and Paul uses prophecy as representative of all other intelligible inspired utterances that are to be preferred to tongues in that setting. These two need further comment.

3.1.2.1. Glossolalia. Paul's actual term is "different kinds of tongues." Enough is said in 1 Corinthians 13—14 to give us a fairly good idea as to how Paul understood it. (1) It is Spirit-inspired utterance; that is made plain by 1 Corinthians 12:7, 11 and 14:2. (2) The regulations for its community use in 1 Corinthians 14:27-28 make it clear that the speaker is not in "ecstasy" or "out of control." Quite the opposite; the speakers must speak in turn, and they must remain silent if there is no one to interpret. (3) It is speech essentially unintelligible both to the speaker (1 Cor 14:14) and to the ungifted hearers (1 Cor 14:16), which is why it must be interpreted in the assembly. (4) It is speech directed basically toward God (1 Cor 14:2, 14-15, 28); one may assume, therefore, that what is interpreted is not speech directed toward others, but the "mysteries" spoken to God. (5) As a gift for private prayer, Paul held it in the highest regard (1 Cor 14:2, 4, 5, 15, 17-18).

Whether Paul also understood it to be an actual earthly language is moot, but the overall evidence suggests not. He certainly does not envisage the likelihood of someone's being present who might understand without interpretation; and the analogy of earthly language in 1 Corinthians 14:10-12 implies that it is not an earthly language (a thing is not usually identical with that to which it is analogous).

3.1.2.2. Prophecy. Of all the Spirit charismata, this is the one mentioned most often in the Pauline letters (1 Thess 5:20; 1 Cor 11:4-5; 12—14; Rom 12:6; Eph 2:20; 3:5; 4:11; 1 Tim 1:18; 4:14; and probably "through the Spirit" in 2 Thess 2:2), implying the widest range of occurrence in the Pauline churches (see Prophecy). Although it was also a widespread phenomenon in the Greek world (see Aune), Paul's understanding of prophecy was thoroughly conditioned by his own history in Judaism. The prophet was a person who spoke to God's people under the inspiration of the Spirit. In Paul such "speech" consisted either of spontaneous, intelligible messages, orally delivered in the gathered assembly, intended for the edification or encouragement of the people, or of a "revelation" of some kind (Gal 2:2), which at times could expose the hearts of unbelievers and lead them to repentance. Those who prophesied were clearly understood to be "in control" (see 1 Cor 14:29-33). Although some people are called prophets, the implication of 1 Corinthians 14:24-25, 30-31 is that the gift is available—at least potentially—to all.

But it is also clear that prophecy does not have independent authority. The combined evidence of 1 Thessalonians 5:21-22 and 1 Corinthians 12:10 and 14:29 is that all such prophesying must be "discerned" by the charismatic community. The implication in both texts is that one may believe oneself truly to be "inspired" of the Spirit, but in reality what is said may not come from the Spirit at all. Therefore, the community must test all things, holding fast to the good and dispensing with every evil expression.

3.1.3. Their Extent in the Pauline Churches. The very fact that Paul can list all these items in such a matter-of-fact way, especially in 1 Corinthians 12:7-11, indicates that the worship of the early church was far more "charismatic" than has been true for most of the church's subsequent history. Some indeed have tried to make a virtue of this lack, arguing that the more extraordinary phenomena were relatively limited in the early church—they belong to more "immature" believers like the Corinthians—and that they are no longer needed once the NT was canonized. But that quite misses the evidence in Paul, as well as his point in 1 Corinthians 13:8-13 (see Fee 1987). One may as well argue that the other Pauline churches did not celebrate the Lord's Supper,* since it is mentioned only in 1 Corinthians.

In fact the evidence is considerable that a visible, "charismatic" dimension of life in the Spirit was the normal experience of the Pauline churches. That Paul should speak to it in a direct way only twice (1 Thess 5:19-22; 1 Cor 12—14) is the "accident" of history—only here were there problems of abuse. Indeed, the problem in Thessalonica is especially telling, since apparently there was a tendency to play down the prophetic Spirit in their gatherings; but Paul would have none of that.

Even more telling are the offhanded, matter-of-fact ways these phenomena are mentioned elsewhere. For example, in 2 Thessalonians 2:2 Paul knows that someone has falsely informed them under the guise of his authority as to "the day of the Lord" (see Eschatology). What he does not know is the source of this false information; one possibility that automatically comes to mind is "through the Spirit" (most likely a "non-discerned" prophetic utterance). Likewise in 1 Corinthians 11:2-16 in the matter of head coverings (see Head), Paul refers to worship as "praying and prophesying," the two primary ways of addressing God and people in the assembly. In Galatians 3:4-5 his argument rests on their past ("such remarkable experiences" BAGD) and ongoing experience of the Spirit, including "miracles." And in the case of Timothy's ministry (1 Tim 1:18; 4:14), his own gifting is related to prophetic utterances in the community, prophetic utterances that are so significant for Timothy that he is urged to keep up the fight in light of them (1 Tim 1:18). In none of these instances is Paul arguing for something; rather, the visible, "charismatic" expression of their common life in the Spirit is the presupposition from which he argues for something else.

3.2. Charismata As Deeds of Service. This category comes from the use of charismata in Romans 12:6-8, where he includes "serving," "giving," "caring for" (in the sense of leadership) and "showing mercy." To these one might also add "helpful deeds" and "acts of guidance" from 1 Corinthians 12:28 (the first word implies that some minister to the physical and spiritual needs of others in the community, while the second probably refers to giving wise counsel to the community—as a whole, not simply to other individuals). These are the least visibly "charismatic" of the "gifts," and the least obvious as expressions of corporate worship. In fact they seem to belong rather to Paul's ever-present interest in relationships within the church. Whether Paul himself considered these ministries as gifts of the Spirit is especially moot. In any case, they fit better in discussions of the Pauline understanding of Christian ethics* and community life (see Churches, Pauline). As such, they give visible expression to the fruit of the Spirit (see Fruit of the Spirit), but Paul himself does not designate them as spiritual gifts (except by our loading the term charismata with meaning not inherent to it).

3.3. Gifts and Ministry. Here is one of the more controverted areas in this discussion. Included here are such items as "apostles," "prophets" and "teachers" from 1 Corinthians 12:28 and Ephesians 4:11, "pastors" and "evangelists" from the latter passage, and Timothy's own charisma of ministry in 1 Timothy 4:14. The difficulties lie in three areas: the ambiguity of language noted above; whether these terms are primarily to be understood in terms of function or office; that Paul himself designates some of these as charismata, but not all of them (see Ministry).

The clue to this ambiguity is probably to be found in a proper distinction between function and office. For the most part, these terms in Paul's letters seem to be primarily functional, rather than denoting office. That is, Paul is more often concerned with the function of prophecy in the community than he is with a position known as "prophet." In any case, the latter emerges from the former, not the other way about; and this is where the role of the Spirit and charismata terminology fit in. Paul clearly understood his own ministry and that of others to be Spirit-given and Spirit-empowered. When functioning as Spirit ministries, Paul would probably consider such ministries to be charismata. Even in what most scholars consider to be the Deutero-Pauline Pastoral Letters (see Pastoral Letters), Timothy's charism is clearly not an office. The charisma resides "within him," for the sake of his ministry (so Schatzmann, Fee; contra Dunn et al.).

In sum, the frequent distinction between "charismatic" and "official" is probably a false one (so Käsemann, Fung), partly because all ministry was "charismatic" in the sense of being Christ-given and Spirit-empowered (Käsemann), and partly because the language distinctions come from a later time and have little to do with Paul and his concerns. This does not negate "office"; it merely suggests that such a discussion seems quite foreign to Paul's own use of charismata when associated with the Spirit.

See also BODY OF CHRIST; FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT; HOLY SPIRIT; KNOWLEDGE, GIFT OF KNOWLEDGE; MINISTRY; PROPHECY, PROPHESYING; SPIRITUALITY; TONGUES; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); A. Bittlinger, Gifts and Graces (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1967); D. A. Carson, Showing the Spirit (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987); H. Conzelmann, "χάρισμα," TDNT IX.402-406; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); idem, God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1993); R. Y. K. Fung, "Ministry, Community and Spiritual Gifts," EvQ 56 (1984) 3-14; D. Gee, Concerning Spiritual Gifts (Springfield: Gospel Publishing, 1947); W. A. Grudem, The Gift of Prophecy in 1 Corinthians (Washington: University Press of America, 1982); D. Hill, New Testament Prophecy (Atlanta: John Knox, 1979); E. Käsemann, "Ministry and Community in the New Testament," in Essays on New Testament Themes (London: SCM, 1964) 63-94; J. Koenig, Charismata: God's Gifts for God's People (1978); J. W. MacGorman, The Gifts of the Spirit (Nashville: Broadman, 1974); R. P. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation (Grand Rapids; Eerdmans, 1984); S. Schatzmann, A Pauline Theology of Charismata (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1986); E. Schweizer, The Holy Spirit (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

G. D. Fee

GLORIFICATION. See GLORY, GLORIFICATION.

GLORY, GLORIFICATION

The terminology of glory provides a window on virtually the whole of Paul's theology (the noun doxa occurs seventy-six times, the verb doxazō, twelve times, predominantly in Romans and the Corinthian letters). Nowhere in the NT are its OT roots more apparent than in Paul's usage.

1. Background
2. God's Eternal Purpose
3. Creation and Fall
4. Christ, the New Creation and the Church

1. Background.

In the OT Yahweh's glory (kᵉḇôḏ yhwh, "glory of the Lord," is a technical term) is his visible and active presence in the creation (Ps 19:1; Is 6:3) and among the nations (Ps 97:6), especially his covenant people Israel.* Closely related to his grandeur and power as creator and redeemer, glory is often associated with the phenomenon of light or fire, sometimes of such overwhelming brilliance and unendurable intensity that it is shrouded in a cloud (Ex 16:10; 24:17; cf. Ex 33:22-23 and 34:29-35).

God's glory-presence, for salvation or destruction, is prominent in the decisive moments and central institutions of Israel's history: Moses and the Exodus, monarchy and Temple, Exile and return. In the prophets glory takes on an eschatological cast; their hope for the future is summed up in Habakkuk's words, "the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Hab 2:14). This final, transforming revelation of the divine glory, through the coming of the Messiah, will bring salvation to all nations (Is 40:5; 58:8; 62:1-2).

The LXX's decision to translate the OT kāḇôḏ with doxa initiated a process of substantial semantic change in the usage of the latter word in Jewish religious contexts (in secular Greek it meant "opinion," "reputation," "praise"). That change carries through into the NT usage, especially in John and Paul.

2. God's Eternal Purpose.

God* is "the Father of glory" (Eph 1:17). Glory begins and ends with him and his plan is to share his glory. "The riches of his glory" (Rom 9:23; Eph 1:18; 3:16; Col 1:27) are displayed in those whom "he prepared beforehand for glory" (Rom 9:23). The mystery*-wisdom*, revealed in Paul's gospel* preaching,* was "predestined before the ages for our glory" (1 Cor 2:7). Election* in Christ* "before the foundation of the world," God's loving predestination, is "to the praise of the glory of his grace" (Eph 1:4-6, 12). The final link in the chain that begins with foreknowledge* and predestination is glorification (Rom 8:29-30).

3. Creation and Fall.

"What has been made" is an evident display of "God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature" (Rom 1:20 NIV); in other words, the entire created order shows "the glory of the immortal God" (Rom 1:23). Uniquely within the creation,* "man . . . is the image and glory of God," and "woman is the glory of man" (1 Cor 11:7; the contrast in Rom 1:23 shows that doxa is correlative with homoiōma ["likeness"] and eikōn ["image"]).

Sin* enters the creation through Adam* (Rom 5:12-19). Consequently, "although they knew God," human beings "neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks" (Rom 1:21); that is, they have withheld worship* and adoration, their due response to the divine glory reflected in the creation around them and in themselves as God's image* bearers. Instead, with futile minds and foolish, darkened hearts (cf. 1 Cor 1:18-25), they have idolatrously exchanged God's glory for creaturely images, human and otherwise (Rom 1:21-23). Having so drastically defaced the divine image, they have, without exception, forfeited the privilege of reflecting his glory (Rom 3:23). This doxa-less condition, resulting in unrelieved futility,* corruption and death, permeates the entire created order (Rom 8:20-22).

4. Christ, the New Creation and the Church.

The whole of Paul's gospel, centered in Christ's death* and resurrection* (Rom 1:3-4; 1 Cor 15:3-4), may be viewed as a message of restored and consummated glory.

4.1. Promise and fulfillment. Sinful human rebellion has not frustrated God's eternal plan. To Israel* belong, as part of the elect nation's privileges, "the adoption and the glory and the covenants* and the giving of the Law* and the promises" (Rom 9:4), and in Christ those covenant promises, "no matter how many," have their fulfillment (their "Yes") "to the glory of God" (2 Cor 1:20).

The highest single concentration of glory vocabulary in Paul's letters (ten occurrences of the noun and verb) is in 2 Corinthians 3:7-11—a contrast between old and new covenants (2 Cor 3:6), with glory as a common denominator. Even the old covenant with its condemning and death-dealing "letter" is invested with divine glory. But the glory of the Law, intervening between the promise and its fulfillment in the interests of that fulfillment (Gal 3:15-18), was transitory (2 Cor 3:11); it is as if the old had none, in comparison with the surpassing, permanent glory of the new covenant (2 Cor 3:10-11).

The new covenant doxa in Christ is the climactic revelation of God's glory; it is eschatological* glory. Its full dimensions are especially apparent in 2 Corinthians 4:6 (quoting Gen 1:3): As the God who in the beginning said "Light shall shine out of darkness," so he gives believers "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ." Christ's glory-light* answers to the light of the original creation; his is the splendor of a new and final creation (cf. 2 Cor 5:17; see Creation and New Creation).

4.2. Righteousness and the Spirit. 2 Corinthians 3:6-18 expressly associate the glory of the new covenant with its being "the ministry of the Spirit" (2 Cor 3:8) and "the ministry of righteousness" (2 Cor 3:9). Righteousness* and the Spirit,* together with closely related concepts like life* (2 Cor 3:6), freedom* (2 Cor 3:17) and power* (cf. 1 Cor 2:4), form a matrix that constitutes the eschatological glory revealed in Christ.

4.2.1. Righteousness. "The gospel of the glory of Christ" (2 Cor 4:4) is the revelation of God's righteousness (Rom 1:17), a righteousness that justifies* (Rom 3:21-26; cf. 2 Cor 5:21). On the cross Christ is "the Lord of glory" (1 Cor 2:8) because his death is a propitiatory sacrifice (Rom 3:25; see Expiation, Propitiation), a provision of God's love (Rom 5:8) that removes his just wrath toward sinners (Rom 1:18).

Christ's glory-righteousness, veiled in the cross* of Christ (1 Cor 2:6-8), is openly displayed in his resurrection.* Because he was "obedient unto death," under conditions of humility and abased servitude, uniquely intensified by his being "in the form of God" and "equal with God" (that is, eternally and inherently he is a participant in divine glory), "therefore" (dio) God "has highly exalted him" (Phil 2:6-9). Rewarded with life for death, "justified in the Spirit, . . . taken up in glory" (1 Tim 3:16), "raised from the dead through the glory of the Father" (Rom 6:4), the humiliated Lord* of glory has become the glorified Lord of glory (see Christology).

This movement involved a real, climactic enhancement in glory for Christ personally. In contrast to his preresurrection existence, marked by "perishability," "dishonor" and "weakness," his resurrection body is characterized by "imperishability," "glory" and "power" (1 Cor 15:42-43; Phil 3:20-21; cf. 2 Cor 13:4).

4.2.2. The Spirit. Christ's glorification results in a new and unprecedented relationship with the Holy Spirit. "The last Adam became life-giving Spirit" (1 Cor 15:45). In this declaration, central to both Paul's christology* and his pneumatology, (1) the reference is to the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Cor 2:14-15; Rom 8:11; 2 Cor 3:6), and (2) the word became has in view Christ's resurrection or, more broadly, his exaltation* (as the flow of the argument in chapter 15 shows). Consequently (2 Cor 3:17), "the Lord [= the glorified Christ; cf. v. 18 with 2 Cor 4:4, 6] is the Spirit" (= the Holy Spirit; see 2 Cor 3:6, 8; see Holy Spirit). This equation does not miss or deny the personal distinction between Christ and the Spirit; eternal, inner-trinitarian relationships are outside Paul's purview in these statements (see God). The identification is functional or eschatological, not ontological; it describes what has happened to Christ, as "the last Adam" (1 Cor 15:45), in history. In being glorified he has been so thoroughly transformed by the Spirit (Rom 1:4; 8:11) and come into such full and permanent possession of the Spirit (Rom 8:9; 2 Cor 3:17) that they are now inseparably one in the activity of giving eschatological life.

4.3. Present Glory. Christ's glorification is not only for himself but others, "in order that he might be the firstborn among many brothers" (Rom 8:29). His loving self-sacrifice for the church (Eph 5:25) was in order that, as his bride, it too might be "glorious" (endoxon, Eph 5:27). To that end faith is essential; Christ's indwelling presence, through the power of the Spirit, is "through faith," "according to the riches of [God's] glory" (Eph 3:16-17).

The church's glorification takes place specifically as believers are "conformed to the image of his Son" (Rom 8:29); the glory-image, universally defaced and perverted in Adam, is restored and made consummate in Christ and the church.* This conformity is a reality already underway (2 Cor 3:18 in context): As believers, in "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor 4:4), "behold [or 'reflect'] the glory of the Lord"—Christ (who is the Spirit, 2 Cor 3:17), they "are being transformed into the same image from glory to glory." The glorified Christ, as life-giving Spirit, is the source of the ongoing, transforming glorification of the church (see Adam and Christ).

This present glory of the church, paradoxically and parallel to the experience of its Lord prior to his resurrection, is veiled by afflictions and adversity. Sharing in "the fellowship of his sufferings" is the way believers experience "the power of his resurrection" (Phil 3:10; cf. 2 Cor 1:5); the condition for those who aspire to be glorified with Christ is that for now "we suffer with him" (Rom 8:17). Paul's prayer* is that believers might be powerfully strengthened "according to the might of [God's] glory" just with a view to the "great endurance and patience" (NIV) they must display (Col 1:11). The present situation, where glory-renewal is being experienced "inwardly" but not "outwardly," involves affliction that is "momentary" and "light" in comparison with the "eternal weight of glory" being produced (2 Cor 4:16-17; cf. Rom 8:18; see Afflictions; Suffering).

4.4. Future Glory. Christ, indwelling the church, is "the hope of glory" (Col 1:27). The glorification of believers awaits its full realization at his return; "when Christ, our life, is manifested, then you also will be manifested with him in glory" (Col 3:4). Then Christ, "the firstfruits*" of the resurrection-harvest (1 Cor 15:20, 23), will transform the present, humble body of the believer to be "in conformity with the body of his glory" (Phil 3:20); "raised in glory," with a "spiritual body*" like his (1 Cor 15:43-44), believers, outwardly and bodily now, "will bear the image of the heavenly [Christ]" (1 Cor 15:49). This final, open revelation of "the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom 8:21), will be cosmic in scope, including as well the freedom of the entire, non-image-bearing creation, its release from futility and corruption (Rom 8:19-21; see Eschatology).

Christ's glorious return will result, for unbelievers, in "eternal destruction," consisting in separation from him and "the glory of his power" (2 Thess 1:9). It will also be the "day" when, definitively, "he comes to be glorified in his saints" (2 Thess 1:10). To that end the apostle's prayer for the church is that even now, until then, "the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you, and you in him." (2 Thess 1:12).

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; ESCHATOLOGY; GOD; IMAGE, IMAGE OF GOD; LIGHT AND DARKNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Hegemann, "δόξα, EDNT 1.346-47; G. Kittel, "δόξα, TDNT II.233-37, 242-55; C. C. Newman, Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); H. Schlier, "Doxa bei Paulus als heilsgeschichtlicher Begriff," in Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus Internationalis Catholicus (2 vols.; AnBib 17-18; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1963) 1.45-56; N. Turner, "Glory and Glorification," in Christian Words (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1980) 185-89. R. B. Gaffin, Jr.

GLORY OF GOD. See GLORY, GLORIFICATION; GOD.

GLOSSOLALIA. See TONGUES.

GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM

The Gnostics were followers of a variety of religious movements which stressed salvation* through gnōsis, or "knowledge," that is, of one's origins. Cosmological dualism was an essential feature of Gnosticism—an opposition between the spiritual world and the evil, material world. Gnosticism was attacked in the writings of the church fathers, who regarded the various gnostic groups as heretical perversions of Christianity.

Modern scholars believe that Gnosticism was a religious phenomenon which was in some cases independent of Christianity. There is as yet no consensus as to when and how it originated, though many scholars have recently sought to trace the roots of Gnosticism to Jewish fringe elements. One problem that faces this view is the need to explain the anti-Jewish cast given by the Gnostics to the OT, such as the caricature of Jehovah as a foolish demiurge.

1. Sources
2. Gnostic Doctrines
3. Gnosticism and the Pauline Corpus

1. Sources.

Texts that are unambiguously gnostic date from after the second century A.D. Those who maintain a pre-Christian Gnosticism assume the early existence of Gnosticism and interpret the NT texts in the light of this assumption.

1.1. Patristic Sources. Until recently scholars were entirely dependent upon the descriptions of the Gnostics found in the church fathers. In some cases the patristic sources preserved extracts of the gnostic writings but for the most part they were polemical in nature. Our most important sources include Justin Martyr from Samaria (d. 165), Irenaeus of Lyons (d. c. 225), Clement of Alexandria (d. c. 215), Origen of Alexandria and Caesarea (d. 254), and Epiphanius of Salamis in Cyprus (d. 403).

Especially valuable is Irenaeus's account, which has been preserved in a Latin translation, Adversus Haereses. The Philosophoumena of Hippolytus was only discovered in 1842. Clement and Origen were in many ways sympathetic to the gnostic emphases. Though Epiphanius had some firsthand contact with Gnostics in Egypt, his Panarion, while comprehensive, is not very reliable. Some of the observations of the fathers, especially of Irenaeus, have been confirmed by the discovery of original gnostic documents at Nag Hammadi, Egypt. On the other hand, we have nothing as yet from the gnostic sources themselves which corresponds to the patristic description of licentious Gnosticism.

The church fathers were unanimous in regarding Simon of Samaria as the arch-Gnostic, though our earliest source, Acts 8, describes him only as a magos, "magician." According to the later sources Simon claimed to be divine, and taught that his companion, a former prostitute, was the reincarnated Helen of Troy. Those who accept the patristic view of Simon believe that Acts has not given us an accurate portrayal of Simon. Most scholars, however, believe that the church fathers were mistaken.

According to the church fathers, Simon was followed by a fellow Samaritan, Menander, who taught at Antioch in Syria toward the end of the first century. He claimed that those who believed in him would not die. His claims were nullified when he himself died. Also teaching in Antioch at the beginning of the second century was Saturninus, who held that the "incorporeal" Christ was the redeemer. That is, he held a docetic view of Christ which denied the incarnation (cf. 1 Jn 4:3).

Teaching in Asia Minor in the early second century was Cerinthus, who held that Jesus was but a man upon whom Christ descended as a dove. As Christ could not suffer, he departed from Jesus before the crucifixion. Another early gnostic teacher was Basilides, to whom we have attributed both a dualistic system by Irenaeus and a monistic system by Hippolytus.

An important though atypical Gnostic was Marcion of Pontus (northern Turkey), who taught at Rome from 137 to 144. He contrasted the God of the OT with the God of the NT. Marcion drew up the first canon or closed list of NT books, including a truncated Gospel of Luke. Jesus simply appeared; his body was a "phantom." Marcion's church spread to Egypt, Mesopotamia and Armenia. His docetic teachings were sharply rebuked by Tertullian.

The most famous Gnostic teacher was Valentinus, who came from Alexandria to Rome in 140. He taught that there were a series of divine eons. He divided humankind into three classes: hylics, or unbelievers immersed in nature and the flesh; psychics, or common Christians who lived by faith; and pneumatics or the spiritual Gnostics. The later Valentinians divided into an Italian and an Oriental school over the question of whether Jesus had a psychic or pneumatic body. The many outstanding Valentinian teachers included Ptolemaeus, Heracleon, Theodotus and Marcus. The earliest known commentary on a NT book is Heracleon's on the Gospel of John.

1.2. Mandaic Sources. The Mandaean communities in southern Iraq and southwestern Iran are today the sole surviving remnants of Gnosticism. Their texts, though known only through late (seventeenth or eighteenth century) manuscripts, were used by the History-of-Religions scholars and R. Bultmann to reconstruct an alleged pre-Christian Gnosticism. In addition to the manuscripts there are earlier magic bowl texts (A.D. 600) and some magical lead amulets, which may date to as early as the third century A.D. There is no firm evidence to date the origins of Mandaeanism earlier than the second century A.D.

1.3. Coptic Sources. In the nineteenth century two Coptic gnostic codices were published: the Codex Askewianus containing the Pistis Sophia, and the Codex Brucianus containing the Books of Jeu—both relatively late gnostic compositions. (Coptic is a late form of Egyptian written mainly in Greek letters.) A third work, the Codex Berolinensis, though acquired in the nineteenth century, was not published until 1955. It contains a Gospel of Mary (Magdalene), a Sophia of Jesus, Acts of Peter and an Apocryphon of John—a work mentioned by Irenaeus in A.D. 180.

In 1945 a cache of eleven Coptic codices and fragments of two others were found by peasants near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt, 370 miles south of Cairo where the Nile bends from west to east. Unfortunately some of the papyrus leaves and covers were burned in an oven after the lot was brought back to the village of al Qasr. The first translation of a tractate, that of The Gospel of Truth, appeared in 1956. After various vicissitudes, an English translation of the fifty-one treatises appeared in 1977, largely through the efforts of J. M. Robinson.

The Nag Hammadi Library, as the collection has been called, contains a variety of texts: non-Gnostic, non-Christian Gnostic, and Christian Gnostic. The most famous example of the latter is The Gospel of Thomas, probably composed c. A.D. 140 in Syria. This contains 114 purported sayings of Jesus. In 1897 and in 1904 B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt had discovered at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt non-canonical sayings or the so-called "Logia" of Jesus. We now know that these papyri came from copies of the Greek text of the Gospel of Thomas.

Some scholars such as J. M. Robinson and K. Rudolph are convinced that the Nag Hammadi texts have served to confirm R. Bultmann's thesis of a pre-Christian Gnosticism, which is both assumed and attacked by the NT. They have cited especially The Apocalypse of Adam and The Paraphrase of Shem as non-Christian gnostic works from Nag Hammadi. But the assertion that these are actually non-Christian works has been challenged; they certainly do not appear to be pre-Christian compositions. G. W. MacRae, who believes in a pre-Christian Gnosticism, concedes, "And even if we are on solid ground in some cases in arguing that the original works represented in the [Nag Hammadi] library are much older than the extant copies, we are still unable to postulate plausibly any pre-Christian dates." The weakness of the arguments which have sustained a pre-Christian date for gnosticism have been pointed out by S. Petrement (cf. Yamauchi; see Apocryphal Pauline Literature; Paul in Early Church Tradition).

1.4. Other Sources. Other sources such as the Hermetica and the Syrian Odes of Solomon and the Hymn of the Pearl are problematic, both because they are not unambiguously gnostic and because there are question about their dates. Though hermetic texts have been found in the Nag Hammadi Library, the Hermetica as a whole are not radically dualistic.

2. Gnostic Doctrines.

Because there was no central authority or canon of scriptures, the Gnostics taught a bewildering variety of views. Fundamental to clearly gnostic systems was a dualism, which opposed the transcendent God and an ignorant demiurge (often a caricature of the OT Jehovah). In some systems the creation of the world resulted from the presumption of Sophia (Wisdom). In any event the material creation, including the body, was regarded as inherently evil. Sparks of divinity, however, had been encapsuled in the bodies of certain pneumatic or spiritual individuals, who were ignorant of their celestial origins. The transcendent God sent down a redeemer (Christ), who brought them salvation in the form of a secret gnōsis or "knowledge." Most Gnostics were docetics, who held that Christ did not really suffer as he was not truly incarnate. Gnostics hoped to escape from the prison of their bodies at death and to traverse the planetary spheres of hostile demons to be reunited with God. There was for them, of course, no reason to believe in the resurrection of the body.

Since salvation was not dependent upon faith or works but upon the knowledge of one's nature, some Gnostics indulged deliberately in licentious behavior. Carpocrates, for example, urged his followers to participate in all sins; his son Epiphanes taught that promiscuity was God's law.

Most Gnostics, however, took a radically ascetic attitude toward sex and marriage, deeming the creation of woman the source of evil, and the procreation of children but the multiplication of souls in bondage to the powers of darkness. They looked forward to the time when females would be transformed into males.

We know very little about the cult and the community of the Gnostics. Women were very prominent in many of their sects. As a general rule the Gnostics interpreted rites such as baptism and the Eucharist as spiritual symbols of gnosis.

3. Gnosticism and the Pauline Corpus.

Despite the lack of gnostic texts prior to Christianity, many scholars (Robinson, Rudolph) have assumed a pre-Christian origin of Gnosticism. They also believe that they can detect references to Gnosticism in the NT, especially in the writings of John and Paul. H. Koester, in his influential introduction to the NT, assumes a gnostic background for Corinthians, Philippians, the Pastorals, but not Colossians. W. Schmithals finds Gnostics almost everywhere in Paul's letters, even in Thessalonians and Galatians (Schmithals 1972).

3.1. Galatians and Romans. R. Bultmann held that a large number of transformed gnostic concepts appeared in Romans,* such as the fall of creation (Rom 8:20-21; Bultmann, 1.174; see Futility) and baptism* into the body of Christ (Rom 6:5; Bultmann, 1.141) and reference to the powers of this age (Rom 8:38-39; Bultmann, 1.173). Schmithals has argued that Paul's opponents in Galatia* were Gnostics on the dubious ground that Paul's insistence on his apostolate was based on a concept of the apostle* derived from the Gnostics (Schmithals 1972, 13-64). Most scholars find it quite obvious that Galatians was directed against Judaizers.* Bultmann and Schmithals operate within a hermeneutical circle which assume a pre-Christian Gnosticism, which can only be extrapolated from much later sources.

3.2. Corinthians. Because Paul spoke about gnōsis and sophia in his letters to Corinth, the possibility of a gnostic background looms the largest here. The thesis that a Jewish Gnosticism characterized Paul's opponents at Corinth has been most fully developed by Schmithals. One of the weightiest evidences cited is Paul's antithesis of psychikos ("physical") and pneumatikos ("spiritual"; 1 Cor 2:14-15; 15:44-46). But it is quite anachronistic to use Valentinian distinctions to understand Paul's terminology (see Corinthians).

Other scholars have concluded that it is not necessary to understand Paul's opponents as Gnostics. R. A. Horsley has attempted to illuminate the "gnosis" of Paul's opponents from Hellenistic Judaism as illustrated by Philo and the Wisdom of Solomon, rather than from Gnosticism. He concludes, "What Paul responds to, therefore, is not a gnostic libertinism, as derived from Reitzenstein, elaborated on by Schmithals and still presupposed by commentators such as Barrett, but Hellenistic Jewish gnosis at home precisely in the mission context" (Horsley 48-49). R. McL. Wilson has also come to the same conclusion: "What we have at Corinth, then, is not yet Gnosticism, but a kind of Gnosis" (Wilson, 112), that is, a tendency that had not yet become systematized as in the late second century (see Corinthians).

3.3. Philippians. Schmithals concludes that the libertines criticized by Paul (Phil 3:19) must be gnostic libertines (Schmithals 1972, 65-122). Others believe that the Christ Hymn of Philippians 2:6-11 may be based on a gnostic prototype (e.g., Bultmann, 1.175-77; Käsemann). On the other hand, Philippians 2:6-11 may be readily explained as an early Christian hymn or an example of exalted Pauline language that is dependent on OT imagery and/or Jewish wisdom* traditions (see Christology). Libertinism may develop from antinomianism rather than Gnosticism. Paul's clear allusion to circumcision (Phil 3:2-3) indicates that his main opponents were Judaizers or Jews (see Philippians).

3.4. Colossians. Many scholars, including J. B. Lightfoot in the nineteenth century, have suspected that the Colossian heresy was a form of Gnosticism (e.g., Bornkamm). Some interpreters have expounded the "preeminence of Christ" in Colossians 1:18 against the background of a series of eons, a concept developed in Valentinian Gnosticism (Bultmann, 149-52; Lightfoot, 255-71). But it is quite possible with P. T. O'Brien to interpret Colossians in a way other than postulating a fully developed gnostic system or as combating a non-gnostic heresy. Many scholars have concluded that the Colossian error was neither a gnostic heresy nor a pagan mystery cult, but was related to Jewish mysticism* (e.g., Francis; see Colossians).

3.5. Ephesians. Some scholars have interpreted the "dividing wall" of Ephesians 2:14-16 as the opposition of the hostile powers to the ascent of the souls in the divine plērōma (cf. Eph 1:23; see Fullness) of Gnosticism (e.g., Schlier, 18-25). But the simplest explanation would be a reference to the barrier keeping out Gentiles from the inner precincts of the Jerusalem Temple* (Lincoln, 139-43; see Ephesians).

3.6. Pastoral Letters. As 1 Timothy 6:20 speaks against a false gnōsis and 2 Timothy 2:18 also speaks against those who have assumed that the resurrection has also occurred, many scholars have concluded that the error combatted in the Pastorals is a form of Gnosticism. The heretics' prohibition against marriage* and the eating of meats (1 Tim 4:3) is also cited as evidence of gnostic asceticism. An incipient or rudimentary form of Gnosticism may well have been combated in the Pastoral letters, but it is anachronistic to read back into the NT period the fully developed Gnosticism of the second century. It is not likely that gnōsis in the Pastorals means a knowledge that will release the soul from enslavement to the material world, that is, "knowledge" in the gnostic sense. There is no evidence of any speculation about eons and archons. The idea that the resurrection had already taken place probably resulted from a faulty understanding of Paul's teaching such as we know it from Romans 6.

See also APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE; CHRISTOLOGY; COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE; FULLNESS; HELLENISM; JUDAIZERS; KNOWLEDGE, GIFT OF KNOWLEDGE; MYSTERY; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PASTORAL LETTERS; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Balas, "The Use and Interpretation of Paul in Irenaeus's Five Books Adversus Haereses," Second Century 9 (1992) 27-40; W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); G. Bornkamm, "The Heresy of Colossians," in Conflict at Colossae, ed. F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (2d ed.; SBLSBS 4; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975) 123-45; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955); I. P. Couliano, The Tree of Gnosis (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1992); G. Filoramo, A History of Gnosticism (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1990); F. O. Francis, "Humility and Angelic Worship in Col 2:18," in Conflict at Colossae, ed. F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (2d ed.; SBLSBS 4; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1975) 163-95; J. E. Goehring et al., ed., Gnosticism and the Early Christian World (2 vols.; Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1990); C. W. Hedrick and R. Hodgson, Jr., ed., Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism, and Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1986); R. A. Horsley, "Gnosis in Corinth: 1 Corinthians 8.1-6," NTS 27 (1980) 32-51; E. Käsemann, "A Critical Analysis of Philippians 2:5-11," in God and Christ, ed. R. W. Funk, JThC 5 (New York: Harper & Row, 1968) 45-88; H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament II: History and Literature of Early Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); J. L. Kovacs, "The Archons, the Spirit and the Death of Christ: Do We Need the Hypothesis of Gnostic Opponents to Explain 1 Cor. 2.6-16?," in Apocalyptic and the New Testament, ed. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 217-36; B. Layton, The Gnostic Scriptures (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1987); J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (9th ed.; London: Macmillan, 1890); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); A. Logan and A. Wedderburn, ed., The New Testament and Gnosis (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1983); G. Lüdemann, "The Acts of the Apostles and the Beginnings of Simonian Gnosis," NTS 33 (1987) 420-26; G. W. MacRae, "Nag Hammadi and the New Testament," in Gnosis. Festschrift für Hans Jonas, ed. B. Aland (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1978) 144-57; G. May, "Marcion in Contemporary Views," Second Century 6.3 (1987-88) 129-52; P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); E. Pagels, The Gnostic Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); B. A. Pearson, "Philo and Gnosticism," ANRW II.21.1 (1984) 295-342; S. Petre-ment, A Separate God: The Christian Origin of Gnosticism (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984); R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistic Mystery Religions: Their Basic Ideas and Significance (Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1978); J. M. Robinson and R. Smith, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library in English (3d rev. ed.; San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988); J. M. Robinson et al., The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices (12 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972-1984); K. Rudolph, Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983); H. Schlier, Christus und Kirche im Epheserbrief (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1930); W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); idem, Paul and the Gnostics (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); P. H. Towner, "Gnosis and Realized Eschatology in Ephesus (of the Pastoral Epistles) and the Corinthian Enthusiasm," JSNT 31 (1987) 95-124; R. Van Den Broek and M. J. Vermaseren, ed., Studies in Gnosticism and Hellenistic Religions (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1981); D. S. Williams, "Reconsidering Marcion's Gospel," JBL 108 (1989) 477-96; R. McL. Wilson, "Gnosis at Corinth," in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 102-14; E. M. Yamauchi, Gnostic Ethics and Mandaean Origins (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1970); idem, Pre-Christian Gnosticism: A Survey of the Proposed Evidences (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1983).

E. M. Yamauchi

GNOSTIC PAUL. See APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

GNOSTICISM. See APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

GOD

To try to capture in succinct and synthetic form Paul's understanding of God is an almost impossible task. There are several reasons why this enterprise is risky, even if necessary. For one thing, Paul's thought is never systematic, never speculative. Rather like the composition of his letters his mind moves to express his teaching in response to the needs of his congregations. This makes his "doctrine of God" less part of his reasoned theology and more implicit in his pastoral and pragmatic handling of human situations. Yet he claims at all times to be reflecting "the mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2:16) as he expects the same disposition among his people (Phil 2:5). At the same time God is never far from his mind. He uses the word God so frequently that his use has forty percent of all the NT references (so Morris, 1986).

Then, Paul's letters have in view the congregations gathered for worship* where they are to be read out (1 Thess 5:27; Col 4:16; and implied in Philem 2). That means the doxological note is sounded throughout his correspondence. Often he will punctuate his writing with outbursts of praise to God and celebration of his grace* and goodness (e.g. Rom 11:33-36; 2 Cor 9:15; Gal 1:5; Phil 4:20; 2 Thess 2:16). Paul's truest teaching on God is mirrored in these liturgical jubilations, notably in his use of creeds,* hymns,* poetic snatches and prayer* speech (see Liturgical Elements).

Also, much of what Paul held dearest in his faith* was shared with his ancestral beliefs in Judaism and underlay his whole viewpoint and outlook, rather than coming to written, explicit expression. Hence a brief study of the OT-Jewish background is given in what follows.

1. Some Basic Assumptions
2. God as Creator, Father and King
3. The Attributes of God
4. Summary

1. Some Basic Assumptions.

Paul, like the other NT writers, makes no attempt to prove the existence of God. He assumes, based on his Jewish ancestral beliefs and upbringing in a pious home of the Diaspora* (Phil 3:5; 2 Cor 11:22; Gal 1:14; see Jew, Paul the), that God exists, that he created humankind and continues to maintain interest in his creation* (1 Cor 11:7-8). Whatever the value of attempting to prove philosophically the existence of God, Paul offers no direct guidance. According to his reported responses and sermons in Acts 14:15-17 and 17:22-31 (see Athens), he did argue his case for God's providential care from the evidence in his creation and its preservation. This line of reasoning—that God is known, at least in part, by his created works and his provision for human need—is amplified in Romans 1:19-23. Yet the revelation is only of limited value, since it is met by the human tendency to idolatry and perversion. Natural theology, for Paul, has the effect of increasing and giving focus to human sinfulness (see Hendry).

Paul, like the other writers of the NT, shares the view of God as maker of all, which is seen in the OT. The creation story concentrates on God's creative initiative, and this view of God as originator of the created world is basic to OT thought. Moreover it is assumed that the Creator is also sustainer of his creation. The heavens and earth are the work of his hands and he is seen to possess supreme power within the order of nature. In the intertestamental period the Jews firmly believed in the same basic creative relationship between God and his world, adding to it the conviction that Torah (Law*) or Wisdom* had served as an intermediary through which God created, a view which came close to personifying the Torah and Wisdom.

In Paul's hands this role of an intermediary is taken over by the pre-existent* Christ,* notably in his redactional use of the christological hymn in Colossians 1:15-20 (see commentaries). Yet it remains the case that Paul's monotheism which retains God's creative act as the sole originator of creation is firm (1 Cor 8:6; 2 Cor 4:4-6), even if it is enlarged to accord a cosmological role to the preincarnate Christ. Such christological monotheism has been regarded as Paul's unique contribution to NT thought about God and the cosmos (Wright Climax, 120-36). It probably arose out of Paul's response to incipient gnosticism* at Corinth which placed a vast distance between the high God and the world, and later (at Colossae) the Hellenistic idea of a set of intermediaries separating God and the universe had to be opposed by Paul's insistence that the entire fullness* (plērōma) of deity resided in the person of Jesus Christ (Col 2:9), both transcendent and incarnate.

In this way, while Paul starts from the OT view of God as transcendent over his creation, as the holy one, he is able to relate God immanently to the world through the divine presence now located in the figure of the earthly Jesus, supremely in Jesus' death* and resurrection.* This was necessary because of the prevalent transcendental view of God during the intertestamental period. The Most High was removed so far from his own creation that he needed some intermediary to maintain contact with the world (but cf. Abelson, 46-54; Sanders, 44, 212-15; Dunn, 198-99). There is nothing of this remoteness in the NT approach. The NT view of God is linked with the OT revelation, not with current Jewish speculations.

Nevertheless, the transcendence of God finds some support in the majesty and particularly in the holiness of God, which is so characteristic of OT writings, especially of the Prophets. The statement in Isaiah 57:15 illustrates the essential difference between the OT view and much Jewish transcendental theology—"For thus says the high and lofty one who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, and also with those who are contrite and humble in spirit" (NRSV). This combination of loftiness and tenderness is an essential feature of the NT, and makes the NT view of God intelligible. This high moral view was in strong contrast to the contemporary multifarious and often immoral deities worshipped by non-Jewish people at the time when the NT came into being. It is impossible to appreciate the NT revelation apart from maintaining its close connection with the OT view of God. Those movements, among which Marcionism was the earliest, which have created a cleavage between OT and NT, begin their approach to NT thought with a serious disadvantage for they have no clue to the understanding of the basic NT view of God. The latter did not arise ex nihilo; it was the result of a long period of revelation of which the NT was the consummation.

Paul equally builds on the inherited Jewish conviction of God's covenant love for Israel which is undefeatable and sure (this assurance underlies the tenor of the argument in Rom 9—11; see Israel). Once more however, the OT-Judaic confidence that God is one, that he has revealed himself in Torah and has entered into covenant relations with his people Israel received a christological modification by Paul. Yet it is not by denying these fundamental tenets in his ancestral faith that Paul argues for the finality of his new relationship (see Hays). Indeed he maintains his monotheism (Gal 3:20; 1 Cor 8:4, 6; cf. 1 Tim 2:5) and grants to the giving of Torah a glory* that accompanied that event (2 Cor 3:7, 9). Israel is still an elect nation, beloved by God for the Jewish fathers' sake (Rom 11:28). On the other side, God's unity is understood in a way that makes room for the place of Jesus Christ as the "form" (Phil 2:6), or "image"* (2 Cor 4:4-6; Col 1:15) or "Son" (Col 1:13; Rom 8:29, 31) of God. Torah's glory was limited at its inception and is now passing away in the face of the greater glory that came in the new age of Messiah's appearing (2 Cor 3:7-11: see Belleville, Newman). And Israel in rejecting Paul's gospel* stands under divine judgment* at the present and in danger of being rejected as branches broken off (Rom 11:19-20; see Olive Tree).

The final word, however, is with God's unchanging love* and purpose (Rom 11:29, 32) in grace,* seen to be displayed and made effectual in Christ the elect one and the embodiment of divine love (Rom 8:29-38). Yahweh's love for Israel, itself uncaused (Deut 7:7-8) and persistent (Hosea) is but a foretaste of God's universal love for the world in its reconciliation (2 Cor 5:18- 21; see Peace, Reconciliation) and the church in its destiny (Eph 1:1-10).

2. God as Creator, Father and King.

So basic to all parts of the Pauline corpus is the doctrine of God that much of the evidence consists of assumptions rather than specific statements. Nevertheless there are many statements which are highly significant. We shall discuss the following aspects—

God as Creator, the providence of God, God as Father, God as King and Judge, various other titles for God, and then in summary form the attributes of God.

2.1. God as Creator. There is no doubt that the Christians assumed without discussion that God is the originator of the universe. They took this over from the OT and also from the teaching of Jesus. In his speech to the Athenians, Paul boldly announced the kind of God whom he worshipped as "the God who made the world and everything in it, being Lord of heaven and earth" (Acts 17:24). His creative power is also seen in the statement that mortals are his offspring (Acts 17:29), reflecting Paul's bid to establish a common ground with his audience, some of whom as Stoics cherished the notion that humans were the family of God (see Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus, for which see Hymns). In his speech at Lystra Paul makes a similar assertion about God's creative power* (Acts 14:15).

In his letters Paul sets a distanc e between Creator and creatures as in Romans 1:25. Moreover, creation is said to reflect the work of the Creator (Rom 1:20). Indeed, it shows something of the character of God (his eternal power and deity). It can do this only because it is the direct work of his hands. There are specific assertions that all things were made by God (Rom 11:36; 1 Cor 8:6; 11:12; cf. Eph 3:9). Those who prohibit what God created for human good (1 Tim 4:3) on the mistaken assumption that God has no direct dealing with matter held to be evil per se—a gnostic trait—are refuted. This is why earlier Paul had appealed to Psalm 24:1 to maintain his teaching that all God's gifts of food and drink are good, provided we receive them with acknowledgement of him as giver (1 Cor 10:26-31; cf. 1 Tim 4:5). Alien teaching that places such activities as eating and drinking, along with marital sexual* relations under a taboo (Col 2:21) is as firmly resisted (Col 2:23). Relations between spouses are honorable and necessary, in normal circumstances (1 Cor 7:1- 7).

Yet Paul reflects the same conviction that the OT shows, that the creation is not coeternal with the Creator nor is creation the product of an inferior deity, as in later gnosticism. God is the author of all that exists, though Paul's interest is chiefly in God's premundane election* of his people. In Ephesians 1:4 the phrase "before the foundation of the world" is used of the choice of God and indicates that the Creator existed apart from the material existence of his creation.

Paul does not discuss the method of creation. He uses a common OT-Jewish imagery (as in Heb 11:3, based on Ps 33:6, 9; cf. Gen 1:3) of a powerful word giving birth to created orders (2 Cor 4:6, based also on Ps 33). More important than the method is the agent. Whereas in Genesis the agency of the Spirit is mentioned (Gen 1:2), creation is said to have been effected through Christ. This has great significance for christology.* But for our present purpose it serves to put the Pauline view of creation in a somewhat different context from the OT view. The emphasis on the creative activity of Christ in no way lessens the creative activity of God. Indeed, the creative act is seen as a unity. As we have noted, the theme comes in Colossians 1:16—"for in him (i.e., Christ) all things were created, in heaven and on earth . . . all things were created through him and for him." 1 Corinthians 8:5-6 provides a similar statement, based on a creedal confession, in turn going back to the OT-Jewish shema (Deut 6:4; see Wright "One God").

These passages clearly teach not only that God created through (dia) Christ but also for (eis) Christ, which give some indication of the divine purpose for the created order. The infinite wisdom of the Creator is seen in his making the creation christocentric rather than anthropocentric. The NT does not support the view that the world belongs to humanity, except in the sense fulfilled in Jesus Christ (1 Cor 15:27, based on Ps 8). Paul does hint in one place (1 Cor 3:22) that believers are called to see the world as theirs, even if it is transitory (1 Cor 7:31), and they await the gift of their eternal homeland (Phil 3:20-21) at the parousia. Creation itself is bound up with the human condition, as Paul clearly recognized in speaking of the groaning of creation for deliverance (Rom 8:19-25). Modern concerns over misuse of creation has brought this into focus and has shown the extraordinary relevance of Paul's concept. The whole ecological issue of not wasting nature's resources and avoiding pollution of earth's environment as though it were an end (however laudable and necessary) in itself hardly tallies with the view of creation as made "for" Christ.

It is as important to consider Paul's teaching of God's providential dealing with his creation, as to note his basic assumptions about God's creative work. Paul provides an answer to the question of God's continued activity within the created order. No support is given for the view that, having created the world, God left it to its own devices. A very different picture lies behind the apostolic approach. Providence is based on the character of God, who is thought as constantly at work and vitally interested in the well-being of his handiwork. As we noted earlier, Paul's reported speech at Lystra (Acts 14:17) stresses God's control of the seasons and his harvest provision. In Paul's Areopagus address (Acts 17:25) he affirms that God gives to all people and creatures both life and breath (see Athens).

God's providence is attested in Paul's life as a missionary in the Acts record, especially in the hazards to which he was exposed and the way God is said to have brought him through (see Acts 27:24-26). The same conviction of a divine superintendence of events, in spite of obvious setbacks and dangers, runs through Paul's recital of a "litany of affliction" (peristaseis-katalog is the technical term current in studies on Paul's trials: see Afflictions) in 2 Corinthians 4:7-15; 6:4-10; 11:21-29; 1 Corinthians 15:30-32; Philippians 2:17.

Although it is the case that providence embraces all peoples, God's special care is offered to his people in their experience of trial (Rom 5:1-10), and his benign regard for all facets of life is celebrated in Romans 8:28 which is most likely to be rendered with modern translations as "in all things God works for good to those who love God and are chosen," even if they are called on to suffer for his sake. This leads on to the teaching on the fatherhood of God.

2.2. God as Father. It is the idea of God as Father which is most characteristic of NT teaching in general and especially of the teaching of Jesus. Whereas the contemporary pagan world held its gods in fear or uncertainty (see Worship), the Christian view of God's parenthood brings an unparalleled element of intimacy into human relationship with God. Nevertheless, while there are striking aspects in Jesus' concept of God as Father carried forward into the letters, the idea is not absent from the OT or from Jewish usage. God is conceived of as Father of his people. The Israelite king could be conceived of as an individual son of God (Ps 2; see Adoption, Sonship). Israel could be called "my son" (Hosea 11:1). But this tended to be a nationalistic idea rather than an individual relationship, though there is a development in the direction of a personal relationship with God as parent in Sirach 4:10, Psalms of Solomon 17:30 and Jubilees 1:24-25 (see Son of God). At the same time, bearing in mind the Hebrew concept of solidarity, it should be noted that this corporate fatherhood did not exclude the idea of individual relationship. Indeed it prepared the idea for its full development in the NT.

Some of the Psalms, which are expressions of individual piety, come close to the more intimate character of God as seen in the NT, but the father-son relationship is not specifically formulated. The idea of God as shepherd (as in Ps 23; Is 40; Ezek 34), while introducing an amazingly tender view of God, falls short of the full acceptance of God as Father. With the advent of Christ these adumbrations of fatherhood emerge into a view of God which shows that the most intimate form of human relationships (parent-children) is but a reflection of the essential characteristic of God (see comment on Eph 3:14, 15 below).

In the Pauline literature the parenthood of God is seen in three ways. He is Father of Jesus, he is Father of the Christians, and he is Father of all creation. It is important to note that the father-child relationship in reference to God is almost wholly reserved for those who are believers. The relationship is the result of the redemptive activity of God. The creative relationship has already been discussed under the providence of God. Our concern here will be the special relationship with believers.

In the opening salutation in all the letters under Paul's name God is described as Father. It forms a basic assumption behind all that the apostle writes in these letters. Moreover, it is frequently reflected in the course of the discussions, whether doctrinal or practical. Indeed there is no one concept of God which dominates the theology of Paul more than this. Yet the maternal aspects of the divine-human relationship are not overlooked, even if they are only implicit in the way Paul describes his pastoral role (Gal 4:19; 1 Thess 2:7) as reflecting God's care (see Pastor, Paul as).

The title "Father" is sometimes qualified to give added richness to the concept. God is many times described as the Father of Jesus Christ, but he is also Father of glory (Eph 1:17), that is, the one whose presence is surrounded by an aura of majesty and might, a numen that both attracts and is mysterious; and "Father of mercies" (2 Cor 1:3), that is, he is known for his compassion, to which Paul appeals, by this use of a phrase drawn from the synagogue liturgy (see Martin 1986, 6-12), to enforce his exhortation to steadfastness under trial (2 Cor 1:4-7). All human fatherhood is said to derive from the fatherhood of God (Eph 3:14-15), which shows that God is not called Father on the basis of a human analogy, as if human fatherhood was the nearest approximation to the relationship between God and humanity. Fatherhood is seen rather to be inherent in the nature of God and in determining all that is highest and holiest in the human relationship of parenthood. Yet this interpretation of Ephesians 3:14-15, while it has support in some ancient authorities like Athanasius and among modern writers such as F. F. Bruce (see the discussion in Lincoln 1990, 201-4), has not gone uncontested; the text may simply mean that God is the Father of all family groupings in heaven and on earth.

But we need to inquire what "fatherhood" means when applied to God. As far as believers are concerned it means that God is the source of their spiritual life and pours his love upon them. God is concerned with their welfare (Rom 8:28) and also with their growth in likeness to his holy, loving character (Eph 5:1; Col 1:12; 1 Thess 2:12; 4:7, 9). For Paul, then, this characterization of God is the criterion and norm of all that we are to understand by the name God. Supremely God is the Father of Jesus, the Son who is loved (Col 1:13; see Son of God). It is the divine purpose to replicate in the lives of Christ's people the image of his Son so that by the Spirit's ministry (2 Cor 3:18) the likeness of his Son is being made increasingly more apparent until at length, at the consummation of their salvation,* they become "conformed to the image" of Christ (Rom 8:29). It may be that in the process they will be called on to experience suffering for Christ (Phil 3:10) in anticipation of the resurrection of the dead (Phil 3:11).

A further observation which is of great importance in any assessment of the Pauline view of God and which distinguishes the NT from any Jewish antecedents is the use of the form Abba by Christians in Paul's congregations (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6), undoubtedly based on Jesus' own use of the term in addressing God (Mk 14:36). This Aramaic form of address ('abbā') to a father was originally a term used by young children as part of nursery speech (though this is debated: see Barr), but it had acquired an extended meaning in familiar usage, roughly equivalent to "my father" or "dear father" (i.e., a caritative form of address). It is a unique form, for it finds no certain parallels either in the OT or in Judaism as an address to God. Its use by Jesus shows how completely his view of God as Father is divorced from any formal approach. The Abba form conveys a sense of intimacy and familiarity which introduced an entirely new factor into an approach to God. And the fact that Paul is able to cite it in its Semitic formulation, which is then rendered loosely into Greek, seems to indicate a liturgical origin for the appellation. It is in converse with God in spoken prayer and in a congregational setting that the term is found (note the corresponding verb is krazein, to cry, in both texts in Paul), and in the two instances given the work and witness of the Holy Spirit* are invoked. The Spirit is the agency by which believers come to this recognition and acclamation of God as one known and approached intimately. It is the mark of the "spirit of sonship/adoption*" that the Spirit places the seal of his witness on believers as sons/children of God, delivering them from nomistic religion with its uncertainty of God and the pagan fearfulness that is, for Paul, akin to slavery (Rom 8:15-16; Gal 4:5-7). Thus the cry Abba becomes for Paul's congregations a point of entry into the experience of a familial relationship to God which is their privilege and inheritance under the new covenant of grace (see Byrne, Scott; see Adoption, Sonship).

2.3. God as King and Judge. Throughout the NT are traces of the idea of God as king. It comes into focus especially in the phrase kingdom* of God or kingdom of heaven. But clearly the idea of kingdom implies a king who exercises his rule over his subjects. There are many OT passages in which God is seen as king, and this furnishes a solid basis for the NT usage. In the contemporary world of NT times, most kings were tyrants, but this idea is nowhere suggested in the NT as applicable to God. Kingship implies sovereignty, which in its proper function carries with it responsibility. This is not to say that the idea of sovereignty is necessarily the major idea of the kingdom. Indeed the kingdom stands also for the entire blessings of salvation. Yet the two ideas are closely linked, since for believers the sovereignty of God has no meaning apart from the salvation which he has effected. The subjects of the kingdom are those who have committed themselves wholly to carrying out the will of the king.

This idea of kingship springs from the creatorship of God. When the early Christians prayed they acknowledged this fact, addressing God as "Sovereign Lord, who made the heaven and the earth and the sea and everything in them" (Acts 4:24). He who creates has a right to direct. Indeed the creature has no right to question the decisions of the creator. Paul recognized this when he used the potter illustration in Romans 9:19-26 (ideas drawn from Isaiah and Jeremiah as understood in Wisdom of Solomon). Sovereignty is therefore seen to be an inherent part of the creative activity of God.

In harmony with idea of kingship is the use of the title Lord* as applied to God, a lexical feature found often in Paul. This is another title which is prevalent in the OT and assumed in the NT. Lordship and sovereignty demand such rigorous standards of allegiance that the announcement of these themes is sufficiently attested in Paul e.g., Philippians 2:11; Romans 14:11-12. God's sole right to worship and homage is not open to question (announced in Is 45:23 which the two Pauline passages just referred to cite). For humans to act in any other way would result in their falling into temptation and consequently dishonoring God. This is the thrust in Paul's argument in Romans 3:1-6 in answer to those who in a diatribe*-like debate reasoned that God is accountable to human reason (see Moxnes).

In the record of Paul's public preaching in the book of Acts and in the letters the idea of the kingdom is less frequent and consequently the concept of God as king is not as prominent. Yet the attestation is there in Acts 28:31, even if it is true that Paul is said chiefly to have preached Christ (Acts 17:18; cf. 1 Cor 1:23; 15:12; 2 Cor 1:19; Phil 1:15-18: see Preaching from Paul). For the early Christians Jesus was seen to be the embodiment of the kingdom. This led to less emphasis on the kingdom itself, but in no sense lessened the conviction that the reign of God had been inaugurated. His kingly function was everywhere assumed rather than expressed.

In his letters there are many indirect indications that the apostle thought of God in terms of sovereignty, that is, under God Christ's kingdom is a present reality (1 Cor 15:25; Col 1:13; Eph 5:5). God is more powerful than the rulers of this age (1 Cor 2:6-8: see Principalities). All the powers of evil (the principalities and powers) are incapable of interfering with God's purposes in Christ (Rom 8:37-39). Indeed they have already been conquered (Col 2:15; see Triumph). The earlier notice (in Col 1:16) that such cosmic powers were created in and by Christ poses a problem, which is most likely resolved by supposing that in the hands of the Colossian philosophers they were venerated in rivalry to Christ (Col 2:8, 18, 20) and so needed to be overcome and "reconciled." Paul sees the final act of history as God subduing his enemies "under his feet" (Rom 16:20, 1 Cor 15:23-28). In the apostle's thought there is little real distinction between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Christ, although Christ at the Parousia will deliver his kingdom to God (1 Cor 15:24) thereby transforming the Regnum Christi to the Regnum Dei. What is central to Paul's thinking in this context is the supreme sovereignty of God over everything (see Martin 1984, 107-25; Kreitzer). The Pastoral Letters contain one statement which clearly brings this aspect to the fore when God is described as "the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords" (1 Tim 6:15).

The concept of king is closely allied to that of judge. For Paul the idea of God as judge was an integral part of his gospel (cf. Rom 2:16). Indeed, there was no doubt in his mind that God would judge the world (Rom 3:6). He speaks positively about "the judgment seat of God" (Rom 14:10; alternately this phrase appears as the judgment seat of Christ in 2 Cor 5:10 with no significant change of meaning; see Roetzel) and uses it as a basis for his verdict on Christians who were judging their fellows. What is not regarded as a legitimate prerogative for human beings—for the reason given in 1 Corinthians 4:3-5—is nevertheless of the essence of the divine nature (see Kuck). It is assumed as right and proper in Paul that the divine king should exercise his prerogative of judgment. There is admittedly a certain element of severity about this aspect of God (Rom 3:5-6, though with the concession made that Paul is speaking in human terms). Paul, who admits the severe side of God, is nevertheless careful to link it with the kindness of God (Rom 11:22). For that reason it is important to see the judgments of God as refracted through the prism of Paul's christology. God will judge the world in righteousness, as a facet of his righteous character. Yet, according to the speech in Acts 17:31, it is a universal judgment made by the standard set in Christ: "by the man whom he (God) has appointed." The effect of this clause is to recall how Paul's entire theology, his doctrine of God, is shaped by the revelation of God's nature and action that came into focus by the coming of Christ.

2.4. Other Titles for God.

2.4.1. Spirit. The entire NT presents the nature and character of God in a number of different titles which express various facets, not found in a formal way, but nonetheless significant. As part of the indictment he levels at the propensity to idolatry* once the knowledge of God is perverted by human sinfulness (Rom 1:21-23), Paul takes it for granted that God is not a human creation or invention. His attitude to idols is not easy to systematize. In 1 Corinthians 8:4 he joins with his Corinthian readers to affirm that "there is no God but one"; hence "an idol has no real existence" (RSV: this is placed in quotation marks to signify it is cited from the Corinthians themselves). The idols are then dubbed "so-called" (1 Cor 8:5), since Paul cannot deny that idol worship does exist. Yet in 1 Corinthians 10:14-22 his tone is more serious, since he grants that there is a malign demonic influence that can infect "food offered to idols" and Christians may be exposed to evil forces (otherwise the warnings in 2 Cor 6:4—7:1 would have no meaning). These powers are to be resisted (1 Cor 10:14) since they are rivals to the true God and yet are powerless to thwart his purpose, however much they seek to try by seducing believers (2 Cor 2:11). The "spiritual" essence of Paul's religion is something he assumes without much argumentation (e.g., Phil 3:3 and his teaching on the church as the dwelling place in God in the Spirit in 1 Cor 3:16; cf. Eph 2:18-21).

2.4.2. Savior. Although the title "Savior"* is occasionally applied to Jesus Christ in the Pauline tradition, it is also used of God and in this respect tallies with a dominant activity of God the Savior in the OT. The main occurrences of the title are in the Pastorals (1 Tim 2:3; Tit 2:10, 13; 3:4). Although the title is relatively rare in Paul, the activity implicit in the title permeates the whole of Paul's soteriology. Indeed, Christian theology centers in the theme of God saving his people and for Paul the power of God is displayed in the saving work initiated by God and executed in Christ (e.g., Gal 4:4-5). One notable treatise (by C. A. A. Scott; see too Morris 1986, 172-75) has placed the essential meaning of Pauline Christianity under the rubric of salvation.

2.4.3. Almighty/Most High. This is a title of supreme dignity which expresses the superiority of God over all other gods. It is used by the slave girl with a python (oracular) spirit in Acts 16:17. Paul and his party at Philippi see this invocation as idolatrous, however, and the demon in the girl is expelled in the name of Jesus Christ. This vignette is an illustration of the way Paul opposed the deities of contemporary religion and superstition by asserting the lordship of Christ, an office and authority given him by God, the only Lord (see Acts 16:31). "Jesus is Lord" is the Christian confession that is made in the light of the resurrection (Rom 10:9: see Creed), which in turn in is, for Paul, the signal proof of the power of God and his approving of his Son's right to rule human lives and cosmic destiny (Phil 2:9-11; Rom 14:9; Eph 1:20-23). The similar title pantocratōr in 2 Corinthians 6:18 moves in the same circle of ideas (see commentaries).

2.4.4. Sovereign. It is similarly the case with this appellation (found in 1 Tim 6:15), with the addition "the King of (all) kings," that is, world ruler and all powerful emperor. Probably this fulsome description is designed to counter the claims of the emerging emperor cult in the Roman empire, where the emperor* was assuming divine honors and sanctioning the erecting of temples in his name.

3. The Attributes of God.

Anyone who seeks an answer to the question "What is the God of Paul's theology like?" will find no formal statements, but a mass of incidental indications, which nevertheless are invaluable in throwing light on many facets of the character of God. There is nothing to suggest that there were differences of opinion in the Pauline circles about the being of God, even when Paul had occasion to defend his gospel (Phil 1:8, 16) and to offer a counterattack on those whom he reproved as teachers who perverted his teaching (Gal 1:6-7; see Opponents) and introduced an "alien gospel" (2 Cor 11:13-15; Berger). The closest Paul comes to meet head-on a rival theology is in Colossians, which opposes a bid to reduce his message to a species of Hellenistic philosophy (Col 2:8; see commentaries). Whereas some parts of Paul's theologizing bring certain facets into focus more than other parts, there is no doubt that a unified picture is presented. While it is impossible to arrange the evidence in a systematic form, it will be helpful to group the main ideas under the following considerations—the glory of God, the wisdom of God, the holiness of God, the righteousness of God, the love and grace of God, the goodness of God, the uniqueness of God and the unity of God. Some of the ground has already been covered, but it will be convenient to set the evidence together in this way.

3.1. The Glory of God. There is a strong OT background to the frequent references in Paul to the glory* of God. Whereas the Hebrew word for "glory" (kāḇôḏ) was used of anything which possessed splendor, honor or conspicuousness, it soon came to have a special significance when applied to God. It came in fact to stand for the revelation of God, as when the psalmist maintained that the heavens declare the glory of God (Ps 19:1). OT history is seen as a record of God's revelation of his glory in his activities on behalf of his people. A more developed sense of the same idea is the use of "glory" to denote the presence of God in a theophany, which was later to become known in Jewish theology as the Shekinah (šᵉḵînâ). But it is the translation of the Hebrew kāḇôḏ by the Greek doxa which provides the key for understanding the Pauline ideas of the glory of God (see Newman). We shall note that in the texts there are two senses in which doxa is used, as visible glory (in the sense of seeing the glory of God) and as uttered praise (in the sense of ascribing glory to God).

It is astonishing how frequently the NT writers in general mention the glory and majesty of God. Moreover, men and women are prompted to glorify God. To ascribe glory to God in face of the mysterious working of his power is often spontaneous, yet in Pauline theology the theme is more implicit than fully spelled out. The pattern for measuring human shortcomings is "the glory of God" (Rom 3:23), which implies that sin has made it impossible for humans to be reflectors of God's glory as they should have been, as the way God designed them as part of his image and glory (1 Cor 11:7: see Scroggs). Nevertheless, through the process of justification and renewal Paul sees the possibility of men and women again sharing in God's glory (Rom 5:2; Col 3:10: see commentaries). When describing the glory of Christ, he equates it with the glory shared by Christians (2 Cor 3:18). On one occasion he describes God as the "Father of glory" (Eph 1:17). He includes several doxologies which ascribe glory to God (Rom 16:27; Phil 4 :20; 2 Tim 4:18). All that Christians do must be done to God's glory (cf. Rom 15:7; 2 Cor 4:15; Phil 1:11; 2:11). Moreover, eternal destruction is seen as exclusion from the presence of God and the glory of his might (2 Thess 1:9), which shows that any obscuring of God's glory is the worst possible happening in human experience.

Enough has been said to demonstrate the great importance in Paul's thought of the theme of God's glory as a basic assumption about the nature and character of God. Now we must consider how it bears upon other aspects of God. A vision of his glory cannot fail to promote a reaction of awe. It provides a ready preparation for the view of God's power, which is everywhere assumed in Paul. So glorious a being could never be impotent (cf. Rom 4:21; 11:23; 1 Cor 2:5; 2 Cor 9:8). Indeed the description "the power* of God," when used absolutely, aptly indicates this dynamic aspect of God's character (cf. 2 Cor 6:7; 13:4; 2 Tim 1:8; see Powell).

With so exalted a view of the glory and power of God, it is not surprising that Paul at times alludes to the mysteries* of God (see Caragounis; Harvey). The apostle speaks of "the depths of God" (1 Cor 2:10), which are known only to the Spirit of God. Some have interpreted this reference to the "depths" of God in a gnostic sense (so Wilckens, cited by, but not supported by Conzelmann, 66). Wilckens supposes that "depths" are to be identified with the revealer, but Conzelmann finds this explanation of Paul's words incomprehensible. He contends that Paul is combating this view that humans could plumb the depths of God's being (see also Fee). There is a whole area of knowledge of God which is beyond the finite grasp. God is in a sense incomprehensible, although the Spirit's revelations of him are sufficient for our understanding of his redemptive purposes. There is no question of humans being able to set their own limits on God's nature and attributes. What we know is at most no more than a glimpse of the whole reality. A massive area of mystery must remain (as in the poetic passage, 1 Cor 13:12). Paul can speak of God's servants as "stewards of the mysteries of God" (1 Cor 4:1), which shows that an element of mystery will always attend the proclamation of the gospel. The sense of awe is well brought out by the apostle at the conclusion of Roman 11, where he speaks of the unsearchable character of God's judgments and the inscrutable nature of his ways (verse 33). No one has known the mind of God, as Isaiah 40:13-14, which Paul quotes, so patently implies. The identical thought lies behind the strange report of Paul's own mystical experience in 2 Corinthians 12:1-10, especially in the "journey to heaven" motif (paralleled in rabbinic literature as well as esoteric Judaism) where Paul heard auditions "which cannot be told" (2 Cor 12:3; see commentaries and Lincoln 1979; 1981; see Visions).

3.2. The Wisdom and Knowledge of God. The Jewish wisdom writers often speak of wisdom,* but not so much as an attribute of God as an emanation from God (Wis 7:25). She is described as the brightness of his everlasting light (Wis 7:26). She is created, but created before all things (Sir 1:4, 7-9; 24:14) and is in fact the principle of creation (Sir 24:10-34; 42:21; Wis 7:21; 9:2: see Schnabel). This concept is more relevant to the NT understanding of Christ (see Christology); nevertheless, there is the strong implication that this personification of wisdom proceeds from God and therefore witnesses to an essential attribute of God.

The concept of the wisdom of God is especially prominent in Paul. He contrasts the wisdom of God with human wisdom (1 Cor 1:20) and shows its superiority. Human wisdom is in fact turned to foolishness in the light of God's wisdom. This implies that the latter is the standard by which all other wisdom is gauged. In the same letter Paul speaks of the secret and hidden wisdom of God (1 Cor 2:7), which can nevertheless be imparted. It is clear that Paul identifies the wisdom which can be communicated with what the apostles proclaimed. Since in the same passage he identifies Christ as "our wisdom" (1 Cor 1:30), he is evidently thinking of the wise acts of God in the salvation of the church or more specifically of Christ as the embodiment of divine wisdom in human form. This is regarded in NT thought as the supreme manifestation of wisdom. (On the various ways "wisdom," both good and bad, is used in 1 Corinthians see Barrett 1982, 6-14; cf. Ellis 1978.) Indeed, it is through the church that "the manifold wisdom of God" is made known even to spiritual powers (Eph 3:10). What is important for our present purpose is that God's work for his people is seen to spring from his wisdom. It is no wonder that Paul marvels at the depth of the "wisdom and knowledge of God" (Rom 11:33).

Some distinction has to be drawn between wisdom and knowledge in relation to humans, but this distinction is not so appropriate when applied to God. If wisdom is the right use of knowledge, perfect wisdom presupposes perfect knowledge. The NT writers like Paul never doubt the perfect knowledge of God. This unerring knowledge on the part of God is extended in some statements to include foreknowledge.* The extension is a logical development. Paul insists that in the perfect planning of God to provide a people conformed to the image of God, he knew beforehand those who were to share that image (Rom 8:29). Paul's statement has provoked endless debate because it appears to limit man's free will (see Election). But here it may simply be noted that Paul does not discuss systematically the foreknowledge of God; he takes it for granted. He does not doubt that if God knows the present, he must also know the future as he has known the past. This seems to be an essential part of his total picture of God (cf. Eph 1:5), and seems to have its contextual setting, not in speculative theology but in a pastoral concern to answer the needs of people in first-century society who felt threatened by a sense of purposelessness and powerlessness in the face of astrological determination and the role of impersonal fate (Martin 1991, 14-15).

There are certain deductions from this conviction that God is all-wise and all-knowing. Such perfect understanding means that when God wills, his plans and purposes are all-knowing and can never be in error. Indeed, although there are few specific statements in support of this in NT, it does not seem to be questioned. What God says must be true. He never lies (Rom 3:4; Tit 1:2). The absolute truth of God guarantees the consistency of his wisdom and knowledge. There is no suggestion that he ever modifies his plans in the light of his own progressive experience. This aspect of God, which will be expounded more fully in the discussion on the uniqueness of God (see 3.7), is essential if his acts in history are to have continuing validity.

Paul, like the NT writers generally, is conscious of the controlling character and obligatory nature of the will of God. This acceptance of the ruling character of God's will is frequently found in the letters. Paul begins several letters with the declaration of his apostleship "by the will of God" (1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Eph 1:1; Col 1:1; 2 Tim 1:1). Moreover, his and other people's movements are controlled by God's will (Rom 1:10; 15:32; 1 Cor 16:12, which shows how human decision-making is not ruled out: see Fee, 824). Indeed, even in his approach to those who challenged his change of plans and policies, Paul asserts that God's nature as trustworthy sets the stage for his own dealings with the Corinthians to be treated as reliable (2 Cor 1:15-22, with a word-play on God's fixed nature as the faithful God [with pistos, "faithful," reflecting the Heb root 'mn, as in "Amen," used of God in Deut 7:9 and Is 49:7] and the apostles' declaration of "yes" [Gk nai = Heb 'āmēn] to God's promises validated in Christ whom he proclaimed and certified in the congregational Amen ["it is certain"] at worship; see Martin 1986, 26-27).

He also, at a later point in 2 Corinthians, reverts to this theme and justifies his ministry at Corinth by recalling how he always operated within the limits God imposed on him according to his good will (2 Cor 10:12-18: on this difficult section see Martin 1986, 314-26).

Life for the Christian is life according to God's will even in suffering.* The ever-present problems involved in God's permitting suffering for his people are nowhere discussed. Does this mean that the NT writers like Paul were unaware of the problem? Yet it is hard to think this personal issue ever eluded Paul's notice or that of his congregations (it underlies much of Philippians*). It must be assumed, therefore, that the Christians were convinced about the all-inclusive character of God's wisdom and the perfection of his will. This is bound up with the conviction of God's providential care for his people. If suffering comes, God must have a purpose in it.

Much confusion arises from the fact that it is generally assumed that all suffering should be avoided. The notion that God can use suffering does not come naturally. But the biblical approach to suffering constantly takes it into the sphere of God's purpose. Although it is true that suffering is nowhere explained, there is enough evidence to show what the Christian attitude toward it should be. There is no suggestion that God is less than wise or good because suffering exists. Since the supreme example of suffering lies at the heart of God's redemptive activity in Christ, it cannot be maintained that suffering is alien to the purpose of God. It will always remain a mystery why God chose to redeem humankind the way he did, but this very fact must be taken into account in considering the Pauline view of God.

Arising from the necessity for Christ to suffer comes the problem of suffering for Christians. It is not surprising that in a hostile world Christians will meet with opposition on account of their faith. This is the least problematic aspect of suffering. Paul, in recounting his experiences in 2 Corinthians 4:7—5:10, in no way criticizes God for the hardships he has endured. He sees these hardships as tools in the hand of God. The present momentary affliction is regarded as "slight" (2 Cor 4:17) compared with the weight of glory to follow. Later in the same letter the apostle gives details of his "slight" affliction (cf. 2 Cor 6:4; 11:23—12:10), which consists of a harrowing list of calamities which have been seldom equalled or surpassed and yet he has arrived at a triumphant attitude toward them. There is no hint anywhere in this letter that he resents or questions the wisdom of God in allowing suffering.

Indeed the one place where he does tackle the theodicy question (Why does God allow suffering, when undeserved?) provides Paul the opportunity to bring out the gracious character of God as seen (paradoxically) in the face of human trials. This appears in Philippians 1:19-30. The implicit questions relate to Paul's own imprisonments and prospect of imminent martyrdom and the Philippians share in his trials (Phil 1:7). To those who doubted Paul's authentic apostleship because he was a suffering leader (and in 2 Cor 12:1-10, a failed charismatic who could not heal himself) and to the Philippians who took their suffering as a test of faith Paul responds with a stirring assertion of God's overruling power-in-weakness and uses affliction as a mark of favor (Phil 1:29; see Güttgemanns, Bloomquist). This leads to Romans 5:3, where Paul actually rejoices in suffering because it develops the quality of endurance. In this same context he speaks of God's love being poured out in our hearts. The two things were clearly not incompatible in his mind.

It cannot be said that the writings of Paul answer all the intellectual problems which arise from God's permitting human suffering, but they do enable Christians to face suffering without losing confidence in the perfection of God's wisdom and his loving design to guide and support his people's lives in their times of testing (Rom 8:28-39).

3.3. The Holiness of God. One of the most characteristic qualities of God in the OT is his holiness.* Although people and things and places are described as holy, this is in the sense of being set apart for God. Holiness is essentially an attribute of God. It marks him out as being utterly pure in thought and attitude. In the prophecy of Isaiah "the Holy One" is a characteristic name for God (cf. Is 6). It is this quality of holiness which creates at once a barrier in our approach to God, since we become conscious of our lack of holiness in the presence of God. It is because Israel had a holy God that demands were made upon her people to become a holy people, which they certainly failed to fulfill.

Undoubtedly this conviction that God is holy forms an important element in the Pauline account of salvation. It underlies his argument in 1 Thessalonians 4:3-8 that his readers should steer clear of immoral practices and respond to God's call to "live a holy life" (1 Thess 4:7, NIV). Yet this for Paul is only possible and practicable if we have recourse to God's provision in the gift of the Holy Spirit (1 Thess 4:8), who is the sanctifying agent in redemption* (cf. 2 Thess 2:13). Equally, in 1 Corinthians 6:12-20 the insistence of Paul's stringent advice to "flee from sexual immorality" (1 Cor 6:18) is governed and supported by his reminder that the holy Lord will have a holy people whose bodies are the temple of the Holy Spirit.

3.4. The Righteousness and Justice of God. So far the only moral characteristic of God which has been mentioned is his absolute truthfulness and his holiness. But more needs to be said about the righteousness* of God, for this is basic to the Pauline plan of salvation. In the OT righteousness in God means more than that God always acts in a morally right way. It includes also the fact that God acts on behalf of his people when they are unjustly oppressed. In the NT the apostle Paul is the great exponent of this important characteristic of God. He does not question that God is righteous. He begins his exposition in the letter to the Romans* with the assertion that God's righteousness has been revealed (Rom 1:17). This is reiterated in Romans 3:21, 22.

Exegetes debate whether "the righteousness of God" in these contexts concentrates on what can be imparted rather than what is inherent to God. Is the expression intended to refer to a quality in God or not? The genitive may be taken in three ways: (1) as an objective genitive, in which case the righteousness is that which God grants (so Luther); (2) as a subjective genitive, in which case it refers to that which belongs to God; (3) as a genitive of origin, in which case it is God's righteousness, but proceeds from God to humans. There is a notable reluctance among many recent writers to regard righteousness solely as an attribute of God (see Righteousness, Righteousness of God). Whatever the conclusion, the association of God and righteousness is clear enough. True righteousness comes from God (cf. Rom 10:3; Phil 3:9). In 2 Corinthians 5:21 Paul even states that Christ was made sin "so that in him we might become the righteousness of God"—an unusual expression, which may indicate a taking over by Paul of an earlier statement (see commentaries). Yet we may concede that 2 Corinthians 5:21 makes sense only if God himself is essentially righteous. Indeed Paul describes the Christian's new nature as "created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness" (Eph 4:24), showing righteousness as an essential constituent in God's image, restored to his people in Christ by the Spirit (2 Cor 3:18).

The concept of God's judging in righteousness involves the idea of God's impartiality. It was difficult for Jews to accept this idea, for they were convinced that Israel was a favored nation, which made it superior to the Gentile peoples in the sight of God. It was this strong bias which threatened to cause real problems when Jews and Gentiles had to mix in the early Christian communities.

Paul had already made a volte-face when he became a Christian. More than any other he wrestled with the problem of God's special concern for the Jewish people, but as a Christian he never doubted that God was impartial and that both Jew and Gentile* must be included in the plan of salvation on an equal footing. On two occasions he asserted as axiomatic that God shows no partiality (Rom 2:11; Gal 2:6), the second of which deals with the apostolic office. The idea definitely excluded any notion of favoritism with God, which would not be in keeping with absolute justice.

An important side to the righteousness and justice of God is his wrath.* There are sufficient instances of emphasis on God's wrath and judgment in the NT and in Paul in particular to make it important to define its meaning. The precise meaning has been subject to debate (see Morris 1960). Indeed of all the aspects of God in the NT this is perhaps the most questioned. Some reduce wrath (orgē) to the effect of human sin, thus getting rid of all notion of anger in God because this is considered to be irrational (Dodd; but see reply in Tasker). But this is an unsatisfactory way of dealing with the NT evidence. In Romans 1:18 the expression "the wrath of God" occurs (cf. Rom 5:9; 12:19; 14:5; cf. also 9:22), and it is impossible in this case to empty the phrase of any relevance to the attributes of God. Paul speaks of a wrath of God which is being revealed (apokalyptetai) in precisely the same way as he had just previously stated that God's righteousness is being revealed (Rom 1:17-18). It is inescapable that Paul intended a connection between the two concepts. It seems most reasonable to suppose that "wrath" is the negative aspect of God's righteousness. It does not express anger in the sense in which it is applied to humans, an uncontrolled outburst of passion (which would certainly be an irrational concept), but it must express the revulsion of absolute holiness toward all that is unholy. This is in harmony with the context where "wrath" is explicitly said to be against (epi) ungodliness and wickedness. The same may be said of Romans 5:9 where salvation is said to be from "the wrath," which may well denote the wrath of God as an expression of God's rejection of all that is sinful (see Enemy).

It is not sufficient to define wrath as the principle of retribution in a moral universe without connecting the principle to its source, the nature of God. Unless we find some place for the moral displeasure of God we shall make light of his judgment, which finds no small place in NT thought. When Paul says in Colossians 3:6 that the wrath of God is coming, he must mean more than that a principle of retribution is approaching. The eschatological aspect is again present in this context and is more explicit than in Romans 1:18 (Martin 1972, 110). Lohse has denied that wrath in Colossians 3:6 indicates an emotion of God, but is God's judgment of wrath (Lohse, 139). Yet God's judgment cannot be wholly detached from his continual reaction against sin. "Wrath" cannot, in short, be received as a term which describes only God's final act of judgment. The expression has more force if the condemnation of the evils mentioned in the previous verse is based on the active opposition of God against them (cf. also Eph 5:6). It should be noted that when the apostle assures the Thessalonians that God has not destined them for wrath (1 Thess 5:9), he is writing to Christians and his words cannot cancel out the statements about God's wrath elsewhere.

3.5. The Love and Grace of God. That God is a God of love* is another assumption Paul makes, though he does not make it lightly, writing (Rom 5:8) that God's love is proved to believers by the death of his Son. The inference is that what was required is a demonstration of what we would not have imagined possible or conceivable without prior revelation of God, namely that God loves undeserving and guilty sinners. It has a firm basis in the OT and Jewish literature, but takes on a sharper focus and a more dominant role in the NT generally.

Hence, the apostle Paul pursued this line of thought. In the letter which most emphasizes the righteousness of God, he can speak with equal certainty about the love of God. God's love has been poured into believers' hearts through the Spirit (Rom 5:5), a vivid way of speaking of the communicating of God's love to humankind. That love is most seen in God's saving work for sinners (Rom 5:8). The consequence for believers is that they will never be separated from that love (Rom 8:39). Love makes them more than conquerors (Rom 8:37). Indeed the love of God is a familiar part of such benedictions as 2 Corinthians 13:13 (14) (cf. also 2 Cor 13:11) and Ephesians 6:23. It comes in Paul's prayers for the Thessalonians (2 Thess 2:16; 3:5). In the latter prayer the love of God is regarded as the aim to which the Christians' minds should be directed ("may the Lord direct your hearts to the love of God").

There are two other aspects of God which are so closely linked to love that they may properly be considered in conjunction with it. First there is the understanding that God is a God of grace.* The whole concept of grace lies at the heart of Paul's soteriology and in that connection we note that "the grace of God" denotes an essential feature of God's love. When applied to God, the word grace denotes the favor of God toward those who do not deserve his favor, and therefore came to be used particularly of God's saving work in Christ. It has become a basic assumption, so much so that it frequently occurs in the opening salutations and in the concluding benedictions of the Pauline letters. God is seen as one who bestows unmerited favor on the objects of his love. God's grace is more than his gracious acts, although it includes these. It involves his nature. His love is of such a quality that it gives unstintingly. Grace is another name for the outgoing character of his love, especially to sinners and to his elect people. Sometimes God's grace becomes almost objectified in the results that it achieves, as when Paul can say that the Macedonians' response to the challenge to Christian giving is a sign of God's grace in human lives (2 Cor 8:1; cf. 2 Cor 8:7 as a summons to the Corinthians to excel in this "grace" of generosity also).

The apostle Paul was deeply convinced of his personal indebtedness to God's grace. He saw his own calling as an act of grace (Gal 1:15). He had no doubt that Christians are saved by God's grace (Rom 3:24; 5:15; cf. Eph 2:5, 7; Tit 2:11). He sees it as a subject for praise (Eph 1:6). He views it as in some way a communicable gift (e.g., 1 Cor 1:4; 3:10; 15:10; 2 Tim 1:9). Living by grace is diametrically opposed to any religious claim depending on human effort (Gal 2:21; Rom 11:6). "Grace" also provided Paul with the assurance that God would work in his apostolic life (1 Cor 15:10-11); indeed the term becomes almost indistinguishable from "strength" needed to fulfill his missionary task (2 Cor 12:9). In spite of the limitations Paul faced he was able to embrace a way of relying more fully on God's power-in-weakness* (2 Cor 12:10; 13:4).

The second aspect of God closely allied to love is the mercy* of God. The root meaning of "mercy" is compassion, hence its close link with love. It is essentially outgoing love marked by persistence and commitment (as in the Heb ḥesed). Mercy is also inseparably linked with grace, but is more specifically connected with righteousness. It is when the righteous judgments of God are considered that his mercy becomes a vivid reality. If he must condemn what is unrighteous because he himself is righteous, he extends mercy to those who would otherwise be condemned because mercy is as much a part of his nature as righteousness. This idea of God's mercy is not unique to the NT. It finds its roots in the OT.

The apostle Paul was deeply aware of the mercy of God (Rom 9:15-16, 18) as part of God's gracious prerogative. He several times speaks, often autobiographically when reflecting on his apostolic calling and mission, of obtaining mercy, which means receiving the results of God's merciful acts (Rom 11:30-32; 1 Cor 7:25; 2 Cor 4:1; 1 Tim 1:16). There is no suggestion that the quality of mercy is alien to God, nor that it conflicts with his essential righteousness. It is part of the apostle's understanding of the total nature of God. Indeed, Paul uses the striking expression "Father of mercies" of God in 2 Corinthians 1:3, which draws attention to his compassionate nature. It echoes Exodus 36:6, Psalm 86:15 and 145:8, which speak of God as merciful and gracious, and is integral to the synagogue's liturgy in its acclamation of God as kind to Israel, especially in forgiving sins and restoring relations (see Col 2:13-15, which suggestively finds its Jewish background in the New Year prayer of supplication for God's mercy to his people).

Paul sometimes uses another word—kindness (chrēstotēs)— when describing the gracious attitude of God. He once links it with the quality of severity (Rom 11:22). It may seem difficult to see how these two facets of God's character can exist in one person, but Paul is not apparently embarrassed by this difficulty. To him both kindness and severity are essential characteristics. He sees God's kindness as intended to lead people to repentance (Rom 2:4), although he recognizes that his Jewish contemporaries have incurred the righteous judgment of God (Rom 2:5). The close connection between God's grace and his kindness is clearly seen in Ephesians 2:7 where God's immeasurable riches of grace are equated with his kindness toward us in Christ. Kindness is therefore practically synonymous with grace. Kindness is further linked with the goodness of God in Titus 3:4, where both are stated to have "appeared" (i.e., in the provisions of salvation by the incarnate presence of Christ).

3.6. The Goodness and Faithfulness of God. There are a few significant statements in the Pauline library which focus on the goodness of God and which deserve separate consideration. The concept of goodness is difficult to define but is nevertheless generally recognized to be closely linked with the moral holiness of God. The Gospels' statement "Only one is good, God," makes clear that the character of God is such that it is itself the standard that should determine all human notions of goodness. Whatever goodness anyone else possesses is derived from him. This is supported by such an OT statement as Psalm 53:1, which is cited by Paul in Romans 3:12, and which affirms that no one is good. Paul uses it to demonstrate human need, but he does not bring out so specifically as Jesus had done the unique goodness of God (Mt 19:17; Mk 10:17; cf. Lk 18:18-19).

Although the faithfulness of God is a different kind of attribute from goodness, it may be linked with the sense that were God faithless to his word he could not be good. Paul was deeply impressed with the faithfulness of God. He is faithful in calling people into fellowship with his Son (1 Cor 1:9) and in guarding them against excessive testing of their faith (1 Cor 10:13) or from the attacks of the evil one (2 Thess 3:3). The faithfulness of God is even cited by Paul as a guarantee of the dependability of his own word (2 Cor 1:18). Moreover, God remains faithful even when others are faithless (2 Tim 2:13). There is a rock-like quality to the apostle's conviction of God's reliability.

We may perhaps include in this section a note about the expression "the God of peace" which is particularly familiar through the concluding salutation in Romans 15:33 and in 1 Thessalonians 5:23. The more widely used form of the idea "peace from (apo) God" occurs in the opening greetings in all Paul's letters. It appears that the quality which God can impart has become an ascription to him. The form "God of peace" is suggestive because it points to the absence of conflict in God and his solicitude for his people's welfare (šālôm). Indeed 1 Corinthians 14:33 brings this out explicitly—"God is not a God of confusion, but of peace." Peace* therefore describes an attitude of God as well as a quality which he imparts. Peace cannot be bestowed "from God" unless it is an integral part of his nature. Humankind in its fallen state is in a perpetual state of enmity and tension until reconciled to God (Rom 5:1-10; cf. Eph 2:1-3, 12). But such a state of tension does not exist in God. There is no suggestion anywhere in NT teaching that God is ever uncertain as to his actions, nor frustrated in his plans. His mind is always in a state of equilibrium. It is no wonder that Paul, in desiring to allay anxiety among Christians, not only exhorts them to commit themselves to God, but also assures them that the peace of God will garrison (phroureō, i.e., act as a sentry or patrol, to guard the city gates against invading attack; see Hawthorne, 184) their hearts and minds (Phil 4:7). In the same passage he assures his reader of the continued presence of the God of peace (Phil 4:9).

3.7. The Uniqueness of God. Included here will be Paul's hints of teaching concerning the invisibility of God. The mystery conveyed in the expression "no one has ever seen God" is fully in accord with the OT conceptions. This invisibility is one of the ways to find a counterpoint in the revelatory character of the mission of Jesus. Paul makes clear that God the creator has made himself known in his works (Rom 1:19), but in saying this he implies that there are also aspects of God which cannot be known. In 1 Timothy 1:17 is included in the somewhat formalized ascription to God his invisibility, which is specifically mentioned only here in the NT.

Closely linked and occurring in the same statement in 1 Timothy 1:17 is the idea of the immortality of God, which occurs also in Romans 1:23. The concept may be indebted more to Hellenistic than Jewish thought. A God who is changeless must be a God who is immortal. Such a God can rightly be described as "eternal" (Rom 16:26).

3.8. The Unity of God. Our purpose here will be to bring together the main NT evidence for the Trinity and then to assess its significance. It must be remembered that although the intertestamental Jews were strongly monotheistic, there are not wanting indications in the OT that God was not regarded as one in the mathematical sense of being unitary (in fact, recent studies have shown how Jewish theology in early Judaism could entertain notions of separate hypostases or personifications within the strict monotheism it cherished and defended; see Segal, Hurtado, Rainbow; more cautiously Dunn, 183-206). Such an expression as "the Lord of hosts" at least implies that God is not alone (cf. 1 Kings 22:19-23; Ps 89:5-8). The armies of heaven or the "sons of God" (as in Job 1:6; 38:7; Ps 29:1; 89:6) show that God has agents. Of greater significance is the frequently mentioned "angel* of Yahweh," who sometimes appears in human form, but is nevertheless recognized as God (cf. Gen 16:7-14; 18:1-22; Ex 3:2- 6). Nevertheless at times the "angel" is distinguished from Yahweh (Ex 33:2, 3). It is certainly significant for the NT teaching about the Trinity, and may have left enigmatic traces in Paul's writing (see Gal 4:14).

An entirely new factor was nevertheless introduced with the emergence of the Christian gospel, which led to a development of the monotheistic approach and ultimately to the doctrine of the Trinity. Of the Trinity there are many adumbrations in the NT, although it cannot be said that the doctrine is explicitly expounded in a formal way. It is significant that none of the NT writers sees the need to speculate about such a doctrine; indeed they seem able to accord divine honors to Jesus without embarrassment (Dunn). They are content to present data which imply the divine nature of both Christ and the Spirit and which naturally give rise to reflections about the unity of God (see Wainwright).

The Pauline evidence may be summarized under three different types of quasi-liturgical passages. First, there are a few passages where trinitarian formulae are used. The passages in view are such as 1 Corinthians 12:3-7; Ephesians 1:3-14; 2:18; 4:4-6; Titus 3:4-6, and are conceivably and suggestively linked with a baptismal and/or initiatory creed.*

Another such passage is 2 Corinthians 13:13 (14), where Paul adds a benediction* involving God, the Lord Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. No distinction is made between them and it is a reasonable assumption that Paul regarded them as coequal persons. (On the debate over the genitive, "fellowship of the Holy Spirit" see commentaries.)

These sections are cast in triadic form. In Ephesians 4:4-6, we read of "one Spirit . . . one Lord . . . one God and Father." The threefold form occurs also in 1 Corinthians 12:3-7, where each Person is introduced with the adjective "same" in the sequence Spirit, Lord and God, as in Ephesians 4. Under this category may be included Ephesians 1:3-14, where the flow of the eulogy is marked by a trinitarian format or a salvation-historical sequence of the plan of redemption from its eternal purpose to its execution in human experience (see Lincoln 1990, 8-44; Martin 1991, 13-20).

The second type consists of passages where the three Persons are mentioned together, but without any clear triadic structure. Samples of such passages are Galatians 4:4-6 ("God has sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts"), Romans 8:1-4; 2 Thessalonians 2:13-14; Titus 3:4-6. The close linking of Father, Son and Spirit in these passages cannot be regarded as accidental.

Third, actions which are normally attributed to God are ascribed to Christ (such as creation: see Col 1:15-20; 1 Cor 8:6) or to the Spirit (e.g., acts of power, e.g., Rom 8:5-11). These add a further dimension to the NT evidence. Although no systematic trinitarian doctrine is stated, Paul furnishes several hints which point in that direction. The problems which confronted later theologians do not seem to have occurred to him, especially as part of his "christological monotheism" or "realigned monotheism" (Dunn, 163) by which he was able to accommodate the risen Lord into his picture of the one God of his Jewish faith, now broadened and deepened to make space for the exalted Lord* who in worship was greeted as on a par with Yahweh and worthy of divine honors and praise (Bauckham). In praise of the living Lord installed as head of the universe and the church Pauline Christians evidently were expected to confess that Jesus could be worshiped alongside (but not in competition with or to the exclusion of) Israel's God. Hence the appellation "God" (theos) for the risen Christ trembles on Paul's lips (Rom 9:5; see Harris).

We have been discussing the adumbrations of the Trinity, but it is under the general heading of the unity of God and some comment must be made concerning this. It must at once be noted that nowhere in the NT is any concern shown over purely speculative ideas about unity. Statements can be found like "the Lord is the Spirit" (2 Cor 3:17) or "our Lord Jesus Christ . . . and God our Father . . . comfort" (sing. verb) in 2 Thessalonians 2:16 or a doxology to Christ as God (Rom 9:5; see commentaries), without any apparent blurring of the distinction between them in the context. Undoubtedly there are deep mysteries in the NT conception of God, but what must strike the thoughtful reader is the complete absence of any attempt to explain the mysteries. Christian convictions were strong enough to maintain the divine nature of both Jesus Christ and the Spirit without falling into the trap of postulating three gods. The conviction that God was active in Christ and in the Spirit prevented this from happening. It may be said that Paul does not work with a conceptual framework which would lead naturally to speculations about the essence of God. In a study of Paul's theology we cannot go further than the evidence we find. Yet the evidence lays foundations for the later developed doctrine. The problems which that later doctrine grappled with had their roots in the NT itself. Although Paul concentrates more on functions than relationships (as Cullmann's writings show), the latter aspect is certainly not lacking.

4. Summary.

Our survey of the Pauline presentation of God has done no more than to erect signposts toward an understanding of what must always retain an air of profound mystery. No outline of names or qualities can present a total picture. But Paul gave abundant indication that what is necessary to know about God can be known. Indeed, this is a basic assumption which colors his entire theological and missionary task (see Gilliland).

Moreover both in the titles and attributes of God found in the NT, there is a remarkable combination of what might at first appear to be opposites. The paradox of the love and wrath of God, his kindness and severity, his mercy and judgment, are examples of apparent antitheses or antinomies which nevertheless are perfectly balanced in the character of God. What in humans would be regarded as real antitheses and unrelieved paradoxes are postulated in God in a way which shows no awareness of any problem.

Another remarkable fact about the evidence is that it includes both transcendent and immanent aspects without any tendency to lay an overemphasis on either. There are no signs, in fact, that the problems which arise from such an overemphasis ever seriously troubled the minds of the early Christians. God is at the same time both majestic and concerned about the human condition. He is never remote, but is at the same time apart from his own creation.

The relevance of a right doctrine of God for an approach to Pauline theology may be illustrated as follows. A God who cares for his creatures is the God who acts to redeem them. A true understanding of the incarnation and therefore of the person of Christ is impossible if a wrong notion of God is maintained (signally at Colossae). Similarly if God were an angry deity who needed to be placated this would naturally color any approach to the doctrine of the mission of Christ. Some indication of the havoc which can be caused within a theology based on wrong assumptions about God can be seen in such issues as the way Paul has been misread as supporting anti-Semitism or (to take a practical yet profound concern) recruited as an ally of the paternalistic-hierarchical structure that demotes and dehumanizes women due to a false deduction regarding male headship.

See also CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; GRACE; HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION; HOLY SPIRIT; IMAGE, IMAGE OF GOD; JUDGMENT; LORD; LOVE; MERCY; POWER; PRE-EXISTENCE; REDEMPTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; SON OF GOD; WISDOM; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

