Dictionary of the Later New Testament & Its Developments

Editors:
Ralph P. Martin
Peter H. Davids

InterVarsity Press
DOWNERS GROVE, ILLINOIS 60515
LEICESTER, ENGLAND

InterVarsity Press
P.O. Box 1400
Downers Grove, IL 60515 USA
World Wide Web: www.ivpress.com
E-mail: mail@ivpress.com

Inter-Varsity Press
38 De Montfort Street,
Leicester LE1 7GP, England

©1997 by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without written permission from InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press® is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, a student movement active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895.

Inter-Varsity Press, England, is the book-publishing division of the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship (formerly the Inter-Varsity Fellowship), a student movement linking Christian Unions in universities and colleges throughout the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and national activities write to UCCF, 38 De Montfort Street, Leicester LE1 7GP.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are the authors' own translations. Those identified NIV are taken from the Holy Bible, New International Version®. NIV® Copyright ©1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan Publishing House and published in Great Britain by Hodder and Stoughton Ltd. All rights reserved. Those identified RSV are from the Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1946, 1952, 1971 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and used by permission. Those identified NRSV are from the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1989 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and used by permission.

Cover photograph: Scala/Art Resource, NY. Rublev, Andrei. Saint Peter. Russian state Museum, St. Petersburg, Russia.

USA: ISBN 0-8308-1779-4

UK: ISBN 0-85111-751-1

Printed in the United States of America ♾

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dictionary of the later New Testament and its developments/editors:
Ralph P. Martin, Peter H. Davids.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 0-8308-1779-4 (alk. paper)
1. Bible N.T. Acts—Encyclopedias. 2. Bible. N.T. Hebrews—Encyclopedias. 3. Bible. N.T. Catholic Epistles—Encyclopedias. 4. Bible. N.T. Revelation—Encyclopedias. 5. Church history—Primitive and early church, ca. 30-600—Encyclopedias. I. Martin, Ralph P. II. Davids, Peter H.
BS2625.5.D53 1997
225.3—dc21 97-36095
CIP

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue entry for this book is available from the British Library.

17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
10 09 08 07 06 05 04 03 02 01 00 99 98 97

InterVarsity Press

Executive Director
Robert Fryling

Editorial Staff

Editorial Director
Andrew T. Le Peau

Managing Editor
James Hoover

Reference Book Editor
Daniel G. Reid

Editorial Assistants
Gloria Duncan-Bevilacqua
Melinda Syens

Proofreaders
Drew Blankman
David Zimmerman

Production Staff

Production Manager
Nancy Fox

Production Coordinator
Don Frye

Design
Kathy Lay Burrows

Design Assistant
Andrew Craft

Typesetters
Gail Munroe
Audrey Smith
Marjorie Sire

Programming Consultant
Andy Shermer

Contents

Preface ix

How to Use This Dictionary xi

Abbreviations xiii

Transliterations xxvi

List of Contributors xxvii

Dictionary Articles 1

Scripture Index 1243

Subject Index 1266

Articles Index 1288

Preface

In the previous two companion volumes, dedicated to the parts of the New Testament called "Gospels" and "Pauline Epistles," an attempt was made to introduce readers to those documents with which the readers would be familiar. Hence the respective prefaces acknowledged the foundational character of what the early church called "the Gospel" and "the Apostle."

A different kind of introduction is called for in this third yet complementary reference work. Here—in the remaining books of the New Testament canon—the reader is more than likely to be on a terra incognita. Features such as the complex arguments of the letter to the Hebrews, the moralizing tendency of James the Just, the fierce denunciations sounded in the epistle of Jude as well as the more accessible First Peter and the Acts of the Apostles will come to mind as representing books which cry out for elucidation. And who has not felt the need for scholarly and sympathetic guidance while patiently, if with puzzlement, reading the final book, called the Revelation? This Dictionary will, we hope, be among the first resources a student, teacher and communicator will turn to when seeking assistance.

It is to offer such help that the contributions to the present full-scale Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments were conceived, assembled, composed—and now are offered to the public. The editors are bold to surmise that this volume, perhaps more than the two earlier dictionaries, will fill a perceived gap in the field of reference books on the New Testament. It is designed to come to the aid of preachers, ministers, Christian laypeople and hard-pressed students of theology no less than the editors' colleagues in the academy when called on to teach these often neglected books of the canon.

Mention of the New Testament canon calls to mind a recent (1983, 1995) pronouncement of the doyen scholar C. K. Barrett. Writing on "The Centre of the New Testament and the Canon" (in his collected essays Jesus and the Word [Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1995] 259-76), he states in support of his position that the norma normans of New Testament theology, the means of testing theological propositions (or better, he would say, the church's proclamation), is a nuanced version of the slogans sola fide, solus Christus, the "claim that in practice no harm but good results [follow] if we look at all the literary products of the apostolic and subapostolic ages" (his emphasis). To respond to this remark would involve a discussion of the ongoing debate regarding the "center of the New Testament" and the limits and definition of canonical authority. It is sufficient here to note that the coverage in this Dictionary will, we trust, put the readers in a position to see the ways the formulation of the Christian message developed from the Synoptic Gospels and Paul to the remaining New Testament books and then up to about the middle of the second century. Commitment to a determinative canon (embracing the twenty-seven books in our New Testament) should make room for (1) a frank admission that books often thought to be peripheral to the alleged "center" are still held to be normative, for as Dr. Barrett remarks, "there cannot be degrees of canonicity"; and (2) an equally frank acknowledgment that Christian thinking did not cease with the last New Testament book, and it developed in those writings usually called the apostolic fathers.

The decision to take the lines of development up to A.D. 150 was a matter of convenience, since a cut-off point was clearly needed if the volume was to be of manageable size. A certain editorial latitude, however, was granted to contributors who felt it needful to include material from the later patristic period. One reason for this inclusion is to allow developments that come to fuller fruition in the late second and subsequent early centuries to cast their light backward on the obscurities of the period A.D. 100-150. To change the metaphor, germination and flowering of a Christian truth often requires a considerable length of time to appear.

The editors and publisher struggled to find a suitable title for this volume that would do justice to its diverse subject matter and yet stand in continuity with the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels and the Dictionary of Paul and His Letters. No prejudicial judgment should be read into the part-title, The Later New Testament. As will be clear, the case for dating Jude or James anterior to the Pauline letters still continues to be made, even if the tendency is to place these letters in a subsequent decade. By general consensus, however, the bulk of the literature covered in this volume was written chronologically after the Pauline chief letters and, in some cases, after the publication of the Synoptics. Again, the adjective "later" is one of convenience, just as the term Developments is in no way intended to blur the line of demarcation the church has accepted (since Athanasius) between canonical and noncanonical, even if the story of the canonization of the New Testament has the ragged edges admitted by Eusebius.

Once more the editors are quick to recognize their debts and pay tribute to all who have made this volume possible. Secretarial help in the production processes and the ready cooperation of our team of contributors, drawn from around the world and across the boundaries of church affiliation, ethnicity and gender, are gratefully acknowledged.

It remains to send out the third member of this ambitious series (which will eventually include a Dictionary of New Testament Background and four volumes on the Old Testament) in the hope that it may, with its partners, serve the interests of readers. It is designed to assist those who seek to understand the remaining books of the New Testament in their historical, literary and religious setting and to observe the flow of church life, thought and history across a diverse spectrum of geography and culture, from Paul and the Synoptic Gospels to Justin in Rome.

Ralph P. Martin
Peter H. Davids

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations
Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly, biblical and ancient literature may found on pages xiii-xxv.

Authorship of Articles
The authors of articles are indicated by their first initials and last name at the end of each article. A full list of contributors may be found on pages xxvii-xxx, in alphabetical order of their last name. The contribution of each author is listed alphabetically.

Bibliographies
A bibliography has been appended to each article. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. Bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's last name, and where an author has more than one work cited, they are listed alphabetically by title. In some types of articles (e.g., articles on specific NT literature and apostolic fathers) the bibliographies are divided into categories. Abbreviations used in the bibliographies appear in the tables of abbreviations.

Cross-references
The Dictionary has been extensively cross-referenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Five types of cross-referencing will be found:

1. One-line entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed:

Abba. See God; Son of God.

2. An asterisk after a single word in the body of an article indicates that an article by that title appears in the Dictionary. For example, "Christ*" directs the reader to an article entitled Christ.

3. A cross-reference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article also directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, (see Church Order) directs the reader to an article entitled Church Order, Government. Such cross-references are used either to prevent the confusion an asterisk might introduce (i.e., Son of God* could refer to either an article on "God" or "Son of God") or to direct the readers attention to an article of related interest.

4. Cross-references have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

See also HYMNS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; WORSHIP, LITURGY.

5. Where appropriate, references are made to articles in the companion volumes, the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels and the Dictionary of Paul and His Letters. These references are found within the body of the text of articles and never in bibliographies. For example, a reference such as (see DJG, Gentiles) refers to the article on "Gentiles" in the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, and a reference such as (see DPL, Righteousness of God §2.4) refers to a specific section within the article on "Righteousness of God" found in the Dictionary of Paul and His Letters. The purpose of these references is both to assist readers in exploring related topics in Jesus and Paul as well as to provide contrasting or alternative points of view.

Indexes

Since most of the Dictionary articles cover broad topics in some depth, the Subject Index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on narrower topics that might, for instance, appear in a standard Bible dictionary. For example, while there is no article entitled "Nazoreans," the subject index might direct the reader to pages where the Nazoreans are discussed in the articles on "Jewish Christianity," "Ebionites" or elsewhere.

A Scripture Index is provided to assist readers in gaining quick access to the Scriptures referred to throughout the Dictionary.

An Articles Index found at the end of the Dictionary allows readers quickly to review the breadth of topics covered and select the ones most apt to serve their interests or needs. For those who wish to identify the articles written by specific contributors, they are listed with the name of the contributors in the list of contributors.

Transliteration

Hebrew and Greek words have been transliterated according to a system set out in the front matter. Greek verbs appear in their lexical form (rather than infinitive) in order to assist those with little or no knowledge of the language in using other reference works.

Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

§ or §§	section or paragraph number(s) (frequently to indicate Loeb Classical Library numbering system for Josephus)
ℵ	Codex Sinaiticus
κτλ	etc. (Greek)
2d ed.	second edition
3d ed.	third edition
A	Codex Alexandrinus
B	Codex Vaticanus
C	Codex Ephraemi Syri
c.	circa, about (with dates); column cent.	century
cf.	compare
chap(s).	chapter(s)
D	Codex Bezae
DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls
e.g.	exempli gratia, for example
ed.	edition; editor(s), edited by
esp.	especially
ET	English translation
EVV	English versions of the Bible
exp.	expanded (edition)
Frag.	Fragment (of document)
Gk	Greek
Heb	Hebrew
i.e.	id est, that is
km.	kilometer
Lat	Latin
LXX	Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)
m	meter
mg.	margin
MS or MSS	manuscript or manuscripts
MT	Masoretic Text (standard Hebrew text of the Old Testament)
n.d.	no date
n.s.	new series
NT	New Testament
o.s.	old series
OT	Old Testament
p. or pp.	page or pages
pace	with due respect to, but differing from
par.	parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)
passim	throughout
pl.	plural
presc.	prescript
Q	Quelle ("sayings" source for Synoptic Gospels)
repr.	reprint
rev.	revised (edition)
sy	Syriac
Symm.	Symmachus's Greek translation of the Old Testament
Tg.	Targum
Theod.	Theodotian's Greek translation of the Old Testament
v. or vv.	verse or verses
v.l.	vario lectio ("variant reading")
vol.	volume
x	times (2x = two times, etc.)

Translations of the Bible

ASV	American Standard Version (1901)
AV	Authorized Version (Use KJV)
JB	Jerusalem Bible
KJV	King James Version (same as AV)
NASB	New American Standard Bible
NEB	New English Bible
NIV	New International Version
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
REB	Revised English Bible
RSV	Revised Standard Version
RV	Revised Version (1881-85)

Books of the Bible

Old Testament

Gen	Ps	Nahum	Gal
Ex	Prov	Hab	Eph
Lev	Eccles	Zeph	Phil
Num	Song	Hag	Col
Deut	Is	Zech	1-2 Thess
Josh	Jer	Mal	1-2 Tim
Judg	Lam		Tit
Ruth	Ezek	New Testament	Philem
1-2 Sam	Dan	Mt	Heb
1-2 Kings	Hos	Mk	Jas
1-2 Chron	Joel	Lk	1-2 Peter
Ezra	Amos	Jn	1-2-3 Jn
Neh	Obad	Acts	Jude
Esther	Jon	Rom	Rev
Job	Mic	1-2 Cor

The Apocrypha and Septuagint

1-2-3-4 Kgdms	1-2-3-4 Kingdoms	1-2-3-4 Macc	1-2-3-4 Maccabees
Add Esth	Additions to Esther	Pr Azar	Prayer of Azariah
Bar	Baruch	Pr Man	Prayer of Manasseh
Bel	Bel and the Dragon	Sir	Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus)
1-2 Esdr	1-2 Esdras	Sus	Susanna
4 Ezra	4 Ezra	Tob	Tobit
Jdt	Judith	Wis	Wisdom of Solomon
Ep Jer	Epistle of Jeremiah

The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha

Adam and Eve	Life of Adam and Eve	Mart. Isa.	Martyrdom of Isaiah
Ahiq.	Ahiqar	Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
Apoc. Abr.	Apocalypse of Abraham	Pseud.-Phoc.	Pseudo-Phocylides
2-3 Apoc. Bar.	Syriac, Greek Apocalypse of Baruch	Sib. Or.	Sibylline Oracles
Apoc. Mos.	Apocalypse of Moses	T. 12 Patr.	Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs
Apoc. Elijah	Apocalypse of Elijah	T. Reub.	Testament of Reuben
Apoc. Zeph.	Apocalypse of Zephaniah	T. Sim.	Testament of Simeon
Apoc. Sed.	Apocalypse of Sedrach	T. Levi	Testament of Levi
As. Mos.	Assumption of Moses (or Testament of Moses)	T. Jud.	Testament of Judah
		T. Iss.	Testament of Issachar
Asc. Isa.	Ascension of Isaiah	T. Zeb.	Testament of Zebulon
Bib. Ant.	Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo	T. Dan.	Testament of Dan
		T. Naph.	Testament of Naphthali
1-2-3 Enoch	Ethiopic, Slavonic, Hebrew Enoch	T. Gad.	Testament of Gad
		T. Asher	Testament of Asher
Ep. Arist.	Epistle of Aristeas	T. Jos.	Testament of Joseph
Jos. and As.	Joseph and Asenath	T. Benj	Testament of Benjamin
Jub.	Jubilees	T. Abr.	Testament of Abraham
Liv. Proph.	Lives of the Prophets (followed by prophet's name)	T. Job	Testament of Job
		T. Mos.	Testament of Moses

Apostolic Fathers

Barn.	Epistle of Barnabas
1 Clem.	1 Clement
2 Clem.	2 Clement
Did.	Didache
Diogn.	Epistle to Diognetus
Herm. Man.	Shepherd of Hermas, Mandate(s)
Herm. Sim.	Shepherd of Hermas, Similitude(s)
Herm. Vis.	Shepherd of Hermas, Vision(s)
Ign. Eph.	Ignatius Letter to the Ephesians
Ign. Magm.	Ignatius Letter to the Magnesians
Ign. Phld.	Ignatius Letter to the Philadelphians
Ign. Pol.	Ignatius Letter to Polycarp
Ign. Rom.	Ignatius Letter to the Romans
Ign. Smyrn.	Ignatius Letter to the Smyrneans
Ign. Trall.	Ignatius Letter to the Trallians
Mart. Pol.	Martyrdom of Polycarp
Pol. Phil.	Polycarp Letter to the Philippians

Other Early Christian Literature

Acts
Acts Apoll.	Acts of Apollonius
Acts Pil.	Acts of Pilate
Acts Paul & Thec.	Acts of Paul and Thecla
Acts Thom.	Acts of Thomas
Ambrose
Abr.	De Abrahamo
Exp. Ev. Luc.	Expositio Evangelii Secundum Lucam
Ps.	In Psalmos
Virg.	De Virginibus
Ap. Jas	Apocryphon of James
Aphrahat (or Aphraates)
Dem.	Demonstrations
Apocalypses
Apoc. Paul	Apocalypse of Paul
Apoc. Peter	Apocalypse of Peter
Aristides
Apol.	Apologia
Athanasius
Ar.	Adversus Arianos
Ep. Fest.	Festal Epistles
Fug.	Apologia pro Fuga Sua
Athenagoras
Leg.	Legatio pro Christianis
Suppl.	Supplicatio pro Christianis
Augustine
Civ. D.	De Civitate Dei
Conf.	Confessiones
De Cons.	De Consensu Evangelistarum
Doctr. Christ.	De Doctrina Christiana
Ep.	Epistulae
Haer.	De Haeresibus
Hom.	Homilia
Quaest. Evan.	Quaestiones Evangeliorum
BG	Berlin Gnostic Codex
CG	Nag Hammadi Gnostic Codices
Chrysostom
Hom. Gen.	Homilies on Genesis
Hom. Mt.	Homilies on Matthew
Regno	De Regno
Clement of Alexandria
Ecl. Proph.	Eclogae Propheticae
Excerpta	Excerpta ex Theodoto
Frag. Adum.	Fragmente in Adumbrationes
Frag. Ep. Jude	Fragmente in Epistle of Jude
Paed.	Paedagogus
Protr.	Protreptikos
Quis Div.	Quis Dives Salvetur
Strom.	Stromateis
Theod.	Letter to Theodore
Cyprian
Dom. Or.	De Dominica Oratione
Ep.	Epistulae
Laps.	De Lapsis
Cyril of Jerusalem
Myst. Cat.	Mystagogical Catecheses
Ep. Apos.	Epistola Apostolorum
Epiphanius
Haer.	Haereses
Weights	Weights and Measures
Eusebius
Eccl. Theol.	De Ecclesiastica Theologia
Hist. Eccl.	Historia Ecclesiastica
Dem. Ev.	Demonstratio Evangelica
In Ps	Commentary on the Psalms
Praep. Ev.	Praeparatio Evangelica
Gospels
Gos. Bar.	Gospel of Bartholomew
Gos. Eb.	Gospel of the Ebionites
Gos. Eg.	Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Heb.	Gospel of the Hebrews
Gos. Mary	Gospel of Mary
Gos. Naass.	Gospel of the Naassenes
Gos. Phil.	Gospel of Philip
Gos. Pet.	Gospel of Peter
Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
Hilary of Poitiers
Trin.	De trinitate
Hippolytus
Apos. Trad.	Apostolic Tradition
Dem. Chr.	Demonstratio de Christo et Antichristo
Haer.	De Haeresibus

Refut.	Refutation of All Heresies, or Philosophumena
Irenaeus
Haer.	Adversus Haereses
Jerome
Comm. Gal.	Commentary on Galatians
Comm. Matt.	Commentary on Matthew
Comm. Mic.	Commentary on Micah
Ep.	Epistulae
Vir.	De Viris Illustribus
Prol. in Matt.	Prologue to Matthew
Praef. in Quat. Ev.	Preface to the Four Gospels
Justin Martyr
Apol. I, II	Apology I, II
Cohor. Graec.	Cohortatio ad Graecos
Dial. Tryph.	Dialogue with Trypho the Jew
Or. Gr.	Oratio ad Graecos
Resurrec.	On the Resurrection
Lactantius
Div. Inst.	Divinae Institutiones
Mart. Justin	The Martyrdom of Justin and Companions
Mur. Frag.	Muratorian Fragment
Odes Sol.	Odes of Solomon
Origen
Comm. Joh.	Commentary on John
Comm. Mt.	Commentary on Matthew
Cont. Cels.	Contra Celsum
De Princ.	De Principiis
Exhort. Mart.	Exhortatio ad Martyrium
Hom. Ez.	Homilies on Ezekiel
Hom. Jos	Homilies on Joshua
Hom. Luc.	Homilies on Luke
Pass. Perp. Fel.	Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas
Peri Arch.	Peri Archon
Selec. Ps.	Selecta in Psalmos
Pap. Frag.	Fragments of Papias
PBerol	Papyrus Berolinensis
PG	Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne
Protev. Jas.	Protevangelium of James
Pseudo-Clementines
Hom.	Homilies
Recogn.	Recognitions
Rufinus
Hist. Eccl.	Historia Ecclesiastica
Tatian
Or. Graec.	Oratio ad Graecos
Tertullian
Adv. Jud.	Adversus Judaeos
Ad Nat.	Ad Nationes
Ad Ux.	Ad Uxorem
Apol.	Apologeticus
De Anim.	De Anima
De Carn.	De Carne Christi
De Praescr.	De Praescriptione Haereticorum
De Bapt.	De Baptismo
De Cor.	De Corona
De Cult. Fem.	De Cultu Feminarum
De Idol.	De Idololatria
De. Jejun.	De Jejunio Adversus Psychicos
De Orat.	De Oratione
De Pud.	De Pudicitia
De Resur.	De Resurrectione Carnis
De Spect.	De Spectaculis
Marc.	Adversus Marcionem
Pud.	De Pudicitia
Prax.	Adversus Praxeas
Scorp.	Scorpiace
Theophilus of Antioch
Autol.	Ad Autolycum

Classical and Hellenistic Writers and Sources

Aelian
De Nat. Anim.	De Natura Animalum
Aeschylus
Pers.	Persae
Sept. c. Theb.	Septem contra Thebas
Suppl.	Supplices
Ammonius
Adfin. Vocab. Diff.	De Adfinium Vocabulorum Differentia
Anacharsis
Ep.	Epistle to Tereus
Antipater
Anth. Pal.	Anthologia Palatina
Appian
Mith. W.	Mithridatic Wars
Civ. W.	Civil Wars
Apuleius
Met.	Metamorphoses
Aratus
Phaen.	Phaenomena
Aristophanes
Thes.	Thesmophorizousai
Acharn.	Acharnenses
Aristotle
Cael.	De Caelo
Eth. Nic.	Ethica Nicomachea
Pol.	Politica
Prob.	Problemata
Artemidorus
Oneir.	Oneirocriticon
Aulus Gellius
Noc. Att.	Noctes Atticae
Callimachus
Epigr.	Epigrammata
Chariton
Chaer.	Chaereas and Callirhoe

Cicero
De Div.	De Divinatione
De Leg.	De Legibus
De Offic.	De Officiis
De Orat.	De Oratore
De Repub.	De Republica
Phil.	Orationes Philippicae
Rab. Perd.	Rabirio Perduellionis
Tusc.	Tusculanae Disputationes
Code Just.	Code of Justinian
Corp. Herm.	Corpus Hermeticum
Demosthenes
Ag. Conon	Against Conon
Lacrit.	Against Lacritus
Dig. Just.	Digest of Justinian
Dio Cassius
Epit.	Roman History
Hist.	Roman History
Dio Chrysostom
De Homero	De Homero et Socrate
Disc.	Discourses
Or.	Orationes
Diodorus Siculus
Bib. Hist.	Bibliotheca Historica
Diogenes Laertius
Vit.	Vitae
Clit.	Clitomachus
Dion. Hal.	Dionysius of Halicarnassus
Epictetus
Disc.	Discourses
Diss.	Dissertationes
Ench.	Enchiridion
Euripides
Hipp.	Hippolytus
Galen
De Placitis	De Placitis Hippocratis et Platonis
Grk. Anth.	Greek Anthology
Hesiod
Op.	Opera et Dies
Theog.	Theogonia
Homer
Il.	Iliad
Odys.	Odyssey
Horace
Sat.	Satires
Iamblichus
De Myst.	De Mysteriis
Inscr. Cos	The Inscriptions of Cos, ed. W. R. Paton and E. L. Hicks (1891)
Isocrates
Dem.	Demonicus
Panath.	Panathenaicus
Paneg.	Panegyricus
Josephus
Ant.	Antiquities of the Jews
J.W.	Jewish Wars
Life	Life of Flavius Josephus
Ag. Ap.	Against Apion
Justinian
Digest	Digest of Roman Law
Juvenal
Sat.	Satirae
Livy
Epit.	Epitomae
Hist.	History of Rome
Lucian of Samosata
Alex.	Alexander the False Prophet
Herm.	Hermotimus
Peregr.	De Morte Peregrini
Philops.	Philopseudes
Tox.	Toxaris
Marcus Aurelius
Med.	Meditations
Martial
Epigr.	Epigrams
Muson. Ruf.	Musonius Rufus
Nicolaus of Damascus
Vit. Caes.	Vita Caesaris
Orosius
Pag.	Adversus Paganos
Orph. Frag.	Orphic Fragments
Ovid
Met.	Metamorphoses
P Cair. Zen.	Zenon Papyri, ed. C. C. Edgar, Zenon Payri, vols. 1-4 (Le Caire, 1925-31; Catalogue générale des antiquités égyptiennes du Musée du Caire).
Pausanius
Descr.	Description of Greece
Petronius
Sat.	Satyricon
PGM	Papyri-Graecae Magicae
Philo
Abr.	De Abrahamo
Aet. Mund.	De Aeternitate Mundi
Agric.	De Agricultura
Cher.	De Cherubim
Conf. Ling.	De Confusione Linguarum
Congr.	De Congressu Eruditionis Gratia
Decal.	De Decalogo
Det. Pot. Ins.	Quod Deterius Potiori Insidiari Soleat
Deus Imm.	Quod Deus Sit Immutabilis
Ebr.	De Ebrietate
Flacc.	In Flaccum
Fug.	De Fuga et Inventione
Gig.	De Gigantibus
Jos.	De Josepho
Leg. All.	Legum Allegoriae
Leg. Gai.	Legatio ad Gaium
Migr. Abr.	De Migratione Abrahami
Mut. Nom.	De Mutatione Nominum

Omn. Prob. Lib.	Quod Omnis Probus Liber Sit
Op. Mund.	De Opificio Mundi
Plant.	De Plantatione
Poster. C.	De Posteritate Caini
Praem. Poen.	De Praemiis et Poenis
Prov.	De Providentia
Quaest. in Ex.	Quaestiones in Exodum
Quaest. in Gen.	Quaestiones in Genesin
Rer. Div. Her.	Quis Rerum Divinarum Heres Sit.
Sacr.	De Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini
Som.	De Somnis
Spec. Leg.	De Specialibus Legibus
Virt.	De Virtibus
Vit. Cont.	De Vita Contemplativa
Vit. Mos.	De Vita Mosis
Philostratus
Vit. Ap.	Vita Apollonii
Pindar
Isth.	Isthmia
Plato
Alc.	Alcibiades
Apol.	Apologia
Crat.	Cratylus
Gorg.	Gorgias
Leg.	Leges
Phaedr.	Phaedrus
Protag.	Protagoras
Rep.	Res Publica
Soph.	Sophista
Symp.	Symposion
Tim.	Timaeus
Pliny (the elder)
Nat. Hist.	Naturalis Historia
Panegyr.	Panegyricus
Pliny (the younger)
Ep.	Epistles
Plutarch
Mor.	Moralia
Adulat.	De Adulatore et Amico
Colot.	Adversus Colotem
Con. Praec.	Coniugalia Praecepta
Conv.	Quaestiones Convivales
Def. Orac.	De Defectu Oraculorum
Fac. Lun.	De Facie in Orbe Lunae
Fort. Rom.	De Fortuna Romanorum
Gen. Socr.	De Genio Socratis
Iside	De Iside et Osiride
Lib. Educ.	De Liberis Educandis
Mul. Virt.	Mulierum Virtutes
Non Posse Suav.	Non Posse Suaviter Vivi Secundum Epicurum
Praec. Ger. Reipub.	Praecepta Gerendae Reipublicae
Rom.	Quaestiones Romanae
Ser. Num. Vind.	De Sera Numinis Vindicta
Vit.	Vitae
Alex.	De Alexandro
Anton.	De Antonio
Caesar	De Caesar
Numa	De Numa
Pomp.	De Pompeio
Polybius
Hist.	Histories
Proclus
In Tim.	In Platonis Timaeum Commentarius
Quintilian
Inst. Orat.	Institutio Oratoria
Seneca
Ben.	De Beneficius
Brev. Vit.	De Brevitate Vitae
De Clem.	De Clementia
Ep. Lucil.	Epistles to Lucilius
Ep. Mor.	Epistulae Morales
Sophocles
Elec.	Electra
Oed. Tyr.	Oedipus Tyrannus
Stobaeus
Ecl.	Ecloge
Strabo
Geog.	Geography
Suetonius
Claudius	from The Twelve Caesars
Domitian	from The Twelve Caesars
Galba	from The Twelve Caesars
Julius	from The Twelve Caesars
Nero	from The Twelve Caesars
Tiberius	from The Twelve Caesars
Titus	from The Twelve Caesars
Vespasian	from The Twelve Caesars
Tacitus
Ann.	Annales ab Excessu Divi Augusti
Hist.	Historiae
Theon
Progymn.	Progymnasmata
Thucydides
Hist.	History of the Peloponnesian War
Valerius Maximus
Fact. ac Dict.	Factorum ac Dictorum Memorabilium Libri
Vegetius Renatus
Epit. Rei Milit.	Epitoma Rei Militaris
Vergil
Georg.	Georgics
Xenophon
Hist. Gr.	Historia Graeca
Mem.	Memorabilia Socratis

Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Texts

CD	Cairo (Genizah text of the) Damascus (Document/Rule)
P	Pesher (commentary)
Q	Qumran
1Q, 3Q, 4Q etc.	Numbered caves of Qumran, yielding written material; followed by abbreviation or number of document
1QapGen	Genesis Apocryphon from Qumran Cave 1 (1Q20)
1QH	Hôdāyôṭ or Thanksgiving Hymns from Qumran Cave 1
1QIsa[a,b]	First or second copy of Isaiah from Qumran Cave 1
1QM	Milḥāmāh or War Scroll from Qumran Cave 1
1QMyst	Mysteries (1Q27)
1QpHab	Pesher on Habakkuk from Qumran Cave 1
1QPsa[a]	Fragmentary copy of Psalms (1Q10)
1QS	Serek hayyaḥad or Rule of the Community, Manual of Discipline from Qumran Cave 1
1QSa	Appendix A, Messianic Rule, to 1QS from Qumran Cave 1 (1Q28a)
1QSb	Appendix B, Rule of the Blessings, to 1QS from Qumran Cave 1 (1Q28b)
3Q15	Copper Scroll from Qumran Cave 3
4Q139	Ordinances or commentaries on biblical laws from Qumran Cave 4
4Q169	Pesher on Nahum from Qumran Cave 4
4Q171	Pesher on Psalms from Qumran Cave 4
4Q176	Tanhumim or Consolations from Qumran Cave 4
4Q186	(see 4QMess ar)
4Q246	(see 4QPsDanA[a])
4Q400-407	(see 4QShirShabb)
4Q504	Words of the Luminaries from Qumran Cave 4
4Q513-14	Ordinances or commentaries on biblical laws from Qumran Cave 4
4QDibHam[a]	Words of the Luminaries[a] (4Q504)
4QEnGiants	1 Enoch fragments from Book of Giants from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q203)
4QEn[a-g]	1 Enoch fragments from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q201-212)
4QEnastr[a-g]	1 Enoch fragments from Astronomical Book from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q208-211)
4QFlor	Florilegium or Eschatological Midrashim from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q174)
4QMess ar	Aramaic "Messianic" text from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q534)
4QMMT	Miqsat Maiaseh Torah from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q394-399)
4QpNah	Nahum Pesher from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q169)
4QPhyl	Phylacteries from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q128-148)
4QPrNab	Prayer of Nabonidus from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q242)
4QPsDanA[a]	Pseudo-Danielic Writings from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q246)
4QPssJosh	Psalms of Joshua from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q379)
4QShirShabb	Songs of Sabbath Sacrifice or Angelic Liturgy from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q400-407)
4QTestim	Testimonia text from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q175)
4QtgJob	Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q157)
4QtgLev	Targum of Leviticus from Qumran Cave 4 (4Q156)
5Q15	New Jerusalem from Qumran Cave 5 (5Q15)
11QH	Hymns (11Q15-16)
11QMelch	Melchizedek from Qumran Cave 11 (11Q13)
11QpaleoLev	Copy of Leviticus in paleo-Hebrew script from Qumran Cave 11 (11Q1)
11QPs[a]	Psalms Scroll from Qumran Cave 11 (11Q5)
11QTemple	Temple Scroll from Qumran Cave 11 (11Q19)
11QtgJob	Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 11 (11Q10)

Targumic Material

Frg. Tg.	Fragmentary Targum
Sam. Tg.	Samaritan Targum
Tg. Cant.	Targum of Canticles (Song of Solomon)
Tg. Esth I, II	First or Second Targum of Esther
Tg. Isa.	Targum of Isaiah
Tg. Ket.	Targum of the Writings
Tg. Neb.	Targum of the Prophets
Tg. Neof.	Targum Neofiti I
Tg. Onq.	Targum Onqelos
Tg. Ps.-J.	Targum Pseudo-Jonathan
Tg. Yer. I	Targum Yerušalmi I
Tg. Yer. II	Targum Yerušalmi II
Yem. Tg.	Yemenite Targum

Orders and Tractates in the Mishnah, Tosefta and Talmud

Same-named tractates in the Mishnah, Tosefta, Babylonian Talmud and Jerusalem Talmud are distinguished by m., t., b. and y. respectively.

'Abot	'Abot	Nazir	Nazir
'Arak.	'Arakin	Ned.	Nedarim
'Abod. Zar.	'Aboda Zara	Neg.	Nega'im
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	Nez.	Neziqin
Bek.	Bekorot	Nid.	Niddah
Ber.	Berakot	Ohol.	Oholot
Beṣa	Beṣa (= Yom Ṭob)	'Or.	'Orla
Bik.	Bikkurim	Para	Para
B. Meṣ.	Baba Meṣi'a	Pe'a	Pe'a
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma	Pesaḥ.	Pesaḥim
Dem.	Demai	Qinnim	Qinnim
'Erub.	'Erubin	Qidd.	Qiddušin
'Ed.	'Eduyyot	Qod.	Qodašin
Giṭ.	Giṭṭin	Roš Haš.	Roš Haššana
Ḥag.	Ḥagiga	Sanh.	Sanhedrin
Ḥal.	Ḥalla	Šabb.	Sabbat
Hor.	Horayot	Šeb.	Sebi'it
Ḥul.	Ḥullin	Šebu.	Sebu'ot
Kelim	Kelim	Šeqal.	Šeqalim
Ker.	Keritot	Soṭa	Soṭa
Ketub.	Ketubot	Sukk.	Sukka
Kil.	Kil'ayim	Ta'an.	Ta'anit
Ma'aś.	Ma'aśerot	Tamid	Tamid
Mak.	Makkot	Tem.	Temura
Makš.	Makširin (=Mašqin)	Ter.	Terumot
Meg.	Megilla	Ṭohar.	Ṭoharot
Me'il.	Me'ila	Ṭ. Yom	Ṭebul Yom
Menaḥ.	Menaḥot	'Uq.	'Uqṣin
Mid.	Middot	Yad.	Yadayim
Miqw.	Miqwa'ot	Yebam.	Yebamot
Mo'ed	Mo'ed	Yoma	Yoma (= Kippurim)
Mo'ed Qaṭ.	Mo'ed Qaṭan	Zabim	Zabim
Ma'aś. Šeni	Ma'aśer Šeni	Zebaḥ.	Zebaḥim
Našim	Našim	Zer.	Zera'im

Other Rabbinic Works

'Abot R. Nat.	'Abot de Rabbi Nathan
'Ag. Ber	'Aggadat Berešit
Bab.	Babylonian
Bar	Baraita
Der Er Rab.	Derek Ereṣ Rabba
Der Er Zu.	Derek Ereṣ Zuṭa
Gem.	Gemara
Kalla	Kalla
Mek.	Mekilta
Midr	Midraš (cited with abbreviation for biblical book)
Pal.	Palestinian
Pesiq. R.	Pesiqta Rabbati
Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana
Pirqe R. El.	Pirqe Rabbi Eliezer
Rab.	Rabbah (following abbreviation for biblical book: Gen. Rab. = Genesis Rabbah)
Ṣem.	Ṣemaḥot
Sipra	Sipra
Sipre	Sipre
Sop.	Soperim
S. 'Olam Rab.	Seder 'Olam Rabbah
Talm.	Talmud
Yal.	Yalquṭ

Nag Hammadi Tractates

Acts Pet. 12 Apost.	The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles
Allogenes	Allogenes
Ap. Jas.	The Apocryphon of James
Ap. John	The Apocryphon of John
Apoc. Adam	The Apocalypse of Adam
1 Apoc. Jas.	The (First) Apocalypse of James
2 Apoc. Jas.	The (Second) Apocalypse of James
Apoc. Paul	The Apocalypse of Paul
Apoc. Peter	Apocalypse of Peter
Asclepius	Asclepius 21-29
Auth. Teach.	Authoritative Teaching
Dial. Sav	The Dialogue of the Savior
Disc. 8-9	The Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth
Ep. Pet. Phil.	The Letter of Peter to Philip
Eugnostos	Eugnostos the Blessed
Exeg. Soul	The Exegesis on the Soul
Gos. Eg.	The Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Phil.	The Gospel of Philip
Gos. Thom.	The Gospel of Thomas
Gos. Truth	The Gospel of Truth
Great Pow.	The Concept of Our Great Power
Hyp. Arch.	The Hypostasis of the Archons
Hypsiph.	Hypsiphrone
Interp. Know.	The Interpretation of Knowledge
Marsanes	Marsanes
Melch.	Melchizedek
Norea	The Thought of Norea
On Anoint.	On the Anointing
On Bapt. A	On Baptism A
On Bapt. B	On Baptism B
On Bapt. C	On Baptism C
On Euch. A	On the Eucharist A
On Euch. B	On the Eucharist B
Orig. World	On the Origin of the World
Paraph. Shem	The Paraphrase of Shem
Pr Paul	The Prayer of the Apostle Paul
Pr Thanks.	The Prayer of Thanksgiving
Sent. Sextus	The Sentences of Sextus
Soph. Jes. Chr	The Sophia of Jesus Christ
Steles Seth	The Three Steles of Seth
Teach. Silv	The Teachings of Silvanus
Testim. Truth	The Testimony of Truth
Thom. Cont.	The Book of Thomas the Contender
Thund.	The Thunder: Perfect Mind
Treat. Res.	The Treatise on the Resurrection
Treat. Seth	The Second Treatise of the Great Seth
Tri. Trac.	The Tripartite Tractate
Trim. Prot.	Trimorphic Protennoia
Val. Exp.	A Valentinian Exposition
Zost.	Zostrianos

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

AARAS	American Academy of Religion Academy Series
AARSR	American Academy of Religion Studies in Religion
AB	Anchor Bible
ABD	Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. D. N. Freedman
ABQ	American Baptist Quarterly
ABR	Australian Biblical Review
ABRL	Anchor Bible Reference Library
AbrN	Abr-Nahrain
ACNT	The Augsburg Commentary on the New Testament
ACW	Ancient Christian Writers
AER	American Ecclesiastical Review
AGJU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums
AGSU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätjudentums und Urchristentums

AJA	American Journal of Archaeology
AJBI	Annual of the Japanese Biblical Institute
AJT	American Journal of Theology
AK	Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte
ALGHJ	Arbeiten zur Literatur und Geschichte des hellenistischen Judentums
ALUOS	Annual of Leeds University Oriental Society
AnBib	Analecta Biblica
AnBoll	Analecta Bollandiana
ANF	Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson (10 vols.; 1890 [repr. 1951])
ANRW	Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt
APOT	The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, ed., R. H. Charles (2 vols., 1913).
ARWAW	Abhandlungen der Rheinisch-Westfälischen Akademie der Wissenschaften
ASNU	Acta seminarii neotestamentici upsaliensis
ATANT	Abhandllungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments
ATLABibS	ATLA Bibliography Series
ATR	Anglican Theological Review
AusBR	Australian Biblical Review
AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies
BA	Biblical Archaeologist
BAFCS	The Book of Acts in Its First Century Setting
BAGD	W. Bauer, W. F. Arndt, F. W. Gingrich and F. W. Danker, Greek-English Lexicon of the NT
BBB	Bonner biblische Beiträge
BBR	Bulletin for Biblical Research
BCJ	Brown Classics in Judaica
BDB	Brown, Driver and Briggs, Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament
BDF	F. Blass, A. Debrunner and R. W. Funk, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961)
BET	Beitrage zur evangelischen Theologie
BETL	Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium
BF	Beiträge zur Forschung
BG	Berlin Gnostic Codex
BGU	Ägyptische Urkunden aus den Museen zu Berlin: Griech. Urkunden I-VIII (1895-1933)
BHT	Beiträge zur historischen Theologie
BI	Biblical Interpretation
Bib	Biblica
BibO	Biblica et Orientica
BibRes	Biblical Research
BibS(F)	Biblische Studien (Freiburg, 1895-)
BibS(N)	Biblische Studien (Neukirchen, 1951-)
BibTh	Biblical Theology
BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester
BJS	Brown Judaic Studies
BMI	The Bible and its Modern Interpreters
BR	Biblical Research
BRev	Bible Review
BS	Bollingen Series
BSac	Biblioteca Sacra
BT	The Bible Translator
BTB	Biblical Theology Bulletin
BTS	Biblisch-Theologische Studien
BU	Biblische Untersuchungen
BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
BZNW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
CAH	Cambridge Ancient History
CahTheol	Cahiers Théologiques
CBC	Cambridge Bible Commentary
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
CBQMS	Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series
CCWJCW	Cambridge Commentaries on Writings of the Jewish and Christian World 200 B.C. to A.D. 200
CD	Church Dogmatics, Karl Barth
CEB	Commentaire Evangélique de la Bible
CGTC	Cambridge Greek Testament Commentary
CH	Church History
CIG	Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum I-IV (1828-1877)
CII	Corpus inscriptionum iudaicarum I-II, J. B. Frey (1936-1952)
CIL	Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum I-XI (1862-1943, 2d ed. 1893-)
CJT	Canadian Journal of Theology
CNT	Commentaire du Nouveau Testament
ConB	Coniectanea biblica
ConBNT	Coniectanea biblica Neotestamentica
ConNT	Coniectanea neotestamentica
CPG	Clavis Patrum Graecorum, ed. M. Geerard, 5 vols. (Turnhout: Brepols, 1974-87)
CPJ	Corpus Papyrorum Judaicarum
CQ	Classical Quarterly
CQR	Church Quarterly Review
CRB	Cahiers de la Revue Biblique
CRINT	Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad novum testamentum
CSCO	Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium
CSEL	Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum
CSHJ	Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism
CTJ	Calvin Theological Journal
CTM	Concordia Theological Monthly
CTR	Criswell Theological Review
CurTM	Currents in Theology and Mission
CV	Communio Viatorum
DCB	Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. Smith and H. Wace, 4 vols. (London, 1877-87)
DHL	Dissertationes humanarum litterarum
DJD	Discoveries in the Judaean Desert

DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green and S. McKnight
DPL	Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, ed. R. P. Martin and G. F. Hawthorne
DRev	Downside Review
DSB	Daily Study Bible
DTT	Dansk teologisk tidsskrift
EB	Études bibliques
EBC	The Expositor's Bible Commentary
EBT	Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology, ed. J. B. Bauer
EDNT	Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament, ed., H. Balz and G. Schneider
EGT	Expositor's Greek Testament
EH	Europäische Hochschulschriften
EKK	Evangelisch-katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
ELS	Enchiridion Locorum Sanctorum. Documenta S. Evangelii Loca Respicientia
EncJud	Encyclopaedia Judaica
EP	Études Bibliques
EPTA Bulletin	European Pentecostal Theological Association Bulletin
ER	The Encyclopedia of Religion, ed. M. Eliade
ERev	Ecumenical Review
ESEC	Emory Studies in Early Christianity
ESW	Ecumenical Studies in Worship
ETS	Erfurter Theologische Schriften
EvJ	Evangelical Journal
EvQ	Evangelical Quarterly
EvT	Evangelische Theologie
EWNT	Exegetisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, ed., H. Balz and G. Schneider (ET, Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament)
Exp	Expositor
ExpT	Expository Times
FB	Facet Books
FBib	Forschung zur Bibel
FCCGRW	First-Century Christians in the Greco-Roman World
FF	Foundations and Facets
FIRA	Fontes Iuris Romani Antejustiniani
FJ	The Foundation of Judaism
FKD	Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte
FN	Filologia Neotestamentaria
FRLANT	Forschungen zur Religion und Literature des Alten und Neuen Testaments
GBL	Das Große Bibellexikon
GBS	Guides to Biblical Scholarship
GLS	Grove Liturgical Studies
GNS	Good News Studies
GNTE	Guides to New Testament Exegesis
GTJ	Grace Theological Journal
HBD	Harper's Bible Dictionary
HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology
HDBA	Dictionary of the Bible (ed. J. Hastings)
HDR	Harvard Dissertations in Religion
Herm	Hermeneia
HeyJ	The Heythrop Journal
HNT	Handbuch zum Neuen Testament
HNTC	Harper's New Testament Commentaries
HR	History of Religions
HSMS	Harvard Semitic Monograph Series
HSS	Harvard Semitic Studies
HTKNT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
HTS	Harvard Theological Studies
HUT	Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie
HZ	Historische Zeitschrift
IBS	Irish Biblical Studies
ICC	International Critical Commentary
IDB	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible
IDBSup	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Supplementary Volume
IEJ	Israel Exploration Journal
ILS	Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae (Berlin, 1892)
Int	Interpretation
IntC	Interpretation Commentaries
IRT	Issues in Religion and Theology
ISBE	International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (rev. ed.)
IVPNTC	InterVarsity Press New Testament Commentary
JAC	Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature
JBR	Journal of Bible and Religion
JCBRF	Journal of the Christian Brethren Research Fellowship
JCR	The Journal of Communication and Religion
JCSR	Journal of Comparative Sociology and Religion
JECS	Journal of Early Christian Studies
JEH	Journal of Ecclesiastical History
JES	Journal of Ecumenical Studies
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
JFSR	Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion
JJS	Journal of Jewish Studies
JPT	Journal of Pentecostal Theology
JPTSup	Journal of Pentecostal Theology Supplement Series
JQR	Jewish Quarterly Review
JR	Journal of Religion
JRE	Journal of Religious Ethics
JRH	Journal of Religious History
JRS	Journal of Roman Studies
JSJ	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic and Roman Period
JSNT	Journal for the Study of the New Testament
JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplement Series
JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series
JSPSup	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha and Related Literature Supplement Series

JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies
JTC	Journal for Theology and the Church
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies
JTS(n.s.)	Journal of Theological Studies (new series)
JTSA	Journal of Theology for Southern Africa
KAV	Kommentar zu den Apostolischen Vätern
KNT	Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
KP	Der Kleine Pauly, ed. K. Ziegler
LAE	Light from the Ancient East, A. Deissmann
LB	Linguistica Biblica
LBS	Library of Biblical Studies
LCC	Library of Christian Classics
LEC	Library of Early Christianity
Lightfoot/ Harmer	The Apostolic Fathers, trans. J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992)
Louw-Nida	Greek-English Lexicon, ed. J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida
LPGL	G. W. H. Lampe, Patristic Greek Lexicon
LSJ	Liddell-Scott-Jones, Greek-English Lexicon
LTJ	Lutheran Theological Journal
LW	Luther's Works, ed. J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann
MBPAR	Münchener Beiträge zur Papyrusforschung und Antiken Rechtsgeschichte
MBTh	Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie
MeyerK	Meyer Kommentar
MFC	Message of the Fathers of the Church
MM	J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-Literary Sources (1930)
MNTC	Moffatt New Testament Commentary
MPAT	A Manual of Palestinian Aramaic Texts
MSB	Monographic Series of Benedictina
MTh	Melita Theologica
MTS	Münchener theologische Studien
Mus	Le Muséon
NA^{26}	Nestlé-Aland Novum Testamentum Graece 26th ed.
NABPRSS	National Association of Baptist Professors of Religion Special Studies
NAC	The New American Commentary
NCB	New Century Bible
NClB	New Clarendon Bible
NedTTs	Nederlands theologisch tijdschrift
Neot	Neotestamentica
NewDocs	New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, ed. G. H. R. Horsley
NGS	New Gospel Studies
NHC	Nag Hammadi Codices
NHMS	Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies
NHS	Nag Hammadi Studies
NIB	New Interpreter's Bible
NIBC	The New International Biblical Commentary
NICNT	The New International Commentary on the New Testament
NIDNTT	New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology
NIGTC	New International Greek Testament Commentary
NLC	New London Commentary
NovT	Novum Testamentum
NovTSup	Supplement to Novum Testamentum
NRT	La nouvelle revue théologique
NTAbh	Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen
NTC	TPI New Testament Commentaries
NTCom	New Testament Commentary (Baker)
NTD	DasNeue Testament Deutsch
NTG	New Testament Guides
NTOA	Novum Testamentum et Orbis Antiquus
NTR	New Theology Review
NTS	New Testament Studies
NTT	New Testament Theology, ed. J. D. G. Dunn
NTTS	New Testament Tools and Studies
OBO	Orbis Biblicus et Orientalis
OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology
OCA	Orientalia Christiana analecta
OCD	Oxford Classical Dictionary
OGIS	Orientis Graeci Inscriptiones Selectae
OPTAT	Occasional Papers in Translation and Textlinguistics
OTP	The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth
PC	Proclamation Commentaries
PEQ	Palestine Exploration Quarterly
PG	Patrologiae Graeca, ed. J.-P. Migne. 162 vols.
PGL	Patristic Greek Lexicon, ed. G. W. H. Lampe
PL	Patrologia Latina, ed. J.-P. Migne. 217 vols.
PRS	Perspectives in Religious Studies
PSBFMi	Publications of the Studium Biblicum Franciscanum. Collectio minor
PTMS	Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series
QD	Quaestiones Disputatae
QJS	Quarterly Journal of Speech
RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum
RB	Revue biblique
RE	Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. Pauly-Wissowa
RelSRev	Religious Studies Review
RevExp	Review and Expositor
RevQ	Revue de Qumran
RGG	Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart
RGRW	Religions in the Graeco-Roman World
RHE	Revue d'Histoire Ecclésiastique
RHPR	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
RHR	Revue de l'histoire des religions
RICP	Revue de l'Institut Catholique de Paris
RQ	Restoration Quarterly
RSR	Recherches des science religieuse
RST	Regensburger Studien zur Theologie
RTR	Reformed Theological Review
SA	Studia Antiqua

SacP	Sacra Pagina
SAJ	Studies in Ancient Judaism
SAM	Studies in Ancient Medicine
SANT	Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament
SB	Sources bibliques
SBEC	Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity
SBFLA	Studii biblici franciscani liber annuus
SBLASP	Society of Biblical Literature Abstracts and Seminar Papers
SBLDS	Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series
SBLMS	Society of Biblical Literature Monograph Series
SBLRBS	Society of Biblical Literature Resources for Biblical Studies
SBLSBS	Society of Biblical Literature Sources for Biblical Study
SBLSP	Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers
SBS	Stuttgart Bibelstudien
SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology
SC	Sources chrétiennes
ScrHier	Scripta hierosolymitana
SCJ	Studies in Christianity and Judaism
Schürer	E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.—A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes et al. (3 vols.; Edinburgh: 1973-87)
SE	Studia Evangelica
SEÅ	Svensk Exegetisk Årsbok
SecCent	Second Century
SECT	Sources of Early Christian Thought
SEG	Supplementum Epigraphicum Graecum (Leiden, 1923-)
SESJ	Suomen Ekseegeettisen Seuran Julkaisuja
SFEG	Schriften der Finnischen Exegetischen Gesellschaft
SFSHJ	South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism
SFSMD	Studia Francisci Scholten memoriae dicata
SH	Studia Hellenistica
SHT	Studies in Historical Theology
SIG^3	Sylloge Inscriptionum Graecarum (3d ed. Leipzig, 1915-24)
SJ	Studia Judaica
SJLA	Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity
SJSJ	Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology
SJTOP	Scottish Journal of Theology Occasional Papers
SKKNT	R. Hoppe, Jakobusbrief Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1989)
SL	Studia Liturgica
SM	Sacramentum Mundi
SNTW	Studies in the New Testament and Its World
SNTSMS	Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series
SNTU	Studien zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt
SO	Symbolae osloenses
SOTBT	Studies in Old Testament Biblical Theology
SP	Studia Patristica
SPB	Studia Post-Biblica
SPP	Studien zur Palaeographie und Papyruskunde
SR	Studies in Religion
SS	Symposium Series
SSEJC	Studies in Scripture in Early Judaism and Christianity
SSRH	Sociological Studies in Roman History
ST	Studia theologica
StBT	Studia Biblica et Theologica
STL	Studia theologica Lundensia
Str-B	Strack and Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
StudLit	Studia Liturgica
StudNeot	Studia Neotestamentica
SUNT	Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments
SWJT	Southwestern Journal of Theology
TB	Theologische Bücherei
TBC	Torch Bible Commentaries
TBl	Theologische Blätter
TBT	The Bible Today
TD	Theology Digest
TDGR	Translated Documents of Greece and Rome, ed. R. K. Sherk
TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. G. Kittel and G. Friedrich
TEH	Theologische Existenz heute, new series
THKNT	Theologische Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament
TI	Theological Inquiries
TJ (n.s.)	Trinity Journal (new series)
TLG	Thesaurus Linguae Graecae
TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung
TNTC	Tyndale New Testament Commentary
TOP	Theology Occasional Papers
TPINTC	Trinity Press International New Testament Commentaries
TQ	Theologische Quartalschrift
TRE	Theologische Realenzydlopädie
TRu	Theologische Rundschau
TS	Theological Studies
TSFBul	TSF Bulletin
TToday	Theology Today
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen
TWOT	Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament
TynB	Tyndale Bulletin
TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift
UBSGNT	United Bible Societies Greek New Testament
UCOS	University of Cambridge Oriental Studies
USQR	Union Seminary Quarterly Review

VC	Vigiliae Christianae	ZBNT	Züricher Bibelkommentare: Neues Testament
VCSup	Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae	ZKG	Zeitschrift fur Kirchengeschicte
VoxEv	Vox Evangelica	ZLTK	Zeitschrift für lutherische Theologie und Kirche
VT	Vetus Testamentum	ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
VTSup	Vetus Testamentum Supplements	ZPEB	Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, ed. M. C. Tenney
WA	Weimar Ausgabe	ZPE	Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary	ZRG	Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte
WTJ	Wesleyan Theological Journal	ZS:NT	Zacchaeus Studies: New Testament
WMANT	Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament	ZSTh	Zeitschrift für Systematische Theologie
WPC	Westminster Pelican Commentary	ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche
WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal	ZWT	Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament

Transliteration of Hebrew and Greek

HEBREW

Consonants

א = ’
ב = b
ב = b̲
ג = g
ג = ḡ
ד = d
ד = d̲
ה = h
ו = w
ז = z
ח = ḥ
ט = ṭ
י = y
כ = k
כ = k̲
ל = l
מ = m
נ = n
ס = s ע = ‘
פ = p
פ = p̄
צ = ṣ
ק = q
ר = r
שׂ = ś
שׁ = š
ת = t
ת = t̲

Long Vowels

(ה)ָ = â
ֵ = ê ִ = î
וֹ = ô
וּ = û
ָ = ā ֵ = ē = ō

Short Vowels

ַ = a
ֶ = e
ִ = i
ָ = o ֻ = u

Very Short Vowels

ֲ = a
ֱ = e
ְ = e (if vocal)
ֳ = o

GREEK

A = A
α = a
B = B
β = b
Γ = G
γ = g
Δ = D
δ = d
E = E
ε = e
Z = Z
ζ = z
H = Ē
η = ē
Θ = Th
θ = th
I = I
ι = i
K = K
κ = k
Λ = L
λ = l
M = M μ = m
N = N
ν = n
Ξ = X
ξ = x
O = O ο = o
Π = P
π = p
P = R
ρ = r
Σ = S
σ/ς = s
T = T
τ = t
Y = Y
υ = y
Φ = Ph
φ = ph
X = Ch
χ = ch
Ψ = Ps
ψ = ps
Ω = Ō
ω = ō
῾P = Rh
ῥ = rh
῾ = h γξ = nx γγ = ng αυ = au ευ = eu ου = ou
υι = yi

Contributors

Allison, Dale C., Jr., Ph.D. Associate Professor, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, USA: Land in Early Christianity; Melchizedek; Moses.

Arnold, Clinton E., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Talbot School of Theology, La Mirada, California, USA: Centers of Christianity; Magic and Astrology; Power; Satan, Devil; Syncretism.

Baker, William R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Greek and Biblical Division Chair, Saint Louis Christian College, Florissant, Missouri, USA: Endurance, Perseverance; Temptation.

Barnett, Paul W., Ph.D. Bishop of North Sydney, Anglican Church, Diocese of Sydney, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia: Apostasy; Salvation.

Bartchy, S. Scott, Ph.D. Director, UCLA Center for the Study of Religion and Adjunct Professor of Christian Origins and History of Religions, Department of History, University of California, Los Angeles, Los Angeles, California, USA: Narrative Criticism; Slave, Slavery.

Barton, Stephen C., Ph.D. Lecturer in New Testament, University of Durham, Durham, UK: Hospitality; Social Setting of Early Non-Pauline Christianity.

Bauckham, Richard J., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, University of St. Andrews, St. Andrews, UK: Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal Writings; 2 Peter; Relatives of Jesus.

Beagley, Alan J., Ph.D. Pastor, Williston Park Reformed Church, Williston Park, New York, USA: Babylon; Beasts, Dragon, Sea, Conflict Motif; Bowls; Scrolls, Seals; Trumpets.

Beale, Gregory K., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Director of the Th.M. in Biblical Theology Program, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA: Eschatology.

Beasley-Murray, George R., D.D., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Emeritus, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Revelation, Book of.

Blackburn, Barry L., Ph.D. Professor, Atlanta Christian College, East Point, Georgia, USA: Stephen.

Blue, Bradley B., Ph.D. Instructor in Aerospace, Marcy Open, Minneapolis, Minnesota, USA: Architecture, Early Church; Food, Food Laws, Table Fellowship.

Bock, Darrell L., Ph.D. Research Professor for New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA: Old Testament in Acts.

Burge, Gary M., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: John, Letters of.

Calvert-Koyzis, Nancy, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Ontario Theological Seminary, North York, Ontario, Canada. Ancestors; Abraham.

Campbell, William S., Ph.D. Reader in Religious and Theological Studies, Westhill College, University of Birmingham, Birmingham, UK: Church as Israel, People of God.

Canales, Isaac J., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament and Director of Hispanic Church Studies, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Mercy.

Capes, David B., Ph.D. Associate Professor, Houston Baptist University, Houston, Texas, USA: Preexistence.

Caragounis, Chrys C., Th.D. Associate Professor of New Testament Exegesis, Department of Theology, Lund University, Lund, Sweden: Reveal, Revelation; Stone, Cornerstone.

Carson, D. A., Ph.D. Research Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA: New Testament Theology.

Casurella, Anthony, Ph.D. Associate Professor, George Fox University, Portland, Oregon, USA: Fellowship; Gospel; Grace; Israel, Twelve Tribes.

Charles, J. Daryl, Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Religion, Taylor University, Upland, Indiana, USA: Noncanonical Writings, Citations in the General Epistles; Old Testament in General Epistles.

Chilton, Bruce D., Ph.D. Bernard Iddings Bell Professor of Religion and Chaplain of the College, Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, USA: Purity and Impurity; Synagogue; Temple.

Comfort, Philip W., Ph.D., D. Litt. et Phil. Senior Editor, Tyndale House Publishers, and Adjunct Professor, Trinity Episcopal Seminary, Pawleys Island, South Carolina, USA: Textual Criticism.

Davids, Peter H., Ph.D. Director of Studies, Schloss Mittersill Study Center, Mittersill, Austria: Anointing; Faith and Works; Healing, Illness; Miracles in Acts; Tongues; Signs and Wonders.

Davies, Glenn N., Ph.D. Rector, St. Luke's Anglican Church, Miranda, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia: Sacrifice, Offerings, Gifts; Tabernacle, Sanctuary.

De Lacey, Douglas R., Ph.D. Faculties of Divinity and Oriental Studies, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, UK: Circumcision.

deSilva, David A., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio, USA: Exaltation, Enthronement; Heaven, New Heaven; Repentance, Second Repentance; Visions, Ecstatic Experience.

Dodd, Brian J., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Leadership, and Associate Director, Doctor of Ministry Program, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA: Millennium; Universalism; World.

Drane, John W., D.D. Directory, Centre for the Study of Christianity and Contemporary Society, University of Stirling, Stirling, UK: Son of God; Sonship, Child, Children.

Dunn, James D. G., D.D. Lightfoot Professor of Divinity, University of Durham, Durham, UK: Pseudepigraphy; Pauline Legacy and School.

Eastman, Brad J., Ph.D. Instructor, Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada: Faith, Faithfulness; Hope; Name.

Evans, Craig A., Ph.D. Director of Graduate Program in Biblical Studies and the Dead Sea Scrolls Institute, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Christianity and Judaism: Partings of the Ways; Judaism, Post-A.D. 70; Thomas, Gospel of.

Ferguson, Everett, Ph.D. Professor Emeritus, Abilene Christian University, Abilene, Texas, USA: Old Testament in Apostolic Fathers; Religions, Greco-Roman.

Fowl, Stephen E., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Theology, Loyola College in Baltimore, Baltimore, Maryland, USA: Paul and Paulinisms in Acts.

Fuller, Ruth M., Ph.D. Adjunct Professor, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA: Rewards.

Giles, Kevin N., Th.D. Vicar, St. Michael's Church, North Carlton, Victoria, Australia: Church; Church Order, Government; Prophecy, Prophets, False Prophets.

Graham, David J., Ph.D. Lecturer in New Testament and Greek, Glasgow Bible College, and Honorary Lecturer in Theology and Religious Studies, The University of Glasgow, Glasgow, UK: Watchfulness; Witness.

Green, Joel B., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA: Acts of the Apostles; Cornelius; Peter, Gospel of.

Guthrie, George H., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Christian Studies, Union University, Jackson, Tennessee, USA: Old Testament in Hebrews; Promise.

Hagner, Donald A., Ph.D. George Eldon Ladd Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Apostolic Fathers; Jewish Christianity.

Hansen, G. Walter, Th.D. Director of the Global Research Institute and Associate Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Authority.

Hawthorne, Gerald F., Ph.D. Emeritus Professor of Greek, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA: Holy, Holiness; Holy Spirit; Joy; Melito of Sardis.

Hertig, Paul A., Ph.D. Instructor in New Testament and Mission, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA: Galilean Christianity.

Hill, Craig C., D.Phil. Associate Professor of New Testament, Wesley Theological Seminary, Washington, D.C., USA: Hellenists, Hellenistic and Hellenistic-Jewish Christianity.

Holmes, Michael W., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical Studies and Early Christianity, Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Barnabas, Epistle of; Clement of Rome; Didache; Hermas, Shepherd of; Ignatius of Antioch; Polycarp of Smyrna.

Hunt, Steven A., M.C.S., Ph.D. Cand. Adjunct Professor of Biblical Studies, Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Light and Darkness.

Hurst, Lincoln D., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of California, Davis, California, USA: Priest, High Priest; Qumran.

Hurtado, L. W., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Language, Literature and Theology, The University of Edinburgh, Edinburgh, UK: Christology.

Johnson, David H., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Providence Theological Seminary, Otterburne, Manitoba, Canada: Assurance; Blessing; Flesh.

Keener, Craig S., Ph.D. Visiting Professor of New Testament, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA: Lamb; Marriage, Divorce, Adultery; Shepherd, Flock; Woman and Man.

Kim, Seyoon, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Kingdom of God.

Klein, William W., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Associate Academic Dean, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado, USA: Election.

Knight, Jonathan M., Ph.D. Research Assistant to the Bishop of Ely, Ely, Cambs, UK: Alexandria, Alexandrian Christianity.

Kreitzer, Larry J., Ph.D. Tutor of New Testament, Regent's Park College, University of Oxford, Oxford, UK: Apocalyptic, Apocalypticism; Parousia.

Kroeger, Catherine C., Adjunct Associate Professor of Classical and Ministry Studies, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA: Women in the Early Church.

Kruse, Colin G., Ph.D. Lecturer in New Testament, Bible College of Victoria, Lilydale, Victoria, Australia: Apostle, Apostleship; Ministry; Servant, Service.

Laansma, Jon C., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Bible, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Illinois, USA: Lord's Day; Peace.

Lane, William L., Th.D. Paul T. Walls Professor of Biblical Studies, Seattle Pacific University, Seattle, Washington, USA: Hebrews.

Larkin, William J., Jr., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Greek, Columbia Biblical Seminary and Graduate School of Missions, Columbia, South Carolina, USA: Ascension.

Lim, David S., Ph.D. Executive Director, China Ministries International—Philippines, Quezon City, Metro-Manila, Philippines: Evangelism in the Early Church.

Lincoln, Andrew T., Ph.D. Senior Professor of New Testament, Wycliffe College, University of Toronto, Toronto, Ontario, Canada: Pentecost.

Losie, Lynn A., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Haggard Graduate School of Theology, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA: Mark, Secret Gospel of.

Luter, A. Boyd, Jr., Th.D. Associate Professor of Bible, Cedarville College, Cedarville, Ohio, USA: Martyrdom; Savior.

Maier, Paul L., Ph.D. Professor of History, Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo, Michigan, USA: Chronology.

Marshall, I. Howard, D.D. Professor of New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, UK: Redemption.

Martin, D. Michael, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, Golden Gate Baptist Theological Seminary, Mill Valley, California, USA: Philo.

Martin, Ralph P., Ph.D. Distinguished Scholar in Residence at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California; Haggard Graduate School of Theology, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California; and Logos Evangelical Seminary, El Monte, California, USA: Early Catholicism; Worship and Liturgy.

Maynard-Reid, Pedrito U., Th.D. Professor of Biblical Studies and Missiology, Walla Walla College, College Place, Washington, USA: Forgiveness; Samaria.

McCartney, Dan G., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA: Conscience; House, Spiritual House; Household, Family.

McDonald, Lee M., Ph.D. Senior Pastor, First Baptist Church, Alhambra, California, and Adjunct Professor of New Testament Studies, Fuller

Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Canon.

McKnight, Scot, Ph.D. Karl A. Olsson Professor in Religious Studies, North Park University, Chicago, Illinois, USA: Gentiles, Gentile Mission; Matthean Community.

Michaels, J. Ramsey, Th.D. Professor Emeritus, Southwest Missouri State University, Springfield, Missouri, USA: Old Testament in Revelation; 1 Peter.

Morris, Leon L., Ph.D. Retired, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia: Love.

Mott, Stephen C., Ph.D. Pastor, Cochesett United Methodist Church, West Bridgewater, Massachusetts, USA: Civil Authority.

Motyer, Stephen, Ph.D. Lecturer, London Bible College, London, UK: Cross, Theology of the.

Newman, Carey C., Ph.D. Research Professor of New Testament, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Covenant, New Covenant; Glory; God; Jerusalem, Zion, Holy City; Righteousness.

Noll, Stephen F., Ph.D. Associate Dean for Academic Affairs and Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Episcopal School for Ministry, Ambridge, Pennsylvania, USA: Angels, Heavenly Beings, Angel Christology.

Nystrom, David P., Ph.D. Chair, Department of Biblical and Theological Studies, North Park University, Director of Institute for Christian Studies, Chicago, Illinois, USA: Josephus.

Osborne, Grant R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA: Hermeneutics.

Padgett, Alan G., D.Phil. Professor of Religion and Philosophy, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA: Marcion.

Paige, Terence P., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Houghton College, Houghton, New York, USA: Spirits.

Painter, John, Ph.D., FAHA. Professor of Theology, St. Mark's National Theological Centre, Charles Sturt University, Canberra, Australian Capital Territory, Australia: Creation, Cosmology.

Patzia, Arthur G., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament and Area Director, Fuller Seminary in Northern California, Menlo Park, California, USA: Knowledge; Mystery; Wisdom.

Pearson, Sharon Clark, Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA: Hymns, Songs.

Polhill, John B., Ph.D. J. B. Harrison Professor of New Testament, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Kerygma and Didache; Pride and Humility.

Porter, Stanley E., Ph.D. Professor of Theology and Head of the Department of Theology and Religious Studies, Roehampton Institute London, London, UK: Eternity, Eternal; Fear; Sin, Wickedness; Tribulation, Messianic Woes; Wrath, Destruction.

Rainbow, Paul A., D.Phil. Professor of New Testament, North American Baptist Seminary, Sioux Falls, South Dakota, USA: Idolatry; Logos Christology.

Rapske, Brian M., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Northwest Baptist College and Seminary, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Roman Empire, Christians and the; Rome and Roman Christianity.

Reasoner, Mark, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA: Emperor, Emperor Cult; Persecution.

Reed, Jeffrey T., Ph.D. Redmond, Washington, USA: Truth.

Reid, Daniel G., Ph.D. Senior Editor, Reference and Academic Books, InterVarsity Press, Downers Grove, Illinois, USA: Pella, Flight to; Virtues and Vices.

Reimer, Andy M., M.C.S., Ph.D. Cand. Adjunct Lecturer, Canadian Bible College, Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada: Freedom, Liberty.

Schmidt, Thomas E., Ph.D. Santa Barbara, California, USA: Discipline; Riches and Poverty.

Schnabel, Eckhard J., Ph.D. Dozent, Head of New Testament Department, Giessen Theological Seminary, Giessen, Germany: Mission, Early Non-Pauline.

Scholer, David M., Th.D. Professor of New Testament, and Associate Dean for the Center for Advanced Theological Studies, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Gnosis, Gnosticism.

Schreiner, Thomas R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Commandments; Law; Obedience and Lawlessness.

Seifrid, Mark A., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA: Death of Christ; Judgment.

Shogren, Gary S., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Biblical Theological Seminary, Hatfield, Pennsylvania, USA: Hell, Abyss, Eternal Punishment; Life and Death; Mortality and Immortality.

Shuster, Marguerite, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Preaching, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA: Preaching from Acts, Hebrews, General Epistles and Revelation.

Spencer, F. Scott, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religion, Wingate College, Wingate, North Carolina, USA: Philip the Evangelist.

Stanton, Graham N., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, King's College, University of London, London, UK: Jesus Traditions.

Sumney, Jerry L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Bible, Lexington Theological Seminary, Lexington, Kentucky, USA: Adversaries; Imitation.

Sunquist, Scott W., Ph.D. Associate Professor of World Mission and Evangelism, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pitts-burgh, Pennsylvania, USA: Syria, Syrian Christianity.

Swartley, Willard M., Ph.D. Academic Dean and Professor of New Testament, Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Indiana, USA: Intertextuality in Early Christian Literature.

Towner, Philip H., Ph.D. Translation Consultant, United Bible Societies, and Adjunct Professor, Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada: Household Codes.

Travis, Stephen H., Ph.D. Vice-Principal, St. John's College, Nottingham, Nottingham, UK: Psychology; Resurrection.

Trebilco, Paul R., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Department of Theology and Religious Studies, University of Otago, Dunedin, New Zealand: Diaspora Judaism.

Verhey, Allen D., Ph.D. Evert J. and Hattie E. Blekkink Professor of Religion, Hope College, Holland, Michigan, USA: Ethics.

Wainwright, Geoffrey, Dr. Théol., D.D. Cushman Professor of Christian Theology, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, USA: Baptism, Baptismal Rites; Lord's Supper; Love Feast.

Wall, Robert W., Th.D. Professor of Biblical Studies, Seattle Pacific University, Seattle, Washington, USA: James, Letter of.

Watson, Duane F., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Chair of Department of Religion and Philosophy, Malone College, Canton, Ohio, USA: Antichrist; Letter, Letter Form; Rhetoric, Rhetorical Criticism; Structuralism and Discourse Analysis.

Webb, Robert L., Ph.D. Lecturer, Luther College, University of Regina, Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada: Day of the Lord; Jude.

Webb, William J., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Heritage Theological Seminary, Cambridge, Ontario, Canada: Suffering.

Weima, Jeffrey A. D., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA: Diognetus, Epistle to.

Wilkins, Michael J., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Language and Literature and Dean of the Faculty, Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California, USA: Milk, Solid Food; New Birth; Pastoral Theology; Prayer; Teaching, Paraenesis

Williams, David John, Ph.D. Vice Principal, Ridley College, Parkville, Victoria, Australia: Antioch on the Orontes.

Witherington, Ben, III, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA: Christ; Lord.

Wright, David F., M.A. Senior Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, The University of Edinburgh, Edinburgh, UK: Creeds, Confessional Forms; Docetism; Ebionites; Sexuality, Sexual Ethics.

Wu, Julie L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Logos Evangelical Seminary, El Monte, California, USA: Hymns, Songs; Liturgical Elements; Mary.

A

ABBA. See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

ABRAHAM

A key figure in early Jewish literature, Abraham played a central part in the letters to the Galatians and the Romans (see DPL, Abraham). Later NT authors continue to employ Abraham in significant ways in Acts* (Acts 3:13, 25; 7:2, 8, 16-17, 32; 13:26) and Hebrews* (Heb 2:16; 6:13; 7:1, 2, 4-6, 9; 11:8, 17) and to a lesser degree in James* (Jas 2:21, 23) and 1 Peter* (1 Pet 3:6). References to Abraham are found in numerous documents of the early church, a fact that suggests that the patriarch held continued importance for early Christian self-understanding.

1. Abraham the Exemplary Jew
2. Acts: Abraham the Father of the Jews in Continuity with Believers
3. Hebrews: Abraham the Prototype of Faith for Believers
4. James and 1 Peter: The Patriarchal Couple as Examples of Obedient Behavior
5. Apostolic Fathers: Adopted Christians and Disinherited Jews

1. Abraham the Exemplary Jew.

For those Jews who returned from exile in Babylon, Abraham often exemplified the characteristics of the ideal Jew. While authors of early Jewish literature often based their writings upon the OT accounts of Abraham (Gen 11:27—25:11), they also elaborated them in order to speak to the readers of their day.

Four primary themes emerge about Abraham in early Jewish literature. He is a tenacious monotheist and the first proselyte to Judaism (Jub. 11:6-17; 12:1-5, 16-21; 20:6-9; Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 6.4; Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §§154-57; Philo Abr. 68-71; Apoc. Ab. 1-8). God established a covenant* with Abraham through which his descendants are blessed (Jub. 15:9-10; Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 7.4; 1QapGen 21:8-14), although one must obey the stipulations of the covenant in order to remain within it (Jub. 15:26-27). Abraham's character is often extolled as righteous (T. Abr. 1:1A), hospitable (T. Abr. 1:1-3A; Philo Abr. 107-110; Josephus Ant. 1.11.2 §196), virtuous (Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §154; Philo Abr. 68), faithful (Sir 44:20; 1 Macc 2:52; Jub. 17:17-18), a lover of God (Jub. 17:18) and a friend of God (CD 3:2-4). Abraham lived according to the Mosaic law* (Jub. 15:1-2; 16:20; Sir 44:20) or the natural/philosophical law (Philo Abr. 3-6), and he praises those who die for keeping the law (4 Macc 13:13-18).

2. Acts: Abraham the Father of the Jews in Continuity with Believers.

In Acts Abraham is used not so much as a prototype for Christians to be emulated as he is in the Pauline epistles, but he remains the father of the Jews. Using Abraham exclusively in his sermons, Luke establishes a connection and continuity between Abraham and the events about which he is writing (Dahl, 140).

2.1. Acts 3. Peter uses the figure of Abraham during his speech in Solomon's portico to identify the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Acts 3:13, 25; cf. Acts 7:32; Ex 3:6) as the God whose "servant" Jesus was (see Service) and through whose name* Peter had just healed the lame beggar (Acts 3:6, 16). The usage of the uncommon and early title servant (cf. Acts 3:26) for Jesus here may indicate that an allusion is being made to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah (Is 52:13—53:12). By using this appellation Peter clearly implicates the Jews as those who killed Jesus, the chosen servant of their own God (Acts 3:15).

Yet in Acts 3:25 Peter invokes the blessing* to Abraham that through his seed all the families of the earth would be blessed (Gen 22:18; cf. Gen 12:3; 18:18; Gal 3:8). The Septuagint has "nations" (ethnē), which could be interpreted to mean Gentiles.* Peter instead uses the ambiguous "families" (patria), which probably refers first to Jews (cf. Acts 3:26) and implicitly to Gentiles. Thus Peter tells his listeners that they are the descendants of the prophets and the covenant that foretold the Messiah, Jesus (Acts 3:22-23), who himself was the fulfillment of the covenant with Abraham through whom the Jews and other families may be blessed.

2.2. Acts 7. Stephen's* speech provides the framework for several allusions to Abraham (Acts 7:2-8, 16-17, 32) in which he appears as the recipient of promises* by which his descendants later benefit.

Luke's affinity with Hellenistic Judaism* is seen most clearly in Acts 7:2-8 (Dahl, 142). In Acts 7:2 Stephen places God's call to Abraham in Ur rather than in Haran (Gen 12:1). Luke's tradition could be drawn from OT texts (Gen 15:7; Neh 9:7) that suggest the call from Ur. Philo* assumes that a divine call came to Abraham in both places (Philo Abr. 62, 85), while Josephus* sees the two migrations as a single exodus (Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §154). Luke further remarks (Acts 7:4) that Abraham left the country of the "Chaldeans," a term that often referred to astrologers and the interpreters of dreams (Jub. 11:8; Philo Abr. 69, 71), traditions connected with Abraham before his call (Jub. 12:16; Philo Abr. 70; Josephus Ant. 1.7.1 §156; Apoc. Abr. 7:9; cf. Josh 24:2).

In a free rendering of Genesis 17:7 Stephen remains true to the Genesis account in which Abraham possessed no land* but received only a promise of land (Acts 7:5; cf. Gen 12:7; 13:15; 48:4) for himself and his offspring. Abraham followed God although he neither took ownership of any part of the land (cf. Deut 2:5) nor yet had his descendants who would eventually inherit the land. While authors sometimes magnify Abraham's taking ownership of the land (1QapGen 21:15-19), Stephen instead magnifies Abraham's trust in God (cf. Rom 4:16-22).

By including references to the prophecy to Abraham about his descendants' four-hundred-year (Acts 7:6; cf. Ex 12:40; Gal 3:17) bondage in Egypt (Gen 15:13-14; cf. Ex 2:22) Luke emphasizes God's faithfulness (see Faith) to his people in the midst of crisis. In an expansion of Exodus 3:12 (Acts 7:7) Luke modifies the term mountain (horos), used for Sinai in the Septuagint, using instead "place" (topos), referring to Jerusalem* or the temple* itself (cf. Acts 6:13-14). God's faithfulness to his promise to Abraham is demonstrated in that Stephen and his Jewish contemporaries in Jerusalem could worship God in that very "place."

Stephen then refers to the "covenant of circumcision" (diathēkē peritomēs; Acts 7:8) established with Abraham (Gen 17:10, 12), a covenant that confirmed God's promise to grant him descendants (Gen 21:1-4), who include his listeners.

Stephen returns to Abraham when he suggests that Jacob, Joseph and his relatives were buried at the cave Abraham bought near Shechem (Acts 7:16). In Genesis Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (Gen 23), not Shechem. Jacob is reportedly buried in the cave Abraham bought near Hebron (Gen 49:29-32; 50:13), while Joseph was buried at Shechem (Josh 24:32) in land that Jacob had bought (Gen 33:18-20). Stephen may have telescoped the two accounts of purchases of land in Canaan as he telescoped earlier events (see Acts 7:2, 7) and has attributed the purchase of the grave in Shechem to Abraham.

2.3. Acts 13. During his speech in the synagogue* of Antioch of Pisidia on his first missionary journey, Paul refers to his Jewish listeners as "Abraham's family," to whom the message of salvation* was sent (Acts 13:26). Paul calls upon them to be different from the residents of Jerusalem who rejected the Messiah, Jesus, and fulfilled the message of the prophets (e.g., Isa 52:13—53:12) by condemning him to death (Acts 13:27-29). It was through David's people, those chosen in Abraham, that their Messiah had come (Acts 13:22-25). The Jews tragically would later reject the message of salvation (Acts 13:45).

3. Hebrews: Abraham the Prototype of Faith for Believers.

Abraham functions in the letter to the Hebrews as the prototype of faithful endurance* that the believing readers are to emulate.

3.1. Hebrews 2:14-16. In the context of showing how the Son of God has solidarity with the human family by virtue of having become one of them (Heb 2:14), the author of Hebrews first uses the figure of Abraham to identify those whom Jesus Christ came to liberate (Heb 2:15-16). Those who are now called descendants of Abraham are those who are of the faithful remnant (cf. Is 41:8-10), oppressed men and women of whom Jesus takes hold to deliver from the bondage to Satan* and to bring them under the authority* of the exalted Son (see Exaltation).

3.2. Hebrews 6:13-20. In this passage God's promise of descendants to Abraham (Heb 6:13-15; Gen 12:2-3; 15:5; 17:5) is brought to the fore. The author repeats a phrase from the sacrifice* of Isaac concerning an oath God swore "by himself" (Heb 6:13; Gen 22:16) because there was no one greater by whom God could swear (Heb 6:16-17) in order to guarantee the promise. The author reminds the readers of the popular tradition of the Aqedah, or binding of Isaac, reinforcing the portrayal of Abraham as the prototype of faithful endurance (Heb 6:15) who in obedience* was willing to sacrifice his only son, thereby receiving God's promises. The exposition provides an example for the addressees to emulate in the expectation that they will receive what God has promised them because their own high priest,* Jesus Christ, has already obtained the promises and is a forerunner on their behalf (Heb 6:19-20).

3.3. Hebrews 7:1-10. Within his broader goal of proving that Jesus' priestly office is greater than the levitical priesthood, the writer interprets the account of Abraham and Melchizedek* (Gen 14:17-20; cf. Ps 110:4) in order to show how Melchizedek is greater than Abraham and the levitical priests (Heb 7:7). His proof lies in the account of Abraham the exalted patriarch (Heb 7:4) giving Melchizedek a tenth of the spoils of war (Gen 14:20). Because the levitical priests received tithes (cf. Lev 18:21; Num 18:26-28; Neh 10:38-39; Josephus Ant. 20.9.8 §181; 20.9.2 §206-7; Josephus Life 15 §80) and because Abraham represented the Levites as the progenitor of Israel,* this fact signifies that Levi was actually tithing to Melchizedek (Acts 7:5-6, 8-10), who is thereby even greater than Israel's progenitor. It is not clear in Genesis who gave tithes to whom, but the author of Hebrews reflects the tradition that Abraham was the one who tithed (cf. 1QapGen 22:17; Josephus Ant. 1.10.2 §181). The author further provides a contrast between Abraham, who received promises (Acts 7:6), and the Levites, who received their office according to the law (Acts 7:5). For the author promise connotes something effective and certain (see Acts 6:13), while the law implied that which was ineffective. Thus the contrast between Melchizedek and the levitical priests heightens Melchizedek's priesthood because the levitical priests collected tithes according to law while Melchizedek received tithes from and blessed the one to whom God had made promises (Acts 7:6) and to whom he is superior (Acts 7:7).

3.4. Hebrews 11:8-12, 17-19. In this chapter the author employs Abraham more than any other figure as an example of faith. Abraham first exemplifies his faith by his obedience to God's call (Heb 11:8; Gen 12:1-2; cf. Gen 15:7; Neh 9:7; Acts 7:2-8; Philo Abr. 60, 62, 85, 88).

Abraham's sojourn as an alien indicates his unsettled status as a foreigner, without native and civil rights, "living in tents" (Heb 11:9; Gen 12:8; 13:3; 18:1) as a nomad. His obedience brought not immediate settlement in the promised land but a life of sojourning for himself and his descendants (Heb 11:9) as he looked toward the ultimate goal. For the author of Hebrews that goal was not Canaan but the firmly established city of God (Heb 11:10; cf. Heb 11:1; Ps 48:8; 87:1-3; Is 14:32). Jewish apocalyptic* tradition affirms that Abraham saw the heavenly* city (2 Apoc. Bar. 4:2-5; cf. 4 Ezra 3:13-14).

Abraham further exemplifies faith through his trust that God would give him a son, even though he and his wife had never produced children and were no longer physically capable of doing so (Heb 11:11-12; cf. Rom 4:19-21; Gen 15:1-6; 17:15-22; 18:9-15). The reliability of God is heightened in the contrast between the singular Abraham and the multitude of his descendants (Heb 11:12 cf. Heb 11:11) in accordance with the promise (Gen 15:5; 22:17; cf. Heb 6:13-15).

Finally Abraham exemplifies faith through his willingness to sacrifice his only son and fulfillment of promise, Isaac (Heb 11:17-19). This event of Abraham's testing (Sir 44:20; 1 Macc 2:52; see 3.2 above) became central to the Jewish exegetical imagination in postbiblical Judaism (Jub. 17:15—18:19; Philo Abr. 167-297; 4 Macc 7:11-14; 13:12; 16:18-20; Josephus Ant. 1.13.1-4 §222-36; Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 18.5; 23.8; 32.1-4; 40.2-3). Abraham's action was celebrated as a model of faithfulness and obedience to God in the literary tradition of Jewish models of faith (Sir 44:20; Jdt 8:25-26; 1 Macc 2:52; 4 Macc 16:20; cf. Jas 2:21-24; 1 Clem. 10.7). Details in the presentation in Hebrews suggest that the author was influenced by this tradition.

The tense and sacrificial nuance of the verb offered (prospherō; Heb 11:17) suggests that in some sense the sacrifice was an accomplished event because of Abraham's intention (Philo Abr. 177; Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 32.4; Swetnam, 122) while the second use of the verb (Heb 11:17, the second part of the verse) indicates that Abraham did not make the sacrifice but was interrupted by God's intervention. Jewish tradition refers to blood that was shed during the sacrifice; because of this God chose Abraham and his family (Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 18.5-6), perhaps implying that the blood had some kind of atoning value.

The author's reference to Genesis 21:12 (Heb 11:18) and subsequent reference to God raising "someone from the dead" (Heb 11:19; cf. Pirqe R. El. 31) simultaneously refers to Hebrews 11:12, where Abraham is said to be as "good as dead" in reference to procreation. The implication is that Abraham had faith that God was able to raise someone from the dead—namely, Isaac—through both procreation and his salvation from sacrifice. The Christian readers would also see the sacrifice of Isaac as a foreshadowing of God's raising Jesus from the dead. From this they could derive faith in the God who is faithful to his promises (Swetnam, 122-23, 128).

3.5. Hebrews 13:1-2. The author reminds his readers that they are to have the attitude of welcoming fellow Christians who are strangers. Hospitality* was a mark not only of one who was cultured but also of Christians, who met in the homes of others. Hospitality was necessary especially in regard to itinerant preachers. In the Christian community the guest/host relationship attained an almost sacramental quality as they expected that God would play a significant role in the exchange between guests and hosts (Lane, 512). Abraham, who was known for his hospitality (1 Clem. 31; T. Abr. 1:1-3A; Philo Abr. 107-10; Josephus Ant. 1.11.2 §196), is alluded to in reference to his meeting with the three visitors to his tent at Mamre when he and his wife received the promise of the birth of their son Isaac (Heb 13:1-2; Gen 18:1-21; 1 Clem. 10.7).

4. James and 1 Peter: The Patriarchal Couple as Examples of Obedient Behavior.

4.1. James 2:21-24. Abraham, known for his exemplary faith (see 3.4 above), was also revered for his obedience to God for his willingness to sacrifice Isaac (the Aqedah; see 3.2 above) which was a story popular in Jewish circles (see 3.4 above). James 2:21-24 brings these two traditions together; Abraham becomes the example of one who completes his faith by his works (see Faith and Works).

Because James 2:21 implies that Abraham was justified (dikaioō) by works and that sounds as if it contradicts statements by Paul about justification (dikaioō; cf. Gal 2:15-16; Rom 3:22) by faith alone, a few observations must be made. First, the sense in which dikaioō is used in James is in reference to Abraham's demonstrated faithfulness, perhaps in reference to the theme of testings (Jas 1:2, 12). Thus God declares Abraham "righteous" or "faithful." The sense in which Paul uses dikaioō refers to the eschatological* act in which God declares sinners rightly related to himself. Paul then can say that Abraham was made righteous by faith (Gal 3:6-9; Rom 4:22). Furthermore, the sense of "works" in the two letters is different: in James it refers to acts of obedience and compassion that should arise out of faith in Christ* (Jas 2:14-17) and that complete faith. The works (as in "works of the law") against which Paul builds his polemic of Abraham's becoming righteous by faith alone are those acts that formerly identified the people of God and that are still being used by some to identify the people of God in Christ. Paul uses Abraham as an example of righteousness* by faith because he is contending with those who would undermine the foundation of his gospel.*

4.2. 1 Peter 3:4-5. Within the context of a household code* the focus is on Sarah, whose example the readers are to emulate. It is surprising that the author did not reflect the situation of the OT account, in which Sarah laughs at the promise of a son, saying that her "lord" is too old (Gen 18:12; see Lord).

Many of the women reading the letter (see 1 Peter) would have had unbelieving husbands. It is through their demeanor that they are to bring their husbands to the gospel (1 Pet 3:1-2). The principle is that one influences a spouse by modest behavior worthy of respect. In the culture of the time this meant that wives were to defer to the authority of their husbands.

5. Apostolic Fathers: Adopted Christians and Disinherited Jews.

While Paul employed Abraham in order to include Gentile believers within the people of God, Abraham's function changed in the writings of the early church (see Apostolic Fathers). As J. Siker has shown, Justin Martyr reverses the function of Abraham when he "claims the Abrahamic heritage for the Christians and denies it to the Jews" (Siker, 145).

5.1. The Revised Promises to Abraham. Early noncanonical Christian authors revise God's promises to Abraham in such a way that Christians alone become the inheritors of those promises. For example, the author of the Epistle of Barnabas (see Barnabas, Epistle of) appeals to Abraham regarding God's promise of the land (Barn. 6.8; cf. Barn. 8.4; 9.7-8; 13.7; cf. Ex 33:1, 3) to Abraham and his descendants. Christians become heirs of the promised land of milk and honey (Barn. 6.8, 10, 17) through the new creation* in their hearts (Barn. 6.14-15) through Christ.

Justin Martyr sees Hadrian's banning the Jews from the city of Jerusalem (A.D. 135) as God's punishment for their disobedience and disbelief (Justin Dial. Tryph. 16.2; cf. 40.1; 92.2; 25.5). It is the Gentiles, along with the Hebrew ancestors, who will receive the inheritance of land, particularly as symbolized by Jerusalem (Justin Dial. Tryph. 26.1). Through Christ, the land promised to Abraham's descendants is given to Gentiles (Justin Dial. Tryph. 119.5-6) and will be established eternally at Christ's Second Coming (Justin Dial. Tryph. 85.7; cf. 80.5, 81.4; see Parousia).

For Justin, Christians additionally are the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham of descendants by virtue of their faith in Christ (Justin Dial. Tryph. 11.5). The Jews are merely physical descendants of Abraham (Justin Dial. Tryph. 47.4; 80.4), which counts for nothing (Justin Dial. Tryph. 25.1; 26.1; 44.1; cf. Mt 3:9 par. Lk 3:8). Further, in Barnabas 13.7 we find that the author has reinterpreted the account in Genesis 17:4-5, in which God promises Abraham that he will be the "father of nations," to mean that Abraham is the father exclusively of the Gentiles.

Gentiles furthermore become the fruit of God's promise to Abraham that through him the nations would be blessed (Justin Dial. Tryph. 11.5; 119.3-6). Abraham's descendants become a blessing to the nations by becoming the nations (i.e., Gentiles) themselves. Thus the promise to Abraham that his progeny would be a blessing to the nations is fulfilled.

5.2. Circumcision Recast. In these texts circumcision* is also given a new meaning. For example, in the Epistle of Barnabas Abraham points to Christ through his circumcision, which was solely a "spiritual witness of the grace to come, through the death of Jesus, not as a seal of a grace already given" (Barn. 9.3-4, 7-9; Siker, 150; cf. Gal 3:8; see Grace). The circumcision of the Jews in the flesh* is even seen to be the misleading of an evil angel* (Barn. 9.4).

Like Paul, Justin emphasizes Abraham's justification by faith apart from circumcision (Justin Dial. Tryph. 11.5; 23.3-4; cf. Rom 4:9-10). Not only does physical circumcision fail to bring righteousness, but only the spiritual circumcision of the heart has positive significance (Justin Dial. Tryph. 11.3; 24.1; 34.1; 43.1; 67.9; 118.2), which Christians receive through baptism.*

Justin further states that circumcision was given to Abraham because God foreknew that the Jews would be disobedient, particularly by virtue of their responsibility for Jesus' death (see Death of Jesus). Circumcision was a mark of those designated for punishment (Justin Dial. Tryph. 16.2-4; 19.2-5; 92.2-3).

5.3. Continuity Between Abraham and Christ. In Barnabas Abraham also points forward to Christ, first through his casting of Abraham as one who sprinkles the people for purification from sin (Barn. 8.3-4; cf. Num 19), which means that he was one who preached the gospel of forgiveness* of sin and purification of the heart (Barn. 8.3).

By using the account of the angels who visit Abraham at Mamre (Gen 18) and the eschatological banquet at which Abraham is present (Mt 8:11-12), Justin argues that as Christ was with Abraham at Mamre, so Abraham will be with Christ at the eschatological banquet (Justin Dial. Tryph. 55-59).

In a response to Trypho's challenge that Justin prove the existence of another God besides the Creator, in Dialogue 56 Justin uses a number of biblical citations to prove that it was Christ who, with the two angels, appeared to Abraham under the oak at Mamre, not God the Father and Creator. In fact it was Jesus who appeared to Moses, Abraham and other Jewish ancestors (Justin Dial. Tryph. 113.4). The unbelieving Jews are not children of Abraham, for they fail to believe in the very Christ to whom Abraham bore witness.

5.4. Father Abraham. Marcion* sought to exclude Abraham from God's promised inheritance (Irenaeus Haer. 4.8.1); given Marcion's antipathy toward all things Jewish, this is not surprising. Irenaeus responded by reasoning that those who disallow the salvation of Abraham and assume that it was another God who made promises to Abraham, presumably as Marcion did, are themselves outside of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) because it is Abraham's seed who receive the adoption and inheritance promised to Abraham. By the time of Irenaeus, proof-texts from the NT were being offered to show Abraham as the father of the Christian faith (Rom 4:3; Mt 8:11; Lk 13:28).

5.5. Abraham and the Afterlife. Irenaeus alludes to a passage in which Marcion states that the unbelieving souls of Abraham's progeny and implicitly also of Abraham remained in Hades (Irenaeus Haer. 1.27.3). Marcion further separates Abraham from inheritance in Christ by placing him in Hades as one who refused salvation.

In the Apocalypse of Peter, Peter takes a detour from hell* and proceeds to the mount of the transfiguration. Abraham is one of the righteous fathers who are in a heavenly plane described as a garden that was "full of fair trees and blessed fruits" (Apoc. Peter, Ethiopic Recension, 16). This description resembles the description of the garden of Eden (Gen 1:29; 2:8-9).

In citing Matthew 8:11-12, relating to the patriarchal eschatological banquet, Justin emphasizes the judgment* of the Jews who are no longer the children of God but are cast out into darkness (Justin Dial. Tryph. 76; see Light and Darkness) because of their unbelief. The Gentiles who believe in Christ and who repent will receive the inheritance with the patriarchs (Justin Dial. Tryph. 26.1; cf. 130.2).

Thus the Jews will be damned by God at the end of time, while the believing Gentiles will share in the eschatological banquet with Abraham, other patriarchs and the prophets. Siker states, "There is no clearer indication of the Jews' status as a disinherited people than Justin's appeal to Matthew 8:11-12" (Siker, 183).

5.6. The Virtuous Abraham. Clement (see Clement of Rome) uses Abraham, who is often called "father," as an example of faith and piety. In 1 Clement 10 Abraham is called "the friend" of God (cf. 1 Clem. 17), and Clement also states that Abraham rendered obedience to God by leaving his country and family in order to inherit God's promises. It was on account of his faith and hospitality that a son was given to him in his old age and also that in exercising his obedience Abraham offered Isaac as a sacrifice to God (1 Clem. 31).

See also ANCESTORS; CIRCUMCISION; HEBREWS; MOSES; PROMISE; STEPHEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. W. Attridge, Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); W. Baird, "Abraham in the New Testament: Tradition and the New Identity," Int 42 (1988) 367-79; N. L. Calvert, Early Jewish Traditions of Abraham: Implications for Pauline Texts (JSNTS; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, forthcoming); H. Conzelmann, The Acts of the Apostles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); N. A. Dahl, "The Story of Abraham in Luke-Acts" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (Nashville: Abingdon, 1966) 139-58; M. Dibelius, James: A Commentary on the Epistle of James (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); E. Ferguson, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York: Garland, 1990); D. Harrington, "Pseudo-Philo: A New Translation and Introduction" in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (2 vols.; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1988); J. B. Polhill, Acts: An Exegetical and Theological Exposition of Holy Scripture (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); W. Schneemelcher, ed., New Testament Apocrypha (2 vols.; Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1989); J. S. Siker, Disinheriting the Jews: Abraham in Early Christian Controversy (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); J. Swetnam, Jesus and Isaac: A Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews in Light of the Aqedah (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1981); A. L. Williams, Justin Martyr: The Dialogue with Trypho (New York: SPCK, 1930). N. Calvert-Koyzis

ABYSS. See HELL, ABYSS, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT

ACTS OF ANDREW. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

ACTS OF JOHN. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

ACTS OF PETER. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

ACTS OF PETER AND THE TWELVE APOSTLES. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

The Acts of the Apostles is the fifth book in the NT canon,* located between collections of Gospels and letters.* Although it is not the first Christian or NT document to have incorporated an interest in narrative history, together with the Gospel of Luke it is the earliest example of Christian historiography.

1. The Genre of Acts
2. The Text of Acts
3. The Speeches in Acts
4. The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts
5. The Theology and Purpose of Acts

1. The Genre of Acts.

Particularly because of the content of Acts as well as the nature of the prefaces to Luke-Acts (Lk 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-3; cf. Josephus Ag. Ap. 1.1 §§1-5; 2.1 §§1-2), Acts has long been understood as the first example of Christian historiography. Following the influential work of H. J. Cadbury early in the twentieth century, study of Acts has until recently identified the work within the genre of ancient historiography. Questions about the historical veracity of the narrative of Acts, combined with ongoing reassessments of Acts within the context of the literature of Jewish and Greco-Roman antiquity, have opened to a lively discussion the problem of the genre of Acts. Consequently Acts has been located within each of the three primary genres of the Roman world—historiography, the novel and biography.

1.1. Acts: Novel? Biography? Scientific Treatise? Ancient Historiography? Those scholars with doubts about the classification of Acts as historiography have tended to maximize the formal discrepancies between the Lukan prefaces and those of Hellenistic historiography, contended that the preface to the Third Gospel does not intend the narrative of Acts and/or argued that because Acts is not reliable as a historical account it should not be seen as an example of the genre of ancient historiography.

R. I. Pervo, for example, maintains that Acts is an ancient historical novel written with the purpose of entertaining and edifying its readers. In making his case Pervo caricatures some of the more radical studies of Acts (e.g., Haenchen) as demonstrating that Luke was a "bumbling and incompetent" historian but a "brilliant and creative" writer. The problem with this characterization of Luke, according to Pervo, is that it wrongly assumes that Acts is intended as history. If one recognizes Acts as historical fiction, he observes, then the impasse is breached and Acts can be read for what it is rather than what it fails to achieve. Pervo correctly acknowledges the humor and wit of Acts but is unable to squeeze all of Acts into the mold demanded by esthetic delight. Even those formal features that Acts shares with the novel are not peculiar to ancient novels; in his second-century treatise on How to Write History, Lucian advised historians to give their audiences "what will interest and instruct them" (§53).

Potentially more useful is the identification of (Luke-)Acts as "biography," since ancient biographers, like historians, dealt with people who actually lived and events that actually took place. However, the narrative of Acts is manifestly not focused on the performance of one person, so it can hardly be pressed into the biographical genre. C. H. Talbert has tried to overcome this obstacle in his proposal that Luke-Acts is a biographical "succession narrative," analogous to Diogenes Laertius's Lives of the Philosophers (mid-third century A.D.). These biographies, he proposes, more or less conform to a threefold format: the life of the founder, a description of the community of his followers and a précis of the teachings* of the community in its contemporary form. Accordingly Luke's first volume, the Third Gospel, highlights the life of Jesus (founder), with Acts concentrating on the deeds and teachings of his followers. D. E. Aune has criticized this approach, questioning the existence of any such genre and noting the significant discrepancies between the respective functions of Laertius's Lives and Acts (Aune, 78-79). Moreover, Luke signals his interest not so much in particular people as in "events" (Lk 1:1-4); and the two parts of Luke's work are held together more basically by the overarching redemptive purpose (see Redemption) of God* than by the life* of one or more individuals, as would be expected in a biography. That Luke has been influenced in his writing by features of the genre of biography is clear (cf. Barr and Wentling), even if Acts cannot simply be identified as a specimen of the ancient biographical genre.

A different approach has been followed by L. C. A. Alexander, who draws attention to the formal differences between Luke's preface (Lk 1:1-4) and those of the Greek historiographers. Luke's preface seems too brief, consisting of only one sentence, as compared with the more elaborate openings of Greek historians; the transition from Luke's preface to the narrative itself is surprisingly abrupt; unlike others, Luke does not engage in explicit criticism of his predecessors; Luke's preface exhibits such a personal style, with its first-person pronouns and dedication, that it has seemed inappropriate for inclusion in the genre of "dispassionate and timeless historiography"; and Luke's opening offers no general moral reflections, common among Greek historians. Such problems led Alexander to a reassessment of the literary map of Greek preface writing, with the result that she finds the closest analogues to Luke 1:1-4 and Acts 1:1 in the "scientific tradition"—that is, technical and professional writing on medicine, mathematics, engineering, and the like. Alexander proposes that Luke's narrative presentation of Jesus and the early Christian movement is scientific in the sense that it is concerned to pass on the tradition of accumulated teaching on this subject.

The affinities between Luke and the scientific tradition do not negate the identification of Luke 1:1-4 and Luke-Acts with historiography, however. First, that Luke-Acts does not match in every instance the formal features of Greco-Roman historiography presents no immediate problem, for the genre itself was easily manipulated. What is more, Luke has been influenced as well by OT and Jewish historiography, especially with respect to the use of historical sequences to shape a narrative theology (see, e.g., Hall, Soards, Sterling), and Luke's predecessors in Israelite and Jewish historiography did not reflect on their aims and procedures within the context of the writing itself. Moreover, in describing his work as diēgēsis ("narrative," Lk 1:1), Luke identifies his project as a long narrative account of many events, for which the chief prototypes were the early Greek histories of Herodotus and Thucydides (cf. Hermogenes Progymnasmata 2; Lucian How to Write History §55). Further, numerous components of Luke's work—symposia, travel narratives, letters, speeches—support a positive comparison of Luke's work with Greco-Roman historiography.

A number of recent studies have strengthened the earlier consensus that Acts is an example of the genre of ancient historiography. For example, viewing Acts in the context of descriptions of Hellenistic, Israelite and Hellenistic Jewish historiography, Aune concludes that "Luke was an eclectic Hellenistic Christian who narrated the early history of Christianity from its origins in Judaism with Jesus of Nazareth through its emergence as a relatively independent religious movement open to all ethnic groups" (Aune, 138-39); this qualifies Luke-Acts as belonging to the genre of "general history." G. L. Sterling, however, argues that Acts belongs to a type of history whose narratives "relate the story of a particular people by deliberately hellenizing their native traditions" (Sterling, 374). Other subgenres (e.g., historical monograph and political history) have also been proposed. Critical work in historiography has begun to underscore the apologetic role of all historiography (see 1.2 below), and this is the case with Acts, written to defend the unfolding of the divine purpose, from Israel* to the life and ministry* of Jesus to the early church* with its inclusion of Gentile* believers as full participants, and thus to legitimate the Christian movement of which Luke himself was a part.

1.2. Historiography and Historicism. In what sense, though, is it appropriate to refer to the narrative of Acts as history? What are we to make of the denial of Acts as historiography on the basis of its alleged duplicity in historical matters? Two points merit reflection. First, an attempt to present material in the generic framework of historiography is no guarantee of historical veracity; choice of genre and quality of performance are separate issues. Hence, even if more radical critics are correct in their indictments of Acts as poor history, this would not be tantamount to excluding a generic identification of Acts as historiography.

At the same time it must be admitted that such indictments against Luke as a historian are not so firmly based as is sometimes claimed. (1) Although study of Acts as history continues to be plagued by a relative dearth of corroborative evidence, whether literary or physical, recent examination of that evidence by C. J. Hemer has encouraged a much more positive assessment of the historical reliability of Acts (see also Hengel). (2) The sometimes spectacular accounts of healing in Acts (e.g., Acts 5:15; 19:11-12) have given some scholars pause in accepting the whole as an historically faithful account. However, in the wake of postmodern epistemology and in light of increasing criticism of the biomedical paradigm for making sense of non-Western accounts of healing (see, e.g., Hahn), such miraculous phenomena—previously understood as expressions of duplicity, mental pathology, superstition, fantasy and/or a prescientific worldview—are not so easily dismissed and have begun to be reexamined for their sociohistorical significance.

Second, Acts has too often been and continues in some quarters to be evaluated as historiography on the basis of modernist, positivistic canons—that is, on the basis of criteria that have themselves been made problematic and are anachronistic with reference to Luke as historiographer (see, e.g., Green 1996, Krieger, White, Stock). The central problem on which the debate on Luke the historian has typically turned has had much less to do with the nature of Luke-Acts than with modern, problematic conceptions of the historian's enterprise and with the concomitant, absurd divorce of event from interpretation. The view of the last two centuries, that historical inquiry is interested in establishing that certain events took place and in objectively reporting those facts, is being eclipsed by a conception of the historiographical project in which Luke would have found himself more at home. The primary question is not, How can the past be accurately captured? or What methods will allow the recovery of what actually happened? for it is increasingly recognized that historiography is always teleological. It imposes significance on the past by its choice of events to record and to order as well as by its inherent efforts to postulate for those events an end and/or origin. The emphasis thus shifts from validation to signification, so the issue is, How is the past being represented? Luke's concern with truth or certainty (see Lk 1:4) resides in his narrative interpretation of the past.

Identification of Acts as ancient historiography adds to the expectations we may bring to the narrative. Alongside those raised by Luke's professed intentions (Lk 1:1-4), we may anticipate a narrative in which recent history is given prominence, issues of both causation and teleology are accorded privilege and determined research is placed in the service* of persuasive and engaging instruction.

2. The Text of Acts.

Textual criticism of Acts presents a special quandary because of the existence of two primary and disparate textual types, the Alexandrian (A B C 81) and the Western (esp. Codex Bezae Cantabrigiensis [D]). The book of Acts in the Western tradition is almost 10 percent longer than the Alexandrian, and the character of each of these two textual types is distinctive. The essential question is, Whence the Western text? Is it the product of a studied recension of Acts? If so, can this effort be assigned a particular provenance? Or does the Western text bear witness* to an ongoing process of emendation? Is the Western text thoroughly secondary to the Alexandrian textual type? Can it be traced back to the hand of the Third Evangelist himself? Or does it display an amalgam of more or less original and secondary readings that must be considered (according to the eclectic method of textual criticism) on a case-by-case basis? In the history of research on the text of Acts, several related proposals have continued to surface (see the surveys in Strange, 1-34; Barrett, 2-29).

As early as the late seventeenth century it was suggested that Luke was responsible for two recensions of Acts and that this explains the existence of the two major text types. This view has gained new momentum since the onset of redaction criticism in the twentieth century as a result of the detection of alleged Lukanisms in the Western versions. It is represented today by M.-É. Boismard and A. Lamouille, who postulate two authentically Lukan versions of Acts, of which Codex Bezae (D) and Codex Vaticanus (B) are the best, though not unsullied, representatives; in their view the Western text type stems from the first edition of Acts while the Alexandrian reflects Luke's later, revised perspective. With this view one may compare the work of W. A. Strange; he believes that Acts was published posthumously by editors who left two versions of Acts now represented by the two manuscript types.

In spite of theories of this nature, most scholars continue to contend that the witnesses of the so-called Western tradition do not contain something approximating the original text of Acts and to deny that with the Western tradition we have access to a revision, primary or secondary, from the hand of the Third Evangelist. Agreeing with such earlier work as that of Martin Dibelius (84-92), they assume that while the Western text has no claim to originality, it may contain superior readings at some points.

Although there remains little agreement on the nature of the original text of Acts, it remains true that most study of Acts continues to proceed on the basis of the relative superiority of the Alexandrian text type. In some cases the Western text type is neglected, on the supposition that it represents a deliberate and sustained revision of the book of Acts; in others Western-type readings are considered on a case-by-case basis. Given this unsettled state of affairs, we may hope that calls for the production of a critical edition of the text of Acts will be heeded (Osburn).

3. The Speeches in Acts.

Among the narrative elements that abound in Acts, the speeches are especially conspicuous, both in the narrative itself as well as on the landscape of the past century of scholarly work on Acts. Many of these are missionary speeches, delivered to both Jewish and Gentile audiences. These would include such important sermons as those delivered by Peter at Pentecost* (Acts 2:14-40) and by Paul at Pisidian Antioch* (Acts 13:16-41); these speeches play programmatic roles within their narrative cotexts. This category of speeches, the missionary sermons, has been at the center of scholarly debate: How accurately has Luke reproduced early Christian missionary discourse? Other speeches have important roles within the narrative, however, including Stephen's* defense speech to the Jerusalem council (Acts 7:2-53), Paul's farewell address to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:18-35), Paul's forensic addresses before Roman officials (e.g., Acts 24:10-21; 26:2-23), addresses by Peter and James at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:7-11, 13-21), and so on. Of approximately 1,000 verses in Acts, 365 are found in major and minor speeches and dialogues (Soards, 1), with direct address responsible for more than half of the book.

3.1. The Debate over Sources and Tradition. The agenda for the modern study of the speeches in Acts was set by the work of Dibelius, first published in 1949 (ET 1956). He sought to locate the speeches of Acts within the matrix of ancient historiography, where, he insisted, the speech was "the natural complement of the deed" (Dibelius, 139). Accordingly the chief question was not the transcription of a particular address but the aim of a speech in the hands of the historiographer—that is, within the historical writing as a whole. A speech might impart to the reader insight into the total situation of the narrative, interpretive insight into the historical moment, insight into the character of a speaker, and/or insight into general ideas that might explain situation. Additionally a speech might advance the action of the account (Dibelius, 139-40). But the inclusion of speeches in historical writing would not constitute any claim for the historicity of the address itself. In his examination of the speeches in Acts, Dibelius was concerned with its function in the book as a whole.

With the hegemony of diachronic approaches to NT study in general, subsequent study of the speeches of Acts remembered Dibelius mostly for his view that the speeches were Lukan compositions (see esp. Haenchen). Even though practically no one would claim that the addresses in Acts are verbatim representations of what was said, it is with reference to just such categories that the debate on their historicity has typically been framed. On the basis of what have now been shown to be largely specious arguments, scholars have referred to consistency of language and style from speech to speech and from indirect to direct discourse, and consistency of content from speech to speech, in order to deny their historicity.

Viewed primarily as a traditio-historical problem, the speeches of Acts have been studied for their historicity. With few exceptions (e.g., Bruce 1942), such examinations have led to largely negative conclusions, even if on matters of detail the handprint of apostolic tradition might be discerned here and there (e.g., Acts 13:38-39; 20:28, where Pauline-type categories are found). Most scholars have concluded that the speeches in Acts are Lukan in composition, typically with little if any traditional basis, and that they serve primarily as instruments of discourse from the author of Acts to his audience (see esp. Wilckens).

Until recently scholarship has not taken as seriously as it might that by "composition" Dibelius pointed not only to "Lukan invention" but also and fundamentally to Lukan artistry. With the rise of interest in narrative* and rhetorical* criticisms, however, some interpreters have begun largely to disregard questions of tradition and history and to examine how the setting and elements of each speech are deployed so as to portend the importance of each speech as an action in the unfolding narrative (see Neyrey 1984, Tannehill 1991, Soards).

An important reexamination of speech writing in ancient historiography by C. H. Gempf has surfaced a via media that moves beyond the impasse of these conflicting paradigms of study. Gempf insists that the principal question relevant to ancient historiography is not, Is it accurate or inaccurate in its representation of this speech? thus producing a false either-or choice or a continuum concerned primarily with faithfulness to an alleged source. Instead ancient writers sought to achieve a twofold balance between artistic and historical appropriateness. This is because speeches are included in narrative representations of history not to provide a transcript of what was spoken on a given occasion but to document the speech event itself. Historiographers (like Luke) would be concerned, therefore, with composing speeches that would cohere with the work as a whole in terms of language, style and content (the literary dimension) and that would not be regarded as anachronistic or out of character with what was known of the person to whom the speech was attributed (the socio-historical dimension).

In other words, contra the modern consensus in the discussion on tradition and sources in the speeches of Acts, literary aspirations do not preclude historical value, and the presence of Lukan style and theology in the speeches of Acts does not lead necessarily to the inference that these speeches are Lukan in origin. With respect to historical appropriateness the issue is not narrowly defined in terms of accuracy; instead the writer would compose a speech in keeping with what could be known of the historical data available to him.

3.2. The Role of the Speeches.

3.2.1. A Unified Worldview. As has often been demonstrated, one can discern a pattern in the missionary speeches of Acts: appeal for hearing, including a connection between the situation and the speech; christological* kerygma* supported with scriptural proof; the offer of salvation*; and often the interruption of the sermon by the audience or by the narrator himself. Taken as a whole the speeches in Acts by followers of Jesus evidence a kerygma that is overwhelmingly christocentric but that also features a medley of reoccurring motifs, including the centrality of Jesus' exaltation* (i.e., resurrection* and/or ascension*), together with its salvific effect; repentance* and/or forgiveness* of sins; the universal offer of salvation; the Holy Spirit*; and, frequently through scriptural interpretation, the assurance* that the message of this salvation is the manifestation of the divine will.

As we would expect, each of these motifs is integral to Luke's theology (see 5 below), but this does not render the speeches in Acts as simply a collective deposit of Lukan thought. Where comparative material is available, close examination will indicate how the speeches of Acts have struggled to hold in tension the sometimes competing aims of speech writing in historiography, literary and socio-historical faithfulness. These instances of repetition within the narrative of Acts demonstrate more particularly Luke's concern to advance through these speeches a distinct (though not at all points distinctive) view of God's purpose. This perspective is then propagated by each of the major figures who serve as witnesses to redemption in Acts.

3.2.2. Performative Utterances. It would not be appropriate in every case to catalog these addresses as commentary, even if, as deliberate pauses in the action, they possess an interpretive function. Instead the speeches often have performative roles; they advance the action of the narrative as they provide the logic and impetus for further developments in the realization of the narrative aim of Luke-Acts. The speeches of Stephen and Peter in Acts 7:2-53 and Acts 10:34-43 (and Acts 11:5-17), for example, appear at crucial junctures, pushing the narrative beyond Jerusalem* and Judea to Samaria* and to "the end of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

3.2.3. "Revealed History." Paul's sermon at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16-41) exemplifies a common concern of the speeches in Acts to locate historical events in an interpretive web by splicing together in one narrative thread the past, present and future of God's salvific activity. In this perspective the meaning of historical data is not self-evident but must be interpreted, and legitimate interpretation is a product of divine revelation* (cf. Hall). Paul's speech moves deliberately and naturally from divine activity in the OT to the work of John and Jesus to the need for present response, thus providing christological interpretations of the Scriptures and of history.

3.2.4. Acts as Witness. The sheer amount of the narrative given over to speeches when compared with other exemplars of ancient historiography (or biography or novel) is suggestive of another narrative role for the speeches in Acts. Combined with the fact that in Acts speeches are typically given by witnesses or for or against the witness, this suggests that via the speeches Luke himself is giving witness, relating "all that God had done with them" (Acts 14:27). "In Luke-Acts, speeches are an essential feature of the action itself, which is the spread of the word of God" (Aune, 125).

4. The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts.

4.1. Luke-Acts, or Luke and Acts. Since Cadbury fixed the hyphen between Luke and Acts early in the twentieth century, the relationship between these two books has been more assumed than explored. The canonical separation of the two notwithstanding, until recently most scholars have assumed that the Third Gospel and Acts shared the same author, genre and a common theological perspective and that the narrative of Acts was written as the calculated continuation of the narrative of the Gospel. Such assumptions have been called into question by M. C. Parsons and Pervo (1993), among others. Although they agree that Luke and Acts share authorship, they question whether these two books belong to the same genre, are theologically harmonious and together embody one continuous narrative.

The issues raised by Parsons and Pervo are important if only because their central observation is correct: the unity of Luke-Acts has been more assumed than justified and explored. But their arguments are difficult to sustain.

Because scholarship has not reached a consensus on the generic identification of Luke and Acts, Parsons and Pervo conclude that Luke and Acts do not share unity at the level of genre. This discussion begs important questions: Given the fluidity of generic forms in antiquity, why must one work for the high level of precision on which this rejection of generic unity depends? With respect to the Third Gospel, why must we assume Luke worked with constraints related to an evolving Gospel genre? Could Luke not be setting out to do something for which previous models or forms proved inadequate? And the possible analogues for serial volumes using multiple genres posed by the authors (e.g., 1-4 Kingdoms and 1-2 Maccabees) are hardly material, given our understanding of the composition and unity of those books.

Further, Parsons and Pervo deny narrative unity by positing the potential identification of two different (textually constructed) narrators, one for Luke, the other for Acts—this in spite of the fact that the application of narratology to even one of these books surfaces multiple narrators and levels of narration (Kurz). Nor do the authors deal constructively with the possible claim of the narrator of Luke 1:1-4 to have been of the circle of those ("us") among whom (some of) these events "have been fulfilled" (cf. the "we passages" in Acts, 4.5 below). Nor do they raise the possibility that Luke and Acts share a single narrative purpose and that in this lies their essential narrative unity.

Along more constructive lines it is important to note that the division of Luke-Acts into two volumes does not signify that one account had ended and a new one begun or that volume 2 would turn to a different subject matter. Rather, as a matter of physical expediency ancient authors divided their lengthy works into "books," each of which fit on one papyrus roll. The maximum length of a papyrus roll extended to thirty-five feet, and Luke's two volumes, the two longest books in the NT, would have each required a full papyrus roll.

Moreover, in size the two are roughly equivalent—the Gospel with about 19,400 words, Acts with approximately 18,400 words—so that they would have required papyrus rolls of about the same length. Thus the division between Luke and Acts conformed to the desire of contemporary writers to keep the size of their books symmetrical (cf. Diodorus 1.29.6; 1.41.10; Josephus Ag. Ap. 1.35 §320). In other ways too the plan of Luke and Acts suggests a purposeful proportionality. Both narratives begin in Jerusalem; the Gospel ends and Acts begins with commission narratives associated with reports of Jesus' ascension; the time span covered by each volume is approximately thirty years; Luke's narration of Jesus' last days in Jerusalem (Lk 19:28—24:53) and of Paul's arrest, trials and arrival in Rome* (Acts 21:27—28:31) each occupy 25 percent of their respective books; and Luke has regularly developed parallels between Jesus in the Gospel of Luke and his disciples in the Acts of the Apostles.

Further, though Parsons and Pervo do not consider this question in their 1993 work, Luke 1:1-4 serves as a prologue for the whole of Luke's work, two volumes, Luke-Acts. This is suggested by the parallel between the primary and recapitulatory prefaces in Luke-Acts and Josephus's Against Apion. In addition Acts 1:1 not only refers to a "first book" but also denotes as the subject of that first book "all that Jesus began to do and to teach." This is a transparent summary of the Third Gospel, which continues the characteristic Lukan emphasis on the inseparable connection of word and deed. With the term began, this summary suggests a continuation of the mission of Jesus, an expectation that is not disappointed, for Jesus' followers "call on his name" (e.g., Acts 2:21; 9:21; 15:17; 18:15; 22:16)—a name* that signifies the continuing presence of Jesus to bring wholeness of life (e.g., Acts 3:6, 16; 4:7, 10, 12, 17, 30; 8:12; 9:15, 34; 10:43; 16:18). The Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles narrate one continuous story (see Augustine De Cons. 4.8), therefore, and the phrase "the events that have been fulfilled among us" (Lk 1:1-4) refers both to the story of Jesus and to the activity of the early church.

The Gospel of Luke thus anticipates the Acts of the Apostles, and it also authorizes the narrative of the Acts, with Acts both continuing the narrative of God's mighty acts of salvation begun with the births of John and Jesus (Lk 1—2) and at the same time showing how the significance of the Jesus story might be worked out and articulated for changing times (Korn). Acts thus builds on the foundation established in Luke, demonstrating the ongoing relation of the church to the Jesus event by interpreting the significance of Jesus for a new day.

The narrative unity of Luke-Acts has important implications for our reading of Luke's work. Most significantly it requires that our understanding of Luke's purpose in writing and thus our understanding of the need(s) and audience he addressed account for all the evidence, both the Gospel and Acts. Similarly it is critical that we understand that incidents in the Gospel anticipate aspects of the story narrated only (finally) in Acts. Notably, in Luke 2:25-35 Simeon realizes that in this child Jesus a salvation has come that will be experienced as "a light for revelation to the Gentiles" (Lk 2:32), but during his ministry as recorded in the Gospel of Luke, Jesus interacts only rarely with non-Jews. One must wait for Acts to see how the Gentile mission is begun, legitimated and takes firm shape at the behest of God and as guided and empowered by the Holy Spirit. The last chapter of the Gospel closes off significant aspects of the story's plot, but there is a more overarching intent at work, the redemptive purpose of God for all people. Seen against this purpose, the Gospel of Luke is incomplete in itself, for it opens up possibilities in the narrative cycle that go unrealized in the Gospel but materialize in the Acts of the Apostles.

4.2. Luke, Acts and the New Testament Canon. The unity of Luke-Acts—two volumes, one story—easily escapes the modern reader in large part due to the canonical placement of these two books in the NT. Although the Gospel and Acts may have been completed and made available to the wider public separately, in the second century A.D. the Gospel of Luke came to be located with the other Gospels so as to form the fourfold Gospel. Not surprisingly, then, Luke's first volume has come to be thought of primarily as a Gospel. It is worth reflecting on the probability that in Luke's day no such literary form existed, however, so that we would be amiss to think either that Luke set out to write a Gospel or that his readership would have understood his work within this category. Luke refers to his predecessors as "narratives," not as "Gospels," and there is no a priori reason to imagine that Luke's purpose was to write a story of Jesus to which he later appended an account of the early church. Rather, the narrative he wished to relate developed naturally and purposefully from the story of Jesus' earthly ministry to that of the continuation of Jesus' mission through the early church.

Nevertheless, according to the logic of the canonical placement of Acts, Luke's second volume rests in an interpretive relationship with the Pauline letters. In fact early lists of NT books usually situated Acts sometimes before, sometimes after the Pauline corpus. Presumably as a bridge from the story of Jesus to the ministry of Paul, Acts was eventually located in its present position between the Gospels and the letters. The consequence of its location in the canon is that Acts came to provide a sequential, biographical and missionary framework within which to fit the Pauline letters—a framework that is presumed in most biblical study even though critical scholarship has surfaced important tensions between the portraits of Paul and his mission available to us in Acts and in his letters.

4.3. Luke-Acts: One Narrative Aim. A conclusion for the unity of Luke-Acts has as its immediate consequence the rejection of any proposed purpose for Luke's writing that does not account for the evidence of both volumes. Although the primary purpose of Acts may have as its corollary, for example, a defense of Paul (as has been argued), this formulation does not grapple fully with the whole of Luke-Acts. A conclusion for the narrative unity of Luke-Acts would presuppose that the whole could be examined as the unfolding of one continuous narrative cycle moving from anticipation to narrative possibilities to probabilities to actualities to consequences and serving one primary narrative aim.

If we view Luke-Acts on the large canvas of narrative analysis, it is possible to see in its entirety one narrative aim unfolding in a simple narrative cycle. In it we see the working out of one aim: God's purpose to bring salvation in all of its fullness to all (Green 1994, 62-63). This aim is anticipated by the angelic* and prophetic* voices that speak on God's behalf (Lk 1:5--2:52). It is made possible by the birth and growth of John and Jesus in households that honor God. According to the Lukan birth narrative, though, this is not an aim that will be reached easily or without opposition. Not all will respond favorably to God's agent of salvation, Jesus, resulting in antagonism, division and conflict. The realization of God's aim is made probable through the preparatory mission of John and the life, death and exaltation of Jesus, with its concomitant commissioning and promised empowering of Jesus' followers to extend the message to all people (Lk 3—Acts 1). Jesus himself prepares the way for this universal mission by systematically dissolving the barriers that predetermine and have as their consequence division between ethnic groups, men and women, adults and children, rich and poor, righteous and sinner, and so on. In his ministry even conflict is understood within the bounds of God's salvific purpose, Jesus' death as a divine necessity, his exaltation a vindication of his ministry and powerful act of God making possible the extension of salvation to Jew and Gentile alike.

The subsequent story in Acts consists of a narration of the realization of God's purpose, particularly in Acts 2—15, as the Christian mission is directed by God to take the necessary steps to achieve a community of God's people composed of Jews, Samaritans and Gentiles. The results of this narrative aim (Acts 16—28) highlight more and more Jewish antagonism to the Christian movement, and the church appears more and more to be Gentile in makeup. This too is God's purpose, according to the narrator, speaking above all through his spokesperson Paul (and through Paul, the Scriptures), even if efforts among the Jewish people at interpreting Moses* and the prophets as showing the Messiah is Jesus should continue.

4.4. Acts 1:8 and the Outline of the Book of Acts. The story related in Acts begins in Jerusalem and ends in Rome, with the plan of the book thus giving form to the centrifugal shape of the mission it recounts. It would not be unusual for a Hellenistic writer of sequential books to provide in a second or subsequent book a preface that includes a summary of the former and outline of the present book. Many readers of Acts have found in Jesus' words in Acts 1:8—"Rather, you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes upon you, and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, in all Judea and Samaria, and to the end of the earth"—a summary outline of Acts. Many who see an outline of the book in Acts 1:8 further identify "the end of the earth" as Rome. Although Jesus' words may be taken as the outline of Acts, albeit in a superficial sense, this identification of Rome as "the end of the earth" is almost certainly mistaken.

Acts 1:8 relates Jesus' response to the disciples' question about the restoration of the kingdom* to Israel. Jesus does not replace a parochial, nationalistic hope* for the restoration of Israel's dominion with a universal mission as much as he sets the future of Israel within the now more widely defined plan of God. Jesus' references to a mission in Jerusalem, Judea (i.e., "the land of the Jews"—cf. Lk 4:44; Acts 10:37; see Land) and Samaria represent significant progress in this direction and portend the development of the mission in Acts 2—8.

Beyond Samaria the Spirit-endowed mission was to continue to "the end of the earth." Various options have been championed for making sense of the phrase heōs eschatou tēs gēs. Some regard it as a geographical location: Ethiopia, Spain, Rome, or even the "Land [of Israel]." Others find in it a more symbolic reference to a universal mission including the Gentiles—that is, a mission to the whole world.*

That Luke must have had in view in Acts 1:8 a purely geographical connotation (as is often emphasized) can hardly be sustained, for space is never measured in purely geographical terms but is always imbued with symbolic power. Geography—and especially such geographical markers as "Judea" and "Samaria"—is not a "naively given container" but rather a social production that both reflects and configures being in the world. Note, for example, the identification of "Jerusalem" as the location of the temple* and abode of God in Jewish and Lukan perspective and the religious sensibilities that would have been transgressed by this juxtaposition of "Judea" (land of the Jews) and "Samaria" (land of the Samaritans; cf. Lk 10:30-37; 17:11-19). Nor is it necessary to restrict the referent of this phrase to a location within the narrative of Acts; other possibilities generated within the narrative are left unfulfilled at its close (other examples of external prolepsis include Paul's execution and Jesus' Parousia*).

Nor does Luke ever identify Rome as the mission's final point; Rome may serve as nothing more than a new point of departure for the mission, like Jerusalem and Antioch earlier in the story. Moreover, even in Acts "witnesses" precede Paul to Rome, so that Acts 27—28 brings Paul, not the gospel, to Rome.

Although in the literature of Greco-Roman antiquity the meaning of the phrase "the end of the earth" was used to refer to Spain, Ethiopia, and so on, one must inquire into how this phrase functions in this cotext. At this juncture in Acts, the meaning of "the end of the earth" is polysemous—that is, we have been given almost nothing by way of interpretive guidelines for identifying the referent of this phrase. As a result one may read through the narrative inquiring at multiple points, Is this "the end"? (And if so, will God's dominion now be realized?) Greek usage elsewhere allows for such open-endedness (cf. Strabo Geog.). But these various interpretive possibilities are narrowed considerably upon reading Acts 13:47, with its citation of Isaiah 49:6, where the phrase "the end of the earth" is again found but with the sense more transparent: "everywhere," "among all peoples," "across all boundaries." Luke's evident dependence on the Isaianic eschatological* vision* elsewhere provides corroborative evidence for the conclusion that the narrative encourages an identification of "the end of the earth" with a mission to all peoples, Jew and Gentile. This underscores the redemptive-historical continuity between this text and its Isaianic pre-text (also Is 8:9; 45:22; 48:20; 62:11; cf. Deut 28:49; Ps 134:6-7; Jer 10:12; 16:19; 1 Macc 3:9).

In only a very limited sense might one take Acts 1:8 as an outline of Acts. Much more significant is the way it identifies God's aim within the narrative (and, one may presume, for the story as it extends beyond the narrative of Acts). As it clarifies God's purpose, it also gives us a measure by which to ascertain what persons within the narrative have oriented themselves fully around serving God's design. That is, those who obey the missionary program of Acts 1:8 are shown to be operating under the guidance and power* of the Spirit and thus following God's plan; they are shown to be authentic witnesses.

The importance of Acts 1:8 is not diminished if it is not regarded as framing the outline of Acts, for its statement of God's aim within the narrative has certainly left its imprint on the form of the narrative itself. One can easily follow the centrifugal shape of the mission, though sometimes the progression of the mission is less geographical and more theological, as when Jesus' witnesses return to Jerusalem in order to work out further the theological rationale for a mission that includes those "at the end of the earth" (Acts 11:1-18; 15; 21:1—26:32). Moreover, our identification of "the end of the earth" as a reference to the universal scope and not the geographical goal of the mission suggests that the story of Acts does not end with the close of the narrative in Acts 28:31. Rather, the challenge to mission reaches beyond the narrative to Luke's subsequent readers.

4.5. The Author and the Narrator of Acts. Examining Acts as a narrative raises the question of the voice through whom the story is told—that is, the identity of the narrator. An author might choose to adopt some voice other than his or her own, and in narrative theory narrators differ in how much they choose to tell, the degree of their reliability and how willing they are to intrude into the narrative itself. Narrative critics agree that the narrators of the Gospels and Acts are knowledgeable and are willing to alert their audiences to realities other than those on the surface of recounted events—e.g., the motivations of characters within the story (e.g., Acts 24:27; 25:3); that they are so reliable that their points of view are consistent with those expressed by God and God's agents within the narratives; and that they are generally unobtrusive in telling their stories. At the same time the narrator of Acts might on occasion provide an explanatory comment to his reader (e.g., Acts 9:36 [Tabitha's name in Greek is Dorcas]; 12:9 [Peter's inner thoughts]), and in Acts 16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1—28:16 (i.e., in the "we" passages) he steps into the story as a character. Today, when many scholars speak of "Luke" with reference to the hand behind Luke-Acts, they have reference to Luke as narrator, often without any necessary inference regarding the identification of the actual author of this work.

Luke-Acts, like the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and John, are anonymous documents (though see John 21:24-25), and the we passages do nothing at a literary level to alter this state of affairs. That is, even when involved in first-person narration, the narrator of Acts identifies himself not as an individual with a name but as one of a group. He is present, sometimes as a participant, other times as an observer, at some events, but his focus is not his individual identity; rather, the "we" of his narration contributes to the vividness of his account and invites his audience into active participation in the narrative. That first-person narration happens in only selected portions of the account underscores that the narrator makes no claim to being a constant companion of Paul and his circle. It also suggests, however, that first-person narration is more than a literary device calculated to enliven the narrative.

Long before the onset of narrative criticism, this last set of observations led readers of Acts to an identification of the author of Acts as Luke, Paul's fellow worker (Philem 24) and sometime companion, a physician (Col 4:11, 14; 2 Tim 4:11). Eusebius, for example, identifies the author of Acts as Luke, an Antiochene, a physician and frequent companion of Paul (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.4.1), as do Jerome (Vir. 7) and many others (see Barrett, 30-48; Fitzmyer, 1-26).

In the second century, Irenaeus identified Luke, the companion of Paul, as the author of Acts, though he also goes further, to speak of the relationship between Luke and Paul as "inseparable" (Haer. 3.1.1, 4). This latter inference lies behind critical rejection of Luke as the author of Acts since, it is alleged, the author of Acts has distorted the message of Paul and so could not have been his regular companion. But the inseparability of Luke and Paul is not a necessary inference from Acts; indeed, it is contradicted by Acts, wherein we are informed repeatedly that the narrator was part of a company whose traveling agenda overlapped with that of Paul but that did not join Paul's entourage regularly, permanently or even for lengthy periods of time.

When it is further remembered that the portrait of Paul available to us via his letters is itself tendentious, shaped by sometimes tension-filled relations with his audiences; that discussions of the incongruity between the Paul of Acts and the Paul of the Pauline correspondence have sometimes suffered from critical hyperbole; that in any case the narrator of Acts is more concerned with telling the story of the realization of God's salvific aim than with developing personalities; and that characters within Acts are more important for what they add to that story than with reference to their own stories (cf. Schwartz), then the critical concerns that have led to the denial of the identity of Luke as the author of Acts dissipate considerably.

Nevertheless, it is worth inquiring into what is at stake in the identification of the real author of Acts. That, for example, C. K. Barrett can engage in a critical reading of Acts without first deciding the issue of authorship is surely suggestive. This is all the more true when it is recalled that Luke makes no apparent attempt to assert himself into the narrative in order to serve concerns of historical veracity. Final resolution of the question of authorship would not table questions of historical accuracy, and, as we know almost nothing of the background of the historical Luke, our insisting that he is responsible for Acts adds almost nothing to our understanding of his narrative. As with the canonical Gospels, then, so with Acts: our reading proceeds best on the basis of what we are able to discern about its narrator from within the narrative itself.

5. The Theology and Purpose of Acts.

Numerous proposals for the purpose of Acts have been defended in recent scholarship, including the following:

1. Acts is a defense of the Christian church to Rome (e.g., Bruce).

2. Acts is a defense of Rome to the Christian church (Walaskay).

3. Acts is an apology for Paul against Judaizers who have sided with non-Christian Jews against Paul's notion that Christianity is the true successor to Judaism* (see Mattill and Mattill).

4. Acts is a work of edification designed to provide an eschatological corrective for a church in crisis (Conzelmann).

5. Acts is written to reassure believers struggling with the reliability of the kerygma—either with regard to its truth and relevance (e.g., van Unnik) or with respect to its firm foundation in the story of God's people (e.g., Maddox).

6. Acts was intended to assist the Christian movement in its attempts to legitimate itself over against Judaism (Esler).

7. Acts is written to encourage among Christians a fundamental allegiance to Jesus that called for a basic social and political stance within the empire (Cassidy).

In light of our earlier comments on the narrative unity of Luke-Acts, some of these can be excluded from the outset—namely, those centering on aims particular to Acts and/or Paul (i.e., 1-3)—since these do not account for the whole of the Lukan narrative. This is not immediately to deny that Luke may have had such concerns, however, for the Evangelist may have been motivated by multiple aims that might not lay a claim on the narrative as a whole.

Our understanding of the aim of (Luke-) Acts flows from our understanding of its genre and narrative aim. We have seen that the genre of Acts suggests Luke's concern with legitimation and apologetic. Our discussion of the narrative aim of Acts highlighted the centrality of God's purpose to bring salvation to all. In the conflicted world of the first-century Mediterranean, not least within the larger Jewish world, it is not difficult to see how this understanding of God's purpose and its embodiment in the Christian movement would have been the source of controversy and uncertainty. We may then propose that the purpose of Luke-Acts would have been to strengthen the Christian movement in the face of opposition by ensuring them in their interpretation and experience of the redemptive purpose of God and by calling them to continued faithfulness and witness in God's salvific project. The purpose of Luke-Acts would thus be primarily ecclesiological, centered on the invitation to participate in God's project.

Our understanding of the aim of (Luke-) Acts must also account for its primary theological emphases. Recent scholarship has repeatedly identified salvation as the primary theme of Luke-Acts, theme being understood as that which unifies other textual elements within the narrative. In order to make sense of the theme of salvation and to show the degree to which it is integrated into the overall purpose of strengthening the church (as we have just described), we must develop it within what can only be an outline of key theological motifs.

5.1. God's Purpose. The purpose or plan of God is of signal importance for Acts, and its presence behind and in the narrative is paraded in a variety of ways. This motif is present especially through a constellation of terms expressive of God's design (e.g., boulē/boulomai ["purpose/to purpose"—Acts 2:23; 4:28; 13:36; 20:27], dei ["it is necessary"—Acts 1:16, 21; 3:21; 4:12; 5:29; 9:16; 14:22; 16:30; 17:3; 19:21; 20:35; 23:11; 27:24, 26], horizō ["to determine"—Acts 2:23; 10:42; 17:26, 31]); through angels, visions and prophecies; through instances of divine choreography of events; through the employment of the Scriptures of Israel; and through the activity of the Holy Spirit.

This pronounced emphasis on the divine will is present in Acts to certify that the direction of the Christian mission is legitimate but not to eclipse human decision making and involvement in the mission. Indeed, the dramatic quality of the narrative is noticeably enhanced by the conflict engendered as some people choose to oppose the divine aim. God does not coerce people into serving his will, but neither will God's plan ultimately be derailed by opposition to it. The communication of his purpose comes as an invitation for people to align themselves with that purpose; some may refuse to do so, but others (and the invitation is to all) will embrace his will, receive the gift of salvation and join in his redemptive activity (see further Squires; Green, 1995, 22-49).

5.1.1. The Divine Purpose. Although God never enters the narrative of Acts as a character, his presence is everywhere apparent through the activity of the Holy Spirit (see 5.1.3 below) and angels and through visions and prophecies.

Through these agents and agencies, God both choreographs human encounters and events and verifies that the mission to the Gentiles is consonant with his will.

Two case studies in divine choreography (Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch, Peter and Cornelius) accompany the narration of the beginnings of the mission to the Gentiles. There is no socio-historical or narratological reason to suspect that the Ethiopian eunuch is anything but a Gentile (Acts 8:26-40). Philip's* encounter with him on the road to Gaza comes at the intersection of (1) the Ethiopian's having made pilgrimage, like many Gentiles in the ancient Mediterranean, to worship in Jerusalem; (2) his reading of a text (Is 53:7-8) that highlights the humility of the Isaianic servant and so declares the solidarity of Yahweh's servant with the eunuch in his own humble status (even though he went to worship* in Jerusalem, as a eunuch he would have been excluded from the Lord's assembly; cf. Deut 23:1; Is 56:3-5); (3) Philip's being directed by an angel of the Lord to travel on the same road, then instructed by the Spirit to join the entourage of the Ethiopian court official; (5) his being able to serve as interpreter of the Scriptures. Following the eunuch's baptism,* Philip is snatched away by the Spirit of the Lord; this divine encounter has reached its conclusion.

Philip's appointment with the eunuch may have initiated the Gentile mission, but this innovation is unknown to anyone within the narrative; Philip does not report what has happened to Jerusalem, and presumably the eunuch journeys home. Hence the encounter between Peter and Cornelius* (Acts 10:1—11:18) initiates the Gentile mission in its own way, particularly since in this case the believers in Jerusalem are included in the account. As with Philip, so with Peter, this novelty comes at God's behest, through the careful staging of visionary and angelic messages to communicate the divine purpose (Acts 10:1-16).

In both cases, but more explicitly in the latter, the importance of human volition is not diminished. Cornelius and Peter have separate divine directives, neither of which is complete in itself. According to this choreography, both persons must obey what disclosure they have received in order to understand more fully what God is working to accomplish in their encounter. As if to underscore again that the Gentile mission is God's doing, when they do follow through on God's purpose, the Holy Spirit breaks into their gathering, falling upon "all who heard the word" (Acts 10:44). This work of the autonomous Spirit is taken as the proof that the Gentile mission, together with full fellowship* between Jewish and Gentile believers, was God's purpose (Acts 11:17-18).

Angels are active elsewhere too (cf. Acts 5:19, 21; 12:7-11, 23; 18:9-20; 27:23-24), indicating the ongoing direction and providential care of God, as do visions (Acts 10:10-16; 16:6-10; 22:17-21).

5.1.2. The Scriptures of Israel. By the Scriptures of Israel, we mean the Septuagint, and especially Deuteronomy, the Psalms and Isaiah, for these are the authoritative texts that appear most in Acts. Two factors characterize the use of the Scriptures by God's spokespersons in Acts. First, characters within Acts are concerned to show that what has happened with Jesus and what is happening with the movement of those who name him as Lord* are continuous with the Scriptures. Second and inseparably related, however, is an important proviso—namely, it is not the Scriptures per se that speak authoritatively but the Scriptures as they bear witness to God's purpose, an interpretation accessible only in light of the mission, death and exaltation of Jesus of Nazareth. Hence, even if it is vital that the actions of the Christian community be grounded in Scripture, that their christological formulations be shaped in dialogue with Scripture, and that they understand the rejection of the message by some Jews and the mission to the Gentiles via scriptural precedent, the Scriptures speak authoritatively only when they are legitimately interpreted.

This suggests that the primary significance of the Scriptures in Acts is ecclesiological and hermeneutical, as the Christian community struggles with its own identity, not least over against those who also read the Scriptures but who refuse faith* in Christ. In Luke's view it is through the Scriptures that Jesus' followers should be able to confirm their status as the heirs of the Scriptures, God's people serving God's mission. The struggle with the Jewish people and with Jewish institutions in Acts is essentially hermeneutical: Who interprets the Scriptures faithfully? Or, to put it more starkly, Whose interpretation has the divine imprimatur? Whose receives divine legitimation? In Acts the answer is simple: Jesus has been accredited by God (Acts 2:22) and vindicated in his resurrection and ascension (e.g., Acts 2:23-36; 3:13-26). Those whose form of life is like his serve as his witnesses, and their charismatic preaching* includes authorized scriptural interpretation (e.g., Acts 4:8-13). The validity of their message is further validated by the signs* and wonders God does through them (Acts 14:3).

5.1.3. The Holy Spirit. If God does not explicitly appear within the narrative of Acts, his virtual stand-in is the Holy Spirit, and it is by means of the activity of the Spirit that God's purpose is known, the mission is directed and the universality of the gospel is legitimated. This is not because the Holy Spirit is for Luke the immanence of God, as is often suggested, but because the Spirit highlights God's transcendence, his freedom of purpose. Throughout Acts, the Lord's witnesses never control or possess the Spirit but attempt to catch up with the Spirit's work whose activity is often serendipitous.

Just as the Spirit had been active in and through the whole of Jesus' ministry (cf. Lk 3:21-22; 4:1, 14-15, 18-19; et al.), so the Spirit would empower the mission of the Lord's witnesses in Acts (esp. Acts 1:8). The Spirit directs the mission (e.g., Acts 13:1-4; 16:6-7) and empowers witness in word and deed. Within Acts, signs and wonders certify the presence of God in the ministry of his witnesses, legitimating the universal reach of salvation as they authenticate the message among the Gentiles (Acts 14:3; 15:12; cf. Acts 2:19, 22, 43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36; 8:6, 13).

One of the primary purposes of Luke's portrayal of the Spirit's activity is legitimation for the breaching of barriers that separate Jew and Gentile. The gift of the Spirit is one of the primary ways in which Luke articulates the content of salvation (see 5.2.2 below), and in Luke's economy of salvation those on whom the Spirit has been poured out are believers. The Spirit thus clarifies the status of believers, especially Gentiles (Acts 10:45-47; 11:15-18; 15:8).

This authorizing role of the Spirit reaches further, however. It is through the Spirit that prophets prophesy in Acts, and this verifies that their messages are grounded in the divine will. The plot of the narrative itself, behind and through which the Spirit is active, is thereby shown to be a faithful interpretation of the early Christian mission. Moreover, because Luke's presentation of the Spirit is in its essence continuous with the understanding of the Spirit in Second Temple Judaism, he portrays the Christian mission, which proceeds with the direction and empowerment of the Spirit, as the fulfillment of Israel. This is true even if in the Lukan conception the activity of the Spirit has been recast along christological lines: Spirit-empowered witness focuses on Christ, and it is through the agency of the exalted Messiah that the Spirit is poured out (Acts 2:33). As a consequence Luke's pneumatology can be viewed as providing an apologetic for God; the Spirit substantiates the direction God's purpose takes in Acts: from Israel to the life and ministry of Jesus to the early church with its inclusion of Gentile believers as full participants.

5.2. Salvation. Salvation is the principal theme of Acts, its narrative centrally concerned with the realization of God's purpose to bring salvation in all of its fullness to all people. Conflict within the narrative arises as a consequence of the division between those who embrace and serve that aim, who join the community of God's people who bear witness to God's salvific work, and those who refuse to do so (cf. Lk 2:34; on 5.2 see Green 1997).

5.2.1. God as Savior, Jesus as Savior. For Luke salvation is first and always from God. God initiates salvation, and even in the salvific activity of Jesus, God is the often silent but nonetheless primary actor. Jesus' powerful deeds are repeatedly attributed to God (Acts 2:22; 10:38). God appointed him Lord and Messiah; God glorified him, sent him, raised him and so on. Luke's soteriology is christocentric, but above all it is theocentric. (Given the strength of this emphasis, it is not surprising [contra those who find in Acts a "divine man" portrayal of the apostles and Paul] that those who align themselves with God's salvific aim in Acts are never credited with possessing the power to minister salvation. The signs and wonders that partially constitute their missionary activity are effected by God, granted by the Lord [cf., e.g., Acts 3:12, 16; 4:10, 29-30; 5:12, 38-39; 8:18-24; 14:3, 14-15; et al.].)

Nevertheless, Jesus is God's agent of salvation, the Savior (Lk 2:11; Acts 5:30-31); as Lord, Jesus is the one on whom people call for salvation. How did Jesus achieve this status? For Luke, a corollary of Jesus' being raised up is that he now administers the promise* of the Father (cf. Lk 11:13; 24:49; Acts 1:4), the gift of the Spirit—that is, salvation (Acts 2:29-36). Similarly in Acts 5:30-31 we find a straightforward affirmation that Jesus' confirmation as Savior, as the one who "gives" repentance and forgiveness, is grounded in his resurrection and ascension. As the enthroned one (Messiah), as the Benefactor of the people (Lord), the exalted Jesus now reigns as Savior, pouring out the blessings* of salvation, including the Spirit with whom he was anointed at the outset of his ministry, to all.

What then of the crucifixion of Jesus? The sheer frequency of times that we read in Acts of the divine necessity (dei) of the suffering of Jesus is warning enough that salvation has not come in spite of the crucifixion of Jesus. What is more, the specifically covenantal* language employed in Acts 20:28 (peripoieomai, "to acquire"; cf. Ex 19:5; Is 43:21) and Acts 20:32; 26:18 (hagiazō, "to sanctify"; cf. Deut 33:3) reminds us of Luke's record of Jesus' last meal with his disciples, wherein he grounds the "new covenant" in his own death (Lk 22:19-20). Although sparsely mentioned, the salvific effect of the cross* is not absent from Luke, even if it is not woven fully into the fabric of Luke's theology of the cross.

Luke's broader perspective on the suffering* of the Messiah can be outlined along three interrelated lines.

First, the rejection of Jesus by the Jewish leaders in Jerusalem leads to the widening of the mission to embrace all peoples, Jew and Gentile. Indeed, suffering and rejection foster the propagation of the word (cf. Lk 21:13-19; Acts 13:44-49; 14:1-18; 18:2-6; 28:17-29). As Luke is fond of narrating, struggle and opposition do not impede but seem to promote the progress of the gospel: "It is through many persecutions that we must enter the kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22; cf., e.g., Acts 6:1, 7; 8:1-3, 4).

Second, the passion of Jesus is paradigmatic for all of those who follow Jesus (cf. Lk 9:23; Acts 9:16). For Luke the theologia crucis is rooted not so much in a theory of the atonement but in a narrative portrayal of the life of faithful discipleship as the way of the cross.

Third, in describing Jesus' crucifixion, Acts echoes the words of Deuteronomy 21:22-23: Jesus was "hung on a tree" (Acts 5:30; 10:39; 13:29). The narrative thus signals the disgrace of Jesus' execution while at the same time it locates Jesus' death firmly in the necessity of God's purpose. The ultimate disgrace, the curse from God, is antecedent to exaltation. Thus in his suffering and resurrection Jesus embodied the fullness of salvation interpreted as status reversal; his death was the center point of the divine-human struggle over how life is to be lived, in humility or self-glorification. Though anointed by God, though righteous before God, though innocent, he is put to death. Rejected by people, he is raised up by God—and with him the least, the lost, the left out are also raised. In his death, and in consequence of his resurrection by God, the way of salvation is exemplified and made accessible to all those who will follow.

5.2.2. The Message of Salvation. Luke develops the content of salvation along five related lines.

First, salvation entails incorporation and participation in the christocentric community of God's people. These are people whose unity is emphatic in the narrative (e.g., Acts 1:14-15, 24; 14:1; cf. Acts 2:44-45; 4:32—5:11; Plato Rep. 5.46.2c; Cicero De Offic. 1.16.51; Aristotle Eth. Nic. 9.8.1168b; Josephus J.W. 2.8.3 §§122-23), who together "call on the name of the Lord [Jesus]" and are baptized in his name (Acts 2:21-22, 38; 8:16; 9:14, 21; 10:48; 19:5; 22:16); who heal* (Acts 3:6, 16; 4:10, 30; 19:13) and preach (Acts 4:12; 5:28, 40) in his name; and who suffer for his name (Acts 5:41; 9:16; 21:13).

What may be surprising is the identification of those who belong to this community. The invitation is for everyone, for "you, your children and all who are far off" (Acts 2:39; cf. Is 57:19; Acts 1:8; 2:5, 9-11, 17, 21; 10:1—11:18; et al.). By pouring upon them the blessing of forgiveness and the gift of the Spirit, God both testifies to the authenticity of the membership of Gentiles in the number of God's people and confirms that "he has made no distinction between them and us" (Acts 15:7-8; cf. 11:15-18). Jesus is Lord of all (Acts 10:43). Also "saved" are those set apart from normal social discourse by sickness and demon possession (e.g., Acts 3:1—4:12; 5:12-16; 8:7; 14:8-10). This reminds us that the Lukan soteriology knows no distinction between the physical, spiritual and social; that in the larger Greco-Roman world "salvation" would be recognized in the healing of physical disorders; and that physical restoration had as one of its ramifications restoration to social intercourse.

Second, salvation entails "rescue from our enemies" (cf. Lk 1:68-79). Salvation as divine rescue does not appear to be prominent in Acts, but there are important hints in this direction. For example, the use of Joel 2:28-32 in Acts 2 brings onto the stage apocalyptic* connotations reminding us that the coming of God signifies the downfall of those who oppose God's purpose, and elsewhere Luke employs exodus typology to characterize salvation (Acts 3:17-26; 7:25). Salvation as rescue from peril takes on concrete form elsewhere when the language of salvation is used to signify safe travel in spite of the threat of ambush (Acts 23:16-24) or storms at sea (Acts 27:31, 43—28:6) or escape from prison and mob action (cf. Acts 5:17-21; 12:1-19; 16:19-40; 19:23-41).

What of salvation from foreign domination (as anticipated in Zechariah's song)? First, although Luke does not report the dismantling of Roman overlordship, he does narrate the relativizing of the sovereignty Rome wielded, as R. J. Cassidy has suggested. More importantly for Luke, the real enemy from which deliverance is needed is not Rome but the cosmic power of evil resident and active behind all forms of opposition to God and God's people. This form of salvation—from the power of darkness, of Satan*—is prominent in Acts (e.g., Acts 26:17-18; 5:16; 13:4-12; 16:16-18; 19:8-20).

Third, salvation is forgiveness of sins. In Acts, Luke continues an emphasis on forgiveness firmly rooted in Jesus' mission according to the Third Gospel (see Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 10:43; 13:38; 15:9; 22:16; 26:18). This signals a renewed or new relationship with God but also with God's people: as sin is the means by which persons exclude themselves or are excluded from the community of God's people, so forgiveness marks their restoration to the community.

Fourth, salvation is the reception of the Holy Spirit. Peter also promises those who respond to the message that they will receive "the gift of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:38), an emphasis that will resurface repeatedly (Acts 9:17; 10:43-44; 11:15-17; 15:8). The gift of the Spirit marks persons, whether Gentile or Jew, as members of the community of God's people and thus clarifies the status of those, especially Gentiles, who believe.

Finally, the offer of salvation calls for response. The necessity of response is set forth programmatically in the narration of the Pentecost address, where Peter is interrupted by his audience: "What shall we do?" (Acts 2:37; cf. 16:30-34). What is the appropriate response to the good news of salvation? Luke addresses this question with an arsenal of possibilities—calls to believe (Acts 2:44; 3:16; 11:17; 13:39; 14:9; 15:7; 16:30-31; 18:8), to be baptized (Acts 2:41; 8:12, 36; 9:18; 10:47-48; 16:15) and to turn to God or to repent (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 11:18; 17:30; 20:21; 26:20); and other potential responses, including some that employ metaphors of illumination (e.g., Acts 26:17-18)—but singles out no particular pattern of response as paradigmatic. God has acted graciously in Christ to bring salvation to all humanity. All humanity is called to welcome the good news, to respond with receptivity and thus to share in that salvation not only as recipients but also as those who serve God's redemptive aim.

5.2.3. Eschatology. Students of Acts have long noticed that eschatological hope has not been developed within the narrative. Although the future of salvation is not missing (e.g., Acts 3:21; 7:31; 10:42), the focus has moved from the eschaton to the present. In Acts 1:6-8 Jesus reorients concerns about the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, an eschatological concern, to the importance of faithful witness in the present. This should not be taken as an attempt on Luke's part to diminish the importance of the Parousia (as Conzelmann argued); in counseling agnosticism about "the times and seasons" established by the Father (Acts 1:7), Jesus emphasizes the unpredictability of the Parousia. "Luke sought to reinforce living eschatological faith, all the while summoning his readers to vigilant, faithful service" (Carroll, 166). That is, Luke employs eschatology as a motivation for mission.

5.2.4. Judaism. The question of Luke's relationship to Jewish institutions and Jewish people is one of the most debated in Lukan studies, with some scholars arguing that Luke's theology is irretrievably anti-Jewish, others insisting that Lukan thought derives from a lively Jewish Christian church and many viewpoints falling between these poles. (For representative views see Tyson.) How does the Lukan treatment of people and things Jewish point toward Luke's overall purpose? Without engaging fully this larger debate, two observations are possible.

First, the centrality of the temple and the synagogue,* the continuous use of Israel's Scriptures, the primacy of the mission to the Jewish people—these and related phenomena within the narrative of Acts suggest the degree to which the story of the Christian community is continuous with the ancient story of God's people.

Second, however, the critical perspective on the temple and the synagogue, for example, and the contested nature of the relationship between the Christian movement and Jewish structures suggests the degree to which the Judaism with which Luke is interested is an interpreted Judaism. That is, "the religion of Israel—its institutions, practices, and so on—is to be embraced fully when understood vis-à-vis the redemptive purpose of God. But in order to be understood thus, Israel's religion must cohere with the purpose of God as articulated by God's own authorized interpretive agent, God's Son, Jesus of Nazareth" and in Acts by the Lord's witnesses who thus serve as interpretive agents (Green 1995, 75). This perspective on the question of Judaism within Acts underscores the nature of the fundamental struggle between the Christian movement and its representatives on the one hand, Judaism on the other, just as it also provides a rationale for the opposition faced by that movement.

*5.3. Discipleship. The interdependence of the Gospel of Luke and Acts is perhaps nowhere more evident than in the Lukan perspective on discipleship. Especially when compared with the other Synoptic Gospels, the Third Gospel is noteworthy for how little it has the disciples participating in Jesus' ministry. This is easily explained, since the Third Gospel can provide instruction and models for discipleship while allowing Acts to document more fully how the disciples came to serve actively in the missionary work of Jesus. Among the motifs that might be developed, two are of particular importance: economic koinonia and witness and allegiance.

5.3.1. Economic Koinonia. Throughout the Third Gospel, Jesus' message has returned again and again to undercut the determination of social relations on the basis of widespread canons of status and to affirm the redefinition of economic relations within the community of his followers. These two points address the same set of issues, since economic exchange is a function and representation of social relations. Patrons, for example, have higher status than their clients, and in their acts of benefaction they obligate others to supply them with loyalty, recognition, venerated status. Among friends and within kinship groups, however, giving and receiving need not have stipulations carried over from the patronal ethic that pervaded the empire. In these cases giving is a function not of obligations and debt but of mutuality, generosity, solidarity and need. Economic koinonia would thus grow out of, as well as symbolize, kinship.

What Jesus had called for in his Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6:27-38, esp. Lk 6:35)—dispositions of kinship giving rise to practices of material generosity—the early church is reported to practice (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32—5:11; see also Acts 6:1-6; 11:27-30). What Luke describes in the summary statements of Acts 2:44-45 and Acts 4:32-35, however, is not communitarianism, either as a requisite for belonging to the people of God or as an ideal. Instead he outlines a disposition of kinship and generosity, an orientation toward the needs of others and toward the generosity of God that characterizes the Christian community outside the normal constraints of reciprocity and the gift-obligation cycle. Accordingly Barnabas is introduced as an exemplary figure who embodied the ideal of kinship that was to characterize the whole community (Acts 4:32, 36-37). Similarly Ananias and Sapphira demonstrate by their falsehood and their choice of private ownership that they have not refused the way of patronage and status-seeking of the larger empire and so that they are not members of this new community of God's people (Acts 5:1-11).

5.3.2. Witness and Allegiance. One of the hallmarks of Luke's narrative is the consistency with which faithful witnesses attract opposition and with which opposition leads to the spread of the gospel. Exemplars include Jesus, Peter and John (e.g., Acts 4:23-31; 5:41-42), Stephen (Acts 8:1-4) and Paul (e.g., Acts 13:45-49). The conflict surrounding these key characters, whose faithfulness is underscored repeatedly by the narrator (e.g., Acts 3:14-15; 5:38-39; 6:8-10; 7:55; 25:25; 26:32; 28:17-22), portends the opposition that faithful witnesses outside the narrative, including those among Luke's audience, may also encounter in the course of the mission.

That is, opposition in the course of the church's mission should not necessarily be interpreted as a sign of misapprehension of the divine purpose. Faithfulness calls for a fundamental allegiance to Jesus as Lord, which calls for a basic social and political stance within the empire (Cassidy), and this may well generate opposition. Peter, John, Stephen and Paul may thus serve as models for Christians who in the course of the church's mission face similar struggles.

See also CORNELIUS; EVANGELISM IN THE EARLY CHURCH; GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION; HELLENISTS; MIRACLES IN ACTS; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE; NARRATIVE CRITICISM; OLD TESTAMENT IN ACTS; PAUL AND PAULINISMS IN ACTS; PENTECOST; PHILIP THE EVANGELIST; SAMARIA; SIGNS AND WONDERS; STEPHEN; TONGUES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Bibliographies: F. Bovon, Luke the Theologian: Thirty-Three Years of Research (1950-83) (PTMS 12; Allison Park, PA: Pickwick, 1987); J. B. Green and M. C. McKeever, Luke-Acts and New Testament Historiography (IBRB 8; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994); A. J. Mattill Jr. and M. B. Mattill, A Classified Bibliography of Literature on the Acts of the Apostles (NTTS 7; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1966); W. E. Mills, A Bibliography of the Periodical Literature on the Acts of the Apostles 1962-1984 (NovTSup 58; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1986); P. F. Stuehrenberg, "The Study of Acts before the Reformation: A Bibliographic Introduction," NovT 29 (1987) 100-36. Commentaries: C. K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994-); F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles: The Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary (3d ed.; Leicester: Inter-Varsity (Apollos)/Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); idem, The Book of the Acts (NICNT; rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); H. Conzelmann, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Oxford: Blackwell; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); L. T. Johnson, The Acts of the Apostles (SP 5; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1992); I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles: An Introduction and Commentary (TNTC; Leicester: Inter-Varsity; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); R. Pesch, Die Apostelgeschichte (2 vols.; EKK 5; Zürich: Benziger; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1986); J. B. Polhill, Acts (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); G. Schneider, Die Apostelgeschichte (2 vols.; HTKNT 5; Freiburg: Herder, 1980, 1982); R. C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation, 2: The Acts of the Apostles (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); B. Witherington III, The Acts of the Apostles: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977). Studies: L. C. A. Alexander, The Preface to Luke's Gospel: Literary Convention and Social Context in Luke 1:1-4 and Acts 1:1 (SNTSMS 78; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (LEC 8; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987) esp. 77-157; D. L. Barr and J. L. Wentling, "The Convention of Classical Biography and the Genre of Luke-Acts: A Preliminary Study" in Luke-Acts: New Perspectives from the Society of Biblical Literature Seminar, ed. C. H. Talbert (New York: Crossroad, 1984) 63-88; M.-É. Boismard and A. Lamouille, Le Texte Occidental des Actes des Apôtres: Reconstitution et Réhabitaliation (2 vols.; Paris: Recherche sur les Civilisations, 1984); F. F. Bruce, The Speeches in the Acts of the Apostles (London: Tyndale, 1942); H. J. Cadbury, "Commentary on the Preface of Luke" in The Beginnings of Christianity, pt. 1: The Acts of the Apostles, ed. F. J. Foakes Jackson and K. Lake (5 vols.; London: Macmillan, 1922; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979 repr.) 2:489-510; idem, The Making of Luke-Acts (2d ed.; London: SPCK, 1958); J. T. Carroll, Response to the End of History: Eschatology and Situation in Luke-Acts (SBLDS 92; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); R. J. Cassidy, Society and Politics in the Acts of the Apostles (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1987); M. Dibelius, Studies in the Acts of the Apostles (London: SCM; New York: Scribner's, 1956); P. F. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lukan Theology (SNTSMS 57; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); J. A. Fitzmyer, Luke the Theologian: Aspects of His Teaching (Mahwah, NJ: Paulist, 1989); S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); C. H. Gempf, "Public Speaking and Published Accounts" in The Book of Acts in Its Ancient Literary Setting, ed. B. W. Winter and A. D. Clarke (BAFCS 1; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993) 259-303; J. B. Green, "Internal Repetition in Luke-Acts: Contemporary Narratology and Lukan Historiography" in History, Literature and Society in the Book of Acts, ed. Ben Witherington III (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) 283-99; idem, "The Problem of a Beginning: Israel's Scriptures in Luke 1-2," BBR 4 (1994) 61-85; idem, "'Salvation to the End of the Earth' (Acts 13:47): God as Savior in the Acts of the Apostles" in The Book of Acts and Its Theology, ed. I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson (BAFCS 6; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997) 83-106; idem,

The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); R. A. Hahn, Sickness and Healing: An Anthropological Perspective (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); R. G. Hall, Revealed Histories: Techniques for Ancient Jewish and Christian Historiography (JSPSup 6; Sheffield: JSOT, 1991); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History, ed. C. H. Gempf (WUNT 49; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1989); M. Hengel, Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); F. J. Foakes Jackson and K. Lake, eds., The Beginnings of Christianity, pt. 1: The Acts of the Apostles (5 vols.; London: Macmillan, 1920-33; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979, repr.); J. Jervell, The Theology of the Acts of the Apostles (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); M. Korn, Die Geschichte Jesu in veränderter Zeit: Studien zur bleibenden Bedeutung Jesu im lukanischen Doppelwerk (WUNT 2.51; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1993); M. Krieger, ed., The Aims of Representation: Subject/Text/History (New York: Columbia University Press, 1987; Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1993, repr.); W. S. Kurz, Reading Luke-Acts: Dynamics of Biblical Narrative (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1993); R. Maddox, The Purpose of Luke-Acts (FRLANT 126; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1982); I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles (NTG; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); J. H. Neyrey, "The Forensic Defense Speech and Paul's Trial Speeches in Acts 22-26: Form and Function" in Luke-Acts: New Perspectives from the Society of Biblical Literature Seminar, ed. C. H. Talbert (New York: Crossroad, 1984) 210-24; idem, ed., The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); C. D. Osburn, "The Search for the Original Text of Acts: The International Project on the Text of Acts," JSNT 44 (1991) 39-55; M. C. Parsons and R. I. Pervo, Rethinking the Unity of Luke and Acts (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); R. I. Pervo, Profit with Delight: The Literary Genre of the Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); M. A. Powell, What Are They Saying About Acts? (Mahwah, NJ: Paulist, 1991); D. Schwartz, "The End of the Line: Paul in the Canonical Book of Acts" in Paul and the Legacies of Paul, ed. W. S. Babcock (Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1990) 3-24; M. L. Soards, The Speeches in Acts: Their Content, Context, and Concerns (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); J. T. Squires, The Plan of God in Luke-Acts (SNTSMS 76; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); G. L. Sterling, Historiography and Self-Definition: Josephus, Luke-Acts and Apologetic Historiography (NovTSup 64; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); B. Stock, Listening for the Text: On the Uses of the Past (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990); W. A. Strange, The Problem of the Text of Acts (SNTSMS 71; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); C. H. Talbert, Literary Patterns, Theological Themes and the Genre of Luke-Acts (SBLMS 20; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1974); R. C. Tannehill, "The Functions of Peter's Mission Speeches in the Narrative of Acts," NTS 37 (1991) 400-14; M. Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel's Restoration and Witness in Luke-Acts (JPTSup 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); J. B. Tyson, ed., Luke-Acts and the Jewish People: Eight Critical Perspectives (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1988); W. C. van Unnik, Sparsa Collecta: The Collected Essays of W. C. van Unnik, pt. 1: Evangelia—Paulina—Acta (NovTSup 29; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973) esp. 6-15, 340-73; P. W. Walaskay, 'And So We Came to Rome': The Political Perspective of St. Luke (SNTSMS 49; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983); R. W. Wall, "The Acts of the Apostles in Canonical Context," BTB 18 (1988) 16-24; H. White, The Content of the Form: Narrative Discourse and Historical Representation (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987); U. Wilckens, Die Missionsreden der Apostelgeschichte: Form- und traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen (3d ed.; WMANT 5; Neukirchen/Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1974); B. W. Winter, ed., The Book of Acts in Its First-Century Setting (6 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993-97); B. Witherington III, ed., History, Literature and Society in the Book of Acts (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996).

J. B. Green

ACTS OF THOMAS. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

ADOPTIONISM. See CHRISTOLOGY; DOCETISM; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

ADULTERY. See MARRIAGE, DIVORCE AND ADULTERY.

ADVERSARIES

Several later NT writings combat what their authors view as unacceptable beliefs and practices. As they do, they are setting limits to the diversity of earliest Christianity. Interpreters have usually identified the adversaries of most of these writings as Gnostics* of some description. This identification was based on a reconstruction of the late first and early second century which envisioned Gnosticism as the primary heresy Christians faced. Thus it was simply assumed that since these writings come from that period, their adversaries were probably Gnostic and could be identified as such with very little evidence. More recent scholarship has recognized diversity among those rejected by the developing orthodoxy of this period and so less often simply assumes a particular type of adversary for these writings.

1. Defining Adversaries
2. Revelation
3. Johannine Epistles
4. Jude
5. 2 Peter
6. Pastoral Epistles
7. Ignatius of Antioch
8. Ebionites
9. Gnostics

1. Defining Adversaries.

Adversaries, understood as those who identify themselves as Christians (hinted at in Paul's* farewell discourse in Acts 20:29-30) but who are rejected and opposed by a particular author, are not part of the occasion of all late NT writings. 1 Peter,* for example, addresses Christians troubled by persecution,* offering encouragement to help them interpret and endure persecution, but has no Christian adversaries in view. Other writings mention unacceptable views while not having the defeat of those who hold these views as their primary goal. For example, the central purpose of James* is to pass on ethical instructions, but it alludes to some use of Pauline teaching* which it rejects (2:18-26). This view is opposed in passing, but opposing its proponents is not central to the purpose of James.

It is also necessary to distinguish between correcting dangerous or unacceptable tendencies or views and opposing adversaries. Not every person who held views our authors thought needed correction was viewed as an adversary. Hebrews* opposes some attraction to cultic practices associated with the Jerusalem temple or its replacement. Those with such inclinations are not, however, treated as heretics or adversaries, but rather as Christians in need of instruction.

When the primary goal is the defeat of adversaries, later NT writings often take up a polemical tone, which means that many of their accusations and charges cannot be straightforwardly attributed to their adversaries. In both early Christian and earlier non-Christian writings, polemics often involved stock charges of immorality applied to whatever opposition one encountered. Often this was done in the belief that deviation from the acceptable inevitably led to such behavior. Thus we must be cautious when such charges appear.

2. Revelation.

Revelation* is a special case. Its primary purpose is to encourage those enduring persecution, but the opening section (Rev 1—3) treats some within the communities addressed as adversaries. The seven "letters" to the churches* are often thought to address a single type of adversary. But some interpreters resist this assumption and examine them individually before making connections. The adversaries repudiated in Revelation 1—3 have been identified as Gnostic libertines or libertines with gnostic tendencies. A few interpreters find a dispute between moderate and conservative Jewish Christians (see Jewish Christianity), with John taking the more conservative position. Many interpreters identify these adversaries as Christians willing to accommodate themselves to the culture by participating in trade guild meetings which were held in temples and included a meal in which sacrificed* food* was eaten.

Only the letters to Ephesus, Pergamum and Thyatira deal with adversaries within the church. The Nicolaitans are mentioned in the messages to both Ephesus and Pergamum. John commends the Ephesians for hating the Nicolaitans and for rejecting some who claim to be apostles.* If, as seems probable, these apostles were Nicolaitans, this brand of teaching was brought to Ephesus by teachers claiming some authority.* But it seems they were unsuccessful there. There is no hint of the content of their teaching. John rebukes the church at Pergamum for having within its congregation Nicolaitans and those who hold the teachings of Balaam. While it initially appears that these are separate groups, the name Balaam is probably used metaphorically for the Nicolaitans, because the two names have similar meanings. Again, no teachings are ascribed to the Nicolaitans. The Balaamites are accused of eating food sacrificed to idols* and of fornication. The charge of fornication is probably figurative, standing for religious infidelity. This is its usual meaning in Revelation. Additionally, fornication had long been associated with idolatry (see Num 25:1-2, which immediately follows the Balaam story, and the apostolic decree in Acts 15:23-29). Since this accusation is a polemically charged metaphor, these Balaamites are not libertines. The only other charge leveled against them is that they eat idol meat. Such conduct was viewed as an unacceptable accommodation to the surrounding culture.

John condemns the Thyatirans for tolerating Jezebel, who is accused of teaching and practicing fornication and eating sacrificed meat. This Jezebel, who claimed to be a prophet, must have been an influential member of this church. The charge of fornication is again metaphorical. So the only practice Jezebel is condemned for is eating idol meat, the same accusation made against the Nicolaitans/Balaamites. However, the Seer adds that those who follow Jezebel call their teaching "the deep things of Satan."* It is doubtful that the followers of Jezebel attribute their teachings to Satan, but they must claim some insight that reconciles their eating of idol meat and Christian conduct.

In the end, all the adversaries mentioned are accused only of eating idol meat, and thus of being unfaithful. So John's opposition to them is based on their accommodation to the surrounding culture and whatever reasons they give for allowing it. There is no evidence that allows us to associate any tendency of these adversaries, whether taken individually or as a group, with any other known group.

3. Johannine Epistles.

The adversaries of 1 and 2 John (see John, Letters of) are usually discussed together, and 3 John is often included within the same broad situation as well. The opponents of both 1 and 2 John are recognized as former members of the Johannine community who have split off from that group. Nearly all interpreters understand the debate to be over the proper interpretation of the traditions* now found in John. Throughout the first half of the twentieth century most interpreters identified these separatists as docetic,* libertine Gnostics. However, many recent interpreters deny that these adversaries were Gnostic, libertine or fully docetic. Several (e.g., Brown) argue that these opponents deny only the salvific significance of Jesus' earthly life, not the reality of his material existence. Some interpreters also find 1 John opposing an adoptionist christology* and argue that the separatists see the life of Jesus as one phase of the work of the "divine word." Similarly, Painter identifies them as pneumatics who see Jesus as merely an example of the spiritual person's life.

3.1. 1 John. 1 John yields clear evidence that its adversaries have seceded from the addressed community and are now viewed as enemies; they are even identified as antichrists* (1 Jn 2:18-19). Two issues dominate 1 John: keeping the commandments (particularly the love commandment) and christology.

1 John frames the christological debate so that denying that Jesus is the Christ* is equivalent to denying "the Son" (1 Jn 2:22-23), and these are further synonymous with denying "Jesus" and not confessing that "Jesus Christ is come in flesh"* (1 Jn 4:2-3). These carefully worded statements indicate that the adversaries separate the earthly Jesus from the Son in some way unacceptable to 1 John, perhaps denying that the heavenly Christ is to be fully identified with the human Jesus. 1 John's prologue (1 Jn 1:1-4) supports the notion that these adversaries have a docetic tendency, as does 1 John 4:3, where the issue is cast as denying Jesus. If they are docetists, they are not necessarily Gnostics. One needs only the common Hellenistic* devaluing of the material world* to find docetism attractive. However, the question may not be whether Jesus had a material body, but rather whether Jesus is to be fully identified with the Son of God (see Son of God), or for how long such an identification is envisioned. The opponents may have an adoptionist christology that has the Son come upon Jesus at his baptism. This could be based in part on their interpretation of the first chapter of the Gospel of John.

But this part of the adversaries' christology may not be at issue; the dispute may concern when or whether the Son separated himself from Jesus. Most interpreters see the reference to blood in 1 John 5:5-6 as an allusion to the crucifixion. The antithetical structure of these verses suggests that this mention of blood opposes some teaching advocated by the separatists. If it does, they seem to deny that the Son (or the Christ) was crucified and only allow that Jesus was. This—in 1 John's view—premature departure of the Son was unacceptable because it at least implicitly denied the importance of that death* for the forgiveness of sins, a function 1 John affirms as central (1 Jn 1:7; 2:1-2, 12; 4:9-10). This understanding of 1 John 5:5-6 also fits if the separatists are docetists.

Thus the most we can say with relative certainty is that these separatists advocated a christology that does not affirm a sufficient identification of Jesus with the Son of God. That insufficiency may involve some form of docetism, or alternatively an adoptionist christology that does not identify Jesus completely enough with the Son and has the Son leave Jesus before the crucifixion. Neither of these positions requires a gnostic theology, but only a descending/ascending redeemer schema, a schema that the Johannine community affirmed.

Beyond the broad indictment that they do not keep the commandments, the sole recurring accusation about the adversaries' ethics* is that they lack love for fellow Christians. This charge probably stems from their separation from the Johannine community. Their lack of love is demonstrated by their absence from the assembly of the remaining community. So this accusation reveals little about the separatists' ethical conduct and certainly does not indicate that they were libertines.

It appears from 1 John 1:8, 10 that the secessionists claim to be sinless. Based on the presence of the perfect tense in 1 John 1:18 ("we have not sinned"), some interpreters discern a perfectionism, based on gnostic beliefs, which claims either that material existence is so unimportant that sin* does not affect them or that their spiritual nature has made them "intrinsically sinless" (Bogart, 33). However, these statements are probably 1 John's interpretation of the adversaries' views, not quotations of their claims. Still, they must advocate a type of perfectionism that the author of 1 John rejects, even as he embraces a perfectionism of another type in 1 John 3:4-9.

The rejected perfectionism may be a correlate of the separatists' denial of the expiatory function of the crucifixion: if they claimed never to have sinned, atonement would be superfluous (see Death of Christ). But their position on Jesus' death may be based on a different understanding of the means of salvation* rather than a gnostic-like anthropology. They may argue that the vital element is that the Son brought down eternal life from God,* an act that has nothing to do with Jesus' death (cf. Brown 1979). Since 1 John rejects their assertions of sinlessness in 1 John 1:8, 10 with comments on the atoning function of Jesus' death in 1 John 1:7, 9; 2:1-2, these two points are either related in the adversaries' teachings or inseparable from 1 John's perspective. While these adversaries seem to claim an advanced spiritual status that includes sinlessness, there is insufficient evidence to tie this claim to any system of thought (e.g., Gnosticism or a realized eschatology*). Perhaps 1 John denies them this status because of their christology and their secession from his community—after all, he expects sinlessness from those "born of God" (1 Jn 3:9).

Our understanding of these separatists must remain vague. We can establish that they refuse to identify the Son of God with Jesus as completely as 1 John demands and that they deny the expiatory significance of the death of Jesus. Furthermore, they claim a spiritual status that probably includes the assertion that they are beyond sin. There is no good evidence that they are libertines or Gnostics or that they belong to any other known group.

3.2. 2 John. The adversaries of 2 John are described in essentially identical ways to those of 1 John. Again in 2 John these adversaries are perceived as secessionists (2 Jn 7) who have not remained "in the teaching of Christ" (2 Jn 9). The Elder warns his readers to beware of the antichrist who does not confess that "Jesus Christ is come in flesh" (2 Jn 7-8). This shorthand for the adversaries' teaching gives more weight to the view that they are docetists, but in light of its use in 1 John, this phrase remains too ambiguous to be decisive. This letter* may represent a later stage in the dispute than 1 John because now there are "many" deceivers (2 Jn 7). Unfortunately, even though we can see that 1 John and 2 John address the same adversaries, 2 John does not appreciably clarify our understanding of them.

3.3. 3 John. 3 John identifies the adversary by name, Diotrephes. The Elder writes that Diotrephes is fond of holding a position of leadership, does not acknowledge the Elder's authority, makes false charges against the Elder and does not welcome itinerant preachers associated with the Elder's community. Some interpreters find here a further disintegration of the Johannine community at the hands of the adversaries of 1 and 2 John. On this reading, the adversaries can now claim an adherent from among those with institutional authority. Others identify Diotrephes as one of the first monarchical bishops and locate the dispute between him and the Elder in issues of ecclesial structure (see Church Order). Käsemann argues that Diotrephes legitimately holds the office that was soon to develop into the monarchical episcopacy. Occupying this position, Diotrephes has, Käsemann asserts, excommunicated the Presbyter for being an enthusiast who valued the immediate encounter of the presence of Christ above the tradition.

Third John serves a dual purpose: it is a commendation for Gaius and a letter of recommendation for Demetrius as he travels to the area where both Gaius and Diotrephes are church leaders, probably the leading members of separate house churches in the same immediate area. The main issue of 3 John is Diotrephes' refusal of hospitality for itinerant preachers sent by the Elder. The Elder interprets this action as an affront to his honor, a primary value in Greco-Roman culture, and thus as both a personal matter and a matter that affects his standing in the broader Christian community in that area.

While this action by Diotrephes may have been due to doctrinal disputes, any such dispute remains veiled. If the false charges brought against the Elder involve some doctrinal issue, the text gives no indication that this is the case. There is no evidence to support Käsemann's claim that the Presbyter has been excommunicated as a heretic. The Elder approaches this problem as he does (i.e., he seems to be on the defensive according to Käsemann) because of Diotrephes' position in the church, not because he has been excommunicated. The dispute could involve ecclesial structure, but again there is no evidence to support this view; it could equally concern Diotrephes' exercise of a recognized office. Thus while we can identify this single adversary by name, we cannot identify (or assume the presence of) any doctrinal, ecclesial or ethical issues beyond inhospitality for itinerants as the root of this struggle for control of a segment of the Johannine community.

4. Jude.

The adversaries of Jude* and 2 Peter* have often been identified together and assumed to be the same because 2 Peter borrows so heavily from Jude. But methodologically this is a mistake. Even though 2 Peter uses much of Jude's polemic, he may well apply this stereotyped material to a different group. Thus, as with all NT writings, adversaries must be identified solely on the basis of the text under consideration.

Most interpreters find some sort of Gnostics or proto-Gnostics as the target of Jude's attack. But this identification can be supported only by reading far more into Jude than his statements reasonably permit. Most interpreters also fail to take the thoroughly polemical nature of Jude into account and so accept at face value his often exaggerated charges and accusations. Consequently they identify his adversaries as libertines. Wisse has shown that such charges were typical of polemics in both Christian antiheretical writings and the broader Hellenistic milieu.

Jude's adversaries were traveling, perhaps charismatic, teachers (Jude 4, 8) who participated in the churches' worship services (Jude 12). Their presence and teaching were causing divisions, as some accepted their teaching and others did not (Jude 18-19). This much is clear. Even though Jude constantly charges these adversaries with being immoral, the level of polemic makes it doubtful that we should see them as libertines. Such charges probably do indicate that Jude and these teachers disagree about some aspect of Christian behavior. But it is difficult to imagine that Jude's rather broad audience (basically all Christians, Jude 1) needed special instructions to reject the kind of sexually profligate teachers many interpreters find opposed. Charges of "defiling the flesh" (Jude 8) or even of being licentious (Jude 4) do not necessarily indicate that these adversaries were without any moral code. At most, such charges show only that they allowed something(s) the author does not.

Given that Jude is totally immersed in Jewish traditions, it seems likely that both the author and audience were Christian Jews. It seems most likely that Jude represents a more law-observant perspective than that advocated by the itinerant teachers. If the "glories" of Jude 8 are the angels* involved with giving the law* (as many interpreters assert), the "insult" of the adversaries is that they do not keep part of the law. They need not be devoid of morality to insult the law and its mediators, they need only to ignore one aspect of it. In addition, if the traditional archenemies of God's people cited in Jude 11-12 are intended to portray Jude's adversaries in any specific way, the inclusion of Korah may be significant. In Jewish tradition he is known not only for rebellion but also for not keeping the law properly—though with no hint of antinomianism. We are left with almost no clues about the aspect of the law the teachers fail to keep. Jude's characterization of them as problematic at fellowship meals (Jude 12) may indicate that their nonobservance involves food laws (or some other purity* regulation that complicated association at table), but this is far from certain.

So Jude's adversaries are itinerant teachers whose primary offense involves their understanding of the responsibilities of Christians with respect to the law. They may cite visionary experiences as evidence of their authority. Taking a more law-observant stance, Jude rejects them as the false teachers of the last days and characterizes them as ungodly, lawless and haughty. They undoubtedly had a different picture of themselves.

5. 2 Peter.

Many interpreters also identify the adversaries of 2 Peter* as Gnostics or proto-Gnostics, in large part because they deny the Parousia.* But this is insufficient evidence to make a connection with Gnosticism, for no beliefs central to Gnosticism are combated in 2 Peter. Rejecting a gnostic connection, Neyrey identifies these adversaries as teachers who draw on Epicurean ideas that had filtered out into the broader culture. Specifically, their denial of the parousia is a manifestation of popular doubts about the reality of divine judgment.* Bauckham (1983) also finds eschatological skepticism to be their central tenet but does not connect their teaching with Epicurean beliefs. Based on their denial of the judgment, Bauckham argues that they advocate antinomianism.

Like Jude, 2 Peter is a thoroughly polemical document. Once again, such direct and fierce polemic must be read carefully, taking into account that stock accusations served to discredit, not accurately describe, adversaries. All of 2 Peter 1:16—3:13 is intended to refute, accuse and denounce the adversaries, not objectively describe them.

The clearest point about these adversaries, who were formerly part of the communities 2 Peter addresses (2 Pet 2:1, 15), is that they deny the Parousia (2 Pet 3:3-4). They based their rejection of it on two things: the passing of the first-generation Christians who thought the Parousia would occur in their lifetime (2 Pet 3:8-10) and the absence of God's action against evil in the world (2 Pet 3:4-6). References to the reality of the Parousia at the beginning and end of the polemical section (2 Pet 1:16—3:13) show that this is the central issue. In 2 Peter 1:16 the author asserts that the Parousia is not a myth and interprets the denial of the Parousia as a rejection of the apostolic testimony. While it is possible that the adversaries explicitly rejected apostolic teaching, it seems unlikely. Even though 2 Peter interprets their view in this way, it is difficult to see how they could have gained influence (2 Pet 2:2) in a community that reveres apostles (as the attribution of this letter to Peter indicates) if they rejected apostolic testimony. Instead they probably argued that the apostles had been misunderstood. 2 Peter 1:16-19 intends to make this claim untenable.

It seems that these adversaries expect no future judgment, but this may only be 2 Peter's interpretation of what it means to deny the Parousia. Some interpreters combine the adversaries' rejection of the judgment with 2 Peter's accusations about their licentiousness to argue that they are libertines. However, this section's sharp polemic prohibits us from reading such charges literally. These denunciations were intended to damage the adversaries' ethos, not accurately describe them. The writer of 2 Peter has no doubt that the adversaries' beliefs lead to moral corruptness, but these polemical denunciations are insufficient evidence that they, for example, "revel in the daytime" (2 Pet 2:13)—a stock polemical accusation.

2 Peter also says that these adversaries revile "glories" (2 Pet 2:10). This expression is taken from Jude but given new meaning here. 2 Peter 2:11 indicates that these "glories" are spiritual beings subject to God's judgment. The charge of reviling may be 2 Peter's interpretation of the adversaries' rejection of the Parousia and its attending judgment. If these "glories" are involved with the judgment, as Neyrey contends, they may be beings who accuse humans before God at judgment. Thus the adversaries' reviling consists in their disbelief that such judging and accusing takes place.

These teachers also "promise freedom" to those who accept their views. Although 2 Peter gives no clear indication of what this freedom* involves, many see it as freedom from moral constraint, perhaps because it is juxtaposed to the charge that the adversaries are "slaves of corruption." But again, such polemical accusations are primarily denunciation. If the "glories" of 2 Peter 2:10 are accusers at the judgment, the freedom of 2 Peter 2:19 may be freedom from fear of such beings. This fits well with the adversaries' denial of the Parousia, but no interpretation of this freedom is certain. 2 Peter also accuses these adversaries of despising authority* or lordship. This is a polemical implication the author draws from their denial of the Parousia.

These adversaries are further accused of "twisting" the Scriptures (2 Pet 3:15-16; cf. 1:20-21). 2 Peter mentions Paul as an authority who agrees that the delay of the Parousia is a sign of God's patience (2 Pet 3:15), but then adds that some misuse Paul's writings and other Scriptures. This is no basis for identifying these teachers as hyper-Paulinists or for asserting that they claim him as their primary authority. He may be simply one apostle they call on. However important Paul is, the reference to him shows that the adversaries do not reject apostolic testimony. Their "twisting" of the prophets shows that particular interpretations of Scripture contribute significantly to their arguments for their teaching.

2 Peter, then, opposes teachers who previously held the same beliefs about the Parousia as the author but now deny its reality and use Scripture to support their position. They do not reject apostolic authority, but 2 Peter interprets their denial of the Parousia as implying such a rejection. Their denial of the Parousia may include a rejection of a final divine judgment; at least 2 Peter presents the two as necessarily related. Denial of a final judgment need not entail the removal of all moral constraints (consider the Sadducees), but the writer of 2 Peter is certain it will lead to licentiousness. Their beliefs about the Parousia and judgment seem to allow them to claim freedom from the fear of certain spirit* beings, perhaps accusers at judgment. Clearly, the primary issue for the writer of 2 Peter is the adversaries' rejection of the Parousia, which he sees as a rejection of Scripture, apostolic authority and morality. So all questions and accusations stem from this one central concern.

6. Pastoral Epistles.

Although the authorship and dating of the Pastorals are debated (see DPL, Pastoral Letters), the majority opinion of scholarship is that the Pastorals are pseudepigraphic* and date from the post-Pauline era. However, those who maintain the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals frequently date these letters in the mid-60s, at the close of Paul's life and ministry, and regard them as reflective of a changing situation. Whether Pauline or post-Pauline, the identity of the adversaries depicted in the Pastorals has long been at issue in reconstructions of early Christianity and the study of the texts under review in this volume.

Most scholars have assumed that the three Pastoral Epistles address a single type of adversary. This single front is usually identified as a type of Jewish Gnosticism or proto-Gnosticism. A few interpreters, however, identify these adversaries as Judaizing Christians with an ascetic regime and a realized eschatology, or alternatively as Jewish Christians who engage in rabbinic exegesis and emphasize keeping the Torah and ascetic practices. Others identify them as Hellenistic-Jewish legalists, and still others see the main problem to be that these teachers are perceived as a threat by those in authority. Barrett comments that the Pastorals seem to mention every heresy that comes to the author's mind and so are directed at no single, specific adversary. Fiore finds these adversaries to be largely indefinite and described in ways contemporary paraenetic writings typically describe rejected teachers.

6.1. 1 Timothy. A growing number of scholars identify the adversaries of these letters individually. Among types of opponents interpreters have proposed for 1 Timothy we find proto-Gnostics, libertines, elitists from within, some who hold a fully realized eschatology, Jewish Christians who keep the food* laws of Judaism, and a circle of Torah-observing Jewish Christians who included the author of Revelation in their number. Interpreters have identified the opponents of 2 Timothy as Gnostics, proto-Gnostics and enthusiastic Paulinists with a realized eschatology. For Titus scholars have found proto-Gnostics, Judaizers and perhaps Marcionites,* rival Jewish missionaries, and the same two types of law-observant Jewish Christians proposed for 1 Timothy.

First Timothy, like the other Pastorals, yields little specific information about its adversaries. Its primary concern is not to describe and oppose some false teaching but to encourage a particular type of behavior by placing it in antithesis with a different type. Consistent with this purpose, its polemic is rather stylized, drawing on stock accusations and denunciations. Still, some things are discernible about these adversaries. First, the author's assertion in 1 Timothy 1:6-7 that they want to be teachers of the law implies that they require more Torah observance than 1 Timothy does. This may be corroborated by 1 Timothy 4:3, where we find that they demand abstinence from certain unspecified foods. This food prohibition is usually taken to signify that these adversaries have an ascetic tendency, especially since it is combined with a proscription against marriage.* But the marriage prohibition could be also associated with an expectation that the Parousia was near (see Paul's comments in 1 Cor 7) or any number of rationales, including some relationship between prophecy and celibacy or the emancipation of women. Still, they may have had some ascetic tendency. Even if they did, their food regulations probably originated with the food laws of Judaism, since other passages allude to questions about the law. One of these is 1 Timothy 1:8-11, where 1 Timothy distinguishes between proper and improper uses of the law. 1 Timothy 2:5-7 may include a passing defense of Paul's mission to Gentiles* and so intimate that observance of the law is an issue.

1 Timothy also accuses the adversaries of propagating myths, genealogies and old wives' tales (1 Tim 1:3-4; 4:7-8). Modern interpreters have often used these characterizations to identify these adversaries as Gnostics. But such accusations were commonly employed as a polemical device designed to disparage one's adversaries, no matter what their teaching was. That seems to be their function here. Even if these statements have specific teachings in view, there is no clear information about their content. Not even the reference to their teaching as gnōsis (knowledge*) in 1 Timothy 6:20 is sufficient to attribute gnostic tendencies to these adversaries, for many groups used this language to designate their teachings in this period.

There is, then, insufficient evidence to connect the teachings of these adversaries with Gnostic or proto-Gnostic beliefs. They do advocate adherence to more of the law than the author of 1 Timothy allows. Their urging of food and marriage prohibitions may indicate that they have some ascetic tendencies. 1 Timothy's comments about these adversaries give us no further information about them.

6.2. 2 Timothy. The adversaries of 2 Timothy are identified by name and by problematic teaching in 2 Timothy 2:17-18; they are Hymenaeus and Philetus, and they claim that the resurrection* has already taken place. 2 Timothy 2:17-18 is probably a polemical recasting of their teaching which makes it as unacceptable as possible to the readers. But it still shows that they advocate an eschatology which asserts that Christians now participate (or at least can participate) in blessings that the author believes are reserved for the Parousia. Their teaching surely excludes a future bodily resurrection but may not deny every sort of afterlife with God. Though some interpreters use this more fully realized eschatology to identify these adversaries as Gnostics, this is not sufficient evidence of such a tendency. Not only are there other bases for a more fully realized eschatology, but no other Gnostic teachings are opposed in this letter.

These opponents are also identified as the predicted eschatological false teachers (2 Tim 3:1-9). The licentiousness attributed to them in this role is again part of the stock polemic against one's adversaries and so is not to be taken at face value without corroborating evidence. The function of this characterization is twofold in 2 Timothy: it makes them odious to the readers, and it is a foil against which to describe and recommend the proper manner of life (e.g., 2 Tim 3:10-15). The remaining references to adversaries in 2 Timothy charge them only with engaging in worthless and harmful disputations (2 Tim 2:14-17, 23-26), an accusation that fits nearly any adversary.

2 Timothy 1:15 may indicate that these teachers who advocated a more fully realized eschatology were fairly successful, because it says that everyone in Asia had deserted Paul. Some interpreters use this as evidence that 2 Timothy represents a later stage in the battle with the same adversaries found in 1 Timothy. However, 2 Timothy 2:24-26 not only encourages Timothy to correct these adversaries gently but also grants the possibility that they may repent.* That hardly sounds like a later stage of the controversy that provoked the accusations in 1 Timothy. More important, nothing in 2 Timothy links its adversaries with those of 1 Timothy beyond the broad and stock rejection of their teaching as worthless disputing. Thus the adversaries of 1 and 2 Timothy do not seem to be related.

6.3. Titus. Titus identifies its adversaries as "the circumcision,"* a group actively propagating a message that included "Jewish myths and commands of those who turn away from the truth"* (Tit 1:10-14). This same passage also indicates that they are native Cretans. The mention of "myths" here is, again, an insufficient basis on which to support the idea that they are Gnostics. These adversaries are Jewish Christians who have begun to demand observance of parts of the law beyond those this author allows. Confirmation that the adversaries' commands involve the law comes from Titus 3:9-11, where Titus is exhorted not to engage in arguments about the law and to exclude from the community anyone who presses such discussions. Further confirmation of this origin of their commands and perhaps more specification of them is found in Titus 1:15. Immediately following the condemnatory description of the adversaries' commands in Titus 1:14, the author turns to the question of what is "clean" and "unclean" for Christians. Thus the adversaries probably urged some purity laws of the Torah. In addition to holding these views, the accusation that these adversaries teach for "dishonorable profit" (Tit 1:11) indicates that they are active teachers who accept pay from their followers.

While these adversaries do seem intent on spreading their message, there is no sign that they are part of a traveling band of missionaries. While they may possibly belong to such a group, any such group must be composed of native Cretans. This makes a direct connection between these adversaries and those of 1 Timothy unlikely, even though the two groups have similar tendencies.

When examined individually, the evidence shows that the Pastorals do not all address the same adversaries. 1 Timothy and Titus do address adversaries with similar tendencies, but we have no evidence that they are part of the same larger Jewish-Christian, law-observant movement. The discussion about the law, particularly among Jewish Christians, continued well into the fourth century and beyond. Any Jews who joined the Christian fellowship would be confronted by questions about their (and Christian Gentiles') observance of the law and could arrive at a more law-observant view than 1 Timothy and Titus deemed acceptable. Thus the adversaries of these two letters need not be part of a large or organized movement. Unlike those of 1 Timothy and Titus, the adversaries of 2 Timothy do not seem interested in Torah observance. Rather, the primary charge against them is that they hold a faulty and harmful eschatology, a more fully realized eschatology than 2 Timothy can accept. Our finding that these letters address significantly different types of adversaries requires future study of these letters to begin by treating them individually rather than simply viewing them as part of the Pastoral Epistles.

7. Ignatius of Antioch.

On his way to martyrdom in Rome, Ignatius* of Antioch (d. 107/110) wrote letters to churches in Asia Minor and Europe. Some of these letters oppose adversaries he encountered on visits to individual churches and perhaps in his home church. In his letter to the Smyrneans he rejects docetists,* who denied that Christ had a physical body and that he suffered in the passion. Furthermore, they probably did not participate in the bishop's Eucharist but celebrated their own in a way consistent with their christology. In Philadelphia, Ignatius finds a very different group which he treats as adversaries. These Christians understood differently and granted more authority to the Hebrew Scriptures than Ignatius did. Additionally, they proposed a sort of continuity with Judaism, a relationship between Judaism and Christianity, that he rejects. But they do not advocate observance of any part of the law that Ignatius does not require. While other letters of Ignatius discuss many issues (including the continually raised matter of the monarchical bishop), he treats no other Christian groups he encounters as adversaries.

8. Ebionites.

Looking beyond the canonical writings and Ignatius, we find that the place of the law continued to be a debated issue into and beyond the second century. In addition to the adversaries of Jude, 1 Timothy, Titus and Ignatius, this matter was crucial in the rejection of the Ebionites* and the Gnostics—though for opposite reasons. The Ebionites originated in Palestine, perhaps as a remnant of the original Jerusalem church. They were Christian Jews who kept the law (including circumcision* and the sabbath) and used only the Gospel of Matthew. It is possible that they also possessed a Gospel of the Hebrews, though this is reported only in later sources. Justin and Origen knew some Ebionites who required Gentiles to keep the law and others who did not. They rejected the former group but accepted the latter group as Christians, albeit weak ones. It is possible that this accepted group is known in other writers as Nazoreans or Nazarenes.

Epiphanius (Haer. 29.9.1-4) labels Nazoreans a group that differs from the orthodox only in that they keep the Mosaic law. However, a wider gap had developed between most Ebionites and the emerging orthodoxy, so that they denied Paul's apostleship (Origen Cont. Cels. 5.66; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.27.17-4), seeing him as an apostate from the law. Some also held an adoptionist christology that usually entailed denial of the virgin birth, though others accepted it (Origen Cont. Cels. 5.61). It is not surprising that Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.27.1.6) asserts that all Ebionites have an aberrant christology. Among the adoptionists there were differing views on the nature of the Christ who descended on Jesus. Some saw the Christ as an archangel, while others believed him to be a being created in heaven* who had intermittently descended on Adam (Epiphanius Haer. 2.30.1). By the fourth century, the heresiologists charged that Ebionites require marriage, allow divorce, eat no meat, reject the Prophets, use water instead of wine in the Eucharist and use multiple baptisms for sanctification (Epiphanius Haer. 30.17.6-18.8). There is no indication in pre-fourth-century sources that these practices were found among the Ebionites at earlier times.

9. Gnostics.

The developed Gnostic systems of the second through the fourth centuries held a view of the law opposite to the Ebionites' (see Gnosis, Gnosticism). Some Gnostics rejected completely the authority of the Hebrew Scriptures, disparaging them as the work of an inferior, and often evil, god who also created the material world. Most Gnostics viewed matter, and so the material world, as evil. They believed that humans, at least some of them, possess within themselves a piece of divine substance which descended to earth after a catastrophe within the divine realm. That divine spark remained trapped in the world of matter until it learned its true nature and how to escape. For Christian Gnostics, Christ came to reveal this saving knowledge, which enables the ascent of the soul to its true home.

Gnostic christology was usually either docetic to some degree or a radical adoptionism. Though the heresiologists usually portrayed Gnostics as licentious or antinomian, the writings of Nag Hammadi reveal that most of them were somewhat ascetic. Their challenge to emerging Christianity's interpretation of the world, Christ and God was strong, widespread and of significant endurance.

See also ANTICHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; DOCETISM; EBIONITES; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, "Pauline Controversies in the Post-Pauline Period," NTS 20 (1973-74) 229-45; R. J. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990); idem, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); J. Bogart, Orthodox and Heretical Perfectionism in the Johannine Community as Evident in the First Epistle of John (SBLDS 33; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1973); R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist, 1979); idem, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); H. C. C. Cavallin, "The False Teachers of 2 Peter as Pseudo-Prophets," NovT 21 (1979) 263-70; B. Fiore, The Function of Personal Example in the Socratic and Pastoral Epistles (AnBib 105; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1986); T. Fornberg, An Early Church in a Pluralistic Society: A Study of 2 Peter (CBNTS 9; Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup, 1977); R. M. Grant, Heresy and Criticism: The Search for Authority in Early Christian Literature (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1993); G. Haufe, "Gnostische Irrlehre und ihre Abwehr in den Pastoralbriefen" in Gnosis und Neues Testament: Studien aus Religionswissenschaft und Theologie, ed. K.-W. Tröger (Gütersloher: Mohn, 1980) 325-39; R. Heiligenthal, "Wer waren die 'Nikolaiten'? Ein Beitrag zur Theologiegeschichte des frühen Christentums," ZNW 82 (1991) 133-37; R. J. Hoffmann, Marcion: On the Restitution of Christianity (AAR Academic Series 46; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1984); L. T. Johnson, "2 Timothy and the Polemic Against False Teachers: A Re-examination," JRS 6-7 (1978-79) 1-26; R. J. Karris, "The Background and Significance of the Polemic of the Pastoral Epistles," JBL 92 (1973) 549-64; E. Käsemann, "Ketzer und Zeuge: Zum johanneischen Verfasserproblem," ZTK 48 (1951) 292-311; A. F. J. Klijn and G. J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects (NovTSup 36; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); G. W. Knight III, The Pastoral Epistles: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1992); J. Lieu, The Second and Third Epistles of John: History and Background, ed. J. Riches (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986); A. J. Malherbe, Social Aspects of Early Christianity (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1978); J. Murphy-O'Connor, "2 Timothy Contrasted with 1 Timothy and Titus," RB 98 (1991) 403-18; J. H. Neyrey, 2 Peter, Jude (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1993); J. Painter, "The 'Opponents' of 1 John," NTS 32 (1986) 48-71; A. F. Segal, "Jewish Christianity" in Eusebius, Christianity and Judaism, ed. H. W. Attridge and G. Hata (SPB 42; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992) 326-51; T. V. Smith, Petrine Controversies in Early Christianity: Attitudes Towards Peter in Christian Writings of the First Two Centuries (WUNT 15; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr-Siebeck, 1985); J. L. Sumney, "Those Who 'Ignorantly Deny Him': The Opponents of Ignatius of Antioch," JECS 1 (1993) 345-65; C. H. Talbert, "II Peter and the Delay of the Parousia," VC 20 (1966) 137-45; D. C. Verner, The Household of God: The Social World of the Pastoral Epistles (SBLDS 71; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); D. F. Watson, "Amplification Techniques in 1 John: The Interaction of Rhetorical Style and Invention," JSNT 51 (1993) 99-123; idem, Invention, Arrangement and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986); R. A. Whitacre, Johannine Polemic: The Role of Tradition and Theology (SBLDS 104; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1980); F. Wisse, "The Epistle of Jude in the History of Heresiology" in Essays on the Nag Hammadi Texts in Honour of Alexander Böhlig, ed. M. Krause (NHS 3; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 133-43.

J. L. Sumney

AGAPE, THE. See LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST.

ALEXANDRIA, ALEXANDRIAN CHRISTIANITY

Because of the scarcity of evidence for the origins and early development of Christianity in Alexandria, our subject is best viewed from the broader perspective of the first three centuries of Christianity. Although this takes us beyond the primary historical focus of this dictionary, the late second and third centuries present vital evidence for the transmission of biblical material by Christians in Alexandria.

1. Historical and Geographical Considerations
2. Philo
3. Hebrews
4. The Catechetical School

1. Historical and Geographical Considerations. Alexandria was the chief seaport of Egypt, situated 129 miles northwest of Cairo. The city was founded by Alexander the Great in 331 B.C. on the site of an earlier Egyptian hamlet called Rhakotis. Under Ptolemy I (Soter) the city became the capital of Egypt, a status that it enjoyed for more than a thousand years. Alexandria prospered under the Ptolemaic dynasty and acquired importance as a cultural and intellectual center for Jews and Greeks alike. It was the home of the Septuagint and witnessed Julius Caesar's and then Antony's interest in Cleopatra. In Christian history it was a major center of the Arian controversy, home to both protagonists and orthodox in it.

Jewish immigration into Egypt goes back as early as the sixth century B.C. (see Josephus J.W. 2 §487). Archaeological excavations have uncovered Jewish tombs from the late fourth century B.C. The Jews were known as a separate community in Alexandria (Ep. Arist. 310), and by the first century the Egyptian Jewish community numbered more than a million people (see Philo Flacc. 43). Judaism* prospered under the Ptolemaic dynasty, but the situation evidently changed under Roman rule after 30 B.C. There was a persecution* of the Jews in Alexandria, and a delegation, led by Philo,* made an unsuccessful appeal to the emperor in A.D. 39. Jewish unrest continued sporadically in the first and second centuries, notably in A.D. 66 and 115. The Jewish rebellion of A.D. 115 resulted in the virtual annihilation of the Alexandrian Jewish community (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.2). It was not substantially restored until the fourth century A.D. The Jewish community was once again destroyed by the Christian bishop Cyril in A.D. 415.

The origins of the Christian presence in Alexandria are difficult to discover, but Christianity was probably brought there by Jewish emigrés from Palestine, evidently before the fall of Jerusalem* in A.D. 70. The Gospels reveal considerable movement between Palestine and Egypt in the first century (Mt 2:13-19; cf. Acts 2:10). Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 2.16.1; 2.4.1) says that John Mark the Evangelist founded the church in Alexandria, but the reliability of this report is difficult to assess. The letter to the Hebrews,* which comes from the late first century A.D., is sometimes associated with Alexandria. If this is so, it would show the presence of a Christian community there and the intellectual ability of some of its members. Church buildings existed in Alexandria before the fourth century, for Eusebius reports the destruction of many of them during the Diocletian persecution of 303-11 (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 8.2). The city was home to the famous catechetical school over which both Clement and Origen in turn presided.

2. Philo.

The strength of Jewish intellectual life in Alexandria is best illustrated by the numerous writings of the biblical philosopher Philo (c. 15 B.C.—A.D. 50). Philo's writings fall into two distinct categories: exposition of the law* of Moses* and exegetical commentaries. Philo's significance for the NT (especially for John and Hebrews) lies in his approach to scriptural exegesis. He accepted the literal meaning of a text (see Philo Migr. Abr. 89-93) but also thought that Scripture contains an allegorical meaning that the exegete must disclose. This double meaning determines his exegetical method: Philo was critical of those who were exclusively literal or allegorical in their work. For him God* is a transcendent spirit who had created the world* by means of his Word, or Logos, which for Philo denoted God's mental activity and which he sometimes presented as an exalted angel* (Philo Conf. Ling. 146). Philo established an attitude toward the Hebrew Scriptures in Alexandria that was both rigorous in its attention to the meaning of the text but also willing to engage in reflection about the religious understanding that the Scriptures conveyed. Early Christianity benefited from this intelligent reflection; the Alexandrian school imitated and developed it.

3. Hebrews.

No NT document, including Hebrews, can be proved to have been written in Alexandria. However, we must acknowledge that Philonic exegesis exercised an important influence on this document. Hebrews shares several exegetical concerns with Philo. The comment about the high priest* in Hebrews 7:27 is often compared with Philo's De Specialibus Legibus 1.131, and there is a certain affinity between the use of cultic imagery in Hebrews 8—10 and Philonic material. The relation between the two must not be over-pressed, however. Philo lacks the emphasis that Hebrews, in company with all other Christian literature, places on eschatology.* Nevertheless, the approach that Philo adopted was more widely disseminated, which explains why Hebrews rather obviously has affinities with the so-called Alexandrian method of exegesis.

Hebrews was written to persuade Christians of the dangers of a return to Judaism. Despite the strongly Jewish character of the language and imagery, it seems unlikely that the recipient church (which has never been identified with certainty) would have been composed of Jewish Christians alone. It was more likely a mixed community, so that Gentiles* are also addressed in the letter. We are perhaps entitled to assume that the author was writing for people who were familiar with the conventions of Alexandrian exegesis and who knew their Bibles well. They would have realized that OT institutions like the sabbath and the tabernacle* had an inner meaning that the letter discloses. This debt to Philonic exegesis must be acknowledged even when it is recognized that early Christianity in general believed that it could interpret the Scriptures with confidence because of its convictions about Jesus and about the imminent eschatological climax (2 Cor 3:16-17).

Hebrews is by no means an easy text to read. The center of its argument is the premise that Jewish institutions had received their fulfillment in the final age that the death of Jesus had inaugurated (see Death of Christ). This is exemplified in the opening chapter, where the ephemeral ministry* of the prophets* (Heb 1:1) and angels (Heb 1:5-14) is contrasted with the permanent achievement of the Son of God (Heb 1:3-4). It was through the Son's offering himself, priest and victim, in the heavenly sanctuary that the decisive reconciliation of humanity to God had been achieved. To desert Christianity, so the author argues, was to negate the achievement of Christ and thus to spurn the redemption* that God had instigated. This central theme accounts for the different methods of argument that are used in Hebrews.

In Hebrews 3 the idea of the divine rest is introduced for the first time. The context is the citation and elucidation of Psalm 95:7-11 (Heb 3:8-11): the passage that says of the rebellious Israelites that they would never enter God's rest. Rest is interpreted as the eschatological sabbath that the author of Hebrews apparently understands in connection with the earthly kingdom* of Christ. This promise of rest could be negated only by disobedience (see Obedience) on the part of the readers (Heb 3:11).

The theme of rest leads to major christological* teaching in the letter. The linchpin of the author's view of Jesus is the mediator's journey from earth to heaven,* a journey that allowed him to make his unique act of atonement in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb 4:14; cf. Heb 10:19-20). In this sense the high-priestly ministry is presented as an antitype of the achievement of Jesus. The author's exegesis of the OT ritual leads him to find reasons why Jesus was different from his earlier counterparts. Jesus was a priest after the order of Melchizedek* (Heb 7:17); he was himself both priest and victim (Heb 9:11-12); and he ministered in the heavenly sanctuary of which the earthly was merely a copy (Heb 8:5). The christology presented in this way has an exegetical foundation. Its key is the recognition that, in the author's view, the OT ritual anticipated the sacrifice* of Jesus, which brought its precursor to its fruition and end.

The eschatological difference between Hebrews and Philo must not be minimized. Philo was essentially a Platonist whose understanding of the soul's destiny was that it would return to its true home in heaven. The background of Hebrews's eschatology has been disputed in twentieth-century scholarship, but there are reasons for questioning the view that its author thought in the same terms. The goal of Hebrews's eschatology is not the heavenly salvation* of the elect* but the appearance on earth of the kingdom of Christ. This is the theme of Hebrews 11, where the author praises the heroes of faith* who anticipated a city that they did not live to see. Christians, by contrast, were on the very threshold of Mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, which the author thought would be revealed on earth (Heb 12:22; cf. Heb 13:14). This eschatology has much in common with that of other NT literature, especially the view expressed by Paul (Gal 4:26) and the author of the Apocalypse (Rev 21—22; see Revelation, Book of). It would be wrong to read Hebrews without acknowledging this central eschatological core. The basis of Hebrews's outlook is its apocalyptic* belief that the city that was currently in heaven would soon be revealed on earth, when the promises* of God would finally be realized.

One must also therefore acknowledge the different uses to which so-called Alexandrian methods of exegesis were put in the ancient Jewish world. Philo was by no means the only example of this method, even if he is the best documented. Hebrews is an interesting glimpse at what may have been a prevalent exegetical method in early Christianity. The distinction between the literal and the allegorical meaning was to exercise an important influence on Alexandrian Christianity in the patristic period.

4. The Catechetical School.

By the late second century A.D. there had emerged in Alexandria the so-called catechetical school, over which both Clement and Origen presided. Clement of Alexandria (c. 150-215) studied at the school under its founder, Pantaenus, whom he succeeded in 190. Clement, who had fled the city in the persecution of 202, is rightly regarded as the first Christian scholar. He knew the Bible and much Christian literature and also classical and philosophical texts. The latter helped Clement to form his distinctive understanding of revelation,* according to which pagan literature contained the seeds of truth that came to full fruit in the Christian faith. Clement opposed the Gnostics, who had taken root in Alexandria by the second century (see Gnosis, Gnosticism), in his insistence that faith is more important than knowledge* (Clement Strom. 6.18.114) and that the earthly life has significance in its own right (Clement Strom. 7.70.6-8). The fact that Clement provides us with the earliest witness to the *Epistle of Barnabas has led many scholars to locate the origin of this late first- or second-century document in Alexandria, though this provenance for the letter is disputed.

Clement was succeeded as head of the school by Origen, who assumed his responsibilities when peace was restored after the persecution. (During the persecution Origen was preserved from martyrdom* only by the foresight of his mother, who hid all his clothes.) Origen too was a learned man. He brought to Alexandrian Christianity a depth of knowledge and a substantial intellectual and reflective ability. Origen remained in Alexandria until 230, when he was deposed from his chair by Bishop Demetrius on the grounds of his supposedly irregular ordination by the bishops of Caesarea and Aelia. Origen's approach to the Bible, which looks back to Philo's, distinguished three senses of the text: the literal, the moral and the allegorical, of which Origen held the third the most important. Corresponding to this distinction was a distinction between different grades of Christians: Origen acknowledged both simple believers and the more able, who could contemplate the Word as he dwelt with the Father.

Origen is noteworthy for his teaching about Christ. He asserts the ultimate transcendence of the Father over the Son and in consequence the Son's subordination to the Father, whom he mediates to the angels and to humanity. He identified the Son with the platonic Logos who had assumed a body and whom, in consequence, Origen called the God-Man (Origen Hom. Ez. 3.3). Origen's understanding of the Holy Spirit* is both imprecise and unsystematic. This is a sobering reminder of the difficulties that attended trinitarian belief in the third century, and that would be resolved only by later conciliar decisions.

In this way Origen exercised a profound importance on later Alexandrian theologians and typified both a method and a christology that came to be associated with that city (as opposed to Antiochene christology). In later times, however, the importance of Alexandria as a Christian center (which ranked second only to Rome at the Council of Nicea in 325) was overshadowed by the emergence of Constantinople as the new imperial capital.

See also CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; HEBREWS; PHILO.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Attridge, Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); C. Bigg, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria (Oxford: Clarendon, 1913); P. Borgen, "Philo of Alexandria" in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M. Stone (CRINT 2; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); J. Daniélou, Origen (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1955); L. K. K. Dey, The Intermediary World and Patterns of Perfection in Philo and Hebrews (SBLDS 26; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); E. de Faye, Origène: Sa vie, son oeuvre, sa pensée (3 vols.; Paris, 1923-28); P. M. Fraser, Ptolemaic Alexandria (3 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon, 1972) 2.2:233-82; E. R. Goodenough, An Introduction to Philo Judaeus (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1940); O. Hofius, Katapausis: Die Vorstellung vom endzeitlichen Ruheort im Hebräerbrief (WUNT 11; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1972); B. A. Pearson, "Earliest Christianity in Egypt" in The Roots of Egyptian Christianity, ed. B. A. Pearson and J. E. Goehring (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); D. Peterson, Hebrews and Perfection (SNTSMS 47; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); S. Sandmel, Philo of Alexandria: An Introduction (New York: Oxford University Press, 1979); J. W. Trigg, Origen: The Bible and Philosophy in the Third-Century Church (Atlanta: John Knox, 1983); R. Williamson, Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970); H. A. Wolfson, Philo (2 vols.; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1947). J. M. Knight

ALLEGORY. See OLD TESTAMENT IN THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

ALLUSIONS, OLD TESTAMENT. See OLD TESTAMENT.

AMEN. See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

AMORAIM. See JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70.

ANCESTORS

Ancestors play an important role in the later NT documents. God* purposed the new covenant* in Christ* in fulfillment of the promises* made to ancestors. Authors depict ancestors as models of behavior to be both emulated and avoided. While both male and female ancestors are noted, the majority of examples are male.

1. Ancestors as Receivers of Promise and Covenant

2. Ancestors as Revered Figures
3. Negative Examples of Ancestors
4. Ethnic and Spiritual Descent from Ancestors
5. The Name of God Specified Using Ancestors' Names

1. Ancestors as Receivers of Promise and Covenant.

Early Jewish and Christian authors speak of how God chose the nation of Israel* for his own from all of the nations. Often this chosen status was related to the reputation of ancestors such as Abraham* or Jacob (Jub. 15:30-32; 1 Clem. 29.2-3; cf. Deut 4:34; 14:2).

The ancestors are often grouped together with the concept of Israel's covenants with God. For example, in the Epistle of Barnabas the covenant given to Moses* on Mount Sinai is highlighted (Barn. 14.1-5; see Barnabas, Epistle of; cf. 2 Cor 3:7-18).

In Acts* ancient covenants are usually shown to be pointers to God's work in Christ. For example, Peter mentions the covenant that God gave to the ancestors (patēr; Acts 3:25; cf. Acts 13:32-33; 26:6-7; Rom 11:28; Barn. 14.1; cf. Barn. 6.8) in order to show that this covenant was realized in Jesus Christ (cf. Lk 1:55; Barn. 14.5).

Stephen* refers to the "covenant of circumcision" (diathēkē peritomēs; Acts 7:8) established with Abraham (Gen 17:10, 12), which confirmed God's promise to grant him descendants (Gen 21:1-4) such as Isaac, Jacob and the twelve patriarchs (Acts 7:8). Abraham's submission to the command of circumcision* (Gen 17:10-14) in turn illustrates his obedience* to God.

In Hebrews* aspects of the old covenant are inferior to the new covenant in Christ. For example, using Jeremiah 31:31-34, the author of Hebrews shows how the new covenant is superior to the old covenant that God made with the people of Israel when he delivered them from Egypt (Heb 8:8-13) but that their forebears (patēr) forsook (Heb 8:9).

God's promise of descendants to Abraham (Gen 12:2-3; 15:5; 17:5; cf. 1 Clem. 10.3, 5-6) is brought to the fore in Hebrews 6:13-15. The author repeats a phrase from the sacrifice* of Isaac concerning an oath God swore "by himself" (Heb 6:13; Gen 22:16) because there was no one greater by whom God could swear (Heb 6:16-17) in order to guarantee the promise.

2. Ancestors as Revered Figures.

2.1. Hebrews 11. Ancestors are sometimes held up as figures deserving reverence and emulation (e.g., 2 Tim 1:3). Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are treated with particularly high regard (Barn. 8.4; cf. Ign. Phld. 9.1). In Hebrews 11 the author "brings before his audience a long series of exemplary witnesses to an enduring faith," who act upon God's promises even though the fulfillment of those promises is not in sight (Lane, 315; cf. Heb 11:2, presbyteroi, "ancestors"). These figures include Abel, whose sacrifice was more acceptable than Cain's (Heb 11:4; cf. Heb 12:24; 1 Jn 3:12; Jude 11). Abel's death at the hand of his brother did not silence his example of faith.*

Enoch, who did not experience death (Heb 11:5; cf. Jude 14; 1 Clem. 9.3) because he "pleased" God (cf. Gen. 5:22, 24 [LXX]; Sir 44:16; Wis 4:10, 14), was often seen in Jewish literature as a figure of repentance* (Sir 44:16) or as a preacher of righteousness* (Jub. 4:22-24). Because of the author's interest in providing examples of faith for his readers, whose confidence in God has been shaken (Heb 10:35), resulting in the defection of some of them (Heb 10:25), he has cast Enoch as an exemplar of obedience.

Noah heeded God's warnings (cf. 1 Pet 3:20; 2 Pet 2:5; 2.4 below) and saved his household,* yet condemned the world (cf. 1 Clem. 7.6; 9.4). Noah endured the contempt of his contemporaries and persevered under God's direction (Gen 6:9-21). He personifies the description of the faithful (Heb 11:6), providing an example to the readers of Hebrews, who are also enduring contempt from their peers. Noah's reward was to be made "heir of righteousness" (Heb 11:7; cf. Gen 6:9; 7:1; Ezek 14:14, 20; 2 Clem. 6.8-9) in accordance with his faith (cf. Heb 10:38; Hab 2:4), a reward* that the persevering reader can also expect (see Endurance).

In Hebrews 11 the author employs Abraham as an example of faith more often than he does than any other figure (cf. 1 Clem. 31.2). Abraham first exemplifies his faith by his obedience to God's call (Heb 11:8; Gen 12:1-2; cf. Gen 15:7; Neh 9:7; Acts 7:2-8; 1 Clem. 10.1-3). His obedience did not bring immediate settlement in the promised land* (Gen 12:14-16; 1 Clem. 10.4); instead it brought a life of pilgrimage for himself and his descendants (Heb 11:9) as he looked toward the ultimate goal, the firmly established city of God (Heb 11:10; cf. Heb 11:1; Ps 48:8; 87:1-3; Is 14:32). Abraham's trust that God would give him a son, even though he and Sarah (cf. 1 Pet 3:6; Gal 4:21-31; Rom 9:9; 1 Clem. 10.5-6) had never produced children and were no longer physically capable of doing so (Heb 11:11; cf. Rom 4:19-21; Gen 15:1-6; 17:15-22; 18:9-15), is eventually rewarded through the birth of his son Isaac (1 Clem. 10.7) and a multitude of descendants (Heb 11:12).

Finally, Abraham exemplifies faith through his willingness to sacrifice his only son and fulfillment of promise, Isaac (Heb 11:17-19; 1 Clem. 10.7). As in other Jewish literature of the time, Abraham's action is celebrated as a model of faithfulness and obedience to God (Sir 44:20; Jdt 8:25-26; 1 Macc 2:52; 4 Macc 16:20; cf. Jas 2:21-24; 1 Clem. 10:7). The readers may see the "sacrifice" of Isaac as a foreshadowing of God's raising Jesus from the dead. From this they could derive faith in the God who is faithful to his promises (Swetnam, 122-23, 128).

Isaac manifests his faith not only in his life of pilgrimage (Heb 11:9; cf. Heb 11:18; Acts 7:8) but also as he confers blessing* upon his sons, Jacob and Esau (Gen 27:1-40; cf. Heb 12:16; Rom 9:13), an action through which he continued to look for the fulfillment of promises yet unseen (Heb 11:20). Similarly Jacob (cf. Heb 11:9; Acts 7:12-15; Gen 47:29-31) blesses Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen 48:1-22) while he was still sojourning. This fact is attested to by his use of a staff (Heb 11:21), which for the Jews was a sign of pilgrimage. God's faithfulness in spite of human folly is exemplified in that in both cases of blessing strict observance of birth order is not observed. In Isaac's case Jacob received Esau's blessing (Gen 27:1-40; cf. 1 Clem. 31.4; Rebekah's insight, Barn. 13.2-3), while in the case of Jacob his right hand rested on the head of the youngest (Ephraim) rather than the oldest (Manasseh; Gen 48:12-20; cf. Barn. 13.4-5). Even in the face of death Joseph (cf. Acts 7:9, 13-14, 18) saw the as yet unseen fulfillment of the promise (Heb 11:22; cf. Heb 11:1) of inheriting the land in which he directed that his body should be buried rather than in Egypt (Gen 50:24-25; cf. Acts 7:15-16).

In disobedience to the edict to kill all male babies (Ex 1:15-22; 2:1-2), Moses' (cf. Acts 7:20-44) parents saw a sign of God's favor in his appearance (Heb 11:23; cf. Acts 7:20; Ex 2:2 [LXX]; Josephus Ant. 2.9.5 §225; 2.9.6 §230-31) and hid him, because their faith in God's purposes overcame their fear of Pharaoh. Moses' renunciation of temporary power and privilege (Ex 2:11-12; D'Angelo, 43-45), perhaps even as a successor to Pharaoh (Heb 11:24; D'Angelo, 42-43), to join the ill-treated Hebrew people (Heb 11:25) marks him as a man of faith, who focuses on the reward that the unseen God (Heb 11:27; on Moses' humility see 1 Clem. 17.5-6) grants those who please him (Heb 11:26). As God's work through Moses' suffering* eventually resulted in the coming of the Messiah (Heb 11:26), so God's purposes will be realized through the readers who persevere in the midst of suffering for Christ. The author emphasizes Moses' observance of God's directions for Passover (Heb 11:28; Ex 11:1-12:28; cf. Heb 3:5; 1 Clem. 17.5; 43.1), which spared their firstborn children and livestock from the plague of death that devastated the Egyptians and was the final, critical event in the deliverance of God's people from enslavement.

God's power on behalf of his people is demonstrated by the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea (Heb 11:29; cf. Rom 10:1-4) and the fall of Jericho (Heb 11:29-30). Further specific ancestors include Rahab (Heb 11:31; cf. Mt 1:5) the prostitute, who is often seen as an example of faith and good works (cf. Jas 2:25; 1 Clem. 12.1-8; see Faith and Works) because of her assistance to Joshua's spies and her faith in the God of Israel (Josh 2:1-15).

Six figures are mentioned as if in passing (Heb 11:32). These are intended to remind us of Gideon's victory over the Midianites (Judg 6:33—8:21), Sisera's defeat under the command of Barak as supported by Deborah (Judg 4:4-16), Samson's victories over the Philistines (Judg 13:1—16:31) and Jephthah's devotion to God in the face of the Ammonites (Judg 10:6—11:32). David (cf. Rev 22:16) is a popular figure in the exemplary tradition (Sir 45:25; 47:2-11; 1 Clem. 18.1-17; cf. 4.13), particularly in view of his conviction of God's providence and faithfulness (1 Sam 17:26, 32, 34-37, 45-47). The judge (1 Sam 7:15-17) and prophet (1 Sam 3:19-20; cf. Acts 3:24; 13:20) Samuel is remembered particularly for his intercession on behalf of Israel at Mizpah, when Israel defeated the Philistines (1 Sam 7:5-14). Further deeds by exemplary forebears are listed without using particular names (Heb 11:33-38), but the discussion presupposes a detailed knowledge of Israelite history (drawn from 1-2 Macc) that would enable one to recognize the situations mentioned and the faith exemplified.

2.2. Acts 7. Stephen's* speech contains another major catalogue of revered ancestors. The speech provides the framework for several allusions to Abraham (Acts 7:2-8, 16-17, 32) in which he appears as the recipient of promises by which his descendants benefit.

Stephen speaks of Abraham's departing from his homeland in obedience to God's call (Acts 7:2-4; see 2.1 above; Gen 12:1; Gen 15:7; Neh 9:7). He magnifies Abraham's trust in God when he shows that Abraham possessed no land but received only a promise of land (Acts 7:5; cf. Gen 12:7; 13:15; 17:7-8; 48:4; 1 Clem. 10.4) for himself and his offspring.

By including references to the prophecy to Abraham about his descendants' four-hundred-year (Acts 7:6-7; cf. Ex 12:40; Gal 3:17) bondage in Egypt (Gen 15:13-14; cf. Ex 2:22) Luke emphasizes God's faithfulness to his people in the midst of crisis. In an expansion of Exodus 3:12 (Acts 7:7) Luke modifies the term mountain (horos), used for Sinai in the Septuagint; he substitutes "place" (topos), referring to Jerusalem* or the temple* itself (cf. Acts 6:13-14). God's faithfulness to his promise to Abraham is demonstrated in that his descendants could worship* God in that very "place."

The story of Joseph (Acts 7:9-16; Heb 11:21-22; Rev 7:8) illustrates God's continued care for his people as exemplified by Joseph's wisdom* (Acts 7:10), which won him a ruling position in Egypt (Gen 41:41). Wisdom is a particular sign of God's favor to his faithful disciples (cf. Acts 7:22) and could include a variety of manifestations, including Joseph's divinely inspired skill in the reading of dreams (Gen 40:1-41:36).

Stephen then shows how Jacob (cf. Heb 11:9, 21; 2.1 above) and his family came to Egypt: because of severe famine (Acts 7:11-12; Gen 41:57). The severity of famine in Canaan may have been a result of divine retribution for the actions of Joseph's brothers (Acts 7:9; cf. 1 Clem. 4.9), which was later instrumental in bringing about God's purposes (Marshall, 138; cf. Acts 7:15-16; Heb 11:22).

Moses' life (Acts 7:20-44) is treated in three parts, each part corresponding to forty years (Acts 7:23, 30). Moses is born "beautiful" before God (Acts 7:20; Philo Vit. Mos. 1.9, 18; cf. 2.1 above; Heb. 11:23) and is brought up in Pharaoh's house, instructed in wisdom (cf. Acts 7:10). In contrast to the account in Exodus, Stephen states that Moses' concern for his kinspeople is manifested when he kills an Egyptian who was oppressing an Israelite (Acts 7:24-25; Ex 2:11-15). Moses may have hoped that as a result of his actions the Israelites would recognize that they had a type of savior* in the form of one who was influential. This is not the case (Acts 7:26-28; cf. 1 Clem. 4.11), and Moses flees to Midian, where he has a family (Acts 7:29; Ex 2:21-22; 18:1-5). Stephen's addition probably points to an intentional parallel between Moses and Christ, intended to show the reader the continuity of God's faithful actions in history on behalf of his people and their continued rejection of his emissaries (cf. Acts 7:52).

God appears to Moses in a burning bush with the promise of the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt (Acts 7:30-34; Ex 3:1-12). Stephen reverses the order of the statements in Exodus (Ex 3:5-6; cf. Acts 7:32-33) which address Moses removing his sandals and the declaration of God's identity as the God of his fathers, so that "it is the God of Moses' ancestors who is revealing himself" (Marshall, 141; see 5 below). God's faithfulness to his promises to earlier forebears continues (Acts 7:6-7; cf. Acts 13:17-18) through his revelation* to Moses.

Stephen further depicts Moses as having qualities similar to those Christ had that would be recognized by the Christian reader (Acts 7:35-36). Moses is called "ruler" (cf. 1 Clem. 43). Ruler is a term that was also applied to Christ (archēgos; cf. Acts 5:31). Moses is also "redeemer" (lytrōtēs; cf. 1 Clem. 53), which is descriptive of Christ's activity (Lk 2:38; 24:21) as well (see Redemption). Moses was further responsible for a prophecy (Deut 18:15; Heb 1:1-2; cf. Barn. 6.8-19) about the coming of a prophet like himself, "which the early Christians had already begun to see fulfilled in the coming of Jesus" (Marshall, 142; cf. Acts 3:22; Barn. 12). Yet those who followed Moses did not obey him and turned back to Egypt "in their hearts" (Acts 7:38), turning to idolatry* (Acts 7:40-41; Ex 32:1; cf. Acts 7:52).

Finally, Stephen speaks of Moses receiving the pattern of the tabernacle* in the wilderness (Acts 7:44; Ex 25:40; cf. Heb 8:5-6; Jude 9). While they are not specifically mentioned, the law* or customs of the Israelites are attributed to Moses (Heb 10:28; Acts 13:39; 15:1, 5, 21; 21:21; 28:23; Barn. 10.9, 11).

Joshua (cf. Heb. 4:8) took with him the tabernacle when the Israelites took possession of their promised land (Acts 7:45). According to Stephen, David found favor with God (Acts 7:46), which most likely refers to his being the ruler of a united kingdom and enjoying possession of the land. But it was also David (cf. Acts 2:29; 4:25; Mt 1:17), a man who was said to carry out God's wishes (Acts 13:22), who desired to build a place for God to dwell with his people (Ps 132:4-5; cf. 2 Sam 6:17). Solomon (cf. Mt 6:29; 12:42; Lk 11:31; 12:27) is noted for actually building the first temple (Acts 7:47; cf. 2 Sam 7:5-16).

2.3. James. James* uses the figures of Abraham (Jas 2:21-24) and Rahab (Jas 2:25) in order to show how faith without works is dead (Jas 2:26). Abraham, known for his exemplary faith (see 2.1 above), was also revered for his obedience to God because of his willingness to sacrifice Isaac, another popular story in Jewish circles. James 2:21-24 brings these two traditions together in order to show how Abraham's faith was brought to completion (Jas 2:22) through his willingness to sacrifice Isaac.

Abraham is also known as the "friend of God" (Jas 2:23), which is a popular description for him (1 Clem. 10.1; 12.2; CD 3:2-4), and as one who exhibits exemplary hospitality* (1 Clem. 10.7; T. Abr. 1:1-3A; Philo Abr. 107-10; Josephus Ant. 1.11.2 §196).

Rahab (Jas 2:25), one of the few women mentioned, is praised in traditions of the time (Mt 1:5; Heb. 11:31) and is lauded for her provision of hospitality to Joshua's spies (Josh 2:1-15; 1 Clem. 12.1, 3). Her actions also fulfill the earlier command to provide food and shelter for those in need (Jas 2:14-17).

In the context of exhorting his readers to patient endurance, James uses Job as an example of one who was steadfast in his faith (Jas 5:11; cf. 2 Clem. 6.8-9). This endurance leads to blessing (Jas 5:11). The readers have apparently heard of Job's endurance already. Whether they considered Job to have been steadfast even though he complained to God (Job 7:11-16; 10:18; 23:2; 30:20-23) or whether they had been influenced by the Testament of Job, which casts Job's wife as the complainer (e.g., Test. Job 24:1-4), is not clear. The point is that even in the midst of dire circumstances Job did not lose his faith in God and that God seemed to have a purpose in such suffering—Job's understanding of God's faithful nature (Job 42:5). The readers should emulate Job's example in the midst of their own trials.

James characterizes Elijah as a man who was a "human being with a nature like ours" (anthrōpos ēn homoiopathēs hēmin; Jas 5:17; cf. Acts 14:15), meaning that he had the same limitations as do all human beings. Yet Elijah was able to offer fervent prayer* that was so effective that he could control the rain (Jas 5:17-18; cf. 1 Kings 18:41-45; 4 Ezra 7:109; rabbinic legend calls him the "Key of Rain"; see commentaries). James is informing his readers that they have access to the same divine assistance as Elijah did.

2.4. Miscellaneous Figures. Noah (1 Pet 3:20; 2 Pet 2:5; cf. Heb 11:6; see 2.1 above) heeded God's warnings about the flood and saved his household (Gen 6—9; cf. 1 Clem. 9.4), yet the world was condemned (2 Pet 2:5). God patiently waited for generations for humanity to turn from evil (Gen 6:3-7), even through the building of the ark (1 Pet 3:20). Noah, who was believed to have preached righteousness* (2 Pet 2:5; cf. Sib. Or. 1:148-98; 1 Clem. 7.6), is contrasted with the ungodly (2 Pet 2:5). A fate similar to that of those who did not believe in the time of Noah will befall the false teachers.* In 1 Peter* the flood prefigured baptism* (1 Pet 3:21) because the readers have also experienced salvation* by passing through the water to safety. Just as a believing remnant remained in the time of Noah (1 Pet 3:20), so the persecuted readers will be delivered.

Lot (2 Pet 2:7-8; cf. Lk 17:28-29) is heralded as a righteous man who is helpless to prevent the blatant evil that surrounds him (Gen 18:22-32; cf. Gen 19:1-11). Clement (see Clement of Rome) praises Lot for his hospitality and piety, for which he was saved from the destruction of Sodom (1 Clem. 11.1). The readers of 2 Peter may identify with this man who not only is saved by God from evil (Gen 19:12-22; 29) but also is distressed by the evil around him, desiring that righteousness be done in the world.*

In early Jewish and Christian literature Isaac is sometimes seen as a revered figure because he was willing to allow himself to be sacrificed (1 Clem. 31.3; Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 32.3-4; 40.2). Clement reports that it was Jacob's meekness in leaving behind his country after gaining Isaac's blessing (Gen 27:41-45) that gained Jacob the scepter of the twelve tribes of Israel (1 Clem. 31.4). It is also from Jacob that the Levites, kings and the Messiah came (1 Clem. 32.2).

Figures whom Clement praises but who are not found in the NT include Esther, who is lauded for facing danger so that she might rescue Israel through her humble seeking of God (1 Clem. 55.6; cf. Esther 4:9-17); Ezekiel (1 Clem. 17.1), who is known as a prophet who heralded the coming of Christ; Daniel, who is known for his righteousness (2 Clem. 6.8-9; cf. 1 Clem. 45.6); and Jonah, who is a messenger of repentance* and the forgiveness* of God (1 Clem. 7.7).

3. Negative Examples of Ancestors.

While many of Israel's ancestors were revered, some are recalled in order to caution readers against the kind of behavior exhibited by them (cf. Lk 6:23; 6:26; 11:47-48). For example, while Hebrews contains accounts of several exemplary ancestors, it also contains a warning against the readers acting as those who wandered in the wilderness. In Hebrews 3:7-11 the author cites Psalm 95:7-11, which contains the warning that the hardness of heart exhibited by those in the wilderness must not be emulated (cf. Ex 17:1-7; Num 14:20-23; 28-35; 20:2-13; Heb 4:2, 6, 8; 1 Cor 10:5; Barn. 2.7-9; 1 Clem. 51.3-5). In early Christian literature even Aaron and Miriam are portrayed negatively for their jealousy of Moses' prophetic gifts (1 Clem. 4.11; cf. Num 12:1-15). The readers of Hebrews are warned not to become like those who wandered in the wilderness and did not enter the promised land because of their unbelief (Heb 3:12-19). For those who persevere in their faith, the promised rest of God remains (Heb 4:9-10).

The writer of Hebrews also portrays Esau in a negative light (Heb 12:16; cf. Rom 9:13) because he sold his birthright for a pot of lentil stew (Gen 25:34). Esau is called "godless" (bebēlos) because he was concerned foremost with personal gratification and relinquished his status as firstborn for the sake of momentary satisfaction. In a pointed reading of the account in Genesis (Heb 12:16; Gen 27:30-40) the author refers to the birthright which Esau rejected, and notes that he, through Isaac, later would not receive the blessing even though he sought it with tears. The example speaks to those in the persecuted community who are tempted to apostatize, or to leave behind their own birthright in the new covenant in Christ. The result of such apostasy* is inescapable judgment* and rejection by God.

While some ancestors are revered in Stephen's speech (e.g., Acts 7:1-4 and 2.2 above), others serve as negative examples. The patriarchs are jealous of Joseph (Acts 7:9; Gen 37:11), selling him into slavery (Gen 37:28; 45:4) from which God rescues him (Acts 7:9-10). Other ancestors did not see that God had appointed Moses as their salvation from oppression in Egypt (Acts 7:27, 35; Ex 2:14; cf. 1 Clem. 4.10). Nor did they obey him in the wilderness (Acts 7:39; Num 14); they turned to idolatry (Acts 7:40-41; Ex 32:1,4), resulting in God's turning away from them and handing them over to worship the host of heaven* (Deut 4:19).

In Stephen's final scathing words to his Jewish listeners, he attacks them for sharing the attitudes shown by their ancestors (cf. Acts 28:25-28; 1 Pet 1:18, patroparadotos). They are obstinate ("stiff-necked"; cf. Ex 33:3) and uncircumcised in heart and ears, which refers to their being proud and sinful and resisting the Holy Spirit* (cf. Lev 26:41; Deut 10:16; Jer 4:4; 6:10; Is 63:10). Those listening also fit the established tradition that the Jewish people had been responsible for the deaths of the prophets (1 Kings 19:10, 14; Neh 9:26; Jer 26:20-24; Lk 6:23; 11:49; 13:34; 1 Thess 2:15; Heb 11:36-38) because they murdered the "Righteous One" (Acts 7:52; cf. Jas 5:6), Jesus, who was the Messiah or "coming" one (Acts 7:52).

Cain was known not only for murder and hatred for his brother (1 Benj. 7:5; 1 Clem. 4.6-7) but also as the archetypal sinner and the one who instructed others in sin (Josephus Ant. 1.2.1-2 §§52-66). In the context of 1 John (see John, Letters of), in which the person who sins belongs to the devil (1 Jn 3:8; cf. Jn 8:44), Cain, who was mastered by sin when he murdered his brother (Gen 4:7-8), is said to be "from the evil one" (1 Jn 3:12; cf. Heb 11:4). For the readers of 1 John, Cain stands for those who are children of the devil (1 Jn 3:12; see Satan), perhaps secessionists from the believing community. They are in stark contrast to those who are adherents to the faith, or the children of God (1 Jn 3:1, 7; see Sonship). In Jude* those false teachers who "go the way of Cain" (Jude 11) have conducted themselves in a manner similar to Cain in that they taught immorality (see Purity) and also enticed others into sin.

Although in the biblical account Balaam refused to be persuaded to curse Israel for the sake of monetary reward (Num 22:18; 24:13; cf. Deut 23:4; Neh 13:2), later Jewish exegetes portray him as accepting Balak's invitation out of greed for the promised reward (Philo Vit. Mos. 1.266-68; Philo Mig. 114). Jewish texts also portray Balaam as advising Balak how to entice Israel into sexual immorality and idolatry (Ps.-Philo Bib. Ant. 18.13; Num 31:16), so Balaam was regarded as responsible for Israel's apostasy (Num 25:1-3) and the divine judgment that resulted (Num 25:9). In the General Epistles Balaam represents those false teachers who are disobedient to God for the sake of financial reward (Jude 11; 2 Pet 2:15). In Revelation following the example of Balaam means that some of those in Pergamum influence others, either literally or metaphorically, to compromise with idolatrous practices (Rev 2:14).

Korah, who led a rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num 16:1-35; 26:9-10) and ultimately against God, was a classic example of a lawless schismatic (1 Clem. 51.3-4; 4.12). Because Korah was believed to have persuaded others to follow him against Moses and Aaron (cf. 1 Clem. 4.12), he was a natural prototype for heretical teachers in the church (cf. 2 Tim 2:19; Num 16:5).

Saul is mentioned negatively in the early church texts as one who persecuted David because of jealousy (1 Clem. 4.13).

4. Ethnic and Spiritual Descent from Ancestors. Adam is of course the ancestor of the entire human race (Acts 17:26; Lk 3:38; 1 Clem. 6.3, "father" Adam). Eve is usually portrayed negatively, as the one responsible for the Fall (2 Cor 11:3; Barn. 12.5; cf. 1 Tim 2:13; Diogn. 12.8; Adam and Eve). Enoch is said to have been born in the seventh generation from Adam (Jude 14; Lk 3:37).

Abraham is the patriarch (Heb 7:4) from whom descent is necessary if one is to be considered ethnically Jewish (Heb 7:5; Mt 1:2, 17; Rom 4:1, propatōr; cf. Rom 4:11-12; "daughter of Abraham," Lk 13:16). This is reflected in the NT documents, as believers often appeal to this descent when speaking to Jews (Acts 7:2) or when Jews (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8; Jn 8:33) or Jewish Christians speak of themselves (Jas 2:21; Rom 11:1; cf. Heb 7:10).

It is through Isaac that descent from Abraham comes (Heb 11:18; cf. Rom 9:10). David is often invoked as one of the premier ancestors of the Jewish people who also represents royalty (Acts 2:29, patriarchēs; Acts 4:25; Mk 11:10; Lk 1:32, 73). He is known for his great humility, specifically because he is a man after God's own heart (1 Clem. 18.1), and for his prophetic gifts, especially in view of his calling Jesus "Lord" (Ps 110:1), thus proving that Christ was not David's son but Lord* (Barn. 12.10-11; cf. 10.10).

Jesus Christ is said to be a descendant of David (Mt 1:6, 17; Lk 3:31; Jn 7:42; Rom 1:3; 2 Tim. 2:8; Rev 5:5; 22:16; Ign. Eph. 18.2; 20.2; Ign. Trall. 9.1; Ign. Rom. 7.3; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; Did. 9.2) and Abraham (Mt 1:2, 17; Lk 3:34) as well as scores of other ancient Israelites (Mt 1:2-17; Lk 3:23-38).

Although references to spiritual descent from Israel's ancestors are not often found outside of Paul's letters (e.g., Rom 4:9-13, 16; Gal 3:6-7; 4:28), Jesus is also said to have come to help the descendants of Abraham (Heb 2:16), to take hold of the persevering believing community to deliver them from the fear of death (Heb 2:15). Early Christian authors depict Abraham as one who is no longer father of Jews alone or of Jews and Christians but father of Gentiles alone (Barn. 13.7).

5. The Name of God Specified Using Ancestors' Names.
During his speech in Solomon's portico, Peter identifies the God of the people of Israel, using the names of his ancestors (patēr), Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Acts 3:13; cf. Ex 3:6; Mt 22:32; 12:26), as the God whose "servant" Jesus was. As is the case elsewhere in Acts (cf. 5:30; 7:32, 52; 22:14; 24:14, patrōos) this identification serves to remind the Jews that this is the God with whom they had a covenant and demonstrates continuity between that covenant and God's work through Jesus Christ.

Early church fathers (see Apostolic Fathers) similarly use the names of ancestors to identify God as the God of the Jews. For example, in the *Didache God is identified as the "God of David" (Did. 10.6).

See also ABRAHAM; MOSES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990);

M. R. D'Angelo, Moses in the Letter to the Hebrews (SBLDS 42; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); M. Dibelius, James: A Commentary on the Epistle of James, reissued by H. Greeven (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Oxford: Blackwell, 1971); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles (Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press, 1980); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. B. Polhill, Acts: An Exegetical and Theological Exposition of Holy Scripture (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); J. Swetnam, Jesus and Isaac: A Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews in Light of the Aqedah (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1981).

N. Calvert-Koyzis

ANGELS, HEAVENLY BEINGS, ANGEL CHRISTOLOGY

Angels as spiritual beings and powers are found throughout the canonical and extracanonical biblical literature, and they feature especially in the late NT and early Christian writings.

1. Background
2. Acts of the Apostles
3. Hebrews and General Epistles
4. The Book of Revelation
5. Early Christian Literature
6. Angels and Christology

1. Background.

1.1. Terms for Angels. While the Bible employs the term angel (Heb māl'ak; Gk angelos) most frequently for spiritual beings, it can also speak of them as "gods" or "sons of God" ([bᵉnê] ʾĕlîm), "holy ones," "spirits," "princes," "host" or "watchers." The only named holy angels in the Bible are Gabriel and Michael (and Raphael in the book of Tobit); however, angelic names and titles proliferate in early Jewish apocalyptic (e.g., 4QShirShabb; 1 Enoch 6:7-8; 20; 3 Enoch 14—29).

1.2. Angels in the Old Testament. The two most important themes of OT angelology are angels in the "divine council" (1 Kings 22:19-23; Job 1—2) and the "angel of the LORD," who is a singular messenger closely identified with Yahweh himself (Judg 13:8-23; cf. Gen 18—19). There are holy angels (Ps 148:2), fallen angels (Gen 6:1-4) and corrupt angels (Ps 82). Angels can be seen as presiding over the nations (Deut 32:8-9) or, in the case of Michael, over Israel (Dan 10:13).

1.3. Angels in Jewish Apocalyptic. Angels are increasingly prominent in the book of Daniel and in the apocrypha and pseudepigrapha of the OT (see Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal Writings). Apocalyptic* involves the unveiling of secrets of the end time and heavenly world, and angels frequently function as guides and interpreters in these realms (T. Levi 2—5). The myth of the fallen Watchers and their demonic offspring (1 Enoch 6—11; cf. Gen 6:1-4) becomes a popular theme among apocalyptically minded Jews and Christians. The Dead Sea Scrolls have provided a new store of angelology contemporaneous with the NT. Qumran* angelology combines a marvelous sense of fellowship between angels and humans with the conviction of participating in spiritual warfare between the Belial, the "prince of darkness," and Michael, the angel of light (1QS 3:22-23; 1QM 13). The close identification of a principal angel with God* reappears in figures like Michael (Dan 12:1), the angel Melchizedek at Qumran and Yahoel in the Apocalypse of Abraham.

1.4. Angels in the New Testament. The NT reflects the apocalyptic milieu of early Judaism.* Angels are particularly present at the boundaries of this world and heaven.* They are party to the birth, resurrection* and ascension* of Jesus; they rejoice over one sinner who repents; and they will accompany Christ* at his Parousia.* In Paul's letters angels figure particularly as intermediary "principalities and powers" (Rom 8:38-39; see DPL, Principalities and Powers). The powers, like the OT angels of the nations, exercise a necessary though frequently corrupt authority* in this age, but they are superseded by Christ and his people in the heavenly places (Eph 1:17-23).

2. Acts of the Apostles.

2.1. The Acts of Angels. Considering the prominence of the Holy Spirit* in the book of Acts,* the continued activity of angels in salvation history, equally distributed in Luke and Acts, is noteworthy. At times an angel and the Spirit operate interchangeably (Acts 8:26, 29, 39 [cf. Acts 8:39, Western text]). Angels are perceived in a vision,* as when Peter is freed from jail or possibly when Paul sees a "Macedonian man" summoning him to help (Acts 12:6-11; 16:9-10). In Luke's recital of salvation history, angels continue to punctuate key moments: Jesus' ascension (Acts 1:10), the miraculous exodus of the apostles* and Peter from prison (Acts 5:19; 12:11), the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch and the Gentile* Cornelius* (Acts 8:26; 10:3, 7, 22; 11:13), the death of Herod (Acts 12:23) and the comforting of the shipwrecked Paul (Acts 27:23). So while Luke-Acts recounts the "demise of the devil" and magic* through the preaching of the gospel, it continues to see a place for angelic helpers in the history of the church.

2.2. Episodes Involving Angels. Acts touches on several peculiar beliefs about angels. Stephen,* who has been described as "full of faith and the Holy Spirit" and "full of grace and power," is brought before the Sanhedrin, and even his opponents cannot but notice that "his face was like the face of an angel" (Acts 6:15; cf. Rev 10:1; Esther 15:13 Vulgate; Dan 3:25[92] LXX). Later, when Peter is freed from prison and Rhoda leaves him standing at the gate, the believers scoff at her, saying "It is his angel!" (Acts 12:15). It is unclear whether they mean by this his angelic double (Mt 18:10; Tob 5:22; Herm. Vis. 5.2; T. Jacob 2:5) or they believe he has died and his spirit hovers near (Lk 24:37; Mt 22:30). Finally Luke's claim that "the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection or angel or spirit" (Acts 23:8) would seem to require some qualification in that the Sadducees accepted the authority of the Pentateuch, in which angels are prominent. Perhaps they differed from the Pharisees and Paul in assigning angels to a past dispensation (cf. Acts 23:9).

3. Hebrews and General Epistles.

The General Epistles mention angels with the purpose of confirming basic teaching on the person and work of Christ (Hebrews,* 1 Peter*) or of warning against moral and eschatological* laxity (Jude,* 2 Peter*). In referring to "angels" and "glorious ones," the writers do not necessarily mean the holy angels but may include the lower principalities and powers, including custodians of the Law* (Heb 2:2).

3.1. Hebrews. The comparison of Christ with the angels in Hebrews 1—2 belongs apparently to the "elementary doctrine of Christ," which the author now reiterates by means of a series of proof-texts. God's preparatory word in the OT had already indicated a fundamental distinction between the Son* and the angels. The angels are always "sons of God" (plural), whereas Christ is the firstborn Son, worshiped by angels (Heb 1:5-6). The angels are fellow inhabitants of heaven, but the Son rules in God's name, and the angels serve him (Heb 1:7-9). The angels are creatures, while the Son is the agent of creation* (Heb 1:10-12). The Son is also the agent of salvation,* whereas the angels merely serve those who are being saved (Heb 1:13-14).

Having established the deity of Christ, the author continues comparing Christ and the angels to establish his full humanity. He interprets Psalm 8:6-8 christologically,* pointing up the paradox that the "man" and "son of man" is "made 'for a time' lower than the angels" but is now crowned with glory* and dominion (Heb 2:9). The psalmist marveled at the mystery of God's overreaching the angels to choose human covenant* partners. Thus "it is fitting," the author says, that the Son should partake of the same nature and be perfected through suffering* (Heb 2:10). Because Christians live in the interim age when they do not see Jesus crowned with glory (as they might see a vision of angels), they may inherit the promised sonship only by faith* and endurance* (Heb 2:8-9; 6:12). The eschatological vision of heaven in Hebrews 12:22-24 reflects this same cosmic reordering, where the perfected human saints are brought into proximity to God and Christ, and the angels form the outer circle.

In the more advanced teaching in Hebrews 7, the author speaks of Melchizedek* as a type of Christ. The publication of the Melchizedek scroll from Qumran has raised the possibility that, in addition to its use of Psalm 110:4 and Genesis 14:18-20, Hebrews is addressing Essene converts who thought of Melchizedek as the archangel Michael, who redeems Israel* in the end of days. Hebrews, however, seems to involve a separate exegetical tradition, focused on the OT personage as a type of Christ.

3.2. 1 Peter. In Peter's attempt to assure his congregations that Christ's death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection have procured them an "inheritance kept for them in heaven" (1 Pet 1:4), he makes several allusions to angelic intermediaries as representing inferior or evil dispensations in salvation history. Neither the OT prophets nor the angels were able to discern the mystery of the apostolic gospel (1 Pet 1:10-12). Furthermore, Christ, being made alive in the spirit, "preached to the spirits in prison" from the days of Noah (1 Pet 3:19). This difficult verse probably is to be seen as parallel with 1 Peter 3:22: by his resurrection and ascension Christ manifested his victory over the principalities and powers of the present world order (Eph 1:20-23; Col 2:15; 1 Tim 3:16).

3.3. Jude and 2 Peter. Jude, probably followed by 2 Peter, makes specific reference to the sin and imprisonment of the Watchers (Jude 6; 2 Pet 2:4; cf. 1 Enoch 6—11) as an OT warning against libertinism. Similarly these writings contrast the arrogance of those teachers who "insult the glorious ones," the upholders of the present world order, when even strong angels like the archangel Michael (in an early Jewish tradition about Moses*) refuse to pronounce judgment on the devil himself (Jude 8; 2 Pet 2:10-11; see Satan). By contrast believers will wait patiently for "the Lord"* (i.e., Christ, not Michael) to come with his holy ones to judge the world (Jude 14-15; cf. 2 Pet 3:10-13).

4. The Book of Revelation.

The final book of the canon* is a unique Christian prophecy* that draws from OT apocalyptic sources (especially Ezekiel, Zechariah and Daniel) in which angels serve as divine courtiers, guardians and guides of God's people and agents of judgment (see Revelation, Book of).

4.1. Revelation Through an Angel. Despite the ubiquity of angels in the Apocalypse, they play an ancillary role in revelation* itself. John's prophecy comes from God through Jesus Christ, who sent his angel to John (Rev 1:1-3; 22:6). However, the agents of revelation in Revelation 1—10 are the exalted Christ and the Spirit. R. J. Bauckham (1993, 254) argues that the core prophecy of the two cities in Revelation 12:1--22:5 is contained in the scroll* (Rev 5:1), which is unsealed by the Lamb* and delivered to John by the strong angel in Revelation 10. At the end of this vision of the cities, the angel forbids John from worshiping him, declaring that he is a fellow servant of the prophets and those who study the book as God's word (Rev 19:10; 22:8-9).

4.2. Angels of the Churches. In his initial vision John sees Christ, holding in his right hand seven stars, which represent "the angels of the seven churches" (Rev 1:12-16, 20). Each of the seven letters is then addressed to the "angel of the church in . . . " (Rev 2—3). The nearly unanimous view today is that these angels are not elders or bishops but spiritual entities like the angelic princes of the nations. Each angel is so closely identified with the congregation that John occasionally addresses it in the second person plural (Rev 2:10, 13). The angels are not necessarily holy (cf. the twenty-four elders). Indeed, Christ calls them to repentance.* W. Wink (1986, 73) argues that they are the corporate personality and vocation of each congregation.

4.3. Angels and the Triune God. In the vision of the divine throne (Rev 4—5), angels serve to highlight the transcendence of God and the Lamb. The throne is encircled by heavenly representatives of the mysteries of creation (four living creatures) and election* (twenty-four elders). As in the OT, this divine council contributes little counsel to God (cf. 1 Kings 22:20; Is 40:13). Even the "strong angel" can merely announce the sealed scroll of God's plan, but no creature can open it or look into it (Rev 5:2-3). When the Lamb proceeds to take the scroll, he is hailed with similar acclamations as the Lord God (Rev 4:1; 5:9). The revelation of God and the Lamb calls forth praise* from all the angels and from every creature (Rev 5:11-14). Throughout the book, Christ as the Lamb is consistently placed on the divine side of the distinction between God and creature. Similarly the sevenfold Spirit is differentiated from the traditional archangels of Jewish apocalyptic (Rev 1:4; 4:6; 5:6; 8:2).

4.4. Angels and Saints. The heavenly beings in Revelation, in a manner reminiscent of Qumran angelology, share special fellowship* with and concern for God's people. The twenty-four elders offer bowls* of incense, "which are the prayers of the saints" (Rev 5:8). At a critical moment an angel interrupts the flow of judgment* in order to seal the elect, and the angel host joins with him in acclaiming God's salvation (Rev 7:2-4, 10-12). In a climactic pause in the heavenly liturgy, an angel presents the prayers* of the full complement of saints, which leads to convulsions on earth (Rev 8:1-5).

4.5. Angels and Spiritual Warfare. The holy angels announce and carry out God's judgment of the world. The judgment of Babylon* is initiated by Michael and his angels and completed by Christ, the rider on the white horse and his angels (Rev 12:7-8; 19:11-16). The secondary role of Michael stands in contrast with the Qumran War Scroll and Melchizedek text, in which the archangel is the final deliverer of God's people (cf. 1 Thess 4:16).

4.6. Angels and the Parousia. With the coming of Christ, angels bow out of the picture. The millennial "thrones" are occupied by the martyrs (Rev 20:4; cf. Rev 3:21; Dan 7:9). An angel displays the new Jerusalem* as having "angelic" dimensions (Rev 21:17), and its portals are guarded by angelic representatives of the new people of God. But the city itself is made for human occupation, not identical to the heavenly world. The Lord's Prayer is now fulfilled, as God's kingdom has come, on earth as in heaven (cf. Rev 11:15; see Kingdom of God).

5. Early Christian Literature.

The early Christians are responsible for preserving many of the Jewish apocalyptic writings featuring angels. In some cases they kept the works as written (e.g., 1-2 Enoch, Apoc. Zeph.), edited them (T. 12 Patr.) or modeled independent Christian apocalypses after them. For our purposes the most important of the subapostolic apocalypses (pre-A.D. 150) are the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah, the *Shepherd of Hermas and the Apocalypse of Peter.

5.1. Christology. In the pseudepigraphal Ascension of Isaiah 6—11, the prophet Isaiah is taken on tour to the seventh heaven, passing through the realm of Satan and his angels in the firmament, then through five heavens, each occupied by angels of ascending rank and by a crowned angelic gatekeeper. In the seventh heaven he sees myriads of angels and the souls of the OT righteous, who have exchanged their robes of flesh* for angelic robes. Finally he sees the preincarnate Christ and the "angel of the Holy Spirit," standing on the right and left hand of the great Glory. As he watches, Isaiah sees the drama of salvation unfold: Christ descends through the heavens, masking himself in angelic form until he has completed his work on earth. As he ascends, even Satan worships, and the angels of the lower heavens marvel at how they failed to recognize him in his descent.

In Hermas's visions, he describes the Son of God (see Son of God) in the constant company of six archangels who are God's counselors and guardians of the church (Herm. Sim. 5.5.3; 9.6.2; 9.12.8). While Hermas's christology is probably adoptionist (cf. Herm. Sim. 5.6.), he identifies a principal angel more strongly with the Spirit than with Christ (Herm. Man. 11.9).

5.2. The Two Ways Tradition. The existence of a Two Ways tradition in early Judaism and Christianity has been confirmed by the striking catechism in the Qumran Rule of the Community (1QS 3:13—4:26). While it is based on OT types of moral instruction (Deut 30:15-20; Ps 1) and Jewish notions of good and evil inclinations (Sir 33:7-15; T. Asher 1:3-9), the tradition includes both a cosmic antithesis of good and evil angels and an eschatological meting out of rewards* and punishments. A truncated version of this tradition may be present in Paul's catalogue of works of the flesh and fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5:17-24), but a much fuller account is found in the Epistle of Barnabas 18 and Hermas Mandates 6.2 (cf. Did. 1.1—2.7 and Doctrina Apostolorum).

5.3. Eschatology. While the idea of angels administering eternal punishment is implicit in NT eschatology (Mt 25:31, 46; Rev 20:2, 15), the Apocalypse of Peter depicts graphically the last judgment of humans and spirits carried out by four angels, Uriel, Esrael, Tartarouchos and Temelouchos (Apoc. Pet. 6—13). The angels show no mercy to the damned; but the righteous victims are permitted to intercede for the wicked after a period of purgation, and some will be saved (Apoc. Pet. 14.1).

6. Angels and Christology.

The canonical materials surveyed here give no indication that Christ is to be understood to have an angelic nature (angel christology) or role (angelomorphic christology). Whether in the development of christology the divine agency of a principal angel like the OT "angel of the Lord" or Michael provided a conceptuality by which Christians could reconcile monotheistic belief with worship of Jesus is an open question (note the tradition of angelic refusal of worship in Tob 12:16-22; Rev 19:10; 22:9; Apoc. Zeph. 6:11-15; Asc. Isa. 7:18-23; 8:5).

See also APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; CHRISTOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; MELCHIZEDEK; SATAN, DEVIL; SPIRITS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, "The Apocalypse of Peter: A Jewish-Christian Apocalypse from the Time of Bar Kokhba," Apocrypha 5 (1994) 7-111; idem, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); idem, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990); P. M. Casey, From Jewish Prophet to Gentile God: The Origins and Development of New Testament

Christology (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of 1 Peter 3:18—4:6 (2d ed.; AnBib 23; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1989); J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); F. L. Horton, The Melchizedek Tradition: A Critical Examination of the Sources to the Fifth Century A.D. and in the Epistle to the Hebrews (SNTSMS 30; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976); L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); C. Newsom, Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice: A Critical Edition (HSS 27; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1985); P. A. Rainbow, "Jewish Monotheism as the Matrix for New Testament Christology: A Review Article" [of Hurtado], NovT 33 (1991) 78-91; C. C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); M. J. Suggs, "The Christian Two Ways Tradition: Its Antiquity, Form and Function" in Studies in New Testament and Early Christian Literature: Essays in Honor of Allen P. Wikgren, ed. D. E. Aune (NovTSup 33; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 60-74; W. Wink, Naming the Powers: The Language of Power in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); idem, Unmasking the Powers: The Invisible Forces That Determine Human Existence (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986).

S. F. Noll

ANOINTING

In ancient Mediterranean cultures anointing was the act of pouring or smearing an oil or cream on a person for cosmetic, medical, magical,* honorific or ritual purposes. Literary references to anointing make use of both its literal sense and an extended figurative sense, as one would expect in literature coming from cultures in which anointing for various purposes was a common practice.

1. The Background of Anointing
2. Anointing in Later New Testament Documents
3. Anointing in the Apostolic Fathers

1. The Background of Anointing.

The practice of pouring or smearing olive oil on people and objects is well documented in the OT. Genesis 28:18 is the earliest reference, where Jacob anoints a rock to signify its sacredness. Later we find that not only objects but also priests (Ex 30:26-32), kings (1 Sam 10:1) and prophets (1 Kings 19:16) were ritually set apart for sacred service by ritual anointing (anointing of persons is usually translated in the LXX by the verb chriō). So significant was this act in the case of the king that he could be referred to simply as "the Lord's anointed" (e.g., 2 Sam 1:14; Ps 89:38). However, nonritual anointing was also commonly used for cosmetic reasons (2 Sam 12:20; Ruth 3:3; Ps 104:15; Amos 6:6; cf. Add Esth 2:12; Sus 17), its absence indicating mourning (Deut 10:3; 2 Sam 14:2). Because of this cosmetic use, "anointing" was also used as a metaphor for honor, joy* and abundance (Ps 23:5; 45:7; 92:10; Is 61:3). Medicinal anointing is also known in Jewish literature (e.g., Tob 6:9; 11:8, 11; the anointing is with a fish's gall), and oil was used in some medicine (Is 1:6; Jer 51:8; perhaps Ezek 16:9), but we have no use of oil with verbs for anointing in a healing* context until the NT (for Jewish post-NT magical* anointing for healing, see Kee, 136; cf. 134, 138). These various OT uses of anointing continued into later Judaism and were also common in Mediterranean cultures from Egypt to Rome.

2. Anointing in Later New Testament Documents.

Literal anointing (always using aleiphō) occurs in our literature only in James 5:14, which likely picks up the practice referred to in Mark 6:13. While the act of anointing is not medicinal, for it is associated with prayer* (see Healing) and does not change according to the diagnosis (for a contrast see Kee, 42-43, 50-52), its meaning is unclear. While some view it as exorcistic (Brunotte), this fits Mark better than James,* where casting out demons is not an issue. Even in Mark it could be viewed as an acted prayer or as connecting the sick person to Jesus (since Jesus is never said to use oil, but the disciples do, presumably at his direction).

Without knowing how James's community understood the Synoptic narrative (assuming that they knew it and that this is not an accidental parallel), we cannot tell the exact meaning that they attached to the action. What is clear is that James attributes healing power not to the oil but to the "prayer of faith" and the action of God.* This removes the activity from the arena of magic and places it squarely in that of prayer and miracle. Thus the anointing is done either because Christians believe that is how Jesus taught the disciples to pray for the sick or because it is itself a form of prayer (see Davids, Martin). The "in the name of the Lord," if it is attached to the anointing rather than the whole action, could indicate that it was an invocation of Jesus' authority,* which could also be the meaning in Mark 6.

The metaphorical sense of anointing (picking up on the use of chriō in the LXX) appears more often in the NT. It appears first of all with respect to Jesus (see DJG, Anointing, for its use in the Gospel narratives themselves). In Acts 4:27 Jesus is God's "servant whom you anointed," which is probably a reference to his Davidic messianic role (see Christology). In Acts 10:38 Peter describes Jesus as anointed by God with the Holy Spirit. Here the anointing refers to the designation of Jesus as Messiah and his empowering for that task. In both passages the anointing is christological* in that it prepares or inaugurates Jesus in his office. (Hebrews 1:9 also refers to "the Son" as anointed, but the metaphorical anointing is taken over from Psalm 45 and refers, as in the psalm context, to the exaltation of the king over his companions; the author of Hebrews makes no special point of the anointing.)

Secondarily, metaphorical anointing appears in the Johannine tradition with respect to the believer. In Revelation 3:18 it is prophylactic, a cure for spiritual blindness which can be "bought" from Jesus. It is also an obvious play on the ophthalmic school and the making of eye salve from "Phrygian stone" in Laodicea (Hemer).

In 1 John 2:20, 27 the anointing (chrisma) is probably the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit; Smalley, 105-7; Marshall, 153-55). While a century later this would be signified by the anointing of the person with oil at baptism* (Tertullian De Bapt. 7), there is no evidence for that practice at this early date. Because the believers have "an anointing from the Holy One [i.e., God]," they know all, so the author explains that he is not trying to give them an awareness they do not have. A similar caveat appears at the end of the discussion, where he notes that they do not need instruction because the anointing they have received from "him" (probably Jesus) "remains in you." Thus in pointing out the characteristics of the false, the author takes pains to point out that his readers have a spiritual awareness of the true, which is given to them through the Holy Spirit (the author strengthens this connection in 4:13, where he describes the Spirit as a gift and connects it to knowing). In this 1 John is similar to Acts 10, for both describe the Spirit as a form of anointing, although in quite different contexts.

3. Anointing in the Apostolic Fathers.

Other than the citations of Psalm 89:20 in 1 Clement 18.1 and Isaiah 61:1 in Barnabas 14.9, there are only a few references to anointing in the apostolic fathers. Ignatius in Ephesians 17.1 instructs, "For this end did the Lord receive ointment [myron] on his head that he might breathe immortality on the Church.* Be not anointed [aleiphō] with the evil odor of the doctrine of the Prince of this world, lest he lead you away captive from the life which is set before you." The initial reference is to the anointing of Jesus in Bethany, which the Gospel accounts interpret in terms of his burial or death.* Ignatius uses this image to point out that through Jesus' death life comes to the church. He then shifts the image from the literal anointing of Jesus to the "anointing" that is the false teaching of those whom he opposes in chapters 16—20. Likewise 1 Clement 56.5 cites Psalm 141:5 in terms of the "oil of sinners" anointing (lipanatō) one's head (here with reference to honor bestowed by sinners). Thus in Ignatius anointing takes on a soteriological sense, but in both Ignatius and 1 Clement the use is secondary: in Ignatius we have a spiritualizing of a narrative about Jesus, as a means to warn against false teaching, while in 1 Clement the reference to anointing is incidental to the use of the longer citation from the psalm.

See also HEALING, ILLNESS; HOLY SPIRIT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brunotte, "Anoint," NIDNTT 1:119-21; P. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); C. Hemer, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia in Their Local Settings (JSNTSup 11; Sheffield: JSOT, 1986); H. C. Kee, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times (SNTSMS 55; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit (London: SPCK, 1971); D. Lys, L'onction dans la Bible (Paris: Presses Universitaires, 1954); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids:

MI: Eerdmans, 1978); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); W. Michaelis, "μύρον," TDNT 4:800-801; D. Mueller, "Anoint," NIDNTT 1:121-23; H. Schlier, "ἀλείφω," TDNT 1:229-32; S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984). P. H. Davids

ANTICHRIST

As eventually defined in Christian tradition, the antichrist is a mythical-historical figure controlled by Satan* who opposes Christ* and usurps his place among humankind. He deceives humanity with false teaching and signs and wonders (see Signs) in order to obtain allegiance that only Christ deserves. He opposes Christ and persecutes* Christians who maintain their proper allegiance to Christ alone. At his return Christ will defeat the antichrist and his followers, thus establishing his divine authority* without challenge. Christ's victory over the antichrist is central to the final battle of the cosmic struggle between God* and Satan linked with the forces of evil.

1. Historical and Theological Origins
2. Antichrist in the New Testament
3. Antichrist in the Early Church

1. Historical and Theological Origins.

The early Christian conception of the antichrist is multifaceted, and its origins are obscure. The concept is rooted in the apocalyptic* and messianic traditions of late Second Temple Judaism (third century B.C. to A.D. 70) and Christian interpretation of the OT in light of these traditions. In turn, these traditions are often rooted in the mythology of the ancient Near East and in Persian dualism. Jewish apocalyptic adapted the ancient Near Eastern combat myth of a great primeval battle at creation* between a powerful god and a chaos monster or dragon (see Beasts, Dragon). It also adapted the Persian dualism that taught that the world is engaged in a fierce battle between the powers of good and evil. In Jewish thought, battles between the wicked and the faithful, good and evil angels,* and the dragon of chaos and the Creator God are all parts of this struggle. The present age is controlled by evil but will be followed by a new age controlled by good.

Typically Jewish apocalyptic molded this mythology and dualism into prophecy that explained the struggles of the righteous in this world in terms of the contemporary struggle of God and the righteous against adversaries who are agents of the powers of evil. These adversaries include oppressive foreign rulers who persecute the righteous, as well as false teachers and prophets* who deceive them. The end of the struggle is the victorious coming of the Messiah to defeat the adversaries and establish the kingdom of God (Dan 11:36; Ezek 28:2; 2 Apoc. Bar. 36-40; T. Mos. 8; see Kingdom of God). The most powerful adversary emerging within Jewish apocalyptic was Satan, or Beliar (or Belial). Satan has roots in the dragon of chaos that opposed God in creation mythology. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Beliar, a demonic figure from the tribe of Dan, entices Israel to turn from worshiping God to live in error. A messiah of the tribe of Levi binds him and casts him into everlasting fire (T. Dan. 5:10-11; T. Levi 18:12; T. Judah 25:3).

Actual historical events often shaped the adaptation of mythology and dualism by Jewish apocalyptic. The rule of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes of Syria (175-164 B.C.) did the most to sharpen the depiction of tyrannical opposition to God focused in an individual. He desecrated the Jerusalem temple by dedicating the altar to Zeus and sacrificing a pig on it; this act was called the "abomination of desolation." In the book of Daniel the Greek empire is portrayed as a beast with ten horns and a little horn (Antiochus) speaking arrogantly and waging war against the righteous, only to be destroyed by the Ancient of Days, who gives his kingdom to a "son of man" (Dan 7; cf. 8:5-25; 9:26-27; 11:21-45). Testament of Moses 6—10 (first century A.D.) combines traits of Antiochus Epiphanes and Herod the Great to form an anti-God figure of the last day whose influence, along with the devil, is destroyed by God.

In A.D. 68 Emperor Nero committed suicide by stabbing himself in the throat with a sword. There were rumors that he did not die but had escaped to Rome's enemy, the Parthian Empire. Others thought that he had died and been resurrected. The myth is called Nero redivivus. Either scenario depicted him as planning to invade the Roman Empire (see Roman Empire). In one scheme he was to attack Jerusalem only to be stopped by the Messiah (Sib. Or. 5:93-110), and in another he was Beliar incarnate (Sib. Or. 3:63-74).

2. Antichrist in the New Testament.
The word antichrist (antichristos) appears only in the Johannine epistles (1 Jn 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 Jn 7), although the concept occurs elsewhere. In the NT and early Christian sources the antichrist appears in apocalyptic contexts expressing the hope* that God will intervene in history to destroy God's enemies and the enemies of God's people and usher in a new era under God's undisputed command. Within this dualism, the antichrist is the enemy and evil substitute for Christ. As God, angels and the righteous have evil counterparts in Satan,* demons and the wicked respectively, so Christ has his counterpart in the antichrist.

It is anachronistic to speak of an antichrist before the early Christians identified Jesus as the Messiah and modified Jewish traditions accordingly. The antichrist tradition results from the converging of separate streams of Jewish tradition within early Christian eschatology. It has two forms, based on the Jewish traditions used. One is a nonpolitical, deceptive religious figure from within the community. It may be rooted in the Jewish tradition of the prophet like Moses and a false prophet who opposes the true prophet and misleads the righteous with signs and wonders (Deut 18:18-22). The second form is a tyrannical ruler from outside the community who oppresses the faithful in the end times. It may be rooted in the Jewish tradition of end-time tyrants. Both traditions are reflected in the prefix anti- (Greek anti, not Latin anti), which means "acting in place of" as well as "opposed to." These Jewish traditions themselves are hard to trace, as is the path of their convergence into the antichrist tradition, a convergence from which the NT picture of the antichrist emerges unfocused.

These traditions of the false prophet and end-time tyrant were used by NT and early Christian writers as the situations they addressed dictated. The end-time tyrant tradition was used in light of the anti-Jewish and Christian activities of the emperors* Caligula and Nero, as well as Rome's destruction of Jerusalem, which was reminiscent of the actions of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (2 Thess; Rev). The false prophet tradition was used when the church was threatened by false teaching (Mk 13 and par.; 2 Thess; 1-3 Jn).

2.1. The Synoptic Apocalypse. The Synoptic Apocalypse (Mk 13 par. Mt 24 and Lk 21) contains Jesus' prophecy of the appearance in the last days of such false prophets and false Christs, who will perform signs and wonders, deceive the faithful and lead many astray (Mk 13:6 par. Mt 24:5 and Lk 21:8; Mk 13:21-22 par. Mt 24:23-24). These false prophets and false Christs are closely associated with the concept of the antichrist but are not equivalent. They do not demand worship, nor are they the cause of the suffering* of those days; they only accompany the appearance of the desolating sacrilege mentioned (perhaps Zealot activity in the temple during the war of A.D. 66-73).

2.2. 2 Thessalonians. Paul gives us the earliest Christian prophecy of the antichrist in 2 Thessalonians 2:1-12, written about A.D. 52 (see DPL, Man of Lawlessness). Paul asserts that in the last days a great rebellion against God will be led by a man of lawlessness. He will usurp the place of God, placing himself in the temple of God and demanding to be worshiped. He will perform all kinds of signs and wonders under the power and plan of Satan. Paul combines the false prophet and the end-time tyrant traditions in a single figure, perhaps in part because of the contemporary actions of Emperor Caligula, who wanted to be worshiped as a god and demanded that his statue be set up in the temple at Jerusalem (A.D. 40).

2.3. Johannine Epistles. In the Johannine epistles the antichrist is portrayed as a spirit* (1 Jn 4:3) or collective force for evil in the last days (1 Jn 2:18). The antichrist is plural, representing all those who held erroneous views of the person of Christ and were already manifest in the church* at the time of the writing (1 Jn 2:22; 4:3; 2 Jn 7). In this case the antichrists are docetists* who did not confess that Jesus the man was the divine Christ come in the flesh.* This portrayal of the antichrist as a collective of deceptive false teachers (see Adversaries) already present in the Johannine community relies on the false prophet tradition. This portrayal is an expression of Johannine realized eschatology,* in which the age to come is already present (see John, Letters of).

2.4. Revelation. The most developed treatment of the antichrist is found in the book of Revelation,* written at the end of the reign of Emperor Domitian, who was persecuting Christians (A.D. 96). John uses the emperor to symbolize the Roman imperial system as evil and empowered by Satan, in part because the emperor* demanded worship as God and persecuted Christians who refused to do so. John combines the traditions of the false prophet and the end-time tyrant, specifically Nero redivivus traditions, with the chaos dragon of ancient Near Eastern mythology.

John portrays the evil Roman Empire using the images of two beasts.* The first beast, from the sea, is modeled on Daniel's fourth beast (Dan 7:7-8, 23-27). It has ten horns and seven heads, with one of the heads having a fatal wound that has been healed (Rev 11:7; 13:1-10; 16:12-16; 17; 19:20-21). This beast is given power by the dragon (Satan; Rev 12:3, 9), blasphemes God and demands that people worship it. As the symbolism of Revelation 17 makes clear, the first beast is the antichrist and symbolizes the Roman Empire; its heads are various emperors who demanded worship, with the healed head representing Nero—all empowered by Satan. Nero became a focus for the antichrist because he was the first official persecutor of God's people, the church, and was rumored to have been resurrected from the dead like Christ.

The second beast has two horns like a lamb* and speaks like the dragon. It performs miracles and compels the worship of the first beast under threat of death (13:11-18; 16:13; 19:20-21). This beast represents the emperor cult, whose priests enforced the worship of the emperor throughout the Roman Empire. In the consummation of all things Christ throws both beasts into the lake of fire as part of the eradication of evil from creation (19:20-21).

3. Antichrist in the Early Church.

The antichrist tradition was popular among the early Christians, and both false prophet and end-time tyrant traditions continued. One Christian source from the end of the first century is the "Testament of Hezekiah" (3:13—4:22 of the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah). It blends the false Christ, Beliar and end-time tyrant traditions into a mature concept of antichrist. Here the antichrist is Beliar (Satan) incarnate in Nero redivivus. He presents himself as Christ, performs miracles and sets up his image in every city for people to worship. At the Second Coming, Christ throws Beliar and his followers into Gehenna.

In the *Epistle of Barnabas 4.1-5 (late first century A.D.) the beast of the fourth kingdom of Daniel 7:7-8 is the Roman Empire of the author's time. The beast is part of the wickedness and lawlessness of the last days and is probably to be identified as the antichrist. *Didache 16 (second century A.D.) predicts that in the last days there will arise false prophets as well as the Deceiver, who will claim to be a Son of God, perform miracles and persecute the righteous.

Quoting 1 John 4:2-3 and 2 John 7, Polycarp* (early second century A.D.) agrees with the Johannine epistles that the antichrist is the spirit of heresy. Everyone who denies the actual Incarnation is an antichrist (docetism), and everyone who denies the resurrection* and judgment* is the firstborn of Satan (Pol. Phil. 7.1). In deciphering the number of the antichrist, 666, Irenaeus (second century A.D.) identifies the antichrist with Lateinos, the Roman Empire, or Teitan, the ancient name of royal dignity belonging to a tyrant (Haer. 5.25, 30). Hippolytus (third century) wrote that the antichrist would arise from a revived Roman Empire to become the accepted Messiah of the Jews who persecutes the church, combining political tyrant with false prophet or messiah traditions (Hippolytus Dem. Chr.).

Although the NT and the early church identified contemporary heresies or political persons and systems as the antichrist, for both the antichrist in his fullness remains a future eschatological reality. His appearance is part of the final conflagration in which the forces of evil make their greatest and final effort to deceive the people of God, divert their allegiance and defeat the powers of good only to be completely and ultimately defeated.

See also BEASTS, DRAGON, SEA, CONFLICT MOTIF; EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT; ESCHATOLOGY; JOHN, LETTERS OF; PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS; REVELATION, BOOK OF; SATAN, DEVIL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, London: Hutchinson, 1896); F. Bruce, 1 & 2 Thessalonians (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1982); D. Ford, The Abomination of Desolation in Biblical Eschatology (Washington D.C.: University Press of America, 1979); J. Ernst, Die eschatologischen Gegenspieler in den Schriften des Neuen Testaments (Regensburg, Germany: Friedrich Pustet, 1967); R. Fuller, Naming the Antichrist: The History of an American Obsession (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995); C. H. Giblin, The Threat to Faith: An Exegetical and Theological Re-examination of 2 Thessalonians 2 (AnBib 31; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1967); G. C. Jenks, The

Origins and Early Development of the Antichrist Myth (BZNW 59; Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1991); H.-J. Klauck, "Der Antichrist und das johanneische Schisma: Zu 1 Joh 2,18-19" in Christus bezeugen: Festschrift für Wolfgang Trilling zum 65 Geburtstag, ed. K. Kertlege et al. (ETS 59; Leipzig: St. Benno, 1989) 237-48; L. J. Lietaert Peerbolte, The Antecedents of Antichrist: A Traditio-Historical Study of the Earliest Christian Views on Eschatological Opponents (SJSJ 49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); V. Maag, "The Antichrist as a Symbol of Evil" in Evil, ed. Curatorium of the C. G. Jung Institute (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1967) 57-82; B. McGinn, Antichrist: Two Thousand Years of the Human Fascination with Evil (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994); B. Rigaux, L'antéchrist et l'opposition au royaume messianique dans l'ancien et le Nouveau Testament (Gembloux: J. Duculot, 1932); R. Schippers, Mythologie en Eschatologie in 2 Thessalonicenzen 2,1-17 (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1961); H. Schlier, "Vom Antichrist: Zum 13. Kapitel der Offenbarung Johannes" in his Die Zeit der Kirche (Freiburg: Herder, 1956) 16-29; L. Sirard, "La parousie de l'antéchrist: 2 Thess 2,3-9" in Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus II 1961 (AnBib 17-18; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1963) 2:89-100; G. Strecker, "Der Antichrist: Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund von 1 Joh 2,18.22; 4,3 und 2 Joh 7" in Text and Testimony: Essays on New Testament and Apocryphal Literature in Honour of A. J. J. Klijn, ed. T. Baarda et al. (Kampen: Uitgeversmaatsschappij: J. H. Kok, 1988) 247-54.

D. F. Watson

ANTIOCH ON THE ORONTES

This city, a melting pot of peoples and cultures, on the evidence of the book of Acts became the second center (Jerusalem* was the first) from which the Christian faith journeyed "to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8). The church, as described in Acts, appears to have reflected its milieu in the racial mix of its congregation and, under God, this fitted it well, first to nurture the nascent apostle to the Gentiles and then to sponsor his missionary journeys. Of the names associated with the church in Antioch, two in particular stand out: Paul's in the first century and Ignatius's* in the second. Each may be said to have left his stamp on Antiochene Christianity.

1. Antioch in the Mediterranean World
2. The Antiochene Church in the New Testament
3. The Antiochene Church of Ignatius's Day

1. Antioch in the Mediterranean World.

Situated on the Orontes some fifteen miles from its mouth, Antioch was founded c. 300 B.C. as his capital by Seleucus I Nicator (312-281 B.C.). It was one of sixteen cities similarly named by him in honor of his father Antiochus (the "Antioch in Pisidia" of Acts 13:14 was another).

With the collapse of the Seleucid dynasty and the Roman occupation of Syria, Antioch became the capital and military headquarters of the new province and a free (i.e., self-governing) city. Under Augustus and Tiberius, aided by Herod the Great, the city was enlarged and beautified in the Roman manner, the road systems extending from it were improved, and its seaport of Seleucia Piera was further developed (for more detail see DPL, Antioch on the Orontes). Thus the communications of Antioch with the Levant and indeed with the whole of the Mediterranean world were made far more rapid and secure than they had ever been before. This was soon to prove useful for the Christian mission.

From the first the city had a mixed population, which in the first century A.D. numbered about 300,000 (Strabo Geog. 16.2.5) and by the third century possibly twice that number. At the beginning of the Christian era the Jews of Antioch may have numbered about 25,000 (see Josephus Ant. 12.3.1 §119-24; 2 Macc 4). Josephus calls it the third city of the empire after Rome* and Alexandria* (Josephus J.W. 3.29 §276-82); others are not so sure, regarding it as the second. It has been described as "a bastion of Hellenism in the Syriac lands . . . the inevitable meeting point of the two worlds" (Dix, 33). This mix of cultures had good and bad results. It gave rise, on the one hand, to the literature and art that won Antioch the praise of Cicero (see Pro Archia 4), but, on the other, it led to the luxury and immorality that made it as infamous as it was famous. Five miles from the city lay the renowned sanctuary of Daphne, where orgiastic rites were practiced in the name of religion. These gave rise to the so-called Daphinici mores, which Juvenal blamed for the disintegration of Roman morality when, as he put it, "the waters of Syrian Orontes flowed into the Tiber" (Juvenal Sat. 3.62). And yet for all that, and perhaps because of the kind of city it was, Antioch was to play an important role in the history of Christianity. For with its mix of race and culture, it was ready-made for the breaking down of "the dividing wall of hostility" between Jews (see Jewish Christianity) and Gentiles* and the forming both into the "one body of Christ" (Eph 2:14-16). Something of this mix is reflected in the early leadership of the church* (see Acts 13:1; Williams, 220-21).

2. The Antiochene Church in the New Testament. Christians first came to Antioch probably in the 40s of the first century A.D., having been driven out of Jerusalem by the persecution* that arose over Stephen (Acts 8:1; 11:19-30). To begin with, they confined their preaching to the Jews. But in Antioch, where the prevailing moral climate drove many to seek something better, the Jews had attracted large numbers of Gentiles to their synagogues.* Many became proselytes (see Josephus J.W. 7.3.3 §43; cf. Acts 6:5), but many more (as we suppose) remained as 'God-fearers"; and before long this group in particular was targeted by the Christian preachers (as may be understood by Acts 11:20) with good results. The juxtaposition of verses implies that the "great number of people [who] believed and turned to the Lord" in Acts 11:21 were largely the God-fearing Gentiles of the previous verse. It would appear, moreover, from the ease with which the Christians were able to order their affairs that they had soon separated from the synagogues.

Given then that it was an independent and perhaps predominantly Gentile body, it is not surprising that before long the church's polity (see Church Order) could be described as "doing as the Gentiles did" as far as circumcision* and the Jewish dietary laws (see Food, Food Laws) were concerned (cf. Acts 15:1; Gal 2:11-14). Paul, who had been brought to Antioch by Barnabas (himself sent there to make contact with the Antiochene believers by the church in Jerusalem), may have first glimpsed here the real scope of his calling to be "an apostle to the Gentiles" (Gal 2:8; see Acts 11:22-26). It was from this church that he and Barnabas, and later Silas, were sent out as missionaries (Acts 13:3; 15:40) and to this church that they returned from time to time with a report on their work (Acts 14:27; 18:22).

While the church in Antioch may soon have been independent of the synagogues in an organizational sense, it remained within the ambit of Jewish influence both from within its own ranks and from outside. Inevitably, then, there were tensions as the transition was made from Jewish to Gentile practice and thought—the more so as this was a period of heightened and intensifying Jewish nationalism, which eventually erupted in the war against Rome in A.D. 66-70. Controversy arose early over the initiation of Gentiles and the extent to which Gentile Christians should be subject to Jewish dietary laws (Acts 15:1-35; Gal 2:11-13). The latter issue is also reflected in the Antiochene sources of 4 Maccabees and, possibly, the Gospel according to Matthew and the Didache.

Paul himself insists that he never accepted any compromise of his "freedom"* on either issue, and according to Acts 15 his, and what might be called the Antiochene, position with regard to the initiation of Gentiles was vindicated by a council held in Jerusalem. However, the battle fought by Paul on this occasion had to be fought again and again, as his letters bear witness, and may have been subsequently lost by him in Antioch, at least in terms of complete freedom from the dietary laws, in the so-called incident at Antioch referred to in Galatians 2:11-14. (See Dunn, who further suggests that as a consequence of his defeat Paul was severed from his connection with Antioch, while the victory of the more conservative Jewish Christians may have inspired their later inroads into the sphere of the Pauline mission.)

3. The Antiochene Church of Ignatius's Day. From this point on the history of the church in Antioch fades into obscurity. In defiance of the biblical evidence, it was later claimed that Peter was "the founder" and "first bishop" of this church (probably to counter the Roman claim to primacy). He was succeeded, it was said, by Euodius and then Ignatius* (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.22; 3.36.2). Of the latter we know a little from his seven letters, written from Smyrna and Troas as he was being taken a prisoner to Rome during the reign of the emperor Trajan (A.D. 98-117). They evidence two dominant concerns. One was his approaching martyrdom*; see especially his letter to the church in Rome, in which he urges the Christians not to interfere and prevent his death by winning a reprieve for him. His other concern was for the unity of the church. In unity, he said, believers would find their union with Christ* (Ign. Trall. 3.1.; cf. Ign. Magn. 6.1; Ign. Trall. 13; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1). To the same end (their union with Christ), Ignatius stressed the importance of the Eucharist (Ign. Phld. 4.; cf. also Ign. Smyrn. 7.1; Ign. Eph. 13.1; 20.1).

This concern for unity is reflected also in Ignatius's perception of the bishop as the focal point of church affairs (see Church Order). In earlier writers the titles and offices of "bishops" and "presbyters" are not clearly distinguished, but in Ignatius's letters there is a clear separation. The bishop is supreme. Without his approval no service can be held or other action taken. "Nobody must do anything that has to do with the church without the bishop's approval" (Ign. Smyrn. 8.1-2). Nevertheless, it should be noted that Ignatius does not yet enunciate a doctrine of apostolic succession. "For him the authority of the church officers is not derived from a chain of teaching chairs (as in Irenaeus) or from a succession of ordinations (as in Augustine), but from the fact that their offices are the earthly antitype of a heavenly pattern" (Richardson, 76).

In all of this it may be possible to identify a number of factors as shaping Ignatius's thought. His stress on the unity of the church and its unity with Christ may owe something to the influence of the mystery religions.* The influence of Gnosticism (see Gnosis) may possibly be seen positively in his emphasis on Christ's work of revelation* (Ign. Magn. 8.1; Ign. Eph. 19.1; see Corwin, 116-53), negatively in his insistence on the historical reality of the Incarnation (Ign. Smyrn. 1; 2; 3.1; Ign. Trall. 10.1). On another front, Ignatius may have been contending with the continuing influence of Judaism (in some form: Essene? Ebionite*?), and hence his stress on the divinity of Christ (Ign. Magn. 9-10; Ign. Phld. 6.1; Ign. Eph. salut.; 15.3; 18.2; Ign. Rom. 3.3; Ign. Pol. 8.3). (In Ign. Rom. 6.3, Ignatius calls Christ "my God." The title "God"* without the definite article is applied to Christ in Ign. Eph. 1.1; 7.2; 19.3; Ign. Trall. 7.1; Ign. Smyrn. 10.1.) The threat of false teaching generally may have pushed Ignatius in the direction of a stronger episcopate.

We see in Ignatius the seeds of what was to become a distinctive Antiochene theology whose methodology was characteristically rational, historical and literal. He died in the Roman arena c. A.D. 110.

See also Acts of the Apostles; Centers of Christianity; Ignatius.

Bibliography. R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome: New Testament Cradles of Catholic Christianity (New York: Paulist, 1983); V. Corwin, St. Ignatius and Christianity in Antioch (New Haven, CN: Yale University Press, 1960); G. Dix, Jew and Greek: A Study in the Primitive Church (London: Dacre, 1953); G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria from Seleucus to the Arab Conquest (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1961); idem, Ancient Antioch (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1963); J. D. G. Dunn, "The Incident at Antioch (Gal. 2.11-18)" in Jesus, Paul and the Law (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 129-82; H. W. G. Liebeschuetz, Antioch: City and Imperial Administration in the Later Roman Empire (Oxford: Clarendon, 1972); W. Meeks and R. Wilken, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era (SBLSBS 13; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); C. C. Richardson, The Christianity of Ignatius of Antioch (New York: Columbia University Press, 1935); J. Stambaugh and D. Balch, The Social World of the First Christians (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Christian Antioch: A Study of Early Christian Thought in the East (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); D. J. Williams, Acts (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1990).

D. J. Williams

APOCALYPSE, THE. See Revelation, Book of.

APOCALYPSE OF PETER. See Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal Writings.

APOCALYPSE OF THOMAS. See Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal Writings.

APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM

The use of the term apocalyptic is so widespread within scholarly studies of both the OT and the NT that its meaning is often taken for granted. Yet there is a great deal of imprecision in the use of the word as well as generalized confusion about the meaning of the related terms apocalypticism and apocalypse. Terminological definition has been a long time in the making, although something of a working consensus has now been arrived at within the scholarly community. However, the question of how much *eschatology and apocalyptic overlap as conceptual categories of biblical theology is not quite so clear-cut, and debate on this question is still on-going with phrases like "apocalyptic eschatology" appearing frequently. Apocalypse is now generally taken to refer to a particular style or genre of writing or to a work which exhibits the distinctive characteristics of that genre; apocalyptic is generally taken to be an adjective used with reference to either the literary genre or the religious perspective underlying it; apocalypticism refers to either the social movement or religious idealogy which produced such apocalyptic writings; and apocalyptic eschatology is understood to refer to a particular type of eschatology, a perspective about how God's future purposes are worked out, which is mainly expressed in, though not restricted to, apocalypses (see DJG, Apocalyptic; DPL, Apocalypticism).

In the main, we see the all-important question about the correspondence between form and content being worked out within these terminological distinctions. For the purposes of our discussion the terms apocalyptic and apocalypticism are associated with select Jewish and Christian writings produced between 250 B.C. and A.D. 150, of which Daniel and Revelation* are the two canonical examples, although apocalypses from other religious traditions of this time period are also known. It is hard to exaggerate the importance of apocalyptic as a conceptual category and equally as difficult to delimit its significance as a theological idea, so determinative has it been for NT studies over the past 150 years.

The phenomenon of apocalypticism is one of the most extensively discussed areas of biblical studies and the secondary literature on the subject is vast. Many have viewed Christianity as nothing less than an apocalyptic movement, at least as far as its origins are concerned. However, there has been something of a love-hate relationship between apocalyptic and NT scholarship over the years. Opinions about the possibility of using apocalypticism as a hermeneutical key to unlock the meaning of the NT documents have varied greatly. Some interpreters see it as absolutely indispensable, others as completely unusable. In 1960 E. Käsemann argued in a celebrated article (first published in ZTK and reprinted in English in JThC in 1969) that apocalyptic is the source of all NT theology, an opinion which has been a veritable Archimedean point within NT studies ever since. All of which stands as testimony to the importance of both apocalyptic literature and apocalypticism in any serious investigation of the NT materials.

1. Terminological Considerations: The Relationship between Apocalyptic and Eschatology
2. The Origins of Apocalyptic Eschatology
3. Some Key Features of Apocalyptic Eschatology

1. Terminological Considerations: The Relationship between Apocalyptic and Eschatology.

Both apocalyptic and eschatology are such loaded terms that it is difficult to use them with any precision; both are, in the delightful phrase used by the Expository Times, "slippery words" which are frequently used interchangeably to refer to "the last things" or "the things that will happen in the future" (see the articles by Marshall, Barker and Webb). In particular, the word apocalyptic has been so problematic that there have been serious calls for the abandonment of it altogether as a term of any value or meaning (see Carmignac, Glasson and Barton for recent arguments).

Three preliminary points need to be made when considering the matter. First, it must be recognized that the term apocalyptic has undergone a significant evolution in usage and has taken on a whole new range of meanings in which the traditional association with the events of the future is dissolved or effaced. A good example of this is the way in which it is applied to an astonishing range of literary and artistic works spanning several centuries. Most of these literary and artistic works are ultimately dependent upon the book of Revelation for their imagery or thematic content; in the words of N. Frye, Revelation is "our grammar of apocalyptic imagery" (Frye, 141). In short, the fact that the author uses the term apokalypsis in Revelation 1:1 to describe his work (the only time out of the 18 instances where the noun appears in the NT that it is so used) means that the subsequent literary works which rely upon the biblical book for their imagery, whether of final judgment, or ultimate catastrophe, or the coming of a new heaven and a new earth, inevitably find that the term apocalyptic is also applied to them. Even Theodotion's application of the term apokalypsis to chapters of Daniel is probably dependent upon its use as a title for Revelation. In any event, we need to recognize that apocalyptic is a term widely used in popular culture, often with little acknowledgment of the biblical basis for it, a fact which in itself stands as a testimony to the enduring influence of Revelation.

Our second point concerns the connection apocalyptic has with eschatology. Far too often the casual assumption is that apocalyptic is to be equated with eschatology; that to speak of the one is to mean the other. To a certain degree we may attribute the casual identification of the two terms to J. Weiss whose Die Predigt Jesu vom Reich Gottes (1892) was among the first works to bring them together. Moreover, the abiding impact of the konsequente eschatologie school of J. Weiss and A. Schweitzer upon biblical studies has led to the situation where many NT interpreters speak of eschatology as if it were simply the contents of apocalyptic. Occasionally this gives rise to potential confusion as can be seen in the classic statement by E. Käsemann that "Apocalyptic was the mother of all Christian theology" (Käsemann, 102), when it is quite clear that what Käsemann meant was that "an eschatological framework of thought was the source of all subsequent Christian theological development." (See Rollins for a helpful critique of Käsemann's imprecise use of terminology and a challenge to his central thesis; also worth noting on this is Laws's essay).

One of the most important things to be remembered when we consider the meaning of the term apocalyptic is that in terms of grammar it is an adjective and not a noun. That is to say that it defines a form of literature and does not exist in its own right. There is no such thing as "Jewish apocalyptic" or "Christian apocalyptic" as such; there is, for example, only Jewish apocalyptic literature or a Christian apocalyptic perspective. Thus the call has been for a more precise definition of apocalyptic literature (assuming that the literature reflects the perspective). This has resulted in some fruitful clarifications of how terms are used as part of the larger definition of the literary genre of an apocalypse.

Our third point follows on directly from the last one and concerns the core meaning of the term apocalyptic itself. In terms of NT studies it is important to keep in mind the etymological meaning of both the noun apokalypsis and its cognate verb apokaluptō and not allow our definition of their meaning to stray too far (see Smith for a history of the use of the two terms). While etymological considerations cannot be made determinative, neither can they be completely ignored. The basic meaning is "an unveiling/to unveil" with the corresponding Latin translation of the noun and verb being revelatio/revelare (from which our term revelation comes). Recognition of this key point has been one of the main impetuses for scholarly investigations concerned with defining the genre of apocalyptic literature.

1.1. Apocalypse: The Difficulties of Defining a Literary Genre. It is extremely important that some sort of distinction between form and content be maintained whenever we speak of Jewish or Christian "apocalyptic literature." We must be careful not to confuse what is revealed with the form of literature through which it is revealed. This is particularly true when it comes to discussing the subject of eschatology since, as we have noted, the tendency has been to use the two terms (apocalyptic and eschatology) as if they were interchangeable. To put the critical point another way, we could say that apocalyptic literature may or may not speak about eschatological matters; what is revealed within an apocalypse may be knowledge about the future, but then again it may not be. The substance of the heavenly revelation might be knowledge about astronomy, or the creation,* or celestial worlds, or matters concerning the heavenly Jerusalem,* for example, and not knowledge of eschatological matters and what is going to happen in the future (the important article by Stone is a convenient place to begin to explore this point; see also Rowland 1982).

In recent years the most frequently cited definition is that offered by J. J. Collins as part of the SBL Genres Project:

> Apocalypse is a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial, insofar as it involves another, supernatural world. (J. J. Collins 1979, 9)

In terms of this formal definition, within the biblical materials it is only Daniel 7—12 and Revelation which might properly be described as apocalypses (although, strangely, some NT scholars have argued against regarding Revelation as an apocalyptic work; see Kallas on this point). Moreover, a total of fourteen other Jewish and twenty-three other Christian documents from the period of 250 B.C. to A.D. 150 are now usually catalogued under the definition, including the composite work known as 1 (Ethiopic) Enoch, a text central to any scholarly discussion of apocalyptic literature and thought by many to embody the earliest examples of apocalyptic writing (as VanderKam suggests). Several other documents are discussed in addition to these more well-known texts, on the basis that they are similar in terms of form or detail (debate still continues whether Jubilees and Sibylline Oracles technically should be classified as apocalypses). These thirty-seven apocalypses are then subdivided into various types and groups depending on whether or not they have an otherworldly journey, whether or not they express a cosmic or political eschatology, and whether or not they contain an historical review as a part of the revelation afforded to the seer (see the contributions by J. J. Collins and A. Y. Collins to Semeia 14 for full details of the criteria; similarly, Bauckham, 17, helpfully suggests on the basis of a study of 1 Enoch that a distinction be made between eschatological and cosmological apocalypses).

More recently members of the SBL Seminar on Early Christian Apocalypticism applied themselves to examining the function of apocalyptic literature within its own social setting, something which had been somewhat neglected within the deliberations of the SBL Apocalypse Group. The result of this thorough investigation is that a fairly detailed picture of what constitutes an apocalypse has now been arrived at and something of a working definition agreed. Nevertheless, there is still a tendency among some experts in the subject, such as P. D. Hanson, to resist the imposition of a rigid genre definition upon apocalyptic literature if it means that attention to the wider considerations of the phenomenon of apocalypticism is thereby compromised.

Moreover, Rowland, who may be taken to be largely sympathetic to the use of a literary form as a means of defining an apocalypse and getting to the heart of what apocalyptic writings are all about, interjects an important qualification which must be kept ever in mind. He suggests that it is not simply conformity to a common literary form which defines a work as apocalyptic, but conformity to a common mode of religious experience which is expressed through that form which does so. That is to say that a work may be classified as apocalyptic when it asserts that the hidden things of God may be made known through direct communication with the heavenly. The key here is the stress laid upon the essential meaning of the Greek words apokalypsis and apokalyptō as "revelation"/"to reveal."* Apocalyptic literature is concerned above all with the knowledge of divine mysteries* through revelation (see Reveal, Revelation). Rowland cites Mishna Hagiga 2:1 as a means to discussing the contents of apocalyptic literature under four headings: it reveals knowledge about what is above, what is below, what was before and what will be. This corresponds nicely with the distinction J. J. Collins makes about a spatial axis and a temporal axis within apocalyptic writing (more on this below).

Herein we see aspects of the dilemma that characterizes much modern research into apocalyptic literature: the relationship which exists between literary form and the contents of a given document. Striking the right balance between form and content becomes especially acute when we compare apocalypses with other types of literature which either have a similar message or claim to be revelatory in nature (such as ecstatic visions* like Paul's experience related in 2 Cor 12:1-6). For example, many of the ideas and expressions contained in Mark 13 are similar to those contained in 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, yet it is, strictly speaking, improper to describe the Gospel chapter as "the little apocalypse" since it does not conform to the literary characteristics of the genre (it contains no heavenly visitation or angelic revealer, for example). The way in which we perceive how the form of an apocalypse and the contents (expressed by means of that form) combine often depends not so much upon our opinion about the literary-genre question as upon our understanding of related matters. These include our understanding of the phenomenon of apocalypticism which is responsible for producing the literature, and the place that we accord apocalypticism within the religious history of the Judeo-Christian world.

1.2. Apocalypticism: The Definition of a Social Movement or an Ideology? Apocalypticism is frequently defined as a social movement which arises out of a context of persecution in which a minority group within society feels alienated and seeks to express their hopes for the future in terms of an alternative symbolic universe. The key here is that apocalypticism is viewed primarily as a social phenomenon, and that the writings produced within apocalypticism have an identifiable Sitz im Leben (Hanson 1979 and Sanders offer good discussions on this). On the other hand, some have sought to define apocalypticism not so much in terms of its being a sociological phenomenon as an ideology which is embodied in the literary works from an apocalyptically minded group whose writings have managed to survive, all the while recognizing that the connection between the literary remains of a movement and its social realities is a difficult one to establish with precision and that a simple equation of the two cannot be asserted (Webb offers a correction to Hanson and Sanders along these lines).

Is apocalypticism then to be defined as a social movement or as an ideology? It may well be that in attempting to phrase the question in such an either/or fashion we are forcing too fine a distinction between the two: a social phenomenon is invariably going to be recognized, at least in part, by the ideology, the belief structures, which are contained within it. While the connections between belief and social practice may be difficult to prove, some sort of relationship between them seems even more difficult, even foolish, to deny. Thankfully, some initial explorations into the social dimensions of apocalypticism have been offered in recent years (such as those by M. Hengel 1974, G. W. E. Nickelsburg 1983, P. R. Davies 1989, and J. J. Collins 1991). However, further investigation of the sociological and cultural factors within a given society which give rise to the production of apocalyptic literature stands as one of the most promising areas of research today. At the same time, a word of caution should prevail here.

We must not presume that apocalyptic literature is something that arises only out of the marginalized segments of society, for there is ample evidence to suggest that the phenomenon we describe as apocalypticism does not recognize the rigid socio-religious boundaries we so often impose upon it (see Rowland 1988 on this point). In short, it is methodologically unsound to assume that all apocalyptic literature was produced by a single, socially-identifiable group in response to one particular concern. A definitive social setting for apocalyptic literature is not to be inferred from the literary genre alone, and the oft-asserted declaration that all apocalyptic literature arises out of a crisis situation needs to be revised; more often than not it does arise in such historical settings, but it need not do so as a matter of course. Most agree that much apocalyptic writing is in some way crisis literature, that it is born out of a situation of social upheaval and political turmoil, that it addresses real concerns about the future fate of human beings in the face of great uncertainty and attempts to offer hope* and assurance in the midst of such despair.

I. Gruenwald (1979, 89) describes Jewish apocalyptic writing as a "literature of protest" insofar as it expresses strong feelings of resentment against oppressive worldly regimes, notably Rome (see Roman Empire). However, precision about exactly where apocalypticism is to be traced and how it develops, and exactly what social or literary pedigree it has, or indeed what the precise relationship it has to the prophecy and wisdom traditions, remain matters of considerable debate. P. D. Hanson is surely correct when, at the conclusion of his survey of study of apocalyptic literature since the Second World War, he says: "Apocalyptic is a complex and many-faceted phenomenon, and matters are not simplified by the restless development that characterizes its passage through time" (Hanson 1985, 483).

2. The Origins of Apocalyptic Eschatology.

The historical origins of apocalypticism have also been the subject of considerable scholarly investigation. Is it correct (as is often asserted) to view apocalyptic eschatology as the "bridge between the Old and New Testaments"? A connection between apocalyptic writings and the OT prophetic tradition is, in the main, accepted by many, particularly in the English-speaking world, as a given (see Nicholson). Many believe that Jewish apocalypticism has an historical link with the priestly circle of the Hasidim of the second century B.C. and view it essentially as a religious phenomenon characteristic of the Hellenistic period (see Hengel, 175-218). However, precisely what the relationship was between what we now describe as apocalypticism and the earlier periods of Israel's history has been hotly debated; virtually every conceivable group within Judaism has been suggested by someone as responsible for the rise of apocalyp-ticism (P. R. Davies 1977 critiques the Hasidim hypothesis).

P. D. Hanson, who offers one of the most extensive treatments of the subject, suggests (Hanson 1979) that Jewish apocalyptic eschatology gradually develops out of the prophetic movement as it confronts national crisis and religious disintegration beginning early in the post-exilic period. Hanson's work is perhaps the most thorough treatment of the topic and remains the standard from which much subsequent discussion proceeds (see R. P. Carroll 1979, J. D. Thomas 1980, M. Knibb 1982, P. R. Davies 1989 and D. S. Russell 1992 for critical evaluations of Hanson).

There is much to be said for seeing a close connection between apocalypticism and early Christian prophecy* (as Fiorenza suggests). Indeed, it should not be overlooked that the only example of an apocalypse in the NT, the book of Revelation,* describes itself not only as an apocalypse but also as a prophecy (the word propheteia is so used five times in Rev 1:3; 22:7, 10, 18, 19). However, such a close association between prophecy and apocalyptic as has been suggested is something which many notable OT commentators such as G. von Rad dismiss out of hand, arguing instead that the wisdom tradition (as opposed to the prophetic tradition) within Israel is responsible for giving birth to apocalypticism.

Others have similarly addressed the question of the relationship between prophecy, wisdom and apocalyptic literature. J. J. Collins, for example, argues that there is a closer connection between wisdom and prophecy as religious traditions within Judaism than is often appreciated and suggests that both need to be investigated against the larger backdrop of the ancient Near East (see also Betz). The tendency to locate the phenomenon of apocalypticism within Palestinian Judaism also must be checked with due attention being given to Babylonian Judaism and Egyptian Judaism (to cite but two further provenances) as possible locations for the production of apocalyptic literature. One further consideration of this widening of the field of study is the recognition that apocalyptic literature was written in a wide variety of languages, including Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek and Latin. Further, Collins argues that apocalyptic literature not only contains elements of both prophetic and wisdom traditions, but also contributes to the further development of them in subsequent writings notably through the pervasive influence of Daniel, which combines earlier mantic wisdom traditions in Daniel 1—6 with the later apocalyptic passages of Daniel 7—12 (see Collins's articles from 1974, 1975 and 1977-78, and his books from 1977 and 1984 where the matter is further discussed). Thus, R. Bauckham goes some way in bringing the two traditions (prophecy and wisdom) together when he says: "The continuity between prophecy and apocalyptic occurred when the apocalyptists assumed the role of interpreters of prophecy" (Bauckham, 17).

In summary we could say that the phenomenon often described as apocalypticism is an exceedingly complex one. It has established connections with the prophetic tradition as well as with the wisdom tradition of the religious world of the ancient Near East in which Judaism had a key role to play. Any attempt to stress one of these traditions at the expense of the other runs the risk of misunderstanding and misinterpreting apocalyptic literature as a whole; both prophetic and wisdom features are to be found in apocalyptic writings.

One final consideration concerns the connection between apocalypticism and the Qumran* community. This is particularly important given the number of close parallels in thought and expression between many of the classic apocalypses and some of the sectarian works of the community, notably 1QS, 1QM, 1QH and 11QTemple. The book of Daniel and 1 Enoch were clearly favorites within the community and are well represented among the manuscripts recovered from the various caves (the oldest fragments known of Daniel come from Qumran). Some have even suggested that the origins of the community itself can be traced back to the Hasidim of the Maccabean period, a group commonly suggested as the source of the phenomenon we now describe as apocalypticism (see Freedman on this; P. R. Davies 1989 disagrees). Thus, it is not unusual to find the Essenes of Qumran described as "an apocalyptic community" and find them prominently figuring in discussions about early Christian apocalypticism. This is the case even though many of the same problems about genre definition and the relationship between apocalyptic literature and the communities producing it or preserving it (which we noted in connection with the Hasidic origins of apocalypticism) also surface in connection with discussions of the Dead Sea materials. Given the extraordinary opportunity that the Qumran community affords for insight into the first-century world, it is understandable that any study of apocalypticism gives due attention to it despite these difficulties (see N. A. Dahl 1971; F. F. Bruce 1975; H. Stegemann 1983; P. R. Davies 1985; 1990; J. J. Collins 1989, 1990; C. A. Newsom 1990 and M. O. Wise 1990 for further discussion of Qumran and apocalypticism).

3. Some Key Features of Apocalyptic Eschatology.

We now turn to consider some of the characteristic features of apocalyptic eschatology as it is found in both Judaism and early Christianity. Most scholarly studies of the subject which predate the detailed discussions of an apocalyptic genre, such as those by H. H. Rowley (1944), D. S. Russell (1964) and P. Vielhauer (1965), discuss the contents of apocalyptic eschatology by organizing their discussion around common themes or ideas. There is a great deal of overlap between these scholarly assessments, although no two scholars use exactly the same themes or identify the same ideas as characteristic of the apocalyptic mindset. For example, Vielhauer's discussion, which has been adopted by many, identifies a number of key themes, including: a doctrine of two ages, an attitude of pessimism about the present and hope in the beyond, a concern for universalism and individualism, a concern for determinism and imminent expectation, and a lack of uniformity. An added problem is that not every work which is described as apocalyptic contains each and every theme.

In any event, all such attempts to characterize apocalyptic eschatology are but the tip of an interpretative iceberg, concealing much more below the surface than we might at first think is there. Throughout we can detect the creative tension between the form and the content of apocalyptic writings being played out, a tension which has an important bearing on assessing the apocalyptic eschatology contained in the NT. While it may be true that within the Bible only Daniel 7—12 and Revelation formally fit the definition of apocalypse (and thus might be properly described as apocalyptic literature), does that mean that other NT passages have no contribution to make when it comes to the matter? Are we to rule them out of bounds on the grounds of not conforming to the formal pattern of an apocalypse? Such a move may be the inevitable result of the detailed genre studies that have taken place in recent years, but does it necessarily follow that other NT passages containing motifs of an apocalyptic eschatology are to be excluded from helping to form an understanding of a theology of apocalypticism? Should not images and ideas occurring in the NT which are closely related to those found in apocalyptic literature also be employed in our investigations, despite the fact that the authors expressing them did not choose to express themselves in the literary form of an apocalypse? When put this baldly, the answer seems obvious, although it must not be allowed to undermine the important studies into the nature of the genre of apocalyptic literature.

We thus need to recognize that it is possible to have a religious perspective, a point of view or a way of thinking, which flows out of, or is at least influenced by, an apocalyptic eschatology which is not necessarily contained within the literary framework of an apocalypse (as Russell 1992 rightly notes). Even if we wished to stress the idea of revelation as central to Jewish apocalyptic writing and thought, this does not require that our understanding of the rise of Christian thinking is on this point somehow incompatible with it. Indeed, it is possible to view that most distinctive, even foundational, Christian claim, the resurrection* of Jesus Christ from the dead, as essentially a revelation from heaven. As J. J. Collins puts it: "The importance of apocalypticism for Christian origins centers on the most basic of all Christian beliefs, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. The resurrection was never viewed as an isolated miracle but rather as a revelatory event that provided a new perspective on life and history" (J. J. Collins 1989, 207).

An attempt to integrate the insights of a number of scholars who have cataloged the contents of apocalyptic literature may be of some use and will be offered here under five headings. We shall first consider two of the formal features which have to do with how the revelation contained is expressed and communicated within apocalyptic literature. Then we shall turn to consider matters of content and note how apocalypses deal with three perceptual axes of thought. These three axes could be seen as expressive of the dualism which is inherent within apocalyptic writings, although it is important to remember that the overlap between the three is often extensive (the description of the first two axes comes from J. J. Collins 1979, who uses them to intimate what he feels is the essence of apocalyptic literature, the idea of transcendence which bridges both the form and the content of the revelation).

The first axis concerns how time is perceived, where the present is juxtaposed to the future. The second concerns how space is perceived, where the earthly is juxtaposed to the heavenly. The third concerns how human beings are perceived, where the evil are juxtaposed to the good. In each instance we shall endeavor to provide one or two examples from Jewish and Christian writings which express these facets of apocalyptic eschatology, although given the limits of space it is not possible to offer a comprehensive discussion (the secondary literature cited may be turned to for a more detailed study).

3.1. The Essence of Heavenly Communication: the Hidden is Revealed. We noted above in our discussion of scholarly attempts to define the genre of apocalyptic literature how important it is to remember the central idea of the word apokalypsis as "revelation" (see Reveal, Revelation). Of all of the variety of features of apocalyptic literature addressed by interpreters over the past thirty years or so, this is perhaps the only one which might gain a general agreement as essential to any definition of the literature as a whole. Nowhere is this better seen than in the opening verse of Revelation where the apokalypsis is described in terms of God, through Jesus Christ, granting heavenly mysteries* to his servant John: "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave him to show to his servants what must soon take place; and he made it known by sending his angel to his servant John" (RSV). At the same time, heavenly revelation appears in a number of other passages in the NT, occasionally using the same key terms apokalypsis or apokalyptō (the noun and the verb appear three times each in 1 Pet in connection with the Parousia of Jesus Christ). Perhaps the most striking example of divine revelation in Acts is found in Acts 7:55-56 where Stephen* has a vision of heaven opening and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God.

In many apocalypses one of the key means whereby the contents of heavenly revelation is communicated is by the extensive use of symbols. Thus a bewildering variety of figures and images, both animals and beasts,* dragons (see Beasts, Dragon) and angels,* symbolic bowls* and trumpets* appear regularly within apocalyptic writings. The meaning of these figures and symbolic images is ever adaptable and constantly changing, leading to a situation which Rowland describes as "a happy hunting-ground for many conflicting opinions" (Rowland 1990, 34). The use of complex and unusual symbols, often involving bizarre animals and mythological beasts, is one of the most striking features of apocalyptic literature and the one that has occasioned all sorts of interpretations over the years. However, such symbolism does have a basis in the OT prophetic literature as both Ezekiel and Zechariah 1—8 testify.

It is perhaps the visions of Daniel 2 and 7 which are most influential as the basis for the use of symbolism within subsequent apocalyptic writings, largely due to the fact that the symbols which appear in these visions stand for hostile nations and thus focus the political message of the work (see Rowland 1988 for a discussion of the influence of Daniel upon the NT). In the NT the clearest example of this occurs in Revelation where similar symbols are applied to the Roman Empire,* notably the red dragon (Rev 12), the beast rising from the sea (Rev 13; see Beasts, Dragon, Sea) and the great harlot (Rev 17). These symbols are immediately recognizable to the readership of the book and serve to dehumanize the opposition while allowing God's judgment* to be pronounced upon them. G. B. Caird's suggestion (1962-63, 103) that such symbols functioned as the political cartoons of the day is a good one to keep in mind (Beasley-Murray extends this suggestion, offering some specific examples).

3.2. The Medium of Communication: Angelic Messengers and Heavenly Ascents. Angelic messengers (see Angels) have an important place in the NT, particularly in Acts where they serve as witnesses to God's actions in the past, as agents of his deliverance and as revealers of the divine will. Thus the apostles are released from jail by means of an angel of the Lord (Acts 5:19-20), and Peter's deliverance from prison is effected through angelic mediation (Acts 12:6-11). Meanwhile, angels also communicate God's will and purposes to responsive human beings, as evidenced by Cornelius's* instruction by a holy angel to seek out Peter* (Acts 10:22-33). Even the Pharisees are made to express belief in the possibility that Paul could have been the recipient of a visitation by an angel (Acts 23:9).

A fairly developed angelology can also be seen in several NT passages which speak of the judgment of Satan* and the punishment of his wicked angels, themes which are commonplace in many Jewish apocalypses. Thus in 1 Peter 3:19 the reference to the "spirits in prison" builds upon an interpretation of Genesis 6:1-4 which is common within apocalyptic writings, including 1 Enoch 16:3-4 where the disobedient angels who foment a heavenly revolt are punished. Similar allusions to the punishment of disobedient angels are found in 2 Peter 2:4 and Jude 6 (it should not be overlooked that Jude 14-15 contains the only explicit quotation from 1 Enoch in the NT).

However, we noted above how central the idea of the revelation of divine mysteries is in scholarly attempts to define the literary genre of apocalyptic literature. Typically in apocalypses revelation is communicated to earthly figures through angelic messengers who are responsible for the transportation of the chosen seer to the heavenly realms where the divine plans and intentions are revealed. The place of heavenly ascents within the larger Hellenistic world has been the subject of considerable investigation (see Segal 1980, Himmelfarb 1983 and Dean-Otting 1984, for example). It has been linked to investigations into the so-called merkabah mysticism strand of thought within rabbinic Judaism, and may stand as an important point of contact between wisdom traditions and apocalyptic writings of the Second Temple period and later rabbinic speculations of mysticism (as Gruenwald 1978, Rowland 1979 and others suggest).

Moreover, the idea of a heavenly ascent wherein revelation is communicated is contained in the NT as well. In Revelation we are given an opening declaration that John is sent an angelic messenger who reveals news of what is soon to take place (Rev 1:1). In Revelation 4:1 this heavenly revelation is continued, and is cast within the framework of a heavenly journey by John: "After this I looked, and lo, in heaven an open door! And the first voice, which I had heard speaking to me like a trumpet, said, "Come up hither, and I will show you what must take place after this" (RSV). This heavenly journey is also described in spiritual terms, wherein John says that he was "in the spirit" (egenomēn en pneumati, the exact same phrase is used in Rev 1:10 in introducing the book); further angelic guidance is also mentioned in Revelation 17:7. Most importantly, the throne vision of Revelation 4—5 stands as the most extensive description of the heavenly realm found in the NT. This vision of heavenly ascent is so similar to passages in other Jewish apocalypses that severe doubts have been raised as to its being Christian in origin; many suggest that it was a Jewish apocalypse which has been incorporated into a Christian work (see Rowland 1979 and Hurtado for a debate over this point). Finally, it should be noted that some have taken the description of the ascension* of Jesus Christ recorded in Acts 1:9-11 (cf. Lk 24:50-51) to be based upon the apocalyptic motif of a heavenly ascent.

3.3. The Temporal Axis: The Present Versus the Future. We turn now to consider a number of perceptual axes of thought, beginning with one which addresses the question of time and history. Concentration on this axis within apocalyptic literature lends itself to seeing a connection with the prophetic traditions of Judaism in that a key motif within the prophetic writings is the future Day of the Lord when human history is brought to its fulfillment. It is often said that much apocalyptic literature is characterized by a deterministic view of history and that it frequently employs a periodization of both the past and the future which places the author and his readership at the final critical juncture of history (see Grabbe for an introductory discussion). Foundational to this view of history is a contrast between two ages, the present and the age to come. Daniel 9:24-27 stands as one of the most frequently cited Jewish sources for such a periodization of history.

The oft-repeated assertion that apocalyptic literature rejects history, whereas the prophetic writers see God as working within history, was axiomatic in early scholarly discussions on the relationship between the prophetic and apocalyptic traditions (Frost is a classic statement of this). However, not all have been as dismissive of the importance that earthly history has within apocalyptic literature and many would go so far as to insist that earthly, human history has a very important place within apocalyptic writings. E. F. Scott, for example, although in many ways quite critical of the religious value of apocalyptic literature as a whole, usefully suggests that within the writings of the apocalypticists we have the first Jewish attempts at a philosophy of history. Others have attempted to solve the question of the meaning of history within apocalyptic writings by a careful consideration of the language used within them. G. B. Caird's distinction between Das Ende and Die Endzeit is a useful one to keep in mind at this point (Caird 1976, 84-85): "to expect an End is not the same as to expect an End-time. The one is an event beyond which nothing can conceivably happen. The other is a period of indefinite duration in which much is expected to happen." Caird's differentiation between the two is used to support his understanding of the nature of eschatological language as concerned not so much with the future that is beyond history as it is with the future which will be revealed within history (see Caird 1980 for a fuller treatment). Nevertheless, this distinction is not without its limitations as D. S. Russell rightly notes: "I myself would prefer to define das Ende in terms of the transcendental and the end of history, and die Endzeit in terms of the temporal and the continuity of history and to say that in apocalyptic thought there is a fluctuation between the one and the other and, at times, a mingling and merging of these two concepts" (Russell 1978, 24).

Many different expressions are used to describe the juxtaposition of present and future within the Jewish and Christian apocalyptic writings. At times it is a straightforward opposition between "the present age" and "the age to come" (a distinction explicitly made in t. Pe'a 4.18). However, within the apocalyptic literature of the Judeo-Christian world there is perhaps no better example of the juxtaposition of present and future than 4 Ezra, generally dated around the end of the first century A.D. Several classic statements of this are contained in 4 Ezra: "The Most High has made not one age but two" (4 Ezra 7:50); "The day of judgment shall be the end of this age and the beginning of the eternal age that is to come" (4 Ezra 7:113); "This age the Most High has made for many, but the age to come for the few" (4 Ezra 8:1). It is clear within 4 Ezra that the author is writing to give his Jewish audience a message of hope following the traumatic events of A.D. 70. In effect the apocalypse addresses the theological problem of theodicy (see Thompson and Willett).

This prompts the question of what it is that generates the juxtaposition of present and future within so many works, such as 4 Ezra, which express apocalyptic eschatology. Is this, as is often asserted, a straightforward temporal dualism which solves the tension in a simple, almost cavalier, fashion, which sees the temporal dualism almost as an extension of a deeper cosmological dualism? Or can the juxtaposition between present and future be anchored more firmly in the experience of the Jewish nation following the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and in A.D. 70 (see Judaism), and the resulting crisis of theology that arose as the questions about theodicy had to be faced? Do hopes for a better future gain currency precisely because of the agonies within society over the offense of a present situation? Was the problem faced by postexilic Judaism so acute that it generated the temporal dualism so characteristic of apocalyptic literature? Was the situation for the Jewish nation one in which, as R. Bauckham puts it, "the experience of God"s absence from their own history might become the dogma of his absence from all history" (Bauckham, 21)? However we may seek to answer these complicated questions, it seems certain that a sensitivity to the sociological dimensions of the people of Israel needs to be kept ever in mind.

In this regard it is perhaps no accident that the production of Jewish apocalyptic writings seems associated with two of the most traumatic episodes in the life of the people, the struggle for national survival against the Seleucid Empire in the form of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-163 B.C.) and against the Roman Empire in the form of Titus and his legions (A.D. 66-70), both of which led ultimately to the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem. At the same time, the belief of the apocalyptists in God as the one who has acted in the past must also be remembered and given its due place, including the implication that he will act again decisively in future history (G. I. Davies rightly argues that many apocalyptic texts demonstrate an interest in past history and that it is a mistake to assume that they are concerned with eschatological matters alone). Herein is contained the theological paradox which lies at the heart of matter: on the one hand, the place that the events of human history have within apocalyptic eschatology; and on the other, how that history itself is to be transformed by the actions of God in the future.

Moreover, it is now almost universally accepted that the creative tension between the present and the future was a feature of the teaching of Jesus himself and that it has characterized Christian thought from the very beginning. Indeed, every work within the NT either makes an explicit declaration along these lines, or implies it. A good example is Hebrews 6:5 which speaks of the Christian life in terms of the believer tasting the "powers of the age to come."

3.4. The Spatial Axis: The Earthly Versus the Heavenly. The image of a military headquarters in which the campaign moves for a battle are being enacted which G. B. Caird uses (1962-63) to portray the relationship between heavenly and earthly events is a useful one to illustrate the complex nature of eschatological language. In Caird's image the moving of various flags (representing military units) is both determinative and descriptive, both establishing movements to be made and reflecting those that have taken place; the same principle holds, Caird argues, for the symbolic language that is being employed in eschatology. At the same time, while Caird's illustration does help us see the complexity of eschatological language, it also begs the question of how such "military moves" (to continue the image for a moment) are played out in history and what relationship they have to the temporal axis discussed above.

We might at times be tempted to view the emphasis on the spatial axis in apocalyptic literature as a reaction to the disappointments of history. However, Bauckham (19) rightly questions the commonly held assumption that the apocalyptists abandoned faith in God's action within history in favor of a transcendent eschatology. In fact the temporal axis and the spatial axis are intricately connected within much Jewish and Christian apocalyptic literature; at times one or the other may come to the fore, as the temporal axis does in 4 Ezra and the spatial does in 2 Baruch, for example, but we must avoid setting up a false dichotomy here. Indeed, the importance of the spatial axis within apocalyptic literature invites one to see a connection with the wisdom traditions of Judaism in precisely the same way that the temporal axis invites one to see a connection to the prophetic traditions. At the same time it is unfair to suggest that wisdom literature as a whole is uninterested in temporal history. The Hellenistic Book of Wisdom stands against any attempt at such a simplistic division between wisdom and apocalyptic on this point, particularly when it comes to the way in which the cosmic order is presented in both. As J. J. Collins (1977-78, 138) remarks: "The conviction that the experience of God and even eschatology is mediated through the cosmic order constitutes the common ground of wisdom and apocalyptic."

Given the fact that the difference between apocalyptic literature and prophetic literature cannot be reduced to a simple difference between their respective views about future history, what can we say about how each stresses the relationship between the temporal axis and the spatial axis? Might we attempt to draw some distinction between them on the basis of how they handle the horizontal and vertical axes? A key question is how this spatial axis of perception is expressed; what gives it substance? J. J. Collins (1974) suggests that one distinctive characteristic that is found in apocalyptic literature, as over against prophetic literature, is the former's concentration on the transcendence of death (he here cites Dan, 1 Enoch, Jub., As. Mos. and select Qumran materials as evidence; Russell 1992 offers an assessment of Collins's distinction). This focal point leads inevitably to a consideration of the idea of the resurrection of the body (as hinted at in Dan 12:2-3), a subject of considerable debate in its own right.

One of the most significant ways that the spatial axis is expressed within apocalyptic eschatology is through the idea of a cosmic transformation and the establishment of a new heaven* and a new earth (see Creation, Cosmology). Perhaps the most explicit description of the cosmic transformation in the NT is found in 2 Peter 3:10-14, while Hebrews 12:18-24 and 13:14 speak of the future heavenly city of Jerusalem.* In any event, the most extensive discussion of the new heaven and the new earth is found in Revelation 21—22, a passage of immense importance as far as Christian millennialism is concerned (see Millennium). In all of these examples the establishment of a new order is closely associated with the imminent Parousia* of a Messianic Deliverer. Indeed, the idea of an imminent Parousia of Jesus Christ has long been seen as one of the premiere features of Christian apocalypticism. E. Käsemann (100) went so far as to define apocalyptic as belief in the imminent Parousia, virtually equating the two.

3.5. The Anthropological Axis: The Wicked Versus the Righteous. As we noted above, the periodical reviews of history which are found in so many of the apocalyptic writings generally place the author (and his readership) in the last crucial moments of human history. This placement is not simply to suggest the ability to predict the future with crystal ball-like accuracy, but is designed to evoke a decision, to elicit a response on the part of the readership. In other words, apocalyptic literature has an ethical dimension which lies at the heart of much of its message, however that may be formally presented and whatever its contents might be.

Many of the apocalyptic texts of both Judaism and Christianity contain explicit declarations about the fate of human beings, dividing them up into two opposing groups, the wicked and the righteous, the evil and the good. Generally this dualism is viewed as an expression of the ethical dimension of apocalyptic literature, a feature which invites a comparison between apocalyptic texts and the wisdom traditions of both Judaism and Christianity and suggests that something of an overlap occurs between the two on this very point (see Gammie). A number of NT passages speak of future eschatological judgment,* particularly associated with the Parousia of Jesus Christ (including Heb 2:2; 4:1, 12-13; 6:2, 4-8; 9:27; 10:25-27, 30-31; 12:5-11, 18-19, 23, 25, 29; 13:4, 17; Jas 1:12; 4:11-12; 5:1-11; 1 Pet 4:5-7; 2 Pet 2:3, 9-12; 3:5-7; 1 Jn 2:28; 4:17; Jude 9, 14-16, 22; Rev 6—19).

Moreover, some of the sectarian documents from Qumran also contain material which speaks of human beings in starkly dualistic terms, effectively equating membership within the community with righteousness and contrasting that with those who are outside and hence wicked. This is most clearly seen in 1QS 3:13—4:26 and 1QM, a scroll sometimes provocatively titled "The War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness" (see Charlesworth and Yadin). The larger question of how the eschatological perspective of the Qumran community might shed light upon the NT documents is one which has engendered considerable interest. One only need call attention to James* to see how tightly interwoven ethical teaching and eschatological ideas can be within the NT, a fact which has invited comparison with the Qumran materials, notably 1QM (see, e.g., Eisenman).

See also CREATION, COSMOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; MILLENNIUM; MYSTERY; PAROUSIA; QUMRAN; REVEAL, REVELATION; REVELATION, BOOK OF; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Aune, "The Apocalypse of John and the Problem of Genre" in Semeia 36: Early Christian Apocalypticism: Genre and Social Setting, ed. A. Y. Collins (Decatur, GA: Scholars, 1986) 65-96; M. Barker, "Slippery Words: III. Apocalyptic," ExpT 89 (1977-78) 324-29; J. Barr, "Jewish Apocalyptic in Recent Scholarly Study," BJRL 58 (1975-76) 9-35; J. Barton, Oracles of God (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1986); R. Bauckham, "The Rise of Apocalyptic," Themelios 3 (1977-78) 10-23; G. R. Beasley-Murray, Highlights of the Book of Revelation (Nashville: Broadman, 1972); H. D. Betz, "On the Problem of the Religio-Historical Understanding of Apocalypticism" in JThC 6 (1969) 134-56; F. F. Bruce, "A Reappraisal of Jewish Apocalyptic Literature," RevExp 72 (1975) 305-15; G. B. Caird, "On Deciphering the Book of Revelation," ExpT 74 (1962-63) 13-15, 51-53, 82-84, 103-5; idem, "Eschatology and Politics: Some Misconception" in Biblical Studies: Essays in Honour of William Barclay, ed. J. R. McKay and J. F. Miller (London: Collins, 1976) 72-86; idem, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (London: Duckworth, 1980) 243-27; J. Carmignac, "Qu'est-ce que l'apocalyptique?," RevQ 10 (1979-80) 3-33; R. P. Carroll, "Twilight of Prophecy or Dawn of Apocalyptic?," JSOT 14 (1979) 3-35; J. H. Charlesworth, "A Critical Comparison of the Dualism in 1QS III, 13-IV, 26 and the 'Dualism' Contained in the Fourth Gospel," NTS 15 (1968-69) 389-418; N. Cohn, Cosmos, Chaos and the World to Come: The Ancient Roots of Apocalyptic Faith (London: Yale University Press, 1994); A. Y. Collins "Early Christian Apocalypses," Semeia 14 (1979) 61-121; idem, ed. Semeia 36: Early Christian Apocalypticism: Genre and Social Setting (Decatur, GA: Scholars, 1986); J. J. Collins, "Apocalyptic Eschatology as the Transcendence of Death," CBQ 36 (1974) 21-43; idem, "Jewish Apocalyptic Against its Hellenistic Near Eastern Environment," BASOR 220 (1975) 27-36; idem, "The Court Tales in Daniel and the Development of Apocalyptic," JBL 94 (1975) 218-34; idem, The Apocalyptic Vision of the Book of Daniel (Missoula: Scholars, 1977); idem, "Cosmos and History: Jewish Wisdom and Apocalyptic in the Hellenistic Age," HR 17 (1977-78) 121-42; idem, "The Jewish Apocalypses," Semeia 14 (1979) 21-59; idem, ed., Semeia 14: Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre (Missoula: Scholars, 1979); idem, Daniel, with an Introduction to Apocalyptic Literature (FOTL 20; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); idem, "Apocalyptic Literature" in Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. R. A. Kraft and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 345-70; idem, The Apocalyptic Imagination (New York: Crossroads, 1989); idem, "Was the Dead Sea Sect an Apocalyptic Community?" in Archeology and History in the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. L. Schiffman (JSPSup 8; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1990) 25-51; idem, "Genre, Ideology and Social Movements in Jewish Apocalypticism," in Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies since the Uppsala Colloquium, ed. J. J. Collins and J. H. Charlesworth (JSPSup 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991) 11-32; N. A. Dahl, "Eschatology and History in the Light of the Dead Sea Scrolls," in The Future of Our Religious Past: Essays in Honour of Rudolf Bultmann, ed. J. M. Robinson (London: SCM, 1971) 9-28; G. I. Davies, "Apocalyptic and Historiography," JSOT 5 (1978) 15-28; P. R. Davies, "Hasidim in the Maccabean Period," JJS 28 (1977) 127-40; idem, "Eschatology at Qumran," JBL 104 (1985) 39-55; idem, "The Social World of Apocalyptic Writings" in The World of Ancient Israel, ed. R. E. Clements (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989) 251-71; idem, "Qumran and Apocalyptic or Obscurum Per Obscurius," JNES 49 (1990) 127-34; M. Dean-Otting, Heavenly Journeys: A Study of the Motif in Hellenistic Jewish Literature (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1984); R. Eisenman, "Eschatological 'Rain' Imagery in the War Scroll from Qumran and in the Letter of James," JNES 49 (1990) 173-84; E. S. Fiorenza, "The Phenomenon of Early Christian Apocalyptic: Some Reflections on Method" in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1983) 295-316; D. N. Freedman, "The Flowering of Apocalyptic," JThC 6 (1969) 166-74; S. B. Frost, "Apocalyptic and History" in The Bible in Modern Scholarship, ed. J. P. Hyatt (Nashville: Abingdon, 1965) 98-113; N. Frye, Anatomy of Criticism (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1957); J. G. Gammie, "Spatial and Ethical Dualism in Jewish Wisdom and Apocalyptic Literature," JBL 93 (1974) 356-85; T. F. Glasson, "What is Apocalyptic?," NTS 27 (1980) 98-105; L. L. Grabbe, "Chronography in Hellenistic Jewish Historiography," SBLSP (1979) 43-68; I. Gruenwald, Apocalyptic and Merkavah Mysticism (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1978); idem, "Jewish Apocalyptic Literature," ANRW 2.19.1 (1979) 89-118; P. D. Hanson, "Jewish Apocalyptic Against Its Near Eastern Environment," RB 78 (1971) 31-58; idem, "Apocalypticism" in IDBSup 28-34; idem, "Prolegomena to the Study of Jewish Apocalyptic" in Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God, ed. F. M. Cross, W. E. Lemke and P. D. Miller (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1976) 389-413; idem, The Dawn of Apocalyptic (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); idem, "Apocalyptic Literature" in The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 465-88; idem, "Apocalypses and Apocalypticism: The Genre," ABD 1:279-80; D. Hellholm, ed., Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East: Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Apocalypticism, August 12-17, 1979 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1983); idem, "The Problem of Apocalyptic Genre and the Apocalypse of John" in Semeia 36: Early Christian Apocalypticism: Genre and Social Setting, ed. A. Y. Collins (Decatur, GA: Scholars, 1986) 13-64; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); M. Himmelfarb, Tours of Hell: An Apocalyptic Form in Jewish and Christian Literature (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); L. W. Hurtado, "Revelation 4-5 in the Light of Jewish Apocalyptic Analoges," JSNT 25 (1985) 105-24; J. Kallas, "The Apocalypse—An Apocalyptic Book?," JBL 86 (1967) 69-80; E. Käsemann, New Testament Questions of Today (London: SCM, 1969); M. Knibb, "Prophecy and the Emergence of the Jewish Apocalypses" in Israel's Prophetic Tradition: Essays in Honour of Peter Ackroyd, ed. R. Coggins, A. Phillips and M. Knibb (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982): K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic (London: SCM, 1972); S. Laws, "Can Apocalyptic Be Relevant?" in What About the New Testament? Essays for Christopher Evans, ed. M. D. Hooker and C. J. A. Hickling (London: SCM, 1975) 89-102; I. H. Marshall, "Slippery Words: I. Eschatology," ExpT 89 (1977-78) 264-69; H.-P. Müller, "Mantische Weisheit und Apokalyptik," VT Supp 22, (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 268-93; C. A. Newsom, "Apocalyptic and the Discourse of the Qumran Community," JNES 49 (1990) 135-44; E. W. Nicholson, "Apocalyptic" in Tradition and Interpretation, ed. G. W. Anderson (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1979) 189-213; G. W. E.

Nickelsburg, "Social Aspects of Palestinian Apocalypticism" in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1983) 641-54; O. Plöger, Theocracy and Eschatology (Oxford: Blackwell, 1964); G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM, 1972); W. G. Rollins, "The New Testament and Apocalyptic," NTS 17 (1970-71) 454-76; C. C. Rowland, "The Visions of God in Apocalyptic Literature," JSJ 10 (1979) 137-54; idem, The Open Heaven (London: SPCK, 1982); idem, "Apocalyptic Literature" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture: Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 170-89; idem, "Apocalyptic" in A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. R. J. Coggins and J. L. Houlden (London: SCM, 1990) 34-36; H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic (London: Lutterworth, 1944); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (London: SCM, 1964); idem, Apocalyptic: Ancient and Modern (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); idem, Divine Disclosure: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic (London: SCM, 1992); E. P. Sanders, "The Genre of Palestinian Apocalypses" in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J.C.B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1983) 447-59; E. F. Scott, "The Natural Language of Religion: Apocalyptic and the Christian Message," Int 2 (1948) 419-29; A. F. Segal, "Heavenly Ascent in Hellenistic Judaism, Early Christianity and their Environments," ANRW 2.23.2 (1980) 1333-94; M. Smith, "On the History of Apokalyptō and Apokalypsis" in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J.C.B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1983) 9-19; H. Stegemann, "Die Bedeutung der Qumranfunde für die Erforschung der Apokalyptik" in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1983) 495-530; M. E. Stone, "Lists of Revealed Things in the Apocalyptic Literature" in Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God, ed. F. M. Cross, W. E. Lemke and P. D. Miller (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1976) 414-52; R. E. Sturm, "Defining the Word 'Apocalyptic': A Problem in Biblical Criticism" in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards (JSNTSup 24; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 17-48; J. T. Thomas, "Jewish Apocalyptic and the Comparative Method" in Scripture in Context: Essays on Comparative Method, ed. C. D. Evans, W. W. Hallo and J. B. White (Pittsburgh, PA: Pickwick, 1980) 245-62; A. T. Thompson, Responsibility for Evil in the Theodicy of IV Ezra (SBLDS 29; Missoula: Scholars, 1977); J. C. VanderKam, Enoch and the Growth of an Apocalyptic Tradition (CBQMS 16; Washington, DC: The Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1984); P. Vielhauer, "Apocalypses and Related Subjects" in New Testament Apocrypha II, ed. R. McL. Wilson (London: Lutterworth, 1965) 581-607; R. L. Webb, " 'Apocalyptic': Observations on a Slippery Term," JNES 49 (1990) 115-26; T. W. Willett, Eschatology in the Theodicies of 2 Baruch and 4 Ezra (JSP 4; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989); M. O. Wise, "The Eschatological Vision of the Temple Scroll," JNES 49 (1990) 155-72; Y. Yadin, The Message of the Scrolls (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1957).

L. J. Kreitzer

APOCALYPTIC ESCHATOLOGY. See APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM.

APOCALYPTICISM. See APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM.

APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS

This article covers extracanonical Christian literature that is either attributed to biblical persons as authors or recounts narratives about biblical persons that parallel or supplement the biblical narratives. In most early Christian literature of this kind the biblical persons are NT characters, but in some cases they are OT characters. Christian apocryphal literature (so defined) continued to be written for many centuries, in many Christian traditions, and so the whole corpus of such literature is vast. Modern collections of such literature in translation (see especially Schneemelcher 1991-92; Elliott 1993) are only selections, usually including the earliest such literature, but often also including later works that have been particularly influential in Christian history. Only occasionally do they include Christian works written under OT pseudonyms, which can often be found, along with Jewish works of this kind, in collections of the OT Pseudepigrapha. The present article is restricted to literature that can plausibly be dated before the mid-third century, but excludes apocryphal Gospels (treated in DJG) and apocryphal Pauline literature (treated in DPL).

1. Apocalyptic and Prophetic Literature
2. Apostolic Acts
3. Other Apostolic Pseudepigrapha
4. Wisdom Literature
5. Hymnic Literature

1. Apocalyptic and Prophetic Literature. An apocalypse* is a work in which a seer receives from a supernatural revealer (usually God, Christ or an angel; see Reveal, Revelation) a revelation (auditory or visionary) of heavenly secrets, which are often, though not always, eschatological* in nature. Many such Jewish works were attributed to biblical figures, such as Enoch or Ezra, and Christian writers continued this Jewish literary tradition, attributing their apocalypses sometimes to OT figures, sometimes to NT figures.

Early Christian apocalypses were not modeled on the NT Apocalypse of John; they form a Christian continuation of the Jewish apocalyptic tradition. But there are two distinctive (and overlapping) developments of the apocalyptic genre. First, revelations made by Jesus Christ to his disciples in the period between his resurrection* and his ascension* form a large category of early Christian works. Many, but not all, of these are Gnostic (see Gnosis). Many of them are often classified as Gospels. One non-Gnostic example (the Apoc. Peter) is treated below (1.1), because its content is eschatological and closely related to Jewish apocalyptic traditions. One Gnostic example is also discussed below (1.6). (Other such works, both Gnostic and non-Gnostic, are discussed in DJG, Gospels [Apocryphal], §9). Second, many Gnostic works, including those just mentioned but also others attributed to biblical pseudonyms, record revelations of otherworldly secrets and must be classified as apocalypses in a broad sense (see 1.7 below). Finally, it should be noted that although apocalypses were the major literary vehicle for prophecy in this period (see Hermas, Shepherd of), there are also some other kinds of prophetic works among the Christian apocrypha (see 1.4-5 below).

1.1. Apocalypse of Peter. Of all the Christian apocrypha, this one came closest to being accepted into the NT canon.* In the second to fourth centuries it was widely read and was treated as Scripture by some. Its popularity was no doubt due to the detailed information it gives as to the postmortem fate of human beings in paradise or hell.* It comprises revelations made to the disciples by the risen Christ about the persecutions and downfall of antichrist,* the Parousia,* the resurrection of the dead and the last judgment,* the punishments of the wicked in hell, and the rewards of the righteous in paradise. Peter receives a revelation of his own future life up to his martyrdom,* and the work ends with an account of Christ's ascension to heaven.* The longest section of the work, the description of hell, in which twenty-one different types of sinners are seen each undergoing a punishment appropriate to their sin, is in the tradition of Jewish apocalyptic "tours of hell."

A good case can be made that the apocalypse was written in Palestinian Jewish Christian (see Jewish Christianity) circles during the Bar Kokhba revolt (A.D. 132-35). It reflects the difficult circumstances of Jewish Christians who refused to join the revolt, since they could not accept the messiahship of Bar Kokhba, portrayed here as the false messiah (antichrist), or support his aim of rebuilding the temple.* In this case the apocalypse is of great historical importance as rare evidence for the history of Jewish Christianity in Palestine after 70.

1.2. Ascension of Isaiah. Though this work has sometimes been treated as a Christian redaction of pre-Christian Jewish sources, it should probably be seen as an originally Christian apocalypse, employing some Jewish traditions about the martyrdom of the prophet Isaiah but largely inspired by the strong early Christian tradition of interpreting the prophecies of Isaiah as prophetic of Jesus Christ. Like the book of Daniel and some other Jewish apocalypses, it comprises a largely narrative section (Asc. Isa. 1—5) and a largely visionary section (Asc. Isa. 6—11). These contain two complementary accounts of Isaiah's vision. The first (Asc. Isa. 3:13—4:18) takes the form of a prophecy of events from the incarnation of Christ (known in this work as "the Beloved") to the Parousia and the end of history. The second narrates Isaiah's visionary ascent through the seven heavens to the throne of God, where he sees in prophetic vision the descent of the Beloved from the seventh heaven to earth, his incarnation, life, death* and descent to Hades, followed by his reascent through the heavens to enthronement at God's right hand. The Jewish apocalyptic idea of a visionary's ascent through the seven heavens to receive revelation from God in the highest heaven is thus adapted to a Christian purpose.

The Ascension of Isaiah seems to derive from a circle of early Christian prophets, whose own corporate visionary experience is strikingly described in the narrative of Isaiah's experience (Asc. Isa. 6). This, along with its distinctive forms of trinitarian and christological* expression, make it interesting evidence that is not easy to place on the map of early Christianity. It has been plausibly dated between the late first and mid-second centuries.

1.3. Apocalypse of Thomas. This revelation of Christ to the apostle* Thomas predicts the signs that over the course of seven days will precede the end of this world. Though difficult to date, it may well be relatively early; it certainly depends closely on Jewish apocalyptic tradition.

1.4. Sibylline Oracles. The Sibyls were pagan prophetesses to whom Jewish writers from the third century B.C. onward had already attributed prophetic oracles in poetic form and enigmatic style. These works, which espouse monotheism, denounce idolatry,* prophesy events of world history and predict judgments, were presumably meant to appeal to pagan readers who did not know their Jewish authorship. Early Christians continued this Jewish tradition by expanding originally Jewish Sibylline oracles with Christian additions and by writing fresh Christian compositions of the same kind.

1.5. 5 Ezra and 6 Ezra. These terms are used for, respectively, chapters 1-2 and chapters 15-16 of the composite work known as 2 Esdras or 4 Ezra, whose core (chaps. 3-14) is a Jewish apocalypse. 5 Ezra, a series of prophecies and visions attributed to Ezra, is a Christian work of the second century, portraying the church as the true people of God who replace disobedient and faithless Israel (see Church as Israel). Prefaced to the Jewish apocalypse of Ezra, it provides a Christian perspective for the reading of the latter. 6 Ezra is a prophecy usually regarded as Christian and of a later date.

1.6. Coptic Apocalypse of Peter (CG VII, 3). This Gnostic work, found in the Nag Hammadi library and dating probably from the late second or early third century, has no connection with the Apocalypse of Peter described above (1.1). The unusual setting of this apocalypse, in the temple before the crucifixion of Jesus, is appropriate to the unusual contents of the visionary revelation which "the Savior"* gives to Peter. Its climax is the disclosure that only the physical Jesus suffers and dies on the cross,* while the spiritual, immortal Savior stands aside, laughing with joy. This revelation provides the basis for polemic against those blind Christians who can recognize only the physical Christ they think died and rose bodily, and who therefore have only a mortal destiny themselves. Thus the apocalyptic form of revelation of the true reality behind the appearances of history in this world serves here the purposes of a strongly dualistic, Gnostic understanding of christology and human destiny.

1.7. Other Gnostic Apocalypses. Gnostic works that do not take the form of postresurrection dialogues between Christ and the apostles, but that do recount revelations made by heavenly revealers to biblical figures, include the Paraphrase of Shem (CG VII, 1), the Three Steles of Seth (CG VII, 5) and Melchizedek (CG IX, 1).

2. Apostolic Acts.

The five oldest apocryphal Acts are those of Andrew, John, Paul, Peter and Thomas (see 2.1-4 below; the Acts of Paul are discussed in DPL). These all date from the second or early third century. (Many other apocryphal Acts were composed in subsequent centuries.) More precise dates are difficult to determine, partly because they depend on the literary relationships between these five works. That there are such literary relationships is clear, but what the relationships are, with implications for the chronological order in which the five works were written, remains debatable. The tendency of recent scholarship has been to date the Acts of Thomas in the first half of the third century but the other four Acts in the second half of the second century or even somewhat earlier.

Though there are considerable differences among these five works, they all belong to a common literary subgenre, which can be defined as a narrative of the missionary activity of a single apostle subsequent to the resurrection of Jesus and concluding with the martyrdom (or, in John's case, death) of the apostle. The Lukan Acts* clearly had some influence on the development of this genre, though the extent of indebtedness to the Lukan Acts varies among the apocryphal Acts and is probably not direct in every case. The Lukan Acts provided the model for an episodic travel narrative that is characteristic, to a greater or lesser extent, of these apocryphal Acts—with the exception of the Acts of Peter in its surviving form—as well as for some, but by no means all, of the contents (such as miracles and preaching) of the various episodes in the apostle's missionary career. In this respect the Acts of Paul is closer to Acts than any other of the oldest apocryphal Acts.

But even the second half of the Lukan Acts, with its concentration on Paul, does not provide a model for a narrative ending with the apostle's death. Here, as in some other respects also, the apocryphal Acts show a more biographical interest in their subjects than the Lukan Acts shows even in Paul. They can be located within the growing interest in biographical literature in the period in which they were written. More specifically, they resemble the novelistic biographies of the period, which combine a genuine interest in history with a freedom for historical imagination, such that the line between fact and fiction is not easily drawn. The extent to which their authors drew on existing legends or even traditions of some historical value in their accounts of the apostles is rarely possible to determine, but to a large extent they are works of historical imagination. But the resemblances to the Greek romantic novels which have often been observed do not place them in the genre of the novel. The resemblances result from the fact that the semifictional biographies to which the apocryphal Acts are most akin themselves have features in common with or borrowed from the novels. The apocryphal Acts were written to engage and entertain readers who might well be familiar with novels and novelistic biographies, but they also convey the Christian message and invite to the Christian lifestyle as their authors understood these.

None of these five apocryphal Acts can properly be called Gnostic (but see 2.2 below), but some of them have clear affinities with aspects of the religious milieu of the period in which Gnosticism flourished, and all show some tendency to favor sexual abstinence and other forms of detachment from material or worldly life. Similarly, the tendencies to docetism* and modalism in the christology of several of the Acts should not, for the most part, be attributed specifically to Gnosticism; instead they reflect the christological piety of the period. However, despite some important affinities, each of the five Acts has its own theological distinctiveness.

2.1. Acts of Andrew. This work survives only in a variety of incomplete and often adapted later forms which allow a partial reconstruction of the original text and contents. They recounted Andrew's travels and missionary successes in various parts of northern Asia Minor and Greece, ending with his death by crucifixion in Patras. (It is uncertain whether the Acts of Andrew and Matthias, which tells of Andrew's adventures in the city of the cannibals, belonged originally to the Acts of Andrew.) Salvation, which is the central concern of the work, is understood as the detachment and liberation of the soul, which is akin to God, from the body, in which it is imprisoned in this life, and from the material world.

2.2. Acts of John. Though some of the contents of the original Acts of John have to be conjectured, much of the text has survived. It recounts the apostle John's journey to Ephesus, where much of the narrative takes place, a missionary journey through the province of Asia (perhaps in the original text to all seven churches of the Apocalypse of John), John's return to Ephesus and his death. The most distinctive section is John's preaching of the gospel* in chapters 87-102, in which he recounts episodes from the ministry of Jesus. These include revelations to the apostles of the polymorphous and elusive nature of Christ's bodily appearance, the famous hymn* of Christ in which he dances with the apostles, and a revelation of the esoteric meaning of the cross. These chapters, uniquely in the five apocryphal Acts, express a clearly Gnostic theology, with special affinities with Valentinian Gnosticism. The special character of chapters 94-102 (and the related chapter 109) suggests that they existed independently and were incorporated in the Acts of John either originally or subsequently. While this does not make the Acts of John as a whole a Gnostic composition, it does indicate that in this work the line between Gnostic and non-Gnostic interpretations of Christianity is thin.

2.3. Acts of Peter. The Acts of Peter survives in a secondary edited form (the Vercelli Acts), which, after an introduction describing Paul's departure from Rome for Spain, recounts the arrival of Simon Magus in Rome, Peter's journey from Jerusalem to Rome and his ministry there, largely in the form of a contest with Simon Magus, in both miracles and argument, concluding with Simon's spectacular defeat. Finally Peter dies by crucifixion and appears after his death. Two other surviving stories about Peter's miracles suggest that the original form of the Acts of Peter was longer and may have recounted his ministry in Jerusalem. Along with the Acts of Paul, the Acts of Peter is the least unorthodox of the five apocryphal Acts, though here too the christology and the sexual asceticism reflect popular piety and preaching.

2.4. Acts of Thomas. This is the only one of the five major apocryphal Acts of which the original form has survived intact, though it is uncertain whether the Syriac (see Syria) or the Greek version preserves the language of composition. It certainly derives from east Syrian Christianity, in which the apostle Thomas was celebrated and (since Thomas means "twin") understood as the spiritual twin of Jesus, and in which radical asceticism (encratism), more extreme in this Acts than in the others, flourished. While the Acts of Thomas is not strictly Gnostic, its understanding of salvation as awareness of one's true self once again shows the affinities of the apocryphal Acts with some aspects of Gnosticism. The Acts of Thomas recounts Thomas's missionary activity in India, but despite some historically accurate information about first-century India, his mission there is likely to be entirely legendary. The "Hymn of the Pearl" (chaps. 108-13), an allegorical myth, has been variously interpreted but probably tells of the heavenly origin and destiny of the soul.

2.5. Acts of the Peter and the Twelve Apostles (CG VI, 1). Though found in the Nag Hammadi library, it is not clear whether this fragmentary text, which has nothing to do with the five major apocryphal Acts, is Gnostic or not. It tells of the apostles' encounter with Lithargoel, a pearl merchant, who turns out to be Christ in disguise.

3. Other Apostolic Pseudepigrapha.

Works included here have some affinities with the apocryphal Acts but cannot strictly be classified as such. Apocryphal apostolic letters are rare (see 3.2 below; see also DPL, Apocryphal Pauline Literature). The Epistle of the Apostles, though written in the form of a letter by the apostles, belongs otherwise to the genre of revelatory dialogues with the risen Christ (see sec. 1 above).

3.1. Preaching of Peter. This work, probably of the early second century, survives only in a small number of quotations. These suggest that it was a collection of missionary sermons attributed to Peter.

3.2. Letter of Peter to Philip (CG VIII, 2). Only the first half of this Gnostic work consists of Peter's letter to Philip; the rest is one of the revelatory dialogues between the risen Christ and the apostles which are the favorite literary genre of the Gnostic literature.

3.3. Second Apocalypse of James (CG V, 4). This work, though it could be classified as a Gnostic apocalypse, is included here because it recounts a sermon by James of Jerusalem, in which he reports the revelations made to him by the risen Jesus, followed by the martyrdom of James. The account of the martyrdom is closely related to that derived by Hegesippus from Palestinian Jewish Christian tradition (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.23).

3.4. Pseudo-Clementine Literature. The Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies are attributed to Clement* of Rome, portrayed as a disciple and companion of Peter. Since they recount Peter's travels, preaching and conflict with Simon Magus, they bear some resemblance to the apocryphal Acts. They date from the fourth century but are mentioned here because numerous attempts have been made to discern much earlier Jewish Christian sources incorporated in them.

4. Wisdom Literature.

The Teachings of Silvanus (CG VII, 4), though preserved in the Nag Hammadi Library, is not a Gnostic work but a Christian work in the genre of wisdom* instruction. It has affinities both with Jewish wisdom literature and with the Alexandrian* tradition of philosophically influenced Christian theology. Since wisdom literature is usually attributed to authoritative teachers of the past, it is likely that the name Silvanus refers to the companion of Paul, but this cannot be certain.

5. Hymnic Literature.

The only Christian apocryphal work in this category is the Odes of Solomon, a collection of forty-two odes. The author was a Christian prophet. Whether he himself associated his work with Solomon is uncertain. The ascription to Solomon results from the association of his work with the Jewish Psalms of Solomon, whether by the author himself or at a subsequent but early date. The complete collection is extant only in Syriac, and this may have been the language of composition, though some have argued for Greek as the original language. In any case, affinities with the Qumran* literature and with Ignatius indicate an origin in Syrian Christianity under strong Jewish influence. The Odes have been dated as early as the end of the first century and as late as the third century.

See also MARK, SECRET GOSPEL OF; PETER, GOSPEL OF; THOMAS, GOSPEL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. K. Elliott, The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993; contains translations and very full bibliographies); J. M. Robinson, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library in English (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); W. Schneemelcher, ed., New Testament Apocrypha (2 vols.; rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991-92). The most important new editions of the Christian apocryphal literature are those appearing in the Corpus Christianorum Series Apocryphorum (Turnhout: Brepols, 8 vols. published so far). See J.-D. Dubois, "The New Series Apocryphorum of the Corpus Christianorum," Second Century 4 (1984) 29-36. The series Apocryphes en Poche (Turnhout: Brepols, 8 vols. published so far) provides accessible French translations and introductions of individual apocryphal works. (Brepols also publishes an annual Bulletin of the Association pour l'Etude de la Littérature Apocryphe Chrétienne [AELAC], which is responsible for these and other projects in the field.)

R. J. Bauckham

APOSTASY

Apostasy is the antonym of conversion; it is deconversion. In the literature covered by this volume, the word apostasy (apostasia) occurs only in a context of Jews falling away from the teachings* of Moses,* for which Paul was being blamed (Acts 21:21; cf. 2 Thess 2:3; see DPL, Apostasy, Falling Away, Perseverance).

1. Apostasy Foreseen by Jesus
2. Apostasy in Acts
3. Apostasy in Hebrews
4. Apostasy in the General Epistles
5. Apostasy in Revelation
6. Occasions of Apostasy
7. Means of Resistance
8. Apostasy in the Postapostolic Literature

1. Apostasy Foreseen by Jesus.

Jesus foresaw the fact of apostasy and warned both those who would fall into sin as well as those who would cause others to fall (see, e.g., Mk 9:42-49). He knew that his disciples would "all fall away" and that Peter in particular would deny him (Mk 14:27-31). There are hints that Jesus foresaw a significant falling away as a prelude to the Parousia* (Mk 13:20-23; Rev 20:3; cf. 2 Thess 2:3-12). Judas, one of the Twelve,* was an apostate (Jn 6:70-71).

2. Apostasy in Acts.

Acts* describes a number of those who fell away under the ministry* of the apostle Peter. Early in the history of the Jerusalem* church,* Ananias and Sapphira died for the sin of lying to the apostles* (Acts 5:1-11; 1 Cor 11:30). In Samaria* a sorcerer, Simon, who had "believed" the message of Philip* and had been baptized,* was rebuked by Peter (and excommunicated?) for the sin of seeking to buy the power* of God* evident in the coming of the Spirit to the Samaritans (Acts 8:9-24; see Holy Spirit).

Notwithstanding the remarkable impact of his ministry in Ephesus, Paul foresaw that after he would leave "wolves" from outside would ravage the flock and that false teachers would arise from within the church and draw many away from his teaching (Acts 20:29-30). Doubtless Paul was proved right in his prophecy* (cf. 2 Tim 1:15).

Examples of the language of apostasy in Acts includes "draw away" (aphistēmi, Acts 20:30; cf. Acts 5:37) and "apostasy" (apostasia, Acts 21:21). Ananias and Sapphira "fall down" (piptō, Acts 5:5, 10), but that word has a literal meaning here and a metaphorical meaning elsewhere.

3. Apostasy in Hebrews.

The letter to the Hebrews* is the locus classicus of the subject of apostasy in the NT. The writer and the readers of the letter, who appear to have been Jewish believers, had been evangelized by the original disciples of Jesus (Heb 2:3). At the time they suffered persecution* (Heb 10:32-34), though in the meantime they have become "dull of hearing" (Heb 5:11-14). At the time of writing they are again facing persecution, though not yet "to the point of shedding blood" (Heb 12:4). The anonymous writer is well aware of their spiritual danger, that they are under the pressure of total apostasy; that is, of deliberately rejecting Christ (Heb 10:36-41; 6:6). The latter text has been the occasion of exegetical debate, with some scholars taking seriously the possibility of rejection and others pointing to Hebrews 6:9 as indicating the author's more optimistic attitude to his readers. To be noted is the vocabulary of apostasy: "fall away" (aphistēmi, Heb 3:12), "fall" (piptō, Heb 4:11), "commit apostasy" (parapiptō, Heb 6:6) and "throw away" (apoballō, Heb 10:35).

Against the possibility of committing apostasy, the writer urges his readers not to "drift" from the gospel or "neglect" their salvation,* not to harden their hearts to the word of promise* that they had received but with faithfulness to "hold fast" their "confession" (Heb 3:7-13). He calls on them to persevere in hope,* not deflected by the suffering* of that present time (Heb 2:14-3:6; 5:7; 11:1—12:2).

How are the readers to be helped to resist this temptation* to apostatize from Christ? The writer is clear. Throughout the letter he builds for them a superb view of Christ: as God, not to be compared with angels* (Heb 1:1—2:4); as an exalted but compassionate high priest* (Heb 7:26-28; 2:17-18; 4:14-16) whose sacrifice* is "once for all" (Heb 10:9-18; 9:11-14), superseding the old covenant* (Heb 8:24-28), who has entered the sanctuary of heaven* where he intercedes for his people (Heb 9:24-28). Thus he powerfully encourages them to "enter" that sanctuary, since the way has been opened for them to do so by the death of Christ.* Let them hold fast their confession* (Heb 10:19-25), running the race with perseverance (see Endurance, Perseverance), looking to Jesus who has gone on before them, through suffering, to the right hand of God (Heb 12:1-2).

4. Apostasy in the General Epistles.

James* warns of the possibility of temptation. The person is not tempted by God but is "lured and enticed by his own desires" (Jas 1:13-15). This letter has in mind a "way" (hodos, Jas 5:20) of belief and behavior, from which one may be "led astray" (planasthe, Jas 1:16; i.e., by the influence of others) or "stray from" (planēthē, Jas 5:19; i.e., by one's own decision). Either way the one who is away from the true path is in jeopardy in regard to his or her personal salvation (Jas 5:20). James also uses the language of "falling"; to misuse one's words is "to fall (piptō,) under condemnation" (Jas 5:12).

1 Peter* warns the readers about the pressure that will come to them through persecution (1 Pet 4:12-19), which ultimately originates in Satan* (1 Pet 5:8). Against such, Peter encourages, "have no fear of them . . . but in your hearts reverence Christ as Lord. Always be prepared to make a defense (apologia) . . . for the hope that is in you" (1 Pet 3:13-17). The example and saving effects of Christ's sufferings are held up before the readers (1 Pet 2:22-25).

2 Peter* addresses the grim situation of apostasy expressed by immorality (2 Pet 2:2-3, 14-16), under the influence of false teachers who have "denied the master who bought them" (2 Pet 2:1, 17-22). This letter serves as a warning given to the readers "beforehand . . . lest you be carried away with the error of lawless men" (2 Pet 3:17). Like James, Peter has in mind a straight path of truth,* from which the readers are admonished not to "go astray" (planē; ekplanō, 2 Pet 2:15; 3:17). Against this, Peter encourages patient hope, a zeal for purity* and growth in the grace* and knowledge* of Jesus Christ (2 Pet 3:14-18).

Like 2 Peter, Jude* warns the readers, notwithstanding having been "once for all fully informed" (Jude 5-7), of the danger to them of "ungodly persons who pervert the grace of our God into licentiousness and deny our only master" (Jude 4, 8-16). Their erroneous teaching is called "the way (hodos) of Cain" and the error (planē) of Balaam," implying departure from "the faith once for all delivered to the saints" (Jude 3). Jude encourages the readers to build themselves up in their "most holy faith" (Jude 20) and to "keep" themselves in the love* of God (Jude 21), in the knowledge that God is "able to keep" them "unfallen" (aptaistous, Jude 24). It is noted that both 2 Peter 2:1 and Jude 4 refer to those who have "denied" Christ (arneomai).

The letters of John (see John, Letters of) see that the current presence of "antichrists" is evidence of the appearance of the antichrist* (1 Jn 4:3; 2 Jn 7-11). ("Antichrist" [Gk antichristos] means a spurious substitute for the true Messiah, Jesus.) This signals that it is the "last hour" (1 Jn 2:18). These "antichrists," who have "gone out from us," have denied that Jesus is the Christ and the Son of God, his Father (1 Jn 2:22). Thus John warns, "let no one deceive you" (planatō, 1 Jn 3:7). Once again is implied a straight path of truth from which one should not deviate. The readers are to continue to believe what they have been taught (1 Jn 2:24) and to do what is right (1 Jn 3:7). The world* listens to the deceivers because they are "of" the world. But believers have been "born of God" (1 Jn 4:4-6) and have overcome these teachers; greater is he who is in them (Christ) than he who is in the world (Satan).

5. Apostasy in Revelation.
In the Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) it is clear that the churches of Asia are subject to persecution and its accompanying pressure to apostatize that arise from a Jewish quarter in Smyrna and Philadelphia (Rev 2:9) and from the emperor* cult in Pergamum (Rev 2:13). At the same time various false teachings are touching the churches of Ephesus (Rev 2:6), Pergamum (Rev 2:14-15) and Thyatira (Rev 2:20). The language of "deception," that is, of being "led astray," is applied to the false prophetess, Jezebel (Rev 2:20). Satan, the source of all these persecutions and false teachings, is also "the deceiver of the whole world" (Rev 12:9). The metaphor, "deception" (planaō), implies a path of truth from which one might be "turned aside." Against these Satan-inspired obstacles the readers are called upon to "conquer," that is, to overcome these problems. Here the example and saving power of Christ's death are constantly appealed to (Rev 7:14; 12:11; 14:4). The church of Ephesus is said to have "fallen" (piptō, Rev 2:5); however, this does not mean apostasy but having "fallen" from its "first love" (i.e., Christ).

6. Occasions of Apostasy.
A review of this literature suggests the following occasions of apostasy: (1) moral or spiritual failure (Acts 5:1-11; 8:9-24); (2) persecution (Heb 10:32-39; 1 Pet 3:13-17; 4:12-19; 5:8; Rev 2:9, 13; 3:9); (3) false teaching (Acts 20:30; Jas 1:16; 2 Pet 2:1; Jude 4; 1 Jn 2:18-19; 2 Jn 7-11; Rev 2:6, 14-15, 20); (4) self-choice (Jas 1:13-15; 5:19).

7. Means of Resistance.
While many warnings are given of the dangers of falling away, there are also encouragements about the mercy* of God shown in these situations (e.g., Heb 4:14-16) as well as the strength and faithfulness of God to "keep" his children (see Sonship, Child, Children) from falling away from the true path of faith* (e.g., 1 Pet 1:5; 2 Peter 2:9; 1 Jn 4:4; Jude 24; Rev 3:10).

8. Apostasy in the Postapostolic Literature.
Believers in the era following that of the apostles probably suffered a greater intensity to turn aside from Christ than did their predecessors. They were known to be separate from the Jews and were vulnerable to Jewish reprisals as well as action from the state. Details of the pressure applied to Christians to apostatize is given from both Christian and non-Christian sources (Mart. Pol. 9-11; Pliny Ep. 10). Pliny reports that Christians in Bithynia had abandoned their faith as long ago as twenty years. It is understandable, therefore, that the postapostolic literature should contain many warnings not to apostatize. Appeal is made, however, on the basis of human effort; little is said about the power of God to "keep" the Christian. It is a matter of the human will rather than the power of God.

1 Clement is not addressing the matter of "apostasy" so much as disorder within the Corinthian church (see Clement of Rome; Church Order). Nonetheless there is a warning against "changing the mind" (1 Clem. 11.2) and an encouragement to persevere to the end (1 Clem. 45). But let those who are disobedient to Clement's words know that they are in "no little danger" (1 Clem. 59.1; see Obedience). 2 Clement also warns that failure to do the will of Christ will incur the eternal punishment* (2 Clem. 6.7). 2 Clement repeatedly calls for genuine repentance* (e.g., 2 Clem. 9.8).

For the most part Ignatius's* warnings are applied to heretical teachers, who are like "ravening dogs" (Ign. Eph. 7; cf. Ign. Eph. 16). Judaism* and Docetism* are among the false teachings abroad at that time. Ignatius commends the church, which resists the influence of the false teacher (e.g., Ign. Eph. 9.1). For his part Ignatius was painfully aware of the temptation he faced to deny Christ (Ign. Rom. 7).

Polycarp* warns of failure to acknowledge Jesus Christ (Pol. Phil. 7) but strongly encourages perseverance among believers (Pol. Phil. 8), appealing to the example of martyrs like Ignatius. Barnabas makes a powerful appeal: "flee from all works of lawlessness lest the works of lawlessness overcome us" (Barn. 4.1; see Barnabas, Epistle of; Law). He warns, "The day is at hand when all things shall perish with the evil one" (Barn. 21.3).

The *Shepherd of Hermas makes a number of references to the matter of apostasy. The noun apostate (apostatēs), appearing in Hermas (Herm. Sim. 8.6.2-6), indicates the reality of a pastoral problem at the time. "Apostates" are in effect deconverted, doing "the deeds of the heathen" (Herm. Sim. 8.9.3). Hermas's admonition against a servant* denying his Lord* (Herm. Sim. 9.28.4) is a probable echo from 2 Peter 2:1, Jude 4 and 1 John 2:2. To do so is to "deny" one's own life* (Herm. Vis. 2.2.7-8). The impulse for such denial is fear* of persecution and a desire to hold on to one's wealth (Herm. Vis. 3.6.5; Herm. Sim. 8.8.5; see Riches). For the "apostate" (i.e., the denier), unlike the lesser sinners (hypocrites and false teachers who may find repentance if it is speedily sought), there is no repentance but only death (Herm. Sim. 9.19.1).

See also ADVERSARIES; ANTICHRIST; ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Bauder, "Fall, Fall Away," NIDNTT 1:606-11; G. C. Berkouwer, Studies in Dogmatics: Faith and Perseverance (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973); M. Eaton, No Condemnation: A New Theology of Assurance (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997); I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God (Minneapolis: Bethany, 1975); idem, "The Problem of Apostasy in New Testament Theology" in Jesus the Savior: Studies in New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990) 306-24; H. Schlier, "ἀφίστημι κτλ," TDNT 1:512-14. P. W. Barnett

APOSTLE, APOSTLESHIP

The term apostle refers, for the most part, to the Twelve plus Paul (and Barnabas) in the literature covered by this dictionary. The Didache and 1-3 John provide some evidence of itinerants other than these who could be called apostles, some orthodox and some heterodox. The main function of apostles is to preach the gospel* and teach* the Christian community. In some places they are held up as examples of endurance under persecution.* In other places they are regarded as those who, by appointing bishops and deacons, provided for a continuation of their ministry* in the church.* In Hebrews the term apostle is applied to Christ.*

1. The Acts of the Apostles
2. Hebrews to Revelation
3. Apostolic Fathers.

1. The Acts of the Apostles.

1.1. The Twelve Apostles. The primary use of the word apostle in Acts is to denote the Twelve. In this respect Acts follows the Gospel of Luke, where apostle nearly always refers to the twelve disciples whom Jesus called (Lk 6:13, cf. 9:1, 10; 22:14, 30), but following the defection of Judas it is used of the eleven (Lk 24:9-10).

It was to the eleven that Christ gave instructions following his resurrection* (Acts 1:2). It was to their number that another person was added following Christ's ascension* to replace Judas and so reconstitute the Twelve (Acts 1:15-22). Only those who had accompanied the Eleven during the whole time the Lord Jesus was among them (from his baptism to his ascension) were eligible for selection (Acts 1:21-22). The final choice was left to the Lord, to whom prayer* was offered; then lots were cast, resulting in the selection of Matthias (Acts 1:24-26). It is to this reconstituted group of Twelve that the majority of references to apostles apply (Acts 1:26; 2:37, 42, 43; 4:33, 35, 36, 37; 5:2, 12, 18, 29, 40; 6:6; 8:1, 14, 18; 9:27; 11:1). The importance of completing again the full number of the Twelve is probably best understood in the light of Jesus' promise that the Twelve would sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel* (Lk 22:30). Rengstorf says that "the re-establishment of the apostolate of the Twelve proves that the risen Lord, like the historical Jesus, has not given up his claim to incorporate the twelve tribes of Israel into his kingdom" (Rengstorf 1962, 192).

The ministry of the Twelve consisted essentially of preaching and bearing witness to the resurrection of Christ (Acts 1:22; 4:33), teaching* (Acts 2:42) and prayer (Acts 6:2-4). Their preaching was often accompanied by signs and wonders (Acts 2:43; 5:12; see Signs). They felt a special responsibility to continue preaching in Jerusalem,* so they remained there even when many of the believers fled the city because of the persecution (Acts 8:1). They felt a responsibility also for new groups of believers that sprang up as the message of Christ was carried abroad by those who were scattered (Acts 8:4-17; 11:19-26). It was through the laying on of the apostles' hands that the Samaritan believers received the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:14-17; see Holy Spirit). In Acts 15—16 the apostles, together with the elders, form the group with whom Paul and Barnabas, being sent by the Antioch* church, discussed the need or otherwise for Gentile* believers to submit to circumcision.*

The Twelve provide an important link between the ministry of Jesus (in Luke's Gospel) and the ministry of the early church (in Acts). When Acts 1:2 speaks of the apostles whom Jesus chose (exelexato), it recalls Luke 6:13, which relates how Jesus called his disciples and chose (eklexamenos) twelve of them. The Twelve provided the foundational testimony to the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:14; 4:33; 5:29-32) and legitimized the Samaritan and Gentile missions* (Acts 8:14; 11:1-18). Having accomplished these purposes, they fade from view in Acts. It is noteworthy that no attempt was made to reconstitute the group of twelve by choosing another replacement when the apostle James was put to death by Herod (Acts 12:1-2). When the Twelve as a group fade from view, the focus of attention in Acts shifts to the parts played by Peter, James (the brother of the Lord, who was not one of the Twelve) and most of all Paul.

1.2. The Origin of the Concept of Twelve Apostles. Luke's Gospel ascribes to Jesus himself the naming of the Twelve as apostles (Lk 6:13). However, this has been regarded by some scholars as an anachronistic application of the term by Luke (so, e.g., Barrett, Campenhausen, Mosbech, Munck, Schmithals), one that he carries over into Acts. A number of alternative explanations for the emergence of the concept of twelve apostles have been suggested.

Schmithals argues that the concept of the Christian apostolate arose with Paul, who was (unconsciously) dependent on gnostic categories for his understanding of what it meant to be an apostle. What Acts says about the Twelve is legend. Following the resurrection appearance of Jesus to Peter, the core group that gathered around him came to be known as the Twelve; they were later given the designation "apostles," but they themselves had no historical connection with Jesus.

Barrett, while insisting that "the Twelve" is not an after-Easter phenomenon read back into the time of Jesus, argues that the use of the term apostle in connection with the Twelve is. Barrett points out that within the post-Easter church there were a number of overlapping applications of the word apostle. These included the Twelve, the "pillars" of the Jerusalem church, representatives appointed by the Jerusalem church, Paul, subordinate apostles appointed by Paul, and delegates appointed by the churches.

Mosbech argues that the Christian use of apostle originated in Antioch, where it was applied to missionaries sent out by congregations. Its narrower application to the Twelve (and then to Paul) arose as a result of Paul's conflict with the Judaizers (see Circumcision). Paul's opponents, wanting to deny Paul the right to call himself an apostle, claimed that only those who had accompanied Jesus during his earthly ministry, and been sent out by Jesus, could be called apostles. According to this reconstruction, it was Paul's opponents who first applied the term apostles to the Twelve.

Munck argues that originally the Twelve constituted a "college" with its seat in Jerusalem. They were not thought of as itinerant missionaries but were respected as those called by Christ. It was only later, when the battle over the legitimacy of Paul's apostolate for the Gentiles* erupted, that the designation apostle was applied to the Twelve and they too came to be regarded as apostles to the Gentiles (Mt 28:18-20). Munck says, "For what has happened is nothing less than that the Church of the Gentiles has taken over the Twelve disciples, sent out by Jesus to Israel, and made them apostles of the Gentiles like Paul" (Munck, 110).

These alternative suggestions all assume that the concept of the apostolate of the Twelve could not have originated with Jesus. However, strong arguments can be advanced in favor of the view that it can be traced back to Jesus (see DJG, Apostle). If this is the case (as Lk 6:13 and Mk 3:14 assert that it was), it is unnecessary to seek alternative explanations.

1.3. The Apostleship of Peter. The activities of Peter dominate the first twelve chapters of Acts (as the activities of Paul dominate the last sixteen). Peter takes the leading role in the church in Jerusalem in the earliest years. He takes the initiative in seeking a replacement for Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:15-26). Peter is the main spokesperson: he speaks on behalf of the Twelve on the Day of Pentecost* (Acts 2:14-40), addresses the crowd following the healing* of the lame beggar (Acts 3:11-26), replies on behalf of himself and John when called to account by the Jewish leaders (Act 4:5-22), and replies on behalf of the Twelve when they are interrogated by the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:27-32). He deals with the deception of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1-10) and the wickedness of Simon the sorcerer (Acts 8:18-24). Peter features in nearly all the healing stories of the first twelve chapters (Acts 3:1-10; 5:15; 9:32-43). He is involved in the expansion of the church into Samaria (Acts 8:14-25) and the conversion of the Gentile God-fearer Cornelius* (Acts 10:1-48). Peter also defends the inclusion of Gentiles among the people of God without circumcision in respect of both Cornelius (Acts 11:1-18) and those converted through Paul's missionary work (Acts 15:7-11).

One thing that emerges from all this is that Peter's apostolate was no more restricted solely to Jews than Paul's was to Gentiles. While Peter's main area of responsibility was to the circumcision (cf. Gal 2:7-9), he was also involved to a certain extent in the Gentile mission. This is consistent with what we find in 1 Peter (see 2.2 below) and with hints about Peter's ministry among Gentiles found in Paul's letters (cf. 1 Cor 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; Gal 2:11, 14).

1.4. The Joint Ministry of Barnabas and Paul. Paul and Barnabas were not included among the Twelve, nor were they eligible to be included, not having accompanied the Eleven from the time of Jesus' baptism to his ascension. The first hint of some special ministry for Barnabas is found in Acts 11:22, where he is sent by the Jerusalem apostles to Antioch in response to news of a great turning to the Lord among Greeks there. Barnabas and Paul were later sent as emissaries of the church in Antioch bearing gifts to the saints in Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30).

In Acts 13:1-3 the prophets* and teachers* in the church at Antioch were directed by the Holy Spirit to set apart Barnabas and Paul for the work to which he had called them. The prophets and teachers released them for this ministry (Acts 13:3), and being sent out by the Holy Spirit, Barnabas and Paul made their way to Cyprus (Acts 13:4-12). In Acts it is only after being set apart for missionary work that Barnabas and Paul are referred to as apostles (Acts 14:4, 14).

It is worth noting that the sending agent in this context is not the church, as is often assumed, but the Holy Spirit. He directs the prophets and teachers to set apart (aphorisate) Barnabas and Paul to the work to which he had called them (Acts 13:2). The prophets and teachers lay their hands on Barnabas and Paul, pray for them and then release (apelysan) them (Acts 13:3). Being sent out (ekpemphthentes) by the Holy Spirit, Barnabas and Paul then make their way to Cyprus (13:4). It was the Holy Spirit who called Barnabas and Paul, it was the Holy Spirit who directed the prophets and teachers to set them apart, and it was the Holy Spirit who sent them out. The role of the prophets and teachers was to pray for them and to release them.

The mission that Barnabas and Paul carried out was initially one of proclaiming the Word of God among Jews in the synagogues* of Cyprus (Acts 13:4-5). It was widened to include Gentiles when Barnabas and Paul were sent for by the proconsul in Paphos, who also wanted to hear the Word of God (Acts 13:6-12). However, when their message was later rejected by many of the Jews in Pisidian Antioch, they deliberately turned to the Gentiles, believing they had been commanded by God to do so (Acts 13:46-47). This decision was confirmed by God when he enabled them to perform signs* and wonders (Acts 13:8-12; 14:1-3, 8-10).

1.5. The Apostleship of Paul. In Acts 13:2 the Holy Spirit directs the prophets and teachers to set aside Barnabas and Paul for the work to which he had called them. Paul's calling predates this and may be traced back to his encounter with the risen Christ on the Damascus road (Acts 9:3-6; 22:6-11; 26:12-18). It was on this occasion, and through Ananias, that Paul was initially given details of his commission (Acts 9:10-19; 22:12-16). He was to make known what he had seen and heard to all peoples—to the Gentiles and their kings and to the people of Israel—so that they might repent and turn to God (Acts 9:15; 22:14-15, 21; 26:16-20). The comprehensive nature of this commission (involving preaching to both Gentiles and the people of Israel) is reflected in the accounts of Paul's missionary work in Acts. In town after town he preached first in the Jewish synagogue and afterward to the Gentiles. Acts indicates that it was Paul's practice to appoint elders in the churches that he founded (Acts 14:23, cf. 20:17).

Sometimes this presentation of Paul's missionary work is rejected as an invention of the writer of Acts. It is rejected because of Paul's own statements in Galatians 2:6-9 (that he was commissioned as the apostle to Gentiles and Peter as the apostle to the Jews). While this certainly represents the broad distinction between the apostolic ministries of Paul and Peter, it should not be read in such a way as to mean that Peter had no ministry to Gentiles or that Paul had none to Jews. That Paul ministered among Jews as well as Gentiles is confirmed by his own account of his persecutions at the hands of the Jews (2 Cor 11:24, 26) which were occasioned in part by his refusal to preach circumcision (Gal 5:11).

1.6. Apostles and the Spirit in Acts. Probably the most outstanding feature of apostleship as it is portrayed in Acts is the involvement of the Holy Spirit in apostolic ministry. The risen Jesus promised the apostles that they would receive power* and be his witnesses when the Holy Spirit came upon them (Acts 1:5, 8). Having been filled with the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost, they proceeded to give their witness to the resurrection (Acts 2:4; 4:8; 5:32). It was through the laying on of the apostles' hands that Samaritan believers received the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:14-17). When Paul was called and commissioned to be an apostle, he too was filled with the Holy Spirit (Acts 9:17). It was the Holy Spirit who prepared Peter to preach the gospel to the Gentile God-fearer Cornelius, and it was through Peter's ministry that Cornelius's household* received the Spirit (Acts 10:19, 44-48; 11:12-17).

Barnabas, who (along with Paul) is described as an apostle in Acts 14:4, 14, is described as a good man who was full of the Holy Spirit (Acts 11:24). It was the Holy Spirit who told the prophets and teachers at Antioch to set apart Paul and Barnabas for the missionary work to which he had called them, and who sent them out on what was to be Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 13:1-4). On Paul's second missionary journey, the Holy Spirit prevented him and his companions from undertaking work in the regions of Asia and Bithynia (Acts 16:6-7), so that they would cross over into Macedonia following Paul's vision in Troas (Acts 16:8-10). The Spirit came upon the Ephesian believers when Paul laid his hands on them (Acts 19:6). Finally, it was the compulsion of the Holy Spirit that led Paul to continue on his way to Jerusalem, despite dire warnings of what awaited him there (Acts 20:22-23).

In Acts it is the Holy Spirit who impels the apostles into ever-widening circles of ministry and who provides authentication for the Gentile mission. The promise and bestowal of the Holy Spirit by Christ constitutes an important link between the ministry of the historical Jesus and that of the apostles.

2. Hebrews to Revelation.

2.1. Hebrews. There is in Hebrews* only one reference to apostleship, and this is related to the commission given by God to Christ himself. The readers are urged to consider Jesus, the apostle and high priest* of their confession, who was faithful to the One who appointed him (Heb 3:1-6). This forms the basis for an exhortation to the readers to be faithful as Jesus was and not to repeat the faithlessness of the exodus generation (Heb 3:7—4:11). In the context of Hebrews, Jesus' role (which reflects the nature of his apostleship) includes proclaiming the Word of God and enduring suffering* and death* so that he might become both high priest on behalf of God's people and the atoning sacrifice* for their sins,* in order that through his ministry God's children might be brought to glory.*

2.2. 1 Peter. In 1 Peter* the author introduces himself as an apostle of Jesus Christ and addresses his readers as exiles of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia (1 Pet 1:1). On first reading this would appear to be in line with the view that Peter restricted himself to a ministry among Jews (in this case his ministry among Jews of the Diaspora*). We have already seen that Acts depicts Peter working among Gentiles (as well as Jews), and a close reading of 1 Peter discloses the same thing. In fact, 1 Peter itself is written to Gentiles. The preconversion period of the lives of the readers is described as a time when they did "what the Gentiles like to do, living in licentiousness, passions, drunkenness, revels, carousing, and lawless idolatry" (1 Pet 4:3-4). The readers were clearly Gentiles, and therefore Peter's address to them as "exiles of the Dispersion" is metaphorical. It refers to their status as Christian aliens and exiles in a hostile world.

2.3. 2 Peter and Jude. In 2 Peter* the author introduces himself as an apostle of Jesus Christ (2 Pet 1:1). He exhorts his readers to remember the command of the Lord and Savior spoken in advance through the holy prophets and "your" apostles (2 Pet 3:2), and warns them about those who twist the teaching of Paul's letters to their own destruction, as they do other Scriptures (2 Pet 3:15-16). In the epistle of Jude* the readers are exhorted to remember the words spoken beforehand (about the last days) by the apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ (Jude 17). In these two epistles, then, the function of the apostles that is stressed is teaching, and in particular handing on the teaching of Jesus. The mention of "your" apostles in 2 Peter 3:2 would seem to refer not to the Twelve but to those missionaries through whom the readers first heard the gospel,* presumably including the apostle Paul (cf. 2 Pet 3:15-16).

2.4. 1-3 John. In 3 John the Elder commends Gaius for providing hospitality* for itinerant preachers who were traveling about "for the sake of the name," and urges him to continue doing so (3 Jn 5-8). On the other hand he criticizes a certain Diotrephes, apparently a leading figure in the Christian community in the town where Gaius lived, because he refused to provide them with hospitality (3 Jn 9-10). In 2 John the Elder warns the "Elect Lady" concerning certain deceivers who have gone out into the world—people who deny that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh.* He urges the "Elect Lady" not to provide such itinerants with hospitality, for that would be to participate in their evil deeds (2 Jn 7-11). In 1 John the author warns his readers about certain people who had seceded from his community and were traveling about propagating false teaching concerning the person of Christ, and so leading people astray (1 Jn 2:18-19, 22-23, 26).

While the letters of 1-3 John do not use the word apostle, they do reflect the fact that toward the end of the first century itinerant preachers, some orthodox and some heretical, were moving around among the churches, at least in the area in which these letters were written. These people could not command the recognition enjoyed by either the Twelve or Paul, and congregations had to exercise discernment before providing them with hospitality and so supporting their work. (A similar situation is reflected in the Didache.) 1 John provides ethical* and doctrinal criteria by which the readers should test the claims of itinerant preachers (see John, Letters of).

2.5. Revelation. The book of Revelation* makes reference to those who claim to be apostles but are not (Rev 2:2), and to true apostles who are urged to join with saints and prophets in rejoicing over the downfall of "Babylon"* (Rev 18:2). It also speaks of the names of the twelve apostles being written on the twelve foundations of the wall of the heavenly Jerusalem,* a symbol of the church (Rev 21:9-14). From this last reference it may be inferred that the author of Revelation believed that the ministry of the twelve apostles was fundamental to the building of the church. Their preaching of the gospel laid the church's foundation.

3. Apostolic Fathers.

3.1. The Epistle of Barnabas. Possibly written between A.D. 70 and 79, the *Epistle of Barnabas, in the one place where it mentions apostles, says that when Christ "chose out his own apostles who were to preach his gospel, he chose those who were iniquitous above all sin to show that 'he came not to call the righteous but sinners' " (Barn. 5.9). From this it may be inferred that Barnabas knew of apostles chosen by Christ (i.e., the Twelve), and that their essential role was to proclaim the gospel. The reference to "his own apostles" perhaps reflects that Barnabas knew of other apostles beside the Twelve.

3.2. The Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians. Generally agreed to have been written around A.D. 95, this letter contains several references to apostles (see Clement). The apostles Peter and Paul are held up as examples of patient endurance in the midst of persecution (1 Clem. 5.2-7). The apostles are said to have been sent from Christ, as Christ himself was sent from God. They received the gospel from Christ and preached it everywhere, and from among their first converts they appointed bishops and deacons (1 Clem. 42.1-5). The apostles of Christ are attributed with foreknowledge concerning the controversy that would later surround the office of bishop (see Church Order, Government). For this reason they not only appointed bishops but also provided for the continuance of their office. Those appointed by the apostles were to appoint other approved men to succeed to their ministry (1 Clem. 44.1-2), men of repute who were to be appointed with the consent of the whole church (1 Clem. 44.3).

3.3. The Didache. As noted above, the *Didache reflects a situation similar to that in 1-3 John, a situation in which many itinerant preachers, both orthodox and heretical, were seeking to influence Christian congregations. The Didache, written in the late first or early second century, provides very practical criteria by which people may distinguish between true and false traveling apostles (and prophets):

> And concerning the Apostles and Prophets, act thus according to the ordinance of the Gospel. Let every Apostle who comes to you be received as the Lord, but let him not stay more than one day, or if need be a second as well; but if he stay three days, he is a false prophet. And when an Apostle goes forth let him accept nothing but bread till he reach his night's lodging; but if he ask for money, he is a false prophet (Did. 11.3-6).

A number of matters worthy of note emerge from this statement. First, true apostles were held in high esteem. They were to "be received as the Lord." This reflects the shaliach background to the notion of the apostle, according to which the one sent is as the one who sent him (see DJG, Apostle). Second, the readers were expected to act in accordance with the teaching of Jesus: they were to offer hospitality to the apostles who ministered to them. Third, this gospel ordinance had been abused by those who were not true apostles, so that the Didache provides guidelines for distinguishing true apostles from false apostles. Fourth, the fact that at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century the author can still speak of itinerant apostles shows that the term apostle was being used to denote a group much wider than the Twelve and Paul and his colleagues. The apostles in the Didache seem scarcely to be distinguished from traveling prophets* (an apostle who asks for money is a false prophet).

3.4. The Epistles of Ignatius. In letters written early in the second century, Ignatius* makes several references to apostles, among whom he includes Paul (Ign. Rom. 4.3). When referring to the apostles, he appears to be looking back to a past era (Ign. Magn. 13.1-2). He distinguishes himself from the apostles by disclaiming the sort of authority they bore (Ign. Rom. 4.3; Ign. Trall. 3.3). By far his most frequent references to the apostles are those that compare God and the apostles on the one hand to the bishop and the presbyters on the other. He does this to enhance the authority of bishops and presbyters in the eyes of church members (Ign. Magn. 6.1; 7.1; 13.1-2; Ign. Phld. 5.1; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1; Ign. Trall. 2.2; 3.1; 7.1). Ignatius makes a number of allusions to the function of the apostles: they gave directions that must be heeded (Ign. Rom. 4.3; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1; Ign. Magn. 13.1; Ign. Trall. 7.1); they provided an example to follow, so that to be of one mind with the apostles (Ign. Eph. 11.2) and to follow in their footsteps (Ign. Eph. 12.2) is praiseworthy; and they presided over the church, a role taken over later by the presbyters (Ign. Magn. 6.1).

3.5. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians. From this letter, written in the early part of the second century, it seems that for Polycarp* Paul was the most illustrious of the apostles. Polycarp speaks of him as "the blessed and glorious Paul" (Pol. Phil. 3.2) and describes the apostolic group as "Paul himself, and . . . the other apostles" (Pol. Phil. 9.1). The function of the apostles was to preach the gospel (Pol. Phil. 6.3). From the study of Paul's letters people can build themselves up in the faith (Pol. Phil. 3.2). The apostles also provided examples of the way in which believers should be obedient to the "word of righteousness" (Pol. Phil. 9.1), a term used to refer to teaching about enduring persecution and martyrdom.*

3.6. 2 Clement. This homily, written by an unknown author and generally known as 2 Clement, is dated to around A.D. 120-40. It contains but one relevant reference, in which the teaching of the apostles is appealed to as an authoritative guide about the nature of the church (2 Clem. 14.2).

3.7. The Shepherd of Hermas. This document, written possibly about A.D. 140-45, consists of preliminary visions seen by Hermas* and mandates and similitudes conveyed to Hermas by a glorious figure in the garb of a shepherd.* It is in the third vision and the ninth similitude that references to apostles are found.

In the third vision Hermas sees a tower, which represents the church, being built with stones squared and white, representing the apostles, bishops, teachers and deacons (Herm. Vis. 3.5.1). In the ninth similitude forty stones are identified as "apostles and teachers of the preaching of the Son of God" (Herm. Sim. 9.15.4). The apostles are described as those who preached to the twelve nations who inhabit the whole world (Herm. Sim. 9.17.1; 9.25.2). The apostles and teachers, having fallen asleep themselves, are said to have preached to them that had fallen asleep before them (Herm. Sim. 9.16.5). In this document, then, it is the preaching of the gospel that is seen as the main function of the apostles, whether that be thought of in terms of preaching to all the inhabitants of the world during their lifetime or to the dead when the apostles themselves joined their ranks.

In light of all of the above, it may be said in very general terms that within the NT literature under consideration, the emphasis falls upon the function of apostles as witnesses of the resurrection and preachers of the gospel of Jesus Christ. In one place the Twelve are portrayed as the foundations upon which the church is built and in another as the authoritative transmitters of the tradition. In the writings of the apostolic fathers the emphasis upon apostles as preachers is also found, but this is supplemented variously by emphases upon their role as examples in the matter of godly living and perseverance in face of persecution, upon ways in which true and false apostles/prophets may be distinguished, and upon the apostles' role in appointing bishops and presbyters in the church, all of which reflect the concerns of the post-apostolic church.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; APOSTOLIC FATHERS; AUTHORITY; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, The Signs of an Apostle (London: Epworth, 1970); S. Brown, "Apostleship in the New Testament as an Historical and Theological Problem," NTS 30 (1984) 474-80; H. von Campenhausen, "Der urchristliche Apostelbegriff," ST 1 (1948) 96-130; A. C. Clark, "Apostleship: Evidence from the New Testament and Early Christian Literature," VoxEv 19 (1989) 49-82; idem, "The Role of the Apostles" in The Book of Acts and Its Theology, ed. I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson (BAFCS 6; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, forthcoming); K. Giles, "Apostles Before and After Paul," Churchman 99 (1985) 241-56; J. A. Kirk, "Apostleship Since Rengstorf: Towards a Synthesis," NTS 21 (1975) 249-64; C. G. Kruse, New Testament Foundations for Ministry (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1983); M. Lohmeyer, Der Apostelbegriff im Neuen Testament: Eine Untersuchung auf dem Hintergrund der synoptischen Aussendungsreden (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1995); H. Mosbech, "Apostolos in the New Testament," ST 2 (1948) 166-200; J. Munck, "Paul, the Apostles and the Twelve," ST 3 (1950-51) 96-110; V. C. Pfitzner, " 'Pneumatic' Apostleship? Apostle and Spirit in the Acts of the Apostles" in Wort in der Zeit: Neutestamentliche Studien, FS K. H. Rengstorf, ed. W. Haubeck, M. Bachmann (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1980) 210-35; K. H. Rengstorf, "ἀπόστολος," TDNT 1:398-447; idem, "The Election of Matthias: Acts 1.15 ff." in Current Issues in New Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Otto A. Piper, ed. W. Klassen, G. F. Snyder (London: SCM, 1962) 178-92; B. Rigaux, "Die 'Zwölf' in Geschichte und Kerygma" in Das kirchliche Amt im Neuen Testament, ed. K. Kertelge (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1977) 279-304; W. Schmithals, The Office of Apostle in the Early Church (London: SPCK, 1971); C. Zettner, Amt, Gemeinde und kirchliche Einheit in der Apostelgeschichte des Lukas (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1991). C. G. Kruse

APOSTLE'S CREED. See CREEDS, CONFESSIONAL FORMS.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS

The apostolic fathers is a somewhat arbitrary group of Christian writings that follows immediately upon the NT writings, spanning approximately fifty years, beginning with Clement* of Rome (A.D. 96) up until the middle of the second century. These writings are to be distinguished from the NT Apocrypha* in two important regards: they are rooted in actual historical situations of the church and they are generally orthodox, rather than gnostic,* in doctrine.

1. The Name "Apostolic Fathers"
2. The Study of the Apostolic Fathers
3. The Literary Genre of the Apostolic Fathers
4. The Life Setting of Early Second-Century Christianity
5. The Canon in the Apostolic Fathers
6. The Theology of the Apostolic Fathers
7. The Significance of the Apostolic Fathers

1. The Name "Apostolic Fathers."

The name "apostolical fathers" has been traced back as early as 1693, to William Wake, who published in London a translation of the epistles of Barnabas,* Clement,* Ignatius* and Polycarp,* as well as the *Shepherd of Hermas and the Martyrdoms of Ignatius and Polycarp. R. M. Grant notes that the equivalent term was used by Severus of Antioch in the sixth century. In the "Preliminary Discourse" to his volume, Wake described these writings as coming from "the contemporaries of the Holy Apostles; some of them bred up under our Saviour Christ himself, and the rest instructed by those great men whom he commissioned to go forth and preach to all the world." Consequently, Wake continues "we cannot doubt but that what they deliver to us, must be, without controverse, the pure doctrine of the Gospel; what Christ and the Apostles taught, and what they had themselves received from their own mouths" (quoted from de Jonge, 505).

The name soon became the commonly used one from the late seventeenth century onwards. As can be seen from Wake's comment, the word "apostolic" was not meant to imply that these writers possessed the authority* of the apostles, but rather that their writings perpetuate apostolic doctrine. The idea that they were contemporaries of the apostles, however, or that any of them had been directly instructed by Jesus or the apostles is improbable, although Polycarp is reputed to have been a disciple of John (Irenaeus Adv. Haer. 3.3.4; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.36.1; 5.20.6).

It has always been a question as to what writings belong in the category of the apostolic fathers. The authors in Wake's volume, namely Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp and Hermas, have held a place in the group from the earliest time. Even this grouping, however, is not without its problems. Barnabas is really pseudo-Barnabas, that is, not the companion of Paul; only the first of the two letters of Clement is authentic, *2 Clement being a document from the mid-second century; and the letters of Ignatius come down to us in no less than three recensions, one of which has thirteen letters, one seven (now regarded in unabridged form as the authentic corpus) and the third three. Also included in the earliest collections is the *Martyrdom of Polycarp, in the form of a letter written to the church of Philomelium from the church of Smyrna. (The other martyrdom in Wake's collection, that of Ignatius, is late and spurious.)

By late in the eighteenth century it became customary to include the fragments of Papias (drawn from Ireneaus [Adv. Haer. v. 33-45] and Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. 3.39]), the *Epistle to Diognetus (probably rather later than the apostolic fathers, and in content more readily classifiable among the apologists), and in the twentieth century even the fragment of Quadratus (again drawn from Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. 4.3.2], and again an apologist).

The latest universally accepted addition to the corpus of apostolic fathers was the *Didache. Although this work seems to have been referred to by early Christian writers (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.4; Athanasius Ep. Fest. 39), the document itself was first published in 1883, having been discovered in 1875 (see 2.3 below). Although it cannot have come from the twelve apostles, as the proem alleges, it is nevertheless an early document and it immediately became a part of the corpus of the apostolic fathers.

2. The Study of the Apostolic Fathers.

The early use of the apostolic fathers has been examined by R. M. Grant. He shows the relatively constant popularity of Ignatius and Clement of Rome through the first thousand years, and the general neglect of the other writings.

2.1. Seventeenth-Century British Studies. While there was considerable attention given in continental Europe to the apostolic fathers during the Reformation period, in Britain the apostolic fathers were virtually unknown until the publication of Codex Alexandrinus in the 1630s by Patrick Young, the librarian of Charles I. At the end of this manuscript were the letters known as 1 and 2 Clement (the latter only partially). A decade later (1644) James Ussher published a thirteenth-century Latin translation of the seven-letter corpus of Ignatius which he had discovered in the library of Gaius College, Cambridge. This he carefully compared with earlier interpolated editions of Ignatius' letters. Ussher had also been at work on Barnabas, but his manuscript was destroyed in a fire at Oxford. These publications stirred up a new interest in the apostolic fathers, and Grant can conclude of this seventeenth-century British work that it "produced a genuine revolution in patristic studies and for the first time made possible a valid historical and theological picture of earliest Christianity outside the New Testament" (Grant 1967, 5).

2.2. Nineteenth-Century Controversy. The apostolic fathers assumed great importance in the modern period when F. C. Baur made his reconstruction of early Christianity dependent largely upon the late (i.e., mid-second century) dating of 1 Clement and the Ignatian Epistles. Since these documents display none of the conflict between Jewish (see Jewish Christianity) and Gentile Christianity that Baur posited prior to the middle of the second century, they could not be genuine, that is, from the end of the first and early in the second century. Thus Baur concluded that the Ignatian letters had been forged in Rome* and that 1 Clement was not by Clement, bishop of Rome (an invented person according to Baur), but by the Clement of Philippians 4:3 who was located in the eastern part of the empire.

Not long after Baur, however, Th. Zahn and J. B. Lightfoot demonstrated beyond question the authenticity of the seven Ignatian letters. Lightfoot's vindication of 1 Clement as coming from the Roman church of the nineties remains relatively unchallenged. This more responsible dating of the letters of Ignatius and Clement overturned Baur's hypothesis in a definitive manner.

2.3. Discovery of the Didache. Toward the end of the nineteenth century a most astonishing discovery again brought new excitement to the study of the apostolic fathers. In a Greek manuscript (Codex Constantinopolitanus), dated exactly at 1056, Philotheos Bryennios found in addition to 1 and 2 Clement, Barnabas and the interpolated Ignatian epistles, a document entitled the Didache ("Teaching") of the Twelve Apostles. Bryennios published the manuscript in 1885. Grant likens the excitement first caused by this event to that caused by the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in the twentieth century.

3. The Literary Genre of the Apostolic Fathers. It is no surprise that a corpus of writings as diverse in origin as the apostolic fathers should also reveal a variety of literary types. It is in fact possible to speak of no fewer than seven representative genres among these writings.

3.1. Epistle. The largest number of writings are true epistles (see Letters): 1 Clement, the seven epistles of Ignatius (six to churches [Ephesus; Magnesia; Tralles; Rome; Philadelphia; Smyrna], one to an individual [Polycarp]); and Polycarp to the Philippians. 1 Clement, to be sure, has somewhat the character of a treatise, because of its length and content, but it is an authentic letter from the church at Rome to the church at Corinth. Barnabas, on the other hand, while ending like an epistle, is more of a treatise. Both 1 Clement and Barnabas are anonymous documents.

3.2. Homily. The so-called Second Epistle of Clement is neither by Clement nor a letter, but in reality a homily (cf. 2 Clem. 17.3; 19.1). The final two chapters of the Epistle to Diognetus (see 3.5 below) also qualify for inclusion here since they form an independent homily.

3.3. Apocalypse. Although apocalyptic in genre, the Shepherd of Hermas is unlike other apocalypses known to us (see Apocalyptic). Its division into the three major parts, Visions, Mandates and Similitudes (Parables), points to its uniqueness. In addition to the clear apocalyptic* elements (i.e., those focusing on divine revelation of truth concerning the world to come), Hermas is presented in the framework of a captivating story filled with allegorical elements and practical applications. The Mandates become in effect like instructions of a church manual, similar to the genre of the Didache.

3.4. Church Manual. Quite distinctive among the apostolic fathers is the Didache ("Teaching") of the Twelve Apostles. This document was apparently a catechetical manual, perhaps used in connection with candidates for baptism* (Did. 7.1-4). A host of practical injunctions are given in this handbook addressed to the Gentiles (according to the proem).

3.5. Treatise. The pseudonymous Barnabas belongs here. Barnabas presents a comparison and contrast between Judaism and Christianity in which it is argued, often by means of allegorical exegesis (e.g., Barn. 9.7-9), that the latter is the fulfillment and, indeed, displacement of the former (Barn. 4.7). The length of 1 Clement together with much of its content also gives it a treatise-like character.

3.6. Apology. The so-called Epistle to Diognetus is in fact a defense of the truth of Christianity against other religions. The final two chapters, however, appear to be a separate homily. The fragment of Quadratus, if included among the apostolic fathers, is to be classified here.

3.7. Martyrdom. The account of the Martyrdom of Polycarp is the oldest example of a genre that would become popular in the church. The martyrdom of Ignatius, so prominent an expectation in Ignatius's letters, does not exist as a separate document but is recorded in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.36).

4. The Life Setting of Early Second-Century Christianity.
It is no easier to reconstruct the life setting of the documents immediately following the NT than it is for many of the NT writings themselves. Here too one must do so mainly from the individual writings themselves, and thus there is the danger of a certain circularity in argument.

Clearly the two main backgrounds of the apostolic fathers are Judaism and Hellenism (in this regard 1 Clement is a perfect example of the combination of both in one author). Because, however, of the importance of Hellenistic Judaism in the Roman world—and hence of Hellenistic-Jewish Christianity—the lines between the two are often necessarily blurred (see Hellenists).

4.1. The Jewish Milieu. At the end of the first century and into the first half of the second, the Christianity we encounter in the apostolic fathers often has a remarkably Jewish cast. This can be seen in several ways. Of very great importance is the dependence upon Jewish writings, canonical and extracanonical. The extent of the quotation from the OT and the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha is impressive (see 5 below; see Noncanonical Writings, Citations of). Beyond that are the allusions (cf. 1 Clem. 9—12; 45) and the frequent Jewish imagery of these writings (e.g., 1 Clem. 64; Ign. Trall. 7.2; Barn. 6—8). The influence of Jewish liturgy is also occasionally evident (e.g., 1 Clem. 40; and the great prayer of 1 Clem. 59.3—61.3). Furthermore, the ethical exhortation we encounter here is frequently Jewish in character (cf. the "two ways" pattern in Did. 1—6; and Barn. 18—20). The apocalyptic cast of Hermas reflects a Jewish background.

Even those documents that clearly reveal a polemic against Judaism may well reflect the background of a Jewish Christianity* (see Jewish Christianity) attempting to establish itself over against non-Christian Judaism. Thus Ignatius and Barnabas (cf. Barn. 2), generally related to a Gentile Christianity, may nevertheless point to the context of a Jewish Christianity (pace Grant).

4.2. The Hellenistic World. The Christianity of the apostolic fathers was lived in a thoroughly Hellenized Roman world. These writers all wrote in Greek, but in addition many of them reveal a significant dependence upon Greek thought. They can on occasion appeal to Hellenistic virtues and perspectives, Hellenistic philosophy, and to ethics that resemble the best in Hellenism (e.g., Stoicism). Clement of Rome uses Hellenistic motifs frequently, as for example in the comparison of the church* with the Roman army in 1 Clement 37.1-3, in the reference to the peace* and harmony of the universe in 1 Clement 20.1-4, and in his famous reference to the phoenix bird as a proof of the resurrection* from the dead in 1 Clement 25.1—26.1. He can furthermore appeal to "examples from the Gentiles" in his exhortation to the Corinthians (1 Clem. 55.1-3) and make use of numerous Stoic metaphors (e.g., peace and concord; voluntary exile). Ignatius employed Hellenistic rhetoric* in his use of medical, musical, nautical and athletic images (see Ign. Eph. 4.1-2; 7.2; 10.2 and Ign. Pol. 1.3; 2.1-3; 3.1). 2 Clement's use of the imagery of the athletic games in 2 Clement 7.1-5 reflects a similar background. Hellenistic influence upon Hermas, on the other hand, is only encountered at a relatively superficial level (see Grant 1964, 106).

4.3. Polemical Contexts. While it is relatively infrequently that we find polemic against the pagan religion of their environment (cf. Diogn. 2), it is evident that a number of the apostolic fathers had to confront an incipient gnosticism* of growing importance. When Ignatius uses gnostic-laden language, he is indirectly polemicizing against them (e.g., Ign. Trall. 5.2). When he stresses the humanity of Christ and argues against docetism's view that Christ only seemed to suffer, he probably has gnostics in view (Ign. Trall. 10; cf. 9.1; Ign. Smyrn. 2—3; 5.2). Similarly, Polycarp's antidocetic (see Docetism) polemic in Philippians 7.1 is apparently directed against the gnostics. The author of 2 Clement seems to provide an anti-gnostic interpretation of a passage from the gnostically tinged Gospel of the Egyptians (2 Clem. 12.2). Hermas too probably opposes gnostics in Similitudes 5.7.2 and 9.22, arguing against those who falsely claim knowledge.

5. The Canon in the Apostolic Fathers.

Because the apostolic fathers quote frequently from the OT and also from the NT writings, they are particularly important witnesses to the state of formation of both canons up to the middle of the second century.

5.1. Old Testament and Other Jewish Writings. Although the Jews decisively closed the canon of their scriptures toward the end of the first century at Yavneh, the Christian church did not conform its "Old" Testament to that decision until the late fourth and early fifth centuries. Before that time the church continued to use a larger collection of writings than it eventually took up into its OT canon.

Among the apostolic fathers, Barnabas and 1 Clement quote the OT far more often than the others. Barnabas has nearly a hundred quotations prefaced by introductory formulae. 1 Clement quotes the OT frequently (approximately seventy times) and at greater length than any other apostolic father or any NT writer (e.g., the whole of Is 53 is found in 1 Clem. 16; nearly the whole of Ps 51 in 1 Clem. 18). The only other apostolic father who quotes the OT substantially is 2 Clement (approximately fifteen times). The others have only a few quotations or allusions, and Hermas, the longest of the apostolic fathers by far, has no OT quotations (see Old Testament in apostolic fathers).

The presence of quotations from the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, given with introductory formulae, in the apostolic fathers points to the fact of an OT canon not yet closed. The situation is not different from that obtaining within the NT itself, where, for example, 1 Enoch is quoted in Jude 14-15 and unknown writings are probably or possibly quoted in James 4:5, Luke 11:49, John 7:38 and 1 Corinthians 2:9 (see Noncanonical Citations). Barnabas cites 1 Enoch with introductory formulae in Barnabas 4.3 and 16.5. 1 Clement alludes to Judith (1 Clem. 55.4-5), quotes from Wisdom (1 Clem. 3.4; 27.5) and from such diverse writings as (probably) Eldad and Modad (23.3-4), Apocryphal Ezekiel (1 Clem. 8.3; 29.3), Assumption of Moses (1 Clem. 17.6) and one quite unknown writing (1 Clem. 46.2). 2 Clement quotes possibly from Eldad and Modad (2 Clem. 11.2). Hermas explicitly cites Eldad and Modad (Herm. Vis. 2.3.4). Early second-century Christianity thus freely made use of a larger collection of Jewish writings than would be the case later (see Canon).

5.2. Gospels. The apostolic fathers do not cite (i.e., with introductory formulae) the NT writings with anything like the frequency of the OT and other Jewish writings just examined, but a number of clear allusions do exist. In the earliest of the apostolic fathers, it is the oral tradition underlying or parallel to the Synoptic Gospels, rather than those writings themselves, that is cited (hence by memory; see Jesus Traditions). This appears to be the case in 1 Clement 13.2 and 46.8, as probably also such instances as Ignatius Smyrnaeans 3.2 and Ignatius Polycarp 2.2; Polycarp Philippians 2.3, 7.2; Didache 9.5; 8.1; 1.2; etc.; Barnabas 4.14 (despite the introductory formula); 5.9; and Hermas Similitudes 9.20.2; 9.29.1-3; 5.6.4; Mandates 9.8; 4.1.1; 4.1.6; Visions 4.2.6. 2 Clement, on the other hand, probably reflects knowledge of the written Gospels, but the author does not cite the texts exactly (cf. 2 Clem. 2.4; 8.5; 9.11; 6.1-2; 5.2-4—all of which have introductory formulae), making the final determination of source very difficult.

5.3. Pauline Epistles. Since the contents of the Pauline epistles were not handed on by oral tradition, the allusions we encounter in the apostolic fathers must point at least indirectly to the actual documents themselves, which apparently were nevertheless often quoted from memory. The pattern and frequency of quotation is such that we may conclude that the apostolic fathers, even as early as Clement of Rome, probably made use of a collection of Paul's letters, perhaps already in codex form. Thus 1 Clement evinces a probable knowledge of the following Pauline letters: Romans, 1 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, 1 Timothy and Titus. Ignatius shows evidence of a knowledge of Romans, 1 Corinthians, Ephesians and Colossians, and probably also 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians and the Pastorals. Polycarp also alludes to most of Paul's letters. 1 Corinthians is best attested, but also well attested are Romans, 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, the Thessalonian letters and the Pastorals.

Because the remaining apostolic fathers do not quote the Pauline letters with the same frequency as Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp, some (e.g., Barnett) have argued that in the first part of the second century Paul's letters fell into a period of neglect, perhaps because of the popularity of the letters among the Gnostics. This hypothesis can hardly be substantiated from the apostolic fathers however. One may well expect less quotation of Paul in documents of the special character of the Didache, Barnabas and Hermas. Furthermore, among the remaining apostolic fathers there are allusions to Paul's letters. Thus the Didache possibly alludes to 1 Corinthians, Romans and 1 Thessalonians; Barnabas clearly alludes to Romans and Ephesians, and also possibly to 1 and 2 Corinthians, Colossians and the Pastorals. The unique character of Hermas is indicated from the start by the fact that there are no OT quotations in the whole of this long document. Nevertheless, Hermas does allude to 1 Corinthians and Ephesians, and there are possible echoes of Romans, 2 Corinthians, Philippians, Colossians and 1 Thessalonians. 2 Clement does have relatively few allusions to the Pauline letters for its size and character, yet there are clear allusions to 1 Corinthians and Ephesians and possibly also to Romans and Galatians. The Martyrdom of Polycarp alludes to 1 Corinthians and Philippians, and possibly to Romans, 2 Corinthians and 1 Thessalonians. The Epistle to Diognetus alludes clearly to 1 and 2 Corinthians and possibly Galatians, Philippians and Romans (see Pauline Legacy and School).

5.4. The Remainder of the New Testament. The apostolic fathers do not allude as frequently to the remaining writings of the NT. The Gospel of John is most clearly alluded to by Ignatius, probably by Polycarp, and only possibly by Hermas. Acts is probably alluded to in 1 Clement and Polycarp, and possibly in Ignatius and Hermas. Hebrews and 1 Peter are clearly alluded to in 1 Clement, and appear to be attested in the other apostolic fathers except the Didache. By contrast, James is alluded to only in 1 Clement, Hermas and 2 Clement. The only allusion to the Johannine letters is to 1 John in Polycarp, and there are no convincing allusions to the Apocalypse in the apostolic fathers.

5.5. The Emerging Shape of the Christian Canon. In summary, the apostolic fathers provide a unique glimpse of the state of the OT and NT canons during the fifty-year period beginning toward the end of the first century. As for the former, it is clear that the church during this period had a rather wider OT canon than it would have later when it eventually conformed its canon to the Jewish decision made at Yavneh. As for the latter, we can already see the NT canon taking shape. While it is clear that the Gospels are already around in the early second century, it seems that there was a preference to quote the words of Jesus from an ongoing oral tradition. With this comes an impressive substantiation of the importance and stability of the Gospel tradition. The majority of the Pauline letters are alluded to in these writers, suggesting that they had access to an established collection of Pauline letters, quite possibly a corpus that already included the Pastorals. The pattern of allusion to the other writings of the NT fits well with what we know of the later history of the development of the canon. That is, solid evidence exists to show the use of Acts,* Hebrews,* 1 Peter* and 1 John,* but James* is only weakly attested and there is no evidence of the use of 2 Peter,* 2 and 3 John, Jude* or Revelation* (see Canon).

5.6. The Authority of "Scripture." There remains a difference between the way the apostolic fathers use the OT and the NT. The OT is in fact quoted more formally, even though at times apparently from memory. The result is that these quotations can be useful for their contribution to our knowledge of the LXX text used by the apostolic fathers. On the other hand, the NT material is used in such an allusory manner that it cannot readily be used for text-critical purposes. It has not yet acquired the full status of "Scripture." The authority of the NT writings, however, is implied by the frequent allusion to them. Clearly, the words of Jesus are treasured as of supreme authority parallel to, and indeed exceeding, the authority of the OT Scriptures themselves (cf. the introductory formula to the quoted words of Jesus in 1 Clem. 13.2; see Jesus Traditions). The apostles share in the authority of Jesus (cf. 1 Clem. 42.1; Ign. Magn. 13.1), they are paralleled with the OT prophets (Ign. Phld. 6.3; Pol. Phil. 6.3), and the apostolic fathers can indicate their consciousness that their own authority is not on a par with that of the apostles (Ign. Rom. 4.3; Ign. Trall. 3.3; cf. Pol. Phil. 3.2). By the time we reach 2 Clement (14.2) we encounter the parallel authority of the OT writings and the apostles (ta biblia kai hoi apostoloi; cf. 2 Pet 3:2, 15-16). Thus while it may be strictly true to conclude that prior to the middle of the second century the NT writings were not regarded as "Scripture," it must also be admitted that the apostolic fathers grant them an authority that amounts to such a designation and is fully consonant with it.

6. The Theology of the Apostolic Fathers.

While the theology of the apostolic fathers builds upon that of the NT writings and is clearly continuous with the theology of the early church that preceded them, the apostolic fathers by no means simply repeat that theology. Because these writings are so different in purpose and content, it is difficult to generalize, and the best we can do is to call attention to some of the emphases of the individual writers. We can see here several examples of the apostolic fathers going somewhat beyond the positions held in the NT writings of the first century.

6.1. Christology. The apostolic fathers share with the entire church the faith that the one God who exists and who is Creator and Lord of all, has sent to the world his unique Son Jesus Christ* (see Christology). Clement of Rome describes Christ as the Son of God (1 Clem. 36.4), as superior to the angels (1 Clem. 36.2-5, alluding to Heb 1) and as the one who spoke through the OT (1 Clem. 22.1). Clement can refer to Christ as the "scepter of the majesty of God" (1 Clem. 16.2). A triadic form referring to God,* the Lord* Jesus Christ* and the Holy Spirit* is found in 1 Clement 58.2.

For Hermas, Christ was instrumental in the creation (Herm. Sim. 9.12.2; in Sim. 5.6.5 the pre-existent* Christ as Holy Spirit "created all creation") and sustains it (Herm. Sim. 9.14.5). Hermas also can write: "the gate is the Son of God, this is the only entrance to the Lord. No man can enter into him otherwise than through his Son" (Herm. Sim. 9.12.6 [cf. 4-5]). Hermas also refers to Christ as superior to the angels* (Herm. Sim. 5.6.2).

The letters of Ignatius are known for the freedom with which they can refer to Christ as God (e.g., Ign. Eph. presc.; 1.1; 15.3; 17.2; 18.2; Ign. Rom. presc.; 3.3; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; Ign. Pol. 8.3). Ignatius refers to Jesus Christ as the Son of God (Ign. Eph. 20.2), Lord (e.g., Ign. Eph. 7.2) and one "who was from eternity with the Father" (Ign. Magn. 6.1) and as God's "Word (logos) proceeding from silence" (Ign. Magn. 8.2). A trinitarian-like formula occurs in Magnesians 13.1, "in the Son and the Father and the Spirit." For Ignatius, Jesus is God become man (cf. Ign. Eph. 7.2; 19.1-3). Polycarp not only repeatedly refers to Christ as "Lord" (e.g., Pol. Phil. 1.1-2; 2.1) and as "the Son of God" (Pol. Phil. 12.1), but he also refers to Jesus Christ as "our God" (Pol. Phil. 12.2, although some MSS omit these words).

The Didache refers to Christ as "the Lord" (e.g., Did. 6.2; 8.2; 9.5; 11.8; 14.1; 16.8) and "the Holy Vine of David thy child" (i.e., pais, possibly "servant," Did. 9.2-3; 10.2-3). Also to be noted is the threefold baptismal name, "of the Son, of the Father and of the Holy Spirit" (Did. 7.1-3).

Barnabas holds to a high Christology, putting Christ at the beginning of creation (Barn. 5.5, in reference to Gen 1:26), referring to him as "the Son of God" (e.g., Barn. 5.9; 7.9; 12.10) who will be the eschatological judge (Barn. 15.5).

The high christology of 2 Clement is indicated from the very opening sentence: "We must think of Jesus Christ as of God, as of the Judge of the living and the dead" (2 Clem. 1.1). The preexistence of Christ is clear from the reference to his being "originally spirit" before he became flesh (2 Clem. 9.5). The church, however, also exists from the beginning, and the implication seems to be that God created both at the beginning (2 Clem 14.2).

6.2. Soteriology. Although it has been argued by some (e.g., Torrance) that the apostolic fathers no longer knew or valued the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith* (cf. 1 Clem. 30.3 with James 2:14-26), there is evidence to the contrary (see Righteousness). To begin with, there is a frequent emphasis on the importance of the cross* for our salvation. The death of Jesus by the will of God was on our behalf (1 Clem. 49.6; "whose blood was given for us," 1 Clem. 21.6; cf. 7.4, "poured out for our salvation"). Clement can write: "all who believe and hope on God shall have redemption* (lytrōsis) through the blood of the Lord" (1 Clem. 12.7). Hermas refers to Christ as the one who "cleansed the sins of the people" through much painful labor and toil (Herm. Sim. 5.6.2-3). Ignatius traces the Christian's life back to the death of Christ (see Death of Christ): "Our life sprang up through him and his death" (Ign. Magn. 9.1). Indeed, for Ignatius the suffering of Christ was for our salvation* (e.g., Ign. Smyrn. 2.1; 7.1; Ign. Trall. 2.1). Polycarp understands the death of Christ in the same way (e.g., "for our sins," Poly. Phil. 1.2; "for our sakes," Pol. Phil. 8.1). Barnabas also speaks of the blood of Christ as the means of the remission of sins* (Barn. 5.1; 6.11; 8.3; cf. 16.8) and of his death as "a sacrifice for our sins" (Barn. 7.3). 2 Clement refers to the sufferings* endured by Christ as "for our sake" (2 Clem. 1.2) but otherwise does not indicate an understanding of the cross.

As for the specific Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, we occasionally find in the apostolic fathers an argument against the efficacy of righteous works (e.g., 1 Clem. 32), and indeed Clement can quote Genesis 15:6 (1 Clem. 10.6) in the same sense as Paul in Romans 4:3 and Galatians 3:6. A strong Pauline-sounding statement can be found in 1 Clement 32.4: "we who by his will have been called in Jesus Christ, are not made righteous by ourselves, or by our wisdom or understanding or piety or the deeds which we have wrought in holiness of heart, but through faith, by which Almighty God has justified all men from the beginning of the world" (see Räisänen). Such an emphasis did not however weaken the strength of ethical exhortation. In that sense the apostolic fathers are more like Paul than the antinomian Paulinists.

If it is true that Hermas tends to become moralistic, that is no doubt due to his preoccupation with repentance after post-baptismal sins. But even in Hermas, faith is not without its importance (Herm. Sim. 6.1.2). Hermas is told by the Lady (the church*) that he escaped the destroying beast "because you cast your care upon God, and opened your heart to the Lord, believing that salvation can be found through nothing save through the great and glorious name*" (Herm. Vis. 4.2.4; cf. Herm. Sim. 8.3.2).

Polycarp is very clear on the matter of justification by faith: "by grace you are saved, not by works, but by the will of God through Jesus Christ" (Pol. Phil. 1.3). True to form, Polycarp follows this statement with an urgent appeal to the importance of good works (Pol. Phil. 2.1-3; cf. 4.1; 5.1).

Barnabas, in articulating the grace of God, goes so far as to say that when God chose the apostles, "he chose those who were iniquitous above all sin to show that he came not to call the righteous but sinners" (Barn. 5.9). Faith for Barnabas is the means of appropriation of eternal life* (Barn. 11.11). Barnabas can allude to Genesis 15:6, where Abraham's* faith is counted as righteousness* (Barn. 13.7). Again, however, Barnabas stresses righteousness (Barn. 4.12; 5.4; and in the two-ways section with which the book ends, Barn. 19—20). In the two-ways tradition stands a statement that makes forgiveness* of sins dependent upon the work of one's hands. It is found both in Didache 4.6 and Barnabas 19.10. It stands in conspicuous tension with other statements in Barnabas, and is probably originally a piece of Jewish paraenesis that is uncritically included as part of the larger tradition being used.

2 Clement indicates the supreme importance of "confessing Christ" before others, but then goes on to define this in terms of righteous deeds (2 Clem. 3.2-5) and can advocate what amounts to a works-based salvation (2 Clem. 6.7, 9; 13.1; 17.4). In this regard, 2 Clement has moved away from the apostolic gospel.

6.3. Church Order. The crisis at Corinth to which 1 Clement is addressed required an emphasis on order and discipline.* It is therefore no surprise to find that Clement refers to "strife for the title of bishop" (1 Clem. 44.1) and the consequent importance of proper succession in the leadership of the church. Elder and bishop seem still to be interchangeable (1 Clem. 44.5), as in the Pastorals. Subjection to the leadership remains a high priority (1 Clem. 21.6). The church, presented under a variety of metaphors, is exceptionally important in Hermas, but church order itself receives no attention.

It is in Ignatius that we get the strongest emphasis on church order in the apostolic fathers. For Ignatius what the Father, Christ and the apostles are to the universal church, the bishop, deacons and presbyters respectively are to the local church. He adds that "Without these the name of 'Church' is not given" (Ign. Trall. 3.1; Ign. Magn. 6.1). Elsewhere it is the bishop who is paralleled to Christ (Ign. Trall. 2.1-2). Ignatius is tireless in his exhortation to the churches to be in subordination to the bishop, and this is an often repeated emphasis in most of his letters (e.g., Ign. Eph. 4.1; Ign. Magn. 4.1; Ign. Trall. 7.1; Ign. Phld. presc.; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1; Ign. Pol. 6.1). The reason for this emphasis upon the bishop is not only for the preservation of authority and order in the church, but also for the maintenance of ethics and orthodoxy in the face of heretical teaching, in particular that of gnosticism. The bishop is also necessary for the proper administration of the sacraments of baptism* and Eucharist (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2; see Lord's Supper). Ignatius is also the first to speak of the "catholic church" (katholikē ekklēsia), by which is meant the universal church (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2; so too the Martyrdom of Polycarp, presc., 8.1; 16.2; 19.2). The Didache makes only a brief reference to the importance of appointing worthy bishops and deacons who are to be honored (Did. 15.1-2). Barnabas and 2 Clement make no contribution on the subject (see Church Order, Government; Early Catholicism).

6.4. View of Judaism. Although 1 Clement and Hermas present a Christianity that must be described as Jewish in much of its character, no attitude to Judaism is indicated. The Didache, Polycarp and 2 Clement also provide very little on this subject. By contrast, however, Ignatius gives us a distinct anti-Judaism. The law* of Judaism and the grace* of Christ stand in opposition to each other (Ign. Magn. 8.1). Ignatius writes: "It is improper to talk of Jesus Christ and to practice Judaism. For Christianity did not base its faith on [believe in] Judaism, but Judaism on Christianity" (Ign. Magn. 10.3). Barnabas is well known for his polemic against Judaism. Illustrative are his remarks about the end of the Jewish law and its displacement by "the new law of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is without the yoke of necessity" (Barn. 2.6; cf. 3.6). Barnabas strongly denies that the covenant* can belong both to the Jews and the Christians: "It is ours" and the Jews have lost it (Barn. 4.7; see Christianity and Judaism).

6.5. Christian Life. It can hardly be doubted that the apostolic fathers put a great stress on the importance of righteousness.* This is of course particularly true of Hermas with its persistent stress on proper conduct after repentance.* 1 Clement is emphatic on proper deeds (e.g., 1 Clem. 21). Ignatius speaks of the divine combination of faith and love,* and concludes that "all other noble things follow after them," adding that "No one who professes faith sins, nor does one hate who has obtained love" (Ign. Eph. 14.1-2). For Ignatius the indwelling Christ, "our true life" (Ign. Smyrn. 4.1), is of great importance for the living of the Christian life (Ign. Magn. 12.1). The presence of the "two ways" tradition in the Didache (1—5) and Barnabas (19—20) give these documents a particular ethical emphasis. Furthermore the very nature of the Didache as a church manual gives it a more practical character than other of the apostolic fathers. 2 Clement also is emphatic about the importance of righteousness in the believer; indeed, it is a kind of recompense for what Christ has done (2 Clem. 1.3; 9.7; 15.2).

6.6. Eschatology. Clement provides a clear argument for a future resurrection* of the body in 1 Clement 24—26. The nature of the Christian's future hope is so wonderful that only God truly knows its greatness and beauty (1 Clem. 34.3—35.3). The final judgment* of the wicked (e.g., Herm. Sim. 9.18.2) and the blessing of the righteous (e.g., Herm. Sim. 9.18.4; 4.2-3) are important motifs in Hermas. Ignatius notes that Jesus "was made manifest at the end of time" (Ign. Magn. 6.1) and he can also write: "These are the last times" (Ign. Eph. 11.1), while anticipating the future resurrection (Ign. Pol. 7.1). Polycarp anticipates the future resurrection of the dead and the reign of the righteous with Christ (Pol. Phil. 5.2; cf. 7.1). Papias is notorious for his millennialism (cf. Irenaeus Adv. Haer. 5.33.3; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39.12; see Millennium). The Didache maintains an eschatological hope* (Did. 10.5) and in the concluding chapter articulates an imminent expectation of the end of the age (Did. 16). An expectation of the imminent end of the world can also be found in Barnabas (Barn. 21.3; cf. "the final cause of stumbling is at hand" in Barn. 4.3). Indeed, Barnabas can speculate about the time of the world as being six thousand years, the day of the Lord as another thousand years, and a new beginning marked by an eighth such period (Barn. 15.4-9). 2 Clement too thinks of the day of the Lord as "already approaching" (2 Clem. 16.3) and argues for the reality of the future bodily resurrection (2 Clem. 9.1-5) and a literal final judgment (2 Clem. 17.4-7). Given their distance in time from the gospel events, the continuing—and even urgent—eschatology of the apostolic fathers is impressive (see Eschatology).

7. The Significance of the apostolic fathers. These documents are invaluable for the view they give us of the church just after the NT period. They are, to be sure, like the NT writings, occasional documents often written with quite specific purposes and they reflect partial viewpoints rather than full-orbed expressions of their faith and theology. Any assessment of their significance must take this into consideration.

Several of these writings were regarded very highly in the second-century church and beyond. A sign of the value attributed to them is the fact that Barnabas and Hermas fill in the extra pages of the fourth-century MS known as Sinaiticus, and 1 and 2 Clement fill out the fifth-century Alexandrinus. We know, furthermore, that Polycarp made use of 1 Clement and the letters of Ignatius, and that apparently 1 Clement was read in the church of Corinth (Dionysius, quoted by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23.11). Irenaeus quotes from 1 Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp and Hermas, as well as possibly 2 Clement and Barnabas. Clement of Alexandria quotes as authoritative 1 Clement, Barnabas, Didache and Hermas. Eusebius in Book Three of his Ecclesiastical History gives an account of the apostolic fathers in the fourth century. Eusebius specifically places Hermas, Barnabas and the Didache in the category of books "not genuine" and thus not qualifying for canonicity (Hist. Eccl. 3.25.4). It may fairly be said that although these writings were recognized as subordinate and inferior to what was emerging as the NT canon, they were nevertheless regarded as significant and valuable.

The apostolic fathers provide a bridge between the NT and the later fathers of the church. We see in them a diversity of viewpoint but at the same time evidence of a common and uniting faith. Without question there is theological development on some issues from the NT writings with the result that we find both continuity and at times a degree of discontinuity with the views of the NT writers. The apostolic fathers neither simply repeat the theology of the NT, nor do they depart radically from it by creating a new theology. Rather than being creators they are supreme adapters of the theology they received. These writings, in short, throw light upon the church of the late first century to the middle of the second, a church faced with a variety of difficult problems. These they address by means of the frequent quotation of OT Scripture, the sayings of Jesus and the tradition of the apostles. Using these materials and others, they consolidate the faith and practice of the church in an era of increasing challenges. In so doing they remain remarkably faithful to what they had received.

See also BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF; CANON; CLEMENT OF ROME; DIDACHE; DIOGNETUS, EPISTLE TO; HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF; IGNATIUS; MARCION; MELITO OF SARDIS; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS; POLYCARP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. N. Bakhuizen van den Brink, "Reconciliation in the Early Fathers," SP 13 (1975) 90-106; L. W. Barnard, Studies in the Apostolic Fathers and their Background (Oxford: Blackwell, 1966); idem, "Bishop Lightfoot and the Apostolic Fathers," CQR 161 (1960) 423-35; A. E. Barnett, Paul Becomes a Literary Influence (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1941); F. F. Bruce, "Eschatology in the Apostolic Fathers" in The Heritage of the Early Church, FS G. V. Florovsky, ed. D. Neiman and M. Schatkin (Rome: Pont. Institutum Studiorum Orientalium, 1973) 77-89; A Committee of the Oxford Society of Historical Theology, The New Testament in the Apostolic Fathers (Oxford: Clarendon, 1905); F. L. Cross, The Early Christian Fathers (London: Duckworth, 1960) 7-28; F. W. Danker, "Bridging St. Paul and the Apostolic Fathers: A Study in Reciprocity," CurTM 15 (1988) 84-94; H. J. de Jonge, "On the Origin of the Term 'Apostolic Fathers,' " JTS 29 (1978) 503-5; R. M. Grant, After the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); idem, The Apostolic Fathers, 1: An Introduction (New York: Thomas Nelson, 1964); idem, "The Apostolic Fathers' First Thousand Years," CH 31 (1962) 421-29; D. A. Hagner, "The Sayings of Jesus in the Apostolic Fathers and Justin Martyr" in Gospel Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1985) 233-68; idem, The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome (NovTSup 34, Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (3d ed.; London: Adam and Charles Black, 1965); J. Lawson, A Theological and Historical Introduction to the Apostolic Fathers (New York: Macmillan, 1961); J. Liébaert, Les enseignements moraux des Pères apostoliques (Gembloux: Duculot, 1970); H. Räisänen, " 'Righteousness by Works': An Early Catholic Doctrine? Thoughts on 1 Clement" in Jesus, Paul and Torah: Collected Essays (JSNTSup 43; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 203-24; W. R. Schoedel, "The Apostolic Fathers" in The New Testament and its Modern Interpeters, ed. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae (Philadelphia: Fortress; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989) 457-98; A. C. Sundberg Jr., The Old Testament of the Early Church (Cambridge: Harvard University, 1964); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1948); S. C. Walke, "The Use of Ecclesia in the Apostolic Fathers," ATR 32 (1950) 39-53.

D. A. Hagner

APOSTOLIC TRADITION. See CREEDS, CONFESSIONAL FORMS.

ARCHITECTURE, EARLY CHURCH

Both literary and nonliterary evidence points to the domestic residence as the venue for early Christian gatherings. This pattern is affirmed in Acts,* where we read that the first believers met together in private homes, and in Paul's letters we find that the new communities that the apostle* established were centered in homes. The gathering of Christian believers in private homes continued to be the norm until the early decades of the fourth century, when Constantine began erecting the first Christian basilicas. For almost three hundred years the believers met in homes, not in synagogues* or edifices constructed for the sole purpose of religious assembly.

1. The Need for and Development of House Churches

2. The House Church, 50-150
3. The Domus Ecclesiae, 150-250
4. The Aula Ecclesiae, 250-313

1. The Need for and Development of House Churches.

The assembly of Christians in house churches was not fortuitous. Four reasons suggest themselves for the choice of the house as a meeting place. First, the "upper rooms" and domestic residences were immediately available. Second, the domestic structure provided a relatively inconspicuous meeting place. Although the house setting was not a guarantee against persecution* (see Acts 8:3), in the early years when persecution was a threat, Christians used discretion in their choice of meeting place. Third, the Jews in Palestine and the Diaspora (see Diaspora Judaism) assembled in house synagogues. Since most of the early believers were Jews and God-fearers, it is not difficult to envisage the Christian communities adopting Jewish patterns, particularly since many of the activities in the house church resembled those of the house synagogue. Fourth, the "house" provided the necessities of a Christian gathering, most importantly, the facilities needed for the preparation, serving and eating of the Lord's Supper.*

The early Christian period of 50-313 can be divided roughly into three stages of development (Krautheimer). During the first stage (c. 50-150), Christians would have met in the private homes belonging to individual members, or benefactors, of the community. The appellation "house church" is most appropriately applied to this period. The house church by definition is a domestic residence that is architecturally unaltered for the purpose of Christian assembly and is used at least occasionally by the local Christian community or a part of it.

During the second stage (c. 150-250), private domestic residences were renovated for the exclusive use of the assembled Christian communities. In some instances these renovated homes had been used formerly as a meeting place for believers during the earlier period. These architectural alterations and change of function are the two characteristics of the so-called domus ecclesiae, appropriately rendered in English as "community center" or "meeting house."

During the third and final stage (c. 250-313), larger buildings and halls, both private and public, were used. These larger buildings preceded the basilical architecture of Constantine's era, and some of them may have previously functioned as domus ecclesiae. They were rectangular in shape and had none of the formal features of later basilical architecture.

Recent archaeological discoveries have allowed a reconstruction of the history of Christian architecture. The following discussion surveys the broad developments of pre-Constantinian church architecture and provides some illustrative examples.

2. The House Church, 50-150.

Acts gives us the picture of early believers regularly gathering in homes and "upper rooms" (Acts 2:46; 5:42; cf. Acts 1:13, 15-16; 20:7-8). Two possibilities present themselves: that the early community rented a room that was part of a domestic residence (cf. P.Oxy 1129, 1036, 1037, 1038, 2190 and P. Mich. Inventory 319) or that a Christian benefactor and homeowner set aside a room, or an entire level of rooms, for the early community's use. There is evidence from Second-Temple Pharisaism confirming that second-floor halls and dining rooms (triclinium) were used as a place of study and haburoth, or meetings of the "brotherhood" (e.g., m. Šabb. 1:4).

In Acts 12:12 Peter, having been delivered from prison, goes to the house of Mary mother of John Mark, where many of the believers were gathered praying.* Presumably this was a house regularly made available to the community. The incidental details suggest that this house was not part of an insulae, or "apartment" complex, but was a large house with a gateway that acted as a buffer between the street and the inner courtyard and rooms.

Luke never portrays the entire post-Pentecost* community gathered in one place. If we are to understand the number three thousand as in any sense an accurate count of these believers (Acts 2:41; cf. Acts 4:4; 5:14; 6:7), they obviously could not have gathered under one roof. Peter's own instruction to the group assembled in Mary's house suggests the reality of multiple places of meeting: they were to report his release to James and "the brethren" (Acts 12:17), who were presumably meeting elsewhere.

The problem of the early Christian community in securing a sufficient number of houses for their assemblies may find its solution in contemporary Judaism.* Most synagogues were single rooms in houses. The majority of early believers residing in Jerusalem* were Jews, and their number included individuals who had financial means. It is plausible that some of these Jewish Christians* had formerly opened their houses or parts of them to the synagogue community. It would have been natural for these patrons, having now become followers of Jesus, to use the same facilities as a gathering place for the Christian community.

Archaeologists have uncovered the remains of domestic residences in Jerusalem that allow us a glimpse of the conditions under which these early Christians may have met. Excavations in one area on the Western Hill (the Upper City) revealed a residential district that included some very large houses. The individual dwelling units were extensive, with inner courtyards characteristic of luxurious villas built in the style of the Hellenistic-Roman period (Avigad). This was where the noble families of Jerusalem lived.

The so-called Palatial Mansion is an example of an ostentatious residence that could easily have accommodated the sorts of activities described in Acts. The house covered more than six hundred square meters and included an upper level for dwelling and a lower basement for water installations (pools, baths and cisterns). The structure probably included a second level, an upper story of rooms, but the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 has made a reconstruction of this level impossible.

The numerous rooms of this spacious mansion were arranged around a courtyard. The ornate frescoes in many of the rooms testify to strong Hellenistic influences such as may be observed at Pompeii. Two prominent features are worth mentioning: first, the large reception hall measuring 6.5 meters wide and 11 meters long (71.5 square meters). Access from the courtyard was through a buffer room through which other areas were also reached. In our estimation this reception hall could have accommodated seventy-five people. Access to three other, smaller rooms was gained only by passing through this room. The ornamental frescoes (Ionic columns bearing a schematic Doric frieze) in these rooms suggest a public character. Taken together, the hall and the smaller adjoining rooms would have accommodated about one hundred people quite comfortably.

The second feature is the water installations on the lower level. In addition to a small, tastefully decorated bathroom, there were two large ritual baths, each with a double entrance. N. Avigad suggests that the emphasis on ritual cleanliness in this household borders on "a cult of immersion."

Acts speaks of a significant number of priests* responding in faith to the apostle's preaching (Acts 6:7). Although Acts does not draw a correlation between these priests and the house assemblies, we find a consistent pattern of converts who could have been significant benefactors, including the provision of homes for the community to gather. Water installations such as those in the Palatial Mansion could have functioned for Christian baptisms.*

Various places in Acts 13—28 and in the Pauline epistles refer to private domestic residences that were used as venues for Christians to gather and where the traveling apostle found hospitality* (see 1 Cor 16:19; Col 4:15; Philem 2; Rom 16:5).

In Luke's selective recounting of Paul's mission and establishment of churches throughout the Roman Empire,* we find Paul consistently converting a homeowner who is capable of benefaction, including the provision of a house for Christian assembly (e.g., Lydia, Acts 16, and Titius Justus, Acts 18). This was important, for the predominant domicile in urban areas was the insula, or apartment complex: only 3 percent of the population lived in a domus, or house. The disproportionate number of insulae is probably evidence of the relatively high cost of housing (see Rome, Roman Christianity). Owning a fine house and property was one of the leading indicators of wealth and status. Thus the conversion of a household* or householder was a strategic means of establishing the new cult in unfamiliar surroundings, and the household remained the soundest basis for the meetings of Christians.

We should reasonably assume that at Corinth, for example, Aquila and Priscilla would have opened their house to the Christian community. When they move on with Paul to Ephesus (Acts 18:18), we find them with a "church in their house" (1 Cor 16:19 and apocryphal* attestation), and when they later reestablish their residency in Rome (Acts 18:1-2), they again have a "church in their house" (Rom 16:3-5).

Since house churches did not demand architectural alterations, their archaeological remains are undetectable unless they were subsequently incorporated into a domus ecclesiae and/or an aula ecclesiae. At Corinth the excavated remains of the Roman villa in the vicinity of the Sicyonian Gate, the house in the vicinity of Temple E and the sumptuous villa at Anaploga are examples of residences in which the early community could have gathered (see Blue 1994, 152-61).

3. The Domus Ecclesiae, 150-250.

Radical change in the social position and composition of Christian communities necessitated changes in meeting places. To be sure, poorer communities continued to meet in domestic residences, but in many areas the Christians began to own property, perhaps by proxy through a member or the bishop (Krautheimer).

3.1. Capernaum, Galilee. The archaeological excavations at Capernaum suggest that the former house of Peter was later transformed into a domus ecclesiae and may well be the most ancient evidence of an original house church. Unlike the remains at Dura-Europos, the remains at Capernaum do not allow an unambiguous reconstruction of the original building and its history of structural development. This is due to the fifth-century construction of an octagonal Byzantine church on the same site and the subsequent invasion by the Persians in 614, which resulted in the end of Byzantine Christian rule and the demolition of Christian places. But with renewed interest in Galilee and detailed archaeological field reports, a satisfying reconstruction is possible.

Beneath the octagonal Byzantine church lie the remains of two earlier building campaigns. The earliest remains testify to a common insula, or joined buildings, which were domestic habitations characteristic of the small fishing community at Capernaum. Within this complex, dating to the first century A.D., is a large hall (7.0 meters by 6.5 meters = c. 45.5 square meters) that was venerated by Christians as the house of Peter. This hall was likely used by the local community of Jewish Christians while the other rooms of the insula continued to function as part of the domestic residence. This partial adaptation of a house, with the surrounding rooms continuing to throb with daily life, continued into the late Roman period when the community enlarged the primitive house church by adding to the hall an atrium on the east and dependencies on the north and by enclosing the entire small insula of the house of Peter within a sacred precinct in order to serve the needs of the community and pilgrims. Subsequently this entire complex was superseded by the octagonal church of the fifth century (for floor plans and isometric reconstructions see Blue 1994, 193-96).

3.2. Dura-Europos, Syria. The evidence from Dura-Europos, a third-century garrison town in Syria,* provides the most convincing archaeological testimony to an early Christian domus ecclesiae. It is conservatively estimated that the private house was constructed in 232/33 and renovated (in one campaign) in about 240/41. Although it is somewhat larger than most private dwellings in Dura, its outward appearance would not have suggested anything other than a private dwelling.

The remains were discovered in a relatively good state of preservation in 1931, and the Christian building was excavated from 1932 to 1933. The quality of the remains are due to the fact that Dura was destroyed in 256 by the Sassanians and was not reinhabited.

When the house was renovated by the Christians, three major changes were introduced. First, the wall dividing the diwan and the adjoining room was removed, thereby creating a large assembly hall measuring 12.9 meters by 5.15 meters (c. 66.5 square meters). At the east end of the room there was a small platform, or dais, which was likely used during the reading and teaching. A smaller room was transformed into a baptistry. This appears to be the earliest evidence for a structural adaptation in order to build a baptismal font. A canopy was also installed, and the walls were decorated with frescoes. The central courtyard was tiled and benches (.50 meters wide and .42 meters high) were built around the walls. All of these renovations suggest a developed and organized Christian community. It is difficult to determine, however, whether communal meals were eaten in this particular domus ecclesiae.

Among the reasons for the transition from the house church to the domus ecclesiae were the size of the community and diversification of activities. By 250, for example, the believers in Rome numbered approximately thirty thousand. Growth such as this necessitated the remodeling of existing structures. The need to accommodate a diversity of activities left its impact on architectural features. For example, the separation of Eucharist from the agape meal meant that dining setting and culinary facilities were no longer needed. Instead, a formal seating was implemented (including a "throne," Didascalia Apostolorum 12) with the orientation toward the dais. A distinction was made between the catechumens and full members, and particular features, such as baptismal fonts, were added. In this way the transition was made from the house church to the domus ecclesiae.

4. The Aula Ecclesiae, 250-313.

A number of remains are preserved beneath some of the churches at Rome that intimate earlier structures used by Christian communities. Many of these ancient tituli (a legal term related to the establishment of ownership, or title) of Rome became the sites of the basilicas, thereby preserving a tradition of a "sacred place" (loca sancta). Basilica S. Crisogono (Titulus Chrysogoni) is an indisputable example of an aula ecclesiae in Rome. It is located on the ancient Via Aurelia, and the basilica was constructed by incorporating a large, preexisting rectangular hall (29.50 meters by 17.25 meters). This particular hall dates to the beginning of the fourth century (c. 310).

This pre-Constantinian structure was used as a church building, but the hall was not distinguishable as such. It is a common Roman type of assembly hall found in administrative and other buildings (Krautheimer). The only recognizable indications of its use by Christians were choir screens and side rooms that could have been reserved for the catechumens.

Although the domus ecclesiae continued to be used well into the fourth century, early in that same century Christians began to use public buildings as places of assembly. This change accompanied the collapse of the periodic persecutions (e.g., Diocletian's in 303-5) and the recognition of Christianity by Constantine, culminating in the Edict of Milan in 313.

See also CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY; HOUSEHOLD, FAMILY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. N. Avigad, Discovering Jerusalem: Recent Archaeological Excavations in the Upper City (Oxford: Blackwell, 1984); B. B. Blue, "Acts and the House Church" in The Book of Acts in Its First-Century Setting, 2: Greco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (BAFCS 2; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 119-22; idem, "The Influence of Jewish Worship on Luke's Presentation of the Early Church" in The Theology of Acts, ed. I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); idem, Secure the Well-Being of the Family: Christians as Householders and Servants (FCCGRW; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, forthcoming); V. Corbo, The House of Saint Peter at Capernaum: A Preliminary Report of the First Two Campaigns of Excavations, 1968 (PSBFMi 5; Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press, 1969); H-J. Klauck, Hausgemeinde und Hauskirche im frühen Christentum (SBS 103; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1981); C. H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Dura-Europos: Final Report, 8.2: The Christian Building (New Haven, CT: Dura-Europos Publications, 1967); R. Krautheimer, Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture (3d ed.; Pelican History of Art; New York: Penguin, 1979); R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae (5 vols.; Pontificio Istituto di Archeologia Christiana; Vatican City: Pontifical Gregorian Institute, 1937-77); L. M. White, Building God's House in the Roman World: Architectural Adaptation among Pagans, Jews and Christians (The ASOR Library of Biblical and Near Eastern Archaeology; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990). B. B. Blue

ARMY, ROMAN. See ROMAN EMPIRE, CHRISTIANS AND THE.

ASCENSION

The ascension is the second stage of Jesus Christ's three-stage exaltation,* in which after his bodily resurrection* (the first stage) he visibly departed earth and entered the presence of God* in heaven* to be crowned at his right hand with glory,* honor and authority.* The third stage, his enthronement, or session at God's right hand, commences his perpetual reign and intercession for his people.

In NT usage Jesus' triumph after his death, his exaltation, refers to either the whole of a three-stage process (resurrection, ascension and session); to stages two and three (ascension and session) taken together; or to stage two, the ascension. Acts gives the most detail about the ascension. It brings out its decisive role for christology,* the coming of salvation* blessings,* the church's* mission,* and eschatology.* The book of Hebrews teaches that the ascension was essential to the completion of Christ's high-priestly work and to his continuing intercessory work. 1 Peter and Revelation pursue the theme of ascension as victory over hostile spiritual powers. In the apostolic fathers the ascension undergirds the Christian calendar and, since it culminates in Christ's universal reign, it provides a rationale for virtue.

1. Exaltation, Resurrection and Ascension
2. Acts
3. Hebrews
4. 1 Peter and Revelation
5. Apostolic Fathers

1. Exaltation, Resurrection and Ascension. The normal method of investigation has been to separate kerygmatic statements that allude to the ascension without narrating it from the few narrative accounts in Luke-Acts (Parsons, 149). The kerygmatic statements contain a variety of ways of referring to Jesus' triumph after his death. It is (a) an "exaltation" presented with no explicit reference to the resurrection or ascension (Lk 24:26; Acts 5:31; Eph 4:8-10; Phil 2:6-11; Heb 1:3, 5; 2:9; 5:5; 12:2; note Rev 3:21; 12:5, which do not mention Christ's* death; see Death of Christ). Or it is (b) a resurrection followed by an exaltation, stated in either general terms (1 Pet 1:21) or in the specific terms of its result: session at God's right hand (Rom 8:34; Eph 1:20; 2:5-6; Col 3:1). And it is (c) a resurrection followed by an ascension (1 Pet 3:18, 22; Acts 2:32-34; 1 Tim 3:16). The writer to the Hebrews will also refer to (d) the ascension alone: Hebrews 4:14; 6:20; 9:12; 9:24; and (e) the session at God's right hand alone: Hebrews 7:26; 8:1; 10:12.

This profile of kerygmatic statements, especially the interplay between exaltation and resurrection, has led many scholars to conclude that fundamental to NT thought is the fact that resurrection and exaltation refer to the same spiritual reality (Court and Kasper describe the consensus; Lohfink, Segal and Jones model it). Any presentation of the ascension as a separate event is a secondary development, often traced to Luke. A careful perusal of the vocabulary of category (b) shows, however, that this is not the case. The kerygmatic statements concerning Jesus' triumph do distinguish the resurrection from the exaltation, especially in terms of a subsequent session at God's right hand (Harris, 85). Further, category (c) contains non-Lukan material; hence G. Lohfink must qualify his assessment of it so that he may maintain his resurrection-exaltation identification (Lohfink, 95). He admits 1 Peter sets resurrection and ascension over against each other, but he says they are also in visible unity; the contrast is only a relative one because of the development of cosmic christology.

NT kerygmatic statements, then, do not see exaltation as the same event as resurrection. But they do apply the concept to the whole process of triumph: resurrection, ascension, session (hyperypsoō, "highly exalt," Phil 2:9; hypsoō, "exalt," Acts 5:31; cf. Heb 2:9) or to the ascension (hypsoō, "exalt," Acts 2:33; cf. 1 Pet 1:21). When these are combined with other kerygmatic statements that use the language of literal ascension (eiserchomai, "enter into," Heb 9:24; poreuomai, "go," 1 Pet 3:21-22; cf. Acts 1:11; anabainō, "go up," Acts 2:34; cf. Eph 4:8-10), a profile of ascension in NT kerygmatic statements emerges. This profile is congruent with the narratives of the ascension as a distinct, visible event (Acts 1:9-11).

If the resurrection is not Jesus' exaltation, many interpreters conclude then that "Jesus' resurrection and ascension seem to form one continuous movement" (Bruce, 37). When Jesus arose on that first Easter he did so in a glorified, spiritual body that immediately ascended into the presence of God. All of his postresurrection appearances were appearances from heaven, and the visible ascension forty days later was his final but not his first departure from earth and entry into God's presence. It visually dramatized "as an acted parable of the raising up of Jesus to cosmic dominion" (Harris, 84). According to this view, there were two ascensions: an invisible one on Easter, integrally united with the resurrection, and a visible one after the period of resurrection appearances (see DJG, Ascension, 49).

The evidence for this view, however, should be understood otherwise. Luke 24:26 views the triumph, the exaltation, as a whole, without demanding that the ascension be an invisible, spiritual one at the resurrection (contrast DJG, Ascension §4). Acts 2:22-36 is in a chiastic pattern. The kerygma, Scripture proof (Ps 16:8-11), Scripture interpretation, and witness* about the resurrection (Acts 2:22-24, 25-28, 29-31, 32) are then mirrored in the witness, Scripture interpretation, Scripture proof (Ps 110:1), and the kerygma about Jesus' ascension (Acts

2:33, 34-35, 36; Krodel, 83; Barrett, 149). Given the close link between Jesus' exaltation and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit* and the presence of ascension vocabulary (Acts 2:34, anebē, "ascended"; cf. Acts 1:9-11), it is better to conclude that Acts 2:33-34 refers to the visible ascension after the period of postresurrection appearances (contrast DJG, Ascension §4). Luke's use of the ascension vocabulary in chronological statements tied to the visible ascent of Acts 1:9-11 further confirms that he knows only one ascension (Acts 1:2, 11, 22; analambanō, "to take up").

K. Giles's (see DJG, Ascension, 49) scriptural evidence does not support the contention that the speeches in Acts do not allow for an intermediate state between the resurrection and exaltation. In fact the references cited do not consistently place the resurrection and exaltation side by side in such a way that their essential unity is asserted. Further, the case cannot be convincingly made from elsewhere in the NT (Harris, 83, cites passages that have been categorized otherwise above; he also appeals to Mt 28:18-20, which may or may not imply that the exaltation has already taken place).

What was the nature of the resurrection body if it were not at the resurrection raised a glorified, spiritual body, exalted immediately into God's presence? Where was Jesus located during the postresurrection period, when he was not appearing to his disciples? These questions, found in W. Milligan's classic work, where he attributes them to D. F. Strauss, continue to be a key part of the discussion (Milligan, 15, 20). Scripture does not help us to answer these questions directly. It does, however, give us evidence that Jesus as he appeared in a physical body after the resurrection was not yet glorified. His body did not display all the attributes of the glorified, spiritual body Christians are promised (Erickson, 574-75). If we allow for stages of exaltation, then, the view that there was one visible departure and ascension continues to be the most congruent with Scripture's witness.

2. Acts.

Giles (see DJG, Ascension) provides an overview of the pre-Christian ascension tradition and a balanced assessment of what may have influenced Luke (see O'Toole for a somewhat dated but still valuable history of recent interpretation; Segal provides further enrichment). Giles makes a solid case for Luke 24 and Acts 1 containing two accounts of the same visible ascension event after the period of postresurrection appearances.

Giles's discussion of the origin of the account in Acts* is that of a redaction based on tradition or Lukan inventive composition; he makes a strong case for the former. He does, however, express uncertainty about whether the timing of the ascension, "forty days," should be taken literally. Since, however, Luke's other references to the postresurrection period do not use this number, it is probably to be taken literally, not symbolically (Acts 10:40-41; 13:31). Further, the various events of the postresurrection period, together with preparation for Pentecost,* can be fit together well within the forty-day boundary (Moule).

In the current discussion of Acts, further refinements on the issue of redaction and composition have occurred. One approach of literary analysis explains the origin and importance of all details in the narrative, so that the historical questions become irrelevant, even wrongheaded. For example, C. L. Stockhausen sees the difference between the timing of ascension in Luke 24 and Acts 1 (assuming that Luke 24 presents an Easter evening ascension) as a function of renarration. Luke describes the ascension through two renarrations of the account about Elijah (2 Kings 2:1-12). She also ties Luke's distinct presentation of ascension as visible, observable event to Lukan literary concerns as he renarrates the account from 2 Kings. Such analysis, however, displaces the text's intended sense by importing meaning from the renarrated passage.

The current scientific historical approach does not find the "stuff of scientific history" in the account in Acts 1 (Johnson, 28). According to C. K. Barrett, Acts 1:9-11 may be based on tradition, but it is the tradition spawned by the theological conviction, expressed in terms of Psalm 110:1, that Jesus after his death now reigns at God's right hand in heaven (Barrett, 62). This plus the physical problem of the disappearance of Jesus' body gave rise to the belief that on a certain day Jesus went up to heaven.

This approach's historical reconstruction reveals more about the constraints of its antisupernaturalist presuppositions than it does about what occurred (cf. Court, 40). The details—Jesus' being lifted upward off the ground and a cloud enveloping him, hiding him from the witnesses' eyes—are told in a straightforward fashion from the standpoint of human observation of empirical phenomena. Luke does not describe, so much as assert, the second part of the ascension: Christ's being taken into the presence of God. No ancient cosmology is essential to Luke's narrative (Gooding, 113; Dunn, 23-25, disagrees).

Giles gives a fine exposition of the significance of the ascension for Luke's theology in matters of christology, coming of salvation blessings, church's mission, and eschatology. It does play a central role in Luke's thought. Luke indicates this by the placement of the accounts of the visible ascent at the transition between the two volumes (Lk 24:51; Acts 1:9-11), together with references to it (Acts 1:2, 22) and kerygmatic statements about it (Acts 2:33-35; 3:21) or the whole exaltation in triumph (Acts 5:31).

Luke wrote Acts in order to evangelize pagan Romans by showing them the truth of the salvation-applied portion of the gospel. "Thus it stands written . . . that repentance and the forgiveness of sins is to be proclaimed in his name among all the nations" (Lk 24:46-47; see Forgiveness; Name; Repentance). That gospel cannot be applied with saving effect until after the ascension, since only then can the exalted Jesus pour out the Spirit. The ascension, then, becomes for Luke the pivotal event (the second stage of exaltation) for God achieving his saving purposes now.

3. Hebrews.

More than any other book in the NT, Hebrews* brings out the theological significance of the ascension. At the beginning and the end of his word of exhortation the writer presents the ascension as part of Christ's triumphant exaltation, which manifests his true nature and position, at God's right hand, and the completion of his saving work (Heb 1:3; 2:9; 12:2; cf. Heb 5:5). At the heart of his argument for Christ's superiority to the Aaronic priesthood and the OT sacrificial system is the writer's claim that Jesus' ascension is an entry with his sacrifice* into the true sanctuary (see Tabernacle) in heaven (Heb 6:20; 9:12; 9:24); his session is as high priest* at God's right hand perpetually (Heb 7:26; 8:1; 10:12).

3.1. Ascension as a Part of Exaltation. Though the writer does affirm the resurrection once (Heb 13:20), his normal practice is to concentrate on the goal of Jesus' triumph: session at God's right hand. This he does by referring to it immediately after pointing to Christ's death (Heb 1:3; 2:9; 12:2; cf. Heb 5:5) or by focusing solely on it (Heb 7:26; 8:1; 10:12). Sitting at God's right hand means that the saving work is complete and that one has received a place of divine honor and authority (Hughes, 21). As the OT quotations in Hebrews indicate, Jesus' exaltation is a fulfillment of Psalm 110:1 (Heb 1:13), Psalm 2:7 (Heb 1:5; 5:5) and Psalm 8:5 (Heb 2:7; see Old Testament in Hebrews). If Psalm 110:1 and Psalm 2:7 can point to his exalted position above the angels* as son* at God's right hand, Psalm 110:4 and Psalm 2:7 point to Christ's glorification to become son and priest according to Melchizedek's* order (Heb 5:5-6; cf. Acts 2:36). Psalm 8:5 introduces Jesus as the "captain of salvation," who when crowned with glory and honor leads many sons to glory (Heb 2:9-10). L. D. Hurst's contention that Hebrews 1—2 are more about Jesus as glorified humanity than as deity incarnate, humbled and exalted, can be maintained only through a selective use of the text.

In Hebrews the theological benefits of the exaltation, which includes the ascension, focus on Jesus' nature and position, his saving work as completed and pioneering for humanity, and the paraenetic encouragement his triumph after death in sitting (kekathiken, "has sat down"; perfect tense, completed action; Heb 12:2) at the right hand will have for those who must endure suffering* for his sake (see Endurance).

3.2. Ascension as an Essential Part of Christ's Atoning Work. The writer unfolds for us in Hebrews 4, 6 and 9 a view of Christ's saving work that begins on earth and is completed in heaven. He introduces Christ as a great high priest who has "passed through (dielēlythota) the heavens" to the presence of God (Heb 4:14). This expresses strongly God's transcendence above his creation.* In Hebrews 6 we learn that the ascension is an entry "within the veil" to the most holy place (Rice's contention that the veil is at the entrance to the sanctuary and not to the holy of holies does not square with whole presentation of Hebrews). Jesus enters as a precursor on our behalf, since he has become a high priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek (Heb 6:19-20). This passage then teaches that Jesus' priestly office and the ascension are intimately tied together (Lane, 154) and brings into clearer focus that as precursor he takes our humanity to heaven (Hughes, 26).

Hebrews 9 teaches that by a once-for-all sacrifice "through his own blood" Jesus entered the holy place, having found eternal salvation (Heb 9:12). Later the writer reveals that he "entered into" heaven itself to appear before God on our behalf, which he styles as the "true" holy place (Heb 9:24; cf. Heb 9:11). The actions of the high priest on the Day of Atonement, especially in their relation to the holy precincts (Lev 16:14-19), is a pattern (Heb 8:5) that corresponds to the "reality," the "true" in heaven (Heb 9:24). Jesus fulfills the pattern and enters the reality by his sacrificial death and his ascension into God's presence. The writer's presentation of the accomplishment of salvation as a two-step process, death and ascension, does not imply that Christ's sacrificial death is incomplete. Rather, since the sacrifice is "once for all" and needs no repetition or renewal, the ascension "completes" the death in that it "consecrates the eternal validity of his redemptive ministry" (Lane, 239).

3.3. Session as Perpetual Intercession. In addition to the opening and closing references to Jesus' triumphant exaltation as "sitting" or "having sat down" at God's right hand (Heb 1:3; 12:2), references to his session are so interspersed with ascension references that they bring out clearly the completed yet continuing priestly work of Christ. Just as he passed "through the heavens" to the presence of God, who is transcendent above creation (Heb 4:14), so his position is "higher than the heavens" (Heb 7:26). And it is a posture of completion. He is a high priest who offered himself once for all and now sits (Heb 7:27; 8:1). He sits continually in a place of highest honor at God's right hand, awaiting the time of complete triumph when all enemies will be put under his feet (Heb 10:12-13). The writer brings together the representations of Jesus' sacrificial work's effectiveness as completed sacrifice and perpetual priestly labor through the concept of continual high-priestly intercession for us with the Father (Heb 7:25; Mealand, 186 n. 13). In his climactic statement of Jesus' triumph ("endured the cross, despising the shame, and has sat down" [kekathiken, "has sat down," perfect tense, as noted above]; Heb 12:2), the writer provides paraenetic encouragement to a church suffering trials by pointing them to Christ's fidelity and reward.*

4. 1 Peter and Revelation.
Written to encourage Christians undergoing persecution,* both works present the ascension in its cosmic spiritual dimensions as an event in which Christ displays his conquest of hostile spiritual forces (1 Pet 1:21; 3:18-22; Rev 3:21; 12:5).

4.1. 1 Peter.

4.1.1. Profile. 1 Peter 1:21 is an example of a category (b) kerygmatic statement (resurrection and exaltation). For some interpreters the exaltation statement "and gave him glory" is an elaboration of what Jesus' resurrection means; that is, the beginning of a new and transcendent existence (Michaels, 69), and may even be used, though not without qualification, for the claim that the fundamental NT teaching is that Jesus' resurrection is his exaltation (Lohfink, 89). Others remain unconvinced of the proposed equivalence (Achtemeier, 133). Peter (see 1 Peter), in the light of his theme of suffering and glory, is giving "enthronement in glory" center stage but sets it next to the resurrection (Richard, 132).

Christ's death, resurrection, ascension and session are clearly distinguished by Peter in 1 Peter 3:18-22. Through a series of participles (thanatōtheis, "having been put to death"; zōpoiētheis, "having been made alive"; poreutheis, "having gone"; cf. Acts 1:10-11), often seen as evidence of creedal* or hymnic* material (Sanders, 17; Shimada), Peter presents the ascension as the third essential component of Christ's saving work (cf. 1 Tim 3:16). J. R. Michaels (199) suggests that Peter may have given us a relatively early, possibly the earliest, stage of such a three-part traditional summary: death, resurrection, ascension (cf. Rom 8:34; and see the development by Paul in applying it to sanctification via the concept of the Christians' identification with Christ, Eph 2:5-6; Col 2:11-13; Rom 6:8; 8:17; 2 Tim 2:11).

The participle poreutheis ("having gone," 1 Pet 3:19; 3:22) refers to the ascension. Zōopoiētheis ("having been made alive"), which precedes it in a distinct sequence, refers to the resurrection (Dalton, 126). The phrase "into heaven" qualifies poreutheis in 1 Peter 3:22.

First Peter 3:18-22 describes Jesus' activity during his ascension not only in terms of having gone into heaven but also in terms of "having preached to spirits in prison." Some scholars are content to say that this latter activity is an aspect of Jesus' postresurrection activity and is not directly linked to the ascension (Michaels, 205). W. J. Dalton (chap. five) and P. J. Achtemeier (256), with the aid of Jewish apocalyptic* reflection, make their cases for the "preaching to spirits in prison" as proclaiming victory or confirming condemnation to fallen angels, the sons of God (Gen 6:1-6) now in bondage in one of the heavens Jesus passes through on his ascent to the Father's presence (2 Enoch 7:1-3; 18:3-6; T. Levi 3:2; 1 Enoch 12:4-6; 13:3; 14:3-6; 16:3). It is difficult to distinguish between Michaels's "domestication" purpose and a proclamation of victory or condemnation. A. T. Hanson's (102) claim that it is a preaching of salvation that fits neither the audience nor Jesus' conquering relation to them. Dalton (185-86) claims that this is an "invisible ascent" at the resurrection since no time interval is supposed But each stage of exaltation is distinguished, though there is no explicit mention of intervals between them. Nothing in Peter's presentation prevents identifying the ascension, including the declaration of victory, with the visible ascension.

4.1.2. Theological and Practical Significance. 1 Peter 1:21 declares the exaltation "gave him glory" (ascension implied) as part of a description of God, the one in whom faith* and hope* for salvation are placed. Since God already has given the same glory to Jesus that the Christians are waiting for in the end (1 Pet 1:11; 4:13; 5:1, 4, 10), they can be confident, even in the midst of persecution for Christ's name, that their hope is not misplaced.

Christ's ascension in 1 Peter 3:18-22 included the declaration of victory or confirming of condemnation to hostile spiritual powers so that the result, enthronement at God's right hand, also means that all spiritual powers are already subordinate to Christ. Such a message would encourage the Christian to remain faithful despite persecution since Christ's present victory over the forces behind such hostility also ensures the Christian's final victory (Achtemeier, 261).

4.2. Revelation. The ascension is assumed by the multiple references of the present heavenly reign of the risen Christ as the Lamb* who reveals the future, receives worship,* administers history, leads his own in salvation blessing and is the coming warrior-king and judge (Rev 1:1, 5, 12-18; 5:6, 11-13; 6:1-7, 9-17; 7:17; 14:1-5; 21:22-23; 22:1, 3; Milligan, 8). In Revelation 3:21 the ascension is implied in an exaltation-session statement. Christ has conquered and sits with his Father on his throne. This pattern is an encouragement to those who themselves will conquer in the midst of trials. As Christ conquered and received a place of honor, so he promises the same for them.

In the cosmic battle of Satan* and his forces with God and his anointed, graphically portrayed in Revelation 12, the ascension plays a decisive role. Christ's saving mission occurs in the context of Satan's opposition (Rev 12:4-5). At the incarnation the dragon* stands ready to devour the child. But the child is snatched up to God and to his throne. The triumph of Christ's saving work is dramatically portrayed as a divine rescue. To do so the writer moves directly from Christ's birth to his ascension and session on God's heavenly throne. He assumes Jesus' life and ministry,* his death and his resurrection. "The Dragon's vigilance was futile; his failure was manifested by the Ascension" (Swete, 151). And it was a bodily assumption or ascension to heaven; the incarnate Son of God took our humanity with him there.

5. Apostolic Fathers.

These writings assume the ascension when they present Christ as high priest, even heavenly high priest (Mart. Pol. 14.3), through whom prayers* are offered to God (1 Clem. 61.3; 64.3; Pol. Phil. 12.2). Clement (see Clement of Rome) has an extended comment, which relies on Hebrews 1:3-5, 7, 13 and the OT background, Psalm 104:4; 2:7-8; 110:1. In it he portrays Christ's present glory as high priest and defender and helper of our weakness (1 Clem. 36; see also Ign. Phld. 9). The apostolic fathers* also assume the ascension when they point to Christ's return (Barn. 21.3; Did. 16.7-8; 1 Clem. 23.5; cf. 2 Clem. 17.4; Ign. Pol. 3; Diogn. 7.6; Pol. Phil. 5.2-3; 6.2).

The apostolic fathers in their appropriation of the NT teaching about ascension employ modes of expression that are both faithful to the NT understanding and shaped to meet the needs of their audiences. Ignatius* and Quadratus approximate category (a) when they use chōreō and apallassō (both meaning "to depart") to describe the whole of Jesus' exaltation beginning with his death (Ign. Magn. 7.2; Quadratus cited in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.3.2). Though the vocabulary is not Johannine, the thought pattern seems to be (Jn 13:3; 14:28; 16:10, 28; Schoedel, 117). J. G. Davies sees Ignatius referring to the ascension, but Lohfink finds here evidence for his "exaltation kerygma" thesis (Davies, 69; Lohfink, 101). The verb is too general, however, and the context is too sweeping to draw a firm conclusion in either direction.

Barnabas 12.10 also sets the incarnation next to the exaltation, though this time the writer represents the latter in the form of prophecy: Psalm 110:1. Jesus' deity is proven by an appeal to the prophecy of his post-Easter exaltation (Hay, 118).

By bringing together an allusion to 1 Peter 1:21 and the imagery of Psalm 110:1, Polycarp in his letter to the Philadelphians creates an elaboration of the exaltation that slightly reconfigures category (b) (Pol. Phil. 2.1). Jesus is raised from the dead and given glory and a throne on God's right hand. Here the beginning and ending points of the exaltation (resurrection and session) are explicit, and consequently "and gave him glory" could well be a reference to the ascension (Davies, 69; contrast Lohfink, 104, who views it as evidence for his "exaltation kerygma"). Polycarp* uses this description of Jesus as a rationale for virtue,* for he ties it directly to Christ's present reign and his second coming as judge.

The clearest reference to the ascension in the apostolic fathers is Barnabas 15.9, an example of category (c). In making a case for worship on the Lord's day,* termed the "eighth day," the writer argues that on it "Jesus also rose from the dead and was made manifest (phanerōtheis) and ascended into heaven" (anebē eis ouranous). Because of the difference in vocabulary, M. C. Parsons (147) says Barnabas (see Barnabas, Epistle of) does not depend on Luke-Acts but rather provides an independent witness to an early church tradition about a distinct, visible ascension. At the least it is evidence of an ascension tradition on which both the authors of Acts and Barnabas may have relied (Lohfink, 125, must concede as much).

Lohfink contends that if the ascension were a distinct event in the early church's thinking (i.e., thinking uninfluenced by Luke-Acts), there are several places in the apostolic fathers where its absence is surprising (Lohfink, 99-102). 1 Clement 42.3, in describing the church's firm apostolic foundation, speaks of the apostles' assurance* by Jesus' resurrection, their faith confirmed by the word of God and their going forth preaching in the assurance of the Holy Spirit. But there is no mention of ascension. This may be because the assurance the apostles* received on earth to do their task does not require reference to the ascension.

Ignatius, in combatting Docetism,* points out Jesus' "true death" and "true resurrection," but he does not mention the ascension (Ign. Trall. 9). Since he is countering a heresy that professed an ascension of the "Christ" to heaven from the cross* before death, reference to the ascension might have been confusing. Further, the reality of the death and resurrection as events fundamental to salvation is what Ignatius is trying to establish. The ascension is implied in the promise* that at the last day God will raise up "in Christ" those who believe in him. Ignatius in his letter to the Smyrneans describes Christ's resurrection in the flesh* by alluding to details of the resurrection appearances also found in Luke 24 (Ign. Smyrn. 3.3). Again there is no reference to the ascension, and again it is unnecessary to Ignatius's argument. Further, the phrase "united with the Father" does not support Lohfink's exaltation kerygma understanding of the resurrection. This phrase is a favorite Ignatian theological theme that he uses for various purposes (Schoedel, 227; note Schoedel, 88-92, corrects H. Schlier's claim that Ign. Eph. 19.2-3 and Ign. Magn. 9.2 speak of the ascension).

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; CHRISTOLOGY; EXALTATION, ENTHRONEMENT; GLORY; HOLY SPIRIT; PAROUSIA; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. J. Achtemeier, 1 Peter (Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); C. K. Barrett, Acts 1-14 (ICC; rev. ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); J. M. Court, "Risen, Ascended, Glorified," King's Theological Review 6 (autumn 1983) 39-42; W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of First Peter 3:18—4:6 (AnBib 23; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1965); J. G. Davies, He Ascended into Heaven: A Study in the History of Doctrine (London: Lutterworth, 1958); J. D. G. Dunn, "Demythologizing the Ascension—A Reply to Professor Gooding," IBS 3 (1981) 15-27; M. J. Erickson, The Word Became Flesh (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1991); D. W. Gooding, "Demythologizing Old and New, and Luke's Description of the Ascension: A Layman's Appraisal," IBS 2 (1980) 95-119; A. T. Hanson, "Salvation Proclaimed I. 1 Peter 3:18-22," ExpT 93 (1981) 100-105; M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal: Resurrection and Immortality in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); D. M. Hay, Glory at the Right Hand: Psalm 110 in Early Christianity (SBLMS 18; Nashville: Abingdon, 1973); P. E. Hughes, "The Christology of Hebrews," SWJT 28 (1985) 19-27; L. D. Hurst, "The Christology of Hebrews 1 and 2" in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament, ed. N. T. Wright and L. D. Hurst (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987) 151-64; L. T. Johnson, The Acts of the Apostles (SacP; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1992); E. Jones, "The Origins of 'Ascension' Terminology," Churchman 104 (1990) 156-61; W. Kasper, "Christi Himmelfahrt—Geschichte und Theologische Bedeutung," Internationale Katholische Zeitschrift—"Communio" 12 (1983) 205-13; G. A. Krodel, Acts (ACNT; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1986); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1991); G. Lohfink, Die Himmelfahrt Jesu (Munich: Kösel, 1971); D. L. Mealand, "The Christology of the Epistle to the Hebrews," Modern Churchman n.s. 22 (1979) 180-87; J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); W. Milligan, The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of Our Lord (London: Macmillan, 1908); C. F. D. Moule, "Expository Problems: The Ascension—Acts 1:9," ExpT 68 (1957) 205-9; R. F. O'Toole, "Luke's Understanding of Jesus' Resurrection-Ascension-Exaltation," BTB 9 (1979) 106-14; M. C. Parsons, The Departure of Jesus in Luke-Acts (JSOTSup 21; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1987); G. E. Rice, "Hebrews 6:19: Analysis of Some Assumptions concerning KATAPETASMA," AUSS 25 (1987) 65-71; E. Richard, "The Functional Christology of First Peter" in Perspectives on First Peter, ed. C. H. Talbert (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1986) 121-39; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns (SNTSMS 15; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1971); W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); A. F. Segal, "Heavenly Ascent in Hellenistic Judaism, Early Christianity and their Environment," ANRW 2.23.2 (1980) 1334-94; K. Shimada, "The Christological Creedal Formula in 1 Peter 3:18-22—Reconsidered," AJBI 5 (1979) 154-76; C. L. Stockhausen, "Luke's Stories of the Ascension: The Background and Function of a Dual Narrative" in Proceedings of the Eastern Great Lakes and Midwest Biblical Societies, ed. T. Callan (vol. 10; Cincinnati: EGLMBS, 1990) 251-63; H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of Saint John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1951 [1909]). W. J. Larkin Jr.

ASCENSION OF ISAIAH. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

ASSURANCE

Assurance is a concept that is not encompassed by a single word in the Greek NT. It falls within the same semantic domain as faith,* hope,* peace,* confidence, boldness, firmness, certainty, knowledge* and courage (cf. Louw and Nida). So instead of offering a word study, this article defines the concept and then discusses it in the various contexts in which it occurs in the General Writings, Revelation and the apostolic fathers.

1. Definition
2. Spheres of Assurance
3. Assurance in the Apostolic Fathers

1. Definition.

In the broadest sense assurance is confidence. It is the opposite of doubt. But rather than thinking of the two ideas as polar opposites, it is best to think of assurance and doubt as opposite ends of a continuum. One can be more or less confident of particular truths or realities.

Christian assurance is confidence in what God* has said regarding the past, present or future or regarding his own character. The concept of assurance is especially prominent in discussions of things that cannot be seen. Hence assurance means holding as true and firm the declarations and actions of God.

2. Spheres of Assurance.

2.1. Prayer. James 1:5-8 encourages the one who needs wisdom* for the trials of life to ask for it. The one who asks can have assurance that God will answer because of the character of God, who is generous and kind (cf. Jas 1:17). Asking without assurance or faith is described as doubting and being double-minded in James 1:6-8. The context does not advocate never praying* without absolute assurance. In that case few would ever venture to pray. Rather, doubting or double-mindedness refers to when one receives the answer of what to do in the trial but then hesitates to do it. As the chapter moves on, it is the Word of God that supplies wisdom for life (Jas 1:20-25), and the person who looks into that Word is warned not to go away unchanged (Jas 1:24). So assurance in prayer is not so much a confidence that God will answer, but rather enough confidence in the Word that God has revealed to put it into practice. The mark of assurance is obedience.*

1 John 3:21-22 and 5:14-15 also speak of assurance in prayer. The former passage ties assurance in prayer closely to obedience to the love* command (1 Jn 3:11-18), which is a sign of an intimate relationship with God (1 Jn 3:21, "the boldness [assurance] we have before him"). This latter phrase is repeated in 1 John 5:14-15, which also leads to assurance of answered prayer: "Whatever we ask according to his will he hears, and we know that if he hears, we have the requests made of him." So assurance in prayer is based on intimacy with God demonstrated by obedience to his commands (see Prayer).

Assurance in prayer is not a major theme in the apostolic fathers, probably because it is assumed. 1 Clement 2.3 describes the Corinthians as praying with godly confidence for mercy toward unwilling sin.*

2.2. Faith. "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen" (Heb 11:1). Every translation of Hebrews 11:1, including this one, is ambiguous in defining faith. The problem arises because the Greek words behind assurance (hypostasis) and conviction (elenchos) are multivalent. Many scholars have attempted word studies of these many-faceted words, with varying results. A different approach to the problem seems to be called for.

Perhaps the best way to understand the meaning of the assurance of faith in Hebrews 11:1 is to examine what the author himself wrote in defining faith in the rest of the chapter (cf. Goppelt, 2:263-65). Faith is defined by OT examples more than by didactic propositions because stories often make a greater impact than logical propositions. Faith goes forward without knowing where the journey will end (Heb 11:8-16); faith trusts in God's promise of the future, including eternity (Heb 11:17-22); faith involves a changed set of values (Heb 11:23-31). So faith is a confidence (assurance) and conviction by which people act without seeing immediate results. An assured faith does not involve cognitive or demonstrable certainty. Rather, it causes Christians to act in ways that are inexplicable to those without faith.

2.3. Salvation. Assurance of salvation* is a dominant theme in Hebrews, James, 1 John and Revelation, and is assumed in 1 Peter. Hebrews and James are written to bolster assurance by causing readers to examine their faith. In Hebrews salvation is pictured as a journey. This is in keeping with the idea that from a human point of view conversion is a process (Carson, 18-20). This "word of exhortation" (Heb 13:22) is addressed to Christians who, because of discouragement, are tempted to leave off their journey in faith and regress to what they were before beginning the Christian pilgrimage. Hebrews leads them to assurance by telling them not to neglect their salvation lest they imperil it (Heb 2:1-4). The loss of salvation is more a stopping of the journey or a losing of one's way than a losing of something that had already been gained. Assurance of final salvation is based on continuing the journey of faith which Jesus has already taken (in spite of its difficulty; Heb 12:1-3), and on the character of God (Heb 6:13-20) and the reliability of his Word (Heb 2:2; 3:6 v.l.; 6:19; 9:17; 13:9).

James attempts to give assurance by telling Christians to examine their faith to make sure it works. "Faith if it has no works is dead by itself" (Jas 2:17). James defines works as acts of kindness to the needy and just dealings. In the final judgment* the rotting wealth of the rich will stand as a testimony against them. They have no assurance that they will be saved, if their wealth is not being used for good deeds (Jas 5:1-6). So assurance of salvation comes as Christians see their faith produce works of kindness and love: "I will show you my faith by works" (Jas 2:18).

Hebrews and James function to the same end (assurance) but in different ways. They both call Christians to examine their faith. Hebrews calls them to examine the perseverance of their faith; James calls them to examine the genuineness of their faith.

1 John and Revelation are written to encourage those who lack assurance. 1 John seems to address people who were left wondering about their status in the larger church after an exodus of members from their Christian community (1 Jn 2:19). This tract tells Christians that their doctrine and their practice assure them that their faith is genuine (Carson, 27). They can have assurance of eternal life (1 Jn 4:17; 5:13; see Eternity) because of their rightful confession of Jesus (1 Jn 4:2-3, 6, 13-16) and because they keep the command to love their Christian brothers and sisters (1 Jn 3:22-23; 4:7-8, 20-21). Although they may sin, God is faithful to forgive* their sin and cleanse them from all unrighteousness (1 Jn 1:9).

Revelation assures Christian witnesses living in an anti-Christian world that they are on the victorious side of the battle even though now the world is dominated by evil. Although the book is filled with visions of apocalyptic* battles between good and evil, it never gives the impression that God has lost control; in fact, evil is a tool in God's hand. The breaking of the seven seals unleashes devastation on the earth; nevertheless, the Lamb is in control. He is the one who breaks the seals (Rev 6); and the scroll itself is God's last will and testament for the creation. So the martyrs* who have suffered* and will suffer under the various empires of the present world (including those who are presently suffering under the persecutions* of Domitian) are told to wait with patience for the final victory of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) over the kingdoms of the world (Rev 6:10-11). Final salvation is guaranteed for the people of God, because God is sovereign (Rev 21:7).

Assurance of salvation is a growing confidence that God will deliver the believer from final judgment and bless him or her with eternal life. Assurance grows through constant exposure to the promises and program of God revealed in the Scriptures and through the application of God's Word to life.

3. Assurance in the Apostolic Fathers.

The apostolic fathers follow the NT in its views of Christian assurance. 1 Clement speaks of confidence in prayer and service (1 Clem. 2.3; 26.1; 34.5). This confident faith is a gift of God to those who strive "to be found among the number of those who wait" (1 Clem. 35.1-4). In the fathers, to be found among that number, one must submit to the steps leading to baptism.* This often involved an extensive training program of two to three years (Hall, 16-17). This training was mainly in morality and ritual, as evidenced in the early part of the Didache. It probably also included instruction in the Bible, although evidence for this is somewhat later (e.g., Origen's homilies). After baptism a believer was allowed to remain with the faithful for the Eucharistic service (Did. 9.5; Justin Martyr Apol. I. 65). In this way a believer was assured of salvation.

But what about a person who sinned after baptism? This issue is taken up in the Shepherd of Hermas, Mandate 4.3.1-7 (cf. 1.8; Hippolytus Haer. 9.12.20-26). Hermas is told that there is no repentance after baptism (Herm. Man. 4.3.2). The passage is rather confusing after this, but at its end Hermas is given assurance of his salvation, as are all who practice these things (Herm. Man. 4.3.7). The Shepherd gives his instruction in such a way as not to give an excuse (aphormē) to present or future believers (Herm. Man. 4.3.3, 6). At the same time he points out the weakness of humanity and the wiles of the devil as causes for sin (Herm. Man. 4.3.4). For his main answer to the question, the Shepherd seems to rely on the foreknowledge and mercy of God in the granting of repentance,* the Shepherd himself being given the authority* over this repentance (Herm. Man. 4.3.5). It seems, then, that the Shepherd does not say it is impossible for a person to be saved if they sin after baptism, but that they will be saved only with difficulty (dyskolōs; cf. Herm. Sim. 9.23.3; Herm. Man. 9.6), akin to 1 Peter 4:18 and Jude 22-23.

See also APOSTASY; BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES; ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; FAITH, FAITHFULNESS; FAITH AND WORKS; FORGIVENESS; JUDGMENT; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Braumann and G. Harder, "Form, Substance," NIDNTT 1:703-14; D. A. Carson, "Reflections on Christian Assurance," WTJ 54 (1992) 1-29; L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981-82); S. G. Hall, Doctrine and Practice in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida, ed., "25 N, Courage, Boldness," "31 I, Trust, Rely," Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament Based on Semantic Domains (2d ed.; New York: United Bible Societies, 1989); H. Schönweiss et al., "Firm, Foundation, Certainty, Confirm," NIDNTT 1:658-64.

D. H. Johnson

ASTROLOGY. See MAGIC AND ASTROLOGY.

ATONEMENT. See DEATH OF CHRIST.

AUTHORITY

Christian writers in the late first century and early second century expressed divergent views on authority in the church.* While a discernible trend toward hierarchical structure can be found in some of their works, other authors clearly reacted against such a trend. The NT documents covered in this article are arranged in a rough succession from those advocating institutionalized forms of authority to those protesting hierarchical organization. A brief survey of selected writings of the apostolic fathers* traces trajectories from the NT into the second century.

1. Pastorals
2. Acts
3. James
4. 1 Peter
5. Hebrews
6. Revelation
7. Letters of John
8. Apostolic Fathers

1. Pastorals.

The Pastorals present the most highly developed structure of authority in the NT. We can almost draw a chart of the ecclesiastical organization. At the top of the pyramid is the apostle* Paul. Repeatedly the letters point to the divine appointment of Paul to his apostolic office (1 Tim 1:11-16; 2:7; 2 Tim 1:11; 4:17; Tit 1:3). Church order* is maintained by those who faithfully guard Paul's apostolic teaching* (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 1:13-14; 2:1-2; Tit 1:9). Apostolic authority is limited to Paul alone; there is no mention of other apostles or of any successors to the apostle. Authority is tied not to succession but to transmission of Pauline doctrine.

Timothy and Titus exercised authority as Paul's emissaries. Their responsibilities were the faithful transmission of the tradition of Paul's teaching (1 Tim 4:6, 16; 2 Tim 2:15; Tit 2:7) and the careful installation of church officers (1 Tim 3:1-15; 5:17-22; 2 Tim 2:1-2; Tit 1:5). They were constantly reminded that their use of authority had to be accompanied and authenticated by their blameless conduct (1 Tim 4:12; Tit 2:7-8). Timothy was ordained to his authoritative role by receiving a gift (charisma) through the laying on of hands by the elders (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6). The exercise of charismatic authority depended on rekindling the gift of God* (to charisma tou theou) within. In the Pastoral Epistles we do not find the teaching that spiritual gifts (charismata) for ministry* are distributed universally by the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) to all in the church, as we do in 1 Corinthians 12, but only the narrower concept that a single gift is given in the course of ordination to a special office.

The only reference to elders (presbyteros) in the Pauline corpus is found in the Pastorals. In some cases the word denotes old men (1 Tim 5:1; Tit 2:2), but a more technical use refers to appointed leaders in the church (1 Tim 5:17; Tit 1:5). Elders have the authority to rule and teach and deserve to be compensated when they exercise their authority well. Accusations against them are not to be accepted unless there is substantial evidence (1 Tim 5:19).

The list of qualifications for a bishop (or overseer [episkopos], 1 Tim 3:1-7; Tit 1:7-9) and deacons (1 Tim 3:8-13) indicates the high regard given to these offices in the church. Aspiration to the office of bishop is encouraged (1 Tim 3:1). The use of the singular form of "bishop" in the Pastorals leads some scholars to suggest that there was monarchical episcopate in view, but the singular "bishop" is probably a generic reference to overseers and serves as a designation for a leadership role carried out by one or a few of the elders within the local church, "elders who rule well" (1 Tim 5:17). The sequence of 1 Timothy 3 is usually taken as a signal that deacons were subordinate to bishops and elders, but the exact relation of these various offices is not described. The reference to women* in 1 Timothy 3:11 appears to indicate that women were involved in the work of deacons, but their official status is not clearly defined. Their inclusion in the leadership group of the church means that the perplexing prohibition in 1 Timothy 2:12 ("I permit no woman to teach or to have authority over a man") should be taken as a safeguard against abuse of authority rather than an exclusion from any leadership function.

The emphasis in the Pastoral Letters on church offices, hierarchical organization and the restriction of a divine charisma to the ordained leader seems to be in contrast to the other letters in the Pauline corpus and leads some scholars to deny the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals. Others defend Pauline authorship of the Pastorals on the basis of their unique historical circumstances: they were written to individuals (not to churches) who were instructed by Paul to establish church order in a time of crisis caused by influential false teachers.

2. Acts.

Acts* is viewed by some interpreters as an expression of early catholicism.* According to this perspective, Luke wrote the history of the first-generation church to legitimize the fixed forms and hierarchical structures of the second- or third-generation church. He replaced the authority of the direct guidance of the Spirit with the authority of a well-defined organization. This interpretation claims to find a three-level structure of ministry: the twelve apostles (Acts 1:15-26; 2:42; 4:33-37; 6:2, 6; 8:1, 14; 15:22), elders (Acts 11:30; 15:2, 4, 6, 22) and deacons (Acts 6:1-6). Though the names of the offices were later changed to bishops (the successors to apostles), priests* (who carry on the role of the elders) and deacons, this hierarchical structure was supposedly the same as that of the second-century church.

Examination of the text does not support this view that Acts presents the structures of early catholicism. Luke's view of the church as the restored Israel* is indicated by the election of Matthias to close the gap in the circle of the Twelve. But the authority of the twelve apostles over the restored Israel was primarily a prophetic authority (see Old Testament in Acts; Prophecy) fulfilled by their Spirit-empowered proclamation of the resurrection* (Acts 1:2-3, 22; 2:14, 36, 42; 4:33). Financial resources were brought to the apostles for distribution (Acts 4:35, 37), but they asserted that their ministry did not involve administrative functions, since they were devoted to "prayer and the ministry of the word" (Acts 6:2, 4; see Prayer). They did not exercise an ongoing role of leadership in the administration of the church. Once they fulfilled their role as eyewitnesses to the resurrection, for the most part they disappeared from the scene (The exceptions are Peter and occasionally John and James.) After the council in Jerusalem* the apostles are never mentioned again. Acts emphasizes Peter's role as the star witness* to the risen and exalted Lord.* But even Peter's authority was not absolute. When he returned to Jerusalem after his mission to Cornelius,* the believers criticized him (Acts 11:8). Only the irrefutable evidence of the Holy Spirit's sanction of Peter's mission silenced their objections (Acts 11:18).

There is no evidence in Acts for the theory of succession from the apostles. Indeed, their unique function described by Luke as eyewitnesses to the risen Lord could not be repeated. Although the Twelve were involved in the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6:1-6), the Seven already exercised charismatic authority by the evident presence of the Spirit before their election (Acts 6:3). Luke gives no explanation of any ongoing relation between the Twelve and the Seven. The latter have often been regarded as deacons because they were called to table service,* but the text never refers to them as deacons. Though they were appointed to an administrative task, they functioned as prophets and evangelists.* In any case they cannot have provided a line of successors from the apostles, since Stephen* was quickly martyred,* five immediately and completely disappeared, and Philip's* only successors were four virgin daughters (Acts 21:8-9).

Luke gives no clues about the origin of the elders in Jerusalem. There is no mention of their appointment by the apostles and no clarification of their relation to the apostles. The elders of the Jerusalem church received gifts (Acts 11:30), participated in the council (Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4) and ruled over the Jerusalem church with James (Acts 21:18). Many scholars regard James* as the one who instituted the pattern of synagogue* government by ruling the church with a board of elders.

James was the key leader at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:13-21), but his decision is portrayed by Luke as a reflection of the Spirit-led consensus of the entire council (Acts 15:22-28). James also appears to be the leader and spokesperson for the elders at the time of Paul's return to Jerusalem (Acts 21:18), but the directions given to Paul to observe the Mosaic sacrificial law* came from the united leadership group (Acts 21:23: "do what we tell you"). Authority was more collegiate than hierarchical.

It is clear that the Twelve had no part in the appointment of Paul; if it had not been for Barnabas's intervention, they would not even have accepted him as a genuine Christian (Acts 9:26-28). Paul was brought into a teaching role in the church of Antioch* by Barnabas. Apparently "prophets and teachers" were the leaders of that church (Acts 13:1-3). Directed by the Holy Spirit, they laid hands on Barnabas and Paul to commission them for an evangelistic mission. Luke grants the title apostle to them (Acts 14:4, 14), since their prophetic mission bears witness to the resurrection. But in their case the title has the secondary meaning of "missionary." Even though Luke establishes the authority of Paul's prophetic mission in a roughly parallel way to Peter's, he does not present Paul as link in a chain of apostolic succession.

Acts 14:23 reports that Paul and Barnabas appointed elders in the churches they had started. In his address to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:17-35), Paul instructs them in their responsibility as overseers (episkopoi) to shepherd* the church of God (Acts 20:28). So the terms "bishops" (episkopoi), "elders" and "pastors" all seem to apply to the same group of leaders. There is no differentiation or hierarchy implied in the use of these alternative terms. There is no indication that Paul appointed the Ephesian elders, and no instruction is given about appointing others to succeed them.

What is most pervasive in Luke's account of the exercise of authority in the early church is his conviction that the leaders of the church were directed by the risen Lord and guided by the Holy Spirit. The Spirit empowered Peter to speak to the rulers of Israel (Acts 4:8) and directed him to go the house of Cornelius (Acts 10:19). The Lord commanded Ananias to speak to Saul (Acts 9:10-16). Stephen and Philip were leaders guided by the Spirit (Acts 6:10; 7:55; 8:29, 39). The church of Antioch was directed by the Spirit to send out Barnabas and Paul (Acts 13:2-4). Paul was guided on his mission by the Spirit (Acts 16:6, 7). Far from presenting a church restricted by institutional structures, Luke describes the way leaders exercised authority under the immediate mandate of the Spirit without direction from other leaders, any local church or the mother church in Jerusalem.

3. James.

Those who are sick are instructed to call the elders of the church for prayer* and anointing* (Jas 5:14). This instruction assumes the appointment of elders, but it says nothing else about their duties or position beyond this basic description of their pastoral care for the sick (see Healing).

James discourages the ambition to be a teacher on the grounds that teachers will be judged with greater strictness (Jas 3:1).

4. 1 Peter.

In the striking image of the church as a spiritual house* constructed of living stones that are built upon Christ the living stone* (1 Pet 2:4-10), all members serve together in this new, living temple* as "a royal priesthood" (1 Pet 2:9). This concept of the "priesthood of all believers" is augmented by the teaching that all are stewards of the manifold grace* of God and that "each" individual serves with the gift (charisma) that each has received. Although speaking and serving are the only two kinds of charismatic ministry mentioned (1 Pet 4:11), these two probably serve as a summary of the many different ways that the "manifold grace of God" is displayed.

This emphasis on the ministry of all is combined with a recognition of the authority of elders over the "flock of God" (1 Pet 5:1-2). Yet the exhortation to elders is aimed against an abuse of authority: elders should not exercise their oversight for "sordid gain" and by "lording it over" others but willingly and by example (1 Pet 5:2-3). Humility* in leadership is encouraged by the recognition that Jesus alone is the "chief shepherd" (1 Pet 5:4; 2:25) and bishop (episkopos, 1 Pet 2:25) of the church. 1 Peter* presents a church in which the authority of elders does not inhibit but inspires the priestly and charismatic ministry of all the members of the church.

5. Hebrews.

The ministry of Jesus is the central focus and major theme of Hebrews.* The emphasis that all the ministries of priests under the Mosaic law are fulfilled in the high-priestly work of Jesus Christ effectively removes any basis for extending those old covenant* ministries in the new covenant church. All believers are repeatedly encouraged to "draw near" to the throne of the high priest without depending on any human priesthood (Heb 4:14-16; 9:22). All believers ought to be teachers not by appointment to any office but on the basis of spiritual maturity (Heb 5:11-14). All members are responsible to serve and exhort one another (Heb 6:10; 10:25).

In the postscript the author encourages his readers to remember and imitate the good example of their previous leaders (Heb 13:7) and to obey their present leaders (Heb 13:17). Leaders worthy of imitation* and respect are characterized by their proclamation of the word of God, their faithful lives and their careful watch over the lives of God's people. Submission to them is motivated by the prospect that they "will give an account" of their ministry.

So leaders are defined by their pastoral functions and held accountable for their use of authority. There is no reference to church offices or hierarchical organization. All offices and hierarchical positions are held only by Jesus: the Son exalted to the right hand of the Majesty on high (see Exaltation), the high priest according to the order of Melchizedek,* the apostle, the mediator of the new covenant, the pioneer of salvation* and the great shepherd of the sheep.

This transference of all titles and offices to Christ leads some interpreters to see a protest in Hebrews against the increasing institutionalization of the church.

6. Revelation.

Diverse interpretations of Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) offer different perspectives on authority in the church. For example, the relation of the church to Israel is a major subject of debate. If on the one hand the church and Israel are kept separate, then some or all of the titles of Israel apply only to Israel and not to the church. In that case most of the book, except for the seven letters, has little to say about the church. If on the other hand the church is seen as the true Israel, then the church is the heir to all the titles of Israel: the church is identified with 144,000 witnesses sealed from the twelve tribes of Israel (Rev 7:1-8; 14:1-5), the temple of God and the holy city (Rev 11:1-2), the two witnesses (Rev 11:3), the woman in the wilderness (Rev 12:1-17) and the saints ruling as priests of God on thrones with Christ for a thousand years (Rev 20:1-6). These images of the church do not point to a hierarchy within the church but to the authority of the church as God's prophetic witness in the world.*

A number of signals seem to point to the second interpretation. The book opens with praise to Jesus Christ for what he has done for the church: "to him who loves us and freed us from our sins by his blood and made us to be a kingdom, priests serving his God and Father" (Rev 1:5-6). The letter to the church of Laodicea promises all faithful members a place on Christ's throne. And the book closes with a vision* of the heavenly Jerusalem, the home of God for all his people (see Heaven). So in the sections clearly addressed to the church, the role of Israel as God's authoritative witness is given to the church.

Positions of authority in the church are held either by all members or by the founders. All believers are kings and priests (Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6). Twenty-four elders are seen in the throne room of God (Rev 4:4, 10; 5:8; 11:16; 19:4). They are sitting on thrones, wearing golden crowns, casting their crowns before the throne and falling on their faces to worship* God. They seem to represent the whole people of God: twelve for the old Israel and twelve for the new Israel, the church. The names of the apostles of the Lamb* are written on the foundations of the heavenly city (Rev 21:14).

The letters to the seven churches are addressed to the angels* of the churches. Though some scholars have interpreted the term angel as a reference to the ruling official (bishop) of the congregation, the use of this term in Revelation supports identifying these angels as heavenly beings or as personifications of the prevailing spirits of the churches.

In Revelation the authority of the Messiah is demonstrated in the lives of believers who conquer Satan* "by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony" (Rev 12:10-12).

7. Letters of John.

The "beloved children" (see Sonship) of the author are protected against the deceptive influence of false teachers in the church by the assurance that they do not need anyone to teach them (see John, Letters of). They have been anointed by the Holy One and have all knowledge* (1 Jn 2:20; but cf. variant reading). Since that anointing teaches them all things, they can discern on their own what is true and what is false (1 Jn 2:18-27). This radical understanding of authority in the church removes the need for any offices or special leadership ministries. Each believer is taught by the inner witness of the Spirit and is called to test all spirits by the apostolic proclamation that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (1 Jn 4:1-3).

The only reference to a position of authority in the church is a negative one (in 3 Jn). Diotre-phes refused to welcome some Christians into the church (see Hospitality) and had expelled others from the church. The author strongly censures the ambition of Diotrephes, who "put himself first," and his unwarranted assumption of the role of a monarchical bishop in the church. The letters of John present a strong check to a development of institutionalized authority in the church.

8. Apostolic Fathers.

In the *Didache there is instruction to appoint bishops and deacons (there is no reference to elders), who are to be honored, "for they too carry out the ministry of prophets and teachers" (Did. 15.1). Yet the prophets and teachers are a distinct class of leaders in the church (Did. 13.1; 15.2). Their ministry of teaching must be examined to see if it is true or false (Did. 11.8-12). But the "prophet who speaks in the spirit" should not be tested (Did. 11.7). It appears that the highest honor of all is to be given to prophets who experience ecstasy in the Spirit. So the Didache presents several classes of church members, including ordinary members and those who speak in the Spirit.

The letter of 1 Clement (see Clement of Rome) was written from Rome* to stop a rebellion against the established leadership in the Corinthian church. In fact the opposition had removed certain presbyters from office (1 Clem. 44.3-6). The arguments in 1 Clement for submission to bishops and elders indicate that the development of hierarchical church structures was strongly opposed by a segment of the church. The author points to the way that all the elements of nature move in their orbits given to them by God: "the sun and the moon and the choir of stars circle in harmony within the courses assigned to them" (1 Clem. 20.3). The author calls the readers to consider how soldiers are placed in higher and lower ranks: "not all are prefects or tribunes or centurions or captains of fifty and so forth, but each in his own rank executes the orders given by the emperor and the commanders" (1 Clem. 37.3). These arguments from the structure of nature and the army for the appointment of higher and lower ranks in the church hierarchy were not made simply in defense of the reputation of individual presbyters but primarily in defense of the legitimacy of the hierarchical organization itself.

The "good order" of the church was a straight line of authority: "Christ is from God, and the apostles are from Christ. . . . They appointed their first fruits . . . to be bishops and deacons for the future believers" (1 Clem. 42.1-5). Presbyters held the office of bishop (1 Clem. 44.4-5); deacons were ranked lower than the bishops (1 Clem. 42.4-5). The apostles who set up this structure "gave the offices a permanent character" (1 Clem. 44.2). When individuals who held offices died (probably a reference to the death of bishops, not apostles, though this is disputed), approved successors were to be appointed to fill the established offices (1 Clem. 44.2).

The letter of 1 Clement leaves no room for opposition to hierarchical structure in the church; the duty of all members is to "submit to the presbyters and accept discipline leading to repentance, bending the knees of your heart" (1 Clem. 57.1; see Repentance).

The development of hierarchical structure in the church takes another momentous change in the letters of Ignatius* of Antioch. Whereas the bishops and presbyters were the same in 1 Clement, Ignatius viewed "the bishop presiding in the place of God and the presbyters in the place of the council of the apostles" and the deacons doing Jesus Christ's service (Ign. Magn. 6.1). Bishops served as monarchical leaders in local churches and over all the churches in a city or a region. The authority of the bishop was absolute: members "must follow the bishop as Jesus Christ followed the Father" (Ign. Smyrn. 8.1); they "must regard the bishop as the Lord himself" (Ign. Eph. 6.1); they should be "subject to the bishop as to Jesus Christ" (Ign. Trall. 2.1); they should "do nothing without the bishop" (Ign. Trall. 2.2), "for the one who does anything without the bishop's knowledge serves the devil" (Ign. Smyrn. 9.1). Only the Eucharist served under the authority of the bishop was to be considered valid (Ign. Smyrn. 8.1).

The authority of the bishop was not the result of his ministry, such as his preaching, "for the more anyone observes that the bishop is silent, the more one should fear him" (Ign. Eph. 6.1). His position in the place of God over the church rather than his function gave him his authority.

The emphasis of Ignatius on the gradation of authority—presbyters subject to the bishop and deacons to the bishop and the presbyters—and on the absolute authority of the bishop places his letters at the extreme end of the trajectory toward the development of hierarchical authority in the church.

See also APOSTLE, APOSTLESHIP; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; CIVIL AUTHORITY; SERVANT, SERVICE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, Church, Ministry and Sacraments in the New Testament (Exeter: Paternoster, 1985); B. E. Bowe, A Church in Crisis: Ecclesiology and Paraenesis in Clement of Rome (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); A. Campbell, The Elder in the New Testament (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1995); H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1969); L. Coenen, "Bishop," NIDNTT 1:188-201; J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); J. S. Jeffery, Conflict at Rome: Social Order and Hierarchy in Early Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); I. H. Marshall, " 'Early Catholicism' in the New Testament" in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, ed. R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1974) 217-31; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1961); P. H. Towner, The Goal of Our Instruction: The Structure of Theology and Ethics in the Pastoral Epistles (JSNTSup 34; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989).

G. W. Hansen

B

BABYLON

Apart from Acts 7:43, where Babylon refers to the geographical location to which Jews were deported, references to Babylon in our NT literature are limited to 1 Peter* and Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), where a symbolic sense seems to be employed. There are no references to Babylon in the apostolic fathers.*

1. 1 Peter
2. Revelation

1. 1 Peter.

In 1 Peter 5:13 "Babylon" probably does not refer to the literal city of Babylon on the Euphrates; although it had a significant Jewish population, the only apostle* associated by tradition with that city is Thomas. It is still less likely to refer to the Roman colony of the same name in Egypt. It is commonly held that "Babylon" refers to Rome,* as it does (or so it is widely believed) in Revelation, so that "she who is in Babylon, chosen together with you" would refer to the Christian community in Rome (so NRSV: "your sister church in Babylon"). This interpretation is in harmony with the ancient tradition that associates Peter's ministry* with Rome. Yet the only certain references to Rome as "Babylon" are found in later works, such as Sibylline Oracles 5.143, 159 (dated by most scholars after A.D. 80 but before 130). Such a usage probably originated in Jewish circles after the fall of Jerusalem* in A.D. 70, Rome being seen as a "second Babylon" because, like the first Babylon, it was responsible for the destruction of Jerusalem.

Moreover, nothing in 1 Peter could raise suspicions about the loyalty of either the writer or the recipients of the letter,* so there was no reason to refer to Rome by any cryptic term. The name Babylon probably refers, therefore, not to any specific place but merely to "the place of exile" (Moule, 9), indicating the Christian community's situation as "strangers and exiles" (1 Pet 2:11) in the world.*

2. Revelation.

The six references in Revelation (Rev 14:8; 16:19; 17:5; 18:2, 10, 21) are all to an entity that falls under the judgment* of God* and whose destruction brings hope* and rejoicing for the people of God (see Church; Church as Israel). In Revelation 14:8 the fall of "Babylon the Great" is announced without a word of explanation as to the city's identity. No more is said by way of identification in Revelation 16:19, when it is said that "God remembered Babylon the Great and gave her the cup filled with the wine of the fury of his wrath." The main clues to the identity of Babylon are found in Revelation 17—18, where the Seer is shown a woman clothed in scarlet and purple and bedecked with jewelry, seated on a beast* with seven heads and ten horns. On her forehead is the title "Babylon the great, the mother of prostitutes and of the abominations of the earth" (Rev 17:5).

2.1. Babylon as Rome. Although the interpreting angel's* explanation of this vision* introduces problems of its own, most interpreters see in the explanation of the beast's seven heads as "seven hills on which the woman is seated" (Rev 17:9) a reference to Rome as the City of the Seven Hills. When the seven heads are explained as also signifying "seven kings, of whom five have fallen, one is alive" and one whose brief reign is future (Rev 17:9-10), this is commonly seen as a reference to a sequence of seven Roman emperors,* although there is little agreement about which seven are in mind. Thus "Babylon" is seen as a reference to pagan Rome, the city, while the beast on which she rides represents the Roman Empire, on which the city depends.

The further explanation that the woman is "the great city that rules over the kings of the earth" (Rev 17:18) is alleged to point to Rome's political dominance; the lament of the merchants over her fall "because no one buys their cargoes any more" (Rev 18:11) to her position as a trading power; and the charge that 'in her was found the blood of prophets and of saints, and of all who have been killed on the earth" (Rev 18:24), together with the rejoicing of the multitude in heaven* because God "has avenged on her the blood of his servants" (Rev 19:2) to her unenviable reputation as a persecutor of Christians.

2.2. Babylon as Jerusalem. Yet none of these claims is immune to challenge. Rome was by no means the only city situated on seven hills; seven notable hills can be pointed out in Jerusalem also. And if the mention of seven hills pointed so clearly to Rome, how would the use of this image save the writer or those found with copies of the book in their possession from a charge of treason against the Roman Empire? Nor was Rome the only city whose fall would bring ruin to her trading partners; Jerusalem was also a substantial importer of just the kinds of goods that are named in Revelation 18:12-13. Much of what is said about "Babylon" applies better to Jerusalem than it does to Rome. The designation prostitute and the charge of "adultery" are more appropriately used of Jerusalem and the Jewish people, who were called to be the wife of Yahweh and whom OT prophets* accused of unfaithfulness, fornication and adultery (Ezek 16).

Moreover, although some Christians did meet their death at the hands of Roman officials, such persecution* was sporadic and local, not the result of an official policy of persecuting Christians. Thus one recent writer, while maintaining the view that "Babylon" symbolizes Rome, views the Apocalypse as a response by the Christian community to the perceived (but unreal) threat of repression by Rome (Thompson, 27-28). It is Jerusalem that Jesus is said to have accused of being guilty of the blood of the prophets (Mt 23:35). It should also be noted that the "great city" where the corpses of the "two witnesses" lie (Rev 11:8) is identified as the place "where their Lord was crucified," that is, Jerusalem.

Finally, it has been argued that just as the seven churches of Revelation 2-3 have their celestial counterparts in the "angels" of the churches and since Jerusalem is the only "sky city" in Revelation, its earthly counterpart must be the historical Jerusalem (Malina, 219-23).

See also JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY; 1 PETER; REVELATION, BOOK OF; ROMAN EMPIRE, CHRISTIANS AND THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); A. J. Beagley, The 'Sitz im Leben' of the Apocalypse with Particular Reference to the Role of the Church's Enemies (BZNW 50; Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1987); M. E. Boring, Revelation (IntC; Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1989); J. M. Court, Myth and History in the Book of Revelation (London: SPCK, 1979); idem, Revelation (NTG; Sheffield: JSOT, 1994); C.-H. Hunzinger, "Babylon als Deckname für Rom und die Datierung des I Petrusbriefes" in Gottes Wort und Gottes Land: Festschrift W. Hertzberg, ed. H. G. Reventlow (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1965) 67-77; K. G. Kuhn, "Βαβυλών," TDNT 1:514-17; B. J. Malina, On the Genre and Message of Revelation: Star Visions and Sky Journeys (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); C. F. D. Moule, "The Nature and Purpose of I Peter," NTS 3 (1956-57) 1-11; R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); I. Provan, "Foul Spirits, Fornication and Finance: Revelation 18 from an Old Testament Perspective," JSNT 64 (1996) 81-100; S. Safrai et al., The Jewish People in the First Century; Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Institutions (2 vols.; CRINT 1; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Revelation: Vision of a Just World (PC; Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1991); L. L. Thompson, The Book of Revelation: Apocalypse and Empire (New York: Oxford University Press, 1990); R. W. Wall, Revelation (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991).

A. J. Beagley

BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES

The apostle Paul could presuppose that the addressees of his letters had received baptism: in Romans 6 he showed the absurdity of their continuing in sin since it contradicted their having died to sin when they had been baptized into Christ's death*; in 1 Corinthians 12:12-13 it was their baptism by the one Spirit into the one body of Christ which meant that the various gifts of the Corinthians were to serve the common good; in Galatians 3:27-28 baptism into Christ is seen as effecting a unity that overrides differences between Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female (see DPL, Baptism). Matthew records the command of the risen Lord to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt 28:19; see DJG, Baptism). Here, then, are indications from the Epistles and the Gospels that baptism was from a very early date the universal rite of admission to the church.

The Acts* of the Apostles relate that practice episodically in narrative form. Elsewhere in the later writings of the NT there are a few clear references to baptism and several more possible allusions to it. The detection of the latter can be controversial among scholars, since it involves hints toward rites surrounding the water bath that find their first direct attestation only in the second or third centuries.

The early postscriptural writings add some details to our knowledge about baptismal understanding and practice in their day, but it is not until Justin Martyr, in the middle of the second century, that we find a relatively full ritual description of baptismal practice, and not until the late second century that we find sustained theological reflection in Tertullian's treatise De Baptismo. The early patristic evidence concerning Christian initiation is completed by the ancient church order which most twentieth-century scholarship has identified with The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus. Tertullian and Hippolytus also provide the first uncontested evidence of the baptism of young children.

Confronted with the fragmentary and allusive material in the NT concerning baptism (in the Gospels and in the Pauline letters as well as in other writings), the historian and exegete has to make decisions concerning its relation to understandings and practices attested only in (say) Justin, Tertullian and Hippolytus. Do these latter illuminate directly what was believed, said and done concerning baptism in NT times? Or do the patristic texts rather represent additions or alterations to the apostolic rites and doctrines? Or is it possible (in something like a middle way) that the second century witnessed liturgical developments that elaborated what was embryonically present in the first century, or brought to concrete expression what existed at the level of theological statement in the apostolic writings? Any serious treatment of baptism according to the NT has to remain aware of such issues.

1. Water and the Spirit in the Acts of the Apostles
2. The Non-Pauline Epistles and Revelation
3. The Early Postapostolic Period
4. The Later Second Century
5 The Baptism of Young Children

1. Water and the Spirit in the Acts of the Apostles.

1.1. The Day of Pentecost. According to Acts 1:4-5, the risen Lord ordered his apostles to wait in Jerusalem for "the promise of the Father" (cf. Lk 24:49; Jn 14:26; 15:26), the fulfillment of Jesus' own word that "John baptized with water, but before many days you shall be baptized with (the) Holy Spirit" (cf. Acts 11:16; also Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16). Acts 2 then relates the story of the first Christian Pentecost.* With a sound like the rush of a mighty wind and the appearance as of tongues of fire resting on each recipient, the Holy Spirit* came from heaven and filled the apostles and their associates, so that they "began to speak in other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts 2:4; see Tongues). To the crowd which gathers, Peter interprets this event in terms of Joel's prophecy: "And in the last days it shall be, God declares, that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh . . . and it shall be that whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Acts 2:17-21; cf. Joel 2:28-32 [LXX 3:1-5]). The apostle then rehearses to the "men of Israel" the life, death and resurrection* of Jesus, whom "you crucified and killed by the hands of lawless men, but God raised him up" (Acts 2:23-24). Having now been "exalted to the right hand of God" (Acts 2:33) as "Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36), and "having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit," Jesus "has poured out this which you see and hear" (Acts 2:33). Cut to the heart, the hearers ask what they should do, and Peter replies: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:38). The result was striking: "Those who received his word were baptized, and there were added that day about three thousand souls" (Acts 2:41).

Several points need to be noted from that narrative which are of significance for the practice and understanding of baptism in the church. First, Peter's listeners are summoned to repentance* for their part in the death of Jesus, with the promise that their sins will be forgiven. Christian baptism will be understood as the seal of both human repentance and divine forgiveness* in reference to the weight of all that Jesus redemptively bore on the cross as the suffering servant (cf. Lk 3:22; 24:25-27; Acts 3:12-21; 10:43; 13:38-39).

Second, baptism takes place precisely "in the name of Jesus Christ." Much ink has been spilled on the phrase (cf. Acts 8:16; 10:48; 19:5; see Name). It seems sufficient to take "in the name of" as indicating Jesus as "the fundamental reference of the rite": L. Hartman suggests it was an application of a familiar Semitic phrase by the Palestinian church (l'šēm in Hebrew, or l'šûmā in Aramaic), with Luke letting Peter express himself in prepositional forms familiar in the biblical style of the LXX at Acts 2:38 (epi tō onomati) and Acts 10:48 (en tō onomati), while the narrative at Acts 8:16 and 19:5 uses eis to onoma as the form that Luke himself had learned, with eis being the preposition that Paul employs in connection with baptism (Rom 6:3; 1 Cor 1:13, 15; Gal 3:27). It has been suggested that the beginnings of Christian baptism go hand in hand with the recognition of Jesus' resurrection and of his status as Christ* and Lord* (Pokorný). We do not know whether the phrase "in the name of (the Lord) Jesus (Christ)" was ritually pronounced by the minister at baptisms in the earliest times (cf. Jas 2:7 for a possible allusion). Third- and fourth-century evidence suggests that the earliest "form" by which the divine name was invoked at baptism was that of a question or questions to the candidate, "Do you believe in . . . ?" (Whitaker 1965). In the NT "Jesus is Lord" may have been a confession of faith on the part of the candidate at baptism (cf. Rom 10:9, 13; 1 Cor 12:3).

Third, there is no indication that the apostles* themselves had been baptized with water (perhaps they had received John's baptism) when they received the Holy Spirit; but the immediate message of Peter calls others to baptism "in the name of Jesus Christ" with the promise that they, too, will "receive the Holy Spirit." From this passage the expected post-Pentecostal sequence appears to be water baptism resulting in the reception of the Spirit: the Spirit, like the forgiveness of sins, remains God's to give; water baptism will be the occasion, or the means, of God's giving the Spirit.

In fact, however, the narrative episodes in Acts* are complicated, as we shall see; and the varying sequence of events in them makes it difficult to draw theological conclusions regarding the relation between water baptism and the giving of the Spirit. In light of the various episodes in Acts, Dunn, for instance, will allow no more than that water baptism is for Luke a "vehicle of faith," a means whereby believers "reach out to God" (Dunn, 90-102). By contrast, a sacramental reading takes Acts 2:38 to establish water baptism as a divinely provided rite whereby God will regularly bestow the Holy Spirit when it is approached with right disposition. Somewhat mediatingly, G. Barth sees Acts 2:38 as stating a "normal" connection between water baptism and the reception of the Spirit, even though the narrative episodes in Acts show the Spirit to be free also to come before or after water baptism (Barth, 60-72).

Fourth, the baptized are thereby "added" to the company of those who "devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and fellowship, to the breaking of bread and the prayers" (Acts 2:41-42). Baptism brings entry into the church, which is marked by a common faith,* common worship* and a common life (see Lord's Supper). Speaking "in other tongues" (cf. Acts 2:4) is not mentioned again of the Spirit-filled apostolic community, but boldness in witness* is (Acts 4:23-33).

1.2. Samaria. The next baptismal episode occurs in Acts 8:1-25 with the spread of the gospel throughout Judea and Samaria* (cf. Acts 1:8). Philip* in particular went to a city in Samaria and preached the "good news about the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 8:12; cf. Acts 8:4-5). Many "believed" and "were baptized, both men and women" (Acts 8:12), including Simon "who had previously practiced magic in the city and amazed the nation of Samaria" (Acts 8:9, 12). This new stage in the mission* apparently called for supervision from Jerusalem, for the apostles sent Peter and John down to Samaria (Acts 8:14). Peter and John "prayed" for the Samaritan believers "that they might receive the Holy Spirit, for it had not yet fallen on any of them, but they had only been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 8:15-16): "Then they laid their hands on them and they received the Holy Spirit" (Acts 8:17).

This passage raises a number of issues. How could the Samaritans have come to believe the gospel* and be baptized in the name of Christ without receiving the Holy Spirit? The impression which the result of the action by Peter and John made on Simon the magician* suggests that what had been lacking was a spectacular manifestation of the Holy Spirit: "Now when Simon saw that the Spirit was given through the laying on of the apostles' hands, he offered them money, saying, 'Give me also this power, that any one on whom I lay my hands may receive the Holy Spirit' " (Acts 8:18-19). At another level, the passage has traditionally been invoked as an apostolic basis for "confirmation," or the imposition of episcopal hands, in ritual completion of water baptism.

1.3. The Ethiopian Eunuch. The gospel continues its spread to "all nations" (Lk 24:47; cf. Mt 28:19; Acts 1:8) in the story of the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26-39). On the basis of a passage from Isaiah 53 concerning the Suffering Servant, Philip proclaims to the African courtier the gospel of Jesus and instructs him in the faith. His hearer's response is rapid: "See, here is water! What is to prevent my being baptized?" (Acts 8:36). The Western text at Acts 8:37 then continues the dialogue between the evangelist and the eunuch: "Philip said, 'If you believe with all your heart, you may.' And he replied, 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.' " Philip and the eunuch "went down into the water," and "he baptized him" (Acts 8:38). The eunuch "went on his way rejoicing" (Acts 8:39): "joy"* is a characteristic of the primitive Christian community, where it is associated with their common meals (Acts 2:46; cf. 16:34; Rom 14:17).

1.4. Paul. The next baptism, in Acts 9:18, is that of Paul,* apostle to the Gentiles.* In this first account, Ananias lays hands on Saul/Paul, so that he may "regain his sight" (Acts 9:12, 17-18) after the blinding vision on the road to Damascus. Then Paul rose "and was baptized, and took food and was strengthened" (Acts 9:18-19). It is not specified by which action Paul was "filled with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 9:17), although he immediately began preaching Jesus (Acts 9:20). As Paul recounts the events in his speech before the crowd in Jerusalem at Acts 22:16, Ananias after healing him had said: "Rise and be baptized, and wash away your sins, calling on his name." The imperatives, baptisai and apolousai, are in the middle voice ("Get yourself baptized, and get your sins washed away") but need not imply that the baptism was self-administered; unlike Jewish proselyte baptism (see DJG, Baptism), Christian baptism appears always to have been administered by another (the story of the martyr Thecla is the exception that proves the rule). It is, however, Paul himself who is to call on the Lord's name (cf. Acts 4:12; Rom 10:9, 13). Paul's sins clearly include having persecuted Jesus in his followers (Acts 9:4-5; 22:7-8).

The final account of Paul's conversion comes in his speech before King Agrippa in Acts 26:2-23. This speech contains baptismal allusions. Paul's mission as an apostle is "to open their eyes, that they may turn from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and a place among those who are sanctified by faith in me [i.e., the Lord Jesus]" (Acts 26:18). Apart from the themes of belief in Christ and the forgiveness of sins, already encountered in connection with baptism, the turn from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God, will find expression in the patristically attested rites of renunciation of the devil and profession of faith, and most dramatically in the Eastern ceremonies of the apotaxis and syntaxis, where the candidate faces west, the place of darkness, to renounce Satan (and even to spit on him in some rites!), and then is turned east, toward the rising sun, to enlist with Christ and the Holy Trinity. Being "sanctified" (hēgiasmenois) is mentioned in connection with baptism also at 1 Corinthians 6:11 ("You were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God"). Finally in Acts 26:23 Paul refers to the now fulfilled prophecies "that the Christ must suffer, and that, by being the first to rise from the dead, he would proclaim light both to the people and to the Gentiles." Death and resurrection are baptismal themes in the Pauline writings (especially Rom 6:1-23), and "enlightenment," or "illumination," was from at least the second century onward, as we shall see, a term for baptism (cf. already perhaps in Eph 5:14).

1.5. Cornelius. The next incident (Acts 10:1—11:17) is the case of the God-fearing centurion of the Italian Cohort, Cornelius,* and thereby marks an important stage in the spread of the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 10:44; 11:1, 18) and toward Rome.* When Peter recounts in Cor-nelius's house the story of Jesus Christ, the apostle concludes with the promise that "every one who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name" (Acts 10:43), which can also be described as the gift of "repentance unto life" (Acts 11:18). Immediately "the Holy Spirit fell on all who heard the word" (Acts 10:44), and they began "speaking in tongues and extolling God" (Acts 10:46). Peter's conclusion is that "these people have received the Holy Spirit just as we have" (Acts 10:47), "God gave the same gift to them as he gave to us when we believed in the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 11:17). Peter could not "withstand God" (Acts 11:17), so no one should "forbid water" (Acts 10:47). Therefore, Peter "commanded them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 10:48). Baptized with Cornelius, apparently, were "his relatives and close friends" (Acts 10:24).

The primary significance of the episode clearly resides, in Luke's historiography, in the extension of the mission—in God's footsteps, as it were—to the Gentiles. While the story undoubtedly shows God's freedom of action in giving the Spirit, and even the manifestation of the gift in glossolalia, it is debatable how far the manner of the Spirit's gift in this case may properly be claimed as a regular part of a more general doctrine of (say) "prevenient grace." It is to be noted that Cornelius and "his household" were already God fearers (Acts 10:2) and in some way knew the story of Jesus (Acts 10:36). It was Peter's preaching which provoked their faith in Christ (as Acts 10:43 and 11:17 imply), and their baptism thus sealed their faith in Christ and God's forgiveness of their sin (Acts 10:43, 48) and, in their case, the gift of the Holy Spirit already (just) received.

1.6. The Philippian Jailor. When a nocturnal earthquake opened the doors of the prison at Philippi in which Paul and Silas were being kept, the terrified jailer asked them, "Men, what must I do to be saved?" (Acts 16:30). Taking their cue from the ambiguity of the verb sōzō ("to save"), the evangelists replied: "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved, you and your household" (Acts 16:24). They then unfolded "the word of the Lord" to those present, by which the narrator means (as we know from similar cases) "the gospel of Jesus Christ." The preaching was successful, and the jailor "was baptized at once, with all his family" (Acts 16:33). He "set a table for them," and "he rejoiced with all his household that he had believed in God" (Acts 16:34). The table and the rejoicing suggest the common meal of Christians (see Lord's Supper). Certainly it was later the practice, as Justin Martyr testifies, for the newly baptized to share at once in the Holy Communion.

1.7. Ephesus. The most puzzling feature in Acts 19:1-7 is why those dozen whom Paul encountered at Ephesus are said from the start to be "disciples" who "believed" (Acts 19:1-2). It seems that they were disciples of John the Baptist. They had been baptized "into John's baptism" (Acts 19:3). They had never so much as heard "that there is a Holy Spirit," let alone "received the Holy Spirit" (Acts 19:2-3). Thus they appear to have caught only part of John's message (perhaps the "baptism of repentance"), to which Paul has to add that John himself told the people "to believe in the one who was to come after him, that is, Jesus" (Acts 19:4). Immediately on hearing this, "they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 19:5). Such was clearly not a repetition of Christian baptism. Paul next "laid his hands upon them," and the result was that "the Holy Spirit came upon them, and they spoke with tongues and prophesied" (Acts 19:6). That sequence of water baptism and imposition of apostolic hands has traditionally been invoked in favor of episcopal "confirmation" after baptism; more recently, the story has been used among Pentecostals and others in support of "Spirit baptism," even marked by glossolalia, as a second stage after water baptism in the making of Christians.

1.8. Conclusions. It is hard to put together from Acts a systematic understanding of baptism or a consistent ritual of Christian initiation. There are differences in the circumstances of the episodes recounted and in the sequences of events within each story, and Luke is in any case chiefly concerned with the larger picture of the gospel's first spread. It is probably sufficient and wise to limit ourselves to noticing a cluster of recurrent themes that will appear in various configurations in the later theological and liturgical history: proclamation of the gospel, repentance, faith, the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, washing in water, the forgiveness of sin, imposition of hands, the reception of the Holy Spirit, glossolalia, life and salvation, entrance into the Christian community.

2. The Non-Pauline Epistles and Revelation.

*2.1. Hebrews. This epistle (see Hebrews) contains two passages that demand consideration: Hebrews 5:11—6:6 and Hebrews 10:19-25. The first passage recalls to the addressees certain features from their first admission to Christianity that should not need repeating and perhaps cannot be repeated: learning "the first principles of God's word," "the elementary doctrine of Christ," which are likened to the milk that is succeeded by solid food (see Milk, Solid Food); a "foundation of repentance from dead works and of faith toward God"; "instruction about ablutions [baptismoi], the laying on of hands, the resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment." So far the reference appears to be to the evangelism which elicits repentance and faith, and to the catechesis which instructs the recipients in basic Christian beliefs and in the significance of the rites of baptism in water and the imposition of hands which seal their entrance into the Christian community (the plural baptismoi may be due to the need for baptizands to be taught the difference between Christian baptism and other religious ablutions current at the time).

Then the text proceeds to mention in the aorist tense certain events, or a complex of events, that took place only once for each participant: they have "been enlightened," have "tasted the heavenly gift," have "become partakers of the Holy Spirit" and have "tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come." These could describe different facets of the entry into the realm of salvation* and/or the corresponding parts of a complex ritual process of initiation: "enlightenment" became a synonym for baptism; the gift of the Holy Spirit was associated with both water and the imposition of hands; "tasting the goodness of the Lord," in the phrase borrowed from Psalm 34:8, was applied by the early church to receiving the Holy Communion. In the context of Hebrews, all this is part of an exhortation to press on and a warning against backsliding, for it is "impossible to restore again to repentance" any who should go so far as to "commit apostasy" (see Apostasy). Gradually the church would later develop a system of penance for the readmission of grave sinners, but a second baptism has always been excluded (such would be tantamount to crucifying Christ afresh, said John of Damascus in an application of Heb 6:6; cf. John of Damascus On the Orthodox Faith 4.9).

In the other passage (Heb 10:19-25), against a background of Levitical ritual (Lev 8 and 16), the writer appears to recall to the already baptized the meaning and effect of their baptism: it is an assurance of current access to God through Christ and a stimulus to mutual encouragement and love within the Christian community. The summons to present action is based in the enduring reality, spoken of by perfect participles, of having "our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb 10:22). That phrase, which does not set up an antithesis between the internal and the external but rather in a positive "rhetorical parallelism" joins the inner and the outer in "one indivisible reality" (Beasley-Murray), suggests a view of baptism as "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace" (to speak with the traditional Anglican Catechism). The rite enacts a meeting between the faithful God of promise and the believers who confess their hope (Heb 10:23; the noun homologia, "confession," became a technical term for the baptismal confession, and the Byzantine exegete Theophylact echoed the eschatological orientation of the baptismal creed when he wrote: "We confessed, when we made the covenants of faith, to believe in the resurrection of the dead and in the life eternal"). The original ground of baptism is "the blood of Jesus" (Heb 10:19), and its ultimate outlook is "the Day drawing near" (Heb 10:25). The verbs of "sprinkling" and "washing" have been invoked in favor of aspersion and affusion as modes of baptism.

2.2. 1 Peter. Baptism is directly mentioned at 1 Peter 3:20, where it is said that "baptism now saves you, not as a removal of dirt from the body but as an appeal to God for [or: a pledge to God from] a clear conscience, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Baptism's power derives from the resurrection of Christ, which is made available to believers for the sake of a life of righteousness in Christ (cf. 1 Pet 3:8-18; 4:1-19). The outward act of baptism has an inner significance: the saving gift of God is there met by the resolve of faith. The term eperōtēma, variously translated "appeal" or "pledge," appears to be contractual language and may refer to the baptizand's ethical commitment (Justin Apology I.61: the candidates "undertake to live accordingly") or the responsio, "response," to the questions put in baptism (Tertullian De Resur. 48; De Cor. 3). The passage sees Christian baptism as having been prefigured by God's saving of Noah and his family in the days of the Flood, a theme which along with other OT "types" (such as the Exodus through the Red Sea; cf. 1 Cor 10:1-2) will be sounded in later baptismal prayers and commentaries (see Old Testament).

The entire epistle of 1 Peter* has according to much recent scholarship a baptismal cast (see Worship). Within an epistolary framework, some have seen the bulk of it structured on the pattern of an entire rite of initiation, with the frequently repeated "now" constituting a trace of actual performance. The German Protestant H. Preisker found in the epistle the "deposit" (Niederschlag) of a baptismal service composed of hymns,* sermons and prayers: a prayer psalm (Gebetspsalm) as introit (1 Pet 1:3-12); an instructional address (belehrende Rede) echoing confessional and liturgical formulae (1 Pet 1:13-21; see Liturgical Elements); the baptism itself (between 1 Pet 1:21 and 1:22), followed by a brief charge to the baptized (Taufvotum), who have now "purified [their] souls" and "been born anew" (1 Pet 1:22-25); a festal hymn (Festlied; see Hymns) in three verses from a Spirit-inspired individual (1 Pet 2:1-10); an exhortation (Parainese) from another preacher (1 Pet 2:11—3:12), interrupted by a traditional Christ-hymn (Christuslied) from the congregation (1 Pet 2:21-24; see Hymns); an eschatological* discourse (Offenbarungsrede) from an apocalyptist* seer (1 Pet 3:13—4:7a); a concluding prayer (Schlussgebet) and sung doxology, bringing the baptismal service proper to an end (1 Pet 4:7b-11); a closing service for the whole church (Schlussgottesdienst der Gesamtgemeinde), consisting of an eschatological revelation (1 Pet 4:12-19), an exhortation (Mahnrede) to the presbyters, younger church members and the entire company (1 Pet 5:1-9), a blessing (Segenspruch) uttered by a presbyter (1 Pet 5:10) and a doxology by the entire congregation (1 Pet 5:11).

The Anglo-Catholic F. L. Cross saw even more precisely in 1 Peter the celebrant's part in the baptismal liturgy of a Paschal Vigil. The bishop's script ran as follows: solemn opening prayer (1 Pet 1:3-12); charge to the candidates, based on the Exodus theme as a "type" of baptism (1 Pet 1:13-21); [baptism, followed by] welcome of the newly baptized into the redeemed community (1 Pet 1:22-25); address on the fundamentals of the sacramental life, i.e., baptism, Eucharist, sanctification, priesthood of God's people (1 Pet 2:1-10); [eucharistic consecration and communion, followed by] address on the duties of Christian discipleship, comprising the moral responsibilities of Christians in their several callings (1 Pet 2:11—3:12) and the Christian's vocation to the "paschal life," i.e., the life of mystical suffering in Christ (1 Pet 3:13—4:6); final admonitions and doxology (1 Pet 4:7-11). The epistle's twelvefold use of paschō for "to suffer" encouraged Cross to locate the presumed liturgy in the Easter Vigil, for such early patristic homilists as Melito* of Sardis and Hippolytus of Rome make a (fanciful) linguistic connection between that verb and ta pascha (Passover), and we know from Tertullian (De Bapt. 19) that the Christian version of that feast was the favored time for the administration of baptism at least by the late second century (and so the likely season of the baptismal liturgy described in the ancient church order that much twentieth-century scholarship has identified with the otherwise lost Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus).

Most exegetes have considered that Preisker and Cross were too ambitious in their respective reconstructions of a baptismal liturgy in 1 Peter, but there is widespread agreement that the language of the epistle does indeed bear many baptismal associations. Whether or not such terms allude to existing rites of initiation, they certainly helped to establish the thematic repertoire of Christian baptism and thus also presage what may only later have found detailed ritual embodiment. Within the repeatedly recalled context of the preaching of the gospel and the response of faith, the following items deserve particular attention in connection with the understanding and practice of baptism: God's regenerative activity manifested in the resurrection of Christ (1 Pet 1:3) and the preached word (1 Pet 1:23), with the recipients being addressed as "new born babes" (1 Pet 2:2), remembering that John 3:3-7 speaks of being born again (see New Birth) of water and the Spirit and Titus 3:5-7 refers to baptism as "the washing of regeneration and renewal in the Holy Spirit"; the outline recital of Christ's saving work in 1 Peter 3:18 and 22 that echoes the apostolic kerygma of Paul and Acts and anticipates the confession of faith in baptismal creeds; the move from darkness into God's "marvelous light" (1 Pet 2:9), noting that "enlightenment" is found in Justin Martyr c.150 as a term for baptism; the mention of "spiritual milk" and "tasting the goodness of the Lord" in 1 Peter 2:2-3, which may suggest the practice of joining a cup of milk and honey to the eucharistic communion of neophytes as alluded to by Tertullian (De Cor. 3) and described in The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus.

2.3. 1 John. Two passages in this letter (see John, Letters of) come into consideration. 1 John 5:6-8 speaks of Jesus Christ as having come "with the water and the blood," and of "three witnesses: the Spirit, the water and the blood." The primary reference may be to the baptism of Christ ("the water") and to his death ("the blood"), the Spirit having rested on him throughout his ministry (Jn 1:32-34); or it may be to the "blood and water" which sprang from the pierced side of the crucified Christ (Jn 19:34), and in which patristic writers such as Ambrose (De Virg. 3.5.22) and Chrysostom (e.g., Homily 85 on John, 3) found an origin of baptism and the Eucharist, and to the Spirit which became available to believers once Jesus was "glorified" on the Cross (Jn 7:37-39). In either case, there will then be a secondary reference to the rites of Christian initiation, which bear a derivative witness to Christ dependent on the primary events of his life, death and resurrection.

It has been suggested (G. Dix) that this passage in the epistle matches an early Syrian* pattern of Christian initiation in the sequence of the gift of the Spirit (which Dix equated with "confirmation" but which may have been either "pentecostal" or exorcistic), water baptism (which in Syrian understanding was chiefly associated with the filial adoption of the Christian) and first communion (Whitaker 1970, 12-23). While it may be dangerous to find such detailed correspondences between theological statements in the Scriptures and ritual practices that are securely attested only later, there can be no doubt that the Scriptures nourished subsequent liturgical understanding even if not all the liturgical elements were present in scriptural times. Similar considerations apply in the case of the other passage in 1 John: twice in quick succession the epistle speaks of Christians having received an "anointing"* by the Holy One (1 Jn 2:20, 27), which brings truth and life. Did an unction with oil, as in the chrismation found in patristic liturgies of initiation (attested from Tertullian on), already in the apostolic period convey the sealing by the Spirit (cf. 2 Cor 1:21-22; Eph 1:13-14; 4:30)?

2.4. Revelation. M. H. Shepherd proposed that the structure of the Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of) reflects an already existing paschal liturgy (see Worship), although admitting that elements in the scriptural book may rather have served as "a source of inspiration and suggestion for embellishments of the Church's liturgy that were developed in later times" (in which case, the charge could be made against Shepherd's thesis that "a paschal liturgy of a later age has been read into the Apocalypse, not read out of it"). The seven letters of Revelation 1—3 would correspond to the "scrutinies" or final screening of the candidates before baptism. Chapters 4—6 place the assembly before God in vigil. The "pause" of Revelation 7 houses "the initiation ceremony of washing and sealing." Revelation 8—19 matches the eucharistic synaxis, with prayers, readings from the Law, the Prophets and the Gospels, and the singing of the Hallel psalms (cf. Rev 19:1-8). The "marriage supper of the Lamb" (Rev 19:9) refers to the Eucharist itself, "a participation in and anticipation of the worship of heaven," "the earnest of the final consummation of the age to come" (Rev 20—22). What is certain is that the vision of the martyrs in Revelation 7 contains features that sooner or later were associated with baptism: the "washing" in the blood of the Lamb, or immersion in the saving death of Christ; the "sealing" of the foreheads, whether with a cross as a sign of belonging to the crucified Lord (cf. Tertullian Marc. 3.22) or with the name of God (cf. Rev 14:1) that was invoked over the initiands at several points in the baptismal process; the "clothing in white robes," whether as having "put on Christ" (cf. Gal 3:27; Col 3:9-10) or the "garment of righteousness" (as in the Byzantine rite); the allusions in Revelation 7:15-17 to Psalms 23 and 42, whose imagery of shepherd,* waters and deer occurs in ancient baptistries. If martyrdom* as viewed by the biblical Seer reflected or inspired the rites of baptism, conversely baptism supplied a category for describing martyrdom—the "baptism of blood" (as when The Apostolic Tradition speaks of a martyred catechumen's salvation being made secure through "baptism in his own blood").

3. The Early Postapostolic Period.

3.1. The Didache. This document, which may encode Syrian* practice around the turn of the first century, presents in its first six chapters what looks like catechetical material as it expounds the "Two Ways" of "life" and "death" (see Didache). Then in chapter 7 the document prescribes: "Baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, in running water." No more than in Matthew 28:19 is it specified how the threefold divine name was invoked: it may have been covered by the exchange of questions and answers between minister and candidate concerning the latter's faith (as in The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus), for we have no evidence before the fourth century of a declaratory pronouncement "I baptize you in the name of. . . ." "Running water" is literally "living water" (hydōr zōn), which has biblical associations with divine grace (e.g., Jer 2:13; 17:13). While running water is preferred, it is not indispensable: "If you do not have running water, baptize in other water; and if you cannot in cold, then in warm." Some form of immersion is envisaged, although affusion is allowed if running or standing water is lacking: "If you do not have either, pour water three times on the head." Both the minister and the candidate should come to the event fasting, together with "such others as are able"; the candidate's fast should be of one or two days. Didache 9.5 stipulates that none but those baptized in the name of the Lord may eat or drink at the community's thanksgiving meals, in accordance with the Lord's injunction not to give what is holy to the dogs (see Lord's Supper).

3.2. Ignatius of Antioch. Early in the second century Ignatius* states that "without the bishop it is not lawful either to baptize or to hold a lovefeast" (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2). Later history will show the chief pastor's oversight of admission to the community maintained in various ways when the water rite is performed by other ministers: the Western churches will characteristically reserve to the bishop a postbaptismal imposition of hand and/or anointing signifying the gift of the Holy Spirit (eventually called "confirmation"); the Eastern churches will allow presbyters both to baptize and to "chrismate," but always with the use of episcopally consecrated myron (lit. "ointment").

4. The Later Second Century.

4.1. Justin Martyr. In his First Apology written in Rome around the middle of the second century and addressed to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, Justin Martyr offers the earliest direct and deliberate description of the process of Christian initiation, which he calls "the manner in which we dedicated ourselves to God when we were made new through Christ." Chapter 61 relates:

> As many as are persuaded and believe that these things which we teach and describe are true, and undertake to live accordingly, are taught to pray and ask God, while fasting, for the forgiveness of their sins: and we pray and fast with them. Then they are led by us to a place where there is water, and they are reborn after the manner of rebirth by which we also were reborn: for they are then washed in the water in the name of the Father and Lord God of all things, and of our Savior Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit. . . . Over him that now chooses to be reborn and repents of his sins is named the Father and Lord God of all things. . . . This washing is called enlightenment, because those that are experiencing these things have their minds enlightened. And he that is being enlightened is washed in the name of Jesus Christ who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and in the name of the Holy Spirit, which through the prophets foretold all things concerning Jesus.

Chapter 65 continues:

> After we have thus washed him that is persuaded and declares his assent, we lead him to those who are called brethren, where they are assembled, and make common prayer for ourselves, for him that has been enlightened, and for all people everywhere, that, embracing the truth, we may be found in our lives good and obedient citizens, and also attain to everlasting salvation. When we have ended the prayers we greet one another with a kiss.

A brief account of the Eucharist follows, in which the newly baptized will have participated for the first time ("for no one may partake of it unless he is convinced of the truth of our teaching, and has been cleansed with the washing for forgiveness of sins and regeneration, and lives as Christ handed down").

The following features of a process of Christian initiation are stated or clearly implied by Justin: those who respond to the church's message are put through an unspecified time of learning (the technical term will be "catechumenate"), which includes doctrinal and moral instruction as well as prayer and fasting; they must express their repentance, faith and commitment; their baptism takes place away from the congregation; forgiveness of sins and rebirth are both associated with baptism in the threefold name, and this baptism appears to play an instrumental role in the conveying of these divine gifts; baptism is also termed a washing and an enlightenment; the newly baptized are brought into the liturgical assembly, where prayer is made for them (some scholars have seen this as the location of some kind of "confirmation," which is otherwise lacking), and they join for the first time in the kiss of peace and the eucharistic communion.

4.2. Tertullian. Another, slightly later, description of the rites of initiation, together with fuller theological reflection on their meaning and effect, can be pieced together from the writings of the North African, Tertullian. His treatise "On Baptism" (De Baptismo) may be supplemented from passages in several other writings. The immediate preparation for the rite is thus: "Those who are at the point of entering upon baptism ought to pray, with frequent prayers, fastings, bendings of the knee, and all-night vigils, along with the confession of all their sins, so as to make a copy of the baptism of John [i.e., in its aspect of repentance]" (De Bapt. 20). The baptismal water is blessed in a prayer of invocation (technically called an epiclesis): "All waters, when God is invoked, acquire the sacred significance of conveying sanctity: for at once the Spirit comes down from heaven and stays upon the waters, sanctifying them from within himself, and when thus sanctified they absorb the power of sanctifying" (De Bapt. 4). At the edge of the water, the candidates make a renunciation of the devil, and once in the water "make profession of the Christian faith in the words of its rule" (De Spect. 4): "When on the point of coming to the water, we then and there as somewhat earlier in church under the bishop's hand affirm that we renounce the devil and his pomp and his angels. After this we are thrice immersed, while we answer interrogations rather more extensive than our Lord has prescribed in the gospel" (De Cor. 3). (As De Bapt. 13 reveals, the reference is to the command to baptize in the threefold name of Mt 28:19, and Adversus Praxean 26 makes explicit that "not once only, but thrice are we dipped [tinguimur], into each of the three persons at each of the several names." Tertullian's phraseology is consonant with the practice in The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, where the minister of baptism put questions to the baptizands in the form of a threefold "interrogatory creed" and "baptized" them at each affirmative reply.) Then "we come up from the washing and are anointed with the blessed unction," which is linked with Moses' anointing of Aaron to the priesthood and with Christ's own anointing by the Father with the Spirit (De Bapt. 7). "Next follows the imposition of the hand in benediction, inviting and welcoming the Holy Spirit," and here the OT type is Jacob's blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh with "crossed hands" (cf. Gen 48:12-14) in prefiguration of "the blessing that was to be in Christ" (De Bapt. 8). Welcomed into the whole assembly, the neophytes receive at communion also from a cup of milk and honey (De Cor. 3; cf. Marc. I.14).

As to the minister of baptism: "The supreme right of giving it belongs to the high priest, which is the bishop; after him, to the presbyters and deacons, yet not without commission from the bishop, on account of the church's dignity; for when this is safe, peace is safe. Except for that, even laymen have the right" (De Bapt. 17). As to the time of baptism: "The Passover [i.e., Easter] provides the day of most solemnity for baptism, for then was accomplished our Lord's passion, and into it we are baptized. . . . After that, [the fifty days of] Pentecost is a most auspicious period for arranging baptisms, for during it our Lord's resurrection was several times made known among the disciples, and the grace of the Holy Spirit first given. . . . For all that, every day is a Lord's day; any hour, any season, is suitable for baptism. If there is a difference of solemnity, it makes no difference to the grace" (De Bapt. 19). The special appropriateness of Passover and Pentecost for baptism matches the Pauline themes of baptism as participation in the death and resurrection of Christ (Rom 6), and of baptism by the one Spirit into the one body of Christ (1 Cor 12:12-13).

As to the significance and effect of baptism, God's powerful work is accomplished by incredibly simple means: "A person is sent down into the water, is washed to the accompaniment of very few words, and comes up little or no cleaner than he was"—and yet he has been "granted eternity" (De Bapt. 2). Tertullian describes the sacramental operation thus: "The spirit is in those waters corporally washed, while the flesh is in those same waters spiritually cleansed" (De Bapt. 4). Or, with a distribution of effect among the various elements in the rite, and bringing out Tertullian's belief that "the flesh (caro) is the hinge (cardo) of salvation": "The flesh is washed that the soul may be made spotless; the flesh is anointed that the soul may be consecrated; the flesh is signed [with the cross] that the soul too may be protected; the flesh is overshadowed by the imposition of the hand that the soul also may be illumined by the Spirit; the flesh feeds on the body and blood of Christ so that the soul as well may be replete with God" (De Resur. 8).

4.3. The Apostolic Tradition. If the ancient church order that twentieth-century scholarship has pieced together is correctly identified with the otherwise lost Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, then it bears witness to the practice of Christian initiation in the church of Rome around the turn of the second century into the third. This testimony is of vital importance for the two-way reading between the evidence of the NT and the early patristic writings.

According to Hippolytus, inquirers are to be examined by the church's teachers as to their motives for wanting to "hear the word," and their admittance to instruction depends on their readiness to forsake evil ways and forbidden occupations. The catechumenate normally lasts three years, but the time may be shortened "if a person be earnest and persevere, because it is not the time that is judged but the conduct." Teaching is accompanied by prayer. When the catechumens are "chosen" to receive baptism (they will be called "electi" in the Roman tradition for the weeks of their proximate preparation before a baptism that typically takes place at Easter), their lives are examined for good works and then they may "hear the gospel" (this probably refers to a ceremony more fully described later, whereby the ears of the candidates were opened to all four Gospels). Thenceforth they are exorcised daily, and at last by the bishop. On the final Thursday, they bathe, and on the Friday and Saturday they fast. On the Saturday (typically Easter Eve), the bishop assembles the candidates and gives them a definitive exorcism. The night is spent in vigil, with Scripture reading and instruction.

At cockcrow, a prayer is said over the water, which is to be "pure and flowing." The candidates divest, ready for baptism. First it is the children's turn, "and if they can answer for themselves, let them answer; but if they cannot, let their parents answer or someone from their family." Then come the adult males, and finally the women, "who shall have loosed their hair and laid aside their gold ornaments." A presbyter bids the candidates say "I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy service and all thy works," anointing them with "the oil of exorcism" already prepared by the bishop. Then another presbyter takes over, assisted by a deacon; and in the water the baptizer lays hand on the baptizand and asks "Do you believe in God the Father Almighty?" On the response "I believe," the candidate is "baptized (baptizatur)" by the minister once And similarly twice more, after creedal questions concerning "Christ Jesus, the Son of God" and "the Holy Spirit in the Holy Church, and the resurrection of the flesh." On coming up from the water, the baptized is anointed with "the oil of thanksgiving" already blessed by the bishop, the presbyter saying "I anoint you with holy oil in the name of Jesus Christ."

The newly baptized dry themselves and dress, and then enter the main assembly. There the bishop lays hand on them, praying "O Lord God, who didst grant these the forgiveness of sins by the bath of regeneration of the Holy Spirit, send upon them thy grace, that they may serve thee according to thy will" (Latin version) or "O Lord God, who didst grant these the forgiveness of sins by the bath of regeneration, fill them now with thy Holy Spirit and send upon them thy grace . . ." (Oriental versions). (The different versions have been deemed significant in debates over "confirmation" and the moment of the Spirit's gift.) Then the bishop pours consecrated oil on each head and, resting his hand there, says "I anoint you with holy oil in God the Father Almighty and Christ Jesus and the Holy Spirit." (The double post-baptismal anointing, by presbyter and by bishop, is a peculiarity of the Roman rite.) The bishop "seals" each forehead with the sign of the cross, kissing the neophyte and saying "The Lord be with you" and getting the response "And with your spirit."

Then for the first time the newly baptized

pray with the whole congregation and exchange the kiss of peace. The Eucharist ensues, at which the neophytes not only receive the bread ("the antitype of the body of Christ," delivered with the words "The bread of heaven in Christ Jesus") but also taste of three cups: of water ("to signify the washing, that the inner man also, which is the soul, may receive the same things as the body"), of milk and honey ("in fulfillment of the promise made to the fathers," and now in Christ giving believers nourishment "like little children, making the bitterness of the heart sweet by the gentleness of his word"), and of mixed wine ("the antitype of the blood which was shed for all who have believed in him").

5. The Baptism of Young Children.

From the earliest documents certain facts about baptism emerge. On the divine side, baptism is an occasion, or even a means, but certainly a testimony, of God's saving activity toward a person on the basis of the redemptive work of Christ. But nowhere is faith in Christ dispensed with on the human side. In the most clearly attested cases in the apostolic period and the early centuries, baptism is administered upon a confession of faith on the part of the recipient. The question, however, arises whether baptism was also given to some—particularly children—who were in a way "covered" by the faith of others or could at least be "spoken for" by them, as we see ritually encoded for the first time in The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus ("If [the children] cannot [answer for themselves], let their parents answer, or someone from their family"). Historians and exegetes often have a heavy ecclesial and ecclesiological investment here, for the answer affects, even if it does not finally settle, the contested issue of the impropriety, legitimacy or necessity of infant baptism.

Third and fourth-century writers speak of the baptism of infants as an apostolic custom. The only piece of potentially hard evidence extant from apostolic times is the reference to the baptism of "households"* in Acts (up to four cases) and in Paul (once). According to Acts 10:2, Cornelius feared God "with all his household [syn panti tō oikō autou]," and Peter was sent to declare to him "a message by which you will be saved, you and all your household [kai pas ho oikos sou]" (Acts 11:14); for Peter's visit, Cornelius called together "his relatives and close friends" (Acts 10:24), and when "the Holy Spirit fell on all who heard the word" spoken by Peter (Acts 10:44), the apostle commanded them to be baptized (Acts 10:48). According to Acts 16:14-15, Lydia, whose heart the Lord had opened to Paul's message, "was baptized, and her household [kai ho oikos autēs]." According to Acts 16:31-32, Paul and Silas told the Philippian jailor "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved, you and your household [su kai ho oikos sou]," and they "spoke the word of the Lord to him and to all that were in his house [pasin tois en tē oikia autou]"; at once the jailor "was baptized, and all those belonging to him [kai hoi autou hapantes]" (Acts 16:33), and "he rejoiced with all his household [panoikei] that he had believed in God" (Acts 16:34). According to Acts 18:8, "Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, believed in the Lord, together with all his household [syn holō tō oikō autou]; and many of the Corinthians hearing Paul believed and were baptized." In 1 Corinthians 1:16 Paul writes that he "baptized the household of Stephen [ton Stephana oikon]," "the firstfruits of Achaia," who "have devoted themselves to the service of the saints" (1 Cor 16:15). As the story is told in some of these cases, it may be possible to equate the baptized with those who heard the word and believed, but in others the "household" that was "saved" may have been more extensive. In particular, those looking for apostolic evidence of infant baptism argue that the "households" which were "saved" and "baptized" will have included infants. In the estimation of those opposed to infant baptism, infants can hardly be said to have heard the word and believed and so will not have been baptized.

The classic modern debate on the early history of infant baptism is that between J. Jeremias and K. Aland. While Jeremias, against an OT background, holds that a quasi-ritual "oikos-formula" includes children, and even especially so, Aland considers that the reference of the common word "household" in any given case depends on the context and notes that small children are nowhere mentioned in the relevant NT passages. Aland is equally unimpressed by Jeremias's appeal to indirect literary evidence from the early or middle second century (such as the martyr Polycarp's confession of Christ, "Eighty-six years I have been his slave") or the data of funerary inscriptions, which in any case belong to the third century. Aland finds the clue to the beginnings of infant baptism in Tertullian's treatise On Baptism. There Tertullian opposes what sounds to Aland like a new practice of bringing young children to baptism. Granting that the Lord said "Forbid them not to come to me," Tertullian draws the conclusion: "So let them come when they are growing up, when they are learning, when they are being taught what they are coming to; let them be made Christians when they have become competent to know Christ" (De Bapt. 18). For Tertullian, childhood remains an age of innocency (innocens aetas): "Why should innocent infancy come with haste to the remission of sins?" Infant baptism will have arisen, according to Aland, with the shift toward the view of original sin finally represented in Cyprian: a new-born child "has not sinned, except that, being born after the flesh according to Adam, he has contracted the contagion of the ancient death at its earliest birth; yet on this very account he approaches more easily to the reception of the forgiveness of sins, because it is not his own sins that are forgiven him but the sins of another" (Cyprian Epistle 64; Aland adduces similar passages from Origen). Later, Augustine of Hippo would appeal to the church's practice of baptizing infants—when baptism is "for the remission of sins"—as liturgical proof of the doctrine of original sin (e.g., Augustine Sermon 174, Migne PL 38.944-45; Epistle 194, Migne PL 33.889-91).

On the theological plane, proponents of infant baptism offer various accounts, severally or in combination, of the relation between faith and such baptism: a child may have faith (like, in Luther's example, the embryonic John who leapt in Elizabeth's womb when confronted by the Word in Mary's womb); a child may be given faith through baptism; sponsors may stand in for the faith of the child; the community of faith may "supply" the faith of one being aggregated to it; the child may be baptized with a view to its future faith. Moreover, the practice of infant baptism is considered warranted, or even necessitated, by its congruity with a variety of themes in biblical soteriology and anthropology: fallen humanity's need for redemption; the unity of God's covenant (with baptism as the Christian circumcision); the prevenience of grace; the universality of the gospel offer; unmerited justification; the intercessory power of others; the solidarity of the family. Those who reject the baptism of infants in favor of baptism solely upon profession of faith by the candidate argue that faith includes a measure of understanding and is personally unsubstitutable. Moreover, the "new" covenant requires circumcision* "of the heart"; the prevenience of grace and the universality of the gospel are properly and sufficiently embodied in the preaching of the word to all; original sin does not imply personal guilt in each human being from birth; justification may be "by faith alone," but it does not occur "without faith"; parents, guardians and the church properly exercise their responsibilities and privileges toward children by prayer and teaching, as towards catechumens in preparation for baptism; even then, there is the prospect, according to the Lord's teaching in the Gospels, that the eschatological crisis will actually divide families (see Wainwright 1980, 139-42).

See also HOLY SPIRIT; HYMNS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST; PENTECOST; TONGUES; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. Aland, Did the Early Church Baptize Infants? (London: SCM, 1963); idem, Die Stellung der Kinder in den frühen christlichen Gemeinden—und ihre Taufe (TEH 138; Munich: Kaiser, 1967); G. Barth, Die Taufe in frühchristlicher Zeit (BTS 4; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1981); G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (London: Macmillan, 1962); P. F. Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship: Sources and Methods for the Study of Early Liturgy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992); F. L. Cross, I. Peter: A Paschal Liturgy (London: Mowbray, 1954); O. Cullmann, Baptism in the New Testament (SBT 1; London: SCM, 1950); G. J. Cuming, Hippolytus: A Text for Students (GLS 8; Bramcote, Notts: Grove Books, 1976); G. Dix, Confirmation or Laying on of Hands? (TOP 5; London: SPCK, 1936); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit: A Re-examination of the New Testament Teaching on the Gift of the Spirit in Relation to Pentecostalism Today (SBT 2d ser. 15; London: SCM, 1970); E. Evans, ed. and trans., Tertullian's Homily on Baptism (London: SPCK, 1964); W. F. Flemington, The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism (London: SPCK, 1948); L. Hartman, "Into the Name of Jesus," NTS 20 (1973-74) 432-40; J. Jeremias, Infant Baptism in the First Four Centuries (London: SCM, 1960); J. Jeremias, The Origins of Infant Baptism: A Further Study in Reply to Kurt Aland (SHT 1; London: SCM, 1963); G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit: A Study in the Doctrine of Baptism and Confirmation in the New Testament and the Fathers

(2d ed.; London: SPCK, 1967); P. Pokorný, "Christologie et baptême à l'époque du christianisme primitif," NTS 27 (1980-81) 368-80; H. Preisker, Die Katholischen Briefe (HNT 15; 3d rev. ed. of H. Windisch's work; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1951); M. H. Shepherd, The Paschal Liturgy and the Apocalypse (ESW 6; London: Lutterworth, 1960); G. Wainwright, Doxology: The Praise of God in Worship, Doctrine, and Life (New York: Oxford University Press, 1980); idem, "The Rites and Ceremonies of Christian Initiation: Developments in the Past," SL 10 (1974) 2-24; E. C. Whitaker, Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy (2d ed.; London: SPCK, 1970); idem, "The History of the Baptismal Formula," JEH 16 (1965) 1-12.

G. Wainwright

BAR KOKHBA. See JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70.

BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF

An anonymous late first- or early second-century Christian writing that seeks to show by means of an allegorical interpretation of Scripture that Christians are the true heirs of God's covenant.*

1. Form and Structure
2. Central Concerns
3. The Interpretation of Scripture
4. Author, Date and Place

1. Form and Structure.

Though cast in the form of a letter,* the epistolary framework (Barn. 1.1-8; 21.1-9) is largely a literary device. The bulk of the document (Barn. 2.1—17.2) is something of a "tract for the times" (Barnard 1993, 172), a polemical essay that seeks to persuade and convince. In it the author shares with his readers gnōsis, "knowledge"* (Barn. 1.5b; cf. Barn. 6.9; 9.8; 10.10; 13.7; 18.1; 19.1; also Barn. 2.3; 5.4; 11.4; 12.3; 21.5) that he himself has received (Barn. 1.5a), that is, traditional material. The following outline (cf. Kraft) offers some indication of the topics addressed.

A. What the Lord requires (Barn. 2.1—3.6)
B. Readiness in the face of impending judgment (Barn. 4.1-14)
C. The Lord's suffering (Barn. 5.1—8.7)
   1. Why the Lord endured suffering in the flesh (Barn. 5.1—6.19)
   2. The Lord's suffering foreshadowed (Barn. 7.1—8.7)
D. Concerning "circumcised" understanding (Barn. 9.1—10.12)
   1. The "true meaning" of circumcision* (Barn. 9.1-9)
   2. The correct understanding of the Mosaic laws (Barn. 10.1-12)
E. Baptism and the Cross foreshadowed (Barn. 11.1—12.11)
F. The Covenant and its true recipients (Barn. 13.1—14.9)
G. Concerning the Sabbath (Barn. 15.1-9)
H. Concerning the Temple (Barn. 16.1-10)
I. Conclusion (Barn. 17.1-2)

In Barnabas 18.1—20.2 the author presents, as "another kind of knowledge [gnōsis] and teaching" (Barn. 18.1), a version of the "Two Ways," one of light (Barn. 19.1-12) and one of darkness (Barn. 20.1-2). The former is comprised almost entirely of "do's and don't's," while the latter is a description of evil actions and persons. This represents a Christian application of a common Jewish form of moral instruction. Similar material is found in a number of other Christian writings from the first through about fifth centuries, including the *Didache. The complex connections between the "Two Ways" sections of the Didache and Barnabas have been closely examined. Rather than either one being directly dependent upon the other, it seems much more likely that both are dependent, perhaps indirectly, on a common source (Kraft; Barnard 1993, 194-95), and thus they are examples of what Kraft has termed "evolved literature." Similar material may be utilized quite differently in the two documents (Draper, 96-99).

2. Central Concerns.

2.1. Ethics and Eschatology. Tying together the two major sections of the document and the epistolary framework is a pervasive ethical concern set within an apocalyptic* eschatological* perspective. The struggle between good and evil in the "present evil age" (Barn. 2.1; 4.1; 4.9) will soon (Barn. 4.9b; 21.3) come to an end with the arrival of the "age to come" (Barn. 4.1) and its accompanying judgment* (Barn. 4.12; 5.7; 15.5; 21.6), for which Christians must be prepared. This conviction lends a note of urgency to the exhortations found everywhere in the document (see Ethics); Christians should take nothing for granted (e.g., Barn. 2.1; 4.9b; 4.13), unlike Israel (e.g., Barn. 4.13-14), who stands as a negative example throughout.

2.2. Church and Israel. Written at a time when the level of antagonism between church and synagogue (and perhaps also Jewish Messianic speculations [Lowy]) still ran high (see Christianity and Judaism), Barnabas represents one of the earliest contributions outside the NT to the discussion of a set of questions that has confronted the followers of Jesus since the earliest days of his ministry: how do the followers of Jesus relate to Israel's covenant and Scriptures? With respect to the first point, the author of Barnabas asserts that Christians are the true and intended heirs of God's covenant* (Barn. 4.8; 6.19; 13.6; 14.4b-5), that is, the covenant is "ours," not "theirs"; Israel forfeited it, according to the author, due to idolatry* (Barn. 4.8; cf. Barn 16.1-2), disobedience (Barn. 8.7; 9.4; 14.1-4a) and ignorance (they interpreted the Mosaic laws literally, rather than "spiritually," as intended, Barn. 10.2, 9). As for the second point, the author presents a Christian reading of the Mosaic law* and prophets by means of an allegorical method of exegesis (see Church as Israel).

3. The Interpretation of Scripture.

In utilizing an allegorical approach the author is following an ancient and well-respected tradition of interpretation (see Old Testament in the Apostolic Fathers). Developed by the Greeks, the allegorical method assumes the existence of and seeks to uncover the hidden spiritual meaning of a text, which may be quite different from the apparent meaning. This method of interpretation played a role in all known forms of first-century Judaism, and particularly in the numerous writings of Philo,* an Alexandrian Jew contemporary with Paul, who himself offers a nice example in Galatians 4:21-31. An allegorical approach enables the author of Barnabas to offer a "Christian" interpretation of biblical texts that at first glance appear to have nothing to do with Jesus (cf. Barn. 9.7-8), and to claim that only Christians understand the true meaning of the Scriptures (cf. Barn. 10.12).

4. Author, Date and Place.

The document is the work of an anonymous teacher (Barn. 6.5, 9, 10b; 9.7; 13.1; 14.4; 16.1; 17.1) who, though he makes the customary declarations of modesty and self-deprecation (e.g., Barn. 1.8; 4.6, 9; 21.1), nonetheless considers his efforts to explain the meaning of the Scripture to be of no small significance, since they include his choicest insights (Barn. 9.9). Any connection with the historical Barnabas, though sometimes alleged, is generally held to be extremely unlikely if not impossible. Apart from possibly Barnabas 4.14 (which is susceptible of other explanations), the author offers no evidence of any use of documents that came to comprise the NT.

The document appears to have been written after the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (cf. Barn. 16.3-5) but before the city was rebuilt by Hadrian (117-138) in 132-135. Within these limits greater precision is difficult to achieve (see Chronology). Interesting cases have recently been made for the time of Nerva (96-98; Richardson and Shukster) or the early years of Hadrian (Barnard 1993, 173-180).

A lack of information renders difficult a confident determination regarding location. In view of its numerous affinities in hermeneutical approach and style with Alexandrian Judaism and Christianity, and the fact that its earliest witness is Clement of Alexandria (who accorded it the same authority as the Catholic epistles), most scholars have located it there (see Alexandria), although Syria* (Prigent) and western Asia Minor (Wengst) have been suggested.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; DIDACHE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Text and Translation: J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings, ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992). Commentaries and/or Editions: R. A. Kraft, Barnabas and the Didache (AF 3; New York: Nelson, 1965); P. Prigent and R. A. Kraft, Épître de Barnabé (SC 172; Paris: Cerf, 1971); H. Windisch, Der Barnabasbrief (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1920). Studies: L. W. Barnard, "The 'Epistle of Barnabas' and its Contemporary Setting," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 159-207; idem, Studies in the Apostolic Fathers and their Background (Oxford: Blackwell, 1966); J. A. Draper, "Barnabas and the Riddle of the Didache Revisited," JSNT 58 (1995) 89-113; R. Hvalvik, The Struggle for Scripture and Covenant: The Purpose of the Epistle of Barnabas and Jewish-Christian Competition in the Second Century (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1995); S. Lowy, "The Confutation of Judaism in the Epistle of Barnabas," JJS 11 (1960) 1-33; E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, Book 1: The First Ecclesiastical Writers, ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (NGS 5/1; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990); J. N. B. Carleton Paget, "Barnabas 9:4: A Peculiar Verse on Circumcision," VC 45 (1991) 242-54; P. Prigent, Les Testimonia dans le Christianisme primitif: L'Épître de Barnabé I-XVI et Ses Sources (Paris: Libraire Lecoffre, 1961); P. Richardson and M. B. Shukster, "Barnabas, Nerva and the Yavnean Rabbis," JTS 34 (1983) 31-55; K. Wengst, Tradition und Theologie des Barnabasbriefes (Berlin/New York: De Gruyter, 1971). M. W. Holmes

BASILIDES. See GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM.

BEASTS, DRAGON, SEA, CONFLICT MOTIF

The dragon, the beasts and the sea in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) constitute a complex of evil powers that war against God* and Christ* and instigate conflict between humans.

1. Revelation as the Product of Conflict
2. Conflict Between Humans
3. Conflict Between Christ and Disloyal Christians
4. Conflict with the Dragon and the Beasts
5. The Fate of the Forces of Evil

1. Revelation as the Product of Conflict.
Revelation as a whole is a work permeated by conflict, especially the conflict between those who follow Christ and those who oppose Christ and his followers. The book was written in circumstances that sprang directly from the conflict of which the writer was a victim—his exile on the island of Patmos as punishment by the Roman authorities (see Civil Authority) for proclaiming the Word of God (Rev 1:9).

2. Conflict Between Humans.
Conflict exists between Christians at Smyrna and those who claim falsely to be Jews (Rev 2:9), although there is no evidence that this conflict reached the point of physical violence. Again, even though the word conflict is not used, violent conflict results from the release of the second horseman, the rider on the red horse, who receives power* to deprive the earth of peace,* with the result that people slaughter one another (Rev 6:3-4).

3. Conflict Between Christ and Disloyal Christians.
Even where the word is not used, there are warnings of imminent conflict between Christ and the disloyal members of the seven churches.* And there is an explicit warning of conflict with those members of the Christian community at Pergamum who hold the teaching of Balaam and of the Nicolaitans (Rev 2:14-16).

4. Conflict with the Dragon and the Beasts.
Although the locusts (Rev 9:1-11) and the horses (Rev 9:17-19) fall within the scope of the Greek word for "beast" (Foerster, TDNT 3:135), the most prominent examples of conflict in Revelation are those associated with the trinity of evil (the dragon and the two beasts) and its opposition to God and his people (Rev 12—13). God's "two witnesses" who, with their characteristics reminiscent of Moses* and of Elijah (Rev 11:16), must be seen as representatives of the Law* and the Prophets,* are caught up in this conflict. Until their prophetic task is complete, they are immune from danger (Rev 11:5), but when their witness* is complete, they meet their death at the hands of the "beast that ascends from the bottomless pit" (Rev 11:7). Yet they are vindicated when they are raised to life* again and taken up to heaven* (Rev 11:11-12).

The "great red dragon, with seven heads and ten horns and seven diadems on his heads" (Rev 12:3), who is identified also as "that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world" (Rev 12:9), appears first as the opponent of the woman whom he pursues in an attempt to devour her son at birth. The attack is unsuccessful, for the woman is granted refuge in the wilderness while her child is taken to safety in the presence of God (Rev 12:5-6). This imagery probably owes much to a widely known myth, according to which the dragon (Python) pursues Leto, the mother of Apollo, at the time of his birth but then is killed by Apollo.

Although the son* undoubtedly represents Christ, the woman probably symbolizes the people of God as a whole, rather than any specific individual, such as Mary.* The deliverance of the child is therefore probably to be seen as a reference to the resurrection* and ascension* of Christ, while the deliverance of the woman may represent the flight of the Christian community across the Jordan to Pella (see Pella, Flight to), just before the siege of Jerusalem* by the Romans.

The dragon suffers defeat at the hands of Michael and his angels and is cast down from heaven to earth, where he wages war on "the rest of [the woman's] children, those who keep the commandments of God and hold the testimony of Jesus" (Rev 12:17), that is, the Christian community. The form this war takes is seen in Revelation 13, where there arises from the sea a beast who is inspired and authorized by the dragon. Like the dragon, the beast has seven heads and ten horns. Like the dragon, this beast is crowned with diadems, but whereas the dragon has one diadem for each of its seven heads, the beast has a diadem for each of its ten horns (Rev 13:1). In describing the beast as coming from the sea, the Seer is drawing on the ancient Canaanite mythology that is found in the OT as well: the sea is the special abode and domain of Leviathan (or Lōtān), the serpent that opposes God, and creation* involves the victory of God over the sea, the serpent and the forces of evil (Gen 1:9-10; Job 41:1-11; Ps 74:13-14; see Old Testament in Revelation).

As with the dragon from which the beast gets its authority,* the description of the beast borrows from the description of the four beasts in Daniel 7:2-7. This beast parodies the Lamb*: the horned Lamb appeared to have been killed (Rev 5:6); although the horned beast received an apparently fatal blow to one of its heads, the beast recovered. Again, the worship* ascribed to the beast by its followers, those whose names have not been written in the Lamb's book of life—"Who is like the beast, and who can fight against it?" (Rev 13:4)—is a conscious parody on the acknowledgment of God's greatness in such passages as Exodus 15:11. Many scholars believe that the historical referent of this image is the Roman emperors,* many of whom laid claim to divinity and demanded the worship of their subjects—specifically the emperor Nero, whose death and (so it is alleged by many) expected return at the head of a Parthian army are seen as equivalent to a death and resurrection.

Just as in Canaanite mythology the sea creature Leviathan is often accompanied by the oxlike land creature Behemoth, so in Revelation the beast from the sea has as its partner a second beast, one that arises from the earth (as distinct from the sea—or perhaps "the land" [i.e., Judah]). This second beast is a demonic counterpart to the Holy Spirit,* a "false prophet" (Rev 20:10) who directs the worship of the "earth-dwellers" to the antichrist,* just as the Holy Spirit directs attention to Christ. This second beast performs miracles that convince the "earth-dwellers" to worship an image of the beast from the sea and to wear the beast's mark (that is, its name or number of its name) on right hand or forehead.

Death is the penalty for failure to worship the beast, exclusion from commercial life the penalty for refusing the beast's mark. The Seer does not name the beast but says that the "number of its name" is "the number of a human being" (or "a human number"), that number being "six hundred and sixty-six" (Rev 13:18). Most scholars believe that the Seer is following a practice, common in his day, of using a number to signify a word, the numerical values of whose letters add up to that number (since in both Greek and Hebrew letters did double duty as numbers), and hold that the reference is to either Nero or Domitian, both of whose names and titles can with a little ingenuity be written in a form whose letters yield the sum of 666 (or, spelled differently, the "six hundred and sixteen" that is found in some manuscripts). It seems more likely, however, that the Seer intends to indicate not a specific individual but rather the merely human status of the beast: "six hundred and sixty-six" falls short in each digit of the perfect number, seven; in contrast, as Sibylline Oracles 1.326-30 points out, the name Jesus has a numerical value of 888 (that is, exceeding in each digit the perfect number). If, as seems likely, the first beast represents the Roman political power, the second beast may represent the religious officials who were responsible for conducting the ceremonies demanded by the state (see Religions, Greco-Roman).

The beast appears also as the willing ally of the great prostitute Babylon* (Rev 17:1-6) but later turns against her (Rev 17:16). This vision* provides further details concerning the beast, its heads being interpreted both as seven hills on which the prostitute sits and as seven kings, one of whom is still alive at the time of the vision (Rev 17:9-10). Its ten horns are interpreted as ten kings who have yet to receive authority (Rev 17:12-13). Of the beast it is said that "it was, and is not, and is about to ascend from the Abyss and go to destruction" and that it "was, and is not, and is to come"(Rev 17:8)—the latter a claim that can be made rightly only by God or Christ (Rev 1:18; 2:8). These features also suggest to most interpreters that the beast symbolizes Rome's political aspect, although there are many opinions about which specific rulers the heads and horns represent.

5. The Fate of the Forces of Evil.
The beast and its followers are not immune from retribution. Its kingdom is plunged into darkness (see Light) and its followers suffer great torments, yet they fail to repent (see Repentance), preferring instead to curse God (Rev 16:10-11). The dragon, the beast and the false prophet mount yet another attack, as and demonic spirits proceeding from their mouths inspire the kings of the earth to gather for battle at "Armageddon" (probably a reference to Jerusalem; Rev 16:12-16). A similar assault occurs after the "thousand years," when Satan* is released from his prison and induces the nations to gather together against "the camp of the saints and the beloved city." The final doom of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet is to be cast alive into the lake of burning sulphur (Rev 19:20; 20:10). The sea, the domain of the beast, will finally be destroyed as well—not merely pushed back but dried up (Rev 21:1).

See also ANTICHRIST; REVELATION, BOOK OF; SATAN, DEVIL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); O. Bauernfeind, "πόλεμος, πολεμέω," TDNT 6:502-15; A. J. Beagley, The 'Sitz im Leben' of the Apocalypse with Particular Reference to the Role of the Enemies of the Church (BZNW 50; Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1987); G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (NCB; London: Oliphants, 1978); G. B. Caird, The Revelation of St. John the Divine (HNTC; New York and Evanston: Harper & Row, 1966); P. Carrington, The Meaning of the Revelation (London: SPCK, 1931); R. H. Charles, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Revelation of St. John (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1920); A. Y. Collins, The Combat Myth in the Book of Revelation (HDR 9; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976); J. M. Court, Myth and History in the Book of Revelation (London: SPCK, 1979); J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the Old Testament (UCOS 35; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985); W. Foerster, "δράκων," TDNT 2:281-83; idem, "θηρίον," TDNT 3:133-35; C. Kloos, Yhwh's Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1986); R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT 17; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes and Indices (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968 repr.); C. van der Waal, Openbaring van Jezus Christus: Inleiding en Vertaling (Groningen: De Vuurbaak, 1971); idem, Openbaring van Jezus Christus II: Verklaring (Oudkarspel: De Neverheid, 1981); M. K. Wakeman, God's Battle with the Monster: A Study in Biblical Imagery (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973). A. J. Beagley

BENEDICTIONS. See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

BENEFACTORS. See SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY. See NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY.

BISHOPS. See CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY.

BLESSING

The English word blessing is used in two ways in the literature under review. These two ways are represented by two different Greek word groups, eulogia and makarismos. The difference between the two word groups is clarified when one compares their opposites. The opposite of eulogia is cursing. This kind of blessing seeks an effect. It refers to an act of bestowing praise or favor. The opposite of makarios is woe. This kind of blessing makes a statement of value. It refers to a state of well-being, usually as a result of fulfilling some stipulation (see DPL, Benediction, Blessing).

1. Effective Blessing (eulogia)
2. Evaluative Blessing (makarismos)

1. Effective Blessing (eulogia).
Blessing is a prominent OT theme. For example, Isaac's blessing of the firstborn is stolen by Jacob from his brother Esau (Gen 27). Jacob blesses Joseph's two sons in reverse order (Gen 48). And the pagan prophet Balaam blesses Israel (Num 23—24). In many cases such as these, the OT sees the blessing as effecting some sort of outcome, as if it were an official last will and testament. But the power* of the blessings was not in the words nor in the speaker, but in the God* who was invoked.

Blessing God was the classic form of prayer* in Second Temple Judaism, as it is in modern Judaism (Bradshaw, 12). Evidence for this can be seen in the benedictions incorporated in the final form of the Psalter (Ps 41:14; 72:18-19; 89:53; 106:48), in a text from Qumran (Weinfeld), and in the fact that the first tractate of the Mishnah (c. 200 B.C.), called Berakot (Benedictions), is devoted to discussions among the rabbis about the formal blessings that were recited at various religious functions, especially at mealtimes, and during the normal routines of life. In these cases the blessing was essentially a declaration of praise: "Blessed is the Lord, the God of Israel," or "Blessed are you, O Lord our God, King of the Universe." The change from third to second person took place at the end of the OT period (Bradshaw, 16). One of the most common Jewish blessings was the qiddûš, said over the cup of wine at the onset of the sabbath to "keep it holy" (Ex 20:8). Another common blessing was the 'āmidāh, a set of eighteen benedictions that were to be recited "standing up" at the daily service of the synagogue (cf. m. Ber. 4:3). The theme of effective blessing carries over to the NT but not with the same prominence, being replaced by a secondary form of Jewish prayer, the hôḏāyah, or "thanksgiving" (for the distinction between eulog- and eucharist- form see Bradshaw).

Acts and Hebrews use the word blessing for various purposes in contexts with OT citations of patriarchal blessings. Acts 3:25 cites the divine blessing of Abraham,* "in your seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed," to affirm Israel's* election.* Acts 3:26 applies the verse to the Jewish listeners: the Abrahamic blessing comes through the gospel,* which they accept when they turn from their wicked ways (which in this case constitute the rejection of the Messiah). Hebrews 6:14 cites the blessing on Abraham after the offering of Isaac (Gen 22:17) to affirm the faithfulness* of God, so that the community might emulate Abraham's perseverance (Heb 6:12). The blessing of Abraham by Melchizedek* is cited in Hebrews 7:1. This blessing is given a commentary in Hebrews 7:6-7. The lesser, Abraham (one of the greatest men in Israelite history), is blessed by the greater, Melchizedek. Thus the priesthood* of the order of Melchizedek is greater than the levitical order that comes from Abraham via Aaron. Hebrews 11:20-21 also mentions the blessings of Isaac on his two sons and Jacob's blessing of Joseph's two sons. The final mention of ancestral blessing is in Hebrews 12:17, where Esau could not inherit Jacob's blessing even though he sought for it with tears. Acts and Hebrews treat these ancestral blessings as part of God's salvific plan rather than as intimate personal communications between relatives or friends. Humans are vehicles for God's acts of blessing.

The notion of effective blessing occurs in 1 Peter 3:9: "Bless because you were called to inherit a blessing." This saying may have derived from the gospel tradition (Lk 6:28; cf. Rom 12:14). The point is that Christians, having been or about to be blessed by God, should bless their enemies. The inherited blessing is not defined in this verse, but it is probably the blessing of salvation* mentioned in 1 Peter 1:3-5. The citation of Psalm 34:13-17 in 1 Peter 3:10-12 outlines the blessing believers are to give: to do good and to seek peace* and pursue it. So the blessing is bestowed not so much through effective speech as through actions. It is not a pronouncement of blessing as much as it is being an instrument of blessing. This blessing is not without salvation-historical ramifications, since it is based on the blessing that Christians inherit by belonging to Christ.*

Christians also bless God. James 3:9-10 notes the inconsistency of human speech, blessing God and cursing people with the same tongue. Blessing here may refer to various Jewish liturgical benedictions referred to above, which may have been commonplace in James's church. The thrust of a large part of the letter of James is illustrated here: people can be religious without practicing true religion. The Godhead is also blessed in the opening eulogy of 1 Peter 1:3-5 and in the worship of heaven in Revelation 5:12, 13; 7:12. These blessings show the Jewish context in which the church was born.

The use of effective blessings continues in much the same vein in the apostolic fathers (see Apostolic Fathers). People are blessed as when Ignatius calls the Ephesian and Magnesian churches to whom he writes blessed by God (Ign. Eph. presc.; Ign. Magn. presc.; cf. Herm. Vis. 1.3.4.). Polycarp blesses God for allowing him to suffer martyrdom (Mart. Pol. 14.2-3). In contrast to developments in Judaism, the blessing of God seems to have been replaced by thanksgiving in the early church (Bradshaw, 31). Nevertheless, "the structure of prayer inherited from Judaism was still preserved—praise and thanksgiving leading to petition and intercession and concluding with a doxology" (Bradshaw, 63).

A special blessing developed among the apostolic fathers which may have roots in the practices of early Judaism. This blessing was actually a thanksgiving and was said in conjunction with the Lord's Supper (see Lord's Supper). *Didache 9.1 begins, "Concerning the Eucharist, celebrate Eucharist thus . . . " The Didache uses the Greek verb eucharisteō, "to give thanks," and the noun eucharistia, meaning "thanksgiving" as an act. So the prayers said before the cup and the bread begin with the phrase "We give thanks to you, our Father" (Did. 9.2, 3), and the prayer after the supper begins, "We give thanks to you, Holy Father" (Did. 10.2). This prayer parallels early Jewish prayers (Weinfeld, 436-37). Justin Martyr echoes Jewish qiddûšîm in his description of the prayer said at the Eucharist when he notes that the president gives praise and glory to the Father of the universe, but the actual words of the prayer are not recorded (Justin Martyr Apol. I 66).

2. Evaluative Blessing (makarismos).
The adjective makarios in Acts (except Acts 26:2), the General Epistles and Revelation is linked with the values and ideals of Christian subcultures. Those who live according to these values will experience well-being—if not now, in the future. Acts 20:35 is a dominical saying, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." James 1:12; 5:11; 1 Peter 3:14; 4:14 note that the person who endures trials (see Persecution, Suffering) is blessed. In James 1:25 it is the one who hears and does the law* who will be blessed, not the one who hears and forgets. The blessing here is most likely eschatological,* since the verb is future and because there is probably a verbal link with James 1:12. The chief value highlighted in these macarisms is an enduring obedience* in the face of trials and persecutions. It is this enduring obedience that will be rewarded with life in the end as well as maturity in the present.

There are seven benedictions in the book of Revelation, five of them spoken from heaven.* Each highlights a value of the early Christian community. The reader and the listeners of the prophecy* are blessed as they keep the things written (Rev 1:3). This blessing is repeated as a sort of framing device in the penultimate benediction of the book, "Blessed is the one who keeps the words of the prophecy of this book" (Rev 22:7). This value of hearing and doing also stands behind the blessing in Revelation 14:13, where those who die in the Lord are blessed because their works follow them.

In Revelation 19:9 those invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb are pronounced blessed. In Revelation 19:7 these are called the bride of Christ and are given clean white linen to make themselves ready. According to Revelation 19:8, the linen represents the righteous* acts of the saints. So again, the blessing is connected to the works of those who follow Christ.* These saints are also those who eagerly anticipate the coming of the Lord* (Rev 16:15). His sudden coming motivates them to keep their garments ready and available. This benediction is for those who remain faithful* in difficult times of waiting.

These same saints are blessed because they have a part in the first resurrection* (Rev 20:6). This benediction is slightly different in that these saints are both blessed and holy.* And they are blessed because they already have a part in the resurrection. Their blessedness here is not dependent on faithfulness but on participation in resurrection.

The final benediction (Rev 22:14) is directed to those who wash their garments. In the context of the book this can be nothing other than a symbol for conversion (Rev 7:14). These persons are blessed because they have the right to enter the heavenly city and partake of the tree of life.* This benediction "complete[s] a ring around the entire Christian Bible by reversing the prohibition of Genesis (3:22) and alluding to the solemn warning and invitation of Deuteronomy (4:2; 30:19)" (Urbrock, 760).

If all these benedictions are read together (and perhaps the number seven indicates that they should be), one can see that those who remain faithful in their actions in the face of persecution while waiting for the Lord are blessed. Faithfulness in persecution is one of the highest virtues* of the NT church. That faithfulness flows from "washing in the blood of the Lamb"—that is, cleansing from sin as a precondition to membership in the elect community.

The use of makarios, along with its verbal form, to denote evaluative blessing continues in the apostolic fathers. The Corinthians are blessed for their character and actions (1 Clem. 1.2-3), and the deacon who proves worthy is also blessed (Ign. Phld. 10.2). In two places Paul is called "blessed," presumably because of his special place in the church (Ign. Eph. 12.2; Ign. Pol. 3.2); here the term is an equivalent of "saintly" in the later sense.

See also PRAYER; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. "Amidah," "Benedictions," "Kiddush," EncJud; D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); P. F. Bradshaw, Daily Prayer in the Early Church: A Study of the Origin and Early Development of the Divine Office (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982); F. Hauck and G. Bertram, "μακάριος," TDNT 4:362-70; H.-G. Link and U. Becker, "Blessing," NIDNTT 1:206-18; W. J. Urbrock, "Blessings and Curses," ABD 1:755-61; M. Weinfeld, "Grace After Meals in Qumran," JBL 111 (1992) 427-40.

D. H. Johnson

BODY. See PSYCHOLOGY.

BORN AGAIN. See NEW BIRTH

BOWLS

The Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of) depicts a series of seven visions* in which seven bowls containing the seven last plagues ("last" because they bring to completion the wrath* of God* [Rev 15:1]) are given to seven angels* who are then summoned by a loud voice from the temple* to pour out their bowls on the earth (Rev 16:1).

1. The Context of the Bowls
2. The Seven Bowls

1. The Context of the Bowls.

The "bowls" constitute the third and climactic series of seven explicitly numbered judgments* in the book of Revelation. There are clear parallels between each member of this series and its like-numbered counterpart in the second series (the visions of the trumpets). Some of these judgments are also parallel to the plagues leading up to Israel's* exodus from Egypt (Ex 7:14—12:32). Unlike the preceding judgments, in which only a portion of the target group—one fourth in the case of the seals* (Rev 6:1—8:1); one third in the case of the trumpets (Rev 8:2—11:19)—is affected by the judgments, each of the plagues poured from the bowls affects the whole of the target group. Moreover, whereas in the judgments of the trumpets humans are not affected directly until the fifth judgment, humans are affected directly from the beginning of the judgments of the bowls.

The "earth" upon which the bowls are poured out could refer to earth as distinguished from heaven* or more probably "the land" (i.e., the land* of Israel). In both Greek and Hebrew the same word may denote earth as distinct from heaven, land as distinct from sea and land as a territorial or political entity, with the phrase "the land" often referring specifically to the land of Israel. The meaning in any specific text has to be determined from the context.

2. The Seven Bowls.

The first bowl is poured on the earth—the dry land as distinct from the bodies of water (cf. Rev 16:3-4)—afflicting with sores all those who had received the mark of the fearsome dragon-inspired beast* (Rev 13) and worshiped its image. This parallels the sixth plague on Egypt, in which the Egyptians were afflicted with boils (Ex 9:8-12).

The second and third bowls are poured out on the sea, the rivers and the sources of water, turning them to blood. All forms of aquatic life die, while humans who had been responsible for shedding the blood of God's servants* ("saints and prophets," Rev 16:6) find that they have no choice but to drink blood themselves. This parallels the first plague on Egypt, in which the Egyptian water sources were turned to blood (Ex 7:14-21).

As with the seven seals and the seven trumpets, the series of seven bowls is divided into subgroups. In this case the divisions occur between the third and fourth visions (the angel of the waters, together with the altar, acclaim God's justice in meting out appropriate punishment* on the enemies of his people, Rev 16:5-7) and between the sixth and seventh visions (the call to wakefulness in view of the impending coming of the Lord,* Rev 16:15), resulting in a 3+3+1 structure.

The pouring out of the fourth bowl on the sun results in scorching heat (Rev 16:8-9), a reversal of the promise* to the new people of God who are sealed in Revelation 7:16 as protection from the coming tribulation,* a reversal also of the promise to those Israelites who would return from captivity among the nations (Is 49:10) and of the promise of protection for those making the pilgrimage to Jerusalem* (Ps 121:5-6; see Old Testament in Revelation).

The fifth bowl is poured on the throne of the beast, resulting in darkness (Rev 16:10-11), as in the ninth plague on Egypt (Ex 10:21-23).

When the sixth angel pours his bowl on the river Euphrates, its waters dry up (Rev 16:12), thus eliminating the barrier that afforded protection to Israel from invasion by its enemies to the north. Demonic spirits gather "the kings of the whole world" to battle at "Armageddon," perhaps meaning "his fruitful mountain," "the desirable city" or "the mount of assembly" (cf. Is 14:13), all of which terms could refer to Jerusalem. If the traditional understanding, Mount Megiddo, is accepted, this is another instance of the reversal-of-the-exodus motif that occurs throughout the book. Megiddo was the site of a major victory in Israel's conquest of Canaan (Judg 5:19) but also, later, of a major defeat for Judah, when King Josiah met his death at the hands of the Egyptians under Pharaoh Neco (2 Kings 23:29-30; 2 Chron 35:20-24). This reversal of the exodus forms a parallel to the Seer's presentation of Jerusalem as the Egypt on which the plagues now fall (cf. Rev 11:8).

When the final bowl is poured into the air, thunder, lightning and a great earthquake result. The "great city" is split into three parts, and the "cities of the nations" fall. "Great Babylon" is given the wine of the fury of God's wrath to drink, and massive hailstones fall on people. The thunder and lightning, together with the hail, are parallel to the seventh plague on Egypt but probably allude also to Ezekiel 13:8-16, which prophesies that "great hailstones" will be a feature of the storm that will beat upon Jerusalem and break down its walls despite the "visions of peace" that the false prophets had proclaimed for the city (cf. Carrington, 65, 273).

Even more significant than the parallels between individual visions of bowls and particular OT passages is the overall picture portrayed by this series. The use of the term plague is significant because of its use in OT passages such as Exodus 23:30-33, Deuteronomy 28 and Leviticus 17-26. Leviticus 26:1-2 warns the Israelites against idolatry,* and that chapter also threatens the nation with "sevenfold punishment" for rejecting God's commandments* (Lev 26:18, 21, 23-24, 28). The targum on Isaiah 51:17, 22 uses an Aramaic loan word closely related to the Greek phialē ("bowl"; Sweet, 241). In the first of these texts Jerusalem is said to have "drunk at the hand of Yahweh the cup of his wrath, drunk to the dregs the bowl of staggering"; in Isaiah 51:22-23 Yahweh declares that the cup has been taken from his people and has instead been put into the hand of their tormentors.

B. J. Malina suggests that what the Seer saw, which then prompted his meditation on OT Scripture and its earlier interpretations, were bowl-shaped comets (Malina, 196).

See also REVELATION, BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. J. Beagley, The 'Sitz im Leben' of the Apocalypse with Particular Reference to the Role of the Enemies of the Church (BZNW 50; Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1987); G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (NCB; London: Oliphants, 1978); I. T. Beckwith, The Apocalypse of John: Studies in Introduction with a Critical and Exegetical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979 [1919]); G. B. Caird, The Revelation of St. John the Divine (HNTC; New York and Evanston: Harper & Row, 1966); P. Carrington, The Meaning of the Revelation (London: SPCK, 1931); R. H. Charles, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Revelation of St. John (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1920); J. M. Court, Myth and History in the Book of Revelation (London: SPCK, 1979); A. M. Farrer, The Revelation of St. John the Divine: Commentary on the English Text (New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1964); J. M. Ford, Revelation; Introduction, Translation and Commentary (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); H. W. Günther, Der Nah- und Enderwartungshorizont in der Apokalypse des heiligen Johannes (FBib 41; n.p.: Echter, 1980); J. Jeremias, "'Αρ Μαγεδών," TDNT 1:468; G. E. Ladd, A Commentary on the Revelation of John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972); E. Lohmeyer, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (3d. ed.; HNT 16; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1970); B. J. Malina, On the Genre and Message of Revelation: Star Visions and Sky Journeys (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); J. Sweet, Revelation (WPC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1979); H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes and Indices (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968 repr.); C. van der Waal, Openbaring van Jezus Christus: Inleiding en Vertaling (Groningen: De Vuurbaak, 1971); idem, Openbaring van Jezus Christus II: Verklaring (Oudkarspel: De Neverheid, 1981). A. J. Beagley BROTHERS OF JESUS. See RELATIVES OF JESUS.

C

CAIN. See ANCESTORS.

CANON

When speaking of canon in reference to the NT literature, the focus is specifically on that limited collection of Christian writings that was recognized by the church to be inspired by God and consequently to have divine authority in the church's life and ministry. As such these writings were also believed to reveal the truth and will of God for the Christian community. It is certain that the NT writings were not recognized as Scripture at the same time for all of the churches everywhere or even by churches in the same geographic location. The literature that was first acknowledged in the churches as Scripture and eventually formed the core of the biblical canon included the four Gospels (see DJG, Canon), the epistles of Paul (see DPL, Canon) and Acts, but there were differences even at the beginning between those (Ebionites*) who believed that Matthew better represented who Jesus was than did Paul (Hellenistic* Christians). The literature that took the longest to gain near universal approval in the churches as canonical was Hebrews,* the General Epistles—except 1 Peter* and 1 John*—and Revelation.* The following discussion will focus especially on the early use and recognition of the authority of Acts, Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation.

1. The Canonization Process
2. The Use and Authority of NT Writings
3. The Muratorian Fragment
4. Summary

1. The Canonization Process.

The recognition of the sacred and canonical status of the NT writings in the church was a long and complicated process beginning in the early part of the second century when some of these writings began to be used by the apostolic fathers* to support their teachings. The process was largely completed by the end of the fourth century, but never fully so. The NT writings were seldom directly mentioned by name in the second century and generally not called Scripture or any other similar terminology, though there were some notable exceptions (see McDonald 1995, chap. 6). Later in the second century, many of these writings were employed in arguments against heresies and heretics in the church such as the Marcionites,* Gnostics* and Montanists.

The final stages of the closing of the NT canon came in the early part of the fourth century during the empire-wide Diocletian persecutions* in the years 303-313. This included the forcing of Christians to hand over their sacred writings to the Romans to be burned (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 8.2.1-5 for a description). When the persecution began, churches had to decide, if they had not done so already, which books were sacred to them and which could be handed over to the authorities. They tried to preserve the sacred Scriptures often by handing over to the authorities only the writings of lesser importance. At that time there was no universal agreement on the books of the Christian canon nor had any church councils taken place to decide the matter. As the various lists of Christian Scriptures began to appear in the fourth and fifth centuries, there was no unanimous or simultaneous agreement on what comprised these collections, but in the first third of the fourth century there was general agreement about accepting the four Gospels, Acts, the epistles of Paul (numbering thirteen or fourteen letters depending on whether Hebrews was included as a letter of Paul), 1 Peter and 1 John. Some doubts persisted, however, in regard to the status of Hebrews, the remaining five of the General (Catholic) Epistles, and Revelation. Acts was received rather early because of its association with the Gospel of Luke, but by the early second century it was circulating separately from the Gospel and, though often cited, it was not yet called Scripture in the second century. On the other hand, some noncanonical writings were also contenders for inclusion, for instance, the *Shepherd of Hermas, 1 Clement, the letters of Ignatius and even the pseudepigraphal Wisdom of Solomon, which showed up in some NT collections in the fourth century.

The generally accepted criteria for canonicity, however unevenly applied by the early church, included: (1) apostolicity, that is, whether a writing was written by an apostle (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.4-7); (2) orthodoxy, whether the writing conformed to a widely accepted canon of faith, or regula fidei (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.6-7 and also Serapion's criteria for his rejection of the use and reading of the Gospel of Peter in his churches [c. 195] discussed in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.12.1-6); (3) antiquity, whether it was written during the apostolic period (see the Muratorian Fragment, lines 73-74); and (4) usage, whether it was generally accepted in prominent or large numbers of churches and used in their worship and catechetical programs (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.24.18 and 3.25.6). The recognition of the inspiration of a writing was not so much a criterion for inclusion as it was a corollary of its acceptance in the church's scriptural canon.

The earliest extant list, or catalogue, of the Christian writings as a sacred collection comes to us from Eusebius of Caesarea (c. 320-30), who made a list of "canonical" (he calls them endiathēkē, "encovenanted") books. Even though he reported that some lists preceded his, including lists supposedly from Clement of Alexandria and Origen (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.5-7 and 6.25.3-14 respectively), these lists were more likely inventions of Eusebius which he constructed from his own tabulation of the references to the NT Scriptures that Clement and Origen cited. No such lists or discussions of canon collections are to be found in the extant writings of either Clement or Origen (see argument of Kalin, 274-82). Thus Eusebius seems to have presented the church with its first list of Christian Scriptures along with a brief categorization listing the NT books either as "recognized" (homologoumena), "disputed" (antilegomena) or "spurious" (notha) (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.1-7, but see also 3.3.1-2, 6).

In the second century the NT writings were not generally called Scripture (graphē), even though there were a number of writers who already had begun to designate some of them by that and other similar terms (e.g., "it is written," "the Scripture says," "that which is written," etc.) at various times throughout that century (see, e.g., 2 Pet 3:15-16, Pol. Phil. 12.1; 1 Clem. 2.4; Barn. 4.14; Justin Dial. Tryph. 100-103; and Apollinarius at the end of the second century in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.16.3).

As the church faced major threats from what it considered heretical groups (the Marcionites, Gnostics and Montanists), writers often referred to or cited the NT writings (especially Matthew and the letters of Paul) to answer these challenges. Although some scholars insist that the church responded to these concerns with a canon of Scripture in the second century, there is no evidence to support that claim. Rather, it responded with a canon of truth (regula fidei) that it believed was transmitted by the earliest witnesses themselves (the apostles). This canon of truth, a summary of the essence of the Christian faith that was believed to have been transmitted or handed down from the apostles to a succession of bishops in the churches, was most clearly set forth by Irenaeus (Haer. 1.10.1; 3.4.2) and was illustrated or supported by the writings that the church believed had come from persons in the earliest period of the church.

By the fourth century, however, there was a certain move toward a standardization of the contents of the biblical collection of Scriptures in various churches. The literature that was questioned, or "doubted," in Eusebius's collection (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.4-7) in the early fourth century eventually found a secure place in most of the biblical canons by the end of that century, even though unanimity was never found. For example, in the East the Syriac Peshitta and other Syrian translations of the NT writings for centuries regularly excluded 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude and Revelation. A number of writings that held a high place in the esteem of some churches in the fourth and fifth centuries—for example, 1 Clement, Hermas and Barnabas—were listed with other Christian Scriptures of the NT in the primary codexes Sinaiticus, Alexandrinus and Claromontanus. Eventually these and other writings were eliminated from the canonical lists of most of the later churches, while the canonical Gospels, Acts and the letters of Paul obtained a prominent place in all such lists, even though their sequence varied within the collections. At the beginning of this standardization, or canonization, period, however, several writings—Hebrews, the General Epistles (except 1 Peter and 1 John) and Revelation—often found a troubled reception in the churches. They were finally admitted into the canons after several centuries of debate, but not unanimously or without suspicion.

After Eusebius numerous collections or lists of sacred Scriptures appeared in the churches and were discussed at various church councils in the late fourth and fifth centuries, for example, the council of Rome in 382 and especially those councils at Laodicea in 397 and 419. The varied acceptance of this literature as Scripture and ultimately as canonical had much to do with the prior experiences and beliefs of those communities that so acknowledged them. For example, in the first century the church was divided over whether Paul, reflecting Gentile Christianity and freedom from the law, or Matthew and James, exhibiting Jewish Christianity (see Jewish Christianity), better represented the essence of Christian faith. In the middle- to late-second century, the Gospel of John was more highly prized in Asia Minor than were the other Gospels, not only by the Montanists but also by others (e.g., Irenaeus who came from Asia Minor and relocated in Gaul), whereas the Gospel of Matthew was by far the more popular Gospel in most of the Eastern churches. After the major canonization period (fourth through the sixth centuries), there were still many differences of opinion in the churches over some books of the canon. The various lists of NT Scriptures that were produced in that period demonstrate the lack of unanimity regarding the "fringe" areas of the biblical canon. (For a survey of the variations in the Scripture canons, see the lists reproduced in Souter 1917, Grosheide 1948, Bruce 1987, Metzger 1987, McDonald [1988] 1995, Hahneman 1992, and Patzia 1995.)

The primary factors leading to a focus on a closed canon of Scripture is never spelled out in the church fathers, but it appears that the persecutions of Christians and the consequent burning of books in the early fourth century may have initiated that process for at least some of the churches. More important for the final stages of canonization, however, was Constantine's call for unity in the churches (see McDonald 1995, chap. 7). Added to this was Constantine's ordering (or requesting) that some fifty copies of the Scriptures be produced by Eusebius to be used in the churches of the new Rome (Constantinople). These copies received the emperor's approval and support, and must therefore have had some importance in the churches of that region, if not in the whole of the Empire. Therefore, both Eusebius's role in the selection and production of these Scriptures and Constantine's acceptance of them probably influenced many churches in the final stages of their selection process, especially those churches in the eastern part of the Empire.

The notion of a standard, or canon, by which other things can be measured was present long before the Christian community, but the notion of a fixed biblical canon emerged during a time when the Empire was focusing on religious uniformity, accompanied by demands on all subjects to return to the ancient pagan religion. That focus began with the Diocletian persecutions (303-310) and continued in a different form in the church during the reign of Constantine, who did not hesitate to impose religious norms on the church in order to establish such unity (McDonald 1995, chap. 7). It is interesting that in this context of religious conformity, the impulse to define a canon emerged.

2. The Use and Authority of New Testament Writings.

With regard to the canonization of Acts, Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation, it is important to remember that citations of these writings in the early church fathers does not necessarily mean that they were accepted as Scripture by the writers that used them. Further, even when these books were referred to as Scripture by an ancient writer, not all Christians of the same location or era drew the same conclusions about them. The following is a brief survey of the use, acceptance and recognition of these Scriptures in the ancient churches. Inferences of this for the formation of the NT canon must be drawn with care, keeping the above qualifications in mind. Once their authority was established or recognized, their inclusion into a fixed canon generally followed. This process began, however, by the early church's use of these writings.

2.1. Acts. References to the Book of Acts* are rather vague until the time of Justin Martyr (155-60). It has been argued that the Pastoral Epistles made use of Acts, but that is highly unlikely and few scholars make a direct connection. The similarities between Acts and the Pastorals include references to ordination, to the laying on of hands (Acts 13:3), the association of the institution of elders with the Apostle Paul (Acts 14:23; 15:22-23; cf. 1 Tim 5:17-19), the reference to the mother of Timothy (Acts 16:1; cf. 2 Tim 1:5) and an allusion to Paul's ministry in Lystra, Iconium and Derbe (Acts 14:1-7; cf. 2 Tim 3:11). These examples do not necessarily involve dependence. They could easily be the result of oral or written tradition common to both, and since there are no exact word parallels, the strength of the case for dependence is not convincing.

There are a number of similarities in content between Acts and other late first- and early to middle second-century documents, but again, a clear dependence is difficult to establish. What may better explain the parallels is that the ancient sources shared a common oral or written tradition (see other parallels of substance: 1 Clem. 2:2, cf. Acts 2:17; 1 Clem. 5.4, 7, cf. Acts 1:25; Pol. Phil. 2.3, cf. Acts 20:35; Pol. Phil. 6.3, cf. Acts 7:52; Pol. Phil. 12.2, cf. Acts 2:5 and 4:12; allusions in Pol. Phil. 12.2, cf. Acts 8:31 and 20:32; 2 Clem. 20.5, cf. Acts 3:15 and 5:31; 2 Clem. 4.4, cf. Acts 4:19; Herm. Sim. 9.28.2, cf. Acts 5:41, 9:16, 15:26; 1 Clem. 59.2, cf. Acts 26:18; Barn. 7:2, cf. Acts 10:42; Pol. Phil. 1.2, cf. Acts 2:24; Barn. 19.8 and Did. 4.8, cf. Acts 4:32; 1 Clem. 18.1, cf. Acts 13:22; 1 Clem. 2.1 and Did. 1.5, cf. Acts 20:35).

Justin shows awareness of Acts as a written source (Justin Apol. I 50.12, cf. Lk 23:49; 24:25; and 24:44-45), but he omits referring to Acts either as Scripture or as an authoritative source (see also Justin Apol. I 39.3, cf. Acts 4:13; Apol. I.49.5 cf. Acts 13:48; Apol. II 10.6, cf. Acts 17:23 for other but less obvious parallels). His argument with Trypho regarding foods* (Dial. Tryph. 20:3ff.) could have been considerably enhanced had he appealed to Acts 10:14 or 15:29. The Martyrs of Lyons (preserved in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.2.5) also have impressive word parallels with Acts, which strongly suggests dependence. Irenaeus is the first to use Acts in an authoritative manner and is the first of the church fathers to quote the book by name and at length (see, e.g., his Haer. 1.6.3; 1.23.1, 2, 3; 2.23.3; 3.1.1; 3.12.1, etc.; cf. also Haer. 1.26.3 with Acts 6:1-6; 3.12.1 with Acts 1:16-17; the story of the Ethiopian eunuch in Acts 8 is recounted in Haer. 4.23.2). In numerous cases there is clear dependence, and Irenaeus views Acts as a valuable source for substantiating his arguments against heresy in the church.

In the second century Acts was not yet cited as "Scripture," nor was it found in any collections of sacred literature. The appeals to the book, however, continued on in the third century and even increased. Tertullian made considerable use of Acts in his arguments against what he considered heresy (Marc. 5.1-2 and De Praesc. 22). There are also word parallels to Acts in the Anti-Marcionite Gospel Prologues (c. late second century). In the fourth century Eusebius had no hesitation in placing the book among the collection of "recognized" (homologoumena) writings (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.1; but also Hist. Eccl. 3.4.1 where he acknowledges that Luke, the companion of Paul, is also the author of the Acts). He cites Acts as a historical text (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.22.1, 6, 7) and is the earliest writer to include it in a list of Scriptures (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.4.6).

Normally in the lists of canonical books, Acts served as a bridge between the Gospels and Paul's letters, but often this was not the case (see lists by Mommsen/Cheltenham where Acts stands just before Revelation; Clermont, where Acts follows Revelation; Cyril of Jerusalem in his Cat. 4.33 and Athanasius in his thirty-ninth Festal Letter, who place Acts between the Gospels and the General Epistles, which are then followed by the Pauline epistles). In Epiphanius, Acts comes after the Pauline epistles and before the Catholic epistles (Epiphanius Haer. 76.5). Pope Innocent placed Acts after all of the epistles and just before Revelation.

Barrett has suggested that rather than use Acts, Marcion may have substituted his own Antitheses (see Barrett 1:47), but what is clear is that Luke and Acts were separated by the time of Marcion (c. 140) (Barrett, 1:47). There apparently was no time in the second-century church or later when Luke and Acts were circulated together and, consequently, it may be concluded that they probably circulated separately by the end of the first century if not sooner. The early acceptance of Acts probably has more to do with its association with Luke's Gospel than with any other single factor.

2.2. Hebrews. The canonical status of Hebrews* was ensured when a second-century editor (possibly Pantaenus, the director of a theological school in Alexandria c. 170) incorporated this writing into the Pauline corpus. After that, Hebrews' authoritative status was never questioned in Alexandria. Eventually the Syrian* churches also agreed that Hebrews was written by Paul, and they eventually received it into their Scripture canon. The book was both known and quoted in the east and west, but that did not mean that the churches in the west accepted it as Scripture. Clement* of Rome, for example, made obvious use of Hebrews and incorporated its words into his letter without referring to it as Scripture or making any direct reference to the letter or its author (see 1 Clem. 9.3, cf. Heb 11:5; 1 Clem. 10.7, cf. Heb 11:17; 1 Clem. 17.1, cf. Heb 11:37; 1 Clem. 21.1, cf. Heb 12:1, and esp. 1 Clem. 36.1-5, cf. Heb 2:18; 3:1; 1:3-4, 7, 13). Other parallels appear in Justin Martyr (c. 160) who, like the author of Hebrews 3:1, strangely refers to Christ as an "apostle" (Apol. I 1.12, 63; other parallels are found in his Dial. Tryph. 34, cf. Heb 8:7; Dial. Tryph. 13, cf. Heb 9:13-14; Dial. Tryph. 67, cf. Heb 12:18-19).

When Eusebius concluded that it was "obvious and plain" that Hebrews was one of fourteen letters by Paul, he conceded that others questioned that view, noting that even the church in Rome had denied its Pauline authorship (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.3.4-5). It is clear that authorship of the book was central to its acceptance in the churches.

Clement of Alexandria was evidently the first of the fathers to maintain that Paul had written Hebrews, but he also claimed that it was originally written in Hebrew and that Luke translated it into Greek, leaving off Paul's name so as not to offend the Jewish Christians who were prejudiced against him (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.2-4). Although Origen acknowledged that others "with good reason" accepted Hebrews as Paul's letter, he admits that "who wrote the epistle, in truth God knows," but notes that some of his contemporaries believed that Clement of Rome wrote it while others thought that it was Luke (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.25.11-14). Tertullian later claimed that Barnabas wrote Hebrews (Tertullian De Pud. 20). In all of these cases, authorship was the basis for acceptance into the canon, quite apart from the basis for acceptance today, which is essentially the value of the message for the life and ministry of the Christian community.

Hebrews had a questionable position in the Syriac Peshitta and was placed after the epistles of Paul, not unlike in the current biblical canon where its position is somewhat equivocal. Later, Augustine and Jerome had doubts about the authorship of Hebrews, but they nevertheless accepted it as Paul's so as to ensure its inclusion in the biblical canon. Jerome observed that the churches to his west (the "Latins") "do not receive it among the canonical Scriptures as St. Paul's" (Jerome Ep. ad Dard. 129). Eventually in the fourth and fifth centuries, the book was included in many of the Scripture canons of the west, at first by the Synod of Hippo in 393, and then by the Third and Sixth Synods of Carthage in 397 and 419 respectively.

2.3. The General Epistles. This collection of seven letters (James, 1-2 Peter, 1-2-3 John, Jude) are called "catholic" or "general" because of their encyclical nature; namely, they were intended for a wider or more general audience rather than for a specific church or individual as in the case of the letters of Paul. The term catholic appears to have originated in the latter part of the second century when it was used by Apollonius (died c. 185) to describe a letter (katholikē epistolē) composed by a Montanist named Themiso (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.18.5). Clement of Alexandria called the letter that came from the council in Jerusalem in Acts 15:22-29 a "catholic epistle," written by all of the apostles. In the early third century Origen also designated the Epistle of Barnabas (c. 140) as a "catholic epistle" (Origen Cont. Cels. 1.63). The term had nothing to do with the canonical nature of the letters, but rather their general appeal. It was later used of the seven letters that are now called the General or Catholic Epistles by Eusebius in the fourth century (Hist. Eccl. 2.23.24-25 and 6.14.1) and later by Athanasius who in his thirty-ninth Festal Letter (39.5) called this collection the "seven catholic epistles."

2.3.1. James. This small book had a mixed reception in early Christianity as a result of its apparent contradiction of Paul's teaching on faith and works (see Faith and Works). In Eusebius James* was classified as one of the disputed writings (antilegomena; Hist. Eccl. 3.25.3), and it is missing from several of the fourth-century lists of NT books. Earlier, Clement* of Rome (c. 95) knew of James, and without mentioning it by name he used it to balance the teaching of Paul on the issue of works and the law versus faith (see 1 Clem. 3, 5, 17, and especially 21, but also 30, 33, 35, 38, 40, 46, 53). Clement did not neglect the need for faith but like James also insisted on the importance of good works. There are further parallels of thought with the *Didache (see Did. 2.4, cf. Jas 3:6-10; Did. 4.3, cf. Jas 1:8, 4:8; and Did. 4.14, cf. Jas 5:16). Mayor has noted numerous parallels in thought (but not always with clear dependence upon James) in the writings of Ignatius, Barnabas, Polycarp, Hermas, Diognetus and Justin (Mayor, lxxiii-lxxix).

Eusebius says that Clement of Alexandria commented on all of the canonical [lit., "encovenanted"] Scriptures, not passing over even the disputed writings, namely, Jude and the rest of the "catholic epistles" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.1-3). It is not clear, however, what books he had in mind, and he nowhere mentions the epistle of James by name. Origen, who was the first person to refer to the letter as Scripture, claimed that it was written by James the brother of Jesus (Comm. Joh. 19.6; compare Sel. in Exod. 15.25). Later the same view emerges in Dionysius of Alexandria (c. 250-65) where he cites James 1:17 (Comm. in Lucam) and refers to God speaking. A similar reference is found in Gregory Thaumaturgus (c. 250-65) whose Fragment is cited in Catena. James's inclusion in the NT canon was widespread at the end of the fourth century, but it was not universal. Even in the sixteenth century it was held in suspicion by Martin Luther. (For a detailed examination of the use and citations of James in the early church fathers, see Mayor, lxvi-lxxxiv.)

2.3.2. 1 Peter. Although there are several parallel phrases in Barnabas and 1 Peter (e.g., Barn. 5.6, cf. 1 Pet. 1:20), it is only with Polycarp* that direct use is first found among the apostolic fathers (see, e.g., Phil. 1.3, cf. 1 Pet. 1:8; Phil. 10.2, cf. 1 Pet. 2:12). The author of 2 Peter (see 2 Peter) refers to the existence of an earlier letter by Peter (2 Pet 3:1) and, depending on the dating of 2 Peter,* this may be the oldest reference to 1 Peter. Eusebius claimed that Papias (c. 100-150) knew and used 1 Peter (Eusebius Hist. Eccl 3.39.17) and added it to his own recognized books (in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.3.1; 3.25.1-2). Irenaeus appears to have been the first to refer to 1 Peter by name (Haer. 4.9.2; 4.16.5; 5.7.2), and thereafter many references were made to the book by the early church fathers. There is a very strong early witness to the usefulness of the letter in various Christian communities, and it does not appear to have been seriously questioned in the fourth century even though it is absent from the Muratorian Fragment. One explanation for this may be that the Fragment is incomplete, that is, it is a fragment, and its original form may have incorporated it, but this is all supposition. Eusebius claims that only one letter from Peter was admitted to the recognized collection, even though he was aware of another having been written in Peter's name (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.3.1-4).

2.3.3. 2 Peter. Essentially 2 Peter* was under suspicion in much of the church until the time of Athanasius's publication of his thirty-ninth Festal Letter in 367. Eusebius rejected it (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.3) and was aware of widespread doubts about its authenticity (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.3.1-4), and the Syrian churches held it in question until the sixth century. It is missing from the recension of Lucian of Antioch and the most prominent church fathers from Antioch. John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia never refer to it even though it is almost certain that they knew of it. Athanasius of Alexandria apparently set the stage for the acceptance of both 2 Peter and Jude into the Christian NT canon, but their witness was being questioned even as late as the Reformation when Martin Luther concluded that the Christian message did not shine well through them. The use of 2 Peter in the early Christian churches was limited and mixed at best.

2.3.4. 1 John. This was one of the earliest books apart from the Gospels and Epistles of Paul to be acknowledged as Scripture and subsequently to be included as part of the Christian canon (see John, Letters of). Both Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.24.17) and Origen, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 6.25.10), accepted this book as a part of their sacred collection of Christian Scriptures. It was cited in an authoritative manner by Irenaeus (Haer. 3.17.5, 8), Clement of Alexandria (Frag. Adum.) and Tertullian Prax. 15; Marc. 5.16; Scorp. 12). Apart from the Alogoi from Asia Minor in the last third of the second century, who rejected the Gospel of John, Acts and Revelation (see Irenaeus' report in Haer. 3.11.12), and probably 1 John as well, few others were opposed to the authenticity of this letter and most writers of antiquity agreed that John had written it. Eusebius in the fourth century states that very few leaders of the church ever questioned its authenticity (Hist. Eccl. 3.3.1-5 and 3.25.1-3). It appears that it was accepted into the Syriac Peshitta version no later than the fifth century, but it was evidently not included in the early stages of its formation.

The first clear citation of the letter appears in Polycarp (Pol. Phil. 7) and Justin (Dial. Tryph. 123.9, see also the possible reference in Ign. Eph. 7.2; Diogn. 10.3). The gnostic Gospel of Truth may allude to 1 John (see Gos. Truth 27.24 and 31.4-5), but that is not certain. Again, allusions and citations in themselves do not necessarily imply that a writing was accepted as Scripture or that it was a part of some fixed biblical canon, but the kind of use that this letter received in the early church shows clearly that there was widespread acknowledgment of its authority, and its use is abundant in the church fathers. When canon lists of Christian scriptures first appeared in the fourth century, 1 John was regularly included.

2.3.5. 2 and 3 John. These two small letters (see John, Letters of) have very little attestation prior to the fourth century, and both Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.25.3) and Origen (Comm. Joh. 5.3, see the quote in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.25.10, which is probably a Eusebian invention) omit them from the recognized (homologoumena) writings. Prior to that time there is very little ancient testimony that speaks either to the existence or the authority of these letters. There are possible parallels in content in the apostolic fathers, but they are not conclusive (see, e.g., Pol. Phil. 7.2, cf. 2 John 7 and 1 Jn 4:2; Ign. Smyrn. 4.1, cf. 2 Jn 10-11; cf. also Tertullian, De Car. 24). Better information is available on the use of 2 John from the time of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 2.15.66), but references to 3 John are missing (Irenaeus quotes 2 Jn 11 and 7 in Haer. 3.17.8). According to Eusebius, Dionysius of Alexandria knew of all three epistles of John (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 7.25.11), but in regard to authorship he concludes "that the writer of these words, therefore, was John, one must believe since he says it. But what John, is not clear" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 7.25.12, LCL trans.).

Irenaeus and Tertullian do not mention 3 John and even the fourth-century Muratorian Fragment (lines 68-69) knew of only two letters of John. Cyprian (fl. c. 240-50) frequently referred to 1 John, but also cited 2 John 10-11 in his Sententiae Episcoporum 81. Elsewhere in the fourth century the three epistles were known, but the second and third were not yet generally accepted among the churches as Scripture or placed in a collection of Scriptures. They were included in lists from Athanasius's thirty-ninth Festal Letter (c. 367), Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 4.36) and the Mommsen Catalogue (c. 360 in North Africa), but doubts continued to be expressed about their canonicity by Jerome in his De Viris Illustribus 9, 18 (c. 420). There apparently was a time when only two epistles of John were accepted in the west and also in Alexandria. Churches under the leadership of Antioch generally accepted only James, 1 Peter and 1 John of the seven General Epistles. Chrysostom, who moved from Antioch to Constantinople in 398, refers only to those three General Epistles. This was also true of the Cappadocian Fathers, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus and Gregory of Nyssa, at the end of the fourth century. Outside of appearances in canonical lists, there appear to have been no certain references to 3 John until the time of Jerome and Augustine. Both 2 and 3 John had a slim history of use in the church until the fifth century, even though they both appear in lists of canonical Scriptures (e.g., Athanasius) generally dated earlier than the treatises which appeal to their authority and reception. Churches that followed the Syriac Peshitta did not include 2 and 3 John until the production of the Philoxenian version in 508.

Although some scholars have argued that 2 and 3 John were circulated at first as one epistle, hence their common designation under one name, and consequently there were only two epistles mentioned in some lists, the evidence for this is not at all convincing. Others, with admittedly even less evidence to support their thesis, have tried to change the meaning of the Muratorian Fragment from two to one catholic epistle (1 Jn) and two others (see Schnackenburg, 274).

2.3.6. Jude. The use and citation of Jude in the ancient church was common, and numerous parallels exist in the second and third centuries. But there is a mixed reception in the fourth century because of Jude's use of 1 Enoch (for early parallels of thought and possible use, see Pol. Phil. 3.2, cf. Jude 3, 20; Pol. Phil. 11.4, cf. Jude 20, 23; Barn. 2.10, cf. Jude 3, 4; as well as Athenagoras, Suppl. 24-25; Theophilus of Antioch, Autol. 2.15; and Clement of Alexandria in his Paed. 3.8.44, who quotes Jude 5, 6 by name and later in 3.8.45 quotes Jude 11). Clement of Alexandria quotes Jude 8-16 and mentions Jude by name (Strom. 3.2.11), and Eusebius claims that Clement accepted "even the disputed writings," including Hebrews, Barnabas, 1 Clement and Jude (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.13.6 and 6.14.1). Tertullian implies that Jude was known in Latin translation to his readers (De Cult. Fem. 1.3), but later Eusebius suggests that Jude came under suspicion after the time of Clement, possibly even by Origen (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.13.6 and 6.14.1).

Origen knew of questions about Jude, but he does not appear to have expressed them himself and variously cites the book (see Comm. Mt. 17.30 where he quotes Jude 6 and again in 10.17 where he refers to Jude as a servant of "our Lord Jesus Christ and a brother of James." See also Comm. Joh. 13.37, cf. Jude 6; Hom. Ez. 4.1, cf. Jude. 8-9; and in De Princ. 3.2.1, where he shows awareness of the book). In the case of 2 Peter, Origen was aware of doubts about the book, but that did not deter him from using it. He may have been attracted to 2 Peter and Jude because of their angelology.*

The widely acknowledged use of Jude in 2 Peter gives further witness to the widespread use of the epistle. The book was fully accepted as canon by Athanasius, however, in his canon of 367. The stormy reception of Jude in the fourth and fifth centuries came primarily as a result of its use of 1 Enoch (Jude 14). In the early part of the second century, but generally throughout the first two centuries, the Book of Enoch was accepted as an inspired writing and therefore was considered sacred in many Christian communities (see Non-Canonical Citations).

Jude's appeal to Enoch, therefore, was not a problem in the Christian communities in the beginning of the church. Only in the third century and later do we find doubts expressed about the canonicity of Enoch, mostly because of its attributing carnal lust to heavenly beings. Consequently in the fourth century and later, Jude's use of Enoch led to questions about its own place in the Scripture canon. Enoch was used by the author of the Assumption of Moses, the apocryphal book of Jubilees, the Apocalypse of Baruch (c. A.D. 70), and even by the author of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. In the Christian era, the author of Epistle of Barnabas cites the book some three times, and in two of those instances he refers to Enoch as Scripture (see Barn. 4.3 which begins, "it was written as Enoch says," and Barn. 16.5 citing Enoch 89.55, 66, 67, beginning with the words, "For the Scripture says"). Eusebius lists Jude among the "doubted" (antilegomena) writings in the church (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.3, see also Hist. Eccl. 2.23.25), and even Jerome, who accepted its authenticity, felt obligated to deal with the issue of Jude's use of Enoch (Vir. 4). Didymus of Alexandria (c. 395) defended Jude against those who attacked its use of Enoch (Migne, PG 39.1811-18). Interestingly, Bigg suggests that the offense leveled against Jude in the fourth century was not that Jude made use of Enoch, as other Christian writers had done, but that he referred to the writing specifically by name (309-10)! He also claims that 1 and 2 Peter, along with Jude, made use of Jewish apocalypses in much the same manner, and that they exhibited characteristics that were common to their Jewish education. Although Jude goes further than the other two epistles when he cites Enoch by name, Bigg claims that Jude is nonetheless within the context of the practice of the writers of his age and within the bounds of acceptable "spiritual perception which distinguishes the Church from the sectarians" (Bigg, 310).

Except for James, 1 Peter and 1 John, the General Epistles were not widely known in the churches throughout the second century, and they were variously disputed in the fourth and fifth centuries and even later. Further, the literature that informed the life and ministry of the churches in the second century was, in some notable cases (1 Enoch, Eldad and Modad, 1 Clement, letters of Ignatius, Shepherd of Hermas and others) somewhat different from that which informed the churches in the fourth to the sixth centuries, the period of canonization.

2.4. Revelation. There are a number of parallels but no certain traces of the Revelation,* or Apocalypse, in the apostolic fathers. The closest parallels, of course, come from the Visions of the *Shepherd of Hermas, where some of the same imagery is used (Herm. Vis. 2.4, cf. Rev 12:1; Herm. Vis. 4.6-10, cf. Rev 13; Herm. Vis. 4.1, 6, cf. Rev 9:3). In Revelation 21:14 the names of the apostles are on the foundation stones of the

New Jerusalem (see Jerusalem), and in Hermas, Vision 5.5.1, the apostles and other teachers of the church form the foundation stones. Also, the faithful in Revelation and in Hermas are given white robes and crowns to wear (Rev 2:10; 3:11; 6:11, cf. Herm. Sim. 8.2.1, 3; notice also that Herm. Vis. 2.2.7; 4.2.5; 4.3.6 are similar to Rev 7:14 and close to Rev 3:10; Herm. Vis. 1.1.3 is similar also to Rev 17:3). Along with this, there appear to be several parallels in words and thoughts between Revelation and other of the apostolic fathers, for example, Barnabas 21.3 probably depends on Revelation 22:10, and Barnabas 7.9 is close to Revelation 1:7, 13. Again, however, the work is not cited by name in the apostolic fathers.

Charles claims that Revelation was all but universally accepted (and consequently used in an authoritative manner) in Asia Minor, western Syria, Africa, Rome and southern Gaul in the second century (Charles, I.xcvii-ciii). Justin appears to have been the first to say that Revelation was written by John the apostle of Christ (Justin Dial. Tryph. 81:15, cf. also Apol. I 28, which refers to Rev 12:9). According to Eusebius, Apollonius used Revelation in the second century to write against the Montanists (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.18.14). Clement of Alexandria (Paed. 2.119) cites Revelation as Scripture and as the work of John the Apostle (see Quis Div. 42 and Strom. 6.106-107).

At various periods Revelation also had a mixed reception in the church, especially in the eastern churches. The Alogoi of the second century rejected the writing altogether and, according to Eusebius, Dionysius of Alexandria wrote a critical appraisal of the authorship of the book (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 7.24-25) concluding that it was not written by John the Apostle. Eusebius himself placed Revelation among the doubtful books in his own collection of Christian writings (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.24.18; 3.25.4). Later, Cyril of Jerusalem rejected the book altogether and forbade its use in public or private (Cat. 4.36). Around 360, Revelation did not get included in the canon list of the Council of Laodicea nor in Canon 85 of the Apostolic Constitutions.

Most scholars have contended, as Charles has shown (Charles, 1:ci-ciii), that Revelation was ignored or largely rejected in the Eastern churches. On the other hand, some Eastern writers both accepted and referred to Revelation (see Andreas Caesariensis, Apoc. 34, Serm. 12 Oecumenius and Arethas, Comm. in Apoc. 12.7), including Melito* of Sardis who, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 4.26.2), wrote a book on it. Both Jerome (Vir. 24) and Theophilus of Antioch (Autol. 2.28) alluded to it, and the latter used its testimonies in a lost work against Hermogenes (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.24.1 for details here). Apollonius of Hierapolis (c. 186) used its testimonies (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.18.13), Clement of Alexandria quoted it approvingly (Paed. 1.6; 2.11; Strom. 6.13, 25), and Origen frequently cited the book of Revelation (De Princ. 1.2.10; 4.1.25; Comm. Joh. 1.1, 2, 14, 23, 42). Although citation does not prove the acceptance of this book as Scripture, it does show favor toward the work. All of these church fathers are from the East in the second and third centuries, and the most significant rejection of Revelation in the East did not occur until the end of the fourth century. Cyril of Jerusalem, for instance, appears to be the first to exclude Revelation without comment (Cat. 4.36), but Epiphanius of Salamis (Haer. 76.5) still included it at the end of the fourth century, as did Jerome (Ad Paul. Ep. 53) and Codex Alexandrinus (c. 425). The work was cited in an authoritative manner in many of the church fathers and on occasion even called "Scripture" when lists or canons of Scripture began to appear in the fourth century.

3. The Muratorian Fragment.

It is quite common today to speak of the Muratorian Fragment as if it were a late second-century document that expressed what the general understanding was regarding the extent of the biblical canon at that time. If it were a second century writing, however, it was without parallel until the fourth century and had no observable bearing on how others viewed the biblical canon in the second century. There are in fact no other discussions of a biblical canon in the second century nor of what form such a canon might take. The only parallels of a descriptive list of sacred Christian writings are found in the fourth century (esp. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25.1-7), and thus far no one has produced a parallel in the second century.

Interestingly, its author included the Wisdom of Solomon, a pseudepigraphal OT writing, in a NT canon (see the Murat. Frag. lines 69-70). The same writing was placed earlier in an OT list of Scriptures (Melito includes Wisdom in his OT Scripture list according to Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.26.12-14). It logically belongs with OT collections since it was written before the time of Christ. The only parallels to the Muratorian Fragment's reference to Wisdom in a NT list are found in fourth-century lists from the East (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.8.1-8 and Epiphanius Haer. 76.5). Further, the listing of the four canonical Gospels (the document is missing the opening section, but Luke is listed as the third Gospel) is strangely quiet about the discussions in the second-century churches over which gospel to use. If the Muratorian Fragment comes from the second century, why is there no defense of the four Gospels such as we see in Irenaeus (Haer. 3.11.8, 9), but also in Tertullian, as noted above, who distinguishes Matthew and John from Mark and Luke on apostolic grounds? For the many arguments against a second-century date and the western provenance of the Muratorian Fragment, see Hahneman, Sundberg and McDonald (1995, chap. 8). For opposing views, see Ferguson, Metzger and Bruce.

4. Summary.

The recognition of the literature of the NT as authoritative and useful in the life and worship of the church came earlier than its recognition as Scripture. In general the NT writings were not called Scripture in the second century even though they often functioned in that capacity for some Christians. By the end of the second century, the principle of a Christian Scriptures had already been recognized by vast segments of the Christian community. Acts appears to have been included in that sacred collection early as a result of its relation to the Gospel of Luke and eventually, when collections began to be made of Christian Scriptures, some churches began to place Acts between the Gospels and the Epistles of Paul as a bridge to the letters that reflected the growth and development of the early church. In other collections Acts appears later in the collection.

The reception of the General Epistles was always mixed in the early church. 1 Peter and 1 John were cited early by the major writers of the second century, but 2 Peter had a more difficult reception. James was a highly disputed book throughout the history of the church because of its supposed differences from the Apostle Paul on the issue of justification by faith. 2 John, 3 John and Jude likewise had something of a mixed reception in the churches until late in the fourth century even though some churches had recognized their authority earlier. The mere fact that these books survived the burning of books in the Diocletian persecution (303-310) attests to their acceptance in many churches.

Revelation was more generally accepted in the Western churches in the second and third centuries, and eventually also in the East in the fourth and fifth centuries as the surviving lists of NT writings show, even though it was favorably received in some sectors in the eastern churches but not in others. Today there are still Christian communities of the East (the Eastern Orthodox and the Nestorians) who either reject the canonicity of Revelation or neglect its use in their liturgies.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; APOSTOLIC FATHERS; HEBREWS; JAMES; JOHN, LETTERS OF; JUDE; MARCION; OLD TESTAMENT IN APOSTOLIC FATHERS; 1 PETER; 2 PETER; PSEUDEPIGRAPHY; REVELATION, BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. Aland, The Problem of the New Testament Canon (Oxford: Mowbray, 1962); J. Barr, Holy Scripture: Canon, Authority, Criticism (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983); C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Acts 1-14 (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); D. Barthélemy, "La Critique Canonique," RICP 36 (1991) 191-220; C. Bigg, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1902); F. F. Bruce, The Canon of Scripture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1988); H. von Campenhausen, The Formation of the Christian Bible (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); R. H. Charles, The Revelation of St. John (ICC; 2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1920); H. Conzelmann, Acts of the Apostles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); W. R. Farmer, Jesus and the Gospel: Tradition, Scripture and Canon (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); W. R. Farmer and D. M. Farkasfalvy, The Formation of the New Testament Canon (New York: Paulist, 1983); E. Ferguson, "Canon Muratori: Date and Provenance," SP 18 (1982) 677-83; H. Y. Gamble, "Canon: New Testament," ABD 1:852-61; idem, "The Canon of the New Testament" in The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989) 201-43; idem, The New Testament Canon: Its Making and Meaning (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); R. M. Grant, The Formation of the New Testament (New York: Harper & Row, 1965); F. W. Grosheide, ed., Some Early Lists of the Books of the New Testament. 1: Textus Minores (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1948); G. M. Hahneman, The Muratorian Fragment and the Development of the Canon. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1992); D. J. Harrington, "Introduction to the Canon," NIB 1:7-21; E. R. Kalin, "Re-examining New Testament Canon History: 1. The Canon of Origen," CTM 17 (1990) 274-82; J. T. Lienhard, The Bible The Church, and Authority: The Canon of the Christian Bible in History and Theology (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press/Michael Glazier, 1995); L. M. McDonald, The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon (rev. and exp. ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); idem, "The Integrity of the Biblical Canon in Light of Its Historical Development," BBR 6 (1996) 95-132; J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of James: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes, Comments and Further Studies in the Epistle of James (3d ed.; New York: Macmillan, 1913); B. M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987); A. G. Patzia, The Making of the New Testament. Origin, Collection, Text and Canon (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1995); G. A. Robbins, "Muratorian Fragment," ABD IV:928-29; R. Schnackenburg, The Johannine Epistles: Introduction and Commentary (New York: Crossroad, 1992); A. Souter, The Text and Canon of the New Testament (New York: Charles Scribners, 1917); A. C. Sundberg Jr., "Canon Muratori: A Fourth-Century List," HTR 66 (1973) 1-41.

L. M. McDonald

CATECHETICAL SCHOOL OF ALEXANDRIA.

See ALEXANDRIAN CHRISTIANITY.

CELIBACY.

See MARRIAGE, DIVORCE AND ADULTERY; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS.

CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY

Christianity spread from Jerusalem throughout the entire Mediterranean world. Cities in Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Egypt and Italy became important centers for the extension and ongoing development of Christianity (for one illustration of this development, see Worship). This essay will explore the contribution of these key cities in the early Christian movement through the middle of the second century.

1. Jerusalem
2. Antioch (Syria)
3. Ephesus (Asia Minor)
4. Corinth (Greece)
5. Alexandria (Egypt)
6. Rome (Italy)

1. Jerusalem.

Jerusalem* was not only the center of Jewish religion, it was also the cradle for the birth of Christianity. It was in this city that Jesus taught, died on the cross, rose from his tomb, and from where he ascended to the right hand of the Father. It was in this city that Jesus instructed his disciples to stay and receive the promised new-covenant outpouring of the Holy Spirit. And it was in this city that the first new community of Christians was formed when thousands believed in Jesus as Messiah and Lord in response to the Spirit-empowered message of Peter. Ironically (if we credit the tradition of the Christian's flight from Jerusalem to Pella) for a period of time less than forty years after the beginning of the Jerusalem church, no Christians remained in the city (see below). Nevertheless, the extensive movement that began in Jerusalem was stronger than ever.

For the first generation of Christianity, the city of Jerusalem was the hub of this new movement that was advancing in every direction. According to Luke, Jesus himself had intended that the gospel spread from this city to the entire then-known world (Acts 1:8). This happened right from the beginning when Jews from all over the Mediterranean world and the East were present for the Pentecost celebration and many became participants in the new movement (see Acts 2:5-12, 41). Although recorded history is silent about what happened to these people, we may assume that they returned to their various cities in the diaspora,* proclaimed Jesus as Messiah in their synagogues,* and started churches. This may explain the beginnings of Christian communities in places such as Damascus, Rome* and Alexandria.* Persecution also played a role in scattering Jerusalem Christians to various regions where they proclaimed the gospel of Christ. This resulted, for example, in Samaria* and Antioch* hearing the gospel (see Acts 8; 11:19-21).

The church of Jerusalem naturally assumed a leadership role in clarifying the beliefs and practices of this new movement. Luke represents "the teaching of the apostles" as foundational (Acts 2:42), out of which stemmed a set of oral traditions that spread beyond the city walls of Jerusalem. The inner group who had been with Jesus during his public ministry thus shaped the self understanding and beliefs of early Christianity at the beginning. Luke focuses primarily on the leadership of Peter, John and the two James. After the death of James the son of Zebedee (c. A.D. 44; Acts 12:1-2), James* the brother of the Lord (see Relatives of Jesus) emerged as a principal figure in the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:17; 15:13; Paul speaks of him, together with Peter and John, as one of the "pillar" apostles; cf. Gal 2:9).

Churches throughout the Mediterranean world developed to a large degree independently from Jerusalem. There is no evidence in Luke's account, for example, of embassies from Alexandria or Rome consulting the Jerusalem apostles. In spite of the absence of a networked institutionalization of authority, there appears to have been widespread and universal agreement among the churches in affirming that Christ* is the Son* of God and Messiah, that his death is an atoning sacrifice* for sins, that he died and rose from the dead, and that he will return (though variations on these themes were inevitable, e.g., see Christology; Eschatology). This was likely facilitated by apostolic traditions in oral form circulating widely from Jerusalem. The common experience of the Holy Spirit,* the empowering and unifying presence of Christ with his people, also served to constitute and establish these new communities.

The only hint we have of Jerusalem attempting to assert its authority over other churches is in the so-called Jerusalem Council (Acts 15). Luke reveals that a serious dispute arose in Antioch concerning the way and conditions of entry into the new community. He says that "certain people" (tines) came from Jerusalem teaching the necessity of circumcision* for salvation* (Acts 15:1). Luke implies to the reader that they were not explicitly commissioned by the leadership of the Jerusalem church. The Antioch church subsequently initiated a meeting in Jerusalem between Paul and Barnabas and the apostles to clarify this central issue. The interpretation of the so-called "Jerusalem Council" and its relationship to Galatians 1 and 2 has been widely discussed (see DPL, Jerusalem, Galatians). What is important for us to note here is that there was agreement between the Antiochian and Jerusalem representatives affirming salvation apart from circumcision and by grace* alone (Acts 15:11, 19, 28). There are no compelling reasons to think that Luke was merely trying to paper over an unbridgeable chasm that separated Jewish Christianity from Gentile Christianity (contra F. C. Baur; see Jewish Christianity). Although the Jerusalem church filled no institutional and authoritative role with respect to the Pauline mission to the Gentiles, this agreement was certainly a positive step in fostering the unity of the Jewish and Gentile* segments of the church and a significant affirmation of the Gentile mission.

The Jerusalem church faced persecution from the earliest stages and throughout its brief history (Acts 4:3-21; 5:17-42; 6:11-14; 7:54—8:3; 9:1-2; 11:19-20; 12:1-19). According to Eusebius, when the Jewish revolt broke out in A.D. 66, the Jerusalem Christians fled the city and migrated to Pella* in Perea (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.5.3-4). Some did return to Jerusalem after the war, but the city was no longer the "center" for Christianity that it once was. Hadrian's edict prohibiting any Jews from living in Jerusalem after the Bar Kokhba revolt of A.D. 132-35 had a drastic impact upon the Jerusalem church (see Christianity and Judaism).

Despite its status as the earliest center for Christianity, Jerusalem's literary output was meager. The letter of James* (and possibly Jude*) is the only Christian document stemming from the city (see Jewish Christianity). Here we need to be reminded of the predominance of oral traditions* of various sorts—hymns,* creeds,* stories* and other forms—that were passed on from Jerusalem (e.g., 1 Cor 15:3-5). Jerusalem fell into demise, but the apostolic traditions nurtured communities all over the world.

2. Antioch (Syria).

Nearly 300 miles to the north of Jerusalem in the province of Syria was a city that became a major center for Christianity as it spread to the Gentile world—Antioch on the Orontes (see Antioch; DPL, Antioch). The third largest city in the Roman empire with a population between one-quarter and a half-million people (Strabo Geog. 16.2.5; cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.52 and Pliny Nat. Hist. 6.122), Antioch was quite naturally a strategic location for the propagation of the gospel. The city lay in a fertile plain near the foot of Mt. Silpius, with the Orontes River flowing through the city and continuing on for a distance of fifteen miles to the Mediterranean Sea. Antioch was a major junction for roads coming from the east (Aleppo), the south (the Lebanon, Damascus and Palestine) and the north (Tarsus and the whole of Anatolia).

Very early on, a great number of Gentiles became Christians in Antioch. Luke suggests that this happened as a result of the proclamation of Jewish Christians who came to Antioch while fleeing from the outbreak of persecution in Jerusalem associated with Stephen (Acts 11:19-21). Luke does not tell us if these Gentiles were predominantly god fearers linked to the synagogues of the sizeable Jewish population (between twenty and forty thousand people) in Antioch. It was only a matter of time, however, until more Gentiles—friends, family members and neighbors of the initial wave—responded to the gospel. Most of these people would have turned to Christ from adherence to Apollo, Artemis, Zeus, Tyche or the Syrian cults of Baal and the mother goddess Cybele—some of the popular deities of the city (see Religions). We can safely assume that a good number of the Jews in the city also turned to Christ. From Acts we learn that the initial leadership of the church actually consisted of primarily Jewish Christians from outside Antioch (see Acts 13:1).

The growth of the Christian community in the city forced outsiders to reckon with their presence. The local population identified the followers of Jesus as a sect distinct from Judaism and dubbed them christianoi (Acts 11:26). It is likely that these Antiochian Christians gathered in several different house groups rather than meeting all in one place (Downey, 277). We do know that Luke could speak of Antioch as one unified church with a common leadership (Acts 13:1).

The church clearly agreed, under the guiding impulse of the Holy Spirit, to commission Paul and Barnabas to continue the mission to the Gentiles in regions beyond Syria (Acts 13:2-3). Antioch thus became a "missionary sending" church and the initial base of operations for the Pauline mission (see Mission; DPL, Mission).

There are no explicit indications that any canonical literature was produced at Antioch. If one accepts the South Galatia hypothesis (see DPL, Galatians), Paul's letter to the Galatians, however, would have been written in Antioch. Many contemporary scholars have argued that Matthew's Gospel (or at least the earlier traditions embedded in the Gospel) was composed at Antioch to address concerns of the Antiochian church in the 80s or 90s (e.g., Meier; Hann). This hypothesis, however, is quite speculative and some have questioned its viability (see Matthean Community). The literature that does have a clear connection with Antioch is the collection of letters written by Ignatius,* the bishop (episkopos) of Antioch at the beginning of the second century. Although none of the letters address the church at Antioch, they do provide some insight into the nature and structure of the church at that time. Most significantly, Ignatius bears witness to the threat of a rising docetism* in the churches (e.g., Ign. Trall. 10.1) and assumes a widespread acceptance of a threefold ministry (bishop, presbyters and deacons; e.g., Ign. Magn. 13.1; Ign. Trall. 7.2; see Church Order). Unfortunately, Ignatius leaves us in the dark regarding many of the specific issues confronting the Antiochian church as well as the circumstances of his arrest.

About the time of Ignatius or shortly after, Antioch became known as a center for the spread of Gnosticism.* Saturninus, a native of Antioch, began teaching that Christ was not truly incarnated and that he merely appeared as a man (Irenaeus Haer. 1.24.1-2; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.7.3). Basilides was another teacher in the city propagating a docetic christology. According to Irenaeus, both studied under a man named Menander who allegedly was a follower of Simon Magus. Basilides later returned to his native Alexandria and began disseminating his Gnostic teaching there during the time of Hadrian (A.D. 117-38) (Irenaeus Haer. 1.24.3ff).

3. Ephesus (Asia Minor).

From Ephesus, "all the Jews and Greeks who lived in the province of Asia heard the word of the Lord" (Acts 19:10). In the early 50s, Ephesus became the famed center for Christianity in Asia Minor (see DPL, Ephesus). From the NT and Ignatius, we know that churches were established in the territories of Phrygia (Colossae, Laodicea and Hierapolis), Lydia (Smyrna, Philadelphia, Thyatira, Sardis), Ionia (Magnesia, Tralles) and Mysia (Pergamum). New communities presumably formed in numerous other villages and cities throughout Asia Minor.

The church in Ephesus began with the ministry of Paul and his colleagues (Acts 19). Starting with a nucleus of twelve men whom he led into a full Christian experience of the Spirit (Acts 19:1-7), Paul reached many more people with the gospel of Christ, first through the local synagogue and then through regular teaching in a local lecture hall (Acts 19:8-10). As in Antioch (Acts 13:1-3) and other cities of the Pauline mission, it is probable that these new believers met regularly in homes for teaching, fellowship,* worship* and prayer.* We have no way of determining how many such home groups existed. It is likely that many new house churches were added year by year as the movement experienced significant growth.

During his Gentile mission Paul spent more time in Ephesus than in any other city. This was due in large part to the strategic importance of Ephesus as a base of operations for spreading the gospel throughout Asia Minor. Ephesus was the principal Aegean port city for Asia Minor. Consequently roads from Ephesus radiated in every direction along the coast and through the interior of the province. Since 133 B.C. when Attalus III bequeathed the Pergameme kingdom to Rome, Ephesus had served as the seat of the Roman proconsul. This prosperous "metropolis of Asia," with a population of at least 250,000 was home to a multi-ethnic and religiously diverse set of people. Ionians, Lydians, Phrygians and Carians lived in the city together with Greeks, Persians, Italians and Egyptians. There was also a sizeable Jewish population.

Epigraphic, numismatic and literary evidence reveals that the people of Ephesus worshiped up to fifty different gods and goddesses. Primacy of place, however, went to Artemis of Ephesus (Diana Ephesia) who enjoyed an official covenant bond with the city. Ephesus was also famous in antiquity as a center for the practice and dissemination of the magical arts (see Magic). Certain magical formulas were even referred to as "the Ephesian letters." Not surprisingly, then, Luke records two incidents portraying the impact Christianity had on the local magical practices and the cult of Artemis (Acts 19:13-20, 23-41).

There is significant Christian literary activity associated with Ephesus. Of the letters attributed to Paul, two were probably written to Ephesus (1 Timothy and Ephesians [even if Ephesians was a circular letter]) and one was written from Ephesus (1 Corinthians; see DPL, Ephesus). There is a strong historical tradition that the Apostle John lived in Ephesus toward the end of the first century. Eusebius and other patristic writers report that John the son of Zebedee spent the latter years of his life in Ephesus where he served as a key leader among the churches (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.1, 23, 28, 31). A considerable body of ancient traditions affirm that the Apostle wrote the Fourth Gospel from Ephesus (e.g., Irenaeus Haer. 3.1.1; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.8.4; et al.). The same writers also link John the Apostle with John the author of the Apocalypse (Rev 1:9; see Revelation), which was composed on the island of Patmos, roughly sixty miles southeast of Ephesus. Although the Johannine letters are anonymous, many scholars have followed the church fathers by also arguing for their Johannine authorship (see John, Letters of). The tradition is muddied to some degree by Eusebius's report of the presence of another John (the elder) in Ephesus (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 7.25.6-16; 3.39.6) who may have served as the author of one or more of these documents. All five of these writings, however, have very close ties with Ephesus and reflect the situation of the churches there at the time of their composition.

The message to the church of Ephesus in the Apocalypse (Rev 2:1-7) commends these believers for their hard work, perseverance and spiritual discernment, but it calls them back to their "first love." Their focus on detecting and rooting out dangerous teachings (such as that of the "Nicolaitans") unfortunately appears to have taken precedence over the maintenance of a personal love for God and a deep love for one another in the Christian community.

In the early second century, Ignatius wrote a letter to the church in Ephesus as he was on his way to martyrdom* in Rome. The letter assumes the presence of a three-tiered ecclesiastical structure in Ephesus. Ignatius even refers to a certain Onesimus as their bishop (episkopos; Ign. Eph. 1.3). He also confirms the positive report of the Apocalypse regarding their intolerance of heresy (Ign. Eph. 6.2; 9.1) but makes no specific mention of the Nicolaitans.

4. Corinth (Greece).

Because of the cultural and historical importance of Athens to the Greek world, one would have expected this city to take on a prominent role as the center of Christianity for Macedonia and Achaia. Rather, the Peloponnesian city of Corinth became the focal point of the Christian movement. As the westward missionary expansion of the gospel of Christ continued in the early 50s through the preaching of Paul, some in Athens heard the gospel with interest, though only a few responded to his message (Acts 17:16-34). For this and perhaps other reasons that Luke does not disclose, Paul spent little time in Athens and immediately went to Corinth where he stayed for a year and a half (Acts 18:1-18).

Paul may have turned his attention to Corinth because of its strategic location for reaching many people with the gospel. Corinth had become the economic, political and trade center for Greece. This was due in part to its location overlooking the narrow isthmus connecting the Peloponnese to the mainland. Much of the shipping between east and west passed by Corinth as boats were hauled across the four-mile wide isthmus on the special road built for this purpose. Corinth was also served by two harbors: Lechaeum on the west, giving access to the Adriatic, and Cenchraea on the east, serving the Aegean. The 1900-foot hill adjacent to the city, the Acrocorinth, provided the city with an important defensive acropolis.

From the time the city was established as a Roman colony in 44 B.C. nearly a hundred years after its destruction, it grew and prospered. The amount of building that took place during the reigns of Augustus (31 B.C.—A.D. 14) and Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) well illustrates how the city was thriving when Christianity was introduced by Paul in A.D. 51.

Aside from the strategic importance of the city, Luke clearly depicts Paul's extended stay as determined by the providential leading of God (Acts 18:9-11). Many people, both Jews and Gentiles, turned to Christ during Paul's time of ministry there. Some of these included prominent people in the city. In Romans 16:23 Paul mentions a certain Erastus whom he calls the "steward" (oikonomos) of the city. This may indicate that he was one of the two city managers (an aedile). It is likely that this is the same Erastus named on a civic inscription dating to the mid-first century (Murphy-O'Connor 1983, 37-38). Luke also tells us that the ruler of the synagogue, Crispus, and his household became Christians (Acts 18:8).

Stringent Jewish opposition to Paul's preaching in the city resulted in Paul's making a forced appearance before the bēma, or magistrate's bench of the Roman proconsul of Achaia, Gallio (Acts 18:12-17). After listening to their complaints, Gallio summarily dismissed the case, ruling that it was an internal Jewish squabble and not a matter appropriate for him to decide. By determining that this nascent Christian movement came under the umbrella of Judaism, Gallio effectively insured that Christianity would be under the same legal protection as Judaism.* This set an important precedent for Paul and the Corinthian Christians that made possible the legally unhindered proclamation of the gospel in Achaia, at least for the immediate future.

From a careful reading of Paul's two letters to Corinth, we can infer that he and his companions experienced great success in sharing the gospel and building a Christian community there. As in other cities the church at Corinth likely came to be comprised of a network of house churches (see Blue, 153-61, 172-77). The various divisions in the church reflected in 1 Corinthians 1—4 may very well have been schisms between house churches. Some of the difficulties faced by Christians in Corinth stemmed from their cultural and religious background in the city, such as the controversy over food* sacrificed to idols* (1 Cor 8-10). Much more can be learned about the Corinthian church through an analysis of the Corinthian correspondence (see DPL Corinthians). Paul wrote his letter to the Romans at some point during his stay in this city.

At the end of the first century, the church at Corinth was once again splintered by an unhealthy divisiveness. It appears that younger members of the congregation had a conflict with the elders and eventually gained enough support to foment a change of leadership (1 Clem. 3.3; 44.6; 47.6). A prominent leader in the church at Rome, Clement,* wrote a lengthy letter to the Corinthian community with the hope of restoring unity within the church.

Little else is known about this important church in the first century of its existence. It is likely that through the ministry and outreach of the Corinthian church, many new communities were established throughout the Peloponnese and to the north.

5. Alexandria (Egypt).

Although no mention is made of the beginnings of Egyptian Christianity in the NT, other material and literary evidence suggests that Christianity started there early and became well established. The most important city for the rise of Christianity in Egypt was Alexandria.*

Egyptian Jews who heard the gospel on the day of Pentecost in Jerusalem (Acts 2:10) were probably the first to introduce Christianity to Alexandria. Eusebius passes on a tradition, obtained by hearsay, purporting that Mark was the first to found churches in Alexandria and that he remained and functioned in a leadership capacity until the eighth year of Nero (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.16; 2.24.1). Most scholars discount the viability of this tradition because of the better attested accounts of Mark accompanying Peter as his interpreter and composing his Gospel in Rome (Papias Frag. 3.15; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39; Metzger, 100; see DJG, Mark).

Alexandria was a natural place for the spread of the gospel to the rest of Egypt and to the (north) African continent. The city was a key commercial center, possessing the busiest port in the empire. Strabo, who spent five years in the city working on his Geography, remarked that Alexandria is "the greatest emporium of the inhabited world" (Strabo Geog. 17.1.13). With a population of up to a half-million people, Alexandria was the second largest city of the Roman world. Among this population was the largest Jewish settlement in the diaspora.*

It is doubtful that Apollos provides us with insight into the early Christian community in Alexandria (Acts 18:24-28) in spite of the testimony of the Western text that he had been instructed in the way of the Lord "in his native place [en tē patridi]." Apollos was only familiar with the OT and the baptism of John, not the gospel of Jesus Christ. We can only speculate as to where he came into contact with the John-the-Baptist tradition.

The *Epistle of Barnabas is the oldest Christian document from Alexandria that we possess. This document was written after some monumental events in the Alexandrian Jewish community: a horrific massacre of Jews under Tiberius Julius Alexander in A.D. 66, the reverberations from the destruction of the Jerusalem temple in A.D. 70 and the decimation of the Jewish community in Alexandria after they revolted during the reign of Trajan (A.D. 115-17; see Judaism, Post-A.D. 70). The content of Barnabas reflects some significant similarities to Stephen's* speech as recorded in Acts 7. In both, there is an emphasis on the demise of the temple cult, an appeal to the golden-calf episode of the exodus, and a similar christology,* including the use of the title, "the Righteous One." B. Pearson suggests that, "this type of Christianity was introduced to Alexandria soon after the death of Stephen and the scattering of the 'Hellenists' from Jerusalem" (Pearson 1986, 213). Since Alexandrian Jews already tended toward a spiritual interpretation of the temple* and its observances, the ground was well prepared for the reception of Christianity along the lines expressed by Stephen (see Hellenists).

Perhaps some of the most significant discoveries illustrating the spread of Christianity into various parts of Egypt have been the fragments of NT and LXX biblical texts on papyri. The earliest of these, the John Rylands fragment of the Gospel of John (P^{52}), dates to the first half of the second century. Another fragment of the Gospel of John dating to the second century was published in 1983 and has been designated (P^{90}). Further analysis of P^{64} has recently led C. Thiede to suggest a late first-century date (in ZPE 105 [1994] 13-20), though this is debated. A fragment from an unknown Gospel (Egerton Pap. 2) dates to the middle of the second century. We could also add to this a number of early fragments of the Greek OT that have been found scattered throughout Egypt which show signs of being Christian copies. Metzger observes that for every papyrus fragment discovered in Egypt, scores have perished or still lie hidden in the sand (Metzger, 101-3). All this points to a thriving Christianity in Egypt that has radiated from its origin in Alexandria to various parts of the hinterland.

At a very early date, it appears that forms of Christianity began to emerge that deviated significantly from the apostolic brand of Christianity represented in the NT documents. From the second century on, Alexandria became a noted center for Gnosticism through a variety of famous teachers such as Basilides and Valentinus. The discovery of the Nag Hammadi documents in the late 1940s has given us a much better understanding of the varieties of Gnosis present in the city at a very early stage (see Gnosticism).

6. Rome (Italy).

Christianity spread to Rome* at the very beginning and, by the end of the first century, Rome was a major center for Christianity. This capital city of the Empire was soon to become the most important city for the development of Western Christianity (see DPL, Rome).

The start of the church in Rome is shrouded in some obscurity. As with Alexandria, the best hypothesis is that Jewish pilgrims who were present at Pentecost* returned home proclaiming in their synagogues that Jesus is the Messiah (Acts 2:10). This would mean that Christianity took root first in the Jewish sector of the city. The largest group of Jews occupied a region known as the Trastevere ("across the Tiber"), where there were as many as thirteen synagogues. The best estimates for the Jewish population of Rome at this time place it at 40,000-50,000 (Brown, 94) within the total city population of about one million. Many of these families had originally come to Rome as captives after Pompey had taken Jerusalem (60 B.C.) and were subsequently sold as slaves. By the first century, many were freedmen, but most were probably poor and not well educated.

Presumably a number of house churches formed in the Trastevere area were composed of Jews and Gentile god-fearers. From there the gospel spread to other parts of the city and to the Gentile population.

A major crisis confronted the church during Claudius's reign (see Chronology; Emperor) when, according to Suetonius, the emperor expelled the Jews from the city around A.D. 49 because they "caused continuous disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus" (Suetonius Claudius 25). Most scholars interpret Chrestus as a reference to Christ and see this as evidence of internal tension in the Jewish community resulting from the preaching of the gospel by Jewish Christians and the formation of Christian communities. This harsh decree would have had a major impact on the church by depleting it of all its Jewish members and forcing Gentiles to assume places of leadership. When Jewish Christians began returning to Rome after Nero became emperor, the situation would have been ripe for conflict between the new leadership and the old.

The Apostle Paul wrote to the Roman church in the mid-50s, about twenty years after its founding. Evidence from the last chapter of his letter suggests that Roman Christianity consisted of a network of house churches and that these people came from a cross-section of social classes, both slave and freed. There is much in Paul's letter that reflects the situation and issues of the Roman church at this time (see DPL, Romans).

There is no historical substance to the tradition that Peter was the founder and first bishop of the church at Rome. Roman Catholic scholar Raymond Brown dispels this legend:

> We have no knowledge at all of when he came to Rome and what he did there before he was martyred. Certainly he was not the original missionary who brought Christianity to Rome (and therefore not the founder of the church at Rome in that sense). There is no serious proof that he was the bishop (or local ecclesiastical officer) of the Roman church—a claim not made till the third century. (Brown, 98)

It is certainly possible, however, that Peter came to Rome at some point and perhaps even ministered there together with Paul for a brief time (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.25.8).

The burning of Rome in A.D. 64 and the subsequent persecution of Christians by Nero marked a very dark period for Roman Christianity (Tacitus Ann. 15.44). The maniacally deranged Nero executed Christians by crucifying them, burning them as a spectacle or dressing them in wild animals' skins and letting dogs tear them to pieces.

It is likely that Paul was released from (or possibly exiled after) his Roman imprisonment recorded by Luke and engaged in further missionary activity before the great fire of Rome in July 64, for which the Nero blamed the Christians. The plight of Roman Christianity after the fire may have been what drew Paul back to the city. Many scholars accept Clement's testimony that both Peter and Paul were martyred in the city (1 Clem. 5—6). He intimates that Peter "endured not one or two but many trials" before his death (1 Clem. 5.4). This evidence would suggest that both of the Apostles died around A.D. 65-67.

Sometime before his death, Peter wrote a letter from Rome to churches scattered around the northern and western regions of Asia Minor (this, of course, assumes the authenticity of 1 Peter; see 1 Peter). The theme of suffering is prominent in this letter reflecting not only the situation in the Roman church, but especially the local outbreaks of persecution in Asia Minor during this period. It is quite likely that 2 Peter* also originated from Rome.

Although the Apocalypse was written from Asia Minor (specifically, Patmos), Rome is designated as the recipient of a visitation of the wrath of God spoken of in the imagery and symbolism of the book. By the end of the first century, Rome came to be compared with the ancient city of Babylon because of its antagonism to the purposes of God and for spilling the blood of his people (Sib. Or. 5.137-44, 159-60, 434-46). Rome is the city sitting on seven mountains (Rev 17:9), ruling over the kings of the earth (Rev 17:18) and serving as the luxurious center of commerce for the world market (Rev 18:2-3; 19:2). The message of the Apocalypse is that "Babylon"* would fall and be judged through the direct intervention of God (Rev 14:8; 18:2, 10, 21). While there is much in the Apocalypse that has the historical city of Rome in view, there appears to be the anticipation of judgment on a future city (or, possibly, some future manifestation symbolized by the city) that possesses all the ungodly and evil characteristics of ancient Rome and Babylon.

At a time not too far removed from the writing of the Apocalypse, Clement,* a famous leader of the church at Rome, wrote his letter to the church at Corinth. He was earnestly attempting to mediate in a leadership crisis of the Corinthian church that had disrupted the peace and order of the whole Christian community. It cannot be inferred from this, however, that the bishop of Rome exercised sovereignty over the churches of the Empire.

The Shepherd of Hermas gives us a fascinating glimpse into a segment of Christianity at Rome that appears, in many ways, quite different from that represented in 1 Clement (see Hermas). This early second-century book may give us some perspective on a form of folk Christianity popular among the lower classes in Rome at this time (see Jeffers). The book attests to the ongoing experience of visions, prophecies and struggle with the devil and his powers. The "Two Ways" theology of Hermas, in fact, depicts life as a struggle between the opposing influences of two powers. The christology* can be described as adoptionist in that the Son is said to have been taken by God as a partner because of his blamelessness and the complete dwelling of the Spirit in his life (Herm. Sim. 5.6).

Rome had clearly become a literary center for the Christian movement. In addition to the documents we have already discussed that have a connection to Rome, we might also add the Gospel of Mark (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.14; 6.14.16). Based on an assortment of traditions, C.-J. Thornton has suggested that by the middle of the second century the Roman church had a central library where they made available to believers in the city an archive of Christian documents that they had collected from the very beginning (Thornton, 47-55).

See also ALEXANDRIA, ALEXANDRIAN CHRISTIANITY; ANTIOCH; DIASPORA JUDAISM; GALILEAN CHRISTIANITY; JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; MATTHEAN COMMUNITY; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE; ROME, ROMAN CHRISTIANITY; SAMARIA; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY; SYRIA, SYRIAN CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Jerusalem: M. Hengel, The 'Hellenization' of Judaea in the First Century after Christ (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989); J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); T. Wright, "Jerusalem in the New Testament" in Jerusalem: Past and Present in the Purposes of God, ed. P. W. L. Walker (Cambridge: Tyndale House, 1992) 53-77. Antioch: R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome (New York: Paulist Press, 1983); G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria from Seleucus to the Arab Conquest (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961); R. R. Hann, "Judaism and Jewish Christianity in Antioch: Charisma and Conflict in the First Century," JRH 14 (1987) 341-60; S. E. Johnson, "Antioch, The Base of Operations," LTQ 18 (1983) 64-73; W. A. Meeks and R. L. Wilken, Jews and Christians In Antioch In the First Four Centuries of the Common Era (SBS 13; Missoula: Scholar's Press, 1978). Ephesus: W. Elliger, Ephesos: Geschichte einer antiken Weltstadt (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1985); E. E. Lemcio, "Ephesus and the New Testament Canon," BJRL 69 (1986) 210-34; R. E. Oster, "Christianity in Asia Minor," ABD 1:938-54; idem, "Ephesus," ABD 2:542-49; P. Trebilco, "Asia" in The Book of Acts in its Graeco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 291-362. Corinth: B. Blue, "Acts and the House Church" in The Book of Acts in its Graeco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 119-222; D. W. J. Gill,

"Achaia" in The Book of Acts in its Graeco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 433-53; W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983); J. Murphy-O'Connor, St. Paul's Corinth (GNS 6; Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1983); idem, "Corinth," ABD 1:1134-39; J. Wiseman, "Corinth and Rome I: 228 BC—AD 267," ANRW 2.7.1 (1979) 438-548. Alexandria: B. A. Pearson, "Christians and Jews in First-Century Alexandria," HTR 79 (1986) 206-16; idem, "Christianity in Egypt," ABD 1:954-60; idem, "Alexandria," ABD 2.152-57; B. M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1977); J. A. Thompson, "Alexandria," ISBE 1:89-94. Rome: R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome (New York: Paulist Press, 1983); A. D. Clarke, "Rome and Italy" in The Book of Acts in its Graeco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 455-81; J. Jeffers, Conflict at Rome: Social Order and Hierarchy in Early Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); S. E. Johnson, "Jews and Christians in Rome," LTQ 17 (1982) 51-58; P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten (WUNT 2/18; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989); G. F. Snyder, "Christianity in Rome," ABD 1:968-70; idem, Ante Pacem: Archaeological Evidence of Church Life Before Constantine (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1985); C.-J. Thornton, Der Zeuge des Zeugen (WUNT 56; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991). C. E. Arnold

CERINTHUS. See DOCETISM; JOHN, LETTERS OF.

CHILDREN, CHILDREN OF GOD. See SONSHIP, CHILD, CHILDREN.

CHRIST

The term Christos, transliterated as "Christ" in English, is used in Jewish and Christian contexts as the equivalent of the Hebrew term māšîaḥ When they are used as nouns both the Hebrew and the Greek terms refer to an anointed person (see DJG, Christ), though originally Christos was an adjective. Jews sometimes used the term māšîaḥ to refer to an individual anointed by God, a king (Ps. 18:50; 89:20) or a priest* (CD 12.23-24; 14.19), and sometimes they saw this person as one who would come to restore or renew Israel.* The evidence that māšîaḥ, much less Christos, was a technical term for "messiah" before NT times is slim (de Jonge 1986).

Nevertheless the use of the term Christos in early Christian literature presupposes and draws on Jewish hopes for an anointed one, especially one in the line of David (see Judaism). We find in the Gospels and in Paul the use of Christos as a title or a term referring to this longed-for figure, but we also find it used as a second name for Jesus. For example, Mark's Gospel begins with the heading that he will relate good news about Jesus Christ, not Jesus "the Christ," though clearly Mark knows that the term began as a title (Mk 13:21-22). This duality is also found in Paul's writings, where most often the term is used as a name for Jesus, especially at the beginning of letters* (e.g., Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1). Equally clearly Paul knows the Jewish background of the term. For example, he does not juxtapose the term Christ with the term Lord,* for that would be putting two titles together, and it appears his usage is primarily indebted to his reflection on the narrative about the end of Jesus' life (1 Cor 1:23; see DPL, Christ §4).

The use of the term Christos outside the Gospels and the Pauline corpus also falls into certain definite patterns, some of which support the notion that "Christ" was frequently used as another name for Jesus of Nazareth and sometimes also was used to describe a role, function or position he assumed at some point in his career. The fact that on various occasions the same document, such as Acts* or 1 Peter,* can reflect both the titular and nominal use of Christos shows the flexibility with which the term could be used.

1. Acts
2. Hebrews
3. James and Jude
4. 1 and 2 Peter
5. Johannine Letters and Revelation
6. Apostolic Fathers and Justin Martyr
7. Conclusions

1. Acts.

The twenty-six references to Christos in Acts refer to Jesus. The term occurs only rarely in conjunction with an OT citation, no doubt because it is rather rare in the Greek OT (see Old Testament in Acts). Nevertheless Acts 4:26 does contain a citation of some form of Psalm 2:2, in which God as Lord is distinguished from "his anointed one" (in Acts tou Christou autou). Texts such as this one and others where the qualifier his occurs (cf. Acts 3:18) make clear that the author knows the root meaning of the word Christos and understands its relational character. If one is the Christ, one must be anointed by someone else, in this case the Father. Hence when we find the phrase "our Lord, Jesus Christ" in Acts (Acts 15:26; 20:21) we see the two relationships that are implied—Jesus is the anointed one of God* and the believer's Lord.

The author of Acts makes explicit that essential to being a Christian is confessing Jesus to be "the Christ" (ho Christos, Acts 9:22; 17:22). In the witness* to Jews in the synagogue* this issue is pressed; precisely this point had to be demonstrated from the Scriptures if Jews were to be followers of Jesus. In Acts it appears that "Christ" functions mainly as a name when the audience is Gentile* but can serve as a functional description or title when the audience is Jewish. The phrase "in/by the name of Jesus Christ" or a variant (Acts 2:38; 4:10; 8:12; 10:48; 15:26; 16:18) shows, however, not only that Christos could be used as part of a name even in a Jewish context (Acts 4:18, noting the Jewish authorities leave out "Christ") but also that it was believed that confessing, invoking, proclaiming, praying* or exorcising in this name produced miraculous events (see Miracles), including conversions and healings.* Baptism* "in the name of Jesus Christ" is seen as the characteristic entrance rite into the Christian community for both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 2:38; 10:48; see Jones 1970).

Luke stresses the necessity of Jesus' sufferings* and resurrection* (Lk 24:26-27), and in this context he asserts that it was God's plan revealed in Scripture for "the Christ" to suffer (Acts 17:2-3) and to be raised (Acts 2:31, citing Ps 16:10; see Moessner 1995). The fulfillment of Scripture in these matters is stressed in the context of the synagogue or where the audience is Jewish. When the audience is solely or almost solely Gentiles who are not synagogue adherents or connected with Jews the term Christ as a title or description does not arise, and in various cases it does not arise even as a name in such contexts (see Paul's speech to the Lystrans in Acts 14:15-17 and to the Athenians in Acts 17:22-31). For a Jewish audience it was critical to confess was that Jesus is the Christ (Acts 5:22; 17:3), while for a Gentile audience it was paramount to confess that the person called Jesus Christ is Lord (cf. Acts 15:23 with Acts 15:26). The community of Christian Jews and Gentiles shared the confession of Jesus as "our Lord" (Acts 15:26; 20:21). One was to have faith* in him (Acts 24:24; 20:21).

One should probably not make too much of Acts 2:36, for while this text does speak of God "making" Jesus the Messiah (presumably after his crucifixion; see Death of Christ) elsewhere he is spoken of as suffering as messiah (Acts 17:3). At most Acts 2:36 suggested to the author that Jesus entered a new stage of his messianic roles and duties after his death. What we find notably lacking in Acts is the Pauline idea of being "in Christ" or being participants in his body (see DPL, Christ §5) or the notion of Christ's preexistence.* The author's christology has sometimes been dubbed "absentee christology," since Luke stresses that Christ ascended and rules from heaven* (cf. Acts 3:11-26; Robinson 1962; Moule 1966).

2. Hebrews.

By contrast with Acts the references to Christ in Hebrews* appear much closer to Pauline usage (see Witherington 1991) not only in the frequency with which Christ seems to be a name rather than a description or title but also in the use of the idea of sharing in or being partners of Christ (Heb 3:14). Again and again, however, "Christ" seems to be a name (Heb 5:5; 6:1; 9:11, 24, 28) for a human being who is flesh and blood (Heb 9:14; 10:10) yet is also much more than that, since "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever" (Heb 13:8) and is one for whom Moses* could suffer in advance (Heb 11:26).

One of the distinctive notes in Hebrews is relating the idea of sonship* to the term Christ (cf. Hurst 1987). At Hebrews 3:6 we hear of Christ being faithful over God's house* as a son, and at Hebrews 5:5 it is Christ who is glorified and royally appointed by God, who said to him, "You are my Son, today I have begotten you" (using the language of Ps 2:7, part of a coronation ode). Notably missing in all the rich christological discussion in Hebrews is any discussion or explanation about Jesus being the Christ, the anointed one, unless we count the sonship language as a surrogate for such. The author is much more interested in the role of Jesus as both sacrifice* and sacrificer—the heavenly high priest. The Pauline influence on this document makes unlikely the suggestion of J. D. G. Dunn that in Hebrews 1-2 the author is talking about the preexistence of an idea rather than the personal preexistence of the Son/Christ (cf. Dunn 1980 to Craddock 1968 and Schweizer 1982).

3. James and Jude.

Little needs to be said about the use of Christos in James,* since it appears twice (Jas 1:1; 2:1). In both cases it appears in one long appellation, "the [our] Lord Jesus Christ," with "Christ" used as a name. There are six references to Christ in Jude,* all of the same variety as we find in James (Jude 4, 17, 21, 25) or even briefer ("Jesus Christ," Jude 1 [twice]). James, Jude and Hebrews show little reflection on Jesus as the Christ even though they appear to be directed to an audience that includes a goodly number of Jews or Jewish Christians. Perhaps the explanation lies in the fact that these documents are not apologetic or evangelistic documents but are meant for those who are already convinced Jesus is the Christ. By contrast, Luke-Acts, which is often thought to be the only document in the NT clearly written by a Gentile, shows considerable interest in this subject.

4. 1 and 2 Peter.

1 Peter and 2 Peter* reflect a variety of uses of the term Christ, and since the two letters manifest distinct tendencies they deserve to be treated separately. For example, in 1 Peter we find the formula en Christō (1 Pet 3:16; 5:14), while in 2 Peter we find the phrase "our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Pet 1:11; 2:20; 3:18) (Richard 1986, 380-96).

In 1 Peter there is a major stress on the suffering and resurrection of Christ (1 Pet 1:2, 3, 11, 19; 2:21; 3:18, 21; 4:1; 5:1). The author also emphasizes in Pauline fashion that the believer may share in these sufferings or ones of a similar nature (1 Pet 4:13; cf. Phil 3:10). The author of 1 Peter is also not reluctant to refer to Christ's return, in this case called "the revelation of Christ" (1 Pet 1:7, en apokalypsei Iēsou Christou; 1 Pet 1:13). There is also the reference in 1 Peter 1:11 to the spirit of Christ who inspired and illuminated the OT prophets. The author appears to subscribe to Christ's preexistence, but he does not discourse on the matter (cf. 1 Pet 1:20; 2:4; Hanson 1965; Craddock 1968; contrast Dunn 1980). He also uses the phrase "the name of Christ," which one may be reviled for bearing or bearing witness to (1 Pet 4:14), and one is to hallow Christ in one's heart as Lord (1 Pet 3:15). The author seems to understand the relational character of the term Christ, for he refers to "the Father of . . . Jesus Christ" (1 Pet 1:3).

In 2 Peter the usage is less varied with the most intriguing passage being the reference to "our God and Savior, Jesus Christ" (2 Pet 1:1). This appears to be a clear example of Jesus being called God in the NT (cf. Harris 1992). This letter stresses the connection of the term Christ with the term savior (sōtēr). Of the eight references to Christ in this letter, half of them (2 Pet 1:1, 11; 2:20; 3:18) connect these two terms. There is a special stress on the knowledge* of Jesus Christ (2 Pet 1:16; 2:20; 3:18). The author clearly uses the term Christ as part of a name (e.g., 2 Pet 1:1) throughout, as is the case in 1 Peter. In 2 Peter, Jesus Christ is not seen as merely a hero of antiquity, for in 2 Peter 1:14 he reveals to the author in the present that his time of death is near. It is possible that there is a Petrine source in 2 Peter 1:16—2:4, as this section shares much vocabulary and ideas with 1 Peter, including the manner of the use of the term Christ in this subsection (cf. 1 Pet 3:1 with 2 Pet 1:16; see Witherington 1985).

5. Johannine Letters and Revelation.

Like the author of Hebrews, the writer of the Johannine epistles (see John, Letters of) has a penchant for combining ideas about sonship with the name Jesus Christ. We hear repeatedly of "his Son, Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1:3; 3:23; 5:20; 2 Jn 3). There is also a special emphasis on the need for the true believer to confess "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (1 Jn 4:2; 2 Jn 7), probably reflecting the need to combat Docetic* or proto-gnostic (see Gnosis, Gnosticism) teachings offered by some false teachers who had frequented the Johannine community (see Adversaries). 1 John 2:22 shows that confessing Jesus to be the Christ is also seen as critical for his community.

The special concern with confession in these letters should not be overlooked, and the incarnational character of what is to be confessed is striking. Deceivers and antichrists* are those who do not confess that the Christ has come in the flesh,* in the person of Jesus (2 Jn 7). In view of the content of the confession, the crucial text (1 Jn 5:6) refers not to the sacraments but to the birth (water) and death (blood) of Jesus Christ—the two means by which he comes to the believer (see Witherington 1989). The author of these letters also knows of the idea of koinonia (see Fellowship) in and with Jesus Christ (1 Jn 1:3) and in 1 John 5:20 refers to the believer being not only in the truth* but also "in his Son Jesus Christ." Abiding in Christ involves abiding in the teaching of Christ (2 Jn 9), which likely means the teaching about Christ referred to in the confessional statements. Jesus Christ is seen as so closely associated with the Father that the divine blessings* of grace,* mercy* and peace* come to the believer from them both (2 Jn 3).

The term Christos does not appear in 3 John.

Despite the plethora of images of Christ in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), the term Christ appears there only eight times, and half of these are in the opening and closing verses of the document. The seer John receives a revelation* from or about Jesus Christ (Rev 1:1; probably the former is being emphasized), which is also a testimony (martyrian) about Jesus Christ (Rev 1:2) that encompasses all that follows in the Apocalypse. Jesus Christ is the faithful witness who reveals and testifies to all these things.

The author knows that Christos is more than a name, as is clear from the allusion to OT ideas referring to God as Lord and to God's Christ (Rev 11:15, drawing on a host of texts, including Ps 10:16; 22:28; Dan 7:14; Zech 14:9; see OT in Revelation). It is also clear from Revelation 12:10, which speaks of the power or authority* of God's Messiah. The martyrs* in Revelation 20:4 are seen as those who will rise and reign with the Christ for one thousand years, indicating that the roles of Christ were not completed by what Jesus accomplished during his earthly ministry.* These martyrs are said to be priests not only of God but also of Christ (Rev 20:6). The author has no difficulty distinguishing God from Christ, but he also clearly defines Christ in divine terms, roles and functions (Rev 19:16). Christ is the one who dispenses grace from heaven to God's people (Rev 22:21). Thus both the titular sense and "Christ" as a name are evident in this work, though the use as a name is notable only at the beginning of the document. Perhaps the intent is to orient the hearer or reader, who is about to be introduced to a multitude of apocalyptic* images (cf. Grundmann 1974). Revelation shows that the original messianic meaning of Christos was still known in the last decade of the first century (cf. de Jonge 1992).

6. Apostolic Fathers and Justin Martyr.

The use of the name Jesus Christ or phrases such as "the [our] Lord Jesus Christ" in early Christian literature are too numerous to list and add little to our perspective of how the authors understood these phrases. We will instead concentrate on some of the important usages carried over from the NT period as well as some of the new and distinctive ways the term Christ is used.

In some early Christian documents the term Christos appears hardly at all. In the *Epistle to Barnabas Jesus is frequently referred to, but the term Christ appears only three times, twice in Barnabas 12.10-11, where the discussion is about the meaning of Psalm 110:1 as it had been interpreted in the Jesus tradition* (cf. Mk 12:35-37 and par.), and also the meaning of Isaiah 45:1. The author refers to Jesus as the Christ about whom David has prophesied and who is David's son. Isaiah 45:1 is the famous passage in which Cyrus is said to be God's anointed, but our author clearly uses it in a christological manner. The other reference is found in Barnabas 2.6, where the author speaks of the new law* of "our Lord Jesus Christ," which is to be contrasted with the OT law.

In the *Didache as well the name Jesus comes up at various points, but the term Christ is rare. Once it is found in the eucharistic prayer (Did. 9.4, where it occurs in the form Jesus Christ as a name), and once it is found as part of a compound word apparently coined by the author (christemporos, Did. 12.5, which seems to mean "making traffic of Christ"). Neither of these references tells us much about the author's understanding of the term Christ other than that it refers to the person Jesus.

The *Shepherd of Hermas contains no references to Christ, the author preferring to use either the term Lord or the phrase "Son of God." A possible exception is a reference in Visions 2.2.8, but this is doubtful; only one manuscript has christon, while a variety of others have kyrion.

Barnabas, the Didache and Hermas are Jewish-Christian documents, and yet the term Christos and the idea of Jesus as Messiah are rarely found, much as we saw in James and Jude (see 3 above and Grundmann 1974).

In the letter of Polycarp to the Philippians we find the familiar phrase "our Lord Jesus Christ" (Pol. Phil. 1.1), the one whom God raised from the dead (Pol. Phil. 2.1). We also find the use of "Christ" as a name (Pol. Phil. 3.3) and a reference to the future judgment* seat of Christ before which all must appear (Pol. Phil. 6.2, no doubt quoting 2 Cor 5:10). Christ Jesus is said to be "our righteousness" (Pol. Phil. 8.1, possibly alluding to 1 Cor 1:30). Perhaps most interesting is the quoting of 2 John 4-7 at the Letter to the Philippians 8.1. Jesus Christ is also said to be "our Lord and God" (Pol. Phil. 12.2), and yet the author speaks of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," who in the same sentence is also called the Son of God and the "eternal priest."

In the Martyrdom of Polycarp we find a variety of references to Christ, frequently as a personal name (Mart. Pol. 2.1-3; 14.3; 17.2; 20.2). We also find the familiar phrase "the [our] Lord, Jesus Christ" more than once (Mart. Pol. presc.; 19.2; 22.3). Of more significance in this document, which comes at the earliest from the late second century A.D., is the probable reference to "your Christ" (though there is some textual evidence for omitting sou; Mart. Pol. 14.2), showing that the author understands the original meaning of the term and its relational content. Martyrdom of Polycarp 9.3 also reflects awareness of the messiahship of Jesus (Grundmann 1974). Christ is also said to be one who has a kingdom* (Mart. Pol. 22.1), though whether this is envisioned as in heaven or on earth at the eschaton* is not clear (Mart. Pol. 22.2, God's heavenly kingdom; other manuscripts have "eternal kingdom"; Epilogus Alius 6).

By far the most important and varied early postcanonical uses of the term Christos are to be found in the letters of Clement (see Clement of Rome) and the letters of Ignatius.*

We can summarize first the evidence for the Clementine literature. References to "the [our] Lord, Jesus Christ" are very common (1 Clem. presc.; 16.2; 20.11; 21.6; 24.1; 42.1, 3; 44.1; 58.2; 65.2), and the reverse, "Jesus Christ, our Lord," is also found (1 Clem. 49.6; 50.7). The simple name Jesus Christ is used infrequently (1 Clem. 59.2; 62.3; 64.1). "Christ" can also be used as a personal name (1 Clem. 46.7, the members of Christ; 1 Clem. 2.1), but we do not find (with one possible exception) the juxtaposition of two titles (e.g., "the Lord Christ").

The Pauline formula en Christō appears, which reflects the great debt of especially 1 Clement to the Pauline corpus (1 Clem. 22.1, en Christō pistis; 1 Clem. 38.1, "in Christ Jesus"; 1 Clem. 43.1, those who were "in Christ"; cf. 1 Clem. 46.5; 48.4; 49.1; 54.3).

Clement can refer to Jesus as "the Christ" (1 Clem. 42:1-2) and asserts that the Christ is from God and the apostles* from the Christ. In Clement's view Jesus came to earth as the Christ and remained such throughout his career; hence he can speak of "heralding the coming of Christ" (1 Clem. 17.1), the giving of the gospel* to the apostles by Christ (1 Clem. 42.1), the blood of Christ (1 Clem. 7.4), the raising of the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Clem. 24.1), Jesus Christ as high priest in heaven (1 Clem. 36.1) and the flock of Christ now on earth (1 Clem. 44.3). Clement refers to a future kingdom of Christ that will appear on earth (1 Clem. 50.3).

Like Paul, Clement sees Christ as the elect one and the election* of believers happening only in and through him (1 Clem. 64.1).

The material in 2 Clement adds little to this, where "Christ" is almost always used as a part of a simple name (2 Clem. 1.1, 2; 2.7; 5.5), so much so that in the phrase "Christ, the Lord" the former is seen as a name and the latter as a title (2 Clem. 9.5).

The material found in the Ignatian letters is rich and deserves close scrutiny, but again we can only summarize the salient aspects of the data. Ignatius uses "Christ" as part of Jesus' name frequently (e.g., Ign. Eph. 3.1-2; 6.2; 9.2; 14.1; 16.2). We find the phrase "in Jesus Christ" or "in Christ Jesus" (Ign. Eph. 9.2; 10.3; Ign. Magn. 6.2; Ign. Trall. 9.2, 13.2; Ign. Rom. 1.1; 6.1), which Ignatius seems to prefer to the shorter "in Christ." Ignatius also speaks of being "of Christ" (Ign. Eph. 14.2) and uses the phrase "Jesus Christ, our Lord" (Ign. Eph. 7.2).

He is emphatic about calling Jesus Christ "God" or "our God" to a degree and in a manner not found in the canonical literature. There are six explicit references and five more references where the identification of Christ and God is probably implicit, though the name or title Christ does not always occur in such texts (cf. Ign. Eph. presc.; Ign. Eph. 1.1; 7.2; 15.3; 17.2; 18.2; 19.3; Ign. Rom. presc.; Ign. Rom. 3.3; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; Ign.

Pol. 8.3; and see Trakatellis 1991).

Like Clement, Ignatius sees Jesus as the Christ throughout his earthly career and beyond; hence he can speak of Christ currently granting permission through prayer (Ign. Eph. 20.1) but also can refer to "the new human being Jesus Christ, which I have begun to discuss, dealing with his faith and his love, his suffering and his resurrection" (Ign. Eph. 20.1; cf. Ign. Trall. presc.). He emphasizes both the human and divine natures of Christ.

As a further development Ignatius uses the phrase christophoroi, paralleling it with theophoroi (Ign. Eph. 9.2)—Christians are both God-bearers and Christ-bearers in the world. This high christology was not invented by Ignatius but rather "can very well be seen as echoes of John 1 and 1 Corinthians 15" (Trakatellis 1991, 430). Ignatius follows the lead of earlier Christian traditions and more strongly emphasizes the divine side of the christological equation. The effect of this is that it pushes the idea of "the Christ" as a proxy and representative for God on earth somewhat into the background (Grundmann 1974, p. 574).

Ignatius frequently couples the appellation "Christ Jesus" or the reverse with the description "our savior" (Ign. Eph. 1.1; Ign. Magn. presc.; Ign. Phld. 9.2). He uses the phrase "the faith of Jesus Christ," in the sense of the faith about Jesus (Ign. Magn. 1.1), and the phrase "the law of Jesus Christ" occurs (Ign. Magn. 2.1). Jesus Christ is also called "the new leaven" (Ign. Magn. 10.2).

God the Father is said to operate and manifest himself through (dia) Jesus Christ (Ign. Magn. 5.2; 8.2). There is stress on there being only one Christ who came forth from the one Father (Ign. Magn. 7.2) as God's only Son (Ign. Rom. presc.).

As part of his theory that the Jewish faith derives from Christianity and not vice versa (Ign. Magn. 10.3; see Christianity and Judaism) Ignatius also claims that the divine (OT) prophets lived according to Jesus Christ (Ign. Magn. 8.2). This is part of his polemic to warn off Christians from Jewish practices.

Ignatius speaks of exhorting "in the name of Jesus Christ," apparently as a solemn sanction to make sure something is done (Ign. Pol. 5.1).

Unlike all the other authors mentioned in this article, Ignatius uses language about Christ that foreshadows the eucharistic developments of the early Middle Ages. Thus he says he desires "the bread of God which is the flesh of Jesus Christ. . . . And for drink I desire his blood, which is incorruptible agape" (Ign. Rom. 7.3). He urges, "Be careful . . . to use one Eucharist (for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ and one cup for union with his blood)" (Ign. Phld. 4.1).

Justin Martyr, even though he wrote in the middle of the second century, shows that the titular sense of Christos was not forgotten by Christians even 120 or more years after Jesus' death. The majority of times when Christos occurs in the probably authentic writings of Justin (Apology I, Apology II and the Dialogue with Trypho) it is used as a part of a name for Jesus ("Jesus Christ"; Justin Apol. I 12, 21, 23 et al.) or occasionally the reverse ("Christ Jesus," Dial. Tryph. 35) or alone as his name ("We have learned from Christ," Justin Apol. I 8, 41, 49). Justin also speaks of "our Christ" (Justin Apol. I 11, 31; Apol. II 10). He even combines two titles in the phrase "our Christ and Lord" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 133).

Justin is also fond of combinations such as "our master Jesus Christ" (Justin Apol. I 19) or "our Savior Jesus Christ" (Justin Apol. I 33). More significant are the references to "the Christ" (Justin Apol. I 49; Dial. Tryph. 32), "the Christ of God" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 8) or "God's Christ" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 136). He evens refer to "the knowledge of God and of his Christ" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 28, 133). If we ask what accounts for the prevalent use of Christos in its proper sense as a title rather than as a name, this may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that Justin was born in Samaria* (Nablus), seems to have grown up in a Semitic environment and was well acquainted with the OT. Yet he is also capable of going beyond the Jewish sense of the term and refers to Christ as an inclusive divine person in striking fashion: "As therefore Christ is the Israel and the Jacob, even so we, who have been quarried out from the bowels of Christ, are the true Israelite race" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 135). There is greater variety in Justin's use of Christos than in most of the other authors we have surveyed.

7. Conclusions.

We have endeavored to show the rich and varied use of the term Christos in the literature under survey. One could say a good deal more, but the following conclusions seem to be warranted.

There do not seem to be any clear distinctions to be made between Hellenistic and Jewish Christian handling of the "Christ" concept. Some of the more Jewish documents use "Christ" as a simple name, and some of those documents assumed to be less Jewish reflect knowledge of the Jewish background of the concept.

While it is not true that one cannot find references to Christ as divine in the canon,* especially in some of its later documents (e.g., 2 Pet), it is true to say that the use of such language escalated in the second century A.D., especially in the case of Ignatius, in part because of the rise of christological controversies within the Christian community and disputes with opponents.

The term Christ is sometimes used indiscriminately of any and all phases of the career of Christ, including apparently his preincarnate and postincarnate existence. There is little or no evidence of adoptionist tendencies unless Acts 2:36 provides such evidence (see 1 above).

"Christ" is frequently used as a name and sometimes as a title but also as a description of a relationship. Jesus is God's anointed but the believer's Lord.

The Pauline concept of being "in Christ" seems to have influenced a wide range of Christians, including especially Ignatius and Clement and to a lesser degree the author of 1 Peter.

The general avoidance of juxtaposing the two titles "Lord Christ" is notable and suggests that the early Christian writers knew the background of the term Christ and knew it was not merely a name, even when they do not make this explicit by calling Jesus "the Christ."

The eucharistic use of Christos language clearly appears only in Ignatius in the data we analyzed, and in this regard he stands out not only from his predecessors but also from his contemporaries and near contemporaries in the second century. His usage is a harbinger of things to come.

Our authors seem to understand that the term Christ refers to a human being, one anointed by God, and in some cases, such as we find in Ignatius, this is made clear when Christ is called "the new human being." Yet many authors also refer to Jesus Christ as God.

Notably absent in all this material is any attempt to explain the term Christ by using the phrase "the Son of Man."

To judge from Acts it appears that demonstrating Jesus to be the Christ was an exercise undertaken by Jewish Christian preachers and teachers on behalf of a largely Jewish audience.

The royal or messianic background of the term Christos is not emphasized in most of the sources considered in this article, but it can be argued to be determinative of how the term is used in most cases (cf. Hahn).

It has also been argued that the parting of the ways between Judaism and early Christianity in the late first century accelerated the process whereby Jesus was called God openly and frequently, and this may be so, but it is notable that some early Jews did use exalted language to speak of various agents, both supernatural (angelic)* and human, between God and humankind (cf. Hurtado 1988). My suggestion is that the high christological language used by early Christians ultimately goes back to some of the sapiential language Jesus and early Jewish Christians used to portray the man from Nazareth as God's Wisdom* come in the flesh (Witherington, Sage 1994). Jesus and his self-presentation stand as the middle term between the particularization of Wisdom as residing on earth in Torah (Sir) and the hypostasization of Wisdom (Wis) and the use of the term theos of Christ (in the NT and in Pliny).

See also CHRISTOLOGY; DOCETISM; LAMB; LOGOS CHRISTOLOGY; LORD; PREEXISTENCE; SHEPHERD, FLOCK; SON OF GOD; STONE, CORNERSTONE; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Black, "The Christological Use of the Old Testament in the New Testament," NTS 18 (1971-72) 1-14; F. Büchsel, Die Christologie des Hebräerbriefs (Gütersloh: Bertelmann, 1922); V. Burch, "Factors in the Christology of the Letter to the Hebrews," Exp 47 (1921) 68-79; R. P. Casey, "The Earliest Christologies," JTS 10 (1959) 253-77; N. Cleary, "Jesus, Pioneer and Source of Salvation: The Christology of Hebrews 1-6," TBT 67 (1973) 1242-48; F. B. Craddock, The Preexistence of Christ in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963); N. A. Dahl, Jesus the Christ: The Historical Origins of Christological Doctrine (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1991); W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of 1 Peter 3:18—4:6 (Rome: Pontifical Institute Press, 1965); P. E. Davies, "Primitive Christology in 1 Peter" in Festschrift to Honor F. W. Gingrich, ed. E. H. Barth and R. E. Cocraft (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 115-22; S. Duffy, "The Early Church Fathers and the Great Councils: The Emergence of Classical Christology" in Jesus, One and Many: The Christological Concept of New Testament Authors, ed. E. Richard (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1988) 435-86; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980) 51-56; idem, "Christology (NT)," ABD 1:979-91; E. J. Goodspeed, "First Clement Called Forth by Hebrews," JBL 30 (1911) 157-60; W. Grundmann, "χρίω, χριστός κτλ," TDNT 9:527-80; F. Hahn, "χριστός," EDNT 3:478-86; A. T. Hanson, Jesus Christ in the Old Testament (London: SPCK, 1965); M. J. Harris, Jesus as God: The New Testament Use of Theos in Reference to Jesus (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992); M. Hengel, Between Jesus and Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); A. J. B. Higgins, "The Priestly Messiah," NTS 13 (1967) 211-39; P. E. Hughes, "The Christology of Hebrews," SWJT 28 (1985) 19-27; L. D. Hurst, "The Christology of Hebrews 1 and 2" in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament, ed. L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987) 151-64; L. Hurtado, One God, One Lord (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); D. Jones, "The Title Christos in Luke-Acts," CBQ 32 (1970) 69-76; M. de Jonge, "Christ," ABD (1992) 1:914-21; idem, "The Earliest Christian Use of Christos," NTS 32 (1986) 321-43; idem, "The Use of the Expression ho Christos in the Apocalypse of John" in L'Apocalypse johannique et l'apocalyptique dan le Nouveau Testament, ed. J. Lambrecht (BETL 53; Gembloux: Duculot; Louvain: Leuven University, 1980); J. Macquarrie, "The Rise of Classical Christology" in Jesus Christ in Modern Thought (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990) 147-72; I. H. Marshall, Jesus the Savior: Studies in New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990); D. Moessner, "The Script of the Scriptures: Suffering and the Cross in Acts" in History, Literature and Society in the Book of Acts, ed. B. Witherington III (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); C. F. D. Moule, "The Christology of Acts" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (Nashville: Abingdon, 1966) 159-85; C. D. Osburn, "The Christological Use of 1 Enoch 1.9 in Jude 14, 15," NTS 23 (1976-77) 334-41; T. E. Pollard, Johannine Christology and the Early Church (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970); E. Richard, "The Functional Christology of First Peter" in Perspectives on First Peter, ed. C. H. Talbert (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1986) 121-39; idem, Jesus One and Many: The Christological Concept of New Testament Authors (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1988); J. A. T. Robinson, "The Most Primitive Christology of All?" in Twelve New Testament Studies (London: SCM, 1962) 139-52; S. S. Smalley, "The Christology of Acts Again" in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973) 79-94; E. Schweizer, "Paul's Christology and Gnosticism" in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, ed. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (London: SPCK, 1982) 115-23; D. Trakellis, "God Language in Ignatius of Antioch" in The Future of Early Christianity: Essays in Honor of Helmut Koester, ed. B. A. Pearson et al. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 422-430; B. Witherington III, "The Influence of Galatians on Hebrews," NTS 37 (1991) 146-52; idem, Jesus the Sage: the Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); idem, Paul's Narrative Thought World: The Tapestry of Tragedy and Triumph (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); idem, "A Petrine Source in 2nd Peter?" SBLSP (1985) 187-92; idem, "The Waters of Birth—John 3:5 and 1 John 5:6-8," NTS 35 (1989) 155-60; F. M. Young, "Christological Ideas in the Greek Commentaries on Hebrews," JTS 20 (1969) 150-63.

B. Witherington III

CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS

In recent years the factors involved in the separation of Christianity from Judaism have stimulated much discussion and are themselves a byproduct of a healthy Jewish-Christian dialogue that has been under way for some time. Review of these factors helps explain why Judaism and Christianity moved so far apart, even though both religions sprang from common roots, and helps in part to explain the origin of anti-Semitism. Critical study of these religions' common roots and the causes of their separation is important, and its continuation should be encouraged.

Christian and Jewish separation has often in recent years been referred to in terms of the "partings of the ways" (see Dunn 1992). This more or less neutral language may, however, mask aspects of the bitterly opposed perspectives of early Jews and Christians themselves (see Lieu). Some of these perspectives will be considered below.

1. Jesus, the Apostles and the New Testament Writings
2. Christianity's Gentile Mission
3. The Divinization of Jesus
4. Historical Factors
5. Jewish and Christian Polemic

1. Jesus, the Apostles and the New Testament Writings.

The roots of early Christianity's separation from Judaism are found in the teachings of Jesus, the apostles* and the NT writings; that is, the roots of the separation are found in the earliest forms of Christianity. But this is not to say that Jesus and his earliest followers intended to found a new religion, one that would break away from the mother faith. Jesus and his earliest followers variously sought renewal and/or proclaimed eschatological* fulfillment within the context of Jewish faith. However, their liberal summons to sinners to enter the community of the redeemed and their criticisms of Torah-observant Jews who opposed this summons sowed the seeds of separation, which in the wake of political and social events and theological developments would later bear fruit.

1.1. The Message of Jesus. However the kingdom* that Jesus preached is to be understood, it seems clear that he envisioned it as open to a great many. We see this inclusiveness not only in his words but also in his actions. Jesus associated with "sinners" and other marginalized members of Jewish society and even showed consideration for Gentiles.* Jesus' inclusiveness paved the way for the later inclusion of Gentiles and other non-Torah-observant persons that marked Christian mission* and evangelism.*

But the message of Jesus was in no sense un-Jewish or anti-Jewish. Every aspect of Jesus' social and religious life and activities was thoroughly Jewish. Jesus frequented the synagogue,* visited the temple,* may very well have had concerns with matters of purity,* never challenged the authority of Torah (though he openly disagreed with the interpretation of Torah held by many of the religious teachers of his day; see Law) and evidently spoke of the fulfillment of Scripture. His proclamation of the kingdom should be understood within the context of a theology of restoration. In short, Jesus anticipated through God's* intervention the restoration of Israel.* In every sense Jesus' message affirmed historic Israel and answered Jewish eschatological hopes,* as Jesus understood them.

1.2. The Apostolic Kerygma. Another factor that paved the way for the separation of Christianity and Judaism was the former's exclusivistic doctrine of salvation.* Early Christians proclaimed Jesus as the only way of salvation (Acts 4:12; Jn 14:6). This exclusivism stood somewhat in tension with Christianity's inclusivism. The gospel* was available to all; anyone could repent and be saved (see the use of Joel 2:32 in Acts 2:21 and Rom 10:13). But this repentance had to be combined with faith* in Jesus as the only Savior of humanity.

Like non-Christian Jews who believed that redemption lay in holding fast to certain beliefs and behaviors, early Christian Jews (see Jewish Christianity) also held fast to certain beliefs and behaviors. The principal point of disagreement lay in which beliefs and behaviors should be regarded as normative. Christian Jews understood the content of faith to revolve around Jesus' teaching, his life, his death* and his resurrection,* while their behavior increasingly revolved around the acceptance and inclusion of persons many Torah-observant Jews regarded as outside the community of the redeemed or redeemable.

The apostolic kerygma also implied that Israel's religious leaders seriously erred in opposing Jesus and in having participated in the events that led to his execution at the hands of the Romans. This criticism is underscored emphatically in the passion narratives (see esp. Mt 27:25) and reiterated elsewhere (Acts 2:23; 4:8-12; 5:17-42; 1 Cor 1—2; 1 Thess 4:14-16). Although the Jewish people as a whole are not condemned, the sharp condemnation of the religious leaders, including criticism leveled at the more popular Pharisees, probably deepened the growing rift between Christian Jews and proselytes on the one side and non-Christian Jews on the other.

1.3. The New Testament Writings. The polemic of the NT, though in-house criticism, paved the way for later anti-Judaistic and eventually anti-Semitic expressions that would drive a wedge between Jews and Christians. Paul's discussion of Jewish-Gentile relations in Romans 9—11 is especially important. Paul believed that owing to a lack of faith, Israel has "stumbled" (Rom 9:32-33, quoting parts of Is 28:16 and 8:14-15). Israel has attempted to establish its own righteousness,* the apostle avers, not knowing that God bestows it and that it is received through faith (Rom 10:1-17). Israel has rejected the proclamation of the gospel and instead has behaved as a "disobedient and contrary people" (Rom 10:21, quoting Is 65:2). Paul adds that only the elect* have obtained God's grace,* but "the rest (of Israel) were hardened" (Rom 11:7, with Rom 11:8-10 quoting Is 29:10 and Ps 69:22-23 as scriptural explanation and confirmation). With respect to the gospel, these fallen Israelites are "enemies of God" (Rom 11:28).

But Paul is not in any sense un-Jewish or anti-Jewish (as is sometimes alleged), any more than were the Essenes, who harshly criticized fellow Jews for not observing the law according to their interpretation (see 1QS 2:4-9; 5:10-13; 1QH 4:9-14). As Romans 11 (see esp. Rom 11:1-2, 26-32) makes clear, Paul firmly believed that the Jewish people, his own people, remained the people of God, even if estranged through their unbelief in the gospel. In Galatians 1 and Philippians 3 Paul speaks of his achievements in his "former life in Judaism" (Gal 1:13). But though he regarded these achievements as "refuse" (Phil 3:8), this does not mean that the Jewish people or Judaism as the faith of the OT had been abandoned. Paul regarded his pre-Christian life, in which he strove to attain to a righteousness outside of the provision of Christ and in which he persecuted* the Christian faith, as completely wrongheaded and therefore completely worthless. But the coming of Christ and the accomplishment of the cross* are part of the Jewish heritage, the fulfillment of Jewish Scripture and the true essence of Judaism (Rom 9:1-5).

Some of the criticisms found in the Gospels themselves also contributed to the later polemic that drove Christianity out of and away from Judaism. One thinks of the sharp diatribe directed against the Pharisees in Matthew 23. Especially noteworthy is the angry exchange between Jesus and the Pharisees depicted in John 8 (Jn 8:44: "you are of your father the devil"). As forthright as this material is, in its original setting and composition it gave expression to in-house debate and polemic, not anti-Semitism. This polemical material, however, did provide an increasingly gentilizing church* a significant corpus of authoritative tradition* out of which anti-Semitic ideas and expressions could be fashioned (see Evans and Hagner; Gager).

1.4. Jewish and Christian Interpretation of the "Four Pillars." Dunn identifies four important pillars of Second Temple Jewish faith: (1) monotheism (the affirmation that God* is one), (2) election* (the affirmation of Israel as the chosen people of God), (3) covenant* (as affirmed and described in Torah) and (4) the land* of Israel (including Jerusalem* and the temple*). Dunn explores in what ways Jews and Christians understood these pillars and finds in their differing understandings the seeds of separation. This important work deserves special consideration.

Dunn observes that Christians became increasingly critical not only of the temple establishment (a criticism that had roots in Jesus' ministry) but even of the temple itself. The temple came to be viewed as "made with human hands" (Acts 7:48), implying that it had taken on idolatrous connotations (see Hellenists; Stephen). God no longer resided in the temple, but in the Christian community. Sacrifice* was no longer needed, because Christ had died once for all. Even Christians themselves fulfilled the priestly* function of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:18; 1 Pet 2:5, 9; Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6).

Although Jesus disputed with his contemporaries the requirements of Torah and the question of election—on what grounds human beings receive forgiveness* and how they might qualify for admission into the kingdom—he accepted the basic concept of Israel's election. In comparison to Pharisees, Jesus was more inclusive, and he symbolized this inclusiveness by his table fellowship with persons some regarded as sinful and neglectful of Torah. Paul advanced Jesus' inclusiveness still further by teaching that Gentiles did not need to observe the fundamentals of Jewish identity, such as circumcision,* observance of the sabbath and food* laws.

Dunn finds that Jesus held to Jewish monotheism and that although he saw himself as a prophet empowered with God's Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and as having a close relationship with God, he did not understand himself as a divine figure. Dunn believes that in response to the resurrection* and the emergence of a theology of exaltation,* whereby Jesus was envisioned as seated in heaven* at God's right hand, Jesus came increasingly to be viewed as sharing in divine functions. This christology* in time grew into expressions of deification, which in non-Jewish Christian circles led to assertions of Jesus' equality, even identity, with God.

Dunn's arguments with respect to land, election and Torah are well taken, but his arguments with respect to monotheism and christology require some qualification. It can be plausibly argued that the recognition of Jesus' divinity began during his ministry,* not in the early church in response to the resurrection. Such an argument would appeal to messianic traditions* that imply a divine status for the Messiah (1 Chron 17:13; Ps 2:2, 7; Dan 7:9-14; 1QSa 2:11-12; 4Q521 1 ii 1; 4Q246 2:1), traditions that would have tempered messianic hopes* associated with Jesus, and Jesus' own tendency to assume divine prerogatives in his words and deeds (Mt 11:25-30; Mk 2:7; 2:27-28; 14:61-64; Lk 7:49; 11:21-22). Of course this is not to say that the trinitarian monotheism and christology of the fourth and fifth centuries represent no significant advancement of Jesus' teachings and activities. The contribution to the Jewish-Christian rift that the deification of Jesus made will be explored further in section 3 below.

2. Christianity's Gentile Mission.

Christian evangelization* of Gentiles* was out of step with Jewish proselytism. Jewish proselytes were to take on the yoke of the Torah (m. 'Abot 3:5), which involved scrupulous observation of sabbath and food laws. But early Christian proselytism seemed, in the eyes of its Jewish critics, bent on removing the yoke of the Torah. The councils depicted in Acts 11 and 15 exemplify the nature of the problems brought on by early Christianity's aggressive Gentile mission.* Pauline polemic against the "Judaizers" (as esp. seen in Gal) offers firsthand evidence of how divisive this issue was.

Although profoundly theologically and programmatic, the account in Acts 8—15 reflects a very real struggle in the life of the early church. The criticisms against the Gentile mission, portrayed as within the early church itself, raised the fundamental question of whether Gentiles were fit for the gospel of Messiah Jesus. The council described in Acts 15 convened to explore the question whether Christian Jews could "eat with" Christian Gentiles. The council decided that they could, because God had given his Holy Spirit to the Gentiles. The indwelling of the Holy Spirit provides divine warranty that in Christ the Gentiles are pure. As such, Christian Jews should have no qualms about fellowshipping with them.

The council described in Acts 15 treated more directly the question of salvation. Christian Pharisees asserted that "it is necessary to circumcise" the Gentile converts "and to charge them to keep the law of Moses*" if they are to be saved (Acts 15:1, 5). But the council decided it was not necessary to require that the "yoke of Torah" be placed on the Christian Gentiles. They were instead to be urged to "abstain from the pollutions of idols* and from unchastity and from what is strangled and from blood" (Acts 15:20, 29). These instructions evidently echo the Mosaic legislation that applies to "strangers" who reside among the Jews (cf. Lev 17:8-13; 18:26) and perhaps the Noachic covenant (Gen 9:3-4). In other words, Christian Gentiles are under no obligation to observe the Israelite covenant itself, as commanded in the written Torah and explicated in oral Torah (the oral traditions), but they are obligated to live godly lives. They cannot simply live as the heathen do.

Because the early church imposed on Gentile converts only the laws that applied to the nations and the sojourners among Israel, conflict with non-Christian Jews, whose faith in the post-70 era increasingly was defined by rabbinic halakoth, was unavoidable. (Halakoth are exegetically derived legal opinions; halākôṯ coming from halāk, i.e., "how one should walk.") Christian Halakoth and rabbinic Halakoth could hardly have been in sharper disagreement. On this score alone, separation was inevitable.

3. The Divinization of Jesus.

The tendency of the Greco-Roman church to deify Jesus in the absolute sense, that is, to intensify Johannine and Pauline christology in terms of Jesus as God (in contrast to Ebionite* christology), only made Christianity all the more unacceptable to Jews. The divinization of Jesus stood in tension with strict Jewish monotheism, and in its extremest form of presentation it appeared to be a direct violation of the First Commandment (Ex 20:3; Deut 5:7).

As has been suggested above, the roots of deification are probably to be found in Jesus' teaching and activities. But at best the sense of divine identity is implicit and only hinted at. It is in the theologies of Paul and the Fourth Evangelist that the divinization of Jesus became explicit and then paved the way for the absolute deification that would later characterize Greco-Roman Christianity.

3.1. Pauline Christology. Paul routinely refers to Jesus as "Christ"* and as "Lord"* (Rom 1:3, 7; 5:1, 11, passim). The first title gives expression to the Jewish hope for the appearance of an anointed* descendant of David through whom Israel would be restored and the kingdom of God be established (Rom 1:3-4; see Kingdom of God). The second title normally functions as a title of respect and does not necessarily denote deity (as though "Lord" necessarily referred to Yahweh). But there is one instance that is of special interest.

In Romans 10:9 Paul tells his readers, "If you confess with your lips that Jesus is Lord and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved." The apostle then digresses (Rom 10:10-12), explaining aspects of faith and confession and how it is that all people—Jew and Gentile alike—must make this confession. He concludes his argument—and here is the interesting point—by quoting from Joel 2:32: "For 'everyone who calls upon the name of the Lord will be saved' " (Rom 10:13). The close association of Jesus, who is "Lord," with the "name of the Lord" in the quotation from Joel is remarkable. At the very least Paul seems to presuppose a very close relationship between the Lord Jesus and the Lord God.

The "name" of the Lord also plays an important role in the Christ hymn* of Philippians 2:6-11, in which we are told that Jesus has received the "name which is above every name" and will be confessed by all as "Lord." The exaltation of Jesus in this hymn (note especially the assertion in Phil 2:6 that Jesus possessed "equality with God") clearly implies that Paul thought of Jesus in terms of divinity, probably as God's coregent.

After cataloging Israel's rich heritage (Rom 9:1-5), Paul concludes with a eulogy (Rom 9:5) that bears an uncertain syntactical relationship to what precedes. The RSV renders the relevant portion of the verse thus: "and of their race, according to the flesh, is the Christ. God who is over all be blessed for ever. Amen." The original Greek, of course, had no punctuation. The NASB translates: "and from whom is the Christ according to the flesh, who is over all, God blessed forever. Amen." Some scholars have argued that in this one place Paul has confessed Jesus to be God. Such a confession would put a serious strain on the monotheism of Judaism.

In the Pastoral Epistles, whose Pauline authorship many dispute, there may be further examples of the divinization of Jesus. Of special interest is the affirmation in Titus 2:13, which may be rendered literally "awaiting the blessed hope and appearance of the glory of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ." Some have insisted that the verse be translated "awaiting the blessed hope and appearance of the glory of our great God and of our Savior Jesus Christ." The use of the definite article, however, supports the first translation, as opposed to the second, which would distinguish "great God" from "Savior Jesus Christ." An affirmation such as this would have been viewed by most first- and second-century Jews as clearly in violation of monotheistic faith.

3.2. Johannine Christology. Johannine christology appears to have been fashioned from Jewish wisdom* ideas and the related concept of the shaliach (lit. "one who is sent" from heaven; šāliaḥ in Hebrew, apostolos in Greek). Shaliach and wisdom ideas were easily exploited by first-century Christians who were trying to explain to themselves and to others who Jesus was and what was the nature of his relationship to God. In the Fourth Gospel Jesus is presented as the Word that became flesh* (Jn 1:1, 14). The function of the Johannine "Word" (logos) approximates that of Wisdom, which in biblical and postbiblical traditions is sometimes personified (Prov 8:1—9:6; Sir 24:1-34; one should note that in Sir 24:3, Wisdom is identified as the word that proceeds from God's mouth). As God's shaliach (see Jn 13:16; 17:3; cf. Mt 15:24; Lk 4:18, 43; Heb 3:1) Jesus is able to reveal the Father (Jn 14:9: "He who has seen me has seen the father") and complete his "work" on earth (Jn 17:4: "I have accomplished the work which you gave me to do"). The theme of Jesus being sent from heaven finds frequent expression in the Johannine writings (Jn 3:16-17, 34; 5:36-38; 6:29, 57; 7:29; 10:36; 11:42; 17:3, 8, 18, 21, 23, 25; 20:21; 1 Jn 4:9, 10, 14). As the one who had been sent from heaven, Jesus now sends his disciples into the world to continue his ministry (Jn 4:38; 17:18; 20:21).

In three passages Jesus is accused of blaspheming for claiming divine privilege and prerogatives. In the first passage Jesus supposedly breaks the sabbath by healing* a man and then intensifies the ensuing controversy by referring to God as his Father (Jn 5:16-18). Jesus' critics infer from this claim that Jesus has made himself "equal with God." The second passage is similar. In it Jesus affirms, "I and the Father are one" (Jn 10:30). His critics take up stones to stone him, because, athough only a human, Jesus has made himself God. But the meaning here is probably not that Jesus has literally claimed to be God. The claim to be one with God probably relates to the shaliach concept. As God's representative, sent to do God's work, Jesus can claim that he is "one" with the Father.

But a third passage, in which Jesus states, "Before Abraham was, I am" (Jn 8:58), probably does imply a divine identity of Jesus. The Greek is somewhat ambiguous. The words "I am" (egō eimi) may very well be a conscious allusion to God, who in the Scriptures of Israel reveals himself as the God "who is" (LXX Is 43:10: "that you should know and believe and understand that I am [egō eimi]"). That these words in John should be understood in an epiphanic sense is strongly supported by the description of the arrest scene: "When he said to them, 'I am,' they drew back and fell to the ground" (Jn 18:6). If John's use of egō eimi in these two passages was intended to imply that in some sense Jesus was the manifestation of Israel's God, then Jewish offense becomes understandable.

John's exaltation of Jesus appears to have been directly challenged by Rabbi Abahu (third century), who is reported to have said, "If a man says to you, 'I am God,' he is a liar; [or] 'I am the son of man,' in the end he will regret it; [or] 'I will go up to heaven'—he that says it will not perform it" (y. Ta'an. 2.1). Elsewhere Abahu adds, "[God] says . . . 'I am the first'—I have no father; 'I am the last'—I have no son" (Ex. Rab. 29.5 [on Ex 20:2]). Similarly Rabbi Aha (fourth century) declares: "There is One that is alone, and he has not a second; indeed, he has neither son nor brother—but: 'Hear O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One' " (Deut. Rab. 2.33 [on Deut 6:4]). An anonymous saying offers further illustration: "There was a man, the son of a woman, who would rise up and seek to make himself God, and cause the entire world to err. . . . If he says that he is God, he lies; and in the future he will cause to err—that he departs and returns in the end. He says, but will not do. . . . Alas, who shall live of that people that listens to that man who makes himself God?" (Yal. Šim. on Num 23:7).

3.3. Patristic Christology. Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 110-65) tried to convince Trypho the Jew that in the Scriptures "Christ is called both God and Lord of hosts" (Dial. Tryph. 36, 85). Elsewhere Justin argued that Jesus is "God and Lord," the very same who appeared to Abraham and who with God the Father created the heavens and the earth (Dial. Tryph. 55–63). Justin's exegesis and theology represented logical extensions of what is for the most part only implied in the NT writings. The primary confession of the early church—that Jesus died for our sins, was raised on the third day and is now the Lord of the church—was becoming more oriented to ontological aspects of christology.

The Apostles' Creed (earliest form dating to c. A.D. 150) reflects the primitive elements of NT christology; part of it reads: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried. He descended into hell. The third day he rose again from the dead. He ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from there he shall come to judge the living and the dead." The antiquity of this creed is witnessed by the early baptismal catechism, dating from the time of Hippolytus (170?–235), in which the convert is asked: "Do you believe in Jesus Christ the Son of God, who was born of the Holy Spirit and the virgin Mary, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate and died and rose the third day living from the dead, and ascended into heaven and sat down at the right hand of the Father, and will come to judge the living and the dead?"

But the Nicene Creed (A.D. 325) reflects the growing interest in the question of Jesus' divine essence. Part of this creed reads: "I believe in . . . one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of his Father before all worlds; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father."

Church theologians became consumed with the difficult questions of Christ's divine nature—was he in essence similar (homoiousios) to God or the same (homoousios) as God? How can there be a God the Son and a God the Father, if there is only one God, as the OT and Jesus himself affirm? Orthodoxy answered this question with the concept of the triune Godhead (see the Athanasian Creed, which reads in part: "But the Godhead of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal . . . yet there are not three Gods, but one God . . . not three Lords, but one Lord"). All of this to Jewish ears sounded foreign and blasphemous and was answered in polemical treatments of the "two powers in heaven" heresy (i.e., the belief, especially in reference to Gnosticism,* that there were two or more gods; see Segal).

4. Historical Factors.

Several historical events played a part in Jewish and Christian separation. Some of these events did not directly reflect the growing Jewish-Christian dispute, but they did have an impact on it. Other events directly reflected the dispute and contributed significantly to Jewish-Christian antipathy.

4.1. The Jewish Wars. A major catalyst that led to the partings of the ways was the destruction of Jerusalem* and the temple in A.D. 70 and the later Bar Kokhba defeat (A.D. 135), which resulted in the loss of Jerusalem as a Jewish city and the loss of Israel as a state. Prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, the temple remained important to Christian Jews. We see this in Acts especially (Acts 2:46; 3:1; 5:20, 42; 21:26; 22:17). The destruction of the temple proved to be a significant loss of common ground.

The Bar Kokhba war also intensified hostilities between Christian and non-Christian Jews. According to patristic sources, Christians were persecuted by Simon ben Kosiba, who evidently had been dubbed "bar kokhba" (Aramaic for "son of the star"). Justin Martyr, a contemporary of Simon, relates that the Jews "count us foes and enemies; and, like yourselves, they kill and punish us whenever they have the power, as you can well believe. For in the Jewish war which lately raged, Bar Kokhba, the leader of the revolt of the Jews, gave orders that Christians alone should be led away to cruel punishments, unless they should deny [that] Jesus [is] the Christ and blaspheme" (Justin Apol. I 31.5-6). Eusebius, possibly dependent on Justin, similarly states that "Kokhba, prince of the Jewish sect, killed the Christians with all kinds of persecutions, when they refused to help him against the Roman troops" (Hadrian Year 17).

Why did the Christians refuse to support Simon's bid for freedom? The most probable reason is that Simon was regarded as the Messiah, as both Jewish and Christian sources relate (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.6.1–4; y. Ta'an. 4.5; b. Sanh. 93b). Christian allegiance to Jesus as the Messiah contradicted Simon's claims and undermined his authority. Christians "alone" were dealt with severely, because among the Jews they alone regarded someone else as Israel's Messiah.

4.2. The Jewish Hope of Rebuilding the Temple. Horbury draws our attention to Barnabas 16.1-4, a polemical passage that expresses criticism of the Jews for placing their confidence in the temple and, after it had been destroyed, hoping to rebuild it (see Horbury, in Dunn 1992, 315-45). Horbury thinks the author of Barnabas was alluding to the Jewish hope to rebuild the temple, perhaps at some time near the end of the Flavian dynasty. The author of Barnabas, as well as other Christians, may have feared a Jewish resurgence that would have undermined Christianity. In fact, such a resurgence was in some sense under way, and many Christian Jews were abandoning Christian teaching in order to remain loyal to the synagogue. Pressure to do so was greatly increased by the introduction of the Birkat ha-Minim (lit. "the blessing [or cursing] of the heretics"). Jews willing to utter this "benediction" tended to abandon Christianity, while Jews or proselytes unwilling to utter it were put out of the synagogue. (The revision of this benediction is treated in 5.1 below.)

4.3. The Demise of Jewish Membership in the Church. The demise of Jewish membership in the Christian church was hastened by punishment and persecution of Christian Jews within the synagogue, eventually followed by expulsions from the synagogue. The evidence for the former is found in the Gospels, Acts, Paul's letters and the book of Revelation. According to Mark 13:9, Jesus warns his disciples that "they will deliver you up to councils; and you will be beaten in synagogues." This material is carried over into Matthew (10:17) and Luke (21:12), perhaps with parallel material drawn from Q (Mt 10:19 par. Lk 12:11). A similar saying is also found in Matthew 23:34, which may have been drawn from the Evangelist's special source: "Therefore I send you prophets and wise men and scribes, some of whom you will kill and crucify, and some you will scourge in your synagogues and persecute from town to town." Similar traditions are related in the Acts of the Apostles, where we read of Paul and various traveling companions being persecuted and driven out of town (Acts 13:50-51; 14:2-6, 19-20; 17:5-9, 13-14; 18:6, 12-17). Indeed, prior to his conversion Paul is portrayed as a persecutor of the young church (Acts 7:58; 8:1-3; 9:1-9, 21; 22:4-5). That this portrait is not a self-serving and imaginative retelling of history is seen in Paul's own letters, where he admits with shame his role in trying to destroy the church ("I persecuted the church of God," 1 Cor 15:9; "you have heard of my former life in Judaism, how I persecuted the church of God violently and tried to destroy it," Gal 1:13, 23; "a persecutor of the church," Phil 3:6).

From the reference to the "synagogue of Satan" in Revelation 3:9 we should probably infer persecution, as the fuller context suggests: "I know that you have but little power, and yet you have kept my word and have not denied my name. Behold, I will make those of the synagogue of Satan who say that they are Jews and are not, but lie—behold, I will make them come and bow down before your feet, and learn that I have loved you" (Rev 3:8-9). This assurance strongly implies that the Christians understood themselves as the true Jews. What we have here is an intramural controversy involving Christian Jews and non-Christian Jews, with the former claiming to be the righteous remnant, the twelve thousand preserved from each of the twelve tribes (Rev 7:4-8; 14:1-3). The non-Christian Jews were stronger (probably in social and political standing, as well as in numbers) and were persecuting those who had believed the Christian message. These Christian Jews, who "have but little power," regarded their persecutors as not really Jews but apostates.

Similar polemic is found in the Fourth Gospel. In three passages we find explicit reference to Christian expulsion from the synagogue (Jn 9:22; 12:42; 16:2). Although it is possible that such actions were taken in the time of Jesus, it is probable that these threats reflected the experience of the Johannine community sometime late in the first century, perhaps in the wake of the revision of the twelfth benediction of the Amidah ('āmidāh, a set of eighteen benedictions that were to be recited "standing up" at the daily service of the synagogue) as part of concerted effort to drive Christians out of the synagogue. If anyone confessed Jesus as the Messiah, he was to be cast out of the synagogue. If such actions were indeed taking place in the late first century, then the decline in Jewish membership in the church is all the more understandable.

According to Eusebius, in the aftermath of the Bar Kokhba war the Jewish presence in the Christian church of Palestine was diminished still further. "I have not found any written statement of the dates of the bishops in Jerusalem, for tradition says that they were extremely short-lived, but I have gathered from documents this much—that up to the siege of the Jews by Hadrian the successions of bishops were fifteen in number. It is said that they were all Hebrews by origin who had nobly accepted the knowledge* of Christ, so that they were counted worthy even of the episcopal ministry by those who had the power to judge such questions. For their whole church at that time consisted of Hebrews who had continued Christian from the Apostles down to the siege at the time when the Jews again rebelled from the Romans and were beaten in a great war" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.4.1-2). Eusebius goes on to list the names and lengths of tenure of the Jewish bishops. He then comments that when the Bar Kokhba war ended, the church in Judea was no longer Jewish but was "composed of Gentiles," over whom a Gentile named Marcus was appointed bishop (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.5.4). As a result of this war Christianity had begun to evolve into a predominantly Gentile religion. As such, it is not surprising that Christian writers became increasingly ignorant and critical of their Jewish heritage.

4.4. The Use of Different Versions of Scripture. Hengel has pointed out the significance of the use of different versions of the OT (see Hengel, in Dunn 1992, 39-84). The synagogue continued to read and study the Scriptures in Hebrew as well as provide commentary on them in Aramaic. But Christians came to use the Greek translation, the Septuagint, almost exclusively. Most Christian Gentiles could read the Scriptures only in Greek (or in Latin), while there is some evidence that non-Christian Jews (and perhaps Christian Jews as well) were discouraged from reading the Septuagint. Hengel even suggests that Aquila's recension of the Septuagint may have been intended as a targum for Greek-speaking Jews, perhaps to counter Christian interpretation of the Greek version.

The use of different versions of Scripture worked as a wedge, further dividing Christians from Jews. As the church became increasingly dominated by Gentiles, it became increasingly Greek and non-Hebrew. The church's use of the Septuagint reflected this ethnic shift and at the same time contributed to it.

5. Jewish and Christian Polemic.

From the second century on Jewish and Christian polemics not only intensified but took on a new character. The polemics were no longer those of squabbling siblings but those of largely ethnically distinct peoples who viewed one another as foreign. Jews began to regard Christianity as idolatry* and heresy; Christians began to view Judaism in terms of apostasy* and obduracy.

5.1. Jewish Polemic and Rejection of Christianity. Jewish polemic directed against Christianity could be just as harsh and ugly as was Christian polemic, though with the ascendancy of Christianity, Jewish polemic came to be muted and sometimes was even edited out of texts. Some of the Jewish polemic is preserved in "dialogues" composed by Christians. The best known is Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. Although these dialogues are artificial and routinely portray the Christian apologists as refuting, even silencing, their Jewish opponents, the nature of the objections raised by the Jews in all probability accurately reflects the arguments and polemic that Jews directed against Christians.

Justin's Trypho found it difficult to accept that Jesus could really have been the fulfillment of the Jewish Scriptures. How could Jesus have been the Messiah, since he had been defeated and put to death by the Romans in such a shameful manner? Trypho declares: "Be assured that all our nation awaits the Messiah; and we admit that all the Scriptures which you have quoted refer to him. . . . But we are in doubt about whether the Messiah should be so shamefully crucified. For whoever is crucified is said in the Law to be accursed, so that I am very skeptical on this point. It is quite clear, to be sure, the Scriptures announce that the Messiah had to suffer; but we wish to learn if you can prove it to us whether by suffering* he was cursed . . . Prove to us whether he must also be crucified and die such a disgraceful and dishonorable death, cursed by the Law. For we cannot bring ourselves even to consider this" (Dial. Tryph. 89–90).

With the passage of time the polemic became much sharper, even hateful. Civil arguments, such as we find in Justin's Dialogue, gave way to vituperation and slurs. The polemic found in the Talmud and Midrashim document some of this nastier polemic. In reference to Jesus' birth we find: "She who was the descendant of princes and governors [= Mary] played the harlot with carpenters [= Joseph]" (b. Sanh. 106a). Jesus is accused of idolatry: "When king Jannai [104-78 B.C.] slew our rabbis, R. Joshua and Jesus fled to Alexandria of Egypt. On the resumption of peace . . . he arose, went, and found himself in a certain inn, where great honor was shown him. 'How beautiful is this innkeeper!' Thereupon Jesus observed, 'Rabbi, her eyes are narrow.' 'Wretch,' he rebuked him, 'do you engage yourself thus?' He sounded four hundred trumpets and excommunicated him. He [Jesus] came before him many times pleading, 'Receive me!' But he would pay no heed to him. One day he [R. Joshua] was reciting the Shema, when Jesus came before him. He intended to receive him and made a sign to him. He [Jesus], thinking that it was to repel him, went, put up a brick, and worshipped it. 'Repent,' said he [R. Joshua] to him. He replied, 'I have thus learned from you: "He who sins and causes others to sin is not afforded the means of repentance" ' " (b. Sanh. 107b; cf. b. Soṭa 47a). We are told that Jesus had five disciples and that their names imply a variety of evils and misfortunes (b. Sanh. 107b). In various places Jesus is accused of having practiced magic* and having led Israel astray (b. Sanh. 43a; t. Šab. 11.15; b. Šab. 104b). Indeed, Jesus can be raised through incantation (b. Giṭ. 57a, MS M).

As early as the end of the first century the liturgy of the synagogue was modified to discourage Christian Jews. It was apparently at this time that the twelfth benediction of the ancient Jewish prayer, called the Amidah (or Shemoneh Esreh), was expanded: "Can anyone among you frame a benediction relating to the heretics? Samuel the Lesser arose and composed it" (b. Ber. 28b). Samuel the Lesser's composition may have something to do with the revision of the twelfth benediction: "For apostates let there be no hope, and the kingdom of arrogance quickly uproot. [In a moment let the Nazarenes and the heretics be destroyed; let them be blotted from the Book of Life, and with the righteous not be inscribed.] Blessed are you, O Lord, who loves judgment!" (Amidah §12). The bracketed words are thought to be the later inserted material. It was probably to this malediction (often referred as the Birkat ha-Minim, lit. "blessing of the heretics") that Justin alluded when he told Trypho, "You curse in your synagogues all those who are called from him Christians" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 96).

Note also the comment made by the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, who claims that Christians "are warred upon by the Jews as foreigners" (Diogn. 5.17). Horbury (1982) has argued that the expanded twelfth benediction was an attempt to strengthen older expulsion mechanisms. Kimelman's argument (1980-82) that there never was an anti-Christian "blessing" in the synagogue is not persuasive.

In the end, to the Jewish mind, to convert to the Christian faith was to abandon one's Jewish identity. In Jewish thinking, Christianity was not simply wrong, it was idolatry and apostasy. Judaism and Christianity had moved from fraternal debate to a completely antithetical relationship. To become one was to cease being the other. This thinking, which with the demise of Jewish (Ebionite*) Christianity came to dominate sometime in the fifth century, marked a stage in the development of Jewish and Christian self-understanding that was far removed from the lively proclamations and in-house disputes of the first century.

5.2. Christian Polemic and Condemnation of Judaism. Judaism and Christianity were driven further apart by Christian polemic, which became increasingly ugly. According to Ignatius* of Antioch (early second century), "if we continue to live according to Judaism, we are admitting that we have not received grace" (Ign. Magn. 8.1). More sharply, Ignatius later says that "it is monstrous to talk of Jesus Christ and to practice Judaism" (Ign. Magn. 10.3). According to Barnabas 13—14 God's covenant with Israel ended when the people committed idolatry at Sinai; God's covenant is now with the Christian church alone. The author of the Epistle to Diognetus ridicules circumcision and the Jewish food laws (Diogn. 4.1-6). Opposition to Jewish practices contributed to Christian condemnation of the Jewish Christians called Nazoreans (Epiphanius Haer. 29; Augustine Haer. 9).

Later Christian polemic (third to fifth centuries) becomes noticeably more bitter. According to Chrysostom, "the synagogue is a temple of idolatry. . . . A synagogue is less honorable than any inn. For it is not simply a gathering place for thieves and hucksters, but also of demons. Indeed, not only the synagogue, but the soul of the Jews are also the dwelling places of demons" (Chrysostom Discourse 1.3.3—4.2). Christians accused Jews of apostasy and rebellion against God. And with respect to the execution of Jesus, the Jews were even accused of deicide, that is, of killing God. In the words of Melito* of Sardis: "And you killed the Lord at the great feast . . . O lawless Israel, what is this unprecedented crime that you committed, thrusting your Lord among unprecedented sufferings, your Sovereign, who formed you, who made you, who honored you, who called you 'Israel'? . . . And who has been murdered? Who is the murderer? I am ashamed to say and I am obliged to tell. . . . The Sovereign has been insulted; the God has been murdered; the King of Israel has been put to death by an Israelite right hand!" (Peri Pascha 567-84, 693-716).

Because of their rejection of Jesus and their ongoing unbelief in the Christian proclamation, God had abandoned the Jews to their doom. Cyprian asks, "Did not the Jews perish on this account, since they preferred to envy rather than to believe in Christ? Disparaging the great things that he did, they were deceived by a blinding jealousy and they were unable to open the eyes of their hearts so as to recognize his divine works" (Jealousy and Envy 5). Some patristic writers believed that there was no longer any hope for the redemption* of Israel (Chrysostom Hom. 1 Thess. 3 [on 1 Thess 2:14-16]; Eusebius Dem. Ev. 1.1; Augustine Civ. D. 18.46; 20.29; Aphrahat Dem. 23.20). (For a convenient assembly and summary of the primary documents that relate to Jewish-Christian polemic, see Callan. For bibliography of relevant secondary sources, see Siker in Charlesworth, ed., 242-48.)

These factors largely account for the disappearance of Jewish Christianity. This disappearance only widened the gap between Christianity (now almost exclusively non-Jewish) and the Jewish people (now almost without any Christians among its population). By the time the church reached its determinative period (fourth and fifth centuries) there was virtually no Jewish input. At about this same time, the rabbinic tradition, which was very critical of Jesus and Christianity, prevailed in defining Judaism. The shape of the NT canon and the definition of several important doctrines, such as the Trinity and the deity of Jesus, were settled without Jewish input. The final shape of Christianity therefore was increasingly non-Jewish, thus making Christianity less attractive and so widening further the gap between Jews and Christians.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; BARNABAS; CHURCH AS ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF GOD; CIRCUMCISION; DIASPORA JUDAISM; GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70; SYNAGOGUE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, "Jews and Judaizers in the Epistles of Ignatius" in Jews, Greeks and Christians: Religious Cultures in Late Antiquity, ed. R. Hammerton-Kelly and R. Scroggs (SJLA 21; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976) 220-44; T. Callan, Forgetting the Root: The Emergence of Christianity from Judaism (New York: Paulist, 1986); J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jews and Christians: Exploring the Past, Present and Future (New York: Crossroad, 1990); P. Donahue, "Jewish Christianity in the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch," VC 32 (1978) 81-93; J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); idem, ed., Jews and Christians: The Partings of the Ways A.D. 70 to 135 (WUNT 66; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr/Siebeck, 1992); C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner, eds., Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. G. Gager, The Origins of Anti-Semitism: Attitudes Toward Judaism in Pagan and Christian Antiquity (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985); L. Goppelt, Christentum und Judentum in ersten und zweiten Jahrhundert (Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1955); W. Horbury, "The Benediction of the Minim and Early Jewish-Christian Controversy," JTS 33 (1982) 19-61; J. Jocz, The Jewish People and Jesus Christ: A Study in the Relationship Between the Jewish People and Jesus Christ (London: SPCK, 1949); S. T. Katz, "The Separation of Judaism and Christianity After 70 C.E.: A Reconsideration," JBL 103 (1984) 43-76; H. C. Kee, "The Transformation of the Synagogue After 70 C.E.: Its Import for Early Christianity," NTS 36 (1990) 1-24; R. Kimelman, "Birkat Ha-Minim and the Lack of Evidence for an Anti-Christian Jewish Prayer in Late Antiquity" in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, ed. E. P. Sanders et al. (3 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980-82) 2:226-44, 391-403; A. J. F. Klijn and G. J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects (NovT-Sup 36; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); N. de Lange, Origen and the Jews: Studies in Jewish-Christian Relations in Third-century Palestine (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976); E. Lerle, "Liturgische Reformen des Synagogengottesdienstes als Antwort auf die judenchristliche Mission des ersten Jahrhunderts," NovT 10 (1968) 31-42; J. Lieu, " 'The Parting of the Ways': Theological Construct or Historical Reality?" JSNT 56 (1994) 101-19; G. Lindeskog, "Anfänge des jüdisch-christlichen Problems: Ein programmatischer Entwurf" in Donum Gentilicium: New Testament Studies in Honour of David Daube, ed. C. K. Barrett et al. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1978) 255-75; G. Lüdemann, Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); W. A. Meeks and R. L. Wilken, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era (SBLSBS 13; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); J. Parkes, The Conflict of the Church and the Synagogue: A Study of the Origins of Anti-Semitism (London: Soncino, 1934); H. G. Perelmuter, Siblings: Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity at their Beginnings (New York: Paulist, 1989); L. Schiffman, "At the Crossroads: Tannaitic Perspectives on the Jewish-Christian Schism" in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, ed. E. P. Sanders et al., (3 vols. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980-82) 2:115-56; idem, Who Was a Jew? Rabbinic and Halakhic Perspectives on the Jewish-Christian Schism (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav, 1985); H. J. Schoeps, Jewish Christianity: Factional Disputes in the Early Church (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, ed., Aspects of Religious Propaganda in Judaism and Early Christianity (University of Notre Dame Center for the Study of Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity 2; Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1976); A. F. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven: Early Rabbinic Reports About Christianity and Gnosticism (SJLA 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); J. S. Siker, Disinheriting the Jews: Abraham in Early Christian Controversy (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); M. Simon, Verus Israel: A Study of the Relations Between Christians and Jews in the Roman Empire (135–425) (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986); G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); G. Strecker, Das Judenchristen in den Pseudoclementinen (Berlin: Akademie, 1958); R. Wilde, The Treatment of the Jews in the Greek Christian Writers of the First Three Centuries (Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1949); S. G. Wilson, ed., Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, vol. 2, Separation and Polemic (Studies in Early Judaism and Christianity 2; Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1986). C. A. Evans

CHRISTOLOGY

A great deal of scholarly effort has been devoted to analyzing the christological statements of early Christian texts as to how they reflect Jewish Christian or Hellenistic influences. The effort reflects an understanding of the formation of earliest christology as a historical process that was conditioned by the cultural, linguistic and religious environment of nascent Christianity. This standpoint can be accepted, whatever one's belief about the transcendent causes and significance behind the historical process.

The complexity of the issues and the diversity of the evidence make this investigation demanding. However, this work has also been hindered by such problems as a lack of agreement among scholars as to what the terms Jewish Christian and Hellenistic signify, overly simplified notions of the interaction between Jewish and non-Jewish culture in the Greco-Roman period and, sometimes, insufficiently examined assumptions and personal agendas of the scholars participating in the investigation. In this article the aims are to clarify the issues and categories involved in the modern discussion, survey relevant Christian texts as to their christological emphases and offer some basic conclusions about the christological developments and diversification evident in NT writings comprising Hebrews—Revelation and important extracanonical Christian writings down to approximately A.D. 150.

1. Terminology
2. New Testament Sources: Acts 1—11, Hebrews—Revelation
3. Early Extracanonical Texts

1. Terminology.

In one sense the christological expressions of all NT documents and of many early extracanonical Christian writings are Jewish in that they reflect terms, concepts and values that are indebted to the OT and to Jewish tradition (see Judaism). But all earliest Christian literature is also Hellenistic, reflecting the impact of Hellenistic culture in the language (Koine Greek), rhetorical and literary conventions, and some of the conceptual categories and themes they exhibit. Also, the Jewish tradition, which served as the immediate matrix of earliest Christianity, had been in direct interaction with Hellenistic culture for more than three hundred years (since the time of Alexander the Great), variously reacting against and absorbing this or that feature of the larger cultural environment, both in the Diaspora* and in Palestine. Consequently distinguishing between Jewish and Hellenistic factors or elements in earliest christology, though not impossible, is more difficult than some have supposed.

It further complicates matters, however, that the labels Jewish Christian and Hellenistic have been used by scholars in varying ways. In some cases it appears that Jewish Christian christology is limited to beliefs that reflect what a given scholar imagines Christian Jews would have found congenial as belief, usually a low christology in which Jesus is seen as a human Messiah or teacher and is not given divine honor. But such an approach is apt to tell us more about the assumptions of the scholar than about the actual beliefs of ancient Christian Jews.

In other cases the label Jewish Christian is restricted to Christian Jews who rejected Gentile* Christians and their beliefs (e.g., the Ebionites*). But, given that the ancient sources indicate a variety of Christian Jewish groups and beliefs, restricting Jewish Christian to one type is misleading.

At the other extreme the term Jewish Christian has sometimes been used for all forms of early Christianity that used any language, symbols and categories drawn from the Jewish tradition. But this definition applies to a wide spectrum of early Christianity, and used this way "Jewish Christian" merely functions to emphasize the Jewish religious and intellectual roots of the early Christian movement.

In this article, therefore, we shall classify as Jewish Christian the christological beliefs and practices of Christian Jews who understood themselves and articulated their faith* and piety in terms and categories drawn from their Jewish religious tradition. Their faith, however, was usually not simply Judaism but was redefined in some major ways by the figure of Jesus and the consequences and implications of acknowledging him as uniquely authoritative divine agent. We shall also have to reckon with texts that may not have Jewish Christian authors but that show interest in and respect for Jewish Christian figures, beliefs and traditions, thereby giving us some further though perhaps indirect access to these beliefs and traditions.

It also has to be acknowledged that the question of what was Jewish and what was Hellenistic in early Christianity has often been dealt with in the service of agendas larger than historical inquiry. Alleging much Hellenistic syncretistic influence upon early Christian beliefs was often a useful way of downplaying the continuing validity of these beliefs for those engaged in an avowedly liberalizing and revisionist agenda for modern Christianity. Countering this agenda but accepting the notions of Hellenistic influences as indicative of corruption of early Christianity, conservative scholars often emphasized the Jewish roots of early Christianity and its beliefs, especially in the NT. In both camps, however, historical analysis has often been skewed under the influence of theological polemics.

Few can credibly claim to be disinterested in the question of the continuing validity of early christology. But it is important to try to prevent exegetical and historical judgments from being determined by theological agendas, whether of a revisionist or a traditionalist leaning. Also, it would be facile either to portray the development of christology as religious syncretism or to deny that early Christians interacted with and were shaped by the larger Greco-Roman religious and cultural environment. Moreover, the religious validity of a christological expression does not depend upon whether it appropriates Jewish or non-Jewish terms, concepts and cultural background. Consequently we shall attempt to characterize the christology of the texts considered so far as possible with a view to accurate historical knowledge of developments and diversification in early Christian beliefs.

2. New Testament Sources: Acts 1—11, Hebrews—Revelation.

2.1. Acts 1—11. The early chapters of Acts give us narratives describing the Jerusalem* church, which was composed of Jews. These narratives include speeches and prayers* as well as the author's summaries of the preaching* and activities of these Christian Jews. Although scholars debate the source(s) and historical reliability of specific events in the narratives, Acts* 1—11 contains a good deal of christological material that looks to be both early and of Jewish Christian derivation.

In these materials Jesus' death (see Death of Christ) is presented both as a misguided act of the Jewish leaders (Acts 3:14, 17; 4:10; 5:30; 7:52) and as a fulfillment of the divine redemptive plan (Acts 2:23-31; 3:18; 4:28; 10:39-43). There is no explanation of how Jesus' death is redemptive (no theory of atonement), only the firm proclamation that his death was essential and foreordained. There is a strong emphasis on Jesus' resurrection*: the key event to which the apostles* are to bear witness* (Acts 1:22; 2:32; 4:33; 5:32) and the act of God* by which Jesus is designated a unique position of salvific importance as "Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36), "Leader and Savior" (Acts 5:31) and eschatological* judge through whom forgiveness* is given (Acts 10:42-43). This idea of Jesus being installed by God in a uniquely lofty position as a consequence of his resurrection (esp. Acts 2:36; 3:20) seems particularly reflective of early, Jewish Christian christological conceptions (cf. Rom 1:3-4, also often thought to reflect Jewish Christian tradition). Jesus is the exclusive medium of salvation* for all (Acts 4:10-12) and is now "Lord of all" (Acts 10:36). But by linking Jesus' exalted status to the act of God the traditional Jewish/biblical monotheistic concern seems reflected, so that Jesus' uniquely lofty role does not reduce God's status or importance.

The frequent references to Jesus as God's Messiah appear particularly in passages mentioning proclamation to Jews (Christos, Acts 2:36; 3:18-21; 5:42; 9:22; and in Acts 8:5 to Samaritans*). "Son of God" in Acts 9:20 seems to be intended as a synonymous (royal) messianic title. Other honorific terms applied to Jesus reflect the Jewish tradition: a prophet like Moses* (Acts 3:22), "the Righteous One" (Acts 7:52) and "servant" (pais, Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30; see Servant). This last term (applied also to David, Acts 4:25) is used as a (royal?) christological title only here in the NT and outside the NT only in texts showing strong Jewish Christian influence and a traditional (liturgical) flavor (e.g., 1 Clem. 59.2-4; Did. 9.3; 10.2-3; Mart. Pol. 14.1, 3). The emphasis upon the name* (of Jesus, Acts 4:10-12, 18; 5:28, 40-41; 8:12) may also reflect ancient Jewish culture with its high reverence for the name of God.

2.2. Hebrews. Several of the specific historical questions about the epistle to the Hebrews* remain without satisfactory answers: author, date, destination. Though we cannot be sure that the original recipients were Hebrews (i.e., Christian Jews), it is widely agreed that the document shows an elaborate effort to articulate Christ's significance in terms and categories drawn from Jewish tradition. In this sense Hebrews reflects Jewish Christian christological expression. In Hebrews 1, after appropriating Jewish wisdom* tradition to describe Christ's glorious relationship to God (Heb 1:1-4; cf. Wis 7:22—8:1), the author goes into a more lengthy statement of Christ's superiority to God's angels,* using a seven-link catena of OT quotations to make his points (Heb 1:5-14; see OT in Hebrews). This contrast continues in Hebrews 2, with additional OT passages used as evidence, here emphasizing Christ's superiority to angels as Redeemer on account of his participation in human nature. The rhetorical force of this contrast with angels depends upon a sympathetic familiarity with OT material and with ancient Jewish reverence for angels. Although "sons of God" is one of the ancient terms for angels (e.g., Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7), the author here draws upon royal Davidic references to God's son to make a strong contrast between the status of angels as servants (esp. Heb 1:7, 14) and Christ's status as unique Son.*

Next the author asserts Christ's superiority to Moses (Heb 3:1—4:13), again emphasizing Jesus' sonship in comparison with Moses as faithful servant (esp. Heb 3:1-6). By reference to the rebellious generation of Israelites the author warns readers against disobedience to or abandonment of the Christian profession (Heb 3:7—4:13). As with the discussion of Christ and the angels, the force of this contrast of Christ with Moses depends upon an acquaintance with Jewish tradition, in this case the revered place it gives to Moses.

The author continues to argue for Christ's exalted significance by portraying his superiority as high priest* over the Aaronic priesthood of the OT (Heb 4:14—7:28). The divine sonship of Christ resurfaces as an important christological category (Heb 5:5-10; 7:28); the superiority of Christ's high priesthood is connected with his being divine Son. In addition the author introduces the theme of Christ's priesthood "according to the order of Melchizedek" (Heb 5:6; see Melchizedek). The extended discussion of Christ's high priesthood by reference to this figure in Hebrews 7:1-28 is a unique christological emphasis of Hebrews (although there are brief references to Christ as heavenly intercessor in Rom 8:34; 1 Jn 2:1; see Heaven), and it too suggests an author and readers appreciative of Jewish traditions. Unlike the Aaronic priests, Christ is personally "a priest forever" (Heb 5:6; 7:15-17, 21), because he now "always lives" and is able "for all time to save those who approach God through him" (Heb 7:23-28, esp. Heb 7:25).

In the following chapters of Hebrews Christ is shown to be the mediator of a new covenant* better than that represented by the OT law* (Heb 8:1-13); Christ's death establishes this new covenant (Heb 9:15-22) by providing for it the superior and permanently effective sacrifice* (Heb 9:23—10:18). The author returns to this theme in Hebrews 12:18-29, where he contrasts phenomena of the revelation* at Sinai (Heb 12:18-21) with the blessings* of this new covenant (Heb 12:22-24), the climactic position of Jesus and his "sprinkled blood" indicating his importance.

In Hebrews 12:1-4 Jesus is referred to as the "pioneer and perfector of our faith" whose patient endurance* of his sufferings* can provide the encouraging precedent for Christians in their trials (Heb 12:5-13). The exemplary significance of Christ's sufferings is easily combined with reference to their redemptive effect in Hebrews 13:10-15.

Throughout the book the author is primarily concerned to emphasize two christological themes: Jesus' salvific death in imagery and language drawn from OT cultic traditions and Jesus' exalted status in imagery drawn from OT royal tradition. From the reference in Hebrews 1:3 to Christ having made "purification for sins" (priestly image) and having "sat down at the right hand" of God (royal image), through to the benediction in Hebrews 13:20-21 with its reference to Jesus as the resurrected "great shepherd" (a common royal image in the OT and the ancient Near East generally; see Shepherd) and his "blood of the eternal covenant" (cultic imagery), this author focuses on Christ's death, resurrection and exaltation.*

Also striking is the author's dual emphasis upon Christ as exalted divine Son and as full partaker in the human nature of those he redeems to God. This dialectic is particularly profound in Hebrews 1—2. After having affirmed Christ's vast superiority to the angels, the author then makes Christ's participation in human nature ("for a little while . . . lower than the angels," Heb 2:9) both evidence that humans are the object of God's redemptive purposes and precisely the strategic step that enables Christ to carry out that redemptive purpose effectively (Heb 2:14-18). In Hebrews 5:7-10 the author makes much of Jesus' humanity, Jesus being pictured as having "learned obedience through what he suffered."

The author of Hebrews produced one of the most developed treatments of Christ in the NT. He illustrates the early Christian appropriation and adaptation of Jewish categories in the effort to understand and communicate the significance of Christ.

2.3. James. The Epistle of James* is mainly concerned with exhortation about right behavior; its christology is implicit and largely a reflection of what the author and first readers held as traditional. Whatever one's view of the question of authorship, the attribution of the document to James the brother of Jesus (see Relatives of Jesus), the description of the addressees as "the twelve tribes in the Dispersion" (Jas 1:1) and other factors, including the strongly eschatological outlook (e.g., Jas 5:1-9), combine to give the document a Jewish Christian flavor. It is therefore interesting to note what the author and readers (who either were Jewish Christians or revered Jewish Christian traditions) must have regarded as traditional and uncontroversial christology.

Jesus bears the titles Christ and Lord (kyrios) in formulaic expressions (Jas 1:1; 2:1). Indeed in James 2:1 we have mention of "the glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (tou kyriou hēmōn Iesou Christou tēs doxēs), giving a particularly sonorous and honorific expression. In several other cases Jesus is probably intended in references to "the Lord." This holds for James 4:15, for example, where the will of "the Lord" is to govern Christian decisions. In James 5:7-11 it is also probable that Jesus is the "Lord" whose coming is awaited (Jas 5:7-8) and the judge standing at the door (Jas 5:9), in whose name the OT prophets spoke (Jas 5:10) and whose mercy* and compassion are applauded (Jas 5:11). In all these cases it is noteworthy that Jesus is referred to in roles associated with God in the OT (see OT in General Epistles).

Jesus is likewise probably the "Lord" in whose name the sick are to be anointed* and who will raise the sick and forgive their sins* (Jas 5:13-15). There is probably a reference to Jesus' name in James 2:7 as "invoked [in baptism?] over you" and blasphemed by opponents. This emphasis upon the sacred significance of Jesus' name accords with references in Acts 1—11 and other evidence of Jewish Christian attitudes.

In addition many commentators have noted that this epistle is full of allusions to sayings of Jesus preserved in the Synoptic Gospels. This indicates both a familiarity with the Jesus tradition* and a practical acceptance of Jesus' authority* as Lord* of Christian behavior. We may say that James emphasizes the practical and ethical* consequences of the christological convictions shared by the author and intended readers.

2.4. 1 Peter. Scholars remain divided as to whether 1 Peter* stems from the apostle Peter or is a pseudonymous attempt to address the intended readers in his voice. Whatever one's view of this issue, 1 Peter is an important window on Christian beliefs and concerns from sometime in the latter part of the first century and is particularly rich in christological material. As is James, 1 Peter is addressed to readers described in Judaic terms, "the exiles of the Dispersion" (1 Pet 1:1), which along with other data suggests Christians who revere Jewish Christian traditions.

The high status of Christ is set within God the Father's supremacy. For example, Christians have been "chosen and destined by God the Father" for obedience* to Jesus Christ (1 Pet 1:2). "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" has given new birth* through Christ's resurrection (1 Pet 1:3), which is explicitly an act of God (1 Pet 1:21). Readers are to come to Christ because he is "precious in God's sight" and the one through whom acceptable "spiritual sacrifices" are now offered to God (1 Pet 2:4-5). It is God's will that Christians are to heed (1 Pet 2:15; 4:19). 1 Peter 1:20 places Christ's redemptive work within the context of God's precosmic plan ("destined before the foundation of the world"; cf. 1 Pet 1:11, where "sufferings destined for Christ" are predicted by OT prophets). The liturgical-sounding benediction and doxologies are all directed to God the Father (1 Pet 1:3; 5:11; even 1 Pet 4:11, though slightly ambiguous, is probably directed to God, who is glorified "through Jesus Christ"; see Liturgical Elements).

There can be no question, however, as to the author's high and richly textured view of Christ. One of the dominant emphases is the redemptive effect of Christ's death, expressed in sacrificial terms. Christians are "sprinkled with his blood" (1 Pet 1:2), alluding to the OT practice of sprinkling the blood of animal victims for dedication and ritual cleansing of people and cultic items (e.g., Exod 29:19-21; Lev 4:3-6, 13-17; 14:5-7). In 1 Peter 1:18-21 Christians are ransomed (lytroō) with the "precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without defect or blemish," likely alluding to the Passover lamb* of Exodus 12:5 (cf. 1 Cor 5:7 for another echo of Passover imagery for Christ's death). 1 Peter 2:21-25 lifts wording from Isaiah 53:4-12 to reveal the significance of Christ's sufferings, emphasizing both his exemplary behavior (1 Pet 2:21-23) and the vicarious nature of his death ("he himself bore our sins in his body") on the "tree" (xylon, 1 Pet 2:24, a probable allusion to Deut 27:6, which seems early to have become a key OT text used to interpret the significance of Christ's crucifixion). In 1 Peter 3:18 the author refers to Christ's undeserved sufferings as both exemplary for Christian behavior and vicariously redemptive ("the righteous for the unrighteous . . . to bring you to God").

The author's reference to "the Spirit of Christ within them" as the inspiring power of OT prophets (1 Pet 1:11) reflects a remarkably exalted view of Christ, perhaps implying some kind of preexistence* conviction and certainly associating Christ with the divine Spirit (see Holy Spirit). The exhortation in 1 Peter 3:14-15 alludes directly to Isaiah 8:12-13 (LXX), and the command to "sanctify Christ as Lord" thus applies and extends to Christ an imperative there concerned with reverence to Yahweh, another direct and striking association of Christ with God. 1 Peter 3:22 explicitly proclaims Christ's unique exaltation* above all heavenly ranks, using OT royal imagery in placing Christ "at the right hand of God" (cf. Ps 110:1). The references to Christ as shepherd and "chief shepherd" (1 Pet 2:25; 5:4) also probably draw upon OT royal imagery.

The exalted position of Christ in the author's beliefs is matched by the crucial place of Christ in practical living. As the chosen stone,* Christ becomes the basis of the redeemed community (1 Pet 2:4-10), to which a variety of OT images are applied (temple* and priesthood [1 Pet 2:5], chosen race and holy nation [1 Pet 2:9], God's people [1 Pet 2:10]). "For the Lord's sake" (i.e., out of reverence for Christ) Christians are to show respect for legitimate earthly authorities (1 Pet 2:13-17; see Civil Authority). Christians are to face unjust abuse looking to Christ's example and following "in his steps" (1 Pet 2:21; see Imitation). If they are persecuted* on account of their Christian faith, they are to take inspiration from Christ's sufferings and subsequent exaltation (1 Pet 3:13-22). They are to take joy in "sharing Christ's sufferings," in being "reviled for the name of Christ," suffering "as a Christian" and glorifying God "because you bear this name" (1 Pet 4:12-16).

2.5. 2 Peter and Jude. Scholars commonly see a direct literary relationship linking Jude* and 2 Peter,* 2 Peter probably being dependent upon Jude. The authorship of these texts is disputed. But whatever one's view of this question, both documents are attributed to figures associated with Jewish Christian groups, especially Jude, which is attributed to the "brother of James" (Jude 1:1), making him also a brother of Jesus. Both documents evidence an exalted view of Christ and share specific christological terms and convictions. But there are also variations.

In addition to more familiar formulaic expressions ("our Lord Jesus Christ" and variations: Jude 17, 21, 25; 2 Pet 1:8, 14, 16), in Jude 4 there is reference to those who "deny our only Master [despotēs] and Lord [kyrios], Jesus Christ." This formula is echoed in 2 Peter 2:1, which condemns heretics who "deny the Master [despotēs] who bought them." Both "Master" and "Lord" are applied to God in other NT writings (e.g., despotēs in prayer to God: Lk 2:29; Acts 4:24; Rev 6:10) and in Jude and 2 Peter are to be taken as titles connoting divine honor extended to Christ. In 2 Peter we repeatedly find the distinctive expression "our Lord [kyrios] and Savior [sōtēr] Jesus Christ" (2 Pet 1:11; 2:20; 3:2, 18). The only occurrence of "Savior" in Jude, however, is with reference to God ("the only God our Savior," Jude 25). In the NT as a whole sōtēr refers to God in eight of its twenty-four uses and is otherwise applied to Christ (e.g., Phil 3:20; Lk 2:11; Jn 4:42).

This tendency to attribute divine titles to Christ occasionally results in some ambiguous passages in which it is difficult to tell whether God or Christ is intended. In Jude 5-16 there are references to "the Lord" who saved Israel* from Egypt (Jude 5), Michael's invocation of "the Lord" against Satan* (Jude 9) and Enoch's prophecy of the coming of "the Lord" with thousands of angels (Jude 14-15). Given that the author otherwise consistently uses "Lord" as a title for Christ and that he appears to expect Christ to come bringing eschatological judgment* and mercy (Jude 17-21), it is probable that Jude 14-15 refers to Christ. But it is difficult to be sure who the "Lord" is in Jude 5 and Jude 9 (the textual variants, Jude 5 [kyrios/Iēsous/christos/theos] and Jude 9 [kyrios/theos], indicate that ancient readers and scribes shared our difficulty). It seems likely that Christ is the "Lord" in this whole passage in Jude, indicating a rather far-reaching association of Christ with the God of the OT. In 2 Peter 3:8-10 it is also likely that Christ is the "Lord" whose promised coming is delayed but sure.

But 2 Peter 1:1 presents a particularly difficult case. The more likely Greek reading (tou theou hēmōn kai sōtēros Iēsou Christou) could easily be taken as "our God and Savior Jesus Christ," although it is possible that the phrase refers to God and Christ (cf. 2 Pet 1:2, where the best reading is probably "knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord"). The textual variation here, substituting kyriou ("Lord") for theou ("God"), shows ancient scribes saw the ambiguity as well.

In addition to the honorific terms and divine roles applied to Christ, there is also evidence of cultic devotion offered to Christ. The elaborate doxology in Jude 24-25 is directed to God "through Jesus Christ our Lord," and the phrase "before all time and now and forever" implicitly seems to extend to Christ the eternal qualities of God. The concluding doxology in 2 Peter 3:18 is directed to Christ, extending to him liturgical expressions connoting divine status and probably reflecting liturgical practices of the readers.

In both documents there is a strong eschatological tone to the christology. In Jude Christians are being "kept safe for/by Jesus Christ" (Jude 1), and Christians are told "keep [themselves] in the love of God" while they await the eschatological mercy of Christ that "leads to eternal life" (Jude 21). In 2 Peter 1:11 readers are offered the hope* of "entry into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." Against the scoffing of some, 2 Peter 3:1-18 is devoted to asserting the reality of the eschatological coming of Christ and the present ethical consequences of this hope. In 2 Peter 1:16-19 the author refers to the transfiguration story (Mk 9:2-8) as indicating that Christ "received honor and glory from God the Father" and urges readers to take encouragement from this to live in the light* of Christ's "power and coming" until his eschatological appearance as "the morning star" (see Glory; Power).

2.6. Johannine Epistles. Although the Johannine epistles are thought to derive from the same early Christian group from which the Gospel of John came, it is widely recognized that there are differences in christological emphases (see John, Letters of). The Gospel of John asserts Jesus' divine significance over against Jewish refusal to recognize him as Christ and Son of God. In 1 John (the other Johannine epistles contain little christological material and nothing not found in 1 John), however, the author asserts his christology over against other Christians whose beliefs he regards as heretical. Because of this doctrinal conflict, 1 John is particularly rich in christological material. It is also commonly accepted that the Johannine community was originally a Jewish Christian group that suffered a severe rupture in relations with the larger Jewish community and at some point included Gentile converts. 1 John seems to reflect this later stage of the Johannine community but still shows the influence of the Jewish Christian heritage of the group.

The major christological emphasis is that the corporal, historical figure Jesus is "the Son" of God. It appears that the opponents in some way distinguished between Jesus and the divine Son, perhaps holding a docetic* (dokēsis, "appearance") christology in which the divine Christ only seemed to be a human. A few decades later Ignatius* of Antioch attacked the same or similar views (see 3.5 below). In 1 John 2:18-27 the opponents are referred to directly as schismatics (1 Jn 2:19) who have left the Johannine group and appear to have sought to win other Johannine Christians over to their views, for which they claimed the authority of a superior enlightenment (1 Jn 2:26-27).

The opening statements of 1 John (1 Jn 1:1-4) emphasize the tangible, historical nature of the revelation witnessed to in the foundational ("from the beginning") gospel* message and explicitly link fellowship* with God and with "his Son Jesus Christ." The heretical alternative to "confessing the Son" (1 Jn 2:23b) is described as denying that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 2:22), denying "the Son" and thus "the Father" (1 Jn 2:23). The heresy is described more specifically perhaps in 1 John 4:1-3, where in contrast to the genuine divine Spirit who "confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," the ungodly spirit "does not confess Jesus is from God" (1 Jn 4:3; this is probably the best reading among the textual variants). The implication is that the heretics hesitate to identify the man Jesus with the divine Son.

Repeatedly the author emphasizes this confessional link: the historical manifestation of the Son is affirmed (1 Jn 3:5, 8); the required confession* is "Jesus is the Son of God" (1 Jn 4:15); the one born of God believes in Jesus as the Christ (1 Jn 5:1); in 1 John 3:23 God's command is to believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ (probably alluding to the ritual use of Jesus' name in confession, healing* and baptism*), which makes precise the historical identification of the divine Son. Such a faith in the true, divine Son acknowledges thereby the Father also and brings eternal life (e.g., 1 Jn 5:11-12).

Unlike some later, Gentile Christian writers, this author does not try to define Jesus' sonship in metaphysical or philosophical terms; his main concern is to insist upon the direct identification of Jesus as divine Son. Nevertheless the reference to Jesus as "the eternal life that was with the Father and was revealed/manifested to us" (1 Jn 1:2) at least suggests some notion of an "incarnation" of the divine in Jesus, all the more likely given the familiar prologue to John (Jn 1:1-18), which stems from the same community. In light of this it is difficult to be sure whether the referent in 1 John 5:20, "This [houtos] is the true God and eternal life," is Jesus (the immediate antecedent) or God the Father. In light of the close link between the Son and the Father in this document, it may be that the author did not intend a mutually exclusive choice, for in his view one cannot be in right relation to God the Father without reverencing the Son.

The author also repeatedly affirms the soteriological significance of Christ. The efficaciousness of Jesus' death is described in sacrificial terms: the blood of Jesus "cleanses us from all sin" (1 Jn 1:7); Jesus is the "atoning sacrifice" (hilasmos) for our sins (1 Jn 2:2; 4:10). He is now "advocate" (paraklētos) for Christians "with the Father" (1 Jn 2:1). Jesus "was revealed to take away sins" (1 Jn 3:5) and "to destroy the works of the devil" (1 Jn 3:8). Christians hope to be made like Jesus when he appears again in future glory (1 Jn 3:2) and in the present time identify themselves with him as their model (1 Jn 4:17).

2.7. Revelation. The Jewish elements in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) are so plentiful that some scholars have offered the unlikely suggestion that the book is a Christian revision of an originally Jewish apocalypse,* and some theologians (e.g., Luther, Bultmann) have erroneously regarded the book as deficient in the Christian beliefs reflected in it. Revelation presents a highly exalted view of Christ, perhaps unsurpassed in the NT. It is thus noteworthy that the author was in all likelihood a Christian Jew (e.g., John, apparently the author's actual name, is Jewish, only much later taken over as a Christian given name). Moreover, he seems to have had decidedly conservative attitudes (e.g., his condemnations of various Christian innovations, the Nicolaitans [Rev 2:6, 14-16] and the teachings of "Jezebel" [Rev 2:20-25]). Consequently his christological views and practices are unlikely to be innovative and probably reflect much earlier Jewish Christian circles. The prophet John sought to respond to what he saw as immediate pressing concerns, both internal problems and the looming pressure from the larger society. In his references to the emperor cult (worship of the "beast"; see Emperor) he was interacting with pagan religious phenomena and practices (see Religions), and these must be considered in understanding the book. But John responds to these influences negatively. Although he shows some acquaintance with pagan myth (e.g., the dragon and Leto analogy to Rev 12), his christology seems mainly expressed in terms from his biblical and Jewish tradition.

As with the Johannine Gospel and epistles, so in Revelation we see a dialectical combination of concern for the supremacy of the one

God together with a high christology. The most direct manifestation of this is with regard to worship,* which is a major theme of the book. The revelation claimed by the author is set on "the Lord's day" (the special weekly occasion of early Christian gathered worship; see Lord's Day). The vision* of heavenly worship in Revelation 4—5 seems intended to overshadow the remainder of the book, in which there are repeated calls and references to worship of God (e.g., Rev 7:11-12, 15; 11:16-17) and repeated warnings against worshiping any other (e.g., Rev 9:20-21; 13:4; 14:9-11). In Revelation 19:10 and Revelation 22:9 the angel interpreter sent from God twice forbids John to worship him, insisting that worship may be directed to God alone. The author clearly pictures the exalted Christ receiving worship with God (Rev 5:8-14; 7:10), which must indicate for this author the highest imaginable status for Christ. If later Christian thinkers speak of Christ and God sharing a common substance, John seems to offer something like a functional approximation in portraying idealized heavenly worship as directed jointly to God and Christ.

The scenes of ideal worship must have been intended both to reflect and inspire worship patterns among Christians, and in Revelation 22:20 we probably have a fragment of early liturgical practice in which the Lord Jesus is invoked in the gathered worship setting (cf. 1 Cor 16:22, "maranatha," which suggests that this practice derived from very early Aramaic-speaking circles of Jewish Christians).

This close association of Christ with God is reflected in other ways too. The eschatological kingdom* belongs jointly to "our Lord [or God] and his Christ" (Rev 11:15; 12:10). Christians hold both to the word of God and the testimony of Jesus (Rev 1:2, 9; cf. Rev 12:17). The august self-designation "Alpha and the Omega" appears in the mouth of God in Revelation 1:8, but in Revelation 22:12-13 it seems likely that we are to take the voice as Christ, designating himself with the same title. The opening greeting (Rev 1:4-5) comes jointly from God, the "seven spirits" and Jesus Christ, "the faithful witness [role model for the readers], the firstborn of the dead [assurance* of resurrection of believers] and the ruler of the kings of the earth [against the blasphemous claims of the Roman emperor]."

Although there is a subordination of Christ to God (e.g., Rev 1:1, where God gives Jesus the revelation to be shown to his servants), the opening vision, which functions like the OT call-visions, is a christophany (Rev 1:10-20) in which the glorious Christ is described with features taken from OT theophanies and angelophanies (e.g., Dan 7:9-10, 13-14; 10:5-6; Ezek 1:24-28). Moreover, in Revelation 2—3 it is Christ's assessment of the seven churches that is to be written to them, Christ's words voiced by the Spirit in prophecy through John (e.g., Rev 2:7, 11) and Christ who determines future reward* or judgment (e.g., Rev 2:7, 10, 17, 22-23, 26-28). Also, the divine plan of redemption and judgment cannot proceed until the Lamb has conquered and is then alone qualified to open the heavenly book and execute its contents (Rev 5:1-5). Yet at the same time this exalted Christ positions his role under the supremacy of God (e.g., Rev 2:28; 3:4, 12, 21).

The image of Christ as the Lamb reflects another christological belief important to this author—the redemptive significance of Jesus' death. The initial doxology (Rev 1:5-6; again probably reflecting the binitarian liturgical patterns of his readers) is directed to Christ, "who loves us and freed us from our sins by his blood," thereby constituting believers as "a kingdom, priests to his God and Father." In the initial, christophanic vision Christ's self-identification includes the crucial reference to his death (Rev 1:18), as a result of which he now has "the keys of Death and Hades" (see Hell). The Lamb's conquest is accomplished through being slaughtered (Rev 1:9-10), and through his "blood" he has "ransomed" (agorazō) saints of all nations. References to Jesus' "blood" (sacrificial imagery) appear also in Revelation 7:14 (the elect* have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," a riveting image) and in Revelation 12:11 (believers conquer the great dragon "by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony," linking Jesus' death and the faithfulness of the saints; see Beasts). In the context of a highly symbolic passage the author drops this sacrificial imagery and makes direct reference to the crucifixion of the "Lord" in Revelation 11:8, making Jesus' death and its consequences the model for the witnesses* who are killed and rise again (Rev 11:11).

2.8. Summary. The NT documents considered all were written either by Christian Jews or by Christians with a good acquaintance with Jewish Christian traditions who sought to express their faith in Christ in categories and terms adapted from the biblical and Jewish tradition. The dominant mode of christological reflection and expression in the first century seems to have been constituted out of Jewish tradition, mediated through Jewish Christian circles and adapted under the impact of Jesus' ministry and subsequent early Christian experience. The Jewish matrix, from which basic terms and categories were derived and adapted, was Jewish tradition of the Greco-Roman period, a robust religious tradition that for several centuries had confidently interacted with the larger cultural environment, appropriating whatever seemed useful and compatible with its fundamental convictions. Thus it should occasion no surprise to find terms or concepts that may have originated much earlier in Greek tradition. Such interaction is the sign of a healthy cultural and religious tradition, not an indication of something negative, certainly not a betrayal or uncritical assimilation of pagan influences.

There can be little question, however, that the christological affirmations and the pattern of binitarian religious devotion reflected in these NT documents exceed both in degree and kind the reverence characteristically shown toward divine agents in Jewish evidence relevant to the first century. In ancient Jewish sources amazingly honorific language can be applied to principal angels and also to revered human figures (esp. Moses or Enoch). Speculations about divine Wisdom or divine Logos* make for interesting comparison with and may have contributed to Christian attempts to define plurality in God, leading to the doctrine of the Trinity in the centuries after the NT. But the exalted status of Christ reflected in the documents surveyed seems to represent a distinctive development in comparison with the pre-Christian Jewish tradition. This is especially so when we take account of the accommodation of the glorified Christ alongside God in the worship setting and practices of first-century Christians.

In the older history-of-religions school (e.g., Bousset), the distinctively exalted status of Christ was often portrayed as the unconscious and deliberate assimilation of a supposedly original and low christology (nondivine Jesus) to pagan-influenced beliefs in demigods, divine sons and lords. More recent research (e.g., Hurtado) indicates that the mutation or innovation represented in early Christian Christ-devotion had its decisive beginnings among Jewish Christian circles within the earliest years of the Christian movement. Moreover, the development in question was almost explosively rapid in the first few years, and elaborate theories of identifiable stages of christological development leading up to a divine status accorded to Christ are refuted by the evidence.

Not only in the texts surveyed but even in earliest NT writings (Paul's letters; see DPL, Christology) Christ is associated with God in astonishing ways, is accorded divine titles (esp. "Lord," informed by OT passages referring to Yahweh), functions in divine roles (e.g., as eschatological judge and as the divine source of prophetic oracles) and is formally reverenced in specific ways otherwise reserved for God. Such Christ-devotion is not readily compatible with the Judaism familiar to us and was apparently an exception in Jewish practice as reflected in ancient Jewish sources. At least in the second century it appears that there were Jewish Christian groups whose reverence of Christ was significantly more modest (the so-called Ebionites,* about whom, however, far too many overconfident claims have been made by scholars). But it is also clear that at least some Jewish Christian groups affirmed the sorts of exalted christological claims and binitarian devotional patterns surveyed.

The main features of Jewish Christian christology apparent to us in the NT and earliest Christian sources are the following. Jesus is proclaimed as the Messiah (Christ) promised by God in the OT, royal Davidic OT texts in particular interpreted as messianic predictions. One of the terms applied to Jesus in Greek-speaking circles of Jewish Christians is pais ("child" or "servant"), which appears to have carried royal Davidic connotations. It is likewise probably earliest Jewish Christian circles who felt required and empowered to interpret Jesus' death so as to see God acting through it in fulfilment of previously unrecognized prophecies of Messiah's sufferings. References to Jesus' death in terms taken from Jewish Passover and from OT sacrificial vocabulary (e.g., "blood," "lamb") probably began among Jewish Christian circles as well.

Jesus was also likely presented as the eschatological prophet like Moses, with consequent authority over the believing community to define obedience to God (reflected, e.g., in Matthew). Early Jewish Christian circles may therefore have begun early to organize and transmit in writing teachings or sayings of Jesus (as reflected in sayings collections thought to lie behind the Synoptics and James).

From Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christian circles of the earliest years of the Christian movement, the exalted Jesus was referred to as the "Lord" (Marê) of the community, a practice carried over into Greek-speaking circles in the common use of Kyrios for Jesus. Already by Paul's time this had generated a collection of Christian terms: Lord's day, Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:20), Lord's brothers (1 Cor 9:5), which are used as terms familiar in Christian circles. Even more importantly the exalted Jesus was invoked in corporate worship as "Lord" and, in other ways as well, functioned with God as the object of devotion.

Particulary noteworthy is the ritual use of Jesus' name, for example, in the initiatory rite of baptism ("into the name of Jesus"), indicating the exalted Jesus as the one through whom exclusively the elect community is constituted. Especially in the context of the larger Jewish community, sharply conflicting judgments about Jesus appear to have been formulated and expressed: "Jesus is Lord" versus "Jesus is Anathema" (1 Cor 12:3, "cursed," a use of the term suggesting Jewish provenance).

It is also particularly to Jewish Christian circles that we can trace the concern to avoid making the exalted Jesus a second god in any way diminishing the supremacy of the Creator God of the OT. Thus, especially in texts showing Jewish Christian influence, we have Jesus' resurrection more characteristically portrayed as God raising Jesus, Jesus' exalted status as conferred or declared by God and Jesus' redemptive work as bringing the elect into relationship with God the Father. As we move farther from the influence of Jewish Christian christology, this concern to maintain a kind of functional subordination of Christ to God the Father is not always maintained, particularly in the apocryphal* Christian writings from Gentile Christian circles of the late second century and thereafter.

3. Early Extracanonical Texts.

The traditional Christian distinction between canonical and extracanonical Christian writings reflects ecclesiastical judgments about the proper relative theological and liturgical role of the writings. But in date, general circumstances and beliefs reflected there are varying degrees of overlap, especially with reference to extracanonical texts from the late first and early second centuries. Along with the NT these documents provide us invaluable historical resources for tracing the early diversification and development of belief in Christ. In particular these early texts show variously a continuing Jewish Christian tradition, the appropriation of it in wider Christian circles and the beginnings of a more deliberate attempt to express christological convictions in terms and categories drawn directly from the non-Jewish intellectual and religious environment.

Given the chronological limit for this article (approx. A.D. 150) and the varying dates proposed for some early Christian writings, it is difficult to decide what to include. Our purpose is to illustrate the sorts of christological developments of the early second century. We shall therefore concentrate on a few documents whose early dates are widely supported.

3.1. 1 Clement. Among the most securely dated extracanonical Christian texts is the lengthy letter sent A.D. 95-96 from the church at Rome* to the Corinthian church. 1 Clement is rich in christological material but except for a few features repeats themes we have already encountered. The author (see Clement of Rome) does not seek to develop any new christological idea but instead urges obedience to what are for him traditional Christian beliefs and values. This aim is reflected in the frequent use of expressions derived from liturgical usage. Given that liturgy is characteristically the most conservative aspect of a religious tradition, the liturgical expressions in 1 Clement probably reflect beliefs and practices in place for some considerable time. The christological rhetoric of 1 Clement seems almost entirely formed of terms and categories from Jewish tradition (see Bumpus 1972) and probably thus has been taken over from Jewish Christian discourse of earlier decades of the Roman churches.

From the reference to the addressees and the opening grace-and-peace wish onward, 1 Clement joins Christ with God as uniquely defining the Christian communities and as objects of religious devotion. The many doxologies show an interesting pattern, with some directly expressed to God (1 Clem. 38.4; 43.6; 45.7), some expressed through Christ (1 Clem. 58.2; 61.3; 64; 65.2) and two that are ambiguous as to whether God or Christ is the object of the praise (1 Clem. 20.12; 50.7; in my judgment God "the Father" is probably to be understood as the intended object). In this placing of God as supreme and Christ as unique agent, 1 Clement follows the characteristic conceptual scheme and worship* dynamics reflected in the NT. Even the implicitly trinitarian expressions in 1 Clement 46.6 and 1 Clement 58.2 do not take us beyond equivalent expressions in earlier Christian texts in the NT (e.g., 2 Cor 13:13; Eph 4:4-6).

The dominant christological titles Christ and Lord (kyrios) are likewise traditional, the latter clearly a divine title used also for God (e.g., 1 Clem. 59.3). 1 Clement restricts despotēs, however, for God as "Lord" or "Master" (e.g., 1 Clem. 7.5; 8.2; 9.4; 20.11-12). In 1 Clement 16.2 there is an apparently unique christological metaphor, "the sceptre of the majesty of God, our Lord Jesus Christ" (possibly an allusion to Num 24:17; cf. CD 7:20), which both directly associates Christ with God and pictures his role as agent of the divine purpose. The lengthy liturgical prayer in 1 Clement 59 applies the term "beloved servant" or "child" (pais) to Christ (1 Clem. 59.2-4), another indication of a traditional christological expression probably derived from Jewish Christian circles. The several references to Jesus as "High Priest" (1 Clem. 36.1; 61.3; 64) are analogous to (dependent on?) the christological use of the term in Hebrews, although in 1 Clement the term is consistently combined with the term guardian (prostatēs), not otherwise used as a christological title in early Christian sources and possibly derived from non-Jewish religious or secular usage. Overall, however, 1 Clement uses a more restricted number of christological titles than do the NT authors.

The traditional character of the christology is further demonstrated in the rather formulaic references to Jesus' salvific death. There are references to Jesus' blood as "poured out" (1 Clem. 7.4), "given for us" (1 Clem. 21.6; cf. 1 Clem. 49.6), through which redemption has come (1 Clem. 12.7). In 1 Clement 16.3-17 there is an extended appropriation of Isaiah 53:1-12, explicitly taking the suffering servant of the latter passage as Christ suffering for the sins of the redeemed. Characteristic of this author, however, is the emphasis placed on Christ's sufferings as ethical example for Christian life (1 Clem 16.17). Christ's resurrection is treated mainly as proof ("first fruit"; cf. 1 Cor 15:20) of the coming resurrection of the elect (1 Clem. 24.1).

1 Clement shows a traditionally minded handling of christological emphases already familiar in the NT. Though the Roman church at this time is probably mainly non-Jewish in composition, the beliefs and terms used seem largely derived from Jewish Christian circles and from biblical and Jewish extracanonical sources. There is little evidence here of any serious attempt to redefine christology using non-Jewish categories.

3.2. 2 Clement. Though the date and provenance of this anonymous homily are not agreed upon, a number of scholars accept a date of A.D. 100 or shortly thereafter. As the opening words indicate ("Brothers, we ought to think of Jesus Christ, as of God, as 'Judge of the living and the dead'"), this author too urges an exalted view of Christ and links him with God as extension and manifestation of God's purposes, not at all as rival or threat to God. Note the concluding doxology to the Father through "the Savior and Founder of immortality" sent by God (2 Clem. 20.5). In this document as well the christology is traditional and the emphasis is more on right behavior than doctrinal development.

Christ's redemptive work, including his sufferings, is celebrated in 2 Clement 1—2 in lyrical terms as the divine overture to which Christian obedience is to be offered in gratitude. Christ's redemptive sufferings could never be repaid (2 Clem. 1.2-3), for "as a father he has called us sons" (2 Clem. 1.4, an unusual paternal image for Christ), he "saved us when we were perishing," banished the former pagan blindness of Gentile Christians (2 Clem. 1.4-7) and has created a people ex nihilo (2 Clem. 1.8).

Perhaps the dominant christological emphasis, however, is on the authoritative words of Jesus "the Lord," which are cited a number of times (e.g., 2 Clem. 3.2; 4.2, 5.2-4; 6.1; 9.11; 12.2; 15.4; 17.4). Some of these sayings attributed to Jesus are not otherwise attested (at least in the form they have in 2 Clement) and are thought to derive from now lost sources such as the Gospel of the Egyptians (e.g., 2 Clem. 4.5). Nevertheless this emphasis on Christ's authoritative words echoes the sort of interest reflected in the sayings material gathered in the Gospels (see Jesus Traditions). In keeping with this, note how the author refers almost interchangeably to doing

"the will of Christ/God/the Father" (cf. 2 Clem. 6.7; 8.4; 14.1), and in 2 Clement 8.4 he links directly doing the "will of the Father" and observing "the commandments of the Lord." The interest in Jesus' authoritative sayings probably stems from Jewish Christian circles but obviously carried over into Gentile Christian circles as well. The Gospel of Thomas (c. A.D. 150?), an early gnosticizing* appropriation and collection of Jesus' sayings, shows how widely shared this interest in dominical sayings became.

3.3. Didache. This probably composite document is variously dated, but many favor placing it in the early decades of the second century. At least some of the traditions must be considerably earlier. It exhibits christological reinterpretation and adaptation of Jewish material.

In the Two Ways portion (Did. 1.1—6.2) we have a profoundly christological recasting of ethical exhortation derived from Jewish tradition. The opening words (Did. 1.1) attribute the teaching to "the Lord," and the concluding words (Did. 6.2) describe the obligations as "the whole yoke of the Lord," bracketing the entire section as Jesus' instruction. The specific teachings in this section make use of sayings of Jesus as authoritative (e.g., Did. 1.3-6). Here Jesus' sayings and interpretation of divine commandments* are placed at the center of what it means to follow God's way.

In Didache 6.3—16.8 we have the earliest surviving manual of church order* and practice, rich in early Christian liturgical traditions. There is both a trinitarian baptismal formula in Didache 7.1-3 and later a reference to baptism* "into the name of the Lord" (Did. 9.5). Prayer is to be "as the Lord commanded in his Gospel," with a version of the Lord's Prayer prescribed (Did. 8.2; cf. Mt 6:9-13). The sacred meal is the Eucharist (see Lord's Supper), and we have set prayers associated with the cup and the bread (Did. 9.1-4) that are directed to the "Father" through Jesus, who is God's "servant" (pais). Through Jesus God "made known to us" life, knowledge* and "the holy vine of David your servant." In the prescribed prayer after Eucharist, God is thanked for the indwelling of his holy name and for knowledge, faith and immortality made known through Jesus "your servant" (pais, Did. 10.1-4). But in Didache 10.5 the prayer may well address Christ as "Lord" (kyrios), who is implored to "remember your church" and gather it "into your kingdom." Among the following liturgical exclamations is the "maranatha," attested also in 1 Corinthians 16:22 and probably deriving originally from earliest Jewish Christian practice, an invocation directed to Jesus.

In this material Jesus is clearly the one mediator of revelation from and the relationship to God. Jesus' sayings are treated with scriptural authority (e.g., Did. 9.5), and in Didache 14.3 Jesus may well be presented as the "Lord" speaking through OT passages (here Mal 1:11, 14). "The Lord's ways" are the behavioral standard for testing prophets (Did. 11.8). In the concluding apocalyptic section there is repeated emphasis on the eschatological coming of the "Lord," another christological theme preserved from earliest Christian traditions.

3.4. Odes of Solomon. Many scholars believe this collection of early Christian hymns* may stem from the early second or late first century. The imagery and themes suggest Jewish Christian provenance, and this makes the christological affirmations reflected all the more interesting.

The terms used include "the Beloved" (e.g., Odes Sol. 3.7; 7.1; 8.21), "Messiah" (e.g., Odes Sol. 9.3; 17.17), "the Son" (e.g., Odes Sol. 3.7; 7.15; 19.2), "Son of Man" and "Son of God" (Odes Sol. 36.3). There is also the intriguing Odes of Solomon 19.1-5, in which the Son is "the cup" from which believers drink the milk* from the breasts of "the Father," milked by the Holy Spirit. In Odes of Solomon 29.6 the author says, "I believed in the Lord's Messiah and considered that he is the Lord" (the same Syriac term in both cases). In Odes of Solomon 23.22 we have a trinitarian reference to Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

One feature of this collection is that in several odes it appears that Christ speaks in first-person form, celebrating his redemptive victory (e.g., Odes Sol. 17.6-16; 22.1-12) and giving us the unique image of the singing Christ. The theme of Christ's incarnation/humbling and exaltation found in Philippians 2:5-11 appears here also (e.g., Odes Sol. 7.3-6; 41.11-12), as does Christ's preexistence (e.g., Odes Sol. 41.15). Though the doxologies are usually directed to the Father (Odes Sol. 11.24; 16.20; 18.16; 20.10), we have one to Christ: "Glory to you, our Head, O Lord Messiah" (Odes Sol. 17.17). And in several odes there is reference to the Christian posture of outspread hands (in prayer and/or creedal confession) as the "sign" that represents Christ's cross* (Odes Sol. 27.1-3; 42.1-2; cf. 35.7; 37.1), which suggests a specifically Christian liturgical practice well developed. In several features (e.g., the highly realized eschatology and some of the christological terms) Odes of Solomon resembles the Gospel of John.

3.5. Ignatius. To a large degree Ignatius* (letters written c. A.D. 107-15) reflects traditional christological affirmations (e.g., Christ's preexistence, redemptive sufferings, the Virgin Birth, Incarnation). But in the particular emphases he chooses and in some of his phrasing, Ignatius adds interesting features.

Against docetic ideas Ignatius emphasizes the reality of Christ's birth, sufferings and resurrection (e.g., Ign. Magn. 11.1; Ign. Smyrn. 2.1; 4.2; Ign. Trall. 10). In this he echoes an emphasis in 1 John but probably because the issue continues a live one in his own time. This docetic christology is the innovation, although in response to what he regards as an unacceptable christology Ignatius may have contributed to what became a developing orthodox view of Christ, giving an early form of two-natures christology. Ignatius seems to like confessional statements in which contrasting affirmations appear, such as Jesus' humanity and divinity (e.g., Ign. Eph. 7.2; Ign. Pol. 3.2). He also gives lists of salvation events connected to Jesus (birth, death, resurrection; Ign. Eph. 18.2; Ign. Trall. 9; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1-2).

Another remarkable feature is Ignatius's resolute alignment of his looming martyrdom* with Christ. He is "in chains for the sake of the Name" (Ign. Eph. 3.1). He and other martyrs "voluntarily choose to die into his [Christ's] suffering" (eis to autou pathos; Ign. Magn. 5.2). As "God's wheat" to be ground by the teeth of the Roman beasts in the arena, he sees his coming death as his chance to be "truly a disciple of Jesus Christ" (Ign. Rom. 4.1-2) and as the means by which "I may reach Jesus Christ" (Ign. Rom. 5.3) and become "an imitator of the sufferings of my God" (Ign. Rom. 6.3). In this Ignatius both develops a christology of martyrdom begun in Revelation and anticipates the flowering of this theme in Christian martyrdom literature of the second and third centuries.

But perhaps the most striking feature in Ignatius's christological expressions are the references to Jesus Christ as "God" (theos): "our God" (Ign. Eph. presc.; 18.2; Ign. Rom. presc.; 3.3; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1), "the blood of God" (Ign. Eph. 1.1) and "the sufferings of my God" (Ign. Rom. 6.3). These expressions appear in only three of his seven genuine letters (Ephesians, Romans, Smyrneans), the same letters in which he seems to be tackling docetic ideas, and so the expressions may well be rhetorically and pugnaciously framed to assert the divine identity and significance of the human Jesus. In Ephesians 19.3 Ignatius refers to the birth of Jesus as "when God appeared in human form."

Yet it is clear that the divinity of Jesus in no way reduces the primacy of God the Father. The openings of all seven letters mention both God and Christ in traditional terms, and even in the letters where the term theos is applied to Christ there are many references indicating a traditional subordination of Christ to the Father (e.g., Ign. Eph. 2.1; 4.2; 5.2; Ign. Rom. presc.; 2.2; 8.2, "Jesus Christ, the unerring mouth by whom the Father has spoken truly"). In the other letters there is a consistent pattern linking Christ with the Father's purposes (e.g., Ign. Magn. 7.1, "the Lord did nothing without the Father"; Ign. Eph. 8.2, "one God revealed in Jesus Christ his Son"; Ign. Phld. 9.1, Jesus "the door of the Father").

Though essentially traditional in his christology, Ignatius also shows an early and modest experimentation with christological expressions and emphases that were intended to speak to a mainly non-Jewish Christian audience. He was probably indebted to Hellenistic-Jewish traditions, but he also attempted to make his letters meaningful in analogies and categories drawn from the larger Greco-Roman culture.

3.6. Justin Martyr. In the writings of Justin (d. A.D. 162-66) we have the earliest major example of a serious effort to reflect upon Christian faith by someone with training in Greek philosophy. For the most part Justin articulates and defends traditional Christian christology, a good deal of which stems from Jewish Christian circles. Even in his Apology I to the emperor, his christology is expressed mainly in these traditional terms and categories, and he develops and defends his christology through use of OT proof-texts. There is an abundance of christological titles taken from the OT (e.g., Justin Dial. Tryph. 126.1: Son, Logos, Angel, Man, Stone,* Star, Firstborn, Day, Rising, Only begotten, Captain, to cite only a few). To serve his apologetic aims Justin probably gathers up the results of a long tradition of early christological exegesis and reflection.

But there are some new features as well. For example, Justin explicitly distinguishes the miraculous conception of Christ from pagan myths of demigods (e.g., Justin Apol. I 33), showing an attempt to set christological claims within the larger religious environment. Much more significant is his notion of the "spermatic Word" (spermatikos logos), the universal mode in which Christ has illumined and taught humankind throughout history, accounting for pre-Christian and non-Christian truths yet making them all truths from Christ (e.g., Justin Apol. II 13.3-4). This idea allows Justin to engage Greek philosophy both critically and appreciatively, yet he also insists upon the superiority and greater fullness of divine truth now revealed in Christ.

Justin also shows an early attempt to reflect philosophically on the divine unity and plurality involved in traditional Christian views of God and Christ. Christ is "numerically distinct" from the Father and was "begotten from the Father by his power and will" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 128.4; 129.4), yet the "essence" (ousia) of the Father is not thereby reduced. Another of Justin's ways of distinguishing Father and Son is that although the Son can be called "God" he is "begotten," whereas the Father is the "unbegotten" God (agennētos; e.g., Justin Dial. Tryph. 114.3; 126.2). This begetting of the Son/Logos is before all creation* and is unique (e.g., Justin Dial. Tryph. 105.1), but it is not clear that this is the same as the later idea of the Son's eternal sonship. Justin also distinguishes between the "person" (prosōpon) of the Father and Son as he sees them referred to in the OT (e.g., Justin Apol. I 36-38).

Justin takes all the theophanies in the OT as manifestations of the Son/Logos (e.g., Justin Dial. Tryph. 59; 126), even arguing that "Jesus" was the divine name revealed to Moses (Justin Dial. Tryph. 75; cf. Exod 23:20). A number of times Justin insists upon the propriety of worshiping Christ as well as the Father (e.g., Justin Dial. Tryph. 63.5; 68.3; Justin Apol. I 6.1-2; 13.3), and in one exegesis he manages to make Isaiah 42:8 a proof-text that Christ shares the glory of the Father (Justin Dial. Tryph. 65).

These all amount to a creative attempt to reflect upon and justify Christian convictions about monotheism and the divinity of Christ. Only in Paul and the Johannine writings do we have comparable theological effort. Justin is distinctive, however, in giving us the first extended example of theological effort informed by and consciously intended to engage Greek philosophy.

3.7. Summary. The early extracanonical Christian texts show the continued life and development of christological traditions attested earlier in the NT. If one were to consider also such documents as *Gospel of Peter and *Gospel of Thomas, both of which may incorporate Christian traditions of the early second century, the range of christological expression and piety would be extended even further. Clearly Jewish Christian circles are reflected in Didache and Odes of Solomon. In 1 Clement and 2 Clement we see largely traditional christological affirmations, showing a strong conceptual indebtedness to Jewish Christian tradition, taken up in Gentile Christian groups and put to the service of ethical exhortation. In Ignatius and even more in Justin we have Gentile Christians ready to engage heresy (Ignatius) and non-Christian religious and philosophical options (Justin) with an obvious indebtedness and a firm commitment to earlier Christian tradition yet also exhibiting a somewhat creative development of this tradition. Both these figures, especially Justin, are early examples of one type of reindiginization of Christian beliefs in terms and categories adapted from non-Jewish traditions (e.g., Ignatius's use of the image of a pagan religious procession in Ign. Eph. 9.2), a process that continues in later christological and trinitarian debates. Christian gnostic texts show other, perhaps more radical, experiments in Christian thought and practice that proved too incautiously innovative for the developing orthodox (more traditional) Christians.

See also CHRIST; DOCETISM; LAMB; LOGOS CHRISTOLOGY; LORD; PREEXISTENCE; SHEPHERD, FLOCK; SON OF GOD; STONE, CORNERSTONE; WISDOM; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. W. Barnard, Justin Martyr: His Life and Thought (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967); R. J. Bauckham, "The Worship of Jesus," in The Climax of Prophecy (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); idem, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970 [1921]); W. F. Bunge, "The Christology of Ignatius of Antioch"

(unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University, 1966); H. B. Bumpus, The Christological Awareness of Clement of Rome and Its Sources (Cambridge, MA: University Press of Cambridge, 1972); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (rev. ed.; London: SCM, 1963); J. Daniélou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture (London: Darton, Longman & Todd; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1973); idem, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1964); J. A. Draper, "A Commentary on the Didache in the Light of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Documents" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Cambridge University, 1983); R. M. Grant, The Christ of the Second Century (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); B. Lindars, The Theology of the Letter to the Hebrews (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); V. A. Spence Little, The Christology of the Apologists (London: Duckworth, 1934); R. N. Longenecker, The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity (SBT 2d series 17; London: SCM, 1970); E. Osborn, The Emergence of Christian Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); G. N. Stanton, "Aspects of Early Christian-Jewish Polemic and Apologetics," NTS 31 (1985) 377-92; D. C. Trakatellis, "God Language in Ignatius of Antioch" in The Future of Early Christianity: Essays in Honor of Helmut Koester, ed. B. A. Pearson (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991), 422-30; idem, The Preexistence of Christ in Justin Martyr (HDR 6; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976). L. W. Hurtado

CHRONOLOGY

Chronology here concerns the datings and sequence of significant events and personalities—aside from Jesus (see DJG, Chronology) and Paul (see DPL, Chronology of Paul)—mentioned in the canonical books of the NT and the apostolic fathers (see Apostolic Fathers), as well as the attendant literature. The chronology for this period—approximately A.D. 60 to 150—is a matter of synchronizing three principal time lines: (1) the reliable chronology of Roman imperial history, (2) its interaction with Jewish history and (3) NT history, as integrated into these time grids.

1. The Roman Historical Framework
2. Jewish History
3. New Testament Personalities
4. New Testament Literature
5. The Apostolic Fathers
6. Early Apologists
7. Early Heretics

1. The Roman Historical Framework. Throughout this period the Roman Empire (see Roman Empire) had final authority in Palestine and all the other biblical lands. The regnal years of the various emperors* are undisputed, and in most cases specific dates of accession and death are known. The relation of each to Judaism and Christianity (if any) is sketched in what follows, with corresponding detail later in this article.

1.1. Nero (54-68). His empress, Poppaea, was interested in Judaism. After the Great Fire of Rome in July 64, Nero blunted suspicion that he himself had set the fire by blaming the Christians, resulting in the first Roman persecution* (Tacitus Ann. 15.44), which seems to have been local in character rather than empirewide. Probably in some association with this, both Peter and Paul were martyred. Nero dispatched Vespasian to put down the Jewish rebellion, which had erupted about May 66.

1.2. Galba (68-69), Otho (69) and Vitellius (69). These transition emperors ruled only months, not years, during the later phases of the Jewish War.

1.3. Vespasian (69-79). The founder of the Flavian dynasty was summoned to the imperial purple while fighting the Jewish War. Neither he nor Titus resumed a persecution of the Christians.

1.4. Titus (79-81). Vespasian had left his son Titus to pursue the Jewish War in Palestine, which he concluded with the destruction of Jerusalem* in 70. Titus had a love affair with the Jewish princess Bernice, sister of Agrippa II (Acts 25:13, 23), whom he subsequently abandoned for political reasons.

1.5. Domitian (81-96). After Titus's brief reign, his brother Domitian may have instigated a Christian persecution that affected the Roman nobility, with his relatives Clemens and Domitilla as victims as well as Acilius Glabrio. 1 Clement (c. 95) may well reflect this persecution of Roman Christians.

1.6. Nerva (96-98). The elderly jurist who succeeded the assassinated Domitian abolished defamations resulting from Jewish proselytism and the fiscus Iudaicus. He did not resume a persecution against Christians and was the first of the so-called Five Good Emperors, the next four of which follow.

1.7. Trajan (98-117). His conquests in Dacia and Mesopotamia expanded the boundaries of the Roman Empire to their greatest extent. A so-called Second Jewish War broke out in Egypt, Cyrene and Mesopotamia (115-17), which Trajan subdued. His moderate policy vis-à-vis Christians surfaces in his celebrated correspondence with Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia c. 112, in which he advises him not to seek out the Christians even if the law had to take its course in the case of those properly indicted (Ep. 10.97). Still, Ignatius,* bishop of Antioch, was arrested in Antioch and martyred in Rome under Trajan's administration c. 114, probably during Hadrian's governorship in Antioch (Ign. Eph. 1.2).

1.8. Hadrian (117-38). The Third Jewish War, or the Bar-Kokhba revolt (132-35), erupted under Hadrian's administration and ended with the exclusion of Jews from Jerusalem, which was rebuilt as a Gentile* Roman colonia named Aelia Capitolina (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.6). Hadrian's rescript to Fundanus, governor of Asia c. 125, continued Trajan's moderate policy regarding the Christians: they were illegal, but not to be sought out via illegal methods. Quadratus (see 6.1 below) addressed the earliest Christian apology to Hadrian.

1.9. Antoninus Pius (138-61). During his administration, but not at his instigation, the aged Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, was martyred in the stadium at Smyrna, although some scholars still share the traditional view of Eusebius that this occurred later in the reign of Marcus Aurelius. Aristides (see 6.2 below) addressed his Apology to Antoninus Pius.

1.10. Marcus Aurelius (161-80, with Lucius Verus 161-69). The great apologist Justin (see 6.3 below) was martyred at Rome c. 165 under his administration. A terrible local persecution of Christians broke out at Vienne and Lugdunum (Lyons) in Gaul in 177, as well as at Scillium in Africa c. 180.

For a general integration of Roman, Jewish and early Christian chronology, see the chart at the end of this article.

2. Jewish History.

This period was marked by three major Jewish rebellions against Roman control, far more serious than the periodic imbroglios that had cluttered previous decades. Several famous Jewish figures also lived at this time.

2.1. Events in Jewish History. The great Jewish War was touched off by a riot between Greeks and Jews at Caesarea in the spring of 66. Due to the criminal folly of the Roman procurator Gessius Florus, Zealot elements in the Jerusalem populace were able to escalate hostilities into a major rebellion against Rome. To meet this challenge, Nero dispatched Flavius Vespasian with three Roman legions, and he conquered Galilee and Samaria by 69, leaving his son Titus to conquer Jerusalem and end the war. After an excruciating siege, the temple* was torched on August 30, A.D. 70, and Jerusalem itself was destroyed by September 26. When Herod's great fortress at Masada fell three years later on May 2, the last Jewish resistance was crushed. Considerable precision in dates and details are provided by an eyewitness and participant in the struggle, Flavius Josephus (see 2.2.4 below). After Jerusalem's destruction, Jamnia became the home of the Great Sanhedrin. Around 100, a council of rabbis there established the final canon* of the OT.

The Second Jewish War (115-17) broke out in Cyrene and Egypt, where Zealot unrest had already erupted in 72, following the great Jewish War. This spread to Mesopotamia, where there was hope of Parthian support in opposition to Trajan. But Hadrian, the commander in Syria, subdued the rebellion with great loss of Jewish life (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.2; Dio Cassius Hist. 68.32).

In the Third Jewish War (132-35), Zealot rebellion in Palestine was provoked by Hadrian's plan to rebuild the desolate site of Jerusalem as a Gentile Roman colony to be called Aelia Capitolina. Having been proclaimed Messiah by Rabbi Akiba, Simeon bar Kosiba led the revolt under the name Bar Kokhba ("son of the star"). After savage guerrilla warfare, Palestine was ruined and Jews were excluded from Jerusalem, which became a Gentile city for the next two centuries (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.6; Spartianus Hadrian 14).

2.2. Personalities in Jewish History. Major Jewish figures in this era include Philo of Alexandria (see Alexandria), Gamaliel the Elder, Johanan Ben-Zakkai and Flavius Josephus.

2.2.1. Philo of Alexandria. Also called Philo

Judaeus, he lived just prior to the period covered by this volume, but he strongly influenced both Jews and Christians (particularly Origen) during the first three centuries A.D. through his blending of Greek philosophy and Hebrew Scriptures, which he often interpreted allegorically. The one sure date in his life is A.D. 40, when he led a delegation of Jews to Rome in order to defend his people before the emperor Gaius Caligula after anti-Jewish rioting in Alexandria (Leg. Gai. 299-305). Approximate dates of his life are usually set at 20 B.C. to A.D. 50.

2.2.2. Gamaliel I ("the Elder"). This Sanhedral Pharisee, who advised moderation in the case of the apostles* (Acts 5:34-39) and whom Paul boasts as his teacher (Acts 22:3), was a grandson of the great Hillel. Continuing in the liberalizing tradition of his grandfather, he was an authority on Jewish law* and the first to be honored with the title Rabban ("our Master") rather than the ordinary Rabbi ("my master"). His dates are unknown, but his prime might be assumed at c. A.D. 55.

2.2.3. Johanan Ben-Zakkai. This most important expounder of Jewish law in the A.D. 60s is supposed to have spent forty years in business, forty in study and forty in teaching (Sanh. 41a), a 120-year life span that too closely mirrors that of Moses* for full credibility. In 68, during the first Jewish War with Rome, he outwitted the extremists and made his way to Vespasian's camp, where he successfully asked the Roman general to spare Jamnia and its sages. There he founded the famous Jewish academy, served as its first president and worked for the continuation of Judaism before his death in the 80s.

2.2.4. Flavius Josephus. This Jewish historian was born in Jerusalem in 37, only four years after Jesus' crucifixion. In 66 he was commander of the Jewish forces in Galilee before his capture by Vespasian. Subsequently he served as interpreter in negotiations between the Roman and Jewish forces, and finally he emigrated to Rome, where he was patronized by the Flavians. There he published his Jewish War in 77-78 and his Jewish Antiquities in 93-94. The latter provides extraordinary detail about the intertestamental and especially NT era. Josephus* is our most copious source for extrabiblical information in the first century A.D.

3. New Testament Personalities.

Christian figures in the later NT era may be placed with varying degrees of precision. The subsequent career and fate of many are unknown, and if no chronological benchmarks have survived to provide relevant data, their names are not included in this listing.

3.1. Simon Peter The date of his birth is unknown. His prominent role in the book of Acts fades with his imprisonment by Herod Agrippa I and subsequent deliverance, after which "he departed and went to another place" (Acts 12:17), which is never specified in the NT. Since his arrest and deliverance occurred near the Passover and Agrippa died shortly thereafter in A.D. 44, Peter's deliverance and departure must have occurred in the spring of 44. Five years later he resurfaces at the apostolic council in Jerusalem defending Paul's ministry (Acts 15), after which he is in Antioch, reprimanded by Paul for withdrawing from table fellowship with Christian Gentiles (Gal 2:11-14).

Whether Peter subsequently visited Rome has been debated for centuries. The evidence that he did not rests on an argument from silence: the absence of any mention in Acts, the Pauline corpus or the writings of Justin Martyr, who lived in Rome. The evidence supporting his presence there is larger. If, as seems probable, Babylon was a cryptic name for Rome, then 1 Peter was addressed from Rome (1 Pet 5:13), though there is some debate over the authorship of this epistle. The Letter to the Corinthians by Clement* of Rome (A.D. 95) links the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul with those of the Roman Christians who endured the Neronian persecution (1 Clem. 5.6). A short time later (c. 107) Ignatius of Antioch's Letter to the Romans contains the revealing phrase "Not like Peter and Paul do I give you [Roman Christians] commands" (Ign. Rom. 4.3).

In the second century there are numerous references in Christian writings to the martyrdoms* of Peter and Paul in Rome, particularly the testimony of the presbyter Gaius, whom Eusebius quotes as stating, "I can point out the monuments [or trophies] of the apostles: for if you will go to the Vatican Hill or the Ostian Way, you will find the monuments of those who founded this church* [Peter and Paul]" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.25). The monuments marked the traditional sites of their martyrdoms and probably their places of burial as well, since Gaius was countering the claim that there were apostolic tombs in Asia. Constantine would later erect the basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul, respectively, at these locations. The evidence, then, inclines heavily toward Peter's presence in Rome, though it does not support the tradition that he conducted a lengthy, twenty-five-year ministry there.

Nero's persecution of the Christians—to which Peter has always been linked—followed the Great Fire of Rome in 64, as noted earlier. How much later is not known, but the fall of 64, or the winter or early spring of 65 most likely marks the first Roman persecution of Christians and the martyrdom of Peter.

3.2. James the Just. Despite those who claim that Mary* the mother of Jesus was "ever virgin," the most natural interpretation of all texts concerned is that the man whom Paul and the early church called "the Lord's brother" (Gal 1:19) was indeed Jesus' half-brother, the son of Joseph and Mary born next after Jesus, since he is always mentioned first among Jesus' four brothers (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3; see Relatives of Jesus). Skeptical of Jesus before the resurrection* but a believer after, James presided in A.D. 49 at the apostolic council of Jerusalem (Acts 15), which approved the mission* and theology of Paul and Barnabas. Apparently James was still in a leadership role at the time of Paul's arrest in Jerusalem c. 57 (Acts 21:18) and working on behalf of the Jewish Christians there. (For his authorship of the epistle of James, see 4.1.8 below.) At this point all evidence on James fades from the NT except for Jude's identifying himself as "brother of James" (Jude 1).

Interestingly enough, information about the death of James comes not from biblical sources but from Josephus, who reports that James "the brother of Jesus who was called the Christ*" was stoned to death by sentence of the high priest* Ananus and the Sanhedrin in the absence of the Roman governor Albinus, who had not yet arrived in Palestine (Josephus Ant. 20.9.1 §200). This occurred in 62—information of great importance not only because it is Josephus's second reference to Jesus of Nazareth but also because it is evidence that closely parallels the events of Good Friday (contra revisionists who discount Jewish involvement in Jesus' trial before Pilate). A further version of James's death appears in Hegesippus (as cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.23), who also states that James was stoned to death.

3.3. Jude. Brother of the above, and called Judas in the Gospels, Jude was the probable author of the NT epistle bearing his name (see 4.1.13 below). His placement last among the four brothers of Jesus (Mt 13:55) may imply that he was the youngest, although Mark places him second to last (Mk 6:3). His letter, the penultimate book in the NT, suggests that he outlived his brother James. According to Hegesippus, Jude's grandsons were brought before Domitian as belonging to the royal line of David, but their hands, rough from agricultural labor, convinced him that they were not a threat. Subsequently they became leaders in the church, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.20).

3.4. John. As with all the apostles, John's birth date is unknown. Although the NT is silent on his later life, earliest traditions are quite vocal in associating him with Ephesus in Asia Minor. Eusebius states that John was exiled to the island of Patmos during the reign of Domitian, then returned to Ephesus after the emperor's death (A.D. 96) and remained there for the rest of his life, dying a natural death at an advanced age in the time of Trajan—that is, post-A.D. 98 (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.1, 18, 20, 23, 31). Irenaeus documents John's Ephesian residence through Polycarp, whom he claims to have heard as a boy (Irenaeus Haer. 2.33; 3.3; 5.33; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.20). Several less-attested traditions report an early martyrdom for John, but this may be due to confusion with John the Baptist. Estimating John's death c. A.D. 100 would not fall wide of the mark. For writings ascribed to John and their datings, see below.

4. New Testament Literature.

Aside from the Pauline corpus (see DPL, Chronology of Paul), the dating of the Gospels and General Epistles usually hinges on the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Some critics argue that Jesus' prediction of this event is a vaticinium ex eventu (a "prophecy after the fact") on the part of the Gospel writers, hence these documents must have been written after 70. Traditionalist scholars generally insist, to the contrary, that the Synoptics must have been written before that event, which is the plain reading of the texts, especially since Matthew—with his penchant for prophecy-fulfillment couplets—could hardly have resisted reporting the fulfillment of Jesus' prophecy regarding Jerusalem's destruction had it already occurred.

4.1. The Synoptic Gospels. Early church traditions place the authorship of Matthew, Mark and Luke within an A.D. 60-70 time frame. Modern critics, on the other hand, claim that they reflect elements of postbellum Judaism after the 70s.

4.1.1. Matthew. According to Irenaeus (Haer. 3.1, and cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.8), Matthew was composed "while Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel in Rome and founding the church there," hence c. 60-67. Origen accepted it as the first written Gospel, followed, in order, by Mark, Luke and John (Origen Comm. Mt., as cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.24). Modern critics point to Matthew 26:52—Jesus' reprimand to Peter at Gethsemane—as the author's refusal of a supposedly revived Zealotism after the Jewish War, but this could just as easily apply to that before the conflict. Jesus' famous statement to Peter (Mt 16:19) using the term church (ekklēsia) is similarly presumed to reflect a more established ecclesiology and thus a later date. The term ekklēsia, however, appears already in the Pauline corpus that preceded the Gospels, as well as in Acts.

Dating Matthew depends on a resolution of the Synoptic problem: how to interpret the fact, for example, that 91 percent of Mark is contained in Matthew. If the Griesbach hypothesis is true (Matthew wrote first, and his Gospel was condensed by Mark), then Matthew and its Jewish focus may well reflect an early period of the church, even the A.D. 50s. But if the more commonly held priority of Mark is assumed, and its authorship is assigned to the 50s or 60s, Matthew would date to the later 50s or 60s. Other scholarship, however, has generally inclined toward a date after the 70s. In the absence of new evidence, no firm date is possible beyond such ranges.

4.1.2. Mark. Irenaeus (Haer. 3.1) claims that after the death of Peter and Paul, Mark, as Peter's disciple and interpreter, wrote his Gospel. Clement of Alexandria, however, states that Mark wrote it during Peter's lifetime (as cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14), as does Eusebius himself (Hist. Eccl. 2.15), hence sometime pre-A.D. 65. Again the Synoptic problem intrudes (see 4.1.1 above). If Markan priority (the majority opinion) is assumed and Clement is correct, the Gospel could have been composed any time in the 50s or early 60s. But if Mark condensed the other Synoptics, then a date in the later 60s—but before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70—would apply. Again, however, most modern scholars generally opt for a dating after Jerusalem's fall.

4.1.3. Luke-Acts. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 2.22) assumes that Luke's second treatise, Acts, was written prior to Paul's trial at Rome, since it is not reported in Acts, which concludes with the statement at 28:30 that Paul lived in Rome "two whole years at his own expense" before any hearing or trial. If Acts were written at the close of this two-year period, the composition would date to c. 61-62. Luke's Gospel, accordingly, would necessarily have preceded it. This view, propounded by Jerome (Vir. 7) and A. von Harnack (Neue Untersuchungen zur Apostelgeschichte [1911]), is often supported by traditionalist scholars, whereas others date Luke, Acts and the other Synoptics later into the 70s and 80s, as indicated.

4.1.4. John. According to all traditions of the earliest church, the Fourth Gospel was written last, the apostle John knowing that the other three had provided external details and therefore writing a spiritual Gospel, according to Clement of Alexandria (cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14). Similarly, Eusebius writes that John knew the other three Gospels and provided necessary addenda (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.24). According to the traditional view, the more developed theology in John also argues for a later origination. Irenaeus (Haer. 3:1) writes that John wrote his Gospel "while residing at Ephesus in Asia." If true, this would likely have been before his reported exile to Patmos in connection with Domitian's persecution c. 95. Accordingly, a date between A.D. 85 and the 90s is often posited by scholars of various stripes.

Recently, however, some writers have urged an earlier dating for John. Paul's letter to the Romans, written much earlier, shows high theological development, and the contrast couplets in John (light vs. darkness, love vs. hate, etc.) that were presumed to reflect later Hellenistic influence occur already in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Furthermore, John 5:2 states, "Now there is in Jerusalem near the Sheep Gate a pool . . . called Bethesda," a present tense of the verb that would have been less likely after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70. Moreover, geographical specifics in the Fourth Gospel, early locutions and other considerations lead some scholars to place it before 70 like the Synoptics, or even preceding them (see Robinson).

4.1.5. Acts. (See 4.1.3 above). No event or personality cited in Acts is datable to a time post-A.D. 61/62 (see Acts).

4.1.6. The Pauline Corpus. (See DPL, Chronology of Paul.)

As above, the following NT writings are listed in canonical—not necessarily chronological—order.

4.1.7. Hebrews. Many scholars suggest a date in the A.D. 80s. Hebrews 10:32-34 seems to refer to a persecution (assumed to be Nero's in 64-65) that took place in "the former days." Hebrews 12:4, however—"You have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood"—would seem to militate against this identification, and the suffering mentioned in Hebrews 10:32 could refer instead to the first persecution of Christians by Jews described in the early chapters of Acts. The absence of any reference to the destruction of the temple* or Jerusalem in 70 (and thus the end of the Jewish sacrificial system), the mention of Timothy (Heb 13:23), the primitive condition of the church, and the author's use of the present tense in referring to temple activities all suggest an earlier dating, likely in the 60s (see Hebrews).

4.1.8. James. This NT epistle contains no references to people or events that might assist in dating it, which has resulted in a wide variety of scholarly opinion. Early tradition names James the Just, Jesus' half-brother, as author, although Eusebius reports that some doubted this because, as in the case of Jude, few early writers referred to it. Still, he concluded, both epistles were used regularly in a great many churches (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.23; see Canon). If James was indeed the author, the epistle would obviously have to have been written prior to his martyrdom in A.D. 62.

Internal evidence, in any case, favors an even earlier date. W. P. Armstrong and J. Finegan point out that since the epistle does not reflect debate on any of the questions raised in the Pauline corpus, particularly Gentile circumcision, "it is possibly the earliest book of the NT, written before the Apostolic Council [in A.D. 49]" (Armstrong and Finegan 1:692). Other considerations also favor an early date, at least for the traditions contained in the document. The social climate in the epistle in which the rich oppress the poor characterizes the era before the Jewish War, not after, while the imminent expectation of the parousia,* loose church organization and Jewish focus all bespeak an early authorship (see James).

4.1.9. 1 Peter. The first general epistle of Peter was accepted as the work of the apostle by early church tradition. Papias of Hierapolis (c. 125) used this letter, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.39), as did the primitive elders of Asia (Hist. Eccl. 3.1), Polycarp (Hist. Eccl. 4.14), Irenaeus (Haer. 4.9) and other early authorities. Eusebius himself regarded 1 Peter as authentic and part of the undisputed canon (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25). If the apostle Peter was indeed the author, the letter must obviously have been written prior to his martyrdom in A.D. 64-65. However, scholars who claim the work was only attributed to Peter have offered later datings.

Since this is apparently a persecution document (1 Pet 1:6-7; 4:12; 5:9), the Neronian persecution of 64-65, that of Domitian c. 95, and even that implied in Pliny the Younger's famous letter from Asia Minor to Trajan c. 112 (Pliny Ep. 10.96-97) have all been suggested. 1 Peter 5:9, however, refers to suffering ("throughout the world") from spiritual warfare rather than persecution by the state. There was no empire-wide persecution until the third century. Still, this does not prove that earlier references in the epistle to suffering might not have been the result of persecution, present or threatened. If so, the persecution in Asia reported in Pliny's letter seems too late for attestation of 1 Peter by Papias only fifteen years later, and the Domitianic persecution, if it occurred, appeared targeted to select members of the nobility. The most workable conclusion, accordingly, is authorship just before or during the Neronian persecution, probably c. 64. In terms of outer limits, it cannot be placed earlier than 59, since it shows some familiarity with the Pauline prison letters, nor later than 68, the death of Nero (see 1 Peter).

4.1.10. 2 Peter. Unlike 1 Peter, the second letter attributed to the apostle has the weakest credentials of any book in the NT, and Eusebius lists it among the disputed writings, "though familiar to most" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25). The first explicit reference to 2 Peter in patristic writings does not come until c. A.D. 240 with Origen (Comm. Joh. 5.3). Most modern interpreters conclude that Peter the apostle cannot have written it, since it is too obviously a later work dealing with the problem of a delayed Parousia (2 Pet 3:4), it presents a style much different from that of 1 Peter, and it incorporates an abstract of Jude. Some claim that 2 Peter reflects conditions in the church of the second century and place its authorship there, while, at the other extreme, some conservative scholars either insist that Peter himself wrote it or suggest that a coworker of Peter, perhaps John Mark, put into writing Peter's final thoughts as a posthumous testament. The latter supposition, however, is far from proven (see 2 Peter). Accordingly, no firm dating is possible for 2 Peter, whose canonicity was not fully accepted until the fourth century (see Canon).

4.1.11. 1 John. This document, more a treatise than a letter, is quoted by Polycarp of Smyrna (Pol. Phil. 7) and Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryph. 123.9), was known to Papias of Hierapolis (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39) and Irenaeus (Haer. 3.16), and is regarded as undisputed and therefore canonical by Eusebius himself (Hist. Eccl. 3.25). He states that both present and past scholars accepted it as the apostle's without question (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.24). Its dating, of course, depends on its authorship: John the apostle for 1 John, according to Jerome, and John the presbyter for 2 and 3 John. Other scholars argue that John the presbyter wrote all three letters. The time and place of authorship, however, are hardly affected if either John the apostle or John the presbyter was the author, since they were near contemporaries in Asia Minor, a setting that is further supported if the teaching opposed in 1 John is the Gnosticism (see Gnosis, Gnosticism) of Cerinthus (fl. c. 90). The development of such heresy militates against any considerably earlier dating, and an origination of 1 John sometime in the decade 85-95 is posited by most scholars (see John, Letters of).

4.1.12. 2 John and 3 John. The second and third Johannine epistles have diminishing canonical authority in that order. Irenaeus quotes the second (Haer. 1.16), and Eusebius lists both letters under the works "disputed, yet familiar to most" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25). Their content reflects a provenance similar to that of 1 John in terms of place and time, but with a sharpened specificity as to authorship—John the presbyter—and recipients—"the elect lady" (2 Jn) and "Gaius" (3 Jn). Furthermore, a keener opposition to heresy in 2 John and internal challenge to the elder's authority on the part of a Diotrephes in 3 John suggest a somewhat later date for the last two Johannines. Accordingly, an authorship in the last decade of the first century should not fall wide of the mark (see John, Letters of).

4.1.13. Jude. Since the author does not claim apostleship but identifies himself as "a brother of James," the apostle Jude or Judas of Luke 6:16 would seem ruled out in favor of one of the four half-brothers of Jesus and the full brother of James the Just of Jerusalem (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3). As to the date of Jude's letter, nothing in it requires a postapostolic origin, and Jude 17-18 implies that his readers had personally heard the apostles speak. Since 2 Peter uses Jude, Jude must be earlier, and its probable use by Clement* of Rome suggests a date between 65 and 80. Eusebius, however, lists it among the books "disputed, yet familiar to most" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.35) (See Jude).

4.1.14. Revelation. Probably used by Hermas (c. 100), known by Papias of Hierapolis and Melito of Sardis, and used by Justin and Irenaeus among the early fathers, Revelation enjoyed considerable canonical* authority in the church. Eusebius, however, includes it among both the undisputed and the spurious books, according it something of an intermediate status, for at the end of the canonical book list he writes, "To these may be added, if deemed appropriate, the Revelation of John, the arguments about which I shall discuss at the proper time" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.25). The earliest identification of its author was John the apostle. In the third century, however, Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria* found so many differences between the Fourth Gospel and Revelation that he suggested John the presbyter as author of the latter (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 7.25), a view shared widely today. As above, however, either identification hardly affects the dating. Since Revelation was written when persecution in Asia was thought imminent—and Nero's was limited to Rome—the latter part of Domitian's reign comes into focus, probably c. 95, a date favored by most scholars.

5. The Apostolic Fathers.

This earliest group of Christian writers was once thought to have been in direct contact with the apostles, although this could possibly apply only to Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp. This section will cover the earliest noncanonical writers and writings from the late first century through the mid-second century.

5.1. Clement of Rome. Clement was the early presbyter and third "bishop" at Rome who wrote his Letter to the Corinthians (1 Clement) shortly after "sudden misfortunes and calamities" had overtaken the Roman Christians. Most scholars attribute this persecution to that presumed under Domitian, thus c. A.D. 95-96. As such, this is among the earliest of the noncanonical Christian writings, probably sharing this position with Hermas's Shepherd (which also mentions a Clement, who, unlike the one cited in Philippians 4:3, is probably the same as this Clement). Clement accordingly flourished during the period c. 90-100. The homily 2 Clement was attributed to Clement but written later—probably 130-150—since it incorporates citations from apocryphal Gospels (see Clement of Rome).

5.2. Hermas. The author of the Shepherd, which had near-canonical status in some sectors of the early church (e.g., Irenaeus, according to Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.8), refers to Clement as his contemporary, which would place him in a late first-century time frame. The Muratorian Canon, however, identifies Hermas as a brother of Pius, bishop of Rome c. 140-54, and states that he wrote the Shepherd during his reign, which would require a later date. The chronological difference has not been resolved, and it is possible that the Shepherd was composed in stages incorporating both time slots, possibly by several authors (see Hermas, Shepherd of).

5.3. Ignatius. The bishop of Antioch who was arrested and sent to Rome, where he was martyred in the reign of Trajan, must thus have died in a time frame 98 to 117, probably c. 107-10. En route to his execution he wrote seven letters: four from Smyrna to the churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles and Rome, three from Troas to the churches at Smyrna and Philadelphia, and to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, personally. Polycarp (Pol. Phil. 9.2), Origen (Hom. Luc. 6) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.36) tell of his martyrdom as he was thrown to the beasts (see Ignatius).

5.4. Papias. This bishop of Hierapolis in Asia Minor wrote five books entitled Exposition of Dominical Oracles. Fragmentary quotations from these preserved primarily in Irenaeus and Eusebius reveal intriguing data about the authors of three of the Gospels. Irenaeus claims that Papias lived "at a very early date," listened to the apostle John and was "later a companion of Polycarp" (Irenaeus Haer. 5.33). Eusebius, however, claims the John referred to was not the apostle but John the presbyter (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39), and he has a low opinion of Papias primarily due to his millennialism. Since Papias claims to have learned information about the apostolic age from the daughters of Philip the evangelist (Acts 21:8-9) who later settled in Hierapolis, scholars are prone to assign him a time frame somewhat earlier than that of Polycarp: c. A.D. 60 to c. 130.

5.5. Polycarp. This bishop of Smyrna, as a disciple of the apostle John, was revered as a living witness of the apostolic age. Arrested in Smyrna, he claimed at his trial to have served Christ for eighty-six years (Martyrdom of Polycarp 9) and, refusing to recant, was martyred. When he was over eighty he journeyed to Rome to settle a controversy on the date of Easter with Anicetus, bishop of Rome c. 155-66. Eusebius states that the martyrdom occurred under the reign of Marcus Aurelius (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.14-15), and specifically in 166 according to his Chronicon. This date was unchallenged until 1867, when Waddington's Mémoire sur la chronologie de la vie du rhéteur Aelius Aristide appeared, in which he demonstrated that the Quadratus cited in the Martyrdom of Polycarp was proconsul of Asia in 155-56, during the administration of Antoninus Pius. Accordingly, many scholars prefer 156 as the year of Polycarp's martyrdom, with his birth thus in 70 if, as seems likely, Polycarp was referring to his own baptism as an infant when he claimed to have served Christ for eighty-six years. Of the numerous letters Polycarp is known to have written, only his Letter to the Philippians has survived, most probably written c. 140-50.

5.6. The Epistle of Barnabas. Of anonymous authorship, this treatise had scriptural authority in the church at Alexandria and is found in the Codex Sinaiticus, which accounts for its traditional inclusion among the apostolic fathers. Its penchant for allegorization had much less influence elsewhere in the early church. An allusion in Barnabas 16.3 to the destruction and rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem by enemies seems to reflect on what Hadrian did to Jerusalem, thus suggesting a provenance c. 135-45 (see Barnabas).

5.7. The Didache. The full title of this document is The Teaching of the Lord to the Gentiles Through the Twelve Apostles. It was lost until a manuscript dated in 1056 was discovered by P. Bryennios at Constantinople in 1875. The Didache, which reflects church order and liturgy in the Christian East, was included among the disputed or spurious books by Eusebius (Hist.

Eccl. 3.25), and it clearly is not the work of an apostolic father. Dating this document is fraught with uncertainty, and suggestions have ranged from the close of the first century to a writer archaizing in the third century. Since the Didache shows a close relationship to the Epistle of Barnabas, a similar origin somewhere in the first half of the second century would seem appropriate (see Didache).

6. The Early Apologists.
Earliest defenders of the faith before the Greco-Roman world, who continued the effort begun by St. Paul at the Areopagus (Acts 17), include Quadratus, Aristides and Justin Martyr.

6.1. Quadratus. His is the earliest known apology, but it is lost except for a brief fragment preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 4.3), which states that some of the people Jesus cured survived up to his (Quadratus's) own time. He addressed his apology to the emperor Hadrian, perhaps during the emperor's visit to Athens during the winter of 124-25. A child whom Jesus cured in his last year of ministry would have been ninety-one years old at that time, or as young as eighty-four if Quadratus presented his apology to Hadrian at his accession in 117. Subsequently, a Quadratus became the third bishop of Athens after the martyrdom of Publius, and he is likely the same person (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23).

6.2. Aristides. Mentioning him in the same context with Quadratus, Eusebius states that Aristides also addressed an Apology to Hadrian (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.3), but he does not quote from it. Most scholars, however, claim on internal evidence that the Athenian philosopher addressed it instead to Antoninus Pius early in his administration, c. 140. Aristides' is the earliest extant Christian apology. In the nineteenth century a partial Armenian version was discovered, then a complete Syriac translation. A short time later J. A. Robinson found that the Greek version of the Apology had almost entirely been incorporated in a Greek medieval novel, Barlaam and Josaphat.

6.3. Justin Martyr. Justin is the most important of the early Christian apologists. Born of pagan parentage at Flavia Neapolis (the modern Nablus) in biblical Samaria c. 100, he moved to Ephesus, where he converted to Christianity c. 132. Teaching in various cities, he later spent a longer time lecturing in Rome, where he addressed his Apology, written c. 150, to Antoninus Pius. His so-called Second Apology, a shorter work against persecution of Christians, appeared c. 153, and his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew derives from this period also. According to the Acta SS Justini et sociorum, Justin was martyred under the prefect Rusticus between 163 and 167.

7. Early Heretics.
Challenges to the theology of the Christian mainstream arose during late apostolic and postapostolic times, principally from Jewish Christian and Gnostic errorists.

7.1. Jewish Christian Errorists. The Ebionites* rejected the Pauline epistles and regarded Jesus as the natural son of Joseph and Mary who was elected Son of God at his baptism.* Probably originating both from the Judaizers opposed to Paul and survivors from Qumran after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70, the Ebionites suffered during the Bar Kokhba revolt (132-35) because they refused to accept him as Messiah (see Jewish Christianity). Their numbers dwindled thereafter, and their remnant was inundated in the Muslim tide that swept over Syria* in the seventh century.

7.2. Gnostic Errorists. Gnosticism, a hydra-headed mélange of various recondite teachings often based on (or spawning) apocryphal* and pseudepigraphic* writings, alarmed church fathers of the second and third centuries. Its roots, however, are in the purview of the later NT era (see Gnosis, Gnosticism). Only the most prominent Gnostics are listed here.

7.2.1. Simon Magus. He is not described as a Gnostic in Acts 8:9 ff., but patristic accounts all deem him the very source of this and all other heresies. The Samaritan magician (see Magic) who tried to buy the power of miracles from Peter (and thus gave rise to the term simony) arrived in Rome during the reign of Claudius (41-54), where he was defeated by Peter, according to Justin Martyr (cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.13-14). A fellow Samaritan, Menander, followed Simon as head of the Simonians, teaching at Antioch* near the close of the first century.

7.2.2. Saturninus. An ascetic disciple of Menander, Saturninus taught at Antioch early in the second century. He claimed that seven angels* created the world and man, although a docetic* Christ was the redeemer.

7.2.3. Basilides. Another disciple of Menander, Basilides, taught at Alexandria during the reign of Hadrian. He claimed archon-gods had power over the universe but were ignorant of the "nonexistent" God until the Gospel of Light descended on them. Another Gnostic, Carpocrates, taught a syncretistic theology at Alexandria a little later, c. 135.

7.2.4. Cerinthus. A heresiarch at Ephesus c. 100 who was both Gnostic and Ebionite, according to Irenaeus (Haer. 1.3), Cerinthus was also a sensual chiliast, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.28). In patristic writings he appears as the archenemy of Johannine Christianity.

7.2.5. Marcion. A native of Pontus, Marcion* taught at Rome from 137 to 144, when he was excommunicated. Like the Gnostics, he had a docetic Christology and a negative attitude toward the material world, which he thought was created by the demiurge, the god of the OT. He rejected the OT and included only an edited version of Luke and the Pauline corpus in his canon.

7.2.6. Valentinus. The most influential Gnostic, founder of the Valentinian sect, Valentinus taught at Alexandria and then at Rome c. 136-65. His esoteric theology posited a hierarchy of aeon pairs and a visible world resulting from the fall of Sophia, the last of the aeons. Jesus, as redeemer, saved people by imparting to them saving knowledge (gnōsis).

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT; ROMAN EMPIRE, CHRISTIANS AND THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. R. Armstrong and J. Finegan, "Chronology of the NT" ISBE 1:686-93; F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles, (3rd ed., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); idem, New Testament History (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972); G. B. Caird, "Chronology of the NT," IDB 1:599-607; K. P. Donfried, "Chronology: New Testament" in ABD 1:1011-22; J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1964); R. Jewett, A Chronology of Paul's Life (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); G. Ogg, The Chronology of the Life of Paul (London: Epworth, 1968); B. Reicke, The New Testament Era (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); E. M. Smallwood, The Jews Under Roman Rule (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976).

P. L. Maier

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

(Years in parentheses are significant dates within the reigns of Roman emperors appearing in the Roman & General History column.)

Dates	Roman & General History	Christian History	Jewish History
27 B.C.-A.D. 14	Augustus
(c. 5 B.C.)		Birth of Jesus
A.D. 14-37	Tiberius
(26-36)	Administration of Pontius Pilate as Prefect of Judea
(c. 29-33)		Jesus' public ministry
(c. 33)		Crucifixion of Jesus
37-41	Caligula	Simon Magus at Samaria	Exile of Herod Antipas; Philo's delegation to Rome
41-54	Claudius	Paul's mission journeys	Death of Philo; death of Herod Agrippa I
(49)		Apostolic Council at Jerusalem
(51-52)	Gallio Proconsul of Acaia	Paul in Corinth
54-68	Nero	James written? 1 Peter written? Much of the Pauline corpus written; Synoptics	Gamaliel; Outbreak of the Jewish War with Rome and Acts written (early view) Gospel of John written (early view).

(62)		Death of James the Just at Jerusalem	Albinus succeeds Festus as procurator of Judea
(64)	Great Fire of Rome	First Roman persecution; Peter martyred; Paul, subsequently
68-69	Galba, Otho, Vitellius	Hebrews written?	Johanan Ben-Zakkai at Jamnia
69-79	Vespasian	Synoptic Gospels written (later view); Jude written?	Josephus publishes the Jewish War
(70)	Titus conquers Jerusalem		Fall of Jerusalem, burning of the temple
79-81	Titus
(79)	Mt. Vesuvius destroys Herculaneum, Pompeii
81-96	Domitian	Revelation written? Second Roman persecution of Christians; Gospel of John written? (later view); John the Seer on Patmos; 1 John written; 1 Clement written.	Josephus publishes Jewish Antiquities
96-98	Nerva	2 and 3 John written?
98-117	Trajan	Ignatius martyred at Rome; Pliny asks about Christians; Gnostics Cerinthus, Saturninus, and Basilides	Council at Jamnia fixes OT canon; Second Jewish War
(c. 100)		Death of John?	Death of Josephus?
117-138	Hadrian	Letter to Fundanus; Quadratus writes Apology to Hadrian; Papias at Hierapolis	Third Jewish War (Bar Kokhba revolt); exclusion of Jews from Jerusalem.
138-161	Antoninus Pius	Polycarp martyred; Aristides writes Apology to Antoninus Pius; Marcion excommunicated at Rome; of Gnostic teacher Valentinus
161-180	Marcus Aurelius	Justin martyred at Rome; persecutions at Lyons and Scillium.

CHURCH

The book of Acts* ends with Paul in Rome.* By this time the church is well established in Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece and Italy (see DPL, Church). When Justin Martyr concludes his Dialogue with Trypho (A.D. 160) the Christian church has spread around the Mediterranean basin and beyond. With this geographical dispersion the early Christian communities could have easily thought of themselves as self-contained groups, but their profound consciousness that they belonged to the one Christian community, the church, did not allow this. In this period we see a widening gulf between Christians and Jews as each comes to recognize the separate identity of the other (see Christianity and Judaism).

1. Presuppositions
2. Acts
3. Hebrews
4. James
5. 1 Peter
6. The Johannine Epistles
7. The Book of Revelation
8. Apostolic Fathers

1. Presuppositions.

In seeking to discover how early Christian writers understood the church, a number of basic presuppositions must be spelled out.

In this article the idea that a doctrine of the church can be achieved solely by focusing on and determining a fixed meaning of the Greek word ekklēsia ("church") is rejected. Words are used with different meanings in different contexts and usually represent a concept that can be denoted by other words, metaphors or expressions. In what follows the focus is on the church concept, defined as the Christian community. One word used frequently to designate this concept is ekklēsia, but as we will see many virtual synonyms, descriptive phrases and metaphors are also used. Furthermore, the concept can be in mind even when this one word is not present.

The church is to be thought of as "the Christian community" because the early Christians were one in understanding that while men and women individually came to faith* in Christ,* this involved by definition becoming part of the family of God* open to all people everywhere. The goal of the Christian mission* was not to save individuals, though it involved this, but to call out a people for God's name.* All the apostolic and postapostolic writers see this new community emerging out of historic Israel.* It is therefore, like Israel, a corporate entity. The local gathering of Christians was important because this was where communal life in Christ was most personally realized; but for the early Christians, belonging to the one community established by Christ was the primary reality. The modern Western individualistic spectacles through which we read the early Christian writings all too often blind us to seeing the profound communalism of early Christianity.

How each author understood the relationship between this community and the one from which it had emerged, namely, Israel, is one of the key issues to be worked out in any study of ecclesiology. As this was a difficult matter for the early Christians to resolve and as it was conditioned historically by an ever-widening breach between Jews and Christians, we would anticipate finding differing answers. The two stark alternatives were restoration or replacement. The church was a purified and renewed Israel into which Gentiles* were welcomed, or the church was a breakaway from Israel, a new work of God. In the first case continuity is to the fore; in the second, discontinuity.

In seeking to conceptualize the form of the church in this early period, we recognize that Christians normally met in relatively small groups in a home. The largest home would hold no more than fifty people. Most homes would have accommodated fewer than this number. Thus our modern experience of church must be put to one side as we try to visualize church life in the first and second centuries.

2. Acts.

Lukan ecclesiology has a number of distinctive features.

2.1. Spirit and Church. In Acts Luke has the new Christian community coming into existence on the day of Pentecost,* when the Holy Spirit* is poured out on those who confess Jesus as Lord* and Christ. In Luke's thinking the Holy Spirit institutes and empowers the church. He sees the coming of the Holy Spirit as the fulfillment of the words of the prophet Joel, who along with other OT prophets had predicted a universal outpouring of the Holy Spirit on God's people in the age of final redemption* (Joel 2:28-32; cf. Ezek 36:27; 37:14; Is 32:15; Zech 12:10; see Old Testament in Acts). In quoting Joel's prophecy Luke adds as an introduction the words "in the last days" (Acts 2:17) to show he understood that this mighty giving of the Spirit indicated that the eschatological* age had dawned. In pouring out the Spirit, God was restoring Israel and inaugurating the new covenant* (cf. Ezek 36:27 and Jer 31:33). The word ekklēsia does not appear in Acts until Acts 5:11. Immediately after the giving of the Holy Spirit Luke is content to use a number of descriptive designations of the newly created, Spirit-filled community: "those who received the word" (Acts 2:41), "those who believed" (Acts 2:44), those who are being saved (Acts 2:47) and "the community" (epi to auto, Acts 2:47; see Giles 1995, 261 n. 9). Nevertheless we can correctly speak of this event as the birth of the church. In Luke's mind this is when the post-Easter Christian community came into existence.

Having made the Holy Spirit foundational to the establishment of the new community, Luke has an abiding preoccupation with the Holy Spirit. Some seventy times the word pneuma ("Spirit") appears in Acts. R. E. Brown concludes, "the distinguishing feature of Lucan ecclesiology is the overshadowing presence of the Holy Spirit" (Brown, 65).

2.2. Church and Israel. A protracted debate has taken place as to how Luke views the relationship between historic Israel and the new Christian community. What seems to be the case is that Luke's distinctive ecclesiology depicts those Jews who recognize Jesus as the long-awaited Messiah and are empowered by the Holy Spirit as restored Israel. Gentiles who believe are included in this restored Israel, as the prophets had predicted (Acts 15:12-18). Jews who reject Christ are "rooted out" and lose their status as the people of God (Acts 3:23). In telling his story in historical sequence, Luke allows that the realization only gradually dawned on the first believers that historic Israel as such had ceased to be the people of God (for a different perspective on Israel's status see Covenant).

This new community, Luke insists, is, like historic Israel, very much on earth. A heavenly church would have been a contradiction in terms for him. Christ has ascended into heaven* to rule in power* and glory* (Acts 1:6-11; 2:33), and the church is on earth "passing through many tribulations" (Acts 14:22).

2.3. Names for the Church. Luke gives a large number of names to the one reality we call the church. H. J. Cadbury lists and discusses nineteen collective titles. A few of these are doubtful, but even leaving two or three aside, a large number remain.

2.3.1. "Those Who. . . ." Some titles are descriptive and may have been developed by Luke or taken over from common usage. The designations "those who believe" (several participial forms are used; see Acts 2:44; 4:32; 15:5; 16:34; 18:27); "those who call on the name" (Acts 9:14, 21; 22:16); "those who received the word" (Acts 2:41) and "those who are being saved" (Acts 2:47; cf. Lk 13:23) fall into this category.

2.3.2. Early Titles Preserved. Another group of titles seem to be almost historical fossils. They reflect very early Palestinian terminology. "Galileans" (Acts 1:11; 2:7) is one possible example. Others include "the Nazarenes" (Acts 24:5) and "the Way" (ho hodos; Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 24:14, 22), to which we can add Acts 22:4 ("this way"). In the OT and at Qumran* the word way is often used figuratively of living in a manner pleasing or not pleasing to God (Ps 101:2; 119:1-3; Is 53:6; 57:17). Besides using the word absolutely, Luke also speaks of "the way of the Lord" (Acts 18:25), "the way of God" (Acts 18:26) and "the way of salvation" (Acts 16:17). Possibly the absolute usage is but an abbreviation. Both titles, "the Nazarenes" and "the Way," can designate what Jewish opponents call a "sect" or "party" (hairesis). This word is not yet another title for Christians but a Jewish way of viewing the early believers as a sect within Israel. Luke uses this word of the Pharisees (Acts 15:15) and of the Sadducees (Acts 5:17), but he does not think it is appropriate to use it of the disciples of Christ. They are more than this. In the three instances (Acts 24:5, 14; 28:22) where this term is used of believers, it is on the tongue of opponents.

Another very early title used first by the enemies of the new community (this time from a Gentile setting) is "the Christians." The Greek transliteration of a Latin ending (-ianos) means "belonging to." In Acts 11:26 Luke says, "At Antioch the disciples were first called Christians." Here and in the second usage (Acts 26:28) Luke has others calling Christians by this name. It was at this stage not a self-designation, and this is still the case when the title appears in 1 Peter 4:16. On a number of occasions Luke also calls Christians collectively to plēthos. He can use this word of any group of people ("a crowd"; Acts 14:1; 17:4; 21:22), but sometimes he allows it to have an almost technical meaning so that it can be translated "the [Christian] community" (Acts 6:2, 5; 15:12, 30; possibly Acts 21:22). Twice in the Septuagint to plēthosis is used to render into Greek the Hebrew word qāhāl ("assembly/the Jewish covenant community"), which is usually translated by the word ekklēsia (Ex 12:6; 2 Chron 31:18).

2.3.3. Saints. The collective titles "the saints" (hoi hagioi) and "the people [of God]" (ho laos) may be grouped together. These two terms are given weighty theological content by their use in the Septuagint to designate Israel. Four times Luke calls Christians collectively "the saints" (Acts 9:13, 32, 41; 26:10), and twice he speaks of them as being "sanctified," using the participial form of the word (Acts 20:32; 26:18). In establishing the covenant with Israel God sets them apart as a holy nation (Ex 19:6; Lev 11:44-45). It is on this basis that the Jews became God's holy people, the saints (Num 16:13; Deut 33:3; Ps 16:3; 34:9; 89:5; Is 4:3). In calling Christians "the saints" Luke identifies them with restored Israel. Similarly, by twice designating Christians ho laos, "the people of God" (Acts 15:14; 18:10; cf. Acts 3:23), Luke makes the same point. In the Septuagint this term is a distinctive and theologically weighted designation of Israel.

2.3.4. Disciples and Brethren. It is, however, the titles "the disciples," "the brethren" and "the church" that Luke uses most commonly. The title "the brethren" (hoi adelphoi), a gender-inclusive term, is interesting because Luke uses it for both Jews and Christians, which suggests the relationship between these two groups was still relatively fluid. Even as late as Acts 28:21 Luke can speak of fellow Jews as brethren. Nevertheless, without any apology he calls Christians "the brethren" twenty-five times (Acts 9:30; 10:23; 11:1; 12:17). This term underlines the familial nature of being a believer. The title "the disciples" (hoi mathētai) is almost as common, being used twenty-three times of Christians (Acts 6:7; 9:26; 11:26; 15:10). In this case this title is a reminder that believers are followers of Christ.

2.3.5. Church. Finally we come to the word ekklēsia, which Luke uses nineteen times of Christians (Acts 5:11; 8:1; 9:31; 11:26), three times of an unruly assembly of citizens in the theater at Ephesus (Acts 19:32, 39, 41) and once of the Jews assembled at Mount Sinai to receive the law* (Acts 7:38). In classical Greek this word referred to people actually assembled, and Luke uses the word in this sense to denote the crowd at Ephesus. To argue on this basis that this is the meaning of the term in all the other uses in Acts is absurd. It would be like arguing that because Luke uses the verb "to save" of the rescue of Paul and the ship's crew (in Acts 27:20, 31) he believed salvation* is only a this-worldly rescue. Elsewhere (excepting Acts 7:38) Luke uses the word ekklēsia in a specifically Christian sense to speak of Christians as a theologically defined community, restored Israel. In this sense it carries the content of the more developed meaning of this word in the Septuagint (see Giles 1995, 230-40).

Luke uses the one word to designate both a local community of Christians (Acts 5:11; 8:1; 11:26; 13:1) and the Christian community in its entirety (Acts 20:28). The addition of the genitive "of God" in this last reference adds nothing. In the Gospels "the kingdom of God" means the same as "the kingdom" (see Kingdom of God). When Luke wishes to speak of local Christian communities in more than one place he uses the plural (Acts 15:41; 16:5). Acts 9:31 is problematic, as both the word ekklēsia and the verbs and participles that follow are found in the singular and the plural in different manuscripts. Luke makes it clear that the church in Jerusalem,* numbering many thousands, met in homes (Acts 2:46; 5:42; 10:2; 11:14; 12:12-17), but he never uses the word ekklēsia for a house church. For him the Christians in one geographical spot are "the" local church.

2.3.6. Synonymity of Titles. What is important to note is that while each of these collective titles has its own nuance, they are virtual synonyms that can be used interchangeably. Acts 9 is instructive, as Luke uses five collective titles for stylistic variation in this chapter. In Acts 9:1 he speaks of "the disciples" and repeats this term in Acts 9:25, 26 and 38. Next comes the title those "who belong to the way" (Acts 9:2). In Acts 9:30 he uses the title "the brethren"; in Acts 9:13 and 32 "the saints"; in Acts 9:14 and 21 "those who call on the name." Elsewhere in Acts the most common titles—"the disciples," "the brethren" and "the church"—are frequently interchanged. For example, Luke speaks of the disciples of a city or of the church of a city (Acts 8:1; cf. Acts 9:19). He can speak of Paul strengthening the churches or the disciples (Acts 14:22; 15:41; 18:23). The overlapping but not identical meaning of each of these collective titles can be diagrammatically illustrated by using a selection of the terms.

One reality, the Christian community, designated by different terms

3. Hebrews.

On reading Hebrews* one is immediately struck by the distinctive language, christology* and use of the OT (see Old Testament in Hebrews). It is not surprising therefore to discover that this epistle also has a distinctive ecclesiology. Although Hebrews appeals primarily to the OT to make its case, it envisages a radical breach with Israel. The old covenant has been replaced by the new (Heb 8:6-13); the Jewish priesthood* and the office and work of the High Priest have come to an end (Heb 7:11-14, 23-28); and Jesus in offering himself has made obsolete the old sacrificial* system (Heb 9:25-28; 10:11-15). As a consequence the author views the Christian community as new Israel in all but name. The Christians have taken the place of the historic people of God, assuming their distinctive titles and privileges. Thus in Hebrews 3—4 the author can typologically identify the Christian family with Israel. How God dealt with Israel and what he said to them in the past now, one for one, applies to the Christian community.

The author of Hebrews uses a number of terms to designate this new community. They are "the people of God" (ho laos, Heb 2:17; 4:9; 8:10; 10:30; 11:25; 13:12); "the children of God" (Heb 2:10; 12:5, 6, 7); "the saints" (Heb 6:10; 13:24) and "God's house" (Heb 3:6). All these titles were originally the prerogative of historic Israel. By implication Christians are also understood to be the new covenant community (Heb 8:8-12; 10:16-17).

The word ekklēsia, is used only twice. It appears first in Hebrews 2:12 in a quote from Psalm 22:22, in which God's people are depicted as a worshiping community (see Worship). This same thought appears in the second example (Heb 12:23), where again historic Israel and the Christian community are related typologically but this time by way of contrast. In Hebrews 12:18-24 the author speaks of the two communities, with different mediators, "drawing near" (proserchesthai) either to the earthly Mount Sinai or to the heavenly Jerusalem,* identified as Mount Zion, the former group in terror, the latter with rejoicing. Who comprises those with whom these Christians are said to draw near is unclear. Possibly the three groups are angels* (Heb 12:22); Christian believers who have died ("the ekklēsia/assembly of the firstborn") and whose names are enrolled in heaven (Heb 12:23); and OT believers described as "just men made perfect" (Heb 12:23).

If we ask, How did the author envisage the Christian community on earth drawing near in Hebrews 12:22, the best answer is, in worship. In Hebrews 2:12 the church is described as a worshiping community, and the key verb proserchesthai ("to draw near") is a cultic term drawn from the OT alluding to what takes place in worship (see Giles 1995, 155-56). At this point we should also add that the argument does not stand that because the word ekklēsia in Hebrews 12:23 is used of a heavenly assembly, all universal uses of the word ekklēsia in the NT refer exclusively to a heavenly gathering. The language and thought of the epistle to the Hebrews is distinctive, and all the writer seems to be suggesting is that in worship Christians come near to God along with a great heavenly company.

4. James.

The epistle of James* is a pastoral epistle, not a theological treatise. Most commentators think James is addressing Jewish Christians* when he calls them "the twelve tribes of the dispersion" (Jas 1:1; see Diaspora Judaism). This title is strongly communal and bears witness to a belief that the Christian community is dispersed throughout the world, but it is probably not a claim that Christians are the new Israel. In James 2:2 the writer calls a Christian gathering a synagogue* (cf. Heb 10:25; Ign. Pol. 5.2; Herm. Man. 11.9; Justin Dial. Tryph. 63.5). In James 5:14 he speaks of "the elders of the church" (ekklēsia). This suggests that the Christian community addressed, called an ekklēsia, was a structured one with appointed office bearers (see Church Order). This means then that the two terms are used differently. In James 2:2 the Greek word synagogē refers to an assembly, to people as they are gathered; the word ekklēsia, in James 5:14 refers to a community of Christians with an ongoing existence and an ordered life.

5. 1 Peter.

First Peter* is important for although it does not use the word ekklēsia it is more interested in theologically defining the Christian community, the church, than is any other NT writing. It seems certain that the epistle is addressed to predominantly Gentile Christians living in northern Asia Minor, who are suffering* for their faith.

In the opening address these Christians are explicitly identified as Israel. They are the "exiles of the dispersion," "chosen and destined by God," "sanctified by the Spirit and . . . sprinkled with his blood" (1 Pet 1:1-2). Three times elsewhere Peter speaks of the Christian community as being "chosen" or elect* (1 Pet 2:4, 6, 9), a way of designating Israel (1 Chron 16:13; Ps 105:6; Is 65:9). The mention of them being sprinkled with blood marks them out as the new covenant community, for these words reflect the enactment of the Sinai covenant, which constituted Israel as God's elect and destined people (Ex 24:3-8; cf. 1 Pet 1:18-21).

But the most theologically pregnant comment about the Christian community is found in 1 Peter 2:4-10. The author begins by exhorting individual Christians to come to Jesus the "living stone" (cf. Is 8:4; 28:16; Ps 117:22; see Stone). He then moves to corporate imagery by speaking of a building process that creates a "spiritual house" (1 Pet 2:5; see House), a community, which may be understood because of the associated cultic language to be the new temple* of Jewish apocalyptic* hope* (cf. 1 Cor 3:16; Eph 2:19-22). It is "spiritual" in the sense that it is not a literal house or temple, being constituted by the Spirit, built up as believers are added. Collectively they are "a holy priesthood" (hierateuma). This designation reflects Exodus 19:6, where it is applied to the whole people of Israel.

Finally in 1 Peter 2:9 an overlapping series of theologically weighted collective titles are given to the Christian community. Peter declares: "But you [plural] are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people (laos) belonging to God." The four titles are drawn from Exodus 19:6 and Isaiah 43:20-1, where they denote Israel as the covenant people of God. In applying them to the Christian community Peter is emphatically saying the church is now Israel. The corporate identity of those belonging to the church is so profound that Peter calls them a chosen "race" (genos). On this basis later Christian writers would speak of the Christian community as "a third race," neither Jew nor Gentile (Preaching of Peter; Tertullian Ad Nat. 1.8).

Another characteristic of the ecclesiology of 1 Peter is a very strong sense of the separation between the believing community and the society in which the church finds itself. Believers are described as "exiles" (1 Pet 1:1, 17) and "aliens and exiles" (1 Pet 2:11); they are exhorted to be holy* (1 Pet 1:15-16) and morally distinct (1 Pet 1:17-18; 3:1-2, 11-12, 18-25; 3:1-7; 8-17; 4:1-6, 12-19). They are to expect to suffer as Christ suffered (1 Pet 1:6-7; 2:19-25; 3:13-22; 4:1-6, 12-19; 5:9-10).

Peter, like most other NT writers, recognizes that the Christian community has both a localized and a universal expression. He designates the whole Christian community as God's "flock" (1 Pet 5:2), who have returned to their "shepherd and guardian" (1 Pet 2:25; see Shepherd). The elders, however, as local leaders are exhorted to "tend the flock of God in your charge" (1 Pet 5:20); that is, the Christians whom they lead in one place. This same contrast appears in the concluding words of the epistle, in which the author distinguishes between those to whom he writes, a localized group of Christians, and "your brothers and sisters (adelphotēs) in all the world" (1 Pet 5:9).

6. The Johannine Epistles.

One of the special characteristics of the three epistles of John (see John, Letters of) is their concern to differentiate the "true church" from those who have broken away (1 Jn 2:19), whom the author thinks are the enemies of Christ (1 Jn 2:18-19; 4:3; 2 Jn 7). This means his main ecclesiological concern is the boundaries of the Christian community (what are the marks of the true church), not the church's relationship with Israel, a matter not alluded to in these epistles.

The true Christian community is made up of believers who are in fellowship* "with us" (those representing the views of John the apostle), who confess that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 5:1), the Son of God (1 Jn 1:3, 7; 3:8, 23) who came in the flesh (1 Jn 4:2; 2 Jn 7); and love* others who are in this restricted company (1 Jn 2:10; 3:11). Those who have broken with "us" are to be shown no welcome: they are to be turned away if they seek contact (2 Jn 10-11). The true church is to be separate from the wider society in which it finds itself. Members are "not to love the world" (1 Jn 2:15), for the "the whole world lies under the power of the evil one" (1 Jn 5:19; see Satan). In return the world hates them (1 Jn 3:13). This restricted understanding of love and hostility to unbelievers is less than the Christian ideal and must be explained as part of the damage control of a church under extreme pressure from schism and external threat.

In 3 John the word ekklēsia is used three times (3 Jn 6, 9, 10) of a circumscribed local group of believers, but otherwise these epistles do not use this word or other theologically significant communal terms such as "the saints" or "the people of God." Instead the author addresses his readers as "beloved," "children" (see Sonship) or "brothers." Some scholars have suggested on this basis and other evidence that we see here an individualistic view of the Christian life, but nothing could be further from the truth. The author underlines the distinctiveness and separation from the world of these believers as a community. They owe their communal identity to the fact that they have been "born of God" (1 Jn 2:29; 5:1); they are God's children (1 Jn 3:1, 10) in whom God abides and they in him (1 Jn 2:24, 27; 3:9).

Very little is said in these epistles about congregational life, and what can be deduced comes mainly from 2 John and 3 John. These epistles seem to reflect a situation in which Christians are meeting in a number of house churches. If this is so then 2 John is a letter from one house church leader to another house church leader in the near vicinity. He calls those to whom he writes "the elect lady and her children" (2 Jn 1). His advice is that anyone who does not make the true confession* of Christ should not be "received into the house or welcomed" (2 Jn 10), which almost certainly means not into "your" house church. In 3 John such house churches are three times designated by the word ekklēsia (3 Jn 6, 9, 10).

7. The Book of Revelation.

The final book of the Bible is addressed to "the seven churches" (Rev 1:4, 11) in Asia Minor. As the number seven is always the number of completeness for this author, the implication is that the whole church is being addressed, of which these seven churches are representative. This is made clear in the refrain at the end of each individual letter, "Let anyone who has an ear listen to what the Spirit is saying to the churches." This means "Listen well, for these words have a message for every believer, the universal church."

In Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) the universal church on earth is Israel. The author makes this transfer of identity even more emphatically than does the author of the epistle to the Hebrews or 1 Peter. The Jewish people are allied with the forces of the beast* and doomed to destruction (Rev 2:9; 3:9; 13:1, 5, 6; 17:3). Jerusalem, representing Israel, is identified with "Sodom and Egypt" (Rev 11:8). Conversely the Christian community is true Israel who inherit all the promises* once made to the Jewish people. Twice the author applies the foundational OT covenant passage, Exodus 19:6, to Christians, declaring that they have been made "a kingdom of priests to God" (Rev 1:6; 5:10; cf. Rev 20:6). This is the text applied to Christians collectively in 1 Peter 2:9 ("you are a royal priesthood"). But whereas in 1 Peter the collective term hierateuma ("priesthood") is used, in Revelation the individual title hiereus ("priest") is found. Every believer is a priest in his or her own right, but collectively they are a kingdom. Christ is the king (Rev 9:11; 15:3; 17:4; 19:16), and the people over whom he rules are a kingdom of priests (Rev 1:6, 9; 5:10; 11:15; 12:10). Revelation also depicts the Christian community as a temple (naos, Rev 3:12; 11:1-2) and as a city (polis, Rev 3:12; 11:3; 20:9; 21:2, 22; 22:19)—a city that is opposed by another city, the embodiment of evil (Rev 11:8; 14:8; 16:19).

As is true in Hebrews, the author of Revelation identifies the Christian community typologically with historic Israel. It is the Christian community who is taking part in the second exodus, who have been redeemed from slavery* by the death of the Lamb* and are now enjoying the blessings of the new covenant; and it is the enemies of this community who fall under the judgment* of God as he sends plagues on them (Rev 12:1—14:20). In Revelation 7 the Christian community is equated symbolically with historic Israel, having assumed its identity. In the first vision* (Rev 7:1-8) the 144,000, identified as "the servants of our God" (Rev 7:3), are God's new covenant people, the suffering church of the first century. In the second vision (Rev 7:9-17) the "great multitude that no one could number" are the same group at the climax of world history.

Particularly important for determining the ecclesiology of the John the Seer is the final vision given in Revelation 21:1—22:22. This speaks amid a confusing number of visual images of the future that is promised to the church. It is described as the new creation* (Rev 21:1), the new Jerusalem (Rev 21:2), the new temple (Rev 21:3a), the new covenant community (Rev 21:3b) and the new Israel (Rev 21:4). This vision proclaims that what is true now will be perfected and revealed for all to see when the Lamb returns in victory. At present the church is the believing community on earth, which has a triumphant counterpart in heaven made up of angels and those who have been martyred (Rev 8:3-4; see Martyrdom). The final vision speaks of the merging into one of these two worshiping communities.

Viewing the church as a worshiping community is another special characteristic of the ecclesiology of Revelation. The term *worship (proskyneō) is used twenty-four times; word pictures of worship in heaven are common and vivid (cf. Rev 4), and liturgical refrains appear frequently (Rev 4:11; 5:9-13; 7:9-17; 11:15-18; 12:10-12; 15:3-4; 16:5-7; 19:1-8). On earth there are two options. One can either "worship" the beast (Rev 9:20; 13:4, 8, 12, 15; 16:2; 19:20) or worship God and the Lamb (Rev 11:1; 14:7; 15:4).

8. Apostolic Fathers.

8.1. The Didache. In the *Didache the church is primarily the whole Christian community on earth. The attributes "one" and "holy" are particularly stressed. In Didache 9 the coming together of believers to celebrate the Eucharist is seen as pointing to the unity of all Christians. As one of the prayers* puts it: "As the broken bread was scattered on the mountains, and then when gathered, became one, so let your church be gathered from the ends of the earth into your kingdom" (Did. 9.4). And similarly: "Remember, Lord, your church, deliver it from all evil and make it perfect in your love, and from the four winds gather it together in holiness to your kingdom which you have prepared for it" (Did. 10.5). Besides using the word ekklēsia of all Christians the author also uses it once of believers "in assembly" (Did. 4.14; cf. 1 Cor 11:18; 14:19, 28, 34, 35). He says confession of sin is to be made "in church."

8.2. 1 Clement. The inscription of this epistle immediately reveals that Clement (see Clement of Rome) saw the church as a universal reality that was located in specific places such as Rome and Corinth. He writes from "The church (ekklēsia) of God which sojourns in Rome to the church of God which sojourns in Corinth." The latter is equated with "those who are called and sanctified by the will of God." In both cases the church (ekklēsia) refers to all the Christians in each of these two cities (1 Clem. 44.3) who would have met in a number of homes as separate congregations (see Maier). H. O. Maier argues that the divisions at Corinth may have originated in disputes between house church groups.

One of Clement's favored designations for the whole Christian community is "the elect of God" (1 Clem. 2.4; 6.1; 6.3, 4, 8; 49.5). He also calls them "the flock of Christ" (1 Clem. 16.1; 44.3; 54.2; 57.2), "the whole brotherhood" (pasēs tēs adelphotētos, 1 Clem. 2.4; cf. 1 Pet 2:17; 5:9) and "the people" of God (ho laos, 1 Clem. 59.4; 64.1). Clement clearly considers Christians to be the new Israel (1 Clem. 29.1-3) and therefore consistently sees the OT typologically addressing the church. However, as it is the matter of "order" (taxis; the tax- word group is found forty-two times) that concerns Clement the most, titles and metaphors that emphasise the structured nature of the Christian community are to the fore.

Clement uses the metaphor of the city-state in a distinctive way in defining the church. He calls Christians "citizens (politeia) of the city of God" (1 Clem. 54.4), and he views disturbances in the church as a political uprising (statis, 1 Clem. 1.1; 2.6; 3.2). Thus he praises the Corinthians for being "virtuous and honorable citizens" (1 Clem. 2.8) before "the worthless rose up against those who were in honor," thereby undermining "their citizenship" (1 Clem. 3.4; cf. 1 Clem. 6.1; 21.1). Clement also likens the church to an army, calling those who lead "our generals" (1 Clem. 37.1-3).

It is within this framework of thought that Clement's two passages outlining the traditional household order (see Household Codes) and his concern that appointed office bearers be recognized and obeyed should be understood. In the extended household communities that constituted the basis of the individual congregations, respect for the traditional order is to prevail (1 Clem. 1.3; 21.6-8). Those who have been appointed as leaders should be the ones who rule (1 Clem. 1.3; 21.6; 42.4; 54.2). In his zeal to uphold order Clement introduces the idea that church leaders are the counterpart of the OT priests and Levites, who may be contrasted with ordinary church members, whom he calls "the laity" (ho laikos, 1 Clem. 40.5). For the first time the one people of God is divided into two distinct groups. The clergy-laity distinction, which has had such fateful consequences on the life of the church, developed on this basis. Finally we mention that unity in the Christian community is of fundamental importance to Clement. He writes primarily to restore and to foster "peace and concord" in the community at Corinth (1 Clem. 63.2; 65.1) and in the whole Christian community on earth (1 Clem. 64).

8.3. Ignatius. Ignatius* develops the doctrine of the church in three ways in advance of anything seen so far. He exalts the church by viewing it as an entity above world history, makes the order of the church essential to its being and insists on unity centred in the bishop. Ignatius is completely negative about Israel. For him the teachings and myths of Judaism* are "old" (Ign. Magn. 9.1; 10.2), a term he uses to describe what is opposed to God (Ign. Eph. 19.3). Writing to the Magnesians, he sets in opposition living "according to Judaism" and living according to grace (Ign. Magn. 8.1; cf. Ign. Magn. 9.1). The OT prophets are radically Christianized being depicted as believers in and proclaimers of Christ who were persecuted by the Jews for this reason (Ign. Magn. 8.2; 9.2; Ign. Phld. 5.2; 9.1-2).

In the opening paragraph of his epistle to the Ephesians Ignatius describes the church (ekklēsia) as "being foreordained before the ages, to be ever destined for enduring and unchanging glory." The language is close to that of Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, in which Christians collectively are said to be chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world* (Eph 1:4). But Ignatius goes beyond Paul in making the church a reality apart from its historical manifestation. Later Ignatius speaks of God "breathing incorruptibility on the church" (Ign. Eph. 17.1). This also is something with no parallel in the NT.

It is in the Ignatian epistles that the threefold order of bishop, presbyters and deacons is found for the first time, although all three titles appear in the Pastoral Epistles. But it is not just that the threefold order appears. Ignatius insists that without these three there is no church. He says emphatically, "Nothing can be called a church without these" (Ign. Trall. 3.1). In this order the bishop is to be "regarded as the Lord himself" (Ign. Eph. 6.1; Ign. Trall. 2.1); "nothing is to be done without the bishop" (Ign. Trall. 2.2; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1; 9.1); and especially no Eucharist is to be celebrated without him (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2; Ign. Phld. 4.1) or his appointed representative if he is not present (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2). It is, however, to be noted that the modern threefold order (known, for example, in the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches) does not parallel the Ignatian order. For Ignatius the bishop is the leader of a citywide church, the presbyters are a pastoral council that advises the bishop, and the deacons (also in the plural) assist the bishop. Neither the bishop nor the presbyters are considered to be priests, and there is no mention of the ordination of anyone in these letters.

Many scholars consider the concern for the unity of the church to be the most important theme in the Ignatian letters. The words unity (henōtēs) and union (henōsis) are used repeatedly to describe the given solidarity of the Christian community (the indicative) for which it must strive (the imperative) (Ign. Eph. 4.2; 5.1; Ign. Phld. 2.2; 3.2; 8.1; Ign. Magn. 1.2). In the context of speaking about the unity of all Christians on earth, Ignatius says believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, are united "in one body of his church" (Ign. Smyrn. 1.2). The body metaphor hovers in the background in two other passages, Ephesians 4.2 and Trallians 11.2.

Like Luke and Paul, Ignatius uses the word ekklēsia of a localized community of believers (e.g., the church in Smyrna or the church in Magnesia) and in the plural when he speaks of more than one of these communities (Ign. Magn. 1.2; Ign. Phld. 10.2; Ign. Pol. 8.1) or of the entire Christian community on earth (Ign. Eph. inscr 5.1; 17.1; Ign. Smyrn. 1.2; Ign. Pol. 5.1). In this last category Ignatius uses for the first time the expression "the catholic church" (hē katholikē ekklēsia, Ign. Smyrn. 8.2). This is contrasted with any particular congregation (to plēthos), probably to be understood as a group that met in a particular home. Following W. R. Schoedel (243), the word katholikē ("catholic") is taken here to mean the whole church, which cannot be divided. Just once Ignatius uses the word synagōgē for a gathering of Christians (Ign. Pol. 4.2).

8.4. Epistle of Barnabas. This theological treatise is divided into two parts. In Barnabas 1—17 (see Barnabas, Epistle of) the author argues that the Christian community has now replaced Israel as the people of God. In Barnabas 18—21 he outlines what he thinks his readers need to know of the Christian ethic. He reads the OT allegorically and typologically as a book intended for Christians from the beginning. In a hitherto unused expression he calls the Christian community "the new people of God" (ton laon ton kainon, Barn. 5.7; 7.5). He also speaks of the covenant offered to the historic people of God, Israel, now being given to the church, the new people of God (Barn. 13.6; 14.1-9). But it is not just that Christians have inherited the promises once given to Israel. Judaism is rejected. A strong anti-Jewish tone pervades this work. The word ekklēsia is used twice (Barn. 6.16; 7.11). In the second instance it clearly alludes to all Christians on earth who are the beneficiaries of the atoning work of Christ, and this probably is so also in the first instance, where it is found in a quote from Psalm 22:22. The most important metaphor for the church in the epistle of Barnabas is the "spiritual temple," which is understood to replace the old temple made with hands (Barn. 4.11; 6.15; 16.1-10).

8.5. Shepherd of Hermas. In this speculative and difficult treatise (see Hermas, Shepherd of) the church is depicted as the primal creation of God, hence seen as an old woman (Herm. Vis. 2.4.1; cf. Herm. Vis. 1.1.4-6). Everything was created for her. The background of this thought is the Jewish apocalyptic tradition in which eschatological realities are assumed to be preexistent in heaven (see Preexistence). In 4 Esdras everything is created for Israel, who is seen as an old woman (4 Esdr 7:11; 9:45—10:1). In subsequent visions the old woman becomes progressively younger, until she is radiant with beauty (Herm Vis. 3.10-13). In a later vision she is presented as a bride dressed in white (Herm. Vis. 4.2.1-2).

More common, however, is the image of the church as a tower (Herm. Vis. 3.3.3—4.1; Herm. Sim. 8.7.5; 8.8.2; 9.1.2; 9.13.1). In using this image the thought of the church being built (oikodomein) naturally follows. This Greek word and the related words oikodomē ("building") and oikos ("house") are repeatedly applied to the Christian community. Three times Hermas calls the church "the house of God" (Herm. Sim. 9.13.9; 9.14.1). The frequency of this terminology probably reflects the house setting of congregational life lying behind Hermas's comments. Hermas also speaks of "his [God's] holy church" (Herm. Vis. 1.1.6; 1.3.6; 4.1.3; cf. Herm. Sim. 9.18.3). This church is gathered from all the peoples of the world to become "one body" (Herm. Sim. 9.17.5; cf. Herm. Sim. 9.13.5; 9.18.4). It is the people of God designated as ho laos (Herm. Sim. 5.5.2-3; 5.6.2-3; 8.1.2, 5).

8.6. 2 Clement, the Epistle to Diognetus and Justin Martyr. 2 Clement also depicts the church as preexistent (2 Clem. 14.1-3; cf. 2 Clem. 2.1) but adds a number of elements to this idea. Only those who are obedient (see Obedience) to the Father belong to this transcendent church, called "the first church, the spiritual one," "the church of life" (2 Clem. 14.1) and "the living church, the body of Christ" (2 Clem. 14.2). This is contrasted with "my house," the empirical church, which has become "a den of robbers" (2 Clem. 14.1). The concept of a visible and invisible church appears in this language. Following these comments, 2 Clement then declares that "the male is Christ and the female is the church" (2 Clem. 14.2). In suggesting a preexistent marriage of Christ and the church, 2 Clement closely parallels Valentinian Gnosticism (Irenaeus Adv. Haer. 1.18.2). Like the Epistle of Barnabas, 2 Clement consistently takes the OT to speak of the church. It is a Christian book. Thus he says the prophets spoke "of us" and of "our church" (2 Clem. 2.1).

The Epistle to Diognetus likens "Christians in the world" to "what the soul is to the body" (Diogn. 6.1), calling them a "new race" (kainos genos) distinct from Jews and Gentiles (Diogn. 1.1). The author is dismissive of Judaism, arguing that Jewish worship, sabbath keeping and food* restrictions are "quite wrong" (Diogn. 3—4). In the Preaching of Peter and in subsequent texts (e.g., Tertullian Ad Nat. 1.8) this "new race" becomes "a third race" (tritos genos), or in Latin a tertium genus.

In his Dialogue with Trypho, a Jew, Justin Martyr argues that the old covenant and its precepts have been fulfilled and superseded in Christ; Jesus as the Logos is God's "firstborn" who appeared in OT times in theophanies; the church, now made up mostly of Gentiles, has become Israel. The thought that Christians are the new Israel is definitive for Justin's ecclesiology. The Jewish law is abrogated (Justin Dial. Tryph. 11; 12); Jews need "a second circumcision" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 12.3; see Circumcision); the prophetic ministry has been "transferred" to the church (Justin Dial. Tryph. 82.1) and Christian sacrifices are "better" than Jewish sacrifices (Justin Dial. Tryph. 29.1; 117.1). The covenant that was once "theirs" is now "ours" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 4.4-8; cf. Dial. Tryph. 6.9).

When eventually Trypho asks, "Are you [Christians] Israel?" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 123.7) Justin answers, "we . . . are . . . both called and in fact are Jacob and Israel and Judah and Joseph and David, and true children of God" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 123.9). A little later he argues that as Isaiah calls Christ "Israel and Jacob," we Christians coming from "the bowels of Christ" are "the true Israelite race" (Israēlitikon to alēthinon esmen genos, Justin Dial. Tryph. 135.3). For Justin spiritual descent from Jacob is more significant than from Abraham.* Christians are a "race" that has taken the place of the Jewish "race." In the context of this argument Justin introduces a new usage of the words ekklēsia and synagoge. In Dialogue 134.3 these words stand for Christianity and Judaism respectively. In Justin we see the starkest expression of the thought that Christianity has taken the place of Israel.

See also CHURCH AS ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF GOD; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Blue, "Acts and the House Church" in The Book of Acts in Its First-Century Setting, 2: Graeco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 119-89; B. Bowe, A Church in Crisis: Ecclesiology and Paraenesis in Clement of Rome (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); R. E. Brown, The Churches the Apostles Left Behind (London: Chapman, 1984); N. Brox, Der Hirt des Hermas (Gottingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1991); H. J. Cadbury, "Names for Christianity and Christians in Acts" in The Beginnings of Christianity, ed. F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake (5 vols.; London: Macmillan, 1927) 5:375-92; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1964); K. P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974); K. N. Giles, Patterns of Ministry Among the First Christians (Australia: Collins-Dove, 1989); idem, What on Earth Is the Church? A Biblical and Theological Inquiry (Melbourne, Australia: Harper-Collins; London: SPCK; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995); A. von Harnack, "The Names of Christian Believers" in The Mission and Expansion of Christianity (Gloucester, MA: Peter Smith, 1972 repr.) 399-418; E. G. Jay, The Church: Its Changing Image Through Twenty Centuries, 1: The First Seventeen Centuries (London: SPCK, 1977); H. C. Kee, Who Are the People of God? Early Christian Models of Community (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); M. Leutzsch, Die Wahrnehmung Sozialer Wirklichkeit im Hirten des Hermas (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989); H. O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1991); L. Pernveden, The Concept of the Church in the Shepherd of Hermas (Lund: Gleerup, 1966); D. Ravens, Luke and the Restoration of Israel (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); M. Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit of Prophecy in Luke-Acts (JPTSup 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996).

K. N. Giles

CHURCH AS ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF GOD

1. Ekklēsia and Synagōgē, Church and Synagogue, in the New Testament
2. The Relation of the Church to Israel
3. Membership in the Ekklēsia and Abrahamic Descent
4. Ekklēsia and Laos: Church as People of God
5. Christ, Church and Israel
6. The Church as Israel, People of God in the Post-New Testament Period
7. Christ, Church and Israel Today: Theological Reflections

1. Ekklēsia and Synagōgē, Church and Synagogue, in the New Testament.

The Greek term ekklēsia is primarily a political term and refers to any assembly of citizens duly summoned by the herald. It is also used along with a number of other Greek terms, such as synagōge and syllogos, for the meetings of various Greek voluntary associations. These groups often met in private houses, as did Jewish assemblies (synagogues) and early Christian assemblies (ekklēsiai). Matthew is the only Gospel writer to use the term ekklēsia. If Matthew has drawn the term from the Septuagint (where it is used of the assembly of Israelites, e.g., Deut 31:30, and very often translates the Hebrew qāhāl), he has used a familiar Greek term for the people of Israel, and this may indicate that he sees his and Jesus' group not as a new or different assembly. However, ekklēsia is frequently thought of as a Christian technical term for a clearly Christian institution (see Church), sharply differentiated from Judaism.*

This understanding possibly derives from the frequent use of the term by Paul as a designation of the Christian assembly. Since Paul's communities are in the Diaspora* regions outside of Israel and are socially distinct from though not unrelated to the Jewish assemblies, being comprised primarily of Gentiles,* it is easy to see how the Pauline pattern has tended to be the lens through which other more ambiguous evidence is viewed, usually in strong contrast to the synagogue.* Thus there is much debate as to whether Luke in Acts* intends the ekklēsia to be polemically contrasted with the Jewish synagogue, as also in relation to whether or not he holds a positive outlook on Israel's future. When Luke wishes to refer to the Jewish assembly of believers in Jerusalem,* he uses ekklēsia (Acts 5:11; 8:1), and the same term is also used for the Jewish/Gentile group in Antioch* (Acts 13:1) and Paul's Gentile communities in the Diaspora (Acts 14:23; 16:5). A. J. Saldarini says that "at a minimum, the author of Luke-Acts sees the ekklēsiai as different from and in tension with Jewish communities, yet also as outgrowths of that same group" (Saldarini, 118). It would seem legitimate to hold that an element of continuity with Israel is being maintained while simultaneously avoiding the closer identification that synagogue might imply.

Paul can refer to "all the churches of the Gentiles" (Rom 16:4) and also to "the churches of Christ in Judea" (Gal 1:22). Even the reference to a "synagogue of Satan" (Rev 2:9) need not imply a polemical contrast between church and synagogue as such. It would be wrong to assume that all ekklēsiai everywhere have no links with and no connection whatsoever with Judaism. "All the assemblies of the Gentiles" (Rom 16:4) is an interesting reference, suggesting that Paul recognizes the existence of assemblies that were non-Gentile. When this is set alongside the address to the seven ekklēsiai in Revelation 2—3, a more diverse picture emerges. Those whom John perceives as deviants in the churches at Smyrna and Philadelphia are apparently calling themselves Jews but are not. These deviants among the true church members are designated "a synagogue of Satan." However, it would be erroneous to see here simply an implied contrast between a Jewish synagogue and a Christian ekklēsia, since the charge that the Jewish communities are not truly Jewish implies the corresponding claim that the ekklēsiai themselves truly affirm Judaism. In any case ekklēsia and synagōgē are both Greek words for an assembly and cannot be naively contrasted as if one were exclusively Christian and the other exclusively Jewish. Luke can still use ekklēsia in a completely profane sense (Acts 19:32-41).

In the first century in both Jewish and Christian literature both words were used to describe a variety of gatherings. Saldarini concludes that "neither Christian nor Jewish meaning nor any fixed content can be assigned to the word ekklēsia without detailed argument from context" (Saldarini, 118). This is borne out by the fact that James* uses ekklēsia and synagōgē interchangeably (Jas 2:2; 5:14) and by Ignatius's designation of a Christian gathering as a synagogue (Ign. Pol. 4.2).

An example of the fluid situation we have described is found in Matthew's use of ekklēsia in Matthew 16 and Matthew 18, instances unique to this Gospel. It might have been expected that Matthew, being a very Jewish Gospel, would have used the word synagōgē. But since he chose ekklēsia, was he thus distancing and distinguishing his group from the wider community of Jews who rejected the message of Jesus? Even if it is accepted that Matthew deliberately avoided using the term synagōgē, this must not be taken to mean that he was rejecting Judaism or that he no longer regarded his group as Jewish. He must have known of the existence of other groups, such as the Pauline congregations, who were already using the term ekklēsia, and that these, despite the common terminology, were demonstrably different from his group of ekklēsiai. This underlines the need to avoid giving a fixed content to ekklēsia, especially in the earlier period.

2. The Relation of the Church to Israel.

2.1. Ephesians. It will be useful at this point to outline Paul's view of Israel (see DPL, Israel). Paul was deeply conscious of Israel's unique heritage. Yet this presented him with a real dilemma because Israel, beloved of God* because of the patriarchs (see Ancestors), is presently rejecting the gospel. Paul is clearly aware that the Israel of God is not coextensive with empirical Israel. Yet he does not seek a solution in which Israel's privileges are transferred to Gentiles. The latter are included not by displacing Israel but by being allowed to share in the richness of Israel's "olive tree." They will thus contribute in some degree to the future salvation* of "all Israel" (Rom 11:25-26). Paul does not designate the new entity as Israel; the term retains its reference to empirical Israel.

There is much disagreement among scholars as to the authorship of Ephesians but not on its designation as part of the Pauline school (see Pauline Legacy and School; Pseudepigraphy). As such it will provide a fitting link between the Pauline letters and the post-Pauline era. M. Barth regarded Ephesians 2 as the climax of a development in Paul's theology moving away from the ideas of Galatians through Romans and culminating in Ephesians. For Barth Ephesians 2 is crucial as it prevents scholars from playing Romans and Galatians off against one another. Barth's laudable intention was to secure Paul's teaching in Romans and Ephesians as the firm ground from which to oppose all anti-Semitism in the church. Barth maintained that Ephesians speaks of a single people of God, of the citizenship of Israel into which Gentiles have been accepted by their being grafted into the people of Israel.

A. T. Lincoln has responded to the preceding view of the relation of the church to Israel, maintaining that in Ephesians the church is decisively new, and he proposes a reversal of Pauline development as Barth had conceived it. He proposes a movement from the stress on discontinuity in Galatians, through a greater stress on continuity and a future role for Israel in the context of pressing contemporary issues about the relation of Jews and Gentiles in Romans, to a return to more stress on discontinuity in Ephesians. There are valid insights in the views of both scholars, but rather than opt for one monochrome view of the relation of the church to Israel throughout the NT, the discussion should remind us that the NT writers were addressing widely varying contexts and that this diversity must be reflected in their understanding of the relation of the new communities to the old in any specific location at a particular time. Primarily we should be ascertaining the perspective of each individual letter before proceeding to the subsequent theological task of investigating their relation to one another and whether or not it may be possible to discover or develop a coherent understanding from them.

2.2. Matthew's Community. In regard to the decades that saw the publication of the Synoptic Gospels, Matthew's references to Israel are mainly what we would expect of a Jewish-oriented group in conflict with fellow Jews about the nature and identity of their common inheritance (see Matthean Community). Of the twelve explicit references, none are pejorative and most are neutral or positive concerning the historic people or the land.* Two references in Matthew 8—9 stress the exceptional nature of individual Gentiles' faith, beyond that to be found in Israel. This is clearly pointing to present or envisaged Gentile members in Matthew's group of churches, but we should not read too much into it as if Gentile inclusion necessitates Jewish exclusion.

It is significant, however, that the imagery of shepherd* and sheep occurs three times (Mt 2:6; 10:6; 15:24) and that in the latter two of these the emphasis upon a mission to the lost sheep of the house of Israel is reiterated. It cannot be said of Matthew that he was unaware of the unique place of Israel in salvation history. The story of the Canaanite woman lends added support (Mt 15:21-28). Jesus says, "It is not fair to take the children's food and throw it to the dogs" (Mt 15:26). It would appear therefore that Matthew is very aware that the mission of Jesus had its starting point with Israel and that a Gentile mission* is both subsequent to and dependant upon a prior mission to Israel.

But despite his severely critical stance against the Pharisees and the leaders of the people, Matthew is not entirely pessimistic. The crowds are still seen as potential converts, and a mission to Israel will continue. Gundry (194-95) suggests this will continue "until the Son of Man comes" (Mt 10:23). There seems to be no clear evidence in Matthew that asserts that Israel is beyond redemption.* Almost all claims to the contrary are heavily dependant on parables, the interpretation of which is by definition flexible, and their interpretation is frequently controlled by the assumptions one brings to the text. Saldarini offers a useful summary of Matthew in this respect. He maintains that when we look closely at Matthew's terms for the people of Israel and their narrative role in relationship to Jesus (and the Matthean community), it seems clear that he sees himself and his group as still part of Israel and that he hopes to attract members of the larger Jewish community to his form of Judaism, just as Jesus did (Saldarini, 195).

The reasons why Matthew's attitude to Israel has been seen to be more hostile (than we think is warranted) are several. First, interpreters have failed to distinguish between the leaders and the people in general. The definitive rejection of Jesus by the former merits extreme condemnation, but Matthew never states or implies that the nation as a whole has rejected Jesus. Second, the presentation of various non-Jews and the Great Commission to disciple all nations (Mt 28:19) have erroneously suggested to some that Matthew's interest in Gentile mission requires the cessation of mission to Jews. Third, the clear statement in Matthew 21:43 that the leaders of the Jews will be replaced by a new group (ethnos) who will produce the fruits of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) has led to theories of the Jews being displaced by the Gentile nations. But it should be noted that Matthew uses ethnos rather than laos, the normal word to designate God's people, and that we should not read theology into general terms that cannot sustain this imposition. At most what can be claimed in this instance is the displacement of a corrupt leadership that was to a great extent responsible for the disaster soon to befall the nation in the advent of the Jewish-Roman war.

The extreme forms of denunciation Matthew employs are frequently viewed as clear evidence of Matthew's permanent alienation from pharisaic Judaism. Sociological insights, however, enable a differing understanding of such language. The sharpest denunciation is often used within the family; family conflicts are often the most extreme, and the closer the relationship has previously been, the greater the distancing that results. But this outcome may not be final, nor need it imply that all future contact is rendered either futile or impossible. It seems best therefore to regard Matthew's groups as perceived deviants who are not content with this portrayal but who hope to win the majority of Jews to their convictions.

2.3. Luke-Acts. Although Luke never uses the term ekklēsia in his Gospel, it occurs very frequently in Acts. It is to be expected that Luke knew and appreciated Paul's view of Israel, and a comparison between the two may enable us to identify those significant elements they held in common. Like Paul, Luke is careful to limit the use of the term Israel to empirical Israel: there remains a clear and abiding distinction between the historic people of God and even believing Gentiles. In Acts, Israel continues to refer to the Jewish people, whether repentant or rejecting the gospel. In Luke's presentation the gospel message has divided the nation (cf. Acts 28:24-25), but both the whole and the two resultant parts can still singly or together be described by the privileged title. While "Israel" can refer to the repentant part of empirical Israel, it does not refer to a church of Jews and Gentiles; nor is the early-catholic view of the church as a tertium genus, a third race, present in Luke (see Early Catholicism). Even the references to "seed of Abraham" and its equivalents do not refer to Christ or the church but only to Israel and to Israelites (Lk 1:55; Acts 7:5-6; 13:23). What is even more surprising is that in Acts, Christian missionaries continue to address Jews as "brothers," and "men of Israel" are addressed separately from "you that fear God" (Acts 13:16). Gentiles are not addressed as brothers (Acts 2:28; 3:7; 7:2; 13:26; 22:1).

Luke's intention seems to be to secure the advent of salvation for Gentiles by demonstrating that the nation of Israel has truly heard the gospel and that a substantial number of the most devout have accepted it (e.g., Lk 1:54, 68; 2:41; 4:4). Only in this way is there good news for Gentiles; for the first time, as Gentiles, through the operation of the Holy Spirit* they are called to share in the salvation that was promised through Israel (Acts 10:47). Initially the gospel must come to Gentiles via Israel and not just via Christ, because the continuity of salvation history does not lie exclusively in the history of Jesus but also in the people who represent Israel. Thus Luke insists that it is in and through the Jewish Christians,* who formed the nucleus of the apostolic church, that the unity and continuity of salvation history are maintained and the gospel guaranteed to Gentiles (Lk 13:16-17). Only when the gospel had been accepted by the earliest Jewish believers, the Urgemeinde in Jerusalem, could the transition take place via these believing Jews to a predominantly Gentile church. Moreover, it is important for Luke to show that the Christian church is part of Israel, since it is in and through them that the unity and continuity of salvation history are maintained (Jervell 1972, 68).

2.4. Other New Testament Witnesses. In Mark's Gospel we find only two references to Israel, and in John's Gospel we find four. Of the three references in Hebrews,* two are citations of the new covenant* text of Jeremiah 31:31, and the other looks back to the exodus. Of the three occurrences of Israel in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), two relate to the twelve tribes of Israel and one to the people of Israel. Although the terminology refers to the tribes of Israel, it is likely that it is the church from every tribe and nation that the writer has primarily in view. In Revelation 10:11, peoples, nations and tongues are not clearly distinguished, making it difficult to maintain that there was a clear-cut distinction between laos and ethnos. In the case of the Gospel of John, the infrequency of reference to the term Israel may be due to the fact that he refers to "the Jews" more than seventy times.

It is not possible to discuss this issue adequately here, but as we have already noted in relation to Abrahamic descent, there developed an increasing alienation between the new Christian groups and the Jewish people, especially their leaders. This was accentuated by the fact that Jewish believers were expelled or at least forced from the synagogues. They felt bereft, like orphans (cf. Jn 14:18), and John responded by arguing that such actions proved that "the Jews" were no longer God's children. It is clear from the Gospel itself that John is aware of and capable of making distinctions among "the Jews." John can refer to believing Jews (Jn 8:31; 11:45; 12:11), Jesus does not object to being called a Jew (Jn 4:9), and salvation is "of the Jews" (ek tōn Ioudaiōn, Jn 4:22). But there is no doubt that his undifferentiated use of the description has contributed greatly to the common Christian tendency to dismiss the Jews as unworthy of any future role in the divine purpose.

It seems that for John the distinction between Israelite and Jew was not significant. John does not appear to have developed any precise understanding of believers as the new people of God, in place of the Jews. Painter (108-9) suggests that the reason for this is that John's attention is focused elsewhere: his emphasis is christocentric*; it is Jesus who is the true vine; and by implication Israel is the false vine. But John does not equate the Jewish believers with the new or true Israel, since Christ himself is the vine, and those who abide in him share his status. There is now the possibility for all to share in the vine through faith, but unlike Paul, John does not give us an image of an olive with some branches broken off and some abiding. There is little self-conscious ecclesiology in John, and when he does refer to the community, it is in relation to Jesus. Nothing is indicated about the status of believers by John's use of laos or Israel. If there is a word symbol for the believing community in John, it would be poimē ("flock") under the guidance of the shepherd whose word they obey.

The changes we have noted in John's Gospel demonstrate that in later NT times, in some areas at least, a growing rift was developing between the followers of Jesus and Jews who were hostile to the gospel; this was beginning to produce opposing self-definitions and frequent recriminations. It is in such circumstances that the stereotyping of the Jews in toto as reprobate had its genesis (see Christianity and Judaism).

3. Membership in the Ekklēsia and Abrahamic Descent.

By way of introduction to this section, it will be useful to recall Paul's stress on this theme in Galatians and Romans. In Galatians Paul argues that Gentiles are blessed with Abraham* through Christ, the one seed (sperma) of Abraham, and not on the basis of circumcision* or any form of judaization. In Romans Paul presents Abraham as the inclusive "father of all the faithful" of the two peoples, Jews and Gentiles. Abraham is the unique recipient of the promise,* which included Gentiles, and the prototype of all believers who hear with faith.* Paul distinguishes three kinds of descendants of Abraham: those who are descendants both according to flesh* and according to faith; those who are descendants according to faith alone; and those who are descendants according to flesh alone (Siker, 60-61). What is new in Romans is Paul's assertion that Gentile inclusion does not come at the expense of Jewish exclusion and of God's faithfulness. In the analogy of the olive tree, the Gentiles are represented not as self-supporting branches but as dependent on the stem of Abraham.

3.1. Matthew's Community. Abraham, somewhat surprisingly, plays a rather limited role in Matthew, appearing in only four passages corresponding to the Lukan parallels. Luke, by comparison, refers to Abraham more frequently, having five passages not paralleled in Matthew. The first reference in Matthew comes in the first verse, where Jesus' genealogy starts by designating him a "son of Abraham" (hyios Abraam), denoting at the outset Jesus' continuity with the bearer of the promise. Descent from Abraham alone, however, is not stressed so much as descent from David, and a favorite title for Jesus in Matthew is the messianic "Son of David."

The second reference to Abraham is from John the Baptist, who warns the Pharisees and Sadducees to produce fruit that befits repentance* rather than saying "we have Abraham as our father." The warning is that it is not enough to rely on one's Jewish ancestry; descent from Abraham is of itself not sufficient, since God is able to raise up children to Abraham (tekna tō Abraam) from stones (Mt 3:7-10). Thus the reference to Abraham somewhat relativizes Jewish birth and at the same time hints that God is not tied exclusively to his historic people.

In the story of Jesus and the Gentile centurion (Mt 8:5-13), Matthew has Jesus express surprise at the great faith of this Gentile and then contrast it with the response of Jews: "Not even in Israel have I found such faith" (Mt 8:10). This is followed by a saying to the effect that many from the east and the west (probably Gentiles) will come to sit down at table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. In this story Matthew retains his Jewish tradition to some extent: there is surprise at Gentile faith, and the guests sit at table with the patriarchs. Significantly, however, both Jesus and Abraham are associated with Gentiles and not with "the sons of the kingdom" (Mt 8:12).

In his fourth section on Abraham, Matthew has Jesus in dispute with the Sadducees about resurrection.* What is noteworthy here is that Abraham is associated with the resurrection of the dead, as was already implied in Matthew 8 (Siker, 86).

3.2. Hebrews. The author of Hebrews refers to Abraham no fewer than ten times. In the most well-known passage (Heb 11:8-19), real continuity with Jewish traditions is predominant in the depiction of Abraham as the model of steadfast faith. He persevered and thus obtained a promise (Heb 3:13-20). The only other significant passage for our purposes is Hebrews 7, in which Abraham enters the stage in a somewhat subsidiary role to the figure of Melchizedek,* on whom attention centers as a type of Christ. In the Genesis narrative Melchizedek blessed Abraham, and the patriarch gave him tithes of all his spoils from his victory over the kings. In Hebrews 7 Abraham is used to assist in elevating the high priesthood* of Jesus, but there is no obvious attempt to decrease his own significance. Abraham was subjected to Melchizedek, whose priestly line Jesus triumphantly fulfills (Wilson, 122). The interest is not so much in Abraham himself as in his role in the salvation history that culminated in Jesus. But this factor alone is significant in that it implies that Abrahamic descent is not now the crucial indicator it once was. Although Abraham is referred to in James, the use made of the reference is entirely traditional, stressing the unity of faith and works (see Faith and Works), with no explicit evidence of Jewish Christian controversy.

3.3. Luke-Acts. Abraham appears in the Magnificat in Luke's first chapter in connection with God's mercy*: "as he spoke to our fathers, to Abraham and to his descendants (tō spermati autou) forever" (Lk 1:54-55). The text recalls Isaiah 41:8-9, which refers to "Israel, my servant Jacob whom I chose, seed of Abraham, whom I have helped." God's mercy in the covenant with Abraham has been realized in the birth of Jesus, so that the humble poor may rejoice; similarly in the Benedictus, there is a reference to the "oath which he swore to our father Abraham" (Lk 1:73). Luke thus links the birth of Jesus with the Abrahamic covenant in a very specific way, emphasizing continuity with the bearer of the promise.

In two other passages Abrahamic descent is explicitly discussed. As in the case of Matthew, Luke uses the Q tradition in which Jewish claims to Abrahamic descent are attacked. Luke does not dismiss the significance of such ancestry, but he qualifies the claims that may legitimately be based upon it (Lk 3:8) and further limits Abraham's importance by tracing Jesus' genealogy back to Adam (Lk 3:34). The patriarch is thus given a more universal significance, and Jesus likewise. In Luke 13:10-11 a crippled woman who is healed by Jesus is called by him "a daughter of Abraham," and in Luke 19:9 Zacchaeus is termed "a son of Abraham" (hyios Abraam). In these stories as in those previously, the patriarch is associated with the needy and now also with the repentant sinner who makes restitution and gives half of his goods to the poor. In two other stories, Abraham is further associated with the poor: in God's kingdom, (Lk 13:28) with the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31) and with the sons of God or of the resurrection (Lk 20:38).

The association of Abraham with the needy and Gentile sinners is fully developed in Acts, where the healing of a blind man happens through the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Acts 3:1-10); where the Jews, though not the only ones, are the first to be blessed as sons of the covenant (hyioi tēs diathēkēs, Acts 3:25). But the covenant with Abraham, far from being a symbol of Jewish exclusivism, becomes in Acts the charter for the inclusion of the Gentiles. For Gentiles, faith in Christ—mediated to them through the blessing of the seed of Abraham (Acts 3:25)—enables the realization of the promise that all the families of the earth would be blessed. It is possible to interpret "in your seed" (en tō spermati sou) in Acts 3:25 as referring to Christ, so that Gentiles would be blessed not through and in association with Israel but directly in relation to Christ, without any necessary connection with Israel. The general tenor of Acts, however, gives little support for such a view. The crucial significance of Jerusalem and of the earliest Christian community for Luke go hand in hand with his christological perspective in which Christ is both the fulfillment of the Jewish heritage and simultaneously the mediator of the promises to Gentiles.

3.4. Gospel of John. Only one passage of John's Gospel deals explicitly with Abrahamic descent (Jn 8:31-39). In it, however, there are no fewer than eleven references to him. In John 8:39 some Jews claim in dispute with Jesus that they are descendants of Abraham (sperma Abraam). While acknowledging to some extent the validity of the claim, Jesus does not give it the significance his opponents desired because he later denies that God is their father. It is apparent then that John is drawing a distinction between genetic descent and divine paternity. He achieves this by changing the terminology from "descendants" to "children" (of Abraham). He maintains that while the Jews are descendants of Abraham, they are not his children (tekna Abraam) but only his seed (sperma Abraam). In this way John equates children of Abraham (tekna Abraam) with children of God, thus relativizing Abrahamic descent and distinguishing it from children of God (tekna theou).

In John's view the works that people do identify their true paternity, and the opposition of the Jews to Jesus demonstrates that Abraham is not their father since they do not do his works. Despite the genetic link, they are in fact children of their father, the devil (tekna diabolou, Jn 8:39; see Satan). John does give some recognition to physical descent, but he qualifies it to such an extent that he comes close to saying that it is of no real significance. And as for Abraham himself, not only is he not greater than Jesus, but he becomes instead a witness to Jesus (Jn 8:53). Abraham lived and died, but Jesus claims "before Abraham was, I am." Thus Abraham, like Moses* (Jn 5:46) and Isaiah (Jn 12:41), is subordinated to Jesus, and instead of being Jesus' judge, his greatest virtue is that "he rejoiced to see my day" (Jn 8:56).

4. Ekklēsia and Laos: Church as People of God.

4.1. Luke-Acts. The term laos ("people") occurs more than 140 times in the NT. Although it is used by Matthew, Paul, and the authors of Hebrews and Revelation and appears only occasionally in Mark, John and 1 Peter* (with single examples in Titus, 2 Peter* and Jude*), by far the greatest number of instances are to be found in Luke-Acts, in which Luke uses it more than 80 times. In several places Luke seems to be quite explicitly claiming that the Gentile believers are the new people of God, as for example in Acts 18:10, where he speaks of a great group of people (laos polys) in Corinth, or Acts 15:14, where it is asserted that God has planned to take a people out of the Gentile nations and make them his own. In a study of the phrase "a people for his name," N. A. Dahl has noted that it is in these two passages alone that laos is apparently used to refer to non-Israelites—the people of Corinth are most likely Gentiles, but here they are being described as potential people of God.

However, when these texts are considered carefully, it becomes clear that neither of them claims that believing Gentiles will be the people of God but rather people of God, because the status of Israel as people of God is not questioned. This is in keeping with texts such as Zechariah 2:10-11, where the Gentiles join themselves to a renewed Israel. Luke states only that in addition to those to whom the promises were first entrusted, God has also taken from Gentiles people for his name. The collective "people" without the article is likely to be less misleading because there is no idea here of a people in the sense of a nation or a cultural unit, as if God would choose one nation in preference to another or displace one by the other en bloc.

This does not mean, however, that for Luke laos has always the full theological meaning of "the people of God"; he frequently uses it as a synonym for ochlos, a crowd of people. On closer inspection, however, this usage is limited to contexts in which the crowd specified is a crowd of Israelites, even if they happen to live among Gentiles (cf. Lk 6:17). It would appear that Luke was careful to limit laos only to Israelites and to the land where the laos dwell. It never occurs in those narratives that are located outside Palestine if it is not in direct speech and referring to Jews (this includes texts such as Acts 21:30, where the people who rushed together were most likely the Jews from Asia referred to a few verses earlier). The word is missing from the central section of Luke 9:51—18:14, where Jesus is supposed to travel in Samaria.* Luke's usage of laos is derived from the Septuagint, both in the specific sense and the more general; he never uses laos in a completely profane sense. This is in accordance with his limitation of Israel to the Israelite people and ethnē ("nations") to non-Israelites. Luke, despite his emphasis on the influx of believing Gentiles who have become heirs of Israel's hope,* is careful to retain a special understanding of Israel, and though he comes close to it, he never asserts that the church is Israel—he never absolutely identifies the two.

4.2. Other New Testament Witnesses. In many of the places in the NT where laos is found, especially in scriptural citations, it refers to empirical Israel or its leaders, whether in the past or the present, without making any comparison or link with the nascent church. Many such examples are to be found in Matthew or Hebrews. In other instances a continuity between Israel and the church is implicit because texts originally relating to Israel are applied to the church for instruction and guidance (e.g., 1 Cor 10:7-8). But in a number of places in the NT, scriptural texts foundational to Israel's election* from among the nations, to become a people dedicated exclusively to Yahweh, are reiterated to confirm the identity of the emergent church (e.g., 1 Pet 2:1-10; Tit 2:14). It would appear that two main functions are being served in this process.

Preeminent is the stress upon the call of God as the creator of his people in accordance with his merciful purposes for the world* (e.g., Rom 9:25-26). This emphasis is designed to denote both continuity with God's previous activity in Israel and confidence in his continuing presence with the communities of believers (e.g., Heb 4:9). Second, the assured destiny of the believing community in times of severe persecution* was strengthened by the use of such texts that offered a secure foundation for hope when earthly realities manifestly denied it (e.g., Rev 1:6; 1 Pet 2:9; both are based upon Exod 19:5-6). In such later NT texts the redemption in Christ* is seen as the eschatological* exodus and the church as the new covenant people of God; this differs somewhat from Paul, despite certain similarities.

Less frequently a resort to texts significant for Israel's origins may indicate fierce competition with Jews who denied the basis of the new communities, who claimed exclusive access to the divine presence and who thus precipitated a comparable response from believers in Jesus. In any discussion of the use of such scriptural texts in the NT, it is essential to consider carefully each citation in the context in which it has been introduced rather than proceed on the basis of a general assumption, such as that the mere use of the OT denotes conflict with Jews and signals their rejection. Jews were not the only opponents or persecutors of the Christian communities. Moreover, these new communities were by no means always looking outward; their attention had necessarily at times to focus on their own identity in order to forge for themselves an appropriate self-understanding. Scriptural texts descriptive of Israel's own origins proved particularly appropriate for the self-definition of an emergent community.

It is also important to recognize development in the ways in which the same texts were used over a period of time as extended as that between Paul's writing his first NT letter and the appearance of a much later text such as the book of Revelation. It is not surprising to discover that polemical intensity increases as the Jewish and Christian communities gradually acquire and even deliberately forge their own distinctive identities. However this later development must not be read back anachronistically into the earliest period when relations were much more fluid and a certain openness and optimism as regards Israel were still feasible.

5. Christ, Church and Israel.

For the majority of the NT writers, the church and Israel are two related but still individually distinguishable entities. Most of them are careful and precise in their use of terminology. Paul and Luke in particular are careful to distinguish Israel from Gentiles even as believers, and they are concerned about how and on what terms Gentile believers are admitted to faith. For them the continuity of salvation history is of great significance; it is secured not by Gentile believers linking with Christ alone but via the believing people in Israel. The continuity in salvation history does not lie exclusively in the history of Jesus but also in the history of the people who represent Israel (Jervell 1972, 53). However, it cannot be argued that John fits into this picture; for him to be linked by faith to the true vine is what counts.

There are also differing emphases on the value of physical descent from Abraham. It is severely qualified to a great extent by Paul and to such an extent by John as to render it almost worthless. But despite the warning that God is able to raise up children from stones, descent from Abraham is never rendered entirely superfluous, nor is Israel desacralized to become like the Gentiles, except possibly in John, and even here we cannot be certain. As we noted, discussion of Abrahamic descent may arise from two directions—the issue of Gentile inclusion as well as the warning against Jewish exclusion; it is not always slanted against Jews. What should be recognized is that this entire discussion had to do with the question of the continuity of the church with Israel. Again, when 1 Peter takes over the imagery of Israel to affirm the self-identity of believers (1 Pet 2:1-10), we must realize that this primarily denotes continuity in the people of God.

We need also to consider what kind of continuity is intended. Is it the continuity of one people of God being succeeded by another (i.e., displacement), or is it the continuity that the majority of the NT writers adhere to, of extension of the privileges of Israel to Gentiles? There is, however, more than one way in which this inclusion of Gentiles may be understood. In order to emphasize the roots of the church in Israel, Barth argued for a model of a single people of God, in preference to a remnant theory, in which continuity between the old and new peoples is maintained by believing Jews, and also in strong opposition to all theories involving the displacement of Israel by the church. It could well be argued that in differing circumstances the contemporary church chooses whichever of these NT models of the relationship is most productive for its own self-understanding and mission. But one must ask whether any models are to be excluded or whether all are equally acceptable for this purpose. Many people today would not regard the displacement model as a legitimate option. The disastrous consequences to which this perspective contributed, to some extent at least, in the Holocaust, is seen as sufficient grounds to merit its exclusion.

What is essential is that we recognize that there are differing emphases related to the circumstances of the audience and that perhaps we are wrong to expect a uniform pattern throughout the NT. We certainly ought not to try to force the texts into the pattern of our preference. As in Judaism, so too in the church, there is an abiding diversity rooted in differing models of community, as H. C. Kee has recently argued.

6. The Church as Israel, People of God in the Post-New Testament Period.

Until the time of Paul's death, most believers in Christ were Jews or former God-fearers. These were probably in the majority until the end of the first century; but even after the time when Gentile believers were in the majority, Jews and Christians often retained close contact if only to dispute over legitimacy or status. In the East, Jewish Christian groups persisted, often overlapping the Jewish communities, and to outsiders at least were often indistinguishable (Saldarini, 195). The period when rabbinic Judaism and nascent Christianity were both in a formative state was an era of great fluidity that allowed the coexistence and interaction of diverse groups of believers in ways that subsequent developments would render impossible. It is essential for scholars who know only a period of history in which church and synagogue are distinct and mutually exclusive communities with developed and divergent theological traditions not to retroject later classical forms of the two religions into the earlier period. The inevitable outcome of such anachronistic thinking is a neglect of traditions held in common prior to the deliberate development and accentuation of separate identities.

Saldarini has stressed this danger in relation to the question of whether or not Matthew's group is perceived as still being part of Judaism, but we believe the same risks face interpreters of documents relevant to Christian-Jewish relations in the second century. Our duty as historians is to try to understand the complex relationships without imposing presupposed or familiar patterns upon our material. Only thus can the variety and diversity of opinion and practice be uncovered. For this reason we will consider separately the relevant thinkers and their distinctive contribution rather than follow thematic studies on selected topics.

6.1. Ignatius. In the last book of the NT we find a reference to the Nicolaitans, those who say they are Jews but are not (Rev 2:9-10; 3:9). Most likely we have here a reference to Gentile Christian judaizers who, in order to escape persecution or for other reasons, called themselves Jews. The only inference we draw from this at this point is that it demonstrates that a certain overlap still exists in certain regions between the church and Judaism. The two entities are still not completely distinct.

In the letters of Ignatius,* which were written shortly after the book of Revelation (in the reign of Trajan, 98-117) and to churches in the same region, we find indications of a similar phenomenon. Ignatius refers to Gentile Christians "who expound Judaism": "it is better to hear Christianity from a man who is circumcised than Judaism from a man who is uncircumcised" (Ign. Phld. 6.1). It is the latter that troubles Ignatius. He is aware that former God-fearers had brought with them into the church their propensity for observing Jewish customs and have continued to live a Jewish lifestyle. "If we continue to live until now according to Judaism, we confess that we have not received grace" (Ign. Magn. 8.1). Ignatius wants to resolve what he sees as the dilemma of conflicting loyalties: Christians should henceforth follow a new norm and "live according to Jesus Christ." In his single reference to Abraham, Ignatius accords the patriarch some christological significance, but both Abraham and the other patriarchs come to God through Christ, "the door of the Father" (Ign. Phld. 9.1).

Ignatius is thus drawn to stress the distinctiveness of Christianity (Ign. Phld. 8.2; 9.1-2) over against Gentile judaizers who had previously attempted to combine Jewish practices and a Christian profession, a position he now regards as untenable. This blurring of boundaries, Ignatius had come to recognize, was a dangerous practice—the Christians concerned probably observed sabbath instead of Sunday (Ign. Magn. 9.1) and may also have had a distinctive view and separate celebration of the Eucharist (Ign. Phld. 4.1).

Ignatius challenged the judaizers to an exclusive commitment: to live according to Jesus Christ. "It is ridiculous to confess Jesus Christ and to judaize," for "Christianity did not believe in Judaism but Judaism in Christianity" (Ign. Magn. 10.2). It is significant that in this, the first known reference to Christianity in literature, we have evidence of existing tensions between the new movement and its Jewish roots, with the call to an exclusive commitment to Christ as the only viable solution.

6.2. The* Epistle of Barnabas. Although the Jewish war and the subsequent destruction of the temple* strengthened that Christian opinion which saw in these events proof of Israel's rejection and punishment, there is some evidence that suggests that hopes for a rebuilt temple were not dead. In the reign of the Nerva (96-98) this hope may have been rekindled.

The *Epistle of Barnabas was probably written during this period (i.e., between the reign of Nerva and the outbreak of the Bar Kokhba revolt in 132). Whether it was ever a real possibility or merely a pious hope, Barnabas takes seriously the report that "those who tore down this temple will rebuild it" (Barn. 16.2). Even the rumor of a rebuilt temple and hence the possibility of a revived Judaism posed a real threat to Barnabas. Moreover, internal problems in the Christian movement were also threatening. Some Gentile Christians were claiming that "the covenant is both ours and theirs" (Barn. 4.6-8). Barnabas represents a strong reaction to this suggestion of one covenant shared by both Christians and Jews.

So the author set out to distinguish Christians from Jews. Christians are another type of people (allon typon, Barn. 6.1), a new creation, a new people (Barn. 2.6; 5.7; 7.5), and they will inherit the promise. As for the Jews, their supreme failure is that they alone were responsible for the death of Jesus (Barn. 5.11). The wretched Jews, like their pagan neighbors, failed to realize that the Most High does not dwell in temples made with hands. So there is no future hope for them or their temple; their rituals such as sacrifice* and circumcision have been replaced.

Barnabas refers to Abraham seven times, three of these in OT citations. J. S. Siker notes that this is more than in any other writing between John's Gospel and Justin Martyr (Siker, 148). But the real significance of Abraham is that he bore witness* to the salvific meaning of the death of Jesus (Barn. 8.1-2; see Death of Christ). Again, the only virtue in the circumcision that Abraham practiced was that it pointed toward Christ, but an evil angel "enlightened" the Jews and caused them to misinterpret its significance (Barn. 9.4). God did give the covenant to the Israelites, but their sin led to its immediate withdrawal. From this Barnabas concludes that the covenant was never theirs and that it was always ours in God's intention. Moses had received the covenant on behalf of the Jews, but "they were not worthy." So the Lord "gave it to us, as the people of his inheritance" (Barn. 13.6-7; 14.4), and by "us" it is clear that Barnabas means Gentile Christians. Abraham is really the father of the Gentiles.

The sectarian use in Barnabas of pronouns such as "ours" and "theirs" denotes the basic tendency to contrast rather than compare and to stress discontinuity rather than continuity in relating Christianity and Judaism. The author does not use the term Jews; most of his references to Israel are to the distant past (Barn. 5.2; 6.7; 9.2; etc) or to the time of Jesus (e.g., Barn. 5.8). Inevitably Jewish observances are, whether by allegory, typology or ethical argument, unfavorably contrasted with Christianity and finally discarded.

What we can see here is the development of a process of counter self-definition. Themes like a new law* and a new people (i.e., a people other than the Jews) are used to distinguish and distance the new movement from its Jewish counterpart and thus to prevent any blurring of the boundaries between the two. Christianity, as a new religious movement, needs to assert its own identity over and against the parent body.

6.3. 5 Ezra and the* Apocalypse of Peter. An early Christian apocalypse, 5 Ezra, which has come down to us as chapters 1—2 of the Jewish apocalypse 4 Ezra, reveals a continuous concern with the concept of the replacement of Israel by another people, the church, described here as "the coming people" (5 Ezra 2:23-32). Jerusalem is compared to a mother who has lost one son but gains another (5 Ezra 2:10-14). The mother is brought to ruin and the people dispersed among the nations (5 Ezra 2:6-7). This could refer quite precisely to the events of the Bar Kokhba revolt, the destruction of Jerusalem, the banning of Jews from the city and the transfer of leadership of the church there to Gentile bishops in 135.

The Apocalypse of Peter may relate to this same period. S. G. Wilson draws attention to the close association of three themes in its first two chapters: the appearance of false messiahs, the persecution and martyrdom* of Christians and their eternal reward* and the fate of Israel (Wilson, 91-92).

In these last days Israel, the fig tree, is cut down and rejected. There is intense interest in and stress upon a radical rejection of Israel as the apparent prerequisite for the transfer of the divine affection to a "new people." Only a historical crisis of great significance can explain the concentration of these associated themes. The Bar Kokhba revolt, particularly in the light of its messianic expectations, provides the most fitting historical context for their emergence. From the content of writings such as 5 Ezra and Apocalypse of Peter, it becomes clear that although the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 was a most significant event, its lasting influence was not nearly as decisive as the events associated with the Bar Kokhba rebellion. Doubtless the persecution of some Christians at a moment of high messianic fervor, the replacement of the temple by a pagan building and the abolition of the Jews from Jerusalem with the concomitant transfer of leadership of the church to Gentiles had a profound influence upon the Christian perception of reality. For an emergent movement involved in developing its own independent identity and drawing up boundaries between itself and other Jews and Gentiles, the outcome of Bar Kokhba for Judaism must have denoted an aspect of finality and provided the catalyst that encouraged the hardening of the concept of the transfer of divine affection to a new entity, "the coming people."

6.4. Marcionites and Gnostics. Gnostics and Marcionites were by no means identical, since it is clear that the former may have originated among disillusioned Jews. Yet for the purposes of this study, their combined influence cannot be underestimated.

Gnostics,* like Marcion, had an intense interest in the problem of evil within a divinely created world. Their myths posit a decline from an upper and perfect world inhabited by the ultimate, absolute God and heavenly beings that emanate from him. But a fall from this world of perfection, associated with one of the lower emanations, precipitated the creation* of the world. This is the work of the Demiurge, an inferior deity, and therefore this cosmos is corrupt and evil, as are the humans who reside there, apart from a residual spark infused in them from the transcendent deity. Only by receiving the enlightenment of gnosis can humans be reunited with the supreme God and their true destiny. In the Gospel of Philip Abraham's circumcision is interpreted as demonstrating that the fleshly must give way to the spiritual in order that true gnosis may be attained.

In many Gnostic myths the Demiurge, the creator of this world and of human beings, is identified with the God of Israel. Heracleon, a student of Valentinus, did not include Abraham among the true Gnostics. The Jewish law also is associated with this lesser creator god, and its adherents are essentially in a state of enslavement. There emerged thus in Gnosticism the potential for a radical anti-Judaism which, when transferred in the second century into Christian communities, contributed strongly to an adverse estimate of Judaism itself and in this way assisted the developing separation between the two faiths.

Marcion,* arriving in Rome* within a decade of the Bar Kokhba revolt, espoused a hyper-Paulinism that stressed divine revelation* as eruption into history rather than as a gradual development within history. His predisposition was not to read the Jewish Scriptures in a christological fashion but to see them rather as law in contrast to the Christian message of the gospel. These two contrasting entities corresponded respectively to the inferior creator god of the Jewish Bible and the redeemer God, wholly unknown until revealed by Jesus. Human beings are sinful and belong wholly to the inferior creator god. Not surprisingly, therefore, Marcion demanded complete asceticism from his followers. For him, Luke and the Pauline writings constituted the one gospel of his hero Paul and therefore for all who like Marcion wished to live like their favorite apostle.*

Marcion's stress on the radical newness of Christianity unavoidably reflected adversely upon Judaism and its Scriptures as inevitably old. Yet Marcion's interest was not in opposing Judaism as such but in opposing Christian judaizers who, in his opinion, had lost the true understanding of Paul's gospel. For him Judaism and Christianity are not related as promise is to fulfillment but are two separate entities. Even the figure of Abraham, frequently representing some element of positive continuity, is excluded by Marcion from the inheritance (rather than entering the kingdom through Christ). So instead of taking over, as did most of his contemporary Christians, the Jewish God, the patriarchs, the Jewish Scriptures and the privileged inheritance of Israel, Marcion conceded to the Jews their God, their founders and Scriptures and even their Messiah (the Jewish Messiah is yet to appear) and chose what to him was an entirely superior and novel revelation. Marcion's solution to the problem of continuity with Israel was to posit a radical separation that solved some problems but also created certain others.

The catholic church reacted strongly to both Marcion and the Gnostics and chose the solutions of neither of them. While it is difficult to be precise as to the influence of either Gnostics or Marcionites, it is clear that they supplied ideas and options previously unavailable that to a greater or lesser extent were utilized by those who for one reason or another wished to stress their difference from or superiority over Judaism. The analogy of the free availability of dangerous weapons in a society, whether they be guns or knives, suggests that where serious conflict arises, every available weapon in the arsenal is likely to be utilized. The denigration of Judaism, so plainly visible in both Marcion and Gnostic ideas, was to become a useful weapon for Christian polemicists in their struggle with opponents both from within and from outside their own faith.

6.5. Justin Martyr. That the church is in some sense the true Israel is implied in earlier Christian writings, but Justin, writing in Rome shortly after 150, is the first openly to express and defend the claim with explicit arguments. Justin denies continuing theological validity to a Judaism apart from Jesus: Judaism had been superseded.

The universal promises of the Scriptures refer to Christ and to Christians, not to Diaspora Jews and proselytes. While the Scriptures contain both promises and threats, Justin tends to apply the former to Christians and the latter to Jews. If once there was one people of God, now there are two, a physical and a spiritual. "So, also we . . . are . . . both called and in fact are Jacob and Israel and Judah and Joseph and David, the true children of God" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 123.9). He does allow a place in God's true people for persons who confess Jesus Christ but practice traditional Jewish practices, provided they do not seek to compel nonobservant Christians to do the same (Justin Dial. Tryph. 47.2-4). Even so, he characterizes Jewish Christians as uncomprehending (Justin Dial. Tryph. 7.3; 12.2).

Justin was able to turn the destruction of the temple to good advantage by claiming it was not only a punishment for the wickedness of the Jews but also clear proof that the Mosaic law was a temporary dispensation since it could now no longer be fulfilled. The only useful function he adduces for circumcision is that it could be used to identify Jews illegally returning to Jerusalem after 135. Nevertheless he is aware of and does try to take seriously contemporary Jewish objections to Christianity. It is also probable that he still holds out some hope for the eventual conversion of Israel, whether by direct action of God or through Christ.

In the end, however, Justin gives the impression that Gentiles are the true and possibly the sole inheritors of God's promises, thereby showing signs of falling into the typically Jewish sin of exclusiveness, this time in a Gentile version.

Siker has drawn attention to the way in which Justin uses Abraham in the gentilization of Christianity in the paradoxical continuity of inversion (Siker, 184). In relation to circumcision, Abraham is a Gentile since Justin dissociates him from the carnal circumcision of the Jews. As regards God's promises to Abraham, Justin reinterprets them all as applying to Gentile Christians; even the concept of the chosen people and the nations is inverted so that the chosen people become no people. For Justin this inversion of the status of Jews and Gentiles stands in continuity with God's purposes in Christ from the beginning, since the Christ existed from the beginning.

It is not surprising that Trypho and Justin, with their competing and conflicting claims, arrive at an impasse. It becomes clear that Justin regards baptism* as an enlightenment that only Christians enjoy. Justin perceived what John Chrysostom was to express more explicitly at a later date: "Don't you realize, if the Jewish rites are holy and venerable, our way of life must be false." To ensure the survival and success of Christianity, Justin felt compelled to demolish the rival claims of Judaism.

6.6. Conclusion. The evolution of the Christian movement from its origins as a Jewish faction in Palestine involved in internal disputes within Judaism to its emergence as a rival religion, with large numbers of Gentile adherents throughout the Gentile world and laying exclusive claim to the heritage of Israel, was marked by intense conflicts. In the earliest period, especially in Palestine itself or in areas with a strong concentration of Jews, the first Christians were probably perceived as deviants by the traditional majority, as a faction within Judaism (see Elliott). Conflicts were no less serious in the Diaspora world, but here most of them are best understood as characteristic of a new religious movement (Sanders 1993, 255-56). From this vantage point we may note that there were several influential factors that help to explain why Christians sought to regard themselves as the "true Israel."

First, there were social reasons. Christians needed to express their own sense of identity over and against both Jews and pagans. Sometimes this took the form of counter self-definition (i.e., defining oneself over and against the other and stressing the divergence, especially in times of conflict). In conflicts with Judaism, the negative continuity of inversion may be seen as an extreme form of defining oneself over against the other.

Second, there were powerful theological reasons. It was necessary and beneficial for Christians, especially Gentiles, to locate themselves in the grand divine plan of salvation history. Here Abraham often played a significant role especially in conflicts with Jews. But even where this was not the case, a writing such as 1 Clement calls Abraham "our father" and holds him up as an example of virtue and piety (see Clement of Rome). In general, however, it is true to state that Abraham is not so frequently discussed in the second-century writings as he is in the NT.

Third, for political reasons it was expedient, in order to avert the charge of being a new and novel religion, to lay claim to an ancient heritage and thus avoid persecution. Despite this, it is also necessary to recognize that there may well have been other occasions when Christians felt it was advantageous for them to dissociate themselves, for example in the collection by the Romans of the fiscus Judaicus.

For many and varied reasons the church felt obligated to challenge the very foundation of Israel and to claim to be the people of the new covenant. But there is no doubt that both the greatest impulse towards this displacement theology, as well as the greatest threat to its credibility, was the existence of a surviving and at times thriving Judaism. The shape and the substance of much early Christian theology were in fact shaped by the proximity, both geographically and theologically, between Christianity and Judaism.

7. Christ, Church and Israel Today: Theological Reflections.

To understand how and why history evolved as it did is not to hold that all developments were good and that all change was necessarily beneficial. Christianity did not develop in a vacuum, and many developments were forced upon it by the mighty power of Rome (see Roman Empire) or other circumstances. Our final exercise therefore is one of theological reflection.

The abiding truth in the church's claim to be the true Israel is that there exists an inalienable connection between the historic people of God, the Jews, and the new entity, the Christian church. The church's Lord* must necessarily be identified as the Messiah of Israel as promised in their Scriptures. Gentiles who trust in Christ are therefore not trusting in an isolated individual whom God has apparently arbitrarily chosen. They are linked through Christ, as part of the faithful remnant, to the people of Israel from whom he came by human descent. If Jesus as a human being, as part of the faithful remnant of believing Israelites, is ignored or forgotten, he becomes unreal, because his family upbringing and personal devotion are disregarded as if it would not have mattered what kind of community he had been born into. But the Gospels, especially Luke, witness otherwise. Jesus was nurtured among faithful believers who were longing and hoping for Israel's restoration.

Christ cannot therefore be decontextualized to become the exclusive property of the Christian church; otherwise he becomes a meaningless cipher or a theological abstraction. He is the Lord of the church and the Messiah of Israel. This leads us to a further christological assertion. Although we do acknowledge Jesus as the true Israelite, the ideal servant* of God, we must not totally identify him with Israel. We cannot claim that Christ is Israel. While Christian doctrine affirms that Christ is the only mediator between God and humanity, this confession* does not negate the fact that historically the righteous remnant in Israel was an essential vehicle in the extension of the covenant faith to Gentiles (not everyone could expect a personal appearance of Christ as in the case of Paul).

Nor is it legitimate to claim that Christ displaces or becomes Israel. In such a theology, the humanity of Christ is obliterated with Israel, and the outcome is that we are left with a theological docetism (see Docetism) that manifests itself as individualism. In order to avoid such an outcome, some recognition has to be given to the fact that the church is called to share in the salvation promised to Israel, as Paul describes in the analogy of the olive tree in Romans 11:13-14. In other words, it must be recognized, as we have already asserted, that there exists an inalienable connection between the church and Israel, one that cannot be subsumed under the notion of believers having a connection with Christ, as if he were an isolated individual and as if Israel could be ignored.

The church's roots in Israel is not merely a historical fact of purely historical significance. It is also of great theological significance. The roots of both Jesus and of the church in Israel are important theologically because this is part of the identity of both the church and of Jesus. As such, this is much more than a temporary stage in their history; it remains a part of their ongoing identity.

Although the NT writers and their immediate successors did not all equally emphasize the aspect of the church as people of God, it is a useful and a valuable title. It stresses the continuity in God's purposes for humanity. It draws attention to the faithfulness of God throughout history, despite the faithlessness of humans. It reminds us of the oneness of God and of the corporate nature of the people of faith. As such it is a healthy deterrent against all forms of extreme individualism. But above all, it reveals to us something of the sovereignty of God in salvation, since it is God who alone determines the membership of his people.

See also BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF; CHRISTIANITY

AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CHURCH; COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT; ESCHATOLOGY; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY; LAND IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY; MATTHEAN COMMUNITY; NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY; SYNAGOGUE; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Barth, "The Faith of the Messiah," HeyJ 10 (1969) 36-70; idem, The People of God (JSNTSup 5; Sheffield: JSOT, 1983); S. C. Barton, "The Communal Dimension of Earliest Christianity: A Critical Survey of the Field," JTS 43 (1992) 399-427; J. C. Beker, "The Faithfulness of God and the Priority of Israel in Paul's Letter to the Romans" in Christians Among Jews and Gentiles, ed. G. W. E. Nicklesburg with G. W. MacRae (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 10-16; D. G. Bloesch, " 'All Israel Will Be Saved': Supercessionism and the Biblical Witness," Int 43 (1989) 130-42; W. S. Campbell, Paul's Gospel in an Intercultural Context: Jew and Gentile in the Letter to the Romans (Frankfurt, NY: Peter Lang, 1992); L. Coenen, "Church, Synagogue," NIDNTT 1:291-307; N. A. Dahl, "A People for His Name," NTS 4 (1957-58) 319-27; idem, "The Story of Abraham in Luke-Acts" in Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1976) 66-86; W. D. Davies, "Paul and the People of Israel" in Jewish and Pauline Studies (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 123-52; W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988), vol. 1; J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); J. H. Elliott, "The Jewish Messianic Movement: From Faction to Sect" in Modeling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context, ed. P. F. Esler (New York: Routledge, 1995) 75-95; E. J. Epp, "Jewish-Gentile Continuity in Paul: Torah and/or Faith? (Romans 9:1-5)" in Christians Among Jews and Gentiles, ed. G. W. E. Nicklesburg with G. W. MacRae (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 80-90; P. F. Esler, The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation (New York: Routledge, 1994); idem, Modeling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context (New York: Routledge, 1995); F. O. Fearghail, "Israel in Luke-Acts," Proceedings of the Irish Biblical Association 11 (1988) 23-43; R. H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Handbook for a Mixed Church Under Persecution (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); R. B. Hays, " 'Have We Found Abraham to Be Our Forefather According to the Flesh?' A Reconsideration of Rom. 4:1," NovT 27 (1985) 76-98; N. B. Huffmon, "The Israel of God," Int 23 (1969) 66-77; J. Jervell, Luke and the People of God (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1972); idem, "Das Volk des Geistes" in God's Christ and His People, ed. J. Jervell and W. A. Meeks (Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1977) 87-106; H. C. Kee, Who Are the People of God? Early Christian Models of Community (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); A. T. Lincoln, "The Church and Israel in Ephesians 2," CBQ 49 (1987) 605-24; R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1986); W. A. Meeks, "Breaking Away: Three New Testament Pictures of Christianity's Separation from the Jewish Communities" in Essential Papers on Judaism and Christianity in Conflict, ed. J. Cohen (New York: New York University Press, 1991) 89-113; idem, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983); J. A. Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of the Matthean Community (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); J. Painter, "The Church and Israel in the Gospel of John: A Response," NTS 25 (1979) 103-12; P. Richardson, Israel in the Apostolic Church (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968); A. J. Saldarini, Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (CSHJ; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); J. T. Sanders, The Jews in Luke-Acts (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); idem, Sectarians, Schismatics, Dissidents, Deviants: The First One Hundred Years of Jewish-Christian Relations (London: SCM, 1993); K. L. Schmidt, "καλέω κτλ," TDNT 3:487-536; W. Schrage, "Ekklēsia und Synagogue, Zum Ursprung des Urchristlichen Kirchenbegriffs," ZTK 60 (1963) 178-202; J. S. Siker, Disinheriting the Jews: Abraham in Early Christian Controversy (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); R. K. Soulen, The God of Israel and Christian Theology (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1996); G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); W. M. Swartley, Israel's Scripture Traditions and the Synoptic Gospels: Story Shaping Story (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); K. Tagawa, "People and Community in the Gospel of Matthew," NTS 16 (1969-70) 149-211; J. B. Tyson, ed., Luke-Acts and the Jewish People: Eight Critical Perspectives (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1988); U. C. von Wahlde, "The Gospel of John and the Presentation of Jews and Judaism" in Within Context: Essays on Jews and Judaism in the New Testament, ed. M. C. Boys et al. (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1993) 67-84; S. K. Williams, "Again Pistis Christou," CBQ 49 (1987) 431-47; S. G. Wilson, Related Strangers: Jews and Christians 70-170 C.E. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992). W. S. Campbell

CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT

How the earliest Christians organized their communal life, who provided the leadership, and the relationship between the whole community of Christians and local congregations has been for centuries a topic of debate. Many issues, however, have become clearer in recent times because a more critical methodology has been adopted. The consensus is that Jesus did not lay down a given pattern for the organization and government of the church, but this slowly evolved as the early Christians took over and modified Jewish communal structures, which were also evolving in the first century A.D.

1. Methodology and Presuppositions
2. Jewish Communal Organization
3. Church Order and Government in the Apostolic Age
4. Church Order and Government in the Postapostolic Age
5. Conclusion

1. Methodology and Presuppositions.

The question of how the earliest churches were organized and governed has been fiercely debated from the time of the Reformation. The diverse interpretations are due partly to the scarcity of information available and partly to the deficiencies in the methodology adopted. The limited and divergent data have all too often been read ahistorically and uncritically, and as a result the same texts have been made to substantiate opposing positions. In what follows the importance of an appropriate critical methodology in gaining an accurate picture of the ordering of the earliest churches is taken as the fundamental issue in resolving the debates over ecclesiology and polity.

1.1. Critical Methodology. Modern critical scholarship demands that ancient texts be read in their historical and cultural context. When we come to the text the primary question must be, What is presupposed by these words and ideas as far as the writer and his readers were concerned? This approach demands that contemporary cultural experience and ecclesial commitments be laid to one side, as far as possible, as the text is studied. It means that we recognize there are profound differences between the social and ecclesial world of the early Christians and those we take for granted. It also means that in coming to the text our concern is not to prove or substantiate any viewpoint already held but to hear the text itself. This leads to a second principle basic to a critical theological methodology, namely, that dogma or doctrine must not be allowed to determine in advance the conclusions reached. The possibility must be accepted that the earliest Christian texts reflect a diversity of opinion and ideas that do not correspond to later dogmatic formulations.

1.2. False Presuppositions. Many of those who have sought to outline the early Christian view of ministerial leadership and church government have assumed a number of viewpoints that we now see as alien to the world of the first Christians.

1.2.1. Individualism. Far too commonly the NT has been and is read as if it reflects and endorses modern individualism and therefore radical congregationalism. In contemporary Western culture the individual is thought of as the primary unit of society. We moderns see ourselves as free agents who may rightly pursue our own interests and self-development, with or without the endorsement of the collective groupings (family [see Household, Family], church,* nation) with which we are associated. But in premodern times and in many undeveloped countries today the individual finds his or her identity and meaning for living not as an individual but as a member of one or more communities of which the individual is but a part. The extended family, the village, the state and the religious community are the primary categories. It is this viewpoint that both the OT and NT writers presuppose. When this is not recognized it is easy for modern Christians to conclude mistakenly that the NT reflects a congregational understanding of the church. The apostolic church was an association of individual believers who freely choose to assemble together: a kind of voluntary club based on faith* in Christ.* There is truth in this, as people did freely choose to meet, but as far as the NT writers are concerned the individual response of faith led inexorably to membership in a new community. This community was the whole company of those who were united with Christ, the elect,* the saints, the (new or true) people of God. The particular congregation of which one was a member was but the arena in which this communal membership was expressed most personally. This means that a strictly congregational understanding of the church is seriously flawed.

Belonging to the one worldwide Christian community brought into existence by Christ was always the primary reality as far as the earliest believers were concerned. This community is designated in many ways by the NT writers, but the most favored term in the writings of Paul and Luke is the word ekklēsia, which in most cases has lost the meaning "assembly" and has come to mean specifically the Christian community (see Giles 1995). In Paul this word is sometimes used of the Christian community that meets in a particular home (Rom 16:5; 16:22; Col 4:15), sometimes of the Christian community in one geographical location, which may or may not assemble in totality (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1), and of all Christians on earth (1 Cor 10:32; 12:28; 15:9). But to reject a radically congregational understanding of the church does not imply that the early believers saw themselves as belonging to a national or worldwide institution that linked them together. Their unity was understood in familial terms (see Households, Family). To conceive of the worldwide community of Christians in the first centuries of Christian history as the hierarchically ordered Roman Catholic Church in embryo is also a mistaken presupposition.

1.2.2. One Defined Ecclesiology. Many Christians still believe that the NT exclusively supports their ecclesiology. All too many Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, Anglicans and Pentecostals, just to take four examples, find their church order and no other endorsed by the NT. Aspects of each ecclesiology are present in the Scriptures but not as one given pattern and not in any set form. The NT exhibits diversity and development in church order and in patterns of leadership.

1.2.3. Charismatic versus Institutional. Another presupposition that too often has determined the outcome of supposedly critical discussions of polity in the early church, especially since World War II, has been the view that we see in our earliest sources two opposing orders, the charismatic and the institutional. According to this thesis the earliest letters of Paul and the Johannine writings (see John, Letters of) bear witness to an entirely Spirit-initiated ministry* given by prophets,* tongues* speakers and others as the Spirit empowers (see Holy Spirit); Luke, James,* 1 Peter* and the Pastoral Epistles, in contrast, bear witness to an institutional order in which office bearers, notably elders, rule the church. While it is true that the more charismatic forms of leadership such as seen at Corinth did give way to more ordered institutional leadership with the passing of time, the data suggest that the charismatic and the institutional existed side by side from the beginning (see esp. Holmberg). There never were two diametrically opposed patterns but differing degrees of emphasis and a tendency for the process of institutionalization to become more pronounced.

1.3. The Starting Point. Because so little is said about leadership and church order in the early Christian writings and because what is said is by no means self-explanatory or consistent, a common practice, especially among Roman Catholic and Anglo-Catholic writers, has been to start with what is clear, the church order of the fourth century and later, and then use this as the key to interpret the NT and postapostolic writings. With some ingenuity Catholic order is found from earliest times, and the old dogma that Jesus himself ordained this order is established. A critical methodology must reject this approach, insisting that the starting point must be the NT understood in the context of its first-century social and historical context.

As the Christian church began as a Jewish renewal movement, what is said in the NT, often in passing, about Christian leadership should be read in the light of what we known about the ordering of Jewish communal life in the first century (see esp. Burtchaell). It may be presupposed that at first the early believers took over Jewish forms, modifying them only as the need arose and as the Holy Spirit bestowed new life and vitality. Beginning with this assumption we may take it that the earliest Christian congregations were the counterparts of Jewish synagogues,* albeit of a more charismatic nature, the first Christian leaders had Jewish antecedents and the linkages that developed between Christians in a given area or in different locations followed patterns the Jews had developed (see Worship).

2. Jewish Communal Organization.

Before studying the limited and varied data in the NT and postapostolic writings on church order and government, we turn to a brief outline of what we know about Jewish communal organization and leadership in the century before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (see Judaism). What can be discovered from Jewish texts is also limited and not always uniform, but a broad picture of typical thinking and structures can be outlined.

2.1. Jewish Communal Identity. The Jews had a strong sense of themselves as a distinct people in the world. Circumcision,* law* keeping and sabbath observance were the primary visible identity markers, but their inner belief that they were the elect people of God was foundational to their communal identity. This communal self-awareness was universal in scope, but of necessity it took localized expression wherever Jews found themselves. Because the Jews insisted so strongly on being seen as a distinct people, the Roman authorities allowed the numerous Jewish communities in the Mediterranean world to be self-governing politeumata, a term used of an organized body of citizens. They themselves, however, more characteristically called their local communities a synagogue, literally an assembly. In the Septuagint synagōgē was used of all Israel as God's elect people, but in the Second Temple period it came to be used of specific communities of Jews and then secondarily in the first century A.D. of the building where Jews assembled together.

2.2. Jewish Communal Government. Self-governing Jewish communities usually had a ruling council, the gerousia, to direct their affairs. The gerousia was made up of respected older men who were generally called presbyteroi ("elders"). One elder was usually recognized as the presiding elder, sometimes called a gerousiarchēs ("ruling council member") and sometimes an archōn ("ruler"), but some texts and inscriptions mention three ruling archōntēs. The oft-mentioned archisynagōgos ("ruler of the synagogue") was also a significant communal figure, but his special domain was the sabbath assemblies where he presided. He was assisted by a one or more officers who were designated individually ḥāzzān (Heb), hyperetēs (Gk) and in English translation, servant.

2.3. Sabbath Assemblies. Meeting together for Scripture reading, exposition, prayer* and common meals was very much part of localized Jewish communal life in the first century. Although special buildings were known, the most common venue was a home setting. In any location where there was a Jewish community of some size there were usually several meeting places. One tradition has it that there were 394 synagogues in Jerusalem* when the city was destroyed by Titus in A.D. 70; another tradition has it that there were 480. It may be conjectured that the owner of the home, as the host of those meeting in his house,* usually assumed the office of archisynagōgos. Philo* and Josephus* usually called these buildings proseuchai ("a house of prayer"). Once Josephus calls them sabbateion ("sabbath meeting place"). Later Jewish texts also use the title "house of prayer" as well as "house of study" and "house of assembly." It was only late in the Second Temple era and first in Palestine that the name for the local community of Jews in their complete number, synagōgos, became the name for a specific meeting place, a usage often seen in the NT.

3. Church Order and Government in the Apostolic Age.

As there is no evidence to suggest that Jesus laid down a blueprint for the ordering of the church, and as leadership structures and titles seem to have slowly evolved, our task must be to trace this development rather than seek out one pattern. In doing this we take as our starting point Jewish models of local self-government and Jewish weekly assemblies. The other determining factor assumed is the home setting for the earliest congregations. In the apostolic and postapostolic period Christians usually met in the home of one of their number. Men and women are mentioned as hosts of house churches, and in both cases it seems they were people of some social standing whose home was somewhat larger than average. Meeting numbers were limited, since only the very largest of homes could accommodate fifty people. This means that once the number of believers multiplied in any one place several house churches must have existed.

3.1. The Book of Acts. In Acts* Luke sets out his account of how the Christian community came into being in Jerusalem and then how Christianity spread throughout the Roman Empire.* He presents the twelve apostles* as the earliest communal leaders. They are recognized as leaders by the early Christians because they have been chosen by Christ himself (Acts 1:2, 24) and then filled with the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:1-4). In other words they are legitimated as leaders both institutionally and charismatically.

But the evangelistic* work of the Twelve, Luke suggests, soon demanded that communal leadership be taken over by others. Luke maintains that the first step took place when the Greek-speaking Jewish believers demanded better care for their widows (Acts 6:1-6). The seven men appointed are not given any title, but they are drawn as communal elders, set apart to oversee the Greek-speaking section of the Jerusalem Christian community.

Later when the Christians in Antioch* send relief for the poor believers in Jerusalem their gifts are received by the elders (Acts 11:30). Luke speaks of Jewish elders earlier and later and so no significant difference, besides the fact that they are Christian elders, can be allowed. They were not teaching* or liturgical functionaries who presided at sabbath assemblies. On one occasion Luke aptly describes their ministry as that of episkopos, oversight, or supervision (Acts 20:28). This Greek noun and its verbal form (episkopein) were commonly used of supervisors or supervision in any endeavor, and in the first instance, as in this example, Christians used these words in a nontechnical and functional way (cf. 1 Pet 2:25; 5:2; Heb 12:15). Luke presents Paul and Barnabas appointing elders in the cities of Iconium, Lystra and Derbe on a return visit to these places (Acts 14:23). In Acts 21:18 Luke depicts James as the president of a group of elders to whom Paul and his missionary coworkers report. In this scene James appears as a typical Jewish archōn or gerousiarchēs, the prototype of the later monarchical bishop—a bishop who rules over a geographically circumscribed community. This use of the word episkopos is first found in the writings of Ignatius* (see 4.3 below).

But alongside the apostles and later the elders Luke has charismatically endowed ministers of the word active in preaching* and teaching, whom he generally calls prophets. (These leaders were legitimated solely on the basis of their Spirit-filled ministries.) They are associated with particular places, but from time to time as the need arose they would travel (Acts 11:27; 15:22, 32). The meeting place for Christians is usually said to be a home (Acts 2:46; 8:3; 12:12-17; 16:15, 34; 18:7). Neither apostles, elders nor prophets are drawn as leaders of house churches. It seems rather that the owner of the home presided when believers assembled, as did the "ruler of the synagogue," and people present contributed freely as the Spirit led. Luke has Crispus, the ruler of a synagogue in Corinth, become a believer and then start a house church (Acts 18:8).

Luke never suggests that particular congregations were autonomous. The ekklēsia for Luke is the Christian community in one given location (Acts 8:1; 13:1) or the whole community of Christians on earth (Acts 20:28). The word when used of Christians means the Christian community, not assembly or congregation. Collective titles like "the brethren," "the disciples," "the saints" or "the believers" are for Luke synonyms of the word ekklēsia. After the initial period elders become the pastoral supervisors of these local Christian communities, or churches, which are subdivided into groups meeting in particular homes that had their own leaders. But besides this locally based oversight Luke insists that the Jerusalem leaders exercised a wider oversight. When the apostles hear of the work beginning at Antioch they send Barnabas to take charge (Acts 11:22); when a doctrinal dispute arises over the question of whether Gentiles* should keep the law a delegation comes from Antioch to Jerusalem for a decision (Acts 15:1-21), and when Paul and his missionary coworkers return to Jerusalem at the end of the third missionary journey they report to James and the other elders (Acts 21:18). Luke also sets Paul and his coworkers over the churches founded by their missionary activity. They appoint the communal elders (Acts 14:23) and return to instruct further these early believers.

3.2. Paul. The Pauline understanding of ministry is outlined in some detail by C. Kruse (see DPL, Ministry) and Paul's views on church order and government by R. Banks (see DPL, Church Order and Government), but a brief additional comment may help. The early Paul is often thought to have endorsed only a charismatic, congregational order, but this is not so.

In his earliest epistles he tells his readers to respect and obey those set over them (1 Thess 5:12-13; 1 Cor 16:15-18), and in his epistle to the Philippians he singles out the bishops and deacons, who it would seem were Christian office bearers. In these three texts Paul is probably alluding to the leaders of the individual house churches (Giles 1989). These were the first designated leaders, or to use the technical terminology, the first institutional leaders. The charismatic ministries took place under their supervision. In Philippians we find for the first time these leaders being given titles, namely, episkopoi and diakonoi. The terminology differs, but their Jewish counterparts would seem to be the ruler of the synagogue and the servant.

In Paul's thinking, like Luke's, Christians belong to a worldwide community, the new people of God. Becoming a Christian is an individual decision, but it involves in Paul's mind a transfer from one community to another. The two communities are variously described by the apostle, but possibly the most fundamental contrast he adopts is when he distinguishes between those in Adam and thus in the flesh* and those in Christ and thus in the Spirit (Rom 8:1-17; 1 Cor 15:12-58).

Although Paul uses the word ekklēsia for the whole redeemed community on earth (1 Cor 10:32, 12:28 etc.), all those "in Christ," he also uses this word of all the Christians in one city (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1) and of a congregation that meets in the home of a particular believer (Rom 16:5, 23). To suggest that Paul uses the word ekklēsia only of either specific assemblies of believers on earth or all Christians in heaven is mistaken (see DPL, Church). It would have been alien to Paul's thinking as a Jew and for him as a Christian to imagine each of the house churches as but atomistic units in no way bound together in one community in Christ (see Giles 1995). Paul consistently holds that there is but one Christian community, and in any given place the communal identity of believers was an axiom. That by necessity they needed to assemble in small groups in no way breached their unity in Christ. Paul's fully corporate understanding of Christian existence is illustrated by his own conception of his work and mission. He is convinced that God had set him over all believers in the Gentile world, and they are subject to his pastoral care and apostolic rule.

In the Pastoral Epistles, which come from a later period, some major differences can be noted. Because of changed circumstances and the progress in the process of institutionalization more ordered forms of ministry are to the fore. In Ephesus "a council of elders" (1 Tim 4:14) is firmly in charge of the local communities of Christians, and as Titus goes to Crete he is told to correct what is lacking and appoint elders "in every town" (Tit 1:5). The bishops and deacons (1 Tim 3:1-13), who are specific office bearers, are probably house church leaders and their assistants, as we suggested they were at Philippi (Giles 1989). The overall superintendence of the believers on a wider than congregational basis is in the hands of Timothy and Titus, Paul's delegates. This suggests that the Pauline tradition envisages a continuing oversight of believers at a congregational level and a transcongregational level.

3.3. Matthew and John. Matthew's Gospel (see Matthean Community) and the Johannine tradition also have a distinctive ecclesiology. Matthew 16:18-19 is of particular importance. Here Jesus, in a passage found only in the First Gospel, says to Simon Peter, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hades will not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven." The term ekklēsia in this context must allude to the new people of God that Jesus has come to gather, of which Peter is to be the leader. Rather than choosing to equate either Peter or his confession as "the rock" on which the Christian community is built, it is best to see Peter as the founding rock (see Stone) because he is the first openly to confess Jesus as Messiah and Son* of the living God.* The gift to Peter of the keys, almost certainly a symbolic way of speaking of his responsibility to decide on matters of faith and discipline, also suggests that Matthew understood that Peter was the leader of the first Christians.

In Acts Peter is depicted as the leader of the earliest believers, but nowhere in the NT do we see him exercising the ministry of the keys. Luke and Paul suggest that Peter's leadership was restricted mainly to the Jewish mission.* But despite these caveats the point to be noted is that Matthew gives to Peter a leadership over the church that is wider than a congregational ministry. He is drawn as the leader of the new Israel.* In regard to congregational gatherings Matthew sees the local ekklēsia as the counterpart of the local Jewish synagogue (Mt 18:15, 17), and he allows that this body also can exercise the keys (Mt 18:18), thereby disallowing this to be a ministry restricted to Peter. Nowhere does Matthew say anything explicit about office bearers. He does nevertheless suggest that in the churches known to him Christian teachers and prophets played an important role (Mt 7:15-20; 13:17; 23:34). In the epistle of James, which is often thought to come from the same milieu as Matthew's Gospel, a Christian congregation is called a synagogue (Jas 2:2), and those who lead it are designated "the elders" (Jas 5:14).

The Johannine tradition exhibits no interest in church office bearers. The emphasis falls on the direct leading of the Holy Spirit, but that virtually nothing is said about church officers should not lead us to dogmatic conclusions one way or the other. In regard to the leadership on a wider canvas, than the congregation the tendency in John's Gospel is to exalt "the beloved disciple" over Peter (see e.g. Jn 20:1-10). This is thought to indicate that in the dispersed communities that saw John as their founder and teacher he was considered in some ways more important than Peter. Some have thought that perhaps Diotrephes, "who likes to put himself first" (2 Jn 9), was an early pretender to the office of the bishop, but this is conjecture. It is more likely that Diotrephes was a house church leader who, John thought, had too big an ego.

3.4. Other New Testament Writers. 1 Peter* is noted for its bold affirmation that Christians are now God's own people, the inheritors of all the promises* bestowed on Israel of old (1 Pet 1:1-2; 2:4-10). The Christian community, the church, is the whole company of believers dispersed throughout the world* (1 Pet 5:10). Peter sees himself as having authority* over those to whom he writes, but when he comes to speak of local leadership he, like Luke, has the elders as the overseers of the geographically circumscribed flock (1 Pet 5:1-5; see Shepherd) and those who are charismatically inspired as the providers of the teaching and serving ministries (1 Pet 4:11-12; see Service). In other words 1 Peter allows that charismatic and institutional forms of leadership could exist side by side.

The book of Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) also emphatically makes the whole company of Christians the heirs and successors of the promises once the preserve of historic Israel (Rev 1:6; 5:9-10; 7:1-17). As far as the author of this book is concerned, the followers of Christ are one community on earth united in faith and suffering.* It is only when addressing the seven churches of Asia minor (Rev 2—3) that particular believing communities come into focus. Nothing is said directly about the leadership of these churches, but as prophets are given prominence in Revelation, we may assume they played an important part in community gatherings (Rev 10:7; 11:18; 16:6; 18:20, 24; 22:6, 9). John addresses "the angel" of each of the seven churches to which he writes. The suggestion has been made that this was a title for a church office bearer, possibly a bishop, but this is unlikely. In Revelation, angels* are heavenly figures. Probably John thought that each congregation had a guardian angel.

4. Church Order and Government in the Postapostolic Age.

Besides the passing comments about church order and church government to be found in the canonical writings we have additional historical data in the limited body of Christian literature coming from the late first and early second century A.D.

4.1. 1 Clement. The occasion for this letter is the removal from office of certain presbyters set over the Christian community in Corinth by a group of young men who seem to have been claiming charismatic authority for their ministry (1 Clem. 21.5; 48.5; 57.2). 1 Clement is introduced as a letter "from the church of God in Rome to the church in Corinth" (1 Clem. 1.10). The name of the author is not given, but later tradition ascribes it to Clement, the supposed third or fourth bishop of Rome (see Clement of Rome; Rome). The author, however, does not claim this title for himself and in fact makes no mention of monarchical episcopacy. When he does come to use the word episkopos he uses it in the plural of "bishops and deacons" (1 Clem. 42.4-5; cf. Phil 1:1; Did. 15.1). This may suggest that in Rome at this time the word episkopos was still used only of house church leaders. As in the Pastorals, all bishops were elders (1 Clem. 44.5), but not all elders were bishops. In both writings the titles bishop and deacon probably refer to particular ministries exercised in relation to specific congregations, whereas the elders are the general overseers of the city-wide community of Christians (cf. 1 Clem. 44.5; 47.6; 54.2; 57.1). Elders are always mentioned in the plural, and their right to give authoritative direction to the Corinthian believers is consistently upheld (1 Clem. 1.3; 3.3; 21.6; 47.6; 54.2; 57.1).

4.2. The* Didache. The Didache (or to give it its full title, The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) is almost certainly a composite document coming from the early second century A.D. but incorporating earlier material. Elders are not mentioned and monarchical episcopacy is not envisaged, but prophets and teachers are prominent, with the former having the honor of presiding at the Eucharist (Did. 11.7). In Didache 15.1 the bishops and deacons are seen as the successors to the prophets and teachers. These two office bearers, the author says, you are "to appoint for yourselves" (Did. 15.1).

4.3. Ignatius. The seven epistles of Ignatius, the bishop of Antioch, written in about A.D. 108 as he travels to Rome to face martyrdom,* introduce us to something hitherto unseen. We read of a clearly defined threefold church order in which monarchical episcopacy is the most important element. Center stage stands the bishop, the unquestioned leader of the Christian community in a given city, who presides over a council of elders and is assisted by a group of deacons. A constant refrain in these epistles is that the bishop must be obeyed. Ignatius insists that "we must regard the bishop as the Lord himself" (Ign. Eph. 6.1; cf. Ign. Trall. 3.1; Ign. Eph. 13.2; Ign. Symrn. 9.2). This use of the term episkopos is a new development. In the NT the word is first used functionally to refer to anyone who gives oversight, and then it becomes a title for a house church leader. Here it is used of the leader of a localized community of Christians. Like James in Jerusalem, Ignatius appears as the counterpart of a Jewish communal archōn; he is not called by this term but by a virtual synonym, episkopos.

Closely allied with the bishop are the deacons. They complement his work by serving the community and are regarded by Ignatius as "his fellow servants" (Ign. Eph. 2.1; Ign. Magn. 2.1; Ign. Phld. 4.1; Ign. Smyrn. 12.2). The elders are a council of older men "after the likeness of the council of the apostles," who assist and advise the bishop in his rule over the local Christian community. They are not drawn as ministers of the word and sacrament. Ignatius's epistles assume this particular form of the threefold order was well established in Asia Minor but possibly not in Rome, as he makes no claims about the Christian leadership in his epistle to the Romans.

4.4. Other Evidence. Other early Christian writings such as the *Shepherd of Hermas, an apocalypse (see Apocalyptic) emanating from the church in Rome; the Epistle of Barnabas, from an unknown origin; and the writings of Justin Martyr, also coming from Rome, and all written around the middle of the first century A.D., make no mention of the threefold order or of monarchical episcopacy, but from this time on this polity becomes common, and by the end of the century it is well nigh universal. It is to be noted, however, that this particular form of the threefold order is quite different from that which prevails in Roman Catholic and Anglican churches. The monarchical bishop in the second century and for many centuries to follow was the leader of a local community of Christians, the deacons in some number were his assistants and the elders were a patriarchal governing council. In none of these postapostolic writings are any of these office bearers thought of as priests* offering sacrifices* to God, and no mention is made of ordination. Ignatius based his authority solely on his claim to be Spirit-possessed (he repeatedly introduces himself as theophorus, which means "God-inspired"). It was not until the sixth century, in the Frankish reordering of the church, that individual presbyters, thought of as priests, became the leaders of local congregations set under a diocesan bishop (Osborne).

5. Conclusion.

In the period studied a number of changes can be seen taking place. Both institutional and charismatic forms of ministry were present from the beginning, but gradually the more institutional forms came to prevail. Jewish communal and organizational ideas were taken over by the early Christians but changed along the way. For example, terminology was often altered. The word synagōgē was replaced by ekklēsia, although both words by the first century bore much the same meaning. Likewise it seems the title archisynagōgos became episkopos when used of a house church leader, and their assistants were called not hypēretai but diakonoi, while later archōn was replaced by a new usage of the term episkopos. But the dynamic presence of the Holy Spirit also brought other changes, notably a renewed outbreak of the prophetic ministry, which flowered for a while and then waned. Christians and Jews met in small groups, but for both their collective and universal communal identity as those obedient* to the law, or those subject to Christ, was always to the fore. For this reason early Christianity always allowed for transcongregational leadership of differing kinds.

See also AUTHORITY; CHURCH; EARLY CATHOLICISM; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. V. Branick, The House Church in the Writings of Paul (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989); J. T. Burtchaell, From Synagogue to Church: Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); K. N. Giles, Patterns of Ministry Among the First Christians (Melbourne: Collins-Dove, 1989); idem, What on Earth Is the Church? (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995); B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Lund: Gleerup, 1978); M. Y. MacDonald, The Pauline Churches: A Sociohistorical Study of Institutionalization in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline Churches (SNTSMS 60; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); H. O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius (Waterloo, ON: Wilfred Laurier University Press, 1991); K. Osborne, Priesthood: A History of the Ordained Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church (New York: Paulist, 1988); S. Safrai and M. Stern et al., ed., The Jewish People of the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions (2 vols.; CRINT 1.1, 1.2; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974, 1976).

K. N. Giles

CIRCUMCISION

Although it was also practiced by other groups, circumcision was widely regarded in antiquity as a specific and defining mark of Jewishness. While the practice was quickly abandoned by the Pauline church, it remained an issue to other Christian groups well beyond the second century. This article explores the NT and other early Christian writings for evidence of the authors' attitudes and attempts to plot the debate through the first century of the church's existence. Since Judaism* never practiced any form of female circumcision, the status of Jewish women* and female converts is outside the scope of this article.

1. Circumcision in Judaism
2. Paul: The Gospel of Uncircumcision
3. The Churches of the Evangelists
4. The Rest of the New Testament
5. The Epistle of Barnabas
6. Other Writings
7. The Flow of the Debate

1. Circumcision in Judaism.

It was well known in antiquity that the Jews were not the only group that circumcised, though it is not clear how widespread the practice was. Ancient authors include Arabs, Egyptians and some pagan priests (see e.g., Herodotus Hist. 2.104; Strabo Geog. 17.2.5; Josephus Ant. 8.260-63; Josephus Ag. Ap. 1.168-171; Philo Spec. Leg. 1.2; Barn. 9). Such evidence may be inaccurate. Yet it is equally clear that male circumcision was generally seen as one of the practices (others included food* laws and sabbath observance) that served to distinguish Jews so sharply from all around them (see Strabo Geog. 16.2.37; Horace Sermones 1.9.69-70; Petronius Sat. 102.13-14; Frag. 37; Martial Epig. 7.30, 35; Tacitus Hist. 5.5.2; Juvenal Sat. 14.96, 99, 101; Diodorus Bib. Hist. 1.28.3; Ptolemy Hist.; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.137).

For the Gentile* male who wanted to ally himself to Judaism there was a range of options, from mere interested outsider, through being a God-fearer who would adhere to various halakic regulations but not be circumcised, to full conversion as proselyte. For this last, circumcision was obligatory except in very special circumstances (Josephus Ant. 20.38).

It is clear, however, that many Jewish groups conceived of an eschatological* inclusion of Gentiles (Is 2:2-4 = Mic 4:1-3; Is 25:6) that they distinguished from conversion and hence without circumcision (see Fredriksen). Even before the eschaton, the category of "the righteous Gentile" under the so-called Noahic covenant* provided for the participation of the uncircumcised, to at least some extent, in the divine blessings* in the present age and in the age to come (details in de Lacey). It is noteworthy that two God-fearers (together with three proselytes) appear to have been members of the decany of the Jewish soup kitchen at Aphrodisias.

2. Paul: The Gospel of Uncircumcision.

When Gentiles first became accepted within the church, their status appears to have been left undefined. Luke suggests that the question of circumcision was not raised (Acts 10:47-48; 11:18); the later controversy indicates both that Gentile converts were in the main not circumcised and that no definitive decision had been taken on the question. Paul, working largely in isolation from Jerusalem, appears by the time of his second visit there to have worked out a definitive position on the issue (Gal 2:2: note the present tense of kērryssō, "I proclaim"). To him it is no longer a matter of indifference how Gentile converts are viewed: they are full members of the new Israel* of God* by which God is fulfilling his promises* (Rom 9—11). Hence any attempt to join the old alliance through circumcision is a betrayal (Gal 5:2-6). Whatever occurred at the first visit (Gal 1:18-19), it is clear that nothing Peter said can have excluded the development of such a theology.

Although Paul does seem at one point to deny the continuing validity of Torah observance even for Jewish Christians (Gal 3:23-28), he stops short of suggesting they should not continue to circumcise their children. His affirmation of the existence of two gospels (Gal 2:7) suggests he could have been happy with a Jewish church that continued to circumcise, provided that it never threatened the status of uncircumcised Gentile Christians. Nothing in the later statements on the law* in Romans suggests any change in this area of his thinking.

The details of the incident at Antioch* (Gal 2) are puzzlingly unclear. If the men from James* had been insisting on the circumcision of the Gentile Christians, we would expect Paul either to proclaim in triumph that their demand was rejected or to explain why it should have been fulfilled in Antioch but not in Galatia. Hence the "compulsion" (Gal 2:14) probably does not go so far as full proselyte conversion; it may have extended only to food laws or to a rigid apartheid between the circumcised and the uncircumcised. Paul carefully does not attribute to James a demand for the circumcision of Gentile converts. Nor does he categorize the debate as one between the strict and the lax or the weak and the strong: the point at issue is the proper interpretation of the plan of God and his Torah (see DPL, Circumcision).

3. The Churches of the Evangelists.

If traditions about Jesus (see Jesus Traditions) were preserved because among other things they were useful in establishing the self-identity of the Christian community, it is remarkable that no discussion about circumcision is found in the Gospels other than the brief reference in John 7:22-23, which hardly suggests that John's community was troubled about the issue. The negative attitude displayed in this Gospel to "the Jews" and their law (Jn 8:17; 10:34; 15:25) most naturally suggests that the Johannine church did not observe Torah and did not circumcise; but if so, these are no longer live issues. The schism that appears to have rent the Johannine church and that the three Johannine epistles address seems to have been unrelated to questions of Torah observance (see John, Letters of).

Matthew and Mark have no references to circumcision; Luke records the circumcision of John and Jesus but without comment. In Acts,* however, the issue is raised at several key points. Stephen* identifies the Abrahamic covenant as a "covenant of circumcision" (Acts 7:8; see Abraham); but when Cornelius* receives the Holy Spirit* the community rejoices that God has given even to the Gentiles the "repentance that leads to life" (Acts 11:18; see Repentance). There is no suggestion of a debate over whether they should be circumcised into the Abrahamic covenant.

Hence even before Acts 15 it is clear that for Luke the apostolic church acknowledged a circumcision-free gospel to Gentiles. All of the language of Acts 15 indicates that Luke himself has little sympathy for the circumcision party. He gives no indication of their arguments, still less a refutation of them. He describes the proponents of this position as being "of the sect of the Pharisees," a group that in general is given a bad press by Luke and people who are certainly not seen as leading lights in the church. We may conclude that for his church any debates over the issue of the circumcision of Gentiles had been long since won. The existence of a circumcision party, however, and also Paul's letters indicate that this was not universally so. To persuade even Barnabas to change his theology (Gal 2:13), the opponents must clearly have had some weighty arguments in their armory.

In Acts 16:1-3 Paul circumcises Timothy "because of the Jews." Luke does not give enough detail for us to decide whether he expects us to think of Timothy as essentially Jewish (Acts 16:1) or essentially Gentile (Acts 16:3); his status was at least ambivalent. The only reason for including this cameo, however, is to show that Paul did not reject circumcision outright; and this links with the final reference (Acts 21:21). Luke clearly wishes the reader to perceive that the report is false (Acts 21:24); his Paul lives in observance of the Torah. The model of the church that Luke intends to portray (cf. Brawley) is one in which Jewish and Gentile practice are clearly distinguished, even in Diaspora* churches. This seems very close to Paul's own position.

4. The Rest of the New Testament.

No other part of the NT refers directly to circumcision, and negative statements about Jews (e.g., Rev 2:9; 3:9) cannot safely be extrapolated to specific areas of belief or praxis. If the letter of James is a polemic against any form of Paulinism (whether true to Paul himself or not), it is remarkable that the issue of the status of circumcision is not even considered. This would seem to confirm the Lukan picture that, whatever their other differences, on this issue Paul was not perceived as rocking the Jewish Christian boat (see Jewish Christianity).

For all its interpretation of other parts of the Jewish liturgy, the epistle to the Hebrews* makes no attempt to spiritualize the act of circumcision, even when speaking of "baptisms" (Heb 6:2; 9:10), and the same is true of 1 Peter.* There cannot be said, therefore, to be any grounds in these writings for the later replacement theology by which apologists sought to explain the church's repudiation of the physical act in favor of baptism.*

5. The Epistle of Barnabas.

The *Epistle of Barnabas is important both for the exalted, perhaps canonical, status it enjoyed in parts of the early church and also for its unusual perspective on the rite of circumcision. The author denies emphatically in Barnabas 9 that physical circumcision was ever required by God and offers two arguments for his thesis. First, the only valid OT commands relate to the metaphorical circumcision of the ears or heart (he quotes Ps 18:44; Is 33:13; Jer 4:4; 7:2; Ps 34:11-12; Is 1:2, 10; 40:3; Jer 4:3; Deut 10:16; Jer 9:26). Second, physical circumcision is practiced by people manifestly outside the covenant of grace* (Barn. 9.6, though the evidence he gives is inaccurate). Only in the case of Abraham was physical circumcision of any value and then only to provide a "spiritual prevision" of Jesus. In the church that preserved and venerated this epistle, there was clearly no place for any continued act of circumcision, even for Jewish Christians. A similar attitude to the Jewish rite can also be found in the anonymous *Epistle to Diognetus (Diogn. 4.4). A Gentile, Pauline church is likely to have found this perspective attractive, though it is not Paul's.

6. Other Writings.

6.1. Polemical Opposition. Historical factors, in particular the Jewish wars of 66-73 and 135 and resulting imperial attitudes to Judaism, led quickly to the separation of the Jewish and Gentile churches.

To many in the latter, by the turn of the century Judaism and Christianity are already regarded as totally separate religions (see Christianity and Judaism), as may be seen from Aristides' Apologia and asides in Ignatius's* letters (e.g., Ign. Magn. 10.3; Ign. Phld. 6.1). At about the same time Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, provides the first link in a chain of development from Colossians 2:11 to the identification of baptism as "Christian circumcision," only for Justin the circumcision by which Gentiles are circumcised from their errors is achieved primarily by the words of the apostles* (Dial. Tryph. 114.4; cf. Dial. Tryph. 19.2-3; only in Dial. Tryph. 43.2 is it said to be "through" [dia] baptism).

There is a large body of Christian writing generically designated as Adversus Judaeos, "Against the Jews." It was important for the early apologists to indicate to their readers how Christianity differed from both Judaism and paganism, and it was necessary for Christians to wrestle with the status of Scriptures whose commands were no longer obeyed. But the rhetoric used in much of this material suggests another reason too: that for a long period church leaders perceived a real danger that their flocks might judaize. To such writers the approach of Barnabas provided one obvious weapon, though few went as far as he did in denying any validity of circumcision even under the old covenant. The link with baptism quickly becomes a truism; it is found particularly in John Chrysostom, whose constant warnings against circumcision, Jewish festivals and visits to the synagogue* suggest that the threat remained a real one well into the fifth century. The quartodeciman controversy over the date of Easter also indicates long-held Jewish attitudes.

The reason is not hard to seek; the church historians and apologists indicate the continuing existence of Christian groups that both affirmed the validity of literal circumcision and practiced it. Such groups are regarded by the writers as heretics and often as fools, and hence they have become effectively invisible to later historians. But their continued existence (to this day in the case of the Ethiopian church) indicates a viable form of Christianity that should not be ignored.

6.2. Judeo-Christianity. Shortly before A.D. 70, at the time of the Jewish war, the Jerusalem church emigrated to Pella (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.5.3; Epiphanius Haer. 1.330, 335), but after the dust had settled they returned (Epiphanius Weights 393-401; see Pella, Flight to). It was not until the Hadrianic ban (135) on Jews in the Holy City that the Jerusalem church had a Gentile bishop and presumably a Gentile constituency. However, it appears that a Jewish Christian group remained or perhaps subsequently returned and based itself on the original Christian center on Mount Zion. Even in the fourth century Gregory of Nyssa describes a city rent by sectarianism.

Syrian Christianity kept such traditions alive, and Bardesanes (c. 180-223) distinguishes his group from "the Christians of Judea" by the facts that they keep Sunday rather than sabbath (see Lord's Day) and do not circumcise (Dialogue of Destiny, Patrologia Syriaca 2.605). Ebionite* and Nazarene Christian groups (the latter of which Epiphanius locates in Pella, with the expatriate Jerusalemites) are also said to circumcise. Such groups were, however, quickly driven to the fringes by reason of their small size and geographical location (and possibly also their theological views: the heresiologists always attribute to them a very low christology,* though that may be mere rhetoric). It must have become increasingly difficult in this situation for Jewish Christians within what became the later orthodoxy to maintain their Jewish customs.

7. The Flow of the Debate.

It is clear that at the earliest stage of Gentile conversion to Christianity, uncircumcised Gentiles could be comfortably accommodated within a Torah-observant church, either on the model of the God-fearers in the synagogue or on that of the eschatological inclusion of Gentiles. It is equally clear that no definitive decision was made as to their status. This was, however, an essentially temporary state of affairs.

The incident at Antioch (Gal 2) indicates a clash of ideologies between Paul, working in relative isolation in predominantly Gentile churches, and the Jerusalem-based Jewish church, and it hints at differences within the latter. It is intrinsically likely that some members (Luke's "Pharisees") pressed for complete conformity to Torah by all Christians and that few Jewish Christians would see any grounds for ceasing their own observance. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.32) attributes to relatives of the Lord* himself (descendants of Jude, the Lord's brother; see Relatives of Jesus) presidency "of every church" in Trajan's reign, and if this is so they are likely to have encouraged Torah observance among Jewish Christians (see Bauckham). As the proportion of Gentiles increased, however, it is likely that the Jewish Christians increasingly saw their own position threatened. The social disruption and identity crisis caused by the war of 135 and the accompanying anti-Jewish atmosphere would have served further to isolate Jewish Christian communities that wished to maintain their traditional rites. With circumcision proscribed by the emperor* and the majority of the church opposing it, the development of a doctrine that saw it replaced by the church's own initiatory rite of baptism is not surprising.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CHURCH AS ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF GOD; EBIONITES; GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Bagatti, The Church from the Circumcision: History and Archaeology of the Judeo-Christians (Jerusalem: Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, 1971); R. J. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990); R. L. Brawley, Luke-Acts and the Jews (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987); D. de Lacey, "The Law and the Gentiles: A Rationale for Paul," TynB 48 (1997); P. Fredriksen, "Judaism, the Circumcision of Gentiles and Apocalyptic Hope: Another Look at Galatians 1 and 2," JTS 42 (1991) 532-64; L. L. Grabbe, Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian, 2: The Roman Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); A. F. J. Klijn and G. J.

Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); G. Lüdemann, Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); F. Manns, Bibliographie de Judeo-Christianisme (Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press, 1979); W. A. Meeks and R. L. Wilken, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); S. Pines, The Jewish Christians of the Early Centuries of Christianity According to a New Source (Jerusalem: Central Press, 1966); R. A. Pritz, Nazarene Jewish Christianity: From the End of the New Testament Period Until its Disappearance in the Fourth Century (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1988); J. Reynolds and R. F. Tannenbaum, Jews and God-fearers at Aphrodisias: Greek Inscriptions with Commentary (Cambridge: Cambridge Philological Society, 1987); H. Schreckenberg, Die Christlichen Adversus Judaeos-Texte und ihr Literarisches und Historisches Umfeld (1.-11. Jh) (3d ed.; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1995); M. Stern, Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism (3 vols.; Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Science and Humanities, 1980-84); J. E. Taylor, Christians and the Holy Places: The Myth of Jewish Christian Origins (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993). D. R. de Lacey

CITY. See HEAVEN.

CIVIC CULT. See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

CIVIL AUTHORITY

Civil authority is the centralized and recognized control in human society with the power* to formulate and enforce the basic, formal rules of that society. The early church manifested the extreme range of attitudes toward government found in Hellenistic Judaism,* namely, from flattery to hatred of the ruler (e.g., Philo Jos. 243; Philo Som. 2.91-2). The affirmation of the order required by government is grounded in a distinction of the church from the world,* which provides a potential basis for critical judgment of government.

1. Responsibility to Social Institutions
2. The Freedom of Belonging Elsewhere
3. The Ordering of Evil

1. Responsibility to Social Institutions.

First Peter* presents respect for civil authority as an aspect of a general recognition of the positive claims of society. "Be subordinate to 'every fundamental social institution' " (1 Pet 2:13, translation by Selwyn). In the context, as in Romans 13 (with which it likely shared a common tradition), this is not a grudging coexistence with evil but a recognition that the basic structures of society function as instruments for good (although this is not stated as strongly as in Rom 13:3-4). The emperor* is to be "honored" (1 Pet 2:17). Civil authorities at all levels are included in this command; 1 Peter specifically mentions the governor as representing the emperor. The authorities' function, stated through an ancient Greco-Roman formula for the essence of authority, is the maintenance of order and the securing of justice in society by punishment of those who do evil and praise of those who do good (1 Pet 2:14; cf. Rom 13:4).

The local authorities are significant in Acts.* The role of government in the persecution* of Paul came from them (Acts 24:1-8; 16:22-24; cf. 1 Thess 2:2). The severe punishments in 2 Corinthians 11:25 may be cases of civil authorities disregarding the limits of their authority.* Paul, however, is shown more commonly to have found civil authority as a source of deliverance (Acts 23:10). He appeals to his rights as a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37; 21:39; 22:25; 25:10-12, 25). Similarly the persecutions referred to in 1 Peter (1 Pet 1:6; 3:13-14; 4:4, 12-16; 5:9-10) appear to be initiated less by official condemnation than by social groups threatened by the separate and peculiar behavior of the Christians.

The call in 1 Peter 2:13 to responsibility within the institutions of society is represented by the initial imperative, "be subordinate." Hypotassō, an important term in 1 Peter's instructions for the basic relationships of the household* (1 Pet 2:18; 3:1, 5; 5:5), should be distinguished from a blanket command of unthinking obedience.* Rather it is a call to order, a call to responsibility within the basic arrangements of social life—in this case those of the institution of government. Diognetus (see Diognetus, Epistle to) interprets the Christians' participation in the broader society as God's* having placed them in their posts (taxis, Diogn. 6.10).

In these types of texts the early church is an expression of the aspect of Hellenistic Judaism, which was friendly to Roman authority. 1 Clement 60.4—61.2 is part of a prayer* that shows strongly Jewish origins (see Clement of Rome).

Even more than Romans 13, it presents the civil authorities as lieutenants of God.

2. The Freedom of Belonging Elsewhere.
In contrast to Romans 13 and 1 Clement 60—61, 1 Peter does not present the civil authorities as subordinate officers representing God. God is carefully distinguished from the emperor. One "loves" the family of believers, one "fears" God, but one only "honors" the emperor, the same response that is due "everyone" (1 Pet 2:17). This appears to be a modification of Proverbs 24:21, where God and the king appear to be on a similar level of authority: both are to be feared. The motivation is that Christ* may be honored in the pure conduct of believers' lives and that criticism may be dispelled (1 Pet 2:12-13, 15). One should note that in 1 Clement, the strongest statement in this literature of the rulers' relationship to God, there still is a qualifier: in nothing are they to resist God's will (1 Clem. 61.1). The Martyrdom of Polycarp, while restating the obligation to honor rulers as instituted by God, qualifies the honor: "as is fitting" (prosēkon, Mart. Pol. 10.2).

For Ignatius* (Ign. Smyrn. 4.2), Polycarp* (Pol. Phil. 8.2—9.2) and Diognetus (Diogn. 5.11-17) persecution is part of normal Christian experience. Ignatius wrote his letters as he traveled to meet death, condemned by Roman authority. His passion for martyrdom* and fear of its being prevented (Ign. Rom.) preserved the motif of discipleship of the earliest Christian faith. It provides a reserve of independence from the state in the context of submission to it. Polycarp also refused to flee (Mart. Pol. 5.1; 6.1; 7.1). The prayers for the persecuting authorities (Ign. Eph. 10.1-2; Ign. Rom. 5.1; Pol. Phil. 12.3) and readiness to appear in court, answer questions and plead their cause (e.g., Mart. Pol. 10.2) manifest a freedom* even in submission.

1 Peter places the tradition that it shares with Romans 13 in the context of the church as a separate people. The sojourning character of the priestly and royal people chosen by God does not mean a separation from a morally praiseworthy life in the context of social institutions (1 Pet 2:9-17). The tradition that Paul used to ward off an antinomian pulling out from social responsibilities is used in 1 Peter to prevent irresponsible applications of the image of being strangers. "[Subordinate yourselves] as free persons—not to use your freedom as a covering for vice but as slaves of God" (1 Pet 2:16). Believers are free as sojourners, but as slaves* of God they are sent back into the community as different persons. Those who belong to God must bear their share of community responsibility.

Diognetus used the motif of the church's sojourning existence to note the contribution Christians made to their host communities. They obey the laws of every foreign country; but as those who have another homeland, they "outdo the laws" in loving and forgiving acts, despite the persecutions, which also are the marks of their foreign distinctiveness (Diogn. 5). Hermas Similitudes 1, however, played heavily upon the separate character of the Christian's sojourning (see Hermas, Shepherd of). The law of the Christian's city ("your city") differs from that of the city ("this city") of the strange country in which he or she lives. The Christians will be rejected for following their own law; thus to be consistent they should avoid the accumulation of many possessions.

When Peter and the apostles* claim, "It is necessary to obey God rather than people" (Acts 5:29), they are resisting a civil authority, even if they are doing it openly, thereby accepting the consequences. The civil authority faced by the early church included local magistrates to whom Rome delegated responsibility for internal legal affairs (see Roman Empire). The Sanhedrin was not, as has been frequently claimed, only a religious versus a civil authority. The local rule in Judea included the high priest* and the Sanhedrin. The high priests' legal authority had been affirmed by Julius Caesar (Josephus Ant. 14.10.6 §208; cf. 1 Macc 15:21). Acts describes the Sanhedrin as "the senate (gerousia) of the children of Israel" (Acts 5:21), and Peter addresses it as "the rulers [archontes; cf. Acts 23:5] of the people" (Acts 4:8).

Peter's words literally read, "To obey God is more of an obligation than to obey people." The basic duty to submit to human authority is acknowledged, but also recognized is the authorities' capacity of rebellion against God (see also Acts 5:30-33; 7:51-53). Peter brings a new element to the tension by asserting concrete claims of God that transcend the demands of civil authority.

3. The Ordering of Evil.
The Revelation of John (see Revelation, Book of) reflects vividly the critical alternative in the evaluation of government in Hellenistic Judaism. By means of apocalyptic* imagery, Roman government is presented in the most negative theological perspective. The dragon (see Beasts), which is Satan* (Rev 12:9), bestows its power and authority upon the beast (an imperial priesthood), which comes out of the sea, indicating its own demonic character (cf. Dan 7:3; Rev 11:7; Barn. 4.4-5). It functions as an imperial power, attacking the church and receiving universal worship* (Rev 13:7-8). This demonic power is also visualized as Babylon,* and its seven heads represent seven mountains, identifying it with Rome,* which for centuries had been described and celebrated as the city of seven hills (Rev 17:5, 9; cf., e.g., Vergil Georg. 2.535; Suetonius Domitian 4.5). Nothing is said of political loyalty or submission.

The book of Revelation confronts a situation in which a distorted theology encouraged some people in the churches to think that they could rise above their social world through privileged knowledge and advanced powers (Rev 2:24). Without moral consequences they now could eat meat offered to idols (see Idolatry), ignore moral restrictions (Rev 2:14, 20) and acknowledge the ruler as an object of worship (Rev 2:13; 13:16).

This accommodating spirit is addressed forcefully by the dualistic imagery of apocalyptic thought. Life is sharply divided between allegiance to God or Satan. A cosmic battle is being waged that involves idols, sexual conduct, economic trade and political rule. The cosmic powers are unmasked to reveal the battle being waged between Satan and Christ, which incorporates human political and moral choices. The Revelation of John is more explicit than Paul on the political aspects of the cosmic powers (see DPL, Civil Authority, Ethics, Principalities and Powers).

Ethical* and political struggles thus have a universal dimension, opening the door for a more radical, more sweeping solution. Rome combines in itself all four beasts of Daniel 7:3-8 (Rev 13:1-2). It is a paradigm of the whole history of human organized evil—political, religious and economic—including Rome's predecessors and its successors. The answer is tied to the outcome of human history itself and to salvation* in its most comprehensive sense, in another reign whose coming is the source of the believers' hopes.*

Some interpreters would discount the opposition to government in Revelation as prompted only by religious persecution. This objection misses the economic critique of the authorities as well as the interlocking of the religious, moral and economic aspects of the state's power. Economic exploitation, particularly through accumulation of luxury items, is characteristic of the whole system of imperial power, which is about to be doomed under the judgment of God (Rev 18:3, 7, 9). The lavish commerce is described as "engaging in prostitution" with Rome (Rev 18:3, 9), quoting Isaiah 23:17, where prostitution is a metaphor for economic rather than sexual activity. Addressing a rural situation, James* also connects economic oppression (katadynasteuō, common in this regard in LXX) with legal persecution (Jas 2:6). The Two Ways tradition in Didache 5.2 and Barnabas 20.2 condemns judges of the poor who disobey the law and are advocates for the rich (see Riches; Didache; Barnabas, Epistle of).

The deepest theological issue in the book of Revelation is power. In contrast to the false claims of human authorities, the most prominent title of God is pantokratōr, "Almighty" (Rev 1:8 and nine other uses). God's throne, symbolic of God's rule, appears in all but five chapters. Against the oppressive power of the state there exists God's power. Christ is already "ruler of the monarchs of the earth" (Rev 1:9). The revelation* about the beast is not to identify the oppressors but to disclose what is going to happen to them in God's anticipated action. The beast will pass away and go into perdition (Rev 17:8, 11). The apocalyptic dualism not only calls forth moral, political and religious seriousness; it also provides ultimate hope to those suffering* because of their faithful response.

The tension regarding civil authority in the NT was important for the succeeding generations. When the church from Justin Martyr onward had to take on itself new political and social tasks, its identity was preserved because of the NT. The church was able to engage in political tasks even as it pointed to a transcending loyalty and destiny grounded in the reign of God rather than the kingdoms of this world (see Kingdom of God).

See also AUTHORITY; EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT; ETHICS; PERSECUTION; ROMAN EMPIRE, CHRISTIANS AND THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, "The Fallen City: Revelation 18" in The Bible in Politics (Louisville: Westminster, 1989) 85-102; A. A. Boesak, Comfort and Protest: Reflections on the Apocalypse of John of Patmos (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); N. Brox, "Hinnahme des Bestehenden: Zur 'Stattstheologie' des Neuen Testaments," BK 26 (1971) 47-50; C. J. Cadoux, The Early Church and the World: A History of the Christian Attitude to Pagan Society and the State Down to the Time of Constantinus (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1925); H. von Campenhausen, "Church and State in the Light of the New Testament" in Biblical Authority for Today, ed. A. Richardson and W. Schweitzer (London: SCM, 1951) 293-309; N. Larn, "The Church of the Apostles and Secular Authority," AER 112 (1945) 110-18; S. Légasse, "La soumission aux autorités d'après 1 Pierre 2:13-17: Version spécifique d'une parénèse traditionelle," NTS 34 (1988) 378-96; A. Lindemann, "Christliche Gemeinden und das römische Reich im ersten und zweiten Jahrhundert," WD 18 (1985) 105-33; R. Lugo Rodríguez, "El verbo hypotassein y la parénesis social de 1 Pet 2:11-17," Efemerides Mexicana 9 (1991) 557-70; P. U. Maynard-Reid, Poverty and Wealth in James (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1987); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, "Apocalyptic and Gnosis in Revelation and in Paul," JBL 92 (1973) 565-81; idem, Revelation: Vision of a Just World (PC; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1992); E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981 [1947]); C. R. Smith, "Reclaiming the Social Justice Message of Revelation: Materialism, Imperialism and Divine Judgment in Revelation 18," Transformation 7,4 (October/December 1990) 28-33; W. C. van Unnik, "Lob und Strafe durch die Obrigkeit: Hellenistisches zu Röm 13:3-4" in Jesus und Paulus, ed. E. E. Ellis and E. Grässer (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975) 334-43.

S. C. Mott

CLAUDIUS, EDICT OF. See HEBREWS.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. See PURITY AND IMPURITY.

1 CLEMENT. See CLEMENT OF ROME.

2 CLEMENT. See CLEMENT OF ROME.

CLEMENT OF ROME

A late first-century Roman Christian leader, likely responsible for the document known as 1 Clement, to whom also are (wrongly) attributed several other documents.

1. Clement of Rome
2. 1 Clement
3. 2 Clement
4. Other Clementine Writings

1. Clement of Rome.

Clement of Rome was a key leader of the Roman* church during the last decade of the first century. A late romance (the Pseudo-Clementines) describing him as a noble Roman citizen connected with the family of the Caesars who was baptized and discipled by Peter is wholly legendary. On the basis of literary and archeological evidence, Lightfoot hypothesizes that he was a freedman of the household of the emperor's cousin, the consul Titus Flavius Clemens (Lightfoot, 1.25-63). The claim by Irenaeus (Haer. 3.3.3) that Clement was the third bishop of Rome after Peter may be correct with regard to the sequence, but misleading with regard to the office, because the position of monarchical bishop, in the sense intended by Irenaeus, does not appear to have existed in Rome at this time. Instead, leadership seems to have been entrusted to a group of presbyters or bishops (the two terms appear to be synonymous in 1 Clement; see 1 Clem. 44.1-6), among whom Clement almost certainly was a (if not the) leading figure (see Church Order, Government). It is possible that he is the Clement mentioned in the *Shepherd of Hermas (Vis. 2.4.3 [8.3]), in which case he functioned as the corresponding secretary of the Roman church. Origen's claim that he is the Clement mentioned in Philippians 4:3 (Commentary on John 6.36; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.4.9; 3.15.1) is an unlikely conjecture at best. Nothing is known about his background (Jewish? pagan?) or age.

2. 1 Clement.

The document known as 1 Clement is a late first-century A.D. letter sent from the church in Rome to the church in Corinth.

2.1. Occasion and Purpose. The letter was written in response to a report (1 Clem. 47.7) of trouble in Corinth. Apparently some of the younger men in the congregation had provoked a revolt (this is the Roman view; the younger men no doubt defended their action in different and more positive terms) and succeeded in deposing the established leadership of the church (1 Clem. 3.3; 44.6; 47.6). When news of this reached Rome (1 Clem. 47.7), the leaders of the congregation there were sufficiently distressed by this breach of proper conduct and order and the damage it inflicted upon the reputation of the Corinthian church (1 Clem. 1.1; cf. 39.1) that they took it upon themselves to write this letter and to dispatch mediators (1 Clem. 63.3; 65.1) in an effort to restore peace and harmony to the Corinthian congregation. Because details regarding the uprising are unavailable or not clear (due to restrictions imposed by the genre; cf. 2.4 below), the real point of the dispute cannot be discerned; suggestions—for example, that it was a struggle between "Spirit and Order" (Campenhausen, 86), or heresy and orthodoxy (Bauer, 96-104), or involved finances (Welborn 1992, 1059) or a conflict between house churches (Maier)—must remain hypotheses.

The motivation of those responsible ("the 'social elite' of the Roman congregations" [Jeffers, 195]) in acting on their own initiative is much debated. Is the document an expression of disinterested fraternal authority (Jaubert), or of a will to power (Bauer, 97; Welborn 1992, 1059), or a service of love in the interest of the unity of the church (Lietzmann, in Bauer, 96)? The answer often appears to depend on the modern reader's ecclesiastical sympathies and estimation of human nature. Analysis from a sociological perspective, which suggests that Clement was attempting to legitimate a certain pattern of institutional leadership (Maier), though still tentative, is promising.

*2.2. Date. Reading the "misfortunes and reversals" (1 Clem. 1.1) of the Roman church as an allusion to recent persecution,* most date the letter c. 95-97, the last years of Domitian or the first of Nerva. Suggestions of 69 or 70 (e.g., Wilhelm-Hooijbergh) have not proven persuasive; the Neronian persecutions are an event of the past (1 Clem. 5—6) and passages like 1 Clem. 44.3-5 and 63.3 seem to require a date subsequent to the late 60s. Correctly noting that the rhetorical language of 1 Clement 1.1 may not in fact refer to persecution, Welborn (1984, 37-40; 1992, 1060) would not allow greater precision than sometime between 80 and 140, but the use of the letter by Polycarp* of Smyrna establishes an upper limit of c. 120. If Clement is the writer, the range may be narrowed to the 90s.

*2.3. Authorship. The letter does not identify who wrote it. While it was sent on behalf of the entire church (so the subscription in the Coptic version), the unity of style suggests a single writer (Jaubert, 90), whom the earliest witnesses, Dionysius and Hegesippus (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23.11; 3.16; 4.22.1), and most manuscripts identify as Clement of Rome.

*2.4. Literary and Rhetorical Aspects. In 1 Clement 58.2 the readers are asked to "accept our advice" (symboulē), indicating that the document was intended as a symbouleutic (i.e., advisory), or deliberative letter, a category widely discussed by ancient rhetoricians and to which 1 Clement closely conforms (van Unnik 1975, 11; Welborn 1984, 44-48; 1992, 1058; see Letters). The "appeal for peace and concord" (1 Clem. 63.2) indicates the theme of the letter, one very much in keeping with contemporary examples, which often sought to resolve stasis, "revolt" or "dissension" (1 Clem. 1.1, 63.1; the term is used a total of nine times) by an appeal to homonoia, "concord" (used fourteen times in the letter). Since the purpose of such a work was to persuade or advise about a future course of action, narrative was intentionally kept to a minimum (this accounts for sparsity of details about the specific problems in Corinth). As in secular examples, the writer assigns blame (jealousy is a key problem, 1 Clem. 3.4—6.4), warns about the consequences of wrong behavior (e.g., 1 Clem. 46.7-9), extols the benefits of the recommended course of action (e.g., 1 Clem. 48.1-4), and makes extensive use of examples (some of which, such as the phoenix [1 Clem. 25] or the theme of cosmic harmony [1 Clem. 20], are the standard stuff of secular rhetoric*).

*2.5. Principal Sources. It seems clear that secular concepts and forms have deeply imbued the letter. Before we draw any conclusions regarding the extent or depth of such influence, it will be useful to survey the question of sources more thoroughly.

2.5.1. Old Testament. The "Scriptures, which are true, which were given by the Holy Spirit" (1 Clem. 45.2) are a major authority for Clement; in functional terms, this means the Septuagint (including the deutero-canonical books; pseudepigraphal and/or unidentified sources [1 Clem. 8.3; 17.6; 23.3-4; 46.2; 29.3?] are also quoted.). In particular Clement finds in the Scriptures rules and models for conduct, to the extent that

Christian behavior is in many respects indistinguishable from traditional Jewish piety (Hagner, 125). There are also prophecies about Jesus (e.g., 1 Clem. 16.2b-17; 36.3-5) and typological predictions, not only of Jesus (e.g., 1 Clem. 12.7) but also early church order and offices (1 Clem. 42.5, citing Is 60:17 [LXX]; see Old Testament in the Apostolic Fathers).

2.5.2. Words of Jesus. Sayings of Jesus comprise a second source of authority. Interestingly, Clement considers parts of the OT to have been spoken by Jesus (e.g., 1 Clem. 22.1-8; 16.15-16). At least as important, however, are the teachings of Jesus during his earthly ministry, which Clement can quote at length (e.g., 1 Clem. 13.1b-2; 46.7b-8; see Jesus Traditions). He seems to have known them via collections (either oral or written) shaped by catechetical interests; dependence on written Gospels cannot be demonstrated (Hagner; Koester, 291).

2.5.3. Early Christian Writings and Traditions. Early Christian tradition, in a variety of forms,was a third source of authority. Clement, who makes explicit reference to 1 Corinthians (1 Clem. 47.1-4), probably had a collection of Pauline letters (estimates of its size range from four to ten); he also knew Hebrews, and possibly Acts, James and/or 1 Peter (there is no indication that he viewed any of the above as "Scripture"; see Canon). The lives of the apostles* and others, especially Peter and Paul (1 Clem. 5.3-7), offer paradigmatic examples of proper Christian behavior and endurance. Traditional paraenetic material, including catalogs of virtues* (1 Clem. 62.2; 64) or vices (1 Clem. 30.1; 35.5b) and "household codes"* (1 Clem. 1.3; 21.6-8) have also been utilized freely, and liturgical* elements, including trinitarian formulae (1 Clem. 46.6; 58.2), doxologies (e.g., 1 Clem. 20.12; 43.6b; 45.7b-8; 64) and prayers* (see especially 1 Clem. 59.2—61.3), have been incorporated.

2.5.4. Secular. In addition to scriptural and Christian sources of authority, Clement in the same manner also utilizes secular sources. The legend of the phoenix (1 Clem. 25.1-5) is a source of divine revelation (1 Clem. 26.1); the portrait of cosmic harmony (1 Clem. 20.1-12) is largely of Stoic origins; and in 1 Clement 37.1-3 the Roman army (a favorite topic of the Stoics) offers, no less than OT heroes or an earlier generation of believers, a model of proper Christian behavior. Moreover, the points drawn from this last example—the mutual dependency of great and small, and the advantages of synkrasis, "blending" (1 Clem. 37.4)—are commonplaces of Greek philosophy. Even the metaphor of the body (1 Clem. 37.5), which Paul also uses, leads to a conclusion—"everything breathes [synpnei] together"—that reflects a Stoic cosmology* (Sanders, 82-91; Jaeger, 19-23), and the portrait of Peter* and Paul* (1 Clem. 5.3-7) is shaped in light of the ideal of the philosopher-athlete (Sanders, 30-31).

2.6. The Christianity of Clement and Greco-Roman Culture. The extent to which Clement draws upon secular sources and the level of authority with which he invests them raises a fundamental question: are these elements part of the circumstantial means by which he expressed or illustrated his understanding of Christianity (van Unnik 1975, 11; cf. Jaubert), or have they been shaped on a deeper level and become part of that understanding (Welborn 1992, 1057)?

At times it seems to be a matter of the former. The phoenix, for example, is largely used as an apologetic device on behalf of a fundamentally Christian understanding of the resurrection,* and the military imagery is not without OT and Jewish parallels (Jaubert, 79-80). Moreover, however Stoic the context of 1 Clement 20, it is not without Jewish parallels, and more importantly, whereas in Stoic use it is employed from an anthropocentric perspective, Clement's point of view is fundamentally theocentric (van Unnik 1950, 184).

But at other points it appears that Clement's Christianity is not merely illustrated but fundamentally shaped by Greco-Roman categories and conceptions. His central theme of "concord," for example, was a popular but non-scriptural norm which, moreover, closely coincided with the imperial interests of the Roman* state (and Corinth, it will be remembered, was a Roman colony). Whereas Paul had mocked the imperial slogan of "peace and security" (1 Thess 5:3), Clement makes it his central concern; indeed, he has been charged with buying wholesale into the imperial ideology and propaganda (Welborn 1992, 1059; see Roman Empire).

One may also note instances where Clement imports his agenda into scriptural texts (Derrett, 670). He finds "concord" in the Ark (1 Clem. 9.4), while Lot's wife became salt because she lacked "concord" (1 Clem. 11.2). At 1 Clement 48.2-4 a key point, "without confusion," is not in the text quoted, while in 1 Clement 60.2 there is the significant addition, "and in the sight of our rulers." The scriptural citation in 1 Clement 50.6 does mention forgiveness,* but not forgiveness "through love" (1 Clem. 50.5), which Clement has just defined as the opposite of factionalism (1 Clem. 50.2, 49.5 [a tendentious expansion of 1 Cor 13]).

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that at some points Clement has shaped his Christianity to fit his cultural values. This is not at all to say that he is not deeply Christian, for he is, and his Christianity shines throughout the letter. But it is a Christianity of a specific sort. The largely undeveloped christology, utilizing intertestamental categories more than NT ones, presents the ministry and death* of Jesus more as confirmation of God's constancy than as signs of an inbreaking kingdom*; resurrection* is a future event, not a present reality (Bumpus, 173-83). There is little mention of the inbreaking of a new age, which might threaten the present one; in short, it is a largely non-apocalyptic* Christianity that poses no threat to the present Roman social order and its values. It is hard to imagine Clement coming into conflict with the Roman authorities as did Jesus or getting arrested with Paul; he seems far more comfortable with 1 Corinthians 14:40 (whose wording he cites) than 1 Thessalonians 5:19 (see Civil Authority; Worship).

*2.7. Later Influence. 1 Clement was still being read in Corinth a half century later, and, according to Eusebius, was read in many churches in his day (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23; 3.16). It was held in high regard by later writers (Polycarp of Smyrna used it extensively as early as c. 120), and Clement of Alexandria cites it as Scripture. It is found in some copies of the NT: in the fifth-century Codex Alexandrinus it stands (with 2 Clement) right after Revelation, and in a Syriac manuscript the two letters are found after the catholic letters (which is how 1 Clement is explicitly described) and before the Pauline letters. A Latin translation was made early on, and later Syriac and Coptic versions appeared. A late fourth-century Syrian work, the Apostolic Canons, lists 1 Clement and 2 Clement as part of the NT, and at about the same time in Alexandria Didymus the Blind appears to have counted 1 Clement as part of his canon. But despite the popularity of this document in antiquity, only two Greek manuscripts have survived, the only complete one not being discovered until 1873.

Modern discussion has often been shaped by questions extrinsic to the document. Arguments about Roman primacy on the basis of the letter, for example, are undercut by the document itself: Rome's uninvited intervention in Corinth's affairs and its strong disciplinary recommendations (e.g., exile, 1 Clem. 54.2) notwithstanding, the letter does not command, but can only attempt to persuade. And while the letter does offer apparently the earliest reference to the laity as a distinct and separate category (1 Clem. 40.5), it offers no evidence of a monarchical episcopate, let alone one to which other churches deferred.

3. 2 Clement.

The so-called second letter of Clement is not a letter, nor is it by Clement. It is, in fact, a mid-second century sermon or "word of exhortation" by an anonymous presbyter (2 Clem. 17.3), the oldest complete Christian sermon that has survived. Based upon a text from Isaiah (Is 54:1; see 2 Clem. 2.1), it presents an exhortation to repentance, purity and steadfastness in the face of persecution. The reader (2 Clem. 19.1), addressing a primarily Gentile congregation (2 Clem. 1.6; 3.1), may be reacting to gnostic* influences (2 Clem. 10.5; cf. the stress on the deity of Jesus [2 Clem. 1.1] and the resurrection and judgment* [2 Clem. 9.1-5]). It is often characterized as displaying a domesticated Synoptic Gospels type of piety.

*3.1. Use of Early Christian Writings. The author makes use of a wide range of writings in seeking to persuade his listeners. In addition to the Scriptures, which he occasionally cites by name (Isaiah, 2 Clem. 3.5; Ezekiel, 2 Clem. 6.8), and an apocryphal book (2 Clem. 11.2-4), he certainly knew and used Matthew, Luke, 1 Corinthians and Ephesians, and may have known Hebrews, James and 1 Peter. 2 Clement 2.4 appears to be the earliest instance of a NT passage being quoted as "Scripture." At least four of the quoted sayings of Jesus (out of a total of at least nine) do not occur in the canonical Gospels; one of these (2 Clem. 12.2) best preserves a saying also found in the *Gospel of Thomas (saying 22) and the Gospel of the Egyptians (Baarda; see Jesus Traditions).

3.2. Occasion and Date. It is puzzling that although the sermon was deemed worthy of preservation, nothing is known with any certainty about its author, date or occasion. Suggestions regarding its date and place of origin include the following: (1) From Rome, perhaps around A.D. 100; (2) the lost letter of Bishop Soter of Rome mentioned by Bishop Dionysius of Corinth (c. 170; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23.9-11); (3) Alexandria* sometime before the middle of the second century "fits the temper and tone" of the sermon, particularly in light of its "semi-gnostic phrases" and its use of the Gospel of the Egyptians (Richardson, 186-87); (4) 2 Clement 7.1, people "coming to enter the contests," without any reference to location, implies that the speaker was near the location of the contests, in this case Corinth, the site of the well-known Isthmian games, perhaps c. 120-140 (Lightfoot, 2.194-208); (5) a hortatory address preached to the Corinthian congregation by one of the previously deposed but now re-instated elders on the occasion of the successful resolution of its crisis following the arrival of 1 Clement, c. 98-100 (Donfried, 1-48); (6) an anti-Gnostic* sermon from Egypt prior to the middle of the second century, possibly "the first tangible evidence for the existence of anti-gnostic Christianity in Egypt before the middle of II CE" (Koester). It is clear that the date and occasion of 2 Clement remain open questions.

4. Other Clementine Writings.

A number of writings falsely attributed to Clement of Rome have survived. These include, in addition to 2 Clement, two letters on virginity and the Apostolic Constitutions. Clement is the subject of a third-century romance, known as the Pseudo-Clementines (extant in two forms: the Clementine Homilies and the Clementine Recognitions), and a fourth-century martyrdom.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; ROME, ROMAN CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Texts and Translations: J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings, ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992). Commentaries and/or Editions: M. Grant and H. H. Graham, First and Second Clement (The Apostolic Fathers 2; New York: Nelson, 1965); A. Jaubert, Clément de Rome: Epître aux Corinthiens (SC 167; Paris: Cerf, 1971); J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, Part I: S. Clement of Rome (2d ed.; 2 vols.; London: Macmillan, 1890); A. Lindemann, Die Clemensbriefe (HNT 17; Die Apostolischen Väter 1; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Siebeck], 1992). Studies in 1 Clement: W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, ed. R. A. Kraft and G. Krodel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); H. B. Bumpus, The Christological Awareness of Clement of Rome and Its Sources (Cambridge, MA: University Press of Cambridge, 1972); H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1969); J. D. M. Derrett, "Scripture and Norms in the Apostolic Fathers," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 649-99; J. Fuellenbach, Ecclesiastical Office and the Primacy of Rome: An Evaluation of Recent Theological Discussion of First Clement (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1980); D. A. Hagner, The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome (NovTSup 34; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); W. Jaeger, Early Christianity and Greek Paideia (Cambridge, MA: Belknap, 1961); J. S. Jeffers, Conflict at Rome: Social Order and Hierarchy in Early Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); O. B. Knoch, "Im Namen des Petrus und Paulus: Der brief des Clemens Romanus und die Eigenart des römischen Christentums," ANRW II.27.1 (1993) 3-54; H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament, Vol. 2: History and Literature of Early Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); H. O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius (Waterloo, Ont.: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1991); E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, Book 1: The First Ecclesiastical Writers (NGS 5/1; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990); L. Sanders, L'Hellénisme de Saint Clément de Rome et le Paulinisme (SH 2; Louvain, 1943); W. C. van Unnik, "First Century A.D. Literary Culture and Early Christian Literature" in Center for Hermeneutical Studies in Hellenistic and Modern Culture Protocol Series 1 (Berkeley, CA: Center for Hermeneutical Studies in Hellenistic and Modern Culture, 1975); W. C. van Unnik, "Is 1 Clement 20 Purely Stoic?," VC 4 (1950) 181-89 (= Sparsa Collecta, vol. 3 [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1983] 52-58); L. L. Welborn, "Clement, First Epistle of," ABD 1:1055-60; idem, "On the Date of First Clement, BR 29 (1984) 35-53; A. E. Wilhelm-Hooijberg, "A Different View of Clemens Romanus," HeyJ 16 (1975) 266-88. Studies in 2 Clement: T. Baarda, "2 Clement 12 and the Sayings of Jesus" in Logia; Les Paroles de Jésus—The Sayings of Jesus, ed. J. Delobel (BETL 59; Leuven: Leuven University Press and Peeters, 1982) 529-56; E. Baasland, "Der 2. Klemensbrief und frühchristliche Rhetorik: 'Die erste christliche Predigt' im Lichte der neueren Forschung," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 78-157; K. P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity (NovTSup 38; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974); H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament, Vol. 2: History and Literature of Early Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, Book 2: The Later Christian Writings (NGS 5/2; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990); C. C. Richardson, "An Anonymous Sermon, Commonly Called Clement's Second Letter" in Early Christian Fathers, ed. C. C. Richardson (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1953; repr. Macmillan, 1970) 183-202. Studies in Other Clementine Writings: O. Cullmann, Le Problème littéraire et historique du roman pseudo-clémentin: Étude sur le rapport entre le gnosticisme et le judéo-christianisme (EHPhR 23; Paris: Libraire Félix Alcan, 1930); F. Stanley Jones, "Clementines, Pseudo-," ABD 1.1061-62.

M. W. Holmes

CLEMENTINE LITERATURE.

See CLEMENT OF ROME.

COMMANDMENTS

This article will focus upon the word commandment or commandments (sing. entolē) in 1 and 2 John (see John, Letters of). A few texts in which the term is found elsewhere in Hebrews—Revelation and the apostolic fathers* will also be noted. Texts in which a commandment from the OT law* is cited will also be consulted.

1. 1 and 2 John
2. Revelation and Other Epistles
3. Apostolic Fathers

1. 1 and 2 John.

1.1. The Importance of Commandments. The word commandment (entolē) is featured prominently in both 1 John and 2 John (1 Jn 2:3, 4, 7, 8; 3:22, 23, 24; 4:21; 5:2-3; 2 Jn 4, 5, 6), and in every case it appears that the commandments of God* rather than Jesus are intended (see esp. 1 Jn 5:2-3; 2 Jn 4). John teaches that those who truly know God keep his commandments (1 Jn 2:3-4). Another way of articulating the same thought is that those who abide in God keep his commands (1 Jn 3:24; cf. Jn 15:10). Because believers keep his commandments, God answers their prayers* (1 Jn 3:23). This does not mean that believers keep God's commands perfectly, for John has already stated that all believers still sin* (1 Jn 1:6—2:2). John's absolute language about believers not sinning is difficult to interpret (see 1 Jn 3:4-10), presumably because his words are a response to proto-gnostic* secessionists (cf. 1 Jn 2:19) who claimed to be free from sin. Our partial knowledge of the secessionists' teaching prevents us from fully understanding John's teaching on sin. Most likely John's intention is to say that believers are no longer under the domination and tyranny of sin, even though they still sin (1 Jn 1:6—2:2).

1.2. The Content of the Commandments. What is the content of the commandments in 1 and 2 John? John notes that the command (entolē) is not a new one but an old commandment that they have had from the beginning (1 Jn 2:7; 2 Jn 5). Given the parallels in 1 John 2:24 and 1 John 3:11, "from the beginning" (ap' archēs) likely refers to the time when the readers first heard the Christian gospel.* The old commandment is the "message" (logos, so 1 Jn 2:7) that was communicated when their faith* commenced. By stressing the historic continuity of the message, the error of the secessionists' deviation from the gospel vouchsafed by John (cf. 1 Jn 1:1-4) is suggested. Even though the commandment is old it is also "new" (1 Jn 2:8). The newness of the command hearkens back to John 13:34, where Jesus enunciates the new commandment to "love one another as I have loved you" (cf. Jn 15:12). The new commandment is specifically identified in 2 John 5 in terms of loving one another (see Love), and the same is inferred in 1 John 2, for 1 John 2:9-11, which immediately follows the reference to the "new commandment," emphasizes the importance of loving brothers and sisters (cf. 1 Jn 3:23; 4:21).

The commandment in 1 John is not exhausted by the call to love one another, for in 1 John 3:23 it is also defined as believing "in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ." R. E. Brown suggests that the "commandment" in 1 John 3:23 is parallel to the "message" (angelia) in 1 John 3:11, for the command to believe in Jesus and to love one another is a shorthand summary of the gospel John proclaimed. 2 John 4 seems to enunciate a strikingly similar point. John rejoices greatly that some of his children (see Sonship) are walking in the "truth" (alētheia)

"just as we received commandment from the Father." The words "just as" (kathōs) forge a connection between walking in truth* and observing the commandment of the Father, leading to the conclusion that the commandment here is nothing other than walking in the truth. And the "truth" is centered in the gospel of Jesus Christ who truly came in the flesh* (2 Jn 7-11). John probably counters the theology of the secessionists, who were docetic in their christology* (see Docetism).

The relationship between the singular "commandment" (1 Jn 2:7 [3x], 8; 3:23 [2x]; 4:21; 2 Jn 4, 5, 6) and the plural "commandments" (1 Jn 2:3, 4; 3:22, 24; 5:2, 3 [2x]; 2 Jn 6) also needs to be investigated. Are the two interchangeable, or should they be distinguished in some way?

Probably the best way to sort this out is to examine briefly 2 John 4-6. The commandment is defined in terms of loving one another (2 Jn 5). 2 John 6 proceeds to say that "this is love that we should walk according to his commandments." If the plural "commandments" has the same definition as the singular "commandment" in 2 John 5, then John would be saying love exists when we walk in love. Such a tautology is certainly possible for John, but I. H. Marshall is probably correct in seeing a distinction between the singular command to love and the detailed requirements that summarize the nature of love. The moral norms of the law encapsulate love akin to Paul's statement in Romans 13:8-10. John concludes by saying (2 Jn 6), "This is the command . . . that you should walk in it." The reference to "it" (autē) is disputed. Brown suggests that "commandment" is understood, and this fits nicely with the observation (2 Jn 5) that love can never be separated from keeping commandments. But most commentators argue that "love" is the antecedent to autē, and the singular use of entolē in this sentence would support this interpretation. John circles back to love here because he wants to emphasize that love is the central feature in keeping the commandments. Love can never be separated from observing moral norms, for one can never claim to be loving and jettison moral absolutes. Nonetheless moral norms should not be exalted above love, for the latter is the heart and soul of the Christian ethic.*

The flow of thought in 1 John 3:22-24 could be explained similarly. Keeping commandments is one indication that one abides in God (1 Jn 3:24), and answers to prayer are given to those who observe his commandments and do what pleases him (1 Jn 3:22). But the center of the commandments is located in the singular command to believe in Jesus as Messiah and love the brothers and sisters (1 Jn 3:23).

The role of the commandments (i.e., moral norms) in guarding against deception comes to the forefront in 1 John 5:3. A claim to love God must be measured by the extent to which his commandments are observed. This recalls 1 John 2:3-4, where a similar observation is made. Brown has shown that there is a close connection between "word" (logos) and "commandment" (entolē) in Johannine writings. This is borne out by 1 John 2:3-6, where knowing God is described in terms of keeping "his commandments" (1 Jn 2:3-4) and also as "keeping his word" (1 Jn 2:5; cf. 2:7). The "commandments" and the "word" probably hearken back to the "ten words" (Ex 34:28) Moses* inscribed upon the stone tablets. Yet John's letters never explicitly refer to the OT commands and thus certainly eludes us. To sum up, John's claim that the commandment is new in Jesus Christ (1 Jn 2:7-9) perhaps indicates that the commandments of the OT were interpreted in the light of the Christ event.

1.3. Interpreting 1 John 5:2. 1 John 5:2 poses problems, for it sits awkwardly with what John wrote previously. He says that we know we love God's children "when we love God and observe his commandments" (1 Jn 5:2). But earlier John insisted that the claim to love God is negated if believers do not love their brothers or sisters (1 Jn 4:20). 1 John 5:2 seems to say that love for God's children is validated by love for God, whereas 1 John 4:19 avers that love for God is substantiated by loving brothers and sisters. The paradoxical character of John's thought is well known, but Brown suggests a promising solution to this paradox. He says that 1 John 5:2 is directed against the secessionists who claim to love brothers and sisters, although in their case it is the so-called brothers and sisters who seceded from the community. What John wants to establish, therefore, is what it truly means to love God's children. Those who love the true children of God are those who love God and keep his commands. The secessionists' declaration that they love fellow believers is contradicted by their failure to keep the moral norms contained in the commandments (cf. 1 Jn 1:6-10).

1.4. Power for Obedience. An emphasis on keeping commandments may seem onerous, but John comments that "his commandments are not burdensome" (1 Jn 5:3). The reason given (1 Jn 5:4—note the "because" [hoti]) is that whatever is born of God overcomes the world.* God himself has provided the life* and power* so that believers can observe the commandments (see Obedience), not as a burden but as a joy.* The victory that enables believers to overcome the world is faith, and faith trusts that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 5:4-5) and that he has provided the ability to conquer sin.

2. Revelation and Other Epistles.

2.1. Revelation. Twice Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) refers to keeping commands (Rev 12:17; 14:12), and in both cases the context is one in which persecution* is envisioned. Satan* in the form of Roman imperial power tries to destroy those who "keep the commandments of God and hold to the testimony of Jesus" (Rev 12:17; see Roman Empire). Believers were placed under severe pressure to submit to Roman authority* and offer worship* to the emperor* (Rev 14:9-12). Those who capitulate will be punished forever, but those who endure are "those who keep the commandments of God and faith in Jesus" (Rev 14:12). Obedience and endurance* are the marks of those who will enjoy the new heavens* and earth.

2.2. 2 Peter. 2 Peter* speaks of "the holy commandment delivered to them" (2 Pet 2:21) and of "the commandment of your apostles" (2 Pet 3:2; see Apostles). In the former text "the holy commandment" is parallel to "the way of righteousness" that was abandoned by the disobedient. R. J. Bauckham observes that in both of these verses the Christian gospel is conceived of ethically, predominantly in response to the false teachers who had disturbed the community with their advocacy of antinomianism.

2.3. The Citation of Old Testament Commandments. The only clear reference to an OT commandment in 1 Peter* is the injunction "to be holy because I am holy" in 1 Peter 1:16. Peter cites from either Leviticus 19:2 or Leviticus 11:44 or both. If the citation is from the latter text, it is instructive that the charge to be holy* is retained while the food* laws that undergird that injunction are not mentioned (see Old Testament in General Epistles).

James* appeals to three OT commandments: loving one's neighbor as oneself (Jas 2:8 from Lev 19:18) and the prohibitions against adultery and murder (Jas 2:11 from Ex 20:13-14 and Deut 15:17-18). This text is discussed more fully elsewhere (see Law). It should be noted that James betrays no concern with sabbath, circumcision* or food* laws—all of which were central for most Jews and naturally so, since the OT commanded them. Instead James only cites some moral norms from the law as authoritative (see Old Testament in General Epistles).

The author of Hebrews* uses the word commandment occasionally (Heb 7:5, 16, 18; 9:19). All of these references when considered in context (see Law) indicate that the Mosaic law was no longer considered to be in force, for the Levitical priesthood* and sacrifices* have been superseded by the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ (see Death of Christ). There may be an allusion to the moral requirements of the law being placed on the heart of believers, for the author quotes approvingly Jeremiah 31:31-34 in Hebrews 10:16, where it is said that God will write his laws on human hearts (see Old Testament in Hebrews).

3. Apostolic Fathers.

A full discussion of the teaching of the apostolic fathers* on commandments is not possible here, since they often use the word entolē, and a number of texts cite or allude to commands from the OT. The apostolic fathers have some strong statements against observing the ceremonial law, but they speak positively about keeping the Lord's commandments where observance of moral norms is commended (Did. 2.1-3; 4.13; 6.1-2; Herm. Sim. 5.4.5; 56.2-3, 5; 2 Clem. 3.4; 4.5; 6.7; 8.4; 17.1, 3, 6). Ignatius,* in line with his desire to strengthen the authority of the monarchial episcopate, says God's command is to submit to the authority of the bishop and deacons (Ign. Trall. 13.2; Ign. Magn. 4.1; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1). Barnabas (see Barnabas, Epistle of) reinterprets OT commands and applies them to the church*: circumcision relates to the circumcision of the heart (Barn. 9.1-9; 10.12), the sabbath points to the eschatological* rest and has been superseded by the eighth day in which Jesus arose from the dead (Barn. 15.1-9), and food laws should be understood spiritually (Barn. 10.1-12). For instance, the permission to eat animals that chew the cud and divide the hoof should not be understood literally. Those who fear* the Lord* and meditate and ruminate on his word "chew the cud," whereas those who live righteously in this age and anticipate the coming one "divide the hoof" (Barn. 10.11).

The author of Barnabas sees the new law of Jesus Christ as binding and warns his readers against becoming "proselytes to the law," the Mosaic Torah (Barn. 2.6; 3.6). Other writers also suggest that the words of Jesus Christ and his gospel constitute the new law for believers (Herm. Sim. 59.3; 69.1-8; 1 Clem. 13.2-3; Pol. Phil. 2.1-3). Polycarp, for instance, says that love for God and Christ fulfills the commandment (Pol. Phil. 3.3). God's law is identified as the preaching of the gospel of the Son of God throughout the world (Barn. 69.2). This accords with the Epistle to Diognetus 11.6, where the acknowledgment of Christ is understood as the fulfillment of the law. And in the Didache normative commandments are cited from the Jesus tradition,* especially from the Sermon on the Mount (Did. 1.2-5). The idea that the words of Christ are normative seems to continue in the apostolic fathers.

But it is also the case that some of the moral norms from the OT law are cited as authoritative. In the Didache some of the commandments hail from the Decalogue (e.g., Did. 2.1-5). The entire Two Ways section of the Didache is filled with moral instruction and exhortations, and some of the material stems from the OT (Did. 1.1—6.2; see also the Two Ways material in Barn. 18.1—21.1). In both the Didache and Barnabas moral righteousness* is necessary to experience eternal life, for the way of evil leads to death (Did. 1.1; Barn. 18.1-2; 19.1; 20.1; 21.1; cf. 2 Clem. 4.1-5; 6.7, 9; 8.4; 14.1; 17.6; 19.3). The Shepherd of Hermas emphasizes repeatedly that obedience to the commands is necessary for participation in the future kingdom, and that the commandments are not impossible to obey, since believers have the Lord in their heart (Herm. Vis. 25.5-7; Herm. Man. 30.4; 37.4-5; 38.12; 46.2-6; 47.1-6; 48.1-2; 49.3-5; Herm. Sim. 54.5; 56.2; 61.1-4; 72.6; 73.6; 74.2; 77.2-4; 106.2). When the commandments required are specified, they focus upon moral norms. Believers should visit orphans and widows, abstain from sexual sin (see Purity) and refrain from pride, slander, lying and greed (Herm. Man. 27.1-7; 28.2, 5; 38.1-12; Herm. Sim. 50.4-6, 7-9). The apostolic fathers appear to follow the same general stream of tradition found in the NT. The law of Christ is authoritative for believers and the Mosaic Torah is no longer binding. Nonetheless the moral norms of the OT law seem to be included in the law of Christ.

See also AUTHORITY; ETHICS; LAW; LOVE; OBEDIENCE AND LAWLESSNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids, 1978); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); D. J. Moo, The Letter of James (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984).

T. R. Schreiner

CONFESSIONAL FORMS.

See CREEDS, CONFESSIONAL FORMS.

CONFLICT MOTIF.

See BEASTS, DRAGON, SEA, CONFLICT MOTIF.

CONSCIENCE

The biblical term syneidēsis, usually translated "conscience," means the faculty of a human being that is aware of the ethical* quality of one's actions and that internally condemns one's own wrongdoing. By the first century syneidēsis and its cognate syneidos usually referred to an awareness of guilt (Pierce 1955, 54), although Josephus uses the word in the positive sense of an awareness of righteousness* (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.218). Although the NT use of the term is derived from this Greek ethical terminology, it is also related to the OT concept of the heart, since in the Bible ethical awareness is always tied up with the knowledge* of God* and the concomitant orientation of one's life.

1. Acts
2. Hebrews and 1 Peter
3. Apostolic Fathers

1. Acts.

The only occurrences of "conscience" in Acts are both in speeches of Paul (Acts 23:1; 24:16). In these cases Paul refers to his "blameless" or "good" conscience, in a way similar to the usage found in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim 1:5, 19; 3:9; 2 Tim 1:3; see DPL, Conscience). A good or clear conscience is the result of behavior in conformity with God's demands and appears to have not just a subjective element but a quasi-objective character. That is, the good conscience reflects an actual state of affairs with God, not just a lack of guilty feelings.

2. Hebrews and 1 Peter.

In the General Epistles the term occurs only in Hebrews* (Heb 9:9, 14; 10:2, 22; 13:8) and 1 Peter* (1 Pet 2:19; 3:16, 21). As in the Pastorals, a conscience can be either bad or evil (convicting a person of his or her sin, e.g., Heb 10:22) or good (testifying to the absence of guilt, e.g., 1 Pet 3:16), with a semi-objective character. This use is sometimes contrasted with Paul's major letters, but there too conscience "accuses" or "excuses" a person (Rom 2:15), signifying either a guilty or a clear conscience.

Hebrews is concerned with the fact that, as people have done evil and have a consciousness of their unacceptability to God, the conscience needs to be cleansed, because the defiled conscience is an obstacle to worship.* In Hebrews 9:9 the old sacrificial system is defective because, among other things, it cannot perfect the worshiper in conscience; that is, it cannot enable him or her to come to God in a cleared state. If it could, there would have been no need for the sacrifices* to continue, "for the worshipers would have been cleansed once for all, and would no longer have felt guilty for their sins" (Heb 10:2, NIV; lit., "would no longer have conscience of sins").

For the author of Hebrews this need for cleansing of the conscience is one of the factors that indicate the superiority of the new covenant* over the old. The old covenant sacrifices not only did not cleanse the conscience but also served as a continual reminder of sin (Heb 10:3), keeping the conscience aware of its guilt. The new covenant blood of Jesus does cleanse the conscience from works that lead to death (Heb 9:14) and so deals with sin once and for all (Heb 9:12). Such cleansing makes believers free to serve the living God (Heb 10:22; see Servant), their hearts having been "sprinkled from a conscience of evil" (i.e., cleansed from guilt). Thus both objective guilt before God and subjective awareness of that guilt in the conscience have been dealt with. A conscience that has been so cleansed can call itself "good" or "clear" (Heb 13:8).

1 Peter emphasizes this "good" conscience as a requisite for Christians so that their testimony (see Witness) in suffering* might shame their slanderers (1 Pet 3:16). A good conscience is the result of good behavior (1 Pet 3:17). Such a good conscience can even be called a "godly conscience" (1 Pet 2:19; literally, a "conscience of God"). Although most translations render dia syneidēsin theou as "because of an awareness of God" or the like, E. G. Selwyn points out that the term is consistently used elsewhere in the NT, including 1 Peter, to mean "conscience" and thus argues that dia syneidēsin theou should bear the meaning "for conscience' sake before God" (Selwyn 1947, pp. 176-77). However, Selwyn also points out that the distinction should not be too sharply drawn, since in the NT the conscience is bound up with a consciousness of God's presence and will. Suffering that occurs because of doing good (1 Pet 2:20), which both stems from and results in a godly conscience, is a "gift" or "sign of favor" with God (cf. 1 Pet 3:14 and Mt 5:10-11).

First Peter 3:21 refers to baptism* as "not the removal of dirt from the body but the pledge of a good conscience toward God." This is an enigmatic verse within an enigmatic paragraph. The verse could mean either that baptism is the act of asking God to cleanse the conscience, that baptism is a promise* to keep the conscience clear in the future (by not sinning) or that it is the confirming act that proceeds from a conscience that has been cleansed. Given that baptism is here typologically connected to the judgment* of God in the Noahic flood and that suffering in Christ is an aspect of the judgment of God (1 Pet 4:17), the best conclusion is that baptism is not a request to clear the conscience but a covenant sign of the objective conscience cleansing that God has applied to the believer by virtue of the resurrection* of Christ.

Hebrews also connects the cleansing of conscience with baptism. Hebrews 10:22 indicates that drawing near to God requires having the heart sprinkled to cleanse the conscience and the body washed in pure water. In both Hebrews and 1 Peter baptism serves as the symbolic marker of the change of condition of conscience brought about by God in the redemptive act of Jesus Christ. Thus the good state of the conscience is a distinguishing mark of the Christian.

3. Apostolic Fathers.

In the apostolic fathers* the use of "conscience" mostly echoes that of the NT. Both the *Epistle of Barnabas (Barn. 19.12) and the *Didache (Did. 4.14) exhort Christians to confess sins because it is forbidden to come to prayer* with an evil conscience (cf. 2 Clem. 16.4). It appears the evil conscience is not just a subjective problem but an objective hindrance to prayer. Ignatius* (Ign. Trall. 7.2) argues that noncooperation with church officers makes a person impure in conscience (see Church Order). This could hardly be simply a subjective feeling. Likewise the Shepherd of Hermas indicates that an evil conscience cannot coexist with the Spirit of truth (Herm. 28.4; see Holy Spirit). The "good" or "pure" conscience also has an objective character (1 Clem. 1.3; 41.1; 45.7). Clement (see Clement of Rome) reminds his readers that "you were struggling day and night for all the brotherhood, in order that the number of his elect might be saved with mercy [v.l., fear] and conscience" (1 Clem. 2.4). The Lightfoot-Harmer translation suggests "conscientiousness," but it is probably better to understand syneidēsis in this case not as a sense of carrying through on responsibilities but a knowledge of purity* or cleansing that accompanies salvation.* The unusual use in 1 Clement 34.7 to mean a commonality of awareness makes it clear, however, that the subjective function of the human perceiver has not been lost sight of.

Thus in our literature as in Paul, "conscience" is a function of the mind, but, like true knowledge (as opposed to false opinion), it has an objective character. The "evil conscience" is the reflection of an objective state of guilt; the "good conscience" is an accurate awareness of an objective state of purity before God and thus a mark of the Christian.

See also ETHICS; PSYCHOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. D. Davies, "Conscience," IDB 1:671-76; J. Dupont, "Syneidesis. Aux origines de la notion chrétienne de conscience morale," Studia Hellenistica 5 (1948) 119-53; C. Maurer, "σύνοιδα, συνείδησις," TDNT 7:918-19; H. Osborn, "Συνείδησις, JTS 32 (1931) 167-79; A. Pelletier, "Deux expressions de la notion de conscience dans le judaïsme hellénistique et le christianisme naissant," Revue des études grecques 80 (1967) 363-71; C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament (Chicago: Allenson, 1955); G. S. Selby, "The Meaning and Function of συνείδησις in Hebrews 9 and 10," RQ 28 (1985-86) 145-54; E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (London: Macmillan, 1947) 176-78; C. Spicq, "La conscience dans le Nouveau Testament," RB 47 (1938) 50-80. D. G. McCartney

CONVERSION. See NEW BIRTH.

COPTIC APOCALYPSE OF PETER. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

CORINTH. See CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY.

CORNELIUS

Cornelius is a pious centurion whose Christian conversion is recounted in Acts 10:1—11:18 (cf. Acts 15:6-11). The circumstances of the encounter of Cornelius and his household* with the gospel mark a key turning point in Luke's narration of the spread of the gospel to "the end of the earth" (Acts 1:8). Historical and source-critical study of the account in Acts has recently been supplemented by more literary-theological and sociological concerns.

1. The Characterization of Cornelius
2. The Cornelius Episode

1. The Characterization of Cornelius.

Acts 10:1 portrays Cornelius as one of probably six centurions, a commander of one hundred men, within the Italian Cohort. Six hundred men made up a cohort; archaeological evidence demonstrates the presence of such a cohort in Syria before A.D. 69 (Cohors II. Militaria Italica Civium Romanorum Voluntariorum quae est in Syria; ILS 9168; CIL 6.3528; 11.6117; see Broughton, 441-3]). This would mark Cornelius as a Gentile* (see Acts 10:28; 11:1-3; cf. Josephus J.W. 18.3.5 §84) and a Roman citizen of considerable social standing. Within the Lukan narrative it would also locate him at least provisionally in the good company of those soldiers who respond positively to the good news (Lk 3:10-14) and the two (Gentile) centurions already mentioned by Luke—one who is an example of faith* even to Israel* (Lk 7:1-10), the other who praises God* and affirms Jesus as "the righteous one" (ho dikaios, Lk 23:47; cf. Acts 3:13-15).

This positive characterization is furthered by the links Luke has drawn between the account about Cornelius and earlier material in the Third Gospel. Like the earlier episodes involving Zechariah and Mary* (Lk 1:8-56) and Saul and Ananias (Acts 9:1-19), the account of Cornelius and Peter (Acts 10) relates a complementary vision—complementary in the sense that visionary experiences are juxtaposed, with the successful completion of the one act of God through a human agent related to the faithful response of the other.

More particularly the far-reaching linguistic and conceptual points of contact between the stories of Zechariah and Cornelius (Lk 1:5-13, 29, 39, 41; Acts 10:1-4, 17, 23) underscore the piety of Cornelius—comparing, surprisingly, the devotion of a Gentile with that of a priest.* They also highlight the reality and nature of God's ongoing intervention. Even if historical events are proceeding under divine guidance, this working out of the divine will is not a fait accompli in the narrow sense (contra Pervo, 73-74); God thus reveals his objective, according to Luke, but its fulfillment involves the partnership of human agents. Cornelius, like Mary and Ananias before him, proves himself to be such a partner (see Green).

2. The Cornelius Episode.

The three most noticeable characteristics of the account are its sheer length, the initial intertwining of the visions of Cornelius and Peter and the retelling of parts or all of the narrative by Luke, by Cornelius and by Peter. These first and last literary devices help to mark the significance of this episode in the Lukan narrative. Acts 10 reaches its climax in the speech of Peter, with its universalizing proclamation of the gospel, declaring Jesus as "Lord of all" (Acts 10:36); it finds its denouement in the coming of the Holy Spirit* on these Gentiles, Cornelius and his household (Acts 10:44-48). Acts 11:1-18, following the protests of the circumcised believers, finds its climax in Peter's interpretation of the whole affair as God's doing, analogous to the outpouring of the Spirit on the first believers at Pentecost* (Acts 2:1-4); it finds its denouement in the acceptance of God's work among Gentiles (Acts 11:18).

Such a brief summary masks the apparent incongruity within the narrative, debated by scholars since Martin Dibelius. He argued that Luke has recontextualized an account about the distinction between clean and animals so as to apply it to clean and people. Subsequent source-critical studies suggested modifications to Dibelius's position, positing various ways in which the vision* of Peter might be recognized as integral to the Cornelius story (e.g., Haacker, Löning).

Source-critical analysis has proceeded, though, on the assumption that the narrative of Acts 10:1—11:18 was a narrative about Cornelius, with the consequence that the Petrine material, presumed to have independent existence, must somehow be made to fit into the material about Cornelius. Beverly R. Gaventa has urged the opposite view, noting first that dreams or visions in Greco-Roman antiquity might occur at the beginning of an account with their significance becoming clear only as the episode unfolds; and second that the conversion Luke narrates in Acts 10:1—11:18 may be that of Cornelius and his household but it is also, and more so, that of the church (see also along related lines, Esler, 93-97; Plunkett).

That Acts 10:1—11:18 is fundamentally concerned with Peter and the Jerusalem* church* and especially with the issue of ethnocentric practices is also highlighted by its reverberations with the story of Jonah: continuity of location, Joppa (Jon 1:3; Acts 9:43), to which God directs his messengers; God's intervention to overcome the messengers' reluctance, together with the symbolically important use of the number three (Jon 1:17; Acts 10:16); the divine commission to "arise . . . and go" (Jon 3:2; Acts 10:20) in order to deliver the message to the Gentiles; a report of the Gentiles' faith (Jon 3:5; Acts 10:43) and being forgiven; a subsequent, hostile response (Jon 4:1; Acts 10:14; 11:2); God's rejoinder to human animosity (Jon 4:2-11; Acts 11:17-18; cf. Acts 15:13-21). Luke's inscription of the Cornelius narrative into scriptural tradition highlights the message that Jonah's God (who extends grace* even to the Gentiles) is Peter's God: "Against this Scripturescape, the 'theo-logic' of the Gentile mission is painted by Luke: the Cornelius conversion is legitimized as the continuation of God's merciful work at Nineveh, Simon-Peter is the bar Jonah who is called by his ancestor's God to convert the Gentiles, and the people of God should do nothing but praise God and say, 'God has granted the Gentiles repentance unto life' (Acts 11.18)" (Wall, 140).

Luke's narration of the episode brims with confirmation of the divine hand at work. This is seen best in the presence of an angel* and the complementary visions (Acts 10:3-16), the prayer* motif (and consequent anticipation of divine revelation* [Acts 10:3, 4, 9]; on this motif in Luke-Acts see Crump), the aforementioned use of the OT and the spontaneous outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 10:44-47). Indeed, Peter's recounting of the episode underscores the initiative and activity of God in the whole affair (Acts 11:1-18; cf. Maloney). This emphasis does not serve the legitimation of the communication of the good news to Gentiles (contra, e.g., Wilson), which has already been mandated by the risen Lord* (Acts 1:8) and performed by Philip* (Acts 8:26-40). After all, hospitality,* not preaching* or baptism,* was at stake in the protestations of the circumcised in the Jerusalem church (Acts 11:2-3; cf. Acts 10:28). Rather, it serves to legitimate full fellowship* between Jewish and Gentile believers.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. Bovon, "Tradition et rédaction en Actes 10:1-11, 18," TZ 26 (1970) 22-45; T. R. S. Broughton, "The Roman Army" in The Beginnings of Christianity, pt. 1: The Acts of the Apostles, ed. F. J. Foakes Jackson and K. Lake, 5: Additional Notes to the Commentary, ed. K. Lake and H. J. Cadbury (5 vols.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979 [1933]) 427-45; D. Crump, Jesus the Intercessor: Prayer and Christology in Luke-Acts (WUNT 2:49; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1992); M. Dibelius, "The Conversion of Cornelius" in Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, ed. H. Greeven (New York: Scribner's, 1956) 109-22; P. F. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lukan Theology (SNTSMS 57; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987) esp. 93-97; B. R. Gaventa, Aspects of Conversion in the New Testament (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 107-22; J. B. Green, "Internal Repetition in Luke-Acts: Contemporary Narratology and Lukan Historiography" in History, Literature and Society in the Book of Acts, ed. B. Witherington III (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) 283-99; K. Haacker, "Dibelius und Cornelius: Ein Beispiel formgeschichtlicher Überlieferungskritik," BZ 24 (1980) 234-51; K. Löning, "Die Kornelius-tradition," BZ 18 (1974) 1-19; L. M. Maloney, "All That God Had Done with Them": The Narration of the Works of God in the Early Christian Community as Described in the Acts of the Apostles (AUS 7, Theology and Religion 91; New York: Peter Lang, 1991) 67-100; R. I. Pervo, Profit with Delight: The Literary Genre of the Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); M. A. Plunkett, "Ethnocentricity and Salvation History in the Cornelius Episode (Acts 10:1-11:18)" in SBLSP (1985) 465-79; R. W. Wall, "Peter, 'Son' of Jonah: The Conversion of Cornelius in the Context of the Canon" in The New Testament as Canon: A Reader in Canonical Criticism, ed. R. W. Wall and E. Lemcio (JSNTSup 76; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 129-40; S. G. Wilson, The Gentiles and the Gentile Mission (SNTSMS 23; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973) 171-78; R. D. Witherup, "Cornelius Over and Over and Over Again: 'Functional Redundancy' in the Acts of the Apostles," JSNT 49 (1993) 45-66.

J. B. Green

CORNERSTONE. See STONE, CORNERSTONE.

COSMOLOGY. See CREATION, COSMOLOGY.

COVENANT, NEW COVENANT

"Covenant" implies relationship, promise* and expectation. Within the biblical tradition the covenant points to the unique relationship Yahweh established with the world through Israel, Yahweh's immutable and sacred pledge of faithfulness to this special relationship and Yahweh's legitimate expectation for his people to respond appropriately (i.e., to live as covenant people). The covenant thus plays a central, if not controlling, role in understanding Israel's identity, history and place within God's purposes.

Early Christianity also understood its relationship to God* in covenantal terms. In and through the sacrificial death of Jesus (see Death of Christ), God had once and for all demonstrated his covenant faithfulness. For Christians to commemorate ritually Jesus' death as the beginning of a "new covenant" (1 Cor 11:25; cf. Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20) raises many questions about the historical and theological relationship between Judaism* and Christianity (see Christianity and Judaism).

1. Lexical Observations
2. Old Testament Background
3. Covenant in Acts
4. New Covenant in Hebrews
5. Covenant in Barnabas
6. Summary

1. Lexical Observations.

The word covenant (diathēkē) appears only a handful of times in the later NT writings and the apostolic fathers*—twice in Acts* (Acts 3:25; 7:8), seventeen times in Hebrews* (Heb 7:22; 8:6, 9 [2x], 10; 9:4 [2x], 15 [2x], 16, 17, 20; 10:16, 29; 12:24; 13:20), once in Revelation (Rev 11:19; see Revelation, Book of), twice in 1 Clement (1 Clem. 15.4; 35.7; see Clement of Rome) and eight times in Barnabas (Barn. 4.6, 8; 6.19; 9.6; 13.1, 6; 14.1, 3; see Barnabas, Epistle of). The phrase "new covenant" (kainē diathēkē; nea diathēkē appears even less frequently—three times in Hebrews (Heb 8:8 [quoting Jer 38:31 LXX; Jer 31:31 MT]; 9:15; 12:24). The numbers hardly swell when the constructions that bear the same semantic weight are added—"better covenant" (kreitton diathēkē, Heb 7:22; 8:6), "eternal covenant" (diathēkē aiōniou, Heb 13:20), "the covenant of the beloved Jesus" (hē [diathēkē] tou ēgapēmenou Iesou, Barn. 4.8), "Lord's covenant" (diathēkē kyriou, Barn. 6.19; 14.3) and the reference to the "first covenant" (prōtē [diathēkē], Heb 9:15; cf. Heb 9:1:) hē prōtē [dikaiōmata], which implies a second or new covenant.

This relative lack of usage may come as a surprise, especially since the Christian Bible is divided into two "testaments" (Lat testamentum, "covenant") and since covenant is the "root metaphor" for Judaism (Segal, 4). However, the absence of extensive and explicit covenant language in early Christian writings could be due to several factors. (1) The identity and deeds of Jesus as a mediator eclipsed that which he mediated, the new covenant. The resultant contrast was not between an old Jewish covenant and a new Christian one but between the first covenant and Jesus. For earliest Christianity, christology* thus became a way of speaking about the new covenant. (2) The identification of Jesus with the new covenant could have operated at such a deep level of shared Christian conviction that it rarely needed and consequently did not receive far-reaching elaboration in Christian writings. (3) At the same time that Christians attempted to show the theological inadequacy of their Jewish contemporaries, they also sought to ground their identity within the Jewish Scriptures. The drive to demonstrate historical and theological continuity with Jewish predecessors may well have tempered the Christian appropriation of new covenant language. Given these factors, what may surprise us most is that Christianity employed covenant language at all.

2. Old Testament Background.

The Hebrew word bᵉrît is most often translated as "covenant," although bᵉrît possesses a much wider semantic range (see Barr). Of particular importance is the use of bᵉrît to describe Yahweh's special relationship with his people.

Four covenants in particular take on a special importance for the OT and Jewish tradition: God's unconditional covenant with the world through Noah (Gen 6:18; 9:8-16); the promise of land* and posterity to Abraham* (Gen 12:1-3; 15:18-19; 17:1-4), which was repeated to the ancestors* Isaac, Jacob and Joseph (Gen 26:1-5; 28:13-15; 48—50 passim); the royal and eventually messianic covenant with David and his descendants (2 Sam 7:1-17; Ps 89; Is 9:2-7; Pss. Sol. 18—19); and the conditional covenant formed between God and Israel at Sinai (Ex 19—24, 34; Deut 5—28). Despite the multiplicity of covenants and any tension that may have existed between them, the Mosaic covenant is the one by which and through which all others should be understood (Childs, 419).

At the heart of the Mosaic covenant is Yahweh's choice of Israel to be his people and his promise to be Israel's God. For their part Israel was to respond through obedience to the Law. Election and law thus gave shape to Jewish religious practice. Jews believed that they were elected by grace, that they were to respond to the historical expressions of Yahweh's mercy* through obedience to the law, that Yahweh's blessing would follow obedience, that his judgment would follow their disobedience and that forgiveness for their transgressions could be found through repentance and sacrifice. As E. P. Sanders has shown, this "pattern of religion" (what he terms "covenantal nomism") was a unifying feature of various Jewish groups from Deuteronomy onward.

The covenant is also a common thread running through the OT. Much of the Pentateuch seeks to elaborate and detail the covenant established through Moses. The historical books explain Israel's persistent difficulties as disobedience to the covenant. The prophets too see Israel's covenantal indiscretions as the chief reason for the punishment of exile. The prophets also describe the future in covenantal terms. God is going to reestablish the Mosaic covenant, variously depicted as a covenant of love (Hos 2:16-20) or peace (Ezek 34:25; 37:26) or as "everlasting" (Is 61:8; Jer 32:40; 50:5). The prophet Jeremiah even speaks of a "new covenant" that entails unprecedented forgiveness, reconciliation and re-creation (Jer 31:31-33). The prophets also universalize the particular covenant given to Israel: the future covenant includes the whole world (Is 42:6; 49:6-8). This eschatological and universal covenantal vision—a vision that authentically reflects the covenants God forged with David, Israel, Abraham and Noah—provides the conceptual framework for understanding new covenant language in the NT.

3. Covenant in Acts.

On several occasions Acts appeals to Israel's covenant history to identify the followers of the risen Jesus as the genuine heirs of the covenant. Acts accomplishes this without extensive reference to the word diathēkē (which appears only twice: Acts 3:25; 7:8), using instead the word "promise" (epangelia) to show how Christianity identified itself as God's covenant people (Acts 1:4; 2:33, 39; 7:17; 13:23; 37; 23:21; 26:6).

Peter's sermons in Acts 2—3 illustrate this identification. Peter proclaims that the resurrection* of Jesus fulfills the "oath" (horkos) God swore to David (that one of David's descendants would inherit the throne, Acts 2:30; cf. Ps 132:11) and the promise made to Moses (that God would raise a prophet like him, Acts 3:22; cf. Deut 18:15-16; see Old Testament in Acts). Further, repentance, baptism,* forgiveness and the reception of the Holy Spirit* confirm God's "promise" (Acts 2:39) and make believers "children of the prophets and of the covenant" (Acts 3:22-26).

Stephen's* sermon points to how God's covenant with Abraham (Acts 7:2-8) epitomizes the history of Israel and thus of Christianity. God's covenant with Abraham is seen as a beginning in which partial realizations are interconnected with new beginnings; stories containing new promises are embedded within older, foundational narratives (Dahl). For example, Moses' prediction of a new prophet lies within the story of Abraham (Acts 7:37). Jesus, as the prophet like Moses, is thus placed squarely in Abrahamic covenant. The rhetorical force of this narrative suturing reaches a climax in the final appeal. Stephen derides his Jewish audience for being "stiff-necked" and "uncircumcised in the heart," a people who "always resist the Holy Spirit" (Acts 7:51; see Circumcision). He does this precisely because they have failed to see the connection between Jesus and their own covenant history (Acts 7:52-53). The programmatic appeal to Abraham within the sermon thus locates those who follow Jesus as true Israel (see Church as Israel).

Paul's sermon at Pisidian Antioch explicitly links the message about Jesus with the covenant history of Israel. Israel's covenant history includes election, exodus, wilderness wanderings, conquest, the promise of land, the judges, the prophets and the office of the king (Acts 13:17-21). This covenant now includes another, for out of David's posterity "God has brought to Israel a Savior, Jesus, as he promised" (Acts 13:24; cf. Acts 26:6). Indeed, Paul's gospel is that all of God's covenantal promises find their fulfillment in Jesus (Acts 13:33). Paul's sermon thus echoes the themes already heard in Peter's and Stephen's, namely, Christianity is the true heir of the Jewish covenant promises.

If Israel's covenant history could show that Jewish followers of Jesus were the genuine heirs, then an appeal to the covenant could also show that Gentiles,* people traditionally thought to be outside the covenant, are (and always were?) also a part of it. This is best seen in the accounts of Cornelius's* conversion (Acts 10:1—11:18) and the apostolic council (Acts 15:1-29). It took a heavenly vision and a thrice-repeated heavenly command to convince Peter too that it was not a covenantal breach to "associate or to visit with any one of another nation" (Acts 10:28). The dramatic coming of the Spirit (Acts 10:44-48), not unlike that at Pentecost,* confirmed to him and the Jerusalem* church that God's promise of forgiveness and salvation* through Jesus was for everyone (Acts 11:17-18). The apostolic council (Acts 15) not only officially sanctioned Gentile inclusion but also clarified the role of circumcision and the law of Moses in salvation. Peter argued that God makes no distinction: all are saved "through the grace of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 15:11). James links Gentile inclusion with the covenant by citing a string of prophetic texts (Amos 9:11-12; Jer 12:15; Is 45:21). Not only are Christians the true covenant people, but also the covenant is seen now to include Gentiles.

In Acts the covenant promises given to Israel are never withdrawn. Israel is not rejected (Acts 13:46; 28:25-28 notwithstanding). It is better to speak of a separation within Israel, with the church (described within Acts as "believers," "brethren," "saints" or "disciples"; but see Church §2.2 for a different reading of Luke's ecclesiology) as carrying on the unbroken line stemming from Abraham. There is no "new" Israel. The church is true Israel, the true covenant people of God. Acts does not emphasize the inadequacy of the Mosaic covenant (but cf. Acts 13:39; 15:10) but only the disobedience of the people. Indeed, Acts underscores the prophetic character of the covenant: its narrative and promissory linkages with the message and movement surrounding Jesus. Acts consistently portrays the community and the message as the intended destiny of Israel.

4. New Covenant in Hebrews.

No NT document so extensively reflects upon the new covenant as does Hebrews. Although the book is full of covenantal imagery and terminology, it is Hebrews's central section (Heb 4:14—10:15) that highlights the relationship between the old and new covenants.

Hebrews's central section can be broken into two halves: the first half argues that Jesus was appointed a superior, eternal high priest* after the order of Melchizedek* (Heb 5:1-10; 7:1-28), while the second half (Heb 8:1—10:16) examines the character of Jesus' high-priestly ministry (Heb 8:1-6), the nature of the new covenant that he mediates (Heb 8:7-13) and the new covenant offering that his ministry includes (Heb 9:1—10:16). The author begins and ends this second section by quoting the new covenant prophecy of Jeremiah 31 (Heb 8:8-12; 10:16-17). Thus, against the backdrop of the OT priestly sacrificial system and within the horizon of hope generated by biblical prophecy, Hebrews presents a sustained, expositional argument that identifies Jesus as the superior, heavenly and sinless high priest, the mediator of a new and better covenant (see Old Testament in Hebrews).

Numerous contrasts can be detected within the second half of this central section. The old covenant was earthly; the new covenant is heavenly (Heb 8:1; 9:1). The old covenant ministry was a copy and shadow (Heb 8:5; 9:23; 10:1); the new covenant is real (Heb 9:24) and true (Heb 8:2; 10:1). The old covenant featured human priests who were destined to die; the new covenant possesses a high priest who lives forever (Heb 9:28). The administration of a priest under the old covenant occurred according to the dictates of the law (Heb 8:4); the new covenant is directly and divinely administered (Heb 8:1-2). A priest under the old covenant had to offer sacrifice for his own sins (Heb 9:7); Jesus' sinlessness means that he did not offer sacrifice for himself (Heb 9:7). Under the old covenant multiple priests had to enter repeatedly the sanctuary to offer numerous sacrifices (Heb 9:6-7, 25; 10:11); under the new covenant a single high priest, Jesus, enters the heavenly sanctuary once (through his death and resurrection) and offers a singular sacrifice once and for all time (Heb 9:12, 26; 10:10, 12). The old covenant contained the sacrificial blood of animals (Heb 9:18-22); under the new covenant Jesus offers his own blood (Heb 9:12, 26). The efficacy of the old covenant offerings was limited (Heb 10:1-2); the efficacy of the new covenant sacrifice was definitive—there are no more offerings for sins. Under the old covenant the worshiper could not be perfected (Heb 9:9); under the new covenant a process of moral transformation has been enacted that will completely purify (Heb 9:14; 10:14).

S. G. Wilson reads these and other contrasts in Hebrews as a pointed effort to "denigrate" the old covenant and thus Judaism—an inference not necessarily demanded by the evidence. Wilson points to the pejorative connotation of such language as "weak and ineffectual," "shadow," "abolished" and "annulled" (see Wilson, 117-21). While the comparative character of much of Hebrews, especially of Hebrews 8:1—10:16, should not be denied, neither should the positive role of the first covenant be ignored. After all, the new covenant Jesus established was "concerned with the descendants of Abraham" (Heb 2:16).

Hebrews's valuation of the new covenant over the old was not a calculated anti-Jewish polemic (as Wilson would have us believe) but a natural consequence of the new covenant's eschatological* character. The old covenant, tied to this "present age" (Heb 9:9), was seen as "growing old" and "passing away" (Heb 8:13); the new covenant excels because it is founded on "better promises" (Heb 8:6), those of resurrection life.* The resulting contrast is not between something evil (old covenant/Judaism) and something good (new covenant/Christianity) but between something good (old covenant) and something better (new covenant). This is a very Jewish way of reasoning known as Qal wahomer, the argument from the lesser to the greater: if the old covenant was good, then how much better will the new be? The argument of Hebrews about the relationship between the old and new covenants at this point is thus very similar to Paul's argument (2 Cor 3) about the two covenants.

The author of Hebrews uses both spatial and temporal imagery to demonstrate the comparable yet provisionary character of the Sinai covenant. The elaborate analogies between the earthly and heavenly elements of the old and new covenants work to show similarity, while the strategic citations of Jeremiah 31 demonstrate that a new day in salvation history has dawned.

5. Covenant in Barnabas.

In the Epistle of Barnabas we first meet what surely can be termed an anti-Jewish polemic. Barnabas's disdain for the practice of Judaism is obvious.

The litany of covenantal critiques begins early on. Barnabas warns his readers about overconfidence. They should not be like a "certain people" who "pile up sins" while claiming that the covenant was "irrevocably" theirs (Barn. 4.6). In fact, Jews "lost it completely" (Barn. 4.6) when they "turned to idols" and "broke the law" (Barn. 4.8; cf. Barn. 14.3, "the Lord's covenant was shattered"). Even Moses understood this as a forfeiture: "he hurled the two tablets from his hands, and their covenant was broken in pieces" (Barn. 4.8) All this occurred in order that the "covenant of the beloved Jesus" might be sealed in believers' hearts (Barn. 4.8). According to Barnabas, God gave the covenant, Moses received it and the Jewish people rejected it, a rejection that made them "unworthy" (Barn. 14.1, 4) and thus opened the way for another people (Barn. 6.11).

Barnabas also appeals to the history of election to demonstrate God's covenantal preference for Christians over Jews. "Let us see if this people [i.e., Christians] or the first people [i.e., Jews] receive the inheritance and if the covenant is ours or theirs" (Barn. 13.1). Barnabas then marshals the OT to show that Jacob was preferred over Esau (Barn. 13.2-3) and Ephraim over Manasseh (Barn. 13.3-5). The choice of the younger over the older prefigures God's choice of Christians as his people and therefore as the only legitimate "heir of the covenant" (Barn. 13.6).

But what happened to the covenant the Jews rejected? Barnabas argues that it passed on to Christians through Jesus. Jesus was both the mediator of the covenant (Barn. 14.5) and the covenant itself (Barn. 14.7). The covenant is the "Lord's covenant" (Barn. 6.19), the "covenant of the beloved Jesus" (Barn. 4.8). Nowhere does Barnabas speak of a completely "new" covenant. Indeed, the Mosaic covenant is Jesus' covenant (Barn. 14.3). For Barnabas the covenant remained the same; only the people changed.

Unlike Hebrews, which links the old and new covenants through an eschatological reading of Jeremiah 31, Barnabas allegorizes covenant imagery to speak of Jesus. The covenant, when properly read with special gnosis,* leads to the truth. For example, the circumcision of Abraham in reality preaches Jesus (Barn. 9.7-9). This different hermeneutic yields a completely different theological relationship between Judaism and Christianity.

6. Summary.

Acts, Hebrews and Barnabas agree that God has demonstrated covenantal faithfulness in the death of his Son.* However, each takes a different position on this new covenant's relationship to the old. Acts consistently presents those who follow Jesus as the true Israel, the genuine covenant people of God, a covenant newly shaped by the death and resurrection of Jesus. Working with a proof from prophecy/proclamation hermeneutic, Acts emphasizes continuity. At the other end of the spectrum is Barnabas, which espouses a throughgoing supersessionist position. The church replaces Israel in the covenant. Indeed, the covenant was never Israel's at all. Standing in the middle is Hebrews. Hebrews recognizes the legitimacy and efficacy of the first covenant; however, Hebrews argues that the "old" or "first" covenant pales in comparison with eschatological power of the new covenant.

See also BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF; CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CHURCH AS ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF GOD; HEBREWS; LAW; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT IN HEBREWS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, "Some Semantic Notes on the Covenant" in Beiträge zur Alttestamentlichen Theologie: Festschrift für Walther Zimmerli, ed. H. Donner (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977) 23-38; R. T. Beckwith,

"The Unity and Diversity of God's Covenants," TynB 38 (1987) 93-118; F. F. Bruce, "The People of God" in New Testament Development of Old Testament Themes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968) 51-67; B. S. Childs, Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments: Theological Reflection on the Christian Bible (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1993); N. A. Dahl, "The Story of Abraham in Luke-Acts" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (London: SPCK, 1966) 139-58; J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways: Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); E. Ferguson, "The Covenant Idea in the Second Century" in Texts and Testaments: Critical Essays on the Bible and Early Church Fathers, ed. W. E. March (San Antonio, TX: Trinity University Press, 1980) 135-62; W. Horbury, "Jewish-Christian Relations in Barnabas and Justin Martyr" in Jews and Christians: The Parting of the Ways A.D. 70-135, ed. J. D. G. Dunn (WUNT 1.66; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992); W. Kanzig, "Καινή διαθήκη: The Title of the New Testament in the Second and Third Centuries," JTS 45 (1994) 519-44; E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religions (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); A. F. Segal, Rebecca's Children: Judaism and Christianity in the Roman World (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1986); S. G. Wilson, Related Strangers: Jews and Christians 70-170 C.E. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995).

C. C. Newman

CREATION, COSMOLOGY

Because the world* and its origin, structure and destiny (cosmology) are not treated systematically in the works under consideration, gaps must be filled in from what we suppose was commonly known. Several words impinge on this semantic area: kosmos ("world"), aiōn ("age"), gē ("earth"), oikoumenē ("inhabited world"). Kairos ("time") sometimes overlaps temporal aspects of aiōn, and the creation (ktisis; cf. ktizō) is also called ta panta ("all things") and is referred to as the "foundation of the world" (katabolē kosmou).

This rich fund of language derives from both the Jewish and Greek traditions. The Jewish teaching of creation, especially in Genesis, made use of a variety of mythical traditions and, because the early Christians did not find this area to be in dispute with Judaism,* scholars sometimes suggest that the NT writers thought of the earth as a disk upon which the heavens rest like a dome, under which the waters of the deep form the sea. It could however be a mistake to interpret such imagery as scientific description rather than as poetic portrayal. From the time of Aristotle the Greeks understood the world to be a sphere (Aristotle Cael. 2.2, 285a, 32), and perceptive attempts were made to calculate the circumference of the earth, though the debate persisted concerning whether the earth or the sun circled the other. Only in dialogue with the wider Hellenistic* world did certain aspects of this teaching become disputed. These were then dealt with in some detail in the second century.

1. Terminology
2. Perspectives of Later New Testament Works
3. Beyond the New Testament

1. Terminology.

In the works under consideration various terms are prominent, depending on the influence of Jewish ('ereṣ/gē; tēḇēl/oikoumenē and 'ôlām/aiōn) or Greek (kosmos and probably ta panta) traditions as well as whether the focus is upon temporal or spatial aspects. Apart from 1 John (see John, Letters of), where kosmos is used twenty-three times, this term is rarely used in the books under consideration. "Earth" (gē is the most frequently used term in Acts* (thirty-two times, almost one-third of which come in OT quotations; see OT in Acts) and Revelation (eighty-two times; see Revelation, Book of). Of the fifteen uses of oikoumenē in the NT, five are to be found in Acts, three in Luke and three in Revelation, two of which are in parallelism to gē. In Hebrews* the most frequently used term is aiōn (fifteen times); it is used only twice in Acts and twenty-seven times times in Revelation, of which twenty-six are used in the expression "to the age of the ages," commonly translated "forever and ever," though gē is used eleven times and oikoumenē twice. God is spoken of as Creator and the world as creation (ktizō, ktisis, ktisma) in Hebrews, James,* 1 Peter,* 2 Peter* and Revelation.

1.1. The World of Space. While "land" (gē) may be used in a local sense, so that it is possible to leave one's land* and go to another (Acts 7:3, 4, 6, 29; 13:17, 19), or even in the more local sense of "holy ground" or other specific pieces of ground (Acts 7:33; cf. 9:4, 8; 10:11; 26:14), it can also be used in formulae incorporating the total creation in terms of heaven,* earth, sea and all that is in them (Acts 4:24; 7:49; Rev 5:13). In this sense the oikoumenē is roughly the equivalent of the earth (Acts 11:28; 17:26; Rev 3:10; 12:9). The extensiveness of the earth is also in view in the expressions "the four corners of the earth" and "the four winds of the earth" (Rev 7:1).

1.2. The Temporal World. The temporal nature of the world is expressed first in the affirmation of creation. God created the world (kosmos), the heaven, the earth, the sea and all that is in them. Thus the world has a beginning (archē, Heb 1:10) and a foundation (katabolē, Heb 4:3; 9:26; Rev 13:8; 17:8). The world begins with creation and ends or passes away (Rev 21:1), or at least the last word about the world concerns the judgment* brought about by God* through Jesus, the person chosen by him to perform this task (Acts 17:31). For the author of Hebrews the last days were ushered in by the ministry* of Jesus (Heb 1:2), but the last word concerns the judgment of the world at the Second Coming of Jesus (see Parousia). In Revelation 20:11—21:8 the end of the present world and the judgment are closely associated. But there the end of the present world signals the dawning of the new and ideal world.

2. Perspective of Later New Testament Works. Generally, the various works are oriented to either a spatial or a temporal view of the world. Most make some contribution to each of these perspectives while concentrating on one of them. In Hebrews, James, 1 Peter and Revelation the world is seen as a place of testing, in which endurance* produces positive results but sin* produces death. Because of the testing in one's present life,* these works all look to a final day of visitation or judgment when the righteous and the wicked receive their just reward* or punishment.

2.1. Acts. Acts 4:24 makes explicit the Jewish understanding of creation and does so in strongly Jewish idiom, addressing God as "Sovereign Lord*" (despota) and confessing, "you who made [sy ho poiēsas] the heaven and the earth and the sea and all that is in them" (cf. Acts 14:15). The created world (kosmos) can also be spoken of in terms of heaven and earth (Acts 17:24). In Acts 17:26 Paul says that God "made [epoiēsen] from one [person] (Adam) every nation of people to dwell upon the face of the earth." Thus Acts affirms the unity of humanity based in creation, the importance of which is revealed in Acts 1:8. Whereas the Gospel of Luke portrayed the purpose of God in Jesus coming to its fulfillment in Jerusalem,* Acts announces the mission* of the witnesses* to the risen Jesus going out from Jerusalem to Judea and Samaria* and to the uttermost parts of the earth (heōs eschatou tēs gēs, an expression repeated in Acts 13:47, where it occurs in the quotation of Isaiah 49:6 (LXX). In both places in Acts the focus is on the extensive nature of the inhabited earth (oikoumenē] and the inclusive scope of the mission (cf. Acts 17:6; 24:5). The mission involved the proclamation that God had fixed a day on which he will judge the inhabited world (oikoumenē] in righteousness* by the man he has designated by raising him from the dead (Acts 17:31; see Resurrection).

Although there are but two uses of aiōn (Acts 3:21; 15:18), the temporal nature of the world is not without importance and finds expression in Acts 1:7. According to Acts, the risen Jesus spoke to the disciples about the kingdom* of God and called on them to stay in Jerusalem until they were baptized (see Baptism) with the Holy Spirit.* In response the disciples asked if at this time he would restore the kingdom to Israel,* to which Jesus responded, "It is not for you to know the times [chronous] or the opportune moments [kairous] which the Father has placed in his own authority." By implication it seems that the disciples associated the kingdom of God with the baptism of the Spirit and the restoring of the kingdom to Israel. Neither of these associations is confirmed by the Jesus of Acts, though such eschatological* fulfillment is implied by Acts 2:17 and Acts 3:20, 25.

Acts depicts the world as God's creation, a creation, however, on the way to fulfillment. That fulfillment involved the historic mission of Jesus and the ongoing mission of the followers of Jesus to the inhabited world. The consummation of the purpose of God in creation, however, lay in the future, awaiting the coming of Jesus, God's appointed judge of all the inhabited earth. Thus the fulfillment of the creation is perceived in terms of the relationship of the purpose of God to human history.

2.2. Hebrews. The orientation of Hebrews (see Heb 1:2) is to the eschatological nature (ep' eschatou tōn hēmerōn toutōn) of the ministry of Jesus. Hebrews asserts the entry (eisagagē) of the Son,* spoken of as prōtotokos, into the world of humanity (oikoumenē, Heb 1:6), while Hebrews 10:5 speaks of Christ's coming into the world (eiserchomenos eis ton kosmon). His ministry is given its due significance (thus Heb 2:1-4) by revealing that Jesus (spoken of as "son") was appointed heir of all things and was the one through whom (di' hou) God made (epoiēsen) the worlds (tous aiōnas, Heb 1:2). Here as in Acts 4:24 the act of creation is signified using the verb poiein rather than the more specific ktizein. The debate about whether the world was created ex nihilo or from already existent formless matter was not yet an issue.

While Acts continues in the tradition of Genesis 1:1 in affirming that God made the heaven and the earth (cf. Heb 1.10), interpretatively adding the sea and all that is in them, Hebrews asserts that God made the ages (tous aiōnas). This is a favorite term in Hebrews, being used fifteen times with important connections between Hebrews 1:2 and Hebrews 11:3. The verb used in the latter is katetisthai, again confirming that no single technical term was used exclusively to describe the act of creation. The idea of the world, understood as the "ages," is dependent on the Hebrew 'ôlām (Eccles 3:11) and the plural 'ôlāmiym (Wis 13:9). The use of the plural (tous aiōnous) refers to all periods of time and what is manifest in and through them, emphasizing the temporal character of creation.

The purpose of this reference to Jesus as "son" (Heb 1:2-3) is to compare him favorably with the prophets* and the angels* (angeloi, "messengers"). Several points are made to demonstrate the superiority of the Son: God appointed him heir of "all things" (pantōn; and see ta panta in Heb 1:3), a reference to the totality of the creation; God made the "ages" through him; and the Son maintains (pherōn) the creation (ta panta) by his powerful word (tō rhēmati tēs dynameōs autou).

Further, the Son is described as "being" the visible revelation* of the invisible God (apaugasma tēs doxēs kai charaktēr tēs hypostaseōs autou; cf. Paul in Col 1:15-20 and Philo Vit. Mos. 2.65; Philo Leg. All. 1.43; Philo Conf. Ling. 97, 147). At the same time the use of Psalm 2:7 ("You are my son, today I have begotten you") in Hebrews 1:5 and Hebrews 5:5-6 suggests that Jesus became son at some point of time. The exaltation* of the Son to the right hand of God (Heb 1:3) is also made consequent to his having made purification for sin. It is unclear whether the appointment of the Son as heir of all things was based on his "being" or his agency in creation or was made effective in his exaltation to the right hand of God (see Heb 1:3,13; 10:12-13). The latter could be said to presuppose his being, his agency in creation as well as his work of purification. Alternatively, we may think that a number of independent traditions are being piled up to emphasize the superiority of the Son. The creation is seen to be directed toward him as the one who established its underlying purpose and also as the one who reestablished that purpose in purification (redemption*). Hebrews adopts the christological* perspective found in Colossians 1:16, 20 rather than the theocentric perspective of Romans 11:36. This apparent conflict is reconciled in the declaration that the Son is the image of the invisible God.

The author ascribes references to God in the Septuagint (Deut 32:43) to the Son, asserting that his throne is eternal (eis ton aiōna tou aiōnos) although his created works were temporal and would perish (Heb 1:8, 10). The temporal and temporary nature of the creation finds expression in reference to the foundation of the creation, which was laid in the beginning (Heb 1:10; cf. 4:3; 9:26) by the one who is. Though laid by him, the creation will pass away and perish in due course. Thus the Son is contrasted not only with the prophets and messengers but with the whole creation. While he remains, the creation established (ethemeliōsas) by him will pass away (Heb 1:10-12; 13:8). By contrast Abraham,* one of those with faith,* is said not to have set his hope* on any earthly city but to have "looked forward to the city which has foundations [tous themelious] whose builder [technitēs] and maker [dēmiourgos] is God" (Heb 11:10; cf. 11:16; 12:22-24; 13:14). Hebrews 9:26-28 (cf. Heb 10:25, 37) is oriented to the completion of the age (epi synteleia tōn aiōnōn) and the second appearance of Christ.

2.3. James. "Every good and perfect gift is from above coming down from the Father of lights" (Jas 1:17). This Jewish characterization of God (see T. Abr. 7:6 and the ascription "the prince of lights" in CD 5:17-18; 1QS 3:20) crystallizes the recognition of the sovereign power of God, especially in control of the heavenly lights. James is one of the least apocalyptic* or dualistic books in the NT. In the Genesis tradition the creation is perceived as good, and James (Jas 1:5, 17) affirms its ongoing goodness. Nevertheless, James is not untouched by the apocalyptic perspective and acknowledges the hostility of the world to God (Jas 1:27; 4:4) and the adversarial role of the devil (see Adversaries, Satan).

At the same time James teaches that it is possible to resist the devil, who flees from those who resist (Jas 4:7-8). The notion that temptation* and testing come from God or the devil is rejected by James, who asserts that temptation arises from evil desire, which when it is satisfied brings forth sin and death (Jas 1:13-16). This looks much like the rabbinic teaching of the "evil inclination" that is balanced by the "good inclination." The good inclination (good desire) is strengthened by the appropriate teaching, which is the role of the law* in Judaism. Thus armed, a person can act appropriately, resisting the devil and performing good works. James thus has an optimistic view of human life in the world.

Even so a two-stage understanding of creation seems to be presupposed in that the author claims to be one of those begotten by the word of truth* (the gospel*?) to be a kind of first fruits of God's creation (aparchēn tina tōn autou ktismatōn, Jas 1:18). What is in view appears to be the beginning of the harvest of the creation, which presupposes the judgment in the last days when the wicked will be punished while those who practice good will be rewarded (Jas 5:1-9). James affirms the imminence of judgment and the coming of the Lord as judge at the end of history. Thus this epistle also reflects an apocalyptic worldview, but it lacks the characteristic pessimistic evaluation of the present age. The "world" (kosmos), however, is viewed with suspicion (Jas 1:27; 4:4).

2.4. 1 and 2 Peter. The worldview of 1 Peter deals with the beginning of creation in terms of the "foundation of the world" (katabolēs kosmou, 1 Pet 1:20). Nevertheless the faithful are strangers and pilgrims (1 Pet 2:11) who must endure testing (1 Pet 4:12-19; 5:6-11), and the devil roams about like a roaring lion (1 Pet 5:8). Meanwhile, salvation* is hidden in heaven waiting to be revealed (1 Pet 1:4), where the risen Jesus Christ is at the right hand of God until angels, authorities and powers* are made subject to him (1 Pet 3:21-22). That apparently is to be at the last time (en kairō eschatō, 1 Pet 1:5), when salvation will be revealed. Nevertheless, Christ was destined before the foundation of the world but revealed (phanerōthentos) at the end of times (ep'eschatou tōn chronōn, 1 Pet 1:20). At the same time it is asserted that the end (ultimate fulfillment) of all things is at hand (to telos ēngiken, 1 Pet 4:7). The coming of Jesus ushered in the last days. The author imminently awaits final fulfillment at the revelation of Jesus Christ (1 Pet 1:20) as judge of the living and the dead (1 Pet 4:5, 17-19).

In response to the assertion that since creation all has continued without change, 2 Peter 3:5-6 echoes the Genesis tradition, according to which the heavens were created in the beginning by the word of God. This reference shows that the earth, formed out of the water, was deluged at the flood (see 2 Pet 2:4-9). Judgments within history are made a basis for affirming the reality of the coming judgment of the last day, which, like the creation, is to be by the word of the Lord (2 Pet 3:7). The delay is explained in terms of the compassion of the Lord, who does not will that any should perish. Nevertheless, the day of the Lord* (judgment) will come suddenly and unexpectedly, when heaven and earth will be dissolved cataclysmically with fire (2 Pet 3:10, 12). The fire of judgment purifies a creation beyond redemption, though there are those to be saved out of it who await the promise of new heaven and new earth in which righteousness dwells (2 Pet 3:13; cf. Rev 21:1). Meanwhile the faithful are granted divine aid to escape from the corruption that is in the world (kosmos) and to become partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet 1:3-4). In this context the message of judgment is used to reinforce the exhortation to live a life of godliness (2 Pet 3:11-13).

2.5. 1, 2 and 3 John. The Johannine epistles are dominated by the use of kosmos. 1 John stands with the Gospel of John (where kosmos is used seventy-eight times) in its understanding of the world. While there is no explicit teaching on creation, the teaching of the Gospel, which seems to underpin that of the Epistles, should be presupposed. The outcome is a hostile world that shows hatred toward believers (Jn 15:18-25; 1 Jn 3:13; 4:1-6). Consequently, believers are exhorted not to love* the world, which is passing away (1 Jn 2:15-17). The world lies in the power of "the evil one" (1 Jn 5:19) and is characterized as being in darkness, apart from God's light (1 Jn 1:7) and in death (1 Jn 3:14).

People are divided into children of God and children of the devil (1 Jn 3:10; 5:18-19), who sinned in the beginning (1 Jn 3:8). The transition from the darkness to the light and from death to life is manifest in love for one another. Jesus Christ died to deal with the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2:2); he was manifest to take away sins (1 Jn 3:5; 4:9-10) and to destroy the works of the devil (1 Jn 3:8); he was sent to be the savior of the world (1 Jn 4:14). The present time is characterized as the last hour when many antichrists* and false prophets have appeared in the world (1 Jn 2:18; 4:1). Yet everyone born of God conquers the world (1 Jn 5:4), and the young men have conquered the evil one (1 Jn 2:13-14).

There is also expectation of the day of judgment (1 Jn 4:17) at the manifestation or Parousia of Jesus (1 Jn 2:28). Thus 1 John portrays a threefold assault on the world and the devil: the historic mission of Jesus, the triumphant faith of believers (1 Jn 5:4) and the Parousia of Jesus in judgment. 2 John also affirms that many deceivers have gone out into the world and that the person who refuses to confess Jesus Christ coming in the flesh* is the deceiver and the antichrist (2 Jn 7).

2.6. Jude. Jude* may have been used by the author of 2 Peter, but the two works have different purposes. The scoffers of Jude 18, however, are those who deny the coming day of judgment (2 Pet 3:3-4). Jude presupposes a world under the influence of the devil, with whom Michael struggled (Jude 9; see Rev 12:7-12). For those who serve the devil's purposes, the nether gloom of darkness has been reserved forever (Jude 13). The punishment is also described in alternative imagery of fire from which those who are saved are snatched (Jude 23). Jude affirms the certainty of judgment, appealing to the salvation of the people out of Egypt and the judgment of those who did not believe; the judgment of the angels who did not keep their appointed place, who are now kept in eternal chains until the judgment day; and the punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah with eternal fire. Thus the judgment of those who troubled the addressees of Jude is assured.

2.7. The Apocalypse of John. The linguistic evidence of this book is distinct from the rest of the Johannine literature. In the Apocalypse gē ("earth") is used eighty-two times, while kosmos ("world") is used only three times, two of which (Rev 13:8; 17:8) occur in reference to those whose names were written in the book of life from the foundation of the world (apo katabolēs kosmou). In the third (Rev 11:15) a great voice in heaven announces that "the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he will reign forever and ever," indicating the opposition of the "world" to God. Nevertheless, the world, spoken of as "all things" (ta panta), is God's creation (Rev 4:11) and comprises every creature in heaven, on earth, under the earth, in the sea and all therein (Rev 5:13). In this formulation "the earth" is more or less the equivalent of "the inhabited earth" (oikoumenē], a description with which it appears in parallelism (Rev 3:10; 12:9). This usage is common in the poetic works of the Septuagint, where oikoumenē was used to translate tēbēl and gē was used to translate 'ereṣ.

God is characterized as eternal, "the one who is and who was and who is to come" (ho ōn kai ho ēn kai ho erchomenos, Rev 1:4, 8; 4:8; 11:17; 16:5). The future is characterized in terms of the coming of God, and the phrase "forever and ever" is appropriately used of God. But the creation has a beginning, and the heaven and earth and sea will become obsolete and pass away (Rev 21:1). The temporality of the creation is stressed.

Further, the world, though created by God, is dominantly evil; Rome,* characterized as great Babylon,* epitomizes the powers of evil (Rev 17-18). The faithful witnesses to Jesus must pass through great afflictions and endure suffering.* The struggle on earth has as a counterpart a war in heaven between Michael and his angels and the dragon (the ancient serpent, the devil, Satan; see Beasts) and his angels (Rev 12:7-12). Although the devil and his angels are cast out of heaven, they come down to earth to wreak havoc. This is apparently the great trial coming on all who dwell on the earth (Rev 3:10). Nevertheless, heaven is called to rejoice because, although the event signals coming trouble on earth, it also signals the imminent end of the devil's reign and of his role as the accuser of the faithful. The prospective period appears to be three and a half years, or 1,260 days (Rev 11:2-3; 12:6; 13:5).

Thus Revelation is oriented to the end of history and the final judgment. The righteous call out to God "How long?" before he judges and avenges his faithful servants (Rev 6:10). The prospect of cataclysmic judgment is depicted (Rev 6:12-17), and the fate of the faithful and the wicked at the judgment is set out (Rev 7:13-17; 21:3-8). There is, however, an apparent conflict in the account of the prospects for the future of the world. There is the assertion that the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ who will reign forever (Rev 11:15). Alternatively, the first heaven and earth pass away, to be replaced by a new heaven and a new earth (Rev 21:1). This is a warning against treating the imagery as factual information that can be added together like pieces of a jigsaw puzzle to make up a complete picture. Rather it seems that alternative sets of imagery are used to enrich the reader's perception of reality. Thus both views (Rev 11:15; 21:1) depict a radically transformed order and make the reader aware that the present world does not yet conform to the loving purposes of God.

3. Beyond the New Testament.

In the second century the understanding of the world and creation became a battleground. Aided by those works that depicted the alienation of the world from God (esp. Paul, the Gospel and epistles of John and Revelation) and recognizing the chaos of life and the breakdown of values in the Roman Empire,* the Jewish and Christian teaching about creation was challenged by Marcion* and the early gnostic* teachers such as Valentinus. Marcion apparently taught that the Creator of the world, worshiped by the Jews and spoken of in their Scriptures, was not the God and Father of Jesus. Jesus was not the Jewish Messiah but had been sent by his Father to set right the mess caused by the morally and creatively inferior creator god. Valentinus taught that the world is a kind of accident caused by a lack within the divine pleroma that produced error, and from the error the world was born. Thus both Marcion and Valentinus took further the recognition of the hostility of the world to God, which is to be found in Jewish apocalyptic works, by denying any positive connection between God and the world. In response to this challenge Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria and Origen were challenged to deal with the problem of theodicy in new and more effective ways that enabled them to affirm the goodness of the creation without ignoring the problem of human and natural evil.

See also APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; WORLD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1951, 1955); idem, "The Understanding of Man and the World in the New Testament and in the Greek World" in Essays Philosophical and Theological (London: SCM, 1955) 67-89; C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953); idem, The Johannine Epistles (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1946); J. G. Gibbs, Creation and Redemption (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); G. Gloege, "Welt," RGG^{3} 6:1595 ff.; G. Johnston, "Oikoumene and kosmos in the New Testament," NTS 10 (1963-64) 352-60; O. Michel, "ἡ οἰκουμένη," TDNT 5:157-59; R. A. Norris, God and World in Early Christian Theology: A Study in Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian and Origen (London: A & C Black, 1966); E. F. Osborn, The Beginning of Christian Philosophy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981) chap. 5; H. Sasse, "αἰών, αἰώνιος," TDNT 1:197-209; idem, "γῆ, ἐπίγειος," TDNT 1:677-81; idem, "κόσμος," TDNT 3:868-95; R. Schnackenburg, Christliche Existenz nach dem Neuen Testament: Abhandlungen und Vortrage (2 vols.; München: Kösel, 1967, 1968). J. Painter

CREEDS, CONFESSIONAL FORMS

It has become common to distinguish between creeds, such as the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed (conventional titles that, as with the Athanasian Creed, give a misleading account of their origins), and confessions, such as the Augsburg Confession (1530), the Scots Confession (1560) and the Westminster Confession (1647), normally to the detriment of the latter. Yet the contrast is usually overdrawn. No sharp differentiation between them can be sustained, apart from the rather obvious one that the three creeds were produced in a still largely united church and in the case of the Nicene Creed as a basis for safeguarding unity.

But no creed, however venerable, is free of the limitations of its original context or can be interpreted without regard for it. Thus in the Apostles' Creed, "Father" almost certainly denotes God's* role as Creator, while in the Nicene Creed, "one baptism for the remission of sins" cannot originally have covered infant baptism* since the responsible church fathers did not believe that infants had sins to be remitted (Wright). In the case of all the three early creeds, historical exegesis must include attention to the teachings each seeks to condemn or exclude. Hence one may understand the extraordinary fact that Pontius Pilate gets a mention in the Apostles' Creed, originally for antidocetic reasons (see Docetism).

Although no formal creeds or confessions appear in the NT, the identification and analysis of creedal elements and formulae, especially in the Pauline epistles, have engaged much scholarly energy in recent decades (see DPL, Creed). Telltale stylistic features have been enumerated and different settings, such as baptism and confession under persecution,* recognized and patterns of development discerned. Such study has emphasized that Christianity, in its earliest phase as the Jesus movement, was distinguished from the rest of Judaism* by its beliefs about Jesus of Nazareth. It was constituted confessionally. Recent translations of the NT often draw attention to creedal and confessional formulations by laying them out in stanza form (see for example 1 Tim 3:16). With the exception of 1 Peter,* the NT writings other than the Gospels and the Pauline epistles do not contain a great deal of relevant material bearing on creedal developments.

1. Acts of the Apostles
2. 1 Peter
2. 1 John
4. Other New Testament Writings
5. The Apostolic Fathers
6. Justin Martyr
7. The Rule of Faith
8. Toward the Apostles' Creed

1. Acts of the Apostles.

In the primitive mission* preaching to their fellow Jews, the apostles* and others repeatedly affirmed that Jesus was the Messiah. This basic homologia appears as a formulaic summary in Acts 9:22 and Acts 17:3 (introduced by hoti recitativum to denote a quotation) and elsewhere is frequent (cf. Acts 5:42; 18:5, 28), whereas the confession of Jesus as Lord* or as Son* of God is rare (for the latter see Acts 8:36 [Codex Bezae] and Acts 9:20; for the former see Acts 10:36 and Acts 11:20, both to Gentile* audiences).

In addition a two-part pattern is common in Acts,* comprising the antithesis of "you/they crucified Jesus" but "God raised him up" (Acts 2:22-24, 36; 3:15; 4:10; 5:30-31; 10:39-40; 17:2-3; 26:23). The first limb of this summary declaration varies considerably in wording. A shift is observable from the polemical directness of "you" (put to death) to "they," as is another transposition into the necessity for the Messiah to suffer (see Suffering). The context for most of the confessional forms in Acts is missionary proclamation. Exorcism is another context (cf. Acts 4:10), but both exorcism (or healing*) and baptism regularly include only the invocation of the name* of Jesus Christ* (cf. Acts 2:38; 3:6; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5; 22:16).

2. 1 Peter.

A long succession of scholars has found in 1 Peter a baptismal homily, or liturgy (see Liturgical Elements), or at least a pattern of catechesis that had baptism as a focal point (see Worship). Since baptism was indubitably a central context for the development of creeds in primitive Christianity, creedal fragments are recognizable in 1 Peter, most obviously at 1 Peter 3:18, with the death and resurrection* of Christ as the subject matter (see Death of Christ), formulaic phrasing ("the just for the unjust") and contrasting parallelism in the final clause ("put to death in the body, brought to life in the spirit"). The baptismal setting of 1 Peter 3:18-22 is obvious, and echoes of baptismal confession or doxology may well be present also in 1 Peter 3:21-22.

Other formulae in the epistle focus on either the resurrection (1 Pet 1:21) or the passion of Christ but not both at the same time. The sufferings of Christ are prominent throughout, partly because of the experiences of the intended readers, and the traditional catechetical resource of Isaiah 53 informs 1 Peter 2:21-24 in its recognizably stylized presentation of Christ's passion as both vicarious ("Christ suffered for you," 1 Pet 2:21; "he bore our sins in his body," 1 Pet 2:24) and yet exemplary (1 Pet 2:21).

3. 1 John.

The background in 1 John (see John, Letters of) is not baptism and Christian demeanor in persecution* but division and conflict over false teaching* (1 Jn 2:19). Short creedal criteria are cited throughout the letter: "Jesus is the Christ" (1 Jn 2:22; 5:1), "Jesus is the Son of God" (1 Jn 4:15; 5:5) and "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (1 Jn 4:2; cf. 2 Jn 7). They serve to debar one of the versions of Docetism that split the human Jesus from the divine Christ.

In addition to these christological formulae, others occur that confess the significance of the death of Christ, especially the repeated "propitiation for our sins" (1 Jn 2:2; 4:10; cf. 1 Jn 3:16, "Jesus Christ laid down his life for us"). The literary style of 1 John, with its penchant for short, lapidary clauses and sentences in a declarative rather than an argumentative or expository mode, makes it harder to isolate certain creedal or confessional elements. Yet the letter illustrates with sharp clarity how the core content of Christian teaching was summarized in situations of dispute to draw unambiguous lines between what would later be called heresy and orthodoxy ("the teaching of Christ," 2 Jn 9).

4. Other New Testament Writings.

The writer to the Hebrews* more than once appeals to "the confession" to which his readers must adhere (Heb 4:14; 10:23; cf. Heb 3:1), but little clue is given to its content (but cf. "Jesus the Son of God" in Heb 4:14). The summary of heads of elementary teachings about Christ found in Hebrews 6:1-2 reflects an extensive catechesis without echoing formulations of any degree of fixity.

In James* the only creedal-type affirmations are of the oneness of God (Jas 2:19; 4:12). Jude* ends with a formal doxology (Jude 24-25), and the Apocalypse of John (see Revelation, Book of) includes a number of verses that must belong to the worship of the congregations known to the author (cf. Rev 4:8, 11; 5:9-10, 12, 13; 7:12; 11:15, etc.). They reflect a Jewish Christian* milieu, but although they and other shorter formulae (e.g., "I am the Alpha and the Omega," Rev 1:8) are by no means bereft of creedal substance, they are best regarded from the perspective of the liturgical sources of the book. Various theories have been advanced, viewing it in terms of a lectionary framework or the celebration of the Christian pascha, for example. John's prophecy* stands within the line of development of early Christian worship rather than of creedal formulation.

5. The Apostolic Fathers.

The formation of creedal statements is one of those subjects (like, for example, attitudes to sabbath and Sunday and observance of the pascha) on which recognition of the continuity between the NT and the earliest post-NT or non-NT writings is particularly helpful. Even if no historical credit can be attached to the delightful legend (found in Rufinus of Aquileia's Commentary on the Apostles' Creed 2, written early in the fifth century) that after Pentecost* the apostles composed the creed known by their name at one sitting, each contributing a clause, nevertheless the development of creeds in general may be deemed in a less precise sense apostolic. This is so because the practice of using formalized summaries of central Christian beliefs goes back to the apostles themselves, and also the faith thus summarized more extensively in later generations derived from apostolic teaching and writing.

Ignatius* is the one of the apostolic fathers* in whose letters creed-like statements most obviously occur, usually with antiheretical import. The following is perhaps hymnodic in its antithetical rhythms:

> One alone is Physician,
> Both fleshly and spiritual.
> Born and unborn,
> God come in the flesh,
> True life in death,
> From both Mary and God,
> At first passible and then impassible,
> Jesus Christ our Lord.
> (Ign. Eph. 7.2)

Others more prosaic in style are found in Ignatius Ephesians 18.2 and in Letter to Polycarp 3.2. Of particular interest is the appearance of "in the time of Pontius Pilate" in three of these formulations (Ign. Magn. 11; Ign. Trall. 9; Ign. Smyrn. 1.2), illustrating, along with Ignatius's repeated use of the adverb "actually/really" (alēthōs), the strongly historical character of his christological confession against docetic denial. These embryonic creeds in Ignatius reflect the tendency of oft-repeated teaching to assume a standardized pattern. At this early stage it is unlikely that they echo an already elaborated baptismal confession in use at Antioch.* They bear more explicit connection with the Lord's Supper,* which Ignatius speaks of in realist terms, possessing significance only as the true flesh* and blood of the Christ who was truly flesh and truly died.

The quasi-creedal fragments in the other apostolic fathers are briefer and more varied. "Have we not one God and one Christ and one Spirit of grace who was poured upon us?" (1 Clem. 46.6) is at once trinitarian, baptismal and interrogatory, a combination prophetic of later developments. Elsewhere Clement (see Clement of Rome) uses phrases more reminiscent of the kerygma focused on Christ (e.g., "Jesus Christ, our Lord by the will of God, gave his blood on our behalf," 1 Clem. 49.6). Formulae of different kinds—triadic, binitarian (naming God the Father and Christ but not the Spirit) and confessing Christ alone—were already attested in the NT. The *Didache instructs baptism "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Did. 7.1; cf. Mt 28:19), confirming evidence that a trinitarian confession was normal at baptism probably by the end of the first century.

6. Justin Martyr.

Among the second-century writers before Irenaeus and Tertullian, Justin Martyr, who came from Palestine but taught and died (c. 165) in Rome,* is the most informative on creedal developments. In the first case he gives the fullest account of baptism to date: "There is pronounced over the one who elects to be born again and has repented of his sins the name of God the Father and Lord of the universe, the person who leads the one to be washed to the water calling him by this name alone. . . . Also in the name of Jesus Christ, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and in the name of the Holy Spirit, who through the prophets foretold everything about Jesus, the one to be enlightened is washed" (Justin Martyr Apol. I 61.10). The italicized clauses must be fairly close to the wording used by the minister of baptism (not by the candidate) in the Roman church.

Second, Justin's writings furnish several creedal-like summaries of Christian beliefs, whose open elucidation is one of his chief apologetic purposes. Some of these statements are in threefold form (the most developed at Apol. I 13), but more of them focus on Christ alone. Of the latter the Dialogue with Trypho 85.2 provides an instructive example: "In the name of this very one, the Son of God and first-born of all creation, and born through the virgin and become a passible human being, and crucified under Pontius Pilate by your people and dead, and risen from the dead and ascended to heaven, every demon that is exorcised is conquered and subdued." This passage reminds us of another context of creedal declaration; exorcism is by far the most frequently recorded miracle* in pre-Constantinian Christianity. Here and elsewhere in Justin (e.g., Apol. I 21.1; 46.5; Dial. Tryph. 63.1; 132.1) we meet a christological confession more elaborate than the second baptismal clause. Other settings than exorcism, particularly of teaching and preaching,* seem to have nurtured the increasingly standardized christological statements. In Justin they remain close to the apostolic kerygma, scarcely reflecting at all the apologetically slanted logos theology his writings promote (see Christology; Logos).

7. The Rule of Faith.

Christian writers of the late second and early third centuries, especially Irenaeus, Tertullian and Origen, present statements of what Irenaeus calls "the faith [which] the church, though dispersed throughout the whole world . . . , has received from the apostles and their disciples" (Irenaeus Haer. 1.2) and what Origen calls "the proclamation of the church . . . preserved unaltered handed down in unbroken succession from the apostles and existing to this day in the churches" (Origen De Princ. 1. presc. 2). These summaries are usually termed the rule (Gk kanōn; Lat regula) of faith* or truth.* They are trinitarian in structure, considerably longer than any formula noted so far and not verbally fixed, as is evident from different texts of the rule within a single writer.

The apostolic fathers' common conviction is that the rule comprised the teaching handed on by the apostles (no claim is made for the apostolic authorship of its wording) and was everywhere uniform; a fragment of Hegesippus records that on a journey from Palestine to Rome he found very many bishops teaching the same faith: "in every succession and in every city what the law and the prophets and the Lord preach is faithfully followed" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.22.1, 3). In reality it represented the sum and substance of the public faith of the local church in question, filtered through the particular theological lens of the apostolic father in question. Thus Irenaeus's rule touches on his distinctive notion of recapitulation, while Origen's includes paragraphs on the soul and free will.

Again, while the rule is advanced as the essence of the church's teaching voice ever since its apostolic foundation, it is not set over against the apostolic writings. From one perspective it may be viewed as what the teaching mind of the church receives from the apostolic Scriptures. From another perspective the rule consists of one of three or four strands woven inextricably together in mainstream second-century Christianity's vindication of its apostolic credentials, in rejection of Gnosticism* and other, lesser false claimants to apostolic descent. Within churches of demonstrable apostolic foundation or close association, the rule of faith stands for the unbroken continuity of public (not secret or esoteric) teaching from the time of the apostles onward (not latter-day novelties), carried by a historically recognizable succession of teachers (presbyters or bishops) and by an openly transmitted corpus of apostolic writings (a canon* larger than Marcion's but exclusive of many gnostic gospels, etc.). As such the appeal to the rule of faith had validity for only a limited period of living memory (Irenaeus, c. 200, believed he knew the apostle John through Polycarp*; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.4-8); by Origen's time it is losing obvious contact with the apostolic kerygma.

Since the diverse gnostic platforms chiefly stimulated the elaboration of the rule of faith but always in continuity with earlier trends toward more stereotypical summaries of church teaching seen in Ignatius and Justin, so its content reflected anti-gnostic emphases on the goodness of Creator and creation,* the historical reality of the incarnation of the Son, the unity of old and new covenants* and the concreteness of the last things.

8. Toward the Apostles' Creed.

The rule of faith is not to be confused with a fixed creed, but it cannot be separated from the development of the latter. For if baptism was the locus of the creed, prebaptismal instruction embodied the elements of the rule of faith. In turn the formulation of the rule may have influenced the wording of the creed at critical points.

Just as the rule of faith varied from church to church, so all creeds were originally local (there was no one Apostles' Creed). Yet not only is the development of a verbally fixed creed most easily traced for Rome, but also what happened at Rome in this respect as in others proved normative for elsewhere in the West. The Old Roman creed (as scholars call it; see the masterly work by Kelly) of c. 200 was in essence not far short of what was first called "the Apostles' Creed" (Symbolon) in the later fourth century and had received its definitive form by the eighth. The chief witness for the Old Roman creed is the Apostolic Tradition, commonly attributed to Hippolytus of Rome c. 215 but increasingly viewed as a compilation of traditions over a longer period.

The main surprise for modern readers is the form of the baptismal creed in Hippolytus: not declaratory ("I believe in God . . . ") but interrogatory. The baptizing minister asked the candidate "Do you believe . . . ?" three times, baptizing him or her after each response of "I believe." The structure is trinitarian, the first question is very brief ("Do you believe in God, the Father Almighty?") and the third not much longer ("Do you believe in the Holy Spirit, in the holy church and the resurrection of the flesh?"; the text is not wholly certain). The second in length and emphasis sums up the development that this article has traced: "Do you believe in Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who was born by the Holy Spirit of the virgin Mary, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and was dead [and buried], and rose the third day alive from the dead, and ascended into heaven and was seated at the right hand of the Father, and will come to judge the living and the dead?" (Hippolytus Apos. Trad. 21).

Scholars agree that this interrogatory form goes back to earliest creedal beginnings. The expansion of Hippolytus's second clause compared with Justin's version less than a half-century earlier at Rome probably points to the impact of the gnostic crisis and the influence, or symbiosis, of the rule of faith. By the of the second century both rule and creed bear eloquent testimony to the christological and historical heart of the church's faith.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GOSPEL; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; TRUTH; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, "Bekenntnis- und Liedfragmente im ersten Petrusbrief," ConNT 11 (1949) 1-14; P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Catechism: A Study in the Epistles (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1940); L. W. Countryman, "Tertullian and the Regula Fidei," SecCent 2 (1982) 208-27; J. Crehan, Early Christian Baptism and the Creed: A Study in Ante-Nicene Theology (London: Burns, Oates & Washbourne, 1950); O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confessions (London: Lutterworth, 1949); C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936); W. R. Farmer, "Galatians and the Second-Century Development of the Regula Fidei," SecCent 4 (1984) 143-70; R. P. C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church (London: SCM, 1962); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (2d ed.; London: Longmans, 1960); V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963); A. M. Ritter, "Glaubensbekenntnis(se), V. Alte Kirche," TRE 13 (1984) 399-412; J. Stevenson, ed., W. H. C. Frend, rev. ed., A New Eusebius: Documents Illustrating the History of the Church to A.D. 337 (rev. ed.; London: SPCK, 1987); D. van den Eynde, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles (Gembloux: Duculot, 1933); K. Wengst, "Glaubensbeken-ntnis(se), IV. Neues Testament," TRE 13 (1984) 392-99; D. F. Wright, "The Meaning and Reference of 'One Baptism for the Remission of Sins' in the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed," SP 19 (1989) 281-85.

D. F. Wright

CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE

For Christianity generally, the "theology of the cross" (or theologia crucis) has been the criterion by which all Christian thinking and living are tested. The cross is seen as the sole ground of salvation,* the starting point of all authentic Christian thought and the indispensable center of the theological enterprise. But we do not find a uniform theologia crucis in the NT, and indeed considerable differences may be observed between the NT and the writings of the post-apostolic period. Some of the latter abandon it altogether (see comments on the *Shepherd of Hermas below), but generally we will survey a variety of authors for whom the cross was central to their theology but who gave different expression to their convictions because of the differing circumstances they faced. They thus point contemporary theology to differing ways in which the cross addresses human needs (see DPL, Cross, Theology of the).

1. Later New Testament Writings
2. Post-New Testament Writings

1. Later New Testament Writings.

1.1. Acts. Older scholarship held that "Luke fails to attach special significance to the crucifixion and death of Jesus. . . . There is no Passion-mysticism such as is found in Paul, no appreciation of the paradox of the crucified Messiah presented as the burning centre of the Christian message" (Hanson, 43-44). Instead, Luke's focus rests on the resurrection* and ascension* of Christ,* which releases the outpouring of the Holy Spirit* and the universal offer of forgiveness* through repentance,* faith* and baptism* (Acts 2:32-33, 38; 3:14-16; 13:32-39). The death of Jesus features chiefly as the sin that reveals the culpability of Israel's* leaders (Acts 3:14, 5:30; see Death of Christ), even if God* had also planned it (Acts 2:23).

More recently the picture has been balanced. First, C. K. Barrett argued that a theologia crucis involves more than just a theory about what was achieved on the cross. It also concerns "a pattern of daily life, in which the believer practices the daily discipline (in the strictest sense of the term) of cross-bearing" (Barrett, 77). And he does not find it hard to show that this is the case in Acts.* The apostles are anything but triumphant figures. They are persecuted, suffer great reversals and "through many tribulations . . . enter the kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22; cf. Acts 9:16). They thus live out the death-resurrection pattern of their Lord, which is exactly what we find in Paul (2 Cor 4:7-12).

Second, R. H. Fuller has pointed to Luke's connection between the passion and "the forgiveness of sins" (see Lk 24:46-47; Acts 2:38, 3:18-19, 5:31, 10:43; 13:38-39). "Luke accepted and transmitted a tradition which identified with the belief that the passion effected remission of sins and that this salvific event was made available through baptism" (Fuller, 217). Implicitly, therefore, the death of Christ is treated as salvific, even if Luke does not spell it out (though cf. Acts 20:28).

Third, J. B. Green has shown that from the start Jesus' death was interpreted through the traditions of the "Suffering Righteous" and the "Servant of the Lord." Since Luke employs both terms in his opening speeches (Acts 3:13-14, 26; 4:27, 30; 7:52), since the "Servant of the Lord" traditions clearly enabled the first Christians to explain the death of the Messiah as salvific, and since the apologetic context of early preaching* would inevitably have laid emphasis on God's vindication of the crucified Messiah, a good case can be made that Luke does not reject a salvific understanding of the cross in Acts but rather presupposes and defends it by emphasizing the resurrection.

1.2. Hebrews. In Hebrews* the picture is very different. The cross takes center stage as the author draws heavily on OT cultic and sacrificial language to explain Christ. "Without the shedding of blood forgiveness cannot happen" (Heb 9:22) is a fundamental presupposition, not just a comment about the OT cult. Christ's blood is different from that of the animal victims: it is effective. The blood of animals could provide ritual purity* (Heb 9:13) but not forgiveness (Heb 10:4). But the blood of Christ cleanses the conscience* (Heb 9:14; 10:11-14, 22).

Why is this? The language of Hebrews is stirring, but we cannot help pressing to find the theological rationale for this emphasis on the effectiveness of the cross. E. Grässer finds it in the gnostic* idea of the preincarnate unity of Christ and his "children"; Hebrews 2:14 implies that Christ's children were already such before they "shared flesh and blood," and their "incarnation" is then made the reason for Christ's. Grässer suggests, then, that in Hebrews the cross works because of that existing family relationship between Christ and his children, so that automatically his death has an effect on them.

Apart from wider questions about the possibility of such gnostic influence on the NT, Grässer's explanation tends to undermine Hebrews's emphasis on faith as the vital means of obtaining the salvation won on the cross (Heb 11:1—12:3) and also undermines the possibility of apostasy.* The passionate warning passages (e.g., Heb 2:2-3; 3:12; 4:11) lose their force if salvation happens quasi-automatically on the basis of a relationship that exists apart from faith. But Grässer rightly points to the unique connection in Hebrews between salvation and incarnation—not only in Hebrews 2:14-18 but also in Hebrews 5:7-10 and Hebrews 10:5-10. The cross is the climax of a process of sacrifice* that embraces the whole incarnation of the Son,* through which he unites himself to flesh* and blood, so that he might then truly represent us as our high priest* in offering himself for us and entering the presence of God.

1.3. The Other General Letters. James* uniquely contains no reference to the death or resurrection of Christ. But if we employ Barrett's point about the theologia crucis in Acts, we understand that James pictures the Christian life on a death-resurrection pattern that must presuppose that a message about the cross formed part of the "word of truth" by which "he brought us to birth" (Jas 1:18). But his strongly pastoral and ethical* purpose does not require him to make this explicit.

We find the opposite in 1 Peter.* Here the purpose is also pastoral and ethical—the encouragement and instruction of scattered and potentially persecuted believers—but an explicit theologia crucis is germane. "The theme of Christian suffering dominates the whole letter, and . . . it is one of the writer's chief aims to bring this suffering into relationship with the suffering of Christ" (Dalton, 123; see Persecution; Suffering). This the author does by underlining the example of Christ (1 Pet 2:21-25) but also and chiefly by pointing to his victory, through the cross, over all the unbelieving powers arrayed against his readers (this is Dalton's persuasive interpretation of 1 Peter 3:17-22).

Similarly in 1 John (see John, Letters of) the purpose is clearly pastoral. An explicit theologia crucis has an important role to play in giving confidence about the forgiveness of sins (1 Jn 2:1-2), in providing a role model of Christian love* (1 Jn 3:16-18) and as a vital doctrinal test distinguishing the Spirit of God from that of antichrist.* The view that it was not God's Son who died on the cross but a mere human being from whom the Son of God had just departed denies the heart of the gospel: the cross as a demonstration of God's love in sending his Son as "the atoning sacrifice for our sins" (1 Jn 4:10 NRSV).

1.4. Revelation. The vision* of "the Lamb, standing as slain" (Rev 5:6) is central to the book (see Revelation, Book of). Death and resurrection are incorporated into a remarkably high christology,* with divine titles, attributes and functions being applied without hesitation to Christ. As R. J. Bauckham puts it (55-56), Christ "as 'the living one' ([Rev] 1:18) shares God's eternal livingness," but "his eternal livingness was interrupted by the experience of a human death, and he shares the eternal life of God through triumph over death." This triumph is displayed in Revelation 5:5-6, where John first hears that "the Lion of the tribe of Judah has conquered" but then sees the slain Lamb* on the throne. The Lion's victory has been achieved through innocence, weakness and death.

This then becomes the pattern for the church*: "They too have conquered him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony (martyria); they did not prefer their own lives to death" (Rev 12:11). Here it seems clear that "the blood of the Lamb" connotes their blood as well as Jesus' (Bauckham). In Revelation, martyrdom* is of the essence of discipleship, not because every follower of Christ will be martyred but because "testimony" means an association with Christ that may not stop short of it, if necessary.

2. Post-New Testament Writings.

2.1. Clement of Rome. A theologia crucis is barely visible in Clement (see Clement of Rome), which is particularly surprising in view of his clear love of Hebrews. As in the case of James, however, the limitations of his aim may explain this. The blood of Christ brings "the grace of repentance" to the world in this generation, parallel to other generations called to repentance by Noah and Jonah (1 Clem. 7.4-7). Clement frequently uses the cross to reinforce his moral appeal to love and humility (e.g., 1 Clem. 16; 21; 49.6).

2.2. Ignatius. Ignatius* is very different. Facing martyrdom, he says, "My spirit is now all humble devotion to the cross, which is a stumbling block to unbelievers but to us salvation and eternal life" (Ign. Eph. 18.1). For him martyrdom was something to be sought actively as a means of union with Christ. "I seek him who died for us! I want him, who rose for us! Birth pangs are upon me" (Ign. Rom. 6.1). His own forthcoming physical death underlines for him the importance of the real, physical death of Christ; hence his passionate opposition to the Docetists,* who "deny his death—but it is the mystery through which we have received the gift of faith; and because of it we endure, so that we may be found as disciples of Jesus Christ, our only teacher" (Ign. Magn. 9.2).

A mystical, personal union with Christ is at the heart of Ignatius's vision, and its physical component, related to his own death, produces for him his twin emphases on the physical unity of the Christian community around the symbolic person of the bishop and on the Eucharist as a real participation in the body and blood of Christ.

There is much in Ignatius that reexpresses the authentic Pauline theologia crucis, but there are new thoughts as well: particularly the desire for martyrdom and the emphasis on the Eucharist both as a real participation in the death of Christ and as a focus of the unity of the church around bishop and clergy.

2.3. Lesser Works. The *Epistle to Diognetus reaches a rhetorical climax with the presentation of the love of God displayed in the gift of his Son to be our ransom from sin (Diogn. 9). The author does not say that the ransom was effected through Christ's death, a strange oversight in an evangelistic tract directed at unbelievers. The *Epistle of Barnabas has a strongly polemical edge to its presentation of the incarnation and death of Christ (chiefly in Barn. 5—6 but also later). The aim is to show that the Scriptures prophesy his death for us, so that they do not belong to Israel but to the church. The result is that "the Lord conferred [the covenant] on us, making us the People of the Inheritance by His sufferings on our behalf. Though the purpose of the incarnation was partly to allow them to put the final seal on their sins, it was also that we might receive the covenant of the Lord Jesus from its rightful heir" (Barn. 14.4-5, Staniforth).

It is sobering to reflect on the enormous popularity of the *Shepherd of Hermas in the second and third centuries—often it is treated on a par with the NT. In its first two parts, the Vision and the Mandates, Christ is not mentioned. He appears in several passages of the Similitudes (Herm. Sim. 5.6; 8.3; 9.12), where an adoptionist christology is espoused and he is presented as the giver of new law. In only one passage are his sufferings mentioned. This work represents a marginalization of authentic Christian faith in favor of a visionary romanticism and moralism.

2.4. Justin Martyr. Justin's remarkable theologia crucis is hard to analyze. On the one hand the cross was clearly central for him: he refers to it repeatedly and is no runner-up to Ignatius in attacking Docetists who deny Christ's sufferings (e.g., Apol. I 63.10; Dial. Tryph. 103.8). He finds the cross foreshadowed throughout the OT (Dial. Tryph. 86) and in nature (Apol. I 55.2-7). In Dialogue with Trypho 94—96 he draws heavily on Galatians 3 in presenting Christ as the one who bears our curse, although, as E. R. Goodenough notes (259-60), he leaves vital parts of the argument to be inferred (i.e., it was our curse that Christ bore, and Christ bore away the curse by his death).

On the other hand it is clear that the essential elements of Justin's soteriology lie elsewhere. His doctrine of the "spermatic Logos" (his belief, drawn from middle Platonism, that every human being already possesses a "seed" of the Logos* of God, which is Christ) led him to emphasize the revelation* of the truth* as the vital center of Christ's ministry.* "He is his Logos, his firstborn and his power, and by his will he became man so that he might teach us these things, in order to turn and lift the human race" (Dial. Tryph. 23.2). And he believed that all truly rational human beings would respond to the patient explanation of the truth revealed by Christ: this is the evangelistic theory on which his chief writings rest, his two Apologies and his Dialogue with Trypho.

So why then the cross? Justin's answer would doubtless relate to the demons. The devil (see Satan) and demons are the chief enemies of truth and instigators of persecution and martyrdom. The heart of the atonement is the destruction of their power, so that they may no longer deceive (e.g., Dial. Tryph. 45.4; 76.6; 121.2-3). Justin proves the truth of Christianity by pointing to successful exorcisms by the name* of Christ (Apol. II 6.6).

However, Justin never explains how the cross achieves this victory over the demons—a puzzling gap in his thinking, for he emphasizes Christ's power over the demons during his ministry by virtue just of his incarnation. So we should probably agree with L. W. Barnard (125) that Justin's belief in the cross as the heart of the atonement attests the teaching of the church that he joined. He took it up as a central article of the faith but never managed to integrate it into his Platonist presentation of it.

See also DEATH OF CHRIST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. B. Adamson, James: The Man and His Message (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); L. W. Barnard, Justin Martyr: His Life and Thought (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967); C. K. Barrett, "Theologia Crucis—in Acts?" in Theologia Crucis—Signum Crucis, ed. C. Andresen and G. Klein (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1979) 72-84; R. J. Bauckham, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); C. B. Cousar, A Theology of the Cross (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of 1 Peter 3:18—4:6 (AnBib 23; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1989); R. H. Fuller, "Luke and the Theologia Crucis" in Sin, Salvation and the Spirit, ed. D. Durken (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1979) 214-20; E. R. Goodenough, The Theology of Justin Martyr (Amsterdam: Philo Press, 1968 [1923]); E. Grässer, "Die Heilsbedeutung des Todes Jesu in Hebräer 2:14-18" in Theologia Crucis—Signum Crucis, ed. C. Andresen and G. Klein (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1979) 165-84; J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative (WUNT 2.33; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1988); R. P. C. Hanson, The Acts (NClB; Oxford: Clarendon, 1967); E. F. Osborn, Justin Martyr (BHT 47; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1973); C. C. Richardson, The Christianity of Ignatius of Antioch (New York: AMS Press, 1967 [1935]); A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, eds., Ante-Nicene Christian Library (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1867) vols. 1-2; J. A. Robinson, Barnabas, Hermas and the Didache (London: SPCK, 1920); W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); M. Staniforth, Early Christian Writings: The Apostolic Fathers (Penguin Classics; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968). S. Motyer

CULT, EMPEROR. See EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT.

CURSE. See COVENANT, NEW COVENANT.

D

DARKNESS. See LIGHT AND DARKNESS.

DAVID. See ANCESTORS.

DAY OF THE LORD

The NT expression "the day of the Lord" is derived from similar expressions in the OT and extracanonical Jewish literature where it developed an eschatological orientation. It refers to the expectation of God's final judgment on the ungodly and the liberation and restoration of his people in the age to come. In the NT it developed a specifically Christian orientation in which the term Lord in the expression was understood as a reference to Jesus at his Parousia.

1. Origins in the Old Testament
2. Use in Extra-Canonical Jewish Literature
3. Use in Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation
4. Use in the Apostolic Fathers

1. Origins in the Old Testament.

The expression "day of the Lord" (Gk hēmera kyriou) is derived from the expression "day of Yahweh" (Heb yôm yhwh) which is found in certain OT prophetic books (e.g., Is 13:6, 9; Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11; 2:31 [MT 3:4]; 3:14 [MT 4:14]; Zeph 1:7, 14; Mal 3:23). Related expressions use "day" in similar ways, such as "the day of the wrath of Yahweh" (e.g., Ezek 7:19) or simply "the/that/your day" (e.g., Jer 50:31; Joel 3:18).

The earliest use of the expression in the OT, Amos 5:18-20, suggests that the term already existed in popular belief as a reference to the time when Yahweh would come to judge the foreign nations and, at the same time, to deliver and bless his people Israel (for a discussion of its origins, see von Rad 1959; Cathcart and the literature cited there). Amos countered this belief by portraying the day of Yahweh as his judgment upon Israel for unfaithfulness. Similar usage is found in other pre-exilic prophets (e.g., Zeph 1:7, 14; Joel 2:1). In some cases the prophetic oracles used the day of Yahweh to warn about the impending exile (e.g., Ezek 7:7-12), and later the exile was interpreted as the day of Yahweh having arrived (e.g., Ezek 34:12; Lam 1:12; 2:1, 22). The term "day of judgment" became an equivalent expression which emphasized this aspect of the "day of Yahweh."

In post-exilic contexts the day of Yahweh developed an eschatological orientation, with the expectation that Israel's enemies would be judged and the faithful remnant experience God's salvation* in a future age (e.g., Is 61:1-2; Zech 12—14; Mal 4:1-6).

2. Use in Extra-Canonical Jewish Literature.

Jewish apocalyptic* literature further developed the eschatological orientation of the later prophets by exploring questions of timing, signs and events surrounding the day of final judgment* and the age to come, and often expressing it in vivid, mythological terms (Russell, 92-96). In Greek versions of Jewish literature the term "day of Yahweh" became the "day of the Lord" (e.g., Pss. Sol. 15:12), probably under influence of the LXX which translated yôm yhwh as hēmera kyriou (e.g., Is 13:6, 9 LXX). Similar expressions such as the "day of the Mighty One" were also used (2 Apoc. Bar. 55:6). In addition, the expression "day of judgment" developed as an equivalent (e.g., 2 Esdr 7:38, 102, 104, 113; 12:34; Jdt 16:17; Add Esth 10:11; 1 Enoch 10:12; 22:11, 13; 27:3-4; 98:10; 99:15; 100:4; 104:5; T. Levi 1:1; 3:2-3; Adam and Eve 12:1; 26:4; cf. Is 34:8 LXX; Pss. Sol. 15:12; 1QS 10:19-20; 1QM 7:5; 13:14; 15:2-3), and the use of the simple expression "the/that/your day" continued (2 Apoc. Bar. 48:47; 49:2). Though the term itself is not used frequently, the concept of a day when God would judge and save pervades this literature (e.g., Apoc. Abr. 29:14-21; 1 Enoch 1:3-9; 100:1-6;

2 Apoc. Bar. 24:1-2; 83:1-7). In some instances an agent of judgment and restoration works on behalf of God, and so the day may be designated by some appropriate expression such as the "day of the Elect One" (1 Enoch 61:5; on agents of judgment and restoration, see Webb 1991, 219-60). This day is understood as bringing to an end the present age and to usher in the glorious age to come (e.g., 2 Esdr 7:112-114; 2 Enoch 65:5-11).

3. Use in Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation.

The Gospels and the letters of Paul use the terms "day of the Lord" and "day of judgment" in continuity with the emphases of Jewish apocalyptic* literature (e.g., Mt 10:15; 11:22, 24; 12:36; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Thess 2:2). They do, of course, understand the "Lord"* in the "day of the Lord" to be a reference to Jesus Christ and his role as judge at the Parousia* (e.g., 1 Cor 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14). Also in continuity with Jewish literature, Paul uses the expression "day of Christ" to identify explicitly Jesus Christ as the agent of judgment (Phil 1:10; 2:16; cf. Phil 1:6; 1 Cor 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14; see DJG, DPL, Eschatology).

3.1. Hebrews and James. While both Hebrews* and James* do have an eschatological orientation (e.g., Heb 1:2; Jas 1:12; 2:5) and allude to the Parousia and coming judgment (e.g., Heb 4:13; 9:27; 10:12-13, 27, 30-31, 37; 12:23; Jas 4:12; 5:7-9), the day of the Lord is not a major focus of these books. The one allusion is in Hebrews 10:25 which exhorts the readers to encourage one another, being motivated "as you see the day approaching" (cf. Heb 3:13).

3.2. 1 Peter. In 1 Peter* the eschatological orientation is more pronounced than in Hebrews and James (e.g., 1 Pet 4:7). In light of the readers' suffering,* the author encourages them to have hope in the eschatological salvation to be brought at the Parousia (e.g., 1 Pet 1:4-5; 4:13; 5:1, 4, 10). Eschatological judgment is a concomitant theme, reassuring the readers that the ungodly will be judged (1 Pet 4:5-6) and encouraging their own continued godliness and faithfulness (1 Pet 1:17; 4:17-18).

While these eschatological themes are prominent, the specific terminology of the day of the Lord is found only in 1 Peter 2:12 which refers to God's "day of visitation." This expression is derived from the OT which used it to refer to that "day" when God would "visit" his people in judgment (e.g., Is 10:3; Hos 9:7; Jer 6:15; cf. Sir 16:18; 1QS 4:18-19). The verb is also used for God "visiting" his people for their vindication and blessing (e.g., Gen 50:24; Wis 3:7; Pss. Sol. 11:1).

3.3. 2 Peter. In 2 Peter* the day of the Lord is a significant element, for the opponents against whom the letter is addressed are eschatological skeptics (see Adversaries). The Parousia of Jesus Christ, expected during the lifetime of the first generation of Christians, had not happened (2 Pet 3:4, 9), and so these scoffers rejected the notion of the Parousia (2 Pet 3:4) and a final judgment (2 Pet 2:3; 3:9).

While the delay of the Parousia was a problem for these scoffers, the author does not agree with them. Rather, he denounces these scoffers, affirming and arguing that the Parousia hope* and eschatological judgment are true. In so doing, the author uses the day of the Lord to support the argument. Rejecting the opponents' denial of coming judgment, the author affirms in 2 Peter 2:9 that God will "rescue the godly" but the unrighteous will be kept for "punishment at the day of judgment" (cf. 2 Pet 3:7). Having explained the Parousia's delay by affirming that God's timetable is different and that judgment may be delayed from a human point of view (2 Pet 3:8-9), the author states that, nevertheless "the day of the Lord will come like a thief" (2 Pet 3:10). In so doing the author draws imagery from early Christian, apocalyptic tradition (Mt 24:43-44 par. Lk 12:39-40; 1 Thess 5:2; Rev 3:3; 16:15) which stresses the unexpected nature of the Parousia and judgment. In 2 Peter 3:12, 18 the author uses two somewhat unusual expressions, the "day of God" and the "day of eternity." These terms probably are not intended to be distinguished from the "day of the Lord," but rather stress a particular element of expectation associated with that day.

3.4. 1, 2, 3 John. Eschatology is not a major concern in the Johannine letters,* but the orientation is present (1 Jn 2:17-18; 2:28; 3:2). The language of the day of judgment appears only in 1 John 4:17 where "confidence on the day of judgment" expresses the result of believers showing love for one another.

3.5. Jude. In contrast with 2 Peter (see above), eschatology is not one of the issues being debated between Jude* and his opponents. Rather, eschatology and eschatological judgment in particular are used by Jude as part of his rhetorical response to the threat posed to the community by the opponents. Thus Jude refers to examples of past judgment (Jude 5-7, 11) and the promise of future judgment (Jude 14-15, 17-18) to convince his readers that the opponents are under present judgment (Jude 4, 8, 13, 16, 19; cf. Webb 1996).

Jude's argument is steeped in the traditions of Jewish eschatology, and his understanding of judgment involves motifs of the day of the Lord (e.g., Jude 14-15, citing 1 Enoch 1:9, which begins in 1:1 by calling this the "day of tribulation"). But Jude uses the language explicitly in Jude 6, in which the evil angels* are kept by God "in perpetual chains under darkness for the judgment of the great day." While eschatological judgment is the predominant motif, Jude does allude to eschatological salvation, though he does not use "day of the Lord" terminology to do so (Jude 24-25; cf. Jude 1).

3.6. Revelation. Eschatological judgment and salvation are dominant themes in Revelation.* The author makes extensive use of Jewish and early Christian apocalyptic motifs to express these themes, including that of the day of the Lord. The precise term "day of the Lord" is not used (the expression, "Lord's day" in Rev 1:10 is not associated with this theme), but similar language does appear.

In Revelation 6:17, those who are fleeing from the One on the throne and the Lamb* describe their judgment as "the great day of their wrath has come, and who is able to stand?" And in Revelation 16:14 the demonic spirits* gather the kings of the world "for battle on the great day of God the Almighty." A parenthetical word from Jesus in the following verse (Rev 16:15) states, "Behold I am coming like a thief!" which associates this image with the day of the Lord as found elsewhere in early Christian thought (cf. Rev 3:3; Mt 24:43-44 par. Lk 12:39-40; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10). Though the term "day of judgment" does not appear, the expression "hour of judgment" is used in a synonymous way (Rev 14:7; 18:10; cf. 3:3, 10; 14:15; Mt 24:36 par. Mk 13:32; Mt 24:44 par. Lk 12:40).

The emphasis in Revelation's use of the day of the Lord is upon the judgment of the ungodly which has as its corollary the liberation and vindication of the righteous (e.g., Rev 6:10; 11:18; 16:6-7; 19:1-2). But in the letters to the seven churches in Revelation 2—3 language associated with the day of the Lord is used in at least one letter as a warning to the people of God themselves (Rev 3:3).

4. Use in the Apostolic Fathers.

Eschatological concerns of judgment and deliverance are not prominent in the apostolic fathers, but eschatological references are frequently made in passing (e.g., 1 Clem. 50.3-4; Did. 16.1-8; Herm. Vis. 2.2.5; 3.8.9; 3.9.5; 4.1—3; Ign. Eph. 11.1; Ign. Smyrn. 6.1; Mart. Poly. 2.1-2; 5.2; cf. Bruce). In most works of the apostolic fathers, references to eschatological matters do not use motifs associated with the day of the Lord. The two exceptions are the *Epistle of Barnabas and *2 Clement where ethical concerns are linked to eschatologically oriented motivation.

The Epistle of Barnabas refers to eschatological judgment (e.g., Barn. 4.12-13; 7.2), eschatological salvation (e.g., Barn. 1.6-7; 4.1; 21.1) as well as other eschatological themes (e.g., Barn. 4.3-5; 6.13; 18.2). With respect to motifs associated with the day of the Lord, Barnabas 15.4, alluding to 2 Peter 3:8, states, "behold the day of the Lord will be as a thousand years." Linking this with the six days of creation (Gen 2:2), the author calculates the eschaton to begin after six thousand years, and then proceeds with a brief description of the Parousia and the final judgment (Barn. 15.5). Later, in the midst of describing the ethical teaching of "the way of light," the author exhorts his readers in Barnabas 19.10 to "remember the day of judgment day and night." Finally, in the conclusion to the letter the author exhorts his readers to faithfulness, motivating them with references to eschatological judgment and salvation (Barn. 21.1-2) and then asserts that "the day is at hand when all things shall perish with the evil one; the Lord and his reward is at hand" (Barn. 21.3). Thus, his readers should seek to "be found faithful in the day of judgment" (Barn. 21.6).

In 2 Clement 12.1, Clement exhorts his readers to manifest continually love* and righteousness* while waiting for the kingdom* of God. The motivation expressed is that "we do not know the day of the appearing of God." Similarly, 2 Clement 16.1-2 exhorts the readers to repentance and abstinence from worldly enjoyments with the motivation being the imminence of the day of judgment: "And you know that the day of judgment is already coming as a burning oven, . . . and then the hidden and visible deeds of humankind will be revealed" (2 Clem. 16.3; alluding to Mal 4:1). Finally, 2 Clement 17.4 refers to the Parousia as "the day of his appearing" at which the unbelievers as well as "the ungodly who are among us" will be judged, while the righteous will be rewarded* (2 Clem. 17.5-7).

See also APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT; SALVATION; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Braumann, and C. Brown, "Present, etc.," NIDNTT 2:887-95; F. F. Bruce, "Eschatology in the Apostolic Fathers," in The Heritage of the Early Church: Essays in Honor of the Very Reverend Georges Vasilievich Florovsky, ed. D. Neiman and M. Schatkin (OCA 195; Rome: Pont. Institutum Studiorum Orientalium, 1973) 77-89; K. J. Cathcart, "Day of Yahweh," ABD 2:84-85; R. H. Hiers, "Day of Judgment," ABD 2:79-82; idem, "Day of the Lord," ABD 2:82-83; Y. Hoffmann, "The Day of the Lord as a Concept and a Term in the Prophetic Literature," ZAW 93 (1987) 37-50; J. H. le Roux, "The 'Last Days' in Apocalyptic Perspective," Neot 12 (1981) 41-74; R. L. Mayhue, "The Prophet's Watchword: Day of the Lord" GTJ 6 (1985) 231-46; H. H. Rowley, "The Day of the Lord" in The Faith of Israel: Aspects of Old Testament Thought (London, SCM, 1956) 177-201; D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic: 200 BC—AD 100 (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); D. Stuart, "The Sovereign's Day of Conquest," BASOR 221 (1976) 159-64; G. von Rad, "The Origin of the Concept of the Day of Yahweh," JSS 4 (1959) 97-108; G. von Rad and G. Delling, "ἡμέρα," TDNT 2:943-53; R. L. Webb, John the Baptizer and Prophet: A Socio-Historical Study (JSNTSup 62; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); idem, "The Eschatology of the Epistle of Jude and Its Rhetorical and Social Functions," BBR 6 (1996) 139-51; M. Weiss, "The Origin of the 'Day of the Lord'—Reconsidered," HUCA 37 (1966) 29-71.

R. L. Webb

DEACONS. See CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS. See QUMRAN.

DEATH. See LIFE AND DEATH.

DEATH OF CHRIST

The writings of the NT interpret the death of Christ fundamentally in sacrificial* terms as a vicarious atonement that secures the forgiveness* of sins. That is not to say that this understanding of the cross or the death of Christ itself always receives emphasis, although it frequently does. Rather, in the NT writings salvation* is conceived in such a way that it has its basis and completion in the forgiveness secured by the death of Christ on behalf of sinners (though the theme is assumed rather than explicit in James,* 2 Peter,* 2—3 John [see John, Letters of], Jude*). This category of thought clearly does not exclude others. The cross is also viewed as a divine victory, a deliverance of humanity from sin and evil, a revelation* of God* and his love* and a pattern of obedience.* No one form of description is exhaustive. The innermost aspects of God's working in the cross necessarily lie beyond human language, as the metaphorical language of the NT and the multiplicity of its images indicate.

Yet it is obviously not the case that nothing can be known or said about the saving effects of Christ's death. Characteristically the NT writers place objective guilt and radical, eschatological* forgiveness at the center of the structure of salvation, deriving all other aspects of the cross from it. The victory at the cross is victory because it secures the forgiveness of sins. Deliverance from sin's power issues from the release from objective guilt. The cross reveals God's love in that God gave his Son* for our sins. This conception of salvation as full forgiveness distinguishes the NT writings from those of the postapostolic period. The various images of salvation and the OT texts used to derive them are taken up in early Christianity of the second century. But the framework of thought shifts, so that salvation is conceived as the attainment of incorruption and becomes contingent upon the obedience of the believer.

1. Acts
2. Hebrews
3. 1 Peter
4. 1 John
5. Revelation
6. Apostolic Fathers

1. Acts.

The understanding of the death of Christ in Luke-Acts has been a center of scholarly interest in recent years. Early redaction-critical studies, particularly those by P. Vielhauer, Hans Conzelmann and Ernst Haenchen, regarded the author of Luke-Acts as lacking any interest in Jesus' death as an atonement and concomitantly charged him with embracing a theology of glory* that measured divine favor by the outward success of the church. Newer studies have moved in various directions: a number have called for an appreciation for a distinctively Lukan understanding of the death of Christ primarily as a pattern for Christian obedience (e.g., Green, Carroll, Garrett), a few have argued that the understanding of Jesus' death as an atonement holds a larger place in Lukan thought than is generally recognized (Moessner), and still others have reasserted the claim that Luke rejects such an understanding of Jesus' death (Ehrman).

When all the evidence has been taken into account, it becomes clear that Luke does understand Jesus' death as a vicarious atonement and that this understanding is foundational to the message of Luke-Acts. Luke obviously emphasizes the salvific nature of Jesus' resurrection,* yet in doing so he undergirds rather than diminishes the atoning significance of Jesus' death. Jesus' death is also paradigmatic and exemplary for Luke. Yet despite its current attractiveness as a category for understanding the death of Jesus in Luke-Acts, it is no more prominent than Luke's interpretation of the cross as an atonement. Finally, the Lukan emphasis on the divine purpose behind Jesus' death does not reduce the human responsibility for it.

1.1. Jesus' Death as an Atonement.

1.1.1. Text-Critical Considerations in Luke 22:19-20. Although twentieth-century textual criticism has been increasingly inclined to regard the longer version of the words of institution in Luke as original, B. D. Ehrman (198-209) has argued forcefully in favor of the judgment of Westcott and Hort that the shorter version is more likely authentic. The shorter text, one of Westcott and Hort's so-called Western noninterpolations, is preserved in Codex Bezae and various Old Latin manuscripts and omits the italicized material:

> [19]And taking bread, having given thanks he broke it and gave it to them, saying, "This is my body which is given for you. Do this in memory of me. [20]And the cup likewise, after they had eaten, saying, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is poured out for you." [21]But the hand of my betrayer is on the table.

Ehrman argues as follows: the external evidence for both readings runs back to the second century and cannot resolve the question; in cases such as this in which the Western witness is shorter it must be taken seriously; the usual explanations for an omission are inadequate (viz., that scribes were motivated by the desire either to harmonize Luke's account with Matthew and Mark or to keep the eucharistic words a secret); the vocabulary and more importantly the theology of the additional material are contrary to Lukan usage and thought.

Despite Ehrman's appeal to the significance of the shorter Western reading, its restriction to some Western witnesses at the very least raises some question about its originality, even if it does not decide the matter. And while Ehrman has rightly pointed out the inadequacy of the usual explanations for a scribal abbreviation of the text, an additional, persuasive possibility suggests itself. Although Luke undoubtedly intends the reader to understand Jesus to say that after this supper he will no longer eat and drink with his disciples, the tradition represented in Codex Bezae seems to have taken Jesus' words to mean that he would not participate in that very Passover (the Greek column of Bezae at Lk 22:15 divides touto to read epethymēsa [tou to] to pascha phagein, the genitive and accusative articles thereby created suggesting that Jesus' desire to eat the Passover with the apostles remained unfulfilled [cf. the genitive following epithymeō in 1 Tim 3:1; Ex 34:24 LXX; Prov 23:3, 6 LXX; Sir 16:1]; moreover Bezae at Lk 22:16 reads: "I certainly will no longer eat [ouketi mē phagomai; iam non manducabo] of it until it is eaten (brōthē; edatur) new in the kingdom of God"). The scribal omission of Luke 22:19-20 removes the troublesome reference to Jesus' eating (Lk 22:20) and the words of institution. Given the parallels in the other Synoptics and Paul, these words of institution nearly require the subsequent mention of the second cup, which in Luke is necessarily distinguished from the first by the reference to Jesus' having eaten. Once emended in this way, the passage also harmonizes nicely with the Matthean and Markan wording concerning the bread, breaking off precisely where they do and leaving Luke with one cup, even if it is out of the usual order (see, however, Did. 9.1-5). The only problem that the emendation failed to overcome is the adversative plēn, which begins Luke 22:21. In the shorter version the statement "the hand of my betrayer on the table" stands in contrast to Jesus' words "this is my body," an impossible juxtaposition, since the hand of the betrayer is not opposed to but is precisely the means of Jesus' death (i.e., his "body"). It appears then that the shorter version in Bezae and probably in the Western tradition in general represents an attempt to smooth out a perceived difficulty in the Lukan text and to remove Jesus' participation in the Passover.

The intrinsic probabilities of vocabulary do not weaken and may strengthen this judgment. Words unique to Luke appear in the longer text, in particular the references to the "remembrance" of Jesus and the new covenant. Yet this phenomenon is not different from the speeches of Acts, each of which contains distinctive vocabulary. Moreover a number of vocabulary items link the longer text to the surrounding material. The second person language ("on behalf of you" [twice]) corresponds to the Lukan context quite closely, including Jesus' desire to eat the Passover "with you" and his instruction regarding the first cup: to "take this and divide it among yourselves" (Lk 22:17-18). "Blood poured out on behalf of you" (Lk 22:20) varies from the Markan and Matthean "poured out on behalf of many" and corresponds to references to martyrdom elsewhere in Luke-Acts (Lk 11:50; Acts 22:20). Furthermore, like Mark, Luke indicates that Jesus gave the bread to his disciples (Lk 22:19; Mk 14:22). And in distinction to the Pauline version (1 Cor 11:24), Jesus indicates (Lk 22:19) that his body is "given for you." It is conceivable that a copyist artistically interwove the Markan ("giving") and Pauline ("for you"), but it is more likely that it is a Lukan composition, linking Luke 22:19 with its context (see also Green 1988, 28-42).

Intrinsic theological probabilities, because of the room they allow for subjective judgments, must be accorded the least weight in assessing the authenticity of any reading. The validity of Ehrman's claim that Luke nowhere else in the Gospel or Acts* portrays Jesus' death as an atonement depends on three considerations: the interpretation of Acts 20:28, to which we will turn shortly; the absence of explicit development of the theme of Jesus' death as an atonement for sin, despite numerous allusions to the Isaianic Servant* that suggest such an understanding (see 1.1.4.1 below); Luke's decision not to include the ransom saying from Mark 10:45. The last two observations provide only arguments from silence, which are fragile, particularly in this case.

It is of considerable importance that Luke transposes the disciples' dispute over greatness from the Markan position immediately following the third passion prediction (Mk 10:41-45) to its place in his Gospel following the Last Supper (Lk 22:24-27). The distinctively Lukan material in the longer version of the words of institution ("given for you," "new covenant in my blood") may serve as Luke's replacement for the saying he chose to omit. Luke's shifting of the material (or use of an alternative tradition; Green 1988, 44-46) adds considerable pathos and irony to the narrative. As Jesus speaks of his affection and self-giving, the disciples are caught up in self-seeking and quarrels. While in Mark greatness is described in terms of doing, in Luke it consists in what one is. The greatest is to be as the youngest and as one who serves, just as Jesus is one who serves. This emphasis corresponds to Luke's presentation of Jesus as the obedient Servant of God (see 1.1.3.1 below) and may therefore explain why Luke left out the ransom saying. He prefers to focus on Jesus' humility and submission to the divine will rather than on Jesus' own intent.

1.1.2. Summary of Luke 22:19-20. We may safely say that the weight of both external and internal evidence favors the originality of Luke 22:19-20 (for further discussion see Green 1988, 35-42). In this case Luke clearly attaches atoning significance to Jesus' death, especially in his allusion to Jeremiah 31:31-34. Jesus' body is given and his blood is poured out "on behalf of you," securing the new covenant* in which sins and transgressions are forgiven. This passage is pivotal to Luke-Acts, supplying for the reader the reason John's baptism* of repentance* for forgiveness is inadequate and faith* in Jesus is necessary (cf. Lk 3:3; 24:47; Acts 19:4). Luke does not want the reader to forget these words and intends the entire subsequent narrative of Acts to be read in light of them, as Acts 20:28 makes clear.

1.1.3. Acts 20:28. The second explicit reference to Christ's death as an atoning sacrifice appears in Acts 20:28, where text-critical and interpretive issues are again intertwined. Although the external evidence is evenly balanced, it is probable that the original text referred to "the church of God" rather than the variant "the church of the Lord." The latter reading most likely represents a scribal amelioration of the difficult wording, "the church of God that he acquired with his own blood," which suggests patripassianism (i.e., the Father is said to suffer) to modern ears, as it probably did to scribes of the third century and onward. Like the NRSV, most commentators opt for reading the passage as speaking of "the church of God, which he obtained with the blood of his own [Son]," for which the word Son is supplied. This is grammatically possible but unlikely. Luke frequently places adjectival modifiers in the form in question. Had he intended to speak of "God's own Son," he most likely would have included the final noun (cf. Rom 8:32). We are left with his striking language to describe the death of Christ. But how are we to understand it?

Ehrman's claim (202-3) that Luke regards Jesus' blood not as an atonement but as saving because it brings a recognition of guilt is unconvincing. The charge of guilt for Jesus' death is present only within the Jerusalem speeches and disappears after Acts 7. Moreover, in Acts it is not Jesus' death but the proclamation of his resurrection that brings repentance.

Statements that speak of the "suffering of God," "the crucified God" or even "the blood of God" are common in Christian writers until the end of the second century, when (monarchialist) conceptions of God existing in sequential modes forced further definition to avoid connotations of patripassianism (e.g., Ign. Eph. 1.1; see Elert, Ehrman, 87-88). We therefore should not be surprised to find such forms of expression in NT writers. The antecedent reference to Jesus' blood (Lk 22:19-20) makes it clear that when Luke uses the expression "God's own blood," he is thinking of Christ's blood and that as with the Christian writers of the second century, this statement represents a bold ascription of deity to Christ. The directness of Luke's statement is not unanticipated, since elsewhere he stresses that Jesus is Lord* with overtones of deity (e.g., Acts 2:21). And Paul, in whose mouth these words appear, is quite capable of making such a statement (Rom 9:5; 1 Cor 8:6).

We should not overlook the biblical allusions conveyed by Luke's language. The word that the NRSV renders "obtained" (peripoieō, cf. peripoiēsis) carries salvific overtones and might better be rendered "spared for himself" or "delivered for himself" (see Lk 17:33; Mal 3:17 LXX; Num 22:33 LXX; Ps 78:11 LXX; Jdt 11:9). Yet the word also conveys the sense of possession and therefore recalls the exodus in which God savingly acquired a people for himself. They are his "special possession" (s'gulâh; LXX periousios; Ex 19:5; Deut 7:6; 14:2; 26:18; cf. 1 Pet 2:9; Ps 73:2 LXX). Likewise the description of the people of God as a flock has its basis in the exodus (Ps 78:52; cf. Num 27:15-17). The reference to "God's own blood" therefore likely recalls the Passover and suggests a typology in which Christ transcends the original Passover. The striking Lukan wording then signals a contrast between the original Passover and the cross. If this reading of the text is correct, we have in Paul's speech at Miletus a powerful recollection of the words of institution in Luke 22:19-20, where Luke reports Jesus' interpretation of his death (precisely, his blood) as a new covenant. Notions of fulfillment are present in both passages. And the striking ascription of deity to Christ marks Acts 20:28 as a pivotal text.

In narrative, as opposed to direct theological discourse, the character of the speaker and the placement of speech count a great deal. The frequency of appearance of a thought or an expression is far less important than who says it and when it is said. It therefore must not escape our notice that this single explicit reference in Acts to the death of Jesus as an atonement appears at a crucial point, in the mouth of the one whom Luke presents as Christ's chosen vessel, the apostolic witness* in whom the promise of Acts 1:8 is fulfilled. Without diminishing the continuing witness of Paul, Luke presents his Miletus speech as the closure of his ministry* to the churches. That is apparent everywhere in the discourse, from Paul's prediction that he would not see the Ephesian elders again (Acts 20:25) to the potent christology* that we have noticed. The elders are in a sense responsible not merely for the Ephesian church but also for the "church of God." Therefore when Paul says that God has "delivered the church for himself with his own blood," Luke is indicating that Jesus' atoning death stands behind all that he has worked among Jews and Gentiles* since the cross (Lk 22:19-20). Rather than serving an insignificant role, the two explicit references to Jesus' atoning death bracket and inform the entire intervening narrative.

1.1.4. Allusions to Jesus' Death as an Atonement. How is it that Luke employs numerous biblical allusions to Jesus' death as a substitutionary atonement yet does not develop them? The answer lies partly in his emphasis on Jesus' resurrection and partly in the bracketing we have just observed. The words of institution and the subsequent statement of Paul provide the interpretation of Jesus' death as an atonement, which Luke reinforces by repeated allusions to the Isaianic Servant, the breaking of bread and the divine necessity of Jesus' death.

1.1.4.1. Jesus as the Isaianic Servant. The most prominent of these allusions is the section of Isaiah 53 that Philip* finds the Ethiopian eunuch reading (Acts 8:32-33; Is 53:7-8). Luke focuses on the unjust death of the Servant of God, yet notions of atonement lie tantalizingly close (Is 53:6) and come to mind for anyone who knows Jesus' words at the Last Supper and the larger Isaianic context.

This citation of Isaiah 53:7-8 does not stand alone in Luke-Acts. References to Jesus' identity as the Isaianic Servant extend back to Jesus' own definition of his ministry (Lk 4:18-19; Is 61:1-2) and into his passion (Lk 22:37; Is 53:12). As J. B. Green observes, the latter is the only instance of the Servant material found on Jesus' lips in the NT (Green 1990, 22). And only in Luke's account of Jesus' death is there a suggestion that the watching centurion unwittingly acknowledges Jesus as the "Righteous One," the Servant (Lk 23:47; Is 53:11, see Karris). Indeed, Luke regards the Servant passages of Isaiah as reflecting a larger biblical understanding of the role of the Messiah (Lk 24:25-27, 44-49), including his mission* to the Gentiles (Acts 13:47; see DJG Death of Jesus §6.3).

Jesus' role as the Servant clearly informs the speeches of Acts, where the running theme of reversal draws upon the biblical motif of the vindication of the suffering* righteous, which is central to the Servant passage of Isaiah 52:13—53:12. When Peter proclaims that God has "glorified his servant (pais), Jesus" and that the people rejected the "holy and righteous one" he uses the language of Isaiah 52:13 and Isaiah 53:11. The distinctive element of the Servant image that distinguishes it from the larger category of the righteous sufferer is the idea that forgiveness is given through him (Is 53:4-6, 10-11). This theme characterizes Luke's narrative. The offer of salvation to the thief on the cross and the omission of the words of dereliction tilts the Lukan passion narrative away from the Markan presentation of Jesus as a righteous sufferer and toward the Isaianic background (cf. Green 1990, 23). Likewise, the offer of forgiveness is central to the proclamation of the Christ in Acts (Acts 2:38-39; 3:18-20; 10:43; 13:38-39).

Luke therefore does not regard Jesus' death as that of a martyr or a hero, or even that of a biblical, righteous sufferer, but as that of the suffering Servant-Messiah through whom God offers the forgiveness of sins. This conception of Jesus and the Isaianic background that serves as its source reinforce the two Lukan references to Jesus' atoning death, and these references inform the entire presentation. Given Luke's abundant allusions to the Isaianic Servant, it is overwhelmingly likely that he intends his readers to draw this connection.

1.1.4.2. The Breaking of Bread. Luke also intends his readers to understand the believing community's "breaking bread" as an expression of faith and obedience to Jesus' injunction to "do this in remembrance of me" (Lk 22:19). As D. P. Moessner (182) observes, the misunderstanding and disappointment of the disciples on the way to Emmaus is reversed not simply by instruction from the unrecognized Jesus but in Jesus' breaking of the bread, suggesting that Jesus' words at the Last Supper represent the culmination of the biblical witness and the focal point of revelation (Lk 24:30-32). Moreover, as is the case with Luke's references to Jesus' atoning death, his references to the communal "breaking bread" bracket his presentation of the spread of the gospel. He includes it in his sketch of the piety of the infant church (Acts 2:42, 46) and mentions it again in Paul's closing meeting with the church at Troas (Acts 20:7, 11). Believers "break bread" along with instruction, fellowship* and prayer (Acts 2:42) and gather together for it on the first day of the week (Acts 20:7). Given their placement in the narrative, these descriptions are intended to show that the practices were typical of the churches. Luke thus indicates that the first disciples have followed Jesus' command to remember his atoning death. He expects his readers to do so as well.

1.1.4.3. Jesus' Death as a Divine Necessity. As with Matthew, Mark and John, in Luke-Acts Jesus' death is not simply the result of human ignorance and wrongdoing that God subsequently corrects by the resurrection. Rather the suffering of the Messiah is the will and plan of God, which must come to fulfillment. This theme appears not only in the passion predictions (Lk 9:22, 43; 18:31) and in the prediction of betrayal (Lk 22:21) but also in Jesus' reference to his role as the Isaianic Servant (Lk 22:37; Is 53:12). The divine necessity of Jesus' death consists in that which is written about him (Lk 24:26-27, 44-47; Acts 3:18; 10:43; 13:27; 17:3; 26:23). As the Messiah, Jesus is destined to fulfill the role prescribed for him as the Suffering Servant. This recurring motif subtly underscores Jesus' interpretation of his death as an atonement (Lk 22:19-20), since in it we have the one point in Luke-Acts at which the divine purpose for the cross is disclosed. Luke does not merely assert that the Messiah died because God willed it but supplies Jesus' own interpretation of that death.

Yet the theme of the necessity of the suffering of the Messiah also serves a larger, apologetic end in Acts. Far from disqualifying Jesus as the promised Messiah, his unjust death fulfills the words of the prophets* (e.g., Acts 13:27). This apology for the cross and Luke's interpretation of Jesus' death as an atonement are bound up with one another, as is his emphasis on the resurrection.

1.1.5. Jesus' Atoning Death and His Saving Resurrection. Luke presents the resurrection of Jesus as the central saving event in Acts in order to undergird the exclusive claims of the gospel. The resurrection not only confirms Jesus as the Servant Messiah but also elevates him into the role of risen Lord. The saving promises* of God for Israel* and the nations have now been fulfilled in him. Having poured out the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), he is now at work in the world sending the message of salvation to the ends of the earth (see Creation). He therefore is the sole mediator of salvation for humanity. He is not only the prophet like Moses,* whom all Israel must obey (Acts 3:22-26), but also the one who will judge the living and the dead and to whom all the world is accountable (Acts 10:42; 17:31). Salvation is given in his name alone (Acts 4:12).

As the fulfillment of promise, the resurrection also serves as an apology for the cross, vindicating Jesus as Messiah and Lord. This concern is especially apparent in Luke's references to Jesus' death "on the tree" (Acts 5:30; 10:39-40; 13:28-30), which reflect an early Jewish interpretation of Deuteronomy 21:22-23 as speaking of crucifixion as a punishment to be inflicted on those guilty of serious offenses (Wilcox; cf. 11QTemple 64:7-9). Questions of guilt and innocence are present in all three occurrences of this description of Jesus' death. In each case the speaker points to the resurrection as the exculpation of Jesus and confirmation of the divine favor resting on him. Luke's emphasis upon God's action suggests that he is aware of the divine curse that Deuteronomy 21:22-23 was regarded as pronouncing on the guilty, yet he does not develop the idea of Jesus' bearing a curse for others (cf. Gal 3:13). His focus is fixed on removing any doubts about God's vindication of Jesus.

Here we are brought back to one of the most pressing current questions about Luke's understanding of salvation. The tendency has been to suppose that since Luke leaves the theme of Jesus' death as an atonement undeveloped and places his main emphasis on the resurrection, he lacks such an understanding of Jesus' death (Vielhauer, Conzelmann) or rejects it, or, although he is aware of it, he has not appropriated it himself (see DJG Death of Jesus §6.2.1; Marshall 1970, 169-75).

But these judgments overlook the character of Acts as a narrative and the function of Luke's emphasis on the resurrection. As we noted, the infrequency of reference to Jesus' death as an atonement is not important. In narrative the character of the speaker and the occasion of the utterance counts far more. Moreover, Luke wishes to provide assurance to a circle of readers who already have received basic Christian instruction (Lk 1:1-4), assurance that necessarily entails a confirmation of the events upon which such instruction was based. In focusing on Jesus' resurrection and exaltation* Luke provides an apology for the claims of the gospel, supporting rather than diminishing the understanding of Jesus' death as a vicarious atonement. Furthermore, the central role of Jesus' exaltation in Acts is indicative of a salvation-historical perspective that is essential for understanding Jesus' death as an atonement. From Luke's point of view, unless the crucified Jesus was raised from the dead it makes no sense to speak of his death in this way. And unless there is a judgment* to come, it makes no sense to speak of the forgiveness of sins. Luke does not confront a diminution of the atoning work of the cross, as do Paul and the author of Hebrews,* but he does defend it in his own circumstances by providing at length the framework and basis for its acceptance.

Two final observations help to confirm this conclusion. First, while it is true that the resurrection receives primary attention in Acts and that Luke does not directly connect forgiveness to the death of Jesus, it is nevertheless also true that Jesus' exaltation and the forgiveness of sins are not independent of the cross. The resurrection and exaltation are not viewed in the abstract but as God's act upon the crucified Servant of God (e.g., Acts 2:33; 5:30-31). Forgiveness is not proclaimed apart from Jesus' death (Acts 2:38; 3:18-21; 5:30-31; 10:40-43; 13:38-39; 26:18, 23). Second and more importantly, NT writers characteristically attach saving significance to both the cross and the resurrection without suggesting that the significance of one eclipses the other (e.g., Rom 4:25). Both are essential elements of the saving work of God in Christ. If that is true elsewhere, we should not be surprised to find it in Luke-Acts (cf. Bovon 177-78).

1.2. Jesus' Suffering as a Pattern for Believers. Luke also provides indications that he regards Jesus' suffering and death as a paradigm for those who believe in him. The call to discipleship in Luke's Gospel includes a general application. Those who follow Jesus must take up their cross "daily" (Lk 9:23). The one who does not bear a cross cannot be Jesus' disciple (Lk 14:27). Moreover, the apostles* are those who have stood with Jesus in his trials and upon whom he confers a kingdom just as the Father has upon him (Lk 22:28-30; see Kingdom of God). Something more than following Jesus' example is operative. Just as it is necessary for the Messiah to suffer, it is necessary for those who believe in him to "enter the kingdom through many tribulations" (Acts 14:22; see Tribulation). This instruction by Paul to the churches of Lystra, Iconium and Pisidian Antioch amounts to the only explicit statement of the matter in Acts. Yet Luke signals his expectation of suffering to his readers through his description of the experiences of the early church (Acts 8:1-3) and its leaders (Acts 5:41), the first martyr, Stephen* (Acts 6—7), and Paul, "the chosen vessel" of the Lord, to whom Jesus himself promises to reveal "all that he must suffer on account of my name" (Acts 9:16).

The parallelism to Luke's treatment of Jesus' death as an atonement is striking. Again we have numerous allusions alongside a single clarifying pronouncement, which is to be understood as typical. And in this case Luke provides even less information as to the workings of this experience. He obviously regards the people of God as identified with the Messiah. That is clear from the dying Stephen's vision* of the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God (Acts 7:55) and from the words of the risen Jesus to the thunderstruck Saul ("Why are you persecuting me?"; Acts 9:4 et al.). And just as Christ is identified with them, Luke implies that they are identified with him. The will of God was accomplished in the case of his Servant (pais), and his servants (douloi) pray that it will be worked out in them as well (Acts 4:23-31). Yet Luke does not spell out the nature and basis of this relation. From one perspective the persecution* of believers is due to the witness they bear to the name* of Jesus (Acts 5:41; 9:16; 15:17; 26:9). Luke also gently hints at the Messiah's role as a second Adam (Acts 26:13). Whatever its basis in Luke-Acts, this theme of conformation to Christ's death (which is quite different from the idea of imitation*) reappears in the Pauline letters, Hebrews, 1 Peter,* 1 John, and Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) alongside the interpretation of Jesus' death as an atonement for sin.

1.3. Human Responsibility for Jesus' Death. Despite Luke's considerable emphasis upon the divine purpose behind the death of the Messiah, he does not diminish human responsibility for Jesus' crucifixion. Indeed, here the biblical tension between divine sovereignty and human responsibility reaches its peak. The cross is not a tragedy from which God somehow retrieves some good but is part of his own plan foretold by the prophets. Yet those who perpetrated the deed are not relieved of responsibility but are called to repent.

Unlike Christian writers of the second century, Luke also finely differentiates the guilt for Jesus' death. He regards as responsible for Jesus' death all who participated in his trials and execution: Herod and Pilate, the Gentiles and the people of Israel (Acts 4:23-28; cf. 7:51-53). Yet the Jews of Jerusalem* especially are charged with guilt, since Luke understands Pilate to have decided to release Jesus, only to be opposed by the crowd (Lk 23:13-25; Acts 2:23; 3:13; 10:39; 13:27-28). Within Jerusalem the leaders are singled out as being especially culpable (Lk 22:66—23:5; Acts 3:17; 5:30-31).

Nevertheless, this guilt does not exclude any from salvation. Both leaders and people acted in ignorance and are called to repent, believe and be baptized, so that they may receive the promises God made to Israel (Acts 2:38-39; 3:17-21; 5:31). Luke regards the door to salvation as remaining open to Israel. Paul's concluding words in the book of Acts do not indicate otherwise (Acts 28:25-28). The hardening of Israel's heart does not mean that no Jews have believed or yet will do so but that the time at which the whole nation will turn to the Messiah is still to come (Acts 3:19-21).

2. Hebrews.

Coupled with his exaltation, the death of Christ is the focal point and basis of the sermonic exhortation of Hebrews. The author derives his framework for interpreting the cross primarily from the OT cult, in particular from the high-priestly service on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16). Christ's death works purification from sin and enables approach to a gracious God (Heb 4:14-16). The levitical priesthood, the wilderness tabernacle* and its sacrifices anticipated the saving significance of Christ's death, providing an earthly pattern or type of the heavenly benefits that Christ secured (hypodeigma, Heb 8:5; 9:23; typos, Heb 8:5). Christ's sacrifice is superior to those enjoined by the Law, since they are mere copies and shadows of the eternal realities achieved in the cross (Heb 8:5; 9:23; 10:1). While the OT cult has been superseded, its conceptual world is firmly retained as the basis for understanding the death of Christ (contra Tuckett, 1:521). This is evident in the concise, introductory description of the saving work of the Son as his "making purification for sins" (Heb 1:3), which both interprets the cross in sacrificial terms and anticipates the subsequent theme of forgiveness as the surpassing effect of the cross. Other ways of interpreting Christ's death supplement and expand this idea. By death Christ divested the devil of the power of death (see Satan). Moreover, he blazed a trail to the divine presence for all the children of God (Heb 2:10, 14-16).

2.1. The Great High Priest. The author introduces the motif of Christ as high priest* as a summary of the purpose of the Incarnation, a theme that figures prominently in the first part of the material (Heb 2:1-18; 4:14—5:10). Jesus had to share in "flesh and blood," including the suffering of death, so that he might become "a merciful and faithful high priest." This thought recurs and reaches a dramatic closure in Hebrews 5:7-9, where the author, recalling early Christian tradition of the prayer in Gethsemane, describes Jesus' fully human experience in facing the ordeal of the cross: "He offered up supplications and petitions with loud crying and tears to the one able to save him from death." Even the Son learned obedience in suffering and was "perfected" in his role as high priest. This attribute sets him apart from the earthly priesthood and qualifies him for an eternal one (Heb 4:15; 5:2-3; 7:26-28; Peterson, 104-25). His own suffering enables him to have compassion toward our moral weakness (astheneia, cf. Heb 5:2; 7:28) and to help us (Heb 5:16).

The Son became not only a merciful and faithful high priest (Heb 2:17) but also the great high priest who has passed through the heavens* (Heb 4:14). This becomes the dominating theme of Hebrews 7—10, where the author presents Christ's superiority in both the effectual character of the sacrifice he made "once for all" and in his eternal status as high priest, a juxtaposition that raises the question as to what Christ's eternal ministry might be.

2.2. The Sacrifice.

2.2.1. Blood. Central to the author's argument is his claim that Christ's blood provides cleansing from sin (Heb 9:14; 9:22-23; 10:22). In such contexts "blood" signifies a sacrificial death and not, as has sometimes been argued, the life of the victim (see especially Heb 9:15-22; cf. Heb 10:5, 10, where the parallel term body appears). The author does not make use of every aspect of the atoning ritual in explicating Christ's work and in particular makes no mention of a presentation of blood in the heavenly sanctuary (cf. Lev 16:15-19). Christ enters into heaven not with his blood but through his blood; that is, through his death on the cross (Heb 9:12; see Laub). Moreover, the finality of Christ's offering distinguishes his ministry from that of earthly priests (Heb 7:26-28). Christ's entrance into heaven, which itself is associated with his cross (Heb 9:12), is followed by his session at the right hand of God, as the author stresses (Heb 1:3; 8:1; 10:11-13). These considerations weigh heavily against interpreting Christ's ministry in Hebrews as including an application of his blood in the heavenly sanctuary subsequent to his death. Rather, the whole of Christ's work is accomplished at the cross, once for all (Heb 7:27; 9:28; 10:10). His ministry as high priest entails not a perpetual offering but his presence before God on our behalf (Heb 4:14-16; 6:19-20; 7:26-28; 9:23-28).

This heavenly ministry has two interrelated aspects. First, Christ serves as mediator, eternally interceding for those drawing near to God through him, providing grace* and mercy* (Heb 2:18; 4:16; 7:25). Second, his entrance into the presence of God for us is an entrance before us. By his struggles, suffering and death, he has established the pilgrimage of his brothers and sisters into the presence of God (Heb 6:19-20). In Jesus' humanity, humanity has been "perfected," having passed obediently through suffering and into heaven itself. By virtue of God's saving purpose for the human race (and not some material conception as in Ignatius* or Irenaeus), the high-priestly language flows over into the imagery of progress and conquest. Christ is the champion (archēgos) of salvation (Heb 2:10; 12:2) and its perfecter (Heb 12:2). He has entered into the presence of God as a forerunner for us (Heb 6:20). Yet Christ's unique high-priestly role is not set aside by these additional conceptions. He alone is the sinless mediator who deals mercifully with sinners (Heb 2:17; 7:26-28). The way into God's presence has its basis in the forgiveness secured at the cross, not in a divinization of humanity. And the forgiveness once and for all secured has its application in the essential help it provides to "the children" on the difficult path to glory.

2.2.2. Offering. In expounding the relation between the sacrifices of the old covenant and the death of Christ, the author generally employs the familiar language of "offering." Significantly, however, at the outset and the conclusion of the main argument, interpretive theological terms appear.

The author introduces Jesus' high-priestly role by describing its purpose as "making propitiation with respect to the sins of the people" (eis to hilaskesthai tas hamartias tou laou, Heb 2:17). There has been extensive discussion as to whether the biblical usage of the Greek verb hilaskesthai signifies the propitiation of divine wrath,* as in secular Greek, or the expiation of sin. Yet once it is acknowledged that the removal of sin averts divine wrath, as is the case here, one arrives at the idea of propitiation. The only distinction that might remain is a dubious insistence that the removal of sin from persons does not entail the appeasing of divine wrath against persons. However, to exclude the idea of punitive divine action is to give the cult an absolute, quasi-magical status and an impersonal character. In the biblical writings the personal, covenantal understanding of the divine-human relation remains decisive, as is evidenced by the close association between sacrifice and forgiveness (e.g., Ex 30:30-32; Lev 4:20, 26, 31, 35).

In the passage at hand it is clear that the author understands Jesus' death to avert the wrath of God. It is of the greatest significance that he shifts without discussion from speaking of the forgiveness of the sins to the removal of sin and back again, all in the context of sacrificial language (Heb 9:22, 26; 10:4, 18). If covenantal provisions are rejected, divine wrath will be directed against the disobedient and unbelieving (Heb 2:1-4; 3:7-19; 4:7-8; 9:26-31; 12:25-29). The syntax of this clause is paralleled in the Septuagint by only a few passages in Sirach, where atonement is closely connected to the avoidance of God's anger (see especially Sir 3:30; 28:5). Moreover, the author stresses that the capacity for mercy is a central duty of a high priest (Heb 2:17: 5:2), implying that strict judgment is the alternative to mediation.

The second passage in which the author interprets the language of "offering" corroborates this reading of Hebrews 2:17. As the author brings to a close his presentation of the death of Christ as a superior sacrifice, he describes the cross as Christ's "being offered up in order to bear the sins of many" (Heb 9:28). Here he obviously recalls the substitutionary suffering of the Isaianic Servant (Is 53:4-12). Bearing the sins "of many," the Christ bore their punishment. It is not simply that at the cross he represented them but that the punishment that was theirs became his, so that they now await salvation rather than condemning judgment (contra Hooker). As he does with the entire sacrificial structure, the author assumes the reality and validity of this substitutionary act (on this topic see Hill, Morris 1965).

2.2.3. Atonement. As is the case with other NT contexts in which Christ's death is interpreted as an atonement, God is not only the object of Christ's sacrifice (Heb 2:17) but also its subject (Heb 9:28), as is apparent from the covenantal framework of Hebrews (e.g., Heb 8:6-13). It is God who ordains all high-priestly ministry and who chose Christ as an eternal high priest (Heb 5:1-6). He offered Christ up to bear sin (Heb 9:28), and by God's will Christ offered up his body for the sanctification of the people of God (Heb 10:10). God not only required a death for the forgiveness of sins but also provided it in the Son.

2.3. The Effect of Christ's Death. Like the sacrifices of the Law, Christ's death "atones," "cleanses" and "sanctifies." Yet the cross alone, not the former sacrifices, secures forgiveness (Heb 10:4, 11). And once sins have been removed and forgiven, no need for sacrifice remains (Heb 8:12; 9:26; 10:18). Likewise, Christ's sacrifice and priesthood bring "perfection," in distinction from the sacrifices of the Law.

2.3.1. Forgiveness. "To sanctify," in Hebrews, generally signifies not the effecting of progressive moral improvement but forgiveness (Heb 2:11; 9:13; 10:10, 29; 13:29; cf., however, Heb 12:14). Those who believe have been sanctified "once for all" through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ (Heb 10:10). This sanctification is nothing other than the forgiveness of sins (see Heb 10:2, 18). As James Denney (126) commented,

> In the Epistle to the Hebrews, the word ἁγιάζειν, corresponds as nearly as possible to the Pauline δικαιοῦν. The sanctification of the one writer is the justification of the other; and the προσαγωγή or access to God, which Paul emphasizes as the primary blessing* of justification, appears everywhere in Hebrews as the primary religious act of 'drawing near' to God through the great High Priest.

2.3.2. Perfection. The "perfection" of believers signifies their participation in the saving blessings of the age to come through the forgiveness won at the cross. "Perfection" could not be achieved through the levitical priesthood, since the law made nothing "perfect" and was not able "to perfect" those who offered sacrifices (Heb 7:11, 19; 10:1). In contrast, with one sacrifice Christ "perfected forever" those being sanctified (Heb 10:14). The provisions of the law were temporary and had only outward effects, cleansing "the flesh" and the copies of the heavenly things. Christ by his death, in contrast, achieved redemption and cleanses the conscience.* Now exalted, he appears before God "for us" (Heb 9:1-15, 23-28).

As an eschatological term, "perfection" involves a fundamental distinction between material and spiritual orders, but not an unconditioned dualism. It is misleading, therefore, to interpret Hebrews on the basis of Platonism or Gnosticism (as was once common), despite its obvious coloring with Hellenistic religious terminology. The "vertical" opposition is not absolute, but appears as an element, albeit a pivotal one, in a salvation-historical framework.

In Hebrews, hope* is not fixed on a disembodied eternity but on a transformation of the creation that has been subverted by sin and death into an eternal dwelling place for God and his people. The author speaks of the tent through which Christ entered as high priest as being not of this creation (Heb 9:11), implying that Christ entered into a new creation. Heavenly realities, then, are eschatological realities. Similarly, in a striking figure, he symbolically equates Jesus' (material) flesh* with the veil before the holy place, making it plain that the "undecayed" (prosphatos) and "living way" into the divine presence is none other than the once crucified and now resurrected Jesus (Heb 9:11; cf. Heb 6:19-20). The world to come is a physical one, as is evidenced by the hope for a "better" resurrection of the dead (Heb 11:35). God will "yet once shake" the structure of the present creation, heaven and earth (Heb 12:26). Created things will then be subjected not to "removal" (wrongly NRSV, NIV) but to a radical "transposition" (metathesis: Heb 7:12; 11:5, cf. Heb 1:10-12). Salvation in Hebrews therefore does not involve a journey from the material into the immaterial but from the present world into the age to come.

Correspondingly, although it is varied in nuance, the language of "perfection" bears an eschatological thrust. The contrast between the earthly tent and the "more perfect" heavenly tent through which Christ entered in offering his sacrifice is strictly eschatological (Heb 9:11). The author's language of perfection therefore is essentially salvation-historical, underscoring the completion of the divine saving purposes.

By virtue of the plan of God, eternal and complete salvation comes only in these last days through the Son (Heb 11:40; Heb 1:2; cf. Heb 9:10).

The perfection of believers is won at the expense of the perfection of the Son through suffering (Heb 2:10; 5:9; 7:28). Here too the eschatological sense is primary. Christ's sinlessness is never in question in Hebrews and in fact receives emphasis (Heb 4:15; 7:26-28; 9:14). His "perfection" represents his progress into his full role as mediator of salvation (Heb 7:26-28). In being perfected, the Son reaches his eschatological station and awaits the subjection of all things under his feet (Heb 1:13; 10:13).

Above all else, the perfection of believers signifies their access to God and participation in the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb 7:19; 12:22-24). Perfection also takes a cognitive sense in Hebrews 5:11—6:3, where maturity involves the capacity to comprehend "the word of righteousness." Yet this perfection of the mind and heart is also obviously bound up with eschatology, since it represents, among other things, "tasting" the heavenly gift and the powers of the age to come (Heb 6:4-8).

As with the language of sanctification in Hebrews, the "perfection" of believers that Christ wrought by his sacrifice entails in the first place the remission of sins (Heb 7:11, 19; 9:9; 11:40; and especially Heb 10:14-18). This corresponds to our earlier observation that the author's fundamental category for interpreting Christ's death lies in its effecting forgiveness. The "perfection" of believers implies the surpassing eschatological cleansing accomplished at the cross (Heb 10:14). In this way the difference between the perfection of the Son and the perfection of believers becomes understandable. He was perfected through suffering; they are perfected by his suffering. They are not thereby spared the difficult path to glory (Heb 2:10; 12:1-13), but through Jesus they participate in their destination already. He is the perfector of faith, since his arrival at his eschatological station ensures their arrival as well (Heb 12:2).

2.3.3. Human Transformation. This eternal redemption effected by Christ is reflected in the experience of the believer. In contrast to the sacrifices offered under the Law, Christ's death cleanses the conscience and not merely the "flesh" from sin and guilt (Heb 9:9, 14; 10:2, 22). There is to be a subjective appreciation of the objective and external reality. The sense of forgiveness does not come about automatically, however. The access to God that Christ's death has achieved must be grasped and held by faith. Indeed, the path of testing on which believers walk requires that they avail themselves of divine assistance. Unbelief, not faith, is passive and sluggish. The primary exhortation of the letter is the call to maintain confidence in the forgiveness that the cross has won (Heb 3:6; 4:16; 10:35).

In a pattern similar to Paul's letters, in Hebrews the forgiveness of sins is not an isolated gift but issues in service to God. The "indicative" of forgiveness forms the basis of the "imperative." This is apparent in the author's understanding of suffering. Believers endure adversity not in order to become "sons" but because they are "sons" already. If they do not receive "discipline," they are not "sons" at all. As a loving father, God works righteousness* within them, which will bear peaceful fruit (Heb 12:4-11). Likewise, believers are pilgrims and wanderers because they have their true home already in the heavenly city (Heb 3:6; 12:18-24). Their progress is assured by virtue of Christ alone, who as a great high priest supplies the gracious help that they need (Heb 2:16-18; 4:16; 7:25).

In Hebrews, then, the transformation of the human heart has its basis in the forgiveness of sins. This is especially apparent in the repeated references to the promise of a new covenant from the book of Jeremiah (Jer 31:31-34). In Hebrews 8:7-12 the author cites the passage in order to establish the inadequacy of the Law, "the first, antiquated covenant." The inscription of the Law of God on the heart is summarized in Jeremiah as "knowing God," and this knowledge* of God in turn is based on the forgiveness of sins (Jer 31:34; Heb 8:12). In his second recollection of the Jeremianic text (Heb 10:15-18) the author underscores the finality of Christ's sacrifice, which, by providing forgiveness of sins, sets aside the provisions of the Law. The author's inclusion in his citation of God's promise to implant his laws in the hearts of his people serves as a reminder of the inability of the Law to do so and implicitly presents inward renewal as result of the forgiveness of sins.

It is important to observe, too, that for Hebrews the church, "the communion of the saints," derives from the forgiveness that each person individually has received, since forgiveness means common access to the throne of grace, participation in the heavenly city and a common sojourn (Heb 3:12-14; 10:24-25; 12:22-23).

2.3.4. Deliverance. Just as Christ's high-priestly role overflows into that of champion, the author portrays his work on the cross as deliverance from the devil, who held the power of death (Heb 2:14-15). Although he leaves the source of the devil's power unexplained, he no doubt assumes a biblical background, in which the devil incites human beings to sin (Gen 3; 1 Chron 21:1) and accuses them before God (Zech 3:1-5). The immediate context suggests that the devil's power derives from his accusations too, since the help that Christ extends to his brothers and sisters consists in his making propitiation for their sins (Heb 2:17-18; cf. Rev 12:9-10). It is likewise highly probable that the author assumes an inner connection between a guilty conscience and the fear* of death, which subjected human beings all their lives to slavery (Heb 2:14-15; see Slave). The "fear of death" in Hebrews has in view the judgment of God that follows (Heb 9:27; 10:27, 31; cf. Heb 12:21). Christ's sacrifice cleanses the conscience from "dead works"; that is, from "works that bring the judgment of death," so that believers may serve the living God (Heb 9:14). Just as forgiveness, both as an objective reality and subjectively grasped, brings the freedom to serve, guilt in both respects makes one a slave.

2.3.5. Covenant Ratification. J. J. Hughes (27-66) has persuasively argued that in Hebrews 9:16-17 diathēkē retains the usual biblical sense of "covenant" (rather than the usual rendering as "testament") and that the proper background for the imagery is the sacrificial covenant ritual reflected in the OT (e.g., Gen 15:9-21). The verses then would be rendered:

> For where there is a covenant, it is necessary for the death of the one who ratifies it to be attested [or represented], for a covenant is confirmed over dead animals, since it is not valid while the ratifier still lives [i.e., has not undergone representative death].

Christ's death provides the ratifying sacrifice prerequisite to the establishment of the new, eternal covenant (Heb 9:15-22), as well as redeeming from the transgressions committed under the "first covenant," the law.

But why would the author characterize Christ's death in this way? The ritual splitting of the carcasses of animals signified the fate that awaited the ratifying party should he or she violate the terms of the covenant. Therefore the mention of Christ's blood as a ratification almost certainly anticipates the warnings of the terrifying judgment that will come upon those who knowingly reject the new covenant, to which the author turns in Hebrews 10. In doing so he takes up the very formula for covenant ratification he has used in Hebrews 9:20—the one who regards "the blood of the covenant by which he was cleansed as will receive the severest of punishments" (Heb 10:26-30). There is therefore an implicit reference to divine wrath in Hebrews 9:16-17, which corresponds to the author's usual method of presentation: he introduces an idea prior to developing it (cf. the description of Jesus as high priest in Heb 2:17-18, which is then followed by his exposition beginning Heb 5).

3. 1 Peter.

Viewed from the perspective of its supreme moral beauty and inestimable value, the death of Christ, or in the language of the letter, Christ's "suffering," serves as the leitmotif of 1 Peter. Elsewhere Christ's death is often described as his suffering (particularly in the Gospels, Acts and Hebrews; see Ign. Eph. 7.2; Ign. Trall. presc.; Ign. Phld. 9.2; 2 Clem. 1.2), but 1 Peter does so exclusively, even altering traditional formulas (see 1 Pet 2:21; 3:18, where variant readings attest scribal tendencies to "correct" the wording).

Peter develops the theme of the excellence of Christ's innocence and humility in three ways. In language suggestive of a common confession, he reminds his readers of the undeserved favor that has come to them by Christ's suffering on their behalf. The sinless Christ accomplished redemption through his meek endurance* of injustice, a redemption that therefore is worthy of highest esteem. A second prominent theme is regularly attached to this idea: in his suffering and death Christ freed believers from their empty past for conduct like his, thereby pleasing God. Finally Peter points to the eschatological "glories" that follow the cross. Christ, although rejected by the disobedient, is precious to God who has now raised him from the dead and exalted him. Believers wait in faith and hope for the revelation of Christ's glory in which they themselves shall be delivered and vindicated. The letter therefore serves as an encouragement to Gentile Christians under pressure and the threat of persecution to persevere in faith and in excellence of conduct.

These three themes characterize each of the three confessions of Christ's cross that appear in the letter (1 Pet 1:18-21; 2:21-25; 3:18). The cross is simultaneously the source of forgiveness, the basis for conduct and the ground of eschatological hope. Moreover, in the course of the letter a certain progression unfolds. In 1 Peter 1:18-21 emphasis falls on the contrast between the vanity of the past conduct of the readers and the exceeding value of Christ's redeeming death. In 1 Peter 2:21-25, while the same elements are retained, the focus shifts to the pattern of life that Christ's meekness set for believers to follow. And in the third passage (1 Pet 3:18 and its context) Peter stresses Christ's vindicating resurrection and the eschatological salvation of those who believe in him.

These passages may represent hymns* or confessions of which the author made use (see Worship). Nevertheless, in each case the phrasing bears the distinct vocabulary of the author, reflects his particular interests and (as we are arguing) contains material integral to his argument in the letter, so that while the passages reflect early Christian traditions, they do not lend themselves to the reconstruction of underlying strata of thought. They are confessional in nature and form as they stand in the letter and may well have been constructed with catechesis in mind.

It is necessary to mention briefly the debate as to whether 1 Peter 3:18-22 includes a description of a postmortem or postresurrection descent of Christ to the dead. Despite its current disfavor, some form of the Augustinian interpretation of the passage is the most satisfactory interpretation (Feinberg, Grudem, cf. Dalton), since it best accounts for the particularity of reference to Noah and the evangelization of the dead in 1 Peter 4:6. This interpretation also receives considerable support from the mention of the presence of the Spirit of Christ in the prophets (1 Pet 1:11), which among the NT writings is unique. In this reading Christ did not descend into hell or the underworld but was present by the Spirit in the preaching of Noah. The "spirits in prison" are those of persons who were then disobedient (1 Pet 3:20; cf. Heb 12:23).

3.1. The Suffering of Christ as an Atonement. In contrast to Hebrews, the theme of forgiveness remains undeveloped in 1 Peter. Yet it is clearly foundational, an essential element of the confession of Christ that Peter and his readers share and upon which he builds. This significance of the cross as a means of forgiveness is apparent in the opening greeting, which describes the ultimate saving aim of God for his people as "obedience and sprinkling with the blood of Jesus Christ."

The first element of the divine aim, "obedience," serves as a pregnant description of faith (see 1 Pet 1:22), which is thereby represented as the primary act of obedience (1 Pet 1:7-9; contra Garlington), with the underlying suggestion that faith is to issue in holy conduct (1 Pet 1:14). This language may represent Pauline influence, since the term obedience is infrequent apart from his letters. And the usage of "obedience" in the sense of "faith" is mistakably Paul's. At the outset of the letter a pattern appears, which is prominent in letters of Paul and common to the NT generally. The forgiveness given by the cross is not an isolated gift but is joined to the new obedience. The focus of the letter is upon the new obedience, but its basis lies in the forgiveness worked by Christ's death.

The second phrase, which bears overtones of the covenantal ceremony described in Exodus 24 (cf. Heb 9:13; 10:22; 12:24), conveys assurance to the Gentile readers that they have now become the people of God and that they are so on the basis of the death of Christ. Notions of cleansing and forgiveness are also implicit (cf. Barn. 5.1), since the sprinkling of blood recalls the Day of Atonement as well (Lev 16; see too the red heifer ceremony, Num 19).

In the first christological confession (1 Pet 1:18-21) the reference to the blood of Christ as that of a "lamb unblemished and spotless" (1 Pet 1:19) recalls the sacrificial system (e.g., Lev 9:3), and in its personal and moral aspect it bears associations with the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53. The understanding of Christ's death as a substitutionary atonement lies just under the surface in the biblical imagery that the passage evokes. The focal point of the confession is found in the contrast between the worthless conduct of the pagan world and the "precious blood of Christ."

The soteriology is profound. As L. Goppelt (117) observes, the "ancestral inheritance of empty conduct" (1 Pet 1:18) describes sociologically what the Adam-Christ typology (Rom 5:12-21) says theologically. There is something more here than a bad example that might be either followed or disregarded. Humanity is entrapped in an empty and reprehensible pattern of life. Yet God's redeeming work in Christ has overcome the fallen human condition. Before the foundation of the world Christ and his saving work were determined (proginōskein), and this inestimable sacrifice was made for those whose deeds were worthless. Since God's impartial judgment yet stands before Christians, they are to conduct themselves in reverential fear, knowing both the incalculable cost of redemption and the efficacy which that cost implies. The "imperative" springs from the "indicative" here in the same paradoxical manner that it does for Paul. The exhortation has faith, not mere gratitude, as its sustaining force (1 Pet 1:21), just as faith (which rightly treasures and loves Christ) is introduced in the letter as the prime virtue of Christians (1 Pet 1:5-9).

The theme of Christ's death as a substitutionary atonement appears again, explicitly, in the second, lengthier confession (1 Pet 2:21-25). "Christ suffered on behalf of you," the readers are told (1 Pet 2:21), a thought that is then expanded in the following confession. This confession is built around Isaiah 53 and represents the most extensive use of that passage in the NT. Thematically it is similar to the citation of Isaiah 53:7-8 in Acts 8:32-33 but goes beyond it precisely in its reference to the substitutionary nature of Christ's death and its saving benefits: "[Christ] who bore our sins in his body on the tree" (1 Pet 2:24; Is 53:12). The phrase "on the tree" reflects the biblical terminology used by early Christians for the shame associated with the cross, reflecting in particular the curse of Deuteronomy 21:23 (see Acts 5:30; 10:39; Gal 3:13; cf. Josh 8:29 LXX, Esther 7:9 LXX).

The underlying thought of 1 Peter 1:2 and 1 Peter 1:19 now becomes explicit. Christ, the sinless Servant of Isaiah 53, has borne the sins of believers upon the cross. Even more than in the earlier confession, attention is concentrated upon the new pattern of conduct that Christ's cross has secured for his people. Yet, as before, the substitutionary and unique character of Christ's death provides the basis for exhortation, so that Christ's suffering is not merely exemplary. The "indicative" of forgiveness that appears in 1 Peter 2:21, 24 is extended to transformed life and gathered up together with the "imperative" in the summary statements. He bore our sins, that "having [by death] departed from sin, we might live to righteousness" (1 Pet 2:24). With remarkable similarity to Paul, Peter understands Christ's death for sin to include the death of believers to sin, which issues in a new life. In the words of N. Dahl, this is not imitation but conformation. Goppelt's claim (206-7) that the interpretation of Christ's death in terms of mere imitatio does not emerge until the second century is substantiated here.

A third succinct description of Christ's death as a vicarious atonement appears in the brief confession found in 1 Peter 3:18. The phrasing "Christ suffered concerning sins [peri hamartiōn]" again reflects sacrificial language (e.g., Lev 16:3, 5, 9 LXX). The following reference to "the righteous one on behalf of the unrighteous" (cf. Is 53:11) completes the substitutionary idea. As in the previous confessions, Peter interprets the cross in sacrificial terms, as an atoning act that brings grace and forgiveness. The stark moral contrast between Christ and those he redeemed reinforces the continuing theme of the virtue of Christ's suffering.

3.2. The Suffering of Christ as a Pattern for Christian Conduct. We have already observed that in 1 Peter Christ's death is interpreted as an atonement for sin in connection with and as the basis for the new obedience of believers and that the interest of the letter lies primarily in exhortation, as is indicated by the frequency of reference to "conduct" (the noun and verb appear seven times).

In the first confession this idea appears in a straightforward but undeveloped way. Christ's death has provided redemption (1 Pet 1:18) and release from slavery, which in context recalls not only contemporary practices of securing manumission but more particularly the exodus from Egypt. Associations not only of the sacrificial system (and the Suffering Servant of Is 53) but also of the Passover lamb* (Ex 12) are present. Bondage is bondage to sinful conduct, from which the "blood" of Christ secures release.

As we have noted, in the progression of emphases the second confession (1 Pet 2:21-25) makes the pattern of Christ's suffering its primary theme. With perhaps a backward glance to the corrupt ancestral inheritance (1 Pet 1:18), Peter indicates that in his patient suffering Christ left behind a model that believers are to follow, tracing his steps (1 Pet 2:21). The following description of Christ's meekness in the face of suffering makes it clear that discipleship consists in conformity to Christ's character. Peter does not suppose that all Christians will suffer crucifixion or even that they all will face persecution (1 Pet 1:6; 3:14; 4:14-16). He expects them to avoid it if possible and does not encourage them to seek abuse or martyrdom* as, for example, Ignatius did. He assumes, however, that they cannot escape all suffering, and what they are called to endure they are called to face in the same manner as Christ did. The extensive reference to the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53 has its basis here and is expanded with Christ's refusing verbal retaliation: "being railed at, he did not rail in return; while suffering, he did not threaten." Instead he entrusted himself to God the righteous judge (1 Pet 2:23).

In this extraordinary virtue Christ provided a example for believers (cf. 1 Pet 3:9-10; 4:19). Yet, as we observed, Peter does not call for mere imitation. Rather, salvation itself is understood as conformation to Christ's character: "the wounding of Christ has brought our healing" (1 Pet 2:24). Christ remains active in guarding and guiding his people, "for as wandering sheep you have now returned to your Shepherd and Guardian" (1 Pet 2:25). Christ by his cross has secured the wholeness of his people, and that wholeness consists in conformity to his character as righteous (see 1 Pet 2:20).

3.3. The Suffering of Christ and Eschatological Glory. In a manner reminiscent of Luke-Acts (see, e.g., Lk 24:26, 46) Peter describes the interest of the prophets in the "sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glories" (1 Pet 1:11). Christ's rejection by human beings was overruled by God's delight in him and his virtue (1 Pet 2:4, 2:19; 3:4, 3:12). Although put to death in the flesh, he was made alive by the Spirit (1 Pet 3:18) and exalted to the right hand of God (1 Pet 3:22). Christians who share in his sufferings therefore are to rejoice, since such hardship portends eschatological blessing for them at the revelation of Christ's glory (1 Pet 4:13; 1:7). Just as Christ's moral excellence was met with divine reward,* so too those who share in his suffering will share in his glory.

4. 1 John.

The death of Christ in its sacrificial, atoning significance is again basic to the message of this letter. The author writes to a confused and battered believing community, which has been fractured by some form of Docetism.* The claims of the wayward group and the status of the remaining community are to be tested against the apostolic witness to the incarnation and atoning death of the Christ. The cross constitutes the eschatological revelation of God's love, which is to determine the confession and the conduct of those who belong to him. Faith and obedience are inherently bound up with one another, not merely by an ethic* of obligation to Jesus' pattern of behavior but more fundamentally in the divine "begetting" of believers and the gift of the Spirit (1 Jn 2:29; 3:24). The world and the works of the devil have been overcome in the cross of Jesus (1 Jn 3:8; 5:4).

4.1. The Death of Christ as a Propitiatory Sacrifice. The opponents deny that "the Christ is Jesus" (1 Jn 2:22; 5:1, 5) and that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (1 Jn 4:2). This implicit denial of the need for the cross is coupled with the errant group's claim that they were without guilt or sin (1 Jn 1:8-10). The author in response insists not only on the confession that Jesus is the Christ but also on the fundamental role Christ's death plays in securing salvation. Particularly the initial and final references to the cross in 1 John address this error, specifying the "blood" of Jesus the Christ as essential to the Christian confession (1 Jn 1:7; 5:6, 8). This language includes a certain stress upon the physical reality of the death of Christ and highlights its saving effect by presenting it in terms of an atoning sacrifice.

The placement of the first of these references to Christ's atoning death at the beginning of the letter (in 1 Jn 1:7—2:2) signals the importance of this topic to the whole discourse. Cultic language appears immediately, which carries associations of the violent death of Christ. "The blood of Jesus cleanses us from all sin" (cf. Lev 8:15; 16:30). The author most likely has in view the forgiveness of sins and not the transformation of the person (contra Brown, Marshall 1978, Smalley), as is suggested not only by the cultic and hence legal background of this expression but also by its counterpart in the denial of guilt (1 Jn 1:8, "to have no sin"; see Brown), in the parallel promise of forgiveness (1 Jn 1:9) and in the elaboration in 1 John 2:1-2, where again sin, forgiveness and cultic-legal ideas are present.

The sacrificial interpretation of Christ's death concludes by the description of it as a hilasmos for sin, around which there has been considerable debate (as with the related term hilaskesthai in Heb 2:17, see 2.2.2 above). Does the expression merely convey the idea of expiation of sin or also that of propitiation of divine wrath? Although notions of wrath remain in the background, in this letter death is not an impersonal effect but the result of divine judgment (1 Jn 2:28; 4:17-18), the consequence of disobedience and unbelief (1 Jn 2:17; 3:14). Correspondingly in this context forgiveness is clearly covenantal and juridical. Christ is our advocate (paraklētos) with the Father (1 Jn 2:1), and this advocacy implicitly derives from his being the hilasmos for sin (1 Jn 2:2). Consequently it is best to understand the term as including the sense of propitiation along with the idea of cleansing, which is obviously present (1 Jn 1:7, 9).

Again, as with all other NT writings, God is both subject and object of Christ's atoning death. He is faithful and righteous to forgive our sins and cleanse us, even as Christ is our advocate before him (1 Jn 1:9; 2:1). He sent his Son as a propitiation (hilasmos) for our sins (1 Jn 4:10).

The concluding reference to Christ's death again uses the term blood, recalling the initial interpretation of his death as an atoning sacrifice and thus carrying salvific associations. These implicitly reinforce the author's assertion that Jesus Christ came not "through water only but through water and blood" (1 Jn 5:6), which here and in 1 John 5:8 most likely refer to Jesus' baptism and death on the cross (see Smalley). Jesus was attested as the Christ not only at his baptism but also in his crucifixion. His death, far from disqualifying him as the Christ, is essential to the divine witness to him.

Christ's death is an atoning sacrifice not only for believers but also for "the world." The "world" is probably not a neutral usage but has in view the hostility of fallen humanity to God and his purposes (e.g., 1 Jn 2:15-17; 3:1, 13; 4:4). The scope of the atonement stands in contrast to the apparent exclusiveness of the group that had departed from the church. Yet 1 John is decidedly exclusive itself in its insistence on faith in Jesus and the belief that the entire world lies in the power of the evil one (1 Jn 5:19). Coupled with this belief are clear statements of divine ultimacy in salvation (e.g., 1 Jn 3:9; 4:4). The author shows no embarrassment at this juxtaposition. The God revealed in the offer of forgiveness in the cross is nevertheless the God who freely and sovereignly gives new birth.

4.2. The Death of Christ as Eschatological Revelation. The cross is centrally and predominantly interpreted as a revelation in 1 John, as is apparent from the emphasis of the prescript (1 Jn 1:1-4) and the running themes of truth,* knowledge and revelation. This perspective does not diminish its status as an atoning event. As a sacrifice for sins, Jesus' death on the cross is the decisive revelatory event, the eschatological manifestation of God and his love and of eternal life.

A historical dimension is attached to this interpretation of the cross as revelation. The author is distinct from the audience. He has seen the "eternal life" (1 Jn 1:2-3), but they have not. They have only heard from him (1 Jn 1:5). Even his vision is only proleptic. He has seen neither God nor Christ "as he is" in his eschatological glory (1 Jn 3:2; 4:12). Yet he has seen and has borne witness that the Father sent the Son as Savior of the world (1 Jn 4:14). And in sending his only Son that "the world" might live, God has manifest his love (1 Jn 4:9). Revelation in 1 John, therefore, is objective in character rather than a matter of inner illumination. "Seeing" comes about only in so far as the testimony is heard, believed and obeyed (1 Jn 2:7-11, 24; 4:6; 5:5-12). The reception of this revelation is not ultimately a matter of human capacities but a divine work: a being begotten of God (1 Jn 5:1), anointed by him (1 Jn 2:20, 27), given the Spirit (1 Jn 4:13).

The cross is the revelation of the love of God and of love itself. And it reveals this love specifically as a death in our place, for our sins. We know love only through Christ's yielding his life for us on the cross (1 Jn 3:16; cf. Mk 10:45: Is 53:10). God manifest his love in sending his only (monogenēs) Son as a propitiation sacrifice (hilasmos) for our sins (1 Jn 4:9-10). The radical nature of this claim derives on the one hand from the author's view that "the world" is filled with hatred (1 Jn 3:11-12) and on the other that Christ gave his life for that world, which hates him (1 Jn 2:2). Love as a reality among believers derives not from our love for God but his love for us manifest in Christ's atoning death for our sins (1 Jn 4:10). Apart from the cross, love of this nature would remain unknown. Through the cross, it has dawned on the world as an eschatological reality (1 Jn 2:8-11).

The love of God revealed in the cross places believers under a moral obligation. "If God so loved us, we ought to love one another" (1 Jn 4:11). Yet the ethic of 1 John derives ultimately from the eschatological realities that the cross has introduced. Conduct reveals whether one knows God, whether one is "in him." God is active in the revelation of his love, so that love has its perfection in the transformation of the human being (1 Jn 2:5; 4:17-18).

The eschatological character of the cross is apparent in other references (1 Jn 3:14; 5:4) and provides the essential structure for the seemingly conflicting statements regarding the relation of believers to sin. As we have seen, the opening declaration of the letter makes continuing confession of sins the mark of true spirituality (1 Jn 1:9-10). Yet the author claims that it is not possible for believers to sin (1 Jn 3:6, 9) and derives this assertion in part from the cross: "That one appeared that he might take away sins, and 'in him' there is no sin" (1 Jn 3:5). The following reference to "abiding in him" (1 Jn 3:6) suggests that the expression "in him there is no sin" refers to the eschatological state that Christ has brought.

Parallel references indicate that the "taking away" sins most likely signifies the provision of forgiveness, not transformation of life (cf. the juridical contexts in Deut 17:12; 19:19; 21:9 LXX, etc.; and see Jn 1:29; 1 Sam 15:25; 25:28 LXX; Sir 16:9; Tob 12:9; Pss. Sol. 3:7-8). With the forgiveness won at the cross the eschatological state has arrived, in which the power of sin has been abolished by the forgiveness which has been granted. This corresponds to 1 John 3:8, where the purpose of the Incarnation is said to be the "destruction of the works of the devil." Believers are now said to have the seed of God abiding within them (1 Jn 3:9), just as they abide in him (1 Jn 3:6). From the eschatological perspective, the perspective of the effects of the cross, the "inability to sin" has been granted. Yet this state of affairs is clearly proleptic. Believers live between the times. They therefore must continue to confess their sins. But they also must live in the light of the eschaton and purify themselves, as Christ is pure (1 Jn 3:3). As the reference to the divine seed implies, eschatological realities have entered the present and indelibly mark the conduct of the believer.

As an eschatological reality the death of Christ represents a triumph over the devil and destruction of his works (1 Jn 3:8), a triumph in which believers share (1 Jn 2:12, 14; 4:5). Moreover, victory consists in the confession of Jesus as the Son of God, including his "coming through water and blood," so that the forgiveness worked through the cross stands behind the triumph, a connection that is suggested by the parallel between 1 John 3:5 and 1 John 3:8 as well.

5. Revelation.

Paradoxically in the Revelation to John, the cross of Christ is the path to his lordship and the reign of those who belong to him. Moreover, as we have seen in the other NT writings, it is as an atoning sacrifice that the death of Christ achieves the divine triumph. Not only death and life, apparent defeat and overwhelming victory are juxtaposed in the letter, but also the deity and humanity of Christ. The paradox therefore is deeper than a mere reversal of fortune. Christ died as both God and human.

5.1. Christ's Death as the Death of God. Although Christ's deity and his death are not paired elsewhere in Revelation, the appearance of this juxtaposition in the opening vision and in the message to the church in Smyrna (Rev 2:8) significantly informs the unfolding drama, particularly the adoration of the Lamb (Rev 5:8-14). The worthiness of the Lamb to receive worship derives not only from his redeeming death but also, subtly and implicitly, from his very being. Christ is "the first and the last" (Rev 1:17; 2:8; 22:13), an ascription of divine self-sufficiency and uniqueness (cf. Is 43:10; 44:6; 48:12). He is "the Living One," the expression used to describe the one sitting on the throne (Rev 4:9-10; cf. Rev 10:6; Sir 18:1). Nevertheless this very one died and lived again (Rev 1:18; 2:8) and now lives forever with authority* over death itself (Rev 1:18), with which he grants encouragement to the suffering church (Rev 2:9-11). The paradoxical relation focuses attention on his death, which is explicable only as a redemptive act.

5.2. Christ's Death as Redemption and Triumph.

Most often in Revelation, Christ's death is presented in its saving significance and in sacrificial language. As elsewhere, Christ's death is his "blood" that redeems from sin (Rev 1:5; 7:14) and purchases a people for God (Rev 5:9; cf. Rev 14:3, 4). This language of purchase, drawn from the field of slavery, expresses God's claim upon the redeemed. The cross frees them for their divinely appointed role as rulers and as priests (Rev 1:6; 5:10). The image of Christ as "the Lamb who was slain" further links the language of redemption and purchase with the Passover and exodus (Ex 12-13; cf. 1 Cor 5:7) and with the Suffering Servant of Isaiah (Is 53:7; cf. Acts 8:32; 1 Pet 1:19; Jn 1:29).

The frequent depiction of Christ as the Lamb underscores the centrality of his saving death in Revelation (Rev 5:6; passim). In an ironic juxtaposition this Lamb is first introduced as the conquering Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev 5:5). God has achieved victory not through force but through weakness in the death of Christ. The violence and oppression of the world and the devil have only caused his purposes to succeed.

These purposes consist in the working of the forgiveness of sins. This idea is inherent to the sacrificial language of Revelation and appears strikingly in the proleptic announcement of triumph in Revelation 12:10-12. The kingdom of God has come, because the "accuser of the brothers and sisters" has been thrown down from heaven (Rev 12:10; cf. Job 1:9-11). The devil, who opposes the divine saving purpose by bringing charges against the people of God for their sins, has been overcome by "the blood of the Lamb" and by faithful testimony to this Lamb. Those who do not believe will be subject to the wrath of God and of the Lamb (Rev 6:16-17; 14:9-11).

The Lamb is supremely worthy of praise because of his sacrificial death (Rev 5:9-12). The moral excellence of his act distinguishes it from the beast's cheap imitation of it in a mortal wound (Rev 13:3, 12).

5.3. Christ's Death as the Destiny of Believers. A stark division between belief and unbelief emerges in Revelation. One is either a follower of the beast (Rev 13:3-4) or a follower of the Lamb (Rev 14:4), subject to the hostility he faced (Rev 12:17). The churches stand in the relation to the risen Lord that he stood to the Father in his earthly ministry (Rev 2:26-28; 3:21-22). They are martyred for their witness (Rev 6:9-11; 12:10), just as he was for his (Rev 1:5). And they likewise share in his triumph (Rev 7:17; 15:3-5; 19:1—20:15).

6. Apostolic Fathers.

The saving significance of the death of Christ is widely assumed but nowhere defined in the Christian writings of the second century. Writers such as Ignatius and Irenaeus were concerned to stress the physical reality of Christ's death in opposition to docetic and gnostic opponents (respectively), but the meaning of Christ's death is not otherwise the subject of debate. The work of Christ did not become the center of contention as the person of Christ did in this period. That is not to say that the salvific nature of Christ's death was unimportant to these writers or that Christian thinking on this matter did not undergo development. New concerns obviously did emerge, particularly those arising from the Hellenistic presupposition of an antithesis between spirit and matter, which were bound to shape the understanding of salvation itself. And the threat of martyrdom clearly influenced, although it did not determine, Christian thinking on the death of Christ (cf. Pagels). Such assumptions and concerns shaped the reception of the apostolic witness. The various understandings of Christ's death found in the NT writings reappear here, along with the OT passages by which his death was interpreted. Christ's death is an atoning sacrifice that secures forgiveness, a pattern for believers to follow and a triumph over the powers of evil. Yet the structure of thought shows a marked shift, so that the traditional concepts are weighed differently and given new connections over against the apostolic witness.

Particularly with Irenaeus, there are developments in soteriology that are to be appreciated. Yet the restructuring that takes place in the second century represents a serious loss of understanding of the gospel. This loss in most instances is not immediately apparent, since traditional formulations of Christ's death found in the NT are often preserved. But the larger framework in which these statements appear reflects a soteriology that is noticeably impoverished. As T. F. Torrance has commented, "It was not that they [the apostolic fathers] were opposed to them [i.e., such statements], but that they did not grasp them properly" (Torrance, 137). In the fathers (see Apostolic Fathers) of the second century, the cross no longer works the whole of salvation. It merely provides the basis for it.

It is not possible here to trace all the various interpretations of Christ's death that appear in early Christian writings of this period, let alone gnostic writings or those showing gnostic tendencies (for whom the death of Christ, when treated, served to display the triumph of spirit over matter; Gos. Pet. 4.10; Apoc. Pet. 81.15-24; see van Voorst, Pagels). The most we can hope to do is briefly touch upon some basic conceptions that characterize many of the writers and to highlight the differences between them and the writings of the NT.

6.1. Deliverance. Christ's death and resurrection freed human beings from the power of the devil. Taking Irenaeus as his starting point, G. Aulén claimed this theme of Christus Victor as the "classic theory" of the atonement and offered it as an alternative to theories of substitution and moral influence. The idea appears in Justin Martyr as well (see Goodenough, 250-52) and incipiently in other writers, who tend to focus upon deliverance from death (Melito,* Homily on the Passion 11-27, 51-56, 100-102; Ign. Eph. 17.1; 19.3; Barn. 14.5). In the Christian writings of the second century, however, in distinction from the NT, this deliverance involves the forgiveness of past sins and moral transformation, not ultimate salvation. Eschatological redemption is yet to be accomplished, with divine assistance, by the works of one's hands (e.g., Barn. 19.10; Did. 4.6; see Barnabas, Epistle of; Didache). Forgiveness is no longer absolute and eschatological but only the remission of past sins that opens the way to salvation. The Christian life is no longer based on a conformation to Christ worked ultimately by God alone but on an imitation of him by the believer aided by grace.

6.2. Revelation. Viewed as an event on the path from the Incarnation to the resurrection, the death of Christ also serves as a revelation of the divine will. The antecedents to Irenaeus's theory of recapitulation, the "restoration" of humanity through the obedient "repetition" of the human life in Christ (Irenaeus Haer. 4.38.1), seem to lie here, particularly in Ignatius (Ign. Eph. 19.1—20.2). Christ has provided a pattern by which disciples may attain to incorruption. Ignatius longs for martyrdom precisely for this reason (Ign. Magn. 1.2; Ign. Rom. 4.1-2; 6.1-3). Christ's humility in suffering also provides a pattern for believers (1 Clem. 2.1; 1.16; Mart. Pol.; see Clement of Rome). Here, however, the shift we noted has taken place. No longer, as in the NT writings, does obedience spring from an absolute, completed "indicative." Imitation takes place by divine grace, not by human resources (see Diogn. 9.6; see Diognetes, Epistle to), but the arrival at salvation is now fully contingent upon one's own efforts.

For most second-century writers, as a divine revelation, the cross marks the supersession of Judaism* by Christianity. This idea is present in Ignatius and prominent in Barnabas, the Epistle to Diognetus and Melito, among others. Christ brings a new law and a new covenant for Christians, since by disobedience Israel long ago had forfeited the old covenant. Generally this new covenant represents a spiritualization of the sacrificial system of the law. Borrowing on the prophetic critique, cultic practices are replaced by Christian obedience. Despite some similarities to the NT writings, fundamental differences again appear. The cross is not central, except as a means of charging Israel collectively with guilt for the death of the Lord. Instead of Christ, it is the church, its institutions and practices that transcends the nation of Israel. Consequently the clear hope for Israel characteristic of the NT writings has disappeared.

6.3. Impartation of Incorruptibility. The impartation of salvation takes on a quasi-physical nature, first in Ignatius and later in Irenaeus. The "breaking of one bread," the celebration of the Lord's Supper,* becomes for Ignatius "the medicine of immortality" (Ign. Eph. 20.2), the means for obtaining life (Ign. Phld. 4). The resurrected flesh of Christ becomes the means by which the church attains to incorruption. Believers are joined to the tree of the cross in an organic way, as branches, and thereby to God (Ign. Trall. 11). In all of this there is an emphasis on the real death of the Lord, which brings the possibility of the salvation of the whole human being. The fronts against Docetism and Gnosticism are apparent, as is the wrestling with the relation of material flesh to immaterial spirit. The death of Christ is understood primarily as a solution to the problem of mortality and corruption rather than that of guilt.

6.4. Forgiveness of Sins. The language of forgiveness and atonement often bears striking similarities to that of the NT but with the marked departure in meaning that we have noted. Rather than having a juridical sense as in Paul, "justification" seems to signify moral transformation (1 Clem. 30-33; Diogn. 9-10; Ign. Rom. 5; Ign. Phld. 8; Herm. Vis. 3.9; Herm. Sim. 5.7; see Hermas, Shepherd of). The atoning death of Christ brings forgiveness (Ign. Smyrn. 6) but only as prerequisite for obtaining salvation (Ign. Eph. 9). As Torrance (94-95) observes, for Polycarp Christ is the "down payment" (arrabōn) of our righteousness (Pol. Phil. 8.1), a down payment that must be supplemented by obedience (Pol. Phil. 2.2).

See also CHRISTOLOGY; CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE; FORGIVENESS; LAMB; LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST; REDEMPTION; RESURRECTION; SACRIFICE, OFFERINGS, GIFTS; SALVATION; SUFFERING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Aulén, Christus Victor: A Historical Study of the Three Main Types of the Idea of Atonement (New York: Macmillan, 1969); F. Bovon, Luc le Théologien: Vingt-cinq Ans de Recherches (1950-75) (Le Monde de la Bible; Neuchâtel: Delachaux & Niestlé, 1978); R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); J. T. Carroll and J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus in Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of Luke (New York: Harper & Row, 1961); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959); W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of 1 Peter 3:18—4:6 (2d ed.; AnBib 23; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1989); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); J. Denney, The Death of Christ, ed. R. V. G. Tasker (London: Tyndale, 1951); B. D. Ehrman, The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture: The Effects of Early Christological Controversies on the Text of the New Testament (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993); W. Elert, "Die Theopaschitische Formel," TLZ 56 (1931) 195-204; J. S. Feinberg, "1 Peter 3:18-20, Ancient Mythology and the Intermediate State," WTJ 48 (1986) 303-36; D. Garlington, The Obedience of Faith (WUNT 38; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); S. R. Garrett, "The Meaning of Jesus' Death in Luke," Word & World (1992) 11-16; E. R. Goodenough, The Theology of Justin Martyr: An Investigation into the Conceptions of Early Christian Literature and Its Hellenistic and Judaistic Influences (Amsterdam: Philo, 1968); L. Goppelt, A Commentary on I Peter, ed. F. Hahn (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); K. Grayston, Dying, We Live: A New Enquiry into the Death of Christ in the New Testament (New York: Oxford University Press, 1990); J. B. Green, "The Death of Jesus, God's Servant" in Reimaging the Death of the Lukan Jesus, ed. D. D. Sylva (Athenum Monographien/Theologie: BBB 73; Frankfurt: Hain, 1990) 1-28; idem, The Death of Jesus (WUNT 33; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1988); W. Grudem, "Christ Preaching Through Noah: 1 Peter 3:19-20 in the Light of Dominant Themes in Jewish Literature," TJ 7 (1986) 3-31; E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms (SNTSMS 5; London: Cambridge University Press, 1967); M. D. Hooker, Not Ashamed of the Gospel: New Testament Interpretations of the Death of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); J. J. Hughes, "Hebrews 9:15ff. and Galatians 3:15ff.: A Study in Covenant Practice and Procedure," NovT 21 (1979) 27-96; R. J. Karris, "Luke 23:47 and the Lukan View of Jesus' Death" in Reimaging the Death of the Lukan Jesus, ed. D. D. Sylva (Athenum Monographien/Theologie: BBB 73; Frankfurt: Hain, 1990) 68-78; J. Kodell, "Luke's Theology of the Death of Jesus" in Sin, Salvation and the Spirit, ed. D. Durken (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1979) 221-30; F. Laub, " 'Ein für Allemal Hineingegangen in das Allerheiligste' (Hebr 9,12) zum Verständnis des Kreuzestodes im Hebräerbrief," BZ 35 (1991) 65-85; I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT: Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); idem, Luke: Historian and Theologian (Exeter: Paternoster, 1970); D. P. Moessner, " 'The Christ Must Suffer,' The Church Must Suffer: Rethinking the Theology of the Cross in Luke-Acts' in SBLSP 29 (1990) 165-95; L. L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1965); idem, The Atonement: Its Meaning and Significance (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1983); J. H. Neyrey, The Passion According to Luke (New York: Paulist, 1985); E. H. Pagels, "Gnostic and Orthodox Views of Christ's Passion: Paradigms for the Christian's Response to Persecution?" in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, ed. B. Layton (SHR 41; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1980) 1:262-88; D. Peterson, Hebrews and Perfection: An Examination of the Concept of Perfection in the "Epistle to the Hebrews" (SNTSMS 47; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1986); V. Taylor, The Atonement in the New Testament Teaching (London: Epworth, 1958); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959); C. M. Tuckett, "Atonement in the NT," ABD 1:518-22; J. B. Tyson, The Death of Jesus in Luke-Acts (Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1986); R. E. van Voorst, "Extracanonical Passion Narratives" in The Death of Jesus in Early Christianity, ed. J. T. Carroll and J. B. Green (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995) 148-61; P. Vielhauer, "On the 'Paulinism' of Acts" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (Nashville: Abingdon, 1966) 33-50; R. S. Wallace, The Atoning Death of Christ (Westchester, IL: Crossway, 1981); M. Wilcox, " 'Upon the Tree'—Deut 21:22-23 in the New Testament," JBL 96 (1977) 85-99. M. A. Seifrid

DECONSTRUCTION. See HERMENEUTICS.

DELAY OF PAROUSIA. See PAROUSIA.

DEMONS. See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SPIRITS.

DESPOSYNOI. See RELATIVES OF JESUS.

DESTRUCTION. See WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

DEVIL. See SATAN, DEVIL.

DIASPORA JUDAISM

By the first century A.D. Jewish communities had become established in almost every part of the then civilized world. Our period of investigation will be from the foundation of the various Diaspora communities until the second century A.D., although material relating to later periods will be discussed occasionally.

1. Definitions
2. Sources
3. A Geographical Survey of Diaspora Communities
4. Population
5. Economic Situation
6. The Diaspora Synagogue
7. Community Leadership
8. Diaspora Communities in the Greek City
9. The Assimilation, Acculturation and Accommodation of Diaspora Communities
10. Facets of Jewish Identity in the Diaspora
11. Conclusions

1. Definitions.

Scholars of earlier generations categorized Judaism* as either Palestinian Judaism or Hellenistic Judaism. The former was regarded as "uncontaminated" and "normative" and, as the name suggests, restricted to Palestine. The latter was an adulterated, Hellenized form of Judaism found in the Diaspora. However, recent scholarship has noted how inadequate such a distinction is since strong hellenizing influences were at work in Palestine, and Diaspora communities continued to regard themselves as Jewish and can in no way be thought of as somehow less genuine.

Therefore, the primary distinction made in the study of Judaism is a geographical one between Judaism in Palestine and that in the Diaspora. Further, it is generally acknowledged that there was much diversity in Judaism in both geographical areas and that the development of Jewish life was influenced by the social and political context of each community.

2. Sources.

Often it is difficult to determine which Jewish texts from our period come from the Diaspora, but the following certainly or almost certainly do: Artapanus, Aristobulus, Demetrius, Ezekiel, Joseph and Aseneth, Josephus,* the Epistle of Aristeas, 3 and 4 Maccabees, Philo,* Pseudo-Philo, Pseudo-Phocylides, the Septuagint, some of the Sibylline Oracles, Testament of Abraham and Wisdom of Solomon. We have a significant number of papyri and inscriptions that shed valuable light on Diaspora Jewish life, although their preservation and discovery is haphazard, and it is often difficult to determine their dating and whether they are Jewish. In addition six Diaspora synagogues have been excavated. Further information about Diaspora Judaism comes from texts written by non-Jewish authors who provide us with insight into how Jews and Judaism were perceived by others. Overall our evidence is sufficient for us to construct a coherent account of Jewish life in only a very few places.

3. A Geographical Survey of Diaspora Communities.

By the first century A.D. there were significant Jewish communities throughout the Greco-Roman world, so that there were probably few major cities or regions that were without a community of resident Jews (see Philo Leg. Gai. 214, 281-83; Flacc. 45-46; Vit. Mos. 2.232; Josephus Ant. 14.7.2 §115; J.W. 7.3.3 §43; 1 Macc 15:23-24; Sib. Or. 3.271-72; Acts 2:9-11). There were two main reasons for the development of communities in the Diaspora. First, on occasions conquerors forcibly deported Jews; for example, the Babylonians carried numerous Jews to Babylonia (see Babylon), and Pompey took hundreds of Jews to Rome* as prisoners of war. Second, voluntary migration from Palestine to the Diaspora, arising from diverse motives, was highly significant.

The origins of the Jewish communities in Babylonia lie in the exile, since many Jews chose to remain in Babylonia when Cyrus allowed them to return to Jerusalem* (2 Chron 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4). Josephus wrote of the size of the Jewish population beyond the Euphrates in his time (Josephus Ant. 15.8.2.2 §14; cf. Philo Leg. Gai. 216, 282); there were significant Jewish settlements in Nehardea, Nisibis (Josephus Ant. 18.9.1 §311-12) and Seleucia (Josephus Ant. 18.9.8-9 §372-79). Queen Helena of Adiabene and her son Izates were converted to Judaism in the middle of the first century A.D. (Josephus Ant. 20.2.1-5 §17-53). During the Jewish war of A.D. 66-70 Jews in Palestine attempted to arouse hostility against the Romans among their fellow Jews beyond the Euphrates (Josephus J.W. 6.6.2 §343). The synagogue* in Dura-Europos, which was a modified house, was decorated with the most elaborate frescoes to survive from the ancient Jewish world.

The Jewish community in Antioch,* which was the largest in Syria, probably began in the third century B.C. (Josephus Ant. 12.3.1 §119). Under the Romans the Jewish community continued to grow, and Josephus notes its size, wealth and success in gaining sympathizers and proselytes (Josephus J.W. 7.3.3 §45). However, Jewish-Gentile tensions grew in the first century A.D., particularly among the lower social classes, and during the Jewish war of 66-70 the Jewish communities in many Syrian cities suffered on several occasions at the hands of the Gentile majority (Josephus J.W. 2.18.1 §457-60; 2.18.5 §477-79; 7.3.1-4 §40-62). After the war the inhabitants of Antioch asked Titus to expel the Jews from the city, but Titus refused to do so and confirmed the Jews' former rights (Josephus J.W. 7.5.2 §100-111). We also know of other Jewish communities in Syria in Apamea, Damascus, Caesarea and elsewhere.

Between 210-205 B.C Antiochus III transferred two thousand Jewish families from Mesopotamia and Babylonia to Lydia and Phrygia as military settlers; this provides us with the first unambiguous evidence of Jewish communities in Asia Minor (Josephus Ant. 12.3.4 §147-53). In Pro Flacco 28.67-68 Cicero writes of significant amounts of temple tax that had been seized in Asia in 62 B.C. by the Roman governor, Flaccus, giving evidence of the size and prosperity of some Jewish communities. A series of probably generally authentic documents preserved by Josephus and to be dated from 49 B.C. to A.D. 2/3 provide evidence for a number of Jewish communities in Asia Minor (Josephus Ant. 12.3.2 §125-28; 14.10.1-26 §185-267; 16.2.3-5 §27-61; 16.6.1-8 §160-78; Philo Leg. Gai. 315). They indicate these Jewish communities experienced ongoing tension in their local cities with respect to their social and religious privileges. The evidence suggests the Jewish communities were a significant and influential presence in the cities concerned and some Jews were of social and economic importance, but their limited participation in the main currents of city life led to their being a considerable irritant as far as the local cities were concerned.

By the beginning of the first century A.D., however, hostility toward the Jewish communities seems to have abated. An inscription from Acmonia shows that Julia Severa, a high priestess of the imperial cult in the time of Nero (see Emperor), built the Jewish community a synagogue (CII 766). She was thus a Gentile benefactor of the local Jewish community, a fact that shows Jews had friends in the highest social circles. Luke indicates that Jews were able to influence the local Gentile population in some places, which suggests that the Jews were respected in their cities (Acts 13:50; 14:2, 5). The presence of God-fearers of some social standing also suggests Jews were a respected group (e.g., Acts 13:16, 48-50; 14:1). Revelation 2:9 and Revelation 3:9 suggest that around A.D. 95 the Jewish communities in Smyrna and Philadelphia actively opposed Christians (see Revelation, Book of). Asian Christians addressed by Ignatius* clearly were tempted to go to the synagogue and adopt Jewish customs (Ign. Phld. 6.1-2; Ign. Magn. 8.1; 9.1-2; 10.3), a circumstance that points to the impact of some Jewish communities on local Christians.

From the second century A.D. onward it seems clear that some Jewish communities and individuals in Asia played a prominent part in their cities (e.g., CII 745, 748, 770; Monumenta Asiae Minoris Antiqua 6, 335a; Trebilco, 37-103). The size and prominence of the Sardis synagogue points to the social integration and civic prestige of this Jewish community. It seems that at least some of these communities were able to become acculturated and integrated into their cities while remaining faithfully Jewish. They seem to have belonged in their cities, where they were respected and made significant social contributions without compromising their Jewish identity.

We know that Jews lived in at least three towns in the kingdom of Bosporus. An almost certainly Jewish inscription from Gorgippia, dated A.D. 41, refers to the manumission of a female slave,* which was carried out in a synagogue (CII 690; cf. CII 683-84, 683a-b from Panticapaeum).

We are best informed about the Jewish communities in Egypt, which were the largest Diaspora communities in our period. At the time of the Babylonian conquest some Jews fled to Egypt (Jer 43:6-7; 44:1; 46:14); Aramaic papyri of the fifth century B.C. give evidence of a Jewish military colony at Elephantine, a colony that included a Jewish temple.

Jewish immigration into Egypt, both forced and voluntary, was significant from the third century B.C., with the result that Jews came to be settled throughout Egypt. The Ptolemaic era was a period when the Jews in Egypt encountered little hostility (although there were some notable exceptions) and came to fill a significant and prominent role in the economic, political, military and social life of Egypt. They generally flourished as Jews who retained their ethnic identity while also being strongly attracted to Hellenistic culture. However, their position was also precarious, since they had become alienated from significant sections of the wider populace.

At Leontopolis there was another significant Jewish community, formed by Jewish military settlers around 160 B.C. and including the Temple of Onias, which served the needs of the military colony (Tcherikover and Fuks, hereafter CPJ, 3:145-63; Josephus Ant. 13.3.1-3 §62-73). In Philo's day Jews lived throughout Alexandria* but were particularly concentrated in two of its five quarters (Philo Flacc. 55; Josephus J.W. 2.18.8 §495). Synagogues were to be found throughout the city (Philo Leg. Gai. 132).

Octavian reaffirmed the privileges of the Jewish community in Egypt when he annexed that country in 30 B.C. The Romans also redefined the various classes of the population and emphasized the distinctions Romans, citizens of Greek cities and "foreigners." The Jews seem to have been relegated en bloc to the same category as the Egyptians and thus were compelled to pay the poll tax (laographia); Romans and citizens of Greek cities were exempted from paying this tax or paid at a lower rate. This was not only a financial burden; to be grouped with the native Egyptians was also a grave cultural affront, particularly to the upper classes of the Jewish population. Hence the matter of civic status became an increasingly important one for some Jews. Thus began a period of decline for the Jews in Egypt.

Jewish-Greek tension erupted in A.D. 38, when the Greeks destroyed synagogues or put up images of Gaius inside them. Flaccus, the Roman governor, declared the Jews to be "foreigners and aliens" in Alexandria and ordered them all to live in one section of the city (Philo Flacc. 25-57; Leg. Gai. 120-35). Murder of Jews and widespread looting also occurred. Flaccus was subsequently dismissed from office, and both sides sent delegations to Caligula, who died in A.D. 41 before giving his decision on the matter of Jewish communal privileges, which Flaccus had annulled.

Further trouble erupted in A.D. 41, which led to hearings before Claudius. He wrote a letter to the city (CPJ 153; cf. Josephus Ant. 19.5.2 §280-85) in which he called upon the Alexandrians to allow the Jews to keep their customs and ordered the Jews not to seek any privileges beyond those they had enjoyed for a long period. He also forbade the Jews from participating in the gymnasium and told them to be satisfied with the benefits they were enjoying in "a city not their own." Both these last factors support the view that the Jews had never possessed citizenship rights as a body in the city (Smallwood, 235-55). However, it seems clear that some Jews had become citizens individually. Claudius's letter halted the social and cultural integration of such Jews and their children.

The conflict between Jews and Greeks erupted again in A.D. 66 and resulted in the slaughter of a large number of Jews (Josephus J.W. 2.18.7-8 §487-98). After the Jewish war some of the most zealous insurgents escaped to Egypt, where they endeavored to stir up the Jewish population against the Romans, although they met strong opposition from the leaders of the Jewish community (Josephus J.W. 7.10.1 §409-19). In A.D. 115-17 Jews in Egypt, Cyrenaica, Cyprus and Mesopotamia attacked their Greek neighbors and launched a revolt. The loss of life was huge, and the Diaspora communities concerned were decimated as a result. Messianic expectation, resentment against the local population and radical social disaffection seem to have been factors behind this revolt.

Jewish settlement in Cyrenaica probably dates from near the beginning of Ptolemaic rule in the area (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.4 §44), with numerous inscriptions testifying to a large Jewish population (see Lüderitz). In Cyrene the Jews formed a well-established and independent body, since Strabo notes that the population of the city was made up of citizens, farmers, resident aliens and Jews (Josephus Ant. 14.7.2 §115). Inscriptions show that in the first century A.D. some Jews were taking part in the life of the city and had attained considerable standing politically and culturally. The city also produced the Jewish historian Jason, who wrote a history of the Hasmonean revolt that was abbreviated in 2 Maccabees. He indicates the high cultural level attained by some Jews in Cyrene.

Three inscriptions suggest that some Jews in Berenice had been successful in their social and cultural integration into city life and that other Jews considered this to be legitimate (Lüderitz, nos. 70-72). The community seems to have called a building it owned an amphitheater. We also know of Jewish communities in Teuchira, Apollonia and Ptolemais and in Latin-speaking North Africa.

Philo (Leg. Gai. 281-82) gives evidence for a number of Jewish communities in Macedonia and Greece; he lists Thessaly, Boetia, Macedonia, Aetolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth, most of the Peloponnese and the islands of Euboea and Crete. In Paul's time there were Jews in Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens and Corinth (Acts 16:13; 17:1, 10, 17; 18:4). The Jewish communities in these areas were probably never large, and the epigraphical data for them are limited. One inscription from Corinth, to be dated after the NT period, speaks of a "synagogue of the Hebrews" (CII 718). An inscription from Stobi (CII 694) records the grant of part of a private house for use as a synagogue. The Jews of Cyprus participated in the revolt under Trajan; clearly they were numerically strong. We have some information about Jews living on Cos, Rhodes and Samos, and a synagogue, built in the first century B.C., has been discovered on Delos.

A significant number of Jews lived in Rome. We do not know when Jews first settled there, but given the significance of Rome and the contacts between the Romans and Hasmonean Judea it was probably in the second century B.C. Some Jews were probably expelled from the city in 139 B.C. (see Valerius Maximus 1.3.3; Goodman in Lieu, North and Rajak, 69-70). A number of Jews were brought to Rome as prisoners of war by Pompey in 63 B.C. (Josephus Ant. 14.4.4-5 §70-71, 79), and in 59 B.C. Cicero suggests that they were securely established in the city (Pro Flacco 28.66-67). Josephus reports that eight thousand Roman Jews supported an embassy from Judea in 4 B.C. (Josephus Ant. 17.11.1 §300). The community flourished in the Augustan era while maintaining its Jewish identity; a number of Roman authors commented on the presence and practices of Jews in Rome in this period (e.g., Horace Sermones 1.4.139-43; 1.5.96-104; 1.9.60-78; Ovid Ars amatoria 1.75-80, 413-16).

In A.D. 19 the Jews were expelled from Rome because of their burgeoning influence (Josephus Ant. 18.3.4-5 §65-84; Tacitus Ann. 2.85); however, it is doubtful that all the Jews living in Rome left the city. There was further trouble in the 40s, although the evidence is problematic. Two events probably occurred: first, a prohibition of assemblies in A.D. 41 referred to by Dio Cassius (60.6.6), and second, an expulsion mentioned by Suetonius (Claudius 25.4), Acts 18:2 and Orosius (Adv. Pag. 7.6.15-16), which the latter dates to A.D. 49. According to Suetonius, the Jews were expelled since "they were constantly rioting at the instigation of Chrestus." This probably refers to troubles resulting from Jewish Christian missionaries'* preaching about Christ among Jews in Rome; it seems likely that only known troublemakers were expelled (e.g., Acts 18:2: Priscilla and Aquila).

For the rest of the first century A.D. the Jews in Rome were in an ambiguous position; they thrived, were able to maintain their identity through faithfulness to their traditions and won admirers and imitators from Romans belonging to a range of social classes. They were also subject to criticism from some quarters, mainly because they were seen as a threat to Roman traditions.

Inscriptions from the Roman Jewish catacombs, mostly to be dated in the second to fourth centuries A.D., show that there was a significant number of Jews spread over several parts of the city in this period. From these inscriptions we learn the names of eleven synagogues in Rome, including "the synagogue of the Hebrews" and synagogues named after Augustus and probably Marcus Agrippa. 1 Clement, written from Rome in the A.D. 90s (see Clement of Rome), tells us nothing about Jews in the city.

A synagogue has been discovered in Ostia, the port of Rome. Part of the building was erected toward the end of the first century A.D.; it was expanded in the second and third centuries and received its final form in the fourth century A.D. We also know of Jews in other cities in Italy, including Puteoli, Pompeii, Venosa and Naples.

4. Population.

Although we lack sufficient data to ascertain accurately the number of Jews in the Diaspora, our sources give some information. Some ancient authors emphasize the large numbers of Jews in Egypt and elsewhere (Strabo Geog. 16.2.28; Philo Vit. Mos. 2.232; Leg. Gai. 214, 245; Flacc. 43; Josephus Ant. 11.5.2 §133; 17.11.1 §300; 18.3.4-5 §65-84; J.W. 7.9.2 §445), and the amount of temple tax seized by Flaccus in four Asian cities suggests a considerable Jewish population in these areas (Cicero Pro Flacco 66-69). That the Jews of Egypt, Cyrenaica, Cyprus and Mesopotamia fought a protracted war in the time of Trajan suggests that the total population of the Jews in these areas of the Diaspora was considerable, although again we are unable to give estimates. It does seem clear, however, that the total Jewish population of the Diaspora considerably exceeded the Jewish population in Palestine (Tcherikover, 292-95) and that Diaspora Jews constituted a group of significant size. Scholars often suggest that five to six million Jews were living in the Diaspora in the first century, but such figures can be only speculative.

5. Economic Situation.

Diaspora Jews participated in a variety of branches of economic life. We know, for example, of Jews who were soldiers, land-owning farmers, agricultural laborers, shepherds, artisans, manual workers, traders, merchants, bankers, government officials and slaves. In some Roman writers Jewish poverty was a byword (e.g., Juvenal Sat. 3.14-16; 6.542-47), but we also know of some very wealthy Jews (Josephus Ant. 20.7.3 §147; J.W. 7.11.1-2 §442-45; see Riches). Diaspora Jews, then, were found in almost all socioeconomic strata of the period (Safrai and Stern, 701-27).

6. The Diaspora Synagogue.

6.1. Synagogue Buildings. Synagogues have been discovered at Delos, Ostia, Sardis, Dura-Europos, Stobi and Priene. The existence of many others is clear from inscriptions or literary evidence. There would have been more than one synagogue in a large city; eleven are attested for Rome, and Philo says that there were many synagogues in Alexandria (Philo Leg. Gai. 132; cf. Spec. Leg. 2.62). Acts shows that there were many synagogues throughout the regions where Paul traveled (Acts 9:2; 13:5, 14; 14:1; 17:1, 10, 17; 18:4-7, 19-26; 19:8). Small communities would meet in a house* belonging to a member. The earliest synagogue buildings were probably originally private houses modified for use by the community (e.g., Delos and Priene).

The earliest references to a Diaspora synagogue building are dated between 246-221 B.C. and come from Egypt (Horbury and Noy, nos. 22, 117). At first the building seems to have been called a proseuchē, or place of prayer (see CPJ 129, 134, 138, 432; Horbury and Noy, nos. 9, 13, 22, 25, 27, 125-26; 3 Macc 7:20; Philo Flacc. 41, 45, 122; Josephus Life 280; CII 682-84, 690, 726); sometimes the congregation that gathered in the building is called synagōgē, which means "assembly." However, later the building in which they assembled is more often called the synagōgē.

There was no uniform architectural design for Diaspora synagogues, and the very different plans of the six known buildings are clearly influenced by local factors; however, they do share some common features. They generally contain an architectural feature for keeping the biblical scrolls and sometimes had a platform for a reader and benches. Often there were also guest rooms or a dining hall adjoining the assembly room. The Dura-Europos synagogue contains an outstanding set of frescoes that provide our most important evidence for the existence of Jewish figurative art in this period. The Sardis synagogue, which was one part of a complex of buildings including a bathhouse and gymnasium in the center of the city, is the largest synagogue known from antiquity. The synagogue reveals a confident Jewish community that was also integrated to some extent into the wider city (see Kraabel in Urman and Flesher, 95-126).

6.2. The Synagogue as an Institution. The synagogue was the focus of community life for Diaspora Jews and was organized by the community for the community. Not only was it the center of religious life where the sabbath service was held, but also it was the focus for the educational, political, economic, social and judicial life of the community; communal meals were also often held there. It was thus a crucial institution for the maintenance of Jewish identity and played a central role in Jewish life.

Sources describe synagogue services primarily in terms of the reading and study of Scripture (Philo Vit. Mos. 2.215-16; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.17 §175). That some of the buildings were called "prayer houses" indicates that prayer was also an important feature.

6.3. God-fearers. A recently discovered inscription from Aphrodisias lists, along with a number of Jews, fifty-four Gentiles who are called theosebis or "God-fearers" (see Reynolds and Tannenbaum). Although some scholars argue that the title God-fearer here means the Gentiles concerned have simply expressed their support for the Jews as fellow townspeople, it seems much more likely that the term indicates that these Gentiles were linked in some formal way to the Jewish community, without being proselytes. This and other inscriptions, and some literary sources, strongly suggest that there were a number of Gentile "God-fearers" who were formally associated with the Jewish community, were involved in at least some facets of synagogue life and kept some of the commandments without becoming proselytes who joined the community (see Trebilco, 145-66; Juvenal Sat. 14.96-99; Josephus Ant. 14.7.2 §110; J.W. 7.3.3 §45).

Although Diaspora Jews do not seem to have been involved in an organized active mission to convert Gentiles (see Goodman in Lieu, North and Rajak, 53-78), they do seem to have welcomed Gentiles who were attracted to the Jewish community either as God-fearers or proselytes. The role of the Jews here then was passively to bear witness through their existence and life. It also seems likely that at least some Diaspora synagogues were visible and open to outsiders. It is also noteworthy that we know of some proselytes (see Juvenal Sat. 14.96-106; Josephus J.W. 2.19.2 §520); 2.20.2 §559-61; Acts 6:5 and some inscriptions), although their numbers are quite small.

We can also note the fairly widespread adoption of some Jewish customs such as lighting of lamps (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.38 §282; Persius Sat. 5.179-84) and not working on the sabbath (Ovid Ars amatoria 1.413-16) by Gentiles who did not come into the more formal category of God-fearers. Clearly Gentiles were attracted to Judaism to varying degrees throughout our period.

7. Community Leadership.

The names and functions of community leaders probably varied from place to place. In the third century B.C. a gerousia represented the Jews of the whole city of Alexandria (Ep. Arist. 310). At the time of Strabo an ethnarchēs stood at the head of the Jews (Josephus Ant. 14.7.2 §117 quoting Strabo), but in A.D. 11 Augustus modified the situation by either reintroducing the gerousia or giving it the power previously vested in the ethnarchēs (Philo Flacc. 74, 117).

The position of archōn or ruler was widespread among Diaspora Jews, although the title may have meant different things in different places. In some communities the archontes were elected, formed the executive committee of the gerousia and looked after all the affairs of the community. The title of presbyteros or elder is found in some places (e.g., CII 663, 735, 739; Ep. Arist. 310). The relation of archōn and presbyteros is unclear; they may have been alternative titles, or the members of the gerousia who were not members of the executive committee (the archons) may have been called presbyteroi. In some places a gerousiarchēs was head of the gerousia. The archisynagōgos or ruler of the synagogue had a role in making arrangements for the services of the synagogue (Acts 13:15) and probably also had some responsibility for maintaining Jewish life and teaching (Acts 18:17). They were often wealthy people of influence and standing in the community, who were benefactors and patrons.

Other titles found in inscriptions include phrontistēs ("overseer"), grammateus ("clerk"), prostatēs ("patron"), father or mother of the synagogue, rabbi and priest. It is often difficult to determine what these titles meant (see van der Horst, 89-98).

We know of more than twenty women who held titles such as "ruler of the synagogue," "mother of the synagogue," "elder," "leader" or "priestess." If holding the equivalent title involved a man in active leadership (as opposed to being an honorary title), then it seems likely that when a woman held the title she too was involved in active leadership in the synagogue. There is a continuing debate, however, about whether some of these positions were essentially honorific for all holders of the posts, in which case those who held the titles would have benefited the Jewish community through their munificence or patronage (see Rajak in Lieu, North and Rajak, 22-24). We have no evidence that women were segregated in Diaspora synagogues, and no ancient text calls for segregation.

8. Diaspora Communities in the Greek City. We do not have any clear evidence that in the Hellenistic and early Roman periods Jews possessed citizenship as a body in any Greek city. Josephus's statements that suggest that they did have citizenship (e.g., Josephus Ant. 12.3.1 §119; 12.3.2 §125-26; Ag. Ap. 2.4 §37-39) are all historically dubious or ambiguous (see Safrai and Stern, 440-81). Clearly, however, some individuals did obtain citizenship in their cities (e.g., Paul in Acts 21:39; Philo Leg. Gai. 155-57; Trebilco, 172).

Diaspora Jews generally organized themselves into communities, although the constitutional position of these communities varied from place to place and over time. The position of the Jewish community within any city probably depended on local factors such as when, how and for what purpose the Jewish community became established in that particular locality. In some cities, such as Alexandria, they seem to have formed self-governing groups. It is often suggested that the Jews there were officially recognized as a politeuma, that is, a formally constituted, semiautonomous civic body within a city whose members were not citizens but possessed some important rights. However, the term politeuma is found only once in Jewish literature from Alexandria (Ep. Arist. 310). Since it is unclear to whom it refers there (see Lüderitz in van Henten and van der Horst, 183-225), it is precarious to base far-reaching theories on this one reference. In Berenice we have evidence for a Jewish politeuma, but it was probably a kind of council of the Jews of the city rather than an organization for the whole Jewish community. In other cities the position of the Jews is best compared with that of other associations of immigrants who lived as foreign people in a city. The actual form of communal life probably varied from place to place, as is shown by the variety of terms used to express the notion of community, including the terms "the Jews," "the people," synodos, politeuma, katoikia, the ethnos and the synagōgē.

A crucial matter in relations between the Jewish Diaspora communities and the cities in which they lived was being granted certain privileges that enabled them to live as Jews in accordance with their law and maintain their identity as communities. The support of the Roman authorities for these privileges was crucial in the face of periodic challenges from individual cities, with Julius Caesar and Augustus being particularly noteworthy in their support for Jewish privileges (see Civil Authority). These included being able to meet regularly, organize their own community life and have internal jurisdiction; to own buildings; to have their "ancestral" food; to collect and send the temple tax to Jerusalem; and to live according to their customs and laws, such as observing the sabbath. Privileges connected with observing the sabbath included being free from appearing in court on the sabbath and an exemption from serving in the Roman army. That they enjoyed these privileges, without being citizens and participating fully in a city's life and cults, often led to friction between the Jews and the city authorities.

The status of Diaspora Jewish communities was not greatly affected after the revolt of A.D. 66-70, in which Diaspora Jews were little involved. Titus resisted demands for the abolition of Jewish communal privileges in Antioch and Alexandria (Josephus J.W. 7.5.2 §100-111), and generally privileges remained unmodified outside Judea. The diversion of the temple tax to the fiscus Judaicus in order to support the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was the one important change that affected the Diaspora after A.D. 70. Domitian exacted the tax with special severity; Nerva prohibited the accusations to officials that had resulted from Domitian's policy.

9. The Assimilation, Acculturation and Accommodation of Diaspora Communities. We have noted that the old distinction between "pure" Palestinian Judaism and "Hellenized" Diaspora Judaism is no longer viable. We cannot analyze Diaspora Judaism by simple measurement against Palestinian Judaism; we must find appropriate criteria for the analysis of Diaspora Judaism and in particular the ways Jews reacted to their environment.

In this regard J. M. G. Barclay notes that we can distinguish among different kinds of Hellenization, such as political, social, linguistic, educational, ideological, religious and material Hellenization. Further, engagement with Hellenism could occur to a different degree in each of these areas, which were not all equally significant. Barclay has devised three scales to depict these different kinds of Hellenization (92-102).

First is an assimilation scale, which refers to the level of social integration and concerns social contacts, interaction and practices. Someone at the top of the assimilation scale had abandoned the social distinctives fundamental to Jewish identity; someone at the bottom confined his or her social life entirely to the Jewish community. Second is an acculturation scale, which refers to the linguistic, educational and ideological aspects of a cultural matrix. Someone at the top of the acculturation scale had scholarly expertise in Hellenistic scholarship; someone at the bottom knew no Greek. Third is an accommodation scale, which refers to the use to which acculturation is put. Here Barclay distinguishes between integrative trends, which involved the imitation of Hellenistic culture and its use in reinterpreting the Jewish traditions and could lead to the submersion of Jewish cultural uniqueness, and oppositional trends, which involved the use of Hellenistic weapons in polemic against Hellenism itself and could lead to antagonism to Greco-Roman culture. Thus "acculturation could be used to construct either bridges or fences between Jews and their surrounding cultures" (Barclay, 98). Although our evidence only rarely enables us to plot Diaspora Jews on these three scales, their use allows us to distinguish among the many different ways Diaspora Jews interacted with their environment. (For the following see in particular Barclay, 103-228, 320-80.)

9.1. Assimilation. There was an enormous range in the degree of assimilation of Diaspora Jews into non-Jewish society. Those who were highly assimilated, to the degree of losing their Jewish distinctiveness and abandoning Jewish practices, included Jews who were fully integrated into political and/or religious affairs of state (e.g., Tiberius Julius Alexander [see Barclay, 105-6]; CII 749; Josephus J.W. 7.3.3 §50); those who abandoned some aspects of Jewish customs in order to be socially successful or to gain some other benefit (Philo Vit. Mos. 1.31; Josephus Ant. 12.4.6 §186-89; 18.5.4 §141); those who married Gentiles and did not rear their children as Jews (e.g., Philo Spec. Leg. 3.29); those who had become critics of their own traditions (Philo Abr. 178-93; Conf. Ling. 2-13); those whose allegorical interpretations of the law led them to abandon key Jewish practices (Philo Migr. Abr. 89-93); and those whose isolated social circumstances necessitated a high level of assimilation (e.g., CPJ 7, 148).

The category of medium assimilation includes those who had significant social ties with the non-Jewish environment but who also preserved their Jewish identity. Again types of assimilation can be discerned. First were those who were well-educated and participated in the social and cultural life of a city or had significant social ties to the non-Jewish world but remained faithful to Jewish tradition (e.g., Alexander the Alabarch [Josephus J.W. 5.5.3 §205]; the author of the Epistle to Aristeas; Philo; Jewish ephebes, city magistrates and citizens [CII 755; Acts 21:39; citizenship did not necessarily entail loss of Jewish distinctiveness]). Many Jews were well integrated into civic life (e.g., Lüderitz, no. 36; CII 748), attained influential positions within their cities and adopted many local customs; yet "a degree of integration did not mean the abandonment of an active attention to Jewish tradition or of Jewish distinctiveness. It was as Jews that they were involved in, and a part of, the life of the cities in which they lived" (Trebilco, 187).

Second were those who were in various forms of employment with or for non-Jews (e.,g. in the Ptolemaic army). Third were those who were associated with non-Jews in legal matters. Fourth were those who gained patrons, supporters or converts among non-Jews, which suggests there was considerable social interaction between these Jews and non-Jews.

Barclay (329) concludes that "the patterns of life we have observed in the Mediterranean Diaspora suggest that Jews were neither socially and culturally isolated nor simply blended into some social amalgam. While their boundaries may have been defined variously in differing circumstances, it was precisely the ability to maintain these boundaries while continuing everyday social contacts with non-Jews that was the peculiar achievement of the successful Diaspora communities."

In the category of low assimilation are Jews whose social contact with non-Jews was minimal. Factors leading to low assimilation include the existence of Jewish residential districts (e.g., CPJ 423, 468; Josephus Ant. 14.10.24 §259-61); the isolation of some communities such as the Therapeutae, a group found throughout Egypt that in some ways resembled the Essenes (Philo Vit. Cont. 2-90); and social conflict with non-Jews (e.g., in Alexandria in A.D. 38), which expressed and encouraged social alienation.

This range in levels from high assimilation to careful preservation of Jewish distinction means that we cannot rule out in advance what was or was not possible for Jews in their assimilation.

9.2. Acculturation and Accommodation. Clearly there was a range in the levels of acculturation of Diaspora Jews, from those authors with expertly utilized different genres of Hellenistic literature to Jews who had no capacity in Greek, although the latter must have been rare, since papyri and inscriptions show us that Greek was used for nearly all communication in virtually all Diaspora communities. In general the involvement of Diaspora Jews in the life, ways and thought forms of the Greek city helps to explain the flourishing of Diaspora Jewish literature written in Greek in this period. But what use did Diaspora Jews make of their acculturation? This leads to the question of what sort of accommodation was effected by Diaspora Jews with their social and cultural environments. Barclay (125-228, 336-80) divides the written texts that can be assigned to the Diaspora with some confidence into those that embrace cultural convergence (while normally retaining some form of Jewish distinction) by integrating Jewish practices with the norms and values of their cultural context and those that emphasize cultural antagonism.

9.2.1. Cultural Convergence. A number of texts exhibit cultural convergence and show the ability of Diaspora Jews to express their traditions within a Hellenistic moral, historical, philosophical and theological framework. The following examples are representative. First, Artapanus was self-consciously Jewish while also being supportive of the Hellenized Egyptian culture he clearly appreciated. Artapanus claims biblical characters brought culture and philosophy to Egypt, thus claiming national superiority for the Jews; yet his work also has a pro-Egyptian tone, for example, when it is asserted that Moses established the annual flooding of the Nile. In order to boost Moses' and his people's reputation further, Artapanus gives a positive evaluation of Egypt and its religion. Clearly the author is very much at home in Egypt, whose culture, temples, priests and cults he eulogizes. Artapanus represents a cultural synthesis, an Egyptianized Judaism, and shows that some Jews stood for an important measure of synthesis with Egyptian culture, including Egyptian religion. Barclay (132) notes that "he indicates the possibility of being both a proud Egyptian and a self-conscious Jew." Artapanus is a clear example of cultural convergence.

Second, Ezekiel the Tragedian rewrote the exodus in the form of a Greek tragedy and thus represents a synthesis with Greek literary tradition. He has an enthusiastic appreciation of Greek education and is another example of acculturation. The drama is thoroughly Jewish in character, but the form and cultural framework of the classical Greek tradition has made it comprehensible and attractive to Greeks. The work seems to be an attempt to align Jews with Greeks in the common environment in Egypt, without weakening Jewish ethnic loyalty. Ezekiel was Greek and Jewish at the same time, being skilled in Greek poetry, literature and history and committed to the Jewish tradition.

Third, Philo represents the climax of a Jewish philosophical tradition that was deeply engaged with Hellenistic culture. He received a thorough Hellenistic education and participated in Alexandrian cultural life. He also received an intensive Jewish education and was intimately acquainted with the life and traditions of the Jewish community in Alexandria, to which he was deeply loyal. He does not give any indication of a tension between Greek and Jewish values. As Barclay (91) puts it, Philo was both "Jewish to the core and Hellenized to the same core."

For Philo the most sublime expression of philosophy was found in the Pentateuch. However, his debt to Plato was just as great, since his thought was structured by Platonic dualism. Philo tried to show the profound philosophical truths found in the Pentateuch by means of allegorical exegesis. An effect of his allegorization was to dehistoricize the text and to shift from the particular to the universal. Hence the exodus was about the escape of the soul from the confines of the body to the virtues (Philo Som. 2.255). His philosophy thus led away from Jewish particularity; Jewish laws were of universal significance. In this way he sought to build bridges between his Mosaic text and Hellenistic culture and to understand Judaism in the light of the themes, motifs and intellectual horizons of his Hellenistic environment. However, "ultimately his allegorical reading of Scripture functions not to submerge Moses' authority in the sea of Hellenism nor to parallel Moses with Plato as equal sources of truth. Rather the whole gamut of Hellenistic culture is subordinated to Moses, pressed into service to endorse his original achievement. As Dawson observes, Philonic allegory 'is an effort to make Greek culture Jewish rather than to dissolve Jewish identity into Greek culture'" (Barclay, 173). Thus Greek culture is subordinated to Jewish cultural and religious identity.

Overall Philo's erudition in Greek ways of thought was used in the service of his Judaism. In his reaction to extreme allegorizers (Philo Migr. Abr. 89-93) Philo shows that his identity was ultimately defined by the Jewish community; his leadership of the embassy to Gaius showed that this was where his social and political commitments lay. With Philo the integration of Judaism into Hellenistic culture was exceptionally profound, but he ultimately used that synthesis for the Jewish community and remained loyal to his Jewish heritage.

Other examples of cultural convergence include the Epistle of Aristeas, Aristobulus and Pseudo-Phocylides.

9.2.2. Cultural Antagonism. In some other Diaspora texts acculturation is used in the service of a sociocultural stance that is predominantly oppositional and antagonistic to Judaism's social and cultural environment. In these cases acculturation results in a religious and social critique of other peoples and a call to resist the cultural pressures of the wider society. Again some representative examples can be noted.

First, the author of the Wisdom of Solomon clearly had a thoroughgoing Greek education, and there is a strong universalist strand in the work. However, the predominant theme is social and cultural antagonism between Jews and non-Jews. The author's Greek education and acculturation serve not to integrate his Judaism with his environment but rather to construct a sophisticated attack upon the latter. It is a deeply Hellenized exercise in cultural aggression and a vigorous defense of Jewish particularity.

Second, the author of Joseph and Aseneth uses the Hellenistic form of the romance to launch an attack on Hellenistic religion (see Religions, Greco-Roman). A sense of cultural antagonism and alienation between Jews and non-Jews is the predominant tone of the book. The work may be thought to show an open attitude to outsiders, but such outsiders can be welcomed only if they have been totally changed by conversion.

Third, Sibylline Oracles 3 and 5 speak of the moral and religious superiority of Israel and the author's cultural antagonism toward non-Jews. They also reveal a cultural and social alienation between Jews and non-Jews. The oracles emphasize the Jews' national greatness, centered on temple and law. The acculturation revealed by the use of the Sibylline genre is thus used to express antagonism toward that culture.

Other examples of cultural antagonism include 3 and 4 Maccabees.

10. Facets of Jewish Identity in the Diaspora. Despite the evident diversity of Diaspora Judaism, we can also identify elements that enabled Jewish communities to endure as coherent entities and that made the difference between a Jew and a non-Jew clear to Jews themselves and to others. We should note that we are looking at Diaspora Judaism as a social as well as a religious and intellectual phenomenon. The following facets were integral to the identity of Diaspora Jews; they were bonds that held Diaspora Jews together and enabled their communities to survive as coherent entities over time (for what follows see in particular Barclay, 399-444; Trebilco, 12-19).

10.1. Ethnicity. At the core of Diaspora Jewish identity was ethnicity or the ethnic bond; that is, the combination of ancestry and customs that could be voluntarily adopted or abandoned. The importance of ethnicity is demonstrated by the following evidence. First, Diaspora literature emphasizes the significance of the "nation," "race" or "people" as the bearer of the Jewish tradition, with Jews being seen as "people of the same race," bound together by a common ethnicity (e.g., Philo Vit. Mos. 2.43-44; Ezekiel 12, 35, 43; Noy 1995, no. 240). Second, non-Jewish authors consistently refer to Judaism as an ethnic entity. Thus the Romans allowed the Jews to follow their "ancestral customs," or time-honored ethnic practices, which points to the combination of kinship and custom that defines ethnicity. Third, proselytes who joined the Jewish community underwent a thorough resocialization, so that they acquired a new ethnicity. The conversion process meant that they were transferred to the Jewish nation (Philo Spec. Leg. 1.51-52; Jos. and As.), which points to the significance of ethnicity. Fourth, the recognition of the importance of endogamy by Diaspora Jews underlines the significance of ethnicity (e.g., Demetrius in Eusebius Praep. Ev. 9.29.1; Philo Spec. Leg. 3.29). Finally, the emphasis on the training of children in the Jewish way of life was to ensure that Judaism continued as an ethnic phenomenon (e.g., 4 Macc 18:10-19; Philo Leg. Gai. 115, 195). The evidence thus suggests that ethnicity constituted the core of Jewish identity.

10.2. The Local Community. A crucial factor in affirming the identity of Diaspora Jews was the life of the local community. As we have indicated, the nature of the local Diaspora Jewish community varied from place to place and over time, with some owning prayer houses or synagogues, others meeting in private houses, some communities having a range of officials, operating their own courts, voting their own decrees and negotiating with civic authorities, while other communities were less institutionalized. Clearly a strong local community of Jews would have provided invaluable support for the retention of Jewish identity by individuals.

Some elements of communal life were particularly important in binding Jews together. First, festivals and fasts (Passover [Ezekiel 184-92; CII 777]; Tabernacles [CPJ 452a; Lüderitz, no. 71]; the Day of Atonement [CII 725]; see also Philo Vit. Mos. 2.42; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.5 §55) meant Diaspora Jews could express their solidarity with one another. Second, the weekly sabbath gathering at the synagogue was of immense social significance and was a crucial feature of Diaspora Jewish life (Philo Leg. Gai. 156-57; Spec. Leg. 2.62-63). These gatherings and the instruction that occurred during them bound the community together in loyalty to their distinctive way of life. Third, Diaspora communities generally paid the temple tax (Philo Spec. Leg. 1.77-78; Leg. Gai. 156-57, 311-16; Josephus Ant. 14.10.1-26 §185-267; 16.6.17 §162-73; 18.9.1 §312-13; Cicero Pro Flacco 28.67-68); its payment reinforced the individual's sense of belonging to the local community.

10.3. Links with Jerusalem and Other Diaspora Communities. Diaspora Jewish communities were connected with Jerusalem and "the homeland" by payment of the temple tax and other gifts for the temple. Through the tax, Diaspora communities were linked to and participated in the temple's life and worship. Diaspora literature shows a deep respect for the holiness of the temple (Ep. Arist. 83-120; Philo Leg. Gai. 184f). Diaspora Jews also went on pilgrimage to the temple, probably in considerable numbers (Philo Spec. Leg. 1.69; Josephus Ant. 18.9.1 §310-13; J.W. 6.9.3 §425; CII 1404), indicating that the temple's symbolic power was considerable even if its impact on daily life was less significant. Pilgrimage to Jerusalem probably provided significant contact for the Diaspora communities with developments in Jerusalem and Palestine in general and further consolidated the bond between the Diaspora and Palestine. On pilgrimage and in other ways Diaspora Jews would have come into contact with others from the Diaspora and thus forged important connections.

There were also strong social and political links between the Diaspora and Palestine (e.g., 2 Macc 1:1-9; Josephus Ant. 12.3.2 §125-26; 17.12.1 §324-31), and some Diaspora literature expresses a strong attachment to the land of Palestine and a sense of solidarity between the Diaspora and Jews in Judea (Artapanus 27.21; Sib. Or. 5:281, 328-32; Wis 12:3, 7; 3 Macc). However, an attachment to Palestine did not necessarily weaken a strong sense of being at home in the Diaspora (Philo Flacc. 45-46). In general, Palestine retained some significance as the holy land,* and the continuing relationship between Diaspora communities and Palestine was an important facet of Jewish identity, but the strength of attachment to Palestine probably varied from community to community.

10.4. The Torah. The Torah was clearly the key text for Diaspora Jews (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.32 §232-35; Sib. Or. 3:584-85, 768-69; 4 Macc 5:16-21). The existence of the Septuagint, a translation begun in the third century B.C. probably in Alexandria, shows that at this time Egyptian Jews regarded the Torah as their key text. This is also illustrated by synagogue architecture in which some piece of furniture for the Law was prominent (e.g., Ostia; see Noy 1993, 22-26). The dependence of Diaspora authors on the Scriptures is clear (e.g., Pseud.-Phoc.), and the allegorical method used by Aristobulus and Philo presupposes the supreme authority of the Scriptures. "Whether as legislation, mystery, constitution, philosophy, founding legend or moral guide, the Jewish Scriptures were integral to all the social and intellectual achievements of Diaspora Judaism" (Barclay, 425).

Instruction in the law formed a key element in Diaspora synagogue life and laid the foundation for Jewish identity (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.16-18 §171-8; Philo Leg. Gai. 156-57). Devotion to the law is regularly noted in the inscriptions from Rome (Noy 1995, nos. 103, 212, 281, 576). In general Diaspora Jewish communities preserved the distinctive customs that were laid down in the law. That Jewish communities took the initiative in the defense of their customs in the face of difficulties with the civic authorities in, for example, Asia and Cyrenaica, and the consistency with which the distinctive traits prescribed by the law were noted as characteristics of Diaspora Jews by outsiders indicate the continuing loyalty of Diaspora Jews to the law and their conviction that their way of life should be ruled by God's law.

Moses, as the person most prominent in the Torah, was also a key figure for Jewish identity. He was seen by Diaspora Jews as a skillful lawgiver, a profound philosopher, a noble king, a supreme military commander, miracle worker and priest (e.g., Philo Vit. Mos.; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.15 §151-172).

10.5. Jewish Practices and Beliefs. Four features of Jewish practice and belief visibly marked off Diaspora Jews from their neighbors and thus were key boundary markers of Jewish identity, with great social significance.

First, Diaspora Jews generally worshiped the one God of Israel (3 Macc 5:13; Jos. and As. 11:10) and rejected other alien and iconic cults (Wis 13:1—15:17; Ep. Arist. 134-39; Josephus Ant. 12.3.2 §126; Philo Conf. Ling. 168-73). It seems that Jews were generally exempt from the obligation to worship local gods; we have no documentary evidence for this (and it is unlikely that such an exemption was ever officially expressed), but the outrage expressed when the customary exemption was in danger of being suspended suggests it was a privilege with some consistency (Philo Leg. Gai. 117, 134).

Second, the evidence suggests that Jewish dietary laws were generally kept in the Diaspora (e.g., 3 Macc 3:3-7; 7:11). These customs and the consequent separatism at meals would have bound the Jewish communities together and created a consistent social distinction between Jews and non-Jews (Philo Leg. Gai. 361-62; Ep. Arist. 139-42).

Third, although circumcision* was practiced by some other groups, it seems to have constituted a strong affirmation of Jewish identity for men (Philo Migr. Abr. 89-93; Josephus Ant. 1.10.5 §192).

Fourth, sabbath observance was well-known by non-Jews as a characteristic feature that marked off Jewish communal life from that of other peoples (e.g., Horace Satires 1.9.69-70). The evidence suggests that Diaspora Jews generally observed the sabbath and abstained from work on this day (Philo Som. 2.123-24; Leg. Gai. 158; Josephus Ant. 14.10.12 §225-27; 14.10.25 §262-64; CPJ 10). The vigor with which Asian Jews, for example, defended the sabbath indicates the depth of their commitment to its observance (e.g., Josephus Ant. 16.2.3 §27; 16.6.2-4 §163-68). It was a highly visible sign of their unique identity as a people.

Each of these strands of Jewish identity—ethnicity, the local community, links with Jerusalem and other Diaspora communities, the Torah, and specifically Jewish practices and beliefs—was interwoven with the others. Together they enabled Diaspora communities to survive in very diverse circumstances.

That Diaspora Jewish identity was reinforced by this combination of factors meant that Diaspora Jews could interpret their traditions in many different ways. "It was not necessary, for instance, to interpret the ethnic bond only in terms of 'election' and 'covenant.' Other metaphors, derived from historical (Ezekiel) or political (Aristeas) spheres, could serve equally well so long as they fulfilled the requisite social functions" (Barclay, 443; see Covenant; Election). This led to diversity in interpretations of Judaism in the Diaspora; unanimity was unnecessary, provided the various customs were preserved intact. This meant that Diaspora communities endured and flourished not by being isolated from their environment but by having clearly differentiated boundary markers at key points. This very strength meant Diaspora communities suffered hostility at times, precisely because they were considered a social and political offense as communities that remained unassimilated.

11. Conclusions.

One feature to emerge from recent study of Diaspora Judaism is its diversity. Diversity within and among Diaspora communities is clearly apparent in a number of areas, including social status and conditions, wealth, size, community organization, assimilation, acculturation and accommodation. We must investigate each community and period as well as the particular circumstances of Jewish individuals and communities in each environment. Clearly factors such as when the Jews settled in a given city and under what conditions, how the community developed, ongoing relations with other groups and the number of new Jewish settlers over time were all crucial factors in the development of particular communities and their religious traditions, and these factors led to diversity among communities. This means that there were no typical Diaspora conditions; nor can we speak of a Diaspora Jew or a Diaspora community as typical.

It is also to be noted that Diaspora communities in the imperial period seem to have developed largely outside rabbinic control and influence, so these communities were not directed by any central authority and should probably be thought of as nonrabbinic (see Rajak in Lieu, North and Rajak, 9-28). Without an authority to impose uniformity, great variety could develop in Diaspora Judaism, which became a complex and variegated phenomenon. We should also note that at least for a time Jewish Christian communities in the Diaspora would have been seen as one more dimension of this diversity.

Some earlier scholars thought that in order to remain as faithful Jews, it was necessary for Diaspora communities to live in social isolation. It is now recognized that although some Diaspora Jews probably did form tightly enclosed communities with relatively closed boundaries, many other Diaspora communities showed a higher degree of openness to their political, social and cultural environment. Yet clearly different Diaspora communities, with different sociocultural stances, continued to regard themselves as Jewish and maintained their identity as Jews over time while often expressing that Judaism in a particular way that varied from the practices of other Jewish communities. Thus we have been able to draw attention to a number of facets of Diaspora Jewish identity that enabled Jewish communities to endure as coherent entities over time and that meant that there was some commonality between different communities. We also have no evidence that Diaspora Jews were significantly involved in syncretism.*

Literary and inscriptional sources indicate that some Jewish communities in the Diaspora continued to flourish until the end of antiquity. The presence of local Diaspora Jewish communities was often a real factor in the life of the early Christian churches.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE; PHILO; SYNCRETISM; SYNAGOGUE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. G. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora from Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE-117 CE) (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996); B. J. Brooten, Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogues: Inscriptional Evidence and Background Issues (BJS 36; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); S. J. D. Cohen and E. S. Frerichs, eds., Diasporas in Antiquity (BJS 288; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993); J. J. Collins, Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora (New York: Crossroad, 1986); L. H. Feldman, Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World: Attitudes and Interactions from Alexander to Justinian (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993); J. B. Frey, Corpus Inscriptionum Iudaicarum (2 vols.; vol 1. [1936], rev. B. Lifshitz, New York: Ktav, 1975; vol. 2, Rome: Pontificio istituto di archeologia christiana, 1952); I. M. Gafri, Land, Centre and Diaspora: Jewish Perceptions of National Dispersion and Land Centrality in Late Antiquity (JSPSup 21; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); W. Horbury and D. Noy, eds., Jewish Inscriptions of Graeco-Roman Egypt (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); H. J. Leon, The Jews of Ancient Rome (updated ed., with new introduction by C. A. Osiek; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); I. Levinskaya, The Book of Acts in Its Diaspora Setting (BAFCS 5; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); J. Lieu, J. North, and T. Rajak, eds., The Jews Among Pagans and Christians in the Roman Empire (London: Routledge, 1992); G. Lüderitz, Corpus jüdischer Zeugnisse aus der Cyrenaika. Mit einem Anhang von J. M. Reynolds (Beihefte zum Tübinger Atlas des Vorderen Orients, Reihe B, Nr. 53; Wiesbaden: Dr Ludwig Reichert, 1983); J. M. Modrzejewski, The Jews of Egypt from Rameses II to Emperor Hadrian (Philadelphia and Jerusalem: Jewish Publication Society, 1995); J. Neusner, ed., Judaism in Late Antiquity. Pt. 1: The Literary and Archaeological Sources. Pt. 2: Historical Synthesis (Handbuch der Orientalistik Abt 1, Band 16-17; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); D. Noy, Jewish Inscriptions of Western Europe 1: Italy (Excluding the City of Rome), Spain and Gaul; 2: The City of Rome (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993; 1995); J. A. Overman and R. S. MacLennan, Diaspora Jews and Judaism: Essays in Honor of and in Dialogue with A. Thomas Kraabel (SFSHJ 41; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); J. Reynolds and R. Tannenbaum, Jews and God-fearers at Aphrodisias (Cambridge Philological Society Supplementary vol. 12; Cambridge: Cambridge Philological Society, 1987); S. Safrai and M. Stern, eds., The Jewish People in the First Century (2 vols.; CRINT 1; Assen: Van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974-76); E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135) rev. and ed. G. Vermes et al. (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1973-87); E. M. Smallwood, The Jews Under Roman Rule: From Pompey to Diocletian (2d ed.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1981); M. Stern, Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism (3 vols.; Jerusalem: The Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1974, 1981, 1984); M. E. Stone, ed., Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period (CRINT 2.2; Assen: Van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1961); V. Tcherikover and A. Fuks, Corpus Papyrorum Judaicarum (3 vols.; with M. Stern and D. M. Lewis; Jerusalem: Magnes; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1957, 1960, 1964) vol. 3; P. R. Trebilco, Jewish Communities in Asia Minor (SNTSMS 69; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); D. Urman and P. V. M. Flesher, Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery (2 vols.; SPB 47; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); P. W. van der Horst, Ancient Jewish Epitaphs (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1991); J. W. van Henten and P. W. van der Horst, eds., Studies in Early Jewish Epigraphy (AGJU 21; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994).

P. R. Trebilco

DIDACHE, THE

The Teaching of the Lord to the Gentiles by the Twelve Apostles, or The Teaching of the (Twelve) Apostles, as it was known in ancient times, or simply the Didache ("The Teaching"), as it is usually known today, is a "handbook," or manual of Christian ethical instruction and church order. Although the title was known from references to it by ancient writers, some of whom (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Origen and Didymus the Blind) used it as Scripture, no copy was known to exist until the 1873 recovery of a manuscript containing, among other things, a complete text of the Didache (published in 1883).

1. Contents
2. The Didache as "Evolved" Literature
3. Date and Place

1. Contents.

The anonymous document is composed of three parts: (1) instruction about the Two Ways (the "way of life" and the "way of death"; Did. 1.1—6.2); (2) a manual of church order and practice (Did. 6.3—15.4); and (3) an apocalyptic section (Did. 16.1-8).

1.1 Two Ways. The Two Ways material appears to have been intended, in light of Didache 7.1, as a summary of basic instruction about the Christian life to be taught to those who were preparing for baptism.* The "way of life" (Did. 1.2—4.14), which opens with the "love command" and the "golden rule," is comprised almost entirely of "do's and don't's," while the "way of death" (Did. 5.1-2) is a description of evil actions and persons.

1.2. Church Order. The second part resembles a "how to" booklet of instructions about food* (Did. 6.3), baptism* (Did. 7.1-4), fasting (Did. 7.4—8.1), prayer* (Did. 8.2-3), the Lord's Supper* (Did. 9.1—10.7), and various practical issues (e.g., almsgiving) and offices and positions of leadership (Did. 11.1—15.4; see Church Order; Worship). In addition to providing the earliest evidence of a mode of baptism other than immersion, it records the oldest known eucharistic and/or agapē prayers and a form of the Lord's Prayer quite similar to that found in Matthew. There is a concern to differentiate Christian practice from Jewish piety (cf. Did. 8.1-2), and to prevent abuses of the church's hospitality (Did. 11.3-6; cf. Lucian Peregrinus 13).

1.3. Apocalyptic. The document closes with a brief apocalyptic* section that has much in common with the so-called "Synoptic Apocalypse" (cf. Mk 13; Mt 24—25; Lk 24).

2. The Didache as "Evolved" Literature.

In its present form the Two Ways section represents the Christianization (by means of, e.g., the insertion of collections of Gospel sayings and related admonitions, such as Did. 1.3—2.1) of a common Jewish form of moral instruction. Similar material is found in a number of other Christian writings from the first through about the fifth centuries, including the *Epistle of Barnabas, the Didascalia, the Apostolic Church Ordinances, the Summary of Doctrine, the Apostolic Constitutions, the Life of Schnudi and On the Teaching of the Apostles (or Doctrina), some of which are dependent on the Didache. The inter-relationships between these various documents are quite complex and while much remains to be worked out, there is clearly a post-history as well as a pre-history to the Two Ways section of the Didache.

The connections between the Didache and *Barnabas have been closely examined. Similar material may be utilized quite differently in the two documents (Draper 1995, 96-99). Rather than either one being directly dependent upon the other, it seems much more likely that both are dependent, perhaps indirectly, on a common source (Kraft 1965).

The "church order" section also bears evidence of change over time (e.g., cf. Did. 11.4 with Did. 12.1, or note the intrusive character of Did. 14.1-3). But the "evolved" nature of this part of the document is at least in part due to its origin in a Christian community that is itself evolving: a transition from (more charismatic?) itinerant ministers to (less glamorous?) resident leadership (Did. 15.2) is evident, as is tension between the ideal and the actual (Did. 6.2).

3. Date and Place.

Dating the Didache is made difficult by (1) a lack of hard evidence and (2) the fact that it is a composite document. Thus the date when the final form was compiled must be differentiated from the time represented by the pre-existing materials incorporated into it.

Some of the materials from which it was composed reflect the state of the church at a fairly early time. The relative simplicity of the prayers, for example, and the form of church organization—note the two-fold structure of bishops and deacons (Did. 15.1; cf. Phil 1:1) and the continued existence of traveling apostles* and prophets* (Did. 11.1-7; 13.1) alongside a resident ministry* (Did. 15.2)—appear to reflect a time closer to that of Paul or James (who died in the 60s) than Ignatius* (who died sometime after 110).

A remarkably wide range of dates, extending from the mid-first century (e.g., Audet) to the early third century (Vokes 1938) or later, has been proposed for the final form of the Didache. The greatest part of it, however, likely reached its present form by c. 150, though a date considerably closer to the beginning of the second century is not improbable.

Syria (e.g., Audet, Rordorf and Tuilier), the Syro-Palestine region (e.g., Niederwimmer) and Egypt (e.g., Kraft 1965) are the places mentioned most often as the place of origin of the Didache. The evidence is indirect and circumstantial (and, as with the date, complicated by the document's composite nature). An urban origin, perhaps Antioch (Draper, 310, in Jeffords 1995), has recently been asserted against a widely assumed rural setting. The reference to mountains in Didache 9.4 suggests to some a Syrian* or Syro-Palestinian provenance; the final editing, however, may well have occurred elsewhere. The strongest (but not only) ancient testimony to the document comes from Egypt.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; BAPTISM; BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; KERYGMA AND DIDACHE; LORD'S SUPPER; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Text and Translation: J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings, ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992). Commentaries and/or

Editions: R. A. Kraft, Barnabas and the Didache (AF 3; New York: Nelson, 1965); K. Niederwimmer, Die Didache (KAV 1; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989); W. Rordorf and A. Tuilier, La Doctrine des douze apôtres (Didache): Introduction, Texte, Traduction (SC 248; Paris: Cerf, 1978). Studies: J. P. Audet, La Didachè: Instructions des Apôtres (EB; Paris: Gabalda, 1958); J. A. Draper, "Barnabas and the Riddle of the Didache Revisited," JSNT 58 (1995) 89-113; idem, "The Jesus Tradition in the Didache" in Gospel Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1985) 269-87; C. N. Jeffords, The Sayings of Jesus in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (VCSup 11; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1989); idem, ed., The Didache in Context: Essays on Its Text, History, & Transmission (NovTSup 77; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); R. A. Kraft, "Didache," ABD 2:197-98; E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, 3: The Apologists and the Didache, ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (NGS 5/3; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1993); F. E. Vokes, "The Didache—Still Debated," CQ 3 (1970) 57-62; idem, "Life and Order in an Early Church: the Didache," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 209-33; idem, The Riddle of the Didache: Fact or Fiction, Heresy or Catholicism? (London: SPCK, 1938).

M. W. Holmes

DIDACHE. See KERYGMA AND DIDACHE.

DIOGNETUS, EPISTLE TO

The Epistle to Diognetus is a relatively brief (698 words, excluding articles, proper names and pronouns) apologetic treatise for Christianity presented in an epistolary form (see Letters). It claims to be written to a pagan of high social or political rank in response to certain questions about the Christian religion. This short document is one of the more enigmatic writings belonging to the patristic period. Not only is it impossible to determine with certainty its authorship, date, recipient and provenance, but also it is composite in character and seemingly unknown to any ancient author. Furthermore, its only textual source is a single medieval manuscript, which has itself perished. Nevertheless the Epistle to Diognetus, with its skillful rhetoric* and elegant style, has elicited high praise from both classical and Christian scholars. It has been justly called the "pearl of the Patristic age" (Barnard), "the noblest of early Christian writings" (Lightfoot) and "one of the most brilliant things ever written by Christians in the Greek language" (Norden).

1. Text
2. Literary Form
3. Authorship
4. Date
5. Recipient
6. Contents and Outline

1. Text.

The text of the Epistle to Diognetus was preserved in only one manuscript, Codex Argentoratensis Graec. ix, which dates from the thirteenth or fourteenth century. This manuscript contained five treatises (the last of which was the Epistle to Diognetus) that were ascribed to the early church theologian Justin Martyr. What is known about the history of this manuscript is as follows. Although privately owned during the early sixteenth century, by 1560 it was housed in the Alsatian monastery of Maursmünster. At the end of the eighteenth century the manuscript was moved to the municipal library of Strasbourg, where it was destroyed by fire on August 24, 1870, during the Franco-Prussian War. However, at least five copies, three of which date from the late sixteenth century, had been made by competent scholars, so that the text of this important document has been preserved. Nevertheless, it is clear from these copies that Codex Argentoratensis Graec. ix was itself defective in a number of places. The document thus contains several conjectural readings arising from attempts to make sense of the text.

2. Literary Form.

The identification of the literary form of the Epistle to Diognetus is complicated by the fact that it likely is a compilation of two distinct documents: Diognetus 1-10, which ostensibly is a letter but in reality is an apologetic treatise for the Christian faith, and Diognetus 11-12, which is probably a fragment of an early Christian homily. Among the various reasons for separating chapters 11-12 from the rest of the document, the following two are the most significant. First, Codex Argentoratensis had a gap at the end of chapter 10 with a marginal note that read "and here the copy had a break." This gap suggests that the original conclusion to the letter (or, more accurately, the apologetic treatise) was lost or perhaps deleted when chapters 11-12 were added. Since the argument of the first part of the document reaches its logical conclusion by the end of chapter 10, the size of this lost or deleted material must not have been very great. Second, there are significant differences in content, vocabulary and style between chapters 1-10 and chapters 11-12. For example, whereas chapters 1-10 have a strongly apologetic focus and are clearly addressed to pagan readers, chapters 11-12 appear to be a homily that has Christians in view.

A few scholars have argued for the literary unity of the document in its present form. The consensus, however, is that the Epistle to Diognetus consists of two distinct sources—an apologetic treatise and a homily—that have been brought together. Although it is frequently classified with the works of the apostolic fathers,* this composite document more properly belongs to the works of the apologists.

3. Authorship.

The text contains no reference to its author. External evidence is likewise lacking, since there is no reference to the Epistle to Diognetus in all ancient Christian literature. The identification of its author, therefore, can be made only on the basis of comparing its vocabulary, style and content with those other documents whose authorship is known. As a result the door of speculation stands wide open on this issue, and many scholars have not hesitated to walk boldly through. Among the numerous names that have been proposed, the more plausible candidates include Hippolytus of Rome, Theophilus of Antioch and Pantaenus of Alexandria.

The most intriguing and carefully argued proposal is that the Epistle to Diognetus is the supposedly lost Apology of Quadratus (Andriessen). Quadratus, a missionary bishop who had come to Athens, presented this document (a short fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius) in A.D. 125 to Hadrian, who was known to his contemporaries by the name Diognetus. This theory, however, like all other claims about the authorship of this document, cannot be established with any degree of certainty. The most that can be said with confidence is that the author of the Epistle to Diognetus was a Christian who was classically trained and who possessed considerable literary skill and style. The strong argument against Judaism* (Diogn. 3) and in particular the ridicule of its practices (Diogn. 4) also suggest that the author was not Jewish.

What has been stated thus far about authorship applies only to Diognetus 1-10 and not to Diognetus 11-12. The brevity of these chapters make the authorship of this document even more a matter of conjecture. This distinction between chapters 1-10 and chapters 11-12, although it is justifiable with respect to content and form, might be irrelevant with respect to authorship, since it is possible that the same person wrote both documents on different occasions (Barnard).

4. Date.

Like the issue of authorship, the question of date cannot be determined with any degree of certainty. Although the range of realistic possibilities for Diognetus 1-10 spans the period A.D. 117-310, the prevailing view is that this material belongs to the middle or latter half of the second century. A relatively early date is supported by the following general considerations: the common condemnation of paganism and Judaism; the relatively simple christology,* which seems unaware of any formulated heresies; the absence of any reference to the Holy Spirit*; the lack of the tendency to identify the ideal of Christian excellence with asceticism; the absence of sacerdotalism; the depiction of the Christian faith as a new phenomenon; and parallels with the *Epistle of Barnabas. The date of chapters 11-12 is even harder to determine, although most scholars locate it a short time after the material of chapters 1-10.

5. Recipient.

It is likewise impossible to identify definitively the recipient of this document. The text claims to have been written to a specific individual named Diognetus, whose title, "most excellent," was a common one in ancient writings for a figure of high social or political status. It may well be, however, that Diognetus is a fictional character, created to ask the questions that the anonymous author wanted to address. That the document was intended for a larger audience is indicated by its use of the plural pronoun you and the absence of any personal references to its readers.

6. Contents and Outline.

The opening chapter depicts Diognetus as wrestling with three questions about the Christian faith: (1) Who is the God* in whom the Christians trust and what is the nature of the worship* they offer him such that they refuse to recognize the gods believed by the Greeks (see Religions, Greco-Roman) and refrain from the practices of the Jews? (2) What is the secret of the strong affection that Christians have for each other? (3) Why has this new race or people entered the world now and not formerly?

The remaining chapters answer these questions, following in a rather general way the same order. Chapter 2 highlights the folly of pagan practices and so answers the first part of question 1. Chapters 3 and 4 emphasize the folly of Jewish practices, both its worship (Diogn. 3) and its rites and customs (Diogn. 4) and so answer the second part of question 1. Chapters 5-7 portray in an attractive manner the distinctiveness of the Christian life and so answer in a general way question 2. Chapters 8 and 9 present the Son* of God as the revealer of the true knowledge* of God (Diogn. 8) and as the agent of salvation* for humankind (Diogn. 9) and in so doing answer question 3. Chapter 10 concludes the work with an invitation for the reader to accept the Christian faith and thus become an imitator of God. The final two chapters, almost certainly a separate document and probably written by another hand, is a two-part homily. The first section focuses on the Logos*: his preexistence,* his being sent into the world,* his work of revelation* and his blessing* both in the church and the individual (Diogn. 11). The second section uses the story of the Garden of Eden to emphasize how only true knowledge leads to true life (Diogn. 12).

Thus the Epistle to Diognetus exhibits the following outline:

- Introduction: The Questions of Diognetus (Diogn. 1)
- Pagans: The Folly of Their Worship (Diogn. 2)
- Jews: The Folly of Their Worship and Practices (Diogn. 3-4)
- Christians: The Distinctiveness of Their Faith and Practices (Diogn. 5-7)
- The Son: Revealer of God and Agent of Salvation (Diogn. 8-9)
- Conclusion: Imitation of God (Diogn. 10)
- Appendix: Homily on the Logos and Union of Knowledge and Life (Diogn. 11-12)

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. P. Andriessen, "The Authorship of the Epistula ad Diognetum," VC 1 (1947) 129-36; L. W. Barnard, "The Epistle ad Diognetum: Two Units from One Author?" ZNW 56 (1965) 130-37; R. Brändle, Die Ethik der "Schrift an Diognet": Eine Wideraufnahme paulinischer und johanneischer Theologie am Ausgang des zweiten Jahrhunderts (Zurich: Theologischer Verlag, 1975); R. H. Connolly, "The Date and Authorship of the Epistle to Diognetus," JTS 36 (1935) 347-53; idem, "Ad Diognetum xi-xii," JTS 37 (1936) 2-15; R. M. Grant, "The Epistle to Diognetus" in Greek Apologists of the Second Century (Philadephia: Westminster, 1988) 178-79; C. N. Jefford, "The Letter to Diognetus" in Reading the Apostolic Fathers: An Introduction (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996) 159-69; J. T. Lienhard, "The Christology of the Epistle to Diognetus," VC 24 (1970) 280-89; H. G. Meecham, The Epistle to Diognetus (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1949); J. G. O'Neill, "The Epistle to Diognetus," Irish Ecclesiastical Record 85 (1956) 92-106; J. J. Thierry, "The Logos as Teacher in ad Diognetum XI, 1," VC 20 (1966) 146-49; A. L. Townsley, "Notes for an Interpretation of the Epistle to Diognetus," Rivista di studi classici 24 (1976) 5-20.

J. A. D. Weima

DISCIPLINE

Early church practices of community discipline for immorality or heresy were adapted from Judaism with a Christian flavor exhibited most fully in the writings of Paul. There is surprisingly little attention given to discipline in late first- and early second-century Christian writings. The few references appear to signal a shift of interest from immorality to heresy.

1. Discipline in Judaism and Early Christianity
2. Discipline in Later New Testament and Noncanonical Christian Writings

1. Discipline in Judaism and Early Christianity. The Qumran* sectarians discouraged misbehavior by means of an elaborate system designed to ensure the purity* of the community. Penalties were usually administered by community leaders following progressive reproof procedures (1 QS 5:24-26; CD 9:16-20). Discipline included exclusion from ritual meals (1 QS 7:20) and permanent expulsion from the community (1 QS 8:20—9:2).

Pharisees in the NT era imposed a form of social isolation known as a "ban" to punish violation of ritual purity laws or doctrinal aberrations (m. 'Ed. 5:6; Mid. 2:2; Mo'ed Qaṭ. 3:1; b. B. Meṣ. 59b; Mo'ed Qaṭ. 16a; t. Dem. 2:9). The offender was required to exhibit signs of mourning and establish his repentance* during the period of the ban in order to qualify for full restoration to the community.

Development during the NT period is impossible to trace, but it appears that an approach similar to that of the Jews was in effect from the start. Community leaders had primary responsibility for discipline (Mt 18:17-20; Acts 5:1-11; 8:20-24); attempts to persuade or warn offenders preceded disciplinary measures (Mt 18:15-16; 2 Cor 13:1-2; Gal 6:1; 2 Thess 3:15), and disciplinary measures might involve food* (2 Thess 3:11; 1 Cor 5:11, the latter perhaps denoting exclusion from the Eucharist) or expulsion from the community (Rom 16:17; 1 Cor 5:1-13; 16:22).

It is apparent that expulsion was a last resort. Furthermore, when it was enforced, it was intended not as a punitive measure and not to denote damnation but to persuade a believer to repent (1 Cor 5:5; 2 Thess 3:14-15). A different stress distinguished early Christian practice from that of the Qumran sectarians and the Pharisees: that is, the deprivation of the loving community of believers would constitute a persuasive force to lead deviants to reformation and restoration.

2. Discipline in Later New Testament and Noncanonical Christian Writings.

The focus in the earliest Christian texts is almost exclusively on aberrant behavior rather than false teaching as the reason for discipline. A distinction between immorality and false teaching as a reason for church discipline may be a false distinction, since some later texts are ambiguous and others suggest a link between false teaching and immorality (e.g., 2 Tim 3:1-13; Tit 3:10-11; 2 Pet 2; Jude 18-19; Rev 2:19-23). Nevertheless, the Pastoral Epistles signal an increasing interest in doctrinal over against behavioral concerns.

The Pastorals recommend discipline for Hymenaeus and Alexander in order that "they might learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim 1:20 NRSV). Timothy is exhorted to correct his opponents (2 Tim 2:24-26); Titus is admonished to avoid the schismatic (Tit 3:10-11). The last passage is the only NT occurrence of hairetikon, but it is better to translate this as "divisive person" rather than "heretic" to avoid the connotations that became attached to the word in later Christian history. Both 2 John 10-11 and 3 John 9-11 address discipline for false teaching, as does Revelation 2:19-23. In the case of the elder and his friends in 3 John, it is Diotrephes who exercises discipline by expelling John's group from the church. To this action the elder raises a protest. Clement* (1 Clem. 54.1-4), Ignatius* (Ign. Eph. 5.3; Ign. Phld. 3.1-3; Ign. Smyrn. 7.2), Polycarp (Pol. Phil. 6.3) and the *Didache (Did. 4.3; 14.2) all warn against schism and association with schismatics.

Discipline is not limited to false teachers, however. The "root of bitterness" warned against in Hebrews 12:15 may well involve immorality that corrupts the community (see Deut 29:18 for background). James 5:19-20 enjoins persuasion of "sinners," and 1 John 5:16 recommends prayer for the restoration of those who have committed certain sins. ("Mortal sin" probably involves behavior deserving death in the OT and is not the "unforgivable sin" against the Spirit of Mk 3:28-29.) Clement (1 Clem. 56.1-2; 57.1-2; 2 Clem. 17.1-3), Polycarp (Pol. Phil. 6.1) and the Didache (Did. 14.2; 15.3) all recommend discipline for immorality.

The texts reveal a wide range of disciplinary measures. Many texts are limited to recommendations of persuasion (2 Tim 2:24-26; Jas 5:19-20; 1 Clem. 56.1-2; 57.1-2; 2 Clem. 17.1-3; Pol. Phil. 6.1). Other texts enjoin avoidance of offenders, presumably or explicitly until they repent (Tit 3:10-11; 2 Jn 10-11; Rev 2:20; 18:4; Ign. Eph. 5.3; Ign. Smyrn. 7.2; Did. 14.2; 15.3). 1 Timothy 1:20 recommends that Hymenaeus and Alexander be "delivered to Satan" (cf. 1 Cor 5:5), which denotes expulsion from the Christian fellowship—possibly for life—but not damnation. Titus 3:10-11 suggests that expulsion should occur only "after a first and second admonition" (NRSV; cf. Mt 18:15-17). Hebrews 6:4-6 and 10:26-31 (cf. Herm. Sim. 6.2.3) imply a more final pronouncement against the apostate,* but it is not clear that this is a matter of church discipline rather than a statement of the offender's status before God.

Perhaps surprisingly, given the increasing problem of heterodoxy in the late first and early second centuries, Christian writers of the period do not indulge in or recommend final pronouncements against moral or doctrinal miscreants. Clement is gentle enough to promise heavenly reward for schismatics who voluntarily remove themselves (1 Clem. 54.1-4), and the Shepherd of Hermas suggests that discernment of true from false disciples is an eschatological* rather than temporal matter (Herm. Vis. 3.5.1-7; Herm. Sim. 9.13-14). The shift to (or at least addition of) concern about doctrinal deviation appears to have been accomplished by the early church without abandoning the pastoral, redemptive discipline characteristic of incipient Christianity.

See also ADVERSARIES; APOSTASY; AUTHORITY; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Davids, The Epistle of James (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); G. Forkman, The Limits of the Religious Community (Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup, 1972); L. Goppelt, Apostolic and Post-apostolic Times (New York: Harper & Row, 1970); G. W. Knight III, The Pastoral Epistles (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); G. W. H. Lampe, "Church Discipline and the Interpretation of the Epistles to the Corinthians" in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, ed. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967) 337-61; W. L. Lane, Hebrews 9-13 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); C. J. Roetzel, Judgment in the Community (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972); R. Schnackenburg, The Johannine Epistles (New York: Crossroad, 1992); W. Telfer, The Forgiveness of Sins (London: SCM, 1959). T. E. Schmidt

DISCOURSE ANALYSIS.

See HERMENEUTICS; STRUCTURALISM AND DISCOURSE ANALYSIS.

DIVINE PRESENCE.

See GLORY.

DIVORCE.

See MARRIAGE, DIVORCE AND ADULTRY.

DOCETISM

"Docetic" derives from the common Greek verb dokein ("seem, appear"). This verb and the nouns dokēsis and dokētai in the plural are used in early Christian literature of a variety of teachings about Jesus Christ that are united perhaps solely in denying that the divine Redeemer, by whatever name or title he is identified, was the subject of all the human experiences attributed to Jesus in the canonical Gospels.

1. Definition
2. The Sect of the Docetists
3. The Gospel of Peter
4. The Heretics in Ignatius's Letters
5. The Docetism of Marcionites and Gnostics
6. Docetism in the New Testament?

1. Definition.

The proper application of the term Docetism is a matter of dispute among patristic scholars (see Slusser). Some wish to restrict its usage exclusively to those presentations in which the human life of Jesus in all its aspects was mere illusion; though visible, it was no more than semblance, devoid of flesh-and-blood reality (Weigandt, Brox). This limitation of the label would certainly confine its use far more narrowly than is found in the sources. Since the latter employ it much less rigidly and furnish nothing akin to an official or agreed definition, most modern writers have sought to pinpoint some common element that might unify the diverse historical references. This can be found, it seems, only in what Docetists of whatever kind denied and probably also in the presuppositions that informed this denial.

The Docetists of primitive Christianity were united in being unable to affirm inseparable lifelong identity between the heavenly or divine One (often distinguished as Christ*) and the human Jesus. But they differed widely in their christological* accounts. Some believed that Jesus was born and lived like other human beings but was indwelt by the Christ only temporarily, from his baptism to the eve of the crucifixion, thus avoiding implicating the divine power* or agent in the processes of human birth and death. This strand of Docetism has obvious affinities with adoptionism.

Others at the opposite end of the docetic spectrum regarded the figure of the Gospels literally as ghostlike, a phantom, an optical illusion. (One wonders how widespread was such a viewpoint.) Between these two extremes cluster a number of versions that attribute to the divine or heavenly Savior while on earth an abnormal human nature of some sort but falling decisively short of an insubstantial specter. The body of Jesus was variously portrayed as composed of a different substance from that of other human bodies, originating perhaps through Mary* but not by normal processes of human birth, capable of some range of human functions but not such as to entangle the Christ himself in the suffering* of death.* Most of these varieties of Docetism deployed not only a distinction between divine and human natures (a phrase that does not here imply the categories of Chalcedonian debate) but also a belief in their essential incompatibility, so that whatever humanity might be predicted of Christ must have been of a special kind, tailor-made for the purpose (except in the temporary union of quasi-adoptionist Docetism).

Underlying all docetic christologies in the early centuries was a conviction, whether of philosophical or theological inspiration, of the impropriety or even impossibility of real incarnation of divinity in human matter. Some flavor of dualism of spirit and flesh* was nearly always operative, but the precise nuance of that dualism, varying from gut-level revulsion against the very thought of God in the womb or the tomb to high-minded notions of divine transcendence, must be observed in each case.

J. G. Davies distinguishes between four primary springs of Docetism: theology (doctrine of the Godhead), cosmology, anthropology and christology. But they easily flow into one another. Although Hellenistic preconceptions inform most Docetism, a Jewish contribution may sometimes be noted. For Jewish faith, theophany was wholly preferable to incarnation.

The imprecision of the content of Docetism in the early church fathers may be partly responsible for the loose use of the label in modern theological debate. Docetism is perhaps the only ancient heresy that recent scholarship has not attempted to rehabilitate, for in an age in which no other creedal* affirmation has been safe from assault, late-twentieth-century believers are sure of nothing so much as (and sometimes nothing more than) that Jesus was one of us. The docetic tag lies ready to affix on the lapels of those for whom virginal conception, sinlessness or knowledge beyond first-century Palestinian norms—or miracle-working power,* resurrection* or even incarnation itself—is incongruent with belief in the humanity of Christ. The antidocetic early-Christian writers held all these credenda together.

2. The Sect of the Docetists.

"Docetist" as the name of a specific group or sect is rare in patristic sources. Hippolytus of Rome, whose authorship is not certain, records the beliefs of the self-styled Dokētai (Hippolytus Refut. 8.8.2; 8.11.1), who were patently of a highly syncretistic mold (Hippolytus Refut. 8.2, 8.8.1—11.2, 10.16.1-6). Hippolytus seems unaware why they assumed this name, which he sarcastically links with the dokos ("beam") of Matthew 7:3. His account of their teachings does not emphasize a docetic strain, which on this evidence was no longer the defining focus of their identity.

Clement of Alexandria names the obscure Julius Cassianus (CPG 1290-91) as ho tēs dokēseōs exarchōn (Clement Strom. 3.13), normally translated "the founder of Docetism" but perhaps meaning, as elsewhere in Clement, "inculcator of Docetism" (Le Boulluec, 348-49). Elsewhere Clement cites the Dokētai as an example of a heretical sect that derives its name not from geography or practice but from "peculiar dogma" (Clement Strom. 7.17). Julius Cassianus, who should be placed in the later second century in Egypt or perhaps Syria, wrote on encratism, for which his Docetism may have been a basis or post factum defense.

3. The Gospel of Peter.

A fragment of a lost work by Serapion, bishop of Antioch (in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.12.6), introduces us to the difficulty of characterizing a text as docetic. Serapion, who flourished c. 200, came across the Gospel of Peter in use in the church of Rhossus and was drawn into scrutinizing it by the discovery that the Christians of Rhossus were entangled in heresy. (Its nature is not clarified, and the name Marcianus is no help, unless we should discern here Marcion, which would be appropriate in both location and Tendenz.) Serapion got some help from the successors of those who began the gospel, "whom we call Dokētai." He found most of it authentic and proceeded to list the additions, which were presumably divergent. But at this point the fragment breaks off.

A sizeable section generally recognized as belonging to this apocryphal* Gospel of Peter was discovered in the 1880s (and more recently two tiny papyri). Its supposed Docetism is no longer so obvious. Discussion has focused chiefly on Jesus' silence on the cross (hōs mēden ponon echōn, "as having no pain" [Gos. Pet. 4.10]; the text does not settle whether he did or did not suffer pain) and the gospel's version of the cry of dereliction, with its distinctive sequel " 'My power, O power you have forsaken me!' And having said this he was taken up" (Gos. Pet. 5.19). In addition the narrative displays heightened apocalyptic* and miraculous elements. The evidence probably does not warrant an endorsement of Serapion's judgment on its docetic origin, but its hypersupernatural christology at least makes its use by Docetists comprehensible, even if it barely squeezes into the moderate end of the docetic spectrum.

4. The Heretics in Ignatius's Letters.

The letters written by Ignatius,* bishop of Antioch,* early in the second century to churches in western Asia Minor attack a denial of the reality of Christ's sufferings. He does not name the heretics but uses the verb dokein in reporting their teaching (Ign. Smyrn. 2.1; 4.2; Ign. Trall. 10.1). But their precise understanding, in terms of their position on the spectrum plotted above, remains elusive, nor are scholars agreed whether they or some other group propagated the judaizing errors Ignatius also attacked. Yet the implications of their Docetism emerge unmistakably: the Eucharist was no longer "the flesh of our Savior Jesus Christ which suffered for our sins" (Ign. Smyrn. 7.1), and the afflictions and death of the martyrs likewise lost their significance (see Martyrdom). In response Ignatius weaves together with wonderful suggestiveness the mutually authenticating threefold reality of Christ's humanity and passion, of the eucharistic flesh and blood and of the death of martyrdom. "Under Pontius Pilate" (Ign. Trall. 9.1; cf. 1 Tim 6:13; Apostles' Creed) makes its appearance in a confessional context.

5. The Docetism of Marcionites and Gnostics.

The testimony of anti-gnostic writers like Irenaeus to the Docetism of the unholy succession of Gnostics* and gnosticizing teachers in the second century (beginning for Irenaeus with Cerinthus and in this respect including Marcion and his followers) is broadly confirmed by the Nag Hammadi gnostic texts (Rudolph, 157-71, Tröger). Thus the Acts of John 97-104 portray Christ, already risen from his temporary body, watching the crucifixion of Jesus taking place (see Death of Jesus). The common christological core of these writings presupposes a Christ who cannot suffer, but their variety encompasses commendation of others' martyrdom (e.g., 1 Apoc. Jas.), metaphorical transpositions of "crucifixion" ("Jesus came to crucify the world," Gos. Phil. 63) and texts such as the Gospel of Truth in which docetizing elements coexist with nondocetic motifs. Nor should we forget that one or two more mainstream teachers, especially Clement of Alexandria, evinced patent docetic strains in their christology.

6. Docetism in the New Testament?

John's Gospel has been characterized by a few interpreters as docetic but is more plausibly viewed as antidocetic. Certainly the Johannine Epistles (see John, Letters of) identify a schismatic group who denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh (1 Jn 4:2-3; 2 Jn 7). Some commentators (e.g., Brown) ascribe this to an ultrahigh christology that was en route to Docetism proper; others (e.g., Strecker) more confidently align it with recognizably docetic currents, especially of a Cerinthian kind. According to Epiphanius (Haer. 28.1), Cerinthus, who flourished in Asia Minor in the early second century, taught an adoptionist-style Docetism whereby Christ and Jesus were not identical (see John, Letters of). Given the appeal of the varieties of Docetism, at the latest from the early second century onward, we should not be surprised to detect it as part of the backdrop against which other, later NT writings should be understood.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; JOHN, LETTERS OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); N. Brox, "Doketismus. Eine Problemanzeige," ZKG 95 (1984) 301-14; J. G. Davies, "The Origins of Docetism," SP 6 (TU 81; 1962) 13-35; P. M. Head, "On the Christology of the Gospel of Peter," VC 46 (1992) 209-24; A. Le Boulluec, La notion d'hérésie dans la littérature grecque IIe-IIIe siècles (2 vols.; Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes, 1985); J. W. McCant, "The Gospel of Peter: Docetism Reconsidered," NTS 30 (1984) 258-73; C. Maurer and W. Schneemelcher, "The Gospel of Peter" in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. W. Schneemelcher (2 vols.; Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1989) 1:216-27; K. Rudolph, Gnosis (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); G. Salmon, "Cassianus, Julius," DCB 1:412-13; idem, "Docetae," DCB 1:865-7; M. Slusser, "Docetism: A Historical Definition," SecCent 1 (1981) 163-72; G. Strecker, Die Johannesbriefe (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989); K. W. Tröger, "Doketistische Christologie in Nag-Hammadi-Texten. Ein Beitrag zum Doketismus in frühchristlicher Zeit," Kairos 19 (1977) 45-52; P. Weigandt, "Der Doketismus im Urchristentum und in der theologischen Entwicklung des zweiten Jahrhunderts," (2 vols.; unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Heidelberg, 1961); K. Wengst, Häresie und Orthodoxie in Spiegel des ersten Johannesbriefes (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1976).

D. F. Wright

DOXOLOGY. See GLORY; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS

DRAGON. See BEASTS, DRAGON, SEA, CONFLICT MOTIF.

DUALISM. See GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; SYNCRETISM.

E

EARLY CATHOLICISM

The term early catholicism (German Frühkatholizismus) has taken on a special nuance in contemporary discussion, chiefly because of its employment in 1950 by Ph. Vielhauer (see DPL, "Early Catholicism"). In general the term "refers to a situation in which primitive apocalyptic expectation has been weakened, and the Church as an institution with an organized ministry and sacraments has begun to replace the Word as the means of salvation" (Marshall, 222-23).

1. Definition
2. Features
3. Assessment

1. Definition.

The boundary lines between Paul's letters generally claimed as authentic and those labeled Deutero-Pauline (2 Thess, Pastorals, Col—Eph) are contested and difficult to draw, and even Käsemann hesitated about the direct authorship of Colossians (Käsemann RGG, 1727-28; see Dunn 1996, 35-39). Yet it remains true that from the witness of the Hauptbriefe (Paul's capital epistles of Gal, 1—2 Cor, Rom) a fairly consistent picture of Pauline Christianity can be assembled, in which God's gracious action in saving his people and reconciling the world through Christ alone, is made available to faith, evidenced by love and obedience in the community, is paramount (see DPL, Center of Paul's Theology).

Within the evidence of the NT, however, other witnesses add their distinctive voices, offering variations and emphases not apparent in Paul's situational and contingently driven theology. It was the observation that certain (later) parts of the NT offered some views divergent from Paul's that led Ph. Vielhauer in his investigation of Luke-Acts to conclude that in this two-volumed work we are in touch with "the nascent early catholic church" (Vielhauer, 49). This conclusion formed the basis of H. Conzelmann's influential work on early and later Christianity when he distinguished between (1) the epoch of Israel ending with John the Baptist; (2) the time of Jesus, forming the "center of time" (hence the title of his study of Luke's Gospel, Die Mitte der Zeit; and (3) the era of the church* extending into Christian history which he saw as represented in Luke's historiographical writing of both Gospel and Acts. Traces of "early catholic" influences were sought in Conzelmann's segment (3) as the church became domesticated in its earthly existence, lost much of its apocalyptic* fervor, and saw its life as reaching into the unknown future on earth.

More importantly, on theological grounds, E. Käsemann proposed that non-Pauline parts of the NT not only express their message in idioms and ideas that have no counterpart in Paul; they are in conflict with the Pauline insistence on God's justifying the godless (the Pauline center, according to Käsemann, based on his understanding of the twin themes of God's righteousness and Christ's lordly control of the world and the church: see Way; Ehler); and they promote a version of Christianity at odds with Paul. Since the signs of these rival kerygmata have links with the shape Christianity took in becoming institutionalized under clergy and demarcated by its creedal fixities, with a loss of eschatological* verve as the apocalyptic hope of the Parousia* waned, Käsemann found it natural to brand these movements away from Pauline soteriology as "early catholic" (frühkatholische), or less questionably, "incipient catholic." "Emergent catholicism" is one such modification of terms (Perrin, 61), which again might better be expressed as "emerging catholicism," since no NT document says exactly that "where Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church" with a full-blown sacramental, hierarchical system in place (Ign. Smyrn. 8) and where faith is replaced by moralism (as some of the apostolic fathers have been said to teach; see Torrance).

2. Features.

The data often appealed to in support of the contention of the presence of "early catholic" elements in the NT may now be passed under review.

*2.1. Church Order. The Pauline model (based on 1 Cor 12—14) of a responsible congregational life with all the members playing their role (albeit under some leadership; see 1 Cor 11:19; 16:15-18) takes on new configuration in the Pastoral Letters, often regarded as setting down directions for an organized, regulated and structured life, with the spontaneity and freedom under the Spirit's immediate afflatus checked (Dunn 1975; 1 Tim 3:1-13; 4:14; Tit 1:5-9; 2 Tim 1:13-14). Church life and order evolved, partly under pressure from encroaching deviant ideas, partly due to the onset of a bürglichliche-Hellenistic (i.e., bourgeois) mentality into a hierarchical, bishop-directed institution of ministry, emanating from the closed circle of the apostles* and their successors (heralded, it may be, in Eph 2:20; 4:16-20; see Worship; further evidence in Ign. Phld. 3.4; Did. 15.1-2; 1 Clement 40—44). Hints of this development are seen in 1 Peter 5:1-5; Hebrews 13:7; and 3 John (rivalry between the Johannine elder and Diotrephes is held to reflect ecclesiastical tensions over power; von Campenhausen, Käsemann 1960; see Adversaries; Church Order and Government).

2.2. Faith. Faith that in the early literature retains its value as salvific and a response in obedience to the kerygma's call now becomes transformed into a belief in articles of religion (fides quae creditur, "what is believed"; cf. Eph 4:5; Jude 3, 20), regarded as a treasured possession to be adhered to and preserved inviolate, then handed on (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 1:14) and thereby losing its personal character in that it is subsumed under a generalized Christian attitude as one virtue* among several (2 Pet 1:5-7).

2.3. Canonical Authority. The limits of the canon, the list of authoritative writings, are determined by the church's acting in collecting such writings, especially Paul's letters (2 Pet 3:15-16), and erecting a "formal principle" of canonical authority (Käsemann; Ehler, 35-70) which is fixed (cf. Rev 22:18-19 for this idea of a "closed book"). The church in its later self-awareness takes on the role of a "saved community" protected as the "bulwark of the truth" (1 Tim 3:15) by the normative Scripture (sola scriptura) it is called to safeguard rather than live by or under.

2.4. Gospel. Perhaps the most serious index of an alleged decline from pristine, Pauline standards is seen in the way the gospel message is said to have degenerated into "orthodoxy," with right belief replacing saving faith, leading to a moralistic way of fulfilling the commandments (evident in the "Two Ways" teaching underlying Barnabas and Didache; see Kirk, 111-39) and a transmutation of Christian living as dependent on a sacramental observance (clear in Ignatius) with clergy and laity separated (1 Clement). The notes of God's sovereign, unfettered grace, displayed in putting the world into right relationship by a gracious act-of-power and suspending the Christians' response on obedience to the lordship of Christ (Käsemann; Way) are muted. Hence, it is said, the Pauline kerygma is eclipsed.

3. Assessments.

A serviceable paradigm of the way critics who favor this reading of NT Christianity in its obvious multiform variety support their case may now be considered. And it will provide an opportunity to assess its strength and weakness.

E. Käsemann (1964) has launched an attack on 2 Peter* by dubbing it an "early catholic" work. As we noted above, in Käsemann's terminology it is a book that fails to articulate and champion the heart of the (Pauline) message and represents an accommodation of Christianity to Hellenistic culture and categories. Marks of "early catholic" influence in 2 Peter are, first, a fading of the parousial hope as part of a general reordering of eschatological conviction in which Christ's coming is sidelined in favor of a stoic idea of cosmic renewal (2 Pet 3:3-14). Second, moralistic ideas stemming from an understanding of salvation as a divinization of human nature (2 Pet 1:4) are part of the (late) author's approach to making the practice of Christian living a cultivation of a basket of virtues (2 Pet 1:5-9). Third, appeal to apostolic authority* in the person of venerated church leaders of the past (Paul and Peter in Rome) seen in 2 Peter 1:16-18 and 3:15-16 replaces reliance on the immediacy of the Spirit's guidance in the community (links with 1 Clem. 5 and Ign. Rom. 4.3 are evident). Fourth, the way in which the faith is codified in set forms and fixed formulas leads to the setting up of canonical authority as a bulwark against gnosticizing heresy. Church members are encouraged to remain committed to the apostolic teaching (2 Pet 3:1; for the "recall" formula and technique, see Talbert, cited in Martin, 134-35) in a way that differs from earlier Pauline charismatic groups who retain a fresh awareness of living "between the times" as a harbinger of receiving the Spirit's final salvation.

Judged by these criteria, Käsemann avers, 2 Peter shows clear signs of its second-century setting. He argues that it wrestles with the problem of the Parousia's delay by recasting eschatology to fit in with the world's continued existence; and he further maintains that the church's role as a bastion of orthodoxy to counter "false teachers" (2 Pet 2:1) shows a distinct shift from Paul's ecclesiology of a church charismatically moved and led. The church as guardian of Scripture (2 Pet 1:12-21; 3:16) is said to betoken a teaching office held in veneration as opposed to Paul's view (1 Cor 12) that all the Spirit-gifted members of the congregation can offer teaching and revelation.*

The upshot is that in 2 Peter the essential gospel (what Käsemann called its "material principle," i.e., justification by faith) has been overlaid and corrupted. The witness of 2 Peter is not to the gospel as "event" but to its transmutation to "doctrine."

There is, in our review of Käsemann's estimate, the need to recognize both truth and exaggeration. He has overstated the case in several ways, chiefly in ignoring the fact that the denial of imminence in the Parousia is the sectarians' position, not the author's. The latter has a strongly held belief in Christ's coming to judgment* in apocalyptic glory* (2 Pet 1:19; 2:12; 3:10-14). True, he expresses salvation in a way that sets a gulf between God's nature (as divine) and human existence (as mortal). The remedy is found in divine power (2 Pet 1:3) that intervenes to promise incorruption (2 Pet 1:4) and moral power (2 Pet 2:19-20). Yet this idea of divinization is still a long way from the later church doctrine seen in the Cappadocian fathers' expression that humans may become as God (Gk theopoiēsis; Kelly, 348-52) in a way that turns the church into a sacramental system offering to transform (Gk metaballein) the human condition into gaining a share of the divine life by osmosis.

The author of 2 Peter does have recourse to apostolic traditions as the ground of appeal—here Käsemann's point is well taken—and this feature marks the normative character assigned to "apostolic words" (2 Pet 2:21; 3:2) as well as their "ways" (2 Pet 2:1, 15, 21), a trait seen in Jude 17 and the Johannine letters. Yet the apostolic office is not exalted as indispensable, and all the addressees are expected to interpret Scripture for themselves much as among the Pauline congregants (2 Pet 1:19-21; 3:14-18; see also Heb 5:12-14; 1 Jn 2:20, 27). The author is building his case on apostolic testimony inherited from Peter, as the writer of Ephesians may well be doing in regard to Paul's legacy—and adapting it to post-apostolic situations (cf. Beker). As Bauckham (153) remarks, this is the key to the author's conception of the task at hand. Finally, while "faith" does have a nuance of "what is believed"—and this usage is not without parallel in the early Paul—both "faith" and "knowledge"* retain a meaning understood as a living relationship to Christ, implied in personal conversion, again much as Paul does (see Reumann, 291-92, who argues that "faith" is the cement that binds together the various parts of the NT's pluriform witness, and that convictional faith [fides qua creditur] can never be understood without or separated from the content of faith [fides quae]).

In sum, we should be alert to the developments of the kerygma as new situations arose in the post-apostolic era, but these enrichments are a deeper explication and application of the central core themes (Best, 87-113) rather than a distortion or contradiction of them. Moreover, with Best (46) we should recognize the need to have in the NT's witness both what he calls "existentialist" interpretations of Christ and the "non-existentialist" interpretations; both emphases are required, he avers, for the church's continued existence (see also Fuller).

See also CHURCH ORDER AND GOVERNMENT; ESCHATOLOGY; NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY; PAROUSIA; PAULINE LEGACY AND SCHOOL; 2 PETER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco: Word, 1983); J. C. Beker, Heirs of Paul: Paul's Legacy in the New Testament and in the Church Today (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); E. Best, Interpreting Christ (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke (New York: Harper & Row, 1960); J. D. G. Dunn, The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); idem, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); B. Ehler, Die Herrschaft des Gekreuzigten (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1986); R. H. Fuller, "Early Catholicism: An Anglican Reaction to a German Debate" in Die Mitte des Neuen Testaments, ed. U. Luz & H. Weder (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983) 34-41; E. Käsemann, "An Apologia for Primitive Christian Eschatology" in Essays on New Testament Themes (Philadelphia: Fortress 1964) 169-95; idem, "Ketzer und Zeuge," Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, Erster Band (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1960) 168-87; idem, "Kolosserbrief," RGG (3d ed.) 1727-28; idem, "Paul and Early Catholicism" in New Testament Questions of Today (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969) 236-51; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (New York: Harper, 1958); K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God (London: Longmans, 1931); R. P. Martin, "The Theology of Jude, 1 Peter, and 2 Peter" in A. Chester and R. P. Martin, The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter and Jude (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); I. H. Marshall, " 'Early Catholicism' in the New Testament" in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, ed. R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1974); N. Perrin, The New Testament: An Introduction (New York: Harcourt Brace, Javonovich, 1974); J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1948); Ph. Vielhauer, "On the 'Paulinism' in Acts" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (New York: Abingdon, 1966) 33-56; H. F. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1969); D. V. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991).

R. P. Martin

EBIONITES

"Ebionites" is one of the names given by the early church fathers to a leading group of Jewish Christians or to Jewish Christians in general. The name, which originally meant "the poor," may reflect NT usage (cf. Rom 15:26), but on this and other questions, such as the Ebionites' differentiation from the Nazarenes (Nazoreans), no agreement exists among scholars.

1. Patristic Testimonies
2. Modern Discussion

1. Patristic Testimonies.

1.1. Irenaeus. "Ebionites" first appears among the names given to groups of Jewish Christians in the writings of Irenaeus (c. 180). The Greek Ebionaioi (Ebionaei in Latin, in the sole extant version of Irenaeus's text) is a transliteration of the Hebrew or Aramaic for "poor," but there is no agreement on the origins of the name. Irenaeus's report, sandwiched between his accounts of Cerinthus and of the Nicolaitans, Cerdo and Marcion,* provides no explanation: "Those who are called Ebionites allow that the world was made by God but as concerns the Lord hold the same opinions as Cerinthus and Carpocrates [omitting a negative, with most editors; for the contrary case see Klijn and Reinink, 19-20]. They use only the Gospel according to Matthew and reject the apostle Paul, calling him an apostate from the law. They strive to expound the prophecies too punctiliously. They circumcise themselves and persist in customs based on the law and in a Jewish lifestyle, such that they even venerate Jerusalem as though it were the home of God" (Irenaeus Haer. 1.26.2).

Elsewhere Irenaeus adds that the Ebionites' use of only Matthew's Gospel misled them in their beliefs about the Lord (Irenaeus Haer. 3.11.7); that they rejected the virginal conception of Jesus, following Theodotion and Aquila in interpreting Isaiah 7:14 ("of a young woman," Gk neanis; Lat adulescentula), thereby dissolving the divine plan and nullifying the God-given witness of the prophets (Irenaeus Haer. 3.21.2); and that consequently they denied the incarnate union of God* and humanity, failing to discern the parallel with the creation of Adam in which God-breathed life united with and vivified the human substance (Irenaeus Haer. 5.1.3; cf. 4.33.4).

1.2. Tertullian. To Irenaeus's account Tertullian added little except to introduce Ebion, the successor of Cerinthus, as the exponent of the heresy (Tertullian De Praescr. 33; cf. the slightly later Ps-Tertullian's Against All Heresies 3). Tertullian cited the variant text of John 1:13 (singular natus) against Ebion's rejection of the virginal conception (Tertullian De Carn. 24) and alluded to Ebion's teaching that, though he was no more than a Solomon or a Jonah, Jesus was indwelt by an angel (Tertullian De Carn. 14, 18). Tertullian never mentions the Ebionites but only Ebion, reflecting the custom Justin Martyr attributes to heretics, like philosophers, of tracing their beliefs back to an eponymous founder (Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 35).

1.3. Hippolytus. Hippolytus's chapter on the Ebionites is heavily indebted to Irenaeus. Hippolytus adds that Jesus was named Christ only for his perfect observance of the Jewish law and that others after him are able likewise to become Christs if they fulfill the law (Hippolytus Refut. 7.34; cf. 10.22.1).

1.4. Origen. Origen's several references to the Ebionites (and once to Ebion) repeat the main points found in Irenaeus and supply other details in agreement with them: as Jews the Ebionites cited Jesus' statement that he was sent only to the lost sheep of Israel (Origen De Princ. 4.3.8); like Christ they celebrated pascha on the same day as the Jews and with unleavened bread (Origen Comm. Mt. ser. 79). Origen is the first to claim that the Ebionites were so called because of the poverty of their understanding (Origen De Princ. 4.3.8) or the poverty of the law to which they clung (Origen Cont. Cels. 2.1). He also distinguishes between two kinds of Ebionites, some who confess the virginal conception of Jesus and others who ascribe to him a normal birth (Origen Cont. Cels. 5.61; cf. Comm. Mt. 16.12). Such a distinction among Jewish followers of Jesus is indicated by Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryph. 48), but he never names the Ebionites. The distinction may reflect divergent texts of Irenaeus (see 1.1 above): Hippolytus had one without the negative, Eusebius probably one with it.

1.5. Eusebius. Eusebius's main account of the Ebionites combines traditions derived from Irenaeus, Hippolytus and Origen (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.27). "Ebionites" was the name appropriately given them from the first because of their poor and base opinions about Christ, who, as an ordinary human being, was "justified" solely by moral achievement. Other Ebionites did not deny the birth from the virgin, yet they too rejected Christ's preexistence* as the divine Word and Wisdom.* To this second group Eusebius attributes the use of the Gospel of the Hebrews to the contempt of other Gospels. He also says that they, like other Christians, worship* on the Lord's Day* in commemoration of the Savior's resurrection* but alongside their continuing observance of the sabbath. It seems that Eusebius had no independent information about the Ebionites but sought to reconcile his sources. Hence he differentiates the two groups more fully than before and disagrees with Irenaeus (who has the Ebionites using Matthew's Gospel) probably in preference for Origen, who several times mentions the Gospel of the Hebrews without linking it with the Ebionites.

Elsewhere, in his account of Origen's work on the text of the OT, Eusebius is the first writer to describe Symmachus as an Ebionite (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.17; cf. Dem. Ev. 7.1). In his Onomasticon he asserts that there are Ebionites living in Choba "to the left of Damascus," probably identical with the Kochaba mentioned, along with Nazareth, as the home of the relatives of the Savior (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.7.14; see Relatives of Jesus).

1.6. Epiphanius. Epiphanius's Haereses [Panarion] was written in the mid-370s while he was bishop of Salamis in Cyprus. Although it provides by far the longest patristic report on the Ebionites, with apparently much fresh information, the extent of Epiphanius's access to independent sources remains uncertain. In the Haereses the Ebionites follow the Nazoreans, with whom Ebion began before developing his distinctive teaching (Epiphanius Haer. 30.1.1). Both groups originated among the Christian Jews who fled eastward into Transjordan before A.D. 70 (Epiphanius Haer. 30.2.7).

Unlike most earlier writers, Epiphanius does not link the Ebionites with Cerinthus, whom he places in Asia Minor. The Ebionites settled in Kochaba and other named towns in the Basanitis region (Epiphanius Haer. 30.2.8), but Ebion also taught in Asia (where he, not Cerinthus, met the apostle John in the Ephesian baths, Epiphanius Haer. 30.24.1-5), Rome and Cyprus (Epiphanius Haer. 30.18.1—did Epiphanius draw on local traditions or experience?). Like the Cerinthians, the Ebionites use only Matthew's Gospel, which they call the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Epiphanius Haer. 30.3.7), but in a version incomplete and corrupted (Ephiphanius Haer. 30.13.2); the corruptions Epiphanius cites reflect particularly a rejection of eating meat (Epiphanius Haer. 30.14.4; 30.22.4). This Hebrew Gospel began with the baptizing by John (Epiphanius Haer. 30.13.6-8) and omitted the genealogy of Jesus.

Epiphanius highlights development as well as diversity in Ebionite teaching. Ebion viewed Jesus Christ as the natural son of Joseph (Epiphanius Haer. 30.2.2; 30.3.1), but through the influence of Elxai (Epiphanius Haer. 19.1.4—19.6.5), Ebion's followers adopted variant christologies,* chiefly based on the notion of a heavenly Christ (Epiphanius Haer. 30.3.1-6; cf. 30.14.4-6). So Epiphanius can depict the Ebionites as observing Ebion's Jewish practice and adhering to Elxai's fantasies about Christ (Epiphanius Haer. 30.17.5-7).

The Ebionites originally commended virginity because of James the brother of Jesus but later repudiated celibacy and continence (Epiphanius Haer. 30.2.6; 30.18.2-3 makes marriage* compulsory). This comment should probably be linked with another distinctive feature of Epiphanius's record: the Ebionites' use of the Peregrinations (Periodoi) of Peter attributed to Clement* of Rome, although this too they corrupted. Clement taught celibacy (Epiphanius no doubt regards Ps-Clement's Letter to Virgins as authentic), but the adulterated Ebionite version of the Peregrinations overturned this. It also depicted Peter's daily baptisms* and abstinence from meat (Epiphanius Haer. 30.15.1-3). Epiphanius has been widely held to have had access to one of the sources, perhaps the Grundschrift, of the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions. He also speaks of the Ebionites' Ascents (Anabathmoi) of James, with its polemic against sacrifices and the temple* (Epiphanius Haer. 30.16.7)—another possible source of the Pseudo-Clementines. Epiphanius ascribes to the heresy the production or use of other works falsely named from apostles (John is mentioned as well as James and Matthew), but identification is impossible (Epiphanius Haer. 30.16.6; 30.23.1-2).

Epiphanius may well have had first-hand acquaintance with Ebionites and their books, but his attempt to reconcile his divergent sources of information about them by introducing the diverting impact of Elxai is unconvincing if only because it explains the obscure by the more obscure. The Elkesaites (from Elxai or Elkesai) have, however, attracted renewed interest through the recent publication of the Cologne Mani codex, showing that the founder of Manichaeism grew up in this syncretistic Jewish Christian baptizing sect.

1.7. Jerome. Other writers contemporaneous with or later than Epiphanius contribute nothing more of significance, except possibly for Jerome. But he appears to confuse Ebionites and Nazoreans (Jerome Ep. 112.13) and perhaps Ebion and Symmachus, the allegedly Ebionite translator of the Hebrew Bible (Jerome Comm. Gal. 3.13-14). His most intriguing claim is to have recently translated from Hebrew (Aramaic) into Greek and Latin the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is used by the Nazoreans and Ebionites (Jerome Comm. Matt. 12.13; Comm. Mic. 7.6; Vir. 2).

2. Modern Discussion.

Making consistent and historically plausible sense of patristic testimonies to the Ebionites (translated and reviewed in Klijn and Reinink) is a taxing assignment. Among the attendant difficulties is that of differentiating them from other Jewish Christian groups, especially the Nazoreans (Nazareans, Nazarenes).

2.1. Origin of the Name. The tradition first found in Tertullian of a historical founder named Ebion is almost entirely discounted (but note Fitzmyer, 210). The etiology first found in Origen of their pejorative naming for their "poverty" of belief or practice is even less credible. Epiphanius rejects their own claim that "they are poor because they sold their possessions in the apostles' time . . . and have gone over to poverty and renunciation; and thus, they say, they are called 'poor' by everyone" (Epiphanius Haer. 30.17.2).

This origination of the name in "the poor" as a designation of the primitive Jesus people, with probably a double reference to economic and spiritual poverty (cf. Rom 15:26; Mt 5:3; Bammel, 909, 912-14; see Riches), has not won universal acceptance. Scholars who deny that "the poor" was used in this sense (e.g., Keck) cannot entertain it. Yet, whether self-adopted or applied by others, it remains the most likely possibility. It appeals especially to those who discern in the Ebionites a continuity with the earliest Jewish Christianity* of Jerusalem.* M. Goulder relies on Ebionite writings to reconstruct "The Pre-Marcan Gospel."

2.2. Emergence of Ebionism. H.-J. Schoeps's influential interpretation accepts that both

Ebionites and Nazoreans derive from the first community in Jerusalem but prefers to use both names only of separate groups that formed after the fall of Jerusalem, settled east of Jordan and came to be viewed as heretical by the mainstream church. Joseph Thomas, following Jerome, identifies "the orthodox Ebionites" with the Nazoreans; by the time of Irenaeus some had become heretical, some would even become Gnostic,* and eventually, through Elkesaite influence, some became baptist Ebionites. In this presentation "Ebionite" is near to an all-inclusive category for all distinctively Jewish Christian groups. More recently R. A. Pritz discerns a split in the ranks of the Nazarenes (who stand in direct descent from the first Jerusalem believers) around the end of the first century, probably over christology, out of which Ebionitism emerged. In terms of continuing adherence to Judaism and in geography, Nazarenes and Ebionites are scarcely distinguishable. The former are less well documented than the latter (Fitzmyer, 292-93 tabulates the features attributed to each), but the Nazarenes (Nazoreans) are generally credited with orthodox beliefs about Christ.

2.3. Ebionites and Qumran. J. L. Teicher held the Qumran* sect to be Ebionite. A number of scholars have seen the conversion of Essene Jews as the source or one source of the Ebionites, before or more likely after A.D. 70 (Bammel, 913; Daniélou, 63, following Oscar Cullmann). J. A. Fitzmyer cautiously concludes that the Essenes did not become Christians but undoubtedly influenced Ebionite teachings and practices.

2.4. An Ebionite Gospel. Sorting out one Jewish Christian Gospel from another is made difficult by the scantiness of the remains. According to G. Howard, from the seven fragments given by Epiphanius, the Ebionites' Gospel presupposed the three Synoptics, was harmonistic (following Bertrand) and was written in Greek, not Hebrew, as Epiphanius supposed. This writer also wrongly identified it with the Gospel of the Hebrews (which clearly contained syncretistic and gnostic elements). The Ebionite Gospel cannot be dated more precisely than the pre-Irenaean second century. Its Tendenz reflects Ebionite christology and antipathy to meat-eating (see 1.6 above; text in Vielhauer and Strecker, 169-70).

2.5. Other Ebionite Literature. Following Epiphanius on the Periodoi Petrou, modern study has widely accepted the Kerygmata Petrou (Preachings of Peter) as a major and Ebionite source of the Pseudo-Clementines (Jones, 84-96 for review of research). G. Strecker's analysis (in Bauer, 257-71) locates its Jewish Christianity (anti-Pauline, dependent on the four Gospels but ignorant of the Catholic Epistles and the Apocalypse, with a high regard for James of Jerusalem, repeated baptisms) on the borderlands of Greek Syria and Edessa around the turn of the second and third centuries.

Although Symmachus is identified by some Fathers as Ebionite, a recent monograph finds "no traces of any Ebionite belief in his Pentateuch translations" (Salvesen, 297). Other patristic evidence identifies a Jewish Christian group of Symmachians (Klijn and Reinink, 52-54) but does not link it with the tradition of Symmachus's Ebionitism. Epiphanius makes him a Samaritan who became a Jewish proselyte (Weights 16). Symmachus's alleged Ebionitism contributes nothing to any understanding of this strand of Jewish Christianity.

See also JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Bammel, "πτωχός κτλ" in TDNT 6:885-915; W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); D. Bertrand, "L'Évangile des Ebionites et problème synoptique: Mc 1.2-6 et par.," NTS 26 (1980) 548-63; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1964); J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Qumran Scrolls, the Ebionites and Their Literature" in The Scrolls and the New Testament, ed. K. Stendahl (New York: Harper, 1957) 208-31, 291-98; M. Goulder, "The Pre-Marcan Gospel," SJT 47 (1994) 453-71; G. Howard, "The Gospel of the Ebionites," ANRW 2.25.5 (1988) 4034-53; F. S. Jones, "The Pseudo-Clementines: A History of Research, Part II," SecCent 2 (1982) 63-96; L. E. Keck, "The Poor Among the Saints in Jewish Christianity and Qumran," ZNTW 57 (1966) 54-78; A. F. J. Klijn and G. J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish Christian Sects (NovTSup 36; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); R. A. Pritz, Nazarene Jewish Christianity (SPB 37; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1988); A. Salvesen, Symmachus in the Pentateuch (JSSM 15; Manchester: University of Manchester, 1991); H.-J. Schoeps, Jewish Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964); M. Simon, Verus Israel (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986); G. Strecker, "Ebioniten," RAC 4 (1959) 487-500;

J. Thomas, Le mouvement baptiste en Palestine et Syrie (150 av. J.-C.-300 ap. J.-C.) (Gembloux: J. Duculot, 1935); P. Vielhauer and G. Strecker, "Jewish-Christian Gospels" in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. W. Schneemelcher (2 vols.; rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991-92) 1:134-78. D. F. Wright

ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE. See VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE.

EDESSA. See SYRIA, SYRIAN CHRISTIANITY.

ELDERS. See CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY.

ELECTION

The presentation of the concept of election mostly parallels what we find in the Gospels and the Pauline literature (see DPL, Election and Predestination). This is understandable, given the formative influence of Jesus and Paul on the development of the theology of the early church. At the same time the topic occupies less space overall in view of the unique purposes for the writings that constitute the remaining books of the NT.

1. God Determines Events and Dates
2. God Elects or Appoints Individuals
3. God Chooses or Appoints Christ
4. God Elects People to Salvation
5. Conclusion and Early Christian Developments

1. God Determines Events and Dates.

This represents a minor element of the topic to be sure, but the authors of Acts and Hebrews assert God's role in the occurrence of certain events and dates that we could consider elective in nature. God decides the timing of the future kingdom* (Acts 1:7). God has "determined" (horizō) the times and locations of the nations on planet earth (Acts 17:26). Using the same verb, the writer of Hebrews affirms that God has appointed a certain day to be "Today" (Heb 4:7). God chose that the Gentiles*—not merely Jews—would hear and believe the word of salvation* through Peter's mouth (Acts 15:7). God's elective will can overturn or determine human plans (Acts 18:21; 21:14).

2. God Elects or Appoints Individuals.

Reserving God's appointment of Christ for the next section, we find in Acts the confirmation that Jesus chose the Twelve* to be apostles* (Acts 1:2, 24; 10:41-42), parallel to God's choice of the ancestors of Israel* (Acts 13:17) or his appointment of the high priest* (Heb 5:4). Beyond that, the use of dei ("it is necessary") plays an important role here: "Claimed by the divine will, they [Christ's disciples] are shaped and determined by it down to the smallest details of their lives (Lk 12:12; Acts 9:6, 16; 14:22; 19:21; 23:11; 27:24)" [Grundmann, 22-23]. The writer of Acts confirms that God's Spirit (see Holy Spirit) called Barnabas and Saul to their missionary endeavors (Acts 13:2; 16:10). In Paul's words, the Holy Spirit appointed those who served as elders/overseers of the church of Ephesus (Acts 20:28). Paul, Luke's hero, is a special specimen of God's electing activity: Paul owes his role as an apostle to God's appointment (Acts 9:15—Paul is a chosen instrument; 13:47; 22:10, 14; 26:16). In Acts 26:19 Paul affirms that he responded positively to God's appointment of him to be a servant and witness.*

3. God Chooses or Appoints Christ.

Parallel to statements in the Gospels, the author of Acts asserts that Jesus was a man under divine appointment. In one of Peter's speeches he affirms that Christ's* career as Messiah was appointed by God (Acts 3:20). The verb dei has elective significance again. It expresses divine lordship* that determines Christ's activity and leads to his suffering,* death* and glory* (Acts 1:16; 3:21; 17:3).

In his first epistle Peter asserts that Christ was foreknown before the foundation of the world (1 Pet 1:20). Scholars debate whether this refers only to prescience or to predestination. In either case, though salvation* may have been a mystery that the prophets* announced and into which angels* longed to look, God knew all along precisely how he would accomplish redemption*—through Christ's death. Indeed, Jesus' crucifixion, though perpetrated by evil people, took place "according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God" (Acts 2:23 NRSV; see also 4:28; 13:29). Though people rejected Christ, he is God's chosen and precious Stone, the cornerstone of the building that constitutes God's people (1 Pet 2:4, 6; quoting Is 28:16).

With virtual quotations of the transfiguration narratives (see Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7), 2 Peter affirms that Jesus enjoys God's appointment to his messianic role because he is God's beloved Son upon whom his divine pleasure rests (2 Pet 1:17). R. J. Bauckham agrees that this pleasure "carries the special sense of God's electing good pleasure" (220).

The writer of Hebrews echoes the same thought (Heb 10:9-10). God has also appointed Jesus to his future role as judge* of people (Acts 10:42; 17:31). Beyond this the writer of Hebrews contends that God appointed the Son to be heir of all things (Heb 1:2). The author defends this divine appointment by citing texts from Psalm 2:7 and 2 Samuel 7:14 (Heb 1:5; 5:5). Christ's role in the Melchizedekian* priesthood stems from definitive divine selection (Heb 5:10; 7:28; 8:3).

4. God Elects People to Salvation.

As we would expect, this final category comprises the largest number of texts. Preeminently, election is the action of a loving and gracious God to secure salvation for sinful people. God chose Christ as his "elect one" in order that people might enter into his elect body, the church. Theological debate has centered on how we should understand the relationship between individuals' election to salvation and the corporate election of the church in Christ. Peter certainly applies corporate categories when he speaks of the church as Christ's elect body. He says, "But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people. . . . Once you were not a people, but now you are God's people" (1 Pet 2:9-10 NRSV; cf. Hos 2:23; Ex 19:6). Yet the debate throughout the church's history has often hinged on whether or not this corporate reality implies that God chose specific individuals to be in the elect body. First we must survey the biblical evidence.

Most scholars acknowledge the importance of "calling" language in the biblical authors' discussion of election (see, e.g., DPL, Call, Calling). The author of Acts asserts that God calls people to salvation; his name is called upon them (Acts 2:39; 15:17), though it may not be precisely certain that election themes are in view. Likewise, James identifies believers as those upon whom Christ's name is called (Jas 2:7). At the same time, people must call upon the name of the Lord to be saved (Acts 2:21). People are appointed to eternal* life (Acts 13:48), though the ambiguity of the middle or passive voice in the Greek construction here makes it unclear whether the author wants to stress God's specific appointment or the hearers' decision to believe (MacDonald, 226-28). Certainly these appointed ones believe.

The elder refers to the recipient of his letter as a "chosen lady," an appellation most commentators believe refers to a local church congregation; the corporate body is elect (2 Jn 1, 13). John piles up collective substantives to describe Jesus' followers: they are the "called," "chosen" and "faithful" (Rev 17:14). Using a metaphor that appears to have elective connotations—"book of life"—John describes believers as ones whose names appear in the book while unbelievers' names are absent from the book. This becomes the criterion for habitation in the New Jerusalem* (Rev 20:12, 15; 21:27). The picture is strange, though, for on one hand names appear to be written from the creation* of the world (Rev 17:8; cf. 13:8), but on the other hand those who remain faithful to Jesus avoid having their names erased from the book (Rev. 3:5; cf. Ex 32:32-33). It is best not to press this metaphor too much for elective significance. It may point to God's foreknowledge of his people, while the possibility of erasure highlights the requirement for human response to God's grace.*

James asks a perplexing question: "Has not God chosen the poor in the world to be rich in faith and to be heirs of the kingdom that he has promised to those who love him?" (Jas 2:5). Can James mean that all economically poor people will attain God's salvation due to his pretemporal choice? Surely that cannot be James's meaning; not all poor people are elect, and certainly some rich people are (arguably, those in Jas 1:10-11 and possibly those in Jas 4:13-17). The phrase "to those who love him" certainly specifies the intent of James's words. Most likely, following the pervasive biblical avowal of God's care for the poor (e.g., Deut 15:7-9; Ps 41:1; 69:33; 82:3-4; 140:12; Prov 14:31), the common OT link of poor with pious (Hebrew 'anawim), and given the historical reality that the early church included those classified as "poor" people, James's question describes the real state of the church. This shows why Christians ought not show favoritism to the rich: the church consists primarily of "poor"—that is, humble—people who are God's chosen ones. Election terminology here describes the status of believers: they are God's chosen ones.

The author of 1 Peter employs the concept of "call" (using the verb kalein) five times to affirm that Christians are the objects of God's action of calling (1 Pet 1:15; 2:9; 2:21; 3:9; 5:10). In the second letter similar language occurs—both the verb kalein and the noun klēsis ("calling": 2 Pet 1:3, 10; see also Jude 1). Christians bear the standing or status of God's "called ones," a virtual synonym for "those whom God has named as his own" (Klein 1984). It is impossible, on the basis of these texts alone, to make any of the distinctions systematic theologians attempt between "verbal" and "effectual" calling. That is beside Peter's point. However, 2 Peter 1:10 presents a fascinating juxtaposition: "Therefore, brothers and sisters, be all the more eager to confirm your call and election" (NRSV). The apparently definitive divine acts of "calling" and "election" necessitate human actions if they are to be confirmed or made sure (bebaios). Peter abhors the emptiness of a mere profession that produces no fruit in a believer's life. Not that one's acts earn salvation, but the confirmation of calling and election exists in a life of faithfulness.* Peter's paraenesis (see Teaching, Paraenesis) is appropriate: unless the Christian virtues* of 2 Peter 1:5-9 now characterize a person's life, one has no evidence that the calling or election is authentic.

Peter employs the adjective eklektos ("elect") as a substantive to identify his Christian readers (1 Pet 1:1-2): they are the elect. According to these verses, Peter's apostolic ministry on behalf of God's dispersed elect is based on or grounded in God's foreknowledge, accomplished through the Spirit's work of sanctification, with the goal of obedience* to Jesus and the sprinkling of his blood. As mentioned above, Peter goes on to describe this elect body in corporate terms, applying to the church terms and categories that once described Israel, God's chosen nation (1 Pet 2:9-10). He ends his letter with a reference (presumably) to his own local fellowship of Christians using the term syneklektos ("she who is chosen with you"). The local church is an elect body.

Have some been predetermined not to believe? Some draw this conclusion from 1 Peter 2:8. However, most commentators agree that this was not Peter's intention here. He defines "unbelief" as disobedience to the message of salvation. Such unbelief leads, inevitably, to stumbling. God does not predestine some to reject Christ. But God has ordained that for such unbelievers Christ becomes a stumbling block, because no salvation exists apart from him. The failure to believe and obey accounts for their stumbling. This is God's predestined plan.

5. Conclusion and Early Christian Developments.

Does God choose individuals? In the realm of ministry, clearly he does. God chose people to perform certain tasks, functions or ministries for him. The clearest instance is his appointment of Christ for his redemptive career. Beyond that, Israel's ancestors and high priests and the church's missionaries and apostles are said to have their role as the result of God's elective activity. In the realm of salvation, the church is God's chosen people; once not a people, it is now the people of God—a nation chosen to declare God's mighty acts to an unbelieving world.

Has God specifically chosen certain ones to believe and be saved? This controversial question cannot be solved solely on the basis of the texts examined here. Apparently the earliest Christians following the age of the apostles did not understand that God chose some to be saved and others to be damned. The emphasis in the next century or so clearly resides with human free will to choose either for or against God. We find only a little evidence of divine determination of the elect. We can display only a small sample of evidence.

In a section of exhortation in 1 Clement the writer urges prayer* and the keeping of God's commandments in the harmony of love,* "that through love our sins* may be forgiven* us." Then after quoting the pronouncement of blessing* from Psalm 32:1-2, he affirms, "This blessedness cometh upon those who have been chosen by God through Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom be glory for ever and ever" (1 Clem. 50.7). The kind of people one associates with demonstrates one's character and status. So "with a harmless man thou shalt prove thyself harmless, and with an elect man thou shalt be elect, and with a perverse man thou shalt show thyself perverse" (1 Clem. 46.3). The innocent and righteous prove themselves therefore to be the elect of God (1 Clem. 46.4). David is simply described as "the elect David" (1 Clem. 52.2).

In his praise of love the author affirms: "By love, have all the elect of God been made perfect; without love nothing is well-pleasing to God" (1 Clem. 49.5). At the book's outset the author, in praising the Corinthians, commends their concern for other believers, adding, "Day and night ye were anxious for the whole brotherhood, that the number of God's elect might be saved with mercy and a good conscience" (1 Clem. 2.4).

Because of the worthy example of the martyrs,* a great multitude was added to the number of the elect (1 Clem. 6.1). The author warns against causing others to sin, saying—reminiscent of Jesus—that it were better for a person not to have been born than for him to throw a stumbling block before one of the elect (1 Clem. 46.8). Praising God, the author affirms that God chose Jesus, and us through him to be a peculiar people (1 Clem. 58.2). The author appeals to the readers to draw near to God, the One who has made them an elect portion (eklogēs meros) for himself (1 Clem. 29.1).

In the introduction to his letter to the Ephesians, Ignatius* affirms that the Ephesians were predestined before the ages and elected through the true passion by the will of God (Ign. Eph. presc.). Likewise, in the introduction to the letter to the Trallians, Ignatius affirms that they are elect and worthy of God (Ign. Trall. presc.). Ignatius calls an individual named Agathopus "an elect man" (Ign. Phld. 11.1).

In the account of the martyrdom of Polycarp,* bishop of Smyrna, he is reported to have shown no ill effects when enveloped by flames and then pierced by a dagger. The onlookers expressed amazement that the elect, like Polycarp, were so different from unbelievers (Mart. Pol. 16.1). Those whom God saves are called his holy elect (Mart. Pol. 22.1).

In his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 100-65) writes, "But if the word of God foretells that some angels and men shall certainly be punished, it did so because it foreknew that they would be unchangeably [wicked], but not because God created them so. So if they repent,* all who wish for it can obtain mercy from God" ("Free-will in Men and Angels," chap. 141). Foreknowledge did not determine destiny.

Mathetes of Diognetus* (c. A.D. 130) includes a passage in which he ridicules the Jews who thought that circumcision* of the flesh* could be a proof of election (Diogn. 4.4).

The Shepherd of Hermas was probably composed between c. A.D. 90 and 150, possibly in stages. In his visions Hermas speaks of people as the elect of the Lord (Herm. Vis. 3.9.10; 4.2.5), his elect (e.g., Herm. Vis. 1.3.4), the elect of God (e.g., Herm. Vis. 2.1.3; 3.5.1) or simply the elect (e.g., Herm. Vis. 2.4.2). He sees that the elect of God will inhabit the age to come, "since those elected by God to eternal life will be spotless and pure" (Herm. Vis. 4.3.5). In the course of his vision the seer observes a tower surrounded by seven women. The explanation comes: the tower is supported by the women. The first woman is called Faith. "Through her the elect of God are saved" (Herm. Vis. 3.8.3). Salvation derives from repentance, for "if they will repent with all their heart, they will be enrolled in the Books of Life with the saints" (Herm. Vis. 1.3). With a severe warning it was revealed to Hermas that "the Lord has sworn by His glory, in regard to His elect, that if any one of them sin after a certain day which has been fixed, he shall not be saved. For the repentance of the righteous has limits" (Herm. Vis. 2.2.5). Clearly the concept of election departs from any rigid understanding of a fixed number that God has determined will be saved.

Barnabas (c. A.D. 100) refers to Christ as the elect one, the precious cornerstone (Barn. 6.2). In another section, after an extended appeal to obedience, the writer affirms that the Lord will judge the world and each person will receive "as he has done: if he is righteous, his righteousness will precede him; if he is wicked, the reward of wickedness is before him " He calls for faithfulness, and for his readers not to make the same mistake as the Jews before them who abandoned the Lord. The section concludes with a quotation from Matthew 20:16 introduced by "as it is written": "Many are called, but few are chosen" (Barn. 4.14).

Tatian (A.D. 110-72), the composer of the Diatessaron, a harmony of the Gospels, wrote in his Address to the Greeks 11. "Live to God, and by apprehending him lay aside your old nature. We were not created to die, but we die by our own fault. Our free will has destroyed us; we who were free have become slaves; we have been sold through sin. Nothing evil has been created by God; we ourselves have manifested wickedness; but we, who have manifested it, are able again to reject it." Free will to choose or reject God's provision determines one's eternal fate.

See also APOSTASY; CHRISTOLOGY; ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; GRACE; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Basinger and R. Basinger, eds., Predestination and Free Will (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1986); R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); E. Best, One Body in Christ (London: SPCK, 1955); D. A. Carson, Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); L. Coenen, "Elect, Choose," NIDNTT 1:536-43; J. Daane, The Freedom of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973); J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy: An Exegetical Examination of 1 Peter 2:4-10 (NovTSupp 12; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1966); R. Forster and V. P. Marston, God's Strategy in Human History (Wheaton, IL: Tyndale House, 1974); W. Grundmann, "δεῖ κτλ," TDNT 2:21-25; J. Jocz, A Theology of Election (London: SPCK, 1958); W. W. Klein, The New Chosen People: A Corporate View of Election (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); idem, "Paul's Use of kalein: A Proposal," JETS 27 (1984) 53-64; W. G. MacDonald, "The Biblical Doctrine of Election" in The Grace of God, the Will of Man, ed. C. Pinnock (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1988) 207-30; C. Pinnock, ed., The Grace of God, the Will of Man: A Case for Arminianism (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1988); A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, ed., The Ante-Nicene Fathers (10 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950-51 repr.); T. R. Schreiner and B. A. Ware, eds., The Grace of God, the Bondage of the Will (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995); R. Shank, Elect in the Son (Springfield, MO: Westcott, 1970); R. P. Shedd, Man in Community (London: Epworth, 1958); C. S. Storms, Chosen for Life: An Introductory Guide to the Doctrine of Divine Election (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987).

W. W. Klein

ELKESAITES. See JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT

The office of Roman emperor was significant for Jews in the land and those in the Diaspora, as well as for the emerging group we now know as Christians. The command to pray for emperors (1 Tim 2:1-2) is tacit recognition of the power that this ruler held over Christians.

1. A Survey of the Emperors
2. The Emperor Cult

1. A Survey of the Emperors.

The vicissitudes of imperial rule and their implications for Jews and Christians are highlighted in the following survey, which concludes with a statement on the significance of the emperor.

1.1. Year of the Four Emperors. The year following Nero's death was one of civil unrest, as four men were acclaimed as emperor and sought to establish uncontested rule. The players in this tumultuous year were Galba, Otho, Vitellius and Vespasian.

Galba was governor of Tarragonian Spain in A.D. 68, when Vindex, the governor of Aquitaine who was rebelling against Nero, asked him to become the next emperor. Galba acceded to the request, encouraged by some favorable signs (Suetonius Galba 10).

The governor of Lusitania, Nero's close friend Otho, soon joined Galba in the coalition against Nero. But Galba's army turned against him when he refused to pay a promised donative. Otho also was particularly upset, since Galba named someone else as his successor. Otho therefore arranged a plot among the Praetorians, who killed Galba in Rome on January 15, 69, and proclaimed Otho emperor.

Meanwhile in lower Germany Vitellius was acclaimed "Emperor!" by his troops on January 2, 69. Immediately receiving the support of the troops in Gaul, Britain and Spain, he headed toward Italy. After he had begun this campaign, news of Galba's death reached him. Before he had left Germany's borders, his men had already marched on Otho in northern Italy, where the latter committed suicide. Thus Vitellius marched on Rome as a triumphant conqueror.

In the East, however, the general Vespasian was also contemplating the imperial office. After years of receiving signs of being a future emperor, then receiving Josephus's prophecy and having a favorable result from consulting "the God of Carmel" (Suetonius Vespasian 5; Josephus J.W. 3.8.9 §399-403), Vespasian gathered legions to support him and began a civil war. In July of 69 the legions of Egypt and Judea swore allegiance to Vespasian, and he was in Egypt when he heard of the assassination of Vitellius that occurred on December 20 that year.

1.2. Vespasian. Supported as emperor by the Roman legions of Egypt, Syria and Judea, Titus Flavius Vespasian (A.D. 9-79) gained an upper hand when the armies of the Danube joined his cause in August 69. Vespasian was formally recognized as emperor by the Senate soon after Vitellius's death. His reign therefore is dated 69-79. His accession is significant in that it marks the rise of an unexpected family to hold imperial power and to begin the Flavian dynasty (Vespasian, Titus, Domitian). To support this rise to power, Vespasian announced certain portents that he thought heralded his accession. He repeatedly made clear that his sons would follow him as emperor, an idea of succession that was not necessarily accepted by everyone in the Senate.

During Vespasian's reign Jerusalem* fell to Rome. Viewed not as a minor battle in a corner of the empire, this victory was celebrated with the minting of coins bearing the phrase IUDAEA CAPTA ("Judea is captured"). Since there was no longer a temple* in Jerusalem to which Jews could contribute, Vespasian decreed that each Jew in the empire was to be taxed two denarii annually, to go toward rebuilding the temple of Capitoline Jupiter in Rome.

Though he took stiff and unpopular measures to increase revenue, Vespasian's rule was generally looked on by the Romans as a good one, not least since he restored the Roman peace, another accomplishment celebrated on Vespasian's coins. Tacitus writes that he was the first emperor who improved in character while emperor (Tacitus Hist. 1.50). Tacitus also describes how a hesitant Vespasian healed a blind man and a man with a paralyzed hand in Alexandria,* both of whom had been told by the god Serapis to seek Vespasian for healing (Tacitus Hist. 4.8; cf. Suetonius Vespasian 7). He is reported to have remarked on his deathbed: "Alas, I think I am becoming a god" (vae, puto deus fio—Suetonius Vespasian 23).

1.3. Titus. Titus Flavius Vespasianus (A.D. 39-81) took an active part in helping his father jockey for power during the year of the four emperors. Half a year after Vespasian was acclaimed emperor by the Senate, Titus captured Jerusalem and oversaw the destruction of the temple (August 70). While he was in Judea he fell in love with Berenice, the daughter of Agrippa I. When she and her brother, Agrippa II, traveled to Rome around 75, Titus lived with her and perhaps promised to marry her, but this promise was not fulfilled (Suetonius Titus 7).

During his short reign (79-81) Titus was popular for his friendly personality and his generous use of funds for the people of Rome. He spent money to allay the destruction caused by Vesuvius in 79, and in the next year he released funds to offset the effects of the plague and fire in Rome. He also finished the Colosseum and constructed the public baths that are named after him. As Titus lay dying prematurely (about age 42), he complained that he did not deserve to die, since only one sin bothered his conscience. After giving this description Suetonius goes on to wonder whether that sin might have been incest between Titus and his sister-in-law, Domitia Longina (Suetonius Titus 10). Jewish tradition interprets this unspecified sin as being Titus's entry into the holy of holies in 70, before the destruction of the temple (Sipre Deut 328; 'Abot R. Nat. B 7; b. Git 56b).

1.4. Domitian. Titus Flavius Domitianus (A.D. 51-96) was perhaps more unpopular than his brother, Titus, had been popular as emperor. He controlled the membership of the Senate and consulted the Senate only as a formality. Although his rule of the empire (81-96) was marked by efficiency and some good appointments, it also was marred by his personality. Suetonius tells us that in the beginning of his reign Domitian's virtues balanced his vices, but later this emperor changed his virtues into vices. His greed came from lack of funds and his cruelty from fear of assassination (Suetonius Domitian 3). Domitian's steps against Christians (see Persecution) were only a part of the generally pro-Roman, conservative morality he sought to enforce on the public. In 83 he sentenced three vestal virgins to be executed for immorality; in 90 he sentenced Cornelia, the chief vestal virgin, to be buried alive. He banished the philosophers from Italy twice (perhaps in 89 and 95). Suetonius tells us that Domitian levied the Jewish tax (see 1.2 above) very harshly (Suetonius Domitian 12.2). Instead of deifying him, as it had done with his brother and father, the Senate officially damned his memory and took legal action to remove his name from every monument or building. His death marked the end of the Flavian dynasty and the beginning of the era of the "five good emperors."

1.5. Nerva. The reign of Marcus Cocceius Nerva (A.D. 30?-98), chosen for his pro-Senate stance and peaceful demeanor, marks the start of a period in which the Senate's voice was heard and emperors were chosen for their ability rather than their popularity with the legions. Though they passed without scandal, Nerva's sixteen months of rule (96-98) were marred by his weak leadership, the lack of support from the army and direct opposition from the Praetorian Guard. He and his successor, Trajan, are thought to be the first emperors to use public funds for the support of poor children in Italian towns. (This marks the start of the alimenta system.) Nerva sought to distinguish himself from his predecessors by using moderation in the collection of the fiscus Judaicus. Coins minted during his short reign have the slogan fisci Judaici calumnia sublata ("malicious prosecution of the Jewish fund is removed"). It is likely that ethnic Jews who were not practicing their religion were now exempted from the tax. With this change Rome took a big step toward identifying Jews as a religious group rather than an ethnic people.

1.6. Trajan. Marcus Ulpius Traianus (A.D. 53-117) was adopted by Nerva in order to please the Praetorians and the armies of Rome, since the former had extensive military experience. But he nevertheless confirmed the Senate's privileges early in his reign, which is dated 98-117. He was a popular leader, and as the closing line of his letter to Pliny about the Christians illustrates, he was concerned to be tolerant (Pliny Ep. 10.97; see Persecution). Harried by two Dacian wars in Europe (101-2; 105-6), the Parthian war (113-17) and Jewish revolts in Cyrene, Egypt, Cyprus and Roman-held Mesopotamia (115-17), his reign was filled not only with enforcing the Roman peace internationally but also with building and welfare projects at home and abroad. His title Optimus seems well-earned.

1.7. Hadrian. Publius Aelius Hadrianus (A.D. 76-138), Spanish-born and appreciative of Greek culture and learning, represents an early step in an imperial succession that would see other foreign-born, non-Italian emperors. In his response to the question raised (c. 121-22) by the proconsul Silvanus Granianus, Hadrian affirmed Trajan's policy toward Christians (see Persecution).

For our purposes Hadrian is most notorious for building a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the Jerusalem temple and forbidding Jews to circumcise their male children (see Circumcision). The Second Jewish Revolt (also called Bar Kokhba, after its Jewish leader) resulted in 132-35. Christians in Judea did not side with the militant Jews in this uprising. The result was tragic persecution for the Jews and more lenient treatment of Christians. Though it was not the only cause of the separation of Christianity from its spiritual mother, this war certainly is a major factor (see Christianity and Judaism). Though it is difficult to conceive of anything as demoralizing as the loss of the temple that occurred in 70, Rome's conquest in this war was perhaps equally tragic, for Rome no longer recognized Judea; it became Syria Palaestina, no longer to be ruled by a local king as in the previous centuries but now under a consular legate with two legions to stifle any thought of questioning Rome's power.

In foreign policy Hadrian was more defensive than his predecessor had been. Hadrian's wall in England illustrates his strategy of choosing defensible borders and holding them. Hadrian is also known for touring the empire with his young male lover, Antinous. When the latter drowned in the Nile River in 130, he was immediately deified at Hadrian's insistence. This is the background to Justin's stinging attack on Antinous's deification (Apol. I 29). It has been suggested that Hadrian's homosexuality is in the background of 2 Peter 2:7 (cf. Jude 6-7, where the problem is human-angelic intercourse), but this cannot be proven. If so, it would only strengthen the obvious historical datum that as in the Judaisms* of the Hellenistic age, so in the early church: homosexuality was continuously regarded as immoral.

1.8. Antoninus Pius. Titus Aurelius Fulvus Boionius Antoninus (A.D. 86-161), known for his integrity and his firm belief in Rome's mission in the world, was given the title Pius ("devout one") by the Senate, with whom he had a harmonious relationship all during his reign (137-61). An Italian who believed in Rome's past and treasured this heritage, Antoninus may never have left Italy while he was emperor. Proconsul of Asia for three years (133-36), as emperor Antoninus kept his legates and officials in domestic and foreign posts in office for longer periods of time. This was part of a tendency to centralize government control and to encourage the development of the bureaucracy. Aelius Aristides's oration "To Rome" pictures the peaceful and beneficent Roman Empire under this emperor. While there were some foreign revolts during his tenure, Antoninus experienced nothing of the foreign threats that later emperors, including Marcus Aurelius, would.

1.9. Marcus Aurelius. Born Marcus Annius Verus (A.D. 121-80), this man was known better by his imperial name, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. His reign (161-80) marks the end of the era of the five good emperors. Conservative in Roman values and committed to Stoicism, this man was preoccupied with fighting wars to keep Rome's borders strong. There was instability in Mesopotamia, Syria, Egypt and Britain during his reign, but most familiar are the Roman battles north of the Danube, where Marcus Aurelius personally led his troops in battle and died. His letters to Fronto, written in Latin, still survive, but he is best known for his Meditations (Ta eis heauton), a sort of philosophical diary written in Greek. The latter work contains some veiled references to Christians (identified by C. R. Haines—1.6; 3.16.1; 7.68; 8.48; 8.51.2; 11.3), whom Marcus Aurelius persecuted. Though he was a conscientious ruler, his wars and public spending depleted the treasury, and the economic crises of the third century were not unrelated to trends already in motion during his reign.

1.10. The Significance of the Emperor. The Roman emperors, especially the five good emperors, were convinced that they were prime agents for the welfare of humanity (salus generis humani). Part of this responsibility involved maintaining moral and social order, as Paul notes in Romans 13:3-4. In addition, generosity (liberalitas) was an expected virtue for emperors. We might think Gaius Caligula's habit of throwing coins to his people from the top of the Basilica Iulia to be odd (Suetonius Caligula 37.1; Josephus Ant. 19.1.11 §71; Dio Cassius 59.25.5), but his practice of throwing out tokens for gifts (missilia; Suetonius Caligula 18.2) was followed by several other emperors (Suetonius Nero 11; Suetonius Domitian 4.5; Dio Cassius 61.18.1-2; 66.25.5; 67.4.4; 69.8.2). Titus's famous exclamation that he had wasted a day—upon realizing that he had given no favors to anyone that day—illustrates how seriously at least this emperor took the expectations of generosity that accompanied his office (Suetonius Titus 8).

The office included the weighty responsibility of hearing many petitions and being expected to answer them, as well as returning gifts received with even more bountiful favors. Sometimes emperors refused gifts from municipalities when they were not ready to reciprocate with favors valued at the expected fourfold or more of the embassy's gift to the emperor. Indeed, J. A. Overman thinks that Matthew's presentation of the magi bringing gifts to Jesus does not represent an act of pure worship*; he sees it rather as an embassy that expected a return favor.

In general the NT authors (except the author of Revelation) and probably most Christians living outside of direct persecution had more positive views of the emperors than do modern readers. The angel's words to Paul, "You must stand before Caesar!" (Acts 27:24), as well as the line from his conversion story that he would be stand before "kings of the sons of Israel" (Acts 9:15), illustrate the importance that monarchs had in the first-century person's mind. Romans 13:1-7, 1 Peter 2:13-14 and the famous "render to Caesar" logion (Mt 22:21; Mk 12:17; Lk 20:25; Gos. Thom. 100; Justin Apol. I 17.2) expect obedience* to the emperor. The NT also includes commands to pray for the emperor (1 Tim 2:1-2) and to honor him (1 Pet 2:17), commands that are predicated on God's establishment of emperors to office, even Nero (Rom 13:1—written c. 56-58).

2. The Emperor Cult.

In the East the worship of kings as divine beings had precedents in the practices of the Hittites and the Egyptians, whose rulers (including the Ptolemies) were worshiped as divine while they reigned. It is more difficult to detect an official cult for the living king in other kingdoms such as the neo-Babylonian, Assyrian and Persian. In the Persian case we know that Cyrus was deified after his death, and a continuous cult was established for him that lasted presumably even into the Principate, when Rome experienced the burgeoning of its own imperial cult. The material that follows is general in nature; investigators of the imperial cult in a given city or province must consult studies explicitly focused on those areas, since the evidence points to a significant variety in cult practice throughout the empire.

2.1. Roman Imperial Cult. In NT and second-century times the imperial cult was primarily of the latter type mentioned; that is, the deification of a deceased ruler and the establishment of a worship regimen to that newly acclaimed deity. In our time period the following rulers were deified after their deaths: Julius Caesar, Augustus (and later his wife Livia—renamed Julia Augusta), Claudius, Vespasian, Titus, Hadrian and Antoninus Pius. Though the apotheosis of Claudius was satirized by Seneca in his Apocolocyntosis ("The Pumpkinification"), it is inaccurate to say that the elite of society were skeptical of the imperial cult as an institution. It continued to be a part of Roman life that was seriously followed, even under Christian emperors.

One discernible change in the cult is that it moved from being a religious act to a political stamp of approval. In the first century or so, the Senate would decide to apotheosize an emperor after his funeral if a witness had seen the soul of the deceased emperor rise to heaven. Later evidence shows that the Senate's decision to deify someone could occur before the funeral, motivated presumably by the political sentiment toward the deceased emperor and pressure from the next emperor to deify his predecessor.

2.2. The Significance of the Imperial Cult. Besides official deification that occurred by an act of the Senate after an emperor's death, sacrifices* were already performed to the genius ("spirit") of living emperors. This practice often was demanded of Christians; refusal to perform such worship constituted legal grounds for the execution of Christians in some later periods of persecution.

Though there is no clear evidence that Christian emperors promoted the cult, they did allow it to continue. Constantine granted one city's wish to construct its own temple for the imperial cult and allowed the imperial cult games to continue, with only the stipulation that sacrifices be discontinued (ILS 705).

The NT is clearly against the imperial cult, though there is some intratestamental tension in picturing the emperor. Acts 12:20-23 illustrates how the ruler cult was used by people petitioning a monarch. Its description of the death of Herod Agrippa I also reveals a decidedly monotheistic disapproval of such cult worship. Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) is clearly against the imperial cult as well, with its caricatures of the cult (Rev 13:4-8, 12-17) and judgments* directly linked to one's involvement with the cult (Rev 14:9-12; 20:4). The specter of the imperial cult certainly makes Revelation's portraits of the emperor(s) the most negative among the NT books. The Roman emperors are pictured as evil beasts* (Rev 13; 17:3-12), and it is unimaginable that the author of Revelation could accept Romans 13:2, since Revelation describes the imperial establishment as directly hostile to God, far different from the picture in Paul's mind during the quiet years of Nero's early reign. Whatever a given author's perspective on the imperial system, however, they remain united in expectation for the enthronement of the coming King (see Exaltation) and can even use imperial language to describe him (Phil 2:9-11; Col 1:16-17; 2 Pet 1:11; Rev 11:15; 17:14; 19:6-8).

See also CIVIL AUTHORITY; PERSECUTION; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; REVELATION, BOOK OF; ROMAN EMPIRE, CHRISTIANS AND THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Béranger, Recherches sur l'aspect idéologique du principat (Basel: F. Reinhardt, 1953); H. C. Boren, Roman Society (2d ed.; Lexington, MA: D. C. Heath, 1992); G. F. Chestnut, "The Ruler and the Logos in Neopythagorean, Middle Platonic, and Late Stoic Political Philosophy," ANRW 17.2 (1978) 1310-32; R. Combès, Imperator (Paris: Presses universitaires de France, 1966); E. Faust, Pax Christ et Pax Caesaris (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993); J. R. Fears, "Rome: The Ideology of Imperial Power," Thought 55 (March 1980) 98-109; D. Fishwick, The Imperial Cult in the Latin West (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1987); E. R. Goodenough, "The Political Philosophy of Hellenistic Kingship," YCS 1 (1928) 55-102; M. Goodman, "Nerva, the Fiscus Judaicus and Jewish Identity," JRS 79 (1989) 40-44; R. M. Grant, Augustus to Constantine (New York: Harper & Row, 1970); C. R. Haines, ed., Marcus Aurelius (LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press; London: Heinemann, 1979 [1916]); F. Millar, The Emperor in the Roman World (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977); J. A. Overman, "Matthew's Parables and Roman Politics" in SBLSP (1995) 425-39; Oxford Classical Dictionary (2d ed.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1970) passim; B. Parsi, Désignation et investiture de l'empereur romain (Paris: Sirey, 1963); S. R. F. Price, "From Noble Funerals to Divine Cult" in Rituals of Royalty, ed. D. Cannadine and S. R. F. Price (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987) 56-105; idem, Rituals and Power (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); G. E. M. de Ste Croix, "Why Were the Early Christians Persecuted?" in Studies in An- cient Society, ed. M. I. Finley (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1974) 210-49; L. R. Taylor, The Divinity of the Roman Emperor (Middletown, CT: American Philological Association, 1931); K. Wengst, Pax Romana and the Peace of Jesus Christ (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987).

M. Reasoner

END TIMES. See ESCHATOLOGY.

ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE

Endurance is a characteristic mark of a Christian in the NT. The key Greek word that conveys this point is hypomenō or hypomonē. This word presumes that the Christian life garners opposition that must be met by spiritual resistance. The opposition may come from formal or informal persecution* or from the general difficulties of life. Although it is natural to view the suffering* this brings as a negative, the NT encourages Christians to contemplate the long-range blessing* of successfully overcoming hardship for Christ* and enduring to the end. Endurance is a virtue* needed for the Christian's transition from suffering to blessing.

A second word, makrothymeō or makrothymia, also encourages endurance as a characteristic mark of a Christian but in a different sense. This word, most often translated "patience," views endurance as a quality of personal relationships. It is not a response to opposition as much as a voluntary act of love* for difficult and irritating people. As opposed to becoming angry and upset with others, Christians who endure in this sense control themselves and are able to do so indefinitely.

Both hypomenō and makrothymeō describe Christians waiting for the return of Christ. Both qualities appear in lists of virtues, although makrothymia appears more often. However, makrothymia is used to describe God's attitude toward humanity, both in the NT and in the OT, but hypomenō is never used to refer to God.* Despite this fact, the word is used to pinpoint the quality of Christ that Christians can and should imitate in their own lives.

1. The Greek and Jewish Background
2. Acts, the General Epistles and Revelation
3. Early Church Fathers

1. The Greek and Jewish Background.

1.1. Suffering as God's Discipline. J. A. Sanders identifies Jeremiah as the hub in the Jewish understanding of hardship as a positive value within God's activity. Acquaintance with the idea that God expects his people to learn at least repentance* through hardship comes as early as Amos 4:6-11. However, it is in Jeremiah, beginning with Jeremiah 2:30, that the concept is established. There the people of Judah are told that their ancestors* failed to respond to God's correcting punishment (mûsar). The tenor of instruction that follows is that they must do so in order for a new covenant* relationship with God to occur (Jer 5:3; 6:8; 7:28; 30:14; 35:13). Other passages that reflect the concept but without elaboration include Isaiah 9:12; 42:25; 57:17; Ezekiel 16:27-28; 23:18-20; Amos 4:6-11; Zephaniah 3:2; Haggai 2:17; and Zechariah 1:6. On an individual, as opposed to a corporate national, basis the concept can be seen in Job 5:17; 13:10; 22:4; 33:19; 42:1-6; Psalm 6:2; 22:1-21; 38:2; 39:12; 51:9-10; 73:14; 94:12; 119:25-26; Proverbs 3:11-12; 15:10.

C. H. Talbert has distinguished between Jewish and Greco-Roman perspectives on suffering. Besides the obvious differences conditioned by a pagan, pantheistic concept of the divine and a personal, monotheistic concept, he perceives in Jewish writings the purpose for suffering to be correction of misdirection. Key texts cited in support include Deuteronomy 8:5; Proverbs 15:32; Malachi 3:3; Wisdom of Solomon 3:5-6; 11:9; Sirach 2:1-6; 4:17; 18:13; 2 Maccabees 6:12-17; 7:33; 10:4; Psalms of Solomon 13:7-10; 18:4-5; 2 Apoc. Bar. 13:10; Philo Congr. 160, 175; The Words of the Heavenly Lights III; 1QH 8; b. Sanh. 101a; b. Ber. 5a, b; Sipre 32.

In Greco-Roman literature the purpose of suffering, Talbert observes, focuses on strengthening and improving character. Chief support for this comes from Aeschylus (Agamemnon 177), Sophocles (Oedipus at Colonus 7), Herodotus (History 1.207), Plato (Rep. 380b), Dio Chrysostom (Or. 8), Seneca (On Providence 1.5; 2.5-6; 4.5-7) and Epictetus (Disc. 1.24.1-3; 3.10.7-8).

Talbert holds that the Jewish and Greco-Roman perspectives on suffering merge in 4 Maccabees 11:12, 20, 27; 16:24-25; 17:2, 11, 12, 18. He proceeds to show how both the Greco-Roman and Jewish concepts of suffering reside in James,* 1 Peter,* Hebrews* and Luke-Acts (see Acts).

1.2. Endurance in the Testament of Job. C. Haas traces the vocabulary of endurance in the Testament of Job, viewed by many scholars as the document behind the comments of James 5:11 rather than the biblical book of Job because of the former's more positive characterization of Job. From this work Haas recognizes endurance (hypomenō) to mean "to stand firm" (in battle; T. Job 4:6; 5:1). He further suggests that karteria means "stubbornness" or "toughness" (T. Job 4:10; 27:4) and that that patience (makrothymia) implies waiting for God's saving intervention (T. Job 24:1; 26:5).

2. Acts, the General Epistles and Revelation.

2.1. Mark of Christian Maturity. Endurance turns the cycle of Christian maturity (Jas 1:2-4). James* was possibly written in the early days of the church to Christians who had fled Jerusalem* because of vicious persecution following Stephen's* martyrdom* (Acts 8:1). The letter addresses the immaturity of Christians who face humiliation (Jas 2:5-8) and injustice (Jas 5:1-6) from nonbelievers as well as jealousy and enmity from fellow believers (Jas 4:1-3; 5:8-9).

From the outset (Jas 1:2-4) the letter calls on its readers to meet the variety of trials life offers not with uncertainty and failure (Jas 1:6-8), which seems to have characterized their experience thus far, but with confidence that stems from a growing, substantial faith* and trust in God who provides insight and success (Jas 1:5). James 1:2-4 teaches that anything which tests Christian faith requires determined endurance in order to pass the test and to gain maturity. This is a continuous cycle that builds from one success to the next. Perseverance and maturity from one trial prepares one for ever greater challenges to Christian faith that result in yet greater maturity as the Christian moves toward full potential or "complete maturity." Endurance is the key to this cycle of growth.

2.2. Mark of God's Blessing. Endurance pleases God and draws out his blessing. James 1:12, continuing under the banner of James 1:2-4 (repeating the three key words: "endure," "trial," "test"), makes "endurance under trial" the primary goal of the Christian. By enduring a lifetime of difficulty but remaining faithful, Christians demonstrate their love for God and receive his blessing. James calls this the "crown of life," perhaps having in mind a royal crown (Rev 4:4; 6:2; 12:1) but more likely a bay or an olive wreath for the victor in an athletic contest (1 Cor 9:25; 2 Tim 2:5). The metaphor indicates that God is watching and judging the performance of Christians. In any case the reward* is eternal life (Rev 2:10). James intends to motivate his readers beyond their immature failures toward a Christian life of endurance by reminding them of the reality of this eternal blessing. James 5:10-11 offers Job as one of numerous OT examples that provide proof that God indeed blesses those who endure life's difficulties.

Like James, Hebrews* is also written to a Christian community (heavily Jewish), probably in Rome,* that has withstood the hardship of persecution in the past. At the brink of a new wave of persecution, however, it seems the second generation of believers is faltering (Heb 12:4; 13:13-14). Waning confidence in their beliefs makes them susceptible not only to persecution but also to renegade doctrine (Heb 3:12-14; 10:35; 13:9). The writer of Hebrews endeavors to renew their confidence in the superiority of their faith and motivate them to endure these difficult days and to regain their boldness for Christ.

Like James 1:12, Hebrews 6:12 explains that God's eternal blessing is at stake when it emphasizes that such lifelong endurance, teamed with faith, enables believers "to inherit what has been promised." Hebrews 10:32-39 reminds its readers of the great sacrifices they have already made for their Christian faith and pleads with them not to turn back. In order to "receive what he has promised," the believer must not "shrink back." Hebrews 12:7-13 explains that the struggles of Christians, especially against sin, are part of God's fatherly discipline to make them holy* like God himself and that successful endurance will bring about his delight.

Like James 5:10-11, Hebrews 6:13-15 offers documentation of God's surety in the life of Abraham,* whose endurance enabled him to receive "what was promised." Hebrews 12:1 reminds Christians, following the great examples of faithfulness chronicled in Hebrews 11 (Moses* is said to endure: ekarterēsen, Heb 11:27), that they are not alone in this struggle. A host of others are cheering Christians on to endure successfully "the race marked out for us." Hope* in receiving God's promised blessing, as they have, should provide motivation to endure also.

2.3. Mark of Identity with Christ. The most pervasive concept of endurance in this literature views every vital facet of endurance to be embodied in the person and work of Christ. He is placed before Christians as the ultimate model and strength for a Christian's endurance.

Employing a stirring athletic metaphor (as does Jas 1:12), Hebrews 12:1-3 challenges its readers who contemplate quitting the Christian life under the pressure of persecution instead to renew the vigor of their convictions by listening to the cheering crowd ("cloud of witnesses") but mostly by looking ahead to the one who stands waiting and encouraging at the finish line. Having completed the rigorous course successfully, Christ now looks back, eager for Christian runners to lock onto his eyes and "run with perseverance" to complete the course. Christ is not only a model and encourager, as "author and perfecter of our faith," but also teams up with the believer to supply the additional spiritual resources required for endurance. The passage encourages its readers to do their part by stripping off any worldly impediments that weigh them down and by laying aside their own sin that trips them up.

In Hebrews 12:3 the readers are told to look to Jesus not only as the model for victory but also as a model of suffering. Sinful people, blind to his sinlessness, tortured him on the cross. He suffered physically and spiritually beyond anything the believer can imagine. Yet even death did not defeat him. So the believers, like Christ, must endure the hardship confronting them and not "become discouraged" and give up, if necessary even shedding their blood (Heb 12:4).

The believer's identification with Christ culminates in the joy* and blessing of Christ's enthronement to the right hand of God (Heb 12:2; see Exaltation). Blessing awaits Christians who endure as well.

First Peter* is written to Gentile* Christians (1 Pet 1:14, 18, 21; 2:11) in Asia Minor who are experiencing persecution in their social contexts, possibly around the time of Nero, who accused Christians of setting fire to Rome in A.D. 64. Distrusted by their neighbors because of their beliefs, Christians are being treated like criminals and outcasts in their own communities (1 Pet 4:12-19). They suffer specifically because they bear the name* of Christ (1 Pet 2:16). The letter attempts to dissipate their fears* (1 Pet 3:14) and lead them to trust God (1 Pet 4:19) no matter the level of suffering they must endure.

Like Hebrews, 1 Peter views identification with Christ as the crucial principle to motivate these suffering Christians to the highest planes of endurance. The key passage, 1 Peter 2:19-25, focuses on the problem of the Christians who are suffering unjustly. They are asked to contemplate the alternative: receiving punishment for just cause. Which is the preferable way for Christians to witness* to their misunderstanding neighbors as well as identify the Christian most closely with Christ? The passage elaborates the injustice yet the necessity of Christ's torture and death on the cross despite his sinlessness (see Death of Christ). Therefore identification with Christ is accomplished not by enduring a beating for wrongdoing but by suffering "for doing good" and enduring it (1 Pet 2:20). Christians must trust themselves to God's judgment and not allow human judgments to affect them.

1 John (see John, Letters of) seeks to sustain the loyalty of believers, probably in and around Ephesus, who are barraged by heretical (probably pre-gnostic; see Gnosis, Gnosticism), second-generation challenges to apostolic christology* concerning the real humanity of Christ and enticements to worldly practices (1 Jn 2:22; 4:2; 5:1, 5, 6). Substantial numbers of people have broken away from the orthodox church* and are soliciting many others to join them (1 Jn 2:19; 4:5). Suffering comes in the form of "believers" haranguing other believers, the former having been affected, says the epistle, by worldly ambitions. Those who endure the onslaught from the evil world* are called "overcomers" (from nikaō; 1 Jn 2:13, 14; 4:4; 5:4, 5) and can achieve this status only because of their faith in Christ.

Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), written to solidify the faith of believers faced with severe persecution, possibly from the government, clarifies "overcomer" as a term of identification with Christ when it uses the term both for Christians who endure (Rev 2:7, 11, 17, 26; 3:5, 12, 21; 11:7; 21:7) and for Christ himself persisting against the evil of the world (Rev 5:5; 6:2; 12:11; 17:14; also Jn 16:33). Revelation 3:21 sets out this identification when it states that the one who "overcomes," like the one who "overcame," will receiving the blessing of a throne.

2.4. Mark of the True Church. John opens Revelation by presenting himself as representing the church in the suffering he has endured on Patmos as a result of preaching the Word of God and sharing his testimony of Jesus Christ (Rev 1:9). The letters to the seven churches that soon follow proceed to evaluate these churches, among other criteria, as to whether they have endured persecution successfully. He compliments Ephesus, Thyatira and Philadelphia for their endurance (Rev 2:2, 3, 19; 3:10) and assumes that idea with regard to Smyrna and Pergamum (Rev 2:10; 2:13). For Sardis and Laodicea the compliment notably is lacking.

2.5. Mark of Martyrdom. Martyrdom for those who endure extends from their identification with Christ. His suffering and endurance led to death and so it could for enduring Christians (Heb 12:4; 1 Pet 2:24; 3:18). The emergence of the beast out of the sea and the beast out of the earth in Revelation signal the call for the ultimate choice for Christians: remain true to the Lamb* or worship the beast.* For the "saints" to endure (Rev 13:9-10; 14:12-13) could well mean death, or martyrdom. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on."

2.6. Mark of Christian Virtue. In 2 Peter 1:6 endurance (hypomonē) appears between self-control and godliness in a list of Christian virtues. It is synonymous here with patience (makrothymia), which is much more common in these lists, especially in Paul's letters (2 Cor 6:4; Gal 5:2; Eph 4:2; Col 3:12; 2 Tim 3:10). In this sense the idea has to do with controlling anger toward others out of love for them (1 Cor 13:4). Patient endurance, among other Christian virtues, reflects the nature of God renewing the Christian into his own character (1 Pet 1:3-4).

2.7. Mark of God's Character. Since patient endurance in the Christian reflects the nature of God, it stands to reason that God's own character is said to exemplify this trait. 2 Peter,* which defends God's character from the attack of second-generation teachers who mock God's promise* that he will return to judge and condemn this sinful world, extols the enduring patience of God (2 Pet 3:9, 15) to explain why God might seem "slow in keeping his promise" to come in judgment upon humanity. God's patient endurance provides for many more people the opportunity for salvation.* This is consistent with Paul's use of "endurance" (makrothymia) in Romans 2:4 and Romans 9:22. God's long-suffering nature toward Israel* and humanity is a major OT theme.

2.8. Mark of Expecting the Lord's Return. Enduring patience is not only a characteristic of God concerning his coming in judgment. It also is to characterize Christians awaiting the Lord's coming. The beleaguered Christians who are addressed in James long for the Lord* to come soon to relieve them from their situation (Jas 5:1-6). James 5:7-8 encourages them to wait patiently (makrothymeō) for the Lord's return (probably meaning Christ's), being as convinced of its coming as the farmer who relies on the certainty of changing seasons. In Hebrews endurance is also in the context of preparing for the approaching day of the Lord (Heb 10:25; see Day of the Lord).

3. Early Church Fathers.

3.1. Continuity. For the most part the vocabulary of endurance lined out in Acts, the General Epistles, Revelation and in the NT as a whole remains unchanged in the writings of the apostolic fathers.* Both patience (makrothymia) and endurance (hypomenē) continue as synonyms for putting up with the irritations of others and appear on numerous lists of positive Christian traits, sometimes together (Barn. 2.2; Ign. Smyrn. 12.2; Ign. Pol. 6.2; Ign. Eph. 3.1), sometimes separately (Barn. 20.2; Herm. Man. 5.1.1-2; 8:9-10; Did. 3.8; 5.2; Pol. Phil. 9.1; 13.2; Herm. Sim. 8.7.6; Herm. Vis. 1.2.3; 1 Clem. 49.5). According to Hermas Mandate 5.1.6, anger cannot be "mingled" with patience without patience being "polluted."

Endurance typifies identification with the sufferings of Christ (Ign. Smyrn. 4.2; Barn. 5.1-12). Enduring torments is the mark of the true church (2 Clem. 16.7; Herm. Vis. 2.2.7). Endurance is associated with waiting for the Lord's return (1 Clem. 35.3).

3.2. Martyrdom, Completion and Miscellaneous Meanings. Association of endurance with martyrdom strengthens in works of the early church fathers. Both Peter and Paul are noted as enduring to the point of suffering martyrdom (1 Clem. 5.5, 7), as are Ignatius,* Zosimus and Rufus (Pol. Phil. 9.1). Polycarp* rejects being nailed to his funeral pyre, contending that God who "gives me strength to endure the fire" will also keep him from "moving in the pile" (Mart. Pol. 13.3). The Martyrdom of Polycarp 2 stresses that "all the martyrdoms" must be admired for the awful tortures they "endured": wild beasts, beds of spikes, scourgings that exposed veins and arteries (also Diogn. 10.8).

Endurance continues to be a mark of God's blessing (Ign. Magn. 1.3; 9.2; Ign. Pol. 3.1; Diogn. 5.5; 2 Clem. 11.5; Mart. Pol. 2.3; Pol. Phil. 8.2). However, reward does not hinge necessarily on enduring suffering. It may be completion of life with its various hardships without relinquishing Christian faith (Pol. Phil. 1.2) or baptism* (Ign. Pol. 6.2). Ignatius's Letter to the Smyrneans 9.2 is typical: "May God recompense you for whose sake you endure all things."

The role of endurance in spiritual maturity does not seem to continue past the epistle of James. Patience (makrothymia) remains a characteristic of God (Herm. Man. 5.2.3; Herm. Sim. 8.11; 1 Clem. 19.3; Barn. 3.6; Diogn. 8.7; 9.2). Exhibited in a person, it is a mark of the indwelling Holy Spirit* (Herm. Man. 5.1.1-2). However, "endurance" (hypomonē) is used once in reference to God, but that reference is negative: Barnabas 2.5 says God cannot endure new moons and sabbaths.*

See also FAITH; HOPE; MARTYRDOM; PERSECUTION; SUFFERING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. R. Denton, "Hope and Perseverance," SJT 34 (1981) 313-20; U. Falkenroth and C. Brown, "Patience," NIDNTT 3:765-76; C. Haas, "Job's Perseverance in the Testament of Job" in Studies in the Testament of Job, ed. M. A. Knibb and P. W. van der Horst (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989); F. Hauch, "Ὑπομένω," TDNT 4:582-88; D. Hill, "On Suffering and Baptism in 1 Peter," NovT 18 (1976) 181-89; D. Johnson, "Fire in God's House: Imagery from Malachi in Peter's Theology of Suffering (1 Pet 4:12-19)," JETS 29 (1986) 285-94; A. R. C. Leaney, "Eschatological Significance of Human Suffering in the Old Testament and the Dead Sea Scrolls," SJT 16 (1963) 286-96; S. McKnight, "The Warning Passages of Hebrews: A Formal Analysis and Theological Conclusions," TJ 13 (1992) 21-59; I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God (Minneapolis: Bethany House, 1975); idem, "The Problem of Apostasy in the New Testament" in Jesus the Savior: Studies in New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990) 306-24; T. Oberholtzer, "The Warning Passages in Hebrews," BSac 145 (1988) 83-97, 319-28, 410-19; BSac 146 (1989) 67-75; T. Osborne, "Guidelines for Christian Suffering: A Source-Critical and Theological Study of 1 Peter 2:21-25," Bib 64 (1983) 381-408; R. Peterson, "The Perseverance of the Saints: A Theological Exegesis of Four Key New Testament Passages," Presbyterion 17 (1991) 95-112; J. E. Rosscup, "The Overcomer of the Apocalypse," GTJ 3 (1982) 261-86; J. A. Sanders, Suffering as Divine Discipline in the Old Testament and Post-Biblical Judaism (Rochester, NY: Colgate Rochester Divinity School, 1955); J. P. M. Sweet, "Maintaining the Testimony of Jesus: The Suffering of Christians in the Revelation of John" in Suffering and Martyrdom in the New Testament, ed. W. Horburg and B. McNeil (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981) 101-17; C. H. Talbert, Learning Through Suffering: The Educational Value of Suffering in the New Testament and Its Milieu (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); J. Wolmarans, "Making Sense out of Suffering: James 1:2-4," Hervormde Teologiese Studies 47 (1991) 1109-21. W. R. Baker

ENTHRONEMENT. See EXALTATION, ENTHRONEMENT.

EPHESUS. See CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY.

EPISTLES. See LETTER, LETTER FORM.

ESAU. See ANCESTORS.

ESCHATOLOGY

In order to understand NT theology it is necessary to grasp how the NT authors viewed eschatology, or the "end times" (see Marshall 1978 "Slippery Words"). For them the end times were not a period coming only at the final phase of history. This can be illustrated by the phrase "latter days" (or similar expressions), which occurs numerous times in the NT and rarely refers exclusively to the end of history as we think of it. Without exception it is used to describe the end times as beginning in the events associated with the life, death and resurrection* of Jesus Christ* (see Death of Christ).

1. Background
2. Eschatology of Acts, Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation
3. Special Problems of Eschatology in Revelation
4. Eschatology of the Apostolic Fathers

1. Background.

1.1. Eschatology of the Old Testament. NT phrases such as "latter days" allude to or echo phrases in the OT, where this wording appears in prophetic contexts referring to a future series of events: (1) Israel* will undergo tribulation consisting of exile (Jer 23:20; cf. Jer 30:24), subsequent oppression (Ezek 38:14-17), persecution* (Dan 10:14; 11:27—12:10), false teaching, deception and apostasy* (Dan 10:14ff.; 11:27-35). (2) After the tribulation Israel will seek the Lord (Hos 3:4-5) and will be delivered (Ezek 38:14-16; Dan 10:14; 12:1-13) while their enemies will be judged (Ezek 38:14-16; Dan 10:14; 11:40-45; 12:2). (3) This deliverance and judgment* will occur because a leader (Messiah) from Israel will finally conquer all of its Gentile* enemies (Gen 49:1, 8-12; Num 24:14-19; Is 2:2-4; Mic 4:1-3; Dan 2:28-45; 10:14—12:10). (4) The saints of Israel will be raised from the dead (Dan 12:2). (5) God will establish a new covenant* with Israel (cf. Jer 31:31-34 with Jer 30:24). (6) God will establish a kingdom on the earth and rule over it (Is 2:2-4; Dan 2:28-45; Mic 4:1-3) together with a Davidic king (Hos 3:4-5). (7) Some of Israel's Gentile enemies will experience deliverance during these eschatological days (Jer 47:48; 49:39; cf. Is 19:19-25).

The OT does not always employ the technical terminology of "latter days" when it addresses eschatological themes. For example, Isaiah's prophecy of the new creation* is overtly eschatological, but no eschatological formula introduces the prophecy (cf. Is 65:17; 66:22). Joel's prophecy of the Holy Spirit* is introduced by "after this" (for further discussion of OT eschatology, see Pryor, Gowan).

1.2. Eschatology of Judaism. The writings of intertestamental Judaism* express a hope in and an expectation of God's bringing history to consummation through a final, great tribulation (on which see Allison, 5-25), followed by judgment* of the wicked and salvation* of the faithful. Jewish apocalyptic* literature usually views the end as imminent, though there are examples of something approaching an "inaugurated eschatology" (see Lincoln 1981, 177-78). The notion that the latter days have begun to be fulfilled on earth is found in the Dead Sea Scrolls of Qumran* (see Carmignac; for further discussion of eschatology in postbiblical Jewish literature, see Howard).

1.3. Eschatology of the Gospels and Paul. The NT repeatedly uses the phrase "latter days" precisely as it is found in the OT prophecies. The meaning of the phrase is identical to that of the OT except that in the NT the end days are seen as beginning their fulfillment in Christ's first coming. All that the OT spoke of occurring in the end times has begun in the first century and continues until the final coming of Christ. The OT expectations of the great tribulation,* God's domination of the Gentiles, deliverance of Israel from oppressors, Israel's resurrection, the new covenant, the new creation and the establishment of God's kingdom (see Kingdom of God) have been set in motion by Christ's death and resurrection and in the emergence of the Christian church.* Christ's first coming marked the beginning of his messianic reign, which was underscored by the presence of the Holy Spirit in his ministry (e.g., at his baptism* [Mt 3:13-17] and in the casting out of demons [Mt 12:22-32]). The resurrection marked a heightened level of Jesus' inaugurated reign. Persecution of Jesus and his followers indicated the beginning of the final tribulation. What the OT did not foresee so clearly was that the kingdom and the tribulation could coexist simultaneously (e.g., Rev 1:6-9). Thus for the NT the latter days do not take place only at a point in the future but occur throughout the church age.

Paul says that the OT was written to instruct Christians about how to live in the end times, since upon them "the ends of the ages have come" (1 Cor 10:11). He refers to Jesus' birth as occurring "when the fullness of the time came" in fulfillment of the messianic prophecies (Gal 4:4). Likewise "the fullness of the times" alludes to when believers were delivered from Satan* and sin through Christ's death and resurrection (Eph 1:7-10; 1:20—2:6), which commenced his own rule over the created order (Eph 1:19-23). Christ's death and resurrection launched the beginning of the latter-day new creation prophesied by Isaiah (cf. 2 Cor 5:17 with Is 43; 65—66). The end-time prophecies of Israel's restoration from exile begin to find fulfillment in Christ's, the true Israel's, resurrection and in believers who identify by faith with him (e.g., 2 Cor 6:16-18; see Beale 1989). Tribulation in the form of false teaching* is also one of the signs that the latter days had arrived (1 Tim 4; 2 Tim 3:1-9). Since 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy speak of the Ephesian church as already experiencing this tribulation of deceptive teaching and apostasy* (see 1 Tim 1:3-4, 6, 7, 19-20; 4:7; 5:13-15; 6:20-21; 2 Tim 1:15; 2:16-19; 2:25-26; 3:2-9), it is evident that a distant, future time is not in view.

Other NT texts speak of the future consummation of the latter days. Many eschatological events will not be fulfilled until Christ returns, including the bodily resurrection of all people, the destruction of the present cosmos, the creation of a new heavens and earth, and the final judgment.

Until this consummation, Christ's followers experience only a part of the eschatological blessings* that will be fulfilled in the new heavens and earth. This is the already/not yet dimension of NT eschatology. O. Cullmann has described this tension by using the World War II analogy of D-day and V-Day. Jesus' first coming (the "already") is D-Day, since it marks the battle in which Satan* is decisively defeated. The Second Coming of Christ is V-Day, when Jesus' enemies will surrender and bow down to him (see Parousia). (See Moule 1964; Lincoln 1981, 181-84, on how NT authors developed aspects of eschatological thought in response to a variety of situations. For further discussion of already/not yet, see DJG, Eschatology; DPL, Eschatology. See also Allison; Caird 1980, 241-71; Hoekema; König; Ladd; Pate; Vos.)

2. Eschatology of Acts, Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation.

The eschatological pattern found in the Gospels and Paul is also found in the rest of the NT literature. The discussion of eschatology in this literature may be organized under the headings of "past and present" (the already) and "future" (the not yet).

2.1. Acts.

2.1.1. Past and Present. In Acts 2:17, the first place the words "last days" appear in the canonically ordered NT literature, Peter understands that the tongues* being spoken at Pentecost* begin to fulfill Joel's prophecy that a day would come when God's Spirit would gift not merely prophets,* priests* and kings but all of God's people (Acts 2:15-17; cf. Joel 2:28). The resurrection marked the beginning of Jesus' messianic reign, and the giving of the Holy Spirit* signaled the inauguration of his rule through the church (Acts 1:6-8; 2:1-43). Subsequent outpourings of the Spirit mark significant transitional points in Acts,* where the gospel is extended to new regions or ethnic groups. These later outpourings demonstrate Christ's exalted reign and that Gentiles as well as Jews are included by their faith* as subjects in the Messiah's new kingdom. This is implied in Acts 2, where we read that Jews representing all parts of the known Gentile world were present at Pentecost. The clearest example of a subsequent outpouring of the Spirit modeled on Pentecost is Acts 10:34-47, where the Roman soldier Cornelius* and his Gentile associates believed in Christ.

Some scholars have identified in Acts* a de-eschatologizing perspective in which a history of the church is substituted for a near expectation of the end (see, e.g., Sabourin). But Luke sees the outpouring of the Spirit as a further stage of eschatological fulfillment, which makes the time of the church an eschatological era (for both sides of the debate see Gaventa; on the purported delay of the end, see Parousia).

In the OT (see 1.1 above) and Judaism, as well as elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Rom 1:3-4, 1 Tim 3:16; see Vos 1980), the Spirit was linked with the hope of resurrection life. As a consequence of Jesus' resurrection, the eschatological center of gravity had shifted from Jesus' ministry* on earth to his reign in heaven.* The notion that Jesus had been raised from the dead was charged with eschatological significance, with roots in the OT (Is 25:7-8; 26:18-19; Ezek 37:1-14; Dan 12:1-2) and postbiblical Judaism (e.g., 2 Macc 7:9, 14; 1QH 11.12; 1 Enoch 51:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 30:1-3; 50:1-4; T. Judah 25:1; Adam and Eve [Apoc.] 41:3). In Acts other references to Jesus' resurrection, though they are not formally linked with eschatological terminology (as in Acts 2), are still eschatological in nature, especially since they are often associated with OT hopes and promises (see Acts 1:3-11, 22; 3:15, 26; 4:2, 10, 33; 5:30-31; 7:55-56; 9:3-6; 10:40-41; 13:30-37; 17:31-32; 22:6-11; 25:19; 26:6-18, 22-23). Likewise the resurrection of some Christians was probably viewed as the corollary of Jesus' eschatological resurrection (Acts 9:37-41; 20:9-12; cf. Mt 27:52-53).

The fulfillment of other latter-day OT prophecies were indications that the last times had begun (Acts 3:18, 22-26; 4:25-28; 13:27-29, 46-48; 15:14-18; 26:22-23). Possibly even the mention of entering the kingdom of God after enduring tribulation is an allusion not merely to an event at the end of history but also to the inaugurated messianic, heavenly realm that one enters at death (Acts 14:22; cf. Stephen's* vision,* just prior to his death, of Christ as the presently reigning "Son of Man" [Acts 7:55-56]).

The idea of a new creation is arguably the best encompassing term for the eschatology of Acts and the NT as a whole, for it ties together all the various thematic strands linked to NT eschatology. For example, the resurrection is an act of new creation (the creation of new life) that is brought about by the life-giving agency of the Spirit. Even the healings* in Acts (Acts 3:1-16; 5:16; 9:33-34; 14:8-11; 19:11-12) and in the Gospels are best understood within the larger redemptive framework of new creation wherein the curses of the fallen creation begin to be reversed.

2.1.2. Future. In Acts 1:6 the disciples ask the resurrected Jesus if it is "at this time that you are restoring the kingdom to Israel." Jesus replies that "It is not for you to know times or epochs which the Father has fixed by his own authority" (Acts 1:7). He then promises (Acts 1:8) that the Spirit will come upon them and will empower them to witness.* Some commentators understand Acts 1:7-8 to mean that there will be an indefinite delay of the coming of Israel's restored kingdom in its consummated form but that during the interim period the Spirit will maintain the witness of Jesus' followers (see Buzzard). Accordingly, the restoration of the kingdom is equated with the time of Jesus' second coming to conclude history (Acts 1:11). From this point of view, Acts 3:19-21 continues the theme of the future kingdom, with the "times of refreshing" and the "times of restoration of all things" occurring when Jesus returns to conclude history, apparently in the same way as he left at the ascension* (Acts 1:11).

Another interpretation of Acts 1:6-8 is plausible, if not more probable. In Acts 1:7-8 Jesus responds to three misunderstandings inherent in the apostles' question (Acts 1:6). First, Acts 1:7 is a response to their mistaken assumption that it was proper for them to know the precise time (cf. 1 Thess 5:1-3) when the kingdom would be restored to Israel. Such knowledge is reserved for the Father alone.

Second, Acts 1:8 appears to be a response to an implicit assumption that future stages of the kingdom would be exclusively physical in expression. Although some interpreters understand Acts 1:8 to refer to a parenthetical period characterized by the Spirit, rather than a part of the messianic kingdom, it is more likely that the verse asserts that a future form of the kingdom is to be "spiritual" in nature ("you will receive power [of the kingdom] when the Holy Spirit has come"). This promise* begins its fulfillment at Pentecost, which Peter understands to be an escalation of the "latter days" inaugurated when Jesus received the Spirit at his baptism. In the OT and Judaism "the latter days" was the time of the expected outpouring of God's Spirit; the OT inextricably links the "latter days" with the prophesied kingdom, so that Peter's reference to the "latter days" in Acts 2:17 alludes to the fulfillment of the foreseen kingdom (e.g., see the OT references in 1.1 above).

Third, Acts 1:8 appears to be a reply to an apparent ethnocentric presupposition expressed by the disciples: that the nature of the kingdom would be Israelite. Jesus' reply is that the kingdom would encompass subjects who lived even "unto to the end of the earth" (in partial allusion to Is 49:6; cf. Acts 13:47, which refers to the conclusion of Acts 1:8 and where the OT reference is explicit). Hence Acts 1:8 affirms an ongoing, progressive and nonconsummative fulfillment of the prophecy of the OT kingdom, which had already begun to be established in Jesus' earthly ministry (see Hill, though he denies that Luke has an inaugurated eschatological perspective; see Bruce for a balanced view of Acts 1:6-8 and of eschatology in Acts).

Acts 3:20-21 refers to a future consummation when Christ comes and achieves "the restoration of all things." Acts 3:19, however, may include an already and not yet notion, especially because of its placement directly following an assertion that God had already fulfilled the OT prophecy of Christ's suffering: "Repent therefore and return, that your sins may be wiped away, in order that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord" (which may be parallel to Acts 2:38: "Repent, and . . . be baptized . . . for the forgiveness of your sins, and you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit"). Likewise Acts 3:22-26 refers to beginning fulfillments of OT messianic prophecy (for further argument in support of this analysis, see Kurz and sources cited; see also Bayer). Even the reference "until the times of restoration of all things" in Acts 3:21 has an already and not yet element, since the restoration had likely begun with Jesus' coming, resurrection and giving of the Spirit (Bayer).

An incontestably future reference to judgment is found in Acts 17:30-31, where Paul affirms that people should repent in the present because God has determined a specific day at the end of history when "he will judge the world in righteousness" through Jesus Christ (also Acts 24:25).

Paul also affirms a "hope of the promise" of the final resurrection for the nation Israel in Acts 26:6-7. Yet even this has been inaugurated when Christ, the true Israel, was resurrected from the dead (as is clear from Acts 13:32-33; 23:6-7; 26:22-24). (On futurist aspects of eschatology in Acts see Nielsen; on the already and not yet, see Cadbury; Carroll, 121-67; Giles; Francis; Franklin; Gaventa; Smith; cf. also Mattill.)

2.2. Hebrews.

2.2.1. Past and Present. In the opening sentence of Hebrews* we read that God "in these last days has spoken to us in his son, whom he appointed heir of all things" (Heb 1:2). As with the Gospels, Acts and Paul, Christ's first coming commences the beginning of the end times. In this vein Hebrews 1:5-13 cites OT texts primarily concerning the messianic son's* kingship which have begun their fulfillment in Jesus' first advent (se also Heb 5:5; 8:1; 10:12-13; 12:2). Likewise the ideal Adam's reign as "the Son of Man" portrayed in Psalm 8, never completely realized in the OT period, is applied to Christ as the one who has started to fill the shoes of this exemplary human figure (Heb 2:6-9). Christ has done what the first Adam and Israel, the corporate Adam, failed to achieve (for the notion of Israel as a corporate Adam, see Wright, 21-26). In this sense of Christ's "fulfillment" of end-time prophecy, he is a "son" who was "made [eschatologically] complete" (teleioō) and who has begun to lead and will finish leading his people to their eschatologically completed salvation (see also Heb 2:10; 5:8-9, 14; 6:1; 7:11, 19, 28; 9:9; 10:1, 14; 11:40; 12:2; see, e.g., Silva).

The work of Christ is viewed as eschatological fulfillment. Christ has decisively defeated the power of the devil and of death (Heb 2:14), a reality not expected to occur until the eschatological new creation. And Christ's mission "to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" is an event taking place at the "consummation of the ages" (Heb 9:26; cf. Heb 10:10, 12, 14). Thus Jeremiah's prophecy of a new covenant is beginning to be fulfilled, a point underscored as Hebrews quotes Jeremiah 31:31-34 with the concluding words, "I will be merciful to their iniquities, and their sin I will remember no more" (Heb 8:8-12; cf. Heb 10:16-17). The eschatological tone of Hebrews 9:26 is true to the setting of Jeremiah's prophecy of a new covenant, which was inextricably linked to latter-day events (cf. Jer. 30:24; 31:31, 33). Finally, the author of Hebrews mentions another hallmark of the arrival of the last age, the resurrection of Christ (Heb 13:20).

Jesus' followers have also "tasted the powers of the age to come" (Heb 6:5), among which is "the heavenly gift . . . of the Holy Spirit" (Heb 6:4; cf. Ellingworth, 320). This is the closest the NT comes to formally identifying the Holy Spirit as a mark of the inbreaking eschatological age (though cf. Rom 8:23; 2 Cor 2:20-22; Eph 1:13-14). The Christians' hope of a future, consummated salvation is rooted in Christ's having already begun to realize that hope (Heb 6:17-20; see Robinson). Christians have already "come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly city" (the new Jerusalem; cf. Heb 12:22); the latter-day city of God has invisibly invaded the present age so that saints might participate in its life. In a related image, Hebrews speaks of Christ's priestly work of sacrificing himself as inaugurating the eschatological temple* (Heb 9:8, 23; see Hurst). Those who spurn Christ's "once for all" sacrifice at the "consummation of the ages" (Heb 9:26) are not able to be "renewed to repentance," since no other sacrifice will be offered other than the one they have despised (Heb 6:4-6; 10:26-29; see Carlston).

The two-dimensional nature of Hebrews's eschatology (though it is found elsewhere in the NT, e.g. Ephesians) is striking: a vertical, or spatial, dimension is developed in addition to a horizontal, or temporal, dimension. The preceding discussion has focused on the temporal aspect. Yet from a spatial perspective, the end-time temple, for example, is viewed both as a reality in present time and as having a spatial dimension other than that of the material, earthly dimension (Heb 9:1—10:26).

2.2.2. Future. In Hebrews 3—4 there are repeated references to a "rest" that believers may "enter." Interpreters debate whether this "rest" has been inaugurated with Christ's first coming (so Barrett, 366-73; Lincoln 1982) or will transpire at the final consummation (Gaffin). Both views are supported by viable arguments, though the futuristic view is perhaps more likely.

The emphasis throughout Hebrews 3—4, as well as the entire epistle, is upon persevering until the end when the final reward is to be received (Heb 3:6, 14). Furthermore, the "rest" is referred to as "a promise" that "remains," one that has not yet been fulfilled (Heb 4:1, 6, 9). While it is true that the "rest" is spoken of as being present (Heb 4:3) and even past (Heb 4:10), these expressions are best understood as being spoken from a future vantage point (e.g., Heb 4:10 can be understood in the sense of a Hebrew prophetic perfect, referring to the certainty of a future event by speaking of it as if it had already happened). The dominant theme of Hebrews 3—4 is that, in contrast with Israel's failure to enter the "rest" of the promised land after its wilderness sojourn, the Hebrew Christians are exhorted to persevere in their earthly sojourn so that they will enter the "rest" of the "heavenly country" (Heb 11:16), which the land of Canaan typologically foreshadowed. Only then will the intended sabbath rest of the new creation be enjoyed (see Land).

The coming judgment of unbelievers and apostates at the end of the age is a repeated theme in Hebrews (Heb 6:2; 9:27), especially as a warning and an encouragement to persevere (Heb 10:27-31, 36-38; 12:25-29; 13:4; cf. Toussaint). Those who heed the warnings of judgment and the exhortations to persevere will receive at the consummation of history full salvation (Heb 9:28), their reward* (Heb 10:35; 11:26) and the complete inheritance that was promised (Heb 6:11-12, 17-18; 9:15; 10:23, 34-35; 11:39). The inheritance of the promised land of the new earth is the author's irreducible summary of what true believers will receive at the eschaton (Heb 11:9-16; 13:14). God will raise them from the dead in order that they might participate in the inheritance (Heb 11:35; cf. Heb 6:20). This final inheritance will be indestructible (Heb 12:27-28) and eternal. There God's presence can be more fully experienced (cf. Heb 12:14). The readers should not be lax about these exhortations because the final "day" is "near" (Heb 10:25; for further discussion see Barrett, MacRae, Woods).

2.3. General Epistles.

2.3.1. Past and Present. James 1:18 speaks of the incipient emergence of the new creation. Later, James* alludes to the true nature of the time in which his audience is living as he chastises people for living in ungodly ways and not redeeming opportunities for doing righteousness: "It is in the last days that you have stored up your treasure" (Jas 5:3). Because it is already the last period of history, the final "coming of the Lord" and the time of judgment for the unrighteous is imminent (cf. Jas 5:7-9; on the problem of imminence, see Parousia).

First Peter* commences by mentioning that the latter-day new creation of believers has taken place: God has "caused us to be born again, unto a living hope, by means of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." The new birth and consequent "living hope" are linked to Christ's resurrection. This notion is developed further in 1 Peter 1:20-21, where Christ's resurrection is portrayed as part of "the end of the times." Through the resurrected Christ the readers have become believers possessing hope.* Through this same resurrection Jesus has been exalted to God's right hand to begin ruling (1 Pet 3:18-19, 21-22). The latter-day Spirit is the agent who brings about the resurrection of Christ (1 Pet 3:18) as well as the resurrection life of his followers (1 Pet 4:6) and their ongoing conduct in that life (1 Pet 1:2). Like the author of Hebrews, Peter speaks of Christ's death for sins as "once for all" (1 Pet 3:18), an expression that evokes the turning of the ages. Not only this, but the final judgment has been set in motion with the divinely ordained sufferings* that serve to test the faith of the Christian community (1 Pet 4:12-19).

Second Peter* makes the most far-reaching reference to Christ's kingship by observing that it commenced at the beginning of his earthly ministry, when he was baptized (2 Pet 1:16-17). Christ and the apostles* prophesied that false teachers would infiltrate the church in "the last days" (2 Pet 3:3; Jude has "last time"). Both 2 Peter and Jude* contend that this expected latter-day tribulation of apostate teaching has come to expression through the appearance of false teachers who are attempting to pervert the truth* in the Christian community (cf. 2 Pet. 3:2-3 with 2 Pet 2:1-22; 3:16-17; cf. Jude 17-18 with Jude 4, 8, 10-13).

The Johannine epistles (see John, Letters of) reveal an acute awareness that the eschaton has already broken into history. The most notable expression of this is the repeated references to the Antichrist,* especially in 1 John 2:18. There are false teachers, little antichrists, from within the community, who have departed but still threaten to deceive Christians about the nature of Christ's person and his commandments* (cf. 1 Jn 2:22-23, 26; 4:1-6; 2 Jn 7-11). These deceivers (see Adversaries) are the corporate embodiment of the beginning fulfillment of the prophecy of Daniel 7—12 that an eschatological opponent of God's people would deceive and arouse covenant disloyalty within the community of faith (see also Mk 13; Mt 24; Lk 21; 2 Thess 2). 1 John 3:4 even labels these false teachers with the covenantal "lawlessness" that Daniel prophesied would characterize the deceivers who would arise from within the ranks of the faithful (cf. Dan 12:10 [esp. cf. LXX with Theod.]): "Everyone who does the sin also does the lawlessness, and the sin is the lawlessness" (see Marshall 1978 John, 176-77; Smalley, 155; R. E. Brown, 399-400). In this respect, the notion of lawlessness is to be identified with the end-time sin of the "lawless one" of 2 Thessalonians 2:3-12.

The readers of 1 John are made aware that they are living in the midst of the "great tribulation," which they are experiencing in the form of false teachers. They must not be taken off guard and deceived. In fact, "the sin to death" in 1 John 5:16 is best understood in light of this latter-day context of apostasy within the covenant community. Those who deceive others or allow themselves to be deceived by the false teachers are regarded as never having belonged truly to the community of faith and experiencing spiritual death (cf. 1 Jn 2:19; see Scholer, who argues that "the sin to death" is committed only by pseudo-believers).

From another perspective, Christ's life and death have such a cosmic impact that it can be said that the old, fallen world of darkness "is passing away" (cf. 1 Jn 2:2, 8, 12-14, 17). Christ's redemptive work has dealt a mortal blow to the evil ruler of the old age (1 Jn 3:8), and those who identify with Christ's redemptive work also participate in his victory over the devil (1 Jn 2:13-14).

Although the old world has begun to disintegrate spiritually, Christ's death and resurrection have also set in motion a new creation. There is an overlap of the old with the new: "the darkness is passing away and the true light is already shining" (1 Jn 2:8). The resurrection life of the eternal age to come has begun in Jesus' resurrection and in the spiritual resurrection of his followers who identify with his death and resurrection (1 Jn 1:2; 2:17, 25; 3:14; 4:9; 5:11-13, 20, especially in the light of Jn 5:21-29). The Spirit, prophesied to be poured out in the eschatological age (see 2.1.1 above), gives assurance* to believers that they have entered into the divine presence characterizing the new age (1 Jn 3:24; 4:13).

2.3.2. Future. Judgment is also a significant theme in James (Jas 2:13; 3:1). People will be judged because of their selfishness, greed and persecution of the righteous* (Jas 5:1-9). The day of the final judgment is near (Jas 5:7-9). However, those who demonstrate true faith through good works will receive a reward at the last day (Jas 1:12; 5:7-9; see Faith and Works).

First Peter affirms that a day will come when God will impartially judge everyone by their works, whether or not they have lived lives of godly obedience (1 Pet 1:17; cf. 1 Pet 4:17-18). Even now God "is ready to judge the living and the dead" (1 Pet 4:5), since "the end of all things has come near" (1 Pet 4:7). In view of such an imminent judgment, believers are advised to live circumspectly. Those who are able to persevere in faithfulness will receive definitive "salvation ready to be revealed in the last time" (1 Pet 1:5; cf. 1 Pet 1:9) when Christ returns again (1 Pet 1:13), and his followers can fully rejoice in the greater manifestation of his glory* (1 Pet 4:13; cf. 1 Pet 5:1). At this "proper time" (1 Pet 5:6) believers "will receive the unfading crown of glory" (1 Pet 5:4), and God will "perfect, confirm, strengthen and establish" for all time those who have persevered (1 Pet 5:10; cf. 1 Pet 5:6). Another image of this final reward is that of receiving an "inheritance" that "will not fade away" (1 Pet 1:4; cf. 1 Pet 3:9). The believers' "hope" is focused on this goal (1 Pet 3:15). When the final day comes, God's "dominion" will be decisively manifested as being "forever and ever" (1 Pet 5:11; cf. 1 Pet 4:11). Both the already and the not yet aspects of the latter days provide a theological framework in which 1 Peter's readers might better understand their ethical* obligations (see Russell; Selwyn).

The notion of the coming final judgment is developed in 2 Peter (2 Pet 2:3, 9; 3:7; see Michaels 1967b) and Jude (Jude 6, 14-15). At the time of this judgment, "the earth and its works will be burned up" (2 Pet 3:7-13). This is likely a literal expectation on the part of the author, though some commentators interpret it figuratively as a picture of an ethical purification of the earth.

A figurative view of the fiery judgment is affirmed by some who favor the textual reading in 2 Peter 3:10 of "the earth and its works will be found [or, discovered]." If this is the original reading, it probably does not refer to the earth and what people have done as literally surviving a judgment but to the works of the wicked which will be laid bare, so that the ungodly will not be able to escape judgment (cf. Bauckham 1983, 301, 316-21; cf. Wenham).

The purpose of reflecting on the cosmic conflagration is pastoral and ethical: to encourage saints to be holy* in order that they should "be found" faithful when the expected judgment day occurs (cf. 2 Pet 3:11-12, 14). In contrast to the ungodly, they will find mercy* on this dreadful day (Jude 21). The old creation, which is to be destroyed, will be replaced by "a new heavens and a new earth" (2 Pet 3:13; see Rev 21:1; both passages are based on the prophecy of Is 65:17; 66:22). The kingdom that was inaugurated at Jesus' first coming will be established in its completeness (2 Pet 1:11), and God's people will stand in the immediate presence of his glory* (Jude 24).

1 John 2:28 and 1 John 4:17 speak of the possibility of Christ's final Parousia* occurring at any time. Readers should therefore persevere in their faith, so that they will obtain salvation and not be ashamed as ones who deserve wrath on the day of judgment. Such perseverance until Christ's coming will result in their becoming fully conformed to his likeness, for the faithful will finally be able "to see him just as he is" (1 Jn 3:2). Those who maintain this hope will be motivated in the present to begin to resemble his holy image (1 Jn 3:3; similarly 1 Jn 4:17).

2.4. Revelation.

2.4.1. Past and Present. The technical vocabulary for the eschatological period is not to be found in John's Apocalypse. Nevertheless other kinds of terminology are used, and the concepts of inaugurated and consummated eschatology are part of the fabric of the book.

The book opens with mention that Christ's resurrection has inaugurated the fulfillment of the prophesied resurrection of the saints (Rev 1:5, "Jesus Christ . . . the firstborn from among the dead"). This resurrection places Christ in the position of "ruler of the kings of the earth" (Rev 1:5) and as the one who now possesses the "keys of death and Hades" (Rev 1:18). The resurrection described in Revelation 1:5 is later explained to be none other than "the beginning of the [new] creation of God" (Rev 3:14; see Beale 1996). By virtue of his resurrection Christ has also continued to fulfill Daniel's prophecy of the eschatological, worldwide reign of the Son of Man (cf. Dan 7:13-14 with Rev 1:13) as well as the Son of God's* rule predicted in Psalm 2 (cf. Rev 2:26-27; 12:5). Through the resurrection Christ likewise has been declared openly as God (e.g., "I am the first and the last" [Rev 1:17; 2:8; 22:13], based on the self-attribution of Yahweh in Is 41:4, 44:6; 48:12).

Christ's followers are also identified with him in the present age as subjects in his newly established messianic kingdom and as those who rule with him (Rev 1:6, 9; 5:10; see Beale 1994; Bandstra 1992). The predominantly Gentile church has also begun to fulfill the prophecies of Israel's latter-day restoration (cf. OT allusions of Rev 3:9 with Is 43:4; 45:14; 49:23; 60:14; as well as the LXX of Is 41:8; 44:2; etc.).

2.4.2. Future. Revelation expects the final coming of Christ to occur in the near future (e.g., Rev 16:15; 22:7, 12, 17, 20). The visions* of the book also express parabolically an expectation of his coming, especially to judge the ungodly (e.g., Rev 6:12-17; 11:15-19; 14:14-20; 17:14; 19:11-21; or where either Christ or God is the agent of judgment [Rev 6:10-11; 11:11-13; 14:8-11; 16:17-21; 20:9-15; 21:8]). Nevertheless Christ will come also to reward and finally bless his people (Rev 11:18; 19:7-9; 21:1—22:5, 12, 14; possibly Rev 7:9-17). He then will establish his kingdom in its final, complete and eternal form (Rev 11:15-17; 19:1; 22:5; possibly Rev 7:9-17). A tribulation of deception and persecution for God's people will directly precede the last judgment and the full coming of the kingdom (e.g., Rev 11:7-10; 16:12-14; 20:7-9; possibly Rev 3:10; 6:11; 7:14; 13:5-18), as well as a final period of torment for their persecutors (e.g., Rev 16:21; 17:16-17; cf. Rev 3:10).

3. Special Problems of Eschatology in Revelation.

A variety of exegetical problems in Revelation pertain to whether passages speak of inaugurated eschatological realities or eschatological fulfillment at the end of the present age (for discussion of the problem in general, see Bandstra 1970; for the question of the thousand-year reign of Christ, see Millennium; for the problem of the delay of Christ's coming, see Parousia).

3.1. Christ's Comings in Revelation 1—3 and 22. Some of the references to Christ's "coming" in the letters to the churches (Rev 1—3) appear to refer to a conditional coming of Christ in judgment. If there is no repentance* in response to the present warning, then Christ will come in a pre-Parousia judgment on that particular church (so Rev 2:5, 16; 3:3; cf. Rev 3:20, referring to a conditional blessing). Some interpreters, however, argue that Christ's judgment or reward at the end of history, rather than his coming, is conditional on the response of the churches (cf. Bauckham 1977, 173-74; Holtz, 207; Satake, 153; Krodel, 109; Thomas 1992, 143-47, 154). Although this interpretation is possible, it rests on a grammatical exception. In NT usages outside of Revelation of the conditional ei de mē ("if not") the whole of what follows is always conditional. Thus in Revelation 2:5, without contextual indications that would suggest the contrary, Christ's activity of "removing" and "coming" are probably conditional (with the same principle holding for Rev 2:16; 3:3; 3:20; see, e.g., Caird, 27-28; Roloff, 45). The references to Christ's coming in Revelation 2:25 and Revelation 3:11 could well refer to the final Parousia, but they are not in the form of conditional statements.

Furthermore, in Revelation 2:5 the removal of the lampstand "from its place" indicates the removal of the church as a light of witness* to the world. Since the witness of the churches is an activity that takes place prior to the final advent of Christ, the removal of the lampstand must take place prior to Christ's final coming, not afterward (cf. Thomas 1992, 146-47). Part of the "witness" of the churches is to the promise that Christ will return to judge and to redeem (Rev 19:7-21; 22:7-20; see Bauckham 1993, 166-67). This also suits the visionary context of Christ walking in the midst of the lampstands as their priestly custodian who repairs or removes them according to their function (Mounce, 89).

It is probably best to see the conditional and nonconditional comings as not precisely identical but to view the conditional comings as local interventions during the church age and the nonconditional ones as referring to the final Parousia. There may be an intended ambiguity in these sayings as they express the tension between the already and not yet.

Other interpreters have proposed that the dual theme of promise and judgment is woven throughout the letters and that in part the imagery is drawn from a eucharistic background (cf. most prominently Rev 2:17, 20). In the Eucharist believers repeatedly anticipate the present judicial and salvific effects of Christ's final coming (see Moule 1956). The identification of the Spirit with Christ in the conclusion of each letter suggests that Christ's salvific presence with the churches is through the Spirit, and his threatened judgment will occur also through the Spirit's visitation.

The repeated affirmations of Christ's "comings" leads us to consider Revelation 1:7, which some interpreters understand as introducing the main idea of the book: "Behold, he is coming with the clouds, and every eye will see him, even those who pierced him, and all the tribes of the earth will mourn over him." The verse is composed of two OT citations, Daniel 7:13 and Zechariah 12:10. In its OT context Daniel 7:13 speaks of the enthronement of the Son of Man over all the nations following God's judgment of the evil empires (Dan 7:9-12, 14). Applied to Jesus, it indicates the fulfillment of his eschatological kingship (Rev 1:5). In its original context Zechariah 12:10 pertains to God's eschatological defeat of the enemy nations surrounding Israel and his redemption of Israel after the nation has repented of sinfully rejecting God and his messenger (i.e., "the one they have pierced"; cf. Mt 24:30; Midr. Wayosa'; Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 14.8).

In Revelation 1:7 the text from Zechariah has been altered in two significant ways. The phrases pas ophthalmos ("every eye") and tēs gēs ("of the earth") have been added to universalize its original meaning, which was specific to Israel. Repentant Gentiles are viewed as fulfilling the prophecy at the second coming of Christ. However, the reference from Daniel 7 ("Behold he is coming with the clouds") may include the whole course of the church age during which Christ guides the events of history in judgment and blessing. (Note how the Son of Man allusion in Rev 1:13 is given a present application; see also Rev 1:5-6, 14-20 but cf. Rev 14:14.) Precedent may be found in the use of Daniel 7:13 in Mark 13:26 and Mark 14:62, both of which may refer not to the Second Coming but to the Son of Man's coming in judgment of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (cf. Mt 24:30; see France, 140-42, 227-39).

Christ's coming in the letters to the churches appears to refer to his conditional visitation in judgment of the churches (though an allusion to his second coming is not excluded). Therefore, Christ's coming in Revelation 1:7 and elsewhere in the Apocalypse is understood better as a process occurring throughout history so that his second coming concludes the whole process (so also Brütsch, 31).

3.2. The Promises and the "Overcomers" in the Letters of Revelation. Each of the letters to the churches concludes with a reference to "the one who overcomes" or "conquers" (nikaō). This is then followed by a promise. In the letters to Smyrna and Philadelphia, persecution is to be overcome. In the letters to the other five churches, particular sins are to be overcome. But it is clear that overcoming these problematic sins that compromise the witness of the churches will lead to persecution. The church that perseveres in its witnessing faith will win a victory on earth prior to the consummation of history, even though it suffers earthly defeat.

The use of nikaō (Rev 12:11; 15:2; Rom 8:35-37) confirms that "overcoming" is best understood individually, ironically, and as an inaugurated event, not merely as a future reality on a corporate level. The ironic, or paradoxical, meaning of nikaō is modeled after that of Christ's eschatological "conquest" (Rev 3:21). In Revelation 5:5-6 and John 16:33 Christ's conquering is understood as his death on the cross* (cf. also Rom 8:36-37 with Rev 5:5-6). Elsewhere in Revelation we find that the beast* "overcomes" the saints (Rev 11:7; 13:7), and in turn Christ and the saints "overcome" the beast by maintaining their faithful testimony in the midst of suffering (Rev 5:5-6; 12:11; 15:2; 17:14). The origin of this ironic application of nikaō to the beast and to Christ and his saints may lie in Daniel 7:21, which speaks of the eschatological opponent overcoming the saints. John quotes this contextually in Revelation 11:7; 12:7; and 13:7 but then ironically applies it to Jesus and the saints in Revelation 17:14 and to the angels* in Revelation 12:7-8 (see Beale 1997, 1998). But the image of conquering may also owe something to the Jewish interpretation of martyrs who were said to have "conquered the tyrant" (4 Macc 1:11; 6:10; 7:3; 9:6, 30; 11:20-21; 16:14; 17:12-18) because they maintained their faith and obedience* to God's law.

The eschatological promises to the overcomers are intended not only for those who suffer martyrdom* (e.g., Charles 1:54; Caird, 27-28, 33-34, 58; Kiddle, 61-65) but also for all true believers (Beale 1998, excursus on Rev 2:28). Overcoming refers to the victory of one's whole life of faith. A parallel may be observed in 1 John (1 Jn 5:4-5; cf. 1 Jn 2:13-14), where nikaō always refers to not succumbing to false teaching from within the community, a theme underscored in the letters to Pergamum and Thyatira.

The eschatological promises to overcomers in Revelation pertain to the salvific blessing of communion with God and are focused on the essentials of life. All of these promises are described in the final vision of the book (Rev 21:1—22:5) and generally refer to participation in the eternal kingdom of God. They include protection from judgment (Rev 2:10; 3:5), an inheritance in the city of God (Rev 3:12), participation in Christ's reign (Rev 2:26-28; 3:21) and eternal life (Rev 2:7; 3:5). Those who overcome are promised that they will begin to partake of the blessings of the age to come prior to the final consummation.

3.3. Temporal References in Revelation 1:19 and 4:1. Many commentators see Revelation 1:19 ("Write what you have seen, the things which are and the things about to take place after these things") as denoting a straightforward, threefold, chronological division of Revelation (and of the history of the church in relation to the world: e.g., Lohse, 19; Thomas 1967). In this view, the three clauses of Revelation 1:19 describe consecutive, mutually exclusive periods of the entire history of the church age; they do not overlap:

(1) "What you have seen" refers to the previous vision of Revelation 1, which concerns the events of the first century;

(2) "The things which are" relates to Revelation 2—3 and describes the condition of the churches in Asia Minor (and the world) during the church age, the time extending from the first century until the commencement of the "great tribulation";

(3) "The things about to take place after these things" applies exclusively to Revelation 4:1—22:5 and narrates the final tribulation, which will begin directly before the end of history and will continue for a brief period until Christ's final coming to conclude history.

Though the chronological perspective is a popular understanding of Revelation 1:19, making Revelation 4—22 come alive with tantalizing insight into future events, there are weighty objections to this interpretation. In general it interprets Revelation without sufficient sensitivity to its literary form, giving a straightforward, literal reading of the book rather than using a figurative approach that is more appropriate to its symbolic genre.

The principal argument against the chronological understanding of Revelation 1:19 is that since both Revelation 2—3 and Revelation 4—22 contain repeated references both to the past (cf. Rev 2—3; 12:1-5) and future, neither Revelation 2—3 nor Revelation 4—22 can be understood as strictly chronological. Since these chapters are described in some sense by Revelation 1:19, if Revelation 2—3 and 4—22 are not strictly chronological, neither is Revelation 1:19 likely to be chronological.

Not only does Revelation 4—22 describe events of past, present and future, but also its subsections recapitulate the same events in different ways (see Beale 1998). There is no reason to assume that the past and future references are tangential allusions to past or future events. Too often it seems that an a priori assumption that the events of Revelation must be understood as a chronological ordering of the future impedes interpreters from seeing their recapitulatory nature.

The concluding phrase of Revelation 1:19 ("what must take place after these things") is probably a conscious allusion to Daniel 2:28 29, 45, which in the original context refers to the eschatological scope of the vision of God's kingdom being established throughout the earth. In Daniel 2:28, 45 the phrase "latter days" is used synonymously with "after these things." If "after these things" refers to the general eschatological age, then Revelation 1:19 cannot express such a tidy chronological formula. It would refer to the eschatological period that includes inauguration in the past, present and future (see Beale 1992).

The initial phrase of Revelation 1:19 ("what things you have seen") probably refers to the entire vision of the book. The section in which it stands, Revelation 1:9-20, is best viewed as a commissioning narrative, with Revelation 1:19 as a repetition of the initial command in Revelation 1:11 to record all of the visions of the book. The second phrase ("what things are") probably does not refer to the present time only of Revelation 2—3 but the present-time segments scattered throughout the book. Alternatively, it may not be a temporal reference but rather an allusion to the figurative nature of the book, which needs to be interpreted accordingly (i.e., Rev 1:19 could be rendered "what they mean"; Stuart, 54; Alford, 559; Johnson, 429; Gundry, 66; Chilton, 78; Michaels 1991).

W. C. van Unnik maintains that the entire formula of Revelation 1:19 refers to all of Revelation and explains that John is commissioned to prophesy about the totality and meaning of history, whose truths apply not only within history but transcend any one historical period. He is able to adduce numerous examples of comparable threefold prophetic formulae in pagan religious contexts, ranging from the time of Homer to the fourth century A.D. (van Unnik 1962-63, 1980; Sweet, 78).

Whereas the majority of these views understand the three clauses of Revelation 1:19 as in some way temporal designations of past, present and future, an alternative view is that they are primarily statements about the genre of the book. The threefold structure describes the literary nature of the visions, not when they will take place. Revelation 1:19 is thus an elaboration of the threefold hermeneutical nature or genre of the entire Apocalypse: (1) because the vision is apocalyptic (visionary), (2) the whole book is to be interpreted both figuratively (cf. Rev 1:12-18 with Rev 1:20) and (3) eschatologically (Rev 1:19; Dan 2:28-29, 45). The phrases "what you have seen" and "the things which are" are not to be limited to the vision of Revelation 1:12-20 but include the whole book (see Beale 1992).

Revelation 4:1 ("I will show you what must come to pass after these things"), which repeats most of the last clause of Revelation 1:19, is likely to be understood in the same way, and not as a reference to visions pertaining exclusively to the future great tribulation, as some futuristically oriented commentators argue.

3.4. The Temporal Scope of the Sevenfold Series of Seals, Trumpets and Bowls, and the Unnumbered Visions of Revelation 12—14. Are the discernible sections within Revelation 4—16 related to one another chronologically, thematically or both? The main lines of debate revolve around whether Revelation 4—16 represents a forecast of events to happen sequentially or whether some segments overlap temporally and thematically. Typically the former interpretation views

Revelation 4—16 as a panorama of events to happen only in the period immediately preceding and culminating with the final coming of Christ, whereas the latter see a threefold temporal reference to events associated with (1) the redemptive work of Christ's first coming, (2) the course of the inaugurated latter-day church age and (3) the Second Coming of Christ and consummation of cosmic history. An exception to this is G. R. Beasley-Murray, who is both a futurist and a recapitulationist, understanding the parallel sections to cover exclusively different aspects of the eschatological future (see Revelation, Book of).

4. Eschatology of the Apostolic Fathers.

4.1. The Past and Present. Like the writers of the NT, the apostolic fathers* understand that the blessings of the age to come have begun but have not yet reached their consummation. These writers can speak of the age in which they are living as the last days (e.g., 2 Clem. 14.2; Barn. 12.9; 16.5). For example, we read that "these are the last times" (Ign. Eph. 11.1), that "Christ appeared at the end of time" (Ign. Magn. 6.1; Herm. Sim. 9.12.3) and that Christians have a "foretaste of things to come" (Barn. 1.7).

Much like the NT writers, the early fathers held so intensely to the inaugurated aspect of the end times that they believed that the promised new creation had been set in motion. Barnabas 6.13 says that "He made a second creation in the last days," which was modeled on the first creation: "Behold, I make the last things as the first." Christians had become "new, created again from the beginning" (Barn. 16.8; also 6.11, 14), a statement likely based on the fact that their progenitor, Jesus Christ, was the representative from whom they received their identity (Ign. Eph. 20). Such thinking motivated some writers to liken the present experience of believers to the blessings of the Garden of Eden (Diogn. 12). Such a heightened notion of inaugurated eschatology is apparently the basis for the seer's misguided question in the Shepherd of Hermas concerning whether "the consummation had already arrived" (Herm. Vis. 3.8.9).

Again, following the lead of NT writers, the apostolic fathers see an inextricable link between the beginning phase of the eschatological new creation and the resurrection of saints. Resurrection is the means by which believers become a part of the new creation, first spiritually at conversion, then physically in the final resurrection of the dead. Christ brought "the newness of eternal life" (Ign. Eph. 19.3) by himself becoming a "new man" (Ign. Eph. 20.1) as a result of his own resurrection. The inaugurated and consummated resurrection of Christians occurs because of their identification with Christ's resurrection (Ign. Magn. 9; Ign. Trall. 9.2; cf. 1 Clem. 24.1; Pol. Phil. 2.2; Barn. 5.6-7).

Those who believe in Jesus "will live forever" (Barn. 11.11). Conversely, God has also commenced with the destruction of the old creation "for his elect" (Herm. Vis. 1.3.4), which is best understood as beginning with Christ's own death (i.e., destruction of his old body) and resurrection; the resurrection put an end to the curse of death for God's people (Ign. Eph. 19.3; Barn. 5.6), so that even when believers die physically, they enter into an escalated phase of their new birth and of their immortality (Mart. Pol. 19.2). Christ's resurrection is the decisive blow in defeating the devil (Papias Frag. 24), and those who remain faithful to Christ participate with him in completing this defeat (Ign. Eph. 13.1; Ign. Trall. 4.2). In this respect Christ's resurrection is also the basis of his messianic reign (Pol. Phil. 2.1). Those who trust in Christ also enter into the kingdom during the present age (Herm. Sim. 9.16.2-4).

There is a link not only between the eschatological new creation and resurrection but also between the new creation and the notion that the church has become the "temple" of God (Ign. Eph. 15.3; Ign. Trall. 7.2; Ign. Phil. 7.2; Barn. 4.11), though this connection is explicitly made only in Barnabas 6.8-19 and Barnabas 16.1-10. The likely reason for associating the two concepts is that the Garden of Eden of the first creation was identified by later OT writers as being like a sanctuary (see Kline, 35-56), and it became natural for NT writers and the early fathers to make the same connection. John's Apocalypse and Barnabas draw a parallel between the first creation when Adam and Eve were placed in Eden and the second creation of Christians as a temple (Rev 21:1—22:5; Barn. 6.8-19). The same passage from Barnabas draws a parallel between Israel's promised land and the new-creation temple of the church because the OT depicts that land as "Eden" (Gen 13:10; Is 51:3; Ezek 36:35; Joel 2:3) and Israel as a corporate Adam, who was chosen ideally to succeed where the first Adam failed (see Wright, 21-26).

Presumably these writers also view the gift of the Holy Spirit as among the eschatological blessings (1 Clem. 2.2; 46.6), though this connection seems to be drawn only in Barnabas (cf. Barn. 1.3 with Barn. 1.7; see Heb 6:4-5).

In the OT the apparent chronology of predicted eschatological events placed the final tribulation prior to the resurrection of the dead and the new creation (e.g., Dan 11:35—12:12). The Fathers follow the NT in placing the beginning of the final tribulation at the same time as the inaugurated new creation and its attendant blessings (as, e.g., Rev 1:9). Barnabas understands that he is living in the "last days," the "age of lawlessness" (Barn. 4.9) and "the deception of the present age" (Barn. 4.1; cf. 18.2), which is the inception and harbinger of the soon to be fulfilled prophecy from Daniel 7:7-8, 24 (Barn. 4.4-6; likewise cf. 2 Thess 2:3-7 and 1 Jn 2:18-27, where "lawlessness" is also used and is rooted in Dan 12:10 [Theod.]). That prophecy was apparently to commence its more concrete fulfillment imminently, though not necessarily consummately, through the infiltration of false teachers in the church (cf. Barn. 4.1, 9-11; 18.1-2). Similarly the Shepherd of Hermas contends that "great tribulations" have already been suffered (Herm. Vis. 2.7.1) which apparently prepare saints for "the coming great tribulation" (Herm. Vis. 2.6.7; cf. Herm. Vis. 7.4; cf. Rev 2:22; 7:14). Likewise, Hermas "escaped a great tribulation" from a satanic beast which was "a foreshadowing of the great tribulation that is coming" (Herm. Vis. 4.2.4-5).

4.2. The Future. The consummation of all things will be in the "age to come" (Herm. Vis. 4.3.5; 2 Clem. 6.3). Barnabas states that at this concluding temporal point there will be a creation (Barn. 15.7); the "renewed creation" will be exceedingly fertile (Papias Frag. 14). A Jewish apocalyptic work, 2 Enoch 25—33, on the basis of the scriptural testimony that "a thousand years is like one day" (Ps 90:4), appeals to the seven days of creation in Genesis 1 and affirms that history will follow the same sevenfold pattern. The historical age will be seven thousand years and a following "eighth day," referring apparently to eternity (see Wikenhauser). In the same tradition, Barnabas 15 reckons history to last six thousand years, at the conclusion of which the Lord will bring everything to an end, for with him a day signifies a thousand years . . . in six thousand years everything will be brought to an end . . . it is not the present sabbaths that are acceptable to me, but the one [the sabbath of the last thousand years] that I have made; on that sabbath, after I have set everything at rest, I will create the beginning of an eighth day, which is the beginning of another world" (Barn. 15.4-8).

The sabbath of the last thousand years merges into the eternity of the eighth day, "the day on which Jesus both arose from the dead and . . . ascended into heaven" (Barn. 15.9). The last thousand years is figurative for the saints' eternal sabbath rest, and the eighth day of Christ's resurrection becomes figurative not merely for eternity but for the age of the saints' resurrection, which commences eternal rejoicing; hence the seventh and eighth day for Barnabas overlap and are virtually identical (Daniélou, 396-401; Kromminga, 29-40; Ferguson; for other viewpoints on Barnabas see Mealy, 48). Irenaeus (Irenaeus Adv. Haer. 5.28.3; 5.33-36) may follow the same line of thought as in Barnabas 15, though his view seems inconsistent and the consensus is that Irenaeus was a premillennialist.

Just as there is a link between the inauguration of the new creation and the resurrection inaugurated in Christ, so there is a connection between the final phase of both: "when the righteous will rise from the dead and reign, when creation, too, [is] renewed" (Papias Frag. 14). This will be the time of the consummated resurrection (1 Clem. 50.4; 2 Clem. 19.3-4; Pol. Phil. 2.2; Mart. Pol. 14.2), eternal life (Herm. Vis. 4.3.5; cf. Barn. 11.11) and immortality (1 Clem. 35.1-4; 2 Clem. 14.5). The tradition purportedly stemming from Papias associates the final resurrection of the righteous with the commencement of the millennial reign of the saints (Papias Frag. 3.12; 16).

Believers will enter the final form of God's kingdom at this time (2 Clem. 5.5; 11.7; 12.1-2, 6; Herm. Sim. 9.12.5, 8) and will reign with the Lord (Pol. Phil. 5.2). Before this occurs, however, Christians must pass through a final tribulation of deception and persecution that is greater than any earlier trials (Did. 16.3-5; cf. also the notion of "the coming great tribulation" in Herm. Vis. 2.2.7; cf. 2.3.4; on "great tribulation" in Hermas, see Bauckham 1974).

Therefore the full reward of the true saint lies in the future and must be awaited in the present (2 Clem. 20.2-4). This reward will be given by the Son of God when he comes to draw the present age to its conclusion (Did. 16.7-8; Herm. Sim. 5.5.3), though no one knows the time that this is to occur (Did. 16.1). Consequently, one must be constantly ready for his coming (Did. 16.1; cf. Herm. Sim. 10.4.4).

There will be a final judgment for God's enemies and the unfaithful who are not prepared for Christ's coming (2 Clem. 18.2; Ign. Eph. 16.2; Mart. Pol. 11.2; Barn. 19.10); this judgment is imminent and is already on the way (2 Clem. 16.3). Continued awareness of the coming judgment serves as the basis of motivation for a believer's upright conduct (2 Clem. 18.2; Barn. 19.10). Christ himself will execute this judgment (Pol. Phil. 2.1; 6.2).

There will be both salvific reward and judgment at the conclusion of history (2 Clem. 10.3-5; Barn. 4.12-14; 21.2-3, 6; Herm. Sim. 4; for further sources discussing patristic eschatology, see McRay; Cunningham; Daley).

See also ANTICHRIST; APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; ASCENSION; CREATION, COSMOLOGY; DAY OF THE LORD; GLORY; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; HOLY SPIRIT; HOPE; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD; MILLENNIUM; MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY; MYSTERY; PAROUSIA; RESURRECTION; REVELATION, BOOK OF; REWARDS; TRIBULATION, MESSIANIC WOES; UNIVERSALISM; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Alford, The Greek Testament (Cambridge: Deighton, Bell & Co., 1866), vol. 4; D. C. Allison, The End of the Ages Has Come (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); A. J. Bandstra, "History and Eschatology in the Apocalypse," CTJ 5 (1970) 180-83; idem, " 'A Kingship and Priests': Inaugurated Eschatology in the Apocalypse," CTJ 27 (1992) 10-25; C. K. Barrett, "The Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews" in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956) 363-93; R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies in the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); idem, "The Great Tribulation in the Shepherd of Hermas," JTS 25 (1974) 27-40; idem, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); idem, "Synoptic Parousia Parables and the Apocalypse," NTS 23 (1977) 162-76; H. F. Bayer, "Christ-Centered Eschatology in Acts 3:17-26" in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 236-50; G. K. Beale, The Book of Revelation (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1998); idem, "The Formula 'He Who Has Ears Let Him Hear What the Spirit Says to the Churches' in Rev. 2—3" in A Vision for the Church: Essays in Honour of J. P. M. Sweet, ed. M. Bockmuehl and M. Thompson (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); idem, "The Interpretative Problem of Rev. 1:19," NovT 34 (1992) 360-87; idem, "The Old Testament Background of Reconciliation in 2 Corinthians 5—7 and Its Bearing on the Literary Problem of 2 Corinthians 6:14-18," NTS (1989) 550-81; idem, "The Old Testament Background of Rev. 3:14," NTS 42 (1996) 133-52; idem, "Review Article: J. W. Mealy, After the Thousand Years," EvQ 66 (1994) 242-45; idem, "The Use of the Old Testament in Revelation" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture: Essays in Honour of B. Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: University Press, 1988) 318-36; C. Brown, "The Parousia and Eschatology in the New Testament," NIDNTT 2:901-35; R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); F. F. Bruce, "Eschatology in Acts" in Eschatology and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of G. R. Beasley-Murray, ed. W. H. Gloer (Peabody, MA: Hendriksen, 1988) 51-63; C. Brütsch, Clarte de l'Apocalypse (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1955); A. Buzzard, "Acts 1:6 and the Eclipse of the Biblical Kingdom," EvQ 66 (1994) 197-215; H. J. Cadbury, "Acts and Eschatology" in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956) 300-321; G. B. Caird, A Commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine (London: A & C Black; New York: Harper & Row, 1966); idem, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); C. E. Carlston, "Eschatology and Repentance in the Epistle to the Hebrews," JBL 78 (1959) 296-302; J. Carmignac, "La notion d'eschatologie dans la Bible et 'a Qumran," Revue de Qumran 7 (1969) 17-31; J. T. Carroll, Response to the End of History: Eschatology and Situation in Luke-Acts (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); R. H. Charles, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Revelation of St. John (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1920); D. C. Chilton, The Days of Vengeance (Ft. Worth, TX: Dominion, 1987); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); A. Cunningham, "From Strangers to Citizens: Eschatology in the Patristic Era," Ex Auditu 6 (1990) 73-85;

B. E. Daley, "Eschatology" in Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York: Garland, 1990) 309-14; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity: The Development of Christian Doctrine Before the Council of Nicea (Chicago: Regnery, 1964), vol. 1; W. J. Dumbrell, The Search for Order: Biblical Eschatology in Focus (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994); P. Ellingworth, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); E. E. Ellis, "Present and Future Eschatology in Luke," NTS 12 (1965) 27-41; A. Farrer, The Revelation of St. John the Divine (Oxford: Clarendon, 1964); E. Ferguson, "Was Barnabas a Chiliast? An Example of Hellenistic Number Symbolism in Barnabas and Clement of Alexandria" in Greeks, Romans, and Christians: Essays in Honor of A. J. Malherbe, ed. D. L. Balch, E. Ferguson and W. A. Meeks (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990) 157-67; R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament (London: Tyndale, 1971); F. O. Francis, "Eschatology and History in Luke-Acts," JAAR 37 (1969) 49-63; E. Franklin, "The Ascension and the Eschatology of Luke-Acts" SJT 23 (1970) 191-200; R. B. Gaffin, "A Sabbath Rest Still Awaits the People of God" in Pressing Toward the Mark, ed. C. G. Dennison and R. C. Gamble (Philadelphia: The Committee for the Historian of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1986) 33-51; B. R. Gaventa, "The Eschatology of Luke-Acts Revisited," Encounter 43 (1982) 27-42; K. Giles, "Present-Future Eschatology in the Book of Acts (I)," RTR 40 (1981) 65-71; idem, "Present-Future Eschatology in the Book of Acts (II)," RTR 41 (1982) 11-18; D. E. Gowan, Eschatology in the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); R. H. Gundry, The Church and the Tribulation (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1973); D. Hill, "The Spirit and the Church's Witness: Observations on Acts 1:6-8," IBS 6 (1984) 16-26; A. A. Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979); T. Holtz, Die Christologie der Apokalypse des Johannes (TU 85; Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1971); G. Howard, "Eschatology in the Period Between the Testaments" in The Last Things: Essays Presented to W. B. West Jr., ed. J. P. Lewis (Austin, TX: Sweet, 1972) 60-73; L. D. Hurst, "Eschatology and 'Platonism' in the Epistle to the Hebrews," SBLSP (1984) 41-74; A. Johnson, Revelation (EBC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1981) 397-603; M. Kiddle, The Revelation of St. John (MNTC; New York: Harper, 1940); M. G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1980); A. König, The Eclipse of Christ in Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; London: Marshall, Morgan, & Scott, 1980); G. A. Krodel, Revelation (ACNT; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989); D. H. Kromminga, The Millennium in the Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1945); W. S. Kurz, "Acts 3:19-26 as a Test of the Role of Eschatology in Lukan Christology," SBLSP (1977) 309-23; G. E. Ladd, "Eschatology and the Unity of New Testament Theology," ExpT 68 (1957) 268-78; idem, The Presence of the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); H. K. LaRondelle, The Israel of God in Prophecy (Berrien Springs, MI: Andrews University Press, 1983); A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981); idem, "Sabbath, Rest and Eschatology in the New Testament" in From Sabbath to Lord's Day, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982), 197-220; E. Lohse, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (Göttingen: Vandenhoek & Ruprecht, 1960); G. W. MacRae, "Heavenly Temple and Eschatology in the Letter to the Hebrews," Semeia 12 (1978) 179-99; J. McRay, "Charismata in Second-Century Eschatology" in The Last Things: Essays Presented to W. B. West Jr., ed. J. P. Lewis (Austin, TX: Sweet, 1972) 151-68; I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); idem, "Slippery Words," ExpT 89 (1978) 264-69; A. J. Mattill, Luke and the Last Things (Dillsboro, NC: Western North Carolina University Press, 1979); J. W. Mealy, After the Thousand Years (JSNTSup 70; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); J. R. Michaels, "The Centurion's Confession and the Spear Thrust," CBQ 29 (1967) 102-9; idem, "Eschatology in 1 Peter 3:17," NTS 13 (1967) 394-401; idem, "Revelation 1:19 and The Narrative Voices of the Apocalypse," NTS 37 (1991) 604-20; P. S. Minear, I Saw a New Earth: An Introduction to the Visions of the Apocalypse (Washington. DC: Corpus, 1969); C. F. D. Moule, "Influence of Circumstances on the Use of Eschatological Terms," JTS 15 (1964) 1-15; idem, "The Judgment Theme in the Sacraments" in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956) 464-81; A. E. Nielsen, "The Purpose of the Lukan Writings with Particular Reference to Eschatology" in Luke-Acts, ed. P. Luomanen (Helsinki: The Finnish Exegetical Society, 1991) 76-93; C. M. Pate, The End of the Ages Has Come: The Theology of Paul (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); P. Prigent, Apocalypse et Liturgie (CahThéol 52; Paris: Delachaux & Niestlé, 1964); N. Pryor, "Eschatological Expectations in the Old Testament Prophets" in The Last Things: Essays Presented to W. B. West Jr., ed. J. P. Lewis (Austin, TX: Sweet, 1972), 32-59; W. C. Robinson, "Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews: A Study in the Christian Doctrine of Hope," Encounter 22 (1961) 37-51; J. Roloff, Revelation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); R. Russell, "Eschatology and Ethics in 1 Peter," EvQ 47 (1975) 78-84; L. Sabourin, "The Eschatology of Luke," BTB 12 (1982) 73-76; A. Satake, Gemeindeordnung in der Johannesapokalypse (Neukirchen: Neukirchener Verlag, 1966); D. M. Scholer, "Sins Within and Sins Without: An Interpretation of 1 John 5:16-17" in Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation, ed. G. F. Hawthorne (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975) 230-46; E. F. Scott, The Book of Revelation (London: SCM, 1939); E. G. Selwyn, "Eschatology in 1 Peter" in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956) 394-401; M. Silva, "Perfection and Eschatology in Hebrews," WTJ 39 (1976) 60-71; S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); R. H. Smith, "The Eschatology of Acts and Contemporary Exegesis," CTM 29 (1958) 641-63; idem, "History and Eschatology in Luke-Acts," CTM 29 (1958) 881-901; M. Stuart, Commentary on the Apocalypse (New York: M. H. Newman, 1845), vol. 2; J. P. M. Sweet, Revelation (SCM Pelican Series; London: SCM, 1979); R. L. Thomas, "The Chronological Interpretation of Revelation 2—3," BSac 124 (1967) 321-31; idem, Revelation 1—7: An Exegetical Commentary (Chicago: Moody, 1992); S. D. Toussaint, "The Eschatology of the Warning Passages in the Book of Hebrews," GTJ 3 (1982) 67-80; W. C. van Unnik, "A Formula Describing Prophecy," NTS 9 (1962-63) 86-94; idem, Sparsa Collecta 2 (NovTSup 30; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1980) 183-93; G. Vos, "The Eschatological Aspect of the Pauline Conception of the Spirit" in Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of Geerhardus Vos, ed. R. B. Gaffin (Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1980) 91-125; idem, The Pauline Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979); D. Wenham, "Being 'Found' on the Last Day: New Light on 2 Peter 3:10 and 2 Corinthians 5.3," NTS 33 (1987) 477-79; A. Wikenhauser, "Weltwoche und tausendjähriges Reich," Tübinger Theologische Quartalschrift 127 (1947) 399-417; C. Woods, "Eschatological Motifs in the Epistle to the Hebrews" in The Last Things: Essays Presented to W. B. West Jr., ed. J. P. Lewis (Austin, TX: Sweet, 1972) 140-51; N. T. Wright, Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991). G. K. Beale

ESSENES. See QUMRAN.

ETERNAL LIFE. See ETERNITY, ETERNAL; LIFE AND DEATH.

ETERNITY, ETERNAL

The concept of eternity or eternal existence is ambiguous in the NT and the apostolic fathers,* referring to two different temporal schemes: one that something exists for the totality of time; the other for the totality of a set period of time, often in terms of beginning from a particular point. Time is an important concept in apocalyptic* literature, and this concern is shared by several of the biblical and early church writers, in which reference to eternity is a way of designating passage from one temporal age to another.

The concept of eternity is not expressed by a single word in the Greek of the NT or the apostolic fathers (the concept is infrequent in extrabiblical Greek; cf. 4 Macc 17:18); there is always some syntactical structure, usually involving a form of the noun aiōn (which also indicates a fixed period of time). The adjective aiōnios also requires definition along the lines suggested. In these writings, reference to eternity is virtually always with the phrase eis ton aiōna or a variant of it, with either the singular or the plural form of the noun. The distinction in usage seems to be not conceptual but authorial. For example, in the NT the author of Hebrews* uses the singular phrase in all instances but one, while the Johannine writings (1 John, 2 John and Revelation; see John, Letters of; Revelation, Book of) use the plural form in all instances but one. In the other authors who use the phrase (1 Peter* and Jude*), there are four instances of the singular phrase and one of the plural.

Few words have caused as much longstanding dispute as temporal words in the Bible. Some of these misunderstandings continue to be found in current biblical studies. For example, on the basis of the temporal vocabulary in the languages involved (Greek and Hebrew), some scholars have wished to argue that the Greek of the NT expresses only a single view of time (as unlimited) and that this reflects a Hebraic form of thought, one out of character with extrabiblical Greek language and thought. J. Barr has shown that this is a clear misunderstanding of the lexical and syntactical evidence. When it is reassessed, the linguistic evidence makes it difficult to sustain this conclusion, even from a theological standpoint.

One of the major difficulties of this topic is that we are discussing a concept obfuscated by unsupported preconceptions and only loosely attached to particular Greek wording. Nevertheless there are three concepts in this biblical and early church literature worth discussing.

1. Eternity Unlimited
2. Eternity Circumscribed
3. Eternal Life
4. Conclusion

1. Eternity Unlimited.

The concept of eternity unlimited refers to instances in which eternity is an open-ended and unbounded concept, not restricted by parameters of temporal limitation. There are surprisingly few instances of this kind of usage in this body of NT writings. These contexts often speak of God* and his existence. For example, God's throne and kingdom are eternal (Heb 1:8; Rev 4:9, 10; 5:13, where Christ is included; 7:12; and with the adjective 2 Pet 1:11), and God and his word are eternal (1 Pet 1:25; Rev 10:6; 15:7). Typical here are doxological passages to God (Heb 13:21; 1 Pet 4:11; 5:11) and references to the Holy Spirit* (Heb 9:14). God is seen to have worked through an eternal covenant* (Heb 13:20).

In the writings of the apostolic fathers the usage is similar, with God and his dominion said to be eternal in most instances (e.g., 1 Clem. 35.3; 55.6; 61.2) but with Christ* also mentioned (e.g., Mart. Pol. 14.3). Doxological passages speak of eternity unlimited with reference to both God (e.g., 1 Clem. 32.4; 50.7; 58.2; 61.3) and especially Christ (e.g., Did. 9.2, 3; 1 Clem. 64; 2 Clem. 20.5; Diogn. 12.9).

2. Eternity Circumscribed.

The concept of eternity circumscribed refers to continued existence from a point in time, perhaps extending into a new temporal age.

Although most instances of this usage look forward, two NT passages in these NT writings reflect the concept of eternity past: Acts 3:21 and Acts 15:18. Although some scholars have argued that these refer to a period of limitless time, this does not appear to be the way that the author is using the phrase ap' aiōnos. In Acts 3:21 Peter is quoted as saying that God promised to restore everything through his holy prophets "from long ago." Three points are worth noting. The first is that the phrase "long ago" describes the prophets and therefore cannot mean that they were prophesying from before creation.* The second is that the context has apocalyptic overtones; these are not connected to the phrase "long ago" but to God's restoring actions. The third is that this phrase is found in extrabiblical Greek authors, including the apostolic fathers, with this sense (e.g., 1 Clem. 32.4; Barn. 18.2; cf. Did. 16.4; Hesiod Theog. 609; cf. Lk 1:70). The same interpretation applies to Acts 15:18, where in wording that perhaps reflects Isaiah 45:21 James adds to the quotation of Amos 9:11-12 a phrase referring to the Lord's* actions being known "from long ago," that is, from a time when it was possible to know them. (Cf. Jude 25, where the sense is of existence probably before any temporal age.)

The second usage speaks of continued existence for the entirety of a set period of time, often with reference to the future. These contexts often speak of Christ and his having been established in a particular role or function. For example, he has become a priest* in the order of Melchizedek* or the living ruler of the earth (Heb 5:6; 6:20; 7:17, 21, 24, 28; Rev 1:6, 18; 11:15), having obtained a special enduring status (Heb 9:1). Hebrews 13:8 illustrates this usage when it states that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever (eis tous aiōnas), indicating a third temporal sphere extending into the future (see also 2 Pet 3:18; 2 Jn 2). The same sense applies to humans who have something marked out for them from a particular time on into the future. For example, the one who does the will of God abides forever (1 Jn 2:17; Rev 22:5; and with the adjective Heb 9:15; 1 Pet 5:10), and the one who does not incurs a similarly long-lasting punishment (Jude 13; Rev 14:11; 19:3; 20:10; and with the adjective Heb 6:2; Jude 7).

Although this usage is not as frequent in the apostolic fathers as is the first category (see 1 above), there is discussion of eternity circumscribed in several passages especially concerning punishment. For example, Hermas Visions 2.3.3 speaks of the righteous* not being punished forever (see also Herm. Vis. 6.2.4; Herm. Sim. 9.24.4; 9.18.2; but cf. 2 Clem. 6.7, which speaks of nothing saving the unrighteous from eternal punishment; cf. Barn. 20.1). Several of the passages in the apostolic fathers are invocations of the OT regarding eternity (e.g., Barn. 6.3; 9.2; 11.10, 11). One important passage (Barn. 18.2, in the Two Ways section) speaks of Christ enduring from age to age (cf. Ign. Smyrn. 1.2).

3. Eternal Life.

The concept of eternal life is one linked to a phrase created by use of the adjective aiōnios and a noun, usually the word for life, zōē. The attributive use of the adjective follows standard Greek usage, and the phrase is not Semitic as some have thought (where it would have been more typical to use a genitive structure with a noun). Although strictly speaking this usage could be categorized as a specific instance of eternity circumscribed, since eternal life is seen as having a beginning, the usage is listed separately here. The language of "eternal life" is especially frequent in the Johannine writings, although it appears in all literary strata of the NT. Apart from 1 John 1:2 (cf. 1 Jn 5:20), where it is used to characterize the word of life, it is used of the condition of a present and/or futuristic relationship with God based on the redemptive work of the Son* (see Redemption). Eternal life is spoken of in 1 John 2:25; 3:15; 5:11, 13, 20. The only other instances are Jude 21 and Acts 13:46, 48. In Hebrews 5:9 the phrase "eternal salvation" is used, with similar sense. The same usage is found in the apostolic fathers. Although there are more occurrences of the concept in the Fathers than in the NT, the frequency of usage is less due to the larger size of the corpus (see Herm. Vis. 2.3.2; 3.8.4; 4.3.5; Did. 10.3; Ign. Eph. 18.1; 2 Clem. 5.5; 8.4, 6; Mart. Pol. 14.2; 2.3).

4. Conclusion.

The distinction between eternity as a period of time with at least one fixed point and as a boundless concept reveals two different temporal frames of reference. Discussion of eternality is important not only for debunking unnecessary false distinctions regarding Hebrew and Greek mindsets but also for illustrating the importance of interpretation rather than simply translation. Though the same words are used, their spheres of reference are significantly different. Eternality as bounded is a temporal concept that can be readily used of a new or transferred state of the believer, such that, for example, that person enters into eternal life. Eternity as unbounded is a timeless concept that is suitably used of God and his existence.

See also CREATION, COSMOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; GOD; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; HELL, ABYSS, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; LIFE AND DEATH; MILLENNIUM; MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, Biblical Words for Time (rev. ed.; SBT 33; London: SCM, 1969); J. Guhrt, "Time," NIDNTT 3:826-33; J. Lawson, A Theological and Historical Introduction to the Apostolic Fathers (New York: Macmillan, 1961).

S. E. Porter

ETHICS

The equivalent of the term ethics is not found in the later NT writings—or in the Gospels or in the Pauline epistles—but there is ethics (see DJG, Ethics of Jesus; DPL, Ethics). There is reflection and instruction concerning the character and conduct worthy of the gospel, rich reflection and inspired instruction, but the ethical teaching of the later NT resists any simple summary.

The voices in the later NT are "many and various," to use the words of Hebrews 1:1 concerning the prophets.* To be sure, the voices all proclaim that "in these last days" God has "spoken to us by a Son," the final and definitive revelation, the One from whom and unto whom are "all things" (Heb 1:2); and to be sure, the story of God's Son* is the foundation for reflection and instruction concerning fitting human deeds and dispositions not only in Hebrews but also in all these writings of the later NT. Even so, there are distinct voices in this literature, using different genres and addressing diverse communities in disparate circumstances.

1. Life in Light of the End: Revelation
2. Life in Accord with the Tradition: 1 Peter, Hebrews, Jude, 2 Peter
3. Life with Wisdom from Above: James
4. Life in Mutual Love: The Epistles of John
5. Developments in the Apostolic Fathers

1. Life in Light of the End: Revelation.
The later NT writings see the moral life in the light of the end. The proclamation of Jesus and the earliest proclamation about Jesus, of course, had announced the end. The final judgment* and the good future of God were "at hand." The end of the whole cosmic story had been anticipated in Jesus' works and words and in the gift of the Holy Spirit.* Moreover, the end had been already established when God raised the crucified Jesus of Nazareth from the dead. When the later NT writings appropriated the Christian tradition, they appropriated certain convictions about the end. They knew the end of the story, and when they thought about the conduct and character appropriate to Christians, they thought about conduct and character in the light of the end.

Nowhere is the link between ethics and eschatology* more obvious than in the Revelation (see Revelation, Book of). As apocalyptic* literature, Revelation is an unveiling of the secrets of the end. It and other such literature was not, however, written for the sake of divining the future. Revelation was written to console and to encourage the churches* of Asia Minor suffering the emperor's* oppression (see Persecution). It called for patience, not computation; for courage, not calculation.

Instruction in the moral life did not here take the shape of traditional admonitions and sage advice; rather the author constructed a symbolic universe that made intelligible both the readers' faith* that Christ* is Lord* and their daily experience of injustice and suffering* at the hands of Caesar. The rock on which that universe was built and on which the author would have his readers build their lives was the confidence that God* has acted, is acting and will act eschatologically in Jesus Christ (Rev 1:3-8). There are sovereignties in conflict; on the one side are God, the Christ of God and those who worship them; on the other are Satan,* his viceregents, the beasts* and "the kings of the earth" and those who prostrate themselves before them. The victory has been won by Christ, the final triumph is assured, but Satan and his minions still battle and threaten Christ's people on earth. That conflict is the background of intelligibility for their suffering and for their obligations.

The seer, exiled on Patmos, was keen to be a part of the battle and anxious about the churches on the mainland where some tried to avoid the conflict, accommodating Caesar and the standards of this age. "On the Lord's day" (Rev 1:10), taken to be the day the victory of Christ was celebrated (see Lord's Day), he saw and communicated his apocalyptic visions* of the end and called the churches to share "in Jesus the tribulation and the kingdom and the patient endurance" (Rev 1:9; see Kingdom of God; Tribulation).

Life in the light of the end was here first of all "patient endurance." In the letters to the churches (Rev 2:1—3:22) the patient endurance* John commended and called for took the shape of faithfulness in spite of the persecution by the emperor (Rev 2:3, 10, 13; 3:10), the harassment by the synagogues* that had cast them out (Rev 2:9; 3:9) and the accommodation urged and practiced by the false teachers (Rev 2:2, 6, 14, 15, 20). Patient endurance required fidelity in their devotion to God (Rev 2:4, 3:15, 16) and in their love* of and service* to one another (Rev 2:19) and resistance to the temptations to immorality (Rev 2:14, 20; 3:4) and the seductions of ease (Rev 2:9; 3:17).

The vision of the enthronement of the Lamb* that was slain (Rev 4:1—5:14) was at once political and liturgical (see Exaltation; Liturgical Elements). The churches already participated in hymnic* acclaim given the Lamb in their worship.* They were heralds of God's reign and a token of its realization; they were the voice in their time of the whole creation,* of all that was abused and oppressed by the false sovereign, of all that will be liberated by the Lamb that was slain. They were in Domitian's empire a counterempire. The promise that they shall reign (Rev 5:10) stood under the standard of the Lamb that was slain, not of Domitian's pomp and privilege; their reign might thus, like that of the Lamb, be found through death but at least through "patient endurance."

The subsequent visions unveiled both God's judgment against aspects of imperial culture and God's good future, and that good future included the vindication of the counterempire and the renewal of the creation. In the four horsemen the empire of Domitian rides upon the earth with military expansionism, civil strife and war, the inflation that robs the poor of sustenance, and death (Rev 6:1-8), but the victory of God answers the plea of the martyrs* (Rev 6:10) and brings in its train not strife and hunger and death but complete well-being (Rev 7:15-17). The beasts use political power (Rev 13:5-7) and economic power (Rev 13:16-17) to persecute and oppress, but the victory of God brings the fall of Babylon/Rome and the unveiling of a new Jerusalem.*

The vision of Babylon* and its fall (Rev 17:1—19:10) portrays the great splendor of Rome (see Roman Empire), but its wealth and power cannot hide the immorality, idolatry,* oppression and murder that prompt God's judgment (Rev 18:2-8, 21-24). The fall of Babylon/Rome is lamented by those who are powerful and wealthy according to its standards and with its aid ("the kings of the earth," "the merchants" and "the shipmasters" [Rev 18:9-19]), but their dirge is overwhelmed by the rejoicing of those who heed the call for a spiritual exodus (Rev 18:4) and by the heavenly "hallelujah" (Rev 19:1, 3, 6). Such a spiritual exodus from the demonic values of Rome, the pride of power (Rev 18:3, 9-10) and the greed (Rev 18:3, 11-19; see Generosity and Greed) that marked Rome's life and justified its doom can be and must be undertaken in the light of the end, the victory of the "King of kings and Lord of lords" (Rev 19:16) and the gift of a new world* and a new city where God dwells and reigns and blesses and where God's people and God's creation flourish (Rev 21:1-5).

Watchfulness is hardly calculation. "Patient endurance" is not passivity. To be sure, the Christian communities in Asia Minor were not called to take up arms to achieve power; this counterempire was not to plot a coup to seize economic and political control. But they were called to be a resistance movement, to defend God's claim to a world corrupted and abused by the spiritual and political powers. They were called to live courageously and faithfully, resisting the pollutions of the cult of the emperor, including its murder, sorcery, idolatry and the lie that Caesar is Lord (see the vice lists in Rev 9:20-21; 21:8; 22:15; see Virtues).

The exhortation to ethics in light of the end is found not only in Revelation but also in "many and various" ways throughout this literature. 1 Peter, for example, saw the moral life in the light of the "living hope" and "inheritance" secured by the resurrection* (1 Pet 1:3-5), reminding readers that "the end of all things is near" (1 Pet 4:7), warning them of the judgment (1 Pet 1:17; 4:17) and urging them to attend to Christ's glory* (1 Pet 4:13; 5:1). Life in the light of the end is in 1 Peter, no less than in Revelation, patient endurance of suffering, "sharing Christ's suffering" (1 Pet 4:13) and his glory (1 Pet 5:1).

2. Life in Accord with the Tradition: 1 Peter, Hebrews, Jude, 2 Peter.

1 Peter,* however, is not an example of apocalyptic literature, though it reflects a church setting in a hostile world. It is a "baptismal anamnesis," to use the phrase of N. A. Dahl. Readers of 1 Peter are reminded of their baptism,* of their initiation into the death and resurrection of Christ (see Death of Christ) and into the Christian community—and of the moral instruction that was part of that initiation. Life in the light of the end was to be lived with fidelity to the identity given in baptism and in accord with the moral instruction that traditionally accompanied it. The use of these traditions is common in the later NT writings and in the apostolic fathers,* but 1 Peter is a particularly rich account of the moral life as life in accord with the tradition.

The traditional elements utilized in 1 Peter include what E. G. Selwyn called an early Christian "holiness code," the instruction to "put off" vices and to "put on" virtues (here "rid yourselves" and "arm yourselves," 1 Pet 2:1; 4:1), the tradition concerning joy* in suffering (1 Pet 1:6-7; 4:13; cf. Rom 5:35; Jas 1:2-4), the tradition of nonretaliation (1 Pet 3:9-12; cf. 1 Thess 5:12-22; Rom 12:3-20) and a Haustafel (1 Pet 2:13—3:8).

The holiness code instructed Gentile* converts to "abstain" from pagan immorality (1 Pet 2:11; see also Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; 1 Thess 4:3; 5:22; Pol. Phil. 2.2; 5.3) and called them to "be holy" (1 Pet 1:15-16; cf. 1 Thess 4:3, 7; see Holy) and to love one another (1 Pet 1:22; 1 Thess 4:9). It evidently related the Christian life to the end, to the revelation* of Christ as judge and avenger (1 Pet 1:13, 17, 20; 1 Thess 4:6), and it construed the Christian life as testimony to those still in ignorance (1 Pet 2:12; 1 Thess 4:12).

The Haustafeln, or tables of rules for the household (see Household Codes), instruct Christians to "be subject" (1 Pet 2:13—3:8; cf. Col 3:18—4:1; Eph 5:21—6:9; 1 Tim 2:1-15; Tit 2:4-10; Did. 4; Barn. 19; 1 Clem. 21; Ign. Pol. 4—5; Pol. Phil. 4—5; 10, which called for mutual subjection). The Haustafeln take up conventional role responsibilities; it is God's will that while Christians wait for the end they should live lives beyond any reasonable reproach. Such lives will silence their detractors and serve the mission* of the church (1 Pet 2:12, 15; 3:1-2, 16).

The redaction of this tradition in 1 Peter puts submission to government first (see Civil Authority). One may contrast this with Revelation, but 1 Peter knows that Christians are not merely subjects but "aliens" and "exiles" (1 Pet 2:11). Their submission is a free submission, not a constrained one, and it is balanced by the recognition of God's greater authority* and finally set in context of a series of other obligations, obligations that may override duties to the emperor (1 Pet 2:17). The exhortation to slaves* to be submissive (1 Pet 2:18-25) is not based on requirements of the role but on the example of Christ (1 Pet 2:21-23), and just as Christ's suffering led to his vindication and glory, so slaves may, like Jesus, trust the One who "judges justly." The admonition that wives be submissive (1 Pet 3:1-6) is given a missionary motive and is balanced by a reciprocal admonition that husbands "likewise" treat their wives with consideration and honor, recognizing "the weaker sex" as "joint heirs" (1 Pet 3:7) of life. "Finally" the duty of submission is the duty of all (1 Pet 3:8; 5:5). 1 Peter and the early Christian tradition of Haustafeln generally did not disown civic and domestic role responsibilities; however, by placing them in the context of the Christian identity and community and in the light of the end, it subtly relativized and qualified them.

Hebrews* describes itself as a "word of exhortation" (Heb 13:22). There is little concrete moral instruction in Hebrews. The concern is not that the church does not know what it ought to do; it is that the church does not do what it knows it ought to. The Christian moral tradition has already informed the consciences* of these people; the task the author undertakes is to exhort them against inattention to what they know (Heb 2:1), against disobedience (Heb 4:11), against becoming dull of hearing (Heb 5:11), against being "sluggish" (Heb 6:12), against weariness in their "struggle against sin" (Heb 12:4).

The theological basis for this "word of exhortation" is the covenant,* more explicitly, the "second" (Heb 8:7), "new" (Heb 8:8, 13; 9:15; 12:24) and "better" (Heb 7:22; 8:6) covenant, the covenant that cannot be reduced to a written code (Heb 8:10; 10:16). Keeping this covenant is not a matter of obedience* to the law* of Moses*; it is a matter of living in accord with the Christian tradition, in accord with the set of precepts that are exemplified rather than codified in the list in Hebrews 13: mutual love, hospitality,* care for prisoners, respect for marriage. "Do not neglect to do good and to share what you have, for such sacrifices are pleasing to God" (Heb 13:16; see Sacrifice).

The failure to keep covenant evokes judgment no less in the new covenant than in the old. Hebrews warns against apostasy* and deliberate sin with rigorous severity (Heb 6:4-6; cf. Heb 10:26-31; 12:16-17), and some early commentators took the letter to be introducing a system of penitential discipline in which there is no possibility of a second repentance* (cf. Herm. Man. 4.3). The author, however, provides not a ruling in canon law but a warning, a "word of exhortation," lest the church become "sluggish" (Heb 6:12).

The letters* of Jude* and 2 Peter* defend a life in accord with the tradition against the heretics who "promise freedom" (2 Pet 2:19) but "pervert the gospel of God into licentiousness" (Jude 4; cf. 2 Pet 2:2). Against those who "scoff" at the promise of Christ's return (Jude 18; 2 Pet 3:3-4), they remind their readers to live "lives of holiness and godliness" while they wait for the end (2 Pet 3:11). Here 2 Peter adds a new note: such lives in accord with the tradition can "hasten" the end (2 Pet 3:12).

2 Peter also adds a carefully wrought catalog of virtues (2 Pet 1:5-8), noteworthy for the prominence of Hellenistic vocabulary in it and for its concern for moral development and progress.

3. Life with Wisdom from Above: James.

The letter of James* is really a paraenesis, a didactic text that gathers moral instruction from a variety of sources, including Jewish and Greek, as well as Christian, traditions. As such it surely represents the moral life as living in accord with tradition, but it tests tradition and behavior by "the wisdom from above" (Jas 3:17). This wisdom* is not simply based on experience; it is wisdom in light of the end. In the light of "the coming of the Lord" readers are advised to "be patient" (Jas 5:7-8). Such patience entails both the endurance of hardship (Jas 1:2-4; utilizing the tradition of joy in suffering [cf. 1 Pet 1:6-7; Rom 5:3-5]) and withstanding temptation* (Jas 1:12-16, in the form of a beatitude, a wisdom form). Moreover, in the light of the coming great reversal (Jas 2:5; 4:6-10; 5:1), the rich are urged to repent. Such repentance entails rejecting the conventional reliance on wealth that passes for wisdom (Jas 1:9-11; 4:13—5:3), and it requires hospitality to the poor (Jas 2:2-6), justice (Jas 5:4) and tangible charity (Jas 1:27; 2:15-17; see Riches and Poverty).

The "wisdom from above" is not a human achievement but a gift "from above" (cf. Jas 1:5, 17-18). It is not an esoteric knowledge* or gnostic* enlightenment; it results in virtue, in community-forming and community-preserving traits of character (Jas 3:17), so that Christians become "firstfruits of his creatures" (Jas 1:18), firstfruits of "a harvest of righteousness" (Jas 3:18; see Righteousness).

This wisdom must govern all things and not least for James that recalcitrant bit of human flesh, the tongue (Jas 1:19, 26; 3:1-12; 4:11; 5:9, 12). The tongue can be used to bless* or to curse, to speak evil or to make peace,* to deceive or to speak the truth in love; every time we open our mouths and let loose our tongues there is a struggle between the rule of wisdom and the reign of evil.

The "law" was obviously important to James (Jas 1:25; 2:8-12; 4:11), but it cannot be identified with the 613 commandments of the Torah or simply with the love commandment* (Jas 2:10). It is the whole of morality as morality is known through Scripture and tradition and tested by the "wisdom from above" in the light of the end.

James's famous polemic against "justification by faith alone" (Jas 2:14-26) was hardly interested in defending an alternative theology of justification or a new concept of faith. It was not Pauline theology that was opposed so much as the use of a Pauline slogan to justify libertine conduct (cf. 2 Pet 3:14-17). For Paul a faith that does not issue in good dispositions and deeds was incomprehensible; for James it was reprehensible. Both writers wanted a faith that acts (Jas 2:22; cf. Gal 5:6; see Faith and Works).

4. Life in Mutual Love: The Epistles of John.
The epistles of John (see John, Letters of) concentrate the Christian life into the duty of mutual love. Life in the light of the end in this "last hour" (1 Jn 2:18) is marked by mutual love, for it is love that marks the (already but awaited) good future of God: "We know we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren" (1 Jn 3:14). Life in accord with the tradition is marked by keeping "the commandments" of God (1 Jn 2:3,4), but John never identifies "the commandments," except to say, "This is his commandment, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ and love one another" (1 Jn 3:23; cf. 4:21; 2 Jn 6).

This "new commandment" (1 Jn 2:8) is not novel; it is really an "old" commandment (1 Jn 2:7; 2 Jn. 5). It stands in continuity not only with the beginning of Christian preaching* and with Jesus' proclamation (1 Jn 2:7, 24; 2 Jn 5, 6) but also with God's intention from the beginning, so that the devil's sin (1 Jn 3:8) and Cain's were precisely their violation of the unity and love that mark the heavenly reign of God. Love is the primal will of God, who "is love" (1 Jn 4:8, 16), the original and fundamental commandment, now "perfected" in Christ and in his community. To believe in this Christ is to stand under the obligation to love; his death on the cross* is the way in which "we know love" (1 Jn 3:16; cf. 1 Jn 4:1-21). The faith that God sent Jesus in the flesh,* that Jesus died on the cross and that the Spirit has been given expresses itself in love.

John's epistles, like his Gospel, focus on the community as the place love must be put into practice, but this focus should not be understood as a limit or a restriction. If we know love from the death of Christ, and if Christ's death is not only for us but also for the whole world (1 Jn 2:1, 2), then it would be quite unreasonable for the author to restrict love to members of the community.

5. Developments in the Apostolic Fathers.
The literature of the early church reprised these themes, but the Christian life was more and more regarded as life in accord with the tradition. The *Didache, for example, began with moral instruction following the traditional pattern of Two Ways, "one of life and one of death" (Did. 1—5; see also Barn. 18—20), utilizing not only the tradition of Jesus' teachings (Did. 1) and the decalogue (Did. 2) but also the tradition of the Haustafeln (Did. 4). Then, after providing instruction concerning baptism (Did. 7), fasting and prayer* (Did. 8), Eucharist (Did. 9, 10) and duties of hospitality to itinerant preachers (Did. 11--13), it concluded with attention to the end and the admonition to "be watchful" (Did. 16). Along the way it made use of certain wisdom forms, such as the address to "my child" (Did. 3), and emphasized the duty to love (Did. 1). The Didache is noteworthy for its prohibition of abortion and infanticide (Did. 2; see also Barn. 19.5; Diogn. 5, 6), for its introduction of a double standard (Did. 6) and for its appreciation for the church as a community of moral discourse and mutual admonition (Did. 4, 15).

Not only was the Christian life more and more focused on life in accord with the tradition, but also the tradition was more and more regarded as properly interpreted by ecclesiastical officers and takes on the role of a "new law" (lex nova) to be obeyed (see Church Government). So, for example, 1 Clement (see Clement of Rome) rebukes the Corinthian church for deposing its lawful leaders. Such sedition puts them in great moral peril; they should rather be obedient to God and to the leaders who have been appointed by God (1 Clem. 14; 21; 30; 41--44; 57; 63). Similarly the epistles of Ignatius* are full of admonitions to live in harmony with the bishop. Harmony with God and with the will of God is found in harmony with the bishop; the unity in the spirit is formed by unity under the leadership of proper ecclesiastical officers; the holiness of participation in the Spirit is domesticated into obedience to church leaders who stand in succession to the apostles.*

The Christian life continued to be regarded in the light of the end, even if eschatology did not shape life as directly or force the revision of conventional assumptions as deliberately as it did in Revelation. The Shepherd of Hermas, for example, although apocalyptic in form, is really a moral treatise. The apocalyptic visions, which constitute the first part of the work, include a vision of the terrors of judgment (Herm. Vis. 4), but they function to make repentance, the practice of the "mandates" and the performance of "good works" urgent (Herm. Sim. 10.4). The mandates (the second part of the work) and the moral instruction of the similitudes (the third part) conform to the conventions of apocalyptic literature by being given by a heavenly figure, "the shepherd, the angel of repentance" (Herm. Vis. 5), but in content they rely on the traditions of baptismal instruction and moral wisdom within the church, contrasting the Two Ways (Herm. Man. 6), for example, and urging Christians to "abstain" from wickedness (Herm. Man. 8).

The sense of being "aliens and exiles" (1 Pet 2:11; cf. Heb 11:13-14; 13:14; Herm. Sim. 1) remained in the light of the end, but the countercultural emphasis of Revelation existed alongside and in tension with an appreciation of the best of the Hellenistic morality and culture. Perhaps the *Epistle to Diognetus captured this tension and its fruitfulness best in its series of paradoxes:

> Christians . . . dwell in their own countries but only as sojourners; they bear their share in all things as citizens, and they endure all hardships as strangers. Every foreign country is a fatherland to them, and every fatherland is foreign. They marry like all other men, and they beget children; but they do not cast away their offspring. They have their meals in common but not their wives. They find themselves in the flesh, and yet they live not after the flesh. Their existence is on earth, but their citizenship is in heaven. They obey the established laws, and they surpass the laws in their own lives. (Diogn. 5.5-10)

See also CIVIL AUTHORITY; COMMANDMENTS; CONSCIENCE; FAITH AND WORKS; FREEDOM, LIBERTY; HOSPITALITY; HOUSEHOLD CODES; IMITATION; JAMES; MARRIAGE, DIVORCE, ADULTERY; OBEDIENCE, LAWLESSNESS; PASTORAL THEOLOGY; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE; REWARDS; RICHES AND POVERTY; SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. R. Baker, Personal Speech-Ethics in the Epistle of James (WUNT 2.65; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1995); N. A. Dahl, "Anamnesis: Memory and Commemoration in Early Christianity" in Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1964) 11-29; R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1996); J. B. Lightfoot, ed., The Apostolic Fathers (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1965 [1891]); W. A. Meeks, The Origins of Christian Morality: The First Two Centuries (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993); F. X. Murphy, Moral Teaching in the Primitive Church (Glen Rock, NJ: Paulist, 1968); W. Schrage, The Ethics of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (London: Macmillan, 1947); A. Verhey, The Great Reversal: Ethics and the New Testament

(Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984).

A. Verhey

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. See PHILIP THE EVANGELIST.

EUCHARIST. See LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST.

EVANGELISM IN THE EARLY CHURCH

Evangelism is defined here in the narrow sense of the verbal proclamation of the good news of salvation* with a view of leading people to a right relationship with God* through faith* in Jesus Christ.* But it touches on other aspects of "mission,"* which also includes the nonverbal aspects of Christian witness* to non-Christians.

Two works stand out as classics on this subject: A. von Harnack's The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (ET 1905) and M. Green's Evangelism in the Early Church (1970). Where the two disagree, the latter often gives the better reconstruction.

Three Greek word-groups were commonly used to denote evangelism: euangelizō ("to share good news"), kēryssō ("to preach") and martyreō ("to bear witness"). In reference to the act and/or process of telling others about Jesus Christ, the first is used most frequently in its verbal form accompanied by a word or phrase that describes the content of the news, such as "the kingdom of God" (Acts 8:12; see Kingdom of God) or "Jesus" (Acts 11:20), hence emphasizing the message's content. The second highlights the method of public proclamation, as it originally denoted what a kēryx ("herald") did. The third emphasizes the veracity and credibility of both the message and the messenger, for it was a legal term that referred to the attestation to facts and events based on the personal experience of the testifier.

1. The Message
2. The Motives
3. The Objective
4. The Context
5. The Strategy
6. The Methods
7. Postapostolic Developments

1. The Message.

The euangelion ("gospel"* or "good news") or kērygma ("preaching") centers on the person and work of Jesus Christ, its sole subject and focus (as in Acts 5:42; 8:35; 28:31). To the Jews it was the joyful announcement that God had finally acted to fulfill the promise of messianic sōtēria ("salvation") which they had long been hoping for (as in Acts 2:22-36; 3:13-25). To those not familiar with the OT, it was the victorious proclamation that a new order of peace* had dawned on the world with the defeat of the evil forces through Jesus' resurrection* (as in Acts 17:18), though the term ran the risk of being misunderstood, since euangelion was used in a political sense in the imperial cult (cf. Acts 17:7).

Euangelion and kērygma are used by Paul and most other NT writers as technical terms to refer to both the content of what is proclaimed and the act, process and execution of the proclamation. Content and process belong together, for in the very act of preaching its content becomes reality and brings about the salvation that it proclaims. The gospel is not a human word but the word of God (1 Pet 1:12) which produces new birth and new life (1 Pet 1:23-25; cf. 2 Tim 1:10). Clear warnings are given against diverting from "the truth" into false teachings* (Acts 20:28-32; 1 Jn 4:1-6; 2 Jn 7-11; 2 Pet 2; Jude 3-4; cf. Rev 2:2, 14-16).

NT scholars have raised three issues about the kērygma. The first interacts with C. H. Dodd's claim that it had a fixed form and structure that were recognizably different from the didachē ("teaching"). The present consensus is that there were indeed a definite form and content centered on the lordship of Jesus, but there were also varied presentations of his relevance to the different needs of the hearers, which were not necessarily different from the teaching materials for new believers.

The second question centers on how reliable are the recorded evangelistic sermons in Acts. It seems clear now that they reflect very old strata of tradition,* with Lukan translation and modifications, which were intended to serve as patterns for the creative exposition of the key points of the gospel.

The third issue has been raised by the Bultmannian school that affirmed only the theological significance of Jesus and denied the significance of his historical reality in early Christian preaching. It seems that the contents of the four Gospels, the sermons in Acts (especially Acts 10:36-38) and the anti-(proto)Gnostic warnings in the Johannine epistles all point to the importance of the historicity and life of Jesus in the kērygma.

2. The Motives.

What motivated the evangelistic efforts of the early Christians? The NT texts show that it was their overwhelming sense of gratitude to God for his love* revealed in Jesus' life and death,* which they had actually experienced (1 Jn 4:10-12, 14, 19; cf. 2 Cor 5:14; Eph 3:7-8). Perhaps this served as the strongest impulse for most of them to share what they had received from the Lord.

There was also a keen sense of responsibility to do what God required them to do, as faithful stewards of the gospel that had been graciously given to them (1 Pet 4:11; 5:2-4; cf. Eph 3:2-3). Paul, for example, felt under obligation to fulfill a commission entrusted to him (Acts 20:24; cf. 1 Cor 4:1-2; 9:16-17; Rom 1:14-15), constantly conscious of the eternal consequences in the final judgment* (2 Cor 5:9-11; cf. 2 Tim 4:8).

Another motivation was the early believers' concern for the state of unbelievers (1 Pet 3:1-6): they believed that those without Christ were lost and condemned (Rev 20:11-15; cf. Rom 3:19, 23; Eph 2:1-3, 12-13; 2 Pet 3:7).

3. The Objective.

The early church aimed to lead all peoples to conversion. For pagans conversion was a complete change of one's religion to be exclusively attached to that of the Christians (cf. 2 Pet 3:9). Except for Jews, for whom conversion was within the faith in which they were nourished (Christ is the end or fulfillment of the OT), this demand to change one's faith, ethic and cult entirely was totally new to the peoples in the Greco-Roman world, since they did not regard a belief system, a moral code and exclusive commitment as necessary for religion (see Stark). Though Judaism was specially protected by law and was open to Gentile* adherents (called "God-fearers"), it generally failed to gain significant conversions.

The early Christians were not shy about the uniqueness (not just superiority) of their faith, for they believed that they had the good news for their families, friends, communities and nations. They knew that the kērygma was in essence a definitive call that demanded a response. They expected results and succeeded; they even counted the number of converts (Acts 2:41; 4:4; 17:4).

To them conversion meant three things: repentance,* faith and baptism.* To do "deeds that showed repentance" (Acts 26:20; cf. 3:26; 17:30) toward God, who had generously supplied all their needs (Acts 14:17; cf. 17:25-28) but whom they had offended through neglect or rejection of his righteous rule over their lives (cf. 2 Pet 2; Jude 4-16; Rev 18), meant forsaking idols* for the Lystran religionists (Acts 14:15), washing Paul's wounds for the Philippian jailer (Acts 16:33) and burning precious scrolls for the Ephesian occultists (Acts 19:18-19).

"Faith toward Jesus Christ" (Acts 20:21; cf. 10:43; 11:17; 16:31) was more than assent to spiritual facts; it included also commitment to a personal God revealed in Jesus Christ, not without basis in certain propositional truths about him (hence the severe warnings against heresies or false teachers), not without evidence of good works (cf., e.g., Jas 1:21-27; 2:14-26; 1 Jn 2:28—3:24) and not without persistence of hope* (cf. Heb 11—13; 2 Pet 3:17-18; Rev 2:10, 19).

Converts were also required to receive water baptism* immediately upon their profession of faith (Acts 8:37; 9:18; 16:33; cf. 1 Cor 1:14-15). Baptism was viewed as the mark of cleansing from old sins* (2 Pet 1:19; cf. Tit 3:5), union with Christ (1 Pet 3:21—4:3; cf. Rom 6:1-4) and incorporation into the church* (1 Cor 12:13). The instances of household* baptisms (Acts 10:24, 27, 48; 16:15, 33; cf. 18:8) suggest that it was also viewed as a parallel to OT circumcision* (cf. Rom 4:1-12; Col 2:11). Both Jews and Gentiles were baptized into the church, as into a third race (1 Pet 2:9-10; cf. 1 Cor 10:32; Eph 2:11-22).

4. The Context.

It seems clear that the first century providentially gave the early church some good conditions to succeed in rapidly propagating the new faith. Though maintained by military force, the pax Romana ("Roman peace"; see Roman Empire) provided an atmosphere of order, plenty and well-being. A network of roads was kept in good condition for fast and relatively safe travel and communication. The Greek language with its developed philosophical vocabulary was widely used in the Mediterranean region, thus facilitating communication across various ethnic groups.

Theologically there was a movement among the intelligentsia, except for the Epicureans and Skeptics, away from the traditional worship* of mythological gods toward some sort of monism. More important, monotheism and simple worship services had spread throughout the Empire through the Jewish diaspora.* Though the Jews were often not popular, they were influential, sometimes even among the social elite. They also set the precedent for the practice of conversion to an exclusive religion.

There were some apparent disadvantages: the early Christians were accused of being atheistic (nonworship of the gods), antisocial (attending secret meetings), traitors (refusal to confess "Caesar is Lord") and depraved (rumored to have practiced sexual* immorality and cannibalism). But up to the later NT era and until Domitian, c. A.D. 95, the persecutions* and hostilities were sporadic and largely in limited regions. Luke sees them as mostly instigated by the Jews (Acts 4:1-31; 5:17-41; 14:2; 17:5-9; 21:27—26:32; cf. Jas 5:10-11; 1 Pet 4:12-19; Rev 2:9). Though they seemed to be setbacks, these "trials" presumably helped to keep the church pure* and members' commitment level high.

To the Jews the first evangelizers were nobodies: they had no formal rabbinic training (hence "untrained laity," Acts 4:13) and were trying to correct centuries-old traditions of the Torah taught and practiced by qualified religious leaders. Worse, they worshiped* a crucified criminal as Messiah and a second God (Heb. Adonai, "Lord"), which was blatant blasphemy (see God).

The polytheistic peoples in the Roman Empire had complete tolerance of private religious beliefs (Lat. superstitiones) as long as they did not disturb public decency and order. In societies where low morals prevailed, Christian conversion required major changes in values, ethical standards and behavior. Moreover, the early Christians were despised for sociocultural inferiority: most of them belonged to the lower classes (cf. 1 Cor 1:26; 2 Cor 8:1-4; Rev 2:9). Nevertheless, the populace soon took notice that the new movement was "turning the world upside down" (cf. Acts 17:6 KJV).

5. The Strategy.

Was there a general plan of action to evangelize the world? In terms of geographical expansion, it was spontaneous via the existing networks of sea and land trade routes, perhaps even to India and Armenia. Like Paul, most evangelizers settled in cities of Roman governance, Greek culture, Jewish influence and commercial importance, such as Antioch, Philippi, Corinth, Paphos, Ephesus, Rome. Paul chose to set up churches in only a couple of urban centers in each province (cf. Acts 19:10; Rom 15:19-23; see Centers of Christianity) to serve as outreach centers in their respective regions. The neat schema of outward expansion "to the ends of the earth" from Jerusalem (summed up in Acts 1:8) is most probably Lukan.

5.1. Total Mobilization. The prime agents in evangelism were the ordinary believers (Acts 8:4; 11:19-21), called "informal missionaries" (Harnack; Green). Wherever they lived or migrated, the good news spread by word of mouth through their natural relationships of families, friends and acquaintances (cf. 1 Pet 3:15). As they "gossiped the gospel" with conviction and enthusiasm, people were converted and added to the church and its evangelistic force. Those who were gifted with special endowments to preach were encouraged to use them faithfully (1 Pet 4:10-11; cf. 1 Cor 12—14; Rom 12:6-8).

These evangelizers were "equipped" (cf. Eph 4:11-13) by two kinds of church leaders: the itinerant apostoloi ("apostles"* or "missionaries") and the resident presbyteroi ("elders"). Besides the Twelve* and Paul, there were "missionaries of the churches" commissioned and supported by the house churches (2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25; 3 Jn 6-7; Rev 2:2; cf. 1 Cor 9:4; 1 Thess 2:7; etc.). They went from place to place, appointed local leaders and then proceeded to preach in other areas where people had yet to be evangelized (cf. Acts 14:23-28).

Though the main task of the elders (also called episkopoi, "overseers" or "bishops," and diakonoi, "deacons," as in Phil 1:1) was to build up the Christian community so that all members discovered and used their spiritual gifts; they also served as exemplars in doing evangelism (2 Tim 4:5; cf. 1 Pet 5:3), just as Paul set this evangelistic concern as a model for the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:18-28). One of their qualifications for church "office" was a good reputation before unbelievers (1 Tim 3:1-7).

5.2. Simple Structures. Total mobilization was maintained for a couple of centuries, because the early Christians met in homes and ministered "from house to house" (Acts 20:20; cf. 2:46; 5:42; Rom 16). With no buildings to maintain, they used their limited resources to support the itinerant ministers and the poor among them. This was most probably done consciously, not just by force of circumstance (frequent poverty and persecution), for they were not without resources (cf. Acts 2:44-45; 4:34—5:11; 1 Cor 16:1-4; 2 Cor 8:1-5) and faced no prohibition against building temples, synagogues* or shrines for religious purposes.

The conversion of a husband led usually to the baptism of the entire household,* which included relatives, friends, slaves or freedmen, and even clients. Though the process was very difficult, converted wives were exhorted to win their husbands to Christ through godly behavior (1 Pet 3:1-6; cf. 1 Cor 7:14). Such homes then served as centers for prayer* and worship* (Acts 1:13-14; 2:46; 12:12), pastoral care and fellowship* (Acts 16:40; 18:26; 20:20-21; 21:7), hospitality* (Acts 16:15, 32-34; 17:5-7; 18:7; 21:8) and especially evangelism (Acts 5:42; 10:22; 16:32; 28:17-18).

Moreover, they were not dependent on a priestly class or a few professional religious leaders. Each house church was led by mature adults who, though new in the faith, were capable to take charge of the prayers and study of the Word in weekly gatherings and in fellowship with neighboring house churches.

5.3. High Morality. Living in immoral societies, Christians prized their witness of righteous living. As the gospel called for repentance from sins, the converts were urged to shun ungodliness and put on holiness (Heb 13:4-5; Jas 1:19—4:12; 1 Pet 1:13—2:25; 2 Pet 2; Jude 4-23; see Holy, Holiness). They were expected to live transformed lives and exhibit a self-sacrificial love* that would transcend race (cf. Acts 13:1-3), social class (Jas 2:1-9) and gender (Gal 3:28), as shown in their agapē feasts (cf. Jude 12; 2 Pet 2:13 NRSV mg.; see Lord's Supper).

5.4. Joy in Persecution. Also significant was the witness of courage, endurance* and even joy in the midst of persecution* for the sake of the gospel (cf. Acts 4:23-31; 5:41; 13:50-52; Jas 1:2-4; 1 Pet 1:6-8; Rev 2:3), as when Paul and Silas sang in prison (Acts 16:25). Such serenity and joy in the face of death was viewed as an expression of one's faith (Phil 1:29; Rev 2:10; cf. Heb 10:34) and was exemplified by the Lord Jesus himself (Heb 12:2).

5.5. Contextualized Message. Although the focus of the euangelion was clearly Jesus Christ, it was expressed flexibly according to the Christians' own spiritual and intellectual understanding as well as on their audience's backgrounds. To the Jews, Jesus was presented as the Messiah in fulfillment of the high expectations in first-century Judaism. Jesus was introduced as the second Moses* (Deut 18:15, 18-19; as in Acts 3:22; 7:37; Heb 7:4-11), the eternal son of David (2 Sam 7:1-16; as in Acts 2:25-36; 1 Pet 2:21-25), the Son of Man (Dan 7:14; as in Acts 7:56) and the suffering* servant (Is 53; as in Acts 3:18; 8:34). Jesus was also fitted into the Primal Man philosophy of intellectual Hellenistic* Judaism (cf. Rom 5:12-19; Heb 5:7-10; Rev 1:13; 14:14) and the Wisdom-Logos ideology of liberal Judaism (cf. Jn 1:1-18; Heb 1:1-12; see Logos). As opportunities arose, the evangelizers appealed to the OT (such as Acts 2:16; 26:23) and used the different types of Jewish exegesis (such as Acts 2:17-26; 1 Pet 1:10-12; Rev 5:5), to highlight the importance and relevance of their Lord.

In preaching to non-Jews, they drew on Greek literature and Stoic and Epicurean philosophies when needed (Acts 17:27-28). When speaking to the religious, especially in the mystery cults, they used words like mystērion, plērōma ("fullness") and zōē aiōnios ("eternal life"); God was the Creator and provider of all and not dependent on people's idolatrous offerings (Acts 14:15-17). To others they offered God's forgiveness* (Acts 17:31; 24:25) and freedom from demons, magic* and Fate (Acts 16:16-18; 27:13—28:10; cf. 1 Pet 3:22; Rev 5; 18—19).

5.6. Healings and Miracles. In a world filled with fears of diseases, demons, Destiny and magic, the impact of "power evangelism" was very significant. Acts mentions the "signs and wonders"* performed by Peter (Acts 5:15-19) and John (Acts 3:1-9), Stephen (Acts 6:8), Philip (Acts 8:6-7), Paul (Acts 19:11-12; cf. Rom 15:18-19) and the apostles in general (Acts 2:43; 4:33; 5:12; cf. Heb 2:4; see Miracles; Signs and Wonders). Some believers were specially endowed with spiritual gifts of healing* and miraculous powers (1 Cor 12:9-10; cf. Jas 5:14-16). Such phenomena done in Jesus' name proved to be superior to the cures and exorcisms of pagan physicians and magicians.

5.7. Prayer. Above all, the early Christians prayed together (cf. Acts 1:13-14; 4:24-31; 12:12). They recognized that their desire, strength and boldness to evangelize came from a divine source: the Holy Spirit was God's gift par excellence (Lk 11:13; see Holy Spirit), given to empower them to bear witness to Jesus (Acts 1:8; 5:29-31, 33; cf. Jn 15:26-27). He was the Evangelizer who equipped individuals, like Peter (Acts 2:4, 33; 4:8), Stephen (Acts 6:10), Philip (Acts 8:29), and Paul (Acts 9:17; 16:6), as well as churches, like Antioch (Acts 13:2), to witness for Christ.

All important decisions in the church were marked by prayer* (Acts 1:14, 24-25; 6:6; 9:11; 10:9; 13:3). James 5:13-18 shows that for the early believers prayer was both an ongoing conversation with God (cf. 1 Thess 5:16-18; Phil 6:18; Eph 6:18-20; Col 4:2) and a special activity when people were sick—not just for evangelistic value.

6. The Methods.

The primary methods used in evangelism in the early church included the following.

6.1. Witnessing. As seen above, the primary means was the spontaneous sharing of the gospel* by all believers, including prominent leaders like Peter and John (Acts 3:1-8), Philip (Acts 8), Ananias (Acts 9:10-18) and Paul (Acts 13:6-12; 16:29-32), even before authorities (Acts 24:10-25; 26:1-29). Converted heads of households had their constituencies baptized at the same time with themselves.

6.2. Preaching. For the first twenty years (c. A.D. 35-55) before the break with Judaism, preaching in the synagogues* was done commonly (Acts 6:10; 9:22; 13:44; 18:28). Open-air preaching was done where people naturally passed or assembled (e.g., Acts 2; 8; 14); this was not uniquely Christian, for Jews and Cynics also used courtyards, open fields, riverbanks and even markets. Some preaching was "prophetic" in the sense of "ecstatic," i.e., speaking directly in Christ's name and coherently "in the Spirit" (Acts 11:28; 1 Cor 14:24-25; cf. Rev 19:10).

6.3. Testimonials. Evangelism both in private and in public included persuasive testimonies (diamartyresthai, "testify forcefully," as in Acts 2:40; 8:25; 18:5; 23:11; 28:23, cf. 10:42). These consisted of one's personal experience of salvation, especially the power behind one's transformed and/or exemplary life (cf. 1 Pet 3:15).

6.4. Teaching. Most prominent here is Paul's use of the school of Tyrannus in Ephesus to explicate the faith to inquirers (Acts 19:8-9). From the beginning, evangelistic teaching* in public to explain the faith* was already practiced (Acts 5:21, 25, 28, 42).

Included in this category is "dialogue," which used intellectual discussion, careful study of Scripture and patient argumentation, usually in small groups (Acts 17:2-3, 17; 18:4, 19; 19:8-9; 24:25; 28:23). Some dialogues were quite intense and were considered public debates (cf. Acts 9:22, 29; 17:3; 18:28).

6.5. Literature. The OT texts were used to bring Timothy and many Jews to the faith (2 Tim 3:15; Acts 17:2-3). The four Gospels were a new literary form in the first-century world; three of them (except Matthew) were written with the clear intent to challenge their readers to respond in faith to the person whose story they record (see esp. Jn 20:30-31).

7. Postapostolic Developments.

Evangelism in the first half of the second century may be summarized as follows.

The message remained focused on the historical Jesus as the kerygmatic Christ and called for absolute allegiance to him (e.g., Diogn. 8—9). There were warnings against false teachers or false teachings (e.g., Ign. Eph.; Ign. Smyrn.; Ign. Magn. 8, 10; Pol. Phil. 7) as well as nominal faith (Ign. Rom. 3.2; Ign. Magn. 4.1; Pol. Phil. 2.2; Justin Martyr Apol. I 4.7-8; 16.8).

Though love* for God remained as a motive for evangelism, the main motivation soon shifted to obedience* to a mandate, often with meritorious connotations such as the desire to be rewarded with eternal* life (Justin Martyr Apol. I 8) or the fear of being punished on judgment* day (Barn. 19, 21; Pol. Phil. 2, 5; Justin Martyr Apol. II 12). There are a few instances of gloating over the tragic fate of the heathen (Apol. I 19; Apol. II 9; Mart. Pol. 11), but what prevailed was the concern to win them to Christ, even pleading for repentance* (1 Clem. 7—8; Justin Martyr Apol. II 13—15; Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 7).

Concerning conversions, the apostolic fathers remained wary of superficial faith even after baptism* (as in the NT case of Simon Magus, Acts 8:23). Some started to regard baptism as unrepeatable (see Repentance, Second Repentance), thus needing to be administered by a bishop (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2), and as an amulet to ward off evil forces (Ign. Pol. 6.2). The most obvious change was the delay in administering baptism, which was done only after a period of instruction on the doctrinal and especially ethical aspects of the faith (cf. "the Two Ways" in Did., Barn. and Herm.) and a time of prayer and fasting (Apol. I 61).

A relatively nonrepressive context for evangelism continued to prevail from A.D. 100 to 150. Except for Trajan's reign, the persecution* of Christians remained sporadic and localized until A.D. 170. Most converts were still from the lower or middle classes (Diogn. 5-7; cf. Barn. 5), with some notable exceptions. The spontaneous expansion geographically to the whole world (1 Clem. 59; Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 42; cf. Apol. I 39) continued to be through the existing road networks and trade routes; by 150 there were thriving churches in France, Spain, Germany, Gaul and Africa Proconsularis (from Alexandria and extending up the Nile).

The gospel continued to spread through the spontaneous witness of ordinary believers (Ign. Trall. 8). The tradition of roving evangelists and evangelizing bishops/elders also continued (Did. 4, 11, 13; Herm. Vis. 3.5.1; Herm. Sim. 9.15.4; 16.5). Ignatius* urged Polycarp,* a bishop like himself, to "exhort all people that they may be saved" (Ign. Pol. 1; cf. Mart. Pol. 12).

Without following von Harnack's extreme claim that the second-century church's* "incipient Catholicism" (see Early Catholicism) was a "corrupt synthesis" of Hellenism and apostolic Christianity, we must acknowledge that there were indeed departures from the simplicity of NT concepts to a more institutionalized view of church order (e.g., Did. 12-13; 1 Clem. 40—41; Ign. Eph. 12, 20; Ign. Phld. 9; Herm. Sim. 9.16).

Though the hope* for an imminent parousia* was less intense, no one thought of erecting religious buildings (see Architecture, Early Church). Homes continued to be the main venue for church meetings. The presence of many children in the house churches (Pliny Ep. 10.96; cf. Justin Martyr Apol. I 15) indicates that the admonitions for parents to raise their children in the faith (Barn. 19.10; 1 Clem. 21.6-8; Pol. Phil. 4.2; cf. Eph 6:1-4) were heeded.

Evangelists preached against immorality, pleaded for repentance and the holy option of the "Two Ways" (Did.; Barn.; Justin Martyr Apol. I 14), and criticized faults among the believers (1-2 Clem.; Herm.). Pliny the Younger found out for himself that Christians did hold to high morals (Pliny Ep. 10.96), in contrast to those of pagan associations (Apol. I 9). Their exemplary lives caused people to say, "This does not look like the work of humans: this is the power of God" (Diogn. 7; cf. 10).

Those who suffered* and faced martyrdom* considered it a privilege and an opportunity to bear witness* to Christ; 1 Clement 5 attests to the courage and endurance* Peter and Paul had when they bore witness to Jesus. Ignatius (d. 117) showed an extreme form of confidence and eagerness to face martyrdom. This emphasis on the witness's death in the conception of martyrein (cf. Justin Martyr Apol. II 12) is a marked development from the NT emphasis on the witness's faithfulness to the role of representing Jesus (Rev 2:13; 6:19; 11:3, 7; 11:6).

The gospel* continued to be contextualized to address the different needs and understandings of both Jews and non-Jews. For instance, Justin Martyr discussed Jesus as the Logos* with intellectual Jews (Apol. I 5; Dial. Tryph. 1, 8) and offered freedom from fear (Dial. Tryph. 30) and God's forgiveness* to others (Apol. I 68; Apol. II 2, 11, 14). Ignatius showed Jesus to be the pantocratōr who is sovereign over all rivals (Ign. Eph. 19; cf. Barn. 2.6), and 1 Clement 25 used the phoenix to prove the resurrection.*

After the break with official Judaism, Christians were considered "impious blasphemers" who believed in two Gods and that God had union with a woman (cf. Dial. Tryph. 16, 96). Especially after the A.D. 135 Bar Kokhba revolt, there was no longer any known attempt to win Jews to the faith.

The postapostolic period continued to see the gifts of miracles and healings* in the name of Jesus as powerful evidences of the reality of the message. Quadratus was cited as saying that some of the people whom Jesus healed or raised from the dead were still alive when he wrote (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.3.2). Justin Martyr also referred to such healings among the Christians (Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 30, 85), saying that Jesus was made man "for the destruction of demons" (Justin Martyr Apol. II 6). As in the NT, no magic formula or training program was needed for such ministry.

Fervent prayer* continued to be a vital part of the early second-century church: Ignatius taught, "Pray without ceasing, on behalf of others" (Ign. Eph. 10, cf. Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 7).

Public preaching, including prophetic preaching, was still practiced (Did. 11; Ign. Phld. 7.1). But except for the Epistle to Diognetus and Justin Apology II, section 15, there seems to be no second-century Christian literature aiming to win the goodwill of and positive response from nonbelieving readers. A development was the rise of philosopher-evangelists who founded their own "schools," like Justin Martyr in Rome (cf. Apol. II) and Pantaenus in Alexandria (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.10).

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY; GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION; GOSPEL; KERYGMA AND DIDACHE; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE; UNIVERSALISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. U. Becker, "Gospel, Evangelize, Evangelist," NIDNNT 2:107-15; U. Becker et al., "Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma," NIDNNT 3:44-68; F. F. Bruce, The Defense of the Gospel in the New Testament (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); L. Coenen, A. A. Trites, "Witness, Testimony," NIDNNT 3:1038-50; C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936); J. D. Dunn, ed., Jews and Christians: The Partings of the Ways, A.D. 70 to 135 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992); W. H. C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); G. Friedrich, "εὐαγγελίζομαι κτλ," TDNT 2:707-37; M. Green, Evangelism in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970); F. Hahn, Mission in the New Testament (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1965); A. von Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (2 vols; London: Williams and Norgate, 1905); E. A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century (London: Tyndale, 1960); J. A. Kirk, "Apostleship After Rengstorf: Towards a Synthesis," NTS 21 (1975) 249-64; A. D. Nock, Conversion (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961); W. H. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire Before A.D. 170 (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1893); H. Shanks, ed., Christianity and Rabbinic Judaism: A Parallel History of Their Origins and Early Development (Washington, D.C.: Biblical Archaeology Society, 1992); R. Stark, The Rise of Christianity (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996); R. C. Worley, Preaching and Teaching in the Earliest Church (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1967).

D. S. Lim

EVIL ONE. See SATAN, DEVIL.

EVIL SPIRITS. See SPIRITS.

EXALTATION, ENTHRONEMENT

The exaltation of Jesus, a concept that embraces Jesus' ascension,* session at God's* right hand and return in triumph, expresses God's approval of Jesus' life and acceptance of Jesus' sacrificial death (see Death of Christ). It expresses the conviction that Jesus is the agent of God's reign and judgment*: loyalty to him and obedience* to his example and teaching would mean a share in his honor and authority* as well as vindication at his coming in power (see DPL, Exaltation, Enthronement). Even though following Christ brought one into disrepute in the eyes of the world, Jesus' exaltation assured his followers that they too would be honored before God's eternal court. Jesus' exaltation signified that Jesus now exists in the presence of God, forever able to intercede on behalf of his followers as their high priest,* assuring them of their perpetual access to God's favor and timely help. Jesus encounters his church* as Lord,* the one who rules the church and claims the complete allegiance of believers, and Savior, the one who is able to bring his followers to their promised inheritance; Jesus will encounter the world as Judge, whose coming will bring terror to all who resist his rule but whose appearing will mean the consummation of God's purposes for God's faithful people. In such ways Jesus' exaltation became a powerful source of encouragement to the churches of the first and second centuries.

1. Jewish Background
2. Acts
3. Hebrews
4. General Epistles
5. Revelation
6. Apostolic Fathers

1. Jewish Background.

The NT authors share the Jewish conviction that God is exalted over creation* and enthroned as king (a frequent theme of the Psalms, for example), but through their experience of the risen Jesus and through their reading of certain OT texts they now see that exaltation shared by God's agent, the Son.* Especially important for this process are the "royal psalms" such as Psalms 2, 45 and 110, which are read as indications of Jesus' vocation and activity after his resurrection* and ascension. The Danielic vision of the Son of Man (Dan 7:13-14) is also now read as God's giving eternal royal authority to Jesus: what he now possesses by right will be actualized at his Parousia.* The hope* formerly expressed in prayers* for God's intervention in human affairs to set things right, establish justice and vindicate the righteous (cf. Is 64:1) is now expressed in prayers for Jesus' return as exalted Lord and Judge to effect these ends.

2. Acts.

Acts* begins with the story of Jesus' ascension, after which the apostles* speak of Jesus being "exalted at the right hand of God" (Acts 2:33-36, referring explicitly to Ps 110:1; cf. Acts 5:30-31) and the martyr Stephen* can see the heavens open to reveal Jesus in this highly exalted station (Acts 7:55-56). Jesus' vindication and exaltation by God necessitate that all who participated in his rejection repent (see Repentance) and respond to Jesus not as the crucified criminal but the one on whom God has set the highest seal of approval (Acts 2:36-38). Jesus' exaltation imposes a similar mandate on the Gentiles*: Jesus has made possible their turning away from idols (see Idolatry) to the one God and their inclusion in the people of God; he is returning as Judge of those who refuse to repent (Acts 17:31).

Jesus' exaltation is explicated in Acts by a number of titles denoting the rank Jesus has attained: God has made Jesus "Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36) and "Author and Savior" (Acts 5:30-31). "Lord" represents the attribution of the divine title kyrios to the exalted Jesus, such that Jesus now shares in God's dominion over creation and history. He is Lord actively of the church, receiving its worship* (Acts 7:59; 13:2), directing it from his exalted position (Acts 9:10-16; 16:7-8) and supplying it with the Holy Spirit* (Acts 1:5; 2:32-33). D. L. Tiede is thus correct to note that Acts does not express an "absentee Christology"—even though he "must remain in heaven" for this interim period (Acts 3:21), the exalted Lord is still present for his people. Jesus' lordship will become absolute when he returns to judge the world (Acts 17:31). As "Christ," it is Jesus who has been appointed by God to bring the "times of refreshing" for his people at the time set beforehand by God (Acts 3:19-21). As "Author" or Founder, Jesus has initiated God's purpose for Israel's repentance and laid the foundation for its restoration, and as "Savior" he has been empowered by God to deliver his followers.

3. Hebrews.

Hebrews* opens with a vivid presentation of Jesus' exaltation and enthronement. Following Jesus' suffering* of death on behalf of all (Heb 2:9) and making purification for sins (Heb 1:3), God seats Jesus at God's right hand (Heb 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2). Hebrews's extensive use of this image of session shows the importance of Psalm 110:1 for this author, as for NT reflection on Christ's status generally (Cullmann). He is exalted above the angels* to the extent that a "Son"* is greater than "servants"* (Heb 1:4-7, 9). God's own self is Jesus' eternal throne—Jesus' authority and reign are embedded in God's authority and reign, and Jesus rules with a scepter of righteousness* (Heb 1:8-9; cf. Ps. 45:6-7). Seated at God's right hand, Jesus awaits the final subjection of all his enemies (Heb 1:13; 10:13; cf. Ps. 110:1).

The author of Hebrews did not stop reading Psalm 110 at the first verse, however. Hebrews finds in this psalm that Jesus' exaltation was an appointment to an eternal priesthood "after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb 5:6, 10; 7:17, 21; Ps 110:4; see Melchizedek). At his exaltation Jesus "passed through the heavens" (Heb 4:14) and stands "above the heavens" (Heb 7:26) so that he has entered the heavenly tabernacle,* the "true" sanctuary "not made with hands" (Heb 8:2; 9:24), which stands in the permanent, unshakable realm of the divine (see Heaven). There Jesus, possessing an "indestructible life" (Heb 7:16, 25), lives forever to make intercession for his followers (Heb 7:25; cf. Rom 8:34).

Jesus has become the believers' "great high priest" (Heb 4:14; 5:5-6, 10; 8:1-2), whose mediation assures believers of God's favor. Jesus' death becomes the one sacrifice* that is able to remove sins and cleanse the heavenly sanctuary of defilement (Heb 9:23-26; 10:11-14) so that the believers can approach God with the anticipation of favor rather than judgment (Heb 4:14-16; 10:19-22). Jesus enjoys face-to-face access to God (Heb 9:12, 24) and enjoys the closest possible relationship to God in God's household* ("Son"): he is the one mediator whose mediation would be assured success (Heb 7:26-28). It is also in this priestly aspect of Christ's ministry* that the author of Hebrews draws the closest connections between Jesus' earthly activity and his activity as exalted Son (Heb 5:7-10). Jesus' session at God's right hand demonstrates the completeness and efficacy of Jesus' one high-priestly sacrifice (Heb 10:11-14). Psalm 110:1 signifies therefore not so much Jesus' active rule for the author of Hebrews (Hay, Saucy) as God's approval of Jesus' work and the completion of the priestly task of restoring favor between God and the people who approach God through Jesus.

The author's development of Jesus' exaltation and priestly mediation serves an intense pastoral interest. First, Jesus' exaltation assists believers, who are Christ's "partners" (metochoi, Heb 3:6, 14) and "brothers and sisters" (Heb 2:10-12), to rise above society's attempts to shame them back into conformity. As Jesus steered the course of obedience to God, despising the world's negative opinion and hostility, and came thus to enjoy the place of highest honor in the cosmos, so believers are called to look to God's reward* of approval and honor (Heb 12:1-3), if they hold fast to the confession and continue in service to fellow believers (Heb 3:14; 6:10; 10:35-36). As Jesus has been "crowned with glory and honor" after his incarnation and suffering of death on behalf of all (Heb 2:6-9; cf. Ps 8:4-6), so the believers have the sure hope* that they will also share in Jesus' exaltation at the consummation (Heb 2:10; cf. Hurst).

Second, Jesus' exaltation to the priesthood* of the heavenly tabernacle means that Jesus' loyal clients also enjoy face-to-face access with God through Jesus' mediation. Unlike earthly high priests, Jesus does not leave his people standing outside the Holy Place but allows them also to "approach with boldness the throne of favor," so that they may "receive mercy and find favor for timely help" (Heb 4:16). The believers may "enter the sanctuary" and go "through the curtain" (Heb 10:19-22) and so receive from the Fount of favor the resources they require to endure in loyalty to Jesus. Moreover, when Jesus entered the abiding realm he did so as a forerunner (Heb 6:20; cf. Maclean): the believers too will be brought into their heavenly homeland and permanent city that they purchased with the price of disenfranchisement in the world (Heb 10:34; 11:13-16; 13:13-14). This is the salvation* that believers may anticipate at Jesus' return (Heb 9:28).

Third, Jesus' exaltation to the place of highest honor and his embeddedness in God's honor as Son make the consequences of breaking faith* with him all the more severe. Those who enjoy the benefits that the Son's death and present mediation have made possible and then reject these costly favors for the sake of peace with the unbelieving society have shown contempt for the One whose honor God will uphold and avenge at the judgment (Heb 10:26-31; cf. Heb 2:1-4; 6:4-8). Christ's exaltation is thus part of a carefully orchestrated rhetorical strategy designed to encourage believers to persevere in their Christian commitment.

4. General Epistles.

1 Peter* speaks frequently of Jesus' exaltation, often in close connection with his suffering (1 Pet 1:11, 21). This no doubt stems from one pastoral intent of the epistle, namely, to encourage Christians to face trial, reproach and suffering now so as to share in the glory* and vindication that also followed Jesus' suffering on account of obedience to God (1 Pet 4:13-14). The exaltation of Jesus is present also in the architectural metaphor of the cornerstone (1 Pet 2:4, 6-8; see Stone). God's exaltation of Jesus, the "stone" rejected by human beings, to the place of "cornerstone" shows the fallibility of human evaluation, encouraging believers to disregard society's negative evaluation of the followers of Jesus (1 Pet 2:12; 3:13-17; 4:4) now in hope of future exaltation by God with Christ, to whom they are being joined as "living stones." The promise of sharing in Christ's glory is also used to encourage submission and humility* toward one another within the church (1 Pet 5:6): because God exalts the humble, there is no need or place for competition and self-advancement within the group (which erodes group cohesion and solidarity).

Jesus' exaltation by God shows God's approval of and public identification with Jesus, such that the believers may be assured that their hope and confidence in Jesus are well-placed—they are in fact placed in God's own self (1 Pet 1:21). The efficacy of baptism* is also linked with Christ's exaltation to the right hand of God, above angels and authorities and powers (1 Pet 3:21-22). In the context of the discussion of Jesus' suffering "for sins once for all . . . in order to bring" believers "to God" (1 Pet 3:18), the resurrection shows God's acceptance of Jesus' sacrifice and thus also of the believers who have identified themselves as Christ's clients through baptism. Jesus as exalted Christ remains our mediator, through whom we may "offer spiritual sacrifices to God" (1 Pet 2:5; cf. Heb 13:15-16).

References to Jesus' exaltation in the other General Epistles are scant. 2 Peter 1:16-18 refers to the transfiguration of Jesus as a revelation of his true honor, a prefiguration of the glory Jesus now enjoys and prophetic vision of the Parousia (see 2 Peter). This vision of Jesus' power and majesty assures the genuineness of the apostolic teaching: it does not consist in humanly devised myths but is a revelation* from the divine Son. James* refers once to the "glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (Jas 2:1; see commentaries for variant translations, one linking Jesus to the "glory" [šᵉḵînâh]) in the context of an exhortation to show no partiality toward the rich or contempt for the poor, for the well-to-do are the ones who fail to honor the "excellent name" of Jesus (Jas 2:7). 1 John 2:2 speaks of Jesus' ongoing role as advocate before God on our behalf, but the Johannine epistles focus much more on the incarnation and its effects rather than its sequel (see John, Letters of).

5. Revelation.

In Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) Jesus is presented at the outset as the "ruler of the kings of the earth" (Rev 1:5). Jesus as God's Messiah has been exalted to share in God's kingship: Jesus' reign has been confirmed in God's court (Rev 5:12-14; 11:15) and will soon be actualized in the human and demonic realms. John's initial vision depicts Jesus as he now exists, in his exalted, glorified, resurrected body (Rev 1:12-17). He is the male child who was caught up into heaven, whence he awaits reception of universal rule (Rev 12:5); he has sat down on his "Father's throne" and thus shares in God's kingly rule (Rev 3:21). Jesus is the Lamb* who enjoys unique privilege and authority in light of what he accomplished by his voluntary death: the right to open the seven-sealed scroll* and thus authority over the setting in motion of the end (Rev 5:2-3, 6-10, 11-12). Jesus has received authority from his Father (Rev 2:28), and the heavenly hosts celebrate the initial realization of this authority in the casting down of Satan* from heaven to earth (Rev 12:10).

Revelation's primary movement is toward the realization of the kingship of God and God's Messiah, specifically through their destruction of their spiritual and human opponents, their judgment of the world and their vindication of the faithful (Rev 11:15-18). Liturgical expressions of the enthronement of God and Jesus in Revelation are, like the liturgical expressions of the same in Christian worship, anticipations of fulfillment—the reign is consistently celebrated before it is consummated (Rev 11:15-18; 19:6; see Worship; Liturgical Elements). Christ's victory over all his enemies is, however, assured. As "Lord of lords and King of kings," his rule and exaltation are ultimate and his authority irresistible (Rev 17:13-14). In John's second vision of the glorified Christ, Jesus now takes his royal authority and makes his reign secure by destroying his enemies (Rev 19:11-16). The symbols of multiple crowns express the coming monarch's rule over the "kingdoms of this world." The promise of Psalm 2:9 that "he will rule them with a rod of iron" is finally fulfilled, as Christ's enthronement is actualized at last.

Again Christ's enthronement and the assurance of his victory serve an important pastoral purpose. Christ's exaltation and enthronement are made a motivation for believers' steadfastness as they are given the hope of sharing in Christ's reign (Rev 2:25-28; 3:21). This is vividly portrayed in the vision of those believers who were shamefully executed for their loyalty to Jesus but who will be rewarded with a share in Christ's reign, seated upon thrones themselves (Rev 20:4-6). Christ's ultimate triumph as "Lord of lords and King of kings" (Rev 17:13-14) also serves to orient believers toward the antienthronement of the emperor* by the dragon (Rev 13:2, 4, 7-8; see Beasts) and toward Roman imperial ideology as a whole. Those who participate in the exaltation of God's enemy fall prey to dire consequences when the true Lord judges the world (Rev 14:9-11; 16:2), whereas those who revere Christ as Lord by not giving reverence to a usurper will enjoy God's presence and favor eternally (Rev 15:2-4; 20:4-6; 22:3-5).

6. Apostolic Fathers.

The successors of the apostles shared the conviction that Jesus was exalted to a throne at God's right hand and given authority and dominion following his resurrection (Pol. Phil. 2.1). These writers (see Apostolic Fathers) wrestled as well with the nature of that dominion and its significance for believers. Jesus the incarnate One is the preexistent Son (see Preexistence), "Lord over all the earth" already by virtue of his agency in creation (Barn. 5.5; 12.10). The *Shepherd of Hermas also underscores this identification (Herm. Sim. 9.12.2-3), although his parabolic language threatens the unity of the Son and Jesus at one point (Herm. Sim. 5.2, 6). Here Hermas distinguishes Jesus, the embodied "servant" who obeys God's command and exceeds it, from the Son of God, who is Spirit, with whom he is made coheir by God. Hermas's point, however, is that Jesus has been exalted now in his human nature as well as his divine nature and aims thus at arousing hope in his followers, who are depicted in the parable as Jesus' fellow servants and who share in the bounty to which Jesus as "servant" has attained.

Jesus now reigns over the church as "the bishop of all" (Ign. Magn. 3.1-2; Ign. Rom. 9.1), the "lord of the whole tower" which is the church (Herm. Sim. 9.7.1). All believers owe Jesus complete allegiance and obedience "from the heart." Jesus, who now shares God's status (2 Clem. 1.1-2; Ign. Pol. 8.3), is the "helper" and "protector" of the believers (1 Clem. 36.1; 61.3; 64.1). His exalted status assures the believers that they will be well taken care of and makes Jesus a patron par excellence: if believers think of him as they ought, they will know him as the source of outstanding benefactions (2 Clem. 1.1-2). The impact of Hebrews's portrayal of the exalted Jesus as high priest, through whom prayer become efficacious and through whom believers offer their gratitude to God, is widespread in this literature (1 Clem. 36.1; 61.3; 64.1; Ign. Phld. 9.1; Pol. Phil. 12.2; Mart. Pol. 14.3).

Jesus' enthronement now as "ruling monarch" (Mart. Pol. 21.1) once again looks to the future for the full realization of his authority and reign, when Christ will return upon the clouds of heaven as "Lord" (Did. 16.6-8). The believers therefore pray for this consummation, a petition that dominates the celebration of the Eucharist (Did. 10.5-6), when the "future Judge of living and dead alike" (Barn. 7.2; 2 Clem. 1.1-2) will receive the "kingdom of this world" to the amazement of unbelievers (2 Clem. 17.5-7). Once more one finds that discussion of Christ's exaltation now and at the Parousia serves a hortatory function. Exaltation as the outcome of Jesus' endurance* of suffering helps believers endure in the hope of sharing in Christ's vindication by God (Barn. 7.11). Those who remain loyal even unto death, God will exalt to honor and renown above (1 Clem. 45.7-8). Believers are confirmed in their doing of God's will as revealed by Jesus by the hope that Jesus' own exaltation provides (Pol. Phil. 2.1-2; Ign. Trall. 9.2). As they live with a view to the day of Jesus' return as Judge and King, they are enabled to endure in the discipline of the Christian life and not to deny Jesus by word or deed (2 Clem. 17.5-7).

See also ASCENSION; CHRISTOLOGY; DEATH OF CHRIST; GLORY; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Bietenhard, "Lord, Master," NIDNTT 2:508-20; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959); J. G. Davies, He Ascended into Heaven (London: Lutterworth, 1958); D. A. deSilva, Despising Shame: Honor Discourse and Community Maintenance in the Epistle to the Hebrews (SBLDS 152; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); M. Gourgues, A la droite de Dieu: Résurrection de Jésus et actualisation du Psaume 110:1 dans le Nouveau Testament (Paris: Gabalda, 1978); D. M. Hay, Glory at the Right Hand: Psalm 110 in Early Christianity (SBLMS 18; Nashville: Abingdon, 1973); L. D. Hurst, "The Christology of Hebrews 1 and 2" in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament: Studies in Christology, ed. L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987); W. R. G. Loader, "Christ at the Right Hand—Ps. 110:1 in the New Testament," NTS 24 (1977-78) 199-217; A. J. Maclean, "Ascension" in Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, ed. J. Hastings (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1916) 1:95-99; W. Milligan, The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of Our Lord (London: Macmillan, 1891); C. F. D. Moule, The Origins of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); M. C. Parsons, "Son and High Priest: A Study in the Christology of Hebrews," EvQ 60 (1988) 195-215; M. Saucy, "Exaltation Christology in Hebrews: What Kind of Reign?" TJ (n.s.) 14 (1993) 41-62; E. Schweizer, Lordship and Discipleship (London: SCM, 1960); D. L. Tiede, "The Exaltation of Jesus and the Restoration of Israel in Acts 1," HTR 79 (1986) 178-286.

D. A. deSilva

5 EZRA AND 6 EZRA. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

F

FAITH, FAITHFULNESS

Faith is one of the most important theological concepts of the NT. Although the Pauline corpus most readily comes to mind when one speaks of faith, the concept is no less important in the later NT. One need only read Hebrews 11 to be reminded of that fact. "Faith" and its cognates are used in a variety of ways in the later NT; the word group is used to refer to religious faith (belief and trust in God* or Christ*) or trust, to the Christian faith itself, to something that functions as a proof, to those who are faithful and to that which is certain or unfailing.

1. Acts
2. Hebrews
3. James
4. Petrine Letters
5. Johannine Letters
6. Revelation
7. Apostolic Fathers

1. Acts.

Acts* uses pisteuō ("to believe") to refer to conversion to the Christian faith. When it is said in Acts 13:12 that the proconsul "began to believe," it means that upon seeing the blinding of Bar-Jesus, he became a believer, that is, that he was converted to the Christian faith. It is interesting to note that his baptism* is not mentioned, although it is almost always connected with conversion (Acts 8:12, 13; 11:16, 17; 16:15, 31-33; 18:8; 19:4, 5; cf. Acts 2:38, 41; 22:16). However, this does not mean that Sergius Paulus was not truly converted (cf. the discussion in Bruce, 299).

Acts very closely connects faith in Christ (or "in his name" [Acts 3:16, 11:17; 16:31; 20:21]) with repentance.* This is not surprising, since in Acts the call to repentance is an essential element in proclaiming the gospel (cf. Barrett, 154). Thus after we read in Acts 11:17 that the Gentiles* believed in God, in the next verse we learn that it is through Christ that the Gentiles were "granted repentance that leads to life." Acts 6:7 says that those who became believers become "obedient to the faith" (where "faith" refers to the content of Christian belief and life), highlighting that for Luke faith is always more than mental assent to a set of doctrines; having faith means that one begins to live as God would have one to live.

The important theme that Gentiles are to believe in Christ and thus become part of the people of God (see Church as Israel) surfaces in various places in Acts, such as Acts 14:27 (see also Acts 13:8, 12, 39, 41, 48; 14:1, 9, 22, 23), which says that God opened a "door of faith" to the Gentiles. We are not to assume that for the first time in Acts, Gentiles have become believers (see the conversion of the eunuch in Acts 8 and of Cornelius* in Acts 10). It is rather a summary statement of what has happened. The phrase "door of faith" is ambiguous; "faith" here most likely means not "true piety" (against Haenchen, 437) but the act of believing and the subsequent lifestyle. Though it is impossible to be precise, the expression implies that a way into faith has been made possible for the Gentiles through Christ.

2. Hebrews.

As we would expect, Hebrews* emphasizes the idea that merely hearing the gospel message without responding in faith will benefit the hearers nothing (Heb 4:2). One must respond to the message with faith and must persevere in that faith.

The Christians to which Hebrews is addressed are not threatened by a specific false teaching but seem to be afflicted with a fear of suffering* that is crippling their faith (cf. the discussion in Ellingworth). Thus the author encourages them to "hold firmly to Jesus Christ, who is the initiator and the perfecter of faith."

Faith, they must realize, is of divine origin. Moreover, since it is not a mere human invention, they must understand that "faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen" (Heb 11:1). This is not a definition of faith (against Michel and Attridge) but a description of what it can accomplish in the life of the believer; properly understood and lived, faith ties believers to that which they do not yet see, but hope for. It is a dynamic, not static, response to God that allows one to live life in light of what one does not see (cf. the discussion in Lane).

In Hebrews, to have faith is to be faithful to God and to the gospel. There is an important difference between Hebrews's and Paul's use of Habakkuk 2:3-4. Galatians 3:12 makes it clear that Paul sees the law* as operating on a different principle than that of the faith enunciated in Habakkuk 2:4. For Paul "the law is not based on faith." The just live "by faith," but the law is based on "doing," a point Paul buttresses by citing Leviticus 18:5: "whoever does the works of the law will live by them" (though Paul does not mean to imply that those who live by faith are not required to live in obedience* to God).

For the author of Hebrews, perseverance is the point of the affirmation of Habakkuk 2:3-4 (which he adapts much more freely than Paul does): "but my righteous one will live by faith" (Heb 10:38). It provides the starting point for the lengthy list of OT heroes of perseverance in faith in Hebrews 11:1-40. Faced with the possibility of destruction such as Israel* faced in the wilderness (Heb 10:38-39), the readers of Hebrews are encouraged to remain faithful and to live by faith (Heb 10:38-39; 4:2-3). The OT heroes were faithful, as Habakkuk 2:3-4 says one must be. "My righteous one shall live by faith" is seen by Hebrews as a call to perseverance, a perseverance that is possible only because one can trust God. Faith in Hebrews involves both elements of obedience (manifested in endurance*) and trust in a God who is himself faithful (Fitzmyer).

3. James.

James* emphasizes that faith must be accompanied by works (see Faith and Works). Whereas Paul says that one is saved by faith apart from works (cf. Rom 9:32), James says that faith without works is dead (Jas 2:17). However, contrary to J. T. Sanders, James has not misunderstood Paul. Sanders, who compares James to Romans 3—4, fails to take into account not only other Pauline letters but even the evidence of Romans itself. James is arguing that faith without works is not authentic faith. True faith calls for works, that is, doing the will of God, which includes kindness to the poor. A person, he says, is justified by works and not by faith alone (Jas 2:24). Yet there is no dichotomy between James and Paul. It is a matter of different but mutually compatible perspectives. Paul insists on the necessity of works in the believer's life (cf. Gal 5:6; 6:40), but because of his focus on justification by faith he emphasizes that it is faith that saves. For James the works that must accompany faith are in focus. James's emphasis can easily be accounted for by positing that some people were saying that belief was enough, and they did not want to be concerned about such things as charity or that the church was courting the rich by not insisting on good works from them (Davids).

There is also a significant point of contact between James and Paul that should not be ignored. Throughout the Pauline corpus we see that Paul believes that God makes possible the good works that believers do. This, although it is not emphasized, also appears in James. In James 1:5 he says that if anyone desires wisdom* from God, God will give it him or her. In James 3:17 the wisdom that comes from above is said to consist of, among other things, "mercy and good fruits." The works that are to accompany faith thus find their ultimate origin in God (see also Jas 4:6: "he gives more grace"). Thus for both James and Paul the demand for Christian works is predicated upon one's experience of grace* (see DPL, James and Paul).

4. Petrine Letters.

In 1 Peter 1:21 Christ is spoken of as the agent of faith in God. It is "through him you have confidence in God . . . so that your faith and hope are in God." This verse highlights that in 1 Peter* faith and hope* are virtual synonyms (cf. Davids), but more importantly they show that for Peter, as for much of the NT, God has taken the initiative in Christ in his death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection,* and this makes possible the human response of faith.

In 1 Peter perseverance in the face of severe suffering is a central theme. The Gentile believers to whom the letter is addressed must realize that they must be ready to suffer as Jesus did (cf. 1 Pet 1:6; 2:21-23). They must expect their faith to be tested, and they must realize that this is the norm for believers. Believers must remain "strong in [their] faith" (1 Pet 5:9), knowing that they can look forward to the last day when God will "restore, establish and strengthen" the suffering church.*

2 Peter 1:5-7 urges believers to "make every effort to supplement your faith with virtue" (and other positive behaviors and qualities; see 2 Peter). Virtue* (moral excellence) is but one of the necessary components of the believer's life. As we also see in James and Paul, for Peter complete trust in God must be accompanied by works (cf. 2 Pet 1:8). That this should be so is here predicated on the fact that Christ's divine power has granted believers "everything that pertains to life and godliness." That the ability to live an authentic life of faith has already been granted them is what lies behind 1 Peter 2:24-25, the importance of which is not always recognized by interpreters. It provides the theological underpinning for all of Peter's paraenesis. Believers can do as God asks of them (which includes remaining faithful while suffering) because Christ has died so that believers "might live to righteousness."

5. Johannine Letters.

In the Johannine letters (see John, Letters of) as in the Gospel of John, faith does not represent a retreat from the world but rather signals the ultimate defeat of the world,* that is, the forces that are arrayed against God (1 Jn 5:4). In 1 John we read that one cannot love God (and to love God is to have faith in God) and not love fellow believers. Faith then must be evidenced by action; to see a brother or a sister in need and not to meet their needs is to fail in love of God and therefore in faith (1 Jn 3:17).

In the Johannine letters "to believe" involves nothing less than total commitment to Christ, his commandments* and one's fellow believers. Although the ideas of faith as receptivity and belief and of faithfulness are present throughout the Johannine letters, the verb occurs only in 1 John 5:1 and the noun occurs only once in the Johannine letters. 1 John 5:1 states that "the one who believes that Jesus is the Christ is a child of God." With R. Bultmann we must note that for John pisteuō and homologeō are practically synonyms (cf. 1 Jn 2:23; 4:2, 3, 15) with right belief leading to new birth.* 1 John 5:4 reads, "For whatever is born of God overcomes the world; and this is the victory that overcomes the world, our faith." Faith refers not just to belief itself; in light of the context, which emphasizes belief in what is true about Christ, it must have christological* content (cf. 1 Jn 5:6; cf. the discussion in Smalley). It is fidelity to the confession* that Christ has come in the flesh* that will enable believers to have victory over the world and its false prophets* (1 Jn 4:1-3).

6. Revelation.

In Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) persevering in faith is of paramount importance. The Revelation to John is to be written down (Rev 1:19) so that the oppressed elect* might know what is and what is to come and thereby be challenged, comforted and ultimately remain faithful to Christ. Revelation 13:10 calls the believers to walk the same path as did Christ—one of suffering. Thus comes the "call for the endurance and faith of the saints." Unwavering trust in the face of persecution* is called for on the part of believers. In Revelation 2:10 John reveals his understanding of the nature of the persecution; although the Roman government (see Roman Empire) is the earthly agent of the church's trials, the trials are diabolical in origin (see Satan). Thus he says that it is "the devil" who "is about to throw some of you into prison." In this text, as we see throughout the NT, exhortations to faithfulness are complemented by assurances* or the certainty of the future consummation of salvation* (the "crown of life" in Rev 2:10).

7. Apostolic Fathers.

H. Chadwick observes that as time passed and as the church spread "the faith," that is, "that which is believed," was crucial for giving scattered communities a sense of belonging to a larger whole. The unity of early Christian communities depended on the things they had in common: modes of worship* and more importantly their allegiance to Jesus and to his teaching. Despite this commonality, however, we do find different emphases (cf. De Simone).

In Hermas it is stated explicitly that faith should lead to living righteously and that this combination leads to "life." Pistis is the means by which "the elect of God are saved" (Herm. Vis. 3.8.2-3), and such faith gives birth to "self-control" and a host of other virtues.* When one evidences these, then one can be sure that one will live (see also Herm. Man. 4.3.7). Knowing the truth is not enough: "if you bear the name but do not bear his power, you bear his name in vain" (Herm. Sim. 9.13.2). It is interesting to note that Hermas (like Jas 1:6) connects faith with the granting of prayer* requests (cf. Herm. Man. 9.6). For 1 Clement faith and knowledge* go hand in hand. "Let a man be faithful, let him have the power to speak deep [or secret] knowledge (1 Clem. 48.5; see Clement of Rome). Faith and knowledge are partners, for it is through faith in Christ that "our foolish and darkened understanding blossoms toward the light" and that "we should taste the immortal knowledge" (1 Clem. 36.2).

For Ignatius* of Antioch, as for the other apostolic fathers,* the object and ground of faith is Christ, crucified and raised from the dead (Ign. Trall. 9.2; cf. Ign. Phld. 8.2). The Christian life begins with belief in Christ and this very early summary of the essentials of "the faith," but it must end in "love." "They who proclaim to be of Christ shall be seen through their deeds" (Ign. Eph. 14.1-2).

By the time of John Chrysostom, Christians are speaking about the difference between faith and the knowledge that can be gotten by human reason alone. Chrysostom, in Homily 22.1.3, comments on Hebrews 11:3-4, saying that "faith needs a generous and vigorous soul, and one rising above all things of sense and passing beyond the weakness of human reasonings. For it is not possible to become a believer otherwise than by raising one's self above the common customs [of the world]." Faith, according to Chrysostom, cannot depend on human reason. It must rise above it; one must be open to enlightenment, which comes from God.

See also ASSURANCE; BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES; ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; FAITH AND WORKS; FORGIVENESS; GRACE; HOPE; LOVE; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Attridge, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); C. K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994-); G. Barth, "πίστις," EDNT 3:91-98; G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles (3d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); idem, "πιστεύω κτλ," TDNT 6:174-228; G. B. Caird, The Revelation of St. John the Divine (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1966); H. Chadwick, The Early Church (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1967); P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); idem, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); M. Dibelius, The Epistle of James (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); R. J. De Simone, "Faith" in Encyclopedia of the Early Church, ed. A. Di Berardino (2 vols.; New York: Oxford University Press, 1992) 1:315-17; P. Ellingworth, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); J. A. Fitzmyer, "Habakkuk 2:3-4 and the New Testament" in To Advance the Gospel (New York: Crossroad, 1981) 236-46; L. Goppelt, A Commentary on 1 Peter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); R. P. C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church (London: SCM, 1962); J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and of Jude (London: A. & C. Black, 1969); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); D. R. Lindsay, "The Roots and Development of the pist-Word Group as Faith Terminology," JSNT 49 (1993) 103-18; D. Lührmann, "Faith," ABD 2:752-58; O. Michel, "Faith," NIDNTT 1:587-605; R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids; Eerdmans, 1977); J. T. Sanders, Ethics in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); C. Spicq, "πίστις," TLNT 3:110-16. B. Eastman

FAITH AND WORKS

While the issue of the relationship of faith and works has focused on Paul's controversies with Judaizers and his relationship to the epistle of James* (see DPL, James and Paul), several works in our literature make a contribution to this discussion. Each work in the later NT literature makes a situationally appropriate application of a position not unlike Paul's (even if he might not have chosen the wording used or the emphasis of an individual author). In the apostolic fathers* the balance shifts decidedly in favor of works to give evidence of faith.*

1. Later New Testament Writings
2. Apostolic Fathers

1. Later New Testament Writings.

1.1. Acts. Acts* reflects an evangelistic orientation. In Acts 3:16 it is through faith in Jesus that the lame man is healed, not through any merit or skill residing in Peter and John. Likewise, in Acts 14:9 Paul sees faith, not claim, in another beggar. Therefore his conclusion at the end of his missionary journey is that a door of faith had been opened to the Gentiles* (Acts 14:27). While there is a pairing of repentance* and faith in Acts (Acts 20:21), it is clear that the primary interest is in faith (Acts 24:24; 26:18).

At the same time Acts does not ignore works, for Tabitha is praised for her good works (Acts 9:36), and although they are not called works, Cornelius's* deeds are "remembered" by God* (Acts 10:4). Likewise, when people repent and turn to God they should do deeds worthy of repentance (Acts 26:20).

Therefore faith and works remain in creative tension in Acts. It is clear that faith, the human response to God's call, is what brings one salvation* or physical healing* and that the primary deed is to remain in "the faith" (Acts 13:8; 14:22). Yet it is expected that appropriate deeds will flow from faith, and in this light the author of Acts probably views Cornelius as expressing true faith in God as a "righteous Gentile" (in the rabbinic phrase) even before he hears about Jesus.

1.2. Hebrews. In Hebrews* the core issue is whether the group being addressed has already departed or may in the future depart from Christian commitment. Thus in Hebrews 4:2 a message comes from God but does not help since it is not united with the recipients' faith. However, those who "inherit the promises" are characterized by faith and endurance* (Heb 6:12). Thus in Hebrews, while faith does indicate confident trust in God (especially in Heb 11), it carries with it strong overtones of faithfulness and far more than in Paul it is a human response rather than a divine gift (e.g., Heb 10:39; Rose, 349).

Works therefore are not ignored in this context, since even faith takes effort; God will not forget the deeds of the addressees, which is one reason the writer is confident of their salvation (Heb 6:10). In Hebrews 10:24 the author exhorts his readers to practice good deeds, although in Hebrews 13:21 it is Jesus who will work in them to produce God's will. Finally, in Hebrews 11 the virtue of faith, akin to endurance, normally produces some clear action in the person, even if the action is not called a work. In Hebrews salvation clearly is through faith in Jesus, but this is a faith that calls for persevering faithfulness. And a mark of this faithfulness is the good deeds that are produced in the believers.

1.3. James. The Jacobean community knows nothing of the tension with the Mosaic law* (seen as salvific Torah) that animated Paul, nor is it concerned about either possible apostasy* or evangelistic outreach. The issue in James is about conflict in the community and sharing among its members. The question is whether faith will move beyond mere words. Thus the teacher shows which "wisdom" animates him or her by deeds, not orthodox teaching (Jas 3:13). It is the doer of deeds, not the mere auditor, who is blessed (Jas 1:25). And faith (here defined as nominal, orthodox belief, not commitment to Christ) that lacks works (defined in context as deeds of charity) is useless (Jas 2:14, 17, 26).

It is not that James ignores faith. Believers are characterized by faith (Jas 1:3; 2:1) and can even be said to be "rich in faith" (Jas 2:5). It takes faith (trust in God) to approach God fruitfully in prayer* (Jas 1:6; 5:15; Davids 1996, 231-32). If faith divorced from works cannot save, James never contemplates the idea that works could exist without faith. For James the ideal is faith working with and being completed by one's deed (Jas 2:22), for as a result of this a person will be declared (proved) righteous (Jas 2:21, 24; see Righteousness). James asserts that a mere confession of faith is not enough; true commitment to God shows in one's deeds (see DPL, James and Paul).

1.4. 1 Peter. In 1 Peter* one finds an author encouraging a group of communities in the face of unofficial persecution.* The stress therefore is on faith as commitment to God. It is faith that brings divine protection and receives a reward* (1 Pet 1:5, 9). This faith is connected to hope* and is fixed upon God with an effect reaching beyond death (1 Pet 1:21; Michaels, 22-24). Persecution and the devil (see Satan) test this faith and thus must be endured and resisted (1 Pet 1:7; 5:9). Works are also relevant, for the Father will judge each person's works, which should mean that despite the security of faith, the believer's lifestyle will be one lived in the light of a healthy respect of judgment* (1 Pet

1:17). When it comes to the situation of persecution, the good works of the Christian should be such that God will be glorified by the persecutors concerning the areas of life about which slander commonly circulated in the pagan community.

1.5. 2 Peter and Jude. Turning to 2 Peter* and Jude,* we discover that in a context in which the communities are threatened by heterodox groups (whether originating within or without the community), faith is presented as something received from God (2 Pet 1:1) which needs to be protected or supported by appropriate character and works (2 Pet 1:5; Reumann, 257, 265-66). The faith must be actively maintained ("fought for," Jude 3), and one should exert effort to build oneself up in it (Jude 20). Works are significant, for in the end of the age all deeds will be exposed and judged (2 Pet 3:10; Jude 15). The emphasis in this literature is clearly on works (see Early Catholicism for the debate on the nature of such "works"), for it is effort that must be expended to protect "the faith" and maintain one's relationship with God. Antinomians are rebutted by such a call in both letters.

1.6. 1-3 John. The Johannine epistles (see John, Letters of) mention the noun faith only once (1 Jn 5:4), and there it is an active agent that conquers "the world" (1 Jn 5:5). The author clearly prefers the verbal form believe (pisteuō) to the noun faith (pistis), for it is through believing in Jesus that one knows that he or she has eternal life* (1 Jn 5:1, 10, 13). Believing is also an act of obedience* in response to a command (1 Jn 3:23; Reumann, 215-16). All three letters are full of commands, particularly the command to love* one another and the warning that sinning is a mark of not knowing God. Thus there is no sense in the Johannine epistles that one could believe correctly (or "walk in the truth") and consistently act wrongly ("continue in sin" or do evil deeds or hate one's fellow believer). The two are so intertwined that to do right is to show that one has life or knows God (1 Jn 3:7, 10, 14), which the elder also attributes to right belief.

1.7. Revelation. In Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) various levels of persecution confront the church, so the emphasis is on works, especially on endurance in those works. "I know your deeds," says Jesus (Rev 2:2). And the appropriate deeds must be done (Rev 2:5, a command to return to their former deeds), for judgment will be according to one's deeds (Rev 20:13; 22:12). While there is no reference to believing (pisteuō, "believe," does not occur), there are references to "the faith," and this is something to be guarded (Rev 2:13; although usually where pistis occurs it means "faithfulness"—e.g., Rev 2:19; 13:10; Reumann, 245).

In the NT literature under consideration, commitment to God (faith) and obedience to God (works) occur in a dynamic tension. The stress in the various pieces of literature could be arranged on a continuum according to the situation of the author and the church or churches addressed. The more evangelistic the document is, the more the emphasis is on faith. The more pressure the community is experiencing (whether as outside persecution or internal factionalism caused by false teachers who advocate a relaxed morality, in turn stemming from a notion of nominal faith), the more the emphasis is on works with faith being reduced to "keeping the faith," which is itself an activity of the individual. Yet in no place in the NT is faith eclipsed as the core of what it means to be Christian (Reumann, 290-92).

2. Apostolic Fathers.

In the post-NT world the emphasis falls increasingly on works. Examples of this are the Two Ways sections of the *Epistle of Barnabas and the *Didache, for there it is clearly how one lives that determines one's ultimate fate. For example, it is through generous charity that one gives "a ransom for your sins" (Did. 4.6). In a parallel in Barnabas we read, "You shall remember the day of judgment day and night . . . [then comes a list of deeds to be performed] or working with your hands for the ransom of your sins" (Barn. 19.10). While 2 Clement does not have a two-ways section, the author does mention "the day of [the Lord's] appearing when he will come and ransom each of us according to his or her deeds" (2 Clem. 17.4). Indeed, "Your faith shall not profit except you be found perfect at the last time" (Did. 16.2; see Redemption).

Faith is important in this literature, but it is often paired with works. 1 Clement 12 states that "For her faith and hospitality Rahab the harlot was saved" (cf. 1 Clem. 10.7, which asserts the same of Abraham*), and later "the faith which is in Christ" is defined in terms of virtues* (1 Clem. 22.1; Ign. Eph. 8.2; Herm. Man. 8.8-11; cf.

Pancovski). Faith at times becomes the hope of future reward (1 Clem. 58.2; cf. 1 Clem. 35.2; Barn. 1.4) or confident trust in God when one prays (Herm. Man. 9). While it is clear that salvation is through believing "on the blood of Jesus" (Ign. Smyrn. 6.1; cf. Herm. Sim. 9.17.4; Did. 16.2, although here faith is virtually synonymous with knowledge*) and thus without appropriate belief one will not receive salvation, the emphasis is strongly on the works that flow from faith.

Therefore, although faith is mentioned in this literature of the second century, the emphasis is on works, reflecting moralistic strains and the reformulation of Christianity as "new law" (lex nova; Torrance, 105; the term is specifically mentioned in Barnabas). In some places one starts with faith and then must produce the appropriate virtue in order to remain with a hope of salvation. In others the important issue is holding onto the faith itself. In still others faith is itself defined in terms of or paired with virtue. In general, faith is spoken of in terms of right belief rather than personal commitment, as "the faith" rather than faith in Jesus (cf. Schwartz). The balance has shifted to works more strongly than in any of our NT literature, which tendency will characterize the church through the following centuries. Although T. F. Torrance (133-41) argues that it is Judaism* plus Hellenism (especially the Stoic ethic) that created the change within Christianity, it may as likely have been caused by the cultural move into the Roman world, with the church increasingly adopting a Roman legal mentality seen later in Tertullian.

See also ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; ETHICS; FAITH, FAITHFULNESS; JAMES; OBEDIENCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. H. Davids, "Controlling the Tongue and the Wallet: Discipleship in the Epistle of James" in Patterns of Discipleship in the Epistle of James, ed. R. N. Longenecker (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996) 220-39; idem, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) 19-21, 120-34; idem, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); M. Dibelius, James (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); H. P. Hamann, "Faith and Works: Paul and James," LTJ 9 (1975) 33-41; M. Hengel, "Der Jakobusbrief als antipaulinische Polemik" in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament, ed. G. F. Hawthorne and O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 248-78; J. Jeremias, "Paul and James," ExpT 66 (1954-55) 368-71; W. L. Lane, Hebrews (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); J. G. Lodge, "James and Paul at Cross-Purposes? James 2:22," Bib 62 (1981) 195-213; R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988) 75-101; J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); I. Pancovski, "Tugend: Weg zum Heil," Ostkirchlichen Studien 32 (1983) 105-16; W. Pratscher, Der Herrenbruder Jakobus und die Jakobustradition (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1987); C. Rose, Die Wolke der Zeugen (WUNT 2.60; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1994); J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991); D. Schwartz, "Paul in the Writings of the Apostolic Fathers" in Paul and the Legacies of Paul, ed. W. S. Babcock (Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1990); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959); A. E. Travis, "James and Paul: A Comparative Study," SWJT 12 (1969) 57-70; R. B. Ward, "James and Paul: A Critical Review," RQ 7 (1963) 159-64. P. H. Davids

FALSE PROPHETS. See ADVERSARIES; PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS.

FALSE TEACHERS. See ADVERSARIES; PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS.

FAMILY. See HOUSEHOLD, FAMILY.

FASTING. See PRAYER; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

FEAR

The language of fear is pronounced in this portion of the NT and is fairly frequent in the apostolic fathers. As in the other portions of the NT (see DPL, Fear, Reverence), fear usually refers to an appropriate level of respect and honor to be shown to another, often in the light of fulfilling one's service to God,* and also implies terror at the prospect of failing to fulfill one's obligations. In keeping with the possible composition of a number of these writings in the light of rising persecution of the early church, a two-sided approach to fear is evident. On the one hand there is suitable fear of God, other people and things, fear that in some contexts appropriately represents respect and provides a suitable basis for Christian conduct. On the other hand there is admonition not to have a craven fear of God, humans or things such as suffering in the light of God's larger plan and purpose. The primary words used to speak of fear are phobos and phobeomai, although Acts uses sebomai as well (see 4 below on God-fearers).

1. Fear of Things
2. Fear of Others
3. Fear of God
4. The God-fearers

1. Fear of Things.

Whereas most references in these writings are to the fear of animate beings, a number of usages refer to fear of inanimate things. These reflect a number of kinds of fear, from simple fear of inauspicious circumstances (Acts 27:17, 24, 29; Heb 12:21; Herm. Sim. 9.20.2) to the natural human fear of the unknown. For example, in Hebrews 2:15 the author speaks of Jesus as having freed those who were in slavery to fear of death. Diognetus 10.7 speaks similarly of the fear of death, and 1 Clement 12.5 speaks of dread. Several passages tend to emerge from adversarial relationships, probably reflecting persecution* in the early church.* For example, in Revelation 2:10 Christ* says to the Smyrneans not to fear what they are to suffer*; Ignatius* (Ign. Eph. 11.1) says not to fear the wrath* to come but to love the grace* present; and in 1 Peter 3:6, 14 Christians are encouraged not to fear for doing right (cf. 1 Pet 3:15). 1 Clement 56.10 speaks of not fearing evil. In an extended discussion, Hermas Mandate 7.1, 3 implores Christians to fear the Lord and keep his commandments* and thereby resist the devil (see Satan). For those who are followers of Christ, there is to be no cowardly fear for proper behavior.

2. Fear of Others.

It is much more common for the NT writings to instruct Christians regarding fear or respect of other people, often linked to motivating human conduct, while there are a relatively smaller number in the apostolic fathers.* At least two classes of people are mentioned, including those in family and societal relations and those outside the church. The majority of references in the apostolic fathers have to do with fearing or not fearing the devil (see Herm. Man. 7.2, 3; 12.4.6, 7; 12.5.2, 3; 12.6.1, 2).

Regarding family and societal relations, wives are told in 1 Peter 3:2 that unbelieving husbands may be won over by the respect (phobos) of their wives. Likewise in 1 Peter 2:18 slaves* are told to submit to their masters with appropriate respect (phobos; cf. Heb 11:23, 27, where Moses' parents are said to have feared Pharaoh's edict; Did. 4.11, which includes a description of household duties; see Household Codes). Ignatius (Ign. Eph. 6.1) tells the readers to fear or respect the bishop if he is silent (see Church Order). Regarding those outside the church, 1 Peter 3:16 implores Christians to have an explanation for their faith,* doing this with gentleness and respect (phobos). In a quotation of Psalm 118:6-7, the author of Hebrews (Heb 13:6) states the situation bluntly: with God as their helper believers do not need to be afraid, since humans can do nothing to them when they are protected or aided by God.

These last two examples, when compared with examples of merely human fear, that is, where humans are said to fear circumstances or others (e.g., Acts 16:38; 22:29; 23:10; 27:17), well illustrate that the fear of Christians is one grounded in their faith and their desire to please God and that this is related to but should take priority over their other relations. 1 Peter 2:17, reflecting a balanced Hellenistic ethical* position with regard to social structures, puts fear of God in proper perspective when it says to honor all people: love the Christian "brethren" (adelphotēs), fear God and honor the king (= emperor*).

3. Fear of God.

The fear of God is the most important motivating factor for Christian conduct in these writings, and it is what distinguishes Christian behavior from that of others. There are two sides to this fear or reverence for God in this body of NT writings. The first is seen in 1 John 4:18, where after saying that God is love* the author says that believers will be confident on the day of judgment,* because there is no fear in love. Perfect loves casts out fear. The second is a more pronounced emphasis on fear of God. For example, in Acts 9:31 it is fear of the Lord that distinguishes the church in Palestine as it grew in strength and numbers.

It is to a large extent the distinguishing mark of believers in these writings that they fear God (cf. Acts 2:43). For example, Peter says in Acts 10:35 that God accepts people from all nations who fear him, and similarly 1 Peter 1:17 implores its readers to live lives of fear before the God who judges. This God is one into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall (Heb 10:27, 31). This is the image of God and Christ that one is impressed with in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), where it becomes clear that fear of God or Christ, which includes reverence and awe before his overpowering presence, is the only motivation needed for the writer's response and behavior. For example, in Revelation 1:17, the author is told not to be afraid, having fallen at the feet of Christ. God's ultimate apocalyptic triumph in judgment will come against those who do not fear God (Rev 11:18; 14:7; 15:4; 19:5).

The apostolic fathers speak of the fear of God far more than they speak of any other type of fear, reverence or awe. The fear of God is seen to be the key to Christian behavior (e.g., Herm. Man. 7.4; Barn. 19.5) and includes humility* before him (Ign. Trall. 4.1).

4. The God-Fearers.

Although it might be possible to discuss the God-fearers under the preceding categories, the special usage in Acts* requires separate comment. There are several issues to discuss. The first is the two separate phrases used in Acts to distinguish what appears to be one or possibly two groups. The first phrase is "the ones fearing (phobeomai) God," and it appears at Acts 10:2, 22, 35; 13:16, 26. The second phrase is "the ones revering (sebomai) God," and it appears at Acts 13:43, 50; 16:14; 17:4, 17; 18:7 (cf. Acts 18:13; 19:27). The first phrase essentially appears in the first half of Acts and the second in the second half. This has raised a number of questions regarding why the author changes terminology midway through his account, especially if the phrasing constitutes technical terminology to label a particular group. Several of the possible explanations for the change are that the author was using different sources, although the language does seem very Lukan; that it reflects standard terminology in use for this kind of group; or that the author uses a more Hellenistic term when the Christian mission* becomes more Hellenistic.

The second issue, however, is the meaning of the phrase in Acts. The switch in the terminology and apparent parallels with some rabbinic literature, combined with the supposed failure to find any extrabiblical parallels in Hellenistic Greek, have led some scholars to posit this phrasing as a Lukan creation or to maintain that the reference was to any highly pious person, including pious Jews. This would account for several instances in which reference is made to "Israelites [or a similar phrase] and those fearing God" (e.g., Acts 13:16, 26, 43; 17:17), with the second a devout subgroup of the first. Nevertheless, the most widely accepted understanding of the phrase is that these people were Gentiles* who were attracted to the piety and theology of Diaspora Judaism* but who were not willing to become full proselytes. Without being willing to submit to circumcision,* they feared the God of the Jews.

The third issue is the attestation of the phrase. A number of scholars have maintained that there was no outside attestation for such phrasing, but it has been shown recently that although there is no exact parallel, there is sufficient inscriptional evidence to suggest that the terminology of Luke-Acts would have been recognizable to a Hellenistic audience.

The fourth issue is the meaning of the phrase in the light of the topic of this essay. The use in Acts is consonant with what this essay has described as the general tenor of discussion in this group of NT writings with regard to fear of God. It constitutes the major motivational force for behavior, so much so that it attracts those from beyond the ethnic and racial boundaries of the Jewish people and distinguishes a group known by fear of or reverence for God.

See also GOD; JUDGMENT; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. C. de Boer, "God-Fearers in Luke-Acts" in Luke's Literary Achievement: Collected Essays, ed. C. M. Tuckett (JSNTSup 116; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 50-71; L. Goppelt, A Commentary on 1 Peter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); P. van der Horst, "A New Altar of a Godfearer?" in Hellenism—Judaism—Christianity: Essays on Their Interaction (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1994) 65-72; J. Lawson, A Theological and Historical Introduction to the Apostolic Fathers (New York: Macmillan, 1961); I. Levinskaya, The Book of Acts in its Diaspora Setting (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); J. M. Lieu, "Do God-Fearers Make Good Christians?" in Crossing the Boundaries: Essays in Biblical Interpretation in Honor of Michael D. Goulder, ed. S. E. Porter et al. (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 329-45; G. Lüdemann, Early Christianity According to the Traditions in Acts: A Commentary (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); S. Snyder, "1 Peter 2:17: A Reconsideration," FN 4.8 (1991) 211-15; M. Wilcox, "The 'God-Fearers' in Acts—A Reconsideration," JSNT 13 (1981) 102-22.

S. E. Porter

FELLOWSHIP

In the later NT and other early Christian literature, fellowship is not described predominantly by the koinōnia ("fellowship") group of words; rather it is approached mainly through descriptions of Christians giving and receiving mutual love or through commandments that they should involve themselves by obedience* (see DPL, Fellowship). Early Christian teaching about this can be organized into three categories.

1. Fellowship and Koinōneō
2. Receiving and Giving Fellowship
3. Mutual Love

1. Fellowship and Koinōneō.

It has become commonplace in the Western church to speak of Christian fellowship in terms of koinōnia ("community," "fellowship," "participation"). Fellowship does comprise part of the semantic range of the NT Greek verb koinōneō and its cognates, including koinōnia. In 1 John 1:3, 6-10, for example, fellowship with the author is based on partaking of what the author knows, and fellowship with God* and other Christians is predicated on living righteously. This word group, however, does not exhaust the idea of Christian fellowship and is insufficient to develop this theme fully in the literature of the later NT and the apostolic fathers.*

1.1. Insufficiency of Focusing on the Koinōneō Word Group. In this Greek word group there are pejorative meanings. In Acts 11:4-10 Peter reports his vision* in the house of Simon the tanner in which a heavenly voice exhorted him three times not to call common or profane (koinos) what God reckons to be allowable. The word group is also used with meanings that lie beyond what is owed by Christians to all Christians as a result of salvation* and the new community in Christ. In Hebrews 2:14, for example, the verb (koinōneō) is employed to speak of the physical flesh and blood shared by all humans. In 2 John 11 the same verb is used not of Christian fellowship but of taking part in the evil deeds of a heretic.

In short the koinōneō word group is not often used in the later NT literature and apostolic fathers, and when it is, it has a semantic range that goes beyond the concept of Christian fellowship. But the concept of fellowship or communion is strongly present in the literature, and it is to this that we turn.

1.2. Community of Goods. On two occasions one of the words from the koinōnia word group is used in the literature of the NT to refer to an aspect of early Christian fellowship. In the summary passages of Acts 2:43-47 and Acts 4:32-37, which conclude stages of development of the formation of nascent Christianity, the adjective koinos ("common," Acts 2:44; 4:32) refers to the community of ownership practiced by the young church.* A third passage (Acts 6:1-7), however, lacks the adjective koinos and describes a situation in which part of the church was not experiencing the full fellowship expected (certainly not the community of goods, which is not mentioned) but also was not receiving the needed portions at the common meals. This third passage mentions a negative case, though also the good that flowed from it; but even this negative statement assumes the positive meaning that the church at that period gave to the concept fellowship (for further details on these three passages see Barrett, 1:158-73, 251-60, 302-17).

2. Receiving and Giving Fellowship.

A similar positive view of the hospitality* and communion to be shown to Christians by Christians is encountered in Acts* in descriptions of the way the central characters of that book are treated by believers. It is apparent in the way that Ananias and the Damascus Christians respond to Paul in his need (Acts 9:17-19, 25) and in the way Barnabas endorses him to the suspicious Jerusalem Christians (Acts 9:26-27). We catch glimpses of it in the hospitality shown Peter by the household of Simon the tanner (Acts 9:43) and in that shown to the missionaries Paul and Barnabas by disciples in Antioch* (Acts 14:26-28), Jerusalem* (Acts 15:4), Philippi (Acts 16:15), Tyre (Acts 21:4-6) and the environs of Rome* (Acts 28:14-15).

It is not a matter solely, however, of believers giving loving attention to functionaries of the church like Peter, Paul and Barnabas. Paul also works at encouraging his converts (Acts 14:22-23; 18:23) and also others who come under his care, such as those who are with him on the ill-fated voyage to Rome on the ship from Adramyttium (Acts 27:33-38). The latter passage exemplifies this whether or not it is to be interpreted eucharistically (see Barrett and the major commentaries listed by him, 1:xiii-xiv), but the connection of communion with fellowship would give further cause for thought if the passage is to be understood that way. There are other such descriptions.

3. Mutual Love.

Taken by themselves, such passages descriptive of demonstrated love* need not necessarily be understood as showing anything more than the actions of amiable people, whether they are responding to evangelists who brought them the good news or are themselves concerned with the care of converts. But there are passages in the later NT that enjoin or praise deeds of love, as did Jesus and Paul after him, and demonstrate that such behavior was thought to be normative. In fact it is expected of believers that the graciousness of God in granting them a new and purified life should result in mutual love (1 Pet 1:22—2:3) expressed in practical ways (1 Pet 4:8-11, but see 1 Pet more widely).

Expressions of love like this are not to be limited to known and familiar believers but are commended and encouraged when they are demonstrated toward strangers (traveling missionaries) too (3 Jn 5-8; see Smalley, 348-53). A related encouragement to sharing and to the expression of love and hospitality to strangers also occurs at Hebrews 13:1-3, though with a special expression of concern for any mistreated in prison (see Lane, 2:509-15), and Hebrews 13:16, where the noun koinōnia is to be found. Similar acceptance and treatment of all who come into the church, without social judging and positioning, is expected by James* of the church to which he writes (Jas 2:1-9; see Martin, 67-68).

Though the tone changes and mutual love is subordinated to other themes, the apostolic fathers may also be found urging Christians to unity and love. In 1 Clement 37—38 and 1 Clement 47—49 purity* of the redeemed life is in primary view, but harmony and mutual love in the church are also to be desired. Ignatius* also demands love and harmony in the body of believers, but the way to achieve this is to be in harmony with the bishop and presbyters (Ign. Eph. 3—5; Ign. Magn. 6—7; see Church Order). Other postapostolic literature touches on the theme of fellowship but only tangentially; other concerns and themes predominate.

See also CHURCH; GOD; HOSPITALITY; HOUSEHOLDS, FAMILY; LOVE; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); J. Y. Campbell, "Koinōnia and Its Cognates in the New Testament" in Three New Testament Studies (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1965) 1-28; J. Hainz, "κοινωνία κτλ," EDNT 2:303-5; F. Hauck, "κοινός κτλ," TDNT 3:789-809; W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); J. M. McDermott, "The Biblical Doctrine of KOINONIA," BZ 19 (1975) 64-77, 219-33; R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); G. Panikulam, Koinonia in the New Testament: A Dynamic Expression of Christian Life (AnBib 85; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1979); H. Seesemann, Der Begriff ΚΟΙΝΩΝΙΑ im Neuen Testament (BZNW 14; Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1933); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984).

A. Casurella

FLESH

In the NT the corporeal aspect of human earthly existence is sometimes called sarx (flesh). In Acts, the General Writings and Revelation, sarx and two derived adjectives, sarkinos and sarkikos, occur thirty-four times. As with the Hebrew bāśār, sarx is used figuratively as well as to refer to literal flesh. Trying to categorize uses into literal and figurative is difficult. It is best to see the two types of use as ends of a continuum rather than as hard and fast classes.

1. Literal Uses
2. Figurative Uses

1. Literal Uses.

To refer to the physical parts of the human body, sarx is used in the plural five times in Revelation 19:18 and once each in Revelation 17:16 and 19:21. In Revelation 17:16 the flesh of the harlot (a symbol for a city, Rev 17:18) is consumed by the beast* (cf. Rev 19:18, 21). The plural in James 5:3 once more paints a vivid picture, this time of those whose hoards of wealth are found rusting. These occurrences of the plural in James and Revelation lend graphic detail to the portrayal of the eschatological fate* of those who are the enemies of God. The Epistle of Barnabas uses the plural of the flesh of Christ* nailed to the cross* (Barn. 5.13).

Sarx in the singular can refer to earthly human form. In Hebrews 2:14 sarx is used in the combination "blood and flesh" to refer to the physical being of people and of the Son who shares in this. In Hebrews 5:7 sarx occurs in the phrase "in the days of his flesh," which again refers to the time of the Messiah's physical life on earth in its weakness as truly human. The same way of using sarx is found in Hebrews 12:9 with reference to our earthly fathers. Sarx in Acts 2:26, 31 might also refer to the physical body of Jesus; it cites Psalm 16:9, "Moreover, my flesh will dwell in hope." Acts 2:31 combines this notion of flesh with the notion of corruption in Acts 2:27 to say that the flesh of the Messiah will not decay (cf. Gundry, 210; Harris, 109).

Because it was supposed that humans are made up of a material part (flesh) and an immaterial part (spirit, soul or conscience*), flesh referring to the physical body occurs in later debates between docetic* and antidocetic sects, especially with regard to the pre- and postresurrection natures of Christ and of believers (e.g., 2 Clem. 9.1-6; Ign. Smyrn. 2—3, 5.2; Barn. 5.10-11). Perhaps this sort of debate stands behind the Apostles' Creed, which uses "the resurrection* of the flesh" rather than the NT term, "the resurrection of the dead." Likewise, the baptismal* confession in Hippolytus (Apos. Trad. 20-21, C. A.D. 200, cited in Hall, 20-21) admits the resurrection of the flesh. Hippolytus also writes against Sabellianism, which says that the flesh is one mode of God's existence (Hippolytus Haer. 9.12.15-19).

2. Figurative Uses.

2.1. Flesh as a Morally Neutral Term. The phrase "all flesh" occurs twice in NT citations of the OT (Acts 2:17 cites Joel 3:1 [MT]; 1 Pet 1:24 cites Is 40:6). In both cases the phrase refers to all of humanity. In 1 Peter 1:24 the emphasis seems to be on the temporality of humankind when compared with the eternal word of God (cf. Bratsiotis).

Sometimes the term flesh is neutral but qualified by an adjective or phrase that gives the concept negative nuances, e.g., 1 John 2:16, "the lust of the flesh," or 2 Peter 2:10, "those who go after other flesh," or 2:18, "the sensual desires of the flesh" (cf. Jude 7, 8, 23).

Three times sarx is used of the Messiah. In 1 John 4:2 and 2 John 7 flesh speaks of the incarnation: "every spirit that confesses that Jesus has come in the flesh." But here it refers more to a realm of existence than to having human flesh. According to John, an orthodox confession says that Jesus' salvific coming was into the real world of flesh and blood (Brown, 493). Hebrews 10:20 also refers to the flesh of the Messiah. Here "his flesh" occurs as the interpretation (tout' estin, "this is") of the "veil" (since both veil and flesh are in the genitive case in Greek). Flesh, by metonymy, refers to the offering of his flesh, i.e., his death (cf. Lane, 275-76). This death inaugurates the new and living way as opposed to the dead way of the old covenant.* These uses of sarx in Hebrews and 1 John prepare us for its use in other texts as a salvation-historical term.

2.2. Flesh as a Salvation-Historical Term. In the NT flesh is often used in contrast to other terms such as conscience and spirit. The earliest uses of this dualistic language in the church fathers are often Neo-Platonic or Hellenistic (e.g., Diogn. 6.5-10; cf. Davies, 448, 455). In Neo-Platonism the flesh-spirit dualism was considered ontological (see above under literal uses). In gnostic and some patristic literature, taking over some aspects of Neo-Platonism, the flesh is wicked, the spirit is pure. This dualism has been used as an interpretive grid for many NT texts. The validity of this grid has recently been questioned based on the eschatological nature of both the OT and the NT. In passages referring to flesh and spirit or flesh and conscience, an eschatological dualism seems more in keeping with the biblical context than an ontological dualism. Flesh, in some of these passages, refers to the old or present age, while spirit (or a clean conscience) belongs to the future age, which has broken into the present with the coming of the Messiah.

In Hebrews 7:16 the Mosaic covenant is called a law of fleshly (sarkinos) commandment and is opposed to the power of an indestructible life. In Hebrews 9:9-10 regulations of flesh (the worship of the Mosaic order) are in force until the time of the new order, in which worshipers will be perfected in conscience. In Hebrews 9:13-14 the blood of goats and bulls and the sprinkled ashes of a heifer sanctified the participants for the cleansing of the flesh (preparing them for worship*; the pros phrase translated "for" is added to qualify the sanctification), but the blood of Christ cleanses the conscience.

Flesh in these passages is a characteristic of the Mosaic as opposed to the new covenant. Flesh is not morally negative; rather it is a part of the old age.

As in Romans 8 and Galatians 5—6, flesh-spirit dualism forms the dominant conceptual grid in the notoriously difficult 1 Peter 3:18—4:6. A full exegesis of the passage is not possible here, but perhaps a recognition of the meaning of flesh can shed some light on the passage. The eschatological point is clear in its conclusion, "The end of all things is near" (1 Pet 4:7), followed by moral exhortation.

According to 1 Peter 3:18, Christ "was put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit" (perhaps a pre-Petrine traditional phrase). The contrast here is between two spheres or modes of existence (Michaels, 204; Davids, 137). Christ died to the old realm (flesh) but was made alive to the new realm of existence (spirit). These could be ontological realms of existence, but perhaps it is best to view them as eschatological. Christ is the first to live in the new age into which all Christians will enter via resurrection. 1 Peter 3:19 says that it was in this sphere of the new age beyond death that Jesus preached to spirits* in prison (perhaps via the Spirit; see Holy Spirit).

The next occurrence of flesh is in 1 Peter 3:21, which asserts that baptism* is not the cleansing of the flesh. Flesh here could refer to the physical body (Beare, 175), but it is more likely that moral filth is in view (Michaels, 216). But if flesh retains its contrast to spirit as a realm of existence, the intention is that baptism does not cause a person to move from the old realm to the new; that was accomplished by Christ, who cleanses (forgives*) us (1 Pet 1:3-7). Rather, baptism is a pledge to live the moral life of the new realm, a pledge that comes from a conscience made clean through forgiveness from the resurrected Christ (Michaels, 217).

1 Peter 4:1 picks up the train of thought from 1 Peter 3:18. The flesh is the sphere in which Christ suffered.* And those who follow Christ must adopt his attitude toward the old world, because the one who suffers in this life (the flesh) has ceased from sin.* Suffering in the preresurrection age is an imitation of Messiah, and as the Messiah has ceased from sin because he has entered the new age, so too will his followers. Life in the flesh is life of the old age. Although we must still do battle with sin in this old age (cf. 1 Pet 2:11), we must not allow the old age to determine our lives (1 Pet 4:2).

Finally, flesh is used in 1 Peter 4:6, again in opposition to spirit. The datives "in flesh" and "in spirit" here are similiar to those in 1 Peter 3:18. Those who have been converted (evangelized) in the old sphere of Christ's suffering (whether they are now dead or alive) will be judged in the new sphere of life—that is, they will be resurrected. As J. N. D. Kelly concludes, "Christ's experience of 'being put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit' becomes through baptism the experience of all Christians, not excluding those who have already undergone physical death" (176).

Perhaps 2 Clement 14.3-5 recognizes this eschatological dualism when it discusses the present form of the church as being the flesh of Christ (an antitype), while the future form of the church will be the Spirit.

See also Holy Spirit; Mortality and Immortality; Psychology; Purity and Impurity; Resurrection; Sin, Wickedness.

Bibliography. F. W. Beare, The First Epistle of Peter (Oxford: Blackwell, 1970); N. P. Bratsiotis, "בָּשָׂר," TDOT 2:317-32; Raymond E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); J. G. Davies, "Factors Leading to the Emergence of Belief in the Resurrection of the Flesh," JTS 23 (1972) 448-55; R. Gundry, "The Essential Physicality of Jesus' Resurrection" in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 204-19; S. G. Hall, Doctrine and Practice in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); M. Harris, Raised Immortal (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (London: Black, 1969); W. L. Lane, Hebrews 9-13 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); E. Schweizer, R. Meyer, F. Baumgärtel, "σάρξ κτλ," TDNT 7:981 1; H. Seebass and A. C. Thiselton, "Flesh," NIDNTT 1:671-82. D. H. Johnson

FLOCK. See Shepherd, Flock.

FOOD, FOOD LAWS, TABLE FELLOWSHIP

The early Christians gathered in house churches (1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:5; Philem 2; Col 4:15) for a variety of reasons, not least because the house provided the necessary means of preparing the Lord's Supper (see Architecture). Like the house synagogue communities of this period, the early Christian gatherings included communal meals. In reference to Christianity the willingness of Jewish and Gentile believers to extend hospitality to one another, and specifically to partake of a meal together, was the litmus test in determining the validity of the gospel message. In this respect the house became the testing ground, and within the confines of the domestic setting the early believers were forced to define how the gospel message stood in relation to its Jewish heritage, its society and the pagan world (on meat or food offered to idols, see Idolatry).

1. Christian Table Fellowship and Jewish Food Laws
2. Jewish and Pagan Attitudes Toward Jewish-Gentile Table Fellowship
3. Early Christian Practices and Paradigms

1. Christian Table Fellowship and Jewish Food Laws.

One of the earliest disputes within Christianity arose over the question of the inclusion of Gentiles* in the new community. Fundamentally two problems faced the early Christians: (1) Is circumcision* a requirement for inclusion into the new community, and (2) to what degree, if any, must Gentile believers adhere to the Mosaic law* so that a Jewish Christian would be able to associate with a Gentile believer? The latter question involves the issue of Jewish purity laws and their place in the lives of Christian believers, and in particular the question of Jewish-Gentile table fellowship. The limits of acceptable table fellowship between a Jew and a Gentile were for Jews determined by two authoritative sources: (1) the laws in Leviticus 11:1-23 and Deuteronomy 14:3-21 and (2) the various Halakoth of the oral tradition. For the most part, these laws and traditions primarily concerned the production and consumption of food and the appropriate venue for eating.

Table fellowship is the central issue in Acts 10:1—11:18, and the offense is stated explicitly in Acts 11:3. It was Peter's willingness to enter Cornelius's home, to eat at his table and to live with him that alarmed the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem.* For Luke the obstacle of a Jew associating with the "unclean" was overcome by Peter's vision* at Joppa. For the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem, however, the issue was not so clear.

The Cornelius* incident, as much as Luke intends it to be paradigmatic, is only the beginning of the problem of defining appropriate social relations between Jewish and Gentile Christians. The conflicts reflected in Galatians 2 and Acts 15 were intense and the opinions varied, and more often than not, the diverse opinions and friction caused inconsistent behavior among the leaders. It is obvious from reading these accounts that the failure to reconcile differences would have nullified the possibility of fellowship,* and Christianity might have become as segmented as first-century Judaism.* The Jerusalem council (Acts 15) decreed that the Gentile Christians abstain from eating food that was sacrificed to idols, from what was strangled, from blood and from fornication (see DPL, Jerusalem §4).

2. Jewish and Pagan Attitudes Toward Jewish-Gentile Table Fellowship.

Both Jewish and pagan writers comment on the tendency for the Jews to separate themselves from the Gentiles. This separation was based on the fundamental differences of custom. Maintaining their customs and traditions was often a costly enterprise for the Jews, both in Palestine and in the Diaspora.* Circumcision and laws of ritual purity* served as boundary markers defining who was in and who was outside the community. And the maintenance of these boundaries ensured group identity.

Obedience* (or disobedience) to the laws pertaining to foods was a telltale indicator of Jew's faithfulness (or unfaithfulness). Many Jews observed the laws and "were resolved in their hearts not to eat food. They chose to die rather than to be defiled by food or to profane the holy covenant" (1 Macc 1:62-63; cf. 2 Macc 6, 7; 3 Macc 3:4; Jub. 22; Jos. and As. 7; 11:9, 16; 12:5; Dan 1:8 LXX; Jdt 12; Esther 4:17 LXX; Tob 1:10-12; Ep. Arist. 151).

Pagan writers also discuss the Jewish attitude of separation and the reluctance to associate with non-Jews. Diodorus Siculus is the earliest (extant) pagan author to mention the Jewish reluctance to engage in table fellowship with a Gentile. In his Bibliotheca Historica he comments that the Jews "had made their hatred of humankind into a tradition, and on this account had introduced utterly outlandish laws: not to break bread with any other race, nor to show them any good will at all" (Diodorus Siculus Bib. Hist. 63.2).

Dio Cassius says of the Jewish people, "They are distinguished from the rest of humankind in practically every detail of life" (Dio Cassius Hist. 37.15.2). And in Philostratus's Life of Apollonius of Tyana, the Jewish people are described as "a race that has made its own a life apart and irreconcilable; that cannot share with the rest of humankind in the pleasures of the table" (Philostratus Vit. Ap. 5.33). These examples are representative of the catalog of opinions from pagan writers.

3. Early Christian Practices and Paradigms. Like the Cornelius incident of Acts 10—11, Jewish and pagan texts indicate that in the mind of a pious Jew there was a correlation between what was and who was : the Gentile consumption of foods meant that the Gentiles themselves were . But for the early church,* forgiveness* and inclusion within the community were not predicated on the observance of the ritual laws of dietary purity. Evidence of this is recorded by the Evangelists, who address the nascent misunderstanding of the early church.

The Gospels are not silent on the subject of table fellowship in reference to forgiveness (see DJG, Table Fellowship). On more than one occasion Jesus is accused of eating with tax collectors and sinners in their homes and is condemned for his willingness to associate with the unrighteous (see Hofius). Often in these conflicts we can see evidence of the struggles of the early church. While Mark, commenting on Jesus' saying regarding what defiles a person, can confidently comment, "thus he declared all foods clean" (Mk 7:19), Matthew, writing later and probably reflecting the mind of a Jewish Christian community (see Matthean Community), does not echo Mark's assessment (Mt 15:17-18; note also Luke's redaction of another incident in Lk 5:27-32).

The Pauline mission to Gentiles and the willingness to engage in table fellowship with Gentile converts was seen as a threat to the church in Jerusalem, especially among the strong judaizing constituency (so Acts 13—14; Gal 2 and Acts 15). In Acts 16:11-15 Luke records the second conversion incident in which table fellowship becomes the test for the validity of the gospel message. The narrative involves the conversion of Lydia who, like Cornelius, was a God-fearer. Following the baptism* of Lydia and her household,* she strongly urged and insisted that Paul and his companions lodge in her home and, presumably, enjoy table fellowship. Luke strategically places Lydia's invitation after her conversion as a way of confirming the legitimacy of the gospel in Philippi. For Luke the invitation is more than mere protocol, and Paul's acceptance of the invitation is a clear indication of the Gentiles' having received the gospel.

Acts 16:25-34 is consonant with the Cornelius and Lydia episodes. Following the Philippian jailor's conversion, Paul and his companions enjoy the hospitality* of this new convert. On this occasion, however, Luke is explicit: the jailor brought them into his home and enjoyed table fellowship with them before returning them to the prison. Subsequently, Paul visits Lydia at her home, which became the meeting place for the believers in Philippi.

Paul's experience at Corinth (Acts 18) was the same in kind: rejected by the Jews and forced from the synagogue, Paul went to another venue for Christian assembly, the house of Titius Justus. A similar relationship existed between Paul and the husband-wife team of Priscilla and Aquila (1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:3-5), for their home also provided a suitable venue for gathering and for preparing table fellowship. Such convivial fellowship at meal times derives from Jewish practice (e.g., the ḥābûra meals of Pharisees and Qumran* sectaries as well as the Therapeutae, described by Philo*) and is in evidence among Luke's descriptions of early Jewish Christianity* in Jerusalem (Acts 2:44-46). The precise relation of such meals to the gatherings, for example, at Troas (Acts 20:7, 11) and at Corinth (1 Cor 11:20-34) is not clear, though it would be straining the evidence to find (following Lietzmann) two distinctive types of meal, one essentially social, the other sacrificial-sacramental. The connection between the meals in Didache 9—10 and 14 is sometimes appealed to in order to establish such a dichotomy (see Worship), but with equal lack of cogency.

Thus for the early church the move away from the synagogue* and from Jewish laws and expectations of ritual purity was only the first stage in a complicated development. It is not clear what the author of Hebrews* has in mind when in Hebrews 13:9 he writes: "Do not be carried away by all kinds of strange teachings; for it is well for the heart to be strengthened by grace, not by regulations about food, which have not benefited those who observe them" (cf. Heb 9:9-10). This may be a reference to partaking in Jewish cultic meals. It seems clear that new notions of purity were to be applied to Christian table fellowship, particularly the Lord's Supper.* In Jude 12 we read of ungodly persons who are "blots and blemishes on your love feasts" (agapais hymōn, cf. 2 Pet 2:13 v.l.). The practice of common meals among Christians persisted into the second century (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2; Ep. Ap. 15; Acts Paul & Thec. 25), though it was open to abuse, exposed by Tertullian (Apol. 39; De Jejun. 17—18) and died out. And the Jewish Christian and Pauline concern and instruction regarding food offered to idols resurfaces in Revelation 2:14, where some within the church at Pergamum have followed the way of Balaam and "eat food sacrificed to idols and practice fornication" (see Idolatry).

The evidence from the apostolic fathers* suggests that if the Pauline view had eventually won the battle and carved out a broad place for the church to stand, the issue was not a dead one in the late first century and into the second century. Ignatius* may have had in mind certain Jewish Christians when in his letter to the Magnesians he writes, "It is monstrous to speak of Jesus Christ and to practice Judaism [Ioudaizein]" (Ign. Magn. 10.3; cf. 8.1). The *Epistle to Diognetus, an apologetic document addressed to a Gentile audience, refers to Jewish timidity over food and other such "superstitions" as "ridiculous and not worth discussing" (Diogn. 4.1). Justin Martyr, writing around the mid-second century, knows of Jewish Christians who fellowship and eat with (koinōnein homilias ē hestias) Gentile Christians only on the grounds that the Gentile Christians adopt the Jewish way of life (Justin Dial. Tryph. 47.2-3).

In a bid to claim the OT for Christians, *Barnabas takes an interest in the subject as he argues that the Jews had misinterpreted the OT by seeking a literal sense rather than the intended spiritual sense. Thus in Barnabas 10 we read that animals such as the pig, eagle, cuttlefish, hyena, rabbit and weasel have their counterparts in humans and their character traits and vices. The righteous should avoid associating with or becoming like the "swine," who "when they have plenty, forget the Lord" (Barn. 10.3). On the positive side, the commandment to "eat of every animal that is cloven hoofed and ruminant" means to associate with those who "meditate in their heart on the meaning of the word they have received" and who both walk "in this world and look forward to the age to come" (Barn. 10.11).

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CIRCUMCISION; IDOLATRY; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST; PURITY AND IMPURITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. C. Barton, "The Communal Dimension of Earliest Christianity," JTS 43 (1992) 399-427; idem, "Paul's Sense of Place: An Anthropological Approach to Community Formation in Corinth," NTS 32 (1986) 225-46; B. B. Blue, "The Influence of Jewish Worship on Luke's Presentation of the Early Church" in The Book of Acts in Its Theological Setting, ed. I. H. Marshall (BAFCS 6; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); M. Douglas, "Deciphering a Meal," Daedalus 101 (1972) 61-81; idem, "The Idea of Purity in Mark's Gospel," Semeia 35 (1986) 91-128; O. Hofius, Jesu Tischgemeinschaft mit den Sündern (Stuttgart: Calwer, 1967); J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Scribner's, 1971); H. Lietzmann, Mass and Lord's Supper: A Study in the History of the Liturgy (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1953-78); J. Neusner, "Two Pictures of the Pharisees: Philosophical Circle or Eating Club," ATR 64 (1982) 525-57; J. H. Neyrey, "Ceremonies in Luke-Acts: The Case of Meals and Table-Fellowship" in The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation, ed. J. H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 361-87; G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1982); M. J. Townsend, "Exit the Agape?" ExpT 90 (1978-79) 356-61; W. L. Willis, Idol Meat at Corinth: The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10 (SBLDS; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); A. C. Wire, The Corinthian Women Prophets (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990).

B. B. Blue

FORGIVENESS

For the most part "forgiveness" in the NT and the apostolic fathers* is a translation of the Greek word aphesis, the basic idea of which is "release." Although emphasis is given to the release or remission of sin and punishment—thus, forgiveness—this is not always the case. In Hebrews 9:22 and Hebrews 10:18 the argument is cultic. In these verses the rendering of aphesis as "forgiveness of sins" is unwarranted in its immediate context. "Release" or "cultic blood purification" is more appropriate.

Aphiēmi is the word used most frequently to express the concept of forgiveness of sin. This word occurs 142 times in the NT with a wide range of meanings, including "let go," "cancel," "remit," "leave," "set aside," "suffer," "forsake" and "let alone." Approximately 45 of these times it has the sense of "forgive."

1. Forgiveness and the Conversion Experience
2. Forgiveness and Healing
3. Forgiveness in the Paul of Acts

1. Forgiveness and the Conversion Experience. In Acts,* the non-Pauline documents and the writings of the apostolic fathers, the idea of forgiveness is usually linked with the conversion experience. Repentance,* baptism* and forgiveness of sin were included in the standard call by the evangelists in Acts at the conclusion of their preaching. The first Johannine epistle, while not highlighting directly those conventional ingredients of conversion, focuses on the necessity of confession. Hebrews* and later writings, however, are more concerned with the postconversion possibility of forgiveness.

1.1. Forgiveness and Repentance. Peter's speeches on the day of Pentecost* and before the Jewish council are almost programmatic in their combination of repentance and forgiveness (Acts 2:38; 5:31). The speech at Pentecost makes it clear that repentance is a condition of forgiveness (Acts 2:38). The defense before the council, however, does not assign any specific order. Rather, repentance and forgiveness are both equally regarded as a dual gift given by the exalted Christ.*

In the case of Simon Magus, repentance and prayer* were presented as possible means of forgiveness. But the inclusion of "if" raises questions of full assurance* of that gift in Simon Magus's case (Acts 8:22) even if those conditions were met.

It is significant that nothing is mentioned regarding the repentance or conversion of Cornelius* in Acts 10. Yet at the conclusion of his sermon, Peter declares simply that everyone who believes in Christ receives forgiveness through his name* (Acts 10:43). A possible explanation for this omission is that Peter's sermon was not to bring about the conversion of Cornelius and his people or to offer them forgiveness. They were already saved and received the gift. It seems, however, that in the early church* repentance is a basic requirement for conversion and the gift of forgiveness (Ign. Eph. 10.1).

1.2. Forgiveness and Baptism. Although forgiveness and repentance are often linked in Acts, the connection with baptism is found only in Peter's speech at Pentecost (Acts 2:38; cf., however, Acts 22:16, where "wash away [apolyō] your sins" is linked with baptism). This connection is more common in the Gospels (see DJG, Forgiveness of Sins). Yet intense controversy surrounds this linking of baptism to forgiveness. The disputed word is the Greek preposition eis. Does the word indicate purpose, and thus should it be translated "for"; that is, baptism is the prerequisite for the forgiveness of sins? Or should it be interpreted causally: "be baptized because your sins are forgiven"? Forgiveness in this case would then be the ground of or basis for baptism.

In the past the causal interpretation has been more accepted. However, recently the purposive translation has become common. Barnabas 11 speaks of baptism that leads to remission of sin—something that Israel* did not receive (cf. Barn. 16. Herm. Man. 4.3). In Justin Martyr's Apology I, we find that initiates pray and fast for the remission of their past sins, and then they are baptized (Justin Apol. I 61).

1.3. Forgiveness and Confession. Twice in his first epistle, John alludes to forgiveness of sins (see John, Letters of). In 1 John 2:12 he tells his readers that their sins are forgiven. He uses the Greek perfect tense, which indicates that they have been and remain forgiven. Here he is thinking of the initial conversion experience. In 1 John 1:19, however, the call is for confession of sins in order to receive forgiveness (cf. 1 Clem. 61—62). This confession, it seems, is a postbaptismal experience. Forgiveness of the confessed sins is assured because God is "faithful and just."

James* also calls for confession of sins, but he does so in the context of healing* (Jas 5:15-16). He promises the sick that their sins will be forgiven. But healing will take place only if they confess their sins to one another.

1.4. Forgiveness and Postbaptismal Sins. In Acts 8:22 we find the possibility of repentance and forgiveness of a postbaptismal sin being open to

Simon Magus. The same is true in the first Johannine epistle, where it is clear that Christians do sin. All they need to do is confess, and they will receive forgiveness (1 Jn 1:9). However, some people in the apostolic and postapostolic church would not allow that sins after baptism would be forgiven. Three passages in Hebrews (Heb 6:4-6; 10:26-31; 12:15-17) seem to posit this position.

These passages are complex and difficult to interpret. It is clear that they all deny the possibility of repentance. But Hebrews 6:4-6 seems to indicate that the sin that cannot be forgiven is apostasy* ("it is impossible to restore again to repentance those who have once been enlightened . . . and then have fallen away," NRSV). The apostates cannot be forgiven because they have crucified the Son of God again (Heb 6:6; see Son of God). It is widely held by commentators that the context for this statement is the persecution* the church began to undergo at that time. To make a deliberate, intelligent and planned denial of Christ in order to be released would be like crucifying Christ again. For such persons there is no coming back.

Although Hebrews 6:4-6 seems not to take a position on postbaptismal sins in general but only on apostasy, some commentators feel that in Hebrews 10:26-31 the door is opened a bit to exclude forgiveness to any willful postbaptismal sin: "For if we willfully persist in sin after having received the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins. . . . Anyone who has violated the law of Moses dies without mercy" (NRSV). Yet even in this passage it is possible that the primary concern is with apostasy.

In the final passage (Heb 12:15-17) Esau is used as a stark example of one who "found no chance to repent (metanoia), even though he sought the blessing with tears" (Heb 10:17 NRSV). There are those who would translate metanoia as "change of mind." But in light of the earlier passages (Heb 6:4-6; 10:26-31), we should read this passage just as rigorously and recognize that for the author of Hebrews a second repentance is objectively not possible. However, it seems that the sin he is concerned with here is also apostasy in the face of persecution.

Because of verses like these, the practice of putting off baptism until one's deathbed became widespread. In reaction to this practice, the Shepherd of Hermas modified the idea to admit a second repentance after baptism. He is convinced that a Christian who at baptism received forgiveness of sins ought never to sin again but will live blamelessly. However, he feels called by a revelation from an angel* to preach that if after baptism a person sins, he or she has one more opportunity for repentance, but only one (Herm. Man. 4.3; see Barn. 6.11, 8).

As in Hebrews it is possible that the rigor of the Shepherd of Hermas is a result of a certain aspect of the severe persecution the church was facing at the time. Up to the fourth century, Christians had no legal standing in the Roman Empire.* Persecution was accompanied by a test—emperor* worship. Some Christians publicly renounced Christ and offered incense to Caesar as God. Such apostates were seen as in the dominion of Satan* and outside the realm of reacceptance by God.

Other voices were not as strident. Didache 11.7 advises that if a prophet* speaks in ecstasy, one should not test him or entertain doubt. Such a sin cannot be forgiven; but any other sin may be forgiven (see DJG, Holy Spirit §2.4.1). And in 1 Clement 51, readers are admonished to acknowledge and ask forgiveness for sins that have been committed. We must admit, however, that Clement (see Clement of Rome) could be referring to the recollection of prebaptismal sins. The context is not clear.

2. Forgiveness and Healing.

James is unique in the Epistles or Acts when he juxtaposes healing with forgiveness of sin. There is not a strict equation of sickness and sinfulness. But James gives the impression that at least some illness is connected with sin when he writes: "The prayer of faith will save the sick, and the Lord will raise them up; and anyone who has committed sins will be forgiven. Therefore confess your sins to one another, and pray for one another, so that you may be healed" (Jas 5:15-16 NRSV).

James is expressing a thought that was common to one degree or another in the ancient world: Sin and sickness went hand in hand. The case of Job, who was accused by his friend of committing sin, causing his illness, illustrates that view (Job 4:1—5:27); and the question of the disciples ("who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Jn 9:2 NRSV), also highlights the equation in the minds of many. Jesus' assurance to the paralytic that his sins were forgiven (Mk 2:5) demonstrates that Jesus also made the connection, though not as the Jews did (Jn 9).

James, like Jesus and his world, makes the connection and seems to imply that if sin caused the illness, there needs to be confession and forgiveness.

3. Forgiveness in the Paul of Acts.
The word for forgiveness, aphesis, is absent in the Pauline epistles except for Ephesians 1:7 and Colossians 1:14. Yet in Paul's speeches in Acts (at Pisidian Antioch and before Agrippa), the climax to which all things lead is the forgiveness of sins (Acts 13:38; 26:18). It seems clear that the "forgiveness" expression is Lukan rather than Pauline. The words and the sermons overall parallel those of Peter (Acts 2:38-40; 10:43).

In his epistles Paul focuses on justification (see Righteousness) and other such parallel concepts rather than forgiveness (see DPL, Forgiveness). The death of Christ is also highlighted in Paul's writings (see Death of Christ). However, in Acts forgiveness is not directly linked with the death of Christ. There is an indirect link. But the emphasis is on the risen and exalted Christ (see Acts 5:30-31; see Exaltation). These differences can be easily explained by the different theological foci of Luke and the Johannine epistles on the one hand and of Paul on the other. In Acts the overwhelming theme is that of resurrection,* and thus forgiveness is the gift of the risen Lord.* Paul in his epistles for the most part presents justification as the gift of the crucified Christ.

See also APOSTASY; ASSURANCE; BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES; GRACE; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SIN, WICKEDNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. L. Arrington, The Acts of the Apostles (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988); R. Bultmann, "ἀφίημι κτλ," TDNT 1:509-12; J. C. Davis, "Another Look at the Relationship Between Baptism and Forgiveness of Sins in Acts 2:38," RQ 24 (1981) 80-88; W. G. Johnsson, Hebrews (Boise, ID: Pacific Press, 1994); W. L. Lane, Hebrews 9—13 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); H. Leroy, "ἀφίημι, ἄφεσις," EDNT 1:181-83; V. N. Olsen, "The Doctrine of Forgiveness in the Light of the Hebrew and Greek Languages" in The Statue of Christ, ed. V. Carner and G. Stanhiser (Loma Linda, CA: published privately, 1970); J. B. Polhill, Acts (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); E. B. Redlich, The Forgiveness of Sins (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1937); V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (London: Macmillan, 1948); W. Telfer, The Forgiveness of Sins (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg, 1960); H. Verländer, "Forgiveness," NIDNTT 1:699-703.

P. U. Maynard-Reid

FREEDOM, LIBERTY

The most common terminology for freedom (eleutheria and its cognates) occurs only eight times in Acts, the General Epistles and Revelation out of a total of forty-one NT usages. If one adds to these eight specific usages a comparison of freedom-related topics in both these and other early Christian texts with the Gospels and the Pauline epistles, three broad patterns emerge. Freedom from self-servitude, satanic oppression, sin, death and OT legal requirements are embraced in certain texts; warnings of the abuse of freedom are expressed in others; and occasionally notions of Christian freedom appear to be forgotten.

1. Freedom Embraced: Acts, Hebrews and 1 Peter
2. Freedom Abused: 2 Peter, Jude and Revelation
3. Freedom as Law: James
4. Freedom Obscured: The Early Fathers
5. Freedom and Context

1. Freedom Embraced: Acts, Hebrews and 1 Peter.

1.1. Acts. Acts* provides a demonstration of the freedom that comes through Christ* and his kingdom first introduced in the Gospels. There is liberation from demonic oppression (Acts 5:16; 8:7; 16:18; 19:12) and a demonstration of freedom from self-interest expressed in the early community of goods and other acts of generosity (Acts 2:44-45; 4:36-37; 11:29). In Acts 13:38-39 Paul's speech approximates Pauline teachings on liberation from sin, and freedom from sin and death are demonstrated in incidents such as the Ephesians burning their magic* books (Acts 19:18-19) and the apostle's bold speech (parrēsia) in the face of deadly persecution* (Acts 4:13, 31; 7:2-56; 9:27-29; 13:46; Schlier, 490).

More debatable is whether Acts and Paul are at odds over the issue of liberty from OT law.* While Acts does not proclaim freedom from the law in the same bold terminology as Paul uses (Acts 10:1—11:18; 15:1-29), in practical terms the compromise on legal requirements at the Jerusalem council, the circumcision* of Timothy or taking Jewish vows do not contradict Paul's own pragmatism on these matters (Rom 14:20-21; 1 Cor 8:13; 9:20; 10:32-33; Longenecker, 245-63).

1.2. Hebrews. Hebrews* matches certain Pauline attitudes toward the law, particularly its passing and replacement by a new covenant* (Heb 7:18-19; 8:6-13; 10:16-18). However, since the writer of Hebrews is not facing Paul's struggles with legalism but rather Christians failing to mature and abandoning their faith* in the midst of persecution, this theme remains undeveloped. The only clear reference to any sort of freedom comes in Hebrews 2:14-15, where humans are described as delivered (apallassō) from a lifelong bondage that resulted from the fear of death.

1.3. 1 Peter. 1 Peter 2:16 exhorts its readers to live as free persons while not using that freedom as a "pretext for evil." This encapsulates two larger themes of the epistle: the believers' identity as sojourners on earth and therefore free from the evil passions that lead to "Gentile" behavior (1 Pet 2:11; 4:1-5); and the call to social behavior that is beyond reproach, so that any suffering* will be undeserved persecution (1 Pet 3:13-17; 4:13-16). This warning, however, implies the possibility of using teaching about freedom from the present earthly order as a justification for immoral and antisocial behavior.

2. Freedom Abused: 2 Peter, Jude and Revelation.

2.1. 2 Peter and Jude. In 2 Peter* freedom is the misleading promise of the false teachers, who appear to promote or permit a hedonistic lifestyle of some sort (2 Pet 2:1-22, esp. 2 Pet 2:19; Bauckham 1990, 67-77). Jude* matches 2 Peter's concern for a group within the church* who have turned teachings about God's grace* into a permit for licentious behavior (aselgeia, Jude 4). The irony is that while freedom was the promise of these teachers, the final state was one of reenslavement to "worldly passions" (2 Pet 2:19-20). These false teachers are among those whom the writer of 2 Peter describes as twisting the "hard to understand" Pauline epistles (2 Pet 3:15-16). It is likely these teachers distorted Pauline teachings on freedom that were well suited to their permissive doctrines (Bauckham 1983, 332).

2.2. Revelation. With the exception of Revelation 1:5, where Christ is described as the one who has "freed us from our sins by his blood" (a theme also expressed in the Johannine epistles, e.g., 1 Jn 1:9; 5:18; see John, Letters of), Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) matches 2 Peter and Jude with its concern over groups abusing Christian freedom. Sexual immorality and the eating of food sacrificed to idols are singled out as characteristics of these groups (Rev 2:14, 20). It is possible that the groups denounced in Revelation had lost the spirit of Pauline teaching on meat offered to idols (i.e., food is a matter of indifference); like the "strong" of Paul's churches, these groups perhaps had made the flaunting of sexual mores and public eating of meat sacrificed to idols a critical expression of Christian freedom (1 Cor 8:4-13; 10:23-33; Rom 14:14-23).

3. Freedom as Law: James.

Some scholars suggest that James's* expression "the law of freedom" in James 1:25 and James 2:12 contradicts Pauline teachings on freedom and the law (Bultmann, 162-63). E. Käsemann suggests its origins lie in the Jewish identification of "the divine law [with] what the Stoics called cosmic reason" and their assertion "that one can live in thorough harmony with the order of things only if one knows and follows the law" (86; Käsemann, 493-96). Even if this is the origin of the expression, in James the "law of freedom" is linked with "the implanted word" that offers salvation* (Jas 1:21). This suggests a strongly Christian connotation to the phrase (Martin, 51). According to James, the freedom offered by this law is a liberty from self-serving behavior in order to do the works of true faith—acts of charity, self-restraint and harmonious living (Jas 1:27; 2:15-17; 3:9-10, 17-18; 4:11; see Faith and Works). In this regard James echoes the Gospels' theme of freedom from self-servitude as well as freedom from external powers of evil (Jas 3:6; 4:7; Davids, 47-50). Whatever the apparent differences between James and Paul on faith and works, in practice both make the love of neighbor the fulfillment of the law (Rom 13:8-10; Jas 2:8-10).

4. Freedom Obscured: The Early Fathers.

R. Bultmann bemoans the loss of Pauline teaching of freedom in both the preceding texts as well as the apostolic fathers* (Bultmann, 162-202). Certainly the latter offer little to counter this claim. The *Didache commends strict rather than libertine views on diet (Did. 6.3; 8.1), while 1 Clement and the epistles of Ignatius,* with their strong emphasis on leadership, hardly promote individual expressions of liberty. The Shepherd of Hermas, 2 Clement and early apocryphal* acts stress repentance,* purity* and perseverance (see Endurance) in the face of persecution. Perhaps most pessimistic on the Christian's ability to live in freedom is Ignatius, who recommends that slaves* should not seek manumission at the church's expense on the grounds that they may become "slaves of lust" (Ign. Pol. 4.3).

Despite the missing message of freedom in the apostolic fathers, apocryphal gospels and other early Christian texts, the picture is not as dark as Bultmann and Käsemann suggest. The Epistle of Barnabas stands within the Gospel and Pauline tradition of freedom from the law and its food regulations as well as freedom from the effects of sin, including death and demonic oppression (Barn. 3.6; 10.9; 16.9; 18.1-2 [coupled with Barn. 3.3; 14.7-9]). Justin Martyr indicates that freedom from demonic oppression was still demonstrated through exorcism (Justin Apol. II 6), and even the Didache demonstrates a spirit of freedom in its prophetic* ministry* (Did. 10.7; 11—13).

5. Freedom and Context.

As one shifts from early Christian communities, particularly those under Pauline influence, to the communities represented in the General Epistles (both early and late), Revelation and the apostolic fathers, there is a shift in context that alters the debate over the believer's freedom. Paul fought for the believers' right to live free from the constraints of OT nomism over against those within the early church who demanded strict adherence to the law. In other contexts, particularly as one moves to the latter part of the first century and beyond, calls for perseverance under more widespread Gentile persecution was a more pressing issue than liberation from legalism. Teaching on a believer's freedom from the law was marginalized in favor of speaking of freedom from the cares, concerns and desires of earthly existence that were a constant distraction to an increasingly oppressed group whose identity and existence were threatened by external persecution and internal schisms.

See also ETHICS; FORGIVENESS; LAW; REDEMPTION; SLAVE, SLAVERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); idem, Word Biblical Themes: Jude, 2 Peter (WBT; Dallas: Word, 1990); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1955) vol. 2; P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); E. Käsemann, Jesus Means Freedom (3d rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); R. N. Longenecker, Paul: Apostle of Liberty (New York: Harper & Row, 1964); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); H. Schlier, "ἐλεύθερος κτλ," TDNT 2:487-502. A. M. Reimer

FULFILLMENT. See PROMISE.

G

GALILEAN CHRISTIANITY

The Gospels depict Galilee as the region in which Jesus carried out most of his ministry and found his greatest following. It has long been assumed that the Jesus movement continued in Galilee and developed into Jewish Christianity (see Jewish Christianity). Although there is a limited amount of direct evidence for Galilean Christianity, the Gospels themselves are potentially rich resources of the Galilean Christianity which originated with Jesus' Galilean ministry. E. Lohmeyer pointed to Mark's emphasis on Galilee as the central motif for divine revelation and for the Parousia* (Mk 14:28; 16:7). Galilee is portrayed as the land of salvation; Jerusalem as the land of Jesus' rejection. Written sometime between 60-70, Mark depicts Jesus' widespread popularity largely within the boundaries of Galilee (i.e., the area around the Sea of Galilee). For these reasons, Marxsen nicknamed Mark the Galilean Gospel (Marxsen, 92), and others have developed the thesis of its Galilean provenance (e.g., Kelber). But it is Matthew, even more than Mark, that offers promise of shedding light on Galilean Christianity.

1. Matthew: The Gospel of Galilean Christianity
2. First-Century Terms for Galilean Christianity
3. Later Galilean Christianity and the Pella Tradition
4. The Nazarenes and the Gospel of Matthew

1. Matthew: The Gospel of Galilean Christianity

Matthew, written sometime in the period A.D. 80-90, builds upon and expands Mark's Galilean motif. An exploration of Matthew's emphasis on Galilee will suggest possible lines along which the First Gospel both reflects and addresses Galilean Christianity of the late first century.

Matthew introduces Jesus by authenticating his activity in Galilee (Mt 4:12-16), particularly Nazareth and Capernaum, through OT promises. Matthew also concludes Jesus' ministry with a long-anticipated meeting in Galilee during which he commissions his disciples to the nations (Mt 26:32; 28:7; 28:10; 28:16-20). In addition Matthew uniquely reverses the traditional understanding of Galilee: The land of peril (Mt 4:12-16) becomes the land of safety when Jesus twice "withdraws" (anechōrēsen) into Galilee in the face of imminent danger (Mt 2:22-23; 4:12). The light of salvation prophetically dawns upon the Galilean people who are sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death (Mt 4:16). And the death of Jesus in Jerusalem suddenly is transformed into a celebration of the resurrection on a mountain in Galilee where Jesus declares his authority among his disciples (see Donaldson). Why did Matthew meticulously reverse negative nuances of Galilee? And how might this reflect Galilean Christianity of the late first century?

1.1. The Social-Historical Setting of Galilee. Galilee had a gloomy history. Gentile nations periodically raided this richly fertile land, sometimes killing, imprisoning or exiling its people. Matthew sought to justify the birth of Christianity and the presence of the Messiah in a land with a dark history set far away from the religious center of Jerusalem.

The first-century form of oppression included Roman occupation and domination of Galilee through client-rulers, multiple levels of taxation, massive building projects which advertised and glorified Rome, and Roman military presence. The land and people of Galilee were used as an economic base, but the client rulers allowed no channel for indigenous Galileans to voice their concerns. The only known expressions of the populace were through popular insurrections and a peasant strike (Horsley, 126).

Galilee of the Gentiles was at a crossroads of cultures and empires. International trade routes gave Galileans contact with various people groups (Mt 4:15). As indicated in the Gospels and other historical sources, first-century Galilee was likely populated by Jews, Romans, Greeks, Syrians, Phoenicians, Samaritans, Arabians and Egyptians. Early rabbinic case laws refer to Jews and Gentiles living beside one another, sharing a courtyard or working together in the fields.

Tolerant and open minded due to their contact with Gentiles, Galilean Jews were often at odds with Jerusalem Temple authorities. Galileans resented their oppressive intrusions and rigid interpretations of the law. Matthew's unique phrase "Galilee of the Gentiles," quoted from Isaiah 9:1, most likely refers to the Gentile cities surrounding Galilee. "Galilee of the Gentiles" has been appropriately translated, "heathen Galilee."

For the above reasons, there are indications of widespread prejudice against Galileans in the first century. Galileans were known to slur their gutturals, and were therefore sometimes prohibited from reciting public prayers in the synagogues. The Gospel of John records Nathaniel saying, "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1:46), and others saying, "a prophet does not arise from Galilee" (Jn 7:52).

1.2. Galilean Christianity and Rabbinic Judaism. At the time Matthew wrote his Gospel, Jewish Christians were likely expelled from the synagogues.* This is probably reflected in Matthew's unique phrase, "their synagogues" (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54; cf. the "cursing of the heretics," or birkat hā mînîm in Jewish synagogue prayers; see Di Sante, 107-10). This situation was due to the underlying tension between Jewish Christianity and rabbinic Judaism which originated after the destruction of the Jerusalem temple (see Christianity and Judaism). In comparison to the other Synoptic writers, Matthew highlights the conflicts between Jesus and the Jewish leaders (e.g., Mt 23). Jewish Christianity's separation from the synagogues implies increased Gentile* involvement in Matthew's Jewish Christian community. It is no coincidence, therefore, that woven among the strongly Jewish overtones in Matthew's Gospel are unique Gentile affirmations: the four Gentile women found in the opening genealogy, the magi from the east who are the first to worship Jesus, the phrase "Galilee of the Gentiles" which introduces Jesus' ministry location (Mt 4:15), and dual climactic mission mandates to all nations (Mt 24:14; 28:19).

If Matthew was addressing Galilean Christians, we may surmise that they had to struggle daily with the above issues as they lived their faith within intense social conditions that dominated their lives. Galilean Christianity found itself immersed in issues of multiculturalism, oppression and conflict with religious and political authorities.

1.3. A Case for the Galilean Provenance of Matthew. A. Overman has suggested that the Gospel of Matthew was composed in or around Galilee, and he cites two reasons: (1) Matthew's Gospel fundamentally limits the Jesus movement to the general region of Galilee; (2) Galilee was the center of the development of early rabbinic Judaism. Its dominant figures were primarily Galileans. The term "rabbi" appears to have originated in Galilee and so did rabbinic Judaism's first authoritative writing, the Mishnah (Overman 1996, 17-18). To these may be added the Council of Jabneh (Jamnia) in Galilee and modern archaeological evidence of synagogues in Galilee (see Levine; see Judaism, Post-A.D. 70).

The issues dominating the period following the destruction of the Jerusalem temple, such as interpretations of the law,* ritual purity,* authority and community structure, are found both in Matthew and early rabbinic Judaism. Early rabbinic Judaism and Matthew's community (see Matthean Community) appear to have understood and defined one another through mutual engagement and conflict. The Pharisees in Matthew are basically limited to Galilee, giving Overman the impression that the Galilean Pharisees of early rabbinic Judaism represented the main contenders of Matthew's community (Overman 1996, 15-18; Overman 1990, 156). The Gospel of Matthew may be viewed as an informed response to the very tensions found in the writings of early rabbinic Judaism which emerged in the period A.D. 70-100 and apparently prevailed over Galilean Christianity. Matthew reads like a treatise to persuade the Jew to accept the kind of Jewish Christianity that would have been incorporating Gentiles into its fellowship.

Overman suggests that Matthew's Gospel was written in or near a Galilean city large enough to have been located on a major trade route and to have had an imperial presence, a nearby court and diverse forms of Judaism. The location would require a multicultural setting outside of Palestine among Gentile Greek-speakers. Overman concludes that the most plausible location of the Matthean community is Capernaum, Jesus' home and ministry base (Mt 4:13) near the city of Tiberias. Interestingly, Jesus called Matthew from his tax collector's booth in Capernaum. Other possibilities include regions in or around the thriving first-century Galilean cities of Sepphoris or Tiberias (Overman 1996, 17-18).

2. First-Century Terms for Galilean Christianity

The name "Galilean" may have been an early term for the followers of Jesus. The apostles were addressed as "People of Galilee" in Acts 1:11. Peter, upon denying Jesus, was reprimanded: "Certainly you are one of them, for you are a Galilean" (Mk 14:70; cf. Mt 26:73). Although lacking details, Acts acknowledges a church in Galilee: "the church throughout Judea, Galilee and Samaria had peace and was built up" (Acts 9:31). After the death of Stephen* Christians "scattered throughout the countryside of Judea and Samaria" (Acts 8:1). They likely fled to Galilee as well since Luke often utilizes Judea as a broadly inclusive reference. While Christianity originated in Galilee, the center of the movement eventually shifted to Jerusalem,* and therefore we have little information of the Galilean community apart from what can be gleaned from the Gospels. Once Gentiles flooded into the movement, the non-Jewish term Christians (Christianoi) replaced Galileans (Acts 11:26).

The early use of Nazarene appears to be a derogatory allusion to Galilean Christianity. Tertullus accused Paul of being "an agitator among all the Jews" and "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts 24:5). This derogatory reference appears to give deliberate precedence of Jerusalem over Galilee (cf. Acts 2:7). Matthew also felt the need to justify Jesus' presence in Nazareth as a fulfillment of the prophecy, "He shall be called a Nazarene" (2:23).

3. Later Galilean Christianity and the Pella Tradition.

Eusebius and Epiphanius report that prior to the First Jewish revolt (A.D. 66-70), Jerusalem Christians migrated to Pella.* Eusebius also mentions the relatives of the Lord (desposynoi) who traveled extensively from the Jewish villages of Cochaba and Nazareth (see Relatives of Jesus). Cochaba was located east of the Sea of Galilee in the Transjordan, just north of the Decapolis. Therefore some of Jesus' relatives may have resided in the Transjordan during the first two centuries.

Pella was in the Transjordan region near the border of the Decapolis and Peraea. There were three known Jewish Christian sects located in Pella: the Ebionites,* Jacobites and Nazarenes. All three sects utilized and favored the Gospel of Matthew. They zealously interpreted Scripture and observed Jewish law. But all three had differences, revealing a diversity among Jewish Christians. The Ebionites rejected the virgin birth, accused Paul of breaking the law and strictly followed Jewish law, including circumcision.* The Jacobites legalistically observed Jewish law but also supported Gentile mission. The Nazarenes knew Hebrew, had a Hebrew version of Matthew and endorsed the mission of Paul to the Gentiles. They were the more progressive of the three and were cursed and hated by Jews for their messianic beliefs. According to Epiphanius, the Nazarenes were located in Pella, Cochaba and Coele-Syria.

Although they kept the law like other Jewish Christians, the Nazarenes have been compared to a mainstream Christian group (Wilson, 156). Their long history dates prior to the A.D. 70 destruction of Jerusalem. In fact Matthew's Gospel uniquely describes Jesus as a Nazarene who appears in fulfillment of prophecy (Mt 2:23). This and Matthew's Jewish perspective may explain the Nazarenes' affinity to Matthew. NT and later Jewish use of the term "Nazarenes" for Christians reveals the deep and enduring historical roots of the term. The Nazarenes flourished at Pella after the pre-70 influx of Jewish Christians from Jerusalem, and they endured on into the fourth century when they were condemned as heretical. The use of the name Nazarenes for Christians in Transjordan likely indicates the presence of people who originally came from Nazareth.

The Transjordan is mentioned in the key geographical passage of Matthew 4:15: "Land of Zebulun, land of Naphtali, on the way to the sea, beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles." This phrase appears to broaden the scope of Galilee to include Gentile regions, since "beyond the Jordan" usually referred to the land east of the Jordan, the Transjordan. This would include the Decapolis and possibly Peraea to the southeast. Matthew's summary verses, "So the news about him spread throughout all Syria" and "Many crowds of people followed him from Galilee, the Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea, and from beyond the Jordan" (Mt 4:24,25), strengthen this interpretation. Furthermore the Synoptics indicate activity of Jesus southeast of the Sea of Galilee, which could have left a lasting impact in the Decapolis region of the Transjordan (e.g., Mt 8:28).

4. The Nazarenes and the Gospel of Matthew. Internal and external evidence strongly suggest that Matthew is the Gospel of Galilean Christianity. Both the Matthean and Nazarene communities reveal underlying renewal movements within Judaism which extended their mission outward to the Gentiles and incorporated them into their respective communities. Both communities, though representing differing times and places, were condemned for their inclusiveness of Gentiles. Both appear to be rooted in the earliest Jewish Christian movement of Galilee (cf. Mt 2:23; Mk 14:67; 16:6).

Matthew best represents Galilean Jewish Christianity in the later first century, and Pella represents Jewish Christianity's migration to the Transjordan beginning in the same time period and continuing on into the fourth century.

The remains of the Gospel of the Nazaraeans (c. A.D. 100-150) and the Gospel of the Ebionites (c. A.D. 100-175; see DJG, Gospels [Apocryphal] §4), as well as the lost works of Ariston of Pella, reveal a flurry of activity in the Jewish Christian communities of the Transjordan, Decapolis and Syria (Van Elderen, 113). This activity appears to have at least some roots in Galilean Christianity.

Indications that Jesus' own family members were active in both Galilee and the Transjordan are further strengthened by the traditions concerning James's family. Since Galilee was linked to Damascus, we may also surmise that Galilean Christians spread the gospel to Damascus, after which the movement experienced persecution from Saul. A few decades later Jewish Christians migrated to the Transjordan, and many second-century Jewish Christian movements flourished there. In the third and fourth centuries, Jewish Christianity waned when it was scorned by both Christians and Jews.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; EBIONITES; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; MATTHEAN COMMUNITY; PELLA, FLIGHT TO.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Di Sante, Jewish Prayer: The Origins of the Christian Liturgy (New York: Paulist, 1991); T. L. Donaldson, Jesus on the Mountain: A Study in Matthean Theology (JSNTSup 8; Sheffield: JSOT, 1985); L. E. Elliott-Binns, Galilean Christianity (SBT; Chicago: Alec R. Allenson, 1956); S. Freyne, Galilee, Jesus and the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); P. Hertig, "The Galilee Theme in Matthew: Transforming Mission through Marginality," Missiology 25 (1997) 155-63; R. A. Horsley, Galilee: History, Politics, People (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1995); E. Lohmeyer, Galiläa und Jerusalem (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1936); W. H. Kelber, The Kingdom in Mark: A New Place and a New Time (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist: Studies in the Redaction History of the Gospels (Nashville: Abingdon, 1969); G. Stemberger, "Galilee—Land of Salvation?" in W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974) 409-38; J. A. Overman, Church and Community in Crisis: The Gospel According to Matthew (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1996); idem, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); A. J. Saldarini, "The Gospel of Matthew and Jewish-Christian Conflict in the Galilee" in The Galilee in Late Antiquity, ed. L. I. Levine (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992) 23-38; B. Van Elderen, "Early Christianity in Transjordan," TynB 45 (1994) 97-117; S. G. Wilson, Related Strangers: Jews and Christians, 70-170 C.E. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995).

P. A. Hertig

GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION

Gentiles (usually Gk ethnē) is a term used by Jews to describe non-Israelites, a distinction made with many other terms (Bietenhard, 788-95; Porton, gôyîm; see DPL, Gentiles, §1). However, the early church* increasingly was composed of Gentiles, and because often it appropriated terms previously used of Israel,* the term Gentiles sometimes refers to "unbelieving, non-Christian gentiles" (e.g., 1 Pet 2:12; 4:3). The "Gentile mission," on the other hand, characterized earliest Christianity in that it aggressively sought out converts to Christianity from any people group all over the Roman Empire (see Roman Empire) and beyond. Accordingly, the "Gentile mission" assumes an early Christian self-identity as it formed itself into a self-conscious group (church) and a desire to recruit members to this church by actively evangelizing* non-Israelites. This mission characterized and shaped earliest Christianity. "In short, the history and theology of earliest Christianity are 'mission* history' and 'mission theology'" (Hengel, 64).

The relationship of Jews to Gentiles was diverse, showing signs of both integration and resistance, and this diversity varied considerably with respect to time and place. What Jews did in Alexandria* at one time could be considerably at variance with what they did later (or earlier), and what Jews did there could be significantly contrasted with what Jews did in the land of Israel or in, say, Sardis or Rome.* It should be observed that Jews of all times believed that Yahweh, their God, was the King of the whole world (Ps 96:4-5, 10), that all people had been created by Yahweh and there was really only one God (Sir 13:15; Philo Decal. 64), that all people could join Judaism through conversion (exceptions to this permission were rare), that it was wise to get along with Gentiles in the diaspora* (Philo Flacc. 94; Josephus records numerous treaties Jews established with Gentiles) and that Jews ought to show general friendliness with their neighbors (the Good Samaritan story of Jesus concerns a religious boundary; cf. Josephus J.W. 2.412-16).

However, despite this integrative tendency there were almost always limits to what Jews were willing to do with Gentiles: they were opposed to intermarriage (Ezra 9—10; T. Levi 9:10; 14:6), religious idolatry* (1 Macc) and permission for Gentiles to penetrate into the central courts of the temple* (Acts 21:28). A fairly standardized hope* of Judaism was a massive conversion of Gentiles to worship* of Yahweh at the last day (Tob 13:11; 1 Enoch 48:7-10; 63:1-12; Mt 8:11-12). This was the context for early Christians, since most were Jewish (see DJG, Gentiles).

1. Origins of the Gentile Mission
2. Nature of the Gentile Mission in Earliest Christianity
3. Two Later Developments

1. Origins of the Gentile Mission.

Evangelizing Gentiles was not natural to the people of Israel, neither in the land of Israel nor in the diaspora. Because of the holiness* laws and their effective, practical implementation in Jewish culture by the first century A.D., concerns were raised not only about the influence of paganism through contact with idolaters but also about the practical impact that regular relations with Gentiles would have on purity* and personal holiness. Thus when the first Christians, who were nearly all Jewish, began to extend the message about Jesus Messiah to non-Israelites, there would have been considerable consternation and conflict among both Christian Jews and non-Christian Jews (cf. Acts 1—15).

We need then to ask how the Gentile mission began. With Paul this mission found its principal spokesman, and the evidence for his understanding of the mission is significant (cf. Acts; Gal 2:1-10; Rom 15:14-29; see DPL, Mission). But one thing is clear: it is inaccurate to argue that it would have been "natural" for Jewish Christians to share their newfound religious ideals realized in Jesus with any pagan who happened to be in their company.

1.1. Jewish Proselytism. It has been argued by very influential scholars (e.g., J. Jeremias, E. Schürer, A. von Harnack, D. Georgi; on this scholarship see McKnight 1991, 1-10) that early Christianity simply adopted the missionary nature and practices of contemporary Judaism and extended them along Christian lines, eventually eclipsing the Jewish mission altogether with a decisive victory: Christians won over the Roman Empire, while Jews, so it is argued, caved in and withdrew from missionary work completely. However, the recent consensus of scholarship is that this picture is not only exaggerated but wrong-headed in its essential arguments. A majority of current scholars working on Jewish missionary activity agree that Judaism was not a missionary movement, did not have a missionary theology and only rarely involved itself in what may be called "universal proselytization" (see McKnight 1991, Goodman, Cohen, Taylor, Porton).

If this conclusion is sound, earliest Christianity did not adopt or adapt the Jewish missionary activity of its contemporaries. Earliest Christianity did not get its missionary impulse from Judaism; the two religions diverge here. "Christianity was committed to encountering the world in its universal mission to convert it; Judaism was committed to keeping the holiness of the people sacrosanct" (Segal, 177).

1.2. Jesus. The closing words of Jesus to his disciples were to make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:16-20), and in Acts 1:8 the resurrected Christ informs the disciples that they are to be "witnesses"* throughout the world, beginning in Jerusalem* and its environs. Thus the Gentile mission, however indirectly, begins with Jesus (Hengel, 61-63; See DJG, Gentiles, §2). However important these words have been in the development of the Christian conception of a mission to the whole world, they apparently fell on deaf ears among the apostolic cadre. For as the text of Acts unfolds and as any reader of the NT can see, the apostles did not appeal to Jesus to explain their mission, nor did they use his words to urge others to evangelize the world. The issue was not the importance of the Gentile misson but rather the manner of accepting Gentile converts.

Even Paul's early missions were designed, in the first level, to be evangelism of Jews in synagogues,* and it was only after rejection by Jews and acceptance by Gentiles that the Gentile mission came into focus (e.g., Acts 13:44-52). In spite of the foundational nature of the Great Commission words of Jesus, and even if these words did have some generative effects, the origins of the early Christian Gentile mission must be largely sought elsewhere.

1.3. Sociological Explanations. M. Goodman has argued that the Christian mission was a sociologically explicable phenomenon (Goodman, 160-74). The eschaton did not arrive as expected, and when we factor in the powerful personality of Paul and his theology, we are led to the view that something new was on the horizon. Paul's ministry, and that of several other early Christians, led to the conversion of some Gentiles, and this led to conflict among early Christians and Jews. Such a conflict forced rationalization and legitimation on the part of the early Christians, and this legitimation led to an overreactive defense of a Gentile, universal mission. Permission was always granted to convert to Judaism; now such activity was not only permitted but positively desired. Thus an initial defensiveness led to what was the distinguishing and defining characteristic of much early Christianity: evangelism of the Gentiles.

However attractive this explanation might be—and arguably it clarifies what inevitably did take place—it falls short of a fully adequate explanation for the origins of the Gentile mission. To be sure, the Gentile mission was in part stumbled upon; but that act of stumbling had greater momentum than a curious, heated interchange arising from a defensive overreaction.

1.4. Divine Providence. If we factor in (1) an ancient Jewish, and pagan, willingness to declare one's religious views in public, (2) a minimal impact of both the example (cf. Mt 8:5-13; 15:21-28) and words of Jesus (Mt 28:16-20; Acts 1:8), (3) the historical accidents of early Christians bumping into pagans and evangelizing them, along with the accompanying debate and legitimation (Dunn; Hengel, 54-58), (4) the presence of a ready-made audience of some Gentiles in Jewish synagogues, and therefore their preparedness for examining the Christian gospel,* and (5) the impact of persecution,* driving early Jewish Christians away from the land of Israel to other places where they would necessarily have to explain their new views, we are led to see the origins of the Gentile mission in a constellation of factors.

Not to be discounted here either is the importance of scriptural exegesis: success would have led Jewish Christians to their Scriptures to find wisdom and guidance for Gentile converts. At least the apostle Paul saw justification for the early Christian mission in the Abrahamic covenant* and its promise that Abraham would be the father of many nations (cf. Gen 12:1-3; 17:5; Gal 2:1-10, 15-21; 3:6-9, 28). Furthermore, the powerful experience of the Holy Spirit among early Christians (Acts 1:5, 8; 2:1-4, 17-18; 4:31; 9:31; 10:19, 44-48; see Holy Spirit) contributed to their developing confidence in a universal missionary outreach.

One might argue, then, that the mission began with accidents: successes among the Gentiles and consequent debates. But these accidents, according to the earliest Christian evidence, were generated by God's guidance through the Spirit and were continued through the divinely permitted driving of Christians away from the land of Israel. The early Christians' appeal to the universal dimensions of God's activity in the history of Israel is solidly based.

2. Nature of the Gentile Mission in Earliest Christianity.

Early Christian literature that survives is not written for the purpose of evangelizing unbelievers. Consequently, the information we do have comes to us indirectly, for it is found in contexts embedded in other concerns. However, one book, the Acts of the Apostles, describes the "development of the church" from Jerusalem to Rome. Every study of the Gentile mission must begin there.

2.1. Acts. Several features of Acts are notable. First, Luke emphasizes the sovereign prompting of the Holy Spirit (Kee, 28-41). The mission of the early church was generated, directed and sustained by the Holy Spirit. Thus it received its decisive impetus from the Spirit's descent at Pentecost* (Acts 2, esp. Acts 2:1-4, 17-18, 33, 38), and its effectiveness is attributed to the Spirit (Acts 4:31; 5:32). When Philip, who became the first "Gentile missonary," had success with the Samaritans, fulfilling the programmatic design of Acts 1:8, it was because the Spirit was at work (Acts 8:14-25); he furthered his ministry by evangelizing the Ethiopian eunuch as a result of Spirit-directed work (Acts 8:29, 39). Paul's conversion was a filling of the Spirit (Acts 9:17), and the Spirit brought about his calling to Gentile missionary work (Acts 13:2, 4), not to mention its actual operation (Acts 13:9, 52; 16:6-7; 19:1-7, 21; 20:22-23, 28; 21:4, 11; 28:25). Peter had to receive revelation from the Spirit before he could comprehend that this same Spirit would also fill Gentiles (Acts 10:19, 44-48; 11:12, 15-17), and similar things are said of others (e.g., Acts 11:24, 28).

Second, Luke intends to record the geographical spread of the gospel from Jerusalem to Rome along with its encounter of different cultures and religions (Kee, 42-69). For each of these, Luke records the establishment of local churches where this faith and practice could be centered and nurtured (see Centers of Christianity). After an initial statement to this effect (Acts 1:8), Luke is careful to record the spread of the gospel: from Jerusalem (Acts 2), to Samaria (Acts 8:4-25), to an Ethiopian traveler (Acts 8:26-40), to Caesarea and the Gentile Cornelius (Acts 10—11), to Antioch (Acts 11:19-30), throughout Cyprus and Asia Minor (Acts 13:4—14:21), to Europe through the evangelization of some of Greece with its different cultural, philosophical, political and religious orientations (Acts 16:6—18:17), and then on to Rome (Acts 27:1—28:16), where once again Paul evangelized both Jews and Gentiles from prison (Acts 28:17-31). Along the way Luke records controversies about this mission and their various solutions (see esp. Acts 11:1-18; 15:1-35). In particular, the Gentile mission was endorsed by the apostles (Acts 11:1-18), but minimal ethical requirements were expected of pagan converts to the gospel (Acts 15:1-35).

Third, Luke shows a Paul who begins with the Jews and only extends that Jewish offer to the Gentiles. At the very end of his account, Luke has Paul warning the Jews that though he has evangelized them, God has appointed this same message to go out to the Gentiles as well (Acts 28:28). This theme (to the Jews first) is a foundational method for Paul's missionary preaching: the same occurs in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:46), Corinth (Acts 18:6) and Ephesus (Acts 19:8-10). Jewish privilege is affirmed, as is found deeply embedded in the early Christian Bible (Gen 12:1-3), but it is not an exclusive privilege: Gentiles who believe will be grafted into the vine, and Jews who do not believe will be snipped from the vine (cf. Rom 9—11). Along this line of evidence, it is Luke who records the presence of the so-called God-fearers in the Jewish synagogues, who, so it seems, were especially attracted to the gospel of universal salvation,* apart from joining the nation of Israel (McKnight 1991, 108-14).

2.2. The Theology of the Evangelists. We can begin with Luke by observing that the theology Luke expounds in Acts is quite similar to his approach to the life of Jesus of Nazareth. He affirms that the Gentile mission begins with the preaching of repentance in Jerusalem (Lk 24:47), but this motif begins in the infancy narratives of Luke and continues throughout: Luke 2:14, 32; 3:4-6; 4:26-27; 7:1-10; 10:29-37; 13:29; 17:11-19. The gospel of the kingdom,* of the salvation of God, is offered to all, but this "all" is subsequent to the offer to Jews. Luke emphasizes the future salvation* of Gentiles in his Gospel (Lk 13:28-29; 14:15-24; 24:47-48), as well as the piety of specific Gentiles (Lk 7:1-10; 19:2-10).

Much of Mark's content is picked up by either Luke or Matthew, but several points regarding Mark deserve mention. Like Paul, Mark affirms the priority of the Jews (Mk 7:27). In addition, Mark emphasizes, along with the rest of the Synoptic tradition, the positive response of Gentiles, including the Roman centurion (Mk 15:39). Mark suggests that Gentiles respond in agreement with the Jews (cf. Mk 1:21-28 and 5:1-20; 5:18-20 and 7:29-30).

On most accounts Matthew's Gospel is the most Jewish of the Gospels, yet it is also marked by a heavy accent on universalism,* leading most scholars today to think that Matthew was seeking to lead his community to greater involvement in the Gentile mission. While Jesus is King of Israel (Mt 2:1-12) and has come for the salvation of his (read "Jewish") people (Mt 1:21), and while he demands that his disciples evangelize only Jews (Mt 10:5-6; cf. 10:23) and he himself restricts himself in some sense to Jews (cf. 15:24), this same Jesus is bent on a more universal scope to the mission of God's kingdom.* Thus the first to worship are the magi (Mt 2:1-12), who become descendants of Abraham (Mt 1:1); Jesus' dwelling in Galilee fulfills the dream of the light of Israel shining on all nations (Mt 4:12-16). The birds of the air (read "Gentiles") will nest in Israel's tree (Mt 13:31-32; cf. 21:33-46; 22:1-14; 24:14), just as Jesus himself evangelizes some Gentiles (Mt 8:5-13; 15:21-28). The centurion at the cross is the first to confess Jesus as Son of God without being rebuked, and he is a Gentile (Mt 27:54). So it is Matthew's design to show that from the very beginning, though the Jews are the privileged people and remain so (this is probably why Matthew retains sayings like 10:5-6 and 15:24), the gospel moves from them to the whole world (Mt 28:16-20). Like Paul's very practice, Matthew, Mark and Luke each see a particularism (to the Jews first) that leads to a universalism (and also to the Gentiles; see DJG, Gentiles, §§3-6).

2.3. 1 Peter. Peter's first letter is addressed to Christians who most probably were former Gentile unbelievers (cf. 1 Pet 1:18; 4:1-6) but who were now members of the family of God. These Christians now see Gentiles as "the other," as those who do not believe in Jesus Messiah and do not live in this new society (cf. 1 Pet 2:12). But Peter's concept of the Gentile mission, if we can judge from his letter (and we have to admit our limitations here), is that Christians are to live in the midst of a disobedient society in such a way that Gentiles can see their holy,* loving* manner of life and, through their observation, be led to glorify God (1 Pet 2:11-12, 15; 3:1-2). These "strangers and temporary residents" (1 Pet 1:1; 2:11) are to be prepared to defend their faith* and hope* (1 Pet 3:15), but this seems to be an action done in the midst of persecution* rather than in some public forum. What we see in 1 Peter, then, is a group of churches in Asia Minor (1 Pet 1:1-2) who have settled into a lifestyle of obedience* but are questioning why they must undergo suffering.* Peter's response is that (1) God uses this suffering to purify their character (1 Pet 1:3-12) and (2) they are to live in such a way as to influence those who persecute them.

In Peter's list of spiritual gifts (1 Pet 4:7-11) there is no mention of evangelism, though it is remotely possible that this could be involved in the "if anyone speaks, let the words be the oracles of God" (1 Pet 4:11). Nor is evangelism a part of the instructions given to the elders (1 Pet 5:1-4). Peter, then, appears to have a different concept of the Gentile mission, one hammered out on the anvil of life experience over the heat of persecution. Peter's perception of the Gentile mission is that it advances as a result of Christian lifestyle, rather than along the lines of a Pauline concept of geographical growth through missionary evangelism. (2 Pet is even more concerned with internal doctrinal and moral questions.)

2.4. Johannine Literature. The complex of writings under the name of John witness to some common themes about Gentiles and the Gentile mission. First, whether in anticipation of a work to be accomplished (Jn 1:9; 3:17; 4:42; 6:33, 51; 11:27; 12:20-23; 16:8-10; 20:21-23) or in apocalyptic imagery for a heavenly reality (Rev 5:1-14; 19:1—20:15), John witnesses to Jesus as Savior of the whole world because he has provided a sacrifice* for the sins* of the whole world (1 Jn 2:2; 4:14). Second, the ministry of Jesus was directed toward Jews, and Gentiles were only exceptionally included (Jn 4:1-42, 46-54; 12:20-22). Thus as for Paul and the Synoptics, Gentile salvation is secondary to the preaching to Jews (Jn 4:22). Third, like Luke, John emphasizes the Spirit's role in mission (Jn 14:25-26; 16:8-11; 20:19-23). However, John's Gospel has little trace of a uniquely Gentile mission, and apart from John 11:52, the only statement along these lines is a misunderstanding on the part of John's enemies, the Jews (Jn 7:35-36). Though we cannot be sure, it is possible that the travelers of 3 John are missionaries (3 Jn 5-8); it is also possible that they are prophets* or teachers* who are not primarily concerned with evangelism.

One might assume that John has this concern for evangelism of Gentiles in view in mission statements cited above, but his concerns lie elsewhere, especially in doctrinal controversies about Jesus and in the fundamental importance of faith in this Word of God and how that faith separates believers from the world (Hahn, 152-63). While John envisions a day when people from all the world will sing praises to the Lamb* on the throne, John does not spell out how it is that all those people got there. Missionary activity must be assumed.

For John there is an absolute contrast between the followers of Jesus and the world; the difference is effected by faith, by believing in Jesus, but John does not expound the role humans play in this gathering of people of faith.

2.5. Miscellaneous. Regardless of how difficult it is to explain the origins of the early Christian mission to the Gentiles, it is a fact that by the time of Constantine the Roman Empire had been "conquered" by the Christian messengers and message. Christianity was found from India to England and throughout the Mediterranean basin. Remarkable success like this deserves careful, sympathetic and analytical explanation.

There was something about Christianity that made it appealing to the Roman world and therefore in some sense superior to all other options available in that day. It must have seemed satisfying and attractive; by the end of the fourth century A.D. it was even advantageous to become Christian in most parts of the Roman Empire (Macmullen). Even if Christianity had many martyrs* in its history, and even if the apologists of the second century worked hard to defend the faith, the blood of the martyrs and the arguments of the apologists outlasted the opponents.

In spite of the inherited traditions of pagans and Jews, the unease of Rome with respect to the legal status of Christianity (especially under Nero, Domitian, Trajan and Hadrian, not to mention the later Decius), the establishment of other religious orientations and the fractious nature of much Christian development, Christianity did gain control of the religious beliefs and worship* of the Roman world. The full story can never be completely recovered, but at least the following contributed to the success of the Christian mission: a unified Roman Empire with an intricate, largely safe system for travel; the widespread use of the Greek language; the foundation that had been laid through the presence of Judaism throughout the Hellenistic* world; the sterling testimony of martyrs; the attractive wholesomeness of pure, loving lives; the effective counterarguments of the apologists; and the longing for religion throughout the Mediterranean (Green; Grant; Neill, 26-60; Ferguson, 571-82; Stark).

However, alongside this noteworthy development is the near absence of records of missionary efforts. We do not know the names of mission centers or of missionaries (but see Green, 166-93); we have no records of missionary endeavors; and we have little reflection by early Christians on the importance, urgency or necessity of missionary work to the definition of what Christianity was (Goodman, 91-108). This absence of information is most readily explained as an accident of history, probably generated largely because early Christian writers were concerned with other issues (like apologetical debates). While early Christians were engaging in apologetics in their writing, a world mission was under way; however unorganized it may have been, this sect of Judaism became a worldwide religion.

2.6. Summary. Christianity, understood here to be the message both of and about Jesus Christ, and then later in its more doctrinal and theological forms, had within it a missionary impulse that was not to be denied. Wherever it got its genesis, its effectiveness is well-known: Rome eventually became the head of a Christian empire.

3. Two Later Developments.

3.1. Conflict with Judaism. Scholarship is split on the nature of early Christian and Jewish relations. Some have argued that Christianity and Judaism were in a competition for pagan souls (e.g., Simon), while others argue that Judaism was never really in competition with Christianity at all. In fact, some more recent scholarship argues that the battle was an imagined battle, really only a theological construct: Christianity's battle with Judaism (as seen in some early Christian literature) was the use of older biblical themes (especially the prophets) for current issues that had almost nothing to do with Judaism (Taylor). It will take a generation to follow up this debate with some definitive conclusions, but for now it must be said that Christianity's conflict with Judaism for the conversion of pagans in the first three centuries of the common era may very well have not been a battle at all; it may be theological argumentation (see Christianity and Judaism).

*3.2. Decreasing Centrality of Mission. Goals, once achieved, usually recede in importance and give way to other concerns. In early Christianity, in many areas, this seems to have been the case with missionary efforts to convert pagans. Settled communities, achieved often with considerable effort, soon found other issues dominating their concern. Doctrinal controversies and practical issues may well have sapped many early Christian communities of their interest in evangelizing harder to reach people groups. For whatever reasons, it is clear that evangelistic energies waned and went through local ups and downs for many of the early Christian communities (Goodman).

Christianity gained the confidence of the Roman Empire, but this was not achieved by some central strategy, nor was it the result of increasing momentum. Rather, Christian goals and Roman goals were conflated, and this conflation dominated the Western world for centuries.

See also CIRCUMCISION; DIASPORA JUDAISM; EVANGELISM IN THE EARLY CHURCH; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Bietenhard, "People, Nation, Gentiles, Crowd, City," NIDNTT 2:788-805; S. J. D. Cohen, "Was Judaism in Antiquity a Missionary Religion?" in Jewish Assimilation, Acculturation and Accommodation: Past Traditions, Current Issues and Future Prospects, ed. M. Mor (SJC 2; Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1992); J. D. G. Dunn, "The Incident at Antioch (Gal. 2.11-18)" in Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1990) 129-82; E. Ferguson, Backgrounds of Early Christianity (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); M. Goodman, Mission and Conversion: Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire (Oxford: Clarendon, 1994); R. M. Grant, Greek Apologists of the Second Century (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988); M. Green, Evangelism in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970); F. Hahn, Mission in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1965); A. von Harnack, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (Gloucester, MA: Peter Smith, 1972 [1908]); M. Hengel, Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the Earliest History of Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1983); H. C. Kee, Good News to the Ends of the Earth: The Theology of Acts (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); R. Macmullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire A.D. 100-400 (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984); S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); S. Neill, Christian Missions (Pelican History of the Church 6; Baltimore: Penguin, 1964); G. Porton, The Stranger Within Your Gates: Converts and Conversion in Rabbinic Literature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); A. Segal, Rebecca's Children: Judaism and Christianity in the Roman World (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1986); M. Simon, Verus Israel: A Study of Relations Between Christians and Jews in the Roman Empire (135-425) (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986); R. Stark, The Rise of Christianity (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996); M. S. Taylor, Anti-Judaism and Early Christian Identity: A Critique of the Scholarly Consensus (SPB 46; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995). S. McKnight

GEONIM. See JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70.

GIFTS. See SACRIFICE, OFFERINGS, GIFTS.

GLORY

The English words glory and glorify are the principal translations for the Greek noun doxa ("glory") and the verb doxazō ("glorify"). However, the translation and significance of doxa and doxazō should not be limited to one English word apiece. In the later writings of the NT and the apostolic fathers,* both the noun and the verb possess wide ranges of meaning. Doxa designates either a person's favorable status, reputation or position (e.g., Heb 3:3; 1 Clem. 32.2; Barn. 19.3; Herm. Vis. 1.1.8; Herm. Man. 4.4.2; Herm. Sim. 5.3.3; 8.7.4, 6; cf. 1 Clem. 61.2) or their vanity and conceit (Barn. 8.2). Doxa is used as a term of measurement; that is, the "brightness" (doxa) of a light (Acts 22:11), the "beauty" (doxa) of a flower (1 Pet 1:24) or the "wealth" (doxa) of the nations (Rev 21:24, 26). Doxa can even refer to heavenly, angelic* figures (Jude 8; cf. Rev 18:1; Ign. Smyrn. 6.1; Szewc, 129-40). The verb doxazō means "appoint" (Heb 5:5), "exalt" (Barn. 6.16; Herm. Vis. 1.1.3), "honor" (1 Clem. 17.5; 32.3; Diogn. 5.14), "bless" (Ign. Pol. 7.2) and "boast" (Rev 18:7). By far, however, the two most frequent and theologically important uses of doxa and doxazō are as terms that denote worship and refer to God's* revealed presence.

1. Glory as Doxology
2. Glory as Divine Presence
3. Summary

1. Glory as Doxology.

1.1. Glory to God. The use of the noun doxa to mean "praise" or "adoration" falls into two basic patterns (but cf. Rev 4:9; 5:12). The first pattern employs doxa in the nominative case, an understood verb, a dative or a genitive that refers to God and a reference to time: "glory [be] to God forever and ever" is an example. This construction appears with some variation twenty-seven times in the literature (Heb 13:21; 1 Pet 4:11; 2 Pet 3:18; Jude 25; Rev 1:6; 5:13; 7:12; 19:1; 1 Clem. 20.12; 32.4; 38.4; 43.6; 45.7; 50.7; 58.2; 61.3; 64; 2 Clem. 20.5; Mart. Pol. 20.2; 21.2; cf. 22.1; Did. 8.2; 9.2, 3; 10.2, 4, 5; Diogn. 12.9). The second noun pattern uses a form of didōmi and doxa in the accusative with a dative referring to God: for example, "give glory to God." This construction, again with some variation, appears eight times (Acts 12:23; 1 Pet 1:7; Rev 4:9; 11:13; 14:7; 16:9; 19:7; 2 Clem. 17.7).

In these passages doxa is contextually coordinated with other nouns used in the veneration of God; "honor" (timē, 1 Pet 1:7; Rev 4:9, 11; 5:12, 13; 7:12; 1 Clem. 64; 65.2; Mart. Pol. 20.2; 21.2), "power" (dynamis, Rev 4:11; 5:12; 7:12; 19:1; Did. 8.2; 9.4, 5), "might" (kratos, 1 Pet 4:11; Rev 1:6; 5:13; 1 Clem. 64; 65.2; Mart. Pol. 20.2), "majesty" (megalōsynē, 1 Clem. 20.12; 61.3; 64; 65.2; Mart. Pol. 20.2; 21.2), "blessing" (eulogia, Rev 5:12, 13; 7:12), "thanksgiving" (eucharistos, Rev 4:9; 7:12), "wisdom" (sophia, Rev 5:12; 7:12), "strength" (ischys, Rev 5:12; 7:12), "eternal dominion" (thronos aiōnios, 1 Clem. 65.2; Mart. Pol. 21.2), "salvation" (sōtēria, Rev 19:1), "praise" (epainos, 1 Pet 1:7) and "riches" (ploutos, Rev 5:12).

1.2. Glorify God. When theos or its semantic equivalent is the object of the verb doxazō or when theos or its semantic equivalent is the subject of doxazō in the passive voice, then doxazō without fail means to "praise," "worship" or "venerate": "glorify God" or "God be glorified." These constructions occur twenty-eight times (Acts 4:21; 11:18; 13:48; 21:20; 1 Pet 2:12; 4:11, 16; Rev 15:4; 18:7; 1 Clem. 35.12; 43.6; 52.3; Ign. Trall. 1.2; Ign. Phld. 10.1; Barn. 2.10; 19.2; Herm. Vis. 2.1.2; 3.4.2; 4.1.3; 4.1.4; Herm. Man. 3.1; 5.2.3; Herm. Sim. 6.1.1; 6.3.6 [2x]; 8.6.3; 9.18.5; 9.28.5).

Doxazō is thus coordinated with other verbs for worship such as "fear" (phobeō, Rev 5:14; Barn. 19.2), "love" (agapaō, Barn. 19.2), "praise" (ainō, Mart. Pol. 14.3), "bless" (eulogeō, Mart. Pol. 14.3; 19.2), "pray" (proseucheō, Herm. Vis. 2.1.2) and "rejoice" (agalliaomai, Mart. Poly. 19.2; euphrainō, Herm. Vis. 3.4.2).

1.3. The Rhetoric of Glory Doxologies. The consistent syntactic patterns, the circumscribed range of meaning associated with both doxa and doxazō within these patterns, and the words contextually coordinated with doxa and doxazō all point to a specific historical setting—the worship experiences of the early church.* Repeated liturgical use accounts for the syntactic and semantic uniformity (see Worship; Liturgical Elements). Doxa and doxazō formed part of the church's rich vocabulary of doxology.

The glory doxologies perform similar functions in their literary context as they did in their original liturgical setting. Although most of the noun patterns imply action, sometimes the verb appears in the indicative (Acts 12:23; 1 Pet 4:11; Rev 4:9; 11:13; 19:7; 1 Clem. 58.2; 2 Clem. 17.7; Mart. Pol. 20.2; Did. 8.2; 9.4; 10.5), subjunctive (1 Pet 1:7) or imperative moods (Rev 14:7; 1 Clem. 32.4). Doxa and doxazō therefore continue to elicit, exemplify and command worship.

The glory doxologies also explicitly identify God as the object of worship. This is underscored when God is directly addressed (Rev 4:9; 1 Clem. 61.3; Did. 9.2, 3; 10.2, 4; Mart. Pol. 14.3). The glory doxologies thus underline early Christianity's continued commitment to Jewish monotheism.

In addition the doxologies demonstrate the liturgical significance of the risen Jesus. Jesus is singled out as the agent through whom glory is offered to God (Jude 25; 1 Clem. 58.2; 61.3; 64; 65.2; Mart. Pol. 14.3; Did. 9.4). In some cases Jesus even replaces God as the object of worship (2 Pet 3:18; Ign. Eph. 2.2; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; Ign. Pol. 8.2; Mart. Pol. 22.3), anticipating later trinitarian developments. The doxologies indicate that Jesus was and should be venerated as God.

Finally, the repeated references to time—"now and for ever more"; "for ever and ever" (Heb 13:21; 1 Pet 1:7; 4:11; 2 Pet 3:18; Jude 25; Rev 1:6; 5:13; 7:12; 1 Clem. 20.12; 32.4; 38.4; 43.6, 7; 50.7; 58.2; 61.3; 64; 65.2; 2 Clem. 20.5; Mart. Pol. 14.3; 20.2; 21.2; 22.3; Did. 8.2; 9.2, 3; 10.2, 4, 5; Diogn. 12.9)—place the glory doxologies within an eschatological* context: the church's worship anticipates that of the coming kingdom. In short the glory doxologies collapse the boundaries between heaven* and earth, present and future, and model the worship of God for the readers.

2. Glory as Divine Presence.
Glory language not only refers to the act of worship; it also indicates who is worshiped, God. Along with "wisdom" (sophia), "spirit" (pneuma), "image" (eikōn), "word" (logos), "name" (onoma) and "power" (dynamis), "glory" formed part of the semantic-filled words that could sign God's revealed presence.

2.1. Background. While the "glory of the Lord" (K̂bôd YHWH/doxa tou kyriou) indicates God's visible, movable presence in the OT and Jewish tradition, it does so in a variety of ways. The "glory of the Lord" was intimately tied up with theophany—the mighty and ominous arrival of God, an arrival that dramatically subdues evil. God's glory "thunders" upon the waters and defeats the powers of chaos (Ps 29:3); its arrival "shakes" the world (1QH 11:34). The revelation of glory to Moses* on Mount Sinai (Ex 24:16) legitimized him as a sacred mediator and thus established his experience as an archetype for other disclosures (e.g., Jub. 1:2-4; 2 Macc 2:8; 1Q34 frag. 3 col. 2; Sir 45:1-5).

Glory connoted the unqualified blessing of God during the Davidic monarchy. Hailed as the cosmic "king of glory" (Ps 24:7-10), Yahweh "fills the earth with his glory" (Ps 72:19; Is 6:3; 1QH 9:10). From this web of royal associations sprang speculation about a messiah figure who uniquely bears God's glory (Pss. Sol. 17:30-32; 4Q504/4QDibHam[a] 4:1-9). In the hands of the prophets* glory became a sign of hope: Yahweh will one day manifest himself, his glory, in an unprecedented way and gather together the nations, forgive and transform humanity and recreate the world (e.g., Is 40:5; 58:8; 60:1-3).

Ezekiel's dramatic inaugural vision* of God's human-shaped glory (Ezek 1:28) profoundly influenced the throne visionary accounts of Jewish apocalypses. Glory signified the anthropomorphic depictions of God, defined certain angelic figures as God's specially chosen agents and demonstrated the exalted status of translated heroes (1 Enoch 14:20; T. Levi 3:4; 2 Enoch 22:1-4, 7). Specifically the "one like a son of man" (Dan 7:13-14) became exegetically equated with the human-shaped "glory of the Lord" (Ezek 1:28), and it was this strand of the tradition that Jesus employed to define his own future role as the Son of Man "in" or "with" glory (Mk 8:28 par. Mt 16:27, Lk 9:26; Mt 19:28; Mk 13:26 par. Mt 24:30, Lk 21:27; Mt 25:31).

2.2. The Glory of God. The later NT documents and the apostolic fathers depend directly upon the variegated glory tradition stemming from the OT. For example, when Acts* records that Stephen* looked into heaven and saw the "glory of God and Jesus standing at his right hand" (Acts 7:55), the echoes of Jesus' Son of Man sayings and the throne vision tradition of Ezekiel 1 and Daniel 7 can be clearly heard. Hebrews's* description of the ark also mentions the "cherubim of glory" positioned over the mercy seat (Heb 9:5). The cherubim, together with the seat, had always been associated with tabernacle* and temple* theophanies (Ex 25:22; Deut 33:26; Num 12:89; 1 Sam 4:4; Ps 18:10; Ezek 9:3; 10:4). 2 Peter's* description of Jesus' transfiguration stands squarely in prophetic-call/throne theophany tradition (Hubbard). God is the "majestic glory" (megaloprepous doxēs) who spoke to Jesus (2 Pet 1:17). 1 Clement (1 Clem. 34.6) creatively places the seraphim's confession of Isaiah 6:3 ("Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts; all creation is full of his glory") in the mouth of the angelic hosts of Daniel 7:13 to speak of God's presence. This quotation is a historical precursor to the liturgical Sanctus of the third century (see Liturgical Elements).

These same documents take an additional step: any past appearance of God could be legitimately construed as an appearance of his glory. 1 Clement states that Abraham* "looked intently at the glory of God" (1 Clem. 17.2; atenizōn, a technical term for a throne vision; cf. Adam and Eve 33:2; T. Abr. [B] 8:4; 12:6). Genesis, however, never records such a glory theophany. Although Acts has Stephen proclaiming that the "God of glory" (theos tēs doxēs) "appeared" (ōphthē), the technical word for the appearance of God "to our fathers" (Acts 7:2), the patriarchal narratives are silent about such an appearance of glory. The *Shepherd of Hermas (Herm. Vis. 1.3.3) can adjure the readers to "pay attention and hear about the glories of God" (tas doxas tou theou), precisely because doxas can refer to any or all of God's past appearances, whether glory was specifically referenced (cf. Rom 9:3). Glory became shorthand for speaking about the manifestation of God's presence.

The later NT documents and the apostolic fathers also press the ethical dimensions of God's glory. Because God has called Christians "by his own glory" (2 Pet 1:3; cf. 1 Clem. 59.2), they should "make every effort" to cultivate the appropriate virtues* (2 Pet 1:5-9). The Christian life includes the disciplines of "seeing" (Barn. 11.5), "knowing" (Herm. Vis. 3.11.1; Herm. Man. 12.4.2), "understanding" (Herm. Man. 12.4.2), "remembering" (Herm. Vis. 3.9.5) and "meditating" (1 Clem. 27.7) upon God's glory. Others who have "served his magnificent glory" provide a model of faithfulness (1 Clem. 9.2). All anxiety should be cast aside because God is a "nurse, father, teacher, counselor, healer, mind, light, honor, glory, strength, life" (Diogn. 9.6; cf. Barn. 3.4). In sum, Christians are to "live in a manner that is worthy of his commandment and glory" (Pol. Phil. 5.1).

2.3. Glory as Eschatological Divine Presence. Early Christianity laid claim to the mantle of the prophets. Thus God's glory figures prominently in the description of the future.

2.3.1. God's Glory and the Future. Even though all believers will undergo judgment* at the throne of God, Jude* assures its readers of God's commitment and ability to make them "stand in the presence of his glory" (stēsai katenōpion tēs doxēs autou, Jude 24; cf. 11QH 12:29-30; Rom 3:23; Pr Man 5). Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) combines theophanic, royal and prophetic imagery in the description of the eschatological, heavenly temple that will be filled with the smoke "from the glory of God and from his power" (ek tēs doxēs tou theou kai ek tēs dynameōs autou, Rev 15:8).

Glory also describes the new, creative powers God unleashes. On that great day a new city will descend from heaven awash in the glory of God (echousan tēn doxan tou theou, Rev 21:11). In that new city there will be no need for sun or moon, "for the glory of God will be its light" (hē gar doxa tou theou ephōtisen autēn, Rev 21:23). Christians themselves can expect transformation into glory in the eschatological age. God leads believers "to glory" (eis doxan, Heb 2:10). Those who endure will receive the promised "crown of glory" (tēs doxēs stephanon, 1 Pet 5:4; cf. 1 Cor 9:25; 2 Tim 2:4; Jas 1:12). Indeed, unjust suffering for the name* of Jesus ensures a "certain glory" (doxan tina) for the faithful (Herm. Vis. 3.2.1; cf. 2.6.6). These texts demonstrate that Christians, like the prophets, continued to hope for an age ushered in and defined by Yahweh's glory.

2.3.2. Jesus' Glory and the Future. Evidence of a profound and controversial referential shift can be detected in a few of the eschatological glory texts. The apocalypse that ushers in the eschatological age is no longer described as a theophany of Yahweh's glory; it is the advent of Jesus and his glory.

1 Peter* states that believers should joyfully share in Christ's sufferings* in this life so that they may also rejoice "at the revelation of his glory" (en tēs apokalypsei tēs doxēs autou, 1 Pet. 4:13; cf. 2 Thess 1:7). Christians are "blessed," even if charged with blasphemy, for holding to the "name of Christ," because "the spirit of glory and of God" (to tēs doxēs kai to tou theou pneuma) rests upon them (1 Pet 4:14). Suffering certifies the hope of sharing in the "glory that is about to be revealed" (tēs mellousēs apokalyptesthai doxēs) at the Parousia* of Jesus (1 Pet 5:1; cf. Rom 8:18). For 1 Peter the apocalypse is not defined by the revelation* of the Father's glory, nor does Jesus simply share it with the Father; glory here belongs to Jesus alone. Further, the present suffering/future glory shape of these passages probably reflects the cross*/resurrection* shape of early Christian preaching and the life of the Jesus tradition.* Suffering was a messianic necessity for the experience of eschatological glory (1 Pet 1:11; cf. Lk 24:26).

2 Clement quotes Isaiah 66:18 to describe the return of Jesus: "And the unbelievers will see his glory" (kai opsontai tēn doxan autou [Is 66:18 LXX]) and will be "astonished" because this apocalypse will demonstrate "that the kingdom of the world belongs to Jesus" (2 Clem. 17.5). In Isaiah the promised theophany is that of Yahweh; in 2 Clement it is that of Jesus. That Jesus can substitute for Yahweh in an overtly monotheistic quotation demonstrates early Christianity's tacit redefinition of the Godhead via an eschatological christology* (or a christocentric eschatology).

2.4. A Glory Christology. The depiction of the final day as an apocalypse of Jesus' glory (and not only Yahweh's) implicitly witnesses to early Christianity's belief in the divinity of Jesus. What was implicit in the eschatological appropriation of glory becomes explicit when glory is deployed in a decidedly christological way.

2.4.1. Hebrews 1:3. The hymnic/confessional fragment preserved in Hebrews 1:1-4 describes

Jesus as the "radiance of his glory" (apaugasma tēs doxēs) and the "exact representation of his very being" (charaktēr tēs hypostaseōs, Heb 1:3). The juxtaposition of doxa with hypostasis in the ontological characterization of Jesus clearly articulates Jesus' status. Jesus is God's glory, God's very being. This hymn*/confession* formed part of the author's strategy to distinguish between Jesus and angels, as the catena of OT texts and the sustained midrash on these texts proves (see Heb 1:5—2:18). The binatarian shape and content of the hymn/confession—its focus upon Jesus and God and Jesus as God—alleviates potential confusion between Jesus and powerful angelic figures. Jesus is ontologically superior to any and all angelic agents; Jesus is equal with God; Jesus is God. The performative force of singing this hymn (or reciting, if a confession) was to strengthen community identity. No less powerful than the Lord's Supper* or baptism,* the ritual of confessing "Jesus as the glory of Yahweh" created and reinforced the boundary lines between Christianity and Judaism.*

2.4.2. James 2:1. James* also directly connects Jesus with glory but does so in a passage beset with grammatical ambiguity. James 2:1 warns the Christian community about showing partiality in expressing their "faith in our Lord Jesus Christ of glory" (tēn pistin tou kyriou hēmōn Iēsou Christou tēs doxēs). The awkward separation of "of glory" (tēs doxēs) from "in the Lord" (tou kyriou) by the words "our Jesus Christ" (hēmōn Iēsou Christou) has led some interpreters to suppose a later interpolation. However, there is no manuscript evidence to justify such a theory.

Instead one should try to make sense of the text as it stands. "Of glory" (tēs doxēs) could modify "faith" (pistin), yielding the translation "faith in the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." The content of faith* would be belief in the divinity (glory) of the Lord Jesus Christ. Or "of glory (tēs doxēs) and the personal pronoun "our" (hēmōn) could be understood as both directly modifying "Lord" (kyriou), yielding the translation "faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory" (KJV; RSV). "The Lord of glory" would function as a technical title and "Jesus Christ" as an appositional proper name. A third option treats tēs doxēs with adjectival force that modifies "Lord Jesus Christ." The resultant translation would be faith "in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (NASB; NRSV). Glory thus becomes a way of referring to the resurrection of Jesus (Johnson, 221; see 2.5 below). A fourth option, favored here, is to understand tēs doxēs in apposition to the phrase "Lord Jesus Christ," that is, "faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, [who is] the glory." Regardless of which option is chosen, James identifies Jesus as God's glory.

2.4.3. Barnabas 21.9. In the closing benediction Barnabas prays, "May the Lord of glory (ho kyrios tēs doxēs) and all grace be with your spirit" (Barn. 21.9). The phrase "Lord of glory" is quite rare, occurring only in Paul (1 Cor 2:8) and in 1 Enoch (1 Enoch 22:14; 25:3; 63:3). That Barnabas can use this phrase without the apocalyptic overtones and context that appear in 1 Corinthians and 1 Enoch witnesses to the fact that it had become a technical title for Jesus. Jesus is the "Lord of glory."

2.5. Resurrection as Glory. The question then becomes, Why and how did early Christianity begin to make the provocative redeployment of glory from Yahweh to Jesus? The resurrection of Jesus can be singled out as the historical and theological trigger for the identification of Jesus as the glory of God.

2.5.1. Acts 3:20. Acts 3:1-26 records Peter's and John's healing* of a cripple and the subsequent crowd reaction. Disavowing any substantive participation, Peter identifies to those gathered at Solomon's portico the "power" behind the miracle*: Peter asserts that it was the God of the Jewish Scriptures—"the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the God of the fathers" (Acts 3:13)—who had healed the man. This God, Peter further declares, is none other than the God who had "glorified his servant Jesus" (edoxasen ton paida autou Iēsoun, Acts 3:13).

God's glorification of Jesus here must be a reference to the resurrection (cf. Haenchen, 205). (1) The "glorification" of Jesus (i.e., his being raised from the dead) is set in the context of major events of Jesus' life, specifically his betrayal and death. (2) Acts 3:15 forms the best commentary on Acts 3:12 (Polhill, 134), where the death and resurrection of Jesus are specifically mentioned (see Death of Christ). Like "raised" (egertheis, Rom 8:34 and passim), "designated" (horisthentos, Rom 1:4), "exalted" (hyperypsōsen, Phil 2:9), "sat down at the right hand" (ekathisen en dexia, Heb 1:3 and passim) and "taken up in glory" (anelēmphthē en doxē, 1 Tim 3:16), "glorified" (edoxasen) is thus one of several constructions used to denote the resurrection of Jesus. God's glorification of Jesus (the resurrection) should be construed as an inauguration of eschatological glory (God's end-of-time presence).

2.5.2. Hebrews 2:7-9. The expositional material of Hebrews 1:5—2:18 presents a sustained contrast of the Son* with angelic figures. Through a series of OT quotations the author asserts the Son's relational, functional and ontological superiority (Heb 1:5-9), even though the author must concede the Son's death (Heb 2:10-18). In Hebrews 2:5-9 the author effects a crucial textual and theological transition. The quotation (vv. 6-8) and exposition (vv. 8-9) of Psalm 8:5-7 (LXX) provide the key textual hinge, while the theological transition occurs through repeated references to the life of Jesus: his incarnation (Heb 2:9), death (Heb 2:9) and resurrection (Heb 2:5, 8), all set in an eschatological context (Heb 2:5, 9).

The narrative architecture of this passage therefore defines "crowned with glory and honor" (doxē kai timē estephanōmenon, Heb 2:9) as a reference to Jesus' resurrection and therefore a homologation for "subject" (hypotassō) of Hebrews 2:9. To be "crowned with glory" is to be raised from the dead, an act that commences eschatological subjection. The "crowning with glory and honor" parallels the twofold conferral of "glory and honor" in the hymnic fragment of Revelation 5:12-13 and the "receiving of the name above every name" (i.e., the name kyrios, the Lord, Yahweh) in the hymn of Philippians 2:6-11.

2.5.3. 1 Peter 1:21 and Polycarp 2.1. Two other confessional passages textually and theologically juxtapose doxa and resurrection. 1 Peter 1:21 assures its readers about the wisdom of placing faith in God. God is "the one who raised him [Jesus] from the dead and gave him glory" (ton egeiranta auton ek nekrōn kai doxan autō donta). This saying is repeated by Polycarp* (Pol. Phil. 2.1), who also encourages his readers to believe "in him who raised our Lord Jesus Christ from and the dead and gave him glory" (ton egeiranta ton kyrion hēmōn Iēsoun Christon ek nekrōn kai donta autō doxan). There can be no doubt that "the one who raised him out of the dead" (ton egeiranta auton ek nekrōn) formed part of early Christianity's confession of faith (see, e.g., Acts 3:15; 4:10; 5:30; 13:30; Rom 4:24; 8:11; 10:9; Gal 1:1; Eph 1:20; 1 Thess 1:10 and passim). The addition of "and gave him glory" is unique in early Christian literature. The addition of the phrase could be part of the earliest confessional formulae (which do not appear elsewhere) or Peter's own addition (which is then followed by Polycarp).

In either case the phrase structurally parallels "crowned with glory and honor" of Psalm 8:7 (LXX) and Hebrews 2:9 and isolates the resurrection as the moment of Jesus' investiture with eschatological glory. Notably, then, Jesus as a bearer of eschatological divine presence is tied to believers' faith and hope. It is not just that God raised Jesus (as crucial for Christian theology as that is) but that in his resurrection the divine character of Jesus, his glory, becomes an essential confessional element. "To believe in Christ's glory is to believe in God, who gave it to him" (Hay, 77).

3. Summary.

In the later NT writings and apostolic fathers, glory language is what G. B. Caird called "bivocal" (Caird 28). That is, glory possess both a subjective and an objective field of meaning. On the subjective side glory refers to the act of worship (i.e., "give glory to God"; "glorify God"). On the objective side glory denotes the object of worship (i.e., God's presence). Glory in both its subjective and objective senses evidences the development of the church's faith and practice. When glory began to be ascribed to Jesus within the church's liturgy and when Jesus was identified as God's glory in the church's confession, Christianity was well on the way toward Nicea and Chalcedon. Glory language was an important vehicle for conveying the Christian redefinition of God.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; GOD; REVEAL, REVELATION; RESURRECTION; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. I. Abrahams, The Glory of God: Three Lectures (London: Oxford University Press, 1925); G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy (Westminster: Dace, 1945); E. Haen-chen, The Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); D. M. Hay, Glory at the Right Hand: Psalm 110 in Early Christianity (SBLMS 18; Nashville: Abingdon, 1973); B. J. Hubbard, The Matthean Redaction of a Primitive Apostolic Commissioning: An Exegesis of Matthew 28:16-20 (SBLDS 19; Missoula, MT: SBL/Scholars Press, 1974); L. T. Johnson, The Letter of James (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1995); H. Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes: Studien zu Geschichte und Wesen eines neutestamentlichen Begriffs (BZNW 16; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1934); C. C. Newman, Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric (NovTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); idem, "Resurrection as Glory: Divine Presence and Christian Origins" in Resurrection at 2000, ed. S. T. Davis, D. Kendall and G. O'Collins (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997); J. B. Polhill, Acts (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1949); C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); M. Steinheimer, Die ΔΟΞΑ ΤΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ in der römischen Liturgie (Münchener Theologische Studien 2.4; Munich: Karl Zink, 1951); E. Szewc, " 'Doxai' in den katholischen Briefen und die Qumranische Literatur," Folia Orientalia 21 (1980) 129-40; G. Wainwright, Doxology (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980).

C. C. Newman

GLOSSOLALIA.

See TONGUES.

GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM

Gnosticism is the modern term used to refer to a religious and philosophical movement that originated in the first or second century A.D., that was especially strong in the second and third centuries A.D. and that was considered heretical by the majority of Christians at that time as well as the majority of the pagan bearers of the Platonic philosophical traditions (i.e., Neo-Platonists). The ancients often referred to the people of this movement as Gnostics (gnōstikoi). The movement, which was not a single, monolithic social-theological reality, emphasized at its core a special claim to special gnosis (gnōsis, knowledge); thus the terms Gnostics and Gnosticism. Until the discovery in 1945 of a large group of texts near Nag Hammadi, Egypt, most of our knowledge* of the ancient Gnostics came from their opponents. With the Nag Hammadi texts (usually designated NHC, Nag Hammadi Codices [Books]), which were made available to the public between 1956 and 1977 and most of which can be identified as gnostic writings, we have for the first time in our modern period the opportunity to understand the Gnostics on their own terms.

1. Definitions and Characteristics
2. Origins and History
3. Sources and Literature

1. Definitions and Characteristics.

1.1. Definitions. Gnosticism is the modern term used to describe a religious movement or complex of movements from the Mediterranean world in the first to the fourth centuries A.D. The term Gnosticism was evidently first used by the Protestant Englishman Henry More in his 1669 work on Revelation 1—3 (An Exposition of the Seven Epistles to the Seven Churches . . ., 99, in reference to the teachings of Jezebel in Rev 2:20; see Layton, 1995).

The religious movement(s) meant to be identified by the modern term Gnosticism were variously named by the ancient sources, but the most common designation was to identify those of the movement as Gnostics (gnōstikoi), a term evidently first used by Irenaeus in the late second century. This term was used by both the church fathers and the pagan Neo-Platonic opponents of the Gnostics. The church fathers also referred to the Gnostics by the names of their leaders or teachers (e.g., Basilides; Valentinus) and by group designations based on names (e.g., Nicolaitans) or concepts (e.g., Ophites, based on the Greek term for serpent). None of the surviving primary gnostic texts shows any use of the term Gnostics as a self-designation. This should be seen, however, as no more unusual than the lack within and among the NT writings of a single self-designation (such as Christians). The Gnostics describe themselves with a host of terms and phrases drawn from their theological self-understandings (e.g., offspring of Seth; elect; enlightened ones; immovable race; the perfect).

The term Gnostics as Irenaeus's designation for a movement arises from the place of the concept of gnōsis in the movement. Knowledge was a claim made by virtually all religious groups and movements at the time, but the Gnostics appeared to give it a major, central and distinctive role in their understanding of reality and salvation.* Irenaeus and others considered the Gnostics' gnōsis a "falsely called knowledge," alluding to the phrase known from 1 Timothy 6:20 (pseudōnymos gnōsis).

Modern debates concerning the origin of Gnosticism (see 2.1 below) have led to the development of various other subterms to refer to the gnostic phenomena, movements or tendencies in the first century, such as pre-Gnosticism, proto-Gnosticism, incipient Gnosticism or gnosticizing tendencies, as well as the use of the term gnōsis (especially in German scholarship) to refer to the larger intellectual-spiritual milieu out of which Gnosticism, as known in the second-century gnostic systems (described by the church fathers or reflected in gnostic texts), emerges.

1.2. Characteristics. The characteristic beliefs of the Gnostics are difficult to summarize both because of the varieties among the different gnostic systems and groups that existed in the early church and because no one surviving primary gnostic text contains all of the alleged basic characteristic beliefs. It is possible to find in some clearly gnostic texts ideas that appear to contradict or significantly differ from the standard description of gnostic beliefs. Nevertheless, it is possible to identify the fundamental belief system that is reflected in most gnostic sources (both in the Gnostics' own writings and in the works of their opponents).

Probably the foundational conviction of the Gnostics is the commitment to a radical anticosmic dualism in which all that is material—the world and the body—is seen as evil and as the creation* of a lesser, inferior god. In some ways all ancient Mediterranean belief systems involved some type of dualism (shown by Jonas), but gnostic dualism is distinctive in terms of its absolute radicalism between matter and spirit and in terms of its proactive descriptions of the status and role of the inferior god(s) who created matter.

The inferior god arose through a mysterious tragic split within the deity within the ultimate realm (usually the "Pleroma") of the ultimate, true God (often called Father-Mother or Father of All). Often this is expressed as the ultimate God's Sophia (Wisdom) engaging in independent reflection that results in producing an illegitimate offspring, who is the inferior creator god or the progenitor of that inferior god. Elements of this understanding are indebted to the Platonic traditions and to the Hellenistic-Jewish wisdom* traditions. Further, in Christian gnostic texts from the second century, the inferior god is usually identified with the creator god of Genesis, who then clearly is not the ultimate, true God.*

In addition most gnostic texts and systems reflect a belief in a proliferated array of intermediary beings (archons, powers, principalities, and the like, many of whom are given names and who often exist in pairs) who inhabit the cosmos between the Pleroma and the earthly realm of humanity. Often the description of the intermediary beings draws much on Greek mythology as well as on wordplays with various Hebrew names and terms. These intermediary beings add to the distance between the ultimate God and humanity.

Given their radical and complex anticosmic dualism and its consequences for understanding material reality, the Gnostics understood humanity to be trapped within the physical body. Yet the human spirit is understood to be part of the ultimate spiritual reality (the Pleroma and/or part of the ultimate God). This entrapment is usually understood as ignorance or sleep but not as sin. In order for the human spirit to find salvation, it would need to be awakened and delivered from its ignorance by recovering the knowledge (gnōsis) of its true self or character as part of the Pleroma or ultimate God.

In order for humanity to be saved, the ultimate God sent a redeemer (see Redemption) from the Pleroma to bring knowledge (gnōsis) to the entrapped human spirits that would bring illumination and salvation. The redeemer figure had to descend from the Pleroma to earth, successfully navigating through the cosmic territory of all the intermediary beings opposed to the ultimate God. Although this redeemer figure can be variously described in gnostic texts (e.g., as Seth), the majority of the Christian gnostic texts identify the redeemer figure with the Christ.* Because they understood the human body to be evil, the Gnostics were generally docetic in their thinking about the appearance of Christ in an alleged human form (Docetism* was the first- and second-century Christian belief, considered false teaching by the majority church, that Jesus Christ appeared to be human but that he was actually and only divine). The redeemer figure, Christ, is thus often portrayed in gnostic texts as delivering special discourses of revelation (the true gnōsis) to his true followers. Further, the Christ is usually portrayed in gnostic texts and sources as not actually dying on the cross; a substitute person (a deluded human) dies at the hands of the inferior god and its intermediary powers.

As noted, many gnostic texts identify the creator god of Genesis as the inferior, evil god. In this context Adam and Eve are often seen as paradigmatic representatives of humanity who are on the verge of contact with the ultimate God. Thus the serpent, in directing Adam and Eve to the tree of knowledge (gnōsis), is actually a servant of the ultimate God; it is the inferior god who does not want them to discover the value of this tree. This is why some gnostic groups are identified with the serpent (the Naassenes = the Ophites, names the church fathers give gnostic groups; the names are based on Hebrew and Greek words for serpent). This is also why Eve is a heroic figure in some gnostic texts as well as Seth, the replacement offspring for Abel, both of whom were understood in some sense to be representatives of the ultimate God. It is evident in these gnostic systems that a significant part of the theological understanding is based on a midrash of Genesis, albeit what is often called an inverted interpretation of Genesis 1—3.

The Gnostics, according to their own writings, given their radical anticosmic dualism, tended strongly to a docetic, ascetic lifestyle—the denial of the reality and importance of the human body, considered the appropriate response for those who knew the true character of salvation and the Pleroma. This is such a strong motif that it may be the most common denominator of all primary gnostic texts. The Gnostics identified themselves as the Pneumatics (the spiritual ones) over against the Psychics (the soulish ones enslaved to and in the flesh*/human body), a view that was sometimes accompanied by a strong election consciousness. This emphasis on the spiritual quality of reality led the Gnostics also to hold to either the immortality of the soul or a spiritual concept of resurrection* or some combination of both. Many church fathers, especially Irenaeus and Epiphanius, portrayed the Gnostics as immoral libertines, who indulged the body and its passions (see Purity). Many scholars doubt the accuracy of these portrayals, since none of the primary texts written by the Gnostics themselves indicate any tendency toward or approval of that type of lifestyle. Yet the church fathers may well have described what was a social reality for some Gnostics, and it is logically possible to understand that an ideology that believes that the body is fundamentally evil could lead not only to asceticism but also to indulgence of the body, since it is of no relevance for religion or morality.

The Gnostics believed that the cosmic order would eventually be dissolved and that the divine sparks within humanity would return to the Light (the Pleroma).

2. Origins and History.

Probably the most disputed questions among scholars, and those for which the sources do not provide adequate information for resolutions with strong consensus, are the issues of the origins of the gnostic movement and the course and details of its historical developments.

2.1. Origins. The view of the church fathers, which prevailed into the nineteenth century, is that the gnostic movement was a second-century heresy within the Christian church that had its ultimate roots in Simon Magus (see Acts 8), who was understood as the father of all heretics in the church. The modern debate, now fueled by the Nag Hammadi discoveries, has involved opening the issue of origins. Thus some scholars argue that the gnostic movement began in the first century as a non-Christian and pre-Christian movement (see especially Filoramo, Jonas, Perkins, Robinson, Rudolph), while others maintain that the gnostic movement is a second-century Christian deviation (see especially Logan, Nock in Scholer 1993, Pétrement, Yamauchi, Yamauchi in Scholer 1993; for a type of mediating position see Wilson). One of the main debated implications of these alternate views has been whether the NT texts could be indebted to and/or reflect in any way the gnostic movement.

In favor of the traditional view is the fact that all extant primary gnostic texts were written in the second or third centuries A.D.; there are no known gnostic texts from the first century. Further, the church fathers' presentation of the Gnostics is completely on the side of understanding the movement as a second-century Christian heresy. Adolf von Harnack defined Gnosticism as "the acute Hellenization of Christianity," a view that affirms the church fathers' allegations and descriptions of gnostic systems clearly indebted to pagan mythologies and Platonic philosophical traditions.

In addition no known first-century texts (pagan, Jewish or Christian) refer clearly to what can be established as a gnostic movement, text or system of ideas. All alleged first-century references to the gnostic movement, especially those in the NT, remain part of the debate on the origins of Gnosticism.

Further, the late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century understandings of Philo,* the prolific first-century A.D. Jewish philosopher from Alexandria,* and of the Corpus Hermeticum (seventeen tractates reflecting a Hellenized pagan amalgam of Greek and Egyptian religious traditions) as first-century A.D. evidences of Gnosticism seem no longer possible to be used to support this view (see 3.4.4.2 below for the evidence that three Hermetic writings were found in the Nag Hammadi collection). The Corpus Hermeticum, especially the first tractate Poimandres, and the writings of Philo do contain some clear parallels to certain gnostic emphases, especially related to issues of gnōsis and alleged dualism. But these texts do not reflect the radical anticosmic dualism and many of its accompanying traits so well documented in known gnostic texts.

There is, however, substantial indirect evidence that the gnostic movement was formulated in the first century as an amalgam of a deviant Hellenistic Judaism* and certain forms of the Platonic tradition and that this movement eventually attached itself to and found its truest home within the Christian church. This view should not be equated, however, with Hans Jonas's inclusive view in which much of Hellenistic thought is designated as gnosis.

This view takes with some seriousness the first-century tradition of the Simon Magus material (not necessarily its historicity but its location in time). Further, this view argues that it is hardly possible to think that the gnostic movements as described by the church fathers sprang so suddenly into existence; they betray evidence of a much longer period of development. This development, it is argued, can be seen in the extensive Jewish elements (inverted and deviant though they may be) in the gnostic movement, the development of which would make better historical sense in the first century than in the second century. It is further argued that many Nag Hammadi texts (e.g., The Apocalypse of Adam, The Three Steles of Seth, The Paraphrase of Shem, Eugnostos the Blessed, The Thought of Norea, The Thunder: Perfect Mind) reflect a only a slight Christian redaction (or none at all) of what were originally non-Christian and likely pre-Christian writings, a claim the traditional point of view denies.

The modern debate between these two points of view has led to the emergence of terminology such as incipient Gnosticism, proto-Gnosticism and the like to describe in a mediating way the first-century evidence for the gnostic movement. In this sense part of the debate is a terminological one, but it is also a substantive one about the ideological and historical origin of a movement, whatever it is called.

The role of the NT writings in this debate is both important and interesting. Those who argue that the gnostic movement is a second-century Christian heresy in origin either argue that alleged gnostic influences upon or alleged gnostic opponents of NT texts do not exist or grant that these features may be categorized as evidences of incipient Gnosticism. Those who argue for a first-century origin of the gnostic movement see certain NT texts (e.g., 1 Corinthians, Colossians, 1 John [see John, Letters of], the prologue of the Gospel of John, the Pastoral Epistles, Jude* and 2 Peter*—which texts are involved varies among the scholars of this point of view) as additional evidence for their hypothesis.

The debate over gnostic origins and their relationship to various NT texts continues and will not be easily resolved and perhaps cannot be resolved unless additional evidence would be found. The analysis of the Nag Hammadi texts and its consequent reevaluation of the Jewish elements within gnostic ideology and of the possible anti-gnostic polemics in certain NT writings suggest that first-century origins for the gnostic movement is a more likely position. If the term Gnosticism should be limited only to the evidence of identifiable gnostic texts, then perhaps the first-century history of the gnostic movement should be called something like incipient Gnosticism, as problematic as the terminological issues remain.

2.2. History. The history of the gnostic movement is difficult to reconstruct for various reasons: the uncertainty about the origins of the gnostic movement; the virtually complete lack of historical or social data in the primary gnostic texts; and the polemical character of the church fathers' (and others') attack on the Gnostics. Assuming some type of origin for the gnostic movement in the first century and a certain degree of reliability in the historical notices in the church fathers about the Gnostics, the following historical outline can be reconstructed.

Sometime early in the first century A.D., probably within a sophisticated circle of Hellenistic Jewish scholars likely located in Alexandria, gnostic speculations about the nature of reality, the problem of evil, the character of God and the possibility of salvation emerged. These reflections combined a reinterpretation of Jewish Scripture and certain Platonic and Greek mythological traditions in such a way as to create a deviant (from a Jewish point of view) Hellenistic religious movement, which in retrospect can be called incipient Gnosticism. Virtually nothing is known about the historical or social character of this movement, but it would appear that very early in its history it attached itself to the church and found in the church's reflections on Jesus Christ its perfect redeemer figure. Already certain leaders within the church found this incipient Gnosticism problematic, in particular Paul and the Pauline school (see Pauline Legacy and School) as found in Colossians and the Pastoral Epistles, the authors of 1 John, Jude and 2 Peter,* and John in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) with respect to the Nicolaitans.

According to the church fathers, the figure of Simon Magus (first century A.D.) became a focal point for the development of the gnostic movement. To whatever degree that might be the case, the tradition suggests the importance of Syria* as a second location for the early development of incipient Gnosticism. According to the patristic sources, Simon's prime disciple was Menander, who in turn influenced Saturninus and Basilides. Basilides, presumably from Syria, subsequently moved to Alexandria.

As speculative as the preceding historical reconstruction might be, it can be more safely assumed that at least some patristic information about the two primary gnostic teachers of the mid-second century A.D. is reasonably reliable.

Basilides emerged as a teacher in Alexandria before A.D. 150. The details of his teaching provided by Hippolytus and Irenaeus are in conflict, so it is very difficult to reconstruct his gnostic construction of reality. Basilides apparently had a series of 365 heavens that emanated from the ultimate God; the powers of the 365th heaven were those that created the material world. Basilides was docetic in his christology; it was Simon of Cyrene, not Jesus, who died on the cross (this tradition seems to be attested also in the Nag Hammadi text The Second Treatise of the Great Seth [VII,2]). Basilides evidently wrote several books, including a Gospel, but none of these is extant. Basilides' main disciple was Isidore, who wrote books as well (which are not extant), including one on ethics.

The other major gnostic teacher, who also emerged in Alexandria, was Valentinus, who later went to Rome (about A.D. 140) and to other places in the East. Valentinus was considered a brilliant thinker and apparently was even a candidate for a time for bishop of Rome. Valentinus evidently wrote many books; a few fragments of them have been preserved within the writings of the church fathers. Some scholars believe that the Nag Hammadi text The Gospel of Truth (I,3) was written by Valentinus. This clearly Valentinian work reflects on Jesus as the revealer of knowledge and argues that the revelation delivers its recipients from ignorance and reunites them with the Father of All. According to patristic sources, Valentinus's construction of reality involved a series of thirty eons emanating from the Pleroma, the last of which was Sophia, who in error produced the Demiurge who is equated with the creator god of Genesis. Valentinus was very influential; among his famous followers were Marcus, Heracleon (some of whose comments on the Gospel of John are preserved by Origen), Ptolemy and Flora (see the Letter to Flora, 3.3.1 below), and Theodotus (see the Excerpta ex Theodoto, 3.3.2 below). In the patristic sources it is often difficult to distinguish between the ideas of Valentinus himself and those of his disciples (Valentinianism).

There apparently was another school of gnostic thought known as Sethianism, described by various church fathers and apparently attested by the unity of various texts from Nag Hammadi (see 3.4.4.2. below). It is not clear how independent this alleged group might have been and what its relationship to the Valentinians or other groups might have been. The Sethians ("the seed of Seth") understood Seth to be a representative, through a primal or heavenly Adam, of the ultimate God (there is a divine triad of Father [Invisible Spirit], Mother [Barbelo] and Son). The inferior god, Yaldabaoth, created the world and humanity (led by a false Adam). Seth was the revealer/redeemer figure, who in Christian Sethian texts can be identified with and/or augmented by Christ.

The patristic sources list other gnostic teachers and movements as well: the Archontici, Audians, Barbelo-Gnostics, Borborians, Cainites, Carpocrates, Epiphanes, Florinus, Justin, Marcosians, Melchizedekians, Naassenes, Nicolaitans, Ophites (the same group as the Naassenes), Peratae and Phibionites. Scholars tend to be very skeptical about the social and historical identity of these teachers and groups as distinct gnostic movements. Rather, they may be designations and categories projected by the church fathers upon the gnostic movements in their attempts to combat and identify them as false teachers.

Marcion* (an important mid-second-century Christian leader) has often been classified as a Gnostic, but that is now generally considered an inappropriate designation. To be sure, Marcion shared to a significant degree in the same thought world of the Gnostics. Marcion was strongly dualistic in his theology and held that the god of the Jewish Scripture was a false, inferior god. But Marcion's analysis of the human condition and the nature of salvation, as well as his social location, distinguishes him from the gnostic movement.

One of the most difficult aspects of understanding the ancient gnostic movement has to do with the problems of attempting to reconstruct the social history of the movement. Both the primary gnostic texts and the attacks of the church fathers on the Gnostics focus almost exclusively on the ideological structures and theological details of gnostic thought; very little is reported about the social reality of gnostic groups and believers. The primary gnostic texts themselves do indicate the deep gnostic commitments to ascetic lifestyles. It is not known, however, how this was practiced in detail.

Virtually nothing is known about the community organization of gnostic churches. One Nag Hammadi text, Apocalypse of Peter (VII,3), refers to "those who are outside our number who name themselves bishop and also deacons, as if they have received their authority from God. . . . Those people are dry canals" (from Robinson). Whether this indicates anything about structures within the gnostic communities is not clear, but it is evident—as virtually all the evidence suggests—that the Gnostics and their opponents were deeply involved in competing claims of authority.*

There is some indication both in the gnostic primary texts and in the accounts of the church fathers that at least some gnostic communities practiced certain liturgical rituals, including baptism* and the Eucharist. The Nag Hammadi text The Gospel of Philip (II,3) refers to five mysteries: baptism, chrism, Eucharist, redemption and the bridal chamber. It is not clear what all of this meant, but it probably indicates a process of gnostic ritual initiation in which the bridal chamber symbolizes the return of the true self to the Pleroma and union with the ultimate God.

There has been considerable discussion of the place of women* in the gnostic movement. Due to the great number of female figures in the presentation of the structures of deity and due to the prominent role of women, particularly Mary Magdalene, in many of the gnostic texts, it has often been assumed that the Gnostics were more open to the participation of women in their religious life than were the majority of the orthodox, central churches. This, however, is difficult to establish with any certainty.

The mainstream church consistently opposed the gnostic movement, particularly with reference to its understandings of God, creation, Jesus Christ and the nature of salvation. The great church emphasized the proper interpretation of Scripture, which was guided by their sense of the public apostolic tradition (the Gnostics often claimed that the revelations of the risen Jesus Christ were secretly communicated through the gnostic apostolic chain). The great church also vested church officials with the authority to protect and guard the tradition and to identify deviant persons and positions. Clearly the great church overwhelmed the gnostic movement with its strong sense of unity, internal connections and common links of biblical interpretation. It is impossible to know how strong the gnostic movement was at any given time and place, but it is known that the church fathers considered it a major threat and that it had the learning and leadership to produce powerful teachers and an extensive literature.

The gnostic movement lasted to the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. at least. Some of the post-second-century/early-third-century forms of the gnostic movement are undoubtedly reflected in some of the descriptions of the church father Epiphanius and in the late gnostic works Pistis Sophia and the Two Books of Jeu (see 3.3.7 and 3.3.8 below).

Other forms of the gnostic movement may be found in the Mandeans and especially in Mani and the Manicheans, but those movements have their own distinct histories and are usually treated separately. Some scholars find gnostic survivals and/or revivals in various medieval groups, such as the Catharists or the Bogomiles, in some forms of medieval Jewish mysticism and in some forms of Islamic mysticism. Various nineteenth- and twentieth-century groups too have claimed the ancient gnostic movement as their spiritual heritage to one degree or another.

3. Sources and Literature.

Prior to the discovery of the gnostic writings near Nag Hammadi, most of what was known about the ancient Gnostics was derived from attacks on them by Christian church fathers and by Neo-Platonic philosophers. Some information was known from a few gnostic texts quoted by the church fathers or that had otherwise survived. (For much of the important bibliography see the volumes of D. M. Scholer; for primary source readers of the church fathers, the Neo-Platonic philosophers and the pre-Nag Hammadi gnostic texts, see the volumes of W. Foerster and R. M. Grant; for the Nag Hammadi texts, see the volumes of B. Layton and J. M. Robinson.)

3.1. The Church Fathers. The two most important writings against the Gnostics from church fathers, often called heresiologists in this connection, are Irenaeus (second century), Adversus Haereses (Against Heresies; Book 1 is especially important), and Epiphanius (fourth century), Haereses or Panarion (Medicine Chest [to protect against the heresies]; sections 21-40 are especially important). Probably the most important patristic text for the study of Gnosticism is Irenaeus (Haer. 1.29), in which he summarizes an unnamed work that he claims belongs to the Gnostics. With the discovery of the Nag Hammadi texts, it is now known that this text is The Apocryphon of John (NHC II,1; III,1; IV,1; also the second work in the Berlin Gnostic Codex). Other church fathers, notably Justin Martyr (second century), Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and Hippolytus (all early third century), and Origen (third century) also opposed the heretical Gnostics (Clement, it should be noted, also used the term gnostic to describe the "ideal Christian").

3.2. Neo-Platonic Philosophers. Pagan Neo-Platonic philosophers also opposed the Gnostics, because they saw them as perverting the Platonic tradition. Especially important are Celsus (second century; preserved only in Origen's work against him: Contra Celsum), Plotinus (third century; see especially his Enneads 2.9) and Porphyry (third century; see especially his Life of Plotinus 16). Porphyry mentions some gnostic texts by name, two of which can now be identified as part of the Nag Hammadi group: Zostrianos (NHC VIII,1) and Allogenes (NHC XI,3).

3.3. Pre-Nag Hammadi Gnostic Texts. A few texts, apart from brief quotations and summaries by the church fathers, known before the discovery of the Nag Hammadi manuscripts were identified as gnostic texts and provided a partial, primary source basis for the understanding of the Gnostics.

3.3.1. Ptolemy, Letter to Flora. Ptolemy was a prominent second-century Valentinian Gnostic. His letter to an unknown Flora is preserved by Epiphanius (Haer. 33.3-7). The letter is an analysis of the Mosaic law, which is understood to have been given by the imperfect god, the Demiurge, creator of the world.

3.3.2. Theodotus, Excerpta ex Theodoto. Theodotus was a second-century Valentinian Gnostic whose Excerpts are preserved at the conclusion of Clement of Alexandria's Stromateis (Miscellanies). This collection of excerpts from Theodotus and other Gnostics may be Clement's attempt to provide a summary of their fundamental beliefs.

3.3.3. Justin, Book of Baruch. Justin, an otherwise unknown second-century Gnostic, is the alleged author of the Book of Baruch (who is the revealer of gnosis), preserved in Hippolytus (Refutation of Heresies 5.26-27). It is an amalgam of Genesis and pagan myths on the creation of the world by the "second god" (Elohim). The ultimate power beyond the world, whom Baruch reveals, is "the good."

3.3.4. The Naassene Hymn. The Naassenes were a Gnostic group mentioned only by Hippolytus. The name comes from the Greek word naas, for the Hebrew word for serpent. The hymn is preserved in Hippolytus (Refutations of Heresies 5.10).

3.3.5. The Apophasis Megale (Great Exposition).

This work represents mature Simonian Gnostic thought and is preserved in Hippolytus (Refutation of Heresies 6.9-18).

3.3.6. The Hymn of the Pearl. Although its gnostic identification has been debated, this probably second-century hymn reflects the gnostic story of the descent of the redeemer. It is preserved in the NT apocryphal* Acts of Thomas 108-13.

3.3.7. The Two Books of Jeu. This third-century work reflects later gnostic thought. It is preserved in Coptic in the Codex Brucianus (at Oxford), named after James Bruce, who acquired the manuscript in the eighteenth century.

3.3.8. Pistis Sophia. This third-century work consists primarily of postresurrection dialogues, allegedly over a twelve-year period, between Jesus and his disciples, especially Mary Magdalene. It is preserved in Coptic in the Codex Askewianus (in London), named after A. Askew, who acquired the manuscript in the eighteenth century. This work cites five of the Odes of Solomon, a second-century Syriac nongnostic collection of Christian hymns* (see John, Letters of; Liturgical Elements).

3.3.9. The Berolinensis Gnosticus Codex (the Berlin Gnostic Codex; known also as Papyrus Berolinensis 8502 [and as BG 8502]). This manuscript was discovered in 1896 and housed in Berlin but, due to various circumstances, including the two world wars, was not published until 1955, after the Nag Hammadi texts were known to exist. It contains four gnostic works in Coptic, two of which appear also in the Nag Hammadi texts (The Apocryphon of John [BG 8502,2; see NHC II,1; III,1; IV,1]; and The Sophia of Jesus Christ [BG 8502,3; see NHC III,4]). The two works not found at Nag Hammadi are The Gospel of Mary [Magdalene] (BG 8502,1) and The Acts of Peter (BG 8502,4).

3.4. The Nag Hammadi Texts. This group of fifty-two papyrus texts was discovered in a jar near Nag Hammadi (for the intriguing and complex story of the finds and their early history see Pearson and Robinson). These texts are contained in twelve codices (books) plus some leaves from another codex (now numbered Codex XIII). Thus the Nag Hammadi texts, known as tractates, are numbered within each of the thirteen codices (e.g., the first tractate in the first codex is I,1). This collection is sometimes designated by the symbol CG (Cairensis Gnosticus; all the manuscripts are in the Coptic Museum in Old Cairo). Codex I is sometimes known as the Jung Codex, since it was originally purchased by the C. G. Jung Institute in Zürich.

3.4.1. General Background. The Nag Hammadi manuscripts are written in Coptic (in two major dialects: Sahidic and Lycopolitan = Subakhmimic) and in at least fourteen different scribal hands. The manuscripts were produced in the fourth century, but all of the texts are clearly translations from Greek originals. The original Greek compositions date most likely from the second century and the early third century, although there are debates over whether some texts might have originated in the first century (e.g., II,2 The Gospel of Thomas).

The fifty-two Nag Hammadi texts contain six internal duplicates, albeit with variations (I,3 = XII,2 The Gospel of Truth; II,1 = III,1 = IV,1 The Apocryphon of John; II,5 = XIII,2 On the Origin of the World; III,2 = IV,2 The Gospel of the Egyptians; III,3 = V,1 Eugnostos the Blessed); thus forty-six works are represented. Six of the Nag Hammadi texts were texts already known to exist (II,1 The Apocryphon of John and III,4 The Sophia of Jesus Christ, both in BG 8502; VI,5 Plato, Republic 588a-589b; VI,7 The Prayer of Thanksgiving and VI,8 Asclepius, known from the Hermetic tradition; and XII,1 The Sentences of Sextus, a collection of moral aphorisms popular in the early church); thus the Nag Hammadi find yields forty new texts. As it turned out, Greek fragments of one of these texts were known to exist, but only with the Nag Hammadi find was it possible for the first time to identify them (Oxyrhynchus Papyri 1, 654 and 655 are part of The Gospel of Thomas [II,2]; previously known Coptic fragments were also found to be from On the Origin of the World [II,5] and from The Teachings of Silvanus [VII,4]). Codex VII is the best preserved manuscript. Many of the tractates have missing pages (and parts of pages) in their extant forms.

3.4.2. The Origin of the Collection. The origin and nature of the Nag Hammadi texts is not known, and attempts to posit answers to these questions are debated. The Nag Hammadi texts are often called a gnostic library, a designation that can be misleading. Not all of the texts are gnostic texts, although there may be reasons to think that the non-gnostic texts may well have had appeal to Gnostics. It is not clear that a gnostic group put the texts in the jar and buried them; the group that probably collected and later buried these texts was probably quite orthodox. It is unclear whether this group collected these texts in order to refute them (possible) or in order to use them for various kinds of spiritual and theological edification (more likely).

There is some meaningful evidence that the Nag Hammadi collection was assembled, used and buried by orthodox Pachomian monks, a debated hypothesis to be sure. The site of the Nag Hammadi manuscript discovery is only about five-and-a-half miles from the ancient headquarters of the monastic movement of Pachomius (the Basilica of St. Pachomius at Faw Qibli [ancient Pabau]) and only about three miles from the third Pachomian monastery at Chenoboskia, where Pachomius himself had studied. The cartonnage (stuffing in the binding of a codex) of Codex VII contains documents that are virtually certain to have comefrom the Pachomian movement. Some of the manuscripts contain scribal notes that are pious Christian prayers.*

A possible scenario for the burial of the manuscripts (in a jar for safekeeping) would be the response of Pachomius's successor, Theodore, to Bishop Athanasius's A.D. 367 Easter Letter, in which he condemned heretical and noncanonical books and listed for the first time the exact list of the twenty-seven books in our common NT (see Canon). Thus it may be that at least some Pachomian monks collected and read the literature now known as the Nag Hammadi texts for their own spiritual and theological purposes but had to hide them once Athanasius's order was put into effect (see especially Pearson and Robinson for this hypothesis). Further, it has now come to light in the wake of the Nag Hammadi discoveries that the Bodmer Papyri (known also as the Dishna Papers) were found only about three miles from the site of the Nag Hammadi discovery. The Bodmer Papyri (now in the Bodmer Library in Geneva) contain not only very important NT texts but also other apocryphal, spiritual and theological writings. Presumably these texts too were buried by Pachomian monks.

3.4.3. Contents of Collection. The adjoining chart lists the official codex and tractate number, title and abbreviation for each of the fifty-two Nag Hammadi texts (see Robinson). Many of the titles come from the works themselves; others have been given to them by scholars.

3.4.4. Classifications of the Tractates. Any classification of the Nag Hammadi texts will be open for discussion among scholars, but it is possible to gain some understanding of the collection by noting both the literary genres and forms and the religious and theological character of the texts, some of which could fit into more than one cagegory in each division. Not categorized here are Plato, Republic 588a-589b (VI,5), one of the clear reminders that although the collection is basically one of gnostic works, not every text in the collection is a gnostic one, and Fragments (XII,3).

3.4.4.1. Literary Genres and Forms. About half of the Nag Hammadi texts (twenty-five of the fifty-two) can be classified as apocalypses and/or revelation discourses of some kind, not surprising for what is a collection of gnostic texts that stress the special character of the secret and/or revealed special knowledge that belongs to the Gnostics. These texts include (listed through this section in codex/tractate order): The Apocryphon of John (three copies), The Hypostasis of the Archons, The Book of Thomas the Contender, The Sophia of Jesus Christ, The Dialogue of the Savior, The Apocalypse of Paul, The (First) Apocalypse of James, The (Second) Apocalypse of James, The Apocalypse of Adam, The Thunder: Perfect Mind, The Concept of Our Great Power, The Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth, Asclepius 21-29, The Paraphrase of Shem, The Second Treatise of the Great Seth, Apocalypse of Peter, Zostrianos, The Letter of Peter to Philip, Melchizedek, Marsanes, Allogenes, Hypsiphrone, and Trimorphic Protennoia.

Other tractates may be classified according to the somewhat traditional canonical categories of gospels, epistles and acts. Six texts are called gospels: The Gospel of Truth (two copies), The Gospel of Thomas, The Gospel of Philip, and The Gospel of the Egyptians (two copies). None of them is in form close to the canonical gospels. The Gospel of Thomas is a collection of 114 sayings of the risen Jesus; the other three are various styles of theological discourses. The Gospel of Truth probably uses the term gospel as in the Pauline literature (gospel = message about Jesus Christ) and intends to claim that it presents the true gospel. Six texts may be considered, at least to some degree, epistles (letters*), although they too are theological tracts: The Apocryphon of James, The Treatise on the Resurrection, The Hypostasis of the Archons, Eugnostos the Blessed (two cop-

Table of Nag Hammadi Texts

I, 1	The Prayer of the Apostle Paul	Pr. Paul
I, 2	The Apocryphon of James	Ap. Jas.
I, 3	The Gospel of Truth	Gos. Truth
I, 4	The Treatise on the Resurrection	Treat. Res.
I, 5	The Tripartite Tractate	Tri. Trac.
II, 1	The Apocryphon of John	Ap. John
II, 2	The Gospel of Thomas	Gos. Thom.
II, 3	The Gospel of Philip	Gos. Phil.
II, 4	The Hypostasis of the Archons	Hyp. Arch.
II, 5	On the Origin of the World	Orig. World
II, 6	The Exegesis on the Soul	Exeg. Soul
II, 7	The Book of Thomas the Contender	Thom. Cont.
III, 1	The Apocryphon of John	Ap. John
III, 2	The Gospel of the Egyptians	Gos. Eg.
III, 3	Eugnostos the Blessed	Eugnostos
III, 4	The Sophia of Jesus Christ	Soph. Jes. Chr.
III, 5	The Dialogue of the Savior	Dial. Sav.
IV, 1	The Apocryphon of John	Ap. John
IV, 2	The Gospel of the Egyptians	Gos. Eg.
V, 1	Eugnostos the Blessed	Eugnostos
V, 2	The Apocalypse of Paul	Apoc. Paul
V, 3	The (First) Apocalypse of James	1 Apoc. Jas.
V, 4	The (Second) Apocalypse of James	2 Apoc. Jas.
V, 5	The Apocalypse of Adam	Apoc. Adam
VI, 1	The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles	Acts Pet. 12 Apost.
VI, 2	The Thunder: Perfect Mind	Thund.
VI, 3	Authoritative Teaching	Auth. Teach.
VI, 4	The Concept of Our Great Power	Great Pow.
VI, 5	Plato, Republic 588a-589b	Plato Rep.
VI, 6	The Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth	Disc. 8-9
VI, 7	The Prayer of Thanksgiving	Pr. Thanks.
VI, 8	Asclepius 21-29	Asclepius
VII, 1	The Paraphrase of Shem	Paraph. Shem
VII, 2	The Second Treatise of the Great Seth	Treat. Seth
VII, 3	Apocalypse of Peter	Apoc. Peter
VII, 4	The Teachings of Silvanus	Teach. Silv.
VII, 5	The Three Steles of Seth	Steles Seth
VIII, 1	Zostrianos	Zost.
VIII, 2	The Letter of Peter to Philip	Ep. Pet. Phil.
IX, 1	Melchizedek	Melch.
IX, 2	The Thought of Norea	Norea
IX, 3	The Testimony of Truth	Testim. Truth
X	Marsanes	Marsanes
XI, 1	The Interpretation of Knowledge	Interp. Know.
XI, 2	A Valentinian Exposition	Val. Exp.
XI, 2a	On the Anointing	On Anoint.
XI, 2b	On Baptism A	On Bapt. A
XI, 2c	On Baptism B	On Bapt. B
XI, 2d	On the Eucharist A	On Euch. A
XI, 2e	On the Eucharist B	On Euch. B
XI,3	Allogenes	Allogenes
XI,4	Hypsiphrone	Hypsiph.
XII,1	The Sentences of Sextus	Sent. Sextus
XII,2	The Gospel of Truth	Gos. Truth
XII,3	Fragments	Frm.
XIII,1	Trimorphic Protennoia	Trim. Prot.
XIII,2	On the Origin of the World	Orig. World

ies), and The Letter of Peter to Philip. One text falls in the acts genre: The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles.

Other literary categories could include the following: wisdom texts, neither of which is a gnostic text (The Teachings of Silvanus, The Sentences of Sextus); texts that "rewrite" the Bible,especially the early chapters of Genesis (The Apocryphon of John, The Hypostasis of the Archons, On the Origin of the World, and The Testimony of Truth); doctrinal and homiletical treatises (recall that many of the gospels and epistles also fit here; The Tripartite Tractate, On the Origin of the World, The Exegesis on the Soul, The Book of Thomas the Contender, Authoritative Teaching, The Testimony of Truth, The Interpretation of Knowledge, and A Valentinian Exposition); and prayers and hymns (apart from such embedded in larger works; The Prayer of the Apostle Paul, The Discourse on the Eighth and the Ninth, The Prayer of Thanksgiving, The Three Steles of Seth, and The Thought of Norea).

3.4.4.2. Religious-Theological Character. The religious-theological classification of Nag Hammadi texts are judgments made primarily on the basis of data known from other sources, especially the church fathers, and on inferences from the content of the texts themselves. Many of these judgments are debated among scholars, and some of them reflect hypotheses various persons have about the origins and development of the gnostic movement. Most of the texts are clearly gnostic in character; thus their enormous value as primary sources for understanding the ancient gnostic movement. However, the most pervasive factor of unity among all the texts is the reflection of an ascetic lifestyle, which is often a result of the gnostic devaluation of the material world and the physical body. Even those texts that are clearly gnostic in character show that there was considerable diversity within the gnostic movement, which serves as a caution against simplistic descriptions of gnostic beliefs.

The texts show clearly the influences of the pagan context (both pagan mythologies and Platonic philosophical traditions), the Jewish environment (e.g., the OT figures of Adam, Seth and Shem; the extensive use of the early chapters of Genesis; the critique of Moses* and other OT figures (e.g., The Apocryphon of John; The Second Treatise of the Great Seth) and the Christian church (e.g., the obvious centrality of Jesus Christ in many texts); the apostolic figures of Paul, James, John, Thomas, Philip, Peter, Mary Magdelene and Silvanus; critique of the main church (e.g., Apocalypse of Peter). The history and redaction of the various texts are difficult to determine and are much debated among scholars. Some of them seem clearly to be non-Christian in origin with, often, a rather thin overlay of Christian redaction. There have already emerged in scholarship an abundance of commentaries and articles on the individual texts (see Scholer's bibliographies; Bibliothèque Copte de Nag Hammadi, Section "Textes"; The Coptic Gnostic Library edited with English Translation, Introduction and Notes).

The largest group of gnostic texts in the Nag Hammadi collection are those that can be identified as Sethian in character. These texts present Seth as a revealer/redeemer figure, have a similar cosmic system and fit at least to some degree into patristic descriptions of Sethian beliefs. Although some identifications are clearer than others, the following texts are generally considered to represent the Sethian group of Gnostics: The Apocryphon of John, The Hypostasis of the Archons, On the Origin of the World, The Gospel of the Egyptians, Eugnostos the Blessed, The Sophia of Jesus Christ, The Apocalypse of Adam, The Paraphrase of Shem, The Second Treatise of the Great Seth, The Three Steles of Seth, Zostrianos, Melchizedek, The Thought of Norea, Marsanes, Allogenes, and Trimorphic Protennoia.

Another large group of texts within the Nag Hammadi collection are the Valentianian writings. Valentinus and his followers constituted an important movement among Christian Gnostics. These texts are identified by criteria similar to those for identifying Sethian texts. Some scholars have even suggested that one or more of the Valentinian texts might have been written by Valentinus himself, a hypothesis beyond any possible verification (e.g., The Gospel of Truth). The following texts, with varying degrees of certainty, are generally considered representatives of the Valentinian school: The Prayer of the Apostle Paul, The Apocryphon of James, The Gospel of Truth, The Treatise on the Resurrection, The Tripartite Tractate (it should be noted that all of the texts in Codex I are probably Valentinian), The Gospel of Philip, The Exegesis on the Soul, The Interpretation of Knowledge, and A Valentinian Exposition (On the Origin of the World and The Thought of Norea, both considered Sethian works to some degree, are also often thought to reflect Valentinian ideas as well). The Testimony of Truth may be an anti-Valentinian work by a former Valentinian.

Three Nag Hammadi texts reflect the pagan Hermetic tradition: The Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth, The Prayer of Thanksgiving, and Asclepius 21-29 (it will be recalled that the latter two of these were previously known Hermetic texts). This provides the occasion to note that some scholars consider the Corpus Hermeticum, especially its first tractate known as Poimandres, to be examples of pagan gnostic literature. This judgment, however, is not widely shared and reflects the difficulties of defining the gnostic movement and identifying its history.

Two Nag Hammadi texts, The Gospel of Thomas and The Book of Thomas the Contender, reflect an early church Thomas tradition, which was not likely gnostic in its earlier forms, although it reflected asceticism. The Nag Hammadi Thomas works exhibit the gnosticizing of the Thomas tradition. Without doubt The Gospel of Thomas has become the most famous and most controversial Nag Hammadi text, on which more has been published than any other Nag Hammadi writing. The Gospel of Thomas consists of 114 sayings of the risen Jesus, approximately half of which have a significant parallel in the canonical Synoptic Gospels. The differences between the Synoptic Gospels and The Gospel of Thomas in the parallel sayings often show a so-called gnosticizing tendency in the latter.

