BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Abelson, The Immanence of God (1912); J. Barr, "Abba Isn't Daddy," JTS 39 (1988) 28-47; idem, " 'Abba, Father' and the Familarity of Jesus' Speech," Theology 91 (1988) 173-79; C. K. Barrett, Essays on Paul (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982); R. Bauckham, "The Worship of Jesus in Apocalyptic Christianity," NTS 27 (1981) 323-31; L. L. Belleville, Reflections of Glory: Paul's Polemical Use of the Moses-Doxa Tradition in 2 Corinthians 3:12-18 (JSNTSup 52; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1991); K. Berger, "Die impliziten Gegner: Zur Methode des Erschliessens von 'Gegner' in NT Texten" in Kirche, FS G. Bornkamm, ed. D. Lührmann and G. Strecker (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr 1980) 373-400; L. G. Bloomquist, The Function of Suffering in Philippians (JSNTSup 78; Sheffield: Academic, 1993); B. Byrne, 'Sons of God'—'Seed of Abraham': A Study of the Idea of the Sonship of God of all Christians against the Jewish Background (AnBib 83; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1979); C. C. Caragounis, The Ephesian Mysterion (Lund: Gleerup, 1977); H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959); C. H. Dodd, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (New York: Harper & Row, 1932); J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); E. E. Ellis, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (Tübingen/Grand Rapids: Mohr/Eerdmans, 1978); G. D. Fee, 1 Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); D. S. Gilliland, Pauline Theology and Mission Practice (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1983); L. E. Goodman, Monotheism (Allanheld, Osmun, 1981); R. M. Grant, Gods and the One God (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); E. Güttgemanns, Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr: Studien zur paulinischen Christologie (FRLANT 90; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966); M. J. Harris, Jesus as God: The NT Use of Theos in Reference to Jesus (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992); A. E. Harvey, "The Use of Mystery Language in the Bible," JTS 81 (1980); G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture (New Haven: Yale University, 1989); G. S. Hendry, "Reveal, Revelation" in A Theological Word Book of the Bible, ed. A. Richardson (London: SCM, 1950); L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monothesim (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); L. J. Kreitzer, Jesus and God in Paul's Eschatology (JSNTS 19; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); D. W. Kuck, Judgment and Community Conflict (NovTSup 66; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42: Dallas: Word, 1990); idem, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); idem, "Paul the Visionary: The Setting and Significance of the Rapture to Paradise in 2 Corinthians 12:1-10," NTS 25 (1979) 204-20; E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); R. P. Martin, Colossians: The Church's Lord and the Christian's Liberty (Exeter: Paternoster, 1972); idem, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); idem, Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon (Int; Louisville: John Knox, 1991); idem, The Spirit and the Congregation: Studies in 1 Corinthians 12—15 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); L. Morris, "The Apostle and his God," in God Who Is Rich in Mercy, ed. P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson (Homebush West, NSW: Anzea, 1986) 165-78; idem, The Biblical Doctrine of Judgement (London: Tyndale, 1960); H. Moxnes, Theology in Conflict: Studies in Paul's Understanding of God in Romans (NovTSup; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1980); C. Newman, Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); C. H. Powell, The Biblical Concept of Power (London: Epworth 1963); P. Rainbow, "Jewish Monotheism as the Matrix for New Testament Christology," NovT 33 (1991) 78- 91; C. J. Roetzel, Judgement in the Community: A Study of the Relationship between Eschatology and Ecclesiology in Paul (NovTSup; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); E. J. Schnabel, Law and Wisdom from Ben Sira to Paul (WUNT 2.16 Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1985); C. A. A. Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul (Cambridge: University Press, 1927); J. M. Scott, Adoption as Sons of God: An Exegetical Investigation into the Background of ΥΙΟΘΕΣΙΑ in the Corpus Paulinum (WUNT 2.48; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992); R. Scroggs, The Last Adam (Oxford: Blackwell, 1966); A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert (New Haven: Yale, 1990); idem, Two Powers in Heaven (SJLA 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1978); R. V. G. Tasker, Biblical Doctrine of the Wrath of God (London: Tyndale, 1951); A. W. Wainwright, The Trinity in the New Testament (London: SPCK, 1962); U. Wilckens, Weisheit und Torheit (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1956); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); idem, "One God, One Lord, One People," Ex Auditu 7 (1991) 46-48; idem, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

D. Guthrie and R. P. Martin

GOD OF THIS AGE. See SATAN, DEVIL.

GODS. See IDOLATRY; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

GOODNESS OF GOD. See GOD.

GOSPEL

The Greek word euangelion, frequently translated "gospel," means "glad tidings," or "good news," and in Pauline usage it refers to the message of God's* saving work in Jesus Christ.* Of the seventy-six instances of "gospel" in the NT, sixty are found in the Pauline corpus (forty-eight in the undisputed letters). There are twenty-one occurrences of the verb euangelizomai, "to announce good news" in the Pauline corpus (nineteen in the undisputed letters); two occurrences of the noun euangelistēs, "evangelist" (Eph 4:11; 2 Tim 4:5); and a single occurrence of proeuangelizomai, "to announce good news ahead of time" (Gal 3:8). Euangelion is for Paul the classic expression of the grace* of God, responded to by faith.* Occasionally Paul speaks of "my gospel," but over twenty times he uses gospel without any qualifier. This strongly suggests that his readers were already familiar with the term.

1. The Gospel and Paul
2. The Gospel of God and of Christ
3. The Gospel's Past, Present and Future Tenses
4. The Gospel, Grace and Faith

1. The Gospel and Paul.

Since euangelion is found in all the traditional Pauline letters except Titus, it should be considered a central feature of the apostle's theological vocabulary. And since the largest portion of occurrences in the NT belong to Paul, some scholars have argued that "it was Paul who established euangelion in the vocabulary of the N.T." (Becker, 110). G. Strecker and others have argued that it was Hellenistic usage that influenced Paul, particularly the Hellenistic ruler or Roman emperor* cult, where the noun euangelion was used (with the emperor as sōtēr, "savior") for the announcement of "salvation" associated with the emperor's rule (Strecker, 71; Friedrich, 725). But this derivation is by no means clear, and arguments have been mounted to show that Paul may have derived the term from the early church, particularly through the Hellenists, who may have translated the Palestinian church's supposed use of the Hebrew bᵉśōrâ ("message of victory/salvation") into the Greek euangelion (see Stuhlmacher).

It appears that Isaiah 40—66, with its theme of the good news of the coming reassertion of God's kingly rule (cf. euangelizomai in LXX Is 40:9; 52:7; 60:6; 61:1), had some shaping influence on Paul's use of euangelion (though the noun euangelion does not appear in Isaiah). Isaiah 52:7 may have been particularly influential (Beker, 116), since Paul quotes from it (perhaps with Nah 2:1) in Romans 10:15, and its theme of peace may be echoed in Ephesians 2:13-18 (Stuhlmacher). Evidence for the significance of Isaiah 52:7 in at least one strand of apocalyptic* Judaism comes from 11QMelch 2:15-16, where the verse is part of a pastiche of proof texts, several of them from Isaiah 40—66. These texts are set forth as testimonies to the year of God's favor and of the eschatological restoration* of Israel (cf. Pss. Sol. 11:1; 1QH 18:14). The influence of the Isaianic euangelion on Jesus (cf. Lk 4:43; Mt 11:5) and the Gospel tradition is also evident (see Broyles) and may have had a shaping influence on Paul insofar as it was a part of the tradition he inherited (see Jesus, Sayings of).

Much discussion has surrounded Paul's infrequent but intriguing references to "my gospel" (Rom 2:16; 16:25; 2 Tim 2:8), including its possible relationship to the origin and nature of the overall NT understanding of euangelion. Certainly the phraseology "my gospel" can be construed as speaking of content that has been decisively shaped by Paul. But that is by no means the only possible understanding, especially given the pattern emerging from the rest of the Pauline usage of euangelion.

Paul also speaks of "the gospel of God" (e.g., Rom 1:1; 15:16), "the gospel of his Son" (Rom 1:9), "the gospel of Christ" (Rom 15:19; also see below) or simply "the gospel" (without further description). Some of these usages even occur in the general context of the relatively infrequent expression "my gospel" (e.g., Rom 16:25; cf. Rom 15:16, 19 and 2 Tim 2:8; cf. 2 Tim 1:8, 10). Paul can also speak of "our gospel" in 1 Thessalonians 1:5 and 2 Thessalonians 2:14, though we must here consider the fact that Paul shares with Silas and Timothy (cf. 2 Cor 1:19) the prescript of both of these letters (cf. 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1) and that these coworkers* shared with Paul the gospel ministry* that gave birth to the church in Thessalonica* (cf. Acts 17:1-15).

The opposition Paul faced at Galatia* led him to state that the distinctive nature of his euangelion was derived from divine revelation (Gal 1:11-12; cf. 1 Tim 1:11). The integrity of this gospel (Gal 2:5, 14) was to be protected from the subtle and deadly distortion that Paul labeled "a different gospel—which is not really another" (Gal 1:6-7; see Opponents). Whatever authority* or credentials a "Judaizer"* might claim, even if it was that of an angel* from heaven (Gal 1:8), that "gospel" was to be rejected if it differed from the gospel Paul had preached to the Galatians. The criterion was not the person nor credentials but the nature of the gospel itself (which Paul can also refer to as "the faith*" in Gal 1:23).

Paul speaks of his divine revelation (see Conversion and Call) in terms reminiscent of the calling and commissioning of a prophet of Israel. God had set him apart from his birth (Gal 1:15; cf. Jer 1:5), called him, revealed his Son* to him (Gal 1:16; cf. 1:12) in a heavenly vision* (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8; cf. Acts 9:1-19; 22:3-16; 26:12-18) and sent him on a mission* to proclaim the gospel (euangelizomai) to the Gentiles* (Gal 1:16; cf. Is 6:8; Jer 1:7; Ezek 2:3). This self-identity is related to Paul's allusion to himself as a herald of the eschatological "good news" of peace* (Rom 10:13-15; cf. Is 52:7; Nah 1:15; see Apostle).

Whatever else might be said about the content or coherent structure (see Becker) of Paul's gospel, it is clear that the eschatological* work of God in Christ* is at its center and that it conveys benefits to Gentiles (see Center). Research into Paul has suggested that the logic of his gospel was a natural outworking of his Damascus Road experience (see Kim). In the struggle at Galatia for a Law*-free gospel, in which Gentiles were to be accepted in Christ apart from Jewish rituals and identity markers (see Works of the Law), Paul was quick to point out the unusual means by which his gospel had come to him and to accent its distinctive features (see Longenecker, 22-25). But Paul could also speak of having "received" certain traditions* from those who preceded him in the faith (e.g., 1 Cor 11:23-26; 15:3-11), and there is evidence that he adopted and incorporated early Christian confessions into his letters (see Creeds). These traditions must have been compatible with the christological and soteriological essence of the gospel that was revealed to him.

Elsewhere Paul felt free to forge a "partnership (koinōnia) in the gospel" (Phil 1:5; see Fellowship) with the Philippian church (which may have included monetary assistance for Paul's gospel ministry, cf. koinōnia in Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 8:4; 9:13; see Financial Support). And if he was passionate for the truth* of the gospel at Galatia, it is also noteworthy that the passages in which Paul's usage of euangelion is most heavily clustered are among the most passionate and personal in the Pauline corpus (e.g., 1 Cor 9; Phil 1; 1 Thess 2). Indeed, P. T. O'Brien notes Paul's use of euangelion in several of his initial prayers* of thanksgiving (Rom 1:9; Phil 1:5; Col 1:6; 1 Thess 1:5-6; see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology, Thanksgiving). There Paul observes that the outworking of faith, love* and hope* in believers is evidence that the gospel has carried out its powerful work in the midst of the church at Thessalonica (1 Thess 1:3-5).

2. The Gospel of God and of Christ.

The Pauline letters contain seven references to "the gospel of God" and ten to "the gospel of Christ" (or "his Son, the Lord Jesus"). In three contexts mention of "the gospel of God" (Rom 1:1; 15:16; 1 Thess 2:9) is followed closely by "the gospel of Christ" (Rom 1:9; 15:19; 1 Thess 3:2). However, that order is reversed in 2 Corinthians 10:14; 11:7. The Corinthian correspondence contains five instances of "the gospel of Christ" and only one of "the gospel of God" (2 Cor 11:7). On the other hand, 1 Thessalonians includes "the gospel of God" three times and "the gospel of Christ" just once (1 Thess 3:2). There is no clear pattern of Pauline usage of these phrases.

Also at issue is whether the construction "gospel of God" or "gospel of Christ" should be taken as objective or subjective genitive. If taken as an objective genitive, God and Christ are the content of the gospel message ("the gospel about God/Christ"). If viewed as subjective, the nuance of authorship or source is emphasized (e.g., "the gospel from God/Christ").

For example, the context in which "the gospel of God" appears in Romans 1:1 makes it slightly more likely that the focus is on the gospel's origin (subjective genitive). Perhaps "the gospel of his Son" in Romans 1:9 is best viewed as specifying the content of Paul's preaching (objective genitive). However, as in virtually every occurrence of these phrases in Paul, the genitive makes good sense if it is read either way. Sometimes the context appears to underline the objective aspect, sometimes the subjective, and sometimes either is equally possible. Ultimately, it is true to Pauline theology to say that God in Christ is both the source and the content of the gospel. But a priority seems to be placed on "Christ" (Gal 1:16 [euangelizomai]; 2 Cor 1:19; 4:5; Phil 1:15-18), or "Christ crucified" (1 Cor 1:23; cf. Gal 3:1; see Cross, Theology of the), as a summary of the content of the gospel Paul preached. Thus "preaching the gospel" and "preaching Christ" seem to be interchangeable (1 Cor 1:17 and 1:23; 1 Cor 15:1, 11 and 15:12; 2 Cor 4:3 and 4:4). In fact, for Paul the "message of the cross" (1 Cor 1:17-

18) or "the message of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5:19) seem also to be interchangeable with "the gospel."

3. The Gospel's Past, Present and Future Tenses.
The gospel message is the divinely powerful instrumentality through which God's salvation* and righteousness* are presently revealed (Rom 1:16-17). In this sense it is akin to the biblical notion that God's word is powerful and effective (see Power). This may contribute to explaining why, particularly in Paul's thanksgivings for his churches, euangelion is in some degree synonymous with martyrion ("witness"*), logos ("word") and ho logos tou theou ("the word of God"; see O'Brien). Paul can use euangelion in a manner that suggests its activity, whether in coming (1 Thess 1:5), confirming (1 Cor 1:6) or bearing fruit and increasing (Col 1:6).

But the past and future aspects of the gospel message are also considered by Paul to be critically important. The historical events proclaimed in the gospel necessarily laid its foundation, providing trustworthy roots (1 Cor 15:1-20). But the gospel cannot be severed from the eventualities of the future: Paul speaks of the day when the thoughts of everyone will be judged by the all-knowing God "in accordance with my gospel" (kata to euangelion mou, Rom 2:16). This may mean that Paul's gospel is the basis for his statement regarding the coming judgment* or that his gospel will be the criterion for the judgment. But on a positive note, Paul can speak of the "hope" which is the content of the gospel (Col 1:23), and of the gospel bringing to light the promise of "life* and immortality*" (2 Tim 1:10 NIV). While the benefits of this gospel begin in the here and now of receiving the gospel, they are also the believer's eternal destiny.

The past tense of the gospel also looks back beyond the "good news" of Christ's redemptive death* and resurrection* (1 Cor 15:1-4), even to his "epiphany" as savior* (2 Tim 1:10), perhaps a reference to his incarnation (as in 1 Tim 3:16). Paul can speak of the gospel as having been "promised beforehand (proepēngeilato) through [God's] prophets in the Holy Scriptures" (Rom 1:2 NIV). The apostle specifically asserts that the Scripture (Genesis 12:3) "preached the gospel beforehand" (Gal 3:8 NASB; proeuēngelisato). Thus the blessing God extended to Abraham* (Gen 12:3; Gal 3:14), as well as the promises made through the OT prophets (Rom 1:1-4), are somehow included in the rich substrata of the preaching* of the gospel of Christ, God's Son (Rom 1:9). The most likely explanation of these Pauline references to the "gospel" before Christ is linked to God's plan for the future worldwide spread of the gospel before the end comes (cf. panta ta ethnē in Mt 28:19; also Lk 24:47).

Thus it is quite plausible that Paul's focus on the phrase panta ta ethnē ("all nations") in Galatians 3:8, borrowed from Genesis 12:3, while serving as a corrective to the Judaizers' understanding of how Gentiles were to be included in the blessing of Abraham (the necessity of circumcision), is related to Paul's understanding of the anticipated global impact of the gospel. This theme appears again at the end of Romans in the yoking of "my gospel" and the "preaching of Jesus Christ" (Rom 16:25; kerygma Iēsou Christou) together with "the Scripture of the prophets" and "all the nations" (Rom 16:26 NASB; panta ta ethnē). Whether this concluding doxology of Romans is authentically Paul's or not (Rom 16:25-27; see e.g., Dunn, 912-17), it ably summarizes the central focus of Paul's gospel: the divine plan for the salvation of humankind in Christ.

4. The Gospel, Grace and Faith.
The apostle makes it abundantly clear that to alter the gospel message in any way is to desert the God "who called you by the grace of Christ" (Gal 1:6 NIV; cf. 2 Cor 11:4 for the intrusion of a "different gospel"). At least ten other passages in the Pauline literature also find "gospel" and "grace"* employed in the same immediate context, strongly implying that the only salvific channel of divine grace is the pure "truth of the gospel" (Gal 2:5, 14). In fact, the relationship between "gospel" and "grace" is so far-reaching and enduring that Paul tells the church at Corinth that their generosity is related to their "confession of the gospel of Christ" (2 Cor 9:13 NIV) and is an expression of "the surpassing grace (hyperballousan charin) of God" that has been given to them (2 Cor 9:14).

Even as Paul labored unceasingly to safeguard "the truth of the gospel" (Gal 2:5, 14) of "the grace of Christ" (Gal 1:6), he also strove to clarify beyond misunderstanding the appropriate response to the gospel: faith in Jesus Christ, without any diluting mixture of works of the Law (Gal 2:16; see Works of the Law). The "good news" of God's undeserved favor is available, according to Paul, to "everyone who believes" (Rom 1:16), whether Jew or Gentile. God has chosen them for salvation through sanctification (see Holiness, Sanctification) by the Holy Spirit* and "faith in the truth" (pistei alētheias, 2 Thess 2:13), and thus those who are called through the gospel gain the glory* of the Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess 2:14).

See also AUTHORITY; CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; GRACE; JESUS AND PAUL; LAW; PREACHING, KERYGMA; TRADITION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. Barth, God, Grace, and Gospel (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1959); U. Becker, "Gospel,"

NIDNTT 2.110-15; J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. C. Broyles, "Gospel (Good News)," DJG 282-86; C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936); idem, Gospel and Law (New York: Columbia University Press, 1951); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (2 vols.; WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Gospel in the Theology of Paul," in To Advance the Gospel (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 149-61; G. Friedrich, "εὐαγγέλιον κτλ," TDNT II.707-37; L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) 2.110-17; S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); P. T. O'Brien, "The Importance of the Gospel in Philippians," in God Who Is Rich in Mercy, ed. P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson (Homebush West, Australia: Lancer, 1986) 213-33; idem, "Thanksgiving and the Gospel in Paul," NTS 21 (1974-75) 144-55; E. F. Scott, The Gospel and Its Tributaries (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1928); R. H. Strachan, "The Gospel in the New Testament," IB 7.21-28; G. Strecker, "εὐαγγέλιον," EDNT 2.70-74; P. Stuhlmacher, Das paulinischen Evangelium (FRLANT 95; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968); idem, "The Pauline Gospel," in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. P. Stuhlmacher (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991) 149-72; H. G. Wood, "Didache, Kerygma and Euangelion," in New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Manchester: Manchester University, 1959) 306-14.

A. B. Luter, Jr.

GOVERNMENT.

See CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; CIVIL AUTHORITY; POLITICAL SYSTEMS.

GRACE

Nearly two-thirds (100 of 154) of the NT occurrences of charis, normally translated "grace," are found in the Pauline letters. The term is found in all thirteen of the traditional Pauline letters, and is heavily clustered in Romans* (twenty-three times) and the Corinthian* letters (eighteen times in 2 Cor; ten times in 1 Cor). In Pauline usage the word charis carries the basic sense of "favor" (cf. Heb ḥēn, "favor," and ḥeseḏ, "loving kindness," in the OT; see Esser, Conzelmann), and when God* or Christ* is its subject, acting in grace toward humankind, it is undeserved favor. This is especially apparent in contexts referring to salvation* or gifts of the Spirit* (where the kindred term charisma overlaps with charis). Paul employs charis as his customary epistolary salutation, but even in that context it appears to carry a theological connotation. With human subjects charis sometimes refers to thanksgiving (to God), to a collection* or offering (recalling divine grace), or to gracious or encouraging speech directed toward others.

1. The Grace of God and Christ
2. The Grace of Salvation
3. Gifts of Grace
4. Greetings of Grace

1. The Grace of God and Christ.

The Pauline corpus includes numerous mentions of "the grace of God" (or "his grace") and "the grace of Christ" (or its lengthened version, "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ"). The last phrase adorns the conclusion of over half of the Pauline letters (e.g., Rom 16:20; 1 Cor 16:23; 2 Cor 13:13[14]), perhaps signaling a climactic summary in linking charis to the full divine-messianic title "the Lord Jesus Christ." In 2 Thessalonians 1:12 the expression "the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ" (NIV) indicates the inseparable bond between the charis of God and Christ.

F. Fisher goes so far as to assert that Paul understands charis as "God acting in accordance with his own character and being" (Fisher, 86), and that "grace" means not merely a divine attribute or attitude but "God himself" (Fisher, 86). Whether or not Paul intended such an identification, a close correlation between God and his grace may be observed in the extended and rhythmic "blessing" (see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology, Thanksgiving) of Ephesians 1:3-14. There we read that appreciation of "the riches of his grace" in Christ (Eph 1:7) should result in praise of "the glory of his grace" (Eph 1:6). This "praise" apparently entails a "blessing" (Gk eulogētos) of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" who has greatly "blessed" (Gk eulogēsas) believers in Christ (Eph 1:3). Essentially, to offer praise to his glorious grace is to praise God. A number of passages employ charis to express the human response of overwhelming gratefulness translated into thanksgiving to God (e.g., 1 Cor 15:57). Occasionally it is the mention of divine grace in the immediately preceding context that prompts the grateful articulation of human charis (thanks) to God (e.g., Rom 6:14, 15, 17; 2 Cor 9: 14, 15). Colossians 3:16 states the ideal, that a song of "gratitude" (NIV; "thankfulness" NASB; Gk en chariti) to God should undergird whatever the Colossians* "do in word or deed" (Col 3:17 NASB). The astounding reality of divine charis demands an awed response of human charis to God.

2. The Grace of Salvation.

The Pauline message of grace is neatly summed up in Ephesians 2:5: "by grace you have been saved." Conzelmann is surely right when he concludes, "In Paul charis is a central concept that most clearly expresses his understanding of the salvation event" (Conzelmann, 393). But for Paul, grace is not a previously undisclosed attitude or characteristic of God, as if he had previously been known only as a wrathful deity. Grace speaks of the "wholly generous act of God" (Dunn, 202; cf. Bultmann, 288-90), which reflects the wholly generous nature of God.

For Paul the grace of God encompasses a broad arena, reaching back to the grace of God's pretemporal electing purpose (Eph 1:3-6; see Election), including his choice of a Jewish remnant (Rom 11:5-6; see Israel). It embraces the actual offer of the gospel* message, which Paul can refer to as charis in place of (2 Cor 4:15), or interchangeably with (Col 1:5-6), the term euangelion ("gospel*"). But fundamentally, grace refers to a pivotal event, God's eschatological deed in Jesus Christ (so Bultmann, 289), as it is experienced in the present gift (dōrea/dōrean) of eschatological justification,* which comes by divine grace and is appropriated by faith* (Rom 3:24; 4:4-5, 16). Believers continue to experience this grace in the ongoing work of sanctification in their lives (Rom 5:2, 21; 6:1, 14, 15).

Paul himself found a unique personal experience of divine grace in the midst of the weakness* of prolonged suffering* with his "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor 12:9). Here, as elsewhere in Paul, grace is used synonymously with, or in place of, divine power* (dynamis; cf. Rom 5:20-21), and in certain cases seems to be used as a correlative of God's Spirit* (cf. Rom 6:14 and Gal 5:18; see Bultmann, 290-91; Dunn, 203).

A salvation so gracious from beginning to end might be misconstrued as encouraging the continuance of sin in the Christian's life (Rom 6:1), a notion the apostle denounces in the most vigorous terms (Gk mē genoito, "By no means!"): those who have died to sin cannot go on living in it (Rom 6:2). Exactly the opposite is true: while works of the Law (Gal 2:16; see Works of the Law) have no part in justification, which is solely of grace (Eph 2:8-9), good works are to be the very centerpiece of the life of gratitude, which is to characterize those who have been saved by God's grace (Eph 2:10). The charis of God manifested in salvation* (Tit 2:11) has the further effect of training (Gk paideuō) believers in a disciplined, godly lifestyle as they await the appearing of their great God and Savior* Jesus Christ (Tit 2:12-13). Their gratefulness for the divine charis should motivate a response of zeal* for good works (Tit 2:14).

In writing to the Corinthians, Paul can appeal to the grace of God given to the Macedonian churches which, despite their poverty, had been moved by grace to pour out their offerings to the Jerusalem saints (2 Cor 8:1-4). The Corinthians, who had also received the grace of God in their spiritual gifts (their charismata seem to be implied in 2 Cor 8:1) and come to know the supreme model of grace in their Lord Jesus Christ (2 Cor 8:9), are called upon to respond in kind (en tautē tē chariti, "in this grace," 2 Cor 8:7). They are to make good on an earlier pledge to come to the aid of the church in Jerusalem in its time of need (1 Cor 16:3; see Collection).

3. Gifts of Grace.

For the most part, the Pauline literature develops the concept of spiritual gifts around the closely related idea of charisma, meaning "a personal endowment with grace," always concrete in its expression (Esser, 121; see Gifts of the Spirit). Occasionally, though, charis is also used, probably to emphasize the source of divine grace providing and empowering the gifts.

In Romans 12:6 charis is found alongside charisma to highlight the undeservedness of the diverse spiritual gifts God has provided (Rom 12:6-8). This sense of being "graced" by the various charismata (Rom 12:6) was apparently intended to promote the unity of the body of Christ (Rom 12:4-5; see Body of Christ). Following a somewhat different appeal to "the unity of the Spirit" (Eph 4:3) and body (Eph 4:4-6), charis and dōrea, another word for "gift," introduce (Eph 4:7) the most selective and distinctive of the Pauline passages dealing with spiritual gifts (Eph 4:7-11).

Frequently Paul refers to his own spiritual gift of apostleship (see Apostle) and related functions in connection with the "grace" involved in that calling. Against the backdrop of controversy in Galatia, Paul speaks of "the grace" that has been given to him (Gal 2:9). Elsewhere he uses the same language to refer to his grace-given apostolic role as a priest or liturgical officiant serving the gospel in order that the offering of the Gentiles* might be acceptable (Rom 15:15-16). Or he can speak of himself as a master-builder (1 Cor 3:10), as a vehicle of God's revelation (Eph 3:2) and as a servant* and preacher of the gospel to the Gentiles (Eph 3:7-8).

4. Greetings of Grace.

Without fail, the Pauline letters all contain charis as an initial salutation and part of the normally formal epistolary prologue (see Letters). Again, without exception, they all have charis as part of their concluding benediction (e.g., Rom 16:20: "The grace of our Lord Jesus be with you"). Such consistent usage has been studied by T. Y. Mullins and others as an element of NT epistolary style. In adopting charis as part of his salutation, Paul seems to have been substituting a word rich in theological significance for the customary Hellenistic greeting, chairein ("greetings").

The twenty-six instances of this usage are statistically significant enough to be discussed merely as a stylistic feature, but there would appear to be more to it than style. A clue to the significance of this feature may be found in comparing the use of charis in the introductions and in the conclusions: While all the letters yoke "grace" and "peace"* (e.g., Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3) in their introductions (although 1 Tim 1:2 and 2 Tim 1:2 insert "mercy" between "grace" and "peace"), only "grace" recurs in the conclusions. This may be simply a feature of Pauline style, but it may also represent a broad inclusio structure. The consistent use of the definite article, "the grace," in the conclusions (Gk hē charis) may also point toward this intention on Paul's part. At the very least, in keeping with a keynote of Pauline theology (see above), the Pauline letters all begin and end by sounding a note of grace. It is not unlikely that the apostle intended all of his writings to be viewed within the all-encompassing framework of divine grace, from beginning to end.

Moreover, within the evangelistic context of Colossians 4:6, Paul cautions that the word of the gospel must always be presented sensitively and graciously (Gk en chariti). In Ephesians 4:29 we read that verbal communication between Christians is to focus on edification (Gk oikodomē) and needs, especially by purposefully aiming to "give grace" (i.e., spiritual benefit) to those who hear the words. In both cases, such loving concern may be understood as a reflection of divine grace.

See also BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING; COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; FORGIVENESS; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; HOLY SPIRIT; MERCY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, The Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955) 1.288-92; H. Conzelmann, "χάρις κτλ," TDNT IX.393-98; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975) 202-5; H.-H. Esser, "Grace," NIDNTT 2.115-24; F. Fisher, Paul and His Teachings (Nashville: Broadman, 1974) 85-102; W. Manson, "Grace in the NT," in The Doctrine of Grace, ed. W. T. Whitley (London: SCM, 1932); C. L. Mitton, "Grace," IDB 2.464-67; J. Moffatt, Grace in the NT (New York: Long and Smith, 1932); T. Y. Mullins, "Greeting as a NT Form," JBL 87 (1968) 418-26; C. R. Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Grace (London: Epworth, 1956); G. P. Wetter, Charis (Leipzig: Brandstetter, 1913); R. Winkler, "Die Gnade im Neuen Testament," ZSTh 10 (1933) 642-80.

A. B. Luter, Jr.

GRECO-ROMAN RELIGIONS. See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

GREEK RELIGION. See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; HELLENISM.

GUILT. See SIN, GUILT.

H

HALAKAH. See JEW, PAUL THE; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

HARDENING. See ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION; ISRAEL; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

HARDSHIPS. See AFFLICTIONS, TRIALS, HARDSHIPS; SUFFERING.

HATRED. See ENEMY, ENMITY, HATRED.

HEAD

Paul used the term kephalē ("head") in ways that demonstrate a variety of meanings, sometimes blending both literal and figurative values in a single passage. In some texts he suggests more than one meaning for the word. "Head" is for him in the first place a literal member of the body (1 Cor 12:21), but the meaning of the term when applied to man in relation to woman, or to Christ,* has been extensively debated (see Man and Woman). Paul's use of kephalē must be understood against the background of its use in ancient Greek.

1. Paul's Understanding of Kephalē
2. The Classical View of Head as Source
3. Headship in the Household
4. Headship in the Trinity

1. Paul's Understanding of Kephalē.

Homer and successive generations of writers used the term head as a metonymy for the entire person, especially where matters of military census or taxation were concerned. The head was also a synecdoche for the individual upon whom judgment, curses or misfortunes could devolve, a sense we find in Romans 12:20. On occasion, kephalē was a synonym for life itself. From Homeric times onward, "head" was employed to refer to a person who had special significance to the speaker, usually one for whom the speaker had deep affection and commitment. Whatever other sense Paul may have attached to the word, this value must always be considered to be present when he refers to Christ as head (see Head, Christ as).

The ancients recognized the head as the most prominent and conspicuous bodily member, by virtue of its uppermost position. This, R. Cervin maintains, is the basic Pauline sense. Paul speaks of the preeminence of Christ as head (Col 1:18) and declares Christ was given to be head over all things to the church,* his body (Eph 1:22; see Body of Christ). Philo, the apostle's Jewish contemporary, noted, however, that the head was interdependent with all of the other body parts (Philo Fug. 110; 112; Aet. Mund. 29; Spec. Leg. III.184; Sacr. 115), a notion also reflected in 1 Corinthians 12:21.

Kephalē became a word used both for an objective or goal to be reached and for its fulfillment, culmination or full fruition. Philo declared, "The head [kephalē] of all actions is their goal [telos]" (Philo Sacr. 115). Paul adopts this sense when he writes of growing up in all things into Christ, who is the head (Eph 4:15), and of believers as being made complete in him who is their head (Col 2:11). Kephalē could also indicate the sum total of anything, so that Paul uses the verb anakephalaiō to imply the summation of the Law* (Rom 13:9) and of "all things" (Eph 1:10).

2. The Classical View of Head as Source.

Plato and Aristotle, among others, maintained that sperm was formed in the brain. The Pythagoreans in particular considered the head to be the source of human generation. They refrained from eating any part of an animal or fish head lest the creature be a reincarnated ancestor and the head the very organ from which they themselves had derived. By the time of Plato, adherents of Orphic religion were using kephalē with archē ("source" or "beginning"; Kern Orph. Fr. 2.nos. 21 a.2., 168; Plato Leg. IV.715E and sch; Proclus In Tim. II 95.48. (V.322); Pseudo-Aristides World 7; Eusebius Praep. Ev. 3.9; Deveni Papyrus col. 13, line 12; Stobaeus Ecl. 1.23; Plutarch Def. Orac. 436D; Achilles Tatius, fr. 81.29), as did the translators of the LXX version of Isaiah 9:14-15.

W. Grudem views archē as conveying the sense of

"rule or dominion" when used synonymously with kephalē, but this concept did not find wide acceptance among the ancients. Irenaeus equates head with "source" when he writes of the "head and source of his own being" (kephalēn men kai archēn tēs idias ousias; PG 7.496. See also Tertullian Marc. 5.8). Hippolytus emphasized the productivity of this bodily member when he designated the head as the characteristic substance from which all people were made (PG 16.iii.3138). Philo declared, "As though the head of a living creature, Esau is the progenitor of all these members" (Philo Congr. 61). Kephalē was considered by Photius to be a synonym for procreator or progenitor (Photius Comm. 1 Cor 11:3. ed. Staab 567.1). The concept of head (kephalē) as "source," "beginning" or "point of departure" is readily apparent in the Pauline corpus. Kephalē is used in apposition to archē in Colossians 1:18. (As an aside, one should recall that the head is the part of the body which is usually born first, a feature that may shed light on Christ as the firstborn* of the dead, and the firstborn of all creation* [Col 1:15, 18].)

While there was debate as to whether the head, breast or stomach was the dwelling place of mind and soul, philosophers viewed the head as the organ from which there issued forth that which was important or distinctive of humans—most notably speech. The head resembled a spring, from which power flowed forth to other bodily organs (Philo Fug. 182; Aristotle Prob. 10 867a). It was placed nearest to the heavens, drawing from thence its power and distributing the life force to every member of the body (Philo Det. Pot. Ins. 85; Praem. Poen. 125). This concept of the head as source of supply to the whole body is well attested among medical writers and is twice echoed by Paul (Eph 4:15-16; Col 2:19). In Colossians 2:10 Christ is presented as the head ("source") of the originative power and ability needed for the believer's fulfillment as he himself embodies the fullness* of the Godhead (see Head, Christ as).

3. Headship in the Household.

In 1 Corinthians 11:3 kephalē appears to have the sense of "ground of being" or antecedent source. The Son* proceeds forth from the Father and is himself the primal cause of all creation, including every human being. Woman found her origin in man, in an interdependency which now brought forth man from woman. The notion of man as the source of woman is twice repeated in the following verses (1 Cor 11:8, 12). The covered head of the woman not only indicated commitment to her husband but also respected the Jewish obligation for a man to divorce a woman who appeared in the street with head uncovered (m. Ketub. 7:6). Observance of this custom was particularly important in a house church which met next door to the synagogue (Acts 18:7), where "messengers" (angeloi) might carry back a report of unsuitable behavior or attire (1 Cor 11:10). In 1 Corinthians 11:16, however, Paul indicates that the church has no such universal custom, and a woman has the right of choice (1 Cor 11:10, exousia; cf. 1 Cor 7:37; 8:9; 9:4, 5, 12); but it is mandatory for her to respect the sensibilities of others.

The punishment of the "head" of the household* for the misdemeanors of his family, in the early-Christian Shepherd of Hermas (Similitudes 7.3) is representative of the prevailing legal structure. According to Roman patria potestas, the oldest living male (paterfamilias)—whether father, grandfather or great-grandfather—controlled all the other members of the family, regardless of age or political importance. Only the paterfamilias was recognized as a full person in the eyes of Roman law and society. As such, he held the power of life and death over other family members and assumed accountability for their behavior. They in turn could not even possess property in their own right, nor were they free to make their own choices in matters of religion. By certain legal procedures it was possible for a younger male to disengage himself from this system, but it was frequently a painful step because of religious and social pressures.

In legal terminology, to have "head" (caput) was to be an integral part of one's legitimate family. If a person was adopted into another family, that individual lost "head." In Christ, believers were offered a new head along with their new family, with Christ as head. Paul calls upon his churches to free themselves from familial bondage and to assume moral responsibility for their own behavior, and to establish new households with Christ as head (1 Cor 11:3; Eph 5:31).

Marriages* within the Empire were ordinarily arranged so that the wife remained legally and religiously part of her father's family. Her relatives might with impunity remove her from the marriage and contract another more favorable alliance, even against her will. This system wrought marital instability that Paul countered with a call for men and women to be bound together as one flesh,* head and body, and both as members of Christ's body (Eph 5:30-31; 1 Cor 11:11-12). If a Roman woman was formally attached to her husband's family rather than her own, her legal position became that of a daughter with respect to her own husband. In the transfer to his family, she was said to have forfeited "head" (capitis deminutio; Cicero Topica III 18. Gaius Institutes I.162). In an era when a woman was legally required to have a "head," Paul called upon the woman to join herself in an attitude of both accountability and commitment (hypotassō, "to submit to," "identify with" or "assimilate to") to a husband, freed of repressive family hierarchy and responsive to Christ as head.

After stressing the mutuality of submission (Eph 5:21), Paul, in Ephesians 5:23, calls the husband head of the wife "as Christ is head of the church, himself Savior* of the body." The extended passage stresses the concern of Christ, the bridegroom, for the full development of his bride, the church; and husbands are called to a similar concern. As Christ the head brought growth and empowerment to the body of believers (Eph 4:15; Col 2:10), so the husband should be the enabler of the wife for personal growth and empowerment in a society that afforded her few opportunities.

4. Headship in the Trinity.

By the Byzantine era kephalē had acquired the sense of "chief" or "master." Although the English head and Hebrew rō'š can have such a meaning, this was rarely true of the Greek kephalē in NT times. B. Mickelsen and A. Mickelsen have demonstrated that, with rare exceptions, translators of the Septuagint chose words other than kephalē to render the Hebrew rō'š when the term implied authority or power. The contemporary desire to find in 1 Corinthians 11:3 a basis for the subordination of the Son to the Father has ancient roots. In response to such subordinationism, church fathers argued vehemently that for Paul head had meant "source." Athanasius (Syn. Armin. 26.3.35; Anathema 26. Migne PG 26, 740B), Cyril of Alexandria (De Recte Fide ad Pulch. 2.3, 268; De Recte Fide ad Arcadiam 1.1.5.5(2). 63.), Basil (PG 30.80.23.), Theodore of Mopsuestia (Eccl. Theol. 1.11.2-3;2.7.1) and even Eusebius (Eccl. Theol. 1.11.2-3; 2.7.1.) were quick to recognize the danger of an interpretation of 1 Corinthians 11:3 which could place Christ in a subordinate position relative to the Father. In view of Scripture ascribing coequality of Christ with the Father (Jn 1:1-3; 10:30; 14:9, 11; 16:15; 17:11, 21), John Chrysostom declared that only a heretic would understand Paul's use of "head" to mean "chief" or "authority over." Rather one should understand the term as implying "absolute oneness and cause and primal source" (PG 61.214, 216; see Christology).

See also CHRISTOLOGY; FIRSTBORN; HEAD, CHRIST AS; MAN AND WOMAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Bedale, "The Meaning of Kephalē in the Pauline Epistles," JTS 5 (1954) 211-15; R. S. Cervin, "Does Kephalē Mean 'Source' or 'Authority' in Greek Literature? A Rebuttal," TJ 10 NS (1989) 85-112; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Another Look at ΚΕΦΑΛΗ in I Corinthians 11.3," NTS 35 (1989) 503-11; W. A. Grudem, "Does Kephalē Mean 'Source' or 'Authority over' in Greek Literature? A Survey of 2,336 Examples," TJ 6 (1985) 38-59; C. C. Kroeger, "The Classical Concept of Head as 'Source' " Appendix 3, in G. G. Hull, Equal to Serve (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1987); A. Mickelsen and B. Mickelsen, "The 'Head' of the Epistles," CT (February, 20 1981); idem, "What Does Kephalē Mean in the New Testament?" in Women, Authority and the Bible, ed. A. Mickelsen (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1986). C. C. Kroeger

HEAD, CHRIST AS

A particularly significant use of "head" (kephalē) in the Pauline letters is in Colossians* and Ephesians* where Christ is designated as "head"* (kephalē) in relationship to the church* as "body."*

1. Head and Body
2. Head as Christological Metaphor

1. Head and Body.

In 1 Corinthians 12:12-31 Paul employs an extensive body metaphor and identifies the Corinthian congregation(s) as the "body of Christ" (1 Cor 12:27). Various anatomical parts, "members," are listed (foot, hand, ear, eye, head, feet), with some of these "mouthing" divisive statements. The head utters one such declaration to the feet: "I do not need you" (1 Cor 12:21). The passage represents Paul's bid to demonstrate the absurdity of attitudes of either inferiority or supremacy on the part of church "members" who have been endowed with a variety of gifts. In the setting of 1 Corinthians 12 the "head" is one body part among others and is not assigned a place of preeminence.

When "head" is taken up again in relationship to the body metaphor in Colossians and Ephesians, it is employed differently. In these two letters Christ is identified as "head" in relationship to the body (Col 1:18; 2:19; Eph 1:22; 4:15; 5:23).

Colossians 1:18 states of Christ, "He himself is the head of the body, the church." This phrase, part of a longer hymn (Col 1:15-20), may represent a revision by Paul of an earlier hymn* which identified Christ as "head" of the cosmic body (see commentaries). Colossians 2:19 once again employs "head" in relation to the body metaphor in describing erring teachers (either actual or rhetorical) as "not holding to the head, from whom [the antecedent of the pronoun is 'Christ'] the whole body, nourished and joined by its ligaments and sinews, grows with a God-given growth."

In Ephesians it is said that God has made Christ

"head over all things for the church, which is his body" (Eph 1:22-23) and that believers are to "grow up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ, from whom the whole body, joined and knit together by every ligament with which it is equipped, as each part is working properly, promotes the body's growth in building itself up in love" (Eph 4:15-16 NRSV). Christ is also identified as "head" in the context of both body and bridal imagery, where the husband as "head" of the wife is compared to Christ as "head" in his relationship to the church, "the body of which he is Savior*" (Eph 5:23).

2. Head as Christological Metaphor.

A central question in regard to the use of "head" in Colossians and Ephesians is: Should "head" be understood as a submetaphor of the "body" metaphor? That is, should "head" be viewed anatomically as part of the body or understood as a separated, if related, metaphor?

While it is frequently assumed that "head" in the Colossian and Ephesian letters refers to "head" as an anatomical part, an opposing view has been gaining ground in recent discussion. This view depends on the notation that "head" is used with Christ as referent and not as a part of the body metaphor (Col 2:10 cf. 1 Cor 11:3), and that the phrase "all the body" in Colossians 2:19 and Ephesians 4:16 specifically excludes imagining a headless body. In this view "head" and "body" are two separate metaphors which are related to one another. Such a view may be pressed with regard to other passages in Ephesians. In Ephesians 1:22, 23 it is as "head of all things" rather than as anatomical head of a specific body that Christ is given to the church. And mention of Christ's "feet" (drawn from Ps 8:6) helps to affirm that "head" should not be taken here in the sense of an anatomical part. In Ephesians 5:21-33 both Christ and husbands are called "head." The passage is not suggesting that the ecclesial body, apart from Christ, lacks a head any more than it is stating that wives apart from their husbands are incomplete persons.

How should the designation of Christ as "head" in Colossians and Ephesians be accounted for? Challenges to Christ's uniqueness in the setting of the letter to the Colossians explain the initial designation of Christ as "head." When the theme is picked up in the closely related document, the letter to the Ephesians, it is used in service of that letter's ecclesiology with its understanding of the church not as a local congregation but as the church universal. Coordinated with advanced views of the unity and ministry of this universal body (Eph 4:1-16), the term "head" becomes a useful way to designate the relationship of Christ to this expansive ecclesial body.

A final comment touches on the nature of metaphor as metaphor. A modern theory of metaphor appreciates metaphor as a useful cognitive vehicle and respects profound or poetic metaphor as incapable of complete paraphrase. When, in the Pauline letters, Christ is designated as "head," it is not as "mere metaphor" but as an important means to communicate the uniqueness and importance of Christ. In other words, the headship metaphor is more christologically* oriented than a part of Paul's ecclesiology.

See also BODY OF CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; CHURCH; HEAD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Best, One Body in Christ (London: SPCK, 1955); E. Clowney, "Interpreting the Biblical Models of the Church: A Hermeneutical Deepening of Ecclesiology," in Biblical Interpretation and the Church: Text and Context, ed. D. A. Carson (Exeter: Paternoster, 1984) 64-109; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Body of Christ in Paul," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church: Essays in Honor of Ralph P. Martin, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (JSNTSup 87; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 146-62; G. Howard, "The Head/Body Metaphors of Ephesians," NTS 20 (1974) 350-56; A. Perriman, " 'His body, which is the church . . .': Coming to Terms with Metaphor," EvQ 62 (1990) 123-42; G. Yorke, The Church as the Body of Christ in the Pauline Corpus: A Re-Examination (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991).

J. K. McVay

HEAD COVERINGS. See MAN AND WOMAN.

HEALING, ILLNESS

The apostle* Paul considers weakness,* sickness and other afflictions as part of the fallen natural order (2 Cor 4:17), as part of his suffering* as a servant* of Christ* (2 Cor 11:23—12:10), as a motivator in preaching the gospel* (Gal 4:13-14) as well as a messenger from Satan* (2 Cor 12:7). Also, sickness is portrayed as God's* judgment* or chastening occasioned by sin* (1 Cor 11:27-32), though Paul never applies this interpretation to his own sickness or suffering. The mention of Luke the beloved physician (Col 4:14) shows Paul's favorable attitude to the medical profession (cf. Sir 38:1-15).

1. Illness As Judgment.

In 1 Corinthians 11:30 Paul attributes "weakness" (astheneia), "sickness" (arrōstos, in the NT, Mt 14:14 par. Mk 6:5, 13; [16:18]; 1 Cor 11:30) and even death (koimaō, "falling asleep," cf. 1 Cor 7:39; see Life and Death) among the Corinthian* Christians as God's judgment over abuse of the Lord's Supper (see Lord's Supper).

Paul does not have in mind any magical effect of the bread and the cup, nor does he indicate that demonic powers (see Demons) are involved in the sickness, even though the alternative to drinking the cup of the Lord is to drink the cup of demons (1 Cor 10:21). Rather, in a passage where he plays on the root of the word judge (krin-), the failure to discern (diakrinō) the body and blood of the Lord* brings divine judgment (krinō). The divisive and greedy behavior of the Corinthians (1 Cor 11:18-19) amounts to a disregard of the meaning of the crucifixion.* Thus, when the Corinthians meet together they do not eat the Lord's Supper, proclaiming the benefits of his death (1 Cor 11:20, 26). Instead, they proclaim themselves guilty and condemned (cf. Heb 10:29). The purpose of the judgment in sickness is seen to be disciplinary correction so that believers will not end up being condemned (katakrinō) along with the world* (cf. Heb 12:9-11).

It cannot be maintained that Paul considers all sickness and death to be related to the abuse of the Lord's Supper. However, Romans 1:18-32 and 1 Corinthians 10:1-14 may indicate that Paul held to a general principle that sickness was sometimes caused by sin.

2. Illness As a Messenger from Satan.

In 2 Corinthians 12:7 Paul says that in order to keep him from being too elated by the abundance of revelations (see Visions), a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan, was given him to batter him.

The nature of this thorn (skolops) has been much debated. As early as Chrysostom (On Second Corinthians 26.2) the view was propounded that the thorn is to be understood as the persecution Paul experienced, including that from his enemies at Corinth. For, the thorn is characterized as an "messenger" or "angel" (angelos, 2 Cor 12:7) of Satan, implying a person or group (cf. Satan as "angel of light," 2 Cor 11:14), and "to batter" (kolaphizō, 2 Cor 12:7) is a personal activity. Further, the context of the passage is Paul's struggle with his opponents* (2 Cor 10—13) and Numbers 33:55 (LXX) uses the image of a thorn for the enemies of the Israelites. However, on the other hand, the thorn may have been given to Paul near the time of his visions and revelations when he had yet to confront his opponents. Also, the reference to a messenger or angel of Satan does not seem like a reference to a group of opponents, and in 2 Corinthians 11:14-15 his opponents are Satan in disguise as his servants (diakonoi) rather than his messengers.

A view from the Middle Ages is that the thorn is every kind of temptation (cf. Calvin Commentary), or sexual temptation in particular. But this does not accord with the list of hardships and weaknesses (see Affliction, Trials, Hardships) in 2 Corinthians 11:23-29 and 12:10, and it requires too narrow a view of "flesh."* Also, 1 Corinthians 7:7 implies that Paul did not struggle with sexual temptation (see Sexuality).

The majority of interpreters, from Tertullian onward (Pud. 13), take the thorn to be some form of physical illness. In favor of this view is the metaphor of a thorn, the connection in ancient times between demonic manifestations and physical illness, and the structure of the 2 Corinthians 12:7-10 passage imitating the narratives of a healing miracle.

Due to the scarcity of data, some scholars do not attempt a diagnosis of the illness. Others have suggested epilepsy (as a result of Paul's conversion experience; see Conversion and Call), hysteria, migraine, depression, severe sciatica, rheumatism, poor hearing, leprosy, stammering and solar retinitis (an inflammation of the retina caused by the blinding light at his conversion). Lightfoot used Galatians 4:13, 14 (see 3 below) to interpret the meaning of the thorn as an ophthalmic complaint. Ramsay's view, that Paul contracted recurring malarial fever in Pamphilia, is often accepted since it takes account of the thorn as being a physical disorder, one that is felt continually or often as battering (2 Cor 12:7, kolaphizē, present tense), and humiliating while not stopping Paul's rigorous mission work.

In so far as Paul intended the thorn in the flesh to denote a physical ailment (with sarx, "flesh," taken to refer to the physical body; see Flesh), he expresses a number of his views on illness and healing in this passage. First, the illness humbled Paul, preventing him from becoming conceited. Second, this illness is a messenger from Satan causing pain and humiliation. Yet, third, the use of the passive edothē ("was given," 2 Cor 12:7) is a veiled allusion to the illness being given by God. Paul resolves this paradox by saying that the Lord's grace* is shown to be sufficient for him even though his three requests for the thorn to leave him were not answered as he expected. Thus, fourth, Paul does not view illness as something the Lord always heals, though remaining weakness makes the power of Christ more evident in his life to the point of Paul boasting in his weaknesses* (2 Cor 12:9-10).

3. Illness As Weakness Yet Opportunity.

In Galatians 4:13 Paul makes a direct reference to a bodily weakness or illness (astheneian tēs sarkos) that he suffered. If this passage is taken as closely resembling

2 Corinthians 12:7, it is not unnatural to suppose the allusion is to the same illness (see 2. above). Others, noting that "flesh" (sarx) is the only word common to both passages, treat them separately.

Paul's saying that the Galatians* would have plucked out their eyes and given them to him, and the postscript in his own hand being in large letters (Gal 6:11), has led to the suggestion that Paul's eyesight was bad. But, as ancient belief held the eyes to be the most delicate and costly human organ (Deut 32:10; Ps 17:8; Barn. 19.9) and that gouging out eyes was an act of self-sacrifice (1 Sam 11:2), notably as a demonstration of friendship (Lucian On Friendship 40-41), Paul is probably saying no more than that the Galatians were prepared to give their eyes as we would say we were prepared to give our "right arm" for a friend.

That Paul's condition was a temptation on the part of the Galatians (humōn, "your," rather than mou, "my," has the greater textual support) to despise or neglect Paul has been thought to mean that for them his illness was likely to be interpreted as demon possession. But, as the context suggests, the Galatians were tempted to reject Paul because his illness was in contrast to the miracles he performed (cf. Gal 3:5). While Paul's illness may not have been severe enough to be listed in the catalog of his trials in 2 Corinthians 11:24-27, it initially caused Paul to preach* to the Galatians, and they received him as Christ (Gal 4:14). Thus, even illness becomes an opportunity to preach the gospel.

4. Healing.

Paul does not adopt a triumphalist attitude to illness and healing, though he is convinced that nothing can separate a person from the love* of God (Rom 8:35-39) and that one of the expressions of the presence of the Holy Spirit* is the gift of healing.

4.1. The Gifts of Healings. The only place Paul refers directly to the healing of illness is when he mentions gifts, or "charismata of healings" (charismata iamatōn), in his lists of gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor 12:9, 28, 30; see Gifts of the Spirit).

Having introduced the theme of charismata ("gifts," 1 Cor 12:4), and saying that to each one is given an expression of the Spirit's presence, he repeats the word charismata (plural) when mentioning healing and says that an individual person (allos, singular) receives gifts of healings (plural, cf. 1 Cor 12:28, 30). Paul may be emphasizing that a person does not inherently possess power* to heal but is given charisma for specific and different occasions of healing. As we do not hear of full-time healers from Paul, and the gift of healing is mentioned only in the context of gifts for the local community of believers, Paul probably does not envisage itinerant healers.

4.2. Paul As Healer. Paul gives few direct references to being a healer (cf. Gal 3:5). However, the traditional phrase he uses to describe his work, "signs and wonders" (sēmeia kai terata, Rom 15:18-19; 2 Cor 12:12; cf. 2 Thess 2:9), would have been understood to include healings (cf., e.g., Jn 4:48; Acts 2:22; 5:12). In recalling the miracles of the exodus (cf. Ex 7:3; Deut 6:22; 7:19; 26:8) and associating "power" (dynamis) with his "signs and wonders" Paul emphasizes that God is the author of his healings. From Paul's perspective these signs and wonders, along with his message, are Christ working through him, and they identify him as an apostle as well as help to win obedience from the Gentiles.*

4.3. Healing the Demonized. In the undisputed Pauline letters demons* are only mentioned in 1 Corinthians 10:20-21 (cf. 1 Tim 4:1) as the gods (see Religions; Idolatry) pagans worship.* Unlike his contemporary Greeks (see Hellenism), Paul did not even attribute the troubles of 2 Corinthians 11:24-27 to demons or evil spirits. Only in 2 Corinthians 12:7 (see 2 above) is it likely that he directly attributed sickness to the demonic. It is in his notion of principalities and powers that much of what Paul thought about evil spiritual beings is contained.

Paul may be expected to include exorcism as one of the charismata ("gifts"). The charisma of "workings of powers" (energēmata dynameōn, 1 Cor 12:10) could mean the acts of power driving out demons. However, these charismata are all for the benefit of the body (1 Cor 12:7; see Body of Christ). As Paul sees all people in relation to either Satan or Christ (2 Cor 6:14-15; cf. Gal 5:16-26), and the Christian has passed from Satan to Christ (Col 1:13), it would be inconceivable for exorcism to appear in Paul's lists of charismata. Nevertheless, Luke's portrait of Paul shows him to be involved in exorcism (see 4.4. below).

4.4. Acts. In Acts 14:8-18 a man lame from birth was healed when Paul noticed that as a result of hearing him speak the man had faith or trust to be healed. In Acts 16:16-18 a girl with a spirit of divination (pneuma pythōna) is annoying Paul and is said to be healed by him when he orders the spirit to come out of her. According to Acts 19:11-12, God did extraordinary miracles through handkerchiefs or aprons being carried away from Paul's body to the sick, and diseases left them and evil spirits came out. In Acts 20:7-12 Paul raises Eutychus from the dead by bending over him and embracing him. Paul himself is healed from a deadly snakebite, according to Acts 28:1-6. Paul is also reported to have laid hands on, and successfully prayed for, the father of Publius, the chief man of Malta, who lay sick with fever and dysentery so that "the rest of the people on the island who had diseases also came and were cured" (Acts 28:9). Thus, Luke confirms that Paul's activity as a healer is integral to his missionary work.

See also AFFLICTIONS, TRIALS, HARDSHIPS; DEMONS AND EXORCISM; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; SATAN, DEVIL; SIGNS AND WONDERS; SUFFERING; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE; WEAKNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. M. Alexander, "St. Paul's Infirmity," ExpT 15 (1904) 469-73; 545-48; H. D. Betz, "Eine Christus-Aretologie bei Paulus (2 Cor 12, 7-10)," ZTK 66 (1969) 288-305; V. P. Furnish, II Corinthians (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984); J. Jervell, "The Signs of an Apostle," in The Unknown Paul (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984) chap 5; R. H. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (London: Macmillan, 1881); T. Y. Mullins, "Paul's Thorn in the Flesh," JBL 76(1957) 299-303; R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC; Waco: Word, 1986); S. M. Praeder, "Miracle Worker and Missionary: Paul in the Acts of the Apostles," in SBL 1983 Seminar Papers, ed. K. H. Richards (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983) 107-29; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1908) 94-97; G. H. Twelftree, Christ Triumphant: Exorcism Then and Now (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1985).

G. H. Twelftree

HEART. See PSYCHOLOGY.

HEAVEN, HEAVENLIES, PARADISE

Paul's understanding of heaven and related themes must be placed within the wider context of his total eschatology (see esp. Lincoln 1981). As with other NT writers, Paul reveals a debt to, as well as a development of, both the OT and apocryphal and pseudepigraphical Jewish works, some knowledge of which is essential for an understanding of Paul's thinking.

1. Background
2. Heaven
3. Things Above
4. Third Heaven, Paradise
5. Heavenlies

1. Background.

Basic to OT understanding is the duality of heaven and earth which together make up the material creation, an idea retained throughout Scripture, culminating in the promise of a new heaven and a new earth (see Creation and New Creation). This physical demarcation pointed toward a spiritual distinction: earth as the dwelling place of humankind, the heavens as the place where God* dwells (see World, Cosmology). The idea of a third "realm," Sheol, was introduced as the place of the departed, a shadowy realm where knowledge of and fellowship with God was not possible. As the thought of vindication for the righteous beyond the grave arose, culminating in the hope of personal resurrection,* so also Sheol was divided, the righteous waiting for final salvation in a form of paradise.

The word paradise (Gk paradeisos) was almost certainly a Persian word taken into both Hebrew and Greek, originally referring to a park or garden. It is used only three times in the OT (Song 4:13; Neh 2:8 and Eccles 2:5), but is found forty-seven times in the LXX, notably as a term for the garden of Eden. This paradisal bliss became a model for a hidden paradise, the immediate resting place of the righteous dead (1 Enoch 60:8; 61:12), but also of an ultimate resting place (2 Enoch 8—9; 2 Bar. 51:3).

Alongside the present/future dichotomy was an earth/heaven duality in which paradise was sometimes located on earth (1 Enoch 32:3-6; 77:3) and sometimes in heaven (1 Enoch 60:8; 61:12; 70:3). These ideas are brought together in 2 Enoch 8. Alongside these developments went another in which the number of "heavens" proliferated; sometimes there were three, or five, or seven or even ten; 2 Enoch 8:1 and Apocalypse of Moses 37:5 locate paradise in the third heaven.

This brief and much simplified account of a complex and often confusing and inconsistent development of ideas puts Paul's thinking into context.

2. Heaven.

Paul uses the word ouranos twenty-one times, twelve of these in the singular and nine in the plural. It is frequently assumed that the plural uses reflect the Hebrew šāmayim, but it is possible that, as in the LXX, where the frequency of the plural increases in the later writings, this is due to the influence of the notion of several heavens (see, e.g., Turner). However, there appears to be no discernible pattern in Paul's usage of singular and plural. He uses the word as:

(1) Part of a description of the universe as the heavens and the earth (1 Cor 8:5; Eph 1:10; 3:15; Col 1:16)

(2) The abode of angels* (Gal 1:8)

(3) The dwelling place of Christ* from which he came down (Eph 4:9; Rom 10:6), to which he returned (Eph 4:10), where he now is (Eph 6:9; Col 4:1; cf. Rom 8:34) and from whence he will return (Phil 3:20; 1 Thess 1:10; 4:16; 2 Thess 1:7)

(4) The eternal home of the believer (2 Cor 5:1, 2; Phil 3:20; cf. Gal 4:26), where the hoped-for salvation* is being kept (Col 1:5)

3. Things Above.
This brief survey demonstrates that heaven was not for Paul a merely future reality; it denotes a spiritual sphere coexisting with the material world of space and time; it is where the exalted Christ now is, seated at God's right hand (see Exaltation and Enthronement). Not only that; the believer is united with Christ, is "in Christ,"* and as such belongs already to the company of heaven (Phil 3:20) and can be thought of as being seated with Christ in the heavenly realms (Eph 2:6). Even now the believer's life is "hidden with Christ in God," and "the things above" should be the focus of the believer's attention and should provide the orientation and goal of the Christian's life here and now. Believers live now in this world as citizens* of heaven, seeking increasingly to become what they are in Christ; and as their gaze is fixed on Christ above the life of heaven becomes an increasing reality as they are "being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory*" (2 Cor 3:18). It is similar thinking which lies behind the expression "the Jerusalem* which is above" in Galatians 4:26. Ever since Christ was exalted, he has become the focal point of salvation, in whom is found all the fullness* of salvation once centered upon the earthly Jerusalem. The heavenly realm of Christ's rule is the new city of God of which the believer is a citizen.

It is this fact, of which the Holy Spirit* is the pledge and guarantee (2 Cor 5:5), that enables Paul to face weakness* and suffering* in the present, and even to face the awesome reality of death; for when the present "earthly tent" is taken down, the believer has "a building from God, an eternal house in heaven" (2 Cor 5:1; see Body). Here Paul is thinking not so much of corporate citizenship as he is of personal transformation, as in 1 Corinthians 15:35-57 (but see, e.g., Ellis for a corporate interpretation), and also seems to raise the difficult and much discussed question of an intermediate* state. The latter may be a bodiless experience after death, sometimes understood as "sleep" but more likely as real fellowship* with Christ, preceding the reception of the final resurrection* body (cf. Phil 1:23). However, "naked" in 2 Corinthians 5:3 can be understood differently, for example, as referring to appearing before God outside of Christ. Paul's concern might not be with bodiless existence after death, but rather with a desire to be transformed at the Parousia rather than pass through the experience of death, or even with a polemic against a realized eschatology that thought the resurrection state was a present experience and reality (see Martin, ad loc.; see Eschatology).

4. Third Heaven, Paradise.
Part of the difficulty is precisely that for Paul heaven is not only a future reality; there is a vertical as well as a horizontal dimension to his eschatological understanding. Fellowship with the exalted Christ, citizenship in heaven and eternal life are present realities to such an extent that the border between earthly and heavenly can be crossed even now. In 2 Corinthians 12:1-5, albeit with the greatest reluctance (the third-person narration emphasizes his desire to distance himself from what he describes), Paul recounts an experience in which he was caught up to the third heaven, to paradise. How much of his contemporaries' thinking Paul accepted is not clear, but here his language undoubtedly reflects some of their ideas about the various heavens as outlined above (e.g., T. Levi 2—5), and the two modes of heavenly journey in their writings—"in the spirit" or bodily (e.g., 1 Enoch for the former, T. Abr. 8:3B for the latter). Clearly Paul enters the very throne room of God; he goes into the presence of Christ and receives a revelation so sacred or mysterious that it cannot be shared (see Visions).

5. Heavenlies.
What is significant in 2 Corinthians 12, both for Paul's argument and our understanding of his thinking, is the thorn in the flesh* which was given to him to keep him humble, and his description of it as a "messenger of Satan.*" Several interpreters refer to the experience of four rabbis, reported in the Babylonian Talmud, who were taken up to heaven, of whom only one, Rabbi Akiba, returned unscathed, the others all suffering in some way (b. Ḥag. 14b). If, as scholars such as W. Baird have suggested, Paul is speaking of a similar assault upon himself in the heavenly realms, this would suggest that Paul distinguishes between heaven in the ultimate sense of the dwelling place of God, and the heavenly realms which are part of the created order, and which will one day be renewed along with the earth. This would make sense of a unique expression used by Paul five times in Ephesians only—en tois epouranois, "in the heavenly realms." The exalted Christ is seated at God's right hand in the heavenly realms (Eph 1:20), and the Christian is seated with him (Eph 2:6) enjoying "every spiritual blessing" (Eph 1:3). But these heavenly realms are also inhabited by "the rulers and authorities" (Eph 3:10) who are further described in Ephesians 6:12 as "the spiritual forces of evil"! The heavenly realms, therefore, refer to the spiritual sphere in which God, Christ, the powers of darkness and the believer exist together, and as well as sharing Christ's reign and receiving the blessings of salvation the believer is involved in spiritual warfare (see Principalities and Powers).

There is, therefore, a tension in Christian experience between the earthly and the heavenly, the present and the future; the believer lives in this world while belonging to another, in this age while anticipating the age to come. It is a tension that will be resolved only when Christ "hands over the kingdom to God the Father after he has destroyed all dominion, authority and power . . . so that God may be all in all" (1 Cor 15:24, 28).

See also CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE; ESCHATOLOGY; INTERMEDIATE STATE; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; RESURRECTION; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Baird, "Visions, Revelation and Ministry: Reflections on 2 Cor 12:1-5 and Gal 1:11-17," JBL 104 (1985) 651-62; C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (HNTC; San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1973) 149-61, 305-18; H. Bietenhard and C. Brown, "Paradise," NIDNTT 2.760-64; E. E. Ellis, "II Corinthians V.1-10 in Pauline Eschatology," NTS 6 (1959-60) 211-24; V. P. Furnish, 2 Corinthians (ABC; New York: Doubleday, 1984) 253-305, 512-56; M. J. Harris, "2 Cor 5:1-10: A Watershed in Paul's Eschatology?," TynB 22 (1971) 32-57; idem, "Paul's View of Death in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10," in New Directions in New Testament Study, ed. R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 317-28; J. Jeremias, "παράδεισος," TDNT V.765-73; A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); idem, "A Re-examination of 'the Heavenlies' in Ephesians," NTS 19 (1972-73) 468-83; idem, "Paul the Visionary: The Setting and Significance of the Rapture to Paradise in 2 Cor 12:1-10," NTS 25 (1978-79) 204-20; R. P. Martin 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986) 95-116, 387-424; R. M. Price, "Punished in Paradise: An Exegetical Theory on 2 Corinthians 12:1-10," JSNT 7 (1980) 33-40; G. von Rad and H. Traub, "οὐρανός," TDNT V.497-543; D. S. Russell, Divine Disclosure: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic (London: SCM, 1992); A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert (New Haven: Yale University, 1990) 34-71; B. Siede et al., "Heaven, Ascend, Above," NIDNTT 2.184-96; N. Turner, Christian Words (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1980) 202-5, 308-12.

J. F. Maile

HEAVENLY CITIZENSHIP.

See CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY.

HELLENISM

Hellenism refers to Greek culture, especially that which was spread throughout the Near East after the conquests of Alexander the Great. The word was first popularized by the historian J. G. Droysen in his Geschichte des Hellenismus (1836-43). He derived the term from the occurrence of the Hellenists in Acts 6:1.

Alexander's conquests spread the use of the Koine (Koinē, "common") dialect, a simplified form of Attic Greek, from Egypt to Afghanistan. Inasmuch as the Torah did not specifically ban such matter as Greek literature, drama, philosophy, art and athletics, most Jews came to varying degrees of accommodation with Greek culture.

1. The Hellenistic Era
2. The Results of Hellenization
3. Scholarship on Hellenism and the NT
4. Hellenization and the NT

1. The Hellenistic Era.

The Classical Age of Greek city-states was replaced by the rise of the Macedonians under the leadership of Philip and his son Alexander, who forcibly unified the Greeks and launched a crusade against the Persians.

1.1. Alexander. Alexander the Great, who had been privately tutored by Aristotle, became the king of Macedonia in 336 B.C. A brilliant general, he led his army of about 30,000 soldiers into the heart of the Persian Empire. It is ironic that the Macedonians, whom the Athenian orator Demosthenes regarded as "barbarians," were the greatest disseminators of Greek culture. Alexander promoted a fusion of Greek and Persian culture and intermarriage with native women. He established over thirty Greek cities, notably Alexandria in Egypt.

1.2. The Diadochi. After Alexander's death in 323, his territories were carved up among his generals, the Diadochi ("the Successors"). After much internecine violence, including murders of all the members of Alexander's family, three major kingdoms were established by 275 B.C.: the Antigonids in Macedonia, the Ptolemies in Egypt, and the Seleucids in Syria.

1.3. The Ptolemies. Ptolemy seized Egypt, the wealthiest country in the ancient world. He and his successors inherited a highly centralized administration. Not only in Egypt but also in Palestine, which they controlled until 198 B.C., the Ptolemies exercised rigid controls to exact the maximum amount of taxes from their subjects. Their policies led to inequities in the distribution of properties in favor of the elites who were loyal to them. At first all of the positions of power and prestige were held by the Macedonians/Greeks and their descendants. Native Egyptians were restricted to the lower levels and even had to have special permission to reside in Alexandria.

But gradually with intermarriages on the part of the Greeks and the acquiring of Greek language and culture on the part of the Egyptians, the ethnic distinction became less important than the cultural ones. A turning point came when Ptolemy IV Philopator, in his struggle with the Seleucids, had to recruit 20,000 Egyptians into the army to win the battle of Raphia in 217 B.C.

The Jews constituted an important minority in Ptolemaic Egypt, eventually occupying two of the districts in Alexandria. The evidence from the Jewish papyri indicates that Jews quickly gave up Aramaic in favor of Greek. A most decisive step was taken with the translation of the OT into Greek, the Septuagint, a project beginning under the auspices of Ptolemy II (c. 270 B.C.) and continuing perhaps over a century until it was completed. The Letter of Aristeas relates the legend of seventy-two Jewish scholars sent by the Jewish high priest to Egypt to do the translation. Aristeas defended both the Jewish Law and Greek education and culture. The first reference to synagogues are Greek inscriptions which appear in the Ptolemaic era.

Aristobulus, an advisor on Jewish affairs to Ptolemy VI (180-45 B.C.), began the tradition of an allegorical interpretation of passages in the Pentateuch which were deemed offensive to Greek tastes. The climax of this tendency to view the Scriptures through a Hellenistic lens is epitomized in the numerous writings of the Jewish philosopher, Philo of Alexandria (30 B.C.-A.D. 50), who used allegory to reinterpret the Scriptures in terms of Middle Platonism. A Hellenized but still loyal Jew, Philo was chosen to lead a legation to the Emperor Gaius (A.D. 37-42) to protest the ill treatment of the Jews by the governor.

1.4. The Seleucids. Seleucus acquired by far the largest territories from Alexander's empire, stretching from the Mediterranean to Persia. Like the Ptolemies, the Seleucids tried to maintain power and privilege in the hands of the Macedonian/Greek elites. A study indicates that even after two generations only 2.5 percent of the positions of authority were held by natives. Seleucus, however, had inherited too much territory with too many diverse populations. By the middle of the third century B.C. Bactria had become an independent kingdom and the Parthians had taken over Persia. The Seleucids failed to recognize their limitations and fought in vain to regain their lost territories. They were finally restricted to the area of Syria.

After a bitter struggle with the Ptolemies, the Seleucids finally gained control over Judea in 198 B.C. Antiochus III (223-187 B.C.) was quite generous to the Jews, asking only that they should pray for his welfare. It was Antiochus IV (176-65 B.C.) who provoked the Maccabean Revolt (165 B.C.) by his policy of a radical replacement of Judaism by Hellenism. The events are recounted in 1—2 Maccabees and Josephus.

The fateful development began in 175 B.C. when Jason, the brother of the incumbent high priest Onias, offered a bribe to Antiochus IV to get himself appointed to that position. Jason then applied for authority to establish a gymnasium and an organization for youth (for ephēboi, young men between eighteen and twenty) in Jerusalem (2 Macc 4:7-9). 2 Maccabees 4:10 declares that "When the king assented and Jason came to office, he at once shifted his compatriots over to the Greek way of life" (pros ton hellēnikon charaktēra). The gymnasium, which involved male athletes exercising and engaging in wrestling in the nude, was shocking to Jewish sensibilities. Some Jews, who wished to compete, even underwent operations to disguise their circumcision.* The graduates of the gymnasium, the ephebes, wore the broad-brimmed Greek hat.

Antiochus then replaced Jason with Menelaus, who, according to Josephus, was an even more radical Hellenizer. Civil war broke out, with the masses behind Jason, and the Hellenized Tobiads of Transjordan behind Menelaus. At the urging of Menelaus, Antiochus harshly suppressed the uprising. In 167 B.C. his forces occupied Jerusalem and despoiled the Temple, which was then defiled with what Daniel called "The Abomination of Desolation"—the imposition of three meteorite idols on the altar. A garrison called the Akra was placed near the Temple, and plans were underway to establish a Greek polis, Antiochat, in Jerusalem. The Jews were to forsake their laws; they could neither observe the Sabbath nor perform circumcision.

It was not until late 167 or early 166 B.C. that the Jews rebelled against the Syrians under the leadership of Mattathias, a priest from the small town of Modin, and his sons. After defeating the Seleucids under the leadership of Judas Maccabeus, the jubilant Jews celebrated the rededication of the Temple (Hanukkah) in 164. Antiochus V wrote a letter in 163 acknowledging, "We have heard that the Jews do not consent to our father's change to Greek customs but prefer their own way of living." Nonetheless, the Jews declared themselves an independent state in 143 B.C. (see Revolutionary Movements).

The Maccabean revolt must not be understood as a rebellion against Hellenism but against paganism. The Hasmoneans, the descendants of Mattathias and his sons, demonstrated their acceptance of many of the non-religious elements of Greek culture. Simon's elaborate mausoleum was built in the Hellenistic style. Many of the Hasmoneans had Greek as well as Hebrew names: Judah Aristobulus, Alexander Jannaeus, Mattathias Antigonus. Jannaeus inscribed his coins in Greek as well as in Hebrew, and employed Greek mercenaries. Aristobulus called himself a "philhellene," that is, a "lover of Greek culture."

1.5. The Romans. The Romans first became acquainted with Greek culture as early as the eighth century B.C. with the establishment of Greek colonies in Italy and Sicily. But it was the later military victories of the Roman legions over the Greek phalanxes in the Macedonian Wars which brought a flood of Greek objects and slaves back to Italy. Perseus, the last king of Macedon, was defeated by the Romans at Pydna in 167 B.C. When the Greek cities of the Achaean League plotted a rebellion, the Romans thoroughly destroyed the city of Corinth in 146 as an example.

Though victorious in war, the Romans were overcome by the superiority of Greek culture in spite of the futile protests of conservatives like Cato against Greek vices such as homosexuality.* There is hardly any aspect of higher culture which was not decisively influenced by the Greeks: art, architecture, literature, drama, medicine, philosophy and religion were all deeply affected by the Greeks. Educated Romans after the second century B.C. were expected to know Greek as well as Latin. It is significant that Philo of Alexandria praised Augustus (Philo Leg. Gai. 147) as one "who enlarged Hellas by many a new Hellas and hellenized the outside world in its most important regions."

2. The Results of Hellenization.

The results of three centuries of Hellenization can best be demonstrated by the textual evidence provided by papyri, inscriptions, coins and artifacts recovered by archeological excavations of ancient Egypt, Rome and Palestine. From the second century B.C. to the second century A.D., Greek became the most common language of discourse between peoples found in the area east of Italy to the Levant.

2.1. In Egypt and in Rome. Jewish texts in Italy and Egypt are overwhelmingly in Greek. With the exception of the Nash Papyrus, all of the papyri from Egypt pertaining to the Jews are in Greek. All but five of the 116 inscriptions from Egypt related to the Jews are also in Greek. In Rome, 405 of 534 Jewish inscriptions are in Greek or seventy-six percent of the total. An analysis of the names of Jewish garrison troops in Egypt indicates that in the third century B.C. seventy-five percent of their names are Greek. In Rome about half the names are Latin and one-third are Greek. Favored names are Dositheos, Theodotus and Theodorus, all referring to God's gift (cf. the Hebrew names Nathaniah, Jonathan).

2.2. In Palestine. Hellenization transformed the areas around Judea such as the Decapolis and urban centers more than it did the Jewish countryside. Gadara, a city in Transjordan, produced Menippus the satirist, Meleager the poet and Philodemus the Epicurean philosopher. Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.) intensified the process of Hellenization in Judea. His secretary was Nicolaus of Damascus, who encouraged Herod to write his autobiography in Greek. According to Josephus (Ant. 15.8.1 §§267-70), Herod established quinquennial games in honor of Augustus, built a theater in Jerusalem and an amphitheater in the plain. He built the Temple in Jerusalem in a lavish Greco-Roman style with colonnaded stoas or porticos (cf. Jn 10:23).

It was probably an expression of a rebellion against Greco-Roman paganism that the Jewish rebels in both the First Revolt (A.D. 66-73) and the Second Revolt (A.D. 132-35) used Hebrew inscriptions on their coins. But the letters of Bar Kochba, who led the Second Revolt, indicates his, or his followers, use of Greek as well as Aramaic and Nabataean.

3. Scholarship on Hellenism and the NT.

The issue of "Hellenism" has played an important role in the analysis of the development of Christianity and of Pauline theology. Earlier scholars assigned it a decisive factor in the later transformation of Christianity into a kind of Hellenistic mystery religion,* but recent studies have indicated that Hellenistic Judaism was already a factor in the earliest stages of Jesus' ministry and message.

3.1. The History-of-Religions School. Scholars of the History-of-Religions School sought to explain Paul's theology on the basis of a contrast between the earliest Palestinian Christians and a later Hellenistic Christianity. W. Heitmüller (1910) proposed that Paul derived his view on the title kyrios ("Lord"), the Eucharist, and Christ mysticism from Hellenistic Christianity in Antioch. W. Bousset in his celebrated book Kyrios Christos (1913, 1921; ET 1970) argued that Jesus was first addressed as kyrios not in the primitive community but in Hellenistic Christianity. This view was popularized by R. Bultmann in his influential Theology of the New Testament (1951, 1955). F. Hahn in The Titles of Jesus in Christology (1963; ET 1969) postulated three stages before Paul: (1) Palestinian Christianity, (2) Hellenistic Jewish Christianity, and (3) Hellenistic Gentile Christianity (see Paul and His Interpreters)

3.2. Martin Hengel. To protest this artificial dichotomy, M. Hengel produced a notable series of erudite monographs (between 1974 and 1989). After an exhaustive examination of the literary and epigraphic evidences, Hengel concluded that Palestinian Judaism was as much a Hellenistic Judaism as that of the Diaspora.* In his view the alleged distinction between an early Hebraic Christianity and a later Hellenistic Christianity is misguided, a conclusion which had already been reached by I. H. Marshall. Hengel observes: "There is hardly any doctrinal theme in the New Testament which could not also have been thought or taught in Palestine. . . . Even a christology of pre-existence and of the Son of God is intrinsically not 'Hellenistic' nor even 'un-Jewish' nor 'un-Palestinian' " (Hengel 1989, 55).

Though Hengel's erudition is impressive and though his main point may be conceded, he frequently strains his arguments in an effort to maximize the evidence for early Hellenism in Palestine. Even if one should accept as Palestinian such Jewish literature as the elder Philo, the tragedies of Ezekiel, the Tobiad romance, Eupolemus and other fragmentary writings, few would be led to conclude with Hengel that, with the exception of Philo, Jerusalem's literary production was greater than that of the Jews in Alexandria. As evidence of Hellenistic influence he even cites such openly anti-Hellenistic writings as Ben Sirach and the Qumran* Scrolls. But the overwhelming predominance of Hebrew and Aramaic scrolls as opposed to the few Greek fragments at Qumran would indicate that the Qumran community was consciously maintaining a traditional stance against the encroachment of Hellenism.

3.3. L. H. Feldman. In L. H. Feldman's view, although the Hellenistic elements were extensive, they were essentially superficial and did not profoundly affect the nature of Judaism. In particular, Feldman is not persuaded that extensive Hellenization had taken place before the Maccabean revolt. The inscriptions cited by Hengel reveal only an elementary acquaintance with Greek. Where Hengel finds Greek influence in Esther, Tobit and Judith, Feldman prefers to see either Egyptian or Persian influence. Where Hengel maximizes the evidence too often, Feldman frequently minimizes the evidence. He points to the fact that Josephus admitted that he needed aid to polish his Greek (Josephus Ag. Ap. 1.9 §50). Josephus's mother tongue was Aramaic; his Greek was imperfectly pronounced, but he was certainly able to speak and to write more than adequately in Greek. Feldman points to the fact that inscriptions from Upper Galilee indicate that there was little Hellenization there. But Upper Galilee was a particularly remote area.

4. Hellenization and the NT.

The most obvious effect of Hellenization is indicated by the fact that the NT was written in Koine Greek. Most of the citations of the OT in the NT are from the Septuagint.

4.1. Acts. The conflict over the distribution of food between the hellēnistai and the hebraioi in Acts 6:1-6 was probably a conflict between Greek-speaking Jewish Christians and Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians. Members of the former would include Jews from the Diaspora areas such as Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia and Asia Minor (Acts 6:9). Though both may have been bilingual, each group would use its mother tongue in their own worship. It was the Hellenists, including the deacons Stephen and Philip, who took the lead in spreading the gospel to the Samaritans (Acts 8) and to Gentiles (Acts 11:19-20). Hengel and other scholars have credited the Hellenistic Christians from Jerusalem as those who first made it possible to proclaim the gospel beyond the bounds of Israel.

4.2. Paul. Paul was born in Tarsus in Cilicia, a city noted for its Stoic philosophers.* However, as he probably came to Jerusalem at about the age of twelve to study under the famous rabbi Gamaliel, Paul received at most a secondary Hellenistic education. Paul was able to address crowds in the "Hebrew dialect," that is, in Aramaic (Acts 21:40; 22:2; see Jew, Paul the). Though Paul eschews the more florid displays of Greek oratory (1 Cor 2:1-4), his letters nonetheless employ such rhetorical devices as: chiasmus (1 Cor 3:17), litotes (Rom 1:28), alliteration (2 Cor 6:3), climax (Rom 8:29-30), oxymoron (2 Cor 6:9) and paronomasia (2 Cor 3:2), and he meets his sophistic opponents (in 2 Cor 10—13) by using their techniques and procedures (e.g., synkrisis, "comparison"; see Rhetoric).

There are but three certain citations of classical literature in the NT. Paul in his famous Areopagus speech before Stoics and Epicureans at Athens* quoted from Aratus's Phaenomena 5 (Acts 17:28), "We are also his offspring." In 1 Corinthians 15:33 Paul cited from Menander's play Thais, the line, "Bad company is the ruin of good character." In Titus 1:12 Epimenedes' De Oraculis is cited: "The Cretans, always liars, vicious brutes, and lazy gluttons." As these were commonplace sayings, they do not prove that Paul read the literary works or that he attended plays, but they do show that he had enough acquaintance with such works to use them as illustrations in his sermons and in his letters.

4.2.1. Theaters. Theaters were invariably built at Hellenistic cities. Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 40-44) generously provided theaters and baths to such cities as Beirut. He was attending the theater at Caesarea (Acts 12:20-23; cf. Josephus Ant. 19.8.2 §§343-44) when he was struck with his fatal illness. Philo, as a Hellenized Jew, tells us that he attended the theater in Alexandria (Philo Ebr. 177): "For example, I have often when I chanced to be in the theater noticed the effect produced by some single tune sung by the actors on the stage or played by the musicians." On the other hand, rabbis were opposed to the attendance at the theater inasmuch as Greek tragedy was performed under the auspices of gods such as Dionysus. The magnificent theater at Ephesus was filled with 24,000 Ephesians shouting their praise of their goddess in protest against the missionary efforts of Paul (Acts 19:29).

4.2.2. Gymnasia. The Greek ideal of paideia, "education," included not only literature and rhetoric, but also music and athletics. The Greek ideal of a person was a sound mind in a beautiful body. Isocrates, an orator, said: "He who shares in our paideia is a Greek in a higher sense than he who simply shares our descent."

The gymnasium where male athletes exercised gymnos, "nude," was an essential element of a Hellenistic city. Pausanias declared, "No gymnasium, no theater, no public water supply—no city." Gymnasia were established in the far reaches of Alexander's Empire, even in Susa in southwestern Persia and in Afghanistan. It was the attempt to establish a gymnasium in Jerusalem which helped to provoke the Maccabean crisis. Herod the Great established gymnasia in Gentile cities but not in Judea proper.

One of the most prestigious positions in the city was that of the gymnasiarch, or official in charge of the games. The graduates of the gymnasium program, the ephebes, originally served in the army. Later in the Hellenistic Age the ephebes formed a social register which provided the leaders of the city. In the East the gymnasia perpetuated the Greek way of life as a protected island in a sea of barbarians. Ambitious parents enrolled their children on waiting lists to enter the gymnasia. Eventually wealthy, Hellenized nationals were admitted into the charmed circle.

At first Jews had difficulty accepting this alien institution, especially since the games were ordinarily dedicated to a god or to a Greek hero such as Heracles. But eventually the athletic games became such an accepted part of culture that we have inscriptional evidence of Jewish participation in the life of the gymnasia from Hypaepa in Lydia, Iasos in Caria, Coronea in Messenia, Teucheira and Cyrene in Cyrenaica. Claudius (A.D. 41-54) in a famous letter warned the Alexandrian Jews against forcing their way into gymnasiarch games.

Philo of Alexandria saw no problem in attending the games and drawing illustrations from them. It is from the realm of athletics that Paul drew many of his striking illustrations: from the boxing ring (1 Cor 9:26), from the stadium race (Gal 2:2; 1 Cor 9:24; Phil 3:13-14; 1 Tim 6:12), from athletic training (1 Cor 9:25; 1 Tim 4:10) and the athletic crown (1 Cor 9:25; 2 Tim 2:5). Though he recognized the value of physical gymnasia, Paul urged Timothy to exercise himself even more spiritually (1 Tim 4:7-8). O. Broneer infers that when Paul was in Corinth he attended the Pan-Hellenic games at nearby Isthmia. Paul's reference to the perishable athletic wreath (1 Cor 9:25) seems to be a specific reference to the withered celery crown of Isthmia.

4.2.3. Philosophy. The influence of Greek philosophy* on Jews and on Jewish Christians is much debated. It is most clearly evident in Philo. It has also been claimed that Platonic and Stoic ideas are present in such works as 4 Maccabees and the Wisdom of Solomon. Though some rabbis forbade the teaching of Greek wisdom, Gamaliel II, the grandson of Paul's teacher, had 500 students of Greek wisdom in addition to 500 students of the Torah. The rabbis mentioned only two Greek philosophers by name, Epicurus and Oenomaus of Gadara. Among the 2,000 Greek words in the Talmudic corpus, it is significant that there are no Greek philosophic terms.

H. Koester writes, "but if Paul had any real knowledge of Greek philosophy, it certainly did not influence his theology materially, nor does he ever concern himself critically with any subject matter of the Greek philosophical tradition" (Koester 1965, 187). Koester, following R. Bultmann, believes that Paul's preaching was dependent on the model of the Cynic-Stoic diatribe.* Though there are many parallels, according to E. A. Judge (1972, 32-33) these may be better explained by the common conversational language of the day. Whatever Stoic terms Paul may have used, he gave them a completely un-Stoic denotation (Cornish). When Paul confronted Stoics and Epicureans in Athens (Acts 17:18), he certainly did not modify his message of the bodily resurrection of Jesus—a concept which was completely unacceptable to Greek philosophers.

See also APOLLOS; ATHENS, PAUL AT; CHRISTOLOGY; DIASPORA; GENTILES; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; JEW, PAUL THE; LORD; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PHILOSOPHY; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; RHETORIC; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. J. Bickerman, The Jews in the Greek Age (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1988); O. Broneer, "The Apostle Paul and the Isthmian Games," BA 25 (1962) 2-31; M. L. Cornish, "Pauline Theology and Stoic Philosphy," JAAR Supplement 17 (1979) 1-21; W. D. Davies and L. Finkelstein, ed., The Cambridge History of Judaism II: The Hellenistic Age (Cambridge: University Press, 1989); L. H. Feldman, "Hengel's Judaism and Hellenism in Retrospect," JBL 96 (1977) 371-82; idem, "How Much Hellenism in Jewish Palestine?" HUCA 57 (1986) 83-111; E. Ferguson, Backgrounds of Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); J. A. Goldstein, I Maccabees (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1976); idem, II Maccabees (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1983); idem, "Jewish Acceptance and Rejection of Hellenism," in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, Volume 2, ed. E. P. Sanders et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981) 64-87; E. R. Goodenough and A. T. Kraabel, "Paul and the Hellenization of Christianity," in Religions in Antiquity, ed. J. Neusner (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1968) 23-68; H. A. Harris, Greek Athletics and the Jews (Cardiff: University of Wales, 1976); M. Hengel, Jews, Greeks and Barbarians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); idem, Judaism and Hellenism (2 vols; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); idem, The "Hellenization" of Judaea in the First Century after Christ (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989); E. A. Judge, "St. Paul and Classical Society," JAC 15 (1972) 19-36; idem, "Cultural Conformity and Innovation in Paul," TynB 35 (1984) 3-24; H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament I: History, Culture and Religion of the Hellenistic Age (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); idem, "Paul and Hellenism," in The Bible in Modern Scholarship, ed. J. P. Hyatt (Nashville: Abingdon, 1965) 187-95; I. H. Marshall, "Palestinian and Hellenistic Christianity," NTS 19 (1972-73) 271-87; F. Millar, "Background to the Maccabean Revolution," JJS 29 (1978) 1-21; J. N. Sevenster, Do You Know Greek? (NovTSup 19; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1968); V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews (Philadelphia: Jewish Publ. Soc. of America, 1961); A. J. Toynbee, Hellenism (Cambridge: University Press, 1959 and Westport: Greenwood, 1981); F. W. Walbank et al., ed., The Cambridge Ancient History VII, Pt. 1: The Hellenistic World (Cambridge: University Press, 1984); H. Windisch, "Ἕλλην κτλ," TDNT II.504-16.

E. M. Yamauchi

HELLENISTIC RELIGION.

See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; HELLENISM.

HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL

In one sense the development of modern hermeneutics, or principles for interpreting texts, has been strongly influenced by Pauline studies. The basis for the development of grammatical, semantic, background and literary approaches came first from the interpretation of epistolary material and later branched out into narrative, apocalyptic and other genre studies. In this sense the Pauline letters participate in general hermeneutical issues. Yet there are also problems inherent to their exegesis, such as the occasional nature of his letters, and the letter-form that lies behind them.

1. Recent Hermeneutical Issues
2. Paul's Letters and First-Century Forms
3. Special Issues

1. Recent Hermeneutical Issues.

Classical hermeneutics has always identified the goal of interpretation as ascertaining the author's intended meaning. Even in the Middle Ages, with the "four-fold sense" (literal, allegorical, tropological/moral, anagogical), scholars felt they were drawing out the meaning of the text (the "literal sense" on which the other senses were based). Recently, however, this approach has come under increasing attack, as attention has shifted from the author to the text (semiotic theory) and then to the reader (postmodern theories) as the locus of meaning.

1.1. Foundations: Gadamer and Ricoeur. The hermeneutical theory of H. G. Gadamer brought about a paradigm shift in the field. Gadamer argued that the act of coming-to-understanding does not unlock the past meaning of a text but establishes a dialectic between reader and text. In what Gadamer called a "fusion of horizons," the reader enters the historical process of tradition and unites with the thought-world of the text. The text, having been detached from the author, is open to new relationships. The reader is not re-creating the author's past situation by reasoning back into the past, but is entering into a relationship with the text in which both text and reader interrogate each other.

P. Ricoeur took Gadamer's theory one step further, arguing that interpretation is symbolic or metaphorical at its core and occurs in front of the text (as the reader is addressed) rather than behind the text (in a reconstruction of the historical meaning). A new world of meaning is created by the text as it engages the reader. For both Gadamer and Ricoeur, the problem of "distanciation" (the distance between the text as originally written and as currently read) demands a "hermeneutic of suspicion," which reckons with the ambiguities of language and the human mind's capabilities for self-deception. With this the hermeneutical emphasis had shifted from an appropriation of the "intended" meaning of the author to a present interaction with the text, now seen as autonomous from the author's intended meaning. For instance, one studies a passage such as Romans 3, dealing with "justification by faith," in terms of its metaphorical or extended meaning rather than its intended Pauline meaning.

1.2. From Structuralism to Deconstruction. Following Gadamer several distinct movements have shifted the focus of hermeneutics even more decisively from the author to the text and, finally, to the reader. First, the hermeneutical approach known as structuralism, or semiotics, has treated the text as an arbitrary system of signs which must be decoded in order to arrive at the meaning. The interpreter works with the "synchronic," or literary, presence of the text itself as autonomous from the author and as controlled by two aspects of the text: the syntagmatic (the horizontal framework of the surface text) and the paradigmatic (the vertical life-world to which the codes of the text belong). The interpreter charts the actantial (basic narrative units) codes behind Romans 3 and determines the structural configuration beneath those surface codes. This is done primarily in terms of identifying binary opposites, that is, a set of oppositions within the surface text. These codes are then recomposed on the basis of transformational rules (primarily derived from N. Chomsky) to derive the "meaning" of Romans 3 for today.

Weaknesses in structuralism (e.g., its lack of a strong philosophical foundation; its overstatement of the place of codes and binary opposites; its overemphasis on the paradigmatic at the expense of the syntagmatic in the production of meaning) has led to a new movement known as poststructuralism. Primarily, this represents a shift from the text to the reader as the generating force in interpretation. The text becomes an open system of signs that compels the reader to complete its meaning. As R. Barthes puts it (74-75), the text is art rather than a work. It is dynamic and subversive, cutting across boundaries and open-ended, with an infinite number of possible meanings. The author is no longer present, and the text participates with the reader in determining meaning. Romans 3 no longer contains Pauline themes; rather, it draws the reader into its textual framework, and it is up to the reader to complete its meaning.

Closely connected to this approach are the movements of postmodernism and deconstructionism. Postmodernism denies that the text has any objective or referential meaning. Instead the reader discovers meaning by interacting with the text. Deconstructionism is the ultimate statement of this perspective. J. Derrida, the father of deconstructionism, building upon Nietzsche and the later phase of Heidegger's philosophy, attacked the very foundations of Western thought by demanding a rhetorical rather than a philosophical approach to communication. There are no fixed norms or dogmas, only metaphorical ones. Metaphor is a "decentering" process involving an infinite number of sign substitutions. The reader can never reach a "final" interpretation of meaning. This leads to "play" as the readers bring their own interpretive rules to bear on the text. There is no presence of meaning in a text, only "difference" and "absence" as the interpreters are forced to deconstruct the text from all past meaning (not only the author's but also all past understandings) and then reconstruct it by developing their own game on the playground of the text (Derrida, 280-81). Derrida would note the many codes that lie behind the surface of Romans 3 and show how all interpreters have built upon and yet reconstructed the "meanings" of each other regarding the "justification" language of Romans 3. He would then urge the readers to engage in the joyous activity of freeplay in the text.

1.3. Reader Response. A similar school, but one built upon slightly different philosophical conceptions, is reader-response criticism. These critics posit the union of text and reader at the moment of response. The "author" of a text is a creation of the reader rather than inherent in the text. In fact, the text itself exists only in the reader's mind, in the sense that the text only takes on life as a formal literary entity when the printed page and the reader converge.

There are two schools of thought within reader-response criticism. The moderate position of W. Iser states that the text plays a mediating role in guiding as well as correcting the interpreter's understanding. Through a series of gaps, the text develops an anticipation which, while still pluri-significant, works with the reading strategy of the interpreter in producing meaning. A more radical type is exemplified in S. Fish, who believes that the reading community dominates the text, which does not truly exist apart from the reader. The text supplies potential meanings, but these are only actualized by the preshaped reading interests brought to bear on the text. For Iser the reader completes the text's meaning; for Fish the reader creates its meaning. Most biblical reader-response critics (e.g., Culpepper, Fowler, Resseguie) are closer to Iser, attempting to blend reader-response with historical-critical perspectives.

1.4. Socio-Critical Hermeneutics: Liberation and Feminist. Socio-critical hermeneutics embraces such diversity as that seen in the writings of J. Habermas, in liberation theology and in feminist hermeneutics. The primary theorists are Habermas and K.-O. Apel. They propose a "critical," or "depth hermeneutics," which posits that interpretation must include a "critique of ideology," that is, the tendency of all communication to manipulate and control others. All texts are the products of a worldview and seek to draw the reader into an acceptance of that social world. Hermeneutics then begins with a critical liberation of understanding from ideology. In other words, one must unmask the worldview behind the text and enter into a critical interaction with that world in coming-to-understanding. Socio-critical theory would seek to uncover the changing social world (i.e., the shift from Judaism to Jesus, then to primitive church and on to Pauline systems) behind the justification teaching of Romans 3, and then critique the social world behind the interpreters who study it.

Liberation and Black theology form another type of socio-critical approach. The basic premise is that Western ideology has used a theology based on heaven and spiritual salvation to oppress the poor by telling them to wait for the next life for their reward. A critical reflection on society, based on praxis, must begin with the plight of the poor. Centering on a view of God as immanent, "in" the world and not just "above" it, justification is redefined as liberation, faith as praxis, and knowledge as the transformation of society (see Gutierrez). In this sense the study of historical meaning in the text takes a back seat to the preeminence of present encounter based on the current social situation. Theory and praxis are fused, and for liberation theologians this demands that one begin with the suffering of the oppressed. Thus the motifs of Exodus and redemption from slavery lying behind the Pauline language of salvation come to the fore. In Romans 3 emphasis is given to the "righteousness* of God" as demanding justice over all oppressive systems.

Finally, feminist hermeneutics utilizes the full spectrum of reader-response and socio-critical theory. The patriarchal nature of all biblical texts and of subsequent theological reflection has oriented Christian theology toward power, domination and exploitation of women. Hermeneutics must be liberated from male-dominated interpretation, and the place of women in church and society must be reinstated before the truth of Scripture and theology can be realized. Thus the femaleness of God and the central role of women in Scripture must be retrieved. The critical norm is seen as women's experience, which R. Radford Ruether sees as "a critical force, exposing classical theology, including its foundational tradition in scripture, as shaped by male experience rather than human experience" (Ruether, 113). The Bible in this sense must be probed from the perspective of the interpreter's social world, not merely of the ancient world. The social framework of biblical thinking, especially in its patriarchal perspective, must be replaced by models that speak to today. For instance, the models of God as father and king are to be replaced by models of God as mother, lover and friend (see TeSelle McFague). Studies by this school tend to center upon Paul either as a reflection of rabbinic oppression of women (e.g., 1 Cor 11:2-16; 14:34-35; cf. 1 Tim 2:11-15) or as containing the seeds of the emancipation of women (e.g., Rom 16:1-3, 7; Gal 3:28).

1.5. Intentionality Approaches. There is a growing number of scholars who stress some type of intentionality approach, that is, a return to author and text as generating meaning. Prominent among these are E. D. Hirsch and his followers (e.g., W. Kaiser, E. Johnson) who see the author's intention as the sole authentic meaning of the text. Hirsch sees two aspects in interpretation—meaning (linked to authorial intent) and significance (as the readers align themselves with the implications of the author's meaning for the present). The former is never changing while the latter changes with the reader's context.

Others build more upon the later phase of L. Wittgenstein's thought and J. Searle's speech-act theory. Searle argues that the heart of interpretation theory is the notion that language is referential more than it is performative. The sentence is an intentional device that brings hearers into the proper arena so that they might apply the correct rules for recognizing the meaning of the utterance. His thesis is: "speaking a language is engaging in a (highly complex) rule-governed form of behaviour" (Searle 1969, 77, 80). K. Vanhoozer (1986, 91-92) notes four factors that guide interpretation: proposition (the data in the text), purpose (the reason communicated), presence (the form or genre of the message) and power (the illocutionary force of the message). He argues that the reader is ethically bound by the text to discover its intended message. Osborne (411-15) calls for a trialogue between author, text and reader. The reader recognizes the guiding presence of preunderstanding and tradition but seeks to place it in front of rather than behind the text, thus allowing the text to correct previous understanding if necessary. This is not done easily but is accomplished by studying past meaning (via historical-grammatical exegesis) and present interpretative possibilities (via the conclusions of competing reading communities). The key is to allow competing possibilities to drive the interpreter back to reexamine the text in a new and open way.

Finally, A. C. Thiselton (597-619) has developed a comprehensive speech-act hermeneutic. Building upon Wittgenstein's theory of language games and J. L. Austin's understanding of performative-language functions, Thiselton argues that texts perform not only locutionary functions (propositional meaning) but also illocutionary acts (calling for commitment and action on the part of the reader). Thus meaning and significance are united in a single act of coming-to-understanding. The text not only communicates its meaning but demands response. While in some ways there is a pluralism of response as the biblical text communicates in many different reading situations, there is not polyvalence (plurality of meanings) in the strictest sense, for the text performs a transforming function, as readers are led to new horizons or life-worlds by the text. For Romans 3 this would involve not only Paul's development of justification by faith, but also the sense in which the readers are called to experience this for themselves.

2. Paul's Letters and First-Century Forms.

Genre has been long recognized as an important classification device for determining the rules for interpreting a specific text. To know that Paul's writings fit under the general rubric "Hellenistic letters" helps one to identify certain principles for understanding them. Yet it is also critical to identify more precisely exactly what kind of letters they are. Since Deissmann's epochal essay (224-46), discussion has centered upon whether certain of Paul's letters were personal letters or literary treatises. Yet all agree today that Deissmann's analysis and distinction is too simplistic (see Letters, Letter Forms).

2.1. Paul and Epistolary Types. There were many kinds of letters in the ancient world. Stowers (49-173) provides a functional typology based on rhetorical patterns, with six types: letters of friendship (cf. 2 Cor 1:16; 5:3; Phil 1:7-8); family letters; letters of praise and blame (1 Cor 11; Rev 2—3); exhortatory or paraenetic letters (1 Thess; the Pastorals); letters of mediation or recommendation (Phil 2:19-30; Philem); juridical or forensic letters (1 Cor 9:3-12; 2 Cor 1:8-2:13). Aune (162-69) adds three other types: private or documentary letters (letters of request, information, introduction, instruction, family and business); official letters (royal edicts, governmental correspondence); and literary letters (recommendation, letter-essays, philosophical letters, novelistic letters, imaginative letters, letters embedded in biographies).

Some of Paul's letters are personal (e.g., Philemon* as traditionally understood, though not by some modern commentators), some come close to being a treatise (e.g., Romans, Ephesians, in their traditional understandings), and some claim to be public letters (e.g., 1 Thess 5:27, Col 4:16). They speak to specific, occasional situations and yet are meant to be read again and again in the churches. Nearly all go beyond the boundaries of the normal letter (see 2.2 below) and mix several forms (e.g., 1 Cor: exhortation in chaps 1—3, juridical in 9, apologetic in 15). Paul's letters were more than personal reminiscences; they represented his presence in the community and were meant to be read again and again in the worship service (see Worship). On the basis of Paul's apostolic authority* behind the letters, they possessed almost a creedal authority from the start.

2.2. Paul and Letter Forms. While Paul's writings followed the Hellenistic form of letters generally, they went beyond the norm in almost every particular. Introductions follow the pattern of "Paul to _____, greetings," but often add a lengthy description of his office and purpose in writing. The greetings combine the Greek charein and the Hebrew šālôm but christianize both, centering upon the divinely bestowed grace* (charis) and peace* (eirēnē) that God provides. The initial thanksgiving and prayer are even more extensive in Paul. Normally letters in the ancient world began with a brief thanksgiving to the gods and a bestowal of blessing, but for Paul these took on great significance. As O'Brien has noticed (262-63), the introductory prayers* of Paul often embody in embryo the basic themes and atmosphere of the letter. There is a paraenetic, or hortatory, function in these sections (see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology, Thanksgiving).

The body of Paul's letters is often far more extensive than even the more literary ancient letters. Writers like Cicero tended to stay within traditional bounds, but Paul felt less bound to tradition. Thus in the body of his letters he strayed farthest from those conventions, undoubtedly because of the situations he addressed. Certain key phrases are markers for divisions in his letters, like "I want you to know" (Rom 1:13, Gal 1:11), "I do not want you to be ignorant" (2 Cor 1:8), and "I urge/exhort you" (Rom 12:1, 1 Thess 4:1). Prayers (Eph 1:15-19, 3:14-19) and doxologies (Rom 11:36; Eph 3:21) often conclude major sections. Paul's presence via his letters is especially observable in what Funk labels "apostolic parousia" (e.g., Rom 1:8-15; 1 Cor 4:14-21; Gal 4:12-20), centering upon his travel plans (see Itinerary), relationship with the readers, and past and future contacts with them. Paraenesis (see Teaching) or general moral exhortation is at the heart of many of his letters, found at the conclusion of some (1 Thess, Rom, Gal, Eph, Col) and interspersed throughout others (1 and 2 Cor, Phil, the Pastorals). This includes social codes (see Households, Household Codes), and virtue and vice lists (see Virtues and Vices), and often builds upon traditional Jewish and Hellenistic teaching. In addition, there are distinct doctrinal sections (e.g., Rom 9—11, 1 Cor 15, 1 Thess 4:13—5:10) in which Paul counteracts false understandings. These often utilize creeds* or hymns* to present the accepted dogma from which the correction can be made. The latter are also linked with other liturgical elements* like confessions and prayers in worship sections.

The closing section of the letter, like the introduction, more closely follows established patterns of Paul's day. A list of secondary greetings, following the format "A greets you, along with B" is found in all the letters except Galatians, 2 Thessalonians, Ephesians and 1 Timothy. The normal closing formula (with errōsō) is replaced with charis, and the traditional "health wish" is replaced by a doxology or benediction. The benediction, with some form of "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all," closes all of his letters except Romans and 1 Corinthians.

3. Special Issues.

3.1. Paul and Rhetorical Criticism. Recently biblical scholars have taken up the study of the modes of communication or persuasion (see Rhetorical Criticism). It is impossible to know whether Paul was ever trained in rhetoric,* which was an essential part of Hellenistic education at the secondary level. Whatever his formal training, however, his letters evidence both a knowledge and use of rhetorical techniques. Aristotle (his thought later developed by Quintilian) spoke of three types of rhetoric—judicial (legal), deliberative (political or religious debates) and epideictic (praise or blame). Scholars have debated whether there were four (Mack) or six (Kennedy) elements in proper ancient speech. Here we will utilize six (with the disputed parts in brackets):

(1) The exordium (introduction) establishes rapport regarding the subject matter.

(2) The narratio (proposition statement) provides a rationale and background to the subject matter.

[(3) The partitio (explanation, often seen as part of the narratio) enumerates the points to be made.]

(4) The probatio (presentation of arguments) cites proof and offers evidence for the argument.

[(5) The refutatio (refutation of opponents, often seen as part of the probatio) disproves opposing views.]

(6) The peroratio (conclusion) summarizes the points and seeks to persuade the reader.

This style, taken primarily from judicial rhetoric, was widely employed in the ancient world and can enhance one's understanding of Pauline argumentation, so long as it is used cautiously and the text is allowed to dictate the final outline. For instance, H. D. Betz's rhetorical analysis of Galatians* identifies it as a judicial or apologetic letter that argues for justification* by faith* rather than by the works* of the Law*; Kennedy concludes that it is a deliberative work that calls for endurance rather than a return to Judaism; and B. Mack finds Galatians too complex to be relegated to one rhetorical type. The latter is certainly the wiser decision. The task for the rhetorical critic is to study the patterns of persuasion and to elucidate the techniques utilized by Paul. This analysis provides important hermeneutical guidelines as to how Paul marshals his arguments. For instance, Paul employs the diatribe* in Romans, a rhetorical method by which an author presents his argument by first showing the errors of his opponents (often with mē genoito, "may it not be so!," as in Rom 3:1-9; 6:1-3, 15-16; 9:14-15), and then demonstrates the true meaning of his own gospel.

In studying the rhetoric of Paul, the interpreter first determines the rhetorical unit (which must have an introduction, a developed argument and a conclusion). It can be a macro-unit (like Galatians or Romans) or a micro-passage (such as those in Rom 9—11 or Rom 9:6-18). Next, one analyzes the rhetorical situation (the purpose or Sitz im Leben, "life setting") of the unit. Then one seeks to determine the type of rhetoric employed (judicial, deliberative or apodeictic) and the specific aspects being addressed. This leads to an analysis of the arrangement, technique and style by which the situation is addressed. Finally, the rhetorical effectiveness, that is, the text's movement from the problem to the solution, is evaluated. These steps enable an interpreter more carefully to evaluate and interpret the language and meaning of Paul in specific passages.

3.2. Creeds, Hymns and Liturgical Material. Paul's letters are replete with creedal and liturgical material. These contain confessional utterances such as "Abba, Father"; "Maranatha"; "Amen"; doxologies; benedictions*; creeds*; and hymns.* These developed out of two needs: worship* in the house churches and the need for established convictions in the light of increased numbers of false teachers. They were used both to draw the heart to God and to anchor established truth in the mind. The central focus of most creedal material is the person and work of the Christ, primarily his incarnation (Phil 2:6-8), the pattern of humiliation and exaltation* (Phil 2:6-11; Rom 4:24, 8:32), his saving work (1 Cor 15:3-5; Rom 10:8-10) or his exaltation as cosmic Lord* (Col 1:15-20; 1 Tim 3:16). Such material incorporated into Paul's letters may have been quoted from a corpus of creedal and liturgical material, though some of this might certainly have been produced on the spot by Paul himself (see Liturgical Elements).

Several formal criteria have been used to detect creedal and hymnic material. They are often introduced by hos ("who") or hoti ("that"). Language of "receiving" and "passing on" may be used (e.g., 1 Cor 15:3). There also will often be a series of parallel participial constructions, and the terms utilized might not be common to Paul. There is a certain hymnic or strophic pattern to the style, and the contents usually contain a very high christology. Finally, there may be a discernible sense in which the passage goes beyond the basic needs of the immediate context, such as the incarnation and exaltation theology of Philippians 2:6-11. To be sure, these criteria are not failsafe (see the objections of G. Fee to Phil 2:6-11 as a hymn), but they do represent the consensus of modern scholarship.

It is interesting that Paul's creedal affirmations at times centered on ethical as well as doctrinal issues (e.g., Phil 2:6-11; Rom 10:8-10; see Fowl). One aspect of interpretation centers on the function of the creed or hymn in both its original setting within early Christian worship and its setting within Paul's letter. For instance, Philippians 2:6-8 functions both as a christological hymn of worship and as a paradigm or paraenesis in the context of Philippians 2. This is somewhat unusual, but interpreters must be aware of both possible elements in exegeting a creedal passage.

3.3. Social Codes and Virtue/Vice Lists. The Haustafeln or "household/social codes" are found in the later (disputed) letters of Paul (Eph 5:21—6:9; Col 3:18—4:1; Tit 2:1-10), as well as in 1 Peter 2:13—3:8 (see Households and Household Codes). A precursor is seen in Romans 13:1-7 where Paul takes up the issue of submitting to civil* authorities (a theme found in the house code of 1 Pet 2). These codes are concerned with the reciprocal responsibilities between the members of the household: husband and wife, parents and children, masters and slaves.* Virtue and vice lists, on the other hand, appear in every letter except Philemon and the Thessalonian correspondence. Scholars, noting similarities between Paul's lists and those found in Hellenism and Judaism, have disagreed as to whether these lists stem primarily from Jewish or Hellenistic antecedents. They probably owe something to both cultures.

The household codes reflect one of the primary metaphors for the church, that of the extended family. Since the church itself was a macrocosm of the family (Eph 5:23, 25-27), it followed that its primary unit, the family, should exemplify the ethical unity and equity that was to characterize the church as a whole (see esp. Eph 5:21). Some (e.g., Aune, 196) maintain that the purpose of the codes was entirely apologetic: to show that Christianity was not subversive. However, the example of 1 Peter 2:12 ("glorify God on the day of visitation") demonstrates a missionary purpose as well. Primarily, however, their purpose was internal: to regulate the social relationships in the church.

The virtue and vice lists (see Virtues and Vices) find parallels in the traditional lists known to us from antiquity and have a similar function: to encourage correct conduct along the lines of contemporary mores (but with the deeper expectations associated with the Christian calling, cf. Gal 5:19-23; Eph 4:25-32), to help differentiate between true and false teachers (cf. 1 Tim 6:4-5, 11; 2 Tim 2:22-25), to lay out the conduct expected of church leaders (1 Tim 1:3-11; 6:4-5) and to demonstrate the depravity of the pagan (Rom 1:29-31; 1 Tim 1:9-10). Paul followed Jewish more than Hellenistic parallels in one particular aspect: his lists focused more on corporate (e.g., love,* patience, envy, strife) than on individual virtues and vices (e.g., self-sufficiency).

In the case of both social codes, and virtue and vice lists, the interpreter must bear in mind that the lists are not meant to be exhaustive and rigid. Their purpose is to provide positive moral and ethical guidance. The lists are sometimes tied directly to their contexts (e.g., 1 Cor 5:9-10; 6:9-10) and sometimes draw upon traditional and widely recognized standards of morality (e.g., Rom 1:29-31).

3.4. The Center of Paul's Theology. There has been extensive debate recently as to whether a "center"* of Paul's thought can be elucidated. Since the Pauline letters are occasional in nature, and since Paul failed to develop his thought systematically, is it possible to conceive of a Pauline "theology" in the broad sense or of a "center" in the narrow sense? J. C. Beker calls these poles "the dialectic of coherence and contingency" (Beker, 15-19); others prefer to see both unity and diversity in Paul's thought. Most interpreters of Paul seek a balance. One point counts against the search for a center, namely, the tremendous diversity of "centers" that have been found. E. Käsemann finds the center in justification* by faith or, more broadly, lordship (see Way); R. P. Martin in reconciliation (see Center of Paul's Theology); J. C. Beker in apocalyptic*; C. J. A. Hickling in the new age and the new life in Christ; and E. P. Sanders in the lordship of Christ and the Gentile mission. It seems as if no one quite agrees on any center. This leads many others to argue that at the core of Paul lies a cluster of themes rather than a single idea or controlling principle (see Paul and His Interpreters).

The way out of the maze is to utilize the techniques of biblical theology, especially those of the analytical method. A "bottom-up" approach will follow the themes as they develop from one Pauline letter to another, allowing them to decide their own direction. One begins by tracing and charting these developing themes book by book. From this analysis, archetypal patterns may be discovered that tie together major ideas in each letter and then between letters. As these archetypal patterns coalesce along lines of primary and secondary emphases, the scholar may hope to discover a single idea (or cluster of ideas) from which the others derive. Only then can one demonstrate a "center" for Pauline thought.

3.5. Development in Paul. Interpreters of Paul have discussed at some length the extent to which Paul's theology developed from one letter to the next. Some have maintained that Paul's theology was fully formed by the time he began his missionary journeys. Others believe that development can be seen in his letters. Longenecker notes three models for development (24-26): (1) There is a basic unity and identity in development, with later changes being new deductions, applications and explications of foundational ideas (the view of the Alexandrian Fathers). (2) There is organic development with genuine innovation, but always growing out of what is inherent in the original "seed" (the view of the Antiochian Fathers). (3) There are genuine ideological changes, not only innovative but even contradictory, and without any propositional correspondence to earlier ideas (the view of Bultmann and his followers). Most Pauline scholars would hold one of these three views, but the hermeneutical criteria for determining which is correct in a given instance have not been developed.

Pauline eschatology* is the most frequently cited example. On the one hand, it has been hypothesized that 1 Thessalonians 4—5 (resurrection* at the Parousia) derived from Paul's primitive apocalyptic period, 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5 (resurrection but without strong apocalyptic overtones) from Hellenistic Judaism, and the prison letters (with realized eschatology replacing expectation of the Parousia) from the Hellenistic church. On the other hand, many have also posited a development in which Paul moves from a belief in the resurrection at the Parousia (1 Thess 4, 1 Cor 15) to a belief in the resurrection at death (2 Cor 5). But the larger question is which of the three models of development best explains the data of Paul's eschatological statements, and how does one go about deciding?

The interpreter must consider both semantic and contextual factors. The first hypothesis, in which Paul moves from a primitive apocalyptic to a Hellenistic viewpoint seems to cohere with the third model of development, but it simply does not fit the data. There are apocalyptic aspects in the Corinthian letters (e.g., 1 Cor 15), as well as in the prison letters, which maintain a strong expectation of the Parousia (e.g., Eph 1:14, 5:5; Phil 1:6, 10, 23; 3:21). The second hypothesis, in which Paul's understanding of the timing of the resurrection appears to shift, does seem to suggest development. But which of the three models of development fits this picture? Most would say that Pauline eschatology exemplifies one of the first two models (either a new explication of a basic truth or an organic development of thought), for resurrection at death and at the Parousia are not contradictory if one posits an intermediate state.* In light of an intermediate state, it may be unnecessary to ask whether Paul changed his mind. Paul may have been stressing two different aspects of a larger truth, in each instance addressing a particular contextual situation. In other words, there likely was some development in Paul's thinking and theological understanding, but it is difficult to ascertain it in particular instances due to the paucity of data (Paul's letters taken together would constitute a fairly short treatise by today's standards).

3.6. Paul and Sociology. Paul's ministry did not occur in a religious vacuum. Paul's mission was conducted within the socio-economic framework of the Roman empire, and he utilized its institutions and social dynamics in pursuing his mission.* Thus Paul provides an attractive field for sociological analysis. Sociology as a discipline studies the relationships and social settings that shape a society. There are two aspects of its application to the study of Paul: (1) Social description studies cultural factors and customs that lie behind biblical texts in order to understand them better (e.g., the Hellenistic banquet practices behind 1 Corinthians 11:17-34; see Social Setting). (2) The application of social-science theory is another matter, applying modern macro-theories to reinterpret the social dynamics behind the development of the early church (e.g., J. G. Gager's use of modern millenarian movements and "cognitive dissonance" theory to explain the movement of the primitive church from apocalyptic to universal mission; see Social-Scientific Approaches to Paul).

There are, however, several problems inherent in this approach. Applying a twentieth-century model to a first-century situation can easily lead to a misuse of the data in support of a theory imposed from above rather than one emerging from the data itself. There is a certain revisionist tendency in such approaches. The data is often too scanty to support such theories. Paul was not writing a sociological treatise on Corinth or Thessalonica but producing pastoral letters interacting with local problems. It is often too easy to take a spiritual problem and read it as a social one. For instance, some have seen the problem of meat offered to idols* in 1 Corinthians 8—10 as a social conflict between upper and lower classes rather than as a religious problem between strong and weak. If social conflict is the issue, it will have to be proven from the text itself. The tendency to explain all factors as a result of social forces is reductionistic, based on the untenable assumption that religious phenomena can simply be reduced to human factors. Social theory does have a place in background analysis, but it must be used very carefully, with an eye constantly open to reductionist tendencies. On the whole, social description is more useful than the application of social-science theory, but both can be helpful.

A general consensus has arisen that Paul and his mission were not restricted to the very poor but affected a wide social range, including those in the upper-middle register of the social spectrum. The proconsul of Cyprus was among Paul's first converts (Acts 13:12), and Paul moved freely from rural (typifying a large part of his first journey) to urban (characterizing his second and third journeys) environments. Studies of the more than eighty names found in Paul's letters have shown that a significant number were of the upper class, with homes that hosted house churches and with the mobility that was the backbone of Paul's mission network (see Meeks). R. F. Hock has shown that Paul's mission method was complemented by his leather-making craft (see Tentmaking), which provided not only his livelihood but the social setting for much of his missionary contact with individuals, with whom he conversed as he worked. Not only rabbis but also Stoic-Cynic philosophers functioned in this way.

When engaged in sociological research, it is important to observe several hermeneutical cautions. Before beginning the sociological study, exegete the passage thoroughly along grammatical-semantic-syntactical lines. This will provide a control against allowing a revisionist, reconstructed "event" to predominate over the text. Also, one should be comprehensive in compiling the data. It is one thing to suggest a possible social background and quite another thing to maintain that this is the likely background. The latter cannot be decided until all possible explanations have been explored. It is not enough to show that a Hellenistic, class-oriented meal conflict may lie behind the Lord's Supper* conflict of 1 Corinthians 11; it must be shown to be superior to the traditional understanding. One must study the contexts of the biblical episode and of the possible explanations and see which one coheres best with the NT data. One must not read extrabiblical parallels into the Pauline context any further than the data allows. The text itself should determine that theory which best explains it. When these cautions have been observed, sociological research can prove to be an invaluable ally to Pauline studies.

3.7. Paul and Narrativity. Many literary critics believe that all genres, including Paul's letters, possess a "narrative world," a fictive aspect that relates a "story" about the life setting behind the work conceived as art. In this sense, it is believed, Paul's writings all possess a plot, a point of view, an ideological framework, a setting, a characterization regarding the implied readers, and a closure. Most scholars distinguish between the historical setting or event behind the text, and the "symbolic universe" portrayed in the text. The former relates to what actually happened, the latter to the fictive re-creation of the event in the text. The latter "story" does not have to conform to the former, for it is a fictional or reconstructed world created by Paul. The reader derives the "story" by reworking the letter to discover the "narrative time" or structural sequence behind the didactic text. Each passage gives a hint regarding "what happened" behind the text, and these are reorganized along story lines to derive the narrative world in the text.

A good example is Petersen's application of narrative and sociological methods to Philemon.* He believes that two "events" dominate the letter, Philemon's obligation to Paul (from which Paul deduces a position of superiority), and Onesimus's debt to Philemon (such that Onesimus plays the role of supplicant). Paul addresses Philemon from the standpoint of Onesimus. He asks not only that Onesimus be forgiven but that he also be freed (with "brother" in Philem 16 having legal as well as social implications). Thus Paul is using his "authority" at once asserted and veiled as well as his closeness to Philemon to demand manumission via Philemon's "obedience" (Philem 21).

Narrative criticism shows promise as a new approach to Paul, but it has to exhibit even greater care in the treatment of letters than it does of the historical books, for it is more a "stranger" to non-narrative texts. Petersen's book represents exciting new possibilities but exemplifies many of the pitfalls of an overexuberant literary criticism: namely, a facile dichotomy between history and fiction in the text; a failure to develop criteria for distinguishing between the two aspects; an ignoring of the referential in favor of the symbolic dimension; a reductionism that ignores the epistolary genre in favor of narrativity; and reading twentieth-century categories too easily into ancient documents. However, these can be corrected, and there is real potential in this approach to Paul (see Bartchy, 308-9).

3.8. Contextualization of Paul. Developed by missiologists in the 1970s, contextualization is the process of crosscultural communication, determining the significance of a biblical text for a group distanced from the cultures behind the Bible. The barrier has been called distanciation, the historical-cultural gap between the biblical world and our own. The method for overcoming this gap recognizes the form-content dilemma: that the content of Paul's letters provides the core of meaning, but the form by which it is understood (see 1.5 above) changes from culture to culture. This process was true also of the early church. Paul consciously contextualized the Jewish-Christian gospel of the primitive church for his Gentile mission on the basis of his principle of "all things to all people" (1 Cor 9:23). The gospel content was inviolate, but the form that it took in Gentile circles varied. This often caused problems, exemplified in the Jerusalem decree of Acts 15 and the issue of the strong versus the weak in 1 Corinthians 8—10 (see Strong and Weak).

Yet the process is the same for us. The move from biblical text to current context is not characterized by a simple one-to-one correspondence but by a dynamic process. Nida and Taber (51-54) developed a translation technique (which applies to contextualization as well as to translation) whereby the translator "back transforms" the surface message of the text to discover the transcultural element behind the passage, the universal truth that applies to every culture. The universal truth is then "forward transformed" to parallel situations today. Some texts cross over intact, like the warnings against pride and dissension of Philippians 2:1-4, 14-18. Other texts demand a deeper transformation at the level of principle, such as Paul's outburst against the Judaizers* in Philippians 3:1-6, 18-19. G. D. Fee and D. Stuart (61-65) note two types of transforming principle: "extended application" (e.g., applying "unequally yoked" [2 Cor 6:14] to marriage with unbelievers) and "particulars that are not comparable" (e.g., meat offered to idols in 1 Corinthians 8—10, which must be applied at the level of principle).

There are six steps in the contextualization process. First, determine the surface message via historical-grammatical exegesis. By combining grammar, semantics and background information, the interpreter seeks to uncover the original meaning of the passage in its ancient context. Second, study the underlying theological or "deep structure" message via biblical theology. This is not structuralism but theological exegesis. As Paul wrote his occasional letters, he consciously chose his surface message from a deeper set of theological truths articulated by Jesus, the early church and himself. The interpreter tries to discover those larger theological categories in order to understand the message of the text in a deeper way. Third, one should study the situation (via background analysis) which caused Paul to emphasize the points in the text. These first three are the historical (or "what it meant") column of the hermeneutical task. The final three constitute the contextual (or "what it means") column. The fourth step is to seek the parallel situation in the modern world, that is, those areas that fit the situation behind the text. One must ask, "If Paul were speaking to my congregation or group on the points of this passage, what issues would he address?" Finally, the interpreter must decide whether to contextualize the passage generally (at the level of principle, step five) or specifically (at the same level as the surface text, step six). This becomes the contextualization of the text.

See also CANON; CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; LETTERS, LETTER FORMS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION; PREACHING FROM PAUL; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K.-O. Apel, Hermeneutik und Ideologiekritik (Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1971); D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); S. S. Bartchy, "Philemon, Epistle to," ABD V.305-10; R. Barthes, "From Work to Text," in Textual Strategies: Perspectives in Post-Structuralist Criticism, ed. J. V. Harari (Ithaca: Cornell University, 1979) 73-81; J. C. Beker, The Triumph of God: The Essence of Paul's Thought (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); R. A. Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1909); J. Derrida, "Structure, Sign, and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences," in Writing and Difference, ed. A. Bass (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1978) 79-153; G. D. Fee, "Philippians 2:5-11: Hymn or Exalted Pauline Prose?," BBR 2 (1992) 29-46; S. E. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1980); R. M. Fowler, "Who is 'the Reader' in Reader Response Criticism?" Semeia 31 (1985) 5-23; H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method (2d ed.; New York: Crossroad, 1982); J. G. Gager, Kingdom and Community: The Social World of Early Christianity (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1975); G. Gutierrez, A Theology of Liberation: History, Politics, and Salvation (New York: Orbis, 1973); J. Habermas, Knowledge and Human Interests (2d ed.; London: Heinemann, 1978); C. J. A. Hickling, "Centre and Periphery in Paul's Thought," in Studia Biblica III. Papers on Paul and Other NT Authors, ed. E. A. Livingstone (Sheffield: Academic, 1978) 199-214;

E. D. Hirsch, Validity in Interpretation (New Haven: Yale University, 1967); R. F. Hock, The Social Context of Paul's Ministry: Tentmaking and Apostleship (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); W. Iser, The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1978); E. E. Johnson, Expository Hermeneutics: An Introduction (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); W. C. Kaiser, Toward an Exegetical Theology: Biblical Principles for Preaching and Teaching (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); E. Käsemann, New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); H. C. Kee, Knowing the Truth: A Sociological Approach to New Testament Interpretation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); G. A. Kennedy, New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina, 1984); R. N. Longenecker, New Testament Social Ethics for Today (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); B. L. Mack, Rhetoric and the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); R. P. Martin, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1983); E. A. Nida and C. R. Taber, The Theory and Practice of Translation (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974); P. T. O'Brien, Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); G. R. Osborne, The Hermeneutical Spiral: A Comprehensive Introduction to Biblical Interpretation (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1991); N. R. Petersen, Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. Resseguie, "Reader-Response Criticism and the Synoptic Gospels," JAAR 52 (1984) 307-24; P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor (Toronto: University of Toronto, 1977); R. R. Ruether, "Feminist Interpretation: A Method of Correlation," in Feminist Interpretation of the Bible, ed. L. M. Russell (New York: Blackwell, 1985) 111-24; E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); J. R. Searle, Expression and Meaning: Studies in the Theory of Speech Acts (Cambridge: University Press, 1979); idem, Speech Acts: An Essay in the Philosophy of Language (Cambridge: University Press, 1969); S. K. Stowers, Letter-Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); S. TeSelle McFague, Models Of God: Theology for an Ecological, Nuclear Age (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); K. J. Vanhoozer, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur: A Study in Hermeneutics and Theology (Cambridge: University Press, 1990); idem, "The Semantics of Biblical Literature: Truth and Scripture's Diverse Literary Forms," in Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon, ed. D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1986); D. V. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991).

G. R. Osborne

HISTORICAL JESUS. See CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS, SAYINGS OF; JESUS AND PAUL.

HISTORY-OF-RELIGIONS SCHOOL. See PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS.

HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION

On the basis of God's* holy character and behavior, and as a consequence of the salvific work of Christ,* Paul insists that believers also are to be holy or sanctified. For Paul holiness or sanctification includes soteriological status, and—more importantly—ethical* and eschatological perfection.* Not only are the significant passages found in contexts addressed to "believers," the most important sustained Pauline passages occur after Paul has turned from his major soteriological categories to focus on the (ethical) consequences of salvation.* Paul insists upon holy and pure behavior and conduct in the lives of believers in anticipation of the return of Jesus Christ, even though attainment of complete perfection in this life is not envisioned by him.

Although the concept of holiness was important in the OT and early Judaism, its application to the Pauline concept of holiness is limited. First, apart from reference to "the holy" (see 1 below), Paul does not use the language of holiness in predominantly cultic contexts (see 2 Cor 7:1 below as a possible exception). Second, he democratizes the concept by removing it from the domain of the cult and making it the spiritual responsibility of every believer. Third, he delimits the concept, to distinguish it from other concepts that remain more cultic in nature, such as "purity"* (kathar-), which is mentioned at 2 Corinthians 7:1, Ephesians 5:26 and Titus 2:14.

1. The "Holy," or "Saints"
2. Sanctification and Justification
3. Sanctification of One's Family
4. The Problem of the Indicative and Imperative
5. Colossians, Ephesians and the Pastorals

1. The "Holy," or "Saints."

Members of the Christian community are frequently addressed in the Pauline letters as "the holy" or "saints" (Rom 1:1, 7; 8:27; 15:25, 26, 31; 16:2, 15; 1 Cor 1:2; 6:1, 2; 14:33; 16:1, 15; 2 Cor 1:1; 8:4; 9:1, 12; 13:12; Eph 1:1, 4, 15, 18; 2:19; 3:8, 18; 4:12; 5:3; 6:18; Phil 1:1; 4:21, 22; Col 1:2, 4, 12, 22, 26; 1 Thess 3:13; 2 Thess

1:10; 1 Tim 5:10; Philem 5, 7). That this is more than a formula is seen by occasional linkage of the word "call"* with "saint" (e.g., Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2) and reference to the "people of God" as holy (e.g., 1 Cor 3:17; Eph 2:21). In Paul's eyes holiness is both a condition and a process in which the believer is involved through the work of God, of Christ or of the Holy Spirit* (see Rom 15:16; 1 Cor 1:2; 1 Thess 5:23; Eph 5:26; the verb hagiazō, "make holy," "sanctify," always has a member of the Godhead as its primary agent).

Language regarding the holy community of believers and a holy God is reminiscent of the OT. In the LXX the adjective hagios ("holy") is used frequently of God (e.g., Lev 19:2) and his people (e.g., Ex 19:5, 6), and verb forms (hagiazō, etc.) are used to call the community to right living. Some of Paul's language regarding "the holy," as well as "sanctification," may have cultic overtones derived from his seeing parallels between God's OT people, who were called to conduct lives of purity, and the church (cf. Rom 12:1; 15:16; Col 1:22; 3:12; Eph 1:4; 5:27).

2. Sanctification and Justification.

As a result of the Reformation, there is a persistent tendency among Protestants to evaluate Paul's major salvific categories in light of the doctrine of justification.* While it is unwise to impose uncritically on Paul Reformation categories of thought, an evaluation of these passages cannot but reflect these questions. There are two major views of the relationship between sanctification and justification.

2.1. Sanctification as a Consequence of Justification. A number of scholars have interpreted Pauline sanctification as a consequence of justification. Hence sanctification is not a synonymous term but a development, actualization or consequence of justification in the believer's life.

2.1.1. 1 Thessalonians 3, 4. Assuming that his readers are already believers and giving thanks for this (1 Thess 1:3, 6, 7, 8; 2:4), Paul in 1 Thessalonians 4 turns to ethical instruction regarding living their lives as pleasing to God (4:1—5:22, the paraenesis). He states that "this is the will of God, your sanctification" (1 Thess 4:3), for "God has not called us for the purpose of impurity, but in sanctification" (1 Thess 4:7 NASB). In this context most commentators differentiate between the call of God, and sanctification, or holy and pure behavior. This ethical behavior centers upon sexual* morality (1 Thess 4:3, 4, 5, 6).

As is typical for Pauline paraenesis, his ethical section follows closely upon theological reflection, as seen in 1 Thessalonians 3:13, the concluding verse of the body of the letter. As he ends his discussion of his concern for the Thessalonians (2:17—3:13), Paul adds that he wishes for their love to increase, "so that He [the Lord] may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before our God and Father at the coming of our Lord Jesus with all his saints" (1 Thess 3:13 NASB). This passage places Paul's subsequent admonitions regarding pure ethical behavior within a context of anticipated eschatological reward. In 1 Thessalonians 3:13 and 4:7 the Greek preposition en ("in holiness") indicates that Christians are to live in an atmosphere permeated and surrounded by holiness.

Most recent commentators distinguish between the word used for "holiness" in 1 Thessalonians 3:13 (hagiōsynē) as the "state of being holy" and the word for "sanctification" in 1 Thessalonians 4:3, 7 (hagiasmos) as "the process of making holy." These are the earliest occurrences of hagiasmos ("sanctification") in Christian literature and, according to F. F. Bruce, have a "strong ethical sense" (Bruce, 82). As Marshall states, hagiasmos "refers to an active process which leads to the state of holiness which is the goal of Christian living in 3:13" (Marshall, 106). This distinction between hagiōsynē, "holiness," and hagiasmos, "sanctification," is well in keeping with the uses of these words in their epistolary contexts, with hagiōsynē reflecting the doctrinal assumption by Paul of the Thessalonians' status in Christ and hagiasmos reflecting his paraenetic exhortation that the Thessalonians conduct lives pleasing to God.

2.1.2. Evaluation. V. P. Furnish disputes the above analysis (Furnish, 154-57). First, other passages, he claims, do not reveal the same ordering of ideas (e.g., 1 Corinthians 6:11, "but you were cleansed, but you were sanctified [hēgiasthēte], but you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ"). This argument is not so significant, however, since "cleansed," "sanctified" and "justified" do not seem to be listed sequentially. Second, Furnish contends that justification, more than a forensic act, is a change in one's standing and one's living, and that sanctification is not primarily ethical (as if there were a special "ethical doctrine" at play in Paul's thought) but soteriological. Because there is conceptual overlap between justification and sanctification, however, does not prove that there is no conceptual differentiation of the terms, especially in light of their use in the unfolding argument of Paul's letter. In fact, the context as outlined above appears to demand differentiation between the concepts of holiness and sanctification, depending upon their immediate context.

2.2. Sanctification as Overlapping with Justification. Just as justification, reconciliation, etc., are Pauline conceptual labels for the believer's right standing with God, so too is sanctification, some scholars contend. In other words, the term is primarily soteriological rather than ethical.

2.2.1. Romans 6:19-23. Whereas the discussion in 1 Thessalonians 4 reflects Paul's ethical exhortation, in Romans the major passage on sanctification is part of Paul's larger theological or doctrinal argument (Rom 1—8). Paul has already established the sinfulness* of the human condition (Rom 1:18—3:20) and described the solution to this as "justification" and "reconciliation" (Rom 3:21—5:21; see Peace, Reconciliation). Within the larger context of discussing "life in the Spirit" (Rom 6:1—8:39), Paul introduces the concept of sanctification in Romans 6:19-23. In Romans 6:19 Paul states that "just as you once yielded your members to impurity and to greater and greater iniquity, so now yield your members to righteousness* for sanctification" (RSV). Furnish, observing that words for "justification" and "sanctification" are used in the passage, claims that this verse might "suggest that sanctification is the 'working out' of justification, the attainment of an even fuller measure of 'righteousness' " (Furnish, 156). This is reflected in some translations (e.g., NASB: "resulting in sanctification") and commentators (e.g., Cranfield, 327). But, Furnish contends, Romans 6:22 makes such a formulation difficult, since " 'sanctification' is used where one might have expected to find 'righteousness' " (Furnish, 156). The RSV renders Romans 6:22: "But now that you have been set free from sin and have become slaves of God, the return you get is sanctification and its end, eternal life."

2.2.2. Evaluation. The substitution of "sanctification" for "righteousness" in Romans 6:22 is not as evident as Furnish believes. The train of thought in Romans 6:22 "telescopes," or condenses, Paul's meaning (Cranfield, 328). The Greek distinguishes between "the return you get" (literally "your fruit") and "sanctification." "Sanctification" is preceded by a preposition (eis), which indicates direction ("to," "unto"). "What Paul is saying is that they are now obtaining fruit (of their slavery to God) which is a contribution to—indeed, a beginning of—the process of their sanctification" (hagiasmos) (Cranfield, 329).

2.3. Summary. The Pauline notion of sanctification is complex, complicated by its relation to justification and its use in several different Pauline epistolary contexts. But if one must reduce sanctification to a single notion, it may be summarized in the idea that the believer both lives in holiness and grows into holiness.

2.3.1. Semantic Overlap. Justification and sanctification are used by Paul to describe overlapping (but not contiguous) theological concepts. 1 Corinthians 1:30 joins the two together explicitly: the Corinthians are said to be "in Christ Jesus," who became righteousness and sanctification. On this verse alone one cannot draw a major distinction between the two concepts (Barrett, 60-61). The expressions in 2 Thessalonians 2:13, "sanctification of the Spirit" (possibly human spirit?) and "by belief in the truth," refer to the means by which salvation is procured for the believer. Here sanctification appears to be the initiating event for salvation, which culminates in eschatological salvation (1 Thess 5:9).

2.3.2. Semantic Distinction. Despite significant overlap, sanctification is not completely synonymous with any other Pauline term. In Romans 6:19-23, whereas one cannot be the slave* of sin and of righteousness, or God (Rom 6:20, 22), once one is freed from sin and presented, or enslaved, to righteousness, or God (Rom 6:19, 22), one is directed toward what ultimately results in sanctification (Rom 6:19, 22). Thus justification emphasizes the initial, or "conversion," experience of the believer, but it is larger than this, including the believer's life "in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 6:23). Sanctification, although it may include initiation (Rom 6:22), is the end (telos) toward which the justified strive, eternal life* (Rom 6:22, 23). Sanctification in some sense is "the highest level of justification" (Furnish 157, although he dismisses this). This understanding coincides with traditional analyses of Romans, in which chapters 6—8 speak of the life of the justified believer as sanctification.

If justification in Romans describes for Paul the power of God to make righteous ("rightwising" [Käsemann]), often equated with, though not to be limited to, the believer's initiation into life in Christ, sanctification is used by Paul to describe the ongoing life of the believer dedicated to serve God (Reumann, 83). This has implications for two areas: moral purity* and perfection,* and eschatology.*

2.3.2.1. Moral Purity and Perfection. One of the primary Pauline emphases regarding sanctification is moral purity. Impurity when contrasted with righteousness* in Romans 6:19-23 is expressed as lawlessness. In 1 Thessalonians 4:1-18 sanctification is opposed to impurity, exemplified in immoral sexual acts. Likewise in 2 Corinthians 7:1, perhaps the most important passage for seeing cultic overtones of this concept, Paul implores his readers to cleanse (katharizō) themselves from defilement and to perfect holiness or sanctification in the fear of God. There is serious debate over whether or not 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1 is derived from a Judaism such as that represented at Qumran* (see commentaries), which perhaps accounts for its strong disjunctive opposition of believers and unbelievers. Assuming that it has at the least been adapted by Paul for this context, it is a passage that puts sanctification in terms of ritual purity, in which believers are said to be temples* of God and are to be separate from what is unclean (quoting a number of OT passages). Some commentators see the word for "holiness," hagiōsynē, in 2 Corinthians 7:1 as merely a static condition, a holiness obtained by observance of cultic practices. But the context is not one of resting content with an unholy life (2 Cor 6:1-2) but one of acting out one's status in Christ (cf. 2 Cor 6:14-18). The present participle epitelountes, "perfecting," indicates being involved in a process of perfection.

2.3.2.2. Eschatology and Expectation. When Paul speaks of sanctification he expects righteous behavior in light of the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. Paul's address of believers as "the holy," or "saints," indicates his belief in at least positional (if not actual) holiness and sanctification. But the tone in which Paul expresses his desire for sanctification in Romans 6 (e.g., Rom 6:2, 6, 11, 14, 22) and 1 Thessalonians 4 indicates belief that sanctification or perfection of the believer by God (through the Spirit) is an ongoing process. First, Paul couches his words in terms of the continuing struggle of the believer. His address to "the holy" includes churches wrestling with their life in Christ. The contexts in 1 Thessalonians 4 and Romans 6 deal with believers struggling morally or intellectually with proper Christian behavior. Second, whereas Paul indicates that believers are at least positioned to attain perfection and sanctification, he indicates also that the believer has yet fully to attain this (e.g., Rom 6:2, 12). This is particularly clear in autobiographical passages, where Paul admits that he has not attained to sanctification in its fullness (e.g., 2 Cor 9:27; Phil 1:6; 2:12-18; 3:12-15). Complete sanctification, in Paul's eyes, only occurs at the return of Christ (1 Thess 3:13). Furthermore, one of the two sustained discussions of sanctification is in 1 Thessalonians, a letter concerned with eschatology. As Paul says in 1 Thessalonians 5:23, "Now may the God of peace Himself sanctify you entirely; and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved complete, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (NASB).

Marshall, commenting upon 1 Thessalonians 5:23, aptly states the Pauline perspective: "Just as Paul can refer to believers as saints or holy ones, despite their lack of actual holiness in conduct, so those who have been sanctified or set apart as God's people must increasingly show the appropriate characteristics in goodness and dedication to God's service, and Paul prays that God will work in the lives of his readers to this end" (Marshall, 161).

2.3.2.3. Reference to the Holy Spirit with Respect to Sanctification. Scholars disagree over how much to make of Paul's use of the attribution "holy" when referring to the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). On the one hand, everything that Paul wants to say regarding the work of the Spirit can be said without making use of the adjective holy with Spirit (e.g., 1 Cor 12:13; Gal 3:2; Rom 8:9, 14; Rom 8:9; Phil 1:19, etc.), so in Paul's mind in this sense the adjective "holy" adds nothing essential to the quality or character of the Spirit. On the other hand, when Paul does refer to the Spirit in a sustained context that speaks of sanctification, it is with the adjective "holy" (1 Cor 6:19; 1 Thess 4:8). Although nothing is added by the adjective, its use may illustrate Paul's association of a cultic background with the terminology. Just as the Spirit accomplishing God's purpose is holy, or dedicated to God and his service, so the product of his work, sanctification in the believer, is a matter of purity and dedication to him.

3. Sanctification of One's Family.

In the context of forbidding mandatory divorce in the case of a mixed marriage* of believer and unbeliever, Paul in 1 Corinthians 7:14 says that the unbelieving husband or wife is sanctified, or made holy, through his or her spouse, and the previously unclean children are now holy. Several solutions have been suggested for understanding this problematic verse. (1) OT views of holiness by association (Ex 29:37) are extended to unbelievers. (2) A corporeal unity between marriage partners results in the unbelieving partner actually being made holy. (3) Marriage to a believing partner removes the marriage from control of the powers of the world. (4) "Sanctification" is used in anticipation of the unbeliever being brought to baptism,* and "holy" refers to infant baptism. (5) Since "sanctification" is a process, "holiness" refers to the behavior of the spouse, reflected also in the children. (6) One of the partners is an unbeliever, so sanctification refers not to sanctification in its full theological sense but to making the marriage relationship pure and thus not warranting dissolution.

The explanation is difficult, so that a few commentators have debated whether the passage is a later interpolation. The most likely view, (6), has the major difficulty that it requires a less theologically rigorous sense for "sanctification," one unparalleled in the rest of the Pauline literature. But in its defense, if Paul were arguing for a salvific transformation of the unbelieving partner, he would surely have made this clearer. The context argues against this, being part of a section detailing the principle of "one husband, one wife" (1 Cor 7:1-16), with no divorce for Christian partners (1 Cor 7:10-11) or for Christians in mixed marriages (1 Cor 7:12-16). As part of Paul's paraenesis to the Corinthians, the ethical side of "sanctification" is probably to the fore, in which Paul is saying that the marital relationship in which these mixed partners are involved, perhaps even by its ongoing maintenance, is made morally pure by the believing partner being in it.

4. The Problem of the Indicative and Imperative.
In describing Pauline ethics,* scholars frequently refer to the tension between the indicative and the imperative. This has come to mean two different things. Bultmann proposed that the imperative (ethical command) proceeds out of the indicative (statement of theological truth), with the idea that Christians should "become what they are." E. Käsemann rejects this when he argues that the believer is simultaneously in two realms: obedience is a requirement for maintaining the condition of faith.*

Despite its enshrinement in the secondary literature, indicative/imperative language is potentially misleading, since "indicative" and "imperative" are strictly speaking grammatical labels for two of the Greek verbal mood forms (it was in this sense that they were originally used in discussion of Pauline ethics). Sometimes they are used in parallel constructions, at other times they are not. The indicative-imperative construct is in actual fact a theological paradigm, in which the two grammatical forms play some part. In Romans 6:1-23 Paul gives a series of exhortations predicated upon a description of the believer's condition (a passage frequently referred to in illustrating the indicative-imperative terminology). But Romans 6:1-11 contains a variety of verbs used in the description of the Christian, including future forms (which are arguably not "indicatives"), subjunctives (hortatory and other uses), infinitives and participles. And Roman 6:12-23 contains verbs other than imperatives regarding attainment of the believer's anticipated condition. In fact, following the imperatives in Romans 6:12 and 13, there are few other imperatives in the section.

Rather than using potentially misleading indicative-imperative terminology, scholars would be better served by the use of narrative ethics to describe the tension in Pauline ethics between Paul's description of the believer's current condition (as justified) and his ethical appeal (for sanctification). Scholars have been using a form of narrative ethics, despite their terminology, by virtue of the fact that they do not (and cannot) insist upon a strict use of indicative-imperative forms. For Paul, ethical discourse is more than simply an appeal to grammatical forms to establish moral directives, but a set of directives for behavior which derive from description of the believer's condition in Christ. The force of Paul's directives will be judged on how well he has adequately described (to the satisfaction of his audience) his audience's condition in Christ, or has narrated the story of Christ (see Christology).

5. Colossians, Ephesians and the Pastorals.
These letters occasionally differ from Paul's chief letters by using a modified vocabulary to describe such notions as holiness or sanctification, and by dealing with these concepts differently.

Colossians 1:28 and Ephesians 4:13 have the same conceptual perspective on sanctification, but use the word teleios ("perfect") instead of the more common Pauline words. In the household* code of Ephesians 5:21—6:9 cultic terminology is used at Ephesians 5:26 when it is said that Christ sanctifies (hagiazō) the church, purifying (katharizō) her by the washing of water by the word.

In the Pastoral* letters holiness and sanctification are always spoken of in terms of defining personal behavior. In 2 Timothy 2:21, hagiazō, a frequent Pauline word, modifies the word "vessel," an impersonal use uncharacteristic of Paul's chief letters, even though describing the pure person. In 1 Timothy 2:8 a word translated "holy" (hosios) is probably used to describe the hands of men who pray* without anger or dispute. This word, not found in Paul's chief letters, is also used at Titus 1:8 of the overseer. In 1 Timothy 5:22 and Titus 2:5 the moral quality of purity (hagnos) is listed as a personal trait. In 1 Timothy 2:15 the author says that women shall be saved through childbirth if they remain in faith and love and holiness (hagiasmos), with self-control. Faith, love and holiness are distinctively Christian traits, in which case the verse states that salvation for the Ephesian women is conditional upon their remaining believers (see Man and Woman; Apostasy, Falling Away, Perseverance).

See also DEATH OF CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS; FLESH; GLORY, GLORIFICATION; HOLY SPIRIT; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; JUSTIFICATION; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE; NEW NATURE AND OLD NATURE; PURITY AND IMPURITY; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS; SIN, GUILT; SPIRITUALITY; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Thessalonians (WBC 45; Waco, TX: Word, 1982); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955) 1.332-

33; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans (Vol. 1; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975); S. E. Fowl, The Story of Christ in the Ethics of Paul (Sheffield: JSOT, 1991); V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968) 171-76, 224-27; E. Käsemann, " 'The Righteousness of God' in Paul," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 168-82; I. H. Marshall, 1 and 2 Thessalonians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco, TX: Word, 1986); J. Murphy-O'Connor, "Works without Faith in 1 Cor 7:14," RB 84 (1977) 349-61; J. Reumann, Righteousness in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress; New York: Paulist, 1982); H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975) 253-65; R. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1967) 7-43; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (2d ed.; London: Macmillan, 1946) 144-88.

S. E. Porter

HOLINESS OF GOD. See GOD; HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION.

HOLY DAYS

Judaism was rich in festivals and the observance of other special days. The vagaries of the calendar however led to disputes among Jewish groups; and the rapid self-definition of the church over against its parent increased the problems for the early Christians. It is not certain what special days were observed by Paul and his churches, though it is clear that some observances provided points of friction.

1. Holy Days and Calendar Systems
2. Paul and Holy Days in Acts
3. Holy Days in the Pauline Corpus

1. Holy Days and Calendar Systems.

Problems with the calendar stem from the lack of correlation between the day, the lunar month (29½ days) and the year (365¼ days). Several calendars were in use in the ancient world, and people were probably accustomed to using different ones concurrently for different purposes. The stress in the Torah on the importance of keeping religious festivals at the correct time (the three great annual feasts Ex 23:14-17; the new moon Num 10:10; 28:11; etc.; and the observance of a strict rest not merely one day in seven but on the seventh day) adds a theological dimension to the problem of choice. Errors in calculation might be feared to lead to the observance of the wrong day, even to the profanation of the Sabbath. For it is of course the seven-day week rather than the month or year which lies at the heart of Israelite practice. A proper calendar is consequently of great religious significance.

After the Exile there is likely to have been debate over the nature of the calendar to be used in the restored cultus. The Pharisees and Sadducees, and hence the administration of the Temple, appear to have agreed on a strictly lunar calendar, with an intercalary month ("second Adar") added every third or fourth year (fuller details of this calendar may be found in Schürer 1973, Appendix III). For some, however, such ad hoc adjustment dishonored the divine order of creation (e.g., 1 Enoch 75:1-2; 82:4-6; Jub. 6:36-38). The book of Jubilees (among others) argues for a neat system of a fifty-two-week year (Jub. 6:23-38), as used at Qumran, where parts of full calendrical cycles have been found.

That calendrical concerns were not just the preserve of the Essenes is seen from other writings such as 1 Enoch 72—82, from groups like the Samaritans, and also from a later (and highly implausible) rabbinic tradition that the Pharisees had coerced the Sadducees to observe a Pharisaic calendar for the Temple cultus. In fact rabbinic tradition also witnesses to sharp differences between Pharisees and "Boethusians" on calendrical issues (m. Menah. 10:3; expanded in the Talmud and Tosefta). The Book of Revelation appears to use a solar calendar (12 months of 30 days each) in Revelation 11—12, where 3½ years = 42 months = 1260 days. The widely pervasive influence of astrology in the ancient world may well have added a further dimension to Jewish calendrical concerns.

Apart from the annual Day of Atonement, the Torah's calendrical occasions were feasts, not fasts (cf. Hos 2:11). Feast days, the Sabbath and its eve are explicitly excluded from Judith's fast (Judith 8:1-6). Fasting might be called for on specific occasions (e.g., 1 Sam 7:6; Neh 9:1; Joel 2:15; cf. 1 Kings 21:27), and Zechariah (7:3, 5; 8:19) refers to what appear to be four set fasts, one of which is probably the commemoration of the fall of the Temple on 9 Ab. We do not know what the others signified; nor whether by the first century they were still observed. But it is clear both from the gospels (Mt 6:16; 9:14 and par.; Lk 18:12; cf. also Acts 13:2) and from the Didache (Did. 8) that regular fast days were an integral part of Jewish and Christian piety, and for the Didache even a part of Christian self-identity.

2. Paul and Holy Days in Acts.

The Book of Acts contains a handful of references to calendrical items, though it is unclear whether they are used to indicate liturgical practice or simply as time markers. Strange though it may seem for a Gentile writer to use the Jewish calendar for the latter purpose, it is difficult to interpret Acts 12:3 in any other way. Similarly in Acts 20:6 we are hardly to understand Paul deciding to stay in Philippi—that least Jewish city of the area—specifically in order to spend the festival there. Acts 20:16 is more problematic. It would certainly make good sense as indicating Paul's desire to make the pilgrimage for the great feast. On the other hand, Pentecost marked the time after which sailing became too hazardous; and Acts 20:16 may indicate simply that Paul had no desire to be trapped in Asia by the weather (cf. Acts 27:9). Since nothing more is said about the festival, it is clear that it is no great concern of Luke (see Itinerary).

The other calendrical references in Acts are all to the Sabbath (Acts 13:14, 27, 42, 44; 15:21; 16:13; 17:2; 18:4; 20:7). M. M. B. Turner argues that Acts is best consonant with a continued Sabbath keeping by the early church, Gentile* as well as Jew; but that at least in the Ephesus area a meeting on Sunday evening was seen as a suitable occasion to celebrate the common meal (see Love Feast).

3. Holy Days in the Pauline Corpus.

References to calendrical points are few. Three allusions to "winter" (1 Cor 16:6; 2 Tim 4:21; Tit 3:12) would not of themselves even allow us to determine whether a Babylonian two-season calendar or the more common four-season one is in view. There are no references to fasting, even where we might expect one (e.g., 1 Cor 5). The references to abstention from foods may relate to fasting, but are more likely to relate to concerns not to transgress Jewish food* laws. The only significant passages are the following.

3.1. 1 Corinthians 5:8; 16:8. We cannot now tell whether or to what extent the festivals were being observed in Paul's churches, for the redefinition of the leaven in 1 Corinthians 5 clearly indicates that the primary referent here is a metaphorical festival, to be "kept" all year round. Yet this still presupposes some knowledge of the Jewish calendar on the part of the reader (see Lord's Supper).

3.2. Galatians 4:10. One major thrust of Paul's polemic in Galatians* is to draw a parallel between Jewish submission to the Law* and Gentile subjection to the "no-gods" which enslaved them. For both, Christ is liberator. Gentiles* were never under the Law, not being involved in the Mosaic covenant*; to seek to submit to it as Christian converts, then, is tantamount to returning to that slavery; to the enfeebled and impotent elements* (asthenē kai ptōcha stoicheia, Gal 4:9). This is described as observing "days, months, seasons and years"—surprisingly non-specific terminology (in contrast to Col 2:16), which may be due to Paul's intended parallelism (see Barclay, 61-64). The "observing" might be "studying" such times (as the inclusion of "years" might suggest) rather than "performing" them; and it is clear that astrology was widely pervasive and deeply influential in Greco-Roman (and Jewish) daily life (see Worship). The "elements"* are likely to be either those of earth, air, fire and water (as generally in ancient cosmology) or the heavenly bodies (which controlled fate in ancient astrology). Either way they are closely linked to the sun, moon and seasons. But without some form of "performance" it is hard to see how the matter could have become a specific point of contention; and it may be that, in the context of the other issues in Galatians, such calendrical observation were viewed, at least by Paul's opponents,* as part of the core of the covenant with Israel, or of the self-identity of God's people. In either case Paul views it as a self-submission to the elements which is in direct opposition to the Christian's subjection to Christ.

3.3. Colossians 2:16. The overall tone of Colossians* is more eirenic than that of Galatians. Any theological dangers facing the church are potential, not actual. But Christian freedom is reiterated, here freedom from what is obscurely described as a "written document of decrees which was against us" (Col 2:14) and from the "principalities and powers." The switch from "you" to "us" (presumably, "us Jews") suggests that the Law* is again in view. Its calendrical observance is characterized as mere shadow (skia) in contrast with the reality (sōma), which is Christ, but it is not stated that the two are mutually exclusive. The "judgment" seems to be criticism of the Christians' present practice, apparently of eating and drinking and enjoying Jewish festivals, in contrast to those whose watchword was "do not handle, do not taste, do not even touch" (Col 2:21). It does not however come from an authority figure imposing on them some alternative as a sine qua non of Christian life (cf. Rom 14:3). Here then the choice is not set up as one between following Christ and being subject to the world elements (cf. the hōs of Col 2:20), and so the issue is treated as one of many adiaphora ("matters of indifference").

3.4. Romans 14:5. The extent of the oddity of Paul's puzzling introduction of the problem of "days" is rarely noted by commentators. Romans 14:5 breaks the flow of thought despite the fact that it is introduced by a logical connective (gar, "for"). Having introduced the issue, Paul fails to tackle it at all, and his general solution ("Let everyone be convinced in his own mind") fails to help a community to solve the problem of calendrical observance. The most plausible solution to this problem is to suppose that the calendrical issue was already resolved in Rome (see de Lacey). Paul is referring back to the solution of another bone of contention in order to develop a parallel for the foods problem. If so, then probably all calendrical issues had been tackled, but the parallelism in Romans 14:2, 5 and 6 suggests that it was primarily the "strong"* who observed the days, in which case they would be more likely to be festivals than fasts (though Michel assumes a deliberate chiasmus here to argue the opposite case). It is likely that specifically Jewish festivals would have been more contentious than fasts.

3.5. 1 Corinthians 16:2. Paul's sole reference to the first day of the week occurs in the context of his discussion of the collection.* Scholarly speculation has claimed that this implies regular Christian meetings on Sunday (see Rordorf, 193-95) or on Saturday (Bacchiocchi 90-101), but the context has little to do with church assemblies. What is called for is the private budgeting of an individual. There is no evidence to support Deissmann's suggestion that Sunday was payday; we know only of daily (cf. Mt 20), monthly or annual settlement. It is therefore reasonable to suppose that Paul's advice presupposes some weekly pattern of Christian devotion, but there is no way for us to tell what it was. Bacchiocchi claims that Jews would do no financial transactions on Sabbath; on the assumption that Paul was a strict sabbatarian, Sunday was the first day on which this budgeting could be done. But if Paul sees only the Noachide commandments as relevant (see Gentiles) this suggestion becomes less plausible. Little therefore can be deduced from the Pauline corpus about the calendrical observances of his churches.

See also LORD'S SUPPER; LOVE FEAST; WORKS OF THE LAW; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Bacchiocchi, From Sabbath to Sunday: A Historical Investigation of the Rise of Sunday Observance in Early Christianity (Rome: Pontifical Gregorian University, 1977); J. M. G. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); D. R. de Lacey, "The Sabbath/Sunday Question and the Law in the Pauline Corpus," in From Sabbath to Lord's Day, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982) 159-95; J. C. Greenfield and M. Sokoloff, "Astrological and Related Omen Texts in Jewish Palestinian Aramaic," JNES 48 (1989) 201-14; O. Michel, Der Brief an der Römer (KEK; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1978); W. Rordorf, Sunday (London: SCM, 1968); E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes and F. Millar (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1973-87); E. Schweizer, "Slaves of the Elements and Worshipers of Angels: Gal 4:3, 9 and Col 2:8, 18, 20," JBL 107 (1988) 455-68; M. M. B. Turner, "The Sabbath, Sunday, and the Law in Luke-Acts," in From Sabbath to Lord's Day, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982) 99-157.

D. R. de Lacey

HOLY SPIRIT

1. The Sources of Paul's Concept of the Spirit
2. The Spirit of God
3. The Spirit and Wisdom
4. The Spirit as Divine Power
5. The Spirit of Christ
6. The Spirit and Mission
7. The Spirit and the Christian's New Life
8. The Spirit and Eschatology
9. The Spirit and Worship

1. The Sources of Paul's Concept of the Spirit. Paul's concept of the Spirit has three main sources: the revelation in the OT canon, intertestamental Judaism and early Christian thought. In addition, Paul's own experience (and that of the Christian communities he founded) no doubt played an important role in his thinking. It must be admitted that only three times in the OT (MT: Is 63:10-11; Ps 51:13) is the Spirit of God called "holy," but this designation became more common in the intertestamental period. The OT roots are evident in the fact that for Paul the Spirit is singular and unique. To speak of the Spirit is to speak of God's presence and power (Is 31:3; 34:16; 40:13). As God is one, so there is only one Spirit of God (1 Cor 12:4-6, 11, 13; Eph 4:4-6). However the term spirit (Heb rûaḥ, Gk pneuma) is increasingly used in later Jewish writing for angels* or demons* (usually in the plural) at Qumran, in rabbinic and apocalyptic* literature (Sekki, chap. 5; Schweizer, TDNT VI.375-76). The Spirit is associated from an early time forward with prophecy (Num 11:29; 1 Sam 10:6; 19:20-24; Mic 3:8; Ezek 11:5; Joel 2:28-29; Sir 48:12, 24; cf. 1 Thess 5:19-20; 1 Cor 12:7- 11). And, especially in the prophets, the Spirit has a moral character, being associated with justice, judgment and living in covenant (Is 4:4; 28:5-6; 59:21; 63:10; Ezek 36:26-27; 39:27-29; Ps 51:10-11; 143:10). The OT holds out a hope that this Spirit, as the power of prophecy, life and covenant keeping, will be a feature of the future messianic age of blessing (Is 32:15; 44:3; Ezek 36:25-27; 39:28-29; Joel 2:28-29), and this hope persisted into the Second Temple period (Pss. Sol. 17:37; 18:7; T. Levi 18:7; T. Judah 24:2). The Qumran* sectarians apparently believed themselves heirs in some sense of this promise of the Spirit (Sekki, 79-84). This prophetic promise underlies Paul's view of the Spirit as a normal part of the Christian life.

The association of the Spirit with God's wisdom (cf. 1 Cor 2:10-11) is a thought found a few times in the OT (Ex 31:3; 35:31; Num 11:16-17; Job 32:8; Is 11:2; 42:1-4) and developed further in later Judaism (Wis 7:22-8:1; 1QH 9; 12:11-12, 31-35; in Philo the divine pneuma is the source of reason and wisdom in mortals, Leg. All. 1.42; Gig. 22-24, 27). Two other ideas that Paul inherits from his background, though they are not unique to Hebrew thought, are the association of Spirit with power (2 Kings 2:9-15; Judg 6:34-35; 14:19; 15:14-15) and with life, as the life-giving force that originates with God (Gen 1:2; 6:3; Ps 104:29-30; Job 32:8; Is 42:5; Ezek 37:4-14; on the Spirit in the OT and Judaism see TDNT VI.362-63, 365-67, 368-89).

Paul's concept of the Spirit is not, however, simply a continuation of the OT/Jewish viewpoint. For one thing the Spirit has a prominence in Paul's writings which far exceeds its place in the OT. In relative numeric terms, rûaḥ refers to the Spirit of God an estimated 90 times in the MT, and pneuma does so 100 times in the LXX (Gächter). In contrast pneuma refers to God's Spirit 112 to 115 times (depending on the exegesis of some passages) in the much smaller corpus of Pauline letters.

The increased importance of the Spirit in Paul may be explained on the basis of the early Christian communities' experience of the Spirit in their midst (including Paul's own experience), in the perception of God's immanence during worship,* in the working of miracles (see Signs) and the inspiration of prophecy,* in the experience of boldness and wisdom to proclaim the gospel even through difficult circumstances, and in the feelings of joy.* These experiences for the early Christians were evidence of the Spirit present and acting. And they understood their experience as the fulfillment of prophetic hopes that in the age of the Messiah, the Spirit would fall on "Israel" (Ezek 36:25-27; Joel 2:28-32; Paul cites from the latter passage in Rom 10:13). Paul shows awareness of this OT eschatological* hope* in referring to the "promise of the Spirit" (Gal 3:14; cf. Eph 1:13). The coming of the Spirit was also a sign for the early Christians that the risen Lord, Jesus, was indeed the Messiah (cf. Acts 2:14-24, 36, 38-39; Jn 16:7-11; see 5 below).

In contrast to much Hellenistic thought, Paul does not see the Spirit as a force or a being at the beck and call of the believer. Unlike "demons" or the magician's helping spirits, the Holy Spirit cannot be controlled by special incantations or actions. He is, however, present to aid the believer in living out God's will. And while in ancient magic* supernatural aid was only believed to be available to the few with esoteric knowledge (regardless of their motives), the Spirit is given freely to all, on the sole condition of faith in Christ as Lord* (1 Cor 12:3).

2. The Spirit of God.

An obvious but important fact is that Paul assumes the Holy Spirit is God's Spirit (see God). That is, it is not merely one of a host of intermediaries, but in accord with the OT and intertestamental Jewish literature it is assumed that the Spirit is singular, unique in power and in its relationship to God (e.g., 1 Cor 2:11; Rom 8:9, 11; 2 Cor 3:17; cf. Eph 4:4). Paul always speaks of the Spirit which is given to Christians in the singular: the Holy Spirit or Spirit of God (cf. Rom 8:9; 1 Cor 3:17; 12:4-6; 2 Cor 5:5; Gal 3:5). This singularity of the Spirit can be used as a theological argument for the unity of the church: "we were all baptized* by one Spirit into one body . . . we were all given the one Spirit to drink" (1 Cor 12:13). Paul never speaks of God giving spirits (plural) to believers (1 Cor 14:12 is best taken as Paul's quoting a Corinthian saying, "[we are] zealots for spirits," without endorsing the viewpoint it implies). The Spirit represents God as present among his people—in Paul often in connection with inspired speech (particularly proclaiming the gospel, but also prophecy, encouragement, exhortation, teaching) and with miracles (1 Cor 12:4-11; 1 Thess 1:5; Gal 3:1-5).

Paul never addresses directly the issue of the personality of the Holy Spirit. At times the Spirit and God may overlap, having seemingly identical functions (as in the distribution of spiritual gifts* to different "parts" of the body of Christ, 1 Cor 12:11, 18, 26). At times the Spirit is spoken of as distinct from both God and Christ, as in the triadic formula of 1 Corinthians 12:4-6 or the blessing of 2 Corinthians 13:13 (14), or when God is said to send the Spirit or to seal believers by means of the Spirit (Gal 4:6; 2 Cor 1:21-22; 5:5; Rom 5:5). The Spirit may be described with personal characteristics. He may "lead" believers (Gal 5:18; Rom 8:14; cf. 8:4), "reveal" the mystery* of the gospel* and its implications (1 Cor 2:6-16; Eph 3:5) or help believers in prayer* (Gal 4:6; Rom 8:15, 26-27; cf. 1 Cor 14:14-16). The Spirit has its "desires" (though the "flesh"* does also, without the "flesh" necessarily being a personal force: Gal 5:16-17); and in Ephesians may be "grieved" (4:30). None of these remarks are intended by Paul as comment directly on the personhood of the Spirit, but are incidental to Paul's main point, which is usually more pragmatic than speculative. Some scholars think these remarks no more point to personhood than do remarks which seem to personalize the power of sin or of the flesh. Certainly Paul does not work with definitions of divine "persons" such as arose in later Christian theology. Nevertheless it seems that the seeds of such thought are present here. Whether or not Paul asserts the personhood of the Spirit, he is eager that his churches know what sort of personality the Spirit has: he has the character of God, and more precisely, of Jesus Christ (see 5 below).

3. The Spirit and Wisdom.

The Spirit is the only means by which God's wisdom may be communicated to humans, for only the Spirit knows God's mind (1 Cor 2:10-16). Paul denies that any sort of "wisdom"* originating from below, from the side of humanity, may comprehend God and his workings. In 1 Corinthians 1:18—2:16 Paul attacks attempts by Corinthian Christians to "correct" the gospel by revising it in the light of contemporary intellectual currents (whether Jewish or Greco-Roman)—specifically by denigrating the role of Jesus' death* on the cross.* In this passage Paul makes a very important link between the Spirit, the cross and wisdom. The gospel foundations cannot be altered, for not only are human intellectual systems "foolish" in God's sight (1 Cor 1:18-25); the problem is even more radical. God's working remains mysterious, incomprehensible to the unredeemed, who reject it (1 Cor 2:6-8, 14).

It is precisely the crucified Savior who is the content of God's mysterious wisdom, a wisdom that cannot be grasped apart from the Spirit (1 Cor 1:23-24; 2:2, 6-12). So the Spirit remains as the only possible bridge to knowing God and to accepting the gospel. Those who try to tamper with the role of the cross (or the foundational elements of the gospel) only demonstrate that they are actually people without the Spirit, "carnal" (1 Cor 2:14; 3:1). This last remark is addressed to those at Corinth who regarded themselves as "the spiritual ones," and who were attempting to revise the apostolic message. When seen in its historical and literary context, this passage has continuing relevance for the church, which in every age is faced with demands by the dominant intellectual/religious forces to modify some aspect of the gospel core. 1 Corinthians 2:6-16 is not an announcement of mystical knowledge for a Christian elite; it is a defense of the apostolic gospel as most truly "spiritual," and the Spirit as the one who communicates and expounds it.

4. The Spirit as Divine Power.

Paul inherits from the OT and intertestamental Judaism the concept of the Spirit as the power* of God (see 1 above). He attributes his evangelistic success to the Spirit's effective presence, and suggests more than once that miracles attended his own preaching,* though he does not enumerate these (1 Thess 1:4-6; 1 Cor 2:4-5; Rom 15:18-19; Gal 3:2). He expects that at Christian meetings the Spirit will inspire not only the spoken word but "supernatural" skills and events as well (1 Cor 12:7-11; 14; Gal 3:5). Naturally this is only one facet of Paul's understanding of the Spirit and must not be taken in isolation. Never does Paul invoke the Spirit's work merely to impress or entertain. Most of the Pauline passages speaking of the Spirit's power relate it directly to the purpose of evangelism or to living the new life in Christ (on evangelism see 6 below; on the Christian life see 7 below). Other references include the Spirit's power in worship—again, not simply as display but as the power to inform and "build up" Christians (1 Cor 12:7; cf. 14:5, 19, 26), or to discipline* and punish (cf. 1 Cor 5:3-5).

That the reception of the Spirit by believers is sometimes described with terms such as "fill" or "pour out (on)" has led several to claim that the Spirit was conceived by Paul and the earliest Christians as a fluid that physically fills the believer (e.g., Hunter 92), though in the Pauline corpus "fill" is only one image of many, and it occurs just three times (1 Cor 12:13; Eph 5:18; Tit 3:4-5). Such language is evoked in part by purposefully echoing Septuagintal usage, and is best understood as metaphor (cf. Joel 2:28-29, "pour out" the Spirit, echoed at Acts 2:33; and Mic 3:8, "I am filled with power, with the Spirit of the Lord").

In Ephesians the only explicit connection between Spirit and power has been internalized: it is for the "inner self" (see Psychology), and is associated with the indwelling of Christ by faith (Eph 3:16-17). Elsewhere in Ephesians the author speaks of God's power (= the Spirit?) as the instrument of Christ's resurrection* (Eph 1:19-20). Similarly at 2 Timothy 1:7 the Spirit given to Timothy is to be the foundation for a divinely inspired boldness concerning both the gospel and his association with the imprisoned Paul ("therefore do not be ashamed of the testimony about our Lord, nor of me his prisoner," 2 Tim 1:8), as well as the source of divine power to "suffer together (with Paul or with Christ?) for the gospel" (2 Tim 1:8). These functions are reminiscent of the role of the Spirit in the proclamation of the gospel (see 6 below).

5. The Spirit of Christ.

The Spirit has the character of Christ. One notable aspect of Paul's teaching on the Spirit which distinguishes it from Israelite and Jewish faith is the intimate association of the Spirit with the risen Lord Jesus, the "Jesus character" of the Spirit (Hermann, 59-66; Dunn 1975, 318-26). Hence it is called the "Spirit of Christ" or the "Spirit of God's Son" (Rom 8:9; Gal 4:6). The Spirit transforms believers from the heart outward to have the character of their Lord Jesus Christ (2 Cor 3:3, 18; Eph 3:16-17). And to be in the fellowship of God's Son, Jesus Christ (1 Cor 1:9), is the same as having fellowship in the Holy Spirit (2 Cor 13:13 [14]; Phil 2:1; see Christology).

5.1. Spirit of Christ and the Cross. Because the Spirit is Christ's, he is associated not only with power and blessing, but with the cross of Christ (1 Cor 2:1-16; see 4 above), with lowliness and service to others in line with the character of the master (1 Cor 12—13; see Cross, Theology of the). The Corinthians have to be taught that to be a spiritual person may mean not glory,* but weakness* and suffering* (e.g., 2 Cor 4:7-18 with 3:7-8; 11:16—12:10). Jesus' earthly life is a pattern for the Spirit's working in believers: "For in fact (Christ) was crucified in weakness, but lives by God's power; and indeed we are weak in him, but we will live with him by God's power for your benefit" (2 Cor 13:4). In this verse God's power is tantamount to the Spirit of Christ. This Jesus-character of the Spirit explains why the supreme sign of the Spirit's presence, the principal element of the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5:22), is love. God's greatest act of love was shown to creation in Christ's death for its redemption; and this love is "poured out" into believers' hearts by the presence of the Spirit (Rom 5:5-8).

5.2. The Spirit of Christ Relating to the Church. Since his resurrection and ascension Jesus now relates to his church and to the world via the Spirit (see Eschatology). Christ can only be experienced (in this time before his return) through the Spirit. The Spirit marks Christians as members of Christ's body (1 Cor 6:15-20; 12:12-13; see Body of Christ); he signifies that believers do not belong to themselves, but to the Lord who purchased them. Christ, as the church's Lord, leads it by means of the Spirit in prophecy, in the teaching and leadership gifts, or by other means. The Spirit's opposition to the flesh may be seen as one way the Spirit presents Christ's will to the individual. The link between Jesus and the Spirit is so intimate that for Paul it was impossible to have one without the other: "If anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, that person does not belong to him" (Rom 8:9; cf. 1 Cor 12:12-13). All who have faith* in Christ are on the basis of that faith assured of the eschatological gift of the Spirit (Rom 8:1-2, 9; Gal 3:1-2, 5; cf. Eph 1:13-14; 4:30; and Acts 2:33, 38-39). Hence to be a Christian is to be truly a "spiritual person" (pneumatikos, 1 Cor 2:10-16), indwelt by the Spirit (see Spirituality).

"The first Adam became a living soul; the last Adam became a life-giving Spirit" (1 Cor 15:45) is not meant to be a simple identification of Christ with the Spirit; the point of the saying in the context of the discussion of resurrection is not christological but soteriological (Fee). Adam had life for himself as God's gift; but Christ is able to give life to others (the life of resurrection, of the age to come). And he is able to do this via the Spirit, with whom he is in some sense one (2 Cor 3:17; see Adam and Christ).

In light of the above, it is to be expected that the Spirit is known by the fact that he will promote the confession of Jesus as Lord* (1 Cor 12:3). Anything contrary to that confession cannot be from the Spirit. This is the measure of the authenticity of any manifestation of the Spirit, taking precedence over ecstasy, glossolalia or any other supposed sign (see Visions, Ecstatic Experience).

5.3. Distinctions between the Spirit and Christ. At times the Spirit and Christ (as with the Spirit and God) seem to overlap or even become completely interchangeable, as in Romans 8:9-11, where "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of Christ" and "Christ in you" all refer to the same reality (on 1 Corinthians 15:45 see 5.2 above). Christians may be said to be "in the Spirit" (Rom 8:9; Gal 5:25; cf. Gal 5:16; 1 Cor 12:3) or to have the Spirit in them (Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 3:16; 6:19; Gal 4:6), just as they may be "in Christ"* (2 Cor 5:17) or have Christ in them (Gal 2:20). 2 Corinthians 3:17 should not be taken as evidence for the identity of Jesus and the Spirit ("The Lord is the Spirit; and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom"). The first occurrence of "Lord" in that passage refers to the wording of Exodus 34:34 LXX (2 Cor 3:16), meaning that when those in this age "turn to the Lord (i.e., God)" as Moses* did at Sinai, a veil of spiritual blindness is lifted from their eyes; only now "Lord" signifies "the Spirit" who is the key to knowledge of God. This is Paul's interpretation of the OT passage's meaning which he applies to his conflict with Jews and Jewish Christians. The next verse must also be understood in this context: it is the work of "the Lord who is the Spirit" to transform believers into the image of Christ, the Last Adam, the pattern of a new humanity (2 Cor 3:18).

In the expression "Spirit of Christ" we cannot take the genitive "of" as simply an equal sign (i.e., an epexegetical genitive phrase, meaning "the Spirit which = Christ"). Paul can clearly distinguish the two: only Jesus is described as the Father's Son* (Rom 1:3; Gal 4:4); only he had a human nature (Rom 1:3; 8:3; Gal 4:4; Phil 2:7); only Jesus Christ died "for our sins"

(1 Cor 15:3; cf. Rom 5:8; 2 Cor 5:15), was raised and is said to be seated at God's right hand (Col 3:3; cf. Phil 2:9). Never are these said of the Spirit. In none of his extant letters does Paul spell out in detail how the Spirit and Christ are related, but a few clues to his thinking may be present:

(1) The Spirit comes only as a result of faith in Christ, and is not otherwise a possession of humanity in general (Gal 3:1-2).

(2) The Spirit is known by the fact that he will promote the confession of Jesus as Lord in the church (1 Cor 12:3), and that he bears witness to the character of and the truth about Jesus (1 Thess 1:6 with 1:8; 4:7-8). The Spirit is recognized because he manifests the character of Christ in himself and in those in whom he dwells.

(3) The Spirit brings to believers in a personal or existential way the reality of their new relation to God as children (huioi), a reality which has been accomplished for them by Christ. "God sent his Son . . . to redeem those under Law, so that we might receive adoption as children [see Adoption, Sonship]. Because you are children, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts crying 'Abba, Father!' " (Gal 4:4-6; cf. Rom 8:14-16).

(4) The coming of the Spirit for the church is a divine work that is historically subsequent to the work of Christ (Gal 4:4-6) and may be seen as dependent upon what he accomplished.

(5) The Spirit binds all believers to Christ: they are "one Spirit" with him (1 Cor 6:17) and have been baptized* in (or by) the Spirit into the body of Christ, where they serve in the power of the Spirit and at his direction (1 Cor 12:4-13).

(6) On the basis of the 1 Corinthians 12, we see the Spirit as empowering, organizing and directing Christian worship and Christian community; and this direction carries equal authority to that of God (1 Cor 12:11 with 18, 28) or Christ (by implication, since the "body" in which believers serve is Christ's). The functions of the Spirit in relation to Christ may in many ways be said to be analogous to Jesus' relationship to the Father as depicted in the Synoptics. The two may have identical functions, yet are distinct. The Spirit, to use John's phrase, glorifies Christ (Jn 16:12-14; cf. 1 Cor 12:3), just as the earthly Jesus glorified the Father. The Spirit conveys the "mind of Christ" to believers; he communicates the will and direction of their Lord, and an understanding of his gospel. The Spirit's work and the Spirit's coming to believers is dependent on the Son, and ultimately on the Father. Yet the Spirit is not thought of as a lesser emissary, like one of the angels; he is in a real sense the presence of Christ with believers.

The Spirit has a very important place in Paul's theology because it makes possible the uniting of the historical Jesus, who was raised from the dead, with the heavenly Lord, who is at the same time present with his people. The corporeality of a risen Jesus could be potentially troubling in two ways: (1) it might seem to give Jesus a corruptible nature (because he shared in material existence); and just as serious, (2) it might make Jesus a distant figure, exalted* into heaven but separated from the feelings and needs of his people on earth. Paul avoids these pitfalls, preserving Jesus' exalted nature in a new body,* and at the same time his immanent presence with the faithful in the Spirit ("spiritual body," 1 Cor 15:44, does not mean "a body made of spirit" or bodiless existence; rather, it indicates a body fit for the existence of resurrection life—simultaneously corporeal and "spiritual"). To use a modern analogy, the Spirit might be compared to the lines connecting our homes to electricity or to telecommunication networks. These make possible the presence in our homes of power or of communication with other people, without actually having those people or the electricity plant physically present.

Some scholars believe Paul was the first Christian to link Jesus and the Spirit in this way. Although this is especially peculiar to Paul, there is evidence that he developed themes or linkages already present in early Christianity. For instance, in Acts receiving the Spirit is linked with faith in the risen Christ and confession of him as Lord (2:38; 4:29-31; 11:17; cf. Hunter, 95; Goppelt, 1.249), not to mention the gospel traditions about Jesus as the one who would baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mk 1:8 and par.). It is also notable that there is no evidence that any Palestinian or Jewish Christians ever opposed Paul's linking of Spirit and Christ in this fashion, though there was plenty of controversy on other points (one exception may be 2 Cor 11:4, which has the expression "different spirit/Spirit"; see commentaries). This implies that Paul's stance was in harmony with early Palestinian Christianity, even if Paul developed and expanded its less articulated ideas.

6. The Spirit and Mission.

As the Spirit of Christ, the Holy Spirit has an intimate connection with the gospel message. The Spirit empowers and impels the Christian mission.* This is vividly portrayed in Acts, where the coming of the Spirit is associated with the beginning of the post-Easter proclamation of the gospel (Acts 2), with its infusion of power (Acts 4:8, 31; 6:10; 8:29; 10:44), and with the directing of Peter, Paul and Barnabas at key points (Acts 10:19-20; 11:12; 13:2-5; 16:6-10). Paul himself writes to the church at Rome that he has been enabled to lead Gentiles* to God "by what I have said and done—by the power of signs and miracles, through the power of the Spirit" (Rom 15:18-19 NIV). He can refer to the apostolic task as a "ministry of the Spirit" (2 Cor 3:8), no small part of which was evangelism. The Spirit accompanied his initial missionary preaching (1) by confirming the truth of the message in his hearers' hearts; (2) by empowering Paul to effect "signs* and wonders" (Rom 15:18-19; cf. 2 Cor 12:12, which may, however, be a Corinthian expression; see commentaries); (3) by filling new believers in such a way that the Spirit's presence was unmistakable. In three of his letters, all to different communities, he reminds the readers of their initial vivid experience of the Spirit in the context of hearing the gospel and conversion (1 Thess 1:4-6; Gal 3:1-3; 1 Cor 2:4-5). Paul assumes such initial encounters with the Spirit serve to confirm the reality of his readers' conversion and the validity of his gospel, as being truly from God. The Spirit gives believers in turn boldness and wisdom to testify about Jesus (cf. 1 Thess 2:2 with 1:5-6).

7. The Spirit and the Christian's New Life.

Paul more than any other NT writer links the concept of the Spirit given to indwell believers with living the Christian life. The Spirit is not only the power of God convincing believers of the truth of the gospel, not only promoting its preaching, but the Spirit is the power of new creation to those who have come to faith in Christ (see Creation and New Creation). Christians who were formerly alienated from God have not simply been entered into the heavenly register of the redeemed; the Spirit indwells them and empowers them to live a life pleasing to God (Rom 8:1-4; 12:1; 1 Thess 4:1; to the Lord, 2 Cor 5:9; Eph 5:10). This life is described as being "led by the Spirit" (Rom 8:14) or "walking in the Spirit" (Rom 8:4; Gal 5:16, 25).

7.1. Flesh and Spirit. The opposite of walking in the Spirit is to be "in the flesh," and "flesh"* is often contrasted with "Spirit" in Paul. Flesh represents the self in its fallenness; the egotism, self-assertion, willful ignorance of God's will or the outright defying of that will. Such defiance characterizes humanity in Adam, under the old aeon. The Spirit is utterly opposed to the principles of flesh and sin, "for the flesh's way of thinking is death; but the Spirit's way of thinking is life and peace" (Rom 8:6). The Spirit within believers breaks the power of sin so that the Christian may be said to fulfill the Law* (Rom 8:1-4, 12-15).

Just how pervasive the new dominion of the Spirit is in believers, according to Paul, and how far Paul expected the Spirit-led freedom* from the dominion of sin* and the flesh to be complete, is a matter of scholarly debate. A large part of the debate concerns the meaning of Romans 7 in the context of that letter. Calvin and several modern exegetes (Cranfield, Dunn) understand Romans 7:14-25 as referring to the experience of a believer, and hence modifying the seemingly absolute statements of freedom from the power of the flesh in Romans 8:1-11. The Christian, though redeemed, may still be described as "fleshly," "sold under sin" and helplessly subject to its power until the resurrection. Some would see Romans 7:14-25, along with Romans 7:7-13, as referring to life prior to conversion, with the inevitable victory of sin broken and deliverance shown in Romans 8. Others see Romans 7:14-25 as the experience of a convert who attempts to fight sin by personal willpower, a believer who is spiritually immature and needs to be pointed to the power of the Spirit (Rom 8) that is necessary to triumph over sin (Bruce, 193-98).

Whether Romans 7 is seen as referring to pre- or post-conversion, there is abundant evidence elsewhere in Paul of his awareness that believers can and do sin. This is presupposed by his many warnings against falling into sin and his exhortations to chose the path of life in the Spirit (Rom 8:12-14, a warning and implied imperative; 1 Cor 6:18- 20; Gal 5:16-26; cf. Rom 6:12-16; 1 Cor 5:9-13; 10:11-13, 14, 18-22, 31; and especially 2 Cor 12:21). Though Paul may express surprise and condemnation when members of his churches persist in sinful behavior (1 Cor 5:1-6, 11-12; cf. Rom 6:1-2, 11-12; Gal 6:7-10; Col 2:20-23), he is ready, nevertheless, to admonish those who are "spiritual" (hoi pneumatikoi) to deal pastorally and meekly with Christians who do sin (Gal 6:1-2).

Because of humanity's corporate participation in the fallen Adamic nature, the believer's present existence is one of struggle in a life lived in the era between two aeons. The pull of the old nature does not let up, even though the redeemed now belong to the future age, to the new humanity in Christ. "We also, who possess the Spirit as a firstfruits, groan within ourselves as we eagerly expect our adoption, the redemption of our body" (Rom 8:23). Christ's redemption will therefore eventually extend to the complete renewal even of the physical self, when at the parousia Christians are raised from the dead and receive "spiritual bodies" (1 Cor 15:42-54; 2 Cor 5:1-5; see Eschatology).

On the other hand, we should take seriously Paul's assumption in Romans 8 that such a choosing of the path of life, to walk in the Spirit and please the Lord, is really possible in the present time. The Spirit provides new possibilities for humanity, and the Spirit's powerful presence characterizes the new existence which is the "indicative" (or statement of a factual condition) upon which the ethical "imperative" is grounded. This is not simply an objective, legal matter to be believed; Paul expected this living in the Spirit to affect their lives in the world in a concrete fashion. "I tell you, live by the Spirit and you will certainly not accomplish the desire of the flesh" (Gal 5:16; cf. 1 Thess 1:4-10; 4:3-8; Rom 8:4, 12-17; see Ethics).

This being-in-the-Spirit expresses itself by the "fruit"* of the Spirit: love, joy, peace, etc. (Gal 5:22-23). The image of fruit accords with the gracious character of the new possibility given by God, like the fruits of the earth which grow by his creative sustaining power. And in Galatians 5:22-23 this fruit is explicitly contrasted with "works of the flesh." If any proof of the Spirit's working and a believer's maturing is to be looked for on the basis of Scripture, surely it is to be found in the fruit of the Spirit, which displays the character of Christ being formed in a person. In 1 Corinthians 13 Paul criticizes the idea that any spiritual manifestation is of value apart from that most important token of the Spirit of Christ, love.*

7.2. Spirit and Law. As the Spirit is opposed to the power of flesh, so we find Spirit and Law opposed in several places in Paul (see Law). This is primarily because the Law (i.e., Jewish Torah), though given by God, has become sidetracked by sin and the flesh, so that even Law-keeping can become another sinful enterprise whereby humans idolize their own efforts and keep the living God at bay; or alternatively, attempt to put God under obligation. The Law cannot be kept fully by unregenerate humans, for it is impossible for them to overcome the power of sin. When the Spirit enters in, he begins a transformation into the new humanity which is epitomized by Christ. The Spirit places believers in the position of fulfilling "the righteous requirement of the law" (Rom 8:4) because by his assistance they are able to carry out the original intent of the Law: to love and obey the heavenly Father (cf. Mt 5:48; 22:34-40).

A key function of the Spirit is its power to make the saving events of Jesus' life-death-resurrection present in an effective way for the believer (Wendland, 151, 136-37). The Spirit "presents" the Son to believers: "the one joined to the Lord is one Spirit with him" (1 Cor 6:17). God's sending the Spirit depends on, and makes real to believers, the sending of the Son (Gal 4:4-7). A similar connection may be observed in the prayer in Ephesians: "I pray to the Father . . . that he may cause you to be strengthened with power . . . by his Spirit in the inner person, so that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith" (Eph 3:14-17). Related to this function of making Christ and his benefits present to believers, Paul's understanding of the Spirit is continuous with his understanding of justification.* The placement of Romans 8 in the letter's overall structure, as well as the argument of the chapter itself (cf. Rom 5:1-5 with 8:1-4), confirms this. There is no doctrine of Christ without justification or without the Spirit; and no justification without Christ and the Spirit.

Why the ethical quality of Spirit? For Paul this ethical nature of the Spirit, and of his effect on the believer, originates from two main sources. The first is that, like the classical Israelite prophets, Paul sees the Spirit as having the ethical character of God (see 1 above), which he expresses in the appellative "holy."

Paul argues in 1 Thessalonians 4:7-8 that whoever rejects the new lifestyle that is consecrated to God (1 Thess 4:3, 7) is really rejecting "God who also gives his Holy Spirit to you" (1 Thess 4:8). The argument uses the fact that the Spirit is known as the Holy Spirit, supposing that therefore those in whom the Spirit dwells should be characterized by ethical purity.* Similarly in 1 Corinthians 6:19-20, while showing the Corinthians why it is wrong and inconsistent for a Christian to use prostitutes, Paul musters the argument that "your body is a temple* of the Holy Spirit within you, whom you have (received) from God."

A second reason for Paul's emphasis on the ethical nature of the Spirit is the fact that it is the Spirit of Christ. As mediator of the presence of Christ to the Christian, the Spirit promotes desires, attitudes and behavior which are in line with the person and teaching of Christ. He is at work creating the new nature of which Christ is the archetype, and which believers will possess in its perfect form in the age to come (2 Cor 3:17-18).

7.3. The Spirit and the Church as Body of Christ. A person does not simply receive the Spirit as an individual. To claim Christ as Lord entails being "baptized by one Spirit into one body" (1 Cor 12:13; see Body of Christ). It means a calling into a corporate existence, becoming part of a new social network directed by the Spirit. Therefore the changes which the Spirit brings about, and the spiritual gifts which he supplies to the individual, are not for self- improvement only; believers are to use these for the benefit of their fellow Christians (1 Cor 12:7; 14:5, 26). The Spirit is the unifying and creative force which brings about Christian community, expressed in the term koinōnia, which points both toward a mutual sharing in the Spirit ("participation in" the Spirit) and a fellowship (i.e., community) created by the Spirit (2 Cor 13:13 [14]; see Fellowship). Within this new fellowship the Spirit brings different gifts to different people, who are intended to come together and work with one another, like the diverse parts of a natural body, so forming Christ's body on earth to serve the Lord (1 Cor 12:4-31).

8. The Spirit and Eschatology.

Paul regards the Spirit given to believers as an eschatological* sign signifying that God's promised salvation* and restoration* of his people has already begun. Wendland speaks of "the thoroughly eschatological character of the pneuma" for Paul (Wendland, 134). This eschatological viewpoint has some precursors in the OT and rabbinic hope for the general giving of the Spirit in the future age, and also in perspectives of the Qumran* literature (Sekki, 82-83). The difference for Paul is that the Spirit represents the inbreaking of the end time in the present.

An eschatological note is sounded in the idea of the Spirit as "first fruits"* and as the "down payment" (arrabōn) for believers of what they will receive when the messianic kingdom* has fully arrived, judgment* is past and every enemy* of God is defeated (Rom 8:18-25; 2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:13-14; 4:30; see Triumph). Thus in the present the Spirit is simultaneously a portion of the life and power of the future age, and a sign pointing beyond the present, telling believers that the fullness of the messianic age has not yet arrived. "The creation waits in eager expectation for the children of God to be revealed . . . but also we who have the first fruits of the Spirit groan inwardly too, while we eagerly await (our) adoption, the redemption of our bodies" (Rom 8:19, 23). Throughout his letters Paul maintains this tension in his view of the Spirit: it is not itself the fullness of the kingdom of God, yet it is a foretaste of future "glory,"* continually pointing forward to the eschatological redemption of the body (Beker, 281-83). The Spirit is himself an in-breaking of the powers of the age to come and a guarantee of the reality of that age together with the believer's part in it.

This linking of the power and presence of the Spirit with the future age is also manifest in the hope and joy that the Spirit inspires in believers (Gal 5:22; Rom 15:13). This hope is a confidence that believers will not be disappointed, that the down payment of the Spirit will indeed be one day confirmed by participation in God's glory and in the renewal of their entire existence alongside the renewal of all creation (Rom 5:2, 5; 8:23-25). Hence a "hope" that has reference only to this present existence is a cruel joke which ends in meaningless existence (1 Cor 15:19).

The Spirit is also the power of the future age present for believers in their struggle with the forces of this age which are at enmity with God—particularly the flesh and sin. Paul can at the same time say "by the Spirit we eagerly await through faith the hoped-for righteousness*"; yet also enjoin believers to "live by the Spirit, and you will not carry out what the flesh desires" (Gal 5:5, 16). For Christians in the Spirit are set free from the deadly powers of this age (Rom 8:2, 6). Hence we are brought back to ethics and to the Christ-nature of the Spirit, showing how for Paul all these facets are inextricably interwoven.

9. The Spirit and Worship.

Paul informs the Corinthian Christians that, both as a whole and individually, they are God's temple*: "Do you not know that you (plural) are God's temple, and God's Spirit lives in you?" (1 Cor 3:16; cf. 6:19). This saying establishes that worship* is not facilitated by a holy site, building or objects, but by the presence of God's Spirit. "For it is we who are the circumcision, we who worship by the Spirit of God, who glory in Christ Jesus" (Phil 3:3). The place of worship is the human heart, cleansed, renewed and accompanied by the Spirit (cf. Jn 4:23-24), or the Christian community as the Spirit's shrine (1 Cor 3:16).

In 1 Corinthians 12 and 14 Paul discusses the significance and purpose of the Spirit's gifts to the body of Christ within the context of worship gatherings. This is the most extensive discussion of early Christian worship we have from the NT period. Paul points to the Spirit as the source of Christians' "gifts,"* whether they appear to be more supernatural or more normal. That the Spirit distributes these gifts means they are benefits given by God's generous grace and may not be used as tokens of one's spiritual status or achievement. They are given out as the Spirit wishes, not as humans wish. We learn from chapter 14 that the purpose of this direction by the Spirit is for Christians to be "edified" (1 Cor 14:1-5, 26)—a term which literally means "built up," as in the construction of a house. "To edify" pictures the Christians as those who learn, mature and are strengthened. Although Paul urges believers to attend to the way in which they use these Spirit-given abilities, ultimately the building up of the body is the work of the Spirit himself.

The most notable class of actions which the Spirit empowers in worship is that of inspired speech of various sorts. Prophecy* is the most obvious (1 Cor 12:10; 14:1-5, 39); it involved instruction, moral exhortation and correction for the congregation (1 Cor 14:3). It is one of the most frequently mentioned of spiritual gifts, closely linked with the Spirit's presence, and Paul encouraged its practice. To denigrate or prohibit it would seem from 1 Thessalonians 5:19-20 to be equivalent to "quenching" the Spirit. Other gifts of inspired speech include a "word of knowledge*" or wisdom (1 Cor 12:8; one or both may be equivalent to teaching, which is not mentioned in this list but is included at 1 Cor 12:28-29); teaching is viewed as inspired by the Spirit as well (1 Cor 12:28-29; 14:19, 26), as is prayer—whether "in the Spirit" or not (1 Cor 14:2, 14-19)—and glossolalia with its accompanying interpretation (1 Cor 14:1-5, 13-19, 39; see Tongues). Even the singing of hymns is in the overall context to be understood as something prompted by the Spirit, who leads the church in its worship, inspiring music and praise (1 Cor 14:15, 26). Ephesians 5:18-19 (cf. Col 3:16) also makes a link between being filled with the Spirit, edification and worship (psalms, hymns and songs of the Spirit; see Hymns).

These worship settings also demonstrate a concern for the mutual welfare and upbuilding of believers. Other supernatural events during worship are sometimes referred to by Paul in a general way. The reference of Galatians 3:5 to God's supplying the Spirit and working miracles among the Galatians most likely refers to the ongoing worship experience of their churches. And if, on the basis of what is said about the Spirit's work in 1 Corinthians 12:4-11, the gifts are always the Spirit's work, then we may look to the list in Romans 12:6-8 to highlight vividly how for Paul the Spirit inspires even mundane tasks such as administration and charity.

Outside 1 Corinthians there are surprisingly few explicit references to the role of the Spirit in worship. Perhaps this is partly because nowhere else in Paul are problems with the worship assemblies of a church dealt with so extensively. Outside 1 Corinthians the most frequent aspect of worship associated with the Spirit is prayer.* The Spirit who marks Christians as God's children inspires the confident "Abba" prayer of the redeemed (Rom 8:15-16; Gal 4:6). And he aids believers in their prayers, directing them to pray properly (Rom 8:26). At the same time the Spirit himself prays on behalf of those he indwells (Rom 8:27). In Ephesians also "access" to God in prayer is granted by the Spirit (Eph 2:18), and this praying in the Spirit is urged on believers as a constant practice (Eph 6:18). This is the mark of the church* as true Israel,* that the community prays and worships in the Spirit (Phil 3:3). Philippians 1:19 also associates the Spirit's provision with prayer.

Beyond these there are no other explicit connections between the Spirit and worship in Paul. A few other statements may depend upon an oblique reference to believers' experience of the Spirit in worship, such as the "Abba" prayer already noted. It is possible that references to the peace and joy generated by the Spirit are inspired partly by worship experiences (Rom 15:13), as are those to the love generated by the Spirit (Rom 5:5; Col 1:8), the fellowship created by the Spirit (Phil 2:1; 2 Cor 13:13 [14]) and the Spirit as a "down payment" (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5—as though it were a tangible evidence to believers), though these suggestions are only conjectures. One thing is sure: that the Spirit plays an enormously important role in Christian worship and in every aspect of the believer's experience of God. We must remember the ad hoc nature of Paul's letters, and assume that there is even more to be said about the Spirit's role in worship that he has not thought necessary to mention (hence the need, e.g., to supply the idea of the Spirit's inspiration in Rom 12:6-8 on the basis of what Paul says in 1 Cor 12).

We might summarize by saying that the Spirit empowers various believers with gifts that benefit others and that aid in worship; that he arranges the distribution of gifts according to their need, and inspires believers to use them aright (1 Cor 14:37-40). This does not mean that everything done with the Spirit's aid in worship must necessarily be done spontaneously, for what is done with the mind (1 Cor 14:15), with purposeful and creative forethought, or with faithfulness to apostolic tradition* (as in teaching*), may be just as inspired and spiritual as something done on the spur of the moment (cf. traditional formulas at 1 Cor 15:1-8; 1 Tim 3:16; see Creed).

The Spirit encourages believers in prayer to have boldness in speaking to the God with whom they are now reconciled as beloved children. He initiates the impulse from below and brings the Father's loving response from above. Ideally, worship is a Spirit-led symphony of doxology, giving praise to God, proclaiming what he has done and is doing, and what the human response should be.

See also ADOPTION, SONSHIP; CHRISTOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; FIRST FRUITS, DOWN PAYMENT; FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; GOD; HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION; IN CHRIST; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; POWER; PROPHECY, PROPHESYING; SPIRITUALITY; TONGUES; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1952) §§ 14, 38; C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); idem, Romans (WBC; 2 vols.; Dallas: Word, 1988); E. E. Ellis, Prophecy and Hermeneutic (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1978); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1987); P. Gächter, "Zum Pneumabegriff des hl. Paulus," ZKT 53 (1929) 345-408; L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981, 1982); I. Hermann, Kyrios und Pneuma: Studien zur Christologie der paulinischen Hauptbriefe (Munich: Kösel, 1961); D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings (Cambridge University Press, 1967); A. M. Hunter, Paul and his Predecessors (rev. ed.; London: SCM, 1961); D. J. Lull, The Spirit in Galatia: Paul's Interpretation of Pneuma as Divine Power (SBLDS 49; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1980); R. P. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); idem, "The Spirit in 2 Corinthians in Light of the 'Fellowship of the Holy Spirit' in 2 Corinthians 13:14," in Eschatology and the New Testament, ed. W. H. Gloer (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988); idem, Worship in the Early Church (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1964); P. Meyer, "The Holy Spirit in the Pauline Letters: A Contextual Exploration," Int 33 (1979) 3-18; C. F. D. Moule, The Holy Spirit (London: Mowbrays, 1978); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (2d ed.; London: Black, 1953); E. Schweizer, "πνεῦμα κτλ (New Testament)," TDNT VI.396-451; idem, The Holy Spirit (London: SCM, 1980); A. E. Sekki, The Meaning of Ruah at Qumran (SBLDS 110; Atlanta: Scholars, 1989); H.-D. Wendland, "Das Wirken des heiligen Geistes in den Gläubigen nach Paulus," in Pro Veritate: Ein theologischer Dialog, ed. E. Schlink and H. Volk (Münster: Aschendorff, 1963) 133-56; W. Wright, Jr., "The Source of Paul's Concept of Pneuma," CovQ 41 (1983) 17-26.

T. Paige

HOMOSEXUALITY

Homosexual activity was not uncommon in the Hellenistic world of Paul's day, chiefly in the form of pederastic liaisons between adult males and young teenagers. Some male prostitution was also current. Yet pederasty was no longer as accepted as it had once been in classical Greece, nor did such "Greek love" ever enjoy equal acceptance in Roman life. Female homosexuality is hardly ever mentioned in classical Greek literature, and not often in the Hellenistic era—mostly post-NT.

1. Hellenistic Judaism
2. Romans 1:26-27
3. 1 Corinthians 6:9; 1 Timothy 1:10
4. General Considerations

1. Hellenistic Judaism.

Paul and other early Christian writers inherited the strong critique of homosexuality common in Hellenistic Judaism. Israel, it seems, had met the problem only in contacts with the peoples of Canaan. The later encounter with Hellenism led Jewish writers (e.g., Philo and Josephus) to stress the homosexual aspect of the Sodomites' gang rape (Gen 19:5) and, especially under Stoic influence, to condemn same-sex intercourse as contrary to nature.

2. Romans 1:26-27.

Most of the references to homosexuality in the NT occur in the Pauline letters. The clearest is Romans 1:26-27. In the context Paul is portraying the moral disorder that accompanies the rejection of the knowledge* of God in the pagan world. Exchanging the creator for the idolatrous worship (see Idolatry) of creatures issues in God's abandoning of women and men who then forsake "the natural use" of their bodies for a use "against nature."

The force of this unmistakable presentation of both female and male same-sex intercourse as a mark of godlessness is today often blunted by minimizing arguments. It is claimed, for example, that the condemnation concerns only homosexual depravity inspired by idolatry (e.g., in sacral prostitution) and has no bearing upon same-sex relations in other contexts. But this is to ignore the clear sequence of Paul's text, which cites the unquestionably immoral character of homosexuality, along with "all manner of wickedness," such as envy, murder, slander and disobedience to parents (Rom 1:29-31), as evidence of the consequences of abandoning God.

Even less plausible is the interpretation (of J. Boswell, among others) that limits Paul's reference to those heterosexuals who pursue homosexual unions contrary to their individual heterosexual natures. The passage has no bearing, it is alleged, on people homosexual by nature. This atomistic reading of these verses is artificially strained, for Paul is commenting on human society at large and focuses on behavior itself. A distinction between persons of heterosexual and homosexual orientation was almost certainly unknown to him.

Others again argue that "unnatural" simply means unconventional, contrary to accepted social practice. But the prominence of the theme of divine creation* in the context (especially Rom 1:20, 25) surely requires that defiance of nature be construed of the flouting of sexual distinctions basic to God's creative design. After all, widespread social usage tolerated homosexual intercourse.

Finally, L. W. Countryman thinks that Romans 1:26-27 treats homosexual acts not as sinful but only as unclean, "an integral if unpleasantly dirty aspect of Gentile culture" (Countryman, 117). Such a reading, which makes the import of Paul's statements cultural rather than moral, misses the triple parallelism of "God gave them up" in Romans 1:24, 26 and 28, and invests the passage with an implausibly sophistic subtlety.

These varied attempts to rule Romans 1 out of court in modern ethical discussion nearly all miss a feature which attests remarkable insight on Paul's part. These verses contain one of the very earliest combined condemnations of female and male homosexuality alike. Only two earlier texts make the link (Plato Laws I.636c; Pseud.-Phoc. Sentences 191-92). It is most unlikely that Paul derived it from preformed tradition. The fact that he condemns both female and male malpractice at one and the same time, together with his use of language that does not specifically identify pederasty as the male abuse, gives his statements a generic force. There was no equivalent to pederasty on the female side.

Contrary to frequent assertions, pederasty as such is never mentioned in the NT. Despite the availability of a varied range of words and phrases denoting pederasty in particular, none of the NT references to same-sex disorder specifies pederasty as a form of homosexuality of an exploitive or aggressive or venal character.

3. 1 Corinthians 6:9; 1 Timothy 1:10.

These two verses may be discussed together. In whatever sense the Pastorals* may be termed Pauline, the use of arsenokoitai in 1 Timothy 1:10 surely betrays a Pauline finger-print, for this Greek noun is not attested before 1 Corinthians 6:9. English translations vary considerably, partly because the obvious derivation of the word from the LXX of Leviticus 18:22; 20:13 for so long went unnoticed (Lev 20:13: hos an koimēthē meta arsenos koitēn gynaikos). It denotes (males) "who lie or bed with males" (not, as Boswell argues, "males [prostitutes] who lie with" (males or females), which linguistically is impossible). Whether a Jewish or Christian—even a Pauline—neologism, the term picks up the Levitical ban, which did not have pederasty in view. Even if what Paul has chiefly in mind is pederasty, his choice of this word, at best very rare, depicts it as sinful in the generic context of males having sex with males. (R. Scroggs' attempt to find in the two Pauline uses not merely pederasty alone but quite precise forms of pederasty is rendered highly improbable by his other claim that Paul is merely reproducing preformed tradition.) The Levitical associations of arsenokoitēs are borne out by the context of its next occurrence, in Sibylline Oracles 2:73: "Do not practice homosexuality."

The malakoi, literally "soft," who precede arsenokoitai in 1 Corinthians 6:9, may well be those who allowed themselves to be misused, rather than took the initiative, in male homosexual acts.

The lists in these two verses are similar in form to the vice-lists found in Hellenistic pagan and Jewish moralists, but the parallel appearance of homosexual abuse in such lists is more often asserted than illustrated. No parallel is cited in H. Conzelmann's commentary on 1 Corinthians (Conzelmann, 106), and this vice is absent from a list of 147 items in Philo's Sacrifices of Cain and Abel 32.

4. General Considerations.

One net result of the preceding paragraphs is to vindicate greater originality and broader scope for Paul's brief references. Yet Paul does not single out same-sex intercourse as specially perverted or monstrous. He lists it alongside theft, drunkenness and perjury, as well as adultery and murder (see Virtues and Vices). The paucity of Paul's references is inconsistent with its being incomparably execrable, but this fact does not imply its relative unimportance. The broader context of his teaching on sexuality supports the view that he saw same-sex activity as so self-evidently contrary to God's creative purpose as to allow of such brief—but eloquent—mention.

Certainly Paul could not have envisaged some facets of contemporary debates, such as "monogamous" same-sex relationships between persons of homosexual preference. It is nevertheless a safe conclusion that, whatever might be said about individual orientations or dispositions, Paul could only have regarded all homosexual erotic and genital behavior as contrary to the creator's plan for human life, to be abandoned on conversion (cf. 1 Cor 6:11; see Ethics).

See also ETHICS; MAN AND WOMAN; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Boswell, Christianity, Social Tolerance and Homosexuality (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1980); J. J. Collins, Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora (New York: Crossroad, 1983) 141-53; H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); L. W. Countryman, Dirt, Greed and Sex: Sexual Ethics in the New Testament and Their Implications for Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); L. M. Epstein, Sex Laws and Customs in Judaism (New York: Block, 1948) 134-38; V. P. Furnish, The Moral Teaching of Paul: Selected Issues (Nashville: Abingdon, 1979) 52-83; R. H. Hays, "Relations Natural and Unnatural: A Response to John Boswell's Exegesis of Romans 1," JRE 14 (1986) 184-215; R. MacMullen, "Roman Attitudes to Greek Love," Historia 27 (1982) 484-502; R. Scroggs, The New Testament and Homosexuality (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); L. P. Wilkinson, Classical Attitudes to Modern Issues (London: Kimber, 1978) 111-42; D. F. Wright, "Homosexuals or Prostitutes? The Meaning of Arsenokoitai (1 Cor. 6:9, 1 Tim. 1:10)," VC 38 (1984) 125-53; idem, "Homosexuality: The Relevance of the Bible," EvQ 61 (1989) 291-300; idem, "Early Christian Attitudes to Homosexuality," SP XVIII:2 (1989) 329-34.

D. F. Wright

HOPE

Hope is an essential characteristic of the Christian life and a central feature of Paul's theology. Every statement Paul makes about Christian hope is also a statement about what God* has given the believer in Christ.* In his letters, especially the letter to the Romans,* Paul explores the ground of Christian hope, what it means to live in hope and the Christian hope for the future.

1. Hope in the OT
2. Hope in the Letters of Paul

1. Hope in the OT.

In the OT hope is closely related to the character of God.* Those who hope in God, trust God and his promises. Because God is the hope of the righteous, they can expect good things from God and wait patiently for his help and deliverance. This patient hope is firmly anchored in the history and narrative of Scripture. The God who has fulfilled his promises to Israel in the past will continue to be faithful in the present and future. Hope that does not place its trust in God is false hope which God will eventually overthrow.

Hope in God in the present is also a hope in God's future eschatological* intervention which will put an end to all earthly distress. This eschatological hope expressed itself as a conviction that all of history was in God's hands and that God would fulfill his promise to establish David's throne forever. This aspect of Israel's hope gave rise to the messianic expectation of the OT, apocalyptic* literature and the idea of the resurrection* of the dead. The messianic age was seen as a time when Israel's hope in God's promises would be fulfilled, the kingdom* of God would be given to the saints and the hopes of the ungodly would be destroyed by God's judgment.*

2. Hope in the Letters of Paul.

The NT concept of hope is rooted in the OT; Christian hope includes trust in God, patient waiting and confidence in God's future. But the situation of the Christian who hopes is decisively different from that of the OT. Christian hope rests on God's eschatological act of salvation* in Christ. The eschatological dimensions of Christian hope provide the framework for Paul's thinking. Christ's resurrection marks the beginning of the messianic age, the presence of the Spirit is evidence that the end has begun and Christian hope waits for the complete manifestation of the kingdom of God at the Parousia. In Paul's letters the church is addressed as an eschatological community of hope: grounded in God's act of salvation in Christ, living in the power of the Holy Spirit* and moving toward the full realization of the purposes of God.

2.1. The Ground of Hope. Paul understands Christian hope as a fulfillment of God's promises to Israel.* This hope is firmly anchored in the history of Israel and in the revealed character of God as one who is faithful to fulfill his promises. Paul delineates this aspect of Christian hope in his discussion of Abraham* in Romans 4.

Abraham is offered as an example of someone who never doubted that God would fulfill his promises. Abraham's hope is grounded in a personal relation with the God whom he trusts. In fact the only ground of Abraham's hope was God's promise. Abraham had no external or historical grounds for his hope; but when that hope was tested by human impossibilities, it grew. This is what is meant by "in hope he believed against hope." Abraham's hope grew because he believed the God of hope, even though all human hope was gone.

Christian hope is directed to the same God who fulfilled his promise to Abraham and who raised Jesus from the dead. What God has done in Christ gives Christians a far greater reason to hope than Abraham had. Christ is the faithful fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham; now even the Gentiles* can be justified* by faith and included in the promise. The resurrection of Christ is the beginning of a new age of hope determined by God's promises in Christ and empowered by God's gift of the Spirit.

2.2. Living in Hope. Christians live in the time between the resurrection of Christ and the ultimate realization of the kingdom of God. They are members of an eschatological community determined by the reality of a future that has already begun, but is still awaiting its final consummation. They live in hope because God's promises in Christ so often stand in contradiction to the reality around them. But they have more than God's faithfulness in the past and promises about the future to give them hope. God's gift of the Holy Spirit provides an experiential basis for hope in the present. In Romans 5:1-5 and Romans 8, Paul writes about what it means for Christians to live in hope.

Like Abraham, Christians must live in hope because the reality of their present circumstances so often stand in direct contradiction to the promises of God and in Christ. In Romans 5:1-5 Paul reminds the Roman church that in Christ they have already been justified by faith, have obtained access to the grace* of God and can rejoice in their hope of sharing the glory of God. Even though it is difficult to embrace hope in the midst of the reality of suffering,* Christians can rejoice even in their suffering since all of Christian experience is illuminated by the reality of the hope of glory.* If Christians hold on to this hope in the midst of suffering, their hope will grow and they will not be put to shame. The reality of Christian hope is based on two things: the reality of God's victory over evil in the death and resurrection of Christ, and the gift of the Holy Spirit. Hope is the source of present strength for believers because it is grounded in what God has done in Christ, is experienced in the power of the Spirit and moves toward the glory that is to be revealed.

The relation between the Spirit and Christian hope is further developed in Romans 8. Here it becomes clear that hope is inseparable from the gift of the Holy Spirit and the new life Christians have as heirs of God. The Holy Spirit assures Christians that they are fellow heirs with Christ because the giving of the Spirit is a sign that Christ has already entered into his inheritance; it is a guarantee that the expectations of those who still wait will be fulfilled.

The suffering that Christians undergo is also part of this guarantee. Those who are joint heirs with Christ must suffer with him before they are glorified with him. But the glory is as sure as the suffering, and the Holy Spirit is a pledge that the suffering is not in vain. The activity of the Spirit is proof that a new age has dawned and that the consummation of the age cannot be long delayed. The suffering which is characteristic of this age is the result of being faithful to Christ in a world that is hostile to him.

The image of groaning and travailing shows that creation's present condition will result in a glorious issue, which includes the redemption* of the cosmos. Christians have a great advantage in this travail because they possess the first fruits of the Spirit and can anticipate their future salvation—their adoption* and the redemption of their bodies. The glory which will be revealed is already present in the gift of the Spirit who intercedes for Christians according to the will of God. The Spirit helps Christians in their weakness by giving them assurance that their hope of glory is not vain. Romans 8:28-30 assures believers that nothing can destroy their ultimate glory; God will triumph.* This is the ground of Christian hope in the face of adverse circumstances.

This close connection between the Spirit and hope is also seen in 1 Corinthians 12 and 13. The pouring out of gifts is part of life in the Spirit. These gifts, when exercised in love,* provide Christians with an overwhelming assurance of their inclusion in a new age that has already dawned. Faith and hope belong with love (1 Cor 13:13; cf. 1 Thess 5:8) in the exercise of spiritual gifts* because these virtues embrace all of Christian existence. Life in the Spirit is a life of trusting God, having confidence about the future and loving one another.

2.3. Hope for the Future. Believers in this age live in hope because they know that they will eventually enter into an inheritance of glory (Col 1:5). This future glory exerts influence on the present through the hope it awakens. As Christians hope they anticipate the future and bring it into the present. Hope is not defined by present realities but by God's purposes for the future.

But when Paul writes about this future, it never becomes detached from the present experience of life in Christ (Col 1:27). The future Christians anticipate is a consummation of activity that began in Christ's death* and resurrection and continues in the present experience of the Spirit. The object of Christian hope is the coming manifestation of Christ. What is now the ground of Christian hope will then be fully manifested.

The object of Christian hope is explicitly mentioned in Titus 2:13 as "the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior* Jesus Christ." Closely connected to the manifestation of glory is eternal life (Tit 1:2; 3:7) and the resurrection of the dead (1 Thess 4:13-18; 1 Cor 15). The most extended discussion of these future realities is found in 1 Corinthians 15. Even though the word hope is not mentioned except once (1 Cor 15:19), this chapter is connected to the discussion of hope in Romans 8 by the use of the first-fruits* image. Just as the Spirit's work in the lives of believers is the first fruit of the coming glory, so Christ's resurrection is the first fruit which guarantees the coming resurrection of all who are in Christ. At this time God's final purpose will be fulfilled and the kingdom will come in all its glory. This final resurrection is so certain that to deny the resurrection is to deny the God who has promised this glorious future.

Christian hope only finds meaning as a foretaste of something greater and more glorious. It sets out from the present reality of God's activity in raising Christ from the dead and giving the Spirit to believers, and proclaims the future of that reality. Hope is an encouragement to believers in the midst of suffering, but it also prevents believers from being content with present circumstances. Hope insists that Christians wait with eager longing for the great day when all of God's promises are fulfilled.

Paul's thinking about hope has had a tremendous impact on modern theologians who have sought to recover the significance of the future for Christian thinking (see Moltmann). The Christian faith lives from the raising of Christ from the dead and strains toward the hope of a future given by God. In the promises of God, the hidden future announces itself and exerts an influence on the present through the hope it awakens. Hope's statements of promise stand in contradiction to present reality; hope leads reality toward the promised transformation. Christians who live in hope are "coworkers" with Christ, loving and striving for the glorious kingdom as well as waiting patiently for it.

See also ADOPTION, SONSHIP; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; ESCHATOLOGY; FAITH; FIRST FRUITS, DOWNPAYMENT; GLORY; HOLY SPIRIT; RESURRECTION; SUFFERING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. B. Cranfield, Romans I-VIII (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); B. Hebblethwaite, The Christian Hope (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); P. S. Minear, Christian Hope and the Second Coming (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1954); J. Moltmann, The Future of Hope (New York: Harper & Row, 1967); C. F. D. Moule, The Meaning of Hope (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1963); K. H. Rengstorf and R. Bultmann, "ἐλπίς κτλ," TDNT II.517-35; S. Travis, I Believe in the Second Coming of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982).

J. M. Everts

HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES

Among the metaphors Paul drew upon to describe the church,* that of the "household" is certainly one of the most important. Not unrelated is his interest in conduct and relationships proper to that institution and his use of the striking pattern of instruction known as the "household code." Although the emergence of the "house church" may have played a role in determining his literary approach, it was probably the structure of society itself which most inspired Paul.

1. The Household Concept
2. Household Codes in Paul

1. The Household Concept.

The basic unit of the Greco-Roman society in which Paul lived and ministered was the household (oikos, oikia). Its importance was such that secular ethicists saw the stability of the city-state as dependent upon responsible management of the household. The foundational nature of this institution is further seen in the pattern it provided for the structure and definition of larger political institutions. The emperor* (see Caesar's Household) came to be viewed as a father and the state as his household. And many functions or positions in relation to the state were derived from the "household" root: metoikoi/paroikoi ("resident aliens"), oikeios ("native"), katoikoi ("military colonists") dioiketēs ("chief financial officer"), oikonomos ("administrator").

The household consisted of members of the immediate family and typically extended to include slaves,* freedmen, servants and laborers, and sometimes even business associates and tenants. In principle, the householder ("lord," kyrios or despotēs) had full authority* over the members of the household. He also had obligations and some legal responsibilities to them. But the cohesiveness of the unit depended more upon the sense of loyalty to the household which stemmed more directly from common economic, social, psychological and religious factors. The household provided members with a sense of security and identity that the larger political and social structures were unable to give (see Social Setting).

Given the dominant place of the household concept within the culture of Paul's day, its impact upon his teaching is not surprising. Paul brings to life his descriptions of the church and various relationships within it by drawing on terms and concepts associated with the household.

There are numerous references to the secular household in Paul's letters* (oikia: 1 Cor 11:22; 16:15; Phil 4:22; 1 Tim 5:13; 2 Tim 3:6; oikos: Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 1:16; 11:34; 14:35; 16:19; Col 4:15; 1 Tim 3:4, 5, 12; 5:4; 2 Tim 1:16; 4:19; Tit 1:11; Philem 2). In some of these the household is identified as the place in which believers met for worship* (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:19; Col 4:15; Philem 2). As distinctions between Judaism and nascent Christianity became pronounced, forcing Christians to separate from the Temple* and synagogues, access to the homes of certain believers led naturally to the development of house churches. And Paul's subsequent references to churches* (ekklēsia) are probably to such house churches, whether considered individually or collectively (see 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1).

But it is the use of household terminology to describe the church that sheds most light on Paul's thinking about God's people and their life in relation to God* and one another (see Fellowship). 1 Timothy 3:15 describes the church in Ephesus as the "household of God" (oikos theou). Rather than referring to a building or meeting place, Paul here draws on the concept of the household as a social unit, made up of various members, each responsible to one another and ultimately to the householder, to emphasize the need for appropriate behavior among the various groups in the church (the church as a whole, 1 Tim 2:1-7; men and women, 1 Tim 2:8-15; overseers, 1 Tim 3:1-7; deacons and deaconesses, 1 Tim 3:8-13). This theme recurs in 2 Timothy 2:20-21, where the church is compared with "a great house" (megalē oikia) in which can be found both valuable and common vessels. As the imagery is applied to the church, the master (despotēs), for whom the "vessel" should be cleansed in preparation for use, is God.

Although in these two instances Paul applies the household concept to the church to encourage appropriate and responsible behavior as well as respectability and order, the imagery would also call to mind thoughts of another kind. To be a member of a household meant refuge and protection, at least as much as the master was able to provide. It also meant identity and gave the security that comes with a sense of belonging. Paul expressed such ideas in describing particularly Gentile believers as "members of the household of God" (oikeioi tou theou, Eph 2:19; or "of faith": oikeioi tēs pisteōs, Gal 6:10; cf. 1 Tim 5:8).

The dominance of the household concept in Paul's thought also influenced his perception of the ministry* and the minister. Paul's ministry thus comes under the category of "stewardship" (oikonomia, 1 Cor 9:17; Col 1:25), that is, a task entrusted by the master to a member of the household. The one who receives this trust, the minister, is called a "steward" (oikonomos, 1 Cor 4:1, 2; Tit 1:7). Such a description emphasizes the need for faithful execution of duties and accountability to the master.

In describing the church (in one way or another), the household metaphor might combine with other metaphors. Ephesians 2:19-22 illustrates this well. Here, along with six terms derived from the oikos root (paroikoi, oikeioi, epoikodomēthentes, oikodomē, synoikodomeisthe, katoikētērion), Temple* imagery also occurs (naon hagion, Eph 2:21). Thus God's household (= God's people) and God's Temple, which signifies above all the place in which God dwells, are brought together. The images are held together by Paul's teaching about the Holy Spirit* (Eph 1:14): the same Spirit which indwelt the Temple now indwells the new community of God. Also present is an emphasis on the process of "building" (epoikodomeō) which leads to the description of the resultant church as a "building" (oikodomē). That a meeting place is not in mind is clear from the organic nature of the process ("growing into a holy Temple") and the fact that the description is of a peculiar people. Discussing the growth of the Christian community in 1 Corinthians 3:6-15, Paul combines the image of planting with "building."

The effect of Paul's use of household imagery is to depict the people of God as God's household, a living and growing family whose life together requires mutuality of service and care, recognition of responsibilities, and a sense of identity, belonging and protection. As a household it would be understood that the community of God's people would be comprised of varieties of people, roles and responsibilities, and that to function effectively order would need to be maintained. In this respect Paul's use of the household concept and his choice to use what have been termed "household codes" to encourage appropriate behavior within the church are almost certainly related (see Ethics).

2. Household Codes in Paul.

Colossians 3:18—4:1 and Ephesians 5:22-33 represent teaching addressed to the various members of the household. What distinguishes these blocks of teaching as a special form is the tendency to address church members according to household role and status (wives/husbands, children/parents, slaves/masters), reciprocity (each member being addressed), the delineation of appropriate behavior with a verb enjoining subordination (hypotassō) or obedience (hypakouō). These two passages represent the fullest expression of the NT household code. But 1 Timothy 2:1-15; 5:1-2; 6:1-2, 17-19; Titus 2:1—3:8 and 1 Peter 2:13—3:7 also contain teaching very similar in tone and form. And shorter sections of related teaching in 1 Corinthians 14:33-35 (cf. 1 Cor 11:3-16) about men and women (see Man and Woman) and in Romans 13:1-7 about the church's posture toward the government appear to come from the same basic source (see Civil Authority).

A great deal of effort has gone into attempts to identify the sources of the NT household codes. Secular sources provide numerous examples of teaching in which household members were addressed. Aristotle, the Stoic duty codes, ethical teaching in Hellenistic Judaism (especially Philo) have all been cited at one time or another as sources of the NT convention. Similarly, determinations about function of the form in the earlier extrabiblical settings are brought across to discussions of the NT house codes' intention and meaning. However, no exact formal parallels have been unearthed. And the question about intention is therefore not to be answered on formal grounds.

What can be said about the intention of the NT household code will have to be based on NT usage and some broader conclusions about the culture of that day. For example, it is reasonable to say that the "fixed" pattern of teaching reflects a depth of interest in the household on the part of the early church equivalent to that of the pagan ethical writers. From this it can also be suggested that Paul's use of the Christian household code reflects his (and the church's) sensitivity to wider social expectations. Moreover, the emphasis, especially in the Pastoral Letters, on behavior that is visibly respectable and appropriate would seem to imply that the apostle desired the church to meet those social expectations as far as possible.

If we now ask the question "Why?" we begin to get at the intention of this aspect of Paul's teaching. Did Paul, like the secular ethicists, believe that the household (expanded to include the whole church) formed the fundamental building block of society? Or was this aspect of his teaching a reaction to unsettling emancipation tendencies based upon some enthusiastic but misguided use of Galatians 3:28? We can be certain of neither alternative. The indications allow the conclusion that his aim was to promote a manner of social behavior that was respectable in the eyes of those outside the church (esp. 1 Tim 3:7; 6:1; Tit 2:5, 8, 10; 3:10; cf. 1 Pet 2:12). But Paul's motives in doing so have been open to question. Some have seen in this development (which is attributed not to Paul but to his successors) the beginning of the secularization of the church. Yet it seems characteristic of Paul to endorse the respectable and orderly lifestyle encouraged in the household codes as an aid to the execution of the evangelistic mission* in a potentially hostile world (cf. 1 Thess 4:12).

See also BODY OF CHRIST; CAESAR'S HOUSEHOLD, IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD; CHURCH; ETHICS; MAN AND WOMAN; SLAVE, SLAVERY; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Balch, Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter (SBLMS 26; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1981); R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community: The Early House Churches in Their Historical Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); J. E. Crouch, The Origin and Intention of the Colossian Haustafel (FRLANT 109; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1972); M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, An die Kolosser, Epheser, an Philemon (3d ed.; HNT 12; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1953); J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); F. V. Filson, "The Significance of the Early House Churches," JBL 58 (1939) 105-12; L. Goppelt, "Prinzipien neutestamentlicher Sozialethik nach dem 1. Petrusbrief," in Neues Testament und Geschichte, ed. H. Baltensweiler & B. Reicke (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1972) 285-96; L. Hartman, "Some Unorthodox Thoughts on the 'Household-Code Form,' " in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism, ed. J. Neusner et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) 219-34; E. A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century (London: Tyndale, 1960); A. J. Malherbe, Social Aspects of Early Christianity (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1977); S. Motyer, "The Relationship between Paul's Gospel of 'All One in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3:28) and the 'Household Codes,' " VoxEv 19 (1989) 33-48; W. Schrage, "Zur Ethik der NT Haustafeln," NTS 21 (1974) 1-22; D. Schroeder, Die Haustafeln des neuen Testaments (ihre Herkunft und theologischer Sinn) (Dissertation, Hamburg: Mikrokopie, 1959); G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); D. C. Verner, The Household of God: The Social World of the Pastoral Epistles (SBLDS 71; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1983); P. Vielhauer, Oikodome: Aufsatze zum Neuen Testament, ed. G. Klein (rev. ed.; TB 65; Munich: Kaiser, 1979) 1-168.

P. H. Towner

HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS

The Pauline churches that meet us in the pages of the NT were worshipping communities of believing men and women. This is clear from the statement of Paul in his letters* (notably 1 Cor 10—14). It is therefore only to be expected that these letters will contain some allusion to a specific part of the Christian cultus, namely, the worship* of God* in religious song since, in both the Jewish background and the religious ethos of the Greco-Roman world (see Religions; Worship), hymns to God or gods were well known.

1. Background for This Study
2. Presence of Hymns in the Pauline Corpus
3. Classification and Function of the Hymns

1. Background for This Study.

The data for hymns and songs lie mostly beneath the surface of the text and have to be explored by the biblical discipline of form criticism as applied to the NT letters. But there are, in addition to certain explicit references to Christian hymns (in 1 Cor 14:26; Col 3:16; Eph 5:19-20), some encouragements of an inferential character, to which attention should be drawn. We may list these with a brief comment.

First, the origin of the church in the womb of the Jewish faith made it inevitable that the first followers of the risen Lord* Jesus, themselves Jews by birth and tradition, who formed the nucleus of the Jerusalem community, would wish to express their religious devotion in a way to which they were accustomed. This would include the use of religious song. It is this background which leads to the suggestion that the worship of Jewish Christianity cherished and preserved messianic psalms, which are represented in fragmentary form in Romans 11:33-36 as well as creedlike snatches in Romans 1:3-4 (cf. 1 Tim 1:17; 6:15-16).

Then, as the message spread to confront the world of Hellenism,* Gentile* converts entered the church from a religious world which sang hymns to the deities of Greco-Roman religion. There are some superficial correspondences between the literary form and language used in both pagan and Christian hymnody (see the definitive work of Norden), but on the more serious levels of theological content and human aspiration there are fundamental differences. These differences center in the way in which Christian compositions appeal to God whose nature is known in Jesus Christ* as a loving and faithful Father (the nearest we come to this conviction is Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus, but that trails off in a sad identification of the father of the gods and humans with impersonal Fate) and the clear declaration that the God and Father of Jesus Christ is the God who acts in history.

Much of the NT hymnology stands in the OT tradition of confessional statements (e.g., Deut 26:5-8; Ps 105) which celebrate the mighty acts of God in salvation history (see Bradshaw). Pagan prayer* as expressed in personal hymns is largely self-centered and does not break out of the circle of egocentricity (see for a good example the suppliant's appeal to Serapis in Aristides' Hymn to Serapis, which does contain some lofty thoughts but without the involvement of personal religion: so Delling, 114; Festugière, 99). NT examples of hymnic prayer are quite different as they focus on objective realities which are at the same time intimately related to the believers' experience in the Christian community—the coming of God's kingdom,* the progress of the gospel* in the world,* and the upbuilding of the church.*

In sum, Christian hymns in the NT church stand in relation to both Jewish antecedents and pagan examples of Greco-Roman religion as the fulfillment stands to the longing which precedes it. That which explains the transition is the gospel of God's grace in Jesus Christ (celebrated in such hymnic pieces as 2 Tim 1:8-10; Tit 3:4-7 as well as the more theologically sophisticated Eph 1:3-14). This good news of human salvation* brought to Christians an awareness of living in days of eschatological* fulfillment; and it was only to be expected that Christian lips should be opened in praise of the mighty deeds of God in tribute to his goodness. Much closer to the ethos of the apostolic hymns are the confessions of the community at Qumran* (e.g., in 1QS 10:9 and in the Hymn scroll, 1QH 11:3-4). These fine expressions offer examples of personal faith* and a desire to give glory to God for his saving acts. But even these tributes lack the note that is characteristic of the NT hymns. Though parts of the Pauline data are simply creation hymns (Rom 11:33-36), the most distinctive feature is seen in those hymnic confessions of faith which praise the redeeming power* of God in the gospel and share in the element which is taken from the OT and given a richer connotation in the Incarnation and redemption of Israel's Messiah (see Christ). As Deichgräber puts it, "The praise of the community is the response to God's saving act" (201), thus making Christian hymns reflexive and expressive of gratitude to God for all that he has done for the world's reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation). Encouragements like this give added depth to our study, for Christian hymns expose the nerve ends of the Pauline gospel itself, as will be seen.

2. Presence of Hymns in the Pauline Corpus.

The detection of hymnic forms in the literature of the NT is a product of comparatively recent scholarly work, and includes the results of an analysis of the literary features which are present in the documents. Direct witness to the presence and use of such liturgical compositions comes in Colossians 3:16 (cf. Eph 5:19-20). There the designations "psalms, hymns and spiritual songs" (i.e., songs inspired by the Spirit) could well refer to different types of composition. "Psalms" would be based on OT precedents; "hymns" might well be a specifically Christian genre devoted to the praise of the risen Lord (a "Christ psalm," in Hengel's description), while "songs of the Spirit" could reflect the spontaneous outburst in rapturous praise or else a song with hortatory appeal; evidence for the last-named comes in Ephesians 5:14 with its address to the newly baptized (see 3.1 below; for a discussion of these passages in Ephesians, see Lincoln). Many interpreters, however, are reluctant to see a rigid demarcation in this way, and, taking the adjective "spiritual" to refer to all three nouns—psalms, hymns, odes—regard the list as not indicating different genres of song but simply employing the most important terms found in the LXX for religious song in general (Hengel).

2.1. Criteria for Detecting Hymns. The chief criteria for ascertaining the presence of hymnic forms according to Stauffer are these:

(1) Contextual dislocations, as in Colossians 1:15-20 where the "flow" of epistolary prose is interrupted, thus betraying the insertion of quoted material.

(2) Terminology and style occur that are noticeably different from the prose writing in context and give evidence of an elevated period that is inserted into the context (e.g., 1 Timothy 3:16).

(3) Both introductory phrases, such as "thus it says" (Eph 5:14) and "confessedly" (1 Tim 3:16), and the initial relative pronoun (hos, "who," Col 1:15; Phil 2:6) suggest that a preformed composition is being added to illustrate the writer's point.

(4) An antithetic style sets up a contrast, whether on a grand scale (Phil 2:6-11) or within a more restricted soteriological tag (Rom 1:3-4). In the former instance the two stages of Christ's odyssey are delineated presupposing a pretemporal existence in 2:6a (incarnate/cosmological), while in the latter his earthly existence ("according to the flesh") is matched by his subsequent state as "designated Son of God" according to the Spirit (see Christology). The couplet formation has been traced throughout Philippians 2:6-11, and is evident more clearly in 1 Timothy 3:16, with anaphora (words linked by similar-sounding openings) and epiphora (similar endings) an obvious literary trait. Rhyme and assonance are thereby produced to indicate how poetic the piece was in its composition. Trochaic rhythms are sometimes seen, for instance, in Ephesians 5:14 with a three-line iambic structure in the original.

(5) As befits the subject matter, the vocabulary is rare, ceremonial, hieratic and full of hapax legomena.

2.2. Discerning Hymns from Other Forms. The line that divides poetry (e.g., 1 Cor 13; 15:32; Tit 1:12) from hymnody is finely drawn, and indeed the terms overlap. What distinguishes the latter as such is the subject matter that is expressed in poetic form. Invariably the hymn is focused on God or Christ and praises some aspect of the divine nature or activity.

It is just as difficult and delicate a task to separate out a species of Christian hymn from an early confession of faith (see Creed), but the chief test (offered by Bultmann, 9) is simply one of length. The creed in early times was short and was used as a baptismal confession of faith (e.g., Rom 10:9). As the creedal statement became lengthened in definition of the person and work of Christ and the character of God—both enlargements even in NT times arose as a result of pressure exerted by false teaching and polemics—so the hymnic forms were drawn into use. Adaptations of Jewish hymns (seen in Lk 1—2 and Rev 15) were insufficient to ward off the strange teachings which threatened the apostolic gospel. The distinctive Christian hymn was born out of a need to assert: (1) the centrality of Christ in God's saving plan and his unique relationship to God; (2) the true meaning of the Christian life as one of moral excellence and (3) the freedom of believers from all forms of bad religion and superstition which would hold them prey to fears and doubts.

We can sum up the chief enemy as a gnosticizing teaching which quickly challenged the apostolic message and imposed its presence in the churches of the Pauline mission (cf. Martin 1982). The tenets are seen in a denial of the lordship of Christ as the sole intermediary between God and the world (Colossians), the insidious relaxing of the moral fiber which led Christians to be indifferent to bodily lusts and sins (Ephesians), and the uncertainty that underlies the meaning of life since the star-gods still hold sway and need to be placated (see Elements/Elemental Spirits). It is not accidental that the main examples of Pauline hymns address the various situations in which the presence of gnostic ideas (see Gnosticism) is suspected and form the polemic counterthrust to heretical teaching in the areas of both doctrine and morals (for an elaboration of this thesis, see Sanders).

3. Classification and Function of the Hymns.

In light of the above discussions, the following is an attempt to classify the Pauline material which is germane. Apart from some specimens which have been identified as drawn from the synagogues of hellenistic Judaism (e.g., Rom 11:33-36), distinctively Christian compositions may be subdivided as follows:

3.1. Sacramental. Here parts of Ephesians (Eph 2:12-19: on this see Martin 1992, 167-76) and the Pastorals (Tit 3:4-7) have been designated as baptismal (see Baptism). Ephesians 5:14, the clearest illustration of a NT hymn, also falls in this grouping. It divides naturally into three lines on grounds of style and finds its obvious Sitz im Leben in a baptismal setting. The convert is summoned to moral endeavor and promised divine aid to live a life worthy of one's profession. In the context of the letter it challenges the view of an indifferent moral attitude—a wrong-headed notion which was plaguing the Asia minor churches (so Eph 4:17-23; see Martin 1968).

3.2. Meditative. Ephesians 1:3-14 is a good example of a Christian rhapsody on the themes of trinitarian faith and redemption.* It is possible that a Jewish pattern drawn from the synagogue in which God is blessed (hence the term berakah) lies in the background, but if so it has been dramatically christianized by impressive Christian concepts of election,* salvation and adoption* (Lincoln; Martin 1992, ad loc.).

3.3. Confessional. The nature of the Christian life comes to vivid expression when believers are called upon to attest their faith in time of trial. Passages of the Pastorals* (e.g., 2 Tim 2:11-13) read like hymns of the martyrs' confession and illustrate the strenuous quality of Christian living which was expected in the early church in its incipient conflict with the persecuting state.

3.4. Christological. Here we touch the heart of the matter, for as we have seen, the NT teaching on the person of Christ is virtually contained in its hymns (see Christology). Outstanding specimens in Pauline literature are Philippians 2:6-11, Colossians 1:15-20 and 1 Timothy 3:16. All these texts have been the subject of in-depth studies in recent times and collectively are discussed in detail by Sanders, Deichgräber and Fowl, with individual treatments on Philippians 2:6-11 (Martin, Rissi), Colossians 1:15-20 (Gabathuler) and 1 Timothy 3:16 (Gundry).

Let it suffice to extract a modicum of common teaching. The Christians' Lord* is depicted in a cosmological role in the double sense of that adjective. First, his pre-existence and pretemporal activity in creation are made the frontispiece of the hymns, and from the divine order in which he eternally exists, he "comes down" as the incarnate one in an epiphany. Second, at the conclusion of his earthly life he takes his place in God's presence by receiving the universal homage and acclamation of the cosmic spirit powers (see Principalities and Powers), which confess his lordship and so are forced to abandon their title of control over human destiny. His saving work is seen as that of bringing together the two orders of existence (the celestial and terrestrial), and his reconciliation is described in a cosmic setting. The hymns are essentially soteriological in their purpose, and set forth the person of Christ in relation to his world as reconciler and world ruler. But inasmuch, as he accomplished what God alone could do—the pacification (see Triumph) of the hostile powers of the universe and the enthronement (see Exaltation and Enthronement) of a true lordship, in particular—and has received from the Father's hands the right to rule human life and to be the judge of history, it was but a short step for the early Christians to set him on a level with God in their cultic worship.* Hymnology and Christology thus merge in praise of the one Lord (see Hengel), soon to be hailed after the close of the NT canon* as worthy of hymns "as to God" (Pliny's report of Bithynian Christians' worship, A.D. 112).

3.5. Ethical/Paraenetic. Much recent discussion has centered on the role Pauline hymns played in illustrating and enforcing his ethical appeals (see Ethics). The chief crux interpretum has been Philippians 2:5-11 in which the introductory verse 5 paves the way for a recital of the (preformed and self-contained) hymn in Philippians 2:6-11. Interpretations have to wrestle with some basic issues on the correct or most likely way to translate Paul's elliptical Greek, which lacks a verb in Philippians 2:5b, and thereby to identify the kind of appeal that is made by the subsequent citation of the stately "hymn to Christ." (A brief review of exegetical possibilities for rendering verse 5 is offered in Martin 1976, with some expanded comment in Martin 1983 in response to, e.g., Hurtado: see now Fee.)

The issue turns on whether Paul is moving at verse 5 from a statement of pastoral problems at Philippi in Philippians 2:1-4 to a display of ethical qualities seen in the incarnate and exalted Lord, notably his humility and selflessness (see Servant), with a view to providing a pattern for imitation.* Or, as a rival view, Paul is basing his pastoral call to have done with pride and self-centeredness (in Phil 2:1-4) on the Christians' way of life "in Christ" (see NEB at Phil 2:5), that is, as members of his church, and more pointedly on their adherence to his lordship (expressed in Phil 2:9-11). There are refinements offered to both alternatives (Hurtado for the first; in part Fowl for the second, but in danger of losing the basic insight that the "center" of the hymn is in Phil 2:9-11, noted by Käsemann). Above all, recent discussion in the commentaries (Hawthorne, Silva) largely passes over the possibility that the christological emphasis in Philippians 2:6-11 may have had an independent function prior to its being taken over and incorporated into a pastoral letter and that, in taking it over, Paul may well have redacted it (by inserting v. 8c) to bring it into line with his purpose.

If this theory of a two-stage development is so, it may offer a path of agreement which will unite the soteriological and exemplary functions of the present hymn. In its pristine form the hymn will have celebrated the cosmic authority* of the exalted Lord; in adapting it to meet a pastoral situation at Philippi (see Philippians) Paul has brought out more clearly the elements of utter humiliation and atonement (since his death was on a cross, Phil 2:8c; see Death of Christ), and so the language of his lowly condescension in Philippians 2:6-8 matches the need seen in a tension-racked community in Philippians 2:1-4, and provides an additional basis for Paul's ethical/paraenetic appeal. The call is to accept Christ's lordly authority as an antidote to disfigurements in the church with the reminder that Christ came to his throne only along the road of obedience to God (hence Phil 2:12), self-sacrifice and giving of himself in atoning death. Lordship and the "theology of the cross" (see Cross, Theology of the) thus merge to form a unified plea for "being conformed" to his way (cf. Phil 3:10).

See also CREEDS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. L. Bailey and L. D. Vander Broek, Literary Forms in the New Testament (Louisville: John Knox/Westminster, 1992) 76-82; P. Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship (London: SPCK, 1992) 42-45; R. Bultmann, "Bekenntnis- und Liedfragmente in ersten Petrusbrief," Coniectanea Neotestamentica 11 (1947) 1-4; R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus in der frühen Christenheit (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967); G. Delling, Worship in the New Testament (London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 1962); G. D. Fee, "Philippians 2:5-11: Hymn or Exalted Pauline Prose?" BBR 2 (1992) 29-46; A. J. Festugière, Personal Religion Among the Greeks (Berkeley: University of California, 1954); S. E. Fowl, The Story of Christ in the Ethics of Paul (Sheffield: Academic, 1990); H.-J. Gabathuler, Jesus Christus: Haupt der Kirche—Haupt der Welt (Zurich: Zwingli, 1965); W. H. Gloer, "Homologies and Hymns in the New Testament: Form, Content and Criteria for Identification," PRS 11 (1984) 115-32; R. H. Gundry, "Form, Meaning and Background of the Hymn Quoted in 1 Timothy 3:16," in Apostolic History and the Gospel, ed W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970) 203-22; G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); M. Hengel, "Hymn and Christology," in Studia Biblica 1978 III: Papers on Paul and Other New Testament Authors, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSNTSup 3; Sheffield: Academic, 1980) 173-97 [= idem, Between Jesus and Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 78-96]); L. Hurtado, "Jesus as Lordly Example in Phil 2:5-11," in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, ed. J. C. Hurd and G. P. Richardson (Waterloo, Ont.: Wilfrid Laurier University, 1984) 113-26; E. Käsemann, "A Critical Analysis of Phil 2:5-11," in God and Christ: Existence and Providence, ed. R. W. Funk (New York: Harper and Row, 1968) 45-88; A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Phil.2:5-11 (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); idem, Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon (Int; Louisville: Westminster, 1992); idem, "An Epistle in Search of a Life Setting," ExpT 79 (1968) 296-302; idem, "Hymns in the New Testament: An Evolving Pattern of Worship Responses," Ex Auditu 8 (1992) 33-44; idem, Philippians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976); idem, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); idem, "Some Reflections on New Testament Hymns," in Christ the Lord, ed. H. H. Rowdon (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1982) 37-49; E. Norden, Agnostos Theos (Stuttgart: Teubner, 1956); M. Rissi, "Der Christushymnus in Phil 2, 6-11," ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 3314-26; L. Ryken, The New Testament in Literary Criticism (New York: Ungar, 1984) 142-46; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns (SNTSMS 15; Cambridge: University Press, 1971); M. Silva, Philippians (WEC; Chicago: Moody, 1989); E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology (New York: Macmillan, 1956); D. V. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991) esp. 88-100.

R. P. Martin

I

IDOL FOOD. See FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; IDOLATRY.

IDOLATRY

Idolatry, the English transliteration of the Greek word eidōlolatria (literally, "the worship of eidōla, 'idols, images' "), refers to a common pagan religious phenomenon of Paul's day in which images or material symbols of deities or other supernatural powers were the objects of worship.* But the term could also refer to the gods represented by the idol. Paul's critique and guidance regarding questions related to idols and idolatry was rooted in a christological revision of his inherited Jewish monotheism which thoroughly rejected idolatry of any kind.

1. Idolatry and the OT
2. Idolatry in the First-Century Mediterranean World
3. Paul on Idolatry

1. Idolatry and the OT.

Idolatry was a problem of special magnitude to the ancient Hebrews because to them had come, "You shall have no other gods besides me," and, "You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above, or that is on the earth beneath" (Ex 20:3-4; Deut 5:7-8). Their pagan neighbors, however, had many gods and made material representations of these deities, often distinguished solely by the characteristic emblem of the god or goddess (cf. Gen 31:19, 34; Num 33:52; Deut 29:17). In Egypt, Mesopotamia, and probably in Canaan as well, devotees of the deities considered cultic images to share in the reality of the deity represented, believing that the presence and power and personality of the deity somehow resided in its image so that what happened to the image or idol happened to the deity itself (cf. Is 46:1-2). They built altars to these gods and goddesses, maintained their images, sacrificed to them, partook of feasts of sacrificial food, ate symbolically with the gods, and bowed down in worship before them (cf. Num 25:1-2).

But such practices were forbidden to Israel. They were to have no other God than the living and true God (cf. Jer 10:10) of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who had revealed himself to Moses by the name Yahweh (Ex 6:2-3) and delivered Israel from slavery to Egypt (and, by implication, from Egypt's gods) at the Exodus. Further, they were to make no material representation—no image or idol—of this one God (Deut 6:4).

According to the OT Israel did not always obey these commands, and there is some archeological evidence that confirms the use of idols in Israel. The biblical witness is that they forgot the God who gave them birth, abandoned the God who made them, adopted new gods, which in reality were demons,* made idols of these deities, sacrificed to them and worshipped them (cf. Deut 32:15-18; LXX Is 65:11; also Jer 44:15-19; Ezek 8). In response to this apostasy, the prophets declared the impotence of the idols (1 Chron 16:26; Is 40:18-20; Ezek 8:10), called upon the people to return to the Lord (Is 1:16-19), pronounced the impending judgment of God upon them if they failed to do so (Is 10:10-11), and warned them of the catastrophe that would surely come of being expelled from their land and driven among the nations as punishment for their sin of idolatry (Jer 9:15-16; cf. Wis 14:11-21).

2. Idolatry in the First-Century Mediterranean World.

By the first century, however, idolatry seems to have been rooted out of Jewish religion (cf. Rom 2:22; Jdt 8:18). The Shema of Deuteronomy 6:4 ("Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One") had become the hallmark confession of Judaism's strict monotheistic faith. For the Jews of the first century, the words of Deuteronomy 6:4 clearly indicated monotheism, not monolatry (the worship of only one of the many gods) or henotheism (belief in one god without denying the existence of others). Thus, there is no mention in the Gospels of Jesus ever speaking out against the sin of idolatry—except in a specialized sense of worshipping Mammon (mamōnas, "worldly wealth," Mt 6:24).

Outside of Judaism, however, idolatry was pervasive.

What had been true of ancient Israel's neighboring nations was equally true of the peoples of the Roman Empire—they had many gods (cf. Acts 17:23): gods to be feared, gods to be appeased, gods to be honored, gods to whom sacrifices were owed, gods whose meal was to be shared by the worshipper (see OCD, 787-88). Throughout the entire Greco-Roman world "idols were venerated in temples dedicated to the traditional Gentile gods, in popular magic and superstition, as well as in mystery religions and mystery worship" (Garber, 2, 799; see Religions, Greco-Roman). Thus when Paul went out on his missionary journeys into the Gentile world he encountered idols of every sort and people who participated in the worship of these idols. For example, when Paul traveled to Athens, he was "greatly distressed to see that the city was full of idols" (kateidōlon, Acts 17:16 NIV). Athens* was typical of other Hellenistic cities that were given over to many forms of idolatry. Ephesus,* for example, was the center for the worship of Artemis (Acts 19:28-36), and Corinth was well known as a religious center, devoted to idolatry and its accompanying evils.

3. Paul on Idolatry.

The fullest discussion in the NT on idolatry and idol worship is found in what is now known as Paul's first letter to the Corinthians.* Earlier, in a letter no longer extant, Paul had told the Corinthians not to associate with those who called themselves believers, but who were still practicing idolatry (cf. 1 Cor 5:9-11). In the Corinthians' reply to him about this command they must have put up some resistance to it, or at least asked for clarification about it, for beginning at 1 Corinthians 8:1 and continuing through 11:1 Paul devotes his attention to the topic of idolatry using the vocabulary of the LXX, e.g., eidōlothyton ("food sacrificed to idols," 1 Cor 8:1, 4, 7, 10; 10:19; cf. also hierothytos, "meat offered in sacrifice," 1 Cor 10:28), eidōla ("idols," 1 Cor 12:2) and eidōleion ("the temple of an idol," 1 Cor 8:10) and vocabulary not found in the LXX, such as eidōlolatria ("idolatry," 1 Cor 10:14) and eidōlolatrēs ("idolater," 1 Cor 10:7).

One of the sins that Paul condemned at Corinth and which he was concerned to correct involved those Christians who had turned away from idols (1 Cor 12:2) to serve "the living and true God*" (see 1 Thess 1:9, which may echo early missionary preaching, cf. Acts 14:15). In spite of this conversion, they continued to go back to the idol temples (which, in a city like Corinth, could evidently function as a sort of restaurant) and there eat the food* that had been sacrificed to the idol. Apparently the Corinthian believers were able to do this in good conscience* because they had come to "know" that "no idol in the world really exists" and "there is no God but one" (1 Cor 8:4 NRSV). The suggestion has been made that the Corinthians' "knowledge"* was informed by a Hellenistic-Jewish argument that knowledge of the one true God imbued the knower with a wisdom that allowed them to dismiss pagan idols as religious nonsense (see Horsley, Wright).

On this reading of the text, Paul is agreeing in principle with the Corinthians and anchoring his argument in the Shema. But he reinterprets the Shema christologically and introduces a duality in the Godhead: "the Lord our God" of the Jewish confession becomes "one God the Father" and "one *Lord Jesus Christ" in contrast with the "many gods and many lords" of the Greco-Roman world. By this God and Lord all things were created and all things exist. There are no other deities, and what appear to be deities are but a part of the created order in rebellion: they are demons (Wright; the view that idols are demons was well known in Judaism, see Str-B 3.48-60; cf. Deut 32:17; Bar 4:7).

What the Corinthians failed to understand was (1) that not all Christians had this knowledge nor the liberty to act toward idols with such freedom* (1 Cor 8:7); (2) that the liberty of those with "knowledge" could become a stumbling block to less knowledgeable Christians, leading these weaker Christians to sin (see Strong and Weak) against their conscience by eating food sacrificed to idols (1 Cor 8:9-11); and (3) that the reality behind the idol at whose table these Christians sat and ate was demonic (1 Cor 10:20). Furthermore, as Wright has pointed out, (4) Paul seems to imply that they had overlooked Deuteronomy 6:5, which follows directly on the heels of the Shema: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might" (NRSV). In letting knowledge override the interests of the community, they sin against members of their own family and so sin against Christ (1 Cor 8:12). Thus Paul expressly prohibits Christians from eating food offered to idols and eating it in the temple of the idol (Fee, 359).

Although the eating of sacrificial food at cultic meals in pagan temples was forbidden by Paul because he believed that those who thus ate became united to demons (1 Cor 10:19-21), Paul had no such word of prohibition for those who purchased the food that had been left over from these events and was later sold in the marketplace. In his judgment, if they ate this food at home, or even in the home of an unbeliever (1 Cor 10:27), they were not participating in the practice of idolatry nor becoming partners with demons (1 Cor 10:20-21). They could eat whatever was sold in the meat market without raising any question of conscience. If, however, in the course of doing so, someone should point out that this was food offered in sacrifice to idols, Paul's word was, "Do not eat it, out of consideration for the one who informed you." To ignore this command of the apostle could result in serious harm being done to the weaker believer (1 Cor 10:28; cf. 8:10-11). Therefore, for the sake of that weaker believer, more liberated Christians, who realized that "the earth and its fullness are the Lord's" (cf. Ps 24:1), were asked to restrain themselves and voluntarily abstain from eating food offered to idols.

In other Pauline letters idolatry is mentioned but not always with the same definition nor with the same extended discussion as that found in 1 Corinthians. Nevertheless, Paul links idolatry in all of its forms, both literal and metaphorical (i.e., the desire for anything more than God; cf. Mt 6:24), with sorcery and other "works of the flesh," against which Christians must constantly be warned and from which they must continually flee (Gal 5:19-21; cf. 1 Cor 10:14).

In Romans 1:18-32, a passage which may reflect Hellenistic-Jewish polemic against idolatry (cf. Wis 11—15), Paul traces sexual immorality (see Sexuality, Sexual Ethics) and every other kind of sin, great or small, ultimately back to idolatry. The Gentiles, who should have known that God existed from observing the handiwork of God in creation, nevertheless failed to honor God as God, and instead exchanged the immortal, invisible God for mortal, visible images (idols). Because of this, God gave them up and allowed them to go their own way and do the filthy things their hearts desired (Rom 1:24 TEV). Thus Paul included idolaters among those evil people who will not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor 6:9).

From Ephesians 5:5 it is clear that idolaters are not simply those who go to pagan temples and worship idols; idolaters also include those who are greedy or covetous: "No fornicator or impure person or one who is greedy (that is, an idolater), has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (NRSV). The point is that greedy, covetous persons, those who make their desires their object of devotion, are as much idolaters as are any of those who bow before an idol in a pagan temple. Thus pleonexia ("covetousness") and eidōlolatria ("idolatry") are used synonymously (cf. also Col 3:5).

See also Athens, Paul at; Demons and Exorcism; Food Offered to Idols and Jewish Food Laws; God; Religions, Greco-Roman; Strong and Weak; Worship.

Bibliography. E. R. Bevan, Holy Images: An Inquiry into Idolatry and Image-Worship in Ancient Paganism and Christianity (New York: AMS, 1979); J. Brunt, "Rejected, Ignored, or Misunderstood? The Fate of Paul's Approach to the Problem of Idol Food in Early Christianity," NTS 11 (1964/65) 138-53; F. Büchsel, "εἴδωλον κτλ," TDNT II.375-80; A. C. Clarke and B. W. Winter, ed., One God, One Lord in a World of Religious Pluralism (Cambridge: Tyndale House, 1991); H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); J. Faur, "The Biblical Idea of Idolatry," JQR 69 (1978) 1-15; G. Fee, "Eidolothyta Once Again: An Interpretation of 1 Corinthians 8—10," Bib 61 (1980) 172-97; idem, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); P. L. Garber, "Idolatry," ISBE 2.799-800; R. A. Horsley, "Gnosis in Corinth: 1 Corinthians 8.1-6," NTS 27 (1980) 32-51; H. Hübner, "εἴδωλον κτλ," EDNT 1.386-88; R. MacMullen, Paganism in the Roman Empire (New Haven: Yale University, 1981); J. E. Stambaugh and D. L. Balch, The New Testament in Its Social Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); P. J. Tomson, Paul and the Law: Halakha in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles (CRINT 3.1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); W. L. Willis, Idol Meat in Corinth (SBLDS 68; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1985); B. W. Winter, "Theological and Ethical Responses to Religious Pluralism—1 Corinthians 8—10," TynB 41 (1990) 209-26; N. T. Wright, "Monotheism, Christology and Ethics: 1 Corinthians 8," in The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 120-36.

P. W. Comfort

ILLNESS. See Healing, Illness.

IMAGE OF GOD

The concept of the image of God* appears in the Pauline literature in three distinct contexts: in reference to Christ* (2 Cor 4:4; Phil 2:6; Col 1:15), in reference to males (1 Cor 11:7) and in reference to Christians (Col 3:10). Elsewhere in the NT the term appears only twice, in Hebrews 1:3, where it is used of Christ, and in James 3:9, where it is used in reference to humanity generally (a usage closer to that of the OT than the Pauline senses).

1. In the Pauline Literature
2. In the OT
3. The OT Background and Paul

1. In the Pauline Literature.

The terms used are morphē (Phil 2:6), usually translated "form," eikōn (1 Cor 11:7; 2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15; 3:10), usually translated "image" (in Heb 1:3 it is charactēr, usually translated "stamp, impress," and in Jas 3:9 it is homoiōsis, usually translated "likeness"); there is no clear difference among these terms. To these could be added passages where Christians are said to bear the image of Christ (Rom 8:29; 1 Cor 15:49; 2 Cor 3:18, all with eikōn).

1.1. In Reference to Christ. When Christ is spoken of as the "image" of God, the idea is that he is the visible representation of God. This is particularly explicit in Colossians 1:15, where Christ is "the image of the invisible God," but it is also observable in 2 Corinthians 4:4, where Christ's glory* is seen as an expression of the divine: unbelievers are unable to see "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God"—which means to say, as 2 Corinthians 4:6 makes plain, that the "light of the knowledge of the glory of God" is seen "in the face of [Jesus] Christ." (Cf. Heb 1:3 also, where Christ's being "the exact imprint of God's very being" [NRSV] makes him the "radiance" [apaugasma] of God's glory.) In Philippians 2:6, on the other hand, there is no explicit use of the terminology of "glory," but the contrast between Christ's existence "in the form of God" and his subsequent adoption of the "form of a servant*" and the "likeness [homoiōma] of humans" (Phil 2:7) suggests that the form of God is the very opposite of the humble status of a servant. The "image of God" when used of Christ may therefore refer to his being, but mostly denotes his function as an expression of the divine.

1.2. In Reference to Males. In 1 Corinthians 11:7 Paul speaks of males (anēr) generally (not Christian men specifically) as "being" (hyparchōn) the image and glory of God, and implies that women are not. Because every male "is" God's image and glory (presumably meaning he is created after God's image and expresses God's glory), every female is subordinated to a male and expresses that male's glory.

1.3. In Reference to Christians. Colossians 3:10 sees the Christian believer, as the "new human" (ho neos anthrōpos), being progressively "renewed" (or, in process of creation) "according to the image of its creator." This image consists of a superior "knowledge" (epignōsis) that overlooks or dissolves the boundaries between Jew and Greek, slave* and free, male and female (Col 3:11).

2. In the OT.

The background to these varied uses of the concept in the Pauline literature and elsewhere in the NT is the few occurrences of the terms ṣelem, "image," and dᵉmût, "likeness," in Genesis 1:26, 27; 5:1, 3; 9:6. In Genesis 1:26, 27 humankind, both male and female, is created "in" the image of God and "according to" his likeness. The context allows us to infer no more than that the divine image is the authorization for human control of the animal world and the physical environment. In Genesis 9:6 murder is prohibited (or rather, capital punishment for murder is prescribed) on the ground that "in his own image God made humankind." This could mean that human life is sacrosanct because it in some way bears the image of God or, preferably, that the taking of human life is sanctioned in certain cases because God has devolved his authority to humans. In Genesis 5:1, 3 the reader is reminded that at the creation God made humankind "in" his likeness, and told that Adam became the father of a son "in" his likeness, "according to" his image (the variation in prepositions from Genesis 1 is probably of no consequence). The meaning apparently is that the image of God is not characteristic only of the first human generation, but of subsequent generations as well. The fact that women are included in the statements of Genesis 1:26, 27 probably does not imply any idea of male and female equality; the text speaks rather of undifferentiated humanity.

The extrabiblical context of the concept of the image of God should also be considered. In the ancient world images were apparently viewed functionally, as a means by which deities became present and visible in the world of humans. A statue or image of a god represented that god on earth, just as the image of a king represented the authority of a king in a land he had conquered. In Genesis, therefore, humanity takes the place of God on earth, a point that becomes clearer if we adopt the suggestion that Genesis 1:26 should not be translated "in our image" but "as our image, to be our image" (understanding the preposition beth as the beth of essence).

In Egypt the king is several times referred to in literary texts as the image of God, where plainly it is his right to rule that is in view. In Genesis it is not the king but humanity at large that bears that privilege; but here also it is the authority of the creator God that is the principal content of the image. In fact, we should probably translate Genesis 1:26 "Let us make humankind . . . so that they may have dominion."

3. The OT Background and Paul.

It is interesting that Paul never uses the concept of "the image of God" in the sense it has in Genesis; only in James is the OT usage continued. For Paul the phrase obviously has important christological overtones, especially within the framework of the New Adam* typology, and it would not have been surprising if he had reserved it for exposition of the role of Christ in creation* and as the expression of the divine. But it is also understandable that in Colossians the term should further be extended to refer to "the new humanity" that is in process of creation. What does not seem to fit so well with Pauline theology is the narrowing of the gender reference of "the image of God" in 1 Corinthians to refer to males exclusively and, furthermore, the absence of any christological connection in its application to males generally.

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; GLORY, GLORIFICATION; MAN AND WOMAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, "The Image of God in Genesis—Some Linguistic and Historical Considerations," in Old Testament Papers Read at the Tenth Meeting of Die Outestamentiese Werkgemeenskap in Suidafrika (Pretoria, 1967) 5-13; idem, "The Image of God in the Book of Genesis—A Study in Terminology," BJRL 51 (1968) 11-26; G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962); P. Bird, " 'Male and Female He Created Them': Gen 1:27b in the Context of the Priestly Account of Creation," HTR 74 (1981) 129-59; D. J. A. Clines, "The Image of God in Man," TynB 19 (1968) 53-103; idem, "What Does Eve Do to Help? and Other Irredeemably Androcentric Orientations in Genesis 1-3," in What Does Eve Do to Help? and Other Readerly Questions to the Old Testament (JSOTSup 94; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990) 25-48; E. M. Curtis, "Image of God (OT)," ABD III.389-91; L. Fatum, "Image of God and Glory of Man: Women in the Pauline Congregations," in Image of God and Gender Models in Judeo-Christian Tradition, ed. K. Borresen (Oslo: Solum Forlag, 1991); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); J. Jervell, Imago Dei. Gen. 1,26f. im Spätjudentum, in der Gnosis und in den paulinischen Briefen (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1960); G. A. Jónsson, The Image of God: Genesis 1:26-28 in a Century of Old Testament Research (CBOT 26; Lund: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1988); V. Lossky, In the Image and Likeness of God (London: A. R. Mowbray, 1975); R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii.5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship (SNTSMS 4; Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 99-133; T. N. D. Mettinger, "Abbild oder Urbild? 'Imago Dei' in traditionsgeschichtlicher Sicht," ZAW 86 (1974) 403-24; M. Miller, "In the 'Image' and 'Likeness' of God," JBL 91 (1972) 289-304; L. Scheffczyk, ed., Der Mensch als Bild Gottes (Wege der Forschung 124: Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1969); J. E. Sullivan, The Image of God: The Doctrine of St Augustine and Its Influence (Dubuque, IA: The Priory, 1963); H. Wildberger, "Das Abbild Gottes," TZ 21 (1965) 245-59, 481-501; R. McL. Wilson, "Genesis 1:26 and the New Testament," Bijdragen 20 (1959) 117-25.

D. J. A. Clines

IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST

There are relatively few passages in the Pauline corpus where Paul uses the language of imitation (mimētēs/mimeomai: 1 Cor 4:16; 1 Cor 11:1; Phil 3:17; 1 Thess 1:6; 2:14; 2 Thess 3:6, 9). The idea of imitation, however, plays a significant (contra Michaelis), though sometimes misunderstood, role in Paul's ethics.

1. 1 Corinthians 4:16
2. 1 Corinthians 11:1
3. Philippians 3:17
4. 1 Thessalonians 1:6; 2:14
5. 2 Thessalonians 3:7-9
6. Misunderstandings of Imitation
7. Imitation and the Cross

1. 1 Corinthians 4:16.

There are two specific places in 1 Corinthians* where Paul urges the Corinthians to become imitators (mimētai) of him. The first occurs at 1 Corinthians 4:16. This call to become imitators of Paul comes at the end of a list of Paul's tribulations (1 Cor 4:9-13; see Afflictions). Paul (and his coworkers) has become a "fool for the sake of Christ*"; he is "held in disrepute"; he is "hungry, thirsty, poorly clothed, beaten and homeless." He closes this list by claiming that he has become like the "garbage of the world."

From the beginning of the letter Paul has been arguing against those in Corinth who believe that the end of the ages in all its fullness, power and freedom has been completed in them (see Eschatology). Paul claims that the Corinthians misunderstand the power and freedom of the gospel* because they failed to understand the significance of the cross when they were baptized into Christ and his death (cf. Rom 6:3; see Dying and Rising). He reminds them, however, that when he was among them he "knew nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified" (1 Cor 2:2; see also 1 Cor 1:18, 23). Prior to the consummation of all things, the Christian life, and particularly Christians' conception of true power* and authority,* are characterized by the cross.* Throughout the first four chapters of the letter Paul has sought to reorient the Corinthians' understanding of the power of the gospel by turning their eyes to the cross. In particular he has pointed to his own life as an apostle, as an embodiment of a cruciform existence in the world.*

By reciting his afflictions in 1 Corinthians 4:9-13 Paul hopes to persuade his audience that in his weakness* the true power of the cross is revealed. This is what lies behind Paul's desire that the Corinthians become imitators of him. J. H. Schütz summarizes this point well when he says, "To imitate the weakness and power of Christ is to become the recipient of God's power in one's own weakness" (230). In calling the Corinthians to imitate him, Paul is pointing to his life of weakness as the way to embody the life of the cross. By imitating Paul in this respect the Corinthians will adopt the manner of life needed to live faithfully on this side of Christ's return.

2. 1 Corinthians 11:1.

At the beginning of 1 Corinthians 11 Paul again urges the Corinthians to imitate him. This time an additional phrase is added. The Corinthians are to imitate Paul as he imitates Christ. Although this verse begins chapter 11 it really represents the closing of the paragraph that starts at 1 Corinthians 10:23. This call to imitation, therefore, ought to be understood in this light.

There may be some temptation to read Paul's call to imitate him as he imitates Christ in the light of 1 Corinthians 10:31 where he claims that he does not "seek his own advantage, but that of the many so that they might be saved." It is not at all likely, however, that Paul is claiming that he imitates Christ by saving people just as Christ does (see Schütz, 229).

Rather, the guiding theme of this paragraph (and indeed of this whole section on idol worship) is contained in the notion of "building up" the body of Christ (see Body of Christ) through seeking the advantage of others rather than one's own advantage (see 1 Cor 10:23-24, 33). The building up of the body is a theme that appears repeatedly throughout the letter (see 1 Cor 8:1; 14:5, 12, 17, 26 and less directly in 1 Cor 11:17-34 and 1 Cor 12:4-27). For the Corinthians to imitate Paul as he imitates Christ, the one who calls the community into being and who sustains it (1 Cor 1:30), they will need to dedicate themselves to the task of building up the body. In terms of concrete action this imitation demands that the Corinthians seek the well-being of others rather than their own.

3. Philippians 3:17.

In Philippians 3:17 Paul uses the unusual word symmimētai to call the Philippians to become "fellow imitators." Because this is such an unusual word, it is not clear whether Paul wants the Philippians to join with him in being imitators (presumably of Christ) or whether the Philippian congregation is to engage in a collective practice of imitating Paul. The reference at the end of Philippians 3:17 to the "example you have in us" would indicate that it is the latter of these two possibilities.

As a call to imitate Paul, Philippians 3:17 serves as a climax to a discussion about his life which he begins at Philippians 3:4. After reciting all of the reasons he has for boasting, Paul says that he considers all these things to be rubbish in comparison with knowing Christ (Phil 3:7-8). Indeed, Paul wants to know Christ in a particular way. He wants "to know Christ and the power of his resurrection* and the sharing of his sufferings by becoming like him in his death" (Phil 3:10). Here again Paul sees his life of discipleship as the living of a cruciform life, and it is this which the Philippians are to imitate. Further, as Philippians 3:18 implies, should the Philippians fail to imitate Paul, they run the risk of living as "enemies of the cross of Christ" (see Enemy).

In many ways Philippians 3:17 simply reiterates the demands Paul has made of them in Philippians 1:27-30, urging the Philippians to act in ways that conform to Christ's self-emptying, obedient death on a cross (Phil 2:6-8; see also Fowl, Hooker, Stanley). As God vindicated Christ's activity by raising him from the dead and giving him a name above all names, so "[Christ] will transform the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory" (Phil 3:21; see Resurrection).

4. 1 Thessalonians 1:6; 2:14.

As part of Paul's greeting to the Thessalonians, he notes that they have become "imitators of us [Paul, Silvanus and Timothy] and of the Lord" (1 Thess 1:6). The basis for such a claim is then spelled out both in terms of the Thessalonians' reception of the gospel amidst tribulation and in regard to their continued faithfulness (1 Thess 1:6-9).

As the letter unfolds, it seems that the Thessalonians are less steadfast than they once were. By accepting Paul's message, they made a radical break with their past. Making such a break would court both social and familial disfavor. The distress and affliction that this disfavor caused new believers seemed relatively common among Pauline churches (see Malherbe, 46-52; DeBoer, 115; see Social Setting).

Such a situation in Thessalonica led Paul to encourage and instruct this struggling body. As part of his strategy of encouragement and instruction Paul in 1 Thessalonians 2:13-16 recalls the Thessalonians' initial reception of the gospel. In receiving the gospel as the word of God in the midst of affliction, the Thessalonians became "imitators of the churches of God in Christ Jesus in Judea" (1 Thess 2:14). By noting that the Thessalonians' reception of the word of God in the midst of tribulation imitates the situation of the churches in Judea, Paul hopes to confirm the Thessalonians' faith. "Their persecution has become the index, the credential which authenticates their reception of [the gospel] as the logos theou" ("word of God"; Schütz, 226).

In both of these references the imitation that is commended is seen in terms of faithfulness in the midst of suffering and distress (DeBoer, 97-99). This faithfulness is the cruciform life which Paul saw in Christ and took on for himself (see Stanley, 868). In the case of the Thessalonians, unlike the Corinthians, Paul does not have to convince them that this is the only way to live faithfully. Rather, they need to be encouraged and instructed on how to continue in the life of the cross which they took on from the beginning in imitation of the Lord.*

5. 2 Thessalonians 3:7-9.

The only other text in the Pauline corpus where Paul explicitly urges imitation of himself occurs in 2 Thessalonians 3:7-9. Here Paul is addressing "disorder" in the Thessalonian church. The source of this disorder is not clear. It may have come from those Christians who believed that the Parousia was so close at hand that they were unwilling to engage in the day-to-day activities needed to keep body and soul together (see Discipline). Alternatively, the disorder might have stemmed from some form of proto-gnostic spirituality (DeBoer, 132-35; see Gnosis, Gnosticism; Thessalonians). In either case, Paul makes it quite clear that this is not "according to the tradition" which the Thessalonians received from Paul and his coworkers* (2 Thess 3:6). Indeed, rather than characterizing the lives of these Thessalonian Christians in terms of either watchful expectancy or committed spirituality,* Paul calls them "idle." To reinforce his disdain for such lives, Paul points to the example of himself and his coworkers. They not only preached the gospel to the Thessalonians, they also engaged in gainful employment. The Thessalonians themselves ought to imitate this example (see Tentmaking).

6. Misunderstandings of Imitation.

Having surveyed the relevant texts where Paul explicitly uses the language of imitation in regard to himself, we should note some ways in which this notion can be misunderstood. First, our contemporary notion of imitation (as well as some ancient notions) leads us to think that the imitation should be like the original in as many respects as possible. It should be the mirror image of the original. If we apply this notion of imitation to Paul, not to mention Christ whom Paul imitates, we will miss the point. When Paul calls on Christians to be imitators of himself and of Christ he wants them to incorporate certain specific aspects of his life into their own lives. Without doubt, when Paul calls on the Corinthians, for example, to become imitators of him they did not understand this as a call to become tentmakers. The contexts in which Paul uses the language of imitation are clear enough that both modern Christians and his original audience can recognize the respects in which Paul is to be imitated. In this sense Paul's language of imitation is not substantially different from other places where Paul calls on believers to do as he does (see 1 Cor 7:7-16; Gal 4:12-20; Phil 4:9).

Secondly, the individualism so characteristic of modernity might well lead us to accuse anyone urging us to imitate them of being extremely arrogant (Best deals with this charge, 69-71). Several considerations should lead us to be cautious in making this judgment in regard to Paul. We must first recognize that the notion of imitating some sort of moral exemplar was quite common in the ancient world. (See, e.g., Isocrates, Dem. 4.11; Seneca Ep. Mor. 6.5-6; 7.6-9; 11.9; Quintilian Inst. Orat. 2.28; Philostratus Vit. Ap. 1.19; 4 Macc. 9:23; 2 Macc. 6:27-28. See Best for other examples.)

Further, new converts cannot be expected to have mastered the demands of their new faith and the practices needed to live in accord with these demands in their day-to-day lives. Such converts will need both instruction in their new faith and concrete examples of how to embody their faith in the various contexts in which they find themselves. We can understand this if we think in terms of the ways in which it is essential for an apprentice to imitate a master of a particular craft. For example, in the initial stages of an apprenticeship in silversmithing the apprentice sits directly opposite the master silversmith in order to imitate the master's movements. Years of learning and practice allow the master to work almost instinctively. Apprentices, however, can only hope to develop such instinctual movements through imitating the master. No amount of abstract verbal instruction can bring about mastery of a craft without the concrete example of a master to imitate.

It would have been futile for Paul simply to repeat to the Philippians, for example, the abstract command "Live a cruciform life." Without giving this phrase some concrete content by pointing to his own life and practice, Paul infers that the Philippians* would have been unclear about how to embody such a command. In fact, failure to understand just this aspect of the life of a disciple led some Philippian Christians to succumb to wrong-headed notions, presumably while claiming to live faithfully before Christ. It appears that the Philippians needed to be directed to a concrete example of what a cruciform life might look like in their context if they were to have any expectation of achieving this themselves and if they were to see the ways in which they were not presently achieving this aim.

Hence, rather than reflecting an arrogant desire for self-aggrandizement, the idea of imitation (in certain respects) was crucial to Paul's moral discourse. For Paul (and for all Christians), the only arrogance surrounding the language of imitation would be the arrogance of those who think that they can walk the path of discipleship without observing, learning from and imitating those who are already further down the path.

7. Imitation and the Cross.

Aside from the relatively general reference in 2 Thessalonians 3, the examination of the specific passages in which Paul uses the language of imitation has shown that the language of imitation is closely associated with the cross. For Paul the cross is the sign under which all Christian life this side of the Parousia is judged (see Judgment). That the cross should be a sign of such power, that God's power should be demonstrated through a sign of weakness and brokenness, contradicts all of the expectations of both Paul's audience and our own world. The cross is "a stumbling block to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks" (1 Cor 1:13). It appears that even for those who sought to live faithfully before the God of Jesus Christ, the life of the cross was a source of great puzzlement and dispute. Paul seems to have grasped that it was only through imitating one who already had sought to embody—with some degree of success—the cruciform life of a disciple that new disciples could hope to embody the cross in the various contexts in which they found themselves. The strangeness of the cruciform life is what led Paul to urge several of his churches to imitate him as he imitated the life of the cross which he saw in Christ.

See also CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; ETHICS; SERVANT, SERVICE; SUFFERING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Best, Paul and His Converts (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988) chap. 3; E. A. Castelli, Imitating Paul: A Discourse of Power (Louisville: Westminster, 1991); W. P. DeBoer, The Imitation of Paul (Kampen: Kok, 1962); S. E. Fowl, The Story of Christ in the Ethics of Paul (JSNTS 36; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); E. Güttgemanns, Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr (FRLANT 90; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966); M. Hooker, "Philippians 2:6-11," in Jesus und Paulus: Festschrift für Werner Georg Kümmel zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. E. Grässer and E. E. Ellis (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975) 151-64; A. J. Malherbe, Paul and the Thessalonians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); W. Michaelis, "μιμέομαι κτλ," TDNT IV.659-74; J. H. Schütz, Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority (SNTSMS 26; Cambridge: University Press, 1975); D. M. Stanley, "Become Imitators of Me: The Pauline Conception of Apostolic Tradition," Bib 40 (1958) 859-77.

S. E. Fowl

IMMORTALITY

Athanasia, a Greek word that literally means, "not subject to death," or "that which will never die," occurs rarely in the NT and is used only by Paul (three times: 1 Cor 15:53, 54; 1 Tim 6:16) to express the idea of immortality. Aphtharsia (literally, "not subject to decay"), another uniquely Pauline word, is used much more often by the apostle and conveys a similar if not identical concept (cf. Rom 2:7; 2 Tim 1:10). Frequently, however, aphtharsia and its cognate adjective, aphthartos, are translated, "imperishable," "the imperishable" or "imperishability" (1 Cor 9:25; 15:42, 50, 52-54; cf. Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17). Immortality in Paul's writings, therefore, must be understood to be an existence that is imperishable, incorruptible, never-dying, never-ending.

1. Immortality in the OT and Judaism
2. Immortality in Paul
3. Conclusion

1. Immortality in the OT and Judaism.

The idea of immortality is not one that figures largely in the Hebrew OT canon (cf. Dan 12:2). But certain deductions can be drawn from Genesis 1—3. In Genesis 2:17 death is introduced as the judgment for eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, a judgment enacted in the expulsion from the garden and the consequent denial of access to the tree of life. This tree of life may represent life as an inherently divine quality that was on offer to humankind. In short, Adam may have been "created neither immortal nor mortal but with the potentiality to become either, depending on his obedience or disobedience to God. While he was not created with immortality, as far as the divine purpose was concerned he was created for immortality" (Harris 1983, 193-94).

The idea of immortality appears frequently in the writings from Qumran and in intertestamental literature, especially in the Wisdom of Solomon. In these writings it is said that human beings are made for eternity, created for immortality and destined for eternal joy in perpetual life (1QH 3:19-36; 1QS 4:7; Wis 2:23; cf. also Wis 3:4; 4:1; 6:19; 8:13, 17; 15:3; see also 4 Macc 9:22; 14:5; 16:13; 17:12). Such texts as these no doubt formed the background for Paul's teaching on the subject, which he modified and clarified and grounded firmly in light of the Christ event.

2. Immortality in Paul.

According to Paul, it is God* alone who is immortal

(Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17; cf. Deut 32:40; Sir. 18:1) and to whom immortality truly belongs (1 Tim 6:16). Human beings, on the other hand, do not by nature possess immortality. Instead they are mortal, perishable, made susceptible to corruption because of sin* (Rom 5:12; 1 Cor 15:42, 50; cf. Acts 2:22). And yet, because they have eternity stamped on their souls (cf. 1QH 3:19, 20), they crave immortality and seek to achieve it by good deeds (Rom 2:7) or to attain to it by wisdom (Wis. 8:13, 17). In the final analysis, however, immortality cannot be gained by human endeavor. Rather it is something that is "brought to light through the gospel" (2 Tim 1:10), that is to say, through the appearing of the Savior,* Christ Jesus, who by his life and death and resurrection* abolished death, on the one hand, and provided all who believe with immortality, on the other (2 Tim 1:10).

Immortality, it may be argued, is not intrinsic to humans, affected as they are by the debilitating effects of sin, nor is it attained by human achievement, nor is it a right that inherently belongs to human beings. If such a right ever existed, it was forfeited by rebellion and disobedience to God (cf. Gen 3:1-7, 24; Rom 5:12). Rather, according to Paul, immortality is always for humans a derived state of existence, a gift from God to be received by faith.* Paul would be in harmony with the words of the Wisdom writer, even though he most certainly would wish to modify them christologically: "To know you [O God] is the whole of righteousness, and to acknowledge your power is the root of immortality" (Wis 15:3; cf. 2 Tim 1:10).

Paul may have thought of immortality as something already possessed by believers. This is possible if one assumes that his use of the expression zōē aiōnios ("eternal life"; cf. Rom 5:21; 6:23) parallels that of immortality. And it is clear that Paul did not relegate the blessings of the age to come, including the life of the new age (zōē aiōnios), exclusively to the future (cf. Rom 5:21; 6:23). Nevertheless, he insisted, contrary to what the Corinthians* themselves may have believed (cf. 1 Cor 4:8, 9; 15:12-19), that the immortality which God has promised to believers (1 Cor 15:53)—immortality in the fullest sense of this term—can only be attained at the resurrection, an event that is still future (1 Cor 15:52-53).

1 Corinthians 15 is the primary source for understanding Paul's meaning of immortality. Here he uses all three words for immortality—athanasia, aphtharsia and aphthartos (1 Cor 15:42, 50, 52-54). He contrasts immortality with phthartos ("that which is bound to disintegrate and die," "perishable," "mortal"). He argues that as there are both earthly bodies and heavenly bodies, and the glory of the one differs from the other, so in the human realm there is both the earthbound physical body and the resurrection spiritual body, and the difference between these two is striking (see Body). The physical human body is marked by weakness, dishonor, perishability, mortality. The resurrection body on the other hand is characterized by glory,* power,* immortality (1 Cor 15:42-44). This contrast spells out a fundamental difference between the first Adam and the second Adam, the man from the earth and the man of heaven (see Adam and Christ). Since what is physical, or earthly, cannot inherit the kingdom of God, and the perishable does not inherit the immortal, a radical change is necessary that will result in the perishable putting on the imperishable (1 Cor 15:52)—God's final victory over death. Life, not death, has the last word (1 Cor 15:54-57).

It is also possible that other Pauline texts argue for immortality, at least implicitly. 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 is one of these. Although it is a passage that is difficult to interpret, perhaps because Paul multiplies figures (or metaphors)—house, tent, clothing—in his attempt to explain life after death, yet this much is clear from what he writes: on account of the goodness and action of God (2 Cor 5:1, 5) that which is mortal (to thnēton) will eventually be swallowed up by life—mortality will give way to immortality.

Philippians 1:20-21 and 3:20-21 also point in this same direction. In these texts Paul not only hints at the possibility of the believer consciously enjoying the presence of Christ after death, but he states with confidence that the humble, mortal, perishable body of the believer will be radically transformed, and, by implication, made immortal at the Parousia (see Eschatology).

3. Conclusion.

There are at least three viable schools of thought generated by those who have attempted to interpret Paul's understanding of life after death. These result from differing views of humankind. Traditional Christianity, holding to a dualistic or tripartite view of persons, believes that between death and the resurrection there is some sort of an intermediate state in which the immaterial part of the individual continues in a conscious existence apart from the physical body. Others are persuaded that there can be no separation of soul from body if a person is to continue to be a person. Those who hold to this latter perspective must assume, therefore, that at death God immediately provides the believer with a new spiritual body from heaven. Still others, with this same holistic anthropology, propound a form of re-creationism—a temporary lapse of consciousness at death (soul sleep), which ends in a new creation at the resurrection of the last day (see Intermediate State).

See also Body; Eschatology; Intermediate State; Life and Death; Resurrection.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, "Paul on Immortality," SJT 24 (1971) 457-72; R. Bultmann, "ἀθανασία," TDNT III.22-25; J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul, and Life Everlasting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (London: Epworth, 1958); E. E. Ellis, "II Corinthians v.1-10 in Pauline Eschatology," NTS 6 (1959-60) 211-24; idem, Paul and His Recent Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961) 35-48; G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 775-809; G. Harder, "φθείρω κτλ," TDNT IX.93-106; M. J. Harris, "2 Cor 5:1-10: A Watershed in Paul's Eschatology?" TynB 22 (1971) 32-37; idem, From Grave to Glory (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); idem, Raised Immortal: Resurrection and Immortality in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); J. Jeremias, "Flesh and Blood Cannot Inherit the Kingdom of God," NTS 2 (1956) 151-59; G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 550-65; A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (Cambridge: University Press, 1981); D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St. Paul (Oxford: Blackwell, 1964) 248-69.

J. J. Scott, Jr.

IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD.

See Caesar's Household, Imperial Household; Philippians, Letter to the.

IMPRISONMENT.

See Prison, Prisoner.

IMPURITY.

See Purity and Impurity.

IN CHRIST

The phrases "in Christ (Jesus)" and "in the Lord" appear frequently in the Pauline letters. They are nearly absent from the other writings of the NT, except for pronominal references to Christ in the Johannine materials. This concentration of the expression in the Pauline letters has suggested to many interpreters that some or all of its occurrences represent a Pauline formula. It is often thought that such a formula was based on a "local" conception of Christ* as a substance or person. But the variety of ways in which the phrases appear in Paul's letters indicates that they serve as a flexible idiom which may express instrumentality or mode of action as well as locality. While Paul sometimes joins the expression "in Christ" with the image of Christ as an inclusive figure, body* or building, it is not derived from or limited to a "corporate" idea. Paul's language instead partakes of a common metaphorical use of "space" by which definition or exclusivity is represented. In varying ways, then, the expression "in Christ" conveys Paul's belief that God's saving purposes are decisively effected through Christ.

1. The Usage of the Expression
2. The Origin and Basis of the Expression
3. Theological Aspects of Paul's Usage

1. The Usage of the Expression.

A number of variations of the expression are possible for Paul, the most frequent of which are "in Christ," "in Christ Jesus" and "in the Lord." It is probable that the individual forms often represent differing nuances of meaning. The Pauline letters only once use "in Jesus" (Eph 4:21), and never "in Jesus Christ," although otherwise references to "Jesus Christ" regularly appear in the letters. The prominence of "Christ" in the phrase suggests an emphasis on the exalted status and saving role of the Messiah. The frequently attached name "Jesus" may call forth the idea of the earthly figure and his humanity. The alternative form "in the Lord" usually stresses the unique power* and divine authority* of Christ, and hence his right to demand obedience or his ability to deliver from other "powers" (e.g., Phil 1:14, 1 Thess 4:1). These distinctions in meaning may not always be present however (see, e.g., Rom 16:1-16).

Unlike the Johannine literature, which focuses on the mutual inherence of Christ and believers, Paul does not emphasize this reciprocal aspect. The idea that Christ is in or among believers appears in his letters (e.g., Gal 2:19; Rom 8:10; Col 1:27) but is only occasionally brought into association with the thought that believers are in Christ.

The expression is used over a triangular field of meaning rather than in a single, "technical" sense. At one corner of the field one finds the examples of the form "certain ones/churches (are) in Christ," where the phrase takes a local sense. At another corner one finds statements like "God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ" (2 Cor 5:19). Here Christ is viewed as the instrument of God's action (debate on the meaning of this verse notwithstanding). Sometimes "in Christ/the Lord" may stress the manner in which an action occurs ("I speak the truth in Christ," Rom 9:1). Paul's use of the phrases moves between these limits, generally exhibiting a lack of distinction between the three ideas of locality, instrumentality and modality (e.g., "your labor is not in vain in the Lord," 1 Cor 15:58).

As Robertson and others have observed, the instrumental use of the Greek preposition en ("in") is a metaphorical extension of the local sense (Robertson, 590). Even when "in Christ"/"in the Lord" is used to describe an instrument or manner of action, "Christ" is understood as a defining "sphere." The "in" phrases bear a more specific sense than the "through" phrases, as Paul's shift from the wording "through a human being" to "in Adam*" and "in Christ" shows (1 Cor 15:21-22). Christ, and no other, is God's instrument for raising humans from the dead, just as death comes through Adam alone. A similar change of meaning emerges in 2 Corinthians 5:18-19 where Paul moves from affirming that he was reconciled to God through Christ, to describing his preaching as asserting that God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ. In the second instance the exclusivity of the proclamation evokes a more definite idea.

Occasionally Paul describes believers or their actions as "in the Spirit" (e.g., Rom 8:9; 9:1; 14:17; see Holy Spirit). If we may take Romans 8:1-11 as the determinative context, it is clear that being "in Christ" leads to being "in the Spirit," not the reverse (Rom 8:1, 2). Those who belong to Christ have the indwelling Spirit of Christ, and so are not "in the flesh*" but "in the Spirit" (Rom 8:9).

Twice Paul refers to the Thessalonians as being "in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1). This unusual variation is part of Paul's concentration of references to God* in the Thessalonian correspondence, stemming from his focus on eschatology* and, perhaps, his awareness of their recent conversion from paganism. It may reflect a concern on Paul's part to preserve monotheism while asserting the efficacy of faith* in Christ.

In Colossians* and Ephesians* the frequency of "in Christ/the Lord" increases sharply. Furthermore, a series of new spatial metaphors appears. The fullness* of deity dwells in Christ bodily (Col 2:9). The divine purpose for creation,* redemption and the consummation of all things is comprehended within the "sphere" of Christ (Eph 1:3-10). Believers have been placed in heaven* by being placed in him (Eph 2:6; Col 3:1). They have been made part of a body of which Christ is the head* (Eph 4:15-16). They are being built together as a temple* (Eph 2:21-22). They have put on a new humanity (Eph 4:22-24; Col 3:10). All these images present Christ as the focal expression of deity and the divine purpose, and consequently the basis of the life and unity of the entire church.*

2. The Origin and Basis of the Expression.

The local or spatial sense of "in Christ/the Lord" has provided the starting point for most modern scholarly theories of its derivation. Generally these theories depend on a quasi-physical understanding of "Christ" in order to interpret the spatial sense conveyed by the phrases. Some scholars in the earlier part of the twentieth century claimed that Paul, equating Christ with the Spirit, understood him as an all-pervading fluid, like the air which we breathe and in which we live (e.g., Deissmann, Bousset). Others asserted that the background to the local idea lay in the myth of a redeemer figure found in gnostic* writings (e.g., Käsemann). This thesis further provided the means for understanding Paul's statements about participation with Christ in death* and resurrection*: as a member of the redeemer's material body, one shared in his destiny. A. Schweitzer claimed to find the source of Paul's thought in an early Jewish expectation of a real, physical union of the elect with the Messiah.

During the latter decades of the twentieth century, scholars have tended to appeal to the broader notion of a "corporate personality," which is thought to be found in the Hebrew Scriptures and early Jewish literature (e.g., Best, Moule). In this reading Christ is regarded as an all-encompassing "person" with whom the whole community of believers is united in experience and destiny. This frequently used but ill-defined idea has come under justified criticism in recent study (see Wedderburn, Porter).

In some measure the local and quasi-physical understanding of Paul's language has been tempered by several mid twentieth-century studies, especially those of F. Neugebauer and M. Bouttier. Neugebauer denied that "in Christ" or "in the Lord" had any spatial sense, arguing that these expressions convey instead the temporal idea of inclusion in the decisive saving event, Christ's death and resurrection. Bouttier was more impressed by the diversity of Paul's usage, finding instrumental and eschatological ideas as well as the inclusive (local) sense. These studies have brought an increased awareness that in many contexts the primary force of the phrase may be something other than locality.

It remains a question whether Paul's employment of a spatial metaphor demands any of the proposed corporeal images of Christ. Three crucial considerations argue against supposing that the idea of an organic reality lies behind his usage. Paul's references to "in Christ" and "in the Lord" appear to be a special extension of the common and almost unnoticed practice of symbolically representing exclusivity or definition as a locality. Paul, like the psalmist, rejoices and hopes "in the Lord" (e.g., Phil 4:4, cf. Ps 5:11; 9:2; 33:21, 22). He applies similar language to persons who do not fit the model of a universal "corporate personality": the Israelites were baptized "into Moses*" (1 Cor 10:2), God promised to bless the nations "in Abraham*" (Gal 3:8, 9), he raised up Pharaoh to display his power "in him" (Rom 9:15), the Philippians have the struggle they saw and heard "in me" (Phil 1:30), the unbelieving husband is sanctified "in his wife" (1 Cor 7:14). Parallel representations may be found elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Mk 3:22; 14:6), in contemporary Jewish authors ("In him [God], and in no other, was their salvation," Josephus Ant. 3.1.5 §23), in secular papyri (e.g., "There is an additional debt from the price of grain 'in' Ptolemy," cited by Mayser, 2.396), and even in classical Greek sources of the fifth century B.C. (e.g., Sophocles Ajax 518, the captive Tecmessa to Ajax: "In you entirely, I am delivered"). The Greek preposition en, "in," may convey association or instrumentality, but the idea of a defining "sphere" remains in such instances. This wider use of spatial metaphor cautions against requiring a concrete local image behind Paul's language.

Moreover, although the attempt has been made (Schweitzer, Sanders), it is not possible to extend a quasi-physical image of union with Christ into Paul's larger theology. There is a breakdown of the metaphor, which reveals that it is not informed by some more definite corporeal understanding of salvation. Paul derives his ethical demands from what God has accomplished in Christ: "Clean out the old leaven, that you might be a new lump of dough, just as you are unleavened" (1 Cor 5:7); "You were once in darkness, but now you are light in the Lord: walk as children of light" (Eph 5:8). If Paul were operating with an organic concept of salvation, he might speak of degrees of mystical participation (e.g., a process of being filled with "light") but not in the paradoxical formulation he offers here.

Paul's utilization of material symbols is robust yet diverse, suggesting a plurality of metaphors rather than a basic realistic idea. Paul's figure of the "body of Christ" is supplemented by his description of the community of believers as the temple* of God (e.g., 1 Cor 3:16, 17; Eph 2:19-22). He plays upon the image of spirit-body dualism with his description of immersion and infusion with the Spirit uniting believers in one body (1 Cor 12:12, 13). He also occasionally links Christ with the indwelling Spirit (Rom 8:10; 1 Cor 15:45; probably Col 3:11; see Holy Spirit). Yet there is no absolute identification of the two (e.g., Rom 8:11). The statements rather represent metonymy: the Spirit is spoken of as Christ, because the Spirit is the means by which Christ's lordship is effected in believers (e.g., 1 Cor 12:3). It is noteworthy that the expression "in Christ" qualifies the idea of believers as the body of Christ, describing its "sphere" of validity: "We, who are many, are one body in Christ" (Rom 12:5). As Gundry has argued, the body here is a metaphor for the interdependence and unity of believers, not a real entity (Gundry, 223-44).

Although the corporate explanations are not satisfactory, it is clear that for Paul, in some real sense, believers share in Christ's death and resurrection. Life in Christ brings participation with him in his death and resurrection (Rom 6:1-11; 2 Cor 13:4; Gal 3:26-28). Paul's employment of Adam* as an inclusive figure is of fundamental importance in tracing this aspect of his thought. Early Jewish parallels to Paul's references to Adam are especially close, and reveal a conception of destiny based on divine pronouncement which matches Paul's statements. God ordained that the entire human race arise from one human being, to show that one who murders a single human being is guilty of destroying the whole world (m.Sanh. 4:5). With Adam's transgression, condemnation came on the whole of humanity (4 Ezra 3:21; 2 Baruch 23:4; 48:42, 43). The judgment* of God on the deed of the one decides the life or death of the many: as in Adam, so also in Christ, Paul argues (1 Cor 15:22, Rom 5:12-21). Solidarity with Adam stems from the divine will to bless or curse through him, not from physical descent, although in this instance the two converge. Paul's dependence on this larger category is apparent in his interpretation of the divine blessing of the Gentiles "in Abraham," who, of course, were not the physical offspring of the patriarch (Gal 3:8, 9).

Paul's connection of Christ to Adam derives from his understanding of the universal scope of Christ's atoning work on the cross: "One died for all, therefore all died" (2 Cor 5:14, 15). Like Adam, therefore, Christ is the new beginning of humanity (Gal 3:28; Eph 4:22-24; Col 3:9-11). The idea that the destinies of the Messiah and the people of God are linked is not unique (e.g., Dan 7:9-27; 2 Baruch 30), but Paul's explicit messianic universalism is. For him, the figures of Adam and Christ are contrasted in all-embracing judgment and salvation.

The expression "in Christ/the Lord" probably came from earlier Jewish Christianity. The book of Acts provides evidence that, before Paul, the earliest believers in Jerusalem proclaimed Jesus as the decisive "sphere" of God's saving action (Acts 4:2, 12). And as Paul's reliance on a traditional statement in Romans 6:3 shows, prior to him participation in salvation had been expressed in baptism,* through which one was transferred into the "realm of Christ." This language and these ideas came into special prominence and underwent further definition in Paul's letters.

3. Theological Aspects of Paul's Usage.
Although there is considerable overlap of the various types, the occurrences of the expression may be divided into five broad thematic categories:

(1) More than one-third of the 151 references affirm something that God has done or does through Christ for salvation (e.g., "the redemption which is in Christ Jesus," Rom 3:24). As we have noted, in Colossians and Ephesians this is expanded to include creation and its consummation.

(2) Approximately another third have to do with exhortation or commendation of behavior or character (e.g., "Rejoice in the Lord always," Phil 4:4; "Prisca and Aquila, my fellow workers in Christ Jesus," Rom 16:3).

(3) About twenty occurrences of the expression describe the present state of believers in view of Christ's saving work (e.g., "we, who are many, are one in Christ," Rom 12:5).

(4) A final dozen or so describe specific persons or particular situations in relation to salvation. Among these are six statements that simply affirm that certain ones are "in Christ" (Rom 16:7, 22, 1 Cor 1:30; Gal 1:22; 1 Thess 3:8; 2 Cor 12:2).

(5) Two references in Colossians have to do strictly with the nature of Christ (Col 1:19; 2:9).

The expansion of the phrases in the vocabulary of Paul's letters and churches is very likely the product of two basic concerns:

(1) In varying ways Paul found it necessary to assert the exclusivity or distinctiveness of God's saving action through Christ. To describe God as having acted "in Christ" or redemption as being "in Christ" succinctly conveyed this thought ("the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord," Rom 6:23).

(2) It was also important to Paul to define how believers were to live under Christ's saving lordship. In statements which call for, describe or commend obedience, "in Christ/the Lord" communicates simultaneously the gift of salvation and the accompanying divine demand (e.g., "stand firm in the Lord," Phil 4:1). The phrases therefore became a vehicle for Paul to describe the life of faith under Christ's lordship in a world where other powers and temptations were present. To act "in Christ" is to act in faith and obedience in the face of false alternatives: "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision or uncircumcision has any force, but rather faith working through love" (Gal 5:6). See also ADAM AND CHRIST; BODY OF CHRIST; CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Best, One Body in Christ: A Study of the Relationship of the Church to Christ in the Epistles of the Apostle Paul (London: SPCK, 1955); W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970); M. Bouttier, En Christ: Étude d'exégèse et de théologie pauliniennes (Paris: Universitaires de France, 1962); A. Deissmann, Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1926); R. H. Gundry, Soma in Biblical Theology (SNTSMS 29; Cambridge: University Press, 1976); E. Käsemann, "The Theological Problem Presented by the Motif of the Body of Christ," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 102-21; E. Mayser, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemäerzeit (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1934); C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: University Press, 1977); F. Neugebauer, "Das Paulinische 'in Christo,' " NTS 4 (1957-58) 124-38; A. Oepke, "ἐν," TDNT II.537-43; S. E. Porter, "Two Myths: Corporate Personality and Language/Mentality Determinism," SJT 43 (1990) 289-307; A. T. Robertson, A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research (4th ed.; New York: Hodder & Stoughton, 1923); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (London: Black, 1931); A. J. M. Wedderburn, Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology Against Its Graeco-Roman Background (WUNT 44; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987); idem, "Some Observations on Paul's Use of the Phrases 'in Christ' and 'with Christ,' " JSNT 25 (1985) 83-97; N. T. Wright, "Χριστός as 'Messiah' in Paul: Philemon 6," in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 41-55.

M. A. Seifrid

INCEST. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST.

INSPIRED UTTERANCE. See GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; PROPHECY, PROPHESYING; TONGUES.

INSTITUTIONALIZATION. See EARLY CATHOLICISM; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES.

INTERCESSION

When Paul and the early Christians reflected on the resurrection* and exaltation* of Christ,* it is not surprising that they thought about Christ's heavenly* role. From its use throughout the NT, Psalm 110 seems to have shaped this picture: "The Lord says to my Lord, 'Sit at my right hand, till I make your enemies your footstool' " (Rom 8:34; 1 Cor 15:25; Eph 1:20; Col 3:1; cf. Mt 26:64; Mk 14:62; Heb 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Pet 3:22). Christ had been enthroned in heaven, and it was clear that as a king his heavenly authority* stood unchallenged as to its ultimate acknowledgement (Phil 2:9-11).

But further inquiry about Christ's salvific work prompted more questions. Did Jesus present the completed work of his sacrifice* to God*? Did he continue to intercede for his people before the Father as their representative? If the Spirit* was indeed Christ's Spirit, did the Spirit have an intercessory role as well? For Paul, the answer to these questions was yes.

1. The Exalted Christ
2. The Holy Spirit

1. The Exalted Christ.

Only in two NT texts is the heavenly intercession of Christ explicitly mentioned (Rom 8:34 and Heb 7:25). In each case the term used is entynchanō (cf. hyperentynchanō and enteuxis), the root of which refers to an approach, an entreaty, often a plea on behalf of another. Paul uses this sense in Romans 11:2, describing how Elijah pleaded with God against Israel (cf. Acts 25:24). But generally in the NT the word group refers to prayer (see 1 Tim 2:1; 4:5).

Romans 8:34 appears in Paul's well-known summary of the work of God in Christ on behalf of believers (Rom 8:31-39). In Romans 8:34 he lists the climactic events of Christ's life: "Christ Jesus, who died, yes, who was raised from the dead, who is at the right hand of God, and who intercedes for us." This contributes to Paul's confidence in the unfailing love* which God holds for believers (Rom 8:35). Christ is their advocate who continuously prays on their behalf before God (see Prayer).

Considerable debate has always surrounded this issue. (1) Are we to think that Christ's intercession is a continuation of his work of redemption*? Must he eternally plead the efficacy of his cross* before God in order to make salvation a reality for believers? Luther was persuaded that this was the case, and for him, Christ's intercession stood alongside his death* and resurrection as integral works of salvation. (2) On the other hand, some have emphasized the completed work of Christ. Since the mystery* of salvation is concluded at the cross, redemption is accomplished without further mediatorial ministry of the ascended Christ.

This second view has been particularly popular in the Reformed Tradition (see esp. K. Barth and the commentaries by L. Morris and C. E. B. Cranfield). Its premise is that if we posit more requirements for salvation than the death of Jesus, this undercuts the conclusive power of the cross. Most have argued that Christ's presence alone with the Father in heaven achieves this intercession.

This latter view seems true to Paul in terms of the finality of the cross, though some have suggested that it lacks a pastoral quality implicit in Paul's statement. Jesus Christ is ultimately and eternally sympathetic with the condition of believers and forever validates their security in God's plan. Thus Romans 8:35 quickly emphasizes that nothing can separate from the love of God because God's compassion for his own is eternally displayed in heaven in Christ.

2. The Holy Spirit.

Intercession, however, is not simply the work of Christ. Paul also believed that the Holy Spirit carried on an intercessory ministry on behalf of believers. Romans 8:26-27 is the only text where Paul makes this clear. As Christ intercedes in heaven, so too the Spirit works on behalf of the saints, interceding for them during the struggles and limits of this earthly life. But it is vital to see how this notion fits into the larger theological argument of Romans 8. After celebrating the glory of life in the Spirit (Rom 8:1-17), Paul lapses into a realistic discussion of the imperfect, limited character of the Christian life. The Spirit of Christ within believers brings transformation, and yet the Spirit cannot bring eschatological perfection* (see Holiness, Sanctification). Those who are "in Christ"* continue to live in a world of suffering,* decay, futility* and confusion (Rom 8:18-25). The creation itself longs for its redemption (Rom 8:22). All is still subjected to hope.* And yet within this darkness, even when believers do not know how to speak or pray or worship,* the Spirit facilitates believers to form an appropriate response to God in spite of their fallenness: "The Spirit intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words." God sovereignly draws men and women into his presence, even when they seem too crippled to walk.

Significant debate surrounds whether or not this ministry of the Spirit is actually describing glossolalia (or "speaking in tongues," cf. 1 Cor 12—14; see Tongues). "Sighs too deep for words" (Rom 8:26) and "inward groanings" (Rom 8:23) might well be the incomprehensible prayer language that Paul had described as taking place among the Corinthian believers. This is even more likely when we recall the theological function of the Spirit in Romans 8:18-27. The Spirit is a foreign power* that intervenes in our darkness and confusion; a remedy when no cure is at hand. He does not energize human effort in prayer, but, in human weakness* and powerlessness, he fills believers' prayers with completely new content.

K. Stendahl and E. Käsemann are among those who have argued that Romans 8:26 is best viewed "simply as glossolalic utterance" (Käsemann, 131) parallel to that described in 1 Corinthians 12—14. According to them, the phrase katho dei ("as we ought") does not modify ouk oidamen ("we do not know") as in the RSV. Correct method in prayer is not the issue. Rather, katho dei relates to the content of prayer: What, not how (ti, not pōs), we pray is the concern here, since it is only the Spirit that can lead us "according to the will of God." The Spirit supplies sighs which are not "wordless" (alalētos), but beyond words, not formulated in human words. For Paul, "prayer is never wordless" (Käsemann, citing Schniewind, 129). Thus, it is a noticeable, audible phenomenon, an utterance likely appearing in assemblies of worship.

The most articulate opponent of Käsemann's view is A. J. M. Wedderburn (see also the remarks of C. E. B. Cranfield, 423-24). For Wedderburn the crux of the issue is the word alalētos ("unspeakable"). The term has no metaphorical meaning (there is no precedent for this in Greek), and according to Wedderburn it must mean that these words are literally unuttered. He points to 2 Corinthians 12:4 as support. But this is debatable. 2 Corinthians 12:4 is about heavenly visions* that Paul cannot and must not articulate in human language. On the contrary, Romans 8:26 focuses on the believers' human inability to express what they should pray but cannot because of their finiteness and weakness. Yet had Paul wished to make the allusion to glossolalia unmistakably clear, certain indications, as he provided in 1 Corinthians 12—14, would certainly have been given (see Dunn, 1.479 for discussion). Nevertheless, the thrust of the text is clear. Prayer needs to be formed by the Spirit as well as empowered by the Spirit on this side of the eschaton.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; EXALTATION AND ENTHRONEMENT; HOLY SPIRIT; PRAYER; TONGUES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. Bauernfeind, "τυγχάνω κτλ," TDNT VIII.242-45; C. Brown, "ἐντυγχάνω," NIDNTT 2.882-84; C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC; 2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979) 1.420-44; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); idem, Romans (WBC 38; 2 vols.; Dallas: Word, 1988); E. Käsemann, "The Cry for Liberty in the Worship of the Church [Rom 8:26]," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 122-37; G. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 578-84; G. MacRae, "A Note on Romans 8:26-27," HTR (1973) 227-30; L. Morris, The Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988) 334-42; K. Niederwimmer, "Das Gebet des Geistes, Röm 8:26," TZ 20 (1964) 252-65; K. Stendahl, "Paul at Prayer," in Meanings: The Bible as Document and as Guide (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 151-61; A. J. M. Wedderburn, "Romans 8:26—Toward a Theology of Glossolalia?," SJT 28 (1975) 369-77.

G. M. Burge

INTERMEDIATE STATE

The "intermediate state" is something of a technical term (the German equivalent being Zwischenzustand) used to describe the state of the believer between his or her death and the consummation of the created order at the parousia of Christ, at which time a new bodily existence is begun (see Eschatology). The phrase is not a NT one and is at best an inference which arises out of key passages dealing with eschatological hope* and resurrection* belief. The problem expressed by the phrase clearly arises out of the eschatological context of Paul's thought, assumes the future bodily resurrection and in one sense might be seen as an attempt to understand, from the strict vantage point of chronological time, the status of the deceased believer in God's eternal presence until the parousia. We could put the essential point which prompts the rise of the idea in the form of a question: What happens to believers at death?

To a great degree the idea of an intermediate state rests on the dualistic assumption that physical death is the separation of soul and body.* This is, of course, an assumption which must be balanced not only by a realization of the somatic nature of the resurrection in Paul's thought, but also by a sensitive handling of temporal considerations in the matter. Only when all three of these facets are held together can a balanced understanding of Paul's contribution to the matter be obtained.

1. Physical Death and Life with Christ
2. Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead?
3. Development in Pauline Thought: 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5
4. The Intermediate State as "Soul Sleep"

1. Physical Death and Life with Christ.

Some interpreters note that much of the NT witness on these matters is corporate (and not individualistic) in focus, a fact which may render some of the discussion about the intermediate state of the individual believer open to considerable question, or open to the charge of being speculative at best. Nevertheless, at several points within Paul's letters the apostle talks about the physical death of the believer as a means of entry into a fuller participation of life with Christ (see Life and Death). Thus in Philippians 1:23 he contrasts continuing life here on earth over against being "with Christ, for that is far better." Similarly in 2 Corinthians

5:6-8 we have a contrast between being "at home in the body" and being "at home with the Lord," with the death of the believer being the transitional event moving him or her from one "home" to the other.

Yet how can this life with Christ be the promised life in its fullest sense, given that according to Paul resurrection life is inherently somatic in nature and the granting of resurrection bodies is closely tied to the future parousia of Christ? The idea of an intermediate state attempts to bridge the chasm created by these two seemingly contradictory theological statements by postulating either an immediate consciousness of "being with Christ" at death or the granting of the resurrection body at death. Thus the intermediate state can be interpreted in terms of either a postmortem embodied existence, or a postmortem disembodied existence; the Pauline materials have been invoked by competent scholars to support both positions.

1.1. "Sleep." Two evocative images are used by Paul in seeking to express something of what we have termed the intermediate state. First, Paul uses the verb "to sleep" (koimaomai) with reference to the deceased a total of nine times (1 Cor 7:39; 11:30; 15:6, 18, 20, 51; 1 Thess 4:13, 14, 15). This builds upon the established intertestamental idea of Hades as the place of the sleep of the dead (as in 1 Enoch 91:10; 92:3). Although the verb is clearly used by Paul as a euphemism for dying, it nevertheless carries with it the idea of presence with Christ at death (see below).

1.2. "Nakedness." In 2 Corinthians 5:3-4 Paul uses an extended clothing metaphor to describe existence between the time of death and the granting of a resurrection body at the parousia of Christ. Thus "nakedness" is equal to existence without a body (disembodiment) and is something to be abhorred, while "being clothed" is embraced in that it means being granted the heavenly resurrection body (see Sevenster). Some scholars, such as E. E. Ellis, feel that the curious reference to "being away from the body" in 2 Corinthians 5:8 is closely related to this clothing image. The precise meaning of the clothing metaphor is a debated point (as Weigelt observes), although a contrast between earthly life and a postmortem existence is clear. C. F. D. Moule offers an interesting interpretation of the metaphor which, in a way, helps resolve somewhat the tension between 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 concerning the nature of the resurrection body. He argues that in 1 Corinthians 15 the resurrection body is something superimposed upon mortal existence, while in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 the resurrection body is something exchanged for it. This subtle distinction, Moule contends, is related to the clothing metaphor in that there is a correspondingly subtle distinction between the various forms of endyesthai and ependyesthai used by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5:1-10 respectively (Harris, 220-23, discusses the matter).

Both images (sleep and nakedness) should be recognized as essentially metaphorical in substance, seeking to express the inexpressible, and neither should be made to carry more theological weight than it is able.

2. Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead?

Some (such as Cullmann) have sought to approach the question of the intermediate state in terms of a straightforward contrast between the Greek view of the postmortem existence and the Judeo-Christian view. According to Cullmann, the former focuses on the immortality of the soul and viewed death as a friend, while the latter focuses on the resurrection of the dead and viewed death as an enemy to be defeated. The resolution such a juxtaposition provides does answer some of the more pressing difficulties raised by the issue of postmortem existence, but it is one which rests on a false dichotomy (as Hanhart notes). It is unlikely that a hard and fast distinction can be made between the Hellenistic and the Judeo-Christian views on the postmortem state, especially given the interpenetration of (so-called) Palestinian and Hellenistic cultures of the NT period (see Hellenism). In addition, there are several Christian and Jewish sources (including the Qumran materials) from the time which seem to teach the immortality of the soul (Cavallin provides some discussion of these). The matter cannot be solved by means of such a false contrast as Cullmann's distinction maintains.

While it is true that in Paul's writing immortality is, more properly speaking, a concept applied to the resurrected body (and not to the disembodied soul), this should not be taken as a denial of the truth of immediate presence with Christ at death to which the idea of immortality of the soul points. We must allow that Paul combines his belief in the reality of the intermediate state in heaven together with his expectation of the future resurrection of the dead (as Lincoln argues). At the same time we should recognize that the dichotomy between immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body implies a distinction between the disembodied and embodied postmortem states respectively. It is highly doubtful that Paul would have conceived of the believer as ultimately disembodied, given his Jewish background which generally viewed the human being as a complete psychosomatic entity.

3. Development in Pauline Thought: 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5.

Some have attempted to expound the significance of the Pauline teaching about the intermediate state in terms of a two-stage development of his eschatological thought. Thus the more traditional teaching on the granting of the resurrection body at the last day (as expressed in 1 Thess 4 and 1 Cor 15) is seen to give way to a greater emphasis on the believer as being immediately in the presence of Christ at the moment of death (as Phil 1:23 and 2 Cor 5:8 suggest). C. H. Dodd, a classic proponent of this approach, takes this shift in Paul's thought to have been occasioned by the apostle's own brush with death, something which took place between the writing of the letters we know as 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians; this trauma is perhaps hinted at in 2 Corinthians 1:8 (see R. Yates for a discussion of this crucial verse).

Certainly the fact that the verb "to sleep" (koimaomai) is used in 1 Thessalonians and 1 Corinthians but not in 2 Corinthians and Philippians lends some support to the theory of development of thought. Others have contested that such a radical shift in Paul's thought has occurred, or have sought to contain its implications in some way. Moule, for example, explains the difference in emphasis between the two stages as one brought about by the circumstances of the individual letters concerned. Harris explains the difference in the two stages as arising from the fact that the corporate and individualistic facets of Paul's teaching about postmortem existence are being expressed in 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians respectively. Certainly too much can be made of the differences between 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5, and it should be ever kept in mind that Paul's focus of concentration and reason for writing is different in the two letters (as Gillman argues).

In any event, however differently 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians might be with respect to the issue of the present postmortem state of the believer, they are united in that they proclaim (or at least imply) a resurrection body for the believer at the parousia of Christ. In that sense both letters assert a transformation of the believer in Christ; but what of the timing of that transformation? F. F. Bruce remarks wisely on this matter: "The tension created by the postulated interval between death and resurrection might be relieved today if it were suggested that in the consciousness of the departed believer there is no interval between dissolution and investiture, however long an interval might be measured by the calendar of earth-bound human history." (The issue of development in Paul's eschatological thought is usually treated in commentaries on 2 Corinthians, generally within the discussion on 2 Corinthians 5:1-10; see Furnish and Martin.)

4. The Intermediate State as "Soul Sleep."

The description of the intermediate state as one of soul sleep is often associated with the thought of the Reformer Martin Luther. Luther described the deceased believer as being unconsciously "asleep" in the arms of Christ until the last day. Effectively Luther's teaching challenged Roman Catholicism with respect to ideas of afterlife (including purgatory) as he shifted the focus of discussion from one of topography to one of christology.* At the same time it should be noted that Luther also recognized that such earthly measurements of time are inadequate to describe fully the status of the deceased believer. As Luther argued, human and divine measurements of time cannot be equated. The sleep image itself has its limitations and should be seen as but one attempt to communicate the believer's assured presence with Christ at death.

The idea of afterlife as soul sleep presents great problems for some modern interpreters of Paul who argue that a proper view of humankind emphasizes the wholistic nature of a person (Badham offers some discussion of this).

See also BODY; ESCHATOLOGY; LIFE AND DEATH; PSYCHOLOGY; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1966) 410-17; P. Badham, Christian Beliefs About Life After Death (London: Macmillan, 1976); M. C. de Boer, The Defeat of Death (JSNTS 22; Sheffield: Academic, 1988); F. F. Bruce, "Paul on Immortality," SJT 24 (1971) 457-72; R. Cassidy, "Paul's Attitude to Death in II Corinthians 5:1-10," EvQ 43 (1971) 210-17; H. C. C. Cavallin, Life After Death: Paul's Argument for the Resurrection of the Dead in 1 Cor 15 (ConB 7,1; Lund: Gleerup, 1974); O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (London: Epworth, 1958); C. H. Dodd, New Testament Studies (Manchester: University Press, 1953) 67-128; E. E. Ellis, "II Corinthians V.1-10 in Pauline Eschatology," NTS 6 (1959-60) 211-24); V. P. Furnish, II Corinthians (AB 32A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984); J. Gillman, "A Thematic Comparison: 1 Cor 15:50-57 and 2 Cor 5:1-5," JBL 107 (1988) 439-54; K. Hanhart, "Paul's Hope in the Face of Death," JBL 88 (1969) 445-57; M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal: The Relation Between Resurrection and Immortality in New Testament Teaching (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: University Press, 1981); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco, TX: Word, 1986); C. F. D. Moule, "The Influence of Circumstances on the Use of Eschatological Terms," JTS 15 (1964) 1-15; idem, "St. Paul and Dualism: The Pauline Conception of the Resurrection," NTS 13 (1966-67) 106-23; J. N. Sevenster, "Some Remarks on the GYMNOS in II Cor. V.3," in Studia Paulina in honorem Johannis de Zwaan, ed. J. N. Sevenster and W. C. van Unnik (Haarlem: Bohn, 1953) 202-14; H. Weigelt, "Clothe, Naked, Dress, Garment, Cloth," NIDNTT 1.312-17; R. Yates, "Paul's Affliction in Asia: 2 Cor 1:8," EvQ 53 (1981) 241-45.

L. J. Kreitzer

ISRAEL

Paul confesses openly that he himself is an Israelite, that he loves his kinfolk and desires their salvation.* Despite their present rejection of the gospel,* he refuses to regard them as irretrievably rejected by God.* He sees them as bearers of a spiritual heritage which has now been opened up to Gentiles* also. He never suggests that Gentiles have displaced Israel or that Israel has no role to play in God's future. Rather he sees God's gift to Israel as irrevocable and Israel as occupying an inalienable place in the divine economy of salvation.

1. Introduction
2. Definition and Terminology
3. The Extension of the Covenant with Israel to Gentiles
4. Israel as the Creation of God's Word
5. Israel's Fault
6. Israel's Dual Status: Beloved and at Enmity with the Gospel
7. Paul's Solution: The Restoration of Israel by Means of the Gentile Mission
8. Israel in Contemporary Perspective

1. Introduction.

Israel was the established name in Scripture for both the covenant* people and the covenanted land. When Paul uses the term he is not using it simply as a general designation of those claiming physical descent from Abraham.* Rather he uses it to designate them as the people of the covenant made with Abraham. Even when Paul refers to the Israel which has rejected his gospel, he can still use the title because he thinks of the people as a whole as a religious entity, the historic people of God. In Romans 2:17, 28-29 and Romans 3:29 Paul speaks of the "Jew," but in Romans 9—11 his clear preference is for "Israel"/"Israelite." One gets the impression that when Paul wants to stress ethnic affiliation, he uses the term Jew, but when he comes to reflect upon their spiritual heritage, Israel/Israelite alone can clearly designate this people as a religious entity.

2. Definition and Terminology.

2.1. Israel of God—New Israel. The main passages in Paul's letters where Israel is discussed are Galatians 6:16, Romans 9—11 and, to a lesser extent, 2 Corinthians 3:7, 13. In 1 Corinthians 10:18 Paul gives a brief reference to Israel to warn the Christians not to be presumptuous. In 2 Corinthians 3 a contrast is drawn between the old dispensation and the new—a contrast really between degrees of glory,* showing how greatly the new excels the old. Also in 2 Corinthians 11:22 Paul, in face of counterclaims, asserts that he himself is an Israelite. It turns out therefore that Romans 9—11 is the crucial text for our topic and we must devote substantial attention to it. But first we need to consider Galatians 6:16 ("the Israel of God"), which some interpreters have regarded as the first reference to the church as "the new Israel."

At the conclusion of his letter to the Galatians, Paul concludes with a benediction.* In Galatians 6:15 he has asserted that in Christ* "neither circumcision* counts for anything nor uncircumcision, but a new creation." By this he sought to repudiate and to relativize the claims of those who wanted to force his Gentile converts in Galatia* to accept circumcision—the major purpose of his letter. He concludes with a sentence which the RSV translates as "Grace and mercy be upon all who walk by this rule, upon the Israel of God." This translation suggests that the latter phrase, "the Israel of God," is simply in apposition to the former and that Paul's benediction is thereby applied to all those Christians who, like him, regard circumcision as unessential. This would mean that Paul, already at this early stage in the NT era, identifies the Christian church* as "the Israel of God" in opposition to the historical people of God. But this translation is unlikely for several reasons.

The basic problem is that the RSV translation has omitted the kai ("and") in the Greek text. The NRSV has corrected this error and now translates Galatians 6:15, "Peace be upon them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God." The revised NEB unfortunately is similar to the RSV. If Paul had really wished to equate the Gentile believers with "the Israel of God," it seems strange that he first uses the phrase here at the very conclusion of his letter. And even if it be granted that the identification is actually made here between believers and the Israel of God, it is somewhat tenuous to hang so much on one doubtful translation since, apart from this passage, there is no other evidence until about A.D. 160 for the explicit identification of the church as "the Israel of God" or "New Israel." This isolated instance would be difficult to explain by itself. Why was it that no one in the next hundred years used this verse to identify the church as "the New Israel?"

It seems better to translate as P. Richardson has suggested: "May God give peace to all who will walk according to this criterion, and mercy also to his faithful people Israel" (Richardson, 84), or as the NIV translates, "Peace and mercy to all who follow this rule, even to the Israel of God."

From this brief survey of the references to Israel in Paul, there is no clear or explicit evidence prior to Romans 9—11 that suggests either an identification of the church with "the New Israel" nor of a theory of displacement of the "old Israel" by the new. Only historical Israel can properly claim the title "Israel of God."

2.2. An "Israel" within Israel? The attribution of the title "Israel" and the recognition of her heritage does not imply however that Paul is not fully conscious of the fact that the majority of the people of Israel were currently rejecting his message. The unique aspect of Paul's understanding of Israel is that she is both beloved because of the fathers—the legitimate heir of the promises—and yet at the same time at enmity with the gospel. In order to give a satisfactory explanation of this state of affairs, Paul was forced to take a careful look at the history of Israel in the Scriptures. From this he came to a conclusion that some Jews would have considered radical, even blasphemous—that not all the descendants of Abraham are truly Abraham's children in the sense that they share the same kind of faith as their father Abraham.

Paul's thesis, which has been grossly misrepresented and which has led to unbalanced interpretations of the relation of Jew and Gentile in the gospel is not, on his premises, simply his own novel creation. Within the nation of Israel God has always exercised his prerogative to select people to carry out his purpose. Every Jew admitted this; Ishmael was a child of Abraham but no Jew believed that the Arabs, his descendants, were within the covenant. According to the OT, the children of faith were reckoned through the line of Isaac (Rom 9:8), and this was because the birth of Isaac was not just a matter of ordinary physical generation but the result of the promise of God, accepted in faith by Abraham (Rom 4:18-22). So Paul insists that since in the biblical narrative there were already examples of descendants of Abraham who were not children of promise, then there ought to be no problem in acknowledging in his own day that "not all those descended from Abraham are Israel."

It seems, at least on the surface, that Paul is guilty of redefining "Israel" to suit his own purposes. The issue centers on the definition of "the Israel of God."

In Romans 2:28-29 Paul had already asserted "Not the outward Jew is a real Jew," a parallel to Romans 9:6b—"Not all offspring of Israel are Israel." It seems therefore that some such term as the "real Israel," "true Israel" or "inner Israel" is logically required to express Paul's intent. The true Israel is "of Israel" in terms of physical descent but not coextensive with historical Israel. (We note in passing that having introduced the concept of the "true Israel" we are then forced to introduce a neutral term, i.e., "historical Israel," in order to avoid slipping into the easy equation of Israel with unbelieving or false Israel, i.e., as a symbol of disobedience.)

Paul himself appears to operate with a fluid concept of Israel. This doubtless originates from ancient Semitic concepts of solidarity which modern individualism finds hard to understand because it is so far removed from much contemporary (Western) religious thought.

Paul's thought in Romans needs to be differentiated from his previous discussion in Galatians.* There Paul distinguished two contrasting groups "Israel of the flesh" and "Israel of the Spirit" (Rom 4:29). The closest parallel in Romans* is Romans 4:14-16, where the terms used are hoi ek nomou ("those of the Law") and hoi ek pisteōs ("those of faith"). But in this chapter the argument runs not on the pattern "either a or b" but "not only a but also b"—it is inclusive rather than exclusive. Paul insists that since the coming of faith (in Christ), not only those who follow the Law,* the Jews, but also those of faith,* Gentiles, may also be included in the people of God. It could be argued that Paul in Romans 9—11 first frees the concept of Israel from its absolute identification with all of Abraham's descendants and then, having loosed this connection, he proceeds to include Gentiles also within "eschatological Israel."

But we must be careful about what Paul does and does not say. It is true that he argues that not all offspring of Israel are Israel. Then he continues from this to argue from Romans 9:22 and what follows that Gentiles may also be included in the people of God. Yet Paul never suggests a complete displacement of Israel by Gentiles however much he argues for the rights of believers. In the end he maintains that the children of God (tekna tou theou) are not merely children of fleshly descent (tekna tēs sarkos) but rather children of promise (tekna tēs epangelias, Rom 9:8).

Nor does Paul simply equate the Christian community with "spiritual Israel," "Israel kata pneuma," and the Jews with "fleshly Israel," "Israel kata sarka" (cf. Gal 4:29). His thought is more complex on this issue.

The problem with terms such as true Israel, spiritual Israel or even eschatological Israel is that all of these may be misused to imply that the church is the only true Israel, and that "historical Israel" is no better than pagan nations, having forfeited her heritage absolutely. It is quite clear that despite Paul's making a radical distinction within Israel and thereby driving a wedge into the historical people of God, he would certainly have insisted that part of historical Israel is also part of eschatological Israel.

3. The Extension of the Covenant with Israel to Gentiles.

It is beyond dispute that Paul could not have envisaged an eschatological Israel that contained none of the historical Israel. Paul's thinking is much more concrete and historically oriented than subsequent Gentile-Christian understanding makes it out to be.

Moreover, certain legal and theological factors have to be taken into account. If an inheritance is bequeathed to someone, one cannot legally displace the heir without breaking the terms of the agreement, the covenant. Gentiles have too easily presumed on their access to the heritage of Israel to which they have no inherent right. The theological factor involves our conception of God's faithfulness. If God is a faithful, covenant-keeping God, how then can Israel be fully and finally rejected? If, for whatever reason, Israel's promises are given to others, then Israel has failed and God also has failed in his purpose for Israel (Rom 9:6). Paul is therefore concerned to maintain both that God is free (and hence not determined by Israel), but also that he is committed to Israel in that he will achieve his purposes through this people whether in their cooperation or in their rebellion.

4. Israel as the Creation of God's Word.

Both the power and the creative freedom of God are emphasized by Paul in his discussion of Israel in Romans 9—11. By his call God created his people and by his word he accomplishes what he purposes. By this alone is Israel the people of God constituted (and re-constituted). But this does not mean God uses his power in any arbitrary fashion. He does have the power to make children from stones, but in fact what Paul claims in Romans 9:1-22 is that God selects not stones, nor even Gentiles but those from within the people of Israel.

The freedom of the potter is absolute; he can make from the clay whatever vessel he purposes, whether for menial or honorable purposes, and the vessel cannot question the logic of its destiny. Yet we need to remember that God, the divine potter, uses the Jewish people as his clay. Granted, the Jew is not eo ipso "seed" (sperma) or "child of God" (teknon theou) but only becomes this through the calling (kalein) and reckoning (logizesthai) of God (Rom 9:7-8). Yet this people, as those historically in covenant with their creator, occupy a unique position. Only since and because of the advent of Christ can Gentiles be included in the people of God through the extension of Israel's covenant; Israel's privilege and priority necessitate that the gospel to the Gentiles can only come by the way of Judaism. Thus Israel occupies an inalienable place in the purposes and plans of God; if Gentiles are to participate in these, they must acknowledge God's prior commitment to Israel and all that this entails (Eph 2:11-22 is an important recognition of this fact).

Until the coming of Christ, God, through his word of promise, creates Israel anew according to his purpose of grace. With the opening up of the promises to Gentiles also the possibility of a "new Israel" or a "renewed Israel" is now a reality. Thus Israel and the church are both the creation of the divine word. From this perspective there is no essential difference between them. However, both historically and theologically, Paul wishes to maintain an awareness of the priority of Israel and warns Gentiles about being too presumptuous lest they forget God's prior engagement with Israel.

5. Israel's Fault.

The non-inclusion of part of Israel is attributed by Paul both to God's predestination (see Election) and to Israel's failure (Rom 9:6-29). In Paul's thought these elements are neither contradictory nor mutually exclusive. Israel's fault is that most Israelites of Paul's time did not put their faith in Jesus Christ. He had become a stumbling* stone to them (Rom 9:30—10:4). The reason for this failure to accept Christ has traditionally been regarded as "a self-righteous attitude on the part of Jews." "They sought to establish their own righteousness" (Rom 10:3) has been understood to mean that Jews thought that righteousness* could be achieved by their own effort, that is, by good works. Hence those who made that effort presumed they had succeeded and became self-righteous as a result. They had a zeal but a mistaken zeal (Rom 10:2).

E. P. Sanders in particular has written much to correct this general view of the fault of Israel. He argues that zeal as such is not wrong. They did not err in seeking righteousness but they sought the wrong kind of righteousness—righteousness "of their own" in the sense that it was a righteousness peculiar to Jews as a people and the righteousness of a former dispensation prior to the coming of faith (in Jesus Christ). The fault of this righteousness is its exclusivity and the "coming of faith" means that God's salvation is open to everyone who has faith, whether Jew or Gentile; there is no distinction (Rom 10:12). It seems therefore that Paul's gospel was an offense to many Jews who failed to understand and/or acknowledge the new day that had dawned in Jesus Christ. They saw Paul's work and message as an absolute threat to the future and well-being of Israel and they opposed it bitterly as a result. But Paul did not perceive it thus—he sees the coming of Christ as confirmation (Gk bebaian, Rom 4:16) of the promises made to Abraham and as an extension of the covenant to include believing Gentiles along with the believing in Israel. He refuses to regard Israel as "rejected" but only as temporarily hardened by God until the full number of the Gentiles comes into the kingdom.*

6. Israel's Dual Status: Beloved and at Enmity with the Gospel.

As we have noted already, Paul seems to have had a fluid concept of Israel because he saw the people as one corporate entity irrespective of the merits or failure of particular individuals. His perspective on Israel is both historical and communal (as distinct from some modern views that are theological/symbolic and individualistic). But because his approach is historical and since he discusses the actual, empirical Israel, he has a problem of definition. Israel is opposed to the gospel; particular Jews are enemies of Paul and his message. But the Jews as a whole are the heirs of the promises given to Abraham and confirmed by the coming of Christ.

Paul does not shrink from the full seriousness of this dilemma. Israel's dual status is that she is rejecting the gospel but is still beloved because of the patriarchs.

Various solutions have been offered to this problem. A common one is that God has two different covenants*—a covenant involving Law-keeping for the Jews and a covenant based on faith alone for Gentiles. But Paul's solution differs from this. He neither minimizes the problem by claiming that all Jews will be saved apart from Christ, nor by predicting another covenant to ensure their eventual salvation.

7. Paul's Solution: The Restoration of Israel by Means of the Gentile Mission.

The actual situation Paul faced near the end of his ministry was that Gentiles were willing to accept Christ but Jews were not. Some Jews probably still held fast to the traditional view of "Jews first and then the Gentiles," that the gospel could only be allowed to proceed to the Gentiles after Israel had already embraced it. Paul had possibly wrestled with this issue as he first heard the Hellenists proclaim the Christian message. But when he experienced his Damascus Road vision, he himself had to work out how his own commission related to this perspective (see Conversion and Call). Working from the empirical evidence of the reality of the Spirit's work among the Gentiles, Paul came to the conclusion that the order of salvation had been changed. "To the Jew first" now means that while the irrevocable place of Israel is confirmed by the gospel, the order of entry for Jew and Gentile into the new community of faith is in fact reversed.

The new reality is that the Gentiles are preceding the Jews and from this actual historical sequence Paul proceeds to argue a theology of the final salvation of Israel succeeding that of Gentiles (Rom 11:12). Just as the rejection of the gospel by Jews had caused it to spread to the Gentiles, so now the reception of the gospel by Gentiles will ensure the turning back of the Jews. Paul came to this conclusion from scriptural, theological and empirical evidence. The empirical evidence of believing Gentiles and unbelieving Jews was plain to see.

The theological evidence Paul developed from his conviction of God's faithfulness. Paul was convinced that Christ's coming demonstrated that God himself is faithful and that he justifies the one who has faith (in Jesus, Rom 3:26). The theology of a "righteous remnant" was frequently used in this discussion. God always retained a faithful remnant to ensure the final success of his purposes. The remnant could be seen as a sign either of judgment* or of mercy,* or even of both. In Romans 9:22-29 and 11:2-6 Paul makes use of this theme. The RSV text of Romans 9:27 (which quotes the prophet Isaiah) reads "Though the number of the sons of Israel be as the sand of the sea, only a remnant will be saved." Although it could be disputed whether the introduction of "only" is justified, we have in the English version an example of the remnant theme reminding us of the divine judgment upon Israel. In Romans 11:2-6 there is no doubt that Paul sees the remnant as a sign of hope*—of mercy rather than of judgment (although judgment is already presupposed). He again uses a scriptural example: Elijah mistakenly thought he alone was left of God's faithful people, but God reminded him that he had kept for himself seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal. Paul concludes "so too at the present time, there is a remnant, chosen by grace" (Rom 11:5). Paul interprets this present remnant, believing Jews, as first fruits* of the coming harvest—it is a hopeful sign. Thus it would be appropriate to translate Romans 11:5 "so too at the present time—there is already a remnant." The existence of some Jewish believers becomes for Paul a pointer to the salvation of all Israel.

How this salvation would take place led Paul to ponder the Scriptures in the light of his own experience. there is a very real possibility that Paul's apostolic commission may actually have included a vision of the restoration* of Israel. The image in Isaiah 49:1 of one set apart from his mother's womb is used by Paul in Galatians 1:15 (cf. Acts 13:47; see Prophet, Paul as). The Servant's call in this passage ties together the twin aspects of his universal work—to be an agent of Israel's restoration and a light to the Gentiles. It is therefore inappropriate to view Paul as apostle to the Gentiles with no function in relation to Israel. It is more fitting to see him as the apostle to the Gentiles for the sake of Israel, so that there is a necessary connection between Paul's Gentile mission and the restoration of Israel.

It was, however, in Deuteronomy 32 that Paul found Scripture that suggested a way to lead rebellious Israel back to God. When Paul read in Deuteronomy 32:21 "I will make you jealous of those who are not a nation; with a foolish nation I will make you angry," he took this to mean that the Gentiles were "the foolish nation," the "no people"; so he found here a clue which he developed to argue that his Gentile mission would indirectly bring Israel, through jealousy, to acknowledge the truth as he saw it.

R. B. Hays has convincingly demonstrated that in Deuteronomy 32 "Paul finds not only the prophecy of Israel's lack of faith and ultimate restoration but also the prefiguration of God's intention to 'stir them to jealousy' through embracing the Gentiles (Deut 32:43)." Hays goes on to comment, "It is hardly coincidental that Paul quotes both of these verses explicitly (Rom 10:19; 15:10)," and he concludes "Deuteronomy 32 contains Romans 'in nuce' " (Hays, 164). It would appear that Paul, faced with the hardened hearts of the majority of his people, found in Deuteronomy 32 a text which looked inexorably beyond present judgment to future hope. Despite a certain tendency among some scholars to regard Romans 9—11 as stressing either judgment or mercy upon Israel, it is plain that in the Deuteronomic tradition it includes both—"Note then the kindness and the severity of God" (Rom 11:22). The severity is for the sake of God's ultimate compassion, and it is perfectly fitting that Romans 11 ends not with the rejection but with the *restoration of "all Israel" (Rom 11:25).

So despite Israel's present obduracy, the ongoing historical process of the Gentile mission will continue until their number is complete—perhaps when the gospel has been "planted" everywhere. The pilgrimage of the Gentiles (Is 2:2-5) will not succeed but rather precede the restoration of Israel—the nations do not come because they see Israel's glory,* but Israel comes because she sees the salvation and glory Gentiles have in Christ. Paul was probably the first to propose this sequence but, as Hofius notes, Paul may have found support in certain OT texts which had already suggested it.

A number of items are closely interrelated in Paul's thought: "The Deliverer will come from Zion, he will remove ungodliness from Jacob;" all Israel—in the sense of the totality of the people (not necessarily every single individual)—will be saved, and this will usher in the resurrection* of the dead.

This will be the final deliverance and vindication of Israel expected in Deuteronomy 32:36-43 and, significantly for Paul, when the Gentiles will rejoice with Israel (Deut 32:43). Most important of all, with the restoration of Israel it is not primarily Israel that is vindicated but the faithfulness and honorable name of God.

What emerges from all this is that Paul's mission cannot be viewed in isolation from Israel's restoration. The apostle views his Gentile mission both as a catalyst to the present salvation of a remnant from within Israel and as an essential precursor to the eventual salvation of all Israel; it is only when the "full measure" of the Gentiles comes in that all Israel will be saved (Rom 11:25-26).

Thus in the reverse sequence to earlier traditions, Israel and the Gentiles will both share in God's salvation. Moreover, despite present or future separation between the church and Israel, in the end there can be no absolutely "separate development" because their destinies remain intertwined in the mysterious workings of God's eternal purpose. Thus Israel cannot achieve her restoration until "the fullness of the Gentiles," and the Gentiles cannot participate in the resurrection without the prior restoration of Israel.

8. Israel in Contemporary Perspective.

Paul's understanding of Israel is thoroughly eschatological.* Modern Christians frequently do not share his perspective. They want to know precisely where contemporary Jews stand in relation to the kingdom of God—judging more from the perspective of a realized eschatology. Paul was as conscious as anyone of the division between him and his unconverted kinfolk. But he viewed them in the perspective of God's ultimate purpose. From this perspective they are not rejected by God but rather they still remain potential members of his eternal kingdom (as all are).

The continuing existence of the Jewish people should not be viewed simply as a result of their failure to accept the Christian message, that is, as a result of their disobedience. Nor should they be viewed merely as a sort of living object-lesson to Christians of the danger of "blind religiosity" as some extremists might describe them. We dare not insist that everything that happens in this world is directly caused by God, but it would be naive to suggest it is merely an accident of history that the historical people of God, the Jewish race, should continue to exist alongside Christianity.

See also ABRAHAM; COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT; ESCHATOLOGY; GENTILES; JEW, PAUL THE; OLIVE TREE; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE; STUMBLING BLOCK.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, "The Faithfulness of God and the Priority of Israel in Paul's Letter to the Romans," in The Romans Debate, ed. K. P. Donfried (rev. ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); R. Bring, "Paul and the Old Testament: A Study of the Ideas of Election, Faith and Law in Paul with Special Reference to Rom ix:30-x:21," Studia Theologica XXV (1971) 21-60; P. M. van Buren, "The Church and Israel: Romans 9-11," The Princeton Seminary Bulletin, Supplementary Issue 1, The Church and Israel: Romans 9-11 (1990) 5-18; W. S. Campbell, Paul's Gospel in an Intercultural Context (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1992); R. E. Clements, "A Remnant Chosen by Grace, (Rom 11:5)," in Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, ed. D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980) 106-21; C. E. B. Cranfield, Romans (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1979); idem, "The Significance of dia pantos in Romans xi:10," Studia Evangelica 2, Texte und Untersuchungen 87 (1964) 547-50; N. A. Dahl, "The Future of Israel," in Studies in Paul: Theology for the Early Christian Mission (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977) 137-58: W. D. Davies, "Paul and the People of Israel" and "Paul and the Gentiles: A Suggestion Concerning Romans 11:13-24," in Pauline and Jewish Studies (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 123-63; E. Dinkler, "The Historical and Eschatological Israel in Rom ix-xi: A Contribution to the Problem of Predestination and Individual Responsibility," JR (1956) 109-27; K. P. Donfried, ed., The Romans Debate (rev. ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (WBC 38b; Dallas: Word, 1988); L. Gaston, Paul and the Torah (Vancouver: University of British Columbia, 1987); M. A. Getty, "Paul on the Covenants and the Future of Israel," BTB 17 (1987) 92-99; K. Haacker, "Der Bekenntnis des Paulus zur Hoffnung Israels nach der Apostelgeschichte des Lukas," NTS 31 (1985) 437-451; idem, "Der Römerbrief als Friedensmemorandum," NTS 36 (1989) 25-41; S. J. Hafemann, "The Salvation of Israel in Romans 11:25-32: A Response to Krister Stendahl," Ex Auditu 4 (1989) 38-58; R. B. Hays Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1989); M. Hengel, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); O. Hofius, "All Israel Will Be Saved: Divine Salvation and Israel's Deliverance in Romans 9-11," The Princeton Seminary Bulletin, Supplementary Issue 1 (1990) 19-39; idem, "Das Evangelium und Israel. Erwägungen zu Römer 9-11," ZThK 83 (1986) 297-324; D. G. Johnson, "The Structure and Meaning of Romans 11," CBQ 46 (1984) 91-103; E. Käsemann, "Paul and Israel," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress 1969) 183-87; R. D. Kaylor, Paul's Covenant Community: Jew and Gentile in Romans (Atlanta: John Knox, 1988); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (2d ed.; WUNT 2.4; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1984); R. P. Martin, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); W. Meeks, "Judgment and the Brother: Romans 14:1-15:13," in Tradition and Interpretation: Essays in Honor of E. Earle Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 290-300; L. Morris, The Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); J. Munck, Christ and Israel: An Interpretation of Romans 9—11 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); H. Räisänen, "Paul, God and Israel: Romans 9-11 in Recent Research," in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism: Essays in Tribute to Howard Clark Kee, ed. J. Neusner et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); P. Richardson, Israel in the Apostolic Church (SNTSMS 10; Cambridge: University Press, 1969); E. P. Sanders, Paul (Oxford: University Press, 1991); idem, Paul, the Law and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (New Haven: Yale University, 1990); K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); J. Ziesler, Romans (TPINTC; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989).

W. S. Campbell

ISRAEL OF GOD. See ISRAEL.

ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA

Paul traveled extensively in the ancient world in fulfillment of his commission from the risen Christ* to be an apostle* to the Gentiles.* Our sources are sufficient for us to outline much of his itinerary and to discuss Paul's motivation for his journeys.

1. Sources
2. The Evidence of Paul's Letters
3. Apostolic Parousia
4. Paul's Motivation for Travel

5. Paul's Itinerary in Acts
6. Integration of the Letters and Acts

1. Sources.

The primary source for Paul's itinerary must be his letters as these provide firsthand evidence. Since Paul's letters are occasional documents and do not cover all of his career, they do not tell us of all of Paul's travels. On the other hand, Acts, our main secondary source, describes Paul's travels in detail. Methodologically it is important to examine Paul's letters first and ascertain what information they provide. Second, we will outline the evidence of Acts and, finally, we will see to what extent the evidence can be integrated.

2. The Evidence of Paul's Letters.

2.1. The Early Years. The revelation of Christ to Paul occurred in or near Damascus and from there Paul went into Arabia (Gal 1:16-17). The Nabatean kingdom of Arabia extended east and south of Palestine from the Euphrates to the Red Sea. Paul may have gone to Arabia to begin missionary work, or he may have sought a place of solitude to reflect on his encounter with the risen Christ (see Conversion and Call).

Paul then returned to Damascus (Gal 1:17) where he remained until three years after his encounter with Christ (Gal 1:18). At that time he found it necessary to escape from the hands of the provincial governor under King Aretas IV (2 Cor 11:32-33). He then went to Jerusalem* for fifteen days but saw only Cephas (see Peter) and James* of the apostles (Gal 1:18-19). Paul then went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:21). The churches of Judea heard that Paul was preaching the faith he once tried to destroy (Gal 1:23), so we can infer that in Syria and Cilicia he was involved in missionary work.

After fourteen years Paul went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas* and Titus. The fourteen years could be reckoned either from the time of his encounter with Christ, or from his first visit to Jerusalem. When in Jerusalem he had a private meeting with James, Cephas and John, who gave to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship and agreed that Paul and Barnabas should go to the Gentiles (Gal 2:1-10). Paul then returned to Antioch* and shortly afterward there occurred the incident in which he accused Cephas and Barnabas of hypocrisy (Gal 2:11-14).

2.2. Founding the Galatian Churches. Paul first preached the gospel* to the Galatians because of an illness (Gal 4:13; see Healing); he does not relate this founding visit to any other event. That he first visited Galatia before he wrote 1 Corinthians (see 2.4 below) is clear from 1 Corinthians 16:1, but Paul gives us no more information about when this was. It is debated whether Paul visited places like Ancyra and Pessinus (the North Galatian view) or Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe (the South Galatian view). Whether to proteron (Gal 4:13, "earlier" or "the first time") indicates that Paul made a second visit before he wrote Galatians is also debated (see Galatians).

2.3. Macedonia and Athens. In 1 Thessalonians 2:2 Paul tells us that he went to Philippi first and then went on to Thessalonica; Philippians 4:15-16 also implies this order. Paul seems to have spent quite some time in Thessalonica, long enough for him to receive help from the Philippian Christians "more than once" (Phil 4:16; see Thessalonians). After leaving Thessalonica Paul went to Athens.* He wanted to return to Thessalonica to visit the church there, but was hindered from doing so by Satan* and thus sent Timothy to strengthen the church. Timothy returned to Paul with a positive report (1 Thess 2:17-18; 3:1-6). As Paul wrote 1 Thessalonians he was praying that he would be able to go to Thessalonica to see the believers there (1 Thess 3:6, 10-11).

2.4. Ministry in Corinth and Ephesus. Second Corinthians 1:19 indicates that Paul, Silvanus and Timothy were the first to preach the gospel in Corinth (see Corinthians). This probably occurred shortly after the mission in Macedonia and Athens for two reasons. First, when Paul was in Corinth his needs were supplied by believers from Macedonia (2 Cor 11:9). Second, Paul had travelled from Philippi to Athens and then sent Timothy from there to Thessalonica; he met Timothy again at the place where 1 Thessalonians was composed (1 Thess 3:1-2). Silvanus probably accompanied Timothy on the return trip since he joined Paul and Timothy in writing 1 Thessalonians shortly after Timothy returned to Paul (1 Thess 1:1; 3:6; the three share only 1 and 2 Thess). Thus we know that the three people who first preached the gospel in Corinth (2 Cor 1:19) were together just after the mission in Thessalonica when they wrote 1 Thessalonians. This suggests they were in Corinth when they wrote and that we should place Paul's first visit to Corinth shortly after his time in Macedonia. It is clearly a good while after this that Paul wrote 1 Corinthians, since much had happened in the intervening period (Lüdemann, 101-3). This his second letter to Corinth (cf. the "previous letter" mentioned in 1 Cor 5:9 and now lost) was written from Ephesus (1 Cor 16:8, 19), so at some point after his time in Corinth he went on to Ephesus,* where his stay seems to have been a prolonged one.

Paul outlines his future travel plans in 1 Corinthians 16:1-8. He hoped to go to Corinth in connection with the Collection,* and may then accompany those carrying it to Jerusalem (1 Cor 16:3-4; 4:18-19). But first, after Pentecost, he planned to travel from Ephesus to Macedonia and might then spend the winter in Corinth (1 Cor 16:5-6). In the meantime he sent Timothy to Corinth (1 Cor 4:17; 16:10-11). Timothy seems to have returned to Ephesus with the bad news that neither the letter nor Timothy's presence had healed the rift between Paul and the Corinthians. Paul then made a second, "painful" visit to Corinth (2 Cor 2:1-2; 13:2); he was humiliated before the church and returned to Ephesus in great distress (2 Cor 12:21). He then sent Titus to Corinth with his third, "tearful" letter to the Corinthians (2 Cor 2:3-4, 9; 7:8-12; some scholars think that this was 2 Cor 10—13).

Paul then went to Troas where he had planned to meet Titus (2 Cor 2:12-13). When he did not find Titus there, he went on to Macedonia (2 Cor 2:13; 7:5). While there, Titus arrived with encouraging news that the Corinthians mourned their wrongs and longed to see Paul (2 Cor 7:6-7). Titus and two others were then sent on ahead to Corinth with Paul's fourth letter (2 Cor 8:16-24), which was probably 2 Corinthians 1—9, a letter of reconciliation. In the letter Paul also explained his change in travel plans (2 Cor 1:15—2:1; cf. 1 Cor 16:2-4) which had led to the charge that he was vacillating (2 Cor 1:17). Paul himself hoped to follow Titus (2 Cor 9:4-5). He probably then received word that renewed troubles had occurred in Corinth, so he wrote 2 Corinthians 10—13. He was again ready to visit the Corinthians (2 Cor 12:14, 20-21; 13:1-2, 10) for what was his third visit and it seems he did so (and was presumably well received), since he wrote Romans* from Corinth (Rom 16:23; cf. 1 Cor 1:14) and noted in Romans 15:26 that he had already added contributions to the Collection money from churches in Achaia, which would include Corinth.

Before Paul wrote Romans he had preached the gospel in Illyricum (Rom 15:19). We do not know when this was, although it was probably connected with a period in Macedonia.

2.5. To Jerusalem and Rome. Paul outlines further travel plans in Romans 15:22-31. Rome* is neither his immediate nor his long-term goal. From Corinth he plans to travel to Jerusalem; this is the third Jerusalem visit he mentions in his letters (see also 1 Cor 16:1-4; 2 Cor 1:16). He will deliver the Collection there (Rom 15:25-27), although he is fearful that he might face trouble from unbelievers in doing so (Rom 15:31; cf. 1 Cor 16:3-4). He will then go to Rome, so that he and the Romans may be mutually encouraged by each others' faith (Rom 1:12). But he also notes that since his mission from Jerusalem to Illyricum is complete (Rom 15:19, 23), he plans to go to Spain to begin a new phase of his mission after he has spent some time in Rome. He hopes that the Roman Christians will become partners in his mission to Spain (Rom 15:24, 28).

2.6. Letters from Prison. Paul is in prison as he writes Philippians* (1:7, 13) Colossians* (4:3, 10, 18) and Philemon* (1). From Philippians 1:27; 2:24 we know that Paul planned a visit to Philippi if or when he was released from prison. As he wrote Philemon he was looking forward to release from prison and hoped to visit Philemon (Philem 22), who probably lived in the neighborhood of Colossae (Col 4:9). However, the place of Paul's imprisonment is debated for all three letters, with Rome, Ephesus and Caesarea all being possibilities. This lack of consensus makes it difficult to use them as evidence here, and in any case we do not know if Paul was released to travel as he had planned.

2.7. The Pastoral Letters. G. D. Fee (3-5), arguing that the Pastorals* are genuinely Pauline and come from a period after Paul's release from prison in Rome (Acts 28), has outlined the most probable order of events portrayed in the Pastoral letters. Paul and Titus evangelized Crete, where Titus remained (Tit 1:5). Paul then traveled with Timothy to Ephesus, where Timothy stayed to combat false teaching (1 Tim 1:3). Meanwhile Paul went on to Macedonia (1 Tim 1:3), where he probably wrote both 1 Timothy and Titus. He planned then to travel to Nicopolis for the winter (Tit 3:12). Paul was probably on his way back to Ephesus (1 Tim 3:14) when he was arrested, perhaps at Troas (2 Tim 4:13-15). At some point he also visited Corinth and Miletus (2 Tim 4:20). When he wrote 2 Timothy he was in Rome, where he expected to die (2 Tim 1:16-17; 2:9; 4:6-8, 16-18).

This outline of events cannot easily be fitted into Paul's ministry as it can be reconstructed from his other letters and Acts, and requires us to assume that Paul undertook further travels after release from Rome, for which we have no other clear evidence. Further, it is noted that if Paul was released from prison in Rome, his plans were to go west, not east, and that Luke would surely have written of such a release. These factors, along with the denial of Pauline authorship of the Pastorals on other grounds, have led to the view that this evidence for Paul's travels should be discounted (see Pastoral Letters). However, with Fee one could maintain that Paul could have changed his plans and gone east. If such an argument is accepted, then the travel information given in the Pastoral letters is reliable, but the evidence obviously postdates

Acts and cannot be integrated with Luke's account.

2.8. Other Travels. On a number of occasions Paul lists some of the hardships he has endured, and often these refer to his experiences while traveling.* For example, in 2 Corinthians 11:25b-27 he says:

> Three times I was shipwrecked; for a night and a day I was adrift at sea; on frequent journeys, in danger from rivers, danger from bandits, danger from my own people, danger from Gentiles, danger in the city, danger in the wilderness, danger at sea, . . . in toil and hardship, through many a sleepless night, hungry and thirsty, often without food, cold and naked. (NRSV; see also 1 Cor 4:11; 2 Cor 6:4-5)

Since many of these experiences are unknown to us, these passages serve to remind us of how many gaps there are in our knowledge of Paul's life.

2.9. Summary. From Paul's occasional letters, which do not cover all of his career, we are able to arrive at the following itinerary (excluding evidence for travel after Paul's Roman imprisonment, since this is debated):

(1) Damascus, Arabia, Damascus, Jerusalem, Syria and Cilicia, Jerusalem, Syrian Antioch

(2) Founding visit to Galatian churches at some point

(3) Philippi, Thessalonica, Athens

(4) Corinth, Ephesus, Corinth, Ephesus, Troas, Macedonia, Corinth, plans to travel to Jerusalem and Rome

3. Apostolic Parousia.

3.1. Definition. Certain passages in Paul's letters have been identified by Funk on the basis of their form and content as literary units concerned with the theme of the "apostolic parousia," that is, the presence of apostolic authority* and power.* In these passages Paul reminds readers of his apostolic authority by making his presence felt through the letter itself, by reference to the visit of an emissary or to Paul's coming visit. The letter and the envoy are anticipatory substitutes for Paul's own personal presence when he cannot travel, but both function as a means of conveying his apostolic presence.

Thus, these apostolic parousia sections remind the readers of Paul's apostolic authority by making his presence felt in these three related ways. The presence of Paul in person was the primary medium by which he made his apostolic authority effective (1 Cor 4:19; Phil 1:24-25), and he would rather have conveyed his information in person than by letter or via an emissary, but these two substitutes were sometimes necessary. An envoy did not have the same power as Paul himself had, as he implied in 1 Corinthians 4:17-20: Timothy would remind them, whereas Paul himself would put their power to the test.

3.2. Form. Funk identified the following passages as concerned with the apostolic parousia: Romans 1:8-15; 15:14-33; 1 Corinthians 4:14-21; 2 Corinthians 12:14—13:13; Galatians 4:12-20; Philippians 2:19-24; 1 Thessalonians 2:17—3:13; Philemon 21-22. Funk (252-53) suggested that the apostolic parousia had five formal units; however, Jervis (113-14) has since proposed that there are in fact only three functional units of the apostolic parousia. These concern:

(1) Paul's writing of the letter* (including the manner in which he is writing) a reference to Paul's apostolic authority to write, and an appeal to fall into line with his teaching.

(2) Paul's dispatch of an emissary, including the credentials of the emissary and what Paul expects the emissary to do.

(3) Paul's visit and its purpose, along with either (a) the announcement of a visit, including Paul's submission to God's will in this matter, or (b) the desire to visit, including his desire and prayer to see his readers, a recognition that he has been hindered from coming and an expression of love* or concern for the readers.

Each of these units or sub-units need not be present in each passage. In fact the visit unit is the only one that occurs in every letter and only 1 Corinthians 4:14-21 contains all three units.

3.3. Significance. Clearly Paul attached great significance to his presence with his congregations and hence to his visits, and this is clear in the content of the apostolic parousia sections and elsewhere. In Galatians 4:20 he writes "How I wish I were present with you now and could exchange my voice [for this letter]." Paul can also speak of his presence in terms of power. In 1 Corinthians 4:19-21 he writes:

> "I will come to you soon, if the Lord wills, and I will find out not the talk of these arrogant people but their power. For the kingdom of God depends not on talk but on power. What would you prefer? Am I to come to you with a stick, or with love in a spirit of gentleness? (NRSV)

In response to the charge that he wrote bold letters but his bodily presence was weak* he replies: "Let such people understand that what we say by letter when absent, we will also do when present" (2 Cor 10:11 NRSV; cf. 2 Cor 13:10). As Funk (265) comments: "Paul's power is bound to the weakness of Christ, it is true, but that power, even in weakness, is capable of making itself felt." Hence he promises to show no leniency when he arrives in Corinth for his third visit (2 Cor 13:1-4).

We see then the significance Paul attached to his actual presence and to the oral word. This is one of the reasons he often prays that he may be able to visit (1 Thess 3:10-11; Rom 1:10; 15:30-32). It is because of his understanding of the significance of his presence that he gathers the items which concern his presence, either in person or via the substitute of a letter or an envoy, into discreet sections in his letters and thus uses the form which has been called the "apostolic parousia."

4. Paul's Motivation for Travel.

As apostle to the Gentiles, Paul traveled to proclaim the gospel. As he writes in 1 Corinthians 9:16: "An obligation is laid on me, and woe to me if I do not preach the gospel." This compulsion led Paul to travel across the ancient world to preach the gospel and establish churches (Rom 10:14-15; 2 Cor 2:14, 10:14-16; Col 1:25-29), often while enduring great hardship (2 Cor 11:23-27). In Romans 15:19-20 we see the vision that motivated Paul's travels. He has preached from Jerusalem to Illyricum and has followed his policy of preaching only where Christ was not already known and so not building on another's foundation. As he writes Romans he wants to continue to fulfill this missionary vision by preaching in the West. Yet Paul also had a more detailed strategy of focusing his work in large cities like Ephesus and Corinth. He seems to have used these as large centers for regional outreach through fellow workers (e.g., Col 1:7; 4:12; see Co-workers).

Yet Paul traveled not only to preach the gospel and establish churches, but also to nurture and encourage his churches that they might be firmly established. Thus Paul often expressed his longing to see a congregation that he may, for example, supply what was lacking in their faith* (1 Thess 3:10; see also 1 Cor 16:5-7; 2 Cor 13:9-10). This accords well with Acts where Paul regularly revisits congregations to strengthen and encourage them (Acts 14:21-23; 15:36, 41; 16:1-5; 18:23; 20:1-2). Paul also traveled extensively because of the need to attend to difficult situations in his congregations, particularly at Corinth (e.g., the "painful visit," 2 Cor 2:1-2). Further, Paul wanted to travel to Rome, a congregation he had not founded, since as apostle to the Gentiles he had a responsibility to strengthen and enrich Gentile believers (Rom 1:11-12; 15:15-16) and to work for their "obedience of faith" (Rom 1:5; 15:18).

Paul traveled extensively in connection with the Collection* to which he devoted much time and energy (1 Cor 16:1-4; 2 Cor 8—9; Rom 15:25-26). For Paul the Collection symbolized the unity of the churches and the validity of the salvation* of the Gentiles. That Paul was willing to risk his life to deliver the Collection (Rom 15:31) indicates the strength of his motivation in this regard.

There was a good deal of flexibility and change in Paul's travel plans, sometimes because of necessity. He notes his plans were hindered by Satan (1 Thess 2:17-18) and that he was unable to travel to Rome when he wanted to because of his service in the East (Rom 1:13; 15:22). It was because of an illness that he stopped to preach the gospel to the Galatians (Gal 4:13-16). Paul also changed his travel plans to Corinth (1 Cor 16:2-4; 2 Cor 1:15-16, 23; 2:1), and this caused difficulty (2 Cor 1:17).

Paul knew that his travel plans were subject to God's will. To the Corinthians he says: "I will come to you soon, if the Lord wills" (1 Cor 4:19; cf. 16:7; Rom 1:10; 15:32). In Acts the Spirit guides Paul in various ways in his travels, and particularly initiates new phases of mission (Acts 11:27-30; 13:1-3; 16:6-10; 18:9-10).

5. Paul's Itinerary in Acts.

5.1. The Sequence of Paul's Travels in Acts.

1. From Jerusalem to Damascus, encounter with the risen Christ, meeting with Ananias, flight from Damascus (Acts 9:1-25)

2. First Jerusalem visit, introduction to the apostles, preaching in Jerusalem (Acts 9:26-29)

3. To Caesarea, Tarsus (Acts 9:30)

4. To Syrian Antioch with Barnabas (Acts 11:25-26)

5. Famine relief visit to Jerusalem, return to Antioch (Acts 11:29-30, 12:25)

6. "First missionary journey": Antioch, Seleucia, Salamis to Paphos on Cyprus, Perga, Pisidian Antioch (actually in Phrygia), Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, Pisidian Antioch, Perga, Attalia, Antioch in Syria (Acts 13:1—14:28)

7. Third Jerusalem visit for the Council; return to Antioch (Acts 15:1-35)

8. "Second missionary journey": Antioch, Syria, Cilicia, Derbe, Lystra, the Phrygic-Galatic territory, opposite Mysia, Troas, Samothrace, Neapolis, Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth (for eighteen months), Cenchreae, Ephesus, Caesarea, Jerusalem (a visit to Jerusalem [Paul's fourth] is certainly implied in Acts 18:22), Antioch (Acts 15:36—18:22)

9. "Third missionary journey": Antioch, the Phrygic-Galatic territory, Ephesus (for three years), Macedonia, Greece, Philippi, Troas, Assos, Mitylene, Samos, Miletus, Cos, Rhodes, Patara, Tyre, Ptolemais, Caesarea (Acts 18:23—21:14)

10. Fifth Jerusalem visit (Acts 21:15—23:30)

11. Antipatris, Caesarea, Sidon, Myra, Fair Havens, Crete, Malta, Syracuse, Rhegium, Puteoli, Rome (Acts 23:31—28:31)

5.2. Issues Arising from the Account in Acts. Acts is often taken to imply that Paul undertook three "journeys" during which he was continually on the move. However, this is a misleading modern deduction. The account in Acts is too complex to be analyzed simply in terms of three journeys, since Paul actually "settles down" for an extended period in Corinth and Ephesus and in some other places (e.g., Philippi) spends only a short time because of opposition. The Acts picture is better thought of as periods of travel and extended periods in which Paul was resident at one place.

Although we cannot go into the debated question of Luke's sources (particularly in the "we-passages"), it is clear that Luke had more information for some of Paul's travels than for others. In addition, Paul made journeys about which Luke probably knew nothing (2 Cor 11:25-27). Luke also makes no mention of Paul's "painful visit" to Corinth during his Ephesian ministry (2 Cor 2:1; 13:2). Luke's intention was not to provide a continuous "life of Paul" but rather to present selected episodes that furthered the purposes of his narrative.

On some occasions we cannot be certain of Paul's exact route (e.g., Acts 13:14; 15:41—16:1; 17:14-15; 19:1). Acts 16:6-10 creates particular difficulties. Having visited Derbe and Lystra, Paul probably had planned to follow the Via Sebaste westward to Ephesus, but was prevented by the Spirit from entering Asia. As a result they travelled through tēn Phrygian kai Galatikēn chōran (Acts 16:6). Taking Phrygian as a noun, the phrase would mean that they passed through two regions, Phrygia and then the Galatian country. The latter would refer to the northern part of the province of Galatia and could include Ancyra, Pessinus and Tavium. On the North Galatian view, Paul conducted a mission in these areas at this time. Alternatively, Phrygian can be an adjective which, along with Galatikēn delimits chōran; two adjectives bound by a common article would denote one entity, the regio Phrygia Galatica. This would then be the Phrygian territory incorporated in the south of the province of Galatia and would include Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe (see Galatians).

Luke tells us that Paul was arrested in Jerusalem and went to Rome for trial. It is debated why Luke ended here; did his source end or did he choose to conclude at this point? To record Paul's vindication and release would have suited Luke's apologetic purpose; that no release is recorded has suggested to some that Paul was martyred in Rome at the end of this imprisonment (the tradition of the early church is that Paul was eventually martyred in Rome, e.g., Acts of Paul 11:1-7; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.25.7-8). The prediction of martyrdom in the farewell speech to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:25, 38) was perhaps intended to indicate what occurred at the end of the two-year period. In 1 Clement 5:6-7 (c. A.D. 95) it is said that Paul reached "the limits of the west," which could mean Spain, although this may simply be an inference from Romans 15:24.

6. Integration of the Letters and Acts.

As T. H. Campbell (80-87) has shown, apart from some omissions (e.g., Acts does not mention Paul's visit to Arabia) there is substantial agreement between Paul's letters and Acts concerning Paul's travels. We turn now to the major issue on which the two sources differ (see Chronology).

6.1. Visits to Jerusalem. In his letters Paul speaks of only three visits to Jerusalem*:

(1) The acquaintance visit three years after his conversion (Gal 1:18-20)

(2) The Conference visit "after fourteen years" (Gal 2:1-10)

(3) The Collection visit (Rom 15:25-33; 1 Cor 16:1-4; 2 Cor 1:16)

Acts, however, portrays five visits to Jerusalem:

(1) The conversion visit (Acts 9:26-30)

(2) The famine visit (Acts 11:27-30)

(3) The Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:1-30)

(4) The hasty visit (Acts 18:22)

(5) The Collection visit (Acts 21:15-17)

There is general agreement that Galatians 1:18-20 is to be identified with Acts 9:26-30, although there are significant differences between the two accounts. The Collection visit planned by Paul in Romans 15:25-33 and the visit in Acts 21:15-17 are clearly identical, although Luke describes this visit without any mention of the Collection (its purpose is mentioned, but only incidentally, in Acts 24:17).

The main difficulty, however, concerns Galatians 2:1-10. Longenecker (lxxii-lxxxiii) gives the most prominent solutions to this question:

(a) Galatians 2:1-10 is the Jerusalem Council visit of Acts 15:1-30, with the famine visit seen by Paul as unimportant and so not mentioned by him (the traditional view until the early twentieth century).

(b) Galatians 2:1-10 is the famine visit of Acts 11:27-30, with the Jerusalem Council visit occurring after Paul wrote Galatians (Gunther, Bruce, Longenecker).

(c) Galatians 2:1-10 is the Jerusalem Council visit of Acts 15:1-30, which Luke has turned into two visits by misunderstanding the parallel nature of two reports about the Council and so fabricating the visit of Acts 11:27-30 (Lake, Haenchen).

(d) Galatians 2:1-10 is the Jerusalem Council visit of Acts 15:1-30, while Acts 11:27-30 is a misplaced report of the Collection visit which was originally connected with the material of Acts 21:15-17 but which Luke has chosen to place earlier (Beare, Funk).

(e) Galatians 2:1-10 is the Jerusalem Council visit of Acts 15:1-30, but the Council actually took place during the visit of Acts 18:22; Acts 11:27-30 is an invention of Luke's (Knox, Jewett, Lüdemann).

Many scholars point out that for Luke Jerusalem had a key role in the expansion of the church. Hence, Luke had specific theological reasons for presenting Paul as making five trips to Jerusalem (Jewett, 67, 92-93), which for many scholars casts doubt on Luke's historicity at these points. It is argued, therefore, that Paul only made the three visits to Jerusalem mentioned in his letters. However, while Luke's theological and redactional activity has clearly shaped the story he tells, we need to ask if he has altered the story to the extent that is sometimes claimed? Or did Luke's theology arise in part, at least, out of the actual circumstances of Paul's career and other features of the story of the early church? We must turn then to a brief consideration of Luke as a historian.

6.2. The Historicity of Acts. Scholars like E. Haenchen and H. Conzelmann have combined interest in Luke as a theologian with rigorous historical skepticism, while in recent years many scholars studying Acts have bracketed off historical questions and focussed solely on literary and theological concerns. However, other scholars have argued that Acts presents a historically reliable picture.

In a study of the earlier parts of Acts, M. Hengel argues that Luke is no less trustworthy than other historians of antiquity. Hengel notes that:

> The radical "redaction-critical" approach so popular today, which sees Luke above all as a freely inventive theologian, mistakes his real purpose, namely that as a Christian "historian" he sets out to report the events of the past that provided the foundation for the faith and its extension. He does not set out primarily to present his own "theology." (Hengel, 67-68)

C. Hemer has shown that many of the background details of Acts receive considerable corroboration from other sources, and he concludes that Luke is much more historically reliable than has often been thought. While accuracy in background details does not necessarily mean that the main plot is accurate, Hemer has shown that where Luke's work can be checked, it shows a concern for accuracy and care. Marshall notes that Hemer's work leads to a significant conclusion:

> [The] common assumption that theological concern necessarily implies an indifference to history and even a readiness to reconstruct history is extremely dubious; the fact of historical precision in areas that can be tested strongly suggests that there are limits to the way in which theological concern can shape narratives which purport to be historical, and that a concern for history and a concern for theology can be mutually compatible rather than irreconcilable. (Marshall 1992, 90)

G. Lüdemann (1989) has attempted to distinguish between tradition and redaction in Acts and then has sought to analyze the traditional material to determine what may be regarded as historical. In arguing for the necessity of studying the history behind Acts, Lüdemann's work represents a decisive break with the work of Haenchen and Conzelmann. Although questions may be asked about Lüdemann's analysis (see Marshall 1992, 87-88), it is significant that he is far more positive about the historical value of Acts than much of recent scholarship.

Marshall (1990, 44-51; 1992, 91-98) has argued that, while Luke has given a limited picture of Paul and of his theology, and has not slavishly followed Paul to the point of using Paul's own terminology, he has not misrepresented Paul in any serious way.

Thus the case that Acts gives a truer historical picture than many have allowed is a strong one. This does not mean that Luke necessarily always got the story exactly right or that he has not given it his own literary and theological shape. Clearly his perspective and purposes were different from Paul's. Further, as Marshall (1992, 89-90) notes, Luke may have received mistaken or partial information that he could not check, or he may have been affected by conscious or unconscious bias which led him to overlook some things or present others from a tendentious angle. But given the work of Hengel, Hemer and others, we should take the likely historicity of Luke's account of Paul's itinerary seriously.

Thus J. Knox (58) is unjustified when he writes: "I would question anything in Acts involving Paul that is not explicitly or by clear implication indicated also in the letters." While Paul's letters must be the primary source for his itinerary, to dismiss Acts in this way is to be unnecessarily skeptical. In attempting to give an outline of Paul's travels we must begin, as we have done, with the evidence of Paul's letters, but then we can carefully assess the Acts evidence and use it in our reconstruction, provided priority is always given to Paul's letters. We return then to the relationship between the Jerusalem visit of Galatians 2 and the Acts account of Paul's visits to Jerusalem.

6.3. Galatians 2:1-10 and the Visits in Acts. We can note that views (a) and (b) (in 6.1 above) accept the historicity of the Acts framework. With views (c) and (d) Acts has less credibility, and with view (e) Acts is seen as unreliable. Apart from the fact that view (b) takes the likely historicity of Acts seriously, a number of points argue strongly in its favor, as Longenecker (lxxvii-lxxxiii) has recently shown.

6.3.1. Galatians 2 and Acts 15. There are strong similarities between these passages. Both concern a meeting at Jerusalem at which the main participants were Paul, Barnabas, Peter and James, and which decided in favor of a Law-free mission to the Gentiles. However, there are some very significant differences. In Galatians 2 Paul is at the center of the meeting; in Acts 15 he is a minor player. In Galatians 2:2 the visit is in response to a revelation; in Acts 15:1-3 it is at the instigation of the church at Antioch. In Galatians 2:2 the meeting is private, small and informal; in Acts 15:6, 12 it is a public Council resulting in an authoritative decision. Are these differences the result of different perspectives and purposes on the part of Luke and Paul, or do the two authors describe different occasions?

We might conclude that the differences are the result of different perspectives if it were not for the fact that there are three factors which question the identification of Galatians 2 and Acts 15. First, if we accept the basic reliability of Acts and identify Galatians 2:1-10 with Acts 15:1-30, we must ask why Paul in Galatians 1—2 has omitted reference to the famine visit of Acts 11:27-30. Given his oath that he is telling the truth (Gal 1:20), such an omission would tend to undermine his argument. To argue that Paul regarded this visit as insignificant and hence not worthy of mention is unconvincing since his opponents would be quick to mention the omission.

Second, again assuming the Acts account is basically reliable, Paul's silence in Galatians about the major decision of the Jerusalem Council argues very strongly against the identification of Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 15:1-30. Luke (at least) clearly saw the decision as applicable to Gentile believers in general (Acts 16:4; 21:25; cf. Acts 15:23). While Paul may have been reluctant to accept and advocate the four prohibitions (Acts 15:20, 29), it is extremely difficult to see why, if he was writing to Galatia after the Jerusalem Council, he would remain completely silent about the Council's favorable decision which would have clinched his case in the Galatian conflict. This omission strongly suggests that Paul wrote Galatians before the Council of Acts 15 and thus that Galatians 2:1-10 is not Paul's account of that Council. The only other alternative is that Luke's account in Acts 15 of a decision in Paul's favor in which Paul was involved is unhistorical.

A final point concerns Paul's inclusion of the account of his clash with Peter and Barnabas in Galatians 2:11-14. In the incident Peter's and Barnabas's actions favor the position of Paul's judaizing opponents in Galatia. Including an account of the incident in a letter written before the Council is understandable; doing so after the Council, and without reference to it, actually undercuts Paul's whole argument, since the incident shows Paul's recognition of a continuing chasm between himself and the Jerusalem apostles. This suggests Paul wrote Galatians on the eve of the Jerusalem Council, and that the visits described in Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 15:1-30 are different. Thus there are significant problems with identifying Galatians 2:1-10 with Acts 15:1-30.

6.3.2. Galatians 2 and Acts 11:27-30. These factors suggest that Galatians 2:1-10 is to be identified with the famine visit of Acts 11:27-30; the following points argue in this direction.

First, the two accounts are clearly written from different perspectives, but there are significant points of contact. Barnabas had been sent to Antioch* because of the conversion of Gentiles there (Acts 11:19-26), so it would have been natural for him to discuss the Gentile mission with the Jerusalem leaders on his return, even if the trip was primarily concerned with the relief of the famine. This sort of discussion accords well with the clearly private nature of the meeting described in Galatians 2:2. The silence of Acts about this does not exclude the possibility that such discussions occurred. Further, the injunction from the Jerusalem leaders, which can be translated as to "continue to remember the poor" (mnēmoneuōmen, Gal 2:10), makes good sense in the context of the famine relief visit of Acts 11:27-30.

Second, the most natural reading of Galatians 1:21 is that between his first two Jerusalem visits Paul was only in Syria and Cilicia. This is in accordance with the Galatians 2:1-10 visit being the famine visit and not the Jerusalem Council visit (cf. 6.3.3 below).

Third, according to Galatians 2:11-14 Barnabas and Peter gave in to the pressure of Jewish Christians from Jerusalem and separated from the Gentile Christians at Antioch. It is very difficult to believe that Barnabas, a pioneer in the Gentile mission, would have done this after the Jerusalem Council, thus undercutting the Council's decision, in which he played a significant part according to Acts, and his own mission work.

Peter's action is also difficult to explain as having taken place shortly after the Council. The incident at Antioch is much easier to understand as taking place at a time before the Council when there were no agreed-upon guidelines about table fellowship between Jewish and Gentile believers. Again this suggests Galatians 2:1-14 occurred before the Jerusalem Council. This view presupposes that Barnabas and Paul renewed their friendship after the incident of Galatians 2:11-14, so that they went together to Jerusalem for the Council (Acts 15:2).

Identifying Galatians 2:1-10 with the famine visit of Acts 11:27-30 does, however, raise some difficulties. One concerns the time spans of three years and fourteen years of Galatians 1:18 and 2:1, which are difficult to fit into the widely accepted chronological framework established by the crucifixion and Paul's Corinthian ministry, which is dated by Gallio's proconsulship (Acts 18:12). To fit them into this time frame involves assuming that the three years and fourteen years are concurrent and not consecutive (i.e., both are to be counted from Paul's conversion). The other main difficulty is that identifying Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 11:27-30 compresses the "second missionary journey," since it needs to occur between the Acts 15 Council (probably in 48-49) and the meeting with Gallio in Corinth in 51 after eighteen months there. Again, this is not impossible, particularly on a South Galatian view, but some argue against this identification on the basis of this compression (see Jewett, 89-93). An earlier date for the crucifixion would help (30 rather than 33), but only if we ignore the probable date of 37 for Paul's escape from Aretas (2 Cor 11:32-33), although this is a date on which we should not rely too heavily (Hemer, 264).

Thus the equation of Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 11:27-30 requires us to make some chronological assumptions, although these are not at all impossible. Given the arguments presented above for identifying Galatians 2:1-10 with Acts 11:27-30, the necessity for making these assumptions does not undermine this view.

6.3.3. Galatians 2 and Acts 15 and 18:22. The other main possibility is that Luke did not have sufficient information to enable him to sequence his material clearly. If this was the case, the true setting for the Council of Acts 15 could be the trip to Jerusalem in Acts 18:22, as proponents of view (e) argue, and the visit of Acts 11 would be a tradition that reflected either the Council or Collection visits. This three-visit hypothesis which Jewett (95-104) has worked out in detail, eases the crowding involved in Paul's travels which results from view (b). However, this view has at least three weaknesses:

First, in Paul's letters Barnabas is not connected with Paul's ministry in Macedonia and Achaia (1 Cor 9:6 is no real exception), yet this view requires Paul and Barnabas to be together after this ministry when they travel to the Jerusalem Conference (Gal 2:1). Galatians 2:1-10 certainly suggests Paul and Barnabas were mission partners up until the time of this meeting.

Second, in Galatians 1:21 Paul says he went to Syria and Cilicia between his first two visits to Jerusalem. However, this view requires that he also undertook an extensive mission in Galatia, Macedonia and Achaia during this period. This goes against the natural reading of the verse and seems to discredit Paul's claim to be truthful (Gal 1:20). Further, since Paul is stressing his remoteness from Jerusalem, it seems likely that if he had gone beyond Cilicia he would have said so since it would have further underlined his independence from Jerusalem.

Third, Knox thought the Collection was an obligation laid on Paul at the Jerusalem Conference. Yet if the Jerusalem leaders obliged Paul to undertake the Collection, Paul's fears about its acceptance (Rom 15:25-32) and its likely rejection (judging from Luke's silence) are hard to explain. It is more probable that the impetus for the Collection came from Paul. This would undermine one of Knox's reasons for arguing that the Conference had to be late in Paul's career. Thus, as Longenecker comments:

> It must be concluded that the Knox reconstruction gives a much less satisfactory account of a series of details found in Paul's own letters than does the traditional framework of Acts. . . . It is, therefore, not simple naiveté that causes us to prefer Luke's framework in Acts to Knox's reconstruction. (Longenecker, lxxvii)

6.3.4. Conclusions. The most likely view, then, is that Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 11:27-30 concern the same visit. This results in the following outline of Jerusalem visits:

1. Galatians 1:18-20: three years after conversion	Acts 9:26-30 (the conversion visit)
2. Galatians 2:1-10: "fourteen years later"	Acts 11:27-30 (the famine visit)
	3. Acts 15:1-30 (the Jerusalem Council)
	4. Acts 18:22 (the hasty visit)
5. Romans 15:25-33; 1 Corinthians 16:1-4; 2 Corinthians 1:16	Acts 21:15-17 (the Collection visit)

We thus suggest that there were two meetings held to discuss the issue of the place of Gentiles, one which was more informal and private (Gal 2:1-10 and Acts 11:27-30) and the other of a more formal nature, probably called to resolve the problem posed by the Antioch incident (Acts 15:1-30). On this view Paul made five visits to Jerusalem but had no reason to mention visits three and four in his occasional letters. If Galatians was written before Acts 15:1-30, then it was before visits 3 and 4 had occurred. When Paul writes about the Collection visit he does not say it was his third visit, and so it could well have been his fifth; Paul certainly says nothing to indicate that there were no other visits (cf. Knox, 35-40).

6.4. Summary. The accompanying chart summarizes the proposed reconstruction of Paul's itinerary, showing how the information in Paul's letters and Acts may be related (adapted from Campbell, 87):

Paul's Itinerary

Letters	Acts
Damascus (Gal 1:17c)	Damascus (Acts 9:1-22)
Arabia (Gal 1:17b)
Damascus (Gal 1:17c; 2 Cor 11:32-33)	Damascus (Acts 9:23-5)
Jerusalem (Visit 1; Gal 1:18)	Jerusalem (Acts 9:26-9)
Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:21)	Caesarea, Tarsus (Acts 9:30)
	Antioch (Acts 11:26a)
Jerusalem (Visit 2; Gal 2:1-10)	Jerusalem (Acts 11:29-30, 12:25)
	Antioch (Acts 13:1-4a)
	Cyprus (Acts 13:4b-12)
Galatia (Gal 4:13)	South Galatia (Acts 13:13—14:25)
Antioch (Gal 2:11-14)	Antioch (Acts 14:26-28)
	Jerusalem (Visit 3; Acts 15:1-29)
	Antioch (Acts 15:30-5)
	Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15:41)
	Derbe, Lystra (Acts 16:1-5)
	Phrygic-Galatic region (Acts 16:6)
	Mysia, Troas (Acts 16:7-10)
Philippi (1 Thess 2:2)	Philippi (Acts 16:11-40)
Thessalonica (1 Thess 2:2; Phil 4:15-16)	Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-9)
	Berea (Acts 17:10-14)
Athens (1 Thess 3:1)	Athens (Acts 17:15-34)
Corinth (2 Cor 1:19; 11:7-9)	Corinth (Acts 18:1-18a; for 18 months)
	Cenchreae (Acts 18:18b)
	Ephesus (Acts 18:19-21)
	Caesarea (Acts 18:22a)
	Jerusalem (Visit 4; Acts 18:22b)
	Antioch (Acts 18:22c)
	Phrygic-Galatic region (Acts 18:23)
Ephesus (1 Cor 16:1-8)	Ephesus (Acts 19:1—20:1; for approximately 3 years)
Corinth (2 Cor 2:1; 13:2)
Return to Ephesus
Troas (2 Cor 2:12)
Macedonia (2 Cor 2:13; 7:5)	Macedonia (Acts 20:1b)
Illyricum (Rom 15:19)?
Corinth (2 Cor 13:1; Rom 15:26)	Greece (Acts 20:2b-3a)
	Philippi (Acts 20:3b-6a)
	Troas (Acts 20:6b-12)
	Miletus (Acts 20:15c-38)
	Caesarea (Acts 21:8-14)
Plans to visit Jerusalem, Rome, Spain (Rom 15:22-27)	Jerusalem (Visit 5; Acts 21:15—23:30)
	Caesarea (Acts 23:33—26:32)
	Rome (Acts 28:14b-31)

See also CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; EPHESUS; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; JERUSALEM; MISSION; PASTORAL LETTERS; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; TRAVEL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Bowers, "Fulfilling the Gospel: The Scope of the Pauline Mission," JETS 30 (1987) 185-98; F. F. Bruce, The Book of the Acts (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); T. H. Campbell, "Paul's 'Missionary Journeys' as Reflected in His Letters," JBL 74 (1955) 80-87; H. Conzelmann, Acts of the Apostles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); B. Corley, ed., Colloquy on New Testament Studies: A Time for Reappraisal and Fresh Approaches (Macon, GA: Mercer University, 1983); G. D. Fee, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988); J. A. Fitzmyer, Paul and His Theology: A Brief Sketch (2d ed.; Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1989); R. W. Funk, "The Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance," in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, ed. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr (Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 249-68; J. J. Gunther, Paul, Messenger and Exile: A Study in the Chronology of His Life and Letters (Valley Forge: Judson, 1972); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); M. Hengel, Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History, ed. C. H. Gempf (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989); L. A. Jervis, The Purpose of Romans: A Comparative Letter Structure Investigation (JSNTSup 55; Sheffield: JSOT, 1991); R. Jewett, A Chronology of Paul's Life (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. Knox, Chapters in a Life of Paul, ed. and intro. D. R. A. Hare (Macon, GA: Mercer University, 1987); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); G. Lüdemann, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); idem, Early Christianity According to the Traditions in Acts (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles (NTG; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); idem, "Luke's View of Paul," SWJT 33 (1990) 41-51; G. Ogg, The Odyssey of Paul (Old Tappan, NY: Revell, 1968); W. M. Ramsay, St Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen (8th ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1905).

P. Trebilco

J

JAMES AND PAUL

Since the Reformation James and Paul have often been viewed as having contradictory theologies, one focusing on works (see Works of the Law) and the other on grace.* An examination of the critical texts shows, however, that in reality the two men used similar terms differently in separate contexts. Modern scholarship generally recognizes this in claiming that James knew only a misunderstood Paulinism.

1. The James-Paul Issue
2. James and Paul on Works
3. James and Paul on Faith
4. James and Paul on Justification
5. Conclusions

1. The James-Paul Issue.

Ever since Luther the watchword of Pauline studies has been "justification* by faith alone, not by works." At the same time one can hardly ignore the fact that James 2:24 states, "You see that a person is declared right [or justified] by [their] deeds [works] and not by faith alone." This apparent conflict with Paul's view of justification is further complicated by the fact that both Paul (Rom 4:3, 9, 22; Gal 3:6) and James (Jas 2:23) refer to Abraham* and cite Genesis 15:6 in support of seemingly opposite views. Does this not support the thesis that one writer knew of the other and was deliberately arguing against him?

There are four ways to answer this question. The first is to deny any knowledge of the one man by the other, the likenesses being coincidental. The problem with this position is that Paul (Gal 1:19; 2:9) and Luke (Acts 15; 21:17-26) each mention at least two contacts between the two men in which these issues at the heart of the gospel* must have been discussed. In Paul's version, three years after his conversion he met James briefly (Gal 1:19), but his first substantive discussion with James took place "fourteen years later" (Gal 2:9). At that point James and his colleagues fully endorsed Paul's version of the gospel, while recognizing that Paul and they had differing spheres and styles of ministry. In Galatians 2:12 Paul makes one further reference to James, but it is unclear from his remarks here whether Peter's actions of withdrawing from table fellowship with Gentiles because of the arrival of "certain people from James" had anything to do with the purpose James himself had in mind in sending them. Hence James's own attitude is not clear. In Luke's version James appears as the leader of the Jerusalem* church and a skilled mediator. In both passages he comes up with a modus vivendi by means of which the stricter Jewish-Christians could live in the same church with Gentile* Christians without compromising the beliefs of either group. How the two versions fit together, and their precise chronology, is one of the issues of NT study on which there is no consensus.

The second answer is to argue that Paul is correcting James or a distortion of James' position. This is a possible solution if one can find a Jewish-Christian context for James's writing. While a few scholars have argued for such a background and even fewer (most notably F. Spitta in 1896) for a purely Jewish background, there is no clear evidence that Jews or Jewish-Christians were discussing faith and works using the types of terminology James is using. Furthermore, many scholars cannot see why James would write as he did if Paul had not written first, for while Judaism does not appear to be concerned with James's issues, in particular that of faith and works, Paul does in fact introduce them into theological discussion using terminology which overlaps that of James. Finally, this answer appears to put the letter of James at an impossibly early date, especially if Paul would have had to have read it before writing Galatians. Thus, while this position remains possible, it is unlikely.

The third answer, then, is that James is directly contradicting Paul, perhaps having read Romans.* This, of course, would mean that the letter of James was written after A.D. 56 and probably far later than A.D. 61 (the year of the death of James), to allow sufficient time for the letter to the Romans to make its way to Jerusalem. (Most scholars who give this answer, whether in the modified form of W. Pratscher or in the original form of the older German commentators, see Acts as a deliberate attempt to harmonize the theologies of Paul and James and so they consider the accounts of the relatively harmonious interaction of the two men in Acts 15 and 21 to be unhistorical.)

The fourth answer is to say that James is responding to a misunderstood Pauline teaching. Two time frames make this answer a possibility. The earliest of these is A.D. 40-50, after Paul began preaching to the Gentiles and before the Jerusalem Council occurred (most scholars who take this position consider Acts 15 to be historical). The other time frame is that period after the teachings contained in Romans, and perhaps Galatians, had circulated widely enough to be distorted (i.e., after A.D. 60) but before the Pauline corpus had reached the author of James (some scholars place this time frame as late as A.D. 96). M. Dibelius, S. S. Laws and M. Hengel all take this latter position.

Of the four answers the first and third are unlikely because, on the one hand, the overlap between James and Paul is too great to make total independence likely. On the other hand, if James had read either Romans or Galatians* he did a colossal job of misunderstanding Paul. Something similar could be said of the second answer; in other words, if Paul had read the written form of James, he misunderstood him. This leaves open the possibility of his having heard an oral distortion of James's teaching. The fourth answer, therefore, appears the most likely.

This conclusion, however, leaves open which version of the fourth answer is the most likely. Either the version that proposes an early date for James or the one that proposes a late date is a possible solution to the relationship between the two leaders. The question about early or late dates must be decided on literary and theological grounds. This conclusion is supported by M. Hengel, who, while certain of the relationship, is vague about what this means for dating the Epistle of James other than that it is "early" (which could mean A.D. 60-66 or A.D. 40-50).

We can clarify our choice of the fourth answer by an examination of how James and Paul use each of the three critical terms of works, faith and justification.

2. James and Paul on Works.

Both James and Paul use the Greek word erga ("works" or "deeds"; see Works of the Law). In James 2:14-26 the author is clearly arguing for a particular kind of works. The two deeds he cites are (1) Abraham's* offering of Isaac and (2) Rahab's hospitality to the spies. In regard to Abraham's act, in Jewish eyes this offering of Isaac was the culmination of a lifetime of obedience to God and charity toward others (Gen 18; Jub. 17:17; 19:8; T. Abr. recension A, 1.17; Tg. Ps.-J. Gen 21:33; 'Abot R. Nat. 7 and 32). The fact that Isaac was not offered was seen as a declaration of Abraham's righteousness.* Rahab's deed was also viewed as an act of charity. Furthermore, charity is the issue which begins the argument (Jas 2:14-17). Thus the works James champions are good deeds (charitable acts, generosity, impartiality, control of the tongue, etc.).

It is true that Paul is clearly against "works," but "works" as a means of becoming righteous before God. Such works he calls "the works of the Law." This phrase is also found in the Dead Sea Scrolls, but is never used by James. The phrase "of the Law" (see Law) is always present, at least in the near context, when Paul speaks negatively of works. What are these works? The principal one is circumcision,* although he also speaks of the observance of (Jewish) holy days and (Jewish) dietary laws (see Food) as concerns of his. In other words, while Paul never mentions generosity and other good deeds in these negative contexts, he is against those cultic acts of the Mosaic Law which set apart a Jew from a Gentile and which could be thought of as necessary acts for one to do to be right with God. This fits the context of the Pauline letters, for the issue he is facing is that some Jewish-Christians are insisting that Gentile believers must become proselytes to Judaism to be saved. Paul denies there is any such need to become Jewish, although there is a need to become godly.

There is, then, no real conflict between James and Paul on the issue of works. Not only does Paul always use a phrase ("works of the Law") James never uses (in fact, it is the lack of reference to the works Paul cites that makes Pratscher and Dibelius reject James as the author of the letter), but in places such as Galatians 5:19-21 Paul can give lists of evil deeds (similar to James' in Jas 3:14-16) and then say "I say to you [now] and I said to you [earlier] that those doing such things will not inherit the kingdom of God." Likewise in places such as Romans 12:9-21 and Galatians 5:22-23; 6:7-10 he affirms good works as James also does. Paul will not separate practical righteousness from eternal salvation.*

3. James and Paul on Faith.

When it comes to faith, James gives a clear definition of what he means by "faith alone": "Do you believe that God is one?" (Jas 2:19). This is not only the basic creed of Judaism, but also the creed that Jews believed Abraham discovered. It is an orthodoxy, but in this case an orthodoxy totally separated from obedience to God (Jas 2:18), an orthodoxy which is shared with demons.* Elsewhere in James a different definition of faith appears. The faith referred to in James 1:6 and James 2:1 is that of personal commitment which includes trust and obedience; in contrast, the faith mentioned in James 2:14-26 is the orthodoxy without action which James sees his opponents claiming.

Turning to Paul, one can discern a definition of faith in Romans 10:9-10: a commitment to the living Lord* Jesus and a confession that "Jesus is Lord" (see Creeds). This is similar to the relational trust type of faith which James refers to in chapter 1. In Galatians 5:6 Paul goes on to state that in Christ the issue is not one of Jewish ritual deeds (circumcision), but of "faith working through love." This faith-love pair is not accidental, for it occurs repeatedly in Paul (e.g., 1 Cor 13:13; 1 Thess 1:3; 3:6). For Paul, then, faith is a commitment to Jesus as Lord which results in a life of love. If the love is lacking (as "the deeds to the flesh" or "unrighteousness" show), then such a person is no heir of God's kingdom (1 Cor 6:9-10; see Kingdom).

Having noted these different emphases, one is not surprised that James and Paul also use the example of Abraham differently. For Paul the critical issue is that Abraham was declared righteous before the rite of circumcision was instituted (Gen 15:6; 17:9-14). Since ritual law is the issue, the fact that Genesis 15 follows after significant acts of obedience by Abraham, such as his leaving home, is not mentioned by Paul, for whom faith is the starting point. For James the critical issue is that the declaration of righteousness in Genesis 22:12 ("now I know that you fear God") shows that the faith referred to in Genesis 15:6 is not mere orthodoxy but a trust leading to actual righteous deeds so that "[his] faith worked together with his deeds and the faith was completed by the deeds" (Jas 2:22). It is important to James that deed precedes God's final declaration; on the other hand, he is not at all concerned about Jewish ritual. In other words, the two men come at the Abraham narrative from different directions, using definitions of faith with different emphases, and as a result argue for complementary rather than contradictory conclusions. Paul stresses that ritual expresses faith, but does not supplement it; yet, as we saw in Galatians 5:19-21, he questions the validity of a "faith" that does not produce good works. James stresses that only a useless type of "faith" does not result in good works; yet, as we noted, he does not comment on the place of Jewish ritual (probably because it was not an issue in his community). Both James and Paul agree on the element of obedience in faith.

Is it possible that James is doing more than this, that he is actually defending Paul by correcting a distortion of the Pauline doctrine of grace which rejected the need for works (or what Paul would call the fruit of the Spirit)? That is certainly a possibility, although, as Reumann (157) argues, it is "speculative." What we know for sure is that James is in contact with what sound like Pauline slogans used by a group which rejects the place of works and thus does not have Paul's balance. How conscious James was of the origin of these slogans and thus how consciously he is trying to rehabilitate Paul within his community can only be guessed at.

4. James and Paul on Justification.

Perhaps the most misunderstood of the three types of terms used in common by James and Paul is the Greek word group including dikaiosynē ("righteousness"), dikaiōsis ("justification") and dikaioō ("declare righteous" or "justify"). The usual meaning of these words in the LXX is a demonstrated righteousness (i.e., one which a person deserves on the basis of their behavior) or a declaration of such righteousness (e.g., Gen 38:26; Ex 23:7; Deut 25:1), a meaning that Paul also knows (e.g., Rom 2:13). It is these traditional meanings that James invariably uses (he never use dikaiōsis, however, which appears in the LXX only in Lev 24:22). Paul, on the other hand, often writes of God's making a sinner righteous (justifying a sinner, Rom 2:24) or of a righteousness obtained by Christ's righteousness being given to the sinner (Rom 5:17) or of the resulting state (justification, Rom 4:25; 5:18; see Justification; Righteousness).

Unfortunately, the Pauline meaning (of which James certainly reveals no understanding) has dominated Protestant thinking since the Reformation and has been read by many translations into James (as the KJV, RSV and NIV all do in Jas 2, where, for example, "justified" in Jas 2:24 would be better translated "declared to be just" to avoid overtones of Paul's usage). This results in an artificial conflict between James and Paul. James, on the one hand, is asking how God knew Abraham was righteous when God made the statement "now I know that you fear God" in Genesis 22:12 and therefore how the reader can know that the faith in Genesis 15:6 was a trust in God (or faith) that actually made Abraham righteous. The answer is, one can know this from Abraham's deeds. And without such deeds any claim of righteousness or of faith is empty. Paul, on the other hand, is pointing out that both Jews and Gentiles are equally short of God's standard of righteous judgment and thus the issue is not how a person can demonstrate that their faith is real faith, but how will God make the unrighteous righteous? The answer is, God does so, not through cultic ritual (circumcision, etc.) but through commitment to (or faith in) Jesus Christ. The two authors use their terms in different ways because they address different issues.

Naturally, it is also because of this that "justification" has a different place in their respective theologies. For Paul the concept is central; for James it is simply one of a number of issues and thus not a central focus of his interest.

5. Conclusions.

It is clear, then, that James and Paul are moving in two different worlds. In James's world Jewish ritual is not an issue (perhaps because all of those in his church are Jews), but ethics* is. His problems are with those who claim to be right with God on the basis of their orthodoxy (i.e., adherence to the proper creed, including that Jesus is Lord), although they were ignoring issues of obedience, especially charity. Abraham and Rahab, in contrast to the demons, demonstrate that saving faith manifests itself in its deeds. Paul, on the other hand, is concerned in Romans and Galatians with the relationship of Jews and Gentiles in the church; that is, his concern is that a Gentile does not have to become a Jew to enter the kingdom. Commitment to Jesus as Lord (including the obedience which flows from this commitment) is all that is necessary for salvation; those ritual deeds which marked out the Jews as a distinct people are unnecessary for Gentiles (although not prohibited for Jews). In the instances where Paul does address the issue of whether a person can enter the kingdom while living in sin, he emphatically denies that this is possible (1 Cor 6:9; Gal 5:19-21), agreeing with James (Jas 2:14, 17, 26).

Paul himself realized that he was at times misunderstood. Some misinterpreted his denial that legal ritual was needed for salvation. They understood him to say that ethical issues were irrelevant to salvation (Rom 3:8; 6:1; 1 Cor 6:12). Paul strongly repudiated these interpretations of his gospel. While we cannot be certain whether James was contending with an orthodoxy-without-deeds rooted in Judaism (such as rabbis would later attack) or a misunderstood Paulinism (such as Paul himself attacked), both being possible backgrounds, the latter is the more likely. What becomes clear is that James is not attacking any actual belief of Paul's, and that Paul could endorse everything James wrote. Nevertheless, Paul used some terms such as works and justify differently than James.

If James is dealing with a misunderstood Paulinism, then it is probable that the sermon preserved in James 2:14-26 comes from a period before James met Paul, for it is likely that once they discussed the gospel together James would have cited Paul's own words against anyone who claimed Paul as an authority for such a twisted doctrine as James is countering. This would certainly have been true had James been trying to rehabilitate Paul and even more likely had James been writing after Paul's letters were being circulated.

It is therefore most unlikely that M. Hengel is correct in seeing "anti-Paulinism" behind most sections of the letter, for (1) most of the letter lacks specific Pauline terms and (2) the sections of the letter were originally separate units (sayings or sermons), and it is unlikely that they were all on the same theme. Hengel's theory, which is possible in one context (Jas 2:14-26), is being used to read that passage's concerns into others. This theory is turned on its head by Reumann, of course, who is more likely correct in arguing that far from being anti-Pauline, James is trying to defend Paul.

The James-Paul issue, then, is partially our misunderstanding of Paul (stemming from the fact that Luther was concerned with the earning of salvation through penance and pious deeds rather than with Jewish ritual, thus reading Luther into Paul) and partially a problem of reading Paul into James. In reality, both James and Paul had similar ideas on the role of good works in the Christian life, but since they ministered in different spheres socially and geographically, they addressed different concerns and used their overlapping terminology differently. Even if James is attacking "Paul" (and this is uncertain), it is a misunderstood and distorted Paul that he is targeting; he may well, in fact, be trying to defend the real Paul. Luke does not appear to be incorrect in Acts when he portrays Paul and James as getting along reasonably well (in spite of Acts 21:17-26).

See also ABRAHAM; FAITH; JERUSALEM; JUSTIFICATION; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) 19-21, 120-134; M. Dibelius, James (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); J. D. G. Dunn, "The New Perspective on Paul," BJRL 65 (1983) 93-122; H. P. Hamann, "Faith and Works: Paul and James," LTJ 9 (1975) 33-41; M. Hengel, "Der Jakobusbrief als antipaulinische Polemik," in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 248-78; J. Jeremias, "Paul and James," ExpT 66 (1954-1955) 368-71; S. S. Laws, A Commentary on the Epistle of James (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1980); J. G. Lodge, "James and Paul at Cross-Purposes? James 2:22," Bib 62 (1981) 195-213; R. P. Martin, James (WBC 48; Waco, TX: Word, 1988) 75-101; D. Moo, "Paul and the Law in the Last Ten Years," SJT 40 (1987) 287-307; W. Pratscher, Der Herrenbruder Jakobus und die Jakobus- tradition (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1987); J. Reumann, "Righteousness" in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982) 148-58; K. R. Snodgrass, "Justification by Grace to the Doers: An Analysis of the Place of Romans 2 in the Theology of Paul," NTS 32 (1986) 72-93; A. E. Travis, "James and Paul: A Comparative Study," SWJT 12 (1969) 57-70; R. B. Ward, "James and Paul: A Critical Review," ResQ 7 (1963) 159-64.

P. H. Davids

JEALOUSY, ZEAL

The bulk of the NT usage of the related ideas "jealousy" and "zeal" (associated with zēlos, "zeal," and zēloō, "strive" or "be jealous") is found in Paul's letters, including several nontechnical instances of "zealot" (zēlōtēs). Zeal represents intense effort and emotional energy focused toward a goal, and the zealot is one who single-mindedly pursues the goal, which frequently involves guarding and vindicating the sanctity of that goal. Jealousy is the relational counterpart to zeal, primarily a focusing of emotion toward a person in the desire for a closer or renewed bond, or an envying of another person. Jealousy is often self-centered and destructive, although God is righteously jealous when his right to total allegiance by his people is infringed. Moreover, Paul regards godly jealousy on the human level as quite possible.

1. Paul's Pre-Christian Zeal
2. Paul's Refocused Zeal
3. Destructive Jealousy and Zeal
4. Godly Jealously and Zeal

1. Paul's Pre-Christian Zeal.

Perhaps Paul's extensive use of the concepts "zeal" and "jealousy" is due to his background and zealous personality. Acts 22:3 tells of the rigorous training he received in Jerusalem under Gamaliel and his youthful zealotry for the Jewish Law* and for God.* In Galatians 1:14 Paul recalls how he gained advanced standing in Judaism at an early age because of his "extremely zealous" (NIV; Gk zēlōtēs) keeping of the traditions of his ancestors (see Jew, Paul the). Paul may have considered his zeal as being in the tradition of Mattathias, whose great zeal for the Law and traditions was said to have followed the prototype of Phineas, the grandson of Aaron (1 Macc 2:26, 54; cf. 1QH 14:13-15; Dupont, 184-85). Phineas exhibited zeal for God when he spontaneously slew the Israelite Zimri and the Midianite woman Cozbi, thereby making atonement for the Israelites and averting the plague that had broken out against Israel in its worship of the Baal of Peor (Num 25:1-15).

S. G. F. Brandon's view that there were ties between Jesus or his followers and the Zealot political movement must be rejected as extreme, and the existence of a Zealot sect prior to A.D. 68 is now widely questioned (see Revolutionary Movements). But there is a more basic and older sense in which the pre-Christian Paul could be considered a "zealot." As a Pharisee (Phil 3:5), a member of the "strictest sect" of Judaism (Acts 26:5 NIV), he was truly a zealot for the Law of Moses (Phil 3:6), protecting and vindicating its sanctity against all violations (Hengel 1991, 63-68).

While Saul of Tarsus was never involved in seeking the political overturning of Roman rule, as the Zealot movement attempted to do (see Hengel 1989, 83-94), his tireless zeal was just as intensely focused. Following the death of Stephen by stoning (Acts 7:55—8:1), Saul "attempted to destroy" the church* through violent persecution (Gal 1:13). As M. Hengel has argued, this "church" may be a reference to the Jewish Christian "Hellenists" (first in Jerusalem and then in Damascus), who in their criticism of Torah and Temple would have been considered by Saul to be accursed lawbreakers (Hengel 1991, 72-84; Kim, 44-50). Speaking from the perspective of his postconversion experience, Paul considered this fanatical persecution to be the epitome of his pre-Christian zeal (Phil 3:6; Hengel 1991, 71-79). Thus he regarded the zeal for God exhibited by many of his fellow Jews as "not according to knowledge" because they were "ignorant of the righteousness* that comes from God" (Rom 10:2-3; cf. Phil 3:6).

2. Paul's Refocused Zeal.

Saul's murderous zeal drove him to pursue Christians as far as Damascus (Acts 9:1-2). But, when he was blinded by a heavenly light on the Damascus Road, there was no escaping the fact that he had been zealously persecuting Jesus,* the Messiah of God, and not just the church (Acts 9:3-5). It took a revelation of God's Son to transform Saul's zeal into that of an equally energetic apostle* of Jesus Christ* (Gal 1:15-17; see Conversion and Call).

As a believer in Christ, who was no longer zealously seeking to establish his righteousness through the Law (Phil 3:9), Paul fervently pursued (Gk diōkō) the heavenly calling of Christ (Phil 3:12, 14). He did so with a tenacity that was every bit the equal of the "zeal" with which he had previously persecuted (Gk diōkō) the church (Phil 3:6; Gal 1:13), only now he lived and worked by the power of Christ's resurrection* (Phil 3:10).

Accordingly, Paul appreciated zealousness for the right purpose (Gal 4:18), and resisted and exposed zeal that was misguided or self-serving (Gal 4:17). Thus Paul urged those who had been redeemed by the grace* of God to be "zealots" (Gk zēlotas) for good works (Tit 2:14).

3. Destructive Jealousy and Zeal.

To pursue a life of zeal is to walk a fine line. One may have proper zeal, directed toward an appropriate object or goal (Gal 4:18); but it may just as easily be directed toward "no good" (Gal 4:17; ou kalōs), rooted in false teaching or aimed at self-promotion (see Judaizers).

Nor does such distorted "zeal" affect only the individual pursuing that course. "Jealousy" is the nuance of zēlos in the negative sense that often overflows into relationships with others. Such zeal gone bad is dangerous to the health of a Christian community (Hahn).

The prime NT example of rampant corporate jealousy was the church at Corinth.* Their jealousy spilled over into quarreling (Gk eris) so bitter that it equalled that of unbelievers (1 Cor 3:3 sarkikoi . . . kata anthrōpon). Paul considered jealousy to be an essential problem behind the factions infecting the Corinthian fellowship (1 Cor 3:4). Even later, after substantial repentance and progress had taken place in Corinth, Paul feared the reemergence of such jealous quarreling with its attendant "outbursts of anger" (2 Cor 12:20) and disputes similar to the party spirit displayed earlier (1 Cor 1:12; 3:4).

This realistic understanding and concern of Paul for the jealous Corinthian congregation should not be mistaken for tolerance or sympathy. The apostle saw such behavior as indicative of prolonged spiritual infancy, of believers acting as if they were still mere unbelieving worldlings (1 Cor 3:1-3). He minces no words in likening the religious factions at Corinth to something non-Christians would do (1 Cor 3:4). Strikingly, in speaking to another aspect of the Corinthians' misguided practice, Paul employs the intensive parazēloō ("to provoke to jealousy") in asking the church with language borrowed from the OT: "Are we trying to arouse the Lord's jealousy?" (1 Cor 10:22 NIV). For all their generally commendable zeal for spiritual gifts, they exhibited little interest in edifying the church (1 Cor 14:12).

These symptoms point to the root cause of jealousy in this hurtful sense, namely a lack of love.* Love, as Paul describes it to the Corinthians, is incapable of jealousy (1 Cor 13:4), anger that is related to jealousy, or anything that is "self seeking" (1 Cor 13:5 NIV). Love builds up the community (1 Cor 8:1), while the negative aspects of jealousy never can do so.

Loving behavior is a choice, but it is also the "fruit"* of the Spirit of God who controls the Christian's life (Gal 5:22; see Holy Spirit). Jealousy is also a choice, prominent among the "works of the flesh" (Gal 5:20), that are in continual conflict with the Spirit that indwells the believer.

Paul forcefully warns his readers that fleshly jealousy, and the anger and dissension it so frequently stirs up (Gal 5:20), is unfit for those who will "inherit the kingdom* of God" (Gal 5:21). The alternative lifestyle he points them to is that of living in the power* of the Spirit (Gal 5:16) and of walking by faith (Gal 5:5). As believers "keep in step with the Spirit" (Gal 5:25 NIV), jealousy and other obvious manifestations of the flesh will not occur.

Elsewhere the apostle relates the avoidance of jealousy and other "lusts" of the flesh* (Rom 13:13, 14) to single-mindedly "putting on" the Lord Jesus Christ and the "armor of light" (Rom 13:12, 14). By this Paul seems to be saying that by consistent faith* in Christ, the power of the Holy Spirit brings forth in the believer's life a behavioral pattern dominated by love (Gal 5:5-6), instead of self-indulgent and destructive jealousy (Gal 5:13, 15, 20).

4. Godly Jealousy and Zeal.

In the second commandment the Lord God is characterized as "a jealous God" (Ex 20:5; cf. Deut 5:9), demanding a covenant relationship of loving fidelity that excludes idolatry of any sort (Ex 20:4, 6). Accordingly, the Corinthians' unwitting participation in the worship of demons* by eating food* sacrificed to idols* (1 Cor 10:20-21) is understood by Paul as "provoking the Lord to jealousy" (10:22).

This righteous jealousy displayed by God also provokes unbelieving Israel* to jealousy. In the Song of Moses the Lord said that his jealousy had been provoked by Israel's idolatry, and he would in turn make them jealous by reaching out to other peoples (Deut 32:21). Paul cites this passage in Romans 10:19 to demonstrate that it is the righteous jealousy of God which continues to use the conversion of Gentiles* to "provoke [them] to jealousy" (parazēloō, Rom 11:11). The apostle's own godly jealousy for Israel is that which makes him earnestly long to provoke his "kinsmen according to the flesh" (Rom 9:3) to accept the same salvation he offered the nations as the apostle to the Gentiles (Rom 11:13, 14).

Paul also spoke tenderly of his "godly jealousy" (2 Cor 11:2 NIV) for the Corinthian church, that their relationship to Christ might be pure. The repentant Corinthians (2 Cor 7:10), out of "godly sorrow" brought forth a zeal (or godly "jealousy"; Gk zēlos) for Paul and others (2 Cor 7:7, 11). Though formerly immature, jealous and riddled with strife (1 Cor 3:1-3), that church is commended by the apostle for becoming a model of generous, enthusiastic zeal (2 Cor 9:2). See also ISRAEL; JEW, PAUL THE; LOVE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots (Manchester: Manchester University, 1967); T. L. Donaldson, "Zealot and Convert: The Origin of Paul's Christ-Torah Antithesis," CBQ 51 (1989) 655-82; J. Dupont, "The Conversion of Paul, and Its Influence on His Understanding of Salvation by Faith," in Apostolic History and the Gospel, ed. W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970) 176-94; E. M. Good, "Jealousy," IDB 2.806-7; H. C. Hahn, "Zeal," NIDNTT 3.1166-68; M. Hengel, The Zealots (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1989); idem, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); W. Popkes, "ζῆλος κτλ," EDNT 2.100-101; D. Rhoads, "Zealots," ABD VI.1044-54; H. N. Snaith, "Jealousy, Zealous," in A Theological Word Book of the Bible, ed. A. Richardson (New York: Macmillan, 1950) 115-16; A. Stumpff, "ζηλόω κτλ," TDNT II.882-88.

A. B. Luter, Jr.

JERUSALEM

The relationship of Paul to the Jerusalem church raises a number of difficult questions. One of these involves how we are to relate the accounts found in the Acts of the Apostles with those in the Pauline letters. When apparent contradictions surface, how are they to be handled? How do we balance the various visits of Paul to Jerusalem mentioned in Acts with those mentioned in Galatians*? What is the relationship between the council meeting mentioned in Acts 15 and the meeting mentioned in Galatians 2? What was at stake in the debate? How was it resolved? And what was the perceived role and status of James,* the Lord's brother?

1. The Centrality of Jerusalem
2. Jerusalem and the Early Years of Paul
3. Paul's Visits to Jerusalem
4. The Jerusalem Church Council
5. Subsequent Visits of Paul to Jerusalem
6. The Collection
7. The Demise of the Jerusalem Church

1. The Centrality of Jerusalem.

1.1. In Judaism. The earliest mention of Jerusalem in the Bible appears to be the reference to "Salem" in Genesis 14:18 (cf. Ps 76:2). Later it is referred to as a Jebusite fortress which was not captured by Joshua (Jos 10:3; 15:63; Judg 1:21). During the reign of David it was captured and made the capital of his kingdom (2 Sam 5:6-10). It also became the religious center of worship by the relocation of the ark of the covenant in the city (2 Sam 6). With the building of the Solomonic Temple the religious worship of Israel was forever centered in Jerusalem.

The destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C. had a monumental effect on both the history and religion of the people of Israel (Lam; Ps 137). After the destruction of the Babylonian Empire, the Persian Cyrus permitted the Jewish exiles to return to Jerusalem (Ez 1—3). Led by Sheshbazzar, Zerubbabel and Haggai, the Temple was rebuilt, and as time progressed Jerusalem was rebuilt as well. It was in the reign of Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.), however, that Jerusalem experienced its greatest time of building. Through him the Temple was rebuilt, so that it surpassed in glory even the Solomonic Temple. Jerusalem also experienced beautification. As a result Pliny the Elder could refer to Jerusalem as "by far the most famous city of the East" (Nat. Hist. 5.15.70), and Josephus spoke of the Temple as "a structure more noteworthy than any other under the sun" (Josephus Ant. 15.11.5 §412).

The place of Jerusalem in the life of Israel can be seen clearly in various Psalms (Ps 24; 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 99; 118; 122; 125—29; 132—35; 146—47). Despite the loss of political independence after 63 B.C., Jerusalem remained for Jews both in Palestine and in the diaspora the center of worship, "the holy city" (Is 52:1). The ruling body of Israel, the high priest and Sanhedrin, were located there; the leading and most influential sect, the Pharisees, resided there. Above all, however, the Temple was in Jerusalem. Sacrifices, pilgrimages, the yearly Temple tax, all focused attention on Jerusalem. Although more Jews lived in Babylon and Egypt than in Judea, Jerusalem was still the holy city. And for the average Jew her most glorious days lay in the future. In the last days all roads would lead to Zion when the Gentile world would acknowledge Yahweh. This thinking was so pervasive that even the future Christian hope could be framed using the metaphor of the "new Jerusalem" (Rev 12:2-7; Heb 12:22).

1.2. In Early Christianity. The centrality of Jerusalem in the life of the early church is apparent from the beginning. It is the place of the resurrection* and the subsequent rise of the disciples' faith* (Mt 28; Mk 16 [but cf. Galilee in Mk 14:28; 16:7]; Lk 24; Jn 20). It is the first home of the apostles and leaders of the church (Acts 15:2; Gal 2:1-2; cf. Rom 15:19, 27), and it is the place from which the new faith would spread (Luke 24:45-53; Acts 1:1-8). Paul reveals a similar understanding in his description of the spread of the gospel through his ministry as being "from Jerusalem to Illyricum" (Rom 15:19). For Paul as well as for Luke (Lk 24:47), the gospel began in Jerusalem.

Within the mother church of early Christianity the apostles served as leaders and guardians of the Jewish-Christian tradition.* How the apostles passed on that tradition is uncertain. The more radical critical theories allow little or no substantial involvement on the part of the apostles in the passing on of the Jesus tradition. This is in no small part due to the miraculous events embedded in much of the tradition. Eyewitnesses cannot be involved in passing on traditions that are replete with miracles if it is assumed a priori that miracles cannot happen. The "Swedish school" of interpretation (e.g., B. Gerhardsson) has sought to explain the handing down of the Jesus traditions in a manner similar to that found in second- and third-century rabbinic Judaism, where the oral traditions of Judaism were passed on by careful and rote memorization (see Jesus, Sayings of). This explanation is not without its weaknesses, but it at least conceives a central role for the apostles in the process.

According to the Lukan prologue (Lk 1:2), the Jesus traditions were passed on by the ministers and eyewitnesses of the word. Preeminent among these were the apostles.* This process began already in the ministry of Jesus, when they went out to preach the message and do the works of Jesus (Mk 6:30). This teaching continued unabated after the resurrection as the apostles proceeded to witness to what they had seen and heard (Acts 1:8, 22; 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 10:39-41; 13:31; 1 Jn 1:1-3; 1 Pet 5:1). In this process the base of operations was Jerusalem where the mother church of the new group was located.

In Jerusalem the church consisted of a multi-lingual community (Acts 6:1-6; 2:5-12). It was mandatory that the Jesus traditions be translated into Greek for the Hellenists, or Greek-speaking believers. Whether some of these traditions were already translated into Greek during Jesus' ministry is uncertain, although possible (Mk 7:24-37; Lk 7:1-10), but this took place within weeks, or at most months, of the resurrection. Thus not only the sayings of Jesus but also the pronouncement stories, the miracle stories and the stories about Jesus which the disciples had shared during the ministry of Jesus were translated into Greek. This was done in a bilingual community by the apostles, who were eyewitnesses and had passed on these traditions on numerous occasions during Jesus' ministry. Such a reconstruction of events fits well the words of Luke in Luke 1:1-4.

The reconstruction given above depends heavily on what the Third Evangelist states in Luke-Acts. Luke, of course, had an apologetic purpose in mind in his presentation of this material, for he sought to demonstrate in his twofold work that Jerusalem had a central place in the divine plan. He begins his Gospel in Jerusalem (Lk 1:5-23) and concludes at the same place (Lk 24:33-53). He begins Acts in Jerusalem as well (Acts 1:3-8) and patterns the spread of the gospel along the lines of the paradigm Jerusalem-Judea-Samaria-ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). The centrality of Jerusalem for Luke is also seen in its being the place of the church's origin (Lk 24; Acts 1) and the place where the Spirit came (Acts 2). The church leaders in Jerusalem are portrayed as the founders and supervisors of the church in Samaria (Acts 8:14-25; cf. also its role with regard to the church in Antioch, Acts 11:22). It is the place where key theological issues are discussed (Acts 10—11), where debates are settled (Acts 15) and from where decrees are promulgated (Acts 15:19-35). Yet all this is certainly not a de novo creation on the part of Luke. This Lukan portrayal is not a pure literary fiction but based on reality. From the available evidence, the fact is that Jerusalem was indeed the center and the mother church of the Christian movement. From his prologue (Lk 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-2) the Evangelist clearly expects his readers to interpret Luke-Acts as a serious historical work.

2. Jerusalem and the Early Years of Paul.

Although Paul does not refer to his place of birth in any of his letters, there is no reason to doubt the Lukan portrayal of his birthplace as Tarsus of Cilicia (Acts 9:11; 21:39; 22:3). The silence of Paul about Palestine in Philippians 3:5, where he seeks to establish his Jewish pedigree, suggests that he was not born in Judea. If he had been born there, he would almost certainly have mentioned it, for this would have helped establish his being "a Hebrew born of Hebrews" (Phil 3:5; see Jew, Paul the).

When did Paul first come to Jerusalem? The answer depends on how one interprets Acts 22:3. Here Luke quotes Paul addressing the crowd in Jerusalem saying, "I am a Jew, born in Tarsus of Cilicia, but brought up in this city, at the feet of Gamaliel educated according to the strict manner of the law of our fathers." The threefold "born . . . brought up . . . educated" is a well-attested literary unit which provides biographical information of the birth to teenage years of a person's life. The first term refers to one's birth; the second to the earliest years of life; and the third to the education one received as a youth. Luke's understanding of this trilogy is revealed in Stephen's speech of Acts 7:20-22, where after Moses is "born," he is "brought up" as a nursing child (Exod 2:6-9) by Pharaoh's daughter and then is educated in the wisdom of Egypt.

According to Acts 22:3 Paul was born in the city of Tarsus, but in the earliest months of his life his family moved to Jerusalem ("in this city"; but cf. Hengel, 34, 38-39) where Paul was then brought up. (Note that in Acts 23:16 Paul's sister lived in Jerusalem and that in Acts 26:4 "in my own nation" is better understood as referring to Judea than Tarsus.) Later he was educated under Gamaliel. (The expression "at the feet of Gamaliel" goes best with the verb "educated.") Galatians 1:22, which speaks of Paul not being personally known to the church in Judea, does not refute Luke's biographical description, because it is a general statement and does not mean that Paul's reputation was not known (as Gal 1:23 reveals) or that not a single person within the Judean church knew him. Paul clearly interpreted what he wrote in Galatians 1:22 in light of what he had said in Galatians 1:18, that although he was known to Peter* and James and the others he met during the fifteen days he spent in Jerusalem on his first visit, he was generally unknown. The thrust of Paul's statement in Galatians 1:22 is that Paul had little contact with the Jerusalem church.

During this period of being educated in Jerusalem, Paul studied at the feet of a leading Pharisaic teacher, Gamaliel (Acts 22:3). Although Paul makes no direct reference to this in his letters, this accords well with several of his statements. Certainly, if he studied under Gamaliel he could boast of being "a Hebrew of Hebrews, with respect to the Law a Pharisee . . . and according to the righteousness which comes from the Law blameless" (Phil 3:5-6). Paul's father, who was himself a Pharisee (Acts 23:6), no doubt intended such an education for his son. Such an education placed Paul in a good position later to acquire letters of authority in order to continue his persecution of the church in Damascus (Acts 9:2; 22:5). The main argument against accepting Luke's description of Paul at this point is the argument from Paul's silence on the matter. It is assumed that, if this were true, Paul would have mentioned his having studied under Gamaliel somewhere in his letters. It is precarious, however, to build an argument on silence, and it must be remembered that the Pauline letters are also silent about Paul's place of birth. Yet there are few scholars who doubt that, as Luke says, it was Tarsus.

3. Paul's Visits to Jerusalem.

In Galatians 1 and 2 Paul speaks of two visits that he made to Jerusalem after his conversion.* The first took place three years (Gal 1:18) after his conversion (Gal 1:15) and the second fourteen years later (Gal 2:1). (It is unclear whether the fourteen years is measured from his conversion or from his previous visit.) On the first visit Paul was befriended by Barnabas* (Acts 9:27), who overcame the fear and suspicion others in the Jerusalem church held toward Paul (Acts 9:26). Whether Barnabas was acquainted with Paul previously is uncertain, but from this relationship developed the missionary team (Acts 11:25—15:41; Gal 2:1-10) and a lasting respect of Paul for Barnabas (1 Cor 9:6; Gal 2:13; Col 4:10). This visit involved a short, private meeting "to inquire of" (or "to get acquainted with," historēsai, Gal 1:18; for the former rendering see Dunn, 110-13, 126-28) Peter, and on that occasion he saw only Peter* and James,* the Lord's brother. (Luke states that Barnabas brought Paul "to the apostles" [Acts 9:27], but this is probably a general expression for the apostolic leadership. It need not be interpreted as conflicting with Paul's statement that he saw only Peter and James, the Lord's brother. Peter and James were in fact the two leading apostles.) During this visit Paul and Peter surely talked about more than just the weather. The verb historeō suggests that Paul went to see Peter in order to gain information. It is quite likely that at this time he received such traditions as he delivered in 1 Corinthians 7:10; 11:23-25; 15:3-7. It may even be that during this visit Paul learned of the resurrection appearances to Peter (1 Cor 15:5) and James (1 Cor 15:7) from these "pillars" (Gal 2:9) themselves. The second visit involved all the apostles and centered on the issues of circumcision* (Gal 2:1-3) and Paul's apostleship (Gal 2:7-10).

Five separate Pauline visits to Jerusalem are recorded in Acts: (1) after his conversion (Acts 9:26-28); (2) a "famine" visit (Acts 11:30; 12:25); (3) a visit involving the issue of circumcision (Acts 15:1, 5) and frequently called the "Jerusalem Council" because it involved the entire church (Acts 15:6, 12, 22); (4) a brief visit after his second missionary journey (Acts 18:22); and his final visit after the third missionary journey, which involved Paul's bringing the collection to the church, his arrest, imprisonment and appeal to Rome (Acts 21:17—25:12).

There are at least eight different ways in which scholars have sought to relate the two sets of accounts:

(1) Galatians 2 = Acts 15

(2) Galatians 2 = Acts 11

(3) Galatians 2 = Acts 11 = Acts 15 (Luke, or his traditions, has misinterpreted what happened in the visit of Galatians 2 and erroneously reported it twice.)

(4) Galatians 2 = Acts 18

(5) Galatians 2 = Acts 15:1-4

(6) Galatians 2 = Acts 11 + Acts 15 (Luke, or his traditions, has misinterpreted what happened in the visit of Galatians 2 and erroneously reported what happened on this occasion as occurring at two separate times.)

(7) Galatians 2 is not reported in Acts

(8) Galatians 2 = Acts 9

Of these views the three that are the most probable are: (1), (2) and (6).

3.1. Galatians 2 = Acts 11:30; 12:25. According to this view we have the following pattern: Galatians 1:18 = Acts 9:26-28; Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 11:30; 12:25; and Acts 15:1-35 is omitted in Galatians, because Paul probably wrote Galatians before this visit took place. According to this view the famine visit of Paul and Barnabas in Acts 11:30; 12:25 is identical with Paul's second visit in Galatians 2. There are several arguments that have been raised in support of this. Most important is the fact that this view does not require Paul's omission in Galatians of a visit to Jerusalem between 1:18 and 2:1-10. Such an omission, which the third view requires (see 3.3 below), would have exposed him to the charge of dishonesty and suppression of facts, and this would have jeopardized his whole argument. This view also avoids the necessity of attributing to Luke an error in his arrangement of the Pauline visits as the next view maintains (see 3.2 below). This view also points out that the apostolic decree of Acts 15:22-29 is not mentioned in Galatians 2:1-10, and this suggests that Luke and Paul are not reporting the same event. In both Acts 11:27-28 and Galatians 2:2 the reason for going to Jerusalem is attributed to a divine revelation. There are furthermore some differences between Acts 15 and Galatians 2, which suggest that these are two different events. According to Galatians 2 Paul and Barnabas met privately with the leaders of the Jerusalem church. Acts 15, however, portrays the meeting as taking place before the whole church. Finally, it is argued that the lapse of Peter reported in Galatians 2:11-14 is far more likely to have occurred prior to the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15 than after it, in other words, Peter's lapse is more easily understood as taking place after the events of Acts 11:30; 12:25 than after Acts 15:1-11.

3.2. Galatians 2 = Acts 11:30; 12:25 + Acts 15. The arguments in favor of this view involve the twofold nature of the account in Galatians 2. During the Galatians 2 visit several major issues were decided. One involved the issue of circumcision. Gentiles* did not need to be circumcised in order to become Christians (Gal 2:1-3). This corresponds well with Acts 15:1, 5, 13-21. Also at that visit it was decided that Gentile Christians should be concerned with the needs of the poor in Jerusalem (Gal 2:10). This corresponds with the relief of the poor referred to in Acts 11:30; 12:25. This view also avoids Paul's having omitted a reference to a visit between Galatians 1:18 and 2:1-10 as the next view maintains (see 3.3 below). On the other hand, this view attributes a serious historical error to Luke.

3.3. Galatians 2 = Acts 15. Some of the arguments in favor of this view include the following:

(1) It must be noted that on a simple reading Acts 15 and Galatians 2 look more alike than do Acts 11:30; 12:25 and Galatians 2. Both Acts 15 and Galatians 2 deal with the question of Gentile Christians' responsibility toward the Law and especially with regard to the issue of circumcision. On the other hand, circumcision is not mentioned at all in Acts 11:30; 12:25.

(2) The geographical delineation (cf. Gal 2:7-8 with Acts 15:12, 22-29), the people (Paul, Barnabas, Peter, James), the occasion (Gal 2:4-5; Acts 15:1), the subject matter (circumcision) and, most important, the result (Gentiles not required to be circumcised) are significant points of correspondence between Galatians 2 and Acts 15.

(3) If Galatians was written at approximately the same time as Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians, it would be strange indeed if, according to the first view (Gal 2 = Acts 11:30; 12:25), Paul would not have mentioned or alluded to the incident of Acts 15. This would have provided considerable support for his argument against his opponents* in Galatians.

(4) In Galatians 4:13 the expression "at first" is best interpreted as referring to two separate visits Paul made to Galatia on two separate journeys. Thus Galatians is better understood as having been written after Acts 15, and, if Galatians 2 = Acts 11:30; 12:25, it is strange that Paul did not mention what happened at the Jerusalem council in his letter.

(5) In Galatians 2:10 when Paul states that he "was eager" to remember the poor, this can only with difficulty be interpreted as referring to something he was already doing, that is, as a pluperfect referring to the "famine" relief visit of Acts 11:30; 12:25. It is most naturally interpreted as referring to something Paul would do in the future, as prospective and not retrospective.

(6) In both accounts Paul and Barnabas give a report of the Gentile mission (Gal 2:7-9; Acts 15:3, 12).

(7) It seems unlikely that on two separate occasions Paul would have met with the Jerusalem church and its leaders to discuss the same issue, whether Gentiles needed to be circumcised, and reach the same conclusion.

Another argument in favor of understanding Galatians 2 as the Pauline version of Acts 15 involves Paul's description of this event. In Paul's description of the incident in Galatians 2, it is clear that he saw himself as the leader. He went up to Jerusalem, and Barnabas went with him (Gal 2:1). Paul (not Barnabas and Paul, and clearly not Barnabas and Saul) also took Titus (Gal 2:1). Paul then set forth before them the gospel he preached (Gal 2:2). The leaders of the Jerusalem church saw that Paul had been entrusted with the gospel to the Gentiles (Gal 2:7) and that God was at work in Paul's ministry to the Gentiles (Gal 2:8). As a result they gave to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship* (Gal 2:9). As for concern for the poor, Paul was eager to do this (Gal 2:10). Clearly Paul in Galatians 2 portrays himself as the chief actor and leader. It is true that he is associated with Barnabas, but in Galatians it is not Barnabas and Saul or Barnabas and Paul. It is clearly Paul and Barnabas!

Yet when we read the account in Acts 11:30; 12:25, the situation is reversed. There Barnabas enlists Saul to work with him (Acts 11:25). The church sends Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem with famine relief (Acts 11:30), and it is Barnabas and Saul who return from Jerusalem (Acts 12:25). The church then sends out Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13:2) on the first missionary journey. The name "Paul" first comes up in Acts 13:9, and only at Acts 13:9 is Paul placed in the forefront of the leadership. The difference in perspective of these two events is major. Luke sees Paul, actually Saul, as the lesser of the team members. Barnabas is the leader. He enlists Saul, not vice versa. In Acts 15, however, Paul is now portrayed by Luke as the leader of the group. It is Paul and Barnabas who debate those advocating circumcision and who are appointed to go to Jerusalem (Acts 15:2), and it is Paul and Barnabas who return to Antioch (Acts 15:22, 35). This portrayal of Pauline leadership fits Galatians 2 better than the portrayal found in Acts 11:30; 12:25.

An additional argument in favor of this view involves Paul's reputation as a missionary. In Acts 11:30; 12:25 his missionary accomplishments still lie in the future. He has yet to go on a missionary journey, and even when he does, the team will be described as "Barnabas and Saul." But in Galatians 2 Paul's fame and success as a missionary is already known and recognized. The Jerusalem pillars acknowledge that what Peter was for the mission to the Jews, Paul was for the mission to the Gentiles (Gal 2:7-8). Yet the Jerusalem pillars could not have recognized this if Galatians 2 = Acts 11:30; 12:25 is correct. There was no basis for recognizing Paul as "the" apostle to the Gentiles. If the church were to recognize anyone in this regard, it would have been Barnabas. The recognition Paul speaks of in Galatians 2:7-9 could not have taken place unless it was being revealed prophetically, but there is no suggestion that this is what took place. On the contrary, the Jerusalem pillars "saw" that God had entrusted this mission to Paul and "recognized" on the basis of what Paul had reported and had already accomplished (Gal 2:2). This could not have occurred during the famine visit of Acts 11:30; 12:25, but it could easily have taken place during the Acts 15 visit after Paul's first missionary journey.

One final argument that can be mentioned involves the chronology* of the early years of Paul. Paul states that three years after his conversion he went for the first time to Jerusalem (Gal 1:18). The next visit took place fourteen years later. Although this could refer to fourteen years after his conversion (or eleven years after the preceding visit), it is more likely that Paul is thinking consecutively: three plus fourteen, or seventeen years after his conversion. The reason for this is that in Galatians 1:18, 21; 2:1 we have a series of three "then(s)" (epeita). In all the other instances in which Paul uses this term, except one (1 Cor 15:6, 7, 23, 46; 1 Thess 4:17; the exception is 1 Cor 12:28), he ties what follows to what has immediately preceded. Here it is best to understand him as doing the same. The first "then" (Gal 1:18) must be interpreted as "then three years after Galatians 1:15 (his conversion)" he went to Jerusalem. The second (Gal 1:21) must be interpreted "then after the event of Galatians 1:18 (having gone to Jerusalem)" he went to Syria and Cilicia. The third (Gal 2:1) should therefore also be interpreted similarly, "then fourteen years after the events of Galatians 1:18 and 21 (which took place at the same time)" he went again to Jerusalem. Since it is more likely that the three plus fourteen years add up to seventeen full years than, by figuring the beginning and ending of the two periods being short fractional years, thirteen or fourteen years, to date the event of Galatians 2 at the time of Acts 11:30; 12:25 is less likely than to date it at the time of Acts 15. Chronological considerations make it difficult to date the famine visit seventeen years after Paul's conversion. The Jerusalem Council, however, is much easier to fit within this time frame (see Chronology).

In light of the above arguments it seems that unless we reject in some radical fashion the Lukan portrayal of the Pauline visits, it is best to see Galatians 1:18 = Acts 9:26-28; Paul not mentioning the famine visit of Acts 11:30; 12:25; and Galatians 2:1-10 = Acts 15:1-35. According to this view, Paul in telling the Galatians of his visits to Jerusalem had as his purpose the demonstration of his independence as an apostle (see Galatians). Thus he told them of his first visit, and that it occurred three years after his conversion. This demonstrated that it was not necessary for him to go to Jerusalem and meet with the apostles. God had ordained him directly to the apostleship of the Gentiles, and as a result he never bothered to go and meet the apostles until three years later. At that time he only met with Peter and James and only for fifteen days. This was certainly not long enough to be trained and commissioned by the Jerusalem apostles, of whom he met only two. The only other visit that had a bearing on his relationship with the Jerusalem apostles took place fourteen years later, when his independent apostleship was acknowledged (Gal 2:6-10) and his view on circumcision was likewise affirmed (Gal 2:1-5; cf. 1 Cor 15:11). Paul has omitted mentioning the famine visit which occurred between these two events, because it was of no consequence to his argument. Only the two visits he records had relevance for demonstrating his apostolic calling.

4. The Jerusalem Church Council.

4.1. The Issues Involved. In Galatians 2:2 Paul states that when he went up to the Jerusalem Council, he went "according to revelation." Although it is uncertain as to how this revelation came to Paul, why Paul mentions this is clear. (It is most unlikely that this refers to Agabus' prophecy in Acts 11:28, because nothing is mentioned in Gal 2 about a famine.) Paul wants the Galatians to know that he was not summoned or compelled by the Jerusalem church to attend the conference. The driving force which caused him to attend the conference was the leading of the Holy Spirit.* As an independent apostle, Paul was subject to the leading and directing of the Spirit, but he was not subject to the Jerusalem church. From a human perspective the cause of his coming to Jerusalem was the teaching of certain Jewish Christians that apart from circumcision Gentile believers could not be saved (Acts 15:1-2). Yet even here it should be noted that it was the church in Antioch, not Jerusalem, which initiated Paul's going to Jerusalem.

It is clear that Paul had a great concern as to the outcome of the Council. He sensed that his own work and the entire Gentile mission could be "in vain" (Gal 2:2) if the outcome went the wrong way. Exactly what Paul meant by this is unclear. Certainly he did not believe that the truthfulness of his message was at stake or that it could be affected by anything the Council decided, for his gospel was not of human origin nor even from a human source (Gal 1:1, 11) but directly from Christ himself (Gal 1:12). If an angel from heaven could not change that gospel, how much less could the Jerusalem Council. Yet if the Council demanded that circumcision be required of Gentiles, this would have hindered greatly the work of evangelism among the Gentiles. This would be true not only for evangelism by the Jerusalem church but for his own efforts as well. He knew that the demand for circumcision was already causing havoc among his converts (Acts 15:1-3; cf. Gal 1:7; Phil 3:2). If this demand had the support of the Jerusalem church, the problem would be multiplied many times.

Another possible danger that Paul feared was the splitting of the church. Paul would, of course, continue to preach the gospel (1 Cor 9:16), but the church would be irreconcilably divided. In fact, since out of Jerusalem there would be coming forth a different gospel, which in fact was no gospel at all (Gal 1:6-7), they might not even be able to be considered a true church. The mother church would itself have become apostate! Finally, Paul no doubt feared that the divine purpose of uniting Jew and Greek and the destruction of the dividing wall through the death of Christ might be thwarted by actions of the Council (Eph 2:11-21). Paul's great concern for the collection (see 6 below) reveals his own great desire to further the oneness of Jew and Greek now created in Christ.

For Paul two key issues were at stake. One involved the question of whether Gentile believers had to be circumcised in order to be justified.* Some recent interpreters have sought to interpret this issue in light of the sociological implications involved (see, e.g., Dunn, 215-41, 242-64; see Social-Scientific Approaches). Thus they portray the issue as one of acceptance into the Jewish community of believers or of becoming full members in the church. For both Paul and Luke, however, the issue was seen primarily from a theological perspective with soteriological implications. (It may well be that Luther, because of his theological orientation, may have understood Paul better than those who approach the apostle with a more sociological orientation.) The issue for Paul involved how one was justified before God* (Gal 2:16; 3:6; Rom 4:9-12), and, in his understanding of the gospel, for a Gentile believer to become circumcised was to fall from saving grace* (Gal 5:2-4). Luke states even more clearly that the issue involved certain Jewish believers, allegedly representing the Jerusalem church, who claimed that unless the Gentile believers submitted to circumcision, they could not be saved (Acts 15:1). For modern commentators to claim that Luke misunderstood the real issue and that we today can better understand what was at stake is highly questionable.

In Galatians 2:1 Paul states that he brought with him to Jerusalem an uncircumcised believer named Titus. Whether this was simply fortuitous or intentional on Paul's part is uncertain. (Most likely it was intentional, for bringing an uncircumcised Gentile believer to the Jerusalem Council would have been provocative, to say the least.) Regardless, Titus served as a highly visual test case of the issue. "Did Titus have to be circumcised in order to be saved?" Although some did demand his circumcision (this appears to be the meaning of Gal 2:3), Paul states that the decision of the Council was that he did not. The Council agreed with Paul that salvation is through faith alone! (Although the grammar of Gal 2:3 permits the following interpretation: "Titus was not compelled to be circumcised, but he voluntarily submitted himself to this," such an interpretation is ruled out by what Paul says in Gal 5:2-4. Furthermore, Paul's whole argument against his opponents in Galatia would have been undermined if it could have been pointed out that Paul had agreed to circumcise Titus.)

For Paul the other issue which was at stake involved his apostleship (see Apostle). Paul certainly did not seek the approval or confirmation of the Jerusalem apostles, for his apostleship had been approved by God (Gal 1:1; Rom 1:5; 1 Cor 9:2). How could they approve his "independence?" Even seeking such approval would defeat his claim to have been called independently as an apostle. What Paul hoped for was that the Jerusalem apostles would recognize that God had indeed called him to be the apostle to the Gentiles.

4.2. The Results of the Council.

4.2.1. Salvation apart from Circumcision. Regardless of how one interprets the Apostolic Decree (see 4.2.3 below), the results of the Jerusalem Council were a clear victory for Paul. The church with one voice recognized that salvation was by grace alone. The Gentiles needed only believe. Those who were troubling them and demanding their circumcision were refuted (Acts 15:14-21; Gal 2:3-5). Yet on what basis was this recognized?

It is difficult for Christians today to appreciate the weight of the argument of those advocating the circumcision of the Gentiles. Two millennia of Christians denying the necessity of this symbol and practice, and the teaching of the NT, which rejects this position, makes the argument of its proponents look very weak. But such was not the case at the time of the Jerusalem Council, for there was no NT canon to which one could refer. The circumcision party probably argued something like this: (1) All of the heroes and leaders of God's people, from the time of Abraham* to the present, had been circumcised. The apostles were all circumcised. Jesus was circumcised! If it was "good enough" for the Son* of God, why should a Gentile complain about following in his steps? (2) Truth is not determined by vote, polls or the desires of Gentiles and their supporters. If this were so, should the church no longer require baptism or repentance if they become unpopular? (3) Jesus never taught that circumcision would no longer be necessary. (4) The covenant which God made with Abraham and by which we are saved (Gal 3:6-9, 29; Rom 4:13-17) has, as an everlasting requirement, circumcision (Gen 17:9-14). According to the Scriptures, the rejection of circumcision cuts one off from this covenant. Thus for Gentiles to enter the saving community they must submit to circumcision.

The weight of the above arguments should not be minimized. Nevertheless the church "recognized" (they did not "decide") that circumcision was no longer required. Luke indicates how this was first recognized in his account of the conversion of Cornelius. In Acts 10:44-48 Peter baptized the uncircumcised Cornelius because Cornelius had received the Spirit (Acts 10:47). Later, when questioned in Jerusalem as to why he shared in table fellowship with this uncircumcised Gentile, Peter explained that the Spirit had come upon Cornelius just as he had come upon them at Pentecost. In light of this fact the church concluded that God was now granting that even Gentiles who repented would receive life (Acts 11:18). At the Jerusalem Council both Peter (Acts 15:7-9) and James (Acts 15:14) recalled this incident, but Luke's readers understood that these brief references involved the entire account of the coming of the Spirit upon Cornelius as recorded in Acts 10—11. Paul also at the Council recalled how God bore witness to the salvation* of the Gentile believers by "signs and wonders" (Acts 15:12). For Luke signs and wonders are understood as a means by which God witnessed to Jesus being the Christ (Acts 2:22), the truthfulness of the gospel (Acts 4:30; 5:12; 14:3) and Stephen being God's spokesperson (Acts 6:8). One of those "signs and wonders" was the coming of the Spirit upon the Gentiles. It should be noted that Paul argues similarly in Galatians 3:2. Since the Galatians received the Spirit by faith while they were uncircumcised, God had accepted them apart from circumcision.

The fact that the Spirit has come upon the believing Gentiles reveals to the church that God has accepted them. Since the Spirit is the seal and first fruits* of divine salvation (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:13-14; 4:30), the church can only conclude that those who have received the Spirit have been accepted by God into the eschatological community as they are, apart from circumcision. The possession of the Spirit is the infallible witness to salvation (cf. Acts 19:2). Apart from the Spirit one stands outside of Christ (Rom 8:9), but possession of the Spirit indicates that believers have life (Rom 8:10-11) and are children of God (Gal 4:6). Thus the decision of the Jerusalem Council was simple and clear. It was not dependent on pragmatic or missiological considerations but on what God had done (Acts 15:12, 14). God had revealed that he had accepted the Gentiles apart from circumcision on the basis of faith alone. There was thus nothing to vote on or decide. They could only recognize what God had done and was doing. In the new covenant God accepts all who repent and believe in Jesus, whether Jew or Greek (Acts 15:14-21). Thus Paul's message was vindicated, and the circumcision party was refuted. The church had one gospel* (cf. 1 Cor 15:11). Both Jew and Greek are justified by faith alone (Acts 15:11). As to the question of whether Jews needed to be circumcised, such a question was a matter for Jewish Christians and was irrelevant to the pressing issue of the hour.

4.2.2. Recognition of Paul's Apostleship. For Paul the Jerusalem Council was also a vindication of his apostolic office. Although Luke does not refer to this in Acts, Paul points out that this took place at a private meeting between him and the leaders of the church (Gal 2:9). This meeting should not be interpreted as contradicting the larger church meeting described in Acts 15:6, 12, 22 but as supplementing it. (What church denominational gathering does not include private meetings involving officials and leaders of the denomination?) At that meeting Paul's message was not only acknowledged (Gal 2:2-6), but his divine calling and apostolic office were likewise recognized. (The giving of the right hand referred to in Gal 2:9 represents the sealing of the contractual agreement described in this and the next verse.)

This recognition went further than simply acknowledging that Paul was a legitimate apostle. That he was qualified to be an apostle was evident. He had seen the risen Lord* (1 Cor 9:1). This was why he included himself in the list of apostolic resurrection appearances in 1 Corinthians 15:5-8. Yet it was a unique kind of apostleship which he had been given. The "grace given to him" (Gal 2:9) involved more than simply apostleship. This expression is also used by Paul in 1 Corinthians 3:10 and Romans 15:15-16 to describe his unique apostleship, and the term "grace"* is used in the same way in Romans 1:5; 12:3; and 1 Corinthians 15:10. At the Council Paul was recognized as "the" apostle to the Gentiles, and his role among the Gentiles was compared and equated to Peter's role among the Jews.

Paul's own understanding of this role can be seen in his letters. He wrote to the church in Rome because the apostleship which he possessed extended to all the Gentiles, and this included the Romans (Rom 1:5-6). Even though he had not founded the church in Rome and even though he did not seek to build upon the foundation of another (Rom 15:20), he had often sought to come to Rome,* because due to his being "the" apostle to the Gentiles, the Roman church lay within his apostolic jurisdiction (Rom 1:13-15). This responsibility caused him to exhort, admonish and rebuke even the Roman church (Rom 15:15-16). This recognition of Paul's apostleship over the Gentiles by the leaders of the Jerusalem church is best understood as due to their reflection on his mission work recorded in Acts 13:1—14:28 rather than that of Acts 9:20—12:25.

The demarcation of the sphere of Paul's apostleship is described as the "Gentiles" (Gal 2:7-9). It is unclear whether this should be understood geographically (the Gentile world versus Palestine) or ethnically (the Gentiles versus Jews). That Luke understood Paul's call geographically is clear, for Paul's strategy in Acts is to use the synagogues in the cities of the Gentile world as his mission base. It is also apparent that in his churches there were both Gentile (Rom 1:5, 14; 11:13-16, 25-31; Gal 5:2; Eph 2:11-22) and Jewish believers (Rom 2:17—3:20; cf. Rom 16:3 with Acts 18:2). Paul's submission to the discipline of the synagogue (2 Cor 11:24) is inexplicable if his mission avoided contact with Jews, and such passages as 1 Corinthians 9:20 and 1 Thessalonians 2:16 assume Paul's ministry among Jews. It is also unlikely that the Jerusalem church did not minister to Gentiles in Jerusalem and Palestine. Thus, whereas Paul's apostleship should not be interpreted exclusively as geographic or ethnic, the demarcation of missionary spheres both for the Jerusalem church and Paul are probably best understood as being primarily geographic in nature. The purpose of designating these areas was more to focus the various responsibilities of Paul and the Jerusalem church than to impose limitations.

4.2.3. The Apostolic Decree. Luke records in his version of the Apostolic Council that a decree was sent out to the Gentile churches which summarized the conclusions of the Council (Acts 15:19-21, 23-29). The decree recognized that circumcision was not required of the Gentiles (Act 15:19, 24-28). On this issue the freedom of the gospel Paul preached to the Gentiles was vindicated (Gal 2:2). Yet there appear to be certain restrictions placed upon the Gentiles by the decree (Acts 15:20, 29; cf. Acts 21:25). The area in which this decree was to be promulgated was Antioch, Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15:23), that is, not so much the "Pauline" churches but the churches in the area in which the circumcision party caused the most trouble (Acts 15:1, 30).

These restrictions are best understood as based on Noachian laws: minimal laws which Jews believed were enjoined by the Scriptures on all people, reaching back to the period prior to Abraham (Gen 9:1-7).

There were seven of them: the prohibition of idolatry,* blasphemy, bloodshed, sexual immorality, theft, eating from a living animal (i.e., eating the blood of an animal) and, on the positive side, the need to establish a legal system of justice. In Acts the non-controversial Noachian laws (blasphemy, murder, robbery, establishment of justice) are omitted. The first three mentioned in Acts refer to food restrictions: things devoted to idols, or food dedicated to idols (cf. Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25 with 1 Cor 8:1-13; 10:14-33), and meat which was non-kosher, that is, meat obtained from animals killed by strangling and from which the blood was not properly drained (Lev 7:26-27; 17:10-14). The fourth requirement was ethical in nature and dealt with sexual immorality. This may refer to either sexual immorality in general or more probably to marriage relationships forbidden in Scripture, for example, marriage between close relatives (Lev 18:6-18). (In Codex Bezae the third requirement, "things strangled," is omitted, and there has been an attempt by the scribe to interpret the regulations as being purely ethical: idolatry-murder-fornication. These restrictions must be understood as ritualistic, however, for if not, then Acts 15:28 would seem to imply that refraining from idolatry, murder and fornication would be the only moral laws that Gentile Christians would have to keep! This variant reading cannot be accepted, for the great weight of textual evidence includes the third requirement.)

Many scholars see these requirements as compromising the Pauline teaching of justification* by faith* alone and have denied that Paul could ever have accepted such a decree. Furthermore it is argued that the requirements of the decree contradict Galatians 2:6, where Paul states that the Jerusalem leaders "added nothing to his message." As a result some scholars deny the historicity of the Jerusalem decree altogether; some argue that the decree took place at a later time (at least after the writing of Galatians); and a great many scholars argue that Paul would never have accepted such a decree for it conflicts with his teachings and practice (1 Cor 8:1-13; 10:25-33). Paul saw all such things as lawful (1 Cor 6:12; 10:23). To have accepted the decree would have compromised his gospel. It would have placed the Gentiles under the Law.*

It must be admitted that if the Jerusalem decree taught that salvation for the Gentiles demanded that they keep certain food restrictions, then Paul in principle lost at the Jerusalem Council. Salvation is either free and through faith alone or it is not free. It cannot be "mostly" free. Yet it is questionable whether the Jerusalem decree should be interpreted in this manner. Luke explains the cause for the establishment of the decree as being due to the fact that "Moses has been preached for generations in every city and has been read each Sabbath in the synagogues" (Acts 15:21). The issue at stake, according to Luke, is not justification but rather social intercourse between Jews and Gentiles. The decree does not add a requirement for Gentiles who are seeking salvation. Rather they are directions given by the Spirit (Acts 15:28) which seek to promote sensitivity on the part of Gentile Christians with respect to issues that were especially offensive to Jews.

If we observe Paul's own practice concerning the scruples of "weaker" brethren, it is quite clear that he always accommodated his personal liberty (see Freedom) and practice in order not to offend the sensitive among his congregations. On several occasions a similar problem arose in his churches. At times it involved eating food* dedicated to idols (1 Cor 8:1-13; 10:23-33); at times it involved those who objected to eating meat (Rom 14:1-15). In such instances, whereas Paul agreed with those advocating freedom, he always surrendered his own freedom in order not to offend the "weak" (see Strong and Weak), and he urged those who had a similar understanding of the freedom of the gospel to do the same. For Paul circumcision was an irrelevant issue in itself, for it only involved the presence or absence of a piece of skin unless one argued that the removal of this piece of skin was a requirement for salvation. Thus when a theological issue was at stake, he refused to have Titus circumcised (Gal 2:1-3); but in the case of Timothy, when it did not involve a theological issue but permitted greater freedom in ministering among the Jews, he was willing to have him circumcised (Acts 16:1-3).

To understand Paul's view of freedom, we must recognize that he was so free that, unless a theological issue was at stake, he could willingly surrender his freedom in order to facilitate the spread of the gospel. This is seen most clearly in 1 Corinthians 9:19-23. Although free, Paul voluntarily became a slave to the weaknesses of others. Among the Jews he lived as under the Law that he might win his fellow Jews (1 Cor 9:20). The Paul of 1 Corinthians 8—10 would have had no problem urging Gentile believers that they should keep the decree when they were in the presence of Jews, for truly free persons are only free when they can surrender their freedom out of love for the weak. For Paul this could even involve taking a Jewish vow, if it helped in his ministry among the Jews (Acts 18:18; 21:26).

5. Subsequent Visits of Paul to Jerusalem.

Paul's view of Jerusalem as the mother church of early Christianity is evidenced by his frequent visits to that city. Three such visits have already been discussed: Galatians 1:18/Acts 9:26-28; Acts 11:30/12:25, which Paul does not mention; and Galatians 2:1-10/Acts 15:1-30. Luke records two subsequent occasions on which Paul again visited Jerusalem.

The first is mentioned only briefly and indirectly. Paul at the end of the second missionary journey left Ephesus and arrived at Caesarea. From there he "went up and greeted the church" (Acts 18:22). There is debate as to which church Paul greeted—the church in Caesarea or Jerusalem. The grammar permits either interpretation. Yet the expression "went up" is frequently used by Luke for going to Jerusalem (Lk 2:4, 42; 18:31; 19:28; Acts 11:2; 15:2; 21:12, 15; 24:11; 15:1, 9), so that for Luke this must refer to Jerusalem. This would also fit well the Lukan portrayal of Paul returning to Jerusalem after each missionary journey. This interpretation receives additional support from an indirect comment found in Acts 18:18. There Luke records that Paul took a vow and cut his hair. If, as seems likely, this was a Nazirite vow (Num 6:1-21; Acts 23:21-26), its fulfillment would have required Paul's offering a sacrifice in the temple in Jerusalem. Other than the implied completion of this vow, Luke gives no additional information as to the nature of this visit.

Paul's final visit to Jerusalem took place after the third missionary journey (Acts 19:21; 20:22; 21:25-26). The expressed purpose of this visit was to bring the collection from the Gentile churches to the church in Jerusalem (see 6 below). Luke alludes indirectly to this in Paul's speech before Felix (Acts 24:17). In the process of fulfilling a vow similar to that of his previous visit (cf. Acts 18:18 and 21:23-26) Paul is involved in a riot, rescued and arrested by the Roman troop which guarded the Temple and was stationed in the Fortress of Antonia (Acts 21:31—22:29). Paul's subsequent defense before the Sanhedrin also results in a riotous division of the Pharisaic and Sadducaic members of that body (Acts 22:30—23:10).

Due to a plot on Paul's life, the tribune sent him to Caesarea under heavy guard. Such concern was afforded him due to his being a Roman citizen* (Acts 22:24-29). For over two years Paul remained under arrest during the governorship of Felix and Festus (Acts 24:27; 24:1—26:32). Finally, having appealed to Caesar, he was sent to Rome to await trial before the emperor* himself (Acts 27:1—28:30; Phil 1:12-14).

6. The Collection.

In his three longest letters Paul mentions a collection being made by the Gentile churches for the church in Jerusalem (1 Cor 16:1-4; 2 Cor 8:1—9:15; Rom 15:25-32; see Collection for the Saints). This is probably Paul's response to the request of the Jerusalem church for the Gentiles churches to "remember the poor" (Gal 2:10; see Rich and Poor). (Although it is doubful that "the poor" was a technical term for the Jerusalem church, it is clear that the collection was to be given to it.) Its importance for Paul is evidenced not only by the amount of space he devotes to this in his letters but also by several other factors. For one, the collection took a great deal of time (at least several years—2 Cor 9:2) and effort on his part to assemble. During the period of the collection, he had an experience in which he despaired of life itself (2 Cor 1:8), but the collection had to continue. The effort required an offering which was to be collected weekly (1 Cor 16:2), and representatives were to be chosen who would supervise the taking of the collection all the way to Jerusalem (1 Cor 16:3). The offering itself took over a year to complete (2 Cor 8:10) and involved churches in at least three major provinces, Macedonia and Achaia (Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 9:2), and Galatia (1 Cor 16:1; cf. Acts 20:4), and perhaps even Asia (cf. Acts 20:4). Paul furthermore needed to send Titus and another helper to assist in the collection (2 Cor 8:16-24), and it required that Paul postpone his planned mission to Spain (Rom 15:28). Luke mentions seven people who accompanied the offering, and Acts 20:16 suggests that a sufficiently high percentage of the passengers on the ship were accompanying Paul and the collection that the apostle could influence the itinerary. Even plots (Acts 20:3), danger (Acts 20:23) and warnings (Acts 21:4, 10-14) could not dissuade him from carrying out this mission. As for the reception of the collection by the Jerusalem church, this was also a major concern for Paul and weighed heavily on his mind (Rom 15:31).

Paul did not understand the collection as a requirement levied upon the Gentile churches by the Jerusalem Council. Galatians 2:10 was understood as a request rather than a "tax." This is clear from the terminology he uses to describe the collection. It is a "contribution" (1 Cor 16:1); a "generous gift" (2 Cor 9:5); "material blessings" (Rom 15:27); "fruit" (Rom 15:28); "aid" (Rom 15:31; 2 Cor 8:4; 9:1); and a "gracious work" on the part of the Gentile churches (2 Cor 8:6).

The collection served a number of purposes for Paul. It was at the very least an act of love* which met a real need in the Jerusalem church. Whatever the value of the communal sharing of the earliest days (Acts 4:32—5:11), the benefit described in Acts 4:34 was only temporary. The concern of the Hellenists that their widows share in the distribution of goods (Acts 6:1) suggests that only limited resources were available to the church. The famine of Acts 11:28-30 might also have had lasting consequences for the economic health of the church community. The collection was therefore a loving act of kindness in tune with the teachings of Jesus (Mt 5:42; 6:2; 25:31-46; Mk 10:21; Lk 6:34-38; 12:33; etc.) and that of the early church (Rom 12:8, 13; Jas 2:14-17). In this way the collection would also serve as a proof of the Gentiles' faith by demonstrating their love for other Christians (1 Thess 4:9; Rom 12:10; Jn 13:35).

Another reason Paul felt so strongly concerning the collection was that it provided an opportunity to reinforce the bonds of unity between Jews and Gentiles within the church. This was especially important in light of the division caused by his opponents (Gal 2:11-13; 1 Cor 3; Acts 15:1). This unity was, for Paul, not based simply on a voluntary decision or spiritual inclination on the part of Jewish and Gentile Christians. It was based rather on the corporate nature of their being "in Christ."* The collection would help demonstrate that the body of Christ was one. Neither Jew nor Greek could say of the other "I have no need of you" (1 Cor 12:14-26).

If the Gentiles had come to share in the benefits of the gospel (Rom 15:27) and had been ingrafted into the people of God (Rom 11:17-24; Eph 2:11-22), this, Paul argued, was due to Jewish believers (such as Paul, Barnabas and Peter) and the spiritual heritage of the mother church in Jerusalem. What they had "received" (1 Cor 11:23-26; 15:3-8) came from the Lord via the Jerusalem church. Now they could return the favor and minister to the mother church by means of their material blessings through this collection. (Paul may be arguing here similarly to how he argues in 1 Cor 9. Just as a minister has the right to live off the gospel he preaches, so the mother church [personified as a "minister"] has a right on this occasion to share in the material blessings of the Gentile churches to which it has given birth.) This unity would be further strengthened by the fact that the offering would be brought by numerous representatives from the Gentile churches (1 Cor 16:3; Acts 20:4-5) who both safeguarded the collection and would symbolize the oneness of the church when they delivered this offering to the church in Jerusalem.

A third reason why the collection was important for Paul involved the eschatological significance of this event. Paul understood the collection as symbolizing in some way the eschatological ingathering of the Gentiles into the people of God. It is quite unlikely that he thought that the collection would be the means by which the Jews would become jealous and turn in faith to God, that is, he did not think that it would be the event that would bring about the fulfillment of Romans 11:13-27 (see Israel). Yet this collection would symbolize the "first fruits"* of the offering of the Gentiles to God (Rom 15:16). The collection was itself an offering to God (2 Cor 9:12), but in a deeper sense it symbolized that now the Gentile world was coming in faith to God. Salvation had come to the uttermost parts of the earth (Acts 13:47). The collection revealed in an undeniable way that the Gentiles who had not pursued righteousness* had now attained it (Rom 9:30).

7. The Demise of the Jerusalem Church.

Although a great deal of information is available concerning the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the events leading up to its destruction, not much is known with certainty regarding the Jerusalem church during the decade leading up to this nor in the subsequent decades.

7.1. The Death of James. From Acts 12:17; 15:13-21; 21:18; Galatians 2:9 (note the order); and James 1:1, it is apparent that James, the brother of Jesus, was the leader of the Jerusalem church in the decade of the fifties. There is no reason to doubt that he remained its leader until his death in A.D. 62. The two major traditions concerning James' death come from Josephus and Hegesippus. Josephus (Ant. 20.9.1 §§199-203) states that after the death of Festus and before the arrival of Albinus, the new procurator, the high priest Ananus convened the Sanhedrin to try "James, the brother of Jesus who was called the Christ." James was condemned and stoned. Ananus was subsequently deposed from the high priesthood for this illegal act (cf. Jn 18:31). There is no major reason for rejecting Josephus's portrayal of this event, for unlike the passage on Jesus in Antiquities 18.3.3 §§63-64, this does not appear to be a Christian interpolation. Josephus would also have been in a position to know, in that he was a contemporary of this event.

A somewhat different description of the death of James is given in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History 2.23.3-18 by Hegesippus, a second-century church father. According to Hegesippus, James, called the "Just," was killed by being thrown down from the Temple, stoned and clubbed. No trial before the Sanhedrin is mentioned. In both accounts, however, James is portrayed as being martyred by being stoned in Jerusalem by hostile Jews (see James).

7.2. The Flight to Pella and the Fall of Jerusalem. According to the Pella tradition, the Jerusalem church was able to flee the city and escape its terrible fate.

Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.5.3-4) states that shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem the church was warned by an oracle to flee to the city of Pella in Perea. It is impossible to prove or disprove this tradition. (Epiphanius refers to this same tradition on three occasions [Haer. 29.7,7; 30.2,7; Weights 15], but it is quite possible that he is indebted to Eusebius for this information.) The Gospels, however, contain numerous warnings which, if heeded, would have resulted in Christians fleeing Jerusalem before the arrival of Vespasian and the Roman legions (Mk 13:13-23; Lk 21:20-24; Mt 24:15-25).

7.3. The Loss of Influence of the Jerusalem Church. The return of Christians to Jerusalem after the destruction of the city in A.D. 70 is witnessed to by ossuaries and tombs, and by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 4.5), who lists a succession of Jewish bishops from the time of the death of James to the second revolt in A.D. 132-35. Yet the city would never again be the mother church of Christianity. The prohibition of Hadrian barring Jews from living in Jerusalem after the second revolt no doubt hindered Jewish Christians from returning, and the bishops Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 5.12) lists after the second revolt all carry non-Jewish names. The bishopric of Jerusalem remained important, but its power was limited and more nostalgic than real. The center of influence in the church had switched to such major cities as: Caesarea, Ephesus, Antioch, Alexandria, Rome and later Constantinople.

See also CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; CIRCUMCISION; COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; JAMES AND PAUL; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; TEMPLE; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); D. R. Catchpole, "Paul, James, and the Apostolic Decree," NTS 23 (1977) 428-44; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville: Westminster, 1990); F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity: The Acts of the Apostles (5 vols.; New York: Macmillan, 1920-33; repr. Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979); G. Fohrer and E. Lohse, "Σιών κτλ," TDNT VII.292-338; W. W. Gasque, A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); D. Georgi, Remembering the Poor (Nashville: Abingdon, 1992); B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity (Uppsala and Lund: Gleerup, 1961); L. Goppelt, Apostolic and Post-Apostolic Times (New York: Harper, 1970); M. Hengel, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1991); R. Jewett, A Chronology of Paul's Life (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); W. L. Knox, St Paul and the Church of Jerusalem (Cambridge: University Press, 1925); G. Luedemann, Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Richmond: John Knox, 1959); K. F. Nickle, The Collection (SBT 48; Naperville: Allenson, 1966); J. D. Purvis, Jerusalem, The Holy City: A Bibliography (Metuchen: Scarecrow, 1989 and 1991); W. Schmithals, Paul and James (SBT 46; Naperville: Allenson, 1965); J. H. Schütz, Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority (Cambridge: University Press, 1975); M. Simon, "The Apostolic Decree and its Setting in the Ancient Church," BJRL 52 (1969) 437-60; R. H. Stein, "The Relationship of Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 15:1-35: Two Neglected Arguments," JETS 17 (1974) 239-42; W. C. van Unnik, Tarsus or Jerusalem: The City of Paul's Youth (London: Epworth, 1962); F. Watson, Paul, Judaism, and the Gentiles (Cambridge: University Press, 1986); S. G. Wilson, The Gentiles and the Gentile Mission in Luke-Acts (Cambridge: University Press, 1973); N. T. Wright, "Jerusalem in the New Testament," in Jerusalem: Past and Present in the Purposes of God, ed. P. W. L. Walker (Cambridge: Tyndale House, 1992) 53-77.

R. H. Stein

JERUSALEM APOSTLES. See JERUSALEM; JUDAIZERS; OPPONENTS OF PAUL.

JERUSALEM COUNCIL. See CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; JERUSALEM.

JESUS, SAYINGS OF

When one moves from the Gospels to the Pauline letters one is immediately struck by the virtual absence of quotations of sayings of Jesus. While Paul makes Jesus Christ* and his work of salvation* the center of his preaching, he hardly ever quotes actual sayings of this Jesus or refers to his deeds, except to his death* and resurrection.* In his paraenesis, or teaching,* he gives instructions similar to those of Jesus, and yet he seldom cites the latter. There may be some allusions to or echoes of Jesus' sayings in the Pauline letters, but they are very allusive, a phenomenon which raises the question of a proper criterion for correctly discerning them. In any case, these allusions and echoes do not seem to be numerous. This state of affairs is puzzling when contrasted with the often observed continuity in theology and attitude between Jesus and Paul. This paucity and allusive character of Paul's references to sayings of Jesus has led some critics to conclude that Paul did not know much of Jesus tradition or that he was not at all interested in the tradition or in the historical Jesus. So our topic constitutes a central element in the "Jesus-Paul debate" (see Jesus and Paul)

1. Certain or Probable References
2. Possible Echoes
3. Continuity/Similarity in Theology and Attitude
4. Theological Loci and Sayings of Jesus
5. Narrative Tradition
6. Paucity and Allusive Character of References
7. Summary and Conclusion

1. Certain or Probable References.

There are six explicit references to "words of the Lord" in Paul's letters: 1 Corinthians 7:10-11; 9:14; 11:23-25; 14:37; 2 Corinthians 12:9; 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17. Among them 2 Corinthians 12:9 obviously refers to the word of the risen Lord, and the "command of the Lord" in 1 Corinthians 14:37 is probably a "prophetic" teaching of Paul who has "the mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2:16). The "minimalists" who allow a minimum number of references, allusions or echoes of the sayings of Jesus in Paul deny a reference to the historical Jesus in 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17, understanding the phrase "in the word of the Lord" exclusively in terms of the OT idiom which the prophets used in order to indicate in whose commission and authority they spoke. They discount also 1 Corinthians 11:23-25, arguing that Paul received and transmitted it as a liturgical tradition. So, for the "minimalists" like F. Neirynck and N. Walter, there are only two explicit references to sayings of Jesus in Paul.

1.1. 1 Corinthians 7:10-11. In 1 Corinthians 7:10-11, Paul cites the "command" of the Lord, emphasizing that it is the Lord's and not his own. It is fairly clear that it is a reformulation of Jesus' teaching on divorce preserved in Mark 10:9-12 (par. Mt 19:6, 9); Matthew 5:32 (par. Lk 16:18; see Marriage and Divorce). The parenthetical remark in 1 Corinthians 7:11a is often thought to be Paul's "free" modification of Jesus' teaching. But it is more a faithful representation of Jesus' teaching in Mark 10:11 (cf. Mt 19:9) than a "free modification" of it. As D. Wenham has shown, there are two indications that Paul knew Jesus' teaching on divorce in its Synoptic context: (1) In Matthew 19 (par. Mk 10) Jesus bases his teaching on the "one flesh" principle drawn from Genesis 2:24, and precisely this principle is used by Paul in the passage immediately preceding his teaching on marriage and divorce (1 Cor 6:12-20), for his teaching that a Christian, being a member of the body of Christ, cannot join himself to a prostitute; (2) In Matthew 19 Jesus' teaching on divorce is followed by his sayings about those who are eunuchs for the kingdom of God (Mt 19:10-12). These latter sayings are often seen to be echoed in 1 Corinthians 7:7, 32-35 in Paul's teaching on celibacy as a special gift from God* for more effective service of the Lord. Thus it seems that Paul knew not just an isolated saying of Jesus on divorce but rather his teaching on marriage as a whole, including its "one flesh" principle and its relationship to the service of the kingdom of God.

1.2. 1 Corinthians 9:14. In 1 Corinthians 9:14 Paul also cites a "command" of the Lord, in this case "for those who preach the gospel to get their living from the gospel." Again, this is a faithful representation of Jesus' saying in Luke 10:7 (par. Mt 10:10), though not a verbatim quotation of it. D. L. Dungan has shown that just as in 1 Corinthians 7 Paul reflects his knowledge both of Jesus' divorce saying and of its interpretation in the tradition behind the Synoptics, so also in 1 Corinthians 9 he reflects his knowledge both of Jesus' missionary charge itself and its interpretation in the Q tradition. However, Paul's practice of forgoing the apostolic right tends to be viewed by some critics as if it reflected his freedom from Jesus' command or evidencing his disregard for Jesus' sayings in general. But surely Jesus' "command" in this case was intended as a "permission" from the beginning, so that Paul's failure to avail himself of it is hardly a "disobedience" to it (Bruce, 107-8). In fact, Jesus' intention in the "command" was probably so that the apostles might concentrate on preaching the gospel without having to divert themselves to securing their living. In that case Paul's refusal to avail himself of the privilege "in order not to burden" any of his churches, but to preach the gospel more effectively, causing no worldly misunderstanding (1 Thess 2:9-10; 1 Cor 9) is paradoxically a real obedience to his Lord Jesus.

1.3. 1 Corinthians 11:23-25. The fact that 1 Corinthians 11:23-25 is a liturgical tradition does not necessarily mean that Paul is unconscious of his transmitting actual sayings of Jesus, or that it is no indication of Paul's interest in the sayings of Jesus. On the contrary, the concrete reference to "the night" and the use of the word paradidosthai ("to be delivered up"), which is so characteristic of Jesus' passion announcements (Mk 9:31 par.; Mk 10:33 par.; Mk 14:18 par.; Mt 26:21; Jn 13:21; Mk 14:21 par.) and so prominent in the Synoptic passion narratives, could hardly have failed to make Paul conscious of the historical reality of the event of the Last Supper and of the words spoken by the man who was to be delivered up and crucified. If nothing else, then, at least the word "Do this in remembrance of me" (1 Cor 11:25) must have reminded Paul of the importance of remembering those sayings of Jesus as well as his acts (see Lord's Supper).

1.4. 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17. Concerning 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17, the OT prophetic idiom of "in the word of the Lord" is now widely recognized. It has been noted that there is a substantial similarity between 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17 and 1 Corinthians 15:51-52, and that in the latter Paul speaks of a "mystery,"* a revelation by the risen Lord. However, there is also a wide recognition of an echo here of Jesus' eschatological saying in Matthew 24:30-31 and parallels. In addition D. Wenham sees here several echoes of the parable of virgins (Mt 25:1-13, e.g.: "with him/the Lord" in 1 Thess 4:14, 17 and the "shout of command"/the "voice of archangel" in 1 Thess 4:16 are matched by "with him" in Mt 25:10 and the "cry" in Mt 25:6 respectively, and the phrase eis apantēsin, "to meet," appears both in 1 Thess 4:17 and Mt 25:6). Recently R. H. Gundry has argued that in 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17 Paul is drawing on Jesus' saying (whose original form may have been: "The one who has died will rise, and the one who is alive will never die") embedded in John 11:25-26 and that, prompted by the pre-Johannine tradition of the raising of Lazarus (cf. Jn 12:13-18) and intending to console the grief-stricken Thessalonians more effectively, Paul portrays the future coming of the Lord and the believers' meeting him in terms of the imperial visit (parousia) and the citizens' going out to meet the approaching emperor (apantēsis) in the Hellenistic world (see Eschatology). In view of the undeniable echoes of various sayings of Jesus here, P. Stuhlmacher thinks that Paul is presenting his own prophetic reapplication of Synoptic tradition. However, in arguing that it is uncertain whether Paul is conscious of applying Jesus-tradition, N. Walter suggests that 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17 should be regarded merely as containing Christian insights (Walter, 66). But the several and clear echoes of Jesus' sayings in the passage seem to suggest that Paul must be conscious of the material he is using as Jesus material and therefore that with "the word of the Lord" here Paul is referring to the word(s) of the historical Jesus he is using (cf. Wenham; Gundry; Holtz), rather than a prophetic oracle spoken in the name of the Lord.

1.5. 1 Thessalonians 5:1-7. The formulation "You yourselves know accurately" (autoi . . . akribōs oidate) in 1 Thessalonians 5:2 may also be an indication that allusions to Jesus' sayings are to be found in 1 Thessalonians 5:1-7. It is widely recognized that verses 2 and 4 echo Jesus' parable of the thief (Mt 24:43 par. Lk 12:39), especially as the metaphor of thief is not applied in an eschatological context in the OT and Jewish literature. Then, as Wenham has shown, there is a close parallelism in vocabulary, structure and meaning between 1 Thessalonians 5:3 and Luke 21:34-35:

1 Thessalonians 5:3:	"come upon them suddenly as birth-pangs . . . escape" (aiphnidios autois ephistatai . . . hōsper hē ōdin . . . ekphygōsin)
Luke 21:34-36:	"come upon you suddenly as snare . . . escape (epistē eph' hymas aiphnidios. . . hōs pagis . . . ekphygein)

(Pagis ["snare"] and ōdin ["birthpangs"] may be translation variants of an original ḥbl/ḥbl', caused by different pointings of the word or, as Wenham argues, the original pagis may have been replaced by Paul with ōdin under the influence of Is 13:6-7 and Jer 6:14-21.) Paul's exhortation in the 1 Thessalonians passage to be awake and sober, not asleep nor drunk, represents the general tenor of Matthew 24:42-51 (par. Lk 12:41-46) and Luke 21:34-36 (par. Mk 13:33-37).

In view of these clear echoes of Jesus' eschatological sayings, how are we to understand the introductory formula "you yourselves know accurately"? With that unusual introductory formula Paul cannot possibly refer so simply to anything that was taught by anybody other than himself and his coworkers,* even if there had been such a thing within the short interval between his founding the church at Thessalonica and his writing of 1 Thessalonians. Nor can he refer to what was simply his own teaching based on the OT-Jewish tradition. For what the Thessalonians are supposed to "know accurately" in 1 Thessalonians 5:2-10 has already been shown, in part, according to the criteria of dissimilarity and coherence, to contain clear echoes of Jesus' sayings. Nor can he refer to his teaching which was based simply on a common Christian tradition, without any consciousness of the teachings of Jesus himself. Some of the parallels between our passage and the dominical sayings recorded in the Gospels seem too striking for that to be correct. It also is hard to believe that Paul was unaware that the Christian tradition was based on Jesus' own teachings, especially in view of the presence of Silvanus, who surely bore tradition from Jerusalem and was with Paul both at the time of founding the church and of writing 1 Thessalonians.

It may be helpful to compare our passage with 1 Thessalonians 4:2 ("For you know what instructions we gave you through the Lord Jesus"). Here the phrase "through the Lord Jesus" (dia kyriou Iēsou) may in itself refer to the origin or inspiration of the instructions. What the Thessalonians are supposed to "know accurately" (1 Thess 5:2) is probably part of the "instructions" Paul gave them dia kyriou Iēsou. In giving them that instruction dia kyriou Iēsou, was Paul conscious only of being inspired by the Lord Jesus, or was he conscious also of it originating from the actual teaching of the Lord Jesus recorded in the tradition? The clear echoes of Jesus' sayings in 1 Thessalonians 5:2-7 suggest the latter as the more likely case. Paul must have given at least this part of the instruction on the basis of the actual sayings of Jesus, even if he interpreted and adapted them as one standing under the inspiration of the Lord.

The conclusion seems unavoidable: with the introductory formula "you yourselves know accurately." Paul is trying to remind the Thessalonians of the teaching that he delivered to them at the time of founding their church (cf. 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6) on the basis of Jesus' eschatological sayings.

This further strengthens our previous conclusion with regard to the formula "in the word of the Lord" (1 Thess 4:15). For by way of an analogy it points to the following conclusion: just as Paul based the instruction now recalled in 1 Thessalonians 5:2-7 ("through the Lord Jesus") on Jesus' teaching, recognized by its many echoes of that teaching, so also in giving a new instruction in 1 Thessalonians 4:13-18 on the fate of the Christian dead "in the word of the Lord," he bases it on Jesus' teaching so that it too contains many echoes of that teaching.

So the formulas, "in the word of the Lord" and "you yourselves know accurately," which follow each other so closely in the wake of Paul's reminder of his previous instructions "through the Lord Jesus" (1 Thess 4:2), both indicate that in 1 Thessalonians 4:15—5:7 Paul is alluding to the eschatological teachings of Jesus.

1.6. Romans 14:14. There is a general consensus that Romans 14:14a ("I know and am convinced by the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean in itself") is an allusion to a saying of Jesus recorded in Mark 7:15 (par. Mt 15:11) and that Romans 14:20 ("all [foods] are clean") corresponds to the editorial remark of Mark ("he declared all foods clean," Mk 7:19). Between Romans 14:14a and Mk 7:15 there is not only an exact material correspondence, but also a verbal agreement: ouden koinon/ouden . . . koinōsai. For this reason some think that with the phrase "by the Lord Jesus" Paul refers to the historical Jesus and seeks to indicate that he is alluding to Jesus' teaching. However, others think that in Romans 14:14a, 20 Paul is giving a general Christian maxim or an insight from his gospel (cf. 1 Cor 6:13; 8:8a), and that the phrase "by the Lord Jesus" is not necessarily a reference to the historical Jesus (cf. Phil 2:19).

This negative judgment is supported by the recent argument of H. Räisänen that Paul's failure to refer to the logion of Mark 7:15 in his controversy with Peter* at Antioch* (Gal 2:11-21) and Luke's failure to refer to it in Acts 10—11; 15:7-9 indicate that Mark 7:15 is inauthentic. But this argument has justly been rejected by H. Merkel and M. Thompson (see below). Furthermore, Thompson appropriately asks how it is possible for Paul simply to declare "Nothing is unclean in itself" and "All [foods] are clean" to an unknown church containing a number of Jewish Christians, to whom he is concerned to show that he is upholding the Law* (Rom 3:13; 7:12) and whose support he is soliciting for his mission to Spain. Unless he knows that a teaching like Mark 7:15 has already been delivered to the church he is treading on dangerous ground. Given the apparent dispute between the "strong"* and the "weak" in the Roman church, it would hardly do for Paul to utter a mere declaration without any accompanying theological justification of what would be taken as simply a corollary of his (disputed) gospel or an opinion ("maxim") of a certain party. So with the phrase "by the Lord Jesus" in Romans 14:14a Paul seems to be alluding to a saying of Jesus (Mk 7:15 par.) in the hope that the Romans would recognize its authority.

1.7. Romans 12:14-21 and 1 Corinthians 4:11-13. There is broad agreement that in Romans 12:14-21 and 1 Corinthians 4:11-13 there are a number of clear echoes of the sayings of Jesus. Even N. Walter, a "minimalist," grants this and notes particularly the following sets of correspondences:

Romans 12:14	Luke 6:28a (Mt 5:44b v.l)
Romans 12:17a (1 Thess 5:15a)	Luke 6:29 par. Matthew 5:39b-41
Romans 12:18	Mark 9:50 par. Matthew 5:9
Romans 12:19-21	Luke 6:27a + 35 par. Matthew 5:44a
1 Corinthians 4:11a	Luke 6:21a par. Matthew 5:6; 10:9-10; 11:19
1 Corinthians 4:12b-13	Luke 6:22-23 par. Matthew 5:11-12; Luke 6:27-28 (Mt 5:44)

Of course, there are some who doubt one or another of these sets. But there is virtual consensus that Romans 12:14 echoes Matthew 5:44 (par. Lk 6:27-28). J. Piper's conclusion on the basis of the criterion of dissimilarity is entirely convincing: "There need be no doubt that Jesus commanded 'Love your enemies,' . . . we found nothing so explicit and unequivocal in our survey of Jesus' environment; nor is it thinkable that the early church should invent the saying and thus impose upon themselves such a troublesome requirement" (Piper, 56). So Thompson considers Romans 12:14 to be "a virtually certain echo" or "possibly even an allusion" to a teaching of Jesus. Related to this observation is the often observed fact that the series of Paul's exhortations in Romans 12:14-21 is matched by a series of Jesus' sayings that appear in the central section of Luke's Sermon on the Plain (Allison) or Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (Wenham). This provides a strong argument for the view that the Pauline exhortations as a whole are echoes of those sayings of Jesus and therefore that the similar autobiographical remarks in 1 Corinthians 4:11-13 also are echoes of them (Walter; Thompson).

Granting all these points, however, N. Walter thinks that the question might be left open as to "whether Paul, in using these sayings, did so in the consciousness that these were sayings of Jesus" (Walter, 56). He maintains there is no indication that Paul considered them as sayings of Jesus but, of course, neither can he give any evidence that Paul did not so regard them. Some have seen the imperative eulogeite ("bless," Rom 12:14) in a section where Paul otherwise gives his exhortations mostly using participles, infinitives or adjectives in verbless clauses, as evidence of Paul's using Jesus' saying without adapting it to the grammatical style of the context. Having represented a saying of Jesus by "bless (eulogeite) those who persecute (you)" (cf. Mt 5:44), Paul may be adding "bless (eulogeite) and do not curse (them)," repeating the word eulogeite because the use of eulogeite in Romans 12:14a "has instantly recalled a more familiar logion" recorded in Luke 6:28. If so, the repetition of eulogeite may be an indicator that here Paul deliberately alludes to a saying of Jesus (Thompson). However, whether or not Paul was conscious of the echoes of Jesus' sayings will have to be decided after examining all those passages and considering a number of other factors.

1.8. Romans 13:8-10 and Galatians 5:14. The majority of scholars see also in Romans 13:8-10 and Galatians 5:14 echoes of Jesus' sayings, especially that of Mark 12:28-34 and parallels. Thompson observes them well, and in the following we give a summary of his observations (with our supplement starting with point 5).

(1) Paul's linking of love* and "debt" in Romans 13:8a may reflect Jesus' teaching represented, for example, in his parables of the unforgiving servant (Mt 18:23-35) and of the debtor (Lk 7:36-50) as well as his sayings like Luke 6:36; Matthew 6:12 etc. (cf. Rom 15:1-3; Col 3:13): the recipient of love from God owes a debt of love to others.

(2) The article to introducing "love one another" in Romans 13:8a indicates it to be "the well-known command" that the readers are expected to recognize immediately. In view of John 13:34-35; 25:12-13, 17 and 1 John 3:11; 2 John 5; 1 Peter 1:22, it is probable that they are expected to recognize it as a dominical command.

(3) The expression "fulfilling [plēroō] the Law" in Romans 13:8b (also Rom 13:10b) and in Galatians 5:14 (especially with its eschatological nuance), while being rare in Jewish literature, is paralleled by Matthew 5:17 (see Law).

(4) Paul's exhortation "Bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ" in Galatians 6:2 (cf. also 1 Cor 9:21) should be taken with Galatians 5:14: "For the whole law is fulfilled in one word, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself' " (Lev 19:18; see Law of Christ).

(5) In a very similar formulation to Galatians 5:14, Romans 13:9 also cites Leviticus 19:18 as the epitome of the whole Law. This corresponds to Jesus' answer to the question about the greatest commandment (Mk 12:28-34 par. Mt 22:34-40 and Lk 10:25-28). Scholars have debated the authenticity of the Synoptic logion. Was there a similar practice of summing up the Law in first-century Judaism? If so, the principle of dissimilarity (i.e., that sayings of Jesus that are dissimilar to his environment are more likely to be authentic) would reduce its claim to authenticity. But even if scholars are correct in noting the presence of such summaries of the Law in Judaism, the fundamental difference between the Jewish practice on the one hand and the Pauline and the Synoptic summaries on the other is to be noted. The Jewish practice aims at stating the Law that is logically prior and therefore includes by implication all the rest, in order to facilitate learning and keeping all the stipulations of the law. The Pauline and Synoptic summaries seek to stress "that love is what really matters, more so than legal scruples" (Thompson). Further, the combination of Deuteronomy 6:5 and Leviticus 19:18, as in Mark 12:28-34 and parallels, has no analogy in Judaism (Neirynck). So the summary of the Law in terms of love for God (Deut 6:5) and love for the neighbor (Lev 19:18) must be accepted as an authentic teaching of Jesus. If so, in view of the material connection between Galatians 5:14 and 6:2 as observed above (4), the striking formulation "the law of Christ" in Galatians 6:2 should be seen not as merely including a reference to Galatians 5:14, but as concretely designating the summary of the Law in Galatians 5:14 as the teaching of (Jesus) Christ on the Law or as the Law given by (Jesus) Christ. If this is so, as in Galatians 5:14; 6:2, so also in Romans 13:8-10 Paul is clearly alluding to Jesus' teaching on the Law.

An objection has been raised against this conclusion from the fact that while Jesus summarized the Law in two commandments, Paul does it in only one. Here Thompson answers well: in Romans 13:8-10 (and also Gal 5:14) Paul refers only to the second commandment because in the context(s) he is concerned with giving his readers ethical exhortations for proper behavior toward one another, rather than giving an instruction in Jesus tradition. Romans 12:17 shows how Paul is capable of using only half of a tradition: citing Proverbs 3:4 ("Take care to do what is noble in the sight of the Lord and people"), he leaves out the reference to the Lord because it does not suit his immediate purpose. Furthermore, he has already stated in the opening verses the believers' duty to love God (Rom 12:1-2) as the foundation for the whole paraenetical section of Roman 12—15. In fact it is quite probable that Romans 12:1-2 echoes the first part of Jesus' double summary of the Law.

1.9. Romans 13:7. The conclusion that Romans 13:8-10 alludes to Jesus' saying in Mark 12:28-34 (and pars.) strengthens the view that Romans 13:7 echoes the saying of Jesus in Mark 12:17 (and pars.). Those who hold this view derive support not only from the material correspondence between the Pauline injunction and the dominical saying, but also from the fact that the dominical sayings that are echoed in Paul's successive exhortations of Romans 13:7 and 13:8-10 also stand closely connected and in the same order in the conflict stories of Mark 12:13-17, 28-31 and Matthew 22:15-22, 34-40. Those who reject this view, however, point to the uncertainty as to whether the two Synoptic narratives stood together in the pre-Markan collection of conflict stories, and also to the difficulty of the generalizing phrases "Pay (apodote) all of them (pasin) what you owe. . . . Let not any debt to anyone (mēdeni) remain unpaid" (Rom 13:7a and 8a). They also point to the absence of anything in Romans 13:7 that corresponds to the second part of Jesus' double saying ("Render unto God the things that are God's"), which is the real point of the whole saying. There is, however, discussion as to whether the phrase in Romans 13:7, "(render) fear to whom fear is due" (tō ton phobon ton phobon), refers to that second part of the Jesus logion (Cranfield). It is uncertain. However, Paul's omission of the second part of Jesus' double saying here can be understood exactly the same way as that in Romans 13:8-10: having already stated in the principial declaration of Romans 12:1-2 the duty of rendering unto God what is God's (our whole being), he omits repetition of that in Romans 13, as it does not suit his immediate purpose of instructing his readers about their proper attitude to the civil authorities. (While in Jesus' original saying the second part is stressed, by omitting it in the context of Romans 13 Paul undoubtedly makes the first part prominent. This is probably conditioned by the situation of the Roman Christians or that of the church as a whole at that critical period in its history.) Once this is recognized, the generalizing phrases in Romans 13:7-8 pose no problem. They just indicate that here Paul is applying a generalized form of Jesus' teaching ("Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's") to different authorities. Even if Mark 12:13-17 and parallels, and Mark 12:28-34 and its parallels did not stand together in the pre-Markan collection of conflict stories, their present connection in Mark and Matthew, corresponding to the connection of Paul's two exhortations in Romans 13:7 and 8-10, is significant. So it is highly likely that Romans 13:7 is an echo of Jesus' saying found in Mark 12:17 and parallels (see Civil Authority).

1.10. Romans 8:15 and Galatians 4:6. The abba address for God* to which Paul refers twice (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6) is universally recognized as originating in Jesus' teaching. But we should note also the unique formulas: "the Spirit* of his Son*" (Gal 4:6) and "the Spirit of adoption*" (Rom 8:15). Is Paul not referring to the Holy Spirit with these formulas as the Spirit who indwelt Jesus, attesting (making?) him as the Son of God and so enabling him to use this unique form of address for God? If so, when Paul says that this Spirit sent by God into our hearts cries "Abba Father!" (Gal 4:6), he may have in mind the fact that Jesus taught his disciples to use that same unique form of address. The Spirit of Jesus the Son of God indwells the hearts of those who by faith* and baptism* unite with the Son of God, Jesus Christ, and who participate in his divine sonship. It is this indwelling Spirit that enables them to use the same form of address for God as Jesus the Son of God used. Thus Romans 8:15 and Galatians 4:6 seem to show Paul's awareness of the full significance of Jesus' abba address (see Adoption, Sonship).

Further, some commentators wonder whether with "Abba Father!" Paul may not actually be referring to the Lord's Prayer which opens with "Pater!" ('abbā', Lk 11:2). But the context of Romans 8:12-27 seems to remind us rather of Jesus' prayer at Gethsemane (Mk 14:32-42 pars.; cf. Thompson). Paul introduces the cry "Abba!" in the context of describing the reality of Christians' participation in Christ's suffering* in order for them to participate in his glory.* Furthermore, the "groanings" of Christians and the idea of the Spirit's helping them make the right prayer according to God's will are reminiscent respectively of Jesus' anxiety and sorrow, and of his prayer at Gethsemane, "Remove this cup from me; yet not what I will, but what you will."

1.11. Kingdom of God. Finally, Paul's references to the "kingdom of God"* (Rom 14:17; 1 Cor 4:20; 6:9-10; 15:50; Gal 5:21; Col 4:10-11; 1 Thess 2:11-12;

2 Thess 1:5; cf. 1 Cor 15:24; Col 1:13; 2 Tim 4:1, 18) must be considered. In view of the fact that in the Synoptics the kingdom of God is the center of Jesus' preaching, while the death (and resurrection) of Jesus Christ is the center of Paul's preaching,* critics tend to emphasize the infrequency with which Paul uses that characteristic expression of Jesus. However, while the thought expressed by the "kingdom of God" was central to contemporary Judaism, the term itself was by no means common in Judaism (let alone to Hellenism*). This observation, considered together with the fact that the total number of occurrences of "the kingdom of God" in the non-Pauline writings of the NT outside the Synoptics is hardly more than those within the Pauline corpus, points out that the eight Pauline references to the kingdom of God are by no means insignificant.

Among the many similarities between Paul's concept of the kingdom of God and that of Jesus (see below), Paul's language of "inheriting the kingdom of God" may be singled out as a sign of his adoption of the characteristic language of Jesus. The phrase "inherit the kingdom of God" is not frequent in the Synoptics (Mt 25:34; cf. Mt 5:5; 19:29), yet it is practically synonymous with the characteristic phrase of Jesus, "enter the kingdom of God" (Mk 10:15 pars.; Mk 10:23-27 pars.; etc.). Both phrases were formed after the OT model of "inheriting" or "entering" the promised land of Canaan (e.g., Deut 4:1; 6:17-18; 16:20; cf. also the phrases reflecting God's "giving" the kingdom [Lk 12:32; cf. Lk 22:29; Mk 4:11 pars.] and the believers' "receiving" it [Mk 10:15 pars.; Lk 18:17]). In the cluster of the synonymous expressions of Jesus (to "enter," "inherit" and "receive" the kingdom of God), Paul seems to have chosen the one of "inheriting the kingdom of God" (1 Cor 6:9; 15:50; Gal 5:21) under the influence of the common Jewish turn of speech, to "inherit" the age to come or eternal life. So it is fairly certain that Paul knew about Jesus' kingdom preaching and that he reflects it in his letters.

2. Possible Echoes.

There are also a large number of Pauline texts which may be seen, with a varying degree of probability, as echoing sayings of Jesus. They do not show any direct indication for it, and they are more disputed than those which have hitherto been treated. As space does not allow them to be discussed and evaluated here, they are simply presented in tabular form (see chart). However, some of them will be drawn into discussion in the subsequent sections.

2.1. 1 Corinthians. 1 Corinthians is distinguished among Paul's letters by the unique presence of three explicit references to the word/command of the Lord (1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; 11:23-26) and by the relative frequency of echoes of Jesus' sayings. It is also distinguished by Paul's explicit statement that on certain issues he has no Herrenwort ("word of the Lord," 1 Cor 7:12, 25, 40) and by the tenfold "Do you not know that? . . ." formula. These characteristics raise several interesting questions concerning Paul's attitude to and transmission of the dominical logia on the one hand, and the Corinthian problems and the nature of 1 Corinthians on the other. (In this article the former question will be taken up at relevant places.)

Paul's use of the "Do you not know that?" formula is quite suggestive and has not received adequate attention in scholarly discussions of Jesus' sayings in Paul. Among its ten occurrences, 1 Corinthians 5:6; 6:2 and 6:3; 6:9 have often been cited as echoes of Jesus' sayings in Mark 8:15-16 and parallels; in Matthew 19:28 (par. Lk 22:29-30); and in Matthew 5:20 respectively. 1 Corinthians 9:13, 24, however, refer to OT practice or common sense. The remaining four cases remain to be explained:

1 Corinthians 3:16 ("that you are the temple of God")

1 Corinthians 6:15 ("that your members are members of Christ")

1 Corinthians 6:16 ("that he who joins himself to a prostitute becomes one body with her")

1 Corinthians 6:19 ("that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you")

E. E. Ellis has sought to demonstrate that they refer to Paul's previous teaching to the Corinthians on "body"* and "temple,"* which was based on Jesus' own teaching. To summarize his argument briefly: 1 Corinthians 10:16 and 11:23-24 show that Paul's theology of the body of Christ is partly rooted in the eucharistic sayings of Jesus. 1 Corinthians 6:15 as well as 1 Corinthians 12:12, 27 reflect the same theology of the "body of Christ."* Ephesians 5:30, which also speaks of Christians as "members of Christ's body," grounds the conception in an exposition of Genesis 2:24: "The two shall be one flesh." Precisely this same passage is in Paul's mind in 1 Corinthians 6:15-17. This shows that the Corinthians' knowledge of their being "members of Christ" or of his "body" is based both on the Last Supper teaching of Jesus and on an exposition of Genesis 2:24, which the Corinthians had learned from Paul. It is most interesting then that Genesis 2:24 forms a part of the Synoptic tradition of Jesus' teaching on divorce, to which Paul alludes in 1 Corinthians 7:10-11. This means that Paul's conception of the church as the "body of Christ" is rooted, partly, both in Jesus' Supper teaching and in his mar-

Possible Echoes of Sayings of Jesus

Romans

1. Romans 12:1-2	Mark 12:17 par.; Mark 12:29-30 par.
2. Romans 12:9-13	Mark 7:6 par. Matthew 15:7; Mark 12:15 par. Matthew 22:18; Luke 12:56; Matthew 7:5 par. Luke 6:42
3. Romans 13:11-14	Luke 21:28, 31, 34 (cf. 1 Thess 5; Eph 6)
4. Romans 14:1-13a	Matthew 7:1 par. Luke 6:37 (cf. Rom 2:1-5; 1 Cor 4:3-5)
5. Romans 14:13b	Mark 9:42 par. (cf. 1 Cor 8:13)
6. Romans 15:8-9	Matthew 15:24; 8:11; Mark 10:45 par. (cf. 1 Cor 9:19; 10:33; 11:1 and Mk 10:44-45 par. Mt 20:27-28)
7. Romans 16:19	Matthew 10:16

1 Corinthians

8. 1 Corinthians 1:18—2:16	Luke 10:21-24 par. Matthew 11:25, 27; 13:16-17
1 Corinthians 1:20-25	Luke 11:29-32 par. Matthew 12:38-42
1 Corinthians 1:23	Matthew 11:6 par. Luke 7:23
1 Corinthians 2:8	Luke 23:13, 35; 24:20
9. 1 Corinthians 4:1-5	Luke 12:41-46 par. Matthew 24:45-51; Matthew 25:14-30 par. Luke 19:12-27; Luke 12:37; Matthew 7:1 par. Luke 6.37a
10. 1 Corinthians 7:7	Matthew 19:12
11. 1 Corinthians 8:13	Mark 9:42 par.
12. 1 Corinthians 9:19; 10:33; 11:1	Mark 10:45 par.
13. 1 Corinthians 10:27	Luke 20:8
14. 1 Corinthians 13:2b	Matthew 17:20; Mark 11:22-23 par. Matthew 21:21
15. 1 Corinthians 3:16; 5:6; 6:2, 3, 9, 15, 16, 19 containing the "Do you not know that?" formula (see below)

2 Corinthians

16. 2 Corinthians 4:10	Mark 9:31 par.; Mark 10:33 par.; Mark 14:21, 41 par.; etc. (cf. Rom 4:25; 8:32; Gal 1:4; 2:20)
17. 2 Corinthians 5:1	Mark 14:58 par. (see below)
18. 2 Corinthians 6:16	Mark 15:58 par. (see below)
19. 2 Corinthians 12:12	Mark 6:7 par. (cf. Mk 16:17-18)

Galatians

20. Galatians 1:4; 2:20	see 16 above
21. Galatians 1:1, 12-16; 2:7-9	Matthew 16:16-17 (cf. 1 Cor 3:11; Wenham)

Ephesians

22. Ephesians 2:19-21	Mark 14:58 par. (cf. 1 Cor 3:11, 16; 2 Cor 6:16; Gal 2:9; see below)
23. Ephesians 6:10-18	Luke 21:28, 31, 34-36

Philippians

24. Philippians 1:27—2:11	Mark 10:43-45 par.; Luke 14:11; Matthew 23:12 par. Luke 18:14

Colossians

25. Colossians 3:5	Mark 9:43-48 (cf. Mt 5:29; 18:8-9)
26. Colossians 3:13	Matthew 6:12 par. Luke 11:4

1 Thessalonians

27. 1 Thessalonians 2:2-9	Matthew 10:10 par. Luke 10:7
28. 1 Thessalonians 4:8	Luke 10:16 (cf. Mt 10:10; Jn 13:20)
29. 1 Thessalonians 5:15	Matthew 5:39-40 par. Luke 6:27-29 (cf. Rom 12:17)
30. 1 Thessalonians 2:16	Matthew 23:32-33

2 Thessalonians

31. 2 Thessalonians 2:1-12	Mark 13 par.

riage/divorce teaching based on Genesis 2:24. The formula "Do you not know that?" in 1 Corinthians 6:15, 16 as well as the references to the Last Supper tradition in 1 Corinthians 11:23-24; 10:16 (perhaps a variant form of the formula "Do you not know that?") then indicate that Paul had previously taught the Corinthians about the church being the "body of Christ" and about divorce on the basis of Jesus' teachings (cf. above).

For an explanation of the origin of the temple typology in 1 Corinthians 3:16 and 6:19 it is helpful to consider 1 Corinthians 3:11 and 2 Corinthians 5:1. The statement "you are the temple of God" (1 Cor 3:16) must somehow be related to the earlier statement that the "foundation" which the apostle Paul has laid is Jesus Christ (1 Cor 3:11). The use of "foundation" (themelion) here may reflect the influence of Isaiah 28:16, which is alluded to in Ephesians 2:20-22 and explicitly cited in 1 Peter 2:4-10 in connection with the conception of the church* as the temple of God in both passages. In 1 Peter 2:4-10, Isaiah 28:16 is cited together with Psalm 117(118):22 (the "rejected stone" becoming the "head of the corner"), which Jesus used in his explanation of the meaning of his sign-act at the Temple of Jerusalem (Mk 11:27—12:11 par.; cf. Kim). May it not be that in 1 Corinthians 3:11, 16 Paul reflects Jesus' teaching on the Temple and, in echoing Isaiah 28:16 (cf. Rom 9:33) he has also Psalm 117(118):22 in mind? (Cf. kephalē gōnias in Ps 117:22 and lithos . . . akrogōniaios in Is 28:16.) The several verbal affinities between 2 Corinthians 5:1 and the Temple saying attributed to Jesus (Mk 14:58 par. Mt 26:61) suggest that 2 Corinthians 5:1 echoes the saying and reflects an interpretation of it which, as in John 2:21-22, identifies Jesus' resurrection body as the new temple. Paul's introductory formula in 2 Corinthians 5:1, "for we know that . . . ," indicates that he had previously taught the Corinthians the temple typology on the basis of Jesus' Temple saying. So they "know" that they are the "temple of God" (1 Cor 3:16) or "that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 6:19).

At this point Ellis's argument needs much supplementing. Elsewhere I have attempted to show that Jesus did predict the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple and promise to build a new temple, and that by the new temple he meant the community of the new people of God he was to create through his vicariously atoning and covenant-establishing death and resurrection. So the new temple was the people of God whom he, as their substitute and representative, embodied, as it were, and it was to come into being with his resurrection. Therefore it was interpreted in terms of the resurrection "body" of Christ in John 2:21-22, where the body concept is perhaps both individual and collective (in its latter aspect, approaching the Pauline concept of the church as the "body of Christ"). Many Qumran* documents illustrate the Jewish background for Jesus' metaphorical or "spiritual" interpretation of temple, and passages like 1QH 7:4, that use for the community the language of body as well as that of building, illustrate the interpretation of temple as body. Paul seems to reflect both the collective interpretation of the temple (1 Cor 3:16) and its individual interpretation (1 Cor 6:19). The resurrection body which believers are to put on as a "building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor 5:1) is the resurrection body like that of the Last Adam, the "man from heaven" (1 Cor 15:42-49). But this resurrection body has already begun to take on reality in believers, insofar as they have died and risen with Christ through faith-baptism, and as the Holy Spirit* has already taken residence in them and they are being transformed into the glorious image* of the risen Lord (2 Cor 3:18). Hence we find the statement of 1 Corinthians 6:19! Space forbids a substantiation of the thesis in greater detail, but at any rate Paul's temple typology (cf. also 2 Cor 6:16—7:1) is undoubtedly based on Jesus' unique teaching on the Temple which is closely bound up with his kingdom preaching. 1 Corinthians 3:16; 6:19 and 2 Corinthians 5:1 clearly suggest that Paul had previously taught the Corinthians about it.

If this is so, all the cases of the formula "Do you not know that? . . ." in 1 Corinthians (except 1 Cor 9:13, 24) and its variant forms in 1 Corinthians 10:16 and 2 Corinthians 5:1 suggest that Paul transmitted Jesus' teachings to the Corinthian church at the time of his founding the church.

3. Continuity/Similarity in Theology and Attitude. We have seen that in only a few cases does Paul clearly indicate his reference to a saying of Jesus, and even in those cases, as 1 Corinthians 7:10-11 and 9:14 show, he does not quote them verbatim but re-presents them in his own language, sometimes using one or two words and/or the form drawn from them. This suggests that verbal parallelism cannot be made the sole criterion for judging whether a Pauline statement reflects a dominical saying or not. The presence of a parallel content or meaning must also be considered. The instances of allusions and echoes listed in sections 1 and 2 above are the result of critical comparisons of the vocabulary, form and/or content of Pauline statements with those of dominical logia preserved in the Synoptics. The critical criteria used are the principle of dissimilarity (i.e., a Pauline statement that is similar to a saying of Jesus could have come only from the latter, since the latter is unique, being dissimilar to OT-Judaism and Hellenism) and the principle of coherence (i.e., a Pauline statement should be both similar to and cohere well with a saying of Jesus). (The limited space, however, has prevented the actual display of comparisons for the instances tabulated in section 2.) Undoubtedly this investigation involves a fair degree of subjectivity. Some may wonder whether there may not be more allusions or echoes that have gone undetected, while others may reject many of the above cases. Even where a Pauline statement clearly seems to reflect a saying of Jesus, minimalists will wish to question whether Paul was conscious that it originated with Jesus when he made the statement.

In such a situation can there not be another criterion to provide a more reliable judgment? It is submitted here that the continuity or similarity between Paul and Jesus both in theology and in attitude must be considered as a factor, if not a criterion.

It is widely recognized that there is a real continuity between Jesus' kingdom preaching and Paul's doctrine of justification* (Bultmann; Jüngel). As noted above, the fact that the specific Jesuanic term kingdom of God is used by Paul at all (and over eight times, when elsewhere in the NT outside the Gospels it is rarely used) is significant. Like Jesus, Paul teaches that the kingdom of God is both present (Rom 14:17; 1 Cor 4:20; Col 1:13; 4:11) and future (all other instances). It presents its saving power through the Spirit (1 Cor 4:20 cf. Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20). It will be "inherited" not by natural, sinful people (1 Cor 15:50; Gal 5:21) but only by the righteous or those who are worthy of the kingdom (1 Cor 6:9; 1 Thess 2:12; 2 Thess 1:5; Gal 5:21; cf. Mt 5:20, 10) or by those who have been made God's children and are so privileged to call God abba (Rom 8:15-17; Gal 4:6-7; cf. Mk 10:15 par.). Paul's emphasis on divine grace corresponds to Jesus' emphasis on the kingdom's transcendental and grace character exhibited in his language of the kingdom "coming," and on God's "giving" it and people's "receiving" or "inheriting" it. It is also seen in Jesus' parables of the kingdom (Mt 20:1-16; Lk 7:36-50; 15:11-32; 18:9-14; Mk 1:40-45). Jesus' summary of the Law in terms of the double commandments of love for God and for one's neighbor, his critique of the contemporary Jewish understanding of the Law, and his disregard for the laws of the Sabbath, fasting, purity, table-fellowship, etc., find their close correspondence in Paul's teaching on the Law and his criticism of the "works of the Law" as the means of justification. Jesus' blessing the poor and helping the outcasts—the "sinners" according to the Law—who respond to his kingdom preaching is not only continuous with Paul's outreach to the Gentiles but also with his doctrine of the "justification of the ungodly" sola gratia (Dahl, 115).

It is more true to say that there is a close correspondence between Jesus' teaching centered upon the kingdom of God and Paul's theology as a whole, rather than specifically between the former and Paul's doctrine of justification (see Center). For the post-Easter church in general, what Jesus had promised through his kingdom preaching, namely to create a people (or children) of God to live in his love and wealth, has been realized in his atoning and covenant*-establishing death,* and this has been confirmed by God through his resurrecting Jesus. So the post-Easter church naturally concentrates on preaching the good news of salvation already wrought in Christ's death (and resurrection) rather than on simply repeating Jesus' kingdom preaching which had basically the character of a promise and an invitation (see Kim). So also Paul makes Jesus' death on the cross the center of his preaching. He expounds the meaning of salvation wrought in it by various categories or metaphors such as justification, reconciliation (see Peace), adoption,* new creation,* life in the Spirit, transformation, etc. He explains its blessings in terms of righteousness,* peace,* joy,* freedom,* hope,* life,* etc. These categories/metaphors and these blessings are those that were explicitly or implicitly promised in Jesus' kingdom preaching. They have now been made available by Jesus' death. Thus the fact that Jesus' gospel of the kingdom is replaced with Paul's gospel of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ means no discontinuity between Jesus and Paul. Rather, the reverse is true: it had to be so replaced.

However, in explaining the salvation promised in Jesus' preaching of the kingdom and accomplished by his death and resurrection, could Paul not have continued using the "kingdom" language? If so, why does he do so only on a few occasions? Among the various categories/metaphors which Paul uses in place of kingdom language, justification is the most prominent. At least, those who maintain that the notion of justification is not merely a "subsidiary crater" or something that developed later out of polemical necessity, but rather is the central category of Paul's soteriology, owe an explanation as to why Paul replaced the language of kingdom chiefly with the language of justification. Certainly the reason must be seen against the background of "righteousness" being a central concern of the Jews, whether they were trying to earn salvation or remain in a saving covenant relationship with God by keeping the Law. It may also have something to do with Paul's attempt to avoid a political misunderstanding of his gospel in the Roman world. Further, it is connected also with his own conversion from a zeal for Law-righteousness (see Works of the Law) to receiving God's righteousness in Jesus Christ (Gal 1:13-16; Phil 3:4-11). From that experience, Paul saw clearly God's saving act in Jesus Christ as God's righteousness, and he realized also that righteousness/justification was the best category for bringing out the grace character of salvation over against the Jewish conception of Law-righteousness-salvation.

The main reason, however, must lie in his understanding of Jesus' death as the atoning and covenant-establishing sacrifice* that has wrought the salvation promised by Jesus in his kingdom preaching (Rom 3:24-26; 2 Cor 5:21; etc.). Since this saving event was the atoning and covenant-establishing sacrifice and, furthermore, since Jesus indicated that his death was to bear such meaning and he portrayed it in terms of the 'Ebed Yahweh ("Servant of the Lord") who was to "pour out his soul to death" as 'āšām ("guilt offering"), "making many accounted righteous" (Is 53:10-12; Mk 14:17-25 par.), Paul naturally interpreted the salvation wrought through Jesus' death chiefly through the category of righteousness/justification. This category of righteousness/justification, which expresses the concerns of atonement, the forgiveness of sins and the restoration of the proper, or covenantal, relationship to God, had the additional advantage of perfectly bringing out the intention of Jesus' kingdom preaching and his conduct in receiving sinners.

Thus not only the close material connection between Jesus' gospel of the kingdom of God and Paul's gospel of Jesus Christ's death and resurrection, but also Paul's choice of righteousness/justification as the main category of interpretation of salvation in Jesus Christ betrays his intimate knowledge of Jesus' kingdom preaching and Jesus' view of his own death.

We have already noted how Paul echoes Jesus' unique teaching on the temple as well as his unique address for God as abba, and his teaching on the adoption of believers into God's family. These teachings of Jesus are in fact closely associated with his kingdom preaching. Jesus' association with sinners, which is seen by many as a basis for Paul's outreach to the Gentiles,* is in fact granted as a foretaste and pledge of salvation, of entrance into the kingdom of God. The close similarity between Paul and Jesus in their eschatological teachings is also often noted (see esp. E. Schweizer on the Pauline kingdom passage of 1 Cor 15:20-28). Jesus' eschatological teaching is given in terms of the kingdom of God. Here the continuity between Jesus' intention of gathering the people of God in solidarity with him in the kingdom and Paul's conception of the church as the people of God and the body of Christ is instructive. These parallels also indicate Paul's intimate knowledge of Jesus' kingdom preaching.

C. Wolff has conveniently surveyed the Jesus and Pauline evidence to compare the conduct of Jesus and Paul under the four headings of deprivation, renunciation of marriage, humble service and suffering persecution. In this area Wolff affirms "some remarkable correspondences" between the two figures, and concludes that Paul as an apostle, a representative of Jesus Christ "displays himself as a true follower" of him. May we not then take this as evidence that Paul knew of Jesus' life and teaching quite well?

Some try to see the similarities between Paul and Jesus in theology and in attitude and conduct as mediated by the Hellenists (Wedderburn, 117-43; cf. Hengel; Dunn). Indeed, the Hellenists may have been the first tradents of the dominical tradition. However, it is very unrealistic to suppose that Paul would have been satisfied merely with knowing their teaching and attitude. Since he preached none other than Jesus Christ and God's saving work in him, he would have demanded to know that what the Hellenists claimed to represent about Jesus Christ and his teaching was accurate. For example, if Paul had heard the Hellenists justify their outreach to the Gentiles on the basis of Jesus' attitude to the outcasts, would he not have felt the urge to know how Jesus justified his attitude, especially since it would have been unacceptable to him in his preconversion days? For Paul, Jesus was no legendary ancient hero, but a contemporary of his who had been only recently crucified as a false messiah. Given this fact, it is impossible to think that Paul did not try to learn of Jesus, his life and teaching, more accurately from the primary witnesses like Peter as well as others from Jerusalem such as Barnabas,* Silvanus and John Mark. Nor is it easy to think that the close correspondences between the teaching and conduct of Jesus, and the teaching and conduct of Paul, could have come about if there was anything less than an earnest desire on Paul's part to learn of Jesus.

Therefore, we conclude that the remarkable similarities between Paul and Jesus in theology and attitude may be taken as evidence for Paul's intimate knowledge of Jesus' teaching and attitude. They must be counted then as Paul's reflections of Jesus' sayings, since it is chiefly by means of one's sayings that one's teaching is imparted. If Paul's theology, especially his doctrine of justification, closely represents Jesus' kingdom preaching, we must conclude that he knew it well, and this conclusion implies that he knew well

Jesus' sayings (including the parables) about the kingdom of God.

This consideration of the theological continuity between Jesus and Paul should tip the balance in favor of a positive judgment in the cases (like those considered in 2 above) where there is a dispute about a possible echo of a saying of Jesus in a Pauline statement. A thesis may now be submitted, one analogous to that of J. Jeremias on the question of authenticity of dominical logia in the Synoptics: When in the Pauline letters an echo of a dominical logion is disputed, the burden of proof lies more heavily on those who would deny it, than on those who would accept it.

4. Theological Loci and Sayings of Jesus.

The sayings of Jesus that we have discerned, whether they be allusions or echoes, are diverse and appear in various contexts of Paul's teaching. The majority of them, however, may be classified as connected with Paul's *ethical and eschatological teaching. It is especially noteworthy that in a number of places Paul echoes the sayings of Jesus which are compiled by Matthew and Luke in the Sermon on the Mount/Plain. D. C. Allison infers from this that Paul knew an early collection of Jesus' logia now preserved in Luke 6:27-38, the central section of the Sermon on the Plain (cf. Mt 5:38-48; 7:12). Ascertaining Paul's "heavy dependence" on the pre-Synoptic eschatological traditions of Jesus, D. Wenham even uses the Pauline echoes as important pieces of evidence in elucidating the history of those Gospel traditions.

One of Paul's explicit references to Jesus' saying is about the apostolic privilege to "get their living by the gospel" (1 Cor 9:14; cf. 1 Thess 2:2-9; see Financial Support), and several of Paul's echoes of Jesus' sayings are concerned with *apostleship and mission (Rom 15:8-9; 16:19; 1 Cor 4:1-5; 7:7; 2 Cor 12:12; Gal 1:12-16; 2:7-8; 1 Thess 4:8; etc.). Here one must consider also Paul's close "following" (or imitation) of Jesus in his apostolic existence of deprivation, unmarried life, humble service and suffering, which, as argued above, implies his knowledge of Jesus' life and of his teaching about such a life. Clearly, as an apostle and missionary, Paul cherished his Lord's teaching on apostleship and mission and his example (cf. 1 Cor 11:1).

Since the words of Jesus at the Last Supper are explicitly referred to by Paul, their influence on Paul's doctrine of the eucharist (see Lord's Supper) needs no further substantiation. We have also seen some intimations of the influence of Jesus' teachings on the Temple and on marriage/divorce as well as his eucharistic sayings, as they shaped Paul's conception of the church as the body of Christ.

Now we turn to the question of whether Paul's christology* and soteriology also echo Jesus' teaching. N. Walter claims that precisely in "expounding the central content of his gospel, in making his important christological or soteriological statements . . . Paul adduces no Jesus-tradition" (Walter, 74). Moreover, he also maintains that "in expounding the gospel of Christ Paul shows no trace of the influence of the theologically central affirmations of Jesus' preaching, in particular of his characteristic 'Jesuanic' interpretation of the kingdom of God" (Walter, 63). Walter concludes that Paul was either not very familiar with Jesus' message or not able "to understand and assimilate these central ingredients of the Jesus-tradition" (Walter, 64).

However, this sort of statement can be made only by the "minimalists" who accept exclusively those few passages in Paul where there is an explicit reference to sayings of Jesus. But as we have seen, there is a strong continuity between Jesus' kingdom preaching and Paul's gospel of God's salvation through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and his interpretation of this salvation chiefly through the category of justification. We have tried to show that the replacement of kingdom by justification was not only expedient but also logically required. We have argued that this continuity or unity presupposes Paul's intimate knowledge of Jesus' kingdom preaching and Jesus' view of his own death. Otherwise we cannot explain the theological unity between Paul and Jesus.

In addition to this fundamental consideration, we may, contra Walter, point to Paul's references to the kingdom of God, which with similarities to Jesus' kingdom preaching are significant in themselves. We may also point to his citation of the eucharistic words of Jesus, which could hardly have failed to influence his soteriology; to his allusion to Jesus' abba address to God, which forms a basis of his Son* christology* and his adoption soteriology as well as his teaching on the testimony of the Spirit in Romans 8; to his use of the language of paradidomai ("to be given up," 1 Cor 4:10-11; Rom 4:25; 8:32; Gal 1:4; 2:20), which echoes Jesus' passion announcements; and to his christological and soteriological argument in 1 Corinthians 1:18—2:16, which is full of echoes of Jesus' shout of praise (Lk 10:21-24 par.) and passion. There is no space here to examine whether behind his kyrios christology, reconciliation and new creation soteriology, etc., there may not stand some concrete teachings of Jesus. However, enough has been shown to indicate that in his christological and soteriological statements also there are clear echoes of Jesus' teachings.

Certainly it is true that he does not cite any saying of Jesus as a proof-text for his christological or soteriological statement. But except for 1 Corinthians 7:10-11 and 9:14, he does not use Jesus tradition in that manner for other kinds of theological statements either. In comparison with his ethical and eschatological teachings, Paul shows a greater freedom in interpreting Jesus' teaching as he incorporates it into his christology and soteriology, where he more frequently replaces Jesus' language with his own. This is quite understandable. Our earlier consideration (see 3 above) goes some way toward explaining the reason for this.

So in his christology and soteriology as well as in all the other areas of his theology, Paul echoes Jesus' sayings. That is, Jesus' teaching provides Paul with a basis for his theology as a whole.

5. Narrative Tradition.

According to N. Walter, there is "no hint that Paul knew of the narrative tradition about Jesus." But again this is a positivistic statement by a minimalist. With M. Hengel, one must realistically consider the Sitz im Leben of Paul's missionary preaching: "It was simply impossible in the antiquities to proclaim a man crucified a few years ago, as Kyrios, Son of God and Redeemer, without saying something about who this man was, what he taught and did, and why he died" (Hengel 1971, 34). This consideration should prevent interpreters from dealing cavalierly with various indications in Paul's letters of his knowledge of the narrative tradition about Jesus, simply because they are mere indications and not extended narratives of Jesus' life and deeds such as those found in the Gospels.

In Galatians 3:1 Paul reminds the Galatians of his having "portrayed Jesus Christ as crucified before your eyes" at his first preaching to them. In Galatians 6:17 and 2 Corinthians 4:10 he speaks of his apostolic life in terms of both carrying about the "marks [stigmata] of Jesus" in his body and the "putting to death [nekrōsis] of Jesus" in his body. Here his use of the name Jesus (instead of the more familiar "death of Christ [Jesus]") as well as the terms stigmata and nekrōsis clearly indicate his consideration of the concrete process of Jesus' crucifixion (Wolff). From this Kleinknecht rightly infers that Paul "must have had a certain visual image" of Jesus' death. We receive the same impressions from Philippians 3:10, where Paul speaks of his resolution to "participate in [Christ's] sufferings, being conformed to his death."

Further, we have already suggested that Paul's use of the paradidomai language (2 Cor 4:11; Rom 4:25; 8:32; Gal 2:20; cf. 1 Cor 11:23; Gal 1:4) indicates his knowledge of the passion tradition. 1 Corinthians 2:8 alludes to the Jewish and Roman rulers' crucifying Jesus, and Romans 15:3 probably refers to the "insults" Jesus suffered on the cross (cf. also 2 Cor 13:4). Of course, it would be most arbitrary if the direct and concrete data provided by 1 Corinthians 11:23-25 and 15:3-5 were excluded from consideration of Paul's knowledge of a version of the passion narrative on the ground that they are a liturgical and a kerygmatic formula (pace Walter). Walter tries to argue against this overwhelming evidence by granting that Paul "certainly knew something about the event of the passion of Jesus," but at the same time by denying "Paul's knowledge of the passion narrative in the (or a) pre-Synoptic version" (Walter, 63). But this distinction is quite arbitrary. If Paul knew something about the passion of Jesus, then he knew a version of the passion narrative. How could it have been otherwise?

Since Paul makes the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ the center of his preaching, it is natural that his allusions to the narrative tradition about Jesus would also be concentrated on the passion narrative. However, indications of his knowledge of other kinds of the narrative tradition are not lacking. Walter asserts again confidently that "Jesus' actions played no role" in Paul's picture of him, "and certainly not his actions as a performer of miracles." However, when Paul speaks of "the signs* of the apostle" in terms of "signs and wonders and mighty works" (2 Cor 12:12; Rom 15:18-19; Gal 3:5; 1 Cor 2:4; 1 Thess 1:5), he seems to reflect Jesus' word of apostolic commission (Mk 6:7-8 par.; cf. Mk 16:17-18). But does not the fact that he regards miracles as a sign of an apostle, as the representative and revealer of Jesus Christ, imply that he knows that Jesus demonstrated the salvation of the kingdom of God through his miracles? Does not precisely this knowledge stand behind Paul's summary description in Romans 15:18-19 of his apostolic ministry: "I will not venture to speak of anything except what Christ has wrought through me to bring about the obedience of the Gentiles, by word and deed, by the power of signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit"? (cf. 1 Cor 2:4; 1 Thess 1:5). So Christ is a performer of miracles, and the miracles Paul the apostle has performed are in fact the works of Christ done through him. Unless Paul knew that Jesus was a miracle worker, how could he speak like this? (see below).

In fact, one of Paul's kingdom sayings (1 Cor 4:20) seems to betray his knowledge of Jesus' kingdom preaching as accompanied by miracles (cf. Lk 11:20 par.; G. Haufe). As Jesus actualized through miracles the salvation of the kingdom he preached, so also Paul, his apostle, has actualized through miracles the salvation of the gospel he has preached. But Paul did it in the name of his Lord Jesus Christ, and he was conscious that in this work of his the risen Lord Jesus Christ carried on his work of salvation as during his earthly ministry. Thus Paul reveals, though allusively, his knowledge of a narrative tradition about Jesus as a miracle worker.

Passages such as Romans 15:3, 8-9; 1 Corinthians 10:33—11:1; 2 Corinthians 4:5; 8:9; 10:1; Philippians 2:6-8 clearly reveal Paul's knowledge of Jesus' life as one of poverty and humble service.* The lists of qualities set forth for the Christian life in 1 Corinthians 13:4-7 and Galatians 5:22-23 are "character sketches" of Jesus (Dunn; Wedderburn). Paul exhorts Christians to "put on Christ" (Rom 13:14; Gal 3:27) and speaks of "imitating" him (1 Cor 11:1; 1 Thess 1:6). In these and other instances of his ethical instruction he often thinks of the example of Christ, and the exemplary "character of Jesus as Paul understood it is consistent with the character of Jesus as portrayed in the Gospels" (Bruce, 96; cf. also H. Schürmann).

To be sure, when Paul speaks of Christ's example of self-renunciation, service, love, humility, meekness, etc., he has in view not just Jesus' actions during his earthly days but his total existence from his pre-existence through the incarnation and the earthly life to his post-exaltation present status (see Christology). But the actions and character of Christ in his supra-historical existence are affirmed in the light of those of the earthly Jesus (or as Wedderburn, 188, puts it, they are "projections backwards and forwards of the patterns of action and the attitudes of the earthly Jesus"). It may be conceivable that without actually knowing anything about the life and character of the historical Jesus, Paul simply attributed those nice qualities to his "Christ." But, as noted above, the "remarkable correspondences" between Jesus and Paul in a life of suffering and humble service suggest that it is more realistic to think that having actually learned of the life and character of the historical Jesus, Paul as his apostle tried to imitate him. This is far more likely than that he gave himself up so totally to deprivation, service and persecution only for a figment of his own imagination (note well the use of the name "Jesus" in 2 Cor 4:5 as well as in 2 Cor 4:10; Gal 6:17). So we must assume on Paul's part an extensive knowledge of a narrative tradition of Jesus' life, ministry and character as standing behind those passages where Paul refers to Christ's example (though the term example as an example to be imitated* is debated; see Käsemann, Martin; see Hymns).

The continuity between Jesus' welcoming sinners and Paul's mission to the Gentiles also suggests Paul's knowledge of a narrative tradition about the former. As argued above, this cannot be denied by appealing to a theory of the Hellenists' mediating this aspect of Jesus' ministry as a justification for their outreach to Gentiles. In fact, Romans 12:16b (cf. Rom 15:7) seems to indicate that Paul was conscious of the model character of Jesus' association with the humble (Käsemann 1980, 347; Thompson).

Finally, Romans 1:3-4; 9:5 and Galatians 4:4 (cf. also Gal 1:19: "James the brother of the Lord") hint that Paul would not have been totally ignorant of or uninterested in the family origin of Jesus.

6. Paucity and Allusive Character of References.

If our argument so far is sound, in the Pauline corpus there are a considerable number of references to or echoes of the sayings of Jesus and the narrative tradition about him. They are found in all the letters of Paul, and are connected with all the major themes of his theology. However, critics regularly comment that they are "strikingly" few. But the question of whether they are to be evaluated as many or few depends on the terms of comparison. Certainly they are strikingly few and indirect in comparison with Paul's references to the OT or to the habits of the contemporary rabbis and Hellenistic philosophers in their references to the teachings of their masters. However, as is often noted, in comparison to the references to the actions and teachings of Jesus in other NT writings, such as Acts, 1 Peter, the Johannine letters, and James, those in Paul's writings are by no means few.

A. J. M. Wedderburn (117-18) lists some issues in connection with which Paul might be expected to refer to Jesus' teaching but, in fact, he does not: (1) the controversies over observance of certain days (Gal 4:10; Rom 14:5-6); (2) the advice for the "virgins" (1 Cor 7:25-28; cf. Mt 19:10-12?); (3) the attitude toward the authorities (Rom 13:1-7); (4) the question about food* and table fellowship (Rom 14; 1 Cor 8—10; Gal 2:11-14; cf. Mk 7:15, 18-19 par.); and (5) the doctrine of salvation by grace* and not by works (cf., e.g., the parable of the workers in the vineyard, Mt 20:1-16).

However, it has already been argued (1) that in Romans 13:1-7 Paul does echo Jesus' teaching in Mark 12:17 and (2) that in Rom 14:14a, 20 he does allude to Jesus' saying in Mark 7:15, 19. In 1 Corinthians 8—10, he may have avoided referring to Jesus' saying in Mark 7 because the saying was known to the Corinthians and precisely its right interpretation was part of the controversy between the strong and the weak at Corinth. Similarly, in Galatians 2:11-14 Paul may also have been conscious of the different interpretation of the saying by the Jerusalemites as well as of the fact that he could hardly speak as authoritatively on the Jesus tradition as could Peter.

(3) It has been noted that in 1 Corinthians 7:7 Paul probably echoes the saying of Jesus recorded in Matthew 19:12. Then, when he regrets that he has "no command of the Lord concerning the virgins" in 1 Corinthians 7:25, he must have found Jesus' saying in Matthew 19:10-12 irrelevant to the "virgins."

(4) The reason why Paul did not cite the examples of Jesus' working on the Sabbath days in connection with the controversies over observance of certain holy days (see Holy Days) may be that he had already taught the Galatians about the real meaning of the Sabbath, citing Jesus' healings on Sabbath days as tokens of his eschatological fulfillment of its true intention (note Paul's reference to his previous "labor" for them in Gal 4:11) or, in the case of Romans 14:5-6, because he regards the Sabbath observance (like dietary observance) as an adiaphoron ("a matter of indifference"), so long as it is properly understood as fulfilled in Jesus and not elevated to a meritorious work for salvation.

(5) For us it would have been natural and most effective if he had cited Jesus' parables, such as that of the workers in the vineyard or the prodigal son (Lk 15), in support of his argument for the doctrine of salvation by grace and not by works. The reason he did not do it, however, lies probably in the more thorough interpretation and representation of Jesus' teaching that Paul gave in his own language—a necessity because of the christological and soteriological center of his gospel. Apparently, in his argument for the doctrine of salvation by grace, he judged it to be far more effective to refer to the actual revelation of God's grace in Christ's vicarious death than to refer to his parabolic teaching about it. Taking all of this into consideration it becomes evident that the number of places in which Paul fails to echo a saying of Jesus is, in fact, but few, and the instances are all naturally understandable.

Nevertheless, when one compares Paul's references to the OT Scriptures with the practices of the contemporary rabbis and philosophers as they referred to the words of their teachers, it becomes clear that Paul's references to the sayings of Jesus are incomparably few. Furthermore, while his references to the OT Scriptures are very often explicit and verbatim, although some are allusive, his references to the sayings of Jesus are mostly allusive, often hardly more than an echo and seldom verbatim.

Now the reason(s) for these phenomena must be found. Certainly the great reverence Paul shows for the "command" of the Lord in 1 Corinthians 7:10-11, distinguishing it from his own instruction, and his regret in 1 Corinthians 7:25 not to have a "command" of the Lord for the "virgins" clearly indicate that his lack of interest in or reverence for the sayings of Jesus does not explain the phenomena.

Some try to explain this paucity in terms of a hypothesis in which Paul's opponents* play a significant role. Wedderburn suggests that Paul saw the teaching of Jesus largely held "in enemy hands" and misused in a legalistic way by his Judaizing opponents (Wedderburn, 100). As we have seen, this hypothesis may explain Paul's failure to refer to some sayings of Jesus (cf. Mk 7:15 par.) in a few exceptional cases like Galatians 2:11-14 or 1 Corinthians 8—10. But it is hardly adequate to explain the problem as a whole. H. W. Kuhn speculates that it is a result of Paul's using his theology of the cross to counter the two groups of his opponents at Corinth: one, the Jewish-Christian opponents who concentrated on a Q-type collection of Jesus' sayings, presenting him as a wisdom teacher, and the other, the "enthusiasts" who transmitted the miracle stories of Jesus, presenting him in the style of a Hellenistic "divine man" (theios anēr). But Kuhn is then left to explain Paul's reticence about Jesus tradition in his other letters. Why precisely in 1 Corinthians and only there does Paul cite explicitly the sayings of Jesus three times over and refer to the kingdom of God more frequently than in any of the other letters? Ultimately, the "opponents hypotheses" are inadequate for solving our problem.

The only viable solution seems to be one that starts by noticing that Paul's attitude to Jesus tradition is exactly in line with the general phenomenon observable in the NT writings outside the Gospels. Luke in Acts hardly ever refers to the Jesus traditions of his Gospel, and 1 John contains few references to the traditions found in the Gospel of John. In the other non-Pauline letters and Revelation the situation is the same. So the scarcity of Paul's explicit reference to Jesus tradition can hardly mean his lack of knowledge of or interest in it. In this vein B. Gerhardsson has argued that the concrete Jesus tradition was treated as an independent entity and transmitted separately as a unique tradition within the early church (Gerhardsson). This argument is persuasive when one observes the general phenomenon of the letters, Acts and Revelation in contrast with the Gospels. Explicit recountings of Jesus tradition are found only in the Gospels, and the Gospels contain only Jesus tradition. On the other hand James may be taken as an illustration of an early Christian author who works out many of his motifs, phrases and words from the Jesus tradition and yet does not cite sayings of Jesus.

It is also to be observed that like Acts 20:35, the only case of citation of a saying of Jesus in Acts (an agraphon, i.e., not found in the Gospels), so also Paul's citation of Jesus' words in 1 Corinthians 11:23-25 has the character of reminding the Corinthian church of the words that they already know. There, using the Jewish technical terms for the faithful transmission of a tradition, parelabon (Heb qbl) and paredōka (Heb mśr), Paul indicates that he had faithfully transmitted the eucharistic tradition to the Corinthians. Similarly, in several other places Paul refers to the "tradition" he transmitted or taught to his churches (1 Cor 11:2; 15:3; Phil 4:9; Col 2:7; 1 Thess 4:1-2; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6; cf. also Rom 6:17), and to the knowledge they already have about various teachings in the tradition (1 Cor 3:16; 5:6; 6:2, 3, 9, 15, 16, 19; 2 Cor 4:14; 5:1; Gal 2:16; 1 Thess 2:11-12; 3:3-4; 5:2; etc.). We have already seen that several of these passages echo sayings of Jesus.

So it is very probable that his initial preaching at each place included a separate transmission of Jesus tradition (the Antiochian tradition?) as well as the christological and soteriological exposition of the Christ-event and paraenesis based both on the Christ-event and Jesus tradition. Then, in his letters to his converts to whom he had already delivered Jesus tradition, Paul did not have to transmit it again. He needed only to refer to it, if necessary.

Thus the fundamental reason why in Paul's letters, as well as in other NT writings outside the Gospels, the references are fewer in number and more allusive in nature than we might expect may well be that Paul and the other representatives of the early church treated Jesus tradition separately as a unique and sacred tradition.

Nevertheless we could imagine that Paul's references to Jesus' teaching would have been more numerous and would have taken the form of an exact citation, had he used it in his argument to prove the truth of his gospel or of his paraenesis. But Paul bases his argument for the truth of his gospel on the Christ-event, that is, not on Jesus' teaching but on the Christ-act, which is the fulfillment of the promise contained in his teaching (see above). For Paul, Jesus is significant primarily not as a teacher but as the *Christ who died and rose again (see Resurrection) for the salvation of humankind! Hence the meaning of Jesus as the risen Lord for Paul is essentially and fundamentally different from that of a rabbinic or a philosophic teacher for his pupil. Therefore the manner in which Paul refers to Jesus' teaching in his letters cannot be compared to that of a rabbi's or a philosopher's references to their teacher in the rabbinic or philosophical tractates.

Considering the realistic logic of Hengel's statement cited above, we can well imagine that in his initial preaching at each place, Paul expounded the meaning of the death (and resurrection) of Jesus Christ in relation to Jesus' teaching, which Paul transmitted separately, indicating how the former had fulfilled the promise contained in the latter. In his letters he did not need to repeat this. Since his opponents were not denying the character of Jesus' death as the eschatological atonement or as the accomplishment of salvation promised in Jesus' teaching, Paul was not required to cite elements of Jesus' teaching to prove these points. The "Judaizers" in Antioch, Galatia,* Philippi* and elsewhere, took issue with him only because of their insistence that the Gentiles must receive circumcision and take upon themselves the yoke of the Law of the covenant in order to avail themselves of the salvation effected by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, the fulfillment of the old covenant. The "enthusiasts" in Corinth irritated Paul with their misunderstanding of the gospel, interpreting it in terms of Hellenistic wisdom and with their over-confident belief that they had already obtained full salvation.

Paul would have found few concrete sayings of Jesus that were directly relevant to his struggle against the "Judaizers" and the "enthusiasts" in his Gentile* churches. For Jesus it had been largely a case of welcoming Israelite "sinners," not Gentiles, to table fellowship as a token of their entry into the kingdom of God. So instead of citing any concrete saying of Jesus, he concentrated on expounding the full significance of Jesus' death for his people (its vicarious character), guided by the general spirit of Jesus' teaching (hence the theological continuity between Jesus and Paul), in order to prove the truth of his gospel of sola gratia and sola fide, or that of his theology of the cross against a theology of glory (see Cross). He backed up his arguments with citations of the Scriptures, which he had come to understand anew in light of the Christ-event.

In paraenesis, unlike in theological argument, one normally does not prove the truth of one's teaching, and so is not required to cite its sources. So, as an apostle of Christ who had the mind of Christ (1 Cor 2:16) and spoke under the inspiration of his Spirit (1 Cor 7:40), Paul usually imparted his authoritative apostolic teaching. However, when he was conscious of the opinions or attitudes contrary to his own teachings, he did refer or allude to Jesus' teachings in order to support his apostolic teachings with the Lord's authority. Romans 14:14; 1 Corinthians 7:10-11; 9:14; Galatians 5:14 (+ 6:2) and other passages (discussed in 1 above) well illustrate this point. With Paul's eschatological teaching also a similar phenomenon is ob-servable, and 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17; 5:1-7 illustrate this. Thus, Paul did use Jesus' sayings in support of his own teaching when he found himself in the situation where he had to prove its veracity. In the usual situations, however, he did not need to make any explicit citation of the sayings of Jesus. Nevertheless, since as an apostle he had to represent his Lord's teaching, he re-presented it in his own language, sometimes alluding to or echoing some of his concrete sayings. This re-presentation was necessary in order to make Jesus' teaching more suitable to Paul's changed, post-Easter situation (Goppelt, 42-46), or to his audience in the Hellenistic world. Furthermore, it is to be noted that even in paraenesis he tends to concentrate on the cross and resurrection of Christ as a motivating force rather than on his concrete sayings and deeds. About this, Thompson puts it well: "Why should Paul point to an act [or a command—we may add] of love, humility, or compassion during Jesus' ministry when he could cite his example of total commitment on the cross? Why should he cite a healing act of power, when he could refer to the resurrection? Everything Jesus said and did before his death and vindication paled in significance by comparison to the Christ-Event."

Thus, the "paucity" and allusive character of Paul's references to Jesus' sayings turn out, partly, to have been necessitated by Paul's living in the post-Easter period, and partly to have been natural. In any case they turn out to be quite understandable. They should no longer be used as evidence for Paul's lack of knowledge of or interest in the Jesus tradition or in the historical Jesus.

7. Summary and Conclusion.

We have ascertained over twenty-five instances where Paul certainly or probably makes reference or allusion to a saying of Jesus. In addition, we have tabulated over forty possible echoes of a saying of Jesus. These are distributed throughout all of the Pauline letters, though 1 Corinthians and Romans contain the most.

There is a real continuity between Jesus' teaching centered around the kingdom of God and Paul's theology as a whole. The replacement of Jesus' gospel of the kingdom with the apostolic gospel of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ was logically necessitated by the salvation promised in Jesus' kingdom preaching being realized in his death and resurrection. In Paul's central soteriological category of justification, he accurately expressed the intention of Jesus gospel of the kingdom. The theological continuity between Jesus and Paul is further supported by Paul's concrete echoes of the "kingdom of God" and "abba," of his teachings on the Law, the Temple and eschatology, of his welcoming sinners, and of other aspects of his attitude and conduct such as renunciation of privilege and humble service.

The close similarities between Jesus and Paul in theology and attitude may be taken as evidence of Paul's intimate knowledge of Jesus' teaching and attitude. This consideration should incline interpreters toward a more positive judgment in those cases where there is a dispute over the presence of an echo of a saying of Jesus, placing the burden of proof more heavily on those who would deny it than on those who would accept it.

Echoes of Jesus' sayings are discernible in all the major themes of Paul's theology. His christology and soteriology are conditioned by Jesus' teaching as much as his other theological loci, leading to the conclusion that Jesus' teaching provides Paul with a basis for his theology as a whole.

Paul also provides hints of his knowledge of the narrative tradition of Jesus' passion, his healing ministry, his welcoming sinners, his life of poverty and humble service, his character and other aspects.

The number of contexts in which Paul fails to refer to a saying of Jesus against our expectation is in fact few and explainable. Nevertheless, the fact that Paul's references to Jesus' sayings are not numerous and they are all allusive, a characteristic shared by other NT writings outside the Gospels, requires an explanation. Paul, like the other NT writers, probably treated Jesus tradition as an independent entity and transmitted it separately to his churches at their foundation (cf. Gerhardsson). However, for Paul, as for the post-Easter church as a whole, Jesus was significant primarily not as a teacher but as the Christ who had died and risen. Hence Paul concentrated on the Christ event. He cannot be compared to a rabbi or a Hellenistic philosopher who diligently cites his teacher.

In his letters Paul was called upon not to prove the character of Jesus' death as the fulfillment of Jesus' ministry, but the availability of that salvation to Gentiles apart from works of the Law. So Paul did not need to cite Jesus' kingdom preaching to prove its fulfillment in his death and he would have found few concrete sayings from the Jewish context of Jesus' ministry that were directly relevant to his conflict with Judaizers and enthusiasts in his Gentile churches. Paul, therefore, concentrated on expounding the full significance of Jesus' death, guided by the general spirit of Jesus' teaching, in order to prove the truth of his gospel of the cross, sola gratia and sola fide.

In paraenesis and eschatology, in order to support his teaching with the Lord's authority in the face of a contrary opinion, Paul occasionally referred explicitly to Jesus' sayings. But usually he did not need to prove the truth of his teaching. As an apostle of Christ who had the mind of Christ and spoke under the inspiration of his Spirit, he could simply impart his authoritative apostolic teaching. In this he seldom cited Jesus' sayings explicitly, but re-presented them, echoing them in his own language. Although he shows a great reverence for Jesus' sayings and shapes his theology as a whole according to them, he does not use them in a literalistic or legalistic way, but adapts them to the new post-Easter situations and to his Hellenistic audiences, modifying their letter while respecting their spirit.

Against this background the "paucity" and allusive character of Paul's references to Jesus' sayings should no longer be used as evidence for Paul's reputed lack of knowledge of or interest in the Jesus tradition or in the historical Jesus. On the contrary, we are led to search for echoes of Jesus' sayings woven into Paul's statements. Once these echoes as well Paul's allusions to Jesus' sayings are established, we can study in detail the actual method by which Paul used them (cf. Gundry; Ellis) and their relationship to the history of the Synoptic tradition (cf. Dungan; Allison; Kuhn; esp. Wenham).

See also CHRISTOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; JESUS AND PAUL; JUSTIFICATION; KINGDOM OF GOD/CHRIST; LAW; LORD'S SUPPER; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; RESURRECTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS/RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison, "The Pauline Epistles and the Synoptic Gospels: the Pattern of the Parallels," NTS 28 (1982) 1-32; F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977) 95-112; C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, Vol. 2 (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1979); N. Dahl, "The Doctrine of Justification: Its Social Function and Implications," in Studies in Paul: Theology for the Early Christian Mission (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977) 95-120; D. L. Dungan, The Sayings of Jesus in the Churches of Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); J. D. G. Dunn, "Mark 2.1—3.6: A Bridge between Jesus and Paul on the Question of the Law," in Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 10-31; E. E. Ellis, "Traditions in 1 Corinthians," NTS 32 (1982) 481-502; B. Gerhardsson, "The Path of the Gospel Tradition," in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. P. Stuhlmacher (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991) 75-96; L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament, Vol 2 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); R. H. Gundry, "The Hellenization of Dominical Tradition and Christianization of Jewish Tradition in the Eschatology of 1-2 Thessalonians," NTS 33 (1987) 161-78; G. Haufe, "Reich Gottes bei Paulus und in der Jesustradition," NTS 31 (1985) 467-72; M. Hengel, "Between Jesus and Paul: The 'Hellenists', the 'Seven' and Stephen (Acts 6.1-15; 7.54-8.3)," in Between Jesus and Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 1-29; idem, "Der Ursprünge der christliche Mission," NTS 18 (1971) 15-38 (= "The Origins of the Christian Mission," in Between Jesus and Paul [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983] 48-64); T. Holtz, "Tradition im 1. Thessalonicherbrief," in Die Mitte des NT, ed. U. Luz and H. Weder (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983); E. Jüngel, Paulus und Jesus: eine Untersuchung zur Präzisierung der Frage nach dem Ursprung der Christologie (HUT 2; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1962); E. Käsemann, Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); idem, "A Critical Analysis of Philippians 2:5-11," in God and Christ (New York: Harper & Row, 1968) 45-88; S. Kim, "Jesus—the Son of God, the Stone, the Son of Man and the Servant: the Role of Zechariah in the Self-Identification of Jesus," in Tradition and Interpretation, FS E. E. Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 134-48; idem, "Jesus' Kingdom Preaching and Christian Politics," [in Korean] Presbyterian Theological Quarterly 222 (1989) 6-49; K. T. Kleinknecht, Der leidende Gerechtfertigte: die alttestamentlich-jüdische Tradition vom 'leidenden Gerechten' und ihre Rezeption bei Paulus (WUNT 2.13; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1984); H. W. Kuhn, "Der irdische Jesus bei Paulus als traditionsgeschichtliches und theologisches Problem," ZTK 67 (1970) 295-320; R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii.5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship (SNTSMS 4; Cambridge: University Press, 1967); H. Merkel, "Die Gottesherrschaft in der Verkündigung Jesu," Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult, ed. M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); F. Neirynck, "Paul and the Sayings of Jesus," in Apôtre Paul, ed. A. Vanhoye (Leuven, 1986) 265-321; J. Piper, 'Love Your Enemies': Jesus' Love Command in the Synoptic Gospels and the Early Christian Paraenesis (SNTSMS 38; Cambridge: University Press, 1979); H. Räisänen, "Zur Herkunft von Markus 7,15," in The Torah and Christ (Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society, 1986) 209-18; P. Richardson, "The Thunderbolt in Q and the Wise Man in Corinth," in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of F. W. Beare (Waterloo: W. Laurier University, 1984) 91-111; P. Richardson and P. Gooch, "Logia of Jesus in 1 Corinthians," in Gospels Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1985) 39-62; H. Schürmann, " 'Das Gesetz des Christus' (Gal 6,2): Jesu Verhalten und Wort als letztgültige sittliche Norm nach Paulus," in Neues Testament und Kirche, ed. J. Gnilka (Freiburg: Herder, 1974) 282-300; P. Stuhlmacher, "Jesustradition im Romerbrief?," Theologische Beiträge 14 (1983) 240-50; E. Schweizer, "1.Korinther 15, 20-28 als Zeugnis paulinischer Eschatologie und ihrer Verwandtschaft mit der Verkündigung Jesu," in Jesus und Paulus, ed. E. E. Ellis and E. Grässer (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975) 301-14; M. Thompson, Clothed with Christ (JSNTSS 59; Sheffield: JSOT, 1991); N. Walter, "Paul and the Early Christian Jesus-Tradition," in Paul and Jesus, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn and C. Wolff (JSNTSS 37; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 51-80; A. J. M. Wedderburn, "Paul and Jesus: the Problem of Continuity," in Paul and Jesus, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn and C. Wolff (JSNTSS 37; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 99-115; idem, "Paul and Jesus: Similarity and Continuity," in Paul and Jesus, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn and C. Wolff (JSNTSS 37; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 117-43; D. Wenham, "Paul's Use of the Jesus Tradition: Three Samples," in Gospel Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1985) 7-37; idem, Gospel Perspectives 4: The Rediscovery of Jesus' Eschatological Discourse (Sheffield: JSOT, 1984); C. Wolff, "Humility and Self-Denial in Jesus' Life and Message and in the Apostolic Existence of Paul," in Paul and Jesus, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn and C. Wolff (JSNTSS 37; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 145-60.

S. Kim

JESUS AND PAUL

The relationship between Jesus and Paul poses a historical question with huge theological ramifications. Is Paul's theology in harmony and continuity with the teaching and ministry of Jesus, or is there an unbridgeable gulf between them? It is generally held that, if it is to merit the title "Christian," the Christian religion must be recognizably continuous with Jesus' message and the impact of his activity. Yet, both at a popular and at a scholarly level, many would argue that Paul, our earliest Christian witness, departed significantly from the message of Jesus and introduced an alien system of theology. This raises many important historical questions; but, since Paul has been so influential in later Christianity, it also constitutes a major theological challenge.

1. History of the Debate
2. The Teaching of Jesus in Paul
3. The Life of Jesus and His Example
4. Letters and Missionary Preaching
5. Revelation and Tradition
6. The Kingdom of God
7. Israel and the Law
8. Sinners, Outsiders and the Mercy of God
9. Suffering, the Cross and Vindication
10. Continuity and Development

1. History of the Debate.

1.1. Before 1914.

1.1.1. Ferdinand Christian Baur. When F. C. Baur opened the modern era of Pauline studies in the nineteenth century, he argued that rigorous historical analysis of the NT indicated that there were significant differences among the various branches of the early Christian church. In particular he emphasized the differences between Paul on the one hand and the Jerusalem* apostles and Palestinian churches on the other. The latter were more influenced by, and more faithful to, the original teaching of Jesus while Paul was consciously independent of such traditions and differed widely from the teaching of Jesus, particularly in his christology* and in relation to the validity of the Law.*

The questions raised by this thesis were discussed in various forms but became the center of an extremely lively debate in the twenty years preceding the First World War. The "Jesus and Paul" question became in these years a focal point of discussion both at an academic and at a popular level, as a number of scholars in Germany and France (H. H. Wendt, M. Goguel, M. Brückner, P. Wernle) suggested that there was a very significant gulf between the teaching of Jesus and the theology of Paul. Some also argued that, for all his organizational and intellectual gifts, Paul should not be allowed to obscure the essential religious truths expressed by Jesus. "Back from Paul to Jesus" became the slogan of such radical critics. Such views were highly alarming both to traditional believers and to liberal Protestant theologians whose theological commitments depended on a synthesis of the teaching of Jesus and Paul.

1.1.2. William Wrede. This controversy became most sharply focused through the publication in 1904 of W. Wrede's Paul, a popular book, brilliantly composed and presenting the radical position with provocative force. Wrede argued that Paul's theology represented a religion of redemption whose centerpiece is the notion of a superhuman being (the Son of God) entering the world in order to break the hold of the powers which keep it in slavery. This theological structure, a system of ideas which he inherited preformed from apocalyptic* Judaism, Paul merged with the story of the death (see Crucifixion) and resurrection* of Jesus. What was significant both in Paul's own religious experience and in his system of thought was not the life and teaching of Jesus but only the fact that Jesus was a man, that he died and was raised. Thus, as representative of humanity, Christ* effected an "objective" salvation,* now mediated to those who believe these dogmas and take part in the sacraments.

Wrede insisted that this thought structure was entirely alien to current theological emphases on individual piety and, more particularly, was in a different world altogether from the simple prophetic style of Jesus and the pure moral truths he had so memorably pronounced. Paul's conversion had been through an encounter with the risen Christ, not the earthly Jesus, and indeed, he was only able to describe Christ as a divine figure because he had not known Jesus. For all the points on which Paul and Jesus might agree, and however much Paul may have known about the teaching of Jesus, Paul was not deeply influenced either by the personality of Jesus or by the spirit of his thought. In all important respects, the theological system basic to Paul's thought was worlds apart from Jesus. Thus Wrede reached his oft-quoted conclusion that "Paul is to be regarded as the second founder of Christianity" (Wrede, 179). While Paul rescued the Christian faith from "pining away as a Jewish sect" he did so only by transforming it. One can readily appreciate the theological dynamite packed into this conclusion. The dilemma which it poses for Christian theology is encapsulated in Wrede's observation that "this second founder of Christianity has even, compared with the first, exercised beyond all doubt the stronger—not the better—influence" (Wrede, 180).

1.1.3. Response to Wrede. The response to Wrede and to similar radical views was vigorous, both from liberal Protestant theologians in Germany (A. von Harnack, A. Jülicher, A. Resch) and from more conservative voices in the English-speaking world (J. Moffatt, C. A. A. Scott, J. G. Machen). Among the common lines of defense were the following: (1) Paul knew a lot more of the teaching of Jesus than we are inclined to acknowledge and alludes to it often, even if he quotes it rarely. (2) Although Paul rarely refers to the life of Jesus in his letters, the salient facts and even the personality of Jesus must have figured largely in his initial missionary preaching. (3) The supposed gulf between Jesus and Paul in matters of theology has been greatly exaggerated; for instance, Jesus' attitude to the Law was, in his own way, just as critical as Paul's and the implicit christology in his claims is not that far distant from the explicit divine titles and roles accorded him by Paul. (4) In many aspects of their theology Jesus and Paul were entirely at one, for instance, in their doctrine of the fatherly love* of God,* in their perception of eschatology* and in their ethics.* It could be argued that these were the kernel of the Christian religion and that any remaining differences were on merely peripheral matters. (5) It was argued by some that even if Paul's theology was different from that of Jesus, in his religious experience he was at one with the spirit of Christ and showed clear signs of the influence of the personality of Jesus. (6) Finally, a variety of explanations could be put forward for the difference of atmosphere between the Gospels and the Pauline letters: Paul's rabbinic training (see Jew, Paul the), his different personal experience, the needs of the Gentile* mission* and of the battle against Judaizers,* as well as the obvious fact that Paul inevitably views Christ from, as it were, the other side of the cross and resurrection. All these were appealed to as factors of purely external significance, not materially affecting the substance of the inner unity between Paul and Jesus.

By such means there was mounted a strenuous rebuttal of the notion of Paul as "second founder" of Christianity and any implication that he had perverted or substantially altered the gospel announced by Jesus. In the kernel of their thought, Jesus and Paul are in harmony and any development from Jesus to Paul constitutes no more than legitimate interpretation and explication.

1.1.4. Wilhelm Heitmüller and Albert Schweitzer. Just before the interruption caused by the First World War, two further contributions heralded important aspects of the debate in its next phases. In 1912 W. Heitmüller probed the question of the Christian sources of influence on Paul's thinking. Whereas previously Paul had been treated largely as an isolated figure, or as drawing what information he had about Jesus from the primitive Palestinian communities, Heitmüller drew attention to the Hellenistic Christian circles in which Paul was nurtured as a Christian, and suggested that his relative neglect of the words and deeds of Jesus was not just an idiosyncrasy but was characteristic of the Hellenized forms of the Christian movement. This not only reinforced those in the history-of-religions school who argued that the really decisive influences on Paul's thought came not from Judaism but from Hellenistic culture. It also pinpointed an important issue in the historical question of continuity between Jesus and Paul: if the Hellenized wing of the early Christian movement already put more emphasis on the risen Lord* than the earthly teacher, the problem cannot simply be framed as "Jesus and Paul" but must incorporate study of this third shadowy entity, "Hellenistic Christianity."

By contrast, in his survey of Pauline scholarship, Paul and his Interpreters (1911), A. Schweitzer supported those who discerned the influence of Jewish apocalyptic on Paul. His interpretation of Paul's theology as molded by eschatological "mysticism" was not published until many years later (The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, 1930), but already in his earlier survey it is clear that he considered Paul's thought to be fully explicable from its parallels in Jewish apocalyptic sources. The significance of this is that in his famous Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906) Schweitzer had demolished all the liberal attempts to write a biography of Jesus and had presented Jesus not as the spokesperson for liberal piety and morality but as an apocalyptic prophet working within a rigorous apocalyptic timetable. Schweitzer thus suggested a quite different solution to the "Jesus and Paul" question. Instead of the gulf between the liberal Jesus and a Hellenized (or an apocalyptic) Paul, Schweitzer suggested a relatively easy transition from the apocalyptic Jesus to an apocalyptic Paul, separated only by the fact that the eschatological events, to which Jesus had looked forward, Paul now saw as having at least begun in the resurrection of the Messiah.

1.1.5. Which Jesus and Which Paul? These contributions at the end of this period of fierce controversy serve to highlight one of its essential underlying problems. In any comparison between Jesus and Paul and any attempt to suggest continuities or correspondences between them, everything will depend on which Jesus is being compared with which Paul. Critical questions about the validity of the gospel material as evidence for the historical Jesus continued to be discussed (the majority discounted John but put confidence in Mark's Gospel); yet most of the participants in the mainstream of this debate took it as axiomatic that the real Jesus was the Jesus of liberal theology, who preached simple but profound moral truths, and highlighted in particular the "fatherhood" of God, the "brotherhood" of all humanity and the infinite value of the human soul. The essence of Christianity (and of religion in general) was contained in Jesus' call for the trusting devotion of the human soul in its God. With this Jesus on one side of the equation, it was simply a matter of arguing whether Paul, in his religion or his theology, had substantially altered or appropriately developed this essential religious vision. When Schweitzer (and J. Weiss) began to shake the foundations of the liberal picture of the historical Jesus, new possibilities for understanding the relationship between Jesus and Paul began to open up.

1.2. Rudolf Bultmann. In the next phase of the discussion, from the First World War to the 1950s, R. Bultmann's contributions were of decisive importance. As a major participant in the post-war theological backlash against liberal theology, he moved the debate forward in several significant ways, both in his multifarious individual works on Jesus and Paul and in two seminal essays specifically on the "Jesus and Paul" question.

1.2.1. Bultmann's Jesus. Bultmann shared Schweitzer's perception of Jesus as an apocalyptic preacher, who proclaimed the imminent arrival of the kingdom of God. In his form-critical work on the Gospels Bultmann cast doubt on the historicity of much of the material, arguing that the Gospel accounts had been heavily influenced by the faith of the church in the period of oral transmission, as well as by the interests of the individual Gospel writers. This made it impossible, in his view, to reconstruct a convincing portrait of the personality of Jesus or the sequence of events in his life. But (contrary to popular opinion) Bultmann was still confident that he could draw the main contours of the message of Jesus; and that proclamation he saw as decisively molded by an eschatological outlook. The kingdom of God was not a matter of God's rule in the soul (Harnack) but described the moment when God would bring the corrupt world to an end. Jesus thus portrayed God in radical terms as creator and judge and his apocalyptic language could not be dismissed as mere "husk"; thus "whoever finds Paul offensive and uncanny must find Jesus equally so!" (Bultmann 1936, 194).

1.2.2. Material Congruity with Paul. In his interpretation of the proclamation of Jesus, Bultmann broke decisively with the liberal emphasis on ethics and on Jesus as a teacher of timeless and universal truths. In probing the meaning of Jesus' eschatological message, and the human situation portrayed in it, Bultmann saw Jesus as issuing a summons, a call to radical obedience. He took Jesus' critique of the Pharisees to represent an attack on any "legalism" which required only partial or external obedience. In his absolute demands Jesus calls for the total dedication of the self to the will of God as the individual surrenders his/her previous self-satisfaction. Moreover, he saw here a real point of correspondence with Paul's theology. At the center of Paul's critique of the Law and in his theology of the cross (see Cross, Theology of the), Bultmann saw a penetrating attack on Jewish legalism and on any attempt to secure salvation from purely human resources. "The real sin of man is that he himself takes his will and his life into his own hands, makes himself secure and so has his self-confidence, his 'boast.' " (Bultmann 1929, 228). Thus, with interpretative insights derived from existential philosophy, Bultmann detected a material (sachliche) congruity between Jesus and Paul in their understanding of the human condition, even though Paul's theology was more theoretically explicated than that of Jesus. Even in christology Bultmann saw some element of similarity, since Jesus, although he "did not demand faith in his own person, did demand faith in his word. That is, he made his appearance in the consciousness that God had sent him in the last hour of the world" (Bultmann 1936, 195). It was thus inevitable that the proclaimer should become the proclaimed. The only difference (though it is significant) is that what Jesus proclaimed as an imminent act of God, Paul preached as an accomplished work of salvation.

1.2.3. Historical Continuity? Bultmann made an extremely important distinction between two aspects of the "Jesus and Paul" debate. It is one question to ask what correspondence there may be between the proclamation of Jesus and the preaching of Paul; it is quite another to inquire if Paul was, either directly or indirectly, influenced by the teaching of Jesus. In regard to this latter question Bultmann saw very little historical connection between Jesus and Paul. He emphasized how little Paul quotes of the words of Jesus and that, even if one allows for all possible allusions, they affect only Paul's ethics*: "it is most obvious that he does not appeal to the words of the Lord in support of his strictly theological, anthropological and soteriological views" in which are contained "the essentially Pauline conceptions" (Bultmann 1929, 223). In such respects Paul is not dependent on Jesus, and "Jesus' teaching is—at least in essentials—irrelevant for Paul." Thus while he saw some important elements of theological congruity between the proclamation of Jesus and the kerygma of Paul, Bultmann found very little by way of historical continuity between them.

1.2.4. The Historical Jesus and the Kerygma. Bultmann's treatment of our theme also made one further significant contribution. He took the "Jesus and Paul" question to be representative of a wider theological issue, namely, the relationship between the historical Jesus and the preaching of the church. This issue had been vigorously pressed back in 1892 in M. Kähler's protest against the liberal lives of Jesus—that they attempted to substitute for the Christ of the church's faith a pale, historically uncertain and theologically irrelevant Jesus of history. As a "theologian of the word" Bultmann shared Kähler's conviction that the Reformation principle of "justification by faith" should be applied to theological method: theological truths could never be validated by the limited and insecure results of historical research but were secured by faith alone. Christian theology therefore could never confine itself to, or even take its starting point from, scholars' tentative reconstructions of the historical Jesus. The starting point is always the kerygma—that the crucified Christ was raised from the dead and is to be acknowledged as Lord (see Preaching, Kerygma).

Bultmann's interpretation of the NT gave strong support to this theology. In particular he argued that the lack of reference in Paul to the life and teaching of Jesus indicated that the only thing concerning the historical Jesus which was significant for the church's preaching and faith was that Jesus, the crucified one, was a historical fact: everything else that was important about him theologically (e.g., that he died for us, that he was the pre-existent* Son of God [see Son of God] and that he is Lord*) was established by the resurrection and by the preaching of the church, not by the facts and events of Jesus' historical life. The significance of the historical Jesus for faith was simply that he lived (Dass), not how he lived (Was). In Paul's theology "one does not acquire knowledge about the Messiah: one either acknowledges him or repudiates him" (Bultmann 1929, 236). If Jesus is teacher or example, that is only as he is already acknowledged as Lord—"it is not the exemplary character of the historical Jesus that makes him Lord" (Bultmann 1929, 239). Thus Bultmann considered the radical cry—"Back from Paul to Jesus"—theologically dubious. "All that one can do is to go to Jesus through Paul: i.e., one is asked by Paul whether he is willing to understand God's act in Christ as the event that has decided and now decides with respect both to the world and to us" (Bultmann 1936, 201).

1.2.5. Bultmann's Significance. In this way Bultmann tackled the question of "Jesus and Paul" not merely at the historical level (how much was Paul actually informed about, or influenced by, or in agreement with Jesus) but also in the context of the larger theological issue of the relationship between the historical Jesus and Christian faith. It is the massive significance of this theological question, and the radical way it was posed and answered by Bultmann, which made his contributions to the debate so important.

It is worth emphasizing also the value of his distinction between historical continuity between Jesus and Paul and theological congruity. Much of the discussion of the "Jesus and Paul" issue before Bultmann had confused these two matters, and some debate since has failed to heed his distinction. It has been easily assumed, for instance, that if agreements in motif or vocabulary between Jesus and Paul can be found which suggest some lines of continuity (e.g., that Paul drew on traditions of the teaching of Jesus in ethics or eschatology), that in itself is proof of close correspondence in their theological perspectives. As NT scholars have learned from many other areas of study, even if parallels are found between two sources, and even if those parallels represent dependence by one upon the other (they sometimes do not), these can be no more than surface phenomena which mask deep differences in the underlying structure of thought. Conversely, as Bultmann himself argued, significant congruity between the thought of Jesus and Paul need not imply continuity in the simple historical sense of traditions about Jesus being passed on to, and received by, Paul. One could still press a historical question as to how such remarkable congruity came about (Bultmann never addresses this), and it would be unwise to separate totally the questions of continuity and congruity. But there is nonetheless considerable value in recognizing the distinction between them.

1.3. From the 1950s to the Present Day. Bultmann's dominant position in German NT scholarship had the effect of depressing interest in the historical Jesus. Historically he cast doubt on our ability to recover anything like a rounded picture of the Jesus of history and theologically he considered that, in any case, the results would be largely irrelevant as far as the kerygma was concerned. But when he emphasized these points in a lecture in 1960 he was obliged to defend his position against a contrary trend already gaining ground even among his own pupils. The tide had begun to turn, and it was bound to bring in with it a renewed interest in the old question of Jesus and Paul.

1.3.1. Joachim Jeremias. From the 1930s onward, resolutely independent of the Bultmannian school, J. Jeremias had been pursuing fresh and highly successful research on the historical Jesus. He believed that it was possible to recover the central facts about Jesus and even, in some cases, his ipsissima verba ("very words"); he also considered that the Jesus thus recovered was, in his consciousness of his status (as seen in the distinctive Abba), in his break with the Law and in his redemptive interpretation of his death, entirely at one with later Christian preaching about him. In particular, Jeremias detected a crucial point of similarity between the Jesus who gave a welcome to sinners and outcasts and the Paul who preached the justification* of the ungodly through the grace* of God.

1.3.2. Werner G. Kümmel. At the same time W. G. Kümmel kept the "Jesus and Paul" issue alive with important essays on the theme. While considerably influenced by Bultmann's position, and largely agreeing with him on Paul's lack of information about the life and teaching of Jesus, Kümmel analyzed the congruity between Jesus and Paul in terms less dependent on existentialist philosophy. In particular he argued that for Jesus the kingdom was not purely future but was already breaking in during his ministry. Whereas Bultmann (following Schweitzer) had seen an important distinction between Jesus pointing to the imminent future and Paul pointing to the immediate past, Kümmel saw both Jesus and Paul as conditioned by a very similar tension between the presence of salvation and its future fulfillment (see Eschatology). The resurrection and the gift of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) merely widened the effect of the salvation already present in Jesus—and present not just in his word (Bultmann) but in his person. Thus for all the differences in formulation between Jesus' preaching and Paul's, Kümmel insisted that Paul's theology represents no fundamental alteration or falsification of the teaching of Jesus, but only a proper reformulation of its fundamental ideas.

1.3.3. The New Quest. However, the "Jesus and Paul" debate could only take on new life with a widespread revival of research on Jesus. The 1950s saw renewed interest in the historical Jesus springing up even among Bultmann's pupils, most notably E. Fuchs, G. Bornkamm and E. Käsemann. While remaining true to the "kerygmatic" principle that the gospel can never be dependent on the uncertain results of historical research, Käsemann made out a powerful exegetical and theological case for what became known as the new quest for the historical Jesus. He warned against the dangers of "docetism" if the Christ preached in the gospel is not firmly linked to the historical Jesus and argued that Bultmann's reduction of this link to the mere historical existence of Jesus was too meager. If Christian scholars did not investigate the character of Jesus' ministry, others certainly would. More importantly, the Synoptic Gospels showed that an important strand of early Christianity did attempt to tie its preaching of the gospel to a life story of Jesus; and even if Paul's kerygma has much less interest in such things, it does focus on the earthly Jesus inasmuch as it emphasizes his crucifixion. Only in this way could Paul combat the Spirit enthusiasm of his converts, for he soon discovered in Corinth that an appeal to the Spirit alone was vulnerable to all sorts of misinterpretations (see Corinthians). Thus research into the historical Jesus, while certainly not providing a historical basis for faith, is important as a criterion for distinguishing the true gospel from falsifications of it. In particular, Käsemann's own interpretation of the historical Jesus as one who broke in a decisive way with the Law and removed the distinction between sacred and secular realms gave support for his emphasis on the radical political and social significance of the gospel.

1.3.4. Eberhard Jüngel. Although the new quest of the 1950s and 1960s had rather limited results, it did open up again the historical questions about Jesus and thus serve to raise afresh the question of the relationship between Jesus and Paul. The most immediate result was a new presentation of the congruity between Paul and Jesus by E. Jüngel (1962). With a skillful combination of NT exegesis and theological expertise, and drawing effectively on the "new hermeneutic" of his mentor E. Fuchs, Jüngel compared the understanding of the kingdom of God which comes to expression in the parables with Paul's central theological affirmations about the righteousness* of God. For all their differences as forms of speech, Jüngel detected an essential correspondence here: just as in the parables, as "speech-events," God and his kingdom draw near to history and establish a new word over against the old word of the Law, so Paul preaches the arrival of a new era which releases us from the slavery of the Law and from the bondage of the past.

1.3.5. Omissions and Problems in the Last Thirty Years. The abstract character of Jüngel's thesis has perhaps made his work more accessible to theologians than to NT specialists. But it is remarkable that there has been virtually no new work on the question of theological congruity between Paul and Jesus in the thirty years since Jüngel's book. The reasons for this neglect are complex but certainly include the following:

(1) In general there has been a parting of the ways between theology and NT study. The theological dimensions of our topic which were so important to Bultmann and his immediate successors have simply eluded or failed to interest most recent NT scholars. At the same time theology has taken much less interest in the NT.

(2) To discuss the congruity between Jesus and Paul requires an analysis of their theologies which can isolate the dominant motifs and discern, within and behind these, the central dimensions of their thought. But in the present climate a large degree of uncertainty prevails concerning such matters regarding both Paul and Jesus.

The Reformation interpretation of Paul, dominant in Germany and also in evangelical theology elsewhere, has long identified justification as the heart of Paul's theology, understanding his critique of the Law as an attack on any attempt of the individual to earn his/her own righteousness. At present, however, under the influence of K. Stendahl and E. P. Sanders, it is now highly debatable whether justification by faith is so easily to be identified as the center of Paul's thought and whether its thrust is to be understood in such individualistic terms (see Justification; Center of Paul's Theology). The last decade in particular has seen a considerable debate on Paul's theology of the Law in which many influential voices present Paul's thought as confused, or wholly confined to issues of practical significance in his Gentile mission. This leaves significantly fewer scholars than in previous generations who are confident about the central dynamic of Paul's theology and thus able to compare this with the central concerns of Jesus.

Meanwhile, although research on the historical Jesus has gained a new lease on life, it has largely cut loose from theological interests—in contrast to the close connections between the "old quest" and liberalism on the one hand and the "new quest" and Protestant existentialism on the other. Thus although there have been substantial advances made in recent years on the historical context of Jesus' ministry and the analogies between his impact on Israel and that of contemporary first-century Palestinian movements (e.g., by J. K. Riches, A. E. Harvey, G. Theissen, M. Hengel, M. J. Borg, E. P. Sanders), these have rarely been accompanied by the sort of theological engagement which seeks to pinpoint the core of Jesus' message and purpose. Although some consensus is emerging on the limits of a plausible picture of Jesus, there is continuing scholarly uncertainty about the authenticity of the sayings material in the Gospels and a large measure of disagreement about the extent to which Jesus challenged central aspects of Judaism. In particular, Sanders has forced a reconsideration of the two points at which Jesus' distinctive message has been most commonly discerned—his critique of the Law and his welcome of sinners. Although many would take issue with Sanders on this, most agree that the decisive questions in relation to the historical Jesus concern his purpose in relation to Israel, and his impact on the religious, cultural and political complex of Palestinian Judaism.

But the more Jesus' life and preaching are placed within his Palestinian context, the harder it appears to find significant points of correspondence with the theology of Paul, which was forged in the light of the cross and resurrection and in the context of the Gentile mission. In fact, the present trend of NT scholarship is largely hostile toward the creation of theological syntheses in general, and any synthesis between Jesus and Paul in particular. It is the diversity, rather than the unity, of the NT which attracts most attention, and there is a general distaste for what are seen as apologetic attempts to paper over the cracks.

The conviction of many Jewish scholars—that Jesus can be accommodated within Judaism, but Paul cannot—was famously propounded in the middle of the century by J. Klausner, and has since been reiterated by G. Vermes and others. Although most Pauline scholars would resist the implication that Paul has been decisively influenced by non-Jewish (mystery-religion [see Religions] or Gnostic [see Gnosis, Gnosticism]) ideas, there is still a general willingness to concede that between the worldview of Jesus and that of Paul there is a considerable gulf. Whereas previous generations were concerned to rebuff Jewish arguments that Christianity was corrupted by Paul, the prevailing atmosphere of pluralism and of sympathetic sensitivity to Jewish perspectives has made Christian scholars altogether less urgent and less polemical in their treatment of this issue.

1.3.6. Progress in the Last Thirty Years. If the last three decades have seen little attempt to explore the possible congruity between the messages of Jesus and Paul, there has been considerable attention paid to the question of historical continuity. In the first place, there has been renewed interest in the question of Paul's use of traditions about (and from) the historical Jesus. The conservative British school of thought had been maintained in W. D. Davies' influential Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (1948) in which he deduced from the quotations and allusions in Paul's letters that "Paul is steeped in the mind and words of his Lord" (Davies, 140). This was supplemented by the researches of the Scandinavian school (H. Riesenfeld, B. Gerhardsson) which stressed the careful preservation of Jesus material in the first generation. In the case of Paul, much hinges on the detection and evaluation of allusions to the teaching of Jesus. D. L. Dungan's careful analysis of The Sayings of Jesus in the Churches of Paul (1971) examined Paul's allusive use of the sayings of Jesus in 1 Corinthians 7:10 and 9:14, and suggested that the Corinthians were already familiar with such material and that there could be many other places where Paul alludes to Jesus' teaching. This has encouraged scholars to pursue further the question of Paul's dependence on eschatological material originating from Jesus and the possibility that Paul knows not just isolated sayings but whole blocks of material (D. Wenham, D. C. Allison, P. Stuhlmacher). New work on the character of echoes and allusions and the proper method for detecting them is being undertaken (M. Thompson), although it must also be acknowledged that a large number of scholars consider this whole enterprise as so fraught with uncertainty as to be of very limited significance.

The second aspect of continuity which presently commands attention is the question of the channel through which Jesus tradition could reach Paul. Most acknowledge that Paul's contact with the immediate disciples of Jesus in the Palestinian churches was not extensive, although argument continues over the proper evaluation of Paul's first meeting with Peter (Gal 1:18). More interest focuses on "the Hellenists," the radical Jewish-Christian group represented by Stephen and Barnabas, who were expelled from Jerusalem, became the target of Paul's persecution and seem to have been the most important influence upon him after his conversion. It is generally accepted that if there is any "bridge" between Jesus and Paul it must lie here. But we are hampered by our lack of direct and reliable evidence about this group. If, in historical terms, the "Jesus and Paul" question cannot be discussed without reference to the "early church" as a third entity, it is frustrating that it is precisely this decisive early period and this crucial "Hellenist" branch of the church which remain so shadowy.

2. The Teaching of Jesus in Paul.

As we have seen, there has been considerable debate about the extent and significance of Paul's use of the teaching of Jesus (see Jesus, Sayings of). There is no dispute about the occasions on which Paul explicitly quotes the words of Jesus (e.g., 1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; 11:23; 1 Thess 4:15—though the origin of this is uncertain). The argument generally focuses on the question whether in other places, where we can detect parallels with the Gospels, Paul is alluding to or echoing the teaching of Jesus (e.g., the cluster of possible allusions in Rom 12—14). Naturally, those who emphasize the gulf between Jesus and Paul minimize the number of plausible allusions; and those who see a close relation between them tend toward a maximalist reading. Of course, within the wider debate the issue is not just the number of occasions on which Paul quotes or alludes to Jesus' teaching. It also concerns the significance which Paul attaches to the teaching of Jesus. Do the words of Jesus carry a special authority? If he does allude to them, why are they so often mixed in with other material and not specifically identified as the words of Jesus? Further, what significance would Paul's christology give to Jesus as a moral teacher?

3. The Life of Jesus and His Example.

The number of facts about Jesus' life which we could glean from Paul's letters is not large: that he was born and lived under the Law (Gal 4:4); that he was of the line of David (Rom 1:3); that he had brothers, one of whom was called James (1 Cor 9:5; Gal 1:19); that he had a meal on the night he was betrayed at which he used certain words (1 Cor 11:23-25). There is no reference to the baptism of Jesus, to his many miracles and parables, to the disputes with Pharisees, the Transfiguration or the Temple incident; there is no indication of the setting of Jesus' ministry, no references to Galilee or Jerusalem. The only facts about Jesus which are constantly referred to are that he was crucified and that he was raised, although even here we must note the absence of detail about time, place and attendant circumstances. The mere fact of Christ crucified seems so to dominate Paul's perspective that everything else recedes into the background.

The cross is also central to Paul's depiction of Jesus' character and his moral example. There are references to the gentleness and meekness of Jesus (2 Cor 10:1) and to his love (Gal 2:20); but these general character traits are illustrated not by any incidents in his life or by his treatment of others but by his self-giving on the cross. When Paul refers to the obedience of Christ (Rom 5:19; Phil 2:5-9) or to his grace in making himself poor (2 Cor 8:9), it appears that he has in mind the whole drama of the Incarnation and the cross (see Christology), rather than any specifiable event in his life. And it is probably significant that in referring to the example of Jesus in bearing the burdens of others (Rom 15:3) Paul refers not to any words or deeds of Jesus but to the depiction in the Psalms of the suffering of the righteous.

All this suggests that it would be incorrect to claim that Paul was wholly ignorant of, or uninterested in, the life of the earthly Jesus. But his mind operates in terms of general characteristics rather than specific narratives, and he is concerned to bring out the significance of the story of Jesus as a whole, interpreted in the light of the Scriptures. Alongside the references to his own example, Paul does appeal to the figure of Jesus as an example of obedience, self-giving and love. For instance, despite the objections of some scholars, part of Paul's purpose in citing the hymn in Philippians 2:5-11 does seem to be to provide a moral example (see Imitation; Hymns). However, one may observe that such a generalized depiction of virtue is sometimes not as effective in moral exhortation as the dramatic narrative which illustrates the point. Other religious and philosophical groups in the Greco-Roman world cultivated stories of heroes (e.g., Moses, Pythagoras, Diogenes, Socrates) whose lives encapsulated the truths they propounded. One can thus understand the need for, and the popularity of, the detailed Gospel narratives alongside the generalized outlines provided by Paul.

4. Letters and Missionary Preaching.

Thus far we have been discussing the evidence of Paul's letters. But it is obvious that these provide only a partial picture of Paul's thought, and it has often been suggested that Paul may (or even "must") have provided a much fuller picture of the life and ministry of Jesus when he carried out his initial evangelism. To draw broad conclusions from the letters alone would thus be misleading. It has been suggested that the genre of a letter in itself precludes the provision of detailed narratives, and the contrast between the Gospel and the letters of John is sometimes cited as a parallel here. There is also the general consideration that one would expect any preaching of Christ crucified to provoke requests for fuller information both from interested and from hostile audiences.

The problem here is our lack of evidence for the original preaching of Paul. Although Acts gives some of his sermons, scholars continue to debate how much these can be taken as evidence for Paul's preaching and the extent of their recasting by Luke; in any case, even the speech at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16-41) provides very scanty information about the earthly Jesus. In his letters Paul does occasionally refer to the terms of his initial preaching (1 Thess 1:9-10; 1 Cor 2:2), but he does not give any hint of a fuller account of the life of Jesus. Further, in Romans, which Paul writes to a church he did not found and which sets out fully the gospel he preaches, there is none of the expected detail on the life of Jesus. Of course to argue that Paul rarely referred to the life of Jesus because he does not say much about it in his letters is to argue from silence; and arguments from silence are always slightly precarious. Yet to assert that Paul did know much more than he says in his letters, and thus to have to provide one hypothesis or another to explain his silence, is perhaps an even more precarious procedure.

5. Revelation and Tradition.

There is an interesting contrast between Galatians 1 and 1 Corinthians 15 in the way Paul describes the origins of his gospel.* In Galatians 1 he insists on his independence from all human authorities and in particular from the apostles in Jerusalem. He suggests that his call and his gospel were received directly through a revelation from Christ (see Conversion and Call) and that it was only some three years later that he had occasion to meet Peter.* In 1 Corinthians 15, however, he reminds the Corinthians of the creedal formula he had passed on to them concerning the death and resurrection of Christ, and says that he had himself received this piece of tradition.* In this latter case we see Paul as one who inherits and treasures traditions from those who were Christians before him, including Palestinian eyewitnesses of the resurrection; while in Galatians all the emphasis lies on what he himself has experienced in his call-revelation. The two passages thereby suggest different perceptions of how much Paul would be concerned to find out, and pass on, information about the earthly Jesus.

It would obviously be a mistake to set these two self-portraits in any absolute antithesis. In both passages rhetorical considerations explain a certain onesidedness in Paul's presentation. It would be wrong to conclude from Galatians that Paul was averse to, or embarrassed by, information about the historical Jesus. As C. H. Dodd once quipped, it is hardly likely that at their initial meeting Peter and Paul spent a fortnight talking about the weather (Gal 1:18)! Yet it is also clear that Paul is extremely self-conscious about the manner of his calling. As one who had not seen or followed the earthly Jesus, his authority could only rest on the visionary calling he received on the Damascus Road. There he encountered the risen Christ, whose crucifixion he had previously counted the chief scandal to Jews like himself (see Jew, Paul the). It is understandable, then, that it is these facts about Christ, his crucifixion and resurrection, rather than details of his teaching or ministry,* which impressed themselves most on Paul's mind.

Another verse often referred to in this connection is 2 Corinthians 5:16 where Paul writes: "So from now on we regard no one from a human point of view (kata sarka); even if we once knew Christ from a human perspective (ei kai egnōkamen kata sarka Christon), we know him thus no longer." For a while this verse became a central text in the Jesus-Paul debate, particularly since Bultmann interpreted it to support his view that Paul had little interest in the life of the earthly Jesus. Detailed discussion of whether the phrase kata sarka should go with the noun or the verb tended to obscure the fact that what is said here of Christ is said in the first half of the verse of everyone. One could hardly say that Paul was uninterested in the natural life and circumstances of everyone he encountered! Yet it is also clear in the context (with its talk of dying with Christ [see Dying and Rising] and of the new creation in Christ [see Creation and New Creation]) that Paul's perspective on everyone, including Christ himself, is determined by the world-shattering events of the cross and resurrection. For Paul these were not simply events which concluded Jesus' life; they constituted the death of an old aeon (together with its old ways of perception) and the opening of a new (see Eschatology).

In this sense, any information Paul may have had about the life and ministry of Jesus seems to have been overshadowed by the cross and resurrection. It is sometimes suggested that Paul makes little reference to the life and teaching of Jesus because he felt insecure in citing such facts, which could be used with more confidence by his Palestine-based opponents.* It is also possible that stories of Jesus as a miracle worker were naively invoked by some of his enthusiastic converts, for instance the Corinthian Christians. But even if either or both of these hypotheses are true, it is more important that the structure of Paul's own theology laid almost exclusive stress on the central facts about Jesus which had caused the dramatic shift in salvation history: that Jesus, the Christ, had been crucified but raised from the dead by God.

6. The Kingdom of God.

One theme that provides a particularly clear example of the difference between the theology of Jesus and Paul is the kingdom of God (see Kingdom). On a surface level, in terms of vocabulary usage, it is immediately obvious that this terminology, which is so central to Jesus' message, plays a much-reduced role in Paul. It is still a part of Paul's vocabulary (e.g., Rom 14:17; 1 Thess 2:12; Gal 5:21; 1 Cor 4:20; 6:9) but often in formulae which appear stereotyped and never in the central statements about salvation. It is possible that this reflects a merely superficial change of terminology and that, as Jüngel and more recently Wedderburn have argued, the basic concept is preserved in Paul's talk of the righteousness* of God. However, it is also significant that where Paul uses metaphors of sovereignty, he does so characteristically by reference to the lordship of Christ (see Lord). In this connection 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 is particularly revealing with its reference to Christ's present reign, even though that is only preliminary and ultimately subordinate to the universal rule of God. This passage also makes it clear that Paul understands the lordship of Christ as a consequence of the resurrection.

This would suggest an important dissimilarity between the preaching of Jesus and the theology of Paul. If Jesus spoke of the kingdom of God as breaking in through his ministry, he pointed primarily to the effects of his preaching and healing. From the other side of the cross and resurrection, Paul understood the rule of God as focused in the risen Lord, and thereby highlighted an event and emphasized a christology which are at most implicit in the teaching of Jesus. Given this undeniable difference in perspective caused by the events of the cross and resurrection, we must now consider whether there are still significant points of congruity between the preaching of Jesus and the theology of Paul that would allow us to hold them together as recognizably united in their fundamental concerns.

7. Israel and the Law.

Recent research on the historical Jesus has highlighted the question of his purpose and has focused attention on his relationship to the people of Israel.* A consensus has emerged which understands his ministry as devoted to the restoration and reconstitution of Israel: he called twelve disciples, a symbol of the twelve tribes of Israel, in order to gather around himself the renewed core of the people of God. Jesus did not found a church because the church (Israel) was already in existence. But the restoration of Israel (see Restoration of Israel) involved a fundamental challenge to its value system. Following on from John the Baptist's call to repentance, Jesus challenged Israel to grasp and to practice the will of God in radical obedience. The object of his attack was not legalism (in the sense of the self-satisfied performance of meritorious works) but the narrowness of vision which confines the perception of the will of God within the boundaries of nation and tradition (see Law; Works of the Law). When Jesus spoke of the kingdom of God he consistently broke apart traditional expectations. Although the evidence probably does not allow us to claim that he set himself against the authority of the Torah as a matter of principle, it is sufficiently clear that he challenged the nation to reconsider its priorities and interpreted the Law in such areas as Sabbath, purity and the love command in an open-ended fashion. To insist, for instance, that the Sabbath rest was to be understood as an opportunity for the performance of acts of mercy was to shift the emphasis from the protection of Israel's way of life to her unique calling to demonstrate, even in the tense historical context of Palestine, the unlimited mercy of God.

Paul's theology also has as its focal point the question of God's purposes for Israel. It is now increasingly appreciated that Romans 9—11 is not an appendix but an integral part of the argument of that letter and that Paul's theology of justification has as its immediate horizon not the question of the salvation of the individual but of God's impartiality toward Jews and Gentiles.* Paul then is also concerned with the reconstitution of Israel, the redefinition of the children of Abraham* (see Restoration). For Paul, the context in which this is worked out is not the political and religious tensions of Palestine but the social environment of Jews and Gentiles in the cities of the Greco-Roman world (see Social Setting). His unique calling to the Gentile mission and its remarkable success necessitated a rethinking of the sufficiency of the Torah as the standard of moral guidance—a much more radical reappraisal than we can detect in the teaching of Jesus. Paul himself looks back to Jesus as one who lived under the Law (Gal 4:4) and his ministry as directed to "the circumcision*" in order to fulfill the promises to the patriarchs (Rom 15:8). But he understands that fulfillment as now entailing a systematic redefinition of the "Israel of God" (see Israel) to include Gentiles who enjoyed freedom from the Law. Paul never invokes the life or teaching of Jesus as a model for his Gentile mission or his selective use of the Law; in this respect it appears that he himself was aware of a significant point of discontinuity between Jesus and himself. But it may still be possible for us to claim that there is a real congruity between the dynamic of Jesus' challenge to Israel and Paul's Law-free mission* to Gentiles; this will require us to investigate more carefully the theological driving force of their respective ministries.

8. Sinners, Outsiders and the Mercy of God.

Recent discussion of Jesus and the "sinners" has highlighted the boldness of his association with those who were not just ignorant of the Law but who willfully and repeatedly crossed the boundaries of acceptable Jewish behavior. Prostitutes and tax collectors (renowned for their dishonesty) were apparently among the company whom Jesus welcomed in table fellowship. The rationale for this controversial behavior is made clear in the parables of the lost (Lk 15) and the saying about the doctor (Mk 2:17): Jesus represents his ministry as the decisive opportunity of forgiveness, the moment when the kingdom of God, focused in his activity, is revealed as the unconditional and saving mercy of God. Instead of reinforcing the protective boundaries of the pure and the righteous, Jesus consciously redefined God's love in radically inclusive terms as welcoming the poor, the maimed, the tainted, the "unconvertible" and the enemy. In taking a Samaritan as the model of service to others, in finding the qualities proper to the people of God represented even outside its traditional boundaries (cf. Mt 8:10-12; Mk 7:24-30), Jesus hints that the mercy of God is not necessarily confined to the Jewish race, even if his primary concern is with the revitalization of Israel. In Paul's context "sinners" are not just disobedient Jews but also, and especially, Gentiles. His theology of justification is focused on the question of how even such Gentiles can be included in Abraham's family. The Gentile mission he pursues, together with his own experience of transformation from persecutor of the church to apostle, lie at the root of his characteristic emphasis on the grace of God—a grace extended even to the weak (see Weakness), the enemy* and the ungodly (Rom 4:5; 5:6-11; etc.). For all the differences of context and expression, and for all the complexities of the theological argumentation Paul employs, it is here, at the very heart of his theology, where Paul seems to be entirely in tune with the dynamic of the message and ministry of Jesus. For both Jesus and Paul, the core of the good news consists in the radical demolition of restrictive boundaries in the free and gracious activity of a merciful God.

Since Paul never appeals to the example of Jesus in this regard, it is not clear how this remarkable theological congruity can be explained in historical terms. The most likely solution, well argued recently by Wedderburn, is that the Jewish "Hellenist" Christians whom Paul initially persecuted were influenced in their openness to Gentile converts by the memory of Jesus' controversial welcome of sinners and took inspiration from his open-ended emphasis on the merciful forgiveness of God. It was perhaps this atmosphere and these priorities which Paul then absorbed when he joined the Hellenist community which he had formerly tried to destroy.

9. Suffering, the Cross and Vindication.

There is good evidence that Jesus consciously adopted a life of poverty and self-denial and understood the measure of greatness to be in service. Because of the suspicion that the Gospel records of Jesus' words have been heavily influenced by subsequent events, many scholars remain agnostic on the question of whether Jesus predicted his own death or what interpretation he may have given to it. However, there is some solid evidence in the well-attested tradition about the Last Supper (see Lord's Supper), and in the logion in Mark 10:45, that Jesus knew his life of service would culminate in death and understood that death as being in some sense on behalf of "many." Moreover, given the long tradition of reflection in Jewish theology on the fate of the righteous martyrs and their sure vindication by God, it is entirely plausible to attribute to Jesus some hope that God's purposes would triumph even in and through his impending death.

Looking back from the other side of the cross and resurrection, Paul's perspective is in some respects radically different: in the confidence of Christian experience of the resurrection, he detects the opening of the new era in the resurrection of Christ and his exaltation* to the position of "Lord."* Yet he also sees the life and death of Jesus as characterized preeminently by service and obedience (Phil 2:5-11; Rom 15:3; 2 Cor 8:9). Moreover, like Jesus, he places the pattern of service* and vindication, death and new life, at the very heart of the good news of the gospel. Just as Jesus saw the love of God as expressed in his own self-giving for others and the essence of discipleship in losing one's own life and finding it again (Mk 8:34-37), Paul's theology focuses on the "Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal 2:20), and his dominant image of the Christian life is of "carrying about the dying of Christ in order that the life of Christ might be manifest in our bodies" (2 Cor 4:10; see Cross, Theology of the). Like Jesus, although with more explicit focus on the cross, Paul sees this gospel pattern as presenting a radical challenge to the pride, defensiveness and self-sufficiency endemic in human nature (1 Cor 1:18-25; cf. Lk 10:25-37; Mk 10:35-45).

10. Continuity and Development.

As our survey of the history of debate has shown, there are important theological presuppositions lying behind many discussions of the "Jesus and Paul" issue. At one extreme lies Bultmann's assertion "that it is the Christ of the kerygma and not the person of the historical Jesus who is the object of faith" (Bultmann 1960, 17). The natural effect of this is to minimize the continuity between the historical Jesus and the theology of Paul and to lay all the emphasis on the Easter faith. At the opposite end of the spectrum is J. W. Fraser's concern that "we cannot rest content with the beliefs of Paul or others; it must be Jesus himself who provided the basis for and the impetus to the whole New Testament understanding of his saving person and work" (Fraser, 29). From this perspective it is important to find as much similarity and continuity between Jesus and Paul as possible.

In fact no one can deny that there are significant changes and developments between the message of Jesus and the theology of Paul. The events of Good Friday and Easter, and the momentum of the Gentile mission, made such developments inevitable and, indeed, necessary. Moreover, quite apart from the different idioms and thought forms used by Jesus and Paul, their very different social and cultural contexts would have made it impossible for Paul simply to repeat the preaching of Jesus. The central question is whether in essence Paul's theology is harmonious with, and a legitimate development of, the message of Jesus. As we have seen, this question cannot be answered simply by discovering or denying the presence of echoes of the words of Jesus in Paul. That issue, which lies on the level of historical continuity between Jesus and Paul, cannot by itself determine whether Paul's theology is congruous with that of Jesus. But there is sufficient evidence to show that, whether consciously or otherwise, Paul did develop the central insights of the teaching of Jesus and the central meaning of his life and death in a way that truly represented their dynamic and their fullest significance.

See also CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; CHRISTOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; JESUS, SAYINGS OF; JEW, PAUL THE; KINGDOM OF GOD/

CHRIST; LAW; LORD'S SUPPER; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; TRADITION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teaching of Jesus (New York/Toronto: Edwin Mellen, 1984); C. Brown, "Historical Jesus, Quest of," DJG 326-41; R. Bultmann, "The Significance of the Historical Jesus for the Theology of Paul," in Faith and Understanding I (New York: Harper & Row, 1966 [1929]) 220-46; idem, "Jesus and Paul," in Existence and Faith (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1961 [1936]) 183-201; idem, "The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus" (1960), in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, ed. C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville (New York/Nashville: Abingdon, 1964) 15-42; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1948); D. L. Dungan, The Sayings of Jesus in the Churches of Paul (Oxford: Blackwell, 1971); J. W. Fraser, Jesus and Paul (Appleford, Berkshire: Marcham, 1974); W. Heitmüller, "Zum Problem Paulus und Jesus," ZNW 13 (1912) 320-37; J. Jeremias, The Central Message of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1965); E. Jüngel, Paulus und Jesus (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1962); M. Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964 [1896]); E. Käsemann, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in Essays on New Testament Themes (London: SCM, 1964); idem, "Blind Alleys in the 'Jesus of History' Controversy," in New Testament Questions of Today (London: SCM, 1969); J. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul (London: Allen & Unwin, 1943); W. G. Kümmel, "Jesus und Paulus" (1939) and "Jesus und Paulus" (1963) in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 1965) 81-106, 439-56; J. K. Riches, Jesus and the Transformation of Judaism (New York: Seabury, 1982); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); A. Schweitzer, Paul and His Interpreters (London: A. & C. Black, 1912); M. B. Thompson, Clothed with Christ: The Example and Teaching of Jesus in Romans 12.1—15.13 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1991): G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); A. J. M. Wedderburn, ed., Paul and Jesus: Collected Essays (JSNTSup 37; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); S. G. Wilson, "From Jesus to Paul: The Contours and Consequences of a Debate," in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, ed. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd (Waterloo: Wilfrid Laurier University, 1984); B. Witherington, Jesus, Paul and the End of the World: A Comparative Study in New Testament Eschatology (Downers Grove: InterVarsity, 1992); W. Wrede, Paul (London: Philip Green, 1907).

J. M. G. Barclay

JESUS TRADITION. See JESUS, SAYINGS OF; JESUS AND PAUL.

JEW, PAUL THE

In recent years a significant change has taken place in Pauline scholarship. During the first half of the twentieth century the dominant "history of religions" school emphasized a Hellenistic approach to Paul: Paul was understood to be a Hellenized Jew of the Diaspora. For example, R. Bultmann and his followers reasoned the syncretistic Judaism of the Diaspora and the popular philosophy of the time constituted the background of Paul's thought (see Paul and His Interpreters). Today, however, NT scholarship finds more and more evidence for the Jewishness of Paul's life and thought. Indeed, this change is part of a general movement in Christian scholarship to rediscover the Jewish roots of Christianity. Concurrently, Jewish scholarship shows a growing interest in reclaiming the Jewishness of Jesus and Paul. Accordingly, the following study emphasizes the Jewish dimension of Paul's life and thought.

Much of the current emphasis on the Jewishness of Paul focuses on his social world. It attempts to go behind his thoughts and words to matters of lifestyle and behavior. For example, Paul shared the apocalyptic hope of primitive Christianity: what did that mean in terms of everyday life, in terms of a group that lived outside the mainstream of life in the Roman Empire? Since the social study of Paul is now a field in itself, it is not possible here to do full justice to this aspect of Pauline scholarship (see Social-Scientific Approaches).

A recent study by J. Neyrey, however, demonstrates how cultural anthropology sheds light on the Pauline letters and on Paul the Jew. According to Neyrey, Paul's early upbringing, or socialization, as a strict Pharisaic Jew conditioned his view of the world and reality. Consequently, Paul had a passionate concern for such categories as order, hierarchy and boundaries in matters of purity (see Purity and Impurity). Paul's concern for these categories was carried over to his postconversion (see Conversion and Call) perspective. Thus Paul was not an entirely new person after his conversion: his Jewish past continued to influence him. This continuity will be further illustrated in the following discussion.

1. Paul's Autobiographical Statements
2. Paul's Formal Education in Judaism
3. Paul's Apocalyptic Worldview
4. Paul's Self-Understanding as a Jew
5. Paul's Mysticism
6. Paul and Torah

1. Paul's Autobiographical Statements.
The proper place to begin a study of Paul the Jew is his own autobiographical statements. The most pertinent autobiographical passage is Philippians 3:4-6. This is a polemical passage in which Paul explicitly emphasizes his credentials as a Jew. "If anyone else has reason to be confident in the flesh, I have more: circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew born of Hebrews; as to the Law a Pharisee, as to zeal a persecutor of the church, as to righteousness under the Law blameless." In this passage Paul makes the point that his Jewish credentials and his zeal for his religion could be matched by few other Jews or Jewish Christians.

Still haunted by a false dichotomy between Palestinian Judaism and that of the Diaspora,* many Pauline scholars refuse to take such autobiographical statements at face value. The scholarship of a previous generation posited a pure, Torah-centered Judaism for Palestine and a syncretistic, Hellenistic Judaism for the Diaspora. And, since Tarsus was located in the Diaspora, Paul was subsumed under the category of syncretistic Hellenistic Jew.

In contrast to the older view, recent archeological and literary finds have demonstrated the rich variety in Palestinian Judaism both in adherence to the Law* and in speaking languages other than Aramaic (see Hellenism). Much the same variety is true of Diaspora Judaism, although Greek was the predominant language spoken. While Greek was the language of Alexandrian and Egyptian Jewry, the language situation in Syria was different; Syria later produced an Aramaic literature. Geographically, Tarsus is quite close to Syria. Also, Jerome reports that Paul's parents came from Gischala in Galilee. If Jerome is correct, Paul could very well have spoken Hebrew or Aramaic in his home.

Philippians 3:4-6, however, reports far more about Paul's Judaism than the fact that he claimed Jewish identity. For example, he claims to be a Benjaminite. Precisely what Paul was declaring by this assertion is not clear. Nevertheless, the following may have been involved in Paul's boast. Jerusalem and the Temple were located within the tribal land of Benjamin. In the separation of the northern kingdom from Judah, Benjamin and Judah remained loyal to the Davidic kings. After the Babylonian exile, Benjamin and Judah were the center of the new community.

Next, Paul claims to be "a Hebrew born of Hebrews." Again, certainty is elusive in defining this phrase (cf. 2 Cor 11:22). He may have meant his blood was pure in that he had no Gentile* ancestry. More probably, he was contrasting himself with Hellenists or Greek-speaking Jews. Thereby, he was saying that he was taught to speak Hebrew in the home. According to R. N. Longenecker, this interpretation gains in probability if Philippians is read in the light of 2 Corinthians 11:22. There Paul matches his qualifications against those of other Jews or Jewish Christians: "Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I. Are they descendants of Abraham? So am I" (Longenecker, 22).

As a further cause for boasting in Philippians, Paul claims to be a Pharisee. Here the term was defined with precision. The expression "as to the Law a Pharisee" refers to the oral Law. The Sadducees held that only the written Law was binding, while the Pharisees believed God had revealed the oral Law as well as the written Law. In Galatians 1:14 Paul writes that he was "extremely zealous . . . for the traditions of the elders." The Greek for traditions* is a technical expression (paradosis) for the oral law. The same Greek word occurs in Mark 7:5 where the Evangelist speaks of the "traditions of the elders." According to E. Rivkin, Paul thereby understood himself as a member of the scholarly class who taught the twofold Law. By saying that the Pharisees sit on Moses' seat (Mt 23:2), Jesus was indicating they were authoritative teachers of the Law. Consequently, the Pharisees claimed to believe that they were the true Israel who knew God's will for the world.

Another basic Pharisaic belief was the resurrection of the dead. If a member of the covenant community (a Jew) or a Gentile convert obeyed the oral and written Law, that person could anticipate being raised to eternal life.

In summary, Paul was saying that he was a Hebrew-speaking interpreter and teacher of the oral and written Law.

A further point should be made in reference to Paul's statement "as to righteousness* under the Law blameless" (Phil 3:6). The uneasy, guilt-ridden conscience of the West, as seen particularly in Martin Luther and his age, should not be read back into Paul's psyche (see Stendahl). The anxieties of one age are not those of another. Paul's biographical statements are best taken at face value—like the Pharisees in the Gospels he understood himself as zealous and righteous (see Jealousy, Zeal).

2. Paul's Formal Education in Judaism.
According to Acts 22:3 Paul received formal education in the Judaism of the time "at the feet of Gamaliel." This famous Gamaliel was either the grandson or son of the renowned Hillel who was instrumental in drawing up the exegetical methods (middôṯ) by which Scripture should be studied (cf. t. Sanh. 7.11; 'Abot R. Nat. [A] §37). Recently, some scholars have questioned the claim that Paul was trained under Gamaliel. The dispute cannot be recapitulated here, but a brief consideration of Jewish education in Paul's day illuminates the setting of Paul's early years (see Hengel, 1.78-83).

From the early Hellenistic period we have the renowned Ben Sira's description of his "school" which was designed to teach wisdom to upper-class young men (Sir 51:23-28). Sometime later and well into the Hellenistic period there arose a movement to instruct the whole Jewish population in the Law (b. B.Bat. 21a). This movement attempted to preserve Judaism from assimilation to Greek learning and language. Even later the attempt to instruct the whole people became a primary goal of Pharisaism. In Paul's generation a network of elementary schools taught the Hebrew Bible, primarily the Pentateuch, to boys who began school at the age of six or seven (y. Ketub. 32c, 4). More advanced schools taught young men to interpret the text of the Bible and to explain contradictions and problems found therein. The exegetical methods drawn up by Hillel were applied both to interpreting the text of the Bible as well as to applying Pentateuchal laws to the contemporary needs of Jewish society.

Some insight into Paul's formal education is gained by considering his exegetical skills in a passage such as Romans 9:6-29, where Paul utilizes Hebrew Scripture, midrashic techniques and the exegetical traditions of his day (see Old Testament in Paul). In this passage Paul is struggling with a problem faced by early Christians: Why have the majority of Jews rejected their own Christ*? He states the issue in Romans 9:6: "But it is not as though the word of God had failed." He then turns to the Pentateuch for primary passages which address this issue. The initial text to which Paul appeals is Genesis 21:12: "Through Isaac shall your descendants be named" (Rom 9:7). A second supplementary text is cited from Genesis 18:10: "About this time I will return and Sarah shall have a son" (Rom 9:9). In the argument that follows, Paul cites other subordinate texts from the OT. These subordinate quotations are linked to the initial and secondary texts by the use of three catchwords: "descendants" (sperma; translated "children" in verse 29), "named" (kaleō) and "son" (huios; see Adoption, Sonship). E. E. Ellis has outlined the pattern of the use of Scripture in the following manner (Ellis, 155).

Romans 9:6-7	Theme and initial text: Genesis 21:12
Romans 9:9	A second, supplemental text: Genesis 18:10
Romans 9:10-28	Exposition containing additional citations (Rom 9:13, 15, 17, 25-28) and linked to the initial texts by the catchwords kaleō (name) and huios (son) (Rom 9:12, 24-26, 27)
Romans 9:29	A final text alluding to the initial text with the catchword sperma (descendants and children)

Paul employed a number of midrashic techniques in composing this unit. The use of a parallel secondary text to supplement and elucidate the primary text is frequently found in later classical midrashim. Also common is the use of a key term in both the initial text and the conclusion of the composition, thereby forming a correspondence of beginning and ending in a discussion (inclusio). The use of key words to pull in other passages of Scripture is also well known. In Paul's composition the key word is not always found in the texts that have been quoted. Nevertheless, the key word is always found in the context of the quotation if not in the quotation itself. Similarly, later rabbis did not always quote the key word.

Other elements of midrashic form found here are introductory or citation formulas for Scripture, breaks in thought caused by dealing with an incorrect inference or an imaginary opponent (also found in the diatribe), and the use of words from the initial text in the exposition.

Perhaps the most significant element in this midrash-like unit is Paul's use of contemporaneous exegetical traditions which are preserved for us in later rabbinic works. An example from outside Romans 9:6-29 is found in 1 Corinthians 10:4 where Paul wrote: "For they drank from the supernatural rock which followed them. . . ." The biblical narrative contains no hint that the rock was mobile. How did Paul know this? As Conzelmann states (Conzelmann, 166-67), Paul was making use of a Jewish haggadic tradition that appears in a later work (t. Sukk. 3.11; cf. b. Ta'an. 9a; Bib. Ant. 11.14; Philo Leg. All. 2.86).

In Romans 9:6-29 the initial text (Gen 21:12) Paul employs was used in two different ways in later rabbinic works. First, the Babylonian Talmud quotes Genesis 21:12 in several places. The following passage from Sanhedrin 59b is typical:

> Circumcision was from the very first commanded to Abraham only. . . . If so, should it not be incumbent upon the children of Ishmael (Abraham's son)? For in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Then should not the children of Esau be bound to practice it?—In Isaac but not all Isaac. (Soncino edition)

Both Paul and the later Babylonian Talmud use the same text to show who belonged to Israel, and both associated Esau with this text. However, unlike Paul, the Talmud ties "in Isaac" to purely physical descent from Jewish parentage.

But what is even more striking is the way both Paul and the later Genesis Rabbah exegete this same text. Here another factor in addition to physical descent is associated with the phrase "in Isaac." (In order to understand the following passage the reader needs to know that in the first century Hebrew letters also had a numerical equivalent: since bêṯ is the second letter of the alphabet, it was also the symbol for the number two.) In Midrash Rabbah Genesis 53.12 we read:

> AND GOD SAID UNTO ABRAHAM: LET IT NOT BE GRIEVOUS IN THY SIGHT . . . FOR IN ISAAC SHALL SEED BE CALLED TO THEE (XXI, 12): R. Judan b. Shilum said: Not 'Isaac', but IN ISAAC is written here. R. 'Azariah said in the name of Bar Ḥuṭah; the beth (IN) denotes two, i.e., [thy seed shall be called] in him who recognizes the existence of two worlds; he shall inherit two worlds [God says]; 'I have given a sign [whereby the true descendants of Abraham can be known] viz. he who expressly recognises [God's judgments]: thus whoever believes in the two worlds shall be called "thy seed", while he who rejects belief in two worlds shall not be called "thy seed." (Soncino edition, 471)

In the above midrash the true descendants of Abraham* believe in two worlds. This is precisely Paul's stance in Romans: physical descent alone is not enough; those who have a certain belief or type of faith* are children of Abraham. In commenting on Romans 9:6-29 Paul writes the following in Romans 9:30-32:

> What shall we say, then? That Gentiles who did not pursue righteousness have attained it, that is, righteousness through faith; but that Israel who pursued the righteousness which is based on Law did not succeed in fulfilling that Law. Why? Because they did not pursue it through faith.

Paul's view of faith is closely related to what we have observed in the Midrash Rabbah. As a Pharisee Paul had believed in the two worlds, that is, not only in this present world but also in the resurrection*—the world to come. When Paul met the resurrected Christ on the Damascus Road, he interpreted Christ as the "first-fruits" of the general resurrection to follow. From that point on his belief in a general resurrection became concretized in a specific person through whom he had experienced reconciliation* with God* and all that the term "faith" meant for him.

Before drawing any conclusions, however, another piece must be added to the picture. Genesis Rabbah is not the only later rabbinic work in which belief in two worlds is associated with Genesis 21:12. Much the same interpretation is also found in the Jerusalem Talmud, Nedarim 2:10. Here also the bêṯ means "two" and points to a Jew who believes in two worlds.

These two late Palestinian sources raise the possibility of the existence of a Palestinian exegetical tradition which associated the belief in two worlds with Genesis 21:12. As we have seen, the Babylonian Talmud does not know this tradition and construes Genesis 21:12 to mean physical descent alone.

Still, the question remains: How could Paul and this exegetical tradition (if such it was), found in sources "published" hundreds of years after Paul, have interpreted the same verse in such a remarkably similar manner? G. Vermes points us toward a solution (Vermes, chap. 6). He first rejects various possibilities: that the NT depends on the Talmud and Genesis Rabbah (they did not exist in NT times); that the later exegetical tradition was learned from Paul; and that the similarities are purely coincidental (there is too much overlap). Rather, he holds open the possibility that the NT and the later rabbinic exegetical tradition both had a common source, namely, traditional Jewish teaching. Exegetical traditions "lived" for hundreds of years. Here Vermes would say that Paul knew the exegetical tradition associated with Genesis 21:12. This tradition "lived" in the schools of Palestine and later resurfaced in the Jerusalem Talmud and in Genesis Rabbah. And, of course, this opens the possibility that a Palestinian exegetical tradition was one source of Paul's doctrine of justification* through faith.

In addition, another exegetical tradition was apparently associated with Paul's second text: "About this time I will return and Sarah shall have a son." Genesis 18:10 and the figure of Sarah herself were associated with the theme of the steadfastness of God's work in Genesis Rabbah and in other places (see Stegner, 47).

Paul's use of Scripture, of midrashic techniques and of contemporary exegetical traditions in Romans 9:6-29 yielded a highly sophisticated composition. It cannot have been the product of an uneducated mind. If he was not trained by Gamaliel, then he was taught by some other Jewish master. In any case, it seems clear that Paul received a formal education in the Judaism of the time.

3. Paul's Apocalyptic Worldview.

Did Paul's apocalyptic (see Apocalypticism) worldview constitute a central motif in his thinking and theology? In answering this question scholars sometimes begin by defining the term, then match their definition with passages from Paul and, thereby, conclude that apocalypticism did or did not constitute a central focus in his thinking. However, since definitions vary from one scholar to another, it is better to start with the centrality of Paul's belief in the resurrection of Jesus and work outward from there.

W. Pannenberg is surely correct in pointing out that in first-century Judaism the resurrection could be expressed only in the language of the apocalyptic tradition (Pannenberg, 96). Indeed, the belief in a resurrection was part of the apocalyptic hope and worldview. For example, the disciples already had to have an understanding of resurrection before they could identify Jesus' empty tomb and appearances as constituting a resurrection. The hundreds of ossuaries (receptacles holding bones of the dead) discovered by archeologists in the environs of Jerusalem may be material evidence of this first-century Jewish hope in a future resurrection.

That the resurrection* was a central element in Paul's message is a truism. 1 Corinthians 15 alone illustrates the point, and Paul again and again mentions resurrection: Christ's saving death and resurrection seem to have been the focus of his preaching.*

Moreover, Jesus' resurrection is the first fruits (see First Fruits) that foreshadows and authenticates the resurrection of all those who belong to him (1 Cor 15:23). This resurrection will involve a transformation like the transformation that Jesus' body underwent in the tomb. Paul makes this point in Philippians 3:20-21: "We await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself." In apocalyptic fashion Paul is speaking of a "bodily" resurrection and transformation in so far as one can speak of a "spiritual body" as a body* (see Immortality).

Further, the resurrection of Jesus as first fruit of the eschaton heightened the expectation for the general resurrection at the end of this age and the accompanying transformation of all creation (see Eschatology). Thus Paul believed the end of this age was very near. According to 1 Thessalonians 4:13-18, Paul expected to be alive (1 Thess 4:15) to see Jesus return. Then two related events would occur: first, the "dead in Christ will rise" and, secondly, the living will be transformed (so also 1 Cor 15:51). This raising of the dead and transformation of the living was to be accompanied by the transformation of nature and all creation*: "the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay and obtain the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom 8:21). This is clearly apocalypticism.

Paul shared the apocalyptic belief in the two ages: this present evil age will be transformed by an act of God into the age to come, or kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God). Thus Paul says that "the whole creation has been groaning in travail" (Rom 8:22) and waiting "with eager longing for the revealing of the children of God" (Rom 8:19).

Perhaps the key ingredient in apocalypticism was the category of revelation. Most apocalyptic writings reveal the future. Paul also reveals the future.

In describing God's purpose for the future, Paul, like other apocalypticists, used the word *mystery (mystērion, e.g., Rom 11:25). Paul's use of the term is both Jewish and apocalyptic in background. Generally speaking, the Jewish apocalypses portrayed God's purposes for history as well as the nearness of the end of this age. They used the term mystery to designate a purpose or secret of God which could not be known by human reason, but had to be revealed by God.

According to the "mystery" that Paul is revealing, God has formed a new people in Christ and the unbelief of the Jewish people has caused the gospel to be preached to the Gentiles. However, in the end time "all Israel," presumably the Jewish people who do not believe in Christ, will be drawn to faith in him by God.

Many interpreters conclude that Paul was speaking of a secret or revelation that he had received from God. Others are not sure. Regardless of how Paul received the "mystery," this term was the common currency of apocalyptic language.

Nevertheless, in the use of traditional apocalyptic language and imagery there is a difference between Paul and other apocalypticists. In Paul the sharp separation between this age and the age to come is lacking. The resurrection of Jesus, more specifically, his crucifixion* and resurrection, introduced a new factor into the equation. There is an overlap between the two ages: the new age is proleptically present in Christ's work of reconciliation. Indeed, the transformation of believers is secretly taking place within them: "And we all . . . beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another" (2 Cor 3:18).

4. Paul's Self-Understanding as a Jew.

The previous discussion of the term mystery and its surrounding context in Romans 9—11 introduces another dimension of Paul's Jewishness, namely, his ongoing Jewish self-understanding. Romans 9—11 enables us to enter into Paul's self-understanding as a Jew better than any other Pauline passage.

In introducing his discussion in Romans 9:2-3 he shares his feelings for his "own people," his "kindred according to the flesh." He agonizes over the unbelief of the Jews as only a fellow Jew could (see Israel). Troubled by the general Jewish rejection of "the Christ," Paul rejects the possibility that "the word of God has failed" (Rom 9:6). In Romans 11:1 Paul also rejects the proposition that God has "rejected his people." The solution is simple: the unbelief of the Jews has caused the gospel to be preached to the Gentiles, who in turn believed. While Paul was "an apostle* to the Gentiles" (Rom 11:13), he cannot forget his own people. Indeed, the turning of the Gentiles to Christ causes the Jews to become jealous: "Inasmuch then as I am an apostle to the Gentiles, I magnify my ministry in order to make my fellow Jews jealous, and thus save some of them" (Rom 11:13-14). The very vigor with which Paul pursued his Gentile apostolate has suggested to some interpreters that Paul thought he was entering into the very eschatological purpose of God in saving all Israel. Paul not only had "unceasing anguish" for his "kinsmen by race," but he gave himself for their salvation,* a side effect of his Gentile mission being the conversion of Jews.

At this point, recent scholarship has tended to take divergent paths. Some hold that Paul is advocating a two-covenant people of God: the Gentiles approach God through faith, while the Jews approach him through Torah (Gaston, Gager, Stendahl). Surely, the majority of NT scholars are correct in holding that any two-covenant approach founders on the rock of Romans 10 (see Israel, Law).

If the Jews must come to faith in Christ in order to be saved, how will God accomplish this? Paul knows the election of the Jews still holds (Rom 11:28-29), and he knows the secret plan (mystery) of God (note the elements of self-understanding implied here). After "the full number of the Gentiles come in," then "all Israel will be saved" (Rom 11:25-26). Will jealousy over the "full number of the Gentiles" turn the Jews to faith? Will the Second Coming of Jesus occasion such faith? Paul reveals God's overall purpose for Israel, but not the details. Paul continued to understand himself as a (believing-in-Christ) Jew, privy to the plan of God.

Even the notion of the ingathering of the Gentiles at the end of the age was a part of Paul's Jewish heritage. In some apocalyptic scenarios the Gentiles would be converted in the end time and make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (see Collection). This expectation for the ingathering of the Gentiles seems to lie behind Romans 11:25. However, in the "mystery" that Paul is sharing, God has formed the Jewish Christians and the Gentile converts into a new people of God in Christ. As we have seen, the unbelief of the Jewish people had caused the gospel* to be preached to the Gentiles.

5. Paul's Mysticism.

Contemporary scholarship is just beginning to explore Paul's mysticism* (see Visions, Ecstatic Experience). Paul's mysticism is Jewish mysticism and derives from Palestinian Judaism. It must be defined with care.

Paul's mysticism is as well defined by what it is not as by what it is. The attempt of a previous generation to identify Paul with the mystery religions (see Religions) of the Hellenistic world on the basis of his use of the Greek term mystērion was a failure (see Paul and His Interpreters). Further, the older discussion of Paul's "Christ mysticism," related to his repeated use of the phrase "in Christ" (see In Christ; Mysticism), is not the issue contemporary scholars are addressing. Rather, Paul's mysticism is best defined by (1) the experience he describes in 2 Corinthians 12:1-4 and (2) his knowledge* of God's eschatological plan (described above in connection with the term mystery). In 2 Corinthians 12:1 Paul boasts of "visions and revelations of the Lord." He goes on to describe his being "caught up to the third heaven" (2 Cor 12:2) and then "into Paradise" (2 Cor 12:3; see Heaven, Heavenlies, Paradise) where "he heard things that cannot be told, which man may not utter" (2 Cor 12:4).

What is the background for this kind of experience? An emerging scholarly consensus posits Merkabah mysticism (related to Ezekiel's vision of the throne chariot, or merkāḇâ, of God) as the background for Paul's experience (see, e.g., Bowker, Segal). G. Scholem (EncJud) associates early Merkabah mysticism with certain circles of Pharisees, and particularly with Johanan ben Zakkai, who flourished around A.D. 70, and with the later Akiba.

Today, scholars are dating Merkabah mysticism earlier than Scholem supposed. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Qumran and Paul) fragments of a so-called Angelic Liturgy were found (4Q400-407 = 4QShirShab). These fragments describe the divine throne chariot—a central theme of early Jewish mysticism. This find shows that Paul could have been acquainted with Merkabah mysticism, especially since he was Johanan ben Zakkai's contemporary.

This early Jewish mysticism was centered in Palestine and found expression in apocalyptic literature such as the Enoch tradition (e.g., 1 Enoch 70—71; 2 Enoch 22; 3 Enoch). Certain Pharisaic circles focused on the first chapter of Ezekiel which tells of the throne chariot (the merkāḇâ) of God. Scholem also reports that the early literature speaks of an "ascent to the Merkabah" (Scholem 1961, 46).

This form of early Jewish mysticism fits together with Paul's autobiographical statements. In Philippians 3:5-6 Paul tells us that he was a zealous Pharisee and blameless "as to righteousness under the Law." In 2 Corinthians 11:22 (a passage immediately preceding his description of his visions), Paul emphasizes his descent from Abraham*: "Are they descendants of Abraham? So am I." Early Jewish mysticism was practiced in certain Pharisaic circles. Nevertheless, not every Pharisee was permitted to study Ezekiel 1 because of the dangers involved (cf m. ḥag. 2:1). If the exegete should see again the vision of the throne chariot and not be in a state of ritual purity, he might die: "You cannot see my face; for man shall not see me and live" (Ex 33:20). Hence Johanan ben Zakkai taught mystical contemplation only to "his most favored pupils." J. W. Bowker has emphasized the importance of the Jewish credentials of the exegete, such as his direct descent from Abraham (Bowker). Paul's credentials well fit these requirements.

However, even more important than Paul's credentials for establishing a connection with Merkabah mysticism are the words he uses in 2 Corinthians 12:1-4. Three expressions stand out: being "caught up" (harpazō), "the third heaven" (tritos ouranos) and "paradise" (paradeisos). J. D. Tabor has shown that these words belonged to the vocabulary of Jewish mysticism and cites the first-century Life of Adam and Eve (25:3) as an illustration:

> And I saw a chariot like the wind and its wheels were fiery. I was carried off into the Paradise of righteousness, and I saw the Lord sitting and his appearance was unbearable flaming fire. And many thousands of angels were at the right and at the left of the chariot (OTP 2.266-8).

In this excerpt the mystic is not talking about the future, but the dwelling of God in paradise, perhaps in the seventh heaven. Other visions associate paradise with the third heaven.

Finally, the book of Acts records that Paul experienced visions. While all visions are not the same, the overlap in vocabulary plus Paul's credentials indicate that his vision in 2 Corinthians 12:1-4 was the kind associated with Merkabah mysticism. Furthermore, Paul's apocalyptic worldview and his concept of "mystery" (revelation of God's future plan) are additional indications of his orientation to mysticism.

There is a fascinating interplay between the facets of Paul the Jew that we have examined so far. His autobiographical statements disclose his Pharisaism, his zeal and his righteousness under the Law. His writings reveal his exegetical prowess and his appropriation of the exegetical traditions by means of which he interpreted the passages of the Septuagint. All this is evidence of his formal training in the Judaism of his day. Of course, this formal training was a precondition for his instruction in Merkabah mysticism. Moreover, his mysticism and his apocalyptic worldview fit together like hand in glove. Since revelation of God's plan for the future is an essential ingredient in apocalypticism, the one depends on the other.

Two striking observations emerge from the above summary. The first concerns how well Paul fits into the first-century, pre-A.D. 70 (Palestinian) Judaism that we know from other sources. For example, the same combination of zeal for the Law, apocalyptic worldview and mysticism characterized the Qumran sectarians. While not an Essene, Paul stands forth as a devoutly religious Pharisee of the time. The second striking observation concerns how well the pieces all fit together into a harmonious whole. Heretofore Paul has been pictured as a marginal man, living uncomfortably in two worlds—the Hellenistic and the Jewish. Heretofore Paul has been pictured as a man characterized by conflicting goals and serious internal contradictions. This is not the picture that emerges from the above study.

Now we are ready to examine the element that shattered the unity of his preconversion synthesis—his relationship to Torah. Still, nothing more cogently depicts Paul the Jew than his continuing preoccupation with Torah. On the one hand, he cannot reject Torah altogether and, on the other hand, he cannot accept it as he formerly did.

6. Paul and Torah.

The literature on the subject of Paul and Torah, or Law, is immense. Our purpose here is not to review this literature (see, e.g., Dunn, Sanders), but to outline the significant issues in the contemporary debate (see Law; Works of the Law). Indeed, a new perspective on Paul and the Law is coming into focus out of the contemporary debate.

The dilemma for scholarship is posed by Paul's apparently contradictory statements about the Law. On the one hand, Paul appears to have had a positive view of the Law: "So the Law is holy, and the commandment is holy and just and good" (Rom 7:12). "Do we then overthrow the Law by this faith? By no means! On the contrary we uphold the Law" (Rom 3:31). On the other hand, Paul wrote negatively about the Law and appears to have attacked the Law itself: "By works of the Law shall no one be justified" (Gal 2:16). "For Christ is the end (in the sense of termination) of the Law, that every one who has faith may be justified" (Rom 10:4). Did Paul contradict himself?

According to the traditional view Paul made a radical break with the positive OT view of Law. Paul rejected the Law and saw Christ as the termination or end of the Law. The traditional view is best articulated by R. Bultmann and other German Lutheran exegetes. The Jews obeyed the Law to accumulate merit for themselves and thereby earn salvation. Indeed, the Pharisee was a worse sinner than most because the Pharisee best exemplified the human striving to assert independence from God and to be free of dependence upon God's grace.*

E. P. Sanders has challenged this traditional interpretation of Law in the name of covenantal nomism. After an exhaustive examination of the Jewish literature of the period, Sanders has challenged Bultmann's understanding of first-century Judaism: Bultmann has read Luther's conflict with Catholicism back into the first century. The covenant,* the Law, the special status as elect people of God (hence the term covenantal nomism) were all gifts of God's grace to Israel. The Jews did not have to earn what they already had: the Law was simply the means of maintaining their covenantal status.

What then was Paul condemning when he spoke of "works of the Law"? In answering this question, J. D. G. Dunn, who accepts Sanders's understanding of first-century Judaism, carries the argument further than Sanders. Dunn points out that the phrase "works of the Law"* occurs three times in Galatians 2:16. More importantly, the issue is table fellowship between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians: in this context Paul was opposing Jewish Christians who insist on maintaining the food laws (see Food). The heart of the matter for Paul is the inclusion of Gentiles in the messianic community on an equal footing with Jewish Christians. The Jewish Christians, on the other hand, wanted the Gentiles to become Jews before they could share in the table fellowship with observant Jewish Christians. Thus, the issue was not merit-based righteousness so much as racial exclusiveness. According to Dunn, the problem for Paul was those observances of the Law that set Jews apart from Gentiles.

For Dunn the issue Paul addressed was not how one was saved: the issue was sociological. The "works of the Law" were circumcision,* purity and food laws, and Sabbath observance. In the ancient world the pagan writers regarded these very practices as distinctly Jewish. These "works of the law" marked "the boundaries of the covenant people" (Dunn, 193). Paul was saying no to the Law inasmuch as it set boundaries for the covenant people. Thus Paul was saying both no and yes to the Law at the same time. According to Dunn, Paul said no to the Law where it reinforced Jewish nationalism and exclusiveness, but yes to the Law where it expressed the will of God.

How could Paul the Jew do this? How could he say no to some provisions of the Law and yes to other provisions of the same Law? The answer seems to lie in Paul's apocalyptic worldview. A shift had taken place from the old age to the new age in Christ. Law or Torah was superseded by Christ. Paul's statement in Romans 10:4 is crucial: "For Christ is the end of the Law, that everyone who has faith may be justified." Paul was not speaking of "the end" as termination of the Law, but as the goal or fulfillment of the Law. While the Law still defined God's will, it no longer functioned salvifically. The new age had arrived, and the Law had been superseded by God's new gift: Christ. Thus Paul can write in 1 Corinthians 15:20-22:

> But in fact Christ has been raised from the dead, the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep. For as by a man came death, by a man has come also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.

The new perspective first advanced by Sanders and then furthered by Dunn does not answer all questions concerning Paul and Torah. But it does answer some. It tends to solve Paul's so-called contradictory attitude toward the Law, as stated above. This new perspective also allows for some continuity between the generally positive attitude toward the Law in the OT and Paul's attitude. Paul opposed the more nationalistic and exclusivistic parts of the Law because God's new act in Christ had extended the covenant to Gentiles: Grace had superseded ritual and race.

Dunn's observation that Paul affirmed the Law where it expressed the will of God is strikingly confirmed by the recent research of P. Tomson. For example, in 1 Corinthians 5:1-5 Paul writes about a man who "is living with his father's wife." The issue is forbidden sexual relationships according to Leviticus 18:1-18 (see Sexuality). Paul tells the church to excommunicate the man. Tomson discovers point-by-point agreement between Paul's discussion and later Jewish legal tradition that explicates forbidden sexual relationships. This is only one example of the continuity between Paul's ethical teachings and Jewish legal tradition.

Finally, this new perspective enables us to see Paul more clearly as a first-century Jew. Jewish scholars have long argued that Paul misunderstood Judaism and his view of the Law differed from that of most first-century Jews. Actually, according to Dunn, the German-Lutheran portrayal of Paul has been the problem. Paul was an authentic first-century Jew; there was no serious discontinuity between Paul and his Jewish past. He was a son of Abraham who objected to narrowing the covenant to the Jewish nation: Abraham was to be a blessing to all the families of the earth (see Universalism).

Among other questions that still remain is Paul's teaching directed toward Jewish Christianity. Was Paul asking Jewish Christians to abandon the boundary markers of the Law in their own practice? Did he teach that they should cease circumcising their sons and observing the dietary laws in their homes? Or was he speaking about fellowship between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians in such places as Antioch and other mixed congregations? The question can be asked more pointedly: Did Paul entirely abandon the boundary markers ("works of the Law") for himself? Or did he continue to observe them in so far as they did not interfere with his Gentile apostolate? At this point, there does not seem to be a clear answer to this question.

Only a few Jewish-Christian voices have survived to tell us how Jewish Christianity reacted to Paul's views concerning the Law. Whether those surviving voices are representative of the various groups composing Jewish Christianity, we do not know. However, these few voices, while they stressed the Jewishness of Jesus, regarded Paul as a villain (Flusser, chap. 13). Some Jewish Christians looked upon Peter as their leader and others preferred James,* the leader of the church in Jerusalem.*

Do these few muffled Jewish-Christian voices constitute the last Jewish pronouncements about Paul the Jew? We hope not. With the scholarly rediscovery of the Judaism of Paul's day, perhaps some Jewish voices contemporary with Paul will offer a more positive evaluation of Paul the Jew.

See also APOCALYPTICISM; CIRCUMCISION; CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; DIASPORA; HELLENISM; ISRAEL; LAW; MYSTERY; MYSTICISM; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PURITY AND IMPURITY; QUMRAN AND PAUL; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Texts: Babylonian Talmud: Sanhedrin (Hebrew-English Edition of the Babylonian Talmud; London: Soncino Press, 1969); Midrash Rabba Genesis (The Midrash Rabba, I Genesis; London: Soncino Press, 1977); Life of Adam and Eve, OTP 2.266-68. Studies: J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. W. Bowker, " 'Merkabah' Visions and the Visions of Paul," JSS (1971) 157-73; H. Conzelmann, I Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); E. E. Ellis, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1978); D. Flusser, Jewish Sources in Early Christianity (New York: Adama Books, 1987); J. Gager, The Origins of Anti-Semitism: Attitudes Towards Judaism in Pagan and Christian Antiquity (New York: Oxford, 1983); L. Gaston, Paul and the Torah (Vancouver: University of British Columbia, 1987); G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); R. N. Longenecker, Paul, Apostle of Liberty (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1976); J. Neyrey, Paul, In Other Words: A Cultural Reading of His Letters (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); W. Pannenberg, Jesus—God and Man (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968); E. Rivkin, "Pharisees," IDBSup 657-63; E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); G. G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (New York: Schocken Books, 1961); idem, "Merkabah Mysticism," EncJud 11. cols. 1386-89; A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (New Haven: Yale, 1990); W. R. Stegner, "Romans 9:6-29: A Midrash," JSNT 22 (1984) 37-52; K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); J. D. Tabor, Things Unutterable: Paul's Ascent to Paradise in Its Greco-Roman, Judaic, and Early Christian Contexts (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986); P. Tomson, Paul and the Jewish Law: Halakha in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984).

W. R. Stegner

JEWISH EXEGESIS. See JEW, PAUL THE; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

JEWISH GNOSTICISM. See GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; OPPONENTS OF PAUL.

JOURNEYS. See ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA.

JOY

For Paul, Christianity was the religion of joy as much as the religion of grace.* Since all was of grace as far as his justification was concerned, one of the main consequences of his reconciliation with God* was his ability to "rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom 5:11), in spite of the afflictions,* hardships and trials that came his way.

1. The Vocabulary of Joy
2. Being in Christ
3. The Fruit of the Spirit
4. Joy in Suffering
5. The Eschatology of Joy

1. The Vocabulary of Joy.

Of the 326 occurrences of words for joy in the NT, 131 are found in the ten letters that are usually ascribed to Paul, namely forty percent. Even if Ephesians and Colossians are discounted, that would still leave a high percentage of the vocabulary of joy in the NT attributable to Paul. So Paul can well be regarded as the theologian of joy as he undoubtedly was that of grace (88 of the 153 NT occurrences of charis, "grace," or fifty-eight percent, are found in Paul). It is significant that the most common cognates for joy (chara, "inner joy," and chairein, "to rejoice") are derived from the same root char- as is the Greek word for "grace," charis. There is a very close connection between the two concepts. Those who have come to experience God's grace, as Paul had done, know that, by standing firm in their faith (2 Cor 1:24), they can continue to celebrate the Christian life as a festival of joy (1 Cor 5:8), in perfect freedom from all anxious worries and fears.

2. Being in Christ.

As far as Paul was concerned, a Christian is a person who is "in Christ"; or, as J. Stewart put it, "The heart of Paul's religion is union with Christ" (Stewart, 147). Christianity is a personal relationship with the risen Lord.

The keynote of the letter to the Philippians is "Rejoice in the Lord" (Phil 3:1; 4:4, 10). What J. Moffatt spoke of as "the history of joy" is described in Philippians 4:4-7, where its implied source is the risen and reigning Lord Jesus Christ. Life's struggle both with external circumstances and with inner anxiety can be endured since "the Lord is at hand". Our safety lies in the fact that we are guarded by God's peace,* which "keeps our hearts and minds in Christ Jesus." The last word, like the first, is a personal relationship, since the history of joy is "simply the history of a man's plain experience with his God in Jesus" (Moffatt).

3. The Fruit of the Spirit.

The Christian life is a life of joyful freedom,* since, with the coming of Christ, Law* has been superseded by grace. In contrast to his opponents in Galatia, Paul boldly declared his reliance upon the cross and all it stood for (Gal 6:14). Believers ought to be able to boast not only in the death* of Christ seen as the outreaching of the love* of God to all human beings, but also in the work accomplished by them in fulfilling the law of Christ (Gal 6:2; see Law of Christ) by showing the divine love to others. Of the ninefold fruit of the Spirit in Galatians 5:22-23, joy comes second in the list as one of three virtues of the inner life. It comes as a close second to the greatest of them all, love, and is followed by peace (see Fruit of the Spirit).

4. Joy in Suffering.

Outward circumstances can be joyfully accepted as factors in the Christian's moral and spiritual progress (Rom 5:3-4). Yet it is in a letter written from prison that Paul's stress on the duty of celebrating in the midst of suffering* comes to its climax. In spite of all that has happened to him and in spite of his present circumstances, the apostle can still "rejoice in the Lord" and glory in work accomplished for his Lord. As the letter to the Philippians* comes to an end, Paul sums up: "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord" (Phil 3:1), and then proceeds, after a parenthesis or interpolation, to give the reason for his "joy in the Lord"—"for we are citizens of heaven" (Phil 3:20). The expectation of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ and of the changing of "our lowly body to be like his glorious body" (Phil 3:21) is enough to keep Christians full of hope* and joy. The message of Philippians was neatly expressed by Bengel: "the sum of the whole letter: I rejoice, rejoice!" (Bengel, 766).

5. The Eschatology of Joy.

Over and over again, Paul links joy with the Christian hope. While no human being can boast in the presence of God (1 Cor 1:29), Christians can exult in their hope of sharing the glory* of God in the life to come (Rom 5:2). Such hope can keep a believer joyful (Rom 12:12), for it includes not only the expectation of the coming of the deliverer, the Lord Jesus Christ, to transfigure our physical bodies* (Phil 3:20-21), but also assures us of joy in the world to come. Provided we suffer with Christ here and now, we can expect to participate in his triumph hereafter. Such union with Christ is the heart of Paul's religion.

See also FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT; GRACE; HOPE; LOVE; PEACE; PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE; SUFFERING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. J. A. Bengel, Gnomon Novi Testamenti (3d ed.; London: Macmillan, 1855); E. Beyreuther and G. Finkenrath, "Joy, Rejoice," NIDNTT 2.352-61; H. Conzelmann, "χαίρω κτλ," TDNT IX.359-72; J. Moffatt, "The History of Joy," ExpT 9 (1897-98) 334-36; W. G. Morrice, Joy in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); J. S. Stewart, A Man in Christ (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1935).

W. G. Morrice

JUDAIZERS

There is some evidence in the Pauline letters that certain Jewish Christians had doubts as to whether Gentile* Christians could be regarded as full members of the people of God* if they did not conform to the requirements of Torah (see Law). Some may even have attempted to force circumcision* and a Jewish life-style on such converts. There is also evidence in early Christianity that some Gentile Christians were attracted to Judaism. The verb judaize and the noun Judaizer have been used in relation to both the above groups with a subsequent lack of clarity in meaning.

1. Introduction
2. Definition and Terminology
3. Paul and Jerusalem: Diversity Within the Early Christian Mission
4. Diversity in Opposition: The Variety of Paul's Opponents

1. Introduction.

At several points in his letters Paul directs his arguments and his anger at opponents* who are misleading or distressing his converts. Such people are probably, in some instances at least, from outside the congregation(s). In Galatians,* 2 Corinthians* and Philippians* we encounter this interaction. One of the questions that has occupied scholars for the last century and a half has been the identity of these opponents. A basic issue has been whether or not to regard such opponents as specific groups peculiar to each local context, or whether to see each instance of opposition as part of a widespread movement. In a famous essay in 1831, F. C. Baur found the identity of Paul's opponents in those who came to Corinth as emissaries of Peter and claiming to be "of Christ." The long-term effect of Baur's contribution was to drive a wedge between Paul and his teaching and that of the primitive church in Jerusalem. A contrast was thus established among interpreters between Gentile and Jewish Christianity, and this contrast has influenced the understanding of Paul's relationship to Jerusalem* even up to the present day (see Paul and His Interpreters).

One outcome of this viewpoint is that Paul is seen too much as an isolated apostle who alone truly understands the universalism* and freedom* that Jesus* represented. Apparently in the memory of the other leading apostles this has either been forgotten, misunderstood or compromised. A misleading contrast informed Baur's and many of his followers' theology—they posited an absolute opposition between particularism and universalism; this is typical of a modern cosmopolitan outlook but should not be read back into the NT. However, from this perspective Paul was seen as a lone contender for the universalism of the gospel* in contrast to the primitive church, whose leaders were in varying degrees tribalistic or particularistic in their ongoing commitment to Judaism.

More recent research has uncovered more diversity in NT groups and theologies. The emphasis upon the particularity of each letter, addressed to a specific situation, has, in following the historical interest of Baur, revealed that Paul's enemies are not necessarily all of Jewish background nor should we regard them as a coherent, organized opposition. Partisanship need not always take the form of an organized party.

2. Definition and Terminology.

2.1. Judaizer. The term Judaizer originates as a transliteration via the Latin of the Greek verb ioudaïzein (ioudaïzō). The latter is a hapax legomenon in the NT (Gal 2:14). The normal meaning of the verb was "to live as a Jew in accordance with Jewish customs." It is found in this sense, for example, in Plutarch (Cicero 7.6), Josephus (e.g., J.W. 2.17.10 §454) and Ignatius (Magn. 10.3). In Galatians 2:14 it probably means "to become a Jewish convert and to keep the Law" (cf. Gal 5:3). In Galatians 2 we also find a unique NT expression ioudaïkōs zēn, "to live as a Jew." Peter's religious status is defined by Paul as being that of a Jew (Ioudaios hyparchōn), and yet as one who lives a Gentile life-style (ethnikōs, another NT hapax legomenon; cf. ethnikos in Mt 5:47; 6:7; 18:17; 3 Jn 7).

Ioudaïsmos (Judaism) occurs in the NT only at Galatians 1:13-14. The term appears to describe the Jewish way of life as a whole as it is distinct from that of other religions (cf. Ignatius Phld. 6.1, where it appears as opposite to Christianity, christianismos). One of the difficulties encountered in a discussion of the meaning of Judaizer or judaize is ascertaining where a reference may indicate simply an adherence to the Jewish way of life without implying any deliberate intention of forcing it upon Gentiles. Thus Josephus (J.W. 2.18.2 §463) appears to distinguish between the Judaizers (hoi ioudaïzontes) and the Jews (hoi Ioudaioi). In Christian literature the term Judaizer generally characterizes Christians engaged in Jewish practices. For example, Ignatius (Magn. 10.3) says "It is absurd to say 'Jesus Christ' and to practice Judaism" (ioudaïzein). It is probably correct to maintain that "to judaize" is not quite synonymous with simply living as a Jew (ioudaïkōs zēn), but seems rather to describe the somewhat artificial character of new converts (cf. Esth 8:17 [LXX]: "Many of the people had themselves circumcised and practiced Judaism because of their fear of the Jews.")

2.2. Those of the Circumcision. According to Galatians 2:12, in the encounter with Peter at Antioch, Paul accused him of being afraid of the Jews, "those of the circumcision" (tous ek peritomēs; see Circumcision). Part of the problem is that Paul severely criticized certain believers (Gal 2:14) in addition to Peter.* He also refers to "certain people from James*" (Gal 2:12) whom he did not accuse of hypocrisy. Who are included in these people referred to as "those of the circumcision" (Gal 2:12)? It is possible that the people from James are included, but perhaps Paul also had in mind the Jews in general, including non-Christian Jews—in fact all those who think according to Jewish patterns.

However, we must be careful to allow for at least some diversity among those who think as Jews. Peter must be included as a Jewish person—so too James and John—but according to Paul, these three pillars did not insist that Gentile Christians should be circumcised. The problem with translating tous ek peritomēs as "the circumcision party" is that it does not allow for diversity, but suggests that all who belonged to the "circumcision party" were ideologically committed to promoting circumcision among Gentile Christians and, therefore, inevitably involved in opposition to the Pauline Gentile mission.

In addition to the above group of Jews probably associated with Jerusalem in some sense, we have other references to Judaizers in the Galatian churches. It would be easy simply to identify these with the "circumcision party" as indicated above. However, it is not at all clear that those advocating circumcision for Gentile Christians in Galatia were themselves Jews by birth.

2.3. Those Who Receive Circumcision. A key text is Galatians 6:13, where Paul surprisingly claims that "even those who receive circumcision (hoi peritemnomenoi) do not themselves keep the Law." On the face of it this looks like a plain case of Gentile Christians who, having recently received circumcision themselves, are now attempting to force it upon other Gentiles. Munck (88) notes how interpreters have tried for a long time to get around this possibility (i.e., that Gentile Christians also agitate for Judaism) by maintaining the traditional view that the agitators in the Galatian churches were Jewish Christians. This is done by making the present participle with the article (hoi peritemnomenoi) denote "those belonging to the class of those . . . who are circumcised according to the established custom, 'the class of' Jews who receive circumcision."

Since the present participle of peritemnō ("to circumcise") occurs only in two places (Gal 5:3 and 6:13) in the NT and not at all in the LXX or in the Apostolic Fathers, there is little on which to come to a clear understanding of its meaning. However, it is used in Justin's Dialogue, 27.5 and 123.1, twice in each place, and in these instances there is no doubt that the meaning is "receive circumcision." Munck argues from this that since the present participle in the middle voice of peritemnō never means "those who belong to the circumcision" but everywhere "those who receive circumcision," or "those who get themselves circumcised," then this must be the meaning in Galatians 6:13 as well. Paul's opponents who are agitating for Judaism among the Galatian Gentile Christians are therefore themselves Gentile Christians. Their circumcision is still in the present, so that all of this judaizing movement is of recent date. (It should be noted, however, that there is strong MS support for the perfect passive participle, peritetmēmenoi (P^{46} B et al.], "those who have been circumcised," which at least attests to how some early scribes understood the present participle.)

Whether or not we follow Munck entirely in this argument, it is very probable that certain traditional interpretations have little or no weight. It is certainly clear that tous ek peritomēs cannot any longer be translated simply as "the circumcision party" (RSV) or even as "the circumcision faction" (NRSV). More precision is needed in the use of terms so that distinctions are drawn between a neutral use of the term circumcision such as Romans 15:8, "Christ became a servant to the circumcised," and other texts in which some degree of commitment to a policy of circumcision for all seems presupposed. We need to distinguish between Jewish Christians who accept Gentiles as Gentiles and others who can properly be termed Judaizers in that they insist on circumcision for all. Moreover, Gentile Christianity cannot be viewed as a monochrome entity, and differing attitudes to the Law and the Temple* have to be recognized within it. Before we deal more specifically with the identity of Paul's opponents, we wish to eliminate if possible one traditional source of opposition.

3. Paul and Jerusalem: Diversity Within the Early Christian Mission.

F. C. Baur not only regarded all Paul's opponents as part of a single movement, but he also connected them via Galatians 2 and Acts 15 with Jerusalem. However, Paul cannot really be viewed as being in continual opposition to Jerusalem. What he says in conflict with opponents must be distinguished from what he explicitly says of the Jerusalem church.

Paul never connects any of his opponents with Jerusalem. Moreover, he always speaks of the Jerusalem church in positive terms. He calls the Jerusalem Christians "the saints"; he refers to their leaders as "apostles"* and "brothers of the Lord," and to three of them as "pillars" (even if he may do so grudgingly). Paul recognized that Peter's apostolate to the circumcised has been fruitful, just as his own mission to the Gentiles has been. There was certainly a degree of mutual recognition as regards these two spheres of mission.* So although the Jerusalem church differs in its mission from that of Paul, there is agreement in principle that both of their respective missions represent the work of the Spirit. Jerusalem may have regarded itself as restricted in mission to Israel,* but its leaders nevertheless supported Paul's mission to the Gentiles.* What is even more significant is that Paul himself can say "he who worked through Peter for the mission to the circumcised, worked through me also for the Gentiles" (Gal 2:8).

A more balanced view of the Jerusalem church is to see diversity of opinion represented within it just as there was diversity at Antioch and elsewhere. Some people at several points may have been closer to Paul on particular issues than others. But in the end there is solidarity in the gospel of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 15:11), and James eventually shared with Paul in martyrdom for his faith, demonstrating beyond dispute that what he shared with the apostle to the Gentiles was more significant than what joined him to his fellow Jerusalemites.

4. Diversity in Opposition: The Variety of Paul's Opponents.

Baur's attempt to portray all Paul's opponents as Judaizers has been gradually modified and to some extent refuted over the years. The oversimplification of dividing early Christianity into two opposing sections and the failure to distinguish between differing emphases within each section was soon found to be lacking in various respects, even in the last century. More recent studies by W. Lütgert, J. Munck and W. Schmithals offer alternative perspectives on the situations Paul addressed. Lütgert drew attention to the existence of spiritual enthusiasts of a gnostic* libertine variety and saw them as Paul's opponents in 1 Corinthians and (in company with Judaizers) also in Galatians.

Munck stressed the particularity of each letter as addressing a specific and therefore probably a different situation. As noted, he saw the Judaizers in Galatians as originating from Gentile converts; nor were there any Judaizers at Corinth or even at Philippi (where at least some of the opposition came from Jews).

In place of what J. D. G. Dunn (1990, 370) calls Baur's "pan-judaizer" hypothesis, W. Schmithals has proposed a "pan-gnostic" hypothesis so that the opponents in Galatians are viewed not as Judaizers but as Jewish-Christian Gnostics, and likewise in Corinthians and Philippians.

As has been shown above, comprehensive hypotheses are not fully adequate to account for the enormous diversity of the first century. Nor is it appropriate to see the heresies that were inflicted upon early Christianity as all emerging from Jewish sources. Current research as exemplified in the studies by D. Georgi, R. P. Martin, J. L. Sumney and C. C. Hill has sought a reappraisal of division within the earliest church. More attention has been devoted to the Hellenists and to their role in opposition to Paul. For example, it may be that Paul faced the same opponents in 1 and 2 Corinthians (though there were developments between the writing of the two letters) and that these opponents were pneumatics. The only real evidence for Judaizers is in Galatians, and, it may be argued that Munck's thesis that they were of Gentile origin is worthy of serious consideration.

See also ABRAHAM; CIRCUMCISION; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; GENTILES; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; JEW, PAUL THE; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Baird, History of New Testament Research, Vol. 1, From Deism to Tübingen (Minneapolis: Augsburg-Fortress, 1992); idem, "One against the Other: Intra-Church Conflict in 1 Corinthians," in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. R. T. Fortna and B. Gaventa (Nashville: Abingdon, 1990) 116-36; P. W. Barnett, "Opposition in Corinth," JSNT 22 (1984) 3-17; C. K. Barrett, "Paul's Opponents in II Corinthians," NTS 17 (1970-71) 233-54; F. C. Baur, Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ (London, 1876); H. D. Betz, Paulus und die socratische Tradition (BHT 45; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1972) 132-37; idem, Galatians: Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and their Significance for the Character of Christianity (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); idem, "Judaizers," in A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. R. J. Coggins and J. L. Houlden (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990) 369-71; idem, "The Relationship between Paul and Jerusalem according to Galatians 1 and 2," NTS 28 (1982) 461-78; E. E. Ellis, "Paul and his Opponents: Trends in Research," in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults, Vol. 1, ed. J. Neusner (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975) 264-98; G. Friedrich, "Die Gegner des Paulus im II Korintherbrief," in Abraham unser Vater: Festschrift für Otto Michel, ed. O Betz et al. (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963) 181-215; L. Gaston, "Paul and Jerusalem," in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of F. W. Beare, ed. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd (Waterloo, ON: Wilfred Laurier University) 61-72; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in II Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); M. Goodman, The Ruling Class of Judea: The Origins of the Jewish Revolt against Rome, A.D. 66-70 (Cambridge: University Press, 1987); J. J. Gunther, St. Paul's Opponents and Their Background: A Study of Apocalyptic and Jewish Sectarian Teachings (NovTSup 35; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); M. Hengel, "Der Jakobsbrief als antipaulinischer Polemik," in Tradition and Inter- pretation: Essays in Honor of E. Earle Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 248-78; C. C. Hill, Hellenists and Hebrews: Reappraising Division within the Earliest Church (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1992); C. Holladay, Theios Aner in Hellenistic Judaism: A Critique of the Use of This Category in NT Christology (SBLDS 40; Missoula: Scholars, 1973); J. Jervell, "Der schwache Charismatiker," in Rechtfertigung: Festschrift für Ernst Käsemann zum 70 Geburtstag, ed. J. Friedrich et al. (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1976) 185-98; E. Käsemann, "Paul and Israel," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 183-87; idem, "Die Legitimität des Apostels: Eine Untersuchung zu II Korinther 10-13," ZNW 41 (1942) 33-71; M. Kettunen, Der Abfassungszweck des Römerbriefes (Helsinki, 1979); H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament, Vol. 2 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); G. Lüdemann, Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); R. P. Martin, "The Opponents of Paul in II Corinthians: An Old Issue Revisited," in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament: Essays in Honor of E. Earle Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 279-89; J. L. Martyn, "The Covenants of Hagar and Sarah," in Faith and History: Essays in Honor of Paul W. Meyer, ed. J. T. Carroll et al. (Atlanta: Scholars, 1990) 160-92; idem, "A Law-Observant Mission to Gentiles: The Background of Galatians," SJT 38 (1985) 307-24; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1959); W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); P. Stuhlmacher, Der Brief an die Römer (NTD 6; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989) 13-14, 49, 222-23; idem, "The Theme of Romans," ABR 36 (1988) 31-44; J. L. Sumney, Identifying Paul's Opponents: The Question of Method in II Corinthians (JSNTSup 40; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); M. E. Thrall, "Super-Apostles, Servants of Christ, and Servants of Satan," JSNT 6 (1980) 42-57; A. J. M. Wedderburn, The Reasons for Romans (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1989); S. G. Wilson, "Gentile Judaizers," NTS 38 (1992) 605-16.

W. S. Campbell

JUDGE. See GOD; JUDGMENT.

JUDGMENT

Paul shares with his Jewish antecedents the conviction that God* as Creator has the right to call people to account for their behavior and allot their destinies accordingly.

1. Terminology and Meaning
2. Continuity and Discontinuity with Judaism
3. Judgment and the Gospel of Christ
4. Judgment According to Works
5. Judgment of Christians

1. Terminology and Meaning.

Two main word groups occur frequently in Paul's letters. Like the English verb to judge, the Greek krinō can mean "form an opinion," "decide" (1 Cor 2:2), but commonly refers to the assessment of human beings by others (1 Cor 4:5; 6:1) or by God (Rom 2:16). Related words include krima ("judgment," "sentence," Rom 2:2; 13:2); katakrinō ("condemn," 1 Cor 11:32); katakrima ("condemnation," Rom 5:16). Words derived from dikē ("justice," "punishment," 2 Thess 1:9) include ekdikēsis ("punishment," 2 Thess 1:8) and ekdikos ("punisher," Rom 13:4; 1 Thess 4:6). But Paul expresses his thought also in other images, such as wrath (orgē, Rom 1:18), destruction (phthora, Gal 6:8; see Wrath, Destruction), "paying back" (antapodidōmi, 2 Thess 1:6) and reward* (antapodosis, Col 3:24).

2. Continuity and Discontinuity with Judaism.

In many respects Paul takes over perspectives familiar in Jewish literature. Non-Christian Jews would find nothing strange in Paul's expectation of a final "day" of judgment (Rom 2:16) when all "will appear before God's judgment seat" (Rom 14:10) to be judged "according to their deeds" (Rom 2:6; 1 Thess 4:6; cf. 1 Enoch 45:3; 4 Ezra 7:33-44; see Eschatology). But they would be shocked by his reversal of common Jewish assumptions about the outcome of judgment. Because God exercises impartiality in judgment (Rom 2:11), Jew and Gentile* alike face both the prospect of judgment and the possibility of salvation* through Christ.*

3. Judgment and the Gospel of Christ.

For Paul, the process of judgment is integrally related to his message of salvation through Christ. Although he can speak of God's righteous judgment (Rom 2:5; 2 Thess 1:5), God's wrath (Rom 1:18) and God's judgment seat (Rom 14:10), he regularly associates judgment with Christ. He cites with reference to Christ OT texts which originally referred to judgment by Yahweh (2 Thess 1:9-10; citing Is 2:10, 19, 21). He links judgment with the "day" of Christ's Parousia (2 Thess 1:6-10; 1 Cor 4:3-5), when "we shall all appear before the judgment seat of Christ" (2 Cor 5:10).

The criterion by which people will be judged is their attitude or relationship to Christ: the key question is whether they "believe" (see Faith) in him, whether they "know" (see Knowledge) God and "obey the gospel* of the Lord Jesus" (2 Thess 1:8, 10).

The outcome of the final judgment also is expressed in terms of relationship to Christ. Unbelievers will suffer "exclusion from the presence of the Lord*" (2 Thess 1:9), while the destiny of believers is to be "at home with the Lord" (2 Cor 5:8; see Intermediate State). Paul is quite reticent about going further than this in describing human destiny. He does not use terms such as Gehenna (Mk 9:43, 45, 47) or the vivid imagery of some Jewish apocalyptists (see Apocalypticism). He prefers more abstract terms such as "life" (zōē) and "death" (thanatos, Rom 6:23; see Life and Death), "destruction" (olethros, 1 Thess 5:3; apōleia, Phil 3:19; phthora, Gal 6:8; see Wrath, Destruction). He is more concerned to warn of the danger of missing life in Christ than to explore the precise form which this loss might take.

4. Judgment According to Works.

Paul's focus on relationship to Christ is not in conflict with his affirmation of judgment according to works. For he understands people's deeds as evidence of their character, showing whether their relation to God is fundamentally one of faith or unbelief (see James and Paul). Judgment according to deeds does not imply degrees of reward or punishment in accordance with the quantity of good or evil works done. In Romans 2:5-11 and elsewhere Paul distinguishes only two groups of people—those who do evil and those who do good—and only two possible destinies (see Snodgrass). When he writes that those whose lives are dominated by sinful acts "will not inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal 5:19-21; cf. 1 Cor 6:9-10; Eph 5:5; see Kingdom of God/Christ), he implies that if professing Christians persistently did evil rather than good they would show themselves not to be Christians and to be in danger of condemnation at the final judgment. Christians are not exempt from that judgment precisely because its function is to show, by the evidence of people's deeds, whether they are in relationship to Christ or not (2 Cor 5:10).

5. Judgment of Christians.

For Christian believers justification* by grace represents a real, though not irreversible (see Apostasy), anticipation of the verdict of the final judgment. Through faith in Christ they have been accepted into relationship with God and are expected to bear the fruit of this relationship in their lives (see Fruit of the Spirit). At the final judgment the evidence of their deeds will confirm the reality of this relationship, which will then find its eternal fulfillment in God's presence.

Two passages in 1 Corinthians (1 Cor 5:5; 11:27-34) seem to express the conviction that, when Christians are guilty of serious sin,* God may use illness (see Healing, Illness) as a disciplinary judgment (see Discipline) to provoke them to repentance. But it would be risky to conclude from this limited evidence either that (in Paul's view) God regularly deals with Christians' disobedience in this way or that Paul normally understands illness as an expression of divine judgment.

Some have argued, on the basis of texts such as 1 Corinthians 3:14-15 and 2 Corinthians 5:10, that Paul believed in a final assessment of Christians leading to degrees of reward in the future life (see Rewards). But these tantalizingly unspecific texts are an uncertain basis for such a doctrine. What they do make clear, however, is Paul's willingness to urge human accountability to God as a motive for Christians to take seriously their life and service.

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; ESCHATOLOGY; JUSTIFICATION; LIFE AND DEATH; REWARDS; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; SALVATION; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. P. Donfried, "Justification and Last Judgment in Paul," ZNW 67 (1976) 90-110; F. V. Filson, St. Paul's Conception of Recompense (Leipzig: Hinrichs'sche Buchhandlung, 1931); C. J. Roetzel, Judgment in the Community (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972); K. R. Snodgrass, "Justification by Grace—to the Doers: An Analysis of the Place of Romans 2 in the Theology of Paul," NTS 32 (1986) 72-93; S. H. Travis, Christ and the Judgment of God (Basingstoke: Marshall Pickering, 1986).

S. H. Travis

JUSTICE.

See GOD; JUDGMENT; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

JUSTIFICATION

Since the time of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, considerable attention has been paid to the theme of justification in Paul. For Martin Luther the doctrine of justification was not merely the center and focus of Paul's thought; it was the "article by which the church stands or falls," the touchstone and heartbeat of all Christian theology and spirituality. That judgment has, however, been subject to intense scrutiny over the last two centuries. Recent discussion of Paul's understanding of justification has tended to focus on a number of major themes, each of which merits careful attention.

1. The Meaning of the Term Justification
2. The Relation of Paul's Thought to That of Contemporary Judaism
3. Paul's Understanding of "the Righteousness of God"
4. The Relation Between Faith and Works in Paul's Thought

5. The Importance of Justification to Paul's Thought

The purpose of this article is to explore and explain the present state of scholarly research on these questions. (It will be clear, however, that these issues are not merely of scholarly interest; they are of vital importance to Christian evangelism and spirituality.)

We begin by considering what Paul means by the term justification and how this differs from related terms such as sanctification (see Holiness, Sanctification) and *salvation.

1. The Meaning of the Term Justification.

The Pauline vocabulary relating to justification is grounded in the OT and seems to express the notion of "rightness" or "rectitude" rather than "righteousness."* The OT prefers the verb rather than the noun, presumably thereby indicating that justification results from an action of God* whereby an individual is set in a right relationship with God—that is, vindicated or declared to be in the right. Paul echoes this emphasis, using the verb dikaioō, "to justify," relatively often, but generally avoiding using the noun dikaiōsis, "justification" (Rom 4:25). The verb denotes God's powerful, cosmic and universal action in effecting a change in the situation between sinful humanity and God, by which God is able to acquit and vindicate believers, setting them in a right and faithful relation to himself.

How does justification relate to other Pauline soteriological terms? It is tempting to adopt a simplistic approach to the matter. For example, one could attempt to force justification, sanctification and salvation into a neat past-present-future framework (Donfried), as follows:

> Justification: a past event, with present implications (sanctification).
>
> Sanctification: a present event, dependent upon a past event (justification), which has future implications (salvation).
>
> Salvation: a future event, already anticipated and partially experienced in the past event of justification and the present event of sanctification, and dependent upon them.

But this is inadequate. Justification has future, as well as past, reference (Rom 2:13; 8:33; Gal 5:4-5), and appears to relate to both the beginning of the Christian life and its final consummation. Similarly, sanctification can also refer to a past event (1 Cor 6:11) or a future event (1 Thess 5:23). And salvation is an exceptionally complex idea, embracing not simply a future event, but something which has happened in the past (Rom 8:24; 1 Cor 15:2) or which is taking place now (1 Cor 1:18).

It is important to note that not all Paul's statements regarding justification are specifically linked with the theme of faith.* The statements appear to fall into two general categories (Hultgren): (1) those set in strongly theocentric contexts, referring to God's cosmic and universal action in relation to human sin; and (2) those making reference to faith, which is the mark to identify the people of God. This is perhaps best regarded as a difference of emphasis rather than of substance. In its universal sense justification seems to underlie Paul's argument for the universality of the gospel*; there is no distinction between Jews (see Israel) and Gentiles.* But in its more restricted sense justification is concerned with the identity of the people of God, and the basis of its membership.

Justification language appears in Paul both with reference to the inauguration of the life of faith and also its final consummation. It is a complex and all-embracing notion, that anticipates the verdict of the final judgment* (Rom 8:30-34) by declaring in advance the verdict of ultimate acquittal. The believer's present justified Christian existence is thus an anticipation and advance participation of deliverance from the wrath* to come, and an assurance in the present of the final eschatological (see Eschatology) verdict of acquittal (Rom 5:9-10).

2. The Relation of Paul's Thought to That of Contemporary Judaism.

In recent years a considerable debate on the relation of Paul's views on justification to those of first-century Judaism has developed, centering upon the writings of E. P. Sanders. His first major writing to address this theme was Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977), followed several years later by the more important Paul, the Law and the Jewish People (1983). Sanders's work represents a demand for a complete reappraisal of our understanding of Paul's relation to Judaism (see Jew, Paul the). Sanders noted that Paul has too often been read through Lutheran eyes (a perspective in marked contrast to the Reformed standpoint, associated with Bullinger and Calvin, it stresses the divergence between the Law and the gospel). Luther argued that Paul criticized a totally misguided attempt on the part of Jewish legalists to find favor and acceptance in the sight of God by earning righteousness through performing works of the Law* (see Works of the Law). This view, Sanders argued, colored the analysis of such Lutheran writings as Käsemann and Bultmann. These scholars, perhaps unwittingly, read Paul through Lutheran spectacles, and thus failed to realize that Paul had to be read against his proper historical context in first-century Judaism.

According to Sanders, Palestinian Judaism at the time of Paul could be characterized as a form of "covenantal nomism." The Law is to be regarded as an expression of the covenant* between God and Israel, and is intended to spell out as clearly and precisely as possible what forms of human conduct are appropriate within the context of this covenant. Righteousness is thus defined as behavior or attitudes which are consistent with being the historical covenant people of God. "Works of the Law" are thus not understood (as Luther suggested) as the means by which Jews believed they could gain access to the covenant; for they already stood within it. Rather, these works are an expression of the fact that the Jews already belonged to the covenant people of God and were living out their obligations to that covenant.

Sanders puts it like this. He rejects the opinion that "the righteousness which comes from the law" is "a meritorious achievement which allows one to demand reward* from God and is thus a denial of grace." "Works of the Law" were not understood as the basis of entry to the covenant, but of maintaining that covenant. As Sanders puts it, "works are the condition of remaining 'in,' but they do not earn salvation." If Sanders is right, the basic features of Luther's interpretation of Paul are incorrect, and require radical revision.

So what, then, is Paul's understanding of the difference between Judaism and Christianity according to Sanders? Having argued that Jews never believed in salvation on account of works or unaided human effort, what does Sanders see as providing the distinctive advantage of Christianity over and against Judaism? Having argued that it is not correct to see Judaism as a religion of merit and Christianity as a religion of grace,* Sanders argues as follows. Judaism sees its hope of salvation as resting upon "their status as God's covenant people who possess the law," whereas Christians believe in "a better righteousness based solely upon believing participation in Christ." Paul, like Judaism, was concerned with the issue of entering into and remaining within the covenant. The basic difference is Paul's declaration that the Jews have no national charter of privilege; membership of the covenant is open to all who have faith in Christ and who thus stand in continuity with Abraham* (Rom 4).

Sanders's analysis is important, not least in that it forces us to ask hard questions about Paul's relation to his Jewish background and the relation between the idea of participating in Christ and justification. (Interestingly, both Luther and Calvin made the notion of participating in Christ of central importance to their doctrines of justification, Calvin to the point of making justification the consequence of such participation). But is Sanders right? The debate over this matter continues and is likely to go on for some time. But the following points seem to be sufficiently well established to note.

First, Sanders is rather vague about why Paul is convinced of the superiority of Christianity over Judaism. Judaism is presented as being wrong, simply because it is not Christianity. They are different dispensations of the same covenant. But Paul seems to regard Christianity as far more than some kind of dispensational shift within Judaism. R. H. Gundry is one of a number of scholars to stress that salvation history does not account for all that Paul says, much less for the passion with which he says it.

Second, Sanders suggests that both Paul and Judaism regard works as the principle of continuing in salvation through the covenant. Yet Paul appears to regard good works as evidential rather than instrumental. In other words, they are a demonstration of the fact that the believers stand within the covenant rather than instrumental in maintaining them within that covenant. One enters within the sphere of the covenant through faith. There is a radical new element here, which does not fit in as easily with existing Jewish ideas as Sanders seems to imply. Sanders may well be right in suggesting that good works are both a condition for and a sign of remaining within the covenant. Paul, however, sees faith as the necessary and sufficient condition for and sign of being in the covenant, with works (at best) a sign of remaining within its bounds.

Third, Sanders tends to regard Paul's doctrine of justification in a slightly negative light, as posing a challenge to the notion of a national, ethnic election. In other words, Paul's doctrine of justification is a subtle challenge to the notion that Israel* has special religious rights on account of its national identity. N. T. Wright, however, has argued that Paul's doctrine of justification should be viewed positively, as an attempt to redefine who comes within the ambit of the promises made by God to Abraham (Wright 1980 and 1992). Such ideas, which may subsequently be found developed in such essays as J. D. G. Dunn (1983) treat justification as Paul's redefinition of how the inheritance of Abraham genuinely embraces the Gentiles apart from the Law.

3. Paul's Understanding of the "Righteousness of God."

There is a close semantic connection between the terms justification (dikaiōsis) and righteousness (dikaio- synē) in Paul's thought, making it essential to give at least a brief account of Paul's understanding of righteousness in the present discussion (see Righteousness, Righteousness of God). The idea of the revelation of the righteousness of God is obviously of major importance to Paul's conception of the gospel (e.g., Rom 1:16-17). Before exploring this in any detail, a serious difficulty must be noted, arising directly out of the English language. English possesses two words which are regularly used to translate the Greek dikaiosynē and the Latin iustitia: "justice" and "righteousness." These words have very different associations in English. Righteousness tends to mean something like "personal moral uprightness" whereas justice tends to bear the meaning of "social and political fairness." The former has individualistic, the latter social and communal, associations. If dikaiosynē tou theou is translated as "the righteousness of God," the English translation itself can mislead us regarding Paul's intentions by imposing individualist ideas of righteousness upon God. There is no easy way of avoiding this difficulty other than noting that one could equally well translate the phrase as "the justice of God."

But what does the phrase mean? There is a distinguished history of interpretation of this term, going back to the first centuries of the Christian tradition. Augustine of Hippo argued that "the righteousness of God" did not refer to the personal righteousness of God (in other words, the righteousness by which God is himself righteous), but to the righteousness which he bestows upon sinners, in order to justify them (in other words, the righteousness which comes from God). This interpretation of the phrase seems to have dominated the Western theological tradition until the fourteenth century, when writers such as Gabriel Biel began to reinterpret it in terms of "the righteousness by which God is himself righteous."

The interpretation of the phrase came to be of major importance at the time of the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Luther's theological breakthrough, probably dating from 1515, centers on the question of what it meant to speak of God as righteous. Luther initially believed that it meant that God was himself righteous, and employed that righteousness to reward those who were obedient and punish those who were sinners. As Luther knew himself to be a sinner, he could not see how the revelation of the righteousness of God could conceivably be gospel—good news—for sinners. Gradually, he came to discover that it referred to the righteousness which God imputes to sinners, covering their sins, and enabling them to be counted as righteous in the sight of God (coram Deo).

This understanding of the nature of the righteousness of God has continued to find a place in the modern debate, especially on the part of Lutheran interpreters of Paul. Two such interpreters may be considered in detail—R. Bultmann and E. Käsemann.

Bultmann, basing his view especially on Romans 10:3 and Philippians 3:9, argued that the "righteousness of God" was not a moral, but a relational, term. Believers are counted as being righteous by means of their faith. The term "righteousness of God" represents a genitive of authorship. Whereas Judaism regarded the bestowal of this righteousness as part and parcel of the future eschatological hope,* something which would happen at the end of history, Bultmann argued that Paul was declaring that this righteousness is imputed to believers in the present time, through faith.

E. Käsemann subjected Bultmann's interpretation to a penetrating criticism on a number of grounds. First, he argued that Bultmann had fallen into the trap of a radical individualism, based on his anthropocentric approach to theology. Bultmann was mainly concerned with questions of human existence; he ought, according to Käsemann, to have concentrated on the purpose of God. Furthermore, by interpreting "the righteousness of God" as a genitive of authorship, Bultmann had managed to drive a wedge between the God who gives and the gift which is given. Bultmann's approach isolated the gift from the giver, and concentrated on the gift itself rather than on God himself. Käsemann comments thus: "The Gift can never be separated from the Giver; it participates in the power of God, since God steps on to the scene in the gift" (Käsemann 1969, 174).

This lack of balance could be recovered by understanding "righteousness" as referring to God himself, rather than to that which he gives. Käsemann then argues that the "righteousness of God" refers to God in action. It refers to both his power, and to his gift. (Strictly speaking, then, Käsemann is not treating the "righteousness of God" as a statement about God's attributes, but as a reference to God in action.) A cluster of phrases may help convey the sort of things that Käsemann has in mind here: "salvation-creating power"; "a transformation of [our] existence"; "the power-character of the Gift"; "a change of Lordship" (Käsemann 1969, 168-82). The basic theme that recurs throughout Käsemann's discussion is that of God's saving power and action, revealed eschatologically in Jesus Christ. It merges a number of central Pauline themes, including those of victory through Christ, God's faithfulness to his covenant, and his giving of himself in power and action.

Käsemann's approach has been very influential in recent years, both positively and negatively (see Way). Basing himself on Käsemann, P. Stuhlmacher argues that it is unacceptable to treat the "righteousness of God" as if it were a purely theocentric notion or an exclusively anthropocentric idea. It brings together elements of both, as the embodiment of the saving action of God in Christ, that brings new life for believers in its wake. The righteousness of God is both demonstrated and seen in action in the redemptive event of Christ—both in terms of God's faithfulness to his covenant and in terms of the salvific transformation of the believer.

A much more critical approach is adopted by K. Stendahl, who argued that Käsemann had neglected the importance of salvation history (often referred to in its German form, Heilsgeschichte) in his analysis. In fact, Stendahl suggests that Käsemann has virtually lost sight of the fact that Paul locates the event of justification in a specific historical context—namely, the history of God's dealings with his people, Israel. There is every danger that Käsemann's approach could lead to some kind of unhistorical mysticism* by failing to see that Paul discusses justification within the context of "reflection on God's plan for the world." Drawing on a series of passages (most significantly, Rom 9—11), Stendahl argues that Paul seems far more interested in the way in which God enables salvation to come about through history (above all, through the history of Israel) rather than with the abstract idea of justification by faith.

Once more, an important debate is still under way and has yet to be resolved. J. Reumann helpfully suggests that four main lines of interpretation of the "righteousness of God" may be discerned, along with their respective champions, as follows:

1. An objective genitive: "a righteousness which is valid before God" (Luther).

2. A subjective genitive: "righteousness as an attribute or quality of God" (Käsemann).

3. A genitive of authorship: "a righteousness that goes forth from God" (Bultmann).

4. A genitive of origin: "man's righteous status which is the result of God's action of justifying" (Cranfield).

However, there is a general consensus on one point of major importance, which needs to be emphasized. The "righteousness of God" is not for Paul primarily a moral concept. Rather, it represents a profound statement about the relevance of God for the human situation. Especially in popular circles, there is often a disturbing tendency to use Pauline texts to construct a picture of God as some kind of moral rigorist and thus impose human conceptions of righteousness upon God. If Pauline exegesis has achieved anything, it is to remind us of the need to interpret Pauline phrases within their proper context, rather than impose "self-evident" interpretations upon them.

4. The Relation Between Faith and Works in Paul's Thought.

It is sometimes remarked that justification by faith implies a devaluing of human works. Or does it? A long and distinguished tradition of interpretation, drawing its inspiration largely from Luther, has seen an absolute contradiction between faith and works. They are held to be mutually exclusive entities designating two radically opposed ways of thinking about and responding to God. The way of works is seen as oriented toward human achievement, centered upon human righteousness and based upon human merit. The way of faith is seen as radically opposite, oriented toward God's achievement in Christ, centered upon the righteousness of God and based upon divine grace.

Yet this is an inadequate understanding of a complex aspect of Paul's understanding of justification. It is unquestionably a simple interpretation of Paul, and possesses all the seductive attractiveness of simplicity. But it is not adequate. It fails to do justice to the nuanced understanding of the relation of faith and works within Paul's thought, most notably expressed in the terse statement that "not the hearers, but the doers of the Law will be justified" (Rom 2:13). Some (e.g., Bultmann) have sought to dismiss this as a vestige of Paul's Jewish phase. But this cannot be maintained in the face of the evidence.

Perhaps the most important issue to emerge from recent Pauline interpretation concerning the relation between faith and works centers on clarifying the relation between Paul's theme of "justification by faith" and "judgment by works" (see James and Paul). There seems to be an apparent contradiction here, the resolution of which is made considerably more difficult by the fact that Paul can speak of this future judgment both negatively (as a warning against disobedience) and positively (as an encouragement for obedience). E. P. Sanders argues that Paul reproduces a characteristic first-century Jewish attitude, which could be summarized in the words "God judges according to their deeds those whom he saves by his grace." Justification by faith resonates with the accents of grace—so why are believers going to be judged on the basis of their works (e.g., Rom 2:12; 14:10; 1 Cor 3:15; 2 Cor 5:10), which resonates with the accents of human achievement? But this statement of the problem and its solution fails to deal with the fact that justification is not seen as an event in the past, but as something with future reference (Rom 2:13; 8:33; Gal 5:4-5). It is not simply a case of being justified in the past and judged in the future; there is a "not yet" element to Paul's teaching on justification which Sanders cannot quite explain.

One possible explanation of the way in which justification and future judgment are related involves an enhanced sensitivity toward the different contexts which the Pauline letters presuppose (N. M. Watson). Paul's message of justification is directed toward various audiences with very different backgrounds. The one doctrine finds itself applied practically for very different ends. The Corinthians appeared to be living in a state of bad theology and spiritual arrogance; Paul's objective is to break down their arrogance by warning them of judgment.* Paul does not intend the message of judgment to be his last word, but rather the word they need to hear so long as they remain unaware of the full implications of the gospel. On the other hand, those who exist in a state of spiritual dejection or discouragement need reassurance of the unconditionality of grace. If this understanding of Paul is correct, it implies that the theme of judgment by works is not Paul's final word to his audience; it is his penultimate word, determined by the pastoral situation of his audience, and intended to shake up those who exploit (and thus distort) the gospel proclamation of grace.

This attractive approach to the problem leaves one glad to have been reminded that Paul's letters have indeed been written to different audiences, but profoundly uneasy concerning the idea of a "penultimate word of God." How does one know what is God's final word, and which is merely his penultimate word? The idea of the finality of justification seems to be compromised.

Perhaps the simplest approach to the problem has the most to commend it. In one of his earliest writings, Paul uses the enormously important phrase "work of faith" (1 Thess 1:3). This would most naturally be understood as implying a genitive of origin—that is, "work which comes from faith." Faith is such that it does not merely produce obedience (Rom 1:5 speaks of the "obedience of faith"—that is, assuming a genitive of origin, the obedience which comes from faith) but also activity. Believers are thus justified on the basis of faith, seen not as a human work or merit, but as an expression and result of the grace of God. And believers are judged on the basis of their works, seen as the natural outcome, result and expression of justifying faith. Believers are justified by faith, and judged by its fruit. There is thus a strong connection between the past and future elements of justification—embracing faith and its outworking. Works are the visible demonstration of a real and justifying faith—not the dead faith of which James complained (Jas 2:14-24). And so these two moments of justification coinhere (see James and Paul).

5. The Importance of Justification to Paul's Thought. In conclusion, we may pose the question which continues to remain intensely controversial within Pauline scholarship: how important is justification to Paul's understanding of the gospel? Luther, as is well known, regarded it as central. While some modern writers have endorsed Luther's judgment, others have been more critical. The center of gravity of Paul's thought lies elsewhere, they argue. But where? It is one thing to suggest that justification is not the center of Paul's presentation of Christianity (see Center). But if it is not, what is? It is actually quite difficult to identify a center to Paul's thought, not least because there is disagreement among scholars as to what the idea of a "center" actually means: a principle of coherence? a summarizing principle? a criterion of authenticity? These difficulties stand in the path of any attempt to reach agreement on the importance of justification to Paul's thought.

Nevertheless, three broad positions may be discerned within recent scholarship on this question.

(1) Justification by faith is of central importance to Paul's conception of Christianity. Among those who adopt this position are G. Bornkamm, H. Conzelmann, E. Käsemann and K. Kertelge. As noted above, this position has strong historical associations with Martin Luther, and it is perhaps not surprising that it is echoed by many modern German Lutheran NT scholars. This school of thought tends to regard justification as the real theological center of gravity within Paul's thought and is critical of any attempt to treat it as being of lesser importance. Justification by faith is not simply concerned with clarifying the Christian gospel in relation to first-century Judaism; it addresses the fundamental question of how sinful human beings can find favor or acceptance in the sight of a righteous God. Within this approach differences can nevertheless be discerned. Bultmann adopts a generally Lutheran position, stressing the positive importance of faith while interpreting Paul's justification language in terms of existentialist categories. C. E. B. Cranfield adopts a more Reformed stance, noting the continuing importance of the Law.

(2) Justification by faith is a "subsidiary crater" (A. Schweitzer) in Paul's overall presentation and understanding of the Christian gospel. The origins of this view may be traced back to the nineteenth century, especially to the writings of W. Wrede. Wrede argued that justification by faith was simply a polemical doctrine designed to neutralize the theological threat posed by Judaism. Having neutralized this threat, Paul was then able to develop the positive aspects of his own thought (which, for Wrede, centered on the idea of redemption in Christ). The real emphasis of Paul's thought thus lies elsewhere than justification. Among those who adopt this position, the following may be noted (along with their views on where the center of Paul's thought really lies): A. Schweitzer (the rising and dying of the believer with Christ), R. P. Martin (reconciliation with God) and E. P. Sanders (believing participation in Christ).

(3) A third view may be regarded as a compromise between these two views. Justification by faith is regarded as one of a number of ways of thinking about, or visualizing, what God has achieved for believers in and through Christ. The position adopted by J. Jeremias well illustrates this mediating function. The center of Paul's thought does not lie with justification as such; rather it lies with the grace of God. But justification is one of a number of ways of describing this grace (in juridical terms of unconditional pardon and forgiveness). It is thus central in one sense (in that it is a way of expressing the core of the gospel), and not central in another (in that it is only one way, among others, of expressing this core).

This debate seems set to continue, and it is not clear whether there is any hope of a genuine consensus. It is perhaps worth noting that it is genuinely difficult to classify some approaches to Paul's theology in terms of this neat framework. Nevertheless, both the first and second positions continue to attract supporters.

This, then, represents the state of present scholarship on the main aspects of Paul's theology of justification by faith. It is clear that it is one of the most interesting aspects of Pauline scholarship, attracting writers of considerable skill and commitment. It is likely that the years ahead will witness still further wrestling with this aspect of Pauline thought, to the considerable enhancement both of academy and church; the former, as scholars seek to understand Paul, and the latter, as Christians seek to apply him to the tasks and opportunities of the Christian life.

See also CENTER OF PAUL; LAW; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Bornkamm, Paul (New York: Harper & Row, 1971); C. H. Cosgrove, "Justification in Paul: A Linguistic and Theological Reflection," JBL 106 (1987) 653-70; C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (2 vols; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); K. P. Donfried, "Justification and Last Judgement in Paul," ZNW 67 (1976) 90-110; J. D. G. Dunn, "The New Perspective on Paul," BJRL 65 (1983) 95-122; R. H. Gundry, "Grace, Works and Staying Saved in Paul," Bib 60 (1985) 1-38; C. J. A. Hickling, "Centre and Periphery in the Thought of St Paul," in Studia Biblica III. Papers on Paul and Other NT Authors, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSNTSup 3; Sheffield, Academic Press, 1978) 199-214; A. J. Hultgren, Paul's Gospel and Mission (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); E. Käsemann, Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); idem, " 'The Righteousness of God' in Paul," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); K. Kertelge, Rechtfertigung bei Paulus (Münster: Aschendorff, 1967); A. E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification (2 vols; Cambridge: University Press, 1986); R. P. Martin, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); J. Reumann, Righteousness in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); M. A. Seifrid, Justification by Faith: The Origin and Development of a Central Pauline Theme (NovTSup 68; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); P. Stuhlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus (FRLANT 87; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966); idem, "The Apostle Paul's View of Righteousness," in Reconciliation, Law, and Righteousness: Essays in Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 68-93; N. M. Watson, "Justified by faith, judged by works: an antimony?" NTS 29 (1983) 209-21; D. V. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991); S. K. Williams, "The 'Righteousness of God' in Romans," JBL 99 (1980) 241-90; N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); idem, The Messiah and the People of God (unpublished D.Phil. thesis, Oxford University, 1980); idem, "The Paul of History and the Apostle of Faith," TynB 29 (1978) 61-88; J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul (Cambridge: University Press, 1972).

A. E. McGrath

K

KERYGMA. See CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; PREACHING, KERYGMA.

KING. See GOD; KINGDOM OF GOD/CHRIST.

KINGDOM OF GOD/CHRIST

The whole of Paul's theology is conditioned by a perspective which sees the eschatological promises of God as having been inaugurated through the resurrection* of Jesus Christ from the dead. An important feature of this eschatological worldview is the teaching concerning the kingdom of God, which overlaps somewhat with the teaching about the kingdom of Christ in the Pauline materials. This overlap also provides a fertile ground for demonstrating how christology* and eschatology* interlock in Paul's thought.

1. Statistical Evidence
2. Is the Kingdom Present or Future?
3. Is the Kingdom of God the Same As the Kingdom of Christ?
4. The Deliverance of the Kingdom to God the Father
5. Transferral into the Kingdom of Christ

1. Statistical Evidence.

While the idea of the kingdom of God or kingdom of Christ is certainly foundational to the whole of Paul's thought, it is somewhat surprising to discover the comparative rarity of explicit references to "the kingdom" within the Pauline letters. The term basileia ("reign," "kingdom") occurs only fifteen times (Rom 14:17; 1 Cor 4:20; 6:9, 10; 15:24, 50; Gal 5:21; Eph 5:5; Col 1:13; 4:11; 1 Thess 2:12; 2 Thess 1:5; 2 Tim 4:1, 14, 18), while the verb basileuō ("to reign") occurs nine times (Rom 5:14, 17 [twice], 21 [twice]; 6:12; 1 Cor 4:8 [twice]; 15:25) and the verb symbasileuō ("to reign with") occurs in 1 Timothy 2:12. The phrase "kingdom of God" (or its equivalent) occurs a mere eight times within the Pauline letters (Rom 14:17; 1 Cor 4:20; 6:9; 15:50; Gal 5:21; Col 4:11; 1 Thess 2:12 ["his kingdom"]; 2 Thess 1:5). The reference to "commonwealth in the heavens" (to politeuma en ouranois) in Philippians 3:20 might also legitimately be understood as a parallel expression. Another startling fact is that within the Pauline corpus the kingdom *of Christ is only explicitly described in Colossians 1:13 and Ephesians 5:5. This is remarkable given Paul's firm commitment to the messiahship of Jesus Christ and the frequent association of the kingdom with God's Messiah in Jewish OT and pseudepigraphal literature (see Kreitzer, 29-91, for details). Several key issues arise as one considers the teaching about the kingdom within the Pauline letters.

2. Is the Kingdom Present or Future?

NT scholarship has long discussed the temporal nature of the kingdom of God as it is contained in the sayings of Jesus. A general consensus has been reached, namely that the primary message of Jesus himself was one of an inaugurated kingdom, one which had already begun in his own life and ministry but which was awaiting consummation in the future. Many of the questions about the temporal nature of the kingdom as it is found in the Gospel materials also surface within the Pauline letters, despite the paucity of references to "the kingdom" as such. At times Paul speaks of the kingdom of God as if it were a present reality capable of being experienced by the Christian believers. Notably, two texts are expressive of this, Romans 14:17 and 1 Corinthians 4:20.

At other times Paul speaks of the kingdom of God as if it were a future hope, something which had yet to be awaited by the Christian believers. A good example of this is 1 Thessalonians 2:12: a verse sandwiched between two declarations of the parousia of Christ (1 Thess 1:10 and 2:19). In 2 Thessalonians 1:5 the kingdom of God is described in terms of it being God's future vindication for those who endure suffering* for their faith.*

Again, in keeping with the future dimension of the kingdom of God, Paul often speaks of it as something which will be inherited by the faithful if they demonstrated the necessary character (1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50; Gal 5:21). The language of future inheritance is also found in Colossians 3:24 (cf. Col 1:12). A similar declaration about inheritance is made in Ephesians 5:5, with the slight alteration that the kingdom is here described as belonging to both God* and Christ.*

In short, the kingdom of God is something which straddles the dimensions of time, being both present and future (as Martin, 109-25, affirms). It is not possible to restrict Paul's teaching about the kingdom of God/Christ to temporal terms. It is true that he tends to speak of the ultimate revelation of the kingdom as a future event, but there is ample evidence to support the contention that the power of this eschatological kingdom is also at work in the life of the Christian community now. Indeed, G. Johnson in his comment on 1 Corinthians 4:20 goes so far as to suggest that "in the last analysis the so-called 'eschatological' dimension of the kingdom has been relegated to a fairly minor place, and its present fact has been translated instead into the great concept of spiritual life" (Johnson, 151). Thus the kingdom of God/Christ might even be described as "life in the Spirit" or "life within the Body of Christ," both much more prominent themes within the Pauline letters.

3. Is the Kingdom of God the Same as the Kingdom of Christ?

Some scholars have suggested that Paul maintains a distinction between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Christ, usually by pointing to 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 as a key text and postulating that the passage hints at a temporary messianic reign on earth which gives way to the kingdom of God in the fullness of time. Such a suggestion parallels a similar distinction between the two kingdoms found in select Jewish and Christian apocalypses of the NT period, namely the Apocalypse of Weeks (1 Enoch 93:1-10; 91:12-17); 4 Ezra 7:26-30; 12:31-34; 2 Baruch 29:3—30:1; 40:1-4; and Revelation 20:4-6 (see Kreitzer for a discussion).

A literal interpretation of passages such as these has yielded a "chiliastic" (or "premillennial") strand of eschatology in the history of the Christian church. Some interpreters, such as A. Schweitzer, have appealed to Paul as an advocate of precisely this position, noting that a necessary corollary is a doctrine of two resurrections,* one for the saints who participate in the temporary, messianic, kingdom and the second a general resurrection for judgment before the age to come. Effectively this means that the kingdom of Christ commences with the parousia and concludes with the arrival of the kingdom of God (the age to come) and that the reign of the Messiah is the interval between the two resurrections associated with these two events.

However, it is not at all clear that Paul maintains a rigid distinction between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Christ throughout his letters; nor that he anywhere teaches a doctrine of two resurrections (although Luke has Paul speak of a resurrection of "the just and the unjust" in Acts 24:15). Consequently most scholars dispute that Paul can be legitimately described as consistently chiliastic in his eschatological viewpoint (if he can be described as chiliastic at all). They point out that more often than not Paul's description of the consummation of God's kingdom is simply associated with the future parousia of Jesus Christ, with no forced dichotomy implied between the two kingdoms. In other words, it is denied that 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 teaches a temporary messianic kingdom, and the passage is effectively harmonized with other passages (such as 1 Cor 15:51-56 and 1 Thess 4:13-18) which describe the parousia of Christ in greater detail (G. Vos is a classic proponent of this approach).

Usually those following this interpretation take Christ's rule over the "kingdom" (which he is said to hand over to the Father in 1 Cor 15:24) to have begun at the cross. This interpretation has the benefit of offering a Paul who is entirely coherent and uniform in his schematization of the future, avoiding presenting Paul as hopelessly confused or inconsistent in his teaching. On the other hand, the passage in 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 is anything but clear in its expression and it is easy to see how a chiliastic interpretation might be derived from it. The question then arises whether we need Paul to be wholly consistent in the way that he describes how the kingdom of God relates to the kingdom of Christ and the parousia. A much more realistic approach is to accept the idea that flexibility of expression is inherent within all eschatological literature, including Paul's letters. Harmonization of eschatological detail, even in the aid of rescuing Paul from (what is perceived to be) a damaging inconsistency, is not the answer. We may be able to iron out all of the eschatological tensions and wrinkles within Pauline theology but in the process distance ourself from Paul himself.

How then, is it that the "kingdom of God" gives way to the "kingdom of Christ" as an expression of eschatological hope? If the basis of Paul's eschatology is the OT proclamation of the kingdom of God, how is it that this kingdom becomes explicitly described as the kingdom of Christ? Almost certainly this transition takes place as a result of the close association of Jesus of Nazareth and the kingdom of God which he came to proclaim. We see examples of just this sort of christological shift of emphasis in the redaction of the Gospels, and it is likely that the Pauline materials follow suit in this regard. As B. Klappert remarks: "The phrase 'basileia of Christ' and the equation of 'kingdom of God' with Jesus Christ are thus seen to be the result of the change-over from an implicit to an explicit christology" (Klappert, 387).

4. The Deliverance of the Kingdom to God the Father.

In 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 we have one of the most difficult passages within the Pauline corpus to interpret, one which is filled with apocalyptic* imagery and language (E. Käsemann's interpretation of Pauline apocalyptic eschatology is heavily dependent upon these verses). Contained within the passage is a curious reference to "the kingdom": "Then comes the end, when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father after destroying every rule and every authority and power" (1 Cor 15:24; see Principalities and Powers). One of the most frustrating features of this highly compressed pericope is the ambiguity of the subject of the verbs. For example, who is the subject of hypetaxen ("he subjected") in 1 Corinthians 15:27? Is it God or Christ? If it is assumed to be God (as in the NRSV) then some difficulties of understanding arise within the rest of the passage. One is never quite sure who is subjecting what to whom. No doubt the referential confusion between God and Christ is partly due to the christologically motivated use of Psalm 110:1 and Psalm 8:7b in verses 25 and 27 respectively (de Boer, 114-20, offers some discussion of this).

A related item of exegetical significance is the connection between "the kingdom" and "the created order" (ta panta) within the passage. M. J. Harris associates the resurrection of the dead and the coming of the kingdom with the re-creation of the created order (see Creation and New Creation); the kingdom, he says "incorporate(s) the rational and the irrational universe" (Harris, 18). Clearly there is an important cosmological dimension to this passage in addition to the more traditional temporal one which has been the focus of scholarly attention in the past.

5. Transferral into the Kingdom of Christ.

In Colossians 1:13-14 we have an unusual reference to the kingdom of Christ: "He (God) has delivered us from the dominion of darkness and transferred us to the kingdom of his beloved Son, in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins." The remarkable thing about this passage is that the transferral is described as an act already accomplished, as realized within the life of the believer. This departure from the more characteristic description of the kingdom of God/Christ as a future reality yet to be awaited has led some interpreters to question Pauline authorship of the letter (see the commentaries by E. Lohse, E. Schweizer and P. T. O'Brien for a discussion of this; see Colossians).

In conclusion, while the explicit expression "kingdom of God/Christ" is not widespread within the Pauline letters, the idea is a fundamental component of Paul's eschatological perspective and underlies the whole of his teaching. The same tension between the present and future dimensions of a kingdom theology found to be present in the teaching of Jesus within the Synoptic Gospels is also contained within the Pauline materials. Perhaps even more significant within the Pauline letters is the fact that the idea of the "kingdom of God" affords an important vehicle for Paul's developing christology wherein the "kingdom of Christ" begins to compete with "kingdom of God" as the focal point of theological concern.

See also APOCALYPTICISM; CHRISTOLOGY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; ESCHATOLOGY; EXALTATION AND ENTHRONEMENT; JESUS AND PAUL; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. C. de Boer, The Defeat of Death (JSNTS 22; Sheffield: Academic, 1988); M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal: The Relation Between Resurrection and Immortality in New Testament Teaching (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); G. Johnson, " 'Kingdom of God' Sayings in Paul's Epistles," in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, ed. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd (Ontario: Wilfred Laurier University, 1984) 143-56; E. Käsemann, "Primitive Christian Apocalyptic," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 108-37, esp. 133-37; B. Klappert, "King, Kingdom," NIDNTT 2.372-90; L. J. Kreitzer, Jesus and God in Paul's Eschatology (JSNTS 19; Sheffield: Academic, 1987) 131-64; R. P. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (London: A. & C. Black, 1931); G. Vos, The Pauline Eschatology (Princeton: University Press, 1930) 226-60.

L. J. Kreitzer

KNOWLEDGE, GIFT OF KNOWLEDGE

The term "word of knowledge" (logos gnōseōs) occurs only once in the Pauline corpus, at 1 Corinthians 12:8. There it is listed second in a catalog of nine charisms (charismata, manifestations of divine grace,* or special gifts bestowed by the grace of God*). While no definition is provided for this gift of the Spirit, we are able to reach some understanding of what it was and is by looking at the way Paul addressed himself to the subject of knowledge within the larger corpus of his writings and the Corinthian correspondence in particular (see Gifts of the Spirit).

1. Knowledge
2. Knowledge at Corinth
3. Gift of Knowledge

1. Knowledge.

From the Pauline corpus as a whole we understand that Paul frequently referred to knowledge (gnōsis) and knowing in the sense of "acquaintance" or "comprehension." One is able to know God* (Rom 1:21; Gal 4:9; Phil 3:10), to know God's will (Rom 2:18), to know the Law* (Rom 7:1) or to know the love* of Christ* (Eph 3:19). Gnōsis is also a term Paul used frequently to communicate information he wants his readers to understand (Gal 3:7; Eph 5:5; 6:22; Phil 1:12). But Paul also viewed certain things to be inscrutable or unknowable in themselves, such as the mind of God. He writes that the depths of the riches of God's wisdom* and knowledge are unsearchable (Rom 11:33-34). The human mind unaided is not sufficient to grasp the mind and knowledge of God.*

If God's knowledge is unsearchable in the sense that it transcends the human capacity to comprehend it, it is equally clear, especially from the Corinthian* correspondence, that at times the Holy Spirit* reveals insight into the mind of God. No one comprehends what is God's except the Spirit of God (1 Cor 2:11), and since Christians have received the Holy Spirit, they are now capable of understanding many of the things of God. It is the Holy Spirit's role to make the spiritual things of God comprehensible to the human mind (1 Cor 2:11).

2. Knowledge at Corinth.

From the Corinthian correspondence it is clear that knowledge held an important place in the minds of many within that congregation. Paul acknowledged the richness of their endowment with knowledge of all kinds (1 Cor 1:5), and he noted that the Corinthians excelled in knowledge, among other things (2 Cor 8:7), but within the Corinthian context knowledge was being abused. It had come to be identified ipso facto as a badge of spirituality,* which only certain Corinthians enjoyed. One can, as does Schmithals, therefore identify a type of proto-gnosticism present at Corinth even in Paul's day (see Gnosis, Gnosticism). Paul's discussion of knowledge in 1 Corinthians 8 is telling. Knowledge is much like a double-edged sword. Paul, like the Corinthians, can sing its praises, but he also recognizes that it possesses a dark side. "Knowledge puffs up," he notes, "but love builds up" (1 Cor 8:1 NRSV). It is this selfish use of knowledge that must be avoided. While knowledge can bring freedom* to some because it has succeeded in banishing the fears which result from ignorance, for others the lack of knowledge means that they can easily be offended by those who, apart from wisdom and love, exercise their newly found "knowledge" (1 Cor 8:7-11). Knowledge improperly handled by those who possess it can result in the destruction of those who do not possess it.

Repeatedly Paul's concern at Corinth is that those with knowledge choose not to employ it as somehow symbolic of their own spirituality, but rather employ it for positive, edifying ends. It should serve the congregation and direct its members toward God. Knowledge must be exercised in love.

3. Gift of Knowledge.

In spite of this, Paul is clear that there are generally useful words or utterances of knowledge, and that these words may be viewed as charisms, or gifts, freely bestowed by the Holy Spirit in a sovereign manner (1 Cor 12:4, 11). J. D. G. Dunn rightly calls them "rational revelations" (Dunn, 217-19). Their purpose, like the purpose of all such charisms, is to serve the ongoing welfare of the church* (1 Cor 12:7). In 1 Corinthians 8 the knowledge possessed by those Corinthians who were labeled as "strong" appears to have provided them with a "charismatic insight into the real nature of reality" (Dunn, 218). The sovereign action of the Spirit's distribution of these utterances of knowledge, moreover, means that not all Christians have been given this charism (1 Cor 12:11) and, therefore, it is important for those who gain this knowledge from the Spirit to share it with the rest of the body of Christ in such a way as to teach and lead them without injury (see Body of Christ). The possession of this knowledge, then, is viewed as having certain limitations.

In 1 Corinthians 13 Paul notes several of the limitations inherent in this knowledge, even if it consists of Spirit-inspired utterances of knowledge. One of these limitations is temporal in nature, for knowledge will ultimately come to an end (1 Cor 13:8). A second, and perhaps more important, limitation is its inability to communicate adequately in words the whole picture. At present our knowledge, even Spirit-inspired knowledge, is only partial or incomplete. It appears merely as a dim reflection in a mirror (1 Cor 13:12), as we ourselves are slowly moving through a process of transformation from one level of glory* to another (2 Cor 3:18) by means of the Holy Spirit. This process of transformation, which also in some way involves a form of divine revelation, will not be complete until the consummation (1 Cor 13:12; 2 Cor 3:18; cf. 1 Jn 3:2). At that time a full knowledge will come, but perhaps more importantly, with it will come the realization that believers have also been the subject of the divine knowledge. They have been fully known by God.

Probably the most important limitation that Paul views as governing knowledge is the limitation placed on it by love. Love edifies (1 Cor 8:1; 13:4-7, 13), and its primary focus seems to be a recognition and an encouragement of others. Any exercise of a manifestation of knowledge apart from love is of no value. It is nothing (1 Cor 13:2). Paul's view of knowledge is expressed in 1 Corinthians 14:6, where knowledge is shown to be parallel with, and to play a role in, teaching.* Teaching, by its very nature, demands an open and trusting relationship characterized by love.

In the contemporary Pentecostal and Charismatic renewal many claims are made regarding the presence and use of the "word of knowledge." Like all charisms, these claims must each be discerned by the community of faith. This charism, like all genuine charisms, is meant to contribute to the whole community, bringing its recipients to a new level of maturity by providing insight into the mind of Christ (1 Cor 2:16). Such charisms show their genuine character by the fruit which they bring forth.

See also GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; PROPHECY, PROPHESYING; TEACHING/PARAENESIS; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); E. E. Ellis, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); D. Gee, Concerning Spiritual Gifts (rev. ed.; Springfield, MO: Gospel Publishing House, 1972); M. R. Hillmer, "Knowledge: New Age, Gnosticsm and First Corinthians," McMaster Journal of Theology 3 (1992) 18-38; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); D. Wead, Hear His Voice (Carol Stream: Creation House, 1976).

C. M. Robeck, Jr.

KOINONIA. See FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; LORD'S SUPPER.

KYRIOS. See CHRISTOLOGY; LORD.

L

LAST ADAM. See ADAM AND CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY.

LAW

A well-attested feature of Jewish religion in Paul's time was the manner in which the Jewish way of life was being defined in both oral and written form. The foundation of this material was the covenant* which God* communicated to Moses* and made with the people of Israel* at Sinai as it is preserved in the first five books of the Hebrew Bible. Jews of Paul's time, following biblical usage, frequently referred to these foundational writings as the "Law" (Heb tôrâ, Gk nomos). After Paul's call to preach Christ* to the Gentiles* (Gal 1:15-16; Rom 1:5, 13-14; 15:18; cf. Acts 9:15; 22:21; 26:17) he thought extensively about the relationship between the Jewish Law and faith* in Christ. We find the results of that thinking primarily in the Thessalonian* and Corinthian* correspondence, in Galatians,* Philippians* and Romans,* and to a lesser extent in Colossians,* Ephesians* and the Pastorals.*

No area of Pauline studies has undergone more sweeping revision in the last half century than the apostle's view of the Law. Compelling evidence has required a reassessment of Christian, and especially Protestant, assumptions about the Law in Judaism and therefore about Paul's relationship to this single most important aspect of his ancestral faith. Some understanding of the nature of this revolution in Pauline studies is, therefore, an important prerequisite to a fresh reading of Paul's own comments about the Jewish Law (see Paul and His Interpreters).

1. The Struggle to Understand Paul's View of the Law
2. The Jewish Law in the Second Temple Period
3. The Jewish Law in the Context of Paul's Letters
4. Conclusion

1. The Struggle to Understand Paul's View of the Law. During the period of the Renaissance and Reformation the Roman Catholic Church understood Paul's claim that "by works of the Law no flesh shall be justified" (Gal 2:16) to mean that no one could attain eternal life* without divine help. To the Catholic Church in the several centuries before and after Luther, this dictum did not seem to exclude good deeds from some role in salvation,* and other passages in Paul's letters seemed to indicate that such works were necessary (Gal 5:6; Rom 6:13, 19; cf. Council of Trent, Decree on Justification, 6.10-11). Thomas Aquinas, therefore, believed that since human nature in itself required the transforming power of God's grace* in order to inherit eternal life, humanity could not have been saved by its own merits even prior to the Fall. After the Fall God's grace was even more necessary for salvation since humanity was now two removes from God (Summa Theologica, I-II.109.2). The OT Law, likewise, operated at a human level and, as good as it might have been, was lacking the requisite grace of God that enabled people to keep its precepts (I-II.98.1-2). The new law of the NT contained this grace, however, and so Christians were able, by means of this grace, to do the works which merited for them eternal life (I-II.108.1; 111.2; 112.1; 114.1-9). Likewise, the Council of Trent claimed that justification was a process of cooperation with divine grace which began with repentance and continued in the form of obedience to the commandments of God and the church (Council of Trent, Decree on Justification, 6.10-11).

It was chiefly against this principle of cooperation between grace and works as it was expressed in the doctrine of the merits of the saints, that the Reformers raised the banner of dissent. Prior to his protest against the Roman Catholic Church, Luther feared that neither his own good works, even if done out of love for Christ, nor the merits of his order could save him from God's terrible righteousness. Finally, after reaching a point of near despair, Luther began meditating on such texts as Psalm 31:1-2 and Romans 1:17 and discovered through them that the purpose of God's righteousness* was not to condemn but to save the sinner. Rather than his angry accuser, God, as it turned out, was his rock of refuge and mighty fortress.

This experience informed Luther's reading of Paul's letters, especially Galatians. There he found ample evidence that no human activity, or "active righteousness," no matter how sincere or vigorous, could save people from God's wrath.* Such salvation could come only through "passive righteousness"—a righteousness provided in its entirety by God himself and appropriated by faith in Jesus Christ. Luther took Paul's use of the word law in such passages as Galatians 2:16-21 as a cipher for God's righteous demands and all human attempts to be saved by them. These, he believed, could not save but only condemn and inspire terror: "no matter how wise and righteous men may be according to reason and the divine Law," he says, "yet with all their works, merits, Masses, righteousness, and acts of worship they are not justified" (LW, 26:140, commenting on Gal 2:16). The role of the Law is not to justify but to condemn and terrify (LW, 26:148-51). Salvation comes by another, entirely separate "law," the Law of grace which gives righteousness to the believer apart from any effort and insulates him or her from the Law's accusations. In the sphere of justification,* therefore, the Law has no place. By putting his or her faith in Christ, the Christian has climbed up into heaven and left the Law far away on the earth below (LW, 26:156-57).

It is easy, when reading Luther, to concentrate on the theological argument with the Roman Catholic Church in which he is so energetically engaged and to miss a subtle hermeneutical impropriety in which the great Reformer and theologian has indulged. Especially in his lectures on Galatians, but elsewhere as well, Luther assumes that the Jews, against whose view of the Law Paul was arguing, held the same theology of justification as the medieval Roman Catholic Church. This hermeneutical error would be perpetuated over the next four centuries and eventually serve as the organizing principle for mountains of Protestant scholarship on the OT and ancient Judaism.

It was frequently assumed among OT scholars, for example, that at least from the period of the restoration of the Jews to Israel under Ezra, the history of Judaism was a story of spiralling degeneracy into legalism, hypocrisy and lack of compassion. Similarly, when Protestant scholars discussed rabbinic Judaism they tended to assume that Paul's polemic against Judaism, interpreted through the lens of Luther's reaction against Roman Catholicism, provided a sound basis for systematizing the religion of the Mishnah, Talmud and related Jewish writings of a later era. F. Weber's "popular" description of Talmudic theology (1880) is typical. Keeping the many and peculiar commands of the Law, said Weber, was the means by which the rabbis believed salvation was earned. The ordinary rabbi, therefore, believed that the goal of rabbinic religion was the search for reward on the basis of merit, that God was a stern judge, and that approaching death brought with it the fear of losing salvation due to a lack of merit.

A large part of this portrait of ancient Judaism found its way into interpretations of the NT generally, and especially into expositions of Paul's writings. Widely used commentaries, such as that of W. Sanday and A. Headlam on Romans (reprinted seventeen times from 1895 to 1952) and influential books about the NT, such as R. Bultmann's popular description of Primitive Christianity in Its Contemporary Setting (1949; ET 1956) used this picture of Judaism as the backdrop for their explanations of NT theology. In Sanday and Headlam's commentary, for example, Paul's struggle with the Law in Romans 7:7-25, which they take to be a self-portrait of his preconversion existence, is interpreted as the natural consequence of the "stern" rabbinic view of the Law, which, they claim, "was fatal to peace of mind" (Sanday and Headlam, 189). Similarly, Bultmann, in a section of Primitive Christianity titled "Jewish legalism," claimed that the Jewish view of the Law in the first century made "radical obedience" to God impossible because it held that once a certain list of commandments had been kept, one was in the clear and was free to do anything (Bultmann, 69). In addition, said Bultmann, it taught that God would punish sins strictly according to the law of retribution, that salvation was never a certainty, and that even repentance and faith could be transformed into meritorious works (Bultmann, 69-71).

The Lutheran picture of ancient Judaism, now clad in the impressive robes of scholarship, did not go unchallenged among Jewish scholars. As early as 1894 the distinguished Jewish reformer C. G. Montefiore objected forcefully to what he viewed as the tendency of Christian theologians to paint rabbinic Judaism as a dark shadow against which Paul's theology could brightly shine. The rabbinic literature, pleaded Montefiore, reveals a compassionate and forgiving God, ready to lay aside even grievous infractions of the Law at the slightest movement toward repentance by the offending party. It portrays rabbis, moreover, as those who regarded the Law as a gift and delight, who placed a value on faith in God as high as Paul's, and whose daily prayer was "Sovereign of all worlds! not because of our righteous acts do we lay our supplications before thee, but because of thine abundant mercies" (b. Yoma 87b). "I wonder," Montefiore asked in an address before England's St. Paul Association in 1900, "if there is the smallest chance that you, unlike the theologians, will believe me when I say that all this business of the severe Judge and the stern Law giver is a figment and a bugbear?"

Montefiore's critique of the Lutheran caricature of Judaism at first fell on deaf ears; but through the work of several influential scholars over the next seventy years, it gradually began to gain the ascendancy not only in Jewish circles but among nearly everyone working in the field. In 1927 G. F. Moore published a two-volume study of rabbinic theology which, in contrast to Weber's work, emphasized the role of grace, forgiveness and repentance in the earliest literature of rabbinic religion. This was followed in 1948 by W. D. Davies's detailed study of Paul and Rabbinic Judaism in which Davies argued that Paul's doctrine of justification by faith apart from the Law was only one metaphor among many, probably developed first in the heat of argument (Davies, 221-23), and that the apostle's letters revealed simply a Pharisee for whom the messianic age had dawned (Davies, 71-73; see Jew, Paul the).

Without question, however, the pivotal event in bringing Montefiore's complaint from the backwater to main stream was the publication in 1977 of E. P. Sanders's Paul and Palestinian Judaism. Sanders's book was so powerful not because its approach was original but because Sanders addressed pointedly and exhaustively the distorted view of Judaism which Lutheran scholarship, and those under its influence, had produced. Sanders made his way step by step through the most influential works of modern NT scholarship in order to show that they disparaged ancient Judaism as a religion in which salvation was accomplished by meritorious achievement. He then embarked on a lengthy journey through not only the rabbinic literature of the first 200 years after Christ but through the Qumran* literature, the apocrypha and the pseudepigrapha as well to determine how those documents answer the question, What must one do to be saved?

His conclusion was that in all of this ancient Jewish literature, with the exception of the atypical document 4 Ezra, salvation came not through achieving a certain number of meritorious works but through belonging to the covenant people of God. The proper response to the covenant was, of course, obedience; but means of atonement were readily available for those who did not obey fully. This "pattern of religion" Sanders called "covenantal nomism" (Sanders 1977, 75; 1992, 262-78), and, he claimed, it bears little resemblance to the descriptions of Jewish "soteriology" in most handbooks of Protestant biblical scholarship.

Largely as a result of this important work, most students of Pauline theology now believe that Montefiore, Sanders and other dissenters from the classic Protestant perspective have proven their case. The problem has now become what to do with Paul, who after all does seem to argue loudly against Jews who espouse justification by "works of the Law."* Montefiore's answer to this question in 1894 has become popular among some. He believed that Paul was an aberration whose neglect of the Jewish doctrine of repentance for infractions against the Law was puzzling and whose Judaism, if Judaism at all, must have been heavily influenced by Hellenism. S. Sandmel claims similarly that "Paul's attitude toward the Law is exactly the reverse of the views in all other surviving Jewish writings" (Sandmel 1978, 320) and that the origin of Paul's negative evaluation of the Law lies to a large extent in ideas about the Law which flourished in the fertile soil of Hellenistic Judaism. This brand of Judaism, Sandmel argues, often saw value in the Law only as a guide to other religious ideals and so played down the importance of its literal observance. Paul, therefore, was predisposed to devalue the Law because of his roots in a Judaism heavily influenced by Greek thought (Sandmel 1979, 48-53). This view reaches its extreme in the work of H. Maccoby who, largely on the basis of Galatians 3:19 and 4:9-10, claims that Paul's view of the Law was derived from Gnosticism* (Maccoby, 40-48).

This reading of Paul, as W. D. Davies observed long ago, blunders methodologically and historically by assuming neat divisions between the "orthodox" Judaism of Palestine and a supposedly deviant variety in the Diaspora.* Such neat divisions apparently did not exist. Sanders, then, both in Paul and Palestinian Judaism and in two subsequent books on Paul, takes the view articulated by Moore (Moore, II.94) half a century before but not carefully worked out: Paul always began with the premise, which his own experience had made certain to him, that Jesus was the savior* of the world,* and worked backward from this premise to the conclusion that all the world, Jews included, needed to be saved through Jesus. In Sanders's view, therefore, Paul's theology represents a leap out of Jewish covenantal nomism into a different religion.

Sanders contends that Paul had no "theology of the law" but responded in various ways to various circumstances which threatened his mission of announcing to both Jew and Gentile the necessity of participation in Christ for salvation. For practical reasons he considered those parts of the Law which Gentiles viewed as particularly Jewish (circumcision,* Sabbath keeping and dietary observance) to be annulled. They would hinder the Gentile mission and would make it seem to Gentiles that the key to salvation was Judaism when in fact it was participation in Christ. When he felt compelled to give reasons for setting aside the Law, he answered in various ways, some of them incompatible with others. His central explanation, however, seems to be that the Law was given to condemn everyone so that everyone could be saved through Jesus Christ.

Nevertheless, Paul was still enough of a Jew psychologically to be uncomfortable with saying in every situation that the Law was no longer valid. He had firm convictions about right and wrong, propriety and impropriety, derived from his Jewish upbringing. When asked to adjudicate on such matters, as he was for example by the Corinthians, the origin of his answers was often, ironically, the Jewish Law (Sanders 1991, 84-100).

J. D. G. Dunn likewise has accepted the new consensus which Sanders's work represents but criticizes Sanders for not providing a plausible explanation of the fundamental Jewishness of Paul's letters. Sanders, Dunn charges, has so divorced Paul from Judaism that Paul's anguish over his unbelieving Jewish brothers and sisters in Romans 9:1-3 and his concern that Gentile Christians understand their spiritual indebtedness to Israel* in Romans 11:17-24 are enigmas (Dunn, 188; see Romans).

The account of Paul which Dunn proposes as a substitute claims that Paul worked through the details of his view of the Law in the heat of controversy with Jewish Christians who believed that Gentile Christians, in order to maintain a place in the covenant people of God, had to adopt the three "works of the Law"* which served as badges of national Israel: circumcision,* Sabbath keeping (see Holy Days) and dietary observance (see Food). Paul's polemic against "works of the Law," then, is not directed against gaining salvation by doing good works but against believing that salvation was, at least in part, contingent upon belonging to national Israel and observing the Law as a badge of that status (Dunn, 191-96). As a result, Paul's positive statements about the Law are not inconsistent with his more negative statements, for the negative statements are directed against a nationalistic misuse of the Law rather than against the Law itself (Dunn, 200).

This reading of Paul, says Dunn, has numerous advantages. It acknowledges the legitimacy of Sanders's complaint against the Lutheran paradigm for understanding Judaism, but it gives a picture of Paul more plausible than Sanders's own picture. Paul is now firmly rooted within first-century Judaism and his statements about the Law, both positive and negative, are held together by a consistent underlying conviction that the Law, while good, can be misused as an instrument of national pride (Dunn, 200-203).

Another highly influential response to the new consensus comes from the pen of H. Räisänen. Like Dunn, Räisänen accepts Sanders's portrait of ancient Judaism and, like others, attempts to explain Paul's polemic against works of the Law in light of this new perspective. He claims that Paul first developed his postconversion attitudes toward the Law under the influence of the Hellenistic Christian community, a group which played down the necessity of the Law's particularly Jewish aspects in the interest of winning Gentiles to Christianity. Later, in the heat of his own Gentile mission,* and as a matter of convenience, Paul dropped the Law entirely from his evangelistic agenda without clearly thinking through the reasons why (Räisänen 1986, 300-301; cf. 1983, 256-63)

Räisänen suggests that Paul produced his first attempts to explain the relationship between the Law and faith in Christ when the Judaizers* invaded his churches in Galatia. This group was antagonistic to Paul and produced a powerful case, based on straightforward arguments from the Hebrew Scriptures that Gentile Christians should adhere to the Law and so become Jewish. Paul, convinced on the basis of his own experience that such additions to the requirement of faith in Christ were unnecessary hindrances, then began to cast around for arguments to prove his conviction (Räisänen 1983, 256-63). In Räisänen's view he was less than successful. Instead of producing a convincing counterargument, he constructed a series of ad hoc statements, some mutually contradictory and others clear distortions of the Jewish view of the Law.

The Paul of Räisänen's description provides an appropriate summarizing metaphor for the state of current scholarship on Paul's view of the Law. The reexamination of Judaism which began with Montefiore and culminated in Sanders has shifted the ground beneath interpreters' feet so dramatically that no consensus on Paul's theology of the Law has been able to emerge. Is this disarray ultimately the product of the disharmony between Paul's distorted picture of Judaism and Judaism as it really existed? Could it be the result of internal disharmonies within Paul himself, and hence within his letters? An honest answer to these questions will require a fresh reading both of Paul and of the Jewish literature of his era.

2. The Jewish Law in the Second Temple Period.

After the Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem, burned the Temple and took many in Israel captive in 586 B.C., most Israelites in exile seem to have adopted the perspective of Jeremiah and Ezekiel and considered the experience as punishment for breaking the covenant

God had made with them at Sinai. To the exiles, the Pentateuch's curses* for disobedience to the covenant must have appeared to be a breathtakingly accurate prediction of the Babylonian invasion and subsequent exile (Lev 26:14-46; Deut 28:43-52, 64-67; 29:22-28; 31:14-29). Thus when the Persians overran the Babylonians and subsequently allowed expatriate Israelites to return to their native land the leaders of the return understandably resolved to adhere strictly to the Law and so to avoid future punishment for disobedience. Their Achilles heel prior to the exile, they believed, was their seduction into idolatry by foreign influences. The road to a restored covenant relationship with God, they reasoned, was a renewed determination to fence themselves off from harmful foreign influences by strictly obeying the Law.

We can see these convictions clearly in Ezra-Nehemiah, where both Ezra and Nehemiah express grave concern over Jewish intermarriage with the Gentile population of Palestine precisely because such actions could lead Israel once again into national apostasy and punishment (Ezra 9:10-15; cf. Neh 10:30). These convictions were still in place two and a half centuries later, as the book of Tobit reveals. There we read of Tobit's awareness that defeat and exile came to Israel as just punishment for breaking the Mosaic covenant (Tob 3:2-6) and of Tobit's determination, while living among Gentiles, to observe the Jewish marriage and dietary customs strictly (Tob 1:9-12; cf. 4:12-13).

The belief that the Law was the distinguishing mark of Israel as God's chosen people intensified in subsequent years as Hellenistic* challenges to Israel's ancestral religion became more frequent and violent, especially under the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV. The Maccabean books show that Antiochus attempted to force Israel into cultural conformity with the rest of his realm by forbidding the Jews to practice precisely those parts of their Law which distinguished them from other peoples. He outlawed circumcision (1 Macc 1:48), made martyrs of those who refused to eat unclean food (2 Macc 6:18-31) and, most horrific of all, tried to force Jews to worship pagan gods (1 Macc 2:15-28; see Idolatry).

Some Jews folded under such pressure, and a few even welcomed compromise as an opportunity for personal advancement; but many became more resolute than ever in their conviction that they would not again ignore God's Law and consort with Gentile ways. They believed that if Israel were faithful to the Mosaic covenant, God would protect them no matter how overwhelming the foe, but that if, on the other hand, they disobeyed the Law, the Gentiles would defeat them in battle and they would cease to be, in any meaningful sense, God's covenant people (Jdt 5:17-21; 8:18-23; Pr Azar 6-14). So, like Daniel (Dan 1:1-21; 3:1-30) they determined not to break the Law, especially observance of circumcision (Jub. 15:11-34), dietary restrictions (Jdt 10:5; cf. 12:2) and Sabbath keeping (Jub. 2:17-33), for these aspects of the Law separated them most clearly from the surrounding nations.

The politically minded among these strict adherents to the covenant of Moses turned to open rebellion against a succession of Seleucid rulers and eventually obtained political independence. Others, however, were content to wait upon God to establish the new covenant with his people which Jeremiah (Jer 31:31-34) and Ezekiel (Ezek 36:24—37:28) had predicted, a covenant in which God himself would give them a "new heart" and a "new spirit," removing their "heart of stone" and giving them a "heart of flesh" in its stead (Ezek 36:26). Thus the authors of Jubilees and of the Qumran documents frequently echo these passages (Jub. 1:22-25; 1QS 4, 5; 1QH 4, 5, 18; 4QShirShabb 2) and witness to a belief that these prophecies were being fulfilled within their communities.

Once the Maccabean family succeeded in throwing off Seleucid rule, observing the Jewish Law was required of all who lived in the land, whether Jewish or not. Under John Hyrcanus I the Idumeans were forced to submit to circumcision and other legal requirements (Josephus Ant. 13.9.1 §§257-58), and Hyrcanus' successor, Aristobulus I, forced the Itureans to do the same (Josephus Ant. 13.11.3 §318). M. Hengel concludes appropriately that Hyrcanus and Aristobulus took these steps because they regarded all of ancient Israel as God's possession and viewed it as part of their mandate to purge the land of Gentiles, either by forcing them out or by forcing them to become Jews (Hengel, 197). Although written much earlier, Psalm 125:3 must have struck a resonant cord with them: "For the scepter of the wicked shall not stay upon the land apportioned to the righteous so that the righteous might not stretch out their hands to act wickedly." The evil influences of Gentiles in years past had led Israel into exile. That mistake would not be repeated.

By the first century A.D., the last of the Hasmoneans had nevertheless capitulated to Rome, and many Jews were happy within the limits of religious freedom that Rome allowed. Some radical groups arose, however, who claimed to be heirs to the zeal of the Hasmonean family and whose goal was to free Israel from the polluting presence of Gentiles. During the formative years of the early church these groups gained strength until, prompted by the blunders and corruption of a quick succession of Roman procurators, their zeal burst into open rebellion against Rome in A.D. 66 (see Revolutionary Movements). Many of those involved in the revolt were concerned, like the Hasmoneans of old, to force conformity to the particularly Jewish aspects of the Law upon everyone who lived on the sacred land of Israel (see, e.g., Josephus J.W. 2.17.10 §454; Life 12 §§65, 67; 23 §§112-13).

Not all Jews during the five centuries from Ezra to the time of Paul, of course, took an approach this radical, and many sought to achieve some level of compromise with the Gentile world around them. In such writings as the Wisdom of Solomon, Ben Sira and Baruch, for example, the Law was closely identified with "wisdom,"* and was found to encompass the insight which Gentile philosophers and theologians on occasion undeniably possessed. In the Wisdom of Solomon the Jewish Law is said to be given to the world through Israel (Wis 18:4), and in Ben Sira and Baruch true wisdom and understanding are repeatedly coupled with observance of the commandments (Sir 1:26; 6:37; 9:15; 15:1; 16:4; 19:20; 21:11; 23:27—24:1; 24:23-29; 33:2-3; 34:8; 39:1-5; Bar 3:12; 3:36—4:1, 12). Despite these efforts to take Gentile thought seriously, however, there is no doubt that if a choice must be made, the Law, not wisdom, should take priority (cf. Sir 19:20 with 19:24). This literature, moreover, continues to express a profound sense of grief at the plight of oppression into which disobedience to the Law has landed Israel (Sir 49:4-7; Bar 2:27—3:13; 4:12-13).

In other writings of the period the particularly Jewish aspects of the Law were ignored (e.g., Pseudo-Phocylides), allegorized (e.g., Letter of Aristeas 139-69) or otherwise rationalized (see, e.g., Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.173-74, 234; Aristobulus as quoted in Eusebius Praep. Ev. 13.12.9-16; 13.13.8) in an effort to emphasize to Gentile readers aspects of Judaism which would be most intelligible and attractive to them. Some Jews even spiritualized the distinctively Jewish aspects of the Law to the extent that they felt literal observance was not necessary. According to Philo (who did not approve of their activity) this group focused its spiritualizing efforts on the laws of Sabbath observance, festival participation and circumcision (Philo Migr. Abr. 450).

In sum, from at least the period of the exile in Babylon, most Jews realized that their subjugation to foreign powers was a direct result of their violation of the Law given at Sinai. Many Jews believed, therefore, that the answer to their oppression was renewed commitment to separate themselves from the Gentiles around them by adhering to the Law, especially to those aspects of the Law which marked Israel as a separate people with a distinct way of life. Some within this group sought to cast off Gentile overlords and even to purge Gentiles from the land within the borders of Davidic Israel. Others, believing that God had begun to establish his new covenant within their communities, waited upon God to intervene eschatologically as he had promised in the prophets (see Restoration of Israel).

Another group, although probably no less committed to the Law as the distinguishing mark of Israel, believed that contact with Gentile peoples and ideas was not only permitted, but revealed that the best aspects of Gentile life were anticipated in the Mosaic Law. Some Jews were willing to go still further and to become outwardly indistinguishable from monotheistic and morally upright Gentiles by spiritualizing at least the laws governing Sabbath observance, festival keeping and circumcision. The scanty evidence for this last group probably indicates that their numbers were small and their influence insignificant. For most Jews of Paul's era, then, the Law was the distinguishing mark of the Jewish people, to be kept at all costs in order to escape the curse which the Law itself pronounced upon the disobedient, and for some Jews the period in which this happened would mark the fulfillment of the prophetic promise of the new covenant.

3. The Jewish Law in the Context of Paul's Letters. When we turn to Paul's letters we find a large measure of discontinuity, but also a surprising amount of continuity, between Paul and second Temple Judaism on the place of the Law in God's dealings with his people.

3.1. 1 and 2 Thessalonians. Paul's Thessalonian* correspondence is widely neglected in the study of the apostle's view of the Law. The word nomos ("law") does not, after all, occur in these letters, and they were written before Paul's heated disputes with the Judaizers over the Law had taken place. It has in the past, therefore, seemed safe to move immediately beyond them to the more fertile ground of 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians and Romans. The absence of the word nomos from the Thessalonian letters, however, does not mean that we cannot glean some information from them about Paul's view of the Law at this early stage in his letter-writing career. What we can glean turns out to be helpful in understanding Paul's view of the Law in his later, more Law-oriented correspondence.

As T. J. Deidun has pointed out (Deidun, 10-12), Paul's use of the phrase "the church* of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" in 1 Thessalonians 1:1 (cf. 2 Thess 1:1), and his description of the Judean Christians as "the churches of God" in 1 Thessalonians 2:14 come from the OT conception of "the church of God," a status which became Israel's on the day that they assembled to receive the Law from Moses at Sinai (Deut 4:9-14; 9:10; 10:4; 18:16). Israel was to observe this Law, according to Leviticus, both because it gave them a holiness corresponding to the holiness* of God who was present among them and because it distinguished them from the surrounding Gentile nations (Lev 11:45; 18:1-5, 24-30; 19:1; 20:7-8, 23-26). Presumably the new covenant prophesied in Jeremiah 31 and Ezekiel 36—37 would have a similar effect for God's people: it would serve to distinguish his people from the rest of the world.

This is precisely what we find in 1 Thessalonians where the distinguishing mark of the Thessalonians is adherence to the "specific precepts" (tinas parangelias, 1 Thess 4:2) which Paul gave to them and which would mark them off from "the Gentiles who do not know God" (1 Thess 4:5; Deidun, 18-28). They are to be "set apart" (hagiasmos), for God's Holy Spirit* dwells among them and they are taught by God himself (1 Thess 4:7-9; cf. Jer 31:34). The wicked figure who will arise in the eschaton can, therefore, be described as "the man of lawlessness" (anomia, 2 Thess 2:3, 7-8). Paul could hardly be unaware of the echoes which his description of the Thessalonian community contains both of Leviticus and of Jeremiah.

Thus Paul views the Thessalonian congregation as a fulfillment of God's promise to establish a new covenant with his people, one in which the Law would be written on hearts and obeyed. Although the congregation is predominantly Gentile (1 Thess 1:9), Paul regards it as parallel to the Israel of the Mosaic covenant, whose status as "the church of God" originated with the giving of precepts to mark them off as a distinct people. We cannot at this point discern the details of the relationship between the old covenant and the new in Paul's thinking; but that there are parallels between the patterns of the two covenants and that there are differences is clear. Both old covenant and new emphasize sanctity through behavior and for identical reasons; but the new covenant, unlike the old, is not ethnically determined.

3.2. 1 Corinthians. Paul's attitude toward the Jewish Law comes into sharper focus when we move to 1 Corinthians.* Although Paul uses the word nomos only eight times in this letter (nine if 14:34 is original), like the Thessalonian correspondence, a stance toward the Law is presupposed in much of what Paul says in the letter about sanctity and ethics. Moreover, the few times that Paul explicitly speaks of the Law provide excellent evidence for his attitude toward the Law when the Law itself is not a bone of contention between himself and his opponents,* as it is in several of his later letters. For these reasons, 1 Corinthians provides a ripe field for gleaning information about Paul's view of the Law.

The first two verses of the letter demonstrate that Paul's emphasis on the continuity between the people of God in the OT and the newly constituted people of God has not weakened since writing to the Thessalonians. Paul addresses the Corinthian believers as "the church of God . . . set apart in Christ Jesus, called to be separate" (1 Cor 1:2), once again echoing the Pentateuch's description of Israel's constitution as the people of God at Sinai. The theme is filled out in 1 Corinthians 3:10-17 where Paul describes the Corinthian church as God's temple,* subject to the most careful maintenance, "for the temple of God, which you (pl.) are, is sacred" (1 Cor 3:17). Because they are God's congregation and God's temple, moreover, the Corinthians should distinguish themselves from "the Gentiles" by abstaining from sexual immorality (1 Cor 5:1; cf. 1 Thess 4:5) and separating themselves from those who claim to be part of God's congregation but refuse to shun immorality (1 Cor 5:10-13). Paul supports his argument for excommunicating those within the church who refuse to separate themselves from Gentile sexual misconduct (see Sexuality) by citing a saying which recurs many times in Deuteronomy and makes the same point with respect to Israel: "cast out the evil person from among you" (1 Cor 5:13; cf. Deut 17:7; 19:19; 22:21, 24; 24:7). He is also concerned that they not taint themselves with idolatry* and, as N. T. Wright (120-136) has shown, Paul approaches the subject of eating meat offered to idols from the standpoint of the great Jewish confession, drawn from the Torah, that there is but one God* (1 Cor 8:4; cf. Deut 4:35, 39; 6:4).

Paul also demonstrates in 1 Corinthians that he is aware of the whole story of God's covenant with Israel at Sinai, Israel's failure to keep that covenant, and of the promise of an eschatological covenant (see Eschatology). In 1 Corinthians, just as in 1 Thessalonians, he shows that he believes the churches coming into existence through his missionary work and on the basis of faith in Christ are the inheritors of this new covenant. These convictions come most clearly to the surface in 1 Corinthians 10 where, in the course of warning the Corinthian believers against idolatry, Paul reminds them of the story of Israel's failure and its miserable consequences and then makes the telling statement, "But these things happened to them as a pattern and were written in order to admonish us, upon whom the climax of the ages has arrived" (1 Cor 10:11). The Corinthian believers, then, appear in Paul's thinking to be eschatological Israel, the new "congregation of God" who stand in contrast both to the Gentiles on one side and to "Israel according to the flesh*" on the other (1 Cor 10:18, 32; cf. 12:2).

Most of the points in the letter at which Paul specifically refers to the Law tally well with this picture of believers as the new Israel. In 1 Corinthians 7:19 Paul claims that what really matters in the busy era before Christ's return is not whether one is married or unmarried, slave or free, circumcised or uncircumcised, but whether one "keeps the commands of God," a phrase frequently used in the literature of Paul's era for "observing the Jewish Law" (Ezra 9:4 LXX; Sir 32:23; Mt 19:17-19). In 1 Corinthians 9:8-9 he calls upon "the Mosaic Law" as an authority for his contention that he, like other preachers of the gospel,* has the right to be supported by the community in which he works (see Financial Support). In 1 Corinthians 9:19-23 he claims that he seeks to accommodate everyone, whether Jew or Gentile, whether "under the Law" or not, although he is not himself "outside the Law but within the Law of Christ" (1 Cor 9:21). In 1 Corinthians 14:21 he calls upon "the Law" to prove a point about the role of speaking in tongues in the church's worship* (1 Cor 14:23). Clearly, for Paul, "the Law" was valid in some form for members of the new covenant.

Already in these few references, however, we find clues that Paul's view of the Law is complex. How could Paul claim that what mattered was keeping God's commands but then say that circumcision, one of the Law's most prominent commands, did not matter? What provoked him to say that he could observe or not observe the dietary scruples of "weak" (see Strong and Weak) Jewish Christians because he was not "under Law" but that he was subject to "the Law of Christ"? In what meaningful sense could Paul claim that the Law was authoritative for believers when he ignored these central commands?

1 Corinthians does not provide an explicit answer to this question; but if we add Paul's comments in 1 Corinthians 7:19 to those in 1 Corinthians 9:19-23 we can see a pattern that may help us to understand Paul's thinking about the Law. In 1 Corinthians 7:19 the part of the Law with which Paul is willing to dispense is circumcision; in 1 Corinthians 9:19-23 it is dietary observance (cf. 1 Cor 8:1-13 and 10:1-11:1). Both of these aspects of the Law, as we saw above in our study of the Law in Judaism, were prized by many Jews as particularly Jewish laws, laws which marked the Jews off from the rest of the world as God's special people. It is precisely these highly prized, and ethnically specific, aspects of the Law that Paul considers no longer valid.

If we pause to think about Paul's calling to be the apostle to the Gentiles we can see clearly the reason for his rejection of these laws: they served to limit membership in the people of God to ethnic Jews and those willing to convert to Judaism. As we have seen, Paul affirmed the Law's commitment to separation of the people of God from the rest of the world; but the crucial areas of separation were now no longer the observance of dietary rules and circumcision, but moral behavior motivated by God's sanctifying Spirit.

Paul's view of the Law, however, is more complex still. Another element of its complex structure breaks through the surface in 1 Corinthians 15:56, his final reference to the Law in this letter. Paul has been discussing the necessity of the bodily resurrection* of believers and of Christ from the dead, and has been trying to explain to Greeks unfamiliar with Jewish eschatology the eternal value of the body and what a bodily resurrection will be like. The climax of his argument comes in 1 Corinthians 15:54-55 with a paraphrase of Isaiah 25:8 and a quotation of Hosea 14:4: "Death has been swallowed up in victory. Where, O Death, is your victory? Where, O Death, is your sting?" Paul's next statement comes, like a bolt from the blue, with no warning: "the sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the Law" (1 Cor 15:56). Sin* has not figured prominently in Paul's argument to this point, and Law not at all. Why does Paul suddenly mention them here?

The surprise which the reader feels at encountering 1 Corinthians 15:56 demonstrates how firmly the Law was connected with sin and death in Paul's mind. Like a runner unable to stop at the finish line, Paul is unable to stop his argument at its most rhetorically effective finish and runs ahead into other subjects which he associates with the Law. This comes as a surprise not only because it raises a new subject within chapter fifteen, but also because what Paul says about the Law in this verse does not immediately appear to be compatible with what he has said about it elsewhere in the letter. Elsewhere it appears as an authority; here it is connected with sin and death (see Life and Death), aspects of the present world which are evil and will pass away. How can Paul hold both positions?

1 Corinthians does not answer this question for us. In Paul's next letter, however, we find some information which helps us to move toward an answer.

3.3. 2 Corinthians. By the time Paul wrote 2 Corinthians he had entered a period of stormy relations with the Corinthian believers, apparently aggravated by the arrival in Corinth of a group of Jewish Christians who opposed him. Despite this changed situation, Paul's attitude toward the Jewish Law in 2 Corinthians meshes well with our discoveries in the Thessalonian correspondence and in 1 Corinthians. We still find Paul, for example, appealing to the Law as an authority when discussing how believers should conduct the practical affairs of everyday life (2 Cor 8:15, quoting Ex 16:18; 2 Cor 13:1, quoting Deut 19:15). In 2 Corinthians, as in 1 Corinthians, moreover, one passage does not seem to square with this picture of continuity between the Jewish Law and the new Israel.

The topic under discussion in 2 Corinthians 3:1-18 is the contrast between Paul's style of ministry* and that of his opponents. Specifically, Paul is concerned to refute the notion that letters of recommendation, such as his opponents carry, are necessary credentials for true apostleship (2 Cor 3:1; see Apostle). Paul claims to have letters of recommendation, but not ones written with ink or on tablets of stone. His letters were written instead with the Spirit of the living God on the tablets of the human heart (2 Cor 3:2-3). Letters were not, of course, written with ink on stone in Paul's time, but with ink on papyrus. Paul has, however, purposely mixed his metaphors in order to echo the prophetic passages dealing with the new covenant, in which God would replace his people's "heart of stone" with a "heart of flesh," put his Spirit in them (Ezek 36:26-27), and write his Law "on [their] hearts" (Jer 31:33; see Prophet, Paul as). Thus, in 2 Corinthians 3:6 Paul claims to be a minister of a new covenant, not like the old, written covenant which "killed" by properly bringing the covenant's curses down upon disobedient Israel, but like the covenant which Jeremiah predicted would at some future time bring forgiveness for sin and a renewed ability to know and to obey God.

Paul's implied conclusion to this argument is that written letters, such as his opponents carry (2 Cor 3:1-2), provide insignificant proof of apostleship when compared to the eschatologically significant "letters" which Paul can bring forward in the form of the Corinthian believers themselves, for the Corinthians joined the eschatological people of God through Paul's ministry and represent the long-awaited fulfillment of the prophetic promise.

In order to drive the point home even more forcefully, Paul, in 2 Corinthians 3:7-11 comments on the superiority of the new covenant, of which he is minister and the Corinthians are proof, to the old. The old covenant, he says, was glorious, so glorious in fact that when Moses* received the covenant stipulations from God, his face was "glorified" to the extent that the Israelites were not able to look at it (2 Cor 3:7; cf. Ex 34:29-30 LXX; Tg. Onq. Ex 34:29-30). If such glory* attaches to "the ministry of death" (2 Cor 3:7) and "condemnation" (2 Cor 3:9), Paul says, how much more glorious must be "the ministry of the Spirit" and "righteousness" (2 Cor 3:8-9). In 2 Corinthians 3:12-18 Paul goes on to describe how Moses veiled his face to prevent the Israelites from seeing that its glory was fading, and comments that the old covenant's obsolescence is still veiled from the unbelieving Jews of Paul's day (2 Cor 3:14).

When we compare 2 Corinthians 3:1-18 with Paul's appeal to the Law as a guide to conduct in 2 Corinthians 8:5 and 13:1 we face the same problem we discovered in 1 Corinthians. Paul at times appears to say that the Law is no longer valid since it is aligned with sin, death and condemnation (1 Cor 15:56; 2 Cor 3:7, 9) and at times seems to regard it, at least in some form, as authoritative. Are these two sides of a complex view of the Law or are they, as Räisänen and others believe, indications that Paul's view of the Law is confused and contradictory?

One hint that these two approaches to the Law form part of a complex but coherent position lies in the consistent presence of the two approaches in different letters. That 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians contain both attitudes, although the letters address different situations, shows at least that Paul did not simply make one type of statement when convenient in one situation and another type of statement when convenient in a different situation.

A second indication that Paul's view of the Law is complex and coherent rather than ad hoc and contradictory lies in the nature of the negative statements. The most natural background for Paul's statements that the Law is aligned with sin, death and condemnation is the widespread conviction among first-century Jews that the Law had justly condemned Israel to Gentile domination for transgressing its commands. When Paul speaks of the "old covenant" as "made obsolete in Christ" (2 Cor 3:14), he may have in focus not everything the Law contained but the Law's sentence of condemnation upon Israel's transgression of the covenant. This reading gains some support from Paul's description of the Sinaitic covenant as "the ministry of death" (2 Cor 3:7), recalling precisely the penalty for breaking the covenant according to Leviticus 26:25 (LXX) and Deuteronomy 30:15, 19, and his further description, so appropriate in this context, of the Mosaic code as the "ministry of condemnation" (2 Cor 3:9). If this perspective is correct, then Paul does not say in these passages that every aspect of the Mosaic legislation was abolished, but that God himself had abolished the Law's just sentence of condemnation upon his people for their transgressions. As Paul puts it, "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself by not counting their transgressions against them" (2 Cor 5:19).

In sum, we have discovered so far that Paul clearly believed that the promise of the new covenant had been fulfilled in the coming of Jesus Christ, that the people of God which this new covenant constituted included Gentiles as Gentiles, not Gentiles as converts to Judaism, and that this newly constituted people was, like the old people of God, separated from the world around it by their conduct. We have also found that the specific rules of this separation coincide in many cases with the rules in the Mosaic legislation, and sometimes are quoted from that legislation word for word. Nevertheless, the Mosaic code viewed from the standpoint of its historical role in justly condemning God's people for their sin, Paul says, has been abolished. For Paul, therefore, it is impossible to say that the Mosaic Law, minus a few cultic and ethnic regulations, is still in force. To the contrary, since the Mosaic Law was inextricably bound to a period of time in which the boundaries of God's people were virtually identical with the boundaries of the Jewish people and to a time in which God's people labored under a justly pronounced sentence of condemnation, it has come to its divinely appointed end (see esp. 2 Cor 3:13).

With these discoveries in mind we are now in a better position to understand the statements which Paul makes about the Jewish Law in the letters where the Law is a specific topic of debate. Hopefully our discoveries in the Thessalonian and Corinthian correspondence will help us to understand the more difficult passages in Galatians, Philippians and Romans.

3.4. Galatians. Paul's letter to the Galatians* records the apostle's angry response to a group of fledgling churches which had come under the influence of Jewish Christians preaching "another gospel" (Gal 1:8-9). This group, evidently under pressure from zealous and violent Jews in Palestine (Gal 6:12; see Revolutionary Movements), taught that it was necessary to become a full proselyte to Judaism in order to stand justified (see Justification) before God at the final day of reckoning. At issue in particular were the requirements that the Gentile Galatians observe circumcision (Gal 2:3; 5:2-6, 11-12; 6:12-13), Jewish holy days (Gal 4:10) and dietary restrictions (Gal 2:11-14).

The details of Paul's response are compressed and frequently difficult to understand; but it is clear that they flow out of the central convictions that a new era in God's dealings with his creation has dawned and that in this new era God has established a new covenant with a newly constituted people (Gal 1:4; 4:4; 4:24, 28; cf. 3:17). Viewed from this perspective, the reintroduction of precisely those barriers which divided Jew from Gentile was nothing short of a defection from the new covenant and a return to the days of the old covenant with its divisions between people (Gal 2:15-21) and its legitimate curse upon Israel's miserable failure to keep the Law (Gal 3:10-14). It was to nullify the effect of Christ's timely coming and death (Gal 4:4; 2:21; 5:4; cf. 3:13-14), to deny the work of the eschatologically supplied Spirit (Gal 3:1-5) and to fall away from the graciously fulfilled promise of God (Gal 5:4). It was, in short, a prodigious error of timekeeping.

From this hermeneutical origin, Paul's discussion of the Law takes two directions. The first, which not surprisingly consumes most of his energy, is that the national markers of circumcision, Sabbath keeping and dietary observances, or "works of the Law"* as Paul calls them (Gal 2:11-16), cannot make one righteous before God. The reason for this is twofold. For one thing, Paul says, no one can keep the whole Law. Paul's opponents themselves demonstrate this by their own inability to do the Law (Gal 6:13); the Galatians will discover it too if they undertake its yoke (Gal 5:3); and the historical experience of Israel with the curse of the Law for disobedience proves it to be true (Gal 3:10-12, cf. Col 2:14). Why is it impossible to keep the Law? Paul hints at what he thinks on this important issue in Galatians 2:16, when he says that "by works of the Law no flesh shall be justified." The term *flesh was probably suggested to Paul not only by the physical nature of the circumcisions which his opponents wished to perform on the Galatians but by the use of the word to indicate human weakness in such biblical passages as Genesis 6:3 and 12, Jeremiah 17:5 and Isaiah 40:6. Thus, the term appears to be Paul's shorthand for humanity's vulnerability to sin (Gal 5:19, 24; 6:8). To elevate "works of the Law" to the level of a requirement for living in a harmonious covenant relationship with God, Paul says, is to place such a relationship outside anyone's reach, whether Jew or Gentile, because the human inclination to disobey God prevents "any flesh" from obeying the Law completely (Gal 2:16).

The second reason that "works of the Law" cannot place one within this harmonious covenant relationship with God is that the covenant of which these works are part was temporary. Unlike the promise made to Abraham,* which constituted a permanent covenant fulfilled in Christ (Gal 3:15-18), the Sinaitic covenant was established "on account of transgressions." By this last phrase Paul probably means that God gave the Law at Sinai in order to reveal clearly

Israel's sin, to transform it from something ill defined and inchoate into specific transgressions against God's will. Paul is probably alluding here to a well-known irony: at the very moment God gave the Law to Moses on Sinai, Israel was on the plain below already violating its first stipulation (Ex 32:7-8; cf. Bib. Ant. 12.4, c. first century A.D.).

Paul's meaning becomes even clearer when he describes the Sinaitic covenant as a "pedagogue" (paidagōgos), the family slave in the Greco-Roman world who served as guardian, disciplinarian and teacher of children until they reached maturity (Gal 3:23-25). Those under the pedagogue's charge sometimes remembered their caretaker fondly; but frequently in satire and in art work he is depicted as a harsh figure, rod in hand, ready to punish any disobedience. As Galatians 3:23 shows, Paul's purpose for comparing the Sinaitic covenant to a pedagogue in this passage is twofold: to emphasize its purpose of identifying and punishing sin and, at the same time, to highlight its temporary nature.

From Galatians 4:1—5:1 Paul uses a series of metaphors to argue that those who want to live under the yoke of the covenant at Sinai are turning the clock back to an era in which both Gentile and Jew were enslaved to sin. The concept which allows these various metaphors to hang together is that of slavery. First Paul compares the Gentile Galatians' former existence under "the elemental things of the world" (stoicheia tou kosmou; see Elements/Elemental Spirits of the World), a phrase reminiscent of their former idolatrous practices, to the life of the young heir to a wealthy estate who, for the time being, is no different from a slave. For the Galatians to accept the yoke of the Sinai covenant was to return from the era of the eschatological Spirit to that former era in which sin dominated their lives (Gal 4:1-11). Next, Paul compares life under the Sinaitic covenant to Hagar, Abraham's female slave who gave birth to Abraham's first son, Ishmael (Gal 4:21-31). Hagar, he says, stands for the present Jerusalem* (Gal 4:25), and to accept the Sinaitic covenant as binding is to turn away from the eschatological new Jerusalem, with its new covenant of freedom from the Law's curse (Gal 4:24, 26), and to return to the "present" Jerusalem where the curse remains in force (Gal 4:25; cf. 4 Ezra 9:38—10:28; 2 Bar. 4). It is, therefore, to accept Hagar the slave as one's mother and to live in slavery with her other children (Gal 4:25).

This extensive case against human ability to keep the Mosaic covenant and against that covenant's continuing validity does not, however, exhaust Paul's comments on the Law in Galatians. In a few other passages, Paul's comments take a different direction. In Galatians 5:14 he tells his readers that "the whole Law is fulfilled in one phrase, namely, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself,' " and in Galatians 6:2 he encourages them to bear each others' burdens "for thereby you will fulfill the law of Christ." These statements seem surprising until we remember (1) that the Corinthian correspondence showed a similar pattern of regarding the Mosaic legislation as obsolete but then referring to the Law in positive ways and (2) that in neither the Corinthian correspondence nor in Galatians does Paul say that each specific command in the Mosaic code is obsolete, but only the code viewed as a whole with its curses for disobedience and its barriers against Gentiles.

Paul's quarrel is with the imposition of old and temporary structures upon the new eschatological age of reconciliation*—structures whose purpose was to condemn sin and to sequester the Jews from the Gentiles (cf. Eph 2:14-18). Some of the content of the Mosaic Law emerges unscathed from Paul's critique, therefore, because it is untainted by the temporal nature of the curses and barriers. These aspects of the Mosaic law, Paul believes, are not only still valid but are fulfilled by believers when they walk in the Spirit (Gal 5:22-23; 6:2; cf. Eph 6:2).

3.5. Philippians. Although Philippians,* unlike Galatians, was not written primarily to correct a mistaken notion of the role of the Law in salvation history, the Galatian controversy was nevertheless ringing in Paul's ears as he wrote this letter. In Philippians 3:2-11, therefore, we find a warning against the same Jewish Christians who were trying to turn the clock back to an era in which circumcision, dietary requirements and Sabbath keeping separated Israel from the Gentiles (Phil 3:2-3). Although the group did not yet pose an active threat to the Philippians (Phil 3:2 sounds more like a warning of possible rather than of present danger), Paul had seen enough of the damage they could do to warrant delivering a warning against them to one of his favorite churches (Phil 4:15-16).

Paul's warning, although brief, provides a helpful link between his compressed and forceful statements about the Law in Galatians and his more carefully nuanced comments in Romans. In articulating his case against his opponents, Paul argues, as he had in Galatians, that to demand the fulfillment of these obsolete requirements is to place confidence in "the flesh," humanity's fallen and inadequate ability to do what God requires (Phil 3:3-4; cf. Gal 2:16). In explaining what he means, however, he takes a step beyond Galatians toward his later argument in Romans. To place confidence in one's fleshly circumcision, Jewish lineage and punctilious legal observance, he says, is to rely on one's own inadequate righteousness rather than on the righteousness which comes from God (Phil 3:5-6, 9; cf. Rom 2:1—3:20).

This new twist to his case against the reintroduction of the Sinaitic covenant is grounded in two biblical images. The first is the image of Israel's own inadequate righteousness during the wilderness wanderings, in spite of which God led them into the promised land (Deut 9:1—10:11). As with Israel, Paul's own righteousness was based on the broken Sinaitic covenant and therefore was an inadequate means of attaining salvation (literally, "the resurrection from the dead," Phil 3:9; cf. Rom 10:2-3). The second biblical image Paul uses is of God's powerful and effective action to rescue his people from their plight as exiles and to restore them both to their land and to a peaceful relationship with himself. In Isaiah 46:13 and 51:5-8 God refers to this saving activity as "my righteousness." Paul takes up this notion in Philippians 3:9 to say that the biblical expectations of an eschatological display of God's righteousness have been at least partially fulfilled in Jesus Christ, and so to cling to the old, inadequate righteousness based on a broken Sinaitic covenant is to put one's trust in "refuse" (Phil 3:8). This brief comment in Philippians on the relationship between the Law, conceived as the Sinaitic covenant, and "the righteousness from God" will in Romans become a dominant theme.

3.6. Romans. Paul's view of the Law in Romans,* like his comments in Galatians, come into sharper focus if we understand something about the situation that provoked the letter. When Paul wrote Romans he was on the verge of delivering his highly prized collection* of relief funds from his predominantly Gentile churches to the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem (Rom 15:25). He was concerned, however, that this offering, purchased at the price of considerable labor, would not be acceptable to the church there, and so he wrote to Rome, in part, to solicit that church's prayer* support for his journey (Rom 15:30-32). Acts shows us that Paul's concern centered upon what some Jewish Christians in Jerusalem had heard about his view of the Law (Acts 21:20-21). Similar rumors had also reached the Roman church, a community which, as A. J. M. Wedderburn (44-65) argues, had close ties to Jerusalem (Rom 3:8; 6:1; 6:15; see Rome). Hence Paul's purpose in Romans was probably at least in part to correct misunderstanding about his view of the Law.

As in Galatians, Paul makes both positive and negative statements about the Law. He maintains both that "works of the Law" cannot give righteousness and that the Law, no longer apparently conceived as the Sinaitic covenant, can be fulfilled by Christians. In Romans, however, Paul articulates his critique of the Sinaitic covenant in a slightly different way from what he had in Galatians. In Galatians Paul never mentioned boasting in the Law (although see Gal 6:13-14); but in Romans his argument receives a new twist from the case it makes against "boasting" or "glorying" in the Law as a special possession of the Jewish people (Rom 2:17, 23; 4:2; cf. Phil. 3:3-6).

When Paul begins to describe the gospel which he wants "to preach to you who are in Rome also" (Rom 1:15), among his first points is that mere knowledge* of what God requires does not provide one with a right standing before God. Only obedience to God's requirements, Paul says, can do that. He begins by discussing the Gentile world where many people sin against God (Rom 1:21-31) although they know his awesomeness, power, divinity (Rom 1:20), creative activity (Rom 1:25) and moral standard (Rom 1:32). Nevertheless, their knowledge goes unaccompanied by obedience, and so in spite of their knowledge, God punishes them precisely as their sins deserve (Rom 1:24, 26, 28).

Paul then turns to the Jewish world where God's impartiality (Rom 2:11) requires that the same standard of judgment hold true: "It is not the hearers of the Law who are righteous in God's eyes, but the doers of the Law who will be declared righteous" (Rom 2:13). This standard is so firm, says Paul, that in God's eyes it is appropriate for a Gentile who keeps the Law in spirit but violates its letter by remaining uncircumcised (Rom 2:26, 29) to sit in judgment upon a Jew who boasts (Rom 2:23) in the possession of the Law but does not obey it (Rom 2:14-29). Although this is a complex passage, its fundamental point is clear: it is no use for Jewish Christians to impose a standard upon Gentile Christians which the Jews themselves have historically not been able to keep (cf. Rom 2:24 and Acts 15:10-11). The reason for this is that doing the "just requirements of the Law" (Rom 2:26) and keeping it "inwardly" and "spiritually" (Rom 2:28-29) are what matters before God, not boasting in the possession of the Law (Rom 2:23) and in outward marks like circumcision (Rom 2:25-26).

In Romans 3:9-20 Paul takes the further step of pointing out that no one, whether Jew or Gentile, fully does what the Law requires. Instead, when measured against the standard which the Law demands, all apologetic speeches must cease (Rom 3:19; cf. Job 29:7-10), for everyone stands condemned. All, both Jew and Gentile, are "under sin" (Rom 3:9; cf. 8:7), and boasting in possession of the Law (Rom 3:27) or the careful observance of the Mosaic code's stipulations ("works of Law," Rom 3:28) are of no use. The Mosaic covenant has been broken both nationally and personally by both Jew and Gentile, and only eschatological help from the covenant keeping God ("the righteousness* of God," Rom 3:21) can remedy the situation. This, of course, has happened in Jesus Christ, because of whom all believers, whether Jew or Gentile, stand assured of a favorable verdict at the day of reckoning (Rom 3:21-26).

By this point in the argument Paul has largely made his case. Two important threads, however, remain loose and need attention. First, Paul must address the significant objection that he has nullified the Law, which after all Paul himself believes to be God's Word (Rom 3:31). Paul answers this objection by appealing not to the Sinaitic covenant but to the narrative portion of the Law and specifically to God's covenant with Abraham,* the first "Jew." Paul observes that God reckoned Abraham righteous (Gen 15:6) prior to circumcision (Gen 17:11-14, 23-27), and then claims that circumcision only served as a seal upon a covenant already made on the basis of Abraham's faith.* Hence faith, not "works" prescribed by the Mosaic code, bring righteousness (Rom 4:1, 1-5, 13), and Abraham serves as the prototype not only of the believing (and circumcised) Jew but of the believing (and uncircumcised) Gentile as well (Rom 4:11-12). In this way Paul demonstrates that, far from nullifying the Law, "the righteousness of God" is consistent with the principle of faith found in the Law itself.

A second problem Paul must address is why, if it lends no advantage to the Jew, did God give the Law? Paul points out carefully that nothing he has said should lead to the conclusion that the Law and sin are identical (Rom 7:7). To the contrary, the Law is holy, righteous, good and spiritual (Rom 7:12, 14; cf. 7:22); it is only so closely allied with sin because it shows sin for the evil transgression that it is and condemns the transgressor. It accomplishes this, according to Paul, in three ways. First, it brings knowledge of sin by making God's will explicit so that people can know God's will and understand that they have not done it (Rom 3:20; 4:15; 5:13; 7:7, 21-23). Second, the Law demonstrates how insidious sin is by suggesting to fallen humanity ways in which it can rebel against God (Rom 7:7-12; cf. 5:20). Finally, "the Law brings wrath*" (Rom 4:15; cf. 1:18), for it contains a list of dire consequences which God ordains for those who disobey its commands. Not surprisingly, then, believers are "no longer under," have "died to" and have been "freed from" this "Law of sin and death" (Rom 6:14; 7:4; 7:6; 8:2).

By this point in our study it should come as no surprise that while Paul can unambiguously speak of the abrogation of the Mosaic code, he can at the same time speak of the Law's authority and of its fulfillment among believers. In Romans the tension between these two kinds of statements is at its sharpest, for along with comments about freedom from the Law we read that the Law is God's (Rom 7:22; 8:7), that it is "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (Rom 8:2) and that believers fulfill its "just requirement" when they walk in the Spirit (Rom 8:4; cf. 13:8-10), something that unbelievers are not able to do (Rom 8:7).

Evidence from Paul's other letters has so far pointed toward a resolution to this tension in Paul's belief in two covenants, or two laws, one old and the other new. Romans 9:30—10:8 tends to confirm this view. Here Paul explains that most of Israel has failed to believe the gospel because they have pursued the Law "as if it were a matter of works" (Rom 9:32), believing that in spite of God's eschatological provision for rescue from the broken covenant in Jesus Christ ("the righteousness of God," Rom 10:3), they could continue to cling to the Law of Sinai as proof that they were God's people (Rom 10:3; cf. Phil 3:9). To demonstrate that clinging to the Law in this way could not lead to salvation, Paul quotes two passages from "the Law." The first, Leviticus 18:5, reminds the attentive reader that the Mosaic covenant promised life only to those who obeyed it (Rom 10:5), something which anyone who had read Leviticus 26:14-46 knew Israel had not done, and which Paul has just argued energetically that no individual has done either. This Law, Paul says, has reached its climax (telos) in Christ (Rom 10:4; see Wright, 241) and has given way to a new covenant. The second passage features much of the vocabulary of Deuteronomy 9:4 and 30:12, passages which in their original context spoke of obedience to the Mosaic Law. In Paul's hands, however, they have been transposed into a different key and now speak of righteousness by faith in Christ (Rom 10:6-8; Hays, 73-83). The very Law which has come to its climactic end (telos) in Christ can be taken up and remolded to fit the shape of the new covenant.

4. Conclusion.

If the portrait of Paul's view of the Law painted here is correct, then at its heart was the conviction that the old covenant made with Israel at Sinai had passed away and the new covenant predicted by Jeremiah and Ezekiel had come. The change of covenants was necessary because no individual could keep the stipulations of the old covenant, a fact which Israel had demonstrated at the national level. The change was also necessary because after the covenant was broken, Israel used the Law to erect barriers between itself and the Gentile world, barriers which to some became a point of pride and false security. The new covenant maintained the formal structure of the old, including its barrier of separation between those within and those outside. This barrier ceased to be national in character, however, and assumed instead dimensions dictated by the Spirit, dimensions which in their practical outworking coincided in many particulars with the old covenant. This new covenant, moreover, as the prophets had predicted, was written on the heart and could be kept by those who walked in the Spirit.

All of this means, of course, that Paul's view of the Law was to a large measure discontinuous with the view of many Jews during his time. It is hard to imagine that the authors of Tobit and Judith, Jubilees and the Qumran Scrolls would have been comfortable in Paul's company. On the other hand, the undeniable element of discontinuity can be overstressed. The conceptual world within which Paul worked would have been familiar to Paul's Jewish contemporaries. They knew that Israel suffered under "the curse of the Law" in the form of Gentile domination because it had broken the covenant, and some of them at least looked for the answer to this plight in the promises of Jeremiah 31 and Ezekiel 36—37. The image of Paul, the aberration, as it appears in the work of Montefiore, Sanders and others is, therefore, hardly fair.

Neither, if our reading is correct, is Räisänen's image of Paul the muddle-head. Paul's conviction that his churches formed the community of the new covenant, with all of the ramifications which that conviction entailed, remains consistent from his earliest correspondence to his latest, from his most placid to his most polemical. Paul did not produce his view of the Law as an expedient in the heat of the moment. Rather it bears the marks of a complex and carefully considered position, worthy of the most painstaking study and of the deepest theological reflection.

See also COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT; CURSE, ACCURSED, ANATHEMA; ETHICS; ISRAEL; JUDAIZERS; JUSTIFICATION; LAW OF CHRIST; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, Primitive Christianity in Its Contemporary Setting (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1956); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); T. J. Deidun, New Covenant Morality in Paul (AnBib 89; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1981); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul, and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1989); M. Hengel, The Zealots (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1989); H. Hübner, Law in Paul's Thought (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1984); H. Maccoby, Paul and Hellenism (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); C. G. Montefiore, "First Impressions of Paul," JQR 6 (1894) 428-75; idem, "Rabbinic Judaism and the Epistles of St. Paul," JQR 13 (1900-1901) 161-217; G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim (2 vols.; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1927); H. Räisänen, Paul and the Law (WUNT 29; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983); idem, The Torah and Christ: Essays in German and English on the Problem of the Law in Early Christianity (SESJ; Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society, 1986); W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC; 5th ed; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1902); E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63BCE-66CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992); idem, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, Paul (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); S. Sandmel, The Genius of Paul: A Study in History (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); idem, Judaism and Christian Beginnings (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978); F. Thielman, From Plight to Solution: A Jewish Framework for Understanding Paul's View of the Law in Galatians and Romans (NovTSup 61; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1989); P. J. Tomson, Paul and the Jewish Law: Halakah in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles (CRINT 3.1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); F. Weber, Jüdische Theologie auf Grund des Talmud und verwandter Schriften, gemeinfasslich dargestellt (2d ed.; Leipzig: Dörffling & Franke, 1897; 1st ed., 1880); A. J. M. Wedderburn, The Reasons for Romans (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988); S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1991).

F. Thielman

LAW OF CHRIST

The meaning of the phrase "law of Christ" (ho nomos tou Christou) is notoriously difficult since Paul uses it only once (Gal 6:2) in his letters (although there is the related expression "subject to the law of Christ" [ennomos Christou] in 1 Cor 9:21), and since the use of the phrase in Galatians* occurs unexpectedly, without any clear definition. We shall attempt to defend briefly the following definition: The "law of Christ" for Paul includes the moral norms of the OT Law,* focusing particularly on the commandment to love one's neighbor. Paul emphasizes that this Law cannot be fulfilled apart from the powerful working of the Holy Spirit* in the believers' life.

1. Survey of Interpretation
2. The Pauline Texts
3. Conclusion

1. Survey of Interpretation.

A survey of the various interpretations will be given here, and though there is some overlap between the various views, we shall attempt to focus on what is distinctive to each.

1.1. Law of Love. The most common interpretation, represented in the commentaries on Galatians by F. F. Bruce and R. Y. K. Fung, understands the "law of Christ" as another way of describing the law of love* which is enunciated in Galatians 5:13.

1.2. Teaching of Jesus. C. H. Dodd and W. D. Davies claim that the phrase refers to the words of Jesus which function as an authoritative standard for the church.* The instruction given by Jesus becomes the new Torah for the Christian community.

1.3. Servants like Jesus. O. Hofius does not understand the "law of Christ" as referring to the teachings of Jesus, nor to the Sinai Torah, nor to the law of love. Rather, he sees it as grounded in the Isaianic Servant Songs in Isaiah 42:1-4 and 52:13—53:12. The Servant as the sin-bearing substitute bears the "burdens," the sins of the sinful. This is parallel to Galatians 6:2 where the one who fulfills the law of Christ "bears the burdens" of others. In light of Galatians 6:1, Hofius thinks the "burdens" are "sins and miseries." Those who have experienced the saving power of God in the gospel* are so gripped by it that they in turn embody the gospel in their relationship with other believers.

1.4. Pattern of Christ. Similar to the above view is the one propounded by R. B. Hays and H. Schürmann. What it means to live according to the law of Christ is to live in accordance with the pattern which was exemplified in Christ Jesus, whose self-giving on the cross becomes the paradigm for all people.

1.5. Borrowed from Opponents. H. D. Betz contends that Paul uses the phrase "law of Christ" in a polemical fashion in Galatians 6:2. The expression is rare in Paul, and Betz suggests that Paul used the phrase as a counter to the opponents.*

2. The Pauline Texts.

2.1. 1 Corinthians 9:21. An examination of 1 Corinthians 9:21 reveals that Paul says he is "subject to the law of Christ" to prevent a misunderstanding of his statement that when he is with "those without Law, he is as one without Law." He does not want his readers to conclude that since he is without Law he is an antinomian. The origin of the expression here is best explained rhetorically. Paul coins it in the course of his discussion to delineate his stance vis-à-vis the Law. Moreover, the context suggests that when Paul says he is "not under the Law" (1 Cor 9:20) and "without Law" (9:21), he is specifically thinking of the Law insofar as it creates a breach between Jews and Gentiles. Thus, specific laws such as circumcision,* food* laws and Sabbath keeping would be particularly in view here. Paul adapts his lifestyle so that he lives as a Jew when with Jews ("under Law") and as a Gentile* when with Gentiles ("without Law") so that he can proclaim the gospel to each. Nevertheless, he wants to stress that he is not "without the Law of God, but is subject to the law of Christ."

This probably means that Paul still abides by the moral norms of the OT Law. He does not consider his freedom* from the Law as a freedom which can violate the moral norms of the Law. The wider context of 1 Corinthians 8—10 supports this observation, for the issue under discussion is food offered to idols (see Idolatry). Jews and Jewish Christians would consider such food unclean, while Gentile Christians would tend to view the eating of such foods as a matter of indifference. A confirmation of the interpretation presented here is found in 1 Corinthians 7:19, "Circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commandments of God is essential." The ritual law of circumcision Paul can describe as insignificant, but the moral norms and commandments of the Law are still binding.

2.2. Galatians 6:2.

2.2.1. Weaknesses of Other Views. We have already seen that discussion has been centered on the phrase "law of Christ" in Galatians 6:2. Contrary to Betz, it is hardly clear that the phrase is polemical, especially since Paul uses it in the paraenetic section of the epistle without providing any substantial clue that the phrase should be understood as a response to opponents. It is also unlikely that the words of Jesus constitute a new Torah for Paul. Nowhere in Galatians nor in the near context of 1 Corinthians 9:21 does Paul cite the words of Jesus as a new law for the Christian. And explicit citations of the teaching of Jesus are rare in the Pauline letters (see Jesus, Sayings of).

Most would agree that the "law of Christ" involves the "law of love," but the phrase can be interpreted more specifically. Hofius provocatively interprets Galatians 6:2 in the light of the sin-bearing Servant of Yahweh, but such an allusion is not evident in the context of Galatians. And the view of Hays and Schürmann, that the focus is on the paradigmatic self-giving of Christ Jesus, although supported by other passages in the Pauline literature and even in the earlier chapters of Galatians, is too far removed from the immediate context of Galatians 6 to be credible.

2.2.2. The Law of Christ Defined in Context. A surprising and little-used phrase, like "law of Christ," is best interpreted in light of its immediate context. In this case the context begins with the paraenesis that extends from Gal 5:13—6:10. Here Paul stresses life in the Spirit. Believers are to "walk in the Spirit" (Gal 5:16), "be led by the Spirit" (Gal 5:18), manifest "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5:22-23), "live by the Spirit" (Gal 5:25), "keep in step with the Spirit" and "sow to the Spirit" (Gal 6:8). Thus, we can conclude that believers can fulfill the law of Christ only by the power of the Spirit. Indeed, this exhortation is addressed (Gal 6:1) to "the spiritual," who live in the strength provided in the Spirit. The emphasis on the Spirit shows that the "law of Christ" cannot be described as legalistic or constraining.

The other link forged in the context is found in the words "law" and "fulfill" (anaplērōsete) which recall Galatians 5:14 where "the whole law is fulfilled (peplērōtai) in love. It is clear in the latter text that Paul is thinking of the OT Law because he specifically cites Leviticus 19:18. The connection between these two texts suggests the following conclusion. The one who fulfills the law of Christ also fulfills the OT Law, which is summed up in the law of love. From the previous context of Galatians (e.g., Gal 2:11-14; 4:10; 5:2-6) it is evident that food laws, circumcision and the observance of certain days (see Holy Days) are no longer binding on believers.

Is the "law of Christ" for believers limited to the law of love? Yes and no. Love is the heartbeat and center of the Pauline ethic. And yet even in Galatians Paul unfolds the true nature of love by delineating what is not loving (Gal 5:15, 19-21, 26) and what is (Gal 5:22-23; 6:1-2, 6-10). A comparison of Galatians 5:14 with Romans 13:8-10 shows that for Paul the moral norms of the OT Law must be included when one is defining love. Otherwise love collapses into sentimentality and vagueness. Nevertheless, the focus must remain on the affections in the heart and the power* of the Spirit so that believers will not be satisfied with outward conformity to a norm.

3. Conclusion.

In conclusion, we have found the expression in Galatians confirms and deepens what we discovered in 1 Corinthians. The law of Christ is the law of love, and it includes the moral norms found in the OT Law, although it is not exhausted by those norms. Furthermore, the law of Christ can only be fulfilled by the power of the Holy Spirit.

See also ETHICS; LAW; LOVE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. G. Barclay, Obeying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988) 126-35; H. D. Betz, Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979) 298-301; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Galatians: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) 260-61; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980) 142-44; C. H. Dodd, "Ἔννομος Χριστοῦ," in Studia Paulina in Honorem Johannis de Zwaan (Haarlem: De Erven F. Bohn, 1953) 96-110; R. Y. K. Fung, The Epistle to the Galatians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988) 286-89; R. B. Hays, "Christology and Ethics in Galatians: The Law of Christ," CBQ 49 (1987) 268-90; O. Hofius, "Das Gesetz des Mose und das Gesetz Christi," ZThK 80 (1983) 262-86; T. R. Schreiner, "The Abolition and Fulfillment of the Law in Paul," JSNT 35 (1989) 47-74; H. Schürmann, " 'Das Gesetz des Christus' (Gal 6:2): Jesu Verhalten und Wort als letztgültige sittliche Norm nach Paulus," in Neues Testament und Kirche (Festschrift für R. Schnackenburg; Freiburg: Herder, 1974) 282-300; J. G. Strelan, "Burden Bearing and the Law of Christ," JBL 94 (1975) 266-76. T. R. Schreiner

LAWSUIT

In 1 Corinthians 6 Paul addresses abuses in the Christian community at Corinth. The powerful were using their position and affluence to manipulate cases of civil litigation. Worse, the litigations were contests between believers in front of unbelievers. According to Paul, such behavior and display by certain Corinthians was nothing more than another attempt to magnify their own self-importance.

1. The Church and the State
2. Civil Litigation in Roman Corinth

1. The Church and the State.

In Romans 13:4 (cf. 1 Pet 2:14), Paul presents the dual function of a ruler: on the one hand, the ruler is seen as God's servant (diakonos; cf. leitourgos, Rom 13:6) who rewards those who do what is right. Conversely, the ruler, as God's servant,* is the avenger (ekdikos) who dispenses punishment on the wrongdoer (see Civil Authority).

1 Corinthians 6:1-8 seems to stand in contrast with Romans 13 (and 1 Pet 2; if under Pauline influence which is uncertain); Paul seems to embrace a contrary view of the state in 1 Corinthians 6. The term servant is conspicuously absent; rather, we read that authorities are "unrighteous" (adikoi, 1 Cor 6:1), least esteemed by the church (1 Cor 6:4) and for Christians to appeal to them is categorically wrong (1 Cor 6:6).

The difference of perspective must be explained with reference to the nature of the problems addressed: Romans 13 offers general instruction concerning the role of the ruler, including jurisdiction over criminal cases; 1 Corinthians 6 addresses the nature of civil litigation. Civil suits included claims of legal possession, breach of contract, damage, fraud and injury (Garnsey, Part 3), as contrasted with the more serious criminal offenses (e.g., treason, murder, adultery, etc.). The practice of some at Corinth seems to fall into the category of civil law (v. criminal law): believer summoning believer before a pagan court concerning even a trivial case (kritērion elachiston, 1 Cor 6:2; see Legal System).

2. Civil Litigation in Roman Corinth.

B. Winter has collected the evidence (literary and nonliterary) for the protocols of forensic litigation regarding civil disputes.

(1) At best, civil lawsuits were generally contests between social equals among the powerful and influential of the city. It was not uncommon, however, for the plaintiff to use position and influence against the inferior. "Litigation caused personal enmity and litigation was used to aggravate personal enmity. The proceedings were not conducted dispassionately by the parties but with great acrimony" (Winter, 566). In fact enmity itself was seen as sufficient cause to litigate, and manuals for rhetorical* training elucidated the most effective means of vituperatio—how to attack the character of the opponent!

(2) The appointed judge, or magistrate (or in some instances a jury), was chosen from among the leading citizens. An honorary magistrate (duovir) would be capable of significant benefaction, and, if assembled, the jury would be comprised of men over the age of twenty-five who were on the census list and held property of more than 7,500 denarii.

(3) The appointed judges and juries were notoriously partial. Hence Paul's invective: these judges are unrighteous. Paul is not merely equating them with the unbelievers in 1 Corinthians 6:6 (although they were non-Christians). He seems rather to imply that at this level, the Corinthian courts were corrupt (cf. the supporting documentation in Winter, 562-64).

(4) Judicial bribery was common and jury service was not without reward (cf. Suetonius Claudius 15.1; Winter, 564-66). According to Cicero, bribery (pecunia) was one of the three forces which frustrated the legal proceedings (Cicero In Defence of Aulius Caecina 15.73).

Winter (following Garnsey) concludes: social status and legal privilege were inextricably connected in the Roman Empire: praetors "undoubtedly acted in the interests of the members of higher orders, to which they themselves belonged" (Garnsey, 4). Cicero comments that security and power constitute advantage. "Security is a reasoned and unbroken maintenance of safety. Power [potentia] is the possession of resource sufficient for preserving one's self and weakening others" (Cicero De Inventione 2.56.169). Moreover, the catalog of virtues which tended to favor the powerful included: public office, money, connections by marriage, high births, friends, country, power and all other things pertaining to this class (Cicero De Inventione 2.59.177).

2.1. Paul's Response to Litigation at Corinth. In light of these observations, Paul's stringent response seems intelligible. Enmity was no stranger to Corinth (cf. 1 Cor 1—4). Civil litigation augmented the existing problems, and the corollary—the award of financial damages—was interpreted by Paul as defrauding brothers and sisters (1 Cor 6:7-8).

Paul's demand that the wise (sophos, 1 Cor 6:5; cf. 1 Cor 1:20, 26; 3:18) present themselves as arbiters is biting criticism at best (Fee, 237). Such lawsuits (krimata) are self-defeating, and Paul condemns the Corinthians' behavior. Even if certain Corinthians were capable of plying their skills in civil suits between Christians, Paul does not advocate this practice. Rather, it would be better to suffer, "even to be defrauded" (1 Cor 6:7).

2.2 1 Corinthians 6: A Contextual Reading.

Paul denies the Corinthians' insistence on a public exposure of their disputes. This pericope is really an attempt to set this right:

> Paradoxically, on the one hand, the Corinthian church had judged the outsider when they had no right to do so, 5:12, but failed dismally to judge the insider when they should have done so, 5:13. On the other hand, they had allowed the unrighteous outsiders to judge the insiders, 6:1, when they should have resorted to the use of a fellow Christian who, by reason of his legal training, would have had the requisite qualifications to act as a private arbitrator. (Winter, 572)

1 Corinthians 6:1-8 is a scathing criticism of the Corinthians' inability to understand the offense committed. Parading power was a parody of the gospel and must be abjured by Christians.

See also CIVIL AUTHORITY; CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; LEGAL SYSTEM, ROMAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); R. H.

Fuller, "First Corinthians 6:1-11—An Exegetical Paper," Ex Auditu 2 (1986) 96-104; P. Garnsey, Social Status and Legal Privilege in the Roman Empire (Oxford: Clarendon, 1970); B. W. Winter, "Civil Litigation in Secular Corinth and the Church: The Forensic Background to 1 Corinthians 6:1-8," NTS 37 (1991) 559-72; idem, "The Public Honouring of Christian Benefactors: Romans 13.3-4 and 1 Peter 2.14-15," JSNT 34 (1988) 87-103; N. T. Wright, "The New Testament and the 'State,' " Themelios 16 (1990) 11-17; W. C. van Unnik, "Lob und Strafe durch die Obrigkeit. Hellenistisches zu Röm. 13.3-4," in Jesus und Paulus, Festschrift für Werner Georg Kümmel zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. E. E. Ellis and E. Grasser (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975) 334-43.

B. B. Blue

LEGAL SYSTEM, ROMAN

Roman law in the first century A.D. was surprisingly simple and easy to understand by comparison with our own legal system. Its origins, like many ancient legal systems, was based on specific laws of retaliation for private and public wrongs. These were collected in the Twelve Tables (c. 449 B.C.), known to us only from numerous fragments. As the Roman state expanded and life became more complicated in late Republican times and the early Empire, the laws of the Twelve Tables were expanded by recourse to legislation enacted by the senate (senatus consulta), the replies (rescripta) of the emperors* to requests for advice, their edicts (mandata), and precedents that developed out of the decisions of magistrates at every level. These were codified and circulated as reference works in the first three centuries of the Empire by the famous jurists: Scaevola, Celsus, Gaius, Salvius Julianus, Paulus and Ulpian.

1. The Legal System in Rome
2. The Legal System in the Provinces
3. Paul's Encounters with Roman Law

1. The Legal System in Rome.

In order to understand the apostle* Paul's encounters with the law one must gain a clear picture of provincial administration. However, it is not possible to comprehend provincial legal administration without recourse to Roman law in general. Decisions at law were delegated to the office of praetor (magistrate) as early as the second century B.C. Most basic to Roman law was the concept that cases would be heard by an individual, usually a praetor, who would render a decision binding on both parties. For lesser offenses the praetor might appoint magistrates of lower rank who would hear cases as an extension of the prerogative of the praetor.

In time there developed the ordo iudicorum publicorum ("the body of public legal opinions"). This consisted of laws dealing with major offenses against persons, society and the government. By late Republican times, if the offense was grievous enough in the opinion of the praetor, the case would be assigned to a jury under the jurisdiction of the praetor. These juries became permanent criminal courts, quaestiones, that developed out of special inquiries made by the senate and the senior magistrates. By the time of the Augustan principate, however, they had regular jurisdiction over more serious crimes. The jurors, thirty in number, were drawn from senators and knights; but the juries were extensions of the authority of the praetor himself. There was no jury system separate from the authority of the magistrates. In fact, juries were all but eliminated by the first half of the third century A.D. The provincial legal system placed the same priority on the jurisdiction of the individual magistrate as that of the individual magistrates in Rome.

All cases, whether heard by a magistrate or a jury, consisted of three parts. First, there was a free formulation of charges and penalties by the magistrate in the presence of both the plaintiff and defendant. Second, there was a formal accusation before the court. Third, this was followed immediately by a hearing before the magistrate and his assistants. In almost all cases when the decision was rendered, it was final. Only persons of wealth and great influence could appeal the decision of the magistrate to the emperor. The decision by the emperor to hear an appeal was not based so much on the interpretation of the law as it was on the prominence and importance of the individual who had access to the emperor, often through the Senate.

2. The Legal System in the Provinces.

In the provinces the senior Roman official, a proconsul in the more settled senatorial provinces, or a procurator in the provinces controlled directly by the emperor, had absolute authority over his realm. In fact provincia meant the area ruled by a particular official rather than a defined geographical area. The governor's authority over provincial subjects, his imperium, was limited only by laws against extortion and extreme cruelty. He usually followed the precedents of Roman law; at other times, particularly for lesser charges, he allowed local law to be the standard. In capital offenses he had the sole authority for local residents. Roman citizens who resided in a province had right of appeal to the emperor, with or without a trial before the governor, if they had sufficient influence to gain a hearing.

Palestine, which in NT times was part of the province of greater Syria, was a special case. Because of the unruly factions present in Palestine, it was placed under the jurisdiction both of the procurator, a Jewish king and the direct military rule of an imperial legate especially positioned in potentially volatile places like Jerusalem (see Political Systems). The legate had imperium ("authority") directly from the emperor, but it is unclear in very serious matters whether the legate was required to defer to the procurator or not. When he did defer to the procurator, the evidence is too scanty to say whether he did so for political or legal reasons. In any event, it should be noted that the book of Acts in particular, and the Pauline letters to a lesser degree, are some of the best sources for Roman legal procedure in the time of the early Empire. To be sure, the allusions to the law in the Acts and the letters are limited and the narrative accounts of the trials are greatly condensed, but there is little in them to prompt questions about the historicity of either of these sources. Contemporary Roman legal documents and literature are as full of difficulties for scholars as are the NT sources (see Sherwin-White, 172-93).

In summary, the provincial governor had absolute authority over all the inhabitants of a particular province. He followed precedents of Roman law, especially in that he, the chief magistrate, rather than a jury, adjudicated the law. He could and often did delegate authority to lesser magistrates, and often in lesser matters of law the municipalities were allowed to retain authority over their subjects at the discretion of the governor. The governor's authority was limited only by laws under which he could be charged with extortion or extreme cruelty. He had absolute authority over Roman citizens in the province he governed, except in capital cases. There was, however, precedent but no binding law that a Roman citizen who resided in a province would be returned to the governor of that province for trial rather than be tried by the local governor.

3. Paul's Encounters with Roman Law.

3.1. Ephesus. Nowhere does the writer of Acts show greater familiarity with Roman provincial administration than he does in regard to the uproar at Ephesus* (19:23—20:1). Paul had connections there with wealthy and powerful friends, the Asiarchs, who were either civil or religious officials of the council of Asia. Their existence in the first century is well documented, although there is some confusion about the precise role they played in government. The authority of the grammateus ("the town clerk") over the informal assembly in the temple is appropriate (Acts 19:35), as is the distinction made in Acts 19:39 between unapproved mob action and an ennomos ekklēsia ("a regular assembly"). There is some dispute about the appropriateness of the technical term tēn Ephesiōn polin neōkoron . . . tēs megalēs Artemidos ("the city of Ephesus, custodian of the great Artemis," Acts 19:35) for the first century, but the evidence suggests that its historical authenticity is a reasonable probability. Finally, the town clerk reminds the crowd that if they have a legitimate complaint they have the right to bring their complaint to the Roman proconsul in the court. He adds that "anything further," whatever that meant, should be settled in the "regular assembly." The intimation of the latter comment is that matters of local religious dispute should be settled by the council; charges of a more serious nature would be heard by the proconsul. This conforms to Roman procedure in all the provinces. The town clerk suggests further that the ones really in danger of an indictment are the mob and its leaders for fomenting an insurrection.

3.2. Thessalonica. At Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-9) the Jews incite a mob against Paul and Silas. Unable to find them, they drag their host, Jason, and other believers of the city before the local authorities. There they accuse them in a vague way of fomenting sedition. "They are all acting contrary to Caesar's decrees, by saying that there is another king, Jesus" (Acts 17:7; see Judge 1971; 1972). It would seem that in this incident the civil authorities have jurisdiction only in the city. They receive a bond, presumably cash, from Jason and his followers, then release them. Next, we are told that the believers sent Paul and Silas out of the city by night. The chronology of the arrest of Jason and the other believers is not clear. This much is: the local magistrates have authority over Jason and other residents of the city. They do not have any jurisdiction over Paul and Silas once they leave the city, unless they can bring a charge of sedition before the Roman proconsul. In this instance the local officials apparently consider the charge to be so vague that the Roman provincial administrator would probably refuse to hear it.

3.3. Berea. At Berea Paul and Silas are more successful in preaching to the Jews, but troublemakers from Thessalonica follow them there and agitate the crowds. Paul and Silas again leave quickly, presumably to escape the local authorities (Acts 17:10-15).

3.4. Athens. At Athens Paul was brought before the local religious authorities at the Areopagus (Acts 17:16-21; see Athens). This was not voluntary. The words, epilabomenoi autou . . . ēgagon ("they seized him and led him," Acts 17:19) are too strong for a voluntary appearance. The only point to be made out of this incident is that Paul soon leaves the city. As is typical in the semiautonomous cities of the East, once he is outside of Athenian jurisdiction, he is safe.

3.5. Corinth. An incident at Corinth (Acts 18:12-17) further defines the matter of jurisdiction. Paul is accused by the Jews before L. Junius Gallio, the proconsul of Achaea, of persuading men to worship God contrary to the law (Acts 18:13). Gallio responded by stating that "if it were a crime or a serious piece of villainy (Can we interpret adikēma and rhadiourgēma [Acts 18:14] as respectively a crime against the state and a private tort?) he would reasonably listen to that. But since it was an inquiry about words and names and Jewish law, he told them to see to it themselves (Acts 18:15). He did not wish to be a judge of these things. Then he had them driven from the bēma (Acts 18:14, 15). Furthermore, Gallio was quite unconcerned when the Jews beat Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue* (and possibly a Christian sympathizer, cf. 1 Cor 1:1), in front of him (Acts 18:17). In this incident it is clear that the proconsul was willing to act only in important criminal and civil matters that concerned Rome, and that local authorities were free by his permission to inflict punishment as they saw fit for lesser offenses.

3.6. Pisidian Antioch, Iconium and Lystra. Earlier incidents in Asia Minor, recorded in Acts, were probably similar to the ones at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens and Corinth. Paul and Barnabas had great success in their ministry at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:14-49) until some Jews incited the religious women and prominent men of the city and instigated persecution against them. Paul and Barnabas simply left the city. No comment is made about any brush with the Roman authorities (Acts 13:50-51).

At Iconium they were more successful in their ministry in the synagogue. However, both Gentiles and "the Jews with their leaders" succeeded in driving them from the city. Then Paul and Barnabas fled to Lystra (Acts 14:6). But Jews from Antioch and Iconium followed them there and convinced the residents of that city to stone Paul and drag him from the city (Acts 14:19). In each instance such confrontation was of no lasting significance from a legal point of view, even though devout women and prominent men of Antioch (Acts 13:50) opposed Paul and Barnabas, and Gentiles cooperated with Jews against them at Iconium (Acts 14:19). We must assume that this was again interpreted by the local magistrates in each city as a conflict between Jews about their own law, because Paul and Barnabas returned immediately afterwards to Lystra and to Iconium, without fear of apprehension by the Roman authorities (Acts 14:21).

3.7. Philippi. Luke relates the arrest, beating and imprisonment of Paul and Silas at Philippi in much greater legal detail than in earlier accounts of their conflicts with the authorities (Acts 16:12-40). Is this to serve as a warning for those who would illegally arrest and imprison Christians who were Roman citizens (cf. Acts 22:24-29)? The nuances of this narrative are noteworthy.

Philippi is properly identified as a Roman colony. Its residents were citizens of Rome. Many of them were veterans of Antony's army who had been stripped of their land in Italy by the victorious Augustus Caesar. Typically such a colony consisted of a mixture of veterans of Italian and of provincial origin as well as local Greeks. (A similar population mix was to be found in Corinth, a city that has been carefully studied.)

In the first century A.D. the chief magistrates of such a city were duoviri legi dicundo ("two magistrates who administrate the law"), whom Luke calls stratēgoi (lit. "generals," here "presidents," Acts 16:20). They had jurisdiction over the lesser crimes of citizens that resulted in fines. Paul and Silas, however, were treated by them not as citizens but as peregrini ("foreigners"); being subjected to arrest, beating and imprisonment without a trial.

It should be noted, however, that the charge brought against the apostles was one that could have resulted in the arrest of a provincial in the first century B.C., but not in the first century A.D. By that time Roman authorities had long ceased to attempt to control foreign cults by forbidding the practice of strange and unfamiliar customs or of proselytizing. Only if their adherents were also involved in sedition or violence would the government move against them to arrest them and specifically charge them with violation of the law. This is apparent from the revision of the charges first made against Paul when he was arrested in Jerusalem. Later, when he was transferred from Jerusalem to Caesarea, Tertullus, the lawyer of the Jews, expanded "the charge over questions about the law" (Acts 23:39) to a charge that corresponded closely to the edict of Claudius (c. A.D. 49-50) by which many Jews were driven from Rome for "stirring up insurrections among all the Jews throughout the inhabited world" (Acts 24:5).

The conclusion of Paul's imprisonment at Philippi (Acts 16:19-40) is a textbook example of the benefits of the status of Roman citizens when they were abroad. The duoviri ("the magistrates") and their police no doubt assumed that Paul and Silas were Jews involved in a controversy with other Jews about their religion. They did not for a moment entertain the idea that Paul was a Roman citizen (see Citizenship), and so they treated him as they would any religious zealot who was causing a civil disturbance. Their concern was the disturbance he had created, not about the existence of the cult or its laws and practices. The duoviri joined with the police in seizing Paul and Silas, disrobing and beating them on the spot and throwing them in prison. But after an overnight stay in jail, with the threat of riot past, they ordered them released from prison. Paul did not claim Roman citizenship until the police came to set them free and offer them safe departure from the city in secret. Only then, when Paul complained about the beating he had received despite his Roman citizenship, did the magistrates become greatly distressed. They were all the more eager to escort him from their city without further trouble (Acts 16:39). The text strongly—if not certainly—suggests that the duoviri themselves came to beg Paul and Silas to leave. The issue was resolved without recourse to the courts, but Paul's status as a Roman citizen was obviously of great importance and concern to the magistrates, to Luke and to Paul himself.

3.8. Jerusalem. The incident at Jerusalem* (Acts 21:27—26:32), one which ultimately led to Paul's hearings and trials in Jerusalem, in Caesarea and in Rome before Caesar, was related to Paul's earlier ministry in Asia Minor. Jews from that region who had come to Jerusalem stirred up the crowds inside the Temple precinct with an accusation that Paul had desecrated the holy place. They had seen Paul in the city with Trophimus the Ephesian, a Gentile,* and assumed that he had brought Trophimus into the Temple area. When the crowd, assuming he had violated the Temple, tried to kill Paul, the Roman garrison nearby heard the disturbance, came running, stopped the beating and took Paul into custody. The commander of the troops, a tribune, ordered Paul bound by two chains and brought to the barracks. Before Paul was taken away, he told the tribune that he was a Jew, a citizen of Tarsus. Asking for permission to address the people, he was granted the opportunity. After Paul had spoken at length, the Jews rioted again. The tribune then ordered Paul to be examined by scourging, a standard practice for the examination of slaves and non-Romans of lowly status. Oddly, Paul did not mention that he was a Roman citizen until they began to stretch him out on a rack. It seems to have been a strategy of his that he did not reveal his status as a Roman citizen until he had been unlawfully treated (cf. Acts 16:37). The centurion in charge of the flogging, upon hearing this, consulted with the tribune, who released Paul but ordered a hearing before the Jews to ascertain the details of their accusations against him. This seems to have been a hearing extra ordinem that would have given the military commander considerable freedom to gather evidence before reaching a verdict. The hearing, however, ended abruptly in a heated argument between the Pharisees and Sadducees (Acts 23:9-10). Paul was returned to the barracks. It is clear from all of this that the Jews, even in their formal council meetings, had only as much jurisdiction in determining Paul's fate on a capital charge as the military commander granted to them. On the other hand, the commander, who had much greater jurisdictional latitude, used it more for political advantage than he did for executing Roman law.

Political influence rather than law was even more decisive in the events that followed. Paul learned from his nephew that there was a plot to kill him the next day en route to a hearing before the tribune and the council of the Jews, information that was then delivered to the tribune (Acts 23:16-22). With an extraordinary show of force—200 soldiers, 70 cavalrymen, 200 spearmen—the tribune, Claudius Lysias, sent Paul to the governor Felix at Caesarea (Acts 23:23-24). In a letter to Felix, Lysias made the point that Paul was guilty of nothing that deserved imprisonment or death. He said that he was accused only on questions regarding Jewish law (Acts 23:26-30). Felix held an initial hearing when Paul arrived, but put off a formal hearing until his accusers should come from Jerusalem. In this initial hearing Felix asked the apostle from what province he was. By custom it was typical for a Roman provincial administrator to return a provincial to his own district, in this instance Cilicia, for trial (Acts 23:33-35). We can only speculate that Felix kept Paul at Caesarea because he saw a rare opportunity to satisfy the Jews, to consult with Paul about his faith and to extort money from him.

About five days later, when the Jews arrived from Jerusalem, it became obvious that they had attempted to strengthen their case. In words reminiscent of Claudius' edict that expelled many Jews from Rome, Tertullus, the lawyer for the Jerusalem Jews, argued that Paul was a troublemaker, one who had stirred up insurrections (staseis) throughout the inhabited world and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes (Acts 24:1-5). He added the further charge that Paul had attempted to desecrate the Temple (Acts 24:6). But while Paul admitted to being a follower of Christ, he refuted all the other charges. In what follows in Acts it is clear that Felix wanted to satisfy everyone. He put the case off until he could consult with Claudius Lysias, the Roman tribune from Jerusalem (Acts 24:22), and gave Paul considerable freedom while he was under house arrest (Acts 24:23). Both Felix and his wife, Drusilla, a Jewess, heard Paul speak about faith in Christ, but ultimately Felix seemed more interested in improving his own lot. Luke tells us that, as a favor to the Jews, Paul was forced to remain a prisoner for about two years. Moreover, Felix consulted with Paul frequently, hoping that Paul would ultimately give him a bribe (Acts 24:24-27).

In the first century A.D. a provincial administrator's power was limited only by the emperor. Hence he had enormous freedom to dispense justice as arbitrarily as he liked, just so long as he did not fall foul of the emperor. But there was one exception to this "unlimited" freedom—the leges repetundarum ("laws against extortion"), the first of which, the Lex Calpurnia of 149 B.C., stipulated that a governor could be as harsh and arbitrary as he liked, but he could not extort property or money from provincials. The law, of course, assumed an abuse of power. Felix seems to have contented himself with a delicate political balancing act. On the one hand, he was eager to hear Paul expound Christianity. On the other, he satisfied the Jews by keeping Paul a prisoner while trying to extort money from him without being obvious about it.

When Festus replaced Felix as governor, much the same situation prevailed. He seemed eager to resolve the standoff that had existed for two years until he too held a hearing first in Jerusalem and then in Caesarea (Acts 25:1-8). The Jews in attendance asked that a new trial be held in Jerusalem, all the while planning to kill Paul (Acts 25:2). Luke never tells us if Paul knew of the plot, but when he was confronted with the suggestion that he stand trial in Jerusalem, Paul appealed to Caesar (Acts 25:9-11). In the hearing extra ordinem the governor could have freed Paul, since neither he nor King Agrippa at a later hearing could find any crime on which Paul could be convicted (Acts 25:25; 26:31). However, beneath it all is Luke's assertion that Festus, like Felix, was eager to do the Jews a favor (Acts 25:3, 9).

In the end Festus too chose the politically expedient course. He could find no wrong in Paul. In fact, both he and Agrippa, with Agrippa's wife, gave Paul a wide-ranging hearing. Festus satisfied the Jews by sending Paul out of the country to Rome and, by doing so, he protected the apostle from the Jews. Underlying all of Luke's narrative is (1) the Jews' relentless efforts to neutralize the effects of Paul's ministry by putting him to death if necessary; (2) Paul's careful adherence to Roman law; (3) Paul's innocence of charges brought by the Jews; and (4) the moral and legal expediency of the Roman rulers of Judea.

3.9. Rome. The book of Acts ends with the notation that Paul was placed under house arrest in Rome while he was awaiting trial. There he lived in rented quarters with a single soldier as his guard (Acts 28:16, 30; Phil 1:13-17). He would have been under the jurisdiction of the praetorian guard while he awaited trial. He could have been heard by the emperor himself or a high official delegated by the emperor to act on his behalf. There is no indication that Paul ever appeared in court at Rome. More than likely he was released, as were many others during the reign of Claudius and the early years of Nero's rule, as a show of clemency at a time when there was a large backlog of appeals to the emperor. It is much less likely that his case was dismissed on the grounds that his accusers did not appear. Roman law was heavily biased in favor of a trial. The weight of the law fell on accusers to appear in court. Cases were not often dismissed because of the absence of one's accusers.

We can only speculate regarding Acts' ending without stating the outcome of Paul's appeal to Caesar. Certainly Luke had made the point that the early Christians scrupulously adhered to Roman law in the face of relentless Jewish legal persecution and Roman political vacillation in the complicated region of Judea.

See also ATHENS, PAUL AT; CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY; CIVIL AUTHORITY; EMPERORS, ROMAN; LAWSUIT; POLITICAL SYSTEMS; PRISON, PRISONER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Abbot and A. C. Johnston, Municipal Administration in the Roman Empire (Princeton: University Press, 1926); A. Berger, "Law and Procedure, Roman," in Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. M. Cary et al. (Cambridge: University Press, 1949) 484-91; H. Conzelmann, Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia, Fortress, 1987); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (WUNT 49; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989); E. A. Judge, "Decrees of Caesar at Thessalonica: Acts 17:5-7," RTR 30 (1971) 1-7; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament (Oxford: University Press, 1963).

A. A. Rupprecht

LEGALISM.

See LAW; WORKS OF THE LAW.

LETTERS, LETTER FORMS

The Greek word epistolē ("epistle," "letter") originally referred to an oral communication sent by a messenger. The term letters was a broad designation for different types of documents in the ancient world, and could include a great variety of commercial, governmental and legal documents, as well as political and military reports, along with other sorts of correspondence, especially of a personal kind. Paul adapted the Greco-Roman letter models for Christian purposes. His letters, which have fascinated people for generations, were usually constructed along lines similar to that of Hellenistic letters. But the apostle,* who had a sense of freedom in literary matters, was not tied to fixed models, and he often combined non-Jewish Hellenistic customs with Hellenistic Jewish ones.

1. Private Personal Letters?
2. The Form of the Pauline Letters
3. The Use of Other Literary Traditions

1. Private Personal Letters?

Since Deissmann's distinction between "letters" (which were understood as natural, daily and situational) and "epistles" (which were understood as mechanical, artistic and literary), there has been considerable scholarly discussion as to whether Paul's letters should be regarded as "private personal letters" or not. They were certainly private as opposed to literary essays, which adopted an epistolary form but were written for an unspecified, universal audience, and official letters, which were not written in the context of a personal relationship. Galatians,* for example, is a highly personal letter written to a specific group of people in an immediate relationship with Paul. However inclusive is the address, "the churches of Galatia," this letter was sent to a relatively minor group in the Greco-Roman world (Hansen).

But Paul's letters were "more than private." He wrote self-consciously as an apostle, that is, as a representative of the risen Christ* (note the emphasis on apostleship in Gal 1:1, 15, 16; 5:2) in order to instruct, give advice, encourage and reprimand (note 1 Thess 5:27 and 2 Thess 3:14-15 regarding the impact on the church at Thessalonica*). Most of Paul's letters were addressed to communities of Christian believers and were intended for public use within the congregations. They were occasional, contextual writings addressing particular situations (though note Ephesians), and were the substitutes for Paul's personal presence (see Itineraries). He was concerned with the life situation of his readers, but never in the impersonal way characteristic of many Hellenistic letters. Paul treated each situation as unique and important. At the same time his letters set forth significant theological teaching and express a Christian understanding of life which reaches beyond the particular historical situation.

2. The Form of the Pauline Letters.

Many ancient letters, which were written by professional scribes, were highly stylized with each part basically determined by convention, regardless of the occasion. The general model of the Hellenistic letter included an opening, a body and a closing. The basic Pauline letter form, in which there was a normal progression rather than any stereotyped or mechanical framework, contained the following elements:

2.1. Opening. Paul's letters, which follow the usual Hellenistic letter openings of "A to B, greetings," regularly contain expansions of this basic pattern (e.g., Rom 1:1-7; Gal 1:1-5; 1 Thess 1:1; Tit 1:1-4), and these often point to the specific purposes of the letters. The identification of the writer (with coworkers often named) and addressees is followed by expanded descriptions of both in terms of their standing in relation to God in Christ. Paul usually identifies himself with epithets such as "apostle" and "servant,"* while the addressees are called "saints," "beloved" or "the church* of God which is at. . . ." The usual Hellenistic greeting, chairein ("greeting"), is replaced by charis kai eirēnē ("grace and peace"). This benediction* is both an affirmation regarding the grace* and peace* of God* in which they already participate, and a prayer* that they may appreciate and experience these blessings more fully.

2.2. Introductory Thanksgiving or Blessing. On occasion the more intimate letters of the Hellenistic period began with a thanksgiving to the gods for personal benefits received. Paul adopted this Hellenistic epistolary model, frequently using it at the beginning of his letters as he expressed his gratitude to God, the Father of Jesus Christ, for what God had effected in the lives of these predominantly Gentile* readers (e.g., 1 Cor 1:4; Phil 1:3; Col 1:3; 1 Thess 1:2; 2 Thess 1:3; Philem 4). But the apostle was no slavish imitator of this epistolary convention, since his structures were highly developed and sophisticated.

Two basic types of structure occurred in Paul's thanksgiving paragraphs (see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology, Thanksgiving). The first, which contained up to seven basic elements, began with the verb of thanksgiving and concluded with a hina-clause (or its equivalent) which spelled out the content of the apostle's intercession for the readers (Phil 1:3-11; Col 1:3-14; 1 Thess 1:2—3:13; 2 Thess 1:2-12; 2:13-14; Philem 4-7; cf. Eph 1:15-19). The second was simpler in form. It also commenced with the giving of thanks to God and concluded with a hoti-clause which noted the reason for this expression of gratitude (1 Cor 1:4-9; cf. Rom 1:8-10).

While the structure of the Pauline thanksgiving periods was Hellenistic, the contents (apart from their specifically Christian elements) showed the influence of the OT and Jewish thought. These paragraphs, which open with a statement of thanksgiving to God, have an epistolary function, that is, they introduce and present the main themes of their letters, usually setting the tone and atmosphere. Many have a didactic function so that either by fresh teaching or recall to instruction previously given the apostle sets forth theological matters he considers important (see esp. Col 1:9-14). An exhortatory purpose is also present in several of these passages (e.g., Phil 1:9-11). Further, the thanksgivings and petitions which are included give evidence of the apostle's deep pastoral and apostolic concern for the readers. At the same time Paul reports his actual thanksgivings and actual petitions for the readers (see Prayer).

Using a typically OT and Jewish prayer form denoting praise (cf. the doxological conclusions to the books of the Psalter: Ps 41:13; 72:19-20, etc.), Paul introduces two of his letters (2 Cor 1:3-4; Eph 1:3-14; cf. 1 Pet 1:3-5) with an introductory blessing or eulogy (eulogētos, "blessed"). While his introductory thanksgivings focus on God's work in the lives of others, his eulogies praise God for blessings in which he himself participates. The formula with a Jewish background was apparently more apt when he himself came within the circle of blessing.

2.3. Body. The bodies of Paul's letters show considerable variety, for it is here more than anywhere else that they reflect the different epistolary situations. Apparently, the apostle was more inclined to strike out on his own within the bodies of his letters and to be least bound by epistolary structures. There has been some difficulty in determining where the body section begins and ends (for example, in 1 and 2 Thess the body seems to have assimilated entirely to the thanksgiving). However, several possible openings have been identified through the parakaleō sentences ("I urge you my brothers," 1 Cor 1:10; 1 Thess 4:1; cf. Rom 12:1; 15:30), the disclosure formula ("I/we want you to know," Rom 1:13; Gal 1:11; Phil 1:12), the joy* expression (Philem 7), the expression of astonishment (Gal 1:6) or statement of compliance (Gal 1:8-9), while the close of the body was occasionally signalled by eschatological* conclusions (Rom 11:25-36; 1 Thess 3:11-13) or the travelog (see 2.4 below; see Itineraries).

The clustering of various epistolary formulas at certain strategic points signals significant breaks or turning points in the letter (Mullins). A distinct transition from a more didactic section to a lengthy section of paraenesis is occasionally signalled by a closing doxology and one of the transitional formulas (e.g., Rom 11:36—12:1; Eph 3:21—4:1; 1 Thess 3:11—4:1). Paraenetic or exhortatory materials were by and large traditional materials (they included "household tables": cf. Col 3:18—4:1; Eph 5:22—6:9), deriving from the OT and Jewish literature as well as from Hellenistic moral traditions (cf. Phil 4:8-9; see Households and Household Codes).

Another typical feature of the bodies of Paul's letters is the "apostolic parousia (i.e., presence)," in which the apostle speaks of his travel plans, including his intention to be with his readers, and of his past and future contacts with them through his coworkers (1 Cor 4:17-21; 16:5-12; Phil 2:19-30; 1 Thess 2:17—3:11; Philem 22). Because he was unable to be with his readers, Paul's letters were a direct substitute for his personal presence, and were "to be accorded weight equal to [his] physical presence" (Doty).

Epistolary topoi, that is, themes and constituent motifs of ancient letters, appear also in Paul's letters. These include the themes of letter writing (Rom 15:14; 1 Cor 4:14), health (2 Cor 1:8-11; Phil 2:25-30), domestic events (1 Cor 5:1—6:11; Phil 4:2-4) and reunion with the addressees (Rom 15:14-33; 1 Thess 2:17—3:13).

2.4. Closing. Paul used the typical closing greetings of Hellenistic letters in order to link the congregations with his own traveling ministry (cf. Rom 16:3-16, 21-23; 2 Cor 13:12-13; Col 4:10-17). However, he did not include the customary health wish or Greek word of farewell. Instead, a benediction (1 Cor 16:23; Gal 6:16, 18; Eph 6:23-24; 2 Thess 3:16, 18) or doxology (Rom 16:25-27; Phil 4:20; cf. Heb 13:20-21) served the same function. The final benediction, which brings the letter to a definitive conclusion, often gives expression to Paul's strong desire (e.g., that the grace of the Lord Jesus may be with them, 1 Cor 16:24) and strikes a note of confidence.

Other closing conventions Paul used include references to his writing a phrase or two in his own hand (1 Cor 16:21; Gal 6:11; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17), his use of a secretary (Tertius, Rom 16:22; cf. Richards), and a holy kiss (e.g., Rom 16:16).

3. The Use of Other Literary Traditions.

Paul's letters exhibit not only a broad stylistic range; they also employ a variety of other literary traditions, including the contemporary rhetorical* forms and modes of persuasion, chiastic structures, diatribe* style, midrashic exegetical methods where appeal is made to the authority of the OT, as well as early traditional hymnic* material and confessional formulas. Paul appears not to have been bound to any one stylistic convention, whether epistolary, sermonic or oratorical. The letter form which developed in the Pauline letters was richer than either the brief private letters or the more developed letter essays of Hellenism. We note briefly the following:

3.1. Liturgical Forms. The apostle's letters were intended to be read aloud to the congregations to whom they were addressed (1 Thess 5:27; Col 4:16). Perhaps this intended setting accounts for the inclusion of liturgical formulas in Christian letters. Recent scholarship suggests that the following belong to this category: (1) "grace"* benedictions, (2) blessings (Rom 1:25; 9:5), (3) doxologies (Rom 11:36; Gal 1:5), (4) hymns* (cf. Col 3:16) and (5) confessions and acclamations (Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 12:3; see Liturgical Elements).

3.2. Greco-Roman Rhetoric. Paul specifies his primary, apostolic task as the preaching of the gospel (Gal 1:16). When he writes his letters, he does so as a preacher of the gospel. His letters, though real, are nevertheless similar in many ways to oral speech. Accordingly, any epistolary analysis must be supplemented with a rhetorical analysis of his argumentation (see Rhetoric; Rhetorical Criticism). The persuasive modes of the classical rhetorical handbooks were well known during Paul's day, and one did not have to be formally trained in rhetoric to use them. Each type of speech could consist of four elements: (1) exordium (introduction), (2) narratio (statement of facts), (3) probatio (argument) and (4) peroratio (conclusion). The introduction and conclusion were intended to influence the audience by securing their interest and goodwill, and conclude by recapitulating the arguments and making an appeal. The body of the speech sought to establish the case. Most of the early Christian letters were written with a basically deliberative purpose. Apart from the opening and closing epistolary formulas, Paul's letters consist of three elements: in the first, which is conciliatory, he commends his readers for their past performance. The middle segment consists of advice, while the final section contains paraenesis (Aune).

Longenecker claims that in Galatians (as elsewhere in his letters) "Paul seems to have availed himself almost unconsciously of the rhetorical forms at hand, fitting them into his inherited epistolary structures and filling them out with such Jewish theological motifs and exegetical methods as would be particularly significant in countering what the Judaizers were telling his converts" (Longenecker, cxix).

See also BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING; DIATRIBE; HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; RHETORIC; TEACHING/PARAENESIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (LEC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); G. J. Bahr, "The Subscriptions in the Pauline Letters," JBL 87 (1968) 27-41; C. J. Bjerkelund, Parakalô. Form, Funktion und Sinn der parakalô-Sätze in den paulinischen Briefen (Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1967); A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (2d ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton); W. G. Doty, Letters in Primitive Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); R. W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God (New York: Harper and Row, 1966) 250-74; idem, "The Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance," in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, ed. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr (Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 249-68; G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians: Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts (JSNT 29; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); R. N. Longenecker, Galatians (WBC 41; Dallas: Word, 1990); T. Y. Mullins, "Formulas in New Testament Epistles," JBL 91 (1972) 380-90; idem, "Topos as a New Testament Form," JBL 99 (1980) 541-47; P. T. O'Brien, Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul (NovTSup 49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); E. R. Richards, The Secretary in the Letters of Paul (WUNT 2.42; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); J. T. Sanders, "The Transition from Opening Epistolary Thanksgiving to Body in the Pauline Corpus," JBL 81 (1962) 348-62; S. K. Stowers, Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (LEC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); J. L. White, "Introductory Formulae in the Body of the Pauline Letter," JBL 90 (1971) 91-97; idem, Light from Ancient Letters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, The Form and Function of the Body of the Greek Letter (SBLDS 2; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1972).

P. T. O'Brien

LIBERATION. See FREEDOM/LIBERTY.

LIBERTY. See FREEDOM/LIBERTY.

LIFE AND DEATH

Paul uses the terms life and death in diverse contexts and with more than one referent. But broadly speaking, he sees life and death as opposed to one another, with life the gift from God and death the penalty of sin. Believers pass from the realm of death to life by dying with Christ.

1. Life
2. The Reign of Death
3. Death to Sin
4. Mortality and Corruption
5. Summary

1. Life.

Occasionally Paul clearly uses zōē, "life," and related forms to refer to present, earthly existence (Rom 5:10; 7:1-2, 9; 8:12-13; 1 Cor 3:22; 7:39; 15:19, 45; Phil 1:20, 22; 1 Thess 4:15, 17; 1 Tim 5:6; 2 Tim 4:1). Bios, "daily life," or "material existence," occurs twice, and then only in the Pastorals (1 Tim 2:2; 2 Tim 2:4). More frequently zōē is used in Paul to mean something other than mere physical existence; it refers to a unique quality of life which comes through faith* in and union with Christ* (see In Christ). Nine times it is combined with aiōnios to mean "eternal life," a life qualitatively different from life as it is presently known, a life bestowed by God* as part of the age to come (Rom 2:7; 5:21; 6:22, 23; Gal 6:8; 1 Tim 1:16; 6:12; Tit 1:2; 3:7; see Eschatology). "Eternal life" or "life" (2 Tim 1:10) can also be used as a synonym for "immortality" (aphtharsia, Rom 2:7; cf. 1 Tim 1:16, 17) or an antonym for "corruption," or "decay" (phthora, Gal 6:8).

Psychē can be employed in a variety of senses which are often difficult to distinguish from one another (see Psychology). Paul uses it in referring to physical existence (e.g., Rom 11:3; 16:4; 1 Cor 15:45; Phil 2:30), although in Philippians 2:30 it may mean more than physical life: Epaphroditus risked his "very being." Pneuma can also refer to physical life (as it clearly does in Rev 11:11; 13:15), but Paul does not seem to use it in this way (but cf. pneuma and sarx in 2 Cor 2:13 and 7:5, where the words seem to refer to inner and outer aspects of the whole person). Nevertheless, the new spiritual life is life by and in the Spirit* of God (Rom 7:6; 8:3-13; 1 Cor 15:45; 2 Cor 3:6; Gal 5:16, 25; 6:8; Phil 1:27).

2. The Reign of Death.

"Death," thanatos (and its related verbs apothnēskō, "die"; thanatoō, "kill," "execute"; apokteinō, "kill,"; anaireō, "kill," "do away with"), may refer to the cessation of earthly, physical, human life (but cf. Eph 2:16). More often it designates the spiritual-physical condition of humanity "in Adam," which came initially through the sin of Adam* (Rom 5:12-21; 1 Cor 15:21-22). "Death," "flesh"* and "sin"* can be used by Paul in close relationship, particularly in Romans 5—7, where they operate in Paul's narrative of life in Adam and life in Christ, as personified powers. Death and sin operate together, with death coming through sin (Rom 5:12) and exercising its universal dominion (Rom 5:12, 17) from Adam to Moses* (Rom 5:14). With the coming of the Law,* sin increased (Rom 5:20), sprang to life (Rom 7:5) and exercised its dominion in death (Rom 5:21). Humanity became enslaved to sin and to death (Rom 6:6, 9, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20), with the two powers operating in alliance (see Beker, 213-34, who interprets them as an alliance of apocalyptic* powers; cf. de Boer). Paul does not speak of eternal separation from God and final punishment as "death" as clearly as does Revelation 21:8 (the "second death"), but he appears to have this in mind when referring to death as the ultimate wages of sin (Rom 6:23). In Ephesians 2:1, 5 and Colossians 2:13 Paul refers to believers as formerly "dead" in sinful humanity's utter helplessness and need of God's gracious initiative (Eph 2:8) in salvation by which he made them alive with Christ (syzōopoieō, Eph 2:5; Col 2:13).

Death is the "last enemy*" (1 Cor 15:26), which at the consummation will be "swallowed up" in Christ's final victory (1 Cor 15:55-57; but cf. 2 Tim 1:10; see Triumph). Here again the personification of death is evident, with Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:25-26 listing death as one of the enemies of Psalm 110:1, and in 1 Corinthians 15:54-55 taunting the power of death (cf. Is 25:7; Hos 13:14), which in the OT is sometimes characterized as a cosmic power. The reign of death exceeds humankind and encompasses the cosmos, which longs for its freedom* from bondage to decay (Beker, 221; de Boer).

3. Death to Sin.

Paul also uses the concept of death in yet another way. To be freed from domination by the "old nature" and from the dominion of death, one must die to sin (see New Nature and Old Nature). This is possible through the death* of Christ, in which believers participate (Rom 6:8-10; see Dying and Rising with Christ). At the same time Paul calls for conscious action, to "reckon" or "consider" oneself "dead to sin" and "alive to God" (Rom 6:11), to "yield yourself to God" as those freed from death (Rom 6:13) so that the new life in Christ may have its full effect (Rom 8:1-17).

4. Mortality and Corruption.

Natural life, subject to both physical and spiritual death, is "mortal" (thnētos). The presence of death also produces a corrupting, rotting effect. The word "corruptible" (diaphthora) is associated with Paul's thought only in Acts 13:34-37 (which has been influenced by the LXX of Ps 16:10) to refer either to the decomposition of the physical body in the grave, or possibly to the permanent abandonment of the individual to the realm of the dead (še'ôl). Paul employs phthartos and diaphtheirō in ways that may be translated with such English words as "destroy," "corrupt," "ruin," "deprave," "lead astray" or "waste away." The latter is frequently used to translate diaphtheirō in 2 Corinthians 4:16: "even though our outer nature is wasting away" (RSV, NIV, NRSV; cf. "perish" KJV; "decaying" NASB). Here diaphtheirō refers to the progressively destructive force at work in our "outer nature," presumably the physical body, although it possibly refers to the whole sinful nature. The present depraved condition, or the Christian's "former way of life," is corrupt (phtheirō, Eph 4:22) and depraved (diaphtheirō, 1 Tim 6:5). Even the believer is subject to the corrupting influence of bad company (1 Cor 15:33), unfaithful messengers (2 Cor 7:2) or evil thoughts (2 Cor 11:3).

Paul speaks of life, death, decay and mortality in most of his letters, but four passages are of special importance. Romans 5:12—8:39 focuses on the entrance of sin and death through Adam and the gracious gift of life in a new and superabundant sense coming through Christ by the Spirit. This same theme is sounded in 1 Corinthians 15:12-57 where the defeat of death and the availability of life are linked to the resurrection* of Christ.

2 Corinthians 5:1-10 introduces the comparison of "the present earthly tent" (the physical body), which will be "demolished," or "dismantled," with the "building from God . . . eternal in the heavens." Here Paul also likens the present state to being "unclothed" and the future with being "clothed." This occurs "in order that the mortal may be swallowed up by life" (2 Cor 5:4). 2 Corinthians 5:6 contains the important statement, "while we are at home in the body, we are away from the Lord." When read with Paul's personal testimony in Philippians 1:20-24, it appears that Paul is here affirming that at death believers pass immediately into the presence of the Lord. On the other hand, he may only be making a general statement about his postdeath expectation without implying an exact chronological sequence (see Immortality; Resurrection).

5. Summary.

Paul asserts that humans were created as "living beings" in the fullest sense of the word, but all "died" in the sin of Adam. This "death" is both spiritual and physical, with temporal and nontemporal aspects. Spiritual death began immediately with the entrance of sin into the race and is not bound to time. With it comes separation from God. Death dominates the physical life in the present (Rom 5:14), renders humans helpless (Eph 2:1), and eventuates in the physical and spiritual destruction of the individual.

Spiritual life is available to humans through faith in the saving act of God by the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is synonymous with righteousness through Christ (Rom 1:17; 5:17-18; cf. Gal 3:11), who is the source, meaning, reality and goal of spiritual life in both the present and future. Spiritual life is characterized by fellowship and union with God in Christ and is unaffected by physical death. In fact, for the believer physical death makes possible a closer union with Christ and so a "more real" life. This new life involves "death" to the old nature and a completely new lifestyle springing from the life of the Spirit within. Thus in describing his own understanding of both life and death, Paul says living is, or means, Christ; dying is gain (Phil 1:21).

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; BODY; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; DEATH OF CHRIST; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; ENEMY, ENMITY, HATRED; FLESH; IMMORTALITY; INTERMEDIATE STATE; LAW; RESURRECTION; SIN, GUILT; TRIUMPH; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); W. Bieder, "θάνατος, ἀποθνήσκω," EDNT 2.129-33; M. D. de Boer, The Defeat of Death (JSNTSup 22; Sheffield: JSOT, 1988); R. Bultmann and G. Bertram, "ζάω κτλ," TDNT II.832-75; R. Bultmann, "θάνατος κτλ," TDNT III.7-25; J. A. Burns, "The Mythology of Death in the Old Testament," SJT 26 (1973) 327-40; R. Cassidy, "Paul's Attitude to Death in II Cor 5:1-10," EvQ 43 (1971) 210-17; J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul, and Life Everlasting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989) 147-72; J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (2 vols.; WBC 38; Waco: Word, 1988) 242-513; G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 737-807; A. Feuillet, "La règne de la mort et la règne de la vie (Rom. V,12-21)," RB 77 (1970) 481-521; G. Harder, "φθείρω κτλ," TDNT IX.93-106; G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); R. Martin-Achard, From Death to Life (London: Oliver & Boyd, 1960); L. Morris, The Wages of Sin (London: Tyndale, 1955); L. Schottroff, "ζῶ, ζωή," EDNT 2.105-9; D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St Paul (Oxford: Blackwell, 1964). J. J. Scott, Jr.

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

Paul occasionally uses the universal symbols of light and darkness in a manner in keeping with his Jewish heritage. Light originates and is associated with God,* while darkness is associated with the enemy,* Satan.* The world is in darkness until the light of the gospel breaks in and those "in Christ"* are transformed from children of darkness to children of light and live in the "day" rather than the "night."

1. The Symbols of Light and Darkness
2. God's Light and the World's Darkness
3. The Gospel As Light Penetrating Darkness
4. The Children of Light and of Darkness
5. Immortality and Light

1. The Symbols of Light and Darkness.

The primary use in Paul of light (phōs) and dark(ness)

(skotia) is in the figurative sense. The terms are employed as symbols of the opposing principles of good and evil, a pattern of religious usage which goes back to the earliest times. This figurative use undoubtedly developed out of a reflection on the phenomenological differences between day and night and the revealing nature of the day/light compared to the hidden and terror-inducing nature of night/darkness.

The literal use of night and day is present in several places in Paul as a temporal reference (e.g., 1 Thess 2:9; 3:10; 2 Cor 11:25; cf. 1 Tim 5:5; 2 Tim 1:4). The order of night preceding day is typical of the Semitic pattern of reckoning the passing of time. This order, however, is not always maintained in the Bible, as is evident in some of the Psalms (e.g., Ps 32:4; 42:3; 55:10; etc.) and the Prophets (e.g., Is 28:19; 60:11; Jer 9:1; 33:20; etc.).

Night and darkness are regarded by biblical writers, including Paul, as the context wherein practices occur which do not represent true godly living. Drunkenness and spiritual sleepiness or insensitivity are associated by Paul with night and darkness (1 Thess 5:7; cf. Eph 5:14 as a baptismal chant to mark the transition to Christ's light; see Worship).

2. God's Light and the World's Darkness.

The metaphorical use of light and darkness in the Bible, as Paul affirms, has its foundation in the creation* account with God's ordering of light into the realm of darkness and void (2 Cor 4:6; cf. Gen 1:2-5). Together with other biblical writers, as at Qumran,* where the phrase "children of light" served as a self-designation of the sect against their enemies, "sons of darkness" (cf. 1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 24-25), so Paul's view of the human dilemma in sin* and judgment* is likened to a state of darkness (e.g., Rom 1:21; cf. Ps 107:10-14; Deut 28:29; Mt 22:13; Jn 3:19). Satan, the enemy of God, is portrayed as a pretender to light, but in actuality he is a minister of darkness (2 Cor 11:14). In Colossians and Ephesians evil is pictured in terms of a forceful realm of dark powers (Eph 6:12) from which those in bondage need deliverance (Col 1:13; see Principalities and Powers).

3. The Gospel As Light Penetrating Darkness.

The creation model of light shining into darkness was adopted by Paul and the early Christians from the OT message of hope* (e.g., Is 9:2; 60:1-3; Ps 18:28; 112:4) and served as a model for the proclamation of the gospel* to a world bound by sin (2 Cor 4:4-6; cf. Mt 4:16; Jn 1:5, 9). Not only is the model of the light penetrating the darkness employed by Paul as a symbol of the power of the gospel in Christ, but it is also used by him as a symbol of hope in the coming of the Lord* and the revealing of the dark and hidden purposes of human hearts (1 Cor 4:5). This use of shining light contrasts greatly with gnostic* ideas (see Gospel of Truth) and especially with the later Manichean views, where the shining light of goodness results in the capture of light particles and provides one of the gnostic explanations for the human dilemma (see Jonas, Borchert).

4. The Children of Light and of Darkness.

Those who have experienced the inbreaking of the gospel in their lives are called by Paul "children/sons" (huioi) of light and day. They are no longer to be categorized in the terms of night and darkness (1 Thess 5:5). Accordingly, they are instructed by Paul to live in anticipation of the end time as the motivation for life; not as those who sleep, as in a moral stupor, but as those who are awake (Rom 13:11; 1 Thess 5:2-6). They are expected to put away the "works" of darkness and take on the protective "armor [hopla] of light" (Rom 13:12). This armor in Paul's parallel passage is identified as the breastplate of faith and love and as the helmet linked to the hope of salvation* (1 Thess 5:8; see Triumph).

In Ephesians the entire argument concerning the transformed life is expanded as readers are summoned to wake up (Eph 5:14), and to walk as children of light (Eph 5:8), bearing the fruit of light (understood as goodness, righteousness and truth), which is contrasted with the unfruitful works of darkness (Eph 5:7-11) and disobedience (Eph 5:6). These dark works may seem to be hidden now but the light of Christ exposes their dead nature and makes the character of human action visible (Eph 5:12-14). Moreover, after an explication of the reciprocal nature of the Christian household* codes in contrast to the authoritarian codes of the Hellenistic world (Eph 5:21—6:9), the discussion is climaxed with an expanded statement of the armor necessary for the Christian in the war against the dark powers at work in the world (Eph 6:10-17). This section then concludes with a call to be awake and ready for the battle and for the proclamation of the gospel (Eph 6:18-20).

In contrast to the sinful and perverse people of the world, Paul describes Christians as children of God and as "lights [or 'stars,' phōstēres] in the world" (Phil 2:15; see commentaries). There is here no attempt to identify believers with being divine or possessing divine seed as in Gnostic thinking, but in this argument Paul calls Christians to responsible living so that his work among them might be fruitful and not result in futility* (Phil 2:12-18). The argument in Colossians concerning "the inheritance of the saints of light" (unless it refers to the angels* in God's presence: see commentaries) must likewise be understood in the context of salvation or deliverance in Jesus and should not be interpreted in terms of later gnostic thinking involving an awakening to one's destiny.

5. Immortality and Light.

The references to light in the Pastoral letters provide some interesting ideas. God is described in the creedal formula at 1 Timothy 6:16 as alone "having immortality* [and] dwelling in unapproachable [aprositon, used only here in the NT] light." In the creedal formula at 2 Timothy 1:10, Christ Jesus the Savior* is described as having "brought to light [phōtisantos, or "made clear") life and immortality through the gospel." Both of these creedal statements are unique in the Pauline corpus and they offer good examples of the early church's wrestling with the meaning of Jesus in a setting of Greco-Roman aspirations for immortality, both in terms of Christ's relationship to God and his work in salvation.

See also ESCHATOLOGY; IMMORTALITY; QUMRAN AND PAUL; SATAN, DEVIL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Aalen, Die Begriffe "Licht" und "Finsternis" im AT, im Spätjudentum und im Rabbinismus (Oslo: Det Norske Videnskapsakademi, 1951); E. R. Achtemeier, "Jesus Christ, the Light of the World: The Biblical Understanding of Light and Darkness," Int 17 (1963) 439-49; G. L. Borchert, "Insights into the Gnostic Threat," in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, ed. R. N. Longnecker and M. C. Tenney (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1974) 79-93; H. Conzelmann, "σκότος κτλ," TDNT VII.423-45; idem, "φῶς κτλ," TDNT IX.310-58; H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion (Boston: Beacon, 1958); E. Lövestam, Spiritual Wakefulness in the New Testament (Lund: Gleerup, 1963); L. R. Stachowiak, "Die Antithese Licht-Finsternis. Ein Thema der paulinischen Paränese," TQ 143 (1963) 385-421.

G. L. Borchert

LITURGICAL ELEMENTS

Liturgical elements refers to the corporate expressions of praise to God* or Christ* that were developed into fixed forms through constant and repeated usage in the public worship of the early churches. In the Pauline corpus, the most common liturgical elements mentioned are: creedal* confessions, hymns,* doxologies, benedictions* and prayer* acclamations such as "Amen," "Abba, Father" and "Maranatha."

1. Creedal Confessions
2. Hymns
3. Doxologies
4. Benedictions
5. Prayer Acclamations
6. Conclusion

1. Creedal Confessions.

Creeds, in the modern sense, may not have been fully evident in the early church as in later centuries. Fragments of confessional statements (or creedal confessions), however, are present throughout the NT. In the Pauline corpus creedal confessions can be recognized by the presence of an introductory formula such as "so it says" (dio legei, Eph 5:14; cf. Eph 4:8) or an expression such as "I receive" (paralambanō, 1 Cor 15:3; Col 2:6). The central messages of creedal confessions are usually related to the saving work of Christ (e.g., 1 Cor 15:3-5) and his lordship (e.g., Rom 10:9-10; 1 Cor 12:3). The rise of these confessions is most likely due to evangelistic intention (the proclamation of the gospel*); cultic practice (the expression of corporate praises to the triune God); or apologetic assertion (the defense of the gospel under attack). Creedal confessions were usually uttered at public worship* or a baptismal ceremony (see Baptism). As used in Paul, creedal confessions are often found in contexts where he is defending the gospel message or proclaiming the person (see Christology) and work of Christ (1 Cor 15:3-5; cf. 1 Tim 3:16) or where he is exhorting believers to practice proper Christian conduct (1 Cor 11:26; 16:22; see Creed).

2. Hymns.

Singing was a common practice in the corporate worship of the Pauline communities (cf. 1 Cor 14:26; Eph 5:19-20; Col 3:16). While most of the songs were spontaneous expressions of praise to God by different individuals during public worship, some of them were more structured, containing various confessional elements relating Christ's saving work and his lordship, and were recited unitedly. In the Pauline corpus, passages such as Philippians 2:6-11, Colossians 1:15-20, Ephesians 2:14-16, 5:14 and 1 Timothy 3:16 are generally acknowledged as hymnic materials. In origin and usage, hymnic materials and creedal confessions are essentially the same, that is, they were originally devised for evangelistic, cultic, apologetic purposes and carried didactic and hortative functions in their contexts. In style, however, hymnic materials are recognizable by the introductory relative pronoun "who" (hos) being followed by a participle prior to the main verb. They are written in poetic or metrical style (see Hymns).

3. Doxologies.

Doxology is a form of exalted prayer speech directed to the praise of God. It was an essential element in Jewish worship and was adopted by the early churches in their public worship. In the Pauline letters there are two major types of doxologies. One is expressed by the formula "Blessed (be) God" (Rom 1:25; 9:5; 2 Cor 1:3-11; 11:31; Eph 1:3-14), resembling the form of the šᵉmōneh ʿeśrēh (the Eighteen Benedictions). The other is expressed by the phrase "to him be glory for ever" (Rom 11:33-36; 16:25-27; Gal 1:5; Phil 4:20; cf. Eph 3:21; 1 Tim 1:17; 6:16; 2 Tim 4:18), which is less formal in structure but more commonly used. There is no particular or fixed location for the insertion of these doxologies except to note that they are not usually tacked-on elements, but are connected with the context, arising out of the preceding words. And their contents, while following a basic formula, are often expressed differently by the addition of new phrases that help to convey didactic messages directly related to the situation of the readers (2 Cor 1:3-11; cf. Eph 1:3-14; Rom 11:33-36; Gal 1:5; see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology).

4. Benedictions.

Benediction is a form of wish-prayer expressed for the well being of the people for whom the prayer* is offered. In the Pauline corpus each letter is commenced with an introductory benediction, "Grace* to you and peace* from God our Father and Jesus Christ" (see Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; Gal 1:3; Phil 1:2; Philem 3; Eph 1:2), and concludes with a benediction, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you" (see 1 Cor 16:23; Gal 6:18; Phil 4:23; Philem 25; 2 Thess 3:18). The form and location of these benedictions are similar to those used in Jewish worship, but in content Pauline benedictions are distinctly Christian in that additional features such as "grace" and "from our Lord Jesus Christ" are added to the Jewish formula. The content of these benedictions (both the introductory and the concluding) are essentially the same in that they include three basic elements: the wish for blessing, the source of the benefaction and the recipients. But they are not expressed identically in every case. Paul does not simply borrow and insert a stereotyped benediction into each letter; nor does he include benedictions in his letters for the sake of formality. In each letter the introductory or concluding benediction may be written somewhat differently (see 2 Cor 13:13; Gal 6:18; 1 Thess 1:1; Col 1:2).

Besides the introductory and concluding benedictions, Paul at times inserts "wish-prayers" for his readers. These are placed within the content of the letter at places where he wants to express his sincere concern for his readers in relation to problems being addressed. In such cases the "wish-prayers" are always tailored to address the specific needs of his readers (Rom 15:5, 13, 33; 1 Thess 3:11-13; 2 These 1:11-12; 2:16-17; 3:5). Thus Paul's use of liturgical benedictions is not perfunctory (see Benediction).

5. Prayer Acclamations.

In the Pauline corpus there are three non-Greek liturgical acclamations which are usually connected with prayers that are used by Paul for other purposes. These acclamations are "Amen," "Abba, Father" and "Maranatha."

5.1. "Amen." "Amen" (Gk amēn) is a transliteration of the Hebrew word ʾāmēn, which is derived from the root ʾmn, meaning "firmness, certainty." In the OT amen is an expression of affirmation of what has been said, whether in a solemn curse* (Num 5:22; Jer 11:5) or in prayer and praise (1 Chron 16:36; Neh 8:6; Ps 41:13; 106:48). In early Judaism this usage of amen continued (Tob 3:3) and was so firmly established that in time it became a liturgical element in Jewish worship: the congregation responded with an "Amen" at the end of each prayer recited by the leader.

In Paul's letters amen is used in two different ways. The first one is the common usage where it is placed at the end of benedictions (Rom 15:33; 1 Cor 16:24; Gal 6:18; Philem 25), doxologies (Rom 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; 16:27; Gal 1:5; Eph 3:21; Phil 4:20; 1 Tim 1:17; 6:16; 2 Tim 4:18) and prayers of thanksgiving (cf. 1 Cor 14:16) as an affirmation of the prayer or thanksgiving of another person. But Paul does not use amen merely for liturgical purposes. In some instances it is intentionally mentioned to promote the unity of the congregation through their corporate utterance of "Amen" together (cf. Rom 15:33) or to lead the readers into a verbal affirmation of the doctrinal beliefs which they are in danger of abandoning (see Gal 1:3-5). This is indicted by the frequency of references to and the locations of amen in Paul's letters.

The second way of using amen by Paul is found in 2 Corinthians 1:20. In this context (2 Cor 1:15-22) there is no doxology or benediction. Instead, Paul is explaining to the Corinthians his change of traveling plans. In defending his personal integrity in the ministry* of the gospel, Paul refers to God's faithfulness (2 Cor 1:18), which is supported by Christ's faithfulness in fulfilling God's promises (1 Cor 1:19-20). Because Christ is faithful (not "yes" and "no"), God's faithfulness in promising salvation to humanity is fulfilled. The amen in this context is not likely a substitution of "yes" (as Hahn proposes), nor a reference to its semitic meaning "firmness, certainty" (as van Unnik argues). Rather, it is invoked in its liturgical usage

(i.e., expressed at the end of prayers) to underscore the faithfulness of Christ in fulfilling God's promise of salvation* which in turn creates the possibility for believers to utter together "Amen" in their corporate worship to the glory* of God. Accordingly, Paul's argument is: He (Paul) is faithful (or trustworthy) just as God is faithful. God is faithful because his son Jesus Christ is faithful in fulfilling his promises. In this light amen is used in 2 Corinthians 1:20 not only directly to affirm Christ's faithfulness, but also indirectly to support Paul's argument for his own trustworthiness. Here we see an example of Paul's creative use of a liturgical acclamation with its familiar meaning for the strengthening of his argument.

5.2. "Abba, Father." The original meaning of Abba and the original usage of the phrase "Abba, Father" in addressing God have long been discussed among NT scholars. The majority view (following J. Jeremias) considers Abba an Aramaic word ('abbā') used by small children in addressing their fathers. It was adopted by Jesus in all his prayers to God and later on introduced by him to his disciples to indicate an intimate relationship between God and the believers. Although this popular view has been challenged by J. Barr, who argues that Abba is actually an adult's word and was used to address God prior to Jesus' use of the term, its unique usage by Jesus to emphasize a relationship of endearment between God and the believers must not be denied (cf. Jn 5:17-18). In Jesus' usage of Abba there is portrayed a direct, individual, filial relationship with God. The double address formula "Abba, Father" appears three times in the NT (Mk 14:36; Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). This formula most likely originated in the garden of Gethsemane when Jesus, under intense emotional stress, added "Father" to Abba. Evidently, this double address was known among the Palestinian churches and was transmitted to the Gentile churches both in Asia (cf. Gal 4:6) and Italy (cf. Rom 8:15) as a reminiscence of the ipsissima vox Jesu (see Jesus, Sayings of). It was later used as a liturgical acclamation (perhaps the communal recitation of the Lord's Prayer) during public worship and was also applied by individuals in their private prayers.

In Paul's letters the two occurrences of "Abba, Father" are found in contexts where Paul is presenting theological arguments for Christian conduct (Rom 8:1-17) and the gospel (Gal 3:1—4:31). In Romans 8 "Abba, Father" is mentioned as a proof of the Romans' filial relationship with God (see Adoption, Sonship), and on such basis the Romans are obligated to live according to the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). In Galatians 4:6 "Abba, Father" is used to reassure the Galatians of their filial relationship with God even without the observance of the Law* (cf. Gal 3:26; 4:5, 7) which the "troublemakers" among them tried to impose. So in both cases this liturgical address, "Abba, Father," with its popular meaning, is used by Paul to convey the theme of his argument.

5.3. "Maranatha." One of the unique features in Paul's letters is his inclusion of the Aramaic word maranatha at the end of his letter to the Corinthians, immediately before he expresses his customary concluding benediction (1 Cor 16:22). This is the only occurrence of the word in the entire NT, and for this reason there has been much discussion concerning its meaning, origin and function. Linguistically, the Greek maranatha can be read as a transliteration of the Aramaic marana' ta' (i.e., the first person plural with the pronominal suffix), denoting an imperative cry "Our Lord, come!," or maran 'eta' (i.e., the shorter form), denoting an indicative statement "Our Lord has come" or "The Lord will come." Of these three meanings, the first has been understood by most NT interpreters to be the original meaning of the term, based on the fact that two similar prayers for the Lord's future coming are found in Revelation 22:20 (erchou Kyrie Iēsou, "Come! Lord Jesus") and in Didache 10:6 (maran atha, "Maranatha"). Many interpreters have argued that the Sitz im Leben of this invocation was the Eucharist (see Lord's Supper), where it served as a prayer for the Lord's immediate presence as well as for his eschatological return (see Eschatology). This view draws its support from Didache 10:6 where "Maranatha" occurs at the end of the meal in connection with the eucharistic liturgy.

In 1 Corinthians the mention of maranatha in its context is directly related to the particular occasion and purpose of this letter. Being misled by the intruding errorists (see Opponents) into believing a realized eschatology, some of the Corinthians thought that they were already in the new age and that there was no need for a future bodily resurrection.* This belief led them to many unacceptable styles of behavior, and Paul is seen making continual emphasis on a futuristic eschatology throughout the letter (e.g., 1 Cor 1:7-8; 3:13; 4:5; 5:5; 6:14; 11:26; 13:12; 15:50-54). Then when he comes to the end of the letter, the pronouncement of a curse, "anathema" (see Curse) on those who do not love the Lord (possibly Paul's opponents) and the exclamation "maranatha!" a prayer for Christ's coming, together serve to reinforce the key messages of the letter.

In brief, Paul's use of this liturgical acclamation at the end of his letter accomplishes three possible functions. First, it may express his sincere wish-prayer that the Lord may soon come. After writing a lengthy letter filled with confrontation, correction and instruction, Paul certainly wishes that the Lord will soon come to vindicate what he had said and done as an apostle (cf. 1 Cor 4:3-5). Secondly, it may be used to correct the Corinthians' misconception concerning their status in Christ. The Lord will come again to usher them into the new kingdom with their resurrected or transformed bodies. They are not yet in the new age here and now (1 Cor 15:50-53; 6:14; cf. 4:8). And finally, it may function to exhort them to live worthily before the Lord. Since they will face his judgment* at his coming (1 Cor 3:11-15), a petition for the Lord's coming reminds them to behave constantly in a proper manner, notably in their personal lives but also in their corporate worship. Thus in 1 Corinthians, maranatha is placed in its context for specific purposes and to suit the particular needs of the Corinthian* congregation.

6. Conclusion.

The above discussion indicates that Paul's letters are richly endowed with liturgical elements. Since these letters were read in public worship, the frequent inclusion of liturgical elements is to be expected. Yet it is remarkable to find that Paul's use of liturgical elements is never confined to stereotyped usage or content. This is seen in his careful selection of a particular form of liturgical element and his placement of it in a strategic location. In many cases the content of these liturgical elements (e.g., doxologies and benedictions) are tailored to clarify or underline the crucial messages he wants to convey to his readers, either for didactic, hortative or apologetic functions. In similar fashion, the liturgical acclamations "amen," "Abba, Father" and "maranatha," with their popular meanings, are cited in contexts to strengthen his arguments. In sum, liturgical elements are used by Paul in a lively and creative manner. Their presence in public worship becomes meaningful only when they include relevant messages directed to the needs of the worshipers.

See also BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING; CREED; HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS; PRAYER; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, " 'Abba Isn't 'Daddy,' " JTS 39 (1988) 28-47; L. G. Champion, Benedictions and Doxologies in the Letters of Paul (Oxford: publ. privately, 1934); W. Dunphy, "Maranatha: Development in Early Christology," ITQ 37 (1970) 294-308; J. A. Fitzmyer, "The New Testament Kyrios and Maranatha and their Aramaic Background," in To Advance the Gospel (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 218-35; W. H. Gloer, "Homologies and Hymns in the New Testament: Form, Content and Criteria for Identification," PRS 11 (1984) 115-32; F. Hahn, "Das Ja des Paulus und das Ja Gottes," in Neues Testament und christliche Existenz: Festschrift für Herbert Braun, ed. H. D. Betz & L. Schottroff (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1973) 229-39; J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus (SBT 2/6; London: SCM, 1967) 11-65; idem, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Scribners, 1971) 61-68; H.-W. Kuhn, "ἀββά," EDNT 1.1-2; A. MacDonald, Christian Worship in the Primitive Church (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1934); R. P. Martin, "Paul and His Predecessors," in New Testament Foundations (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 2.248-75; A. Mawhinney, "God as Father: Two Popular Theories Reconsidered," JETS 31 (1988) 181-90; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns (Cambridge: University Press, 1971); W. C. van Unnik, "Reisepläne und Amen-Sagen, Zusammenhang und Gedankenfolge in 2 Korinther 1:15-24," in Studia Paulina in honorem J. de Zwaan, ed. J. N. Sevenster und W. C. van Unnik (Haarlem: De erven F. Bohn, 1953) 215-34.

J. L. Wu

LORD

In Pauline writings as in the rest of the NT, "lord" usually translates the Greek term kyrios. The term basically connotes a superiority of the one to whom it is given. When kyrios is used vocatively to address a person (kyrie), it can be a purely respectful gesture, roughly equivalent to the English polite address "sir" or "mister" (Jesus is frequently addressed as kyrie with this sense in the Gospels). The term can also designate a person as "master" of his servants or followers, and was applied to rulers as masters over their subjects. With this connotation of the term, kyrios is linguistically paired with doulos ("slave," "servant"). Also, kyrios was applied to deities, especially among Semitic and other Eastern peoples of the Greco-Roman period (see Worship), and came to be applied to Roman emperors* in the late first century and beyond as emperor devotion was more strongly promoted. The Greek despotês, also translated "lord" (or "master"), is found a mere ten times in the NT, and in the Pauline corpus, mainly in household codes,* only in writings whose authorship is disputed, where the term refers to a "master" in a social relationship (1 Tim 6:1, 2; Tit 2:9; 2 Tim 2:21).

Kyrios is used by Paul with reference to Christ* most frequently, far less often to designate God,* and in a very few cases to refer to humans in socially dominant roles such as masters of slaves. Along with the more frequently occurring "Christ" and the less frequently occurring "Son of God,"* kyrios ("Lord") is one of the major christological titles used by Paul.

Paul's "secular" use of kyrios for human masters and his religious use of the term for God reflect the applications of kyrios in the Greco-Roman world among both Jews and Gentiles.* It is Paul's use of kyrios with reference to Christ that marks Paul as Christian and has drawn the interest of scholars. The central questions have to do with the historical background and influences upon the application of kyrios to Christ, the origin of this use of the term in early Christianity, and its use and significance as a christological title in Paul (see Christology).

1. Background
2. Origins of Christian Usage
3. Pauline Usage
4. Summary

1. Background.

1.1. General. As with many other languages, so in ancient Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek the terms for "master" or "lord" were used with reference to humans in socially superior positions, and could also be used as designations for deities (for much more extensive discussion of the linguistic background, see Foerster and Quell). It is this use of kyrios as a title for deities that seems most relevant for appreciating Paul's application of the term to Christ. Paul alludes to the pagan use of kyrios for divine beings in 1 Corinthians 8:5 with his remark about "many gods [theoi] and many lords [kyrioi]" in the religious world of his day.

In the wider religious uses in Paul's time, two in particular have sometimes been pointed to as of direct significance for Paul's designation of Christ as kyrios: the use of kyrios for the deities of various so-called mystery cults, and the application of the term in Roman emperor devotion. Various criticisms have been offered about such suggestions, however, which make it highly improbable that Paul's use of kyrios for Christ can be explained as stemming from these circles.

Both the mystery cults and emperor devotion achieved their zenith of popularity in the second century and later, well after the Christian use of kyrios for Christ was firmly established. Most importantly, a general and deeply felt antipathy toward, and disdain of, pagan religiousness were characteristic of Jews such as Paul and the others who made up the initial circles of Christian groups (and who continued in leadership positions through the crucial first few decades). This makes it most difficult to understand how pagan religious usage of kyrios could have had any direct influence upon early Christian application of the term to Christ.

Consequently, more recent scholarship has tended to conclude that the pagan use of kyrios and similar terms in other languages is probably not the occasion or source that explains the early Christian application of kyrios as a title for Christ. Instead, the pagan religious use of the term simply illustrates the wider linguistic context within which the Christian use of kyrios is to be seen, showing that the term was widely seen as an appropriate appellation for revered beings, and that pagans would have understood the term as connoting such reverence when Christians used it for Christ. But to understand why Paul and other early Christians acclaimed Christ as kyrios and what they meant when they did so, we must turn elsewhere.

1.2. Jewish. It is now clear to most scholars that it is the Jewish religious background of early Christianity that provides the most important linguistic sources and precedents for the use of kyrios as a christological title (see esp. Fitzmyer). There are two particular features of this Jewish religious background that are directly relevant: (1) the religious use of translation equivalents to kyrios in Hebrew and Aramaic, and (2) the use of kyrios itself as a religious term by Greek-speaking Jews.

By the time of the origin of Christianity, it appears that religious Jews had already developed a widely observed avoidance of pronouncing the Hebrew name of God, Yahweh, and that various substitutes were used. Indeed, evidence of ancient Jewish texts suggests that substitutes for Yahweh were often used even in written references to God. In Hebrew God was often referred to as "the Lord" using 'ădônay. And in Aramaic, as illustrated in documents from Qumran, the equivalent term, māryā' (definite form of mārēh), was used similarly. That is, in Jewish circles of the first century, the Semitic equivalents to kyrios could be used to designate the God of the Bible, and in the absolute form ("the Lord") could be used as substitutes for the holy name of God (Yahweh).

Among Greek-speaking Jews of the period, there likewise developed the practice of using Greek equivalents of 'ădônay to refer to God in place of using the sacred Hebrew name of God. Josephus, writing toward the end of the first century, seems to have preferred despotēs in place of God's name (but he may have wanted to avoid using kyrios on account of its having become one of the titles of the Roman emperors under whose sponsorship he worked). Philo (several decades earlier than Josephus) usually employed kyrios as the Greek substitute for Yahweh. The NT authors likewise more often than not use kyrios in citing OT passages where God's name appears in Hebrew, giving further evidence (1) that Greek substitutes were used for God's name, and (2) that kyrios was a popular (preferred?) choice as such a substitute, functioning in Greek the same as Hebrew 'ăḏônay and Aramaic māryā'.

The occurrences of Yahweh in Hebrew characters (yhwh) or of the curious combination of Greek characters pipi (which seems intended to signal and to resemble the Hebrew characters for Yahweh) in certain early Jewish copies of the Greek OT cannot be used to gainsay these observations. It is almost certain that in the actual reading of these copies of the OT in Greek neither Yahweh nor the pipi device was pronounced, and that instead a substitute, very likely kyrios, was spoken, the sort of practice demonstrated in the NT and other first-century Greek writings that reflect the Jewish religious background.

To summarize, in addition to the general honorific sense of kyrios and the pagan religious application of the term to certain divine figures, there is the specific adoption of kyrios into the religious vocabulary of Greek-speaking Jews of the first century as a way of referring reverentially to God, which was paralleled to, and likely facilitated by, the use of 'ăḏônay and mārêh for God among Semitic-speaking Jews. And given the Jewish religious background and theological scruples of Paul and most Christians of the formative decades, the Jewish religious use of kyrios and its Semitic equivalents is to be seen as the most directly important linguistic datum in considering the use of kyrios in the NT. The Jewish uses of kyrios as equivalent to 'ăḏônay and even as a Greek substitute for Yahweh add significantly to the range of connotative possibilities to be reckoned with, especially when interpreting the application of the term to Christ.

2. Origins of Christian Usage.

The earliest Christian writings extant are Paul's letters, and they provide evidence for the origin of a practice of referring to Christ as "Lord" that antedates the apostle (cf. Kramer, whose treatment of this question, however, goes repeatedly against the evidence). From his earliest letters onward, Paul applies kyrios to Jesus without explanation or justification, suggesting that his readers already were familiar with the term and its connotation. This is shown also in the "formulaic" or linguistically routinized way that kyrios is applied to Christ in phrases such as "the Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., 1 Thess 1:1), and "our Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., 1 Thess 1:3), especially common in the letter openings and closings (see Letters) which seem to employ greetings and benediction* conventions from the liturgical life of Paul's churches. The frequently occurring reference to Jesus simply as "the Lord" (e.g., 1 Thess 1:6; 4:15) shows how the term had acquired such a familiar usage for Christ that no further identification was necessary. Paul's letters presume a familiarity with the term as a christological title from the earliest stages of his ministry.

And such a usage of the term is a priori unlikely to have been initiated by Paul peculiarly among his own converts. This is confirmed by a number of data. Though Paul insisted on his special calling from God to evangelize the Gentiles and could even refer to "my Gospel" (Rom 2:16), he was also at pains to insist that his proclamation embodied a view of Christ shared by Jewish Christians in Jerusalem* (e.g., Gal 1—2; 1 Cor 15:1-11). His concise summary of faith in Romans 10:9-10, which focuses on Jesus' resurrection and status as kyrios, is presented as an uncontested core statement of Christian belief shared by Christians generally. In Paul's references to James* and others as "brother(s) of the Lord" he seems to be using quasi-formal designations of Jesus' relatives that originated in Palestinian Jewish-Christian groups (see, e.g., Gal 1:19; 1 Cor 9:5), in which the risen Jesus was referred to as "the Lord."

But the most direct confirmation of the very early and non-Pauline origin of the reference to Jesus as "Lord" is found in the Greek transliteration of the Aramaic invocation formula, maranatha, in 1 Corinthians 16:22 (see Liturgical Elements). Probably to be vocalized marānā' ṯā, it means "Our Lord, Come!" This phrase derives from Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians. It is used here by Paul without explanation or even translation, which suggests that it had been conveyed to the Corinthians earlier by him, likely as a sacred verbal link between Paul's Gentile Christians and their Palestinian predecessors and coreligionists, among whom the risen Jesus was addressed as "our Lord" (marānā' from mārêh). Paul's preservation of the Aramaic form of invocation of God as abba ('abbā', Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6) is probably a parallel linguistic and liturgical link with Jewish Christians that Paul gave to his Gentile converts. It is interesting that Paul passed on to his converts the Aramaic liturgical terms used to address both God and Christ, showing the early "binitarian shape" of Christian devotion in both Aramaic-speaking and Greek-speaking churches.

Suggestions by Bousset that maranatha was an Aramaic translation of an invocation of Christ that originated among Greek-speaking Christians, or that the "Lord" addressed was not Christ but God, are rightly regarded today as utterly unpersuasive attempts to avoid the obvious historical force of the phrase, which is that the reverential address of Christ as "Lord" can be traced back to the earliest Jewish Christian groups. Furthermore, claims that the use of mārêh for Christ among Aramaic-speaking Christians cannot have connoted a reverence of him as divine but only a more general honorific connotation such as "master" are now refuted by Aramaic texts from Qumran in which forms of mārêh are used to refer to God. Mārêh seems to have been used similarly to the Hebrew 'ādônay (and the Greek kyrios), including its use as an appellation for God.

When this semantic fact is combined with the observation that the maranatha phrase shows Christ addressed as mārêh in corporate prayer*/invocation, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that mārêh connotes a reverence of the risen Christ approaching, or on the level with, the reverence shown to God. And this means that Christ first began to be reverenced as "Lord" among the earliest circles of Jewish Christians in terms and actions corresponding to what is slightly later presupposed and everywhere reflected in Paul's letters.

That is, the appellation of Christ as "Lord," connoting a status like God's, seems to have its roots surprisingly early, in fact in the earliest circles of the Christian movement, and is not to be the result of a gradual process of assimilation to pagan models of devotion to various deities. Nor can the attribution of kyrios to Christ and the view of him as divine be attributed to the influx of large numbers of Gentiles of pagan background into the Christian movement (contra Casey). Linguistically and historically, the reference to Christ as "Lord" with an exalted connotation seems to have erupted among Jewish Christians of Palestinian provenance. As was also true for Paul, they were somehow able to accommodate such reverence for Christ within their exclusivist monotheism inherited from their Jewish background, producing thereby a distinctive "binitarian" adjustment in this tradition (see Hurtado 1988; see God).

3. Pauline Usage.

3.1. OT Citations. The first observation to make about Paul's use of kyrios concerns the figures to whom he applies the term. If (simply to avoid becoming entangled in another issue) we exclude the Pauline writings widely regarded as pseudepigraphical, there are a little more than 200 occurrences of kyrios to reckon with (and the following observations would not be altered if the excluded letters were included). In the overwhelming majority of these occurrences (about 180) Paul uses kyrios as an appellation for Christ, and it is this use of the term to which we must devote the greater part of the following discussion. But it is worth noting that Paul refers to God as kyrios also, though in several passages it is difficult to be sure whether in fact the reference is to God or Christ.

The certain passages where Paul refers to God as kyrios are all in citations of the OT where God is mentioned in the OT text, and kyrios is Paul's Greek substitute/translation for the Hebrew Yahweh (the practice customarily followed also in the LXX; see Old Testament Citations). We may take God as certainly the referent in the following Pauline passages where kyrios translates Yahweh in the Hebrew text of the OT: Romans 4:8 (Ps 32:1-2); 9:28-29 (Is 28:22; 1:9); 10:16 (Is 53:1); 11:34 (Is 40:13); 15:11 (Ps 117:1); 1 Corinthians 3:20 (Ps 94:11); and 2 Corinthians 6:17-18 (Is 52:11; 2 Sam 7:14). In addition, there are several passages where Paul cites the OT and modifies it by supplying an explicit reference to God as kyrios that is missing in the Hebrew and LXX: Romans 11:3 (1 Kings 19:10); 12:19 (Deut 32:35); 1 Corinthians 14:21 (Is 28:11). In these latter passages Paul imitates the language of his Greek Bible and shows how familiar he was with kyrios as a Greek substitute/translation of Yahweh in referring to the God of the OT among Greek-speaking Jews and Christians. This makes the following passages all the more interesting.

In several places where Paul cites OT references that mention Yahweh, he clearly applies the OT citations to Christ: Romans 10:13 (Joel 2:32); 1 Corinthians 1:31 (Jer 9:23-24); 10:26 (Ps 24:1); 2 Corinthians 10:17 (Jer 9:23-24). There are two passages where the context makes it more difficult to be certain whether it is God or Christ to whom Paul applies the citation (cf. Capes who argues these are references to Christ): Romans 14:11 (Is 45:23); 1 Corinthians 2:16 (Is 40:13). Moreover there are a number of Pauline passages that may well incorporate allusions to OT passages that mention Yahweh where the kyrios Paul refers to is clearly Christ (e.g.): 1 Corinthians 10:21 (Mal 1:7, 12); 10:22 (Deut 32:21); 2 Corinthians 3:16 (Ex 34:34); 1 Thessalonians 3:13 (Zech 14:5); 4:6 (Ps 94:2); 2 Thessalonians 1:7-8 (Is 66:15); 1:9 (Is 2:10, 19, 21); 1:12 (Is 66:5). But surely the most striking allusive passage in Paul is Philippians 2:10-11, which is commonly seen as an appropriation of monotheistic language from Isaiah 45:23-25 concerning Yahweh to portray the eschatological acclamation of Christ as kyrios "to the glory of God the Father."

If we set aside the ambiguous passages mentioned above, we are still left with a considerable body of evidence that Paul applied to Christ OT language, even passages, that originally quite clearly referred to Yahweh. In these cases at least, it appears that Paul's appellation of Christ as kyrios connoted, and was based on the conviction that, Christ was somehow directly and uniquely associated with Yahweh. In Philippians 2:9-11 we read that God has bestowed on Christ "the name above every name" (whether the passage was composed by Paul or appropriated by him, either way he clearly approved of it as a christological statement). This phrase likely reflects the ancient Jewish reverence for God's name (Yahweh), which for ancient Jews represented God's unique status and being. The passage thus refers to a status and endowment given to Christ that can be compared only with God's status and attributes. This seems to be why Isaiah 45:23-25, originally portraying a universal acknowledgment of Yahweh, is drawn upon to predict a universal acknowledgment of Jesus as kyrios. Kyrios here must be the Greek equivalent of acclaiming Christ as bearing the OT name of God.

Another instance of Paul appropriating an OT passage allusively to make a christological point is in the much studied passage 2 Corinthians 3:15-18. Paul's statement "when one turns to the Lord the veil is lifted" (2 Cor 3:16) adapts phrasing from Exodus 34:34, where the kyrios is Yahweh, to refer to Christ. This application of kyrios to Christ is not simply wordplay but indicates that Paul sees Christ as the kyrios in divine terms. The following verses confirm this, where Christ the kyrios is linked with the (divine) Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and is referred to as the source of transforming "glory"* (Gk doxa = Heb kābôḏ), one of the most important attributes of Yahweh in the OT and here borne by Christ (see also 1 Cor 2:8 which refers to Christ as "the Lord of glory"; and on the christological significance of doxa, see Newman).

Other evidence that Paul's reference to Jesus as kyrios can connote a direct association of Jesus with Yahweh is found in several passages where Paul uses the OT concept of "the day of the Lord [Yahweh]" to refer to the eschatological victory of Christ (on this see Kreitzer; see Eschatology). In 1 Thessalonians 5:2, 2 Thessalonians 2:2 and 1 Corinthians 5:5, Paul simply appropriates the OT phrase, though the context makes it clear that the kyrios whose "day" is coming is Christ. In other passages, Paul modifies the phrase to identify Christ explicitly as the kyrios (1 Cor 1:8; 2 Cor 1:14; cf. 2 Tim 1:18; 4:8). Capes studied Paul's application of kyrios to Christ, emphasizing especially those OT passages applied to Christ where the kyrios referred to was originally Yahweh. Unfortunately, his work is flawed at crucial points by his tendency to approach the Pauline texts in terms of the christological controversies of later centuries, occasional distortion of the work of others (esp. 168-74 in his discussion of Hurtado) and dubious claims about pre-Christian Jewish readiness to accept the worship of figures other than God. Though he is not fully consistent, Capes tends to claim that Paul's application of OT Yahweh texts to Jesus means that Paul "considered Jesus to be one with God" (Capes, 165) and that for Paul Jesus was "identified with God" (Capes, 169). These are, however, unfortunate oversimplifications.

Kreitzer focused on the close association between Christ and God in Paul's eschatology and described a "referential shift" of the term kyrios in Paul (e.g., Kreitzer, 113), in which Christ is the referent acting in the role of God. Though Kreitzer intended nothing of the sort, his phrase could be misunderstood as implying an emphasis on Christ in Paul at the expense of God, leading to christomonism. Elsewhere (Kreitzer, 116), Kreitzer refers to a "conceptual overlap between God and Christ" in Paul, and this is perhaps a more appropriate way of putting the matter. Linguistically, we might also speak of Christ as enfranchised or incorporated quite prominently and uniquely into Paul's referential field in his use of kyrios as a divine title. And, as shown particularly in Paul's application to Christ of OT passages and eschatological actions that originally concerned Yahweh, when Paul refers to Christ as kyrios the term can carry a connotation of honor and status deliberately comparable with God's.

3.2. Creedal Use. Another particularly important collection of evidence concerning Paul's application of kyrios to Christ are the several passages commonly identified by scholars as "creedal," that is, passages probably reflecting early expressions of Christian faith in Christ (see Creed). The term creedal is perhaps a bit misleading, however, for the phrases in question were neither intended as full confessions of early Christian beliefs nor were they the result of doctrinal deliberations. Instead, these faith expressions likely originated as acclamations in the setting of corporate worship* in Christian circles. The oldest surviving expressions of Christian faith, they all acclaim Christ as kyrios.

Perhaps the earliest reference to the acclamation of Christ in the Christian worship setting is 1 Corinthians 12:3. Here, in the midst of a lengthy discussion of proper behavior in Christian worship (1 Cor 11—14), Paul refers to the acclamation kyrios Iēsous, and attributes it to the work of the Holy Spirit in Christian believers. We have noted earlier Romans 10:9-10, which is another reference to this early liturgical acclamation of Jesus as kyrios Iēsous, probably to be translated as "Jesus is Lord." In Romans 10:9-10 this acclamation is connected to belief in Christ's resurrection,* which was the event that seems to have initiated the conviction that Christ had been given the unique heavenly glory referred to in proclaiming him kyrios. This passage shows that Jesus' resurrection continued to be regarded in early Christian groups as the historic basis and demonstration of his exaltation.*

Another passage previously cited, Philippians 2:9-11, likewise must be considered again here. On the basis of the two previous passages just considered, Philippians 2:9-11 also seems to allude to the early Christian acclamation of Jesus as kyrios, projecting a future universal participation in this acclamation which now the Christian groups anticipate and prefigure in their worship gatherings.

Two more features of this passage are to be noted. First, the slightly longer formulation Kyrios Iēsous Christos (Phil 2:11) is found (with some variation) especially in Paul's letter openings and closings (commonly thought to reflect liturgical formulas used in his churches), such as Philippians 1:2. This fuller formulation shows that there were variations in acclamation wording, this one is likely an attempt at greater sonorousness and christological fullness, and demonstrates at the same time that the core acclamation remained the heralding of Jesus as "Lord." And, as mentioned already, the title here certainly seems to carry the connotation of Jesus having been given the name (thus, status, honor and attributes) of God.

Second, the attempt at fuller christological expression in the acclamation formula is followed in Philippians 2:11 by a phrase conveying more explicit theological precision than the simple acclamation of Jesus as kyrios. Specifically, verse 11 makes the acclamation of Jesus as "Lord" (which constitutes acknowledging that Jesus has been given the divine name) redound at the same time "to the glory of God the Father." As Kreitzer observed (Kreitzer, 161), this phrase is evidence that Paul sought to maintain the "integrity" of his monotheistic faith and reconcile it with the breathtaking status of Jesus reflected in the acclamation of him as the kyrios. This concern is also reflected elsewhere in Paul in this sort of "clarifying word or phrase" (Kreitzer, 158) added to passages referring to Christ (e.g., 1 Cor 3:23; 11:3; 15:20-28).

In the final "creedal" passage to be considered here, 1 Corinthians 8:5-6, we see another example of how Paul reconciled Christ's exalted status with his inherited monotheism. In contrast to the Greco-Roman polytheistic environment (see Religions), Paul affirms a two-part confession of "one God [heis theos] the Father," and "one Lord [heis kyrios] Jesus Christ" (the latter phrase another example of the longer sonorous reference to Christ noticed above in Phil 2:11). The wording seems to be influenced by Deuteronomy 6:4, "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (kyrios heis estin [LXX], translating the Hebrew Yahweh 'eḥāḏ). That is, Christ is included in a revised proclamation of God's uniqueness. By Paul's time Jews were probably using Deuteronomy 6:4 as part of their confession of faith in the uniqueness of their God (the Shema). Paul may thus have intended an allusion to this Jewish confessional practice as well, to express the distinctively Christian version of monotheism in which Christ is the "one Kyrios," the Greek title by which Yahweh was referred to among Greek-speaking Jews and in the Greek OT. This constitutes an acclamation of Christ in the most exalted degree.

At the same time, we must notice how Paul's two-part ("binitarian") statement of Christian faith in 1 Corinthians 8:6 places the acclamation of the "one Lord Jesus Christ" within and under a continuing commitment to a monotheistic faith. This is the significance involved in the careful use of prepositions in the statement that "all things," including the redemption* of Christians (which is probably what is meant by "we") have come "from" (ek) the "one God the Father" and "through" (dia) the Lord Jesus Christ.

Nevertheless, although Paul fitted his view of Christ within his monotheistic faith, he clearly felt compelled to regard Christ in an amazingly exalted light, which resulted in a dramatically redrawn monotheism. Indeed, given Paul's fundamentally monotheistic commitment, it is difficult to imagine a more exalted status for Christ without replacing God with Christ, something scarcely imaginable for Paul.

D. R. de Lacey has described 1 Corinthians 8:6 as representing "a significant milestone in the development of New Testament Christology" (de Lacey, 203), and this is surely correct. It is, however, less certain that he is right to make the religious view it expresses Paul's unique christological handiwork, "his own radical re-interpretation of the creed of Israel" through which he "was able to steer the church down the road towards a truly trinitarian faith" (de Lacey, 202).

In Paul's own personal history, to be sure, he experienced a "radical re-interpretation of the creed of Israel" as a result of his christophany experience in which God chose "to reveal his Son" to him (Gal 1:16). And Paul's "revelations" and gifts in thinking through their implications are not to be minimized. The wording of 1 Corinthians 8:6 with its allusions to Deuteronomy 6:4 and to Jewish recitation of the Shema may well show Paul's own creativity of expression and rhetorical skill (see Rhetoric). But the "significant milestone" de Lacey refers to, the reverence for Jesus as kyrios, connoting his divine status but within the limits of the biblical tradition about God's uniqueness and supremacy, seems to have been arrived at by many other Christians in addition to Paul, including Jewish Christians not indebted to him for their faith.*

The evidences of corporate acclamations of Jesus as kyrios considered above suggest that Paul's high view of Christ was representative of the Christians with whom he was acquainted and of the churches whose piety he knew. And, as shown earlier, we must include Jewish-Christian groups, both Greek-speaking and Aramaic-speaking ones, as those who confessed and invoked Christ as "Lord" in their gatherings and over their lives.

3.3. Appellation Formulas. In addition to the types of usages already mentioned, there are in the seven undisputed letters about another 170 occurrences of kyrios (of the approximately 200 total occurrences) which appear in several frequently recurring, somewhat fixed ways of referring to Christ. These may be seen sociolinguistically as "routinizations" in the religious language of Paul and early Christians which show how thoroughly familiar among them was the use of kyrios as a christological title.

Of these, in about sixty-five cases (decisions about textual variants in a number of passages will produce slightly differing counts) kyrios is used in connection with other christological terms in the following expressions: "Jesus Christ our Lord" (e.g., Rom 1:4; 5:21), "our Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., Rom 5:1, 11; 16:20; Gal 6:18), "Christ Jesus our Lord" (e.g., Rom 6:23; 1 Cor 15:31), "the Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., 2 Cor 13:13) and "the Lord Jesus" (e.g., Rom 14:14; 1 Cor 11:23). These constructions are found especially (but by no means exclusively) in the opening and closing sections of Paul's letters, in greetings and farewells, where as already noted Paul is believed to use the greeting and benediction formulas used in early Christian worship assemblies. Here we probably have a glimpse of the deliberately sonorous phrasing of earliest Christian liturgical language.

Syntactically, in these expressions "Jesus," with and without "Christ," identifies the "Lord," and "Lord" defines who Jesus is for Christians and their relationship to him. That is, in these expressions the fundamental force of the term kyrios denoting the superior or "master," seems primary. Jesus is the "master" of Christians, to whom in turn they are his followers, his subjects bound to obey him.

In fact the single most frequently found use of kyrios in Paul (about 100 times in the letters we are considering here) is as the designation of Jesus without any other title, simply "the Lord" (ho kyrios, e.g., Rom 14:6, 8; 16:2, 8, 11, 12, 13; 1 Cor 3:5; 4:4-5). It is as if "the Lord" is a shorthand way of referring to Jesus, and Paul feels he needs no identifying terms to indicate who is designated as "the Lord." As noted earlier, the reference to Jesus simply as "the Lord" seems to have had its equivalent (māryā') in Aramaic-speaking Christian groups, and was likely taken over by Paul from his predecessors in the faith. It is certainly the case that Paul nowhere shows any need to justify or explain such a way of referring to Christ, indirectly suggesting that this is a well-established custom already among Christians of his time.

As with the fuller constructions listed above, so in this absolute form, ho kyrios, used of Jesus we are probably to see the primary connotation as "Lord" or "Master." That is, Jesus is the one whom the Christians are to regard as supreme, to whom they are obliged to give obedience, and whom they see as designated by God as the unique agent of redemption and judgment.* Through his death and resurrection Jesus has now been given authority to exercise lordship (Rom 14:9, kyrieuō), which Christians recognize freely now in referring to him as "Lord."

Yet it is well to remember that Paul and other Christians applied kyrios to Jesus at times with a far more specific connotation that was also more sweeping in import. As noted earlier, in some Pauline passages kyrios is applied to Christ with the effect of associating him directly with God, even implying that he shares in the divine name. It may be that this very profound and exalted meaning of kyrios was not consciously intended every time Jesus was referred to by Paul in expressions such as "the (our) Lord Jesus Christ" or even "the Lord." But it is reasonable to surmise that an undertone of the more exalted connotation was present even in these formulaic uses. That is, though the emphasis of the term might vary from one occasion to another, it is likely that the various connotations or emphases of kyrios mutually colored one another in the living use of the term by Paul and other Christians.

3.4. Contexts. In his study of Paul's christological titles, Kramer pointed out that the individual titles each tend to be used in particular kinds of statements and contexts. He noted that Jesus is referred to as kyrios especially frequently in hortatory passages in Paul. Kreitzer and Capes have confirmed that references to Jesus as kyrios tend to occur in certain kinds of contexts, especially in Paul's hortatory and eschatological passages. In fact, however, we should identify at least three types of statements in which Jesus is referred to as kyrios, each of which reflects an important way in which Paul and fellow Christians related themselves to Christ as "Lord." Paul's usage is not rigid, but we can identify a tendency to refer to Jesus as kyrios more frequently in these contexts.

3.4.1. Paraenetic Contexts. It is certainly the case that Jesus is referred to as kyrios in passages where Paul deals with matters of Christian behavior. We may take Romans 14:1-12 as an example, where Paul urges believers who differ over scruples of food and calendar matters not to judge one another harshly. Whether they eat or refrain, whether they regard one day special or all days alike (Rom 14:5-8; see Holy Days), Paul encourages them all to believe that their common motivation is that they act "unto the Lord." And he goes on to characterize Christian existence generally as living and dying "to the Lord" to whom they belong (Rom 14:9).

To cite another passage, in 1 Corinthians 6:13—7:40, where Paul deals with a number of questions of sexual relationships (see Sexuality), he mainly refers to Jesus as "the Lord." Forbidding the use of prostitutes, Paul proclaims that the Christian's body is "for the Lord" (1 Cor 6:13). It is "the Lord" whose command he either can or cannot cite (1 Cor 7:10-12, 25) in responding to the questions sent to him from Corinth about married and unmarried people (see Marriage). (See also 1 Cor 9:14; 14:37 for references to commands of "the Lord.") Indeed, here as in other passages Jesus "the Lord" defines the realm of Christian existence. Christians are called "in the Lord" (1 Cor 7:22); single persons are able with fewer distractions to devote themselves "to the Lord" (1 Cor 7:32-35); and the widow may remarry only "in the Lord" (1 Cor 7:39, i.e., within the Christian fellowship).

In Romans 16:2-20 Paul repeatedly uses the phrase "in the Lord" in referring to people in the context of Christian fellowship* and service* to Christ (Rom 16:2, 8, 11-13). Compare his criticism of certain troublesome people who by contrast "do not serve our Lord Christ" (Rom 16:18). The phrase "the work of the Lord" can serve as Paul's way of referring to Christian involvement in promoting the gospel* (1 Cor 15:58; 16:10). And Paul refers to his personal movements in his ministry as dependent upon the will of "the Lord" (1 Cor 4:19; 16:7).

In 1 Thessalonians 1:6 the Thessalonians are congratulated for having become "imitators of us and of the Lord" in their obedience to the gospel despite affliction. And in 1 Thessalonians 4:1-12, where Paul exhorts the believers to observe ethical instructions previously given, he designates Jesus as "the Lord Jesus" (1 Thess 4:1- 2) or simply "the Lord" (1 Thess 4:6).

We may summarize these examples as showing that Paul tended to refer to Jesus as "Lord" in contexts where Paul instructs his churches in Christian obedience, and, more generally, in referring to Christian life and relationships, and the service involved in spreading the gospel message. As their kyrios, Jesus claimed the obedience of his followers and defined the sphere of their endeavor.

3.4.2. Eschatological Contexts. A second type of context and statement in which Paul tends to refer to Jesus as kyrios may be identified as eschatological. Consider, for example, the several references to the eschatological return of Jesus in 1 Thessalonians in which the term kyrios is used, either alone (four times) or with identifying terms ("the Lord," 1 Thess 4:15-17; "day of the Lord," 1 Thess 5:2; "our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Thess 5:23; "our Lord Jesus," 1 Thess 2:19; 3:13).

As another example of this usage, in 1 Corinthians 1:7-8 the Corinthians are described as awaiting the eschatological "revelation" and "day" of "our Lord Jesus Christ." And in 1 Corinthians 4:1-5 Paul refers to the eschatological coming of "the Lord" who will render final judgment over Paul and other ministers of the gospel (1 Cor 4:4-5). The little phrase "the Lord is near" in Philippians 4:5 is probably to be taken as a reference to the hope of Christ's imminent return. As 1 Corinthians 15:23 shows, with its reference to the eschatological "coming" of "Christ," there is some variation in the christological terms Paul uses in eschatological references as well as in other kinds of statements. But his general tendency was to use the title "Lord" in passages where Jesus' eschatological manifestation and victory are in view (see Eschatology).

To the passages cited here we must add the references listed earlier where Paul appropriates the OT concept/phrase "day of the Lord" to describe Jesus' eschatological appearance, sometimes modifying the OT phrase by the use of formulas such as "Lord Jesus Christ." In fact it is likely that the OT phrase "day of the Lord," and the hope it came to represent in ancient Jewish tradition, influenced Paul's tendency to use "Lord" in references to Jesus' return. And, given Paul's familiarity with the OT, it is also likely that we should see his references to the "day of the Lord (Jesus)" as indications that for Paul Jesus was associated with God and would act in the eschatological role of God.

Thus, to refer to Jesus as kyrios in these eschatological statements probably connoted something beyond the basic meaning of "master." In such statements the "Lord" Jesus was clothed with the attributes and functions of Yahweh. His eschatological appearance would involve his judging all things and would bring divine victory over all evil. As Kreitzer has shown, pre-Christian Jewish writings show that there had already developed the notion of a messianic figure acting on God's behalf in eschatological redemption. In this the Pauline references to Jesus carrying out the role that originally was God's has a precedent. It is, however, significant that in Paul (and the NT elsewhere) Jesus not only acts in God's place in the projections of eschatological hope,* but is also frequently referred to as the "Lord" whose "day" of eschatological triumph* is anticipated. This association of Jesus with God, in eschatological action and in title, is not without parallel but seems comparatively more pronounced and consistent in the NT than in the pre-Christian Jewish references to principal agents of God's eschatological victory.

3.4.3. Liturgical Contexts. The third type of passage and setting to highlight with regard to Paul's use of the term kyrios for Jesus has to do with the worship life of earliest Christian groups. We have already mentioned Pauline passages identified as evidence of early acclamation formulas and practices by which Jesus was confessed liturgically as kyrios in Christian worship gatherings (probably collectively). And we have also noted that Paul's letter openings and closings, with their sonorous references to "the (or our) kyrios Jesus Christ" (or "Christ Jesus our kyrios") in statements of greetings and farewells, are commonly thought to echo the parlance of early Christian worship as well. The point to repeat here is that these uses of kyrios all derive from, and give evidence of, the setting of Christian worship gatherings as one of the earliest and most important contexts for, and sources of, the application of kyrios to Christ.

In further illustration of this we may consider 1 Corinthians 5:1-5, which concerns the man guilty of porneia ("sexual immorality") with "his father's wife." Paul calls for disciplinary action to be taken in the setting of the gathered church (see Discipline), and we are particularly concerned to note the way he describes the Christian gathering. We should probably punctuate verses 3-5 with a stop at the end of verse 3, taking "in the name of the Lord Jesus" in verse 4 as referring to the Christian assembly. Thus, 1 Corinthians 5:4-5 are to be read in the following fashion: "When you have assembled in the name of the Lord Jesus, I also present in spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus you are to hand this man over to Satan for the destruction of his flesh that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord."

Though the occasion for this particular assembly may have been unusual, the terms Paul uses to describe the Christian gathering are probably typical, and the point to underscore here is how Jesus is repeatedly referred to as kyrios. They gather "in the name of the Lord Jesus," a probable allusion to an invocation and acclamation of Jesus as kyrios in the early Christian assembly for which we have already seen evidence. This phrase and the references to the "power" of the Lord and his eschatological "day" show that kyrios is here applied to Jesus with a connotation of transcendent attributes and functions such as are associated with God.

And both the use of kyrios to designate Jesus and the transcendent connotation of the title seem typical of the Pauline passages where early Christian worship gatherings are either referred to directly or are indirectly reflected in phraseology taken from this setting. As a final example we may examine 1 Corinthians 11:17-33. The sacred meal of the Christian gathering is "the Lord's supper"* (kyriakon deipnon, 1 Cor 11:20; and cf. "table of the Lord" in 1 Cor 10:21). Consistently Jesus is referred to as kyrios in the passage (1 Cor 11:23, 26, 27, 32). It is probably both the worship context and the allusion to the eschatological appearance of Christ ("until he comes") that account for the expression "the death of the Lord" in 1 Cor 11:26, a striking contrast to the more typical Pauline tendency to use "Christ"* in references to Jesus' death.

We have, then, three main types of Pauline contexts in which he characteristically uses kyrios to designate Jesus, reflecting three early church settings in which particularly Jesus was referred to as kyrios. In the Pauline hortatory statements and passages the kyrios Jesus is the "master" whose teaching and example are authoritative for Christian conduct. In the references to eschatological expectations, the designation of Jesus as kyrios seems to reflect the conviction that Jesus has been designated to act in the eschatological role of God. Finally, in the Pauline references to early Christian worship gatherings and in his liturgically influenced language, kyrios designates Jesus as the transcendent, exalted one who has been given the divine "name" and incorporated into the devotional and cultic life of early Christianity.

These three contexts are, of course, not to be separated entirely. We may distinguish varying emphases of the term kyrios as applied to Christ in each type of passage, but the connotations were also likely linked in the religious thought of Paul and early Christians generally. In some cases the link is explicit, as in Philippians 2:9-11, where the future universal acclamation, Kyrios Iēsous Christos, echoes and is anticipated in the Christian acclamation of Jesus in the worship setting. Or we may again cite 1 Corinthians 11:26, where the present liturgical celebration of the death of the kyrios Jesus in the sacred meal is connected with his eschatological appearance. In Paul's references to early Christian worship, Jesus is the kyrios whose present authority over the church is both very real and inseparable from his future dominion over all things to be made manifest in the "day of the Lord."

4. Summary.

In any attempt to probe Paul's view of Christ, the term kyrios must be central. It functions in several ways and is enriched by several connotations in Paul. The term expresses the relationship of Christians to Jesus as subjects and followers to their master, as in the phrase "our Lord Jesus Christ." In Philippians 3:8 Paul speaks of this relationship in very personal terms with the reference to "Christ Jesus my Lord." As kyrios, Jesus' example and command are unquestionable authorities for Christian behavior in Paul's letters. Paul reflects the acclamation of Jesus as kyrios in the worship setting, which is understood by him as the pattern and anticipation of the universal acknowledgment of Jesus as Lord when he comes in eschatological glory. The divine glory of Jesus the Lord, however, has already been revealed to Paul. As a result, Paul views Jesus in incredibly exalted terms, permitting the application to Jesus of OT passages concerning Yahweh and the portrayal of kyrios Jesus as the agent of all creation* and redemption (1 Cor 8:6). In short, in some cases at least, Paul's application of kyrios to Jesus connoted the conviction that Jesus had been given to share in the properties and honor of God's "name" (with all that represented in the OT and ancient Jewish tradition) and bore the very glory of God in such fullness and uniqueness that Jesus could be compared and associated only with God "the Father" in the honor and reverence due him.

See also CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; EMPERORS, ROMAN; EXALTATION AND ENTHRONEMENT; GOD; HOLY SPIRIT; SAVIOR; SON OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970 [1913]); E. D. Burton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1921) 392-417; D. B. Capes, Old Testament Yahweh Texts in Paul's Christology (WUNT 2/47; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992); P. M. Casey, From Jewish Prophet to Gentile God (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); L. Cerfaux, "Kyrios dans les citations pauliniennes de l'Ancien Testament," in Receueil Lucien Cerfaux: Études d'exégèse et d'histoire religieuse de Monseigneur Cerfaux, Vol. 1 (Gembloux: Duculot, 1954); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963 [1957]); N. A. Dahl, "Sources of Christological Language," in Jesus the Christ, ed. D. H. Juel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 113-36; D. R. de Lacey, " 'One Lord' in Pauline Christology," in Christ the Lord: Studies in Christology Presented to Donald Guthrie, ed. H. H. Rowdon (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1982) 191-203; W. Foerster, G. Quell, "κύριος κτλ," TDNT III.1039-98; J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Semitic Background of the New Testament Kyrios-Title," in A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays (SBLMS 25; Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1979) 115-42; L. W. Hurtado, "New Testament Christology: A Critique of Bousset's Influence," TS 40 (1979) 306-17; idem, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God (SBT 50; London: SCM, 1966 [1963]); L. J. Kreitzer, Jesus and God in Paul's Eschatology (JSNTSup 19; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); C. C. Newman, Paul's Glory Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992).

L. W. Hurtado

LORD'S SUPPER

Abuses in the holding of the church* meal at Corinth* led Paul to remind the church of its real significance as a memorial of the Lord's* sacrificial death* on the basis of a tradition describing the Last Supper. Recent study has emphasized the importance of social factors in explaining the divisions between rich* and poor in the church. These divisions led to the abuses and the response of Paul which emphasized the meal as a focus of Christian unity and mutual love* which does away with class and other human distinctions. Theories that the Pauline type of meal differed significantly from meals in other areas of the early church are improbable.

1. Introduction
2. Religious Meals in the Ancient World
3. The Church Meal in Corinth
4. Paul's Response to the Situation at Corinth
5. The Pauline Lord's Supper and Practice Elsewhere

1. Introduction.

In 1 Corinthians 10:1-3 Paul points out the danger that Christians who think that they stand secure in their faith may fall into severe temptation by participation in idolatry. The people of Israel, who had experienced a remarkable act of divine grace in being liberated from slavery in Egypt, nevertheless fell into idolatry and its accompanying immorality. This was to serve as a warning to the Corinthians. Paul strengthens the parallel he is drawing by tracing an analogy with the way in which the Israelites "were all baptized . . . [and] all ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink." Just as their experience with the cloud and the sea is seen in terms of Christian baptism, so too their eating and drinking must be seen as analogous to the Christian meal, which is referred to later in the same chapter (1 Cor 10:15-17). Here, then, we have the first explicit mention (though some scholars find a possible allusion in 1 Cor 5:6-8) by Paul of the church meal with its spiritual food and drink. (And here, too, we have one of the few places where baptism* and the Lord's Supper are linked together as the two rites practiced in the church. 1 Corinthians 12:13 refers purely to baptism in two parallel expressions and not to baptism with the Spirit [see Holy Spirit] and drinking the Spirit at the Lord's Supper, which is a totally unattested idea.)

Later in the same letter Paul refers to a church meal called the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:20; cf. "the table of the Lord," 1 Cor 10:20) which was celebrated, manifestly on a frequent basis, in the church at Corinth. References in Acts indicate that an event called "the breaking of bread" was celebrated in the church at Jerusalem, "on the first day of the week" at Troas (Acts 20:7), and by implication in the other churches. Since at Corinth the collection of money for church purposes was also made on the first day of the week (1 Cor 16:2), it is reasonable to suppose that this day had special significance for the church and that a church meeting took place weekly on that day.

Details of what happened at the actual celebration, whether in the Pauline churches or elsewhere, are scanty, and it has often been commented that, if there had not been abuses of the meal in Corinth, we might never have heard about it. However, the fact that the tradition cited by Paul in connection with the occasion contains a command by the Lord to his followers to "do this in memory of him" indicates clearly enough that it was regarded as a duty wherever this tradition was known.

For Paul the origin of the meal lay in the last meal of Jesus with his disciples "on the night when he was betrayed/handed over" to the Jewish authorities, and ultimately by God, and subsequently put to death (1 Cor 11:23). He based his understanding of the meal on this event. However, the nature and theology of the meal in the Pauline churches, and its relationship both to the so-called Last Supper and to Christian meals in general, raise a number of problems.

2. Religious Meals in the Ancient World.

Communal meals were important in both Judaism and Hellenistic religions. They served a social purpose in bringing the adherents together, and they functioned religiously in a variety of ways (see Food).

For the Jews in general each and every meal was "religious" to the extent that it was accompanied by the giving of thanks to God* for the food. The main evening meal at the beginning of the Sabbath (which commenced at sunset on the previous day) had a special character, and there were special meals associated with Passover and other festivals. Within the religious movement associated with the Pharisees small groups known as ḥābûroṯ met to celebrate meals as occasions for giving thanks to God and for self-dedication. Jewish daily meals began with a thanksgiving to God associated with the breaking of bread and concluded with a further thanksgiving. Festal meals on special occasions, including Sabbaths, other festivals and guest-meals, included wine (which was not drunk at ordinary daily meals). Thanks were offered for each cup of wine (Klauck 1982, 66-67). At the Passover meal a more elaborate procedure was followed. An important element was an explanation of the symbolism attached to the various parts of the meal (including the lamb, unleavened bread and bitter herbs). This verbal "proclamation" (cf. katangello, 1 Cor 11:26) was intended to make the occasion a remembrance (Ex 12:14; 13:9; cf. anamnēsis, 1 Cor 11:24-25) of what God had done for his people.

The situation in the Hellenistic world has been described fairly exhaustively by Klauck (1982), who discusses in turn meals associated with religious offerings and sacrifices, meals held by associations, meals celebrated in the cult of the dead, meals associated with the various mystery religions both in Hellenism* and also in Judaism, and cultic meals in Gnostic* sects. He notes that the communal meals held by associations were particularly important and that they maintained a religious character. Individual Christian converts could well have been familiar with any of these types of meal and also with some of the practices of the different mystery religions (see Religions).

There was a complicated mix of religious practices in Corinth. Some members of the church were familiar with meals associated with pagan temples and some of them believed that it was all right to continue to participate in these. It does not, of course, follow that they viewed what happened at these meals and the Lord's Supper in the same way. Further, it is important to note that the very strong explicit criticisms that Paul makes of the Corinthian church meal do not appear to be connected in any way with pagan beliefs or practices that had been carried over into it. It may be that the Corinthian Christians felt that participation in the meal of itself protected them from divine judgment,* but Paul's instruction to them is not about misunderstanding the meal but about refraining from idolatry.* Rather, the abuses at the meal were of a social character and reflected the practices of the secular world in general rather than of pagan religions in particular.

3. The Church Meal in Corinth.

Since Paul was the founder of the church, and since he refers to what he had told the church (undoubtedly during the visit to Corinth when the church was established), it follows that the church meal had been introduced by Paul himself but had developed characteristics in his absence from Corinth of which he could not approve. The church was meeting regularly to celebrate the Lord's Supper, but in such a way that Paul denied that the church meal could properly be called the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:20).

The basic problem appears to have arisen out of tensions in the church between the poor and the rich. Since there were no church buildings, meals were held in the houses of church members. The believers met together in groups of a maximum size dictated by the size of the houses which were at their disposal. It has been convincingly shown that the groups would have met in the homes of the rich (since they alone could accommodate them). These occasions were full meals with plenty of food and drink—at least for some members. The rich brought plentiful food for themselves (including meat), whereas the poorer members had to make do with their own scanty fare (see Social Setting; Social-Scientific Approaches).

Closer definition of what went on is disputed. The tradition about the Last Supper suggests that the eating of the bread and the sharing of the cup, which were given special significance by Jesus, were separated from one another by the meal (cf. the words "likewise after supper the cup," Lk 22:20 = 1 Cor 11:25). Nevertheless, the bringing together of the bread and the cup in the tradition and the way in which the words of interpretation were shaped symmetrically indicate that the specific "remembrance of the Lord's death" came to be seen as one action and that it followed the meal proper. However, there is dispute as to whether the juxtaposition had already taken place in Corinth when Paul wrote, and it has been argued that the order bread-meal-cup was followed at Corinth (Theissen; Lampe). Klauck (1982, 295) argues that, since there is no indication that the poorer members of the church were excluded from participation in the bread, the meal must have preceded the use of the bread and cup.

One view of the matter is that the richer members came early and ate and drank copiously before (cf. Gk prolambanō) the arrival of the poorer members who would have brought much scantier fare with them (Theissen). It is pointed out that the poorer people would have had to be content with bread and not much besides, whereas the rich would have had meat and a variety of delicacies. Parallels from the Greco-Roman world indicate that there could be at least two levels of eating at one and the same meal, the rich thereby accentuating their difference from their poorer neighbors who also came at their invitation to the church meeting. Thus, although the rich opened their houses to the church, they did so in a way that emphasized social divisions. (It perhaps needs to be mentioned that the fact that the problems at the meal reflected social divisions was recognized long before Theissen [see, e.g., G. G. Findlay, in EGT II.879]; what his research has done is to indicate more clearly how the rich carried over the practices of the secular world into the church and sinned against their poorer brothers and sisters.)

Further research has taken up the analogy of Hellenistic meals to which a householder would invite guests; a meal was held in two stages, the main meal being followed by a "dessert" or "symposium" at which there could be further guests who had not been at the earlier stage (Lampe). Lampe argues that the "religious" gathering at Corinth corresponded to the "dessert and drinks" part of the meal, and that it was preceded for the rich by the "main meal" to which each brought their own food (on the analogy of a Greek eranos) The poorer members of the church could not come so early (because of their work commitments) nor bring food of the same quality.

An alternative view is that the rich were actually eating their meal in the presence of the poorer members and not sharing out the food with them (Winter; the problem at issue is whether Gk prolambanō in 1 Cor 11:21 signifies eating prior to other people or, as an intensified form of lambanō, "take," means simply "to devour").

Despite uncertainty over the precise circumstances, the main point stands out quite clearly. There was over-indulgence on the part of the rich and feelings of envy on the part of the poor who were made to feel inferior (cf. 1 Cor 12:15). For Paul this was inconsistent with the intended character of the meal. Both hunger and drunkenness were out of place in a church meal. Rowdy festivity and social divisions alike ruined the occasion.

4. Paul's Response to the Situation at Corinth.

Paul's teaching in 1 Corinthians 11 was directed against these practices which meant that the meal had lost its character as the Lord's meal. As far as practically stopping the abuse was concerned, he commanded that the church members should welcome one another when they came together for their meal. That is to say, the rich should welcome the poor and treat them (as indeed all members of the church should treat one another) courteously and graciously; the occasion was still to be a meal, but the implication may be that there was to be sharing of the food (Winter defends this sense for Gk ekdechomai in 1 Cor 11:33) so that nobody felt disadvantaged. Further, Paul laid down that the rich should eat privately in their own houses if they wished to have a larger meal or more expensive fare, and thus avoid importing social divisions into the meeting of the church. Thus Paul was not counseling that the occasion should cease to be a meal and become what it subsequently became in the church generally, namely the token consumption of a morsel of bread and a sip of wine. He had further instructions which he promised to give verbally, but we shall never know what these were.

Paul's main point, which provided the theological undergirding for the practical advice, was made by citing the tradition which he had received concerning the meal and which he had previously passed on to the church by word of mouth. The language used indicates that it was a matter of an accepted, authoritative tradition. Paul says that he received it "from the Lord," which has been understood by some to mean that it came in the form of a private vision or communication directly from the Lord to Paul (Maccoby); it is far more likely to have been a piece of church tradition* which had the authority* of the Lord behind it (cf. the use of words of the Lord, doubtless handed down in church tradition to Paul, in 1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; see Jesus, Sayings of).

The tradition described what happened at the Last Supper, when the Lord took bread and the cup and distributed them to his disciples with accompanying sayings that interpreted them as representing his body and the new covenant* in his blood; he gave directions that the disciples were to do "this" (i.e., repeat the practice) in memory of him. The meal was thus intended to be a memorial of his death, through which it would be proclaimed. It followed that conduct which was contrary to the spirit of self-giving seen in the death* of Jesus would negate that proclamation. Hence it was the contempt and lack of love for the poorer members of the church which specifically aroused Paul's anger.

The members of the church should stop before taking part in the meal to be sure that they were not committing this sin* which was a sin against the body and blood of Christ and would bring judgment upon them. Such conduct was "unworthy" and represented a failure to "discern the body" (1 Cor 11:29). The use of "discern" (Gk diakrinō) here is difficult, and interpretation depends on whether "body" here stands for "the body [and blood of the crucified Lord]" or for "the church" (Fee, 562-64). Either Paul is saying that people who eat unworthily are not recognizing that the food symbolizes the body (and blood) of Jesus nor acting as befits the recipients of his salvation; or he is saying that they are failing to recognize that the people gathered together for the meal are present as the body of Christ (made one by sharing in the one loaf, 1 Cor 10:17) and must be treated in Christian love.

In any case, what Paul says here is reinforced by his earlier comment that the "many" who share in the one loaf at the supper are "one body" in virtue of doing so (1 Cor 10:16-17). He sees that those who share in the blood and the body of Jesus are thereby brought into a unity with one another where social distinctions cannot be allowed to exist. Opinions differ as to whether the communion with the body and blood of Christ signifies "a union (sharing) with the risen Christ" (Hauck, 805), or a common sharing between the members that binds them together on the basis of the Lord, his death and his resurrection* (Fee, 564), or a common sharing in the benefits secured for them by the death of Christ (Barrett 1968, 232). However precisely we understand the phrase, Paul emphasizes that sharing in this meal and taking part in idolatrous* meals are incompatible. His stress on the fact that believers are joined together as one by the church meal may suggest that any members who take part in idolatry are contaminating the whole community. But his main thought is probably, as in 1 Corinthians 6, the incompatibility of being joined to Christ and to what is sinful/demonic.*

In 1 Corinthians 11 Paul develops the theological significance of the Supper on the basis of the tradition. He reminds the readers that the body of Christ, represented by the bread, was "for you." This phrase forms part of a series of statements which teach that Christ died for other people (Rom 5:8; 8:32; 1 Cor 15:3; 2 Cor 5:15 [3x]; Gal 2:20; 3:13; Eph 5:2, 25; 1 Tim 2:6; Tit 2:14) and which occur throughout the NT (Mk 10:45 [Gk anti]; Jn 10:11, 15; 11:52; Heb 2:9; 9:24; 1 Pet 2:21; 3:18; 1 Jn 3:16). Thus the death of Jesus is seen as his self-giving in death on behalf and for the benefit of other people, so that they might be redeemed from sin and its judgment and be justified. Possibly his self-giving "for you" is intended also to be seen as exemplary (Winter, 79).

The cup is interpreted as signifying the new covenant in the blood of Christ. Against the background of Exodus 24:8 and Jeremiah 31:31-34 this indicates that the death of Jesus is the sacrifice which inaugurates the new covenant between God and his people, thus establishing the new people of God.

There has been much discussion, arising out of contemporary theological differences in the church, as to whether Paul's teaching indicates that the Lord himself is present at the Supper. He appears to regard the food and drink as "spiritual," like the heaven-sent provision for the Israelites in the desert (1 Cor 10:3-4; Wedderburn, 234-39). Roman Catholic interpreters tend to find a presence of the Lord in the bread and the cup on the basis of "This is my body," whereas Protestant interpreters argue that the phrase means rather "This symbolizes my body." The debate turns on 1 Corinthians 10:20-21 where there appears to be an analogy between being partakers with demons through sharing in their cup and table and what happens at the Lord's Supper. However, there is no indication that the two events are precisely parallel, and in any case it is not suggested that the worshippers eat the demons or that the demons are present in the food. Rather, the parallel suggests that, just as those who share in idolatrous feasts are brought into a relationship with demons, so those who share in the Lord's Supper are brought into a relationship with the Lord who is present as host. This language of "host and guests" admittedly goes beyond what Paul explicitly says, but fits in with the background concept of feasts held under the patronage of a god in paganism and feasts celebrated "in the presence of the Lord" in the OT and Judaism (cf. also Rev 3:20). There is no indication that Paul saw the event as sacrificial; it is likened not to the offering of an animal on an altar but to the eating of food at a table, where the partakers receive the symbols that indicate that a sacrificial death has already taken place (at Calvary). It is thus conceived of as a post-sacrificial meal.

There is no explicit reference to the Supper elsewhere in Paul. However, if 1 Corinthians was meant to be read as part of the proceedings at the church meal, the use of the curse* against those who do not love the Lord (1 Cor 16:21) may be seen as reinforcing the sense of community among those who in the meal confessed their love of the Lord and their separation from others, specifically those who proclaimed another gospel* (cf. the similarly placed warning in Rom 16:17-18 and also Gal 1:8-9 for the use of the curse). The kiss of peace, mentioned at the end of several letters, will also have had significance as an expression of unity and love. Finally, the phrase Maranatha, which may be understood as a statement or a prayer,* should be taken as an expression of longing for the final coming of Jesus as Lord (rather than as a prayer for his presence in the Lord's Supper; see Liturgical Elements).

5. The Pauline Lord's Supper and Practice Elsewhere. How is the Pauline material related to other teaching about the Supper in the NT? The Synoptic Gospels uniformly witness to the occasion when Jesus met with his disciples for what is characterized as a Passover meal. He used this occasion to announce to them his imminent decease and to share with them the customary bread of the Passover and one of the cups of wine with accompanying statements that these symbolized his body and his blood. The precise wording of the accounts varies between the Gospels, with Matthew and Mark standing close to one another with essentially the same wording (Mark: "Take, this is my body; this is my blood of the covenant which is poured out for many"), and with Luke offering a form of words close to those preserved by Paul (Luke: "This is my body which is given for you; do this in remembrance of me; this cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is poured out for you"). The somewhat stylized nature of the accounts suggests that the wording had become "fixed" as part of a liturgical statement used in church meetings and was incorporated into the Gospels (see Worship).

The variation in wording between Matthew/Mark and Luke/Paul has been variously explained. Perhaps the majority of scholars regard the Markan wording as the older, with the Lukan/Pauline as a development from it, but there is a sizable minority (to which the present writer would join himself) which sees the development moving in the reverse direction. Opinions further differ as to whether this tradition actually goes back to the historical occasion described or has been developed from a simpler form of words which was less pregnant with theological implications. The view that the whole account is a church creation, and that we know nothing historical about a final meal of Jesus with his disciples, need not be taken seriously (see the refutation by Stein).

Communal meals were celebrated widely in the early church and are traced back by Luke to the earliest days of the Jerusalem* church. There is nothing unlikely about this. The first Christians in a Jewish setting appear to have acted in a way analogous to the Pharisees or indeed to any Jewish group which met to eat together. The meal is referred to as "the breaking of bread"—with no mention of drinking wine. Although this phrase refers strictly to the opening act of a meal, the sharing of bread to the accompaniment of prayers of thanksgiving, it is clear that a proper meal is meant. The use of meal imagery in Revelation likewise shows that the religious significance of meals was recognized in its geographical area in Asia.

The question that now arises is whether there was uniformity of practice throughout the early church. Were there two or more types of meal in the early church, the one a rather more festive type of meal which was known as "the breaking of bread" and which was not a memorial of the Lord's death and not based on the tradition of the Last Supper, while the other was very much tied up with the use of bread and the cup to remember the Lord's death and was the kind of occasion advocated by Paul?

A theory of this kind was developed especially by H. Lietzmann, who argued that the original Jerusalem meal was replaced by the Pauline one. Other scholars have suggested similar theories. (Barrett 1985, 61, 67-68, thinks it possible that it was Paul who made the link between the church's weekly fellowship meal, celebrating the resurrection, and the Last Supper.) However, it has proved impossible to trace the independent existence of the putative Jerusalem meal. The most that can be said is that the phrase "the breaking of bread" in Acts may cover both celebrations of the Lord's Supper and other church meals without wine (which was not normally drunk at ordinary meals). The meal at Corinth included the breaking of bread, and it also included the use of wine. Our sole witness for a Lord's Supper with bread only would be Luke, if that is what he is describing, and the close links of Luke with Pauline Christianity make it very unlikely that he intends to describe anything other than Pauline practice; the case that a post-Pauline writer is describing a "bread-only" meal current in his own time and reading it back into the days of the early church has no basis. Thus we have no historical evidence for the parallel existence of two different kinds of meal.

We therefore have to ask whether there is any evidence which might suggest an evolution in the early church meals from being simply fellowship gatherings to becoming memorials to the death of Jesus with an increasingly elaborate theological significance attached to them and reflected in the varying forms of the so-called "words of institution." The "Last Supper" itself was a reinterpretation of a Passover meal, and this might have suggested an annual celebration of it rather than a weekly one. That some early Christians celebrated an annual "Christian Passover" emerges from 1 Corinthians 5:6-8, but this evidence also shows that Paul had no difficulty in holding together an annual Christian Passover and a weekly Lord's Supper (see Jeremias, 901-4). We are thus thrown back again on the question whether the account of the Last Supper is historically plausible and reliable and whether it influenced the church from its earliest days. So far as Luke is concerned, it is noteworthy that he describes the Emmaus meal with the risen Lord in a way which suggests that it was a pattern for what was to follow, and he describes it in terms which are reminiscent of the Last Supper. There were evidently no problems in his mind regarding the continuity between them.

The case for development has been defended by Maccoby. He states that at ordinary Jewish meals the opening action was the "breaking of bread" and the sharing of it among the participants with a prayer of thanksgiving in which God was blessed for his provision; however, at ceremonial meals on the Sabbath and at festivals this action was preceded by the sharing of wine, with thanks given to God. He then argues that in the Jerusalem church the "breaking of bread" followed the pattern of ordinary Jewish meals. But the last meal of Jesus with his disciples followed the pattern of a festival meal with the order wine-bread, as attested in Luke and Didache 9-10. Originally it had a purely "apocalyptic"* theme, as Jesus looked forward to the imminent inauguration of the kingdom* of God. Then Paul had a vision* in which he learned that at the Last Supper Jesus had distributed bread and wine (in that order!) and interpreted them with reference to his death. (This is the tradition received [directly] from the Lord to which reference is made in 1 Cor 11.) Hence arose the text of Luke which shows a secondary combination of the apocalyptic and eucharistic themes, and then the text of Mark which almost entirely suppresses the apocalyptic aspect. Thus the Lord's Supper is a Pauline creation, and is not to be confused with the breaking of bread in Acts.

Maccoby's theory comes to grief on various facts. There is no clear evidence in the NT itself for a church meal with the order wine-bread (1 Cor 10:16-17, to which he rightly does not appeal, has the inverted order to allow Paul to develop the significance of the one loaf), and the Didache's evidence should not be preferred to that of earlier sources. It would be strange if the post-Pauline Acts were to ascribe to Paul a "breaking of bread" (Acts 20) which was different from the Pauline custom known to the author. Paul himself uses the term "breaking of bread" to refer to the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 10:16). And the phrase "the cup of blessing" (i.e., "the cup for which we bless God") used by Paul in 1 Corinthians 10:16 was used for the third cup at the Passover meal (Str-B IV.1, 72). The case, in short, is not convincing.

See also BAPTISM; BODY OF CHRIST; CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; FELLOWSHIP, COMMUNION, SHARING; FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; LOVE FEAST; SACRIFICE, OFFERING; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL; TRADITION; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Co- rinthians (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1968); idem, Church, Ministry and Sacraments in the New Testament (Exeter: Paternoster, 1985); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); F. Hauck, "κοινός κτλ," TDNT III.789-809; J. Jeremias, "πάσχα," TDNT V.896-904; H. J. Klauck, Herrenmahl und Hellenistischer Kult: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum ersten Korintherbrief (Münster: Aschendorff, 1982); idem, "Lord's Supper," ABD IV.362-72; P. Lampe, "Das korinthische Herrenmahl im Schnittpunkt hellenistisch-römischer Mahlpraxis und paulinischer Theologia Crucis (1 Kor 11, 17-34)," ZNW 82 (1991) 183-213; H. Lietzmann, Mass and Lord's Supper (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1953-1979); H. Maccoby, "Paul and the Eucharist," NTS 37 (1991) 247-67; I. H. Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Exeter: Paternoster, 1980); P. Neuenzeit, Das Herrenmahl: Studien zur paulinischen Eucharistiefassung (München: Kösel, 1960); E. Schweizer, The Lord's Supper According to the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); R. H. Stein, "Last Supper," DJG 444-50; G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); A. J. M. Wedderburn, Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology against Its Graeco-Roman Background (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987); B. W. Winter, "The Lord's Supper at Corinth: An Alternative Reconstruction," RTR 37 (1978) 73-82.

I. H. Marshall

LOVE

For Paul love is the most important of all the Christian graces and the very heart of Christian ethics.* Motivated by the supreme expression of God's* own love in the sacrificial death* of Christ, it springs from a transformed life filled with God's own Spirit.* The primary focus of love in Paul's writings is its tangible expression within the Christian community.

1. Terminology
2. God's/Christ's Love for Us
3. Our Love for God/Christ
4. Our Love for Others

1. Terminology.

There is no Pauline letter in which the term love does not figure prominently. Most commonly Paul uses agapaō terminology (referring to love based on high regard or appreciation) for both divine and human love: agapē ("love," 75 x), agapaō ("to show love," 34 x), and agapētos ("one who is loved," 27 x). The terms eleeō ("to show compassion, mercy," 12 x) and eleos ("compassion, mercy," 10 x) apply almost exclusively to God, not humans, in Paul's usage.

A wide variety of phileō terminology is employed, though not frequently: aphilargyros ("no lover of money," 1 x), philagathos ("lover of goodness," 1 x), philadelphia ("brotherly, or familial, affection, love," 2 x), philandros ("lover of one's husband," 1 x), philanthrōpia ("love for people," 1 x), phileō ("to love, have affection for," 2 x), philēma ("kiss," 4 x), philotheos ("lover of God," 1 x), philoxenia ("hospitality," 1 x), philoxenos ("hospitable person," 2 x), philostorgos ("lover of those in close relationship," 1 x) and philoteknos ("lover of children," 1 x).

Other words expressing love include epipotheō ("to have great affection, yearning," 7 x), epipothēsis ("great affection, yearning," 2 x), epipothētos ("one who is yearned for," 1 x), epipothia ("great affection, yearning," 1 x), eusplanchnos ("compassionate person," 1 x), homeiromai ("to have great affection, yearning," 1 x) and splanchna ("compassion," "affection"; "object of compassion or affection," 8 x). A few words are used negatively, of non-Christian attitudes: astorgos ("without love or affection," 2 x), philargyria ("love of money," 1 x), philargyros ("lover of money," 1 x), philautos ("lover of oneself," 1 x) and philēdonos ("lover of pleasure," 1 x).

2. God's/Christ's Love for Us.

At the heart of Paul's understanding of the gospel* lies the saving love of God (agapē) in Christ.* The supreme expression of this undeserved love is Christ's death on the cross as a sacrifice* for sins* (Rom 5:8; Eph 2:4-5; 2 Thess 2:16; cf. Gal 2:20). When Paul speaks of God's (or Christ's) love, it is usually with reference to some aspect of the atonement or Christian salvation.* (Note: the expressions "love of God" and "love of Christ" are notoriously ambiguous. They may refer either to our love for God or Christ [objective genitive], or to God's or Christ's love for us [subjective genitive]. It is only the individual context that determines the meaning, and sometimes it is simply not possible to be sure which Paul intends: e.g., Rom 5:5; 2 Cor 5:14; 2 Thess 3:5.)

God's love is shown both in the cross and in the specific calling and choosing of believers ("In love he predestined us to be his sons through Jesus Christ," Eph 1:4-5; see Call, Calling; Election and Predestination). So when Paul speaks of Christians as the "elect" or "chosen," the idea of God's undeserved love is clearly implicit. Indeed, his discussion of predestination in Romans 9 seems to speak of God's love as exclusively for his chosen people (Rom 9:13, 15, 18, 21-24); but he does not press the logic of this point, and writes elsewhere of God's love for all people.

For Paul, having a good grasp of God's saving love in Christ is crucial. It lies at the heart of all true Christian theology and ethics, and is important for a believer's sense of security. ("Nothing can ever separate us from God's love in Christ Jesus our Lord," Rom 8:31-39). Coming to a full appreciation of this love, then, is one of his strongest desires and prayers* for his young converts (Eph 3:14-21). Indeed, the overpowering sense of Christ's love is one of the chief driving forces in Paul's own life (2 Cor 5:14-15).

3. Our Love for God/Christ.

Though implicit throughout, love for God (or Christ) remains strangely unemphasized in Paul's writings. (It is mentioned only in Rom 8:28; 1 Cor 2:9; 8:3; 16:22; Eph 6:24; 2 Tim 3:4; the phrase is ambiguous in Rom 5.5; 2 Cor 5:14; 2 Thess 3:5.) Though the second great commandment is quoted twice, the first great commandment is cited nowhere. The focus is rather on God's (or Christ's) love for us, with the emphasis on grace. The response Paul calls for is not so much one of loving God or Christ, as one of believing in Christ and loving others. The initial response is a receptive one.

This does not mean that the concept of loving God is peripheral in Paul's thinking: it is central to his Jewish heritage and clearly in line with his view of the Christian life as one of utter dedication to God. But why he speaks so little of loving God and builds so little on it remains a mystery.

4. Our Love for Others.

For Paul, loving others is the single most important characteristic of the Christian life and the heart of Christian living. Everything one does is to be an expression of love (1 Cor 16:14). More important than the charismatic gifts* that the Corinthians coveted (1 Cor 12:31—13:2), love is listed as first among the "fruit of the Spirit"* (Gal 5:22-23; much of the rest of the list could be taken as a commentary on love) and is the one grace that believers are to seek above all others (Col 3:12, 14). Paul speaks of it as the epitome and essence of the entire OT moral law (Rom 13:8-10; Gal 5.14), the one unending debt that Christians owe others. Indeed, in language most unusual for him, he even speaks of love as the "law of Christ"* (Gal 6:2), in line with Jesus' own emphasis on the law of love. As such, loving others has some bearing on one's welfare on the coming Day of Christ (Phil 1:9-10; 1 Thess 3:12-13; see Eschatology). Paul's whole concept of holy living is dominated by love.

4.1. The Theology of Love. The terms *faith and love are frequently linked in Paul's writing: together they represent a summary of his greatest theological and ethical concerns. Reference to his readers' faith in Christ and love for one another often occurs in the initial thanksgiving sections of his letters, and it suggests the importance of these two concepts in his thinking (Eph 1:15; Col 1:4; 1 Thess 1:3; 2 Thess 1:3; Philem 4-5; cf. Eph 6:23; 1 Thess 3:6; 5:8; 1 Tim 1:5, 14; 2:15; 6:11; 2 Tim 1:13; 2:22; 3:10; Tit 2:2). Paul reminds the Galatians that what really counts is not the Jewish Law* but "faith working through love" (Gal 5:6)—a phrase that perhaps comes closer than any other to summarizing his view of the Christian life.

Love represents the ethical outworking of the imputed righteousness* bestowed by grace through faith, the outward expression of new life in Christ. There is a necessary correlation, then, between faith in Christ and loving others. And just as faith spells the end of the Jewish Law in a salvific sense (Rom 10:4), so love represents the fulfilling of the Law in an ethical sense (Rom 13:10); in Paul's thinking, together the two essentially replace the focus on Law as the way of righteousness.*

4.2. The Sources of Love. Love comes through one's relationship to Jesus Christ (1 Tim 1:14; 2 Tim 1:13), by the gift of the Holy Spirit* (cf. 2 Tim 1:7). Love is possible because faith in Christ brings the believer into a whole new life, dominated no longer by sin and self-desire but by the Spirit of God. As the guarantee of the life to come (2 Cor 5:5; cf. 1:22), the Spirit effects the power of the new age in the believer's life here and now, making a form of eschatological* existence actually possible in the present. Thus, freed from the enslaving powers of sin and the Law, the believer is empowered to produce real "fruit" for God (Rom 7:4), the "fruit of righteousness" (Phil 1:11)—which for Paul is always the "fruit of the Spirit"; and the most important "fruit" is love (Gal 5:22- 23; cf. Rom 15:30; Col 1:8; 2 Tim 1:7).

For Paul, then, love is never simply a self-attained virtue; it is the result of a transformed life filled with the Spirit of God, which pours God's own love into the human heart (Rom 5:5; cf. Gal 4:6-7; Phil 1:8). Lack of love therefore calls into question the presence of the Spirit in one's life, and hence one's whole relationship to God (cf. Rom 8:1-14). The fact that Paul's encouragements to love are frequently voiced in the form of a prayer (Phil 1:9; 1 Thess 3:12; cf. 2 Thess 3:5) reflects his conviction that love, like everything good, ultimately derives from God as a gift of grace (2 Cor 8:16; 1 Thess 4:9). The key to loving is being filled with the Spirit of God (Eph 5:18).

4.3. The Motivation of Love. Sometimes Paul speaks of love as a simple command to be obeyed—indeed as the most important of all the moral commands

(Rom 13:8-10; Gal 5:14). At other times he encourages love because of the purity demanded on the coming Day of Christ (Phil 1:9-10; 1 Thess 3:12-13; see Eschatology). At still other times he appeals to the story or example of Christ (Rom 15:2-3; 1 Cor 10:31—11:1; 2 Cor 8:8-9; Eph 4:32—5:2; Phil 2:4-8; Col 3:12-14; see Imitation; see Fowl).

But above all, Paul thinks of love as a joyful response to the grace of God in Jesus Christ, motivated by one's personal relationship to the Savior.* It is not so much a matter of submitting to Jesus's teachings, or of imitating his earthly life, as of responding with a grateful heart to the ultimate expression of love in his death on the cross (Rom 12:1-2) and in obedience to him as Lord. Loving others is only the appropriate ethical response to the divine love shown in the gospel. (Even when Paul speaks of imitating Christ, the appeal is not to his earthly life but to some aspect of the sacrificial love shown in his dying.) For Paul, the whole of the Christian life is a joyful response to God's grace in the gospel: it is an expression of gratitude for Christ. Loving others is a way of saying "thank you" for divine love (cf. 2 Cor 8:1-9).

4.4. The Focus of Love. Because Paul's major concern is the welfare of the churches, his primary focus is on the expression of love within the Christian community. Though he occasionally speaks of showing kindness to those outside the fellowship (Rom 12:14, 17-21; Gal 6:10; 1 Thess 3:12; 5:15), he is much more concerned with the expression of love among Christians themselves: "Let us do good to all people, but especially to . . . the family of faith" (Gal 6:10).

Because the church* is the body of Christ (see Body of Christ), the fellowship* of God's own people and the temple* of his presence on earth, it is of supreme importance that Christians learn to live together in love. Love is what knits the diverse members of the body together in "perfect harmony" (Col 2:2; 3:14). Without love the body can neither function well nor honor Christ as it ought. The importance of this matter may be seen in Paul's repeated emphasis on love and unity (Rom 12:10, 16, 18; 14:1, 19; 15:5-6; 1 Cor 1:10; 10:16-17; 2 Cor 13:11; Gal 3:27-28; 5:22-23; 6:2; Eph 4:1-6; Phil 1:27; 2:1-4; 4:2; Col 2:2, 19; 3:12-14; 1 Thess 5:13-14) and in his constant caution against anything that would prove disruptive (Rom 12:16; 14:1-23; 16:17; 1 Cor 3:3-4; 4:6; 11:18-22; Gal 5:15, 19-21; Eph 4:25, 31; Phil 2:3-4; Col 3:8-9). As "members one of another," Christians are to care for one another (1 Cor 12:25-26) and to be concerned above all with building one another up (Rom 14:19; 15:2; 1 Cor 8:1; 14:3-5, 12, 17, 26; Eph 4:15-16; 1 Thess 5:11). The placing of Paul's classic discourse on love (1 Cor 13) in the middle of a discussion on the use of charismatic gifts for the edification of the church shows something of the role of love in his thinking. For Paul the welfare of the community is as important as that of the individual—and that is why love plays such a central role in his writings.

4.5. The Nature of Love. The characteristics of love (agapē) are spelled out by Paul in 1 Corinthians 13. Love is shown in patience and kindness—not in jealousy, pride, arrogance, rudeness, insistence, irritability, resentment, or a sense of getting even. In other words, real love is not self-centered, but is willing to sacrifice its own desires for the good of others. It is this sense of self-sacrifice for others—modeled by Christ's sacrifice for us—that lies at the heart of Paul's understanding of what real love is (cf. Wischmeyer).

That Christians are not to live for themselves but for others is a theme that runs throughout Paul's writings. Jesus, Timothy and Paul himself all serve as models of this way of life (Rom 9:3; 15:1-3; 1 Cor 9:19-22; 10:33—11:1; 2 Cor 1:6; 4:5; 6:4-6; 8:8-9; 12:15; 13:9; Gal 2:20; Phil 1:20-26; 2:4-8, 17, 19-24; Eph 4:32—5:2; Col 1:24; 1 Thess 2:9; 1 Tim 4:12). This attitude of self-sacrificing care is to be expressed even in the home (Eph 5:25-33; Col 3:19; Tit 2:4). For Paul, then, real love demands self-denial. (In contrast, the "last days" will be marked by the love of self, money and pleasure; 2 Tim 3:2-4.) The refusal to indulge in meat if it would cause others to sin is one of the strongest illustrations of the self-denial demanded by love (Rom 14:15, 20-21; 1 Cor 8:9-13; 10:23-33; see Food Offered to Idols and Jewish Food Laws; Idolatry; Strong and Weak).

One further point: for Paul love is not just a matter of doing, it is also a matter of being (cf. 1 Cor 13:3: "Even though I give away everything I have . . . but don't have love. . . ."). Loving others is not simply a matter of doing good or showing mercy* but is to spring from a sense of genuine care and compassion. It is to be real and heartfelt—merely going through the motions will not suffice. And it must be expressed with a sense of warmth and affection if it is to be truly perceived as love. The importance of this in Paul's thinking may be seen in his urging of his readers to communicate their affection for one another (Rom 12:10; 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 2:8; 13:12; 1 Thess 5:26) and in his repeated affirmation of his affection for them (1 Cor 16:24; 2 Cor 2:4; 6:11; 7:3; 11:11; 12:15; Phil 1:7-8; 4:1; 1 Thess 2:8; 3:12; Philem 9). Paul is deeply concerned that the churches know his care and affection for them; and he in turn seems to derive no little comfort from the knowledge of their love for him (2 Cor 7:6-7; 1 Thess 3:6-10). When Paul speaks of love, then, he is thinking not only of practical acts of charity but also of the heartfelt expression of care and affection—both of which are important.

4.6. The Limits of Love. Questions are sometimes raised about how consistent Paul is in living out his own ideals, especially in light of the harsh language he uses of those who oppose the gospel (Gal 1:8-9; 5:12; Phil 3:2; cf. his emphasis on gentle responses and gracious words in Rom 12:17-21; Col 4:6!). When the grace of the gospel is jeopardized, theological concerns clearly take precedence in his thinking over considerations of politeness and etiquette. For Paul, the basic tenets of the gospel simply cannot be compromised; and if a church's grasp of those is weakened, tough words and actions may be required for the sake of his readers' salvation. In other words, Paul does not conceive of love as gentleness at any price. Indeed, he insists that it is precisely out of genuine concern for their welfare (i.e., out of love) that such harsh words and confrontive actions arise (1 Cor 4:14; 2 Cor 2:4; 7:8-11; 12:19; 13:2-4, 10; Gal 2:11-14). There are clear theological and moral limits, then, to the validity of some of his statements about the form that love generally takes. When God-given norms are threatened, there are times when love does not endure all things (cf. 1 Cor 13:7), when love does insist on its own way (cf. 1 Cor 13:5), even rather strongly—if that way is identified with God's way (1 Cor 14:37-38; 2 Thess 3:14). And when the doctrine of God's grace is at stake, love does not seem to be of greater importance than faith (cf. 1 Cor 13:13). In Paul's own life, then, the expression of love is clearly conditioned by certain theological and moral considerations of critical importance; and when these are threatened, harsh words may be the truest form of love and not a violation of it (see Opponents).

See also DEATH OF CHRIST; ETHICS; FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT; GOD; MERCY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribner's, 1951, 1955); S. E. Fowl, The Story of Christ in the Ethics of Paul (JSNTS 36; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); V. P. Furnish, The Love Command in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); idem, Theology and Ethics in Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); W. Günther et al., "Love," NIDNTT 2.542-50; J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida, "Love, Affection, Compassion," in Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament: Based on Semantic Domains (New York: United Bible Societies, 1988) 1.293-96; J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1929); R. Mohrlang, Matthew and Paul: A Comparison of Ethical Perspectives (SNTSMS 48; Cambridge: University Press, 1984); H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); G. Schneider, "ἀγάπη κτλ," EDNT 1.8-12; C. Spicq, Agape in the New Testament (2 vols.; London: Herder, 1963, 1965); G. Stählin, "φιλέω κτλ," TDNT IX.114-46; E. Stauffer, "ἀγαπάω κτλ," TDNT I.21-55; O. Wischmeyer, Der höchste Weg. Das 13. Kapitel des 1 Korintherbriefes (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1981). R. Mohrlang

LOVE FEAST

The use of the term agapē ("love") to refer to a Christian meal is rare, with Jude 12 offering the only explicit reference in the NT. There is no evidence from the NT period to suggest that the love* feast was a separate meal from the Lord's Supper; rather, love feast and Lord's Supper refer to the same event (see Lord's Supper).

1. The New Testament Evidence
2. The Love Feast and the Common Meal
3. The Abuse of the Love Feast

1. The New Testament Evidence

In 1 Corinthians 11 Paul is addressing an abuse in the gathering of the local church. It is helpful, therefore, to consider a similar situation indicated in Jude, where the abuse seems to involve certain false teachers who are feasting without fear (Jude 12 NRSV), fattening and indulging themselves. Likewise in 2 Peter 2:13 we find the language of feasting (syneuōcheomai, cf. Jude 12) and reference to overt displays of opulence, suggesting riotous misbehavior during the meal. While Jude speaks of deplorable behavior during the love feasts (agapai) 2 Peter 2:13 deliberately alters the expression agapais to read apatais ("dissipation"), thereby presenting a deliberate play on words. (The textual variants at Jude 12 and 2 Pet 2:13 indicate subsequent scribal attempts at harmonization.) According to 2 Peter, this dissipation (a mockery of the love feasts) takes place in the daytime—a further indication of degeneracy (cf As. Mos. 7:4, where the godless "feast at any hour of the day").

2. The Love Feast and the Common Meal.

Early Christian churches met in houses, which, among other things, offered all that was necessary for the common meal (see Households). Based on the tradition of the Last Supper (Mk 14:17 and par.), the early Christians ate together in their house churches. The meal, or aspects of the meal (including the prayers* of thanksgiving), can be referred to by a variety of terms: "Lord's Supper" (1 Cor 11:20), "breaking of bread" (i.e., the ritual opening of the meal, Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7; cf. Lk 24:35; 1 Cor 10:16), "sharing" (koinōnia, 1 Cor 10:16 NRSV; or "participation" RSV, NIV), Eucharist, or "thanksgiving" (1 Cor 11:24, with the verb eucharisteō), and "love feast."

The separation of the meal/agapē from the Lord's Supper, or Eucharist, was made in the second century. Justin Martyr (c. 150) indicates that by his time the common meal and Eucharist (as sacrament) were separate observances. He speaks of the Eucharist without referring to a meal. Accordingly, a portion of bread accompanied by the water and wine constituted the Eucharist (Justin Martyr Apol. 1.65-66).

3. The Abuse of the Love Feast (1 Cor 11:17-34). Food and meals were prominent features in the various associations and religious, or cultic, groups of the Greco-Roman world (Klauck; see Food). The early church, unlike many of these associations, was not a homogeneous group; rather, early Christianity displayed a marked internal social and economic stratification (Theissen, 145-74; Judge, 60-62). This stratification offers some clues regarding the nature of the problems that arose in early Christian table fellowship (see Social-Scientific Approaches; Social Setting).

All we know from Paul is that the actual celebration of the Lord's Supper was linked with, and perhaps was an extension of, the so-called agapē, a common meal, which Christians in a given locality were in the habit of sharing together. Abuses of this practice occurred at Corinth, involving a discrepancy between "haves" and "have nots," which Paul was careful to set right. It cannot be determined beyond all doubt that this common meal was called hē agapē, "the love feast." But if it was so called, it was to remind all who partook that lying at the base of their fellowship was agapē, "love"—the love of God for them expressed so vividly in the broken bread, and the love of Christian for Christian as seen in their sharing the one loaf.

According to Paul, certain Corinthians "have" while others "lack": one is hungry, another drunk, some have houses, others have nothing. On the one hand there are believers who have plenty of food and drink while others have an insufficient quantity (and quality?) and go hungry. The stark difference between these two groups is dramatized at the table. To further accentuate the difference, the "haves" also have houses where, Paul suggests, they might carry on their selfish behavior if they must. Those who "lack," on the other hand, are without food and, perhaps as day laborers, may be without houses or the security of a larger household, which even slaves* might enjoy during times of austerity.

Paul does not commend the Corinthian gathering for the community meal: "when you come together it is not for the better but for the worse" (1 Cor 11:17). Apparently the abuse was sufficiently abhorrent that the divisions and factions rendered the meal merely one of many and not the Lord's Supper ("it is not really the Lord's Supper," 1 Cor 11:20). Paul's advice was candid: the wealthier Christians who arrive early should not begin eating a private meal which precedes the communal meal, but they should wait and thereby have more to share with those who have nothing. If the wealthy are insistent on gorging themselves they should do so at home (in a private meal) but not at the Lord's Supper, or agapē.

During Paul's eighteen months at Corinth (Acts 18:11) he must have established a pattern of practice for the gathering community, particularly for something as important as the Lord's Supper (including the communal meal). Given the social and economic diversity of the church, Paul would surely have addressed the issue of the rich* rubbing elbows with the poor at table. It is highly probable that a severe famine gripped the region in A.D. 51, shortly after Paul's departure. This could have precipitated the problems envisioned in 1 Corinthians 11:17-34, problems which the absent apostle was called upon to address (see Blue; the famine may lie behind the anangkē, "crisis," of 1 Cor 7:26; see Winter, 93-94).

Paul's gospel of reconciliation would have brought together people from different religious and socio-economic backgrounds to share the table of the Lord. Regardless of Greco-Roman mores, believers were instructed to share, and not to parade affluence and influence by indulging themselves while others lacked. Blatant disregard for others is not agapē but selfishness. The abuses of the meal were a byproduct of a breakdown of koinōnia; humiliating to those who had nothing and contemptible to Paul.

See also CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; LORD'S SUPPER; RICHES AND POVERTY; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC 50; Waco: Word, 1983); B. B. Blue, "The House Church at Corinth and the Lord's Supper: Famine, Food Supply, and the Present Distress," CTR 5 (1991) 221-39; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (London: SCM, 1966); E. A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century: Some Prolegomena to the Study of the New Testament Ideas of Social Obligation (London: Tyndale, 1960); H.-J. Klauck, Herrenmahl und hellenistischer Kult: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum ersten Korinthbrief (NTAbh 15; 2d. ed.; Münster: Aschendorff, 1982); I. H. Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Chirstianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadephia: Fortress, 1982); B. Winter, "Secular and Christian Responses to Corinthian Famines," TynB 40 (1989) 86-106. B. B. Blue

M

MAGIC

Belief in gods, demons,* spirits and various other forms of supernatural powers was a prominent characteristic of the first-century A.D. worldview. Through the widespread practice of magic, one could find protection from this realm and even control it. People who became Christians and joined the early Christian churches would have been tempted to bring their magical beliefs and practices with them, as we see in the Acts account of an incident in Ephesus* (Acts 19:18-19). These people needed perspective on their past and a changed attitude toward it in the light of Paul's interpretation of the gospel.*

1. Definition of Magic
2. Sources
3. Magic and the Spirit World
4. The Uses for Magic
5. Jewish Magic
6. Paul and Magic in Acts
7. Paul and Magic in the Letters

1. Definition of Magic.

In the world of Paul's time, magic was not a form of entertainment consisting of the skilled use of illusory tricks. It was far more serious and corresponds closely with what we might today call sorcery, witchcraft or the occult.

Magic was based on the belief in supernatural powers which could be harnessed and used by appropriating the correct technique. Magic can therefore be defined as a method of manipulating supernatural powers to accomplish certain tasks with guaranteed results. Magicians would not seek the will of the deity in a matter, but would invoke the deity to do precisely as they stated.

There is also a sociological aspect to the definition of magic. Magic was illegal in the Roman Empire and regarded as socially deviant, outside the boundaries of acceptable religious practice. Accusing another person or group of practicing magic was a powerful tool of social dominance in the ancient world. Although the motives of those who accused people of magic and witchcraft need to be evaluated carefully, the sociological definition of magic by no means exhausts its definition (see Betz 1990, 212-19; pace Segal). Magic was characterized by a set of objective characteristics and its own positive self-definition.

2. Sources.

The most important witnesses for our understanding of magical beliefs and practice are a collection of Greek papyri originally discovered in Egypt (abbreviated PGM). These have recently been translated into English (see Betz 1986). Most of these papyri date to the third and fourth centuries of our era (although a few date as early as the first century B.C.), but the contents reflect the way magic was practiced during Paul's time and earlier (Luck, 14, 16).

Hundreds of lead curse tablets (defixiones) have also been unearthed from throughout the Mediterranean world by archeologists. The tablets using the Greek language date between the fifth century B.C. and the sixth century A.D. and contain formulae similar to the papyri. In addition, numerous magical amulets have been discovered which shed much light on magical practices. Our understanding of magic is also enhanced by the many Greek and Roman authors who describe the practice (see Luck, 3-131).

3. Magic and the Spirit World.

The wearing of amulets, recitation of magical formulas and performance of magical rites were carried out in the belief that these words and actions could exert a compelling influence over one or more spirits. Practitioners would try to "conjure" (orkizō) well-known deities (e.g., Mithras, Isis, Helios), but more often the "angels"* (angeloi) or "assistants" (paredroi) of the gods. Note the following magical formula in a recipe that reputedly "accomplishes anything":

> I call upon you, holy, very powerful . . . assistants of the great god, the powerful chief daimons, you who are inhabitants of Chaos, of Erebos, of the abyss . . . dwelling in the recesses of heaven, lurking in the nooks and crannies of houses . . . lead> ers of those in the underworld, administrators of the infinite, wielding power over earth . . . lords of Fate . . . adverse daimons . . . rulers of daimons . . . do the matter [which I demand]. (PGM IV.1345-75)

This formula is to be recited after performing an elaborate rite using, among other things, some fat and hairs from an ass, a female goat and a black bull. The person who performed the rite and uttered the formula would expect the spirits to fulfill the demand if the recipe was followed in precise detail.

Magic also drew on nonpersonal powers and forces for its purposes. It assumed the principle of cosmic sympathy—that the microcosm is bound to the macrocosm in a system of correspondences. What affects one part affects the other in this integrated whole of life forces. The magician would therefore make use of animal viscera, plants, herbs, precious stones and metals, believing that there was a cosmic correspondence. Even the seven vowels in the Greek alphabet had their cosmic counterpart in the seven planetary deities.

4. The Uses for Magic.

People who used magic sought self-serving aims. There are no extant examples of people using magic to accomplish the will of a deity. Rather, magic was used precisely to influence the will of a deity or spirit.

4.1. Protection. One of the primary uses of magic in everyday life was for protection. In a world thought to be populated by hordes of evil spirits bent on bringing harm in every conceivable way, people sought supernatural protection. This was perhaps the chief use of the magical amulets, which frequently bore the inscription "protect me!" Many recipes for constructing these kinds of amulets appear in the magical papyri as, for example, the following:

> The protective charm which you must wear: Onto lime wood write with vermilion this name "[50 Greek letters] Guard me from every daimon of the air on the earth and under the earth, and from every angel and phantom and ghostly visitation and enchantment, me [space for name]." Enclose it in a purple skin, hang it around your neck and wear it. (PGM IV.2694-2704)

This text vividly illustrates the fear of evil spirits from which people sought relief.

4.2. Altering Fate. In Paul's day many in the Mediterranean world were convinced that the course of their lives was directly affected by the alignment of the stars in the heavens at their time of birth. This reflected the principle of cosmic sympathy and represented the basis for astrology. In the worldview of the masses, however, the stars either embodied or represented personal powers (see Worship). Thus, the names of deities were given to the sun, moon, planets and stars. Magical practitioners believed that a foul fate could be altered by influencing these astral deities through the appropriate magical formula. Also through magical means, a prominent deity could be invoked to thwart the grip of fate. For example, in one text Sarapis is invoked for this purpose:

> I call on you, lord, holy, much hymned, greatly honored, ruler of the cosmos (kosmokratōr), [Sarapis] consider my birth and turn me not away. . . . Protect me from all my own astrological destiny; destroy my foul fate; apportion good things for me in my horoscope." (PGM XIII.618-40)

4.3. Other Uses. Magic was also used for less honorable purposes. Spirits could be invoked to compel the physical attraction of another person (aphrodisiacs), to gain favor and influence with people, to heal various kinds of illnesses (see Healing, Illness) and to gain an appearance from a deity who could reveal special knowledge. There was also a malevolent kind of magic, represented especially by the curse tablets (defixiones). This form of magic sought to inflict pain and harm on opponents and enemies.

5. Jewish Magic.

Magic was by no means practiced only by pagans. Jewish magic flourished in antiquity (Alexander, 342). There are many testimonies to Jewish involvement in magical practice in the apocrypha, pseudepigrapha, Qumran, Josephus, the earliest traditions within the Talmud and the midrashim, early Christian writings, pagan authors and even in the NT itself (Acts 19:13-20, "certain itinerant Jewish exorcists"). The Greek magical papyri also contain many magical formulas of probable Jewish origin.

An interesting example of Jewish magic is the Testament of Solomon (first to third centuries A.D.). Essentially a manual of magical formulas, the Testament ostensibly records how Solomon directed demons to build the Temple at Jerusalem by manipulating them through magical means. Another important early Jewish book of magic, translated into English and published under the title Sepher ha-Razim ("Book of Mysteries"), probably comes from the fourth century A.D. However, the book likely contains traditions and reflects the magical practices of certain segments of Judaism dating to the first century A.D. The work describes the seven heavens and gives the names of the angels populating each of the heavens. Within this framework are numerous magical formulas instructing how the angels can be invoked to fulfill the desires of the conjurer. Although the angels appear to take the place of pagan gods (in comparison with pagan magical texts), there are a few examples of invocations directly to the pagan deities (e.g., Helios, Aphrodite, Hermes).

Speaking of the various Jewish magical texts, P. S. Alexander concludes that, "As an indicator of the spiritual atmosphere in which large sections of the populace lived—rich and poor, educated and ignorant—their importance can hardly be overestimated" (Alexander, 342).

6. Paul and Magic in Acts.

Luke records one incident in which Paul was confronted with a magician (Acts 13:4-12). This magician was Jewish and yet was attached to the Gentile proconsul of the Island of Cyprus. Paul encountered him on the island at the outset of his first missionary outreach. When the proconsul showed interest in the gospel which Paul preached, Elymas (the magician) strongly opposed Paul. According to Luke, Paul denounced Elymas as a pawn of the devil and the Lord immediately struck the magician with blindness.

Acts recounts another dramatic episode that occurred during Paul's Ephesian ministry (Acts 19:13-20; see Ephesus). Luke narrates a situation involving itinerant Jewish exorcists who invoked the name of Jesus as part of their magical rite for exorcism (see Demons and Exorcism). On one occasion they were tragically unsuccessful as they applied this method to a demonized man. Luke says they were physically assaulted by the man and forced to flee the house naked and bleeding. As word spread among Christians about this incident, those who continued to practice magic came under strong conviction. Gathering all of their expensive books of magical formulas and incantations, they burned them. This account reinforces the reputation of Ephesus as being something of a center for magical practices during the first century. It is also important for understanding the pre-Christian background of many of Paul's converts. Early Christians faced a strong temptation to combine their magical beliefs and practices with their Christianity. It is clear that Luke regards magic as evil and the domain of the devil (see Garrett, 101-9). In this respect, he also accurately reflects the convictions of Paul.

7. Paul and Magic in the Letters.

Very little has been written on the theme of magic in relation to Paul's letters. This is probably due to the fact that he explicitly mentions it only once (Gal 5:20) in his undisputed letters. Furthermore, his theology betrays nothing of a magical worldview.

7.1. "Witchcraft" (Gal 5:20). If Galatians 5:20 is any indication of Paul's overall attitude toward magic, we can conclude that he believed it to be inconsistent with life in the Spirit. He roundly condemns "magic" (pharmakeia) in Galatians 5:20 as on the same level as idolatry; both are acts of the "flesh"* which should have no part in the life of a believer (cf. Rev 21:8 where it is said that those who practice magic will experience the "second death").

7.2. "Magicians" (2 Tim 3:13). The text of 2 Timothy 3:13 predicts that "evil men and impostors [goētes] will go from bad to worse, deceiving and being deceived" (NIV). The term goēs is commonly used in literature as a derogatory reference to a magician—a person who is a charlatan or a swindler. Although it is possible that 2 Timothy 3:13 uses the term in a general sense, it is more likely that a magician is in mind, perhaps of the same sort as Apollonius of Tyana (Philostratus Vit. Ap.). This interpretation is rendered more likely because the deceivers are compared in 2 Timothy 3:8 with magicians who opposed Moses (Jannes and Jambres). Here again, the practice of magic is viewed in the worst possible light.

7.3. Principalities and Powers. Practitioners of magic were obsessively interested in supernatural powers for utilitarian reasons. Paul's letters, especially Colossians* and Ephesians,* provide his readers with a new outlook on the spirit realm (see Principalities and Powers). Paul never denies the real existence of evil spirits (but cf. 1 Cor 8:4); rather he is careful to describe them as minions under the control of the prince of evil, Satan* (e.g., Eph 2:2). Most importantly, Christ has defeated all these forces by his work on the cross (Col 2:15; see Triumph) and is now exalted far above them to a position of sovereignty (Eph 1:20-22; see Exaltation and Enthronement). Nevertheless, the powers still exert their influence and are hostile to the church. Christ's parousia will bring an end to their tyranny over the world (1 Cor 15:24; Eph 1:10; Col 1:20). Because of their dangerous hostility to the church, these powers are not to be invoked or manipulated by Christians, but rather resisted through the power* of God (Eph 6:10-20).

The terms Paul uses for the powers reflect the wide array of vocabulary shared by people of all religious traditions during the NT era. Some of these terms are used in magical texts (e.g., dynameis, kosmokratores, thronoi), although his vocabulary for the powers more closely reflects the angelology and demonology of Second Temple Judaism. Paul draws on this reservoir of terminology with which his readers would be familiar, lumping together all manner of spirits, when he speaks of the supernatural realm of evil (see Principalities and Powers).

7.4. The "Elemental Spirits." It is possible that Paul's terminology for "elemental spirits of the world" (stoicheia tou kosmou, Gal 4:3, 9; Col 2:8, 20) comes from a background of usage in astrology and magic (of course, it is also possible that the meaning "elementary principles" is more appropriate to these contexts; see Elements/Elemental Spirits). The expression appears, for instance, in the astrological section of the Testament of Solomon (T. Sol. 18:1, 2; cf. also 8:1-4), a portion that probably had an independent existence and use as early as the first century B.C. It is used there to refer to the astral decans, thirty-six spirits controlling every ten degrees of the heavenly sphere. The expression is used similarly in the magical papyri (PGM 39.18-21). If Paul was drawing the phrase stoicheia tou kosmou from the tradition represented in this literature, he did so strictly because it was part of the wide array of vocabulary shared by Jew and Gentile alike to refer to the spirit world. In this case he may have chosen this particular expression for the powers because it was well known to the readers of Galatians* and Colossians.* Paul does not necessarily give credence to the notion that astral spirits hold the keys of fate; rather, he is more concerned to subsume them under the category of the demonic and assert that by participation in Christ's death, believers have died to their enslaving influence (see Dying and Rising).

7.5. Addressing a Magical Worldview (Ephesians). Many aspects of the teaching of Ephesians about divine power and supernatural spirits seem particularly appropriate for people who have come to Christ from a background of involvement in magical practices (Arnold 1989, esp. 167-72). That such people were entering the churches is certain because of the widespread use of magic at the time. This is corroborated by Luke's account of the burning of the magical books at Ephesus (Acts 19:18-19), which is especially relevant for understanding the struggles of the Asia Minor churches.

In Ephesians Paul declares the superiority of the power* of God and the supremacy of Christ over all spiritual powers, indeed, over "every name that is named" (Eph 1:19-23; 4:8-10). For those who lived in constant fear of the dreadful workings of evil spirits, this would have provided much comfort. Fate is not in the hands of capricious powers, but rather is determined by the loving Father who "chose us in him before the creation of the world" (Eph 1:3). The will and purpose of this benevolent heavenly Father is being worked out in history (Eph 1:5, 9, 10, 11; 2:10); he is not a deity to be manipulated according to one's carnal whims. One approaches God with humility and thankfulness and prays according to his will (Eph 3:14-19; cf. 1:15-19). In contrast to the self-serving attempts to use divine power in magic, Ephesians stresses the believer's reception of divine power to manifest love* to other people in a selfless manner (Eph 3:16-17; 5:2). The letter also gives a new perspective on the powers by highlighting their collusion with the devil and exposing their objective of attacking the church (Eph 2:2; 4:27; 6:12). Ephesians assures believers of the availability of God's power for resisting these forces. God's power, according to Paul, is not obtained through incantations and formulae, but by virtue of a close union with the resurrected Christ (Eph 2:5-6; 6:10).

See also DEMONS AND EXORCISM; ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD; EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SATAN, DEVIL; TRIUMPH; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, "Incantations and Books of Magic," in The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Goodman (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1986) 3.1.342-79; C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989); idem, Powers of Darkness (Downers Grove, IL: IVP, 1992); D. Aune, "Magic in Early Christianity," ANRW II.23.2 (1980) 1507-57; H. D. Betz, ed., The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation, vol. 1: Text (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1986); idem, "Magic and Mystery in the Greek Magical Papyri," in Hellenismus und Urchristentum: Gesammelte Aufsätze I (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990) 209-29; C. A. Faraone and D. Obbink, eds., Magika Hiera: Ancient Greek Magic and Religion (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, vol. 2 The Archaeological Evidence from the Diaspora (BS 37; New York: Bollingen Foundation, 1953); T. Hopfner, Griechisch-Ägyptischer Offenbarungszauber (SPP 21; Amsterdam: Adolf M. Hakkert, 1974 [= Leipzig: Haessel, 1921]); G. Luck, Arcana Mundi (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1985); A. Segal, "Hellenistic Magic: Some Questions of Definition," in The Other Judaism of Late Antiquity (BJS 127; Atlanta: Scholar's, 1987) 79-108; E. M. Yamauchi, "Magic in the Biblical World," TynB 34 (1983) 169-200.

C. E. Arnold

MAN AND WOMAN

No NT writer has been more criticized for his allegedly negative portrayal of women than the apostle Paul. Although Paul's view that "There is neither male nor female in Christ" (Gal 3:28) has been hailed as revolutionary, he has been viewed conversely as merely a child of his culture in other texts in which he appears to subordinate or denigrate women (e.g., 1 Cor 14:34-35). Whether Paul merely reflects his culture's views of women or significantly differs from them (positively or negatively) can only be determined by examining some of the most debated Pauline passages in light of his culture.

1. Paul and Men's and Women's Roles in General
2. Paul and Women's Head Coverings
3. Paul and Wives' Submission
4. Paul and Women's Ministry

1. Paul and Men's and Women's Roles in General. Paul's letters are occasional letters, that is, they were occasioned by specific circumstances and thus address certain situations as responses to them. Paul's earlier letters (mainly those undisputedly attributed to him) do not deal specifically with women, men or marriage* very frequently, but the topic does come up, especially in 1 Corinthians 7.

In 1 Corinthians 7 Paul addresses Christians who, like a few groups in their culture, have come to value the single lifestyle; their view, however, has created certain complications. One complication is that some of those valuing the single lifestyle are already married, and their pursual of celibacy within marriage provides a danger of sexual temptation to their spouses and possibly themselves as well (1 Cor 7:2, 5; cf. 1 Cor 7:9). Paul may be citing a Corinthian position in 1 Corinthians 7:1, but in 1 Corinthians 7:2-5 Paul's language is quite sensitive to hearers of both genders: he addresses both husbands and wives on equal terms. Jewish marriage contracts stipulated certain duties required of husbands and wives, but Paul focuses on one duty relevant here, intercourse. What is significant is that it is not simply a duty for husbands, as in some Jewish texts; it is a reciprocal duty (1 Cor 7:3-4). Both the Jewish contracts and Paul show special sensitivity for the wife's feelings in this matter, however, quite in contrast with Greek culture's emphasis on male sexual gratification (Keener 1991, 67-82).

Another complication of their lifestyle is that some Christians now wanted to divorce, either due to lack of sexual fulfillment or, more likely, to pursue a celibate lifestyle (or, like Cynic philosophers, a lifestyle free of the encumbrance of marriage, yet not of sexual relations; cf. 1 Cor 6:12-20). In response Paul cites a saying of Jesus: divorce is not permissible (1 Cor 7:10-11; cf. Mk 10:11-12). Having appealed to Jesus' prohibition of divorce, however, Paul goes on to qualify it, without in any sense feeling that he is challenging its authority; it was widely understood that general statements of principle needed to be qualified in certain situations (especially since Jesus' Jewish teaching style often included hyperbole, i.e., rhetorical overstatement; see Keener 1991, 13-28). It is true that the believer is not allowed to initiate the breakup of his or her marriage; if, however, the believer is forced into the situation (Paul's example here covers abandonment and being divorced against one's will; either spouse could unilaterally divorce the other under Roman law), the believer is "not under bondage" (1 Cor 7:15), for there is no guarantee of the unbeliever's conversion (1 Cor 7:16).

Paul's "not under bondage" echoes the exact language of Jewish divorce contracts, meaning that the person's divorce was valid and they were "free" to remarry (see Keener 1991, 50-66). To read "not under bondage" as anything other than freedom to remarry is to ignore how all first-century Jewish readers would have understood it (not to mention ignoring the synonym in 1 Cor 7:27, 39). Throughout this initial discussion on divorce, Paul is careful to maintain his balance of inclusive language, involving husband and wife equally in spiritual responsibility and freedom.*

After exhorting his readers that it is better to remain in their present state (i.e., he prefers remaining single, and more strongly advocates avoiding divorce; cf. 1 Cor 7:17-24), he explains that virgins are probably better off remaining single (1 Cor 7:25-38), although he acknowledges that this is only better for those who are fit for it (1 Cor 7:36; cf. 1 Cor 7:9). In this context he again returns momentarily to the issue of divorce. Digressions were common in antiquity in general and Paul in particular, and the flow of thought in the immediate context leaves no doubt that 1 Corinthians 7:27-28 refers to divorce: "Are you married to a wife? Do not seek a divorce. Are you divorced (the same Greek word as in the preceding line) from a wife? Do not seek to be married again. But if you do remarry, you have not sinned; and the same is true for one who has not been married before." Here Paul's language is temporarily less inclusive, but his point is meant to cover both genders: by 1 Corinthians 7:32-34, he values the spiritual devotion of men and women equally.

1 Corinthians 7:36-38 may be relevant to our discussion if it refers to parentally arranged marriages, as is likely; but scholars are almost evenly divided as to whether a virgin's father or fiancé is addressed here. If the former is in view, Paul simply addresses the father in the cultural situation which then prevailed: parents arranged their children's marriages, usually with input from the children. If the latter is in view, we have no earlier cultural parallels to the situation addressed here. On either reading, however, Paul apparently suggests sensitivity to the girl's wishes (1 Cor 7:36).

We must now turn to the more specific questions of head coverings, and authority relationships in marriage and in the church, the most frequent issues of debate concerning women's roles in Paul.

2. Paul and Women's Head Coverings.

Some commentators have managed to deny Pauline authorship to nearly all the controversial passages in Paul concerning women, but the textual evidence for this attempt in 1 Corinthians 11:2-16 is so weak that few scholars support it; most writers have concerned themselves instead with the more rigorous task of understanding the text. The text clearly refers to a custom of women covering their heads, at least in worship*; often a shawl (covering only the hair) was employed for this, but in some places face-veils were also used. There are so many contexts in which head coverings were used, however, that one must question which context Paul addresses. For instance, people covered their heads due to mourning or shame; but since this practice was used for both men and women, it is unlikely that Paul has this practice directly in view.

Although Greek women had traditionally been secluded in the home to a great extent, there is not much evidence for frequent head coverings among them in this period, certainly not among the well-to-do. East of Greece, however, the custom was prevalent, including in Palestine and southern Roman Asia (e.g., Tarsus; see MacMullen); further, Roman women (like Roman men) covered their heads in worship, in contrast to Greek women and men. The Corinthian church, located near a major port and born in a synagogue (Acts 18:4, 7-8), probably included a number of Eastern immigrants for whom the covering was an important practice. Evidence from Egypt indicates that many Jewish women covered their heads outside Palestine, even if they were Hellenized in many other respects (Philo; Joseph and Asenath). But more is probably involved than merely a clash of cultural icons; the head covering was a cultural issue, but it symbolized certain values that went deeper than the symbol itself.

Women's hair was a prime object of male lust in the ancient Mediterranean world (Apuleius Met. 2.8-9; Sifre Num. 11.2.3); societies which employed head coverings thus viewed uncovered married women as unfaithful to their husbands, that is, seeking another man (cf. m. Ket. 7:6; virgins and prostitutes, conversely, were expected not to cover their heads, since they were looking for men). Women who covered their heads could thus view uncovered women as a threat; uncovered women, however, undoubtedly viewed the covering custom as restrictive and saw the way they dressed their hair as their own business. Significantly, the uncovered women probably include the cultured women of higher status, whose family homes hosted most of the house churches. Statues show that well-to-do women pursued fashionable hairstyles and uncovered heads, styles that poorer women probably considered seductive. Given the class conflict in the Corinthian church evident from other passages in 1 Corinthians (e.g., 1 Cor 11:21-22; see Theissen), this would easily have flared into a major issue of controversy (see Keener 1992, 22-31; cf. Thompson)

Both the Book of Acts and Paul's own letters present him as a skilled debater, conversant in the logic and rhetoric* of his culture. In ancient rhetoric, one's arguments for a position need not be the same as the reasons for which one actually held the position. Paul's purpose in advising head coverings may have been the unity of the church, but his arguments are those which would work best to persuade his readers. He proposes four main arguments for his position: family values, the creation order, the example of nature and of propriety as dictated by custom.

First, Paul argues from family values and a pun (plays on words were common in ancient argumentation, both Jewish and Greek): the husband is the wife's head, so if she dishonors her head by uncovering it in a culture where that is dishonorable, she dishonors her husband (1 Cor 11:2-6). By drawing an analogy between uncovered and shaven heads (this is the rhetorical technique reductio ad absurdum: Paul says, "If you want to be uncovered, why don't you go all the way with it?"), Paul reinforces this sense of shame; when a woman's hair was cut short or shaved, it was a great dishonor and symbolized the loss of her femininity.

Although Paul is arguing from a play on words, modern interpreters have often fastened on the single word head (Gk kephalē) and debated what Paul meant when he called the husband the wife's "head." Some scholars have argued that the term means "authority" or "boss"; the Hebrew for "head" (rō'š) could mean this, and occasionally kephalē means this in the Septuagint (Grudem; Fitzmyer). Other scholars have disputed this meaning, noting that the translators usually bent over backward to avoid translating the Hebrew rō'š with the Greek term kephalē; kephalē does not normally mean "authority" or "boss" in Greek. These latter scholars often argue for the meaning "source," which it does mean in some texts (Mickelsen in Mickelsen, 97-117; Scroggs, 284). Scholars favoring the "authority" meaning, however, respond that "source" is an even rarer meaning of kephalē in the Septuagint than "authority." Both groups of scholars are undoubtedly right in what they affirm but may fall short in what they deny; the term sometimes means "source" and sometimes means "authority," at least in "Jewish Greek" influenced by the rhythms of the Septuagint.

The question is, what sense should be attributed to the term in 1 Corinthians 11:3? Given the allusion to Adam as Eve's source in 1 Corinthians 11:8, it is very likely that Paul speaks of the man (Adam) as his wife's "source," just as Christ had created Adam and later proceeded from the Father in his incarnation (in which case 1 Cor 11:3 is in chronological sequence; see Bilezikian, 138). (In Eph 5:23, by contrast, the wife is to submit to her husband as her "head," i.e., one in authority* over her [although the husband is simultaneously expected to define headship in terms of his sacrificial service for his wife]. Even Ephesians 5, however, does not give us a transcultural view of the husband's authority; the husband's authority in this passage reflects the status of women in a society where they were already subordinate to their husbands, and modifies it in a more progressive direction. See our discussion of this passage below.)

Secondly, Paul argues from the creation order (1 Cor 11:7-12); essentially Paul says, "Adam was created before Eve, therefore women should wear head coverings." This argument does not work well on modern logic, but undoubtedly made the point admirably to the Corinthians. Although Paul knew from Genesis 1:26-27 that man and woman together represented God's image* (cf. Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18), he points out that woman, taken from man, also reflects man's glory (1 Cor 11:7) and therefore can distract men from worship; this may relate to the danger of typical male lust in that culture. But once Paul has made his argument from the creation order, he takes it back: it is true that woman comes from man, but it is also true that men come from women; both are really dependent on one another in the Lord* (1 Cor 11:11-12). Although Paul only needs woman's derivation from man to support his point, he qualifies his argument so that no one will press more meaning into it than he himself intends: he uses this only as an ad hoc argument for head coverings, not for everything one might extrapolate from it.

Paul concludes argument two with an allusion so brief that it has generated a considerable variety of interpretations: "Therefore it is proper for a woman to exercise authority over her head [not, to have authority 'on' her head, as in many translations; see Hooker], because of the angels" (1 Cor 11:10). The angels* may be (1) lusting angels, as in the most common Jewish interpretation of Genesis 6:2 (cf. also 2 Pet 2:4; Jude 6; probably 1 Pet 3:19-22), although Paul presumably would have made more of these angels here and elsewhere in his writings had he believed them a current threat; (2) angels who were present for worship, as witnessed in texts from Qumran,* who might be offended by a breach of propriety that culturally signified disregard for one's family's honor; or (3) angels who ruled the nations, but which Christians would someday judge; in this case, Paul is exhorting the women to recognize their authority over their heads but to use it responsibly (cf. 1 Cor 6:3). In any case, the Greek construction indicates that Paul recognizes the woman's authority over her head; he reasons with her to cover it for the sake of propriety, but his argument is no more forceful than this.

Third, Paul argues from nature, that is, from the natural order of things (1 Cor 11:13-15). Stoics normally argued from nature, and other writers often joined them. Paul may here be arguing from current Greek and Roman custom (other peoples in Paul's day and Greeks in an earlier period wore their hair long), although "nature" usually means something stronger than this; or he may be arguing that women's hair naturally grows longer than men's.

Finally, Paul employs a classic argument of both early Jewish and other Greco-Roman rhetoric: "That's just the way things are done" (1 Cor 11:16). One group of philosophers,* called the Skeptics, only accepted arguments from custom; most other thinkers accepted this as a supporting argument. With arguments that related to all his readers (those influenced by Jewish, Stoic and perhaps some Skeptic thought), Paul concludes with an argument related to his real purpose for writing the arguments: to avoid contention (cf. Keener 1992, 31-47, for further documentation for this section).

A few points are clear here. One is that Paul engages the issues with which his congregation is struggling, including gender issues from the culture. He also upholds the importance of the Christian family and church unity; further, while providing arguments for propriety of dress to keep the church unified, he seeks to persuade the woman who hears his letter read in the church to keep these arguments in mind without questioning her right to dress as she will (1 Cor 11:10), a far cry from stronger arguments elsewhere in the letter (1 Cor 4:18—5:5; 11:29-34). Perhaps most significant for our discussion, however, is what he omits: Paul nowhere in this text subordinates the woman, failing even to touch on that issue.

3. Paul and Wives' Submission.

Although several Pauline passages address the subordination of women in the home (Eph 5:22-33; Col 3:18; 1 Tim 5:14; Tit 2:4-5), we will examine in detail only the longest of these passages, since all four share the same cultural milieu, and the two references in the Pastorals may reflect the social situation depicted in our treatment of 1 Timothy 2:9-15, below. (That the social situation influences the directives is clear from a sample comparison of, say, 1 Tim 5:14 and Prov 31:10-31.)

3.1. The Social Situation. Before examining Paul's meaning in Ephesians 5:22-33, we should note that even the most restrictive interpretation of this passage would portray Paul as no more conservative than his culture in general. Although women were experiencing some upward mobility in this period (anything would have been an improvement over classical Athens!), and women in some areas (e.g., urban Roman Asia and Macedonia) experienced more freedom than in other areas, women nowhere enjoyed the social freedom recognized as their right today.

Influential ancient male attitudes toward women often sound harsh to modern ears; to some early Jewish teachers, women were inherently evil (cf. Sir 42:12-14; m. 'Abot 2:7); Josephus claimed that the Law prescribed their subordination for their own good (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.24 §§200-201). Philo complains that women have little sense (Philo Omn. Prob. Lib. 117), and praises one exception, the Empress Livia, for becoming "intellectually male"! Likewise, Plutarch, one of the more progressive writers on the subject, positively suggests that women can learn philosophy from their husbands—but negatively bases this on the datum that they will pursue folly if left to their own devices (Plutarch Bride and Groom 48; Mor. 145DE). Such attitudes naturally affected their treatment in ancient households, where men always held the power. Roman law vested complete authority over wife, children and slaves* to the male head of the household, known as the paterfamilias. The wife's quiet submission was viewed as one of her greatest virtues throughout Greco-Roman antiquity (e.g., Sir 26:14-16, 30:19; Greek marriage contracts).

Perhaps due to the proliferation of female infanticide (this detail is debated), there seems to have been a shortage of women in Greek society, and the marriage of men in their thirties to girls in their early and mid teens was thus a standard practice. Until their thirties men normally had intercourse with slaves, prostitutes or one another (see Homosexuality); when men in classical Athens married, many of them found their wives (just entering puberty) less intellectually challenging than prostitutes. While the situation was not this dismal throughout the Empire of Paul's day, and tomb inscriptions testify to an abundance of genuine love between husbands and wives, the very structures of ancient society militated against husbands perceiving their wives as potential equals.

From the time of Aristotle, in fact, it had been customary for moral philosophers to advise their male readers how to govern wives and other members of the household* properly; these instructions have come to be known as "household codes" (or in their German title common in scholarly literature, the Haustafeln). Aristotle and many subsequent moralists classified the three main categories subordinate to the male householder as (1) wives, (2) children and (3) slaves (Aristotle Pol. 1.2.1, 1253b); although he allowed that the character of their subordination differed (male children, for instance, required less subordination as they grew older; cf. Aristotle Pol. 1.5.12, 1260b), he argued that their subordination was a matter of their nature, not merely of culture (on women, Aristotle Pol. 1.2.12, 1254b). Such moral themes appealed to the Romans, whose culture emphasized duty and order, and who were suspicious of any potential threats to their social order (e.g., the socially disruptive cult of Dionysus in the second century B.C.).

In the first and early second century, many aristocratic Romans (e.g., Petronius, Juvenal) found reason to disparage religious groups from the East, especially when these groups converted Roman women and subverted traditional Roman values. In the first century major scandals concerning women misled by Jews and followers of Isis in Rome led to severe reprisals from the government (Tacitus Ann. 2.85; Josephus Ant. 18.3.4 §§64-80). To prove that they were not subversive to traditional Roman family values after all, suspected groups often produced their own sets of "household codes" modeled after those of the moral philosophers: instructions as to how each householder should govern his wife, children and slaves (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.25-31 §§201-17; see Balch for a thorough treatment of household codes from Aristotle through Josephus).

3.2. Ephesians 5:22-33. Some scholars have argued that the original Paul (as reflected in Rom 16:3-15; Phil 4:2-3) preserved Jesus' spirit of egalitarianism, but the second and third generations of his disciples (reflected in Colossians* and Ephesians,* and the Pastorals,* respectively) increasingly subordinated women's roles to fit the standards of their culture. While such a view has some evidence to support it, it rests on two hypotheses requiring proof: first, that the later canonical Pauline writings are not genuine; and second, a particular reading of these later letters. The question of these letters' authenticity is examined elsewhere in this volume (see Canon); the question of their meaning, however, is examined here. The text of Ephesians itself actually does not support the contention that its writer has become more chauvinistic than the Paul of the earlier letters.

Assuming that Ephesians is written by Paul, it is written by a prisoner in Rome well aware of Roman attitudes toward "Eastern cults" like worshipers of Isis and Dionysus, plus Judaism in both its Christian and non-Christian forms (what we today call Christianity and Judaism, respectively). Paul is also well aware that the social ostracism Jews and Christians often faced could become much worse if the outcome of his own trial set a negative precedent for Christians elsewhere (cf. Phil 1:7, addressed to a congregation that includes some Roman citizens like himself). Like representatives of other mistrusted religious groups in the Roman Empire, Paul had good strategic reason to uphold traditional Roman family values.

At first sight, it may appear that Paul has done just that. Given the social situation, it is hardly surprising that Paul presents household codes in their familiar three basic categories: relations between wives and husbands, children and fathers, and slaves and masters. But contrary to our expectations, Paul significantly adapts the list. Yes, wives, children and slaves are to submit, and thus to silence cultural objections to the gospel (submission here is "for the Lord's sake," Eph 5:21; 6:5-8). But for Paul a truly Christian ethic compatible with Jesus' teaching and example of servanthood goes beyond this: the male householder is also to submit. That Paul requires this of the paterfamilias is implied in a number of ways, and the distinction between his view and the more usual ancient injunction that the householder govern should have been clear to ancient readers.

First, Paul begins this three-part structure in a very unusual way. As the climax of his exhortations describing a Spirit*-filled life (Eph 5:18-21), Paul calls on all believers to submit to one another (Eph 5:21). It is true that the following context delineates different ways to submit according to differing societal roles; but the very idea of "mutual submission" strained the common sense of the term "submission": householders were sometimes called to be sensitive to their wives, children and slaves, but they were never told to submit to them. That Paul envisions the same sort of mutual submission to cover the slave and master relationship is clear from his exhortation in Ephesians 6:9: after explaining how and why slaves should submit (Eph 6:5-8), he calls on masters to "do the same things to them," an idea which, if pressed literally, goes beyond virtually all other extant writers from antiquity.

Second, the duties are listed as reciprocal duties. Whereas most household codes simply addressed the head of the household, instructing him how to govern other members of his household, Paul first addresses wives, children and slaves. Far from instructing the paterfamilias how to govern his wife, children and slaves, he omits any injunction to govern and merely calls on him to love his wife (undoubtedly a common practice, but rarely prescribed), be restrained in disciplining his children and to regard slaves as equals before God.* This is hardly the language of the common household code, although some ancient philosophers also exhorted moderation and fair treatment of subordinates. The wife, children and slaves are to regulate their own submission voluntarily.

Third, Paul does not describe the duties that are attached to submission. An ancient reader could therefore have been tempted to read a wife's submission as meaning all that it could mean in that culture—which, as we have noted above, involves considerably more subordination than any modern Christian interpreters would apply to women today. (Applying the text in this way would return women to rarely being able to attend college, to disallowing them voting privileges, etc.) However, Paul does define the content of the wife's submission once, in quite a strategic place: at the concluding summary of his advice to married couples. The wife is to "respect" (phobeomai, Eph 5:33) her husband. Although the term usually translated "submission" (hypotassō) could be used in the weaker sense of "respect," household codes demanded far more of wives than mere respect; Paul's view of women's subordination even in this social situation could not be much weaker than it is.

Finally, the wife's subordination to her husband is directly parallel to the slave's subordination to his or her master. In both cases one submits as "to Christ"—who is compared with a slave's master no less than with a wife's husband. Most interpreters recognize today that Ephesians 6:5-9 does not address the institution of slavery; it simply gives advice to slaves in their situation. Like some Stoic philosophers, Paul could recommend securing one's freedom where that was possible (1 Cor 7:21-22); like the rare philosophers whom Aristotle chastised for suggesting that slavery was against nature and therefore wrong, Paul clearly regarded the subordination of humans as unnatural (Eph 6:9). Whereas the OT enjoined children's obedience to morally sound parental instruction (Deut 21:18-21), the OT nowhere explicitly enjoins the submission of wives and slaves (although they regularly appear in subordinate cultural roles, which God sometimes contravened). Paul does call on wives and slaves in his culture to submit in some sense; but he does not thereby approve of the institutions of patriarchal marriage or slavery, both of which are part of the authority of the paterfamilias and the household codes he here addresses.

That Paul's instructions to wives and slaves are limited to wives and slaves culturally subordinated to the male householder has often been noted (e.g., Martin, 206-31; Giles, 43). The objection that Paul could have rejected the institution of slavery but clearly would support the institution of marriage (Knight, 21-25) simply begs the real question. It is not the institution of marriage per se, but the institution of patriarchal marriage, that Paul addresses here; that was what appeared in the household codes. Paul elsewhere calls on believers in normal circumstances to submit to all who are in authority (Rom 13:1-7; see Civil Authorities), as Peter does (1 Pet 2:13-17); but this does not mean that he regards the particular authority structures (e.g., kingship) as necessary for all cultures. Because Paul's instructions specifically address institutions as they existed in Paul's day, interpreters of Paul who do not insist on reinstituting slavery or the monarchy should not insist on patriarchal marriages which subordinate wives, either. Indeed, given Paul's weak definition of the wife's submission as "respect" (Eph 5:33; see above), it appears that Paul advocated her submission in only a limited manner even for his own social situation.

4. Paul and Women's Ministry.

4.1. Passages in Which Paul Approves Women's Ministry. Although some Greek and Roman women became philosophers, higher education in rhetoric and philosophy was usually reserved for men. In a society where most people were functionally illiterate (especially much of the rural peasantry, estimated at perhaps 90 percent of the Empire's population), teaching roles naturally would fall on those who could read and speak well. Nearly all of our Jewish sources suggest that these roles were, with rare exceptions, limited to men.

Although inscriptions from ancient synagogues indicate that women filled a prominent role in some synagogues (see Brooten), the same inscriptions indicate that this was the exception rather than the norm. Our sources indicate that most Jewish men, like Philo, Josephus and many later rabbis, reflected the prejudice of much of the broader Greco-Roman culture. Josephus (Ant. 4.8.15 §219) and the rabbis in most cases dismissed the trustworthiness of women's witness, and, with the possible exceptions of Beruriah, wife of R. Meir, and the women followers of Jesus (Mk 15:40-41; Lk 8:1-3; 10:38-42), women seem never to have been accorded the role or status of teachers or their disciples (see Swidler). While the roles of women varied from region to region, certain Pauline passages make it clear that he was among the more progressive, not the more chauvinistic, writers of his day.

In a brief letter of recommendation at the conclusion of Romans, Paul commends the bearer of his letter whom the Romans may trust to explain it to them (Rom 16:1-2). Phoebe is "servant" of the church at Cenchreae, the port city of Corinth; the term may refer to a "deacon" (diakonos), apparently a person with administrative responsibility in the early church, but which in Paul's letters usually refers to a minister of God's word, such as himself. He also calls her a "helper" (prostatis) of many, a term which normally referred in antiquity to patrons, some of whom were women. As a patron, she would own the home in which the church met and hold a position of honor (see further Keener 1992, 237-40).

In Paul's following greetings (Rom 16:3-16), he lists about twice as many men as women, but commends more than twice as many women as men (see Coworkers, Paul and His). This may indicate his sensitivity to the opposition women undoubtedly faced for their ministry in some quarters. Among the most significant ministers he lists is Prisca (a diminutive form of Priscilla), possibly mentioned before her husband Aquila because of her higher social status (Rom 16:3-4). Luke also portrays her as a fellow-minister with her husband, joining him in instructing another minister, Apollos (Acts 18:26).

Paul also lists two fellow-apostles (this is the most natural way to construe "notable among the apostles," since Paul nowhere else appeals to commendations from "the apostles"), Andronicus and Junia. "Junia" itself is clearly a feminine name, but writers inclined to doubt that Paul could have referred to a female apostle have proposed that this is a contraction for the masculine "Junianus." But this contraction does not occur in our inscriptions from Rome and is by any count quite rare compared to the common feminine name; the proposal rests on the assumption that a woman could not be an apostle, rather than on any evidence inherent in the text itself.

In another letter Paul refers to the ministry of two women in Philippi, who, like his many male fellow-ministers, shared in his work for the gospel* there (Phil 4:2-3). Macedonia was one of the regions where women were accorded more prominent religious roles (Abrahamson), and this may have made it easier for Paul's women colleagues to assume a position of prominence (cf. also Acts 16:14-15).

Paul, who ranks prophets* second only to apostles* (1 Cor 12:28), assumes the existence of prophetesses and demands only that they, like other women in the congregation, cover their heads (1 Cor 11:5). In this he follows the tradition of the OT (where women filled the prophetic office far less than men, but nonetheless could assume positions of prominence and authority, e.g., Ex 15:20; Judg 4:4; 2 Kings 22:13-14) and other elements of early Christianity (Acts 2:17-18, 21:9).

These passages alone establish Paul among the more progressive writers of his culture, but other passages must be examined before one can determine how progressive he was. It is these passages, therefore, which have stirred the greatest controversy.

4.2. Passages in Which Paul Seems to Restrict Women's Ministry. Although both the following passages have been subjected to a bewildering array of interpretations, neither of them is universally held to be Pauline. Not only the authorship of 1 Timothy, but also that of 1 Corinthians 14:34-35, has been called into question. On the basis of some (admittedly slender) textual evidence, some prominent text critics have denied that the latter passage is actually Pauline, thinking that it was inserted instead by a later hand (Fee, 699-705). While this position is possible, the passage can be explained as a Pauline digression on a specific aspect of church order relevant to the Corinthian church (see Church Order and Government).

Some have argued instead that Paul here quotes a Corinthian position (1 Cor 14:34-35), which he then refutes (1 Cor 14:36); but 1 Corinthians 14:36 does not read naturally as a refutation of 1 Corinthians 14:34-35. Others have suggested that the church services were segregated by gender like the synagogues, thus rendering any communication between the sexes disruptive; but this view is refuted both by the architecture of synagogues in this period (Brooten) and that of homes like that in which the Corinthian church met. Still other scholars, examining the context, have suggested that Paul addresses Corinthian women abusing the gifts of the Spirit, or a problem with judging prophecies. While both of these views can be argued from the context, both ancient writers in general and Paul in particular were fond of digressions, and 1 Corinthians 14:34-35 may simply represent a digression concerning a specific issue of church order, distinct from other matters of church order in the context.

More likely is the view that Paul is restricting the only kind of speech directly addressed in these verses: asking questions (Giles, 56). It was common in the ancient world for hearers to interrupt teachers with questions, but it was considered rude if the questions reflected ignorance of the topic (see Plutarch On Lectures). Since women were normally considerably less educated than men, Paul proposes a short-range solution and a long-range solution to the problem. His short-range solution is that the women should stop asking the disruptive questions; the long-range solution is that they should be educated, receiving private tutoring from their husbands. Most husbands of the period doubted their wives' intellectual potential, but Paul was among the most progressive of ancient writers on the subject. Paul's long-range solution affirms women's ability to learn and places them on equal footing with men (see more fully Keener 1992, 80-85).

Whatever reconstruction one accepts, however, two points are clear. First, Paul plainly does not enjoin total silence on women, since earlier in the same letter he expects them to pray* and prophesy publicly along with the men (1 Cor 11:4-5); he thus must enjoin only the silencing of a particular form of speaking. Second, there is nothing in the context to support the view that Paul refers here to women teaching the Bible. The only passage in the entire Bible that could be directly adduced in favor of that position is 1 Timothy 2:11-14.

In 1 Timothy 2:8-15 Paul (on authorship, see Pastoral Letters) apparently addresses the proper decorum of men and women in prayer. Paul first addresses the men in the Ephesian churches, who are apparently involved in conflict inappropriate for worshipers of God (1 Tim 2:8). Then, in a more lengthy passage, he turns to problems with the women in these congregations. As noted above, women of the lower economic ranks in the East frequently covered their heads; but the urban congregations of Ephesus would have included women of higher social status, who would flaunt their status by the ornate ways they decorated their hair. To poorer women in the congregation, the wealthier women's wardrobe represented both ostentation and potential seduction, so Paul rules against it, borrowing language common among moralists of his day (1 Tim 2:9-10; Scholer, 3-6; Keener 1992, 103-7).

After calling on the women in the congregation to adorn themselves properly, he forbids them to "teach in such a way as to take authority" (reading "teach," didaskō, and "take authority," authenteō, together as many scholars do, although they could also be read as separate prohibitions). The precise meaning of the rare Greek term here used for "take authority" has been questioned. Some scholars suggest that it normally means simply "have authority" and that the passage thus excludes women from exercising any authority in the church at all. Other scholars have shown that it is often used more strongly than that in this period, and may mean, "seize authority"; on this reading, Paul merely forbids women to grasp for authority overbearingly, in the same way he would have forbidden it to men. Still other scholars have appealed to other examples within the semantic range of the term to argue for meanings like "domineer in a murderous way" or "proclaim oneself originator." Since some second-century Gnostics saw Eve as the originator of Man, 1 Timothy could be refuting a gnostic myth (Kroeger argues this case with impressive erudition, and even suggests that part of this passage quotes a gnostic* source in order to refute it). This case works well if 1 Timothy is written by another writer in Paul's name in the second century (which many scholars believe, although Kroeger does not); if it was written by Paul or his amanuensis, however, the term probably means to "have authority" or (more likely) "seize authority."

The social situation of the letter may represent a more fruitful basis for resolving the meaning of the text than the broad lexical possibilities, however; both Paul and his readers assumed this situation when reading the text, and the situation which elicited Paul's response is thus part of his intended meaning. Clues in the text indicate the following situation: male false teachers (1 Tim 1:20; 2 Tim 2:17) have been introducing dangerous heresy into the Ephesian church (1 Tim 1:4-7; 6:3-5), often beginning by gaining access to its women, who would normally have been difficult to reach because of their greater restriction to the domestic sphere (2 Tim 3:6-7). Because the women were still not well trained in the Scriptures (see above), they were most susceptible to the false teachers and could provide a network through which the false teachers could disrupt other homes (1 Tim 5:13; cf. 1 Tim 3:11). Given Roman society's perception of Christians as a subversive cult, false teaching that undermined Paul's strategies for the church's public witness (see above on Eph 5—6) could not be permitted (cf. 1 Tim 3:2, 7, 10; 5:7, 10, 14; 6:1; Tit 1:6; 2:1-5, 8, 10; cf. Padgett, 52; Keener 1991, 85-87; Verner).

Whether because the women were uneducated and thus particularly susceptible to error, or because their seizing authority would have injured the church's witness in a tense social situation, or (most likely) both, the specific situation Paul addresses invites his specific response. Paul again provides a short-range solution and a long-range solution. The short-range solution is: They should not take ruling positions as teachers in the church. The long-range solution is: Let them learn. Again, Paul affirms their ability to learn, and he proposes educating them as a long-range solution to the current problem. That they are to learn "quietly and submissively" may again reflect their witness within society (these were characteristics normally expected of women), but it should be pointed out that this was the way all novices were supposed to learn, and also characterizes the desired behavior of the whole church (1 Tim 2:2). That Paul addresses these admonitions to the women rather than to the men is as determined by the social situation as his admonition to the men to stop disputing (1 Tim 2:8); he hardly wanted the women to dispute, but addressed only those involved in the problem.

This solution might be so obvious as to render debate superfluous, except for Paul's following argument, in which he appears to predicate his admonitions to women on the roles of Adam and Eve (1 Tim 2:13-14). What one must ask is whether Paul adduces these examples as the basis for his point, or merely as an ad hoc argument to support it. His argument from the creation order is no more straightforward here (1 Tim 2:13) than it was when in 1 Corinthians 11:7-9 he used it to contend that women should wear head coverings. His argument from Eve's deception is even more likely to be ad hoc. If he argues that Eve's deception prohibits all women from teaching, he is arguing that all women, like Eve, are more easily deceived than all men; if the deception does not apply to all women, neither could his prohibition of their teaching. It is far more likely that Paul instead uses Eve to illustrate the plight of the particular women he addresses in Ephesus, who are easily deceived because they are untrained. Paul elsewhere uses Eve for anyone who is deceived, not just women (2 Cor 11:3). Finally, it is possible that 1 Timothy 2:15 is meant to qualify the preceding verses, though there is considerable debate on its meaning (salvation coming through Mary's childbirth, perhaps as the new Eve; through women submitting to traditional roles like childbearing; or simply a woman being brought through childbirth safely, challenging the curse in Eden).

Other passages in Paul which clearly demonstrate his approval of women's ministry of God's word (above) indicate that 1 Timothy 2:9-15 (if, as we assume here, it is genuinely Pauline) cannot prohibit women's ministry in all situations, but is limited to the situation in Ephesus and perhaps some other congregations facing similar crises in this period of the church's history. Pauline texts addressing the roles of women in both church and home suggest that Paul be ranked among the most progressive of ancient writers. See also AUTHORITY; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; HEAD; HOUSEHOLDS AND HOUSEHOLD CODES; MARRIAGE, DIVORCE, ADULTERY, INCEST; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. V. A. Abrahamsen, "The Rock Reliefs and the Cult of Diana at Philippi" (Th.D. dissertation, Harvard Divinity School, 1986); D. L. Balch, Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter (SBLMS 26; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1981); G. Bilezikian, Beyond Sex Roles: What the Bible Says About a Woman's Place in Church and Family (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1986); B. J. Brooten, Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue: Inscriptional Evidence and Background Issues (Chico, CA: Scholars, 1982); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); J. A. Fitzmyer, "Another Look at KEPHALE in 1 Corinthians 11.3," NTS 35 (1989) 503-11; J. Gardner, Women in Roman Law and Society (Bloomington: Indiana University, 1986); K. Giles, Created Woman: A Fresh Study of the Biblical Teaching (Canberra: Acorn, 1985); W. A. Grudem, "Does kephale Mean 'Source' or 'Authority Over' in Greek Literature? A Survey of 2,336 Examples," TJ n.s. 6 (1985) 38-59; N. A. Hardesty, Women Called to Witness: Evangelical Feminism in the 19th Century (Nashville: Abingdon, 1984); M. D. Hooker, "Authority on Her Head: An Examination of I Cor. XI.10," NTS 10 (1964) 410-16; P. K. Jewett, Man as Male and Female: A Study in Sexual Relationships from a Theological Point of View (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); C. S. Keener, And Marries Another: Divorce and Remarriage in the Teaching of the NT (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); idem, Paul, Women and Wives: Marriage and Women's Ministry in the Letters of Paul (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1992); G. W. Knight, III, The NT Teaching on the Role Relationship of Men and Women (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1977); R. S. Kraemer, Maenads, Martyrs, Matrons, Monastics: A Sorcebook on Women's Religions in the Greco-Roman World (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); R. C. Kroeger and C. C. Kroeger, I Suffer Not a Woman: Rethinking 1 Timothy 2:11-15 in Light of Ancient Evidence (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992); M. R. Lefkowitz and M. B. Fant, Women's Life in Greece and Rome (Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins, 1982); R. MacMullen, "Women in Public in the Roman Empire," Historia 29 (1980) 209-18; C. J. Martin, "The Haustafeln (Household Codes) in African American Biblical Interpretation: 'Free Slaves' and 'Subordinate Women,' " in Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. H. Felder (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990) 206-31; W. A. Meeks, "The Image of the Androgyne: Some Uses of a Symbol in Earliest Christianity," History of Religions 13 (1974) 165-208; A. Mickelsen, ed., Women, Authority and the Bible (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1986); A. Padgett, "The Pauline Rationale for Submission: Biblical Feminism and the Hina Clauses of Titus 2:1-10," EvQ 59 (1987) 39-52; J. Peradotto and J. P. Sullivan, ed., Women in the Ancient World: The Arethusa Papers (SUNY Series in Classical Studies; Albany, NY: State University of New York, 1984); S. B. Pomeroy, Goddesses, Whores, Wives, and Slaves: Women in Classical Antiquity (New York: Schocken, 1975); B. Rawson, "The Roman Family," in The Family in Ancient Rome: New Perspectives, ed. B. Rawson (Ithaca, NY: Cornell, 1986) 1-57; S. Safrai, "Home and Family," in The Jewish People in the First Century, ed. S. Safrai et al. (CRINT 1.2; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976) 728-92; D. M. Scholer, "Women's Adornment: Some Historical and Hermeneutical Observations on the New Testament Passages," Daughters of Sarah 6 (1980) 3-6; R. Scroggs, "Paul and the Eschatological Woman," JAAR 40 (1972) 283-303; A. B. Spencer, Beyond the Curse: Women Called to Ministry (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1989); L. Swidler, Women in Judaism: The Status of Women in Formative Judaism (Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1976); G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); C. L. Thompson, "Hairstyles, Head-Coverings and St. Paul: Portraits from Roman Corinth," BA 51 (1988) 101-15; D. C. Verner, The Household of God: The Social World of the Pastoral Epistles (SBLDS 71; Chico, CA: Scholars, 1983).

C. S. Keener

MAN OF LAWLESSNESS AND RESTRAINING POWER

The man of lawlessness is mentioned in just one passage in the whole of Scripture, namely the place where Paul writes to the Thessalonians to correct the view that "the day of the Lord" has already arrived (2 Thess 2:2). Paul assures his readers that before the Lord's* return "the man of lawlessness" (2 Thess 2:3, 8; KJV "the man of sin") must appear. He says further that this lawless one is "the son of perdition," that he is strongly opposed to God,* that he even sits in the Temple* claiming to be God, that there is a power restraining him and that when that power is removed the Lord Jesus will destroy him (2 Thess 2:3-8). This man has not appeared, Paul argues, and therefore "the day of the Lord" could not have come.

1. The Man of Lawlessness
2. The Restraining Power

1. The Man of Lawlessness.

At the Reformation some held that the man of lawlessness was the papacy (see the Preface to KJV), but this polemical view is not now held. Some have thought that Paul meant the Roman emperor* (Calig-ula? Nero?) or perhaps the whole line of emperors. The emperors were certainly opposed to the church and they even claimed divinity. Caligula wanted to have an image of himself set up in the Temple at Jerusalem, but he died before this could be done (A.D. 41; cf. Mt 24:15; Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). But in any case, setting up an image is not the same as sitting there himself. Moreover Paul was clearly referring to an eschatological figure, one who will appear at the end of the age, not to a contemporary. Other suggestions are that he would be an incarnation of Satan* or someone falsely claiming to be the Messiah. But none of these suggestions carries conviction. We do not know enough to say more than that Paul was referring to the supreme embodiment of evil and that it will take place at the end of this age when there will be a great apostasy* from the church and when evil will be strong (see Apocalypticism; Eschatology).

2. The Restraining Power.

Paul says that his readers know "what restrains, so that he may be revealed in his own time" (2 Thess 2:6). "What restrains" is neuter (to katechon) in verse 6, but "he who restrains" in verse 7 is masculine (ho katechōn). This seems to many to point to the Roman Empire, which might be spoken of in itself (neuter) or in the person of its emperor (masculine). One of the emperors, usually Nero, is sometimes seen as the man of lawlessness. The emperor in question could not make his appearance on the world stage until his predecessor was removed from the scene. But is this Paul's meaning? Nothing the apostle says really indicates contemporary Rome, and in fact not only Nero but the whole Roman empire has now passed away and the end of this age has not come.

Another view is that Paul was referring to some contemporary view about the end time. Various myths are cited to show that many people expected great conflicts at the end of time, and Paul is held to refer to one such speculation. In the nature of the case this cannot be decisively refuted. But we know of nothing in ancient literature that fits what Paul is saying and to speculate that something of what has perished would give the necessary identification is hazardous. As far as our knowledge goes, there was nothing in contemporary speculation that would fit Paul's words.

O. Cullmann (supported, for example, by A. L. Moore and J. Munck) suggests that the church's missionary preaching is in mind; Paul's mission* to the Gentiles* must be completed before the end comes. Perhaps. But who is "he who restrains?" Cullmann suggests the apostle himself, but this is unconvincing. We have no reason for thinking that Paul held that he himself was holding back the man of lawlessness. And the preaching of the gospel* scarcely presupposes a great falling away. I. H. Marshall has introduced a variation of this view in suggesting that the "present opportunity for preaching and hearing the gospel" is that which restrains, and "he who restrains" is "the angelic* figure who is now in charge." When this figure withdraws, "the power of evil . . . will be openly manifested so as to produce the final showdown" (Marshall, 199-200). But Paul is otherwise silent about such an angelic figure.

C. H. Giblin has argued that what is meant is a force of evil, "a present and persistent threat to faith" (Giblin, 230). But it is not easy to see the restraining power as a force for evil. One would have thought that a force for evil would be something that prepares the way for Satan rather than something that must be removed before the evil one's henchman makes his appearance.

B. B. Warfield, identifying the man of lawlessness sitting in the temple of God with Jesus' reference to the "abomination of desolation" (Mt 24:15) and the fall of Jerusalem* (cf. the divine wrath* to befall the "Jews" in 1 Thess 2:16), thought of the Jewish state as the restraining power with perhaps James* of Jerusalem as the masculine restrainer (Warfield, 471-74). But it is not easy to see how either could hold back the coming of the man of lawlessness. Warfield saw the line of Roman emperors as the persecuting power let loose by the destruction of the Jewish state. But despite the learning with which this case is argued, it seems impossible to accept it.

It has sometimes been held that what is meant is the presence of the church* and of the Holy Spirit* in the church. But it is not easy to see either the church or the Spirit in Paul's words and it is more than a little difficult to see how or why the Holy Spirit should be taken away.

Probably our best understanding is that the restrainer of evil is the principle of order. The neuter would refer to the general principle and the masculine to its personification. In Paul's day the principle was seen in the Roman system of law and its personification in the emperor (see Legal System, Roman). Similar applications are evident in other systems of law. The rule of "the man of lawlessness" will take place when the rule of law ceases to operate. "The civil power is set up as a bulwark against the powers of chaos, but it can only keep these powers in check, never really subdue them. The fight against them will never come to an end, and in the end it must succumb to their final onslaught" (Stauffer, 85).

Paul sees the climax of Satan's opposition to the things of God as coming at the end of time. And he is confident that God will then defeat all the forces of evil.

See also APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; THESSALONIANS, LETTERS TO THE; TRIUMPH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. D. Aus, "God's Plan and God's Power: Isaiah 66 and the Restraining Factors of 2 Thess 2:6-7," JBL 96 (1977) 537-53; O. Betz, "Der Katechon," NTS 9 (1962-63) 279-91; W. Bousset, The Antichrist Legend (London: Hutchinson, 1896); F. F. Bruce: 1 & 2 Thessalonians (WBC 45; Waco: Word, 1982); O. Cullmann, "Le caractère eschatologique du devoir missionnaire et de la conscience apostolique de saint Paul. Étude sur le κατέχον (-ων) de 2 Thess. 2:6-7," RHPR 16 (1936) 210-45; D. Ford, The Abomination of Desolation in Biblical Eschatology (Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1979); C. H. Giblin, The Threat to Faith (AnBib 31; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1967); I. H. Marshall, 1 and 2 Thessalonians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); A. L. Moore, The Parousia in the New Testament (NovTSup 13; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1966); L. Morris, The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians (NICNT; 2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); J. Munck, Paul and The Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1959) 36-42; E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1955); W. Trilling, Der Zweite Brief an die Thessalonicher (EKKNT; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1980) 81-105; G. Vos, The Pauline Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1953); C. A. Wanamaker, 1 & 2 Thessalonians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990) 249-57; B. B. Warfield, "The Prophecies of St. Paul" [1886] in Biblical and Theological Studies, ed. S. G. Craig (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1952) 463-502.

L. Morris

MANUSCRIPTS.

See TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

MARANATHA.

See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

MARCION.

See CANON; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, ADULTERY AND INCEST

Paul did not write treatises on the subjects of marriage, divorce, adultery or incest, and, were it not for problems in some of the churches he had founded that specifically concerned these matters, he might have made no reference to any of them at all. But there were problems and there were questions, and as a result Paul, as an apostle* of Jesus Christ, addressed these problems and questions and gave his answers to them.

1. Background
2. Marriage
3. Divorce
4. Adultery
5. Incest

1. Background.

Paul was born, lived, worked and traveled in the Greco-Roman world. Although it is a matter of debate as to how much of Paul's thinking was shaped by this world, one should at least take passing note of its views about marriage, divorce, adultery and incest.

1.1. Greco-Roman World. Marriage in Roman times was held to be monogamous and for life, "a life-long partnership, and a sharing of civil and religious rights" (Modestinus Digesta 23.2.1). And yet marriage, while it was usually terminated by death, could also be brought to an end by the will of one or both of the parties involved if marital affection (affectio maritalis) ceased to exist between them. Legal divorce proceedings were not required—a simple oral or written notification was sufficient, and under the Empire divorce was as readily available to the wife as to the husband. Adultery, usually rather narrowly defined as sexual intercourse of a married woman with a man other than her husband, was viewed as a serious crime, perhaps because it was thought to be a gross invasion of a husband's property rights, and was punished with severe penalties—at times with death to the wife and her partner or more often with the banishment of both from home and community (cf. Lex Iulia de adulteriis coercendis, c. 18 B.C). Laws were enacted that forbade the marriage of one class of people to another. Of special interest here are those laws or sanctions that prohibited persons from marrying other persons of near relationship, whether natural or adoptive—this kind of conubium was not acceptable in a well-ordered society (see OCD, 8, 539-540; RE 14.2259-86).

1.2. Judaism. Although Paul was born into the Roman world, he was also born into a Jewish home that rigidly adhered to Jewish beliefs and customs (Phil 3:5-6), and for whom the Torah was the prime source of instruction. He attended the school of Hillel, studied under Rabbi Gamaliel (Acts 22:3) and joined the order of strict observance of the Law,* the Pharisaic order (cf. Phil 3:5-6). So although Paul may indeed have been acquainted with what was taught and practiced in the Greco-Roman world of which he was a part, yet it is likely that both his thinking and his way of life were shaped more by a Judaism informed principally by the OT than they were shaped by Greco-Roman ideas (see Jew, Paul the).

1.2.1. Marriage. For the discussion here it is important to note that the OT writers held to a high view of marriage. No doubt this was true because they understood marriage to be the perpetuation of that fundamental social unit which God was said to have created when he formed one man from the dust of the ground and fashioned one woman from him and brought her to him to be his sole partner, thus becoming "one flesh" with him (Gen 2:21-24; cf. 1:27-28). It is true that customs and practices are recorded in the OT that fall far short of this ideal, such as polygamy, concubinage, the wife considered to be the property of her husband, the husband seen as the master of his wife. Nevertheless the accounts of monogamous marriages of significant persons such as Noah, Isaac and Joseph, the numerous narratives of husbands treating their wives with love, respect, equality and faithfulness, and the many statements indicating that domestic happiness and prosperity are tied directly to monogamy, fidelity and respect show that the ideal was never lost and that many of God's people strove to make this ideal a reality in practice (cf. 2 Kings 4:8-25; Ps 128; Prov 31; Eccles 9:9; Mal 2:14; cf. also Sir 25:1, 8; 26:1-4, 13-18).

1.2.2. Divorce and Remarriage. Hence, divorce was perceived as something contrary to God's original intent for the welfare of the covenant community and as an action hated by God (Mal 2:16 NIV). Nevertheless, the OT did make allowances for the willful stubbornness of human beings (cf. Mk 10:5), and thus both divorce and the remarriage of divorced persons were permitted (Deut 24:1-4). It seems that in the history of ancient Israel divorce proceedings could only be initiated by the husband (but cf. Ex 21:11), for rather unspecified reasons and with relative ease. Note the following: If the husband were to find "some indecent thing" (Heb 'erwaṯ dāḇār, LXX aschēmon pragma) in his wife, he was simply required to write her a certificate of divorce and send her from his house (Deut 24:1-4; cf. Is 50:1; Jer 3:8; see Hos 2:2 for a simple form of such a certificate).

1.2.3. Adultery. Quite contrary to modern ideas and practice, adultery in the OT was not considered to be grounds for divorce. Rather, death—usually by stoning, but also by burning (Lev 20:10; Gen 38:24)—was the consequence for such infidelity both for the adulterous wife and her paramour (Deut 22:22-24). The severity of this punishment was because adultery struck against "the foundations and personal rights of marriage and family" and "against the law of God (Ex 20:14) and so threatened the basis of the people's existence" (Reisser, 582-83) as the covenant people of God (see Deut 22:22).

1.2.4. Forbidden Marriages. OT Law forbade marriage to and the having of sexual intercourse with any close relation (cf. Lev 18:6-18). After the return from the Exile the leaders of Israel ruled against marriage to "outsiders" and took a vow on behalf of the citizens of the nation of Israel that they would not permit their daughters to be given in marriage to the sons of the people of the nations around them, nor would they permit the taking of the daughters of these foreigners for their sons (Neh 10:30). Such marriages, it was believed, posed a deadly threat to Israel's faith in the one true God (cf. Ex 34:16; Ezra 10:5; Neh 13:23-27; Mal 2:11).

1.3. Jesus. Paul was also familiar with the tradition about Jesus. Hence, what Jesus said about marriage and divorce and adultery must also have provided background for the answers he gave to his churches (see Jesus, Sayings of).

1.3.1. Marriage. Jesus reaffirmed the ideal for marriage laid down in the beginning. He passed over all intervening history and what may have happened or had been sanctioned in this interim and took his questioners and listeners back to creation. Jesus said to them, "In the beginning he [God] made them male and female. For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and will be joined to his wife, and the two will be one flesh, so that they are no longer two but one flesh" (Mk 10:6-7; cf. Gen 1:27; 2:24). And then he added his own new word of command based on what was implied but not made explicit in the ancient biblical texts, "No one ever is to break apart that which God has linked together" (Mk 10:9). Jesus thus taught that marriage was a divine institution, owning the blessing of God. It was to be monogamous, lifelong and an unparalleled spiritual oneness of two people—a man and a woman—so united by God that they are no longer two but one.

1.3.2. Celibacy. Singleness, or celibacy, was also an option for Jesus. According to the gospel records he chose that way of life for himself. He never married. And he taught that others, too, had the ability to accept celibacy for the sake of the kingdom of God. From all existing data Jesus did not advocate this as the preferred way of life. Rather he viewed celibacy as a charism, as a gift bestowed (dedotai) on certain people by God (see Mt 19:10-12).

1.3.3. Adultery. Jesus stood with the Law against adultery, fully supporting the ancient command, "Thou shalt not commit adultery!" But he went beyond it in two significant ways: (1) Jesus said that the man who looks at a woman for the express purpose of lusting for her (pros to epithymēsai autēn) has already committed adultery with her (Mt 5:27-28). Thus for him such a culpable act as adultery can be committed in the mind as well as in the bed. And (2) Jesus also said that any man who divorces his wife and marries another woman commits adultery, or any woman who divorces her husband and marries another man commits adultery (cf. Mk 10:11).

In sum, Jesus saw the ideal for marriage as two people, a man and a woman, being yoked together in a union so permanent and inviolable that only God has the right to dissolve it. Hence he deplored divorce and forbade remarriage. And yet one should be careful not to treat these words of Jesus as unyielding, iron-clad, legal prescriptions that permit no exceptions ever. For already within the Gospel record this high standard was modified when the ideal was applied to real-life situations where all the characteristic human frailties, even of Christians, came to light (Mt 19:9; cf. Mt 5:32).

As a person acquainted with the Roman world of which he was a citizen, as a person who was a Jew by birth and training, and as a devoted follower and apostle of Jesus Christ,* Paul was heir to all these traditions. From them he forged his ideas about marriage, divorce, adultery and incest.

2. Marriage.

Paul's view of marriage is multifaceted and somewhat complex. His remarks need careful examination.

2.1. Marriage as Inviolable and Permanent. In simplest terms Paul considered that marriage was for life and that this union was to be maintained as inviolable. This idea of marriage was so much a part of Paul that almost without thinking he could use it as an illustration while discussing another subject altogether. He wrote: "Are you unaware, my brothers and sisters, that the law lords it over a person as long as that person is alive. For example, the Law binds a woman to her husband as long as her husband is living, . . . but if her husband dies she is free from that law" (Rom 7:1-3).

Paul reiterates this same understanding of the lifelong permanence of the marriage union, repeating and affirming the law of Christ (for that seems to be the law he had in mind in Rom 7:1-2; see Law of Christ) concerning such a union, when he addresses problems in the Corinthian church: "I issue this command to those [Christians] who are married—no, not I, but the Lord—a wife is not to separate herself from [divorce?] her husband; but if she does separate herself from him, she must remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband, and the husband must not divorce his wife" (1 Cor 7:10-11; cf. Mk 10:11; but see Murphy-O'Connor, 601-2).

2.2. Headship and Mutuality in Marriage. For the purposes of establishing order within any Christian societal group, small or large, Paul was prepared to say that within the marriage relationship the husband is the head* of his wife (1 Cor 11:3; see Man and Woman). Here he reflected the cultural customs of his times and his own understanding of the divine order. He nevertheless rejected any notion that the husband thus was lord over or master of his wife with the right to do to her or with her as he wished. On the contrary, he cut across many of the cultural norms of his day and stressed the equality that exists between husband and wife and the mutual responsibility that each has to the other. He wrote "The husband must give his wife what is due to her, and the wife equally must give the husband his due. The wife cannot claim her body as her own; it is her husband's. Equally, the husband cannot claim his body as his own; it is his wife's" (1 Cor 7:3-4 NEB). "For Paul the marriage bed is both unitive (cf. 6:16) and an illustration that the two belong to one another in total mutuality" (Fee, 280).

This idea of mutuality within the marriage bond is once again articulated in Ephesians where both Christian husbands and Christian wives are urged to subject themselves to one another out of reverence for and obligation to Christ (Eph 5:21)—wives to husbands (Eph 5:22) and, by implication, husbands to wives in love (Eph 5:25). But it seems clear from the whole of this passage that once again > mutual submission coexists with a hierarchy of roles within the [Christian] household. Believers should not insist on getting their own way, so there is a general sense in which husbands are to have a submissive attitude to wives, putting their wives' interests before their own. But this does not eliminate the more specific [role] in which wives are to submit to husbands. (Lincoln, 366; but see Kroeger, 267-83)

On the other hand, a Christian husband, described here as "head of his wife," to whom his wife is to submit (see also Col 3:18; Tit 2:5; cf. 1 Pet 3:1), is not given license to rule his wife, but he is ordered to love* his wife with self-sacrificing love—the same kind of love that Christ had for the church.* In this sense, then, the husband in actuality also submits himself to his wife as she to him, for he puts himself at her service.* According to Paul, then, any exercise of headship on the part of the husband in relation to his wife is to be actualized not through self-assertion but through self-sacrifice.

2.3. Marriage, Christ and His Church. Further, it is also clear from Ephesians 5:22-33 that Paul's view of the marriage relationship is extremely high. The OT prophets had magnificently and boldly described the covenantal union between God and Israel in terms of marriage (cf. Ezek 16:8), thus heralding the sacredness and honorableness of marriage. In this same tradition Paul proclaims the sacredness and honorableness of marriage by boldly using the marriage bond between husband and wife as an analogy of the bond that has been forged between Christ and the believing community. "This is a profound mystery," he writes about marriage, "but I am talking about Christ and the church" (Eph 5:32). Why, of all human institutions that existed at that time, did he select the institution of marriage to illustrate the relationship between the believing community and its Lord? The answer would seem to be that Paul held marriage in high esteem as the perfect example of henōsis, a "oneness" forged between two by the unifying power of love.

2.4. Marriage or Asceticism? Because Paul held marriage in high regard and was true to his own Jewish heritage ("It is not good for a man to be alone," Gen 2:18), he considered the married state to be the normal and expected state for people within the Christian church (cf. Eph 5:22-33; Col 3:18-19; 1 Tim 3:2). For this reason he struck out against those who forbade people to marry (1 Tim 4:3). Hence, the abruptly introduced words in 1 Corinthians 7:1, literally: "It is good for a man not to touch a woman" (meaning, "It is good for a man not to have sexual intercourse with a woman," cf. Gen 20:6 [LXX]; Ruth 2:9 [LXX]; Prov 6:29 [LXX]) must not be understood as reflecting Paul's own position on marriage. Rather, it is a slogan expressing the view of some within the church at Corinth who were advocating strict asceticism, even to the point of sexual abstinence within the marriage relationship (see Scroggs, 293-303). Paul strongly rejected this notion and forbade its implementation because of the counter-Christian and destructive practices (porneias, 1 Cor 7:2) he knew could result if it were adopted as the norm (cf. 1 Cor 6:13-16). Thus he struck a blow against such unnatural abstinence within the marriage bond by saying, "Let each husband be having [a euphemism for 'sexual intercourse with'; cf. Ex 2:1 LXX; Is 13:16 LXX] his own wife, and each wife be having her own husband" (1 Cor 7:2). "Thus he means, 'Let each man who is already married continue in relations with his own wife, and each wife likewise.' And that means a full conjugal life," which is precisely what he argues for in detail in the verses that follow (Fee, 279).

2.5. Marriage and Church Leaders. Paul's high evaluation of marriage is also seen in the guidelines he lays down for the one who is to fill the office of bishop. A bishop, he wrote, "must be mias gynaikos andra" (1 Tim 3:2; Tit 1:6; cf. 1 Tim 5:9)—an expression that is literally translated, "husband of one wife." But this is a notoriously difficult expression, and as a consequence has led to various translations and interpretations. These are: (1) "the husband of one wife" (KJV, NASB), a translation that has been understood to mean that the bishop must be a married person; (2) "married to one wife only" (cf. NIV, Phillips), a translation that has been understood to mean that a polygamist could not be a bishop; (3) "married only once" (cf. NRSV, Goodspeed, Moffatt), a translation that has been understood to mean that no bishop was permitted to marry a second time, if his first wife should die; (4) "faithful to his one wife" (cf. NEB), a translation that has been understood to mean that of all people the bishop must lead an exemplary life as a married person.

Of these possible translations and interpretations the last seems best. It allows room for a bishop to be a person like Paul himself—unmarried (1 Cor 7:7; cf. 7:25-38), but at the same time, in light of Paul's high estimation of marriage, and in contradiction to the position of his opponents (1 Tim 4:3), it commends marriage to the bishop. It not only stresses the importance of marriage but at the same time strikes out against polygamy, at least implicitly, as well as divorce and remarriage. Further, it best fits the context in which it appears (1 Tim 3:2; Tit 1:6), for the emphasis here is not so much on the status of the bishop as upon the character of the bishop (see Houlden, 78; Scott, 31; see Church Order and Government; Ministry).

2.6. Marriage and Times of Crisis. While Paul championed the normalcy of marriage, even counseling younger widows to re-marry (cf. 1 Tim 5:14), he nevertheless envisioned times of crisis or distress when marriage might not be the best course of action for people to take (1 Cor 7:26). What kinds of crises Paul had in mind when he gave such advice may have been clear to the Corinthian* church, but it is no longer clear to any who might read this same letter today. Hence, it is presumptuous to state what these particularly stressful situations might have been for the purpose of providing some sort of rule book for contemporary action. The most one can do is to point out that Paul, without surrendering his high view of marriage, did on occasion advise against it, when certain grave circumstances warranted that kind of restraint, and to use such advice simply as a guiding principle for life in the church, not as a binding rule for any segment of its people.

2.7. The Option of Celibacy. Like Jesus, Paul also believed and taught that celibacy instead of marriage was a legitimate option for Christians. He taught that celibacy provided advantages to the one who would choose such a way of life for the sake of the kingdom of God, advantages not always available to the one who is married (1 Cor 7:32-35; cf. Mt 19:10-12). Paul himself was celibate and free from those legitimate and requisite responsibilities of caring for a wife that of necessity would have restricted his activity as an apostle. But he, no doubt familiar with the words of Jesus, also recognized that celibacy was a charism, a gift* from God (1 Cor 7:7), and that it was not for everyone, even though he might wish it were for everyone in light of his understanding of the vastness of the mission* and the shortness of the time available (1 Cor 7:26-35, esp. 7:26 and 29; cf. Mt 19:11).

2.8. Marriage with an Unbeliever. In the tradition of some of the writers of the OT, Paul stood firmly opposed to mixed marriages—marriages between believers and unbelievers—and no doubt for precisely the same reason that burdened his OT predecessors. Like those ancient writers, perhaps, he too foresaw far greater potential for the believing spouse being turned away from following after God by the one who had no faith than for the believing partner converting the unbelieving partner (cf. Deut 7:3-4; Ezra 9:12; Neh 10:30; 13:25). This was a tragedy he wished Christians to avoid at all costs. Hence his words opposing such a union come in the form of a harsh negative command and a rhetorical question: "Do not be yoked together (mē ginesthe heterozygountes) with unbelievers. For what do righteousness and wickedness have in common? Or what fellowship can light have with darkness?" (2 Cor 6:14 NIV). Such an interpretation of this Corinthian text may be putting too fine a point on it, narrowing it too severely (as Martin, 197, cautions). Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that the word translated here, "yoked together" (better, "mis-yoked," hetero-zygeō), has essentially the same root as the word Jesus used when, in speaking of marriage, he said "That which God yoked together [sy-zeugnymi] no person must break apart" (Mk 10:9). So it is correct to see marriage as at least one kind, if not the only kind, of mismating that Paul had in mind.

3. Divorce.

Paul had little to say about divorce, simply because for him marriage was a lifelong covenant relationship between husband and wife that found its basis in the Genesis account of the creation of man and woman (Gen 2:24; cf. Rom 7:2-3).

3.1. Marriage: Ideals and Concessions. Like Jesus before him, however, Paul realized that life brings people situations in which the ideal is not always attainable, even by the redeemed. Hence, when he addresses a particular impending crisis (ean chōristhē [1 Cor 7:11; cf. BDF 373]) where one of the women in the Corinthian church seems to have been about to "separate herself/divorce herself" (chōristhēnai) from her husband (1 Cor 7:10), he counters this threat with a word of Jesus and an implication drawn from it: "she is not to divorce herself from her husband (cf. Mk 10:12); but if she does she must remain unmarried" (1 Cor 7:10-11).

From this statement of Paul it may be inferred that when the church moved out into the Greco-Roman world, Christian women, like their pagan counterparts, found themselves culturally free to divorce their husbands. This freedom had not been a part of the Jewish milieu from which Christianity sprang, where the privilege of divorce belonged only to the husband (cf. m. Yebam. 14:1). This same statement also makes it clear that, although women in general were culturally free to divorce their husbands, women as Christians were not free to do so. The word of Jesus, their Lord, that forbade divorce stood as a command (parangellō) against their exercise of such freedom—a command that applied equally to Christian husbands as to wives (1 Cor 7:11).

Paul, while holding to the ideal situation—"no divorce"—nevertheless concedes (as did Jesus) that it is possible that a divorce will take place in spite of any command against it. What then? Once more Paul advocates the same standard that was set forth by Jesus under similar circumstances: if divorce does take place (is permitted) then there is to be no re-marriage (so as to avoid committing adultery, cf. Mk 10:11-12; Mt 5:31; 19:9; Lk 16:18). The divorced person must remain unmarried. And if this state of affairs cannot be endured, then the apostolic authoritative command is for the parties to be reconciled, she to her husband and he to his wife (1 Cor 7:11). This then is the goal for marriage set out by Jesus (preserved for us in Mark's Gospel) and toward which Paul emphatically encouraged all Christians to strive: No divorce; but if divorce occurs, then no remarriage to a different partner.

3.2. The Exceptions. But just as the ideal for marriage that Jesus set forth (cf. Mk 10:8-12) was early modified by an exception (cf. Mt 5:31; 19:9), thus freeing the "innocent" partner from the marriage bond and providing legitimate grounds for remarriage, so Paul establishes still another exception for similarly troubled Corinthian Christians. What happens if a husband who comes to faith in Christ now finds himself married to a wife who does not share that same faith? Or what if a believing wife now finds herself married to an unbelieving husband? Paul's answer to this question is consistent with what he said earlier: believers must initiate no change in their marital status—not even in situations like this that might cause them to think (incorrectly) that they have grounds for divorce (cf. 2 Cor 6:14; cf. 1 Cor 6:15-16). The believer is still bound to his or her spouse until that bond is dissolved by death as long as the unbelieving partner agrees to live together as husband or wife with the Christian partner. But it is at this point that Paul, by inspiration, allows still one more exception to the marriage ideal. He writes, "If an unbelieving husband (or wife) initiates a divorce, breaks (chōrizetai) the marriage union [this must be at least part of Paul's meaning here in light of Jesus' word about marriage in Mark 10:9—"Let no person break it apart" (mē chōrizetō)], and abandons his or her marriage partner, the Christian is to let the break take place and let that partner go. In situations such as this the Christian husband or wife is not bound [ou dedoulōtai]" (1 Cor 7:15).

These two words of Paul, "not bound," the new exception now added to the rule "No divorce! But if divorce does occur, no remarriage," have generated considerable debate (see bibliography). There is no consensus about precisely what Paul meant. Nevertheless, they are taken here to mean that Paul was saying to the Christian husband or wife, "If you find yourself in circumstances like this—abandoned by your non-Christian spouse—you are no longer bound by the constraints of the divinely given laws that govern marriage. You are free to marry again" (but see Fee, 303, who argues rather extensively against such an interpretation only to conclude his remarks by writing, "All of this is not to say that Paul disallows remarriage in such cases; he simply does not speak to it at all").

The exception to the marriage ideal that Paul offers here was the apostle's solution to a particular real-life situation that had arisen in a particular church in a particular place at a particular time. Therefore, one cannot help but ask whether it is possible that Paul may have authorized still other exceptions to the marriage ideal when very different, but equally serious ruptures of the union between husband and wife, were brought to him for an authoritative answer? Is it possible to infer from the fact that two exceptions to the marriage ideal are already found within the boundaries of the sacred canon—one in Matthew's Gospel (Mt 5:32; 19:9) and one here in Paul's letter to the Corinthians, both of which reinforced the sanctity of marriage by dissolving travesties against it—that other exceptions might also fall in line with these? Marital unfaithfulness (porneia, Mt 19:9, a word with a wide range of meaning; see Blomberg, 195-96) and the abandonment of the believing partner by the unbeliever were seen as destroying and dissolving the marriage union and freeing the wronged or abandoned partner to remarry without committing adultery. Is it possible to extrapolate from this that other such marital travesties, although not identical to these (e.g., cruelty, desertion, physical abuse, the systematic psychological destruction of one's marriage partner, and the like), might also have been included as exceptions to the ideal had only authoritative responses to such abuses been written down and preserved by the church?

There is no agreed-upon answer to these questions. It is sufficient to say that, although the exception which Paul added to the one in the Jesus tradition may seem to point in the direction of the possibility of other exceptions being envisioned, there is no evidence within the Pauline corpus of the slightest encouragement for Christians to act unilaterally in such matters and to decide to divorce on their own initiative. Therefore, from this it may be inferred that any plan to divorce must not be made independently of the community of faith or apart from the advice and support of the authorized leaders of the church (see Church Order).

4. Adultery.

Paul says very little about the subject of adultery, perhaps because he knows that as heirs to the OT people of God Christians for the most part are already quite convinced that adultery is out of bounds for them. But what Paul does say makes it clear that he considers adultery to be a destructive perversion of the divine ideal and stands under God's curse.*

Paul never defines adultery. But if he had, he most certainly would have expanded its definition beyond that of sexual intercourse between a married woman with a man other than her husband. He would also have defined adultery as sexual intercourse between a married man with a woman other than his wife—quite contrary to the norms of sexual morality in the Roman world (see 1.1 above). Paul never tolerated a double standard—one for the husband, another for the wife—when it came to matters of conjugal rights and responsibilities that each shared with the other (1 Cor 7:3-4). From this it may correctly be inferred that "the apostolic message from the very outset made it clear to the churches that the full marital fidelity of both spouses is an unconditional divine command" (Hauck, 734; cf. 1 Cor 6:9; see Sexuality).

Because Paul held to the same high ideal of marriage to which Jesus held, he likewise, with one exception (see above), considered that the remarriage of a divorced man or the remarriage of a divorced woman was the equivalent to committing adultery (cf. Rom 7:3 with Mk 10:11-12). Thus he added his apostolic authority* to that of Jesus, whose critique of adultery reached a level never before articulated.

The tragic seriousness of adultery, in that it is a violation of the will of God, can be seen from Paul's severe pronouncement that those who commit adultery will not inherit the kingdom* of God (1 Cor 6:9). The severity of his judgment is because adultery destroys the very fabric of the marriage union, tears asunder the henōsis, the oneness, that God had planned for marriage, and is one thing that has the potential of fracturing what Jesus said no one ever should break apart. It must be noted, however (not to alter in the least Paul's view of the heinousness of adultery, or to weaken the harshness of his judgment against it) that always his severity was tempered by the tender heart of a pastor who wished for and strove to bring about the repentance of the sinner and the sinner's full restoration to the believing community (see Discipline). This was the case even for the sinner whose sin may have been that of sexual perversity (cf. 1 Cor 5:1-5 with 2 Cor 2:5-9; see Martin, 33-38; Lampe, 353-54; cf. also 2 Cor 12:21).

5. Incest.

There is only one instance recorded in Paul's letters where incest is addressed: "a man has his father's wife" (1 Cor 5:1), meaning, no doubt, that after the death of his father, a Christian man had married his father's widow, his stepmother (the expression 'iššaṯ 'āḇ [Gk gynē patros], "father's wife," is an OT and rabbinic designation for a stepmother; cf. Lev 18:8, Str-B 3.343, noted by Conzelmann, 96). Paul's reaction to this sexual relation is one of dismay, anger and judgment.* (1) He terms this union porneia—not itself the word for incest, but a word, while wide-ranging in its meaning, nevertheless primarily describes grievous, perverse, unlawful sexual acts, that would include incestuous acts. Christians must flee from porneia, for it is counter to the holy Law of God and comes under his judgment (cf. 1 Cor 6:13, 18; 2 Cor 12:21; Gal 5:19-21; Eph 5:3; Col 3:5; 1 Thess 4:3). (2) He speaks of the sin* of this man as being so perverse that it does not even occur among pagans. Even the Romans had laws which forbade such action (see 1.1 above). (3) And finally, because of the seriousness of this sin, he instructs the church corporate to put this person out of the fellowship, into the realm of wrath, and into the hands of Satan.* He is to be given over to death (cf. 1 Cor 11:30; see Käsemann). Once again, it is important to note that such severity always has a redemptive purpose in mind—so that the church may be maintained pure and so that the sinner may be saved (1 Cor 5:5, 7).

See also Ethics; Head, Headship; Homosexuality; Households, Household Codes; Man and Woman; Sexuality, Sexual Ethics.

Bibliography. C. J. Barber, "Marriage, Divorce or Remarriage: A Review of the Relevant Religious Literature," Journal of Psychology and Theology 12 (1984) 170-77; C. L. Blomberg, "Marriage, Divorce, Remarriage, and Celibacy," TJ 11 (1990) 161-96; V. P. Boyer, Divorce and Remarriage (Stow, OH: Cre-Com, 1976); H. Conzelmann, I Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the New Testament (London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 1978); G. Duty, Divorce and Remarriage (Minneapolis: Bethany Fellowship, 1967); J. K. Elliott, "Paul's Teaching on Marriage in 1 Corinthians: Some Problems Considered," NTS 19 (1972-1973) 219-25; S. A. Ellisen, Divorce and Remarriage in the Church (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1977); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); D. E. Garland, "The Christian's Posture Toward Marriage and Celibacy: 1 Corinthians 7," RevExp 80 (1983) 351-62; F. Hauck, "μοιχεύω κτλ," TDNT IV.729-35; W. A. Heth, "The Meaning of Divorce in Matthew 19:3-9," Churchman 98 (1984) 136-52; idem, "The Changing Basis for Permitting Remarriage after Divorce for Adultery: The Influence of R. H. Charles," TJ 11 (1990) 143-59; J. L. Houlden, The Pastoral Epistles (New York: Penguin, 1976); E. Käsemann, "Sentences of Holy Law in the New Testament," in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 66-81; C. S. Keener, And Marries Another: Divorce and Remarriage in the Teaching of the New Testament (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); C. C. Kroeger, "The Classical Concept of Head as 'Source,' " in Equal to Serve, ed. G. G. Hull (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1987) 267-83; G. W. H. Lampe, "Church Discipline and the Interpretation of the Epistles to the Corinthians," in Christian History and Interpretation, ed. W. R. Farmer (Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 353-54; A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); J. Murphy-O'Connor, "The Divorced Woman in 1 Corinthians 7:10-11," JBL 100 (1981) 601-6; H. Reisser, "μοιχεύω," NIDNTT 2.582-83; E. F. Scott, The Pastoral Epistles (New York: Harper, n.d.); R. Scroggs, "Paul and the Eschatological Women," JAAR 40 (1972) 283-303; D. L. Smith, "Divorce and Remarriage: From the Early Church to John Wesley," TJ 11 (1990) 131-42; G. J. Wenham, "Gospel Definitions of Adultery and Women's Rights," ExpT 95 (1984) 330-32; B. Witherington, "Matthew 5:32 and 19:9—Exception or Exceptional Situation?," NTS 31 (1985) 571-76. G. F. Hawthorne

MARS HILL. See ATHENS, PAUL AT.

MATURE. See PERFECT, MATURE.

MEALS, RELIGIOUS. See FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS AND JEWISH FOOD LAWS; LORD'S SUPPER; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL.

MERCY

The God* Paul worshiped* and about whom he preached* is a God who is "rich in mercy" (Eph 2:4). It is fundamental to the apostle's thinking that all are sinners* (Rom 6:23) and therefore deserving of judgment,* totally unable to achieve salvation* by their own merits. When anyone is saved it is only because God is merciful. The mercy of God underlies Paul's whole message.

But God is not just merciful: he is "rich in mercy." He is "the Father of mercies and the God of all consolation" (2 Cor 1:3). We are not to think of him as one who occasionally has merciful impulses: for Paul God is essentially and wholeheartedly merciful.

1. OT Background
2. Mercy on Israel
3. Mercy as Incentive to Service

1. OT Background.

In the LXX the noun eleos is normally used for the Hebrew ḥesed, which has to do with the attitude of a human or of God arising out of a mutual relationship (see Andersen). Ḥesed is chiefly used of God's relationship with his people in which the notion of grace rather than obligation is prominent. God's ḥesed issues in his covenant with Israel,* and by it he refuses to abandon Israel when the nation is faithless.

God's mercy consistently manifests itself in his saving acts which consist of his forgiveness* of individuals and the nation (e.g., Deut 13:17; Ps 25:6; Hos 1:6-7), his deliverance of Israel* from enemies (e.g., Ps 69:16-18; Is 30:18) and his restoration* of the exiles (e.g., Deut 30:3; Is 49:10, 13; Jer 12:15; Ezek 39:25). God's mercy also has an eschatological dimension, for from God's ḥesed will flow the final forgiveness and redemption of his people (e.g., Is 54:8; 55:3; Jer 33:26).

Less frequently (six times), eleos is used in the LXX for the Hebrew raḥᵃmîm (as is oiktirmoi, etc.), a term which seems to denote the feeling of kinship between those born from the same womb or the maternal feeling of a mother who has given birth (reḥem, "womb").

2. Mercy on Israel.

God's dealings with Israel form for Paul the supreme example of mercy. When he is discussing the position of Israel* (Rom 9—11) he uses the verb eleeō, "to have mercy," eight times and the noun eleos, "mercy," three times. He finds God's treatment of the nation a superb illustration of his sovereign exercise of mercy.

Paul sees the divine mercy as extending to all peoples, not only to Israel. He emphasizes God's freedom to act as he wills. In making the point that salvation is God's free gift and that we sinners can do nothing to merit it, Paul quotes words of God: "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion" (Rom 9:15; citing Ex 33:19). It is the mercy of God that matters, not any human will or endeavor. Indeed Paul says explicitly, "So then it is not of him who wills nor of him who runs but of God who shows mercy" (Rom 9:16). And a little later he comes back to the theme with "he has mercy on whom he wills" (Rom 9:18). No human merit avails before God. Our salvation is due to the wonder of the divine mercy.

Paul wrestles with the problem of the divine choice of some while others are subjected to "the wrath* of God" (see Election). He does not produce theoretical reasons why some are saved and others are lost, but he insists that there are "vessels of wrath" which, he says, are "fitted for destruction." Over against them are "vessels of mercy which God has prepared beforehand for glory" (Rom 9:23). Paul leaves no doubt about the importance of mercy for the people who are saved. They are saved not on account of merit, but because God is merciful.

It is clear from Romans 9-11 that Paul suffered agonies over the failure of his own nation to embrace the gospel* (but cf. 1 Thess 2:16). The Jews were the people of God and it was inconceivable to him that they should fail at the last. There was no doubt about their rejection of the gospel in Paul's own day, but he sees this as part of the plan of God. The Gentiles were formerly disobedient to God but have "now obtained mercy because of the disobedience" of the Jews (Rom 11:30). The Jews were "enemies"* for the sake of the Gentiles* (Rom 11:28), which appears to mean that their rejection of the gospel was the means of its being preached to the Gentile nations and of the Gentiles obtaining mercy (Rom 11:31). The Gentiles should be duly appreciative of their high privilege, and Paul looks to them to "glorify God for his mercy" (Rom 15:9). Mercy is the keynote of the whole passage.

But the Jews are also "according to election beloved on account of the fathers" (Rom 11:28). This does not mean that every individual Israelite will be saved (any more than the preaching to the Gentiles means that all Gentiles will be saved). But it does mean that in the providence of God salvation will in due course reach the Jews and they too will know the divine mercy: "God has shut all up to disobedience that he may have mercy on all" (Rom 11:32).

3. Mercy as Incentive to Service.

Paul speaks of himself and his coworkers* as those who had their ministry* as people who had "obtained mercy" (2 Cor 4:1), and thus that they are not to lose heart. The mercy of God has been shown to them; therefore they should engage in the service* of God. In a very different context Paul gives an opinion on "virgins" in a matter where he has no divine command to which to appeal. He gives his advice "as one who has obtained mercy from the Lord to be faithful" (1 Cor 7:25). Those who have received mercy can speak because of that mercy, and the reception of mercy leads to faithfulness. It is on the grounds of "the mercies of God" that Paul makes his appeal to the Romans (Rom 12:1).

Paul recognizes that he had not been an ideal person prior to becoming a Christian and says that he had obtained mercy "so that in me as the foremost sinner Christ might demonstrate his longsuffering" (1 Tim 1:12-16). If God could show mercy to such a one as Saul the persecutor, he can show it to anyone! At the same time Paul recognizes that his ignorance was a mitigating factor (1 Tim 1:13).

Paul finds mercy in the ordinary affairs of life. He prays for mercy (Gal 6:16), especially in his greetings (1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2; Tit 1:4). He prays for Onesiphorus's household to find mercy (2 Tim 1:16, 18). And he sees evidence of God's mercy in the recovery of Epaphroditus from a serious illness (Phil 2:27; see Healing). Mercy is a quality believers should show as well as receive (Col 3:12). And Paul is anxious that they should show mercy cheerfully and not as a grim duty (Rom 12:8).

In addition to the words we naturally understand as mercy, Paul makes use of the word for "entrails" (splanchna), which was used for the deepest feelings and often denoted mercy. Paul mostly uses it for love and similar terms. He uses it almost in the sense of mercy when he speaks of longing for the Philippians with "the compassion of Jesus Christ" (Phil 1:8; cf. 2:1).

See also FORGIVENESS; GRACE; LOVE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. I. Andersen, "Yahweh, the Kind and Sensitive God," in God Who Is Rich in Mercy, ed. P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson (Sydney: Lancer, 1986) 41-48; R. Bultmann, "ἔλεος κτλ" TNDT II.477-87; C. H. Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1935) 55-69; H.-H. Esser, "Mercy, Compassion," NIDNTT 2.593-601; N. Glueck, Das Wort ḥesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauche als menschliche und gottliche gemeinschaftgemasse Verhaltungsweise (Geissen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1927); H. Köster, "σπλάγχνον κτλ," TDNT VII.548-59; N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament (London: Epworth, 1944) 94-130; H. J. Stoebe, "Die Bedeutung des Wortes Häsäd im Alten Testament," VT 2 (1952) 244-54.

L. Morris

MERCY SEAT. See EXPIATION, PROPITIATION, MERCY SEAT.

MERIT. See JUSTIFICATION; LAW; WORKS OF THE LAW.

MERKABAH MYSTICISM. See JEW, PAUL THE; MYSTICISM; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE.

MIDRASH. See JEW, PAUL THE; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

MIND. See PSYCHOLOGY.

MINISTRY

For the apostle* Paul, ministry included all that the exalted Christ* did and is doing through his people for the building of his church.* This involved the proper exercise of gifts* for ministry which Christ bestowed upon all his people, as well as the ministry of those who, like Paul, had been divinely appointed to establish and nurture churches. It also included those appointed by human agency to exercise leadership roles in the churches.

1. Ministry in the Pauline Churches
2. Paul as Minister
3. Eschatological Evaluation of Ministry

1. Ministry in the Pauline Churches.

The churches founded by Paul were "charismatic" communities, made up of individuals each of whom had received gifts of ministry to be exercised for the common good (1 Cor 12:7, 11). Some persons were appointed directly by God* to have a leadership role in the church, and their function was to equip the other members to exercise their own ministries. There is also evidence of more "official" ministries; those of bishops (overseers), elders and deacons, and of apostolic delegates as well, whose appointment was by human agency (see Apostle; Church Order and Government).

1.1. Pauline Churches as "Charismatic" Communities.

That Paul's churches were "charismatic" communities is implied in a number of places in his letters. In Galatians 3:5 the apostle asked his converts, "Does he who supplies the Spirit to you and work miracles among you [do so] by the works of the Law, or by [the] hearing of faith?" Paul's question would have had no point unless the presupposition underlying it were true, that is, that God was supplying them with the Spirit and working miracles* among them (see Holy Spirit). In 1 Thessalonians 5:19-21 Paul exhorted his readers: "Do not quench the Spirit; do not despise prophecies; but test everything." Such an exhortation presupposes a prophetic ministry inspired by the Spirit in the church at Thessalonica.* Paul's extended treatment of the charismata in 1 Corinthians 12—14 was in response to problems that had arisen in respect of "charismatic" ministry exercised in the church at Corinth* (see Worship).

1.2. All Believers as "Charismatic" Ministers. When dealing with the problems related to "charismatic" ministry in 1 Corinthians, Paul pointed out that all believers had been given one of a variety of manifestations of the Spirit to be used for the common good (1 Cor 12:4-11). These manifestations of the Spirit included the utterance of wisdom,* the utterance of knowledge,* faith,* gifts of healing,* working of miracles, prophecy,* discerning of spirits, various kinds of tongues* and the interpretation of tongues (1 Cor 12:7-10). In Romans 12:4-8 Paul stressed that believers had different gifts according to the grace* given to them. Those he listed include gifts of prophecy, service,* teaching,* exhortation, giving, leading and showing compassion. These lists were probably not meant to be exhaustive but illustrative of the manifold gifts of God to his people to facilitate the building up of his church. And this occurred when each part was working properly (Eph 4:16 NRSV), when each member of the church is using his/her gift for the common good (see Body of Christ).

1.3. Women in Ministry. There are many indications in the Pauline corpus that women labored alongside men in the cause of the gospel. First, there is the outstanding example of Priscilla. She and her husband, Aquila, were coworkers with Paul, and they risked their necks for his life. It was in their house that the church met, and for them all the churches of the Gentiles gave thanks (Rom 16:3-4; cf. 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Tim 4:19). Then there were Euodia and Syntyche, Paul's fellow-workers in the gospel who labored in the congregation at Philippi (Phil 4:2-3), the deacon Phoebe who served the church in Cenchreae (Rom 16:1-2), and Tryphaena and Tryphosa, workers in the Lord to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:12). In addition, there was possibly a person named Junia, who, with her partner Andronicus, was "outstanding among the apostles" (Rom 16:7, although this text could be read: "They are people well known to the apostles"). Further, there is the assumption in 1 Corinthians 11:4-5 that women prophesied and prayed in the congregation.

While Paul affirmed women's ministries, texts such as 1 Corinthians 11:2-16; 14:33b-35 and 1 Timothy 2:11-15 suggest that he expected them to exercise their ministries in ways that did not undermine the headship* of their husbands at least, if not male headship in general (see Man and Woman).

1.4. Divinely Appointed Ministers. While Paul spoke of all believers having gifts of ministry, he also believed that certain ones had been divinely appointed to have a leadership role in the church. Thus in 1 Corinthians 12:28, for example, he says that God appointed in the church first apostles, second prophets, third teachers (and then deeds of power, gifts of healing etc.). Such a view is also reflected in Ephesians 4:11-13, where it is said that the gifts of Christ are that some would be apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, whose task was to equip the saints for the work of ministry, for building up the body of Christ. The ministers mentioned here have a role vis-à-vis the rest of the members of the church, and function to equip them for their ministries (see Lincoln ad loc.).

1.5. Ministers Appointed by Human Agency. In the Pastoral* letters instructions were given to Timothy and Titus concerning the qualifications of those to be appointed as bishops, deacons and elders (1 Tim 3:1-7, 8-13; Tit 1:5-9). Such ministers were appointed by Paul and his delegates (Tit 1:5; cf. Acts 14:23). The task of the bishop involved teaching and managing the household* of God (1 Tim 3:2, 5). It would appear that the task of elders was to rule the church (1 Tim 5:17a) and that some of them also labored in preaching, teaching and refuting error (1 Tim 5:17b; Tit 1:9). No information is given concerning the actual task of deacons.

Because of the closeness of the descriptions of the tasks of bishops and elders, and because the words elders (presbyteroi) and bishops (episkopoi) appear to be used as synonyms in Titus 1:5, 7, it has generally been thought that in NT times these words were different terms for the same office. In recent times this identification has been called into question. Attention has been drawn to the fact that the early churches were house churches. Therefore, it has been suggested, the heads of households came to have supervisory responsibilities for the churches which met in their houses, and that these were the bishops of the early church (so, e.g., Theissen, Holmberg, Giles). Further, it has been suggested that as elders in the Jewish community were not synagogue officials but community leaders, so too early Christian elders were community leaders not church officials. Thus elders are to be distinguished from bishops in the NT. Bishops were the hosts of the house churches and they exercised a supervisory role over the church meeting in their houses. Elders were leaders in the Christian community, but were not necessarily hosts of house churches as well. There is the possibility that one person was both an elder (community leader) and a bishop (host of a house church) which accounts for the overlapping of the descriptions of the tasks of elders and bishops in the Pastoral Letters (Giles). If this suggestion could be shown to be correct, it would throw light upon the references to elders who rule only (community leaders only), and elders who also labor in teaching (hosts of house churches as well as community leaders).

1.6. The Ministry of Apostolic Delegates. Timothy and Titus appear to have functioned as delegates of the apostle Paul (1 Tim 1:3; Tit 1:5; see Coworkers). Timothy was instructed to counteract erroneous teaching (1 Tim 1:3-11), to order public worship* (1 Tim 2:1-15), to appoint bishops and deacons (1 Tim 3:1-13), to regulate the enrollment of widows on the list for financial* support (1 Tim 5:9-16), to ordain elders, but not hastily, (1 Tim 5:22), ensuring that they were properly remunerated and that no flippant charges were brought against them (1 Tim 5:17-21). Timothy's overall responsibilities are summed up in the instruction: "What you have heard from me through many witnesses, these things entrust to faithful people who will be able to teach others as well" (2 Tim 2:2). In other words, he was responsible to ensure the faithful handing-on of apostolic tradition to the next generation. Titus was instructed to appoint elders who were able to preach sound doctrine and refute those who contradicted it (Tit 1:5-9) and to do the same himself (Tit 1:10—2:2). He was to exhort the members of the Christian community to behave in ways that adorned the doctrine of God our Savior,* to be devoted to good works and avoid dissensions (Tit 2:3—3:11). Titus himself was to model what he taught (Tit 2:7-8).

1.7. Charisma and Office. Two interrelated questions are involved here. First, were the earliest Pauline churches dependent for their ministry upon "charismatic" individuals alone, there being no "official" ministers (i.e., those appointed by human agency) as well? The evidence of 1 Corinthians 12—14 seems, on first reading, to reflect a congregation that was ministered to only by those who were spontaneously endowed with various charismata. Further, Romans and 2 Corinthians give no indication that there were "official" ministers in the churches to which these letters were addressed. One might then be tempted to conclude that "official" leadership roles appeared only in a later, even post-Pauline, period when the ministry had developed away from the charismatic and spontaneous form it had earlier on (so, e.g., von Campenhausen).

However, there are difficulties with this view. For example, Paul's letter to the Philippians was addressed to the bishops and deacons (Phil 1:1), and in 1 Thessalonians 5:12 the apostle appeals to his readers to respect those who labored among them and who had charge of them. They were to esteem them highly because of their work. In 1 Corinthians 16:15-16 reference is made to the devoted service of Stephanus and others, to whom the Corinthians were urged to subject themselves. All this suggests that there were "official" ministries existing alongside the charismatic ministries in the Pauline churches from the earliest period.

This leads to a second question. If there were both charismatic and official ministries in the Pauline churches, were they antithetical to one another, as has sometimes been suggested? It is not easy to answer this question because of the scarcity of evidence. However, there are a few hints to be found, and these suggest that no such antipathy existed. For example, in the concluding chapter of his letter to the "charismatic" churches of Galatia, Paul says: "Let him who is taught the word share in all good things with the one who teaches" (Gal 6:6). This exhortation to supply the needs of the teacher is unlikely to be a request for assistance for Paul himself; such a request would be out of keeping with his overall stance as far as personal financial support is concerned. It is more likely to be an exhortation that one who was recognized as a teacher of the Galatian churches be supported by those who were taught by him. This suggests that the teacher was someone who had been set apart for this task; someone who exercised a kind of official ministry among the charismatic Galatian churches.

Another hint is found in 1 Thessalonians 5:12-13 where Paul says: "Recognize those who labor among you, and have charge of you in the Lord and admonish you; esteem them very highly in love because of their work." In this same letter, just a few verses later, Paul urges his readers not to quench the Spirit or despise the words of the prophets, but to test everything (1 Thess 5:19-21). So here, found side by side, we have references to those who "have charge of you" and to the ministry of Spirit-inspired prophets, without any hint of antipathy between them.

Finally, it is significant that there is included in the lists of gifts in both Romans and 1 Corinthians a reference to the ministry of leadership (Rom 12:8; 1 Cor 12:28). That this gift is listed among others of a more charismatic nature suggests that Paul saw no antipathy between what we might call charismatic and official ministries (so, e.g., Holmberg, Martin 1979).

1.8. The Church and the Ministry. One of the issues that has been much debated is the relationship of the ministry to the church. All agree that ultimately it must be Christ himself who commissions people for ministry in his church. The disagreement comes in respect of the means by which this commissioning is done. Is it (1) directly by God's call; or (2) by human agency, in any way the church chooses; or (3) by those who have themselves been commissioned by duly authorized persons? As far as the Pauline corpus is concerned, there appears to be no evidence that could be adduced in support of the second approach, but there is some evidence for the first and third approaches.

In support of the first, it may be noted that Paul himself claims to have been commissioned as an apostle by direct call of God and the revelation of Jesus Christ, without any involvement by those who were apostles before him (Gal 1:1, 15-16). In 1 Corinthians 12:28 he speaks of the appointment by God of apostles, prophets, teachers and other gifted individuals to minister to the church (cf. Eph 4:11-12). In all this there is no hint of any human commissioning. In these texts it appears that the bestowal of ministerial gifts by God constitutes the commission to use them, and the church's role is to recognize the gifts God has bestowed and to allow for their use (cf. 1 Thess 5:19-21).

In support of the third position, it may be noted that the Pastoral letters reveal that Paul himself appointed Timothy and Titus to act as his delegates in Ephesus and Crete respectively, and that they in turn were to appoint bishops, elders and deacons. Within the Pauline corpus, it is only in the Pastoral letters that any reference is made to the qualifications (aside from the brief designation of "those approved"—if not used ironically—in 1 Cor 11:19) and appointment of these ministers; however, the existence of such ministries is reflected in Philippians 1:1 and 1 Thessalonians 5:12 as well. The Pauline corpus leaves us completely in the dark as far as the involvement of the churches themselves in the process of the appointment of their bishops, elders and deacons, apart from the lists of desirable and necessary credentials and characteristics in 1 Timothy 3 and Titus 2.

2. Paul as Minister.

Paul saw his ministry primarily as an apostle of Christ, charged with the responsibility of bringing about the obedience of faith among the Gentiles. It was a ministry in which the exalted Christ himself was actively involved; a ministry carried out by word and deed and in the power of the Holy Spirit. His ministry was motivated primarily by a realization of the love* of Christ for all (2 Cor 5:14) and an awareness of the obligation he was under to fulfill the commission that had been given to him (1 Cor 9:16-17).

2.1. An Apostle of Jesus Christ. While Paul referred to himself variously as a minister of Christ (Rom 15:16; 2 Cor 11:23), a minister of the gospel (Eph 3:7; Col 1:23) and a minister of the church (Col 1:24-25), he saw himself primarily as an apostle* of Jesus Christ, one called and commissioned by the risen Lord to bring about the obedience of faith among the Gentiles* (Rom 1:5; Gal 1:15-16).

As an apostle, Paul acted as an ambassador for Christ, one through whom God made his appeal to people to be reconciled to him (2 Cor 5:20). Paul also spoke of this ministry in priestly terms. He was "a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles, serving the gospel of Christ as a priest, so that the offering [consisting] of the Gentiles may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Spirit" (Rom 15:16). It was possibly in response to Jewish suspicions about the "cleanness" of his Gentile converts that Paul was prompted to speak of his ministry in this way. He saw himself as a priest responsible for the offering of the Gentiles, and particularly for the purity of that offering. He presided over the offering of the Gentiles, and by his preaching and teaching ministry endeavored to ensure that they were an offering acceptable and well pleasing to God.

2.2. The Essential Elements of Paul's Ministry. The fundamental element of Paul's ministry was the preaching* of the gospel* (1 Cor 1:17). This, he recognized, was the means by which God had chosen to make himself known to people (1 Cor 1:21); this was the power of God for salvation* (Rom 1:16; 1 Cor 1:18). He was under obligation to preach this gospel, and faced dire consequences if he did not (1 Cor 9:16-17). The only option he had was whether or not to preach it free of charge, and he consistently chose to do it free of charge (1 Cor 9:18; 2 Thess 3:8).

Paul's gospel preaching was accompanied by the performance of the signs of an apostle: "signs and wonders and mighty works"* (2 Cor 12:12: evidently a Corinthian slogan taken over by Paul, see commentaries). In Romans 15:18-19 the apostle gave a summary description of his evangelistic ministry: "For I will not dare to speak of anything except what Christ has accomplished through me to [bring about] the obedience of the Gentiles, by word and deed, by the power of signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit [of God]." From this statement, reminiscent of the Synoptic descriptions of the public ministry of the historical Jesus, we can infer that the exalted Christ continued to accomplish through Paul's ministry what he had begun to do as the historical Jesus (see Jesus and Paul).

Paul's ministry to people did not cease once he had brought them to initial obedience of faith. He felt under obligation to teach, encourage and warn, so that his converts might reach maturity in Christ (Col 1:28). This involved him in continual anxiety over the churches, especially when he saw their members faltering in their Christian walk (2 Cor 11:28-29; Gal 4:19). In a striking metaphor Paul describes himself as one who betroths people to Christ: "I feel a divine concern for you, for I betrothed you to one husband, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ" (2 Cor 11:2). Through his apostolic preaching of the gospel he betrothed people to Christ. Then he was responsible to do all in his power* to ensure the continuance of their devotion to Christ until the day of Christ's coming. Such devotion was under threat when their thoughts were led astray by false teaching, and so the apostle sought by all means to make plain to them the truth of the gospel.

Prayer,* too, was an essential element of Paul's ministry. His letters abound with references to his prayers for his converts and others for whom he was responsible as apostle to the Gentiles (Rom 1:8-10; Eph 1:15-19; 3:14-19; Phil 1:3-5, 9-11; Col 1:9-12; 2 Tim 1:3; Philem 4-6). The burden of these prayers was that believers might know the hope to which they were called and the greatness of God's power at work in them (Eph 1:17-19); that they might be strengthened by the Spirit and comprehend the surpassing love of Christ (Eph 3:16-19); that their love might overflow in greater insight to know what is best, and so be blameless on the day of Christ (Phil 1:9-11), and that they might know God's will and so lead lives worthy of their Lord (Col 1:9-10).

A further aspect of Paul's ministry was conscious modeling of the sort of life believers should live. When the Corinthians had become puffed up with their own importance through what appears to have been overrealized eschatological notions, Paul urged them rather to be imitators of him, and to facilitate this he sent Timothy to remind them of his ways in Christ (1 Cor 4:16-17). Concluding his response to the Corinthian problem of eating meat offered to idols, Paul urged his readers to "give no offence to Jews or Greeks or the church of God." Rather they should be imitators of Paul, trying to please everyone in everything so that some might be saved (1 Cor 10:32—11:1; cf. 9:22). When warning the Philippians against those who lived as enemies* of the cross* of Christ, Paul urged them to "join in following my example, and observe those who live according to the example you have in us" (Phil 3:17). The Thessalonian believers were told to keep away from those who were living in idleness, and reminded of how Paul had worked day and night rather than be a burden to anyone, "in order to make ourselves an example for you, that you might imitate us" (2 Thess 3:7-9). It is not surprising, then, that we find in the Pastoral letters exhortations that Timothy and Titus should also set an example for the believers to follow (1 Tim 4:12; Tit 2:7; see Imitation).

2.3. The Involvement of the Exalted Christ. One of the striking things to emerge from a study of Paul's letters is his strong conviction that the exalted Christ was actively involved in his ministry. Paul ascribed the successes of his mission* to "what Christ has accomplished through me to [bring about] the obedience of the Gentiles" (Rom 15:18). It was the voice of Christ himself that was heard through the proclamation of the apostle and his colleagues (2 Cor 5:20; cf. Eph 2:17). Christ was the author of the "living letters" written in the hearts of men and women, but this he achieved through the "scribal" ministry of Paul and his colleagues, to whom was entrusted the precious "ink" of the Spirit (2 Cor 3:1-3). It was none other than Christ himself, Paul believed, who inspired him with the energy needed for the preaching and teaching ministry by which he sought to present men and women mature in Christ (Col 1:28-29).

2.4. Paul's Defense of his Ministry. Paul's apostolic ministry was called into question in both Galatia and Corinth (and maybe Philippi; see commentaries). In Galatia,* it would appear, Paul's opponents, the Judaizers,* had suggested that he had not been faithful to the commission they believed he had received from the Jerusalem* apostles, because he failed to include in his preaching the demand for circumcision.* In defense of his apostolic integrity and the truth of the gospel which he preached, Paul insisted that both his commission as an apostle and his understanding of the gospel for the Gentiles had been received neither from men nor through a man (Gal 1:1, 11). It had been given to him directly by a revelation from God (Gal 1:12, 15-17), and therefore, it is implied, there was no basis to any charge that he had been unfaithful to a commission received from the Jerusalem apostles.

In fact it was not until three years after his conversion-commissioning experience that he had his first contact with Peter* (Gal 1:18-21). And it was only after fourteen years that he laid the gospel he had been preaching before the Jerusalem apostles, and at that time they had added nothing to it (Gal 2:1-10). For this reason also, it is implied, he could not rightfully be accused of unfaithfulness to any commission received from Jerusalem.

In Corinth Paul experienced a strong attack upon his apostolate. This was made by those to whom he referred as "false apostles" (see Opponents). They accused him of being "bold" while absent and at a safe distance, but of being "timid" when present (2 Cor 10:1). He lived by worldly standards (2 Cor 10:2). He used to frighten people with stern letters from afar, but in person he was unimpressive and his speaking amounted to nothing (2 Cor 10:9-10). They criticized Paul's apostolate, saying it was inferior to their own, because he was not a trained speaker (2 Cor 11:5-6), he lacked proper Jewish ancestry (2 Cor 11:22), his apostolate was not based on visions and revelations (2 Cor 12:1) and "the signs of an apostle" were not performed by him (2 Cor 12:11-12). They also attacked Paul's personal integrity in financial matters, insinuating that his refusal to accept financial support from the Corinthians (as they themselves obviously did) was both evidence that Paul did not really love his converts (2 Cor 11:7-11), and a smokescreen behind which he intended to extract an even greater amount for himself through the ploy of the Collection* (2 Cor 12:14-18).

For the sake of the Corinthian church Paul felt obliged to point out that, although he might not be skilled in speaking, he did not lack knowledge* (2 Cor 11:6) or authority* (2 Cor 13:2-3, 10). He pointed out also that he had experienced visions* and revelations of God (2 Cor 12:1-5), that he did perform signs and wonders (2 Cor 12:11-13), and that he could show evidence that Christ spoke through him (2 Cor 13:2-3). However it is patently clear that Paul rejected this whole approach to evaluating claims to apostleship, and the triumphalist criteria involved. For Paul the marks of true apostolic ministry were its fruit (i.e., churches planted, 2 Cor 3:2-3), the character in which it is carried out (i.e., in accordance with the meekness and gentleness of Christ, 2 Cor 10:1) and the sharing of Christ's sufferings* (2 Cor 4:8-12; 11:23-33). Far from regarding his sufferings as something which disqualified his claim to apostleship, he actually appealed to them as legitimatizing evidence (cf. Gal 6:17).

2.5. The Simultaneity of Weakness and Power. Paul claimed to be the agent through whom God worked. His opponents in Corinth asserted that his lack of a commanding presence and his unimpressive speech (2 Cor 10:10) were inconsistent with this claim (see Rhetoric). Since the Corinthians had listened to his opponents in this matter, Paul wrote: "I said before . . . that if I come again I will not spare, since you desire proof that Christ is speaking in me," and he added, "he is not weak toward you, but is powerful among you. For he was crucified in weakness, but lives by the power of God" (2 Cor 13:2-4a). And then, to defend the "weakness"* of his own presence and ministry, while at the same time asserting that divine power was manifested through it, he wrote: "For we are weak in him, but in dealing with you we shall live with him by the power of God" (2 Cor 13:4b). Clearly we are here confronted with a paradox. The apostle implies that he is simultaneously identified with the Jesus who was crucified in weakness and with the Christ who now lives by the power of God.

The locus classicus for this teaching of power-in-weakness is 2 Corinthians 12:9-10: "He [the Lord] said to me, 'My grace is sufficient for you, for [my] power is made perfect in weakness.' I will all the more gladly boast of my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me . . . for when I am weak, then I am strong." Paul's words here indicate the simultaneity of weakness and power; it is in the very weakness of the apostle that the "epiphany" of God's power takes place. Thus, against his opponents in Corinth, Paul argued that while true apostolic ministry does involve the manifestation of the power of Christ, that power is manifested through the weakness of the apostle.

2.6. Motivation for Ministry. Paul's motivation was multifaceted. He was essentially driven by a realization of the love of Christ for himself personally and for all humanity (2 Cor 5:14-15; Gal 2:20). Alongside this was his sense of obligation to carry out the apostolic commission which had been given to him (Rom 1:14-15; 1 Cor 9:16-17), and a realization that he must give an account of his life and work to God (1 Cor 4:1-5; 2 Cor 5:9-10). The apostle was motivated by a strong desire to see fellow Jews brought to a saving knowledge of Christ (Rom 9:1-3; 10:1), and he hoped that his ministry among the Gentiles would make them jealous and so save some of them (Rom 11:13-14). Paul developed a strong affection for his converts, and this made him want to share with them, not only the gospel but his own self also (1 Thess 2:8). This affection made him want to visit them and pray for them (1 Thess 2:17-20; 3:9-10), and to spend both his resources and himself for them (2 Cor 12:15).

3. Eschatological Evaluation of Ministry.
Paul's ministry came under much criticism. The genuineness of his apostleship was called into question in Galatia, Corinth and Philippi. While he defended his apostolate against his critics for the sake of the truth of the gospel, ultimately he seems to have laid little store by the evaluations made of his ministry by his converts or anyone else (1 Cor 4:3), even the Jerusalem apostles (Gal 2:6). For Paul what counted was the evaluation to be made of his ministry when the Lord comes (see Eschatology).

The first hint of Paul's conviction about eschatological evaluation of ministry is found in 1 Thessalonians 2:19-20. Here the apostle expresses the hope that his converts will be his joy and crown of boasting on the day of the Lord. A similar hint is found in Philippians 2:14-16, where Paul urges his readers to live blameless lives so that in the day of Christ he may be proud that he had not run in vain nor labored in vain (see Futility).

The most developed form of this teaching is found in 1 Corinthians. In this letter Paul declares that he is not accountable to the Corinthians, asserting that for him it was a very small thing that he be judged by them or any human court (1 Cor 4:3). No judgment should be pronounced "before the Lord comes." When he comes all things will be brought to light and people will receive their commendation from God (1 Cor 4:5). Even clearer teaching is found in 1 Corinthians 3:10-15, where, using a building metaphor (with its fabulous as well as mundane building materials), Paul asserts that everyone's ministry will be tested by fire on the last day (1 Cor 3:13). It is possible that some Christians' ministries will not survive the testing, but even so they themselves will be saved (1 Cor 3:15). However, those whose ministries do survive the testing will receive rewards (1 Cor 3:14). Here we see the principle of eschatological validation, which Paul previously applied to his own ministry, extended to apply to the ministries of all those who take it upon themselves to build up the church.

See also APOSTLE; CHURCH; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; PASTOR, PAUL AS; SERVANT, SERVICE; WEAKNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (Faith and Order Paper No. 111; Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982); N. Baumert, "Charisma und Amt bei Paulus," in L'Apôtre Paul: Personnalité, Style et Conception du Ministère, ed. A. Vanhoye (Leuven: Leuven University, 1986) 203-28; H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (London: Adam & Charles Black, 1969); E. E. Ellis, Pauline Theology: Ministry and Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988; Exeter: Paternoster, 1988); K. Giles, Patterns of Ministry among the First Christians (Melbourne: Collins Dove, 1989); A. T. Hanson, The Pioneer Ministry (London: SPCK, 1975); B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. G. Kruse, New Testament Models for Ministry: Jesus and Paul (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1985); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, The Family and the Fellowship: New Testament Images of the Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979); idem, The Spirit and the Congregation: Studies in 1 Corinthians 12—15 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); L. Morris, Ministers of God (London: Inter-Varsity, 1964); P. Perkins, Ministering in the Pauline Churches (New York: Paulist, 1982); E. Schillebeeckx, Ministry: A Case for Change (London: SCM, 1981); G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1982); B. Witherington, Women in the Earliest Churches (SNTSMS 59; Cambridge: University Press, 1988).

C. G. Kruse

MIRACLES. See CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE; SIGNS, WONDERS, MIRACLES.

MISSION

Since the time of F. C. Baur the modern debate on Paul has repeatedly used the remarkable missionary expansion of first-century Christianity as an essential backdrop for understanding the conflicting forces out of which early Christianity took shape (see Paul and His Interpreters). And since the earliest Christian literature assigns to Paul a significant role in that expansion, the Pauline mission has also featured prominently in modern attempts to arrive at a comprehensive picture of early Christian development.

Even more so has Paul's mission proven foundational for understanding the apostle* himself. The outlines of his career, the contents of his letters and the structures of his thinking are all substantially determined by implications of his missionary vocation.

The modern study of Paul has focused on his mission principally in terms of his life and work, while consideration of that mission as an integral element of his thinking remains underdeveloped. An adequate assessment of Paul and his mission requires attention to both dimensions.

1. Paul's Missionary Activity
2. Paul's Missionary Thought

1. Paul's Missionary Activity.
Paul's permanent historical significance is commonly taken to be that he was the first to give theological articulation to the early Christian proclamation and to work out reflectively the issues which it raised. But the historical significance of Paul's missionary labors must not be underestimated. At all points the apostle's theological articulations were called forth from within the context of his Gentile* mission. By means of that mission Paul also contributed to the remarkably early transposition of the new faith from the limited sphere of Judaism into the broader frame of the Gentile world, thereby making it possible for Christianity to survive and flourish as a distinct movement after A.D. 70. And in the process Paul's mission became for all religious history a preeminent model of organized missionary outreach.

Nevertheless, in his missionary labors Paul himself achieved the planting of the gospel only in certain principal cities along the northeastern arc of his Mediterranean world. He neither inaugurated the opening of the faith to Gentiles, nor did he originate the active proclamation to Gentiles, nor did he initiate their inclusion in the Christian communities. Nor can Paul even be credited with accomplishing the principal portion of the missionary expansion during the first generation. What then did Paul do in his missionary career?

1.1. Historical Career. Paul's missionary effort has become a dominant model in the history of Christian expansion not least because the author of Luke-Acts chose to highlight the Pauline mission, and did so with often vivid and lively narrative. The question of what indeed happened in the Pauline mission has therefore become bound up with questions about appropriate sources for the study of Paul, and especially with contentions about the historical reliability of Acts.

Yet one should note that, with respect to the general outline of Paul's missionary career, it is the traditional chronology which the recent debate has called most prominently into question, not the geographical locations which Paul visited during his career nor the larger sequences of his movements through those areas—except for questions about the "first tour" in southern Asia Minor (Acts 13—14) and the well-known uncertainties regarding Galatia (see Chronology; Itineraries). The consequence, significantly, is that the still-disputed modern reconstructions of Paul's missionary career tend to reschedule that career rather than reroute it.

This is so not least because both in the general scheme of Paul's missionary movements, as well as in their details, at those points where Paul's letters can serve as a check, the record available in Acts is found to be in fairly close and sometimes quite precise accord with the letters. This fact has suggested to many (including Cadbury, Dibelius, Haenchen) that, at least with respect to the itinerary of the Pauline mission, the writer of Acts often had access to dependable information.

Thus with reference to the general scheme of Paul's mission, both the letters and Acts place Paul in the same area of the Mediterranean world and in the same provinces, and take him through these provinces in the same general sequence. That is to say, Paul's area of mission in all the sources is the northeastern Mediterranean world, ranging between Judea and the Adriatic. And he moves through this area roughly from east to west, touching Syria and Cilicia, Macedonia, Achaia and Asia—and touching them in that order (as well as Galatia at some point along the way).

That Paul was conscious of this geographical pattern in his missionary career is made explicit in his summation at the end of his Aegean period: "From Jerusalem and as far round as Illyricum I have fully preached the gospel of Christ" (Rom 15:19). At this point both the Roman letter and the narrative of Acts (Acts 19:21) indicate that Paul intended to travel to Jerusalem* and then to Rome. Only Acts reports subsequent visits to Jerusalem and Rome,* whereas only in Romans* do we encounter Paul's plans for going on further west beyond Rome to Spain—because, as he states, he no longer had "any room for work in these regions" (Rom 15:22; cf. 2 Cor 10:12-16). Thus Paul both proceeded in his missionary activities and surveyed them in a manner confirming the presence of a geographical factor in his conception of what he was about. Mission was for Paul in part a geographically definable accomplishment.

The sources also bear witness to a second defining dimension of the Pauline mission, namely Paul's commitment to founding and nurturing Christian communities as the central goal of his missionary endeavors in any particular region. Paul did indeed engage in missionary preaching stage by stage in his journeys. And he actively sought individual conversions as part of his calling. But these evangelistic functions were pursued as necessary preliminary steps in a larger missionary objective to form communities of believers region by region throughout his part of the world. It is hardly accidental that Paul did not picture himself as a maker of bricks but as a builder of buildings (cf. 1 Cor 3:10). His mission was focused on corporate achievement.

Yet even the emergence of such communities proves an insufficient measure of Paul's missionary intentions. Paul repeatedly displays a sense of obligation not only to founding but also to nurturing such communities, not only to begetting but also to rearing, not only to planting but also to cultivating. For this reason he regularly revisits churches he has previously founded, and shows an inclination to pursue a residential ministry* of edification wherever possible. As Paul explains about his activities cut short at Thessalonica: "You know how, like a father with his children, one by one we exhorted you and encouraged you and charged you to walk worthy of God" (1 Thess 2:10-12). Paul's missionary commitment to nurturing his newly founded churches is most directly demonstrated by the existence of the very letters themselves. These letters are not evangelistic pieces: the Paul who is available to us at first hand is available almost exclusively in the community-nurturing dimension of his missionary role.

These indications accord with Paul's representation to the Colossians of his missionary assignment: "We proclaim [Christ], warning everyone and teaching everyone in all wisdom, so that we may present everyone mature in Christ" (Col 1:28). Likewise, Paul characterizes his letter and his proposed visit to the Roman community as edificatory in intent, and then expressly justifies this intention by referring to the nature of his missionary vocation (Romans 1:5-15; 15:14-21). A distinguishing dimension of the Pauline mission is that it found its fullest sense of completion neither in an evangelistic preaching tour nor in individual conversions but only in the presence of firmly established churches (Bowers 1987).

Both from these broader characteristics, and from details recoverable from the sources, one can propose certain predominant patterns in Paul's missionary career. (1) Paul is committed to introducing the gospel* where it has not yet been heard, to a pioneering function at the frontiers of the Christian expansion. (2) He understands this commitment to imply geographical movement in the proclamation of the gospel. (3) He conceptualizes such movement in terms of specific geographical areas. (4) Paul attempts to canvass these areas in a roughly contiguous sequence, from east to west. (5) Within that compass Paul seeks to establish Christian communities in the main population centers of each region. (6) Paul's missionary commitment includes nurturing such communities toward mature stability. (7) Once he takes this to be accomplished, Paul feels that he has "no more room" for his particular missionary calling in these areas, and is prepared to move on.

1.2. Methods and Strategy. In attempting to discern the contours of Paul's missionary approach, we must recognize at once that Paul was by no means the only figure engaged in religious propaganda in his day. If Paul traveled about among urban centers, preaching publicly and soliciting converts in synagogue and marketplace and private dwelling, such methods of religious attraction turn out on fuller inquiry to have been a widespread feature of the Greco-Roman world. The itinerant preachers of Hellenism,* the devotees of the mysteries and the faithful of the Jewish synagogue were all engaged in religious propaganda of one form or another, as of course were many early Christians besides Paul. One contribution of the religionsgeschichtliche ("history-of-religions") emphasis earlier in this century was to throw fresh light on the Pauline mission by exploring those methods which Paul apparently utilized in common with the numerous other examples of religious outreach in his day (Cumont, Nock 1933).

But it has not yet been sufficiently recognized that the Pauline model also diverges from each of these other examples of first-century religious propaganda in important aspects, and that these differences help to define more effectively the nature of the Pauline mission (Bowers 1980). Such divergence is apparent not least with regard to the geographical dimension of Paul's missionary conception and the ecclesial focus of his endeavors. Thus the deliberateness with which Paul pursued a geographically definable expansion of the faith unexpectedly proves on closer review to be an approach to religious outreach apparently lacking effective parallel in his day. And the focus of Paul's missionary efforts on founding and nurturing believing communities also appears to lack exact equivalent among other examples of religious propaganda of his world.

Recent studies have tended to confirm these distinctions in several important respects. For example, the latest reassessments of the Jewish proselyte movement raise serious doubts whether one should speak of Jewish "missionaries" during the Second Temple period, or even of a Jewish "mission" at that time (McKnight, Goodman). Even if the case may prove to be somewhat more nuanced, the cautionary implications for comparisons with the Pauline mission are salutary.

Likewise the conventional depiction of the "missionary expansion" of the mystery religions throughout the Roman world has now been subjected to authoritative challenge (MacMullen 1981, 98-99, 111-12; cf. Nilsson, 670, 699-700; Nock 1972, 81). On closer inquiry this expansion proves not to have been so diffuse, and to have occurred principally by the relocation of existing converts rather than by any deliberate outreach (see Religions, Greco-Roman).

Indeed, the degree to which the early Christian mission itself may have proceeded by patterns familiar from the Pauline model, both in the first and in succeeding centuries, has also been questioned (MacMullen 1984, 34, 136 n.29; cf. Beskow, Congar). The public evangelist seeking to plant churches territory by territory is hardly discernible in early Christian history after Paul. In short, recent reassessment is supporting the suggestion that the first-century world was not widely populated by "missionaries" of the Pauline type.

Scholarship in general has yet to reckon with the degree to which these clarifications seriously undermine the accepted depictions of religious propaganda in the time of the Early Empire. This would apply not least to the extensive and still influential description worked out by D. Georgi. Georgi argues that Paul found himself competing with a whole class of early Christian "missionaries" modeled on types familiar from Hellenistic Judaism and pagan Hellenism. But on closer scrutiny the evidence offered for discerning such deliberately "missionary" types substantially vanishes, making a reexamination of the entire question desirable. At the very least one must now expect a much more cautious precision than exhibited by Georgi and others in sorting out the variant models of religious propaganda in Paul's time.

While the inquiries of comparative-religion scholarship earlier in this century were useful in drawing attention to these movements and to their similarities with the early Christian mission, no systematic and comprehensive study is yet available which treats with sufficient sensitivity and precision the rich variety of approaches to religious expansion in the first-century world. Such investigations would help considerably to sharpen and refine the scholarly characterizations of Paul's own missionary activity and its particular place in early Christian development.

The emerging sociological approach in NT studies has fruitfully taken up certain lines of this inquiry. For example, G. Theissen (1982) has sketched out a suggestive distinction between the "itinerant charismatic" preachers of early Palestinian Christianity and what is taken to be the more orderly and sophisticated mission of Paul as a "goal-oriented community organizer." According to Theissen, the former were devoted to proclamation but not to community formation. And while they traveled constantly, their itinerancy was not organized in a manner that could sustain proclamation to distant lands.

Theissen has also helpfully illumined economic dimensions of the early Christian mission, while R. F. Hock has contributed to a better understanding of the social context of Paul's tentmaking* vocation in relation to his missionary role. Most of the principal sociological inquiries in Pauline studies have, however, tended more to illuminate the results of the Pauline mission, including the social status of the members of his communities, the structures of those communities and Paul's troubled relationships with them, rather than the dynamics of the mission itself (Meeks et al.; see Social Setting of Mission Churches; Social-Scientific Approaches to Paul).

Those sociological analyses which have ventured into interpreting the Pauline mission itself have not been entirely successful. Writers have variously interpreted the early Christian mission in terms of a "millenarian movement" or a "conversionist sect," based on models drawn from the sociology of religion. Relying on some of these materials, F. Watson has vigorously promoted a not altogether novel paradigm for the origins of Paul's mission and theology. According to Watson, Paul turned to the Gentiles only after he had failed as a Christian missionary to his fellow Jews (Gal 5:11). To ensure that the second venture would not also fail, Paul found it expedient to discard the normal legal requirements for Gentile inclusion, which led in turn to separation from the Jewish community. Thus whereas Christianity had hitherto functioned as a reformist movement within Judaism, in Paul's mission it became transformed into a dissident sect outside of Judaism, and one therefore requiring its own legitimating rationalizations. Paul's theological perspectives on Judaism and the Law derive from these sociological necessities.

Watson can only achieve this reconstruction by overlooking fundamental inconveniences to his theory. Thus he fails to clarify why, if Paul was so capable of missionary expediency, he did not first engineer a radical accommodation of his message for his hesitant Jewish hearers, sufficient to avert the failure of that earlier mission. Nor can Watson offer supporting examples where a Jewish preacher, rejected by his own people, promptly compensated by turning to the Gentiles. The link with social theory claimed for the inquiry is also only minimally in evidence. Watson has raised useful questions about the origins of the Pauline mission and about its resulting implications for Pauline theology, but the answers he proposes fall short of persuasiveness.

The methodology of much recent sociological analysis of the NT has now been subjected to a careful assessment by Holmberg, who severely criticizes the tendency often found in such studies to handle sociological models as factually determinative rather than as interpretively suggestive. Holmberg particularly dis-credits the adequacy of millennial, conversionist and sectarian models as currently deployed. Sociological interpretations of the missionary phenomena in the first century, including the Pauline mission, will likely have much to offer, but have yet to be worked out with sufficiently credible methodological discipline.

W. D. Davies, discussing territoriality in early Christianity, criticizes the persisting notion that the Pauline mission must have functioned on the basis of a larger strategy (Davies 1974, 180-82), a perception first given prominence in the writings of W. M. Ramsay nearly a century ago. In Ramsay's view, the missionary efforts of Paul the Roman citizen disclose the operations of a conscious "imperial" strategy to render the Christian faith coextensive with the Empire. Ramsay points especially to Paul's evident predilection for the strategic cities and roads of the Roman world. But most material and ideological commerce would have flowed inevitably along these very lines, not owing to any conscious strategy but by the necessity of the available routes and the locations of major populations (see Itineraries, Travel Plans, Journeys, Apostolic Parousia; Travel in the Roman World).

In an often cited article, J. Knox (1964) has suggested that underlying Paul's choice of words in surveying his mission in Romans 15:19 is the hint of a larger missionary plan to proceed in circuit right around the Mediterranean world. In terms of this more comprehensive plan Paul is claiming so far to have completed the first leg up to Illyricum, and is projecting a second leg to Spain. The lexical hint that forms the basis of Knox's proposal is very slender at best, and no supporting indications exist that Paul ever entertained missionary intentions toward Egypt or other parts of the southern Mediterranean coast.

If a comprehensive strategy or plan is not demonstrable for Paul's mission, he did certainly perceive the scope of his assignment in broad terms. Thus the spreading gospel is "bearing fruit and growing in the whole world" (Col 1:6), and his own apostleship is "for obedience of faith among all the nations" (Rom 1:5). And the presence of Spain in Paul's missionary plans probably also indicates, at least in part, a desire to attain to "the ends of the earth" of OT eschatology. In antiquity Spain was conceived to lie at the western edge of the inhabited earth, and of the four extremities of popular conception it was the only one within the Empire and hence relatively accessible. Given the already generally westward orientation of his missionary movement, Paul may have come to look on Spain as an eschatologically meaningful objective for his mission, so that by preaching in Spain he would have traversed his world with the gospel, from its place of origin at the eastern edge of the empire right across to earth's western boundary.

Nevertheless, the inherited outlook of Paul's Roman citizenship may have acted as a limitation upon his practical geographical interests. The known world of Paul's day was considerably larger than the Roman Empire, and not least in Jewish consciousness since a significant portion of the Diaspora* was resident in the East. Luke's inhabited world apparently stretched at least from Ecbatana to Rome (Acts 2:9-11), and contemporary references to India and the Ganges were not uncommon. Yet the boundaries of Paul's active missionary interest appear rather to have been essentially from Jerusalem to Gades, entirely within the confines of the Empire. The reference to Arabia in Galatians 1:17, if relevant, is not an exception, since Arabia fell within the sphere of Roman suzerainty. Paul may speak of barbarians and Scythians, but there is neither word nor movement that even hints at projected travel outside the jurisdictions of the Empire. In that sense Paul was not a "foreign" missionary, and the operational world of his missionary vision as available to us was apparently something less than the known world of his day.

1.3. Conversion and Call. The complex of issues relating to Paul's Damascus experience admit of at least one fixed point, namely that Paul believed that Jesus had appeared to him alive (1 Cor 15:8; see Conversion and Call). Pauline scholarship has long busied itself with the various theological consequences that might flow from such an experience, especially in light of what may have been Paul's pre-Christian dispositions and activities. But the pivotal significance of the Damascus experience for Paul is not exhausted by reference to the encounter alone. The relevant data indicate a close correlation in the apostle's thinking between his sense of encounter and his sense of personal calling. God revealed his Son in him, Paul declares, "in order that I might preach him among the Gentiles" (Gal 1:15-16).

The modern study of Paul has often attempted to explain Paul's sense of missionary calling as an inevitable theological derivative of his vision. The Damascus event precipitated a sequence of soteriological insights resulting in the acknowledgement that a Law-free gospel must by its nature be universal in applicability. This universalistic perception led in turn to a conviction of the legitimacy and even the necessity of a Gentile mission. One must, however, discount this conventional explanation of Paul's sense of missionary calling for at least two reasons.

In the first place, Paul understands his call to Gentile mission as a specific individual assignment, which he grounds not in a common experience in Christ but in a unique personal experience which set him apart. Had he arrived at his sense of vocation based on his soteriology, he would have understood that vocation to be applicable to all believers in general. The evident particularity of his sense of vocation renders inadequate any attempt to explain his call simply as a necessary theological consequence of his conversion.

In the second place, the theological connections which are supposed to have led inevitably from encounter to call cannot be sustained. A resurrection* appearance would certainly require the sort of christological* reorientation evident in Paul, and this should imply a new valuation of the cross* and the Law,* and hence a new soteriology. But if the new soteriology would permit a universalizing ingredient, does it require it? It is arguable that soteriological universalism* is not inevitably implied in a Law-free gospel. But even more to the point, mission is not an inevitable derivative of soteriological universalism. A belief in universal access does not inexorably lead to a sense of universal mission. A conviction that a message is applicable to everyone, and a conviction that one is obliged to make that message known to everyone are two different beliefs—without necessary correlation, as the subsequent history of Christianity itself has repeatedly demonstrated.

Given the available evidence, it would seem better to understand Paul's Damascus experience as both encounter and call, as an encounter with the risen Christ which Paul understood to include a special commission to Gentile mission. Once this duality of Paul's initial experience is acknowledged, the contours both of his missionary career and of his theological development can be appropriately clarified. The resurrection appearance called forth certain theological adjustments, adjustments which were then worked out within the specific framework of a Gentile mission vocation, and which moved toward solutions to questions arising from within that historical context.

It is useful to note that, while an encounter with Jesus in resurrected glory could not help but bear revolutionary theological implications for Paul as an unconverted Pharisee, a divine summons to Gentile outreach by itself would not have required a similar radical reorientation for such a person (see Jew, Paul the). Since the Jewish community of Paul's day generally maintained an openness toward Gentile accessions, a simple assignment to Gentile outreach of itself should not have proved especially incompatible with Paul's pre-conversion disposition. It was the christological encounter that provided the creative force in Paul's theological renovation, and the commission that determined its direction of development. Either without the other cannot adequately account for all the historical and theological data involved.

That is not, of course, to conclude that everything happened at once for Paul: encounter, call, a specific focus on Gentiles, the energetic Pauline mission, and a developed Pauline mission theology. The sources suggest otherwise. Subsequent decisive experiences at Jerusalem* and Antioch,* and indeed in his missionary travels, certainly also fundamentally shaped Paul's later sense of his missionary vocation. (For the place of Paul's outreach within the development of the early Christian mission, see now especially Hengel 1983.)

Although S. Kim's extensive analysis of Paul's Damascus experience and its theological consequences provides useful access to the issues and literature in the modern debate, the incompleteness of the inquiry bears notice. While Kim argues for the duality of the initial event, he fails to provide any detailed consideration of Paul's apostolic self-understanding and universal mission, acknowledging in the conclusion that this aspect must yet await his attention. The limitation for the entire enterprise implied by this omission should not be overlooked.

2. Paul's Missionary Thought.

Whatever the impact of Paul's missionary career on the subsequent history and literature of Christianity, his thinking about mission (as distinguished from his activity in mission) has received relatively meager elaboration in modern scholarly study. From F. C. Baur to A. Schweitzer to R. Bultmann and E. P. Sanders, the mission of Paul as a historical reality is used to provide essential backdrop for assessing the structure and content of Pauline theology. But, with notable exceptions, the apprehension of Paul's mission within his theological reflection, as one of its integral and even generative features, can only be found at the margins of the scholarly discussions or in some underlying assumptions. This deficiency is yet to be addressed adequately even within contemporary Pauline research.

Yet given Paul's evident preoccupation with his vocational mission, we may rightly suppose that no adequate understanding of Pauline theology will be achieved until his perspective on mission has been integrated into the larger interpretation of his theology, showing the place and relationships of the Gentile mission within his theological reflection. Without such an achievement, we will not have an adequate understanding either of Paul's mission or of his theology.

2.1. The New Perspective on Paul. In his path-breaking inquiry Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977), E. P. Sanders offered a two-part answer to the question of a proper starting point for understanding Paul's thinking, the central locus (see Center) from which all the rest may be explained: "There appear to me to be two readily identifiable and primary convictions which governed Paul's Christian life: (1) that Jesus Christ is Lord, that in him God has provided for the salvation of all who believe, . . . and that he will soon return to bring all things to an end; (2) that he, Paul, was called to be the apostle to the Gentiles" (Sanders 1977, 441-42). From these two generative foci Sanders believes he can explain the entire complex of Pauline reflection. Thus in one of the most influential contemporary studies on Paul, the issue of the Gentile mission in Paul's theology has been fundamentally reasserted.

Sanders did not go on in this study to elaborate the role of the Pauline mission in Paul's theology, since his particular concern was Paul's attitude towards Judaism and the Law. But Sanders does suggest that Paul's call to Gentile mission played a pivotal role in that question. It was Paul's sense of calling that required him to understand that the salvation* available in Christ was for all, both Jew and Gentile (Sanders 1977, 442-43). His resulting attitude toward Judaism and its Law thus arose from his prior conviction of the universal nature of the salvation offered in Christ. "It is the Gentile question and the exclusivism of Paul's soteriology which dethrone the law" (Sanders 1977, 497). Sanders's follow-up study, Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (1983), in further considering Paul's attitude toward Judaism, asks how Paul understood himself and his work, and addresses in some detail the question whether Paul's mission included an outreach to Jews, which Sanders denies (see the balanced assessment of this in Hultgren, 137-43).

In the lively debate which has followed Sanders's new perspective, although the proposal regarding the formative place of the Gentile mission in Paul's theology has largely remained a suggestive pointer for future discussion, some have seen in this particular theme a helpful basis for addressing the larger questions of current Pauline research. This approach appeared first in a remarkably suggestive contribution by N. T. Wright (1978), and has since been elaborated in some detail by J. D. G. Dunn in a series of publications beginning with "The New Perspective on Paul" in 1983. Dunn proposes that early Christians were faced with the question of how, with the coming of Jesus the Messiah, they should relate to their covenantal* obligations under Judaism. Should the people of God still be defined, and should the Gentiles be incorporated, on terms of distinctively Jewish national identity? According to Dunn, it is on just this point that Paul's answer develops, namely that the advent of Christ has introduced the time of the covenant's fulfillment, the realization of God's eschatological purpose as proclaimed to Abraham*: "In you shall all the nations be blessed." The fulfillment of the covenant therefore requires that covenantal participation no longer be established by legalistic badges of national identity (see Works of the Law).

Sanders and those engaged in the debate precipitated by his proposals have by no means been the first to affirm the significance of Gentile mission in Paul's theology. At least four strands of the scholarly discussion have previously attended to the question in one form or another.

2.2. Mission in Biblical Perspective. The modern western missionary movement, in its search for a credible biblical undergirding, has from time to time called forth certain contributions of merit from the scholarly community, which have in turn secured a place within the general debate on Paul and his theology. Among the more notable examples have been the classic treatment by F. Hahn, Mission in the New Testament (1963), and the broader inquiry by D. Senior and C. Stuhlmueller, The Biblical Foundations for Mission (1983) (also, e.g., Allen, Kuhn, Blauw, Green, Haas, Hinson, Gilliland, Bosch). While these studies have usually been elicited by interests external to modern Pauline research, and have tended more to offer summary and synthesis of scholarly findings than to break new ground, they have nevertheless played a fruitful role in keeping alive relevant questions about the early Christian mission.

2.3. Paul's Universalism. From Baur onward the recurrent pattern in Pauline scholarship has been to assume that the place of mission in Paul's theology is adequately addressed by attending to the issues relating to Paul's "universalism."* Thus Baur identified the heart of Paul's controversy with Jerusalem in terms of a struggle between a Jewish-Christian particularism and a Pauline universalism. Paul's apostolic mission was but the outward expression of his conviction that in the new faith the exclusiveness of Judaism must be abandoned, the nationalistic distinction between Jew and Gentile must be systematically rejected, and the principle must be established that salvation is for all people. It is in order to establish this fundamental universalism that he denies the validity of salvation by works of the Law. Such an approach assumes rather than demonstrates that Paul's mission is theologically explicated by reference to his universalism.

But can one find in Paul's universalistic soteriology

the generative theological explanations for his mission? The assumed linkage of concepts suffers in the first place from a persisting looseness in defining "universalism." The various notions evident from religious history which scholars so easily combine under the rubric of universalism in fact represent a considerable diversity of perspectives. Thus what appears on first glance in Paul to represent a dramatic removal of distinctions, a sweeping universalizing of religion, proves on closer inspection to be no more than a redefined particularism. What we actually find in Paul could be termed a universal access to a particularistic community. Everyone may enter, but those who do so have entered into a distinct group which is not universal, but only representatively universal. If "universalism" means universal access to a particularistic community, then one must note that the term could as well be applied to the Judaism of Paul's day. Where Paul differed from contemporary Judaism was not in offering access without ethnic distinctions, but in offering a means of access and a resulting community that were not linked to ethnic exclusiveness.

But the more substantial deficiency in the analysis of Pauline universalism and mission which Baur inaugurated lies in the fact that "universalism" does not explain mission. In the actual history of religions, universalism can exist without mission, and mission can exist without universalism. There is no necessary correlation. The conviction that anyone may be admitted is not at all the same as the conviction that everyone must be actively invited. Therefore, the presence in some form of a universalistic religious conviction in Paul may be congenial to his mission, but it neither requires that mission, nor does it explain its emergence. And once the inquiry has gone further to distinguish the nature of the Pauline mission as a deliberate aggressive outreach, then the inadequate explanatory power of Pauline universalism becomes readily apparent. While there may be many instances in religious history where a universalistic conviction has generated a missionary impulse, there are undoubtedly as many or more instances where it has not, where the attitudes of acceptance ("if anyone knocks, we will open") and of availability ("if anyone asks, we will answer") have not inevitably been followed by, or given rise to, a sense of compulsion to move out persuading and inducing others to knock and to ask. And hence when all discussion of Pauline universalism is concluded, the question of the place of Paul's mission in his theology remains unresolved.

In the religionsgeschichtliche phase of Pauline studies, these issues of particularism and universalism became submerged. With the presumption that the Hellenistic world and its religious energies furnished the essential setting for interpreting Paul, the particularistic preoccupations of the world of Judaism dropped easily from view. Baur's supposed struggle between the Jerusalem church's exclusivism and Paul's inclusivism no longer offered the consequential key for interpreting early Christian development. Within the new interpretive framework any missionary effort per se appears as an interesting but inconsequential historical accessory to the central theological questions, and the more so on the supposition that comparable missionary undertakings were a pervasive feature of the Hellenistic religious world. On such terms Paul's mission, far from requiring theological explanation, seemed sufficiently comprehensible simply as another reflection of Paul's Hellenistic milieu.

In his Paul and Rabbinic Judaism in 1948, W. D. Davies carefully reasserted the significance of Paul's Jewish religious background for any adequate interpretation of Paul, including any assessment of Paul's Gentile-mission thinking. According to Davies, postexilic Judaism gradually gave up the OT prophetic expectation that the Gentiles would be included in the blessings of the messianic kingdom, while increasingly accommodating an exclusivist nationalism. The result was an uneasy conscience respecting the Gentiles, evident not least in the rise of the proselyte movement as an alternative solution to their fate. Yet Judaism remained ambivalent toward the results of that approach. Although the Rabbis maintained an open door to accessions from among the Gentiles, a persisting lack of enthusiasm toward the process is also evident.

For Davies this tension at the heart of late Judaism, the struggle between a narrow nationalism and a concern for the fate of the Gentiles, is directly reflected in Paul's own attitudes. Universalism, Davies states, was implicit in Paul's conversion experience; in Christ he found his nationalism necessarily transcended. "To be converted had meant for Paul to be a missionary to the Gentiles" (Davies, 58). Yet Paul the apostle to the Gentiles could never entirely shake off the ethnic particularism of his heritage, even as he courageously worked his way toward a true universalism. Whatever else one may make of the inner contradictions of his arguments in Romans 9—11 respecting Jews and Gentiles in the divine economy, they are but one more confirmation of the significance of his Jewish background for understanding the man and his theology.

In Bultmann the issues of Jewish particularism and Pauline universalism were transposed from a question of ethnic identity into a question of existential individualism. Under the requirements of Bultmann's hermeneutical enterprise, legalistic Jewish exclusivism comes to represent for Paul not a corporate particularism but a universal individualism, the assertive self seeking to achieve its own salvation. Once Judaism is taken as the symbol of a universal religious stance, issues of ethnic exclusivism and inclusivism as perceived by Paul and the Judaism of his day can no longer be relevant categories of analysis. And under such interpretive impulses it is not surprising that, whereas in his treatment of the development of early Christian theology Bultmann everywhere presupposes the historical process of the early Christian mission, any need for explaining Paul's singular missionary preoccupation within an exposition of his theology goes unattended.

2.4. The Käsemann/Stendahl Debate. E. Käsemann was the first to break with the mold of Bultmann's interpretive enterprise, arguing against an exclusively individualistic focus, and asserting the cosmic and apocalyptic* dimensions of Paul's soteriological theology. In doing so Käsemann reopened the possibility of addressing the place of mission in Paul's theology, within a context of fresh and fruitful insights. But Käsemann could not break entirely from Bultmann's conception that Paul was opposing Jewish legalism, nor from an individualistic conception of salvation by faith.* And he therefore initiated a celebrated debate with K. Stendahl, directed against Stendahl's influential 1963 investigation, "The Apostle Paul and the Introspective Conscience of the West" (see Stendahl 1976).

Stendahl had argued that Paul's theology took its central orientation not from the question of Law and gospel but from the question of the place of the Gentiles in God's plan. Paul's problem is not the anguished guilty conscience seeking divine grace; that is the problem of an Augustine or a Luther. For Paul the vital concern was how his call to Gentile outreach could be interpreted within God's age-old salvific operation.

Käsemann took stern exception to this approach (see Käsemann 1971), in part because he thought its heilsgeschichtliche flavor to be dangerous for modern Christianity, and in part in order to defend the traditional Reformation perception that justification* by faith functions at the center of Paul's theology. The contention was sharp and not always clarifying, not least because both men sometimes allowed their variant twentieth-century agendas to intrude inordinately upon their historical judgments.

Nevertheless, by breaking the grip of Bultmann's powerful exposition, Käsemann allowed the study of Paul to resonate once again with elements in the apostle's thinking otherwise elusive to existentialist interpretation. And Stendahl, by breaking with the "Lutheran" exposition of Paul, and pointing toward the formative issue of Gentile inclusion in Paul's thought, allowed Pauline research to assess with much greater flexibility the inner structure of Paul's theology. Equally important, the Käsemann/Stendahl debate served to bring the then-dominant existential approach to Paul into a necessary and creative interaction with an alternative eschatological interpretation of Paul, and it did so specifically with respect to questions of the Gentile mission. The full implications of this development, reinforced almost immediately by Sanders's decisive intervention in the interpretation of Paul, are still being worked out in current Pauline studies.

2.5. Paul's Eschatological Self-Understanding. While A. Schweitzer's influential 1911 critique of previous Pauline research urged an interpretation of Paul worked out consistently from within the framework of Jewish eschatology, the issue of Paul's mission featured in the presentation only marginally. But when Schweitzer's own constructive exposition of Paul's theology, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, finally appeared after long delay in 1930, it included a pioneering attempt to take Paul's mission into account within a systematic exposition of his theology (Schweitzer, 177-87).

According to Schweitzer, Paul's commitment to Gentile mission arose from his particular theological conviction that the coming of the End awaited the ingathering of the "full number" of the elect from among the Gentiles. To achieve this Paul felt himself compelled to carry the knowledge of Christ to Gentile lands. And since he was alone in perceiving this specific need, he came to recognize himself as "the God-appointed apostle to the Gentiles." Paul also insisted upon the Law-free gospel for his converts because only as their Gentile status was maintained could they still be counted within the required eschatological quota for elect Gentiles.

The delay in publication of Schweitzer's study meant that, when it finally did appear, readers did not always find it "in step" with the contemporary state of discussion. Perhaps this is why Schweitzer's creative attempt to explain Paul's mission within the context of his eschatology was never widely noticed in the subsequent literature.

In modern Pauline studies the most sustained and influential discussion of the place of Paul's mission in his theology took its rise from an article by O. Cullmann in 1936. Like Schweitzer, Cullmann directed attention to Paul's eschatology. His theme was the eschatological character of Paul's missionary self-consciousness, and he based his presentation on a controversial suggestion that the mysterious "restrainer" in 2 Thessalonians 2:6-7 was the apostle himself in his mission (see Man of Lawlessness and Restraining Power), a suggestion which probably helped obscure the seminal contribution of the article as a whole.

Nevertheless, Cullmann's more fundamental insights were taken up in other studies, and in particular by J. Munck in 1954 in his Paul and the Salvation of Mankind. Munck began with a systematic critique of what he took to be the continuing influence of the Tübingen interpretation of Paul and of early Christian history. He then sought to replace this with a consistent interpretation of Paul centered on his eschatological self-consciousness as the apostle to the Gentiles. "Paul's apostolic consciousness in its eschatological form stands in the center of his personality and theology" (Munck, 42). The scholarly response to Munck's study on Paul was extensive, and focused principally on his negative critique of Tübingen influence, which it found inadequate. Most scholarship also found unpersuasive Munck's positive attempt to place Paul's eschatological self-consciousness at the center of his theology.

But Munck's exposition of Paul's eschatological understanding of his missionary vocation has proved of more enduring influence. Once one makes allowance for the sometimes eccentric exegesis, and for the tendency to overstate a case, the central elements of Munck's assessment of Paul's vocational self-consciousness remain defensible and illuminating. And indeed when Sanders refers to Paul's sense of missionary vocation as one of the two generative convictions for his theology, it is Munck whom he singles out in particular for positive reference (Sanders 1977, 442). Munck investigates a series of Pauline texts in order to demonstrate that Paul took his Gentile mission vocation to be decisively connected with the events of the consummation. His call was to fulfill the OT eschatological expectation of the ingathering of the nations, and to this end he undertook to proclaim the good news to the ends of the earth before the final day. Munck proposed that it is within this framework of eschatological beliefs that Paul's sense of mission is to be sorted out and clarified (see Eschatology).

But Munck's full formulation incorporated significant excesses requiring correction, a process which in fact can serve the more exact delineation of Paul's eschatological self-understanding. According to Munck, Paul saw himself not only as a key participant but in fact as the pivotal figure in the eschatological drama: "Paul regards himself as the one on whom the arrival of the Messianic age depends" (Munck, 41). The completion of his own Gentile mission assignment would thus precipitate the final events leading to the Parousia. This in turn explains the intensity of Paul's vocational self-consciousness and of his missionary endeavor. Such a formulation is defective in at least two consequential respects.

First, the evidence is plentiful enough that Paul entertained a heightened sense of his vocational significance. Thus having referred to the other apostles, he can say: "His grace toward me was not in vain; on the contrary, I worked harder than any of them" (1 Cor 15:10). He takes his assignment to be on a par with that of Peter (Gal 2) and does not hesitate to place it on superior footing to that of Moses (2 Cor 3). Yet the two passages on which Munck must principally depend in order to establish a uniquely decisive eschatological role for Paul fail in the purpose, either because the text is incapable of any assured interpretation and very likely not this one (2 Thess 2), or because the crucial element of unique decisiveness must be read into the text (Rom 11). Munck also ignores the numerous signals that Paul clearly recognized the limitation and interdependency of his vocation. Thus his own mission characteristically functioned as a collaborative rather than an individual effort (Ollrog; see Coworkers). And when Apollos,* not apparently at that time part of the Pauline team, carried forward the work that Paul had begun at Corinth, Paul readily described their ministries as complementary under God (1 Cor 3:4-9). Indeed Paul's sensitivity to spheres of labor, and his annoyance at violation of such spheres, is itself an acknowledgement of the limits of his own contribution in the spread of the gospel (2 Cor 10:12-16; Rom 15:18-21). And even when he is imprisoned, he can accept with equanimity the provocative endeavors of his opponents, so long as the proclamation continues (Phil 1:15-18). Paul understood his part in the eschatological mission to be consequential, but not uniquely decisive.

Second, and even more important, Munck assumes a uniformly future orientation for the eschatological dimension of Paul's missionary understanding. Yet clearly for Paul the most decisive event of the End had already taken place in Jesus Christ, and the determinative experience for his own life and mission had been when this recognition had been forced upon him by a personal messianic encounter and commission. Throughout his letters the references and allusions to his sense of mission habitually take orientation from this consciousness. For him the End had already arrived, eschatological expectation had given way to eschatological experience, and the long-expected ingathering of the nations was now being fulfilled. He conceived of his Gentile mission as eschatological in nature principally not by virtue of some connection with a yet future event but by virtue of its evident connections with a past one.

For this reason Paul can boldly describe his assignment as a direct extension of the messianic mission which God* has already initiated: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and has committed to us the message of reconciliation. So we are Christ's ambassadors, God making his appeal through us" (2 Cor 5:19-20; see Peace, Reconciliation; Center). That Paul did see a link between the Gentile mission and the Parousia is evident from Romans 11, but the exact nature of the relationship is left unemphasized and obscure in Paul's treatment, and no other Pauline texts clearly take up this particular theme. That is to say, contrary to Munck, Paul in his mission is much more demonstrably working from an eschatological event than toward one.

2.6. Conclusion. Whether or not we touch the generative springs of Paul's theology as a whole by focusing upon his eschatological self-understanding, it would appear that in that eschatological self-understanding we are nevertheless provided central explanatory sources for Paul's thinking on mission. Paul's theology of mission is a theology of his own mission, and he understood that mission as an eschatological event. To discern Paul's thinking on mission we must explore his vocational self-understanding, and to do that we must address his eschatology. It is here that we are likely to find the most appropriate matrix within which to understand the place of mission in Paul's theology. Within such a framework particularism is understood by Paul to be giving way to universalism, not by way of struggle and contradiction but as an intended expansion and fulfillment. "You were grafted in," Paul tells his Gentile readers, "to share the rich root of the olive tree" (Rom 11:17; see Olive Tree). And it is here as well that the contours of Paul's soteriological universalism find their most effective interpretive setting, no longer as the source of Paul's missionary commitment but as one of its theological consequences.

And to the extent that Paul's larger theological frame is structured as well by underlying assumptions concerning the outworking of the redemptive drama, he and his assigned mission fit within that larger frame as a feature of those eschatological events which are understood to proceed from the first advent and prepare for the second. What has now already been made available at the end of time in the Messiah is to be made available by Paul himself in a geographically defined outreach to the nations, in fulfillment of the OT eschatological promises, and it is to be realized in representative communities which demonstrate the life of the new age. By thus fulfilling the eschatological promise of blessing to the nations, Paul in his mission helps to complete that task which in the divine economy is to precede the final denouement.

So far as the modern task of apprehending the place of Paul's mission within his theology is concerned, the flood of fresh studies provoked by Sanders has led the modern discussion of Pauline theology in promising directions that have yet to be fully exploited. While Sanders did identify Paul's sense of call to Gentile mission as one of the two basic convictions underlying Paul's theological reflection, and directed particular attention to Munck for a suggestive assessment of this dimension of Pauline thought, the interest of the subsequent discussion has generally concentrated on Sanders's original theme, namely the question of the Law in Paul and in Judaism. Nevertheless, by supporting a renewed awareness of issues about Gentile inclusion, the modern discussion is offering a more congenial climate in which to address the related (but not identical) questions surrounding the place of Paul's mission in his theological reflection.

Whether these latter questions will be effectively addressed within that larger discussion remains yet to be seen. But one must suspect that the way forward in the study of Paul and his mission lies not least in achieving a greater precision both in discerning what exactly Paul was doing in his eschatological mission, and in understanding how that eschatological mission functioned within his larger theological reflection.

See also ANTIOCH; APOSTLE; CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; DIASPORA; EPHESUS, PAUL AT; ESCHATOLOGY; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; GENTILES; GOSPEL; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; JERUSALEM; JUDAIZERS; MINISTRY; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES TO PAUL; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES; TENTMAKING; TRAVEL IN THE ROMAN WORLD; UNIVERSALISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Allen, Missionary Methods: St Paul's or Ours? A Study of the Church in the Four Provinces (London: World Dominion, 1912); P. Beskow, "Mission, Trade and Emigration in the Second Century," SEÅ 35 (1970) 104-14; J. Blauw, The Missionary Nature of the Church: A Survey of the Biblical Theology of Mission (London: Lutterworth, 1962); D. Bosch, "Mission in Paul: Invitation to Join the Eschatological Community," in Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission (Maryknoll: Orbis, 1991); P. Bowers, "Paul and Religious Propaganda in the First Century" NovT 22 (1980) 316-23; idem, "Fulfilling the Gospel: The Scope of the Pauline Mission" JETS 30 (1987) 185-98; idem, "Church and Mission in Paul" JSNT 44 (1991) 89-111; Y. Congar, "Souci du salut des païens et conscience missionnaire dans le christianisme postapostolique et préconstantinien," in KYRIAKON. Festschrift Johannes Quasten, ed. P. Granfield and J. A. Jungmann (Münster: Aschendorff, 1970) 1.3-11; O. Cullmann, "Le caractère eschatologique du devoir missionnaire et de la conscience apostolique de S. Paul" RHPhR 16 (1936) 210-45; idem, "Eschatology and Missions in the New Testament," in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: University Press, 1954) 409-21; F. Cumont, "Why the Oriental Religions Spread," in Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism (New York: Dover, 1956) 20-45; N. A. Dahl, Studies in Paul: Theology for the Early Christian Mission (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); idem, The Gospel and the Land (Berkeley: University of California, 1974); J. D. G. Dunn, "The New Perspective on Paul" BJRL 65 (1983) 93-122; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); D. Gilliland, Pauline Theology and Mission Practice (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1983); M. Goodman, "Proselytising in Rabbinic Judaism," JJS 40 (1989) 175-85; M. Green, Evangelism in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970); O. Haas, Paulus der Missionar. Ziel, Grundstätze und Methoden der Missionstätigkeit des Apostels Paulus nach seinen eigenen Aussagen (Münsterschwarzach: Vier-Türme, 1971); F. Hahn, Mission in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1965); M. Hengel, "The Origins of the Christian Mission" in Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the Earliest History of Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 48-64; E. G. Hinson, The Evangelization of the Roman Empire: Identity and Adaptability (Macon, GA: Mercer University, 1981); R. F. Hock, The Social Context of Paul's Mission (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); B. Holmberg, Sociology and the New Testament: An Appraisal (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); A. J. Hultgren, Paul's Gospel and Mission: The Outlook from His Letter to the Romans (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); E. Käsemann, "Justification and Salvation History in the Epistle to the Romans," in Perspectives on Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 60-78; H. Kasting, Die Anfänge der urchristlichen Mission (Munich: Chr. Kaiser, 1969); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (2d ed.; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1984); J. Knox, "Romans 15:14-33 and Paul's Conception of His Apostolic Mission," JBL 83 (1964) 1-11; K. G. Kuhn, "Das Problem der Mission in der Urchristenheit," Evangelische Missionszeitschrift (Stuttgart) 11 (1954) 161-68; S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); R. MacMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire (A.D. 100-400) (New Haven: Yale University, 1984); idem, Paganism in the Roman Empire (New Haven: Yale University, 1981); W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University, 1983); J. Munck, Christ and Israel: An Interpretation of Romans 9—11 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); idem, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (Atlanta: John Knox, 1977); M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion (München: Beck, 1941-50); A. D. Nock, Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo (New York: Oxford University Press, 1933); idem, Essays on Religion and the Ancient World (2 vols.; Cambridge: Harvard, 1972); W.-H. Ollrog, Paulus und seine Mitarbeiter (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1979); W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen (11th ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1895); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, Paul, the Law and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (London: Black, 1931); D. Senior and C. Stuhlmueller, The Biblical Foundations for Mission (Maryknoll: Orbis, 1983); K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); F. Watson, Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles: A Sociological Approach (Cambridge: University Press, 1986); N. T. Wright, "The Paul of History and the Apostle of Faith" TynB 19 (1978) 61-88.

W. P. Bowers

MISSIONARY JOURNEYS. See CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; ITINERARIES, TRAVEL PLANS, JOURNEYS, APOSTOLIC PAROUSIA; MISSION; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS.

MITHRAISM. See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

MONEY. See COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; RICHES AND POVERTY; TENTMAKING.

MONOTHEISM. See CHRISTOLOGY; GOD.

MONTHS. See HOLY DAYS.

MORTALITY. See IMMORTALITY; LIFE AND DEATH; RESURRECTION.

MOSES

References to Moses in the Pauline Corpus are few in number. Yet it is through these few references that one catches an important glimpse of Paul's hermeneutical method and gains a crucial understanding of the relationship between the old and new covenants.*

1. As a Historical Figure
2. Identified by His Work As Lawgiver
3. Illustrative Use of Moses
4. Typological Use of Moses
5. Reflective Use of Moses
6. Use of Mosaic Haggadah and Lore
7. Theologically Significant Uses

1. As a Historical Figure.

Paul clearly sees Moses as a historical figure and recounts several significant events in Moses' life. Mention is made of the duplication of Moses' miracles by Pharaoh's court magicians (2 Tim 3:8), of the revelation of God's* sovereign character to Moses while in the cleft of the rock (Rom 9:15) and of the descent of Moses from Mt. Sinai with the Law* (2 Cor 3:7-11). Moses is also used to mark a historical period of time. In Romans 5:14 Paul makes the claim that "death reigned from Adam until Moses."

2. Identified by His Work As Lawgiver.

Moses is primarily identified in Paul by his work as lawgiver. The Law was "put into effect through angels by the hand of a mediator"—who by implication was Moses (Gal 3:19). The splendor of the Law was transferred to Moses' face as he descended from Mt. Sinai (2 Cor 3:7). Paul can therefore refer to the Law as "the Law of Moses" (1 Cor 9:9). So closely, in fact, are Moses and the Law linked that they become virtually interchangeable. Citations from the Law are prefaced by "Moses writes" (Rom 10:5; cf. Rom 10:19; see Old Testament in Paul). "The reading of the old covenant" (2 Cor 3:14) becomes "when Moses is read" (2 Cor 3:15). And the period when the Law was given is called the "time of Moses" (Rom 5:14).

3. Illustrative Use of Moses.

The most frequent contexts in which "Moses" appears are illustrative ones. Timothy is warned that in the last days there will be those who oppose the truth "just as Jannes and Jambres opposed Moses" (2 Tim 3:1-9). The church at Corinth is cautioned against following the idolatrous (see Idolatry) example of the wilderness generation, which had been "baptized into Moses" (1 Cor 10:1-22).

Moses himself is used as an example at several points. The custom of Moses' removing the veil from his face on entering the tabernacle to speak with the Lord* (Ex 34:34) becomes an example for Paul of the action that the Jews in his own day needed to take (2 Cor 3:15-17). For only if "someone turns to the Lord" as Moses did, will "the veil be removed" as Moses' veil was (2 Cor 3:16). Moses' request to be blotted out of Yahweh's book for the sake of Israel* (Ex 32:30-35) is probably behind Paul's willingness to be cut off from Christ* for the sake of his Jewish kinspeople (Rom 9:3).

A number of Paul's illustrative uses are contrastive ones. Yet these references are not to Moses per se but to his "old covenant" ministry or to his office as lawgiver, over against which the apostolic ministry* and the new covenant are set. The gospel* minister, Paul claims, is very open and forthright in manner, "and not as Moses who placed a veil over his face, so that the sons of Israel could not stare intently down to the last glimmer of that which was fading" (2 Cor 3:12-13). This, Paul states, is because of the character of the ministry that each represents ("because we have such a hope," 2 Cor 3:12). For the ministry of Moses, though it came with overwhelming glory* (2 Cor 3:7), was nonetheless a ministry of "death" (2 Cor 3:7; see Life and Death), "condemnation" (2 Cor 3:9) and "fading glory" (2 Cor 3:11), while the apostolic ministry is of "the Spirit" (2 Cor 3:8; see Holy Spirit), "righteousness"* (2 Cor 3:9) and "permanence" (2 Cor 3:11). As was fitting for such a ministry, Moses customarily covered his face (Ex 34:35), whereas the face of the gospel minister is "unveiled," thereby reflecting a glory that, far from fading, is constantly increasing (2 Cor 3:18).

4. Typological Use of Moses.

Paul nowhere employs Moses as a type of Christ. This is probably because of the parochial nature of the Mosaic ministry as contrasted with the universal character of the gospel. Yet, like other NT writers, Paul finds in Moses and the wilderness generation a pattern or "type" for his own day (see Old Testament in Paul). To the church at Corinth Paul writes that what happened to the wilderness generation took place as "types" (typoi; 1 Cor 10:6). The suggestion is that the many visible blessings that God bestowed on Israel (e.g., the crossing of the Red Sea, the miraculous provision of food and water) occurred as prefigurements of the far greater blessings that the church experiences through Christ (e.g., salvation,* the Lord's Supper,* baptism*). Among these blessings Paul includes Israel's being "baptized into Moses."

5. Reflective Use of Moses.

More often Paul found that current events shed light on events of the past. This is especially true for Moses and the wilderness generation. Seen through the perspective of salvation in Christ, Paul could claim that the rock that followed Israel through the wilderness "was Christ" (ēn ho Christos, 1 Cor 10:4). And he could assert that what was thought to have been written by Moses out of concern for the ox who labors in the field, could now be understood as God's concern for the gospel minister who labors on Christ's behalf (1 Cor 9:9-12). It is salvation en Christō ("in Christ") that leads Paul to the recognition that the Mosaic covenant has become "old" (2 Cor 3:14) and that Israel pursued the Law-righteousness about which "Moses wrote," but never attained (Rom 10:1-5; see Law). And it is the overwhelming response of the Gentiles* to the gospel that allows him to identify what Moses obscurely referred to as "those who are not a nation" (Rom 10:19). It is also the corresponding Jewish lack of response to the gospel that leads Paul to speak of divine election* by grace* (Rom 9:15) and prompts him to seek an explanation for this response in Moses' veiled face and the resultant dulling of Israel to the transient character of the Law "until this very day" (2 Cor 3:13-15).

6. Use of Mosaic Haggadah and Lore.

Scholarship is coming more and more to the realization that Paul was dependent on the vast body of extrabiblical Jewish lore that developed around the major OT figures. This dependence is brought home clearly when one investigates Paul's Mosaic references. Paul incorporates such Mosaic lore as the opposition of Jannes and Jambres to Moses (2 Tim 3:8; cf. CD 5:17-19), angels* giving the Law to Moses (Gal 3:19; cf. Jub. 1:27-29), Israel's inability to look at the glory of the face of Moses when he descended Mt. Sinai (2 Cor 3:7; cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 2.70), the fading character of Moses' facial splendor (2 Cor 3:7; cf. Zohar 3.58a), the reason Moses veiled his face (2 Cor 3:13; cf. Bib. Ant. 12.1-3) and the rock that followed Israel through forty years of wilderness wandering (1 Cor 10:4; cf. Bib. Ant. 11.15).

7. Theologically Significant Uses.

A number of the Pauline Mosaic references function in theologically significant ways. One of the blessings that Paul recalls from Israel's history is that "all were baptized into Moses" (pantes eis ton Mōusēn ebaptisthēsan, 1 Cor 10:2). "Baptism into" elsewhere in Paul is used of the believer's incorporation into and union with Christ (e.g., Rom 6:3; Gal 3:27; see In Christ). Paul finds a parallel to the Christian experience of baptism in Israel's crossing the Red Sea, which becomes her "baptism" or means of corporate identification with Moses ("into Moses") as leader of Israel.

A notoriously difficult problem is determining the basis for Paul's verdict in Romans 5:14 that death "reigned from Adam until Moses," as this sentence of death was prior to the Mosaic standard for judging sin* (Rom 5:13; see Adam and Christ). This has become a critical text for subsequent theological doctrines such as the imputation of guilt to all of Adam's descendants by virtue of their corporate solidarity with Adam, as well as for the argument regarding the pre-Mosaic existence of the Law, a conclusion bearing significant implications for the role of Law in salvation history.

Paul's references to Moses in 2 Corinthians 3:6-18 are of critical importance. For it is here that one finds some of his strongest statements regarding the fundamental discontinuity between Christianity and Judaism. The Jews are blind to the fact that their covenant has become "old," is temporary in function and, as an external code, kills and condemns. By contrast the Christian covenant is "new," permanent and, through the internal working of the Spirit, brings life* and righteousness. It is just such an understanding that eventually led to the separation of the church from the synagogue.

See also ABRAHAM; ADAM AND CHRIST; COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT; LAW; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Belleville, Reflections of Glory. Paul's Polemical Use of the Moses-Doxa Tradition in 2 Corinthians 3:12-18 (Sheffield: Academic, 1991); P. Démann. "Moïse et la loi dans la pensée de saint Paul," in Moïse, l'homme de l'Alliance, ed. H. Cazelles (Paris: Desclée, 1955) 189-242; R. P. C. Hanson, "Moses in the Typology of St. Paul," Theology 48 (1945) 174-77; R. E. Nixon, The Exodus in the NT (London: Tyndale, 1963); T. Saito, Die Mosevorstellungen im Neuen Testament (Bern: Peter Lang, 1977).

L. L. Belleville

MYSTERY

The word mystery in modern speech means a sublime or unclear truth that is marvelled at but only partly understood. The Greek mystērion, however, describes any divine or heavenly* reality which is regarded as hidden or secret and can be known only when revealed by the gods.

1. Background
2. Mystery in Paul

1. Background.

In Paul's world mystērion ("mystery") was employed in the ancient pagan cults, philosophy,* secular usage and Gnosticism. Recent biblical scholarship has focused attention on the OT and Judaism, particularly the wisdom* literature, apocalyptic* literature (e.g., 2 Apoc. Bar. 81:4; 4 Ezra 14:5; 1 Enoch 51:3; 103:2; 104:10) and Qumran (e.g., 1QpHab 7:4, 8, 13; 1QM 3:8; 16:9; 1QS 3:21-23; 4:18; 11:34; 1QH 7:27; 10:4; 11:9, 16), as the proper background for understanding the NT writers' use of the "mystery" language.

Mystērion corresponds to the Aramaic rāz ("secret"), frequently found in the book of Daniel (Dan 2:18, 19, 27-30, 47), which denotes "an eschatological mystery, a concealed intimation of divinely ordained future events whose disclosure and interpretation is reserved for God alone" (Bornkamm, 814-15).

2. Mystery in Paul.

Mystērion appears twenty-one times in Paul's letters out of a total of twenty-seven NT occurrences. Usually it points not to some future event hidden in God's plan, but to his decisive action in Christ here and now. Paul normally employs the term with reference to its disclosure or its being revealed (Rom 16:25-26; 1 Cor 2:10; Col 1:26-27; Eph 1:9; 3:3, 5).

2.1. Earlier References.

2.1.1. 1 Corinthians 2:1, 7. Apart from the earliest reference to mystērion in 2 Thessalonians 2:7 in a negative sense ("the mystery of lawlessness which is at work"; see Man of Lawlessness), the apostle* offers some important insights into his view of revelation in his early use of this word in 1 Corinthians 2. After indicating that the only knowledge* he proclaimed as he set forth "the mystery of God" (1 Cor 2:1 v.l.) at Corinth was Jesus as the crucified Messiah (see Christ), Paul states: "we speak God's wisdom* in a mystery." The gift of wisdom is for the teleioi, "the mature," not the initiates of the Hellenistic mystery religions. Rather it is for those who by their attitude and behavior show they are spiritual rather than carnal and thus are ready for "solid food" (1 Cor 3:1-4). The mystery which focuses on salvation* through the cross of Jesus Christ is not new, for God* had decreed it "before the ages" (1 Cor 2:7; see Election and Predestination). It has been kept hidden from "the rulers of this world" (1 Cor 2:8; see Principalities and Powers): only ignorance of the mystery can explain their crucifixion* of "the Lord of glory." But now the mystery of God's salvific plan, which includes the divine inheritance, is being revealed through his Spirit (1 Cor 2:10; see Holy Spirit); it completely escapes human perception, but God has prepared it for all who love* him (cf. Rom 8:28-30).

2.1.2. 1 Corinthians 4:1; 13:2; 14:2. The plural mysteries appears here, perhaps for polemical reasons or because it draws attention to the essential elements of the one mystery. As an apostle Paul is a steward of "the mysteries of God" (1 Cor 4:1). In 1 Corinthians 13:2, where "all mysteries" include everything that transcends human power of conceiving, he may be rebuking those who thought they had a superior understanding of Christian teaching—after all, only God understands "all mysteries." "Mysteries" (perhaps hidden truths of God, 1 Cor 14:2), spoken in a tongue, are unintelligible and of little value unless interpreted (see Tongues).

2.1.3. Romans 16:25; 11:25. In the concluding doxology of Romans (Rom 16:25) there is a correlation between the disclosure of the mystery and Paul's preaching* of Jesus Christ. The connection between the mystery and the salvation of the Gentiles is a feature that is developed in Ephesians and Colossians.* An element of new teaching may be in view in Romans 11:25 where the "mystery" points to the salvation of the Jews (cf. 1 Cor 15:51; see Israel).

2.2. Colossians and Ephesians. Some of the most significant Pauline references to mystērion occur in Colossians and Ephesians.

2.2.1. Colossians 1:26-27; 2:2; 4:3. The "mystery" has to do with God's decisive action in Christ in the here and now (Col 1:26-27). It is characterized by "riches," for in it the wealth of God was lavished in a wonderful way, and "glory"* which suggests that it shared in the character of God himself. Its content was "Christ in you [Colossians], the hope of glory": he now indwelt these Gentiles who had believed its proclamation. They are to come to a deeper understanding of Christ, God's mystery, for in him all the treasures of wisdom were available (Col 2:2). Finally, the Colossians are to pray for Paul so that he might proclaim this divine mystery in a clear manner (Col 4:3; cf. Eph 6:19).

2.2.2. Ephesians 1:9; 3:3, 4, 9; 5:32; 6:19. Ephesians has been called the "epistle of the mystery." Paul uses the term six times in the letter and in Ephesians 3:2-11, in the context of his stewardship, he presents the fullest NT expression of this concept. Many key theological terms in Ephesians are associated with "the mystery." In Ephesians 1:9 mystērion refers to God's plan to unite in Christ all things in heaven* and earth (Eph 1:22-23; see Peace, Reconciliation), and this refers to subduing everything, especially hostile "powers," under his lordship. "Christ is the one who will consummate all things by providing ultimate redemption for believers and pacifying the opposing forces" (Arnold). The focus of the mystery which was made known to Paul on the Damascus road is Christ (Eph 3:4; see Conversion and Call), for in him the unseen God is fully revealed. As a steward of the mystery Paul knows that the Gentiles were destined to be fellow heirs, members of the same body and partakers of the same promises as Israel (Eph 3:6). In the reconciliation (see Peace, Reconciliation) of Jews and Gentiles in one body the manifold wisdom of God is unfolded (Eph 3:10; see Body of Christ). The very existence of the church bears witness to the "administration of the mystery," which further implies the defeat and ultimate overthrow of the powers. In Ephesians 5:32 the "mystery" points to the union of Christ and the church, the meaning of which (perhaps like Gen 2:24) is hidden.

The situation of "perceived demonic hostility in western Asia Minor may have provided a partial motivation" for Paul's emphasis on the cosmic aspect of the mystery in Ephesians (Arnold). It could have stood in deliberate contrast to the Lydian-Phrygian "mysteries," which were so popular, so as to be a polemic against the possible influence of these mysteries in the churches. According to PGM I.128-32 a pagan mystery initiation involved receiving "the lord of the air" (cf. Eph 2:2) as the indwelling deity!

The mystery revealed in Ephesians, however, was the opposite of the pagan mysteries. Christ bringing "all things" under his head implied the impending doom of the so-called deities invoked in magic and the mystery religions. It is inadequate to claim that the content of the mystery in Ephesians is defined solely in terms of God's acceptance of the Gentiles and their union with Jews on an equal footing in Christ (Eph 3:3-4). Christ is the starting point for a true understanding of the notion of "mystery" in this letter, as elsewhere in Paul. There are not a number of "mysteries" with limited applications, but one supreme "mystery" with a number of applications (Caragounis).

2.3. 1 Timothy 3:9, 16. Mystērion appears twice in the Pastorals, that is, in 1 Timothy 3:9, 16. Many claim that in its first occurrence, the "mystery of faith" (1 Tim 3:9), mystērion here has lost its characteristically Pauline sense and describes what transcends ordinary comprehension. However, it is best to understand the phrase as referring to the corpus of Christian teaching. This is a logical inference from the earlier usage of speaking about the saving plan of God. Essentially the expression is akin to the truth of the gospel, particularly the saving character of Christ's death, which was previously hidden but not revealed by the Spirit (1 Cor 2:6-16). "Faith" is here used in an objective sense so that "the mystery of faith is what is believed, as the mystery of the gospel is what is preached" (Brown).

In 1 Timothy 3:16 the unusual expression "the mystery (mystērion) of godliness" ("our religion," NRSV) appears. "Godliness," a favorite term in 1 Timothy, which usually refers to "the duty which people owe to God," is here understood in an objective way to refer to the content or basis of Christianity. What follows in the hymn expresses something of the content of the "revealed truth" of this godliness which has been committed to God's people (Fee). The hymn's focus is upon Christ's humiliation and exaltation, and Christians' ongoing praise of him as the exalted and glorified One. This double emphasis may stand in contrast to the Christology of the false teachers in Ephesus, with the hymn preparing the way for Paul's censure that follows. At the same time the apostle exhorts his colleague Timothy to stand firm and in sharp contrast to the false teachers (1 Tim 4:6-16).

See also CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; GENTILES; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63: Cambridge: University Press, 1989); M. N. A. Bockmuehl, Revelation and Mystery (WUNT 2/2; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990); G. Bornkamm, "μυστήριον, μυέω," TDNT IV.802-28; R. E. Brown, The Semitic Background of the Term "Mystery" in the New Testament (FBBS 21; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); C. C. Caragounis, The Ephesian Mysterion*: Meaning and Content* (ConNT 8; Lund: Gleerup, 1977); J. Coppens, " 'Mystery' in the Theology of St. Paul and Its Parallels at Qumran," in Paul and Qumran, ed. J. Murphy-O'Connor (London: Chapman, 1968) 132-58; G. Fee, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1984); A. E. Harvey, "The Use of Mystery Language in the Bible," JTS 81 (1980) 320-36.

P. T. O'Brien

MYSTERY RELIGIONS.

See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

MYSTICISM

The attempt to understand Paul in terms of "mysticism" has been very popular in the past, but has inevitably run into difficulties of definition. "Mysticism" can be understood broadly as "a generic term covering an enormous range and variety of experience. . . . All the great figures in the history of religion were, basically, mystics" (S. G. F. Brandon, 462-63). On this description, Paul was undoubtedly a mystic. However, this criterion tends to obscure rather than illuminate. Accordingly, we prefer R. C. Tannehill's clearer and more specific definition of "mysticism" as "the doctrine that the individual can come into immediate contact with God through subjective experiences which differ essentially from the experiences of ordinary life" (Tannehill, 4). Two questions, therefore, arise: Was Paul a "mystic?" Does he have a mystical theology?

1. Earlier Views
2. Paul's Conversion
3. Dying and Rising with Christ
4. Being "in Christ"
5. Sharing Christ's Sufferings
6. Paul's Contentment
7. Glossolalia
8. Conclusions

1. Earlier Views.

Significant earlier studies understood Paul's interpretation of Christian existence in terms of "mysticism." A. Schweitzer claimed Paul's mysticism was unique since it took the form of union with Christ ("Christ-mysticism") rather than direct union with God. The apostle's teaching on "being-in-Christ" (see "In Christ") which provided the clue to his entire thought, was founded on theology, and was essentially eschatological.* A. Deissmann and J. Schneider spoke of Paul's "passion mysticism" as they focussed attention on his experiences of suffering within the context of the dying* and rising with Christ theme. "Ontological mysticism" has been used of A. Wikenhauser's presentation and refers not to an experience but to an objective state of all Christians; it is for Wikenhauser, "the mysterious union between Paul—and indeed all Christians—and the person of Christ Triumphant" (Wikenhauser, 19).

Each of these earlier interpreters was attempting to come to grips with several important motifs in Paul, including his teaching about dying* and rising with Christ and being "in Christ." The following issues are relevant to our inquiry:

2. Paul's Conversion.

Paul uses the language of revelation (Gal 1:12, 16) and mystery* (Eph 3:3, 4, 9) to describe his conversion-commissioning on the Damascus road (see Conversion and Call). The gospel* came to him through a revelation of Jesus Christ* (Gal 1:11-12). God was pleased to reveal his Son* in him in order that he might preach him among the Gentiles* (Gal 1:15-16). Paul stresses the inward and personal character of God's revelation: it was "in me." Yet for him inward illumination and outward vision* coincided. Stressing the objectivity of the latter he states that Christ appeared to him (ōphthē is the language of christophany, 1 Cor 15:8), and so he saw Christ (1 Cor 9:1). A. F. Segal has attempted to understand Paul as an ecstatic visionary who underwent a mystical conversion akin to the experiences found in the Jewish mystical tradition exemplified in the Qumran* Angelic Liturgy, 1 Enoch and later medieval Merkabah mysticism. While valuable insights may be gained from viewing Paul's visionary experience against this more clearly defined environment of Jewish mysticism, with its theme of the ascent to heaven, Segal's rereading of Paul's language of justification and spiritual transformation (e.g., "His faith in Christ, based on his conversion experience, made him feel righteous and justified him"; Segal, 130) does violence to Paul's emphasis on the objectivity of Christ and his salvific work. Even if Paul is thought of as a mystic on Tannehill's definition, the Damascus christophany does not support the notion of a mystical theology.

3. Dying and Rising with Christ.

The apostle's dying and rising with Christ was a personal, life-changing experience (Gal 2:20; cf. Rom 6:3-6; Col 2:11-12, 20; 3:1-4; see Dying and Rising). He, like other believers, was personally united with his Lord in the salvation-historical acts of the cross* and resurrection.* But this important event is misunderstood when dissolved into a subjective, mystical experience. The apostle does not isolate the individual and focus on the inner experience as mysticism does. Consequently, any attempt to understand this dying and rising motif in terms of mysticism fails to come to grips with its corporate nature or Paul's eschatological teaching about the two ages, while mysticism obscures the connection of this motif with other basic themes of his thought.

4. Being "in Christ."

Phrases such as "in Christ"* (cf. Phil 1:13; 2:1, etc.) or "in the Lord" (cf. Phil 1:14; 2:24, etc.) are characteristic of Paul, and it is the notion which they express that is often in view when people speak of "Pauline mysticism" (cf. Schweitzer). These phrases, which focus on the fact that Christians are fellow members of the body of Christ, have nothing to do with individual mysticism (it is even doubtful whether the expression "the mystical body of Christ" is appropriate). The corporate significance of being in Christ is regularly stressed by Paul, both in relation to what God has done on behalf of his people and the responsibilities believers have to Christ and to one another. All believers are incorporated into the body* of Christ by the Holy Spirit* (1 Cor 12:13), and his presence, by which they are empowered for new life, is in fulfillment of the OT promises about the outpouring of the Lord's Spirit on his people in an unprecedented way (cf. Ezek 36:24-27; Joel 2:28-29).

5. Sharing Christ's Sufferings.

The notion of "sharing in Christ's sufferings*" is part of Paul's wider teaching on dying and rising with Christ and is not to be interpreted along mystical lines. The background to this teaching is the messianic woes of OT and Jewish apocalyptic* thought which would usher in the end time. With the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus the coming age has already been inaugurated, even though the present age still continues. Christians living between the first and second comings of Christ already experience these afflictions and sufferings, for it is through them that they enter the kingdom* of God (Acts 14:22; 1 Thess 3:3, 7). The exalted Christ in heaven continues to suffer in his members, not least in Paul himself. The sufferings which he experienced in his apostolic* ministry* were "Christ's afflictions" (Phil 3:10; Col 1:24) and were endured on behalf of other Christians like the Colossians.* The more Paul bore in his own person the more his fellow-believers would be spared (cf. 2 Cor 4:12).

6. Paul's Contentment.

The mystic tends to be self-sufficient (autarkēs) in his religious life, or he can become so when the circumstances require it. Paul, who insists on the common life in the body of Christ where members are interrelated and interdependent with each contributing to the welfare of others and to the whole, speaks of sufficiency: "I have learned to be content in whatever circumstances I find myself" (Phil 4:11). But his autarkeia was not Stoic self-sufficiency, the cultivated attitude of the wise person who could face life and death with equanimity because of his own inner resources; rather, Paul's independence of external circumstances was only because he was totally dependent upon God. He is able to be content in all things because of his relationship with Christ who gives him strength (Phil 4:12-13). The apostle's contentment is different from the sufficiency (autarkeia) of the mystic.

7. Glossolalia.

Paul makes special reference to glossolalia (see Tongues), but it was not necessarily bound up with mysticism, for the one could exist without the other. The person speaking with tongues "utters mysteries in the spirit"; but he is not communicating anything "for no one understands him" (1 Cor 14:2). It is the source and content of the utterance which is important rather than the simple fact of its being inspired. Paul himself practiced glossolalia (1 Cor 14:18; 2 Cor 5:13, possibly), but he downplays this gift in favor of prophecy* which edifies the congregation.

8. Conclusions.

In light of the above-mentioned definition Paul may be spoken of as a "mystic" (cf. his visions 2 Cor 12:1-4), but he does not have a mystical theology. His theology was not based on experiences which might be called mystical, but "on Jesus, the fulfiller of God's promise and purpose of salvation; Jesus, the crucified and exalted Lord; Jesus, the divine wisdom, in whom God creates, maintains and brings to consummation everything that exists; Jesus, who here and now lives within his people by his Spirit" (Bruce, 75). So, Paul's all-consuming passion was "the incomparable value of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord" (Phil 3:8).

See also CONVERSION AND CALL OF PAUL; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; IN CHRIST; SUFFERING; TONGUES; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. G. F. Brandon, ed., A Dictionary of Comparative Religion (New York: Scribner's, 1970); F. F. Bruce, "Was Paul a Mystic?" RTR 34 (1975) 66-75; L. Cerfaux, The Christian in the Theology of St. Paul (London: Chapman, 1967); A. Deissmann, Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1926); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); A. T. Lincoln, "Paul the Visionary: the Setting and Significance of the Rapture to Paradise in 2 Corinthians 12:1-10," NTS 25 (1979) 204-20; J. Schneider, Die Passionsmystik des Paulus (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1929); A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of St. Paul (London: A. & C. Black, 1931); A. F. Segal, Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (New Haven: Yale, 1990); J. D. Tabor, Things Unutterable: Paul's Ascent to Paradise in Its Greco-Roman, Judaic, and Early Christian Contexts (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986); R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ: A Study in Pauline Theology (BZNW 32; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1967); A. Wikenhauser, Pauline Mysticism: Christ in the Mystical Teaching of St. Paul (Edinburgh: Nelson, 1960).

P. T. O'Brien

N

NAG HAMMADI. See APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM.

NAME

Of some 225 NT uses of the noun "name" (onoma), only twenty-one are found in Paul's letters. However, the verb "to name" (onomazō), which is found nine times in the NT, appears six times in the Pauline letters. Paul's usage of "name" always speaks of more than a topical identification. It is a description of the one to whom reference is made. In many cases "name" is virtually equivalent to a person or being. In that regard, "the name above all names" (Phil 2:9) means the person higher than any rival beings: the Lord* Jesus Christ.* The verbal examples range from a description that presumes the reality of the character implied in a name to a personal identification with, or trust in, the person being "named."

1. Human Names
2. God's Name
3. Christ's Name
4. The Name Above All Names

1. Human Names.

In dealing with the factions in the church* at Corinth* that were short-sightedly following leading personalities, Paul asks pointedly: "Were you baptized into the name of Paul?" (1 Cor 1:13 NIV). The similarity of expression between this passage (see also 1 Cor 1:15) and the trinitarian formula for baptism* in Matthew 28:19, and particularly the compressed statement in Acts 2:38, strongly suggests that Paul is concerned about improper identification with, or adherence to, his person. Paul's "name" thus stands for his person, which could never take the place of the person of Christ (1 Cor 1:13). Similarly, Paul's later mention of his coworkers* "whose names are in the book of life" (Phil 4:3) has the same force. It is clearly the eternal destiny of people like Euodia, Syntyche, and Clement (4:2-3) that is meant here.

Three examples of the verb "to name" are of significance at this point. The Greek phrase adelphos onomazomenos in 1 Corinthians 5:11 may speak of a "so-called brother" (NASB)—one outwardly "named" a Christian, but lacking inward reality—or, more naturally in the context, one whose behavior belies his "name" as a believer. Ephesians 5:3 urges that immoral or impure actions not even be "named" among Christians, apparently meaning that there be no "hint" (NIV) that such behavior is actually taking place. We find an analogy elsewhere in the NT where the name Christianos, "Christian," was apparently a name given by outsiders to identify believers as "followers of Christ" (Acts 11:26; 26:28). While this name may first have been used in ridicule of believers by those outside the Christian community, for Christians it came to imply the honor of bearing Christ's name (1 Pet 4:16) in a life consistent with Christ. In a broader sense, Ephesians 3:15 speaks of every patria, every "nation," "family" or "clan" "in heaven and on earth" as being "named" only by God,* the "Father" (patēr, Eph 3:14). Here Paul seems to be speaking of every grouping of spiritual ("heaven") and human ("earth") beings. Their assignment of a "name" is solely a divine prerogative and an expression of God's sovereignty over every power in the cosmos (see Arnold, 58-59; Lincoln, 201-4).

2. God's Name.

In Romans the common OT usage of "name" in connection with God is drawn upon most clearly among Paul's writings. OT citations in Romans 2:24, 9:17 and 15:9 all support the equivalence between the name of God and his person. Romans 10:13, quoting Joel 2:32, extends the same parallel to "the name of the Lord," which in Joel refers to God, while in Romans it speaks specifically of Christ (Rom 10:10).

The two other instances in the Pauline corpus where name refers to God are in the Pastorals. 1 Timothy 6:1 provides an example of the name of God as a way of speaking of the divine person. In 2 Timothy 2:19 the verb and noun forms are combined in the phrase "naming the name of the Lord" (onomazōn to onoma kyriou; cf. Is 26:13), which in its context means identifying fully with God and his sovereignty and turning "away from wickedness."

3. Christ's Name.

Eleven of the twenty-one uses of the noun name refer to Jesus Christ (with an additional instance of ōnomasthē, "named," in Romans 15:20). The apostle's earliest uses of the term name are in the Thessalonian letters. His prayer* that "the name of our Lord Jesus be glorified in you" (2 Thess 1:12 NIV) is to express the desire that Jesus Christ, as a person, may receive the glory* he deserves. In 2 Thessalonians 3:6 the command given "in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" draws upon the sovereign authority of his person, not some magical quality Paul attributes to Christ's name.

Interestingly, the two examples of the name of Jesus Christ in Romans are found in the introduction (Rom 1:5) and biographical epilogue (Rom 15:20). Romans 1:4-5 states that it is in the resurrection* power* of "Jesus Christ our Lord" that Paul extended his apostleship* to "all the nations for his name's sake" (hypēr tou onomatos autou). This means, in essence, that Paul carried out his apostolic ministry* to glorify the person of Jesus Christ. In Romans 15:20 Paul speaks of "proclaiming the gospel not where Christ has already been named [ōnomasthē]." The verb named could initially be taken as a superficial hearing of the gospel,* but the context seems to demand a deeper knowledge of, response to and possibly worship* of the person of Christ (Rom 15:19-20).

1 Corinthians employs the term name four times in connection with Jesus Christ (1 Cor 1:2, 10; 5:4; 6:11). As with most of Paul's other references to the name of Christ, "Lord"* (kyrios) occurs as a title of highest authority,* further emphasizing the worship and obedience due his person. Paul appeals to the Corinthians as those "who call on the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1:2). Thus agreement and unity between them is possible in Christ's "name" (1 Cor 1:10). Their justification* and sanctification* came about "in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 6:11), and their church* "assembled in the name of our Lord Jesus" (1 Cor 5:4). In each case it is Christ's person or authority, or both, that is in focus with the use of "name."

The remaining three references to Christ's name are found in the prison letters. In contexts that contain a striking number of parallel terms, Colossians 3:17 and Ephesians 5:20 both include "the name" of the Lord Jesus Christ in the midst of admonitions for God-empowered relationships with other Christians and for constant thanksgiving before God. Everything that is said or done is to be carried out "in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Col 3:17). Thus all of life is to be lived under the conscious authority of Christ and in active, thankful allegiance to his magnificent person (Col 3:17; Eph 5:20). Such a perspective takes on cosmic and eternal dimensions in Philippians 2:10-11. Despite the ongoing debate over the structure and significance of the Christ hymn in Philippians 2:6-11 (see Martin 1983), it is clear that "the name of Jesus" deserves and demands universal worship: "in heaven and on earth and under the earth" (Phil 2:10).

4. The Name Above All Names.

In Ephesians 1:20 Paul strongly asserts that Christ, in his glorious post-resurrection status (Eph 1:20), is far above "every name named" (pantos onomatos onomazomenou, Eph 1:21). A number of significant studies have posited that the "powers" (Eph 1:20) over which the Lord Jesus is exalted (Eph 1:21) are societal or political structures. But it is much more likely that the letter is addressing a cultural milieu in which supernatural demonic* beings are regarded with fear (so Arnold; see Principalities and Powers). The phrase "every name named" would thus include every possible power that might be named by those who call upon deities or spirits whether for the practice of magic* or in worship (in either case, the "name" of the spiritual power plays an important role).

The usage of the verbal form (onomazein) and the noun form (onoma) in Acts 19:13, in the context of an attempted exorcism at Ephesus, is generally parallel to Ephesians 1:20-21 and lends some credibility to the view that Ephesians is addressing a similar situation in Asia Minor in which the relationship between Christ and the demonic powers is a concern (see Ephesus). Also, like Philippians 2:10-11, Christ's unrivaled supremacy over any and every being that could be mentioned exists "not only in the present age but also in the age to come" (Eph 1:21). Though it is not yet seen clearly in earthly terms, the surpassing greatness of Christ's name means "all things" have been placed under his feet (Eph 1:22), in fulfillment of such messianic texts as Psalm 110:1 and 8:5-7 (see Exaltation, Enthronement; Triumph).

The most significant christological use of "name" in Paul occurs in Philippians 2:9 where "the name above every name" is given to Christ. The exaltation of Christ Jesus (Phil 2:9-11) follows his ignominious humiliation on the cross* (Phil 2:5-8). His subsequent elevation by God "to the highest place," or "office" (Phil 2:9), is matched by his receiving the highest "name" (or title) in all creation (Phil 2:10). What is this name? From the context two possibilities are frequently suggested: "Jesus" (Phil 2:10) or "Lord" (kyrios, Phil

2:11). Here the OT background of the exalted name of Yahweh (LXX kyrios) must be kept in mind, and the influence of Isaiah 45:23 ("to me [Yahweh] every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear") is observed in the immediately following verse (Phil 2:10). The exalted Christ shares the universal lordship known of Yahweh, and is thus given the title "Lord." But his humiliation to the extent of death on the cross has given new meaning to lordship: the true character of the one who bears the "name" has been indelibly shaped by servanthood in the historical person of Jesus.

See also BAPTISM; CHRISTOLOGY; LORD; MAGIC; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Abba, "Name," IDB 3.506-8; C. E. Arnold, Ephesians, Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989); H. Bietenhard, "ὄνομα κτλ," TDNT V.270-83; H. Bietenhard and F. F. Bruce, "Name," NIDNTT 2.648-56; L. Hartman, "ὄνομα," EDNT 2.519-22; G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. P. Martin, Philippians (NCB; rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); idem, Carmen Christi: Philippians 11:5-11 in Recent Interpretation and the Setting of Early Christian Worship (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983).

A. B. Luter, Jr.

NARRATIVE CRITICISM. See HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL.

NARRATIVE TRADITION. See JESUS, SAYINGS OF.

NEW COVENANT. See COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT.

NEW CREATION. See CREATION AND NEW CREATION.

NEW ISRAEL. See ISRAEL; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

NEW NATURE AND OLD NATURE

Paul can contrast what believers were "in Adam" and what believers are after receiving the gift of salvation in Christ in terms of their "old" and "new nature" (see Adam and Christ).

1. Terminology
2. Romans
3. Ephesians and Colossians
4. Theological Significance

1. Terminology.

Few words are more dangerously ambiguous than "nature." Because of this there has been considerable misunderstanding of the phrases "old nature" and "new nature" (see Rom 6:6; Eph 4:22; Col 3:9). Numerous popular explanations of Paul's doctrine of the Christian life argue, or assume, that the apostle distinguishes with these phrases between two parts or natures of a person. Following this misguided thinking is the debate as to whether the "old nature" is replaced by the "new nature" at conversion, or whether the "new nature" is added to the old (see Psychology).

The interpretation that ho palaios anthrōpos and ho kainos anthrōpos refer to parts, or natures, of a person is wrong and misleading. These terms rather designate the complete person viewed in relation to the corporate whole to which he or she belongs. Thus these terms are better translated as "old person" and "new person." The translation "old self" and "new self" (NIV, NRSV) is too individualistic, since the idea certainly means the individual Christian (Rom 6:6), but is much more than merely individual. "Old person" and "new person" are not, then, ontological but relational in orientation. They speak not of a change in nature, but of a change in relationship.

The "old person" is not the sin* nature which is judged at the cross* and to which is added a "new person." The "old person" is what believers were "in Adam" (in the old era). The "old" points to everything connected with the fall of humanity and with the subjection to the distress and death of a transitory life, separated from God (see Life and Death). Within the context of Paul's theology, this concept carries with it deep undertones of God's wrath* and the wages of sin. The "new person" is what believers are "in Christ" (in the new era). Paul directs us to the completely new, to the salvation* and healing that believers receive when they are crucified* with Christ and raised with him (cf. Rom 6:3-6; see Dying and Rising with Christ).

2. Romans.

In Romans 6:6 Paul argues that the old person (the individual believer) was crucified with Christ.* The reference to the crucifixion is a startling message indicating the vast distance separating Paul's theology of dying and being raised with Christ from the mysticism* of the mystery religions* of his day (see Cranfield, 1.309). The "old person" was crucified with Christ in baptism.* For in baptism believers received the divinely appointed sign and seal of the fact that by God's* gracious decision the old person was, in God's sight, crucified with Christ on Golgotha. Paul's language denotes the unity between baptized believers and the person of Christ himself in his redemptive action (see Beasley-Murray, 134). Yet believers, by putting off the old person, still have to fulfill on the moral level the death that in God's gracious act and in the symbol of baptism they have already experienced. This is Paul's emphasis in Ephesians and Colossians.

3. Ephesians and Colossians.

Behind the contrast between the "old person" and the "new" is the contrast between Adam and Christ (1 Cor 15:45; see Ridderbos, 223-31). These phrases indicate the solidarity of people with the heads of the two contrasting eras of salvation history. Paul employs the term with a corporate meaning in Ephesians 2:15 and Colossians 3:10-11, showing that Jews and Greeks, the circumcised* and the uncircumcised, are united into one new humanity.

In Colossians 3:9-11 Paul explains that believers have taken off the "old person" with its practices and have put on the "new." This does not merely mean that Christ demands a new standard of life from his redeemed people. It means that everything associated with distorted humanity is to be put to death (Col 3:5-8) because it has been transformed according to the perfect model, Christ himself (Col 1:15-20; 2:6), and therefore there is no excuse for such distorted behavior (Wright, 137-38; Melick, 286-99).

The metaphor of "putting off" and "putting on" clothes (Col 3:8-10; Eph 4:22-24) does not simply mean promising to behave differently. Rather it is the gracious action of God's Spirit* moving believers into a different sphere where the new rule of life obtains. Paul may be alluding to the familiar picture of the candidate for baptism, who by exchanging old clothes for new symbolizes the transfer of solidarities.

These two pictures of what believers are and what they should become are not in conflict. Christians have been transferred from the old era of sin and death to the new era of righteousness and life. The powers of the old age must continually be resisted (thus the imperatival infinitives apothesthai and endysasthai in Eph 4:22-24). At the center of the contrast between the old and the new is the eschatological tension between the inauguration of the new age in the life of believers (cf. 2 Cor 5:17) and the consummation of the new age in glory (cf. Rom 8:17, 19-23; Beker, 288-89; Moo, 392). What believers were in Adam remains no more, but the struggle of life between the inauguration and consummation of the new age continues (see Eschatology).

4. Theological Significance.

Life in the new age for the "new person" is to be lived out between the polarities of what has been redemptively accomplished by the historical achievement of the death of Christ and what is yet to be fully realized in the consummation of God's redemptive program. Believers live in this temporal tension between the "already" and the "not yet," and between the indicative (what they are) and the imperative (what they should become). Believers live in this "not yet" age, but their life pattern and standard of conduct are not to be those of this age, which are essentially human-centered and prideful, but of the age to come. Yet the struggle continues. While living as a "new person" in the new age, the basis for new life should be remembered. It is through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ that the Spirit applies the benefits of the "new" life to the lives of believers. Life for the "new humanity" is living out, by the Spirit's empowerment, what believers are because of Christ.

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; BAPTISM; CREATION AND NEW CREATION; DYING AND RISING WITH CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS; RESURRECTION; SPIRITUALITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Barth, Ephesians (AB; Garden City: Doubleday, 1974); J. Baumgarten, "καινός κτλ," EDNT 2.229-32; G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962); J. Behm, "καινός κτλ," TDNT III.447-54; J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC; 2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975); D. S. Dockery, "An Outline of Paul's View of the Spiritual Life," CTR 3 (1989) 327-40; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1981); H. Haarbeck, "Old," NIDNTT 2.713-16; M. J. Harris, Colossians and Philemon (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); R. Melick, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1991); D. J. Moo, Romans 1-8 (WEC; Chicago: Moody, 1991); H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); P. Tachau, 'Einst' und 'Jetzt' im Neuen Testament (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1972); R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1967); N. T. Wright, Colossians and Philemon (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986).

D. S. Dockery

NEW PERSPECTIVE ON PAUL. See LAW; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; ROMANS, LETTER TO THE.

OBEDIENCE. See ABRAHAM; ADAM AND CHRIST; ETHICS; FAITH; JAMES AND PAUL; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; WORKS OF THE LAW.

OFFERING. See DEATH OF CHRIST; SACRIFICE, OFFERING.

OLD NATURE. See NEW NATURE AND OLD NATURE.

OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL

Although many Jews in the first century saw the Christian gospel* as antithetical to their faith, Paul regarded his message as the fulfillment of God's promises to Israel.* His letters are therefore filled with OT references used to clarify and defend the gospel. This feature, unquestionably, is of central importance to understanding Paul's teaching, but it also raises many questions. Sometimes we come across textual problems, caused in part by the fact that Paul, who was writing in Greek, naturally made use of the Septuagint (LXX), and this translation does not always correspond precisely with the Hebrew text. In addition his exegesis of some OT passages is puzzling to the modern reader: can we follow that pattern in our interpretation of the Bible? Moreover Paul's use of Scripture has profound theological implications, and these have caused heated debate throughout the history of Christianity, such as the church's conflicts with Marcion in the second century, the sixteenth-century debates among Protestants regarding the continuing validity of the OT Law,* the more recent disagreements between covenant theologians and dispensationalism, and so on. This article seeks to provide a survey of the textual data and to shed light on Paul's principles of biblical interpretation.

1. Explicit Citations
2. Allusions
3. Paul and Jewish Exegesis
4. Biblical Interpretation in Paul's Writings

1. Explicit Citations.

Discussions about Paul's use of the OT have focused primarily—in certain cases exclusively—on the apostle's explicit citations. This approach, though understandable, can prove misleading. As will be pointed out below, it is possible that a particular quotation, though explicit and verbatim, may play only an illustrative role and thus will not tell us very much about Paul's fundamental conceptions. Conversely, some of the apostle's arguments that do not contain any apparent citations reflect a very deep insight into, and dependence upon, OT themes. In spite of these caveats, however, there is a certain usefulness and convenience in using explicit citations as a starting point for further study.

1.1. The Data. We should begin by listing those passages that are generally recognized as quotations from the OT. Unfortunately, there is no unanimity among researchers, particularly as they seek to distinguish between quotations and allusions. The accompanying chart of OT citations in Paul, based primarily on the work of Michel, Ellis and Koch, are meant to be as inclusive as possible: if two of these scholars agree on a reference, that reference is included. In addition, the half-dozen citations found in Ephesians and the Pastorals, though excluded by Michel and Koch (the latter also excludes the ones in 2 Cor 6:16-18), are included here; scholars who do not recognize these letters as authentically Pauline can eliminate them easily enough.

Rather than present the data in raw form, an attempt has been made to group the quotations into useful categories. The first group consists of passages that are free of significant textual difficulties. In these cases the LXX renders the Hebrew text in a generally reliable and fairly "literal" way, while Paul's citation in turn conforms with the LXX rendering in all matters of substance.

In many passages, however, the MT and the LXX give different readings. (At least three factors, individually or in combination, can account for the differences: free translation, mistranslation and the translators' use of Hebrew MSS that differed at points from what would later become the MT.) These passages can

Old Testament Citations in Paul

Note: All OT references are keyed to the chapter/verse numbers of the English Bible. In the Psalms, the Hebrew and the English are frequently off by one or two verses; beginning with Psalm 10, the Hebrew and the LXX are off by one chapter, so that, for example, Psalm 24 in the Hebrew and English is Psalm 23 in the LXX. Discrepancies of this sort outside the Psalms are noted in parentheses.

1. Paul = LXX = MT.

(1) Rom 2:6	Ps 62:12
(2) Rom 3:4	Ps 51:4
(3) Rom 3:13a	Ps 5:9
(4) Rom 3:13b	Ps 140:3
(5) Rom 3:18	Ps 36:1
(6) Rom 4:17	Gen 17:5
(7) Rom 4:18	Gen 15:5
(8) Rom 7:7	Ex 20:17 (= Deut 5:21)
(9) Rom 8:36	Ps 44:22
(10) Rom 9:7	Gen 21:12
(11) Rom 9:12	Gen 25:23
(12) Rom 9:13	Mal 1:2-3
(13) Rom 9:15	Ex 33:19
(14) Rom 9:26	Hos 1:10 (2:1)
(15) Rom 10:5	Lev 18:5
(16) Rom 10:13	Joel 2:32 (3:5)
(17) Rom 10:19	Deut 32:21
(18) Rom 13:9a	Deut 5:17-21 (cf. Ex 20:13-17)
(19) Rom 13:9b	Lev 19:18
(20) Rom 15:3	Ps 69:9
(21) Rom 15:9	Ps 18:49 (cf. 2 Sam 22:50)
(22) Rom 15:11	Ps 117:1
(23) Rom 15:21	Is 52:15
(24) 1 Cor 3:20	Ps 94:11
(25) 1 Cor 5:13	Deut 17:7 et al.
(26) 1 Cor 10:7	Ex 32:6
(27) 1 Cor 10:26	Ps 24:1
(28) 1 Cor 15:27	Ps 8:6
(29) 1 Cor 15:32	Is 22:13
(30) 1 Cor 15:45	Gen 2:7
(31) 2 Cor 4:13	Ps 116:10 (LXX 115:1)
(32) 2 Cor 6:2	Is 49:8
(33) 2 Cor 6:16	Lev 26:12 (cf. Ezek 27:37)
(34) 2 Cor 6:17	Is 52:11 + Ezek 20:34
(35) 2 Cor 8:15	Ex 16:18
(36) 2 Cor 9:9	Ps 112:9
(37) Gal 3:8	Gen 12:3 + 18:18
(38) Gal 3:12	Lev 18:5
(39) Gal 3:16	Gen 13:15 (cf. Gen 12:7; 17:7; 22:18)
(40) Gal 4:30	Gen 21:10
(41) Gal 5:14	Lev 19:18
(42) 1 Tim 5:18a	Deut 25:4

2. Paul = MT ≠ LXX.

(43) Rom 1:17	Hab 2:4
(44) Rom 11:4	1 Kings 19:18
(45) Rom 11:35	Job 41:11 (3)
(46) Rom 12:19	Deut 32:35
(47) 1 Cor 3:19	Job 5:13
(48) Gal 3:11	Hab 2:4
(49) 2 Tim 2:19a	Num 16:5

3. Paul = LXX ≠ MT.

(50) Rom 2:24	Is 52:5
(51) Rom 3:14	Ps 10:7 (LXX 9:28)
(52) Rom 4:3 (9, 22)	Gen 15:6
(53) Rom 4:7-8	Ps 32:1-2
(54) Rom 9:29	Is 1:9
(55) Rom 10:16	Is 53:1
(56) Rom 10:18	Ps 19:4
(57) Rom 10:20-21	Is 65:1-2
(58) Rom 11:34	Is 40:13
(59) Rom 12:20	Prov 25:21-22
(60) Rom 14:11	Is 45:23 (+ 49:18?)
(61) Rom 15:10	Deut 32:43
(62) Rom 15:12	Is 11:10
(63) 1 Cor 6:16	Gen 2:24
(64) 2 Cor 13:1	Deut 19:15
(65) Gal 3:6	Gen 15:6
(66) Gal 4:27	Is 54:1

4. Paul ≠ LXX ≠ MT.

(67) Rom 3:10-12	Ps 14:1-3 (cf. Ps 53:1-3)
(68) Rom 3:15-17	Is 59:7-8
(69) Rom 9:9	Gen 18:10, 14
(70) Rom 9:17	Ex 9:16
(71) Rom 9:25	Hos 2:23 (25)
(72) Rom 9:27-28	Is 10:22-23 (+ Hos 1:10?)
(73) Rom 9:33	Is 8:14 + 28:16
(74) Rom 10:6-8	Deut 9:4 + 30:12-14 (cf. Ps 107:26)
(75) Rom 10:11	Is 28:16
(76) Rom 10:15	Is 52:7
(77) Rom 11:3	1 Kings 19:10 (cf. v. 14)
(78) Rom 11:8	Deut 29:4 (+ Is 29:10)
(79) Rom 11:9-10	Ps 69:22-23
(80) Rom 11:26-27a	Is 59:20-21
(81) Rom 11:27b	Is 27:9
(82) 1 Cor 1:19	Is 29:14
(83) 1 Cor 1:31	Jer 9:24 (23)
(84) 1 Cor 2:16	Is 40:13
(85) 1 Cor 9:9	Deut 25:4
(86) 1 Cor 14:21	Is 28:11-12
(87) 1 Cor 15:54	Is 25:8
(88) 1 Cor 15:55	Hos 13:14
(89) 2 Cor 3:16	Ex 34:34
(90) 2 Cor 6:18	2 Sam 7:14 (+ v. 8; cf. 1 Chron 17:13)
(91) 2 Cor 9:7	Prov 22:8 (LXX only)
(92) 2 Cor 10:17	Jer 9:24
(93) Gal 3:10	Deut 27:26
(94) Gal 3:13	Deut 21:23
(95) Eph 4:8	Ps 68:18
(96) Eph 5:31	Gen 2:24
(97) Eph 6:2-3	Ex 20:12 (cf. Deut 5:16)

5. Debated.

(98) Rom 3:20	Ps 143:2
(99) Rom 9:20	Is 29:16 (45:9)
(100) Rom 11:1-2	Ps 94:14
(101) Rom 12:16-17	Prov 3:7
(102) 1 Cor 2:9	(Is 64:4 + 65:16?)
(103) 1 Cor 15:25	Ps 110:1
(104) 2 Cor 8:21	Prov 3:4
(105) 2 Cor 9:10	Is 55:10 + Hos 10:12
(106) Gal 2:16	Ps 143:2
(107) 2 Tim 2:19b	Is 26:13? (+ Sir 35:3?)

[Ellis also notes 1 Tim 5:18b (= Mt 10:10?) because of the introductory formula at the beginning of the verse.]

be further subdivided on the basis of Paul's agreement with one or the other. Accordingly, the second group below consists of a handful of instances in which Paul agrees with the Hebrew (i.e., the MT) over against the LXX. More frequently, Paul follows the LXX over against the Hebrew, as shown by the passages listed under the third category.

Two additional categories round out the lists. The fourth group consists of passages where Paul's citation differs from both the Hebrew and the LXX, whether or not these two agree. The fifth and last category brings together a series of citations that are problematic, either because the source of the citation is debated and/or because only one of the three scholars mentioned above regards it as a citation rather than an allusion.

It needs to be stressed that a strong subjective element affects some of the decisions reflected in the lists, particularly when one must determine whether a variation is significant enough to be noted as such. Differences between Paul and LXX are here regarded as significant primarily if they appear to reflect a different Greek version of the OT or a different understanding of the Hebrew. Similarly, variations between LXX and MT are noted if the Greek rendering suggests a misunderstanding of the Hebrew text or presupposes a Hebrew text different from the MT. Not everyone, however, will apply these criteria in the same way. For example, 2 Corinthians 13:1, quoting Deuteronomy 19:5, is included in the third group below because Paul follows the LXX (against MT) in adding the word "every" (pan), but someone could argue that such an addition is almost required for Greek stylistic reasons. Similarly, not everyone will agree that Paul's citation of Habakkuk 2:4 in Romans 1:17 and Galatians 3:11 should be placed in the second category (contrast Smith, 272).

Complicating the discussion is the fact that sometimes a particular quotation could be listed under two different headings. As mentioned above, 2 Corinthians 13:1 is normally regarded as closer to the LXX than to the MT because of the addition of the Greek word pan; however, in the same quotation Paul—against both MT and LXX—fails to repeat the phrase "by the mouth." Note also Romans 9:17, where Paul's choice of a verb departs from the LXX in a way that approximates the Hebrew of Exodus 9:16; at the same time, Paul accepts the phrase en soi, "through you," added by the LXX. Understandably, this passage has been included under the fourth category, yet it may be misleading to suggest that Paul's citation agrees with neither the MT nor the LXX.

In spite of these problems, however, the rough categorizations of the accompanying chart should prove sufficiently reliable to form a broad picture of the relevant data.

1.2. Textual Problems. What emerges from the material, more than anything else, is the fact that Paul's quotations of the OT do not follow a simple pattern. Certainly the apostle feels no compulsion in every instance to reproduce texts exactly. On the other hand, it would be a mistake to infer that he attached no significance to the details: when appropriate or necessary, he could focus on the actual wording in support of his teaching (the best known example is his emphasis on the singular of the word "seed" in Gal 3:16).

We also find a lack of uniformity with regard to Paul's textual source. His dependence on the current Greek translation of his day is clearly established, but there is good reason to think that he was familiar with the original Hebrew and that the latter, in at least some cases, determined how he used the OT. This general question, unfortunately, becomes tangled in the technical problems of textual transmission. The LXX translators would of course have used Hebrew MSS produced at about their time (two or three centuries before Christ), when the textual situation was somewhat unstable; by A.D. 100, however, the Hebrew text had become more standardized, and it was not until some centuries later that the particular form available to us (the MT) took definitive shape.

Could some of the differences in the lists above be accounted for by such changes in the Hebrew textual tradition? Someone might argue, for example, that the addition of the words pas anthrōpos ("every person") in Deuteronomy 27:26 LXX = Galatians 3:10 reflects a Hebrew text that contained the corresponding phrase and that such a text was used by the LXX translators as their Vorlage (master-copy). Indeed, the Hebrew biblical MSS found in Qumran and other areas of the Judean desert confirm that peculiar LXX renderings occasionally reflect a Hebrew Vorlage different from the MT. Most discrepancies between the MT and the LXX, however, arise from other factors (such as the translators' method of work, their exegesis, their style, etc.). In any case, there is no hard evidence that differences in the passages cited by Paul resulted from the lack of uniformity among Hebrew MSS.

To complicate matters further, the OT Greek text itself was not uniform. What we (naively) call the Septuagint, or LXX, is really a collection of various translations done at different times by different people who had differing skills and different approaches. Moreover, major revisions and even competing new Greek translations affected the subsequent transmission of the text. As a result, determining what may have been the actual form of the so-called "Old Greek," and thus whether that was the form used by Paul, can be a challenge. For example, at the end of Romans 9:33 Paul quotes the LXX of Isaiah 28:16, "he who believes in him will not be ashamed." The words "in him" do not appear in the MT; however, they are also missing from an important Greek MS, Codex Vaticanus (B). In this case, and usually when there is evidence of competing traditions, Paul's wording conforms to the "standard" and probably original Greek text, which in the book of Isaiah is best represented by Codex Alexandrinus (A).

Occasionally, however, Paul's quotations seem to reflect a mixed text. Romans 9:27-28 cites Isaiah 10:22-23 in a form that is very close to Codex A, but instead of theos ("God") Paul has kyrios ("Lord"), which is the reading of Codex B (however, since the divine names are so easily interchanged, it seems wise not to put too much weight on this variation). Outside Isaiah the textual alignments are somewhat different, but we can find other cases where Paul's wording may reflect, not his own changes, but a variant reading. The original Greek translation of Deuteronomy 27:26 probably contained the relative pronoun hostis (cf. J. W. Wevers' edition of Deuteronomy in the Göttingen Septuaginta), but when Paul quotes this passage in Galatians 3:10 he uses the pronoun hos, which is also attested in various LXX MSS.

These technical details are of importance for the following reason. If Paul quotes an OT passage in a form that differs from the "standard" Greek text but that is attested in isolated LXX MSS or in a later translation, most scholars would explain the divergence as having originated not with Paul but with a competing textual tradition (the most common example is 1 Cor 15:54, where Paul's citation of Is 25:8 departs from the LXX and agrees with a later version attributed to Theodotion). However, if Paul's text form is not attested in a LXX MS or in another Greek version, should we assume that Paul himself is responsible for the change? In 1 Corinthians 3:19, where Paul quotes Job 5:13, he departs from the LXX in several ways that bring the text a little closer to the MT. Since no LXX MSS preserve the rendering used by Paul, it is often assumed that Paul himself is responsible for it. Possibly so. Interestingly, however, one of the features of that rendering (the use of panourgia, "craftiness," for Heb 'ormāh) has led several scholars to argue that a competing version was available to Paul and used by him (the translation attributed to Symmachus, which may reflect an earlier tradition, used the same rendering at Prov 8:12). This option cannot be ruled out.

One final complicating issue is textual variation in the Pauline letters themselves (see Textual Criticism). For example, in 1 Corinthians 9:9 Paul quotes Deuteronomy 25:4, but the verb he uses for "muzzle" is kēmoō, whereas the LXX uses phimoō. It turns out that the vast majority of NT MSS, including P^{46} ℵ A, also have phimoō. Because scribes would naturally have adjusted the quotation in the NT to the Greek OT text with which they were familiar, modern textual critics rightly judge kēmoō to be the original reading in 1 Corinthians 9:9, even though it is found only in a handful of MSS (including Codex B; incidentally, note that the same OT verse is quoted in 1 Tim 5:18, but there the original reading is almost certainly phimoō).

1.3. Exegetical Significance. When Paul's citation varies from either the LXX or the MT (or both), the reason need not be significant. Just as we may sometimes refer to a passage without quoting it exactly, so might Paul. For example: "Jesus said that we cannot do anything without him" is a reliable reference to John 15:5, even though the exact quotation (from NIV) would be: "apart from me you can do nothing." The difference in the personal pronouns ("me" becomes "him"; "you" becomes "we") is due to the very character of an indirect quotation, while the other changes (the word order; the difference between "nothing" and "not anything") are not intended to communicate something special—nor do they imply that the speaker considers the actual words to be unimportant. Similarly, many of Paul's citations belong in this category (cf. Rom 3:15-17 = Is 59:7-8). In short, the mere fact that they contain verbal differences is not a clue to Paul's hermeneutics.

But there are also many other quotations where verbal differences do have exegetical significance. A very interesting example is 1 Corinthians 2:16, where Paul quotes the LXX of Isaiah 40:13a, "Who has known the mind [nous] of the Lord?" even though the Hebrew text has the word "spirit" (Heb rûaḥ) rather than "mind." The rendering of the LXX translator can perhaps be defended as an attempt to clarify the meaning of the original. But whatever we may think of the translator's technique, Paul could surely have changed the Greek nous, "mind," to pneuma, "spirit," if he had wanted. His choice was probably intentional, and it gives us an important insight into his use of Scripture, namely, the role played by the LXX in Paul's theological reflection.

As it turns out, 1 Corinthians 2 focuses on the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) as the one who makes it possible for us to know God* (see especially 1 Cor 2:11). As Paul draws that discussion to a close, he appeals to Isaiah 40:13 and concludes with the statement "But we have the mind of Christ." The use of the word "mind" here links this last comment with the LXX quotation, but the Hebrew original, as well as the context of Paul's discussion more generally, makes clear that what the apostle means is "We have the Spirit of Christ and therefore we really know Christ." Could it be then that the LXX's interpretive rendering itself became a source for the development of Paul's teaching?

Clues for understanding Paul's use of Scripture, however, go far beyond mere verbal changes. Many passages that contain verbatim citations can reflect important interpretive principles. Conversely, passages that do not even contain an explicit citation at all may be especially revealing of Paul's exegesis. Before discussing the broader hermeneutical questions, therefore, we need to survey Paul's allusions to the OT.

2. Allusions.

As already suggested, the distinction between citation and allusion is not hard-and-fast, and the NT writers (who did not have quotations marks available to them!) appear to have been quite unconcerned about the issue; certainly, there is little to be gained by attempting to formulate a definitive criterion to decide this question. Moreover, the category of "allusion" itself can cover a rather broad range of scriptural uses: loose quotations, references to events, intentional appeals to specific passages, verbal similarities used (perhaps unconsciously) to express a different idea, broad undercurrents of themes, even totally unintentional correspondences. Since hardly a paragraph in the Pauline corpus fails to reflect the influence of the OT on the apostle's language and thought, a complete list of these allusions would be very long indeed; in Romans 9—11 alone, for example, more than one hundred quotations and allusions have been identified (so Hübner, 149-60). The most useful way to survey the material, therefore, is not to produce such a list, but rather to discuss briefly a select and representative number of items.

Philippians,* for example, is conspicuously absent from the list of explicit citations, but it would be a grave mistake to infer that this letter shows no OT influence. A fairly obvious dependence on the OT may be seen in the way Paul describes the monetary gifts he received from the Philippian church: "They are a fragrant offering, an acceptable sacrifice, pleasing to God" (Phil 4:18). This language, of course, comes from various ceremonial passages, such as Exodus 29:18; moreover, a figurative shift is already present in Ezekiel 20:41, "I will accept you as fragrant incense when I bring you out from the nations." This detail must be understood against a larger theological framework, for Paul elsewhere uses priestly language to describe Christian service (cf. leitourgia, "service," and related words in Phil 2:17, 25, 30). In effect, the ceremonial system of Israel is viewed as having been transformed and transferred to the Christian church, which properly fulfills the significance of that system. A few scholars have even suggested that Paul sees himself as the priest who, serving in the church as the true temple* of God, receives the Christians' offerings (see Financial Support).

Another well-known allusion is in Philippians 2:9-11, where Paul states that the purpose of Christ's exaltation* is that "every knee should bow . . . and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord." In Isaiah 45:23, after God has repeatedly affirmed his oneness and uniqueness, he adds: "By myself I have sworn, . . . Before me every knee will bow; by me every tongue will swear" (the last verb is translated by the LXX with the same verb used by Paul, exomologēsetai, "will confess"). Although not an explicit or precise quotation, this use of Isaiah is especially significant because of its profound implications for Paul's conception of Christ* (this would be true whether or not the so-called Christ hymn* was originally composed by Paul).

Close attention to the LXX reveals other interesting allusions to the OT in Philippians. A few verses later, Paul addresses the problem of grumbling and complaining (Phil 2:14), a theme reminiscent of the experience of the Israelites in the wilderness. That comment leads him to speak of the Philippians as "children of God without fault in a crooked and depraved generation" (Phil 2:15), a phrase that reproduces half a dozen words from Deuteronomy 32:5 LXX. Since the OT passage (which is exegetically difficult) speaks of the Israelites themselves as a crooked people and thus not God's children, Paul here gives a provocative, possibly ironic, twist to the phrase in Deuteronomy: it is the Gentile* Christians of Philippi, not the unbelieving Jews, who may be regarded as God's children, and therefore the Philippians need not be intimidated by the Jewish-based opposition they are experiencing (cf. Phil 3:1-3; see Opponents).

Another allusion which is easy to miss unless one refers specifically to the LXX text is at Philippians 1:19, "what has happened to me will turn out for my deliverance." The Greek here is touto moi apobēsetai eis sōtērian (lit., "this will lead to salvation for me"), a verbatim quotation from Job 13:16 LXX. Most commentators, even if they notice the striking verbal correspondence, appear to see little significance in it. And, to be sure, it is possible that Paul has simply—and perhaps even unconsciously—borrowed the language of Job to express quite a different idea, his hoped-for deliverance from prison (the connection would have been aided by the parallel between Job's accusers and the individuals Paul mentions in Phil 2:17; cf. Hays, 21-23). There is much to be said, however, for the view that what Paul has in mind is the more profound issue of his relationship with God and thus his spiritual destiny. Since the context of Job 13:13-18 deals precisely with matters of eternal import, Paul's use of that passage may be more than a casual allusion.

In other instances conceptual rather than strict verbal correspondences suggest that Paul has an OT passage or theme in mind. For example, some scholars have argued that the clause "made himself nothing" (heauton ekenōsen, lit., "emptied himself") in Philippians 2:7a alludes to Isaiah 53:12, which says that the Servant* of the Lord "poured out his life unto death." Since, as we have seen, Paul definitely uses Isaiah later in the passage (Phil 2:10-11), and since he refers to Jesus as doulos ("servant," Phil 2:7b), it may well be that the Suffering Servant motif has played a role in the formulation of the Christ hymn. If so, however, the allusion is rather subtle, and therefore one would want to be cautious about reading too much into the meaning of the phrase.

Even more subtle is the suggestion that Philippians 2:12, where Paul encourages his readers to continue their obedience whether or not he is present with them, is an allusion to Moses'* words in Deuteronomy 31:27, "If you have been rebellious against the Lord while I am still alive and with you, how much more will you rebel after I die!" Three verses later, as already noted, Paul certainly alludes to a statement in the close context of Moses' exclamation (Deut 32:5); moreover, Paul seems to have his own death in mind at Philippians 2:17. The possibility that Deuteronomy 31:27 may have affected the apostle's writing can hardly be excluded, but it is difficult to determine whether the allusion was a conscious one and, if so, how much significance should be attached to it.

One reason for focusing on Philippians (and there are perhaps another half dozen allusions not mentioned above) is to show that even a letter that has no citations in the usual sense may reflect Paul's great dependence on the OT. In the case of letters that do include citations, readers usually concentrate on those citations to the exclusion of the less obvious ways in which Paul uses Scripture. A good case in point is 2 Corinthians. Paul quotes Psalm 116:10 (LXX 115:1) in 2 Corinthians 4:13, "I believe; therefore I have spoken," in support of his own attitude to his apostolic ministry. What commentators usually fail to note, however, is that in that Psalm there are several references to humiliation and death, recurring themes in 2 Corinthians; that Psalm 118, which also has references to death, speaks of affliction* (Ps 118:5), God's power* (Ps 118:15-16, LXX dynamis; cf. 2 Cor 6:7) and discipline (Ps 118:18, LXX epaideusan; cf. 2 Cor 6:9); and that there are some other light parallels in nearby Psalms. Several important allusions to other parts of Scripture are also present in 2 Corinthians. As Paul relates his ministry to the problems in Corinth, he shows "that he has 'lived in the Bible' to the point where the Bible has formed his whole outlook on how the world is and what his place in it might be. Those who idly suppose that Scripture is important only when Paul uses it in argument in Galatians and Romans have a superficial view of the situation" (Young and Ford, 63, though not all of the parallels mentioned on 64-68 are convincing).

3. Paul and Jewish Exegesis.

As an educated and religious first-century Jew, Paul would of course have been familiar with the range of principles and techniques employed by his contemporaries (see Jew, Paul the). We have already seen his indebtedness to the interpretive tradition preserved in the LXX. It is also reasonable to think that Paul would have learned from the targumic tradition, that is, the Aramaic interpretive renderings of the Hebrew Bible that were part of the synagogue liturgy (whether written targumim were available to him is debated). The most convincing example of targumic influence is found in one of the disputed letters, Ephesians 4:8 (= Ps 68:18), which uses the verb "gave" as in the targum, whereas both MT and LXX have "took" (see commentaries). Some scholars have also tried to explain Paul's use of Deuteronomy 30:12-14 in Romans 10:6-8 by appealing to a targumic tradition, but even this instance is debatable. At any rate, the ancient versions do not contain explicit exegetical reflection (except perhaps for some of the expansive glosses of the Palestinian targumim), and so we turn to other sources.

3.1. Alexandrian Exegesis. Jews living in the Diaspora were constantly faced by the twin tasks of confronting pagan culture and accommodating to it; survival required learning how neither to compromise their own faith nor to reject Greek thought altogether. This challenge would of course affect their use of Scripture. The very existence of the LXX (a Greek document) is evidence of that fact. Philosophical currents would moreover exert their influence in the self-understanding of Hellenistic Judaism. One important element in Greek philosophy, as it turns out, was the need to reinterpret the old Homeric stories (the Iliad is sometimes referred to as the Bible of the Greeks) in the light of cultural changes. The Stoics in particular, offended by some elements in those stories, resorted to allegorization: Homer was salvaged by nonliteral interpretation.

The allegorical approach was borrowed by Hellenistic Jewish thinkers, especially in Alexandria. Best known among them was Philo (c. 13 B.C.-A.D. 45), who used this method as a means of synthesizing Hebrew and Greek thought. Whether Paul was familiar with Philo's work is impossible to prove or disprove, but attempts have been made to demonstrate a connection between them. Passages in Paul that some have considered allegorical include 1 Corinthians 9:9 (where he applies to Christian workers the principle of not muzzling the ox), 1 Corinthians 10:3 (which identifies the wilderness rock with Christ), 2 Corinthians 3:12-16 (where the veil over Moses' face is applied to Jewish unbelief) and especially the Sarah-Hagar analogy in Galatians 4:21-31.

This last passage actually contains the Greek verb allēgoreō (Gal 4:24), a feature that some consider conclusive, but that word could be used quite broadly and one can hardly assume that Paul intended it in the rather technical sense in which the English word allegorize is often used today. The apostle neither dehistoricizes the Genesis narrative—on the contrary, he clearly assumes its historical character—nor does he seek to integrate the narrative into a philosophical scheme, the two features that most clearly distinguish Philonic interpretation. In fact, even a superficial acquaintance with Philo's usual exegetical mode highlights its differences from, rather than similarities to, Pauline hermeneutics. Attempts to find an organic connection between Paul's use of Scripture and Alexandrian exegesis have not been persuasive.

3.2. Qumran Exegesis. The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in the late 1940s, and subsequent findings elsewhere in the Judean desert, have greatly affected our understanding of Jewish life and thought in the first century (see Qumran and Paul). Although the NT makes no direct reference to the religious groups that produced this literature, we may reasonably assume that the early Christians would have had some knowledge of the ideas held by those sects. Some scholars have even argued, though not successfully, for a relatively close connection between Christianity and Qumran. (According to one theory, the "Damascus" where Paul went upon his conversion was none other than Qumran!)

This question is particularly relevant to the present article because biblical interpretation is very common in the Dead Sea Scrolls and is in fact one of the most interesting and distinctive features in Qumranic thought. The most obvious feature common to both Qumran and Paul is the use of certain expressions to introduce explicit citations from the OT, in particular the formula "as it is written" (in various constructions). At a more substantive level, Fitzmyer has pointed out that both Qumran and the NT, over against Alexandrian exegesis, use the OT in a generally—but not strictly—literal way; that both often "modernize" the OT text by applying its general sense to a contemporary situation (sometimes going so far as to "accommodate" the text by, in Fitzmyer's judgment, wresting it out of its original context); and that both make use of "eschatological" exegesis by identifying the "last days" of certain OT passages with the expectations of the respective communities. Fitzmyer concludes, however, that such similarities "do not affect anything more than the periphery of their theologies. Both depend on the Old Testament, but both have certain presuppositions in the light of which they read the Old Testament. It is these presuppositions which distinguish the two groups despite the similarities in their exegetical procedures" (Fitzmyer, 332).

The eschatological* exegesis in Qumran is especially evident in the pesharim, which comment on the biblical text more or less "verse-by-verse." After citing a portion of text, the comments are introduced with the formula "its interpretation is" (pišrô, or a comparable expression). The word for "interpretation" is in fact pesher (pēšer), and the commentary normally consists in identifying the words of the OT prophets with a contemporary event.

Undoubtedly there is a rough parallel between this approach and the conviction of the NT writers, including Paul, that the coming of Jesus Christ was to be understood as the fulfillment of the OT prophecies. Both communities had a heightened sense of expectation based on God's promises to Israel,* and this common frame of mind sheds light on their use of Scripture. But the contrasts are fundamental. Apart from the obvious, yet crucial, fact that the events they identified as the fulfillment of the prophecies were completely different, other factors figure prominently. The letters of Paul, for example, do not include sustained, verse-by-verse interpretations of the OT, a Qumranic approach that led to highly arbitrary applications. More significantly, the apostle shared with the other NT writers the belief that Jesus' death* and resurrection* constituted the manifestation of God's kingdom,* whereas the community in Qumran was much more preoccupied with the yet-to-come deliverance. Although Paul's thought certainly includes a strong sense of expectation (cf. Rom 8:18-25), his dominant perspective is the conviction that the age to come is already here (cf. 1 Cor 10:11).

3.3. Rabbinic Exegesis. If Philo's work was geographically and conceptually distant from Palestinian Judaism, and if the teachings of Qumran (and other sectarian groups) were somewhat removed from "mainstream" Jewish thought, can we find a more fruitful area of study in the rabbinic materials? On the assumption that such documents as the Talmud (the basic storehouse of Jewish folklore and law, which includes the Mishnah) and the midrashim (rabbinic expositions of Scripture) give an accurate picture of first-century Pharisaism, many scholars have in fact drawn striking parallels between Pauline and rabbinic exegesis and even argued that the apostle was in some important respects indebted to the latter.

Formally, rabbinic citations of OT texts are introduced, as in Qumran and Paul, with an authoritative formula, though the precise expressions are often somewhat different (e.g., the rabbis prefer forms of the verb "say" rather than "write"). Again, scholars have detected a similarity between Paul's occasional stringing of quotations (e.g., Rom 9:25-29, citing successively Hos 2:23; 1:10; Is 10:22-23; 1:9), which may be related to one another by the use of significant words, and a rabbinic method known as ḥāraz ("to string," figuratively "to draw parallels between passages"). Another possible feature is Paul's structuring of texts-plus-exposition in a way reminiscent of some (later) rabbinic commentaries that fall into a category known as Yelammedenu rabbenu, "May our master teach us." Ellis (in Mulder, 708) gives the possible example of Galatians 4:21-31, which begins with a general reference to a basic text (Gen 16 and 21); the exposition includes a secondary reference (Is 54:1); and the application quotes another passage (Gen 21:10) that relates to the other texts both verbally and conceptually. A few other literary techniques have been suggested.

In addition to noticing formal characteristics, scholars have paid much attention to exegetical principles and methods found in the rabbinic literature. An explicit set of rules attributed to Hillel, a very influential teacher who lived just prior to the ministry of Jesus, may have been known to Paul. The very first rule, known as qal wāḥômer ("light and heavy"), establishes a relationship between two ideas, one of which is more significant than the other. Such an approach may be reflected in 2 Corinthians 3:7-11, where Paul draws a contrast between the Mosaic Law* and the gospel by arguing that if the former, which was a ministry* of death, was glorious, then we should expect the ministry of the Spirit to be all the more glorious.

Other principles of exegesis, attributed to later rabbis, have also been suggested as parallels to Pauline interpretation. For example, a rule clearly formulated by R. Ishmael in the second century states that when two texts appear to be contradictory, one may appeal to a third to resolve the tension. Now in Galatians 3:11-12 Paul sets Habakkuk 2:4 in contrast to Leviticus 18:5 (does one live by faith or by doing what the Law says?), and H. J. Schoeps argued that Genesis 15:6, cited by Paul earlier in the context, provides the solution (Schoeps, 178-79; differently, Bonsirven, 316-17 with 201). Many additional examples could be adduced.

In spite of the massive efforts expended in this field of study, the results are ambiguous. One basic obstacle is chronological: the rabbinic literature available to us dates back only as far as the beginnings of the third century, and even the older oral tradition to which that literature refers developed mostly after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. According to some scholars, there is little (if any) significant connection between the Pharisees of Jesus' day and the later rabbinic school that flourished in the second century and thereafter became "mainstream" Judaism. This position surely goes too far; there is no need for an extreme skepticism regarding the historical value of rabbinic literature. Nevertheless, great caution and tentativeness is required when attempting to draw parallels. Because the antiquity of specific rabbinic statements can no longer be assumed, concrete reasons need to be offered in support of using those statements as evidence of first-century thought and practice.

Another serious obstacle is the relative vagueness of some of the adduced parallels. It is immediately apparent, for example, that the qal wāḥômer argument simply reflects the general logical principle of arguing a fortiori, a technique present in a wide variety of cultures at both popular and sophisticated levels. Indeed, one would be hard-pressed to find an exegetical example in Paul's writings that is distinctively rabbinic; that is, some technique that could not be paralleled elsewhere.

One particularly ambiguous term is the adjective midrashic, which is frequently applied to various portions of the NT, such as 1 Corinthians 10:1-5 and 2 Corinthians 3:6-16. The Hebrew noun midrash (midrāš) can have a very general meaning, suggesting nothing more than our own term interpretation; when capitalized, the Hebrew term has a very specific meaning, namely, a particular type of rabbinic literature consisting of collections of biblical expositions (it is generally agreed that no NT book can be described as a midrash in this sense).

Between these two meanings, midrash is commonly used as shorthand for "distinctive Jewish interpretation," but just what is distinctive about it? In the view of some scholars, it is the tendency to embellish narratives; for others, it is the presence of exegetical moves that do not conform to the grammatico-historical method. A less prejudicial definition that has become widely accepted focuses on the way that Jewish interpretation actualizes the text—for the rabbis the Bible was a living text, and its interpretation could not be divorced from application. True enough, but has not such a focus also characterized the reading of Scripture in most Christian communities? Although a few modern writers are careful to define midrash more concretely and precisely, the term continues to be used by others in a way that is either pejorative or sloppy, and it seldom serves to clarify Pauline exegesis.

To be sure the numerous similarities between Paul and the later rabbis, when taken cumulatively, create the strong presumption that the apostle does reflect the Jewish culture of which he is a part (and which developed into what we call Rabbinic Judaism). The importance of that insight must not be underestimated. Increased familiarity with first-century Jewish interpretation is of inestimable help, at least in a general way, as we seek to appreciate Paul's use of Scripture. Nevertheless, the appeal to later rabbinic literature remains problematic; its evidential value is only indirect, and thus its function is largely limited to illustrative, not probative, uses.

3.4. Other Sources. In addition to the bodies of literature already considered, there are many other documents produced during or before the NT period that shed light on the Jewish use of Scripture. The so-called apocryphal and pseudepigraphic books (some of which, incidentally, are represented among the Qumran findings) are full of allusions to the OT. Some of these works consist of "retellings" of biblical narratives, often with considerable expansion and embellishment; at least implicitly, they reveal certain hermeneutical commitments. The same is true even of writings that are more self-consciously historical, such as Josephus' Antiquities. (For a discussion of biblical interpretation in such documents, see the relevant chapters in Mulder.) While these works have been exploited for their relevance to Pauline studies with regard to theology, less has been done with regard to exegetical practice—surprisingly so, in view of their close chronological proximity to the NT writings.

Finally, it should be pointed out that Paul, though first and foremost a Jew, had direct and sustained contact with Greco-Roman culture. Apart from the debated question whether his childhood was spent in Tarsus or in Jerusalem, he certainly ministered for at least a decade in Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:18—2:1); his use of the Greek language and his obvious familiarity with current Greek thought are further evidence of the extent to which he was influenced by Hellenism.* Considerable attention has been paid to parallels between Paul's style of argumentation and the rhetorical* techniques of the day, but an issue that needs addressing is the possible influence of Greco-Roman literary interpretation on his handling of Scripture (at the formal level, cf. Stanley).

4. Biblical Interpretation in Paul's Writings.

The present article is concerned with Paul's principles and methods of interpretation rather than with the actual content of that interpretation. Of course, exegesis and theology are intimately related and so the lines tend to blur (see Hermeneutics/Interpreting Paul). Nevertheless, no attempt will be made here to summarize Paul's teaching, as that teaching arises from his use of the OT, on the various relevant topics (for which the reader should consult the appropriate articles; see, e.g., Abraham, Adam, Covenant, Creation, Eschatology, Law, Wisdom).

4.1. Foundational Concepts. Although, as we have noted, many of the OT citations are not verbally exact, it is apparent to virtually all students of Paul that he regarded the Scripture (hē graphē) as proceeding from God himself and therefore as enjoying ultimate authority. In polemical contexts he explicitly invokes the OT as the final court of appeal; such is in fact the point of the introductory formulas—to say "as it is written" in effect settles the argument. Not surprisingly, then, the explicit quotations appear almost exclusively in the Hauptbriefe (chief letters): Romans,* 1-2 Corinthians* and Galatians.* The significance of this distribution is not, as A. von Harnack once argued, that the appeal to Scripture was forced upon Paul by the Judaizers'* arguments and that he really had no desire to bind the Gentile churches to a book. As we have seen, Paul's dependence on the OT is just as clear in those passages where he makes no direct appeal to it. Moreover, Harnack's theory does not really do justice to the fact that the greatest concentration of quotations is found in Romans. Whatever polemical element we may rightfully see in this letter, its great significance lies in the fact that here Paul gives a sustained exposition of his gospel (Rom 2:16), and for that purpose nothing is more important than to show the consistency of his message with that of Scripture (Rom 1:2; 3:31; 9:6; etc.).

Of special interest is the way in which Paul depends on the OT even (especially?) when he appears to view it negatively. Galatians 3, for example, is a sustained rejection of the view that the Law* can give life,* yet he directly appeals to the Law itself in support of his position. Paul can even combine those two perspectives within one statement: the Law is a primary witness to the fact that righteousness* comes apart from the Law (Rom 3:21); indeed, the Law itself led him to die to the Law (Gal 2:19).

A related issue is Paul's use of Scripture to deal with the serious problem of why the Jewish nation as a whole had failed to receive the gospel (see Israel). The early Christians faced no greater challenge to the validity of their message than the negative Jewish response. If the gospel is indeed God's fulfillment of his promises, is it conceivable that God's own people would not see it? Would not that imply that God's purposes have been thwarted—that his word has failed (Rom 9:6)? Both the problem and the solution to it can already be seen in the ministry of Jesus. In explanation of his use of parables, for example, the Synoptic Gospels record Jesus' appeal to Isaiah 6, which stresses the hardening of Israel within the context of God's providence (Mk 4:12 and par.). The Gospel of John, which focuses sharply on the fact that "his own did not receive him" (Jn 1:13), also depends on Isaiah 6, in combination with Isaiah 53, to account for that unbelief (Jn 12:37-41).

Very probably this background is part of the reason why the book of Isaiah, as the lists of citations indicate, figures most prominently in Paul's quotations. It also helps us to understand why Romans 9—11, far from being a "parenthesis" in the argument of the letter, constitute its very heart—indeed, the climax to which the earlier chapters were building (cf. esp. Rom 2:28-29 and 4:11, anticipating Rom 9:6-8). Having already quoted or alluded to Isaiah in Romans 9:20, he does it again in Romans 9:27-28, which is followed by another Isaiah quotation in Romans 9:29 and still another one in Romans 9:33 (this last one combining two different passages from Isaiah). But that is not all: Romans 10 includes four more quotations from the same book, and Romans 11 another four! Undoubtedly, the prophecies of Isaiah provided Paul with the ammunition he needed to fight one of his fiercest battles.

There is a positive side, however, to the sobering truth of Israel's hardening, namely, the glorious reception of the Gentiles* into God's fold. This is the "mystery"* that had been hidden throughout the ages but is brought to light with the coming of Christ (Rom 16:25-26; 1 Cor 2:7; Eph 3:2-11; Col 1:25-27). The church* as the eschatological community that Christ has established through his Spirit becomes therefore a focal point for Paul's hermeneutics (for the view that Paul's use of Scripture is primarily "ecclesiocentric," see Hays, chap. 3). But this concept reflects a view of redemptive history that also functions as an interpretive principle, as the next section will make clear.

4.2. Guiding Principles. It should be evident from what has already been said that Paul's use of the OT was not motivated by antiquarian interests. The Scriptures were intensely practical for him. However, the moment we use an earlier writing to meet a current need, we of course transfer that writing to a new historical context and thus unavoidably involve ourselves in shifting its meaning (cf. Rom 15:21, where Paul applies the messianic words of Is 52:15 to his own ministry). Just how much shifting goes on and, more important, in what way that shifting takes place, is perhaps the fundamental problem in the field of hermeneutics.

It is precisely because Paul is never content with merely restating the original, historical meaning of an OT text, but rather applies it to his present situation, that the perennial and troublesome question arises, "Can we use Paul's exegesis today?" The very formulation of the problem can be misleading. Usually what is in view is whether Paul's methods of interpretation are compatible with "scientific," grammatico-historical exegesis. But this concern often ignores some fundamental obstacles. In the first place, Paul never gives us an exegetical discussion in the usual sense. We find no sustained Pauline exposition of any one OT passage. He never explicitly raises the question, What does such or such a passage mean? Even in sections where he appears to be arguing exegetically (e.g., Gal 3:10-14), he never stops to consider alternate interpretations of the texts. When we further consider the possibility that at least some of Paul's references to Scripture are not intended as doctrinal proofs but serve primarily to heighten the emotive thrust of his words (e.g., 2 Cor 13:1), the difficulties in answering our question become clearer.

To put it differently: there is no evidence that Paul or his contemporaries ever sat down to "exegete" OT texts in a way comparable to what today's seminary students are expected to do—that is, to produce an exposition that focuses on the historical meaning. Nevertheless, many of Paul's actual uses of Scripture are acknowledged by all concerned to be consistent with such a historical meaning. In other words, there is plenty of evidence that the apostle reflected carefully and thoughtfully on OT texts in their contexts. Even in the case of quotations that appear somewhat arbitrary, patient consideration of the broad context can be enlightening.

For example, in the middle of the Sarah-Hagar analogy Paul quotes Isaiah 54:1, which at first blush may look like a violent use of the text. Isaiah's words, however, are strongly reminiscent of the description of Sarah's barrenness in Genesis 11:30 LXX. Moreover, Isaiah had earlier referred to the (true) children of Sarah as the inhabitants of Zion who "pursue righteousness and who seek the Lord" (Is 52:1-3). In between these two chapters, of course, is the Suffering Servant passage, which Paul seems to allude to in Galatians 3:1 (cf. Gal 3:2 with Is 53:1 LXX; see Jobes). These and other features suggest that Paul is in fact exploiting important associations present in the OT itself. Yet one does not usually hear complaints that the OT prophets are guilty of using allegorical exegesis; nor is it common to argue that, in their view, Scripture contained a sensus plenior ("fuller meaning"). We simply recognize that they knew how to exploit their literary tradition.

The emotive power of literary associations can be great, and so a good writer or speaker will use them as a method of persuasion. Such a "technique" implies neither disrespect for the OT as a source of doctrine (quite the opposite) nor lack of concern for its historical meaning, though admittedly that original sense may sometimes recede into the background in the interests of contemporary needs. In addition, we as modern readers are not always privy to ancient interpretive traditions that perhaps fill the logical gaps that we are so quick to detect. Of course, this principle applies also to rabbinic interpretations. All too often Christian interpreters have tried to salvage Paul by emphasizing the "fantastic" interpretations of the rabbis. The latter, however, were quite capable of careful, literal exegesis; at other times, they could be simply playful. More important, however, their writings are greatly compressed: two or three words might call to mind a whole passage of Scripture, plus other parallel passages, plus a body of tradition that linked those passages with the point being made. Similarly, our inability to identify all the logical steps that might have led Paul to use an OT text for a particular purpose may reflect nothing more than our ignorance (cf. Silva, 159-61).

Finally, Paul's use of Scripture was guided by the conviction that God was the Lord of history. Scholars use different adjectives to describe and nuance this approach: typological (because it may focus on correspondences between OT and NT events or individuals), eschatological (because it emphasizes the coming of Christ as bringing in the end times), canonical (because it considers that the full meaning of a text depends on the teaching of Scripture as a whole) and so on. As already mentioned, the point is simply—but profoundly—that redemptive history came to a climax with the people of the new covenant,* for whom the OT events were recorded as "examples" (1 Cor 10:11). That last word translates the Greek typos, and, though it is doubtful that it reflects the heavy theologizing associated with the modern use of the English word typology, we may be sure that the apostle saw a fundamental and organic connection between OT history and the eschatological realities of Christ's coming. And because the same God who ruled over that history inspired the biblical writers, it is inevitable that the text of Scripture would include a certain undercurrent—a "deeper meaning"?—that could only become clear after the fulfillment of the promises.

Such a view of redemptive history, of course, implies that the whole OT was a witness to Christ, and for that reason Paul's use of the Bible was most distinctively guided by his christological* orientation. Whatever else may be said about the subject, the hermeneutics of the apostle to the Gentiles was ultimately rooted in Christ "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom* and knowledge*" (Col 2:3).

4.3. Habakkuk 2:4 as a Test Case. Some of Paul's quotations raise difficult exegetical problems that cannot be treated adequately in a reference work such as this one. The present article, instead, has sought to provide general guidelines that may help the reader work through those problems in a satisfactory way. Nevertheless, it will be useful to pull together at least a few of the threads by covering one sample passage in greater detail.

In Galatians 3 the apostle is seeking to demonstrate that the true children of Abraham* are those who believe as Abraham believed (Gal 3:6-7; cf. the concluding words in Gal 3:29); these believers are sharply contrasted with those who are "of the works of the Law" (Gal 3:10). In Galatians 3:11 Paul states the crucial thesis that "through the Law no one is justified," and as proof for that thesis he quotes Habakkuk 2:4, "the righteous one will live through faith" (ho dikaios ek pisteōs zēsetai). So fundamental is this statement that it becomes the programmatic verse in Romans (Rom 1:17), a book that can be viewed as a systematic expansion of the message of Galatians.*

This citation provokes some interesting questions. For example, it would be possible to construe the prepositional phrase (ek pisteōs) with the subject rather than with the verb, which yields the translation "he who through faith is righteous will live," but this problem does not directly affect our main concerns. Another issue of secondary importance has to do with textual variation, since the Hebrew includes a pronoun, "his faith," which the LXX mistranslated with the first-person pronoun, "my faith"; Paul's omission of the pronoun has the effect of bringing the quotation closer to the Hebrew (though some argue that it deliberately renders the reference ambiguous).

The main problem with this citation, however, is the fact that the word for "faith" (pistis) translates the Hebrew ʾmûnâh, which normally means "steadiness, faithfulness" (thus implying obedience to the Law), yet Paul uses this text precisely to attack the notion of justification by the works* of the law. It seems bad enough that Paul should use this verse in a way not originally intended—namely, to propound a distinctively "Pauline" doctrine—but even worse that his meaning appears to be exactly the opposite of the original. And if Paul was being careless or dishonest, how could the Christian church use this text as a basic argument for the biblical doctrine of salvation*? In short, we are faced with a major exegetical and theological problem.

The Hebrew text of Habakkuk, in spite of some textual and interpretive problems, is quite clear. The prophet had uttered a complaint to God regarding wickedness in Judah (Hab 1:4, "the wicked hem in the righteous"). The divine response was that the Babylonians would destroy Judah, but that response raised an even more serious problem regarding God's justice and thus we have a second complaint: how can God, who cannot look upon evil, be silent while the wicked swallow up those more righteous than they (Hab 1:13)? The answer is delayed by a verse that creates considerable suspense (Hab 2:1). The setting is then further dramatized by the instruction to write down the message and by an emphatic word that, in spite of apparent delay, the prophecy will come to pass, and so the prophet must wait for it (Hab 2:3). Finally, Habakkuk 2:4 discloses the awaited revelation, which we may paraphrase: "Behold, the unrighteous Babylonians are wicked and proud, but the righteous one will live by his faithfulness." The clause in question, which may be parenthetical (cf. NIV), is followed by a detailed prophecy of the destruction of the wicked.

How did the earliest readers understand this verse? The LXX translator faltered at various points, obscured the syntax and ended up with the view that God's faithfulness is the basis of salvation (a popular Jewish belief still common today). The Jewish community at Qumran interpreted the herald ("reader") of Habakkuk 2:2 as the Teacher of Righteousness and applied Habakkuk 2:3b and 4b to the doers of the Law in Judah, whom God will deliver from condemnation because of their suffering and their faithfulness or loyalty to the Teacher of Righteousness (1QpHab 6:12—8:3). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, for his part, followed the LXX, but with some important changes that emphasize the concept of pistis as faithful perseverance (Heb 10:36, a theme developed in Heb 11).

In view of all this evidence, Paul appears to be the "odd one out." In fact, he seems to use Habakkuk to support a notion of faith that he gets from elsewhere, namely Genesis 15:6, "He [Abraham] believed God and it was credited to him as righteousness." But is it true that the Genesis passage addresses a different issue? A quick look at the Hebrew text suggests that Genesis and Habakkuk may in fact be dealing with the same thought, since the lexical parallels can hardly be a coincidence (the roots ʾmn and ṣdq appear in both passages). The point to appreciate is that Habakkuk himself was involved in biblical interpretation. Though his method may appear subtle to the English reader, the prophet surely was exhorting the people of Judah to follow the footsteps of Abraham, whose faith was not a momentary experience, but a whole life of persevering in obedience (cf. esp. Gen 22, which is the basis for Jas 2:21-24). Faith involves waiting for fulfillment and thus is always in danger of being shaken; therefore, steadiness and constancy are of its essence.

In other words, for Habakkuk there was no such dichotomy between faith and faithfulness as we often assume (similarly, Hebrews emphasizes their connection; cf. Heb 3—4). That the apostle Paul did not view justifying faith as excluding obedience to God's commandments is suggested in Galatians itself (see esp. Gal 5:13-26), but the organic link between these two concepts is extensively developed in Romans. Indeed, in his letter to Rome, after describing his gospel as the fulfillment of the OT promises (Rom 1:2) and appealing to Habakkuk 2:4 as a key to understanding that gospel (Rom 1:16-17), Paul spends considerable time elaborating on the significance of Abraham's faith (Rom 4; note especially the emphasis on his perseverance, Rom 4:18-21), and then devotes a major section to the doctrine of the believer's sanctification (Rom 6—8; see Holiness, Sanctification). Far from manipulating the Habakkuk citation as a convenient proof text for a view that contradicted that of the prophet, Paul was genuinely indebted to that text as a source for his teaching; moreover, his own theological formulations strengthened and advanced the prophetic message (see Prophet, Paul as).

4.4. Conclusion. It is plain, then, that Paul was not careless when he quoted the Scriptures. True, the apostle's use of his Bible did not in every respect conform to methods that modern exegesis considers appropriate, but only a superficial reading of his letters could lead one to regard that use as invalid or irresponsible. Quite the contrary, the very categories with which he presented his understanding of Christ's work clearly arose from a serious study of the OT that was both meticulous and comprehensive. Guided not only by the text's historical meaning, but also by its divine authority, by the need to actualize the biblical message, by the power of literary associations and by a christological view of redemptive history, Paul succeeded both in setting forth the truth of the gospel and in teaching God's people how Scripture should be read.

See also HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL; JEW, PAUL THE; LAW; PREACHING FROM PAUL TODAY; QUMRAN AND PAUL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. W. Aageson, "Paul's Use of Scripture: A Comparative Study of Biblical Interpretation in Early Palestinian Judaism and the New Testament: With Special Reference to Romans 9—11" (D.Phil. diss., Oxford University, 1983); idem, Written Also for Our Sake: Paul and the Art of Biblical Interpretation (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1993); J. Barr, Old and New in Interpretation: A Study of the Two Testaments (London: SCM, 1966); J. Bonsirven, Exégèse rabbinique et exégèse paulinienne (Paris: Beauchesne, 1938); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); D. R. Denny, "The Significance of Isaiah in the Writings of Paul" (Ph.D. diss., New Orleans Theological Seminary, 1985); C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures: The Sub-structure of New Testament Theology (London: Fontana, 1952); E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1957; repr. Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Use of Explicit Old Testament Quotations in Qumran Literature and in the New Testament," NTS 7 (1960-61) 297-333; L. Goppelt, Typos: The Typological Interpretation of the Old Testament in the New (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); A. T. Hanson, Studies in Paul's Technique and Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); A. Harman, "Paul's Use of the Psalms" (Th.D. diss., Westminster Theological Seminary, 1968); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven; Yale University, 1989); H. Hübner, Gottes Ich und Israel. Zum Schriftgebrauch des Paulus in Römer 9—11 (FRLANT 136; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1984); K. H. Jobes, "Jerusalem, Our Mother," WTJ 55 (1993) 299-320; W. C. Kaiser, Jr., The Uses of the Old Testament in the New (Chicago: Moody, 1985); D.-A. Koch, Die Schrift als Zeuge des Evangeliums. Untersuchungen zur Verwendung und zum Verständnis der Schrift bei Paulus (BHT 69; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1986); B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic: The Doctrinal Significance of the Old Testament Quotations (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961); R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); O. Michel, Paulus und seine Bibel (1929; repr. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1972); M. J. Mulder, ed., Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity (CRINT 2.1; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); D. A. Oss, "Paul's Use of Isaiah and Its Place in His Theology: With Special Reference to Romans 9-11" (Ph.D. diss., Westminster Theological Seminary, 1992); H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961); M. Silva, "The New Testament Use of the Old Testament: Text Form and Authority," in Scripture and Truth, ed. D. A. Carson and J. W. Woodbridge (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1983) 147-65; D. Moody Smith, "The Pauline Literature," in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture. Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, SSF, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: University Press, 1988) 265-91; C. D. Stanley, Paul and the Language of Scripture: Citation Technique in the Pauline Epistles and Contemporary Literature (SNTSMS 69; Cambridge: University Press, 1992); P. J. Tomson, Paul and the Jewish Law: Halakha in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles (CRINT 3.1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); F. Young and D. F. Ford, Meaning and Truth in 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988).

M. Silva

OLIVE TREE

1. Setting
2. Pauline Usage
3. Theology of the Olive Tree Analogy
4. Summary

1. Setting.

In order to develop his argument concerning the proper relationship of Gentile* Christians to Jewish Christians and of both of these to Judaism, Paul introduces in Romans 11:16b-24 an analogy from oleiculture. The olive tree played an important role in the culture of people in the Mediterranean region and also enjoyed wide symbolic usage, for example, signifying fruitfulness or athletic success. In the long-established imagery of Israel* as God's* planting, the people had occasionally been likened to an olive tree as in Jeremiah 11:16 or Hosea 14:6, though other plant images were more frequent. The reason why Paul chose the olive tree rather than any other figure is most likely that he wanted to make use of the process of engrafting. The essence of the grafting process is the implanting into an established root or trunk of a new scion. In modern times we are more familiar with the implanting of a cultivated scion into a wild root or stem to provide a tree capable of producing good quality fruit. But another process has also been practiced in which a new scion is grafted into an aged trunk or root to rejuvenate the tree. In both cases the desired result is the same, that the tree produces a good harvest of useful fruit.

2. Pauline Usage.

In Paul's use of the olive tree what is basic is the image of an ancient trunk from which some (tines) branches have been broken off. (The passive verb exeklasthēsan in Rom 11:17, 19 is a circumlocution for divine action.) Among (en autois and not as in NRSV, "in their place") the remaining branches of this cultivated olive tree, wild olive shoots (lit. "wildlings" Rom 11:17, 24) are grafted. Since the wild olive (oleaster in Latin, kotinos in classical Greek) is almost certainly not a different species from the cultivated (on this see Baxter and Ziesler), there is no natural obstacle to the process Paul describes. The rejuvenation of aged stock by engrafting was known and practiced in the ancient world.

The basic grafting process itself is unnatural (cf. the contrast kata/para physin, Rom 11:24) only in the sense that it is an interference with the natural order, but when Paul goes on to speak of the grafting in again of branches that had been deliberately cut off, he is referring to something which has no parallel in normal oleiculture.

The context in Romans 11 into which the olive tree analogy is introduced is one in which Gentile Christians are directly addressed (Rom 11:13-25). Hence the application of the analogy must have its primary reference to them. The resumption of the diatribe* style, with its repeated second-person address, is directed against the presumptuous boasting of Gentile Christians: the echo of earlier rebukes of Jewish presumption is deliberate. Apparently the Roman* Gentile Christians have misunderstood God's dealings with Israel and also their own place in the divine plan. From the fact that the majority of Jews have failed to accept Paul's gospel,* the Gentile Christians have come to the erroneous conclusion that God has rejected the Jews irretrievably. Moreover they saw themselves as displacing the broken-off branches and boasted in their new-found status. Some may even have believed that God had deliberately cast off the Jewish branches to make way for Gentile believers as if the divine choice were determined on purely ethnic grounds.

Paul uses the olive tree analogy to make several important points.

(1) The branches remain in, or are incorporated into, the tree only by faith (not because of ethnic or any other qualities).

(2) The branches, even those grafted in, do not support the root but are entirely dependent on it; the life is in the root, branches of themselves can never constitute a tree.

(3) The branches grafted in are brought in to share (Rom 11:17) the richness of the root—not to monopolize it or to displace all the other branches.

(4) The in-grafted branches are not different in kind from the other branches because if they do not live in humble dependent faith they too will be broken off.

(5) Even the broken-off branches (normally destined to wither or even to be burned), if they do not continue to disobey will be grafted in again—a truly unnatural, even miraculous activity.

The function served by the analogy here is primarily that of deflating the pompous self-image of the Gentile Christians, to insist that arrogance stands in contradiction to faith, to reaffirm the divine election of Israel and to maintain the unity of all God's people whether Jew or Gentile.

3. Theology of the Olive Tree Analogy.

This passage, its immediate context in Romans 11, and indeed Romans 9—11 as a whole, are not negative with respect to Israel; nor are they a finely balanced mixture of judgment* and mercy* (cf. the goodness and severity of God, Rom 11:22); rather the overall emphasis is upon divine mercy and the dominant note is one of hope*—God has the power to graft in again even the branches broken off (Rom 11:23). In Romans 11:25-36 we find Paul's final blow against Gentile-Christian conceit when he goes on to reveal that Israel's hardening is temporary, preliminary to the salvation of "all Israel," "the full number" of Israel (see Fullness).

The imagery of God as an olive cultivator implies a concern to keep the tree alive, to make it bear fruit and to use whatever means necessary to reinvigorate it. Gentiles are only allowed access to the people of God by the extension of God's covenant* with Israel. It is not the grafted branches in and of themselves that invigorates but their ingrafting that rejuvenates the tree. In the image of the olive tree the continuity

(and to a lesser extent the discontinuity) of the people of God is underlined. There is no total destruction of the old tree, nor is the planting of an entirely new tree envisaged. The implication is that the root is still healthy and certainly not incapable of bearing further fruit. Although human response and responsibility are stressed here, there is an underlying emphasis upon divine freedom. God takes human behavior into account but he is not determined by it. He is free to graft in Gentile branches, free to break off Jewish branches, and he maintains the prerogative to make his gifts and call* irrevocable (Rom 11:29).

From this analogy, we can conclude that Paul rejected the notion of the church* having displaced Israel and likewise the concept of an exclusively Gentile Christianity not cognizant of its dependence upon the Jewish root. For Paul this means that the church cannot be in relationship with the God of Israel without at the same time seeing herself as somehow also related to the historical Israel of God.

There may also be implicit in Paul's use of the olive tree analogy, as W. D. Davies has noted, a criticism of Gentile culture and a positive appreciation of God's historic revelation to Israel. Contrary to normal Hellenistic expectation, in Paul's analogy it is the (believing) Jews who are represented in the cultivated olive and the Gentiles who are equated with the wild olive (agrielaios), a notoriously unproductive and profitless shrub. Perhaps Paul was turning the tables on proud Gentile Christians who were tending to make culture rather than the gospel the dominant factor in social relations. Paul displays a positive regard for the heritage of Israel even though in his day the majority rejected his message ("If the root [probably Abraham*] is holy, so are the branches," Rom 11:16).

4. Summary.

Paul's concern in his use of the olive tree is to stress the continuity in God's community of salvation.* God's historic relation to Israel cannot be ignored by the church: The church has to be kept in genuine continuity with its own origins. Only thus can it arrive at true self-understanding and only thus can the church be prevented from deteriorating into some ancient or modern form of gnosticism* or other such ideology. Only as the church sees itself in continuity with Israel and learns from God's interaction with Israel as recorded in the Scripture can the church truly designate itself the "people of God."

See also GENTILES; ISRAEL; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. G. Baxter and J. A. Ziesler, "Paul and Arboriculture: Romans 11:17-24," JSNT 24 (1985) 25-32; P. M. van Buren, "The Church and Israel: Romans 9-11," The Princeton Seminary Bulletin, Supplementary Issue 1 (1990) 5-18; W. S. Campbell, Paul's Gospel in an Intercultural Context (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1992); C. E. B. Cranfield, Romans (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); W. D. Davies, "Paul and the People of Israel" and "Paul and the Gentiles: A Suggestion Concerning Romans 11:13-24," in Pauline and Jewish Studies (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 123-63; J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (WBC 38; Dallas: Word, 1988); O. Hofius, "All Israel will be Saved: Divine Salvation and Israel's Deliverance in Romans 9-11," The Princeton Seminary Bulletin, Supplementary Issue 1 (1990) 19-39; J. Munck, Christ and Israel: An Interpretation of Romans 9—11 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); W. M. Ramsay, "The Olive Tree and the Wild Olive," Expositor, 6th Series, 11 (1905) 16-34, 152-60.

W. S. Campbell

ONESIMUS. See PHILEMON, LETTER TO.

OPPONENTS OF PAUL

Opposition is often presupposed in Paul's letters, which are not theoretical treatises but reasoned replies to living situations in the churches. Paul's epistolary responses are often in rebuttal of opposition, whether to his person or to his teachings. Sometimes these are general and merely imply the existence of local resistance to Paul's doctrines, in which case they are deemed to lie outside the scope of this article. At other times, however, Paul refers to opponents from outside who have infiltrated the churches established by him with a view to overturning his doctrines and influence. In what follows we will limit our discussion to outsiders who have penetrated the Pauline assemblies.

Scholars have devoted considerable effort in identifying such opponents. So important is the question of the identity of the opponents in 2 Corinthians that C. K. Barrett declared it to be "one of the crucial questions for the understanding of the New Testament and the origins of Christianity," a view with which we concur.

2 Corinthians, where opposition to Paul comes into clearest focus, has been submitted to intense investigation and has proved to be the most appropriate point at which to begin.

1. Survey of Opinion
2. Paul's Opponents at Corinth: "Servants of Righteousness"
3. Paul and the Jerusalem Apostles
4. Opponents in the Galatian Churches
5. Paul's Opponents: A Profile
6. The Judaizers, James and Paul

7. Opposition at Colossae: Jewish Gnosticism
8. Opposition at Philippi: Judaizers
9. Opposition in the Pastoral Letters.

1. Survey of Opinion.

The range of opinion on the identity of Paul's opponents is usefully summarized by E. E. Ellis and J. J. Gunther. Broadly speaking, the identity of the opponents in 2 Corinthians has been classified in three ways.

1.1. Judaizers. This view has been classically expressed by F. C. Baur and repeated with refinements by C. K. Barrett, M. E. Thrall and R. P. Martin. It argues that the newcomers to Corinth were Palestinian Jews bent on bringing the Gentile* Corinthians within the framework of Judaism. There is much to be said for this hypothesis.

However, based on 1 Corinthians 1:12, Baur also argued that the opponents were emissaries of Peter who came to Corinth claiming to be "of Christ*" (2 Cor 10:7). Moreover, Baur drew a distinction between the false apostles (pseudapostoloi, 2 Cor 11:13-15) and the exalted apostles (hyperlian apostoloi, 2 Cor 11:5; 12:11) from whom the false apostles came, namely the Jerusalem* apostles (see Apostle).

Against this it should be noted, first, that neither Peter* nor James* is mentioned within 2 Corinthians, although Paul does not hesitate to refer to them by name—and sometimes in negative terms—on other occasions (Gal 1:18-19; 2:9, 11-14; 1 Cor 1:12; 9:5).

Moreover, the differentiation of hyperlian apostoloi from pseudapostoloi appears to be arbitrary. Bultmann argued that the transition from pseudapostoloi (2 Cor 11:1-4) to the hyperlian apostoloi (2 Cor 11:5) is far too abrupt to make sense. The distinction is perhaps necessitated by Baur's own thesis. Baur would not go so far as to suggest that Paul would call Peter and James "false apostles . . . disguising themselves as apostles of Christ . . . servants [of Satan]" (2 Cor 11:13, 15 RSV). The less sinister sounding hyperlian apostoloi is more of a tribute paid to the Jerusalem leaders.

Furthermore, the one explicit reference to pseudapostoloi is sandwiched between the two references to hyperlian apostoloi in a part of the letter (2 Cor 10—12) where Paul utilizes the idea of hyper ("better") ironically. Paul uses words prefixed with hyper to attack the pseudapostoloi for their missionary imperialism (over-extending themselves, hyperektenein, 2 Cor 10:14) into lands beyond (ta hyperekeina, 2 Cor 10:16), for their boast of abundance of revelations, (tē hyperbolē tōn apokalypseōn, 2 Cor 12:7) and the resulting super-elation (hyperairesthai, 2 Cor 12:7). To expose their boastfulness Paul himself boasts ironically of being a "better" (hyper) servant of Christ in terms of the sufferings* which he catalogues (2 Cor 11:23-33; see Afflictions). The close association of hyper words with pseudapostoloi makes it likely that the hyperlian apostoloi and the pseudapostoloi are the same people.

1.2. Gnostics. Diametrically opposed to the Baur thesis is the opinion that the opponents were "gnostic pneumatics" who minimized the earthly Jesus in favor of a heavenly Lord and who pushed Paul's doctrines of grace to antinomian extremes. This theory holds that since the opponents preached "another spirit" (2 Cor 11:4) they must have been antinomian, since Law* and Spirit (see Holy Spirit) are mutually exclusive. 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1 is held to be Paul's reaction against their antinomianism. They despise Paul's inferior gnōsis (2 Cor 11:6) and self-confessed weakness (2 Cor 10:10) and present themselves as offering a higher gnōsis supported by miraculous and visionary "signs" (see Visions). This hypothesis regards the opposition to Paul in 2 Corinthians as an extension of the gnosticizing tendencies evident in 1 Corinthians.

An early advocate of this theory was W. Lütgert (see Gunther) who saw the opponents' background in liberal diaspora Judaism. Lütgert in turn influenced the more recent expositions of R. Bultmann and W. Schmithals.

This view is undermined by the strongly Hebraic/Israelite character of those who oppose Paul (2 Cor 11:22) and by their message which appears to have focused on Moses* and therefore the Law (2 Cor 3:4-16). Furthermore, it is far from certain that Gnosticism (see Gnosis, Gnosticism) was as clearly defined during Paul's time as this hypothesis would require.

1.3. Divine Men* (Theioi Andres). More recently D. Georgi has developed the hypothesis that Paul's opponents claimed—on the basis of their gifts and signs—to be "divine men" in succession to Jesus and Moses, who both were charismatic, wonder-working figures. These were itinerant Hellenistic Jewish missionaries whose methods and beliefs arose from a Hellenistic milieu. Their confident claims and strong demands made on the Corinthians were part of their legitimacy as theioi andres which they insisted upon over against the manifest weaknesses* of Paul.

A variation of this theory may be found in that of G. Friedrich who holds that the models to which the newcomers pointed were not drawn from the Hellenistic world but from early Christianity. According to Friedrich, Stephen and Philip, the miracle-working Hellenist leaders of Acts 6, gathered supporters who have now come with similar powers to Corinth to present Jesus as a triumphant second Moses, as opposed to the suffering figure preached by Paul.

Georgi's theory suffers from the problem that the theioi andres are not the clearly defined type he presupposes, and reference to them generally comes from texts later than the NT (see Blackburn). His argument for their claim to "being sufficient," "sufficiency" (hikanos, hikanotēs, 2 Cor 2:16; cf. 2 Cor 3:5) does not necessitate self-presentation as "divine men"; mere superiority over Paul would suffice.

Friedrich's hypothesis, while helpfully suggestive, does not reckon on the many points at which Stephen's theology may have anticipated and indeed been the source of Paul's doctrines rather than being antipathetic to them.

While the growing knowledge of the world of the NT will doubtless stimulate further theories of their identity and intentions, given that we only meet Paul's opponents in his own passing rebuttal of them, it is unlikely that a scholarly consensus will be reached. The evidence from Paul's letters is too unsystematic and indeed polemical to permit ultimately secure historical decisions.

2. Paul's Opponents at Corinth: "Servants of Righteousness."

2.1. Evidence from 2 Corinthians. The key to the identity of Paul's opponents in Corinth is to be found in his statement:

> For such men are false apostles,
> deceitful workmen,
> disguising themselves as apostles of Christ . . .
> [Satan's] servants > also disguise themselves as servants of righteousness
> (2 Cor 11:13-15).

In terms of their self-presentation the opponents came as "apostles of Christ," "workmen" and "servants," that is, on the same terms as Paul (2 Cor 11:12), having a vocabulary of ministry* identical with Paul's. Their "deceit," their "disguise" was that they purported to be "servants of righteousness*" (diakonoi dikaiosynēs).

Earlier Paul had contrasted two ministries (diakoniai)—of Moses and of Christ (2 Cor 3:4-18). The former, a "written code" which "kills," the latter—"a new covenant"—"[written] in the Spirit," "gives life*" (2 Cor 3:6). The former is a "ministry (diakonia) of condemnation," the latter "a ministry (diakonia) of righteousness" (dikaiosynēs, 2 Cor 3:9).

How does "this ministry," which Paul says he "has" (2 Cor 4:1), mediate "life" and "righteousness"? It is by Christ's death, Paul declares, that "God made him to be sin . . . that in him we might become the righteousness (dikaiosynē) of God" (2 Cor 5:21). This is "the ministry (diakonia) of reconciliation . . . the message of reconciliation" (see Peace, Reconciliation) which God has entrusted to Paul (2 Cor 5:18-19; cf. 2 Cor 6:3).

Paul, therefore, is a diakonos in the "diakonia of righteousness" through the cross of Christ (see Cross, Theology of the) while the opponents are diakonoi of Moses' diakonia of righteousness through "the written code" which, however, brings not "righteousness" but "condemnation" (2 Cor 3:7). The opponents' "deceit" lies in their "message" to the Corinthians that God imputes righteousness by the "written code" rather than through the cross. In proposing to the Corinthians an alternative to the death of Christ as the means of "the righteousness of God" (see Righteousness of God) Paul declares these men to be "servants of Satan*" (2 Cor 11:15).

The phrase "servants of righteousness," therefore, is critical in the identification of Paul's opponents in Corinth. Since theirs was "the ministry . . . of the written code," that is, of "Moses" (2 Cor 3:6-7), we take it that these men were indeed Judaizers* and that their version of the "righteousness of God" by means of the "written code" lay at the heart of their message and was their chief point of difference from the apostle to the Gentiles.

Unfortunately, we may only speculate about their precise message. Once more, however, the word righteousness may come to our assistance. Righteousness occurs not at all in the Thessalonian letters and only once in 1 Corinthians. The single appearance of righteousness to this point, in a letter written to a Greek church, suggests that the issues associated with righteousness had not been raised in Macedonia or Achaia until the writing of 2 Corinthians in about A.D. 56.

2.2. Evidence from Romans. By general agreement Romans* was written in Corinth around A.D. 56 or 57, not long after the writing of 2 Corinthians from Macedonia. There we find righteousness occurring forty-nine times with numerous occurrences of the closely related words justify (dikaioō) and righteous (dikaios; see Justification). Since the righteousness family of words lies at the heart of the argument of Romans (see the key text Rom 1:17), it is likely that Paul is there addressing the same issues and the same (kind of) opponents as in 2 Corinthians. Although Paul makes no mention of circumcision* in 2 Corinthians, it is quite possible that circumcision was part of the dispute at Corinth. It was certainly prominent in both Romans and Galatians.*

The Romans letter may well be Paul's more measured response to the issue of righteousness so painfully raised in Corinth and passionately but unevenly addressed in 2 Corinthians. Certainly polemical echoes may still be heard in Romans which may relate to the same opponents as in 2 Corinthians. There are those who "slanderously charge" Paul with saying "why not do evil that good may come?" (Rom 3:8; cf. Rom 6:1; Gal 2:17). His defensive comments about the Jews (Rom 3:1, 9; 4:1; 9:3-5; 11:1) are consistent with accusations that might arise from a Judaizing apostolate whose message focused on righteousness through the keeping of the works of the Law (cf. Rom 3:21—4:3, 16; 10:3-4). Possibly "those who create dissensions and difficulties in opposition to the doctrines you have been taught" (Rom 16:17) represents Paul's general warning to Roman Christians about the Judaizing message arising out of problems recently encountered in Corinth.

2.3. Newcomers at Corinth. It is evident from 2 Corinthians that Paul's opponents in Corinth were a group ("many," 2 Cor 2:17) of persons (hoi kapēleuontes, "hucksters" or "peddlers," 2 Cor 2:17) who had "come" to Corinth (2 Cor 11:4-5) from outside (their "letters of commendation," 2 Cor 3:1) where they and their message had been "received" (2 Cor 11:4, 20).

It emerges from 2 Corinthians that these newcomers legitimated their diakonia in Corinth by "boasting" (kauchasthai, 2 Cor 10—12 passim) of their achievements, "contrasting" (synkrinein, 2 Cor 10:12) their strengths with Paul's weaknesses. In their missionary journey to Corinth they have come a greater, Paul a lesser, distance (2 Cor 10:13-14). They have "letters of commendation" (from Jerusalem?); Paul has none (2 Cor 3:1-3). They are "sufficient," triumphant figures (see Triumph); Paul is inadequate, a sorry figure as he limps from place to place in defeat (2 Cor 2:14—3:5; 4:1, 16). Extrapolating from remarks Paul makes about himself, some scholars affirm that these experiences were being claimed by his opponents. They are men of divine power* ("beside" themselves, 2 Cor 5:13), "caught up . . . out of the body . . . into paradise" (see Heaven) where they see "visions" and hear "revelations" of what "cannot be told" (2 Cor 12:1-5; see Visions), whereas Paul is mundane, a minister without power, worldly and weak (2 Cor 10:3-6; 12:1-10; cf. 2 Cor 5:12-13). Possibly they performed "the signs of an apostle" (2 Cor 12:12) whereas, they allege, Paul did not. They are powerful in speech (2 Cor 11:5-6) and in wisdom* whereas he is in speech "unskilled" and in general "a fool" (2 Cor 11:1—12:13). In all things he is "inferior" (cf. 2 Cor 11:5), whereas they are superior, "better" (hyper, 2 Cor 11:23).

Herein lies the difficulty of identifying these opponents as Judaizing "Hebrews" bent on imposing "Moses" (the Law) on the Corinthians (2 Cor 11:22; 3:4-16). Corinth was a Greco-Roman metropolis. How can we account for "Hebrews" having sufficient style to find acceptance with such an audience and, moreover, displaying proficiency in the rhetorical arts (see Rhetoric; Rhetorical Criticism) of "boasting" and "comparison"? These "Hebrews" would appear to be behaving like Greeks.

The two main theories about the opponents—that they must have been Judaizers or Gnostics—are perfectly understandable given the apparent contradiction implicit in the evidence about them in 2 Corinthians.

New information is available, however, which changes our whole idea of life in first-century Judea. On the basis of funerary inscriptions M. Hengel has argued that there may have been as many as 16,000 Greek-speaking Jews in Jerusalem out of an estimated population of 100,000 (Hengel, 10; see Hellenism). He reasons that many of these must have enjoyed a high level of classical education. It is quite conceivable, therefore, that the "Hebrews" who came to Corinth spoke polished Greek and possessed skills in rhetoric. Saul/Paul himself was not altogether without abilities in these areas, to say nothing of his coworker Silas/Silvanus (see Coworkers), the Jewish-Christian prophet of Jerusalem to whom is attributed the stylishly written 1 Peter (Acts 15:32; 2 Cor 1:19; 1 Pet 5:12).

What then of the paranormal ecstasy, visions, revelations and miracles on which Paul's opponents depended, in part at least, for their acceptance in Corinth? Study of the history of Judea in the period A.D. 44-66 reveals a milieu of political disintegration, revolutionary activism and apocalyptic fervor which was expressed in prophetic inspiration and miraculous signs (see, e.g., Josephus J.W. 2.13.4 §§258-59). It is quite possible that Judea at the time represented the kind of religious milieu from which the pseudapostoloi could have come. It is unnecessary, therefore, to require a gnostic provenance for these newcomers.

3. Paul and the Jerusalem Apostles.

If the newcomers in Corinth, as reflected in 2 Corinthians, were Judaizers, were they emissaries of the Jerusalem apostles, as F. C. Baur suggested? Paul's relationship with the Jerusalem church and its apostles is set out most clearly in Galatians, particularly in chapters 1—2. Contrary to Baur's thesis, it emerges from these chapters that while tension existed between Paul and the Jerusalem apostles, they are distinct from his opponents, both in Jerusalem and Antioch.*

Paul outlines his relationship with the Jerusalem apostles by referring to four critical occasions in his own ministry. He writes autobiographically but so as to establish with the Galatians the delicate nature of relationship with "those who were apostles before" him in Jerusalem (Gal 1:17).

First he refers to his "call" on the way to Damascus (Gal 1:15-17; see Conversion and Call of Paul). It was God,* not the Jerusalem apostles, who "called" Paul and "revealed his Son" to him that he "might preach him among the Gentiles" (Gal 1:16). Not even after his call did Paul "confer with (literally, "seek corroboration from") flesh* and blood," that is, the apostles in Jerusalem. He went away to Arabia and then to Damascus. Paul's knowledge of the risen Christ has been mediated directly to Paul by God.

The second occasion was in Jerusalem (Gal 1:18-21). Only "after three years" from his "call" did Paul go up to Jerusalem "to visit Cephas" with whom he remained fifteen days (Gal 1:18). Paul's word visit (Gk historēsai), whose meaning is much debated, could be interpreted "meet" or perhaps "inquire of," suggesting some indebtedness to Cephas for information about the historical (see Jesus and Paul), as opposed to the heavenly, Christ. Paul underlines his apostolic autonomy by commenting in passing, "I saw none of the other apostles except James the Lord's brother," suggesting no more than a courtesy call. His carefully chosen words are highlighted by his solemn assurance, "In what I am writing to you, before God, I do not lie" (Gal 1:20; but cf. Acts 9:26-30). "Still not known by sight to the churches of Judea" (i.e., in and around Jerusalem) he went to Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:21-22; cf. Acts 9:30).

The third occasion, also in Jerusalem, occurred "after fourteen years" (Gal 2:1-10), that is fourteen years from his great watershed "call" en route to Damascus. Concerned to know of the acceptability to James, Cephas and John "of the gospel which [he] preach[es] among the Gentiles," a gospel which did not require circumcision of Gentiles, Paul brought with him as a test case the uncircumcised Titus. While Paul's apostolic authority* was independent of Jerusalem, it was important that his circumcision-free Gentile converts were accepted, along with believing Jews, as spiritual heirs of Abraham.*

Despite the attempts of "false brethren" (Gk pseudadelphoi, Gal 2:4) to have Titus circumcised, the "pillar apostles"—James,* Cephas and John—made no such demands on Paul's Gentile companion (Gal 2:6). Rather, the three Jerusalem apostles formally recognized that Paul had been "entrusted [i.e., by God] with the gospel* to the uncircumcised" whereupon they joined hands with Paul and Barnabas* in a gospel "fellowship" whereby Paul and Barnabas should "go to the Gentiles" and the Jerusalem triumvirate should "[go] to the circumcised" (Gal 2:7-9).

In other words, the Jerusalem apostles recognized two apostolates, one to Jews led by Peter, the other to Gentiles led by the Antioch delegates Paul and Barnabas. Despite the decision to approve two racially distinct apostolates, there was overarching agreement in the fundamentals of the gospel based on the death and resurrection* of Christ (see 1 Cor 15:3-5, 11).

The fourth occasion was at Antioch in Syria, a church of mixed Jew-Gentile membership (Gal 2:11-14; see Social Setting). Cephas had come (from Jerusalem) to Antioch where he had shared table fellowship with Gentile members (including the Lord's Supper?; see Lord's Supper), something he had presumably been prepared to do following the conversion of Cornelius (Gal 2:14; cf. Acts 10:28). Though a Jew, Peter now "lived like a Gentile" (Gal 2:14), that is, he had eaten with Gentiles which meant eating what they ate (see Food).

But a serious division along racial-religious lines developed within the church in Antioch with the dramatic arrival of "certain men . . . from James" (in Jerusalem, Acts 15:23-24; cf. Acts 15:1), whom Paul calls "the circumcision party." Cephas "drew back and separated himself" [from eating with the Gentile members of the church]. The rest of the Jewish members, including even Barnabas, acted "insincerely" (literally "hypocritically"). Paul "opposed [Cephas] to the face because he stood condemned" for withdrawing into an exclusively Jewish table fellowship. It was hypocritical for Peter to "live like a Gentile" but now by this action "compel the Gentiles to live like Jews" (Gal 2:14).

At stake at Antioch was "the truth of the gospel" (Gal 2:14), which was raised by the demand that the Jewish Christians must eat separately from Gentile believers, which had the effect of demanding that Gentiles adopt Jewish eating practices. Paul used the telling phrase "the truth of the gospel" in the previous incident in Jerusalem when he opposed the necessity of the circumcision of the Gentile Titus (Gal 2:5). In other words "the truth of the gospel" is preserved when circumcision and Jewish food laws are regarded as extraneous to the gospel and nonmandatory for Gentiles.

This long autobiographical passage (Gal 1:15—2:14), covering a decade and a half of Paul's life, is invaluable for identifying the degrees of difference between Paul and various persons within the Jerusalem church. We are able to distinguish between "those who were apostles before him" in Jerusalem—with whom certain tensions may be recognized—and others with whom there is outright opposition. Thus Paul insists that his "call" to be an apostle to the Gentiles was mediated directly by God and after some years formally recognized by the "pillar" apostles of Jerusalem. He expresses deference to Cephas in one situation but fierce opposition in another. In regard to James there is a certain ambivalence. At his first visit to Jerusalem he merely "saw" James. He acknowledges by his order of names the primacy of James at the second meeting in Jerusalem, while implying criticism of James because the trouble in Antioch was caused by "men who came from James."

Nonetheless, Cephas and James are not "opponents." No qualifying remarks are used in regard to the "false brethren secretly brought in who slipped in to spy out our freedom . . . that they might bring us under bondage" (Gal 2:4). They may be associated with or more probably identified with the "men who came from James" to Antioch and who had such a dramatic effect on the eating practices of Cephas, Barnabas and the Jewish believers (Gal 2:12-13).

The same distinction is to be found in the Acts of the Apostles. On one hand there are the "apostles and elders" of the Jerusalem church (Acts 15:2, 6, 22, 23), among whom are named Peter (Acts 15:7) and James (Acts 15:13), while on the other are "believers who belonged to the party of the Pharisees" who said, "It is necessary to circumcise [Gentiles] and to charge them to keep the Law of Moses" (Acts 15:5; cf. Acts 15:1). Whether or not we identify the meeting of the Antioch delegates and the "pillar" apostles (Gal 2) with the so-called Jerusalem Council (Acts 15), it is probable that the "false brethren" of Galatians 2:4 are to be equated with the "believers of the party of the Pharisees" of Acts 15:5.

Acts 15:5, therefore, supplies the precious clue, which is found nowhere else, and which goes a long way toward solving the mystery of the identity of Paul's opponents in Jerusalem. These "false brethren" of Jerusalem, these "men who came from James [from Jerusalem to Antioch] . . . the circumcision party" (Gal 2:4, 12) were "believers who belonged to the party of the Pharisees."

What, then, was the relationship between the "pillar" apostles of the Jerusalem Church—James, Cephas and John—and these men?

4. Opponents in the Galatian Churches.

Scholars are divided over the dating of the Letter to the Galatians.* Some place it in the late forties, following hard on the dispute in Antioch (Gal 2:11-14) on the eve of the Jerusalem Council. Others date the letter at about the same time as 2 Corinthians and Romans, that is, around the mid-fifties. Certainly the "righteousness" vocabulary is very prominent in the letter, suggesting that the same issues were at stake as in 2 Corinthians and Romans. But this does not necessarily demand that Galatians was written in the mid-fifties. Paul may have used the "righteousness" vocabulary whenever the Judaizing question was raised.

Unlike Antioch and Corinth there is no mention of anyone from outside coming to the Galatian churches (2 Cor 11:4; Gal 2:12). The churches were being troubled by a group of Jews led by an unidentified individual (Gal 5:10, 12; 3:1; 1:7, 9) who said that circumcision was a prerequisite for membership in the Israel* of God (Gal 3:6-14; 6:16). These "agitators" and their leader were putting pressure on other Jewish believers to compel the Gentile members to be circumcised (Gal 6:12). They claimed that Paul really owed his authority to the Jerusalem apostles (Gal 1:15—2:9) and that Paul himself "preached circumcision" (Gal 5:11).

Were these agitators and their leader indigenous to the Galatian region or had they in fact come there from somewhere else? The letter of the Jerusalem Council to the "brethren in Antioch, Syria and Cilicia" acknowledges that "some persons from us have troubled you" (Acts 15:23). If such agitators had come from Jerusalem to Cilicia, it would have been no great surprise had they travelled on to southern Galatia. Since the focus of Galatians is on circumcision related to Christian freedom (see, e.g., Gal 5:1-2), a theme which is also prominent in the autobiographical section where "false brethren" in Jerusalem "spy out our freedom . . . that they might bring us into bondage" by having Titus circumcised (Gal 2:3-5), it is reasonable to argue that those who came to the Galatian churches were in fact the "false brethren" of Jerusalem, the "believers who belonged to the party of the Pharisees" (Acts 15:5).

5. Paul's Opponents: A Profile.

A pattern emerges from the study of 2 Corinthians, Romans and Galatians which enables us to define more closely Paul's opponents in Corinth as reflected in 2 Corinthians. The supersession of the "written code" associated with Moses by means of "a new covenant" (see Covenant and New Covenant), "a diakonia of righteousness," along with Paul's rejection of the opponents in Corinth as "servants of righteousness," suggests that the newcomers had come on a Judaizing mission to bring the Gentile Corinthians under obligation to the written Mosaic code. The proliferation of righteousness and related words in Romans and Galatians, concerned as they are to rebut righteousness arising from the works of the Jewish Law, add confirmation to the profile of the opponents in Corinth as Judaizers.

Galatians assists us to see that while significant tensions existed between himself and the Jerusalem apostles, it is important to differentiate these from persons Paul calls "false brethren . . . the circumcision party" whom we have been able to more closely identify as "believers from the party of the Pharisees."

The "false brethren" who are also "false apostles" are one and the same group as the "superlative apostles" (hyperlian apostoloi, 2 Cor 11:5; 12:11). It emerges from 2 Corinthians that their claim to superiority is based, in part, on their boast that they have traveled as far as they have, possibly that they have traveled further than Paul (2 Cor 10:13-18). Paul rejects this claim in the terms of the missionary agreement made in Jerusalem in the late forties by the "pillar" apostles with Paul and Barnabas (Gal 2:7-9). In their coming to Corinth the "superlative apostles" have crossed the line of demarcation and entered Paul's sphere of agreed missionary labor (see Mission): ministry to the Gentiles. They have "overextend[ed] themselves . . . [not kept] to the limits God has apportioned . . . boasted of work already done in another's field."

From 2 Corinthians there emerges a fascinating profile of these men, their mission and their means of legitimating their mission. Driven in all probability by a heightened religious zeal arising from the rapid deterioration of Roman-Jew relationships in Judea under Felix's notorious regime, these "superlative apostles" have apparently armed themselves with an array of paranormal abilities calculated to impress the Gentiles in Corinth so as to supplant Paul as their apostle. Their determination to overturn Paul is perhaps also indicative of their awareness of his success in establishing messianic assemblies among the Greeks. But, so far as they were concerned, such assemblies, though connected to the Messiah Jesus, were schisms from Israel, because they gave no real place for Moses and the Law (Acts 15:1, 5).

In their counter-mission Paul's opponents have, by any measure, shown zeal comparable with his own. They have opposed him in Jerusalem and traveled from there to churches in Antioch, Syria-Cilicia, Galatia and now they have come all the way to the city of Corinth in Achaia. This is a remarkable historical phenomenon. They claimed, he says, to be "servants of Christ" (2 Cor 11:23) yet, from his viewpoint, so misguided as to the ministry of "righteousness" that he calls them "[Satan's] servants" (2 Cor 11:14). Their mission and activities have constituted a major threat to the survival of Paul's churches and have provoked him to write letters which are among his most powerful. It is fair to say that lack of appreciation of their identity and zealous program by modern readers significantly hinders our grasp of Paul's argument in those letters where he is responding to their doctrines.

6. The Judaizers, James and Paul.

It is clear from the above argument that we may not too closely associate the name of Peter with Paul's opponents. The incident at Antioch (Gal 2:11-14) shows that Peter was susceptible to their influence, but not the source of it. But what of James, the brother of the Lord, an "apostle before" Paul, who by the late forties had emerged as the preeminent "pillar" apostle of the Jerusalem church? Was James the source of the opposition which flowed from Jerusalem to the churches of the Gentiles?

James had been a member of the Jerusalem church from its beginning until his death in A.D. 62, a period of about thirty years. At first the leader was Peter, supported by John Zebedee. By the late forties, however, James, not Peter, was the leader (Gal 2:9; Acts 15:13-22). At that time there were both apostles and elders at Jerusalem (Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23). However, when Paul came for the last time to Jerusalem in about A.D. 57, there was no reference to "apostles"; only the Jerusalem elders remained, with James the clear leader.

Over this thirty-year period the Jerusalem church became more conservatively Jewish, doubtless reflecting the rise of Jewish religious nationalism in the face of worsening Roman-Jew relationships in Judea (Josephus J.W. 2.12.1—13.7 §§223-271 passim). First, the Hellenists emigrated in the thirties, and by the late forties they were followed by Peter (and John?) and possibly the other apostles. The final glimpse of the Jerusalem church given by Acts at the time of Paul's final visit is of a thoroughly Jewish enclave.

Despite the good face Acts gives to the meeting, it is clear enough that the Jerusalem elders expressed profound unhappiness with Paul. No speech of gratitude for the collection* from the Gentile churches is mentioned, though Luke knew of the collection's existence (Acts 24:17). Rather, the elders pointedly remark on the size and thorough Jewishness of the believing community in Jerusalem, whose widely held conviction it is that Paul has betrayed the cause of Judaism in the Diaspora. It is their understanding that Paul has taught Jews to abandon Moses and not to circumcise their children (Acts 21:21), and he has not required Gentiles to uphold the decisions of the Jerusalem Council over ritual and moral matters (Acts 21:25).

These accusations are instructive since they clearly reflect the views of the Jerusalem elders. Yet these opinions are continuous with and closely resemble the commitment to Moses of the men from Judea who a decade and a half earlier went from Jerusalem to the Gentiles in Antioch insisting on circumcision as a prerequisite to salvation and who, we have argued, were "believers who . . . belonged to the party of the Pharisees" (Acts 15:1, 5).

It is not suggested they were necessarily the same men. Rather, that there was from at least the forties a strongly held theological viewpoint within the messianic community in Jerusalem, which, influenced by Pharisaism, promoted a nationalistic and therefore a Mosaic version of the faith and which therefore regarded Paul's mission to the Gentiles with profound unease. The rising tide of religious nationalism during the crises in Judea of the forties and fifties, together with the decreased influence of more liberal leaders like Stephen, Philip, John and Peter and the emergence of James as the undisputed leader—the brother of the Lord no less—created an environment in which there arose a mission to counter Paul's influence in the Diaspora. But these persons are never named, either by Paul or in Acts. They remain "certain men" (tines, Acts 15:1, 5; Gal 2:12) who on account of their assault on the doctrines of Christ, Paul will portray as "false brothers," "false apostles" and even "[Satan's] servants."

James must have been a significant figure in Jerusalem by the late fifties since he presided over such a large religious community (Acts 21:18-20). In his account of James's death in A.D. 62, Josephus corroborates this impression. The high priest Ananus II seized the opportunity presented by the unexpected death of the procurator Festus to have James stoned. Clearly James must have been important to pose a threat to the high priest. But his death provoked a protest by those Jerusalemites who were "considered the most fair-minded and who were strict in their observance of the Law" (Josephus Ant. 20.9.1 §201), which can only mean citizens of Pharisaic sympathy.

Thus James appears to have enjoyed significant respect within the wider community of Jerusalem. From his viewpoint, as a leader of a messianic community in Jerusalem, Paul's mission to Gentiles in the Diaspora must have raised acute difficulties for relationships between the messianic Jewish community and the wider Jewish community at a time of rapidly increasing religious nationalism.

From Paul's perspective there may have been a degree of nervousness about the Lord's brother since his opponents appear to have come from James's community. It is true that Paul refuses to allow that his apostleship is derived from James (Gal 1:19; cf. Gal 1:17) and to a degree he deprecates the authority of the Jerusalem apostles (Gal 2:6-9), and indeed he voices an angry complaint about "the men who came from James" creating division in Antioch (Gal 2:12). Nonetheless, Paul acknowledges James's apostleship and indeed his primacy as a Jerusalem apostle (Gal 1:19; 2:9). There is no good reason to believe that the "letters of recommendation" brought by the newcomers to Corinth (2 Cor 2:17—3:1) bore the name of James. Paul is hardly likely to have persevered with the collection for the Jerusalem church if James was the well-spring for the opposition which flowed out from Jerusalem to the Pauline churches. Indeed, one of Paul's motives for the collection* may have been to maintain a gospel fellowship* between his apostolate to the Gentiles and that other apostolate, which was directed to Jews and which was based at Jerusalem where James was the undisputed leader.

A comparable impression of James may be discerned in Luke's account of the council in Jerusalem. James does not demand circumcision of the Gentiles, and he denies that those who have gone from Jerusalem "unsettling" the Gentiles in Antioch, Syria and Cilicia did so on his authority (Acts 15:19, 23-24). At Paul's final and tense visit to Jerusalem, the complaints about the apostle to the Gentiles come from the mouths of the elders, not from James (Acts 21:18-25).

7. Opposition at Colossae: Jewish Gnosticism.

Mindful of the major theories that Paul's opponents were either Judaizers or gnostics, a neat solution would be to identify Paul's opponents, particularly those in Corinth, where so much is said about them, as Jewish gnostics. The existence of such people is made probable by Paul's rebuttal of what is generally regarded as some species of Jewish gnosticism within the Colossian church (see Colossians). Unquestionably, there was a version of Christianity at Colossae which was characterized by circumcision, asceticism, Jewish calendrical observance, mysticism and worship of angels (Col 2:8-23).

These elements are largely missing from Paul's rejection of the teaching of his opponents in Corinth. Paul's presentation of Christ's person and work (see Christology) to the Corinthians—in terms of his fulfillment of the promise and righteousness of the Law (2 Cor 1:19-20; 3:4-9; 5:18-21)—has a very different emphasis from the cosmic Christ of the Colossians letter (Col 1:15-20; 2:9-10, 19; 3:1-3).

There is no hint in Colossians about the origin of this Jewish gnosticism, whether it was indigenous or imported. It is, however, well known that Judaism flourished even in remote regions of Anatolia such as the Lycus Valley. The most probable explanation is that a local version of Jewish gnosticism had found its way into the life of the Christian church at Colossae. In any case Paul had not visited this region. The more typical Judaizers seem to have been attracted to churches directly established by the apostle.

8. Opposition at Philippi: Judaizers.
According to many scholars Paul wrote his letter to the Philippians from Rome in the early sixties. Once again opposition to Paul from Jewish believers is evident. But the nature of the opposition to Paul at Philippi is debated (see Philippians). Paul's imprisonment has encouraged the "brethren" in Rome to "speak the word of God" (Phil 1:14). Some of these, however, do so "from envy and rivalry . . . out of partisanship, not sincerely, but thinking to afflict me in my imprisonment" (Phil 1:15, 17). In all probability these are "those who mutilate the flesh" (Phil 3:2), the circumcisers of Gentile believers, "whose god is the belly" (Phil 3:19), that is they observe Jewish food regulations.

As with other letters—Galatians and Romans—where the imposition of circumcision on Gentiles is being promoted, we notice the apostle's use of "righteousness . . . the righteousness of God which is through faith in Christ" (see Phil 3:6, 9 bis).

From the time of the arrival of believers in the world capital there had been problems within the large Jewish community (see Rome and Roman Christianity). It was forced to withdraw from Rome in A.D. 49 "on account of Chrestus" (Suetonius Claudius 25.4; cf. Acts 18:1), a probable misspelling of Christus. It is likely that the conversion of Jews to Jesus the Christ had created such turmoil within the Jewish community that Claudius expelled all the Jews. The accession of Nero in A.D. 54 meant that Jews could return to the city, doubtless fearful that further disturbances might mean more reprisals from the authorities. Known to be a storm center wherever he went, it is possible that Paul's Jewish-Christian opponents in Rome even resorted to preaching Christ—their version, of course—to precipitate unrest within the Jewish community and so prejudice the impending hearing of Paul's case.

There is no hint that these persons had come from Jerusalem to Rome to harass Paul. Possibly the Judaizing movement, like Paul's own mission, had by then developed its own momentum so that it had no direct connection with the mother city, Jerusalem. This may support the argument that the Judaizing program is not directly associated with James, who would have been dead by the time Paul wrote to the Philippians.

9. Opposition in the Pastoral Letters.
We have limited our discussion to opponents from outside who penetrated the churches established by Paul. In our opinion the false teachers and other opponents referred to in the Pastoral Letters (see Pastoral Letters) were indigenous to the churches. In this we follow E. E. Ellis: "Unlike the earlier letters, the opponents appear to include a considerable number of former co-workers whose apostasy creates an especially bitter situation" (Ellis, 214).

See also APOSTLE; CIRCUMCISION; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; JERUSALEM; JUDAIZERS; LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. A. Agnew, "Paul's Theological Adversary in the Doctrine of Justification by Faith: A Contribution to Jewish Christian Dialogue," JES 25 (1988) 538-54; P. Barnett, "Opposition in Corinth," JSNT 22 (1984) 3-17; C. K. Barrett, "Paul's Opponents in II Corinthians," NTS 17 (1971) 233-54; B. Blackburn, "Miracle Working THEIOI ANDRES in Hellenism (and Hellenistic Judaism)," in Gospel Perspectives 6: The Miracles of Jesus, ed. D. Wenham and C. Blomberg (Sheffield: JSOT, 1986) 185-218; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Relationship between Paul and Jerusalem according to Galatians 1 and 2," NTS 28 (1982) 461-78 [= Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 108-26]; E. E. Ellis, "Paul and his Opponents," in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults, ed. J. Neusner (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975) 264-98; C. Forbes, "Paul's Opponents in Corinth," Buried History 19 (1983) 19-23; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); J. J. Gunther, St. Paul's Opponents and Their Background (NovTSup 35; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); M. Hengel, The "Hellenization" of Judaea in the First Century after Christ (Philadelphia: Trinity, 1989); D. Kee, "Who were the 'Super-Apostles' of 2 Corinthians 10-13?" RQ 23 (1980) 65-76; C. G. Kruse, "The Offender and the Offence in 2 Corinthians 2:5 and 7:12," EvQ 60 (1988) 129-139; idem, "The Relationship between the Opposition to Paul Reflected in 2 Corinthians 1-7 and 10-13," EvQ 61 (1989) 195-202; S. E. McClelland, " 'Super-Apostles, Servants of Christ, Servants of Satan': a Response," JSNT 14 (1982) 82-87; R. P. Martin, "The Opponents of Paul in 2 Corinthians: An Old Issue Revisited," in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 279-89; J. Murphy-O'Connor, "Pneumatikoi and Judaizers in 2 Cor 2:14-4:6," ABR 34 (1986) 42-58; D. W. Oostendorp, Another Jesus: A Gospel of Jewish Christian Superiority in II Corinthians (Kampen: Kok, 1967); E. P. Sanders, "Paul on the Law, His Opponents, and the Jewish People in Philippians 3 and 2 Corinthians 11," in Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity 1, ed. P. Richardson and D. Granskou (Waterloo: Wilfred Laurier University, 1986) 75-90; J. Sumney, Identifying Paul's Opponents (JSNTSup 40; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); idem, "The Role of Historical Reconstructions of Early Christianity in Identifying Paul's Opponents," PRS 16 (1989) 45-53;

M. E. Thrall, "Super-Apostles, Servants of Christ, and Servants of Satan," JSNT 6 (1980) 42-57.

P. W. Barnett

ORDER. See CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; PASTORAL LETTERS.

ORDINATION. See CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY; PASTORAL LETTERS.

P

PAGANISM. See IDOLATRY; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

PARADISE. See HEAVEN, HEAVENLIES, PARADISE.

PARAENESIS. See TEACHING/PARAENESIS.

PAROUSIA. See ESCHATOLOGY.

PARTICULARISM. See ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION; UNIVERSALISM.

PASSOVER. See LORD'S SUPPER; SACRIFICE, OFFERING.

PASTOR, PAUL AS

1. Pastor Paul
2. Paul as Parent
3. Paul's Pastoral Care
4. Pastoral Authority
5. Shared Pastoral Responsibilities

1. Pastor Paul.

1.1. Paul as Pastor. Paul's letters are a clear testimony to his pastoral heart. Indeed his letters* are a product of his pastoral care, for through them Paul exercised a pastoral role in regard to the churches which he or his converts had founded. Paul was no academic theologian, far removed from the realities of church life; rather it was his concern for the churches which proved to be the springboard for his theology. Nor was Paul a single-focus evangelist, intent only on winning people for Jesus Christ; rather it was his concern to remain in relationship with the churches he planted. V. P. Furnish helpfully pointed out that Paul's pastoral ministry* was in fact rooted in the character and meaning of his gospel.* For the obedience to Christ he sought to win from Gentiles* (Rom 15:18) involved their becoming one in Christ* (Gal 3:26-28), members of Christ's body* (Rom 12:4, 5; 1 Cor 12:12-27), bound to one another as members of God's family (cf. Gal 6:10).

1.2. Paul as Teacher. In view of his pastoral heart, it is perhaps somewhat surprising to discover that Paul nowhere uses the term "pastor" of himself. Indeed, in the Corpus Paulinum the term "pastor" occurs only once in Ephesians 4:11, where the office of pastor is described as one of the gifts* of the risen Christ to his church. The fact that one definitive article is used for both "pastor" and "teacher" indicates that the pastoral office is here closely linked with teaching or "feeding" the flock. In Luke's record of Paul's speech at Miletus, the Ephesian elders are charged to "watch over the flock, of which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers, to shepherd the church of God" (Acts 20:28). If the context is a guide, then preaching* and teaching* would appear to be a major element in such pastoral care. Although Paul does not actually use the pastoral imagery of himself, the context suggests that he too had been engaged in the pastoral task.

1.3. Paul as Church Planter. On the other hand, Paul was more than simply a pastor. Paul was a pioneer, with his eye always on fresh fields to conquer: for instance, he hoped that his projected visit to Rome* would be a staging post for a mission* to Spain, providing him as well with an opportunity for securing the support of the Christians at Rome for this mission (Rom 15:28). Primarily a church planter, Paul was content to leave the task of watering to others (1 Cor 3:6); he was far more concerned to break new territory (Rom 15:20). It was perhaps for this reason that at Corinth he left the task of baptizing (for the most part) to others: it was not that he considered baptism* unimportant (see Rom 6:3, 4), but rather because Christ had called him to "proclaim the gospel" (1 Cor 1:17); moreover, the inevitable link between baptizer and the baptized would have made pastoral care by the local church leaders easier in the future.

2. Paul as Parent.

2.1. The Parent-Child Relationship. Paul's preferred imagery for the pastoral task is found in the parent-child relationship. To the Corinthians Paul declared: "For though you might have ten thousand guardians in Christ, you do not have many fathers. Indeed, in Christ Jesus I became your father through the gospel"

(1 Cor 4:15). Paul regarded himself as the founding father of not only the church in Corinth (1 Cor 4:15; 2 Cor 6:13; 12:14), but also of the churches in Philippi (Phil 2:22) and Thessalonica (1 Thess 2:11). Paul could also be a spiritual father to individuals, as well as to churches: during Paul's imprisonment he had become "father" to Onesimus (Philem 10); Timothy is "my beloved son and faithful child in the Lord" (1 Cor 4:17: similarly Phil 2:22; 1 Tim 1:2, 18: 2 Tim 1:2; 2:1); Titus, too, is his "loyal child" (Tit 1:4). Indeed, Paul could even apply the metaphor of a mother to describe his relationship with his churches (1 Cor 3:1-3; Gal 4:19; 1 Thess 2:7). When writing to Rome and to Colossae, however, churches he had not founded, he carefully avoided the parental—and thus the pastoral—tone.

2.2. Parental Love. It is this parental imagery that underlies his expressions of love* and concern for the churches which are in his care. Thus in 2 Corinthians 11:28, 29 it is almost certainly in his role as a "founding father" that Paul experiences the daily pressure of "anxiety for all the churches"; hence he "burned" with indignation born of love as he saw his spiritual children made to stumble. Indeed the logic of 2 Corinthians 11 suggests that for Paul it was pastoral care of this kind—and not the performance of wonders—which was the truest sign of being an apostle (cf. 2 Cor 12:12). Second Corinthians 6:11-13 (cf. 2 Cor 7:13) provides another telling insight into Paul's pastoral heart: there he tells his children in the faith (2 Cor 6:13) that his heart is "wide open" to them and that there is no restriction to his affection for them (2 Cor 6:12). Paul cared deeply for his converts. His letters are full of expressions of love for their recipients: for example, he has "abundant love" for the Corinthians (2 Cor 2:4); the Philippians, who are his "crown and joy,*" he regards with "love" and "longing" (Phil 4:1, see also Phil 1:7); because of his "deep care" for the Thessalonians (1 Thess 2:8), he longs "with great eagerness" to see them face to face (1 Thess 2:17). Paul frequently calls his converts his "beloved" (1 Cor 4:14; 15:58; Phil 2:12; Philem 16; 2 Tim 1:2). Undoubtedly it was precisely because of his love for his churches that he was so indignant when he felt they were threatened (see Gal 1:6-9; 4:16-20; 2 Cor 11:13-14). Similarly, it was his love for his churches which accounted for the intensity of his prayers for them: so he "constantly prays with joy" for all the members of the church at Philippi (Phil 1:4); similarly he prays "night and day . . . most earnestly" for the church in Thessalonica (1 Thess 3:10). Love—as of a parent for a child—was the bedrock of Paul's pastoral care.

2.3. The Parental Metaphor in Jewish and Greek Thought. This metaphor of parenthood was well known both to Jews and Greeks alike. The terms father and son with reference to a master and his disciple appear as early as 2 Kings 2:12 (of Elijah and Elisha respectively). In the Wisdom literature the term "my son" is used for the one who is instructed in the way of wisdom (see e.g., Prov 1:8, 10; 2:1; 3:1; 4:1 etc.; Eccles 12:12; Sir 2:1; 3:1 etc.). The rabbis likewise used the metaphor: it was, for instance, customary for a rabbi to call his pupil "my son" (cf. Mt 23:9-10). Although in this usage there was no thought of begetting, the notion is present in the statement of the Babylonian Talmud: "he who teaches the son of his neighbor the Torah, Scripture ascribes it to him as if he had begotten him" (b. Sanh. 19b). It was said that the Jew who wins another to his faith satisfies in an ideal manner the injunction to be fruitful and multiply, which according to the rabbis was laid on all male Jews as a supreme command.

A. J. Malherbe has drawn attention to a number of similarities between Paul and the hellenistic philosophers of his day (see Philosophy). Paul's description of his pastoral care in 1 Thessalonians 2:1-12, where he speaks of himself as a father and as a mother to his charges, is reminiscent of the ideal philosopher in Dio Chrysostom's Discourses 32.11-12. Similarly Paul's literary style in 1 Thessalonians is typical of the paraenetic devises employed by hellenistic philosophers, who sought to confirm their audiences in what they already knew (cf. 1 Thess 1:5; 2:1, 2, 5, 11; 3:3, 4; 4:2; 5:2) by reminding them of it (1 Thess 2:9; 3:6), complimenting them on what they had already accomplished and encouraging them to continue in their practice (1 Thess 4:1, 10; 5:11). On the other hand, Malherbe recognizes that there are significant differences: whereas these philosophers drew attention only to their words and deeds, Paul draws attention to the gospel, whose divine power is exhibited in his ministry (1 Thess 1:5, 6). Furthermore, Paul differs from these philosophers, in so far as his goal is to form communities of believers rather than only to bring about change in individuals (1 Thess 3:12; 4:9).

2.4. Paul as Mother. The maternal metaphor is rich in imagery. In 1 Thessalonians 2:7, 8 Paul likens his pastoral care for the Thessalonians to that of a nursing mother "tenderly caring for her own children." Unlike certain itinerant Cynic philosophers, gentleness was the hallmark of his ministry. Indeed, so great was his affection for them that he was determined to share his very life with them (cf. 2 Cor 12:15).

In Galatians 4:19, 20 Paul expresses his concern for his children in the faith in terms of childbirth: once already he, like a mother, had suffered at their birth, and now he found himself in labor again. Anguish and tenderness are bound together. The imagery, however, is somewhat confusing: for whereas initially Paul envisages the Galatians as embryos still in the mother's womb and yet to be delivered, Paul then moves on to represent the Galatians as the pregnant mother, with Christ as the developing embryo.

The maternal image is also to be found in 1 Corinthians 3:1-3, where Paul speaks of having to feed his converts with milk and not with "solid food." E. Best reminds us that while fathers today may bottle-feed their babies, in the ancient world babies were breast-fed. However, the emphasis in this passage is less on Paul's maternal care as on the Corinthians' failure to develop and grow in the faith. Interestingly, whereas elsewhere Paul uses the word teknon ("child") in a positive sense to describe his relationship with his converts (1 Cor 4:14-16; 2 Cor 6:13; Gal 4:19; Phil 2:22; 1 Thess 2:7, 11; Philem 10), here Paul uses nēpios—"mere infant"—in a pejorative sense to bring out the Corinthians' failure to develop in the faith.

2.5. Paul as Father. There are a number of aspects to Paul's pastoral role which emerge from his use of this parental imagery. For Paul's role as a "father" is not limited to bringing individuals to faith: rather, as a result of his evangelistic activity, Paul enters into a relationship which involves ongoing pastoral responsibilities. Thus it is precisely because he is their "father-in-God" that Paul can exhort the Corinthians to "be imitators of me" (1 Cor 4:14-16). It is significant that while he can issue an exhortation to churches in general to follow Christ (e.g., Rom 15:1-7; Col 3:13), it is only those churches that he had founded that he can exhort to follow him (1 Cor 4:16; 11:1; Gal 4:12; Phil 3:17; 1 Thess 1:6; 2 Thess 3:7, 9) as he follows Christ (1 Cor 11:1).

In the secular world of Paul's day sons were expected to imitate their fathers: for instance, Demonicus is exhorted to follow the example of his father Hipponicus: "I have produced a sample of the nature of Hipponicus, after whom you should pattern your life as after an example, regarding his conduct as your law, and striving to imitate and emulate your father's virtue" (Isocrates, Dem. 4.11). Similarly Plato regarded education as the visible practice of example (Plato Leg. All. 5.729b,c) and said that sons must be able to see the walk of their fathers as in a mirror (Plutarch Lib. Educ. 20). Not surprisingly in the church it was to be "like father, like son." The call to imitation was not a mark of spiritual arrogance on the part of Paul, but rather an indication of a close pastoral relationship (see Imitation).

Similarly it was in his role as "father" that Paul sought to promote spiritual growth in the churches. Just as a father in the world of his day was responsible for the education of his children, so too Paul saw himself as responsible for the education of his children in Christ. Although, with the exception of the Pastorals (see 1 Tim 2:7; 2 Tim 1:11), Paul never specifically referred to himself as a "teacher," he did see himself as having a teaching role, a role which was contained within the father imagery (see 1 Cor 4:17: also Eph 4:21; Col 1:28; 2:7; 2 Thess 2:15). Thus as he expected fathers to bring up their children "in the discipline and instruction of the Lord" (Eph 6:2), so in similar fashion he sought to bring up his spiritual children. Paul clearly believed that both encouragement (1 Thess 2:11, 12) and correction (1 Cor 4:14-21) were necessary for healthy development within the Christian family.

On the one hand, there were occasions when encouragement was called for: thus Paul "like a father with his children" urged and encouraged and pleaded with the Thessalonians to lead a life worthy of God (1 Thess 2:11, 12). This approach to pastoral care is reflected in 1 Thessalonians in particular (see 1 Thess 4:12; also 5:12, 14), as also in his letters in general.

On the other hand, there were occasions when correction was called for: to the Corinthians Paul wrote, "I am writing this to admonish you as my beloved children" (1 Cor 4:14). Whereas the primary effect of "teaching" is directed to the intellect, "admonishing" (noutheteō) describes an effect on the will and disposition and involves correction. Indeed in 1 Corinthians 4:12 Paul refers to the possibility of his wielding "the rod of correction" (see Ex 21:20; 2 Sam 7:14; Prov 10:13; 22:15; Is 10:24; Lam 3:1). For Paul discipline* was not reserved as a final resort for gross moral error, but rather was perceived to be an essential part of Christian nurture by which individuals and churches were built up in the faith (see Col 1:28). Discipline was a form of pastoral care. Needless to say, such discipline, however, was always born of love (2 Cor 2:24), love which could be likened to that of a father for his child (1 Cor 4:14-21).

A further expression of "fatherly" care is to be found in Paul's refusal to accept financial help from his churches (see Financial Support). Although entitled to an apostolic right (1 Cor 9:1-14), Paul refuses financial support from the Corinthians on the basis that it was not the duty of children to lay up money for their parents, but rather parents for their children (2 Cor 12:14). It is of interest to see how Paul's parental role here takes precedence over his apostolic role. Furthermore Paul, in his parental role, was also concerned to give to his converts an example of honest toil (see 1 Thess 4:11; 2 Thess 3:6-12). Unlike the Cynics who were renowned for greedily making money out of their philosophizing, Paul was at pains to ensure he put no "obstacle in the way of the gospel of Christ" (1 Cor 9:12).

3. Paul's Pastoral Care.

3.1. Paul's Care for Individuals. Paul was concerned not just for the corporate health of the churches in his care, but also for the well-being of individuals. People mattered to Paul: hence in Romans 16 Paul takes the trouble of greeting over twenty-seven people by name. In 1 Thessalonians 2:11 Paul declared: "We dealt with each one of you like a father with his children," implying that he had concerned himself with his converts on an individual basis. Similarly Paul emphasized the personal character of his work in Colossians 1:28: he sought to promote individual maturity by "warning and teaching everyone in all wisdom." All this is in line with Luke's account of Paul's speech to the Ephesian elders, which suggests that his normal practice was to combine preaching to the church at large together with the visiting of individual church members (Acts 20:20). Significantly, Paul commended this kind of pastoral care to the Thessalonians: their mutual care for one another was to take place on an individual basis (1 Thess 5:11).

3.2. Paul's Care for Churches Other Than His Own. So far we have been noting Paul's concern for those churches which stood in a special relationship to him. However, Paul's "eagerness" to remember the poor in Jerusalem (Gal 2:10) throws an interesting light on his concern for the needs of those who were not in one of his churches. Although this "collection for the saints"* is often interpreted as evidence of Paul's concern for the unity of the church (see Gal 2:6-10), Paul himself never explicitly mentions this as a factor when encouraging his Gentile churches to give generously to the Jerusalem church (see, e.g., 2 Cor 8 and 9, though some find it implied in 2 Cor 8:24 and Rom 15:27). Paul is rather concerned because of the poverty of his brothers and sisters in the Jerusalem church, and therefore as a matter of equality urges the Corinthians to give (2 Cor 8:14; see Rich and Poor).

4. Pastoral Authority.

Paul was a forceful person who expected obedience from the churches in his care (e.g., 2 Cor 10:6; Phil 2:12; Philem 2). His letters are full of instructions on how his readers are to live their lives together. Thus he writes to the Corinthians, "Now in the following instructions I do not commend you. . . . About the other things I will give instructions when I come" (1 Cor 11:17, 34: see also 1 Thess 4:2; 2 Thess 3:6-15). He tells the Corinthians that the "authority" which the Lord has given him is for "building up" the church and not for "tearing down" (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10: cf. 12:19)—for it is only arguments (2 Cor 10:3-5), and not people, which he seeks to destroy.

It has often been assumed that Paul based his authority on his calling to be an apostle* (see Conversion and Call). However, at no point do we find Paul issuing instruction on the basis of his apostleship. It is much more likely that his sense of authority* was derived from his position as founding father of his churches. In this respect it should be borne in mind that for Jews and Greeks alike the father relationship was perceived as one of authority. For a Jew to honor one's father (Ex 20:12; Deut 5:16) inevitably involved obedience (see 2 Kings 16:7: "your servant and your son"). Epictetus declared: "To be a son is to regard all one's possessions as the property of the father in all things, never to blame him before anyone, to support him with all one's power" (Epictetus Diss. II.107). In Roman society a father retained control over his children even after they were grown and married.

However, Paul puts limits upon his own authority. He much preferred to "appeal" (e.g., Rom 12:1; 15:30; 16:7; 1 Cor 1:10; 4:16; 16:16; 2 Cor 5:20; 6:1; 10:1; 13:11; Eph 4:1; Phil 4:2; 1 Thess 2:11; 4:1, 10; 5:14; 2 Thess 3:12; Philem 8-9) rather than to "command," which in turn implies that he preferred not to impose his own will upon the churches, but rather to encourage them to make their own decisions. Hence he writes to the Corinthians that he does not seek to "lord it over your faith" (2 Cor 1:24), and reminds the Galatians, "You were called to freedom, brothers and sisters" (Gal 5:13). The churches he founded may have been his spiritual children, but they were to be no longer babes in Christ. In this respect Paul's model is the parent-adult child, and not the parent-infant child. Thus although he is clear about the form of discipline which should be exercised at Corinth toward the man committing incest, he prefers that it is the church itself which exercises that discipline* (1 Cor 5). Paul does not want his children to be overly dependent upon him.

5. Shared Pastoral Responsibilities.

Although Paul regarded himself as having a special pastoral relationship with his churches, this did not cause him to operate as a solo pastor. Rather Paul constantly surrounded himself with colleagues who could share in the pastoral task (see Coworkers). It is reckoned that, if one adds all the names found in Acts and in the Corpus Paulinum, then at various times some one hundred people were associated with the apostle. Unlike the itinerant philosophers, Paul was always accompanied by others (e.g., Barnabas,* Luke, Silas and Timothy) on his missionary journeys. His letters were sent out not only in his name, but in the name of others too (see, e.g., 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Phil 1:1; Col 1:1; 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1). Some of his associates were sent out on difficult pastoral missions: Timothy was sent to Corinth to remind the church of Paul's "ways in Christ Jesus" (1 Cor 4:17); Titus was likewise sent to Corinth, ostensibly with a view to organizing the collection for the Jerusalem poor (2 Cor 8:6), but no doubt also to report back to Paul on the church's overall progress (2 Cor 7:6, 7).

If Acts 14:23 is any guide, then it would appear that Paul appointed leaders to be responsible for the ongoing life of the church after Paul had left (see Church Order and Government). Certainly Paul recognized and encouraged local leadership: for example, he urges the church at Corinth to submit themselves to Stephanas and others who had devoted themselves to the "service of the saints" (1 Cor 16:16); similarly he appeals to the Thessalonians to respect those who "have charge of you in the Lord" (1 Thess 5:12). At Corinth he by and large left the task of baptizing to others (1 Cor 1:14-17). In this respect Best is not fair in suggesting that, though Paul desired his converts to behave in orderly fashion (1 Cor 4:33, 40), he did singularly little to organize them. This is all the more true, if we accept the evidence of the Pastoral Letters.*

Paul also encouraged his converts in general to be involved in pastoral care. Likening the church to a body,* he spoke of the members having "the same care for one another" (1 Cor 12:25), so that "if one member suffers, all suffer together with it; if one member is honored, all rejoice together with it" (1 Cor 12:26; cf. Rom 12:15). Paul urged the Galatians to "bear one another's burdens," which in turn involved caring for those straying from the faith, restoring the backsliders (Gal 6:1, 2). The Thessalonians were to "encourage one another and build up each other" (1 Thess 5:11). Indeed Paul expected the Thessalonians to share in every aspect of pastoral care: "admonish the idlers, encourage the faint-hearted, help the weak" (1 Thess 5:14). Similarly the Colossians were "to teach and admonish one another in all wisdom" (Col 3:16). Pastoral care was not exclusively conferred to a particular cadre in the church: all were involved in "the work of ministry" (see Eph 4:12, 15, 16).

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; APOSTLE; AUTHORITY; BODY OF CHRIST; CHURCH; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS; DISCIPLINE; FINANCIAL SUPPORT; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; MINISTRY; MISSION; PASTORAL LETTERS; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community (Exeter: Paternoster, 1980); E. Best, "Paul's apostolic authority—?," JSNT 27 (1986) 3-25; idem, Paul and His Converts (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1988); W. E. Chadwick, The Pastoral Teaching of St. Paul (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1907); D. Coggan, Paul: Portrait of a Revolutionary (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1984); H. Doohan, Leadership in Paul (Wilmington, DL: Michael Glazier, 1984); E. E. Ellis, "Paul and His Coworkers," NTS 17 (1970-1971) 437-52; idem, Pauline Theology: Ministry and Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); V. P. Furnish, "Theology and Ministry in the Pauline Letters" in A Biblical Basis for Ministry, ed. E. E. Shelp and R. Sunderland (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1981) 101-44; S. M. Gilmour, "Pastoral Care in the New Testament Church," NTS 10 (1964) 393-98; T. R. Glover, Paul of Tarsus (London: SCM, 1926); P. Gutierrez, La Paternité Spirituelle selon Saint Paul (Paris: Gabalda, 1968); D. R. Hall, "Pauline Church Discipline," TynB 20 (1969) 3-26; B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); J. Knox, "The Ministry in the Primitive Church," in The Ministry in Historical Perspective, ed. H. R. Niebuhr and D. D. Williams (New York: Harper & Row, 1956) 1-25; J. T. McNeill, A History of the Cure of Souls (New York: Harper & Row, 1951); A. J. Malherbe, "Gentle as a Nurse: The Gnostic Background to 1 Thess 2," NovT 12 (1970) 203-17; idem, Paul and the Thessalonians: The Philosophic Tradition of Pastoral Care (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); idem, " 'Pastoral Care' in the Thessalonian Church," NTS 36 (1990) 375-91; E. M. Martinson, "Paul as Pastor," BR 9 (1924) 350-70; J. R. W. Stott, The Preacher's Portrait: Some New Testament Word Studies (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961); D. J. Tidball, Skilful Shepherds: An Introduction to Pastoral Theology (Leicester: Inter-Varsity, 1986); W. Wuellner, "Paul as Pastor: The Function of Rhetorical Questions in First Corinthians," in L'Apôtre Paul: Personnalité, Style et Conception du Ministère, ed. A. Vanhoye (Leuven: Leuven University, 1986) 49-77.

P. Beasley-Murray

PASTORAL LETTERS

First Timothy, Second Timothy and Titus, termed the Pastoral Epistles since the eighteenth century, are, with Philemon,* letters of the Pauline corpus addressed to individuals. Like other NT literature written under Paul's name, they employ the letter form to convey not just personal communications but primarily teachings and exhortations, some of them preformed traditions already in use in Pauline congregations (Ellis, Making). In the face of defections and of the depredations of false teachers they emphasize instructions on ministry,* church order* and related themes in order to protect the apostle's congregations in Asia Minor and Greece during the final years of his life.

1. Canonicity and Authorship
2. Occasion and Date
3. Historical Setting
4. Composition: Literary Criticism
5. Outline
6. Themes

1. Canonicity and Authorship.

In the patristic church the reception of the letters into the NT canon was tied to their Pauline authorship for, as Serapion (died c. A.D. 211) bishop of Antioch put it, "we receive both Peter and the other apostles as Christ, but pseudepigrapha in their name we reject" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.12.3). This judgment was virtually unanimous, explicitly witnessed by the Muratorian Canon and Irenaeus (c. A.D. 180; Haer. 1.16.3; 2.14.7; 3.14.1), and probably to be inferred from earlier quotations (cf. Theophilus Autol. 3.14; Polycarp Phil. 4.1) and allusions (cf. Ignatius Eph. 14:1). The Pastorals (along with 2 Thess and Philem) are lacking only in one incomplete manuscript of Paul's letters (P^{46}; c. A.D. 200), and were rejected only by certain heretical teachers: 1—2 Timothy by Tatian and Basilides (cf. Clement Strom. 2.11, end; Jerome Commentary on Titus, Preface) and all three by Marcion (cf. Tertullian Marc. 5.21). However, they encountered serious objections in the literary criticism of the nineteenth century.

1.1. The Baur School. In 1835 F. C. Baur, drawing upon earlier literary questions about the Pastorals, concluded that they reflected a post-Pauline context and identified them, in his Hegelian reconstruction of early Christian history, as second-century forgeries (cf. Ellis, "F. C. Baur and his School," in Making). His views were elaborated by H. J. Holtzmann, who summed up the objections to Pauline authorship: (1) the historical situation, (2) the gnosticizing false teachers condemned, (3) the stage of church organization, (4) the vocabulary and style, and (5) the theological views and themes. Baur was ambivalent about the effect of his criticism on the canonicity of the Pastorals, but most of his followers thought that it should have no effect, asserting against the evidence that in antiquity pseudonymity was an innocent device (see Ellis, "Pseudonymity," in Theology and Criticism). They often attributed the Pastorals to "disciples" of Paul and cited as precedents the schools of Pythagoras and Plato, who wrote letters in the names of those philosophers. However, there is no evidence that a "school" of Paul existed after the apostle's death: The earliest postapostolic writers, such as Clement of Rome, Papias, Ignatius and Polycarp, cite or appeal to various apostles and display no knowledge of any "school" tendency to transmit only teachings of a particular apostle (see Paul and His Interpreters).

1.2. The Nineteenth-Century Debate. J. B. Lightfoot and T. Zahn countered the Baur school with the observations that (1) the changed historical circumstances and (2) the more advanced church organization were well accounted for if some years separated Paul's earlier letters from his writing of the Pastorals, that is, after his release from his first Roman imprisonment, a release well attested in 1 Clement 5 (c. A.D. 95, Lightfoot) and in second century literature (Muratorian canon; Acts of Peter [Vercelli]). Anticipating twentieth-century criticism, Lightfoot argued that (3) gnosticizing false teachers were already present during the ministry of Paul (cf. Ellis 1993, 89-95), and he also attributed (4) changes in vocabulary, style and (5) in theological emphasis to the origin of the Pastorals in the last years of the apostle's ministry.

In the nineteenth century both traditional and speculative scholars assumed that Paul himself penned his letters* or dictated them verbatim. They consequently supposed that if the major letters were taken as a touchstone, the genuineness of the others could be determined by internal criteria of vocabulary, style and theological motifs. They differed only as to whether variations in such matters were sufficient to exclude Pauline authorship (the Baur/Holtzmann tradition) or lay within the literary range of a versatile writer like the apostle (the Lightfoot/Zahn tradition). The debate, which has continued and developed through the present century, was something of a standoff (Prior; Ellis 1979). However, the pseudepigraphal viewpoint was undermined by three new insights of twentieth-century criticism: the role of the secretary; the function of cosenders; and the presence of a considerable number of preformed, non-Pauline pieces in almost all of Paul's letters (see Creeds; Hymns; Liturgical Elements).

1.3. Developments in the Twentieth Century. The problem of the Pastorals continued in the minds of many to lie in their vocabulary and style, in their more developed church order and in the difficulty of "placing" them within the Pauline missions in Acts.

1.3.1. Vocabulary. With respect to vocabulary it was not just the divergence from the terminology of the recognized Pauline literature but also the absence of many word groups common to Paul (e.g., apokalyptō, energeō, kauchaomai, perisseuō, hypakouō, phroneō) and the use of different terminology for the same concepts in eschatology* (epiphaneia vis-à-vis parousia), church organization (presbyteroi vis-à-vis prohistamenoi and poimenes) and soteriology (cf. Dibelius). At the same time many Pauline expressions in these letters were evident to all.

Three attempts were made to resolve this problem. Writers in the Baur/Holtzmann tradition ascribed the Pauline traits to a conscious attempt by the forger to imitate Paul, either to gain apostolic authority for his deception (Donelson) or, reworking certain Pauline traditions, to offer under the apostle's name what he thought Paul might have taught had he been there (Wolter). Some in the Lightfoot/Zahn tradition contended that the role of the secretary and Paul's use of traditions composed by others accounted for the differences in the Pastorals' style, vocabulary and theological idiom (see 4 below). A few scholars early in the twentieth century argued that the Pastorals were genuine Pauline letters supplemented by second-century interpolations, mainly on church order (Harnack), or that they were early second-century products incorporating some genuine Pauline fragments (Harrison). The fragment hypothesis failed to convince very many because it could not explain why and how a forger would have used the fragments in such a strange way (Guthrie; Dibelius). The interpolation hypothesis was a possibility in its day. But with the advances in textual criticism and in the understanding of writing practices of the Greco-Roman world, it lost credibility.

As was the custom in antiquity (cf. Cicero To Friends 7.25.1; Richards, 6-7.), Paul retained a copy of his letters both for subsequent reference (cf. 1 Cor 5:9-10; 2 Cor 7:8; 2 Thess 2:15) and because of the danger of loss or damage in transit (cf. Cicero Friends 16.18. end). It is also likely that he allowed the church where he was writing to make a copy of the letter for its own use and that he permitted or instructed the recipients to make copies for themselves or for neighboring congregations (cf. 2 Cor 1:1, Achaia; Gal 1:2; Col 4:16). In this way the apostle himself initiated, virtually at the outset, different textual traditions with inevitable variations in the wording of his correspondence. Therefore, > it appears to be quite impossible that an interpolator, who anywhere in the stream of tradition arbitrarily inserted three verses, could force under his spell the total textual tradition (which we today have before our eyes in a way quite different from any generation before us) . . . so that not even one contrary witness remained. (Aland, 141)

What is said here of Romans applies also to the Pastorals. Any theory that certain verses were later additions must produce some manuscript that omits the verses, or it will lack all historical probability. The sections that Harnack thought were later interpolations are not absent from any manuscript and were, therefore, in all likelihood a part of the Pastorals from the beginning.

1.3.2. Church Organization. The Baur tradition (and also Harnack) supposed that the qualifications demanded for the ministry of "bishop" or "overseer" = ? "elder" (1 Tim 3; 5; Tit 1) reflected a "developed" church order that was post-Pauline. It rested its case on the twin assumptions that the earliest congregations had no structured ministries and that early Christian (theology and) praxis moved forward gradually and stage-by-stage as a block. These assumptions were deeply embedded in nineteenth-century consciousness from theories of egalitarianism, of historical and social progress and of biological evolution. But they do not accord either with the variegated church order of the apostolic congregations nor with the present-day recognition that "development" may be either gradual or extremely rapid (see Ministry; Church Order and Government).

From the beginning the congregations of all the apostolic missions had some measure of church order. The church at Jerusalem with its leadership of resident apostles, especially Peter* (c. A.D. 33-42; Gal 1:18; Acts 2:14; 3:12; 5:3; 8:14; 9:32; 12:17) and James* (c. A.D. 42-62; Gal 2:9; Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18) and elders (Acts 11:30; 15:2; 21:18; cf. Jas 5:14) had a more structured organization, probably similar to that of the synagogues and of the Qumran* community (e.g., Lk 7:3; CD 13:9-10; 1QS 6:14-15, 19-20: mᶜḇaqqēr, pāqîḏ; cf. Schürer II.427-39; Thiering; Weinfeld). According to 1 Peter (1 Pet 5:1-3; cf. 1:1; c. A.D. 64) and Acts (Acts 14:23; 20:17, cf. 20:28; c. A.D. 65), certain churches in Asia Minor and Greece founded by the Petrine and Pauline missions also had a recognized church order, even if the term elders (presbyteroi) in Acts is a Lukan idiom for ministries given different designations in Paul's earlier letters. These letters disclose established ministries of administrative and teaching leadership, although they identify them more often as activities (Rom 12:8; 1 Cor 12:28; Gal 6:6; 1 Thess 5:12-13) than as appointed offices (cf. Phil 1:1). The Pastorals give more prominence to appointed ministries and to the qualifications for them because, among other things, of the increasing threat to Paul's churches by false teachers (Ellis, Ministry, 92-107; idem, Prophecy, 113-15). They represent an understandable development of his earlier usage.

1.4. Conclusion. The role of the secretary (Richards, Roller) and the use of preformed traditions (see 4.3 below) in the composition of the Pastorals cut the ground from under the pseudepigraphal hypothesis with its mistaken nineteenth-century assumptions about the nature of authorship. They require the critical student to give primary weight to the opening ascriptions in the letters and to the external historical evidence, both of which solidly support Pauline authorship.

2. Occasion and Date.

Proponents of Paul's authorship of the Pastorals usually, though not always (Reicke, Robinson), presuppose the tradition that Paul was released from his first Roman imprisonment (Acts 28), rightly regarded by Harnack (I.240n) as "a certain fact of history," and afterwards had a second Aegean ministry in which 1 Timothy and Titus could be placed. The tradition is supported by two considerations: (1) second-century accounts underlying the Acts of Paul (9-11; c. A.D. 170-190) of the apostle's final trip to Rome and martyrdom under Nero on a route different from that in Acts 27—28 (Rordorf; Zahn, II.84) and (2) very early evidence for a post-Acts 28 Pauline mission to Spain.

2.1. Paul's Mission to Spain. The probability of a missionary journey to Spain arises largely (1) from the anticipation of such a task in Romans 15:24, Acts 1:8 and Acts 13:47, and (2) from the evidence for it in 1 Clement 5.7 (c. A.D. 70, cf. Robinson), the Acts of Peter (Vercelli) 1-3, 40 (probably Asia Minor, c. A.D. 160-180) and the Muratorian Canon (Rome, c. A.D. 170-190). The last two are independent witnesses to a widespread second-century tradition that Paul journeyed from Rome to Spain and, in the Acts of Peter, that he returned to Rome for martyrdom.

Clement of Rome knows of seven imprisonments of Paul, calls Paul and Peter "our good apostles," and, according to Irenaeus (Haer. 3.3.3; c. A.D. 180), Clement sat under their teaching. He speaks of Paul's preaching in the West, which for a writer in Rome would mean Spain or Gaul (cf. 2 Tim 4:10), and of his reaching "the extreme limits of the West" (to terma tēs dyseōs). The latter phrase, like "to the end of the earth" (heōs eschatou tēs gēs, Acts 1:8), referred in the usage of the time to the region of Spain around Gades (= Cadiz), where the apostle probably traveled after he was set free from his first Roman imprisonment (cf. Ellis 1991 "End of the Earth"). These sources are supported by later traditions of Paul's release and of his post-Acts 28 ministry (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.22.1-8: logos echei, 2). Since Paul's Spanish sojourn was apparently unknown to Origen (cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.1.3) and produced no churches in Spain that claimed Pauline origins, it may have been a brief mission (c. A.D. 63-64), undertaken soon after his release (cf. Zahn, II.64-66), from which he returned to his churches in the Aegean area.

2.2. The Situation of 1 Timothy and Titus. The situation of 1 Timothy and Titus differs from that of Paul's earlier Aegean ministry (c. A.D. 53-58; cf. Kelly, 6-10). His mission had now extended to Gaul (2 Tim 4:10; Zahn, II.25-26), and his congregations around the Aegean had multiplied and now encompassed Crete, Miletus and Nicopolis (Tit 1:5; 3:12; 2 Tim 4:20). They were increasingly endangered by a judaizing-gnostic countermission (1 Tim 1:3-7, 19-20; 4:1-2; 6:20; 2 Tim 4:3-4; Tit 1:10-16; cf. Ellis, Prophecy, 92-93; 113-15) that included church leaders and probably former coworkers* (2 Tim 1:15-18; 2:16-17; 3:6-9; 4:10; Tit 3:9-14). Some house churches were ravaged and near collapse, as Paul's instructions to Titus indicate: "Restore the things that remain, and appoint elders in each city. . . . For many deceivers . . . especially the circumcision party . . . are overthrowing whole houses" (Tit 1:5, 10-11). This threat may have occasioned Paul's return from Spain.

To meet the problem, Paul adopted a new strategy for his writing. He continued as before to work from a hub-city, perhaps Corinth (2 Tim 4:20), with several visits to a number of churches, for example, in Macedonia (1 Tim 1:3), Crete (Tit 1:5), Nicopolis (Tit 3:12), Miletus (2 Tim 4:20) and Ephesus (1 Tim 1:3; 3:14; 4:13; 2 Tim 1:15-18; 4:19; but see Zahn, II.17-19). But he could not, as he did earlier (1 Cor 4:17; 2 Cor 7:6, 12-13; Eph 6:21-22; Col 4:7-8; cf. Phil 2:25), send a letter to each of the many congregations, along with a colleague to explain and apply it. Instead, he sent letters to trusted coworkers, Titus in Crete and Timothy in Ephesus, which served both as instruments of personal communication and encouragement and also as vade mecums to give apostolic authorization for their teaching.

For the itinerary* of his second Aegean ministry one is left largely to conjecture, for Paul's letters and other sources offer little help. The apostle probably returned there from Spain only in late A.D. 64 and labored in Crete (Tit 1:5) and Macedonia (1 Tim 1:3) as well as in Achaia for a year or so, spending the winter of 65-66 (or 66-67) at Nicopolis in Epirus (Tit 3:12; Zahn, II.27-35, 66). He composed 1 Timothy and Titus fairly early in this period, probably in 65. In the late spring of 66 or 67 he visited Miletus, where he left Trophimus (2 Tim 4:20), and Troas, where he left his winter coat and a number of books and notebooks (membrana), which probably included copies of his previous letters and traditional materials useful in his teaching and in composing new letters (2 Tim 4:13, 20; cf. Richards, 158-60). From Troas, apparently, he departed for Rome with the intention of returning before winter.

2.3. The Situation and Date of 2 Timothy. Paul took his last missionary journey from the Aegean to Rome, where he was again imprisoned, wrote 2 Timothy and soon thereafter was beheaded on the Ostian Way (2 Tim 4:6-7; Acts of Paul 11; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.25.5-8). He may possibly have been arrested in Ephesus (Spicq, I.141) or Troas (Fee, 244-45) and taken to Rome a prisoner. More likely, in accordance with second-century traditions used in the Acts of Paul (9-10), he returned to Rome a free man (Rordorf, 323; cf. Zahn, II.67) to minister to a church that was suffering "repeated calamities and reverses" (1 Clement 1:1) due to the continuing persecution of Nero. He may have traveled by the Egnatian and Appian Ways (Troas—Philippi—Apollonia—Brundisium—Rome), about a three week journey, or again following second-century traditions, by a route from Troas via Philippi to Corinth and from there to Italy and Rome (cf. 2 Tim 4:20; Rordorf).

According to Eusebius's Chronicle (c. A.D. 303; cf. Jerome, Vir. 1; 5; 12), Paul was martyred together with Peter in the fourteenth year of Nero, 67-68. However, neither 1 Clement 5 nor the Ascension of Isaiah (4:2-5; c. A.D. 90) suggests that both apostles died together, and Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (c. A.D. 170; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.25.8), says only that they were executed at about the same time. Probably Peter suffered death near the beginning of the Neronian pogrom in the winter or spring of 65 and Paul in late 67, or at any rate before the suicide of Nero on June 9, 68 (cf. Zahn, II.61-67; Edmundson, 147-52; otherwise: Harnack, I.240-43). If so, he would have composed 2 Timothy in the late summer or fall of A.D. 67.

3. Historical Setting.

3.1. Congregations. The churches had no special buildings in Paul's day, and they usually met in the homes of affluent members (see Social Setting). Some of these homes could accommodate a (standing) congregation of between 100 and 200 people in the main room (atrium) or in a colonnaded garden (peristylium) further back in the house (cf. Ellis 1989, 139-45, 144). Paul's Aegean congregations had affluent members, as is evident also in the Pastorals from his comments on slaves* and masters, and on proper attitudes for wealthy Christians (1 Tim 6:1-7, 17-19; cf. Rom 16:23; Eph 6:5-9). Such house churches are probably in view in the references to "households"* (1 Tim 3:15; 2 Tim 1:16; 4:19; Tit 1:11; ? 1 Tim 5:13).

Pliny (Ep. 10.96.9-10; c. A.D. 110), governor of Bithynia-Pontus, reported that extensive conversions to Christianity had virtually emptied pagan temples of the province "for a long time" (? c. A.D. 100). In the mid-sixties the Pastorals suggest that conversions around the Aegean had already been extensive. Paul's earlier letters disclose that even in the fifties there were at least two house churches in Colossae (Philem 2; Col 4:15) and two in Ephesus (1 Cor 16:19; cf. 2 Tim 1:16; 4:19), and probably four at Corinth (Rom 16:23; 1 Cor 1:11; 16:15-16; Acts 18:7-8). There were four or five at Rome (Rom 16:5, 10-11, 14-15; cf. Phil 4:22). When one house church is specified, at least one other is implied. While many numbered their members in the dozens, some probably had congregations of 100 to 150, including the household servants. The size and impact of the church at Ephesus is reflected by the uproar of the silversmiths (Acts 19:23-40), who would hardly have reacted so strongly to a minor threat to their sales.

In the mid-sixties the church at Rome suffered the martyrdom of "a great multitude" (1 Clement 6.1; cf. Tacitus Ann. 15.44) and Paul's Aegean churches had suffered defections, as the Pastorals attest. However, in the decade of 57-67 the Pauline congregations of Greece and Asia had greatly increased both in numbers and in area, and their total membership is probably to be counted in the thousands.

3.2. Coworkers. The coworkers* of Paul include a number who are mentioned in Acts (Trophimus) and in his earlier letters: Apollos, Demas, Erastus, Luke, Mark, Priscilla and Aquila, Timothy, Titus, Tychicus. Others appear only in Titus (Artemas, Zenas) or in 2 Timothy (Claudia, Crescens, Eubulus, Linus, Onesiphorus, Pudens, ? Carpus), where they are workers in the church at Rome or participants in Paul's continuing mission outreach.

3.3. Opponents. The opponents* represent the same type of opposition throughout the Pastorals (Kelly, 10-11; Dibelius, 65-67), that is, indeed, only a more developed form of the false teaching that plagued Paul's and other apostolic missions virtually from the beginning. They originated as a "judaizing" segment of the ritually strict Hebraioi, that is, "the circumcision* party" of the Jerusalem church (cf. Acts 11:2 with Tit 1:10; see Judaizers), which combined a demand for Gentile adherence to the Mosaic regulations and an ascetic ritualism with a zeal for visions of angels* and, at least in the Diaspora,* with gnosticizing tendencies to promote an experience of (a distorted) divine wisdom* and knowledge,* and to depreciate matter and physical resurrection* and redemption* (cf. 1 Cor 15:12 with 2 Tim 2:18; see Gnosis, Gnosticism). At times their vaunted asceticism produced an arrogance primed for a subtle sexual licentiousness (cf. Gal 4:9; 5:13-21; Col 2:18, 23 with 1 Tim 4:3; 2 Tim 3:6-7; Tit 1:10, 15). While Paul argued that in the messianic age the OT ethical laws remained valid but its ritual laws were passé (Col. 2:17; cf. Gal 4:9-10) and were no longer binding (Rom 10:4; 13:8-10; Gal 3:24-25), his opponents argued that the ritual laws remained binding and yet they vitiated the ethical commands by their conduct (cf. Ellis 1993, 36-38, 51-52, 61, 80-115, 116-28, 230-36; see Law).

In the Pastorals the gnosticizing judaizers were known as "the circumcision party" (Tit 1:10) and continued their claim to be "teachers of the Law" (1 Tim 1:7), although they apparently no longer stressed, as in Galatians, the duty of circumcision. They forbade marriage, promoted food laws and claimed to impart a spiritual "knowledge" (gnōsis) whose source was, in the words of an oracle applied to them, demonic* spirits (1 Tim 4:1-3; 6:20). They represented one stage of a continuing counter-mission, which appears in Ignatius (Magn. 8-11; Trall. 9; c. A.D. 110) as a kind of "Judaism crossed with Gnosticism" (Lightfoot) that denied not only Christ's resurrection but also his physical incarnation and death, and which later in the second century developed or merged into the full-blown Gnostic heresies. While some of the opponents originated in the mission of "the circumcision party," others were teachers in Pauline congregations and defectors from a Pauline theology, including former associates or coworkers (1 Tim 1:3-5; 2 Tim 1:15-16; Tit 1:10-11).

4. Composition: Literary Criticism.

Literary questions about the Pastorals have addressed their letter form, the role of the secretary and, perhaps most significant, their use of preformed traditions (cf. Ellis, Making; Ellis 1989, 104-7).

4.1. Letter Form. Early in this century Paul's "letters," understood as non-literary products intended solely for the addressees, were distinguished from more formal literary "epistles" intended for a larger circle (G. A. Deissmann). More recently they have been the subject of attempts to identify the "letter" as a literary genre (see Letters). Deissmann's distinctions were at best oversimplified and probably mistaken, and the later attempts at classification were misleading (cf. Ellis, Making; but see Malherbe, ANRW II.26.1, 192-93, 325-26). In fact, in antiquity letters could take virtually any form, as P. L. Schmidt pointed out (KP, II.325), and according to Cicero (Friends 2.4) they were simply "of many kinds," although he classified his own as newsletters and as the "familiar and sportive, and the grave and serious."

The apostle's letters were intended to be used by more people than the immediate addressees (see 1.3.1 above) and were specifically to be "read in church" (Col 4:16; 1 Thess 5:27; cf. 1 Cor 7:1, 25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1, 12). In the light of his Jewish background in which not even Targums but only canonical Scripture could be read "in church" (b. Meg. 32a; cf. Alexander, CRINT 2.1. 238-39), they were written and received as "the Word of God," that is, as inspired and normative authority for the churches (cf. 1 Thess 2:13 with 2 Thess 2:15). They were teachings of an apostolic prophet that, unlike other prophetic teaching and writing in the congregations, were not subject to "testing" or vetting by other prophets (1 Cor 9:3, anakrinō; 1 Cor 14:29, diakrinō, with 1 Cor 14:37-38). That is, they were teaching pieces clothed in the form of letters: Philemon addresses a specific personal question; others, like 1 Corinthians, give attention to immediate congregational problems or, like Romans and Ephesians, to more general theological motifs; 1 Timothy and Titus (and to some extent 2 Tim) are virtual manuals of tradition that have genre affinities with Qumran's Manual of Discipline. The apostle utilizes the letter form for a number of reasons, not least that by it he can combine personal communication and relationships with his primary purpose of teaching and upbuilding believers in the truth of the gospel of Christ.

4.2. Secretary. A secretary was a practical necessity in antiquity for all but the briefest letters, since the poor quality of pen, ink and paper made writing slow and laborious (cf. Quintilian Inst. Orat. 10.3.31; 10.3.19-22) and could require more than an hour to write a small page (Roller, 13-14, 6-9). The secretary ordinarily would record first on a wax or wood tablet in shorthand, which was used in first-century Greek and Latin writing (Richards, 24-43), and then would transcribe in longhand onto papyrus. Such a helper is explicitly mentioned in Romans 16:22 and is implied where Paul, in accordance with the custom, adds a marginal note (e.g., Philem 19a; 1 Cor 14:34-35; Ellis 1989, 67-68) or an ending (e.g., 1 Cor 16:21-24; Gal 6:11-18; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17; cf. 1 Tim 6:20-21; 2 Tim 4:19-22; Tit 3:15) to a completed secretarial composition. For the Pastorals a secretary may be inferred from numerous verbal and stylistic peculiarities, and he has been plausibly suggested to be Luke (2 Tim 4:11; cf. Strobel, 210; Moule, 434; C. Spicq, I.199; Knight, 51: perhaps; but see Metzger, 10-16). The secretary's work could range from taking dictation to being a coauthor, and in the Pastorals he appears to have had a greater input than in certain other

Pauline letters (cf. Richards, 23-24, 193-94). However, more significant for the literary form of the Pastorals are the numerous preformed traditions, largely non-Pauline, that are employed in them.

4.3. Traditions. Traditions* in the Pastorals have long been recognized in a few passages, such as the confession at 1 Timothy 3:16 and the five "faithful word" (pistos ho logos) sayings (see 4.4.1 below). In other passages they can also be identified by the use of acceptable criteria. Some preformed pericopes were composed by Paul and some by others whom he recognized to be prophetically gifted to mediate divine revelation.

Criteria to identify a cited or traditioned piece (see Creed; Liturgical Elements) include: (1) a formula that elsewhere introduces or concludes quoted material (e.g., 1 Tim 4:1; cf. Acts 20:23; 28:25; Heb 3:7); (2) the self-contained character of the passage; (3) a relatively large number of hapax legomena and an idiom and style that differ from the rest of the letter and from other writings by the same author; and (4) a strikingly similar passage in another writing where no literary dependence is probable. One criterion alone may not be significant since a different vocabulary or idiom may point only to a change of subject matter, to a different secretary or to a different time of writing. Also, a quotation might not be transmitted tradition (e.g., Tit 1:12), and transmitted traditions might be paraphrased and incorporated without a formula of quotation. Nevertheless, several criteria in a given passage provide guidelines for measuring probabilities.

4.4. The Classification of Traditions. Preformed pieces embrace a variety of topics and literary forms (cf. Ellis, Making). Among them are doxologies (1 Tim 1:17; 6:15-16; see Benediction), a vice list (1 Tim 1:9-10; see Virtues and Vices), congregational regulations for the conduct of wives (1 Tim 2:9—3:1a) and qualifications for ministries (1 Tim 3:1b-13), predictive prophecies (1 Tim 4:1-5; 2 Tim 3:1-5), confessions that are sometimes hymnic (1 Tim 2:5-6; 3:16; 2 Tim 1:9-10; Tit 3:3-7; cf. 1 Tim 1:15) and other hymns* (1 Tim 6:11-12, 15-16; 2 Tim 2:11-13; Tit 2:11-14). Some of these are in the form of implicit and explicit midrash, that is, commentary on OT texts (1 Tim 1:9-10; 2:9—3:1a; 5:17-18; 2 Tim 2:19-21; cf. Ellis 1993, 188-97, 147-237: "prophecy as exegesis"). One passage combines midrash and a hymnic form (Tit 3:3-7), both of which are characteristic of early Christian prophecy* (cf. Aune, 453-55; "the prophetic hymn").

Some traditions may also be identified and classified in terms of three formulas that introduce or conclude them: "faithful is the word" (pistos ho logos), "knowing this that" (touto ginōskein/idein hoti) and "these things" (tauta). Such passages are relatively independent of their contexts and are distinguished by other criteria listed above.

4.4.1. "Faithful is the Word." This formula introduces (1 Tim 1:15; 4:9-10; 2 Tim 2:11-13) or concludes (1 Tim 2:9—3:1a; Tit 3:3-8a) five passages which, with the exception of 1 Timothy 2:9—3:1a, are confessional statements of Pauline soteriological themes, whose vocabulary is generally Pauline. The formula is absent from Paul's earlier letters (but see 1 Cor 10:13) and apparently had its origin among Jewish apocalyptic prophets or at Qumran (cf. 1Q27 1:8). However, it was employed in the Johannine mission (Rev 22:6) and came to be used by Paul and his coworkers during his Caesarean or first Roman imprisonment. On the analogy of Ben Sira's use of "faithful" (Sir 46:15; 48:22) to designate the prophecies of Samuel and Isaiah, the formula governs a word that is no mere saying but that is a prophetic word of God to the hearers. Therefore, the teaching elder (= bishop) is required to "hold to the faithful word" (Tit 1:9), and Timothy in his ministry is said to be nourished on such "faithful words" and is urged to mediate them to his congregations (2 Tim 2:11-13, 14). Given their Pauline themes and vocabulary, most "faithful Word" sayings were probably Paul's compositions, but 1 Timothy 2:9—3:1a (and perhaps Tit 3:3-8), composed by others, is a variant of a tradition used in common with the Petrine mission (cf. 1 Pet 3:1- 5, 18-22; 1 Cor 14:34-35).

4.4.2. "Knowing this that." This and similar phrases do not always have a formulaic significance (e.g., 1 Thess 1:4-5), but they are sometimes used elsewhere as formulas to introduce a paraphrastic biblical quotation (Acts 2:3, cf. Ps 132:11; cf. Polycarp Phil 4:1) and other cited traditions (Rom 6:6; Eph 5:5; cf. 1 Cor 6:9-10). In the Pastorals they are used as formulas to introduce a vice list paraphrasing the Fifth to the Ninth Commandments (1 Tim 1:9-10) and a transmitted prophecy (2 Tim 3:1-5).

4.4.3. "These things." This formula is found at the conclusion of cited material and introduces its application to the current situation. It appears at the end of pericopes identified above as traditioned pieces (1 Tim 4:6, 11; 2 Tim 2:14; cf. Tit 1:15-16; 2:1). It also occurs at the end of a regulation on ministry* (1 Tim 3:1b-13, 14; cf. Tit 1:7-9) that is distinct from its context (Harnack, I.482-83; Kelly, 231) and of congregational and household* rules (1 Tim 5:5-6, 9-10, 17-20; 6:1, 2; Tit 2:2-14, 15), which are probably also preformed traditions incorporated into the letters.

4.4.4. Conclusion. A number of other passages are probably reworked traditional material: hymnic confessions (1 Tim 2:5-6; 2 Tim 1:9-10), a doxology (1 Tim

1:17), a commission + doxology (1 Tim 6:11-16) and other sayings (1 Tim 6:7-8, 10a; 2 Tim 1:7). Together such preformed materials make up about forty-three percent of 1 Timothy, sixteen percent of 2 Timothy and forty-six percent of Titus (Ellis, Making).

5. Outline.

5.1. 1 Timothy.

I. 1:1-20 Introduction
- 1:1-2 Greeting
- 1:3-20 A Charge to Oppose the Gnosticizing Judaizers
  - 1:3-7 Their Errors
  - 1:8-11 The Right Use of the Law
  - 1:12-17 Paul's Example
  - 1:18-20 Timothy Contrasted with the False Teachers

II. 2:1—4:10 Congregational Regulations
- 2:1-8 Prayers and Their Purpose
- 2:9—3:1a "A Faithful Word" for Husbands and Wives
- 3:1b-13 Qualifications for Overseers and Ministers
- 3:14-16 Their Purpose and Christological Basis
- 4:1-10 A Prophetic Warning and Its Application

III. 4:11—6:2 Instructions for Timothy
- 4:11—5:2 His Example to Others
- 5:3—6:2 His Congregational Supervision: Widows, Elders, Slaves and Others
  - 5:23 A Personal Aside: Purity Does Not Require Asceticism

IV. 6:3-19 Final Admonitions
- 6:3-10 Concerning False Teachers and Their Money Motives
- 6:11-16 Concerning the Motives and Conduct of "The Man of God"
- 6:17-19 Concerning Affluent Believers

V. 6:20-21 Admonition and Benediction in Paul's Hand

5.2. Titus.

I. 1:1-4 Greeting

II. 1:5-16 Instructions for Titus
- 1:5-9 Qualifications for Overseers
- 1:10—2:1 Concerning False Teachers

III. 2:2-15 Congregational Supervision and Its Basis

IV. 3:1-11 Responsibilities of Believers
- 3:1-2 Concerning Civic Life
- 3:3-8 Its Basis in a Faithful Word
- 3:9-11 Concerning the False Teachers

V. 3:12-15 A Concluding Word
- 3:12-13 Concerning the Coworkers
- 3:14 A Repeated Admonition
- 3:15 Greetings and Benediction in Paul's Hand

5.3. 2 Timothy.

I. 1:1-5 Greeting and Thanksgiving

II. 1:6—2:13 Appeal to Timothy
- 1:6—2:7 For Faithful Witness in the Face of Opposition
- 2:8-13 In the Light of Paul's Example

III. 2:14—4:5 Warnings Against False Teachers
- 2:14-26 Avoid Their Vain Ways
- 3:1-9 A Prophecy Concerning False Teachers and Its Application
- 3:10-17 The Reason and Way to Counter False Teachers
- 4:1-5 An Exhortation to Faithful Ministry

IV. 4:6-21 Paul's Situation and Prospects
- 4:6-8 His Approaching Death
- 4:9-16 His Need For Timothy to Come
- 4:17-18 His Confidence in God's Presence and Final Redemption

V. 4:19-22 Greetings and Benediction in Paul's Hand

6. Themes.

The teachings of the letters are largely contained in the (reworked and) transmitted traditions and their application. They concern (1) the errors of the false teachers and the proper response to them (1 Tim 1:3-20; 4:1-10; 6:3-10; Tit 1:10—2:1; 3:9-11; 2 Tim 2:14—4:5) and (2) the strict qualifications for ministries in the light of the opponents' activities (1 Tim 3:1b-13; Tit 1:5-9). Not unrelated to this situation are (3) other regulations on church order (1 Tim 2:1—3:1a; 5:3-25; Tit 2:1-14) and on the conduct of believers (1 Tim 6:1-2; Tit 3:1-8). As is the case in the other Pauline letters, all the teachings are given (4) a christological* basis in salvation history (1 Tim 3:16; Tit 2:11-14), including Christ's identity with God* (Tit 2:13), pre-existence* (1 Tim 1:15, erchomai), human Davidic descent (2 Tim 2:8), faithful ministry (1 Tim 6:13), saving work (1 Tim 2:5-6a; 2 Tim 1:9-10), resurrection (2 Tim 2:8) and future coming and reign (1 Tim 6:14; 2 Tim 2:11-12; 4:8, 18).

See also CANON; CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; EARLY CATHOLICISM; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); G. D. Fee, The Pastoral Epistles (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988); D. Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles (TNTC; 2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); H. J. Holtzmann, Die Pastoralbriefe (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1880); J. N. D. Kelly, The Pastoral Epis- tles (London: Black, 1963); G. W. Knight III, The Pastoral Epistles (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); T. D. Lea and H. P. Griffen, Jr., 1, 2 Timothy, Titus (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); W. Lock The Pastoral Epistles (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1958 [1924]); A. Schlatter, Die Kirche der Griechen im Urteil des Paulus (Stuttgart: Calwer, 1958 [1936]); C. Spicq, Les Épîtres Pastorales (2 vols.; Paris: Gabalda, 1969). Studies: K. Aland, "Neutestamentliche Textkritik und Exegese," Wissenschaft und Kirche. FS E. Lohse, ed. K. Aland (Bielefeld: Luther, 1989) 132-48; D. E. Aune, "The Odes of Solomon and Early Christian Prophecy," NTS 28 (1982) 435-60; F. C. Baur, Die sogenannten Pastoralbriefe (Tübingen: Gotta, 1835); L. R. Donelson, Pseudepigraphy and Ethical Argument in the Pastoral Epistles (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1986); G. Edmundson, The Church in Rome in the First Century (London: Longmans, 1913); E. E. Ellis, " 'The End of the Earth' (Acts 1:8)," BBR 1 (1991) 123-32; idem, The Making of the New Testament Documents (forthcoming); idem, Theology and Criticism (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1994); idem, "The Pastorals and Paul," ExpT 104 (1992-93) 45-47; idem, The Old Testament in Early Christianity (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); idem, Pauline Theology: Ministry and Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); idem, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (4th ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993); idem, Paul and His Recent Interpreters (5th ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979) 49-57; D. Guthrie, Introduction to the New Testament (rev. ed.; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1990) 636-46; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristliche Literatur, Teil II: Chronologie (2 vols.; Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1958 [1904]) 1.480-85; P. N. Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles (London: Oxford University Press, 1921); J. B. Lightfoot, "The Date of the Pastoral Epistles" and "The Close of the Acts," in Biblical Essays (London: Macmillan, 1893) 399-437; W. Metzger, Die letzte Reise des Apostels Paulus (Stuttgart: Calver, 1976); C. F. D. Moule, "The Problem of the Pastorals: A Reappraisal," BJRL 47 (1964-65) 430-52; M. Prior, Paul the Letter-Writer (JSNTSup 23; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); B. Reicke, "Chronologie der Pastoralbriefe," TLZ 101 (1976) 82-94; E. R. Richards, The Secretary in the Letters of Paul (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (London: SCM, 1976); O. Roller, Das Formular der paulinischen Briefe (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1933); W. Rordorf, "Nochmals: Paulusakten und Pastoralbriefe," in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament. FS E. E. Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987) 319-27; A. Strobel, "Schreiben des Lukas? Zum sprachlichen Problem der Pastoralbriefe," NTS 15 (1968-69) 191-210; B. E. Thiering, "Mebaqqer and Episkopos in the Light of the Temple Scroll," JBL 100 (1981) 59-74; M. Weinfeld, The Organizational Pattern and the Penal Code of the Qumran Sect (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1986); M. Wolter, Die Pastoralbriefe als Paulustradition (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1988); T. Zahn, Introduction to the New Testament (3 vols.; Minneapolis: Klock, 1977 [3d ed. 1909, 1st ed. 1899]) II.1-133.

E. E. Ellis

PAUL AND HIS COWORKERS.

See COWORKERS, PAUL AND HIS.

PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS

The story of Paul's interpretation stretches from his contemporaries to the present and includes such notable figures as Augustine, Luther, Calvin and Wesley. This article focuses on modern research on the life and letters of Paul, which has burgeoned exponentially since the days of F. C. Baur and the "Tübingen School" that grew up around him. Nevertheless, despite the increased volume of studies, the basic perspectives of the Tübingen School provided both the framework and presuppositions for the modern study of Paul's writings until the mid-1970s. Hence, as a result of the agenda set by Baur's work, Pauline research in the twentieth century has predominantly focused on the interrelated questions of the center* of Paul's thinking, Paul's view of the Law* and the nature of Paul's opponents.* Moreover, the central questions raised by Baur concerning Paul's theology and his place in the history of the early church still remain to be resolved.

1. F. C. Baur and the Tübingen School
2. The Identity and Theology of Paul's Opponents
3. Paul's View of the Law
4. The Center of Paul's Theology
5. Prospects for the Future

1. F. C. Baur and the Tübingen School.

F. C. Baur was professor of NT at the University of Tübingen from 1826 until his death in 1860. At the heart of Baur's work was his conviction that the traditional Christian view of a transcendent, personal God could no longer be accepted. The concept of revelation as the disclosure of God's will, and miracles as the act of a personal God in history, must therefore also be rejected. In mid-career Baur became convinced that this traditional Christian view must be replaced by the new speculative philosophy of Hegel, which to Baur's mind offered the most coherent and comprehensive explanation of history and the nature of reality. But in the final fifteen years of his life Baur came to reject Hegel's abstract view of God as an infinite Spirit or eternal Idea, which in the evolving process of history was emerging from its own previous finite manifestation. Baur then returned to a simpler rationalism that emphasized universal ethical principles as the meaning of life and the value of Christianity. Nevertheless, it was the Hegelian orientation of Baur's earlier and formative understanding of Paul and early Christianity that became determinative for subsequent scholarship.

1.1. Baur's Paradigm. In 1831 Baur published his seminal essay, "Die Christuspartei in der korinthischen Gemeinde, der Gegensatz des petrinischen und paulinischen Christenthums in der ältesten Kirche, der Apostel Petrus in Rom" ("The Christ-party in the Corinthian Church, the Conflict Between Petrine and Pauline Christianity in the Early Church, the Apostle Peter in Rome"; TZT 4 [1831] 61-206). In it he laid out the foundation for his understanding of Paul and the history of the early church by applying the dialectical, evolutionary approach of Hegel's philosophy to 1 Corinthians 1:11-12. Based on this text Baur posited a fundamental opposition between Gentile Christianity, represented by Paul and the party of Apollos,* with its universal, Law-free, Hellenistically determined gospel, and Jewish Christianity, represented by Cephas and the "Christ-party," with its particular, Law-orientated, Jewish-bound interpretation of the significance of Jesus. According to Baur the "Christ-Party" was a Jewish-Christian faction which followed Peter and emphasized its own direct relationship to the historical Jesus through the original apostles whom Christ had appointed.

First Corinthians 1:11-12 thus provided a basic framework for understanding the conflict within early Christianity and the inner dynamic of Paul's writings. Paul's Law/gospel contrast was seen to reflect the opposition within early Christianity between Paul and Gentile Christianity on the one side, and the Jewish Christianity supported by Peter, James and the rest of the Jerusalem* apostles on the other. It was against the continual attacks of his Jewish-Christian opponents, therefore, that Paul developed his doctrine of justification by faith as the center of his theology. Moreover, according to Baur this original and bitter conflict between Peter and Paul not only dominated the rest of the writings of the NT, it also drove the historical development of the early Church until the end of the second century, when it was eventually resolved by the emerging unity of the hierarchial catholic church.

The height of the Tübingen school was reached in 1845 with the publication of Baur's Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi. Sein Leben und Wirken, seine Briefe und seine Lehre (published in English in 1875 in two volumes as Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ, His Life and Work, His Epistles and His Doctrine). As the capstone of his work on Paul, Baur now argued that the authentic Paul could only be found where the conflict between Jewish (Petrine) and Gentile (Pauline) Christianity was evident, and where Paul's doctrine of a law-free justification by faith was explicitly presented in response. Those writings attributed to Paul that evidence an attempt to mediate this conflict by finding a middle ground were regarded as a second stage in the development of the early church. Furthermore, any documents which reflected an authoritarian and ecclesiological attempt to resolve this conflict were considered part of the eventual catholic resolution of the Jewish-Gentile Christian conflict around A.D. 200, which came about only in response to the common threat of Gnosticism.*

Armed with this paradigm, Baur concluded that only Romans,* Galatians* and the Corinthian* letters could be considered authentic. On the other extreme, the Pastorals* were clearly inauthentic, late-second-century documents written against Gnostics and Marcionites. The Prison letters and Philemon,* although sometimes disputed in terms of authorship and theology, were also in reality aimed at Gnostic opponents and written between A.D. 120 and 140 as late examples of the Pauline school. 1 and 2 Thessalonians were written in the generation after Paul (A.D. 70-75), but were of no particular significance, since they were of inferior quality theologically. They had no trace of the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, nor of the conflict between Peter and Paul, while their eschatology conflicted with 1 Corinthians 15. Following his lead, Baur's students and followers then applied this basic scheme to the rest of the NT writings by interpreting and categorizing them according to their theological "tendency" (Tendenz) as either Pauline (e.g., Hebrews, 1 Peter), Petrine-Judaizing (e.g., James, Matthew, Revelation), mediating and conciliatory (e.g., Luke-Acts; Mark) or catholicizing (2 Peter, Jude, John; see Early Catholicism).

1.2. Baur's Impact. As time went on scholars completely rejected the Tübingen School's evaluation of the late date and character of the majority of the Pauline letters. Its analysis of the rest of the NT and the second century as a continuation of the conflict between a Pauline and Jewish Christianity has also proved unconvincing, since it was based on the groundless identification of Simon the Magician in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies with Paul(!). Most NT scholars have also rejected Baur's historical skepticism and philosophical rationalism, which as a matter of principle excluded the supernatural from history. Nor has the Tübingen School's complete skepticism concerning the historical Jesus gained wide acceptance, beginning as it did with D. F. Strauss's Life of Jesus in 1835 and the decisive break it posited between the life and teachings of Jesus and the Jerusalem apostles on the one hand, and Paul on the other.

But in spite of the weakness of his historical and theological judgments, Baur's consistent attempt to provide a comprehensive and coherent understanding of the history of the early church on the basis of historical reasoning alone, without recourse to supernatural interventions or to explanations based on the miraculous, did propel biblical scholarship into the modern world. Moreover, Baur's work also set the stage for the debate in the twentieth century over the relationship between the life and teaching of the historical Jesus and the theology of Paul (see Jesus and Paul). Most importantly, however, Baur's treatment of Paul raised the three interrelated interpretive questions with which all subsequent students of Paul have had to wrestle in attempting to work out a comprehensive picture of Paul's life and theology: (1) the identity and perspective of Paul's opposition as a key to his own life and thought; (2) Paul's view of the Law and its relationship to his own understanding of the Gospel; and (3) the search for the generating center of Paul's theology (if indeed it is possible to talk about one such generative principle within Paul's varied writings).

It is these three questions, above all, which have determined the interpretation of Paul and his place within the history of the early church for the last 150 years. How one answers any one of them will greatly influence, and be greatly influenced by, one's understanding of the others. But for the sake of clarity, the three issues will be treated separately, since the interpreters of Paul since Baur have usually entered the debate by one of these three avenues.

2. The Identity and Theology of Paul's Opponents. No aspect of Pauline studies has received more attention in the twentieth century than the question concerning the identity and arguments of Paul's opponents (see Opponents of Paul). And nowhere has the disagreement been more far reaching. Since the work of Baur there have been at least eight major theories proposed for Galatians, and in the more difficult cases such as 2 Corinthians and Philippians, no less than thirteen and eighteen different proposals have been made respectively (see Gunther, 1-5). Despite the multitude of proposals, however, the current debate concerning the identity of Paul's opponents in his various letters still centers on the validity of Baur's understanding of the conflict between Jewish and Gentile Christianity during Paul's day and on its extent within the Pauline corpus, since Baur was the first modern scholar to make Paul's opponents the key to interpreting the whole of Paul's writings.

2.1. The Polarization of Views in the Nineteenth Century. Of course, Baur's view was not new, nor was it uncontested. Ever since the Reformation most Protestant exegetes have held that Paul's opponents were "Judaizers"* who advocated the necessity of keeping the Mosaic Law and of circumcision* for Christians. But already in the seventeenth century some scholars argued that Paul's opponents were gnostics, while others maintained that Paul's opponents were not simply comprised of Judaizers or gnostics, but included those who mixed legalistic and gnostic and/or enthusiastic elements. And just prior to Baur's work, Edward Burton offered in 1829 the most thoroughgoing presentation to date of the thesis that Paul's opponents were gnostics. Hence, the debate in the first half of the twentieth century had its immediate roots in the polarization that took place during the previous century between those who presented Paul's opponents as gnostics and those who, following Baur, saw them as Judaizers. Moreover, the debate centered primarily on the identity of Paul's opponents in Corinth because of its pivotal role in Paul's ministry and the difference in subject matter between 1 and 2 Corinthians and the other Pauline letters. If Baur's thesis was to stand, it must be able to account for Paul's theology and opposition in 1 and 2 Corinthians, where the issue of the Law does not appear to be central but where, especially in 2 Corinthians, the focus of Paul's apologetic is still on his own legitimacy as an apostle.

2.2. Lightfoot, Lütgert and the History of Religions School. In nineteenth-century Germany the overwhelming majority of scholars thought that Baur was right, even in regard to the issues at stake in the Corinthian correspondence. But outside of Germany the reaction to Baur was significantly different. This was especially true in England, where J. B. Lightfoot led the way with his critique of Baur entitled "St Paul and the Three" (in his St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 5th ed., 1884, 292-374), in which he maintained that Paul did not stand in opposition to the chief "apostles of the circumcision," James,* Peter* and John. Moreover, Lightfoot argued that the opponents of Paul were not rival Christians associated with the "Pillar" apostles (Gal 2:9). Rather, the opponents behind Colossians, Romans, 1 Corinthians and the Pastorals were part of a "Christian Essene" movement which was more gnostic in orientation than the traditional Pharisaic Judaizers whom Paul opposed in Galatians, 2 Corinthians and Philippians. In contrast to the situation in Germany, Lightfoot's influence in the English-speaking world thus mitigated Baur's impact, since it kept scholars from interpreting Paul's letters as reflecting only one type of Judaizing heresy.

Within Germany the first significant break with Baur did not come until the beginning of the twentieth century, with the publication in 1908 of W. Lütgert's Freiheitspredigt und Schwärmgeister in Korinth. In Lütgert's view Paul's opponents in his various writings could all be subsumed under the overarching rubric of "gnostics," or "pneumatics," whose background was a liberal, Alexandrian Judaism that taught a gnosis in the form of a haggadic exposition and expansion of Scripture. Only in Galatians could Paul's opponents clearly be identified as Christian, Pharisaic Judaizers. But even in Galatia there was still a pneumatic opposition present, so that in his letter to the Galatians Paul was fighting against two fronts at once.

But it was the rise of the Religionsgeschichtliche ("history of religions") School, with its emphasis on a gnostic, mystery-religion backdrop to early Christianity, which appeared to deal the death-blow to the reign of Baur's position. The History of Religions School crystallized around the works of W. Bousset, especially his 1913 work, Kyrios Christos, Geschichte des Christusglaubens von den Anfängen des Christentums bis Irenaeus (ET Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, 1970) and R. Reitzenstein's study of the ancient mystery religions, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (1927³, ET Hellenistic Mystery-Religions: Their Basic Ideas and Significance, 1977). As a result of these works and others from this perspective, the attention of NT scholars was now forcefully directed to the conceptual world of Hellenism.* In addition, the History of Religions School offered for the first time a reconstruction of the development of early Christianity that was just as comprehensive and extensive as that of Baur. Prior to this time the concept of gnosticism had been used merely as a general description for certain theological tendencies. With the rise of the history-of-religions approach, this formerly vague term was now given the concrete and well-defined content needed to compete with the Tübingen School's ability to define the precise nature of Jewish-Christian legalism.

It was precisely the well-defined nature of gnosticism offered by the History of Religions School, however, that also brought about its own demise. In fact, the last serious attempt to argue that Paul's opponents in 2 Corinthians were gnostics was R. Bultmann's 1947 essay Exegetische Probleme des Zweiten Korintherbriefes zu 2 Kor 5:1-5; 5:11-6:10; 10-13; 12:21, written in response to E. Käsemann's influential article, "Die Legitimität des Apostels, Eine Untersuchung zu II Korinther 10-13" (ZNW 41 [1942] 33-71). Käsemann had concluded that Paul's opponents in Corinth were simply pneumatics who belonged to an association of Palestinians in the Diaspora who in their preaching emphasized their own spiritual exploits and accomplishments. In Käsemann's view, to say more than this, especially to attempt to understand them as gnostics, was to go beyond the evidence of the text. In response, Bultmann argued that Paul's opponents in 2 Corinthians were in fact the same Christian gnostics whom Paul had opposed in 1 Corinthians 15. But what is most evident in Bultmann's response is his determination to maintain at all costs the theory of the existence of a pre-Christian gnosticism. Bultmann's desperate attempt eventually failed, along with the entire History of Religions School's program of interpreting early Christianity against the backdrop of the gnostic mystery religions. There was simply no evidence to justify their extension of the incipient gnostic tendencies apparent in some parts of the NT into a reconstruction of a full-blown pre-Christian gnosticism like that first attested only in the second and third centuries.

2.3. The Bornkamm-Georgi Hypothesis. The collapse of the Bousset-Reitzenstein-Bultmann hypothesis thus freed scholarship from the burden of its past bias toward gnosticism as the key to Paul's thought, while at the same time allowing it to retain the History of Religions School's sound insight that early Christianity must be interpreted in the light of its surrounding religious context. Ultimately this continuing interest in Paul's religious environment and his opponents in Corinth culminated in the massive work of Dieter Georgi, Die Gegner des Paulus im 2. Korintherbrief (1964; ET The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians, 1986). Georgi's work was an extension and substantiation of the position of his mentor, Günther Bornkamm, whose overall understanding of Paul's life and thought was summarized in his now classic study, Paul (original German ed., 1969; ET 1971).

Georgi concluded that Baur's earlier adversaries had not been able to offer an adequate alternative because they had not taken seriously enough the Jewish origins and aspects of Paul's opposition. Georgi's own study of the terminology in 2 Corinthians 10—13 led him to the conclusion that Paul's opponents were Jewish-Christian missionaries and apostles of Palestinian origin who utilized the propaganda methods of the Hellenistic Jewish apologists. Georgi's extensive study of the missionary activities of Hellenistic Jews thus sought to provide the history-of-religions foundation Lütgert and Bultmann had failed to produce in order to combat Baur's extensive depiction of Palestinian Judaism and Judaizers. The result of Georgi's surveys of the Hellenistic-Jewish sources is a picture of Paul's opponents as Hellenistic-Jewish pneumatic missionaries whose self-understanding was based on the "divine man" (theios anēr) tradition within Hellenistic Judaism.

The publication of Georgi's work finally confronted Baur's thesis concerning Paul's opponents with an equally systematic and comprehensive antithesis. Thus, if Lütgert had ended the dominance of Baur's position, Georgi appeared to have called into question its very legitimacy! Baur's traditional picture now seemed to be a thing of the past. The only remaining task, apparently, was to refine Georgi's position, which many scholars since then have attempted to do.

2.4. Oostendorp, Barrett and the Revival of F. C. Baur. This new surge of optimism was premature. Not only was Georgi's work severely criticized for his methodology and use of sources, but the position of Baur itself still remained very much alive, despite the rise of the History of Religions school. In an ironic reversal of roles, however, it was now two scholars from outside Germany, D. W. Oostendorp and C. K. Barrett, who rose up to defend Baur's classic thesis, albeit with certain significant modifications.

Oostendorp modified Baur's Judaistic hypothesis sufficiently to incorporate the central significance of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), which Baur had excluded and which had repeatedly become the basis upon which he was attacked. According to Oostendorp (Another Jesus: A Gospel of Jewish Christian Superiority in II Corinthians, 1967), the Judaizers in Corinth, as in Galatia, had connected the work of the Spirit with the observance of the Law (cf. Gal 5:13-26), so that Paul's purpose was to contrast the Law and the Spirit (cf. Gal 3:1-5; 2 Cor 3:6) in such a way as to contradict their teaching. Though largely overlooked, Oostendorp's work was thus able to integrate the question of the reception and role of the Spirit with the issue of obedience to the Law both in the theology of Paul's opponents and in Paul's own understanding. Oostendorp brought together what, in the more traditional approach to Paul's opponents, had always been kept apart: the Spirit and the Law.

But of even greater significance for the history of the debate is the fact that Baur's position has also been strongly represented by one of the most influential of the recent interpreters of Paul in the English-speaking world, C. K. Barrett. In 1953 Barrett laid the foundation for his future work in his article "Paul and the 'Pillar' Apostles" (in Studia Paulina, FS Johannis de Zwaan, ed. J. N. Sevenster and W. C. Van Unnik, 1953, 1-19). Ten years later Barrett built upon this foundational study with a corresponding reexamination of the references and possible allusions to Peter in 1 and 2 Corinthians entitled "Cephas and Corinth," (in Abraham unser Vater, Juden und Christen im Gespräch über die Bibel, FS Otto Michel, ed. Otto Betz, et. al., 1963, 1-12). In this study Barrett concluded not only that it was probable that Cephas had visited Corinth, but that therefore the "man" who was building on Paul's foundation in 1 Corinthians 3:10-17 was either Peter himself or someone acting in his name. Like Baur before him, Barrett thus posited the existence in Corinth of a Jewish-Christian "Cephas-Party" in opposition to Paul.

But why then was Peter not mentioned in 2 Corinthians? Because, according to Barrett, and contrary to Baur's view, Paul still retained some respect for the original Jerusalem apostles. For this reason Paul released all of his "vigorous antipathy" on the "other agents" at work in Corinth under the guise of the authority* of Peter, that is, the "false apostles" of 2 Corinthians 11:13-15. Thus for Barrett, as for Käsemann before him, a distinction must be made between the "false apostles" and the eminent Jerusalem apostles of 2 Corinthians 11:5 and Galatians 2:9. Furthermore, the key to the situation in 2 Corinthians is the same as that in Galatians 2:12: Peter's heart was in the right place, but he was easily frightened and used by others! At Corinth Peter had once again become an easily manipulated figurehead whose name and authority were being used by impostors. As in Galatians 2, Paul was therefore once again in the uncomfortable position of not being able to repudiate Peter, while at the same time having to deal with those who wanted to destroy his work in Peter's name. From this point on Barrett's subsequent work was aimed at strengthening this basic position.

2.5. The Deadlock in Recent Scholarship. After more than 150 years of scholarship the result of Barrett's extensive work was to destroy any notion that a general consensus had been reached concerning the identity and theology of Paul's opponents. By the mid-1970s the camps were equally divided. The very fact that Barrett could argue for Baur's position so persuasively in the face of its most serious challenge made it clear that scholarship was at a stalemate. The two basic positions were now both firmly entrenched and seemed to be well fortified with a strong supply of documented arguments and counter-arguments.

But equally devastating to the modern debate has been the serious doubt raised concerning the historical reality which is said to undergird both of these positions. Georgi's evidence for the very existence of a "divine man" in Judaism, as the key to the opponents' self-understanding, has been seriously called into question. Others have criticized Georgi's attempt to interpret "servants of Christ" in 2 Corinthians 11:23 in the sense of "envoys," while still others have rejected Georgi's entire enterprise by maintaining that Jewish parallels to the missionary motives and methods of Paul do not exist. On the other hand, those who want to maintain that Paul's opponents were in some sense "Judaizers" must now contend with the challenges of E. P. Sanders and the "new perspective on Paul" which it has produced (see 3.2 below). Indeed, many from this perspective doubt if Paul's polemics have anything to do with the real position of his opponents at all! Hence, like the gnostic hypothesis of a previous generation, both of these remaining and basic hypotheses now stand under the shadow of serious questions concerning their historical reliability.

Finally, the current stalemate is a direct and natural result of the methodology employed in attempting to determine the nature of Paul's opposition. The inconclusive and internally contradictory history of Pauline studies since Baur has demonstrated that the temptation to reconstruct some grand hypothesis based on isolated fragments and "catch words" from Paul's letters, which are then filled out by recourse to distant parallels, must be resisted. For the simple fact is that there is no direct evidence from any of Paul's opponents themselves, unless James is read as an anti-Pauline polemic, which is certainly questionable.

Sumney's recent proposal of a "minimalist approach" to identifying Paul's opponents is therefore to be welcomed for its emphasis on the priority of exegesis in a "text-focused method," for its insistence upon a sound evaluation and use of proper sources, together with a "stringently" limited application of the "mirror technique" (i.e., reading the position of Paul's opponents directly out of Paul's own assertions as their opposite), and for its rejection of the attempt to approach the text with a previously determined, externally based, reconstruction. But it is significant in view of the history of research that when Sumney himself applies his method to 2 Corinthians, he offers no new insights into the identity of Paul's opponents. If progress is to be made in breaking the current deadlock it will thus come about only when such a text-oriented approach to the problem is combined with a renewed analysis of Paul's view of the Law and the center of his thinking as they impinge upon and are determined by the opposition which he faced not only in Corinth, but in Galatia, Antioch* and Jerusalem as well. Essential to such a renewed study is the recognition that in countering his opponents Paul drove a wedge between the "Pillar Apostles" and those who worked in their name by underscoring his essential unity with the Jerusalem apostles (cf. Gal 2:1-10; 1 Cor 15:1-11; 2 Cor 11:5-6), while at the same time opposing those who claimed to represent them.

3. Paul's View of the Law.

Baur's understanding of the conflict in the early church between a Law-free, Pauline, Gentile Christianity and its Judaizing, Petrine, Jewish Christian counterpart was wedded to and supported by his acceptance of the Reformation understanding of Paul's Law/gospel contrast (see Law). But as Douglas Moo observed in 1987, following the insight of Robert Jewett, "scholarship on Paul and the Law in the last ten years has witnessed a 'paradigm shift' " (Moo, 287). All of the traditional "assured results" concerning Paul's Law/gospel contrast are now being so seriously called into question that, after a long period of dormancy characterized only by minor refinements of the reigning paradigm, Paul's understanding of the Law is currently the most debated topic among Pauline scholars.

3.1. Antecedents to the Paradigm Shift in Recent Scholarship. This recent destruction of the modern consensus concerning Paul's Law/gospel contrast corresponds to the earlier but largely unheeded dissatisfaction in our century with the traditional Reformation understanding of the centrality of justification by faith in Paul's theology (see 4 below). Nor could Johannes Munck turn the tide with his explicit and sustained critique (in his Paul and the Salvation of Mankind, 1959 [German, 1954]) of the continuing influence of Baur on modern scholarship. To argue as Munck did that the only substantive difference between Paul and the Jerusalem apostles was over mission strategy, based on Paul's conviction that the Gentiles must be won to Christ first as a prelude to the salvation of Israel,* did not seem to account for Paul's critique of the Law itself (see Mission). Moreover, Munck's contention that Paul was convinced that the arrival of the messianic age depended upon his own ministry,* so that Paul himself becomes the central figure in salvation history, was viewed not only as an overstatement of the case, but as an untenable denial of the centrality of Christ in Paul's eschatology.* Munck's supporting thesis that Paul's opponents were Gentile Judaizers has also garnered little support. Nevertheless, Munck's interpretation of Paul is insightful at many points, and his strong rejection of Baur's conflict theory concerning the relationship between Paul and the rest of the primitive church, based upon a supposed difference in their fundamental perspectives concerning Jesus and the Law, is a lasting contribution of his work. For Munck there was no essential theological conflict between Paul and Jewish Christianity.

On the other hand, H. J. Schoeps's Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History (1961; German, 1959) and W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (1948; see now the revised 4th ed., 1980), sought in different ways to challenge the traditionally negative view of Judaism and the supposed antagonism between Paul and the Jewish-Christian apostles against which Paul had been interpreted since Baur. But Schoeps did not deny the basic Reformation understanding of the Law in Paul. He merely sought to show its irrelevance to the "mainstream" Judaism of Paul's day, since in Schoeps's view Paul was in essence attacking only a distortion of Judaism represented by the Hellenistic Jews of the Diaspora. Conversely, Davies discounted Paul's critique of the Law too readily as mere polemic, and therefore as not essential to Paul's otherwise normal "rabbinic" views. In other words, Schoeps's Paul was not Jewish enough to win the day, and Davies's Paul was too Jewish to be accepted.

However, the modern consensus was significantly attacked again in 1964 in C. E. B. Cranfield's now programmatic article, "St. Paul and the Law" (SJT 17 [1964] 43-68). Cranfield did not deny the centrality of justification by faith for Paul's theology or the Reformation understanding of Paul's opponents. Rather, his burden was to redefine the focus of Paul's criticism of the Law in terms of a criticism of its perversion into legalism, this perversion being represented by the unique Pauline phrase "works of the law"* (cf. Rom 3:20, 28; Gal 3:2,10 etc.). According to Cranfield, Paul coined this new terminology because no designation was available in Greek to represent "legalism." Hence, when Paul speaks negatively of the "works of the Law," or simply the "Law," he is not opposing the Law itself but its perversion into works-righteousness. Conversely, Paul's positive statements concerning the Law refer to the Law freed from this legalistic misuse. In arguing this, Cranfield's overall intention was to counter the axiom of the modern consensus that, for Paul, Christ had abolished the Law. For although Christ had abolished legalism, he was, for Paul, the "goal" (telos) of the Law itself (Rom 10:4). In 2 Corinthians 3:6 it is thus the "legalistic misunderstanding and perversion of the law," not the Law itself, which kills.

Cranfield's view has won many followers and has been refined in many directions (see now his two-volume commentary on Romans, and the studies of C. F. D. Moule, Ragnar Bring and, most importantly, D. P. Fuller). But this position has also been severely criticized for its reliance on what appears to many to be a self-confirming hypothesis in which Paul's negative statements concerning the Law are simply taken really to be about legalism, even when the full phrase "works of the Law" is not used (cf., e.g., Gal 3:10-12, 17-19). Others have pointed to its apparent failure to incorporate adequately some of Paul's statements concerning the abolition of the Law itself (e.g., Gal 3:12, 15-20; Rom 6:14; 7:4). And now, with the advent of E. P. Sanders's work, NT scholars increasingly regard the historical basis for Cranfield's view to be a phantom (but see his self-defense, Cranfield 1991).

Finally, although from a very different perspective on Paul's theology as a whole, a revitalized interest in biblical theology has led Hartmut Gese and Peter Stuhlmacher to reject the traditional Reformation understanding of the Law/gospel contrast as a theological distinction between two competing ways of salvation (see P. Stuhlmacher, "Paul's View of the Law in the Letter to the Romans," SEÅ 50 [1985] 87-104; his Reconciliation, Law, and Righteousness, 1986; and his recent commentary on Romans, 1989). Instead, the Law and the gospel are seen to represent an eschatological contrast between two periods in God's salvation history. Though still retaining the Reformation understanding of the centrality of justification by faith in Paul and his corresponding critique of the Law apart from faith, this approach views the Law itself as also in need of "redemption" from its role within the old covenant as the "Sinai Torah." Through the atonement of Christ and by the power of the Spirit, God has therefore redeemed not only humanity, but the Law as well from the power of sin. As the freed, eschatological "Zion Torah," God gives back to the Law its original function of giving life which it had in paradise. But to date, this approach has not been fully developed. In addition, the refinement it offers either goes too far for the traditional view, or not far enough for those seeking to replace the old consensus with a new one, since its criticism of the more traditional view does not strike at its essence.

3.2. The "New Perspective" on Paul. Hence, though substantial critiques of the reigning paradigm could certainly be found prior to 1977, these attacks on the prevailing consensus were primarily attacks on the Reformation understanding of Paul rather than an assault on its perception of Paul's Judaizing opponents. But as long as the traditional view of Paul's opponents remained substantially in place, the attempt to rethink Paul's own view could be dismissed not only as theologically or exegetically unsound, but also as historically misguided. Moo is therefore right in dating the destruction of the modern consensus to the advent of Sanders's contribution to the debate, beginning with his Paul and Palestinian Judaism in 1977. Sanders's view of Paul is, of course, in and of itself worthy of note and demands a response. But this is not what turned the tide in Pauline studies.

Sanders changed the course of scholarship on Paul because he succeeded in forcing scholars to rethink fundamentally the nature of the opposition Paul faced in his churches, and consequently the character and content of the criticism he raised against it. He accomplished this feat by presenting his own portrayal of Paul against the backdrop of a comprehensive and polemically forceful understanding of Palestinian Judaism as a religion of non-legalistic "covenantal nomism." According to Sanders, rather than demanding a perfect "works-righteousness" as the basis of one's salvation and as the prerequisite for entering into the covenant, the "covenantal nomism" pervasively found throughout Palestinian Judaism "is the view that one's place in God's plan is established on the basis of the covenant* and that the covenant requires as the proper response of man his obedience to its commandments, while providing means of atonement for transgression" (Sanders, 75). Thus, for Palestinian Judaism at the time of Paul, "the intention and effort to be obedient constitute the condition for remaining in the covenant, but they do not earn it" (Sanders, 180, emphasis his). Sanders's conclusions concerning Palestinian Judaism, though certainly not new (cf., e.g., the work of G. F. Moore before him) and not without their critics, could not be ignored, combined as they were with a corresponding reinterpretation of Paul's polemic against the Law.

For the vast majority of scholars, Paul's world had suddenly changed, and with this change came the need to rethink Paul's view of the "problem" of Law itself in view of the "solution" now offered in Christ. For if Sanders and his followers are right about the nature of Palestinian Judaism in Paul's day, then the traditional Reformation view of "Paul's polemic is left hanging in mid-air, and it is necessary either to accuse Paul of misunderstanding (or misrepresenting) his opponents, or to find new opponents for him to be criticizing" (Moo, 293). Once accepted, the effects of the paradigm shift regarding Judaism precipitated by Sanders are thus both far-reaching and decisive for the way in which Paul will be read in the decades ahead.

As is always the case, however, it is easier to tear down than to build up. Since the early 1980s the study of Paul's view of the Law has been marked by a flurry of studies seeking to work out the implications of Sanders's work for "the new perspective on Paul," to quote the title of the 1983 article written by J. D. G. Dunn, who has become one of the leading voices of this radical reorientation. In addition to Dunn's many studies (e.g., his collection of essays, Jesus, Paul, and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians, 1990, and his two-volume commentary, Romans, 1988; see Romans), most important among these new voices have been the works of Heikki Räisänen, especially his Paul and the Law (1983), Sanders's own subsequent works on Paul and Judaism (see especially his Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People, 1983; Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63BCE-66CE, 1992; and Paul, 1991; as well as Reinhold Liebers, Das Gesetz als Evangelium, Untersuchungen zur Gesetzeskritik des Paulus, 1989). Often at odds with one another on individual points of exegesis, these studies are unified only by their common conviction concerning the non-legalistic nature of first-century Judaism and their corresponding rejection of the traditional Reformation understanding of the Law/gospel antithesis as the key to Paul's view of the Law and the theology of his opponents, especially in view of the fact that 2 Corinthians apparently lacks this debate over the Law entirely.

3.3. The Current Diversity of Proposals. Dating from Sanders's initial work in 1977 a forceful and, in part, successful attack on the traditional understanding of Paul's view of the Law, stemming from Baur, has thus been mounted. But the plethora of new proposals spawned by this paradigm shift suffers as much from internal dissent as from external critique, since no consensus has yet emerged concerning the reason(s) why Paul actually rejected Judaism and the "works of the Law," nor concerning the actual meaning of "works of the Law" in Paul's writings. Morevoer, the earlier positions represented by Cranfield and Stuhlmacher continue to win adherents, while the recent studies of Charles H. Cosgrove, The Cross and the Spirit: A Study in the Argument and Theology of Galatians (1988); Roman Heiligenthal, Werke als Zeichen, Untersuchungen zur Bedeutung der menschlichen Taten im Frühjudentum, Neuen Testament und Frühchristentum (1983); Frank Thielman, From Plight to Solution: A Jewish Framework for Understanding Paul's View of the Law in Galatians and Romans (1989); and Peter J. Tomson, Paul and the Jewish Law: Halakha in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles (1990), offer great promise due to their recognition of the positive role that obedience to the Law plays in the soteriological structures of both Judaism and Paul. Moreover, although the pendulum of opinion is now swinging toward the new perspective, recent proponents of the more traditional view, such as F. F. Bruce, Seyoon Kim, G. Lüdemann (who has once again picked up and argued extensively and explicitly for the validity of the Tübingen School's perspective), Otfried Hofius, Martin Hengel, Robert H. Gundry, Thomas R. Schreiner, Brice L. Martin and in part S. Westerholm, continue to argue strongly that the "paradigm shift" in Pauline studies has been misguided and that "there is more of Paul in Luther than many twentieth-century scholars are inclined to allow" (Westerholm, 173).

As with the question of the identity and nature of Paul's opponents, the positive result of this great diversity among scholars today is that it drives interpreters back to the text itself. Students of Paul are now approaching his writings with eyes wide open and a healthy skepticism concerning all paradigms as they search for fresh insight into passages which suddenly look new again. And here too, Paul's emphasis on his essential unity with the Jerusalem apostles as the conduits of the teaching of Jesus and the positive role which the Law played "in Christ"* and under the power of the Spirit must play a decisive part in the forging of a new consensus (cf. Gal 5:1—6:16; Rom 8:1-8; and the use of the Law in Pauline ethics). Furthermore, the centrality of Paul's eschatological conviction that Christ has initiated the beginning of the new creation* with the establishment of the new covenant, in fulfillment of Jeremiah 31:31-34 and Ezekiel 36:26-27, needs to be taken seriously as a key to Paul's understanding of the Law. For it is against this backdrop that the question of the exact locus of the "problem" with the Law as it functioned under the old covenant, as well as its role in the new, must be raised. But to raise the question of the impact of Paul's eschatology* on his view of the Law is to call attention to the larger question of the center of Paul's theology as such, which is the last and most important question raised by Baur's work.

4. The Center of Paul's Theology.

Until the mid-1970s most German scholarship maintained an inextricable link between its traditional Reformation understanding of Paul's Law/gospel contrast and the overriding conviction that the center of Paul's thinking was the concept of the righteousness* of God* as encountered in the doctrine of justification.* This view was then bolstered by the corresponding understanding of Paul's opponents as predominantly Judaistic legalists who insisted that, in addition to faith in Christ, adherence to the Law was necessary for gaining and/or maintaining a righteous standing before God.

But as with the other pillars of Baur's perspective, this too was not without its challengers within Germany, while Anglo-Saxon scholarship was never dominated by this position or controlled in the same way by this question. Instead, outside of Germany some of the leading scholars sought to understand Paul's doctrine of justification as merely one aspect of a larger panorama of theological themes. The various aspects of Paul's theology were not organized, therefore, as derivatives of this one generating center of Paul's thought. Rather, Paul's thought was analyzed either according to the traditional structure of systematic theology (e.g., creation, anthropology, sin, redemption, christology, eschatology etc; for a prime example of this approach, see the works of D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St. Paul, 1964, and Herman Ridderbos, Paul, An Outline of His Theology, 1975 [original Dutch ed., 1966]), or within the structure of some other organizational principle (cf., e.g., Richard N. Longenecker, Paul, Apostle of Liberty, 1964, who took the broader issue of "legality-liberty" as the organizational framework for displaying Paul's thought; and F. F. Bruce's, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free, 1977, who presented Paul's theology within the historical outline of Paul's missionary travels). And yet, due to the influence of the Reformation and its questions on the study of Paul and the leading role that German scholarship played for the first seventy years of the twentieth century, the dominant question within Pauline studies has remained, Is justification by faith the conceptual center of Paul's thought (see Center)?

4.1. Challenges to the Traditional View. Already in 1904 W. Wrede had argued in his book, Paulus, that the doctrine of justification was not the generating principle of Paul's thinking but merely a polemical doctrine (Kampfeslehre) aimed at the Judaism of his day. The generating principle of Paul's theology, Wrede maintained, was his eschatological conviction that Christ had ushered in the proleptic beginning of the kingdom* of God. But it was left to Albert Schweitzer to take Wrede's emphasis on eschatology and understand it as the framework of Paul's thought. This was Schweitzer's argument in his influential book, Die Mystik des Apostels Paulus (1930; ET The Mysticism of the Apostle Paul, 1931), which was to that date the most convincing and thoroughgoing alternative to the traditional view. Schweitzer combined Wrede's emphasis on eschatology with Adolf Deissmann's earlier development of Paul's "Christ-mysticism" (see Mysticism), which Deissmann had argued was "the characteristic expression of his Christianity," as evidenced in the 164 times that the formula "in Christ" appears in Paul's writings (see his Paulus, 1911 and 1926; ET Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History, 1912, 1927, 140 for quote and evidence). Hence for Schweitzer, being "in Christ" was not merely a cultic reality as Deissmann had emphasized, but an eschatological reality which was experienced physically and sacramentally and brought about by the inaugurated eschatological kingdom of God now present with the turn of the ages. Viewed in this way, Paul's "mysticism" was the key to his thinking. The title of Schweitzer's book is thus misleading, since for Schweitzer this mysticism was not the result of some immediate and timeless "oneness" with Christ. Nevertheless, Schweitzer relegated the doctrine of justification by faith to a mere "subsidiary crater" (Nebenkrater) of Paul's thought, since it was found only in certain letters (predominantly in Galatians and Romans) and then only in reference to the specific problem of the Law as raised by Paul's controversy with the Judaizers.

But the work of Wrede, Deissmann and Schweitzer did not win the day in the German speaking world. Nor did W. D. Davies's rejection of the centrality of the Law/gospel contrast and the doctrine of justification, argued in his Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, gain a hearing outside of England and America. It was not until the seminal writings of Krister Stendahl and E. P. Sanders that these earlier protests found a foothold in scholarship. Ever since the work of Stendahl and Sanders, however, the traditional understanding of the center of Paul's thought has been increasingly called into question.

Stendahl's programmatic essays, "The Apostle Paul and the Introspective Conscience of the West" (1960) and "Paul Among Jews and Gentiles" (1963), were originally written in Swedish and were published in English in his Paul Among Jews and Gentiles and other Essays (1976). Stendahl's reinterpretation of Paul's theology grew out of his conviction that, due to Reformation theology and the grid of Luther's own conversion experience, Paul's teaching concerning justification by faith had been removed from its original setting and transposed into the very center of his teaching about salvation.* Rather than addressing the status of Gentiles* within God's plan for the world, as it does in Paul's writings, the doctrine of justification by faith was now seen to be the abstract doctrinal response to the despair and failure of humanity brought about by the attempt to live up to the moral demands of the Law or by the pride caused by humanity's attempt to justify itself by the Law. The ultimate result of this loss of the original focus of justification is that the Pauline problem of the relationship between Jews and Gentiles becomes captive to the Western problem of the introspective conscience.

As a corollary to this misunderstanding of the role of justification in Paul's thought, Paul's Damascus Road experience has thus been wrongly universalized as an experience of conversion, rather than rightly understood as Paul's specific call to be the apostle to the Gentiles (see Conversion and Call). Hence, for Stendahl, "Paul's argument about justification by faith neither grows out of his 'dissatisfaction' with Judaism, nor is intended as a frontal attack on 'legalism,' " but instead was "hammered out by Paul for the very specific and limited purpose of defending the rights of Gentile converts to be full and genuine heirs to the promises of God to Israel. Their rights were based solely on faith in Jesus Christ" (Stendahl, 130, 2). For Stendahl, therefore, Paul's view of justification by faith served merely as an apologetic doctrine which " 'justified' the status of Gentile Christians as honorary Jews" (5, cf. 130). As such, the doctrine of justification by faith can lay no claim to being the pervasive or organizing principle of Paul's thought.

In much the same way, E. P. Sanders's reexamination of the pattern of Judaism and the central issue of the relationship between Jews and Gentiles in Paul's thinking has also led him to reevaluate the driving force of Paul's theology. Just as Paul's opponents can no longer be understood as legalistic Jews who held to a form of works-righteousness, so too must justification by faith be given up as the clue to Paul's thought (Paul and Palestinian Judaism, 438). Instead, following Schweitzer, the dominant conception of salvation in Paul's letters is the transfer from one sphere of lordship (sin, death, the Law) to another (righteousness, life, the gospel), so that being saved both entails, and is brought about by, becoming one with Christ. If the pattern of Judaism in Paul's day can be called "covenantal nomism," the pattern of Paul's religion can thus be described as "participationist eschatology" (Paul and Palestinian Judaism, 552).

There have also been those who, like H. Räisänen, have stressed that due to the occasional nature of Paul's theology it is asking too much to seek the center to Paul's thinking to begin with. Indeed, the fact that Paul was not a systematic theologian in his approach to doctrine, or in his mode of presentation, is widely acknowledged today. But for Räisänen, not only is Paul not systematic in his framework, his thinking itself is characterized by internal contradictions concerning the relationship between the Law and his gospel, from that of hostility and mutual exclusion in Galatians, to that of compatibility and inclusion in Romans. Räisänen's understanding of Paul as fundamentally inconsistent in his thought has not carried the day, nor should it. It is one thing to recognize the occasional nature of Paul's letters, but it is quite another to conclude that Paul's thinking lacks an internal coherence or conceptual focus.

4.2. The Debate Within and Against the Traditional View. The traditional interpretation of justification by faith as the center of Paul's thinking has also undergone a significant development of its own in the last fifty years. The internal debate has focused on the meaning of the corresponding concept of the "righteousness of God" in Paul's thought (cf. Rom 1:17; 3:21-22, 26; 10:3; 2 Cor 5:21; Phil 3:9) and on the relationship of Paul's doctrine of justification to his other central affirmations. Above all, scholars have sought to understand more precisely the interplay between justification by faith and the new creation, the role of the Spirit, the expectation of moral transformation in Christ, the coming judgment by works, and Paul's hope for the future consummation and vindication at Christ's return.

The starting point for the modern debate is the work of Rudolf Bultmann, no doubt the most influential NT scholar of the twentieth century. As an extension of Luther's basic position, Bultmann argued in his Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; 1948, 1953; ET 1951, 1955, §§28-30) that for Paul the righteousness of God, granted to the individual upon his or her justification by faith, was a forensic concept. As such, it is not an ethical change brought about in a person, but an eschatological reality which, although originally related to the end times, is now, for Paul, already experienced by the believer as a pure gift of God's grace,* rather than as a result of one's obedience to the Law.

Bultmann's view was based on his reinterpretation of Paul's theological categories into existential terms in which God was viewed not as an external subject, but only from the perspective of his relationship to humanity, while humanity was equally viewed only in relationship to God. For Bultmann, therefore, history is the arena in which God encounters us directly and individually in order to call for a decision in response to the preaching of the gospel, rather than being the working out of God's redemptive plan on the way toward an ultimate consummation at the return of Christ.

The legitimacy for this reinterpretation of Paul's view of history and eschatology was found in Paul himself, whom Bultmann saw continuing to demythologize the Jewish apocalyptic* gospel of Jesus as the Messianic Son of Man as originally preached by the early church, into a kerygma concerning Jesus as the divine Son of God (see Son of God), which could then be preached and understood in a Hellenistic context. For Bultmann, Paul's letters consequently show hardly a trace of the historical Jesus or of the Jewish and Palestinian tradition of the early Christians, since Paul received the Christian tradition as it had already been altered through the filter of the Hellenistic Church (see Jesus, Sayings of). In line with this reconstruction, Bultmann saw Paul's opposition to be a Judaistic legalism based on the Law itself, which for Bultmann not only could not be kept perfectly, but which itself brought about sinful boasting by its very demand for obedience. Paul thus opposed the Law and those Jewish Christians who held to it for both quantitative reasons (no one can keep the Law perfectly) and qualitative reasons (the very attempt itself to keep the Law is already sin). Luther's Law/gospel contrast therefore reaches its apex in Bultmann's reading of Paul.

In stark contrast, Ernst Käsemann argued in his paradigmatic 1961 article, "Gottesgerechtigkeit bei Paulus" (ZThK 58 [1961] 367-78; ET "The Righteousness of God in Paul," in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 168-82), that for Paul the righteousness of God was not primarily a gift, but a cosmic and creative power,* under which one is brought to live as part of the corporate people of God as a result of having been freed in baptism from the power of sin* and death (see Life and Death). For Käsemann, Paul's thought must not be conceived of primarily in existential terms, but in apocalyptic categories in which the content of the righteousness of God is the rule of Christ over the world and his people in anticipation of God's final cosmic triumph.* Salvation is not therefore fundamentally the experience of receiving God's righteousness, but of being brought back into obedience to the righteousness of God in Christ. Rather than referring to a righteousness which comes from God as a gift, as Bultmann argued, for Käsemann the righteousness of God is God's own righteous behavior, expressed in his saving activity as an outworking of his covenantal faithfulness to his creation and to his people (see Way).

The most important contribution to this ongoing debate has been the further development of Käsemann's basic perspective in the work of Peter Stuhlmacher, beginning with the 1966 revised form of his dissertation, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus (The Righteousness of God in Paul). Against the backdrop of the OT and Jewish apocalyptic understanding of the righteousness of God, Stuhlmacher has argued that the righteousness of God in Paul's thought must be understood in view of the fact that for Paul the new age of the righteousness of God has already broken in with Christ, so that God's people are now living in the overlapping of the ages. The present experience of the righteousness of God does not refer, therefore, primarily to some forensic transaction in heaven which transcends time. Rather, Paul could speak of the present reality of the righteousness of God in the lives of his people precisely because God's power to save and to vindicate, in accordance with his faithfulness to his covenant, was already being poured out in the world through Christ. The righteousness of God is thus first and foremost the power of God which brings one into the new world of the kingdom of God. In turn, the believer's experience of God's righteousness is made possible by the "forensic situation" brought about by the cross of Christ and realized in the world through participation in the body of Christ.

Stuhlmacher consequently solves the tension between the theological categories of imputed and effective, or real, righteousness by emphasizing that the ontological bridge which makes possible the Pauline assertions concerning one's real participation in the righteousness of God is the concept of the Spirit. Hence, in contrast to the view of Schweitzer and those who follow him, mystic union with Christ and justification are bound together into one reality for Paul, rather than being in conflict or distinct from one another. For according to Stuhlmacher, being justified includes, for Paul, being put into the realm of and experiencing the reality of the Spirit as a proleptic realization of the future new creation (cf. Rom 8:2-17; 1 Cor 12:13; Rom 8:10-11).

Käsemann's fundamental paradigm, based on the conviction that apocalyptic thinking is the "mother" of all Christian theology, has now been further developed and applied consistently to all of Paul's thought in J. Christiaan Beker's, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (1980). Beker too recognizes with the majority of modern scholars that Paul's thought is not systematically developed or presented. Beker's distinct contribution is to argue, however, that for Paul the apocalyptic triumph of God which has now been brought about proleptically in the Christ-event, but which will reach its final victory in the imminent future triumph of God, is nevertheless the coherent and symbolic (not doctrinal!) center of Paul's gospel. For Beker the center of Paul's thought is thus neither an abstract doctrine on the one hand, nor a life changing experience on the other. According to Beker, it is "a mistake to define Paul's coherent center either in terms of a too-narrow conceptual definition, that is, in a petrified conceptuality ('justification by faith,' 'sacramental participation,' etc.), or in terms of a too-general characterization ('being in Christ,' 'the Lordship of Christ')" (Preface to the 1984 ed., xvii; see too the review of Beker's work by R. P. Martin, JBL 101 [1982] 463-66). Instead, "Paul's coherent center must be viewed as a symbolic structure in which a primordial experience (Paul's call) is brought into language in a particular way. . . . That language is, for Paul, the apocalyptic language of Judaism, in which he lived and thought" (Beker, 15-16).

In Beker's view, the genius of Paul is his corresponding ability to correlate and apply this overarching and consistent apocalyptic theme to various and distinct situations, without dissolving the coherence of the gospel. Beker thus argues that for Paul "in nearly all cases the contingent interpretation of the gospel points—whether implicitly or explicitly—to the imminent cosmic triumph of God" (Beker, 19). Hence, Beker rejects Bultmann's attempt to remove the apocalyptic elements from Paul's gospel (i.e., to demythologize them into an existential self-understanding) as an attempt to remove the very content of the gospel itself. But unlike Käsemann and Stuhlmacher, Beker also rejects the conclusion that the theme of the righteousness of God is the central theme of Paul's writings. For Beker, it too is merely one of the many expressions of the underlying symbolic theme of the coming triumph of God. "Thus, righteousness must be viewed as one symbol among others and not as the center of Paul's thought" (Beker, 17).

As scholarly investigation and proposals from Wrede to Beker demonstrate, the challenge now is to rethink Paul's theology in such a way that the centrality of eschatology in Paul's thought is brought together with Paul's actual assertions on a doctrinal and personal level concerning what God in Christ has accomplished in history and for the believer. But at the same time, to pursue the question of the center of Paul's theology is also to ask what it means for the believer to be living in the kingdom of God which, although already inaugurated, has not yet been established in all its fullness. Within this context, and in anticipation of the coming triumph and judgment* of God, the need to delineate both the meaning of the righteousness of God and the means of the justification of God's people, now and in the future, still remains the crux for interpreting Paul's letters.

5. Prospects for the Future.

The history of Pauline research since Baur has highlighted the crucial importance of determining the historical context within which Paul's thought was developed and expressed. As a consequence, recent studies of Paul have increasingly focused on the study and classification of Paul's rhetoric* (apart from H. D. Betz's Galatians, 1979, and his earlier work, Der Apostel Paulus und die sokratische Tradition, Eine exegetische Untersuchung zu einer 'Apologie' 2 Korinther 10—13, 1972, these contributions are found mostly in journal articles dedicated to specific passages) and on the sociology* of Paul's communities (see Wayne A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul, 1983, and the many works of Gerd Theissen, especially The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity, 1982; see Social-Scientific Approaches). Nevertheless, such studies remain merely helpful subsidiaries in service of the main task of interpreting the content of Paul's own thought as it was expressed in response to the needs of his communities and the opposition that he faced. The history of Pauline research since Baur has also made it clear that one's view of Paul will be determined, above all, by whether one interprets his letters predominantly against the Greco-Roman philosophical and religious world of Paul's day, as Bultmann argued over fifty years ago, or in light of the Hellenistic-Jewish world of the first century and its Scriptures, as Adolf Schlatter proposed in the early decades of this century. This is true despite the fact that modern scholarship has shown the great degree to which the Judaism of Paul's day had already been influenced by Hellenism,* so that it is a historical mistake to view Paul as either Jewish or Hellenistic in his thought. Paul was clearly a Hellenistic Jew (see Jew, Paul the). Nevertheless, the fundamental issue still to be resolved in Pauline studies is the determination of the primary religious and theological context within which Paul's thought is to be understood. This is the great watershed among students of Paul.

How one decides this issue will determine how one reads Paul. And how one reads Paul will determine how one evaluates the relationship between Jesus and Paul on the one hand (see Jesus and Paul), and the place of Paul in the development of the early church on the other. Baur saw Paul as the great "Hellenizer of Christianity," so that Paul's opponents became the other apostles themselves. Those who likewise look first to the religions* and philosophies* of the Greco-Roman world to explain Paul's thought must also posit a gap, if not hostility, between Paul and the early church in Jerusalem.

Against the backdrop of this decision, it is worth remembering the words of Ritschl. Already in 1856 he recognized that the enduring value of Baur and the Tübingen School would be in the counter-reactions which it would evoke: " 'The Tübingen School has fallen to pieces and its initiative will only deserve recognition in the measure that it leads to opposition against the system of early Church history as presented by Baur and Schwegler, and as it furthers the cultivation of Biblical Theology more than has been the case up to now' " (quoted by Harris, 108-9).

After 150 years of Pauline studies there still remains a need for a comprehensive developmental, rather than conflict, model of Paul's life and thought, and for the corresponding cultivation of a biblical theology which incorporates Paul's apostolic role and theology within the history of the early church. This need has been underscored by the study of Paul from an explicitly Jewish perspective (in addition to the work by Schoeps, see Samuel Sandmel, The Genius of Paul: A Study in History, 1958; Schalom Ben-Chorin, Paulus, Der Völkerapostel in jüdicher Sicht, 1970; and now Alan F. Segal, Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee, 1990). But even adherents to the "New Perspective" on Paul, who have worked hard to renew our understanding of Paul within the Judaism of his day, have often not taken the Jewish matrix of Paul's own thinking seriously enough as the decisive conceptual source for Paul's thinking. Moreover, at the heart of the debate concerning the Law and the role of justification in Paul's thought is the question of Paul's understanding of redemptive history (cf. Gal 3—4; 2 Cor 3:7-18; Rom 3:21-16; 9—11), which itself can only be solved by a renewed study of Paul's use and understanding of the OT within the larger question of the relationship of Paul and his gospel to Israel* as the old covenant people of God (see Restoration of Israel). Such a study is only now beginning to be undertaken (see, e.g., the recent works of Dietrich-Alex Koch, Die Schrift als Zeuge des Evangeliums, Untersuchungen zur Verwendung und zum Verständnis der Schrift bei Paulus, 1986; Richard B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul, 1989; N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology, 1991; and the various recent motif studies and treatments of particular key passages in which Paul quotes, alludes to, or relies upon the OT explicitly for his self-understanding and theology, such as Seyoon Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel, 1981, James M. Scott, Adoption as Sons of God, 1992, and Karl Olav Sandnes, Paul—One of the Prophets, 1991; see Old Testament in Paul; Prophet, Paul As). The future of Pauline studies at this juncture in its history is dependent upon just these kinds of studies if we are to move forward in our understanding of Paul as he understood himself: the Jewish apostle to the Gentiles, whose message came from the history of his people, their Scriptures, and the history of Israel's Messiah.

See also CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL; JESUS AND PAUL; JUSTIFICATION; LAW; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; RIGHTEOUSNESS, RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD; WORKS OF THE LAW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Becker, Paulus. Der Apostel der Völker (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989); R. Bring, "Paul and the Old Testament: A Study of the Ideas of Election, Faith and Law in Paul, with Special Reference to Romans 9:30-10:30," ST 25 (1971) 21-60; C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule. Darstellung und Kritik ihres Bildes vom gnostischen Erlösermythus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1961); C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1975, 1979); idem, " 'The Works of the Law' in the Epistle to the Romans," JSNT 43 (1991) 89-101; N. A. Dahl, Studies in Paul (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology (4th ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. D. G. Dunn, "The New Perspective on Paul," BJRL 65 (1983) 95-122; E. E. Ellis, Paul and His Recent Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961); idem, "Paul and His Opponents: Trends in Research," in Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity: New Testament Essays (WUNT 18; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1978) 80-115; E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae, eds., The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); D. P. Fuller, Gospel and Law: Contrast or Continuum? The Hermeneutics of Dispensationalism and Covenant Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); idem, The Unity of the Bible: Unfolding God's Plan for Humanity (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); J. J. Gunther, St. Paul's Opponents and Their Background: A Study of Apocalyptic and Jewish Sectarian Teachings (NovTSup 30; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); H. Harris, The Tübingen School: A Historical and Theological Investigation of the School of F. C. Baur (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990); H. Hübner, "Paulusforschung seit 1945. Ein kritischer Literaturbericht," in ANRW II.25.4.2649-2840; W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); D. Moo, "Paul and the Law in the Last Ten Years," SJT 40 (1987) 287-307; C. F. D. Moule, "Obligation in the Ethic of Paul," in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, ed. W. F. Farmer et al. (Cambridge: University Press, 1976) 313-35; S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861-1986 (2d ed.; New York: Oxford, 1988); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism, A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); A. Schweitzer, Paul and His Interpreters: A Critical History (London: Adam & Charles Black, repr. 1948, 1912); idem, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (New York: H. Holt, 1931); K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); J. L. Sumney, Identifying Paul's Opponents: The Question of Method in 2 Corinthians (JSNTSup 40; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1990); J. M. Gundry Volf, Paul and Perseverance (WUNT 2/37; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990); D. V. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991); S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988).

S. J. Hafemann

PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS

1. Sources
2. Paul's Career
3. Paul's Missionary Policy and Message
4. Paul's Abiding Influence

1. Sources.

There are two main sources for our knowledge of Paul—his own writings and the Acts of the Apostles. These two sources are apparently wholly independent. Paul's writings display him as a letter writer—he is in fact one of the great letter writers of world literature—whereas Acts says nothing of him in this regard. The majority opinion is that Acts makes no use of his letters, although his authentic letters were all in existence (though not yet collected) when Acts was written.

A subsidiary body of source material includes the contemporary evidence bearing on social, political and religious life in those parts of the Mediterranean world where Paul moved and worked, from Judea to Rome.

1.1. Paul's Letters. Paul's letters provide primary evidence for our knowledge of the man himself. Most of them were written to churches* he had planted, dealing with issues that had arisen in them during his absence. They are usually second-best substitutes for his presence and spoken word (see Authority). In Galatians 4:20, for example, he expresses the wish that he could be with his readers so that they could gather the intensity of his emotions from the tone of his voice as they could not from his writing. On one occasion, however, he deliberately did not visit the church of Corinth when he could have done so because he could express himself more severely in writing than he could have done in speech: he evidently found it difficult to be severe in the presence of his friends and converts and wanted to spare both them and himself the embarrassment of a face-to-face confrontation (2 Cor 1:23—2:4).

The outstanding exception to the rule that Paul's letters were sent to his own churches is the letter to the Romans (see Romans). (The letter to the Colossians is not really an exception: it was sent to a church in Paul's mission field, one founded by his lieutenant Epaphras.) The letter to the Romans was sent to the Christian community in Rome, when Paul was about to pay his first visit to their city. He wished not only to prepare the Roman Christians for his visit but also to enlist their sympathetic involvement in his further apostolic enterprise, both in his projected evangelization of Spain and in the discharge and continuation of his commission to the Gentile* world at large. The main letters of his apostolic prime—those to the Galatians, Corinthians and Romans, are sometimes called his four "capital" letters; they provide our chief source of information for the content and purpose of his message. The "captivity," or "prison," letters (Philippians, Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon) are so called because he appears to have been undergoing some kind of imprisonment when they were written (see Prison, Prisoner). Traditionally, they have been dated during his two years of house arrest in Rome; this is most frequently held to be the case with Philippians, but arguments have been presented for dating Philippians and the other captivity letters during his period of custody in Caesarea (Acts 24:27; see Philippians) or during the earlier, not explicitly recorded, imprisonment in Ephesus (see Ephesus).

One of the captivity letters, the personal note to Paul's friend Philemon of Colossae (see Philemon), interceding for Onesimus, Philemon's slave and now Paul's convert, shares the same life setting as Colossians (see Col 4:9 with the references to Archippus in Philem 2 and Col 4:17). Another, the letter to the Ephesians, is not associated with one particular church: the phrase "in Ephesus" (Eph 1:1), from which the traditional title is derived, is probably not part of the original text (see Ephesians). This letter has the character of a testament to Paul's mission field, especially in proconsular Asia, viewing his ministry to the Gentiles as a means to the fulfillment of God's eternal purpose, to unite the universe in Christ (see Peace).

The Pastoral Letters (1 and 2 Tim and Tit; see Pastoral Letters), of uncertain date, include a number of personal notes (especially 2 Tim), but 1 Timothy and Titus largely resemble early manuals of church order, while 2 Timothy has the nature of a personal testament.

Paul's letters were regularly dictated to amanuenses (the name of one of these, Tertius, has been preserved in Rom 16:22). Paul was accustomed to authenticate them by adding the last sentence or two in his own hand (cf. Gal 6:11). Occasionally, but not usually, this autographic addition included his name (cf. 1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17; also Philem 19).

In the opening salutation Paul frequently associates with himself one or more friends who might be with him at the time of writing; only occasionally, however, does internal evidence suggest that one of these was a responsible joint author, like Silvanus in 1 and 2 Thessalonians or Timothy in Colossians. In 1 and 2 Thessalonians those passages are evidently Paul's where we find the singular pronoun "I" (e.g., "I Paul" in 1 Thess 2:18).

Most of Paul's letters are "occasional documents" in the sense that they were called for by some local need where Paul was not present to deal with the situation firsthand. Only once, to our knowledge, did he deal with a critical situation by letter in preference to on-the-spot action (2 Cor 1:23—2:4). Even Romans is an occasional letter because it was sent in view of Paul's plan to visit Rome as soon as he had completed the delivery of relief money to Jerusalem (Rom 15:23-32; see Collection for the Saints), although he took the opportunity to present the Roman Christians with an orderly statement of the gospel* as he understood and preached it (see Preaching, Kerygma).

1.2. Acts of the Apostles. In the Acts of the Apostles, the second part of Luke's history of Christian origins (the sequel to the Third Gospel), Paul is introduced at an early stage. His call to be Christ's worldwide witness is first related in Acts 9:1-20, and from Acts 15:40 to the end of the book he dominates the narrative, until he arrives in Rome and spends two years there in custody. After the record of Acts ends we have only scanty and uncertain hints about the remainder of his life. If the author of Acts was, as seems most probable, an acquaintance and occasional companion of Paul, then Acts has claims to be recognized as a primary source of information about Paul.

Indeed, a collection of occasional letters written by some figure of history at crucial epochs in his career, will have a value and directness of their own, by giving his personal perspective on persons and events and (in a man who wore his heart on his sleeve, as Paul did) by providing insight into his mind and motives. Such a collection, however, cannot take the place of an orderly account of events in which he played a major part, written from the more objective point of view of a writer who had access to the material from reliable informants and from personal involvement, and set in the context of contemporary history.

1.3. Comparison of the Letters and Acts. Although these two main sources for our knowledge are apparently independent of each other, there are impressive parallels between their respective portrayals of Paul.

In both sources Paul supports himself by his own labors so as not to be financially burdensome to his friends and converts (see Financial Support). His policy recorded in Acts of visiting the local synagogue first, in place after place to which he comes, is in line with his insistence in Romans 1:16 that the gospel is directed "to the Jew first." Besides, apostle* to the Gentiles as he knew himself to be, he found that the Gentile sympathizers who attended the synagogue services presented the most promising nucleus for a Christian community. Plainly, he did not regard visiting the synagogue to make contact with them a breach of his agreement with the Jerusalem church leaders, by which they were to concentrate on evangelizing Jews and he and Barnabas on the Gentile mission (Gal 2:7-9). In any case, he was not the man to keep silent about Jesus while in Jewish company; he was under a debt to his kinsfolk by race as well as to all others (see Israel).

In Acts, Paul is the most adaptable of people. He is equally at home with Gentiles and religiously observant Jews. This is the Paul who in 1 Corinthians 9:19-23 claims to live like a Jew among the Jews, in order to win Jews, and like a Gentile among Gentiles, in order to win Gentiles.

From the point where he assumes a major role in the narrative of Acts, Paul is Luke's hero. He is indeed a man "of like nature" with other human beings (Acts 14:15), but in Luke's portrayal he dominates the situation. He is always sure of himself; he always triumphs. The Paul of the letters includes himself among his fellow Christians when he describes them as "more than conquerors" through Christ (Rom 8:27); but there is little triumphalism in his own account of his apostolic activity (see Triumph). He is "led in triumph" in Christ (2 Cor 2:14)—led in Christ's triumphal procession—and he can thank God that by his grace* he has worked harder than any of the others called to the same evangelistic task (1 Cor 15:10), but even when he contemplates with satisfaction his preaching the gospel "from Jerusalem and as far round as Illyricum" (Rom 15:19), he claims no credit for himself but for Christ working through him. In himself he is a cheap, expendable earthenware vessel, but to that vessel the surpassing treasure of the gospel has been entrusted "to show that the transcendent power belongs to God" and not to Paul or any of his fellow preachers (2 Cor 4:7; see Power).

If he was a hero to Luke, Paul was no hero in his own eyes. In his letters he is too often the prey of conflicting emotions, "fightings without and fears within" (2 Cor 7:5). He confesses that he has neither the self-assurance nor the self-assertiveness of some of his rivals—of those intruders, for example, who tried to supplant his authority in the church of Corinth. Those intruders may exploit his converts, while he himself hesitates to claim his rights among them as their spiritual father, and some of them despise him for his "weakness"* (2 Cor 10:1—12:13). At times indeed he did assert his authority, although the reader of his letters may suspect (as some of his converts realized) that he found it easier to do this by letter from a distance than in words spoken face to face. The side of Paul shown in Acts is the side that can readily assert authority, the charismatic person of power. But Paul was a many-sided personality, and his letters expose many other sides than that shown in Acts. The most revealing side disclosed in the letters is probably that which says, "I will all the more gladly boast of my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. For the sake of Christ, then, I am content with weaknesses, insult, hardships, persecutions and calamities; for when I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor 12:9-10).

2. Paul's Career.

2.1. Family and Citizenship. Paul was born into a religiously observant Jewish family of Tarsus in Cilicia, apparently in the first decade of the first century A.D. According to Jerome (Vir. 5), his family came from Gischala in Galilee (see Jew, Paul the). It traced its descent from the tribe of Benjamin, and Paul was given the name Saul, borne by the most illustrious member of that tribe in history—Saul, the first king of Israel. The name Paul, by which he is commonly called, was part of his triple name as a Roman citizen (see Citizenship): it is the Roman cognomen Paullus.

It is not known for how many generations the family had lived in Tarsus, but the family business of tentmaking* (or perhaps, more generally, leatherworking) evidently prospered. Paul was born a citizen of Tarsus—"a citizen of no mean city," in his own words (Acts 21:39)—and this implied a certain level of wealth. The property qualification for Tarsian citizenship was 500 drachmae (Dio Chrysostom Or. 34.23). In addition to the wealth requirement, the practice of Judaism must have been a further obstacle in the successful quest for citizenship. If the citizens of Tarsus were organized into tribes, like the citizens of many Hellenistic cities, membership of such a tribe involved practices which Jews would have found offensive; possibly the Jewish citizens of Tarsus were enrolled in a tribe of their own, though there is no positive evidence for this.

But much more important than the family's possession of Tarsian citizenship was its acquisition of Roman citizenship—an honor rarely granted to provincials. Paul inherited Roman citizenship at birth: his father or grandfather may have been so honored for conspicuous services rendered to a military proconsul such as Pompey or Antony. Paul would have been registered as a Roman citizen by his father at the public record office in Tarsus. Roman citizenship carried with it several privileges of which Paul was able to avail himself during his career—the right to a fair trial, for example, exemption from degrading penalties like scourging, and most notably the right to appeal from the jurisdiction of a lower court to that of the emperor of Rome* (Acts 16:37; 22:25; 25:11).

2.2. Education at Jerusalem. Although he was born in a Greek center of culture, it was not in any of the schools of Tarsus that Paul was educated. It was probably at a later stage that he acquired the measure of literary knowledge and Stoic thought (see Philosophy) that is attested in his writings and speeches. By his own account he was educated according to his ancestral traditions, surpassing many of his contemporaries in the study and practice of Judaism (Gal 1:14). In his Jerusalem speech of Acts 22:3 he says more precisely that, while born in Tarsus, he was brought up in Jerusalem* and "trained in the school of Gamaliel according to the strict interpretation of our ancestral law."

Gamaliel, a leading Jewish teacher of his day, is said by later tradition to have been head of the rabbinical school founded by Hillel, c. 10 B.C., if not indeed a member of Hillel's family. But the earliest traditions which reflect some direct memory of Gamaliel and his teaching do not associate him with the school of Hillel; they speak rather of others as belonging to the school of Gamaliel, as though he founded a school of his own. Even if Gamaliel was a follower of Hillel, however, it would not follow that Paul was a Hillelite. Paul's writings do not yield sufficient evidence to show certainty whether, before he became a Christian, he was a Hillelite or an adherent of the rival school of Shammai. His statement that anyone who submits to circumcision* "is bound to keep the whole Law*" (Gal 5:3) might be thought to reflect the stricter Shammaite doctrine, but such a conclusion cannot safely be drawn from a statement made in a polemical context. His zeal as a persecutor of the church presents a sharp contrast to the temporizing policy advocated by Gamaliel in Acts 5:34-39, but the explanation may simply be that Paul saw more clearly than Gamaliel the serious implications of the Christian movement for the life and health of Judaism.

2.3. Persecutor of the Church. According to his letters and to Acts, Paul was an active persecutor of the church before he became a Christian. He assaulted the infant church with the utmost violence in his attempt to destroy it (Gal 1:13). This was the negative aspect of his zeal for the Law and traditions of Israel, which perhaps found a positive outlet in the proselytization of Gentiles. His words, "If I . . . still preach circumcision, why am I still persecuted?" (Gal 5:11), have been thought to point in that direction.

When he says that he "persecuted the church of God" (1 Cor 15:9), it is natural to think primarily of the Jerusalem* church. The "church of God" would hardly have been found as a recognizable body anywhere else than in Jerusalem in the first two or three years after the resurrection of Christ. This is plainly attested by the record of Acts, which describes him as "entering into houses, dragging out men and women and committing them to prison" (Acts 8:3), and, when the persecution led to dispersal, harrying the refugees even beyond the frontiers of the province of Judea. Reading between the lines, one can infer that "Hellenists" (see Hellenism) rather than "Hebrews" (cf. Acts 6:1) were the principal targets for this attack. The apostles remained unscathed in Jerusalem (Acts 8:2).

2.4. Call to Apostleship. It was while Paul was on his way to Damascus, armed with the high priest's commission, to round up some who had sought refuge from the persecution there, that he was confronted by the risen and exalted Christ,* turned right around in his tracks and called to be Christ's ambassador to the Gentile world (see Conversion and Call of Paul). This personal encounter with Christ determined the whole course of Paul's subsequent thought and action.

Until that moment Paul had taken it as axiomatic that one who had died the death (see Crucifixion) on which the divine curse* was pronounced by the Law (Deut 21:23) could not be the Messiah, the elect one of God,* as his followers claimed. Their claim was blasphemous. But now their claim was manifestly true. He had seen and heard Jesus, the crucified one, alive and glorified (see Glory, Glorification). But it was his devotion to the Law that had made him such a zealous persecutor—that is, as he now realized, his devotion to the Law had led him into the most sinful course of all: he had been fighting against God, his Son (see Son of God) and his people. The Law had done nothing to show him the sinfulness of his course. The Law had proved itself bankrupt. But Christ, whose grace wiped out his guilt and empowered him to be his special envoy, displaced the Law's former centrality in Paul's life. For him, henceforth, "to live was Christ" (Phil 1:21). It was then that Paul first knew himself to be set right with God through the redemptive act of Christ and not through his own works of righteousness (see Works of the Law). The very death which incurred the curse of God turned out to be the deliverance of the people of Christ from the curse of a broken Law (Gal 3:10-14).

2.5. Apostle to the Gentiles. Paul quickly responded to his call to evangelize the Gentiles by traveling to the nearby territory of the Nabatean Arabs, where his activity seems to have aroused the hostility of the authorities (Gal 1:17; 2 Cor 11:32-33). From there he returned to Damascus and then went up to Jerusalem to visit Peter.* He also met James,* the Lord's brother, all the other apostles being evidently absent from Jerusalem. It was doubtless during this visit that Paul learned how Jesus had appeared in resurrection* to Peter and James, as he records in 1 Corinthians 15:5, 7. They in turn would hear how he himself had met the risen one.

After two weeks he returned to his native Tarsus and spent several years in the united province of Syria and Cilicia, actively propagating the faith he had once endeavored to root out (Gal 1:21-24). While he was thus engaged, he was invited by Barnabas* to join him in directing the new forward movement which had recently been launched in Antioch* on the Orontes, where Gentiles in large numbers were making a positive response to the gospel (Acts 11:19-26).

Paul claimed to be an "apostle* of Jesus Christ"; where necessary, he insisted on this designation. But in what sense was he an apostle? The term is used in a variety of ways in the New Testament: Luke, for his part, generally confines it to the Twelve (with Matthias replacing Judas Iscariot). If a qualification for apostleship was to have remained in Jesus' company throughout his public ministry (Acts 1:21-22), then Paul did not satisfy that qualification. In one section of his narrative (Acts 14:4, 14) Luke uses the plural "apostles" of Barnabas and Paul together; this usage may have been taken over from his source at this point. Otherwise, he does not call Paul an apostle. Paul may very well have recognized Barnabas as an apostle. By "those who were apostles before me" (Gal 1:17) he probably means the Twelve; but he almost certainly looks on James, the Lord's brother, as an apostle (Gal 1:19), together with "all the apostles" who saw the risen Lord in sequence from James (1 Cor 15:7) and who seem to be distinct from the Twelve, mentioned along with Peter in 1 Corinthians 15:5. When he speaks of Andronicus and Junia, whose faith in Christ antedated his own, as "of note among the apostles" (Rom 16:7), he probably means that they were apostles themselves. (The "apostles," or envoys of the churches, mentioned in 2 Cor 8:23, are in quite another category.)

If to be an apostle is to have seen the risen Lord and to have been called and commissioned by him to be his witness and messenger, then Paul was preeminently an apostle of Jesus Christ, accredited as such by the apostolic "signs" which attended his ministry (1 Cor 9:1-2; 2 Cor 12:12). Paul was called and commissioned to be an apostle to the Gentiles (Rom 11:13; Gal 1:16), and his Gentile apostolate appears to have been acknowledged by the leader of the Jerusalem church (Gal 2:7-8). But there was no other witness at hand when the Lord commissioned him. Anyone who refused to recognize this apostleship could appeal to the absence of independent testimony.

Paul could produce nothing like the credentials of the Twelve. His credentials were the converts he had won and the churches he had planted—more than adequate credentials, in all conscience. He had worked harder and preached more extensively than any of those who had seen the risen Christ before he did; he had planted churches more widely and observed the harvest of the Spirit growing in the lives of those who had turned to Christ through his ministry. It is almost incredible that intruders should invade his own mission field and try to persuade his converts that his apostolic standing was questionable, and that they should even find some to lend them an ear. In such situations Paul's argument was practical: his converts were the last people who could question his apostleship, for they owed their new existence in Christ to his apostolic ministry—they were its seal and guarantee (1 Cor 9:2). But what is important is not the title he held but the work he did. In the light of his achievement Paul can safely rest his case before the bar of history—not to speak of a more august bar which he kept constantly in view, as he set himself to discharge his commission in such a way that the day of Christ would reveal that he had "neither run in vain nor labored in vain" (Phil 2:16).

2.6. Conference at Jerusalem. The church of Antioch, a mainly Gentile church, was not long in being established. Its members showed their quality by sending a sum of money to the mother church in Jerusalem to help it at a time of food scarcity in Judea, appointing Barnabas and Paul to convey the gift (Acts 11:27-30). This may have provided an occasion for the conference described by Paul in Galatians 2:1-10 (see Jerusalem). Barnabas and Paul were received by the leaders of the Jerusalem church, James (the Lord's brother), Peter and John, the three so-called pillars. It was agreed that Barnabas and Paul should continue to concentrate on the Gentile mission, while the Jerusalem leaders would devote themselves to gospel witness among Jews. It is not implied that two different versions of the gospel were involved: Paul laid his Law-free gospel before the Jerusalem leaders, and they evidently found it acceptable. The difference lay rather in the two mission fields and in the presentation of the message. The agreement concealed several ambiguities, and these might lead to tension if full confidence were not maintained between the two sides. At the request of the Jerusalem leaders, Barnabas and Paul undertook to remember the poor (see Riches and Poverty) in the mother church—an undertaking which Paul took very seriously.

2.7. With Barnabas in Cyprus and Anatolia. On returning to Antioch, Barnabas and Paul were released by the church there to embark on a missionary campaign which took them to Cyprus and then to central Anatolia—to the Pisidian, Phrygian and Lycaonian regions of the Roman province of Galatia. The churches planted in the course of this mission in the cities of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe are probably among the "churches of Galatia" addressed in Paul's letter to the Galatians.

The historicity of this campaign has been questioned: it has been interpreted as a "model journey," setting forth the way in which Luke conceived that a missionary campaign should be conducted, including the way in which the gospel should be presented both to a synagogue congregation, as in Paul's address at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16-41), and to a pagan audience, as in Barnabas and Paul's confronting the idolatrous Lystrans with the revelation of the true God in his works of creation and providence (Acts 14:15-17). But the details of the journey, when examined in the light of historical geography, make a strong impression of factual truth. There is, moreover, a marked similarity between the missionaries' remonstrance against idolatry at Lystra and Paul's reminder to the Thessalonian Christians of how they had "turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God" (1 Thess 1:9; see Idolatry).

2.8. Terms of Gentile Admission to the Church. When Barnabas and Paul returned to Antioch on the Orontes, they found themselves before long involved in controversy. The agreement recently concluded at Jerusalem was perhaps understood differently by the two parties. Paul apparently soon began to feel that its spirit was not being observed by the Jerusalem leaders. There was a clash between him and Peter at Antioch, when Peter was spending some time with the church there. To begin with, Peter ate quite freely with the Gentile Christians, but some messengers from James in Jerusalem persuaded him to change his ways and withdraw from table fellowship with Gentiles. In Paul's eyes the implications of Peter's conduct threatened the foundations of the gospel of grace. But other Jewish Christians in Antioch, including even Barnabas, sided with Peter, and Antioch could no longer provide Paul with a base for his missionary activity.

A disagreement on this scale, affecting the unity of the church and indeed the very nature of the gospel, could not be left unresolved: Peter himself, we may be sure, was not happy with the embarrassing situation in which he was placed. A meeting of the Jerusalem apostles and elders, commonly called the Council of Jerusalem, was convened to consider the issue, and observers from the church of Antioch were invited to attend. Those members of the Jerusalem church who maintained that Gentile converts should be circumcised and submit to Mosaic Law were given an opportunity to express their views, but the apostles and elders resolved that no such conditions should be imposed—that Gentile Christians should simply be required to abstain from eating blood or the flesh of animals sacrificed to pagan divinities (see Food), and from fornication, including perhaps marital unions within bounds forbidden by Jewish rules (Acts 15:23-29). If Gentile Christians agreed to those terms, the barrier to table fellowship would be removed; and most of them agreed very readily.

Peter must certainly have welcomed this resolution of the dilemma. When Paul, however, was later consulted by his converts at Corinth about the eating of meat sacrificed to idols, he replied that eating such meat was harmless unless it violated one's own conscience* or scandalized a fellow Christian. As for the ban on fornication, Paul agreed that fornication (see Sexuality) contravened the order of creation and frustrated the purpose of God in creating the human race male and female (see Man and Woman).

2.9. In Macedonia and Achaia. One of the messengers chosen by the Jerusalem church to convey the findings of the Council to the Gentile churches of Syria and Cilicia was Silas or Silvanus, in whom Paul found a congenial companion. He invited him to join him in a missionary expedition to the west. Traveling by land through Asia Minor, they first visited the churches which Paul and Barnabas had planted a few years earlier. At Lystra Paul found Timothy, a young convert of his, whom he invited to accompany him; Timothy became his devoted and lifelong lieutenant (see Coworkers). Their westward journey would have taken them to Ephesus, which may have been Paul's goal, but they were diverted from this course in circumstances which they recognized to be tokens of the Holy Spirit's (see Holy Spirit) guidance, and proceeded in a northwest direction until they reached the Aegean Sea at Alexandria Troas. There they took ship for Neapolis in Macedonia.

In Macedonia they preached the gospel and planted churches in three cities, Philippi, Thessalonica and Berea; but after a short stay in each they were forced to leave when riotous demonstrations had been stirred up against them—in Philippi because of their alleged interference with citizens' property rights and in the other cities through the activity of opponents within the Jewish community.

Philippi (see Philippians) and Thessalonica (see Thessalonians) stood on the great Egnatian Way, linking the Aegean with the Adriatic; and Paul may have thought of going on to its western terminus and crossing over to Italy. This would have been one of the many occasions when he planned to visit Rome (as he tells the Roman Christians in Rom 1:13). If so, his inability to continue farther west was providentially ordered, for had he gone on he would have met Jews (including Jewish Christians) traveling east because of Claudius's expulsion edict of A.D. 49 (see Acts 18:2). As it was, Paul had to turn off the Egnatian Way, and soon found himself compelled to leave Macedonia altogether. He was taken away from Berea for his own safety by his friends in that city and, after a short stay in Athens, proceeded to Corinth.

Paul's brief mission in Macedonia proved in fact to have been amazingly successful; the churches of Macedonia gave him much cause for encouragement and thanksgiving. But at the time the Macedonian venture must have seemed a failure, in spite of the clear signs of divine guidance which led him and his colleagues to undertake it. He left Macedonia in deep depression and arrived in Corinth, as he confessed, "in weakness and fear and much trembling" (1 Cor 2:3). If Macedonia had shown itself so unwelcoming, Corinth would surely be more so: its public reputation promised no receptive soil for the gospel seed. But nevertheless Paul was able to spend eighteen months in Corinth, preaching the gospel and building up the church, with no serious molestation (see Corinthians).

Here Paul met Priscilla and Aquila, a married couple who had left Rome when Claudius expelled the Jews of the city. In them he found helpful and devoted friends for life (cf. Rom 16:3-5).

One serious attempt was made to put an end to Paul's activity during his Corinthian ministry. Some Jewish leader in the city charged him before Gallio, lately arrived as proconsul of the province of Achaia, of propagating a form of religion not authorized by Roman law. A decision by so authoritative an imperial officer would have much greater weight than a ruling by a city magistrate. Had Gallio sustained the charge, the progress of the gospel would have been impeded not only in Achaia but elsewhere throughout the empire. Having heard the charge, however, he concluded that it involved a dispute about interpretations of the Jewish Law and refused to take it up. Negative as Gallio's action was, it worked to Paul's advantage: he continued his work unhindered.

The mention of Gallio in Acts 18:12 provides a fixed point for the chronology of Paul's career. An inscription at Delphi, recording a directive issued by Claudius within the first seven months of A.D. 52, refers to Gallio as recently proconsul of Achaia. The implication is that he became proconsul in the early summer of 51. We know from other sources that because of poor health he did not remain in the office long. Paul's eighteen-month stay in Corinth may safely be dated between the fall of 50 and the spring of 52.

By the time the work in Corinth was finished, Paul had left behind a large and gifted Christian community, although there were times in the following years when he had to regret its deficiency in moral ballast.

2.10. In Ephesus and Proconsular Asia. Paul's next base of operations was the city of Ephesus, in the province of Asia, where he settled for the greater part of three years (see Ephesus). Those years mark one of the most fruitful phases of his whole apostolic ministry. The evangelization of the province was accomplished through the activity of Paul and several of his colleagues. One of these, Epaphras, served as the evangelist of the Lycus valley, where his labors resulted in the founding of churches in Hierapolis, Laodicea and Colossae (Col 1:7-8; 4:12-13).

The work was not accomplished without hazards; some of these are recorded by Luke, and others are alluded to by Paul himself. They may have included one or two of the frequent imprisonments which he mentions in 2 Corinthians 11:23. It is doubtful, however, if any of his prison letters is to be dated during an Ephesian imprisonment. Luke describes in graphic detail the riotous demonstration against Paul and his preaching in the great theater of Ephesus (Acts 19:19-41). Paul's activity was perceived as an economic threat to those tradesmen who depended for their livelihood on the cult of Artemis, the great goddess of the city whose temple was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. But the greatest personal danger which he encountered in those years, toward the end of his Ephesian ministry, is referred to by Paul himself in 2 Corinthians 1:8-10. He speaks of a situation so threatening that death seemed inevitable, and when, against all odds, deliverance finally came, he greeted it as a token of God's power to raise the dead. It has been argued that this perilous occasion was connected with the crisis resulting from the assassination of M. Junius Silanus, in the latter part of A.D. 54. The situation was probably so unfavorable for Paul that an appeal to Caesar, the course which normally lay open to a Roman citizen, would have been counterproductive.

It was almost certainly this experience that brought home to him the likelihood that he would not survive to witness the Lord's Parousia (see Eschatology). In earlier references to the Parousia and the attendant resurrection* he tends to include himself among those who would still be alive then; from now on he tends to include himself rather among those who will be raised from the dead. For the first time, so far as the evidence goes, he considers seriously what his condition will be immediately after death (see Intermediate State): his conclusion, as set out in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10, is that he will not remain in a state of "nakedness" for one moment; he will be "clothed upon" forthwith with the housing even now reserved for him in heaven. By "nakedness" he means the lack of all means of communication with the environment, and for Paul the believer's environment immediately after death is summed up in the words "at home with the Lord" (2 Cor 5:8).

Some Pauline students, notably C. H. Dodd, have envisaged what they describe as Paul's "second conversion" around this time. This is not simply a matter of the shift in eschatological perspective just mentioned: Dodd draws attention to a change of temper in the later letters. Paul is less sharp in his polemic, less insistent on his status, more relaxed in his attitude toward those fellow Christians who tried to make his apostolic task more difficult than it need be. The contrast has often been pointed out between Paul's unrestrained denunciation of the intruders in the churches of Galatia (Gal 1:6-9; 5:10, 12) and his charitable reference to those Christian opponents (in Rome, possibly) who thought they could rub salt into his wounds by taking advantage of his imprisonment to preach the gospel the more energetically (Phil 1:15-18). True, the difference in the two situations must not be overlooked, but the change of temper is unmistakable. Whether the change was gradual, or precipitated by some crisis like that described in 2 Corinthians 1:8, cannot be said with confidence. But a passage like Philippians 3:7-16 helps us to "see most clearly what experience had made of this naturally proud, self-assertive, and impatient man" (Dodd, 81).

Another experience which profoundly influenced Paul's attitude to life was one which he dates several years before this, although it is only now—at the end of his Ephesian ministry—that he records it (2 Cor 12:2-10). A mystical experience left him with a physical disability, which he calls a "thorn in the flesh" (see Visions, Ecstatic Experience). Whatever its precise nature was, it evidently threatened to incapacitate him from continuing his apostolic activity, and he prayed three times that it might be taken away. Instead of having his prayer answered, he received the assurance that the grace of Christ would enable him to live with it; in fact, he learned to rejoice in it because it helped him to be more completely reliant on the power* of Christ at work in his weakness.*

2.11. The Collection for Jerusalem. Toward the end of his Ephesian ministry Paul was busily engaged in organizing in the churches he had planted east and west of the Aegean a collection for the relief of the chronic poverty of the Jerusalem church (see Collection for the Saints). On the occasion when he and Barnabas met James, Peter and John in Jerusalem, those three "pillars" urged on them that they should "remember the poor" in the mother church (Gal 2:10). Paul treated this as a solemn obligation both then and subsequently throughout his ministry. As for this special collection, one impelling force behind it was his strong desire to bind the Gentile churches and the Jerusalem church more closely together. The Gentile churches probably imagined that they could get along quite well without Jerusalem, and many members of the Jerusalem church looked with serious misgivings on Paul's preaching of a Law-free gospel and on the Gentile churches founded on the basis of that preaching. If a bond of gratitude, confidence and love* could be forged between Jerusalem and the churches of his own mission field, Paul would feel that his ministry had been truly worthwhile. A generous gift would persuade the mother church that the Gentile's commitment to the gospel was genuine and practical. So he urged his converts by letter and, where practicable, by personal visits to give as generously as possible to this good cause. He also encouraged a spirit of competition when, for example, he depicted the Macedonian churches' sacrificial generosity in glowing terms to the Corinthians, and praised the Corinthians' prompt response to the Macedonians.

In Paul's eyes, moreover, the delivery of the collection in Jerusalem would be the climax of his apostolic service thus far, the visible sign of that "offering of the Gentiles" which he planned to present to God in Jerusalem as the crown of his "priestly service" (Rom 15:16). He hoped to consummate his thanksgiving for the past and his dedication for the future by an act of worship* in the Temple, where the Lord had appeared to him many years before and sent him "far away to the Gentiles" (Acts 22:21).

2.12. Arrest in Jerusalem; Trial in Caesarea; Journey to Rome. After his long and fruitful ministry in the province of Asia Paul revisited the churches of Macedonia and Achaia. He and some of his colleagues, especially Titus, helped them to complete their contributions to the collection. It was probably at this time, too, that he traveled west along the Egnatian Way and turned north in the direction of Illyricum (Rom 15:19).

After spending the winter of 56-57 in Corinth he set sail for Judea in company with representatives of the Gentile churches appointed to carry their churches' contributions to Jerusalem. The presence of these men, Paul hoped, would be a further witness to the Jerusalem church of the divine blessing on his Gentile mission. But Paul's final visit to Jerusalem turned out disastrously. In the Temple precincts he was set upon by some of his old enemies from proconsular Asia who accused him of sacrilege (polluting the sacred area by bringing Gentiles into it). He was taken into custody by the commander of the Roman garrison in the Antonia fortress and sent to Caesarea to stand trial before the procurator Felix. After two years' procrastination on the part of his detainers, he exercised the privilege of a Roman citizen and appealed to have his case transferred to the hearing of the emperor in Rome (see Emperors), and was sent there to have his appeal dealt with. After two years under house arrest in Rome, he was summoned to appear before the supreme court when at last his case came up for hearing. What the outcome was cannot be determined with certainty. The record of Acts comes to an end just before the hearing. Paul's letter to the Philippians, written apparently when court proceedings were imminent, shows that he was equally prepared for a favorable or unfavorable outcome—acquittal (followed by liberty for further ministry) or conviction (followed by execution)—although he thought it more probable that he would be acquitted.

That he was in fact acquitted and eventually realized his hope of preaching the gospel in Spain is assumed or implied by several writers from Clement of Rome onward (Clement does not actually mention Spain, but it is difficult to see what else he could have meant by "the limit of the west" which, in 1 Clement 5.7, he says that Paul reached before he was "taken up into the holy place"). But it is not clear that any of these had firm evidence for this belief, other than an inference from Romans 15:23-29, where Paul speaks of his plan, after the delivery of the Jerusalem relief fund, to begin the evangelization of Spain and to visit Rome on the way.

There is a tradition (accepted by Eusebius and Jerome) that after being acquitted when his appeal was heard, Paul was arrested again and subjected to the more rigorous imprisonment and trial in Rome to which reference is made in 2 Timothy 1:16-18; 4:16-18. There was no acquittal this time; he was convicted and beheaded with the sword at the third milestone on the Ostian Way, at a place called Aquae Salviae, and buried on the site covered by the basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls—a probably authentic location. These last proceedings against him may well have been an incident in Nero's proceedings against Christians about A.D. 65.

Chronological Table.

c. 33	Call to apostleship; mission in Arabia (Gal 1:15-17)
35	Short visit to Jerusalem (Gal 1:18-20)
35-45	In Cilicia, Syria, Antioch
46	Conference with "pillars" in Jerusalem (Gal 2:1-10); famine relief delivered from Antioch (Acts 11:27-30)
47-48	Paul and Barnabas in Cyprus and Anatolia (Acts 13:4—14:28)
48/49	Council of Jerusalem; apostolic decree (Acts 15:6-29)
49-51/52	Paul and Silas/Silvanus in Macedonia and Achaia; churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea and Corinth planted (Acts 16:9—18:18)
51/52	Paul's hasty visit to Jerusalem, Antioch and Anatolia
52-55	Paul in Ephesus (Acts 19:1—20:1)
55-57	Paul in Macedonia, Illyricum and Corinth (Rom 15:19; 16:23)
57	Last visit to Jerusalem; arrest and loss of liberty (Acts 21:17—23:35)
57-59	Imprisonment in Caesarea (Acts 23:35—26:32)
59-60	Journey to Italy (Acts 27:1—28:15)
60-62	House arrest in Rome (Acts 28:16-31)
? 62	Paul's hearing before Caesar
64	Great fire of Rome
? 65	Death of Paul

3. Paul's Missionary Policy and Message.

Paul's missionary policy (see Mission) was to win as much of the Gentile world for Christ as was possible within his lifetime, and when it began to be evident that the task would not be completed within his lifetime he tried—not without success, it appears—to bring the Christian community of Rome to share his vision (see Romans).

3.1. The Mission of the Apostle. The carrying out of this policy did not require the presentation of the gospel to every individual in the areas which he evangelized; it did require the planting of local churches to serve as self-propagating cells in those areas (see Church). His plan involved pioneer evangelism, preaching the gospel, as he said, "not where Christ has already been named" (Rom 15:20-21), but laying the foundation himself.

A combination of strategic planning and responsiveness to divine guidance was called for. The whole enterprise was undertaken "by the power of the Holy Spirit" (Rom 15:19), and the Spirit's guidance was experienced at special junctures, as when his steps were diverted from the westward road to Ephesus and directed toward Troas and so to Macedonia (Acts 16:6-10). Paul may have discerned the Spirit's overruling, too, in the repeated obstacles placed in the way of his plan to visit Rome up to the time of his writing to the church of that city (Rom 1:13; 15:22). On the other hand, he discerned supernatural interference from a different source at times: "Satan* hindered us" is his explanation of the factors which prevented him from returning to Thessalonica after his forced and hasty departure from it (1 Thess 2:18).

When he wrote to the Roman Christians, he regarded his work east and west of the Aegean as completed: "I no longer have any room for work in these regions" (Rom 15:23).

His achievement during those years, as "from Jerusalem and as far round as Illyricum" he "fully preached the gospel of Christ" (Rom 15:19), is impressive on any showing. As R. Allen has put it, in A.D. 47 there were no churches in the provinces of Galatia, Asia, Macedonia and Achaia. Now, ten years later, these four provinces had been evangelized so thoroughly that Paul could speak of his work in that part of the world as done, and he was planning to repeat a similar program in the Western Mediterranean.

Paul's evangelistic work was thus extensive rather than intensive. He concentrated on the principal cities situated along the main roads, assisted at times by colleagues working either in those cities or in neighboring ones. During his Ephesian ministry, for example, his colleagues worked in outlying parts of the province of Asia (like Epaphras in the Lycus valley), while he himself was active in Ephesus, so that "all the residents of (proconsular) Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks" (Acts 19:10).

3.2. The Mission of the Churches. The local churches planted by Paul throughout these provinces may have preserved some family likeness to the synagogue although, being based on a Law-free gospel, they were separate from the synagogue. In some measure they resembled other private associations for religious or charitable purposes, attested in various parts of the Hellenistic world (see Social Setting). But Paul maintained a continuing pastoral care for them, for his aim was that each church should be an extension of his apostolic ministry. Once he had established a church and given it basic teaching, his hope was that he could pass on to another place in the confidence that it would take up his gospel witness and spread the message. Thus, only a few weeks after he left Thessalonica, he could praise the young church he had left behind there because, as he said, "not only has the word of the Lord* sounded forth from you in Macedonia and Achaia, but your faith in God has gone forth everywhere" (1 Thess 1:8).

Such a church was not encouraged to think of itself as "a garden walled around," mainly concerned to prevent any encroachment by the surrounding wilderness; rather, it was its business to take over more and more of the surrounding wilderness.

The Roman world had to be evangelized as soon as possible. The time was limited. Paul knew himself to be the Lord's special agent in the enterprise. His was not the only mission to the Gentiles, but he "worked harder than any of them" (1 Cor 15:10). He might not live to finish the task, but he would do as much as he could while he could, planting one "colony of heaven" (Phil 3:20) after another, so that in every area within the apostolic sphere allotted to him Christ might be represented, proclaimed and glorified. The churches were to "shine as lights in the world" (Phil 2:15); thus an ever-increasing number of people would come to see "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ" (2 Cor 4:4).

3.3. Apostolic Authority and the Churches. The Pauline churches do not appear to have been linked together in any formal or visible organization (see Church Order). Paul was their founding apostle, and it was through his apostolic authority that the authority of Christ, the Lord of all the churches, was conveyed to them and accepted by them. But the one example of anything that could be called organization among Paul's churches is his organizing of the relief fund for the poor of the Jerusalem church (1 Cor 16:1-4, etc.). The care and practical wisdom which are so manifest in the organization of the relief might have been exercised in organizing the life and administration of individual churches, or of groups of churches. But Paul evidently was little concerned about this kind of organization. He was concerned, indeed, that in each of his churches there should be some members who were qualified to provide spiritual guidance for the others. He preferred to let such an aptitude develop and become apparent in the course of time (weeks or months rather than years). And if he thought that a church was slow in recognizing the qualities of leadership in this person or that, he would draw attention to them. The church of Corinth is urged, for example, to take note of the household of Stephanus, who "have devoted themselves to the service of the saints," and to "be subject to such people and to every fellow worker and laborer" (1 Cor 16:15-16).

The Corinthian Christians were perhaps impatient of anything in the nature of authority.* In the church of Philippi, on the other hand, an orderly administration of "overseers (bishops) and deacons" was established within ten or twelve years from its foundation (Phil 1:1). But even in writing to the Philippian church Paul can recommend a man like Epaphroditus as specially worthy of honor because of his self-sacrificing devotion to the work of Christ (Phil 2:29-30).

The Pauline churches tended naturally to have features in common, but no attempt was made to impose conformity by regulation. Paul deprecated one of his churches for stepping completely out of line with the others; but if it insisted on doing so, all he could say was, "If any one is disposed to be contentious, we recognize no other practice, nor do the churches of God" (1 Cor 11:16)—in other words, if there are those who are determined to be out of step, let them recognize that that is what they are.

Individual members might in an extreme case be excommunicated from the local fellowship (see Discipline), like the incestuous man at Corinth whose public life subverted the ethics of the gospel and brought the Christian name into disrepute in a permissive pagan city—though even so this drastic measure was designed for his ultimate salvation (1 Cor 5:5). But there was no means of unchurching a church—not that Paul would have contemplated such a self-defeating thing as the disowning of a group of his own spiritual children, the "seal" of his "apostleship in the Lord" (1 Cor 4:14-16; 9:2).

In all these things, discipline, administration and others, the presence and directive power of the Holy Spirit* were so real to Paul that he implies them even where he does not explicitly mention them. If he did not trust his converts, corporately or individually, to advance along the lines he laid down for them, his "ways in Christ" (1 Cor 4:17), he trusted the Holy Spirit to work in his converts.

The Pauline communities were thus equipped to carry on his ministry in the world. They were not debarred by food restrictions or the observance of sacred days from sharing meals or other forms of social fellowship with their pagan neighbors (1 Cor 10:27-30; see Food). Only unambiguous idolatry or sexual immorality were barred. Not by segregation but by participation could they most effectively shine among their neighbors "as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life" (Phil 2:15-16).

3.4. Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Baptism* and the Lord's Supper (see Lord's Supper) were two primitive institutions in the church which Paul "received" from those who were in Christ before him and which he perpetuated in the churches of his own founding.

Baptism was initiatory. It might have been inferred from Jesus' words to the apostles, "John baptized with water, but . . . you shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 1:5; 11:16), that baptism in water would be superseded by baptism in the Spirit; but in fact it turned out otherwise. Baptism in water acquired a new significance from its association with the gift of the Spirit. "In one Spirit," Paul reminds his Corinthian converts, "we were all baptized into one body, . . . and we were all watered (epotisthēmen) with one Spirit" (1 Cor 12:13). Baptism is no individual experience: "All of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death, . . . so that . . . we too might walk in newness of life" (Rom 6:3-4); "as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ; . . . for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:27-28). To be baptized in the Christian sense involves becoming a member of Christ corporate—through the Spirit sharing the life of the exalted Christ together with all others who are united with him by faith.*

Paul might not have left us his understanding of the Lord's Supper if his converts, more particularly in Corinth, had not conducted themselves at times in such a way as to give the lie to its significance. It was a meal in which they celebrated from time to time their fellowship with Christ and with one another. But those members of the church who ostensibly participated in Christ at "the table of the Lord" and also felt free to share a meal in a pagan temple, under the patronage of the divinity worshipped there, effectively denied their Christian profession (1 Cor 10:14-22). So too, those who ostensibly celebrated their fellowship with their brothers and sisters in Christ at the common memorial meal but acted uncharitably or inconsiderately toward some of them, especially the poorer or underprivileged, were "guilty of profaning the body and blood of the Lord" and brought judgment, not blessing, on themselves by their eating and drinking (1 Cor 11:17-32).

Neither baptism nor the Lord's Supper serves as a supernatural prophylactic against divine judgment,* somehow counteracting the law of sowing and reaping. They signify and seal God's pardoning grace, with its ethical implications in believers' lives; those who think that they stand firm must therefore take heed lest they fall (1 Cor 10:11).

4. Paul's Abiding Influence.

4.1. In the Early Centuries. Paul was venerated as a saint, apostle and martyr throughout most of the church after his death. There were indeed some judaizing traditions which execrated his memory—those, for example, whose influence can be traced in the pseudo-Clementine literature of the third and fourth centuries—but they did not affect the main stream of Christian thought (see Paul in Early Church Tradition).

The Roman church laid a special claim to him because it was in Rome that he spent his closing days and consummated his apostolic career in martyrdom. His funerary monument on the Ostian Way was pointed out with some pride by Roman Christians toward the end of the second century as though it enhanced the apostolic authority of their church. Indeed, Paul was accorded the honor of being joint-founder, along with Peter, of the Roman church—an honor which Paul himself would have deprecated. And nearly all the churches with which he is associated in the NT record made the most of that association (only in Ephesus did his name tend to be overshadowed by that of "John, the disciple of the Lord").

But while Paul's memory was revered, his message was to a large degree simply not comprehended. To know oneself to be freely justified by the grace of God and to rejoice in the liberty of the Spirit were experiences enjoyed by all too few Christians in the post-Pauline generations. Ignatius of Antioch did not enjoy them, as he hoped that his final acceptance with God would be secure when his bones were crunched by the teeth of the wild beasts. On his more pedestrian level Hermas did not enjoy them, as he anxiously feared that by some misdemeanor or other he might have irretrievably forfeited the divine forgiveness.

Paul's Law-free gospel does not readily commend itself to many religious people who prefer to direct their lives, and the lives of others, by rules and regulations. So he was domesticated: the apostle who spoke so "dangerously" (as some thought) of freedom from the Law was transformed into a moralist, not to say a legalist. Until the end of the second century the one man known to us who understood what Paul meant by freedom from the Law was Marcion—and, in Harnack's words, "even in his understanding he misunderstood him" (History of Dogma I [London, 1894], 89). Marcion's heresy consisted largely in his pressing Paul's antithesis between grace and Law to what he judged to be its logical conclusion, to the point where the OT, together with the God revealed in the OT, was dismissed as irrelevant to the gospel of Christ, the revealer of the hitherto unknown Father. Because of his heresy, Marcion was unable to transmit his insight into Paul's message to the Christian world: Marcion's teaching was repudiated in toto.

Marcion refused to undergird the ethics of the gospel with legal sanctions. When Christian moralists like Tertullian, writing a couple of generations after Marcion's death, asked rhetorically why Christians might not, in the absence of such sanctions, abandon themselves to an extravaganza of sin, Marcion's only answer was "God forbid!" (absit)—an answer on which Tertullian poured scorn (Marc. 1.27). It is plain that here Marcion was echoing Paul's indignant question, "Are we to sin because we are not under Law but under grace?" and reacting with the Pauline answer "God forbid!" (Rom 6:15). Perhaps Tertullian knew this quite well but could not resist the temptation to score a debating point. Even so, his argument invited the retort: "And is your only reason for abstaining from sin your fear of wrath to come?"

It was through the experience and thought of Augustine that an appreciation of Paul's gospel of grace revived in the church. When Augustine, in his friend's garden at Milan, heard a child singing "Tolle, lege!" ("Take up and read!"), it is no accident that it was words of Paul (Rom 13:13-14) that his eyes lighted on, flooding his soul with clear light and dispelling the darkness of doubt (A.D. 386). Others had written about the grace of God before Augustine, but none so fully and systematically and none in such depth. Augustine knew himself, as Paul did, to be the undeserving recipient of divine grace. This appears supremely in his Confessions (397-401) rather than in his more formal treatises on grace, in which at times the logic of his arguments and the demands of systematization threaten to impose limits on the inherently limitless freedom and sovereignty of the grace of God.

Even in the Confessions, however, a non-Pauline note is struck. In the Confessions Augustine has given us perhaps the first great essay in world literature on spiritual introspection. Augustine certainly found Paul speaking eloquently to his own condition, but for this reason there has been an unwarranted tendency to suppose that Paul in his pre-conversion days was prey to the same kind of divided conscience as Augustine. Paul, in fact, gives no hint that he suffered from such an inward conflict. Even while he was actively persecuting the church he maintained a good conscience because he was convinced he was serving God. After his conversion, indeed, when he realized the sinfulness of the course he had been pursuing, he magnified the grace of God which had pardoned him and called him to be an apostle (see Stendahl, 78-96). So Augustine's transmission of the doctrine of grace to the Middle Ages was Pauline in part but not in purity.

4.2. In the Later Centuries. On the theological side, the sixteenth-century Reformation in Europe marked an unprecedented revival of the Pauline message, or at least of one important aspect of it. Martin Luther tells how he was frustrated in his attempt to grasp the argument of Romans by the expression "the righteousness of God" (Rom 1:17). This he took to mean "the righteousness whereby God is righteous and acts righteously in punishing the unrighteous." But when, with further study of Scripture, he "grasped the truth that the righteousness of God is that righteousness whereby, through grace and sheer mercy, he justifies us by faith," then, he says, "I felt myself to be reborn and to have gone through open doors into paradise" (Luther's Works, American edition 34 [Philadelphia, 1960], 336-37). As K. Stendahl points out, Luther, like Augustine, found relief from an inner conflict in Paul's message. Luther's conflict was spiritual whereas Augustine's was moral, and in neither respect did they reproduce an experience of Paul's, but God's justifying grace speaks to the widest variety of human conditions.

It may be that Luther's understanding of justification by faith took insufficient account of other aspects of the believer's participation in Christ, including the ethical aspects.

Luther's discovery played a full part in the Evangelical Revival of the eighteenth century, although other influences were also at work, so that it proclaimed a more comprehensive version of the gospel of Paul, in which there is an insistence on "scriptural holiness" alongside the acceptance of justification by faith.

The most important of these other influences was a booklet published in Scotland in 1677, The Life of God in the Soul of Man, by Henry Scougal, a discovery and exposition of Paul's understanding of the Christian life as "a union of the soul with God, a real participation of the divine nature, the very image of God drawn upon the soul, or, in the apostle's phrase, it is 'Christ formed within us' (cf. Gal 4:19)."

It was the reading of The Life of God in the Soul of Man that led to George Whitefield's conversion in 1733, and it was another expositor of Paul who precipitated similar experiences in Charles and John Wesley in 1738. Charles was gripped by his first reading of Luther's commentary on Galatians; the words of Galatians 2:20 came home to him with power: "who loved me and gave himself for me." A few days later took place John Wesley's Aldersgate Street experience, when he felt his heart "strangely warmed" as he listened to a reading from Luther's preface to Romans. In his own words, "I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death" (Journal, I, 103). This was Paul's gospel manifesting its abiding vital power in personal life, with profound consequences for social life. It was perhaps the combination of two essential elements in Paulinism—the initial appropriation of God's justifying grace and the progressive work of the Spirit, reproducing the Christlikeness in the believer's life—that gave the evangelical revival such a well-balanced quality: concentration on the one without the other produces a lopsided religion.

One might go on into the twentieth century and recall how Karl Barth, starting to read and expound Romans, felt like a man who, clutching in the dark at a rope for support, finds that he has pulled on a bell-rope and made a noise fit to wake the dead. When the first edition of his Römerbrief appeared in 1918, it fell, said a Catholic theologian, "like a bomb on the theologians' playground" (K. Adam; see Paul and His Interpreters).

The explosive force of this "bomb" was the voice of Paul himself; and in all the forward movements of the Spirit which we have surveyed, and in others too, it has been the voice of the authentic Paul, the Paul of the capital letters, that has sounded out, making effective his perennial message of liberation. Being dead, Paul continues to speak.

See also CHRONOLOGY OF PAUL; JEW, PAUL THE; MISSION; OPPONENTS OF PAUL; PASTOR, PAUL AS; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION; SOCIAL SETTING OF MISSION CHURCHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Allen, Missionary Methods: St. Paul's or Ours? (2d ed.; London: Word Dominion Press, 1930); C. K. Barrett, Essays on Paul (London: SPCK, 1982); J. C. Becker, Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); G. Bornkamm, Paul (New York: Harper & Row, 1971); F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (3d ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. H. Dodd, "The Mind of Paul," in New Testament Studies (Manchester: Manchester University, 1953) 67-128; V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); J. J. Gunther, Paul: Messenger and Exile: A Study in the Chronology of His Life and Letters (Valley Forge: Judson, 1972); R. Jewett, A Chronology of Paul's Life (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); J. Knox, Chapters in a Life of Paul (New York: Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1950); L. de Lorenzi, ed., Paul de Tarse: Apôtre du [sic] Notre Temps (Rome: Abbaye de S. Paul h.l.m., 1979); G. Luedemann, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (London: SCM, 1959); E. P. Sanders, Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, Paul (Oxford: University Press, 1991); H. J. Schoeps, Paul (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961); K. Stendahl, Paul among Jews and Gentiles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); A. Suhl, Paulus und seine Briefe (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1975); F. B. Watson, Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles (SNTSMS 56; Cambridge: University Press, 1986); A. J. M. Wedderburn, ed., Paul and Jesus: Collected Essays (JSNTS 37; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St. Paul (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1964). F. F. Bruce

PAUL IN EARLY CHURCH TRADITION

The question of Paul's place in the traditions of the early church is closely tied to the question of the authorship of the disputed Pauline letters. If Paul is not the author of 2 Thessalonians, or Colossians, or Ephesians, or 1—2 Timothy and Titus, then the study of "Paul in Early Church Tradition" should begin with the apostle Paul as presented in those letters. If he is the author, however, or even if the question of authorship is left open, so that "Paul" is consciously defined as the Paul of the canonical NT, then the study of Paul in early church tradition begins where the canon* ends.

The latter course is the one adopted here. This means that the traditions we are examining are based on a very complex figure. The data include the Paul who speaks in the unquestionably genuine letters, the Paul of the disputed letters and the Paul of the book of Acts (see Paul in Acts and Letters). These diverse images of Paul have shaped the even more diverse images to be found in the ancient church. Even in the NT itself there is evidence that Paul's views were subject to conflicting interpretations, and that a correct understanding of Paul's teaching was already being seen by some writers as a matter of life and death (cf. 2 Pet 3:15-16, where those who distort Paul's writings are said to do so "to their own destruction").

1. The Apostolic Fathers
2. The Marcionite and Ebionite Paul
3. The Ascetic and Gnostic Paul
4. The Orthodox Paul

1. The Apostolic Fathers.

Thus the story of Paul in early church tradition begins with the so-called Apostolic Fathers. Here it is evident that Paul's life and personality made a stronger impact on the next few generations than did his ideas.

1.1. Clement of Rome. Clement of Rome mentions Paul, with Peter,* as a hero who had to contend all his life with "jealousy,"* "envy" and "strife" (1 Clem. 5.2, 5). "Seven times he was in bonds," Clement writes, "he was exiled, he was stoned, he was a herald both in the East and in the West, he gained the noble fame of his faith, he taught justice to the whole world, and when he had reached the limits of the West he gave his testimony before the rulers, and thus passed from the world and was taken up into the Holy Place—the greatest example of endurance" (1 Clem. 5.6-7). Clement later cites Paul as one who wrote "with true inspiration" when he warned against factionalism in his letter to the same Corinthian church to which Clement was now writing (1 Clem. 47.1-5; cf. 1 Cor 1:10-12). Clement's point is that "even then you had made yourselves partisans" (1 Clem. 47.3), but that it was worse now because the Corinthians had become partisans not of apostles or of those of noble reputation (like Paul, Cephas or Apollos,* as in 1 Cor 1:12), but of far lesser figures (1 Clem. 47.4).

1.2. Ignatius. Ignatius, too, saw Paul as a hero. Writing to the Ephesians in imitation of Paul's style, he said, "I am condemned, you have obtained mercy; I am in danger, you are established in safety [cf. 1 Cor 4:10]; you are . . . fellow initiates with Paul, who was sanctified, approved, who gained a good report, who was right blessed, in whose footsteps may I be found when I shall attain to God" (Ignatius Eph. 12.1-2). His admiration of Paul's life was greater than his knowledge of Paul's letters, for he continued that "in every Epistle [Paul] makes mention of you in Christ Jesus" (Ignatius Eph. 12.2). In his letter to the Romans, Ignatius wrote: "I do not order you as did Peter and Paul; they were Apostles, I am a convict; they were free, I am even until now a slave" (Ignatius Rom. 4.3).

1.3. Polycarp. In the same generation as Clement and Ignatius, Polycarp viewed Paul, like the other apostles, as a model of endurance (Polycarp Phil. 9.1) and admitted that "neither am I, nor is any other like me, able to follow the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul, who when he was among you in the presence of the men of that time taught accurately and steadfastly the word of truth, and also when he was absent wrote letters [sic] to you, from the study of which you will be able to build yourselves up into the faith given you" (Polycarp Phil. 3.2). Like Ignatius, Polycarp was eloquent about Paul the man but somewhat vague about the content of his letters (cf. Polycarp Phil. 11.3).

2. The Marcionite and Ebionite Paul.

Ironically, the aspects of Paul's thought which have made the greatest impact in the West since the Reformation—his teachings about the Law* and faith,* and about the salvation* of Jew (see Israel) and Gentile*—were first noted and accented by segments of the church later regarded as heretical. The prime example among those sympathetic with Paul is Marcion, and among those hostile to him the Jewish-Christian Ebionites.

2.1. Marcion. To Marcion, Paul was more than an apostle*; he was the only apostle. Marcion's canon consisted of a collection of Paul's letters plus an expurgated edition of Luke's Gospel. Marcion extended Paul's radical distinction between law and grace (e.g., in Galatians) into a radical gulf between the God* of the Hebrew Bible and the God of Marcion's Christian Bible. Irenaeus charged that for the sake of this distinction Marcion "dismembered the Epistles of Paul, removing all that is said by the apostle respecting that God who made the world, to the effect that He is the Father of our Lord* Jesus Christ,* and also those passages from the prophetical writings which the apostle quotes, in order to teach us that they announced beforehand the coming of the Lord" (Irenaeus Haer. 1.27.2, in ANF 1.352). Thus Marcion appropriated what many later theologians have judged to be the core of Paul's theology (see Center), yet in the process eliminated the nuances and qualifications that have made Paul's thought so complex and challenging to later readers. The judgment of F. Overbeck and A. von Harnack (itself an oversimplification) was that "Marcion was the only one in the second century who understood Paul . . . and he misunderstood him."

2.2. Ebionites. Marcion is not the only one, however, to whom Harnack's judgment applies. To a considerable extent, the Paul of Marcion is also the Paul of the Ebionites, perhaps the second-century descendants of Paul's opponents* in Galatians.* The difference is that Marcion saw Paul in this way and liked what he saw, while the Ebionites emphatically did not. If Paul was to Marcion the supreme true apostle, he was to the Ebionites the supreme false apostle, a messenger of Satan.* They saw him as the enemy of Peter (cf. Gal 2:11-14) and destroyer of the Law of Moses.* In the so-called Kerygmata Petrou (Hennecke-Schneemelcher-Wilson, 2.102-27), Paul was viewed as the one "who first went to the Gentiles," while Peter was "the one who came after him, appearing as light after darkness, as knowledge after ignorance, as healing after sickness. Thus, as the True Prophet told us, first a false gospel must come through a certain deceiver, and then, after the destruction of the holy place, a true gospel must be propagated secretly in order to rectify the existing heresies" (Pseudo-Clementine Homilies 2.17, trans. by Meeks, 180). In the present form of the text Peter's opponent is "Simon" (i.e., Simon Magus), but what is predicated of him makes it clear that this "deceiver" was originally understood to be Paul.

3. The Ascetic and Gnostic Paul.

Paul's statements about the body and the present and future aspects of the resurrection* were embedded in an eschatological framework (see Eschatology) and were written in the concrete situations of his own struggle to articulate the truth of the gospel* in the face of misunderstanding and opposition. Viewed through new paradigms of thought and struggle, the subtleties of the canonical Paul were skewed to support two opposing perspectives.

3.1. The Ascetic Paul. It was the image of Paul in the canonical Acts of the Apostles that provided a foothold for a view of Paul in apocryphal traditions as a traveling preacher and miracle worker (see Apocryphal Pauline Literature). This heroic picture of Paul is similar to that of Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp, except that the apocryphal Paul is seen as a messenger not only of Christ but of the ascetic way of life. This Paul is described in the Acts of Paul and Thecla as "a man small of stature, with a bald head and crooked legs, in a good state of body, with eyebrows meeting and nose somewhat hooked, full of friendliness; for now he appeared like a man, and now he had the face of an angel" (Paul and Thecla 3). He gives to the "house of Onesiphorus" (cf. 2 Tim 1:16; 4:19) his own version of the Beatitudes: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Blessed are they who have kept the flesh pure, for they shall become a temple of God. Blessed are the continent, for to them God will speak. Blessed are they who have renounced this world, for they shall be pleasing to God. Blessed are those who have wives as if they had not [cf. 1 Cor 7:29], for they shall inherit God," and so on (Paul and Thecla 4-5).

In the story of Thecla, conversion to Paul's gospel means that a woman renounces sexual intercourse (see Sexuality, Sexual Ethics) with her husband and is then protected from the anger of her family and miraculously delivered from death by wild beasts. These Acts represent a radicalization of the Paul of 1 Corinthians 7, and on several points stand opposed to the Paul of the Pastoral Letters (e.g., 1 Tim 2:11-15; 4:3; 5:14-15). Yet they agree with the Pastorals in endorsing a future resurrection against those who say that the resurrection "has already taken place in the children whom we have" or "in that we have come to know the true God" (Paul and Thecla 14, Hennecke-Schneemelcher-Wilson, 2.357; cf. 2 Tim 2:18). Far from being excluded, the future resurrection is held out as the reward of the celibate life. Paul's opponents in these stories denounce him as one who "deprives young men of wives and maidens of husbands, saying: 'Otherwise there is no resurrection for you, except ye remain chaste and do not defile the flesh, but keep it pure' " (Paul and Thecla 12; Hennecke-Schneemelcher-Wilson, 2.256).

The ascetic view of Paul was later denounced by church fathers in the East and the West (e.g., Irenaeus, Clement, Hippolytus, Jerome) as the "Encratite" heresy (from the Greek word encrateia, "continence" or "self-control"). Such Pauline passages as Colossians 2:16-23 and 1 Timothy 4:1-5 afforded them a canonical basis for this judgment. The fathers traced the Encratite perspective to Tatian in the mid-second century, whose harmony, or Diatessaron, of the four Gospels became the one Gospel in the canon of Syrian Christianity until the fifth century. Whatever its origin, an ascetic form of Christianity, and therefore an ascetic view of Paul, seems to have characterized the Syriac-speaking churches almost from the beginning.

3.2. The Gnostic Paul. If the Encratites and their opponents alike maintained Paul's expectation of a future resurrection (as expressed, e.g., in 1 Thess 4:13-17 and 1 Cor 15:12-58), there were others in the second century who attributed to Paul the contrary notion that the resurrection had already taken place (the view of his opponents according to 2 Tim 2:18; see Gnosis, Gnosticism). The Valentinian Epistle to Rheginos, building on the Pauline idea that "the Savior swallowed death" (Rheginos 45.15; cf. 1 Cor 15:53-55), cites "the Apostle" (clearly Paul) as having said, "We suffered with him, and we arose with him, and we went to heaven with him" (Rheginos 45.25-28; contrast the future formulations in Rom 6:8; 8:17 and 2 Tim 2:11). Without referring to the actual texts, this tradition extended and expanded on Paul's analogy between Christian baptism* and the death and resurrection of Christ (see Dying and Rising) as developed in Colossians 2:12-13 (cf. Col 3:1) and in Ephesians 2:5-6.

4. The Orthodox Paul.

Whatever the issue at stake, it was the ambiguities and tensions in the teaching of the canonical Paul that gave rise to conflicting interpretations of him in later centuries. The second century was a time in which the church's desire to claim the Jewish Scriptures for its own won out over Marcion's appeal to cut all its ties with the past. Because Paul was an authentic martyr and hero of the faith, and could not be transformed (as the Ebionites had done) into a false apostle, it became necessary to emphasize the positive side of his attitude toward the law of Moses—for example, as a schoolmaster or tutor preparing humanity for the coming of the Christ (Gal 3:23-24, especially in Clement of Alexandria).

4.1. The Law and the Unity of Scripture. Paul's stark contrast between the Law and faith was no longer useful once the mainstream of the church became overwhelmingly Gentile, with nothing more to fear from the requirement of circumcision or detailed legal observance. Instead, distinctions foreign to Paul began to be introduced within the law itself—for example, between the law in its literal and its spiritual sense (Origen), or between the ceremonial law, which the coming of Jesus abolished, and the moral law, which the coming of Jesus confirmed (Tertullian and others). Such distinctions gave a more positive role to the law in the Christian life, and consequently a greater measure of unity between OT and NT in a Gentile church increasingly in need of a canon.

4.2. The Resurrection of the Flesh. On the issue of when the resurrection of believers took place, Paul's dominant emphasis on its futurity (e.g., 1 Thess 4; 1 Cor 15; Rom 8) won out over those texts (e.g., in Rom 6, but above all in Ephesians and Colossians) which applied the language of resurrection to baptism or to present Christian experience in the Spirit (see Eschatology).

As to the nature of that resurrection,* many of the church fathers sought to qualify Paul's accent on discontinuity between the present physical body* and the body that will be raised (cf. 1 Cor 15:35-53). "Flesh* and blood," he had said, "cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither does corruption put on incorruption" (1 Cor 15:50). The Gnostics highlighted this discontinuity in order to emphasize the evil of physical existence in contrast to the spirituality of the resurrection. Origen too accented the discontinuity, but most others, like Irenaeus and Tertullian, were concerned to show that Paul's pronouncement did not exclude an actual physical resurrection. All Paul was saying was that human nature by itself, apart from the work of the Spirit of God (see Holy Spirit), could not enter heaven.* Moreover, the expression "flesh and blood" was given a moral rather than a physical meaning. Irenaeus took it to imply the sinful "works of the flesh" mentioned in Galatians 5:19-21.

Such interpretive strategies, in the face of the threat of Gnosticism and Hellenistic dualism, allowed the church to emphasize continuity rather than discontinuity between present and future existence, and so to speak of the "resurrection of the flesh" (a term Paul had never used). Paul, for his part, had emphasized discontinuity and transcendence in the face of very different kinds of threats, possibly from charismatic perfectionists in Corinth (see Corinthians) who believed they were already in the age to come. For Paul the questions about the time and the nature of the resurrection of believers had been intertwined. Once they became separated, it was inevitable that many of Paul's interpreters would come to a different set of answers.

On some issues, the interpretation of Paul among the church fathers followed no single or simple pattern. For instance, on the alternatives of marriage and celibacy, Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3) maintained the tension so evident in 1 Corinthians 7 by recognizing that Paul had affirmed the legitimacy of both. But as in the case of the law and the resurrection, others came down on one side or another of the tension. New issues that Paul had not faced created new ambiguities and barriers to understanding the Paul of history and of the NT. Such barriers were by no means a problem only for the ancient church and church fathers. They still exist, and still make the study of the apostle Paul a formidable, fascinating challenge (see Hermeneutics/ Interpreting Paul).

See also APOCRYPHAL PAULINE LITERATURE; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; PAUL AND HIS INTERPRETERS; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); E. C. Blackman, Marcion and His Influence (London: SPCK, 1948); E. Hennecke, W. Schneemelcher, and R. McL. Wilson, New Testament Apocrypha II (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965); D. R. MacDonald, The Legend and the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983); W. Meeks, ed., The Writings of St. Paul (New York: Norton, 1972) 151-213; E. Pagels, The Gnostic Paul: Gnostic Exegesis of the Pauline Letters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); A. Souter, The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (Oxford: Clarendon, 1927); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960); C. H. Turner, "Greek Patristic Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles," HDB 5.484-531; H. E. W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth: A Study in the Relations between Orthodoxy and Heresy in the Early Church (London: A. R. Mowbray, 1954); M. F. Wiles, The Divine Apostle: The Interpretation of St. Paul's Epistles in the Early Church (Cambridge: University Press, 1967).

J. R. Michaels

PEACE, RECONCILIATION

Reconciliation is the Pauline concept in which enmity between God* and humanity, or between human groups, is overcome and peaceful relations restored on the basis of the work of Christ* (see Death of Christ). This concept refers to an objective state of peace, not simply a feeling of peacefulness. Although the strictly secular usage is found in 1 Corinthians 7:11, 15, where Paul speaks of peace being restored to a married couple in the case where one is a believer and the other is not, most of his usage of these terms is distinctively theological. Paul depends upon two word groups, often used together; the more important one includes katallagē or katallassō ("reconciliation"), and the other eirēnē and its cognates ("peace"). The fact that the almost exclusive provenance of katallagē and katallassō is Greek secular literature, or literature heavily influenced by the Hellenistic world, makes the Greek milieu foundational to understanding the concept of reconciliation. The Greek terms for reconciliation derive from words for exchange, in which by extension enmity is exchanged for peaceful relations. In confirmation of its Greek background, the words are found only once in the OT outside of the apocrypha (LXX Jer 31:39 [MT 48:39]), and four times in 2 Maccabees (2 Macc 1:5; 5:20; 7:33; 8:29), texts which have no Hebrew antecedent. The relation between Greek eirēnē ("peace") and Hebrew šālôm ("peace") is discussed in more detail in section 3 below.

1. Chief letters
2. Colossians and Ephesians
3. Superscriptions

1. Chief Letters.

Two major passages delimit Paul's thought regarding reconciliation or the establishment of peace between God and humanity.

1.1. 2 Corinthians 5:18-21. In support of his belief that the work of Christ means the coming of a new age (2 Cor 5:16-17), Paul proclaims what God has done through Christ (2 Cor 5:18-21). Some scholars claim that Paul has here supplemented traditional material (i.e., a soteriological credo supplemented by adding "not reckoning against them their trespasses" and "we beg you on Christ's behalf, be reconciled to God"), since this theological section, with its kerygmatic idioms suited to preaching* the gospel,* comes while addressing pastoral problems (Martin, 1981, 93-97; Käsemann 1971). But two objections may be raised. First, this analysis of the letter does not fully appreciate that its body (2 Cor 1:8—9:15) is mainly given over to Paul's discussion of his apostolic ministry (2 Cor 1:12—2:13; 2:14—7:16). Second, this analysis does not affect our understanding of the concept of reconciliation, since the traditional material (especially 2 Cor 5:21) is placed within the larger context of distinctly Pauline language: God's reconciling work is accomplished by or through Christ (2 Cor 5:18-19), and the ministry of reconciliation consists of the proclamation of this work of Christ (2 Cor 5:20-21).

In 2 Corinthians 5:18-19 God is the agent and instigator of reconciliation "through Christ." Although the main clause of verse 19 is grammatically problematic, the best rendering is that "God was reconciling the world to himself through Christ." Paul is the first attested Greek author to speak of the offended party (God) initiating reconciliation, using the active voice form of the verb.

The object of reconciliation is "us" (2 Cor 5:18) or "the world" (2 Cor 5:19), probably referring to those of the fallen world* who are reconciled (cf. 2 Cor

5:20). The question of when this reconciliation occurred is established by the phrases "through [dia] Christ" and "by [en] Christ." "Through Christ," as Bultmann suggests, is equivalent to "through the death of his [God's] Son," a phrase used explicitly in Romans 5:10 and described in more detail in 2 Corinthians 5:14-15 and indicating Christ's sacrificial* death.

Most commentators understand 2 Corinthians 5:20-21 as Paul's appeal to the Corinthian church to be reconciled to God, taking Paul's use of first person plural ("we," "us") as an "epistolary plural," that is, the singular "I" is meant even though the plural form is used. But in light of the context, in which Paul sees himself as allied with his audience of believers, the passage is better understood as a concerted appeal to the unreconciled: "We therefore are ambassadors for Christ, as God makes his appeal through us: 'We beg you on Christ's behalf, be reconciled to God.' " Paul includes himself with other Christians ("we") as ambassadors on behalf of Christ. The message of 2 Corinthians 5:20b is addressed to those to whom the Corinthian believers are ambassadors, to those being called to reconciliation.

The command of 2 Corinthians 5:20, "be reconciled," agrees with the Pauline pattern found in 2 Corinthians 5:18-19 (cf. Rom 5:10, as well as other Greek usage of this verb), in which God is not only the agent or instigator of reconciliation, but is the goal toward whom reconciliation is directed. In all uses of the verb of reconciliation in 2 Corinthians 5 (verses 18, 19 and 20) the object or goal of the action is God. As Furnish states, "reconciliation is not ["only" ?] of God but from and to God" (Furnish, 335).

Several commentators have noted that the passage makes no explicit reference to the enmity of God or of humanity. While this passage does not explicitly refer to human antagonism except by alluding to "transgressions" (2 Cor 5:19), it may be inferred that God's righteousness* provides the basis for reconciliation. There is reference in 2 Corinthians 5:14, 15 to humans living for themselves and requiring Christ's death, as well as the defining phrase in verse 19 regarding the nonimputation of sin* and the reference in verse 21 to Christ becoming sin. These point toward a God who condemns sinful rebellion and yet makes provision for it in effecting reconciliation.

1.2. Romans 5:8-11. The place of Romans 5 within the argument of Romans* is notoriously difficult to determine. Whether one associates Romans 5 with Romans 1—4 or with Romans 6—8, or detects a division between Roman 5:11 and 12, many recent commentators recognize Romans 5 as a convergence point of important material (Kaye). There are several noteworthy verbal parallels, or overlaps in meaning, between peace, reconciliation and justification.* In some instances justification (Rom 5:1, 9) is parallel with reconciliation (Rom 5:10b); in others having peace and being reconciled are parallel (Rom 5:1 and 10a). In Romans 5:8-9 Paul says that Christ died for us, and now that we are justified we shall be saved; in Romans 5:10 Paul says that we were reconciled to God, and now that we are reconciled we shall be saved (see Salvation). (See similarly Rom 14:17, where Paul describes the kingdom* of God as "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.")

In Romans 5:1-11 having peace with God (Rom 5:1) and being reconciled to God (Rom 5:10) are equated. Although many scholars believe that the sense of "peace" (eirēnē) depends upon the OT sense of external or material well-being, the Greek sense denoting a time or state without hostility or war fits the context better. In Greek thought "peace" is a relational word which speaks of a state of objective well-being, leading to harmonious relations between people or nations. The creation of peace (Rom 5:1, 10a) is directed toward God, with whom humans are at odds. R. P. Martin looks to the love of God mentioned in Romans 5:5 and 8 as the basis of reconciliation. Although the love* of God is in harmony with the relational language, and certainly forms part of the divine character that prompts reconciliation, especially in terms of the death of Christ, God's character itself—of which love is a part—is the fundamental basis of the reconciling process (see God).

The means for these actions are stated explicitly. In Romans 5:1 and 11 it is said that we have peace or reconciliation "through our Lord Jesus Christ," in Romans 5:8 that "Christ died for us," and in Romans 5:10 that reconciliation is "through the death of his Son." Almost half of the verses of Romans 5:1-11 (Rom 5:1, 8, 9, 10 and 11) mention the work of Christ explicitly: God acts to bring about reconciliation through or by means of the work of Jesus Christ.

In the parallel phrasing of Romans 5:8 and 10 Paul equates being a sinner with being an enemy* of God. The scholarly controversy surrounding C. H. Dodd's understanding of Paul's view of divine wrath* in Romans is well known. Dodd argued that, for Paul, God's wrath is an "objective principle and process in the moral order" (Dodd, 77). On the contrary, however, Paul understands wrath as God's personal repulsion at evil, whether displayed in the present age or revealed at the final judgment. This is the logic of Romans 5:8-11, where the wrath from which one is saved is related to being a sinner and an enemy of God. Romans

1:18—3:20 prepares readers for the reference to humans as sinners. Humans constitute themselves as God's enemies not only by their sin but also by their disdain (the active sense of "enmity") for godly things. Human sin, therefore, precipitates God's wrath, thereby severing his relationship (the passive sense of "wrath") with humanity. As I. H. Marshall states, God does put "away the wrath which he has toward men and women on account of their sins so that there is no longer any barrier on his side to fellowship with them" (Marshall, 128).

Paul closes this section with an appropriate sense of exultation (Rom 5:11; cf. 5:2, 3). Believers jubilantly exult through their Lord Jesus Christ, their mediator, in what God has done: reconciliation (Rom 5:11b). As Cranfield says, "It is through Christ . . . through whom we have already received the gift of reconciliation with God, that we exult; for this gift which we have received through him is ground enough for ceaseless exultation" (Cranfield, 1.268-69). These ideas are caught up "under the catchword of the reconciliation that exists in the eschatological present" (Käsemann, 1980, 139) as a culmination of the past work of God and a hope for future salvation. The life set on the Spirit* is life and peace (Rom 8:6).

2. Colossians and Ephesians.

The language of reconciliation in Colossians 1:20-22 and Ephesians 2:16 is slightly different from that in Paul's chief letters. The verb translated "make peace" (eirēnopoieō) is used in its only instance in the Pauline letters. The verb for reconciliation, apokatallassō, here in its earliest attested usage in Greek literature, is an emphatically prefixed form of the verb (katallassō) used in 2 Corinthians 5:18-21 and Romans 5:8-11.

2.1. Colossians 1:20-22. Discussion of this passage is often linked to analysis of the reputed "hymn"* of Colossians 1:15-20. Despite arguments on all sides, it cannot be conclusively determined how or whether the "hymn" pre-existed (see Colossians). Thus G. B. Caird rightly states that its pre-Colossian function is "totally irrelevant" (Caird, 175) for interpreting its function here, including its contribution to understanding reconciliation. Reconciliation is mentioned in the second half of the "hymn" (Col 1:18b-20) and then restated in the following section (Col 1:21-23; there are textual variants regarding the verb apokatēllaxen, "be reconciled," in Col 1:22).

Both God and Christ are said to be the primary agents or initiators of reconciliation and peace. In Colossians 1:20 God is the unstated subject of the verb "reconcile," and thus the understood agent ultimately responsible for making peace. Whereas God may also be the subject of the verb in Colossians 1:22 (in conformity with Romans and 2 Corinthians), the context perhaps more clearly indicates that Christ (or the Son) is the understood subject of the verb and thus also a primary agent of reconciliation (on Ephesians, see 2.2 below).

The relation between these two emphases is best understood through the bipartite argument of Colossians 1:18b-22. The first section, Colossians 1:18b-20, recounts the means and scope of reconciliation. The fullness of divinity (a circumlocution for God; see Fullness) was pleased to dwell in Christ and through Christ to reconcile all things to Christ, making peace through the blood of his cross.* It seems best to take all of the pronouns in Colossians 1:19-20 as referring to Christ. The first (en autō) provides a place for the fullness of divinity to dwell ("in Christ"), the second (di' autou) the means by which reconciliation is enacted (parallel to the instrumental phrase with the same preposition, dia ["through"], referring to "the blood of his cross"), and the third (eis auton) its goal ("to Christ"). The third pronoun, in the phrase "to him," might be construed as "himself" with reference to God, but this pronoun has no direct grammatical antecedent ("all the fullness of divinity" is a circumlocution for God), and creates an unnecessary break in the parallelism with reference to Christ. Consequently its reference to God is not accepted by most commentators.

We conclude, then, that whereas the goal of reconciliation in the other Pauline literature is God, in Colossians 1:20 it is Christ. This is in keeping with the general tenor of this section of Colossians, in which actions are predicated of Christ that are usually predicated of God, including his creating the cosmos (Col 1:16; see World, Cosmology), his sustaining the created order (Col 1:17), and quite possibly his pre-existence* (Col 1:15, 17). In the second portion, Colossians 1:21-23, Christ then assumes the function of reconciler in presenting the personal objects of reconciliation, those who were formerly strangers and enemies, to God. As Martin states, "The link between 1:15-20 and 1:21-23 is close-knit, with the personal pronoun at verse 21, 'And you' and the verb at verse 22, 'he has now reconciled by his death' standing in an unusual and emphatic position" (Martin 1981, 115).

Most commentators understand God as the subject of reconciliation in Colossians 1:22, in which case God is said to reconcile and present strangers and enemies to himself. Although a case can be made for this understanding, its attractiveness to interpreters is probably due more to its conformity with Paul's chief letters than to an analysis of the text itself. Our analysis of the text has shown (1) that Christ is the subject of the main clauses of Colossians 1:15, 17, 18; (2) that he plays the key role in reconciliation in Colossians 1:19-20; (3) that divine functions are applied to Christ in Colossians 1:15-20; and (4) that the structure of Colossians 1:21-22 is closely tied to the preceding verses. We conclude, then, that Christ is better interpreted as the subject of the verb of reconciliation in Colossians 1:22, with the goal now seen as presenting the former enemies before God, the latter being a theme in conformity with Pauline usage in his chief letters. (The textual variant with the verb for reconciliation in Col 1:22 indicates that others have struggled with how to understand it in this context.) The emphasis upon the direct role of Christ is continued in Colossians 3:15 with reference to the "peace of Christ."

The work of Christ as a sacrifice upon the cross is the means or instrument by which reconciliation is brought about (Col 1:20a, 20b, 22). The reference to blood in Colossians 1:20 is unique to Colossians but not unique to reconciliation passages (cf. Rom 5:9). Reference to "the body of his flesh" in Colossians 1:22 calls attention to the fact that it was a physical body* that was involved, and a specific one ("his"). The following instrumental phrase is used to state what happened to this body of flesh* (i.e., physical body): it died.

In speaking of the resolution of enmity between parties, Paul uses the word eirēnopoieō, "make peace," a word implying a well-known Greek concept of hostility that requires pacification (see Triumph). Furthermore, enmity is implied by reference to the blood of his cross (Col 1:20b), and this alienation is applied to "us," the personal recipients of reconciliation. E. Schweizer states the essential minimum when he says, "in the whole of the NT it is always the individual person, not God, who needs to be reconciled" (Schweizer, 92). It is humans who are characterized as "strangers and enemies in understanding in their evil works." The modifying phrase "in understanding" brings the active sense of enmity to the fore, since "understanding" specifically locates animosity in the human mental activity.

Many commentators understand the language of reconciliation in Colossians as addressed only to Gentiles, since the condition of being strangers "can be said only of former Gentiles and not of Jews" (Lohse, 62). But this is too restrictive. The argument encompasses the time from before creation* to the present (Col 1:16-18), including the time of the church* (Col 1:18), with reference to God's reconciling work affecting "all" (cf. Col 1:20). The word "all" in Colossians 1:20 is explicated as "either things upon the earth or things in heaven." Interpreters have defined these words in various ways: to include the world of humans (upon the earth) and angels* (in the heavens); the breach between humans and God brought about by sin; subjection of the cosmic powers, which by nature are evil; the rupture between heaven and earth; and the world of humankind. On the basis of the grammar, the contrasting structure and the context of the work of Christ extending from before creation to reconciliation on the cross, the antithetical elements apparently form a comprehensive or inclusive statement, that is, embracing all the things in heaven, upon the earth, seen and unseen, thrones, principalities,* rulers and powers (Col 1:16). Although this passage may imply universal* salvation, in which things are reconciled against their will, that interpretation overlooks the larger argument. Colossians 1:18-20 establishes the general principle of God's cosmic reconciling activity. Its specific application to humanity ("strangers and enemies") does not occur until Colossians 1:21-23.

2.2. Ephesians 2:14-17. The phrase "for he is our peace" (Eph 2:14), equating Christ with peace, forms a title for the entire passage. The purpose of Christ being "our peace" is to create one new person by reconciling both Jews and Gentiles* in one body to God through the cross, and so effecting peace by killing the hostility in humankind.

Whereas Colossians 1:20-22 presents the work of Christ in its cosmic implications, here the emphasis is on breaking down a wall which separated Jews and Gentiles (Eph 2:11-13). Paul employs a metaphor probably drawn from the wall in the Jerusalem Temple,* or the Temple itself, which prevented Gentiles from proceeding into the inner courts. This was reinforced by the "Law* of commandments, condemning in its requirements [en dogmasin]" (Eph 2:15). Through reconciliation Jews and Gentiles are said to become "one new person" and "one body" (Eph 2:15, 16), being created into a third entity, a body without ethnic boundaries. As M. Barth points out, "The pacification carried out by Jesus Christ is an act of creation" (Barth, 1.308) whereby the two are made into something entirely new (see Creation and New Creation). This act of reconciliation is defined in both positive and negative terms. Reconciliation consists of making peace, and of killing animosity. The first phrase explains the title of this section: Jesus Christ can be called "our peace," since he is a peacemaker. This positive message forms the basis of the proclamation of peace to all, those both far and near (Eph 2:17; cf. 6:15; see also Col 1:18-22). The enmity which calls for reconciliation is defined in terms of two human groups, Jews and Gentiles. In that the Law excluded Gentiles, it was the source of their enmity. The animosity is said to be "killed" by Christ's work on the cross, and to constitute the new condition of Christian existence (cf. Eph 4:3; Rom 11:15; see Triumph).

In overcoming this separation, Christ is the agent of reconciliation and God is its goal (see 2.1 above). As Barth says, in Ephesians 2:16 "the Messiah rather than God is denoted as the one who reconciles" (Barth, 1.266). Although Christ is the one who effects reconciliation (as the primary agent), his work on the cross is still seen as the means or instrument used to produce reconciliation (Col 1:13, 15, 16, 18).

3. Superscriptions.

Paul often uses a form of the word "peace" (eirēnē) in the superscriptions of his letters. It virtually always appears with "grace" in the Pauline letters (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; Phil 1:2; Col 1:2; 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:2; Philem 3; Tit 1:4), and with the word "mercy"* in 1 Timothy 1:2 and 2 Timothy 1:2. In using "grace"* (charis) Paul has adapted a cognate word (chairein, "greeting") used in the usual superscription of Hellenistic letters. There has been widespread speculation, however, regarding his use of the word "peace." Most scholars take it as a Semitism, translating the Hebrew word for "peace" (šālôm). This is not a certainty, although it is a possibility. There is little substantive evidence from Greek Jewish letters of the time that superscriptions with "peace" were used as a convention that Paul might have borrowed (but cf. LXX Dan 4:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 78:2; b. Sanh. 11b). If Paul was using a Semitic superscription, he risked misunderstanding by his predominantly Gentile, Greek-speaking churches.

A more plausible explanation is that Paul has consciously created his own superscription to emphasize the comprehensive work of God: it is one of gracious giving and forgiveness for previous hostility. This is fully in keeping with Paul's use of "peace" language in his major reconciliation passages and reflects a Greek background which in this case speaks of an objective state of peace with God. Too much theological emphasis, however, should probably not be placed upon a highly formulaic feature of Paul's adaptation of the Hellenistic letter.

Paul often uses similar language in the close of his letters (Rom 15:33; 16:20; 2 Cor 13:11; Phil 4:9, cf. 4:7; 1 Thess 5:23; 2 Thess 3:16), where he speaks in terms of the God (or Lord) of peace (and love) being with his readers. This may be related to Paul's listing of peace in Galatians 5:22 as a fruit* of the Spirit, since he also includes love,* joy and faithfulness, language reminiscent of his extended discussion of peace elsewhere. Too much weight, however, should not be put upon what for Paul is probably a formulaic epistolary closing (see Letters).

See also CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; DEATH OF CHRIST; ENEMY, ENMITY, HATRED; GENTILES; JUSTIFICATION; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; TRIUMPH; UNIVERSALISM; WORLD, COSMOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Barth, Ephesians (2 vols.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1974); R. Bultmann, The Second Letter to the Corinthians (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1985); G. B. Caird, Paul's Letters from Prison (Oxford: University Press, 1976); C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans (Vol. 1; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975); C. H. Dodd, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (MNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1932); V. P. Furnish, II Corinthians (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984); E. Käsemann, A Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); idem, "Some Thoughts on the Theme 'The Doctrine of Reconciliation in the New Testament,' " in The Future of Our Religious Past, ed. J. M. Robinson (New York: Harper & Row, 1971) 49-64; B. N. Kaye, The Thought Structure of Romans with Special Reference to Chapter 6 (Austin: Schola, 1979); E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); I. H. Marshall, "The Meaning of 'Reconciliation,' " in Unity and Diversity in NT Theology, ed. R. A. Guelich (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 117-32 (= Jesus the Saviour: Studies in New Testament Theology [Downers Grove, Il: InterVarsity, 1990] 258-74); R. P. Martin, Reconciliation: A Study of Paul's Theology (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); idem, "Reconciliation and Forgiveness in Colossians," in Reconciliation and Hope, ed. R. Banks (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974) 109-16; P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); S. E. Porter, Καταλλάσσω in Ancient Greek Literature, with Reference to the Pauline Writings (Cordoba: Ediciones El Almendro, forthcoming); E. Schweizer, The Letter to the Colossians (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1982).

S. E. Porter

PEDAGOGUE. See ABRAHAM; LAW.

PERFECT, MATURE

In Paul's writings perfection or maturity entails several ideas related to the concept of fulfillment, reaching a goal or attaining completion. The English word actualized captures an important nuance in Paul's thinking on this subject: that which is perfect or mature has fulfilled its intended goal. Paul generally uses the Greek adjective teleios ("perfect," "complete," "mature") to convey the concept, though several cognate words also contribute to make the complete picture: teleioō ("make perfect, complete or mature"), teleō ("to complete," "to end"), telos ("end," "result," "purpose," "completely") and teleiotēs ("maturity," "perfection"). Paul's concept includes four distinct aspects: (1) simple maturity or the attainment of a goal; (2) spiritual perfection as the status of all Christians "in Christ"; (3) a position of relative perfection attainable by Christians in this life; and (4) the state of ultimate perfection that Christians hope to experience in the age to come.

1. Maturity, Having Attained the Goal
2. Spiritual Perfection as Existence "in Christ"
3. Relative Perfection in this Life
4. Ultimate Perfection in the Age to Come

1. Maturity, Having Attained the Goal.

In several places Paul speaks of maturity in a nontheological sense. He encourages the Corinthians to think as do adults—mature people—not as do children (1 Cor 14:20). He insists, possibly in irony, that mature Christians exercise a kind of sober judgment (Phil 3:15). Christ's power,* he argues, fulfilled its intended goal or was truly operative when Paul was at his weakest (2 Cor 12:9; see Weakness). At the point of death Paul could affirm that he had successfully completed (or actualized) his assignment as a Christian apostle* (2 Tim 4:7).

2. Spiritual Perfection as Existence "in Christ."

Parallel to the sense of reaching the goal, becoming a Christian leads to becoming perfect, or complete. So Paul alludes to the Corinthians as "perfect," or "mature" (1 Cor 2:6) because to them God's Spirit revealed his wisdom* that is "not of this age" (1 Cor 2:6, 10). The Corinthians stand in contrast to those without the Spirit (1 Cor 2:12, 14), who possess no spiritual discernment. God's goal for his people is that they should be perfect, and achieving this goal energizes Paul's apostolic ministry.* Convinced that God wants all to be saved, Paul desires nothing less than to present "every person" mature in Christ (Col 1:28). His ministry, whether it be exhorting, teaching or some other means, serves that one intended aim (see Du Plessis, 198-99).

Though salvation itself brings a status of perfection, the new life in Christ needs to be actualized. What is its intended goal? For Paul the goal is perfection, on both an individual and a corporate level. And perfection has two stages: a relative kind of perfection that Christians work to attain in this life, and a final state of absolute sinless perfection realized only in the life to come.

3. Relative Perfection in This Life.

First, Paul holds out the prospect of perfection for individual believers. Paul urges Christians who have been so greatly graced by God's salvation* to seek what is perfect (Rom 12:2). God's will is "perfect," and believers, by the renewing transformation of their minds accomplished by God's Spirit,* can know God's will. God purposes nothing short of the goal that his people should perfectly accomplish his will. Along the same lines Paul insists that perfection, or maturity, derives only from living according to God's will (Col 4:12). These are present goals for Christians to seek.

Second, on the corporate side Paul urges the church* to maturity—to become fully grown adults in all their ways. In Ephesians 4:13 Paul calls not individuals but the entire church to God's goal for its existence: the fullness* of Christ (cf. Eph 3:19 for fullness of God).

Maturity also entails the church's corporate expression of unity characterized by faith* and love.* Though "in Christ" the church already exists as God's new, mature person (Eph 2:15), yet it must pursue these virtues with the aid of the ministers Christ has given it (Eph 4:16). This fits Paul's stress on love in Colossians 3:14, where love binds and unites the gifts* and efforts of church members. Pursuing love, Paul says, produces perfection. The church thus becomes what God determined it to be. Here Lietzmann's dictum proves helpful in explaining Paul: "become what you are." "Work out ethically all that is involved in being in Christ" (Flew, 59).

4. Ultimate Perfection in the Age to Come.

Though perfection remains the goal for Christians in this life, and a relative perfection might be achieved, Paul envisioned an eventual state of entire perfection for those who are in Christ. This constitutes in a paramount sense "the end" or "the complete state." In this age, as holy or loving as any individual or church may become, absolute perfection remains elusive because it belongs to the age to come. Everything is "in part" until the perfect comes (1 Cor 13:10). Even the best qualities or actions believers can presently exhibit—including the exercise of the most impressive spiritual gifts—fall short of God's final intention for his people. But at the end, when Christ returns and the church secures its final destiny, perfection or completeness reigns (see Eschatology). Paul sees that destiny as a prize at the finish line, and he works earnestly to attain that perfection (Phil 3:12-14). He recognizes that he is not yet perfect, yet that consummate state serves to inspire his present life. When the resurrection comes, he will attain the prize. Then Christians will truly be all God designed them to be—perfect.

Did Paul believe that believers could ever approximate in this life the final perfection of sinlessness? Though it is not extensive, the evidence does suggest that Paul never envisions that Christians could achieve a state of sinlessness in this life. He never claims as much for himself, nor does he ever hold up any other Christians as models of sinlessness. At the same time, Paul clearly sees sin* as a defeated foe. Though Christians may never become completely sinless in this life, God intends that they should and must avoid sinning. And Paul teaches that it is possible for Christians not to sin. In Galatians 5:16-26 he champions the power of the Spirit over the sinful nature, and in Romans 6:2, 6, 11-14, 18, 22 he clearly insists that resisting sin is not only possible, it is the required response of those whom God justified. The point is not that Christians reach a state in which they cannot sin, but that God has empowered them so that they need not sin.

See also APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; ESCHATOLOGY; FULLNESS; GLORY, GLORIFICATION; HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION; SIN, GUILT; SPIRITUALITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Deissler and F. Mussner, "Perfection," EBT 2.658-67; G. Delling, "τέλος κτλ" TDNT VII.49-87; R. N. Flew, The Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology (London: Oxford University Press, 1934); P. J. Du Plessis, Teleios: The Idea of Perfection in the New Testament (Kampen: Uitgave, 1959); H. K. La Rondelle, Perfection and Perfectionism (Berrien Springs, MI: Andrews University, 1971); R. Schippers, "τέλος," NIDNTT 2.59-66; R. Schnackenburg, "Christian Adulthood according to the Apostle Paul," CBQ 25 (1963) 254-370; B. B. Warfield, Perfectionism, Vol. 1 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1931); J. A. Ziesler, "Anthropology of Hope," ExpT 90 (1979) 104-9.

W. W. Klein

PERSECUTION. See AFFLICTIONS, TRIALS, HARDSHIPS.

PERSECUTOR, PAUL AS. See JEALOUSY, ZEAL; JEW, PAUL THE; PAUL IN ACTS AND LETTERS.

PERSEVERANCE. See APOSTASY, FALLING AWAY, PERSEVERANCE; FAITH.

PERSON, THE. See PSYCHOLOGY.

PESHER INTERPRETATION. See JEW, PAUL THE; OLD TESTAMENT IN PAUL.

PETER

Paul never refers to the apostle* Peter by his original name of Simon (Simōn, as frequently in the Gospels) or Simeon (Symeōn, as in Acts 15:14 and the preferred text of 2 Pet 1:1). Only twice (Gal 2:7, 8) does he use the name Peter (Petros, or "Rock") given to Simon by Jesus (Mt 16:17-18; Mk 3:16 par. Lk 6:14; Jn 1:42). In the eight other instances in which Paul refers to Peter (1 Cor 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal 1:18; 2:9, 11, 14), he does so with the Aramaic equivalent, Cephas (i.e., kēpha, or "rock," identified as Petros, "Peter" in Jn 1:42). A possible explanation for this is that Paul regarded Cephas as a real name, not a nickname, and consequently not to be translated. The exceptional use of Peter in Galatians 2:7, 8 could then be viewed as Paul's accommodation to the wording of an actual agreement drawn up at Jerusalem* regarding the mission* to Jews (see Israel) and Gentiles.*

It has been seriously argued (e.g., Lake, Ehrman) that Simon Peter and Cephas were not the same person. Yet even apart from the explicit identification in John 1:42, it is difficult to imagine two different figures in the ancient church, each with a name meaning "rock," each mentioned first among those who saw the risen Christ (in 1 Cor 15:5, within a confessional statement antedating Paul, and in Lk 24:34) and each identified as one sent "to the circumcision" (Gal 2:7-8, with v. 9).

1. Peter in Galatians
2. Peter in 1 Corinthians

1. Peter in Galatians.

Paul speaks of "Cephas" only in Galatians and 1 Corinthians. Each time "Cephas" is mentioned in Galatians (i.e., Gal 1:18; 2:9, 11), "Peter" occurs as a variant reading in some manuscripts (e.g., in Codex D [Claromontanus], the Old Latin versions and the majority of later Greek manuscripts; see Textual Criticism). A likely reason for this is the unquestioned occurrence of "Peter" in Galatians 2:7, 8. The tendency of later scribes would have been to achieve consistency by conforming the less familiar to the more familiar name.

The purpose of Paul's personal history in Galatians 1:13—2:10 is to minimize his contacts with Peter, not to emphasize them. But Paul admits that three years after receiving a revelation (see Conversion and Call) from God* he went to Jerusalem to get acquainted with Cephas and spent fifteen days with him there (Gal 1:18). Fourteen years later he returned with Barnabas* and Titus (see Coworkers), not on his own initiative but in obedience to another divine revelation (Gal 2:1-2). Paul insists that the leaders of the Jerusalem church "added nothing" to the gospel* he was already proclaiming (Gal 2:6), but that "James,* Cephas and John" endorsed his ministry by giving him and Barnabas "the right hand of fellowship" (Gal 2:9). It was agreed that Paul and Barnabas would go to the Gentiles, while Cephas and his two associates in Jerusalem would continue their mission to the Jewish people (lit., "the circumcision,*" Gal 2:9; cf. the reference to "Peter" in Gal 2:7, 8). The only stipulation was that Paul and Barnabas "should continue to remember the poor [especially among Jewish Christians, cf. Rom 15:26], the very thing I was eager to do" (Gal 2:10).

Paul encountered Cephas again at Antioch* (Gal 2:11-14) and "opposed him to his face, because he was clearly in the wrong" (Gal 2:11 NIV). Cephas had been eating freely with Gentile Christians until some messengers came from James. At this time, Paul claims, Cephas "drew back and separated himself because he feared those who belonged to the circumcision group" (Gal 2:12). This hypocrisy, as Paul calls it, influenced other Jewish Christians, including Barnabas, to break off table fellowship (see Food) with the Gentile believers in Antioch. Paul's consequent rebuke to Cephas serves as an introduction to his main argument in Galatians (Gal 2:14-21). "If you, being a Jew," Paul begins, "live like a Gentile and not like a Jew, how can you compel the Gentiles to live like Jews?" (Gal 2:14). It is not clear at what point Paul's words to Cephas end and his written words to the Galatians begin, but it is likely that at least Galatians 2:15-17 is intended to fit the context of the confrontation just described. Paul rebuked Cephas precisely because he was convinced that they both agreed in principle. Both had in common the fact that they were "Jews by birth and not Gentile sinners" (Gal 2:15), and both shared in the knowledge that "one is not justified by the works of the Law but by faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal 2:16). Paul's charge was that Cephas had failed to live up to his own convictions.

Quite possibly it was the record of this disagreement that made some later writers (e.g., Epistle of the Apostles 2; Clement of Alexandria, in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.12.2) reluctant to conclude that Cephas and the apostle Peter were the same person. This evidence is another reason why modern scholars who have attempted to draw a distinction between the two are on shaky ground.

2. Peter in 1 Corinthians.

"Cephas" is mentioned four times in 1 Corinthians (1 Cor 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5), and in none of these instances is "Peter" introduced into the manuscript tradition. Paul states that some in Corinth were saying "I belong to Cephas" (1 Cor 1:12), just as others were saying "I belong to Paul," "I belong to Apollos*" or "I belong to Christ" (see Corinthians). This verse (1 Cor 1:12) carries no necessary implication that Peter's adherents took a particular theological stance over against that of Paul. Their allegiance could have been simply a personal attitude on the part of some who admired Peter, or Peter could have represented in Corinth the authority of the Twelve or of the Jerusalem church. It is difficult to say. The same is true in 1 Corinthians 3:22, where Cephas is mentioned again, along with Paul and Apollos, as someone of importance to the Corinthian community and probably not just to his own faction.

Paul introduces Cephas as an example for yet a third time (1 Cor 9:5) in a list of those who had a right to support from the churches so that they would not have to worry about earning a living or being separated from their wives: "Don't we have the right to food and drink?" Paul asks. "Don't we have the right to take a believing wife along with us, like the rest of the apostles, and the Lord's brothers, and Cephas? Or is it only I and Barnabas who have to work for a living?" (1 Cor 9:4-6). Again Peter is singled out, either because of his following in Corinth or because he represented the Twelve. The phrase "the rest of the apostles" probably includes all Christian missionaries known to Paul (except Barnabas), and within this group Paul wants to call attention particularly to "the Lord's brothers" and (possibly) the Twelve originally chosen by Jesus. By singling out Peter, Paul could be implying that Peter was married, but he does not say so explicitly. Clearly, he is not pronouncing on the marital status of all "the Lord's brothers" and "the rest of the apostles." What Paul is saying is that Peter and the others had the right to marry (see Marriage) and enjoy the support (see Financial Support) of the churches for themselves and their wives, and Paul wants to claim that same right for himself—even if he made no use of it.

Paul's last reference to Cephas in 1 Corinthians comes in his list of witnesses to the resurrection* (1 Cor 15:5). Christ* "appeared to Cephas, then to the Twelve, then he appeared to five hundred at once, . . . then he appeared to James, then to all the apostles" (1 Cor 15:5-7). The recurrent "then" (epeita) suggests that Paul was interested in the order of the appearances, yet he did not characterize the appearance to Cephas as "first" (in contrast to an appearance "last of all . . . to me" in 1 Cor 15:8). Paul was evidently following a tradition similar to that of Mark (Mk 16:7) or Luke (Lk 24:34) or John (Jn 21:15-17), in which an appearance to Peter is distinguished from an appearance to the Twelve as a group. Possibly there is a tacit acknowledgment in the tradition Paul was following that the "first" appearance of the risen Christ was to women at the tomb (as in Mt 28:9-10 and Jn 20:14-17). At any rate, Paul assigns no preeminence to Cephas for having been the first to see the risen Lord.*

Paul's references to Cephas in Galatians and 1 Corinthians are all distant and somewhat guarded. Aside from the confrontation described in Galatians 2:11-14, there was no hostility between the two apostles, but Paul was always careful to maintain the principle that Peter "added nothing" (Gal 2:6) to the revelation that Paul himself had received. As for Peter, in the canonical letters attributed to him, Paul is mentioned only once (2 Pet 3:15-16), and with similar reserve. The author of 2 Peter believed that "our beloved brother Paul," when rightly interpreted, was in agreement with Peter, but this author did not have the same confidence in Paul's followers. Paul's letters were "hard to understand" and therefore easily distorted by the "ignorant and unstable." Even though they were classed among "the Scriptures" (2 Pet 3:16), they needed the clarification that the voice of the apostle Peter was able to supply.

See also ANTIOCH ON THE ORONTES; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; JERUSALEM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown and J. P. Maier, Antioch and Rome (New York: Paulist, 1983); R. E. Brown, K. P. Donfried, J. Reumann, Peter in the New Testament (Minneapolis: Augsburg; New York: Paulist, 1973); O. Cullmann, Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962); B. D. Ehrman, "Cephas and Peter," JBL 109 (1990) 463-74; W. R. Farmer and R. Kereszty, Peter and Paul in the Church of Rome (New York: Paulist, 1990); K. Lake, "Simon, Cephas, Peter," HTR 14 (1921) 95-97.

J. R. Michaels

PHARISEES. See DISCIPLINE; JEW, PAUL THE; RESTORATION OF ISRAEL; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS.

PHILEMON, LETTER TO

Philemon is the shortest (335 words in Greek) and most personal of the letters belonging to the Pauline corpus. Despite the literary, historical and interpretive problems the letter raises for modern scholarship, it offers a fascinating window not only on a corner of the social world of the first century, but on Christian principles at work in a particular setting within the early church.

1. History of Interpretation
2. Continuing Questions of Interpretation
3. Theological Significance

1. History of Interpretation.

1.1. Historical-Critical Method. Although there are some older critical theories which tended to question the letter's authenticity and purpose (F. C. Baur, for example, regarded it as a second-century "fictional romance" seeking to address the issue of slavery in the early church), the interpretation given by most commentators who follow the historical-critical method and the "natural" meaning of the text, is that this letter was written somewhere between A.D. 58 and 60 while Paul was in a Roman prison. It appears that the letter is addressed to Philemon (Philem 1), who was a wealthy Gentile Christian in Colossae who became a believer under Paul's ministry* (Philem 19). Its divisions include Paul's greetings (Philem 1-3); thanksgiving and prayer* (Philem 4-7); intercession for Onesimus (Philem 18-22); final greetings and benediction* (Philem 23-25).

The heart of the letter centers upon Onesimus, Philemon's slave* who had somehow wronged his master (Philem 18), made his way to Paul in prison (Philem 9), was converted (Philem 10) and became a useful partner (see Coworkers) with Paul in the gospel* (Philem 11, 13). But under the existing laws governing slavery, Paul knows that Onesimus must be returned to his rightful owner. In the letter, Paul implores Philemon not only to receive (Philem 17), forgive (Philem 18; see Forgiveness) and acknowledge Onesimus' new status as a fellow believer (Philem 16), but to relinquish all claims upon Onesimus so that he can continue serving with Paul (Philem 13, 21).

In the opening greetings (Philem 1-3) Paul identifies Philemon as a "dear friend and fellow worker" (NIV). We have no way of knowing how the two became acquainted and whether Philemon 19 should be taken to imply that Philemon was converted by Paul. If so, it probably was during Paul's stay in Ephesus* and in similar circumstances when Epaphras, another resident of Colossae, came under Paul's ministry (Col 1:7; 4:12). Nor is there any way of knowing whether Apphia was Philemon's wife and Archippus his son.

The thanksgiving and prayer (Philem 4-7) focus on Philemon, who is commended for his faith* in Christ* and his love* for the saints. Both of these virtues have "refreshed" (anapauō) the saints and given joy and encouragement to the apostle.* The accent is on Philemon's spirit of love and not on any specific actions. It is the same word (splangkna) that Paul uses in verse 20 where he anticipates the effect of Philemon's response.

Paul's request—or intercession—on behalf of Onesimus (Philem 8-22) takes the reader through a series of agonizing delays because Paul just does not seem to get to the point (the opening, "I appeal to you for my son Onesimus" in verse 10, is not completed until verse 17). But Paul is careful to use diplomacy and tact in handling this rather delicate matter. He needs to state the request strongly but yet have the decision be voluntary. He wants Philemon to act out of conviction, not out of compulsion (Philem 14). Thus Paul approaches Philemon as a friend and coworker and not with apostolic authority.*

Although the circumstances surrounding Onesimus' arrival at the place of Paul's imprisonment and his conversion to the Christian faith are uncertain, this section clarifies the strong attachment that Paul has developed for his spiritual "son" (Philem 10) and "brother" (Philem 16) and the appreciation for Onesimus' ministry to him while under house arrest.

All this puts Paul on the horns of a dilemma: Onesimus, whose name means "useful," can only be of value to his master if he returns, and to Paul if he stays. In spite of Paul's tact in approaching Philemon, it is obvious that he wants Philemon to release Onesimus so that he can retain him for his own service. This appears to overshadow the other concern Paul had that Philemon forgive Onesimus and receive him as a Christian brother (Philem 16). Paul's confidence of his release and plan to visit Philemon (Philem 22) may be related to both of these requests. Could it be that Onesimus returned to Colossae before Paul, that he was forgiven by Philemon, and then released to Paul when the apostle visited Colossae?

The final greetings (Philem 23-25) are almost identical to the closing section of Colossians (Col 4:12-18). The plural form of you (hymōn) in the benediction ("The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit") carries a singular meaning and does not necessarily confirm the public nature of the letter.

The letter to Philemon and the letter to the Colossians* are closely related. Both are written from the same place, addressed to the same church, were carried to Colossae by Tychicus (Col 4:8-9), both mention similar circumstances about Paul's imprisonment (Col 4:3; Philem 1, 13) and have an almost identical list of personal greetings. It is most likely that the two letters were kept together as Paul's correspondence to Colossae. Unfortunately, the relationship of these two letters was lost when the compilers of the NT separated them in the canon.*

1.2. Knox's Reconstruction. J. Knox's provocative study of Philemon broke with the traditional interpretation at a number of points. First, he identifies Archippus as the recipient of the letter and thus Onesimus' master. The "work" (NIV) or "ministry" (RSV) which Paul admonishes Archippus to complete (Col 4:17) refers to the way he was to receive and handle Onesimus. Philemon is an "overseer" of the churches in the Lycus Valley with a probable residence in Laodicea. Second, he equates "the letter from Laodicea" which Paul wants read in Colossae (Col 4:16) as "the epistle to Philemon." Third, Knox believes that the restored slave Onesimus is the same person who became bishop of Ephesus and may have been responsible for collecting Paul's letters in the second century (Ignatius Eph. 1.3). This, claims Knox, could account for the preservation and inclusion of this brief and personal letter in the canon.

Reaction to Knox's reconstruction varies among scholars. While most regard it as novel, interesting and/or ingenious, much of his reconstruction is generally dismissed as lacking sufficient evidence to be taken seriously. It seems more natural to conclude that Philemon, the first person addressed in the letter, is the recipient and the one to whom Paul is interceding on behalf of Onesimus. Neither can the letter referred to in Colossians 4:16 be identified with certainty as our letter to Philemon. On the other hand, Knox's proposal regarding the preservation and function of this letter remains intriguing.

1.3. Rhetorical Criticism. This approach analyzes the letter of Philemon through the categories of ancient rhetoric.* F. Forrester Church, for example, believes that Paul is employing such classical rhetorical devices as "pathos," "ethos" and "forensic rhetoric" in order to persuade Philemon to accept his request. "The key" to deliberative rhetoric, writes Church, "is to demonstrate love or friendship and to induce sympathy or goodwill, in order to dispose the hearer favorably to the merits of one's case" (Church, 19-20). In rhetorical categories, Philemon would be divided into the exordium (Philem 4-7), proof (Philem 8-16) and peroration (Philem 17-22; see Rhetorical Criticism).

This method does not necessarily challenge the interpretation of Philemon given above. Its proponents believe that it provides further insights into the shape and design of Paul's letters (see White; see Letters, Letter Forms). The fact that a common rhetorical device was used to "conceal the ultimate objective" so that the hearers or readers may find it for themselves may account for the ambiguous and puzzling way Paul actually makes his request to Philemon (Derrett).

1.4. Legal Analogies. S. Winter has examined Philemon for parallels to legal forms and language used in Paul's day and believes that there are significant analogies which help to explain certain phrases in the letter. Paul's appeal in Philemon 10 (parakalō . . . peri), for example, is like a formula used in legal petitions; anapempō in Philem 12 ("I am sending him . . . back to you . . .") is a legal term better understood as referring Onesimus' case "to the proper higher authority"; and the idea of the partnership (koinōnia) between Paul and Philemon, notes Winter, has more of the elements of a "consensual association," a societas in which partnership was legally binding. Paul's plea to Philemon is that Onesimus be received into this societas as an equal partner (Winter 1987, 7).

1.5. Literary Criticism and the Social Sciences. The most extensive and significant work on the letter to Philemon from this perspective belongs to N. Petersen who draws upon sociological and anthropological models (those of, e.g., Levi-Strauss, Evans-Pritchard, Berger, Eco) and insights on the sociology of the NT (the writings of J. Elliott, B. Malina, W. Meeks and G. Theissen; see Social-Scientific Approaches).

Basically, Petersen transfers the letter into a story in order to create a "narrative world" in which Paul is the narrator and Philemon the actor. This narrative is played out in the midst of two social realities—the church* and the world.* The heart of the letter, according to Petersen, centers upon the sociological categories of "kinship" and the tension Philemon faces when confronted with values of kinship in the world and in the church. Paul is forcing Philemon to decide between the two.

The historical and literary approaches outlined above are not mutually exclusive. Rather, they are positive attempts by several disciplines to discover the nature and purpose of this letter. And, even though the letter to Philemon may not necessarily be written as a legal or rhetorical document, there are insights, when combined with the historical-critical method, that are helpful.

2. Continuing Questions of Interpretation.

Scholarly debate continues around issues where the text is ambiguous or for which there is no conclusive proof. These include the recipient of the letter (Philemon or Archippus), the address of the recipient (Colossae or Laodicea) and the place of Paul's imprisonment (Rome, Ephesus or Caesarea). Speculation also abounds on how and where Onesimus was converted, if he actually was returned to Philemon, if Paul was able to retain him as a coworker and whether or not he became the bishop of Ephesus. Two major concerns, however, merit special mention.

2.1. Onesimus: "Runaway Slave" or "Sent Messenger"? The traditional interpretation among commentators is based on the inference that Onesimus was a runaway slave who probably stole something from his master (Philem 11, 18). This view was doubted by Knox, whose doubts are amplified by Winter who proposes that Onesimus was "sent" to Paul by the Colossian congregation in order to meet some of Paul's physical needs while Paul was under house arrest. Onesimus' departure and consequent separation (Philem 15) from Philemon need not imply that he ran away. The situation could be similar to the one that brought Epaphroditus from Philippi to Paul while Paul was in prison (cf. Phil 2:22-30).

Winter's conclusions are based on several observations: first, she believes that Paul's commendations of Philemon in the thanksgiving section (Philem 4-7) express the apostle's gratitude for sending Onesimus to him; second, she interprets certain phrases to mean that Paul's "hearing" of Philemon's faith (Philem 5) came from Onesimus, that the "good thing" (pantos agathou, Philem 6; see Wright) and the "sharing of your faith" (koinōnia, 6) is Paul's response to having Onesimus sent by Philemon (Winter, 3-4). Some of this exegesis is questionable and lacks support from the main body of the letter.

All this, however, does not necessarily mean that Onesimus was a runaway slave in the traditional sense of being a fugitive or deserter (cf. Bruce, 197). P. Lampe argues that the situation of Onesimus does not fit the legal category of a "fugitive" (fugitivus). Under certain conditions of Roman law governing slavery, it was possible for a slave to seek out an advocate or intercessor to mediate a grievance with the master. In this case Onesimus legally makes his way to the place of Paul's imprisonment to seek help (Lampe; Bruce, 197; Bartchy; see Slave, Slavery).

Is it reasonable to suggest the following scenario? Onesimus would have known Paul from the contacts that Philemon had with the apostle (in visits to Ephesus?) and may even have become Paul's friend. Some serious domestic grievance destroyed the relationship between slave and master and Onesimus, who knew his civil rights, believed that Paul could intercede for him. While visiting with Paul and attending to his needs while he was under house arrest (Philem 11, 13), Onesimus became a believer (Philem 10). Paul, then, wrote this "letter of intercession" trusting that Philemon would forgive the "wrong" (adikeō), cancel any debt ("owes you anything," Philem 18, 19), accept Onesimus as a "brother in the Lord" (Philem 16) and release Onesimus into Paul's service (Philem 21). We need not infer from Philemon 18 and 19 that Onesimus had stolen money from Philemon other than, perhaps, enough to finance his journey to Paul (cf. O'Brien, 299-300). It could also be that Philemon loaned Onesimus to Paul (a modification of the "sent" theory) so that the "debt" refers to time and not monetary compensation (Patzia, 114).

2.2. The Letter: Private or Public? Some scholars conclude that the brevity, personal appeal to one person and the delicate way Paul handles his request, confirm that this is a private letter. However, several factors favor its public nature: (1) the length exceeds that of most private letters; (2) the greetings are extended to more than one person and, in fact, include a house church; (3) it was customary to read Paul's letters to the entire church in worship*; (4) the legal and technical language are more characteristic of a public document than a private letter; (5) it has all the characteristics of Paul's longer letters addressed to churches, such as the inclusion of Timothy as a cosender, salutation, thanksgiving, body and greetings; (6) the designations "fellow worker" (synergos), "sister" (adelphē) and "fellow soldier" (systratiōtes) in Philemon 1-2 suggest church titles.

Finally, one cannot help but feel that Paul's request and the issue of social relationships involves the entire Christian community and not just one person. Lohse, quoting Wickert, notes that "in the Body of Christ personal affairs are no longer private" (Lohse 187 n. 9). "In short," concludes Martin, "this brief epistle is to be seen not so much as a private letter of Paul as an individual . . . but as an apostolic letter about a personal matter" (Martin, 144). In other words, Paul is referring his case to the entire church. This public nature may also account for its value in the collection and canon of Paul's letters (see Canon).

3. Theological Significance.

The literary, historical and interpretative problems which remain should not detract from the beauty and meaning of this letter. Basically, it contains no explicit theological or ethical doctrines; it attacks no heresies in the church. Nevertheless, it presents a number of important truths that should not go unnoticed.

First, it opens a window on the nature of Paul's imprisonment and the personal relationship that he enjoyed with his friends and coworkers* (Philem 23, 24; Col 4:12-14). It ends by showing the optimism that Paul had for his release and desire to visit his beloved friend Philemon.

Second, it provides a small commentary on slavery in the ancient world. When read together with Colossians 3:22—4:1, we begin to appreciate how conversion to the Christian faith broke down all social, racial and economic barriers (Patzia, 91-93). Although Paul does not speak directly for the abolition of slavery, this letter exemplifies, as much as any other writing of his, the truth of Galatians 3:28: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (NIV). A new relationship and partnership has been formed in this situation where master, slave and apostle are all part of one family in Christ (Philem 16). The church as a whole should be characterized by such virtues as love, forgiveness, equality and fellowship.*

Third, it is a masterpiece of pastoral diplomacy (see Pastoral). Paul's request is not reinforced by expressions of compulsion, constraint or coercion. The reconciliation* between Philemon and Onesimus is based on the principles of Christian love and forgiveness and not Roman law or apostolic authority. The release of Onesimus for Paul's ministry must be a voluntary action leading to the highest good for all parties concerned. Paul is confident that he will succeed in motivating Philemon "to do even more" than he has requested (Philem 21).

Finally, as W. Barclay so aptly wrote, "here is one of the great romances of grace in the early Church" (Barclay, 316). Although we do not know how the story ended, there is enough reason to suspect that Paul's confidence (Philem 21) in Philemon was honored and that the former slave Onesimus, now a brother in Christ, continued to serve Paul.

See also COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; SLAVE, SLAVERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: W. Barclay, The Letters of Timothy, Titus and Philemon (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1960); F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Colossians, to Philemon, and to the Ephesians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); J. Gnilka, Der Philemonbrief (HTKNT 10.4; Freiburg, Basel, Vienna: Herder, 1982); E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); R. P. Martin, Colossians and Philemon (rev. ed.; NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, Philemon (WBC 44; Waco: Word, 1982); A. Patzia, Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon (NIBC; Peabody, MA.; Hendrickson, 1991); P. Stuhlmacher, Der Brief an Philemon (2d ed.; EKKNT 18; Zürich: Neukirchener, 1981); A. Suhl, Der Brief an Philemon (ZBNT 13; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1981). Studies: S. S. Bartchy, "Philemon, Epistle to," ABD V. 305-10; F. F. Church, "Rhetorical Structure and Design in Paul's Letter to Philemon," HTR 71 (1978) 17-33; J. D. M. Derrett, "The Function of the Epistle to Philemon," ZNW 19 (1988) 85; J. Knox, Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (New York: Abingdon, 1959); P. Lampe, "Keine Sklavenflucht des Onesimus," ZNW 76 (1985) 135-37; N. R. Petersen, Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. White, The Structural Analysis of Philemon: A Point of Departure in the Formal Analysis of the Pauline Letter (SBLASP; Missoula: Scholars, 1971); S. Winter, "Methodological Observations on a New Interpretation of Paul's Letter to Philemon," USQR 35

(1984) 203-12; idem, "Paul's Letter to Philemon," NTS 33 (1987) 1-15; N. T. Wright, "XPIΣTOΣ as 'Messiah' in Paul: Philemon 6," in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 41-55.

A. Patzia

PHILIPPI. See PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE.

PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE

Philippians is a letter the apostle Paul wrote to the church in the city of Philippi in Macedonia, the first church* he founded in Europe. It is the most personal of all of his letters. Although not a theological treatise, Philippians does have a great deal to say about God* and his ways with people, about Christ* Jesus and about Christians and how they should live in this world. The terms "overseers" and "deacons" (1:1) occur here for the one and only time in Paul's letters, but without any elaboration on what these people did or about what kind of authority* they exercised within the church.

1. Contents
2. The City and Its Citizens
3. The Church and Its Apostle
4. Some Critical Questions
5. Theological Themes

1. Contents.

1.1. The letter begins with a salutation that is both like (e.g., "A to B, greetings!") and unlike (e.g., "from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ") letters that were typical of first-century letter forms (1:1-2) (see Epistle, Epistolary Forms).

1.2. Paul then thanks God for the Philippians, reminds them of his constant prayer* and affection for them, of his confidence in God concerning them, gives a brief account of his imprisonment and the unexpected positive effects it has had and informs them of the likelihood that he will be released from prison* and reunited with them (1:3-26).

1.3. Paul turns from thanks to plead with the Philippians to live in a manner worthy of the gospel* of Christ: harmoniously with one another, striving for the faith of the gospel, unafraid of opponents of the gospel, willing to suffer for the gospel, eager to imitate Christ Jesus in seeking the welfare of others with humility, carrying out responsibilities without murmuring or grumbling and keeping themselves pure and holy, blameless children of God (1:27—2:18).

1.4. Paul tells them of his desire to send Timothy to them, but until he is able to do so, of his intention instead to send back to them Epaphroditus, one of their own people, their messenger to him—a man who had risked his life in order to bring their gifts to him (2:19—3:1).

1.5. The letter changes tone at this point. Paul now begins a bitter attack on those who would subvert the Philippians—upon people who are "enemies of the cross* of Christ." He counters whatever influence they may have had with an assertion of his own authority based not on status but sacrifice, taking the Christ of the Christ hymn* as his model (cf. 3:4-11 with 2:6-11), not on his own self-worth but the exceeding worth of Christ Jesus (3:2-21).

1.6. In conclusion, Paul pleads for unity in the church, especially among its leaders, gives his advice about how Christians are to feel and think and act, relieves the Philippians of any sense of guilt they may have had for those times when they were not able to send him aid, gives them thanks for their renewed generosity and brings the letter to a close with a doxology* to God, greetings to all and a benediction* (4:1-23).

2. The City and Its Citizens.

Philippi was already a very old and historic city when Paul arrived and later wrote his letter to the Christians there. Philip of Macedon had built it in 358-57 B.C. on the site of an ancient Thracian city located eight miles from the sea in a spring-filled, fertile region. He fortified it and named it after himself. Later Philippi became part of the Roman Empire and was made one of the stations along the main overland route connecting Rome with the East. Destroyed by wars, it was rebuilt by the Emperor* Octavian, who established it as a military outpost, populated it with veterans of his wars, made it a Roman colony and gave it the ius italicum—the highest privilege obtainable by a provincial municipality (see Legal System, Roman). Consequently, as the citizens of Rome, so the citizens of Philippi could buy and sell property, were exempt from land tax and the poll tax and were entitled to protection by Roman law. Thus it was that when Paul made his first journey to Europe, he purposely neglected the port city of Neapolis to begin preaching the gospel in the small but more important city of Philippi of the first district of Macedonia (Acts 16:12).

Philippi was inhabited predominantly by Romans, but many Macedonian Greeks and some Jews lived there as well. Its people were proud of their city, proud of their ties with Rome, proud to observe Roman customs and obey Roman laws, proud to be Roman citizens* (cf. Acts 16:21). Twice in this brief letter Paul makes statements that capitalize on this fact: "Only conduct yourselves in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ" (1:27), where the verb he uses for "conduct yourselves," politeuesthe, literally means "to live as a citizen, to live as freepersons," even "to take part in government." By choosing this word Paul seems to be appealing to their pride as Roman citizens, and to be extending this idea now to the church, the new community to which they belong, and of which they must be responsible citizens, abiding by its law of love. Paul's other statement is in 3:20: "For our citizenship [politeuma] is in heaven. . ." Here again his choice of the word politeuma recalls what he said in 1:27 and suggests that once more he is reflecting on the civic status of Philippi as a Roman colony, and reminding the Philippians that they now belong to a higher, more important, more enduring commonwealth. Choosing Philippi, thus, as the place to launch the gospel on European soil fitted in with Paul's mission strategy of selecting important cities of repute and strategic location as ideal centers from which the good news of the gospel might radiate out.

3. The Church and Its Apostle.

Paul came to Philippi as the result of a vision he had while he was in Troas. He saw a "man of Macedonia" and heard him say "Come over . . . and help us." Immediately after the vision Paul and his party left off their attempts to go into Bithynia and decided instead to go into Macedonia, concluding that God had called them to preach the gospel there (Acts 16:9-10). According to the Acts account the first convert to Christianity in Philippi was a woman, Lydia. Although Lydia was a pagan, she nevertheless was a God-fearing person who had been attracted to the lofty ideals of the Jewish religion (Acts 16:14). But when she heard Paul preach the gospel and, as Luke said, God opened her heart, she put her faith in Jesus Christ and along with her household was baptized (16:14-15). These people became the nucleus of the church at Philippi, and while meeting in the home of Lydia they showed great kindness in their generous hospitality to Paul and his companions, prevailing upon them to come and join this household and stay with them (Acts 16:15).

The only other Philippian converts mentioned in Acts were the Roman soldier, who guarded the jail where Paul had been put in prison, and his household (Acts 16:30-33). But the extraordinary circumstances in which the jailer became a Christian generated within him such affection for Paul and Silas that he washed their wounds, brought them into his house and spread his table with food for them to eat.

The reactions of these two people, one a distinguished and wealthy woman and one a Roman soldier, and of those around them toward the apostle set the tone for the relationship that was to endure between the church at Philippi and Paul. It is obvious from this brief letter, no doubt one of several he wrote to the Philippians (see Polycarp's Letter to the Philippians 3.2), that not only did he have a deep affection for the Philippians, but they as well for him (cf. 1:7; 4:16). When he addresses them he does not do so as "Paul the apostle" but only as a servant of Christ Jesus—he had no need to convince them of his authority. This is not to say, however, that there were not things happening in this church that grieved Paul and against which he raised his voice. Apparently there were divisions between groups of people there (1:27; 2:2), with people who were selfish, conceited and looking out only for their own interests (2:3-4). There were people who were murmuring and grumbling (2:14) and people who simply could not get along with others (4:2)—and all within the church. In a gentle fashion, holding up before them the way of the Christ, he graciously calls them back to harmony and mutual concern one for another.

Little else is known about the composition of the church in Philippi, but names such as Epaphroditus, Euodia, Syntyche and Clement—all mentioned by Paul as members of this church (Phil 2:25; 4:2-3)—indicate that this first Christian church on European soil was made up largely of Greeks. Furthermore, it is safe to infer that from its inception women played an important role in this church, even in its leadership. Not only was its first convert a woman, a woman of wealth and influence (Acts 16:14), but it is possible that all the other women who had met with Lydia for prayer by the riverside even before Paul came to Philippi (Acts 16:13) also were led to faith in Jesus Christ by her example and testimony. It is a fact worthy of note that of the four Philippians mentioned by name in this letter, two of them are women and are designated by Paul as women who worked hard alongside him in the proclamation of the gospel (Phil 4:3) (see Man and Woman).

4. Some Critical Questions.

4.1. Authorship. Although the letter to the Philippians opens with the words "[From] Paul and Timothy" (1:1), it is clear that whatever may have been the reason for Timothy's name being linked together with that of the apostle, it was Paul alone who was responsible for this letter and its contents. The tone of the letter is far too personal to be otherwise. For example, Paul's use of the singular personal pronouns "I," "me," "my"—occurring fifty-one times in such a short letter—alone argues for this. But, in addition, Timothy's name reappears again only in 2:19 and not at all, as might be expected, in the final salutation. In effect, therefore, it is Paul alone who lays claim to being the author of Philippians.

Historically the church has accepted this claim without question—Polycarp of Smyrna, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian and others not only quoted from Philippians but assigned it solely to Paul (see Paul in Early Church Tradition). In the nineteenth century, however, some thinkers began to doubt that Paul had written Philippians. The most articulate of these thinkers was F. C. Baur (Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ). Baur's historical studies led him to the conclusion that Paul wrote none of the letters that bear his name, including Philippians, except Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians and Galatians. In spite of the great power and erudition with which Baur argued, his arguments were not convincing nor widely adopted. Eventually they fell into disuse and essentially disappeared. From time to time, however, other scholars have attempted to revive his thesis, but with little or no success. It is thus safe to say that the vast majority of those who study the NT today are certain that Paul was responsible for Philippians and that the question of the genuineness of this letter has only historical significance.

4.2. Unity. Is Philippians a single letter, or is it in reality a composite of several letters written by Paul? In the second century A.D. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, wrote to the church at Philippi mentioning that Paul had sent them "letters" (3.2). This remark of Polycarp's, combined with the following features within Philippians itself, are sufficient reasons for many to regard this single letter in reality to be two or more letters fused together into one: (1) the quiet, orderly preparation for the conclusion of the letter at 3:1; (2) the radical change of tone from the rest of the letter beginning at 3:2 and continuing through 4:3; (3) the observation that 3:1 fits together so exactly with 4:4; and (4) the fact that Paul waits to the end of the letter to thank the Philippians for their generosity to him.

The reasons for considering Philippians a composite letter are weighty—as are those against such a consideration: (1) The fact that there is a disjointedness about Philippians and that Paul does interrupt himself at 3:2 should not be surprising in a personal, conversational letter, perhaps not all written or dictated at one time, by a person accustomed to abrupt shifts of style without notice (cf. Rom 16:16-19; 1 Thess 2:13-16). (2) There are no Greek manuscripts, no matter how far back one goes, nor is there any early Church Father offering the slightest indication that Philippians ever appeared in a form different from that which now exists. (3) It is difficult to isolate one part of the letter from another because the same terms, word-roots and motifs pervade all of its so-called parts. Furthermore, the development of Paul's argument in one part of the letter often depends on what he has said in another part (cf. especially 2:6-11 with 3:7-11; and 2:6-11 with 3:20-21; see Hooker, 331-333). (4) If 3:1 and 4:4 fit together so perfectly that chapter 3 must be considered a separate letter, it is difficult to explain why any thinking scribe intent on unifying the various letters would have placed it here where it seemingly fractures the unity of the whole. The same goes for the so-called letter of thanks (4:10-20). Why would an intelligent scribe, desiring to weave the Philippian letters together into a single letter, place this particular "letter" at the end and not at the beginning?

There is thus no compelling reason to doubt that Philippians came fresh from Paul as a single letter and not as several letters later made into one by some anonymous redactor. Hence, Philippians should be treated by interpreters as a unified whole.

4.3. Place and Date. The place and time of Paul's writing the letter to the Philippians are important questions with a bearing on the interpretation of the text, particularly the issues of the identity of Paul's opponents and the nature of their opposition.

4.3.1. Place. Before it is possible to determine the provenance of Philippians, several factors must first be kept in mind: (1) that Paul was in prison when he wrote (Phil 1:7, 13, 17); (2) that he faced a trial that could end in his death (1:19-20; 2:17) or acquittal (1:25; 2:24); (3) that there was a praetorium where he was held (1:13), as well as people who belonged to Caesar's household* (4:22); (4) that Timothy was with Paul (1:1; 2:19-23); (5) that extensive, effective evangelistic efforts were going on around him (1:14-17); (6) that Paul planned to visit Philippi when he was acquitted (2:24) and (7) that apparently several trips—possibly as many as four—back and forth between Philippi and the place from which Paul wrote Philippians were made by different people within the time span of his imprisonment.

4.3.1.1. Rome. As the hypothetical place from which Paul wrote Philippians, Rome not only meets most of these criteria, but is the oldest and longest-held view, dating from as far back as the second century A.D. and the Marcionite prologues. Paul was a prisoner in Rome under house arrest for at least two years (Acts 28:30). Here he had soldiers guarding him (28:16), yet he was given a certain degree of freedom to receive guests and gifts and to write and send off letters (28:17, 30). Here he was free to preach the gospel (28:31). Here he would stand before Caesar and here his fate would ultimately be decided. Here were the praetorium (Phil 1:13) and "the people of Caesar's household" (4:22), which included the imperial guard and the slaves and free persons in the employ of the emperor. Here also was a church sufficiently large and not all that loyal to Paul, not having been founded by him, which might have divided into the factions Paul refers to in his letter (cf. Phil 1:14-17).

And yet to identify Rome as the place from which Paul wrote Philippians is not without its problems: (1) the distance between Rome and Philippi makes it difficult, some would argue, to fit the number of trips between these two cities into the time frame of Paul's prison term. (2) There is no indication in the Acts account that Timothy was with Paul in Rome, whereas Philippians 1:1 makes it clear that Timothy was with him wherever it was he wrote this letter. (3) Paul's intent was to visit Philippi upon his release from prison (2:24), and yet his earlier-stated plan was to quit the East and focus on mission fields in the West, especially Spain (Rom 15:24-28). (4) It has been inferred from 1:30 and 4:15-16 (cf. also 2:12, 22) that Paul is stating here that he had not returned to Philippi since he and Timothy had founded the church there—a statement he could not have made were he writing from Rome, since he had been to Philippi twice between the establishment of the Philippian church (Acts 16) and his journey to Rome (Acts 20:1-6).

4.3.1.2. Ephesus. Modern scholarship has suggested that Ephesus* was the place from which Paul wrote Philippians. The following reasons are given in support of this hypothesis: (1) Reference to the praetorium can point to the residence of any provincial governor in Ephesus or elsewhere (cf. Mt 27:27; Jn 18:28, 33). (2) Timothy was with Paul in Ephesus (Acts 19:22; Phil 1:1). (3) The distance between Ephesus and Philippi is minimal in comparison with that between Rome and Philippi and eliminates the time problem that requires several journeys back and forth between Philippi and the place of Paul's imprisonment. (4) Extensive evangelistic activity went on in and around Ephesus while Paul was there (Acts 19:10, 25-26; cf. Phil 1:12-14) as well as contention over Paul and his teaching (Acts 19:2-9; cf. Phil 1:15). (5) Paul refers to his being imprisoned on several occasions (2 Cor 11:23). Consequently, the fact that Acts makes no mention of his being put in prison in Ephesus is not necessarily an argument against the possibility that he was indeed imprisoned there (cf. 1 Cor 15:32; 2 Cor 1:8).

The Ephesian hypothesis, although it enjoys increasing popularity, is not without serious objections: (1) It rests mainly on inference from those texts just cited. (2) Nothing is said in Philippians about the "collection"* for the poor in Jerusalem*—certainly a matter of immense importance to Paul during his Ephesian stay—and for Paul to accept gifts for himself from the church at Philippi during this period of fund raising for the Jerusalem church is inconceivable (Phil 2:25; 4:10-20). (3) The church in the city from which Paul wrote was a divided church—divided over him (Phil 1:15-17)—a fact that does not at all fit the picture of the church in Ephesus (Acts 19; 20:17-31). (4) Paul speaks rather harshly about all the Christians around him except for Timothy (Phil 2:19-21), a strange feature when his best friends, Priscilla and Aquila, were in Ephesus when he was (Acts 18:2, 18, 24-26; 1 Cor 16:19).

4.3.1.3. Corinth. Several factors suggest the possibility of Corinth as the place from which Philippians was written: (1) Corinth was in close geographical proximity to Philippi, closer even than Ephesus. (2) A proconsul was in Corinth (Acts 18:12), and consequently a praetorium and a "household of Caesar" was there. (3) Apparently Paul wrote Philippians before his polemic with Jewish Christians who came from James in Jerusalem (cf. Gal 2:12), for there is no mention of his apostleship in this letter; thus it was probably written before 1 Corinthians* (a letter Paul wrote from Ephesus) while he was still in Corinth. (4) The severe opposition Paul faced in Corinth, even mortal danger, and the night vision of encouragement that came to him because of it (Acts 18:10), paralleling that which came to him while in prison in Jerusalem (Acts 23:11), allows one to infer that Paul's enemies had had him arrested, put in prison and threatened with death. But comforted by this nocturnal call to courage he could be confident of release and could assure the Philippians of this fact (Phil 1:25; 2:24).

The objections to this hypothesis are similar to those raised against the Ephesian hypothesis: (1) The hypothesis is totally based on conjecture, and (2) Paul's harsh remarks about those around him (2:19-20) make no sense when one realizes that Priscilla and Aquila were also with Paul when he was in Corinth (Acts 18:1-2, 18).

4.3.1.4. Caesarea. Another suggested provenance for Philippians—that of Caesarea—though late in its formulation, makes a great deal of sense and harmonizes with most of the essential facts: (1) Luke specifically says that Paul was imprisoned in Caesarea in the praetorium of Herod (Acts 23:35)—the residence of the Roman procurator (see Political Systems) and headquarters for the Roman garrison in Palestine. (2) Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea was a long one (Acts 24:27) allowing time for several communications to travel* back and forth from Caesarea to Philippi. (3) Although Paul was kept in custody, he was nevertheless given considerable liberty with opportunity to be aided by his friends (Acts 24:23; cf. Phil 2:25-30; 4:10-20). (4) Philippians 1:7 implies that Paul had already been given a hearing and had made a defense for himself and his gospel, while 1:16 indicates that Paul still lay in prison in spite of his defense. This harmonizes with the events that took place in Caesarea (Acts 24:1-27), whereas the story of Paul in Rome concludes by describing him as a prisoner, leaving no hint that he had made any defense of any kind (Acts 28:16-31). (5) When Paul wrote to the Philippians he was confident he would be released from prison (1:24-26) and would visit them on his journey west (2:24; cf. Rom 1:13-15; 15:23-29). Here again is a close correlation between the statements in Philippians and those in Acts (19:21; 23:11). Paul's plans to move west were large in his thinking because he believed his work in the east was done (Rom 15:20, 23-24). To assume then that he later changed his mind and made plans to return east from Rome would be a perplexing assumption and one without foundation in fact. It is not unreasonable, however, to assume that Paul would want to return to Philippi on his way from Caesarea westward, in order to see his loyal and generous friends.

The objections to Caesarea are not sufficient to eliminate the assumption that this was the place from which Paul wrote to the Philippians: (1) The objection that the distance from Caesarea to Philippi is too great for the number of communications back and forth is overruled in part by the length of Paul's stay in the Caesarean prison. Too much, thus, may have been made of this matter of distance when considering either Rome or Caesarea. (2) The objection that wherever Paul was when he wrote Philippians he was facing the very real possibility of death is also not a valid objection to Caesarea (cf. Acts 21:31, 36; 22:22; 23:30). It is true that as a Roman citizen Paul had the right of appeal to Caesar, but if the Jews could have proved that he had violated their Temple* by bringing a Gentile into that part of the Temple forbidden to Gentiles, thus desecrating their holy place, then even as a Roman citizen he would, under Jewish Law, have been liable to death at the hands of the Jews (cf. Acts 25:11, and see Josephus, J.W. 5.193-94; Ant. 15.417).

Not all questions can be answered in this matter, and in reality there is no possibility of knowing with absolute certainty where it was that Paul wrote Philippians. Yet for the sake of trying to understand this letter, and especially in the interest of trying to identify the opponents mentioned in it, it may be argued that Caesarea fits the evidence as well as, or perhaps better than, any other theory of the letter's provenance.

4.3.2. Date. If Paul wrote the letter to the Philippians from Rome, then he wrote it sometime in the early 60s, between A.D. 60 and 63; if from Ephesus, between A.D. 54 and 57; if from Corinth, about A.D. 50. But if he wrote this letter from Caesarea, then he wrote it sometime in the period A.D. 58-60.

4.4. Opponents. The opponents* mentioned in Philippians cannot be understood as a single group of people, but as several. One group opposed Paul himself, and though they preached Christ, they did so for the purpose of adding to Paul's sufferings while he was in prison. These were fellow Christians, irrespective of such a hostile attitude on their part, for Paul calls them "brothers" (1:14-15). These Christians may have had a divine-man theology that made them view such matters as humility, meekness, imprisonment and suffering—things that Paul advocated or was experiencing—as proof that he knew nothing of the triumphant power of Christ and hence was an unworthy candidate for a Christian leader who might be emulated. Or they may have been Judaizers,* who taught not only the need for faith in Christ but the necessity also of keeping the Jewish Law,* including circumcision* and regulations about food* and drink, and who thus were at odds with Paul since he held tenaciously to the necessity of faith in Christ but rejected the necessity of keeping the Law.

But there was also a second group of opponents—people very different from those in the group mentioned above. These had threatened the Philippians, had made them afraid because of their threats and had tried to undermine the firmness of the Philippians' faith in the gospel (1:27-29). Very likely this group was the same as those Paul would call "dogs," "evil workers," "mutilators" (3:2), "enemies of the cross of Christ" (3:18), people "whose end is destruction" (3:18). They can hardly be identified as Judaizers—that is, Jewish Christians—but rather as Jews, Jewish missionaries in particular, who aggressively pushed for converts at Philippi, even with force. They proclaimed a message that righteousness* and perfection were attainable "now" (cf. Phil 3:12-15) by submitting to circumcision and complying with certain ritual laws (3:19)—a message that offered visible and tangible tokens of God's favor in the present, not in the future and invisible world. Paul's exceedingly harsh words in 3:2 probably reflect his own frustration over the fanatical and unrelenting opposition he was encountering from the Jews both in Jerusalem and Caesarea (Acts 21:37—26:32; cf. 28:19).

4.5. The Christ-Hymn. Philippians 2:6-11 is the prime example of an early Christian hymn. But who wrote it and what was the source of the ideas expressed here? Many scholars consider that Paul was its author

(cf. Martin 1960) and this has been the traditional view. The way in which this section dovetails so perfectly into Paul's argument in chapter 2 and into the whole tenor of the letter does not immediately lead one to look for another writer. Some scholars, however, have seen features of style, vocabulary and doctrine in the hymn that suggest a composer other than Paul. But whether it was the work of Paul or some other Christian hymn writer makes little difference, since it fits Paul's purpose at this point, harmonizes with his own thinking as he writes to the Philippians and is incorporated into his letter without reservation.

Scholars have looked in many different directions for the source of the ideas in this hymn. Some have suggested the background of the Gnostic* "Redeemed-Redeemer" myth that describes the descent into this world of a "light-person," who comes to bring knowledge to the sons of light, appears in human form and endures misery, pain and suffering like other humans until he leaves this world and returns to the world of light (Bultmann, 1.167).

Others have looked to the Adam theme from the Old Testament (see Adam). Both Adam and Christ were human beings made in the image of God (Gen 1:26; Phil 2:6, "image" and "form" being treated as synonymous), but whereas Adam disobeyed and grasped after being like God, Christ obeyed God and instead of grasping for equality with God chose the way of servanthood and mortality. As a consequence the first Adam was cast out of paradise because of his self-seeking, but the last Adam, Christ, was exalted by God and given the highest place because of his self-giving (Dunn, 114-21; but contrast Wright).

Perhaps one does not need to look so far afield as these scholars have suggested. There is recorded in the gospel tradition (Jn 13:3-17) an incident from the life of Christ that provides an almost perfect model for the movement of the Christ hymn of Philippians 2. Both the Fourth Evangelist and Paul begin what they have to say in a similar fashion. John starts his narrative by saying that Jesus washed his disciples' feet (the work of a slave/servant) because he knew that the Father had given everything into his hands and that he himself had come out from God and was going back to God (John 13:3; cf. Hawthorne 1983, 78-79). The Philippian hymn begins by stating "that Jesus, being in the form of God and yet not taking advantage of his being equal with God, took the form of a slave, and did the work of a servant (Phil 2:6-8). The entire hymn preserves the descent-ascent motif that is prominent in the Gospel story (13:3-17)" (Hawthorne 1987, 65).

5. Theological Themes.

Because of its theological themes, the influence of the letter to the Philippians on the church seems to be out of all proportion to its size. Perhaps this in large part is due to the exquisite Christ hymn (2:6-11), a hymn that elegantly sums up Paul's teaching about the person of Jesus Christ and of the nature of God (see Christology).

While providing a magnificent description of Jesus Christ—pre-existent,* equal with God, becoming incarnate, a human being, a servant, totally obedient to God, in turn exalted by God to the highest place in heaven or on earth, the object of worship* for all created beings to the glory of God the Father—this hymn also articulately describes who God really is. For Jesus Christ, who shared the very nature of God and acted out of that nature, showed by what he chose to do and by what he in fact did that God's true nature is not characterized by seizing, grasping or attaining, but rather by sharing, by open-handed giving and by pouring oneself out for others in order to enrich them.

Whether or not Paul composed this hymn, it undoubtedly was an integral part of the letter and not a later interpolation because by it Paul provides the Philippians with the basis of his ethical* appeal. He begs them to live humbly, generously, unself-consciously, while being thoughtfully concerned for the welfare of those around them (2:1-5), for this was the attitude that Christ Jesus possessed and that governed all of his conduct—an attitude to be emulated by all who call themselves by his name.

The Christ hymn is not the only factor contributing to the influence of Philippians. Here in this letter one also finds Paul's motto for life, which in turn has become the life motto for many Christians ever since: "For me to live is Christ; to die is gain" (1:21). These two statements, coupled with the one that follows, namely that "to depart and to be with Christ is a very much better thing [than living]," have had great theological significance. They suggest that the condition of Christians who die in the Lord is one of conscious happiness beyond anything experienced on earth. If indeed they do make such a suggestion, they then raise the question of the need for the resurrection* of the body* or for a new body from heaven* (see Cullmann; but see also Phil 3:20-21) (see Immortality; Intermediate State).

Furthermore, there is in Philippians the often-quoted remark of Paul, "work out your own salvation* . . . for it is God who is at work in you" (2:12-13). This remark, rarely put in its context so as to be properly understood, has influenced the thinking both of those who argue for the sovereignty of God, and of those who champion the free will of human beings. In the context of Philippians 2, Paul is not using the word salvation to refer to eschatological salvation, the salvation of one's eternal soul, but rather to the health of the Christian community in Philippi. Torn apart by conceit, pride and selfishness (2:3-4) the Philippians hear in these words the urging of the apostle to follow the example of Christ (2:5-11), to humble themselves and to take the role of the servant, to work obediently at bringing healing (i.e., "salvation") to their church and to work at this task until it is accomplished. If they do this, they will discover that they have only been cooperating with God, who is already at work among them giving them these desires for wholeness and the energy to fulfil their desires.

In all of Paul's letters, perhaps the most important single statement having to do with the doctrine of sanctification* is found in Philippians 3:8-16. Holiness* described here is an ever-increasing apprehension of the surpassing worth of Jesus Christ by the Christian, with nothing whatsoever allowed to destroy or diminish this apprehension. In turn it is also an apprehension of the Christian by Jesus Christ. Both elements are present—the work of God or Christ, and the work of the Christian. Sanctification for Paul, therefore, allows room for growth, increase, advancement and progress on the part of the Christian (1:9, 25). As the many imperatives present throughout this letter indicate, sanctification in fact demands progress (e.g., 4:8-9; see Beker, 218-19).

Finally, the theme of joy* that runs throughout Philippians has had a profound influence on Christians through the centuries, drawing them back to this letter again and again. Here one learns that joy is not so much a feeling as it is a settled state of mind characterized by peace, an attitude that views life—including all of its ups and downs—with equanimity. It is a confident way of looking at life that is rooted in faith in the living Lord of the church (1:25; 3:1; 4:4, 10). For Paul joy is an understanding of existence that makes it possible for one to accept both elation and depression, to accept with creative submission events that bring either delight or dismay, because joy allows one to see beyond any particular event to the sovereign Lord who stands above all events.

See also CAESAR'S HOUSEHOLD, IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD; CHRISTOLOGY; IMITATION OF PAUL/OF CHRIST; JOY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: K. Barth, The Epistle to the Philippians (Richmond: John Knox, 1962); F. W. Beare, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians (HNTC; New York: Harper, 1959); J.-F. Collange, The Epistle of Saint Paul to the Philippians (London: Epworth, 1979); J. Gnilka, Der Philipperbrief (HTKNT 10/3; Freiburg: Herder, 1976); G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC 43; Waco: Word, 1983); J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (London: Macmillan, 1894); R. P. Martin, The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959); idem, Philippians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976); J. H. Michael, The Epistle to the Philippians (MNTC; London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1928); P. T. O'Brien, The Epistle to the Philippians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); M. Silva, Philippians (WEC; Chicago: Moody Press, 1988). Studies: J. M. Bassler, ed., Pauline Theology vol I: Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); F. C. Baur, Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ, 2 vols. (London: Williams and Norgate, 1875); J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. (New York: Scribners, 1951); O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or the Resurrection of the Dead (London: Epworth, 1958); J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); D. E. Garland, "The Composition and Literary Unity of Philippians: Some Neglected Factors," NovT 27 (1985) 141-73; G. F. Hawthorne, Word Biblical Themes: Philippians (Waco: Word, 1987); M. D. Hooker, "ΠΙΣΤΙΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ," NTS 35 (1989) 331-33; L. Hurtado, "Jesus as Lordly Example in Phil. 2:5-11," in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, ed. J. C. Hurd and G. P. Richardson (Waterloo: Laurier University Press, 1984); R. P. Martin, An Early Christian Confession: Philippians ii. 5-11 in Recent Interpretation (London: Tyndale Press, 1960); idem, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii. 5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); D. F. Watson, "A Rhetorical Analysis of Philippians, and Its Implications for the Unity Question," NovT 30 (1988) 57-88. N. T. Wright, "Harpagmos and the Meaning of Philippians ii.5-11," JTS 37 (Oct 1986) 321-52.

G. F. Hawthorne

PHILO. See PHILOSOPHY.

PHILOSOPHY

There were four main philosophies that held the intellectual field in the first century A.D.: the Middle Platonists, the (Later) Stoa, the Peripatetics and the Epicureans. In addition there were Cynics who begged for a living and mixed with the people, offering moral advice on a popular level. In the ancient world philosophy was considered a normal part of the education that would prepare a youth for a public career or even military leadership. Hence philosophy's influence was widespread among the upper classes and people of wealth who could afford an education. Few studied to be professional philosophers or read more than a tiny selection of primary texts, but digests of a school's dogma such as we find in Diogenes Laertius were a common source of knowledge. Paul's hometown of Tarsus boasted a flourishing school of philosophy. Though it is unlikely that he attended, it is reasonable to suppose that Paul met with some philosophy in his youth, even if his training may have been in Jerusalem.* Jewish literature of the Hellenistic era shows the influence of Greek philosophy (see Hellenism).

1. Schools of Philosophy
2. Paul and Hellenistic Philosophy

1. Schools of Philosophy.

1.1. Common Elements. Platonism, Aristotelianism and Stoicism shared some common characteristics with one another and with Hellenistic thought generally. All maintained that there was a supreme deity above and behind every other supernatural force, yet the reality of the traditional pantheon of gods was seldom challenged. These were regarded as the children or servants of the highest deity, and were sometimes called daimones (see Demons). Philosophy in the late Hellenistic and Imperial eras was rarely atheistic; the ancient philosopher studied what we would call "theology" together with physics, logic and other subjects. Cicero even complained that the Stoics were "pitiably and distressingly superstitious" (De Div. 2.86). Most philosophers of these three schools from the first century B.C. onward supported a rationalized version of traditional belief in the gods (see Religions). Still, Hellenistic philosophy remained aloof from popular piety and was critical of the myths of the gods, particularly their anthropomorphism and portrayal of the gods in trivial quarrels, human passions and immoral activities.

The Middle Platonists and Peripatetics held that God was utterly transcendent, an immaterial divine force, pure mind or rationality. God's will was performed by lesser gods in order to avoid contact with matter. His dwelling place was beyond the moon, in the sphere of serene order where the stars moved. The Stoics, however, were immanentists in their view of God. All three schools held the highest and most divine attribute of God to be mind (nous) or reason (logos). Hence the reasoning portion of the human soul was also regarded as divine, a portion or "seed" of God.

1.2. Epicureans. The Epicureans, though believing in the gods as "blessed and immortal beings," tended to live as though religion were irrelevant. They explained everything in terms of natural forces, and believed everything to be composed of "atoms" (Diogenes Laertius Vit. 10.38-44). The random collision of atoms was the cause of every natural event, and chance predominated. They also upheld the validity of free will in opposition to fatalism. The goal of philosophy was to free people from all fears or trouble, enabling tranquility of mind to flourish (ataraxia; Diogenes Laertius Vit. 10.82, 117, 120, 131-35).

Epicureans became infamous for defining pleasure as the primary good that was to be pursued in life (Diogenes Laertius Vit. 10:128-29). Though Epicurus qualified this by noting that excess (whether in eating or in immorality) was incompatible with true pleasure and ataraxia, his followers were frequently lambasted by other philosophers as effeminate or profligate.

1.3. Middle Platonists. Plato had held that the rational element of the human soul was immortal. While this reason was bestowed by the God who formed the universe (the Demiurge), the formation of the rest of the human person was entrusted to lesser gods who were themselves creations of the Demiurge (Plato Tim. 40a, 41a-43a). These lesser gods also contributed the mortal parts of the soul—the "irrational passions" and appetites. By the first century A.D. even the Demiurge was thought to be a lesser god, making the supreme deity vastly remote from the material world. This tended to lead to a denigration of material things as inferior substances, and the body especially as a hindrance to progress toward God. The body, however, was rarely held to be evil in nature (see Body).

The universe of Middle Platonism was peopled with a host of intermediary beings who acted as servants of the supreme God, who were also involved in oracles and who attended sacrifices and mystery celebrations (Plutarch Def. Orac. 416d-417b; Fac. Lun. 944c-d). A person's ascent toward deity, intended to free the soul from its cycle of reincarnation and attachment to a body, was made via the pursuit of philosophy (Plato Tim. 90b-c; cf. Plutarch Fac. Lun. 943d; Gen. Socr. 593d-594a). Divine reason, such as was implanted in humans, had also been put into different sorts of "bodies" which became stars or demigods. Thus in the Platonic tradition we have already a basis for developments in later astral religion and Gnosticism (see Gnosis, Gnosticism).

1.4. Peripatetics. The Peripatetics followed Aristotle (384-322 B.C.), the disciple of Plato. Aristotle was much more empirical and inductive in his method than Plato. He rejected Plato's immaterial soul, believing soul to be inseparable from the body except for the power of thought. Though Aristotle's works began enjoying a revival among philosophers in the late first century B.C., the Peripatetic school had assimilated a great deal of Platonism and for our purpose is of little importance.

1.5. Stoics. Stoicism could be characterized as a religious materialism which was pantheistic. The Stoa rejected "immaterial substance"; for them all that was real was material—including God. God was variously described as "fire," "reason" (logos) or "spirit" (pneuma). "Spirit" for the Stoic, though, was a material substance, very unlike the Jewish-Christian Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit). God was said to exist in everything throughout the universe, sometimes as "spirit." He shapes Fate and all reality according to divine reason. Despite its materialism Stoicism was not atheism, and it could express profound reverence for God and his wisdom in shaping nature. It is from a Stoic poet who was also a fellow Cilician, Aratus, that Paul is said to quote in his Areopagus speech: "We are his offspring" (Acts 17:28; see Athens). Several other Stoic teachers came from Paul's hometown of Tarsus, including Athenodorus who was close to the emperor Augustus, and who in his later years returned to Tarsus to become its leading citizen.

Stoicism became for a short time the leading philosophy of the early empire, a favorite with the Romans. Though the early Stoa had a wide range of interests, by the first century A.D. ethics seems to have almost completely dominated the school's interest. The overarching question became, "How can the wise man live in accordance with nature?" The life according to nature included the thought of a life lived rationally, in concord with the rational-divine part of human nature and in acceptance of one's fate from God (which was inevitable anyway). This was believed to lead to a virtuous life, and virtue was the only absolute "good" which the Stoa recognized. All else, including health, wealth, strength, beauty, even life or death (see Life and Death), was termed "indifferent" (adiaphora) because, it was said, such things made no difference to the wise person's virtue or happiness. The ideal Stoic life was a highly individualistic, self-centered pursuit of "virtue" in complete independence from any external supports. The Stoa developed the ethical diatribe (see Rhetoric), which was adopted by many who did not consider themselves Stoics—including Plutarch and Paul.

1.6. Cynics. Cynicism was a predecessor of Stoicism; it is often thought to have been more a way of life than a philosophy (Diogenes Laertius Vit. 6.103), and Malherbe notes the Cynic lifestyle was combined with philosophies quite disparate in essence. The key to Cynic thought is a consistent life lived "according to nature." This is interpreted to mean an independence from all external props, living only with the barest essentials. The famous Diogenes of Sinope (founder of Cynicism) lived in a barrel with only a cloak and a cup to his name, eventually giving up the cup as well. The Cynic was known by his ragged cloak and his begging (though some were said to work). Typically they rejected social norms and were proud of their "shamelessness," though they saw themselves as moral reformers. The Cynic ideal of "boldness" (parrēsia) in speech was displayed by public preaching which was often caustic, abusive and arrogant in exposing the "sins" of the audience. They compared their manner to surgery on a patient with gangrene. They seem never to have been interested in speculative thought, limiting their attention in general to ethics. Of all the schools the Cynics were the ones most willing to work with common people.

1.7. Philo of Alexandria. Philo (c.30 B.C.-c.A.D. 45) was a Jewish scholar who wrote extensively on the Pentateuch, using the allegorical method to make the texts present lessons in philosophy and ethics. His works show a thorough acquaintance with classical literature, philosophy and rhetoric. In his philosophical outlook he was primarily a Middle Platonist (cf. Philo Op. Mund.; Migr. Abr. 2.9; 11.62), though heavily influenced by Stoicism in his ethics (cf. Philo Omn. Prob. Lib.; Migr. Abr. 22.127-28; 36.197; Abr. 1.5-6), and in his appropriation of the Stoic concepts of the logos of God and the world-"spirit" (pneuma). The latter two concepts were reshaped in Philo under the influence of his Judaism, so as to become much more personal than they were in Stoicism.

Though Philo's philosophy was very Greek, he remained loyal to Judaism, upholding monotheism and the divine inspiration of the Jewish Law.* He still regarded the literal meaning of the Law as a necessary companion to its allegorical meaning, and obedience to the Law as necessary to following the path of spiritual perfection (Migr. Abr. 16.93; 25.457—26.458). Like Paul, Philo saw Abraham* (along with Isaac and Jacob) as an important model for the virtuous person, as somehow superior to the Law. Abraham is said to have achieved a perfect life "according to nature"; the patriarchs were "living laws," while the Mosaic code is merely a record of their lifestyle (Abr. 1.5-6; 11.52; 46.276; Migr. Abr. 22.127—23.131). And Abraham represents not simply a historical person but the journey of every soul which seeks God (Abr. 14.66; 15.68; Migr. Abr. 1.2). For Philo the virtuous life was a journey of the soul which ends in a closer communion with the divine "powers" which are God's intermediaries in the world; some might say Philo believed in a mystical union with God (see Mysticism). He certainly believed in prophecy* and in ecstatic divine possession (see Visions, Ecstatic Experience; Migr. Abr. 7.34-35).

2. Paul and Hellenistic Philosophy.

2.1. General Observations. It can be seen from this survey that there were many items Paul held in common with the philosophers as well as many differences. Nearly all who thought deeply about the subject held God to be a moral being whose actions are justifiable even if we cannot always explain them. Paul had in common with Platonists the conception of God as an immaterial being, but he did not see God as remote from the material world. Paul conceived of God as involved in his creation* where he reveals himself, calls* people to repentance and faith* in his Son Jesus Christ* and saves. The foundation for all this was laid in the life and death of Christ,* and upon this are based God's continuing dealings with humankind via preaching* and the Holy Spirit* (e.g., 1 Thess 1:4-6, 9-10; Gal 1:3-4; 1 Cor 1:18-25, 30; 2 Cor 5:17-21; Eph 1:3-14). In this respect Paul bears outward similarity with the Stoic view of God as immanent, though Paul never identified God with nature or the universe as the Stoa did. Thus Paul can say "all things are from him and through him and for him"—a very Stoic-sounding phrase (Rom 11:36; cf. Col 1:16). Yet God remains transcendent over the world he has created (1 Cor 8:6; Col 1:15-19; Eph 4:6). To Hellenistic philosophers the supreme deity could be said to be a craftsman or shaper of the universe, but he does not create from nothing (see World, Cosmology); matter is coeternal with him (or in the case of Stoicism, nature is coextensive with him). In light of this view of matter it is interesting that Paul regards Jesus not only as God's instrument in creation, but as having preceded the physical universe: "he is before all things" (Col 1:17).

A major difference between Paul and contemporary philosophers was their approach to the knowledge* of God. Whereas philosophy asserted that reasoning from certain first principles was the proper manner to attain knowledge of God and the world, for Paul this knowledge could only be received as revelation from God, mediated through the Spirit and proclaimed in preaching (1 Cor 1:17-18; 2:6-16). "Wisdom"* cannot be obtained from below. This may be in part because all such reason is tainted with sin, but the explanation Paul gives is that in this way all humanity is placed in need of God's grace,* utterly bereft of any means of self-exaltation (1 Cor 1:19-25).

The only place in Paul (or the NT) where the term philosophy occurs is at Colossians 2:8, "Watch out that no one take you captive through the philosophy and empty deception that is in line with human traditions, with the elements of the world, and is not in line with Christ." What Paul had in view here is not the "standard" philosophies but the speculative mixture of ideas from Judaism, Hellenistic religion and philosophy that were apparently current at Colossae (see Colossians). Paul answers it with an assertion of the tradition "in line with Christ" (kata Christon)—that is, it is a tradition both about Christ and one which befits his person.

Paul's best-known encounter with philosophy is recorded in Acts 17:16-34. There Luke portrays Paul in the Athenian agora, where he draws the attention of some Epicureans and Stoics. Luke's account echoes the Athenians' rejection of Socrates: like Socrates, Paul speaks with anyone in the agora; is accused of introducing "new gods" (kaina daimonia; cf. Plato Apol. 24b-c) and is rejected by many (see Athens). Paul built the first part of his message around the existence of one God who created the world, who cannot be properly said to live in temples* or idols (Acts 17:24-27, 29; see Idolatry). This God is the source of human life, making all people of one family (Acts 17:26, 28-29). Similar sentiments are known to have existed in Greek philosophy, so that there is nothing exclusively Christian about the first half. Yet neither is it unchristian; it establishes a point of contact between the philosophers and Paul, who even quotes two lines of Greek poetry in his support (Acts 17:28): "for in him we live and move and exist" (Epimenides), and "for we are also (members) of his family" (from the Stoic Aratus Phaen. 5).

Toward the end of the speech, the themes of forgiveness* and repentance are introduced (Acts 17:30), which entail a day of judgment* over which Jesus will preside (Acts 17:31), who is not named here but is referred to as "a man whom [God] has appointed," the proof of which is his resurrection* from the dead (Acts 17:31). If considered apart from its literary function in Acts, the speech is a good example of early Christian preaching adapted to a Hellenistic Gentile audience.

Many scholars maintain that Acts 17 is incompatible with the Paul who wrote Romans 1—3, excluding natural theology. But there is nothing in Acts 17 which assumes a saving knowledge of God; and in any case the two audiences (Roman Christians and Athenian pagans) demand a somewhat different address. We must assume that in speaking to Gentiles* Paul would have taken a different point of departure than the OT, and the speech of Acts 17 can be seen to incorporate several common Pauline themes, including the typical apocalyptic elements of resurrection and coming judgment associated with Jesus (cf. 1 Thess 1:9-10; see Stonehouse).

2.2. Paul and Platonism. The idea that things which can be grasped only by the intelligence are more divine than those which are open to sensory examination was a Platonic notion which became an altruism in the Hellenistic era. Thus Paul states "we set our gaze not on what is seen but what is not seen" (2 Cor 4:18, also 2 Cor 5:7; Col 1:5); the idea of invisibility at 1 Timothy 1:17; 6:16, though similar, arises from OT traditions (e.g., Ex 20:4; 33:20). Likewise, the concept of a heavenly archetype, or "idea," on which earthly particulars are modeled comes from the Platonic universe. It is used by Philo (e.g., Leg. All. 1.31) and influences the "allegory" of Galatians 4:24-26, though any Platonic influence on Paul there has doubtless been mediated through Judaism (cf. 1 Cor 15:48-49; Phil 3:21). The "inner man" (see Psychology) of 2 Corinthians 4:16 has a formal parallel in Plato's Republic (IX 589A), but for Plato it is a rational power of will, while Paul's concept is broader than mere rationality and includes an eschatological hope of resurrection existence in wholeness (see Eschatology).

2.3. Stoic Influence in the Letters. The numerous similarities between Paul's language and Stoic language and thought, especially that of Seneca, has long been noted (e.g., Rom 1:19-20, 26; 11:36; 12:1; 1 Cor 3:21-23; 6:12; 7:31; 9:1, 19; 12:12-27; Col 1:16; Eph 4:6; 5:22-6:9). Sevenster and others have demonstrated that in the latter case most similarities are only formal, and that beneath the language lie very different concepts of God, humanity and the relationship between the two. Some view the similarities as a coincidence from the use of a common language, but it is quite possible that Paul was consciously reworking popular Stoic concepts in light of Christian theology. So autarkeia, "self-sufficiency" (2 Cor 9:8), and autarkēs, "self-sufficient" (Phil 4:11), are used as technical terms in Cynic and Stoic dogma to express the contentment of the wise person with a "life in accord with nature" which is achieved by long training and severing any dependence on human society or material goods. In this fashion the wise Stoic becomes a heroic figure who rises even above the gods in achieving independence. But Paul posited for the Christian an autarkeia which is paradoxically a dependent existence flowing from the grace of God. It resembles Cynic or Stoic independence in its renunciation of the need for material wealth, but internally it is very different: it takes its strength not from resolution of will but from the assurance of the favor and presence of God. And it is not self-centered, but is a "contentment" that enables one to be of service to others.

1 Timothy 6:6-8, 12 sounds more Stoic in its concentration on renunciation and the theme of "struggle," though even these are Christianized by being linked with piety (1 Tim 6:6, 11) and faith (1 Tim 6:11, 12)—an ugly word for a philosopher. Another instance is the "natural theology" of Romans 1:19-20. The Stoa greatly developed the theme of the knowledge of God's existence through observation of a rational and purposive order in the universe. However, the Stoic influence here is probably mediated through a Jewish wisdom source, as can be seen from Paul's use of "wrath" (Rom 1:18; see Wrath, Destruction), "what can be known of God" (Rom 1:19, implying also an unknowable essence) and "from the creation of the world" (Rom 1:20). Paul's practice of deliberately using Stoic themes in redefined ways is an early Christian attempt at crosscultural communication, even more significant if Stoicism or a Stoicizing influence were at work in the Gentile churches.

2.4. Paul and Cynic Moral Exhortation. A. Malherbe has demonstrated several thematic and verbal parallels between parts of Paul's letters and the ideal of the "mild" Cynic philosopher as idealized especially by Dio Chrysostom. Most notable is his description of his ministry* in 1 Thessalonians 2. The philosopher who is abused by the crowd, yet speaks "boldly," "without guile," with "purity of mind" (cf. 1 Thess 2:2-3) and attacks the charlatans who deceive their hearers from impure motives (cf. 1 Thess 2:3, 5) was idealized by Dio and others. Even the theme of gentleness in correction was known to some of the milder Cynics (cf. 1 Thess 2:6-8). Again, as with Stoic parallels Paul used available material but in a reoriented framework. His boldness was not due to self-confidence and independence, but to his sense of God's calling—a dependence that might well have repelled a Cynic. The content of his preaching was the gospel, not natural law or asceticism for its own sake.

2.5. Paul and Philo. Most scholars believe Paul was not directly influenced by Philo, though there are some similarities which can be explained by reference to a common Jewish Wisdom* tradition older than either of them. This would explain such things as circumcision* having a symbolic meaning (Philo Migr. Abr. 16.92); or that humanity and the world are "foolish" in comparison to God's understanding and purpose (Migr. Abr. 24.134-38; cf. 1 Cor 1:18-29). Recently some have proposed that the Corinthians had drawn on Philo or a Philonic-type conception of spiritual perfection through a philosophic use of the Law (1 Corinthians; e.g., R. Horsley, J. Davis); or for an understanding of Moses as a glorious, charismatic, Spirit-filled man (2 Corinthians; cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 2.69-70; Martin, 63-64). This is highly unlikely for the situation in 1 Corinthians, where the problems of the mostly Gentile converts have no demonstrably Jewish basis. There may have been, however, some Philonic-type concepts brought into the church by the Jewish-Christian intruders by the time 2 Corinthians was written.

2.6. Summary. While Paul may have used philosophical vocabulary for his apologetic or didactic purposes, he was not constrained by the content or method of the philosophies in vogue. As a man of his era, he was aware of intellectual currents, but he was not concerned as Philo was to reconcile his message with philosophy. Paul holds the gospel to be the only means to divine wisdom (1 Cor 1:21; 2:6-16; cf. Eph 1:15-18).

See also HELLENISM; MYSTERY; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1951, 1955); H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); J. Davis, Wisdom and Spirit (New York: University Press of America, 1984); J. Dillon, The Middle Platonists (London: Gerald Duckworth, 1977); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (WBC 38a-b; Dallas: Word, 1988); R. A. Horsley, "Pneumatikos vs. Psychikos: Distinctions of Spiritual Status among the Corinthians," HTR 69 (1976) 269-88; T. Irwin, A History of Western Philosophy, vol. 1: Classical Thought (Oxford: University Press, 1989); A. A. Long and D. N. Sedley, The Hellenistic Philosophers (2 vols.; Cambridge: University Press, 1987); A. J. Malherbe, Paul and the Popular Philosophers (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Waco: Word, 1986); T. Paige, "Stoicism, ἐλευθερία and Community at Corinth," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church, ed. M. J. Wilkins & T. Paige (JSNTSup 87; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 180-93; F. H. Sandbach, The Stoics (London: Chatto and Windus, 1975); J. N. Sevenster, Paul and Seneca (SNT 4; Leiden: Brill, 1961); N. B. Stonehouse, Paul Before the Areopagus and Other NT Studies (London: Tyndale, 1957).

T. Paige

PLATONISTS. See PHILOSOPHY.

POLITICAL SYSTEMS

Paul the Hebrew of Hebrews (Phil 3:5) and the Roman citizen* (Acts 16:37-38; 22:25-29; 25:7-12) lived within both the Jewish and Roman political systems. Paul's doctrine that one should be obedient to earthly authorities as to God (Rom 13:1-7) indicates that he held himself accountable to both Jewish and Roman political systems (see Civil Authority).

1. Jewish Political System
2. Roman Political System

1. Jewish Political System.

While the Mediterranean world was under Roman rule and Paul called himself a missionary to the Gentiles,* Paul himself was a member of the Jewish Diaspora* and worked in dialogue with the Jewish population. While under Roman rule, Diaspora Jews were accountable to local synagogue rulers, who served as local agents of the Jewish political system. Above them were the Sanhedrin and the high priest. This political system worked to maintain Jewish distinctives within Palestine and the Diaspora and it also taxed Mediterranean Jewry for the Jerusalem Temple. The first function is illustrated by the warnings Paul received that the Jews in Jerusalem would hold him accountable for his mission* work in the Diaspora (Acts 21:4, 10-11). Also, Paul's letter to the Romans* is written with concerns of Jewish authorities in mind (Rom 2:17—3:8, 31; 6:1; 9:1-9; 11:25-36). The second function of the Jewish political system was guaranteed by Augustus's edict in 12 B.C. that the Jews could send money to Jerusalem. This support for the Jerusalem Temple provides the ideological background for Paul's own collection* for the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem* (2 Cor 8—9; Rom 15:25- 31).

1.1. Synagogues and Synagogue Rulers. As communities with official recognition by the municipal and provincial authorities, Jewish citizens were fully under the secular political system. We have the record of the Jewish communities in Alexandria and Sardis being called politeuma in the first century B.C., the term for an organized body of citizens within a Hellenistic city. In Alexandria this politeuma was governed by a council called the gerousia. For the most part, however, the political matters unique to Diaspora Jews were conducted through the local synagogue. During Paul's ministry synagogues retained the status of aedes sacrae (sacred buildings) in Roman law. Synagogues without a permanent fixture for the Torah ark could function as meeting houses of the Jewish community for non-religious matters. Here thefts would be reported, slaves* would be released, the poor would be fed and decisions about community life would be made. Many synagogues also functioned as schools for the religious education of the Jewish youth. The synagogue ruler (archisynagōgos in the NT) functioned as a local political ruler with regard to Jewish affairs. There were a number of synagogue rulers for each synagogue (ten according to an inscription dating from A.D. 56 in Cyrene, SEG 17.823). According to Acts, Paul habitually began his mission outreach in any Hellenistic city by preaching in the synagogue (Acts 9:20-22; 13:5,14; 14:1; 17:1-3). In Acts 13:15 we see the synagogue rulers asking Paul and Barnabas if they would like to speak. Acts 18:8,17 seems to indicate that two synagogue rulers in Corinth (Crispus and Sosthenes) believed in Christ (cf. 1 Cor 1:1).

1.2. Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin (synedrion in the NT) in Paul's day was composed of seventy-one men who were both the religious and political rulers of Jerusalem. The council included the high priest (Acts 23:1-5; Josephus Ant. 4.8.14 §218). In light of the link made by Tannaitic rabbis between the Sanhedrin and the seventy elders who worshipped God at Sinai with Moses (Ex 24:1, 9-11; t. Sanh. 1.6), to stand before the Sanhedrin was not a small matter (cf. Mt 5:22). While the Talmud allowed for Jewish councils in cities outside of Jerusalem (t. Sanh. 1.6; e.g., Josephus, J.W. 2.20.5 §§570-571), in the biblical record Paul does not stand trial before any except the Jerusalem Sanhedrin. This Sanhedrin included both a priestly component and a component of scribes, or teachers of Torah. The former were Sadducean in orientation and the latter were primarily Pharisees. This accounts for Paul's ploy of splitting the council on the issue of the resurrection, a point of disagreement between the two groups (Acts 23:6-9). A third component within the Sanhedrin were the "elders," prominent men who were respected as leaders, though they were not of religious vocation (Mk 15:1; Acts 4:5, 8, 27-28; 23:14; 24:1; 25:15). Acts first presents Paul as a passive but approving accomplice of the Sanhedrin-led stoning of Stephen (Acts 6:12; 7:58; 8:1). It is after years of ministry that he is then a defendant before the Sanhedrin (Acts 22:30-23:9), and later seeks to avoid a death plot in which the Sanhedrin was implicated (Acts 23:12-22).

1.3. High Priest. The high priesthood secured for itself a political function during the Maccabean period. From this time and throughout the ministry of Paul, the high priests were Sadducees. The influence that a high priest (archiereus in the NT) held in Diaspora communities can be seen by Josephus's account (Ant. 14.10.20 §§241-242), in which it is evident that the high priest in Jerusalem sent documents on behalf of Jews in Laodicea, so that they would be able to live with fully Jewish distinctives. Acts confirms such influence of the high priest outside of Palestine, for Acts 9:1-2 describes how Paul had received arrest warrants for Jewish Christians in Damascus from the high priest. Acts 23:1-5; 25:2 show an older Paul, after years of Christian ministry, on the other side of the high priest's favor.

2. Roman Political System.

Officially still a republic, the Roman empire was in Paul's day an imperial system. Referred to as the early Empire, or the Principate, Rome ruled its provinces with a strong hand. Though tradition informs us that Paul was executed by the Romans, there is no reason to doubt Acts' presentation of the Roman political system as generally a positive force in Paul's missionary efforts. Acts typically describes the Romans rescuing Paul from Jewish hands, thus allowing him to continue his witness (Acts 18:12-17; 21:27-40; 23:12-24). Also, it is at Roman expense that Paul traveled to Rome, a trip he had long anticipated (Rom 1:11-13; Acts 27:1—28:16). In the provinces the Romans allowed native rulers to exercise authority so as to maintain order.

2.1. Native Rulers. Rome's efficiency during Paul's lifetime meant that it did not maintain a standardized bureaucracy with each province. Instead it managed the native rulers of various cities and provinces. Because of this one sees a variety of offices that correspond with the NT record of Paul's ministry.

2.1.1. City Magistrates. Unnamed city officials (archontes) appear in the Acts record of Paul's ministry. The rulers of Philippi handed Paul and Silas over for imprisonment (see Prison) after the latter pair had deprived some citizens of their demonically based means of livelihood (Acts 16:16-24). City rulers (politarchēs) who were troubled by the disturbance raised in opposition to Paul's ministry are also mentioned in the account of Paul's visit to Thessalonica (Acts 17:8-9). "Some of the Asiarchs" are mentioned in Acts 19:31, counseling Paul not to appear before the violent Ephesian mob. These Asiarchs were probably native rulers of that area of Asia Minor who were entrusted by the Romans to rule it. The clerk (grammateus) of the Ephesian assembly is described in Acts 19:35-40 as talking his fellow citizens out of mob violence against Paul. (See the commentaries for local background to these titles, accurately reproduced in Acts.)

2.1.2. Ethnarch of Aretas. The Nabataean ruler Aretas IV was ruling Damascus around the time of Paul's conversion. Herod Antipas married Aretas's daughter, but later divorced her. The latter action led to Aretas's impulsive attack on Peraea and defeat of Antipas. A Roman force under L. Vitellius was preparing to counterattack Aretas for this strike, but it withdrew at the news of Tiberius's death in March of A.D. 37. It was Gaius Caligula, the next emperor, who gave Aretas jurisdiction over Damascus. Paul's description in 2 Corinthians 11:32 indicates that Aretas's deputy in charge (ethnarchēs) of the Jewish community there was poised to arrest Paul. This attempt to arrest him led to Paul's escape over the wall of Damascus (Acts 9:23-25).

2.1.3. Agrippa II. Marcus Julius Agrippa II lived in the court of the Emperor Claudius until around A.D. 49. At this time he was made the king of Chalcis (Ituraea). Then in A.D. 53 Agrippa's rule was moved to the territory formerly ruled by Herod Philip: Auranitis, Trachonitis, Batanaea, Gaulanitis and Paneas. Abilene and Arcene were added at that time, and later Nero added parts of Galilee and Peraea to his rule. Agrippa's capital was Caesarea Philippi, though he called it Neronias in honor of the emperor. Agrippa maintained a close working relationship with the Jewish leaders, since it was his responsibility to appoint the high priest and oversee the Jerusalem Temple's finances. His position as native ruler in that region explains how he came to visit the Roman procurator Festus (Acts 25:13). Agrippa may have helped Festus draft the legal brief that was sent with Paul to Rome. His familiarity with Judaism accounts for Paul's appeal to Agrippa's belief in the OT prophets and Agrippa's sympathetic response to Paul (Acts 26:27-32).

2.2. Centurion. This military officer (hekatontarchēs in the NT) served to enforce Rome's political rule in the provinces. There were five or six centurions per cohort. (Each cohort contained from 500 to 1000 men; there were ten cohorts per legion.) During the early Principate most centurions were legionaries who were elevated to the post of centurion. Some, however, were those of the equestrian order, who were attracted to the post because of the high salary and retirement benefits. In the NT record of Paul's travels, centurions appear as favorable officers who rescue Paul from the mob (Acts 21:32), help him escape beating (Acts 22:25-26), guard him (Acts 24:23) and take him to Rome (Acts 27:1). The only centurion named is Julius of the Sebastian cohort (Acts 27:1), which probably indicates that he was from an auxiliary cohort with the honorific title Augusta. Paul must have come into frequent contact with centurions during his imprisonments (Phil 1:13-14).

2.3. Military Tribune. The tribunus militum (chiliarchos in the NT) served as leader of a Roman legion. There were usually six tribunes per legion. During Paul's time these officers were taken from either senatorial or equestrian orders. Acts shows a tribune rescuing Paul from a mob (Acts 21:31-33; 24:7), respecting Paul's citizenship (Acts 22:29), listening readily to the report of a plot against Paul (Acts 23:18-22) and attending Paul's speech before Festus and Agrippa (Acts 25:23). The only tribune named in the NT record about Paul is Claudius Lysias (Acts 23:26; 24:7, 22). The exchange he has with Paul about citizenship (Acts 22:26-28) indicates that he was a freedman of the emperor Claudius who had been granted equestrian status. The "large amount of money" (Acts 22:28) does not refer to a price he paid for his freedom but rather a bribe to officials in Caesar's bureaucracy or the provincial government, who put his name on the list of people to be granted citizenship. The demand for Roman citizenship and its privileges led to a lucrative business for some imperial officials (Tacitus Ann. 14.50.1). The importance of the tribune's office is seen by Felix's comment that he will wait until Lysias the tribune arrives to pass judgment on Paul's case (Acts 24:22).

2.4. Proconsul. Both the titles of proconsul (anthypatos in the NT) and procurator (see 2.5 below) designate officials who functioned as governors of Roman provinces. The proconsuls functioned as independent administrators of Roman provinces under the Senate's rule in one-year terms of office. Selected by lot, proconsuls in the Republic and Principate were typically ex-consuls or ex-praetors, therefore of senatorial order. As representative of the consuls, this post was officially under authority of the Roman senate rather than the emperor, at least through Paul's lifetime. But this in no way means that the proconsuls functioned as deputies of the senate. Their appointment as proconsuls gave them imperium, or ultimate administrative power, including the power to inflict capital punishment. Invested with imperium, the proconsul had no obligation to consult with the Roman senate for his decisions. Practically, as long as he did not offend the wealthy citizens in his province, he had no worries about censure from Rome. Indeed the common provincial had little recourse in the face of a proconsular decision. The only legal constraints on a proconsul's decisions in the first century were laws against extortion and treason and part of the lex Iulia that protected citizens from undeserved execution. The proconsul's influence over the provincials was also limited by the manner in which his year-long administration of a province was conducted. Proconsuls typically moved on a circuit of the major cities in their provinces to hear litigants. This meant that there was no center for efficient administration of the whole province. Paul's appearance before Gallio, proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18:12), shows that the plaintiffs were sufficient in number or persistence to get a hearing. This is noted because there was no guarantee that litigants' cases would be heard, given the proconsul's itinerant court that could move on to the next judicial center before all of one city's cases were heard. Besides his judicial function, proconsuls also inspected public buildings for needed repairs, maintained the water supply for the province through aqueducts or other means, and participated in municipal governance when they wanted. Both proconsuls mentioned in Acts are portrayed in a manner consistent with the book's agenda of showing the helpfulness of Roman authorities in the spread of the gospel.

2.4.1. Sergius Paulus. Sergius Paulus was the proconsul of Cyprus described in the record of Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 13:6-7). This proconsul is not attested in pagan literature, but we do find his name on ancient coins of Cyprus (Cat. Greek Coins, "Cyprus," 119-21). The Sergii Pauli were a senatorial family of the first century; the name therefore fits one of consular status. The account in Acts tells us that this proconsul believed the message of Paul and Barnabas after seeing the divine judgment Paul brought against Elymas the magician (Acts 13:8-12).

2.4.2. Gallio. Lucius Annaeus Novatus Gallio was a proconsul of Achaea, the province that included Corinth. The brother of Seneca the philosopher, Gallio had been adopted by the senator Lucius Junius Gallio, and therefore took his patron's name. After Seneca's political ruin, Gallio of necessity committed suicide. Paul's appearance before Gallio (Acts 18:12-17) is a crucial starting point for constructing a chronology* of his ministry, since we know from an inscription (SIG 2.801) that Gallio was proconsul in A.D. 52. Gallio is amply attested in pagan literature (Dio 61.35.2-4; 62.20.1; Seneca Ep. 104.1; Tacitus Ann. 15.73.4).

2.5. Procurator. This title (hēgemōn in the NT) designates a post in the lesser Roman provinces equivalent to that of governor. The title had been used earlier of financial administrators in provinces under senatorial rule, but its use as the title for governor is the only way it is used in the NT. The procurator was normally of the equestrian order and directly appointed by the emperor to rule as his agent in the province for as long as the emperor wished.

2.5.1. Felix. Marcus Antonius Felix was procurator of Judea when Paul stood trial before him (Acts 24:1-21). Felix agreed to try Paul even though Paul was not from the geographical area under Felix's responsibility (Acts 23:34-35) because it was probably under the imperial legate of Syria, who did not need to be bothered by an individual's case. Also, Paul's home city of Tarsus was considered a free city, which meant that its citizens were not required to stand trial in their own provincial courts. A freedman of Emperor Claudius's mother Antonia, Felix may have come to Samaria in A.D. 52 as procurator. Felix's brother Pallas was in charge of the emperor's financial accounts and managed to obtain equestrian ranking for his brother and positions normally held by this order, such as procurator. This promotion of a freedman to the equestrian order and appointment to posts in the normal equestrian career were scandalous in the highly stratified Roman society (Suetonius Claudius 25.1.28) and illustrates how easily Claudius was influenced by those in the imperial household. Like Paul, Felix was also accused by the Jews of wrongdoing. He was appointed procurator for Judea, but social upheaval increased during his tenure, and he was replaced by Festus in A.D. 59.

2.5.2. Festus. Porcius Festus took over from Felix the responsibility for Paul's trial (Acts 25:1-8) when he relieved the latter of his post as procurator of Judea. His plan to try Paul in Jerusalem formed the pretext for Paul's appeal for trial before Caesar (Acts 25:9-12; see Citizenship). Festus led battles against militant Jewish opposition and took part in a dispute between King Agrippa II and Jewish leaders. He died in A.D. 62; his position as procurator of Judea was then filled by Albinus.

2.6. Praetorians. From the time of Sejanus's gathering of the praetorian guard in one area in A.D. 23, the praetorians became a political force in Roman life. In A.D. 41, after the murder of Gaius, it was the praetorians who saluted Claudius as emperor while the Senate was considering reinstatement of the republic. By this action they ensured that the Principate would continue and that Claudius would be the next emperor. Elite soldiers who were paid very well, the praetorians served for terms of sixteen years. The praetorians guarded the Emperor and his family members in Rome and abroad. Paul's statement that the cause of his imprisonment was well known throughout the whole praetorian guard (Phil 1:13) is strong but not by itself sufficient evidence for the Roman provenance of Philippians.* The leader of the praetorian guard, the praetorian prefect, had a great deal of political power. Since Nero had announced at the beginning of his reign that he would not judge cases personally (Tacitus Ann. 13.4.2), it is thought that the praetorian prefect took this responsibility. If Paul appeared in Caesar's court for trial soon after the time period covered in Acts, it is very likely that the praetorian prefect was his actual judge.

2.7. Caesar's Household. This term designates the slaves and freedmen who served in both personal and political capacities for the imperial family (see Caesar's Household). There was a significant distinction in status within this household; slaves or freed persons entrusted with financial matters held highest status and were most upwardly mobile. From the reign of Augustus these slaves and freed persons were entrusted with power previously reserved for men of equestrian or senatorial orders. The resulting status disso-nance disturbed Roman nobility and began undermining the highly structured Roman social order. Caesar's household thus constituted the elite civil service, as is shown by the phenomenon that freeborn women would marry men of servile classes in this household.

Paul's mention of Caesar's household in Philippians 4:22 is another piece of evidence for the Roman provenance of the letter, though members of the imperial household did serve in other cities of the empire. It also shows that the Christian message had made significant inroads into the imperial court. At least two groups mentioned in Romans 16 may designate members of the imperial household. "Those of Aristobulus" (Rom 16:10) might refer to the former slaves of Aristobulus, the younger brother of Agrippa I. Since he was a member of the Herodian family and the immediately preceding name is Herodion, this identification is quite likely. Aristobulus lived in Rome and was a friend of Claudius (Josephus Ant. 18.5.4 §§133,135). If he passed on his property to the emperor, his slaves would have been members of Caesar's household when Paul wrote Romans. "Those of Narcissus who are in the Lord" (Rom 16:11) may signify the family of Tiberius Claudius Narcissus, a rich freedman who wielded much influence in Claudius's imperial household. Nero executed Narcissus shortly after he came to power (Tacitus, Ann. 13.1.4; Dio, 60.34), but his slaves would still have remained in Caesar's household.

2.8. Caesars. Four emperors* reigned during Paul's lifetime. He was born during the reign of Tiberius (A.D. 14-37), converted to Christianity during the reign of Gaius Caligula (37-41), and ministered mostly during the reigns of Claudius (41-54) and Nero (54-68). By the time of Paul the office of emperor (kaisar in the NT) was not simply "first among equals," but dictator. Claudius and Nero are the emperors most significant in the consideration of Paul's ministry and letters.

2.8.1. Claudius. Tiberius Claudius Nero Germanicus (10 B.C.—A.D. 54) received little notice in the reigns of Augustus or Tiberius. While alternate consul with his nephew, Gaius Caligula, the latter did not mark him as successor. His accession in A.D. 41 was therefore a surprise, brought on by the political muscle of the praetorians (see 2.6 above). Claudius's daughter Octavia was Nero's first wife. Claudius was known for being easily swayed by his wives and those closest to him in the imperial household. Paul met Priscilla and Aquila as a result of Claudius's edict that expelled Jews from Rome (A.D. 49; Acts 18:1-2). While this edict might be partially due to Claudius's love of Roman distinctives and religion, one must note that Claudius exerted significant effort to end the social upheavals in Alexandria and Judea resulting from Gaius's anti-Semitism. Paul's missionary effort (Rom 15:17-24) may have been influenced by Claudius's expansionistic drive that resulted in adding provinces and extending citizenship. In any event, Paul at least uses language of Roman military policy when he describes his apostolic commission in Romans 1:5.

2.8.2. Nero. Nero Claudius Caesar (A.D. 37-68) was the emperor first known to have persecuted Christians (Tacitus, Ann 15) and was reigning at the time of Paul's execution. When Nero acceded to the throne in A.D. 54, he was under the influence of his powerful mother, Agrippina. Seneca and the praetorian prefect Burrus did much to lead the empire during the first five years of his reign. Helpful legislation was enacted (Tacitus Ann. 13.51) and competent governors were appointed. It must be noted that Paul wrote Romans 13:4 in the context of his directives on civil obedience during this period of Nero's reign. But in A.D. 59, after his matricide of Agrippina, the death of Burrus and Seneca's retirement, Nero began to lead as he wished, establishing games, founding a gymnasium and singing in public. Those closest to him were of low birth or freedmen of Greek or Asian descent. They were known for their arrogance. Nero's lavish spending on himself and the cost of wars in Armenia and Britain induced him to take money from the rich. By A.D. 62 people at a variety of levels in Roman society hated him. In 64 Nero was suspected of starting the great fire in Rome in order to build a bigger palace. He blamed the fire on Christians and began executing them (Tacitus Ann. 15.44). It is probable that Paul was executed C. A.D. 64-65 after trial in Nero's court. Then a conspiracy to assassinate Nero and install Calpurnius Piso as emperor was discovered in A.D. 65 and Nero executed all who were implicated. Paranoid of rebellion from this time on, he killed anyone whom he suspected. In A.D. 67 he toured Greece, granting it freedom. He was summoned back to Rome after the city had experienced famine and there was increasing dissatisfaction with his reign. Arriving in Rome in January of 68, he was unable to reverse the political tide. Beginning in March, three officials in various parts of the empire revolted. When the praetorians removed their support from Nero, he left Rome on June 9, A.D. 68, and committed suicide. Paul's martyrdom in Nero's court was certainly tragic in its time, though Glover's comment that the day would come when men would name their sons Paul and their dogs Nero shows the justice that the passage of time brings.

See also CAESAR'S HOUSEHOLD, IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD; CITIZENSHIP, ROMAN AND HEAVENLY; CIVIL AUTHORITY; DIAS-PORA; EMPERORS, ROMAN; LEGAL SYSTEM, ROMAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); P. A. Brunt, "Procuratorial Jurisdiction," Latomus 25 (1966) 461-89; G. P. Burton, "Proconsuls, Assizes and the Administration of Justice under the Empire," JRS 65 (1975) 92-106; P. Garnsey and R. Saller, The Roman Empire: Economy, Society and Culture (Berkeley: University of California, 1987); N. G. Hammond and H. H. Scullard, ed., Oxford Classical Dictionary (2d ed.; Oxford: University Press, 1970) passim; E. Lohse, "συνέδριον," TDNT VII.860-71; F. Millar, "The Emperor, the Senate and the Provinces," JRS 56 (1966) 156-66; A. Momigliano, Claudius: The Emperor and His Achievement (Oxford: Clarendon, 1934); A. M. Rabello, "The Legal Condition of the Jews in the Roman Empire," ANRW 2.13 (1980) 662-762; S. Safrai and M. Stern, ed., The Jewish People in the First Century, Vol. 1 (CRINT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament: The Sarum Lectures 1960-1961, (Oxford: University Press, 1963; repr. Grand Rapids: Baker, 1978); P. R. C. Weaver, Familia Caesaris: A Social Study of the Emperor's Freedmen and Slaves (Cambridge: University Press, 1972).

M. Reasoner

POOR. See COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; RICHES AND POVERTY.

POSTAL SERVICE. See TRAVEL IN THE ROMAN WORLD.

POVERTY. See RICHES AND POVERTY.

POWER

In Pauline theology the cross represents the ultimate manifestation of the power of God.* In the death,* resurrection* and exaltation* of Jesus, God manifested his superior power against evil, especially as represented by sin,* death (see Life and Death) and the realm of Satan.*

Paul's favorite term for power is dynamis (and its cognates) which occur throughout his writings. On occasion he also uses the words kratos and ischys to speak of inherent or derived capability. Paul uses exousia usually in the sense of the right or authority* to exercise power and energeia/energeō to refer to the actualization of power in concrete circumstances. Paul's concept of power is certainly not restricted to a set of power-denoting terms. When Paul speaks of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), he often has in mind the supernatural power of the Spirit. Similarly, his use of the expressions "grace,"* "glory,"* "fullness"* and even "in Christ"* often convey the notion of divine power as part of their contextual meanings.

1. Power to Save
2. Power Against "the Powers"
3. Power to Serve
4. Power in Weakness
5. The Role of Faith and Prayer
6. God's Powerful Triumph over Evil

1. Power to Save.

The God of creation* who rescued his people from their slavery in Egypt has once again exercised his power for the salvation* of humanity from its bondage to sin and the cosmic powers (see Principalities and Powers). The essence of Paul's gospel consists of this message of salvation. The gospel* is thus "the power (dynamis) of God for the salvation of everyone who believes" (Rom 1:16; cf. also 1 Cor 1:18). God acted through Christ* to release people from the bondage of death, sin, flesh* and the Law* (Rom 5:12—8:39) and to blunt the influence of the realm of Satan against the church* (Col 2:15). Because of the life-transforming capability of the gospel resulting in the reconciliation* of people to God, the apostle* devoted his life to the propagation of this powerful message.

Paul speaks of the Holy Spirit as the dynamic presence of God dwelling within believers. The Spirit works to transform people into conformity to God's standards of holiness.* The Spirit thus enables believers to rid themselves of evil thoughts and deeds (Rom 8:13). Believers need divine strength to resist the supernaturally powerful influence of the principle of sin (1 Cor 15:56) and the ongoing enticement of the inner evil impulse, which Paul calls the "flesh" (Rom 8:13).

2. Power Against "the Powers."

Believers also face personal supernatural opponents who tend to exploit the "flesh" and the world structures (Eph 2:1-3) leading people into rebellion against God's purposes. Although believers have been rescued from the all-encompassing tyranny of Satan's kingdom, his evil forces are still actively hostile to the redeemed people of God. This demonic hierarchy of "principalities and powers"* seeks to cause the demise of the church by promoting impurity, dissension and deviant teaching (Eph 6:10-18; 4:27). God promises to impart his power to believers so they can resist these influences and thus "stand" pure and blameless before him.

3. Power to Serve.

Paul zealously devoted himself to the proclamation of the gospel of the Lord* Jesus Christ. He affirms that he carried out his ministry* "through the power of the Spirit" (Rom 15:19; cf. also 1 Tim 1:12). He tells the Colossians* that he labored to bring all of his converts to maturity in Christ, "toiling strenuously with all the energy and power of Christ at work in me" (Col 1:28-29 NEB; Eph 3:7). This power enabled Paul to continue proclaiming the gospel and building the church even in the most hostile of circumstances (2 Tim 4:17).

In his teaching Paul endeavored to root the faith of his converts in God and his power. The Corinthians,* however, were tempted to be more impressed with the form and style of delivery (perhaps such as they saw in the Sophists; see Rhetoric) rather than the content of the message. Paul thus calls them to focus on the content of the preaching—Jesus Christ and him crucified—and the demonstration of the Spirit's power in his preaching, evident in the transformed lives of the converts (1 Cor 2:1-5; see Cross, Theology of the).

The same divine power that strengthened Paul also empowers other believers in their service to the church. Paul admonished Timothy not to be timid, but to draw on the power which God provides, viz. "the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim 1:7; 2:1). The "grace" of God is imparted to believers primarily in the context of the ministry of the various members of the body of Christ to one another. The Holy Spirit works through the individual parts of the body for the building up of the whole (1 Cor 12; see Body of Christ). There is a strong emphasis in Paul's thought on divine empowerment taking place chiefly in the context of Christian community.

God's power will enable believers to manifest love to one another and also to those outside the Christian community (1 Cor 13; Eph 5:1-2). This is possible because God has enabled believers to know and experience the unsurpassed love* of Christ (Eph 3:16-19).

4. Power in Weakness.

"When I am weak, then I am strong!" was a guiding principle in Paul's ministry (2 Cor 12:10). Although he regarded his human body as possessing a measure of ability, he was painfully aware of its frailty and inherent limitations (2 Cor 1:8). He even compared his body to a clay pot in its fragility (2 Cor 4:7). Yet, in spite of these constraints, he was able to serve the church in ways that surpassed his innate weakness.* He attributes his ability to the "grace" of God (1 Cor 12:9; Eph 3:7), that is, the power of God working in him and through him. Specifically, it is Christ himself who indwells Paul and enables him to carry out a life of service (2 Cor 12:10; Eph 3:16-17; see Servant, Service).

Paul needed God's empowering to endure suffering.* He saw suffering as integral to knowing Christ—he who suffered to death for his people (2 Cor 4:10; 13:3-4; Phil 3:10). Because Paul experienced God's inner strength, he was able to endure a level of suffering that went far beyond mere human ability to endure (2 Cor 4:7-12; cf. also Col 1:11; 2 Tim 1:8). Because he trusted in a God who could accomplish anything he purposed through his frail human servants (Eph 3:20-21), Paul could tell the Philippians* that he could endure any set of circumstances because of the empowering divine presence (Phil 4:13).

Paul also experienced God's power to help him continue his service in spite of the debilitating effects of what he called his "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor 12:7-10). Most likely manifested as some physical disability, Paul regarded the thorn as the work of an angelic ambassador of Satan. Although the thorn was inherently evil, it served a good purpose by ensuring Paul's humility. Most importantly, it was an opportunity for God to display his mighty power through the weakness of the apostle (see Black).

5. The Role of Faith and Prayer.

Paul speaks of faith* as the essential prerequisite and means for acquiring divine strength (Eph 3:16-17). He regards prayer* as a concrete manifestation of faith in God. Thus, in his famous passage on "spiritual warfare," Paul depicts faith as the shield by which all the attacks of the devil can be thwarted (Eph 6:15). Furthermore, he highlights prayer as the most prominent of the weapons and presents it as foundational to the deployment of each of the other weapons (Eph 6:18-20). Paul has already modeled this to his readers by praying for their heightened comprehension of the vastness of the divine power available to them (Eph 1:15-23) and also by directly praying for God to strengthen them in their innermost beings (Eph 3:14-21).

6. God's Powerful Triumph over Evil.

There was no thoroughgoing dualism in Paul's theology. He was convinced that God would triumph* over the cosmic powers in the end. Paul speaks of a definite end to this evil age in which Christ destroys the hostile principalities and powers and, ultimately, death itself (1 Cor 15:24-26). Believers can thus be assured of God's victory over evil and of their own life after death. This is certain because God has already demonstrated his power by raising Jesus from the dead (Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 6:14; 15:43; Eph 1:20-23).

See also AUTHORITY; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; HOLY SPIRIT; MAGIC; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SALVATION; TRIUMPH; WEAKNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989); D. A. Black, Paul, the Apostle of Weakness: Astheneia and Its Cognates in the Pauline Literature (New York: Lang, 1984); W. Grundmann, "δύναμαι κτλ," TDNT II.284-317; idem, Der Begriff der Kraft in der Neutestamentlichen Gedankenwelt (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1932); R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC 40; Dallas: Word, 1986); H. Nielsen, "Paulus' Verwendung des Begriffes Dunamis," in Die Paulinische Literatur und Theologie, ed. S. Pederson (Århus: Aros, 1980) 137-58; C. H. Powell, The Biblical Concept of Power (London: Epworth, 1963). C. E. Arnold

POWERS. See COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE; ELEMENTS/ELEMENTAL SPIRITS OF THE WORLD; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; TRIUMPH.

PRAISE. See HYMNS, HYMN FRAGMENTS, SONGS, SPIRITUAL SONGS; PRAYER; WORSHIP.

PRAYER

Paul's apostolate began in prayer and, according to tradition, ended in prayer as he was martyred. His whole ministry* was grounded in, and developed from, prayer. For Paul, the Christian experience was essentially (and unceasingly) an act of prayer. Those redeemed and hence overwhelmed by the sovereign grace of the "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," intentionally and purposefully pour out their lives as a perpetual act of thanksgiving, ever conscious of dependence on an omnipresent and omnipotent God,* as they are motivated and empowered by the Holy Spirit.* Apart from prayer, life as a redeemed bondservant* of Christ* was both inconceivable and impossible.

1. Prayer in Paul's Life: Acts and Letters
2. Analysis of Pauline Prayer Material
3. Pauline Prayer Vocabulary
4. Pauline Prayer Theology

1. Prayer in Paul's Life: Acts and Letters.

1.1. Spiritual Roots in Judaism. Before his conversion* Saul of Tarsus belonged to "the strictest sect" of first-century rabbinic Judaism (Acts 26:5). The young Pharisee was "extremely zealous for the traditions" of his Jewish ancestors (Gal 1:14), and viewed himself as "faultless" regarding legalistic righteousness* (Phil 3:6; see Jew, Paul the). Because of these assertions, we may assume this earnest rabbi participated fully in the prayers prescribed by Pharisaic Judaism. Prayers of praise, blessing, thanksgiving, confession, petition and intercession* were all part of Saul's daily routine (see Benediction, Blessing, Doxology, Thanksgiving). Among pious rabbis, formal set public prayers were associated with meals, life transitions such as birth, marriage and death, the reading and study of the Law,* local synagogue worship,* national religious festivals and Jerusalem temple rituals. The OT evidences considerable spontaneity and intimacy in private prayer (see the psalms of David, for example), but Pharisaism conformed much personal prayer to fixed forms such as the Shema (šᶜma', Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21 and Num 15:37-41), repeated morning and evening at the third and ninth hour (cf. Ezra 9:5; Dan 9:21) along with several prescribed introductory and concluding benedictions, and the Tephillah (tᶜpillāh), or Eighteen Benedictions (šᶜmōneh 'ésrēh), apparently repeated three times each day (see Ps 55:17 and Dan 6:10; cf. Acts 10:9). It has been argued that the spirituality of first-century Judaism may have been far more varied than commonly supposed, inasmuch as the Qumran* scrolls and extant synagogue liturgies evidence considerable variation in Jewish prayer forms. We may be certain, however, that prayer was extremely important to Pharisees like Saul: according to Rabbinic tradition, without a systematic, disciplined and structured prayer life one could not achieve personal righteousness. It is evident at many points, however, that Paul's dynamic prayer experience owes more to the ethos and examples of the OT Psalter and the passion of Israel's prophets than to rabbinic ritualism.

1.2. Insights from the Book of Acts. Luke's narrative in Acts stresses the central role prayer played in Paul's life. The apostle's initial conversion,* commission, baptism* and missionary* work were linked to prayer. Saul heard the dying Stephen's prayers to the "Lord Jesus" (Acts 7:59-60; 22:20). Shortly thereafter, on the Damascus road, he spoke directly to the risen Christ, calling him "Lord"* (Acts 9:5). During the three-day period of prayer and fasting which followed (Acts 9:11), Saul first came to understand that "Jesus is the Son of God" (Acts 9:20). Following Ananias's communication of his apostolic commission, Saul was immediately baptized while "calling upon his [Jesus'] name" in prayer (Acts 22:16; cf. 9:19; Rom 10:9-10, 14). The apostle later received personal guidance from Christ while "praying" in the Jerusalem Temple (Acts 22:17; cf. 9:26-30; 16:9-10). It was during a period of "prayer and fasting" that the Holy Spirit instructed the church at Syrian Antioch to set apart Barnabas* and Saul for evangelistic work (Acts 13:2-3). The two missionaries similarly confirmed elders in the fledgling churches at Lystra, Iconium and Pisidian Antioch through "prayer and fasting" (Acts 14:23). Near Philippi, at a Jewish "place of prayer," Paul met Lydia, his first convert in Macedonia (Acts 16:13, 16). The Philippian jailer was converted following an earthquake, apparently a miraculous response to the midnight "praying and singing hymns to God" by the imprisoned Paul and Silas (Acts 16:25). The final trip to Jerusalem* occasioned a sorrowful time of prayer and weeping with the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:36-37), and later a poignant scene of prayer with "all the disciples, their wives and children" kneeling on the beach at Tyre (Acts 21:5). It is likely that encouraging visitations by Christ (Acts 23:11) and an angel* (Acts 27:23) were also associated with prayer. Acts draws to a close with Paul interceding for others: Luke says, "after prayer" the apostle placed his hands on and healed the ailing father of Publius, the chief official of Malta. This scene was surely repeated, because "the rest of the sick on the island came and were [also] cured" (Acts 28:8-9).

1.3. Reflections of Paul at Prayer in the Letters. Strictly speaking, the Pauline letters contain almost nothing that can be described as personal or public prayer. The NT letters represent a literary genre quite different from the narratives of the Gospels and Acts or John's visions in Revelation. Directly addressing God while writing to others was ruled out by the conventions of ancient letter* writing. What we find in Paul's letters are references, allusions and reports about his prayers.

1.4. Requests for Prayer. G. P. Wiles rightly says Paul's "dynamic ministry involved a triangular relationship between God (known in Christ and through the Holy Spirit), himself as commissioned apostle,* and the churches for which he was responsible" (Wiles, 2). As a result, several times the apostle urges his readers to "join me in my struggle by praying to God for me" (Rom 15:30; cf. 1 Thess 5:25). His prayer requests are both direct and indirect, and often quite specific. 2 Thessalonians 3:1-2 summarizes the concerns most commonly mentioned: "Brothers, pray for us that the message of the Lord may spread rapidly and be honored, just as it is with you. And pray that we may be delivered from wicked and evil men, for not everyone has faith." The focus in Romans 15:30-32 is twofold: (1) that the apostle would be delivered from unbelieving Jews in Judea who wished harm both to him and to the Gentile mission; and (2) that the collection gathered from the predominantly Gentile* churches of Asia, Macedonia and Achaia would be received positively by the impoverished but more conservative Jewish Christians in Jerusalem.

Elsewhere Paul expresses confidence that he will be delivered from "deadly peril" as the believers in Corinth help him by their prayers (2 Cor 1:8-11). Ephesians 6:19 sounds a more urgent note, the apostle asking for intercession that "whenever I open my mouth, words may be given me so that I will fearlessly make known the mystery* of the gospel." The request for courage is repeated in Ephesians 6:20: "Pray that I may declare it fearlessly, as I should." The pattern is repeated in the apostle's final exhortations to the Colossians*: "Pray for us too, that God may open a door for our message.... Pray that I may proclaim it clearly, as I should" (Eph 4:3-4). With those he knows better, Paul seems more confident: telling the Philippians* he expects to be delivered from Roman imprisonment "through your prayers" (Phil 1:19) and assuring Philemon, "Prepare a guest room for me, because I hope to be restored to you in answer to your prayers" (Philem 22). The instruction in 1 Timothy 2:1-8 urging intercession for "everyone" should be viewed as an implicit request for personal prayer support, inasmuch as verse 7 stresses Paul's divine appointment as "herald, apostle and teacher" in connection with the Gentile mission.

2. Analysis of Pauline Prayer Material.

2.1. Trends in Research. Research on Pauline prayer material has been surveyed by R. Gebauer. Helpful digests have also been provided by P. T. O'Brien and G. P. Wiles. However, as compared with concerns such as christology* or soteriology, scholarly interest in NT prayer material has been relatively slight. There are several probable reasons for this. Spirituality* was a concern to several early church fathers, but in the postapostolic period, prayer was not a major issue for church councils, and it was virtually ignored by those who framed the creeds. In the modern period formal study of prayer in Scripture has been discouraged by three discernible trends in Christendom.

(1) From approximately 1900 onward researchers were increasingly uncomfortable with the assumptions of ancient authors concerning the existence of the supernatural. To pray and write as Paul did assumes a so-called pre-scientific worldview in which is assumed the existence of an omnipotent, yet personal living God, who is actively involved in the outworking of his will on earth, and who responds to prayer. Modern historical-critical biblical scholarship has tended to erode the theological underpinnings of petitionary prayer along with the church's certainty about biblical miracles, predictive prophecy and the divinity of Christ.

(2) Following World War I philosophical existentialism exerted a powerful influence on NT scholarship. R. Bultmann said, "How a man prayed concerns no other man, not even the historian. And whoever allows himself to judge how fervently or deeply Jesus prayed, proves only that he neither understands nor respects Jesus' conception of prayer. For whoever so judges either sees prayer merely as a psychological phenomenon which can become the object of interesting analysis [Bultmann's reaction to F. Heiler's work], or he arrogates himself to God's own right. For according to Jesus, prayer is talking with God; whoever assumes he can evaluate any prayer presumes to stand in the place of God." Such views, expressed so forcefully by scholars of significant influence, made the study of NT prayer seem illegitimate. It is notable that the groundbreaking studies of Pauline prayer by H. Greeven, G. Harder and P. Schubert were undertaken in the face of such discouragements.

(3) During an age when social, political and economic issues have dominated large parts of the church there was a tendency to regard biblical spirituality as "other worldly" and irrelevant. The fact that the revolutionary apostolic activist whose ministry "turned the world upside down" (Acts 17:6 RV) drew great power from prayer has been largely overlooked. Despite the fact that recent decades have seen several excellent contributions (see esp. the work of R. Gebauer, P. T. O'Brien and G. P. Wiles), academic study of Pauline prayer material continues to be truncated due to on-going scholarly misgivings about the apostolic authorship of 2 Thessalonians, the Prison letters and the Pastorals.* When prayer does become the focus of serious research, it is often held at arm's length: atomized, analyzed and categorized in ways which rarely seem to reflect the power and passion of apostolic spirituality.

2.2. General Classification: Prophetic Prayer. F. Heiler's Das Gebet, a study of the history, phenomenology and psychology of the human prayer experience, assigns prayer to six fundamental classes: primitive, ritual, Greek, cultural, philosophical, mystical and prophetic. Despite those who regard Paul as a mystic (often largely on the basis of his descriptions of believers as being "in" or "into" Christ; see In Christ), it is evident the apostle prayed in continuity with the "prophetic," or biblical, rather than the "mystical" prayer traditions. Paul's spirituality never seeks to "merge" with divinity; and his letters contain no instruction which can be rightly understood as providing a mystical prayer ladder to (a nonpersonal) God—either through visions in association with asceticism or on the basis of illumination gained through the impartation of (secret) esoteric knowledge. Mysticism* generally asserts that as spirituality matures petition and supplication will be replaced by so-called higher forms of prayer, such as meditation and contemplation. By contrast, the Pauline prison letters evidence ongoing, vigorous supplication and intercession in the apostle's own prayer life, and exhortations that his readers "in everything, by prayer and petition with thanksgiving, present your requests to God" (Phil 4:6). The Pastorals continue these themes: "I urge . . . that requests, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for everyone . . ." (1 Tim 2:1).

2.3. Classification by Content. True prayer is a fluid (some would say spontaneous) expression of the human spirit which does not readily lend itself to precise analysis or assignment to rigid categories. Nevertheless, both Scripture, worship* and culture have each contributed to the ways Christians pray. As a result, patterns and characteristics are discernible, and attempts at classification are useful aids to study and spiritual formation. Biblical prayer material may be categorized by content as: (1) praise, thanksgiving, worship, adoration; (2) contemplation, meditation; (3) confession, lamentation, penitential prayer; (4) entreaty, petition, supplication, intercession; (5) declaration, affirmation vow, oath; (6) invocation, doxology, benediction; (7) complaint, imprecation (prayer asking for vengeance, curse). There are no undisputed examples of Pauline prayer material in categories (2) and (3). Categories (1) and (4) are most frequent: thanksgiving and intercession predominate. Similar emphases are seen in the Gospel accounts of the prayers of Jesus.

2.4. Classification by Form. Since the time of G. Harder and P. Schubert, scholars have generally categorized the bulk of Pauline prayer material as either (1) wish prayers or (2) prayer reports.

2.4.1. The Wish Prayers. Wish prayers refer to God obliquely, using the third person, and the optative of the Greek verb: "May our God and Father himself and our Lord Jesus clear the way for us to come to you. May the Lord make your love increase. . . . May he strengthen your hearts . . ." (1 Thess 3:11-13). Similar forms are found in Romans 15:5-6, 13; 1 Thessalonians 5:23-24; 2 Thessalonians 2:16-17; 3:5, 16; 2 Timothy 1:16, 18; 2:25; 4:16b (cf. Heb 13:20-21). An optative is implied in Romans 15:33, and other wish prayers using the future indicative may be observed in Romans 16:20; 1 Corinthians 1:8-9 and Philippians 4:19.

G. P. Wiles includes in this category the epistolary greetings, or "benedictions," which open and close the Pauline letters. With minor modification all contain an initial wish prayer similar to that of Romans 1:7: "[May there be] grace and peace to you from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ." (It is not uncommon for scholars to label texts like Eph 1:3-4, which begin with "praise be" or "blessed be" [eulogein] with the Hebrew term berakoth [beᶜrāḵôṯ], a classification used for extended blessings in the OT and other Jewish texts. In the case of thanksgivings, another Hebrew term, hodayoth [hôḏāyôṯ], is sometimes used to refer to those beginning with "thanks be" [eucharistein]. See Bradshaw.)

Though wording varies considerably, all of the Pauline letters close with wish-prayer benedictions. 2 Corinthians 13:14 is a classic example, "May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all." Scholars also include in the wish-prayer category the so-called curse* in 1 Corinthians 16:22, "If anyone does not love the Lord, [may] a curse be on him" (cf. 1 Cor 5:3-5 and Gal 1:8-9). (The AV and NKJV render 2 Tim 4:14b as a prayer for divine retribution, "May the Lord repay him according to his [evil] works." But the best Greek texts have the verb in the future active indicative, indicating the apostle's confidence in God's justice, "the Lord will requite him for his deeds," rather than a prayer-wish for revenge.) Also included is the pronouncement blessing of Galatians 6:16, "Peace* and mercy* to all who follow this rule, even to the Israel* of God."

2.4.2. Prayer Reports. Although a few prayer reports mention Paul's prayers for others (Rom 10:1) or the prayer of others for his readers (2 Cor 9:14), most material usually classified under this heading consists of references to the apostle's thanksgiving and/or intercession for his readers. Prayer reports are prominent features of the introductory portions of most Pauline letters. 2 Corinthians begins with the famous doxological exclamation, "Praise be to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of compassion and God of all comfort" (2 Cor 1:3), whereas Galatians, 1 Timothy and Titus, documents apparently written under urgent circumstances, have no equivalent.

References to thanksgiving and intercession are often mixed, as in Romans 1:8-10, "First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for all of you, because your faith is being reported all over the world. God, whom I serve with my whole heart in preaching the gospel of his Son, is my witness how constantly I remember you in my prayers at all times; and I pray that now at last by God's will the way may be opened for me to come to you." Some introductory prayer reports (see, e.g., Col 1:3-14) tend to merge with content of the letter proper. Specific criteria for discerning transitions have been proposed by P. Schubert and J. T. Sanders, but this is a difficult matter. Analysis of the prayer reports is also complicated by the apostle's preference for lengthy syntax: Ephesians 1:16-23, for example, is one continuous Greek sentence.

In several of Paul's prayer reports, one form of prayer begins before a preceding type concludes. Texts such as 2 Corinthians 9:11-13 evidence the overlap of doxology and thanksgiving; and 1 Corinthians 14:16 shows a merging of blessing and thanksgiving. In some reports (see Col 1:3-14 and 2 Thess 1:3-12) the apostle mentions prayer but seems to move into straightforward teaching, returning to prayer again at the close. Scholars have adopted the expression period to designate a portion of a letter generally recognized as an extended prayer report (thus in scholarly literature one will come across references to, e.g., "Pauline thanksgiving periods").

2.4.3. Introductory Thanksgiving Periods. The introductory thanksgiving periods have occasioned the most scholarly discussion. P. Schubert's generally accepted syntactical analysis discerned two basic forms:

(1) The most frequent begins with the expression "I thank God" (usually, eucharistō tō theō) as the main clause, with the main verb modified by one, two or three participles which follow. The participles are always nominative masculine, making it clear that the apostle himself has offered the prayer. The period concludes with a final subordinate purpose or result clause (introduced with hina, hyper or eis to followed by an infinitive).

(2) Schubert's second type is simpler, but also less personal: It too begins with a main clause of "I thank God," but is followed by a subordinate causal-hoti clause, and concludes with a subordinate result clause. In at least three cases (Rom 1:8-15; 1 Thess 1:2-10 and 2 Thess 1:3-12) the two form categories are intermixed.

2.4.4. Form and Function. Schubert's analysis led him to conclude that the essential function of the Pauline thanksgivings was simply "to indicate the occasion for and the contents of the letters which they introduce" (Schubert, 27). He reached this deduction by detailed form analysis of all known uses of the verb eucharistein ("to give thanks") in non-Pauline NT material, the LXX, Philo, and Greek epistolary papyri and inscriptions. Since many nonbiblical Hellenistic parallels are evident, Schubert confidently concluded, "beyond a shadow of a doubt," that the apostle was not so much a Jew of the Diaspora who was "exposed" to the culture and language of Greece, but a thoroughgoing "Hellenist of Hellenists," who employed the epistolary thanksgiving form "strictly" (and merely) as a convenient literary device to indicate why he was writing a particular letter and to introduce themes he would develop later in the body of the letter (Schubert, 183-84). Schubert admitted that Paul did not slavishly imitate Hellenistic literary forms (some aspects of the Pauline thanksgivings are much more developed structurally than many examples in extant Greek letters). But on this view one is left, as P. T. O'Brien says, to "wonder whether Paul actually gave thanks (or offered petition) for the churches concerned at all" (O'Brien, 13).

Schubert's Form and Function was published in 1939, prior to the Qumran discoveries and their enrichment of biblical and historical studies. Following the publication of the Qumran* Scrolls, both J.-P. Audet and J. M. Robinson demonstrated that the prayer and liturgical influences of the Greek and Jewish cultures of the NT period were not as isolated as Schubert believed. J. A. Fitzmyer (223-25) and G. Delling (51-54) have suggested, contra Schubert, that although the structure of Paul's introductory thanksgivings is manifestly Hellenistic in form, their content (although obviously Christian) is clearly influenced by, and indebted to, Judaism. The apostle's own claim to be a "Hebrew of Hebrews" (Phil 3:5) from the Hellenistic city of Tarsus squares well with this conclusion.

Many NT scholars now believe Paul's use of convenient and culturally appropriate Hellenistic epistolary prayer forms has neither dominated nor determined the content of the thanksgiving-intercessory periods. In recent decades researchers have taken the study of Pauline thanksgiving and intercessory material beyond the analysis of form, structure and function to consider seriously their purpose as prayers and their role in the apostle's ministry. An extensive critique of Schubert's work and exegetical analysis has been done by P. T. O'Brien. His Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul (1977) and subsequent articles clearly establish a number of conclusions:

(1) Paul's "thanksgiving and petitionary prayer reports are evidence of the Apostle's deep pastoral and apostolic concern for the addressees" (O'Brien, 262).

(2) The Pauline thanksgiving periods and intercessory prayer reports also have a didactic function. When the letters were read in a congregation, they would remind the worshippers of the apostle's preaching in their city. The prayers emphasize the faithfulness of God and stress vital elements in Paul's teaching on the believers' life in Christ. As such, they would also serve as a "model for their own giving of thanks when remembering fellow-believers before God" (O'Brien, 1977, 14; cf. 262-63).

(3) The introductory prayer material also often seems to "prefigure" the paraenetic (exhortation, admonition or advice) material which becomes an important emphasis later in the letter. This feature is especially prominent in the intercessory prayer reports. (Analysis of this aspect was a major emphasis in the groundbreaking work of G. P. Wiles, Paul's Intercessory Prayers [1974].)

(4) O'Brien draws an important distinction between the paraenetic function of the prayer reports and their more obvious epistolary function "to introduce and indicate the main theme(s) of the letters." He concludes that Paul's "prayer reports" are just that: they are not just an interesting and appropriate literary device, but rather are accounts (or perhaps summaries) of actual thanksgivings and petitions offered by the apostle for his churches. O'Brien stressed the prayer reports' immediate relevance to genuine historical contexts and emphasized their accurate reflection of Paul's theological convictions and personal pastoral compassion for his converts. In this O'Brien echoes Wiles, who concluded:

> "In Paul's hands, the conventional usages of ancient letter style turned out to be weighted with new meaning and the prayers were found to give concentrated living expression to his deeply responsible love, his vital anxieties and burning hopes. Each of the prayers was evoked by and adapted to a particular context; the lines of concern flowed together through each threatening occasion, through the letter composed for that situation, and through the prayer passages that reflected it." (Wiles, 293)
>
> "Prayer buttressed all his mission work—in advance of visits, during them and after he had departed. All his plans were conceived under the constant sense of the guidance and will of God. None of his bold advances would have seemed worthwhile to him apart from continual undergirding by the prayers of the apostle and his associates. Taken together, then, the intercessory prayer passages offer impressive documentation of Paul's unfailing reliance upon the ministry of supplication, his own and that of fellow believers." (Wiles, 296)

3. Pauline Prayer Vocabulary.

3.1. Terminology. The Pauline prayer vocabulary is the richest in the NT, and the apostle uses prayer terms more frequently than any other writer. R. Morganthaler's NT word statistics indicate that 16 different words for prayer appear 105 times in the 13 canonical Pauline letters. (In comparison: Mt has 8 words used 30 times; Mk only 5 used 18 times; Lk has 10 terms used 46 times; Jn only 3 words used 18 times; Acts has 6 words used 36 times; Heb has 3 words, each used once. In the remainder of the NT 11 prayer terms are used 36 times.) The apostle's penchant for thanksgiving is striking: eucharisteō ("to give thanks") appears 23 times; and eucharistia ("thanksgiving") 12 times. O'Brien has shown that "Paul mentioned the subject of thanksgiving more often per page than any other Hellenistic author, pagan or Christian" (O'Brien 1980, 61). The apostle's preferred words for petition are: proseuchomai ("to pray"), 19 times; proseuchē ("prayer"), 14 times; deēsis ("request, entreaty"), 12 times; and epikaleō ("to call upon"), 6 times. G. P. Wiles discerned no unique terms for intercession: "Instead Paul uses general words for prayer in such a way as to imply that the prayer is on behalf of others" (Wiles, 18). In several places nonprayer terminology is used to refer to prayer (see, e.g., Rom 15:30, synagōnizomai ("assist"); 2 Cor 1:11, synypourgeō ("help"); 1 Thess 1:2, mneia ("mention"); 1 Thess 1:3, mnēmoneuō ("remember").

3.2. Sources and Roots. Paul's prayer language contains terms that would have been familiar to virtually all first-century Greek-speaking readers—even those recently converted from paganism. Yet he uses these words in expressions which indicate his spiritual life had deep roots in OT Scripture, particularly the Psalms. Similarities with Qumran texts have been suggested, and parallels with the LXX, used among Hellenistic Jews, have been noted. A growing number of scholars discern links between Paul's prayer language and the liturgical formulations of early Christian worship. There is a discernible tendency for commentators to regard full-orbed christological expressions in the prayers, for example: "God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Col 1:3; cf. Eph 1:2), as evidence of postapostolic authorship. Yet very similar language may be found in prayer contexts in the chief letters (Hauptbriefe) of Paul: "as you wait for the revealing of our Lord Jesus Christ; who will sustain you to the end, guiltless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. God is faithful, by whom you were called into the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor 1:7-9 RSV; cf. 2 Cor 1:3). O'Brien concludes that "phrases from the wish-prayer of 1 Thess 3:11-13 were probably used in pre-Pauline Christian worship" (O'Brien 1977, 264). Those familiar with research on the themes and expressions of the primitive kerygma are immediately struck with the repetition of many characteristic motifs in Paul's prayers. Terms such as proclaim, gospel, receive* (a tradition*), witness, the word of God, grace,* faith,* hope and *love are common in early Christian preaching. In the "fruit-bearing" language of Colossians 1:10, O'Brien discerns echoes of Mark 4:19, 13-20. There are parallels with "fruitfullness" concepts in the OT (cf. Is 5:1-4 and Ps 80:14-15), and those who posit an original Sitz im Leben for Mark's parable in the earthly ministry of Jesus, find here evidence for a link between Paul's prayer language and the teaching of Jesus.

4. Pauline Prayer Theology.

4.1. Prayer Results from a Theocentric Worldview. Paul's life was lived in moment-by-moment consciousness of the eternal existence of a holy, sovereign God, "the blessed and only ruler, the King of kings, Lord of lords, who alone is immortal and who lives in unapproachable light, whom no one has seen or can see" (1 Tim 6:15-16 NIV; cf. 1 Tim 1:17). Since "from him and through him and to him are all things" (Rom 11:36), it was impossible for the apostle to conceive of any human activity apart from God: "For in him we live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:28). This totally theocentric worldview fundamentally shaped Paul's spiritual life and prayer.

4.2. Prayer As a Creaturely Obligation. Prayer, especially thanksgiving, is a logical, natural and necessary consequence of the apostle's understanding of reality. About those who do not acknowledge God's existence nor their accountability to a holy creator, he says "they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools" (Rom 1:21-22 NIV; cf. 2 Tim 3:2). Paul's basic theology of prayer was thus constructed on the rational certainty that God exists and personally and providentially sustains the creation (cf. Col 1:16-17). Yet his motivation to pray stems from considerably more than creaturely obligation to glorify the creator.

4.3. Thanksgiving Motivated by Salvation. Saul the Pharisee was certainly conscious of human moral accountability to God. But after his conversion Paul asserted that "there is no one righteous" (Rom 3:10) and, what is more, no human effort or legal system could enable one to measure up to "the glory* of God" (Rom 3:20; 5:12; 8:3). Paul's personal opposition to Christ and persecution of the primitive church are the basis for the claim that he was "once a blasphemer and a violent man," "the worst of sinners" (1 Tim 1:13, 15-16, cf. Acts 9:4-5). One might speculate that the root of the apostle's passion to pray came directly from his awareness that although he was "wretched," "helpless" and "condemned" before God because of the guilt of his sin,* he "was shown mercy because," as he confesses, "I had acted in ignorance and unbelief. The grace of our Lord was poured out on me abundantly along with the faith and love that are in Christ Jesus" (1 Tim 1:13-14 NIV). It is this which produces the exclamation: "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" (Romans 7:25). Forgiveness of sins, redemption* and justification* by God's grace through faith left no room for human "boasting." But in Paul's mind, being turned from darkness to light,* from the power of Satan* to God—receiving full rights as God's child—was so astounding that it virtually compelled ceaseless thanksgiving: "Be joyful always, pray continually; give thanks in all circumstances, for this is God's will for you in Christ Jesus" (1 Thess 5:16-18 NIV). Hence, Christians are characterized as "always giving thanks to God the Father for everything in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph 5:20).

It has been suggested that those who pray "in the name of Jesus" will eventually pray to Jesus. Since Paul repeatedly affirms the divinity of Christ, and had observed prayer offered to Jesus (Acts 7: 59), it is notable that his wish prayers, prayer reports, doxologies and benedictions do not evidence prayer to Christ, either as petition or intercession (nor is there a hint of prayer offered to the Holy Spirit). It seems that Paul would affirm as normative the often stated maxim: "Prayer is a co-operation between God and the believer in that it is presented to the Father, in the name of the Son, through the inspiration of the indwelling Holy Spirit" (Thompson, 960; cf. Clowney, 133-73). Yet it is clear that Paul did not adhere to this schema rigidly. 1 Corinthians 16:22 contains his famous use of the Aramaic exclamation Maranatha ("Our Lord, come!"; cf. Rev 22:20; see Hymns).

4.4. Prayer Essential to Service. Paul's personal experience of the "surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord" (Phil 3:8) reinforced his apostolic commission and commitment to the proclamation of the gospel. Naturally, his "heart's desire and prayer to God for the Israelites is that they may be saved" (Rom 10:1). And it seems reasonable to assume that he prayed similarly for the Gentiles. He requested prayer (Eph 6:19-20; Col 4:3-4) that God would: (1) open a door for the word of the gospel; (2) give him uninhibited boldness or confidence in preaching; and (3) give him facility of speech in his proclamation. Prayer to God was essential in the apostle's understanding of evangelistic work. On a purely human level, even the most eloquent gospel message was "veiled to those who are perishing. The god of this age has blinded the minds of unbelievers so that they cannot see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor 4:3-4 NIV; cf. 1 Cor 2:14). It was neither the preacher nor the convert, but God who supernaturally intervened through the Spirit's call and justified those who believed. Prayer was also expected on the convert's part.

4.5. The Role of the Mind in Prayer. Romans 10:9-14 connects salvation* with faith, confession and prayer. The reference to prayer (using the Semitic idiom "to call upon the name of the Lord," cf. Gen 12:8; Ps 99:6) is extremely important. It emphasizes the individual's responsibility to respond to the gospel, it reveals Paul's understanding of faith, and it clarifies the role he assigned to the mind in prayer. In Romans 10:14 the apostle unmistakably links (1) knowledge* of God, (2) faith based on that knowledge and (3) prayer which proceeds from such faith. It is evident that Paul did not regard the faith from which authentic prayer issues as a kind of blind leap in the dark. For him, prayer comes from an intelligent or rationally informed faith and is grounded in the certainty that God is not "unknown" (cf. Acts 17:22-28) but rather, has revealed himself in creation, history, Christ, Scripture and the gospel. Modern tendencies to divorce faith from reason find no support here.

A similar emphasis on the use of the intellect when praying occurs in 1 Corinthians 14:14-17: "For if I pray in a tongue, my spirit prays, but my mind is unfruitful. So what shall I do? I will pray with my spirit, but I will also pray with my mind; . . . . If you are praising God with your spirit, how can anyone in the position of an outsider who does not understand [tongues] say 'Amen' to your thanksgiving, since the outsider does not know what you are saying. You may be giving thanks well enough, but the other person is not edified." The apostle thanked God that he spoke in tongues "more than all of you" (1 Cor 14:18), and in 2 Corinthians 12:1 he claims "visions and revelations" (perhaps associated with prayer) during which he heard "inexpressible things." But he seems to have regarded a rational mental state as less open to abuse or misunderstanding when praying, especially in public meetings (cf. 1 Cor 14:32-33).

4.6. Prayer Essential to Perseverance. Paul saw the Christian life in this world as an unending struggle against "rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph 6:12; cf. 2 Cor 2:11; see Principalities and Powers). He saw persecution and life-threatening opposition to his ministry (see Opponents) as manifestations of this hostility and asked for prayer for deliverance (Rom 15:30; 2 Cor 1:8-11). He was convinced that believers needed the supernatural armor of God to resist temptation and "stand against the devil's schemes." He thus exhorts: "Pray in the Spirit on all occasions with all kinds of prayers and requests. With this in mind, be alert and always keep on praying for all the saints" (Eph 6:18). Paul does not, however, believe that perseverance (see Apostasy, Falling Away, Perseverance) is ultimately dependent on human ability: His prayers express certainty that God "will keep you strong to the end, so that you will be blameless on the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1:8). He prays for the Philippians, being "confident" that God "who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil 1:6; cf. 1:9). But knowing the human inclination toward "quarreling, jealousy, outbursts of anger, factions, slander, gossip, arrogance and disorder," he tells the Corinthians, "I am afraid when I come again my God will humble me before you, and I will be grieved over many who have sinned earlier and have not repented of the impurity, sexual sin and debauchery in which they have indulged" (2 Cor 12:20-21). He exhorts them to "test" themselves, and says, "we pray to God that you will not do anything wrong" (2 Cor 13:5, 7).

4.7. Offering Converts to the Returning Christ. The apostle regarded the whole Gentile mission* as an act of worship and expected to present his converts as an "offering acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit" (Romans 15:16). "What," he asks the Thessalonians, "is our hope, or joy, or the crown in which we will glory in the presence of our Lord Jesus when he comes? Is it not you? Indeed, you are our glory and joy*" (1 Thess 2:19-20). In his letters Paul connects this theme with prayer in three ways:

(1) The steadfast faithfulness of his converts results in praise to God: "How can we thank God enough for you in return for all the joy we have in the presence of God because of you?" (1 Thess 3:9).

(2) Their need for spiritual growth motivates the petition that he might visit them as he prays earnestly "night and day . . . that we may see you again and supply what is lacking in your faith. Now may our God and Father himself and the Lord Jesus clear the way for us to come to you" (1 Thess 3:10).

(3) His long-term concern about their state at the parousia (see Eschatology) motivates many of his intercessory and wish-prayers: "May the Lord make your love increase and overflow for each other and for everyone else, just as ours does for you. May he strengthen your hearts so that you will be blameless and holy in the presence of our God and Father when our Lord Jesus comes with all his holy ones" (1 Thess 3:12-13).

Paul wanted his converts to "eagerly wait for the Lord Jesus Christ to be revealed" (1 Cor 1:7), and his concern for their holiness, given the immediacy of Christ's return, is a prominent feature of many of the intercessory prayer reports.

4.8. The Spirit of Adoption. The Pauline understanding of Christian prayer places major emphasis on the believer's relationship with, and personal access to, God as Father. This privilege is an aspect of the Christian's "adoption" as God's child (see Adoption and Sonship), and is grounded solely in the finished work of Christ: "in him and through faith in him we may approach God with freedom and confidence" (Eph 3:12). This opportunity transcends race and culture. Through Christ, Jew and Gentile "both have access to the Father by one Spirit" (Eph 2:18). The apostle says, "God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out Abba, Father" (Gal 4:6; cf. Rom 8:15), and he relates the "Spirit of adoption" with the believer's ability to pray as Jesus did (cf. Mk 14:36), with childlike personal intimacy (see Bruce, 199-201). For Paul prayer originates in the indwelling Holy Spirit who gives the believer assurance of adoption. Those who take prayer seriously will pursue holiness and strive to avoid sin which "quenches" or "grieves" the Spirit (1 Thess 5:19; Eph 4:30). In Romans 12:1-2 he connects (1) holiness, (2) service to God and (3) nonconformity to the [sinful] pattern of the world, with the renewing of the mind—clearly implying that Christian obedience facilitates discernment ("testing and approval") of God's will (cf. Jn 14:21).

4.9. Prayer and the Will of God. For Paul the "struggle" of prayer was not an attempt to wrestle God into changing his will. Praying according to God's will was critical to Paul because he understood all activity in the world in terms of good and evil. Through prayer, one declares that God and his world are in constant conflict. Prayer is "in essence rebellion—rebellion against the world and its fallenness, the absolute and undying refusal to accept as normal what is pervasively abnormal. [Prayer is] . . . the refusal of every agenda, every scheme, every interpretation that is at odds with the norm as originally established by God" (Wells, 124). Thus prayer truly is a struggle.

But Paul does not envision a striving with God to bend his will to personal desires or to the needs of others. Rather prayer is part of the believer's struggle to discern, affirm and participate in doing God's will against the pervasive influence of the power of evil (see Arnold 1989 and 1992, 148-59). Commitment to living as well as to praying according to God's will constitutes the essence of what Paul means when he calls his readers to pray "in the name of Jesus" (Eph 5:20). Believers are admonished not just to pray, but to lift up hands which are "holy" (1 Tim 2:8). Because of the apostle's high view of God's sovereignty, he did not envision that answers to human prayer could ever be contrary to God's will. He told the Romans, "I pray that now at last by God's will the way may be opened for me to come to you" (Rom 1:10); and later he urged them to pray "that by God's will I may come to you with joy and together with you be refreshed" (Rom 15:32).

The priority of God's will was underscored for the apostle by the reality of importunate, persistent, yet unanswered prayer in his own life. "Three times I pleaded with the Lord," he says in 2 Corinthians 12:7-10, that a "stake in my flesh, a messenger of Satan, to torment me" might be taken away. Through this type of experience he came to understand that (1) adversity, suffering, insults and persecution were opportunities for God's power to be made "perfect," or completely manifest, through human weakness. Furthermore, (2) suffering in the will of God produces perseverance, character and hope which does not disappoint (Rom 5:3-5). And, finally, (3) suffering and "our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all" (2 Cor 4:17; cf. Rom 8:18). He thus urges "patience" as Christians wait and pray for the final realization of "our adoption as children (huiothesia), the redemption of our bodies" (Rom 8:23).

The apostle recognizes the seriousness of suffering in a fallen world and acknowledges in Romans 8:23 that believers "groan inwardly" because of it. He exhorts the church to "carry one another's burdens" (Gal 6:2), an expression often popularly explained, with appeal to Psalm 55:22, as an exhortation to intercession. But we should probably give more emphasis to the aspect of mutual concern in Christ, expressed in shouldering burdens such as the temptations of others (cf. Gal 6:1). Paul's famous blessing in 2 Corinthians 1:3-4, which describes God as "the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort, who comforts us in all of our troubles, so that we can comfort those in any trouble," seems to support this. Yet intercession is important in the apostle's discussion of suffering.*

4.10. The Intercession of the Spirit. Paul reveals in Romans 8:26-27 that "the Spirit helps us in our weakness.* We do not know what we ought to pray, but the Spirit himself intercedes (see Intercession) for us with groans that words cannot express. And he who searches our hearts knows the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints in accordance with God's will" (NIV, emphasis added). The central point here, namely the assurance that prayer offered by the Spirit is according to God's will, is rightly emphasized by the NIV quoted above. By rendering to gar ti proseuchōmetha "how to pray," the RV, RSV, NASB and NEB wrongly focus on prayer technique, methods or procedures. For Paul, asking in accordance with God's will (cf. 1 Jn 5:14-15) is the primary issue (for a survey of the exegetical issues see Cranfield, 1.421-23). The Spirit's intercession from within believers on earth is paralleled by ongoing intercession for believers by Christ himself in heaven* (Rom 8:34). The expression "unspoken groanings" (RSV) in Romans 8:26 is often taken as an allusion to tongues*-speaking by believers during prayer in difficult circumstances. But it seems best to regard stenagmois ("with sighs, groans") as a prayer activity of the Spirit, who discerns the believer's deepest needs and communicates them in a unique way directly to God (see Cranfield, 1.423-25; cf. Käsemann 239-41).

If this is correct, then Paul's reference elsewhere to praying "in the Spirit" (Eph 6:18) should probably also not be interpreted as a reference to tongues: a Spirit-inspired "prayer language" (so Peterson, 98; cf. Barrett, 319-20). To pray "in the Spirit" means "to pray in that awareness of God which the Spirit brings, to be able to approach him in simple trusting confidence as a child to his father" (Mitton, 228). As A. T. Lincoln puts it, in Ephesians 6:18 "the writer is calling for prayer inspired, guided and made effective through the Spirit" (Lincoln, 452).

4.11. The Pauline Prayer Focus: Eternal Rather Than Temporal. 1 Timothy 2:2 urges prayer for political stability "that we may live peaceful and quiet lives" in an environment which fosters the progress of the gospel. And the apostle gives instruction concerning prayer which touches on practical issues such as worship (1 Cor 11:5; 14:13-17) and table grace (Rom 14:6; 1 Cor 10:30; 11:24; 1 Tim 3:3-5). But it is striking that in the reports which constitute our major window into Paul's patterns of prayer, we see virtually no petition for many practical things such as daily bread, health or healing, improved economic conditions, etc. This is especially obvious in the two lengthy intercessory prayer periods of Ephesians 1:15-23 and 3:14-21.

The apostle's priorities come to the fore when he encourages the Corinthians to "fix our eyes not on what is seen, but on what is unseen. For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal" (2 Cor 4:18). This is paramount when he prays. Hence his initial intercession asks for greater knowledge of God, spiritual enlightenment, better understanding of what it means to be "in Christ" and certainty of God's "incomparably great power." The latter theme is reemphasized in Ephesians 3 where God's power is first linked with the strengthening of believers, "so that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith" (Eph 3:17) and, secondly, to total comprehension of Christ's love which surpasses knowledge. His ultimate goal is that his converts may mirror Christ, being "filled to the measure of all the fullness of God" (cf. Eph 3:19 with Col 1:19). This emphasis on spiritual well-being is seen throughout the Pauline letters. The missionary-pastor is neither ascetic nor unmindful of the importance of the practical affairs of daily living. But in terms which recall the words of Jesus, he urges believers to live (and pray) in ways which give first priority to the values of the present and coming kingdom: "Physical training is of some value, but godliness has value for all things, holding promise for both the present life, and the life to come" (1 Tim 4:8; see Carson 1992; for exegetical issues see Lincoln 1990, 196-221).

The apostle's intercession in Ephesians concludes with a doxology (Eph 3:20-21) well summarizing Paul's certainty about the efficacy of all prayer offered in the Spirit according to God's will: "Now unto him who is able to do immeasurably more than all we ask or imagine, according to his power that is at work within us, to him be glory in the church and in Christ Jesus throughout all generations, for ever and ever! Amen." See also BENEDICTION, BLESSING, DOXOLOGY, THANKSGIVING; HOLY SPIRIT; INTERCESSION; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; MYSTICISM; SPIRITUALITY; TONGUES; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989); idem, Powers of Darkness (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1992); J.-P. Audet, "Literary Forms and Contents of a Normal Eucharistia in the First Century," Studia Evangelica, vol. 1, ed. F. L. Cross (Berlin: Akademie, 1959) 643-62; C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (New York: Harper & Row, 1968); P. F. Bradshaw, Daily Prayer in the Early Church (London: SPCK, 1981); F. F. Bruce, Epistle to the Galatians (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (New York: Scribners, 1934); D. A. Carson, A Call to Spiritual Reformation: Priorities from Paul and His Prayers (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992); idem, ed., Teach Us to Pray: Prayer in the Bible and the World (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990); E. P. Clowney, "A Biblical Theology of Prayer," in Teach Us To Pray: Prayer in the Bible and the World, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990) 133-73; D. Coggan, The Prayers of the New Testament (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1967); C. E. B. Cranfield, Romans (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975, 1979); O. Cullmann, "La prière selon les Epîtres pauliniennes," TZ 35 (1979) 90-101; G. Delling, Worship in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962); A. Dietzel, "Beten im Geist: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Parallele aus den Hodayoth zum paulinischen Gebet im Geist," TZ 13 (1957) 12-32; F. Fisher, Prayer in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); J. A. Fitzmyer, "New Testament Epistles," in Jerome Biblical Commentary, ed. R. E. Brown et al. (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1968); R. Gebauer, Das Gebet bei Paulus (Basel: Brunnen, 1989); E. F. von der Goltz, "Das Beten des Apostels Paulus," in Das Gebet in der Ältesten Christenheit (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1901) 81-122; H. Greeven, "δέομαι κτλ," TDNT II.40-42; idem, "ἐρωτάω κτλ," TDNT II.685-89; idem, "προσκυνέω," TDNT VI.758-66; idem, "Paulus," in Gebet und Eschatologie im Neuen Testament (Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1931) 133-85; A. Hamman, "La Prière chez Saint Paul," in La Prière. I. Le Nouveau Testament (Tournai: Desclée, 1959) 245-333; G. Harder, Paulus und das Gebet (NTF 1.10; Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1936); F. Heiler, Das Gebet (5th ed.; München: E. Reinhardt, 1969); idem, Prayer (London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1958); E. Käsemann, Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC 42; Dallas: Word, 1990); C. L. Mitton, Ephesians (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); E. A. Obeng, "The Origins of the Spirit Intercession Motif in Romans 8:26," NTS 32 (1986) 621-32; P. T. O'Brien, "Ephesians 1: An Unusual Introduction to a New Testament Letter," NTS 25 (1979) 504-16; idem, Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul (NovTSup 49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); idem, "Romans 8:26, 27: A Revolutionary Approach to Prayer?" RTR 46 (1987) 65-73; idem, "Thanksgiving and the Gospel in Paul," NTS 21 (1974-75) 144-55; idem, "Thanksgiving within the Structure of Pauline Theology," in Pauline Studies, ed. D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980) 50-66; D. G. Peterson, "Prayer in Paul's Writings," in Teach Us To Pray: Prayer in the Bible and the Modern World, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990) 85-101, 325-28; J. M. Robinson, "Die Hodajot-Formel in Gebet und Hymnus des Frühchristentums," in Apophoreta: Festschrift für Ernst Haenchen, ed. W. Eltester and F. H. Kettler (BZNW 30; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1964); J. T. Sanders, "The Transition from Opening Epistolary Thanksgiving to Body in the Letters of the Pauline Corpus," JBL 81 (1962) 348-62; H. Schönweiss et al., "Prayer," NIDNTT 2.855-86; P. Schubert, Form and Function of the Pauline Thanksgivings (BZNW 20; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1939); K. Stendahl, "Paul at Prayer," Int 34 (1980) 240-49; J. R. W. Stott, "Paul Prays for the Church," Themelios 2 (1976) 2-4; J. G. S. S. Thompson, "Prayer," New Bible Dictionary, ed. J. D. Douglas (2d ed.; Wheaton, IL: Tyndale, 1982) 958-61; D. F. Wells, "Prayer: Rebelling Against the Status Quo," in Perspectives on the World Christian Movement (Pasadena: William Carey Library, 1981) 123-26; G. P. Wiles, Paul's Intercessory Prayers: The Significance of the Intercessory Prayer Passages in the Letters of St. Paul (SNTSMS 24; Cambridge: Cambridge University, 1978).

W. B. Hunter

PREACHING, KERYGMA

In his letter to the Corinthians Paul declared the priority of preaching in his ministry*—"For Christ did not send me to baptize, but to preach the gospel" (1 Cor 1:17). This gospel* was the "power* of God" leading to the salvation* of all who believed (Rom 1:16). Preaching was not a role Paul had chosen for himself. He spoke of being "compelled to preach" and confessed, "Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel" (1 Cor 9:16; cf. Acts 20:24; Jer 20:9). To the Romans he wrote of his "priestly duty of proclaiming the gospel of God" (Rom 15:16).

1. Terminology
2. The Message Paul Preached
3. Paul the Preacher
4. Twentieth-Century Scholarship

1. Terminology.

The two major verbs in Paul's letters for preaching are kēryssō and euangelizomai (each over twenty times). It is generally true to say that kēryssō tends to emphasize the activity of preaching and euangelizomai the quality of the message. However, the word groups overlap in such passages as Romans 16:25 ("Now to him who is able to establish you by my gospel [euangelion] and the proclamation [kērygma] of Jesus Christ." For other combinations see Gal 2:2; Col 1:23; 1 Thess 2:9). But Paul also uses other words in contexts where they are in some degree synonymous with kēryssō and kērygma. These include the verbs "to make known" (gnōrizō, Eph 6:19); "to portray" (prographō, Gal 3:1); "to proclaim" (diangellō, Rom 9:17); "to proclaim throughout" (katangellō, Rom 1:8); "to bear witness*/testify" (martyreō, 1 Cor 15:15); "to teach" (didaskō, Rom 2:21) and the nouns "news," or "report" (akoē, Rom 10:16-17); "testimony" (martys, 1 Cor 1:6); "word" (logos, Col 3:16). In addition to the passages using euangel- and kēry- words, and their various synonyms, Paul's sermon at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16-43) and his presentation before the Areopagus (Acts 17:22-31; see Athens) provide an important secondary witness to Paul's preaching.

2. The Message Paul Preached.

Paul's message centered on the person of Christ* (Gal 1:16), specifically, "Christ crucified" (1 Cor 1:23) and risen from the dead (1 Cor 15:12; cf. Acts 13:30-37; 17:31; see Resurrection). The content of his message is described by a variety of terms such as "the word of faith*" (Rom 10:8), "Jesus Christ as Lord*" (2 Cor 4:5), "the gospel*" (Gal 2:2; Col 1:23) or "the gospel of God*" (1 Thess 2:9; 2 Cor 11:7; 1 Thess 2:8), "the faith" (Gal 1:23), or "the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph 3:8). In Acts Paul is said to have preached "the kingdom*" (Acts 20:25), or "the kingdom of God" (Acts 28:31). This gospel is the only real gospel; anyone preaching "another gospel" is accursed (Gal 1:6-8; 2 Cor 11:4, 13-15).

Paul understood that the gospel had been entrusted to him by God (Tit 1:3). Therefore he avoided all flattery and deceit and spoke openly as a man "approved by God to be entrusted with the gospel" (1 Thess 2:4-5). It is instructive that the ancient Greek kēryx, or herald, was to be a person of integrity who would proclaim to the people exactly what the king wanted to make known. To add to or subtract from that message was considered treason. Paul served as an "ambassador" for Christ through whom God has made known the message of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:20; see Peace, Reconciliation; Apostle).

3. Paul the Preacher.

Paul considered himself to be a servant* of the gospel (Col 1:23). This entailed hard work (1 Cor 15:10; 2 Cor 11:24-28), facing strong opposition (1 Thess 2:2), suffering* (2 Tim 1:8) and even imprisonment (Phil 1:16; Eph 6:19-20; Philem 13; see Prison). Yet he was eager to preach the gospel especially in places where it had not been heard (Rom 1:5; 15:20; 2 Cor 10:16).

From birth Paul had been set aside for the purpose of preaching the gospel (Gal 1:15-16; cf. Rom 1:1). At the proper time God by his grace* called Paul and revealed to him his Son,* Christ Jesus (Gal 1:15-16). It was Paul's specific task to preach the gospel to the Gentiles* (Gal 2:7).

Paul's preaching did not rely upon "eloquence or superior wisdom*" (1 Cor 2:1). He did not preach the gospel with "words of human wisdom, lest the cross of Christ be emptied of its power" (1 Cor 1:17). It was crucial that faith rest on the power of God rather than on human wisdom or rhetorical proofs (apodeixis, 1 Cor 2:4-5; cf. 1 Thess 1:5; see Rhetoric). Thus Paul could speak of "miracles, signs* and wonders" attending his proclamation of the gospel (Rom 15:18-19; cf. 2 Cor 12:12). It was by the open declaration of God's redemptive act in Christ that listeners were brought to faith. The divine origin of the gospel (Gal 1:11-12) mandated a supernatural means of communication. Paul served only as the human instrument in that process. Apart from God's active involvement in preaching, the message would come as a stumbling block* to the Jews (who demanded miraculous signs) and foolishness to the Gentiles (who looked for wisdom). At this point the content and activity of preaching correspond, for both are marked by "foolishness" (1 Cor 1:21-25). Only to those who believe does it bring salvation (1 Cor 1:21-23). The minds of unbelievers have been blinded so that they are unable to see the light of the gospel of the glory* of Christ (2 Cor 4:4).

4. Twentieth-Century Scholarship.

In 1936 C. H. Dodd's seminal study on the preaching of the apostles was published. There he defined preaching as "the public proclamation of Christianity to the non-Christian world" (Dodd, 7). He arrived at an outline of the primitive kērygma by comparing the early sermons in Acts with the pre-Pauline creedal fragments in Paul's letters. A later study of the kērygma described the apostolic preaching as "a proclamation of his death, resurrection and exaltation of Jesus that led to an evaluation of His person as both Lord and Christ, confronted man with the necessity of repentance, and promised the forgiveness of sins" (Mounce, 84). All of these aspects of preaching are clearly seen in the preaching of Paul in Acts. For example, the importance of the resurrection is pivotal in both of Paul's sermons recorded in Acts (13:27-31; 17:31). A similar message is suggested by 1 Thessalonians 1:9-10, which may sum up Paul's gospel as it was first preached to the Thessalonians: turn from idols* to serve the living and true God ; it is his Son who died and whom God raised from the dead [and exalted to heaven*], this Jesus will come from heaven to rescue his people from the coming wrath.*

Dodd's emphasis on the content of the kerygma was in response to R. Bultmann's understanding of the kerygma as the active and effective Word, rather than content, that addresses men and women in their existential situation and elicits a response of faith. According to Bultmann, Paul's knowledge and interest in the historical Jesus were minimal and did not constitute the kerygma. Thus the existential and the salvation-historical perspectives on kerygma were squared off against one another, and the term kērygma and question of its precise character took on far greater weight than it is given in the NT itself.

In recent decades various aspects of the issue have been pursued. Some scholars have revisited the question of Paul's familiarity and interest in the historical Jesus and his use of Jesus tradition in his preaching. Bultmann's claim, based on his tendentious interpretation of 2 Corinthians 5:16, has been discredited in the view of many scholars. Hence, G. N. Stanton's study of the place of Jesus of Nazareth in early Christian preaching concludes that "the possibility must be allowed that Paul laid greater emphasis on the pre-crucifixion events and the character of Jesus in his preaching than he does in his epistles" (Stanton, 113; see too Lemcio). While Paul's explicit references to sayings of Jesus are relatively few, the possible allusions are, by some accounts, numerous (see Jesus, Sayings of). This phenomenon might be due to the Jesus tradition having been transmitted in the setting of Paul's initial missionary preaching and teaching.

Consideration of the varied settings and activities of communication within the early Christian communities questioned whether preaching can be sharply distinguished from other forms of communication. What sort of distinction should be drawn between mission* and community kērygma? More importantly, has too rigid a distinction been drawn between kērygma and didachē ("teaching")? Paul seems to indicate a relationship between the two in Romans 2:21, where the content of kērygma seems to be defined as didachē. J. I. H. McDonald has suggested that the distinction between kērygma and didachē lies in the "situation" and "posture" of the communicator "rather than the substance of the message, . . . preaching and teaching are properly regarded as being broadly complementary and as denoting the whole process of communicating the appropriate message" (McDonald, 5). McDonald has examined kērygma within the context of the koinōnia of the community, where didachē ("teaching"), prophēteia ("prophecy," "inspired utterance"), paraenesis ("moral exhortation"), paraklēsis ("exhortatory preaching" to the community) and paradosis ("tradition*") all play a role and have varying degrees of overlap and interrelationship (see Teaching/Paraenesis).

The content of the Pauline kerygma, or gospel, inasmuch as it shares the same concerns as the larger question of the coherence of Paul's theology (see Center), has led some scholars to question whether it ever achieved a final and static form. Did it not develop over time? Is it perhaps better understood as being fluid, having a coherent substratum that was capable of varied contingent expressions according to circumstances (Beker)? Should the structure of Paul's kerygma be summed up as an integrated set of propositions, or should it be construed as a narrative of Jesus Messiah? Was Paul's kerygma (however it might be defined) one of a number of diverse kērygmata of the early church, some of which Paul would have found compatible with his own kerygma and others which he would have disavowed as "another gospel" (Dunn)? And to what extent was the kerygma of Paul continuous with or dissimilar from the kerygma of Jesus (see Jesus and Paul)? These questions continue to prod research into Paul and the early church and reveal a lack of consensus regarding the coherence, or center, of Paul's gospel, much less of a kerygma of the early church.

Finally, the relationship between Paul's kerygma and his self-understanding as an apostle* as well as the social reality of his mission and ministry is being actively explored (see Social-Scientific Approaches to Paul). Clearly, Paul's theology of the cross shaped his apostolic lifestyle, the way in which he envisioned his mission and the definition of his gospel over against that of some of his opponents.*

See also APOSTLE; ATHENS, PAUL AT; CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; CHRISTOLOGY; CREEDS; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; DEATH OF CHRIST; GOSPEL; JESUS, SAYINGS OF; JESUS AND PAUL; MINISTRY; MISSION; PREACHING FROM PAUL TODAY; RHETORIC; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; TEACHING/PARAENESIS; TRADITION; WITNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Baird, "What is the Kerygma? A Study of 1 Cor 15:3-8 and Gal 1:11-17," JBL 76 (1957) 181-91; C. K. Barrett, Biblical Problems and Biblical Preaching (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1964); J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936); J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); C. F. Evans, "The Kerygma," JTS 7 (1956) 25-41; H. H. Farmer, The Servant of the Word (London: Nesbet, 1942); G. Friedrich, "κῆρυξ κτλ," TDNT III.683-718; L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) 2.107-18; F. W. Grosheide, "The Pauline Epistles as Kerygma," in Studia Paulina, ed. J. N. Sevenster and W. C. van Unnik (Haarlem: De Ervem F. Bohn, 1953) 139-45; J. Knox, The Integrity of Preaching (New York: Abingdon, 1957); E. E. Lemcio, The Past of Jesus in the Gospels (SNTSMS 68; Cambridge: University Press, 1991); J. I. H. McDonald, Kerygma and Didache: The Articulation and Structure of the Earliest Christian Message (SNTSMS 37; Cambridge: University Press, 1980); O. Merk, "κηρύσσω κτλ," EDNT 2.288-92; R. H. Mounce, The Essential Nature of New Testament Preaching (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960); B. Reicke, "A Synopsis of Early Christian Preaching," in The Root of the Vine, ed. A. Friedrichsen et al. (New York: Philosophical Library, 1953) 138-41; J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); G. N. Stanton, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching (SNTSMS 27; Cambridge: University Press, 1974); J. S. Stewart, Heralds of God (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1946); J. R. W. Stott, The Preacher's Portrait (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961); P. Stuhlmacher, "The Pauline Gospel," in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. P. Stuhlmacher (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991) 149-72; H. G. Wood, "Didache, Kerygma and Euangelion," in New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Manchester: Manchester University, 1959) 306-14.

R. H. Mounce

PREACHING FROM PAUL TODAY

Contemporary preaching from Paul's letters is a natural extension of their original use in first-century churches. For Paul not only addressed these letters to specific churches, he also requested that they be read in the church addressed (1 Thess 5:27; cf. 2 Thess 3:14) and be shared with other churches (Col 4:16). The link to contemporary preaching comes into view when one considers that these letters were not only to be read in the churches but also explained by the letter carriers (Doty, 30, 37). Preachers must be acquainted with several issues in order to do justice to Paul's letters in contemporary preaching.

1. The Nature of Paul's Letters
2. The Form of Paul's Letters
3. Rhetorical Structures
4. Selecting a Suitable Preaching Text
5. Analyzing the Preaching Text
6. Crossing the Historical-Cultural Gap
7. Designing the Sermon
8. Preaching Christ

1. The Nature of Paul's Letters.

Paul's letters are ideal sources for contemporary preaching because of their kerygmatic nature. For not only are these letters relevant communications, some also contain the actual preaching* of the apostle Paul, and all may be characterized as a special form of preaching and as the Word of God.*

1.1. Relevant Communications. It is clear from Paul's letters that for the most part they were written originally for specific occasions. For example, the letter to the Galatians* was written because Paul had heard that church members were "turning to a different gospel," that of the Judaizers (Gal 1:6 RSV throughout); 1 Thessalonians* was occasioned by Timothy's return from Thessalonica and his report to Paul (1 Thess 3:6); 2 Thessalonians was written to counter a pseudo-Pauline letter circulating in Thessalonica claiming "that the day of the Lord has come" (2 Thess 2:2); and Colossians* was written to head off the threat of a deceitful philosophy* (Col 2:8). Because Paul's letters were written for specific occasions, they have been called "occasional documents." This designation is homiletically significant because it reminds preachers that these letters were inherently relevant in the first century and that this relevance can be uncovered today only by way of historical investigation and interpretation.

1.2. Summarized Sermons. In addressing the immediate concerns that occasioned his letters, Paul also recorded here and there summaries of his typical sermons. R. Longenecker writes:

> Probably . . . we should view the body of Romans (1:18-15:13) as something of a précis of Paul's preaching in Jewish synagogues of the Diaspora and at Jewish-Gentile gatherings, with that précis during the course of his missionary activities having become more and more polished in literary form. . . . The so-called Letter to the Ephesians . . . likely . . . was originally meant to be a précis of Paul's teaching on redemption in Christ and the nature of the church, and was sent out as something of a circular tractate letter to churches in the Roman province of Asia, of which Ephesus was the capital. (Longenecker, 104-5)

In the dictation of other letters, too, Paul would quite naturally have included previous sermonic material.

1.3. Long-Distance Preaching. Paul's letters may also be characterized as long-distance preaching. They were like preaching not only because they addressed specific needs in early churches but also because they were primarily oral communications. Except for brief conclusions (2 Thess 3:17; Gal 6:11; 1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18), Paul did not write these letters but dictated them to secretaries (amanuenses; cf. Rom 16:22) for the purpose of public reading in the churches. Like preaching, therefore, these letters were a form of oral communication. Moreover, in the Greek letter-writing tradition, a letter was a stand-in for the presence (parousia) of its author (see Itineraries). Since Paul was "unable to be present in person, his letters were a direct substitute, and were to be accorded weight equal to Paul's physical presence" (Doty, 36; cf. 1 Cor 5:3-4; 2 Cor 10:11). Listening to Paul's letter being read, therefore, was the same as hearing Paul himself speak—except that this speaking was long-distance and was committed to writing.

1.4. The Word of God. Paul wrote to the Thessalonians, "We also thank God constantly for this, that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers" (1 Thess 2:13). If the hearers heard Paul speak not only in his preaching but also in his letters, one may assume that they would also have accepted Paul's letters as "the word of God." This assumption was confirmed subsequently when the church acknowledged these letters to be canonical. As the Word of God, Paul's letters are the authoritative kerygma, eminently suitable as the normative source for preaching today. As the letter carriers originally received "authority to convey the letters, to expand upon them, and to continue Paul's work" (Doty, 37), so contemporary preachers may continue Paul's work by expounding his letters. But to do so with authority,* they will have to do justice to the inspired words of Paul (see Greidanus, 1-16).

2. The Form of Paul's Letters.

In order to do justice to Paul's words, preachers will have to take into account, among other things, the location of Paul's words: whether they function in the opening section, the body of the letter, or in some other section. For just as letters today have a standard form (Heading, Greeting [Dear Sir], Body, Complimentary Close [Sincerely yours], Signature), so Paul's letters reveal a standard form (see Letters, Letter Forms). The homiletical significance of Paul's letter form becomes apparent when one compares Paul's form with that of contemporary Greek letters.

2.1. The Standard Form of Greek Letters. The ancient Greeks had developed a standard letter form which consisted of three main parts:

> 1. An introduction, prescript, or salutation, which included the name of the sender, the name of the addressee, greetings and often a wish for good health.
> 2. The body or text of the letter, introduced by characteristic formulae.
> 3. A conclusion, which included greetings to persons other than the addressee, a final greeting or prayer sentence, and sometimes a date (Longenecker, 103).

2.2. Paul's Changes in the Standard Form. In writing his letters to various churches, Paul modified the standard Greek form in various subtle ways but particularly by developing two major sections: a section of thanksgiving (see Benediction; see O'Brien; Aune, 177, 186) and a section of exhortations. Thus Paul's letters usually follow a five-part form:

> 1. Opening: Sender, Addressee, Greeting
> 2. Thanksgiving to God for the Addressee's Faithfulness (missing in Galatians)
> 3. Body
> 4. Exhortations ("paraenesis")
> 5. Closing: Peace Wish, Greetings, Warnings, Benediction

2.3. The Homiletical Significance. The changes Paul introduced in the standard Greek letter form provide several hints for preachers on how these letters demand to be preached.

2.3.1. Major Changes. Paul changed the opening greeting of his letters from the standard Greek chairein (greeting) to charis (grace) and, probably in imitation of the shalom of Jewish letters, added the word "peace" (Doty, 22, 29). The neutral Greek "Greeting" thus becomes the profound Christian greeting, "Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." Paul also changed the conclusion to a peace wish and variations of "The grace* of the Lord* Jesus Christ* and the love* of God and the fellowship* of the Holy Spirit* be with you all." The whole letter is thus enveloped in the inclusio of God's grace and peace*: "(opening) grace and peace, (closing) peace and grace" (Roetzel, 37). (Echoes of the opening and closing of Christian worship* services are probably not accidental; see Liturgical Elements.)

Further, the new section of thanksgiving to God immediately focuses the listeners' attention on God's grace as it comes to expression in the church.* Moreover, the new section of exhortations follows the thanksgiving and the body of the letter; that is, in all of Paul's letters, God's indicative precedes the imperative (see Ethics). In short, Paul's major changes have made his letters God-centered. The homiletical implication is clear: to be true to Paul's letters, one will have to preach God-centered, relevant sermons. The reverse also holds true: anthropocentric and legalistic or moralistic sermons do not do justice to Paul and are possible only by isolating the preaching text from its context in Paul's letter.

2.3.2. Subtle Changes. Paul's more subtle changes provide clues for understanding the concrete issues he was addressing. His variations in the formal opening frequently provide initial hints of the issues addressed. For example, in his letter to Philemon,* which seeks unheard-of forgiveness* and acceptance for the runaway slave* Onesimus, Paul describes himself humbly as "Paul, a prisoner* for Christ Jesus." By contrast, in his letter to the Galatians* who questioned his apostleship* and rejected his gospel of grace, Paul opens with, "Paul an apostle—sent neither by human commission nor from human authorities, but through Jesus Christ and God the Father" (Gal 1:1 NRSV). Similar clues to the letter's concern may be found in the description of the addressees.

The thanksgiving section provides even clearer clues to the reason(s) for writing and the major concerns of the letter. For example, the thanksgiving section to Philemon concentrates on Paul's love for the saints (Philem 5, 7). Not surprisingly, in the body of the letter Paul appeals for acceptance of Onesimus "for love's sake" (Philem 9). Paul's letter to the Galatians, by contrast, omits the thanksgiving section—an omission which speaks loudly of Paul's deep disappointment at their desertion of the gospel of grace. Paul jumps in immediately, "I am astonished . . ." (Gal 1:6). Since Paul tends to repeat his major concerns in various parts of his letter, he provides a string of clues to the main issues addressed and thus forces contemporary preachers to understand each issue in the context of the whole letter.

3. Rhetorical Structures.

Paul's letters reveal intricate rhetorical structures (see Rhetoric, Rhetorical Criticism). The existence of these structures in dictated letters can be accounted for by two facts: First, Paul made use of structured traditional materials such as hymns,* creeds,* ethical lists and doxologies (see Benediction), as well as his own standardized sermons. Second, Paul dictated these letters with a view to their being heard. For contemporary preaching, one needs to pay attention to these rhetorical structures.

> Good preaching not only presents the text but attends to how the text itself preaches. The Scriptures are not a shapeless mass, a lump of dough, to be divided and shaped into sermons and lessons. The texts already have shapes and contours, reflecting the writer's concern for the arts of persuasion, for the listeners' need to remember what is read to them, and for ways of communicating which are congenial to the nature of the message; in other words, for communication that respects and cares for the listeners as thinking, feeling, deciding, believing human beings. (Craddock, 166-67)

3.1. Repetition. Repetition is still used today by teachers and preachers who are sensitive to the demands of oral/aural communication. Paul uses repetition at different levels. He frequently repeats major issues (e.g., Christian freedom in Gal 5:1 and 13). At other times he simply repeats a single word (e.g., the sevenfold repetition of one in Eph 4:4-6, "There is one body and one Spirit . . ."). Then again he strings together a series of questions (e.g., Rom 6—7). Repetition may serve simply to recall and/or elaborate a point, or to emphasize a point, or to provide continuity for the hearers. Since repetition still serves the same functions in oral communication, preachers should not only pay attention to Paul's repetitions but follow suit in their own preaching.

3.2. Parallelism and Chiasm. Parallelism (e.g., A B A′ B′) and chiasm (e.g., A B C B′ A′) are both forms of repetition and both are found in Paul's letters. For example, in 1 Corinthians 15:55 Paul quotes the synonymous parallelism of Hosea, O death, where is thy victory?

O death, where is thy sting?

In 1 Corinthians 12—14 Paul uses a simple A B A′ chiasm:

A. Spiritual gifts (1 Cor 12:1-31a)
B. Love, the greatest gift (1 Cor 12:31b—13:13)
A'. Spiritual gifts: prophecy and tongues (1 Cor 14:1-40)

Parallelism served not only as an aid to memory but also to emphasize and present the point from different angles. True chiasm, in addition, served to focus literally on the central issue, the turning point. Preachers today can use these ancient rhetorical structures, which are detected especially in the Greek NT, to gain a clearer understanding of a passage by comparing the parallel lines, to discern the focal point in the heart of a chiasm and to discover the limits of a section that makes for an ideal preaching text (see Greidanus, 58-67, 319-22).

3.3. Diatribe. As was customary in his time, Paul used "the device of diatribe by which a speaker or writer enters into imaginary debate with an interlocutor, raising points which he would make and objections he would voice, which are then answered and refuted" (Martin, 247). Diatribe gave the hearers a voice in the debate and thus sought to persuade. For example, Paul used the following diatribe in Romans 3:27-31: "Then what becomes of our boasting? It is excluded. On what principle? On the principle of works? No, but on the principle of faith. . . . Do we then overthrow the law by this faith? By no means! On the contrary, we uphold the law" (for more examples, see Malherbe, 129-34). Awareness of this ancient rhetorical device will help preachers not only in tracing the course of Paul's argument but also in retracing in their own sermons the rhetorical trail laid down by Paul.

4. Selecting a Suitable Preaching Text.

One cannot cut up Paul's letters into random snippets and still have confidence of doing justice to Paul. In selecting a preaching text, preachers interested in proclaiming the thoughts of Paul will wish to show respect for the shape as well as the content of Paul's letters. This respect calls for the selection of preaching texts that are appropriate passages, literary units, and that include, if feasible, the original issue, Paul's answer and defense, and his goal.

4.1. An Appropriate Passage. Before settling on a preaching text, preachers ought to raise the question of what goal, what objective they are seeking to accomplish with the sermon. If they desire to move their congregation to repentance, they will require a passage where Paul aims at that goal; if they wish to comfort, they will require a passage where Paul aims to comfort; if they wish to stir people to greater love, they will require a passage where Paul aims at that very goal. Coordinating one's goal with that of the apostle Paul will prevent the dissonance that results when a passage of Paul is used for a different objective from what he had in mind.

4.2. A Literary Unit. To do justice to the shape and content of Paul's letters, one should select as preaching text at least a literary unit rather than an isolated verse or phrase. Paul's rhetorical devices frequently identify such units, for chiasm and inclusio encompass rhetorical units, and diatribe and repetition, such as the key word technique, continue as long as one is in the same unit of thought. The content, of course, provides the most obvious clue: a change of content means a different unit of thought. Selecting anything shorter than a literary unit is to chop up Paul's original units of thought. For example, to select Ephesians 1:4a, "even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world," to preach a sermon on predestination (see Election and Predestination) distorts Paul's construction and thought. For Paul continues in Ephesians 1:4b, "that we should be holy and blameless before him." And this verse, in turn, is but part of a single Greek sentence that runs from Ephesians 1:3 to 1:14. Since the units and sections in each letter are closely interrelated, the most appropriate treatment of Paul's letters would be a brief series of sermons on a specific letter.

4.3. The Issue, Response and Substantiations. Whenever feasible, a reference to the historical issue that gave rise to the text should be included in the preaching text. When the text is a response to a specific issue, combining in one text the original question and its answer can only benefit genuine hearing. Moreover, Paul's substantiations for a claim or demand should be included in the preaching text, for they are part of the thought unit. For example, instead of selecting as text only Romans 8:28, "We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose," one ought to include the substantiations of this claim that follow in Romans 8:29-30 (Liefeld, 70-71). The inclusion of the issue and substantiations would generally argue against selecting a preaching text from the opening of Paul's letters. Although the sender and greeting sections sometimes anticipate the burden of the letter, since the issue and Paul's answer and substantiations are stated much more elaborately in the thanksgiving and especially in the body of the letter, the latter deserve priority in selection for preaching texts.

4.4. Paul's Goal. Whenever possible, Paul's aim should be included as part of the text, for this goal expressed the relevance of this passage in the past—a relevance that can function as a bridge to contemporary relevance. For example, in preaching on Philippians 2, preachers have selected as their text the Christ hymn and preached on Christ's states of humiliation and exaltation.* But what is the aim of such sermons? Paul clearly states his goal in Philippians 2:5 when he introduces the hymn with the words, "Let the same mind be in you that was in Christ Jesus"(NRSV). Paul's aim, as the preceding verses also show, is to stir the Philippians up to love and selfless service (Fowl; see Servant, Service). And that goal is still worth pursuing by preachers today.

5. Analyzing the Preaching Text.

After selecting the text to be used in preaching, one ought to study it in its literary and historical contexts.

5.1. The Literary Context. The common advice to read through the whole letter in one sitting is good counsel, for that is the way letters are usually read. As one reads through the letter, perhaps several times and aloud in different translations, one should gain a sense of the whole document, its recipients, its occasion, its parts and its overall theme and goal.

5.2. The Historical Context. Since Paul's letters are occasional documents, written to respond to specific historical needs in the early church, it stands to reason that one cannot fully understand his letters without understanding the underlying historical background. Therefore, preachers need to determine the occasion that gave rise to the letter. The question is, What is the historical question to which this particular text is the answer?

Sometimes Paul himself identifies the question explicitly. For example, in 1 Thessalonians 4:13 he says that he will deal with the question "concerning those who are asleep." In 1 Corinthians* he lists a whole series of questions starting with 1 Corinthians 7:1, "Now concerning the matters about which you wrote," and answers each in turn (see 1 Cor 7:25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1). However, Paul responds not only to their written questions but also to other issues: for example, 1 Corinthians 5:1, "It is actually reported that there is immorality among you"; and 1 Corinthians 11:18, "I hear that there are divisions among you." Where such explicit identification of the historical question is lacking, it must be painstakingly gleaned from the letter itself and other sources.

5.3. The Text Itself. Reading the whole letter in its historical context has set the stage for analyzing the specific message of the preaching text. This is the time for careful grammatical-historical exegesis of the Greek text. It is also the time for comparing the message of the text with similar messages elsewhere in this letter, as well as in other letters and other books of Scripture (analogia Scripturae, "analogy of Scripture").

Reading the text in its literary contexts will keep one from preaching, say, exhortations in isolation, for the imperative cannot be proclaimed without the divine indicative stated or assumed earlier in the letter (see Greidanus, 325-27). Reading the text in its historical context will make one aware of the intense relevance of Paul's letters for the churches addressed. However, this very relevance brings one face to face with the historical-cultural gap, for questions of circumcision,* eating food offered to idols (see Food) and master-slave relations (see Slave, Slavery) are hardly burning issues in the West today.

6. Crossing the Historical-Cultural Gap.

How can one preach relevantly to a twentieth-century Western church a message intended originally for the first-century church of Corinth?

6.1. Overarching Continuity. Without denying the reality of the historical-cultural gap, one ought first to appreciate the continuity between past and present—a continuity rooted in the faithful covenant God. God's plan for redeeming his fallen creation (Gen 3:15; Rom 8:19-23) results in the history of the coming kingdom of God (1 Cor 15:22-24; see Kingdom). In this history God calls into being one covenant people, the church (Gal 3:8, 29).

Since the churches Paul addressed and churches today are essentially one church under God, living in the same NT epoch of kingdom history, God's message addressed to first-century churches is relevant for churches today (Greidanus 169-73, 330-31). This continuity accounts for the fact that so much in Paul's letters is directly applicable to the church today. Then as well as now, God's people were and are called to faith,* hope* and love.* Nevertheless, preachers will frequently find themselves obstructed by the historical-cultural gap, for Paul spoke relevantly to churches that lived in a different culture and at an earlier stage of the NT epoch.

6.2. Analogies. A major bridge across the historical-cultural gap is provided by analogies between the church Paul addressed and the church today. These analogies are not figments of our imagination, for they exist by virtue of the fact that there is basically but one church and but one Word of God. Preachers, therefore, need not construct analogies but uncover existing ones. This search requires a thorough understanding of both the church addressed by Paul and the church today. It requires cognizance of the question behind the text—the question to which Paul responded.

Why was the church then in need of correction, comfort or encouragement? And is there a genuine analogy between that situation and the situation in the church today so that Paul's answer is an authentic response to the present need for correction, comfort and encouragement? One must be careful to search out real analogies. It will not do simply to draw an analogy between Judaizers in Galatia and conservatives or ritualists in the church today and redirect Paul's words for Judaizers at contemporary conservatives. Before drawing such an analogy to people today, one should at least take into account that Judaizers denied the gospel of grace by insisting on works (see Works of the Law) for inclusion among God's people.

*6.3. Principle and Practice. If the issue is so culturally specific that no direct analogy can be found in the present church, it may be helpful to view the message as a particular cultural application of a biblical principle and seek to discover precisely what this underlying principle is. Once discovered, the question is how to apply this biblical principle today in an analogous way to its biblical application (Fee and Stuart, 62-70). For example, when Paul demands in 1 Corinthians 11:2-16 that women must be veiled when they pray or prophesy, his command is clearly culturally conditioned. Preachers today would miss the point if they insisted in our culture that women be veiled. But the biblical principle behind this application, the principle of appropriate dress for women and men in the worship service (1 Cor 14:40), may open the way for contemporary application.

> The search for the points of analogy is a risky task. This is so since there can be no total identity. History never repeats itself completely. . . . Thus preaching is a creative art. It is not a cool application but a creative vision for analogies. Risky it is, and that is why the preacher must seek the guidance of the Spirit as the sermon grows out of study and meditation. (Stendahl, 307)

7. Designing the Sermon.

After considering these issues, one is ready to begin designing the sermon.

7.1. Paul's Goal. One of the first questions that needs to be raised concerns Paul's goal or aim. Why is Paul writing this passage to this particular church? Is he aiming to teach, or reprove, or correct, or train in righteousness (2 Tim 3:16), or comfort or encourage? The question behind the text together with the text will help answer the why question.

*7.2. The Sermon's Goal. The sermon's goal cannot always be identical with Paul's goal but should at least be in harmony with it. Preachers should ask themselves, Why am I preaching this sermon? This question will reveal one's goal. The sermon's goal will guide the preacher in designing the sermon, perhaps in selecting a fitting introduction and certainly in formulating a pertinent conclusion.

*7.3. Paul's Theme. Along with the why question about Paul's aim, one needs to ask the what question about Paul's message. What is Paul's theme in this text? What is the main idea that encompasses all subsidiary ideas? This theme should be formulated in a brief sentence: subject and predicate.

*7.4. The Sermon's Theme. Next, Paul's message needs to be compared with other Scripture passages to see if it can be preached as it is or needs some adjustments or qualifications. Usually Paul's message can be preached as is, but sometimes his message is one-sided and needs to be balanced by other passages before it can be preached as God's word for his people today. For example, Paul's message in Romans 13:1-7, "Be subject to the government because it is God's servant," needs to be balanced by Acts 5:29 and Revelation 13:1-10 before it can be preached today. Thus the sermon theme may need to be changed to something like, "Be subject to the government when it is God's servant."

Other passages are so culturally specific that their themes need to be recast to communicate to the church's present situation. For example, Paul's message in 1 Corinthians 8, "Christians may eat food offered to idols unless it causes a brother to fall" will need to be recast into a contemporary issue or the more general sermon theme, "Christian freedom is limited by the well-being of fellow Christians." The functions of the sermon theme are to keep the sermon on the right track and to ensure its unity as well as movement (Greidanus 139-40).

*7.5. The Form of the Sermon. The form of a sermon on Paul's letters can vary from deductive to inductive development to a combination of both, and from a didactic form to a narrative form. Most appropriate is a form which closely conforms to the text itself by following its flow: for example, its development of ideas, its line of argumentation, or its repetition of words, phrases or questions.

7.6. The Relevance of the Sermon. As Paul's letters were intensely relevant for the early church, so sermons on his letters can be intensely relevant for the church today. This relevance can be achieved by taking clear aim as Paul did. Moreover, preachers can follow Paul in addressing the whole person—intellect, will and emotions—and in showing the relevance of their message for the whole of life—physical as well as spiritual and public as well as personal. Further help for relevant preaching is provided by Paul's metaphors which range from putting on "the whole armor of God" with all of its parts (Eph 6:11-17) to running the race to obtain the prize (1 Cor 9:24), and from "justification" to "redemption" (see Redemption), and "adoption"* to "liberty" (see Freedom). Preachers can use these metaphors to make abstract truths concrete and living for their hearers.

8. Preaching Christ.

Finally and most importantly, preachers are to preach Christ crucified and risen as Paul did (see Christology). Paul told the Corinthians, "I decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified" (1 Cor 2:2; see Cross, Theology of the). Contemporary recommendations to use Paul's letters to preach biographical sermons on Paul are obviously contrary to his intentions. Yet, as his letters show, Paul's preaching of Christ is not simply a constant retelling of Jesus' life, death and resurrection (Rom 10:9). Rather, Paul takes his starting point in Jesus Christ and preaches Christ as his person and work illumine all other vital issues and questions. "Jesus Christ and him crucified" is the heart of God's plan of redemption; from this heart, renewing power pulses into every area of life.

In the light of Colossians 1:15-20, preaching Christ means to preach the God through whom and for whom "all things" were created and through whom "all things" are being reconciled. Ultimately, preaching Christ has to do with "all things." Therefore, contemporary preaching from Paul's letters may rightly address any area of life and any vital issue, but all issues must be viewed and preached in the light of Christ and his redemptive work. This transforms one's preaching into the good news of which Paul said, "I am eager to preach the gospel. . . . For . . . it is the power of God for salvation to everyone who has faith" (Rom 1:15-16).

See also CENTER OF PAUL'S THEOLOGY; GOSPEL; HERMENEUTICS/INTERPRETING PAUL; PREACHING, KERYGMA.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); F. B. Craddock, "Preaching to Corinthians," Int 44 (1990) 158-68; W. G. Doty, Letters in Primitive Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); G. D. Fee and D. Stuart, How to Read the Bible for All Its Worth: A Guide to Understanding the Bible (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982); S. F. Fowl, The Story of Christ in the Ethics of Paul (JSNTSup 36; Sheffield: Academic Press, 1990); S. Greidanus, The Modern Preacher and the Ancient Text: Interpreting and Preaching Biblical Literature (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); L. E. Keck, Paul and His Letters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); W. L. Liefeld, New Testament Exposition: From Text to Sermon (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1984); R. N. Longenecker, "On the Form, Function, and Authority of New Testament Letters," in Scripture and Truth, ed. D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1983) 101-14; A. J. Malherbe, Moral Exhortation, A Greco-Roman Sourcebook (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); R. P. Martin, "Approaches to New Testament Exegesis," in New Testament Interpretation: Essays on Principles and Methods, ed. I. H. Marshall (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977) 220-51; F. J. Matera, "Preaching Paul," Chicago Studies 24 (1985) 323-38; J. Murphy-O'Connor, Paul on Preaching (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1964); P. T. O'Brien, Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul (NovTSup 49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); C. J. Roetzel, The Letters of Paul: Conversations in Context (Atlanta: John Knox, 1975); K. Stendahl, "Preaching from the Pauline Epistles," in Biblical Preaching: An Expository Treasury, ed. J. W. Cox (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983) 306-26.

S. Greidanus

PREDESTINATION.

See ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION.

PRE-EXISTENCE

The term pre-existence refers to the idea of an entity having a heavenly existence before its earthly, historical or eschatological* manifestation, sometimes even before the creation* of the world. Pre-existence is attributed to Christ* in a number of NT passages (e.g., Jn 1:1-18; Heb 1:1-3), including several Pauline passages, according to most scholars. But there is disagreement about which, if any, Pauline passages express the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ, about the conceptual sources of this doctrine, and about what the expressions of Christ's pre-existence meant. As well, Paul's letters suggest what may be an allied concept of the precosmic divine predestination of believers (see Election and Predestination).

1. Ancient Jewish Tradition
2. Christ's Pre-existence
3. Conclusions

1. Ancient Jewish Tradition.

1.1. Background. There is today a virtual consensus among scholars that the pre-Christian Jewish tradition provides the most important background for the idea of pre-existence in the NT. (For a fuller discussion, see Hamerton-Kelly 1966.) In addition to specific examples of pre-existence, two general concepts are to be noted: (1) that certain historical phenomena are earthly manifestations of heavenly realities, which gives to the historical phenomena a transcendent validity and significance, and (2) that God* foresees and has even ordained history and/or a plan of salvation from the beginning (see Foreknowledge, Divine).

Both in the OT and in the wider ancient Near Eastern cultures, we encounter ideas that there is a heavenly, transcendent realm in which matters of earthly importance have ideal and prior reality; for example, the wilderness tabernacle is designed according to the heavenly pattern shown to Moses in Exodus 25:9, 40; 26:30; 27:8; Numbers 8:4, showing that it is no mere human contrivance but a model of a heavenly reality. Such an outlook is especially clear in OT material designated as priestly tradition, in Ezekiel (e.g., Ezek 43:10-12), in extracanonical literature (e.g., the Angelic Liturgy from Qumran [4Q400-407; 11Q5-6]; T. Levi 3:4-8), and in the NT (e.g., Rev 4—5). Jubilees likewise claims that Sabbath (Jub. 2:30) and the Feast of Weeks (Jub. 6:17-18) were observed in heaven from the creation.

In apocalyptic* thought God's eschatological blessings are often described as waiting in heaven, as in 2 Apocalypse of Baruch 4:2-7, which states that the heavenly Jerusalem* and Temple* were created with the world but taken to heaven after Adam's sin, to be held there until the eschaton. Paul's reference to "the Jerusalem above" (Gal 4:26) suggests a similar notion (and see Rev 21:9-14).

The conviction that God foreknows all things and (in some passages) has foreordained things before their earthly, historical appearance is frequent in OT prophetic books (e.g., Is 42:9; 46:8-11; Jer 1:4), and is fundamental in apocalyptic thought (e.g., 1QS 3:15-16; "all that is and shall be" answers to God's preordained design). Paul says that God "foreknew" and "predestined" believers "to be conformed to the image of his Son" (Rom 8:29-30), which suggests that the divine salvific purpose, the identity of believers and "the Son" (Christ) had some sort of (precosmic) heavenly reality (in the mind of God?). And Ephesians* (Pauline authorship widely doubted) states that God chose believers "in Christ before the foundation of the world" (Eph 1:3-6).

1.2. Pre-existent Personages. The Testament of Moses claims that God "created the world on behalf of his people" (T. Mos. 1:12-13), and that Moses was "prepared from the beginning of the world, to be the mediator of [God's] covenant" (T. Mos. 1:14). In 4 Ezra the Messiah "who will arise from the offspring of David" is kept by God "until the end of days" (4 Ezra 12:32); and 4 Ezra 13:25-26 states that the messianic man from the sea of 4 Ezra 13:3 is "he whom the Most High has been keeping for many ages." Similarly, 1 Enoch 48:1-7 describes a messianic figure whose "name was named" and who was "chosen and hidden . . . before the world was created." In The Prayer of Joseph, Jacob appears to be described as the historical manifestation of a pre-existent angelic being.

It is sometimes difficult to determine whether in a given text the figure has an independent, heavenly existence or some other kind of prior reality in the mind or plan of God, so to speak. Nevertheless, the evidence shows that in ancient Jewish tradition there was a freedom, a tendency perhaps, to link particular characters of exceptional importance to the heavenly and pretemporal state.

1.3. Wisdom. It is a scholarly commonplace that ancient Jewish tradition about personified divine wisdom* may have been a conceptual source the early Christians drew upon in attributing pre-existence to Christ in the NT, especially where Christ is associated with creation of the world (e.g., Col 1:15-16; Heb 1:2; Jn 1:1-3, 10). In Proverbs 8:22-31 wisdom is pictured as created before all else and as God's companion in the creation of the world and humankind. The same idea is reflected also in Sirach 24:9, and in Wisdom of Solomon we are told that wisdom is "the fashioner of all things" (Wis 7:22) and "an associate in all his [God's] works" (Wis 8:4) who was present in the creation of the world (Wis 9:9). The identification of divine wisdom and the Torah (Law*) reflected in Sirach 24:23 permitted rabbis later to emphasize Torah as pre-existent and the plan/agency of creation.

2. Christ's Pre-existence.

In recent scholarly study there has been spirited debate over which (if any) Pauline passages attribute pre-existence to Christ and precisely what was intended in those passages where one sees the doctrine. It is undisputed that the doctrine developed in the first century and is found in the NT. The debate about the Pauline evidence (the earliest extant Christian writings) concerns how early the doctrine emerged. To cite the extreme positions: on the one hand, J. D. G. Dunn has argued that no real doctrine of Christ's personal pre-existence and Incarnation is found in the Pauline writings but only in late first-century NT writings (Heb 1:1-4; Jn 1:1-18); on the other hand, S. Kim has credited Paul with being the specific initiator of this doctrine.

2.1. Philippians 2:6-11. The most intense locus of the debate has been Philippians 2:6-11, especially verses 6-7. With a few others, Dunn (114-21) has insisted that these verses allusively contrast Christ with Adam (see Adam and Christ), and that no heavenly pre-existence of Christ is spoken of in the passage. In this view, the "form of God" is synonymous with Adam as being in God's "image" (Gen 1:26-27). Christ's choice not to grasp "equality with God" but to "empty" himself and take the path of slavery (see Servant) and obedience is seen as contrasting with the temptation of Adam to be "like God" (Gen 3:5). And Dunn argues that for the analogy with Adam to work, the text must describe the decision of the earthly Jesus to serve God faithfully.

Once it has been pointed out, the contrast between Christ and Adam that can be inferred here is evocative. But, as L. D. Hurst has observed, even granting an intended comparison/contrast of Christ with Adam, it may be a logical fallacy to assume that this requires that Christ's actions be set, like Adam's, entirely within earthly existence. Indeed, a heavenly figure who forgoes grasping at equality with God and voluntarily descends to a human life of servitude and obedience might have been seen as quite a telling contrast with the human Adam understood as having vainly sought to rise above his status as creature.

But it may be unwise to allow an alleged intentional contrast of Christ and Adam to control overmuch the exegesis of the passage. It must be noted that the Adamic allusions are none too explicit. There is no direct use of phrasing from known Greek OT translations of relevant passages in Genesis. It is perhaps too easily claimed by some that the morphē theou ("the form of God," Phil 2:6) is to be taken as alluding to the "image of God" of Genesis 1:27. The term eikōn is consistently preferred over morphē in the Greek OT in passages where Adam is described as made in God's "image."

Most scholars see Philippians 2:6-7 as reflecting a belief in a heavenly pre-existence of Christ. Given this view, two important further observations present themselves. First, if Philippians 2:6-11 is Paul's adaptation of an early Christian hymn* (as is commonly, though not unanimously, thought), it is valuable evidence that the pre-existence of Christ was celebrated liturgically in his churches and affirmed also by Paul (see Worship). Second, whether Philippians 2:6-11 is original with Paul or an adaptation of a hymn, to take verses 6-7 as a condensed expression of Christ's pre-existence means that by the time of the composition of this letter (c. 55-65) the idea was already sufficiently familiar among Paul's churches as to require no explanation (see Christology).

2.2. Shorter Texts. In one or more shorter Pauline passages, most scholars find additional evidence that Christ's pre-existence and Incarnation was a familiar idea among Paul's churches, and supporting evidence for seeing pre-existence in Philippians 2:6-11. Of these passages 1 Corinthians 8:6 is perhaps the most confidently offered text, where Christ, "through whom are all things and through whom we exist," is taken as the agent of creation, similar to personified wisdom in Jewish sapiential literature. The Greek prepositional phrases used here ("from whom," "through whom") seem to echo cosmological language that originated in pagan circles but had probably become more common linguistic property by Paul's day. A more allusive mention of Christ's pre-existence is often found in 2 Corinthians 8:9, Christ as "rich" and "poor" taken respectively as references to his heavenly and earthly existence. As with Philippians 2:5-11, this passage portrays Christ's self-abasement as a moral basis/example for Christian behavior (see Imitation).

But some texts are not as plausible or as widely supported as references to Christ's pre-existence, such as 1 Corinthians 10:4, more likely a christological interpretation of Israel's "rock" in Deuteronomy 32:4, 15, 18, 30-31, used here to "Christianize" the wilderness events for ethical exhortation (cf. Heb 11:26). And Romans 15:3, 8 may simply allude to the tradition of Christ's earthly ministry as a servant (see Old Testament in Paul).

2.3. Colossians 1:15-20. Of the key christological passages in the Pauline corpus, Colossians 1:15-20 is among the most honorific, and is easily the most explicit and emphatic in linking Christ with the creation of all things. And, like Philippians 2:6-11, this passage is taken by most as an adaptation of an early Christian hymn. Some, such as J. Habermann, who view Colossians as written in Paul's name by someone after Paul's death, take Colossians 1:15-20 as an adaptation of a Christian hymn circulating in the 60s or later. But if Colossians is a genuine letter of Paul (as many scholars hold; see Colossians), the passage reflects an even earlier stage of christological belief and devotion in Pauline Christianity.

Christ is here described as the "image [eikōn] of the invisible God," and "first born* [prōtotokos] of all creation" (Col 1:15). The term eikōn reminds one of the status of Adam in Genesis 1, but it is also applied to personified wisdom in Wisdom of Solomon 7:26, and wisdom tradition may be more relevant here. "First born of all creation" resembles the pre-Christian Jewish references to personified wisdom* as the beginning point of creation* (e.g., Prov 8:22-25; Sir 24:9). And in Colossians 1:16 the claim that everything (pointedly specified by types of creatures) was created "in [or by] him [Christ]" (en autō) and "through him" (di' autou) seems most readily to be taken as expressing the idea that Christ was somehow the agent of creation, similar to some descriptions of personified Wisdom (e.g., Wis 7:22; 8:4; cf. Ps 104:24). The final claim of Colossians 1:16, however, that all things were created "for him" (eis auton) goes beyond wisdom tradition and resembles what is said of God in 1 Corinthians 8:6. This phrase may also echo elements of Jewish tradition where Israel or the elect are referred to as the ones for whom God created the world (e.g., 4 Ezra 6:55; T. Moses 1:12-13).

Dunn (187-96), who takes Colossians as from Paul, has suggested that Colossians 1:15-20 was not intended to attribute to Christ real pre-existence and an active role in creation. Instead, he reads the passage as indicating "the continuity between God's creative power and Christ" who is portrayed here as "the one predetermined by God to be the fullest expression of his wise ordering of the world" (Dunn, 190). Doubtless, Dunn has identified some implications of Colossians 1:15-20, but it is less certain that his suggestions adequately convey the full force of the passage. The emphatic language seems more naturally to reflect convictions about Christ's priority in time as well as in significance. Indeed, the ancient Jewish tradition seems to give ample evidence that the two forms of priority were quite often linked. Granting that Paul and other Christians of the earliest decades were heavily influenced by such tradition, it seems quite likely that, in principle, they would have found pre-existence to be a proper attribute of a figure they regarded as the uniquely appointed agent of God's eschatological triumph.* What is remarkable is that early Christians attributed such a significance to a man who was not a great figure of the past but a near contemporary and one who had suffered a shameful death (see Cross, Theology of the) and been rejected by the religious leadership of his people.

3. Conclusions.

Pre-existence appears in Paul's letters as an attribute of Christ. As his undisputed letters are dated c. A.D. 50-60, the view that Christ is the historical manifestation of a pre-existent (indeed, precosmic) divine reality must, therefore, have begun remarkably early. Moreover, the casual way in which the topic is mentioned suggests that this was an uncontested and familiar view of Christ in Paul's churches. The ancient Jewish tradition provided the basic language and concepts that entities of ultimate and/or eschatological significance could have pre-existence in the divine realm, and that the divine purpose or intention for creation could be personified and understood as having preceded, and participated in, the creation of the world.

But pre-existence was not attributed to Christ simply through a process of intellectual adaptation or speculative thought. Fundamental was the conviction, born of Jesus' career and the subsequent powerful religious life of the earliest Christian groups, that Christ personally and uniquely embodied the divine salvific purpose and bore surpassing significance. And the Pauline writings show that the pre-existence of Christ was meaningful in the practical purposes of ethical exhortation (e.g., Phil 2:5-11; 2 Cor 8:9; see Ethics) and religious identity-formation (Col 1:15-20).

See also ADAM AND CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; FIRSTBORN; IMAGE, IMAGE OF GOD; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Andrews, The Meaning of Christ for Paul (New York/Nashville: Abingdon, 1949); F. B. Craddock, The Pre-existence of Christ in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963); N. A. Dahl, "Christ, Creation and the Church," in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, eds. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: University Press, 1964) 422-43; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making: A New Testament Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); J. Habermann, Präexistenzaussagen im Neuen Testament (Europäische Hochschulschriften, Series XXIII, Vol. 362; Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1990); R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, "The Idea of Pre-Existence in Early Judaism: A Study in the Background of New Testament Theology," (Th.D. diss.; Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1966); idem, Pre-Existence, Wisdom, and the Son of Man: A Study of the Idea of Pre-Existence in the New Testament (SNTSMS 21; Cambridge: University Press, 1973); L. D. Hurst, "Re-enter the Pre-existent Christ in Philippians 2:5-11?" NTS 32 (1986) 449-57; S. Kim, The Origin of Paul's Gospel (WUNT 2/4; 2d ed.; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1984 [1981]); R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians 2:5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983 [1967]); C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: University Press, 1977); J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns (SNTSMS 15; Cambridge: University Press, 1971).

L. W. Hurtado

PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS

The two terms, principalities and powers, are shorthand for a variety of terms Paul employed to refer to powers that were created by God* but in some way are hostile to Christ* and his church.* The precise meaning of these terms in their various contexts has been a matter of twentieth-century scholarly debate. Most would agree, however, that Paul was speaking of a spiritual dimension of the created order (objective and personal powers, some would add) who, being inimical to Christ and his church, were in some way opposed and either neutralized or conquered by Christ. A promising approach is to view them from the perspective of the OT tradition of holy warfare.

1. Interpretation of the Powers
2. Terminology, Context and Background
3. The Nature of the Powers
4. Christ and the Powers

1. Interpretation of the Powers.

The interpretation of the powers has been discussed within a hermeneutical horizon shaped by political and social concerns. Whereas Bultmann's existential approach viewed the powers as mythic projections of human dis-ease within the cosmos, O. Cullmann, speaking from the context of Europe shortly after World War II, represented an interpretation of Romans 13 and 1 Corinthians 2:6-8 which saw the powers as both spiritual and civil authorities and thus gave a theological accounting for the potential good and evil of the state (see also Morrison). But a particularly influential line of interpretation has been that Paul demythologized the powers and employed the language to refer to the structures of earthly existence such as tradition, morality, justice and order (Berkhof). This approach has been adapted by others who have argued that Paul was referring to both the sociopolitical structures of society and spiritual forces behind and within those structures (Yoder, Mouw).

The most comprehensive study of the subject has been undertaken by W. Wink, who surveys the whole range of Paul's usage of the language of power (not just where it ostensively refers to nonhuman entities or dimensions of reality). He concludes that Paul employed the imprecise and interchangeable language of power to refer simultaneously to the "inner and outer aspects of any given manifestation of power" (Wink, 5). While Paul himself believed in the ontological reality of an invisible spirit world, Wink finds Paul's perspective far more subtle than has previously been appreciated. Paul had already taken steps toward the demythologization of that worldview by expanding the list of enemies of Christ and his people to include Law, sin, flesh and death. The "powers are both heavenly and earthly, divine and human, spiritual and political, invisible and structural" (Wink, 100). As such they are capable of being "depotentiated" and "neutralized"—even redeemed—in God's plan for cosmic restitution (Wink, 50-53; see critique in Arnold 1989, 48-51, 129-34; 1992, 198-201).

The notion that Paul's usage of the language of principalities and powers was always in reference to good angels* in the service of God, not hostile powers, has been argued at some length by W. Carr. But his interpretation of texts such as Colossians 2:14-15 and the exegetical expedient of concluding that Ephesians 6:12 was not part of the original text, have led most interpreters to dismiss his proposal (see Wink, O'Brien, 125-28). Attention has also been devoted to the relationship between Paul's reference to the powers and the demonology implicit in the magical texts of the period (see Arnold).

2. Terminology, Context and Background.

The range of terminology Paul employed in speaking of powers was varied and in some cases is ambiguous to modern interpreters.

*2.1. Designations of Power and Authority. A large portion of the terms Paul employs hold certain features in common: (1) They are not proper names (e.g., Belial, Beelzebul), nor do they reflect particular abilities (e.g., Deception, Strife, Error in T. Sol. 8:3), but appear to be titles or nominal classifications, the most prominent of which are based on abstract qualities of power and authority. (2) The terms employed are potentially ambiguous to modern interpreters because for the most part they depend upon their contexts to define whether they refer to human or non-human leaders and potentates—or, less plausibly, both. (3) They most frequently occur in the plural or their plurality is implied (e.g., pasan archēn, 1 Cor 15:24; Eph 1:21; Col 2:10), and thus they seem to refer to classes of beings. (4) In most cases they appear in a series of like names. (5) The names themselves suggest some possibility that they refer to echelons of power within the spiritual world, but if that is the case, the evidence is insufficient to determine their ranking. (6) These powers, unlike those called "demons,"* are not said to inhabit humans or idols,* nor reside "under the earth"; when their domain is indicated or implied, it is "heaven and earth," "this age" and in the "heavenlies." This implies that their power is cosmic in extent.

*2.2. Contexts. Within the Pauline corpus only four letters use these terms in contexts implying that they are nonhuman powers (excluding for the moment the more problematic stoicheia tou kosmou, "elements of the world,"* which appear twice in both Galatians and Colossians): Romans, 1 Corinthians, Colossians and Ephesians. Of these, only Romans and 1 Corinthians are of undisputed Pauline authorship, and by far the greatest concentration is found in Colossians (eight instances) and Ephesians (eleven instances). It is argued that the expanded emphasis on the "powers" in these letters may reflect specific cultural and religious situations being addressed, either in Paul's day (e.g., magic* at Ephesus; see Arnold 1989) or the post-Pauline era.

2.3. Specific Terms. The meaning of these terms relies primarily on Paul's own usage. But the broader context of their usage in other extant literature—particularly Jewish literature—predating or roughly contemporary with Paul, offers light on the meanings Paul may have employed in his own usage. But the evidence must be considered with care. Claims for these terms referring to cosmic powers have frequently been based on evidence that postdates Paul by a century or more.

2.3.1. Archai ("principalities" or "rulers": Rom 8:38; 1 Cor 15:24; Eph 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Col 1:16; 2:10, 15). Arch- was the most frequently used prefix for Greek words denoting positions of human power (Wink, 13). In Daniel 7:27, where the rulers of earthly kingdoms serve the Most High, Theodotion's Greek text speaks of them as archai (LXX exousiai). The possibility that the Ethiopic equivalent of archai is found in 1 Enoch 61:10, where it refers to spiritual powers in the service of God, is more problematic, but likely (see Wink, 153 n. 2).

2.3.2. Archontes ("rulers," 1 Cor 2:6, 8). This term commonly referred to human rulers, a sense Paul himself used when he spoke of rulers as civil authorities (archontes) in Romans 13:3 (where they bear the sword and collect taxes). Interpreters are divided over whether 1 Corinthians 2:6, 8 refers to human or to spiritual powers, with some suggesting a dual reference. In light of this, the argument for a reference to cosmic powers calls for support.

The possibility of archontes referring to spiritual powers is illustrated by the Greek texts of Daniel. Where the Masoretic text uses the Hebrew śar, both the LXX and Theodotion (late second century but probably relying on a much earlier Greek text) speak of Michael, the archangel of Israel, as heis tōn archontōn tōn prōtōn ("one of the prominent rulers") in Daniel 10:13. Theodotion also uses archōn (singular) of Michael in Daniel 10:21 and 12:1, where the LXX has angelos. Moreover, in Daniel 10:20-21, where the LXX speaks of the spiritual ruler (śar) of Persia and of Greece as stratēgos, Theodotion consistently uses archōn. The Hebrew term śarîm, meaning "chiefs," "princes," "captains" or "rulers," as malevolent spiritual powers of this age, may very well stand behind Paul's usage of archontes in 1 Corinthians 2:6, 8 (cf. śar in the positive sense as angelic "Ruler/Prince of Light" who has been appointed for Israel's defence against the Satan* or the Angel of Darkness in 1QM 13:10; 1QS 3:20). In 1 Corinthians 2, where Paul speaks of the archontes tou aiōnos toutou ("rulers of this age"; cf. 1 Cor 4:4) who are coming to naught (tōn katargoumenōn, 1 Cor 2:6), and who did not comprehend God's secret wisdom* and so crucified* the Lord* of glory (1 Cor 2:7-8), there is a compelling context for understanding archontes to refer to spiritual powers (but see Fee, 103-5). One need not appeal to a gnostic* or protognostic cosmology to account for this usage. If Paul bore in mind the Danielic cosmology of spiritual powers lying behind the nations, he would quite easily have used archontes as a general term for the hostile spiritual powers who, as the chief tradents of the wisdom of this age, were oblivious to the wisdom of God's plan for the ages (cf. Eph 3:10) and so crucified the Lord of glory. The presence of the motif of Satanic opposition to Jesus as it is recorded in the Gospel tradition—an opposition culminating in their leading Jesus to the cross (e.g., Lk 22:3, 53)—probably represents a widespread early Christian understanding of the spiritual conflict that stood behind the human opposition that led Jesus to the cross (cf. the use of archōn in reference to Beelzebul in Mk 3:22 par.).

2.3.3. Exousiai ("powers" or "authorities": 1 Cor 15:24; Eph 1:21; 2:2; 3:10; 6:12; Col 1:16; 2:10, 15). This term is most frequently used in the NT for the right or authorization to use power bestowed by an office, as is clearly illustrated in Paul's usage of the word in Romans 13:1-3 (Wink, 15, 45-47; cf. Morrison). In LXX Daniel 7:27 the earthly rulers who are subject to and obey the most high are called exousiai (contrast Theodotion's archai in 2.3.1. above). An example of usage of the word roughly contemporary with the NT, and with a reference to spiritual beings, is found in Testament of Levi 3:8. Here the exousiai occupy the highest heaven and are privileged, along with the thronoi ("thrones"), to be in the very presence of God (cf. also 1 Enoch 61:10; 2 Enoch 20:1). In this case, of course, they are servants of God and not of evil.

2.3.4. Dynameis ("powers": Rom 8:38; Eph 1:21). In LXX Daniel 8:10 the "powers of heaven" (dynameis tou ouranou) and "the stars" are cast down to the earth and trampled by the "little horn" (cf. Is 34:4; Mk 13:25). Philo frequently used dynameis to refer to angelic powers (e.g., Philo Migr. Abr. 181), and in Jubilees 1:29 it is used of "powers of the heaven" (cf. "of the heavens" in 1 Enoch 61:10 and as part of the heavenly army of the seventh heaven in 2 Enoch 20:1). In the LXX kyrios tōn dynameōn ("Lord of powers"), rather than kyrios tōn stratiōn ("Lord of armies"), is used to translate Yahweh Sabaoth, "Lord of Hosts" (where "hosts" refers to Yahweh's heavenly army). This may reflect the frequent use of dynameis in Jewish texts to refer to military forces (cf., e.g., Ps 102:21; see Wink, 159-61). This militaristic association suggests that the same connotation might be present in the use of dynameis in Romans 8:38 and Ephesians 1:21, where the powers are opposed to God.

2.3.5. Kyriotētes ("dominions," "lordships": Col 1:16; Eph 1:21 [singular kyriotēs]). It is not clear whether kyriotētes lies behind the Slavonic term for the "dominions" that are part of the heavenly army of the seventh heaven in 2 Enoch 20:1 (cf. 1 Enoch 61:10; Wink, 20). It may be plausibly argued that the Hebrew term memšeleṭ, used of the dominion of Belial in 1QS 1:18; 2:19; 1QM 14:9; 18:1; 4Q 286-87, is the equivalent of kyriotēs (Wink, 20; though note the possible parallel to Qumran usage in tēs exousias tou skotous of Col 1:13). In speaking of idolatry, Paul can refer to "many gods and many lords [kyrioi]" (1 Cor 8:5), which, by implication, he associates with "demons" (1 Cor 10:20). One possible connotation is that the kyriotētes represent spheres of spiritual influence formerly understood to be ruled by the gods of the nations.

