The major debates over The Gospel of Thomas are whether its traditions parallel to the Synoptic Gospels, are dependent or independent of them (or some combination thereof), and to what degree it is appropriate to identify The Gospel of Thomas as a gnostic work at the various stages of its redaction. Some scholars have strongly argued that at least some of the parallel sayings in The Gospel of Thomas are independent first-century witnesses to Jesus traditions* of competing value with the traditions contained in the Synoptic Gospels (and that such also constitute an indirect witness for the existence of a text such as Q, the alleged sayings source for words of Jesus common to Luke and Matthew). Others have argued just as strongly that all The Gospel of Thomas parallel sayings are second-century forms dependent upon the Synoptic Gospels. This remains an unresolved debate, with the reality likely to be found somewhere in between the two extremes.

Three Nag Hammadi texts are clearly nongnostic in character: Plato, Republic 588a-589b, The Teachings of Silvanus and The Sentences of Sextus (the first and last of these are previously known texts).

The remaining Nag Hammadi texts not named in this section (about twelve tractates) are gnostic works that have defied classification and are additional witnesses to the varieties among the Gnostics.

3.4.5. The Importance of the Nag Hammadi Texts. The Nag Hammadi find ranks with the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Qumran) as the most significant finds of this century for the reevaluation of our knowledge of the religious movements of the Greco-Roman period (see Religions, Greco-Roman), including Judaism and the early church. The foremost contribution of the Nag Hammadi texts is that they provide primary source documents for the study of ancient gnostic movements, through which it is possible to understand better the variety and theological nuances of those movements. Much traditional literature on the gnostic movement has stressed its heretical and/or fanciful or irrational character. The primary gnostic texts should document that the Christian Gnostics, even if deviant from "orthodox" Christianity, were attempting to provide serious answers to the problem of evil and to provide a hope for salvation, as complex as it may seem. Further, the Nag Hammadi texts, by virtue of their sources, have contributed to our understandings of early church history, ancient Judaism and the Middle Platonic and Neo-Platonic traditions. With reference to early church history, these texts show how complex the issues were in the second century with reference to what in retrospect we consider "orthodox" and "heretical."

The Nag Hammadi texts are also important for NT studies. They contribute to the discussion of the alleged anti-gnostic character of certain NT texts (e.g., compare 1 John with the "we have not sinned" litany in The Second Treatise of the Great Seth). As already indicated, The Gospel of Thomas contributes to the discussion of the tradition of Jesus' sayings in the Synoptic Gospels, as do The Apocryphon of James and The Dialogue of the Savior. Trimorphic Protennoia has been widely discussed as related to the prologue of the Gospel of John. Many of the Nag Hammadi texts were composed in the second century and indirectly give witness to the authority of many of the texts that were in the process of constituting the canonical NT at that time.

The Nag Hammadi texts have also made significant contributions to the knowledge of the Coptic language and the disciplines of codicology (the study of the production of the codex) and papyrology.

3.5. A Suggested Reading Program of Ancient Gnostic Texts. As a suggestion for those who have not read the ancient sources on the gnostic movement, the following ten items (seven from Nag Hammadi) would be an excellent way to begin: The Gospel of Truth, The Treatise on the Resurrection, The Tripartite Tractate, The Apocryphon of John, The Hypostasis of the Archons, The Second Treatise of the Great Seth, Apocalypse of Peter, Ptolemy's Letter to Flora, the Excerpta ex Theodoto and the major selections on the Gnostics from Irenaeus (see Robinson; Foerster; or Grant).

See also ADVERSARIES; DOCETISM; MARCION; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SYNCRETISM; THOMAS, GOSPEL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Texts and Bibliographies: Bibliothèque Copte de Nag Hammadi, Section "Textes" (22 vols., not yet complete; Québec: Les Presses de Université Laval/Louvain: Peeters, 1977-95); The Coptic Gnostic Library edited with English Translation, Introduction and Notes (13 vols., complete; NHS 4, 11, 15, 20-23, 26-28, 31; NHMS 30, 33; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975-96); C. A. Evans, R. L. Webb and R. A. Wiebe, Nag Hammadi Texts and the Bible: A Synopsis and Index (NTTS 18; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1993); The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices (12 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972-84); W. Foerster, Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts (2 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon, 1972); R. M. Grant, Gnosticism: A Source Book of Heretical Writings from the Early Christian Period (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1961); B. Layton, The Gnos-

tic Scriptures: A New Translation with Annotations and Introductions (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1987, 1995); J. M. Robinson, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library in English (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1988); D. M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1948-69 (NHS 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); idem, Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1970-94 (NHMS 32; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997). Studies: G. Filoramo, A History of Gnosticism (Oxford: Blackwell, 1990); C. W. Hedrick and R. Hodgson Jr., eds., Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism and Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1986); H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion: The Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity (2d ed.; Boston: Beacon, 1970); B. Layton, "Prolegomena to the Study of Ancient Gnosticism" in The Social World of the First Christians: Essays in Honor of Wayne A. Meeks, ed. L. M. White and O. L. Yarbrough (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 334-50; idem, ed., The Rediscovery of Gnosticism: Proceedings of the International Conference on Gnosticism at Yale, New Haven, Connecticut, March 28-31, 1978 (2 vols.; Supplements to Numen 41; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1980, 1981); A. H. B. Logan, Gnostic Truth and Christian Heresy: A Study in the History of Gnosticism (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996); E. H. Pagels, The Gnostic Gospels (New York: Random House, 1979); B. A. Pearson, Gnosticism, Judaism and Egyptian Christianity (SAC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, "Nag Hammadi Codices," ABD (1992) 4:984-91; P. Perkins, Gnosticism and the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); S. Pétrement, A Separate God: The Christian Origins of Gnosticism (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990); K. Rudolph, Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983); D. M. Scholer, ed., Gnosticism in the Early Church (SEC 5; New York & London: Garland, 1993); R. McL. Wilson, Gnosis and the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); idem, The Gnostic Problem: A Study of the Relations Between Hellenistic Judaism and the Gnostic Heresy (London: A. R. Mowbray, 1958); E. M. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism: A Survey of the Proposed Evidences (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1983). D. M. Scholer

GNOSTICISM. See GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM.

GOD

"God" (theos) in the later NT documents continues to denote the unique deity of Israel's* Scripture and tradition. Most every use of theos (or its semantic or pronominal substitutes) consequently carried with it the explicit commitment to an exclusive brand of Jewish monotheism—i.e., that there is only one God, Israel's God, Yahweh. These same later NT documents, however, demonstrate that the identity of this God underwent a profound redefinition. The identity of Israel's one true God was enlarged to include Jesus of Nazareth.

Given such revision, it was not a foregone conclusion that Christianity would stay within the constraints dictated by Jewish monotheism (Harvey, 154-73). The temptations to entertain a whole host of other arrangements—from a full-fledged ditheism to supplanting Yahweh with Jesus—were ever present. The various christological* debates and controversies of the first four centuries of the church can be read as a sustained struggle to bind the theological energy unleashed by the juxtaposition of Yahweh and Jesus within the worship of the church.* Remarkably, Christianity did remain within the bounds of monotheism. Just as an unwavering commitment to an exclusive brand of monotheism provided the theological context for the Jewish way of living (Halakah), so too a christologically reformatted monotheism fueled the communal identity and eschatological* ethics* of the new Christian movement. Monotheism proved to be as essential to Christianity's various conciliar confessions as it had been to Israel's Shema (Deut 6:4).

The crucial historical, theological and philosophical question then becomes, How did Christianity successfully effect the transition from "there is but one God" of Deuteronomy 6 to the Nicene affirmation of the three, "Father," "Son" and "Spirit," all within the bounds of monotheism? Although it was not until the second, third and particularly the fourth centuries that Christian trinitarian reflection gathered momentum, the NT sets the trajectory for the course of Jewish monotheism in the Christian tradition. It is here that the later NT writers and the authors of the early second century take on a special significance, for they were the first to delineate the identity and mission of Jesus within Jewish monotheism. Moreover, the NT and early second-century documents inscripturate how the first Christians revised what they knew to be true about their God in light of Jesus. These documents are thus crucial for the theological trajectory that began to wrestle with Jesus' identity within the context of Jewish monotheism and God's identity in light of the veneration of Jesus.

1. Background
2. Acts
3. Hebrews
4. James
5. 1 Peter
6. 2 Peter and Jude
7. 1, 2 and 3 John
8. Revelation
9. Apostolic Fathers
10. Summary

1. Background.

Jewish monotheism formed the primary conceptual matrix for Christianity's understanding of God. In particular two aspects of Jewish monotheism were important for Christianity—the singularity of God (i.e., that there are no other gods aside from Yahweh) and the unity of the Jewish God (that there is no division within Yahweh).

1.1. The Shape of Jewish Monotheism. One way to approach the study of a deity is through a careful examination of the god's attributes (e.g., mercy, love, righteousness). However, the character, nature and attributes of Yahweh are primarily inferred only from the shape and tenor of his past and promised deeds. In turn Yahweh's actions, and thus by extension Yahweh's attributes, have meaning only when framed by the larger narration of Israel's story. It is the emplotment of all of Yahweh's deeds that imbues any individual event with revelatory and hermeneutical* power. Monotheism thus becomes a necessary presupposition for and consequence of the narration of Israel's history: it is the same God who is responsible for all, from beginning to end. Jewish reflection upon its unique history implied and demanded one and only one God.

The OT repeatedly affirms the singularity of God and simultaneously opposes the multideity worldview of idolatrous paganism. The Decalogue states, "You shall have no other gods before me" (Ex 20:3 RSV; cf. Deut 5:6-7); the Shema declares, "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD"* (Deut 6:4 RSV); and the prophet proclaims that "Before me no god was formed, nor shall there be any after me. . . . I am the LORD, and besides me there is no savior" (Is 43:10b-11 RSV; cf. Is 40:28-31; 44:6; see Savior).

Israel openly asserted that this one God made the world and everything in it, that this one God had elected a people, and that this one God providentially cared for them. That Yahweh had decisively and consistently acted on their behalf in the past emboldened Jews, even in the face of a historical crisis like the exile, to envision a new and better day. Jewish monotheism can be characterized as creational (it was Yahweh who created the world), covenantal* (it was Yahweh who had given the promises) and providential (it was Yahweh who was directing the course of history), an exclusive monotheism that forged a dogged eschatological hope* (Wright, 248-52).

1.2. Divine Agency Within the Matrix of Jewish Monotheism. The documents of Second Temple Judaism* demonstrate a proliferation of "divine agents" (Hurtado, 17-92). These heavenly figures can be divided into three sometimes overlapping categories: agents who are depicted as personified attributes of God (e.g., Wisdom, Word), as exalted patriarchs/matriarchs (e.g., Enoch, Moses,* Jacob) or as principal angels* (e.g., Michael, Melchizedek, Yaoel). Similar to other figures, these divine agents either originated in or were exalted to heaven*; however, unlike other figures, these divine agents were depicted as bearing the marks and properties of divinity in unprecedented ways. In some cases these divine agents were described as performing deeds typically reserved for Israel's God—i.e., creating the world and/or executing eschatological judgment* and redemption.*

The phenomenon of divine agency undermines any claim that Jewish monotheism had weakened during the Second-Temple period. Instead of indicating transcendence and distance (Bousset), these divine agents actually demonstrate God's immanence and immediacy (Hurtado). Despite the exalted ways in which these figures could be described, divine agency did not compromise the piety of Jewish monotheism. Divine agents were never worshiped as god(s). Although the extravagant epiphanies could well have confused the line of demarcation between one of these powerful agents and the one true God, the angelic refusal tradition (in which angelic figures refuse to be worshiped) safeguarded Jewish monotheism by legitimating the veneration of the one true God alone (Stuckenbruck; see Worship).

If the monotheism of the biblical writings emphasized the singularity of the one true God (there is only one God, Yahweh; all others are mere idols), the writings of Second Temple Judaism preserved the unity of the one true God (despite the presence of powerful agents that share the marks of divinity, Yahweh is one). The singularity and unity of the creating, covenanting and purposeful God formed the conceptual matrix for early Christian theological reflection.

2. Acts.

The Book of Acts* demonstrates that the supreme deity of the earliest followers of Jesus was none other than the God of Israel, that the identity of this God underwent a profound change and that belief in a Christian-style monotheism should not be confused with other theistic claims.

2.1. Lexical Observations. Acts (see OT in Acts) employs six different constructions to denote the traditional deity of Jewish piety. The list includes "God" (theos, 159 times), "Lord"* (kyrios, at least 31 times; see Mowery 1995, 89 and fn. 32-35), "Father" (patēr, 3 times), "Most High" (hypsistos, 2 times), "Sovereign" (despotēs, 1 time); "Deity" (theios, 1 time). Occasionally the terms are combined—e.g., "Sovereign Lord" (Acts 4:24), "Lord God" (Acts 2:39; 3:32).

Acts distinguishes between this God (i.e., the one worshiped by Jews and Christians) and other "gods" in the Greco-Roman world (Grant 1966). The list of other gods (see Religions) includes the god "called Great" (hē kaloumenē Megalē, Acts 8:10), "the gods" (hoi theoi) Hermes and Zeus (Acts 14:11-12), "the great goddess Artemis" (megalēs theas Artemidos, Acts 19:27) and the god "Justice" (hē dikē, Acts 28:4) as well as unofficial or unsanctioned (demonic) deities—i.e., "host of heaven" (stratia tou ouranou, Acts 7:42), " spirits" (pneumata akatharta, Acts 5:16; 8:7), or "Satan"* (ho satanas, Acts 5:2; 26:20). While adamant about its brand of exclusive monotheism, Acts does demonstrate an awareness of competing and opposing claims.

2.2. Christian Monotheism as a Continuation of Jewish Monotheism. Acts assumes that its readers will identify its references to theos as Israel's singular deity. There is not even the slightest hint otherwise. Repeated references to the "kingdom of God"* (Acts 1:8; 8:12; 14:22; 19:8; 28:23; 28:34) not only link the story Acts narrates with the "first word" (Acts 1:1) told in the Gospel of Luke but also situates the narrative of Acts within the horizon of the Israel's story. The kingdom must belong to the one God about whom both the prophets and Jesus preached. That Acts can summarize the preaching and teaching* of the early church as "the word of God" (Acts 4:11; 6:2, 7; 8:14; 11:1; 12:24; 13:5, 7; 13:46; 17:13; 18:11), without pausing to identify which god only reinforces this presupposed continuity. The "word of God" consists in a message about the one true God of Israel.

The disciples' continued veneration of the God of Israel also clearly documents the strength of early Christianity's unequivocal monotheistic commitment. This religious devotion included praising God (Acts 2:47; 3:8-9), glorifying God (Acts 4:21; 11:18; 21:20), magnifying God (Acts 10:46), lifting voices to God (Acts 4:24), singing hymns to God (Acts 16:25), giving thanks to God (Acts 27:35; 28:15) and offering prayer to God (Acts 12:5). The terms "God-fearer" (Acts 10:2, 22; 13:16, 26) and "worshiper of God" (Acts 16:14; 18:7, 13), while probably not technical, do refer to the worship of Israel's God. Acts consistently depicts the object of the disciples' preaching and worship as the God of Israel.

2.3. Images of God in Acts. Since the unstated theological assumption of Acts is that Israel's God is the God of early Christianity, it is not surprising to find God's picture painted with very traditional Jewish colors.

2.3.1. God as Creator. Acts several times depicts God as the creator of the world (see Creation) and in each case echoes Genesis 1. The community of disciples addressed their prayer to the "Sovereign Lord, who made the heaven and the earth, the sea, and everything in them" (Acts 4:24, NRSV). Stephen's* quotation of Isaiah 66:1-2 highlights the creative power of Israel's God (Acts 7:50). At Lystra Paul* encourages his hearers to turn from idols to "the living God who made the heaven and earth and the sea and all that is in them" (Acts 14:15 RSV), while at Athens he begins his sermon by identifying the God of his preaching as "the God who made the world and everything in it" (Acts 17:24 RSV). The God of the earliest disciples is the God who made the world.

2.3.2. The Faithfulness of God. Acts repeatedly underscores God's covenant-keeping faithfulness.* Peter, Stephen and Paul all clearly invoke the covenant promises made by Israel's God to Abraham* (Acts 3:25; 7:3, 5-7) by identifying the God they both preach and serve as the "God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers" (Acts 3:13; 5:30; 7:32; 24:14; 26:6). The speeches of Acts specify the occasions when God demonstrably reaffirmed this covenant promise (Mowery 1990, 198). God rescued Joseph (Acts 7:9-10), secured Israel's release from Egyptian bondage (Acts 7:17; 13:17), promised a future deliverer like Moses (Acts 3:22; 7:37), endured Israel's rebellion during the wilderness wanderings (Acts 7:42; 13:18), led Israel in conquest over the nations (Acts 7:45; 13:19), swore an oath to David (Acts 2:30; 13:23) and reaffirmed his covenant promises to the prophets (Acts 3:18; 26:22). Even the risen Jesus charges his disciples to wait patiently for the complete fulfillment of God's covenant (Acts 1:4). The narrative force of these affirmations serves to characterize God as faithful to his covenant.

But Acts presses further. The events of Jesus' life should also be understood as an act of God's covenant faithfulness. It is the "God of our fathers" who has now "raised" and "glorified" Jesus (Acts 3:13; 5:30); from David's posterity "God brought a Savior, Jesus"—just as was promised (Acts 13:23); the good news of Jesus' resurrection fulfills what was "promised to the fathers" (Acts 13:32-33). More than just another faithful act, the death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection* of Jesus should be read as God's supreme act of covenant faithfulness.

2.3.3. God, the Sovereign Lord of History. God's resolute commitment to the covenant bespeaks a larger plan and purpose for the world. Acts portrays God as controlling all of history (Conzelmann, 149-63; Cosgrove). It was God who determined the temporal and geographical boundaries for the nations of the world (Acts 17:26). While past generations were permitted "to walk in their own ways" (Acts 14:16), God now requires undivided allegiance (Acts 17:31). God's sovereign control of history even includes the foreknowledge of the future (Acts 1:7).

Acts also portrays God as choreographing Jesus' life. God is the one who "sent" (Acts 3:26) or "brought" (Acts 13:23) Jesus to Israel. God is the one who "anointed" Jesus with the Spirit at his baptism* (Acts 10:38; cf. 4:26-27); who, through signs and wonders,* "attested" to Jesus' ministry (Acts 2:22); and who was "with him" (Acts 10:38). Even Jesus' death occurred in accordance with the definite plan (boulē) and foreknowledge (prognōsis) of God (Acts 2:23; see also 3:18; 4:27-28; 20:28). God is the one who "ordained" Jesus to be the eschatological judge (Acts 10:42; 17:31). God is consistently pictured as controlling the life of Jesus from beginning to end.

Acts also sees providence at work in the community's mission* (see Evangelism) to the Gentiles.* Peter's Pentecost sermon (Acts 2:39), Paul's conversion (Acts 9:15; 21:21) and missionary endeavors (Acts 13:46; 18:6; 28:28 [quoting Is 49:6]) and the apostolic councils of the Jerusalem church (Acts 11:18; 15:7; 15:16-18 [quoting Amos 9:11-12, Jer 12:15 and Is 45:21]) all show how the events of Jesus' life, death and resurrection have empowered the church to fulfill the task originally assigned to Israel. God's sovereign control of history and his covenant promises to Israel coalesce in the predestined events of Jesus' life to bring about his intention to bless the nations with salvation* (Acts 26:22-23).

The adventuresome character of Acts is due in large measure to the dramatic ways in which God intervenes on behalf of the community of followers within the story (see the extensive list provided by Pervo, 14-17). The external hazards of persecution,* mob violence, imprisonment, punishment and travel, along with the internal threats of strife, deceit and prejudice, receive decisive resolution in God's many and multifaceted divine interventions. Through visions,* miracles,* sermons, angelophanies, christophanies and theophanies God consistently transforms both external and internal threats into further growth and expansion (Newman). Acts depicts God as in control of every aspect of history.

2.3.4. God as Judge. The image of God as judge would be familiar to Jews, and thus the assertion in Acts that God had judged Egypt (Acts 7:7), the nations of Canaan (Acts 13:19) and even Israel (Acts 7:42) would not have surprised them. Neither would the portrayal in Acts of characters within the narrative as being aware of God's oversight (Acts 3:23; 4:19; 8:21; 10:4, 31, 33; 23:1; 24:16), for surely the God of Israel "knows the heart of all persons" (Acts 15:8). Acts portrays those outside of Christian circles as conscientiously avoiding being found "opposing God" (Acts 5:39) and records the rather severe judgment received by unsavory characters (e.g., Acts 5:5; 12:23). That God has "fixed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness" (Acts 17:31) continues the OT's "day of the Lord"* tradition. Acts states that God's eschatological, universal and impartial judgment will be executed "by a man who he has appointed" (cf. Acts 10:42), namely, Jesus of Nazareth, thus demonstrating how the tradition of divine agency was appropriated within Christianity.

2.4. Christian Monotheism as a Redefinition of Jewish Monotheism. The images enumerated meld the identity of God in Acts to that presupposed and evoked by the Jewish Scriptures. Acts, however, engages in a scandalous redefinition of God's identity.

2.4.1. The God of Israel Is the God Who Raised Jesus. The persistent refrain that it was God (i.e., the one true God of Israel) who raised, exalted and glorified Jesus (Acts 2:24, 32, 36; 3:13, 15, 26; 4:10; 5:30, 31; 7:37; 10:38, 40; 13:23, 30, 33, 37; 17:18, 31; 24:21; 26:8) rhetorically and theologically punctuates the narrative. By supplying the newest (and ultimately most important) bit of information about the God of Israel, these confessional fragments represent a determined effort by the early church, as depicted in Acts, to retrofit God's identity. The God of Israel is the God who raised the crucified Jesus. The historical implications of this claim are matched only by its hermeneutical ones: the resurrection unlocks the enigma of crucifixion; the cross* and resurrection reveal the true significance of the earthly ministry and message of Jesus; the life of Jesus, rightly understood through the cross and resurrection, divulges the true intentions of Israel's God for the world. The resurrection of Jesus thus becomes the best commentary on God and his purposes for his people and the world.

2.4.2. Jesus as God. The resurrection of Jesus not only disclosed something new about the God of Israel but also simultaneously revealed the true stature of Jesus. The resurrection undeniably revealed Jesus' true identity as the divine Lord, the kyrios (Acts 2:36; Marshall, 161-69). Numerous times within the narrative does Acts specifically identify Jesus as the "Lord" (Acts 1:6, 21; 4:33; 7:59; 8:16; 9:5-6; 11:17, 20; 15:11, 26; 16:30; 19:5, 13; 20:21, 24; 21:13; 22:8; 26:15; in many others it is implied). By employing the same word used by the Septuagint to translate the divine name (i.e., Yahweh) as a title for Jesus, Acts comes close to binitarianism.

While it is true that Acts never applies theos to Jesus (unless the kai at Acts 7:55 is construed epexegetically—i.e., Stephen saw the "glory of God, even [kai] Jesus"), Acts does position Jesus as a divine being alongside Yahweh. First, Acts explicitly substitutes "Jesus" for "Yahweh" in several OT quotations (Joel 2:32 at Acts 2:21; Ps 110:1 at Acts 3:34; Ps 118:22 at Acts 4:11-12; and Amos 9:11-12, Jer 12:15 and Is 45:21 at Acts 15:16-18). Second, official, public, corporate religious acts are done "in the [divine] name of Jesus," including public repentance, conversion and baptism (Acts 2:38; 4:12; 8:16; 10:43; 10:48; 19:15; 22:16); religious healings and exorcisms (Acts 3:6; 16; 4:7, 10, 30); preaching* and teaching (Acts 4:17, 18; 5:28, 40; 8:12; 9:27, 29); being appointed an official representative of the community (Acts 9:15); and suffering religious persecution (Acts 5:41; 9:16; 15:26; 21:13). Most importantly, religious devotion, the true test of monotheism, is directed to the name of Jesus (Acts 9:14, 21; 19:17; 22:16) or directly offered to the risen Jesus (Acts 1:24; 7:59-60; 13:2; 19:17; see Bauckham 1992). The divine title Lord, the OT quotations, the use of the name of Jesus and religious devotion offered to Jesus all function to identify Jesus as participating in Yahweh's divinity.

2.5. Christian Monotheism in Opposition to Paganism. The geographical expansion of the Christian movement necessarily brought it into contact with other official and some unsanctioned competitors. Acts gives seven snapshots of Christianity's encounter with other religious construals: Philip's* evangelistic efforts in Samaria* (Acts 8:4-24) entangled both him and Peter with the powers of magic*; in his missionary activities on Cyprus, Paul had an encounter with magical powers (Acts 13:6-12); after healing a cripple at Lystra (Acts 14:8-20), Paul and Barnabas were confused with the pagan gods Hermes and Zeus; Paul's exorcism of a demon-possessed girl at Philippi (Acts 16:16-24) brought him into conflict with her owners; at Athens (Acts 17:16-34) Paul debated monotheism and resurrection with the philosophers gathered at the Areopagus; the success of Paul's apostolic ministry at Ephesus (Acts 19:1-40) undermined the cultic practices associated with Artemis; and at Malta (Acts 28:3-6) observers concluded that the god Justice had taken revenge upon Paul when he was bitten by a viper.

In each of these episodes Acts pits Christian monotheism against the surrounding paganism, graphically demonstrating that idols are not real (there is only one true God); that there are magical or demonic forces at work in the world (in direct opposition to the God of Christianity); that this magical world is intimately connected to economic gain by the practitioners (which contrasts with the benevolence associated with the new community); that Christianity's exclusive monotheism threatened devotion to other ethnic and nationalistic deities; and that Jesus should not be confused with other divine agents, be they pneumatic or human. Christianity, like Judaism, ardently and scandalously proclaimed monotheism to its pagan environment.

3. Hebrews.

The theological sophistication of Hebrews* is matched by its literary elegance. The author's ability to refer to the theological language of levitical sacrifice* balances a text thickly plotted with inventive scriptural interpretations, interlaced with elaborate analogies and structured by alternating genres of exposition and exhortation. At the same time that Hebrews presents a sustained theological argument about Jesus as Son and high priest,* it also issues persuasive appeals to a community for repentance. The blended structural components of exposition and admonition yield complementary yet integrated pictures of God. While the expositional material focuses upon God in relationship to Jesus, the admonitions highlight God in relationship to the community. The literary and theological artistry in Hebrews unite in its intricate depiction of God.

3.1. Lexical Observations. God is the referent in all but one of the sixty-eight occurrences of theos (God) and twelve of the fifteen occurrences of kyrios (Lord). That Jesus also bears both appellations (theos, Heb 1:8; kyrios, Heb 2:3; 7:14; 13:20) within the text of Hebrews confirms at the semantic level the kind of theological vitality that existed within the earliest church; both God and Jesus enjoyed the same status as divine beings (Heb 1:3, 8-9; see Harris, 205-28).

The titles "Majesty on High" (megalōsynē en hypsēlois, Heb 1:3), the "Majesty in Heaven" (megalōsynē en tois ouranois, Heb 8:1), the "God Most High" (theos tou hypsistou, Heb 7:1) and the "Father of Spirits" (patri tōn pneumatōn, Heb 12:9) all emphasize that God sits atop a hierarchy of heavenly/angelic/pneumatic beings. The formulations "God of peace" (ho theos tēs eirēnēs, Heb 13:20) and "living God" (theou zōntos, Heb 3:12; 9:14; 10:31; 12:22), while characteristic of Christianity (e.g., Mt 16:16; Jn 7:38; Rom 9:26; 15:33; 16:20; 2 Cor 3:3; Phil 4:9; 1 Thess 5:23; 1 Pet 1:23; Rev 7:2), locate both author and readers in the broad stream of Jewish tradition. The circumlocutions "heaven" (Heb 3:1; 12:25) and "grace"* ("throne of grace," Heb 4:16; "Spirit of grace," Heb 10:29) appear where "God" may be expected. Hebrews thus employs a rich and varied vocabulary in referring to God.

3.2. The God Who (Still) Speaks. Hebrews presents the reader with some thirty-eight OT quotations (following the list printed in the UBS GNT) and thereby confronts the reader with a God who continues to speak in and through these citations (see OT in Hebrews). God is the grammatical subject in twenty-two of these quotations (Heb 1:5a, 5b, 6, 7, 8-9, 10-12, 13; 4:3, 4, 7; 5:5, 6; 6:14; 7:17, 21; 8:5, 8-12; 10:30a, 30b, 37-38; 12:26; 13:5; see Lane, cxvii), with the verb legō, in the present tense, active voice, being employed ten times (Heb 1:6, 7; 4:7; 5:6; 6:14; 8:8a, 8b, 9, 10; 12:26). Even a text that Hebrews ascribes to the Holy Spirit* in its introductory formula (Heb 10:15) has God speaking in the quotation (Heb 10:16-17 [using Jer 31:33-34]), and one that is patently about God (Gen 2:2 quoted at Heb 4:4) Hebrews attributes to God. These OT citations position God as the ultimate authority* of all Scripture, bestow a dynamic quality upon the text of the OT and bolster the community's awareness of the presence and nearness of God.

3.2.1. Hebrews 1:1-4. The opening hymnic/confessional exordium (Heb 1:1-4) parallels what God spoke to the ancestors* through the prophets (in the past) with what God speaks to the community through the Son (in the author's present). Hebrews situates this new word as God's final eschatological revelation by setting it within the prophetic sequence. The author also contrasts the Son (Heb 1:1-4) with the angels (Heb 1:5-14). The disparity between the Son and angels not only works on an ontological axis (Jesus is divine; angels are not) but also pivots on the eschatologically superior revelation delivered by the Son. The word God speaks through the Son is much preferred to that spoken through angels (Heb 2:2). God speaks his final word to the community through (the message about) his Son.

3.2.2. Hebrews 4:11-13. When at Hebrews 4:11 the readers are admonished not to fall into disobedience, the author grounds this admonition in the character and power of God's word (Heb 4:12-13). Like God (Heb 3:12; 9:14; 10:31; 12:22) the word is "living" (zōn), "active" (energēs) and "sharper than any two-edged sword" (Heb 4:12a; cf. Eph 6:17; Rev 1:16; 2:12). The author predicates divine qualities to the word through the use of physiognomic imagery: God's word pierces the division of the soul and spirit, of joints and marrow; it discerns the thoughts and intentions of the heart (Heb 4:12b). The distinction between God and the "word" finally vanishes: to stand before God's word is to stand before "him" (Heb 4:13).

3.2.3. Hebrews 5:11-14. In Hebrews 5:11-14 the author employs four binary opposites to chastise the community. Instead of teaching others, the community has become dull of hearing; instead of exhibiting competency in the "word of righteousness" (logou dikaiosynēs, Heb 5:13), they are in need of instruction in the "elementary principles of [God's] words" (ta stoicheia tēs archēs tōn logiōn, Heb 5:12); instead of feasting on solid food, they can only stomach milk*; instead of experiencing maturity, they languish in adolescence. While the rhetoric is intended to shame the community, the passage also highlights the efficacy inherent in the divine message. Like God, the word demands attention and discipline* and nurtures spiritual growth.

3.3. God in the Expositional Material. While it is common practice to divide Hebrews into expositional and hortatory sections (although the precise lines of division are often disputed), it has not been the norm to employ these divisions for theological ends. Recent work into the structure of Hebrews, however, advocates the separate treatment, at least initially, for the purpose of gaining a more precise theological profile (Guthrie).

The expositional material develops a spatial argument about Jesus that traces his journey from heaven to earth and back to heaven. The argument is logical in that each expositional unit depends directly upon the one that precedes it. This spatial and logical argument discloses two pictures of Jesus, as Son and as high priest (see Parsons), and consequently two corresponding pictures of God, as Father and as heavenly beneficiary.

3.3.1. God as Father. Although only explicitly used twice of God in the entire epistle (Heb 1:5; 12:9), "Father" (patēr) is one of the primary images for God. By frequently calling Jesus the "Son" (Heb 1:2, 5a [quoting Ps 2:7], 5b [quoting 2 Sam 7:14], 8 [in the introductory formula for Ps 45]; 2:6 [quoting Ps 8:4]; 3:6; 4:14; 5:5 [quoting Ps 2:7], 8; 6:6; 7:28; 10:29), Hebrews implicitly identifies God as "Father." The importance of "Father" for Hebrews can be seen in one of the epistle's opening OT citations in which God declares: "I will be a father to him [referring to Jesus], and he shall be a Son to me" (Heb 1:5b [quoting 2 Sam 7:14]).

God, as "Father," actively participates in the crucial events of Jesus' life. God "begot" (Heb 1:5) and "anointed" (Heb 2:9; cf. 1:2) Jesus, making him "a little lower than the angels" (Heb 2:7, 9; cf. 2:17). "Only by God's grace" did Jesus taste death for everyone (Heb 2:9; cf. 9:28). God "completed"/"perfected" (teleiōsai) Jesus though suffering (Heb 2:10). God heard Jesus' cries in the garden and from the cross and always possessed the power to save him from death (Heb 5:7). God "enthroned"/"crowned"/"appointed"/"exalted"/"designated" Jesus (Heb 1:13; 2:9; 3:2; 5:5, 10; 7:26, 28; 8:1)—all references to the events of resurrection, which is only once (Heb 13:20) referred to explicitly—where he awaits God to make all enemies a footstool (Heb 10:13). God as "Father" and Jesus as "Son" help structure the expositional argument in Hebrews.

3.3.2. God as Heavenly Beneficiary. A second set of expositional texts, organized by the rubric of Jesus as high priest, picture God as the recipient of Jesus' activity. Jesus' life was one of faithful "obedience" and "service"* to God (Heb 2:17; 3:2, 6; 5:8; 10:5-10; 12:2). In his death Jesus "offered" himself up as a sacrifice to God, "once for all" (Heb 2:17; 7:28; 9:14; 10:12). Jesus "passed through the heavens" (Heb 4:14) to "enter the true sanctuary" and "appear" before God (Heb 9:24). Jesus intercedes with God for those who "draw near" (Heb 7:25), being the mediator of God's new covenant with humanity (Heb 8:6; 9:15). As the "Father," God is actively involved in the course of Jesus' life; as the divine beneficiary, God passively receives the liturgical offerings and sacrifices rendered by his high priest, Jesus.

3.4. God in the Exhortations. The hortatory sections also contain two depictions of God—one emphasizing God's distance and one stressing God's accessibility.

3.4.1. The God Who Warns and Punishes. On five separate occasions Hebrews sternly cautions its readers about the divine consequences of persisting in sin.

If disobedience to the (eschatologically) inferior words delivered by angels received God's judgment, how can those who "drift away" from the message by the Son hope to escape (Heb 2:1-4)? Disobedience cannot be hidden from the "eyes of him" who knows and sees all (Heb 4:11-12). For those who finally apostatize there is nothing but judgment, because God "curses" the life that produces only "thorns and thistles" (Heb 6:4-8). Those who persist in sin should harbor no hope for forgiveness* (Heb 10:26-31). They face a "terrifying prospect of judgment," "a raging fire," ready to fall upon God's "adversaries"* (Heb 10:27). They should be forewarned: "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb 10:31). Hebrews 12:25-29 also cautions about rejecting "him who warns from heaven" (Heb 12:25). Theophanic imagery underscores the severity and certainty of impending divine judgment: "Yet once more I will shake not only the earth, but also the heaven" (Heb 12:26 [quoting Hag 2:6 LXX]). The readers are encouraged to respond with "worship," "reverence" and "awe" (Heb 12:28b), because God is a "consuming fire" (Heb 10:29; cf. Deut 4:24). Standing behind all five of the warning passages is a God who is holy* and righteous and vows judgment for those who refuse him. Volatility and distance dominate when Hebrews pictures God as Judge.

3.4.2. The God Who Promises, Disciplines and Rewards. Hebrews also emphasizes the predictability and nearness of God. He is a God who promises, disciplines and rewards.* God's promises provide the warranting basis for many of the author's exhortations. The admonition to "strive to enter that rest" (Heb 4:11) depends directly upon a God who promises a "rest" (Heb 4:1, 3, 4-5, 7, 9). The exhortations to "draw near" (Heb 10:22), "hold fast" (Heb 10:23) and "to stir up" (Heb 10:24) all acquire their rhetorical power from a God who is faithful to do all that he promises (Heb 10:23). Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and Rahab (as well as many others!) are examples of those who, even through they did not receive in their earthly life all that was promised (Heb 11:13-14, 39), were still faithful to God. Like this "great cloud of witnesses" the community should also "run the race with perseverance" (Heb 12:1-2). God promises; the community should persevere.

Discipline, like promises, should spur the readers on. In order to gain a perspective upon their own difficulties, the author invites the readers to consider those experienced by Jesus (Heb 12:3-4). The midrash on Proverbs 3:11-12 that follows (Heb 12:5b-6) identifies the community as God's children and God as their heavenly Father. It also interprets the difficulties they face as God's discipline. The community should not be dismayed when God treats them "as children," because discipline is a normal aspect of the parent-child relationship (Heb 12:7). The absence of discipline denotes illegitimacy (12:8). Since earthly fathers are held in respect for disciplining their children (Heb 12:9), the chastisement received from "the Father of spirits" should only inspire confidence, respect and holiness (Heb 12:10-11).

If the God of Hebrews promises and disciplines, this God also rewards.* Those who seek to draw near should not think God "so unjust" so as to overlook their work and love (Heb 6:10). The author exhorts the community not to throw away their confidence, "which has a great reward" (Heb 10:35), but instead to develop endurance,* so that they might "do the will of God and receive what has been promised" (Heb 10:36). Believing in a God who rewards is essential for moral transformation: "For whoever would draw near to God must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who seek him" (Heb 11:6 RSV). The hortatory material in Hebrews profiles both God's volatility and his nearness, images strategically deployed to elicit the same response: repentance.

3.5. God, the Architect and Builder. Hebrews affirms that God designed and created this world. God founded the earth in the beginning, and the heavens are the work of his hands (Heb 1:10 [quoting Ps 102:25]). God is the one "through whom and for whom all things exist" (Heb 2:10), which is doubtless a monotheistic confession of the early church (cf. Rom 11:36; 1 Cor 8:6; 15:27-28; Col 1:16; Rev 4:11). God's "works were finished from the foundation of the world" (Heb 4:3b; cf. 9:26), a fact understood only "by faith" (Heb 11:3). Such language pictures creation as a divine enterprise stretching back to eternity (cf. Mt 13:35; 25:34; Jn 17:24; Eph 1:4) and God as its architect.

Hebrews baptizes this building imagery to describe God's eschatological act of new creation. Abraham looked forward to an eschatological city "whose builder and maker is God" (Heb 11:10). The OT heroes died in faith, not having received what was promised, not having entered that heavenly "better country," the "city" that God prepared for them (Heb 11:13-16). Here on earth believers have no lasting city but seek the city "which is to come" (Heb 13:14). Remarkably, however, in salvation believers have already come to the eschatological Mount Zion (see Jerusalem), the "city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb 12:22). God designed and founded this world and is in the process of rebuilding it.

4. James.

More than any other NT document James* has been subject to the shifting opinions of its interpreters. This may largely be due to the unfortunate (and inordinate) influence wielded by Luther's negative evaluation of James as a "strawy epistle." While Luther's hesitation was based upon a perceived fall from Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, the absence (again, perceived) of an explicitly developed christology accounts for more recent uncertainty as to its point. So damning are the kerygmatic* omissions that some consider James to be "wholly Jewish in language and thought" (Dunn, 212). Such an observation unfairly pits James's theocentrism against the christocentrism of other NT documents.

The charges of theological irregularities in James levied by some tell us more about the singular lack of information about the setting of the letter than they do about James's theology. James both knows and employs the common core of apostolic theology (Sloan, 3-14) and, while admittedly more indirect, James is not entirely lacking direct and explicit christological claims (Mussner 1970, 111-17). James calls Jesus the "Lord" (kyrios, Jas 1:1; 2:1) and identifies him with God's divine presence, his Glory* (tou kyriou . . . tēs doxēs, Jas 2:1; cf. 1 Cor 2:8). Despite the claims of some, James admirably illustrates a profoundly theocentric perspective that is genuinely Christian.

4.1. Lexical Observations. All sixteen occurrences of theos ("God") in James refer to the one God of Judaism (Jas 1:1, 5, 13 [2x], 20, 27; 2:5, 19, 23 [2x]; 3:9; 4:4 [2x], 6, 7, 8). Kyrios ("Lord") appears fourteen times, and in five occurrences God is the clear referent (Jas 1:7; 3:9; 4:10, 15; 5:4). In two others Jesus is the clear referent (Jas 1:1; 2:1). The referent in the other seven occurrences of kyrios is uncertain, though the three occurrences in James 5:10-11 probably refer to God and on balance the other four (Jas 5:7, 8, 14, 15) refer to Jesus (Mussner 1981, 97). Three times James uses patēr ("Father") to refer to God, always in conjunction with or as part of other titles—i.e., "Father of Lights" (patros tōn phōtōn, Jas 1:17), "God and Father" (tō theō kai patri, Jas 1:27), "Lord and Father" (kyrion kai patera, Jas 3:9). Additionally, James uses the Isaiah's "Lord of Hosts" (kyriou Sabaōth, Jas 5:4; cf. Rom 9:29; it is used sixty-one times in Isaiah and only nine others in the entire OT) to refer to God. James also uses circumlocutions—"from above (anōthen, Jas 1:17; 3:15, 17) and "heaven" (ouranos, Jas 5:12) for God. If God and not Jesus (cf. Rev 3:20) is the referent, then James refers to God as "the Judge" (ho kritēs, Jas 5:9; cf. 5:12; Heb 12:23). James's multiple references to God endow his work with a powerful theocentrism.

4.2. A Wisdom Pneumatology? "Wisdom"* (sophia) figures prominently in two important passages (Jas 1:5-8; 3:13-18), while echoes of it may be heard in two others (Jas 1:16-18; 2:1-3). James explicitly quotes Proverbs 3:34 at 4:6 and implicitly alludes to other wisdom literature (Chester and Martin, 9 n. 8). Further, the parallels between wisdom in James and the Holy Spirit in other parts of the NT are also striking. Specific verbal connections can be made between the virtues of "wisdom" in James 3:13, 17 and those of the "Spirit" in Galatians 5:22-23—i.e., "meekness" (praÿtēs), "peaceableness"/peace (eirēnikos/eirēnē) and "fruit" (karpos). This has led some (e.g., Davids, 56) to suppose James betrays a "wisdom pneumatology" that forms the major conceptual matrix and organizing principle of the text.

However, the connections between these two passages may be due to common dependence upon Jesus traditions* rather than to an independent wisdom pneumatology. Further, James explicitly subordinates wisdom to God: Wisdom comes "from above" (Jas 1:17; 2:15). Thus a wisdom pneumatology does not run parallel with or control James's theological perspective; rather, James's reflection upon the one true God is the larger conceptual category into which specific comments about wisdom fit.

4.3. The Constancy of the One God. James no doubt approves of and accepts the exclusive monotheism of the Jewish Scriptures. Twice he plainly states that God is "one" (heis, Jas 2:19; 4:12). However, James's interest in the one God of Jewish piety is of a different sort. His monotheistic exploration seeks to map the unchanging character of the one true God.

James describes God as the "Father of lights with whom there is not any variation or shadow of change" (Jas 1:17b). "Lights" (phōtōn, i.e., the "stars") and "change" (tropēs, i.e., "solstice")—and possibly even "shadow" (aposkisma, i.e., "eclipse"; see Dibelius-Greeven, 102-4)—are technical cosmological terms. James invokes the solar system to contrast the permanence of the Creator God with the instability of the creation. The heavenly bodies are subject to change; God is not. James applies this to the faith of the community. The constancy of God means that he is the author only of "good and perfect gifts" (Jas 1:17a).

God's unaltering, equitable character can be seen in other of James's statements. God gives "freely" and "generously" to anyone who asks (Jas 1:5, 9, 17, 21). God will give the "crown of life" to anyone who endures (Jas 1:12). God neither tempts with nor is tempted by evil (Jas 1:13). God blesses anyone who is both a hearer and a doer of the word (Jas 1:22-25). God's promises about the kingdom are inclusive, regardless of social or economic status (Jas 2:5). God applies the same law* to everyone (Jas 2:8-13). God is jealous over anyone in whom his Spirit dwells (Jas 4:5; see commentaries on this problem text). God will draw near to anyone who seeks to draw near to him (Jas 4:8). God expects the same responses from all—submission (Jas 4:6), humility (Jas 4:10), patience (Jas 5:8). God hears the prayer of the oppressed and the righteous (Jas 5:5, 16).

The one God's immutable character dramatically contrasts with humanity's duplicitous nature. Although created in God's likeness (Jas 3:9) to be "a kind of first fruit of his creatures" (Jas 1:18)—i.e., to be like God—a double-mindedness (dipsychoi, Jas 1:8; 4:8) plagues humanity. Humanity doubts (Jas 1:6-8), denies (Jas 1:13-15), deceives (Jas 1:16-18, 26-27), forgets (Jas 1:22-25), discriminates (Jas 2:1-13; cf. 1:9-11), and slanders (Jas 3:6-12; 4:11-13); humanity is impetuous (Jas 1:19-21), controlled by selfish ambition (Jas 3:13-18; 4:1-10), arrogant (Jas 4:13-16), short-sighted (Jas 5:1-6) and impatient (Jas 5:7-11). Mired in fickleness, capriciousness and inconsistency, humanity fails to mime God's constant, true character.

4.4. Monotheism and Ethics. James offers a simple solution: believers should become as consistent as God. Word must always be matched by deed. But James does not simply preside over the marriage of monotheism to ethics (as if monotheism and ethics could legitimately exist independent of each other); for James a commitment to the one true God is at its core, and at the same time, a commitment to ethics.

By quoting the Shema (Deut 6:4) James demonstrates Christianity's continued confessional allegiance to Jewish monotheism. "You believe that 'God is one'; you do well" (Jas 2:19). While this text can be read as affirming God's singularity (there is no other god) or unity (there is no division with God) or both, James pursues another rhetorical goal. A monotheistic confession, while necessary, is not sufficient for Christian identity. There has to be more. Christianity moves beyond intellectual recognition and verbal confession—for even the demonic world does this in fear (Jas 2:19)—to a specific ethical program. The character of this one true God demands a certain relationship between confession and living. Believers' works should no more be separated from their faith than God's deeds are from his nature (see Faith and Works). Since there is no variance between God's nature and deeds, there should be none between a believer's faith (confession) and works (Jas 2:14, 16, 18b), a point amply illustrated by Abraham and Rahab (Jas 2:21-25). If there is separation, faith is "dead" (Jas 2:17, 20, 26).

James repeatedly illustrates the ethical obligation inherent in a monotheistic commitment. Genuine faith in God produces faithfulness, maturity and completeness in the believer (Jas 1:3). Embracing "the righteousness of God" outlaws the expression of human anger (Jas

1:20). Devotion to the one true God is to care for those who cannot care for themselves and to demonstrate moral purity* (Jas 1:27). Christian "faith" (Jas 2:1) does not discriminate (Jas 2:1-13). Since God's wisdom is peaceable (Jas 3:17), those who are wise should make peace* (Jas 3:18). That there is but one Lawgiver and Judge means that believers are not to judge each other (Jas 4:11-12). In imitation of God, the yes of a believer's life needs to remain a yes and the no a no (Jas 5:12). The singularity and constancy of the one true God elicits and demands a singular ethical resolve from those who would commit themselves to this God. Christian monotheism obligates the believer to the same relationship between faith and works that exists between God's nature and his deeds.

5. 1 Peter

1 Peter* identifies its readers as "visiting strangers" (1 Pet 1:1; 2:11) and "resident aliens" (1 Pet 2:11; cf. 1:17). Both terms imply that the recipients were experiencing political and social displacement (see Elliott). The ever-increasing friction with and ever-growing estrangement from the surrounding culture prompts the author to intertwine two themes in one letter, both of which are firmly anchored in the author's understanding of the one true God. 1 Peter preaches patience and endurance to those undergoing hardship because of their Christian identity. Support for this message is found in the christological shape of God's providence. 1 Peter also strongly advocates the maintenance of Christian distinctiveness in the face of a strong temptation to assimilate to the surrounding culture. The community is to be as holy as God is (based on Lev 17—26). God's providence and holiness are thus crucial for 1 Peter.

5.1. Lexical Observations. 1 Peter employs a closely circumscribed number of words for God. Theos (God) appears thirty-nine times and each refers to the one God of the Scriptures. "Father" (patēr) is used of God three times (1 Pet 1:2, 3, 17). Kyrios (Lord) appears seven times; four of the references are to God (1 Pet 1:25, 2:3; 3:12 [2x]), all in OT quotations. Twice Jesus bears the title "Lord" (1 Pet 1:3; 3:15), and once the precise referent is unclear (1 Pet 2:13). 1 Peter also refers to God as the "faithful Creator" (pistos ktistēs, 1 Pet 4:19). Despite employing a small range of vocabulary for God, 1 Peter does possess a distinct image of God.

5.2. The Providence of God.

5.2.1. God's Election of Believers. 1 Peter applies God's providential care as a balm for the wounds inflicted by a world hostile to Christian faith. 1 Peter identifies its readers as God's "called" (eklektois, 1 Pet 1:1); they are God's "chosen race" (genos eklekton, 1 Pet 2:9). This calling occurred "according to God's foreknowledge" (kata prognōsin theou, 1 Pet 1:2a) and unites the readers with other Christian communities—specifically the one in Babylon* (Rome?)—as the "co-called" (synekletos, 1 Pet 5:12). God's electing purposes help to locate and give self-identity to the estranged communities.

Election* entails the experience of God's "mercy" in "new birth" (1 Pet 1:3a, 23), the possession of a "living hope" (1 Pet 1:3b; cf. 1:13, 21; 3:15), the promise of an "inheritance" no less magnificent than God himself (1 Pet 1:4; 3:9) and the constant protection of God's "power" (1 Pet 1:5). The effectual work of God's call commences with conversion, determines the shape of the Christian life and ensures final transformation (1 Pet 1:15; 5:10). For Peter, God's electing purposes embrace the beginning, middle and end of Christian experience.

5.2.2. God's Election of Jesus. What is true of every Christian is especially true of Jesus. His appearance on the stage of history was "destined" by God "before the foundation of the world" (proegnōsmenou pro katabolēs kosmou, 1 Pet 1:20). 1 Peter's exegesis of Isaiah 28:16 identifies Jesus as the "living stone," "the chief cornerstone" and the stone "specially chosen by God" (para theō eklekton entimon, 1 Pet 2:4, 6; see OT in 1 Peter). God's electing purposes for Jesus included his death (1 Pet 1:2, 19; 2:21; 3:18), resurrection (1 Pet 1:21; cf. 1:3; 2:1; 3:18), exaltation (1 Pet 3:22) and future apocalypse (1 Pet 1:7, 13; 4:13; 5:1). Jesus is God's Elect One par excellence.

5.2.3. Election and Suffering. The juxtaposition of Jesus' election with that of believers implicitly suggests a connection between the two. The connection becomes explicit when the issue of suffering* is raised. God's providential purposes worked through Jesus serve as both a model and a guarantee of his providential care for all Christians.

Peter acknowledges that the community was undergoing a period of intense suffering (1 Pet 4:12; cf. 1:6-7; 3:14). Though probably not "official" persecution, the anguish was nonetheless real. Peter states, incredibly, that such difficulties are a natural consequence of God's calling (1 Pet 2:21); they are a "necessary" (1 Pet 1:6) and "required" (1 Pet 5:9) part of his "will" (1 Pet 3:17; 4:1-2, 19). What justification could there be for these extraordinary statements? Unlike Paul (who primarily uses physiomorphic eschatology) or Hebrews (whose author uses a journey motif), 1 Peter answers christologically the question that suffering puts to God's providence.

5.2.3.1. 1 Peter 2:18-25. 1 Peter admonishes servants to persist in respectful service to their masters despite the harsh treatment they receive (1 Pet 2:18), for anyone who patiently endures unjust suffering will find God's approval (1 Pet 2:19-20). Such moral stamina is required precisely because of the christological shape of the God's call: Christians "have been called to this [suffering], because Christ also suffered" (1 Pet 2:21). Jesus blazed the trail by not responding in kind but by completely trusting the "one who judges justly" (1 Pet 2:21). Jesus' response to unjust suffering (detailed in 1 Pet 2:22-24, based on Is 53) serves as a model for God's elect to follow.

5.2.3.2. 1 Peter 3:13-22. 1 Peter 3:13-22 also demonstrates that the interconnectedness of Jesus' election and that of believers is most apparent at the point of suffering. The passage opens with the rhetorical question about the ability of anyone to harm a Christian "zealous for the good" (1 Pet 3:13). But even if believers should suffer harm for the sake of righteousness, they will certainly enjoy God's blessing* (1 Pet 3:14). 1 Peter then details what a proper response to suffering looks like—reverence, preparedness, gentleness and a clear conscious (1 Pet 3:15-16). Finally, Peter lays down his guiding principle: it is better for Christians to suffer for doing right than for wrong (1 Pet 3:17). This is so precisely "because Christ also died for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous" (1 Pet 3:18a). Peter's confessional justification (3:18b-22) for patient endurance of unjust suffering (1) makes plain his christological belief, (2) promotes confidence in God's providential care and (3) celebrates God's victory over the demonic powers. Not only is unjust suffering a natural consequence of belonging to Christ* but also the prospect of receiving God's blessing is no less certain than Jesus' resurrection.

5.2.3.3. 1 Peter 4:12-19. The christological shape of Christian suffering is most clear, however, in 1 Peter 4:12-19. Here Peter plainly states that a Christian shares in Christ's sufferings (koinōneite tois tou Christou pathēmasin, 1 Pet 4:13a) and that sharing in Christ's suffering determines future joy* (hina kai en tē apokalypsei tēs doxēs autou charēte agalliōmenoi, 1 Pet 4:13b; cf. Rom 8:18). The present suffering/future glory shape of the passage follows the cross*/resurrection* shape of early Christian preaching and thereby confirms 1 Peter's theological indebtedness to the paradigmatic influence of the life of Jesus.

Peter's treatment of unjust suffering demonstrates that the destiny of believers lies within the destiny of Jesus. The prophetic predictions (1 Pet 1:11) and historical reality (1 Pet 2:21; 4:1, 13; 5:1) of messianic suffering become paradigmatic for all who follow in the steps of the Messiah. 1 Peter resolves the question that unjust Christian suffering puts to God's providence by pointing to the life of Jesus. Jesus is the divine exemplar (Christians should respond as Jesus did) and the guarantor (those who suffer unjustly yet patiently will enjoy the same eschatological blessings). God works his purposes in Christians in and through Jesus the Christ.

5.3. The Holiness of God. The emphasis upon suffering in 1 Peter encourages an adversarial picture of society, but that is not the whole story. Paradoxically running alongside the threat of persecution is the danger of assimilation (to avoid hardship?). Christians were tempted to return to or adopt a secular lifestyle. Peter insists that the boundary between the Christian community and society must remain distinct and recognizable. Crossing the line pollutes the purity* of the community, a purity that is defined by and grounded in God's holiness.*

1 Peter systematically employs purity language to define community identity. The readers are to abandon their former life (1 Pet 1:14) and to pursue holiness in all their conduct (1 Pet 1:15). This 1 Peter justifies by quoting Leviticus 11:44-45, where God declares: "Be holy for I am holy" (1 Pet 1:16). In 1 Peter 2:11-12 Peter instructs the community "to abstain from passions of the flesh" and instead "to maintain good conduct among the Gentiles" in order that the outsiders might see the purity of their "good deeds." Christians are to submit "for the Lord's sake" to every human institution in order to silence detractors (1 Pet 2:13-17). Peter instructs the community to refrain from living as the Gentiles do (1 Pet 4:3), because the Christians will one day have to give an account of their life to God (1 Pet 4:5). God's holiness defines what it means to be inside or outside the community.

God's holiness also builds cohesion within the community. Christians are to express "love" to one another (1 Pet 1:22), precisely because they have experienced God's "new birth" (1 Pet 1:23). Mutual submission (1 Pet 3:1, 7) should characterize marital relations because it is God who knows "the inner self" (1 Pet 3:4) and "hears" prayers* (1 Pet 3:7). Love,* hospitality* and sacrificial service* should guide the use of spiritual gifts (1 Pet 4:9-10) because it is God who gives, supplies and strengthens (1 Pet 4:11). Leaders are to tend the flock of God in a Christlike humility (1 Pet 5:1-5) because "God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble" (1 Pet 5:6). The whole community should always be humble, sober, watchful and resistant (1 Pet 5:6-11), because the "God of all grace" will himself restore, establish and strengthen (1 Pet 5:10). To imitate God not only becomes a way of defining the boundary lines of the community but also strengthens bonds within it.

6. 2 Peter and Jude.

That 2 Peter* and Jude* bear a literary relationship with each other is hard to doubt (cf. Jude 4-13 and 16-18 with 2 Pet 2:1-18 and 3:1-3). In all probability 2 Peter was dependent upon Jude. Further, both documents employ common topoi of Jewish apocalypticism* and address a similar situations, i.e., problems with false teachers and teaching. Not surprisingly, then, both documents emphasize God's forbearance and judgment and do so in very similar ways.

6.1. Lexical Observations. 2 Peter uses only four words to refer to God—"God" (theos), "Lord" (kyrios), "glory" (doxa) and "Father" (patēr). Six of the seven uses of theos are applied to God (2 Pet 1:2, 17, 21; 2:4; 3:5, 12). The other occurrence of theos refers to Jesus (2 Pet 1:1; see Harris, 229-38). Six of the fourteen occurrences of kyrios refer to God (2 Pet 2:9, 11; 3:8, 9; 3:10, 15), while the other eight refer to Jesus (2 Pet 1:2, 8, 11, 14, 16; 2:20; 3:2, 18). Once 2 Peter refers to God as the "majestic Glory" (megalōprepous doxēs, 2 Pet 1:17) and as "Father" (para theou patros, 2 Pet 1:17). The identical lexical situation prevails in Jude. All four occurrences of theos refer to God (Jude 1, 4, 21, 25). Kyrios is used seven times with two, possibly three, occurrences referring to God (Jude 5, 9, 14). Jude identifies God as "Father" (patēr) once (Jude 1) and, like 2 Peter, makes reference to God's glory (Jude 24).

6.2. God's Forbearance in 2 Peter. False teachers had undermined the stability of the church by calling into question the certainty of the Parousia.* The answer 2 Peter provides moves well beyond just reaffirming the certainty of the Parousia; it addresses the issue of the delay, in light of the forbearance of God.

2 Peter begins by emphasizing God's beneficence. From the bounty of his "divine power" God gave "all" (panta) that could be given (2 Pet 1:3). The call includes "life and godliness" and a share in God's own "glory and excellence" (2 Pet 1:3). He has provided an "escape" from the corrupting powers of this world and promised a share in his "divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4). All of this is mediated through the "knowledge"* of him (2 Pet 1:3). The certainty and efficacy of God's gifts should never be doubted.

It is not what God has done but what he has apparently failed to do that has given an opportunity to the false teachers (2 Pet 2:1). Specifically, the fact that the end had not yet come allowed the false teachers to conclude that it would not come at all.

To counteract the appraisal of the Parousia as simply a "cleverly devised myth" (2 Pet 1:16), 2 Peter points to Jesus' transfiguration. In that event the "majestic Glory" gave voice to his divine approval of Jesus (2 Pet 1:17). 2 Peter interprets the transfiguration as a prolepsis of God's eschatological presence—Jesus received "honor and glory" from God—and thus a sure sign of the future apocalypse (2 Pet 1:19). This is a testimony still heard in the apostolic community (2 Pet 1:18) and verified by God's Spirit-inspired prophets* (2 Pet 1:20-21). The transfiguration and the subsequent testimony mean that the Parousia can hardly be described as a myth.

The false teachers also asserted that a day of judgment would never come. 2 Peter rehearses past examples when God, despite the passage of time, judged the unrighteous and vindicated the faithful (2 Pet 2:1-10). God did not spare the disobedient angels (2 Pet 2:4); those who sinned during Noah's day (2 Pet 2:5); or the ungodly of Sodom and Gomorrah (2 Pet 2:6). However, God did rescue Noah out of the flood (2 Pet 2:4) and honored the endurance of Lot (2 Pet 2:7-8). Delay does not invalidate divine judgment, as the false prophets claimed; delay only witnesses to God's forbearance. God knows how both to rescue and to punish (2 Pet 2:9), and thus to indulge one's passions (2 Pet 2:1-3, 10), as the false teachers encouraged, is not only eschatologically perilous but openly sneers at God's patience.

When the scoffers taunt, "Where is the promise of his coming?" (2 Pet 3:4a) and "All has remained the same since the beginning of creation!" (2 Pet 3:4b), they call into question God's intention and power to intervene in history. Such mockery deliberately ignores what is common knowledge: God's ability to create confirms his ability to judge (2 Pet 3:5-6).

Since the passage of time in no way undermines the certainty of God's promises—"with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (2 Pet 3:8 [quoting Ps 90:6])—any perceived delay should be construed as an expression of God's mercy. God wishes that all should repent and that none should perish (2 Pet 3:9). God's forbearance is thus an expression of his saving purposes (2 Pet 3:15). The day of the Lord* will come quickly enough, like a thief (2 Pet 3:10), and thus holiness and Godliness should be the order of the day (2 Pet 3:11, 14).

6.3. The Judgment of God in Jude. Jude also seeks to contradict false teaching. The opponents advocate licentiousness—words denoting "ungodliness" are listed: asebeia (Jude 15, 18), asebēs (Jude 4, 15) asebōs (Jude 15), aselgeia (Jude 4)—apparently grounded in an overly realized eschatology. Jude instead mandates doctrinal purity (Jude 3) and moral sobriety (Jude 20-23) in the face of God's imminent judgment.

Jude begins by describing the readers as those having been "beloved by God the Father" (Jude 1b). Jude follows this with another reference to the goodness of God (Jude 3-4). But God's grace* does not legitimate any sort of behavior (as the false teachers apparently taught). God's grace has limits. To appeal to God's grace as a cover for "licentiousness" is to "pervert" it and to "deny" the lordship of Jesus (Jude 4). Judgment awaits the ungodly, as it did for the disobedient of Israel (Jude 5), the disobedient angels (Jude 6) and the immoral of Sodom and Gomorrah (Jude 7). The Lord's rebuke will most surely come upon those who reject and revile authority (Jude 8-10). "Woe to them!" (Jude 11), for the Lord will certainly come to judge (Jude 14; cf. 1 Enoch 1:9). Jude even asserts that the ungodly false teachers are a sure sign of the end (Jude 17-18). The cure for such moral laxity is to stay within the "love of God" (Jude 21), for God is able to keep believers from falling and to finishing the process of eschatological transformation (Jude 24).

7. 1, 2 and 3 John.

The letters of 1, 2 and 3 John (see John, Letters of) seek to close social fissures opened by an amalgamation of erroneous teaching and practice of the gnosticizing kind. The letters encourage right belief and praxis, both of which are tied to the nature of the one true God.

7.1. Lexical Observations. Theos ("God") appears in 1 John sixty-two times, in 2 John twice (2 Jn 2, 9) and in 3 John three times (3 Jn 6, 11 [2x]). 1 John explicitly calls God "Father" (patēr) twelve times (1 Jn 1:2; 1:3; 2:1, 14, 15, 16, 22, 23 [2x], 24; 3:1, 14) and implies it in twenty-two other instances by identifying Jesus as the or his "Son." 2 John refers to God as "Father" four times (2 Jn 3 [2x], 4, 9). Additionally, 1 John twice calls God the "One [who is] from the beginning (ton ap' archēs, 1 Jn 2:13; 14).

7.2. God as Light. "God is light and in him there is no darkness at all" (1 Jn 1:5). By juxtaposing "light"* (phōs) and "darkness" (skotia) 1 John divides the world and human existence into two mutually exclusive domains. Specifically, 1 John allies "light" with "truth" (1 Jn 1:6), "love" (1 Jn 1:7; 2:10) and "forgiveness" (1 Jn 1:7). "Darkness" keeps company with lying (1 Jn 1:6), disobedience (1 Jn 1:6), ignorance (1 Jn 2:11) and spiritual blindness (1 Jn 2:11). Light invokes all the images associated with God and salvation; darkness, of sin and death.

John's Gospel identifies Jesus as the light that shines in a dark world (1 Jn 1:5), an illumination that bestows life upon all who are willing to identify with him (Jn 1:4, 9; 9:5; 12:46). 1 John also marks the transition from "darkness" to "light" at the advent of Jesus. "The darkness is (already) passing and the true light is already shining" (1 Jn 2:8). The "message" that the church first "heard" and continues to "preach" (1 Jn 1:5), the "word" that they had "from the beginning" (1 Jn 2:7), is the narration of Jesus' life, death and resurrection. Adherence to this message of light demands spiritual transformation. The community is to "walk in the light as God is in the light" (1 Jn 1:7). Adherence to the message of light also requires confession (1 Jn 1:8), one that is not exhausted by words. To "hate" a fellow Christian is to betray the confession and demonstrates solidarity with darkness (1 Jn 2:9; cf. 2:1). To walk in God's light is to be forgiven, cleansed and unencumbered by the powers of evil (1 Jn 1:8; 2:10). The community is created and sustained by God's light.

7.3. God as Love. "God is love" (1 Jn 4:8, 16), God gives love (1 Jn 3:1; 4:7, 16), and God initiates love (1 Jn 4:10, 19; cf. Rom 5:8). God demonstrated his love in the sending of his Son (1 Jn 4:9) and most particularly in the Son's sacrificial death (1 Jn 3:16; 4:10). God's love permits knowledge of him (1 Jn 4:16), inspires belief and confidence (1 Jn 4:17) and conquers all fear* (1 Jn 4:18).

God's love requires and enables love for one another (1 Jn 3:11, 16, 17, 23; 4:11, 19, 21; cf. 2 Jn 6; 3 Jn 11). Confession should be matched with compassion. "And this is his commandment: that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ and love one another" (1 Jn 3:23). To love authenticates the claim to saving knowledge of God (1 Jn 3:14; 4:8). To love demonstrates God's perfecting presence within (1 Jn 2:5, 10; 3:1; 4:12, 16; 5:1; cf. 2:14; 2 Jn 7, 9). "The one who does not love remains in the grip of death" (1 Jn 3:14; cf. 3:10). To love anything other than God (e.g., the "world") illustrates the absence of God's love (1 Jn 2:15; 3:17-18). To confess love for God and yet to hate others transforms the confession into a lie (1 Jn 4:20).

8. Revelation.

Revelation* forms a fitting conclusion to the Christian canon: it narrates the final disposition of all things. Revelation's depiction of God equally satisfies: God faces opponents of great power—the dragon, the sea and earth beasts,* Babylon—and soundly defeats them.

8.1. Lexical Observations. Revelation employs the most varied terminology in the NT to refer to the one true God. Standing at the head of the list are ninety-six occurrences of theos (God), kyrios (Lord), which appears twenty-three times (of which seventeen refer to God; the other occurrences refer to the risen Jesus (Rev 11:8; 14:13; 17:14; 19:16; 22:20, 21) and patēr (Father), which is used of God five times (Rev 1:6, 2:28; 3:5, 21; 14:1; cf. 21:7).

The list widens to include constructions rarely or never used in other NT writings. "Almighty" (pantokratōr) is used only once outside of Revelation (2 Cor 6:18), but within Revelation it is used of God nine times (Rev 1:8, 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:23). Revelation uniquely entitles God "The King of the Nations"/"Ages" (ho basileus tōn ethnōn/aiōnōn, Rev 15:3—depending on the textual reading), "The Sovereign [One]" (ho despotēs, Rev 6:10; but cf. Lk 2:19; Acts 4:24), "The Holy and True [One]" (ho hagios kai alēthinos, Rev 6:10), "The Lord of the Earth" (tou kyriou tēs gēs, Rev 11:4), "The One who was, is and comes" (ho ōn kai ho ēn kai ho erchomenos, Rev 1:4, 8; 4:8; 11:17; 16:5), "The Alpha and the Omega" (egō eimi to Alpha kai to Ō, Rev 1:8, 21:6; 22:13), "The Beginning and the End" (hē archē kai to telos, Rev 21:6; 22:13) and "The First and the Last" (ho prōtos kai ho eschatos, Rev 22:13). On numerous occasions Revelation refers to God as "the One who sits/is seated upon the throne" (Rev 4:2, 3, 9, 10; 5:1, 7, 13; 6:16; 7:10, 15; 12:5; 14:3; 19:4; 20:11; 21:5). The unique ways in which Revelation refers to God corresponds to the singular importance of Revelation's message.

8.2. The Unseen Revealer. As a literary hybrid (the combination of letter,* prophecy and narrative), Revelation communicates on several levels simultaneously. As a letter, Revelation addresses the situation and needs of specific congregations; as a prophetic work, Revelation dialogues with major historical events, albeit obliquely; and as a narrative, characters within Revelation's narrative (e.g., the angelic mediators, the Lamb,* the unnamed voices or even the scroll) communicate with each other and the author. Revelation is something of a literary symphony.

Revelation wraps this complex enterprise within an apocalyptic disclosure. The book opens with the self-descriptive line "the revelation of Jesus Christ" (apokalypsis Iēsou Christou, Rev 1:1), a phrase that should be read both objectively (i.e., "a revelation about Jesus Christ") and subjectively (i.e., "a revelation from Jesus Christ"). Jesus is both the author and the content of the apocalyptic visions given to John.

Revelation envelops Jesus' disclosure to John within yet another disclosure. The text stresses that what Jesus makes known to John is what "God gave him" (Rev 1:1). It was God who gave this revelation to Jesus (who in turn gave it to John, who then obediently wrote it up for the communities where it should be read aloud). God therefore is the ultimate source of revelation—but, curiously, a source who is only rarely seen or heard.

While various heavenly beings are described in detail, including the risen Jesus (Rev 1:12-16) and the four living creatures (Rev 4:6b-8a), the only sort of descriptive accounting of God occurs when John likens his vision of the "One seated upon the throne" (Rev 4:2) to "jasper and carnelian" (Rev 4:3). John's approximation moves from the known (jasper and carnelian) to the unknown (God). Further, God only speaks twice within the entire narrative—the self-predication of Revelation 1:8 and the promises of Revelation 22:1-5. Thus even though God is the ultimate source (and therefore positioned as the most powerful agent in Revelation's story-world) and even though Revelation is putatively the most revelatory of all NT documents, the text never finally diminishes the mystery of God. What Revelation does make clear is that God is the all-powerful King who will judge evil and vindicate the righteous.

8.3. The Omnipotence of God. Simply naming God the "Almighty" (Rev 1:8, 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:23) was not enough. The greatness of God's all-embracing power to be unleashed during the final days demanded elaboration.

8.3.1. God's Temporal Omnipotence. God is the One "who was, is and is to come" (Rev 1:4, 8; 4:8; 11:17; 16:5). God "lives for ever and ever" (Rev 4:9, 10; 10:6; 15:7; cf. 1:6; 5:13; 7:2, 12). God is "The Alpha and the Omega" (Rev 1:8, 21:6; 22:13), "The Beginning and the End" (Rev 21:6; 22:13) and "The First and the Last" (Rev 22:13). While these sorts of declarations position God above and beyond time, Revelation also makes clear once and for all that the one God of the Scriptures intervenes within the flow of history to direct its course to a final and proper conclusion. The God who is beyond time controls time.

8.3.2. God's Cosmic Omnipotence. Revelation augments the picture of God's temporal power by linking it with his cosmic power. God created this world and everything in it (Rev 4:11; 10:6; 14:7). It is by his will that the world exists (Rev 4:11). He is the "Lord of the earth" (11:4). But God's powers do not end there. The risen Jesus, "The Amen, the Faithful and True Witness," is the "beginning of God's [new] creation" (hē archēs ktiseōs tou theou, Rev 3:14; cf. 1:5; Col 1:15, 18), and those who obediently follow this Lamb are its "first fruits" (aparchē, Rev 14:4; cf. 11:11). God culminates his re-creation by refashioning a new heaven, a new earth and a new Jerusalem (Rev 21:1-2, 10). God's omnipotence includes his ability to create and recreate. God rules both chronos (time) and cosmos (the universe).

8.3.3. God's Theophanic Omnipotence. Revelation also strategically employs theophanic imagery to accentuate the God's power. John's initial vision included God's throne from which spewed "flashes of lightning and voices and peals of thunder" (Rev 4:5). The unsealing of the seventh seal resulted in "peals of thunder, voices, flashes of lightning, and an earthquake" (Rev 8:5). The blowing of the seventh trumpet* triggered "flashes of lightning, voices, peals of thunder, an earthquake and heavy hail" (Rev 11:19). The emptying of the seventh bowl of God was followed by "flashes of lighting, voices, peals of thunder, and a great earthquake such as had never been since men were on the earth, so great was that earthquake" (Rev 16:8). Not only does such rhetoric graphically depict God's power but the sequential intensification of theophanic imagery—at the very place where one might expect a detailed description of the Parousia—moves the narrative forward toward the final theophany (cf. Rev 19:11-16).

8.3.4. God's Royal Omnipotence. Revelation explicitly identifies God as King only once (Rev 15:3) and makes reference to God's "kingdom" only twice (Rev 11:15; 12:10). However, Revelation refers to God's "throne" forty-two times. The throne thus becomes Revelation's major symbol for conveying God's royal power and authority.

God is explicitly identified as the One who sits/is seated upon the "throne" (Rev 3:21; 4:2, 3, 9, 10; 5:1, 7, 13; 6:16; 7:10, 15; 12:5; 14:3; 19:4; 20:11; 21:5). The throne is surrounded by a rainbow (Rev 4:3), seven torches of fire (Rev 4:5), a sea of glass (Rev 4:6) and a golden altar

(Rev 8:3). From the throne spew flashes of lightning and fire (Rev 4:5), come unidentified voices (Rev 16:17; 19:5; 21:3) and flows a river (Rev 22:1). Revelation pictures all sorts of heavenly beings and angelic creatures as gathered around God's throne—i.e., the seven spirits/angels (Rev 1:4; 8:2), twenty-four elders (Rev 4:4; 5:11; 7:11; 11:16; 19:4), four living creatures (Rev 4:6; 5:11; 7:11; 19:4), the Lamb (Rev 5:6; 7:17), myriads of angels (Rev 5:11; 7:11), great multitudes from all the tribes of the earth (Rev 7:9; cf. 19;1), innumerable people in white robes (Rev 7:15), the male child brought forth by a woman (Rev 12:5), the 144,000 (Rev 14:3) and all the dead, both great and small (Rev 20:12). At the throne these heavenly beings sing (Rev 4:6; 14:3), give thanks and praise (Rev 4:9), fall prostrate (Rev 4:10), worship (Rev 4:10; 5:13; 7:10, 11) and utter confessions/acclamations (Rev 7:10, 11; cf. 19:1). This extravagant imagery positions God as the most majestic, commanding and potent being in Revelation's hierarchy of beings.

8.3.5. God's Juridical Omnipotence. God's complete control is nowhere more evident than in the expression of his judgment. While Revelation makes explicit reference to God's judgments (Rev 6:10; 14:7; 15:4; 17:1; 19:8) or "plagues" (Rev 9:18, 20; 11:6; 15:1, 6, 8, 9; 16:21; 18:4, 8; 21:9), it is the complex of events unfolding from the seven "seals" (Rev 4:1—6:17; 8:1-5), "trumpets"* (Rev 8:2—9:21; 11:15-19) and "bowls"* (Rev 15:1—19:10)—culminating in the judgment of the great harlot Babylon (Rev 18:1-24) and the great white throne (Rev 20:11-15)—that dramatically illustrate God's omnipotence. The all-powerful God of Revelation denies the evil powers of this world the final say: there is only one God powerful enough to render judgment.

Divine judgment is an expression of God's "anger" (thymos) and "wrath" (orgē). No one will be able to stand the great day of God's wrath (Rev 6:17). God will answer the unrepentant nations with his wrath (Rev 11:18). Whoever worships the beast and opposes God will certainly "drink the wine of God's anger, poured unmixed into the cup of his wrath" (Rev 14:10; 16:19) and thereby experience eternal torment (Rev 14:11). God's judgment is nothing short of a "wine press" of his anger (Rev 14:19). The seven bowls are full of God's anger (Rev 15:7; 16:1), and only when the bowls are emptied shall God's anger cease (Rev 15:1). God's anger and wrath, however, should never be construed as indiscriminate vengeance. Revelation asserts that God's judgments are always "just and true" (Rev 16:5; 19:2).

8.4. The Worship of the Omnipotent God and the Crucified Lamb. Revelation weaves together the various images of God in the twelve songs/confessions that punctuate the narrative (Rev 4:8, 11; 5:13; 7:10, 12; 11:15, 17-18; 15:3-4, 5-6; 16:7; 19:1-3, 4). These songs/confessions celebrate God's "worthiness" (Rev 4:11) to receive "glory" (Rev 4:11; 5:13; 7:12; 19:1), "honor" (Rev 4:11; 5:13; 7:12), "power" (Rev 4:11; 7:12; 19:1), "blessing" (Rev 5:13; 7:12), "might" (Rev 5:13; 12), "wisdom" (Rev 7:12) and "thanksgiving" (Rev 7:12; 11:17). The songs/confessions affirm that "salvation" (Rev 7:10; 19:1) and "power" (Rev 11:17) belong only to God. The hymns* extol God as the one who "reigns" (Rev 11:15, 17), "judges" (Rev 11:18; 15:4; 16:5; 19:2) and "rewards" (Rev 11:18; 19:2). God is "holy" (Rev 4:8; 15:4; 16:5), "just" and "true" (Rev 15:3; 16:5, 7; 19:2). In no other place in the NT are so many images for God brought together with such power.

Thus, in a book that venerates God's omnipotence in unprecedented ways, it is surprising to find that Revelation also openly encourages and models the worship* of the enthroned Jesus. The opening doxology honors the risen Jesus as the one "who loves us and has freed us from our sins by his blood and made us a kingdom, priests to his God and Father, to him [i.e., to Jesus] be glory and dominion for ever and ever" (Rev 1:6). The new song sung by the elders and the creatures hallows the worthiness of Jesus (Rev 5:9). When the angelic hosts join the chorus, Jesus is again reckoned worthy to "receive power and wealth and wisdom and might and honor and glory and blessing" (Rev 5:12). The final song sung by every creature on earth culminates in worship being simultaneously given "to him who sits upon the throne and to the Lamb" (Rev 5:15; cf. 7:10; 12:10). Revelation legitimates and promotes the worship of Jesus and God—and the worship of Jesus as God—and it does so at the very places where God is worshiped and with the very language that is used to venerate God. Revelation shows how the revision of Jewish monotheism occurred in context of Christian worship where OT psalms originally addressed to God, under the inspiration of the Spirit, were redirected to Jesus (Hengel, 81-83). The omnipotence of the only God was fully shared with the only one worthy enough to open the scroll.

9. Apostolic Fathers.

The apostolic fathers* continue in the conceptual trajectory of the NT, even if some of the language and imagery is borrowed from Hellenistic philosophy.

9.1. Lexical Observations. The apostolic fathers refer to God in similar ways as the NT. This list includes God (theos), "Lord" (kyrios), "Father" (patēr), "Most High" (hypsistos), "Majesty" (megalōsynē), "Almighty" (pantokratōr), "Master" (despotēs) and "the Holy One" (ho hagios). Additionally, the apostolic fathers employ some constructions not found in the NT. For example, "The Great Demiurge" (ho megas dēmiourgos, e.g., 1 Clem. 20.11; Diogn. 8.7), "All Holy One" (panagios, e.g., 1 Clem. 35.3; cf. 58.1), "Father of Truth" (patri tēs alētheias, e.g., 2 Clem. 20.5), "God of the Powers" (ho theos tōn dynameōn, Herm. Vis. 1.3.4), "All Creating God" (ho pantoktistēs . . . theos, Diogn. 7.2).

9.2. Oneness of God. The apostolic fathers preserve the commitment to monotheism. The "Jews rightly claim to worship the one God of the universe" (Diogn. 3.2). God is the "true and only God" (1 Clem. 43.6 [or "Lord," depending on the textual reading]; 59.4). The beginning of faith is to "believe that God is one, who created all things and set them in order, and made out of what did not exist everything that is, and who contains all but is himself alone uncontained" (Herm. Man. 1.1; 1 Clem. 46.6; 2 Clem. 20.5). Further, this one God has revealed himself in and through Jesus his Son (Ign. Magn. 7.2; 8.2), and it is God alone who is able to do the good things through Jesus (1 Clem. 61.3). Ignatius* extends the exclusiveness to Jesus: Just as there is but one God, there is also only "one physician . . . God in man, one Jesus Christ" (Ign. Magn. 7.2; cf. Pol. Phil. 4.1).

9.3. God as Creator. The apostolic fathers also affirm the creatorship of this one God. God is the "Father and Creator of the whole universe" (1 Clem. 19.2; 60.1; Diogn. 7.2). He is the "Demiurge and Master of all" (1 Clem. 20.11; Diogn. 8.7). "By the word of his majesty he established everything" (1 Clem. 27.4). Everything in the world owes its order to him (1 Clem. 23.1). Barnabas makes explicit reference to the creation in seven days (Barn. 15.3). 2 Clement applies the creation of male and female to relationship between Christ and the church (2 Clem. 14.2). God is the one who "made humanity" (1 Clem. 7.3; Did. 1.2; Barn. 16.8; 19.2) and "created the world for humanity" (Herm. Man. 12.4.2; cf. Did. 10.3). God is the God of the "angels, the power and of all creation" (Mart. Pol. 14.1). God "created out of nothing the things that are" (Herm. Man. 1.1; Herm. Sim. 1.1.6). God created the world through Christ (Barn. 5.5; Diogn. 7). Both 1 Clement and Hermas describe in detail God's creative work (see 1 Clem. 33; Herm. Vis. 1.3.4).

9.4. God as Ruler. God's ability to create and his sovereign power are closely related. Nothing is impossible for him to do (1 Clem. 27.2). He hears and sees everything (1 Clem. 28.1; Ign. Magn. 3.2). He wills creation into being (Ign. Rom. presc.). He needs nothing and asks for nothing (1 Clem. 52.1). God has a purpose (Ign. Eph. 3.2; Ign. Rom. 8.3; Ign. Smyrn. 6.2; Ign. Pol. 8.1) and will (Ign. Eph. presc. 20.1; Ign. Trall. 1.1) and exercises providence (1 Clem. 24.5). Resurrection was part of his providential plan and well within his creative powers (1 Clem. 24). He is Master of the universe (1 Clem. 8.2; 20.11). God rules the whole world (Barn. 21.5; cf. 5.5).

9.5. God as Judge. God's power extends to judgment. God has judged in the past (1 Clem. 17.5), judges in the present (e.g., 1 Clem. 11.2; 21.1), and will execute judgment in the future (Barn. 5.7; 7.2; 15.5; Did. 11.11; Pol. Phil. 2.1; 6.2; Herm. Man. 1.7; 12.6.3; Diogn. 7.6). God opposes the proud (Ign. Eph. 5.3), and those who disobey will find eternal punishment (2 Clem. 6.7), the "dreadful torments of an unquenchable fire" (2 Clem. 17.7). Sinners will be burned (Herm. Sim. 4.1.2; 4.4.4).

9.6. The Grace and Mercy of God. God is also the source of grace (e.g., 1 Clem. 1.1; 30.2; 65.2; Ign. Smyrn. 11.1; Mart. Pol. 20.3). God is compassionate (1 Clem. 23.1), merciful* (Ign. Trall. 12.3; Barn. 14.3), long-suffering (Ign. Eph. 11.1) and patient (Pol. Phil. 6.2). He has been and always will be kind, good, without anger and true (1 Clem. 19.3; Diogn. 8.8). "Who can describe the bond of God's love" (1 Clem. 49.2)? God hears the prayers of the righteous (Barn. 5.3) and rewards the righteous (2 Clem. 20.4). If anyone does what is right in God's sight he or she will enter the kingdom (2 Clem. 11.7).

10. Summary.

The NT and the apostolic fathers employ a wide range of vocabulary to refer to the one true God. All the later NT authors and many of the apostolic fathers employ theos, kyrios and patēr to designate God. But any common lexical pattern ends there. Of the other twenty-eight separate titles noted here, only four titles appear in two or more authors—hypsistos in Acts, Hebrews and 1 Clement; despotēs in Acts, Revelation, 1 Clement, Barnabas, Hermas,* Didache and Diognetus; pantokratōr* in Revelation, 1 Clement, Martyrdom of Polycarp, Diognetus, and Hermas; and ho hagios in Revelation and 1 Clement. When the NT and the apostolic fathers speak, they tell of God's faithfulness, sovereignty, holiness, constancy, providence, forbearance, mercy, grace, love, anger and omnipotence; they explain God as Father, love and light; they write of a God who creates, builds, reveals, promises, saves, redeems, justifies, warns, disciplines, judges, vindicates and rewards.

Despite such wide-ranging vocabulary and imagery, the NT and apostolic fathers hold certain features of God in common (see Dahl, Bassler)—there is only one God who is the Creator and Giver of life, who rules, judges and mercifully redeems.

	Oneness	Creator of the World and the Giver of Life	Sovereign Ruler of the World	Righteous Judge	Gracious Merciful Redeemer
Acts	X	X	X	X	X
Hebrews	X	X	X	X	X
James	X		X	X	X
1 Peter		X	X	X	X
2 Peter		X		X	X
1, 2, 3 John				X	X
Jude	X			X	X
Revelation		X	X	X	X
Apostolic Fathers	X	X	X	X	X

The chart not only demonstrates commonality among the NT and apostolic fathers but also indicates the indebtedness of early Christianity to Jewish monotheism. The Jewish scriptures, the Christian OT, bequeathed to Christianity the identity of the one true God.

Christianity did, however, recast Jewish monotheism in light of Jesus' death, resurrection and installation to God's right hand (see Exaltation). Early on, Christians recognized the divine status of the risen Jesus, despite the high threshold that Jewish monotheism had established. Christians offered worship and prayers to Jesus (e.g., Acts, Revelation). Christians also began to call Jesus theos (e.g., Heb 1:8; 2 Pet 1:1; 2 Clem. 1.1; 12.1; Ign. Eph. presc. 1.1; 7.2; 15.3; 17.2; 18.2; 19.3; Ign. Trall. 7.1; Ign. Rom. presc. [2x]; 3.3; 6.3; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; Ign. Pol. 8.3). The trinitarian seeds planted within the later NT documents and the apostolic fathers (Acts 2:33; 1 Clem. 46.6; 58.2; Ign. Eph. 9.1; 18.2; Ign. Magn. 8.2; 13.1, 2; Ign. Trall. 9; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; Mart. Pol. 14.3; Pol. Phil. 3; Did. 7.1, 3) were destined to flower into the great confessions of the church. The later NT documents and the apostolic fathers demonstrate that the office of the one true God had been enlarged to include Jesus as worthy of worship and service.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CHRISTOLOGY; HOLY SPIRIT; LORD; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. Bassler, "God (NT)," ABD (1992) 2:1049-55; R. J. Bauckham, "Jesus, Worship of," ADB (1992) 3:812-19; idem, "The Worship of Jesus in Apocalyptic Christianity," NTS 27 (1981) 323-31; W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970); A. Chester and R. P. Martin, The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter and Jude (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1961); C. H. Cosgrove, "The Divine Dei in Luke-Acts," NovT 26 (1984) 168-90; N. A. Dahl, "The Neglected Factor in New Testament Theology," in Jesus the Christ: The Historical Origins of Christological Doctrine, ed. D. H. Juel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 153-63; N. A. Dahl and A. F. Segal, "Philo and the Rabbis on the Name of God," JSJ 9 (1978) 1-28; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1964); P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); C. J. Davis, The Name and Way of the Lord: Old Testament Themes; New Testament Christology (JSNTSup 129; Sheffield: Sheffeld Academic Press, 1996); M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James (Herm; Philadephia: Fortress, 1976); J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); R. M. Grant, The Early Christian Doctrine of God (Charlottesville, VA: University of Virginia Press, 1966); idem, Gods and the One God (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); G. Guthrie, The Structure of Hebrews: A Text-Linguistic Analysis (NovTSup 73:

Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); M. J. Harris, Jesus as God: The New Testament Use of Theos in Reference to Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982); M. Hengel, "Hymns and Christology" in Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the History of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 78-96; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (rev. ed.; New York: Harper & Row, 1978); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); R. MacMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire A.D. 100-400 (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1984); A. C. McGiffert, The God of the Early Christians (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1924); I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970); T. N. D. Mettinger, In Search of God: The Meaning and Message of the Everlasting Names (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); R. L. Mowery, "Direct Statements Concerning God's Activity in Acts," SBLSP (1990) 196-211; idem, "Lord, God, and Father: Theological Language in Luke-Acts," SBLSP (1995) 82-101; F. Mussner, " 'Direkte' und 'Indirekte' Christologie im Jakobusbrief," Catholica 24 (1970) 111-16; idem, Jakobusbrief (4th ed.; HTKNT; Freiburg: Herders, 1981); V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions (NTTS 5; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963); C. C. Newman, "Acts" in A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. L. Ryken and T. Longman III (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1993) 436-44; M. C. Parsons, "Son and High Priest: A Study in the Christology of Hebrews," EvQ 60 (1988) 195-218; R. I. Pervo, Profit with Delight: The Literary Genre of the Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); P. Rainbow, "Jewish Monotheism as the Matrix for New Testament Christology," NovT 33 (1991) 78-91; A. F. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven (SJLA 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1978); R. B. Sloan, "The Christology of James," Criswell Theological Review 1 (1986) 2-29; E. Stauffer, "θεό," TDNT 3:65-122; L. Stuckenbruck, "Do Not Worship Me, Worship God!": The Problem of Angel Veneration in Early Judaism and Angelmorphic Aspects in the Christology of the Apocalypse of John (WUNT; Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1995); A. W. Wainwright, The Trinity in the New Testament (London: SPCK, 1962); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

C. C. Newman

GOD-FEARERS. See DIASPORA JUDAISM; FEAR.

GOSPEL

The euangelizomai ("I proclaim") word group refers in the apostolic and subapostolic literature to the good news of salvation* in Jesus, not to a written gospel (see DPL, Gospel). It is not until Marcion* and Justin Martyr that euangelion ("gospel, good news") is used to refer to a written Gospel, though there are hints of such usage in the *Didache.

1. The Euangel- Word Group
2. The Verb Euangelizō
3. The Noun Euangelion
4. The Noun Euangelistēs
5. The Verb Proeuangelizomai

1. The Euangel- Word Group.

Neither any single member of the euangel- word group nor all its members taken together can represent what the early NT and other early Christian literature meant by "the gospel."

An examination of the euangel- word group gives an idea of what Christians until about A.D. 150 understood by the term gospel. Where they occur in the later NT and the writings of the apostolic fathers,* the words belonging to this group refer to the grace* of God* in Christ* rather than to a written gospel (for helpful summaries see Friedrich; Strecker).

2. The Verb Euangelizō.

The verb euangelizō ("proclaim [glad tidings]"), with the thing proclaimed expressed, is used thirteen times in the later NT: ten times in Acts,* twice in 1 Peter* and once in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of). Yet on every occasion, although the explicit wording varies, some aspect of the Christian message is being proclaimed. In Acts Jesus is proclaimed as Messiah by Peter and the apostles* (Acts 5:42; see Barrett, 1:301) in spite of rough treatment and orders from the Sanhedrin to refrain from doing so. Similar messages are attributed to those who proclaimed the good news about Jesus (the Lord,* Christ) and his fulfillment of what God had promised (Acts 8:12, 35; 10:36; 11:20; 13:32; 17:18). When Acts portrays Christians proclaiming "the word," whether or not (Acts 8:4; 15:35) the expression is further modified by a Greek defining genitive such as in the phrase "the word of the Lord," it means that they were expounding the good news of what God had done in Christ. The contents of the proclamations in 1 Peter (1 Pet 1:12, 25) and Revelation (Rev 10:7) are not made as precise, but their meaning is clear enough (though the sense of 1 Pet 4:6 is still uncertain; see commentaries). The grace of God in Christ is at issue.

Euangelizō also appears in absolute form—that is, without an express indication of the thing proclaimed—five times in Acts (Acts 8:25, 40; 14:7, 15, 21; 16:10), twice in Hebrews (Heb 4:2, 6), once in 1 Peter (1 Pet 4:6) and once in Revelation (Rev 14:6). The passage in Revelation is a special case; there is present an accusative object of the thing to be proclaimed, but it does not in itself clarify the passage further (see 3.1 below). In all these cases context makes it plain that what is being proclaimed is the grace of God in Jesus. It is apparent that euangelizō refers to proclamation of the Christian message whether or not the content of the proclamation is expressed explicitly.

Although this verb occurs twenty-two times in the later NT, it is found only twice in the postapostolic writings and then only in 1 Clement. Where it does occur it appears in proximity, the first time with the content of the proclamation indicated and the second time with it excluded. We are told that the apostles were evangelized or received the gospel from the Lord Jesus Christ (with no express indication of the content of the proclamation; 1 Clem. 42.1) and that, fully in line with the will of God, they then proclaimed that the kingdom of God was imminent (1 Clem. 42.3; see Kingdom of God). The grammatical possibilities for the verb euangelizō have not here changed from what was available to the NT writers. In the postapostolic period the word still refers to the Christian glad tidings.

3. The Noun Euangelion.

The spread of occurrences of the noun euangelion ("gospel, good tidings") is different from that of the verb euangelizō . The noun is found only four times in the later NT, in Acts (twice), 1 Peter (once) and Revelation (once); but it appears six times (in more than one gender) in Josephus* and several times in a variety of writings of the apostolic fathers.

3.1. Later New Testament. Each time the noun occurs in the NT it is accompanied by another word or words that modify its meaning slightly. In his speech to the Jerusalem council Peter remembers that in the early days he had been divinely appointed to carry "the word of the gospel [good news] to the Gentiles" (Acts 15:7; see Gentiles). Paul tells the Ephesian elders that he values above his own life the ministry* he had from the Lord to bear witness to "the gospel [good news] of God's grace" (Acts 20:24). At 1 Peter 4:17 the author wonders about the heaviness of the judgment* that will rest on those who do not obey the "gospel of God," with a more favorable response indicated in 1 Peter 4:6 (see commentaries). John the revelator speaks of the "eternal gospel" that the angel* flying in the sky had to proclaim (Rev 14.6). Euangelion in 1 Peter 4:17 probably stresses the demands of the gospel (see Davids, 171-72), as opposed to its delights ("good news"), and in Revelation 14:6 judgment is again in view, a fact that also colors the meaning of "gospel." In the two passages from Acts, however, there is every reason for allowing the word its usual meaning in Acts of "good news."

3.2. Josephus. The substantive occurs four times in Josephus (usually given the feminine form hē euangelia; Josephus Ant. 18.6.10 §229; Josephus J.W. 2.17.4 §420; 4.10.6 §618; 4.11.5 §656), all in the sense of "good [welcome] news." Josephus uses it ironically in the phrase deinon euangelion ("terrible tidings") in one place (Josephus J.W. 2.17.4 §420), but the ironic insertion of the adjective adapts euangelion to its context, though it does not alter its basic sense.

3.3. Apostolic Fathers. Subapostolic usage, in contrast to earlier (NT) Christian literature, requires a more lengthy discussion. It is frequently acknowledged that Marcion was the first to have used euangelion to designate a written Gospel. That is how he identified the purified and harmonized account of the life and ministry of Jesus that he promulgated.

Was this use of euangelion prepared for gradually in the literature that went before it, or did it appear all at once? H. Koester has insisted on the latter because neither the NT nor postapostolic literature before Marcion can be construed as using it for anything like a written gospel. The usage of the later NT has been discussed; in the apostolic fathers, when the word is singular and where context suggests nothing else, it is clear that postapostolic usage is continuous with NT usage. That is, "gospel" evokes what was proclaimed rather than any canonical or otherwise written Gospel (Ign.

Phld. 5.1, 2 [twice]; 9.2; Mart. Pol. 4.1; 19.1; 22.1). Similarly, in the difficult passage (Ign. Phld. 8.2) in which Ignatius* refers to the "charters (archeioi) of the gospel," there is no indication that the written gospel is being referred to.

But though several passages from the apostolic fathers have been adduced to disprove Koester's assertion, R. H. Gundry rightly asserts that they are all patient of explanations that do not contradict Koester. Instead they point to the modified contention that while "subapostolic literature borrows from books that became canonical" (2 Clem. 8.5; Ign. Smyrn. 5.1; 7.2; Did. 8.2; 11.3; 15.3, 4), they do not refer to any of these books by the appellation euangelion (Gundry, 322-25). Except for 2 Clement 8.5, which may have been written somewhat after Marcion, and Didache 11.3, Gundry is persuasive. These two passages, however, are not proved conclusively to be referring to an oral gospel, though the usage elsewhere in the Didache does suggest that is the case in the second of the two passages.

4. The Noun Euangelistēs.

Euangelistēs ("proclaimer [of the Christian message]," "evangelist") does not occur often outside of Christian writing and appears in our literature only once. It refers to one who carries out the ministry of a Christian preacher (cf. 2 Tim 4:5). Acts 21:8 speaks of Philip* the euangelistēs, one of the seven "deacons" (Acts 6:5) who at that time lived in Caesarea and entertained Paul and his companions on their way from Antioch* to Jerusalem.* Philip had done missionary work at the time of the great persecution* (Acts 8:4-8, 26-40), and repeated activity in propagation of the Christian tidings may have prompted the designation euangelistēs.

5. The Verb Proeuangelizomai.

The verb proeuangelizomai ("proclaim the gospel [good news] in advance") occurs only once in the NT, in Galatians 3:8, and it does not appear in the apostolic fathers.

See also EVANGELISM IN THE EARLY CHURCH; GRACE; KERYGMA AND DIDACHE; REDEMPTION; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); G. Friedrich, "εὐαγγελίζομαι κτλ," TDNT 2:707-37; R. H. Gundry, "EUANGELION: How Soon A Book?" JBL 115 (1996) 321-25; H. Koester, "From the Kerygma-Gospel to Written Gospels," NTS 35 (1989) 361-81; F. R. McCurley and J. Reumann, Witness of the Word: A Biblical Theology of the Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); G. Strecker, "εὐαγγελίζω, εὐαγγελιστής," EDNT 2:69-70; idem, "εὐαγγέλιον," EDNT 2:70-74.

A. Casurella

GOSPEL OF PETER.

See PETER, GOSPEL OF.

GOSPEL OF THOMAS.

See THOMAS, GOSPEL OF.

GRACE

Grace, often described as the unmerited favor of God,* is spoken of and alluded to in the earliest Christian literature by the word charis ("grace"). It is difficult to discourse on all the aspects of grace in early Christian literature, because there is a sense in which the entire NT and much early Christian writing is about the grace of God in Christ* and its outworking in the believer. This is so whether or not the Greek word charis is employed in a particular passage. Nevertheless charis does mean "grace," and with the preceding caveat this article explores this English concept as represented by that Greek word (see helpful summaries in Berger; Conzelmann).

1. Heavenly Grace
2. Miscellaneous Uses

1. Heavenly Grace.

Charis is most often used to refer to some form of heavenly favor shown to the human race, and this use of the word charis is considered first.

1.1. Grace* (Charis Unmodified). On occasion charis appears undefined and without a modifier to indicate the heavenly grace from God that incorporates people into the community of the redeemed and empowers them. This is probably the way it should be interpreted in Acts 4:33 (cf. Barrett, 1:254). It is surely the understanding behind the descriptions of Stephen* as "full of grace" (Acts 6:8) and the Christians in Achaia who had become believers "through grace" (Acts 18:27). Grace, rather than dietary laws (see Food, Food Laws), is also laid down by the author of Hebrews* as the appropriate strengthener of the heart (Heb 13:9). Usually, however, when the NT speaks of this sort of heavenly grace, charis is explicitly defined as God's grace or the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

In the post-NT period charis assumes a slightly different nuance. It is still possible to speak of the grace by which God can bring us to his kingdom (Mart. Pol. 20.2) and to speak of individuals as filled with some aspect of grace (Polycarp* in Mart. Pol. 12.1). But there is a different feel about the word, so that one begins to understand grace to comprise an aspect of the present Christian order of salvation.* Thus the way of Judaism* is contrasted with grace (Ign. Magn. 8.1), and the prophets* are portrayed as having been in tune with Jesus, from whom they received inspiration, rather than with their own Israelite people (Ign. Magn. 8.2; Barn. 5.6). Christians are exhorted to be in love with the present order of grace (Ign. Eph. 11.1) and to advance in this grace (Ign. Pol. 1.2). It is an extension of this use of the word that takes grace to represent something like the whole economy of heaven* and opposes it to this undesirable world* (Did. 10.6).

1.2. Grace of God. The phrase "grace of God" becomes in Acts* a way of referring to the merciful action of God in Christ by which people become believers. Barnabas, for instance, pursues a fact-finding mission to Syrian Antioch* for the Jerusalem* church* and discovers that Gentiles* are also recipients of this grace (Acts 11:23). It is in this sense that the Christians of Pisidian Antioch are admonished to continue in the grace of God (Acts 13:43; cf. Acts 20:32) and Paul was set apart to testify to God's grace (Acts 20:24). The phrase is also used to refer to the loving favor of God (Acts 14:3, 26; 15:40). Charis, as the kind and salvific action of God in redeeming and strengthening people, also occurs in the General Epistles (Heb 2:9; 12:15; Jas 4:6; 1 Pet 5:5, 10, 12). Grace motivates the gifts of God, which believers are admonished to use to serve each other (1 Pet 4:10; Goppelt, 301-2). The grace of God is also behind the encouragement offered by 1 Peter* to the Christians of Asia Minor in their straitened circumstances (1 Pet 5:12; Davids, 197-201).

For the apostolic fathers* as for the NT writers, the originator of grace is God; therefore the phrase "grace of God" occurs from time to time. Those who share the faith* with others are known as the ministers of the grace of God (1 Clem. 3.1), and those to whom God has given grace are holy* and sanctified (1 Clem. 30.3). From this grace come love* (1 Clem. 50.3) and at the necessary times power (1 Clem. 55.3), steadfastness (Ign. Rom. greeting) and endurance* (Ign. Smyrn. 11.1).

1.3. Grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. Twice the NT refers specifically to the grace of Jesus (Acts 15:11; 2 Pet 3:18). The former reference is part of Peter's address to the Jerusalem council and argues against an imposition of law* on Gentile believers because all, Jew and Gentile alike, have access to salvation "through the grace of the Lord Jesus." The latter reference is part of the closing greeting of 2 Peter* and exhorts the recipients to grow in what R. J. Bauckham (337-38) refers to as "the need for progress in the Christian life."

The apostolic fathers speak of salvation and redemption* as by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, using some form of that name and title (Ign. Phld. 8.1; 11.1; Ep. Apos. 6). This grace enables those who have it to endure tortures (Mart. Pol. 2.3). But those who have erroneous notions about the grace of Jesus Christ are opposed to the mind of God and deficient in love (Ign. Smyrn. 6.2).

1.4. Related Uses. So far we have spoken of occurrences of charis that refer directly to some form of heavenly grace. Now we turn to instances that adapt or modify this use or make the heavenly connection less direct. Several times (Heb 13:25; 1 Pet 1:2; 2 Pet 1:2; 2 Jn 3; Rev 1:4) the word occurs in salutations and benedictions in which it refers to the gracious action of God himself (see Lane, 2:571 on Heb 13:25 and Brown, 681-82 on the assertion of 2 Jn 3). This use continues in the postbiblical period (1 Clem. 65.2; Ign. Smyrn. 9.2; 12.2; 13.2; Mart. Pol. 22.2; Barn. 21.9; Ep. Apos. 1; cf. Ign. Smyrn. 12.1). In these passages it is akin to usage in the greetings of the Pauline epistles.

Hebrews 4:16 uses charis twice. Once it is used absolutely and represents the practical application of the mercy* that it defines and renames. The other time it is in the phrase "throne of grace" and denominates the source of the mercy and grace that come from God; in this sense it is an almost Jewish way of referring to God without mentioning God by name.

Hebrews 10:29 denounces the apostate* who has, among other things, insulted "the Spirit of grace," the Spirit who conveys grace (cf. Lane, 2:293-95).

In the postapostolic period the phrase "grace of" is completed by other things than "God" and "Lord Jesus Christ," but the citations tend to relate to one or more aspects of the order of salvation. As a result *Diognetus refers to the faith as the "grace of the church" (Diogn. 11.6; 11.7); Clement (see Clement of Rome) speaks of the "grace of repentance" (1 Clem. 7.4) and, in resisting schisms, of the "Spirit of grace" (1 Clem. 46.6); and the *Epistle of Barnabas mentions the "grace of the gift of the Spirit" (Barn. 1.2). In Diognetus there is also mentioned a "grace of the Prophets," which the author distinguishes from the Law (Diogn. 11.6).

2. Miscellaneous Uses.

A few times charis carries a sense best translated into English with some word other than "grace." It is not that the Greek word is inappropriate in the original; it is that charis and grace do not coincide exactly in semantic range. Thus it is appropriate to understand this word in 1 Peter 2:19-20 to refer to it being creditworthy for a slave* to endure beating for right behavior but not creditworthy to endure it for doing wrong. Similarly, while it is not wrong to understand 1 Peter 3:7 to speak of husband and wife as sharing the grace of life, it is better to understand them as sharing the gift of eternal life, that is, the life of heaven (Davids, 123; Goppelt, 227-28). In Hebrews 12:28 the phrase that includes charis is best translated "let us be thankful" or "let us give thanks" (cf. Lane, 2:483-84).

Frequently, however, charis is used of goodwill or favor. This takes place where it is a matter of people seeking and granting favors to each other, as in the cases of Felix or Festus and the Jews (Acts 24:27; 25:3, 9), or of one person having the goodwill of another, as in the case of Joseph and Pharaoh (Acts 7:10). Charis is also used of David winning God's favor (Acts 7:46). There is some discussion over the proper translation of Acts 2:47, but T. D. Andersen argues persuasively that the verse ought to be translated "praising God and having goodwill towards all the people."

See also DEATH OF CHRIST; GOD; GOSPEL; LOVE; MERCY; REDEMPTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. T. D. Andersen, "The Meaning of ἔχοντες χάριν πρός in Acts 2:47," NTS 34 (1988) 604-10; C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994) vol. 1; R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); K. Berger, "χάρις," EDNT 3:457-60; R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); H. Conzelmann, "χάρις κτλ," TDNT 9:387-402; P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); L. Goppelt, A Commentary on 1 Peter, ed. F. Hahn (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament (New York: Long & Smith, 1932); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959). A. Casurella

GUESTS. See HOSPITALITY.

H

HALLELUJAH. See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

HAUSTAFEL. See HOUSEHOLD CODES.

HEALING, ILLNESS

Various forms of healing practices were widely used in the ancient Mediterranean world. The distinctive item in our literature is that healing is principally through the name of or faith in Jesus. The references are concentrated in Acts* but also occur in James,* 1 John and Revelation (see John, Letters of; Revelation, Book of), as well as the largely metaphorical references to healing in the apostolic fathers.*

1. Healing in the Ancient Mediterranean World
2. Healing in the New Testament
3. Healing in the Second Century

1. Healing in the Ancient Mediterranean World. In the ancient Mediterranean world in which the NT was born, there were multiple means of seeking healing. First, there were a number of healing cults with their shrines, such as those of Asclepsis (Asklepios) and Isis. Second, there were various magical means that one could use individually or in combination, such as spells, amulets, special oils and sacred inscriptions. Third, there were the various physicians, trained to some degree in a combination of the healing arts of the Greek (e.g., Hippocrates) or Roman (Celsus De medicina) type. While this typology of miracle* (involving the gods), magic* and medicine (Kee 1986) is descriptively helpful, in practice the lines were blurred, with practitioners using a variety of means and ill individuals selecting eclectically from whatever practitioners were available (e.g., Pliny Nat. Hist. 25; 27-28). Among these practitioners were, on occasion, charismatic wandering miracle workers, such as Apollonius of Tyana (Philostratus Vit. Ap.), who taught philosophical or religious reform along with working healing through a variety of medicinal or magical means. They related their abilities to their relationship with the gods (Apollonius started out in the temple of Asclepsis; see Religions) rather than to wisdom* derived from other sources. In certain cases they were themselves viewed as in some sense divine.

Although the sources we have cited are all from the non-Judaic world, a similar pattern would hold true in Second Temple and rabbinic Judaisms.* The major difference is that of a strong underlying monotheism in Jewish practices. This means that, drawing on the OT traditions of Elijah and Elisha and a growing tradition about Solomon and his wonder-working wisdom, in Judaism charismatic miracle workers are either prophets* or sages such as Honi the Circle-Drawer or Hannina ben Dosa, who lived in the first centuries B.C. and A.D. respectively. While these two used mainly prayer,* others in all branches of Judaism used medicine and magic as well, with the understanding that the effectiveness of both was due to the action of God.*

2. Healing in the New Testament. While healing is mentioned in all types of NT literature (see DJG, Healing; DPL, Healing, Illness), we will focus on three types of NT literature within the scope of this volume, each of which has a significant contribution to make.

2.1. Acts. The pattern of Acts is that of "the miracle-working messenger" much in the fashion of the OT prophet (Reimer, 54). The general pattern is that the messenger is called for or shows up and heals through a word of command or prayer, with or without touch. In two instances healing is apparently worked through intermediate means (Peter's shadow, Acts 5:15; Paul's handkerchiefs or aprons, Acts 19:11-12). Other than these examples (where the objects serve as a means of contact with the messenger), there is no use of medical or magical means. Given the close connection between healing (i.e., signs and wonders*) and the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in Acts (2:43; 5:12, both of which follow passages that speak of Spirit-filling), the basic model appears to be that of the OT wonder-working prophet, such as Elisha, for the stress in Acts 2 is that the Spirit of prophecy* has been poured out.

This pattern is emphasized by the fact that in Acts alone in the NT (with the possible exception of 1 Cor 11:30) there is some divine causation of illness. Most illnesses are mentioned without any reference to their ultimate causation (e.g., when in Acts 20:7-12 Eutychus falls, only natural causes such as lamps and the length of the discourse are mentioned). The people are simply sick or dead (in the case of Dorcas, Acts 9:36-43). However, in three cases illness or death is caused by God or his agent (Acts 5:1-11; 12:20-23; 13:6-12; cf. Davids 1990, 218-20). One of these uses an angel and two use divine messengers, functioning much as Elijah and Elisha do in the OT (see OT in Acts).

In Acts, then, healing is a function of prophetic miracle-working messengers (the Twelve, the Seven, Paul*). The messengers make it clear that they act "in the name of" Jesus and thus that his power* and authority* accomplish the healing. Given the presence of charismatic miracle workers in the Mediterranean world, this explanation was absolutely necessary. In giving it they separate themselves from magic and the possible attribution of the deed to another god or even their own divinity (Acts 14:8-18). The miracles* serve primarily to give divine attestation to the messenger and his message.

2.2. James and 1 John. In both James* and 1 John* instructions about healing prayer appear in the closing of the letter where a Hellenistic reader would expect a health wish (Jas 5:13-18; 1 Jn 5:14-17). In both there is one named cause of illness, for in James some but not all illness is traced to sin* (Jas 5:15-16; note the conditional clause), while in 1 John only illness caused by sin is in view. The issue there is the nature of the sin: whether it is mortal (i.e., leading to death) or not (1 Jn 5:17). At this point the two epistles diverge.

In 1 John the illness is never mentioned, so it is not clear whether physical or spiritual death is in view, although in view of the use of "life" and "death" in the rest of the letter (e.g., 1 Jn 3:14; 5:11-12) the latter is more likely (Marshall, Scholer, Smalley). The passage starts with a general exhortation on prayer, which is then applied to praying for a fellow believer who sins a nonmortal sin. In the case of a mortal sin, prayer is not required (although perhaps not prohibited either), since it will not be effective. Furthermore, whether this healing is spiritual or physical, all readers of the letter are addressed with the command to pray for appropriate healing.

The passage in 1 John is paralleled in reverse order in James 5:16-18, where all community members are addressed and instructed to confess their sins to one another and pray for one another; then a general exhortation on prayer is given. The example of Elijah, the basis of this exhortation, rests not on his being a prophet but on his being a human "just like us" who prayed and suffered* for his faith. Prayer for healing is a communal activity.

James 5:14-15, however, adds a new dimension to healing in that in at least some cases (perhaps when the person is too ill to come to community meetings, if there is any intention to differentiate this from Jas 5:16) the sick person calls the leaders of the community, the elders, to him or her. They use a specific means, anointing with oil (also mentioned in Mark 6:13; see Anointing). The focus of the rite, however, is not on the oil but on "the name of the Lord." This is confirmed in the following verse where it is "the prayer of faith" which heals and specifically "the Lord" who "raises [the sick person] up." In the process of this prayer the responsible sins, if there are any, will be forgiven.

As in Acts the focus is on the divine source of healing, with the human agent serving as an intermediary. Yet now the picture is not that of a miracle-working messenger coming to town, but that of the mutual care of the whole Christian community or a specific authority vested in the leaders of that community. In either case healing is viewed as an ongoing internal activity of the church,* not as something that attests the messengers of the gospel* to outsiders.

2.3. Revelation. In Revelation no one is described as ill and then healed. However, the book contains several references to eschatological* healing. In Revelation 3:17-18 illness and anointing with salve are used as a metaphor for the lukewarm state of the church and its remedy in Christ.* In Revelation 22:2 the leaves of the tree of life bring "healing to the nations," although what this healing consists of is never described. It is only in Revelation 7:16-17 (with reference to those coming out of the great tribulation*) and Revelation 21:4 (with reference to the inhabitants of the new Jerusalem*) that physical healing is clearly included in the description of heavenly existence. Believers may have suffered pain and gone through sickness on earth, but in the resurrection "God will wipe away every tear" from them; pain and death will have been banished. There is no human agent of this healing; God (and possibly the Lamb* in Rev 7) is its only agent, reminding the readers that ultimate healing awaits the eschaton.

3. Healing in the Second Century.

By the time of the apostolic fathers, healing imagery is usually applied only to spiritual sickness. Thus Hermas frequently refers to the "healing of the former sins" (e.g., Herm. Sim. 8.11.1). Likewise sickness is a metaphor for spiritual weakness (Herm. Vis. 3.11.4). Barnabas and 2 Clement both accepted medical practice (e.g., Barn. 9.6), but the OT references to healing are interpreted as metaphors for repentance or other spiritual healing (2 Clem. 9.7). When Jesus is referred to as a physician, it is with reference to these spiritual ills (Ign. Eph. 7.2; Diogn. 9.6).

In Hermas* there is a close relationship between illness and sin. On the one hand those who wander away from God are punished with, among other things, illness (Herm. Sim. 6.3.4), while on the other physical suffering heals sins (Herm. Sim. 9.28.5; cf. Herm. Sim. 7.4, which refers to penance). On a more prosaic level Hermas notes that some get ill due to eating too much, while others get ill due to their lack of food; therefore people should share (Herm. Vis. 3.9.3).

In this literature we never see examples of specific prayers for the sick, but there is concern for them. In the final prayer of 1 Clement (1 Clem. 59.4) we read, "We beseech you, Master, to . . . heal the sick." Although the prayer recognizes that God does heal the sick, we have no idea whether Clement's* community did more than pray such general prayers nor how, assuming that they did do more, their belief was reflected in pastoral practice.

Later, in Justin and other apologists, we find references to prayers for healing, although often the healing is exorcistic: "We do continually beseech God by Jesus Christ to preserve us from the demons which are hostile to the worship of God, and whom we of old time served, in order that, after our conversion by him to God, we may be blameless" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 30; cf. 85; Apol. II 2.6). There is, however, an awareness of gifts of healing, which appear to be separate from exorcism (Justin Dial. Tryph. 39).

See also ANOINTING; MIRACLES IN ACTS; SIGNS AND WONDERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Aune, "Magic in Early Christianity," ANRW 2.23.2 (1980) 1510-16; E. Buck, "Healing in the New Testament," Consensus 17 no. 2 (1991) 63-77; P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); idem, "Sickness and Suffering in the New Testament" in Wrestling with Dark Angels, ed. C. P. Wagner, F. D. Pennoyer (Ventura, CA: Regal, 1990) 213-37; H. C. Kee, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); idem, Miracle in the Early Christian World (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983); I. Jacob and W. Jacob, eds., The Healing Past: Pharmaceuticals in the Biblical and Rabbinic World (SAM 7; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1993); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); R. E. A. Palmer, "Paean and Paenists of Serapis and the Flavian Emperors," in Nomodeiktes: Greek Studies in Honor of Martin Ostwald, ed. R. M. Rosen and J. Farrell (Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 1993) 355-65; C. Pickar, "Is Anyone Sick Among You?" CBQ 7 (1945) 165-74; J. J. Pilch, "Sickness and Healing in Luke-Acts," in The Social World of Luke-Acts, ed. J. H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); idem, "Understanding Healing in the Social World of Early Christianity," BTB 22 (1992) 26-33; A. Reimer, Divine Healing Rites in the New Testament: Diversity and Unity (Vancouver, BC: unpublished M.C.S. thesis, Regent College, 1994); D. M. Scholer, "Sins Within and Sins Without: An Interpretation of 1 John 5:16-17" in Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation, ed. G. F. Hawthorne (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975) 230-46; S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); D. L. Tiede, The Charismatic

Figure as Miracle Worker (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1972); M. F. Unger, "Divine Healing," BSac 128 (1971) 234-44; K. Warrington, "Anointing with Oil and Healing," EPTA Bulletin 12 (1993) 5-22; idem, "Some Observations on James 5:13-18," EPTA Bulletin 8 (1989) 160-77.

P. H. Davids

HEART. See PSYCHOLOGY.

HEAVEN, NEW HEAVENS

Heaven signifies both the visible realm of sun, moon and stars as well as the invisible realm of God's dwelling to which Christ has ascended. In this second sense heaven is also an expression of the believer's hope for an enduring homeland and inheritance in the presence of God. Both this awareness of God's realm as the site of eternal reward (showing the value of worldly gains to be inferior) and the hope for a "new heaven and new earth" (showing the duration of worldly benefits to be short-lived) assisted early Christians to accept the temporal costs and self-denial of following the way of Jesus for the sake of eternal gain.

1. Jewish and Greco-Roman Background
2. Hebrews
3. Acts and the General Epistles
4. Revelation
5. Apostolic Fathers

1. Jewish and Greco-Roman Background.

1.1. Jewish Background. The Jewish Scriptures speak of God* as Creator of the heavens (Gen 1:1; Ps 33:6). Authors began to differentiate between heaven as the visible firmament of the stars and celestial bodies and a higher heaven that was the dwelling of God, referred to as the "heaven of heavens" (Deut 10:14; 1 Kings 8:27; Ps 148:4; 3 Macc. 2:15). God dwells "above the firmament"; as early as Exodus 24:9-12 God appears only beyond the "sapphire pavement" that is the firmament (Bietenhard; pace Gaster). Psalm 148:4 speaks of a threefold division of heaven into the heavens, the waters above the heavens and the highest heavens (the dwelling of God and God's closely related agents, such as Wisdom in Sir 24:4). Heaven as the dwelling of God is frequently conceived as a temple,* an image that goes back to 1 Enoch 14:8—15:2 (Himmelfarb) and to early exegesis of Exodus 25:9, 40, stressing the correspondence between the earthly and heavenly (Bietenhard). The activity of the earthly tabernacle* and cultus is a reflection and an extension of a heavenly temple and cultus where angels* worship the one God.

The Septuagint translation of the Hebrew dual šamayîm ("heavens") as the Greek plural ouranoi facilitates the development during the intertestamental period of widespread speculation on the number of the heavens and the beings associated with each. The Testament of Levi 2:6—5:1 speaks of the seven heavens and their inhabitants and functions: the lower three are the "gloomier" heavens, which witness human unrighteousness and in which are stored the materials for judgment* (rain, hail, fire; cf. Job 37:9; 38:22, 37 on the "storehouses" of heaven). The higher four are the dwelling places of lower spiritual beings, angels, the seven archangels and finally God. During this period many interpreters were convinced that the heavens are accessible to the seer and a source of revelation.* Apocalypticists regularly peered into the activity of the heavenly realm with the conviction that it would provide a much-needed perspective on their mundane circumstances (Rowland, Russell, deSilva). The cosmos, moreover, was not regarded as absolute: the later prophetic* and apocalyptic* literature expresses the conviction that God would dissolve the present cosmos and bring into being a "new creation" (Is 65:17; 66:22). Only such a radical renewal could allow the fulfillment of God's promises.*

The NT authors engage in no speculation of number of heavens (save for 2 Cor 12:2-4), but the more general conception of the realm of God's activity lying beyond the visible heaven (cf. Is 64:1) is important for Hebrews,* Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) and the Shepherd of Hermas. Only if the visible heavens open or part can the latter authors, who share with other apocalypticists the conviction that the heavens are accessible to visionaries, witness the activity in the divine realm (celestial phenomena require no such parting of the firmament). The concept of new heavens is a pillar in the arguments of 2 Peter and Revelation. Hebrews and Revelation share the conviction that a heavenly temple exists in the realm of God, of which the earthly temple is but a copy.

1.2. Greco-Roman Background. The Greeks tended to refer to heaven in the singular as the dwelling place of God (Plato Phaedr. 246E; Dio Chrysostom Or. 19.22) and sometimes of the righteous dead (Dio Chrysostom Or. 23.35). Even this single heaven, however, contained a multitiered system of concentric spheres (Aristotle Cael.). For Plato the term heavenly (ouranios) denoted what "really is and what is truly coming to be" (Bietenhard). This axiological sense of "heavenly" appears again in Aristotle's cosmology—the further out one moves from the earthly into the heavenly, the more permanent, divine and valuable things become. This conception appears also to be at work in the mind of the author of Hebrews, for whom the "heavenly," in the sense not of what belongs to the visible "heavens" but to the realm of the divine, is what is "abiding" and "better."

2. Hebrews.

The author of Hebrews uses the term heaven to refer to two different realities in his cosmos. There are the "heavens" that are part of the changing, temporary creation. These will "perish" and "wear out like clothing," in stark contrast to the unchangeableness and constancy of the Son* (Heb 1:10-12). This image is attested in Hellenistic Judaism,* notably in the Septuagint translation of Job 14:12. The translator gives a different vocalization to the Hebrew "will be no more" so that it reads "will become unstitched," bringing the verse in line with the image of heaven as a garment (Gaster). The earth and these heavens will be shaken and removed at the end, so that the invisible and unshakable kingdom that the believers are inheriting will remain (Heb 12:26-28; Hooke, Bietenhard).

Hebrews also speaks of "heaven itself" (Heb 9:24), the place that Jesus entered after he "passed through the heavens" (Heb 4:14) and from which vantage point he stands "exalted above the heavens" (Heb 7:26). This is the eternal and abiding realm, beyond the material and visible creation,* where Jesus serves as high priest* in the "greater and perfect tabernacle not made with hands, that is, not of this creation" (Heb 9:11). The impermanent heavens are what Jesus must pass through in order to get to the true and real tabernacle (Hooke). This is the realm of the believers' "better and lasting possessions" (Heb 10:34), their "better" because "heavenly" homeland (Heb 11:16) and the "unshakable kingdom" that they are receiving (Heb 12:28) in which is their "abiding" city (Heb 13:13-14). The concept of "abiding" and "permanent" enjoyment of enfranchisement in a city and homeland is especially important to the recipients of this epistle, who have lost their status and sense of belonging in their own city (Heb 10:32-34) and continue to live as "aliens and foreigners" (Heb 11:13). That this homeland exists now and stands prepared for them encourages the believers to remain loyal to their Christian commitments even in the face of continued dishonor and marginalization in the world. Since earthly cities and homelands will not survive the eschatological "shaking," believers may the more easily invest themselves in the pursuit that will grant them entrance into the one homeland that will remain intact through the shaking (Heb 12:26-28).

This heaven beyond the material heavens is portrayed as a temple (cf. Rev 11:19; 15:5-8), of which the earthly one is but a shadow and copy (Heb 8:2, 5; 9:24). Jesus' exaltation* to God's right hand is specifically his entrance into the Holy Place of the heavenly sanctuary, the dwelling place of God (Heb 8:1-6), in whose presence Jesus intercedes on behalf of believers. Through Jesus, Christians also have access to the throne of God and are able to go behind the curtain and enter in a spiritual sense this ultimate "heaven" that is God's presence (Heb 10:19-22; 4:14-16). They have in this way a foretaste now of their final entrance into that unshakable heaven and divine rest (Heb 4:1, 11; 6:19-20). The believers have already drawn near to the "heavenly Jerusalem," in which are found the angels performing their celebratory liturgy, the souls of the righteous people, Jesus and God's own self (Heb 12:22-24), and they have only to persevere until the time of God's visitation.

3. Acts and the General Epistles.

Acts* refers to heaven as the place that has received Jesus until the appointed time (Acts 3:20-21; cf. 1 Pet 3:22), whence Jesus continues to direct his church (Acts 9:10-16; 16:7-8). This author also distinguishes between the visible heavens and the heaven that contains God and now Jesus, for the former must part or open in order for the latter to be visible (Acts 7:55-56). 1 Peter* speaks of heaven as the locus of the believers' inheritance, on which they are to set their hopes (1 Pet 1:4). The certainty of this imperishable inheritance should be a source of joy* that helps the addressees to endure the "various trials" to which they have been and continue to be subject (1 Pet 1:6).

2 Peter* contains the most well-developed discussion of the origin and future of the heavens (2 Pet 3:5-14). The same divine word that brought the heavens into being (2 Pet 3:5) has decreed that the "present heavens and earth" will be dissolved in an eschatological* conflagration (2 Pet 3:7, 10). This conception has a certain affinity with the Stoic doctrine of the ekpyrōsis ("conflagration"), which holds that each age ends in a fire that renews the elements and returns to the beginning, to play out the same history again and again. 2 Peter rejects this cyclical component in favor of the apocalyptic conception of two and only two ages. The first age is prey to unrighteousness, but the second age with its "new heavens and a new earth" will be an age in which "righteousness has its home" (2 Pet 3:13). This expectation of the dissolution of the created order (earth and heavens) and the arrival of the coming "new heavens and new earth" is used to shape and motivate certain behaviors (2 Pet 3:11-14, 17-18). The addressees' knowledge of the end of this age should give them stability and steadfastness in their pursuit of holiness,* godliness and unity within the church, as they wait for the fulfillment of God's promise.

4. Revelation.

John shares with other apocalypticists the conviction that the heavens are accessible to the visionary and that the events of heavenly spheres place the everyday experience of the community in an important and informative perspective. John passed through a "door standing open in heaven" (Rev 1:1) in order to witness the events of the court of God, which stands in John's cosmology beyond the visible firmament (hence the need for an open door). He sees the throne of God surrounded by a variety of angelic beings (four fantastic beings resembling the seraphim of Isaiah 6:2-3, seven archangels, twenty-four elders on their "thrones" and myriads of angels), all arranged concentrically around the throne of God and giving worship, together with "every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth," to the one God and the Lamb (Rev 4:1—5:14; see Worship; Liturgical Elements). This window into the heavenly realm lends an essential perspective to the commitment made by Christians in Asia Minor to worship the one God and withdraw from the worship of idols (see Idolatry). In their everyday experience they form a minority, a small group standing apart from the majority of people who still worship the Greco-Roman pantheon (see Religions, Greco-Roman), and are thus susceptible to accept the larger society's labeling of them as deviant. John's vision,* however, assures them that they are in touch with the true order of the cosmos and that from this cosmic perspective those who center themselves around the worship of idols or the emperor* are really the deviants standing in need of correction (deSilva).

The heaven of God's court has ultimate authority* over the earthly realm. It is in heaven that the seals (see Scrolls) that set the end in motion are broken (Rev 6:1-17); it is from heaven that judgments and agents of judgment are released upon the earth (Rev 8:6; 14:14, 17; 16:1); it is from heaven that final destruction falls upon God's enemies (Rev 20:9). Heaven's inhabitants, whether the righteous martyrs under the altar (Rev 6:9-11; 16:7) or the angels themselves (Rev 16:4-6), encourage God's judgment of those who resist God's justice and harm God's servants* on the earth, rejoicing when the righteous are finally vindicated and the oppressors punished (Rev 18:20; 19:1-4). The faithful on earth are also assured of vital connections between their sphere and the realm of God, for the "prayers of the saints" rise up before God's throne and result in the vindication that they seek (Rev 8:3-6).

Revelation's window into the heavenly realm provides the encouragement believers needed to continue to resist Roman imperial ideology and the pressure to conform to their Greco-Roman neighbors' definitions of piety. As their eyes are opened to this invisible realm, they are enabled to hold fast their allegiance to Christ,* assured that they are acting wisely in light of heaven's authority over the earth. They are encouraged by the promise of a place in the new Jerusalem* that belongs to the new heavens and new earth (Rev 3:12) and by the hope* of dwelling eternally under the protection and care of God and the Lamb* (Rev 7:9-17; 22:1-5).

In the present age heaven and earth remain two separate realms. God and humanity remain apart in the visions of Revelation 4—20: only the righteous dead now enjoy the full presence of God. Revelation looks forward, however, to the joining of these two realms in the new heavens and new earth (Rev 22:1-5), where God finally dwells with humanity as the new Jerusalem descends to the new earth, bringing with it the dwelling of God and the Lamb. After the passing away of the first creation, the dwelling of God and the dwelling of people become one and the same, and the longstanding promise of God is fulfilled (Rev 21:3-4, 22; 22:3-5; cf. Ezek 37:27).

5. Apostolic Fathers.

For the successors of the apostles* heaven remains the place of God's throne (Barn. 16.2; Herm. Vis. 1.1.6) and the abode of diverse orders of angelic beings (Ign. Trall. 5.2; Ign. Smyrn. 6.1). Within this literature too there is some awareness of different levels of heaven. 2 Clement, for example, expects the dissolution of the earth and only "certain of the heavens" at the judgment (2 Clem. 16.3), suggesting that the higher heaven of God's realm will persist. The visible heavens must still open or part in order for a revelation from beyond the material creation to be imparted (Herm. Vis. 1.1.4; 1.2.1) or for the triumphant Christ to appear to the inhabitants of the earth at the Parousia* (Did. 16.6-8).

Most frequently heaven appears in the literature as the ultimate goal that believers seek to attain, toward which they shape their lives in the present, mundane realm. The righteous who die in Christ, like Peter and Paul, enter the "place of glory" at their death (1 Clem. 5.4, 7; 50.3; Ign. Rom. 4.3; 6.2; Mart. Pol. 19.2; so Hooke). Believers set their minds fully on being received by Christ into the eternal, heavenly kingdom (Mart. Pol. 20.2; 22.3; Diogn. 6.7-8; 10.2; Did. 10.5-6). This hope is to shape their actions now, so that they walk in holiness and righteousness,* not indulging the love for temporary things that might distract the believers from attaining eternal treasures (2 Clem. 5.5-6) and bravely persevering in the face of hostility and reproach (2 Clem. 19.3-4). Knowing that "true life" belongs to "heaven" shows up the deceitfulness of the world and allows one to commend the choices of the Christian martyrs rather than despise them, for they are despising a temporary death in order not to fall victim to eternal loss (Diogn. 10.7). For the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, however, the life of heaven is not merely a future possession of the believer; it is experienced as one begins in discipleship, for the believers themselves become "a paradise of delight" through the knowledge of God and the experience of God's favor (Diogn. 12.1). A righteous person's honor and reputation are already established in heaven: the believer is to preserve his or her reputation in that sphere unblemished, which also assures the believer of the Lord's assistance (Herm. Vis. 1.1.8). Heaven encourages the martyr to persevere and serves as the court to which the martyr appeals for justice and vindication (Mart. Pol. 9.1-2).

Clement (see Clement of Rome) shows an interest in the visible heavens as a source of moral instruction. As the heavens move in complete harmony in submission to God's will, so the divided Corinthians must return to concord through each person's submission to God (1 Clem. 20.1-3). As the heavens declare God's glory* without words or speech, so also there is nothing unseen or unknown to God, be it spoken or kept in silence: the believers therefore are to leave off their rebelliousness, so as to be safe at the judgment (1 Clem. 27.6—28.1). Finally, just as the orderly heavens bear witness to God's delight in working what is noble, so those who are created in God's image are to delight in well-doing (1 Clem. 33.1-3).

While the eschatology of this corpus is not uniform, a number of authors look forward to some change in the heavenly realm at the time of God's visitation. The *Didache reproduces the widespread expectation of the rending of the heavens and the descent of the conquering Christ at the Parousia (Did. 16.6-8). 2 Clement 16.3 resonates with 2 Peter 3:5-14 in its expectation of the melting of the earth and certain of the heavens, after which shall be uncovered all the works done by people, whether secretly or openly. For both authors the eschatological expectation should lead to readiness through repentance* and holy living. The *Shepherd of Hermas extends the image of Isaiah 40:1-3, namely, that the way for the Lord's deliverance shall be made smooth, to include the heavens as well. God will remove heaven and all natural barriers that stand between the righteous and God's promises for the righteous, so that their way into their eternal possessions will be "made level" (Herm. Vis. 1.3.4).

See also ANGELS, HEAVENLY BEINGS, ANGEL CHRISTOLOGY; APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; ASCENSION; CREATION, COSMOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; EXALTATION, ENTHRONEMENT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Bietenhard, "οὐρανός," NIDNTT 2:188-96; D. A. deSilva, "The Construction and Social Function of a Counter-Cosmos in the Revelation of John," Forum 9:1-2 (1993) 47-61; P. Ellingworth, "Jesus and the Universe in Hebrews," EvQ 58 (1986) 337-50; T. H. Gaster, "Heaven," IDB 2:551-52; M. Himmelfarb, "Apocalyptic Ascent and the Heavenly Temple," SBLSP 26 (1987) 210-18; S. H. Hooke, "Heaven" in Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, ed. J. Hastings (New York: Scribner's, 1916) 1:530-33; C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); D. S. Russell, Divine Disclosure: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); J. W. Thompson, " 'That Which Abides': Some Metaphysical Assumptions in the Epistle to the Hebrews" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Vanderbilt University, 1974); H. Traub and G. von Rad, "οὐρανός," TDNT 5:497-543; D. F. Watson, "New Earth, New Heaven," ABD 4:1094-95. D. A. deSilva

HEAVENLY ASCENT. See APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM.

HEAVENLY BEINGS. See ANGELS, HEAVENLY BEINGS, ANGEL CHRISTOLOGY.

HEBREWS

Hebrews is a richly textured discourse addressed to a group of Christians who were experiencing a crisis of faith and a failure of nerve. The intended audience was almost certainly the members of a house church with a history of fidelity to Christ (Heb 10:32-34). These facts may be gleaned from the surface of the text. Although the character and location of the community addressed, the precise nature of the crisis to which Hebrews is a response, the circumstances and date of its composition, the literary genre of the discourse, and the purpose and plan of the work continue to be debated vigorously, no broad consensus has been reached.

All texts pose the challenge of reconstructing history from them. The only rational means by which this can be achieved is historical methodology, in which the historian's intuition is an essential component. This is particularly true in the case of Hebrews, which is distinctive in form and complex in literary structure. The early tradition concerning its authorship, purpose and intended audience is conflicting and unreliable. The evidence provided by the text lends itself to divergent interpretations. Any historical reconstruction must be proposed as tentative and exploratory in nature.

Patient interaction with the text and with the discussion it has prompted, especially during recent decades, supports the opinion that Hebrews is a sermon in response to circumstances in the life of the audience. The sermon throbs with an awareness of the privilege and the cost of Christian discipleship. It proves to be a sensitive pastoral response to the sagging faith* of seasoned and weary individuals who were in danger of abandoning their Christian commitments. The writer sought to strengthen them in the face of a new crisis so that they would hold fast to their confession* and stand firm in their faith. He warned them of the judgment* of God* they would incur if they were to falter in their commitments. His exhortations to covenant* faithfulness and unwavering perseverance were grounded in a fresh presentation of the significance of Jesus and his sacrificial death. As high priest and Son of God in solidarity with the human family, he is the supreme exemplar of faithfulness to God and of endurance, whose death on the cross secured for his people unlimited access to God and the assurance of divine help that arrives at the appropriate time.

1. Authorship
2. Audience
3. Circumstances and Date of Composition
4. Integrity
5. Genre
6. Literary Structural Devices
7. Purpose and Plan
8. Structural Function of Old Testament Texts
9. Canonical Recognition
10. Concluding Observations

1. Authorship.

Hebrews is anonymous, and the identity of the author has been veiled from the earliest period of the church.* Although it has been suggested that the author was Priscilla or some other woman (see Women), we are well advised to refer to the author as "he" in light of the masculine ending of the participle diēgoumenon in Hebrews 11:32. The writer was known to the community he addressed (Heb 13:19), but the brief personal notes in Hebrews 13 are not specific enough to reveal his identity.

The author clearly was not Paul, though presumably he moved within the Pauline circle (see Pauline Legacy and School) and expected to travel with Timothy (Heb 13:23). He classed himself as one who had not heard the Lord* deliver the message of salvation* (Heb 2:3-4). He was capable of writing some of the finest Greek in the NT, far superior in vocabulary and sentence construction to that of Paul. He also employs a distinctive range of images that are not found in Paul (Heb 2:1; 4:12, 13; 6:7-8, 19) and moves easily within the conceptual world of priesthood* and sacrifice,* emphases that are foreign to Paul's letters.

Among early church traditions we find the author of Hebrews identified as Paul, Barnabas, Luke or Clement of Rome.* Contemporary scholars have suggested Apollos, Silvanus, the deacon Philip,* Priscilla and Aquila, Jude, Aristion and others (see Moffatt). This variety of opinion shows that the limits of our historical knowledge preclude any certainty regarding the writer's identity. We are left to conclude that Hebrews was composed by a creative theologian, one well trained in the art of expounding the Greek Scriptures, whose thought world was shaped by, and whose vocabulary, traditions and theological conceptions were indebted to Hellenistic Judaism* and the early Hellenistic church.

We may draw a number of plausible inferences regarding the author from the composition of Hebrews. He was structured in his thought patterns, stating a thesis and then developing it through analysis. His reasoning powers were exceptional, as illustrated by the majestic opening sentence (Heb 1:1-4) that sets the program for the entire discourse. He was evidently trained in rhetoric* and understood speech as a medium of power to be used in the service of the gospel. He was able to deploy a rich vocabulary (169 of his 1,038 different words are found in the NT only in Hebrews) and a cultured diction. He had confidence in the persuasive power of oral speech as it is committed to the written text.

The writer's educational level may be compared with that of Philo* of Alexandria* and probably reflects training in a gymnasium or a private rhetorical school. Luke's description of Apollos as "an eloquent man" (Acts 18:24), a designation associated with formal rhetorical training and so used by Philo (see Philo Poster. C. 53; Leg. Gai. 142, 237, 310; Vit. Mos. 1.2), has suggested to many scholars that Apollos was the author of Hebrews.

The writer was an intensely devout man whose subconscious mind was steeped in the cultic categories and language of the Septuagint. He was also a pastoral theologian (see Pastoral Theology) who shaped early Christian tradition into an urgent appeal to a community in crisis. He was a gifted preacher and interpreter of salvation, a covenant theologian whose spiritual insight, scriptural exegesis and situational discernment provided encouragement, admonition and pastoral direction. He presents himself as a charismatic leader whose effectiveness did not depend on office or title. He at best wrote reluctantly, shaping his "word of exhortation" (Heb 13:22) as an effective substitute for his personal presence and immediate address. Our encounter with his discourse is fragmentary, for he does not present himself to us as he would have to his contemporaries.

2. Audience.

The attempt to establish a social and historical context for Hebrews is important for understanding its place within the life of an early Christian congregation. We must first sketch a profile of the audience on the basis of the evidence of the text itself.

2.1. The Audience in Profile. Hebrews was written with a specific local assembly in mind. The author is able to distinguish this assembly from its leaders and from other congregations in their social setting (Heb 13:17, 24), which was almost certainly an urban center (cf. Heb 13:14). This is borne out by the paraenetic concerns expressed in Hebrews 13:1-6, all of which are appropriate within an urban setting: hospitality* to Christian "strangers" (Heb 13:2), empathetic "remembering" of Christians imprisoned or suffering ill treatment (Heb 13:3), concern for the sanctity of marriage* and for sexual purity (Heb 13:4), and caution against greed and crass materialism (Heb 13:5-6).

The assembly was probably a house church (note "house" or "household" of God in Heb 3:6; 10:21) meeting in an ordinary room in a private home or apartment complex (insula; see Architecture). The group was small, perhaps numbering no more than fifteen or twenty persons, though it was probably part of a larger network of local assemblies scattered throughout the city. Their numbers had recently been depleted through defections (Heb 10:25).

The roots of the congregation may be traced to a Hellenistic synagogue* in the Jewish quarters of the city. Their primary source of authority* is the Hebrew Bible in an old Greek version. Their familiarity with the biblical narratives makes it possible for the writer to refer to the story of Esau without elaboration (Heb 12:17). In the opening lines of Hebrews the writer can presume to establish contact by presenting the transcendent Son of God (see Son of God; Sonship) in the distinctive vocabulary associated with divine Wisdom in the traditions of Hellenistic Judaism of the Diaspora (cf. Wis 7:24-27; see Diaspora Judaism).

Their spiritual, intellectual and social nurture in the Hellenistic synagogue is further borne out by the allusion to angels* as the heavenly mediators of the old revelation* (Heb 2:2). This notion, absent from Exodus 19—20 but hinted at in Deuteronomy 33:2 (cf. Ps 68:17), gained acceptance sometime prior to the first century and spread among Hellenistic Jews (cf. Acts 7:38, 53; Gal. 3:19; Josephus Ant. 15.5.3 §136). The centrality of the figure of Moses* in Hebrews corresponds with the veneration of Moses in Hellenistic Judaism (see The Exodus by the Hellenistic Jewish writer Ezekiel the Tragedian, preserved by Eusebius Praep. Ev. 9.29; and Philo Vit. Mos. 2.66-186; Rer. Div. Her. 182; Praem. Poen. 53, 56). In the Hellenistic Jewish tradition, Moses is the supreme exemplar of perfection because of his unique access to the unmediated presence of God, a feature that would explain Hebrews's sustained comparison of Moses and Jesus (see, e.g., Heb 3:1-6; 8:3-5; 12:18-29; 13:20).

2.2. Their Past Commitment and Present Crisis. The writer is well acquainted with the previous experience of his readers (see Heb 2:2-4; 5:11-14; 6:9-11; 10:32-34; 12:4; 13:7). They had been brought to faith through the preaching of some who had direct access to Jesus' ministry (Heb 2:3), and the testimony of these witnesses* had been endorsed by the tangible evidence of "signs and wonders," "various miracles" and "gifts of the Holy Spirit" (Heb 2:4). The community's reception of the spoken word and their experience of the "powers of the age to come" (Heb 6:5) had confirmed that, as with Israel,* God had constituted this Christian community by an act of revelation.

Those who first proclaimed the gospel to the community had become its first leaders (Heb 13:7). And although these first charismatic leaders were now deceased, the community's present response to their original proclamation is of utmost concern: "We must pay the closest attention, therefore, to what we have heard, so that we do not drift off course" (Heb 2:1).

Hebrews 2:1-4 is the first in a series of sections that addresses the audience in the light of their current situation (see Heb 3:7—4:13; 5:11—6:12; 10:19-39; 12:14-29). These sections form pauses in the discourse and are characterized by stern warning or urgent appeal. As such they also provide a window on the social and historical setting of Hebrews (see Social Setting). The admonition in Hebrews 2:1-4, for example, implies that the readers had grown lax in their commitment to the basic Christian message of salvation, a situation that severely threatened the stability and integrity of the community. They are summoned to recognize the solemn import of the message and reaffirm their allegiance to it.

Throughout Hebrews the writer is pastorally concerned that the community might falter in its response to the claim of God upon their lives, a concern that extends to individual members (Heb 3:12, 13; 4:1, 11; 6:11; 12:15). The congregation was most likely varied in its experience, disposition and maturity (cf. Heb 12:13, 15), and the admonition to "encourage one another every day" (Heb 3:13) may presuppose a daily gathering of the household* fellowship* as the occasion for mutual encouragement.

The paraenetic unity of Hebrews 5:11—6:12 sheds further light on the circumstances. In Hebrews 5:11 the group is charged with spiritual lethargy ("you have become sluggish in understanding" [or, "hard of hearing"]), and this becomes the occasion for a resumed stress on the importance of listening to the voice of God (cf. Heb 2:1; 3:7-8, 15; 4:1-2, 7). This spiritual inertia and apathy must be checked before it undercuts their faith, hope* and obedience.*

The indictment of Hebrews 5:12, "You are at the stage of needing milk and not solid food," is probably ironical (see Milk). Although interpreters often understand this as the author's considered estimation of his readers' current condition, this is difficult to reconcile with his determination to respond to them as mature believers (Heb 6:1, 3). It is more likely that he is employing biting irony to call them to acknowledge their maturity and thus reckon with their ethical,* theological and social responsibilities as Christians in an urban society.

In Hebrews 5:13 the community is described as "unskilled in the word of righteousness." The meaning of this expression is unlocked by Polycarp's* use of this precise expression in Letter to the Philippians 9.1, where, as in Hebrews, it is associated with a call to endurance.* For Polycarp the "word of righteousness" is the paramount lesson in holiness* that Christians must be prepared for the cost of discipleship, even if that cost extends to martyrdom.* The use of the phrase in Hebrews 5:13 suggests that the threat of renewed suffering,* perhaps even of martyrdom, has brought about a crisis of faith and a failure of nerve. In Hebrews 10:32-34 the writer appeals to their past and valiant commitment to Christ and to one another under the pressure of public abuse as a paradigm for their responding to renewed perils. But the indelible memory of past suffering and loss may account for some now deserting the assembly (Heb 10:25) and a general inclination to avoid contact with outsiders (Heb 5:12).

The likelihood of this threat of persecution* is enhanced by the catalog of martyrs in Hebrews 11:35-38, crowned with the reference to Jesus, who endured a cross,* disregarding the shame of crucifixion (Heb 12:2-3; 13:12). The use of agonistic (i.e., conflict-oriented) vocabulary is intentional (Heb 12:4), for it prepares readers to risk public identification with Jesus, bearing the shame he bore (Heb 13:12-13).

2.3. Their Social Location. Proposals for locating the audience have ranged from Jerusalem* in the East to Spain in the West. But there are good reasons for placing them in or around Rome.* The only NT parallel to "Those from Italy greet you" (Heb 13:24) is found in Acts 18:2. There the phrase "from Italy" is used of Aquila and Priscilla, who were currently in Corinth and had departed "from Italy," namely, Rome, because of the Claudian expulsion (see 3.3 below). Thus the most natural way of reading Hebrews 13:24 is as a greeting from certain Italian Christians who are currently absent from their homeland that is being communicated by the author to the members of the house church in or near Rome.

This judgment is supported by several additional lines of evidence: the allusions to the readers' generosity (Heb 6:10-11; 10:33-34) comport with the known character of Roman Christianity (cf. Ign. Rom. salutation; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23.10); the sufferings endured by the believers shortly after they came to faith (Heb 10:32-34) suggest the events surrounding the Claudian expulsion of A.D. 49 (Acts 18:2; Suetonius Claudius 25.4); the use of the term hēgoumenoi for leaders in the community (Heb 13:7, 17, 24) is found in early Christian documents associated with Rome (e.g., 1 Clem. 21.6; Herm. Vis. 2.2.6; 3.9.7); and the first evidence of Hebrews' recognized authority comes to us from Clement of Rome, who throughout his letter produces striking parallels to Hebrews and is literarily dependent upon Hebrews in 1 Clement 36.1-6.

This construction of social location cannot be proven, yet it provides a concreteness to Hebrews that other hypotheses lack, and it offers a plausible destination that may be tested exegetically. We may also fill out the picture by invoking what is known concerning the Jewish community and the early house churches in Rome. There is little doubt that Roman Christianity was originally Jewish. It is striking that the fourth-century commentator on Romans, Ambrosiaster, attests to Gentile* Christians in Rome who came to faith through the evangelistic outreach of the original Jewish converts of the earliest Roman community (Exposition of Romans, prologue, 2 [CSEL 81.1.5-6]). By the time Paul wrote his letter to the Romans, there had been a significant influx of Gentile Christians in Rome, and the balance of power had shifted to Gentile leadership. In Romans 16:3-15 Paul gives us evidence for the existence of several house churches in Rome (see Rom 16:3-5, 10, 11, 14, 15).

Archaeological investigation has uncovered the remains of apartment complexes (insulae) several stories high that date to the second and third centuries. Incorporated into the walls or preserved below the floors of at least three of the existing titular churches in Rome are the remnants of large tenement houses (see Architecture; Rome, Roman Christianity). The ground floors would have been occupied by shops and the upper levels by prosperous families. Craftsmen and artisans such as Aquila and Priscilla might well have lived in such quarters, which served as workshop, residence and meeting place. From Paul's greetings in Romans 16:3-15 we may picture a number of relatively small household fellowships only loosely related to one another. Evidence indicates that even in the early second century the congregations of Rome were not centrally organized under the administrative authority of a single bishop. Ignatius* insists on the importance of the office of bishop in six of his seven letters to churches (see Church Order), but he is silent on this matter in his letter to the Romans (Ign. Rom., c. 110), presumably because there was no monarchical bishop in Rome. Shortly thereafter the *Shepherd of Hermas refers only to "the elders who preside over the church" at Rome (Herm. Vis. 2.4.3; 3.9.7).

The setting we have sketched suggests why the Roman church may have been troubled by problems of diversity, disunity and a tendency toward independence. In Hebrews we see evidence of tension between the intended audience and the recognized leaders (Heb 13:17-18) and a pastoral concern to bring the two groups together (Heb 13:24). The members of the house church are not to regard themselves as an autonomous assembly or to isolate themselves from other household groups within the city, and as a countermeasure the writer asks them to convey his greetings "to all the saints" throughout the city (Heb 13:24).

3. Circumstances and Date of Composition.

3.1. Circumstances of Composition. In reconstructing the circumstances surrounding the composition of Hebrews, we are left to rely on the document itself. What is the precise relationship of the writer to his audience? The answer is difficult to discern, but in Hebrews 13:17-19 the writer identifies himself with the "leaders" of the community. He considers his pastoral responsibility, epitomized in his "word of exhortation" (Heb 13:22), to extend to the congregation. And his desire to be "restored to you sooner" (Heb 13:19) implies his personal acquaintance with them. His discourse (Heb 1:1—13:21) and personal note (Heb 13:22-25) are intended as a substitute for his presence until he can come in person (Heb 13:19, 23).

We have already noted that the assembly was in crisis. Their numbers had been depleted (Heb 10:25), and those who remained were subject to a loss of confidence in their convictions. Their former sense of identity as the new covenant people of God had been undermined, and in the writer's analysis they are no longer listening to the voice of God (Heb 2:1, 3; 3:7—4:14; 5:11; 12:25). Their formerly bold commitment in the face of public abuse, imprisonment and loss of property (Heb 10:32-34) has given way to discouragement (Heb 5:11; 6:12; 12:12-13) and a weariness of sustaining their Christian confession in the face of hostility (Heb 12:3-4).

The writer is alarmed at the group's attraction to traditions that he regarded as inconsistent with the word of God proclaimed by their former leaders (Heb 13:7-9). This may account for the tension between the community and their current leaders (Heb 13:1, 17-18), and it may also explain their apparent isolation and lack of accountability to the larger network of house churches (Heb 13:24). These factors would have exposed them to the corrosive impact of their sociopolitical and religious environment.

We should probably understand Hebrews to be addressing the concerns of second-generation Christians. The root of the problem may have been the delay of the Parousia* (Heb 10:25, 35-39), social ostracism and impending persecution (Heb 12:4; 13:13-14) or a general waning of enthusiasm and erosion of confidence (Heb 3:14; 10:35). A significant symptom was the faltering of hope (Heb 3:6; 6:11, 18-20; 10:23-25; 11:1), and the writer sensed the grave danger of apostasy* among some members, which he defined as turning away from the living God (Heb 3:12) and subjecting Jesus Christ to public contempt (Heb 6:4-6; 10:26-31). Once the sacred covenant bond between God and his people was violated, they would be excluded from covenant fellowship. Weaker members might reject the grace* of God and forfeit participation in the new covenant through personal carelessness (Heb 3:12-13; 4:1, 11; 6:4-8, 11; 10:26-31; 12:15-17, 25-29). These factors might well account for the urgent tone and pastoral strategies adopted by the writer.

3.2. Date of Composition: General Considerations. In assigning a date for the composition of Hebrews, we must first allow for the fact that both the writer and his audience had come to faith through the preaching of those who had heard Jesus (Heb 2:3-4) and had subsequently served as leaders during the formative period of the community (Heb 13:7). Further, we learn that the present members had been believers for an extended time (Heb 5:12). If we allow that at least three or four decades have elapsed since the beginning of the Christian movement, the earliest date we can assign for the composition of Hebrews would be around A.D. 60.

In seeking to establish an upper limit for a date of composition we need to consider the use of Hebrews in 1 Clement (see 1 Clem. 17.1 for the use of Heb 11:37; 1 Clem. 36.2-6 for direct literary dependence on Heb 1:3-5, 7; 1 Clem. 36.3 for the quotation of Ps 104:4 [103 LXX] in the precise wording of Heb 1:7 [in variation from the LXX]). Internal evidence and external attestation indicate that 1 Clement was composed some time between 80 and 140 (for issues of dating, see Clement of Rome). Thus no firm inference concerning the date for the composition of Hebrews may be drawn from its use by Clement of Rome.

Some scholars have set an upper limit at 70, the year in which the Jerusalem temple* was destroyed by Titus. This conclusion is based on the writer's referring to cultic activity in the present tense (e.g., Heb 7:27-28; 8:3-5; 9:7-8, 25; 10:1-3, 8; 13:10-11) and the presumption that cultic activity was being carried out in Jerusalem. But the writer shows no interest in the Jerusalem temple or in contemporary sacrificial praxis. In Hebrews 9:1-10, for example, the focus is on the tabernacle* in the wilderness rather than the temple. Since the sanctuary is considered in relation to the old and new covenants and the contrast between the two, the writer refers to the tabernacle (and its association with the old Sinai covenant) rather than to the temple (see Heb 8:5). The use of the present tense evokes a sense of timelessness rather than indicating a continuing temple cult in Jerusalem. (Such use of a "timeless" present tense to describe the temple and its sacrifices after the temple had been destroyed may be observed in Josephus Ant. 4.8.17-23 §§224-57; 1 Clem. 41.2; Barn. 7—8; Diogn. 3.) It has no bearing on the dating of Hebrews.

3.3. The Edict of Claudius. The most explicit reference to a specific event in the audience's past occurs in Hebrews 10:32-34. This description of the suffering endured is congruent with the hardships borne by the Jewish Christians who were expelled from Rome by the emperor Claudius in A.D. 49. Among them were the Jewish Christian leaders Aquila and Priscilla, who arrived in Corinth about 49 or 50 "because Claudius had commanded all the Jews to leave Rome" (Acts 18:2). This edict of expulsion is known from Suetonius, who in his Lives of the Caesars (A.D. 120) comments on Claudius's official actions toward certain foreign groups in Rome: Iudaeos impulsore Chresto adsidue tumultuantes Roma expulit (Suetonius Claudius 25.4). This may be translated in either of two ways: "He expelled from Rome the Jews constantly making disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus," or "Since the Jews constantly made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus, he expelled them from Rome." Suetonius's comment can be interpreted to mean that either Claudius expelled only those responsible for the disturbances among the Jews, or the entire Jewish community in Rome was affected by the edict because they had been implicated in frequent rioting. The first translation is preferred because in Rome the Jewish community was divided into a number of district synagogues. In all probability the edict of expulsion was directed to the members of one or two specific synagogues, who would have been compelled to leave the city until there was a guarantee of no further social disturbances.

Although Chrestus was a common name among Roman slaves,* signifying "good" or "useful," it was not a recognized Jewish name. The garbled reference to "Chrestus" is almost certainly evidence of the presence of Christians within the Jewish community of Rome. The confusion between Chrestus and Christus ("the Messiah") is understandable, since in antiquity the distinction in spelling and pronunciation was negligible. There is every reason to believe that the source of the disruptions was the Jewish Christian preaching* of a crucified Jesus as Messiah. We can well imagine members of the Jewish community being thrown into violent debate, and this attracting the unfavorable attention of the imperial authorities. Claudius issued a decree of expulsion affecting those most directly involved (i.e., those Jewish Christians labeled under the name of Chrestus). Insult, public abuse and the loss of property were normal under the conditions of a decree of expulsion. If this reading of the evidence is correct, some of the recipients of Hebrews were Jewish Christians who had shared banishment from Rome with Aquila and Priscilla.

The date of the Claudian edict is contested, but the year 49 is plausible. It was in the period 47-52 that Claudius engaged in a campaign to restore the old Roman rites (see Religions, Greco-Roman) and to check the spread of foreign cults. Independent corroboration of this date is provided by the Gallio inscription from Delphi, which has made it possible to determine when Paul entered Corinth and made the acquaintance of Aquila and Priscilla, who had arrived in Corinth from Rome "only recently" (Acts 18:1-2). We conclude that the experience referred to in Hebrews 10:32-34 took place in 49.

Hebrews was written at a later time in which a new crisis had emerged, posing its own threat to the welfare of the members of the house church. The fear of death (Heb 2:15), loss of heart (Heb 12:3) and the fact that the community had not yet contended to the point of bloodshed (Heb 12:4; cf. Heb 11:35—12:3) suggest a situation more serious than that under Claudius. This suggests the persecution and martyrdom endured by Roman Christians under Nero following the devastating fire of 64 (Tacitus Annals 15.42-44). Christians then experienced the loss of life, not simply property. Hebrews appears to have been composed for members of a house church that had not yet borne the brunt of Nero's repressive measures, or less probably, for Jewish Christians who returned to Rome after that terrifying event. This suggests a tentative date of composition in the interval between the great fire of Rome (64) and Nero's suicide in June 68. Incidental features of the text, such as the imminent expectation of the Parousia (Heb 10:25, 36-39) or the notice of Timothy's release from prison (Heb 13:23), are consistent with this relatively early dating of Hebrews.

4. Integrity.

Few scholars have doubted the integrity of Hebrews 1—12, but questions have been raised concerning the authenticity of Hebrews 13 (for discussion, see Filson). The reasons are several: the chapter appears to begin abruptly and is marked by a sharp change in tone and theme; it appears to lack the writer's normal care to link a new section to the preceding unit of exhortation (Heb 12:14-29); the form of the chapter, marked by catechetical precepts characteristic of the paraenesis of Paul or Peter (e.g., 1 Thess 5:12-22; Rom 12:9-21; 13:8-10; 1 Pet 3:8-12), is without parallel in Hebrews 1—12; and its contents distinguish this section from the rest of the Hebrews.

Nevertheless Hebrews 13 exhibits the characteristic vocabulary and significant concepts, the appeal to the Pentateuch and Psalms and the elements of structure that are found in Hebrews 1—12. This constitutes a strong, cumulative argument for the authenticity of Hebrews 13.

A number of literary devices form a literary signature that identifies the author of Hebrews 13 as the author of Hebrews 1—12: the use of chiastic structure (Heb 13:2, 4, 10, 14, and 10-16); paronomasia, or play on words (Heb 13:2, 18, 20, 22); unusual word order designed to arouse attention (Heb 13:8, 11, 20); elegant style (Heb 13:17); linguistic rhythm (Heb 13:3); assonance (Heb 13:4, 5, 9, 13, 14, 16); alliterative arrangement of lines (Heb 13:5, 19); the use of syntax to display emphasis (Heb 13:3, 4, 5, 9, 11, 15, 18, 20) and the use of classical idioms (Heb 13:2, 5, 15, 17).

Hebrews 13 not only was composed by the same writer as Hebrews 1—12 but also was designed to accompany the preceding discourse. Its essential message can scarcely be separated from the primary concerns and conceptual themes expressed in Hebrews 1—12. The connection of Hebrews 13:1-21 to the preceding section (Heb 12:14-29) is established through Hebrews 12:28, where the community is called to serve God through thanksgiving. This concept of worship* is an expansive one, and the varied aspects of life (Heb 13:1-21) are to be regarded as an expression of devoted service* to God.

5. Genre.

The canonical ordering of Hebrews among the letters of the NT predisposes one to regard this document as a letter. This understanding of Hebrews can be traced back as early as the beginning of the third century and the Chester Beatty Papyrus (P^{46}), where Hebrews is positioned after Romans and before 1 Corinthians and is identified by the superscription "To the Hebrews" (cf. the uncials B A C H I K P, where it appears after 2 Thessalonians and before 1 Timothy).

Hebrews does not possess the form of an ancient letter (see Letters). It lacks the conventional prescript of a letter and has none of the characteristic features of ordinary letters from this period. The writer offers no opening prayer for grace and peace,* no expression of thanksgiving or blessing.* Its beginning with a stately periodic sentence acclaiming the transcendent dignity of the Son of God through whom God spoke his final word (Heb 1:1-4) is more characteristic of rhetorical discourse that compels attention and engages a reader or auditor immediately. Hebrews begins like a sermon.

5.1. The Homily or Sermon Form. The writer confirms the sermonic genre when he describes the discourse as a "word of exhortation" (Heb 13:22), an idiomatic expression for a sermon in Hellenistic-Jewish and early Christian circles, where the public reading of Scripture was followed by preaching (cf. Acts 13:15 with Acts 13:16-41). Hebrews may be classified as a paraenetic homily in the Hellenistic-Jewish synagogue tradition (see Thyen). As such it is the oldest complete early Christian sermon that has been preserved. It possesses the eloquence of a discourse but the form of a homily. Like the paraenetic homilies of its period, Hebrews consists of strong encouragement and stern warning.

5.2. Defining the Genre. Recent research has identified a common form of Hellenistic-Jewish and early Christian oral sermon. The synagogue hortatory homily, or "word of exhortation," found in Acts 13:16-41 follows a threefold pattern: authoritative exempla (i.e., evidence in the form of biblical quotations, examples from the past or present, or reasoned exposition set out to commend the points that follow); a conclusion inferred from the preceding examples, indicating their relevance for the audience; a final exhortation. This threefold pattern can be found in many early Christian writings (Hebrews; 1 Clement; other speeches in Acts; 1 Cor 10:1-14; 2 Cor 6:14—7:1; 1 Peter* and 2 Peter,* the letters of Ignatius; *Barnabas) and in Jewish sources from the Hellenistic period (see Lane, lxxii).

This oral form was flexible and could be developed in a variety of ways. It could stand alone, as in Acts 13:16-41, or it could be extended in a cyclical fashion as the pattern is repeated in a longer sermon (e.g., Heb 1:5—4:16; 8:1—12:28; 1 Clem. 4.1-13; 37.2—40.1; Ign. Eph. 3.1—4.2; 5.1-36; 7.2—10.1). Hebrews appears to follow a modified form of the latter pattern, creating in the process a complex sermonic text.

The study of Hebrews in light of Greco-Roman rhetoric, as outlined in the handbooks of Aristotle, Quintilian and Cicero, reveals the manner in which Hebrews addressed its hearers with the intent to persuade (cf. Aristotle Rhetoric 1.2.1355B). Hebrews exhibits highly nuanced and sophisticated forms of proof. In its various hortatory cycles, in which complementary ideas are augmented with multiple arguments, the writer engages in what the rhetorical handbooks call amplification or refinement.

Even the lengthy interruption in the "word of exhortation" of Hebrews 5:1—10:18, where the writer turns from the established hortatory pattern to present an extended exposition, finds explanation in the rhetorical setting. The writer aims not only to exhort his audience but also to stimulate and fortify them in their present convictions on the basis of an exposition of the surpassing, unrepeatable priestly sacrifice of Jesus for the sins of the many.

An alternative approach takes note of the formal pattern that serves as a structuring device in important sections of Hebrews (Heb 3:1—4:16; 8:1—10:18; 12:1-13). The pattern consists of formal introduction (e.g., Heb 3:1-6; 8:1-6; 12:1-3), scriptural citation (e.g., Heb 3:7-11; 8:7-13; 12:4-6), exposition or thematic elaboration (e.g., Heb 3:12—4:13; Heb 9:1—10:18; Heb 12:7-11) and application (e.g., Heb 4:14-16; 10:19-21; 12:12-13). This pattern has left its partial imprint in other portions of Hebrews as well (e.g., Heb 7:1-28). This genre of "word of exhortation" (Heb 13:22; Acts 13:15), or "paraclesis" (i.e., "exhortation"), emerged in the hellenistic synagogue, where it served to actualize traditional Scripture for a Jewish community in a nontraditional environment. The writer of Hebrews adapted this form in order to confirm the values and commitments of a group of Christians who were experiencing social ostracism and alienation in their environment.

5.3. The Impact of the Sermonic Discourse. The writer of Hebrews skillfully projected the impression that he was present with the gathered audience, delivering the sermon. Until the postscript (Heb 13:22-25), he studiously avoids any reference to writing or reading, which would tend to emphasize his geographical distance from the audience. Instead the accent is on speaking and listening, and he directly identifies himself with the audience and establishes a sense of presence (Heb 2:5; 5:11; 6:9; 8:1; 9:5; 11:32).

As a gifted preacher, the writer skillfully employs alliteration, oratorical imperatives, euphonic phrases, unusual word order and literary devices, all calibrated for rhetorical effectiveness. The alternation between exposition and exhortation provides an effective vehicle for oral impact. As the discourse was read aloud to the gathered assembly, Hebrews would have communicated its point as much aurally as logically.

Interpreters should be aware of the difference between oral preaching and written discourse. The dynamic relationship between speaker and audience is distinct in each case. The writer expressly declares in Hebrews 13:22 that his "word of exhortation" has been reduced to writing. As such, it is available for study to a modern reader, taking on a life of its own independent of the audience for whom it was written. But it is clear that this was not the writer's intention. It is also clear that the writer would have preferred to have spoken directly with the men and women he addressed (Heb 13:19, 23). In the realm of oral speech, the speaker and the auditors are bound together in a dynamic relationship within a world of sound. Although forced by geographical distance and a sense of urgency to reduce his homily to writing, the writer of Hebrews never loses sight of the power of the spoken word.

5.4. Rhetorical Analysis. In Hebrews the voice of the writer is the voice of the speaker. It was essential to provide verbal clues to enable the audience to discern where one unit of the discourse ended and another began. These verbal clues were also necessary for the reader, because in ancient documents there was no indication where parts of a composition began or ended. Thus the organization of the argument was revealed by devices such as repetition, anaphora, inclusio, responsio, parallelism, catchwords (or "hook words") and the like. By attending to these clues, the one reading the discourse to the assembled group could give the discourse a coherent delivery. Hebrews was crafted not for the eye but for the ear, and its forceful, artistic prose provided the vehicle for the argument.

It is attractive to view Hebrews as a deliberative discourse since it consists of advising and dissuading (cf. Quintilian Inst. Orat. 3.8.6). Hebrews includes a rhetorical prooemium (prologue, Heb 1:1-4), narratio (necessary background information, Heb 1:5—2:18) with the propositio (a lucid thematic statement, or the statement that is to be proved, Heb 2:17-18), argumentatio with probatio and refutatio (argumentation with the presentation of proof and refutation, Heb 3:1—12:29), peroratio (peroration, Heb 13:1-21) and postscriptum (postscript, Heb 13:22-25) that identifies the discourse in Hebrews 1:1—13:21 as an exhortation or urgent appeal (see Rhetoric).

It is difficult, however, to classify Hebrews as a specific type of ancient rhetoric. Deliberative rhetoric attempts to persuade an audience to make a choice on the basis of some future benefit or to dissuade them from inappropriate action. This type of rhetoric agrees with the earnest pastoral character of much of Hebrews. Epideictic rhetoric, however, is concerned with reinforcing beliefs accepted by the audience. The tone is more instructive, seeking to buttress a set of convictions already embraced. This also is a feature of Hebrews and may be observed in the exhortation not to cast aside the confidence and hope once firmly held, for the One who had promised is faithful (e.g., Heb 3:6, 14; 10:23, 35-39; 11:11).

The state of research is such that no one has yet produced a structural analysis of the homily that conforms strictly to the type of rhetoric discussed in the ancient Greco-Roman handbooks. We must conclude that Hebrews resists being cast into any single mold of classical rhetoric. Although rhetorical devices are clearly discernible, an identifiable rhetorical structure is less evident. The writer of Hebrews (like Paul and Philo) was not bound by rhetorical conventions. He freely adapted rhetorical conventions to suit his purposes.

5.5 Discourse Analysis. As a written communication, Hebrews lends itself to discourse, or text-linguistic, analysis. As a technique of biblical criticism, discourse analysis is in its infancy. Discourse analysis is concerned with semantic cohesion, the relationships within a unit of discourse and the identification of unit boundaries within a discourse. Its primary goal is an understanding of the individual paragraphs that constitute the building blocks of a discourse. This is based on the premise that the paragraph, rather than individual semantic units like words, phrases or sentences, provides the key to understanding the total (or main) discourse. A writer organizes sentences to form larger semantic units (i.e., paragraphs) that are assigned a variety of semantic functions in the development of the discourse.

The fundamental assumption of discourse analysis is that written texts originate in a writer's conceptualization of a theme. This theme is given expression by linguistic choices (diction, grammar, style), which lend meaning and structure to paragraph units. In order to comprehend the writer's development of his theme, it is necessary to examine the text on the lexical, syntactic and rhetorical levels. Discourse analysis attempts to understand how a writer linguistically marked his paragraphs and embedded discourses (i.e., those identifiable, distinct units of discourse that have a beginning and an end) in the process of developing the main discourse. (For further discussion, see Structuralism and Discourse Analysis.)

One analysis of Hebrews has identified a discourse structure that may be broadly outlined as follows:

Thematic introduction (Heb 1:1-4)
Point 1 (embedded discourse 1, Heb 1:5—4:13)
Point 2 (embedded discourse 2, Heb 4:14—10:18)
Peak (embedded discourse 3, Heb 10:19—13:19)
Conclusion (Heb 13:20-21)
Finis (Heb 13:22-25)

According to this analysis, Hebrews comprises three major embedded discourses bracketed by an introduction and a conclusion. The formal closing at the end of the homily is unrelated semantically to the thematic development of the discourse (for further details, see Lane, lxxx-lxxxiv; Vanhoye).

It must be emphasized that discourse analysis represents a purely linguistic approach that takes into account such factors as literary devices, shifts in genre, the semantic cohesion of individual sections, the functional role of subsections and the development of the discourse. It is not concerned with social or historical factors that may have affected the surface structure of the discourse. One of its major contributions to understanding Hebrews lies in its identification of techniques that not only effect a transition but also give cohesion to a unit of discourse.

6. Literary Structural Devices.

The literary structure of Hebrews is complex and elusive. The range of proposals concerning its literary structure attests to the artistic and literary complexity of this discourse. Nevertheless the quest for a literary structure is legitimate and assumes that there were literary and rhetorical conventions for the orderly arrangement of a discourse and that in reducing the discourse to writing verbal clues would need to be provided to assist the auditors in following the argument (see Lane, lxxxiv-xcviii).

The writer of Hebrews has used a number of literary devices to indicate the beginning and ending of unified sections. These verbal clues to the development of Hebrews may be enumerated as follows:

(1) Announcement of subject. The writer announces the primary theme just prior to the introduction of the unit in which the theme is developed. For example in Hebrews 2:17 Jesus is designated a "merciful and faithful high priest in the service of God." These primary themes are developed in inverse order. In Hebrews 3:1—5:10 the writer directs attention to Jesus as "faithful" (Heb 3:1-4:13) and then to Jesus as "merciful" (Heb 4:14—5:10).

(2) Transitional hook words. Hook words were a rhetorical device developed in antiquity to tie together two or more blocks of material. The introduction of a key word at the end of one section and its repetition at the beginning of the next served to mark formally the transition between the two units (e.g., "the angels" in Heb 1:4/5 joins the sections Heb 1:1-4/5-14).

(3) Change of genre. The writer alternates between exposition and exhortation throughout the discourse.

(4) Characteristic terms. The concentration of key vocabulary or of cognate terms within a unit of discourse frequently serves to articulate and develop a primary theme. For example, the term angels is found eleven times in Hebrews 1:5—2:16 and only twice after that. This density of usage serves to build cohesion in a block of material.

(5) Inclusio. Bracketing a unit of discourse by the repetition of a striking expression or key word at the beginning and close of a section provides an objective means of determining the beginning and end of a unit of discourse. For example, the repetition of the verb "to see" and the noun "unbelief" in Hebrews 3:12 and 19 marks Hebrews 3:12-19 as a discrete literary unit of commentary on the biblical text found in Hebrews 3:7-11.

7. Purpose and Plan.

The purpose and plan of Hebrews is integrally related to the literary structure of the document. The key issue is the distinctive role assigned by the writer to the expository and hortatory sections of the homily. How is the writer's essential purpose served by the blocks of exposition or of exhortation throughout the discourse? What is the intended relationship between the indicative and the imperative, between thesis and paraenesis, within the total work?

There are sound reasons for arguing that in Hebrews paraenesis takes precedence over thesis in expressing the writer's purpose. Argumentation serves exhortation. Hebrews may be designated a pastorally oriented sermon whose goal is given expression in the paraenetic sections of the discourse. When the writer characterized his entire discourse as paraenesis or paraclesis (Heb 13:22, "my word of exhortation" [paraklēsis]), he was identifying his work as an earnest, passionate and personal appeal. The writer's biblical and theological exposition is therefore subordinate to his paraenetic purpose. Hebrews was composed to arouse, urge, encourage and exhort the audience to maintain their Christian confession and to dissuade them from a course of action the writer regarded as catastrophic. The writer calls them to fidelity and obedience and seeks to prepare them for suffering.

The primary function of the exposition is thematic development. The primary function of the exhortation is to motivate the community to appropriate action. Exhortation confronts, with implications for obedience and disobedience. Exposition instructs, showing why obedience will be amply rewarded. In Hebrews, exposition provides an essential foundation for the exhortation and ultimately serves a hortatory purpose. The expository units of the discourse do not stand on their own but furnish the presupposition for the paraenesis. At the same time, the persuasive force of the exhortation is derived from the convincing thematic development in the expository sections of the sermon. The basis for the exhortation in Hebrews 2:1-4, for example, is provided in the demonstration of the superior dignity of God's Son in Hebrews 1:5-14.

As we have argued, the purpose of Hebrews is to strengthen, encourage and exhort the weary members of a house church to respond courageously to the prospect of renewed suffering in view of the gifts and resources God has lavished upon them. The plan of the homily complements its practical purpose. The finality of God's revelation in his Son is set forth in moving language (Heb 1:1-4). The transcendent dignity of the Son is superior both to the angels (Heb 1:5-14) and to Moses (Heb 3:1-6). Within this setting the writer warns his auditors against indifference to the gospel message they have heard (Heb 2:1-4) or blatant unbelief (Heb 3:7—4:13). The unique priesthood of Jesus is introduced in Hebrews 2:17—3:1 and Hebrews 4:14—5:10, and it is treated at length in Hebrews 7:1—10:18. Three contrasts are developed that demonstrate the superior dignity of Jesus as priest and sacrifice: the temporal, ephemeral character of the Aaronic priesthood is overshadowed by the eternal ministry of the priest like Melchizedek* (Heb 5:1-10; 7:1-28); the priestly ministry in the tabernacle of the old covenant is superseded by the priestly ministry of Jesus in the heavenly sanctuary of the new covenant (Heb 8:1—9:28); the inadequacy of the sacrifices under the law* is contrasted with the efficacy and finality of Jesus' sacrifice (Heb 10:1-18).

The thematic development of Jesus' priesthood and unique sacrifice is foundational to the paraenetic warnings concerning the peril of immaturity and apostasy, which can be avoided only through faith, endurance and hope (Heb 5:11—6:20; 10:19-39). The audience is exhorted to steadfast endurance and the exercise of eschatological* faith that acts in light of the certainty of the future (Heb 11:1—12:3). The heroes and heroines of the past, whose faith was attested by God (Heb 11:1-40), are paraded before the audience. This appeal is then crowned by the supreme example of faith, Jesus himself (Heb 12:1-3). In the pastoral and theological climax to the sermon (Heb 12:14-29), the congregation is warned of the peril of refusing God's gracious word. A concluding exhortation summons them to a lifestyle of worship and unqualified identification with the confessing community (Heb 13:1-25).

Any analysis of the plan of Hebrews must reflect an intensive listening to the detail of the text. The analysis in figure 2 attempts to distinguish between thesis and paraenesis and to indicate the primacy of paraenesis in the discourse by italicizing the five warning passages that expose the danger to which the community was vulnerable (Heb 2:1-4; 3:7—19; 5:11—6:12; 10:19-39; 12:14-29). The passages listed in the right-hand column point out the extent to which Hebrews has been organized around paraenesis.

8. Structural Function of Old Testament Texts. Every chapter in Hebrews is marked by explicit or implicit references to the OT text (for a full discussion, see Old Testament in Hebrews; Thomas). The writer's use of Scripture expresseshis firm belief in the continuity between God's speaking and action under the old and new covenants which has urgent ramifications for Israel and for the church. A detailed knowledge of the OT is indispensable for following what the writer of Hebrews was endeavoring to say, for he assumes on the part of his audience a deep familiarity with the detail of the biblical text.

The argument of Hebrews is focused upon a succession of OT themes and figures so as to draw out both the continuity and the discontinuity between the period prior to the coming of Christ and the time of fulfillment in Christ. In the course of Hebrews a number of OT texts gain particular prominence. The rhetorical use of these OT texts defines the arrangement and the argument of Hebrews as a whole.

The writer appears to have arranged his argument as a series of six scriptural explications, each of which is framed by exhortation. He introduces a key biblical text, clarifies its eschatological significance and draws out the paraenetic implications for the community. This rhetorical strategy accounts for the arrangement of the entire discourse from Hebrews 2:5 to Hebrews 13:19. The argument is directed to the eschatological appeal for unqualified faithfulness in light of the fact that Christ's high-priestly ministry* has now secured the promised "good things" (Heb 9:11). Once this is recognized, the structural organization is clearly perceived. It is evident that the paraenetic passages are grouped fairly uniformly in proximity to the six primary scriptural quotations (see figure 1).

Section	OT Text	Placement	Paraenesis
Introduction
1:1—2:4	Catena		2:1-4
First Point:	"You Crowned Him"
2:5-18	Ps 8	2:6-8
Second Point:	"Today"
3:1—4:13	Ps 95	3:7-11	3:1-2, 12-14 4:1, 11
Third Point:	"A Priest Forever"
4:14—7:28	Ps 110	5:6	4:14-16 5:11—6:12
Fourth Point:	"A New Covenant"
8:1—10:31	Jer 31	8:8-12	10:19-29
Fifth Point:	"By Faith"
10:32—12:2	Hab 2	10:37-38	10:32-36 12:1-2
Sixth Point:	"Do Not Lose Heart"
12:3—13:19	Prov 3	12:5-6	12:3-29 13:1-19
Closing
13:20-21

Fig. 1. Six Primary OT Texts

This analysis demonstrates the consistency of the paraenesis in Hebrews 10:19—13:19 with the earlier sections of the discourse. It displays the same rhetorical arrangement and permits the argument of the homily to proceed directly to its crowning paraenetic conclusion.

An appreciation of the thematic development, of the form of certain segments and of the transitions between sections often depends on an understanding of the function of OT texts in defining the arrangement and argument in Hebrews.

The manner in which the writer makes use of the OT shows that he stands in the mainstream of Judaism* and early Jewish Christianity.* The distinctiveness of his interpretation of Scripture was determined by his Christian theology of the interrelationship of history, eschatology and revelation. But the principles that guided his approach to the OT text and the forms of exposition he adopted were drawn from synagogue preaching. It is safe to assume that his audience was thoroughly familiar with the approaches to the scriptural text that char-

	Thesis	Paraenesis
1:1—2:18	I. The Revelation of God Through His Son
1:1-4	A. God Has Spoken His Ultimate Word in His Son
1:5-14	B. The Transcendent Dignity of the Son
2:1-4		C. The First Warning: The Peril of Ignoring the Word Delivered by the Son
2:5-9	D. The Humiliation and Glory of the Son
2:10-18	E. The Solidarity of the Son with the Human Family
3:1—5:10	II. The High Priestly Character of the Son
3:1-6		A. Consider That Jesus Was Faithful to God Who Appointed Him
3:7-19		B. The Second Warning: The Peril of Refusing to Believe God's Word
4:1-14		C. Strive to Enter God's Rest, the Sabbath Celebration for the People of God
4:15—5:10	D. A High Priest Worthy of Our Faith Because He Is the Son of God Who Is Compassionate
5:11—10:39	III. The Highly-Priestly Office of the Son
5:11—6:12		A. The Third Warning: The Peril of Spiritual Immaturity
6:13-20	B. A Basis for the Confidence and Steadfastness
7:1-10	C. Melchizedek, the Royal Priest
7:11-28	D. Jesus, Eternal Priest like Melchizedek
8:1-13	E. Sanctuary and Covenant
9:1-10	F. The Necessity for New Cultic Action
9:11-28	G. Decisive Purgation through the Blood of Christ
10:1-18	H. The Ultimate Character of Christ's Single, Personal Sacrifice for Sins
10:19-39		I. The Fourth Warning: The Peril of Disloyalty to Christ
11:1—12:13	IV. Loyalty to God Through Persevering Faith
11:1-40	A. The Triumphs of Perseverance in Faith
11:1-7	1. In the Antediluvian Era
11:8-22	2. In the Patriarchal Era
11:23-31	3. In the Mosaic Era
11:32-40	4. In the Subsequent Era
12:1-13		B. Display the Necessary Endurance
12:14—13:25	V. Orientation for Life as Christians in a Hostile World
12:14-29		A. The Final Warning: The Peril of Refusing God's Gracious Word
13:1-25		B. Serve God Acceptably Within the Confessing Community

Fig. 2. Analysis of Hebrews: The Primacy of Paraensis

acterize this homily, for they also were conversant with the liturgy and preaching that were the mainstay of Hellenistic synagogues of the Diaspora.

Hebrews is a reminder that the OT remains a valid and significant witness to God's redemptive word and deed. Christians must appreciate this witness in the light of God's decisive act of speaking through the Son (Heb 1:1-2). The words of the OT are invoked not for their significance in the past but for their significance in the present. For the writer of Hebrews, Scripture in its entirety remains a revelation of God's unalterable plan of redemption for the human family.

9. Canonical Recognition.

Hebrews asserted an intrinsic authority in the early church, both in the West and in the East. But there was reluctance to acknowledge it as integral to the church's rule of faith and practice. In the West we find early evidence for the impact of Hebrews on the life of the Christian community in Rome through 1 Clement. As we have earlier noted, 1 Clement reflects a detailed literary acquaintance with Hebrews, and the manner in which he made use of Hebrews indicates that he recognized its authority (1 Clem. 9.3-4 [cf. Heb 11:5-7]; 12.1-3 [cf. Heb 11:31]; 17.1 [cf. Heb 11:37]; 19.2 [cf. Heb 12:1]; 21.9 [cf. Heb 4:12]; 27.2 [cf. Heb 6:18]; 36.1-6 [cf. Heb 1:3-13; 2:17-18; 4:15-16]; 43.1 [cf. Heb 3:2-5]).

The Shepherd of Hermas, an apocalyptic* prophecy* written in Rome between 120 and 140, appears to have known Hebrews. Hermas reflects questions raised in the Roman church concerning repentance* and the possibility of "second" repentance. The writer of Hebrews is the only teacher in the period prior to Hermas who is known to have expressed precisely the eschatological singularity of baptismal* repentance and of forgiveness.* Since Hebrews was circulating within the Roman Christian community, the writer may have been the teacher from whom Hermas received the instruction concerning the singularity of repentance. Hermas developed its prophetic message concerning a second repentance in formal recognition of the teaching of Hebrews but in substantial contrast to Hebrews (Herm. Vis. 2.2.4-5). (Other passages in Hermas that appear to reflect an acquaintance with Hebrews are Visions 2.2.7 [cf. Heb 11:33]; Visions 2.3.2 [cf. Heb 3:13]; Visions 3.7.2 [cf. Heb 3:13]; Visions 4.2.4; Similitudes 9.13.7 [cf. Heb 11:33]; Similitudes 9.22 [cf. Heb 10:19-20].)

Justin Martyr clearly knew Hebrews (Justin Apol. I 12.9 [cf. Heb 3:1]; Dial. Tryph. 13.1 [cf. Heb 9:13-14]; 19.3 [cf. Heb 11:5]; 19.4 [cf. Heb 5:6; 6:20; 7:1-2]; 46.3; 56.1 [cf. Heb 3:5]; 67.9 [cf. Heb 12:21]; 96.1 [cf. Heb 7:17, 24]; 113.5 [cf. Heb 5:6, 10]; 121.2 [cf. Heb 4:12-13]). Hebrews was known and used by Irenaeus (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.26.3), by Gaius of Rome (c. 200, Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.20.2) and by Hippolytus (Refut. 6.30.9), all of whom recognized that it was not Pauline in origin.

The absence of Hebrews from Marcion's* Apostolicon (Tertullian Marc. 5) is sufficiently explained by its strong reliance upon the OT and upon Jewish thought forms. The Muratorian canon, which appears to date from the last quarter of the second century and provides a list of the documents received as authoritative by the church in Rome, makes no mention of Hebrews. In the West, Hebrews was seldom quoted in the third century and in the first half of the fourth century.

Some church leaders in the West questioned the authority of Hebrews. Confusion over the distinction between authorship and authority was widespread (see Canon). By the end of the second century and the beginning of the third, Roman opinion had crystallized in excluding Hebrews from the Pauline letter canon. The voice of Hebrews was muted for the church in the West. Even when its authority was formally recognized in the fourth century and Hebrews was admitted to the canon* of sacred Scripture, there is little evidence that it exercised any considerable influence upon the thought, life and liturgy of the church in the West.

In the East the early Alexandrian fathers and the Eastern church in general appear to have recognized the intrinsic authority of Hebrews and attributed it to Paul. It is probable that in the East the superscription "To the Hebrews" was first added to manuscripts. Hebrews was known to Pantaenus (c. 180) and to Clement of Alexandria (c. 200) (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.1-4). Pantaenus, Clement of Alexandria and Origen (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.1-4; 6.25.11-14) acknowledge the presence of Hebrews among a collection of Paul's letters and sense the necessity of justifying that association. The arguments advanced by Clement and Origen to defend the legitimacy of this arrangement are a witness to recognition of the intrinsic authority of Hebrews in the East by the end of the second century.

Late in the fourth century, under the influence of Western fathers who had spent time in the East, an agreement was reached between East and West that Hebrews was a letter of Paul's (see Hilary of Poitiers Trin. 4.11). Jerome was aware of the diversity of opinion regarding Hebrews. Although he displayed caution in his citations of Hebrews, he had no reservations concerning its intrinsic authority and its right to be included in the NT (Jerome Vir. 5; Ep. 53.8; 129.3). Augustine recognized its authority and listed Hebrews among the letters of Paul (Augustine Doctr. Christ. 2.8; Civ. D. 16.22).

10. Concluding Observations.

The authority of a text is ultimately determined by the "performance" (i.e., its power to influence and effect change in the readers) of the text. Hebrews was preserved and transmitted because Christian leaders continued to use it, and positive results followed. The concern of the early church was with praxis, with piety, with an experienced, vital faith, with spiritual usefulness, and Hebrews demanded that its voice be heard.

The authority asserted by Hebrews early in the life of the church is a reminder that this document is more than a sensitive pastoral response relevant only to a specific occasion in the past. Rather a specific occasion was a catalyst for creative and prayerful theologizing. More than that, it was a response to revelation. It conveys a word from God addressed to the church in response to the often harsh realities of Christian discipleship in a troubled world. Within the NT canon Hebrews is an essential witness to the decisive eschatological character of God's redemptive action through Jesus Christ and to the urgency of unwavering commitment to him.

Its canonical status both reflects and confers normative status. The particular text was universalized, endowed with a life of its own so that it may address a variety of situations not identical with the situation that called forth the text. The authority of Hebrews to function as a rule of faith was recognized when Hebrews was used by the believing community for teaching, correcting, equipping and leading the community into the reality of the holiness that is indispensable to the enjoyment of the vision of God (Heb 12:14).

Hebrews has acquired a reputation for being formidable and remote from the world in which we live. Ironically Hebrews is a call for ultimate certainty and ultimate commitment. It concerns itself with the issue of certainty by confronting ultimate questions about life and death with ultimate realities. Its presentation of the way in which God responds to the human family as the God who speaks, creates, covenants, pledges, calls and commits himself is intended to breathe new life into men and women who experience a failure of nerve because they live in an insecure, anxiety-provoking society. Hebrews is a scriptural gift to be appreciated especially when God's people find themselves prone to discouragement or distraction from any cause. It is a gift the church sorely needs.

See also ABRAHAM; ANCESTORS; ANGELS, HEAVENLY BEINGS, ANGEL CHRISTOLOGY; CHRISTOLOGY; COVENANT, NEW COVENANT; DEATH OF CHRIST; JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; MELCHIZEDEK; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT IN HEBREWS; PRIEST, HIGH PRIEST; PROMISE; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE; RHETORIC, RHETORICAL CRITICISM; ROME, ROMAN CHRISTIANITY; SACRIFICE, OFFERINGS, GIFTS; TABERNACLE, SANCTUARY; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: H. W. Attridge, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); S. Bénétreau, L'épître aux Hébreux (2 vols.; CEB 10; Vaux-sur-Seine: ÉDIFAC, 1989, 1990); H. Braun, An die Hebräer (HNT; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1984); F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews (rev. ed.; NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); G. W. Buchanan, To the Hebrews (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972); P. Ellingworth, Commentary on Hebrews: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); H. Feld, Der Hebräerbrief (BF; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1985); E. Grässer, An die Hebräer (2 vols.; EKK; Zürich: Benzinger, 1990, 1993); D. A. Hagner, Hebrews (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1990); H. Hegermann, Der Brief an die Hebräer (THKNT; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1988); P. E. Hughes, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); S. J. Kistemaker, Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews (NTCom; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1984); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer (MeyerK; 13th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975);

J. Moffatt, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1924); V. C. Pfitzner, Hebrews (ANTC; Nashville: Abingdon, 1997); E. Riggenbach, Der Brief an die Hebräer (Wuppertal: Brockhaus, 1987); C. Spicq, L'Épître aux Hébreux: Traduction, notes critique, commentaire (SB; Paris: Gabalda, 1977); A. Strobel, Der Brief an die Hebräer (NTD; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975); H. F. Weiss, Der Brief an die Hebräer (MeyerK; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1991). Studies: K. Backhaus, Der Neue Bund und das Werden der Kirche: Die Diatheke-Deutung des Hebräerbrief im Rahmen der frühchristlichen Theologiegeschichte (NTAbh 29; Münster: Aschendorff, 1996); A. Cody, Heavenly Sanctuary and Liturgy in the Epistle to the Hebrews: The Achievement of Salvation in the Epistle's Perspectives (St. Meinrad, IN: Grail, 1960); M. R. D'Angelo, Moses in the Letter to the Hebrews (SBLDS 42; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); D. A. DeSilva, Despising Shame: Honor Discourse and Community Maintenance in the Epistle to the Hebrews (SBLDS 152; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995); J. Dunnill, Covenant and Sacrifice in the Letter to the Hebrews (SNTSMS 75; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); L. Dussaut, Synopse structurelle de l'Épître aux Hébreux: Approche d'analyse structurelle (Paris: Desclé, 1981); F. V. Filson, "Yesterday": A Study of Hebrews in the Light of Chapter 13 (SBT 2/4; London: SCM, 1967); E. Grässer, Der Glaube im Hebräerbrief (Marburg: Elwert, 1965); idem, "Der Hebräerbrief 1938-1963," TRu 30 (1964) 138-236; G. H. Guthrie, The Structure of Hebrews: A Text Linguistic Analysis (NovTSup 73; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); D. M. Hay, Glory at the Right Hand: Psalm 110 in Early Christianity (SBLMS 18; Nashville: Abingdon, 1973); G. Hughes, Hebrews and Hermeneutics: The Epistle to the Hebrews as a New Testament Example of Biblical Interpretation (SNTSMS 36; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); L. D. Hurst, The Epistle to the Hebrews: Its Background of Thought (SNTSMS 65; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990); M. E. Isaacs, Sacred Space: An Approach to the Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews (JSNTSup 73; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); E. Käsemann, The Wandering People of God (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); W. L. Lane, "Hebrews as Pastoral Response" in The Newell Lectures (Anderson, IN: Warner, 1996) 3:91-201; S. Lehne, The New Covenant in Hebrews (JSNTSup 44; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); D. F. Leschert, Hermeneutical Foundations of Hebrews: A Study in the Validity of the Epistle's Interpretation of Some Core Citations from the Psalms (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1994); B. Lindars, The Theology of the Letter to the Hebrews (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); W. R. G. Loader, Sohn und Hoherpriester: Eine traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zur Christologie des Hebräerbriefes (WMANT 53; Neukirchen/Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1981); J. C. McCullough, "Hebrews in Recent Scholarship," IBS 16 (1994) 66-86, 108-20; G. Mora, La Carta a los Hebreos como Escrito Pastoral (Barcelona: Herder, 1974); L. L. Neeley, "A Discourse Analysis of Hebrews," Occasional Papers in Translation and Textlinguistics 3.4 (1987) 1-146; D. G. Peterson, Hebrews and Perfection: An Examination of the Concept of Perfection in the "Epistle to the Hebrews" (SNTSMS 47; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); D. J. Pursiful, The Cultic Motif in the Spirituality of the Book of Hebrews (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993); M. Rissi, Die Theologie des Hebräerbiefs: Ihre Verankerung in der Situation des Verfassers und seiner Leser (WUNT 14; Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1987); J. M. Scholer, Proleptic Priests: Priesthood in the Epistle to the Hebrews (JSNTSup 49; Sheffield: JSOT, 1991); J. Swetnam, Jesus and Isaac: A Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the Light of the Aqedah (AnBib 94; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1981); K. J. Thomas, "The Old Testament Citations in Hebrews," NTS 11 (1964-65) 303-25; J. W. Thompson, The Beginnings of Christian Philosophy: The Epistle to the Hebrews (CBQMS 13; Washington, D.C.: The Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1981); H. Thyen, Der Stil der jüdisch-hellenistischen Homilie (FRLANT 47; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1955); A. Trotter, Interpreting the Book of Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1997); W. G. Übelacker, Der Hebräerbrief als Appel: Untersuchungen zu exordium, narratio und postcriptum (Hebr 1—2 und 13:22-25) (CBNTS 21; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1989); A. Vanhoye, Structure and Message of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Rome: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1989); idem, La structure littéraire de l'Epître aux Hébreux (StudNeot 1; 2d ed.; Paris and Bruges: Desclée de Brouwer, 1976); R. Williamson, Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews (ALGHJ 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970); H. Zimmermann, Das Bekenntnis der Hoffnung: Tradition und Redeaktion im Hebräerbrief (BBB 47; Cologne and Bonn: Hanstein, 1977).

W. L. Lane

HELL, ABYSS, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT

A belief in divine punishment* after death was widespread in Jewish and Greco-Roman thought. In our literature one finds the specific expectation of everlasting torment by the one righteous God,* directed against all who are outside of Christ.* The canon* of Scripture and the apostolic fathers* refrained from the elaborate descriptions of hell that are found in other later literature.

1. The Canonical Material
2. Postapostolic Literature
3. Is Punishment Everlasting?

1. The Canonical Material.

1.1. Acts. The implication in Acts 1:25 is that when Judas Iscariot went to his "own place," it was to hell, although ho idios topos may be heaven or hell in other contexts (Ign. Magn. 5.1; Pol. Phil. 9.2). But compared with Luke's Gospel, Acts* hardly mentions hell or eternal punishment.

1.2. Hebrews. The author of Hebrews* pronounces destruction on those who fall away from Christ (Heb 10:39). These apostates* will perish like the Israelites under Moses,* but their end is no mere physical death. Rather, a fire will consume the enemies of God (Heb 10:26-27; cf. Heb 12:9). Those who hear the word but are "unfruitful ground" (Heb 6:7-8) will be cursed and burned, an image that the author apparently understands as fiery eschatological* judgment.* None of these passages, with their cursing, perishing and burning, are easily made to refer to the fire of correction during this life (as in Herm. Sim. 6—7) or to the testing fire of 1 Corinthians 3:13-15 (Ellingworth, 535).

1.3. James. God has the power to "save and destroy" (Jas 4:12). In James 5:3 the author (see James) may be speaking of the fire of hell, and he certainly does in James 3:6: "the tongue is a fire . . . and it is set ablaze by hell (geenna)."

1.4. 1 Peter. What is meant by the intriguing reference to Christ preaching to the "spirits in prison" in 1 Peter 3:19 (see 1 Peter)? If it is linked with 1 Peter 4:6 and Ephesians 4:9-10, it could mean that between his death and resurrection,* Christ "descended into hell." This doctrine was firmly established by the second century, mentioned for example by Justin Martyr and Irenaeus as well as the apocryphal* Gospel of Nicodemus (Goppelt, 260-63).

The trend of late has been to see a chronological sequence in 1 Peter 3:18-22. This proclamation occurred after Christ's death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection and before he was enthroned at God's right hand (see Exaltation). Perhaps this was a part of his ascension,* in which he announced to the dead or to the angels* his victory over death and demons (Michaels, 194-222).

1.5. Jude and 2 Peter. Both Jude* and 2 Peter* agreed with the tradition that evil angels have been imprisoned since their primeval rebellion. They have "sinned" (2 Pet 2:5) or left their positions of heavenly authority* (Jude 6), but there is no explicit reference to whether their sin was consorting with human women, as in the Jewish tradition (e.g., 1 Enoch 12, based on Gen 6). In 2 Peter 2:5 the verb tartaroō means to "confine to Tartarus," which in Greek and Jewish literature referred to the deep abyss to which angels were consigned. They are bound by chains, a feature that turns up often in Greek, Jewish and Christian writings (see esp. 1 Enoch 10:5). Both 2 Peter 2:17 and Jude 13 connect their fate to the destiny of false teachers. For the errorists too are the chains of darkness reserved, since they have fallen away from the true faith.* Jude 23 alludes to Zechariah 3:2 when it speaks of snatching the dupes of false teaching from the "fire," that is, arresting their slide into eschatological judgment.

The end of the wicked is "destruction" in 2 Peter 2:1, 3; 3:16 (apōleia) and 2 Peter 1:12 (phthora). 2 Peter and Jude, again following tradition, use the destruction of Sodom as an example of fiery judgment (Jude 7; 2 Pet 2:6-10; cf. Mt 10:15; 1 Clem. 11.1-2). Along the same lines, God will rescue the righteous from the fire as he did Lot. He will destroy both heaven* and earth with fire (2 Pet 3:7, 12).

1.6. Revelation.

1.6.1. Abyss, Hades. In the literature under consideration "abyss" (abyssos) has reference to the infernal regions only in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of). Elsewhere it denotes the deep places of the seas. Despite its etymology, this abyss is not a "bottomless pit" (Rev 9:1 KJV) but an enclosed subterranean chamber. The phrase "the shaft [phrear] of the abyss" in Revelation 9:1 may mean that the abyss itself is a shaft or more likely that its entrance is a shaft (see Rev 9:2; 11:7; 17:8). It is critical to the book's plot that the abyss may be shut up from the outside. Once secured, it may be locked with a key and sealed

(Rev 20:1-3) so that it serves as a prison (phylakē, Rev 20:7; cf. Lk 8:31; 1 Pet 3:19). In Revelation 9:1-2 an angel from heaven is given the key to the abyss, from which he allows the "locusts" to escape in a billow of smoke. In the Greek version of 1 Enoch 20:2, the good angel Uriel is placed over Tartarus, but in Revelation the king of the abyss is an angel named Abaddon or Apollyon, "the Destroyer." Possibly a different angel is put in charge of the "fire" in Revelation 14:18, but his relationship to the abyss is not made clear. We are also told indirectly that the first beast* comes up from the abyss (Rev 11:7; 17:8).

The abyss plays its major role in Revelation 20:1-3. Satan* is chained and thrown into the abyss, and his underworldly cell is locked and sealed for a thousand years.

Where "abyss" appears in the apostolic fathers (1 Clem.; Diogn.)*, it takes its other meaning, that is, "the watery deep" (based on the Heb t'hôm, "the deep").

1.6.2. Death and Hades. In Revelation there may be an implicit connection between the abyss and Hades or hell (as in Ps 71:20; Rom 10:7; and the first-century Apoc. Zeph. 6:15). Just as heaven holds the key to the abyss, Jesus possesses the keys to death and Hades or hell (Rev 1:18; see also Rev 6:8).

1.6.3. The Lake of Fire. The final abode of wicked angels and human beings is "outside" the new Jerusalem* (Rev 21:27; 22:14-15), or more specifically in the "lake of fire." A lake of fire or burning sulfur is not uncommon in apocalyptic* literature, and it is equivalent to "gehenna" in the NT.

The destruction of Babylon,* after the fashion of Sodom's fall, is a foreshadowing of the eternal fire (Rev 18:9, 18; 19:3). The beast and the false prophet* are the first to be cast in (Rev 19:20), followed by the devil (Rev 20:10), death and Hades (Rev 20:14) and the wicked, where they undergo the "second death" (Rev 20:15; 21:8).

2. Postapostolic Literature.

Christ is the savior from future punishment. Even further, with language similar to that of John's Gospel, 2 Clement 2.7 asserts that before Christ came, the Christians were perishing already.

Didache 16 refers only to the resurrection of the righteous and makes no reference to the resurrection or judgment of the wicked (see Didache). Curiously, some scholars have offered this silence as proof that its author(s) took an "annihilationist" view, that damnation leads to nonexistence forever.

There is clearer information in other literature. When the *Epistle of Barnabas spoke of the Two Ways, the way of the devil is the "way of eternal death with punishment" (Barn. 20.1). Clement of Rome* is more detailed. The destruction of Sodom presaged eternal fire for the wicked, salvation* for the righteous and destruction on the "double-minded," who like Lot's wife look back to the world (1 Clem. 11.1-2).

Ignatius* foresaw hell for those who threatened the united catholic church.* Twice he updated the warnings against the immoral in 1 Corinthians 6:9-10; in his new version, corrupting teachers with their followers will not enter the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) but will go into the "unquenchable fire" (Ign. Eph. 16.1-2; Ign. Phld. 3.3). As in Hebrews, an eternity in hell is within the realm of possibility as a warning for people who are professedly Christians. The author of 2 Clement foresees the same reversal (2 Clem. 6.7-9; 7.6; 10.5).

The literature of this period originated from a church under persecution,* and the prospect of eternal torture was offered as a counterpoint to the pains of earthly suffering.* The Jews of the Second Temple period had already grasped that truth (cf. 4 Macc 9:7-9), and it was taught by the Lord* himself (Mt 10:28; cf. 2 Clem. 5.4). In that vein the author of Diognetus 10.7 promised his hearers that at their conversion, "you will recognize that which is true life in heaven, then you will scorn that which is here thought to be death, then you will fear that which is truly death." Theory comes to life in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, as Polycarp* was forced to weigh the everlasting fire of God's judgment against a dreadful but fleeting martyrdom* at the stake (Mart. Pol. 11.2). As for all the martyrs of Smyrna, "to them the fire of the inhuman torturers was cold, for they had set before their eyes an escape from the fire that is eternal and is never quenched" (Mart. Pol. 2.3).

The scant references to hell's destruction in the *Shepherd of Hermas are reserved for those who defect from Christ (Herm. Vis. 3.7.2; Herm. Sim. 6.2.4; cf. Herm. Sim. 9.31.2). These will face "double punishment," perishing forever (Herm.

Sim. 9.18.2; apothanountai eis ton aiōna).

At the close of this period Justin Martyr made the fullest use of the fires of hell for apologetic purposes. He argued before the Roman government that if Christians believe that wickedness leads to hell, then they are highly motivated to live as good citizens (Justin Apol. I 12; 17). Plato and other thinkers, claimed Justin, borrowed their ideas about hell from the OT (Justin Apol. I 20; 44; 54; cf. Justin Cohor. Graec. 27). The existence of hell implies that human responsibility, not fate, controls our destiny (Justin Apol. I 43). In his Dialogue with Trypho Justin kept citing Isaiah 66:24 and Matthew 8:11-12 in tandem to show that some Jews will be sent to hell and some Gentiles* will enter the kingdom of God; everything hinges on one's response to Christ.

3. Is Punishment Everlasting?

If the extant literature is any indication, then an overwhelming majority within the ancient church were persuaded that damnation leads to everlasting, conscious suffering. The main historical alternatives are annihilationism, the view that the wicked eventually are consumed by the fire and forfeit their existence, or Origen's "curative" approach, in which the wicked are eventually purged and reconciled to God (Bernstein, 308; Kelly, 483-85).

3.1. Lexical Background. It has been argued that the key adjective aiōnios does not mean "everlasting" when it defines hell's torments but rather "lasting a long period of time." This interpretation rests partly on a few scattered passages in which aiōnios could be read that way and partly on its etymological relationship to aiōn ("ages"). This leads to the precarious logic that aiōnios must therefore mean "for many ages" rather than forever.

A search of early Christian literature reveals that, apart from a few places where it means "from eternity past" (e.g., 2 Tim 1:9; never in the apostolic fathers), aiōnios transparently takes the meaning of "everlasting" (e.g., Heb 5:9; 1 Pet 5:10; 2 Pet 1:11). The expectation of eternal punishment (2 Clem. 5.4-5) frequently provides the counterpart to "eternal life," which no one would argue is merely long-lasting. The real issue is whether God's punishment is consciously experienced by the wicked for eternity or whether it is everlasting in its permanence but not in its infliction of torment.

3.2. Canonical Material. Jude 7 contains the threat of "eternal fire" (pyros aiōniou) for the apostates. This was the "eternal fire" that destroyed Sodom, which fire was thought to burn perpetually. It is not said whether the wicked feel its pain forever.

In Revelation the devil, beast and false prophet "will be tormented day and night, forever and ever" (Rev 20:10). Although there is no explicit matching statement for wicked humanity, it is the natural reading of "the smoke of their torment arises forever and ever" (Rev 14:11, based on Is 34:10; cf. Rev 19:3).

While the author of Revelation joins the rest of the canonical writers in calling the fate of the wicked "death," death in that case is defined not as extinction but as existence in the inferno (Rev 20:14).

3.3. Later Developments. The postapostolic literature abounds in stereotyped language about everlasting punishment (e.g., 2 Clem. 6.7; Mart. Pol. 11.2; Ign. Eph. 16.2; Barn. 20.1; also Justin Martyr Apol. I 8; 12; 17; 19; 45; Justin Apol. II 1; 2; Justin Dial. Tryph. 45; 117; 120; 130; Justin Fragm. 3; 4). Hermas referred to eternal destruction in Hermas Similitude 6.2.4 (apōleian . . . aiōnion), a fate that he repeatedly contrasted with life in the kingdom of God.

Another common motif, the "unquenchable fire," is borrowed from Isaiah 66:24 by way of Mark 9:48 (see also Sir 7:17; Jdt 16:17). Gehenna is the place "where their worm never dies, and their fire is never quenched" (2 Clem. 17.5; Ign. Eph. 16.2; Mart. Pol. 2.3).

A singular exception to this model turns up in Diognetus 10.7 in a reference to "the everlasting fire that shall punish to the end (mechri telous) those who are given over to it," perhaps a prediction of the eventual annihilation of the wicked. The ambiguity lies in the fact that in actual usage "unto the end" did not necessarily imply a conclusion or termination (cf. Heb 3:14) and likely meant "forever" (see the similar wording in 1 Thess 2:16; Herm. Sim. 8.8.5).

In the writings of Justin Martyr "eternal fire" was certainly intended to intimate everlasting suffering. Justin could not content himself with merely repeating the traditional formulations, since his books were designed to explain concepts such as the resurrection to a Greek audience. Christ himself will assign the wicked to hell once their souls are reunited with their bodies (Justin Apol. I 8), and, immortal, they have an eternal consciousness of pain (Justin Apol. I 52). Their torment will be everlasting (aiōnios), not a mere thousand years, as Plato had taught (Justin Apol. I 8). When Justin predicted that wicked angels and humans will "cease to exist" in Apology II 7, he was speaking of ceasing from the earth, in the tradition of 2 Peter 3:3-13.

See also DAY OF THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT; LIFE AND DEATH; MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. E. Bernstein, The Formation of Hell: Death and Retribution in the Ancient and Early Christian Worlds (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1993); J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul and Life Everlasting: Biblical Anthropology and the Monism-Dualism Debate (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); P. Ellingworth, Epistle to the Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); L. Goppelt, A Commentary on I Peter, ed. F. Hahn (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); J. Jeremias, "ἄβυσσος," TDNT 1:9-10; idem, "γέεννα," TDNT 1:657-658; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (rev. ed.; New York: Harper & Row, 1978); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); H. Sasse, "αἰών, αἰώνιος," TDNT 1:197-209; W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985). G. S. Shogren

HELLENISTIC CHRISTIANITY.

See HELLENISTS, HELLENISTIC AND HELLENISTIC-JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

HELLENISTIC-JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

See HELLENISTS, HELLENISTIC AND HELLENISTIC-JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

HELLENISTS, HELLENISTIC AND HELLENISTIC-JEWISH CHRISTIANITY

Acts 6:1-6 records the earliest known Christian controversy, a dispute between the Hebrews (those who spoke Aramaic) and the Hellenists (those who spoke Greek; Hellēn, "Greek") over the inequitable distribution of food to the Hellenist widows. According to Acts, the conflict was resolved by the appointment of a board of seven apparently Hellenist leaders charged with oversight of the church's* benevolent work. According to many biblical scholars, however, the controversy went much deeper and lasted much longer: Palestinian (Hebrew) and Diaspora* (Hellenist) Jews thought differently and so as Christians propagated divergent and competing forms of Christianity. Thus the essential distinction between Hebrews and Hellenists was theological, not linguistic, and their essential disagreement was a matter of religious perception, not charitable dispensation. In other words the Hebrews and Hellenists were the first Christian factions. Other scholars have challenged this approach, citing, for example, recent insights into the complex relationship between first-century Palestinian Judaism* and Hellenism (see DPL, Hellenism). It is ironic, according to this latter view, that the original dispute between the Hebrews and Hellenists, having been settled in a matter of days, has generated a controversy that remains unresolved after 150 years.

1. Background
2. Theoretical Questions
3. Exegetical Questions
4. Conclusion

1. Background.

Many influential nineteenth-century intellectuals regarded Hellenism and Judaism as diametrical opposites. For example, M. Arnold in "Hebraism and Hellenism" wrote that "between these two points of influence moves our world. . . . The uppermost idea with Hellenism is to see things as they really are; the uppermost idea with Hebraism is conduct and obedience" (Arnold, 165). Arnold sought the middle ground between what he regarded as two contrary but equally important positions. For many others the opposition between Judaism and Hellenism was absolute; choice, not compromise, was necessitated, and Judaism was decidedly the inferior partner in most such comparisons.

The contrasting of Judaism and Hellenism both owed much and offered much to a society largely contemptuous of the Jews. An example of the disparagement of Judaism may be found in nineteenth-century Gentile biblical scholarship, in which the religion of the Jews is derided as formalistic, idolatrous, superficial, stern and even perverse. Such characterizations were nowhere more commonplace than in Germany, where Luther himself earlier had extended if not established the precedent of Christian anti-Semitism.

In retrospect one may describe the task of many nineteenth-century (in particular German) NT scholars as the rescue of Christianity (in particular Pauline Christianity) from Judaism. The obvious strategy was to link Christianity to Hellenism and in so doing demonstrate Christianity's clear opposition to and superiority over Judaism. The obvious text on which to found such an argument was Acts 6:1.

1.1. F. C. Baur. Beginning in 1831 F. C. Baur advanced the theory that the early Jerusalem* church was divided into two theologically based parties corresponding to Luke's Hellenists and Hebrews. The conservative Hebrews "adhered as nearly as possible to the Jewish religion," whereas the liberal Hellenists came in a short time to recognize the clear "antagonism of Christianity to Judaism" (Baur 1873-75, 1:41-43).

According to Baur, Stephen,* the Hellenist leader, spoke out against the Mosaic law* and taught that the building of the temple* under Solomon had been contrary to the will of God,* who opposed "external, sensuous, ceremonial worship." "This inevitable rending asunder of Christianity from Judaism, whereby Judaism would be rendered negative as an absolute religion, and by which its final extinction was threatened, had been realized by Stephen; the high, liberal standpoint which he assumed, fostered in him the energetic zeal with which he laboured in the cause of Jesus" (Baur 1873-75, 1:48, 59).

A bloodthirsty mob lynched the radical Stephen, an incident that touched off a "great persecution" of the church in Jerusalem (see Persecution). According to Acts 8:1, all the believers were scattered, "except the apostles" (see Apostles). "This may justly surprise us," wrote Baur. What persecution is directed at followers but not leaders? "However, it cannot be doubted that they [the apostles] remained behind in Jerusalem. . . . But if they remained we cannot believe that they were the only ones who did so, but rather that the persecution first directed against the Hellenist Stephen was in fact carried on against the Hellenistic part of the Church" (Baur 1873-75, 1:39, emphasis added).

The consequences of this selective persecution of the Hellenist Christians were profound: "The two elements composing it, the Hellenistic and Hebraistic . . . now became outwardly separated from each other. At that time the Church at Jerusalem was purely Hebraistic; as such it adhered closely to its strictly Judaizing character, and a strenuous opposition to the liberal Hellenistic Christianity was consequently developed" (Baur 1873-75, 1:40).

The Hellenists, having fled Jerusalem, founded the church of Antioch,* which soon became the second and only dynamic center of the Christian faith.* From the ranks of the Hellenists emerged Paul, whose great missionary work was obstructed and opposed by the Hebrew leaders Peter and James. Thus by mid-first century there appeared two separate but scarcely equal Christianities: the liberal-minded, universalistic, Hellenistic church and its moribund, legalistic and rigidly Jewish (= Hebrew) counterpart.

1.2. Baur's Influence. Baur was the first modern scholar to publish a comprehensive reconstruction of the history behind the earliest Christian texts. Moreover, Baur was one of the first commentators to take seriously disagreement within the primitive church. Baur's conclusions may be heavily disputed, but they cannot be and were not lightly dismissed.

Opponents, such as J. B. Lightfoot, focused their attack on two vital points: Baur's evaluation and use of sources (in particular his extreme skepticism toward Acts*) and his assertion of an open split between Paul and the Jerusalem apostles. Baur's views concerning the Hebrews and Hellenists were seldom challenged, being based on widely held assumptions about the relationship between Judaism and Hellenism. Lightfoot himself was convinced that the Hellenists would naturally "accept and interpret the new revelation in a less rigorous spirit than the Hebrew [Christian] zealot of Jerusalem" and that the Hebrews "regarded their Hellenist brethren with suspicion and distrust." Lightfoot is here indistinguishable from Baur: "a breach [with Judaism] was made, and the assailants as might be expected were Hellenists." Stephen "was the first . . . to sound the death-knell of the Mosaic ordinances and the temple worship, and to claim for the Gospel unfettered liberty and universal rights" (Lightfoot, 296-98).

Among those contemporaries who did attack Baur's interpretation of Acts 6:1—8:3 was L. Wolff, who rejected the notion that the "great persecution" was directed solely against the Hellenists. He also challenged Baur's reading of Stephen's speech in Acts 7: "Stephen's criticism is directed against the opinion that temple worship was in itself the complete fulfillment of the worship of God" (Wolff, 92-93, 96-97). Similarly M. Baumgarten wrote that Baur's Stephen is "an imaginary character" and that Baur's interpretation of Acts 7 "is a mere arbitrary conceit, which is opposed by the whole tenor of the discourse" (Baumgarten, 1:138, 158). Similar protests were penned a generation later by W. Soltau and W. Mundle, among others.

On this issue, however, Baur's opponents did not carry the day. Other, more influential scholars, including E. Zeller, F. Overbeck, H. J. Holtzmann and J. Wellhausen, assumed Baur's perspective. Gradually the core elements of Baur's proposal rose to the place of critical orthodoxy. In contemporary NT commentaries, introductions, handbooks, theologies and histories, in biblical annotations, dictionary articles and scholarly studies, we find these ideas consistently represented: the Hebrews and Hellenists were ideologically based parties, Stephen denounced temple worship and law observance, the Hellenists were selectively persecuted and the Hebrew church of Jerusalem and Hellenist church of Antioch were in constant tension and frequent conflict with one another. These opinions are repeated without attribution by teachers and writers across the theological spectrum at every level of academic sophistication. A few representative examples follow.

According to F. F. Bruce, "the Hellenists . . . were Jews who spoke Greek and whose way of life, in the eyes of stricter Palestinians, smacked too much of Greek customs." Stephen made "a vigorous attack on the Temple cultus," and at least some of Stephen's fellow Hellenists taught that "the coming of Jesus abrogated the Law," a position that would "inevitably cause tension between them and the more traditionalist 'Hebrews.'" Bruce stated also that "the death of Stephen was the signal for a campaign of repression by the authorities in Jerusalem against those who were of his way of thinking. Luke does not say explicitly that the Hellenists . . . were the principal targets of this campaign, but it emerges fairly clearly from his narrative that this was so" (Bruce 1972, 206, 208, 210, 214-15).

R. Bultmann made each of these same points in his seminal Theology of the New Testament. He also argued that the Seven were not deacons (contra Acts 6:2-3) but rather leaders of a Hellenistic party; as such "their office was by no means serving table, but . . . they were proclaimers of the word" (Bultmann, 55-56). This observation is echoed by L. T. Johnson in his popular The Writings of the New Testament: An Interpretation (227).

J. C. Beker referred to "the Stephen group that founded the Antioch church" and " 'liberalized' the Torah with respect to the validity of the temple and the cultic law" (Beker, 341-42). Similarly G. Bornkamm stated that the author of Acts concealed "a much more serious cleavage" within the Jerusalem church. The Hellenists had come to "an understanding of the gospel altogether revolutionary in the eyes of the rest of the church." "Obviously, the non-Hellenistic part of the mother church was left unmolested" (Bornkamm, 14).

E. Haenchen provided an elegant restatement of Baur's interpretation of Acts 6:1—8:3 in The Acts of the Apostles. Equally prominent is the work of M. Hengel, whose analysis of early church history gives pride of place to the Hellenists, who "recognized above all" that "the protective attitude of Judaism over against its environment . . . most strongly expressed by the absolutizing place of the Torah" was "shattered in pieces" by the message of Jesus (Hengel 1974, 1:313-14).

If all academic questions were settled by vote, the clear winner in the precinct of Acts 6—8 would be Baur and his Hellenist party. All the same the choice would not be unanimous, and the incumbent's future would not be assured. Scholars are asking new and substantial questions about the validity of Baur's interpretation.

2. Theoretical Questions.

Two key events have shaped NT interpretation during the past half century: the Holocaust, which has led many to an awareness of the role that anti-Semitism has played in the interpretation of Christian Scripture; and the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, which has alerted scholars to the diversity and complexity of first-century Palestinian Judaism. Let us consider the relevance of each of these points.

Horror at the ready use of the NT in support of Nazism—and shame at the silence of countless Christians who witnessed the near annihilation of European Jewry—have motivated many recent scholars to take care to interpret the Bible from a point of view that is fair to Judaism. For example, commentators now recognize that much of the NT was composed in the nascent church's bitter conflict with Judaism; therefore, many of its harshest statements, such as John's sometimes vitriolic references to "the Jews," must be understood within their immediate argumentative context. A second consequence is the reinterpretation of some biblical passages whose exegesis had been prejudiced by anti-Jewish assumptions; much recent work on Romans 9—11 fits within this category. A third effect is the reclamation of passages that offer a favorable view of the Jews and Judaism, such as the depiction of Elizabeth and Zechariah in Luke 1:6.

These insights force the question, Is the standard view of the Hebrews and Hellenists founded on solid exegesis or simple prejudice? Was it really a case of good Hellenists versus bad Hebrews? Were the historical lines so conventionally and conveniently drawn?

The second point concerns the revolution in Judaic studies precipitated by the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls together with numerous lesser but complementary archaeological findings. In the past fifty years many pillar assumptions about the conservatism and homogeneity of Palestinian Judaism have fallen, notably the longstanding dichotomy between Judaism and Hellenism. To quote Hengel, "It is [now] certain that ancient Judaism was extremely pluralistic—even in Palestine itself—and in turn was influenced in many ways by its 'Hellenistic' environment" (Hengel 1983, xiv). M. Smith writes, "Greek thought, in one way or another, had affected the court and the commons, the Temple and the tavern, the school and the synagogue" (81). Palestine had been Hellenized for three centuries prior to Jesus; thus all of Palestinian Judaism was to an extent Hellenistic, as by extension was all of Christianity. Borders and minds were surprisingly open. Israel was not the hermit kingdom.

This means that one can no longer claim that because a Jew was from Palestine, he or she must have thought in certain predictable ways. This realization, like new wine bursting an old wineskin, has spattered the pages and scattered the ink of conventional wisdom. For example, prior to the discoveries at Qumran,* it was commonly believed that the Gospel of John was the most Hellenistic and therefore un-Palestinian of the canonical Gospels; however, in light of its many affinities with the Dead Sea Scrolls, John is now frequently regarded as the NT's most Palestinian Gospel.

The questions these facts raise about the interpretation of Acts 6:1—8:3 are obvious. If Judaism and Hellenism are not opposites, can the opposition of Hebrews and Hellenists be maintained? Would not the religious diversity of Palestinian Judaism be mirrored in Palestinian Jewish Christianity? Further, is it the case (as was supposed by W. Bousset, Bultmann and others) that many key Christian concepts could have developed only outside of Palestine?

I. H. Marshall has noted the problem: "If no hard and fast distinction can be made between Palestinian and Hellenistic Judaism, it is unlikely that one can press the distinction between Palestinian and Hellenistic Jewish Christianity." Therefore "we must conclude that the hypothesis of a theological distinction between Aramaic- and Greek-speaking sections of the Jewish church rests on inadequate grounds" (Marshall, 274).

3. Exegetical Questions.

Doubts concerning the adequacy of the Hebrew/Hellenist dichotomy have encouraged some scholars to take a second look at Acts 6:1—8:3 and related passages. What follows is a sampling of the questions they have raised about the traditional interpretation of these texts.

3.1. Acts 6:1-5. Does the author of Acts deliberately obscure a much deeper conflict between the Hebrews and Hellenists? One major component of the argument concerns the supposed domestication of the Seven: it is often claimed that these Hellenist leaders were assigned a minor role that is in conspicuous conflict with their (at least Stephen's and Philip's*) subsequent preaching* activity (Acts 6:8—8:40). This assumes the incompatibility of administrative and evangelistic* ministries. Acts does not preclude other forms of service* on the part of the Seven; it acknowledges that they had proven themselves already to be "full of the Spirit and wisdom" (see Holy Spirit; Wisdom). Moreover it was a common practice in Judaism to appoint boards of seven men to oversee important work (see Church Order).

More basic is a factor seldom included in the scholarly calculation: Acts 6:1-5 appears to be modeled in a fashion evident elsewhere in Luke-Acts on OT narrative (see Intertextuality), in this case the stories about the appointment of Moses'* assistants (Ex 18:13-27; Deut 1:9-18; Num 11). The account in Numbers describes even the "murmuring" of the people regarding the "daily distribution" of manna. The elders appointed to deal with the problem were filled with the Spirit, and two of them, Eldad and Medad (Num 11:26-30), were given prophetic* ministries—recalling the Spirit-endowed ministries of Stephen and Philip. The joining of the two forms of ministry is intentional, as are the echoes of the Exodus experience (Lk 9:31; Acts 2:22, etc.). The church succeeds when faced with challenges like those that threatened nascent Israel. (In similar fashion the earlier conflict over Ananias and Sapphira [Acts 5:1-11] harkens back to the paradigmatic story of Achan and his family, who "took some of the devoted things . . . acted deceitfully, and put them among their possessions" [Josh 7:11].)

3.2. Acts 6:11-14. Stephen is accused of teaching* that "Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this place [the temple] and will change the customs . . . [of] Moses" (Acts 6:14). Are these charges true? Many scholars argue that the "false witnesses" (Acts 6:13) were telling the truth*; Stephen was a radical critic of both law and temple. There are two basic problems with this view: (1) The actual charge concerns future, eschatological* destruction and change; this is a different belief from that usually credited to Stephen. (2) It would be obvious to the original readers of Luke-Acts that the temple charge at least was patently false; Jesus never threatened to destroy the temple himself (see Lk 13:34-35; 20:9-19; 21:6). The author's point throughout the narrative is that the Jews are guilty of disobedience (see Obedience), by which they themselves have brought about the destruction of their temple. Stephen's innocence is assumed.

3.3. Acts 7:2-53. Does Stephen dispense with the law and attack the building of the temple? The counter to the first of these points is simple: Moses and the law are treated almost glowingly in Stephen's speech; it is the Jews, who "received the law as ordained by angels," who "have not kept it" (Acts 7:53). The issue of temple criticism is much more complicated. It is certainly possible that Stephen made inflammatory statements about the temple, perhaps repeating Jesus' prophetic warning concerning its future destruction. The question is whether Stephen's teachings would have offended not only Jewish authorities but also Hebrew (but not Hellenist) Christians. Did Stephen believe that temple worship was inherently wrong, that the building of the temple was an act of apostasy?*

At two principal places in the speech scholars claim to find radical criticism of the temple. The more important of these is in Acts 7:46-48:

> [David] found favor with God and asked that he might find a dwelling place for the house of Jacob.
>
> But it was Solomon who built a house for him.
>
> Yet the Most High does not dwell in things made with human hands.

Does the author intend to contrast "finding a dwelling place" and "building a house"? Scholars since Baur have claimed that, according to Stephen, David wanted only to locate a place in Jerusalem for the mobile tabernacle*; Solomon's mistake was to think he could confine God to a permanent locale, the temple.

Numerous challenges are raised to this interpretation. David clearly intended to build the temple; the reference to asking (Acts 7:46) almost certainly refers to 2 Samuel 7:1-2, in which David inquires of the prophet Nathan concerning his desire to construct a house* for God. Psalm 132, from which the phrase "find . . . a dwelling place for the house of Jacob" is borrowed, is a song of ascents celebrating the establishment of the Davidic monarchy and Jerusalem cult in toto. Reference to "building a house" (Acts 7:47) is found in a number of related verses in the Septuagint; in 1 Kings 5:3 it refers specifically to David's original wish. The categories tent and house are not treated elsewhere in Acts 7 in a way that would be consistent with Baur's reading: we are told of a bad tent ("the tent of Moloch") in Acts 7:43 and of a good house ("the house of Jacob") in Acts 7:46.

Almost always ignored is the fact that Acts 7:48, which summarizes Acts 7:46-47, omits the words house, dwelling place and tent. (Several translations wrongly insert the word houses, which does not appear in the Greek text.) The point is simple: God does not reside in human structures, whether tents or temples. This is a sentiment well known to Judaism (see Solomon's own statement in 1 Kings 8:27) and at most argues against any who would tend to localize the presence and worship of God in the Jerusalem temple. This theme would be of undoubted importance to the author of Acts, whose purpose is to chronicle the spread of the gospel* "to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:16).

It is worth noting the string of charges that conclude the speech (Acts 7:51-53). The Jews are "stiff-necked" and "uncircumcised in heart" "and ears." They "are forever opposing the Holy Spirit"; having slain the prophets, they have now "betrayed" and "murdered" the righteous* One. The final accusation takes up the theme that dominated the central portion of the speech: the rejection of Moses and the law (see Acts 7:23-42). "You are the ones that received the law as ordained by angels, and yet you have not kept it" (Acts 7:53; see Angels). At its core the speech argues that present Jewish rejection of Jesus, the prophet like Moses (Acts 7:37; cf. 3:22; Deut 18:18) is well precedented, as are its tragic consequences. (The curious reference to Babylon* in Acts 7:43 [cf. "Damascus" in Amos 5:27] puts in parallel the first destruction of the Jerusalem temple in 587 B.C. and the second in A.D. 70.)

The second passage commonly cited in reference to Stephen's radical temple criticism is Acts 7:41-43. Many believe that there is an essential link between the wilderness story and the building of the temple. This is because the idolatrous Israelites are said in Acts 7:41 to have rejoiced "in the work of their hands," and Acts 7:48, which refers at least in part to the temple, makes the point that God does not dwell in "handmade" structures. Hence it is concluded that the building of the temple was an act continuous with the fashioning of the golden calf at Sinai. But what of the "tabernacle of testimony," which was also handmade? The shift from the terrible judgment* of Acts 7:42-43 to the construction of the tabernacle in Acts 7:44 is seamless. The point about the limitations of "handmade" shrines in Acts 7:48 is repeated in Paul's Areopagus speech in Acts 17:24, undoubtedly reflecting the author's own point of view.

Contrary to Baur, all evidence strongly suggests that the early church arrived at law (not to mention temple) criticism gradually and in response to specific circumstances, especially as occasioned by the Gentile mission* (e.g., as in Acts 11:19-20; Gal. 2:1-14; Acts 15).

3.4. Acts 8:1-3. Were the Hellenists the only Christians persecuted in Jerusalem? Absolutely not. In Acts 4:1-22 John and Peter are arrested and threatened; in Acts 5:17-41 the "apostles" are apprehended, miraculously freed, rearrested and then beaten. Acts 12:1-11 tells us that Herod "laid violent hands upon . . . the church," killing James and arresting Peter. According to Josephus,* James, the brother of Jesus (see Relatives of Jesus) and by most accounts the leader of the Hebrews, was put to death at the instigation of the high priest Ananus the Younger (the brother-in-law of Caiaphas, the high priest who, according to Acts 7:1, sat in judgment of Stephen). Paul speaks in 1 Thessalonians 2:14-16 of the persecution of the churches in Judea. Certain passages in the Synoptic Gospels appear to presuppose a state of persecution; Matthew 10:23 locates this in Israel specifically. Clearly if persecution of the Hellenists means anything, then persecution of the Hebrews means something equally significant.

What are we to make of the notorious statement in Acts 8:1 that "all were scattered, except the apostles"? Probably the author wished to assure his readers that the captains of the church remained at the helm, which means in Jerusalem. It is no accident that Acts tells us nothing of the wider travels of Cephas, "the other apostles and the brothers of the Lord" (1 Cor. 9:5). It is in the author's design that the Twelve* (Acts 1:15-26) remain associated with the holy city, the capital of God's saving activity. (Concerning the unique importance of Jerusalem in Luke-Acts see Lk 1:38; 9:31, 51; 13:33; 21:24; 23:28 [statements found only in Luke].) Luke defends the continuity between Judaism and Christianity in part by highlighting the Jerusalem-centeredness of the Christian revelation.* As Paul says to King Agrippa, "This was not done in a corner" [Acts 26:26]).

3.5. Galatians 2:1-10 and Acts 15:1-35. Were the later Hebrew church of Jerusalem and the Hellenist church of Antioch in controversy with one another? We know of two meetings of representatives of these two congregations: the so-called Jerusalem council (Acts 15; Gal 2:1-10) and Antioch incident (Gal 2:11-14). In the first instance the leaders of the Jerusalem church (against the wishes of some) accepted the Antiochian practice of allowing uncircumcised Gentiles into the church. In the second case it appears that the Antiochian Christians (with the exception of Paul) accepted the ruling of the Jerusalem church that Jewish Christians as Jews ought to continue to obey the law. In both cases disagreement existed within each church; between the two churches there was compromise and conciliation. The notion of an unbridgeable theological chasm separating Greek-speaking and Aramaic-speaking Christians is unsubstantiated.

4. Conclusion.

We have reviewed two very different models of early church history. According to the first, the primitive Christians were divided along cultural lines: old-style Jews and new-thinking Hellenists. Two different churches traveled on two different trajectories toward two different destinies Unretouched, it is a black-and-white picture of starkly opposed alternatives. According to the second view, all of the earliest Christians were by heritage both Jewish and Hellenistic, and their methods of integrating these valuable but complex inheritances varied from individual to individual. Neither Judaism nor Hellenism was one thing; varieties of early Christian belief and expression (the fate of Israel* in Matthew and Romans; the Platonism of Hebrews and the Stoicism of 1 Thessalonians) were the inevitable products of so concentrated a mixture of ideas and allegiances. The result was complexity—and color.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; LAW; PHILIP THE EVANGELIST; STEPHEN; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Arnold, The Complete Prose Works of Matthew Arnold, 5: Culture and Anarchy with Friendship's Garland and Some Literary Essays (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, 1965); C. K. Barrett, "Acts and Christian Consensus" in Context: Essays in Honor of Peder Borgen, ed. W. Bockman and R. E. Kristiansen (Relieff 24; Trondheim: Tapir, 1987) 19-33; M. Baumgarten, The Acts of the Apostles; or, The History of the Church in the Apostolic Age (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1854); F. C. Baur, History of the Church in the First Three Centuries (London and Edinburgh: Williams & Norgate, 1878-79); idem, Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ, His Life and Works His Epistles and Teachings: A Contribution to a Critical History of Primitive Christianity (2 vols.; London and Edinburgh: Williams & Norgate, 1873-75); J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. Bihler, "Der Stephanusbericht (Apg 6,8-15 und 7,54-8,2)," BZ 3 (1959) 252-70; idem, Der Stephanusgeschichte im Zusammenhang der Apostelgeschichte (Munich: Max Hueber, 1963); G. Bornkamm, Paul (New York: Harper & Row, 1971); R. E. Brown, "Not Jewish Christianity and Gentile Christianity But Types of Jewish/Gentile Christianity," CBQ 45 (1983) 74-79; F. F. Bruce, New Testament History (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972); idem, Peter, Stephen, James and John: Studies in Early Non-Pauline Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribner's, 1951-55); J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); W. W. Gasque, A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1989); E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); M. Hengel, Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the Earliest History of Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine During the Early Hellenistic Period (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); C. C. Hill, Hellenists and Hebrews: Reappraising Division Within the Earliest Church (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); L. T. Johnson, The Writings of the New Testament: An Interpretation (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); J. Kilgallen, The Stephen Speech: A Literary and Redactional Study of Acts 7,2-53 (Rome: Biblical Institute, 1976); A. F. J. Klijn, "Stephen's Speech—Acts VII. 2-53," NTS 4 (1957) 25-31; E. Larsson, "Die Hellenisten und die Urgemeinde," NTS 33 (1987) 205-25; J. T. Lienhard, "Acts 6:1-6: A Redactional View," CBQ 37 (1975) 228-36; J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians: A Revised Text with Introduction, Notes and Dissertations (10th ed.; London and New York: Macmillan, 1900); I. H. Marshall, "Palestinian and Hellenistic Christianity: Some Critical Comments," NTS 19 (1972-73) 271-87; H.-W. Neudorfer, Der Stephanuskreis in der Forschungsgeschichte seit F. C. Baur (Giessen-Basel: Brunnen, 1983); E. Richard, Acts 6:1—8:4: The Author's Method of Composition (SBLDS 41; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); P. Richardson and D. Granskou, ed., Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, 1: Paul and the Gospels (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1986); M. Scharlemann, Stephen: A Singular Saint (Rome: Biblical Institute, 1968); M. Simon, St. Stephen and the Hellenists (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1958); M. Smith, "Palestinian Judaism in the First Century" in Israel: Its Role in Civilization, ed. M. Davis (New York: Seminary Israel Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1956); G. Stanton, "Stephen in Lucan Perspective" in Studia Biblica, 1978, 3: Papers on Paul and Other New Testament Authors, ed. E. A. Livingston (Sheffield: JSOT, 1980) 345-60; L. Wolff, "Der Bericht der Apostelgeschichte über Stephanus vertheidigt gegen die Angriffe Baur's," ZLTK 8 (1847) 86-97.

C. C. Hill

HERESY. See ADVERSARIES; APOSTASY; DOCETISM; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; MARCION.

HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF

The Shepherd of Hermas (or simply Hermas) is one of the more enigmatic documents to have survived from the sub-apostolic period. Relatively simple in style and widely popular in the second and third centuries, it is an important witness to the state of Christianity in Rome in the mid-second century. Expressing a Jewish Christian theological perspective by means of imagery, analogies and parallels drawn from Roman society and culture, the Shepherd reflects the efforts of its author(s) to deal with issues—for example, post-baptismal sin* and repentance*; the relationship between rich* and poor within the church—of concern to at least part of the Christian community in Rome.*

1. Genre and Structure
2. Contents
3. Authorship and Date
4. Concluding Observations
5. Later Influence

1. Genre and Structure.

The external structure of five Visions, twelve Mandates, and ten Similitudes (or Parables) masks the fact that on the basis of its internal structure the document falls into two parts: Visions 1—4, and the Shepherd proper, comprising the Mandates and Parables, to which Vision 5 serves as an introduction.

The genre of Visions 1—4 is that of a Jewish Christian apocalypse.* A typical apocalypse (cf. Revelation) includes the following features: (1) a revelation from God, (2) usually in the form of a vision or dream, (3) often given through a mediator, (4) who provides an interpretation of the vision, (5) whose contents usually concern future events, especially the end times. Visions 1—4 neatly reflect this pattern, except for their contents: the focus is not on the end, but on the possibility of repentance* because the end is not yet.

The Mandates reflect the form of a typical Jewish-Hellenistic homily. The closest parallels to the Parables of the Shepherd are found in the book of 1 Enoch. These parables, in which typically the telling of the "parable" is followed by a request for and granting of an interpretation, and finally blessings and curses upon those who either do or do not heed it, are more like "allegorical similes" than the more familiar parables of the Synoptic Gospels.

There is some evidence to suggest that the two major sections, Visions 1—4 and Vision 5/Parable 10, were written and circulated separately. Two textual witnesses begin with Vision 5, and there are some discrepancies in the numbering of the Parables and internal inconsistencies which indicate that Parable 9 is a later addition. In all, it appears that two separate sections were later combined, at which time Parable 9 was added to unify and link them together, creating the Shepherd as it is known today. Whether these sections represent the work of two or three different contributors at different times (Giet), or the work of a single author, either written in stages over a period of time (Joly 1993, 529) or in a brief time (Maier, 58) continues to be debated.

2. Contents.

In Vision 1 Hermas sees a woman bathing and desires her, and then is confronted about his sin by an elderly woman, who represents the church. In Vision 2 he receives a revelation in the form of a book, and after fasting and prayer* is granted its interpretation: forgiveness* is possible for those who truly repent now and cleanse themselves of dipsychia, "doublemindedness." Vision 3 is of the church as a tower built on a foundation of apostles,* teachers, etc., with its diversity portrayed by the variety of stones used to build it. Vision 4, in which a huge monster appears, foreshadows tribulation.* The shepherd replaces the elderly woman as revelator in Vision 5, and proceeds to introduce the following twelve Mandates and ten Parables.

The Mandates consist of a series of commandments regarding ethical behavior, given by the shepherd and explicated by means of lists of virtues* and vices, with a smattering of dialogue between a patient shepherd and an unperceptive Hermas thrown in to advance matters. Key topics raised include faith, innocence, chastity, repentance, patience, truthfulness, cheerfulness and self-control, on the positive side, and evil desire, bad temper, doublemindedness and grief on the other.

The Parables (extended analogies or similes, utilizing cities, vineyards, trees, shepherds,* sticks, mountains, a tower and a garment) reflect similar concerns. Parable 8, for example, is a vision of a willow tree and various kinds of sticks (some green and budded, some half green and half dry, others dry and insect-riddled, etc.), each of which represents a certain type of believer (in the three examples, respectively, those who were persecuted for the law, those so engaged in business that they fail to associate with the saints, and apostates).

The book ends with a charge to Hermas to write down and communicate what he has seen, and to live in accordance with it.

3. Authorship and Date.

3.1. Authorship. The "Hermas" to whom the Shepherd is attributed is certainly not Paul the Apostle (a suggestion arising from Acts 14:12) or the Hermas mentioned in Romans 16:14 (Origen's suggestion). According to the Muratorian Canon, which may be the oldest (c. 180-200?) known list of NT and early Christian writings, Hermas was the brother of Pius, bishop of Rome (c. 140-154). Whether or not this is so, nothing else is known about the author(s); apparent autobiographical information is likely fictional.

3.2. Date. The date of the Shepherd is difficult to establish. Reference to it by Irenaeus (c. 175) establishes a date before which it must have been written, but on the other end dates as early as the 70s and 80s of the first decade have been proposed. The evidence of the Muratorian Canon (Hermas wrote the Shepherd in Rome while his brother Pius was bishop) must be used with caution, since it appears to reflect a subtle attempt to discredit the Shepherd. The internal evidence is inconsistent. Data in Visions 1—4, together with the reference in Visions 8.3 to "Clement,"* who may possibly be the Clement of Rome responsible for 1 Clement, point to the end of the first century or the early part of the second, while the section comprising Vision 5/Parable 10 seems to come from a later time. Recognition of the composite nature of the Shepherd resolves many of the difficulties. Visions 1—4 likely represent the earliest state of its formation, while the final editing, including the interpolation of Parable 9, may well have occurred about the time (mid-second century) suggested by the Muratorian Canon (see Canon).

4. Concluding Observations.

Throughout the book Hermas wrestles with whether repentance and forgiveness of post-baptismal sin are available. The answer, which seeks to balance God's justice and mercy* (cf. 4 Ezra), is yes, once, but only for a limited while, so one must repent quickly before the opportunity passes. In sum, Hermas seeks to affirm God's mercy while attempting to maintain a strict moralism (Snyder 1992). A second major concern is the behavior of the rich, and their relationship to the poor within the church (Osiek); Hermas' solution (chap. 51 [= Parable 2]) stands in tension with the Sermon on the Mount. While scholarship has tended to dissociate the two concerns, sociological perspectives suggest they are intimately related (Maier).

The Shepherd offers a glimpse of a Christianity whose piety (much like that of the *Didache and Barnabas) is centered on observing the divine commandments and self-control. The distance from Romans (another document addressed to the Roman Christian community) in tone and perspective is considerable; its piety has much more in common with 1 Clement (although its social location differs greatly [Jeffers, 120; Maier]). Christological* reflection is minimal (the Holy Spirit* or angels* carry out many christological functions). Although there is scarcely any direct use of the OT or early Christian documents, substantial parallels with Jewish wisdom traditions run throughout the document (Joly 1993). The use of Roman examples and categories is more than merely circumstantial (Reiling).

5. Later Influence.

The Shepherd was generally well received in the early church. Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria and Origen (at least for a while) accepted it as Scripture, as apparently did Tertullian, although later, after he joined the rigorous sect of the Montanists, he referred to it as the "shepherd of the adulterers" for its "lax" approach to repentance. In the fourth century, Athanasius early on quoted it as canonical, and even after the Christology of the book proved to be congenial to his Arian opponents he continued to recommend it to new converts. His Alexandrian contemporary, Didymus the Blind, included it in his canon* of Scripture, and it stands at the end, following Revelation and Barnabas, of the important fourth-century biblical manuscript, Codex Sinaiticus.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; REPENTANCE, SECOND REPENTANCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Text and Translation: J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings, ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992). Commentaries and/or Editions: M. Dibelius, Der Hirt des Hermas (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1923); R. Joly, Hermas le Pasteur (Paris: Cerf, 1958; repr. with supplement, 1968); G. F. Snyder, The Shepherd of Hermas (AF 6; Camden, NJ: Nelson, 1968). Studies: L. W. Barnard, "The Shepherd of Hermas in Recent Study," HeyJ 9 (1968) 29-36; S. Giet, Hermas et les Pasteurs: les trois auteurs du Pasteur d'Hermas (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1963); J. S. Jeffers, Conflict at Rome: Social Order and Hierarchy in Early Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); R. Joly, "Le milieu complexe du 'Pasteur d'Hermas'," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 524-51; H. O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius (Waterloo, Ont.: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1991); E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, 2: The Later Christian Writings, ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (NGS 5/2; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990); C. Osiek, Rich and Poor in the Shepherd of Hermas: An Exegetical-Social Investigation (Washington, D.C.: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1983); L. Pernveden, The Concept of the Church in the Shepherd of Hermas (Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup, 1966); J. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy: A Study of the Eleventh Mandate (NovTSup 37; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); G. F. Snyder, "Hermas' The Shepherd," ABD 3:148; W. Telfer, The Forgiveness of Sins: An Essay in the History of Christian Doctrine and Practice (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg, 1960).

M. W. Holmes

HERMENEUTICS

Some of the most difficult books in the Bible to interpret are found in the last part of the NT (e.g., Hebrews, Revelation), and scholars are just beginning to realize the value of the church fathers for understanding NT literature. Among the difficulties is the peculiar use of the OT in Acts, Hebrews and Revelation. For these and other reasons the later NT literature provides fertile ground for exploring the value of recent techniques such as rhetorical theory, text-linguistics and intertextuality. This article will summarize the relevant hermeneutical issues and provide a general introduction to topics discussed more extensively in separate articles within this volume (see DPL, Hermeneutics/Interpreting Paul).

1. Recent Hermeneutical Developments
2. Hermeneutical Strategies
3. Hermeneutical Techniques
4. Hermeneutical Difficulties

1. Recent Hermeneutical Developments. The postmodern attack on the classic hermeneutical quest for the author's intended meaning (maintained even in the Middle Ages with the Antiochian stress on the literal sense of the text) has intensified in recent years. Future generations will no doubt view twentieth-century hermeneutics as typified by the ascendance of the reader over the author in the production of meaning. For many scholars the author has no authority whatsoever over the texts he or she produces. Polyvalence, or multiple meanings, is becoming axiomatic in many circles of interpretation. This fits well with the pluralism and relativism that predominate in postmodern culture.

1.1. The Death of Modernism. Modernism per se began with the ascent of rationalism in the seventeenth century, epitomized by Descartes and his cogito ergo sum ("I think, therefore I am") and establishing the subject/object distinction as the heart of knowledge. At the same time knowledge was attained by empirical proof and was seen as certain in its results. Science replaced religion at the apex of the intellectual pyramid, and it was thought that a combination of reason and science could solve all problems. Optimistic humanism pervaded the social ethos, and it was believed that humankind was progressing upward on the path to a true paradise of modernistic life. In hermeneutics this produced the Schleiermachian objective hermeneutic, a method in which the subject (the interpreter) studies the object (the author's text) and derives a certain meaning that is deeper than even the author understood. This led to the grammatical-historical method and the historical-critical method, both of which were thought to produce assured results.

Several factors led to the demise of modernism on the historical as well as the scientific and hermeneutical levels. The Einsteinian revolution played havoc with the Newtonian closed-world nexus and the subject-object distinction (especially due to Heisenberg's "uncertainty principle"). Along with the Freudian emphasis on the power of the superego to subvert the objectivity of the subject, this revolution showed that knowledge is attained as much through the observer's perspective as through the data studied. Moreover, World War I and the century that followed destroyed the optimism of modernity. The last eighty years of the twentieth century have been characterized by a search for a new basis for meaning in the wake of modernism's demise.

1.2. The Hermeneutical Switch: Heidegger and Gadamer. M. Heidegger has often been called the most influential philosopher of the twentieth century. Heidegger's early thought was a primary influence on the theology of R. Bultmann, and Heidegger's later thought exercised influence on both the New Hermeneutic and H.-G. Gadamer. The early Heidegger of Being and Time (1927) developed the relationship of Dasein (the concrete, human "I") to its world in the quest for understanding. Preunderstanding informs Being and provides time-oriented content to this quest. Thus life itself is a hermeneutical process as one's Dasein addresses its existence and as understanding projects Being on the world. Meaning is the union of Dasein with existence, and the hermeneutical circle is the union of preunderstanding and interpretation; that is, the already understood unites with the object to be grasped. In his later works Heidegger developed the linguistic underpinning for his ontological approach to existentialism, relating the problem of language to the issue of Being. For him language is not a tool for imparting knowledge but an event that leads to the possibility of human existence. Language is grounded in being and not just in the thought life. It expresses Being by uniting both the subject and object into itself (see Thiselton 1980, 335-36).

Gadamer borrowed both Heidegger's ontology and the controlling metaphor of art or aesthetic appreciation. Although his major work is called Truth and Method, Gadamer opposes the methods of hermeneutics and the classical attempt to find the true meaning of the text. Perhaps more than anyone else, Gadamer was the hermeneutical precursor of postmodern interpretation. For him interpretation is not judging the meaning of the text but is to be found in the art or the act of reading. The community behind the reader and the prejudgments of readers are decisive as they enter the world of the text. Gadamer's most famous metaphor for this is the "fusion" of the "horizon" of the text with the "horizon" of the reader. This occurs not via foundational methods like grammar and semantics but via the reader's leap into the "stream of tradition," that is, the prejudices and understandings inherited from one's past and community. Thus Gadamer was opposing the myth of objective knowledge inherited from the Renaissance. Not only is the text cut off from its author, but also the reader is cut off from any purely rational interaction with the text. Instead there is a new relationship as both text and reader interrogate each other.

1.3. The Hermeneutical Centrality of the Reader: Poststructural Criticism. There are three schools within what is called the poststructural movement: poststructuralism, deconstruction and reader-response criticism. Building upon Heidegger and the French linguist F. de Saussure (1857-1913), structuralism was a short-lived movement that emphasized the text as an arbitrary system of signs that must be decoded. Saussure was the founder of modern linguistics and had developed the theory that language is a system of interdependent terms centering upon the interaction of langue (the language system) and parole (concrete acts of speech). The speaker chooses from the storehouse of linguistic conventions and puts arbitrary signs (individual terms) together into a meaning-context. Structuralists reworked this into a theory of "actantial" units to be decoded on the basis of binary opposites to get at the deep-structure message underlying the surface text.

However, there were serious philosophical problems in structuralism, and attention shifted quickly to poststructural considerations. With this came a serious attack on the Kantian subject-object distinction. Meaning was seen not in the object (text) but in the subject (reader). While Saussure considered the term to be an arbitrary sign that was given definition in the context of the sentence, poststructuralists saw the sentence also as an open-ended system of signs that compels the reader to complete its meaning. R. Barthes sums up this movement (Barthes, 74-81): The text is a production that continually develops and is open-ended by nature. It is without closure and has an infinite number of meaning-possibilities. It is intertextual by nature and contains within itself many different texts via its multiple meanings. The original author has no control over it and can come back only as a "guest" who is no longer necessary for interpretation. The author is "dead," and any return is only a projection of the reader's mind. Therefore the reader must complete its meaning and enter into the text, thereby producing a new text in the act of reading. The guiding metaphor is "play." The text becomes a playground on which readers may play whatever game they wish.

J. Derrida is the leading poststructuralist, and his deconstruction movement provides the greatest challenge yet to traditional hermeneutics. Derrida is trying to deconstruct, or decenter, Western philosophical reasoning inherited from Plato and Aristotle by blending Nietzsche with Heidegger to produce a metaphorical or rhetorical view of language. Communication is characterized by the "absence" of meaning, for when readers "interrogate" the text, they discover it is defined by "difference," which Derrida interprets two ways—the opposition between signifier and signified ("differ") causes an infinite number of sign-substitutions and endless play between the reader and the text ("defer"). Readers must deconstruct the text from any supposed connection with the author (who is no longer available) or previous interpretations of the text (which also cannot be truly understood) and reconstruct their own understanding of the text.

Reader-response theory is similar but centers on the reading strategy the reader employs. There are two schools of thought. Most biblical theorists follow the more moderate approach of W. Iser, who said that the text draws the reader into its narrative world and guides the process of coming to understanding by providing markers that work with the reader in producing meaning. The more radical approach of S. E. Fish states that the text itself exists only in the mind of the reader. As the text is read, the reading strategy drawn from the reading community determines the meaning of the text. The meaning is not discovered but created by the reader. There is no object, only a subject.

1.4. Hermeneutics and Social Context: Sociocritical Approaches. In line with the switch to the subject, this movement switches to the current cultural situation as the generating force in meaning. J. Habermas and K.-O. Apel propose a metacritical or "depth hermeneutic" that recognizes the worldview behind a text and its purpose to control or manipulate the reader into accepting its perspective. According to this view, one must go beneath the surface message to uncover the attempt to dominate the readers. Therefore interpretation must liberate itself from the ideology of the text and recreate the social world of the text into conformity with current needs.

Three recent movements are part of this school: liberation, feminist and black theologies. All seek to recreate biblical theology in light of the needs of the present community. For liberation and black theology, salvation* is freedom from economic and racial oppression. The Bible has been misused by the white, wealthy majority to oppress the poor and minorities, and the story of the exodus becomes the governing metaphor for the release of the oppressed from injustice. The primary need today is not spiritual but economic liberation, and this occurs when theoria (the meaning of the text) and praxis (the current needs of the community) are fused. God* is immanent (involved in the liberation of the oppressed) and not just transcendent (above this world), so practical action must replace theoretical speculation. Theology is redefined as action, and biblical parables about the lost sheep or the prodigal son are reinterpreted to center on the release of the oppressed poor rather than the search for the spiritually lost. The book of Revelation is a favorite text for this school of thought, centering as it does on the destruction of evil government.

Feminist hermeneutics takes a similar tack and critiques the patriarchal domination of women in the Bible, which has resulted in the male subjection and exploitation of women in society. A metacritical perspective must first unmask the pretense of objectivity in male-dominated biblical exegesis and both reiterate the femaleness of God and rediscover the centrality of women* in Christian religion. The basis of this reconstruction is women's experience of male domination, which provides the critical norm for biblical reflection (see Reuther). Moreover this reflection is praxis-oriented; that is, it must liberate the contemporary community from oppression.

1.5. The Counter Movement: Intentionalist Hermeneutics. While postmodern skepticism toward the intended meaning of the text has controlled many segments of higher criticism since the 1980s, there are some signs that its influence may be waning. A growing number of studies argue that such skepticism is unwarranted. N. T. Wright (50-69) argues that the solution is found in a critical-realist perspective in which the reader grapples with the text and attempts to ascertain what the author intended to say in the text. Two primary schools of thought espouse a similar realist approach.

The followers of E. D. Hirsch Jr. (W. C. Kaiser Jr., E. E. Johnson) argue for two elements in hermeneutics, the single intent of the author and multiple significances for the readers. There is only one true meaning of a text and that is the meaning the author intended to portray. However, that meaning can have more than one significance for readers in different situations. The task of readers is primarily to ascertain the original meaning and on that basis to see what impact that meaning has on their lives. P. D. Juhl agrees with an intentional approach but argues that one studies the author's text rather than the author's intention. Authors are still important, for they situate the text historically, but we know the author only to the extent that we know the text (Juhl, 12-15).

Others are more influenced by the language-game theory of the later L. Wittgenstein as filtered through the analytical philosophy of J. L. Austin and the speech-act theory of J. R. Searle. This is the view that language is first referential and then performative. The language-game theory of the later Wittgenstein developed the idea that communication depends upon the ever-changing linguistic context in which language operates. The context supplies rules whereby the utterance can be understood. Austin applied this to the performative function of texts in three aspects—the locutionary (cognitive, or propositional, message), illocutionary (what the text accomplishes—declaring, warning, etc.) and perlocutionary (what is effected or caused in the hearer or reader—persuading, changing, etc.). Searle has built on the illocutionary aspect and developed a speech-act theory that blends the propositional or referential dimension of a text with its performative force. In other words, texts both assert truth and make demands of the reader, and in their contexts those different functions can be interpreted.

A. C. Thiselton (1992, 597-604) builds on this to develop his "action theory" of hermeneutics. He would see the locutionary and illocutionary functions as combining both meaning (proposition) and significance (demanding response) into a single act of communication. The author provides certain direction markers in the text that draw the reader into the extralinguistic world of the text and perform certain actions on the reader. A " 'believing' reading" allows the reader to participate in the text's effects and to discover its intended purpose. K. Vanhoozer (1995, 314-18) agrees that readers play a primary role in interpretation but argues that they must do so responsibly by seeking not just to "overstand" the text (ask only their own questions of it) but also to "understand" it (seek the meaning and sense of the text itself). The interpreter has an ethical responsibility to allow the communicative aim of the text to guide the reader to its intended meaning.

2. Hermeneutical Strategies.

2.1. Letter Forms. Of the nine Hellenistic letter forms (see Letters) adduced by S. K. Stowers (49-173) and D. E. Aune (162-69) (friendship; family; praise and blame; exhortation, or paraenesis; mediation, or recommendation; juridical, or forensic; private; official, or royal; and literary), several are reflected in the General Epistles. On the whole, however, it has been noted that even the personal letters (e.g., 3 Jn) are primarily literary and that rhetorical techniques dominate all of them. No single letter form suffices. Hebrews certainly fits into the paraenetic pattern and 3 John into the private letter form, but other types are mixed in as well (see below).

In general, all the letters follow Greco-Roman convention, such as the opening (sender to recipient followed by a greeting, a thanksgiving and prayer) and closing (greetings from friends, final exhortations and words of farewell). For the most part these conventions are followed, but Hebrews* and 1 John (see John, Letters of) have no opening, and James,* 2 Peter* and 1 John have no closing. Jude* closes without greetings or farewell, only with a doxology, and Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) with a benediction.

The General Epistles evidence a great variety in their letter forms. Hebrews is a paraenetic homily (Heb 13:22, "word of exhortation") containing several mini sermons (e.g., Heb 3—4, 5—7, 8—10) with rhetorical techniques centering upon warnings and encouragements to persevere. James does not easily fit any epistolary genre. It is primarily a moralistic letter that addresses several ethical* problems in a group of Hellenistic Jewish churches. 1 Peter* and 1 John might both be called pastoral letters, with 1 Peter a homily that tries to encourage churches of northern Galatia to persevere in times of persecution,* and 1 John a polemical tractate to encourage Christians to persevere in light of false teachers. 2 Peter and Jude are also polemical tractates. 2 Peter has often been called a testament or farewell address (2 Pet 1:13, 14 on his impending death) calling upon Christians to remain faithful to Christ* in light of false teachers. Jude contains an extensive midrash (Jude 5-19) with a strong prophetic emphasis on the judgment* awaiting the false teachers. 2 John and 3 John are personal pastoral letters addressing the treatment of church representatives (2 John of false teachers, 3 John of John's own representatives). The book of Revelation is the most complex of all. It contains many subgenres (epistle, prophecy, apocalyptic*) and does not fit any of the forms. The seven letters are virtually royal edicts with a paraenetic challenge to the churches, and the book as a whole is a prophetic-apocalyptic narrative designed to call the beleaguered Christians to a life of persevering faithfulness in the light of Roman persecution.

2.2. Rhetorical Approaches. Ancient rhetoric was developed by the Greeks (Aristotle and Quintilian) and utilized not only by them but by Jewish writers as well (see Rhetoric, Rhetorical Criticism). There were three primary types—judicial, or legal, argument, used to establish right and wrong; deliberative, or political/religious, used to persuade an audience of what is true or best; and epideictic, or praise/blame, used to argue for moral values. In most epistles one type will be primary with the others supporting it. There were six parts of ancient rhetoric: the exordium, or introduction; the narratio, or proposition; the partitio, or explanation of facts; the probatio, or arguments presented in defense of the thesis; the refutatio, or refutation of opposing views; and the peroratio, or conclusion, providing final points to persuade the readers. The goal of the scholar (see Kennedy) is to study the rhetorical unit and the situation behind it and then to determine the type of argumentation employed, the arrangement and style by which it is presented and the effectiveness of the final product. The purpose is to understand the epistle better by studying the techniques the author used to address the ancient readers.

The epistle to the Hebrews* (see 2.1 above) is a paraenetic homily that places it under the general rubric of deliberative rhetoric, as the author tries to convince his Jewish Christian audience that Christianity is the true religion. Scholars have long noted that the key to the book is the juxtaposition of doctrinal and exhortatory sections, and in this sense the sixfold rhetorical division does not work easily. Therefore many interpreters (see Rhetoric) call this synkrisis, or comparison, comparing Christian with Jewish soteriological practices in order to call the readers back to Christ* as the only path to salvation.*

James* and 1 Peter* may well be epideictic rhetoric. James calls the readers to the moral values or ethics* of true Christianity. Attempts to outline it according to the six elements above have also proven difficult, and many different patterns have been suggested. Most likely it follows its own internal logic (the tendency recently is to see it as a unity rather than fragmented). 1 Peter attempts to call a persecuted church to persevere in the Christian values that characterized it in the past. As with James, it does not fall into any Greco-Roman literary pattern but centers on the twin themes of privilege (1 Pet 1:3-12; 2:4-10) and responsibility (1 Pet 1:13—2:3; 2:11—3:12), then applying these to the problem of persecution* (1 Pet 3:13—4:19), with a conclusion centering on the readers' responsibilities before Christ (1 Pet 5:1-14).

2 Peter* and Jude* are deliberative rhetoric attempting to persuade the readers of both the danger of the false teachers and the truths of the apostolic faith.* At the same time they utilize judicial rhetoric to prove the error of the heretics. The letters of John (see John, Letters of) combine deliberative rhetoric to challenge the false teachers and epideictic rhetoric to call the readers to the true ethical precepts of the Christian walk. Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) cannot easily be classified since it is an apocalyptic* work, but it utilizes all three types: judicial rhetoric to address the false movements (e.g., the Nicolaitan heresy), deliberative rhetoric to call the readers to follow Christ at all costs and epideictic rhetoric to encourage the readers to worship* and persevere in Christ.

2.3. Historical and Social-Scientific Approaches. Ancient stories and texts originate in an historical context, and so it is important to ascertain the original social setting behind them (see Social Setting). There are two basic types of study. (1) Social description studies the facts and historical-cultural background behind the text, utilizing archaeological data to uncover details such as the type of homes people lived in as well as broad sociological patterns such as the patterns behind the house church* movement or Paul's tentmaking ministry.* (2) Sociological interpretation uses current sociological theory to explain what social forces led to the production of the text itself, such as the social codes as the product of Cynic influence or the early church as a millenarian movement. The problem with the latter is it is often reductionistic and a revisionist attempt to rewrite the history behind the ancient text on the basis of modern theories. The solution is to treat such study as heuristic and to allow the text rather than the theory to control the process. In this sense it is best to combine the methods of the historian and the sociologist and to let the data guide the results.

It is critical to center not just upon historical reconstruction but also upon biblical illumination, that is, to approach the text as a believer. This is the classic debate between the church and the academy, between a reasoned openness to the text and a historical-critical skepticism toward it. The solution is to amalgamate the two approaches, to search out what underlies the text but remain an obedient listener to its message. As historical documents, the biblical books must be studied critically; as divine revelation they must be obeyed implicitly. Moreover sociological analysis is an important aid to theological understanding when it is employed carefully. So long as one avoids the dangers of reductionism, revisionism, determinism, anachronism and overstatement (see Osborne, 141-44; Barton, 74-76) and allows exegetical analysis to control the use of the social-scientific tools, social science is a valuable tool.

A couple of examples will help illuminate the value of this approach. First, the social implications of the Acts of the Apostles* are critical. Scholars have long noted the significant place social concern has in the two-volume work of Luke-Acts. In Luke there is a reversal of roles in which the rich will have nothing in the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) and the poor will have everything (Acts 6:20-26; 16:19-31; see Riches and Poverty). In Acts there is a strong theology of communal sharing at the core of the church (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32-35). In both the Jewish and Greco-Roman worlds the poor had a special place of privilege. In Rome the path to power lay in keeping the masses fed and happy, and politicians would spend fortunes financing the games to keep the masses happy and purchasing bread to keep them fed. In the Jewish world almsgiving was one of three primary acts of piety (with prayer and fasting). The early church built upon both to make the sharing of possessions a must for the mature Christian. The theology is this: when God blesses persons financially he is primarily giving them a ministry of helping and only secondarily a blessing* to enjoy.

One of the best known sociological works is J. H. Elliott's Home for the Homeless, a study of the situation behind 1 Peter.[5] Elliott focuses on the key terms "aliens and strangers" (1 Pet 1:1, 17; 2:11), arguing that they are sociological in nature and portray the "alienated" peoples of northeast Asia Minor who converted because they thought Christianity would provide a haven of rest for them. However, they became doubly oppressed and thereby depressed when their neighbors turned against them for becoming Christians. Peter writes to encourage them to embrace their "alien" status and join the "household of God" (1 Pet 4:17; see Household, Family). While Elliott does a service in tracing the rural, small-town life of that section of Asia Minor and the pressures that were exerted upon the original readers, he overstates the social nature of "aliens and strangers" and fails to understand its use as a religious metaphor for considering oneself separate from this world* (as in the black spiritual, 'This world is not my home, I'm just a-passin' through"). Nevertheless, Elliott's study is helpful in placing 1 Peter in its first-century context.

2.4. Narrative Approaches. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, the weaknesses of form and redaction criticism, specifically the tendency to divide the narratives of the Bible into independent units (form) and to center only upon the differences between the Gospels (redaction), became apparent. Scholars realized that the biblical narratives were whole stories that contained plot, characterization, point of view and story time. Literary or narrative criticism had been developed by secular literary critics in their study of fiction, and their techniques were applied to the Bible (see Narrative Criticism). There are several premises: books like the Gospels, Acts and Revelation are to be considered as holistic pieces of literary art; they are to be treated as aesthetic works and studied in terms of literary artistry; the external or historical background behind the text is not the object of study, but the focus should instead be on the internal composition of the story itself.

The book of Revelation may be used as an example (for Acts as an example, see Narrative Criticism). Scholars have long recognized that Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) has a plot that centers on the conflict between God* and the forces of evil. The central theme is the sovereignty of God, with the correlative being the futility of Satan.* The first ten chapters juxtapose heavenly scenes (Rev 1, 4—5, 7) with earthly scenes (Rev. 2—3, 6, 8—9). The heavenly scenes are characterized by peace,* joy,* praise and worship.* The earthly scenes are characterized by chaos, persecution,* judgment* and sorrow. God alone is in control of the earthly and the heavenly. This theme is carried through in the central section (Rev 6—16) that details the seals,* trumpets* and bowls.* These series of seven judgments are seen not just as the wrath* of God upon the earth-dwellers but also as a final proof of his sovereignty (the first four trumpets and bowls are modeled after the Egyptian plagues) and a final opportunity for repentance* (see Rev 9:20-21; 14:6-7; 16:9, 11). It is clear throughout that the dragon has already been defeated by the slain Lamb* (Rev 5:6, 9, 12; 6:16; 12:11; 13:8).

The characterizations in the book are vivid. The dragon, the beast* and the false prophet* are clearly seen as a parody of the Trinity (Rev 13; 16:13), and everything Satan does is a "great imitation" of what God and Christ have already done, such as placing a mark on followers (Rev 13:16 = Rev 7:3), resurrection* from the "mortal wound" (Rev 13:3) and the "many crowns" (Rev 12:3/13:1 = Rev 19:12). Point of view is especially seen in the interludes between the seals, trumpets and bowls (Rev 7:1-17; 10:1—11:14; 12:1—14:20), which tend to typify the glory* of the heaven-dwellers and the battle between God and the forces of evil. The setting is in contrasting scenes of heaven* and earth, which demonstrates the choices that the churches have to make—will they follow the ways of God or the dictates of their world?

2.5. Text-Linguistics and Discourse Analysis. This is the latest hermeneutical development, coming to the fore in biblical studies within the last decade (see Structuralism and Discourse Analysis). It is also the most comprehensive school, moving from author to text to reader and combining sociolinguistics, anthropology, classical exegetical methods and reader-response theories. There are two primary types: the text-linguistics practiced by G. H. Guthrie, which utilizes semantic markers and grammatical and syntactical study of the surface text to analyze rhetorical development at the macro level of the text; and the discourse analysis practiced by S. E. Porter and J. B. Green, which studies the production of the textual strategy by the author and its effect upon the reader in the current reading situation. The one hermeneutical discipline missing is a consideration of historical background. The interest is not on what is behind the text but on what is in the text. The goal is to uncover not just the semantic interplay between words but also the process by which the text communicates to the reader (original reader and current reader).

When studying Hebrews,* one will first analyze the original linguistic situation that produced the book, including the first-century literary and rhetorical strategies employed. Second, it is necessary to ascertain the code or structure embedded in the book, utilizing a study of conjunctions, verb moods and tenses as they develop, and rhetorical strategies such as inclusion and meaning gaps to determine the major and minor breaks of the developing argument. Guthrie's analysis of Hebrews yields the following divisions: Hebrews 1:1-4 (introduction); Hebrews 1:5—4:13, 4:14—10:18, 10:19—13:19 (major sections); and Hebrews 13:20-25 (conclusion). At this stage there is also consideration of the multiple levels at which communication occurs, the relationship of the word to the sentence, of the sentence to the paragraph, and of the paragraph to the major section of the book.

Third, discourse analysis studies the effect upon the reader. The text is produced within one sociolinguistic situation but is read today within another sociolinguistic situation. This is where polyvalence occurs, for bridging the gap is difficult. The original readers understood the crisis behind the text (for Hebrews it is Jewish Christians tempted to return to Judaism* due to persecution*), but modern readers look at it from different vantage points, such as Arminian or Calvinist traditions. Discourse analysis analyzes the way the embedded discourse in Hebrews draws readers into the message of the text and guides them into participating in its narrative world.

2.6. Genre Approaches. Genre refers to a basic type of literature that provides hermeneutical guidelines so that the reader might understand its contents. It functions at the macro level (the book as a whole) and at the micro level (the subgenres utilized in the larger book). For instance, although Revelation is usually characterized as apocalyptic, it also utilizes epistolary (the seven letters of Rev 2—3), prophetic (the promises* and warnings) and poetic-liturgical (the hymns*) forms and material (see Liturgical Elements). J. L. Bailey notes three aspects: repeatable patterns that help the reader understand its message; a social setting that reveals a particular way of looking at reality; and rhetorical strategies that impact the reader in particular ways.

Genre is an indispensable aid to understanding Acts,* the General Epistles and Revelation (see Revelation, Book of). For instance, apocalyptic* has its own grammatical patterns (e.g., solecisms) and a unique set of syntactical devices (e.g., esoteric symbols, cyclical patterns and interludes). Knowing how these patterns operate can radically alter one's understanding of a text. The modern prophecy movement, for example, assumes that the apocalyptic symbols in the Bible were meant to be understood entirely in terms of current events and fails to understand how such symbols operated in their ancient context; namely, that they were drawn from a common store of such symbols in the Jewish and Greco-Roman worlds and made good sense to citizens of those cultures. It is therefore a gross misinterpretation to identify the "eagle" as the United States and the "bear" as Russia. Likewise, to identify the symbol "666" as Hitler or Henry Kissinger or Ronald Wilson Reagan (whose three names each have six letters) falls far off the mark. The number refers to something or someone in the first century (perhaps to Nero Caesar, the letters of which name in Hebrew come close to 666).

2.7. Theology, Paraenesis and Ethics. The speech-act theory of Austin, Searle and Thistleton recognizes three types of utterances (see 1.5 above): locution (what the text means), illocution (what the text accomplishes) and perlocution (the effect the text causes in the reader). These three aspects correspond to the title of this section. Biblical theology is the message of the book; paraenesis the purpose of the book; and ethics the required response on the part of the reader. While there is no systematic theology in the Bible, all biblical books are inherently theological (see New Testament Theology). The key is to allow the developing embedded message of the text to emerge from the data. As one moves from one section to another, the theology is the thread that stitches the sections together. In 1 John (see John, Letters of) this would be the three "tests" that describe the true faith as opposed to the false teachers—an incarnational christology,* a binding love* between the members of the community and the necessity of righteous deeds. 1 Peter* contains some of the deepest teaching about God* (mentioned thirty-nine times in this epistle) in all the NT, about election* and a resultant holy living (see Holiness), about the church* as not belonging to this world,* and about a theology of suffering.*

Paraenesis describes the purpose of theology—to persuade the reader to live appropriately to the theological truths (see Teaching, Paraenesis). One mistake of theologians is to think of their discipline as primarily cognitive, as demanding logical or rational thought. While this is somewhat true, it is only part of the picture and not the more important part. The biblical authors intended their theology to be lived more than thought through. B. Fiore defines paraenesis as "discourse whose aim is to exhort or persuade the reader or auditor to do good." It refers to virtue* and vice lists, household codes* and general exhortations. The warning passages of Hebrews,* most of the wisdom sayings of James,* the ethical paragraphs (1 Pet 1:13—2:3) as well as household codes (1 Pet 2:11—3:12) of 1 Peter,* and the perseverance* passages of Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) are all examples of paraenesis.

Ethics refers to the action side of paraenesis (see Ethics). Theology informs, paraenesis persuades and ethics puts it into practice. As R. B. Hays argues, the NT cannot be understood apart from recognizing its moral dimension. The new life that Christ* made possible through his sacrificial death demands a new set of principles for living (see Death of Christ). This is true at the community level as well as at the individual level. The emphasis on community love in 1 John is a case in point. The theme begins with obedience* as the sign of the presence of God's love* (1 Jn 2:5) and proceeds to define this as "walking as Jesus did" (1 Jn 2:6). Finally this is applied to mutual love as the basis of "living in the light" of God (1 Jn 2:9-11; see Light). It is clear that no one can be in right relationship with God and "hate his or her brother and sister" (1 Jn 2:11).

3. Hermeneutical Techniques.

In recent years the study of the OT in the NT has centered more and more on the exegetical techniques employed by the NT authors. The OT is utilized in several ways in the NT. Often we find direct citations of OT passages; at other times allusions or echoes of passages can be detected; and at other times we have intertextual uses of OT stories (see Intertextuality in Early Christian Literature). Throughout the NT one fact is clear. The entire OT, not just the prophetic portions, is viewed as fulfilled in Jesus and the church* he established. What distinguishes the General Epistles and Revelation from the Gospels, Acts and Paul is the absence of apologetic quotations trying to prove Jesus is the Christ of prophecy.* Primarily these books use intertextual material in paraenetic fashion to call the readers to a life of Christian faithfulness and perseverance* in light of persecution* and pagan pressure to conform to the mores of the surrounding culture.

3.1. Exegetical Techniques in Acts. Most of the twenty quotations in Acts* can be found in the speeches, primarily Peter's (Acts 2:17-21, 25-28; 3:22-23, 25), Stephen's* (Acts 7:3, 5-7, 18, 27-28, 32-35, 37, 40, 42-43) and Paul's (Acts 13:22, 33-35, 41). The quotations are taken almost exclusively from the Septuagint (A text), primarily from the Psalms, Isaiah and the Minor Prophets (see Old Testament in Acts). Typology is central to the use of these passages, as Jesus, the church* and the mission* to the Gentiles* are all anchored in Israel's scriptural tradition. In his formula quotations Luke is quite specific, normally naming the OT author and often linking the text with God* (Acts 3:25; 7:2, 3, 5), the Holy Spirit* (Acts 4:25; 8:25) or the Lord* (Acts 13:47). As C. K. Barrett says (242), this shows Luke is writing "an account of a people, heir to Israel, told through the story of such men as Peter and Paul, and supplied with its meaning through their prophetic utterances, which were always in harmony with what the prophets of old had said."

Two subjects dominate the typological focus. As in Luke, Jesus is seen as the promised Messiah who must suffer (Is 53:7, 8 in Acts 8:32-33), die and be raised (Ps 16:8-11 in Acts 2:25-28, 13:35; Ps 118:22 in Acts 4:11; Is 55:3 in Acts 13:34; see Resurrection), and be exalted to the right hand of God (Ps 110:1 in Acts 2:34-35; see Exaltation). Also, the Gentile mission is steeped in scriptural fulfillment (Is 49:6 in Acts 13:47; Amos 9:11-12 in Acts 15:15-17), including God's turning from the Jews to the Gentiles (Is 6:9-10 in Acts 28:25-28) on the basis of Jewish unbelief (Ps 2:1-2 in Acts 4:25-26, applied to the Jewish people in Acts 4:27; as well as most of the quotations in Stephen's defense in Acts 7).

3.2. Exegetical Technique in Hebrews. Hebrews* may well be the most complex NT book in its use of the OT (see Old Testament in Hebrews). The presence of testimonia, or chain collections, the mixture of more than thirty direct quotations (Longenecker lists thirty-eight) with at least thirty allusions and several stories, and the absence of formula citations makes this a difficult subject to trace. Primarily it is God rather than the author who is the speaker (the predominant introduction to a quote is some form of "God says"—twenty-three times it is God, four times Christ and four times the Holy Spirit), so the emphasis at all times is on divine revelation rather than human mediation. The quotations are somewhat mixed, some from books exhibiting Septuagint text A and others from books exhibiting Septuagint text B.

There has been widespread disagreement over the hermeneutical technique used, with some interpreters arguing for a Philonic type (see Philo) of allegorical exegesis (e.g., Sowers, Spicq), but most recent studies (Hanson, Longenecker) have shown a much closer correspondence with Qumran* pesher, Jewish midrash and typology. Midrash is seen in several places (e.g., Ps 95:7-11 in Heb 3:7-19; Ps 39:7-9 in Heb 10:5-10), where a text is quoted and then explained. Chain citations dominate Hebrews 1—2, as the Son* is shown to be superior to the angels* by linking together passages on the superior relation of the Son and the inferior relation of the angels to God* the Father. Typology is demonstrated in the earthly tabernacle* as a "copy" or "shadow" of the heavenly sanctuary (Heb 8:5; 9:24).

Hebrews also has a unique purpose in the quotations, with two primary thrusts. The predominant issue is christology.* The writer demonstrates not so much that Jesus is the promised Messiah (as in the Gospels) but rather shows that he is superior to the Jewish cultus: first angels (Heb 1:5-14), then Moses* (Heb 3:1-6) and rest in the land* (Heb 4:8-11), then the priesthood* (Heb 5:1-10; 7:1-28), then the covenant* (Heb 8:1-11), sanctuary (Heb 9:1-10) and sacrifices* (Heb 10:1-18). In each area the fulfillment passages prove that Jesus alone is the path to salvation.* Linked to this is the use of texts for warning and example. In Hebrews 3:7-19 and Hebrews 4:7-13, Psalm 95:7-11 is used as a warning against testing God via a hardened heart, using Israel perishing in the wilderness as an example. The passage adduced in Hebrews 11 provide positive examples of triumph through persevering faith* and hope.* In Hebrews 12:5-11, Proverbs 3:11-12 exemplifies suffering* as loving discipline from the heavenly Father.

3.3. Exegetical Technique in James. James* contains only five direct quotes but numerous allusions, drawn primarily from the Pentateuch (in Jas 2:8-11) and Proverbs (which accounts for the centrality of wisdom* in James). So pervasive is the OT influence that it is common today to call James as a whole a midrash on OT themes (see Old Testament in the General Epistles). Its way of reasoning, its hermeneutical tradition and its themes are as Jewish as they are Christian. James quotes exclusively from the Septuagint, and there is no uniform citation formula. Three passages mention "Scripture" (Jas 2:8, 23; 4:6) and two have simply "he who said" (Jas 2:10, 11; 4:6). Scriptural "fulfillment" is emphasized in James 2:8, but as R. N. Longenecker says (199) this is teleō, not plēroō, and so points to literalistic midrash rather than pesher exegesis in James.

There are two major motifs in this book. First, the "whole law" is emphasized (Jas 2:8-11) in order to demonstrate the responsibility of the Jewish Christian reader to be impartial (see Law). Here James combines the Decalogue (Jas 2:11) with the "royal law" of love from Leviticus 19:15, 18. R. J. Bauckham (309) follows L. T. Johnson in noting the extent to which Leviticus 19:12-18 permeates the epistle. This leads to the second emphasis—a paraenesis that demands the believer conform to the ethical demands of God. Several "stories" are alluded to as examples of exemplary moral behavior (Abraham,* Sarah, Rahab, Elijah, Job, the prophets) and many OT echoes on issues such as wisdom, perseverance,* trials, the problem of the tongue, concern for the poor, misuse of riches (see Riches and Poverty) and the power of prayer.*

3.4. Exegetical Technique in 1 Peter. Like James, 1 Peter* is permeated with OT themes and allusions (see Old Testament in the General Epistles). There are nine direct quotes, all from the Septuagint, and many allusions, especially in the catenae collection in 1 Peter 2:4-10. There is great variety in the citation formulae, with the characteristic "it is written" occurring only in 1 Peter 1:16 and "in Scripture it says" in 1 Peter 2:6. There are simpler introductions elsewhere: gar (1 Pet 3:10), dioti and hoti (1 Pet 1:24; 5:5), kai (1 Pet 2:8; 4:18) and hos (1 Pet 2:22), and no introduction at all in 1 Peter 2:7.

Peter mingles his OT allusions with creeds* and catechetical teachings, so there is no standard introduction. The key to Peter's approach lies in 1 Peter 1:10-12, which tells us the "prophets" (including here the psalms) spoke of "the sufferings of the Messiah and the glories after these." As Bauckham points out (310), this has similarities to 1QpHab 7:1-8 and shows that 1 Peter's exegesis can be compared with the Qumran* pesharim. This style of "this is that" interpretation can also be found in 1 Peter 1:24-25 (applying Is 40:6-8 via "this is the word that was preached to you") and 1 Peter 2:4-10 (a pesher type stringing together the passages about the stone* of Ps 118:22 and Is 28:16; 8:14).

Peter's purpose is paraenetic and deeply christological.* Christ* becomes the model for Christian suffering* in 1 Peter 1:11, 1 Peter 2:21-25 (utilizing Is 53:9) and 1 Peter 3:18-22 (cf. 1 Pet 4:13; 5:10), and one of the primary themes of the book is "suffering is the path to glory." Christians are called to realize (1) the transitory nature of life in contrast to the eternal nature of God's word (Is 40:6-8 in 1 Pet 1:24); (2) what it means to be the people of God (see Church as Israel), the "living stones" built up by God to be "chosen" and "honored" as the "spiritual house" (the stone testimonia in 1 Pet 2:4-10); (3) the necessity of a life of virtue* (Ps 34:12-14 in 1 Pet 3:10-12); (4) the value of suffering for Christ (Prov 11:31 in 1 Pet 4:18); and (5) the necessity of humility (Prov 3:34 in 1 Pet 5:5; see Pride).

3.5. Exegetical Technique in Revelation. While there are no formal citations in this work (see Revelation, Book of), it contains by far the most extensive list of allusions in the NT (see Old Testament in Revelation). H. B. Swete lists 278 allusions in the 404 verses of Revelation, and this does not count the numerous echoes permeating the book. All three major divisions of the OT are included, and Swete lists 46 references from Isaiah, 31 from Daniel, 29 from Ezekiel and 27 from the Psalms. Nowhere is there a verbatim quote from an OT passage, though at times John comes close, such as his conflation of Daniel 7:13 and Zechariah 12:10 in Revelation 1:7 or his apparent translation of the Hebrew of Psalm 2:9 in Revelation 2:27. There are two interpretive problems. (1) Normally references are strung together in catenae fashion, so that one must interpret each one in a series and then try to determine the cumulative effect. (2) John exhibits a creative use of the OT allusions, often altering details and seemingly ignoring the original context; the reader must be careful to note how the passages are applied and what they add to the context of Revelation.

On the whole Revelation utilizes midrash and typology. Yet there is a bewildering array of exegetical techniques within this broad pattern. G. K. Beale (323-32) notes several: (1) Literary prototypes, in which a particular OT pattern dominates the themes of a section, such as Daniel 3, 7 in Revelation 1, 4—5, 13, 17; (2) thematic use, such as the "abomination of desolation" or the divine warrior themes, which surface again and again in the book; (3) analogical types, such as the "serpent of old" in Revelation 12:9, the judgment* motif, the four horsemen of Revelation 6:1-8, the plagues of the trumpets* and bowls* (= the Egyptian plagues), or Gog and Magog in Revelation 20:8; (4) universalization, as OT themes that belong to Israel* are applied to larger groups, such as "kingdom of priests" from Exodus 19:6 to the church* in Revelation 1:6 and Revelation 5:10, and "they will mourn" of Zechariah 12:10 to "all the tribes of the earth" in Revelation 1:7; (5) indirect fulfillment, in which nonprophetic passages such as historical events are applied, among them the tree of life (Rev 2:7; 22:7; Gen 2:9) or the wings of the eagle (Rev 12:14; Exod 19:4); (6) inverted use, as OT texts are used contrary to their original meaning, such as Revelation 3:9 (= Is 45:14; 49:23), in which the Gentiles* bowing down to the Jews is used of Jewish persecutors bowing down to believers.

3.6. Exegetical Technique in the Apostolic Fathers. Here the exegesis is of both the OT and NT. However, as the idea of canon* was just beginning, gegraptai ("it is written") is used only of OT quotes rather than of NT quotes (see Old Testament in the Apostolic Fathers). The NT books were well-known and treated as authoritative, especially the four Gospels and the Pauline letters, but they were not yet treated as Scripture. As with NT writers, literal midrash and typology were predominant, and the apostolic fathers* took a christocentric view of the OT, that is, the whole canon pointed forward and was fulfilled in Jesus.

The use of the OT varies widely among the Fathers. Perhaps the earliest work, 1 Clement, contains at least seventy quotations and nearly one hundred allusions from the OT but no formal quotations (though there are several allusions and references to the Pauline epistles, James,* 1 Peter* and Hebrews*) from the NT. Much of it is paraenetic, with Job and Proverbs among the most frequently cited. Clement (see Clement of Rome) characteristically used the heroes of the past (Enoch, Noah, Abraham,* Moses,* Rahab) as examples of proper conduct in the present. The Epistle of Barnabas has an even more extensive OT presence (one hundred quotations, utilizing all three divisions), probably because it is a polemic against Judaism and its ceremonial regulations. There is a heavy use of typology and a christological* emphasis. Christ not only fulfilled the OT but actually spoke through it.

In contrast, in the seven letters of Ignatius* there are only two formal quotations, though he writes against judaizing teachers in the church (as well as proto-Gnostics who denied the Incarnation). He argues that the prophets* and Judaism are subordinate to Christ, and so he uses a christological hermeneutic. The Shepherd of Hermas has no formal quotations but many allusions, most of them in liturgical or catechetical contexts. 2 Clement draws most of its OT quotations from NT parallels. In short, there is wide diversity in the use of the OT, probably due to the problems faced. Those fighting a judaizing or gnostic movement tend to see the OT as subordinate to the NT, while others view it (in ways similar to the General Epistles) in paraenetic fashion as anchoring the ethical* practice of Christians. A christocentric perspective dominates.

4. Hermeneutical Difficulties.

4.1. Interpretation of Acts. The critical issues in Acts of the Apostles* have been explored elsewhere in this volume, but several interpretive problems can be discussed. Two poles might be noted at the outset. Some modern Christian interpreters (especially those associated with the contemporary missionary movement) have tended to treat Acts as a strategy text that tells us how to conduct the church's* mission.* Yet this is counter to the hermeneutical dictum that historical books deal with contingent situations and the interpreter must keep that fact carefully in view. The theology of Acts, not the events, is programmatic. The second pole is to treat the book purely as a fictive narrative with virtually no theological thrust. This misses both its historical and its theological foci. The book is a narrative whole that traces a particular theological trajectory through the life of the early church.

Moreover, Acts is the second of a two-volume, integrated work and carries on themes prepared in the Gospel of Luke. The interpretation of any single part of this work must be done in terms of the place of the passage in the developing message of the two-volume work. One must consider structure (macro and micro), plot, setting and theological themes. L. T. Johnson (409-10) discusses some of the narrative devices (summaries, speeches, journeys, parallelism) and structures (geography, prophecy [literary, programmatic and speech-narrative types]) needed to understand the book. The best title for the book would be "The Acts of the Holy Spirit Through the Apostles," because the actant throughout is not Peter or Paul but God* through the Holy Spirit.* God decides, informs and guides the events throughout the book. Peter and Paul follow his dictates. Narrative criticism and biblical theology guide the exegesis of the Acts of the Apostles.

4.2. The Interpretation of Hebrews. There has been considerable debate regarding the possibility that the author of Hebrews* engaged in Alexandrian exegesis. Affinities with the platonic approach of Philo* in terms of such peculiarities as the law* as a "shadow" (Heb 8:5; 10:1) and of the heavenly tabernacle* (Heb 8:5; 9:23-24) have led many scholars to think this epistle stems from Alexandrian Judaism.* However, recent thought has demonstrated the lack of data for such an approach; Jewish parallels, particularly an eschatological* perspective, provide closer parallels (see especially Hurst). In similar fashion E. Käsemann and others have argued that the dualism of the book and the idea of a pilgrimage of the soul from the world* to the heavenly sphere shows that the author had a gnostic* background. Yet this too has problems, for the very myth Käsemann alludes to comes from a time later than Hebrews, and the parallels are not that close. Some interpreters (e.g., Buchanan, Hughes) see a pesher exegesis and Qumran* influence in this book. The Melchizedekian* high priesthood* of Hebrews 5:8-10 and Hebrews 7:1-28 has some affinities with Qumran, as does pesher exegesis in Hebrews 1:3-13 (similar to 4QFlor) and his use of Psalm 110:4 in Hebrews 5:6 and Hebrews 7:17, 21. While there undoubtedly are similarities, it is unlikely this is the provenance of the epistle, which is more Hellenistic Jewish than Essene in its thought (see Lane, cviii).

It is best to see a Jewish typology dominating the exegesis of the book and to note an eschatological* perspective that sees salvation* as a future entity demanding perseverance* in faith* and hope* in the midst of persecution.* As H. W. Attridge says (103), "the work is fundamentally the work of a Jewish-Christian rhetor, an individual who draws freely on a broad spectrum of legends, theological and philosophical patterns, scriptural interpretations, liturgical formulas, and oratorical commonplaces." More and more it is recognized that the warning passages (Heb 2:1-4; 3:7-19; 5:11—6:12; 10:19-39; 12:14-29) show the predominantly paraenetic purpose of the book. The peril and the solution in personal perseverance* and community undergirding (cf. Heb 12:12-17; 13:1-9) are keys to the book.

4.3. The Interpretation of Revelation. There is no biblical book whose interpretation depends more upon the perspective one brings to it than does the Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of). Historically understanding has shifted among five hermeneutical approaches: (1) the historicist view that sees Revelation describing the entire period between the first and second coming of Christ* (see Parousia); (2) the preterist view that sees the book written to describe only the first-century situation of conflict between the church and the imperial cult (see Emperor; Roman Empire); (3) the sociological approach, which is a subset of the preterist but centers upon the social world behind the book (see Social Setting); (4) the idealist perspective, which sees the book as a set of timeless symbols addressing issues that Christians face at any time in history; and (5) the futurist approach, which understands the book to be describing the final eschatological* victory of God* over Satan* and the forces of evil.

Throughout Revelation's history of interpretation, it has been thought that one must choose a perspective, but it is being increasingly recognized (see Mounce, 39-45) that all the approaches have value for understanding the book. The Apocalypse addresses both present and future, it stems from a social world, and it contains symbols and emphases that speak to the church* in every age. The perspective shifts from one to another throughout the book, and often there is more than one emphasis in a given passage (e.g., the martyrdom* of the saints, combining the preterist, idealist and futurist into a single message).

The key to interpreting Revelation is in understanding how apocalyptic* functions and in interpreting the symbols accordingly:

> Apocalyptic entails the revelatory communication of heavenly secrets by an otherworldly being to a seer who presents the visions in a narrative framework; the visions guide readers into a transcendent reality that takes precedence over the current situation and encourages readers to persevere in the midst of their trials. The visions reverse normal experience by making the heavenly mysteries the real world and depicting the present crisis as a temporary, illusory situation. This is achieved via God's transforming the world for the faithful. (Osborne, 222)

The symbols function within this environment. They are drawn from the ancient apocalyptic store of symbols and communicated well to the ancient reader. The modern reader needs to use background information (Jewish and Hellenistic) to unlock their meaning. One critical aspect is that the symbols function theologically and are not a description of exactly what will take place. The reader is to understand the text as a theological message, and what will really happen is not the intended message. In other words, an early-edition newspaper approach is hermeneutically indefensible. The message of the book is as open to careful students as that of any other biblical book, so long as they utilize the exegetical tools of structure, grammar, semantics and background information. The book is also narrative, and the tools of plot, characterization, point of view and setting are also critical.

See also CANON; INTERTEXTUALITY IN EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE; LETTERS, LETTER FORMS; NARRATIVE CRITICISM; NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY; NONCANONICAL WRITINGS, CITATIONS OF; OLD TESTAMENT IN ACTS, HEBREWS, GENERAL EPISTLES, REVELATION, APOSTOLIC FATHERS; PREACHING FROM ACTS, GENERAL EPISTLES, REVELATION; PSEUDEPIGRAPHY; RHETORIC, RHETORICAL CRITICISM; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY; STRUCTURALISM AND DISCOURSE ANALYSIS; TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K.-O. Apel, Hermeneutik und Ideologiekritik (Frankfort: Suhrkamp, 1971); H. W. Attridge, "Hebrews, Epistle to the," ABD 3:97-105; D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (LEC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); J. L. Bailey, "Genre Analysis" in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation, ed. J. B. Green (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 197-221; C. K. Barrett, "Luke-Acts" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 231-44; R. Barthes, "From Work to Text" in Textual Strategies: Perspectives in Poststructuralist Criticism, ed. J. V. Harari (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979) 73-81; J. Barton, Reading the Old Testament: Method in Biblical Study (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1984); R. J. Bauckham, "James, 1 and 2 Peter, Jude" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 303-17; G. K. Beale, "Revelation" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture, ed. D. A. Carson, H. G. M. Williamson (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 318-36; G. W. Buchanan, To the Hebrews (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972); J. Derrida, "Structure, Sign and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences" in Writing and Difference, ed. A. Bass (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978) 79-153; J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of I Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); B. Fiore, "Parenesis and Protreptic," ABD 5:162-65; S. E. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method (2d ed.; New York: Crossroad, 1982); J. B. Green, "Discourse Analysis and New Testament Interpretation" in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation, ed. J. B. Green (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 175-96; G. H. Guthrie, The Structure of Hebrews: A Text-Linguistic Analysis (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); J. Habermas, Knowledge and Human Interests (2d ed.; London: Heinemann, 1978); A. T. Hanson, "Christ in the Old Testament According to Hebrews," SE 2 (1964) 393-407; R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1996); E. D. Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interpretation (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1967); P. E. Hughes, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); L. D. Hurst, The Epistle to the Hebrews: Its Background of Thought (SNTSMS 65; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990); W. Iser, The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978); E. E. Johnson, Expository Hermeneutics: An Introduction (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); L. T. Johnson, "Luke-Acts, Book of," ABD 4:403-20; idem, "The Use of Leviticus 19 in the Letter of James," JBL 101 (1982) 391-401; P. D. Juhl, Interpretation: An Essay in the Philosophy of Literary Criticism (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980); W. C. Kaiser, Toward An Exegetical Theology: Biblical Principles for Teaching and Preaching (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); E. Käsemann, The Wandering People of God: An Investigation of the Letter to the Hebrews (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); G. A. Kennedy, New Testament Interpretation Through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1984); W. L. Lane, Hebrews 1-8 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); G. R. Osborne, The Hermeneutical Spiral: A Comprehensive Introduction to Biblical Hermeneutics (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1991); S. E. Porter, "Discourse Analysis and New Testament Studies: An Introductory Survey" in Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek, ed. S. E. Porter and D. A. Carson (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 14-35; R. R. Reuther, "Feminist Interpretation: A Method of Correlation" in Feminist Interpretation of the Bible, ed. L. M. Russell (New York: Blackwell, 1985) 111-24; P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977); J. R. Searle, Expression and Meaning: Studies in the Theory of Speech Acts (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); C. Spicq, L'Épître aux Hébreux (2 vols.; Paris: Gabalda, 1952-53); S. K. Stowers, Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (LEC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); S. G. Sowers, The Hermeneutics of Philo and Hebrews: A Comparison of the Interpretation of the Old Testament in Philo Judaeus and the Epistle to the Hebrews (Richmond: John Knox, 1965); H. B. Swete, Commentary on Revelation (Grand Rapids: Kregel, n.d. [1911]); A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); idem, The Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); K. J. Vanhoozer, "The Reader in New Testament Interpretation" in Hearing the New Testament, ed. J. B. Green (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 301-28; idem, "The Semantics of Biblical Literature: Truth and Scripture's Diverse Literary Forms" in Hermeneutics, Authority and Canon, ed. D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1986) 53-104; D. F. Watson, Invention, Arrangement and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS 104; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

G. R. Osborne

HIGH PRIEST. See PRIEST, HIGH PRIEST.

HOLINESS. See HOLY, HOLINESS.

HOLY, HOLINESS

"Pursue holiness," urges the writer to the Hebrews, for without holiness "no one will see the Lord" (Heb 12:14). The word holy and its cognates permeate the NT and find prominence in the postapostolic writings. Yet these words are not always readily understood, since the fundamental idea of the Greek words for holy or holiness and the Hebrew root word (q-d-š) that underlies them is embodied in such expressions as "different from," "distinct," "devoted to," "sacred," and the like. Moral and ethical* ideas derive from these words only insofar as people are devoted to or pledge themselves to a certain kind of god, in this instance to the God* of the OT and of the NT—the living and true God, the God who is sheer goodness, who is vitally concerned with the moral and ethical.

1. The Vocabulary of Holiness
2. The Old Testament Background
3. The Idea of the Holy in the New Testament and Apostolic Fathers

1. The Vocabulary of Holiness.

The words for "holy" and "holiness" used in the NT and the apostolic fathers belong to that cluster of words derived from an old Greek root, hag- : hagiazō (make holy, sanctify), hagiasmos (holiness, sanctification), hagioprepēs (holy, proper for one who is holy), hagios (holy, sacred), hagiotēs (holiness), along with words such as hagneia (purity), hagnizō (purify), hagnismos (purification), hagnos (pure, holy) and hagnotēs (purity, sincerity). Of this multiplicity of related words, however, hagios is the one used most frequently by all our authors.

Still other words, while from a different root, are related in meaning: hosios (holy), hosiotēs (holiness) and hosiōs (in a holy manner). These words are rarely used in early Christian writings, the latter two not at all in that part of the NT under consideration (but see 1 Clem. 6.1; 21.7-8; 29.1; 32.4; 48.4; 60.2).

Hieros is still another Greek word denoting holiness—holiness or sacredness with no overtones of the ethical. It is used only infrequently in 1 Clement (see Clement of Rome) and the *Shepherd of Hermas (1 Clem. 25.5; 43.1; 45.2; 53.1; Herm. Vis. 1.10).

2. The Old Testament Background.

2.1. The Fundamental Character of God. The starting point for an understanding of these words in the NT and other early Christian writings is the OT. The OT writers reiterate that the Lord* God is holy (Lev 19:2; 21:8; Josh 24:19; Ps 22:3; Is 57:15, passim)—"holy" being the fundamental characteristic of God under which all other characteristics are subsumed—and that humans are sinful (Gen 18:20; 1 Kings 8:46; Ps 51:3; Eccles 7:20, passim).

As holy, God is transcendent above, different from, opposite to, Wholly Other (Otto, 6, 25), separate from sin and sinful people (Is 6:1-9; 55:8, 9; cf. Ex 19:20-24; Num 18:3; Heb 7:26). Sinful people, who have become so by their own choice against God (Gen 2:16, 17; 3:1-7; cf. Rom 5:12), are thereby alienated from God and powerless in that they are incapable of closing the chasm that exists between themselves and God, between the holy and the unholy (Is 50:1; 59:1, 2). God, the Holy, is also the "I am, the One who is" (Ex 3:14): God is Life. For people to be separated from God because of their sin is for them to be separated from Life. Those who were made for the purpose of living (cf. Gen 1:26) are faced with its opposite—death (Ezek 18:4).

2.2. The Actions of God. God, however, did what humans could not do. The holiness of God cannot be described merely as a state of being indicative of what God is, but also as purposeful, salvific action indicative of what God plans and carries out. The OT viewed God as transcendent in that he was distinct from sinful humans but not remote or indifferent to them (Snaith, 47). God took the initiative to make the unholy holy, to make the alien a friend, to reconcile sinners to himself (see Salvation).

An example of this is when God the holy One took the initiative to reveal himself to Israel* at Sinai and to call this people out from among other nations into a special personal relationship with himself through covenant,* law* and sacrifice* (Ex 20, 24:1-8; Lev 16). Thus, it was God who made Israel a priestly kingdom and a holy nation (Ex 19:6; Deut 7:6), a people that must preserve its distinctiveness by pursuing a way of life different from that practiced by other peoples (Deut 7:5-6; see Levine, 256), a people fit for the service of God and dedicated to do his will, a light to the nations around them (Is 49:6).

Because of God's special relation to parts of his creation* it was possible even for things to be called holy—holy only in the strict sense that they were different from the profane—wholly given over to divine purposes: the ground around a burning bush (Ex 3:5), Jerusalem* (Is 48:2), the temple* (Is 64:10), the Sabbath (Ex 16:23), priestly garments (Ex 31:10), and so on.

2.3. The Ethical Response to God. The OT meaning of "holy/holiness," however, is not exhausted with such ideas as "separate from," "dedicated to," "sacred" and the like, although these may have been the primary meanings of the words. There are also ethical and moral meanings attached to them. Again such meanings find their origin in the nature of God, for the nature of God is the determining factor that gives meaning to everything (2.1 above). Leviticus 19:1-18 clearly illustrates the moral side of God's holiness. Here it becomes clear that to be holy as God is holy is not simply to be pure* and righteous,* but to act toward others with purity and goodness, with truthfulness and honesty, with generosity, justice and love, particularly toward the poor and those who are in no position to help themselves (see esp. Lev 19:9-10, 14). Religion and ethics,* the sacred and moral, belong together in the OT; relationship to the Lord God of the OT demands an ethical/moral response. God's people must not only be like God but also act like God.

3. The Idea of the Holy in the New Testament and Apostolic Fathers.

The meaning of the words holy and holiness, although expanded in the literature under study, is squarely based on the writings of the OT. The primary meaning of holy as "separate from" is to be found in the actions of Paul and others who engaged in purification/sanctification rites (hagnizō, hagnismos) by which they ceremoniously separated themselves from the profane so as to be considered fit to enter the sacred precincts of the house of a holy God (Acts 21:24, 26; 24:18; cf. Num 6:5, 13-18; see Douglas, passim; also Barn. 8.1; 15.1, 3, 6-7). That narrow but fundamental meaning of "holy" is nevertheless inadequate to interpret all the texts that treat this concept.

3.1. The Holiness of God. In our early Christian writings "the holiness of God the Father is everywhere presumed . . . though seldom stated" (Procksch, 101). Nevertheless it is stated: God's name, the very essence of his person, is holy (Did. 10.2; 1 Clem. 64). Making use of the vocabulary of Leviticus, especially the Holiness Code in Leviticus 19-26, Peter tells those to whom he writes that it is incumbent upon them to be holy as God is holy (hagios, 1 Pet 1:15-16; cf. Lev 19:2; see Selwyn).

The writer of Hebrews* explains the disciplinary action of God as his creative work in human lives so that they may share in his holiness (hagiotēs, Heb 12.10). Once again the trisagion (see Liturgical Elements) is sung to God (cf. Is 6:3), this time by the four living creatures of the Seer's vision*—hagios, hagios, hagios (holy, holy, holy). They acclaim that God is holy to the ultimate degree and as such is the Almighty, the Pantokratōr, the one who is, who was and who is to come, eternal and omnipotent, transcendent, Wholly Other (Rev 4:8; see also 1 Clem. 34.6; 59.3). Those who were victorious over the beast sang, "Great and amazing are your deeds, Lord God the Almighty! . . . For you alone are holy" (hosios [hagios] Rev 15:3-4; 1 Clem. 59.3), and the angel of the waters, "You are just, O Holy One" (ho hosios, Rev 16:5). The martyrs,* asking for vengeance upon those who slaughtered them for serving God, address God as "Sovereign Lord, holy and true (ho hagios kai alēthinos), "because they know that God, as holy, stands apart from and opposed to sin and evil and that he alone is able to administer justice and judge rightly (Rev 6:10).

God as holy is to be feared (cf. Ps 89:7; 99:3; 111:9); he is a consuming fire (Heb 12:29). He owns the right to judge and to take vengeance (cf. Deut 32:35). But in the NT and other early Christian writings God takes no delight in banishing sinners from him. He delights instead in making them holy, in creating a people fit for his presence, in bringing them close to himself and in giving them sacred work to do (cf. Is 6:1-8). As a consequence God sends his good news (see Gospel) out into the world so that sinful people may "turn from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, so that they may receive forgiveness of sins and a place among those who are sanctified [hēgiasmenoi], " i.e., among those who have been made holy and have been set apart to God (Acts 26:18; cf. 20:32). It is important to note here that the expression "those who are sanctified" is a passive participle (from hagiazō, make holy, consecrate, sanctify) that has been termed a "divine passive." That is, God is the agent of the action. He has taken the initiative not to destroy sinners but to make them holy (cf. Herm. Vis. 3.9.1).

It is God's will that sinful people be made holy (Heb 10:10). But it was costly for God to realize this wish. Under the old covenant sinners were made holy on the basis of animals being properly sacrificed year after year in their behalf (Lev 16)—tentatively made holy (cf. Rom 3:25; Heb 10:4). Under the new covenant sinners are made holy or sanctified (hēgiasmenoi/hagiazomenous) by a much more profound act—the conscious, deliberate choice of Jesus Christ,* God's Son, radically to obey his Father and offer his body in death as a single sacrifice for sins forever (Heb 10:5-10, 12, 14, 29; cf. Phil 2:8; Diogn. 9.2; see Death of Christ). The blood of Jesus (an expression that refers to the self-determined action of Jesus to die on behalf of sinful human beings) is that by which sinful persons are made holy. The explicit purpose of his suffering and death was that the unclean might become clean, that he might make unholy people holy (hagiasē, Heb 13:12; see also 9:13; 1 Clem. 32.4; 59.3; Barn. 5.1).

In the writings under consideration, as in the OT, places and things as well as persons can be considered holy. Thus the temple is called "the holy place" (Acts 6:13; 21:28). The two tents of the tabernacle are referred to as "the holy place" (hagia, Heb 9:1) and "the Holy of Holies" (hagia hagiōn, Heb 9:3; see also 9:1, 12, 24, 25; 10:19; 13:11). The mountain on which Jesus was transfigured is designated as "the holy [hagios] mountain" (2 Pet 1:18; cf. Barn. 11.3). The Christian faith* is termed "the most holy [hagiōtatē faith" (Jude 20). Jerusalem is called "the holy [hagian] city" (Rev 11:2; 21:2, 10; 22:11, 19). Presbyters are holy (Ign. Magn. 3.1), the Eucharist is holy (Did. 9.5), the church* is holy (Herm. Vis. 1.1.6; Mart. Pol. presc.), prophets* are holy (Acts 3:21; 2 Pet 3:2), angels* are holy (Acts 10:22; cf. Jude 14; Rev 14:10; 1 Clem. 39:7; Herm. Sim. 5.4.4; Herm. Vis. 5.5.3).

3.2. The Holiness of Jesus Christ. The NT describes Jesus as holy, a person set apart to God, anointed by him (Acts 4:27; see Anointing), dedicated to God and designated as his unique instrument to carry out his predestined plan in the world (Acts 4:28). But holy is also used of Jesus as it is used of God the Father.

The early church understood Psalm 16:10, said to be written by David and about David, to have had its fulfillment in the resurrected Jesus—"You will not . . . let your Holy [hosion] One experience corruption" (Acts 2:27; 13:35). Peter referred to Jesus as "the Holy [ton hagion] and Righteous One" (Acts 3:14), seemingly in the moral sense of innocent since he linked the word so closely with the anarthrous dikaion ("righteous"—ton hagion kai dikaion; cf. Lk 23:47 and see Conzelmann, 28). In a later sermon Peter speaks of Jesus as God's "holy [hagion] servant/son" (pais, Acts 4:27; 30).

But the NT and early Fathers say more than this about Jesus. He is the one who makes others holy (ho hagiazōn, Heb 2:11; 13:12), who consecrates them to God and his service that they might be admitted into his presence (cf. Procksch, 89-97). "Jesus is here [in Heb 2:11] exercising a divine function since, according to the OT, it is God who consecrates" (Montefiore, 62; cf. Ex 31:13; Lev 20:8; 21:15; 22:9, 16, 32; Ezek 20:12; 37:28; but see Attridge, 88 n. 107).

Borrowing the language of Isaiah 8:12-13 Peter calls upon Christians to "sanctify [hagiasate] Christ as Lord" (1 Pet 3:15). They are to acknowledge that he is holy (cf. Is 29:23; Ezek 20:41; Ecclus 36:4, Mt 6:9)—holy in the sense that God is holy—for as J. N. D. Kelly has remarked, this verse "has a bearing on 1 Peter's Christology. . . . [As] in ii,3 the title 'the Lord', which in the Hebrew original denotes God, is unhesitatingly attributed to Christ" (Kelly, 142; see Christology; 1 Peter).

"The Holy One," a frequent name of God in the OT (2 Kings 19:22; Ps 71:22; 78:41; Is 1:4, passim), appears also in 1 John 2:20 ("you have been anointed by the Holy One [tou hagiou])." Although there is debate over whether this expression refers to God the Father or to Jesus Christ, in light of the context and especially in light of 2:27-28 it seems more likely that it is a title given to Jesus (see also Diogn. 9.2).

In his vision the Seer reads a letter addressed to the church at Philadelphia. It begins, "These are the words of the Holy One" (ho hagios, Rev 4:7). From the context of this letter (see Rev 2:18; 3:1) this Holy One is none other than the crucified, dead and risen Christ, the one who was and is and will forever be (Rev 1:17-18; cf. Rev 4:8; Diogn. 9.2). These writers want everyone to understand that Jesus is holy in the sense that God is holy—"holy [hosios, a word chosen to emphasize the moral dimension of holiness], blameless, undefiled, separated from sinners, and exalted above the heavens" (Heb 7:26). In naming him "the Holy One" they claim for him the title of deity.

3.3. The Holiness of God's People: Sanctification. In our writings Christians are God's holy people. These are sinful people who have responded with faith in and gratitude to God, who provided the means by which they might be reconciled to him, to be sanctified, to be made holy—action so radical that it required the death of his Son, Jesus Christ (Heb 10:5-10). All early Christian writings affirm this, but the letter to the Hebrews describes it most fully (Heb 2:11; 9:13; 10:10, 14, 29; 13:12; see also Acts 20:32; 26:18; Rev 22:11). Christians, therefore, but including grateful and believing Israel, have become the new Israel of God, "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation" (1 Pet 2:9; cf. Ex 19:6; see Priest).

The most common term describing Christians is hoi hagioi, consistently translated "saints" (Acts 9:13, 32, 41; Heb 3:1; 6:10; 13:24; Rev 5:8; 8:3-4; 11:18; 13:7, 10; 14:12; 16:6; 18:20, 24; 19:8; 20:9; 22:21 [?]; 1 Clem. 56.1; Ign. Phld. 5.2; Did. 4.2; 16.7, passim). "Saints" is perhaps not the most felicitous translation for this expression, since in popular usage it too often connotes people who rarely or never sin, when in fact this is not always the case (cf. Gal 2:11-14; Phil 1:14-16, passim). Hagioi (holy/saints) refers to persons who are holy because of God's gracious choice of them (Asting, 133-51). It primarily refers to persons who have a new ground of existence, who have been oriented away from the world and turned toward God, and not primarily to persons who are morally and ethically perfect.

Yet moral and ethical meanings do inhere in this word, for such meanings derive from the fact that Christians are persons who are set apart unto and dedicated to this God who has revealed himself in Jesus Christ, who is just, merciful, true, trustworthy, good, and so on (cf. 1 Jn 1:5). Therefore they are persons who have been turned toward God and toward doing his will. But doing the will of God does not come without conscious decision. Hence, the indicative of the verb—"we have been sanctified, made holy, made God's people" (hēgiasmenoi esmen, Heb 10:10)—is quickly followed by the imperative: "As he [God] is holy, be holy [genēthēte hagioi] yourselves" (1 Pet 1:15). And again, "Cleanse your hands, you sinners, purify [hagnisate] your hearts, you double-minded" (Jas 4:8. The seriousness of this command is such that James* underscores it by addressing his Christian readers as "sinners" and "double-minded" people; see Martin, 153).

In Hebrews the perfect tense of the verb hēgiasmenoi esmen ("we have been sanctified, made holy," Heb 10:10) is followed by the present tense (tous hagiazomenous, "those who are being made holy," Heb 10:14 NIV). Thus, paradoxically, holiness is both an established fact for Christians and at the same time a process. Christians both are holy and are becoming holy. They are people who have been made holy, made God's special people by virtue of what God has done to them and for them in Christ (Heb 10:10). But they are also people who must allow the creative power of this redemptive act to work itself out in shaping their day-to-day behavior.

When Peter says, "Be holy as God is holy," he is not thinking of holiness in the abstract, for he goes on to say, "be holy in all your conduct" (1 Pet 1:15); you must be leading lives of holiness (2 Pet 3:11; cf. 1 Clem. 48.5). Peter's "be holy in daily conduct" is not, however, holiness solely limited to that of sexual purity, as often is the case in the apostolic fathers (cf. 1 Clem. 30.1; 38.2; 2 Clem. 8.4, 6; Herm. Man. 4.1.1; Pol. Phil. 5.3), although it includes this. Peter's command is enlarged to embrace purity in the fullest sense of this word—utter goodness in every aspect of life (note how 1 Pet 1:15-16 recalls Lev 19:2-14, which defines the meaning of the word hagios; see also 1 Pet 1:22; 3:2; Jas 3:17-18; 1 Jn 3:3; 1 Clem. 6.1; 21.7-8). Christians are holy and at the same time are people who are continually being shaped so as to share comfortably in God's holiness (hagiotētos, Heb 12:10; 1 Clem. 56.16).

See also GOD; HOLY SPIRIT; PURITY AND IMPURITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Asting, Die Heiligkeit im Urchristentum (FRLANT 46; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1930); H. W. Attridge, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); D. Bloesch, "Salt and Light: Our Vocation to Holiness," Touchstone: A Journal of Ecumenical Orthodoxy 5 (1992) 25-28; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribners, 1951, 1955) 1:332-33; F. G. Carver, "The Quest for the Holy: The Darkness of God," WTJ 23 (1988) 7-32; H. Conzelmann, Acts of the Apostles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); M. Douglas, In the Wilderness: The Doctrine of Defilement in the Book of Numbers (Sheffield, JSOT, 1993); J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and of Jude (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1969); B. A. Levine, "Biblical Concepts of Holiness" in The JPS Torah Commentary, Leviticus (Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society, 1989) 256-57; R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1988); H. Montefiore, The Epistle to the Hebrews (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1964); R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1946); O. Procksch and K. G. Kuhn, "ἅγιος κτλ," TDNT 1:88-115; E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981 [1947]); N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament (London: Epworth, 1944); N. Wolterstorff, "Liturgy, Justice, and Holiness," Reformed Journal 39 (1989) 12-20.

G. F. Hawthorne

HOLY CITY. See JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY.

HOLY SPIRIT

There is a sense in which the OT was the age of law* and prophecy,* a period when the Spirit of God came powerfully upon or into the lives of a variety of people—priests,* judges, kings, prophets* and the like—but only sporadically and for a brief time in order to accomplish certain specific tasks on God's behalf for God's people. With the coming of Jesus Christ, however, the eschatological* age dawned (see Heb 1:1-2), the age of the Spirit was inaugurated. Then not only did the Spirit come upon/into (Mk 1:10) Jesus at his baptism* and remain with him throughout his life (cf. Lk 4:1), but later and as a consequence of Jesus' death (see Death of Christ), resurrection* and exaltation,* the Spirit was "poured out," in the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy (Joel 3:1-5), upon all of Jesus' followers—irrespective of gender, age, race or social status—and upon them permanently (see Acts 2:4, 17-20, passim). The age of hope* had given way to the age of fulfillment, so that the gift of the Spirit is presently available to all who repent* and believe in the name of Jesus Christ. The promised gift of the Holy Spirit belongs now both to those who are near (Jews) and to those afar off (Gentiles*) (Acts 2:38).

1. Etymology
2. Terminology
3. The Holy Spirit in the Life of Jesus
4. The Holy Spirit and the Church
5. The Holy Spirit and the Inspiration of Scripture
6. The Holy Spirit and the Trinity

1. Etymology.

In all the writings under consideration the word translated "Spirit" (i.e., the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit), is the Greek word pneuma (the equivalent of its Hebrew counterpart, rûaḥ) whose fundamental meaning is "air in motion." This word encompasses such ideas as wind, gale, storm or blast (see Ex 14:21; 15:8; Gen 1:2, where von Rad translates rûaḥ 'elohim [Spirit of God] as "Storm of God," von Rad, 49)—ideas of immense power,* force and uncontrollable strength; or ideas of peace, quietness and refreshment, for pneuma may also be used to describe something as gentle as a breeze (see Gen 3:8). Significantly, pneuma also means "breath," the breath of one's mouth or nostrils and by extension the breath of life—the stuff of existence for all living beings (see Gen 2:7; Ps 104:29-30).

It is this word that OT, NT and early Christian writers attach to God in an attempt to describe him, to tell in part who he is: God is pneuma, wind, and as such he is invisible, irresistible, unpredictable, uncontrollable power. He is pneuma, breath, and as such he imparts life and vitality into every living creature. He is pneuma, air in motion, and as such is movement and action, energy at work, everywhere and always present to create and re-create, to sustain, to order, to renew, to revive. This Spirit of God is God, the living God, who infuses new life into his people, filling them with strength, wisdom,* moral courage and power, heightening and enhancing their natural abilities, equipping them in an extraordinary fashion so as to take them beyond the borders of their own limitations, preparing them to carry out significant moral and ethical roles in the course of redemptive history (Hawthorne, 14-23).

2. Terminology.

The titles most frequently used for this "breath of God" in the OT and in the OT apocryphal and pseudepigraphal writings are "the Spirit," "the Spirit of God" and "the Spirit of the Lord." The name, "[the] Holy Spirit," occurs in only two places in the OT (Ps 51:11; Is 63:10-11) and somewhat more often in later writings (4 Ezra 14:22; Asc. Is. 5:14; cf. CD 2:11-13; 1QS 3:6-12). It becomes the standard term in rabbinical literature, meaning the Spirit of God as "an entity which stands outside [a person], and which comes to [that person] from God in special situations and under special circumstances" (Sjöberg, 6:381; for other, less frequently occurring titles see Is 11:1-2; Zech 12:10).

The NT and early Christian documents produce a plethora of titles by which attempts were made to catch in a net of words this elusive, universal, immediate, life-changing power that was daily being experienced by ordinary people. The Spirit of God, which many of Israel's* teachers taught had fallen silent or had ceased to be active in the world or was no longer needed now that the Hebrew Scriptures were complete (see Davies, 208-15; Scott, 47, 50; but cf. Aune, 103-47), was once again observed to be present and active. It is as though the world had suddenly awakened to the fact that the longed-for universal age of the Spirit had dawned (see Joel 2:28-29), that the hoped-for new era when God's people would continuously be infused with, inspired and motivated by the Spirit had at last arrived (Is 61). It is no wonder, then, that some of our literature abounds with references to the Spirit and that the titles now are far more varied than before.

As in the OT, especially in Ezekiel, "Spirit" or "the Spirit" are titles frequently used in the NT and the apostolic fathers* to designate the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 6:3 with 6:5; 1 Pet 1:2; 1 Clem. 42.4, passim). Surprising, however, is the fact that the familiar OT terms such as "the Spirit of God" and "the Spirit of the Lord" hardly occur in our literature. "The Spirit of God" appears in the NT only in 1 Peter 4:14 and 1 John 4:2 and in the early Fathers only in Hermas, Mandates 10.2.6; "the Spirit of the Lord" occcurs only in Acts 5:9; 8:39, 1 Clement 21.2 and The Epistle of Barnabas 6.14 and 9.2.

Yet the excitement generated by the presence and power of the Spirit in the Christian community fostered an irresistible desire on its part to set forth in words the nature of this presence, to explain as clearly as possible the overwhelming significance of the Spirit, to try to make comprehensible the incomprehensible. This desire led to the creation of a variety of new terms to describe the person and work of the Spirit. Thus in addition to the aforementioned terms, the Spirit is called "the promise of the Father" (Acts 1:4; 2:33, 39; cf. Lk 24:49; Jn 14:16, 26; 15:26; Joel 2:28-29), "the Spirit of life" (Rev 11:11), "the Spirit of truth" (1 Jn 4:6; Herm. Man. 3.4), "the Spirit of grace" (Heb 10:29; 1 Clem. 46.6), "the eternal Spirit" (Heb 9:14), "the blameless Spirit" (Ign. Smyrn. presc.), "the seven Spirits of God" (Rev 1:4; 3:1; 4:5; 5:6; see Bruce, 336), "the delicate [trypheron] Spirit" (Herm. Man. 5.2.6, indicating, no doubt, that the Holy Spirit is easily grieved by wickedness within the human heart), "the prophetic Spirit" and "the Spirit of prophecy" (Herm. Man. 11.9; Rev 19:10, calling attention to the Spirit as the inspirer of Scripture), "the Spirit of the Godhead (theotētos; Herm. Man. 11.10) and "the Divine (theion) Spirit" (Herm. Man. 11.7, 12, 21), terms that imply the deity of the Spirit, thereby moving the thinking of the church forward in its development of the doctrine of the Trinity.

Another new and important title given to the Holy Spirit, yet one that would be easily understood, is "the Anointing" (to chrismon, 1 Jn 2:20, 27): "You have an anointing from the Holy One and all of you have knowledge," an allusion to the Holy Spirit that Jesus poured out upon his followers like an anointing oil (Acts 2:32-33; cf. 1 Sam 16:17-18). This anointing* imparted to Christians a special gift of knowledge* about God* and about Christ and about their relation to God and Christ (see 1 Jn 3:24; 4:13).

The most common title for the Spirit is "[the] Holy Spirit" (hagion pneuma, to hagion pneuma, to pneuma to hagion)—rare in the OT but abundant in our literature. The reason for this radical alteration in terminology is not completely clear. Perhaps it is because now it is more fully understood that it is the Spirit who sets the people of faith* apart ("set apart" is the fundamental meaning of hagios, holy; see Holiness) from the profane world unto God and who consecrates them to God's service* (cf. 1 Pet 1:2). More likely, however, it is because the Spirit was being dramatically experienced as the power of God by which God was effecting changes in the lives of human beings on a very large scale, transforming them from sinners into a holy people as God himself is holy (1 Pet 1:15-16; cf. Lev 19), that is, effectively working out in them God's "personal will directed to a religious and moral end" (Baumgärtel, 365), making them ethically and morally good people (cf. Ezek 11:19; 18:31; 36:26; Acts 2:1-41; see Herm. Man. 11.7-8; see Ethics).

Perhaps the titles for the Spirit that call for the greatest reflection are those that bring the Spirit and Jesus close together in a dialectical pattern of identity and distinction, arising no doubt from the fact that "Christ and the Spirit are so closely associated in the life of Christians that their names are interchangeable" (Hendry, 24): "the Spirit of Jesus" (Acts 16:7; see Stählin, 229-52), "the Spirit of Christ" (1 Pet 1:11), "the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (Ign. Magn. 1.2), "the unhesitating/unwavering [adiakriton] Spirit, who is Christ" (Ign. Magn. 15.1), "the Spirit is Christ" (2 Clem. 14.4) and "the Holy Spirit . . . is the Son of God" (Herm. Sim. 9.1.1). The preposition of in the expression "the Spirit of Jesus, of Christ, of Jesus Christ" need not necessarily lead one to identify the Spirit with Christ, since at base the function of the preposition is only to describe a close relationship existing between the two and may simply convey an idea similar to that of the Fourth Gospel, in which the Spirit of Christ is the Spirit who witnesses to Christ (cf. Jn 14:26; 15:26; 1 Cor 12:3). But the ambiguity of the expressions obviously led some of the Fathers to go beyond this and say that the one is the other and not to make a distinction between Christ and the Spirit (cf. Rom 8:9-10; 1 Cor 10:4; 2 Cor 3:18; see the confused and confusing passage in Herm. Sim. 5.6.5-7; also in the same vein, 2 Clem. 9.5).

3. The Holy Spirit in the Life of Jesus.

The Gospel writers record decisive points in the life and ministry of Jesus, noting the presence of the Holy Spirit in each of these—his baptism, his temptation,* his preaching,* his exorcisms, and so on. Recording these events in this way, they make it clear that their intent was to describe the life of the Son of God become incarnate as that of a truly human person who was wholly guided and empowered by the Spirit (Hendry, 19). This theme is picked up in our literature and is clearly and succinctly summarized in Acts 2:22 and Acts 10:38. There it is stated that "Jesus the Nazarene was a man marked out by God with mighty works, wonders and signs which God did through him" (Acts 2:22), for "God had anointed him [made him Messiah] with the Holy Spirit and power"; as a consequence, "he always went about (diēlthen, see BDF 332.1) doing good [euergetōn] and healing [iōmenos] all who were overpowered by the devil because God was with him" (Acts 10:38; see Robinson, 125; Swete 1976, 59). The whole of Jesus' ministry* is here regarded as "made up of a continuous series of acts of beneficence"—"God's decisive attack upon the (personally conceived) power of evil" (Barrett, 1:525)—performed by Jesus in the power of the Holy Spirit (cf. Is 61:1-2; 42:1; 11:1-3; see Hawthorne, 97-172).

It is of interest that in our texts only Ignatius* refers to the role that the Holy Spirit played at the birth of Jesus: "Our God, Jesus the Christ, was conceived by Mary . . . of [ek] the seed of David and of the Holy Spirit" (Ign. Eph. 18.2, an allusion to Rom 1:3).

The writer to the Hebrews* alone describes the presence and power of the Holy Spirit at the death of Jesus. He writes, "Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish to God" (Heb 9:14). Behind these words "lies the portrayal of the Isaianic Servant of the Lord, who yields up his life to God as a guilt offering for many, bearing their sin and procuring their justification. When this servant is introduced for the first time, God says: 'I have put my Spirit upon him' (Is 42:1). It is in the power of the Divine Spirit, accordingly, that the Servant accomplishes every phase of his ministry, including the crowning phase in which he accepts death for the transgression of his people" (Bruce, 205; cf. the enigmatic words of Barn. 7.2-3).

In the literature we are considering there are repeated statements that God raised up Jesus and freed him of the pains, or pangs, of death (Acts 2:24, 32; 3:15, 26; 4:10; 5:30-31; 13:33-34; 17:31; 1 Pet 1:21; Ign. Magn. 9.3; [in one place Ignatius says that Jesus raised himself, Ign. Smyrn. 2]; Pol. Phil. 2.1-2). But how did God do this? By what power did God effect this mighty act of resurrection?

It is possible to infer that the power by which God did this was the power of the Holy Spirit, especially when one considers that the Holy Spirit of God was present in every significant event of Jesus' existence—at his birth, in his life and ministry, and at his death. This inference is strengthened by the implication of the somewhat enigmatic creedal* statement of 1 Peter 3:18, variously translated "He [Christ] was put to death in the flesh, but made alive [zōopoiētheis] in the spirit" (NRSV) or "He was put to death in the body but made alive by the Spirit" (NIV). This statement has been taken by some to be an unmistakable reference to Jesus' resurrection by the Spirit. The parallels with the two other creedal statements involving flesh-spirit distinctions (i.e., Rom 1:3-4; 1 Tim 3:16) confirm the contention that "spirit" here refers to that sphere of Christ's existence "in which God's Holy Spirit was supremely and most conspicuously at work" (Dalton, 129-30). "Jesus was 'put to death' by human hands, not by God, but it was God who brought him to life by the power of the Spirit (cf. 4:6)" (Michaels, 204; cf. Mart. Pol. 14.2).

Further, the possibility that God raised Jesus by the power of his Spirit seems to be an increasingly reasonable supposition upon noting the words of Luke's introduction of his second treatise to Theophilus: "I wrote about all that Jesus began both to do and to teach until the day in which he was received up after he had given commandment [cf. Mt 28:19-20; Lk 24:45-49; Jn 20:21-23] through the Holy Spirit to the apostles he had chosen" (Acts 1:1-2; see Robinson, 125). This is to say, that during the forty-day period after his resurrection and before he was taken up to heaven Jesus continued to instruct his disciples, as he had done before, "by means of the Holy Spirit." Thus Jesus' entire time on earth, from his birth until his exaltation,* which includes his resurrection, is bracketed by references to the presence and power of the Holy Spirit effectively at work in every significant event of his life (see Hawthorne, 184-94).

4. The Holy Spirit and the Church.

4.1. The Initial Coming of the Holy Spirit. From the beginning of time the Spirit of God has been present and active in the world (Gen 1:2). Never has there been a period in human history when this has not been so—the Spirit creatively at work bringing order, relief and life in the midst of chaos, suffering* and death; the Spirit persistently and effectively reversing the process of destruction and decay; the Spirit in concrete ways acting "against the power of sin, despair, cynicism and death" (Welker, 340). If there was a time when the Spirit was thought to be absent, removed from the sphere of human affairs, no longer visibly evident (see Davies, 208-15; Scott, 47, 50), even then the Spirit was present and at work. There is, however, a difference in emphasis at different times with regard to the activity of the Spirit. The OT primarily focuses attention upon the presence and power of the Spirit in periods of national crisis and in the lives of select individuals. The NT, however, primarily focuses attention upon the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in the life of Jesus and then through him in the lives of all his followers.

After his resurrection Jesus told his disciples to wait in Jerusalem* until they should receive the promise of the Father, the promise of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:4-5; 2:33). This waiting period ended on the day of Pentecost* (Acts 2:1), the fiftieth day after Passover (hē pentēkostē [hēmera] = the fiftieth [day]). Pentecost was the Jewish "feast of weeks" (Deut 16:9-12) or the "day of the first fruits" (Num 28:26), so called because it was when the first fruits of wheat harvest were offered to God (Ex 34:22; cf. Tob 2:1; Josephus Ant. 17.10.2 §254). Later Jewish writers viewed Pentecost as the commemoration of the giving of the law* by Moses* (Str-B 2:601). It is tempting to speculate about why this particular day was chosen to end the waiting period and mark the coming of the Holy Spirit—e.g., as Pentecost was thought to commemorate the gift of the Law that resulted in the old covenant* between God and his ancient people, so this same day was selected to celebrate the gift of the Spirit, based upon the life, death, resurrection and exaltation of Jesus that issued in a new covenant between God and his new or renewed people (see Schweizer, 411; Jub. 6:17-19; see also Jub. 1:1; 15:1; 44:4-5; Philo Decal. 33, 35; Philo Spec. Leg. 2.189). But such attempts have proved futile (see Lohse, 49-50; Barrett, 111). It appears that Luke was attempting only to state a fact, not make a theological statement.

Whatever may have been the significance of this particular day, Jesus' followers—no doubt the entire 120 (see Acts 1:15)—were together in one place. Then an unforgettable and decisive experience in the life of the church occurred—an event that was both audible and visible. Luke describes it as a sound like the rush of a violent wind and as the appearance of divided tongues of fire resting on each of the persons present (Acts 2:1-3). It is not possible adequately "to translate this experience into terms which convey the true significance to us" today (Bruce, 54), but certainly both wind and fire are familiar biblical terms that call to mind the presence and power of God, of the Spirit of God, creatively at work in the world (cf. Ezek 37:9-14; Ex 3:2-6). Thus it is not surprising to read immediately after this description of such an extraordinary happening that "all of them were filled with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:4), which Peter interprets both as the fulfillment of God's promise through the prophet Joel (Acts 2:17-21, quoting Joel 3:1-3) and as the direct result of the resurrected and exalted Christ lavishly bestowing on his church* the gift of the Holy Spirit which he had received from his Father (Acts 2:32-33).

Only in Acts 2—nowhere else in the NT or apostolic fathers—is this founding gift of the Holy Spirit described. Only here is the initial fulfillment of Jesus' promise to his followers that they would be infused with supernatural power detailed. Only here is the permanent coming of the Holy Spirit to live in the lives of the faithful, to indwell the community of believers, the church, made known. What then is one to make of the so-called additional comings of the Spirit described in Acts 8:16 and Acts 10:44 = 11:15? To be sure, the Greek verb that is used in these texts, epipiptō (lit. "to fall upon") is similar in meaning to other verbs—eperchesthai (Acts 1:8, "to come upon"), pimplēnai (Acts 2:4, "to fill"), or baptizesthai en (Acts 1:5, "to be baptized in")—used by Luke of that initial giving of the Holy Spirit.

Was there then more than one initial gift of the Spirit to the church? If the answer is no, perhaps the subsequent events recorded in Acts 8 and Acts 10 can be explained not so much as new comings but rather as necessary demonstrations that this same Spirit was no longer exclusively for believing Israel but was now present and available to all who believe. In other words, these so-called comings were concrete, visible proofs that Samaritans (Acts 8:16; see Samaria) and Gentiles (Acts 10:44 = 11:15)—people despised or looked down upon as outsiders by Israel—were now fully included among the recipients of God's gracious gift of the Spirit, proofs that the church, which from the beginning, though located only in Jerusalem, "is . . . a universal society in which universal communication is possible" (Barrett, 108). The Spirit once-for-all given at Pentecost to Jewish believers in Jerusalem is seen now to pervade every part of the believing community drawn from among all the nations of the world (Acts 1:8; 2:38-39; Barn. 1.3).

4.2. On Receiving the Holy Spirit. To discuss the initial coming of the Holy Spirit upon the faithful in Jerusalem at Pentecost is one thing. But when and how does the Spirit come upon or into each new believer subsequently? How does each new believer receive the Holy Spirit? Of the writings being studied in this volume only the book of Acts* gives an answer to this question, and its answer is unclear.

Certain texts seem to connect baptism so closely with the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; 19:1-7) that interpreters have come to understand that baptism is a necessary prerequisite for the coming of the Spirit into the life of the believer, a rite of the church by which the faithful receive the Spirit (e.g., Luther: "This doctrine is to remain sure and firm, that the Holy Spirit is given through the office of the church, that is through the preaching of the gospel and baptism," quoted by Lenski, 109; see more recently, Conzelmann, 22: "Baptism and receiving the Spirit belong together").

But if it is true that the gift of the Holy Spirit is contingent upon baptism, it is remarkable that there is such a varying relation in Acts of baptism to the coming of the Holy Spirit. In Acts 2:38 baptism precedes the gift of the Holy Spirit, from which it could be argued that baptism is a prerequisite for receiving the Spirit. But in Acts 8:16 baptism and the coming of the Spirit are not connected, and in Acts 8:36-39 the Ethiopian eunuch is baptized without any mention of the Holy Spirit coming upon him (see also Acts 9:17-19; 16:14-17, 31-33; 18:8; but note the variant reading to Acts 8:39). In Acts 10:44 the Spirit falls upon Cornelius* and his household* before their baptism takes place, whereas in Acts 18:24-26 baptism appears to be an unnecessary or at least an unmentioned element in the instruction given to Apollos. Finally, in Acts 19:5-6 it appears that the Holy Spirit is not so much conferred upon those who believe by baptism as it is by the laying on of the apostle's* hands (see Barrett, 154).

There is, then, in Acts no consistent tie to enable one to say unequivocally that the Spirit is received at baptism. Nor do the apostolic fathers make any such connection between baptism and the giving of the Spirit (Barn. 11.11 excepted, although the translation there of the key expression, en tō pneumati, is open to question: "in our spirit" [Swete 1912, 19], "in the Spirit" [Lake, Loeb trans.]).

If our texts will not permit one to argue with complete confidence that water baptism (though important) is a prerequisite for the conferring of the Holy Spirit, it is possible to infer from them that whenever the Spirit "falls upon" or "fills" any person or group of persons it is because of their positive response to the divine person who encounters them in the gospel.* For example, even while Peter was proclaiming the gospel to the receptive Cornelius and his household the Holy Spirit "fell upon all who heard the word" (Acts 10:44), an event that brought to mind the word of the Lord: "John baptized with water, but you will be baptized with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 11:15-16). Thus the all-important baptism is the baptism with the Spirit, namely, the coming of the Holy Spirit upon or into the community or into the life of individuals. This baptism is predicated upon and coincident with faith in Jesus—in his person, life, death, resurrection and exaltation (cf. Acts 8:12, 14-17; 16:14-17, 31-33; 18:8, passim).

It seems clear from comparing Acts 1:5 with Acts 1:8 and Acts 2:4 that baptism with the Holy Spirit and being filled with the Holy Spirit are to be equated. Nothing is to be found in the book of Acts (and Acts is the principal source of information about the person and work of the Spirit in the literature under discussion) to indicate that the Holy Spirit once imparted was ever taken away from those to whom it was given—church or individual. In fact "Luke [in Acts] believes that the gift of the Spirit is constitutive of the Christian life (see [Acts] 19.1-6; there is something wrong with a disciple who has not received the Holy Spirit)" (Barrett, 115).

What then is meant when Acts says that at a later time Peter and the other believers "were filled" with the Holy Spirit (Acts 4:8, 31; 13:52; see also Acts 9:17 with 13:9)? Perhaps the answer to this question can be gained by comparing the Holy Spirit in the life of Jesus with that of the Spirit in the life of the church. Luke records that at Jesus' baptism the Holy Spirit descended upon him, filled him, was constantly leading (hēgeto) him during the forty days of his wilderness testing (Lk 3:21-22; 4:1-2) and was present with him throughout the remainder of his life (cf. Lk 4:14, 18), even at the cross (cf. Heb 9:4). Nevertheless, there are points noted by the Evangelists in the ministry of Jesus where it might be said that Jesus, "filled with the Spirit," healed, spoke, saw or rejoiced. That is, he who was filled with the Spirit at all times was especially inspired by the Spirit at special moments during his ministry. For example, Luke records that on one such occasion "the power [= Spirit, see Acts 1:8; Herm. Man. 11.21] of the Lord was at hand for him to heal" (Lk 5:17). Again, when the woman with an incurable menstrual flow purposefully touched Jesus' clothes, he knew "that power [= Holy Spirit] had gone out from him" (Lk 8:46). Jesus' disciples returned to him with word of their success over the forces of evil. At that instant, it would appear, the Spirit gave him a flash of insight to see in their successes Satan's fall like a lightning bolt from heaven, for Luke goes on to say that "at that time Jesus, full of joy by the Holy Spirit," began to praise God (Lk 10:17-21).

So it is with Peter and all other Christians, initially and continuously filled with the Holy Spirit from conversion. When they are faced with especially difficult and challenging experiences they need from the Holy Spirit a special endowment of insight, inspiration, effective speech, power and emotional strength successfully to carry out their mission in life.

4.3. The Work of the Holy Spirit. It has already been noted that believers in Jesus who were filled with the Holy Spirit from the inception of the church (Acts 2:4) were also "filled with the Spirit" at certain important junctures in life (Acts 4:8). That is to say, they were especially empowered by the Spirit to go beyond the limits of their own innate human abilities so as to carry out a God-given mission in fulfillment of Jesus' words, "You will receive power [focused power, power to achieve some good end] when the Holy Spirit comes upon you" (Acts 1:8).

For example, it is the Holy Spirit who gives Peter, perceived as an "uneducated and ordinary" person, a special power of effective speech (Acts 4:8), so that even the learned elite are forced to recognize the unusualness of his eloquence (Acts 4:13). This power was not given solely to Peter in the history of the church, nor was it intended to be limited to him (Acts 6:10 with 6:5; cf. Lk 12:11-12; see Swete 1976, 84).

Further, it is the Holy Spirit that gives humble men and women, when faced with real threats to their life and welfare, supernormal courage to speak the word of the Lord with boldness and carry to completion the task they believed God wanted them to accomplish regardless of the consequences (Acts 4:31; 7:54-56; 20:23; Mart. Pol. 14).

The Holy Spirit on occasion lifts certain people in an ecstatic, trancelike state above their confining human limitations and heightens their natural faculties, intellectual and spiritual, so that they are able to see and know things other people cannot see and know (Acts 7:55; 10:19; 20:23; Rev 1:10; 4:2; 17:3; 21:10; Herm. Man. 1.1.3; 2.1.1), to peer into the future and predict events yet to come (Acts 11:28; 21:12). Perhaps in a similar ecstatic manner, the Holy Spirit comes to the aid of God's people in prayer (Jude 20; cf. Rom 8:15-16, 26-37; Gal 4:6; Jn 4:23-24; Bauckham, 113; Dunn 1975, 245-46).

For whatever reason and in unspecified ways, the Spirit at times hinders people from doing what they intended to do or from going where they planned to go. The Spirit then turns them in quite different directions, giving them undreamed of work to accomplish (Acts 16:6).

The Spirit, living within believers, grants to them the possibility of a new understanding of existence, imparting to them right knowledge and instruction, so that they may come to realize that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 4:2, 6), know that God lives in them and they in God (1 Jn 3:24; 4:13) and recognize the difference between truth and error (1 Jn 2:20-21, 27; 4:6; see Bultmann, 80).

Still further, the Spirit is the silent, invisible one who sanctifies. The Spirit is the inner transformer of human lives, the one who acts through the preaching of the gospel to separate individuals from the world unto God (1 Pet 1:2; cf. 1:12; Barn. 6.14) so that they no longer indulge themselves in immoral behavior (Jude 18-19; Pol. Phil. 5.3) or engage their minds in attitudes hostile to God (Jas 4:4-5 and Martin's translation of 4:5: "The Spirit God made to dwell in us opposes envy," 149). The Shepherd of Hermas, however, seems not to realize the relation of the Spirit either to the life of God or to the human spirit and implies that a person must first be good in order for the Spirit to come and do a sanctifying work (Herm. Sim. 9.25.2; Man. 3.1.2; 5.1.2-3; 10.2.1, 5; 3.1-2).

Again, there are times when the Spirit constrains believers to achieve some worthwhile goal in life, as Paul felt himself constrained (dedemenos) by the Spirit to go to Jerusalem, while at the same time the Spirit warns them through other Christians or Christian prophets of impending disaster if they proceed as planned (Acts 20:22-23; 21:4, 12). Luke sees no contradiction in this, for to him it accords "with the common notion of prophecies and prodigies: they are fulfilled, but not to the exclusion of human decision. Paul 'must' go, but he freely affirms his destiny" (Conzelmann, 178).

It was the Holy Spirit who, in his own inexplicable way, appointed "overseers to shepherd the church of God" at Ephesus (Acts 20:28). Thus one should be careful not to make too sharp a distinction between the charismatic age of the Spirit and the ecclesiastical age, the age of the organized church, as though the latter automatically excluded from its midst the presence and power of the Spirit (see also 1 Clem. 42.4; Ign. Phld. presc. 7.1-2).

The Spirit continues to be the Spirit of prophecy, i.e., the Spirit still inspires select men and women (see Acts 21:9), so that when they speak, they speak with power, so that they rank with the OT prophets in bringing to the people of God the word of God. Christian prophets resided in numbers in Syrian Antioch (Acts 13:1; cf. Did. 13.1); others were itinerant (Acts 11:28; 21:10; Did. 11). All were authoritative figures within the church, for the Spirit spoke through them. They were to be respected, even feared, certainly obeyed. Nevertheless, both they and their message could and should be put to the test (see Did. 11.7—12.11; Herm. Man. 1.7-17). This phenomenon of the Christian prophet survived, as far as our literature is concerned, at least into the fourth or fifth decade of the second century (Swete 1912, 25).

The postapostolic writers see in the presence and power of the Spirit the source and dynamic of peace and unity within the church—"A profound and rich peace was given to all; you had an insatiable desire to do good, because the Holy Spirit was poured out in abundance on you all" (1 Clem. 2.2; 46.6). Ignatius uses an extravagant metaphor to portray this unifying work of the Spirit: "You are the stones of the temple of the Father, made ready for the building of God our Father, carried up to the heights by the crane of Jesus Christ, that is the cross, and using as a rope the Holy Spirit" (Ign. Eph. 9.1). With this imagery he is saying that apart from the Spirit the cross* is a vast inert machine, with building stones around it unmoved. Only when the rope of the Holy Spirit is attached to it can it work to lift the individual stones, i.e., Christians, to fit them harmoniously into the place prepared for them.

The Holy Spirit, present and living within believers, is the companion (or author) of joy* even in the presence of the most adverse circumstances. For instance, Paul and Barnabas, persecuted and driven from city to city for preaching the gospel, nevertheless "were filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 13:52; see Swete 1976, 174; compare or contrast Herm. Man. 10.1.2; 10.2.1-6; 10.3.3).

The familiar NT triad of faith,* hope* and love* (1 Thess 1:3; 5:8; Gal 5:5-6; Col 1:4-5; Eph 4:2-5), words that "embrace the whole of Christian existence, as believers live out the life of the Spirit in the present age" (Fee, 212), appears in our literature only in The Epistle of Barnabas (Barn. 1.4; 11.8) and in Polycarp's Letter to the Philippians (Pol. Phil. 3.2-3).

When the church throughout Judea, Galatia and Samaria had endured fierce persecution* and had come through it into an era of peace* they found themselves living "in the comfort of the Holy Spirit" (NRSV; paraklēsei tou hagiou pneumatos), or as the NIV puts it, "encouraged by the Holy Spirit" (Acts 9:31)—a difficult word and phrase to translate. At times the noun paraklēsis can mean (prophetic) exhortation, as in Acts 13:15; at other times comfort, as is possible in Acts 15:31; at still other times, encouragement. "Followed here by the subjective genitive tou hagiou pneumatos it is not wrong to allow it to refer to whatever it is that the Holy Spirit does, and this will include both the (messianic) consolation . . . and the stirring up and enabling of Christians to live as they should (cf. 1.8)" (Barrett, 474; cf. 1 Clem. 42.3).

4.4. How the Holy Spirit Works in the Church. It is clear from the literature that the Holy Spirit is God/Christ powerfully, mysteriously, sometimes quietly and unobtrusively at work in and through the church. But it is not always clear how this work is carried out.

Sometimes supernatural means are used, which defy further definition or explanation, as when Luke says that the Spirit of the Lord "snatched Philip away" and he later found himself in Azotus or when the Shepherd says that the Spirit "seized" him and took him away through a certain pathless district (Herm. Vis. 1.1.3; 2.1.1).

The chorus that is repeated seven times in the Apocalypse, "Let anyone who has an ear listen to what the Spirit is saying to the churches" (Rev 2:7, 11, 17, 28; 3:6, 13, 22), may find its explanation in the opening phrase of each letter addressed to the seven churches: "To the angel [angelos] of the church . . . write," for angelos may refer not to some supernatural being but to mortals, for it also means "messenger." These messengers may have been prophets—human beings especially prepared by God, people sensitive and open to receiving God's word—who wrote to each of these churches an authoritative word of the Lord, because the Holy Spirit inspired them to write. Thus each letter was in essence the Spirit speaking to the particular church addressed. The same might be said of Acts 13: 2—how did the Holy Spirit say to the church at Antioch, "Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them"? Very likely the Spirit did so through the human voice of men or women—for there were prophets, people especially tuned to listening to the voice of the Spirit, in Antioch at that time (Acts 13:1). And when Luke goes on to say that Barnabas and Saul "were sent out by the Holy Spirit" (Acts 13:4), he meant for everyone to understand that the Spirit "sent them out" by means of the church.

That is to say, the Spirit infused God's people, who were praying and fasting, with the authority* necessary to commission these two men by the laying on of their hands (Acts 13:3). How was it that the Holy Spirit told Philip* to join the Ethiopian eunuch in his chariot? Perhaps he spoke to Philip in a human messenger (angelos), "the messenger of the Lord" who told him to leave Samaria and go south (Acts 8:29 with Acts 8:26).

Sometimes the Spirit acts in people's lives, communicates with and directs them through dreams, trances (Acts 10:9-20) or ecstatic experiences (Rev 1:10). At other times the Spirit concurs with and confirms the verbal witness of the church by external, visible miraculous signs and wonders (Acts 5:32 with Acts 2:32-39 and Lk 24:48-49; cf. Heb 2:4).

Sometimes the Spirit speaks through disappointing circumstances that cause people in whom he lives to take a different but better course of action than that originally planned (Acts 16:6-7).

Sometimes it is that still, small, inner voice of conviction (cf. Barn. 12.2)—perhaps it was in this way that the Spirit testified to Paul that in every city imprisonment and persecution were waiting for him (Acts 20:23). Whatever can be said of God, namely, that he "moves in mysterious ways his wonders to perform," can also be said of God's Spirit. But whenever the Spirit commands, he gives the power to carry out that command; wherever he directs, he gives the strength to traverse that course, however difficult.

5. The Holy Spirit and the Inspiration of the Scripture.

In the OT the formulas that the ancient prophets repeated over and over again as introductions to their prophecies were, "thus says the Lord" (Jer 9:23, passim), "the Lord has spoken" (Is 1:2, passim), "hear the word of the Lord" (Is 1:10, passim), "the word of the Lord came to me" (Ezek 33:1, passim), or the like. Such introductory formulas were intended to assure the audience that the message that came to them, whether spoken or written, did not originate with the prophet but with God. The word of the prophet was the word of the Lord and was to be received as such.

In the NT and the early fathers these older formulas for the most part have been replaced by the single formula, "the Holy Spirit said," or its like. The writers of our literature perceive the Holy Spirit as God's pervasive influence in the life of certain persons, inspiring them, validating their message by his power as words that are sacred, authoritative and final. Notice Peter's remarks to the 120 disciples after the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus: "Friends, the Scripture had to be fulfilled, which the Holy Spirit through David foretold" (Acts 1:16). These words of Peter give clear expression to the widespread belief of the early church about the OT as a whole—the Holy Spirit was its ultimate source; the Holy Spirit was speaking through persons, such as David, so that what was contained in the OT was the word of God, the word of the Spirit of God (see also Acts 4:25; 28:25; Heb 3:7; 9:8; 10:15; 1 Clem. 13.1; 16.2; 22.1; 45.2; cf. 8.1; Barn. 9.2; 10.2, 9; 14.2). The remarks of the writer of 2 Peter 1:21-22 are apt at this point, even though the text is difficult to translate: "No prophecy of scripture is a matter of one's own interpretation, because no prophecy ever came by human will, but men and women moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (NRSV, but see also the NIV). However one finally translates this verse, its message is clear: "The only point which the author of 2 Peter is concerned to deny is that the prophets themselves were the originating source of their message. To counter this view he affirms that the Holy Spirit was the source of their prophecy, enabling them to speak as God's spokesmen" (Bauckham, 234; cf. Philo Rer. Div. Her. 259; Philo Vit. Mos. 1.281, 286).

The universal testimony of the earliest church concerning the OT is that it is the word of God, because those designated persons who spoke or wrote its message spoke or wrote by inspiration of the Holy Spirit and thus spoke or wrote for God. God spoke to his people through David, Isaiah, Jeremiah and others by the Holy Spirit (Acts 4:25). But what of the NT? Luke was aware that the Holy Spirit was still speaking in the apostolic period (Acts 13:2; 20:23), and the writer to the Hebrews refers to the Holy Spirit not only to say that the scriptural account of the tabernacle* and its priestly services was divinely inspired but also to say that the Holy Spirit was still speaking—in his day—and indicating that the way into the sanctuary could not be opened as long as the first tabernacle and its services still stood (Heb 9:8). Clement* seems more certain that the apostles* shared the same inspiration as the OT prophets. He wrote that they "having therefore received their commands, and being fully assured by the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ... went forth with the certainty that the Holy Spirit gives preaching the good news" (1 Clem. 42.3). Again, of Paul he writes, "With true inspiration (ep' alētheias pneumatikōs) he charged you concerning himself and Cephas and Apollos" (1 Clem. 47.3). From these few texts it is possible to infer that the Spirit was still speaking during the apostolic period, inspiring prepared persons to be God's voice in the world.

In contrast with the church's historic understanding of a closed canon* are the perplexing statements of Clement in which he appears to be claiming inspiration for himself. For example, he writes, "You will give us joy and gladness, if you are obedient to the things which we have written through the Holy Spirit" (1 Clem. 43.2). Ignatius,* too, claims to have the Spirit preaching and speaking through him, the Spirit who says, "Do nothing without the bishop" (Ign. Phld. 7.1-2). If indeed Clement and Ignatius viewed themselves as inspired prophets, on a par with the OT prophets, writing the words of God, there is not sufficient material in the writings under consideration to refute such claims. Such a refutation must be left to the later documents of the church, to the church universal, which apparently did not view them as inspired in the same way as the writers of the OT or those of the apostolic period were inspired.

6. The Holy Spirit and the Trinity.

The trinitarian formula that appears in Matthew 28:19, "baptize . . . in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," surprisingly appears neither in Acts nor in any other of the apostolic writings being considered. Nor does even a suggestive summary appear here such as that found in 2 Corinthians 13:14: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with all of you." Seemingly none of our NT writers was concerned to construct a full-blown doctrine of the Trinity. Nevertheless, all the necessary ingredients to do so were present in our texts from the beginning, gathered up in the experience of Jewish Christians: "their inherited conception of God as 'Father,' their new faith in Christ as the 'Son,' . . . and their experience of the Spirit which [had] been given as the earnest and guarantee of the coming New Age" (Grant, 1015).

As time passed and Christian writers had more time to reflect, a gradual pulling together of these elements into a unified whole began to take shape, although there was still no developed doctrine of the Trinity. Nevertheless, several writers in the postapostolic period bring together the words "Father, Son and Holy Spirit" in a single sentence (1 Clem. 46.6; 58.2; Ign. Magn. 13.1). The earlier expression "baptize . . . in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" reemerges in the *Didache (7.1, 3), the earliest noncanonical writing to give the trinitarian form of baptism (Swete 1976, 19). Polycarp's prayer at his martyrdom is the earliest instance of a doxology that glorifies the Spirit together with the Father and the Son: "I praise thee for all things, I bless thee, I glorify thee through the everlasting and heavenly high priest, Jesus Christ, thy beloved child, through whom be glory to thee with him and the Holy Spirit, both now and for the ages that are to come. Amen" (Mart. Pol. 14.3; cf. also 22.1). From this time on Christian thinkers had the materials that enabled them to theorize about the mystery of the nature of the Godhead and hammer out the doctrine of the Trinity.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; HOLY, HOLINESS; MIRACLES IN ACTS; NEW BIRTH; PENTECOST; POWER; SIGNS AND WONDERS; SPIRITS; TONGUES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. W. Attridge, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); C. K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994) vol. 1; R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX, 1983); F. Baumgärtel, "πνεῦμα κτλ (OT, Judaism)," TDNT 6:359-68; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964); R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); H. Conzelmann, Acts of the Apostles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of 1 Peter 3:18—4:6 (AnBib 23; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1965); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. D. G. Dunn, "Discernment of Spirits—A Neglected Gift" in Witness to the Spirit: Essays on Revelation, Spirit, Redemption, ed. W. Harrington (Dublin: Koinonia, 1979) 79-96; idem, Jesus and the Spirit (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); G. D. Fee, God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); F. C. Grant, "Trinity, the," Dictionary of the Bible, ed. J. Hastings (rev. ed.; New York: Scribners, 1963); M. Green, I Believe in the Holy Spirit (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); G. F. Hawthorne, The Presence and the Power: The Significance of the Holy Spirit in the Life of Jesus (Dallas: Word, 1991); G. S. Hendry, The Holy Spirit in Christian Theology (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965); R. C. H. Lenski, The Interpretation of the Acts of the Apostles (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1934); E. Lohse, "πεντηκοστή," TDNT 6:44-53; R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); G. von Rad, Genesis (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); H. W. Robinson, The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (London: Nisbet, 1928); E. Schweizer, "πνεῦμα κτλ, (NT)," TDNT 6:396-453; E. F. Scott, The Spirit in the New Testament (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1923); E. Sjöberg, "πνεῦμα κτλ (Palestinian Judaism)," TDNT 6:375-89; G. Stählin, "τὸ πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ (Apostelgeschichte 16:7)" in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament, ed. B. Lin-dars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973) 229-52; H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church (London: Macmillan, 1912); idem, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament (reprint ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1976); M. M. B. Turner, "The Significance of Receiving the Spirit in Luke-Acts: A Survey of Modern Scholarship," TJ (1982) 131-42; idem, "The Spirit of Christ and Christology" in Christ the Lord, ed. H. H. Rowdon (Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press, 1982) 168-90; H. P. Van Dusen, Spirit, Son and Father (New York: Scribners, 1958); M. Welker, God and Spirit (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994). G. F. Hawthorne

HOMILY GENRE. See HEBREWS.

HOMOSEXUALITY. See SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS.

HOPE

In the later NT, hope is one of the defining marks of the believer. Despite the suffering that comes from living in a fallen world, the Christian is certain that God will one day complete what he has started in the lives of believers and in the whole cosmos.

1. Old Testament Background
2. Later New Testament
3. Apostolic Fathers

1. Old Testament Background.

In the OT, hope in God* is predicated on the mighty acts he has done for Israel.* God has acted on behalf of his people in the past, and thus the faithful can be certain that he will exercise his righteousness* on their behalf. That we do not see in the OT much in the way of hope for an afterlife sets the outstanding character of OT hope into bold relief. God can be counted on to act in the here and now. However, prophets* such as Isaiah (cf. Is 25:9; 42:4; 51:5) display a certainty that one day there will be a new order in which all the world* will recognize the sovereignty of God.

2. Later New Testament.

2.1. The Object and Ground of Hope. The meaning of "hope" and its cognates in the NT is radically different from that of the English word hope. Rather than expressing the desire for a particular outcome that is uncertain, hope in the NT by definition is characterized by certainty. The object of hope in the later NT is variously described: it is seeing God himself (1 Jn 3:2), the resurrection* of the dead (Acts 23:6) and Christ,* who will bring his children* "to glory" (Heb 2:10; cf. Heb 12:23; see Glory). 1 Peter* encourages believers to endure unjust suffering*; Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) looks forward to the day God will put an end to such suffering. Although God's people may be persecuted, the Apocalypse encourages them to hope; it presents Christ as the supreme ruler of the universe who will one day be victorious and ensure victory for God's people (cf. Rev 2:21; 5:5; 6:2; 17:14). Revelation's vision of hope reaches its climax in Revelation 21:1—22:5, which describes in extravagant detail the new creation* and new Jerusalem* that await the faithful.

1 Peter instructs its audience that they must be ready to account for the hope that characterizes their lives as believers ("the hope that is in you" [plural]; 1 Pet 3:15). We do not have to decide if "in you" refers to individuals (Goppelt) or to the Christian community, for it is individual believers, all of whom have hope, that make up the community. They must be able to articulate the nature and content of their faith* to those who do not believe, that is, to those who persecute them because of their hope in Christ (cf. Kendall). The hope that believers enjoy is recognized by Peter to be a manifestation of God's grace.* It is by God's "great mercy"* that we believers have been born anew "into a living hope" (1 Pet 1:3). The description of hope as "living" is appropriate. Hope is not static; it is active, expressing itself in the hearts, minds and lives of Christians. It is not merely something to live by; it makes life as it should be possible (cf. Davids).

Hope looks with certainty toward the future God has promised his people, but at the same time it looks back to the Christ event. Throughout the NT the assurance* of future salvation* is grounded in the work of God in Christ, specifically in the resurrection of Christ. Because of this act, which has a decidedly future-looking character, believers are confident that God will finish what he has started (cf. 1 Pet 1:13). Regarding 1 Peter 1:13, L. Goppelt is correct when he notes that the believer does not hope for an atemporal, spiritualized utopia. He errs, however, in asserting that hope in 1 Peter 1:13 implies certain ethical* obligations. That is not made clear until the next verse (see 2.2 below).

2.2. Perseverance and Hope. The writers of the NT know that to hope is a decision that must be made continually. Thus the author of Hebrews* continually exhorts his readers to "hold fast" to the confession of hope "without wavering" (Heb 10:23). Hope is objective, referring to what believers hope for, but the basis for endurance* is hope of the reliability of God's promise* (cf. the discussion in Ellingworth). In Hebrews 3:6 the "hope" that is to be "held fast" looks forward to the day when Christians will enter into the "rest" promised to the people of God (cf. Heb 4:1). That believers should stand firm is predicated on God's character. It is impossible that God should prove false. If he was true to his promises to Abraham* (cf. Heb 6:15), and if he has been true to Christians, then he will continue to be so.

Persevering in hope also implies an ethical obligation. There is an "already" and "not yet" aspect to hope. The new birth* that Peter speaks of is to a living hope (1 Pet 1:3). If one has hope, then one must live up to one's hope and faith. This, J. Piper argues, is at the heart of 1 Peter's paraenesis. 1 Peter 1:13 is a call to hope fully, and in 1 Peter 1:14-15 the implications of that hope are spelled out. Those who hope in a future secured and given by Christ will not try to satisfy themselves with what the flesh* offers but will instead live in a manner that pleases the One who has graciously made a living hope available (cf. 1 Pet 1:14-15).

The possibility that believers can do so comes in an exhortation to slaves.* Slaves, Peter says, are to endure unjust suffering. And how is this possible? The answer comes in a verse that is not a mere digression (contrary to some scholars) but provides the theological underpinning for all of Peter's commands. Christ, he says, "bore our sins in his body on the tree so that we, having died to sin, might live for righteousness." Christ's death (see Death of Christ) makes possible to live up to our hope. In 1 John we see that hope functions similarly: the one who has "this hope" purifies himself as [God] is pure" (1 Jn 3:3). This hope, contrary to the view of R. E. Brown, here not only looks to the future ("we shall be like him") but also is experienced in the present ("we are God's children now").

2.3. Continuity and Discontinuity.

2.3.1. Continuity. The NT writers are heirs of the dynamic OT language of hope, expressing as they do an unwavering confidence that God will do as he has promised because of what he has done in the past. Thus in Acts* Paul assumes a continuity between the hope he, as a Christian, has in God and that of his Jewish ancestors* (Acts 24:25; 26:6-7; 28:20). In Acts 26:6 Paul says that he stands on trial for his hope in the promise made by God to Abraham. Paul describes his belief as being in continuity with the OT promise to Abraham. What Paul's hope has in common with the hope of the OT is its "anchorage in the past" (Moule).

2.3.2. Discontinuity. If, however, the character of NT hope is not substantially different from that of the OT, the divine action on which hope is grounded is new. In Acts we see that Paul's hope is based not only on the acts of God in the Hebrew Scriptures but also and ultimately in what God has done in Christ. The fulfillment of the promise given to Abraham is decidedly different from that which Paul's Jewish and non-Christian contemporaries believed it to be (cf. Minear's discussion). The author of Hebrews, working from the categories of type and antitype, says in Hebrews 7:19 that Christians have a "better hope." The OT realities were a shadow of what was to come, and since, for the writer of Hebrews, Christ is the fulfillment of the promise of the OT and the "anchor of the soul" (Heb 6:19), Christian hope is superior to any hope that is not based on Christ.

3. Apostolic Fathers.

Given the apostolic fathers'* dependence on the NT and the fundamental importance of hope therein, it is to be expected that they would refer to it frequently, and this is the case. 1 Clement 59.3 reads, "[grant us] to hope on your name, the source of all creation." It would seem that it is God's name,* not that of Jesus Christ, to which the text refers. God is the object of hope. 1 Clement also makes reference to one of fundamental facts of early Christian dogma. 1 Clement 27.1 says "in this hope [the hope of the resurrection] let our souls be bound to him [God] who is faithful."

The certainty of Christian hope is used to encourage believers to remain steadfast in their faith in the face of persecution* (cf. 2 Clem. 17.7). Hermas refers to the "hope of repentance," that is, the possibility of turning from one's morally bankrupt ways (Herm. Sim. 8.7.2; 8.10.2; see Repentance), which will lead to salvation.

Barnabas, writing from his post-A.D. 70 vantage point for a church that continues to define itself against the Judaism* from which it has now parted (see Christianity and Judaism), speaks of the superiority of Christian hope; Jews, he says, placed their hope in the temple*; this, however, "was vain" (Barn. 16.1-2). Hope, he says, is "put on the Name" (Barn. 16.8); it is only that way that people experience remission of sins and become part of the covenant* community (see also Barn. 6.3; 11.11). Faith and hope can become virtually synonymous: "Blessed are those who hoped on the cross and descended into the water" (Barn. 11.8).

Christian hope was also used to call for unity among the churches. 1 Clement claims that "those who were the leaders of sedition and disagreement are bound to consider the common hope" (1 Clem. 51.1; see also 2 Clem. 1.2; see Church Order). Since Christ is he who makes unity possible, the truth concerning him must be clung to. Ignatius* of Antioch* battles heresy by recalling the common hope of the things accomplished by Jesus Christ: his birth, passion and resurrection (Ign. Magn. 11.1; cf. Ign. Trall. 2.2; Ign. Eph. 1.2). For Ignatius "the gospel of the common hope" (Ign. Phld. 5.2) is to be preserved at all costs.

See also ASSURANCE; ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; ESCHATOLOGY; FAITH, FAITHFULNESS; GLORY; LOVE; REDEMPTION; RESURRECTION; SALVATION; SUFFERING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Beker, Suffering and Hope (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist, 1979); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); F. J. Denbeaux, "Biblical Hope," Int 5 (1951) 285-303; P. Ellingworth, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); L. Goppelt, A Commentary on 1 Peter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); E. Hoffman, "Hope," NIDNTT 2:238-46; D. W. Kendall, "1 Peter 1:3-9," Int 41 (1987) 66-71; P. S. Minear, Christian Hope and the Second Coming (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1954); C. F. D. Moule, The Meaning of Hope (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1963); J. Piper, "Hope as the Motivation of Love: 1 Peter 3:9-12," NTS 26 (1980) 212-31; K. H. Rengstorff and R. Bultmann, "ἐλπίς κτλ," TDNT 2:517-35; C. Spicq, "ἐλπίζω, ἐλπίς," TLNT 1:480-92; B. Studer, "Hope" in Encyclopedia of the Early Church, ed. A. Di Berardino (2 vols.; New York: Oxford University Press, 1992) 1:397-99.

B. Eastman

HOSPITALITY

The custom of hospitality was worldwide and highly regarded as a virtue in antiquity (Stählin, 17-20). It was rooted in a sense, given divine sanction, of the mutual obligation of all people to help one another, especially the stranger. Hence temples and altars were places of asylum, and the gods (such as Zeus Xenios, Zeus the patron of strangers) were believed to protect the oppressed foreigner or the abused host. Inns, hostels and other forms of shelter for travelers, often linked with temples and synagogues, also became important components of hospitality as an institution (Casson).

1. Definition
2. Background
3. The Later New Testament
4. The Postapostolic Period

1. Definition.

From the point of view of the anthropology of the cultures of the Mediterranean, hospitality (Gk philoxenia; Lat hospitium) is a social process by means of which the status of someone who is an outsider is changed from stranger to guest. The process has three stages: the evaluation and testing of the stranger to see whether incorporation as a guest is possible without undue threat to the purity lines of the group; the incorporation of the stranger as a guest under the patronage of a host and in accordance with a culture-specific code of hospitality imposing obligations upon both host and guest; the departure of the guest as a stranger now transformed into either a friend, if honor has been satisfied, or an enemy, if honor has been infringed (Malina, 181-87; Hobbs).

This conception of hospitality differs significantly from that of most Westerners today, for whom hospitality is personal and individualistic and has to do with entertaining relatives and friends with the prospect of the hospitality being reciprocated. In the first-century Mediterranean world, however, hospitality was a public duty toward strangers where the honor of the community was at stake and reciprocity was more likely to be communal rather than individual. Furthermore, whereas contemporary Western hospitality has become secularized (so that a common synonym is "entertainment"), hospitality in antiquity was a sacred duty, not least because it opened up the possibility of revelatory encounter with strangers from another world. The story of the hospitality of Abraham* and Sarah to the "three men" by the oaks of Mamre (Gen 18; see also Gen 19) is a classic instance that became proverbial (cf. Heb 13:2; 1 Clem. 10.7). Such strangers, precisely because they are outsiders and unknown, make hospitality a potential occasion for an epiphany. A classic instance from the NT is the revelation* of the risen Christ* to the two disciples during the meal at Emmaus (Luke 24:28-35).

2. Background.

2.1. Greco-Roman Background. For the Greeks and Romans hospitality was a mark of culture. Principal motivations were fear of the gods and human fellow-feeling (philanthrōpia) as well as the expectation of reciprocity. That hospitality was regarded as a basic aspect of civilized behavior is reflected in the recurrence of the motif in the Homeric sagas (Finley, 99-103). In this vein is the story of Paul's shipwreck at Malta (Acts 28:1-11). Hospitality is extended to the apparently ill-fated travelers both by the natives (barbaroi, of the island and by the Roman "first man," Publius; their hospitality is rewarded by manifestations of the divine mediated by the apostle*; and in turn the strangers-become-guests are sent on their way fully provisioned and bearing gifts.

2.2. Jewish Background. The practice of hospitality is fundamental in the Jewish tradition as well. Many biblical and Jewish texts give accounts of exemplary hospitality (usually associated with heroes and heroines like Abraham and Sarah, Lot, Rebekah, Rahab and Job), as well as of notorious inhospitality (the people of Sodom [Gen 19] and those of Gibeah [Judg 19]). Hospitality toward the stranger or the resident alien (Hebrew, gēr) is a duty that takes precedence over the obligation of neighborliness (Cohn, 49-57). In the Torah it is commanded no fewer than twenty-four times. It is an ideal rooted religiously both in an understanding of God* as one who "loves the sojourner, giving him food and clothing" (Deut 10:18) and in the story of the Israelites in Egypt: "you shall not wrong a stranger or oppress him, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Exod 22:21; cf. Lev 19:33-34; Deut 10:19). A powerful image in Jewish eschatology* is that of God as a bountiful host entertaining Israel* (Amos 9:13-15) and the nations (Is 25:6-8) at a great feast at the end of time.

2.3. Jesus. This latter point helps to explain Jesus' practice of hospitality and table fellowship (to which all the Gospels testify), for there can be little doubt that Jesus saw himself as God's eschatological envoy extending the divine invitation of heavenly hospitality to Israel and the nations (Koenig, 15-51). In contrast to other movements of his day (e.g., the Pharisees and the Qumran* covenanters), which were seeking to restrict table fellowship, Jesus seems to have become notorious for a practice of open hospitality that brought him the label "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners" (Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34).

Consistent with this are a number of other aspects of Jesus' teaching and action: the prominence of metaphors of meals and exuberant hospitality in the parables; the eschatological prayer* for bread that Jesus teaches his disciples; the positive reception Jesus gives to women,* children (see Sonship, Child, Children), the poor and the sick; the miraculous feeding of the multitudes; the alacrity with which Jesus accepts the hospitality of others and himself plays the host (not least at the Last Supper); the opposition he registers to fasting so long as he remains with his disciples; the teaching he gives on hospitality to itinerant preachers; and his teaching about God's hospitality in the kingdom of heaven: "Many will come from east and west to sit at table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:28-29; see Kingdom of God).

2.4. Paul. But if Jesus' teaching and practice of hospitality is important for developments in early Christianity, so too is that of the apostle Paul (Koenig, 52-84; Theissen). A reading of Paul's letters shows us that Paul regarded hospitality as an important Christian virtue,* the practice of which builds up unity and helps meet practical needs. In his instructions, therefore, he exhorts his fellow believers to "contribute to the needs of the saints [and] practice hospitality" (Rom 12:13). As an itinerant apostle, Paul not only worked to support himself but also depended upon the hospitality of others (cf. 1 Cor 9:4-14; Acts 21:4, 7, 16-17); and the hardships he faced included the frequent absence of hospitality and even severe experiences of inhospitality from his enemies (1 Cor 4:11-13; 2 Cor 6:4-10; 11:21-33).

But hospitality, for Paul as for Jesus before him, is not just a practical issue. It is a fundamental expression of the gospel: a response to God's hospitality to humankind in providing Christ as the "paschal lamb*" (1 Cor 5:7) and an outworking of what it means to be members of the one "body of Christ," sharing Christ's eschatological table by eating bread, which is his body, and drinking wine, which is his blood (1 Cor 11:17-34). That is why Paul demanded a practice of hospitality that united the fellowship across lines both of social status and purity* and why he refused to compromise lest the gospel of unity in Christ be brought into disrepute (cf. Gal 2:11-14). It is also why he demanded the refusal of hospitality from those who ate and drank at the "table of demons," for this would have been to acknowledge the authority* of a host other than the risen Lord* (1 Cor 10:14-22). Instead of sharing hospitality in temple precincts, therefore, the primary locus of Christian hospitality was the meeting together of the believers in members' houses (oikoi). This explains the prominence Paul accords to various heads of households,* both men and women, who served as patrons of the fellowships* (ekklēsiai) meeting in their houses (cf. Rom 16). It also explains the prominence of instructions about godly household order in Paul's letters (cf. Col 3:18—4:1).

3. The Later New Testament.

Given the orientation of early Christianity toward universal mission,* as well as the self-understanding of the local churches as belonging together to one universal church,* it is not surprising that itinerancy was common and hospitality an essential aspect of Christian instruction and practice (Riddle). Outside the Gospels and main Pauline literature, specific references to hospitality come mainly in Acts, the Pastoral Epistles, Hebrews and the Johannine epistles, but the practice is presupposed and therefore implicit elsewhere also (e.g., Philem 22).

3.1. Acts. The narrative testimony of Acts* is illuminating. Here we find themes and motifs from the story of Jesus in Luke's first volume developed further in the stories of the apostles and the early church. Thus the motif of the journeys of Jesus as occasions for encounters with the divine is carried over into the missionary journeys of the apostles as the context for further experiences of the supernatural motif of "entertaining angels unawares." The conversion of households in response to Jesus' preaching and healing* is carried over into conversion by household in Acts; and among the converted householders who show hospitality are Cornelius,* Lydia and the Philippian jailer.

The exuberant table fellowship of Jesus is translated into the practice of the Jerusalem church, having "all things in common . . . [and] breaking bread in their homes . . . with glad and generous hearts" (Acts 2:44-47; cf. Acts 4:32-37). Jesus' hospitality to the socially marginalized is reflected in the care of the apostolic churches for the poor and the sick, whether men, women or children. The welcome Jesus gives to Gentiles becomes mission to all nations; and the formulation of new rules of table fellowship makes possible the integration of Gentile* converts with converts from Judaism* (Acts 15:1-29). The hospitality of women as well as men shown to Jesus in the Gospels is carried over into the patronage offered by both women and men to the apostles and the nascent church in Acts. The inhospitality of the leaders of the people (Jewish and Roman) to Jesus is reflected in the apostles' experiences of inhospitality among both Jews and Gentiles, culminating in the inhospitality of the Jews in Rome* toward Paul at the story's end (Acts 28:17-31).

There is no single explanation for this considerable interest in hospitality and related matters in Luke-Acts (cf. Esler, 71-109). First, the boundary-crossing hospitality expresses Luke's belief that with Pentecost* a new age of salvation* has dawned and a new people of God is being brought into being to share in the messianic banquet. Second, such hospitality as narrated has a moral thrust as well. It is a reminder (especially to the wealthy and influential?) that true conversion requires both detachment from household ties and material concerns generally and a generosity that overflows in acts of mercy* to the poor, the needy and the stranger. A third explanation may be of a more pragmatic kind. Luke may be wanting to encourage his readers to continue the practice of inclusive hospitality begun a generation earlier, as a way of contributing to the maintenance of church unity and Christian witness* in his own day. He may even want to encourage his readers not to neglect hospitality to itinerant missionaries.

3.2. Pastoral Epistles. In the Pastoral Epistles teaching about hospitality has a narrower focus, being related to the essential qualifications of overseers as officers in the local church (cf. 1 Tim 3:2; Tit 1:8). The Pastorals generally appear to reflect a stage in the development of early church organization in which the predominantly charismatic ethos of Pauline church order was becoming more formalized, perhaps due to the impact of structures that Jewish Christianity* inherited from the synagogue* or the Qumran community but also as a means of reinforcing the boundaries of the church against the threat of what were perceived as heretical doctrines and their proponents.

A striking feature of this process of routinization (to use M. Weber's term) is the dominance of the metaphor of the household, already pervasive in Paul's writings but now taken further (Verner). It is as if the model of orderly, hierarchical, gendered social relations provided by the household, a model fully recognized and acceptable in society, was seen as having the potential for protecting the church's life from dissolution within and maintaining its honor in relations with the world outside. Thus in 1 Timothy 3:15 the writer speaks of how believers are to behave in "the household (oikos) of God, which is the church (ekklēsia) of the living God, the pillar and bulwark of the truth"; and in Titus 1:7, the overseer (episkopos) is described as God's "steward" (oikonomos), the one, that is, who manages the household on behalf of the master (in this case, God).

Given this conception of the church as God's household and of the overseer as God's household steward, it is not surprising that the overseer is to exhibit all the qualities of the good household head: "Now an overseer must be above reproach, the husband of one wife . . . hospitable (philoxenos), an apt teacher. . . . He must manage his own household well, keeping his children submissive and respectful in every way; for if a man does not know how to manage his own household (oikos), how can he care for God's church (ekklēsia)?" (1 Tim 3:2-5). In this context hospitality was important on two fronts. First, it was the means whereby the overseer welcomed traveling Christians, itinerant preachers and other strangers into the church but in a way that made a process of testing possible, transformed the stranger into a guest and so avoided threats to church life and order. Second, it was the means whereby charitable activity within the fellowship of the church could be administered fairly, with due regard for the poor and for the maintenance of unity, so that the good name of the church could be upheld.

But hospitality is expected of "ordinary" (i.e., non-official) members of the church as well. Thus in the instructions about drawing up the list of the "real widows" (i.e., widows who have no household members of their own to support them and therefore need the support of the household of the church; cf. Young, 114-20, contra Thurston), the writer lays down certain criteria for eligibility: "she must be well attested for her good deeds, as one who has brought up children, shown hospitality (xenodocheō), washed the feet of the saints, relieved the afflicted and devoted herself to doing good in every way" (1 Tim 5:9-10).

Several assumptions are noteworthy. First is that of reciprocity: the widow is to receive hospitality from the church household because, as a former householder, she has been hospitable herself. Second, hospitality occurs conventionally as a test of social and religious worth; and it is taken for granted that it involves washing the feet of traveling fellow believers (as a ritual of acceptance; cf. Lk 7:44; Jn 13:14) and helping people (the indigent, persecuted, imprisoned) in distress. Third, hospitality is not restricted to officials of the church, nor is it restricted to male members; rather it is an accepted moral virtue that is to characterize the behavior of believers as a whole. In context its appropriateness as a role for women is that it is a natural extension of their authority in the domestic sphere, a way of bringing the household into the church and the church into the household.

3.3. Hebrews. In a manner that reminds us of the ethical injunctions (including the command to practice hospitality) with which Paul concludes his letter to the Romans (Rom 12), the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews* draws his letter to a conclusion with important practical recommendations for maintaining the life of faith,* prominent among which is the command "Do not neglect to show hospitality (philoxenia)" (Heb 13:2; cf. Rom 12:13). So for the author of Hebrews as for Paul, hospitality is a fundamental expression of Christian faith. For both it is also a fundamental outworking of love (agapē or philadelphia). Hence "Let brotherly love (philadelphia) continue. Do not neglect to show hospitality" (Heb 13:1-3: cf. Rom 12:9-13).

Worth noting also is the following. First, hospitality, according to Hebrews, is a virtue to be exercised first and foremost among fellow Christians. The RSV and NRSV misleadingly translate Hebrews 13:2 as a command to be hospitable "to strangers" (omitted by REB), if this is taken to imply unbelievers. As we might say, charity begins at home, and this is true of early Christianity as a whole (cf. 1 Pet 4:9, "Practice hospitality ungrudgingly to one another"). It is teaching especially relevant to the concerns of Hebrews, in which the author is trying to prevent apostasy* by recalling his readers to an active faith given expression in good works that strengthen the fellowship. But what of the motive, "for thereby some have entertained angels unawares" (Heb 13:2)? This is likely to be a reminder of the encounters of Abraham, Lot, Gideon, Manoah and Tobit with angelic* beings in contexts of hospitality. In Hebrews it fits well with the idea that believers are, like the ancestors,* "strangers (xenoi) and exiles (parepidēmoi) on the earth" (Heb 11:13), on a pilgrimage to heaven,* there to share with the angelic hosts in the divine worship* (cf. Heb 12:22-24). So hospitality is appropriate for a pilgrim people, especially if it entails the possibility of anticipations of that heavenly destination.

Heaven and earth remained firmly linked, however, in the command that follows: "Remember those who are in prison, as though in prison with them" (Heb 13:3; cf. Heb 10:32-34). Yet another aspect of early Christian hospitality comes to the surface: the practice of relieving the needs of fellow believers in prison by visiting them and providing their sustenance. This is not the only instance in the NT that juxtaposes the motif of "meeting angels unawares" and visiting fellow believers in prison. In the parable in Matthew 25:31-46, the heavenly king is revealed as present incognito with "the least of these my brethren" suffering imprisonment. There are also the two stories in Acts of imprisoned apostles being visited and miraculously released by "an angel of the Lord" (Acts 5:17-26; 12:1-19). Such evidence as this, together with the testimony of sources from the postapostolic period (see 4 below), shows that the instruction in Hebrews marks an early stage in a significant, developing tradition of hospitality as solidarity with the oppressed.

3.4. Johannine Epistles. In the Johannine epistles (see John, Letters of) we encounter evidence of what becomes a recurring concern in the churches of the late first century and onward: how to discriminate between true and false prophets* or teachers who come as itinerants expecting hospitality but who may be the bearers of false doctrine or out for personal gain at the Christians' expense (cf. Did. 11—12). In 2 John the "elder" (presbyteros) writes to a "sister" church (the "elect lady") and recommends the strict refusal of hospitality to any itinerant who does not teach orthodox Johannine christology: "If anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine [of Christ], do not receive him into the house or give him any greeting; for he who greets him shares his wicked work" (2 Jn 10-11). This shows both how dependent Christian itinerant preachers were on the informal hospitality of those among whom they moved but also how vulnerable local churches were to the harmful influence of wandering schismatics.

3 John is even more revealing (Malherbe, 103-12). The elder writes a letter of recommendation on behalf of Demetrius to Gaius, who is presumably a household head and someone prominent in one of the local house churches. He commends Gaius for showing hospitality to itinerant believers (like Demetrius), even those who were "strangers" (xenoi). But he also complains bitterly of the behavior of Diotrephes, who has contested the elder's authority and expressed his rival claim by refusing hospitality to those who have come from the elder, even expelling from his own house church any members who break ranks and offer hospitality themselves. So, ironically, whereas in 2 John the refusal of hospitality is advocated, in 3 John it is a cause for complaint.

These texts contribute to our understanding of early Christian hospitality in a number of ways. They reinforce our impression of the importance of hospitality as an informal, household-based mechanism for sustaining itinerant mission and building unity among the churches. They show what hospitality involved: sending and receiving letters of recommendation testifying to the bona fides of the itinerants (3 Jn 9); "greeting" the strangers; receiving them into the household for a period (unspecified here); attending to the doctrine they brought; and sending them on their way provisioned for the next stage of their journey (2 Jn 10-11; 3 Jn 5-6). They show that hospitality was a practice that brought honor to the host and to the local church through the positive testimonials of the guests (3 Jn 6). They also show that hospitality (and its opposite) between churches could be a focus of tension in relation to evolving authority structures at both the local and translocal levels. In 3 John hospitality is obviously a barometer not only of relations between potential hosts and guests but also of relations between church leaders (Malina).

4. The Postapostolic Period.

Beyond the NT, the practice of Christian hospitality continues to be widely attested in both Christian and non-Christian sources. Even outsiders find it worthy of comment, if only for the purpose of ridicule.

4.1. A Non-Christian Source. The Roman satirist Lucian is a case in point. As he saw things, Christians were so hospitable that they could be taken advantage of by charlatans like the imprisoned Peregrinus (d. 165):

> From the crack of dawn on you could see grey-haired widows and orphan children hanging around the prison, and the bigwigs of the sect used to bribe the jailers so they could spend the night with him inside. Full-course dinners were brought to him, their holy scriptures read to him, and our excellent Peregrinus . . . was hailed as a latter-day Socrates. From as far away as Asia Minor, Christian communities sent committees, paying their expenses out of the common funds, to help him with advice and consolation. The efficiency the Christians show whenever matters of community interest like this happen is unbelievable; they literally spare nothing (Lucian Peregr. 12—13, in Greer, 119-20).

This remarkable testimony from a hostile witness shows that the Christians were renowned for their hospitality. It indicates that by the second century (if not earlier) hospitality was carried out in an organized fashion on a translocal basis drawing upon resources held in common (cf. Acts). It reinforces the impression from Paul and the Pastoral Epistles that Christians saw themselves as brothers and sisters together in a worldwide household. This makes it unsurprising that the primary focus of their hospitality was on fellow believers, a particularity that impressed some outsiders and irked others (cf. Tacitus on the Christians' "hatred of mankind" in Annals 15.44). But Lucian clearly believes that Peregrinus was not worthy of hospitality because he was receiving it under false pretenses (since he was not a Christian). The question of how to distinguish true prophets from false seems to have been a perennial one.

4.2. Didache. The fact that hospitality was open to abuse and could even threaten church life (cf. 2 Jn; 3 Jn) meant that it continued to be a subject of reflection and instruction. The rules laid down in Didache 11—12 are significant in this regard. They show that a peripatetic ministry of teachers, apostles and prophets was taken for granted in the church of the late first century. Such travelers are to be received "as the Lord." But certain criteria are listed for testing the authenticity of incoming strangers: their teaching must be orthodox, their stay is to be strictly limited, they are to be sent on their way with (limited) provender but not money, and they are not to use their spiritual gifts for personal material gain (Did. 11). Similar rules apply to traveling Christians generally (Did. 12): they are not to be allowed to make a living off the name Christian, and they are not to "make traffic of Christ" (christemporos).

4.3. 1 Clement. Important also is the evidence of 1 Clement (c. 96), a letter from the church at Rome to the Corinthian church (cf. Brown and Meier, 159-83). The fact that it was written to encourage harmony in a church plagued with dissension and insubordination toward the local elders (presbyteroi) now deposed (1 Clem. 3.2; cf. 1 Clem. 46.5-9; 53.1-2; 57.1-2; see Church Order) goes a long way to explain why hospitality is a recurring motif. This is especially so if, as H. Chadwick suggests, the local divisions are being accentuated by the arrival from outside of fellow Christians expecting hospitality, receiving it from the elders who have been deposed and consequently being cold-shouldered by the rest of the church. What the visitors will have been aware of is not the hospitality of the church as a whole but its absence. This helps explain why, at the beginning of the letter, the writer reminds his addressees of the former, honorable practice of hospitality to which he wants to recall them: "For who has stayed with you without making proof of the virtue and steadfastness of your faith? . . . Who has not reported your character so magnificent in its hospitality (philoxenia)?" (1 Clem. 1.2).

In a recounting of the virtues of the biblical models Abraham, Lot and Rahab, hospitality is prominent once again, alongside faith and piety: "Because of his [Abraham's] faith and hospitality a son was given him in his old age" (1 Clem. 10.7); "For his hospitality and piety Lot was saved out of Sodom" (1 Clem. 11.1); "For her faith and hospitality Rahab the harlot was saved" (1 Clem. 12.1). Important from a theological point of view is the clear implication that salvation is social as well as individual: it comes not just through a certain kind of spiritual knowledge (gnōsis) but through a certain kind of hospitable practice as well.

4.4. Shepherd of Hermas. Finally we may cite the Shepherd of Hermas, written in Rome in the early second century. Among the list of good deeds whose reward is salvation is the following: "To minister to widows, to look after orphans and the destitute, to redeem from distress the servants of God [and] to be hospitable (philoxenos), for in hospitality may be found the practice of good" (Herm. Man. 8.10). The subject recurs in Hermas Similitude 9.27, where reference is made to "bishops and hospitable men (episkopoi kai philoxenoi) who at all times received the servants of God into their houses gladly and without hypocrisy; and the bishops ever ceaselessly sheltered the destitute and the widows by their ministration and ever behaved with holiness." The prominence of the episkopos in the exercise of hospitality (cf. 1 Tim 3:2) is evident.

The problem of itinerant false prophets who threatened local church life (cf. Did. 11-12) was probably one of the main reasons for the disappearance of a peripatetic ministry and the development in its place of the threefold ministry* of bishops, priests and deacons. Hospitality becomes more formalized, and the bishops become the agents of hospitality, assisted by the deacons (Greer, 125). Noteworthy also in Hermas Similitude 9.27 is a distinction between two types of hospitality: that toward visiting "servants of God," which strengthens the unity of the church ecumenically, and that toward the needy in the immediate vicinity, which strengthens the unity of the church locally. This conforms with the twofold conception of the church of which we know from Paul onward: the church in a particular place and the church universal.

See also HOUSEHOLD, FAMILY; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome: New Testament Cradles of Catholic Christianity (New York: Paulist, 1983); L. Casson, Travel in the Ancient World (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1974); H. Chadwick, "Justification by Faith and Hospitality," SP 4 (1961) 281-85; H. H. Cohn, Human Rights in the Bible and Talmud (Tel Aviv: MOD Books, 1989); P. F. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lukan Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); M. I. Finley, The World of Odysseus (Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1979); R. A. Greer, Broken Lights and Mended Lives: Theology and Common Life in the Early Church (University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1986); T. R. Hobbs, "Man, Woman and Hospitality—2 Kings 4:8-36," BTB 23 (1993) 91-100; J. Koenig, New Testament Hospitality: Partnership with Strangers as Promise and Mission (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); A. J. Malherbe, Social Aspects of Early Christianity (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); B. J. Malina, "The Received View and What It Cannot Do: 3 John and Hospitality," Semeia 35 (1986) 171-94; W. A. Meeks, The Origins of Christian Morality: The First Two Centuries (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993); D. W. Riddle, "Early Christian Hospitality: A Factor in the Gospel Transmission," JBL 57 (1939) 141-54; G. Stählin, "ξένος," TDNT 5:1-36; G. Theissen, The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1982); B. B. Thurston, The Widows: A Women's Ministry in the Early Church (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); D. C. Verner, The Household of God: The Social World of the Pastoral Epistles (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); F. Young, The Theology of the Pastoral Letters (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

S. C. Barton

HOUSE CHURCHES.

See ARCHITECTURE, EARLY CHURCH.

HOUSE OF GOD.

See HOUSE, SPIRITUAL HOUSE.

HOUSE, SPIRITUAL HOUSE

A house (Gk oikos and oikia) is a dwelling that is both a permanent shelter and a place where one's family is located. By extension of meaning, therefore, "house" can also mean "household" or "family" (for the sociological dimension of such "houses," see Households, Family) or an even larger social unit regarded as the descendants of a particular individual. A special use of "house" is in reference to the "house of God," which can refer either to God's symbolic dwelling place (the temple* or tabernacle*) or to the people of God's family.

1. Dwellings
2. Ancestral Families
3. The House of God
4. The People of God as the House of God

1. Dwellings.

The Septuagint uses the Greek words oikos and oikia almost exclusively for the Hebrew bayit, very rarely for 'ōhel ("tent"), lišhâh ("eating hall") or hêḵāl ("temple"). Bayit in the OT most commonly refers to one's physical dwelling or place of residence, and similarly in NT and early Christian literature its most common use is in reference to a literal building where people reside (e.g., Acts 4:34, 1 Clem. 12.6). For a physical description of dwellings in NT times see Dickie and Payne.

The author of Acts* locates many events of the early church's* development in the houses of particular individuals. It was in a house that the first believers were baptized by the Holy Spirit* (Acts 2:2), and the earliest church met in people's houses (Acts 2:46, 12:12). Saul (Paul*) raided these house meetings as a persecutor (Acts 8:3) and then later is healed in the house of Judas (Acts 9:11). Peter stayed in the house of Simon the tanner (Acts 10:6), upon whose roof he sees the vision* that encourages him to go to Cornelius.* Then, against Jewish practice, Peter enters the house of Cornelius, a Gentile* (Acts 10:25). This became a point of contention (Acts 11:3) from which it was established that, as Paul later put it, the old walls of separation between Gentile and Jew were coming down in Christ.* Paul stayed at the houses of many of his converts (Acts 16:15, 31; 17:7; 18:7). The book of Acts (see, e.g., Acts 16:40) makes it fairly clear that the early church's principal locus of operations was in the houses of individual Christians (for more on house churches, see Households, Family). The naming of so many particular houses (some by name, e.g., Acts 12:12) may also reflect the author's intention to stress the historical reality of the events (see Architecture).

The only possible reference to a literal house in the General Epistles* is 2 John 10. The author urges the "elect lady" (either the church [note the plural verbs] or perhaps a prominent woman at whose house the church met) not to show hospitality* to heterodox teachers (literally, "do not receive them into the house") or even greet or speak to them. However, since churches met in people's houses, it is possible that this is also an injunction against receiving these people into the church (see 4 below). Thus this command would not forbid hospitality in general, even to heretics, but rather forbids receiving false teachers into the fellowship or allowing them to teach in the church.

In the OT, "house of" could be used metaphorically to mean a place or circumstance in which something is manifested (e.g., the "house of Lady Wisdom" in Prov 9). The Dead Sea community referred to itself as the true "house of the Torah," presumably because they regarded themselves as the only truly obedient people (CD 20:11-13). Early Christian literature occasionally makes such metaphorical use of "house." So, for example, an unregenerate heart is a "house of demons" in Barnabas 16.7, because it is where wickedness dwells.

2. Ancestral Families.

In the OT "house" was commonly used to refer to a sociological unit under a particular person's authority* (see Households, Family). Therefore, a greatly extended sociological unit such as a whole nation, if it regarded itself as a family, could be identified in terms of the common ancestor, understood as a kind of head of his descendants and their dependents. "House of Israel" means all those people who could claim a connectional identity with Israel's (Jacob's) descendants, and the "house of Judah" refers to the tribe that descended from Judah. Even smaller social units or families within tribes can be called houses, as with the house of Zadok.

"House" thus meaning "nation," "tribe" or "clan" occurs in our literature only as a rare carryover from OT usage. Acts twice uses the stock phrase "house of Israel," once in an OT citation by Stephen* (Acts 7:42) and once in Peter's first sermon at Pentecost* (Acts 2:36) where he solemnly tells the "house of Israel" that God has made Jesus whom they crucified to be both Lord and Christ. Hebrews 8:8 and 8:10 quote OT texts addressed to the "house of Israel" and the "house of Judah."

Instances of this use of "house" in the apostolic fathers occur in their reflections on OT material. Thus the phrase "house of Israel" occasionally is observed (e.g., 1 Clem. 8.2). Barnabas, who likes to see the symbolic meaning of everything, has Moses* prophesy that "in the last days the Son of God will cut off the house of Amalek by the roots" (Barn. 12.9), taking "the house of Amalek" as a metaphor for the unbelieving world. Just as Christians are spiritual descendants of Israel or Abraham* by faith, non-Christians are spiritually connected to Amalek by unbelief.

3. The House of God.

The OT speaks frequently of the "house of God" or "house of the Lord." This was generally applied to the temple or earlier to the tabernacle (e.g., Judg 18:31; 19:18), which was indeed some kind of physical accommodation. But the first use of the phrase "house of God" was in Jacob's naming of Bethel (which means "house of God" in Hebrew), which was not a domicile or building but simply a place where Jacob had experienced the presence of God. Later Israelites too were aware that the temple was not a literal abode of God, as Solomon testified when he dedicated the temple (1 Kings 8:27)—"the heavens, even the highest heaven, cannot contain you. How much less this temple I have built." The house of God was thus a symbol for the dwelling of God among his people, his spiritual presence in a special way.

Therefore the tabernacle or temple took on something of a metaphorical character in representing this presence of God. When the psalmist said, "Surely . . . I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever" (Ps 23), he was not referring to the physical tabernacle or temple but the fact that he would experience the presence of God always.

Since in the OT the "house of God" was the physical place that symbolized God's presence with his people, the temple is occasionally referred to as God's house. Stephen echoed the Chronicler's reference to Solomon's temple as "God's house" (Acts 7:46, 47, 49). But Stephen also refers to Isaiah's declaration that the temple cannot really be God's dwelling (Acts 7:48-50, quoting Is 66:1-2). Stephen had been charged with "speaking against this holy place" (Acts 6:13), and thus his motive is to show that the physical building in Jerusalem* does not in any way guarantee God's presence and that the Jewish trust in the presence of the physical building is misplaced.

Though the dominant "house" motif in Hebrews 3 is the idea of the "people of God," the image of God's "house" as his dwelling place, or the place where God may be approached, is not absent. Hebrews 3 begins with an exhortation to consider Jesus, the apostle* and high priest* whom we confess. Hebrews* is clearly interested in Jesus' priestly service in the heavenly tabernacle, as is spelled out in Hebrews 8 and 9. Further, the readers of Hebrews would no doubt remember that Moses was in some sense the "builder" of the literal tabernacle in the wilderness. At least he is the one who took down the directions and then implemented them (see Heb 8:5). Thus there may be an implicit merging of the two ideas that the "house" of God, which is the people of God, is also the place where God is approached—echoing Paul's understanding of the people of God as being also the dwelling place of God (1 Cor 3:16; Eph 2:19-22). Thus when Hebrews 10:21 concludes that Jesus is also "great priest over the house of God," the author understands "house of God" both in terms of the tabernacle/temple imagery and in terms of the "people of God."

4. The People of God as the House of God.

In 2 Samuel 7:11 there is a hint of juxtaposing the two concepts of family and dwelling, for when David wishes to build a house for God (a temple) he is told that rather God will build a house for David (David's progeny). Since "house" was a common enough idiom for a social unit with familial connections who are under an individual's authority and share a common identity (see Household, Family), it was a small step to think of the "house of God" as the people of God.

In the intertestamental period the Similitudes of Enoch (probably dating to late second or early first century B.C.) speaks of God's house in spiritual terms and associates it with a messianic figure—"After this, the Righteous and Elect One will reveal the house of his congregation" (1 Enoch 53:6, trans. E. Isaac). There is some ambiguity here. Possibly this is a vague reference to a "hidden" temple like the hidden Jerusalem made manifest at the end of the world. Alternatively, "of his congregation" may simply be epexegetical (he will reveal the house, that is, his congregation). In any case the concept of house as family and house of God as temple is starting to merge into the idea found in the NT of the community as the house of God.

Apparently the Qumran* covenanters regarded the council of their community as a spiritual replacement for the temple (1QS 8:4-5: "When these [twelve men and three priests] are in Israel the Council of the Community shall be established in truth. It shall be a . . . house of Holiness for Israel"). The temple of Herod was apparently regarded as illegitimate, primarily because it was served by a priesthood* they regarded as illegitimate (because the priests were not Zadokite). The Temple Scroll suggests that the Qumran sectaries also expected the literal temple to be restored and the entire sacrificial system to be reestablished.

But the path was well-laid for the NT writers to think of the "house of God" as the people of God. As in Paul, who understood both the church as a whole (Eph 2:22) and the believer as an individual (1 Cor 3:16; 6:19) to be a dwelling place of God's Spirit, most references to "house of God" in our literature carry the meaning of "God's people," that is, the Christian community, although it is sometimes merged with the concept of "God's dwelling" as well.

Hebrews 3:2 refers to Numbers 12:7, which says that Moses, unlike ordinary prophets, is "faithful in all my house." Numbers may have simply meant that Moses was faithful in his words and actions in the Tent of Meeting and thus used the term house in a more or less literal fashion. But the author of Hebrews clearly saw a greater significance, understanding it to mean the "people of God," namely, Israel/church (see Church as Israel). Moses was faithful as a servant* in God's house (i.e., among God's people), in contrast to Jesus, who is a son over his house (i.e., over God's people; Heb 3:5-6). Further, Moses himself is part of the house, albeit an exalted one, whereas Jesus is the builder (Heb 3:3-4), which is an implicit statement of Christ's deity (Heb 3:4). Moses was chief minister among God's people, whereas Christ not only ministers but also has created the people of God by his redemptive acts.

Christians who persevere are "his house" (Heb 3:6), the house Christ built and in which Moses served. There are not two houses here, one for Moses (Israel) and one for Jesus (church), but a single house ("Israel" and "church" together). In fact, it is unlikely that Hebrews makes anything like our modern distinction between Israel and the church, since ekklēsia is the Greek word used for the congregation of Israel (Heb 2:12, quoting Ps 21:23 LXX [EVV Ps 22:22]). Both Moses and Jesus have to do with the one house of God; the difference lies in their respective positions and functions with regard to that house.

In 1 Peter,* particularly in 1 Peter 2:4-10, the two concepts of "house of God"—God's dwelling and God's family—are completely merged. The focus in this passage is on Jesus Christ, who is the chief cornerstone, which is the "guide" stone used in the foundation and building of a house (rather than the keystone of an arch). A catena of OT "stone" quotations is given in 1 Peter 2:6-8 to show how Christ is foundational to God's house, the church. But the underlying purpose is to show how believers are likened to and identified with Christ as God's elect.* Believers are also called "living stones" (1 Pet 2:5), which together with Christ "are being built up as a spiritual house for holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices* acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" [author's trans.]. Thus when 1 Peter calls the believers a "spiritual house" it is not just saying they are a metaphorical house; they are the family of God constituted by and indwelt by God's Spirit (1 Pet 2:9-10).

In the OT the temple or tabernacle was the symbol of God's dwelling with his people, and the people are the family/house of God. Further, the Christian takeover of the OT concept that Israel is to mediate God's presence to the Gentile world at large makes the church as a whole a priesthood. Thus we have the combining of three OT images, the house of God as the temple, the house of God as God's family and the house of God as the priesthood. As was already mentioned, the Qumran community (which was probably a priestly sect) had already regarded its council as in some ways a temporary replacement for the temple. 1 Peter here uses a homiletical midrashic exegesis similar to the Qumran community's to present the church as the new temple community (Schutter). Thus they are both the house of God and also the maintainers (the "priesthood") of the house. Certainly it is surprising how many overlaps in OT citations there are between 1 Peter and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Even if 1 Peter is entirely independent of Qumranic influences, the thought-world is clearly parallel.

There are, however, certain clear differences. Most noticeable is that the "spiritual house" in 1 Peter is permanent rather than a stopgap until a proper temple can be reconstituted, as appears to have been the case with Qumran. The observation that the NT's exegesis is distinctly christological,* in contradistinction to exegesis in the Dead Sea Scrolls, obtains here as well, since this spiritual house has Christ as its determinative foundation. Peter's spiritual house exists only in connection with the chief cornerstone. Finally, the merging of the temple imagery with the idea of God's family as God's house gives a distinctly personal character to Peter's spiritual house.

With this as background it is possible to understand the enigmatic statement of 1 Peter 4:17 that "it is time for judgment to begin with the house of God," which appears to be saying that Christian suffering,* even for the sake of Christ, is a judgment* of God. This is probably an allusion to Ezekiel 9:6, where in Ezekiel's vision all God's people who were not marked as grieving over sin* were slaughtered, beginning with the elders at the temple. As the new spiritual "house of God," the church is subject to the winnowing trials that befell the literal temple and the people of Israel in the OT. The "house of God" must be purified (cf. Mal 3:3; 2 Chron 29:15-18) so that it is a suitable dwelling for God.

The merged image of God's house as his people and his dwelling found ready acceptance in the early church. 1 Clement twice picks up on the quotation of Numbers 12 in Hebrews 3, understanding "God's house" in the same way to refer to God's people. 2 Clement goes so far as to cite Jeremiah 7:11 ("my house has become a den of thieves") as applying to the church if it does not do the will of the Lord. The Epistle of Barnabas (16.6) follows Paul's lead in seeing Christians as God's temple. Gentile believers are now a house for God, though formerly they were a house for demons. In Hermas* the "house of God" is synonymous with the church. In a passage apparently based on 1 Peter 2, Hermas has a vision of a tower (the church) and rejected stones, those who were formerly in the faith but were later deceived by the "women in black" (Unbelief, Self-indulgence, Disobedience, and Deceit). These rejected stones were cast out of the house of God, but they may reenter God's house as true stones if they repent (Herm. Sim. 13-14).

See also ARCHITECTURE, EARLY CHURCH; CHURCH; HOUSEHOLD, FAMILY; TABERNACLE, SANCTUARY; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. C. Dickie and J. B. Payne, "House," ISBE 2:770-72; J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy: An Exegetical Examination of 1 Peter 2:4-10 and the Phrase βασιλειον ιερατευμα (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1966); B. Gärtner, The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the New Testament (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965); J. Goetzmann, "House . . . ," NIDNTT 2:247-51; N. Hillyer, "Spiritual Milk . . . Spiritual House," TynB 20 (1969) 126; F. Manns, " 'La maison où réside l'Esprit'. 1 P 2,5 at son arrière-plan juif," SBFLA 34 (1984) 207-24; R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple: The Church in the New Testament (London: Oxford University Press, 1969); J. S. Marshall, " 'A Spiritual House and Holy Priesthood' (1 Peter ii, 5)," ATR 28 (1946) 227-28; O. Michel, "οἶκος κτλ," TDNT 5:119-31; P. Minear, "The House of Living Stones: A Study of 1 Peter 2:4-11," ERev 34 (1982) 238-48; W. Schutter, Hermeneutic and Composition in 1 Peter (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989). D. G. McCartney

HOUSEHOLD, FAMILY

The sociological unit in the Hellenistic world, as in the OT, was not the individual, the city or the state but the family or household. Early Christianity, including the NT itself, to a large degree addressed people not as separate individual entities but as connected to the household (see DPL, Households and Household Codes).

1. Households in the Ancient Mediterranean World
2. Evidence of Households in the New Testament
3. Households and the Social Structure of Early Christianity

1. Households in the Ancient Mediterranean World.

In the OT the term house is frequently used figuratively as a reference to one's family (e.g., Gen 7:1). A house or household included not only an immediate nuclear family but usually a somewhat extended family and those who were dependent on and connected to that family in some way, all under the authority* of the householder. Thus when Joshua promises that "I and my house will serve the Lord" (Josh 24:15), he means his family and other people living with his family under his authority will serve the Lord. Similarly, in Genesis (41:40; 45:8, etc.), as Acts 7:10 recounts, when Joseph was made governor over Egypt and over Pharaoh's household, it means he had stewardship both of the nation and of Pharaoh's family and attendants. (The NIV's "my palace" in Gen 41:40 probably misses the point.) These references also demonstrate that "house" did not include everyone under a person's authority but only those with some kind of familial or domestic attachment. Pharaoh's household (Gen 45) is distinguished from "all Egypt," which was also under his authority.

In the Hellenistic world the household was a social* unit with familial or domestic connections whose members lived in a particular house and were subject to the householder's authority. They shared a common identity as members of that unit. Its cohesiveness lay not only in its members' connection to the head of the house but also in various economic, psychological and religious factors. Prosperity (or want) came not to individuals in isolation but to their household (see Herm. Sim. 7.3). The very word economy comes from the Greek (oikonomia) for "house law," because financial and other administration pertained to the household, not the individual. Such administration was often the responsibility of the householder's wife. In our literature Clement of Rome* refers to women who have been taught "to manage the affairs of the household with dignity" (1 Clem. 1.3). Psychologically, a person's identity, from that of the householder to that of the slave,* resided in his or her connection to, responsibilities toward and function within a household. Ordinarily a household was held together by a common religion,* the family generally following the religious proclivities of the head of the household.

2. Evidence of Households in the New Testament.

It is therefore not surprising that the household, a social unit found both in the OT and in Hellenistic culture, is common in our literature. Since households were such strongly religiously-linked social units, they are often the target of evangelistic* effort. Several extended families whose heads believe the gospel* are said to be included in the salvation* that comes to that "house." Thus in Acts 10:2 Cornelius* "with all his household" feared God* and is later (Acts 11:14) told that Peter will bring a message "by which you will be saved, you and all your household." Similarly Lydia, a Thyatiran businesswoman in Philippi, is baptized "with her household" (Acts 16:15). This last reference demonstrates that a woman could be head of a household and was accepted as such in the church* (see also 1 Cor 1:11; Ign. Pol. 8.2; Rom 16 in Paul's tribute to women colleagues). The prison warden of Philippi and his whole household are saved and rejoice with him (Acts 16:31, 34), and in Acts 18:18 Crispus, the synagogue* ruler in Corinth, believed, along with his whole household. Clearly the author of Acts* regards the coming of the gospel as affecting whole families and household authority structures as well as individuals. The baptisms* of these entire households suggests an early Christian adoption of the OT covenantal* idea that included families and households, not just individuals, in the covenant and thus also the covenant signs (see Gen 17:23).

Likewise in the General Epistles* the family is a social unit to which salvation often comes. Hebrews 11:7 makes reference to Noah building an ark for the salvation of his "house." Although this was in the first instance a physical salvation rather than a spiritual one, Hebrews* is clearly applying it in a spiritual direction (see 1 Pet 3:20-21), since his emphasis is on Noah's faith. The rest of Hebrews 11 emphasizes how the OT family of God exercised faith.*

3. Households and the Social Structure of Early Christianity.

Since entire households of prominent people were converted, it is not surprising that the household remained the basis for early Christian meetings. In general the early Christians, having been expelled from the synagogues,* appear to have gathered in the homes of prominent converts for instruction and prayer* (Acts 12:12, 16:40; Rom 16). Several recent sociological studies on these house churches have argued that much of the social structure of early Christianity stemmed from its being patterned after a household unit, with attendant responsibilities and claims to loyalty. In particular, as the household of God, the church was not a democratic institution but a patriarchal family consisting of people who are familially related to, dependent on, obedient to and loyal to the head of that house, Jesus Christ, and thus also to his subordinate officers (1 Pet 5:5; Heb 13:17).

Since the church as a whole, as well as in its manifestations in local houses, was regarded as a family, the mutual obligations of its members are thought of in terms of family responsibilities. Christians have an obligation to familial love (1 Pet 1:22; 2 Pet 1:7; 1 Jn 3:11; 4:7; etc.), and failure to show proper hospitality* in welcoming family members is grievous (3 Jn 10; Did. 12.1-5). The family must be protected against false teachers, to whom hospitality must not be given (2 Jn 10). 1 Peter 5:1-5 (see also 1 Jn 2:12-14) addresses the church as a household. Elders are to be shepherds, eager to serve but not lording it over their charges, themselves in service to the chief Shepherd (1 Pet 5:4). The "young men" are to be submissive and a model to all members, who are to be clothed with humility toward one another (1 Pet 5:5).

However, the early church's stress on believers as members of the household of faith did not obscure the significance of individual belief. The particular character of the household code* in 1 Peter* is partly the result of the fact that certain slaves* and women,* contrary to their household heads, have believed in Christ and are thus religiously at odds with their households. Much of the suffering* that 1 Peter envisages is due to the fact that, by adopting Christianity, individuals are disrupting one of the glues that held a household together. No doubt many non-Christian heads of households felt obligated for the sake of maintaining the household to discourage its members from departing from the accepted religion of the house, and this may at times have led to attempts at physical coercion. Thus slaves, specifically identified in 1 Peter 2:18 as oiketai or household slaves, could be beaten for their faith (1 Pet 2:20). Both slaves and wives (1 Pet 3:1-6) are put in the difficult position of being required to do all they can to maintain the stability of the household while at the same time holding fast to their religious convictions and commitments to Christ. Suffering for so doing was commendable (1 Pet 2:20) because it brought glory to God (1 Pet 2:12; 4:16).

The fact that individuals may be saved in distinction from their household does not obviate the reality of their household connections. 1 Peter 3:1-2 even entertains the possibility of the household connectedness working in reverse of the usual pattern, suggesting that unbelieving heads of households might be won by the godly behavior of their believing wives.

The postapostolic period continued in this vein. Although the corporate idea of salvation continues, the necessity of personal belief and action is also stressed. Hermas* retains the corporate expectation when he exhorts people to "pray to God, and he will heal your transgressions, and those of your whole house and those of all the saints" (Herm. Vis. 1.1.9), but at the same time he struggles with the fact that his own family has not repented (Herm. Vis. 1.3.1-2), at least partly because Hermas did not care for the spiritual well-being of his house until rebuked (Herm. Vis. 2.3.1). Thus the early church to a large degree maintained the balance between corporate connectedness, even in respect to salvation, and individual responsibility.

See also HOSPITALITY; HOUSE, SPIRITUAL HOUSE; HOUSEHOLD CODES; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); E. A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century (London: Tyndale, 1960); A. J. Malherbe, Social Aspects of Early Christianity (Baton Rouge, LA: Louisiana State University, 1977); A. Strobel, "Der Begriff des 'Hauses' im griechischen und römischen Privatrecht," ZNW 56 (1965) 91-100; D. Tidball, An Introduction to the Sociology of the New Testament (Exeter: Paternoster, 1983). D. G. McCartney

HOUSEHOLD CODES

NT writers adopted a number of conventional literary devices to aid them in the teaching of ethics.* One significant device of this sort is referred to by scholars as a household code. This term is a translation of the German term Haustafel ("house table"), which Martin Luther originally coined and which was taken up by scholars to describe the extended passages in the NT that address various members of a household.* A number of sections in the NT letters have been classified in this way (Col 3:18—4:1; Eph 5:22-33; 1 Tim 2:8-15; 5:1-2; 6:1-2; Tit 2:1—3:8; 1 Pet 2:13—3:7), and related teaching occurs in the writings of the late first- and second-century apostolic fathers.* The focus of the present article is on the non-Pauline NT and later usage of this form of instruction, but the lines of research have developed in such a way that some discussion of the Pauline usage must fall within our purview (see DPL, Households and Household Codes).

1. Definitions: The Parameters and Permutations of the Household Code
2. The Household Code Tradition in Recent Scholarship
3. Household and Church Codes in the Later New Testament and Apostolic Fathers
4. Conclusions

1. Definitions: The Parameters and Permutations of the Household Code.

1.1. The Form. The ideal household code is characterized by teaching addressed to the two members in a household relationship (wives and husbands; slaves* and masters; children and parents); use of an imperative verb expressing subordination (Gk hypotassō) or obedience* (Gk hypakouō); grounds or motivation for the behavior enjoined; and reciprocal address. But close inspection of the various passages generally categorized as household codes reveals a number of differences that complicate the issues of the genesis and form of the NT device.

1.2. Variations Within the New Testament. The typical assumption is that the household codes of Colossians and Ephesians represent in some sense the basic form, with somewhat divergent later examples being understood as developments or expansions of an ideal form corresponding to developments in the church's sense of self-identity in relation to the world as the house church became the institutional church* (so esp. Herr).

Although this interpretation is open to question, it does seem clear from a comparison of the form and themes that the related passages belong to a common tradition(s) that in different settings and times proved to be capable of adaptation to new situations. Thus within the Pauline and Petrine writings we find passages that address believers specifically from the perspective of their place in the household (Eph; Col; cf. 1 Tim 6:1-2; 1 Pet 2:13—3:7). However, other passages related in form and tone address believers according to their positions in the broader context of the Christian congregation. Injunctions may be divided along gender lines, whether generally or in the marriage relationship (1 Cor 11:3-16; 14:33-35; 1 Tim 2:8-15), and along generational lines (1 Tim 5:1-2); Titus 2:1-10 combines these perspectives. Elsewhere the church as a whole is instructed to acknowledge the secular authorities (Rom 13:1-7; Tit 3:1-2; 1 Pet 2:13-17; see Civil Authority). And several passages encourage the church similarly to submit to its leaders and/or exhort leaders to lead well (1 Cor 16:16; 1 Thess 5:12-13; Heb 13:17; 1 Tim 3:1-13; Tit 1:6-9; 1 Pet 5:1-5).

In view of both the similarity of form, content and tone in these passages and the variety of groups and concerns addressed, the adequacy of the term "household code" to describe the tradition as a whole has been questioned. D. Schroeder (1976, 1959) chose the more general term "station code," which identifies and links the passages on the basis of their common form and concern to teach believers how to behave in their various stations in life. Others (Balch, Weiser) prefer to think in terms of two subspecies of one tradition: the term "household code" applies to the form as it occurs in Colossians, Ephesians and 1 Peter,* but the term "church code," or "congregational code," more accurately describes the tradition's application or expansion in those passages that exceed the bounds of the household (e.g., 1 Tim 2:1—6:2; Tit 2:1—3:8).

Both of these approaches share the assumption that a basic form was altered or expanded as new situations warranted. The most recent work of H. von Lips suggests another explanation. He observed the relationship between the household code in 1 Peter and the code in Titus 2:1—3:7 and determined that these two examples share certain features that set them off from Colossians and Ephesians: the parent/child category is absent; instructions are addressed to slaves but not masters; subordination to the state, which Colossians and Ephesians do not mention, is enjoined; 1 Peter and Titus prefer the verb subordinate or submit (Gk hypotassomai; used throughout) to obey (Gk hypakouō; used in Col and Eph of slave and child) and the noun despotai of the masters (Col and Eph use kyrioi); and the codes in 1 Peter and Titus make extensive use of theological material to ground the instructions (Titus 2:11-14; 3:3-8; 1 Pet 2:21-24; 3:18-22). These points of contact, especially the addition of the instruction concerning the state, suggest the emergence of a new schema or a parallel tradition rather than one that has undergone transformation. Whether this explanation is an improvement remains to be seen. However, his attentiveness to the text and context, instead of primarily secular parallels, for clues about the meaning of the codes is noteworthy. This methodology has not always been followed.

2. The Household Code Tradition in Recent Scholarship.

Three crucial questions determine the direction that study of this teaching form has taken: Where did it come from? What circumstances in the Christian communities gave rise to its usage? What is the intention of the ethic it enjoins?

2.1. The Question of Source. For the most part scholars have concentrated on discovering the source of the code as it appears in the NT in the hope that this would provide the clue to its meaning. Initial investigations concluded that codes used in Stoicism had been modified only slightly for Christian use (Weidinger, Dibelius). Then some scholars noticed that the emphasis on subordination seemed closer to the teaching of Hellenistic Judaism* as seen, for instance, in Philo* (Schroeder 1959 and esp. Crouch). L. Goppelt (1973, 1993 [1978], 1982), building on the work of Schroeder, concluded that the NT household codes are genuinely Christian products; in some respects they compare with Stoic and Hellenistic Jewish relationship ethics but are more specifically the result of Christian reworking of Hellenistic ethics "on the basis of principles developed by Jesus and Paul" (Goppelt 1993 [1978], 173).

More recent scholarship emphasizes to a greater extent the influence of the Greco-Roman culture on the NT device (Lührmann, Thraede, Balch 1981, Müller, Lips). The structure of Aristotelian household ethics (addressing social relationships, reciprocality, placing one of the pair under the authority of the other) might explain the codes in Colossians and Ephesians. But the more likely immediate source of the NT tradition, which becomes more diverse in content, is to be found in the broader contemporary Hellenistic discussion of the theme "concerning the household" (Gk peri oikonomou), which developed from, but was not restricted to, Aristotle in terms of content and form.

For a number of reasons, looking to the contemporary culture for an understanding of the NT household codes is a useful approach. The absence of an identifable source for the form recommends caution and sensitivity (Hartman). It is clear that the NT writers were indeed influenced by their environment, and in this respect it is important to note how the early church utilized the Hellenistic "household" concept as its own sense of identity developed. This concept, rather than formal considerations alone, would seem to be the common denominator that links NT with secular social ethics. The ancient household* was regarded as the basic building block of society; its stability guaranteed the stability of the city-state, and so discussion of the relation of household members to the state authorities came naturally within the purview of a discussion of ethics related to the household. The teaching developed to safeguard the relationships and responsibilities in the household and respect for the state established some of the categories and suggested the method of instruction of the NT household code. But there is no question of an uncritical, wholesale adoption of secular ethics on the part of NT writers.

2.2. The Question of Causal Circumstances. Martin Dibelius and K. Weidinger answered this question on the basis of secularization in the early church. In their opinion the delay of Christ's* return and the pressing concern for survival in a hostile world led the church to find a way to make itself at home in society. The secular code, with some slight Christian modifications, encouraged the kind of behavior that would facilitate this transition. The codes were taken over so completely, however, that nothing about a particular church's situation might be learned from them. This view has been largely rejected, though it has still influenced the interpretation of later NT writings.

Other scholars maintain that the household code was applied to quiet the unrest caused in Christian communities by the enthusiastic enactment of the Pauline equality tradition preserved in Galatians 3:28 (Col 3:11; 1 Cor 12:13; Schroeder 1959; Crouch; Martin, 3:931-32). Goppelt argued similarly that the tradition called Christians undergoing stress because of the faith* to remain engaged in the social structure rather than emigrate out of it (Goppelt 1982).

E. Schüssler Fiorenza's feminist reconstruction combines the two preceding views, interpreting the household codes as evidence of the church's return to patriarchy. Early efforts to live according to the equality promised by Paul's gospel (Gal 3:28) led to some exuberant excesses and apparently drew criticism and hostility from secular critics. Rather than stand firm for the gospel and coequality of the sexes, church leaders in the name of Paul returned to the acceptable secular arrangement for the church in order to promote peace with the hostile world.

On the whole Schroeder, Crouch, Goppelt and Balch seem to be on the better track in their various ways. Balch (1981) especially pointed out that there is no sign of an emancipation movement in 1 Peter, much less one based on Galatians 3:28. What does seem evident in all cases is some sort of social instability in the church, whether brought on by errant theology or eschatology* (Col; 1 Tim; and perhaps linked to false teaching) or stressful conditions in society in which Christians were being alienated and persecuted (1 Pet; see Elliott). In either case the solution arrived at was for the Christian community to structure its social behavior in ways that reflected conformity rather than opposition to the outside world. The more fundamental question is the intention in encouraging such behavior.

2.3. The Question of Intention. Along with the search for the source has gone the search for the motive or intention of the ethic taught by the NT household code, and numerous suggestions have been made (accommodation to secular ethics, Weidinger, Dibelius and more recently Schüssler Fiorenza; quieting enthusiastic unrest, Crouch, Martin; preventing internal disintegration brought on by outside pressures, Elliott 1981; defense-apologetic, Balch; mission, Schroeder, Goppelt).

However, the variation in the form the tradition takes and in the circumstances it addresses in the NT, as well as the absence of a single secular prototype, suggest that any one of the proposed solutions may be too narrow. It can be said generally that the NT household and church codes are concerned with Christian behavior in typical life situations; as in the secular Hellenistic setting, so too in the church: household roles and the household context provided the typical forum for discussing social ethics. Once the household metaphor is taken over as an expression of congregational identity (Eph; 1 Tim; Tit; 1 Pet), the same pattern of teaching can be expanded and applied to address life within the relationships in the broader Christian community and life as a Christian in the world. Goppelt observed correctly that life lived at this level in the various social roles insured that Christians would be in daily contact with unbelievers with every opportunity to testify to the faith (Goppelt 1982, 2:170; 1993, 162-79).

Whether the household codes were specifically missionary in orientation in every NT application is another question. What can be said is that through them the NT writers reflect sensitivity to the expectations of society at large and seem to encourage Christians to live according to patterns that were widely accepted as respectable. But in view of the emphasis on justice and fairness and the extent to which the ethic is grounded in theology, none of the NT household codes reflect uncritical secularization. A creative middle ground was sought, and at least in some cases (Tit; 1 Pet) this would facilitate a "salt and light" Christian existence in the world. In other cases it might serve a different purpose or have in-house matters more in mind.

3. Household and Church Codes in the Later New Testament and Apostolic Fathers.

3.1. 1 Peter. As indicated, the circumstances of the recipients of a letter* containing a household code provide the more reliable clues to the intention of the teaching than anything inherent in the form itself. 1 Peter is somewhat distinct (as compared, for instance, with Titus) in that it addresses churches already experiencing or about to experience alienation and abuse in society. This dimension of Christian existence had apparently led some people in those churches to consider either a form of compromise to avoid this criticism and hostility or perhaps to pull out and attempt to live a Christian life beyond the range of pagan society.

Peter responds to these options by reinforcing rather than reducing the sense of tension felt by his readers with a theology that explained their experience of alienation. God's* election* to membership in his family set them in a paradoxical situation—nonmembers in a world in which they must continue to live (1 Pet 1:1-2). On the one hand Christians are "foreigners," those who reside without citizenship and without rights in a land that is not their own (1 Pet 1:1; 2:11). On the other hand they are the equivalent of resident aliens, a slightly different metaphor that implies the same sorts of limitations as "foreigners" but also implies the need to live on in that foreign country (1 Pet 1:17; 2:11). Since God's action in Christ for his people has determined their situation, they may rejoice; and however much the pressures of this life might seem to contradict it, the hope of salvation* to be realized in full only in the end is sure (1 Pet 1:3-7). This theology may explain how the predicament has come about and provide some assurance* about the future fulfillment of God's promises,* but there is little incentive in it for a continued commitment to living the arduous Christian life in a hostile world.

Another factor is mentioned to convince Christians to stay engaged in the social life of the world, whatever the perils: mission. At 1 Peter 2:11-12, Peter makes the turn from the theology of the Christian identity as aliens to appropriate Christian living. The main motive for living an exemplary life before pagans is the hope of their salvation (1 Pet 2:12; cf. 1 Pet 3:1, 15). If Christian living can lead to this, then the importance of continued engagement in social life can be seen. It is this point that the household code that immediately follows (1 Pet 2:13—3:7) seeks to explore. Engagement will mean living as far as possible in accordance with the patterns of social life, and the secular household ethos provides the essential categories.

1 Peter 2:13-17 calls for submission to the government authorities. This would include a general attitude of respect toward those in authority (cf. Tit 3:1; Rom 13:1-4), which would be demonstrated in the specific acts of paying taxes (cf. Rom 13:6-7) and offering prayers* in behalf of civil leaders (cf. 1 Tim 2:1-2; 1 Clem. 61.1-3). The rationale is that the civil government has been ordained by God and that such behavior will disprove the false accusations of outsiders who have slandered Christian households as being disloyal to the city-state. Apparently this kind of accusation was a current problem; the implication from the letter is that even exemplary behavior in this regard might not stop the abuse from unbelievers.

1 Peter 2:18-25 commands Christian slaves to submit to their masters. It is possible that it was more common in these churches for slaves to be Christians than masters, since masters are not addressed (cf. 1 Tim 6:1-2; Tit 2:9-10) and since the lengthy theological foundation establishes Christ's suffering* as the pattern for Christian slaves who must continue to suffer unjustly. The unique christological* grounding reveals the special circumstances of the churches to which Peter writes (cf. the confessional* material used to ground the behavior in Titus 2:11-14; 3:3-7). In any case, the church's calling to engagement in the world prohibited slaves from opting out of this social institution. To encourage anything else would be regarded by unbelievers as anarchy.

1 Peter 3:1-7 closes the household code with teaching addressed to wives and husbands (see Marriage). Wives are to be submissive to husbands, and the two possible scenarios of mixed and Christian marriages are envisaged. A Christian wife whose husband was an unbeliever might experience harsh treatment for insubordination because of her foreign religion (1 Pet 3:1-2). Exemplary behavior might also be linked to her faith and so win over the unbelieving mate to Christ. Outer adornment is the specific aspect of respectable conduct given to illustrate the teaching (cf. 1 Tim 2:9-10). Spiritual inner adornment is commended (a gentle and quiet spirit), and Sarah's demeanor provides a pattern. Christian husbands are to refuse to treat their wives harshly (1 Pet 3:7). They are fellow heirs of eternal life; failure to treat them with the respect they are due as human beings and fellow heirs will affect their relationship with God (cf. 1 Tim 2:8).

At this point in the letter the teaching addressed to the traditional household code categories comes to an end. There is no question of the wholesale adoption of a pagan ethical code. The conduct encouraged certainly corresponds to secular ideals of respectability, but the grounds and intention of the teaching are thoroughly Christianized. What is unique about the code as it is applied in 1 Peter (in contrast to Col, Eph, 1 Tim, Tit) is the insistence on respectability and engagement by Christians in the social life of the world even when they have been marginalized by unbelieving society.

Church concerns continue in 1 Peter 3:8—5:11 with various themes being linked to the dominant one of suffering. In 1 Peter 5:1-5 Peter returns briefly to the traditional format, addressing the congregational categories of elders in authority* and younger believers who are to submit to that authority. The teaching to both parties is traditional (for leaders, cf. Acts 20:28; Rom 12:8; 1 Tim 3:1-13; Tit 1:6-9; for the younger, cf. 1 Cor 16:16; 1 Thess 5:12-13; Heb 13:17); the decision to expand the household code to address behavior within the broader congregational setting is in keeping with Peter's overarching concern for the church in the world; this "household" of God must maintain the lines of authority and order that will insure its acceptability in a society looking precisely for such things.

3.2. The Apostolic Fathers. Several passages in the group of late first- and second-century Christian writings known as the apostolic fathers assume the pattern observed in the NT household and church codes. Circumstances and concerns have changed. It is more likely that a less critical endorsement of the traditional patriarchal social order (such as Schüssler Fiorenza argues for the NT household codes) has now become evident in some cases

3.2.1. 1 Clement. Clement's (see Clement of Rome) main concern as he addresses the Corinthian congregation is for unity and harmony (see esp. 1 Clem. 20; 37—38; 46—48). One threat to church stability came from a group that had apparently challenged ecclesiastical authority (1 Clem. 21.5; 44.1, 4; 47.6). The two passages fashioned as household codes suggest that Clement urged a return to traditional family values as the key to harmony. Moreover, the authority of the male head of the house, central to Roman ethical thinking among the aristocracy, corresponded to Clement's views of ecclesiastical authority in the church.

Two passages in 1 Clement take the form of household or church codes. 1 Clement 1.3 addresses teaching meant for all to the head of the family according to a hierarchical organization: submission to leaders, honor to older men (elders?), instruction to younger men; women were to cherish their husbands and live in subjection. 1 Clement 2.1 states the goal of this pattern: to live in humility* as characterized by a willingness to be in subjection (as the household ethic dictates) rather than demanding subjection (cf. Eph 5:21).

1 Clement 21.6-8 serves the theme of harmony expounded in the hymn* of 1 Clement 20. This time in the hortatory first person plural, the same basic order of instruction is followed: to honor leaders and elders (possibly church officers), to teach the younger, to guide women toward the good, to teach the children in the faith. Despite the first-person address, the absence of instructions to the husbands or fathers suggests the main addressee is the male leader of the household.

Differences between the NT household codes and those in 1 Clement are evident and probably indicate changed circumstances and outlook. Instructions concerning children emphasize teaching rather than obedience to parents, perhaps because of the concern to safeguard the faith for succeeding generations. Slaves and masters are not addressed. In addition to addressing instuctions to the male head of the house, the emphasis on the behavior of wives (in terms of obedience, purity* and silence without reference to status in marriage or in Christ; cf. Eph 5:22-33; 1 Pet 3:1-7) reveals Clement's preference for the accepted order of things in his Roman setting. The household codes outline the divine pattern for unity and stability (1 Clem. 1.3; 20.11; 21.4). But the divine pattern, as Clement interprets it for household ethics, seems completely uncritical of Roman patriarchal assumptions (see Stambaugh and Balch, Bowe, Jeffers).

3.2.2. Ignatius and Polycarp. In the writings of Ignatius* and Polycarp* main concerns include false teachers (Ign. Pol. 3.1; Ign. Eph. 6.2; Ign. Trall. 6.1; Ign. Magn. 8.1; Ign. Smyrn. 6.2; Pol. Phil. 7), and the answer to their threat comes in maintaining unity in the church and ecclesiastical (episcopal) order (Ign. Pol. 1.2; 6.1; Pol. Phil. 5.3). To aid the church in achieving this unity Ignatius in his Letter to Polycarp 4.1—5.2 introduces a church code (somewhat closer in tone and content to the NT codes than 1 Clement) that combines instructions concerning treatment of widows and slaves and reciprocal instructions to wives and husbands with instructions to Polycarp himself concerning ministry.* Although the immediate application of the code is to an internal matter, we should be aware of Ignatius's general positive attitude toward unbelievers and desire for their repentance* that underlie his instructions to live in harmony with the world (Ign. Eph. 10.1-3). Thus the pattern of life described in the household or church code might be applied to internal instability, but it is not without outward effect. Polycarp's Letter to the Philippians 4.2—6.1 instructs the church similarly, according to household groups and church-specific groups—wives, widows, deacons, young men, young women, elders—blending them much as Titus 2:1-10 does. Although he does not elaborate, the order of life Polycarp encourages is introduced as that which pleases the Lord* (Pol. Phil. 5.2; 6.1; 4.1).

3.2.3. The Didache and the Epistle of Barnabas. The *Didache is partly (Did. 1.1—6.2) a catechetical work designed to prepare new believers for baptism* (Did. 7.1) and partly a text on church order* (Did. 6.3—16.8). The much different purpose of the *Epistle of Barnabas is to demonstrate that Christians are the genuine children (see Son) of God. Didache 4.9-11 instructs parents to discipline their children, masters to treat their slaves reasonably and slaves to be subject to their masters. The reciprocity, the theme of submission and the motivation (the impartiality of God, who is over both master and slave) suggest a link with the tradition as used in Colossians and Ephesians. Probably the writer has incorporated material from the Pauline letters (the possibility that the writer had access to an earlier teaching source, which Colossians and Ephesians also knew, is explored by Munro). Barnabas 19.5, 7 uses the same material (the matter of source is unclear; there may have been a common source accessible to each writer) with slight alterations, reversing the order of instructions to slaves first, then masters. In each case the household code material has been incorporated into the collection of traditions used to explain the Two Ways teaching (of "life and death," Did. 1.1; of "light and darkness," Barn. 18.1). The household and community relationship ethics implied by these sections are not applied in any discernible way to immediate situations. The material is simply included as orthodox.

4. Conclusions.

The household codes of both the NT and the apostolic fathers reflect an awareness of the expectations of the Greco-Roman environment of the church. However, they also reveal some subtle differences in the way the church at different times and in different situations sought to interact with secular society. NT usage of the device demonstrates sensitivity to secular values and in critically adjusting certain features (emphasizing justice and fairness and providing a theological rationale) aimed to direct Christians to a constructive middle ground, avoiding either the simple return to patriarchy or emancipation. 1 Peter utilizes the household code with Christian engagement in the social life of the world in mind (cf. Tit 2—3), and it is significant that this engagement is necessitated by the church's identity and mission as aliens and foreigners who are God's elect.

In the writings of the apostolic fathers, household codes are used—without evidence of the critical reflection upon the church's responsibility in the world seen in 1 Peter—to preserve the status quo. The shape of the two codes in 1 Clement suggests a preference for patriarchy on the Roman model; Schüssler Fiorenza's interpretation may fit this later situation. The Didache and Epistle of Barnabas have employed another recension of the household code but in any case offer its teaching as traditional without reflecting on its implications. Ignatius and Polycarp are more in touch with NT household codes but are mainly preoccupied with restoring church stability and unity. For this the codes provide a structure for respectable behavior in relationships that complement the writers' understanding of ecclesiastical authority. Although Ignatius's outlook on the church in the world may be an exception, the household codes in the late first- and second-century church seem to function less to keep the church on the cutting edge of eschatological tension with contemporary society and more to preserve a status quo.

See also HOUSE, SPIRITUAL HOUSE; HOUSEHOLDS, FAMILY; SLAVE, SLAVERY; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY; WOMAN AND MAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J.-P. Audet, La Didachè: Instructions des Apôtres (EB; Paris: Gabalda, 1958); D. L. Balch, "Household Codes," ABD (1992) 3:318-20; idem, Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter (SBLMS 26; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1981); L. W. Barnard, Studies in the Apostolic Fathers and Their Background (Oxford: Blackwell, 1967); B. E. Bowe, A Church in Crisis: Ecclesiology and Paraenesis in Clement of Rome (HDR 23; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); J. E.

Crouch, The Origin and Intention of the Colossian Haustafel (FRLANT 109; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1972); M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, An die Kolosser, Epheser an Philemon (3d ed.; HNT 12; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1953); J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); L. Goppelt, A Commentary on 1 Peter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993 [1978]); idem, "Jesus und die Haustafeltradition" in Orientierung an Jesus, ed. P. Hoffmann (Freiburg: Herder, 1973) 93-105; idem, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982) vol. 2; L. Hartman, "Some Unorthodox Thoughts on the 'Household-Code Form'" in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism, ed. J. Neusner et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) 219-34; T. Herr, Naturrecht aus der kritischen Sicht des Neuen Testaments (Munich, Paderborn and Vienna: Schöningh, 1976); J. S. Jeffers, Conflict at Rome: Social Order and Hierarchy in Early Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, eds. The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings (2d ed.; ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992); H. von Lips, "Die Haustafel als 'Topos' im Rahmen der urchristlichen Paränese," NTS 40 (1994) 261-80; D. Lührmann, "Neutestamentliche Haustafeln und antike Ökonomie," NTS 27 (1980) 83-97; R. P. Martin, "Haustafeln," NIDNTT 3:928-32; W. Munro, Authority in Paul and Peter: The Identification of a Pastoral Stratum in the Pauline Corpus and 1 Peter (SNTSMS 45; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983); K. Müller, "Die Haustafel des Kolosserbriefes und das antike Frauenthema" in Die Frau in Urchristentum, ed. G. Dautzenberg, H. Merklein and K. Müller (QD 95; Freiburg, Basel and Vienna: Herder, 1983) 263-319; W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); W. Schrage, "Zur Ethik der NT Haustafeln," NTS 21 (1974) 1-22; D. Schroeder, "Die Haustafeln des neuen Testaments (ihre Herkunft und theologischer Sinn)" (unpublished dissertation; Hamburg: Mikrokopie, 1959); idem, "Lists, Ethical," IDBSup (1976) 546; E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York: Crossroad, 1984); J. E. Stambaugh and D. L. Balch, The New Testament in Its Social Environment (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); G. Strecker, "Die neutestamentlichen Haustafeln" in Neues Testament und Ethik: Festschrift für R. Schnackenburg, ed. H. Merklein (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna: Herder, 1989) 349-75; K. Thraede, "Zum historischen Hintergrund der 'Haustafeln' des NT" in Pietas, Festschrift für Bernhard Kötting, ed. E. Dassmann et al. (Munich: JAC Ergänzungsband 8, 1980) 359-68; K. Weidinger, Die Haustafeln: Ein Stück urchristlicher Paränese (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1928); A. Weiser, "Titus 2 als Gemeindeparänese" in Neues Testament und Ethik: Festschrift für R. Schnackenburg, ed. H. Merklein (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna: Herder, 1989) 397-414; K. Wengst, Tradition und Theologie des Barnabasbriefes (Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1971).

P. H. Towner

HUMILITY. See PRIDE, HUMILITY.

HYMNS, SONGS

Singing hymns as spontaneous praise to deities in public assembly, with or without musical instruments, had been a common practice in Jewish and the pagan communities long before the NT era (Norden). When Christianity, with its Jewish and pagan converts and the presence of the Holy Spirit, came into existence, singing hymns to God* or Christ for his redemptive* grace* inevitably became a part of Christian public worship (MacDonald, 112-13; see Worship). Some of the Pauline communities, for example, were musically oriented (see 1 Cor 14:15, 26). Members were often encouraged to teach and admonish one another with psalms, hymns and spiritual songs (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16). No wonder one finds that incorporating christological* hymns for a didactic or epistolary purpose is a common literary practice within the Pauline corpus (e.g., Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; 1 Tim 3:16; see DPL, Hymns). Elsewhere in the NT and in the writings of the apostolic fathers,* the allusion to hymns or songs and the incorporation of hymnic fragments, although less frequent (except in Revelation; see Revelation, Book of), also provide windows to the hymns or songs used in other Christian communities during the first two centuries of the Christian era.

1. Acts
2. Hebrews
3. James

4. 1 Peter
5. Revelation
6. Post-Apostolic Writings
7. Conclusions

1. Acts.

Allusion to hymns or singing is expressed by two Greek words in Acts:* aineō (Acts 2:47; 3:8-9) and hymneō (Acts 16:25). The former, although it generally means "to praise" or "to extol" (Schlier, 177), is employed by the Septuagint to translate hallel, which in the Bible most commonly means "to praise [God] in song" (Stanley, 173). In Acts 2:46-47 Luke uses aineō to denote communal praises expressed by the early Christian converts during their daily assembly; in Acts 3:8-9 the same word is used to denote praises expressed by an individual in response to the healing* he has just experienced. If aineō includes musical expression, then in both of these cases the praises are mostly likely hymnic in form and are said to be directed to God. The content of these praise hymns is not recorded. However, in light of the communal prayer of praise (deomai) recorded in Acts 4:24-30 (which is possibly in musical or metrical form also; see Old, 27; Smith, 22), we see a blend of fragments quoted from the OT Psalms coupled with Christian motifs (Moule, 70). Through the apostolic preaching* and teaching,* their new recognition that Jesus is the Christ (see Acts 2:36; 8:5; 9:22; 17:3; 18:5; 28), their awaited Messiah (see Lk 24:26-27), is making a powerful impact in their lives. It is thus natural that their praises to God included a combination of the OT prophecies (esp. in the Psalms) and their new faith in Christ.

Luke's repeated reference to hymnic praises early in his book to Theophilus (just as in Luke 1-2, where four Jewish Christian canticles are recorded), while possibly reflecting actual incidences, may serve an apologetic purpose as well. Those events highlight the practice of hymnic praise as a key element in early Christian worship; both in form and content this practice resembles Jewish synagogue* worship in the Diaspora* (Hengel, 90). It is Luke's intention to provide a linkage between the Jewish and Christian communities. He wanted Theophilus (as well as others in Rome) to know that Christianity, like Judaism,* should be considered a religio licita (permitted religion), not a threat to the empire (Longenecker 1981, 218; see Roman Empire). The constant allusions to hymnic praise at the outset help to reinforce this message.

In Acts 16:25 the special reference to Paul's and Silas's corporate singing to God in the Philippian prison is expressed through the word hymneō, which commonly referred to praising God in songs. Philo uses hymnos regularly to describe the OT Psalms. In Ephesians 5:19 and Colossians 3:16 hymnos is mentioned with psalmos and ōdē pneumatikē to denote musical elements used in corporate worship for mutual edification. As some have suggested, Acts 16:25 perhaps reflects the writer's knowledge of a regular custom of night service (Acts 12:5, 12; 20:7-1; see Bradshaw, 39), but it is more likely that the writer wanted again to present a positive image of Christianity to his reader(s). Note the similarities between Acts 16:25 and Acts 4:21-31; namely, the Sitz im Leben (Christians being persecuted*), the reaction (they praised God) and the consequence (the earth was shaken). The writer repeatedly uses hymnic praise to stress that Christians are not a threat to the Roman Empire even when they face oppression. Rather, they are a people of praise, whether in Palestine (represented by Peter and John in Jerusalem, Acts 4:21-31) or in Hellenistic regions (represented by Paul and Silas in Philippi, Acts 16:25). So Luke uses the allusion to hymnic praise in Acts 4:23-31 and Acts 16:25 for an apologetic purpose: to show how Christians did not offer political resistance to Rome.

2. Hebrews.

The most obvious use of hymnic material is found in Hebrews 1:3, which on the basis of syntactical and stylistic criteria has been considered to be hymnic in form (e.g., Schille, 42; Deichgräber, 137-38; Sanders, 19-20; contra Ellingworth, 98). The introductory relative pronoun hos, followed by a present participle ōn in preference to main verbs, and the switch of person from God in Hebrews 1:1-2 to Christ his Son in Hebrews 1:3 also support the notion that this is possibly a piece of a preexisting hymn quoted by the writer (cf. Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; contra Frankowski) in this context.

The theme of this hymn is distinctly christological in addition to being ontological and soteriological: Christ is God in revelation,* sustainer of the creation,* savior of humanity, and the exalted one. These four brief phrases embody the four key roles of Christ. Perhaps the hymn was originally composed as a piece of liturgical confession and is being adopted by the writer of Hebrews* to highlight his or her message of Christ's supremacy to his or her readers, who are in danger of being misled by alien teachings (Heb 13:9) and falling away from their salvation* (Heb 2:1-3). Since it is hymnic material, its message would make a greater impact upon the readers (see Nida et al. on the contributions of poetic language to a text). And if Hebrews is a sermon, as some have suggested (Lane, lxxx), then the writer's inclusion of a piece of hymnic material with relevant content at the outset of his or her message is noteworthy (Black, 193).

The writer first shows the readers that the use of hymns is essential in corporate worship, just as they are reminded that they are to offer up sacrifice of praise (aineseōs) to God; that is, the fruit of lips that acknowledge his name (Heb 13:15). The saving act of Christ ushered in new forms of worship in which singing praises to God is considered a sacrifice* in lieu of animal sacrifices (cf. the prophecy of Hos 14:2). The writer also demonstrates that the content of a hymn sets the pattern for the message of the sermon. In the case of Hebrews, Christ's supremacy is the theme, and the hymn in Hebrews 1:3 effectively prepares the readers for the message to be delivered. This brief hymnic fragment is incorporated in the sermon at the outset to serve epistolary, didactic and even polemic purposes (cf. Col 1:15-20, which has similar purposes). Although the allusion to hymnic material is found only in Hebrews 1:3 and Hebrews 13:15 (in addition to Hebrews 2:12, where Christ is likened to a hymn singer leading his people's praises), the place of hymns in the Hebraic communities and the writer's use of hymn to serve his or her purposes are clearly shown.

3. James.

The letter of James* includes only one reference to singing: "Is anyone cheerful? Let him sing praises [psalletō]" (Jas 5:13). The allusion has been taken by many as merely an exhortation to remember God at all times. But considering the use of the word psallō (which appears almost sixty times in the LXX and generally indicates to praise by means of a harp or a song sung to God [e.g., Ps 33:2, 3; 98:4-5; 147:7; 149:3]) and the context (Jas 5:13-15), in which praying* and singing are mentioned together, we may conclude that the Sitz im Leben of this verse is communal worship (Martin 1988, 206). It is probable that, just as in other Christian communities (cf. 1 Cor 14:26), the members of the Jacobean congregation used to offer songs of praise and thanksgiving during corporate worship. But continual oppression by the wealthy (see Jas 5:1-6; cf. Jas 2:6, 15-16) has possibly depressed the exuberant spirit of these worshipers. James, by the use of the imperative psalletō ("let him sing a song [to God])," reminds as well as exhorts his readers to revert to what they used to do. Music (i.e., psallō, which is significant in the light of the paucity of possible references in the early Fathers) must be rehearsed in public worship if anyone is in good spirits despite distressing circumstances. This brief allusion to singing in the letter provides us insight into the place and practice of hymnic praise in the Jacobean congregation.

J. L. Wu

4. 1 Peter.

Five passages of 1 Peter* contain its essential christological testimony: 1 Peter 1:3-12, 18-21; 2:4-8, 21-25; and 3:18-22. Each of these texts contains traditional materials, whether from oral or literary sources. Four of the five passages (the exception is 1 Pet 2:4-8, a catena of three OT texts) have been identified by style and form as containing traditional liturgical deposits and, more specifically, hymnic fragments, which have been brilliantly woven into the text of 1 Peter.

4.1. Twentieth-Century Research. The identification of liturgical (creedal* or hymnic) passages in the text of the NT was begun in the early 1900s. Seeberg (1903) made note of the use of formula-like material in 1 Peter, and Norden (1913) listed some of the literary devices indicative of liturgical deposits in this epistle: parallelismus membrorum (the poetic technique of the Psalms in which lines are arranged in couplets or triplets), a pronominal beginning, descriptive participles and relative clauses. The studies that followed were concerned with detecting such preformed deposits on the basis of refined study of lexical and stylistic evidence (such as rhyming devices in the Greek, rare terms or dramatic language), including formal introductory phrases and the contextual dislocation produced by the insertion of such material into the prose style of narrative or epistle. Over the last century, form-critical study has identified a number of types of traditional material and formal sources (beyond the OT citations) found in 1 Peter, including topoi, ethical lists, kerygmatic and creedal* statements, hymns or hymn fragments, catechetical instructions, doxologies and eulogies, household* rules, testimonia and dominical sayings (Stauffer, Shimada and Martin have provided lists of the features of traditional materials, especially hymns in the NT).

The proposal that formal liturgical or hymnic materials are embedded in the text of 1 Peter has been advocated by a majority of scholars. B. Reicke (1946), R. Bultmann, J. Jeremias and H. Windisch all identified the following passages in 1 Peter as hymnic: 1 Peter 1:3-12, 18-21; 2:21-25; 3:18-22. (See also Best, Boismard, Cullmann, Dalton, Deichgräber, Goppelt, Hengel, Lohse, Martin, Sanders and Schutter.) Bultmann's study (12-14), the most speculative, went so far as to propose an original hymn that he reconstructed from three passages: 1 Peter 1:20; 2:21-24; 3:18-22. His proposal has been justifiably dismissed by such scholars as Jeremias and Lohse for his excessive freedom in alteration of the text and his faulty hypothesis of a Gnostic* redemption myth. But the enduring value of his analysis is that it provided the springboard for the modern discussion of the author's use of source materials, especially hymnic or creedal forms, in 1 Peter.

4.2. Hymnic Passages in 1 Peter.

4.2.1. 1 Peter 1:3-12. This christological pericope, composed of a single sentence, is a tightly woven declaration based upon at least six varieties of formal materials, including hymnic material. The bᵉrākôt ("blessed be") form that opens the pericope establishes the types of sources employed in the unit (1 Pet 1:3-12) and also the intent of 1 Peter; the passage is created from the language and forms of Christian worship for Christian worship. A hymnlike quality can be observed in 1 Peter 1:3-5 and probably even in the materials through 1 Peter 1:9. The christological pattern of sufferings* and glories,* explicitly stated in 1 Peter 1:11, creates the center of this exquisite literary poem which, in its final form, is best identified as a formal, didactic ascription.

4.2.2. 1 Peter 1:18-21. This pericope is a composite of formulary materials primarily determined by the Isaiah 53 tradition and deliberately reflecting the dynamic of the sufferings/glories pattern. The descending clauses, in two couplets (parallelism) and unusual liturgical language, preserve traces of the hymnic nature of the traditional sources.

4.2.3. 1 Peter 2:21-25. This passage stands out from its context by a different linguistic usage, terminology and style. Derived from Isaiah 53, this hymnic piece is based primarily on the feature of parallelism. The features that indicate the independence of this unit also give the unit the character of a traditional deposit (a preformed unit) and, more particularly, a hymn. The pericope includes the ethical* example of Christ as the archetypal righteous sufferer and the dominant theme of Christ's suffering as atonement.

4.2.4. 1 Peter 3:18-22. The fullest statement of the christology of the epistle lies in 1 Peter 3:18-22, five short verses that have been the focus of numerous articles and books. The passage is a self-contained unit of one sentence that fits into the context with coherence but is not defined by the context. 1 Peter 3:18-22 opens with a primitive creedal statement, moves into a hymn fragment that frames 1 Peter 3:18c-22 and expands in a sort of midrash (1 Pet 3:20-21) developed on Enoch/Noah traditions. The passage's theme of salvation and judgment* includes strong eschatological* overtones.

Whereas the pericope of 1 Peter 2:21-25 emphasized the obedience* of the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53, the pericope at 1 Peter 3:18-22 moves immediately from the suffering of Christ to his vindication, exaltation* and triumphant rulership in the present, which assures the future. The progression of thought in 1 Peter 3:18-22 is produced by a long series of qualifying statements or dependent clauses, each one specifying the preceding statement. Then, 1 Peter 3:22 returns to the resurrection* inference of 1 Peter 3:18 in a resolution in which Christ has become the "Cosmocrat" and "judge of all history" (Martin 1978, 267).

Clear signs that creedal and hymnic material are present in 1 Peter 3:18, 22 include the preference for participles, the intentional antithesis with parallel clauses, the men/de construction and the assonance created by anaphora and epiphora. Also, the rhyming participles of 1 Peter 3:18b are both hapax legomena in the epistle. The features of antithetical parallelism are clearly related to the well-established hymn in 1 Timothy 3:16. The elevated language and content, which recall the basic facts of Heilsgeschichte, is a further indication of a poetic and hymnic character.

4.3. Suffering and Glory. The hymnic material of 1 Peter introduces the primary focus on the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ (see Death of Christ), which is presented as constituting a unity that reveals God's plan. The unity of death/resurrection is presented throughout 1 Peter in the scheme of "sufferings" and "glories" (1 Pet 1:11). Isaiah 53, referred to explicitly in 1 Peter 2:21-25, is the controlling source behind this scheme. Appearing sixteen times as a pattern in 1 Peter, this scheme declares that in God's plan righteous suffering is followed by vindication and exaltation, or "glories." The scheme, introduced in 1 Peter 1:10-12, is understood by the author(s) of 1 Peter to be the core of the prophets'* message and is the definitive statement of the hermeneutical* method of the document. The sufferings/glories pattern is derived from the humiliation/vindication theme of the Servant Songs of deutero-Isaiah (especially Is 53) and a closely related contrast of "rejected"/"chosen" (Ps 118 as quoted in 1 Pet 2:4-8). Preserved in the lyrical style and hymnic form of the traditional materials, the scheme has been used to address the dilemma of the righteous sufferer. In 1 Peter, Christ himself is presented as the model of righteous suffering and as the forerunner and archetype of one who has been "lifted up" (1 Pet 5:6) in vindication and exaltation.

The christology of the five major pericopae of 1 Peter, 1:3-12, 18-21; 2:4-8, 21-25; and 3:18-22, all of a poetic character, forms the conceptual unity of the document. It provides the foundation for the central motif of 1 Peter—righteous suffering and resulting glory. This christology controls the soteriological assurances and both reveals and responds to the sociological realities of the recipient community. These pericopae function as the rationale, the assurance, the requirement of the community of faith and as a theodicy that both assures vindication and justifies God's action or inaction. The genius of 1 Peter is expressed in a compositional strategy that directs extensive redaction of the christological and other formal materials. The hallmark of the composition of 1 Peter is the careful weaving of many types of source materials into a tapestry of reassurance that is developed through the use of eschatological perspectives along the lines of promise/fulfillment themes (now/then topoi and the pattern of sufferings/glories). S. C. Pearson

5. Revelation.

The book of Revelation is richly embedded with liturgical elements (e.g., the Ter Sanctus, "Amen," "Hallelujah," doxology and benedictions; see Liturgical Elements) and hymnic materials (e.g., Rev 4:8, 9-11; 5:9-10, 12-14; 7:9-12; 11:15-18; 14:3; 15:3-4; 19:1-4, 6-8). These hymns are mainly praises directed to God (e.g., Rev 4:8, 11; 7:11-12; 11:15-17; 15:3-4; 19:1-4, 6-8) or to Christ (e.g., Rev 5:9-10; 14:3). Most of these hymns are placed in heavenly worship scenes (see Rev 4, 5, 7, 11, 15, 19); nevertheless, they are probably derived from songs sung in early Christian worship (Smith 25-27). In particular, hymns that make constant allusion to OT motifs such as the Ter Sanctus ("three times holy") in Revelation 4:8 (cf. Is 6:3); the Song of Moses in Revelation 15:3-4 (cf. Ex 15:1-18); and the Hallelujah chorus in Revelation 19:6 (cf. the enthronement, Ps 96-99) are probably of Jewish Christian origin and betray the influence of the synagogue on Greek-speaking believers in the Diaspora (MacDonald, 112).

It must be noted that the writer's constant reference to hymns is not done arbitrarily. R. Deichgräber (45) observes that these hymns are evenly scattered in each of the vision* sections, so that each section has at least one hymn. He suggests, therefore, that hymns are used as a connecting thread to link the visions with one another. It is a literary style peculiar to the writer. But beyond the literary aspect, we should note that all these hymns are by nature songs of praises directed to God (as the Creator, Rev 4:11; the almighty Lord* who judges the world, Rev 11:17-18; the holy and righteous God, Rev 15:3-4; and the victorious King, Rev 19:1-6) and to Christ (as the Lamb* who was slain for the ransom of all nations, Rev 5:9-14; cf. Rev 14:3).

In view of the readers' predicament under imperial persecution, the writer's inclusion of these praise hymns into his vision narratives serves not only to present an exalted view of God and Christ in Christian worship but more specifically to provide a coherent message of comfort to the readers. God, who is the Creator of the universe, is still in sovereign control despite the hardships they are experiencing. He will triumph and execute judgment on evil powers. Christ, who is their Redeemer, has already made them a kingdom to God and will reign on earth eventually (Rev 5:10; see Thompson, 49-50; Carnegie, 254-56). The hymns in Revelation are skillfully interwoven into various visions to present messages of hope* and comfort to the readers according to their specific needs at that time. And poetic language usually contributes to a text a more effective impact to the readers (see Nida et al.). In the case of Revelation, the writer's use of hymnic materials, placed in a heavenly worship setting, uttered by large multitudes (namely the four living creatures, the twenty-four elders, the followers of the Lamb and/or a host of angelic beings), has indeed helped to convey his message more dynamically and to accomplish his goal even more effectively.

6. Post-Apostolic Writings.

6.1. Odes of Solomon. At least one Christian "hymnody" was composed in the post-apostolic era under consideration: the Odes of Solomon, dated in the mid or late second century. This work, generally acknowledged to be a product of a Syriac poet, contains songs of praise directed toward God and Christ with a sentimental tone. The wide variations in length and requirement for soloists or antiphonal choirs suggest that the Odes of Solomon may have served various functions, as anthem book, hymnal, psalter and even oratorio (Adey, 29). The author describes Christian worship as the sacrifice of praise offered by the righteous (Odes 8.1-2) and often speaks of the fruits presented to the Lord, which is the sacrifice of praise (echoing Heb 13:15). A close examination of the entire document reveals its incomplete (if sometimes faulty) presentations of christology and other doctrinal beliefs (e.g., the silence about sin and judgment; hence Odes is sometimes regarded as having a gnostic flavor). Yet its value of providing later Christians a window into the place of hymns and their thematic emphasis in early Christian communities is not to be overlooked (Old 1992, 68-75). According to the writer, songs of praise, when expressed with love, are essential in Christian worship:

My art and my service are in his hymns,
Because his love has nourished my heart,
And his fruits he poured unto my lips.
For my love is the Lord;
Hence I will sing unto him.
For I am strengthened by his praises,
And I have faith in him.
I will open my mouth,
And his spirit will speak through me
The glory of the Lord and his beauty. (Odes 16.2-5)

6.2. Ignatius. The earliest Father to mention hymns or songs in his writings is Ignatius,* the bishop of Antioch. On his journey to Rome before his martyrdom* (for dates, see Ignatius of Antioch), his letters to the Ephesians and Romans include several direct allusions to hymns of praise. In Ephesians 4 Ignatius exhorts the readers to live in unity so that Jesus Christ is sung and that they may sing to God the Father through Jesus Christ with one voice (see Worship). Here Ignatius stresses the importance of Christian unity. Hymnic praises to God or to Christ are meaningful only when they are sung by Christians who are united in heart and in voice. In Ephesians 13 the importance of hymnic praise in corporate worship is also made plain: "Take heed, then, often to come together to give thanks to God, and show forth his praise." In his letter to the Romans (Ign. Rom. 2) Ignatius beseeches his readers to sing praise to God upon his martyrdom, for he sees his death as the will of God and thus God is to be praised at its fulfillment. Ignatius's words to these churches reflect the place and functions of hymns in the Antiochean community under his supervision.

A more lengthy piece of Christ-hymn has also been attested in Ignatius, Ephesians 19, due to its elevated and poetic literary style, generally known as the "Song of the Star" (Martin 1997, 11). As a preface to the song three mysteries are being mentioned: the virginity of Mary;* her giving birth; and the death of the Lord. The song commences with the appearance of a star, which is depicted as above all stars and having the power to destroy the reign of all wicked astral powers. Ignatius's inclusion of this hymnic fragment in his letter is to be expected in the light of the popular worship of Fate and astral powers in the pagan world and the danger of false teachers intruding into the Ephesian community at that time (Ign. Eph. 16, 17). The necessity of reminding the readers about the essence of Christian faith* is urgent. Christ the incarnate one, as the supreme Star, is triumphant over all wicked astral powers that have kept many under bondage. This message, expressed in hymnic language, serves a polemic function in its context, just as in 1 Peter the hymns function also pastorally to refute the idea that alien powers are still triumphant.

6.3. Pliny. At about the same time as Ignatius, Pliny, the governor of Pontus and Bithynia, reports that some former Christians who have abandoned their faith are now worshiping the emperor's statue (see Emperor) and testifies to several key features of early Christian worship: on a fixed day they met before dawn to sing a hymn antiphonally to Christ as to a god (carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem; Pliny Ep. 10.96). Although there is no mention of the content of the hymn, it is most likely a hymn of praise or thanksgiving, since it is directed to Christ on the day when his resurrection is commemorated (i.e., Sunday; cf. Justin Martyr Apol. I 67). And since it is mentioned before other matters (the making of an oath, the pledges and the meal), it indicates that Christians customarily begin their worship with hymns of praise sung antiphonally (i.e., in turn) by the congregation. Thus we see the prominent order of hymn singing in corporate worship (1 Cor 14:26) and the way they are sung (Eph 5:19) developed into the second century.

7. Conclusions.

The preceding survey provides a composite picture of the place, content and functions of hymns used in early Christian worship at different regions outside the Pauline communities. Hymn singing is an important element in Christian worship, being a spiritualized form of sacrifice replacing animal sacrifices of temple service (1 Pet 2:1-10; Heb 13:15). It is the opening element in a worship service (1 Pet 1:3-8; Pliny Ep. 10:96), and its ongoing practice is often encouraged and promoted whenever singing is neglected (Jas 5:13). The content of these hymns is mainly descriptive praise (in Westermann's term) directed toward God or Christ and blended with motifs derived from the OT (see Heb 1:3; Acts 4:24-26; Rev 4:8; 15:3-4; 19:6; later possible gnostic sources, Odes of Solomon). Devotional or self-reflecting hymns are not detected. Finally, hymns are commonly used or referred to by writers as an effective literary means to convey their messages to their readers whether for epistolary (Heb 1:3), exhortatory (Jas 5:13; Rev 4:11; 5:9-11, Ign. Eph. 4, 13) or polemic purposes (Acts 4:24-26; 16:25; 1 Pet 3:18-22; Ign. Eph. 19). J. L. Wu

See also LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; 1 PETER; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Adey, Hymns and the Christian "Myth" (Vancouver: University of British Columbia, 1986); D. E. Aune, "Excursus: Hymns in Revelation" in Revelation (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1997) 1:313-16; J. L. Bailey and L. D. Vander Broek, Literary Forms in the New Testament (Louisville: John Knox/Westminster, 1992); F. W. Beare, The First Epistle of Peter (Oxford: Blackwell, 1958); E. Best, 1 Peter (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971); D. A. Black, "Heb. 1:1-4: a Study in Discourse Analysis," WTJ 49 (1987) 175-94; M.-E. Boismard, Quatre Hymnes Baptismales dans la Première Epître de Pierre (Paris: Cerf, 1961); P. Bradshaw, Early Christian Worship: A Basic Introduction to Ideas and Practice (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); idem, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); R. Bultmann, "Bekenntnis- und Liedfragmente im 1 Petrusbrief," ConNT 11 (1947) 1-14; D. R. Carnegie, "Worthy Is the Lamb: The Hymns in Revelation" in Christ the Lord: Studies in Christology, ed. H. H. Rowdon (Leicester: Inter-Varsity, 1982) 243-56; D. A. Carson, ed., Worship: Adoration and Action (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993); O. Cullmann, Earliest Christian Confessions (London: Lutterworth, 1949); W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits: A Study of 1 Peter 3:18-4:6 (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1965, 1989); R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus in der frühen Christenheit (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967); G. Delling, "ὕμνος κτλ," TDNT 8:489-503; idem, Worship in the New Testament (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1962); P. Ellingworth, Commentary on Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); J. Frankowski, "Early Christian Hymns Recorded in the New Testament: A Reconsideration of the Question in the Light of Heb. 1:3," BZ 27 (1983) 183-94; W. H. Gloer, "Homologies and Hymns in the New Testament: Form, Content and Criteria for Identification," PRS 11 (1984) 115-32; L. Goppelt, "Der erste Petrusbrief," Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neuen Testament (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1987); D. Guthrie, "Aspects of Worship in the Book of Revelation" in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (Sheffield: JSOT, 1992) 70-83; M. Hengel, "Hymns and Christology" in Between Jesus and Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 78-96; J. Jeremias, "Zwischen Karfreitag und Osten," ZNW 42 (1949) 194-201; R. Karris, A Symphony of New Testament Hymns (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1996); J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1969); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (WBC; 2 vols.; Dallas: Word, 1991); R. N. Longenecker, The Acts of the Apostles (EBC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1981); E. Lohse, "Parenesis and Kerygma in 1 Peter" in Perspectives on 1 Peter, ed. C. Talbert (NABPRSS 9; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1986) 37-59; R. P. Martin, A Hymn of Christ (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997) idem, "Hymns in the New Testament: An Evolving Pattern of Worship Responses," Ex Auditu 8 (1992) 33-34; idem, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); idem, New Testament Foundations: A Guide for Christian Students (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) vol. 2; idem, "New Testament Hymns: Background and Development," ExpT 94 (1983) 132-36; idem, "Some Reflections on New Testament Hymns" in Christ the Lord: Studies Presented to Donald Guthrie, ed. H. H. Rowdon (Leicester: Inter-Varsity, 1982) 37-49; J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); P. S. Minear, "Singing and Suffering in Philippi" in The Conversation Continues, ed. R. Fortna and B. Gaventa (Nashville: Abingdon, 1990) 202-19; C. F. D. Moule, "The Influence of Liturgy on the Selection and Use of Christological Terms," JTS 10 (1959); C. M. Mountain, "The New Testament Christ-Hymn," The Hymn 44 (1993); idem, "The New Testament Epiphany-Hymn," The Hymn 45 (1994); L. Mowry, "Revelation 4-5 and Early Christian Liturgical Usage," JBL 71 (1952) 75-84; T. Mullins, "Ascription as a Literary Form," NTS 19 (1972-73) 194-205; E. Nida et al., Style and Discourse (New York: United Bible Societies, 1983); E. Norden, Agnostos Theos: Untersuchungen zur Formengeschichte religiöser Rede (Leipzig: Teubner, 1913); H. O. Old, "The Psalms of Praise in the Worship of the New Testament Church," Int 39 (1985) 20-33; idem, Themes and Variations for a Christian Doxology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); J. J. O'Rouke, "The Hymns of the Apocalypse," CBQ 30 (1968) 406-9; B. Reicke, The Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism; A Study of 1 Peter 3:19 and Its Context (Copenhagen: Munksgaard, 1946); idem, The Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964); E. Richard, "The Functional Christology of 1 Peter" in Perspectives on 1 Peter, ed. C. Talbert (NABPRSS 9; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1986) 121-39; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns (SNTSMS 15; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1971); G. Schille, Frühchristliche Hymnen (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1965); idem, "αἰνέω," TDNT 1:177; W. L. Schutter, Hermeneutic and Composition in 1 Peter (WUNT 2d series 30; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989); A. Seeberg, Der Katechismus der Urchristenheit (Leipzig: A. Deichert'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung Nachf. (Georg Bohme), 1903); E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); K. Shimada, "The Formulary Material in First Peter: A Study According to the Method of Traditionsgeschichte" (Ann Arbor, MI: Xerox University Microfilms, 1966); W. S. Smith, Musical Aspects of the New Testament (Amsterdam: Kok, 1962); D. M. Stanley, "Carmenque Christo Quasi Deo Dicere . . . ," CBQ 20 (1958) 173-91; G. Stanton, "Aspects of Early Christian and Jewish Worship: Pliny and the kerygma Pertrou" in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992) 84-98; E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology (New York: Macmillan, 1955); M. M. Thompson, "Worship in the Book of Revelation," Ex Auditu 8 (1992) 45-54; U. Vanni, "Liturgical Dialogue as a Literary Form in the Book of Revelation," NTS 37 (1991) 348-72; H. Windisch, Die katholischen Briefe (HNT; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1951); K. Wengst, Christologische Formeln und Lieder des Urchristentums (Gütersloh: J. C. B. Mohr, 1972).

J. L. Wu and S. C. Pearson

I

IDOLATRY

Idolatry is the offering of sacrifice* to some deity other than the Creator, usually with a view to gaining temporal benefits (fertility, rain, health, good luck); by extension, a person dominated by anything in the created realm might be guilty of idolatry. Images of the god had little role in Greco-Roman cultic procedures, which used just an altar, but were defining symbols of the precinct.

1. Greco-Roman Images
2. The Jewish/Christian Outlook
3. Eating Eidōlothyta ("Things Sacrificed to Idols")
4. Gnosticism
5. Cult of the Emperor

1. Greco-Roman Images.

Gods were pervasive in Greco-Roman society. Birth, marriage, death, sickness and health, sowing and reaping, travel and business ventures, the customs of the home and the ideology of the empire (see Emperor; Roman Empire)—no aspect of life was without its divine charm secured by ritual. Scarcely a classical text lacks data for the historian of religion. One need only skim Pausanias's Description of Greece to get an impression of the plethora of visual reminders of the divine that greeted a tourist of the second century A.D. Industries in some places depended on trade in statuary (Acts 19:24-41), and temples suffered pillaging (Philo Prou 2.33-34; Rom 2:22). To escape the reach of images "you would have to exit the world" (1 Cor 5:10).

Local priests,* who opened a shrine in the morning and locked it at night, kept the statue within brightly painted and washed, rubbed it with oil, dressed its hair, decorated it with robes and garlands and carried it in parades once or twice a year. Suppliants who visited the shrine would gaze on the figure in admiration or pray* before it. Although it is hard to generalize across the multifarious cults of antiquity (see Religions), usually worshipers thought a deity existed on high, apart from its images in several cities, but was responsive to what people were doing with the images. Thus a statue was a concrete means of contact between the human and the divine. Devotees would call a god's statue an agalma (ornament) or a theos (god).

2. The Jewish/Christian Outlook.

The word eidōlon ("idol"), preferred by Jews and Christians, had the somewhat demeaning connotation "copy" or perhaps even "phantasm." To say "There is no idol [anywhere] in the world" (1 Cor 8:4) was to deny that images had any actual effect on the imagined realm of gods.

Early Christianity inherited its stance toward idols from Judaism.* The Second Commandment prohibited making a likeness and worshiping it (Ex 20:4-5). When the tempter (see Satan) urged Jesus to do obeisance, Jesus refused with indignation (Mt 4:10; cf. Lk 4:8). For a Christian to embrace idols is impossible: "don't be idolaters," "flee idolatry!" (1 Cor 10:7, 14; cf. 1 Jn 5:21; Did. 3.4). The Christian Eucharist and the feasts of the gods, God's temple* and idols, have nothing in common (1 Cor 10:21; 2 Cor 6:16). Idolatry brings excommunication (1 Cor 5:11); indeed it excludes one from God's kingdom* (1 Cor 6:9-10; 8:11; Gal 5:20-21; Rev 21:8; 22:15; Did. 5.1; Barn. 20.1).

Besides being unworthy of the one, spiritual Creator,* features of Greco-Roman idolatry that Jews and Christians found repulsive were the drinking bouts and sexual immorality in certain cults (see Purity). Notorious were the rites of Dionysus, the wine god whose cultic revelries used phallic symbols, and the Egyptian deities Isis, Osiris and Serapis, whose temples had a sordid reputation (Josephus Ant. 18.3.4 §§65-80; Ovid Art of Love 1.77-78; Juvenal Sat. 6.487-89, 526-41; 9.22-26). Literary, artistic and archeological remains attest the nexus at various times or places of idolatry and orgy. This explains the dictum of Rabbi Judah ("The Israelites knew that there was no reality to the idol and they only worshiped it in order to permit themselves public fornication"; b. Sanh. 63b), as well as collocations of the two things in NT texts (Rom 1:20-25; 1 Cor 5:11; 6:9; Gal 5:19-21; Eph 5:5; Col 3:5; 1 Pet 4:3).

A keynote of the Christian mission* to pagans was a call to turn "to God from idols" (1 Thess 1:9; cf. Acts 14:11-18; 17:16-31). Christians' rhetoric may have included ridicule: the gods have no divine nature (Gal 4:8-9); unlike God,* idols are or dwell in temples "made with hands" (Acts 7:41, 48; 17:24; 19:26); idols are useless (Acts 14:15), speechless (1 Cor 12:2) senseless and deaf (Diogn. 3.3) and nothing short of dead (implied by 1 Thess 1:9; Did. 6.3).

3. Eating Eidōlothyta ("Things Sacrificed to Idols").

3.1. Paul. Paul's Corinthian correspondence sets the scene for the issue of sacrificial food in the early church.* Some at Corinth in the early 50s refused to eat meat from animals, portions of which had been offered to pagan gods (1 Cor 8:7, 10-12). Others felt at liberty (see Freedom), by virtue of the impotence of idols, to party with unconverted friends in temples (1 Cor 8:10), where all would be served such meat (1 Cor 8:1, 4). Archaeology has uncovered dining rooms in or adjacent to sacred precincts that might be hired by adherents for private entertainment—only mansions could accommodate more than about nine persons at table. The church at Corinth wrote Paul for guidance (1 Cor 8:1; cf. 7:1).

His answer was threefold. (1) Love requires us voluntarily to suspend freedom at times, lest an imperfectly educated Christian be drawn to sin against conscience (1 Cor 8:1-3, 9-13; 9; 10:28-29a, 32-33). (2) Yet those with robust consciences have a valid point: idols do not spoil God's good gifts, which may be enjoyed without scruple, subject to the exception above (1 Cor 8:4-6, 8; 10:19, 23, 25-27, 29b-30). (3) Participation in an idolatrous festival, however, the purpose of which is to honor a pagan deity—by laying its statue on a couch at table, for example—is incompatible with the Christian Eucharist. There is this much reality to idols: they are tools of demons (1 Cor 10:1-22; cf. Rev 9:20).

3.2. Other Christian Leaders. Paul's answer is more nuanced than either the earlier decree of the Jerusalem council or John's later prophecy, both of which had other contexts. The apostolic letter (A.D. 49) was addressed to churches where Jews and Gentiles* formed mixed congregations (esp. Antioch*). It required Gentiles in such churches to avoid sacrificial meat altogether, so as not to offend Jewish-Christian sensitivities (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; see Jewish Christianity). Although Paul participated in the consultation (Acts 15:2, 12) and helped publicize its judgment* (Acts 16:4), he breathes not a word of it in 1 Corinthians, presumably because the abstainers at Corinth are former idolaters and not Jews, so other principles govern ethics.

According to John, those who eat what has been offered to idols face judgment (Rev 2:14, 20). This presupposes the sort of situation 1 Corinthians 10:1-22 warns against. About A.D. 95, Nicolaitans at Pergamum and Thyatira (maybe other places in western Asia Minor too) were openly practicing orgiastic rites. Blanket prohibition of eating meat offered to idols became characteristic of the catholic church in the second century (Did. 6.3; Justin Dial. Tryph. 34, 35; Irenaeus Haer. 1.6.3; 24.5; 28.2).

4. Gnosticism.

Gnostic* syncretism harbored idolatrous elements. According to one tradition the Samaritan Simon Magus, who claimed divinity (Acts 8:9-11), was honored by a statue in the river Tiber at Rome during the reign of Claudius (Justin Martyr Apol. I 26). Simon's followers down to the early fourth century allegedly prostrated themselves before images of him and of his consort, Helen, and worshiped them with incense, sacrifices and libations (Irenaeus Haer. 1.23.4; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.13.6), and at least one other gnostic sect behaved similarly (Irenaeus Haer. 1.25.6), if patristic testimony may be trusted. A Jewish-Christian-pagan theosophy at Colossae seems to have served angels* (Col 2:18). If the schismatics who left the community that later read 1 John shared such practices, it would give point to the elder's parting shot: "Keep yourselves from idols" (1 Jn 5:21).

5. Cult of the Emperor.

One apocalyptic* expectation looked for anti-christ* to set himself up as an object of worship* (2 Thess 2:4; Rev 13:4, 8, 12, 15; 14:9, 11; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4). John saw this partially fulfilled in the imperial cult (see Emperor), as enforced in proconsular Asia in the last decade of the first century, with its priests, counterfeit miracles, ventriloquistic use of statues and economic or capital punishment of Christians who would not offer incense or decorate their doors for civic processions (Rev 13:11-17).

See also EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT; FOOD, FOOD LAWS, TABLE FELLOWSHIP; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. N. Bookidis, "The Sanctuary of Demeter and Kore in Corinth: Excavations 1970-72," AJA 77 (1973) 206-7; J. C. Brunt, "Rejected, Ignored, or Misunderstood? The Fate of Paul's Approach to the Problem of Food Offered to Idols in Early Christianity," NTS 31 (1985) 113-24; W. Burkert, Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical (Oxford: Blackwell, 1985); K. Donfried, "The Cults of Thessalonica and the Thessalonian Correspondence," NTS 31 (1985) 336-41; D. W. J. Gill, "Behind the Classical Facade: Local Religions of the Roman Empire" in One God, One Lord in a World of Religious Pluralism, ed. A. E. Clark and B. W. Winter (Cambridge: Tyndale House, 1991) 72-87; H.-J. Klauck, Herrenmahl und hellenistischer Kult: eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum ersten Korintherbrief (NTAbh n.s. 15; Münster: Aschendorff, 1982); R. MacMullen, Paganism in the Roman Empire (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981); S. R. F. Price, Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); S. J. Scherer, "Signs and Wonders in the Imperial Cult: New Look at a Roman Religious Institution in the Light of Rev 13:13-15," JBL 103 (1984) 599-610; E. E. Urbach, "The Rabbinical Laws of Idolatry in the Second and Third Centuries in the Light of Archaeological and Historical Facts," IEJ 9 (1959) 149-65, 229-45; W. L. Willis, Idol Meat in Corinth: The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10 (SBLDS 68; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985). P. A. Rainbow

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH

Ignatius, bishop of Antioch in Syria, was sent early in the second century as a prisoner to Rome* to be thrown to wild animals in the arena. While en route he wrote seven letters which offer a glimpse of post-apostolic Christianity in Asia Minor and are virtually the only source of information about their remarkable author.

1. Authenticity
2. Date
3. Form and Style
4. Sources and Cultural Context
5. Setting and Occasion
6. Central Concerns

1. Authenticity.

The letters exist in three basic forms. The "long" recension is an expanded fourth-century version of the seven original letters to which six spurious letters have been added (some of these came to be associated with the "middle" recension as well); the "short" is a Syriac abridgment of the letters to the Ephesians, Romans and Polycarp; the "middle" (known to Eusebius) preserves the original form of the letters.

During the Renaissance and Reformation periods both the "long" and "middle" recensions became known in both Greek and Latin, although it was not until 1646 that the Greek text of the "middle" recension was published. This multiplexity of forms, together with the admixture of varying numbers of later spurious letters, created considerable confusion and debate about the authenticity of the letters. Progress in resolving the question was not helped by the fact that the discussion came to be heavily influenced by dogmatic concerns (generally Catholic vs. Protestant) extraneous to the issue.

A consensus favoring the "middle" recension eventually prevailed following the publication of Pearson's Vindiciae Ignatianae (1672), but the publication of the "short" recension in 1845 re-opened the question. Not until the independent work of T. Zahn (1873) and J. B. Lightfoot (1885) was general recognition of the authenticity of the seven letters comprising the "middle" recension attained, a situation which recent challenges (Joly; also Weijenborg, Rius-Camps) have not altered (Schoedel 1980, 1993, 345-46; Munier, 379-80).

2. Date.

There has long been a virtually unanimous consensus that Ignatius was martyred during the time of Trajan (A.D. 98-117). The Eusebian date of c. 107-8 is accepted by some, while many place it somewhere in the second half of Trajan's reign, c. 110-17. Attempts to fix the year more precisely have not been persuasive; if anything, the tendency is to enlarge the possible time frame in the direction of Hadrian's reign (A.D. 117-38; Schoedel 1993, 347-48; Munier, 380). The original collection of the letters was apparently compiled by Polycarp not long after Ignatius's death (cf. Pol. Phil. 13.2).

3. Form and Style.

Drawing on both Pauline and secular models of letters,* Ignatius utilizes them in distinctive ways (e.g., thanksgiving statements are notably absent), especially with respect to the greetings at the beginning and end and internal transitional devices (Schoedel 1985, 7). His dense, colorful (perhaps even florid) style reflects a popular type of rhetoric* known as "Asianism."

4. Sources and Cultural Context.

4.1. Old Testament. Ignatius makes little use of the OT, citing it only three times (Ign. Eph. 5.3; Ign. Magn. 12; Ign. Trall. 8.2). Allusions are no more numerous (cf. Ign. Eph. 15.1; Ign. Magn. 10.3; 13.1).

4.2. Early Christian Traditions and Literature. Ignatius is deeply indebted to early Christian tradition, which has pervasively shaped his vocabulary and thought. His heavy use of Pauline tradition (the way Paul responded to rejection likely offered a model for Ignatius) was shaped both by a more "mystical" tradition (represented also in the Gospel of John) and by a concern for order and discipline* (cf. Matthew).

Knowledge of only a limited range of written documents can be demonstrated conclusively. He probably worked with the Gospel of Matthew (e.g., Ign. Smyrn. 1.1; so Massaux, Köhler, contra Koester [all in Massaux, 118-21]); there is no evidence of Mark, and minimal (and not conclusive) evidence of Luke (Ign. Smyrn. 3.2). Use of John (cf. Ign. Rom. 7.2-3, Ign. Phld. 7.1) is unlikely (Paulsen 1978, 36-37). He has read 1 Corinthians and probably Ephesians. There are numerous echoes of other Pauline documents (his collection may have included 1 Corinthians, Ephesians, Romans, Galatians, Philippians, Colossians and 1 Thessalonians), but it is difficult to determine whether they reflect the use of traditional elements or literary dependence. The parallel between 1 John and Letter to the Ephesians 14.2 is notable, as are parallels between Ignatius and 1 Clement, 2 Clement, and the Shepherd of Hermas. But the parallels are insufficient to demonstrate knowledge of written documents. In short, Ignatius may have known a wide range of early Christian literature, but the use of only a few can be demonstrated with any certainty.

4.3. Hellenistic Culture. The character of Ignatius's debt to Hellenistic culture is much debated. Gnostic* affinities have been alleged on the basis of mythological elements in such passages as Ignatius's Letter to the Ephesians 19 (Schlier; see Worship) or the themes of "oneness" and "silence" (Bartsch; cf. Paulsen 1978). But recent investigations have indicated that these elements are also found in the wider popular culture (Schoedel 1985, 15-17). Taken together with observations about the form and style of his letters (see 3 above), this suggests that Ignatius mirrors more the popular culture of his day than esoteric or gnostic influences.

5. Setting and Occasion.

The letters were written in extraordinarily stressful and difficult circumstances. After his arrest (it is not known why and in what circumstances he was arrested) in Syria,* which left the church in Antioch* leaderless and vulnerable, Ignatius was sent to Rome in the custody of ten soldiers (the "leopards" of Ign. Rom. 5.1) to be executed. As he traveled, he met with Christians in communities along the way, including Philadelphia. At Smyrna he was enthusiastically received by Polycarp, the local bishop, as well as delegations from Tralles, Magnesia and Ephesus (who had been informed in advance of Ignatius's route). Ignatius responded to this show of support (perhaps deliberately orchestrated; Schoedel 1985, 12) by sending a letter to each of the three churches, and he also sent one ahead to the church in Rome, alerting them to his impending arrival there and attempting to forestall any interference with his plans. At Troas, Ignatius's received the news that "peace" had been restored to the church at Antioch (cf. Ign. Phld. 10.1; Ign. Smyrn. 11.2; Ign. Pol. 7.1), about which he apparently had been quite worried, and he sent letters back to the two churches he had visited, Philadelphia and Smyrna, and to Polycarp. At Philippi, where he was warmly welcomed by the church (cf. Pol. Phil. 1.1), he disappeared from view; presumably he was taken on to Rome and thrown to the lions in the Coliseum. While it is not absolutely certain that he died a martyr's death (later accounts of his martyrdom* being historically worthless), there is no reason to think otherwise.

6. Central Concerns.

It appears that three concerns were uppermost in Ignatius's mind at this time: the struggle against false teachers within the churches, the unity and organization of the churches and his impending death.

6.1. False Teachers. To Ignatius, the false teachers within posed a greater threat than the pagan society without (see Adversaries). "Heresy" (cf. Ign. Eph. 6.2; Ign. Trall. 6.1), whether that of the "Judaizers" (see Jewish Christianity), whose teaching tended to diminish the importance and centrality of Christ,* or of the "Docetists,"* who tended to deny the reality of Jesus' humanity, threatened to split the church and thereby destroy the God-given unity which for Ignatius was one of the distinguishing marks of the true faith.* In response Ignatius strongly affirmed the divinity of Jesus and the reality of Christ's incarnation, suffering* and resurrection,* to such an extent that he grounded the meaning and reality of his own circumstances on the reality of what Jesus experienced (Ign. Trall. 10; Ign. Smyrn. 4.2).

6.2. Unity and Organization. In opposing the false teachers Ignatius also stressed the importance of the bishop in preserving the unity of the church (see Church Order; Early Catholicism). He does this on two levels. First, while Ignatius's ideal church may have a threefold ministry* that includes deacons and presbyters, it is the bishop who is most critical: where the bishop is, the church is, and no activity or service that takes place without either the bishop's presence or permission has any validity (Ign. Smyrn. 8.1-2; Ign. Magn. 7; Ign. Trall. 3.1). Thus those schismatics who gather separately cut themselves off from the true church (Ign. Eph. 5.3; Ign. Smyrn. 6.2). Second, the central role of the bishop organizationally has a theological rationale (in contrast to his near-contemporary Clement of Rome, who works with a concept of apostolic succession; see Worship): the bishop is in some sense God's representative to the congregation, and just as Christians are united with God spiritually in heaven, so it is their duty to be in communion or harmony with their bishop on earth (Ign. Eph. 6.1; Ign. Magn. 3; Ign. Trall. 2.2, 3.1; Ign. Phld. 2.1; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1). Conversely, one's attitude toward the bishop reflects one's attitude toward God, and thus one's behavior relative to the bishop becomes critically important.

The sociological implications of these first two concerns (community protection through definition of belief and legitimation of authority*) have been highlighted by Maier.

6.3. Impending Death and View of Martyrdom. Ignatius anticipates his impending death with a vivid, almost macabre, eagerness (Ign. Rom. 4.2; 5.3; 7.2). At least three elements shaped his complex attitude toward martyrdom* and contributed to the zeal with which he pursued it.

One factor is his sincere desire to imitate the suffering of Jesus and thereby become a true disciple; indeed, he goes so far as to claim that only since his arrest is he "beginning" to be a disciple (Ign. Rom. 5.3; 6.2). His positive attitude toward persecution finds parallels in both Paul and Matthew.

Some of his language, particularly in his Letter to the Romans, may reflect an understandable fear of failure (Ign. Rom. 7.2), an effort to bolster his courage so as not to fail in the course to which he had publicly committed himself. In addition, generally the only basis for releasing a Christian condemned to death was apostasy*; even if the Roman church had won his release for good reasons (something he feared they would attempt to do [Ign. Rom. 1.1—2.1; 4.1]), rumors that he had apostatized likely would have arisen, and he no doubt wished to avoid such a situation.

Finally there is the situation in Antioch, about which Ignatius is evidently quite worried. Schoedel notes (1) Ignatius's marked tendency towards self-effacement and (2) that he relates to the churches to which he writes not on the basis of his status as bishop, but as a captive about to be martyred and persuasively suggests that the Antiochene church was on the verge of splitting (Schoedel 1985, 10-11, 13-14). If such a split were to occur it would mean that Ignatius was a failure as a bishop, because he would not have maintained the godly way of the congregation that had been entrusted to him. He may, therefore, have seen in his imminent martyrdom a means by which to reclaim the deteriorating situation in Antioch and/or to redeem his reputation as a bishop and a Christian.

See also ADVERSARIES; ANTIOCH; APOSTOLIC FA-

THERS; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; MARTYRDOM; SYRIA, SYRIAN CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Text and Translation: J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings, ed. and rev. M. W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992). Commentaries and/or Editions: P.-Th. Camelot, Ignace d'Antioche: Lettres. Lettres et Martyre de Polycarpe de Smyrne (4th ed.; SC 10; Paris: Cerf, 1969); R. M. Grant, Ignatius of Antioch (ANF 4; Camden, NJ: Nelson, 1966); J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, Part II: S. Ignatius. S. Polycarp (2d ed.; 3 vols.; London: Macmillan, 1889); H. Paulsen, Die Briefe des Ignatius von Antiochia und der Brief des Polykarp von Smyrna (Zweite, neubearbeitete Auflage der Auslegung von Walter Bauer; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1985); W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985). Studies: C. P. H. Bammel, "Ignatian Problems," JTS 33 (1982) 62-97; H.-W. Bartsch, Gnostisches Gut und Gemeindetradition bei Ignatius von Antiochen (Gütersloh: Bertelsman, 1940); W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, ed. R. A. Kraft and G. Krodel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1969); V. Corwin, St. Ignatius and Christianity in Antioch (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1960); R. Joly, Le dossier d'Ignace d'Antioche (Brussels: Éditions de l'université de Bruxelles, 1979); H. O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius (Waterloo, Ont.: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1991); E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, Book 1: The First Ecclesiastical Writers, ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (NGS 5/1; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990); C. Munier, "Où en est la question d'Ignace d'Antioche? Bilan d'un siècle de recherches 1870-1988," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 359-484; H. Paulsen, Studien zur Theologie des Ignatius von Antiochien (FKD 29; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1978); J. Rius-Camps, The Four Authentic Letters of Ignatius, The Martyr (Christianismos 2; Rome: Pontificium Institutum Orientalium Studiorum, 1979); H. Schlier, Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zu den Ignatiusbriefen (BZNW 8; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1929); W. R. Schoedel, "Are the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch Authentic?" RSR 6 (1980) 196-201; idem, "Polycarp of Smyrna and Ignatius of Antioch," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 272-358; R. Weijenborg, Les lettres d'Ignace d'Antioche (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1969); T. Zahn, Ignatius von Antiochien (Gotha: Perthes, 1873). M. W. Holmes

ILLNESS. See HEALING, ILLNESS.

IMITATION

Many NT scholars are reluctant to accord imitation a prominent place in early Christian ethical* instruction, especially imitation of Christ* or God.* However, recognizing the role this pedagogical tool played in the Greco-Roman environment justifies a reconsideration of this important means of exhortation in the later writings of the NT and other early Christian literature.

1. Imitation in Hellenistic Moral Instruction
2. Imitation of Human Examples
3. Imitation of Christ
4. Imitation of God

1. Imitation in Hellenistic Moral Instruction. The use of models for imitation was an important element of classical and Hellenistic moral instruction. Examples served as demonstrations of the appropriate manner of life. Calls for imitation, both explicit and implicit, of personal example are among the most common means of ethical exhortation across a wide variety of writings throughout the Hellenistic period (e.g., Socrates, Alexander the Great). Additionally imitation of or assimilation to God was central to Middle Platonism's understanding of the purpose of human existence. Thus, as one might expect, imitation of God was a crucial element in Philo's* ethics. Less philosophically inclined Judaism* also used example as a motivation for proper behavior. The stories of Eleazar and the seven sons who were tortured and executed by Antiochus IV explicitly draws on this motif (2 Macc 6:24—7:42; 4 Macc 5—18). Likewise the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs regularly use this theme. Assuming the effectiveness of personal example, Josephus* (Josephus Ant. 1.11.3) asserts that Lot was hospitable (see Hospitality) to the angels* who destroyed Sodom because he had learned to imitate the goodness of Abraham.* Since the use of imitation was so widespread, its presence in NT texts should be no surprise.

2. Imitation of Human Examples.
Late NT writings draw on many human examples. Hebrews* often utilizes this means of exhortation. Its readers are called to imitate those who through faithfulness "are inheriting the promises" (Heb 6:12). These inheritors include Abraham (Heb 6:13-15) and others among the faithful in Israel's* history, as the implicit invitation to imitate the faithful in Hebrews 11 shows. Citing both ancient and current examples was a common practice in contemporary hortatory writings. Readers are explicitly summoned to imitate their current leaders in Hebrews 13:7, and those "inheriting the promises" (Heb 6:12) may also include those who maintain proper beliefs (Heb 6:1-12) in the present ("inheriting" is in the present tense). Like Hebrews, James 5:10-11 cites figures from the past (the Hebrew prophets and Job) as examples to be imitated. The specific focus of this imitation is perseverance (see Endurance) in suffering.*

B. Fiore argues that the literary form of the Pastoral Epistles itself is a call for imitation. This form (see Letters), paralleled in the Socratic epistles, harks back to the group's founder and earliest associates as patterns for the readers' lives and teaching. 2 Timothy 1:13-14 explicitly gives Paul's teaching as the pattern for correct doctrine. 1 Timothy 1:11 implies the same ideal. 2 Timothy 3:10-17 gives both the teaching and life of Paul as examples for imitation, and in 2 Timothy 4:1-8, Timothy is exhorted to fulfill his ministry,* with Paul's acceptance of martyrdom* as his model. Titus 3:3-8 apparently gives both Paul and Titus as examples of the impact conversion is to have on Christians' lives. In Titus 2:6-8, Titus is told that he should be an example for other young men to follow. Finally, 2 Tim 1:5-6 gives members of Timothy's own family as examples to encourage him to perform his ministry vigorously. Using family members as models was also a common hortatory technique of this period.

Outside the canon,* 1 Clement 17—19 exhorts its readers to be imitators of several OT characters (including Elijah, Ezekiel, Abraham, Job, Moses* and David). Clement (see Clement of Rome) uses their example to urge his readers to peace* and devotion to God, even asserting that their deeds, presumably through their examples, have "made us better" (1 Clem. 19.1-2).

As was common in Hellenistic moral exhortation, several late NT writings also provide examples to be avoided. Among others, Jude 5-7, 2 Peter 2:4, 6 and 1 John 3:12 all cite characters from the Bible whose conduct is to be avoided.

3. Imitation of Christ.
A call to imitate Christ presents difficulties for some modern interpreters. W. Michaelis narrowly circumscribes the idea by asserting that the primary meaning of imitation is obedience.* And W. Schrage delimits imitation by noting the unique soteriological significance of Jesus (e.g., Schrage, 273, 324-25). But ancient authors do not shy away from the idea of imitating Christ. 1 Peter 2:21 encourages slaves* to endure suffering at the hands of their masters by presenting Christ's sufferings as an example to imitate. Many interpreters see this verse as a foundation for all the following exhortations to wives, husbands and the whole Christian community as the household* of God. This aspect of Christ's example is especially appropriate for a church* enduring persecution. Similarly Timothy is exhorted to follow Christ's example by living up to his confession* of Christ (1 Tim 6:12-14). M. Reddish asserts that one of the central points of Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) is to present Jesus as the prototypical martyr whose example is to be imitated. This example of Jesus' endurance helps John prevent his readers from capitulating in persecution.

More broadly Ephesians 5:25 and 1 John 3:16-18 exhort their readers to imitate the love* of Christ: Ephesians exhorts husbands to imitate Christ in their love for their wives, and 1 John gives Christ's willingness to sacrifice himself as the model for relations within the Christian community (see John, Letters of).

Ignatius* reports that at Philadelphia his inspired preaching urged his hearers to become "imitators of Jesus Christ" (Ign. Phld. 7.2). In context this seems to be a general exhortation about how to conduct one's life, especially perhaps with regard to the unity of the church. More narrowly, Polycarp* (Pol. Phil. 8.2) urges his readers to imitate Jesus by enduring suffering. 1 Clement 15—16 does not explicitly call for imitation of Christ, but the description of Christ as humble immediately preceding a list of those figures from the Bible whose humility* the readers are to imitate makes it clear that Christ is the foremost example. Clement encourages these readers to achieve unity by following these examples of humility.

Calls to imitate Christ in these writings usually have one of two foci: enduring suffering or living a life of love, especially (though not exclusively) in the context of the church, where such an attitude promotes unity.

4. Imitation of God.

The most problematic sort of imitation for modern interpreters is imitation of God (see, e.g., Lindars). But again late NT writings find God an appropriate model for imitation. Ephesians 5:1 straightforwardly calls its readers to be "imitators of God." In context the focus is on being loving, especially perhaps as that is manifested in forgiving fellow Christians. Christ serves as yet another model of love to emulate in Ephesians 5:2. Just as 1 Peter* supported specific ethical injunctions with the example of Christ, it also intimates that imitation of God is a foundation of Christian ethics more broadly by quoting Leviticus 11:44, "You be holy because I am holy" (1 Pet 1:16-17; see Holy). 3 John 11 gives the general exhortation to imitate the good and not the evil. This exhortation may involve imitation of God because the result of imitating the good is that one will be "of God."

Ignatius describes the Ephesians as "imitators of God" because they had sent him help while he was in prison (Ign. Eph. 1.1). Later he exhorts this same church to strive to be imitators of God by putting the good of the other above one's own good. The *Epistle to Diognetus (10.3-6) asserts that by loving God and one's neighbor, believers become imitators of God. Anticipating some reaction, the author says one should not be amazed at this because it is possible for humans to be imitators of God if they so desire.

It is clear, then, that Christians of the first and second centuries found it appropriate to urge imitation not only of Christ but also of God. Imitation of God arises most often in contexts that exhort believers to live lives of love. This love is to be expressed in helping those in need or by putting the good of others, both within and outside the Christian community, before one's own good. Still, 1 Peter 1:16-17 and perhaps 3 John 11 make imitation of God a broad foundation for the conduct of the believer's life.

See also ETHICS; OBEDIENCE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. D. Betz, Nachfolge und Nachahmung Jesu Christi im Neuen Testament (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1967); J. H. Elliott, "Backward and Forward 'In His Steps': Following Jesus from Rome to Raymond and Beyond. The Tradition, Redaction and Reception of 1 Peter 2:18-25" in Discipleship in the New Testament, ed. F. F. Segovia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 184-204; idem, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); B. Fiore, The Function of Personal Example in the Socratic and Pastoral Epistles (AnBib 105; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1986); L. E. Frizzell, "Education by Example: A Motif in Joseph and Maccabee Literature of the Second Temple Period" in Of Scholars and Savants and their Texts; Studies in Philosophy and Religious Thought: Essays in Honor of Arthur Hyman, ed. R. Link-Salinger (New York: Peter Lang, 1989); V. P. Furnish, The Love Command in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); B. Gerhardsson, "Agape and Imitation of Christ" in Jesus, the Gospels and the Church: Essays in Honor of William R. Farmer, ed. E. P. Sanders (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987); B. Lindars, "Imitation of God and Imitation of Christ," Theology 76 (1973) 394-402; R. N. Longenecker, ed., Patterns of Discipleship in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); A. J. Malherbe, Moral Exhortation, A Greco-Roman Sourcebook (LEC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); W. Michaelis, "μιμέομαι κτλ," TDNT 4:659-74; H. P. Nasuti, "Identity, Identification and Imitation: The Narrative Hermeneutics of Biblical Law," Journal of Law and Religion 4 (1986) 9-23; M. Reddish, "Martyr Christology in the Apocalypse," JSNT 33 (1988) 85-95; R. Schnackenberg, The Moral Teaching of the New Testament (London: Burns & Oates, 1965); W. Schrage, The Ethics of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); R. A. Wild, " 'Be Imitators of God': Discipleship in the Letter to the Ephesians" in Discipleship in the New Testament, ed. F. F. Segovia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 127-43.

J. L. Sumney

IMMORTALITY. See MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY.

IMPERIAL CULT. See EMPEROR, EMPEROR CULT; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

IMPURITY. See PURITY AND IMPURITY.

INCARNATION. See CHRISTOLOGY; PREEXISTENCE.

INTERCESSION. See PRAYER.

INTERTEXTUALITY IN EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE

This article focuses on the manner in which OT stories and narrative were a significant influence in shaping the literature of the later NT and early second-century writings. While OT quotations in many NT writings are apparent, numerous studies have argued for formative influence of the OT upon the NT also at the conceptual and structural level (see DJG, OT in the Gospels; see also studies by Evans and Sanders, Evans and Stegner, and Swartley, esp. 10-21 for history of scholarship on this topic). While these contributions focus on the canonical Gospels, similar evidence obtains for the Pauline writings (e.g., Hays). Both the OT and the stories of the Jesus tradition,* in oral and written Gospel* form, had significant influence also upon the writings considered in this volume. Occasionally the Pauline influence is prominent also.

1. Types of Use
2. Acts
3. Hebrews
4. James
5. 1 Peter
6. 2 Peter and Jude
7. 1, 2 and 3 John
8. Revelation
9. Apostolic Fathers
10. Concluding Comment

1. Types of Use.

Because of the varied nature of later NT literature, it is impossible to speak of one or even several patterns that characterize OT textual influence in these writings. To illustrate: the epistles of John (see John, Letters of) contain no OT quotations and utilize the OT only in recalling the Cain and Abel story for moral example, whereas Revelation* is saturated with OT allusions to Ezekiel, Daniel et al. (see Old Testament in Revelation). Similarly, two documents with unknown dates but likely from early- to mid-second century, the *Didache and the *Epistle of Barnabas, represent vastly different uses of and influences from the OT: the former has only several allusions to specific texts, while the latter constructs a sustained argument effecting a mutation in foundational theology (see Old Testament in Apostolic Fathers).

As a whole, however, the later NT literature and the early patristic literature up to the mid-second century show seven ways in which earlier Scripture exerted influence: (1) quotations of earlier texts, often to claim fulfillment of prophecy;* (2) allusions, echoes or very brief quotations of older narrative to thus extend the older "truth-world" in a "just-as" pattern; (3) recital of Israel's* past or the story of Jesus to convince listeners of some truth; (4) citing persons or events for moral (or immoral) example; (5) typological argument to argue for fulfillment of hope;* (6) allegorical reflection on older texts to emphasize new theological realities; and (7) creative new use of older images, stock expressions and sequences of thought in a new ordering and composition. All these means of employing the older story contribute to intertextuality. Comment on the writings is oriented to these means by which older literature fashions younger narratives.

2. Acts.

In Acts* quotations abound, to effect chiefly a fulfillment pattern of type 1 above. Most remarkable theologically are the pouring out of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in the "last days" (Acts 2:17-21 par. Joel 2:28-32 [in LXX and MT 3:1-5]); raising up a prophet, Jesus, like Moses* (3:22-23 par. Deut 18:15-16, 19); the Messiah Jesus "led as a sheep to the slaughter" (Acts 8:32-33 par. Is 53:7-8); and the "raising of the fallen booth of David," so that the rest (the Gentiles*) can call on the name of the Lord* (Acts 15:16-18 par. Amos 9:11-12). The important texts of making God's* people a light to the nations (Acts 13:47 par. Is 49:6) and explaining the unbelief of God's own (Jewish) people (Acts 28:26-27 par. Is 6:9-10) are also fulfillment texts with some element of the "just-as" pattern of type 2. For the list of quotations and mode of citation, virtually all from the Septuagint, see J. A. Fitzmyer, who remarks that the Christian owning of the OT is largely due to Luke's legacy (Fitzmyer, 538; see Old Testament in Acts).

The extended kerygmatic* recital (type 3) of Israel's salvation* story—from Abraham* to Solomon in Acts 7 and from election* to David in Acts 13:16-23—is an important means of using earlier narrative to establish identity and call to decision. This recital is extended through the life, death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection* of Jesus in Acts 13:26-41 (cf. Acts 10:34-43) and includes a catena of OT quotations (Ps 2:7; Is 55:3; Ps 16:10 MT [15:10 LXX]; Hab 1:5). Paul's speech in front of the Areopagus is of type 2 with numerous allusions (1 Kings 8:27; Ps 50:12; Is 42:5; Deut 32:8; and the Adam story in Gen 3 in the phrase "from one ancestor" [Acts 13:26]; see Paul and Paulinisms). In the narrative as a whole, David as a royal person and the book of Isaiah figure prominently from the older story, providing promissory hope and warrant for Jesus as messianic fulfillment. David is of special significance since he connects prophecy with the messianic figure (Jervell, 84-85). The Elijah-Elisha stories are echoed in Acts 1:1-9 and Acts 8:9-40 and perhaps more broadly (see Brodie). The Moses story as prototype of God's revelation,* both in "raising up a prophet like unto Moses" (Acts 3:22) and the people's response of unbelief (esp. Acts 7), also plays a major role (see Soards).

3. Hebrews.

Even more than Acts, Hebrews* is laced with OT quotations, as well as numerous thought allusions to the older scriptural story (see Old Testament in Hebrews). Hebrews 1 contains eight such connections in a space of fourteen verses (Ps 110:1; 2:7; 2 Sam 7:14; Deut 32:43; Ps 104:4 MT [103:4 LXX]; 45:6-7; 102:25-27 MT [101:25-27 LXX]; 110:1 MT [109:1 LXX]). These uses combine a "just-as" with a fulfillment motif (see esp. Heb 2:6-9 par. Ps 8:4-6). The most notable fulfillment use is Hebrews 8:8-12, citing Jeremiah 31:31-34 to make the case that the new covenant replaces the Mosaic covenant (see Heb 8:13, "he [Jesus] has made the first one obsolete").

In addition to this extravagant use of OT texts to prove and provide warrant for arguments, Hebrews contains a sustained typological* argument to show the superiority of Jesus (type 5, above): first, to the OT prophets* (Heb 1:1-3), the angels* (Heb 1:5—2:18) and to Moses* (Heb 3:1-6); second, to the levitical priesthood* (Heb 4:14—7:28); and third, to sacrifices* as offered in Israel heretofore (Heb 8:1—10:39). Here the accent falls on fulfillment, so much so that the older pattern of piety is abolished (Heb 10:3-10).

One distinctive mark of the older story on Hebrews is the writer's use of the Melchizedek* narrative from Genesis 14, both in Hebrews 5 and 7. Here we have not a fulfillment typology, but an analogical typology wherein Jesus is likened to Melchizedek: to his mysterious origin and destiny and to his royal peace- and righteousness-making character. All these attributes are superior not only in quality, compared to the old levitical order, but in quantity—they are eternal, for Jesus is priest like Melchizedek forever (Heb 5:6; 7:17, 21; citing Ps 110:4 MT [109:4 LXX]).

The second distinctive imprint of the older story is the recital in Hebrews 11 with its litany of OT heroes of faith, including lesser well-known figures—Abel, Enoch, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Rahab, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, Samuel—as well as the famous ones—Noah, Abraham, Moses and David (see Ancestors). Abraham and Moses receive pride of space in the narration but all, including women, constitute the "great cloud of witnesses" that now functions to inspire faith in Jesus, the "pioneer and perfecter of faith" (Heb 12:2).

Third, the writer presents us with a metaphorical transformation of Zion in Hebrews 12:22, an extension of the "city that has foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb 11:10; see Jerusalem, Zion). Here, the holy city and Zion imagery of Israel's Scripture, in Psalms and Isaiah especially, reaches a new level of meaning, loosed from its geospace and transmuted into a new transspace reality where its durability is unquestioned, for it "cannot be shaken" (Heb 11:28).

4. James.

James* has several quotations and numerous allusions to and variations on OT Scripture. Most notable are the citation of the command to "love your neighbor" in James 2:8 (Lev 19:18); citation of the commandments* not to commit adultery and not to kill in James 2:11 (Ex 20:14, 13 par. Deut 5:18, 17); "Abraham believed God . . . for righteousness" in James 2:23 (Gen 15:6); and "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble" in James 4:6 (Prov 3:34). The sense of Isaiah 40:6-7 is evident in James 1:10-11, as is Isaiah 5:9 in James 5:4. More distinctive is James's use (type 4) in which Abraham (Jas 2:21-24), Rahab (Jas 2:25), Job (Jas 5:11) and Elijah (Jas 5:17) are employed as moral examples of righteous action (see Righteousness), perseverance (see Endurance) and earnest prayer* respectively (but the reader needs to know these OT stories to make the points persuasive [Davids, 122]). This use of OT personages and the stories by which they are remembered signals a developing tendency in the literature of this later canonical portion (see Old Testament in General Epistles).

5. 1 Peter.

1 Peter* contains at least nineteen quotations, mostly in a "just-as" mode but with an added paraenetic punch: 1 Peter 1:16, an injunction to be holy (Lev 19:2); 1 Peter 3:6, that women* should behave toward husbands as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord (Gen 18:12); 1 Peter 3:10-12, keep your tongue from evil and seek peace* (Ps 34:12-16 MT [Ps 33:13-17 LXX]); 1 Peter 5:5, God resists the proud* but gives grace* to the humble (Prov 3:34 LXX); and the exhortation in 1 Peter 5:7 to cast all anxiety on God (Ps 55:22 MT [54:23 LXX]).

In a catena of quotations and massing up several sets of images, the author establishes a christological* and ecclesial foundation for the believers' identity that empowers ethical resistance (see Ethics) to the pressures of the larger society and sustains in the midst of suffering* (1 Pet 2:4-24). This series of images—a "living stone" (1 Pet 2:4); a stone* in Zion, a chief cornerstone, elect and precious (1 Pet 2:6) but rejected by the builders; and a stone that makes those who do not believe stumble (1 Pet 2:7-8)--build upon the joining of Isaiah 28:16; Isaiah 8:14 and Psalm 118:22 (Snodgrass, Oss). The images of elect race, royal priesthood,* and holy nation echo the stories of exodus and new exodus (Ex 19:5-6; 23:22; Is 43:20-21). The reality of a new people is clinched in 1 Peter 2:10 by dramatic flashback to Hosea 1:6, 9 and Hosea 2:1, 23, where God's faithless people are forgiven and reclaimed as a marriage partner. This creative use of Scripture testifies to deep intratextuality whereby the story of God's people's past infuses the identity-forming text for the readers of this epistle. Drawing on various OT texts (Ps. 33 LXX; Is 8; 53; Gen 18; Lev 19:2; 20:7, 26; Prov 3:34), he authorizes his instruction to shape moral conduct (Green).

But there is another important layer of story influence here. 1 Peter appeals directly to the example of Jesus (1 Pet 2:21-25). Without citing the passion narrative as such, Peter draws on the oral story of Jesus' suffering and death (1 Pet 2:21-24; cf. 1 Pet 4:1-6) and resurrection-exaltation victory (1 Pet 3:21c-22) to clinch his sustained paraenetic exhortations to nonresistance to evil (see Death of Christ; Exaltation; Resurrection). Referring to Noah (1 Pet 3:20) as a moral example also adds to the persuasion, showing God's provision to care for the faithful even while exercising divine wrath.* Hence the older and newer stories of God's people blend together as basis for ethical paraenesis.

6. 2 Peter and Jude.

While in these two brief epistles there are several quotations of OT Scripture (2 Pet 2:22 par. Prov 26:11; 3:8 par. Ps 90:4; 3:13 par. Is 65:17; Jude 9 par. Zech 3:2) and possibly one of a Gospel text (2 Pet par. Mt 17:5), as well as one from an extracanonical writing (Jude 14-15 par. 1 Enoch 1:9; 5:4; 60:8), the more distinctive feature of these writings is an appeal to OT people or events that evoke episodes of divine salvation in the context of certain and devastating judgment* and provide either moral or immoral example (type 4).

While 2 Peter* accentuates the certainty of God's judgment upon perpetrators of destructive teaching and those who follow licentious ways (2 Pet 2), it also points to a moral example in two of the three citations: Noah saved from the devastating flood (Gen 6—8) and Lot saved from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:12-29). Only in the first citation—God not sparing the rebellious angels (Gen 6:1-6)—no saving act occurs.

Jude* uses the same list (Jude 6-7) but does not mention those saved, rather only the terrible, pounding judgment. This is trumped by a second sequence of OT people who acted like "irrational animals" (Jude 10): Cain, a murderer; Balaam, erring for the sake of gain; and Korah, in rebellion. Unmitigated judgment is heaped upon all who behave similarly to these immoral and ungodly types. Here the OT story is used in a way opposite from that of Hebrews 11. Rather than portray the "hall of faith," Jude highlights the "hall of fate," of those who rebelled against God and fell under God's judgment. In these writings, stories of the past are used as warrant for harsh messages of judgment, especially upon apostasy* (see Old Testament in General Epistles).

7. 1, 2 and 3 John.
Of all the writings in this canonical grouping, 1, 2 and 3 John are least marked by influence of OT story. Here is mentioned only Cain as an immoral example—a murderer—while Abel is a model of righteousness (1 Jn 3:12). Whether one can deduce from this feature the nature of the audience to which these epistles are addressed—i.e., Gentiles*—is dubious. Important truths from the Jesus story punctuate these letters, however: the blood of Jesus, God's Son, cleanses us from sin* (1 Jn 1:7); Jesus Christ is our advocate with the Father and the expiation for our sins and for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2:1-2); and Jesus Christ has indeed come in the flesh—to deny this is antichrist* (1 Jn 4:2-3; 2 Jn 7). Here cardinal beliefs of the Jesus story, received either orally or through written Gospel, form the motivating goal of the exhortation: so the readers might believe correctly in Jesus as Son* of God and continue to know that they have eternal life (1 Jn 5:13; see Old Testament in General Epistles).

8. Revelation.
If the vote for common authorship in the Johannine corpus depends upon influence of the OT upon the narrative, then the Gospel and Revelation* are together and the epistles stem from another hand or group. Of the three, Revelation is by far the most thoroughly dependent upon the OT in its one-liner quotations (eleven listed by Bratcher), many stream-of-consciousness allusions, its symbolic codes, apocalyptic* genre and possibly even its structure (some have seen in it the reverse order of the exodus plagues as well as the days of creation* in Genesis). Lacking any direct appeal to OT Scripture, the narrative is replete with thunderous echoes of the OT, in collage fashion, so that it consummates the OT in its prophetic-apocalyptic essence (see Apocalyptic).

E. Schüssler Fiorenza suggests that the writer "adapts or borrows whole Old Testament sequences as patterns for his original compositions" (135). W. J. Harrington begins his commentary on short individual sections by printing six to nine OT texts, occasionally NT ones as well, to show the store of imagery from which the new composition arises (e.g., for Rev 12:1-4: Gen 3:14-16; Song 6:10; Is 66:7-8; Dan 7:7; 8:10 [164-65]). S. Moyise has shown John's extensive use of Daniel and Ezekiel but also corrects misuses of the connections: G. Beale's virtually exclusive appeal to Daniel 7 for composition of Revelation 1:4-20 and Revelation 4—5 and M. Goulder's correlation of Revelation with the Ezekiel readings in the Jewish year (45-84) are notable. H. Ulfgard assesses various proposals that connect Revelation to the Feast of Tabernacles and concludes that not the feast itself, but what it eschatologically* represents provides an illuminating context for the grand vision of Revelation 7:9-17 (148-53).

The NT gospel story surely figures prominently also in understanding Revelation, both in its testimony to the suffering of the Messiah and in its promised exaltation of the Messiah. In this respect Revelation is the grand finale to both aspects of the Jesus story: the Lamb* that was slain (Rev 5:9-14) and the vindication of the Lamb through the triumph of God (Rev 19-22; see Old Testament in Revelation).

9. Apostolic Fathers.
Here are briefly considered 1 Clement, the Letters of Ignatius, the Didache, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas (see Old Testament in Apostolic Fathers).

9.1. 1 Clement. An anonymous letter ascribed in ancient tradition to Clement,* the third bishop of Rome, and written likely at the end of the first century, 1 Clement brims with OT personages, short citations, recitals of faithful people and their deeds, all within the purpose to emulate for moral action. All the first four types of OT uses noted above are present. Though Scripture is cited with a fulfillment motif, it is not for messianic proof but to authorize moral instruction (1 Clem. 3.1). Similarly, the heroes of faith, ancient and near contemporary (Peter and Paul), are cited to encourage faithfulness (1 Clem. 4—12). Rahab is given eight verses (1 Clem. 12.1-8) and later Judith and Esther are emulated for risking their lives for the faithful (1 Clem. 55.4-6).

Specific reference to Jesus Christ in his faithful life, unto death, is intertwined with citations from Isaiah 53 (1 Clem. 16). Elijah, Elisha, Ezekiel, Job, Moses and David are called forth, with brief key texts, to present models of godly response (1 Clem. 17—18). Later Isaac, Jacob, the priests and the Levites are listed, leading up to a christological reflection that in turn results in the call to "be energetic in doing 'every good deed' " (1 Clem. 31—33). Then, in language reminiscent of Hebrews 12:1-2, Jesus Christ is set forth to culminate these appeals (1 Clem. 36.1). Then follows a catena of OT quotations to magnify Christ (Pss 104:4; 2:7-8; 110:1). In a quite different manner from Revelation, 1 Clement is formed by OT Scripture stories and appeals to the lives and teachings of Jesus Christ and the apostles.*

9.2. Letters of Ignatius. The Letters of Ignatius, written in the early second century by Ignatius* enroute to Rome for martyrdom and to churches that echo Revelation 2—3 and Paul's own mission, contain few references to the OT, but many to Gospel and Pauline texts. Paul is the real saint and martyr* (Ign. Eph. 12.2) and Ignatius's goal is to be worthy to die in union with the passion of Jesus Christ (Ign. Magn. 5). Ignatius takes refuge in the gospel as the flesh of Jesus, in the apostles as the presbytery of the church and in the prophets, who in anticipating Christ's coming were in unity with him. He warns against those preaching Judaism* but regards a circumcised person preaching Christ better than a Gentile* (Ign. Phld. 5—6.1). The clincher comes in a simulated argument between those claiming the documents and those claiming Christ as authority.* Ignatius's famous retort is, "To me Jesus Christ is the original documents" (Ign. Phld. 8.2). Ignatius's letters contain only occasionally the second type use of OT texts, with brief quotes to warrant his moral instruction (Ign. Eph. 5.3 par. Prov 3:34; Ign. Magn. 12d par. Prov 18:17 LXX; Ign. Trall. 8.2 par. Is 52:5). But his letters breathe Gospel and epistle language with frequent textual citations and this with type 3 use.

9.3. Didache. Likely written very early in the second century (likely before Barnabas and Hermas), this catechetical manual cites frequently from the Gospels (though rarely from John) but only occasionally from the Pauline epistles and the OT. The double love command, the Sermon on the Mount (with Luke's par.) including the Lord's Prayer (Did. 8.2), the Gospel Apocalypse (Mt 24) and the Great Commission (Mt. 28:19; Did. 7.3) shape the ethical exhortation. But the Didache often adds to these borrowed words some explicit instruction, as in the case of baptism.* The eucharistic words only slightly recall the NT texts, presenting a distinctive version of its own (Did. 9-10). The predominant type of use is 2, but the textual axis is mostly between the Gospel works of Jesus and the Didache writer(s).

9.4. Epistle of Barnabas. The Epistle of Barnabas demonstrates prominently the sixth use, as well as the third and fifth uses of numerous OT texts, laws and stories. Many OT texts are cited briefly or at length and are interspersed with NT citations: in Barnabas 6 alone K. Lake lists twenty-two OT references and six from the NT. Barnabas cites the older story repeatedly to show it was intended spiritually for our (Christians') sake and was misunderstood by Jews in literally observing the laws and grasping the stories. Most famous are Barnabas's claim that the covenant* is not "both theirs and ours. It is ours" (Barn. 4.9; K. Lake trans.) and equating Abraham's 318 circumcised men (Barn. 8.8), via gemmatria play, with Jesus Christ and the cross* (of the 18, 10 = I; 8 = H and IH are the first two letters for Jesus in Greek and T (Tau), the cross, = 300).

The allegorical use of the OT, similar to that in Qumran* (Barnard), is not limited to christological* points but extends to moral instruction as well. The levitical food* prohibitions (Lev 11:13-16) mean that you shall not be like or associate with those people who manifest the traits of these animals (lazy, dirty swine or idle birds). In short, through spiritualized interpretation the whole OT is for us (including creation, sabbath, and temple in Barn. 15-16). The treatise concludes with ethical paraenesis on the "Two Ways," either borrowing from the Didache or a source common to both.

9.5. Shepherd of Hermas. Written in Rome sometime between A.D. 120 and 148 and in an apocalyptic genre that combines the visionary style of Ezekiel, overtones of Song of Solomon and Hosea in love and fidelity themes, and parables (some akin to Jesus'), this lengthy writing addresses itself primarily to the ethical challenge of maintaining a virtuous life and struggling against the insiduous temptations of lust, wealth and anxieties that ruin simplicity of mind and heart (see Hermas, Shepherd of).

Echoes of Scripture, both Old and New, are sporadically frequent, but there is relatively little explicit use of biblical texts. The few exceptions include Mandates 4.4, which addresses whether one should remarry (1 Cor 7:38-40) after a spouse dies (see remarriage). In Hermas remarriage is not sin, but greater honor accrues to one who does not. The parable of the rock and the door (Herm. Sim. 9.12.3-8) employs imagery from John 3:5 and 14:6, with a prelude echoing Proverbs 8:17-20. The prominent biblical issue of how the rich stand before God (esp. Lk and Jas 4:13—5:6) is taken up numerous times (Herm. Vis. 3.6.5-7; 3.9.2-9; Herm. Man. 10.1.4-6) and genially resolved by the remarkable parable of the sterile elm and fruitful vine (Herm. Sim. 2). The rich man, poor in intercession and confession toward God because of his business, must lean upon (give to) the poor, who are rich in this regard, and the poor man must lean upon the rich (the elm), so the vine produces abundant fruit. In this way the rich are of service to God, and both together bear much fruit.

None of the seven patterns of employing Scripture neatly fit for Hermas, but elements of both 2 and 7 are clearly present in his creative use of biblical images and phrases, and through visionary genre these are used for the sake of exhorting unto holiness of life, to "glorify God's great and glorious name," which is a recurring phrase (Herm. Vis. 3.4.3; 4.1.3; et al. par. Ps 86:9, 12; 99:3). The Shepherd certainly echoes John 10 and is the visionary one who comes to remain with Hermas (Herm. Sim. 10.3) to assure him of his purity and life with God.

10. Concluding Comment.

Both the later NT canonical literature and these five early second-century writings exhibit a remarkable degree of intertextuality, utilizing various parts of the canon.* Moreover, the range of types of use is fully present in the canonical group and almost fully present in the early second-century group. The latter group lacks type 1 used as messianic fulfillment proofs, as in Acts and Hebrews. L. Goppelt (35) observes this point as well as other differences between 1 Clement (representative of other second-century writings) and canonical Hebrews and 1 Peter: Hebrews and 1 Clement make use of the OT in exegetical argument, while 1 Peter uses it homiletically. In terms of content, the OT provides the writer of Hebrews with salvation-historical or typological correspondences, 1 Clement with authoritative moral analogies and 1 Peter with wisdom* sayings and images. Its hermeneutical approach places 1 Peter, like Hebrews, in the middle of the "apostolic" witness, since it announces that the eschaton is present in the dialectic of the now-but-not-yet. This cannot be said for 1 Clement or for the other documents of the apostolic fathers.

See also OLD TESTAMENT IN: ACTS, HEBREWS, GENERAL EPISTLES, REVELATION, APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. W. Barnard, "The Epistle of Barnabas and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Some Observations," SJT 13 (1960) 45-59; R. G. Bratcher, ed., Old Testament Quotations in the New Testament (New York: United Bible Societies, 1967); T. L. Brodie, "Luke-Acts as an Imitation and Emulation of the Elijah-Elisha Narative" in New Visions on Luke and Acts, ed. E. Richard (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990) 78-85; G. B. Caird, The Revelation of St John the Divine (London: Adam & Charles Black, 1966); J. T. Carroll, "The Uses of Scripture in Acts," in SBLSP (1990) 512-28; P. H. Davids, "Tradition and Citation in the Epistle of James" in Scripture, Tradition, and Interpretation, ed. W. W. Gasque and W. S. LaSor (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 113-26; C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures: The Substructure of New Testament Theology (London: Nisbet, 1952); W. J. Dumbrell, The End and the Beginning: Revelation 21-22 and the Old Testament (Australia: Lancer, 1985); C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders, Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Scripture in Luke-Acts (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1993); C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner, eds., The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel (JSNTSup 114; Sheffield: Academic Press, 1994); E. S. Fiorenza, The Book of Revelation: Justice and Judgment (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Use of the Old Testament in Luke-Acts," in SBLSP (1992) 524-38; S. Freyne, "Reading Hebrews and Revelation Intertextually" in Intertextuality in Biblical Writings (Festschrift B. van Iersel) ed., S. Draisma (Kampen: J. H. Kok, 1989) 83-94; L. Goppelt, A Commentary on 1 Peter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); G. L. Green, "The Use of the Old Testament for Christian Ethics in 1 Peter," TynB 41 (1990) 276-89; W. J. Harrington, Understanding the Apocalypse (Washington, DC & Cleveland: Corpus, 1969); R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989); J. Jervell, "Die Mitte der Schrift: zum lukanische Verständnis des Alten Testaments," in Einheit und Vielfalt Neutestamentlicher Theologie, ed. U. Luz, and H. Weber (Festschrift E. Schweizer) (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983); S. J. Kistemaker, The Psalm Citations in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Amsterdam: van Soest, 1961); S. Moyise, The Old Testament in the Book of Revelation (JSNTSup 115; Sheffield: Acadernic Press, 1995); A. P. O'Hagan, "Early Christian Exegesis Exemplified from the Epistle of Barnabas," AusBR 11 (1963) 33-40; C. Osiek, Rich and Poor in the Shepherd of Hermas: An Exegetical-Social Investigation (CBQMS 15; Washington, DC: The Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1983); D. A. Oss, "The Interpretation of the 'Stone' Passages by Peter and Paul: A Comparative Study," JETS 32 (1989) 181-200; F. Schröger, Der Verfasser des Hebräerbriefes als Schriftausleger (Regensburg, Germany: F. Pustet, 1968); K. R. Snodgrass, "I Peter II.1-10: Its Formation and Literary Affinities," NTS 24 (1977-78) 97-106; M. L. Soards, The Speeches of Acts (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); W. M. Swartley, Israel's Scripture Traditions and the Synoptic Gospels: Story Shaping Story (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); H. Ulfgard, Feast and Future: Revelation 7:9-17 and the Feast of Tabernacles (ConBNT 22; Lund: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1989). W. M. Swartley

ISAAC. See ANCESTORS.

ISRAEL, TWELVE TRIBES

At its birth the Christian church had a lively sense of continuity with the historical Israel, as is clear from canonical books that relate to both the beginning of the NT period (the Gospels and the letters of Paul; see DJG, Israel; DPL, Israel) and its end (Revelation); this was replaced by a modified self-awareness as the church developed its own separate identity.

Biblical authors in the period in view do sometimes refer to some or all of the twelve tribes of Israel (Acts 26:7; Rev 21:12), but not frequently. They tend rather to use the name Israel both as a way to refer to historical, ethnic Israel and as a code word for a variety of related matters.

1. Shared Outlooks
2. Acts
3. Apostolic Fathers

1. Shared Outlooks.

1.1. The Historical Israel. Either "Israel" or "the people(s) of Israel" is used as a common shorthand for referring to all Jews (Acts 4:10, 27; 5:21; 9:15; 10:36) or as a way to refer to the central OT nation (Acts 13:17, 23-24; Rev 2:14; 21:12). These references are clear, even in the case of the passages in Revelation, in spite of the interpretive uncertainty frequently brought about by symbolic imagery there.

1.2. The Church as the New Israel. It is more difficult to interpret Revelation 7:4-8, but G. R. Beasley-Murray (139-41) argues cogently that this passage, applied here to the church* as the new Israel, was originally written as a Jewish oracle and only later applied to the community of believers. If he is correct, then this passage is an example of the Christian view that the church is the new Israel.

That such a conception of the church was current in the late NT period and beyond can be amply demonstrated. James 1:1, which refers to "the twelve tribes of the dispersion," was surely addressed to ethnic Jews who were also practicing Christians and makes it plain, as R. P. Martin argues (Martin, 8-9), that the author thought of Jews who had become Christians as the true Israel. James* was not apparently written to a mixed group of Jews and Gentiles* but to Jews alone.

First Peter,* however, though it begins similarly (1 Pet 1:1), is written to churches that have a marked Gentile membership (see 1 Pet 4:3). To quote J. Ramsey Michaels, the author of this book "is addressing certain communities of Gentile Christians as if they were Jews" (Michaels, 6). In the language used to describe Petrine believers in 1 Peter 2:9-10, the Christians addressed are a "chosen race, royal priesthood, holy nation, God's own people" (cf. the OT passages behind these words in the Septuagint translation of Exod 19:6 and Is 57:15 and especially in the "not pitied/not my people" language of Hos 2:23 and context). These verses come at the end of a passage beginning at 1 Peter 1:13 and clearly delineate the believing community (see Elliott, esp. 38-48), Jew and Gentile alike, in terms that were originally applied to Israel in their OT contexts. God,* who chose the people of Israel to be his own people, through Christ* has now chosen Christian believers to be his own people as an extension of his salvation* to the race (Steuernagel, 13-14).

1.3. Jesus, God's Agent to Save and Restore Israel. The canonical books reflect an early Christian understanding of Jesus as the consummation of God's plan, as articulated by the prophets,* to redeem and restore Israel. This appears in our literature in Acts, both as an assumption underlying the thinking of the early disciples (Acts 1:6ff.) and as an idea expressed in addresses by Peter (Acts 3:18-21; 5:31) and Paul (Acts 13:30-33; 26:6ff.; 28:20).

It is also a theme represented in Hebrews,* which views Jesus as the fulfillment of the promises* of salvation and restoration made to Israel by God and as the perfection of what was foreshadowed in that nation's institutions and history. Israel was the object of the conditional and passing Mosaic covenant,* whereas the church is in the line of the unconditional and permanent Davidic covenant (Beavis, 25-27). Hebrews portrays Jesus as the perfect representative of heaven,* making him superior to OT religion in every respect (Omanson, 25).

This contrast between the former, Israelite order and the new arrangement under Jesus is so pervasive in Hebrews that it is difficult to select some passages that demonstrate the point without neglecting others that equally deserve attention. But Hebrews 8:7-13 is exemplary of both the theme of the necessary supercession of the old covenant by the new and the citation of OT facts and passages (here Jer 31:31-34, the longest quotation of the OT anywhere in the NT). In the extended context of describing the new covenant and its high priest* Christ, the author writes of the obsolescence of the Israelite covenant and its replacement. As foretold by Jeremiah, the day had come for God in Christ to forge a new relationship with his people that does not partake of the provisional nature of the original one (Vanhoye, 182-83). Throughout its sustained argument Hebrews makes it clear, as here, that the new covenant will not be limited to the twelve tribes of Israel but will extend to the church that replaces them.

2. Acts.

The Gospels assign much of the blame for the crucifixion of Jesus to the Jews and their leaders (see DJG, Death of Jesus §6.1) who lived at that time. (In Christian history this has sometimes been taken to mean that all Jews of all subsequent times are guilty of Jesus' death; that is an erroneous deduction, but it lies beyond the scope of this article to address it.) Acts,* the second volume of Luke's bipartite work, portrays this understanding as carried on by the nascent church (on the authorship of Acts and its relationship to Luke see, e.g., Johnson, 197-210). God had predicted a Messiah who would do Israel good, but when that Messiah came in Jesus, the Jews (under the name of Israel) not only turned him away but made away with him. This understanding of the state of affairs lies behind and is assumed in several places in Acts. But it is used variously, as a whip in the excoriating speech of Stephen* (Acts 7:2-53) and evangelistically in Peter's Pentecost* sermon (Acts 2:14-36; see esp. the climax in Acts 2:36 and the outcome).

3. Apostolic Fathers.

By the time of the writers referred to as the apostolic fathers,* the consciousness of the Christian body as being in direct succession to the historical nation Israel had receded somewhat into the background. That idea never completely dies in the church, and it comes to expression several times and in various places in subsequent Christian history. But it is directly and extensively expressed in the apostolic fathers in only one book, and even that book allegorizes the Jewishness of Israel away (cf. Bernard). There are isolated passages, such as the one in 1 Clement 29 (1 Clem. 29.2-3), for example, that speaks of God's part in creating and electing historical, ethnic Israel. But it is the Epistle of Barnabas that stresses the theme of the Christian significance of the OT. This epistle urges Christians not to accept a Jewish reading of the Hebrew Scriptures but to understand their esoteric meaning, which speaks of the church. For the anonymous author of this epistle, there is not any literal significance to be assigned to commands of the Law.* Nevertheless, beyond a small handful of questionable words and phrases, neither these writings nor other Christian and fringe Christian writings to the middle of the second century make much at all of the literal Israel and its twelve tribes.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CHURCH; CHURCH AS ISRAEL, PEOPLE OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); M. A. Beavis, "The New Covenant and Judaism," TBT 22 (1984) 24-30; L. W. Bernard, "The Use of Testimonies in the Early Church and in the Epistle of Barnabas" in Studies in the Apostolic Fathers and Their Background (New York: Schocken, 1966) 109-35; J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy: An Exegetical Examination of 1 Peter 2:4-10 and the Phrase Basileion Hierateuma (NovTSup 12; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1966); L. T. Johnson, The Writings of the New Testament: An Interpretation (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); R. L. Omanson, "A Superior Covenant: Hebrews 8:1—10:18," RevExp 82 (1985) 361-73; V. R. Steuernagel, "An Exiled Community as a Missionary Community: A Study Based on 1 Peter 2:9, 10," ERT 10 (1986) 8-18; A. Vanhoye, Old Testament Priests and the New Priest According to the New Testament (Petersham, MS: St. Bede's Publications, 1986).

A. Casurella

J

JAMES, LETTER OF

The Letter of James is among the most neglected books of the NT canon. Many believers and their (especially Protestant) faith traditions still agree with Luther's negative verdict of its usefulness for Christian formation, pointing out its lack of reference to Christ and its apparent disagreement with Paul as good reasons for its marginal status within the church. During the modern period of biblical studies, some have even viewed the book's more practical bent as inherently inferior when compared to the theological profundity of Paul's correspondence. At the same time, others have come to depend upon the book's wise solutions to everyday situations, which insist that a fully biblical religion requires more than mere confessions of orthodox faith. In this sense James offers a complementary "check and balance" to the accents of the Pauline letters, helping to form a biblical witness that commends a firm trust in the saving work of the Lord Jesus (Pauline) and a practical wisdom patterned after his life (James).

1. The Author(s) of James
2. The Audience(s) of James
3. The Literature of James
4. A Canonical Approach to James
5. The Gospel According to James
6. The Argument of James

1. The Author(s) of James.

1.1. Candidates for Authorship. The identities of a book's author and his first audience are important considerations for any interpreter interested in a wide range of historical issues. For instance, it is difficult to locate a composition in its original world, to know something of what occasioned its writing and when and how it functioned among its first readers without good ideas of who wrote it and why.

The opening verse directly claims authorship for "James, servant of God and of Jesus Christ" (Jas 1:1). Yet the author's identity remains a contested issue of modern scholarship. Two critical issues are at stake in this continuing discussion: who is this "James" referred to in the letter's address, and is he necessarily the author of the book? The evidence that may settle these issues is historical and lacking: we have no other writing from James by which to compare its literary style and subject matter; nor do we have a reliable contemporary of the author who confirms the author's identity.

Even if one agrees that the book's superscription identifies its "real" author, there are still several Christian leaders named James to choose from, including six mentioned in the NT. Some have even added an "unknown James" to this list (Moffatt), only by sheer conjecture. Among those named by Scripture are two apostles,* making them especially attractive candidates because of the close historical connection between canonicity (see Canon) and apostolicity, a point embraced for a time in the West, where some thought the book was written by the apostle James, son of Alphaeus (cf. Mk 3:18; Acts 1:13). Yet memory of his apostolic ministry outside of Scripture is lacking. In any case an apostolic credential does not seem required for the author: the book's address does not appeal to an apostolic office for personal authorization but rather to the more modest relationship to God and the Lord Jesus as their "servant." Origen and Jerome even held that no apostle could have written James, which disagrees so thoroughly with Pauline thought—a point followed by Luther centuries later.

Most scholars suppose the only viable candidate remains "James the Just," the brother of Jesus (see Relatives of Jesus), a verdict that has modest support from ancient tradition (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.23.4). While he was not one of the Twelve,* the biblical portrait of James commends him as a significant leader in earliest Jewish Christianity.* Jesus even singled him out following the resurrection* (1 Cor 15:7), apparently for an important ministry (see Gos. Heb. 7). It is not surprising, then, that Acts* introduces James as Peter's successor in Jerusalem* (Acts 12:17; Wall 1991, "Successors"), whose pastoral leadership over the Jerusalem church became increasingly strategic, first at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:13-21) and then during his relations with Paul (Acts 21:17-26). Paul himself named James as the first of three "pillars" of the Jewish church (Gal 2:9), whose continuing observance of circumcision and laws* of ritual purity undermined the gospel* of his Gentile mission* in Antioch* (Gal 2:11-15).

In fact the robust memories of James the Just were preserved well into the second century by the Jewish church, who viewed him the model disciple (Martin, xli-lxi). Eusebius even cites Hegesippus, a second-century Jewish believer from Jerusalem, who describes in some detail the moral and religious superiority of James (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.23.4). Indeed, a substantial body of apocryphal* (largely gnostic*) Christian writings, written in his name by pseudepigraphers during the second and third centuries (1 and 2 Apoc. Jas.; Ap. Jas.; Protev. (= Book) Jas.; also, Gos. Heb., Epis. Pet.), promote an exemplary, if not legendary, James whose vital piety and ascetic lifestyle corrected a church that had become too secular and middle-class for the taste of its more conservative Jewish and gnostic constituencies (Wall and Lemcio, 250-71). Almost certainly the canonizing church envisaged this James as the James of the biblical letter's address. Only his witness to Christ and abiding authority* within earliest Christianity, singular among possible candidates, justify the canonical status accorded this controversial composition. Thus W. G. Kümmel concludes, "Without doubt James claims to be written by [the brother of Jesus], and even if the letter is not authentic, it appeals to this famous James and the weight of his person as authority for its content" (Kümmel, 412).

1.2. Authorial Style and Subject Matter. Did "this famous James" write the book in his name? A majority of modern scholars think not and favor a postapostolic date and pseudonymity,* even though there are significant allusions to James already in 1 Clement and Hermas at the end of the first century (Davids, 8-9). They suppose the composition's superior Koine Greek and literary artistry, as well as the author's substantial knowledge of current Hellenistic philosophy, lie beyond the ability and provenance of this working-class Jew from Galilee (Reicke, Laws). James may have even employed a trusted and well-educated amanuensis, or secretary, a common practice then, who knew Greek well and who transcribed James's pastoral exhortations into a more suitable idiom and literary form for a wider Greek-speaking audience (Mitton) while retaining their original Semitic "flavor" (cf. Mussner).

This compromise solution is hardly necessary. One need only appeal to the mounting evidence that demonstrates a fairly active social intercourse between Hellenistic and Palestinian cultures during the late Second Temple period. Religious Jews, especially in Galilee, may well have been anti-Hellenistic during the days immediately before and after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (see Judaism); however, Jew and Greek intermingled, if a little uneasily. Thus Acts describes a Jerusalem congregation that included Greek-speaking Jews and a pastor (James) who cites the Greek translation (LXX) of Scripture when instructing them (Acts 15:17-18; cf. Jas 4:6). Sharply put, James grew up in a Hellenized Jewish culture where Greek was used and perhaps learned well enough to write this book.

Others contend that the epistolary writer could not be the brother of Jesus, whose biblical portrait values aspects of the Jewish law that finally disagree with the thrust of the letter (Kümmel). This objection too has little merit. A growing number of scholars think that the Jewish-Christian theological cast and pastoral intentions of the letter mirror those same commitments of the biblical James. For example, his concerns for religious purity* (Acts 21) and for the public performance of the biblical torah (Gal 2) are central concerns of this book (Jas 1:22-27; 2:8-26); and his commitment to the poor, which Paul mentions in Galatians 2:10, also reflects an important theme of the book (Jas 1:9-11; 2:1-7; 5:1-6). Even the conciliatory James of Acts 15 seems consistent with the spirit that undergirds this letter. Likewise the traditions used by Luke to narrate the speech of James to the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:13-21) and the subsequent letter to Antioch (Acts 15:23-29) reveal a remarkable similarity in both substance and vocabulary to the letter of James (Adamson, 18-20; Oesterley). Further, the many apocalyptic* images and themes found throughout James fashion a sociology of suffering* and vindication similar to that of the Jerusalem community James pastored, according to Acts and the social world of first-century messianic Judaism. Noteworthy also are the many allusions to targumic and midrashic materials found in James, which follow his speech in Acts where James settles a crucial intramural conflict by a midrash on the biblical book of Amos (Acts 15:17-21).

The agreement between this James and the subject matter of the letter is also secured by more implicit evidence. Many suppose that dates of compositions can be calculated by images and ideas of Jesus, so that a more full-bodied or developed christology* is contained in a later composition. By this reasoning the scant references to Jesus in James (Jas 1:1; 2:1), which does not include even an apparent allusion to his atoning death (see Death of Christ), is more easily explicable if James was written in the middle of the first century.

Finally, however, the most important consideration in this matter is whether the author is responding to controversial elements of Paul's teaching, including the relationship between faith* and works (see Faith and Works), and law and liberty (see Freedom). Since these combinations are found neither in Jewish sources nor in the earliest Christian traditions of the NT, some scholars assume the author is responding to ideas found in Paul's writings and only after their publication toward the end of the first century when they came into a wider circulation (Holtzmann, Dibelius, Laws, Aland). Since James was executed in 62 by the Sadducean high priest Ananus II, these same scholars further presume that James the Just could not have written the letter of James.

Yet many are reluctant to find in favor of the author's dependence upon the writings of Paul. Some find it impossible that any Christian reader of Paul's writings would criticize him so openly, especially at the close of the first century or beginning of the second when his writings already were being recognized as "Scripture" (2 Pet 3:15-16). Still others find the issue of literary dependency indeterminate (Mayor, Davids, Martin). Even if James and Paul mean the same thing by "faith and works" or by "law and liberty," a view that remains contested among scholars, Paul could have as easily been responding to the kerygma* of Jerusalem Christianity (Spitta, Meyer), especially in his Romans and Galatians where numerous parallels are found. In support one may appeal to the well-known contention of G. Bornkamm that Paul wrote Romans as his "last will and testament" in order to recall and respond to the controversies generated by his missionary work, particularly among believers in Jerusalem (Donfried, 17-31). While the ideas and precise argument of James may not predate Paul's Gentile mission and his corpus of NT writings, their status in earliest Christianity may be more current and certain than is often supposed. In short there is no compelling reason to argue against the traditional position, which supposes a pre-Pauline date for this book and James the Just as its author (however, see 4. below).

1.3. Stages of Composition. Perhaps the persistent indeterminacy of this problem commends another solution that considers and integrates a wider field of available evidence. In this case J. Cantinat, more recently and cautiously followed by P. H. Davids, has suggested that the biblical form of James actually evolved in two discrete stages of composition (see Davids, 12-13). According to this hypothesis, James the Just is responsible for most of the book's raw material, delivered first as homilies and preserved by the Jewish Christian Diaspora (Jas 1:1; cf. Acts 8:4; 11:19). This may help explain the letter's "primitive" theological content.

These precious memories of James were then edited and written by another, probably (although not necessarily) after James's death, under the pressures of the educational mission of an expanding church.* The editor who actually wrote James may have done so without a religious agenda of his own: his intent was to compile and preserve the most enduring "sayings of James" for future readerships. If required at all, this conjecture may help explain the letter's articulation of Jacobean Christianity in the literary and intellectual idiom of Hellenistic culture.

Editors, however, are rarely this objective. Even editors who do not overlay a peculiar theological perspective on that of another still must select material from available traditions when composing a new work—a self-critical act of interpretation. Further, the reworking of old traditions is typically occasioned by the requirements of new readers. The letter's careful literary design and theological coherence seem to reflect this very sort of editorial decision-making: James is hardly the mere compilation of sayings, as some have suggested (see 3. below), or the exact copy of some former speech recalled. Indeed, if a two-stage composition is followed, one should probably assume that the editor had specific theological, sociological and literary intentions in mind, which are then reflected by the letter's final shape and subject matter.

For instance, the editor's arrangement of earlier traditions to combine Pauline catchwords (Jas 2:12-26) and to make strategic allusions to Jesus' ministry among the poor (Jas 2:1-5), along with the clever pairing of cited/alluded Scripture from Torah and wisdom* (Jas 1:19-27) and from the prophets* and wisdom (Jas 4:6-10; Jas 4:13—5:6), all intend to create a far richer context within which his audience could better hear and interpret the authoritative witness of James to the gospel. New audiences are addressed by a written composition unlike any sermon preached by James and in a fresh way that more effectively presents an inspired solution to their particular spiritual crisis. Even though the editor followed the core convictions of James the Just, his literary design accented certain theological convictions that were apropos for the new contingencies of his late first-century church, which occupied a very different geographical, linguistic and cultural turf than it did during the old days in Jerusalem. For these reasons the interpreter who decides in favor of the two-stage hypothesis of composition should consider the editor the "real" author of the Letter of James and the late first century its "true" date of composition.

2. The Audience(s) of James.

The letters of the NT are occasional literature, most often written to defend or nurture the tentative faith of immature audiences. While the author's advice only rarely takes a narrative form, every letter tells a story, however implicit, of an audience's struggle to confirm its faith. In the case of James, the story is plotted by the suffering of Jewish believers whose devotion to the Lord and to one another is tested by various kinds of conflicts, both spiritual and social.

2.1. Identity of the Audience. The precise identity of the first readers of James is indeterminate and opinion remains divided. Lacking specific details of the readers' identity, most exegetes are content to locate them in either of two places: post-Pauline Diaspora or in prewar (A.D. 66-70) Palestine-Syria.* All agree, however, that the proper place to begin this discussion is the letter's opening verse, which greets the audience as "the twelve tribes in the Diaspora." This enigmatic phrase, however finally understood, might then be employed to interpret subsequent references to the readership in the letter itself, resulting in a more detailed and focused picture.

If this opening phrase is taken at face value, the readers are probably Jewish believers ("twelve tribes") with an address in some Roman territory outside of Palestine ("in the Diaspora"), perhaps in Rome* (Laws), Alexandria* (Schneider) or even Syria (Davids) toward the end of Domitian's turbulent reign (Reicke). If, however, the phrase is taken metaphorically, the scope of possible meaning and setting is significantly widened. On this basis some have created complex settings of social and spiritual conflict, which are then confirmed by the images of hostility found throughout the book.

In fact a metaphorical reading of "the twelve tribes" certainly agrees with use of the phrase by other biblical writers. The biblical prophets, for instance, use the phrase (or "tribes of Israel") as a reference to a future, restored Israel* (Ezek 47:13, 22; Is 49:6; Zech 9:1). Paul contends that the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:16) is a spiritual rather than an ethnic people (cf. Rom 9—11; Gal 3—6) who belong to Christ (Rom 9:1-18) and are the true heirs of the biblical promise of salvation* (Gal 3:21-4:7; cf. Jas 2:5). In a similar way the audience of James consists of those whose primary identity appears religious and eschatological* rather than ethnic and national; that is, they form a spiritual people whose life is guided by God's word and whose destiny is the realization of God's promised blessing.*

The metaphorical use of "Diaspora"* is also attested in Jewish literature as a reference to believers, living in Palestine, but who are cut off from social and religious support systems (Overman; Maynard-Reid). In this case a reference to diasporic Jews need not place them in a geographical location but rather in a social world. Moreover, diasporic Jews were often driven from their homeland for political (e.g., criminals) and economic (e.g., unemployed workers or tax debtors) reasons; in this sense they were aliens both at home and abroad. Even in Palestine the "homeland" was typically in the hands of wealthy landowners (Jas 5:1) who controlled both the economic (Jas 5:4-6) and religious lives (Jas 2:2-7) of their poor workers, sometimes in venal and vicious ways (see 2.2 below).

In a similar way Scripture speaks of the Diaspora to accent this very kind of experience (cf. 1 Pet 1:1; Is 49:6) in which a people's present pain results from their separation from the plentiful land of divine blessing (whether land* of Israel or in heaven*). In a religious sense present suffering discloses one's status as "alien and stranger" but more significantly the absence of promised salvation that is still in the future. Indeed, this theological understanding of place adds another layer of meaning to "the twelve tribes," whose future inheritance of the kingdom's blessings ameliorates the trials and tribulations of their present exile.

The haunting ambivalence between the audience's present suffering in the Diaspora and its future restoration as the twelve tribes underscores the spiritual crisis that has occasioned the writing and reading of this composition. Its thesis neatly follows: Even though belonging to the redeemed and restored Israel, believers continue to face the hardships and heartaches of the Diaspora that test their devotion to God (Jas 1:2-3). Their possible spiritual failure carries this future consequence: the forfeiture of promised blessing (Jas 1:12-15); the passing of their spiritual testing, enabled by divine wisdom, ensures the community's future salvation (Jas 1:16-21). The community's joyful consideration of present suffering (Jas 1:2), then, has in mind the prospect of a future restoration, when all is made complete and perfect and when nothing is lacked (Jas 1:4).

2.2. Social and Spiritual Worlds of the Audience. References to the first readers of this letter, however vague and even opaque, supply several details about the nature of the conflict that may help us tell their unrecorded story. Clearly they are believers (Jas 1:2) who are members of a Jewish Christian synagogue* (Jas 2:1-2), who aspire to be "rich in faith" as heirs of the promised kingdom* (Jas 2:5) and at the same time pursue worldly pleasures that they lack (Jas 4:1-5). A measure of their current suffering is due to their poverty: they are a congregation of "humble" means (Jas 1:9-11; cf. 4:6-10), composed of members from the working-class poor (Jas 5:1-6) and from other social groups who are most neglected (Jas 1:27; cf. Acts 6:1-6), most oppressed (Jas 2:1-7; cf. Gal 2:9-10) and most poor (Jas 2:14-17).

Their enemies are the landed rich (Jas 5:1) and merchant middle class (Jas 4:13) who are members of a Jewish congregation attached to the local synagogue (Jas 2:2-4; cf. 1:9). However, their exploitation of the poor, their greed and maliciousness, which so fundamentally offend the moral essentials of their own biblical tradition (Jas 2:8-10), fortify the author's polemic against them: they are foolish to look in the "mirror" (= biblical law) and then turn away from it (Jas 1:22-24) without any further reflection of their own frailty (or their riches, Jas 5:1-3) under the eternal light of God's will (Jas 4:14-17) and the imminent coming of God's judgment* (Jas 5:4-6, 7-9). Indeed, they have become "outsiders" (Jas 2:6-7) to God's reign (Jas 2:5) who no longer belong to "the twelve tribes" and cannot look forward in joy* to their complete restoration. In demonstration of their outsider status they oppress the impoverished members of the Christian congregation (Jas 2:2), even using their political clout to exploit the working-class poor (Jas 5:1-6) and to demand favorable verdicts against them from the law court (Jas 2:6-7) and the synagogue court (Jas 2:3-4; Ward).

These outside pressures have created tensions inside the congregation that threaten its present unity and eschatological survival. The conflict that rages between believers is pluriform: some disregard their own poor in favor of the rich and powerful outsiders (Jas 1:22—2:26); abusive speech between rival teachers undermines their teaching* ministry and the congregation's spiritual formation (Jas 3:1-18); and hostilities between believers (Jas 4:1-2) and finally toward God (Jas 4:7-10) have their source in their frustration of not having the material goods they passionately desire (Jas 4:3-6).

Perhaps more troubling than this class conflict between rich and poor, which in turn threatens the solidarity of the congregation, is the spiritual or psychological conflict that threatens the believers' relationship with God. These same trials also occasion doubt about God's generosity (Jas 1:5-8) or even the self-destructive deception that God is to blame for the bad news of human life (Jas 1:13-16). Perhaps anxiety for personal safety prompts some believers to suppose that glib confessions of orthodox faith are sufficient for God's approval (Jas 1:22-27; 2:14-20), substituting them for a morally rigorous life that responds in mercy to the poor and powerless when they are exploited by the rich and influential (Jas 2:1-13; 2:21-26). An inward passion for lacking pleasure (Jas 4:1-2) gives one up to a consuming desire for things at the cost of relationships with God (Jas 4:6-12) and neighbor (Jas 4:3-5). Spiritual failure results from theological deception, when a faulty view of the word of God yields bad decisions and ultimately prevents participation in the new order (Jas 1:17-21; 2:12-13; 3:14-16; 4:11-12).

2.3. Social and Spiritual Tensions. To specify a locale in the first-century Roman world, whether Hellenistic or Palestinian, is extremely difficult to do with any precision. For this reason some continue to follow Dibelius's lead and contend that this form of literature (paraenesis) resists any reference to a particular historical contingency that may have occasioned the writing and first reading of this composition. One can speak perhaps of a moral culture that this literature helps to shape by its advice, which fixes the community's socioreligious borders within any hostile environment (Perdue, Elliot). Perhaps even the apocalyptic images found throughout this composition perform this same social role—images that anticipate a new cultural order that promises an alternative, more hospitable homeland for a poor and powerless people (Wall 1990).

Nevertheless, some continue to investigate James for a particular historical Sitz im Leben (life setting). The traditional position locates both the author and his audience in prewar Palestine; the details gathered from the letter fit this setting well (Davids, 28-34). Of course, no one who accepts a literal Diaspora would subscribe to this provenance. Further, while the images and metaphors of nature are brought to sharper focus against a Palestinian backdrop (Hadidian), S. S. Laws, for one, remains unconvinced by this evidence and counters by pointing to Greek literature for similar images, even as F. Mussner points to Scripture as the source of these images.

However, if the diasporic setting is viewed as a metaphor of spiritual or social dislocation, the references to class strife between rich and poor proffers a more convincing line of evidence for a Palestinian provenance (Maynard-Reid). In Palestine, as throughout the Roman world, rural land and wealth were concentrated in the hands of a few wealthy farmers (Jas 5:1). Middle-class merchants (Jas 4:13) could but dream of a future when they too could take their place among the landed gentry and share their life of luxury. Toward that end the merchants worked with the large landowners to control the agrarian marketplace, which only made the workers more dependent upon the landowner and the independent farmer's situation more difficult to endure.

Very little upward mobility was enjoyed between these classes, since Rome (see Roman Empire) maintained a stratified society as a means of managing the masses. While the continuing exploitation of the poor by the merchant-farmer coalition was not encouraged by Rome, for fear of a worker strike, it was tolerated in order to maintain the fragile prosperity of the region. Especially during times of famine (see Jas 5:17-18; Acts 11:27-30), the economic pressures of field hands and harvesters became more intense and their economic well-being more precarious as landowners tried to maximize their profits (Jas 4:4-6). The result is that some lacked even the basic requirements of a humane existence (see Jas 2:15-16). The great majority of the Palestinian population was thus confined to working-class ghettos, living a hand-to-mouth existence without any hope of an improved life. Such historical determinism either gave rise to social rage and the potential of peasant rebellion or to religious sentiment deeply rooted in a "piety of poverty" and apocalyptic hope.

In addition, Martin contends, James was written for a community of poor people and their religious leaders who were suffering under Sadducean rule. His argument recognizes Josephus's* historical record that James was executed in 62 by Ananus II, a Sadducean priest, at the height of tensions with the Jerusalem church; James might be read as another kind of record of that episode. His contention also makes considerable sense not only of the economic conflict mentioned in the letter (Jas 5:1-6; 2:6-7), since the landed aristocracy was essentially Sadducean if even religious, but also of the book's theological cast, since Sadducees also observed Torah (Jas 1:22-25; 2:8-13) and were deeply fearful of any apocalyptic-messianic movement—to which the readers of James belong (Jas 2:1; Martin, lxiv-lxv). However, unlike the Zealots, whose apocalypticism the Sadducees feared most of all, James takes his readers in a more spiritual and less violent direction, so that the struggles of the poor against the rich are then internalized as spiritual warfare with materialism (Jas 4:1-5).

2.4. Theological Tensions. Those who posit the audience within a Hellenistic culture tend to describe the audience's struggle in ideological rather than in sociological terms. The most interesting suggestion places the audience in a Roman (Laws, Deppe) or perhaps Corinthian (Syreeni) congregation, where the tensions are theological and between Jewish and Gentile believers. Common themes shared by the whole church, such as law and liberty, faith and works, perfection and wisdom, are now explored by James to distinguish more carefully between the two different Christian missions and their kerygmata (cf. Gal 2:7; Rom 16:3-4). For example, in Paul the "faith in and of Jesus Christ" is redemptive (Rom 3:22; Gal 3:22) whenever confessed (Rom 10:9-10), whereas for James the "faith of Jesus Christ" asserts an ethical* principle (Jas 2:1)—do not favor the rich over the poor (Jas 2:2-11)—which is redemptive when practiced (Jas 2:12-13, 14-26).

The conflict between rich (= outsider) and poor (= insider) symbolizes the conflict between competing ideologies. The poor (= Jewish believers) are true heirs of the promised kingdom (Jas 2:5), while the salvation of the wealthy (= Gentile believers) is less certain, a view that seems to retain but reverse the sense of Paul's commentary on the same conflict (1 Cor 8-10; Rom 14). There are social and even economic results of this theological battle, which Paul notes. For example, his warning about settling intramural conflicts in civil court (1 Cor 6:1-6) is vaguely similar to James 2:6-7.

The intense tones of this conflict found in James 5:1-6 are not easily explained by this Sitz im Leben. Even if such a setting fails to explain the data, however, the thematic parallels between James and Paul and the dialogic manner by which they are related together may well provide the raw material for a more robust theological reflection (see 4 below).

2.5. A Way of Wisdom. T. B. Cargal has called attention to the interplay between the book's opening address to those "in the Diaspora" and its concluding exhortation to those who "wander from the truth" (Jas 5:19-20). He proposes that the literary architecture of James is that of an inverted parallelism, with James 1:1 and James 5:19-20 providing the outside boundaries for the exhortations found within. In this sense the "Diaspora" is located wherever immature believers are found who have "scattered" from the truth; the exhortations are to encourage their repentance and restoration in order to guide them back into the "homeland," which is the eschatological reign of God.

The ultimate importance of this address is not to identify the geographical location of first readers but rather to give shape to their theological location. Indeed, the audience of this book includes all those who find themselves pushed, pulled and moved away from the truth as Christian faith defines it. They are those who have been marginalized and alienated from the cultural order because of their piety and now question whether this testing of faith is worth their devotion to God. This book supplies a way of wisdom by which scattered believers are led back into the faith.

3. The Literature of James.

3.1. James as Exhortation. Most scholars accept with some qualification Dibelius's important form-critical conclusion that James is a paraenesis, a genre of ancient moral literature characterized by various collections of moral sayings and essays, loosely held together by common themes and linking catchwords but without literary rhyme, theological reason or specific social location. The dominant mood of paraenesis is imperative; the primary exhortation is to live a virtuous life. Readers are often reminded of moral truth that all should accept (e.g., Jas 1:19; 3:1-8; 4:3-4) and of heroic exemplars (e.g., Jesus, Abraham, Rahab, Job, Elijah) whom all should imitate.

Even if one allows that James exhibits the conventions of paraenetic literature and has wide appeal, its final shape frames a carefully orchestrated witness to God that compels a faithful (and Christian) response to its claims. Since Dibelius, several have demonstrated that the composition develops along the lines of a specific rhetorical strategy (Wuellner, Cargel, Johnson, Watson) that argues for a specific theological point (Mussner, Hoppe). Johnson, who contends that James must be approached as an oral presentation, argues for a thematic and literary coherence that is organized by two competing worldviews between "friendship with the world" and "friendship with God" (1995, 13-15).

3.2. James as an Epistle. James may also be studied as epistolary literature (Francis; see Letters). Even though omitting many features of the Pauline (or Hellenistic) epistolary form, the structure of James is still vaguely parallel to other NT letters: it opens with an address (Jas 1:1) followed by a thesis statement (Jas 1:2-21) that both clarifies the letter's occasion and introduces the author's advice. It then sets forth various exhortations and oaths that promote Christian piety (Jas 5:7-8, 9-11, 12, 13-18), before the real purpose for writing is stated (Jas 5:19-20). Sandwiched between the opening thesis statements and concluding exhortations is the letter's main body (Jas 1:22—5:6), comprised of three extended essays on the wisdom of "quick to hear" (Jas 1:22—2:26), "slow to speak" (Jas 3:1-18) and "slow to anger" (Jas 4:1—5:6), which communicates more fully its pastoral message to an embattled readership.

Clearly the literary form of the main body of James differs in convention and substance when compared with the Pauline letters. However, its function is precisely the same: to provide the readers with a powerful interpretation of their present spiritual crisis and to offer them a practical solution that encourages their future salvation (see 4. below).

3.3. James as Wisdom Literature. The question of sources remains a thorny one: from whence comes this book's understanding of wisdom? In my view, wisdom is the orienting concern of this book by which all else is understood: after all, James refers to wisdom as the divine "word of truth," which is graciously provided to a faithful people to make sense of their trials and to guide them through those trials in order to insure their future destiny in the new creation (cf. Martin, lxxxii-lxxxiv). A strong case has been made that James shares in the moral world of the Greco-Roman world (Laws, Kee): the virtue of the community of the wise is aptly demonstrated during personal testing, when the actions of the wise result in personal and divine blessing (see Johnson 1995, 27-29). The well-known contrast between professions of trust and an embodied faith may be less a response to Pauline teaching and more a reflection of the contrast between eloquent speech and moral action found among certain Hellenistic moralists such as Epictetus.

The characteristics of a virtuous life, concentrated by the catalog found in James 3:17 and complemented by the book's accent on a life of patience, perfection, consistency and self-control, are common themes among current moral philosophies (esp. Stoicism and Cynicism).

This article will seek to understand this same moral calculus and its various topoi under the light of Jewish wisdom literature. The theological subject matter of James is profoundly biblical, and the Greco-Roman literary patterns and moral topoi found in this composition are subsumed by the author's biblical vision. Morality, according to James, is concentrated by a believer's faith in God. It is not a virtue ethic, then, whose failure is vice and self-destruction. Rather it is a theological ethic, since the lack of wisdom threatens the believer's relations with God and imperils the prospect of future blessing in God's coming reign on earth. For this reason James fits much more comfortably in Scripture than in an anthology of Hellenistic moral philosophy.

Of course, these two sources, Hellenistic and biblical, are not dissimilar in either form or content and are found integrated in Jewish intertestamental writings such as Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon, which no doubt formed a part of the wisdom tradition this author inherited. There are frequent parallels to the writings of Philo.* James is a traditional wisdom, and its sensibilities are Jewish more than Greco-Roman. In passage after passage the crucial subtexts of this composition are not Greco-Roman but biblical—a perspective recently defended in L. T. Johnson's commentary on James (1995).

For this reason the interpreter seeks after the relationship between James and its principal subtexts in Scripture rather than in the writings of Greco-Roman moralists and philosophy: James offers one tradent's reading of biblical wisdom (Jas 1:19; see 6 below). The overarching interpretive strategy of James is sapiential in that nonwisdom and extrabiblical traditions are strained through the filter of Jewish wisdom. In this sense, then, the testing addressed by James is spiritual and not personal, and this "way of wisdom" promises eschatological blessing (Jas

1:12) for those who live and act under the light of the Lord's coming triumph (Jas 2:5; 5:7-9).

3.4. James as Midrash. James is midrashic literature. While several exegetes have discovered fragments of existing Jewish midrashim employed by James (e.g., Ward, Johnson), few go as far as M. Gertner, who claims that the whole of James is a midrash on Psalm 12. More modest is the suggestion of L. T. Johnson, who finds examples of a halakic midrash on Leviticus 19 throughout James that both anchors and warrants its moral vision (Johnson 1982).

Contemporary literary theory uses "midrash" as a metaphor of a literary text's reflexive interplay with another, earlier text. That is, a literary text is midrashic insofar as it interprets an earlier text as part of its own redaction and argumentation for a new audience and its particular situation. In this sense the primary indicator of biblical midrash is not a certain form of literature (e.g., halakic) that is produced by following certain rabbinical rules for commenting upon Scripture. Rather, the primary indicator is a text's intertextuality,* when the reader of a biblical text recognizes its citation, allusion or echo of another, earlier biblical text that then completes and commends its meaning. In my reading of the intertextuality of midrash, biblical texts echo other biblical texts as literary cues that point us to those stories or topoi, persons or places in order to construct a fuller biblical context within which the strong interpreter reflects upon the theological meaning of the passage under analysis.

With this understanding of midrash in mind, then, similar words and ideas found in different parts of Scripture are cited, alluded to and echoed in James and add a rich subtexture to its message—a message that is framed by a reflexive, mutually enriching conversation between James and these other biblical voices. Sometimes a meaningful contour is added to James by what is lacking from a biblical allusion. For example, the carefully worded reference to Rahab in James 2:25 presumes by what it omits that the reader knows the details of her story as told in Joshua 2. In this way James need not even mention Rahab's faith since her biblical story asserts that the works of her hospitality* are the real stuff of true religion. Thus I have come to read James as the literary product of an author whose "canon consciousness" (see Canon) first elevates the status of his Bible as the central symbol of his religious life and then routinely appeals to it, sometimes in subtle ways, to justify the moral authority of what he advises his readership to be and do.

The dynamic quality of an intertextual reading of James is envisaged even when the exegete narrows one's frame of reference to the *intra*textuality of the book of James itself. Following the lead of G. Lindbeck (see The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age [Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984]), the full meaning of James is discovered when a text is analyzed within (intra-) the literary and theological context of the composition, when the composition itself serves as the privileged medium of its own interpretation. In this sense the book of James is approached as an autonomous text that supplies its own special "grammar," which makes sense of its own "text-constituted world" (Lindbeck, 136). From this intratextual perspective, then, a fuller meaning of its most important catchwords can be discerned by their repetition in different locations of the argument (for example, follow the author's use of "perfect" [Jas 1:4, 17, 25; 2:22; 3:2; cf. 2:8; 5:11]). These words acquire new and enlarged meanings by their repeated use, while at the same time their prior uses alert the interpreter to possible meanings that may well be obscured by their new literary and linguistic context. This literary feature of James is especially important, since it provides a kind of literary coherence that otherwise has seemed lacking to some.

Both features of the literary art of James mentioned above are also important features of persuasive speech in the Greco-Roman literary culture (see Rhetoric), which also contributed to the shaping of this composition's main body (Watson). Clearly the repetition of key words and ideas in a composition was one such feature of ancient rhetorical writing and speaking. By repeating catchwords throughout a composition or speech, for example, an author like the writer of James could both organize and relate together different sections of a composition for his auditors. Especially important in this regard is the reflexive character of repetition, so that subsequent uses of a word or phrase would naturally expand and clarify how an auditor or a reader should understand an important thematic interest of the composition as a whole.

The use of prophetic exemplars in James also follows ancient rhetorical practice. In the case of James, references to familiar biblical personages (Abraham, Rahab, Job, Elijah) not only provided authoritative examples in support of the thesis—these were those who passed their spiritual tests. They provided role models for an eschatological community—these were those who received promised blessings from God. The use of these exemplars in James is more than rhetorical, since each calls attention to a biblical story that provides the primary subtext that in turn deepens the point James scores.

3.5. Literary Sources. The author's possible knowledge and use of NT traditions (specifically those found in the Synoptic Gospels and in the Pauline and Petrine letters*) remains debated. While there are significant linguistic and thematic parallels between James and the major letters of Paul (Syreeni) and 1 Peter* (Davids)—more numerous and certain than most scholars care to admit—the question of literary dependence remains indeterminate (see 1 above). The same can be said of the possible appropriation by James of Jesus sayings found in Q (Hartin 1991) and then in Luke (Davids) and especially Matthew (Shepherd). In fact the parallels between James and Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (par. Luke and Q) are remarkably close (Mayor, lxxxii-lxxxiv; Mussner, 47-52; Shepherd; cf. Hartin 1993; see Jesus Traditions). However, D. D. Deppe argues against a pre-Synoptic source by contending that the parallel sayings in James evince an even more primitive source and have in any case a different literary form and function than they do for Q and the Synoptic Evangelists. In any case B. Witherington correctly contends that James exhibits a more conventional, less prophetic theological conception than found on the lips of the Synoptic Jesus (Witherington, 236-47).

4. A Canonical Approach to James.

The canonical approach to biblical interpretation is interested in reading the whole of Scripture as the church's authoritative (or canonical) witness* to God and so formative and normative of the church's understanding of God (Wall 1995). The interpreter recognizes this theological role more clearly when reflecting upon Scripture within its biblical and ecclesiastical contexts rather than in terms of the conventions of its "original" historical or literary environments. While historical and literary reconstructions of the "original" James have had some value in determining the full meaning of a biblical text, to presume that critical historical investigation determines its normative meaning is mistaken. The principal property of the biblical text is neither historical nor literary but theological. For the exegete to locate this composition within its first-century milieu and to fix its meaning there is to mistake the true referent of the biblical witness who is God. If the interpreter's orienting concern toward Scripture is its authorized roles within the church, then all the various tasks and exegesis and interpretation will seek to understand a biblical writing as a resource for theological reflection and understanding.

Within its particular biblical Sitz im Leben the book of James supplies a distinctive and complementary witness to God, so that it functions neither as the single articulation of God's biblical word nor as an atonal voice that must be excluded from the chorus of voices that together harmonize on the word of God. In this sense Christian faith is distorted by not taking the distinctive witness of James seriously. The special significance of this book's particular witness to God is best understood in relationship to the witnesses of other biblical books and collections, precisely because each understands God in different, although complementary, ways and forms if finally by "mutual criticism" a more objective and discriminating faith.

Besides this overarching perspective on the study of Scripture, important guidance is provided the interpreter by the title that introduces a book within its discrete canonical collection; by the arrangement of canonical writings within the canon as a whole; by the final literary form of a composition that best articulates that variety of God's word; by the author's use of his Scripture as a decisive clue to how the canonical audience should read his book as Scripture; and by the history of its interpretation, whenever a biblical writing "becomes canonical" as faithful interpreters pick it up again and again to comfort the afflicted or afflict the comfortable.

4.1. Title. Titles are properties of the canonical process and as such are indicators of a theological tradition and a practical role that continues to exercise authority in forming the faith and witness of Scripture's current readerships. Even if one is not convinced that James should be read as a literary letter, the ancient church recognized its divine inspiration precisely when using it as a letter. Thus the inscription, Iakbou Epistolē ("the letter of James"), is added to this nonletter (or at least a literary letter different from those written by the Pauline school [see Pauline School]) to fit it into a wider collection of epistolary writings, all of which share a similar role in nurturing the faith of believers; that is, letters function as pastoral vehicles of instruction and exhortation, written for believers whose worship* of God is threatened by personal hardship or theological confusion. The canonical audience orients itself to James from this perspective to read it as Christian Scripture.

The importance of authorship statements in the address of a biblical letter is not exclusively historical; rather, names found in titles and greetings also locate compositions in particular theological traditions, each of which provides an authoritative witness to God's saving activity in Christ Jesus. This particular title locates the composition of James in a particular genre of literature to underscore its practical role in forming Christian faith; it also places the theological subject matter of James in a particular theological tradition—that belonging to James of Jerusalem, the brother of Jesus. In turn the name of James, found in both its biblical title and epistolary address, assigns this writing to the revelation tradition founded by James—that is, a conservative variety of Jewish Christianity.

4.2. Placement Within the Canon. The placement of the letters within the NT and then of James among them is suggestive of the role this book continues to perform as part of the biblical canon. James is placed within a second collection of NT letters. While the relation between the four NT Gospels has long been a topic of scholarly investigation, few have considered the relationship between the two collections of NT letters as significant: what possible relationship do the non-Pauline letters have with the Pauline in forming our theological understanding (the intended role of Scripture), and how might this consideration aid the interpreter in discerning the special role James might perform within the Christian Bible?

Especially within Protestantism, primary attention has been concentrated upon the Pauline collection to investigate not only the meaning of individual letters but also the relationship between them. Partial justification for this keen interest in Paul's witness to the gospel is claimed by the ordering of the letters, since the Pauline corpus comes first. Yet this very Pauline priority has also led to a reductionism in the study of the second, non-Pauline collection of letters. For example, James is typically viewed as envisaging either a Pauline faith, although in alternative wording, or an anti-Pauline faith. In either case the more complementary character of the intracanonical relationship between James and Paul is seriously distorted, as is their integral witness to God's gospel.

Accordingly one may suggest that a critical role performed by the second collection of (non-Pauline) letters is to enhance our understanding of the first (Pauline) by provision of an apparatus of checks and balances that prevents distortion of the full gospel (Wall 1992, 208-71). In light of the history of its interpretation, the interpreter is especially challenged to listen to James for a different voice from that heard when reading Paul. However, it is neither the voice of a ventriloquist nor the voice of an adversary but that of a colleague whose new perspective adds and even supplies a necessary balance to what has already been read and accepted from Paul (see 5 below).

4.3. The Canonical Audience. Even though their readerships constantly change, biblical letters allow for the continual adaptation of their practical message to every generation of believers. There is no guarantee that the current readers of James participate in any of the ancient worlds occupied by its first readers; nor should we expect to recover the full meaning of the words that James originally wrote. Precisely because James is canonical Scripture, readers must not interpret its meaning as belonging to a distant past. Not only does its central theme of spiritual testing seem pertinent, but readers often number themselves among the rich and powerful who disregard the powerless or among the powerless who require and are given God's support against the powerful. James sometimes exposes the foolishness of believers who substitute facile confession for an embodied devotion to God or use malicious words to gain an advantage over a rival—both important topics of James. The wise words of James may sound a prophetic tone, sharply critical of business as usual and often inviting our repentance or a pastoral tone for those in need of the gospel's assurance. The point is this: the book of James has found a place in Scripture not only because it provides us trustworthy contours of our understanding about God but also because it illumines our walk before God especially when considered an integral part of an inspired whole.

5. The Gospel According to James.

5.1. A Portrait of God. The old critical conclusion that James is not a theological writing has waned in recent years. At the very least, most scholars now acknowledge the importance of theological images and themes in communicating the message of this book. For instance, the portrait of God that James envisages is rather robust. God is Creator* who rules over all things (Jas 1:17) and who promises a new cosmic order (Jas 1:18) that is remade perfect and complete, lacking in nothing (Jas 1:4). In preparation for the coming triumph of the Creator, God gives only good gifts to the faith community (Jas 1:13-17), especially the gift of wisdom (Jas 1:5-6; 3:17), which is able to "save their souls" (Jas 1:21; 3:18). God also receives petitions for wisdom (Jas 1:5; 4:3) and healing* (Jas 5:13-18). God is faithful to the promise of salvation (Jas 2:5; 4:6-10) and will reverse the status of the faithful poor and powerless in the coming age (Jas 1:9-11; 2:1-5). Because God is Savior and Judge of all creation (Jas 2:12-13; 4:11-12, 13-17; 5:1-9), God is worshiped (Jas 3:9-10; 4:7-10) and God's law obeyed (Jas 1:22-27).

5.2. A Story of God's Salvation. Biblical scholarship has recently underscored the narrative aspect of Scripture's theological subject matter—in J. Sanders's tidy phrase, "God has a story too" (Sanders 1979). The functional importance of this line of inquiry is twofold. First, it supplies biblical theologians with a framework for building a comprehensive and coherent treatment of Scripture's theological subject matter. Second, foundational stories function to facilitate a more personal and immediate identification between the biblical narrative and its contemporary audience.

One fruitful effort in this regard is by R. Hays, who contends that Paul's theological vision is narrative in cast. According to Hays, Paul's core theological convictions comprise a sequence of six events, beginning with God's promise of blessing to Abraham* and concluding with the Lord's Second Coming. Between are those episodes that constitute the "Christ event," climaxed by Jesus's messianic death and resurrection* and their results in the faith community. While the Pauline accents are distinctive within the NT, the narrative theology of other contributors to the biblical canon, including James, follows a similar story line. Like Hays, E. E. Lemcio has isolated the basic ingredients of a "unifying kerygma" in every canonical unit (i.e., Gospels, Acts, Letters, Apocalypse) of the NT.

The fourfold Gospel frames and founds Scripture with a narrative substructure; that is, this story of Jesus becomes the interpreter's foundational presupposition in understanding the practical advice given and theological claims made by every subsequent book of the NT. From this perspective as well, James shares with other biblical writers a common story of God's salvation through Jesus Christ, which provides the structure and supplies the subject matter of a fully integrated biblical theology.

The story's inaugural event is (1) God's election of a people to save. James understands divine election in terms of social class: God chooses the poor as heirs of the promised kingdom (Jas 2:5). Their inheritance of the blessing first promised to the children of Abraham is not conditioned upon their national or ethnic identity but upon their devotion to God, whether they are "rich in faith" (cf. Jas 1:12; 2:5) as embodied by merciful deeds (Jas 2:8-26).

(2) God sends an agent of salvation into the world in order to free people from the results of their sin. According to James, God "gives" "the word of truth" to these pious poor in order to enable the passing of their spiritual tests (Jas 1:2-3) and to restore them as part of the coming order (Jas 1:4, 17-18). The subject matter of the divine word is proverbial wisdom (Jas 1:5), which demands that the community be "quick to hear, slow to speak and slow to anger" (Jas 1:19; see 6 below). This word of wisdom is capable of saving the community (Jas 1:21; 3:17-18) from all the foolishness (Jas 1:16) and filthiness (Jas 1:21) that bring forth death (Jas 1:14-15; 3:14-16; 5:19-20).

(3) God's word is disclosed in the messianic "faith of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Jas 2:1). Unlike Paul, who understands the faith of Jesus in terms of his messianic death and resurrection, James understands the faith of Jesus as exemplary of an observed wisdom ("the word of truth"). In particular Jesus' devotion to God is confirmed by his just treatment of the poor neighbor, which God demands according to the "royal" law (Jas 2:8; cf. 1:27).

(4) The divine word, already made known in Scripture's wisdom and exemplified by Jesus, illumines "the way" to divine blessing for any believer who asks God for it (Jas 1:5) and does not doubt its efficacy (Jas 1:6-8). Further, this same word has taken root within (Jas 1:21) and so marks out the boundaries of the elect community of the poor (Jas 1:27). Membership in this community, and with it the prospect of future blessing, is maintained by those who observe the word (Jas 1:22-25; cf. 4:13-17), who teach it without jealousy (Jas 3:1-18) and who resist those internal passions that undermine its performance (Jas 4:1-10; cf. 1:14-15).

(5) The current crisis that provokes spiritual testing is occasioned by every struggle of remaining faithful to God in an anti-God world (Jas 1:2-3; 3:13-16). In the present situation, when the community's suffering indicates a real "lack" of God's good intentions for creation, James contends that the word of proverbial wisdom empowers the passing of the spiritual test, so that the "first fruits" of a new creation might even now be demonstrated in the community's life together (Jas 1:18; 3:17-18). In this restricted sense, the witness of the wise community anticipates the coming age: the true and approved religion is an ethical people, whose witness to God is measured by the purity of its collective and personal life (Jas 1:27; 2:14-16). Thus it is finally the public works of wisdom, which demands the community's merciful treatment of its own poor (Jas 1:22—2:26), purity of speech among its word brokers (Jas 3:1-18) and a denial of materialistic affections among its aspiring middle class (Jas 4:1—5:6) that form the essential identity of an eschatological people.

(6) The community's hope is concentrated by the story's conclusion, the Lord's imminent Parousia* from heaven (5:7-9), which ushers into history the ultimate good and perfecting gift from above. At this climactic "any-moment" the eschatological community will be confirmed and vindicated: God will judge the foolish and bless the wise (Jas 2:13; 4:11-12; 5:4-6; 5:7-9; cf. Mt 7:24-27). James and Paul substantially agree on this final event. Both agree that divine judgment and blessing are finally creational activities, which bring about the new order of things (Jas 1:4; 1:18; 3:18; 5:17-8). Both agree that the Lord's Parousia is imminent, so that the convictions of christological monotheism and the demands of public witness are made more urgently and embodied more readily. The time for repentance is short, because the time of judgment is at hand (Jas 5:7-9; 5:19-20).

6. The Argument of James.

6.1. Thematic Introduction (Jas 1:1-21). James is written to a community whose faith in God is threatened by a daily struggle with hardship (Jas 1:2-4). This "testing of faith" is provoked by a variety of external and historical circumstances or "trials." More importantly every test occasions a theological crisis, when the believer is more easily deceived or confused about who God is and how God acts (Jas 1:5-8). Within a crucible of theological reflection, largely internal and spiritual (Jas 1:13-15), a decision is called forth that ultimately measures the believer's "true" devotion to God, whether one is fit to participate in God's coming reign (Jas 1:12). To remain faithful to God in the present is the way to receive promised blessings from God in the future.

The community's decision for or against God is rooted in a sense of moral freedom. What form will this freedom take? On the one hand the wise believer loves God and trusts that God is a consistently loyal Father, who generously supplies the faith community with the "word of truth" that will guide the believer's pilgrimage on earth through the wilderness of trials and into the promised land of eternal life (Jas 1:16-18). The anticipated result of receiving this word, whose subject matter is proverbial wisdom (Jas 1:19-20), is an increased capacity to remain faithful to God during the testing of this age until the Lord comes in triumph over sin and death. The wise and faithful believer will enter into the coming age where all that is lacking is reversed and made perfect by the Creator, who alone completes humanity's material (Jas 1:9-11) and spiritual existence (Jas 1:21).

On the other hand the foolish Christian believes that God is disloyal to the promise of new life and actually is responsible for the community's hardships (Jas 1:13-16). The fool supposes that God is responsible for humanity's hardship and intends one's death; however, this deception results in refusing the merits of God's advice (cf. Jas 1:21). Such doubt gives birth to spiritual failure when facing present hardships, and the eschatological result of present spiritual failure is the forfeiture of the "crown of life" that is the blessing of all those who endure (Jas 1:12).

6.2. The Wisdom of "Quick to Hear" (Jas 1:22—2:26). In this first section of the main body of James, the wisdom of "quick hearing" is paired with biblical Torah: to "hear" is to "do the work" of Torah (Jas 1:22-25). More specifically the wisdom of "quick hearing" means to obey the levitical laws pertaining to the merciful treatment of the neighbor (Jas 1:26-27). This portion of the Torah is defined as the wise thing to do in order to address a situation in which the material needs of the poorest and most marginal members of the faith community are neglected. The occasion for this neglect is the favored treatment of rich and powerful outsiders in the legal proceedings of both the synagogue (Jas 2:2-4) and law courts (Jas 2:6-7). In this situation the biblical Torah demands jubilary justice in order to liberate the poor and powerless from their oppression (Jas 2:8-13).

The decision to favor these rich outsiders over poor insiders, even though perhaps a matter of short-term survival, fails the community's "test of faith" because God has in fact chosen the pious poor of the world to receive blessing (Jas 2:5). Further, favoritism of this sort envisages a compromise to the evils of the world order. Such is the nature of a theological failure that imperils the community's future salvation, which requires concrete works of mercy toward the poor (the social "diaspora"). Jesus was approved by God as "glorious Lord" (Jas 2:1) because he loved his poor and powerless neighbor according to the "royal law" (Jas 2:8). His example of divine mercy, which followed in the way of both ancestor Abraham (Jas 2:21-24) and prostitute Rahab (Jas 2:25), charts the way of wisdom for all which leads into eternal life.

The wise community is quick to hear and act upon what the Torah commands, knowing that it articulates God's will according to which all people will be either blessed or judged at the coming triumph of God's reign (Jas 2:12-13). If the Torah is centered on the command to love the neighbor, especially those who are like the "widow and orphan in distress," then it is foolish to favor the rich over the poor when the result is eternal retribution. According to Torah, faith in God is embodied by works of mercy: true religion is an ethical religion, not confessional orthodoxy (Jas 2:14-26). To profess devotion to God without a complement of merciful works is foolish (Jas 2:20). Such religion is worthless for either heralding or entering the age to come (Jas 2:17, 26).

6.3. The Wisdom of "Slow to Speak" (Jas 3:1-18). James's essay on the proverbial wisdom of "slow speaking" is especially suited for the "wilderness" (Jas 3:11-12), when the spiritual journey is most unstable (Jas 3:3-6), when the guidance of "wise and understanding" teachers (Jas 3:13) is most critical, but also when harsh things are more easily said. The peril of speech is made even more pointed by the inherent difficulty of controlling what is said (Jas 3:7-8).

Every social crisis embodies a theological crisis as well; i.e., a crisis of faith in God as Creator (Jas 3:9-10). Slanderous speech, which curses the neighbor who should be loved (Jas 2:8), offends the good intentions of the Creator, who made people in God's image. The deeper logic of a creation theology is that God built certain patterns in the created order (Jas 3:11-12); in this sense profane speech will not yield spiritual results (Jas 3:15-16), whereas pure speech will (Jas 3:17-18).

That is, the result of speech that substitutes "earthly" wisdom (Jas 3:15) for "heavenly" wisdom (Jas 3:17) is "chaos" (Jas 3:16), which is opposite of the Creator's intentions for a restored creation (cf. Gen 1:2). Demonic speech destroys human relationships and prevents the sort of spiritual nurture that empowers the community's journey through present trials toward the future promise of a new order. The harvest of "pure and merciful" speech (Jas 3:17), which conforms to heavenly wisdom, is the blessing of peace for those "perfect" teachers (Jas 3:1-2) who practice it (Jas 3:18).

6.4. The Wisdom of "Slow to Anger" (Jas 4:1—5:6). James 4:1—5:6 interprets the meaning of the proverbial exhortation for believers to be "slow to anger." According to James, the source of the community's anger (Jas 4:1) is an inward passion for lacking material pleasures (Jas 4:2-3). The trial that imperils the community's participation in God's coming triumph stems from an inability to be content with one's humble conditions, coveting rather the material goods of others (Jas 4:4-5). This passion for things tests the community's dependence upon God, who resists the arrogant and exults those of humble means (Jas 4:6; cf. 2:5). The wise community humbles itself before God (Jas 4:7-10), who alone establishes the criterion for judge and salvation (Jas 4:11-12).

The foolish, however, continue to indulge in self-centered passion for material profit without consideration of God's will for human existence (Jas 4:13-17). Indeed, those who choose Mammon over God will also choose Mammon over people and treat their poor neighbor with inequity (Jas 5:4) and hostility (Jas 5:6). The misery of mistreated workers ironically foreshadows the misery of the rich in the last days, when they will lose their wealth (Jas 5:1-2) and lives (Jas 5:4) to an angry God.

6.5. Concluding Exhortations (Jas 5:7-20). James concludes as it opens, with a pair of integral statements. By recalling important catchwords and phrases from the opening statements, the author forms an inclusio with his thesis that frames the commentary on wisdom found in between. More than a retrospective on the way of wisdom according to James, this conclusion also supplies the principal motivation for following its advice: the coming of the Lord is near (Jas 5:7-9).

The concluding exhortations to endure the testing of faith, implicit throughout James, are made more urgent by the author's pointed assertions that the Parousia is imminent. The community is encouraged to exercise patience (Jas 5:7-8), like Job (Jas 5:10-12) rather than his complaining friends (Jas 5:9), and to be vigilant in prayers* for healing (Jas 5:13-16), like Elijah (Jas 5:17-18), in order to insure participation in the coming triumph of God's reign.

The final verses (Jas 5:19-20) form a commission that calls the readers to a special mission for those foolish believers who have been deceived by falsehood and have departed from the "word of truth" that defines the way of wisdom. Their spiritual healing will result in salvation rather than condemnation at the end of the age. To be the church is to be wise when tested in knowing that the present testing of faith determines the future entrance into the age to come.

See also FAITH AND WORKS; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: J. B. Adamson, The Epistle of James (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1954); J. Cantinat, Les épîtres de s. Jacques et de s. Jude (SB; Paris: Gabalda, 1973); P. H. Davids, Commentary on James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); M. Dibelius, James, rev. H. Greeven (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); Z. C. Hodges, The Epistle of James (Irving, TX: Grace Evangelical Society, 1994); R. Hoppe, Jakobusbrief (SKKNT; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1989); F. Hort, The Epistle of St. James (London: Macmillan, 1909); L. T. Johnson, The Letter of James (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1995); S. S. Laws, A Commentary on the Epistle of James (HNTC; San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1980); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. Marty, L'épître de Jacques (Paris: Felix Alcan, 1935); J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1954); C. L. Mitton, The Epistle of James (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1966); J. Moffatt, The General Epistles (MNTC; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1928); D. Moo, James (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); F. Mussner, Der Jakobusbrief (HTKNT; Freiburg: Herder, 1967); W. E. Oesterley, The General Epistle of James (EGT; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1910); P. Perkins, First and Second Peter, James and Jude (IntC; Louisville, KY: John Knox, 1995); B. Reicke, The Epistles of James, Peter and Jude (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964); J. H. Ropes, The Epistle of St. James (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1916); F. Spitta, Der Brief des Jakobus untersucht (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1896); G. M. Stulac, James (IVPNTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1993); R. W. Wall, The Community of the Wise: The Book of James (NTC; Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press, 1997). Studies: K. Aland, "Der Herrnbruder Jakobus und der Jakobusbrief," TLZ 69 (1944) 97-104; G. Bornkamm, "The Letter to the Romans as Paul's Last Will and Testament" in The Romans Debate, ed. K. Donfried (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977) 17-31; D. Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1990); M. Brett, Biblical Criticism in Crisis? (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); F. F. Bruce, Peter, Stephen, James and John: Studies in Early Non-Pauline Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979); T. B. Cargal, Restoring the Diaspora. Discursive Structure and Purpose in the Epistle of James (SBLDS 144; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993); A Chester and R. P. Martin, The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); B. S. Childs, The New Testament as Canon

(Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); C. E. B. Cranfield, "The Message of James," SJT 18 (1965) 182-93, 338-45; D. D. Deppe, The Sayings of Jesus in the Epistle of James (Chelsea, MI: Bookcrafters, 1989); K. Donfried, ed., The Romans Debate (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1977); J. H. Elliot, "The Epistle of James in Rhetorical and Social Scientific Perspective: Holiness-Wholeness and Patterns of Replication," BTB 23 (1993) 71-81; F. O. Francis, "The Form and Function of the Opening and Closing Paragraphs of James and I John," ZNW 61 (1970) 110-26; M. Gertner, "Midrashic Terms and Techniques in the New Testament: the Epistle of James, a Midrash on a Psalm," SE 3 (= TU 88 [1964]) 463; D. E. Gowan, "Wisdom and Endurance in James," HBT 15 (1993) 145-53; D. Hadidian, "Palestinian Pictures in the Epistles of James," ExpT 63 (1952) 227-28; P. J. Hartin, "Come now, you rich, weep and wail . . .' (James 5:1-6)," JTSA 84 (1993) 57-63; idem, "Call to Be Perfect Through Suffering (James 1:2-4)," unpublished paper presented to the Society of Biblical Literature (Philadelphia, 1995); idem, James and the Q Sayings of Jesus (JSNTSup 47; Sheffield: JSOT, 1991); R. B. Hays, The Faith of Jesus Christ (SBLDS 56; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); M. Hengel, "Der Jakobusbrief als antipaulinische Polemik" in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament, ed. G. F. Hawthorne and O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 248-78; idem, Property and Riches in the Early Church (London: SCM, 1974); H. J. Holtzmann, "Die Zeitlage des Jakobus- briefes," ZWT 25 (1882) 292-310; R. Hoppe, Der theologische Hintergrund des Jakobusbriefes (FB 28; Würzburg: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1977); J. Jeremias, "Paul and James," ExpT 66 (1954-55) 368-71; L. T. Johnson, "Friendship with the World/Friendship with God: A Study of Discipleship in James" in Discipleship in the New Testament, ed. F. F. Segovia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 166-83; idem, "The Mirror of Remembrance (James 1:22-25)," CBQ 50 (1988) 632-45; idem. "The Social World of James" in The Social World of the First Christians, ed. L. M. White and O. L. Yarborough (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 178-97; idem, "The Use of Leviticus 19 in the Letter of James," JBL 101 (1982) 391-401; W. G. Johnsson, "The Pilgrimage Motif in the Book of Hebrews," JBL 97 (1978) 239-51; H. C. Kee, Who Are the People of God? (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); J. A. Kirk, "The Meaning of Wisdom in James," NTS 16 (1969) 24-38; G. Kittel, "Der Jakobusbrief und die apostolischen Vater," ZNW 43 (1950) 54-112; W. G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament (rev. ed.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1975); E. E. Lemcio, "The Unifying Kerygma of the New Testament," JSNT 33 (1988) 3-17; J. G. Lodge, "James and Paul at Cross Purposes: James 2,22," Bib 62 (1981) 195-213; B. J. Malina, "Wealth and Poverty in the New Testament," Int 41 (1987) 354-67; P. U. Maynard-Reid, Poverty and Wealth in James (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1987); A. Meyer, Das Rätsel des Jakobusbriefes (BZNW 10; Giessen: Töppelman, 1930); J. A. Overman, "The Diaspora in the Modern Study of Ancient Judaism" in Diaspora Jews and Judaism, ed. J. A. Overman and R. S. MacLennan (SFSHJ 41; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992) 63-78; T. C. Penner, The Epistle of James and Eschatology (JSNTSup 121; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); L. Perdue "Paraenesis and the Epistle of James," ZNW 72 (1981) 241-56; J. M. Reese, "The Exegete as Sage: Hearing the Message of James," BTB 12 (1982) 82-85; J. A. Sanders, God Has a Story Too (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. Schneider, Die Briefe des Jakobus, Petrus, Judas und Johannes (NTD 10; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1961); A. M. Shepherd, "The Epistle of James and the Gospel of Matthew," JBL 75 (1956) 40-51; K. Syreeni, "James and the Pauline Legacy," unpublished paper presented to the Society of Biblical Literature (Chicago, 1994); R. E. van Voorst, The Ascents of James: History and Theology of a Jewish-Christian Community (SBLDS 112; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); R. W. Wall, Colossians & Philemon (IVPNTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1993); idem, "James as Apocalyptic Paraenesis," RQ 32 (1990) 11-22; idem, "Reading the New Testament in Canonical Context" in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation, ed. J. B. Green (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 370-93; idem, Revelation (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); idem, "Successors to 'the Twelve' According to Acts 12:1-17," CBQ 53 (1991) 628-43; R. W. Wall and E. E. Lemcio, The New Testament as Canon: A Reader in Canonical Criticism (JSNTSup 76; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); R. B. Ward, "The Works of Abraham: James 2:14-26," HTR 61 (1968) 283-90; idem, "Partiality in the Assembly: James 2:2-4;" HTR 62 (1969) 87-97; D. F. Watson,

"James 2 in Light of Greco-Roman Schemes of Argumentation," NTS 39 (1993) 94-121; idem, "The Rhetoric of James 3:1-12 and a Classical Pattern of Argumentation," NovT 35 (1993) 487-64; B. Witherington, Jesus the Sage (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); W. Wuellner, "Der Jakobusbrief im Licht der Rhetorik und Textpragmatik," LB 43 (1978) 5-65.

R. W. Wall.

JAMES THE JUST. See JAMES, LETTER OF.

JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY

Ever since the "stronghold of Zion" was seized by David (2 Sam 5:7; 1 Chron 11:5), Jewish attention has been focused upon one city, Jerusalem. Shortly after its capture Jerusalem became the political, economic, military, social and religious center for ancient Israel. The successful concentration of both earthly and heavenly power in Jerusalem insured that this city was destined to dominate Jewish geographical imagination forevermore. Not only was Jerusalem thought to be the "center," or "navel," of the whole earth (Ezek 5:5; 38:12; 1 Enoch 26:1; Jub. 8:11, 19) but also ideal figurations of this holy city, this Zion, became stock symbols for Jewish worship and eschatology.* Jewish dreams of what ought to be and what would be were uniquely tied to this specific plot of land (Gowan). Jerusalem, or Zion, thus replaced Sinai as the mountain of Yahweh's presence (Levenson).

Given Jerusalem's importance for Jewish communal identity (Kee, 18-22), it is curious that imagery about Zion does not play a larger role within early Christian reflection. "Zion" (Sion) occurs only four times in the later writings of the NT and the apostolic fathers* (Heb 12:22; 1 Pet 2:6; Rev 14:1; Barn. 6.2), while the phrase "holy city" (hagia polis) appears only four times in the later writings of the NT (Rev 11:2, 21:2, 10; 22:19) and never in the apostolic fathers. References to "Jerusalem" (Ierosolyma; Ierousalem), although more plentiful, are concentrated: fifty-nine occurrences in Acts; only five elsewhere (Heb 12:22; Rev 3:12; 21:2, 10; 1 Clem. 41.2). Part of the explanation may be that Roman occupation and the destruction of Jerusalem held in check wholesale Christian appropriation of the tradition (see Barn. 16.4-5; Robinson). Further, Jesus, as the embodiment of God's presence, reshaped Jewish eschatology. Since Christian hope was uniquely tied to a person and not to a place, the Zion tradition was reformatted in its application to Jesus (1 Pet 2:6; Barn. 6.2; cf. Is 28:16). Finally many of the royal themes associated with Zion were carried along without specific reference to the city; for example, language about kingdom, temple,* covenant* and priesthood.* The few places in which Christianity did explicitly use the Zion tradition in a substantive way thus merit close attention.

1. Old Testament Background
2. Jerusalem in the Geographical Theology of Acts
3. Zion in the Eschatological Warning of Hebrews
4. The Holy City in the Apocalyptic Vision of Revelation
5. Summary

1. Old Testament Background.

In the OT several motifs coalesce to form the idealized picture of Jerusalem, Zion or the holy city (Roberts, 329-44). The OT affirms that Yahweh specifically chose Jerusalem (Ps 78:68; 87:2; 102:16; 132:13) to be his special dwelling place (Ps 2:6; 9:11; 74:2; 87:2; 102:16). Jerusalem is thus considered to be a sacred place, a place of worship and celebration (2 Chron 5:2; Ps 99:2; 137:1-3; 146:10; 147:12). OT writers consistently glorify the city by describing it in epic proportions. Even though it is of modest size, Zion is depicted as a mountain of exceeding height (Ps 48:2; Is 2:2; Mic 4:1; cf. Ezek 40:2; Zech 14:10). All the heavenly host assemble at Zion (Is 14:13; Ps 48:1-2; 89:5, 12). From Zion flows a river that brings unparalleled fertility and abundance to the world (Ps 46:4; Ezek 47:1-12; Joel 3:18; cf. Is 51:3; Zech 1:17). Zion is also thought to be the site of a mighty theophany where Yahweh defeated, defeats or will defeat the evil powers of chaos (Is 14:32; 17:12-14; 18:1-6; 29:1-8; 31:4-9; Ezek 38—39; Joel 2:1; 3:21; Amos 1:2; Zech 12:1-9; 14:3, 12-15).

The OT also sees the city as playing a prominent role in Israel's and the world's future. After purification and cleansing (Is 4:4; 52:1), Jerusalem is the place where Israel will be regathered (Is 30:19; 46:13; 51:11; Jer 31:6); Jerusalem is the place where both Israel* and the nations with be judged (Is 10:12; Amos 6:1; Mic 3:12); from Jerusalem salvation* will pour to the ends of the earth (Ps 14:7; 50:2; 53:6; Is 37:32; 52:7; Joel 2:32; 3:16; Obad 1:17; Zeph 3:14); and to Jerusalem all the nations will come to acknowledge Yahweh alone as king of the world (Ps 76:11-12; Is 2:2-4; Mic 4:2, 7; Is 18:7; Zech 14:16-19). The themes of election,* divine presence, worship,* prosperity, ingathering, conversion, transformation, judgment* and salvation are all closely associated with the tradition of Jerusalem, Zion and the holy city.

2. Jerusalem in the Geographical Theology of Acts.

Hans Conzelmann placed geography front and center in any discussion of the theology of Luke-Acts. While one may wish to quibble with some of Conzelmann's conclusions—for example, that Luke intentionally used geography to distance Jesus from John the Baptist (Conzelmann, 18-27; cf. Marshall, 145-47)—one cannot deny the programmatic role that geography in general and Jerusalem in particular played for the structure of this two-volume work. Jerusalem not only is the city of destiny for Jesus (Gospel of Luke) but also is the reference point for worldwide gospel expansion (Acts).

The first scene of Acts* takes place in Jerusalem (cf. Lk 1:5-23). The risen Jesus commands his disciples not to leave Jerusalem until "the promise" has been fulfilled (Acts 1:4). Jesus then recommissions his disciples (Acts 1:8; cf. Lk 24:47), and this commission provides the geographical plan for the entire work: "you shall be my witnesses beginning in Jerusalem [Acts 1—7], Judea and Samaria [Acts 8—12] and unto the ends of the earth [Acts 13—28]." If in the Gospel the story winds down to Jerusalem, then in the book of Acts the story spirals outward from Jerusalem.

Jerusalem continues to figure prominently in the narrative, even though the plot of Acts requires the movement away from the city. The entirety of Jerusalem becomes a collective and unwitting witness to the death of Christ,* his resurrection* and the coming of the Holy Spirit* (Acts 2:14; 4:16; 5:28). The disciples' ministry* and preaching* first enjoyed success in Jerusalem (Acts 5:16; 6:7). The critical events of Jesus' life that transpired in Jerusalem—his crucifixion, resurrection and appearances—became essential elements in the preaching of the disciples (Acts 10:39; 13:27, 31). The persecution of the church* at Jerusalem paradoxically led to the evangelization of Judea and Samaria* (Acts 8:1). The community of believers in Jerusalem provided supervision for the successive waves of expansion outside the city environs (Acts 8:14, 25; 11:2, 22, 27; 12:25; 15:2, 4; 16:4). And the Paul of Acts, like the Jesus of Luke's Gospel (Lk 9:51—19:27), makes a fateful, final journey to Jerusalem (Acts 19:31—21:17), replete with foreboding travel notices (Acts 20:16, 22; 21:4, 11, 12, 13, 15; cf. Lk 9:51, 53; 13:22; 17:11; 18:31; 19:11).

What drives this focus upon Jerusalem? Acts strategically places Jerusalem in the narrative horizon generated by the Zion tradition. The subtext for the programmatic commission of Acts 1:8 is Isaiah 49:6 (cf. Is 2:3 = Mic 4:2). The phrase "ends of the earth" specifically links these two texts and thereby places the commission in a larger narrative web of texts that spotlight God's universal saving intentions (e.g., Ps 2:8; 22:27; 72:8; 98:3; Is 45:22; 52:10). The disciples thus become intertextually positioned as the "light" that Yahweh or Jesus sends to "the nations" in order that "salvation might reach to the ends of the earth."

Pentecost* should also be read in light of the Zion tradition. "Devout persons from every nation under heaven" had gathered in Jerusalem, and it was to them, in their own language, that they heard the apostles* speaking. Peter appeals to Joel's prophecy about Zion (Joel 2:1, 15, 23) to explain this extraordinary event. God foretold that he would pour out his Spirit upon "all flesh" (Joel 2:28 = Acts 2:17). But, as Peter glosses his subtext, this blessing* is not limited to those who reside in Zion (Joel 2:32); this blessing is to be democratized upon "whoever calls upon the name of the Lord" (Acts 2:21). Peter's pesher of Joel 2 thus makes Jerusalem the nuclear center for world transformation.

Paul's missionary efforts, which dominate the latter half of Acts, are also narratively linked to the Zion tradition. The interpretation of Paul's conversion that God provides to Ananias identifies Paul as a (the) "chosen instrument" to carry Yahweh's name "before the nations" (Acts 9:15; cf. Acts 22:12-16; 26:16-18; Gal 1:16; Rom 1:5). Paul and Barnabas justify their Gentile* mission by explicitly citing Isaiah 49:6 (Acts 13:47). The citation clarifies Paul's "necessity" of preaching first to the Jews and, only after their rejection, of turning to the "nations" (Acts 13:46; 18:6; 28:26-28; cf. Rom 1:16-17). Such a procedure resonates with Isaiah's eschatological* vision: Zion's "servant" has a twofold mission: to restore Israel (Is 49:6) and to include the nations in this salvation (Is 49:6). Like Jesus (Lk 2:32) and the early disciples before him (Acts 1:8), Paul too is to be the "light to the nations."

Not only does Jerusalem provide the literary setting for the middle portion of Luke and Acts (Lk 20—Acts 7), but also the city is the theological epicenter for reaching the "ends of the earth" with the good news of Jesus (Kee, 192-207). Acts construes the events accomplished in Jerusalem—Jesus' death, resurrection, ascension*—as the topical sequence of a larger narrative, a narrative whose final sequence includes the conversion of the nations. Acts thus explains the ever outward spiral of expansion in terms of the Zion tradition: Jerusalem is the place where God begins to transform the world. The missionary exploits of Jesus' disciples, beginning in Jerusalem and stretching to the ends of the earth, represent nothing short of the world's "Zionization."

3. Zion in the Eschatological Warning of Hebrews.

The clearest and most expressive use of the Zion tradition occurs in Hebrews 12. In a tightly knit and internally cohesive unit, the author contrasts Sinai (Heb 12:18-21) with Zion (Heb 12:22-24). Specifically the author compares the terrifying aspects of Yahweh's theophany at Sinai with the festive joy of Zion under the new covenant. Prefaced by a hortatory appeal for perseverance (Heb 12:14-17), the descriptive analogy between Sinai and Zion forms the basis for the author's stern warning about the eschatological peril of falling away (Heb 12:25-29).

The dramatic differences between Sinai and Zion can be seen in the images the passage associates with the two locales:

You have not come to [Sinai]	But you have come to Mount Zion, to the city of the living God,
	to the heavenly Jerusalem to what can be touched	to a myriad of angels in festal gathering to a burning fire	to the congregation of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven to darkness	to God, a judge over all to gloom	to the spirits of the just made perfect to a whirlwind	to the mediator of the new covenant, Jesus to the sound of a trumpet	to the sprinkled blood to a voice of words

The author compounds Zion imagery, to demonstrate the eschatological superiority of the new covenant revealed in and through Jesus. The juxtaposition of the phrases "the city of living God" and "the heavenly Jerusalem" with "Mount Zion" (Heb 12:22) identifies Zion as the "city whose builder and maker is God" (Heb 11:10), the city that God has "prepared" for the faithful (Heb 11:16) and the city believers earnestly "seek" in this life (Heb 14:13). Zion, the holy city and heavenly Jerusalem are also related to other royal geographical references in Hebrews; for example, to the "kingdom" (Heb 1:8; 11:33; 12:28), the "world to come" (Heb 2:5), "the throne" (Heb 4:14; 8:1), "the shrine behind the curtain" (Heb 6:19), "the sanctuary" (Heb 8:2, 5, 19), "homeland" (Heb 11:14) and the "better country" (Heb 11:16). Hebrews uses Zion imagery to define Jerusalem as the city of God's abiding presence and conversion as citizenship in God's cosmic and eschatological metropolis.

The atmosphere in Zion is festive, in direct contrast to Sinai. Joyful angelic praise (Heb 12:22) replaces the distressing images of fire, darkness, gloom, violent wind and unintelligible sounds (Heb 12:18). The festal gathering (panyrgia) recalls the unrestrained celebrations prefigured within the Zion tradition, while the presence of innumerable angelic hosts invokes the divine council who were thought to reside upon Zion.

The "congregation of the firstborn" (ekklēsia prōtotokōn) supplants the image of Israel huddled at the base of Sinai (Heb 12:23). That the earthly members of God's community share Zion's certain and sure election is emphasized by the inscription of their names in the heavenly city (cf. Ps 69:28; 139:16; Phil 4:3; Rev 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27). Zion's God is still "judge over all" (Heb 12:23); but the life that he makes possible in the heavenly city will entail full transformation. The "just" will undergo that final, eschatological metamorphosis into complete conformity with God's perfect character (Heb 12:23; cf. Ezek 36:24-32; Gowan, 73-81). The unapproachability, distance and mysteriousness of God under the old covenant are replaced by the full and unrestricted access of the new (Heb 12:24). This access is gained through the mediatory work of Jesus—specifically the offering of his sacrificial blood. This eschatological vision inaugurates the new covenant hope* of Jeremiah 31:31-34.

The author of Hebrews* uses the dramatic images of Sinai and Zion to demonstrate the eschatological superiority and greater responsibility of Christian identity. While affirming that the readers have already arrived (Heb 12:18) at the city gates of Zion (i.e., the "now" of salvation), the author also portrays the Christian life as a pilgrimage to the heavenly city (i.e., the "not yet" of salvation). Christians should persist in "drawing near" (Heb 4:16; 7:25; 10:1, 22; 11:6; 12:18, 22). Hebrews thus employs Zion imagery to draft a strong word to those who are experiencing spiritual fatigue in their journey.

4. The Holy City in the Apocalyptic Vision of Revelation.

"City" (polis) occurs twenty-six times in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) and forms one of the book's key images. The plot of Revelation can be read as the tale of two cities—the new and heavenly Jerusalem and the corrupt and sinful Babylon.*

Revelation predicts that the "great" city of Babylon is destined to suffer a cataclysmic end (Rev 14:8). Revelation narrates this fate in the climatic judgment of the seventh cup (Rev 16:17—18:24), the final judgment before the apocalypse of Jesus and the new Jerusalem (Rev 19:1—22:5).

Babylon is singled out as the special object of God's wrath* (Rev 16:19). The city is metaphorically described as a woman (Rev 17:3; 17:18). Despite her regal appearance (Rev 17:4), the city is a harlot (Rev 17:1), the mother of all whores (Rev 17:5). Babylon is the dwelling place of demons, of all that is foul and hateful (Rev 18:2). Babylon has consciously persecuted those who side with God. She has become drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus (Rev 17:6). Her sins are heaped as high as heaven itself (Rev 18:4). This woman/city exercises an undue and tragic influence over all the cities of the earth (Rev 17:18). Revelation graphically demonstrates this connection: when Babylon was split into three parts, the cities of the nations fell (Rev 16:19). The nations have committed fornication with her and under her influence have grown rich with the wealth of her wantonness (Rev 18:3).

But God promises to punish her iniquities (Rev 18:5). He will repay double for all that she has done (Rev 18:6). Because she has usurped royal privilege (Rev 18:7), her plagues will come and they will come quickly—in a single day (Rev 18:8), even a single hour (Rev 18:10, 17, 19). The cities and kings of the earth will be amazed at the swiftness and completeness of her judgment (Rev 18:10). Babylon's destruction will collapse the world's domination system (Rev 18:11-20; see Wink, 319-24). God's judgment upon this great city will be complete: "she will be found no more" (Rev 18:21).

Like Babylon, Jerusalem also will undergo judgment because of her sinfulness; thus the renaming of Jerusalem "Sodom and Egypt" (Rev 11:8). Consequently the nations will "tread under foot" the holy city for forty-two months (Rev 11:2), and the city will be punished by a great earthquake (Rev 11:13). However, unlike Babylon, Jerusalem will also receive the protection of God. Just when the forces of evil are ready to destroy this great city, God will send "fire" to destroy them (Rev 20:6).

The final eradication of evil clears the way for the transformation of Jerusalem (Rev 21:2). The new Jerusalem is also likened to a woman, a faithful and chaste woman, adorned as a bride (Rev 21:2). This new city will enjoy the unmediated and full presence of God forevermore (Rev 21:3, 11). Sorrow, pain and suffering* will no longer plague the city, for all the former woes will have "passed away" (Rev 21:3-4).

Revelation draws freely upon the Zion tradition to describe the new Jerusalem. The city will be located upon a mountain of exceeding height (Rev 21:10) and of immense proportions—a great cube with its height, width and length measuring the same fifteen hundred miles (Rev 21:15-16). The four city walls, with three gates each, are made of jasper, while the city itself is constructed of gold. The foundations supporting the four walls are adorned with every kind of precious stones (Rev 21:18-21). This eschatological city needs no temple or sun or moon, for God's presence will be a beacon to all the nations (Rev 21:22-26). The river that flows from the city brings abundance and peace to the whole world (Rev 22:2). From this city God will reign forevermore (Rev 22:5).

The images of Babylon and Jerusalem provide comfort to a community suffering persecution* and wondering about its future. God will vanquish the great foe Babylon, the symbol of evil's cruel rule in this life, and will replace that city with the new Jerusalem, the symbol of transforming powers of God that will usher in the age of unparalleled blessing. The horrors and catastrophe of Babylon will be exceeded only by the greatness and shalom of the new Jerusalem.

5. Summary.

Christianity, like Judaism,* saw in Jerusalem, Zion and the holy city a rich array of possible evocations. Acts interprets Jerusalem's strategic role in worldwide expansion through the lens of the Zion tradition: the mission to include the nations in God's saving purposes inaugurates the hope of eschatological Zion. Hebrews translates the entirety of the Christian life into the language of Zion: conversion is arrival at the city gates, while discipleship is the progressive journey toward Zion. Revelation pits Babylon against Jerusalem to assure its readers of God's final victory: the new, heavenly Jerusalem embodies the greatness and certainty of complete world transformation.

See also CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY; CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; ESCHATOLOGY; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); R. L. Cohn, The Shape of Sacred Space (AARSR 23; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1981); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1961); D. G. Gowan, Eschatology in the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); J. D. Levenson, Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (Minneapolis: Winston, 1985); H. C. Kee, Who Are the People of God? Early Christian Models of Community (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970); J. J. M. Roberts, "The Davidic Origins of the Zion Tradition," JBL 92 (1973) 329-44; J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); W. Wink, Engaging the Powers: Discernment and Resistance in a World of Domination (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

C. C. Newman

JESUS TRADITIONS

To what extent were traditions about the life and teaching of Jesus used in earliest Christianity? In what contexts were Jesus traditions used? These questions continue to tease scholars. In the light of form criticism it is generally accepted that Jesus traditions circulated orally in early Christian communities for several decades before they were incorporated into the four Gospels. However, the evidence from Christian writings themselves for the use of Jesus traditions is difficult to assess.

There are few explicit quotations of Jesus traditions in writings that date from before the early decades of the second century. Many more possible allusions have been noted, but it is difficult to determine how many of them would have been understood by the first readers to be references to Jesus traditions. Some of the alleged allusions may result from the use of similar "biblical" phraseology in both the Jesus tradition and the allusion.

A decision on the extent of allusions to traditions of the life and teaching of Jesus is inevitably based partly on presuppositions. Scholars who insist that most early Christian writers took it for granted that their readers had an extensive knowledge of traditions about the teaching and actions of Jesus are naturally more willing to accept a considerable number of allusions. A very different view is taken by those who claim either that before about A.D. 150 interest in the earthly life of Jesus was less prominent in Christian preaching and teaching than we might suppose, or Jesus traditions did not circulate in all early Christian communities. Discussion of these questions has often focused on the Pauline epistles (see DPL, Jesus, Sayings of), but the equally important evidence of the later NT writings and second-century writings needs to be considered carefully.

An equally controversial issue arises in Christian writings from early in the second century onward. Are quotations or allusions to Jesus traditions taken from oral tradition or from written Gospels? Since Jesus traditions were known and used orally long after the Gospels were written, it is often difficult to decide whether an oral or a written Jesus tradition has been used.

1. Acts of the Apostles
2. Hebrews
3. James
4. 1 Peter
5. 2 Peter and Jude
6. The Johannine Epistles
7. Revelation

8. Apostolic Fathers
9. Other Early Christian Writings (Agrapha)
10. Jesus Traditions and the Fourfold Gospel
11. Conclusions

1. Acts of the Apostles.

There are few references to Jesus traditions in the speeches or sermons of Acts.* This is not surprising, given that Luke has already set out the story of Jesus at some length in his Gospel. Close examination of the speeches confirms that Luke is an economical writer who avoids unnecessary repetition: themes that are prominent in one speech are often treated cursorily or omitted in other speeches.

The speeches in the early chapters of Acts are set in Jerusalem,* where some knowledge of the life and teaching* of Jesus and in particular of the events that led to the crucifixion seems to be assumed. Once Luke's account of the post-Easter events moves beyond Jerusalem, however, it is necessary to include a sketch of the story of Jesus in Peter's evangelistic preaching* to Cornelius,* a Roman centurion (Acts 10:34-43).

Luke did not include such a sketch in Paul's lengthy speech in the synagogue* at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16-41). Here there is more detailed reference to John the Baptist than there was in the previous speech (Acts 10) and a quotation of John's words concerning his relationship to Jesus (Acts 13:24-25). But the story moves directly from John the Baptist to the request of "the residents of Jerusalem and their leaders" to Pilate to have Jesus killed (Acts 13:27-28).

The citation of John the Baptist's words in Acts 13:24-25 does not correspond exactly to Luke 3:16: in Acts Luke may have abbreviated the words he included in his Gospel, or he may be quoting from a slightly different oral tradition.

The later speeches in Acts do not allude to, let alone cite, Jesus traditions. Paul's moving farewell speech to the Ephesian elders at Miletus, however, is an exception. It concludes with an explicit citation of a saying of Jesus that is not included in any of the Gospels: "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35). Although quotations of the teaching of Jesus are rare in early Christian writings before Irenaeus, this verse confirms that extracanonical sayings of Jesus (often referred to as "agrapha," or "unwritten" sayings) were known. Unlike many of the agrapha found in later writings, this saying is usually accepted as a genuine saying of Jesus (see 9 below).

The quotation of these words of Jesus brings to a dramatic climax the final theme of Paul's speech at Miletus. In this way Luke shows his readers that Paul knows and obeys the teaching of Jesus and implies that they should follow Paul's example: Paul's last words to the Ephesian elders are not his own but the words of "the Lord Jesus." Luke makes this point so powerfully as the finale to this speech that there is no need to repeat it in the other speeches in Acts.

The context is significant. Paul quotes the words of Jesus as the climax of his insistence to the Ephesian elders that by his own hands he has supported himself and his companions. The use of a Jesus tradition in the context of community instruction in Acts 20:35 complements the use of Jesus traditions in an evangelistic context in Acts 10:36-43.

2. Hebrews.

In Hebrews* there are few references to events in the life of Jesus and probably no references to his teaching. Nonetheless the author's whole line of argument assumes broad familiarity with the story of Jesus.

The fullest reference to the earthly life of Jesus is in Hebrews 5:7-9 (NRSV):

> In the days of his flesh, Jesus offered up prayers and supplications, with loud cries and tears, to the one who was able to save him from death, and he was heard because of his reverent submission. Although he was a Son, he learned obedience through what he suffered; and having been made perfect, he became the source of eternal salvation for all who obey him.

Although this passage has often been related closely to the Gethsemane traditions in the Gospels, there is no significant verbal correspondence. However, nearly all the Greek words in this verse are found in several OT passages with a similar context of a prayer* uttered in deep anxiety; the closest parallels are in Psalm 116. Several scholars have suggested that Hebrews 5:7-9, like the partly similar Philippians 2:6-11, is based on an early Christian hymn.* While this view is plausible, it is worth noting that few of the stylistic features of the "hymn" in Philippians 2:6-11 (and other early Christian "hymns") are found here.

The context of Hebrews 5:7-9 assumes that the experiences of Jesus alluded to took place in connection with his passion (for some discussion see Cullmann, 95-98). While a variant Gethsemane tradition probably does lie behind these verses, they may refer in summary form to more than one period of earnest prayer shortly before the crucifixion.

Hebrews 13:12 refers to the suffering of Jesus "outside the city gate." This detail is not found in the Synoptic passion narratives, though it does seem to be presupposed in the Matthean and Lukan versions of the parable of the wicked husbandmen (Mt 21:39 par. Lk 20:15; cf. Mk 12:8). The closest parallel is in John 19:17-20, though verbal correspondence is minimal.

Two further references to the earthly life of Jesus need to be noted. In line with many NT passages, Hebrews 7:14 refers to the descent of Jesus from the tribe of Judah. Hebrews 4:15 states that Jesus, our high priest,* has been "tested in every respect as we are, yet is without sin." Since the previous chapter has compared Jesus and Moses* closely and has referred to the "testing" of Moses and those whom he led in the wilderness (Heb 3:1-19), it is possible that the general reference to the "testing" of Jesus in Hebrews 4:15 includes an allusion to his wilderness "testing" (Mk 1:13 and par.).

Knowledge and use of sayings of Jesus are even more difficult to trace. In two passages sayings of Jesus are quoted, but in both cases they are words of Scripture rather than sayings of the earthly Jesus. In Hebrews 2:12 we read: "For this reason he [i.e., Jesus] is not ashamed to call them brothers and sisters, saying, 'I will proclaim your name [i.e., the Father's name] to my brothers and sisters,' " a quotation of Psalm 22:22. Quotations of 2 Samuel 22:3 (or perhaps Is 12:2 or Is 8:17) and then Isaiah 2:13 follow. Although there is no indication of the point at which Jesus is considered to have spoken these words, they are not necessarily to be taken as words of the exalted Christ.* The author probably intends the citations of Scripture to be taken as comments made by Jesus at his incarnation.

This is certainly the case at Hebrews 10:5-6, where quotation and discussion of Psalm 40:6-8 is introduced as follows: "Consequently, when he [Christ] came into the world, he said. . . ." Since Christ is the fulfillment of Scripture, then it is possible for the author of Hebrews to claim that at his coming into the world* Christ quoted verses from the psalm: his coming into the world is an act of submission to the will of God*; this is the sacrifice* God really desires.

In several paraenetic passages a saying of Jesus might have been used to clinch the argument, as at Acts 20:35, but for whatever reason this is not done. Hebrews 13:5 is a good example. In the opening clause readers are urged to keep their lives free from the love of money, but there is not so much as an allusion to Matthew 6:24 (par. Lk 16:13). The verse continues: "Be content with what you have," which might be taken as a summary of Matthew 6:31-34 (par. Lk 12:29-32), but there is no verbal reminiscence of this passage. Hebrews 13:5 ends with a quotation, "I will never leave you or forsake you." The introductory formula is unusual; it plausibly can be translated "For he [i.e., the Master] has said." However, in view of the immediate context and of the absence of sayings of the earthly Jesus elsewhere in Hebrews, the introductory phrase should almost certainly be translated (with the REB) "for God has said [in Scripture]" and the quotation taken as a reference to either Joshua 1:5 or a version of Deuteronomy 31:6, 8.

In spite of the paucity of references to Jesus traditions, the author of Hebrews is by no means uninterested in the earthly life of Jesus. Immediately after his highly rhetorical opening chapter, the author makes the first of his forceful exhortations: "Therefore we must pay greater attention to what we have heard" (Heb 2:1 NRSV). What has been heard is the message of salvation,* "declared at first through the Lord, and it was attested to us by those who heard him" (Heb 2:3 NRSV). While some interpreters insist that the exaltation* of Christ is in view as the moment when the message of salvation is first proclaimed, the immediate context refers to the incarnation rather than the exaltation of Christ (Heb 2:9-18). So Hebrews 2:3 is probably "a traditional summary of the spread of the gospel that started with a reference to Jesus" (Attridge, 67), a summary not unlike Acts 10:36-39, Peter's evangelistic proclamation to Cornelius.

In Hebrews 2:10 Jesus is referred to as the "pioneer" or "pathfinder" (see also Heb 12:2) who blazes a trail to glory* for his followers (see also Heb 6:20; 10:19-20). Because Jesus himself was tested by what he suffered, he is able to help those who are being tested (Heb 2:18; cf. Heb 4:15). At Hebrews 5:8 the Son* of God is said to have "learned obedience" through what he suffered (see Obedience). Since the obedient suffering* of the Son* is the path to exaltation and the pattern for his followers, the author has a deep-seated interest in the earthly life of Jesus.

It is difficult to assess the extent of the author's knowledge of the details of that life. It is significant that Hebrews 5:7, the most specific comment on the sufferings of Jesus, is couched in phrases from Psalm 116 rather than in echoes of Jesus traditions from the Gospels or their earlier sources.

3. James.

The letter of James* does not contain a single explicit citation of a saying of Jesus. Nonetheless as many as forty-five possible allusions to Jesus traditions have been noted. P. H. Davids has gone a step further and argued that at least one allusion lies at the heart of every major paragraph of the letter. While few scholars would be quite so bold, most accept that in at least a handful of passages the writer is indebted to oral Jesus traditions.

The clearest evidence of use of a Jesus tradition is at James 5:12 (NRSV): "Do not swear, either by heaven or by earth or by any other oath, but let your 'Yes' be yes and your 'No' be no, so that you may not fall under condemnation." A close relationship with Matthew 5:34-35, 37 is undeniable, for the verbal similarity of these two passages cannot be explained as independent use of the same OT, Jewish or Greek admonition. Although both Jewish and Greek ethical* teachers discouraged the use of oaths, Jesus seems to have been the first to prohibit their use. James 5:12 may well be closer to the original words of Jesus than is the fuller version in Matthew 5:34-35, 37; if so, Matthew 5:36 is probably an early expansion of the tradition, for there is no trace of these words in James.

Why does James fail to note that this striking and perhaps unique teaching comes from Jesus himself? Perhaps the writer and his readers were so well aware of this fact that ascription to Jesus was unnecessary. Or perhaps the writer was not aware of the origin of these words, for there is evidence elsewhere that Christian teachers wove sayings of Jesus into their ethical exhortation without indicating their origin.

James 2:8 also draws on Jesus tradition: "You are doing well if you really do fulfill the royal law according to the scripture, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' " Here Leviticus 19:18 is quoted as Scripture, but James does not note that Jesus referred to this passage (Mk 12:31). Paul also quotes Leviticus 19:18 as the supreme command (Rom 13:9-10; Gal 5:14) but without referring to the authority* of Jesus for this conclusion. "It is probable that when James quotes Lev 19:18 as scripture he does so in the knowledge that this scripture has received the added authority of Jesus' use" (Laws, 110).

The following may be noted as further examples of allusions to Jesus traditions.

(1) "Ask God, . . . and it will be given to you" (Jas 1:5 recalls Mt 7:7 par. Lk 11:9). The same Q pericope seems to lie behind James 1:17 and perhaps James 4:2-3.

(2) James 2:5 is an extended paraphrase of Matthew 5:3, 5 (par. Lk 6:20): "Has not God chosen the poor in the world to be rich in faith and to be heirs of the kingdom that he has promised to those who love him?"

(3) James 3:12, "Can a fig tree . . . yield olives, or a grapevine figs?" may be based on Matthew 7:16 (par. Lk 6:44), though parallels in Stoic teaching may be closer.

(4) James 4:10, "Humble yourselves before the Lord, and he will exalt you," recalls Luke 14:11 and also Luke 18:14 and Matthew 23:12.

(5) The closing sentence of the letter, James 5:19-20, may be based on Matthew 18:15 (par. Lk 17:3), though there is little verbal correspondence.

How are these and many other alleged allusions to be assessed? If they are examined closely one by one, use of Jesus traditions is by no means certain. In some cases an equally plausible case can be made for partial dependence on OT, Jewish or Greek ethical teaching. However, once one accepts that Jesus traditions have been used at James 2:8 and at James 5:12, it becomes more likely that the writer has drawn on Jesus traditions elsewhere.

Some writers have attempted to show that in its use of Jesus traditions James depends directly on Q, on "M" or on Matthew's Gospel (see Hartin). The allusions are not confined to Q or to "M." While one cannot rule out dependence of James on Matthew's Gospel, few of Matthew's distinctive themes and turns of phrase are found in James; some of their shared vocabulary is common in other writings or is used rather differently by the two writers. In some respects James is closer in ethos to Luke than to Matthew.

The writer of James has drawn on his knowledge of a number of oral Jesus traditions in order to express his ethical concerns, but the extent of his indebtedness must remain an open question.

4. 1 Peter.

There are no explicit citations of sayings of Jesus in 1 Peter,* but more than thirty possible allusions to sayings of Jesus have been identified. Most scholars, however, accept no more than a handful of allusions to Jesus traditions.

Given that the author of this letter identifies himself in 1 Peter 1:1 as "Peter, apostle of Jesus Christ," the extent of allusions to sayings of Jesus has played a prominent part in discussion of the apostolic authorship of 1 Peter. Are there allusions to the sayings or events in the life of Jesus that could have come only from Peter himself? Or does the paucity of personal reminiscences tell against apostolic authorship?

In two detailed articles R. H. Gundry argued that 1 Peter was dictated by the apostle* Peter in Rome* and insisted that his dictation was peppered with frequent allusions to dominical sayings that were authentic and possessive of special interest to Peter. In a response to the first article, E. Best rejected most of the alleged allusions and concluded that contact between 1 Peter and Gospel traditions was confined primarily to two blocks, Luke 6:22-33 and Luke 12:32-45. Several more recent writers have assessed this debate and sided largely with Best, but they have added few fresh observations.

In the opening part of the great eulogy in 1 Peter 1:3-9 the writer includes himself along with the readers: "By God's great mercy he has given us a new birth" (see Mercy; New Birth). In 1 Peter 1:8, however, the writer switches to the second person plural: "Although you have not seen him, you love him; and even though you do not see him now, you believe in him." Is this an indication that although the readers have not seen the earthly Jesus, the writer (i.e., Peter) was an eyewitness? This seems unlikely. In the remainder of the letter* the second person plural is used frequently in passages in which the writer is not necessarily distinguishing himself from his readers.

When the writer refers to himself as a "witness of the sufferings of Christ" (1 Pet 5:1), does he imply that he himself was an eyewitness to some of the events of the passion? Although this verse may be interpreted in this way, it should be noted that the phraseology of the references to the sufferings of Christ in 1 Peter 2:23-25 are taken from Isaiah 53, not from eyewitness testimony.

The following are some of the clearest examples of possible allusions in 1 Peter to Jesus traditions.

(1) The closing sentences of the Beatitudes (Mt 5:10-11 par. Lk 6:22) are alluded to in 1 Peter 3:14 and 1 Peter 4:14, even though these verses share only three Greek words.

(2) The whole of 1 Peter 2:12, a lengthy verse, is strikingly similar in content to Matthew 5:16 (which does not have a close parallel elsewhere in the Gospels), but they have only four Greek words in common.

(3) There are a number of similarities between 1 Peter 1:11 and Luke 24:26-27, but these verses have only one Greek word in common.

(4) 1 Peter 4:13 and Matthew 5:12 share two Greek verbs in the same order ("rejoice and be glad"), and this might be taken at first sight to indicate dependence. But the two contexts are very different, and the two verbs are hardly unusual.

Some interpreters argue that an allusion by the writer of 1 Peter to the content or a few words of Jesus traditions would have triggered in the minds of the readers recollection of larger blocks of traditions: the writer and the recipients of his letter were steeped deeply in traditions of the teaching of Jesus. This may have been the case, but if so, it would be difficult to understand why the writer frequently used his own turns of phrase and favorite terminology in passages that are similar in content to Jesus traditions.

We may be confident that 1 Peter drew on several clusters of Jesus traditions that were relevant to the points the writer wished to make. But it is impossible to be precise about the extent of the writer's knowledge and use of Jesus traditions. In several cases allusion to Jesus traditions is possible, but the influence of other early Christian catechetical traditions cannot be ruled out. However, the writer and perhaps his readers may have known many more sayings of Jesus that are not alluded to in this letter because they were not relevant to the themes being emphasized.

The writer knew oral Jesus traditions rather than written Gospels, but there is not enough evidence to decide whether or not he knew some form of Q. Since the clearest allusions are to Jesus traditions in Greek rather than Aramaic, it has often been claimed that they rule out Petrine authorship of this letter. This line of argument, however, is not compelling. We now know that Greek was spoken in some circles in first-century Galilee, and Greek may well have been used from time to time by Peter and Jesus, even though Aramaic was their native language.

5. 2 Peter and Jude.

2 Peter* includes an intriguing reference to the transfiguration in 2 Peter 1:16-18. The writer claims to have been an eyewitness of the majesty of Christ. "For he received honor and glory from God the Father when that voice was conveyed to him by the Majestic Glory, saying, 'This is my Son, my Beloved, with whom I am well pleased.' We ourselves heard this voice come from heaven while we were with him on the holy mountain" (2 Pet 1:17 NRSV).

Some scholars have claimed that the large number of differences from the transfiguration traditions in the Synoptic Gospels suggest that these verses are an account of a postresurrection appearance of Jesus (see Resurrection). But the words of the voice from heaven,* as well as the references to the visible majesty of Christ and to the presence of "Peter" and others on the mountain, confirm that this is a terse version of the transfiguration traditions. Although the phraseology of these verses is a little closer to Matthew than to the other Gospels, they almost certainly originated as an independent tradition that has been revised and perhaps abbreviated by the writer to fit its present context. If that is so, they provide important evidence for the continuing circulation of oral traditions of events in the life of Jesus as well as of his teaching. (For a full discussion see Bauckham, 205-12.)

There are three further references to Jesus traditions. At 2 Peter 1:14 "Peter" notes that he will die shortly, as indeed the Lord* Jesus Christ has told him clearly. This is usually taken to be a reference to the saying of Jesus recorded in John 21:18. While dependence on the final form of the Fourth Gospel is possible, there are no other indications in 2 Peter that the writer and his readers knew this Gospel. 2 Peter 1:14 and John 21:18 are more likely to depend independently on a similar oral tradition concerning Peter's impending death.

At 2 Peter 2:20 there is close verbal agreement with the conclusion to the parable-like story of the returning unclean spirit (Mt 12:45 par. Lk 11:26). While the context suggests that the writer may know the whole story, this is unlikely in view of the fact that 2 Peter 2:22 quotes two proverbs rather than the Jesus tradition.

2 Peter 3:10, "the day of the Lord will come like a thief," is almost certainly related to the parable of the thief (Mt 24:43 par. Lk 12:39), for the image of a thief is found only in early Christian writings. Dependence on the version of this tradition in 1 Thessalonians 5:2 cannot be ruled out, for the verbal similarity is as close as it is to the Q tradition.

Several further phrases in 2 Peter may allude to Jesus traditions, but since there are similar phrases in OT or later Jewish writings, certainty is not possible.

The short letter of Jude* does not contain any clear allusions to Jesus traditions. Jude 17 urges readers to remember the predictions of the apostles of Christ; their words are quoted at a point where we may have expected a saying of Jesus. "They said to you, 'In the last time there will be scoffers, indulging their own ungodly desires.' " The next verse notes that these people are causing divisions. The theme of these two verses recalls Matthew 24:10-12 and related passages, so it might be argued that Jesus traditions are referred to here at second hand (i.e., via "the apostles"). But since there are no close verbal similarities, the link with Jesus traditions is at best tenuous.

6. The Johannine Epistles.

Although there are no traces of Synoptic Jesus traditions in the Johannine epistles (see John, Letters of), the relationship between John's Gospel and the Johannine epistles has long been a perplexing problem. Nearly every verse of 1 John contains a phrase or theme found in John's Gospel; there are also many links between 2 John and 3 John and the Gospel. There are so many differences, however, that common authorship is probably ruled out.

In the patristic period 1 John was often considered to have been written either to introduce the Gospel or to comment on its text. Variations on both these views are still advanced. R. E. Brown, for example, argues that 1 John is attempting to correct misinterpretation of the Gospel by the secessionists. On the basis of the impressively long list of parallels between 1 John and the Gospel (Brown, 757-59) and possible links between the structure of 1 John and the Gospel, Brown concludes that it is more likely that the author of 1 John knew some form of the written Gospel itself than merely the kind of tradition contained in it (Brown, 101, 86 n. 190). If this is so, 1 John would provide the earliest evidence for use of Jesus traditions in written rather than oral form.

Although Brown's views have been influential on recent scholarship, they have not won the day. For 1 John does not contain any proof of direct dependence either on Johannine Jesus traditions in oral form or on the written text of a version of John's Gospel itself. From time to time the rather unlikely view that the Johannine epistles were written before the Gospel has been defended.

In 1 John, as is the case in several other early Christian writings, there are a number of possible allusions to Jesus traditions. But careful consideration of the evidence suggests that it is unwise to draw bold conclusions about the ways Jesus traditions were used in Johannine circles.

7. Revelation.

Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) contains a handful of clear allusions to Jesus traditions. The following passages are among the most striking: Revelation 1:3, "blessed are those who hear and who keep what is written in it [the words of the prophecy]; for the time is near" (cf. Lk 11:28); Revelation 1:7, with its conflation of Daniel 7:13 and Zechariah 12:10, is closely related to Mt 24:30. In Revelation 3:3 (and cf. Rev 16:15) the Parousia* of Christ is likened to the coming of a thief, as in the Q tradition (Mt 24:42-23 par. Lk 12:39-40). A Q tradition (Mt 10:32 par. Lk 12:8) also lies behind Revelation 3:5: "I will confess your name before my Father and before his angels." Revelation 13:10, "if you kill with the sword, with the sword you must be killed," is dependent on the Jesus tradition in Matthew 26:52.

Most intriguing of all is the use in Revelation of the "hearing formula," "let anyone with ears to hear, listen," which is found in several strands of the Synoptic tradition (Mk 4:9 par. Mt 13:9 par. Lk 8:8; Mk 4:23; Mt 11:15; Mt 13:43; Lk 14:35). With the exception of Matthew 11:15 (which follows the statement that John the Baptist is the expected Elijah), these passages all conclude parables of Jesus. In Revelation, however, the similar hearing formula is used in a different context, at the end of all seven letters in Revelation 2—3 to churches in Asia Minor (Rev 2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22; cf. also Rev 13:9). In spite of the different contexts and the slightly different wording, in the Synoptic traditions and in Revelation the hearing formula is used to encourage careful attention to the preceding teaching; it is not a signal pointing to an esoteric meaning.

The relationship of Revelation to John's Gospel continues to baffle scholars. Most scholars accept that both writings, as well as the Johannine epistles, come from the same circles, though common authorship is unlikely. Although there is no clear evidence that Revelation depends on John's Gospel in its written form rather than on oral Johannine traditions, numerous passages echo its vocabulary and themes. For example, Revelation 21:6, "to the thirsty I will give water as a gift from the spring of the water of life," and Revelation 22:17, "let everyone who is thirsty come; let anyone who wishes take the water of life as a gift," are closely related to John 4:10 and John 7:37.

Revelation, probably written toward the end of the first century under Domitian, is thus the first early Christian writing that draws on both Synoptic and Johannine Jesus traditions. Decisive evidence of literary dependence is lacking, so whether the author knew oral traditions or written Gospels must be left as an open question. Nonetheless Revelation's evidence for the merging of two streams of Jesus traditions no later than about A.D. 95 is most important.

One further point needs to be noted. Although the author of Revelation has a deep knowledge of the OT Scriptures, he never quotes from them explicitly (see Old Testament in Revelation). This phenomenon should alert us to the possibility that early Christian writings may be deeply dependent on Jesus traditions even though they are not cited.

8. Apostolic Fathers.

Jesus traditions are used extensively in the writings of the apostolic fathers.* As is the case in the canonical writings considered above, quotations are rare, and the extent of allusions is keenly debated. Unlike the canonical writings, however, the apostolic fathers provide some limited evidence of the use of written Gospels. As we shall see, opinions differ on the interpretation of individual passages.

8.1. The Didache. Several passages in this fascinating manual of early church instruction and discipline (see Didache) contain close parallels to sayings of Jesus included in the Synoptic Gospels.

In the opening six chapters traditional Jewish ethical teaching has been lightly christianized. Two ways are contrasted: the characteristics of the "way of life" are set out in Didache 1—4 and the sinful acts that are the "way of death" are listed in Didache 5; there is a short conclusion to the Two Ways traditions in Didache 6.

This lengthy section opens with a passage (Did. 1.2—2.1) that contains numerous parallels to traditions in Matthew and Luke. These verses include a negative form of the Golden Rule (cf. Mt 7:12 par. Lk 6:31) and a series of close parallels with Matthew 5:39-48 (par. Lk 6:27-36) and with Matthew 5:25-26. However, there is no indication in the text that Jesus traditions are being cited. Perhaps the first users of the Didache would have known this almost instinctively. It is then striking that in this section Jesus traditions are not singled out in any way and given a higher authority than is the traditional Jewish ethical teaching that follows this passage.

The Didache's version of the Lord's Prayer (Did. 8.1-2) is closely related to Matthew 6:9-13. The prayer is introduced in a similar way: "Do not pray as the hypocrites do, but as the Lord commanded in his Gospel, pray like this: Our Father in heaven, hallowed be your name." The Didache includes the earliest example of what came to be the traditional doxology: "For yours is the power and the glory for ever." The Lord's Prayer is followed by the instruction, "Pray like this three times a day." This regular Jewish practice (see Ps 55:17) is taken over for the first time in a Christian writing. But instead of Jewish prayers, the words of the Lord (Jesus) are to be used. In this way Christians are to differentiate themselves from Jews (see Worship).

In one key passage a saying of Jesus is quoted (probably from oral tradition) with an introductory formula: "The Lord has also spoken concerning this [i.e., participation in the Eucharist by unbaptized persons]: 'Do not give what is holy to dogs' " (Did. 9.5). In Matthew 7:6 an identical proverbial saying is enigmatic; here it is given a specific context.

The final chapter of the Didache opens with an exhortation, "Watch over your life: do not let your lamps go out, and do not let your loins be ungirded, but be ready, for you do not know when our Lord is coming" (Did. 16.1). Further numerous parallels to verses in Matthew 24 follow, at least some of which presuppose knowledge of Matthew's written Gospel rather than the sources on which the evangelist drew (see Tuckett, 200-214).

Four passages in the Didache refer to "the Gospel." In addition to Didache 8.2, cited above, these passages advise readers to "deal with the apostles and prophets in accordance with the decree of the Gospel" (Did. 11.3); "Reprove one another, not in anger but in peace, as you find in the Gospel.... Carry out all your prayers and acts of charity and actions just as you find in the Gospel of our Lord" (Did. 15.3-4). Although these passages may refer to an oral collection of the sayings of Jesus, Matthew's written Gospel is more probable, especially in the light of Didache 8.2, which reflects the Matthean context of the Lord's Prayer.

The date of the Didache cannot be settled easily, especially since it is clearly a composite document. While many traditions in the Didache have first-century roots and thus predate some NT writings, the final redaction seems to have taken place in the early decades of the second century. By this time Jesus traditions in both oral and written form were being used extensively in instruction of Christians.

8.2. 1 Clement. Although this lengthy letter (see Clement of Rome) has traditionally been dated to about A.D. 95, it may come from the early decades of the second century. Two passages use clusters of Jesus traditions; several others contain probable allusions. In 1 Clement 13.1 seven maxims are introduced as follows: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, which he spoke as he taught gentleness and patience. For he said this:

> Show mercy that you may receive mercy;
> forgive that you may be forgiven.
> As you do, so shall it be done to you.
> As you give, so shall it be given to you.

As you judge, so shall you be judged.
As you show kindness, so shall kindness be shown to you.
With the measure you use, it will be measured to you."

Five of the seven maxims are related, with varying degrees of closeness, to traditions in Matthew's or Luke's versions of the Sermon on the Mount. Oral traditions seem to have been reshaped for ready memorization.

The second passage opens with a similar introductory formula, "Remember the words of Jesus our Lord, for he said: 'Woe to that man! It would have been good for him if he had not been born, than that he should cause one of my elect to sin. It would have been better for him to have been tied to a millstone and cast into the sea, than that he should turn aside one of my elect' " (1 Clem. 46.7-8). Here there are links with Mark 14:21 and Mark 9:42 and parallels, but the verbal agreement is not extensive. Once again oral rather than written Jesus traditions seem to have been used.

8.3. Ignatius. In the seven letters of Ignatius* there is only one explicit quotation of a saying of Jesus: "after the resurrection, when Jesus came to Peter and those with him, he said to them: 'Take hold of me; handle me and see that I am not a disembodied demon' " (Ign. Smyrn. 3.1-2). Although this saying recalls Luke 24:39, it is probably taken from oral tradition rather than Luke's Gospel, for these words are attributed by Jerome to the Gospel according to the Hebrews and by Origen to the Preaching of Peter.

The letters include several allusions to sayings of Jesus, some probably from oral tradition, some from a written Gospel. "The tree is known by its fruit" (Ign. Eph. 14.2) is similar in wording to Matthew 12:33. The proverbial character of these words suggests oral tradition; there is no indication in the context that a Jesus tradition is being referred to. In Trallians 11.1 (and similarly in Ign. Phld. 3.1) the "opponents" of Ignatius are referred to as people who "are not of the Father's planting." Here the allusion to a redactional verse at Matthew 15:13 suggests dependence on Matthew's written Gospel. If so, the context is altered: Matthew's attack on Pharisees is adapted for use against docetists.*

In Ignatius's writings there are more references to the life of Jesus than occur in works of other apostolic fathers. In Ephesians 17.1 the reader is reminded that "the Lord received ointment upon his head," an allusion to Matthew 26:6-13. Several passages refer to the virgin birth and Davidic descent of Jesus, his sufferings, crucifixion under Pontius Pilate and resurrection (e.g., Ign. Magn. 11; Ign. Trall. 9.1-2; Ign. Smyrn. 1.1-2; see Worship for a possible liturgical setting). Although the full humanity of Jesus is stressed, these passages move directly from the birth of Jesus (and in the case of Ign. Smyrn. 1.1, the baptism* of Jesus) to his passion.

Ignatius and his readers were probably acquainted with rather more of the teaching and actions of Jesus than the references and allusions in the letters might suggest. This is strongly suggested by the fact that in at least some of Ignatius's references to the noun gospel, he has a written Gospel (almost certainly Matthew) in mind. In Philadelphians 9.2 "the Gospel" includes the coming (Parousia), here undoubtedly the life of Jesus Christ, as well as his suffering and resurrection. This suggests that a written rather than an oral proclamation of the cross* and resurrection is being referred to, but the latter interpretation is possible.

In the letter to the Smyrneans, however, there is less room for doubt. The letter opens (Ign. Smyrn. 1.1) with a creedal* summary of christological* convictions that refers to the baptism of Jesus by John, "in order that all righteousness might be fulfilled by him." The verbal agreement with Matthew 3:15, a verse that bears the stamp of Matthew's redactional hand, is sufficiently close to persuade most scholars that Ignatius is here quoting Matthew's Gospel.

In the same letter (Ign. Smyrn. 5.1) Ignatius notes that neither the prophecies* nor the law* of Moses nor "the gospel" has persuaded his opponents. The juxtaposition of "the gospel" with scriptural writings strongly suggests that, in this letter at least, Ignatius is referring to a writing, most probably Matthew's Gospel, which he has quoted a few paragraphs earlier. A similar juxtaposition of "the gospel" with scriptural writings is found two paragraphs later (Ign. Smyrn. 7.2). Here Ignatius urges his readers to "pay attention to the prophets and especially to 'the Gospel' in which the passion has been made clear to us and the resurrection has been accomplished."

For Ignatius, as for the Didachist, Jesus traditions, whether oral or written, are "Gospel."

8.4. Polycarp. Two passages in Polycarp's* letter to the Philippians are of special interest. At Philippians 2.3 the readers are exhorted to "remember what the Lord taught." Four Jesus traditions are then quoted:

> Judge not, that you be not judged, > forgive and it shall be forgiven unto you,
> be merciful that you may obtain mercy.
> with the measure you use, it will be measured to you again.

These sayings are closely related to four of the seven maxims quoted in 1 Clement 13.1-2 (see 8.2 above) and the Q traditions in Matthew 7:1-2 (par. Lk 6:36-38). The order and the wording of the sayings are not fixed, so this passage is almost certainly drawn from oral tradition. A further Jesus tradition is attached with the word and: "Blessed are the poor and they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of God." This tradition is similar to Matthew 5:10, a redactional verse, so it seems to reflect Matthew's written Gospel. If that is so, then the juxtaposition of oral and written Jesus traditions in the one passage is striking.

At Philippians 7.2, a Jesus tradition, "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak," is introduced with the words "as the Lord said." Here it is difficult to decide whether oral or written tradition (Mk 14:38 par. Mt 26:41) has been used. This is also the case with the allusion to the Lord's Prayer at Philippians 6.1-2.

8.5. Barnabas. There are few references to Jesus traditions in the *Epistle of Barnabas. Given this letter's concentration on the interpretation of OT passages, this is not surprising (see Old Testament in Apostolic Fathers). In Barnabas 4.14 a terse saying, "many are called but few chosen," is introduced by a phrase that points to use of a written document: "it is written." This may well be a reference to Matthew 22:14 in its written form, but since there is a similar proverbial saying in 4 Ezra 8:3, the question cannot be readily answered. In Barnabas 5.9 the writer states that Jesus "came not to call the righteous but sinners" (Mk 2:17 and parallels). There is no indication in the context that this is a Jesus tradition. Perhaps readers of Barnabas were so familiar with this saying that they would have recognized it immediately as a saying of Jesus. Or perhaps the writer knows many Jesus traditions and quotes one here instinctively, without any awareness that it is a saying of Jesus.

8.6. Shepherd of Hermas. In this lengthy writing (see Hermas, Shepherd of) there are a large number of possible allusions to Jesus traditions, but none of them is preceded by an introductory formula. Scholarly opinion is divided: some think that the writer is steeped in oral Jesus traditions, while others are convinced that he knew at least some of the Gospels that later became canonical. As in most of the writings under discussion, the allusions are all to sayings of Jesus.

8.7. 2 Clement. This sermon (whose relationship to 1 Clement is unclear) probably dates from the middle of the second century, a little later than the writings discussed above. For several reasons its use of Jesus traditions is particularly interesting.

Immediately after citation and discussion of Isaiah 54:1 in 2 Clement 2.1-3, a striking introductory formula precedes citation of a saying of Jesus: "And another Scripture says, 'I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners' " (cf. Mk 2:17 par. Mt 9:13). Here for the first time in an early Christian writing, a written Gospel or possibly a written collection of sayings of Jesus is quoted as Scripture and considered to have the same authority as Isaiah.

In 2 Clement 8.5 an introductory formula introduces baffling Jesus traditions: "For the Lord says in the Gospel: 'If you did not guard something small, who will give you something great? For I say to you, the person who is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much.' " The latter part is in verbatim agreement with Luke 16:10, so perhaps this a rare early quotation of Luke's Gospel. While the first part of the quotation could be a free rendering of Luke 16:11-12, it may stem from a noncanonical source.

In three further passages, the formula "the Lord says" introduces Jesus traditions (2 Clem. 5.2-4; 6.1-2; 9.11). In each case there are close but not exact parallels in the Synoptic Gospels. The author could be quoting freely from memory from two or even all three Synoptic Gospels, he could be drawing on a harmonized written collection of Jesus traditions or an apocryphal* gospel, or he could be referring to oral traditions. The evidence does not allow us to settle the matter.

In 2 Clement 13.4 a Jesus tradition very similar to Luke 6:32, 35 is introduced by "God says." Since 2 Clement does not equate Jesus with God, the sense here seems to be, "God says in a [scriptural] Gospel," as in 2 Clement 2.1-3 (see above).

In 2 Clement 9.5-6 there seems to be clear dependence on John's Gospel: "If Christ the Lord who saved us was spirit at first but became flesh [cf. Jn 1:14] and so called us, so we shall receive the reward in the flesh. Let us then love one another [cf. Jn 13:34] so that we may all come to the kingdom of God." In this case there is no introductory formula, so at best we have here two allusions to John's Gospel. Nonetheless, this passage provides evidence that Johannine as well as Synoptic Jesus traditions were known and used in the same circles before the middle of the second century. As we shall see (10 below), this conclusion coheres with other evidence that suggests that the fourfold Gospel began to gain ground at this time.

8.8. Papias. About A.D. 110 Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Asia Minor, wrote in five books his Exposition of the Lord's Logia. Perhaps as many as twenty fragments have survived. His comments on the origin and purpose of Matthew and Mark are intriguing and have been discussed repeatedly. More important for our purposes is Papias's attitude toward oral and written Jesus traditions.

In the preface to his work Papias commented as follows on his own careful search for "the commandments given by the Lord to the faith": "For I did not think that information from books would profit me as much as information from a living and abiding voice" (quoted by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39.3). Papias's preference for oral instruction by an authoritative teacher is clear. As we have seen, there is plenty of other evidence for the continuing importance of oral Jesus traditions well into the second century.

Papias, however, did not reject written Jesus traditions. The title of his work suggests that he himself collected and wrote down traditions of both the sayings and the deeds of Jesus: he uses the term logia to refer to the sayings and deeds of Jesus in Mark's Gospel. His comments on Matthew and Mark confirm that he was not opposed to written Jesus traditions.

The surviving fragments of Papias are terse and often difficult to interpret. Nonetheless they remind us of the complex relationship between oral and written Jesus traditions in the early decades of the second century.

9. Other Early Christian Writings (Agrapha). In the preceding sections reference has frequently been made oral Jesus traditions that continued to circulate for some time among early Christian communities. In most cases these oral traditions are related to sayings found in the canonical Gospels. But some were either unknown to or ignored by the Evangelists; Acts 20:35 is a notable example.

The large number of sayings attributed to Jesus in early Christian writings, but not included in the four canonical Gospels, have been referred to as agrapha ("unwritten sayings") for more than two hundred years. Many of the agrapha are found in writings much later than the first- and second-century writings considered above. Do any of the agrapha in these later writings have strong claims to be authentic sayings of Jesus?

J. Jeremias assessed critically the references to sayings of Jesus outside the Gospels and concluded that in all probability eighteen such sayings were spoken by Jesus. The evidence has been reassessed recently by his former pupil and colleague O. Hofius, who concludes that only nine of the agrapha have strong claims to authenticity.

The nine sayings are as follows.

(1) In 1905 one damaged page of a tiny parchment book was discovered with writing on both sides. The forty-five lines of Greek text in microscopic script have still not received the attention they deserve. The tiny book was probably used as an amulet, a charm hung around the neck to ward off evil. The text includes an account of a discussion between Jesus and a pharisaic chief priest named Levi, who criticizes Jesus and his disciples for ignoring regulations for walking in the temple* court. Levi speaks to Jesus as follows:

> Who gave you leave to [trea]d this place of purification and to look upon [the]se holy utensils without having bathed yourself and even without your disciples having [wa]shed their f[eet]?

In his response Jesus echoes anti-pharisaic polemic found in Matthew 23 and concludes:

> But I and [my disciples], of whom you say that we have not im[mersed] ourselves, [have been im]mersed in the li[ving . . .] water which comes down from [. . . B]ut woe unto those who . . . (P.Oxy 840)

This passage is similar to discussions concerning purity* regulations in Mark 7, but it does not seem to be directly dependent on any of the NT Gospels. If in its original form it is an authentic tradition, it would provide further evidence that Jesus took a radical stance concerning purity regulations.

(2) In a sermon in Syriac we read: "As you are found, so you will be led away hence" (Liber Graduum 3.3.).

(3) Logion 8 of the Gospel of Thomas:

> And Jesus said: A man is like a wise fisherman, who cast his net into the sea and drew it up from the sea full of small fish. Among them the wise fisherman found a good large fish. He threw down all the small into the sea. He chose the large fish without trouble. He who has ears to hear, let him hear.

(4) At the beginning of the third century, Clement of Alexandria quotes the following saying of Jesus: "Ask for great things, and God will add unto you the little things" (Clement of Alexandria Strom. 1.24.158).

(5) In the middle of the third century Origen quotes the following saying, which is also referred to by six other early Christian writers: "Be approved money changers."

(6) In Codex Bezae an additional short tradition is added to the text of Luke 6:4: "On the same day he [Jesus] saw someone working on the Sabbath and said to him, 'Man, if you know what you are doing, you are blessed; if you do not know, you are cursed and a transgressor of the law.' "

(7) Gospel of Thomas logion 82: "Whoever is near me, is near the fire; whoever is far from me, is far from the kingdom."

(8) Jerome (c. A.D. 400) claims that he found the following words in the Gospel of the Hebrews (now lost): "And never be joyful, save when you look upon your brother in love."

(9) A papyrus fragment (P.Oxy 1224), probably part of an apocryphal gospel, contains two sayings that are similar to Matthew 5:44 and Luke 9:50. A third saying that is not related to the canonical Gospels may be authentic: "[He that] stands far off [today] will tomorrow be [near you]."

Hofius notes that the first five of these nine sayings may be related in some way to the canonical Gospels, so perhaps only the last four have strong claims to be independent "new" sayings of Jesus. Hofius concludes, surely correctly, that the four NT Gospels contain nearly all that was known about the life and teaching of Jesus in the second half of the first century. A thorough search of all early Christian writings for possible references to words of Jesus confirms the value of the canonical Gospels and related oral traditions as evidence for the life and teaching of Jesus.

10. Jesus Traditions and the Fourfold Gospel. From shortly after the middle of the second century, Justin Martyr's Apology I and his Dialogue with Trypho provide important evidence for the use of Jesus traditions. In Apology I 67 there is an explicit comment on the context in which Jesus traditions were used. In his well-known account of eucharistic worship, Justin refers to the reading of "the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets, as long as time allows." Here apostolic writings are being accorded a similar authority to the writings of the prophets, a Christian shorthand way of referring to the OT Scriptures. In the preceding chapter the reader is told explicitly that "the memoirs of the apostles" are "the Gospels" (Apol. I 66), the first Christian occurrence of the plural.

In addition to these two references to "the memoirs of the apostles" in Apology I, Justin uses the phrase thirteen times in one section of the Dialogue (Justin Dial. Tryph. 98—107), in which he seems to have incorporated his own earlier extended anti-gnostic exposition of Psalm 22 and in which he emphasizes the "writtenness" of "the memoirs of the apostles." At one point in this exposition Justin refers to Peter's memoirs; from the context this is a reference to Mark's Gospel (Dial. Tryph. 106.3). So in both the Apology and the Dialogue the "memoirs" are identified as written Gospels.

How many Gospels does Justin accept? In Dialogue with Trypho 103.8 he refers to "the memoirs composed by the apostles [of Jesus] and those who followed them." Although Justin never refers to the number of the Gospels he accepts, this passage implies that there were at least four. There is general agreement that Justin used Matthew and Luke regularly and that Mark's Gospel is referred to once (Dial. Tryph. 106.3). Justin's knowledge of the Fourth Gospel is much disputed, but Apology I 61.4 draws on John 3:3-5 and Dialogue with Trypho 88.7 shows knowledge of John 1:19-20. Justin's failure to refer to John's Gospel more frequently is puzzling, but it may be related to his strong interest in infancy narratives, in ethical teaching and in futurist eschatological* sayings, all in somewhat short supply in this Gospel. Since there is no clear evidence for Justin's knowledge of any Gospels other than the canonical four, we can be all but certain that he had in mind Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, no more, no less.

Justin uses the singular "Gospel" in only two passages, but in both cases he is referring to written Jesus traditions. Justin's opponent, Trypho, states that he has read with appreciation the commands of Jesus "in the so-called Gospel" (Dial. Tryph. 10.2) At Dialogue with Trypho 100.1 there is a similar usage: a citation of Matthew 11:27 is introduced with the words "it is written in the Gospel." These two references recall Irenaeus's much more frequent use of the phrase "in the Gospel" some thirty years later. For Justin, as for Irenaeus, the sayings of Jesus are of special importance: they are recorded "in the Gospel," "in the memoirs of the apostles."

It is not easy to account for the variations in wording from Matthew and Luke in Justin's citations of Jesus traditions. In some cases Jesus traditions from the Gospels have been harmonized; some of those harmonized traditions can be traced in his pupil Tatian's more thoroughgoing harmony of the Gospels. It is likely that for catechetical purposes (and possibly even to disarm critics) Justin himself gathered together topically harmonized clusters of sayings of Jesus from written Gospels, primarily Matthew and Luke. In this respect he partially anticipates Tatian. In his use of written Gospels alongside harmonized sayings of Jesus, his successor is Irenaeus.

Recent research suggests that Justin may well have possessed a four-Gospel codex in the library of his catechetical school in Rome. T. C. Skeat has shown that papyri fragments of Matthew (P^{64} + P^{67}) and of Luke (P^{4}) are from a late-second century codex that contained all four Gospels. G. N. Stanton (1997) has drawn attention to one of the codex's most striking features: its use of two columns to the page is rare in papyrus codices. This is the only example of a two-column Greek NT papyrus manuscript, though there are four examples in early fragments of OT papyri. The narrow columns, with only about fifteen letters in each column, would have assisted reading aloud in the context of worship. So the use of two columns in P^{64} + P^{67} + P^{4} is almost certainly an indication of a high-class codex, a splendid "pulpit edition" of the four Gospels intended for liturgical use. This codex was an édition de luxe that was planned and executed meticulously. All these features indicate a handsome edition of the four Gospels, which would have been expensive to produce. This codex does not look like an experiment by a scribe working out ways to include four Gospels in one codex; it certainly had predecessors much earlier in the second century.

When Irenaeus set out the earliest defence of the church's fourfold Gospel in about A.D. 180, he almost certainly did so on the basis of his use of codices that contained all four Gospels. His main point is clear: there is one gospel in fourfold form, held together by one Spirit (Irenaeus Adv. Haer. 3.11.8). He frequently refers to "the Gospel," "the Gospel according to . . ." and only very rarely to "four Gospels." The gospel is primarily the faith* proclaimed and transmitted by the apostles and only secondarily the written record reported by such and such an Evangelist. The church has the one God-given gospel as recorded by two apostles and two of their immediate associates: the gospel has been given to the church in fourfold form.

Although Irenaeus often cites passages from the four Gospels accurately, he also regularly introduces sayings of Jesus with "the Lord said," "the Lord said in the Gospel" or "the Lord declared" without indicating from which particular Gospel the sayings are taken. At the end of the preface to book 3, for example, a version of Luke 10:18 is introduced with the words "the Lord declared." In this case the text is cited in abbreviated form. It is difficult to decide whether the variation occurs as the result of faulty memory, Irenaeus's knowledge of an otherwise unattested textual tradition, or his use of oral tradition. In the middle of his extended discussion of the opening chapters of Luke, Irenaeus refers to four verses from John 1 but without indicating that he has switched from Luke to John (Irenaeus Adv. Haer. 3.10.3). Matthew 12:18-21 is quoted as part of the discussion of the opening chapters of John's Gospel, but once again the reader is not told about the change of Gospels. Similar phenomena occur elsewhere. This is not surprising once we recognize that for Irenaeus "the Gospel" and in particular the words of Jesus have a higher authority than do the individual writings of the Evangelists, even though the Gospels are referred to occasionally as "Scriptures."

Irenaeus is able to cite the written Gospels both carefully and carelessly, to weave together loosely passages from two or more Gospels and to introduce sayings with "the Lord said," some of which seem to be taken from the written Gospels, some from oral tradition. The fact that these various phenomena are found in a writer for whom the fourfold Gospel is fundamental stands as a warning sign for all students of Gospel traditions in the second century. Earlier Christian writers may also value the written Gospels highly even though they appeal directly either to the words of Jesus or to oral tradition, or even though they link topically sayings of Jesus taken from two or more Gospels. Irenaeus was not the only early Christian writer who cites "words of the Lord" and does not tell us whether he is quoting from written Gospels or from oral tradition.

11. Conclusions.

Although the use of Jesus traditions in early Christian writings raises a number of questions that must be left open, several conclusions can be drawn. The transition from the use of oral to written Jesus traditions is difficult to trace in detail, but the broad outline is clear. While it is possible that the Evangelists drew on written sources, in the very earliest post-Easter decades Jesus traditions were transmitted mainly in oral form. Even after the written Gospels began to circulate, oral traditions continued to be used, even as late as early in the third century. But by then the written fourfold Gospel was beginning to be accepted as primary, partly in the light of misuse of oral traditions by Montanists and Gnostics.*

Most of the examples of the use of Jesus traditions noted above are in the context of the catechetical instruction and exhortation of believers. This is not surprising since the writings referred to nearly all fall into that category. Some evidence suggests that Jesus traditions were also used in other contexts: Acts 10:36-43 indicates that the story of Jesus was an integral part of evangelism, and Justin's Apology I 67 confirms that readings from "the memoirs of the apostles" were part of eucharistic worship. Although the shape of some of the Jesus traditions included in the Gospels strongly suggests that they were used in apology and polemic, evidence for their use in these settings is scarce from outside the Gospels. When Justin and his Jewish opponent, Trypho, enter into dialogue, they differ sharply in their interpretation of the OT Scriptures, but according to Justin, not in their interpretation of Jesus traditions: Trypho has read the sayings of Jesus "in the Gospel" and considers them to be "admirable and great" (Dial. Tryph. 10.2).

The quotations of Jesus traditions confirm their importance for Christians in the period under discussion. The even more numerous allusions are difficult to assess. In some cases the writers seem to assume that readers will be familiar with the traditions to which allusion is made. In many other cases it is impossible to determine whether the allusions are deliberate or merely casual use of familiar phraseology. It is important to note that even in the latter case the allusions confirm that the writer was steeped so deeply in Jesus traditions that use of its phraseology was almost instinctive.

From early in the second century we have evidence for the use of the term gospel for both oral and written Jesus traditions. It is likely that in this period the title "the Gospel according to . . ." began to be used for the four writings that came to be accepted as canonical. From early in the second century and probably from much earlier, traditions of the sayings of Jesus and of his story were considered to be an integral part of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; CHRISTOLOGY; MARK, SECRET GOSPEL OF; MATTHEAN COMMUNITY; NONCANONICAL WRITINGS, CITATIONS OF; PETER, GOSPEL OF; THOMAS, GOSPEL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. W. Attridge, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); A. J. Bellinzoni, The Sayings of Jesus in the Writings of Justin Martyr (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1967); R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC 50; Waco: Word, 1983); E. Best, "I Peter and the Gospel Tradition," NTS 16 (1970) 95-113; R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John: Translated with Introduction, Notes, and Commentary (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963 [1959]); P. H. Davids, "James and Jesus" in Gospel Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1984) 63-84; K. P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity (NovTSup 38; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974); A.-M. Enroth, "The Hearing Formula in the Book of Revelation,"

NTS 36 (1990) 598-608; R. H. Gundry, "Verba Christi in 1 Peter," NTS 13 (1966) 336-50; idem, "Further Verba on Verba Christi in First Peter," Bib 55 (1974) 211-32; D. A. Hagner, "The Sayings of Jesus in the Apostolic Fathers and Justin Martyr" in Gospel Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1984) 233-68; idem, The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome (NovTSup 34; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); P. J. Hartin, James and the Q Sayings of Jesus (JSNTSup 47; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); O. Hofius, "Unbekannte Jesusworte" in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien, ed. P. Stuhlmacher (WUNT 28; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983) 355-82; C. N. Jefford, The Sayings of Jesus in the Teaching of the Apostles (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1989); J. Jeremias, Unknown Sayings of Jesus (rev. ed.; London: SCM, 1964); W. D. Köhler, Die Rezeption des Matthäusevangeliums in der Zeit vor Irenäus (WUNT 24; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987); H. Köster, Synoptische Überlieferung bei den apostolischen Vätern (TU 65; Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1957); S. S. Laws, A Commentary on the Epistle of James (HNTC; San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1980); E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature Before Saint Irenaeus, ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (NGS 5/1, 5/2, 5/3; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990-93); J.-M. Sevrin, ed., The New Testament in Early Christianity (Louvain: Louvain University Press, 1989); T. C. Skeat, "The Oldest Manuscript of the Four Gospels?" NTS 43 (1997) 1-31; G. N. Stanton, "The Fourfold Gospel," NTS 43 (1997) 317-46; idem, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching (SNTSMS 27; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974); idem, "Other Early Christian Writings: 'Didache,' Ignatius, 'Barnabas,' Justin Martyr" in Early Christian Thought in its Jewish Context, ed. J. Barclay and J. P. M. Sweet (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) 174-90; W. D. Stroker, Extracanonical Sayings of Jesus: Texts, Translations and Notes (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); C. M. Tuckett, "Synoptic Traditions in the Didache" in The New Testament in Early Christianity, ed. J.-M. Sevrin (Louvain: Louvain University Press, 1989) 197-230; D. Wenham, ed., Gospel Perspectives 5: The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels (Sheffield: JSOT, 1984).

G. N. Stanton

JEWISH CHRISTIANITY

The much discussed problem of defining Jewish Christianity is caused by the diversity of the phenomena to be explained and the difficulty of deciding what criteria to use in identifying it. One may, for example, focus on negative criteria, that is, on the lack of difference with Judaism (thus Baur, Hort). One may, on the other hand, establish certain positive criteria that are regarded as distinctive of Jewish Christianity. Daniélou found three such criteria, each representing a discrete group: a low christology* that denied the deity of Christ*; esteem for the Jerusalem* church ruled by the relatives* of Jesus; and an apocalyptic* orientation. One may focus on opposition to Paul and corresponding affirmation of the law* (see DPL, Opponents of Paul) R. E. Brown advocates speaking of four types of what he calls Jewish/Gentile Christianity, that is, Jewish Christianity and its Gentile* converts, depending on the degree of commitment to the observance of the law. In fact, as recent studies have emphasized, Jewish Christianity was anything but a single, unified phenomenon. We have to deal with something that extended over a period of three to four centuries, in locations throughout the Mediterranean world, phenomena further complicated by the mutual interpenetration of Judaism* and Hellenism, and the fact that Jewish Christianity expressed itself in a variety of both orthodox and heretical forms, known to us through widely different sources.

Broadly conceived, Jewish Christianity consists of those forms of Christian faith held by the Jewish Christians of the first few centuries. After that time Jewish believers in Christ were usually assimilated into the Gentile church, at least until the modern "Messianic Judaism" movement. Just as there were various manifestations of Judaism prior to A.D. 70, Jewish Christianity was itself also a varied phenomenon. We know orthodox varieties of Jewish Christianity directly from a number of NT writings and the apostolic fathers.* Even here, however, we find considerable diversity. Our knowledge of heterodox varieties of Jewish Christianity outside and later than the NT often comes to us more indirectly. Special caution is called for in considering the accounts of heterodox Jewish Christianity provided to us by the church fathers. The later sects known to us, for example, the Ebionites,* clearly reflect a departure theologically from the orthodoxy of the mainstream church on several key issues. This raises the question of the exact boundaries that mark out orthodoxy from heterodoxy.

1. Jewish Christianity in the New Testament
2. Jewish Christianity After the New Testament
3. Historical Observations
4. The Theology of Jewish Christianity
5. The Question of Orthodoxy and Heresy

1. Jewish Christianity in the New Testament. It may fairly be said at the outset that there is no Christianity in the NT that is not Jewish. All of the writers of the NT, with the exception of Luke, were themselves Jews who had believed in Jesus Christ and the gospel.* Even Paul's Christianity, often categorized as reflecting "Gentile Christianity," remains deeply Jewish in character. Yet, for all the continuity between Paul's Christianity and that of, say, early Palestinian Judaism, there is a distinct difference. This can be admitted without accepting the so-called Tübingen hypothesis of F. C. Baur. Indeed, certain documents of the NT manifest a Christianity that is distinctly Jewish in a way that contrasts with Paul's. These represent an identifiably specific type of Christianity we call Jewish Christianity, and it is these that are the focus of this section.

1.1. Acts. We must begin with Acts,* not because it is written from the perspective of Jewish Christianity, but because it provides the only description we have of the beginnings of Christianity among the Jews of Palestine. And although Acts is written relatively late, we may for our purpose take its representation of matters as essentially accurate. Earliest Christianity—that described by the opening chapters of Acts—was exclusively Jewish. In Acts we first encounter a Gentile Christian, excluding the exception of the Ethiopian eunuch in Acts 8:27-39, in the story of the conversion of the Roman centurion, Cornelius,* to which Luke gives so much space (Acts 10:1—11:18). Even "the Hellenists"* of Acts 6 were not Greeks (the word used in Acts 6:1 is Hellēnistai rather than Hellēnēs, which properly means "Greeks"). The argument in Acts 6 concerns Aramaic-speaking Jews and Greek-speaking Jews, that is, Jews who differed on the degree to which assimilation to Hellenism was to be tolerated.

What is remarkable about the earliest church is that it appears at first to be classifiable as a messianic sect within Judaism. The disciples are found frequently in the temple* (Acts 2:46; 5:21, 25, 42), going up at the hour of prayer,* presumably to pray (Acts 3:1, 3), and they are held in high regard by the people (Acts 2:47; 5:13). From this last point we may assume not only that they continued to observe the law, but that they continued in their Jewish practices and customs, including circumcision,* temple participation, Sabbath worship* and observance of food* laws. They were fully Jews, although to be sure they held the quite strange conviction that a recently crucified criminal had in fact risen from the dead and that he was the Messiah.

It was apparently Stephen,* a Hellenistic Jew, who first began to draw conclusions about the significance of Christ's death* for the practice of the Jewish church. He seems to have made the suggestion that the temple was of limited, or even outmoded, significance and that—undoubtedly leaning on some sayings of Jesus contained in the oral tradition—the law had now been significantly modified (Acts 6:13-14; although the witnesses against Stephen are "false" and distort the truth, what they say is not without basis). Stephen's radicalism ignited the first persecution* of the church, of Jews by Jews. It is unlikely that the more conservative, Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians, including the apostles,* agreed with Stephen's radical analysis of the new situation. The ability of the twelve apostles to remain in Jerusalem (Acts 8:1) implies that the persecution was not directed against them, probably because they dissociated themselves from the views of the Hellenistic Christians.

While there is no need to put undue stress upon the differences between the Aramaic-speaking and Hellenistic Jews, that there were important differences between them seems clear. The attempt of C. C. Hill to overturn the common reconstruction just offered is hardly successful (see Hellenists). He correctly cautions against a polarizing in the fashion of Baur, pointing to the increasingly recognized influence of Hellenism even upon Palestinian Judaism, and the necessarily overlapping backgrounds of the two groups of Jewish Christians. But he minimizes the significance of Stephen,* arguing that there was no truth in the claims of the false witnesses, and that the critique of the law and temple began with Gentile Christianity. Acts, however, gives no evidence of this. To be sure, the Aramaic-speaking Jews are also persecuted in Acts, but apart from Peter* and John* in Acts 4 and Peter in Acts 5 (which the populace does not support: Acts 4:21; 5:26), this persecution occurs later when not even the conservative Jerusalem Christians can continue to be regarded as a sect within Judaism.

Evidence concerning the conservative attitude of the Aramaic-speaking Jerusalem Christians toward the law in particular is found much later in the book of Acts. In Acts 21:20 they are represented as saying to Paul: "You see, brother, that there are many thousands among the Jews who have believed and all of them are zealous for the law (zēlōtai tou nomou)." Because of Paul's reputation concerning the law, he is forced to make a symbolic gesture of fulfilling his vow (cf. Acts 18:18) together with several other Jewish Christians (Acts 21:23). Here too we have evidence of the continuing role of the temple in the lives of the conservative Jerusalem Christians.

Also to be mentioned is the presence of Judaizers at the Jerusalem council in Acts 15. These ultraconservative Jewish Christians, described as former Pharisees, were insisting on the need for Gentiles to be circumcised* and to keep the law in order to be Christians (Acts 15:5). Arguing with Paul and against the Judaizers, however, were both Peter and James. Thus the Judaizers cannot be taken to represent the typical Jewish Christianity of the Jerusalem church, who upheld the importance of the law for Jewish Christians but not for Gentile Christians (cf. Gal 2:12).

1.2. The Gospel of Matthew. Since this Gospel was written for Jewish Christians, it reflects concerns of the congregation or congregations of Jewish Christianity for which it was written (see Matthean Community). The Jewish character of the Gospel can be seen in such things as the stress on the fulfillment of the OT, especially in the fulfillment formula quotations, the omission of Mark's explanation of Jewish customs, and the use of rabbinic patterns of argument (e.g., Mt 19:3-9). Some sayings of Jesus unique to Matthew can only have been preserved by and have meaning for Jewish Christians (e.g., Mt 10:5-6; 15:24; 23:2). Of particular significance, however, is the stress on the fidelity of Jesus to the law (e.g., Mt 5:17-19) as it can be seen in Matthew's redaction of Mark 7 in Matthew 15 (note especially the omission of Mark's editorial comment "Thus he declared all foods clean" [Mk 7:19 NRSV]). Also to be noted is the consistently strong call to "righteousness"* (dikaiosynē occurring in the Synoptic Gospels only in Matthew [except for the poetry of Lk 1:75], seven times). The insistence upon the permanence of the law and the emphasis on righteousness have been taken by some as a polemic against the Pauline gospel or at least against extreme Paulinists.

Other marks of a Jewish-Christian background to this Gospel can be seen in the narrative of the virgin birth, possibly written against Jewish claims of the illegitimacy of Jesus' birth, and in the resurrection* narrative, which addresses explicitly the Jewish claim that the missing body was stolen.

Matthew has always been somewhat of a puzzle to commentators because of several of its strong polarities. Thus, for example, for all the Jewish aspects of the Gospel that one might mention, there is at the same time a striking anti-Judaism (to be carefully distinguished from anti-Semitism) in Matthew. This can be seen in the distancing remarks "their synagogues" (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 10:17: 12:9: 13:54; cf. "your synagogues" [Mt 23:34]), "their scribes" (Mt 7:29), and in the striking reference to "the Jews" (Mt 28:15). More significant are the passages where Israel is in effect displaced by the church (Mt 8:11-12; 21:41, 43; 22:3, 8; cf. Mt 11:24; 13:10-15; 23:38; see Church as Israel). Worst of all, because it has been used to incite anti-Semitism, is the bitter statement in Matthew 27:25, "His blood be on us and on our children" (NRSV).

This strong anti-Judaism is precisely what one might expect among Jewish Christians who are in polemical debate with non-Christian Jews. This is an intramural polemic between Jews. Jewish Christians had to defend themselves against Jewish charges of disloyalty to the religion of Israel, abandonment of the law, and affiliation with an alien (if not pagan) religion whose membership was mainly Gentile. What can explain the polarities and distinctives of the Gospel is the life-setting of Jewish-Christian communities who exist between Jews who did not accept the new faith and a largely Gentile church. It is they above all who must be prepared to bring out of their treasure boxes "things both old and new" (Mt 13:52).

The Gospel of Matthew thus provides an interesting example of a Hellenistic Jewish Christianity that existed in the second half of the first century, very possibly as early as the late sixties, probably no later, however, than the mid-eighties. Torah righteousness is upheld in a distinctive way over against the Pauline view of the law, as articulated for the Gentile churches. It is not surprising to find Irenaeus reporting that many Jewish Christians accepted Matthew as the only authoritative Gospel (Adv. Haer. 1.26.2; 3.11.7).

1.3. Hebrews, James, Jude/2 Peter. If the tradition concerning the Petrine authorship of 1 Peter* may be relied upon, the letter may qualify for consideration as a product of Jewish Christianity. Although it is not without the marks of a Jewish perspective, however, 1 Peter appears to have been written to a Gentile readership, and its Christianity is not greatly different from that of Paul.

The epistle-homily we know under the title of Hebrews* was, by contrast, almost certainly addressed to Jewish Christians (cf. Heb 1:1; 2:16). The extent of the argument from the OT and its midrashic interpretation (see OT in Hebrews), the understanding of the cross through the detailed correspondences with the sacrificial ritual of the temple, the levitical priesthood* and the Mosaic covenant,* all point to the Jewish bedrock presupposed in this document. Hebrews is an exceptionally powerful statement about the final truthfulness of Christianity and the folly of returning to Judaism, perhaps a Judaism inclined to gnosticism.* What is remarkable about the Jewish Christianity of Hebrews is its very high christology, on the one hand, and its relative neglect of the subject of the law, on the other. Hebrews 13:9 (cf. Heb 9:10), however, does take a stand against the dietary laws—but perhaps only as abused within gnosticizing circles. The author and the readers were very probably Hellenistic Jewish Christians in Rome, probably in the late sixties of the first century.

James* represents one of the most distinctively Jewish Christian documents in the NT. Indeed, because it has no explicitly Christian doctrine and so few specifically Christian elements (Jas 1:1; 2:1; but, cf. Jas 1:18), many regard it as the slight reworking of an originally Jewish document. With its repeated imperatives, the letter emphasizes orthopraxy, stresses the importance of being doers, and not merely hearers, of the word, and lifts up the importance of social justice for the needy. In these and other respects, James resembles the wisdom* tradition of Israel (cf. Jas 1:5; 3:13, 15, 17). The law, referred to uniquely as 'the law of liberty" (Jas 1:25; 2:12) and "the royal law" (Jas 2:8), is also glorified (cf. Jas 4:11). And there is a famous polemic, if not against Paul, at least against extreme Paulinists (Jas 2:14-26). Consonant with the stress on the importance of the law is the reference to the position of James and the Jerusalem church in Acts 21:17-20.

The epistle of Jude* also reflects a Jewish-Christian background. The chief evidence for this is the reliance upon the apocalyptic* perspective, and specifically the quotation of, or allusion to, the non-canonical apocalyptic works 1 Enoch and the Testament of Moses (see Non-Canonical Citations). The midrashic section of Jude 5-19 is decidedly Jewish. On the other hand, the law is not referred to at all, despite the obvious concern for orthopraxy. If the tradition concerning the authorship by Jude the brother of James and Jesus, is true, then the author's context might well reflect Palestinian Jewish Christianity. 2 Peter,* dependent upon Jude, is a testamentary document pertaining to Peter. It too reflects a high interest in Jewish apocalyptic, but now within the framework of a Hellenistic Jewish Christianity. While much of the imagery in the letter-testament is clearly Jewish, the language often reflects Hellenistic terminology.

1.4. The Johannine Literature. The tradition underlying the Fourth Gospel stems from Palestinian Jewish Christianity. Linguistically its idiom may be designated Semitic and at several points the author indicates his awareness of the rabbinic interpretation of the Bible (e.g., Jn 1:51; 5:17; 8:56). At the same time, however, the Gospel reveals considerable Hellenistic influence. As it stands, the Fourth Gospel is the product of a Christianity reflecting the Hellenistic Judaism of the Diaspora (Asia Minor). In this Gospel one again encounters an ambiguity with respect to the Jews (cf. Matthew). Jesus can say in response to the Samaritan woman: "We worship what we know, and salvation is from the Jews" (Jn 4:22). At the same time, some of the harshest words against the Jews in the whole of the NT are found here: "You are from your father the devil, and you choose to do your father's desires" (Jn 8:44). This reflects the bitter hostility between the Jewish Christians and the non-Christian Jews (cf. Jn 16:1-4). In the Gospel of John there is a very high christology (directed in part against Jewish Christians with a low Christology?) together with a high view of the law (e.g., Jn 7:19, 49).

The three Johannine letters* appear to reflect similar characteristics and the same Hellenistic-Jewish-Christian milieu as the Gospel. All of the letters indicate a concern for righteousness, and 1 John reveals a high respect for the law (1 Jn 3:22; 5:2-3); sin is defined as "lawlessness" (anomia; 1 Jn 3:4).

1.5. The Apocalypse. The literary genre of the Book of Revelation* points in itself to its Jewish origin. Apocalyptic* is an essentially Jewish phenomenon and builds upon the precedent offered in the OT and in much of the literature between the testaments. The imagery of the book is repeatedly Jewish, reflecting the orientation of Jewish Christianity, from the reference to "a kingdom"* and "priests"* in Revelation 1:6 to "the holy city, the new Jerusalem" in Revelation 21:2. This Jewish Christianity too is in a hostile relationship to non-Christian Jews as can be seen especially from the reference to "those who say they are Jews and are not, but are a synagogue* of Satan" (Rev 2:9; 3:9). The Apocalypse is, of course, marked by a very high christology, one that makes much of Jewish imagery. The importance of the law is upheld (Rev 12:17; 14:12).

2. Jewish Christianity After the New Testament. Virtually from the beginning Jewish Christianity was diverse. Heterodox Jewish Christianity was also to be found from the beginning in, for example, the Judaizers against whom Paul fights in Galatians and Romans, and the gnosticizing Jewish Christians against whom he fights in Colossians. After the NT the diversity continues: orthodox forms continue, while heterodox forms of Jewish Christianity begin to harden in their opposition to the Gentile church.

2.1. Apostolic Fathers. Jewish Christianity is well represented in the apostolic fathers.* Both the *Didache and *Barnabas contain a description of the Christian life using the Jewish literary device of the "Two Ways" of life and of death. This may be a pre-Christian Jewish document used independently by the two writers. The Didache depends directly on the Gospel of Matthew and very probably reflects the same Jewish-Christian milieu. Orthopraxy is central and fasting is stressed, but on Wednesdays and Fridays, in contrast to the Mondays and Thursdays on which the non-Christian Jews fast. The eucharistic prayers* of Didache 9—10 are based on originally Jewish patterns of prayer. The law remains important, and the document's christology employs Jewish images, particularly in its pais ("servant") christology (Did. 9.2, 3; 10.2, 3) and in the reference to Jesus as "the Holy Vine of David" (Did. 9.2; cf. 10.6).

Pseudo-Barnabas, which ends with the "Two Ways" tradition, is filled with OT quotations, many of which are interpreted allegorically. Jewish imagery is abundant together with a stress upon the importance of the law (Barn. 2.6 ["without a yoke of necessity"]; Barn. 4.11; 21.8; cf. 4.1). Barnabas is striking for the sharpness of its argument against the law as observed by the Jews in order to prevent "conversion to their law" (Barn. 3.6). Thus in turn, the author refutes the Jewish notion of the sacrifices,* the Sabbath, the food* laws and the temple. Most notable is the argument that the covenant belongs to the Christians and not to the Jews (Barn. 4.6-7).

The *Shepherd of Hermas, also reflecting Hellenistic Jewish Christianity, is written in the form of a Jewish apocalypse similar to 2 Esdras. The central problem of Hermas is the possibility of repentance* after postbaptismal sin, and in the discussion of this subject the author reveals both extensive Jewish imagery and Hellenistic influence. The law is given high prominence in Hermas Similitude 8.3.1-8. Indeed, the second major section, Mandates, is given over entirely to an exposition of commandments for the penitent. Through the whole of the document the commandments receive the highest emphasis, with the refrain repeated again and again that the one who does the commandments will thereby live. A high christology is found in the exposition of the ninth Similitude.

1 Clement (see Clement) clearly comes from a Hellenistic Jewish Christianity in Rome. The letter-treatise is filled with OT quotations, examples from the history of Israel, and frequent Jewish imagery. The great prayer of 1 Clement 59—61 employs much Jewish terminology. 1 Clement contains a high christology (cf. 1 Clem. 59.2; 64.1). The law, on the other hand, receives no emphasis (the word is not found in 1 Clement). Indeed, the only place where the word "commandment"* (entolē) is found is in 1 Clement 13.3, where it is used in connection with the sayings of Jesus.

The homily known as 2 Clement (see Clement), not by the same author as 1 Clement, again makes extensive use of Jewish language and reflects a Jewish-Christian perspective. A distance from Judaism is indicated by 2 Clement 2.3. From the opening words of 2 Clement 1.1, "we must think of Jesus Christ as of God," and sprinkled throughout the document is a very high christology. The importance of the commandments is insisted upon, but as interpreted by Jesus (cf. 2 Clem. 4.5).

The seven authentic letters of Ignatius also contain language reflecting a Jewish Christianity. Here a more specific polemic against Judaism can be seen. Most striking is the statement in Ignatius Magnesians 8.1: "For if we are living until now according to Judaism, we confess that we have not received grace." This remark and the one following in Ignatius Magnesians 10.3: "It is monstrous to talk of Jesus Christ and to practice Judaism," are apparently addressed to Judaizers (so too Ign. Phld 6.1; cf. 8.2). A high christology is present (Ign. Eph. 7.2; 18.2) and Jesus "the High Priest" can be described as "the door of the Father, through which enter Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and the Prophets and the Apostles and the Church" (Ign. Phld. 9.1). The law, however, is not emphasized.

2.2. Cerinthus. An early second-century Jewish Christian, influenced by incipient gnosticism, Cerinthus is known to us only indirectly through Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 1.26.1; 3.11.1), Epiphanius (Haer. 28.4) and Hippolytus (Omn. Haer. Ref. 7.33). Cerinthus is significant because he represents the distinctives of Jewish Christianity as it begins to develop independently of the Gentile church. Thus one finds a strong emphasis on the law, especially circumcision and the Sabbath, and a low christology that describes Jesus as a man upon whom the Christ descended at the baptism and departed before the cross.

2.3. Justin Martyr. In his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, Justin reveals an awareness of Jewish believers in Christ. He allows their continuing obedience to the law, as long as they do not persuade Gentile Christians to join them in that obedience (Dial. 47). In the following chapter, Justin acknowledges that some Jews who confess Jesus as the Christ hold him to be only a man among men. Trypho later indicates that it would be acceptable to him if Christ had been elected to be the Messiah because of his faithful obedience to the law (Dial. 67), a view held by some Jewish Christians of a later time.

2.4. The Pseudo-Clementines. In Syria at the beginning of the third century, a Jewish Christianity produced a corpus of literature, apparently using earlier materials to some extent, under the name of Clement (of Rome), known more specifically under the titles Clementine Recognitions and Homilies. This literature, although showing signs of gnostic influence, represents a classic form of Jewish Christianity somewhat similar to that of the Gospel of Thomas. James, "the Lord's brother," and Peter are exalted. Much disputed is the question of whether the Simon Magus debated by Peter is a cipher for Paul himself. A strong emphasis on the continuing importance of the law is present. Again the "Two Ways" idea is presented, described as "those of obedience and disobedience to the law" (Hom. 20.2). While Christ is the only Savior (Recog. 1.51) and is described as "the true Prophet" (Recog. 5.10; 10.51; Hom. 3.21), he is the Son of God but not God (Hom. 16.25).

2.5. Sects: Ebionites, Nazoreans, Elkesaites. The most conspicuous name applied by the church fathers to Jewish Christianity is Ebionism.* We know about the Ebionites mainly from the apologists of the late second and third century, although it may well be that what we have encountered in the Pseudo-Clementines represents Ebionite Christianity. In the Ebionites Jewish Christianity has hardened in its heterodoxy against the Gentile church. Irenaeus, in the earliest mention of them, indicates that they "use the Gospel according to Matthew only [cf. Adv. Haer. 3.11.7], and repudiate the Apostle Paul, maintaining that he was an apostate from the law," and that they "persevere in the observance of those customs which are enjoined in the law" (Adv. Haer. 1.26.2). As for Ebionite christology, Irenaeus reports that they do not accept "the union of God and man," but only that Jesus was a naturally born man (Adv. Haer. 5.1.3). According to Eusebius, the Ebionites viewed Christ as "a plain and ordinary man," and he adds that "they insisted on the complete observance of the law" (Hist. Eccl. 3.27). While some of the patristic writers trace the name of the sect back to an individual named Ebion, the name almost certainly is from the Hebrew 'ebyônîm, meaning "the poor," and was probably indeed originally a reference to their actual poverty.

It is impossible to isolate distinctives of the Nazoreans (or Nazarenes; the spelling varies considerably), and the name refers probably to Jewish Christians indistinguishable from the Ebionites (pace Pritz, who distinguishes them from the Ebionites because of their orthodox christology). The fourth century Epiphanius used this name in his catalog of heresies (Haer. 29; cf. 18; cf. Jerome, Ep. 112.13).

A third sect, the Elkesaites, did not apparently differ much from the Ebionites. They took their name from Elkesai, who had produced a book containing the revelation he had received. They upheld the law strictly, a christology that spoke of Jesus as only a man, though a prophet, and they rejected totally the Pauline epistles. Most distinctive was their asceticism, which included vegetarianism. The Elkesaites are known to us from Origen (via Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.38; here the name is given the spelling Helkesaites), but primarily from Epiphanius (Haer. 19; 30.17; 53) and Hippolytus (Philos. 9.13-17; 10.29).

3. Historical Observations.

From the beginning, as we have seen, the only Christianity that existed was a Jewish Christianity. The church first spread from Jerusalem by means of Diaspora* Jews who had come to faith in Christ in the holy city. As they returned to their various communities in the Mediterranean world, they in effect founded Jewish-Christian communities. In this way the churches at Rome,* Antioch* of Syria, and Alexandria* in Egypt were founded. We have evidence of a thriving Jewish Christianity in these cities.

Paul's letter to the Romans indicates the existence in Rome, in the fifties, of the kind of tensions between Jewish and Gentile Christians that one might indeed expect (see esp. Rom 11:13-24; 15:7-13). This sort of problem undoubtedly existed in other places where there were sufficient numbers of Jewish and Gentile Christians. Eventually, it would appear, in many if not most places Jewish Christians eventually assimilated into the larger Gentile church. Where they did not, they usually began to polarize on certain issues in the process of establishing their identity against the larger church.

The events of the First Jewish Revolt of A.D. 66-70 were of course catastrophic for the Jerusalem church. According to a tradition increasingly challenged, but still to be regarded as trustworthy, the Palestinian Christians moved to Pella* in the Transjordan (perhaps believing that Jesus had directed them to do this; cf. Mk 13:14) around the year 67 (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.3.5). There some of them remained until perhaps the fourth century, apparently becoming more radical in their Jewishness, and eventually becoming known generally as Ebionites, or sometimes Nazoreans. Some, however, eventually returned to Jerusalem where they resumed leadership of the church. Although he probably overstates his case, Jervell's conception of the Jewish Christians as a "mighty minority" on through the first century into the second seems justified in light of the continuing strength of Jewish Christianity as it can be seen in the later NT writings and the apostolic fathers. It did not help the relation between Christians (whether Jewish or Gentile) and Jews when the former regarded the destruction of the temple as a vindicating expression of the judgment of God upon Judaism. Toward the end of the first century the polarization between Christian Jews and their non-Christian kinsfolk was aided by the expulsion of the Christian Jews from the synagogue through the deliberate alteration of the liturgical prayer called "the Eighteen Benedictions" (Shemoneh Esreh) to be directed against the "heretics" (minîm) and "Nazoreans" (noṣrîm), though this is debated.

To the credit of the Gentile church, it did not turn its back on its Jewish heritage (though this would happen later), nor did it in the late second century follow Marcion* in denying the Hebrew Scriptures their proper place in the Christian canon.* The church of the first four centuries knew the importance of its Jewish roots and the extent to which Christianity constituted the fulfillment of the OT (see Christianity and Judaism).

4. The Theology of Jewish Christianity.

Jewish Christianity was marked by diversity from the beginning. We see it already in the Aramaic-speaking and Hellenistic Jewish Christians of the early chapters of Acts, whose differences involved more than language, not to mention the Judaizers. As we move into later manifestations of Jewish Christianity, however, and particularly to increasingly heretical branches such as the Ebionites, more radical stances on key issues are often found.

4.1. The Law. Because of its central importance to Judaism, it is understandable that the law* becomes a crucial element within certain manifestations of Jewish Christianity. We have noted that already in the NT one encounters an amazing spectrum of opinion on the subject, from the Judaizers who insist on the law even for Gentile Christians, to the Jerusalem church under James, to Matthew's community, and to Paul and Hebrews. Commitment to the law in varying degrees may be said to characterize all of Jewish Christianity after the NT. Later Jewish Christianity, as represented by the Ebionites, solidified in its affirmation of the continuing validity of the commandments of the law (cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.27) and its rejection of Paul's law-free gospel.

4.2. Anti-Paulinism. One can detect some tension between Jewish Christianity and Paul already in Acts 21:21. It seems probable, furthermore, that James 2:14-26 is directed against Paulinists—that is, those who took Paul's law-free gospel to an extreme. Since it was Paul who spoke out so clearly against the permanence of the law, it is to be expected that later Jewish Christianity would seek to separate itself from his teaching and authority. Irenaeus reports concerning the Ebionites that "they repudiate the Apostle Paul, maintaining that he was an apostate from the law" (Adv. Haer. 1.26.2; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.27). If, as some have argued, the Simon Magus of the Pseudo-Clementines represents Paul, then this body of literature would contain by far the most extensive polemic against Paul in the Jewish Christian literature we possess.

4.3. Christology. Certain strands of second-century Jewish Christianity apparently found a high christology* incompatible with the strict monotheism of the shema. The Johannine idea of Jesus as the Incarnation of God was rejected. Usually the virgin birth was denied and a type of adoptionism was accepted, wherein Jesus became designated Messiah because of his faithfulness to God (Apost. Const. 6.6; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 5.1.3). Eusebius goes so far as to say that the Ebionites (i.e., "the poor") received their name because "they had poor and mean opinions concerning Christ" (Hist. Eccl. 3.27). This is probably not the true explanation of the name, but it does point to the meager christology of these Jewish Christians.

5. The Question of Orthodoxy and Heresy. The Jewish Christianity of the early Jerusalem church was theologically primitive, yet not to be judged as unorthodox. As early as Stephen and the Hellenistic Jewish Christians there is growth in understanding of the theological significance of Jesus and his death. The later examples of Jewish christianity in the NT reflect a much more developed christology than that of the early Jerusalem church.

Yet from nearly the beginning there were also heterodox Jewish Christians, the so-called Judaizers (Gal 2:11-14; Phil 3:2; Acts 15:5). It seems probable that people of this persuasion concerning the law continued right through the first century. There were also undoubtedly Jewish Christians who remained relatively conservative in their christology, being unwilling to draw out the full implications concerning the person of Christ, for example his deity and his pre-existence.

As we move into the second century we begin more and more to encounter a Jewish Christianity of a decidedly heterodox kind. What is the reason for the increasing polarization between Jewish Christianity and the Gentile church, and the eventual demise of the former? With the passing of time, the Jewish Christians who did not integrate into the great church must have felt themselves under increasing pressure from both the church on the one hand, and the synagogue on the other. The pressure from the synagogue reinforced their own strong Jewish convictions and clearly had a great impact on them. The result was that despite their Christian leanings, they were unable to articulate a Christianity that was orthodox on the matters of law and christology. They found themselves in a quite impossible situation.

With much perceptivity Jerome said of them: "since they want to be both Jews and Christians, they are neither Jews nor Christians" (Ep. 112.13). Unlike the Jewish Christian scribes of Matthew's community, they were apparently unable to bring out of their storehouse things both old and new (Mt 13:52). For them the old was a hindrance to the new, and they were thus unable to arrive at that important balance wherein the newness of the gospel finds its proper place alongside the tradition of Israel of which it is the proper fulfillment.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CHRISTOLOGY; CIRCUMCISION; EBIONITES; FOOD, FOOD LAWS, TABLE FELLOWSHIP; GOD; HOLY DAYS; JERUSALEM, ZION, HOLY CITY; LAND IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY; LAW; MATTHEAN COMMUNITY; SYNAGOGUES; TEMPLE; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Bagatti, The Church from the Circumcision (Jerusalem: Franciscan, 1971); R. E. Brown, "Not Jewish Christianity and Gentile Christianity but Types of Jewish/Gentile Christianity," CBQ 45 (1983) 74-79; G. W. Buchanan, "Worship, Feasts and Ceremonies in the Early Jewish-Christian Church," NTS 26 (1980) 279-97; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity, Vol. 1 of The Development of Christian Doctrine Before Nicea (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1964); J. A. Fitzmyer, "Jewish Christianity in Light of the Qumran Scrolls" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (New York: Abingdon, 1966) 233-57; B. Gerhardsson et al., Judéo-Christianisme, Festschrift J. Daniélou [=RSR 60 (1972) 1-320)] (Paris: Recherches de Science Religieuse, 1972); C. C. Hill, Hellenists and Hebrews (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); G. Hoennicke, Das Judenchristentum im ersten und zweiten Jahrhunderten (Berlin: Trowitzsch, 1908); F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, ed. J. O. F. Murray (reprint: Grand Rapids: Baker, 1980); J. Jervell, The Unknown Paul (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); A. F. J. Klijn, "The Study of Jewish Christianity," NTS 20 (1974) 419-31; R. N. Longenecker, The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity (Naperville: Allenson, 1970); G. Lüdemann, Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); F. Manns, Bibliographie du Judéo-Christianisme (Jerusalem: Franciscan, 1978); I. H. Marshall, "Palestinian and Hellenistic Christianity," NTS 19 (1972-73) 271-89; J. Munck, "Jewish-Christianity in Post-Apostolic Times," NTS 6 (1959-60) 103-16; R. Murray, "Defining Judaeo-Christianity," HeyJ 15 (1974) 303-10; R. A. Pritz, Nazarene Jewish Christianity: From the End of the New Testament Period until Its Disappearance in the Fourth Century (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1988); S. K. Riegel, "Jewish Christianity: Definitions and Terminology," NTS 24 (1977-78) 410-15; H.-J. Schoeps, Jewish Christianity: Factional Disputes in the Early Church (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); A. F. Segal, "Jewish Christianity," in Eusebius, Christianity and Judaism, ed. H. W. Attridge and G. Hata (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1992) 326-51; G. Strecker, "On the Problem of Jewish Christianity," Appendix 1 in W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, ed. R. A. Kraft and G. Krodel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) 241-85; idem, Das Judenchristentum in den Pseudoclementinen (Berlin: Akademie, 1958).

D. A. Hagner

JEWISH WARS.

See CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS.

JOHANNINE COMMUNITY/SCHOOL.

See JOHN, LETTERS OF.

JOHN, LETTERS OF

Three of the NT's twenty-one letters are associated with John. Even though they do not bear John's name, an impressive church tradition and unmistakable thematic connections with the Fourth Gospel have suggested that they stem from John, the author of the Fourth Gospel.

Interest in the Johannine epistles has always been eclipsed by an untiring fascination with the Fourth Gospel. John's recasting of Jesus' life (compared with the Synoptic portrait), his theological probings into the essence of the Incarnation and his theological contributions (in christology,* pneumatology and eschatology*) have all drawn expected attention. The Johannine epistles, however, are an enigma. While 2 John and 3 John have the usual features of ancient letters,* 1 John bears no such marks: it is more like a tract or a broadside aimed at a particular problem sweeping the church.

In recent years, however, scholars have taken a second look at the letters as one more avenue into exploring the composition and social history of the Johannine community. As early as 1979, R. E. Brown's The Community of the Beloved Disciple brought to general audiences suggestions about the Johannine community that had been offered elsewhere by J. L. Martyn (1968), O. Cullmann (ET 1975), R. A. Culpepper (1975), and others (for bibliography see Brown 1982, 140-43). Today it is commonplace to speak of the Johannine school, or community, or circle, from which the teachings of John about Jesus were preserved and penned (the Gospel of John) and where John's correspondence was preserved (1 Jn, 2 Jn, 3 Jn). Just as the Fourth Gospel yields information about Jesus, it also betrays the consciousness of the community that shaped and cherished it. Just as the opening paragraph of 1 John and the Fourth Gospel mirror each other, so too the concerns of the letters fit into the compositional history of the Gospel.

Therefore in order for us to understand better the place of the letters of John, we would do well to reconstruct the social and theological history of the community as best we can from its surviving literature. There is considerable debate concerning the sequence of these four documents (Brown 1982, 14-35), but a consensus has emerged showing that they stem from the same community and, for many, they share the same author. Moreover, it is widely accepted that the problems addressed in the letters are reflected in the Fourth Gospel itself. A common compositional history argues that an early edition of the Fourth Gospel was followed by a theological crisis in the community. This crisis prompted a revision of the Gospel and the writing of 1 John. This explains, for instance, the parallels between the Gospel's prologue and that of 1 John, as well as parallels between 1 John and John 14-17, John's Farewell Discourse (Smalley 1984, xxix-xxx; see chart, Brown 1982, 757-59; Segovia). Finally, 2 John and 3 John were penned to address a subsequent local problem.

1. History of John's Church
2. Theological Struggle
3. John's Secondary Concerns
4. Authorship and Setting
5. Epistolary Structure

1. History of John's Church.

The Johannine literature does not provide us with chronological clues to reconstruct its life and setting. Nevertheless, we can confidently assume that these letters and the Gospel did not surface in a vacuum. It is not farfetched to assume that John himself—John the apostle, son of Zebedee, one of the Twelve*—was a pastor and an evangelist who built churches in the Mediterranean world and was a custodian of traditions about Jesus (see Jesus Tradition). If this is the case, then the literature that survives this community, the letters and the Gospel of John, provide important evidence of the character of these Christians. These documents tell us about the development of thought among John's followers: their passions, their wars, even their history.

1.1. John's Earliest Community. Early traditions indicate that John planted churches in Ephesus. Eusebius, the fourth-century historian, quotes Irenaeus (130-200), bishop of Lyons, who tells us that John was a leading ecclesiastical figure in Asia Minor (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.23). He goes on to say that clergy from throughout the area would travel to Ephesus just to learn from John and hear his stories about Jesus. And how did Irenaeus know all this? Irenaeus says it was confirmed to him by Polycarp,* the bishop of Smyrna, who in his younger years was instructed by John (Irenaeus Haer. 2.22.5). Similarly Eusebius also preserves for us a letter by the bishop of Ephesus itself (Polycrates). In it the Ephesian bishop tells us that John who reclined near the Lord at the Last Supper (Jn 13:25) was buried in Ephesus. Today two tombs still exist near this ancient city, both claiming to be the burial place of John.

While the early church was well-known for its fanciful traditions about the apostles* (see the Syriac History of John), many scholars do not count this story of John among them. John was a leading pastor whose memory of Jesus and whose recollection of his teachings gave him unique stature in antiquity.

John's community of believers lived on the frontiers of Judaism.* His church was heterogeneous: Jews who had moved into the Greek world lived alongside Greeks who knew little of the OT. Their common bond was a firm allegiance to Jesus, their messiah, and John was their leader. And yet because John himself and his "Christian message" were rooted in Judaism, it was natural that this community would live in proximity to the synagogues* of his city. In fact it is here, in this relationship with the synagogue, that the Johannine community's "story" was forged.

1.2. The Fourth Gospel. The Gospel of John is a by-product of John's ministry. That is why it repeatedly anchors its message in John's "eyewitness" testimony (Jn 19:35; 20:24). Its text tells us about Jesus, to be sure, but the way its message is framed tells us about its author and his audience. This explains, for instance, why again and again the Gospel refers to "the Jews" (sixty-four times) as if they were the opponents of the church (neither Paul nor Luke writes with this same tone). Even though some have criticized the NT and especially the Fourth Gospel as anti-Semitic, such a view misrepresents the cultural and historical framework unique to these writings. In its earliest days John's congregation felt that it was under siege: external enemies particularly from the synagogue were in debate with them. This also explains the importance of John's lengthy story in John 9: the blind man's expulsion from the synagogue may have meant a lot to John's Jewish followers who themselves were being expelled.

At its earliest stages (before the writing of the epistles) this community was cultivating an outlook of division: the world outside the church was a place of darkness, persecution* and turmoil. In Jesus' prayer (Jn 17) there is not even a record of Jesus praying for the world: he simply prays for the survival and success of his followers. Stories that held deep meaning for the community ended up in the Johannine archive about Jesus: fights with Jewish leaders (see Jn 5, 8, 9 and 10), the continuing relevance of Jewish festivals like Passover (see Jn 6) and the ongoing importance of John the Baptist (see Jn 1:35-51; 3:22-36) to name a few. We know, for example, that Ephesus had a community of people who were followers of John the Baptist but not of Jesus (see Acts 19:1-7). Did these groups debate? Did a story like John 1:35-51 encourage many of them to join the followers of Jesus?

In these earliest days the Fourth Gospel may have been a loose collection of stories preached by John (see Stibbe). These were the formative years of the community when prized stories about Jesus were being preserved and polished, when a collection of John's best memories and personal accounts were being written down. To be sure, this was a Gospel to be proud of: it gave generous amounts of teaching* from Jesus, teaching that predicted the sort of persecution the church was having and yet promised an intimacy with Christ that made such suffering* immaterial. This was a Gospel that described the Holy Spirit* in detail—that talked about conversion using terms like "rebirth" and "drinking living water" and "eating the bread of life." This was a Gospel that encouraged those believers prone to mystical experiences of the faith.*

Indeed the Gospel of John was an empowering Gospel that shaped this Christian community so that it would expect dynamic spiritual experiences. Jesus and the Father were dwelling inside these spiritually reborn believers (Jn 14:23)! No other Gospel speaks like this. The Holy Spirit promised to provide them with incredible powers: power* to recall Jesus' very words (Jn 14:26), power to work miracles* greater than those of Jesus (Jn 14:12), power to have prayer answered (Jn 14:13-14) and power to confront a hostile world (Jn 16:7). They even had the power to forgive sin* (Jn 20:23). Above all the Spirit gave them the power of prophecy,* to continue speaking with Jesus' voice, revealing new things not recorded in Scripture (Jn 16:13).

John's Gospel suggests that John's community was a pneumatic community. This is not to say that the Johannine literature provides a detailed working-out of the spiritual gifts as, say, Paul does in 1 Corinthians 12-14. Rather, the Johannine literature evidences a community that was alert to the centrality of the Spirit and ready to experience the Spirit in its fullness. Johannine theology laid the context in which a pneumatic/charismatic Christianity would flourish.

1.3. Problems in the Community: The Letters. But we can only speculate that something serious happened at a later stage of the church's life. The once-unified congregation began to tear apart from within. Threats that were once external now were found within the ranks of the fellowship* itself. For John it must have been a crisis beyond belief. In 1 John 2:18 he even says that it is "the last hour" for the community.

Lengthy scholarly debate has centered on the identity of these dissenters. They were likely a select group of Johannine Christians who knew the Fourth Gospel well, claimed to be inspired by the Spirit and challenged John's understanding of Jesus Christ's personhood and work. And they were succeeding. The community was splitting, harsh words were being exchanged, and the vocabulary once reserved in the Fourth Gospel for those in "the world" now was being aimed at fellow Christians.

1 John supplies our primary evidence for this division. In its chapters we have evidence of severe social conflict: the painful departure of the group (1 Jn 2:19-26) and warnings about "deceivers" and "liars" who twist the truth of Christ (1 Jn 2:22; 2 Jn 7). There were also severe theological debates (1 Jn 5:5-8) that were being fought among teachers claiming to be filled with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (1 Jn 2:20-21; 4:1-6). The letter's repeated emphasis on love* hints at the severity and desperation of the situation.

Brown believes that at this point the Fourth Gospel may have gone through a revision to correct some of these misunderstandings. The Gospel, for instance, gained its prologue (Jn 1:1-18), which emphasizes Jesus' full incarnation (Jn 1:14). These introductory verses have an uncanny resemblance to the opening verses of John's first letter (see 1 Jn 1:1-4). Some think that the event that inspired this "writing up" of the Gospel was John's death. John 21 implies that John has died even though his community thought that he would survive until Christ's second coming (see Jn 21:20-25). When John's disciples compiled their leader's story of Christ, they gave him a title of veneration that would make him famous: the Beloved Disciple (Jn 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20).

Therefore we can say that in some respect John's letters are a response written in debate with those who may be misinterpreting the Fourth Gospel. For some scholars the epistles serve as a sort of commentary on the Gospel. Still other scholars would describe them as an "epilogue" to the Gospel designed to circulate with it so that erroneous interpretations would not be reached. S. S. Smalley prefers to describe 1 John as a paper that "sets out to expound Johannine teaching and ideas, now preserved in the tradition and theology of the Fourth Gospel, for the benefit of heterodox members of John's community who were also indebted to the teaching of the gospel but who were understanding it differently and, indeed, erroneously" (Smalley 1984, xxvii).

1.4. The Fate of the Johannine Church. But the Johannine church was not to survive the conflict. 2 John and 3 John give a glimpse of the sort of crises that must have gripped one congregation. The larger Johannine community divided, with strong leaders taking the fellowship into Gnosticism* and Docetism* while John's own disciples remained in communion with the other NT churches of Paul and the apostles. The earliest commentaries on John (e.g., Heracleon) were written by Gnostics, a fact that shows how the Fourth Gospel was embraced in these heretical circles. The Odes of Solomon (if they are gnostic) likewise bear marks of Johannine influence. Even the Nag Hammadi texts seem to describe a dualism that would fit the secessionists of John's church quite well. Concepts such as light and darkness, sinlessness, divine birth, the Spirit of Truth and God's seed all appear in Nag Hammadi.

Hippolytus (c. 170–c. 236)) describes how Johannine language was used by his gnostic opponents. This may explain why the orthodox church (the "Great Church" as some label it) embraced the Fourth Gospel reluctantly. In fact there is a surprising lack of interest in the Johannine writings among the leading second-century writers. The church's gnostic opponents were using the Fourth Gospel or a form of it. As many scholars believe, it was the epistles of John—1 John in particular—that redeemed the Fourth Gospel for the NT we possess today.

2. Theological Struggle.

The Johannine epistles everywhere betray the marks of struggle and conflict. 1 John 2:18 describes antichrists* in the world; 1 John 2:22 names them "liars" who are denying an orthodox christology. There is no doubt that the letters themselves were written in the midst of a severe and desperate theological debate.

2.1. John's Opponents. Who were these opponents whom John confronted? What were the issues that they debated? It is virtually impossible to name them specifically or label their "movement" (although some scholars attempt to do so). Some even believe that John is confronting two separate groups in the letters (Painter 1993; Smalley 1980). What we can do is outline their beliefs using the refutation that John has given us in his letters. But this is a difficult endeavor for a number of reasons. Writers rarely give a complete hearing to their opponents' views, and we have no first-hand information from John's adversaries.* None of their writings have survived. Moreover, sometimes John opposes things that may not be on the agenda of his opponents. For instance, in 1 John 4:18 he says there is no fear in love because perfect love casts out fear. John may be taking an opportunity to chastise his followers and not necessarily addressing anyone else.

2.2. Theological Issues. John returns to two major subjects repeatedly as he writes: christology and ethical* behavior. And it is likely that the two are intimately connected. The secessionists had embraced an aberrant form of christology that led them to make wrong judgments about Christian living.

2.2.1. Christology. The doctrine of Christ lived at the center of John's theological disputes. John says that his opponents hold the following beliefs: they deny the Son (1 Jn 2:23); they deny that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (1 Jn 4:2; 2 Jn 7); they deny that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 2:22). These statements may be compared with affirmations in the epistles that buttress John's own christology. It is likely that these verses are connected to the opponents' christological error: Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 5:1); Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (1 Jn 4:2); Jesus is the Son (1 Jn 2:23; 3:23; 5:11) or the Son of God (1 Jn 1:3, 7; 3:8, 23; 4:9, 10, 15); Jesus Christ came "by water and blood" (1 Jn 5:6).

From these statements a composite image begins to emerge. These are no doubt Christians who have begun to deviate from the traditionally received understanding of Jesus Christ. They affirm the idea of Christ but doubt if Christ became flesh and if the man Jesus was indeed the incarnation of God.

Today scholars have concluded that John's opponents embraced a "high christology" that elevated Christ's divinity at the expense of his humanity. The Hellenistic world commonly affirmed a cosmos populated by numerous deities. Elevating Christ into their company was easy given the tolerant, syncretistic outlook of the day. And yet this same Hellenistic world was predisposed to reject that such divinities would materially enter the world. Using a dualistic outlook, Christ was separated from the world, set apart with the divinities of heaven and there left to rule. One Christian variety of this view said that Christ may have "seemed" (Gk dokein, hence, Docetism) to appear in the flesh, but he did not. The notion that Christ would appear "in flesh" (Gk sarx) was ridiculous if not abhorrent. The strong emphases of John 1:14 and 1 John 1:1-3 are all salvos in John's theological struggle.

If the earthly life of Jesus Christ was now irrelevant, these people still claimed to have immediate access to God. In their view they had moved beyond the basic, elementary, orthodox teachings of Christianity and, inspired by the Spirit, could know God directly. I. H. Marshall describes them well: "They were like men kicking away the ladder on which they have climbed to the heights and leaving themselves without any visible means of support" (Marshall 21). The very gospel* that had given birth to their faith was being jettisoned. They are not abiding in the teaching of Christ but are going beyond it (2 Jn 8).

This tendency to divide the world along dualistic lines that separated reality into opposing forces (light/darkness, above/below, spirit/flesh, etc.) was quite common in the first century. Further, the notion of immediate revelation* through divine knowledge* (known as Gnosticism) was just coming to life. But the application of these principles to a Christian christology was something new.

2.2.2. Cerinthus. One of the first teachers to do so was Cerinthus. What we know about him is contained in the records of his opponents, particularly Irenaeus. In Irenaeus's Adversus Haereses (c. A.D. 180) we find an important story reported by Polycarp that bring Cerinthus and John together. Apparently John once was in the public baths at Ephesus and discovering Cerinthus there cried out, "Let us save ourselves; the bath house may fall down, for inside is Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth." Irenaeus goes on to say that John proclaimed his gospel in order to refute the errors of Cerinthus (Irenaeus Haer. 3.3.4; 3.11.1).

Cerinthus's theology is outlined for us by Irenaeus. Cerinthus may have been one of the first to carefully distinguish Jesus and Christ. He argued that Jesus was the earthly man of Nazareth well-known for his piety and wisdom.* Christ was a heavenly deity who descended on Jesus at his baptism* and departed before the crucifixion (see Death of Christ). Thus the man Jesus, not the Son of God, died on the cross.* Therefore when we read 1 John 2:22 ("Who is the liar but the one who denies that Jesus is the Christ.") many commentators wonder if it is just this sort of distinction that John has in mind (see also 1 Jn 5:1, 11, etc.). Someone is saying that Jesus the man is not the Christ.

In summary, for John's opponents the incarnate Jesus Christ was no longer occupying the central place in Christian faith. At best these secessionists had a nominal interest in the Jesus of history and tradition and instead were looking to inspired spiritual experiences that lifted them above the conventional views of John.

2.2.3. Ethics. John's letters also evidence a sustained critique of the moral disposition of certain persons. This is not like the usual exhortations we find in Paul's writings, in which believers are warned against catalogs of sins (1 Cor 6) or dispositions of the heart (Gal 5). In the Johannine context a theological rationale had formed making ethical behavior of no consequence for the Christian life. John mentions his opponents' views in a number of places:

☐ they boast that they are "free from sin" (1 Jn 1:8, 10)
☐ they boast that "they have fellowship" with God but walk in the darkness (1 Jn 1:6)
☐ they boast that they "know God" but nevertheless are disobedient (1 Jn 2:4)
☐ they boast that they "love God" but hate their brothers and sisters (1 Jn 4:20)
☐ they boast that they are "in the light" but hate their fellow Christians (1 Jn 2:9)

John also repeats a number of affirmations that shed some light on the nature of the secessionists' ethical position:
☐ to abide in God is to obey him—it is to walk as Jesus walked (1 Jn 2:6)
☐ to sin willfully shows that you have not known God (1 Jn 3:3-6; 5:18)
☐ whoever acts sinfully belongs to the devil (1 Jn 3:7-8, 9-10)
☐ we should love one another (1 Jn 3:11-12, 17-18)
☐ refusing to love your brother or sister means that you have not inherited eternal life (1 Jn 3:14-15)
☐ God is love—and to know him is to love (1 Jn 4:8-10)

While christology was the main battleground in the community, the tangible expression of these disagreements came in the form of open conflict and hostility. Faulty christology spilled into unethical conduct.

What does John mean when he says that these people are "not obedient"? There is no evidence that they were living immoral lives (see Purity). 1 John 2:15-16 is likely a general exhortation for the church not to be worldly. Instead, these people were not following the conventional authoritative teachings of the church. Since they denied the significance of Christ's incarnation, it stands to reason that they would deny the significance of his earthly teachings. Therefore they did not heed Jesus' words written in the Gospel. Likewise if they denied their own sinfulness, they would feel no need for Christ's atoning death on the cross. Theirs was a "deeper" religion, a mystical faith, fueled by nontraditional insights gleaned from the Spirit (1 Jn 2:20-23; 4:1). They refused to conform to traditional teachings, and as a result they refused to submit to the leadership that bore those teachings.

The secessionists were not simply indifferent to those who disagreed with them. They were intolerant. This explains the repeated times that John refers to "hating" fellow Christians. Conflict resulted from their superior spirituality. These people had become elitist in their view of themselves. And those who sought to exhort them who could not catalog similar experiences for themselves had no credibility.

We must not read John's words about "community love" as applying merely to John's opponents, however. Too often we have characterized these unorthodox Christians as difficult, haughty and unremitting in their attitudes toward the church. John is also exhorting his own followers to exhibit love because they are responding to the secessionists with equal hostility. And just because their theology is right by no means says that their angry attitudes are justified.

2.2.4. Incipient Gnosticism? This disposition to spiritualize the earthly career of Christ, giving it no great salvific importance, and to deny the spiritual importance of one's own physical, moral life had some currency in antiquity. Gnostic systems of religious thought were in intense debate with Christianity from about A.D. 150-300 (years after John's death) and yet the framework that would lead to these systems was already in place (see Gnosis, Gnosticism). This later literature speaks of a religion of enlightenment, of special knowledge, preserved only for the initiated. Believers were "reborn," creating a unique union with God that literally brought about a state of sinless perfection. "Sin" belongs to another nature, our material nature, which no longer matters in God's economy. Hence, enlightened spiritual experiences validated spirituality, while at the same time practical questions of moral conduct were deemed irrelevant.

Scholars who have compared the Johannine literature with second- and third-century gnostic writings find striking similarities of language and tone. For instance, when 1 John 3:9 talks about God's "seed" remaining in one born of God, this echoes the teaching of the Valentinian Gnostics who were great opponents to the orthodox church. In the nineteenth century this even led some to conclude that John was directly in debate with a fully developed gnostic religious system (and hence to be dated much later). But this is not necessary. The predisposition to divide the world along material and spiritual lines (dualism), to seek spiritual enlightenment (mysticism) and to deny personal moral responsibility were well-established by the end of the first century. Colossians and the Pastoral Epistles bear similar witness to Christians who have some christological deviation and who disregard the value of practical moral conduct.

3. John's Secondary Concerns.
A number of secondary themes are found throughout the epistles. In some sense these appear by accident because they are a part of the refutation the author is making against his opponents. In most cases these are intimately connected with the two primary subjects under debate in his church: christology and ethics.

3.1. The Holy Spirit. If study of the Fourth Gospel was central to this community's spiritual formation, it comes as no surprise that the Spirit would play a pivotal role in discipleship. No gospel places as much emphasis on the Spirit as John's Gospel (Burge). In fact the indwelling of Christ and the transformation of the believer are both framed in terms of Spirit-experience in this literature (Jn 14:23-24; 3:1-8). Even the Lord's Supper is defined as an assimilation of Christ in Spirit (Jn 6:52-63). This is why John's community had strong pneumatic or ecstatic tendencies. His followers were confident of their anointing,* and in his polemic against the secessionists he must take this pneumatic context into consideration.

In 1 John 4:13 John reassures his followers that possessing the Spirit is characteristic of those who "abide in God." Such abiding is not simply a matter of orthodox confession (1 Jn 4:15) or loving conduct (1 Jn 4:16), although these are important. Abiding in God is experiential: it is a personal experience with the Holy Spirit. Therefore John's opponents (the false teachers) must buttress their authority* with some pneumatic experience, some evidence that they have the Spirit too. This explains why in 1 John 4:1-3 the church is called to "test the spirits." These opponents are claiming to be prophets (1 Jn 4:1 labels them false prophets), who under the inspiration of the Spirit are making striking new claims about Christ.

This is a pneumatic context. It is interesting to note what John does not say. He does not employ his apostolic authority as, say, Paul does in Galatians to refute the Judaizers there. He does not leverage pastoral authority as power anchored in a position. Instead he urges the church to test the spirits to see if they are affirming traditional beliefs about Jesus—thereby undercutting the authority of these prophets. His tactic therefore is characteristic of those struggling against rival leadership claims in a "charismatic" setting. One cannot deny the Spirit. One must teach discernment and urge believers to weigh claims made in the voice of the Spirit.

But John goes further. If these secessionists are claiming a superior spirituality, John reminds the church that each member has been equally anointed with the Spirit (1 Jn 2:20, 27). In other words, spiritual discernment is the task of every person. To be a Christian is to possess the Spirit, and no one may come along claiming exclusive spiritual insight. Thus 1 John 2:27 remarks, "As for you, the anointing you received from him remains in you, and you do not need to have anyone teach you." Christians must be well-grounded and confident in the authenticity of their own spiritual experience and not swayed by the seemingly more compelling experiences of others.

3.2. Discernment and Tradition. John reminds us that the church is the custodian of the truth. Foremost among John's concerns is the responsibility of the corporate community to discern false belief and practice, to distinguish between truth and error. While this theme is explicitly mentioned only in 1 John 4:1-6, nevertheless it is presumed throughout 1 John. The church must stand guard against any who would bring distortion or error (2 Jn 8).

But this presents a problem. How can we discern truth from falsehood? If a prophet urges something new under the authority of the Spirit how can it be weighed? In 1 Corinthians 14:29 Paul confronted a similar dilemma. His solution was to have the prophets weigh one another's words, thereby checking individual inspiration in a deliberative body. John nowhere uses that tactic, setting prophet against prophet. Instead he believes that the church is accountable to the historic revelation given in Jesus Christ and passed down through the apostles. Individual inspiration, therefore, must be weighed against truth revealed in Scripture and tradition.

Throughout 1 John the author affirms that what was "from the beginning" should be the anchor for what we believe now (1 Jn 1:1; 2:13, 14; 3:11). In fact "from the beginning" becomes a refrain as John urges his readers to recall what they first learned and measure all else by it. "Let what you heard from the beginning abide in you. If what you heard from the beginning abides in you, then you will abide in the Son and in the Father" (1 Jn 2:24 NRSV). He says that his commandments are not new, but "old commandment[s] that you have heard from the beginning" (1 Jn 2:7; 2 Jn 5).

John is not merely giving a stubborn defense of tradition, as if older is better. By "the beginning" he refers to the historic coming of Jesus Christ and the preservation of that revelation. What was revealed in the Incarnation must be the litmus test for all new theological insights. Thus in 1 John 1:1-3 John points to what he saw with eyes and touched with hands—the incarnate Christ. Historic christology must be the touchstone for all Christian belief. How do we know love? "God sent his son into the world" (1 Jn 4:9). Curiously his exhortation in 1 John 2:12-14 twice reminds the fathers—those who are older—to rekindle their acquaintance with the ancient teachings, things the younger generation may no longer treasure.

This theological anchor in historic christology is reminiscent of what we read in the Gospel of John. In his Farewell Discourse Jesus talks about the Spirit and the limits of what he will do. As Jesus' words cannot deviate from the Father's words (Jn 5:19), so too the Spirit will reiterate what Jesus himself has said in history (Jn 14:26). The Spirit "will not speak on his own, he will speak only what he hears" (Jn 16:13). In Christian faith Father, Son and Spirit provide a revelation that is self-consistent and harmonious. No later revelation contradicts what has gone before. John is affirming that Christian wisdom and truth, anchored in right christology, are cumulative and binding.

3.3. Love, Unity and Fellowship. The epistles of John as well as the Gospel of John place a high premium on the quality of Christian community. Jesus' command in John 13:34 and John 15:12, 17 made clear that love should be the hallmark of his followers. In John 17 Jesus prays for harmony and unity among his followers "so that they may be one" on the model of the oneness of the Father and the Son (Jn 17:20-23).

No doubt the schism in John's church has placed unity and love on the ecclesiastical agenda. He even makes love a command: Christians who love God must love their brother or sister in the church (1 Jn 4:21). This teaching John anchors "in the beginning" as well (1 Jn 3:11; 2 Jn 5), harking back no doubt to the Gospel. In 1 John 3:23 he almost sums up the Christian life giving two simple exhortations: belief in Jesus Christ and loving one another.

But John does not give an exhortation without offering some theological ground since there are indeed times when loving those who are unlovely seems impossible. God, he says, first loved us (1 Jn 4:19). Love, especially in difficult circumstances, cannot be fueled by human energy. Love originates from God when we apprehend the depth of his love for us (1 Jn 4:7a) and when we are born anew by his spirit (1 Jn 4:7b). For John intimate knowledge of God is the same as enjoying the intimate reciprocity of God's love: he loves us, we love him, and this love spills over to those near us. In harsher terms, not to love is evidence, severe evidence, that someone does not know God and has failed to experience him fully (1 Jn 4:8).

If we are uncertain about God's profound desire for us, we need only look to God's love shown to us in Christ. Christ is the material expression of God's tangible love, and so once again John is making a claim for the value of historic, incarnational christology to address issues of ethics. Because Christ laid down his life for us, so too we ought to do the same for one another (1 Jn 3:16). 1 John 4:10 says it succinctly: "This is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins."

John describes living in God's love, knowing him and obeying his commands as "walking in the light." This is one more metaphor for normative Christian discipleship. Therefore in 1 John 1:7 he affirms that when people walk in the light together, when corporately they experience God's love, unity and fellowship result. Vibrant community is the natural outgrowth of people who genuinely live in God's presence. But the reverse is also true. When people exhibit hostility and division, when they "hate" (to use John's term), they prove that their lives are being lived "in the darkness" (1 Jn 2:9-11) or being lived "in death" (1 Jn 3:14). Such so-called Christians are "liars" and hypocrites (1 Jn 4:20). John spares no words for people who claim to know God but fail to exhibit genuine godliness.

There is an important nuance to John's teaching. To anchor our love in God's affection might inspire passivity. That is, we wait for God's love to mature and change us, to shape us, before we apply any effort to our own growth. If we cannot feel God's love, John would have us exhibit love toward others as a way to step into God's presence. In 1 John 4:12 he talks about the limits of our experience of God: "No one has ever seen God; but if we love one another, God lives in us and his love is made complete in us." Loving the unlovely or the difficult to love is an avenue, a mystical avenue, to discover God in our midst.

A concrete example of how this love might be expressed is in simple acts of charity among God's people. 1 John 4:17 remarks: "How does God's love abide in anyone who has the world's goods and sees a brother or sister in need and yet refuses help? Little children, let us love, not in word or speech, but in truth and action" (NRSV). In 3 John 10 we are even given a negative example of someone named Diotrephes who is lacking in the practice of Christian charity and hospitality, according to the elder.

Are there limits to love? Of course, John says that we must not love the world (1 Jn 2:15)—not meaning the people of the world (Jn 3:16) or God's creation (Jn 17:24). This instead refers to everything that is hostile to God and inimical to the truth of the gospel. But in 2 John 10 we have an interesting problem. John urges his followers not to welcome (to receive into fellowship) anyone who intentionally professes false doctrine. Could John be referring to the secessionists who have divided the church? While participation with the unbelieving world is a necessary facet of Christian discipleship, if we are to have integrity there must be a limit to tolerance. There are lines of personal social intercourse and public participation that Christians must not cross.

4. Authorship and Setting.

4.1. Authorship. While Christian tradition has attributed these letters to John the apostle, the Johannine epistles are anonymous with the exception that 2 John and 3 John call their author "the elder" (2 Jn 1; 3 Jn 1). Locating his identity would of course solve the mystery. The title may simply refer to a man of high esteem in the community, although good evidence shows us that the apostles themselves were described as "elders" in antiquity (cf. 1 Pet 5:1).

The situation is sorely complicated by a reference in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.4) to two Johns, one clearly the apostle and the other possibly an elder who lived later (some have speculated that he was a disciple of the apostle John). Could the elder in our epistles be this second John? Marshall, however, has shown that this does not necessarily have to be the case and that even if two persons named John lived in this period, the attribution of epistolary authorship to the later man is purely hypothetical (Marshall 42-48).

While 2 John and 3 John appear to come from the same pen, does 1 John originate with this author? Nowhere is he described as "the elder," who is so called in 2 John and 3 John. Careful comparisons of style and content show striking similarities among all three writings and suggest that common authorship is not at all unlikely (Brown 1982, 14-35, 755-59). A more compelling question is whether the same pen wrote the epistles and the Gospel of John. As early as the third century Dionysius the Great of Alexandria was making this claim based on similarities of content and style, and today the parallels between the Gospel and the letters is a commonplace in NT studies. This is particularly true of 1 John and the Gospel. In fact careful comparison of 1 John and the Gospel's Farewell Discourse (Jn 13—17) shows even more remarkable parallels. Parallels in style and content are comparable to those found in Luke and Acts or even Colossians and Ephesians. This has led the vast majority of scholars to affirm common authorship for 1 John and the Gospel. Those who disagree point to the absence of OT quotations in 1 John, stress on future eschatology, Jesus as paraclete (rather than the Spirit), 1 John's emphasis on Jesus' sacrificial death and the promotion of ecclesiastical authority. But for most these objections have not been decisive.

4.2. Date. Since the epistles have been closely associated with the Fourth Gospel, those who would place the Gospel in the late first century locate the epistles anywhere from A.D. 90-110. However, arguments for such a late date now must bear the weight of serious criticisms, and increasingly the Gospel has been given an earlier time frame closer to A.D. 70 or A.D. 80. Allowing time for the development of the heresy described in the epistles, a date between A.D. 70 and A.D. 90 would not be unreasonable.

4.3. Location. The traditional view that the Johannine writings originated from Asia Minor is sound. The heresies addressed in the epistles (and perhaps the Gospel) are well-established in this area. Further, the Fourth Gospel is traditionally associated with Ephesus. We can also argue by inference. John 1:35-42; 3:22-4:3; and 10:41 suggest that the Johannine community was in a debate with followers of John the Baptist who had not affirmed the messiahship of Jesus. Acts 19:1-7 describes twelve such followers of the Baptist in Ephesus who find themselves at odds with the Christians in that city.

4.4. The Sequence of 1, 2 and 3 John. Since little supplemental information exists telling us about the circumstances of these letters, we cannot assume that they were written in the sequence in which they appear in our NT. Some scholars have rearranged the three letters in every conceivable configuration. Some have argued that 2 John precedes 1 John because the tone is quite different: in 2 John the false teachers are addressed mildly (2 Jn 7-9) while in 1 John the struggles are described more severely (1 Jn 2:19; 4:1-3). We can wonder then if the problems brought on by the secessionists are just beginning in 2 John (making it earlier) and only later come to blows in 1 John.

The differences in the epistles may be explained by geographical locale. That is, 1 John may be addressed to a community setting at the heart of the Johannine world, perhaps the very center where the secessionists had launched their campaign. This would explain the personal nature of the letter as well as its intensity. By contrast 2 John may be addressed to outlying house churches not fully embroiled in the controversy. Perhaps this is why 2 John is more formal and detached in the way it addresses its readers (see 2 Jn 1, 5, 13) and essentially is a warning about what is to come (2 Jn 8-11). Another possibility is that 2 John and 3 John were cover letters that were accompanied by the more substantial treatise 1 John. Some believe that this fits 3 John particularly well since it is addressed to "Gaius," and Demetrius, who is being commended to the church, may have been the letter's courier (3 Jn 12; cf. 3 Jn 8). But we cannot be confident about any of these theories.

It is no doubt best to view these letters as coming from the same approximate time period and addressing the same general crisis in the church. 1 John is the author's full broadside against his opponents. 2 John and 3 John are personal notes that either accompanied 1 John or were sent separately to another destination.

5. Epistolary Structure.

2 John and 3 John have all of the usual features of first-century letters: the author and recipient are identified at the beginning, a blessing or prayer follows ("Grace, mercy, and peace will be with us," 2 Jn 3; "I pray that all may go well with you," 3 Jn 2) and there is a concluding greeting (2 Jn 13; 3 Jn 15; cf. Gal 1:1; 1 Thess 1:1). The letters also contain personal references and allusions that suggest they are intended for a specific, personal situation. Some even suggest that 3 John is the best NT example of first-century epistolary format.

The same cannot be said, however, for 1 John. In fact of all twenty-one letters, 1 John is the least like a first-century letter. As B. F. Westcott wrote, there is "no address, no subscription, no name is contained in it of a person or place; no direct trace of the author, no indication of any special destination" (Westcott, xxix). No conclusion ends the document—1 John 5:21 even sounds as if the writer's thoughts have been cut off. Further, no personal comments suggest that the author is writing a personal letter. This is highly unusual when we consider the intensely personal character of the crisis in the church. It is all the more unusual if we believe that the same author penned 2 John and 3 John. If so, then he clearly knew epistolary form.

This absence of form has rightly led many to suggest that 1 John is not a personal letter at all but a general treatise aimed at wide distribution. Some prefer to call it a sermon or an address. Perhaps it is a pamphlet, a brochure or an encyclical. Some prefer to think of it as a tractate engaged in some sort of polemic, a kind of manifesto that addresses specific theological issues across a general front. This may explain why John mentions thirteen times that "he is writing" and that twenty-two times he uses the plural you.

The earliest patristic view understood that 1 John was a sort of introduction or explanation of the Fourth Gospel. It was not an exposition or a commentary but rather a correction, a clarification aimed at those who might distort its teachings. And in the end the Fourth Gospel would become more intelligible. This explains why John chooses an opening that deliberately imitates that of the Gospel and why in 1 John 5:13 his closing epilogue resembles John 20:31. Brown (1982, 116-29), who defends this view (following earlier scholars like Lightfoot) even finds a two-part structure to the epistle that imitates the two-part structure of the Fourth Gospel (cf. The Book of Signs, Jn 1—12; The Book of Glory, Jn 13—21).

5.1. The Structure of 1 John. Discovering a recognizable pattern or structure of thought in 1 John has proven impossible. Most scholars have sought to divide it into either two or three sections. Some commentators (Brooke, Dodd, Grayston, Houlden and Marshall) believe this is pointless and find instead either spirals of cyclical thought or a list of unconnected units. According to this view, John's units link up with each other only casually and are "governed by an association of ideas rather than by a logical plan" (Marshall, 26).

The most famous threefold division belongs to R. Law whose 1909 commentary argued that 1 John had three parts, each part offering three "tests of life:" righteousness, love and belief. The secessionists fail to acknowledge the importance of righteous behavior, do not love fellow Christians and deny belief in Jesus Christ, the Son of God. While such a theory's creativity is attractive it falls short in many places in the epistle, particularly in part three (1 Jn 4:7—5:13). Nevertheless a number of current scholars have defended such a three-unit theory: A. E. Brooke (1912), E. Malatesta (1973), P. R. Jones (1970), M. Thompson (1992) and R. Schnackenburg (1965). Those who find a threefold structure appealing generally look for thematic divisions at 1 John 2:27/28/29 and at 1 John 3:22/24, 4:6 or 4:12.

A twofold or bipartite division has traditionally been less popular but today is commanding renewed attention. The French scholar A. Feuillet defended this view in 1973 and most recently Brown (1982) and Smalley (1984) have become its champion in their commentaries. Two observations argue for this structure. First, John makes two declarations in the Gospel (Jn 1:5; 4:6) that Brown suggests are keys to John's master plan: "God is light" (Jn 1:5) and "God is love" (Jn 4:6). Second, the Gospel of John, which enjoys a bipartite form, may be the structural model for this second Johannine writing. Similarities between the two writings have often been observed. Each begins with parallel prologues, and the bodies of each writing move from doctrinal truths to practical applications for life.

Smalley would prefer to divide the epistle at 1 John 2:29 and 1 John 3:1, which would employ a division popularly used by those making a threefold division in the epistle. Brown's divisions shown here provide proportionally sized halves for the epistle and also find parallel introductory lines for 1 John 1:5 and 1 John 3:11, "This is the message we have heard."

A. Prologue, 1 John 1:1-4: The word of life which we have witnessed among us.

B. Part 1, 1 John 1:5—3:10: God is Light—and we should walk accordingly.

"This is the message we have heard from him and proclaim to you."

- 1 John 1:5-7: Thesis: walking in the light and walking in the darkness.
- 1 John 1:8—2:2: First Exhortation: Resist sinfulness.
- 1 John 2:3-11: Second Exhortation: Obey God's commands.
- 1 John 2:12-17: Third Exhortation: Defy the world and its allure.
- 1 John 2:18-27: Fourth Exhortation: Renounce those who distort the truth.
- 1 John 2:28—3:10: Fifth Exhortation: Live like God's children.

C. Part 2, 1 John 3:11—5:12: God is Love—and we should walk accordingly.

"This is the message you have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another."

- 1 John 3:11-24: Love one another in practical ways.
- 1 John 4:1-6: Beware of false prophets who would deceive you.
- 1 John 4:7-21: Love one another as God loves us in Christ.
- 1 John 5:1-4: Obey God and thereby conquer the world.
- 1 John 5:5-12: Never compromise your testimony.

D. Conclusion, 1 John 5:13-21: The boldness and confidence of those who walk in God's light and love.

5.2. The Structure of 2 and 3 John. Few have discovered a careful literary structure for these brief epistles. Like personal letters everywhere, they begin with a greeting and then develop one theme after another in a casual manner. Each letter is occasioned by the same concern: living the truth. This takes on two dimensions: it means loving those who abide in the family of God, and it means chastising those who would dismantle that family. In each case John warns against community destroyers—a theme grounded in the concerns about division well-known throughout 1 John.

2 John
- 2 John 1-3: Personal Greetings
- 2 John 4-6: Loving the Family of God
- 2 John 7-11: Protecting the Family of God
- 2 John 12-13: Closing

3 John
- 3 John 1-2: Personal Greetings
- 3 John 3-8: Loving Christ's Emissaries
- 3 John 9-12: Exhortations About Diotrephes
- 3 John 13-14: Closing

See also ADVERSARIES; CHRISTOLOGY; DOCETISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: A. E. Brooke, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Johannine Epistles (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1912); R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John: Translated with Introduction, Notes, and Commentary (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); F. F. Bruce, The Epistles of John: Introduction, Exposition, and Notes (London: Pickering & Inglis; Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1970); R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles: A Commentary on the Johannine Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); G. M. Burge, The Epistles of John (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996); C. H. Dodd, The Johannine Epistles (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1946); K. Grayston, The Johannine Epistles (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); J. L. Houlden, A Commentary on the Johannine Epistles (London: Adam & Charles Black; New York: Harper & Row, 1973); S. J. Kistemaker, Exposition of the Epistle of James and the Epistles of John (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1986); R. Law, The Tests of Life: A Study in the First Epistle of St. John (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1909); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1978); R. Schnackenburg, The Johannine Epistles: Introduction and Commentary (New York: Crossroad, 1965/1992); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); J. R. W. Stott, The Letters of John: An Introduction and Commentary (TNTC; 2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); M. M. Thompson, 1-3 John (IVPNTC; Downers Grove, IL; Leicester, UK: InterVarsity Press, 1992); B. F. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John: The Greek Text with Notes (4th ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans 1966, [1883]). Studies: C. K. Barrett, Essays on John (London: SPCK, 1982); R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple: The Life, Loves and Hates of an Individual Church in New Testament Times (New York: Paulist; London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1979); idem, "'Other Sheep Not of This Fold': The Johannine Perspective on Christian Diversity in the Late First Century," JBL 97 (1978) 5-22; idem, "The Relationship to the Fourth Gospel Shared by the Author of 1 John and by His Opponents" in Text and Interpretation, ed. E. Best and R. McL. Wilson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979), 57-68; G. M. Burge, The Anointed Community: The Holy Spirit in the Johannine Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); O. Cullmann, The Johannine Circle (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); R. A. Culpepper, The Johannine School (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); A. Feuillet, "The Structure of First John: Comparison with the Fourth Gospel," BTB 3 (1973) 194-216; P. R. Jones, "A Structural Analysis of I John," RevExp 67 (1970) 433-44; J. M. Lieu, "The History and Background of 2 and 3 John," unpublished Ph.D. thesis, University of Birmingham, 1980); idem, The Second and Third Epistles of John: History and Background (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986); idem, The Theology of the Johannine Epistles (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); idem, "What Was from the Beginning: Scripture and Tradition in the Johannine Epistles," NTS 39 (1993); E. Malatesta, The Epistles of St. John: Greek Text and English Translations Schematicallty Arranged (Rome: Gregorian University, 1973); J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); J. Painter, The Quest for the Messiah: The History, Literature, and Theology of the Johannine Community (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993); F. F. Segovia, "The Love and Hatred of Jesus and Johannine Sectarianism," CBQ 43 (1981) 258-72; S. S. Smalley, John: Evangelist and Interpreter (Exeter: Paternoster, 1978, 1983); idem, "What about 1 John?" in Studia Biblica 1978, 3: Papers on Paul and Other New Testament Authors, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSNTSup 3; Sheffield: JSOT, 1980) 337-43; D. M. Smith, "Johannine Christianity: Some Reflections on Its Character and Delineation," NTS 21 (1974-75) 222-48; M. W. G. Stibbe, John as Storyteller: Narrative Criticism and the Fourth Gospel (SNTSMS 73; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); J. C. Thomas, "The Order of the Composition of the Johannine Epistles," NovT 37 (1995) 68-75; U.C. von Walde, The Johannine Commandments: 1 John and the Struggle for the Johannine Tradition (New York: Paulist, 1990); R. A. Whitacre, Johannine Polemic: The Role of Tradition and Theology (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982). G. M. Burge

JOSEPH THE PATRIARCH. See ANCESTORS.

JOSEPHUS

A politician and general during the Jewish war of A.D. 66-70, Josephus was the most significant Jewish historian* of the Roman period (see Roman Empire).

1. Life of Josephus
2. Historian and Apologist
3. Josephus's Works
4. Summary

1. Life of Josephus.

Born in the first year of Caligula (A.D. 37-38), Josephus was a priest* and claimed Hasmonean lineage. Never shy about his abilities, Josephus relates that he possessed a fine memory and great intellectual acuity. At twenty-six he was part of a delegation sent to Rome concerning several priests who had run afoul of Nero. He met and befriended Poppaea, the consort and then wife of Nero, and through her offices secured their release (Josephus Life 3 §16). Nero and his circle were known to favor eastern religions,* and Agrippa II issued coinage bearing the visage of Poppaea.

Upon returning to Judea, Josephus found seditious elements already at work and attempted to mollify them. Secretly hoping that Cestius, the governor of Syria, would be able to quell the rebellion in its infancy, he regarded the defeat of Cestius a terrible blow, as it encouraged the revolutionaries for whom Josephus had scant regard (Josephus Life 6 §24). Two years later Josephus was appointed general for Galilee. Captured soon after Vespasian arrived in A.D. 67 to direct Roman efforts against the revolutionaries, Josephus became a collaborator with the Romans, serving as an interpreter during the siege of Jerusalem.* In this Josephus was typical, as the Romans frequently preferred to entice conquered elites to act as their agents, granting in return positions of privilege. Josephus thereby earned the enmity of many Jews. After the war Josephus lived in Rome, where Vespasian granted him a pension and made him a Roman citizen (Josephus Life 76 §422-26).

2. Historian and Apologist.

Our richest source for information about Judea during the Second Temple period, the works of Josephus are often cited yet frequently judged "propaganda" and "distorted." Nevertheless, we owe him the courtesy of evaluation according to his apologetic aims and the literary standards then current.

Josephus was an apologist for his people and for himself. To appeal to Roman sensibilities he cited hubris to explain human behavior, noted parallels between the Pharisees and the Stoics, applied the four cardinal Hellenistic virtues to biblical figures and merged two schools of Hellenistic historiography: the sensationalism and rhetoric of the "pathetic" school (he added dramatic, romantic and even erotic elements to biblical stories) with the revived Herodotean tradition. He also was determined to appeal to fellow Jews who regarded him a traitor. For example, The Jewish War, sometimes judged a propaganda piece produced by a Roman minion, is actually the fruit of a striking thesis: a nonrepresentative minority Jewish faction corrupted Judaism* and caused the war (J.W. 2.17.10 §449-56; 4.3.6 §147-50), and by destroying Jerusalem the Romans acted as the agents of God.* This is consonant with Jewish views of history, respects Roman might and fortune and exonerates the Jewish people at large.

Josephus made use of a number of rhetorical conventions then standard (the child prodigy, lies that demonstrate wily resourcefulness), and while their presence may disturb us, to Josephus they no doubt appeared effective. That Josephus was capable of misrepresenting history pursuant to his apologetic or rhetorical needs is likewise seen in the discrepancies between The Jewish War and Life. While this renders our desire to achieve Rankean historicity (i.e., history "as it actually happened") difficult, Josephus remains in large measure a trustworthy guide.

Josephus provides crucial information on figures (Pilate, Herod, James), movements (the enormously complicated revolutionary/messianic terrain) and social conditions only alluded to elsewhere. His fondness for Daniel may be evidence of the popularity of apocalyptic* during this period. The relationship between Josephus and various NT documents (Luke-Acts,* Paul,* James*) constitute burgeoning fields of study, and recent work on the sociology of Palestine owes much to Josephus. Preserved by early Christians for the wealth of information he relates, Josephus was distorted by Origen and Eusebius to make the claim that the destruction of Jerusalem was God's punishment for the murder of Jesus. In Josephus the Jewish idea of God acting in history is combined with Greek historiographical styles. This is emblematic of a broader fusion of cultures and more narrowly points to the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius and to the historiography of Christian Byzantium.

3. Josephus's Works.

In Rome Josephus produced four works that have survived.

3.1. The Jewish War. The earliest was The Jewish War, originally written in Aramaic. The stated purpose is to warn other nations against opposing Rome, but its pro-Roman apologetic is far more complex than this. Debate continues concerning its accuracy, but excavations at Masada by Yadin have in large measure affirmed its trustworthiness on that matter at least.

3.2. The Jewish Antiquities. The Jewish Antiquities is a survey of Jewish history from the biblical period through the Jewish war, occasioned by charges of Jewish hatred of humankind. In response Josephus highlights the antiquity of Judaism and the high moral character of its laws,* pictures Jewish leaders in terms reminiscent of Plato's philosopher-king and all but ignores the covenant.* Yet he notes the need for Jews to avoid assimilation with other cultures. Claiming to set out in "precise detail," "neither adding nor omitting anything," Josephus frequently alters the biblical material to suit his apologetic aims. The integrity of the claim can be preserved by arguing that Josephus used an early Aramaic Targum along with the Septuagint and the Masoretic Text, viewing each as authoritative. We are on more firm ground in noting that Josephus modeled his work on the Roman Antiquities of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, which had appeared a century before. Both comprise twenty books, and both make the rhetorical claim to historical accuracy. The Jewish Antiquities contains the famous Testimonium Flavianum, where Jesus is called the Messiah (Ant. 18.3.3 §63-64). Most scholars judge it a Christian interpolation.

3.3. Life of Josephus. Often called the first autobiography, the Life of Josephus is in large measure an apology for his career in Galilee, claiming that his actions followed the lead of his superiors in Jerusalem. A response to criticisms leveled at the account provided in The Jewish War, it differs in many respects from the longer work.

3.4. Against Apion. His last work, Against Apion, follows the model of the Greek apologists. It is an attack upon Greek anti-Jewish sentiment that had spread to Rome.

4. Summary.

Josephus is crucial to our understanding of the NT world. His work presents us with a complicated historical and apologetic landscape, causing many to express doubt concerning his reliability. Nevertheless, once apologetic aims are recognized, his value is unchallenged.

See also JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70; PHILO.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Z. Baras, "The Testimonium Flavianum and the Martyrdom of James" in Josephus, Judaism and Christianity, ed. L. Feldman and G. Hata (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987) 338-48; G. Carras, "Paul, Josephus and Judaism: The Shared Judaism of Paul and Josephus," Unpublished D. Phil. thesis, Oxford, 1989); L. Feldman, "Josephus," ABD 3:981-98; L. Feldman and G. Hata, eds., Josephus, Judaism and Christianity (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987); idem, Josephus, the Bible and History (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989); S. Mason, Flavius Josephus on the Pharisees (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1991); idem, Josephus and the New Testament (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1992); T. Rajak, Josephus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); H. Schreckenberg, "The Works of Josephus and the Early Christian Church" in Josephus, Judaism and Christianity, ed. L. Feldman and G. Hata (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987) 315-24. D. P. Nystrom

JOY

Joy is a major theme that runs throughout the writings of the OT, the NT and the literature of the early church fathers (see Apostolic Fathers). It is a word with great theological significance, because everywhere in these documents joy in the true sense, both individual and corporate, is rooted in an unshakable faith in God and originates in a realization that God has acted and is acting to save those who put their trust in him (Ps 16:11; Lk 1:46-47; Acts 2:26, 28; 5:41; 1 Pet 1:6; Rev 19:6, 7; 1 Clem. 18.8; Barn. 10.11).

1. The Vocabulary of Joy
2. Joy in the Later New Testament
3. Joy in the Apostolic Fathers
4. Summary

1. The Vocabulary of Joy.

In the body of Christian literature under consideration there are numerous Greek words or clusters of words that give color to the idea of joy: agalliasis/agalliaomai ("exult," "be glad," "rejoice"), asmenōs ("gladly"), gelaō/gelōs ("laugh"/"laughter"), euphrainō/euphrosynē ("gladden," "be glad," "take delight in," "joy," "cheerfulness"), eudaimoneō ("be happy," "fortunate"), hēdeōs/hēdonē/hēdomai ("gladly"/"pleasure," "have pleasure," "enjoyment," "cravings") hilaros/hilarotēs ("cheerful"/"cheerfulness," "glad"/"gladness," "merry," "graciousness"), makarizō/makarios/makarismos ("consider blessed," "happy," "fortunate," "a blessing"), skirtaō ("exult," "skip gaily about") and chairō/chara ("rejoice," "be glad"/"joy").

The very number of these words helps one to approach an understanding of the meaning of this elusive term. From the texts under study its meaning seems to range from an exuberant gaiety that expresses itself in frolic or exultant dance, to a happiness coming from a good mental outlook on life, to a feeling of well-being that is generated by confidence in the blessing of God, to a deep, quiet, settled joy that is more akin to peace* than it is to happiness.

2. Joy in the Later New Testament.

Some of these words or word groups are seldom used or used not at all by our NT writers. For example, the verb to laugh never appears and the noun laughter only once (Jas 4:9). These writers, familiar with and influenced by the OT, where laughter was most often used to convey ideas of scorn, doubt, derision or foolish thinking and behavior, not joy (cf. Gen 18:12; Prov 10:23 LXX; Eccles 7:6; Sir 21:20; 27:13), either avoided such words altogether or did as James did. He challenged certain of his Christian readers to change their "laughter to mourning" (Jas 4:9), not because he wanted to kill their joy but rather because he knew that their laughter was the foolish laughter of people who had turned from the ways of God and who needed to repent,* so that they might discover true joy (see Martin, 154).

Other words such as eudaimoneō, hilaros/hilarotēs and skirtaō also are absent from the vocabulary of these writers. Perhaps this was because some of these words may have been still too closely tied to their pagan roots (eudaimoneō), describing a happiness that was the result of a good genius (daimōn)—words not filtered by previous usage in the Septuagint—while others tended to emphasize a lighthearted gaiety that was not truly descriptive of a suffering* community that lived life under the cross.* Hēdonē, a word that writers in antiquity often made use of to convey both positive ideas of enjoyment and delight (Plato Rep. 9.583-85; Aristotle Eth. Nic. 7.14; Herodotus 4.139) and negative ideas of sensual pleasures that threaten to undermine the very meaning of life (Jaeger, 1:178-80), is a word that our writers use sparingly (three times) and only in the latter pejorative sense. They see hēdonē as contributing nothing to genuine joy, for it is sinful pleasure, evil passion, a selfish craving that works to destroy the self and the community (Jas 4:1, 3; 2 Pet 2:13; cf. 4 Macc 1:25-26; see Stählin, 2:917-18).

The words or word groups for joy that our NT writers make the most use of are agalliaomai/agalliasis, euphrainomai/euphrosynē, makarizō/makarios and chairō/chara.

The first of these, agalliaomai/agalliasis, is a word group that is found only in Jewish (especially in the Psalms) and Christian writings. It is strictly a religious term that always expresses the worshiper's* thankful exultation in God* and in his mercy.* It is a gladness that may be experienced in the present, e.g., through the contemplation of and the participation in what God has done through Christ* to redeem* human beings (Acts 2:46; 1 Pet 1:6, 8). It comes to full flower in the future when Christians will rejoice with rapturous joy as they stand with Christ in his glory* (1 Pet 4:13; Rev 19:6-7)—agalliaomai is a common eschatological* theme: "the jubilation of God's people in the attainment of his purpose" (Jude 24; Is 12:6; 25:9; 60:5; 61:10; Bauckham, 122). Yet time, present or future, is irrelevant to the meaning of this word, since such exultation is grounded in faith in God and in his unchangeableness (see Bultmann, 1:19-21, who nevertheless does emphasize the eschatological dimension).

Euphrainō/euphrosynē is a word group that appears rather infrequently in our NT writings.

It primarily identifies the inner, subjective feelings of merriment and good cheer describing a mood, a positive mental outlook on life; secondarily it refers to the outward expression of that cheer, such as banqueting, eating, drinking and making merry. It is the joy that a righteous* person (e.g., the Messiah) experiences, even in the face of death, because of his quiet confidence in the safekeeping of his person in the protective care of God (Acts 2:26, 28). These words also describe an inner mood that is a gift from God that can enable all people, if they will allow it, to recognize God's gracious providential care of them (Acts 14:17). It also expresses a joy that manifests itself in liturgical, jubilant celebration. Whenever it is so used in the NT, however, it always has a pejorative connotation (Acts 7:41; Rev 11:10).

Makarizō/makarios is a word group that finds its origin in a word first used of the gods and that denoted "the transcendent happiness of a life beyond care, labour and death" (Hauck, 4:362). Although it later became a weaker, more common everyday term, it seems never to have lost its meaning of well-being, fullness of life, bliss, settled joy in contrast to fleeting earthly happiness (Sir 11:28). In biblical writings it described those whose well-being had its basis in God and his will—knowing and doing it, trusting him, waiting for him, hoping in him and loving him (Mal 3:12; Ps 2:11; 33:8; Prov 16:20) irrespective of the situations in which these faithful might find themselves (Wis 5:15-23). In this same sense our NT writers often use this word group. Who is the person who experiences true well-being, bliss, settled joy (makarios)? Such is the person who holds up under testing and proves faithful (Jas 1:12); the person who both hears and does the will of God (Jas 1:25; Rev 1:3); the person who for the sake of God and Christ experiences suffering even when doing what is right (1 Pet 3:14; 4:14); the person who endures to the end (Jas 5:11; Rev 14:13). However one is to translate this word group, the translation "happy"/"count happy" is hardly the best, for "happy" suggests an emotional reaction based on circumstances, while in fact makarios/makarizō suggests rather a reaction to whatever life might bring based on the faithfulness of God (Martin, 193).

Chairō/chara, originally secular in usage, has become the word group for joy in the NT. Its frequent occurrences underscore the fact that joy is the hallmark of the Christian era—initiated at the birth of Jesus (Mt 2:10), accented at his death,* resurrection* and ascension* (Lk 24:52), persisting to the present even during periods when Christians are subjected to suffering (Jas 1:2; 1 Pet 1:6, 7)

At times joy may be an inner response to a life-changing event—conversion to Christ (Acts 8:39), hearing the gospel* for the first time (Acts 13:48); learning that the church* at Antioch* was manifesting the grace* of God (Acts 11:23); experiencing healing* acts of God (Acts 8:8); knowing Peter was released from prison (Acts 12:14); finding out about the conversion of Gentiles* (Acts 15:3), and so on.

At other times joy may be an inner response to the greatest of adversities—beaten and disgraced for the sake of Christ's name (Acts 5:41); having one's possessions plundered because of being a Christian (Heb 10:34); being painfully driven from city to city because of preaching the gospel (Acts 13:52); undergoing every kind of testing (Jas 1:2); sharing in the sufferings of Christ (1 Pet 4:13); enduring painful discipline* (Heb 12:11).

Sometimes joy was both a present and a not-yet experience—something future, anticipated, eschatological. For example, we may note these words: "Jesus, who for the sake of the joy that was set before him, endured the cross," where the joy, like the goal itself, lies in front of him yet to be attained (Heb 12: 2; Attridge, 357). Note also 1 Peter 4:13b, where the apostle links chara and agalliaomai in a kind of ascending parallelism from present gladness in experiencing suffering for Christ to an eschatological jubilation in the day when his glory will be revealed: "Rejoice insofar as you are sharing Christ's sufferings, so that you may also be glad [charēte] and shout for joy [agalliōmenoi] when his glory is revealed" (1 Pet 1:6, 8; see Michaels, 262; Marshall, 151; Selwyn, 222).

At times the NT writers cannot fully express precisely what they mean by joy with a single word, so they pile word on top of word to help them articulate what they have in mind: euphrainomai/agalliaomai (Acts 2:26); chairō/agalliaomai (1 Pet 4:13; Rev 19:7); agalliaomai/chara (1 Pet 1:8); chairō/euphrainomai (Rev 11:10), variously translated "glad"/"rejoiced," "be glad"/"shout for joy," "rejoice"/"exult," "rejoice with joy," "rejoice"/"celebrate." On occasion, almost as though they realized human beings are incapable of experiencing and adequately giving full expression to joy, they call upon the heavens and those who dwell there to join them in this (Rev 12:12; 18:20; cf. Ps 96:11, 12; T. Levi. 18.5). In our NT writings God is never made the subject of joy (but cf. 1 Clem. 33.7).

3. Joy in the Apostolic Fathers.

Some of the words for joy omitted by the NT writers find a place, however, in the postapostolic writings.

The verb gelaō ("to laugh") appears only in the *Shepherd of Hermas but with a positive connotation, where an old woman asks Hermas, "You who are patient and good-tempered, who are always laughing [gelōn], why are you . . . not merry?" (Herm. Vis. 1.2.3, 8).

Hilaros/hilarotēs ("cheerful," "glad," "merry," "joyful," "gladness") is still another word group found only and often in Hermas. The Shepherd says to Hermas: "Put on joyfulness [hilarotēs], which always has favor with God. . . . Every joyful man [hilaros anēr] does good deeds . . . and despises grief [lypē]. But the mournful man [lyperos anēr] always does wickedly . . . because he grieves the Holy Spirit which is given to man [anthrōpō] in joyfulness [hilaron]" (Herm. Man. 10.3.1, 2; Herm. Sim. 9.15.2; cf. Herm. Vis. 1.2.3; 1.4.3; 3.9.10; 3.10.5; Herm. Man. 5.2.3; 10.3.2; Herm. Sim. 6.1.6; 8.1.18; 9.9.7; 9.10.1). This word group seems to connote a lighthearted cheerfulness linked by this writer to the presence of the Holy Spirit* within the believer (cf. Gal 5:23), a cheerfulness that is the opposite of and incompatible with sorrow [lypē]. Perhaps it was for this reason that the other apostolic fathers avoided the use of these words: a hint and a silent reminder that true joy is not incompatible with sorrow and pain.

Eudaimoneō is found only in Diognetus: "For happiness [eudaimonein] consists not in domination over neighbors. . . . But whoever takes up the burden of his neighbor and works to help another" (Diogn. 10.5). This text, so used, demonstrates that a pagan word can be taken up, "baptized" and used to express a fundamental Christian idea.

Skirtaō, a word that in itself means "to leap, spring or skip about" as a sign of joy (cf. Lk. 1:41, 44), never appears in our NT writers and only twice in the early fathers—negatively in Hermas where the Angel of Luxury and Deceit shepherded skipping (skirtaō), joyful (hilaros) sheep that had given themselves to lusts of this world (Herm. Sim. 6.1.6; 2.3.4, 6) and positively in Diognetus where it is said that "the grace of the church exults" (Diogn. 11.6).

Those words and word groups used by our NT writers to connote joy also appear frequently in the writings of the fathers and with similar meanings.

Makarizō/makarios continues to give expression to that sense of supreme well-being that humans experience by participating in the forgiveness,* grace and salvation* of God even though they must endure suffering, pain and martyrdom (1 Clem. 50.6; 2 Clem. 19.4; Pol. Phil. 2.3; Mart. Pol. 2.1-3).

Euphrainomai/euphrosynē still describes a joy born from knowing and trusting God who both provides and will provide; it refers to a joy both experienced and anticipated (1 Clem. 52.2; 2 Clem. 19.4; Barn. 7.1; 10.11; 21.9; Herm. Man. 5.1.2). The apostolic fathers also carry on to a lesser degree the meanings of chairō/chara as they were used in the NT. For example, it is said of Christians that "when they do good they are buffeted as evildoers, when they are buffeted they rejoice as people who are receiving eternal life" (Diogn. 5.16); joy is experienced by leaders in the church upon seeing Christians living together in unity (1 Clem. 65.1); knowledge of God's love brings joy (Diogn. 10.3); obedience to Christian teachings given in the Holy Spirit gives joy and gladness to the teacher (1 Clem. 63.2); the blood of Jesus Christ is eternal and abiding joy to those within the church (Ign. Phld. presc.); Polycarp, when facing a cruel death, was nevertheless filled with courage and joy (Mart. Pol. 12.1). Polycarp's friends, although they had begged Polycarp to make his escape, remained to put his bones in a proper place where the Lord allowed them to come together in gladness and joy in order to remember him (Mart. Pol. 18.2).

Like the noun to which it is related (hēdonē, pleasure), the adverb hēdeōs ("with pleasure," "joyfully"), which is not used by our NT writers, sometimes expresses a negative idea: "What sort of luxuries are harmful? Every act which a person does with pleasure [hēdeōs]" (Herm. Sim. 6.5.5; Herm. Man. 2.2; cf. Ign. Trall. 6.2). But more often than not it describes an action done in a positive, gladsome, joyful spirit (1 Clem. 2.1; 31.3; Herm. Sim. 6.5.5; 8.10.3, 4; 9.14.6; 27.2). In using hēdonē, the apostolic fathers for the most part follow the example of our NT writers in giving it a negative connotation (Ign. Trall. 6.2; Ign. Phld. 2.2; Ign. Rom. 7.3; Herm. Sim. 6.5.7; 8.8.5; 9.4; Diogn. 6.5; contra 2 Clem. 15.5).

While employing these same words for joy that are found in the NT writings under consideration, the apostolic fathers extend their usage. Not only do humans rejoice, but "the Word teaches the saints and rejoices [euphrainomai]" (Diogn. 12.9). God, too, rejoices: "The Lord adorned himself with good works" (by creating the world; Conzelmann, 9:371] and rejoiced (chairō, 1 Clem. 33.7; cf. Herm. Vis. 3.12.3). For some of these postapostolic writers, joy is a reward for keeping the commandments of God and going beyond them—doing anything good beyond what is required (Herm. Sim. 5.3.3). Barnabas addresses his readers as "children of gladness" (euphrosynēs; Barn. 7.1) and tells them of the three ordinances of the Lord, one of which is "love united with joy and gladness" (agapē euphrosynēs kai agalliaseōs; Barn. 1.6).

4. Summary.

Joy is a theme that pervades the earliest Christian writings. Words for joy are plentiful and seem easy enough to translate, but to understand precisely what these writers meant by them is much more difficult. There is something mysterious about this concept that is not always easy to grasp or express.

Perhaps one can say, on the basis of the texts examined, that for the vast majority of these early Christian writers true joy was not something that could be measured by external features, such as hilarity and exultant celebration —at least not on this side of the great eschatological banquet (Rev 19:7). In those places where such words for joy are used to describe a cultic dance or a dance of jubilation, they always are used in a pejorative sense (see Acts 7:41; Rev 11:10.) Further, these writers do not appear to equate joy with happiness, as happiness is commonly understood today (this in spite of the fact that makarios is translated as "happy" in numerous versions), nor can any of them be termed advocates of what might be called "holy laughter" or other such ecstatic, visible expressions of joy (see Jas 4:9).

Whatever joy is, it can be the result of an experience and awareness of beneficial things occurring either to oneself or to others, such as a vivid consciousness of the providential presence of God in life (Acts 2:28; Barn. 10.11), the coming of rain from heaven and a bountiful harvest (Acts 14:17), possessing and observing the commandments* of God (Jas 1:22-25; Barn. 1.8; 4:11; 10:11), hearing of the growth and stability of the church (Acts 11:23), knowing that the gospel is for Gentiles as well as for Jews (Acts 13:48), possessing an invitation to the eschatological wedding feast hosted by Christ (Rev 19:9), receiving the right to share in the first resurrection (Rev 20:6), and the like.

At the same time joy is not something that exists and thrives only when good things happen or when good news comes. Genuine joy cannot be extinguished or even dampened by the direst of circumstances or the worst kind of events. For example, the apostles, flogged and ordered by their religious leaders to desist from their mission in life, were nevertheless filled with joy because they were counted worthy to suffer disgrace for the sake of Christ's name (Acts 5:41). Christians living in the midst of fiery trials and themselves sharing in the sufferings of Christ rejoiced (1 Pet 4:13). People of faith accepted, even anticipated (prosdexasthai), the plundering of their possessions with joy (Heb 10:34). Furthermore, the possibility of life coming to a violent end could not keep Christians from walking forward to their own personal, painful death with courage and joy (Mart. Pol. 12.1).

What then is joy? One begins to suspect that for most of these Christian writers joy was more than a happy feeling, a pleasing mood or a sense of overflowing jubilation, although it might include these. Rather, by joy they seem to have been referring to something more profound, something more difficult to define yet real. Joy seems not to be laughter, gaiety, lightheartedness, and dance and song (at least in this present world) but something more akin to faith, more akin to a settled state of mind marked by peace. Joy is fundamentally an attitude toward life that views and accepts the world with equanimity, a confident way of looking at life that is rooted deep in faith, in a keen awareness of and trust in the sovereign God who has revealed himself in Jesus Christ and his death and resurrection. Joy thus was a perception of reality that generated hope* and endurance* in affliction and temptation or ease and prosperity. It enabled Christians to see beyond any particular event, judged good or bad, to God who stands above all events and ultimately has control over all events, which will be consummated at Christ's Parousia* (1 Pet). Joy included a readiness for martyrdom (Mart. Pol. 12.1), but equally it described an eagerness to go on living and serving even in the most difficult of circumstances (Hawthorne 1983, 17-18; 1987, 107-10).

See also ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; ESCHATOLOGY; PEACE; SUFFERING; WORSHIP, LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. W. Attridge, Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); E. Bey-reuther and G. Finkenrath, "Joy, Rejoice," NIDNTT 2:356-61; R. Bultmann, "ἀγαλλιάομαι κτλ," TDNT 1:19-21; idem, "εὐφραίνω κτλ, TDNT 2:772-75; H. Conzelmann, "χαίρω κτλ," TDNT 9:359-415; F. Hauck, "μακάριος κτλ," TDNT 4:362-70; G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); idem, Word Biblical Themes: Philippians (Waco, TX: Word, 1987); W. Jaeger, Paideia: The Ideals of Greek Culture Highet (3 vols.; New York: Oxford University Press, 1939-44); I. H. Marshall, 1 Peter (IVPNTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1991); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); W. G. Morrice, Joy in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); J. Moltmann, Theology and Joy (London: SCM, 1971); E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of Peter (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); G. Stählin, "ἡδονή κτλ," TDNT 2:909-26.

G. F. Hawthorne

JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70

Traditional Judaism began to take shape in the aftermath of the destruction of Jerusalem* and the temple* in A.D. 70. With the destruction of the temple and fading hopes of rebuilding it, Jewish faith* could no longer be centered around the temple and the priesthood.* At the time of the destruction of the temple there were many religious sects and doctrines, many of which were at variance with one another. In recent years J. Neusner has rightly criticized the tendency, still in evidence in the work of some scholars, to view Judaism of the first century as essentially unified or "normative." Judaism (or "Judaisms," as Neusner sometimes puts it) was quite diverse in faith and practice. It was only after A.D. 70 that Judaism began moving toward something approximating standardization. This process reached important stages with the production of the Mishnah and later the Talmud, which subsequently came to dominate Jewish religious understanding and practice.

1. Historical Factors
2. Literature
3. Rabbinical Schools, Authorities and Sects
4. Synagogue
5. Basic Tenets of Faith

1. Historical Factors.

The most important factors that changed the complexion of Judaism were the two major wars with Rome. The first war (A.D. 66–70) resulted in the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. This destruction effectively brought the priesthood and the Jewish religious-political establishment to an end. The second war (A.D. 132-35) resulted in the destruction of the Jewish state and the banning of Jews from Jerusalem.

Both of these wars were to some extent driven by messianic hopes. To be sure, the first war was fueled by economic desperation on the part of many of Israel's marginalized, but according to Josephus* it was an "ambiguous oracle," more than anything else, that provoked his countrymen to rebellion (Josephus J.W. 6.5.4 §312-14; cf. 6.5.3 §289). This oracle, which foretold that "one from their country would become ruler of the world," was in all probability based on Numbers 24:17 ("a star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a scepter shall rise out of Israel"). This text is understood in an explicitly messianic sense in all four of the extant Pentateuch targums ("a king shall arise out of Jacob and be anointed the Messiah out of Israel"). Earlier traditions also provide evidence that the passage was understood in a messianic sense (T. Jud. 24:1-6; 1QM 11:4-9; CD 7:18-21; Philo Praem. Poen. 16 §95; Mt 2:2, 7, 9-10). Josephus, however, believed that the oracle was fulfilled in the accession of Vespasian.

The passage from Numbers seems to have played an important part in the second war as well. The leader of this rebellion, Simeon bar Kosiba, who in some of his letters calls himself "Prince of Israel" (cf. 5/6*Ḥ*evEp 1–15), was apparently dubbed bar Kokhba, that is, "Son of the Star" (Justin Martyr Apol. I 31.5-6; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.6.1-4; y. Ta'an. 4.5). This triumphalistic messianism is probably what lies behind the Aramaic paraphrase found in Targum Isaiah 52:13—53:12. This targumic passage probably reflects messianic hopes as they were expressed in the period between the two Roman wars. These hopes were fixed on the advent of a conquering (not suffering) Messiah who would defeat Rome and liberate Israel: "He will build the sanctuary. . . . He will bring our exiles near. . . . He will take away the rule of the Gentiles from the land of Israel. . . . He will hand over the wicked to Gehenna. . . . They shall see the kingdom of their Messiah" (Tg. Isa 53:5, 8, 9, 10).

The Bar Kokhba defeat ended Israel's nationhood. The Jewish people were now almost entirely a dispersed people, a people of the Diaspora.* Jewish identity no longer was defined by support of the Jerusalem temple or life in the land of Israel. Jewish identity increasingly became Torah-centered. The context of Jewish worship and Torah study was the synagogue.* Although pluralism remained a reality, the rabbis, exerting greater influence, more precisely defined several teachings of Jewish faith and the liturgy of the synagogue. These definitions are preserved in the rabbinic writings.

2. Literature.

An extensive corpus of writings was produced after A.D. 70. These writings can be placed into three broad categories: legal or prescriptive; homiletical or speculative; and apocalyptic* and pseudepigraphal.

2.1. Legal. Rabbinic Judaism's foundational document is the Mishnah, a compendium of legal (or halakic, i.e., how one should "walk") opinions that was compiled and edited under the direction of Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi ("the Prince") in the early part of the third century. The Mishnah (lit. "repetition") is divided into six sedarim ("orders") treating major aspects of Jewish life under the authority* of Torah. The names of the sedarim are "Seeds," "Set Feasts," "Women," "Damages," "Holy Things" and "Clearnesses." Each seder contains several tractates, which treat various subtopics. The Mishnah seems to envision obedience to Torah mainly in terms of priestly holiness.*

Completed about one century after the Mishnah, the Tosefta (lit. "addition") supplements—as implied by its name—the contents of the Mishnah. In fact, the Tosefta cannot be understood apart from reading it alongside of the Mishnah. It too is divided into the six mishnaic sedarim, although the tractates are not always in the same order, nor are all of them represented.

The Talmud (lit. "learning") has taken form in two recensions, the Palestinian and Babylonian. The former may be dated to the fifth century, the latter to the sixth. The Talmud is made up of the Mishnah and the gemara (lit. "completion"), material that expands section by section upon portions of the Mishnah. In Hebrew the former is called Talmud Yerushalmi (Jerusalem Talmud). But this is a misnomer, for the Palestinian Talmud was not edited in Jerusalem. In Hebrew the latter is called Talmud Babli. The Talmud contains mostly legal discussion (as one would expect, given its dependence on and interaction with the Mishnah), but nearly one third of it is homiletical. It is in the Talmud, not the Mishnah and the Tosefta, that we find a rich assortment of messianic traditions and polemic directed against Jesus and Christians. Modern Judaism has its roots in the varieties of Judaism preserved and held in tension in the mishnaic-talmudic literature.

2.2. Homiletical. Much of the homiletical (or haggadic, i.e., story) material is found in the rabbinic Midrash (lit. "interpretation," or "commentary") and the Aramaic paraphrase of Scripture called the Targum (lit. "translation").

The early midrashim include Mekilta (lit. "measure," or "section"; commentary on Exodus), Sipra (lit. "the book"; commentary on Leviticus), and the two Sipre (lit. books; commentaries on Numbers and Deuteronomy). Later midrashim include Midrash Rabbah (lit. "the great commentary"; commentaries on the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls), Midrash Tehillim (Psalms commentary), Midrash Shemuel (Samuel commentary), Midrash Mishle (Proverbs commentary). These last three are sometimes collectively referred to as Midrash Shocher Tov (from Prov 11:27: commentary of "the one who seeks good"). Midrash Tanhuma (commentary of [Rabbi] Tanhuma) is another important commentary.

The targums are interpretive Aramaic paraphrases that arose in the synagogue (see 4 below). There are three complete Pentateuch targums: Onqelos, the official targum and the one that is the most literal; Pseudo-Jonathan, the latest and most paraphrastic; and Neofiti (or Neophyti), the targum that may represent the oldest tradition. There are also several manuscripts of the so-called Fragmentary Targum. It is called this because it contains only selections of verses and passages. Finally, there are several fragments of the Pentateuch targums that have been recovered from the Cairo Genizah. There are also targums for all of the Prophets (the so-called Targum Jonathan). It has been argued that these targums contain many early (i.e., first-century) traditions. Finally, there are targums for most of the Writings (two targums, in the case of Esther).

The antiquity of the production of targums is attested at Qumran.* Among the fragments of caves 4 and 11 we have 4QtgLev (= Lev 16:12-15, 18-21), 4QtgJob (= Job 3:5; 4:16–5:4) and 11QtgJob (= major portions of Job 17–42). There are important differences between these targum fragments and the later, fully preserved targums. The discovery of them at Qumran demonstrates that targums were produced in the first century, but it does not prove that the style and traditions of the later targums can be assumed also to reach back to the first century. The later targums do contain traditions that reach back to the first century, but this has to be demonstrated on a case-by-case basis; it cannot be assumed.

Thanks largely to the numerous publications of Neusner, a lively and interesting debate has emerged that revolves around the related questions of the interpretation of rabbinic literature and of Jewish pluralism of late antiquity. Breaking with traditional modern Jewish interpretation, which tends to regard the contents of rabbinic literature as historically reliable and as offering a description of a unified Jewish faith, and applying several of the canons of Gospel criticism, Neusner has argued that each rabbinic document should be studied on its own terms. He finds that these documents reflect individual traits and distinctives and that very little of their contents can with confidence be assigned to the various named rabbinic authorities.

Nor is it legitimate, Neusner argues further, to infer from the rabbinic literature an ancient, monolithic Judaism. Rather, we should speak of "Judaisms." Although criticized for claiming too much with respect to a given document's overall perspective (often in the form of an argument from silence—what the document does not address we should assume that it is opposed to it) and sometimes for failing to engage in tradition criticism that takes into account related materials found outside of the document in question, Neusner's work marks a major advance in the modern study of rabbinic Judaism. The older, largely uncritical, synthetic portraits of what "the rabbis" believed or what "Judaism" was like in the first century, portraits that included biographies of figures such as Hillel or Aqiba, should now be seen as obsolete.

2.3. Apocalyptic and Pseudepigraphal Literature. A great deal of apocalyptic (i.e., revelatory) and pseudepigraphal (i.e., pseudonymous) literature was produced in the aftermath of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. In his English translation of the oldest and most important specimens of the pseudepigrapha, J. H. Charlesworth subdivides this literature into the following categories: apocalyptic literature; testaments; OT expansions; wisdom and philosophical literature; and prayers, psalms and odes. Among the most important writings in the first category are 1 and 2 Enoch, 4 Ezra, 2 Apocalypse of Baruch and the Apocalypse of Abraham. In the second category the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Testament of Job and the Testament of Moses are especially important. The Epistle of Aristeas, Jubilees, Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities and the Lives of the Prophets are among the most important pseudepigraphal writings of the third category (what is also sometimes called the "rewritten Bible"). In the fourth category, 3 and 4 Maccabees are especially important, while the Psalms of Solomon is arguably the most important specimen from the fifth category.

Common to all five of these categories of the pseudepigrapha is the role played by the OT. The OT provides names (of famous biblical characters), settings, themes, structures and language. At least two concerns stimulated the production of the pseudepigrapha: the perception of historical and theological problems or gaps in the OT and the need to update the message of the OT, so that it might speak more directly and effectively to later generations.

Pseudepigraphical writings attempted to update the OT and how it should be interpreted by clarifying points of law,* instructing in matters of piety and cultic practice, predicting Israel's history and predicting the timing and character of the eschaton* and day of judgment.* For these reasons it is true in a general sense to say that the pseudepigrapha bear an exegetical relationship to the OT.

In many of the pseudepigraphal writings there is a marked interest in theodicy and final judgment. Evidently many of the pseudepigraphal writers, in the aftermath of the devastating wars with Rome and the apparent dissolution of the locus of Jewish faith and practice, were seeking to validate faith in the God* of the OT Scriptures. Had God abandoned Israel? Was God just? What did the future hold? How should a believing Jew live? These are the principal questions that drive many of the pseudepigraphal writers. It might be added that the legal interpretation of the rabbis is also to some extent pseudepigraphic, in that it is understood as the "oral Torah," a detailed explication of the written Torah that ultimately derives from Moses* and is passed on by various famous rabbinic authorities (often fictitiously).

3. Rabbinical Schools, Authorities and Sects. The rabbinic tradition makes reference to several pretannaitic sages, such as Shammai, Hillel, Admon, ben He He, Yose ben Yohanan, Yohanan ben Bag-Bag, Yohanan the High Priest, and Simeon the Just. Among the early sages also are the so-called holy men (e.g., Honi the Circle-Drawer and Hanina ben Dosa), who are remembered especially for their acts of piety and effectual prayers. One of the much-debated questions has to do with the relationship between the Pharisees and the rabbis. In the past it was often assumed that the rabbis were the heirs of the pharisaic tradition. Although it is true that many of the teachings and practices associated with the Pharisees appear to have been taken over by the rabbinic tradition, the exact nature of this continuity remains unclear.

The rabbis are divided into four basic classifications that correspond to four periods of time: the Tannaim, the Amoraim, the Saboraim and the Geonim. Each of these periods saw important works produced or compiled and edited.

3.1. The Tannaim. The tannaitic period extends roughly from A.D. 10 to 200, that is, from the establishment of the early academies, Bet Shammai (House of Shammai) and Bet Hillel (House of Hillel), to the compiling and editing of the Mishnah under Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi in the first decade or so of the third century. The teachers, or sages, of this period are called the Tannaim (lit. "teachers," from the Aramaic word t'nā, which literally means "to repeat." This word is formulaic, occurring frequently in the literature.). It is in this period that teachers were given the more or less formal title rabbi (lit. "my master"). Some have argued that it was after Yabneh (c. A.D. 85) that this title became a mark of official ordination. The Gospels evidently attest its earlier, informal usage. The rabbis of this period produced what would become the Mishnah and the tannaitic midrashim (Mekilta, Sipra Leviticus, Sipre Numbers and Sipre Deuteronomy). The sayings of many of these rabbis (or at least many sayings attributed to them) are found in later collections and are referred to as baraitot (lit. "standing outside"; sing. baraita). Major Tannaim include Rabban Gamaliel, Rabban Gamaliel II, Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, Aqiba ben Joseph, Ishmael, Joshua, Judah ben Bathyra, Meir, and Yose the Galilean.

3.2. The Amoraim. The amoraic period extends roughly from A.D. 200 to 500. Rabbis of this period are called the Amoraim (lit. "expounders" or "spokesmen"). The achievement of the amoraic period was the production of the Tosefta and the gemara that, in combination with material from the Mishnah and the Tosefta, would make up the two versions of the Talmud. The oldest version of the Talmud (i.e., Talmud Yerushalmi) was completed toward the end of the amoraic period. The Amoraim also contributed to and edited many midrashic works. Major Amoraim include Hanina ben Hama, Joshua ben Levi, Rab, Simeon ben Lakish and Abbahu.

3.3. The Saboraim. The saboraic period extends roughly from A.D. 500 to 650. The relatively small number of rabbis of this period are called Saboraim (lit. "reasoners"). The Saboraim expanded and edited the Babylonian Talmud, their most important achievement, as well as some of the midrashim, and contributed to halakic debate. Major Saboraim include Sama ben Judah, Ahai ben Huna and Samuel ben Judah. 'Ena and Simuna were the last of these scholars.

3.4. The Geonim. The geonic period extends roughly from A.D. 650 to 1050. The major Babylonian rabbis of this period are called the Geonim (lit. "excellent ones"). "Gaon" was a title of honor reserved for the chief rabbis (sometimes in place of the title Rosh Yeshiva; lit. "head of the academy"). They edited several of the latest midrashic works and were students of the Talmud, often interacting with philosophy and secular academics. Perhaps best known is Saadia Gaon (Saadia ben Joseph, 892-942) who translated the Hebrew Bible into Arabic, complete with Arabic commentary. He also wrote a commentary on Ishmael's thirteen exegetical rules and a polemical work against the Karaites. Another famous Gaon was Natronai (eighth century) who, it is claimed, wrote out from memory a copy of the Talmud. With the death of Gaon Hai (1038) the geonic institutions went into decline.

4. Synagogue.

The roots of the synagogue* (from the Greek synagōgē, meaning "a gathering") are obscure but probably had their origin in the exilic period. In the Second Temple period the word referred both to the people who assembled for worship* and prayer* (hence, a synagogue may also be called a proseuchē, "a house of prayer") and to the building in which they gathered. Eventually the word comes to refer primarily to the building.

Many references to synagogues are found in the NT and in Josephus. Archaeological remains suggest that as distinctive buildings synagogues did not become commonplace until after the Bar Kokhba war. Only three first-century synagogues have been discovered (in Gamla, in Masada and within the Herodium). In the first century various buildings, public and private, served as synagogues. A first-century Greek inscription, however, does speak of the building of a synagogue: "Theodotus, son of Vettenos, the priest and archisynagōgos, son of an archisynagōgos and grandson of an archisynagōgos, who built the synagogue for purposes of reciting the Law and studying the commandments." There are NT references to archisynagōgoi (lit., "rulers of the synagogue"; Mk 5:22, 36-38; Lk 13:14; Acts 13:15; 18:8, 17).

In the aftermath of the destruction of the temple, the liturgy of the synagogue became increasingly fixed and formalized. Lectionaries developed. Older prayers and blessings were edited and new prayers and blessings were added. One of the best known prayers is the Qaddish (holy): "May His great name be glorified and made holy in the world which He created according to His will. May He establish His kingdom in your lifetime and during your days." This Aramaic prayer has often been compared with the Lord's Prayer. Another well known prayer is the Amidah (standing) or Shemoneh Esreh (eighteen). The twelfth benediction of this prayer was eventually supplemented in such a way as to discourage Christians from continuing with the synagogue: To the original line, "For apostates let there be no hope, and the kingdom of arrogance quickly uproot," has been added: "In a moment let the Nazorenes and the heretics be destroyed; let them be blotted from the Book of Life, and with the righteous not be inscribed" (for rabbinic discussion of this revision, see b. Ber. 28b-29a). The assurances in Revelation 21:27 that Christians' names are written in the book of life could very well be a response to the imprecations of this revised benediction.

The interpretive paraphrasing of Scripture into Aramaic, which resulted in the production of the targums, was another important activity of the synagogue. Although the targums contain traditions that date to the early Middle Ages, careful comparative work has isolated primitive traditions, sometimes reflecting ideas and events of the first century. Some of this early tradition has been useful in NT interpretation.

5. Basic Tenets of Faith.

According to Josephus, the Jewish people adhere to the Law of Moses and so live in "astonishing unity of mind [homonoia]" (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.19 §179-81). He goes on to declare that Jews hold to a single concept and profession of God. The apologetic needs of his treatise have led Josephus to exaggerate, especially when he declares that among his people is "no difference in conduct of their lives." But there is much truth to his claim that the Jews, unlike the Gentiles,* hold to a common belief about God. But in most other matters touching faith and practice, Jewish religious views of the first century were quite diverse. Only in the rabbinic age did Jewish faith become more or less standardized.

5.1. God. Judaism's view of God* is squarely founded on the writings that make up the Hebrew Bible. The spiritual, transcendent and eternal character of God is affirmed. God is Creator and Sustainer. He is the final Judge. Absolute monotheism is affirmed. Jewish writings, especially rabbinic writings, vigorously oppose any idea that could be viewed as compromising monotheism. In some cases this means carefully qualifying statements in Scripture

(e.g., Gen 1:26; 3:22), which Christians, Gnostics* and others at one time or another appealed to in support of the plurality of the Godhead (Segal 1977).

In post-70 Judaism, reverence for God's name exceeded the explicit requirements of written Torah. Whereas Exodus 20:7 (Deut 5:11) commands Israelites not to take the name of the Lord God in vain, Jewish piety would eventually require that the name of God normally not be uttered at all. The rabbinic writings reflect this reverence, as is seen in the formulaic and ubiquitous reference to God as "The Holy One, blessed be He."

5.2. Humankind. In contrast to Hellenistic dualism, in which the human being is understood as made up of an unworthy and flawed body and a worthy and good soul (the latter longing to escape from the former), Judaism understands the human being in monistic terms. There is a "soul" (nepeš), to be sure, but it acts in concert with the physical being. Every aspect of the human being is potentially good, yet every aspect of the human being has been tainted by sin. In rabbinic writings the moral dimension of the human being is described in terms of the yēṣer, or "inclination," either to do good or to do evil (m. Ber. 9:5; Gen. Rab. 14.4 [on Gen 2:7]). Some rabbis believed that the evil yēṣer resides in all of the members, or organs, of the human being (compare Paul's comments in Rom 7:17-24, esp. 7:23).

One finds in Jewish writings a broad range of opinions with respect to the question of humanity's redemption.* There is a range of opinion even with respect to the fate of Israelites themselves. Certain Jewish groups, especially the Essenes and authors of some of the Dead Sea Scrolls, believed that persons outside of their community had little chance of salvation.* Jewish views with respect to Gentiles also varied greatly. Some believed that there is no hope for Gentiles; their corpses will feed the furnaces of hell.* Others believed that salvation was possible for righteous Gentiles if they obeyed the seven Noahic laws (based on Gen 9:3-4).

5.3 Written and Oral Torah. The most inspired and most authoritative writings of Judaism are the books of Moses, the Torah ("law" or, more literally, "instruction"). Because these books were written and so were public they could not remain the exclusive property of the Jewish people. Christians claimed the books for themselves as an important part of their heritage. The history of God's dealing with Israel and humanity in general had reached its climax in the coming of Jesus and his atoning death (see Death of Christ) on the cross. What the Jewish people were able to retain for themselves was the oral Torah, that is, the written traditions that elaborated and interpreted the written Torah. It was believed that the oral Torah also originated at Mount Sinai and so was invested with essentially the same authority as was the written Torah. For many Jewish teachers the oral Torah was Judaism's trump card. Christianity may well possess the written Torah, but only Judaism possessed the oral Torah and so was able to interpret the former fully and accurately.

5.4. Eschatology. One must be cautious when attempting to summarize Jewish eschatology. The literature generated in the first century following the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple is especially diverse. Apocalyptic and pseudepigraphal writings envision a variety of events and forms of judgment, both temporal and eternal, with or without a Messiah. Within the rabbinic corpus itself there is much diversity. Some authorities believe that the ten northern tribes will be regathered; others think not. Some rabbis apparently tried to predict when the Messiah would appear (e.g., "forty years after the destruction of the temple"); others expressed skepticism (e.g., "Aqiba, grass will sprout from your cheek bones and still Messiah will not have appeared"). Others speculated how long the messianic era would perdure (e.g., "four hundred years" or "one thousand years"). Later rabbinic speculation entertained a suffering Messiah, who was "son of Josephus" (or Ephraim), as opposed to the more traditional "son of David." This Messiah would suffer and die, paving the way for the triumph of the Messiah, son of David.

Even with all of the diversity, there emerged several common concepts in rabbinic Judaism. The hope for the "world to come"; the hope for the appearance of the Messiah, son of David; the anticipation of the day of judgment, with opinions varying as to the fate of the Gentiles; and the idea that Abraham* and other patriarchs guarded the gates that led either to heaven* or to hell (cf. Lk 16:22-25) are among the most commonly held eschatological beliefs.

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; DIASPORA JUDAISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. I. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1917); G. Alon, Jews, Judaism and the Classical World: Studies in Jewish History in the Times of the Second Temple and Talmud (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1977); L. Baeck, The Pharisees and Other Essays (New York: Schocken, 1947); J. Bonsirven, Palestinian Judaism in the Time of Jesus Christ (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1964); S. J. D. Cohen, From the Maccabees to the Mishnah (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); J. H. Charlesworth, ed., The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (2 vols.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983, 1985); H. Conzelmann, Gentiles, Jews, Christians: Polemics and Apologetics in the Greco-Roman Era (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); W. D. Davies and L. Finkelstein, eds., The Cambridge History of Judaism, 1: Introduction: The Persian Period (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); A. Eisenberg, The Synagogue through the Ages (New York: Bloch, 1974); C. A. Evans, "Mishna and Messiah 'in Context': Some Comments on Jacob Neusner's Proposals," JBL 112 (1993) 267-89; F. J. Foakes Jackson, Josephus and the Jews (London: SPCK, 1930); S. Freyne, Galilee: From Alexander the Great to Hadrian (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1980); M. Goodman, State and Society in Roman Galilee, A.D. 132–212 (Oxford Centre for Postgraduate Hebrew Studies; Totowa, NJ: Rowman & Allanheld, 1983); L. L. Grabbe, Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian, 2: The Roman Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); R. Hamerton-Kelly and R. Scroggs, eds., Jews, Greeks and Christians: Religious Cultures in Late Antiquity (SJLA 21; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976); M. Hengel, The "Hellenization" of Judea in the First Century after Christ (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989); H. Jagersma, A History of Israel from Alexander the Great to Bar Kochba (London: SCM, 1985); H. C. Kee, "The Transformation of the Synagogue after 70 C.E.: Its Import for Early Christianity," NTS 36 (1990) 1-24; P. Keresztes, "The Jews, the Christians, and Emperor Domitian," VC 27 (1973) 1-28; L. I. Levine, ed., Ancient Synagogues Revealed (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1981); idem, ed., The Galilee in Late Antiquity (New York and Jerusalem: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1992); H. Maccoby, Judaism in the First Century (London: Sheldon, 1989); L. M. McDonald, "Anti-Judaism in the Early Church Fathers" in Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith, ed. C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 215-52; G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Century of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim (3 vols.; Cambridge: Harvard University, 1927-30); J. Neusner, Early Rabbinic Judaism: Historical Studies in Religion, Literature and Art (SJLA 13; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975); idem, "The Formation of Rabbinic Judaism: Yavneh (Jamnia) from A.D. 70–100," ANRW 2.19.2 (1979) 3-42; idem, Formative Judaism: Religious, Historical, and Literary Studies (2 vols.; BJS 37, 41; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1982-83); idem, Judaism: The Classical Statement. The Evidence of the Bavli (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986); idem, Judaism: The Evidence of the Mishnah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981); idem, Judaism in Society: The Evidence of the Yerushalmi (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983); S. Safrai, ed., The Jewish People in the First Century (2 vols., CRINT 1.1-2; Assen: Van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974-76); idem, ed., The Literature of the Sages (CRINT 2.3; Assen: Van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); S. Sandmel, Judaism and Christian Beginnings (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978); E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.—A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes et al. (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1973-87); A. F. Segal, Rebecca's Children: Judaism and Christianity in the Roman World (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1986); idem, Two Powers in Heaven: Early Rabbinic Reports about Christianity and Gnosticism (SJLA 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); P. Sigal, The Emergence of Contemporary Judaism (Pittsburgh, PA: Pickwick, 1980); E. M. Smallwood, The Jews under Roman Rule: From Pompey to Diocletian: A Study in Political Relations (SJLA 20; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1981); G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (London: SCM, 1983; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); I. M. Zeitlin, Jesus and the Judaism of His Time (Oxford: Blackwell, 1988).

C. A. Evans

JUDE

The letter of Jude is the last letter in what has become known as the "catholic," or "general letters," of the NT (i.e., James through Jude; Webb 1992). In this letter Jude warns his readers about false teachers and exhorts them to defend the faith. Rowston (1975) is correct in lamenting that Jude is "the most neglected book" in the NT. But careful study of it will richly repay the reader.

1. Literary Structure and Form
2. Character
3. Opponents
4. Authorship
5. Date
6. Recipients/Destination
7. Message

1. Literary Structure and Form.

Although Jude is one of the smallest letters of the NT, analysis of its structure reveals a carefully composed literary gem.

1. Epistolary Structure. While Jude has a letter opening (Jude 1-2) and a closing doxology (Jude 24-25), its epistolary character has been questioned (see Letters). For example, Fuller (160) considers Jude to be a tract, and the epistolary features to be "merely a conventional device." But such a claim cannot really be substantiated because it is these features which characterize the letter genre, and there are no formal means for distinguishing them as conventional devices or later interpolations (Bauckham 1988 ANRW, 3800). Furthermore, the body itself alludes to the epistolary character of the text (Jude 3); it also uses epistolary conventions (e.g., "I desire to remind you," Jude 5; cf. White).

As an epistle, Jude's epistolary structure may be outlined as follows:

Letter Opening (Jude 1-2)
  Opening Address (Jude 1)
  Salutation (Jude 2)
Letter Body (Jude 3-23)
  Body Opening (Jude 3-4)
  Body Middle (Jude 5-23)
Letter Closing (Jude 24-25)

Due to the brevity of the letter, there is no body closing. Neyrey (1993, 27) views Jude 17-23 as the body closing because of the use of a disclosure formula (cf. Watson, 67). However, the phrase "but you, beloved" (Jude 17, cf. Jude 20) with an imperative is not actually a disclosure formula. Rather, this use of direct address and a command indicates a major transition within the body middle itself (cf. White, 38). In this instance Jude 20-23 actually brings the body to a fitting climax by addressing the purpose of the letter itself: how to contend for the faith* (cf. Jude 3).

The body opening of a letter usually identifies the occasion for the letter and alludes to its purpose (White, 18-19). Thus the body opening of Jude indicates that the occasion for the letter is Jude's realization that false teachers have entered the church* (Jude 4), and the letter's dual purpose is to make his readers aware of them and their condemnation (Jude 4), as well as to exhort them to fight for the faith (Jude 3). As a body opening, Jude 3-4 lay the foundation for the discussion in the body middle (Jude 5-23). This relationship between the body opening and body middle produces a chiastic structure (cf. Bauckham 1983, 5-6):

A Appeal: need to contend for the faith (Jude 3)
  B Occasion for appeal: false teachers identified and condemned (Jude 4)
  B′ Occasion for appeal: false teachers described and condemned (Jude 5-19)
A′ Appeal: how to contend for the faith (Jude 20-23)

By concluding with a doxology, Jude does not follow the usual form for a letter closing. This form of the closing suggests that Jude envisions the letter being read to the Christian community gathered in worship,* and that he is addressing them with a sermon in letter form. This suggestion is confirmed by the midrashic style of the letter's body (see below), and thus, as Bauckham (1983, 1) suggests, Jude is an "epistolary sermon" (cf. McDonald, 60-61).

1.2. Rhetorical Structure. Within the past twenty years scholars have begun to analyze NT texts in light of Greco-Roman rhetorical* techniques and forms (cf. Kennedy; Mack). While originally an oral skill used in speeches, rhetoric was later used in written texts as well, particularly in those forms of literature which were meant to persuade. Rhetoric was taught to Greco-Roman students and included instruction in selecting the appropriate arguments (called "invention"), arranging the material into the most effective outline (called "arrangement"), and developing appropriate language for effective communication (called "style").

In a very helpful analysis, Watson (29-79) has applied rhetorical criticism to Jude's letter. All parts of a letter, including its opening and closing, may contribute to its rhetorical effectiveness. For example, while the identification of the readers in Jude 1 is necessary according to epistolary form, the description itself reassures the readers and contributes to their sense of goodwill toward the author. Thus a letter opening may contribute to the rhetorical function of an introduction (exordium) while at the same time conforming to the epistolary form.

Watson's analysis (29-79, esp. 77-78; cf. Neyrey 1993, 25-27) results in the following rhetorical outline of Jude, to which has been added brief definitions of the Latin terms.

1. Introduction (exordium; Jude 3)
   (with Jude 1-2 as a quasi-exordium)
2. Narration (narratio; Jude 4)
3. Proofs (probatio; Jude 5-16 containing three proofs (Jude 5-10, 11-13, 14-16)
4. Conclusion (peroratio; Jude 17-23)
   Recapitulation (repetitio; Jude 17-19)
   Emotional Appeal (adfectus; Jude 20-23)
   (with Jude 24-25 as a quasi-peroratio)

While this is an informative analysis, its weakness is the combination of Jude 17-19 and Jude 20-23 as the conclusion (peroratio). Jude 17-19 as a unit contains the same formal characteristics as the earlier three proofs (example/text, application to the opponents), and so it should be considered a fourth proof in the probatio. The unit of Jude 20-23 does not really qualify as an adfectus, or emotional appeal; it is, rather, completing the appeal stated in Jude 3 by giving instructions for how to contend for the faith. How to classify such paraenesis in NT letters is one of the questions still unanswered in the application of rhetorical analysis to biblical texts.

1.3. Midrash. Ellis (221-26; cf. Bauckham 1983, 4-5) first observed the midrashic style used in Jude 5-19, in which scriptural examples and quotations become "texts" which are then interpreted to apply to the situation facing Jude's readers. This midrashic pattern of "text" followed by interpretation is repeated four times in these verses. The first two "texts" are actually allusions to biblical stories (Jude 5-7, 11) which are then interpreted to apply to Jude's opponents (Jude 8-10, 12-13). The latter two are from authoritative (though not biblical) sources (Jude 14-15, 17-18) which are equally applied to the readers' situation (Jude 16, 19; cf. Bauckham 1990, 179-234).

This midrashic style may be compared profitably with the Qumran pesharim (scrolls interpreting biblical texts; from pēšer, "interpretation"; plural, pᵉšārîm), particularly the thematic pesharim that comment on diverse texts which have been brought together because they address a common theme (e.g., 4QFlor; 11QMelch; in contrast to continuous pesharim, e.g., 1QpHab). Both similarities and differences may be noted between Jude and these pesharim (cf. Bauckham 1983, 4-5; Bauckham later suggests avoiding the term midrash because of potential confusion with rabbinic midrashim; cf. Bauckham 1990, 180 n. 2).

2. Character.

Jude has frequently been viewed as characterized by the early catholicism* of the post-apostolic era (e.g., Schelkle 1963 Spätapostolische; Sidebottom, 77-78; Rowston 1971, 145-54; on date, see 5 below). As a category in which to understand the development of early Christianity, early catholicism has increasingly been called into question. But even if the characteristics of this category are granted for the sake of argument, Jude still should not be so characterized (e.g., Bauckham 1983, 8-9). The expectation of an imminent Parousia* has not faded (Jude 1, 14-15, 21, 24; cf. Webb 1996). Jude does not argue that the false teachers should submit to some form of ecclesiastical hierarchy; he does not even allude to such officials (see Church Order). There is no evidence of a developing Christian canon.* The evidence for this characterization is based on two things: (1) Jude 17 is interpreted to imply a post-apostolic date, but this is unnecessary (on date, see 5 below). (2) The reference to "the faith" in Jude 3 (cf. Jude 20) is interpreted as referring to a defined set of crystallized doctrines. But there is no need to view this phrase as anything more than a synonym for "the gospel." And even Paul, writing in the 40s and 50s, used "the faith" in this way (e.g., Gal 1:23; cf. Neyrey 1993, 55).

Rather than early-catholic, Jude is better understood as an apocalyptic* Jewish-Christian letter (e.g., Bauckham 1983, 8-11; Charles 1993, 42-64). This view is based on observing (1) the midrashic style of argumentation (see above), (2) the pervasive use of Jewish sources, especially apocalyptic ones (see 3.2 below), and (3) the prominence of an apocalyptic* worldview in the thought of the letter.

2.1. Literary Relationships. Packed within the twenty-five verses of this letter is an amazing number of literary allusions. Perceiving them aids the reader in appreciating Jude's literary richness.

2.2. Old Testament. While Jude does not actually quote any OT texts, a careful study reveals its extensive dependence on the OT, including its narratives (e.g., Israel's exodus and wilderness experience, Jude 5), theology (e.g., the people of God are "the called," Jude 1), and language ("feeding themselves," Jude 12, from Ezek 34:2; e.g., Rowston 1971, 37-48; Bauckham 1983; Charles 1990; Charles 1993, 91-127).

The author is evidently aware of Greek versions of the OT because he picks up some of its distinctive terminology (e.g., gongystēs, "grumbler", Jude 16; Symm. Prov 26:22; Is 29:24; cf. Bigg, 310-11). But his primary text appears to be the Hebrew because he alludes to OT passages in which the Hebrew text makes his point, but the Greek translation does not support it. For example, Jude 12 refers to "clouds without rain, carried away by winds," which probably alludes to the Hebrew version of Proverbs 25:14 ("clouds and wind, but there is no rain"). But Proverbs 25:14 LXX reads "winds and clouds and rain appear," and lacks the vivid image Jude is using (see Old Testament in General Epistles).

2.3. Jewish Traditions. While not quoting from the Hebrew canon, Jude is the only NT book to cite explicitly an extra-canonical Jewish source. This is clearly the case in Jude 14-15 which quotes 1 Enoch 1:9 and probably also in Jude 9 which may quote the now lost ending of the Testament of Moses (Bauckham 1983, 65-76). For some later Christians this was a problem. Tertullian saw this as an argument for 1 Enoch's authenticity (Tertullian De Cult. fem. 1.3), while Jerome on the other hand questioned Jude's canonicity (Vir. 4; cf. Bauckham 1990, 137-38). Given the other allusions to these and other Jewish apocalyptic texts in Jude (and in some other NT books), it is quite evident that these works were popular in the milieu in which this letter was composed and read. If this is the case, then Jude's quotations should not really be a problem to modern readers; it is similar to a minister in a sermon making a point by quoting a popular Christian writer who is a recognized authority on a subject (see Non-Canonical Writings, Citations).

Beyond these explicit quotations, Jude makes extensive allusions to 1 Enoch and other Jewish writings and traditions of the Second-Temple period (Osburn 1977; Wolthuis; Charles 1991, "Jude's Use"; Charles 1993, 128-66). An appreciation of these allusions assists the reader in understanding what Jude is implying in his dense and compact work. The use of these Jewish traditions often moves an OT story or reference beyond that which may be understood from the OT itself. For example, Jude 11 refers to Cain, Balaam and Korah. Jude has probably brought these three characters together in this woe oracle based on similarities between them, which they have in later Jewish tradition. In the case of each of these three men, Jewish tradition viewed them as leading people astray through false teaching (e.g., Cain, Josephus Ant. 1.2.1 §61; Balaam, Philo Abr. 114; Korah, Pseudo-Philo 16:1; cf. 16:5; Josephus Ant. 4.2.3 §21). That such points are made allusively rather than explicitly suggests that such Jewish traditions were a natural part of the milieu of Jude's readers.

2.4. 2 Peter. It is quite evident that some relationship exists between Jude 4-13, 16-18 and 2 Peter 2:1-18; 3:1-3. Until the nineteenth century the predominant view was that Jude used 2 Peter* as a source (e.g., Luther, 203; Bigg, 216-24), but more recently the predominant view has been reversed to 2 Peter having used Jude (e.g., Mayor 1978 [1907], i-xxv; cf. list in Bauckham 1990, 145), with very few holding the earlier view (e.g., Lenski, 241). A few have argued that both Jude and 2 Peter are dependent upon a common source (e.g., Reicke, 189-90; Green, 58-64), and common authorship by Jude has also been argued (e.g., Robinson, 192-95).

More recent work using redaction criticism (Fornberg, 33-59; Neyrey 1977, 119-67; Bauckham 1983) and rhetorical criticism (Watson 1988, 160-87) have strengthened the position that 2 Peter used Jude as a source, and this remains the most probable position. However, the lack of precise verbal links between 2 Peter and Jude renders the position of a common source a possibility.

2.5. Christian Traditions. It has frequently been asserted that Jude is indebted to Paul's thought and terminology (e.g., Bigg, 311-12; Sidebottom, 72-73), such as Jude's self description, "a servant of Jesus Christ" (Jude 1; cf. Rom 1:1), or use of the phrase "build yourselves up" (Jude 20; cf. 1 Thess 5:11; cf. the list of parallels in Rowston 1971, 60-61). The problem with this assertion is its assumption that parallels between Jude and Paul's letters are distinctively Pauline. But this assumption is questionable on two grounds. Paul himself makes use of common early Christian traditional materials, and many of the supposed examples of Jude's indebtedness to Paul may be better explained as traditional material common to early Christianity (Bauckham 1983, 8). Second, some of the common terminology may be better explained by the fact that Jude is addressing a situation similar to that which Paul sometimes faced (e.g., "worldly," Jude 19; cf. 1 Cor 2:14).

If Jude is not indebted to Paul in particular, it is more likely that he is indebted to early Christian tradition in general. This is the case not only with respect to his use of Christian terminology but also catechetical (Jude 20-21) and liturgical* material (Jude 24-25).

2.6. Other. A few suggestions have been made that Jude is dependent upon Greek literature for certain traditions (e.g., Glasson, 62-63; Oleson, Charles 1993, 162-63). The evidence substantiating this indebtedness is weak at best, and the imagery in Jude which is used to support this claim is better explained through links with Jewish apocalyptic literature (Osburn 1992, 302-303).

3. Opponents.

The opponents (see Adversaries) referred to in Jude have often been identified as Gnostics* and considered to be similar to or the same as the opponents in 2 Peter (e.g., Werdermann; Green, 42-46). Older scholars tended to identify the opponents with a specific gnostic group (cf. the list in Bauckham 1988 ANRW, 3809; Osburn 1992, 310), but more recently those holding to a gnostic identity have not made a specific identification, referring instead to some form of incipient Gnosticism (e.g., Sidebottom, 75-76; Kelly, 231; Fuchs and Reymond, 143). It is increasingly recognized that developed, second-century Gnosticism should not be read back into Jude, and the few defined features of Jude's opponents do not point in this direction. Other proposals for identifying Jude's opponents include political agitators in the employ of Rome (Reicke, 191-92), the Essenes (Daniel), deviant Hebraists who have rejected OT ethical codes (Ellis, 235) or "Pauline" antinomians (Sellin; cf. Bauckham 1993, 12). Werdermann argued that Jude probably does not describe a specific heresy. Wisse (142) concludes that Jude is not combating actual opponents at all because the letter is a general "eschatological tract" preparing Christians everywhere for the imminent Parousia. Desjardins, who blends Jude and 2 Peter, suggests that the communities were eschatologically-minded and world-denying, whereas the opponents were becoming less radical because of the delay of the Parousia (see Eschatology). Winter (218-22), who translates Jude 23b as "hating the defiled garment of flesh," proposes that the author is encouraging sexual asceticism.

Many elements of Jude's language about the opponents must be understood as rhetoric rather than as description; nevertheless, certain elements do provide some sense of their character. The internal evidence of Jude itself indicates that the primary characteristic of the opponents is antinomianism; they reject the moral authority of Christ* (Jude 4) and the law* (Jude 8-10). As a consequence, they engage in immoral behavior, particularly sexual* immorality (Jude 6-8, 16, 18, 23). The authority* for these opponents is their own visionary* experiences (Jude 8). Jude's rhetorical statement that they are merely psychikoi (lit. "soulish;" i.e., functioning at a natural, human level) and were "devoid of the Spirit" (Jude 19) is probably countering their claim to prophetic* inspiration. These opponents did not arise within the community but rather entered in from the outside (Jude 4), have been accepted by the community (Jude 12) and were perhaps supported by them as well (Jude 16). The influence they were having on the community (Jude 11-13) and Jude's use of shepherding* imagery ("shepherding themselves," Jude 12) indicate that these opponents functioned as teachers. Their claim to prophetic inspiration supported their teaching role.

In light of these elements, Jude's opponents are most likely itinerant prophets whose charismatic experience led them to reject moral authority and to practice immorality. They also taught others to adopt these views and practices. There is no real indication of cosmic dualism underlying the thought of these false teachers, and so the evidence does not support the claim that these opponents are Gnostics. Other early Christian texts point to itinerant charismatic prophets being a problem for some churches (Mt 7:15; 24:11-12; 2 Pet 2:1; 1 Jn 4:1; 2 Jn 7-11; Did. 11—12; cf. Bauckham 1983, 11-13; Martin, 68-75), and it is against such that Jude is best understood to be writing.

4. Authorship.

Two related questions arise with respect to the authorship of this letter. First, what is the identity of the "Jude" referred to in Jude 1? Second, is the name "Jude" used pseudepigraphally or not?

4.1. The Issue of Jude's Identity. In the NT the name "Jude" refers to at least eight different men (the Greek Ioudas is translated as "Judah," "Judas" or "Jude" depending on the person to whom reference is made). It is a common Jewish name held in honor because of its namesake, Judah, one of the twelve sons of Israel.

It is, of course, theoretically possible that this Jude is an otherwise unknown person and that the James referred to in Jude 1 is also unknown (e.g., Moffatt, 224-26). But it is very unusual to identify oneself as someone's brother, rather than using the name of one's father. As Bauckham (1983, 23) aptly observes, "The only theory which does explain it is that which identifies James as the James whom everyone knew." Equally, the phrase "brother of James" could be a later gloss (e.g., Barns, 393), but without manuscript evidence such a proposal begs the question.

Some older scholars identified the author as one of the twelve apostles, Judas of James (Lk 6:16; Jn 14:22; Acts 1:13; e.g., Calvin, 428), equating Jude the apostle with Jude the brother of Jesus. The weaknesses of this view are that (1) the expression "Judas of James" would naturally be understood as "Judas, son of James" rather than "Judas, brother of James"; (2) Jude does not identify himself as an apostle of Jesus Christ in Jude 1; and (3) the disciple, Judas of James, is better understood to be a different person than Jude, brother of Jesus, because Jesus' brothers were not disciples during his lifetime (see Relatives of Jesus).

A few scholars have identified Jude as the apostle Thomas who was known in the eastern Syriac* tradition as Judas Thomas or Didymus Judas Thomas (Koester, 247; Sidebottom, 69, 79; cf. Gos. Thom. title). The names Thomas and Didymus both mean "twin" in Syriac and Greek respectively, and thus in two works of this tradition the apostle Thomas was equated with the brother of Jesus named Jude, identified as his "twin," and so named Judas Thomas (cf. Thom. Cont. 138:1, 4, 7, 10, 19; Acts Thom. 10, 31, 39; cf. Jn 14:22 $sy^{s.(c)}$). But this equation is probably a later confusion (Klijn 1970; Gunther 1980; Bauckham 1990, 32-36).

Another proposed identification is Judas called Barsabbas, who accompanied Paul, Barnabas and Silas to Antioch with the decision of the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:22, 27, 32; e.g., du Plessis; Ellis, 226-34). In this view the "James"* in Jude 1 is identified with the brother of Jesus, but the term "brother" in Jude 1 is interpreted not as a blood-brother but as a spiritual designation for those who were involved in ministry with the apostles in the Jerusalem* church (cf. Acts 11:1). Acts 15:22 describes Judas called Barsabbas as a leader among the "brothers" (Greek, adelphoi). This identification of Jude is possible, but its weakness is that, if this particular Jude's identity was clarified by also being called Barsabbas, he did not use it in his own letter.

Most scholars identify the author as the brother of Jesus (cf. Mt 13:55 par. Mk 6:3; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.19.1—20.1; e.g., Bauckham 1983, 21-25) on the strength of the author's self-designation, "brother of James" (Jude 1). This Jude was not a disciple during Jesus' lifetime (Jn 7:5; cf. Mk 3:20-21), but, like his brother, James, he became a member of the early Christian movement after the resurrection of Jesus. The strength of this view is that it explains the evidence in Jude's letter in the simplest way. Its chief weakness is that Jude could have clarified who he was by identifying himself as "brother of Jesus Christ." It should be noted, however, that whereas the early church used the term "brother(s) of Jesus" (e.g., Mk 3:31; Acts 1:14; 1 Cor 9:5; Gal 1:19; Gos. Thom. 99; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 2.23.4; 3.19.1—3.20.1), it would appear that this expression was not used as a self-designation by these men (cf. Jas 1:1).

Of all these alternatives, the last two are the most plausible, with the identification of Jude as the brother of Jesus the more probable of the two.

4.2. The Issue of Pseudepigraphy. Ascertaining the probable identity of Jude does not address the second issue: whether or not this letter is pseudepigraphic.* Scholars are divided on this point, with an increasing number in recent years proposing that the letter is pseudepigraphic (cf. list in Bauckham 1990, 174 n. 261). There are two main arguments for the pseudepigraphic character of Jude's letter. First, the letter should be dated quite late (after the death of Jude, about which nothing is known) because

(1) Jude 17 is interpreted to refer to the apostolic age as being in the past, and (2) the letter is characterized by early catholicism opposing Gnosticism (e.g., Kelly, 233-34). But a careful reading of Jude 17 indicates that it is referring rather to the readers having heard the prediction by the apostles, probably at the time when this church was first established by these apostolic missionaries. In other words, Jude is bringing his readers back to their first instructions in the faith (cf. Jude 3, 5; with respect to Jude's letter not being characterized by early catholicism and the opponents not being Gnostics, see 2 above).

The second main argument for the pseudepigraphic character of Jude is the quality of the letter's use of language. It can be claimed that the letter's Greek is too good to have been written by a Palestinian Jewish peasant like Jude (e.g., Kelly, 233). But a couple of points call this argument into question: (1) While the letter is marked by a rich and varied vocabulary and it has quite clearly been carefully composed, the grammar itself is relatively unsophisticated. And much of this vocabulary echoes Jewish sources, so the language itself does not necessarily need to be entirely natural for this author. (2) In light of the increasing recognition of the bilingual character of Galilee,* and that, if written by Jude, it was written after many years experience in missionary activity, it is quite possible for someone like Jude to have used Greek competently (e.g., Bauckham 1983, 6-7, 14-16; Green, 48-52).

One objection to using Jude as a pseudonym is that he was too obscure a person for his name to be used in this way (e.g., Cranfield, 147-48; Green, 51-52). It may be noted, however, that, while Jude may be obscure to us, as one of "the brothers of the Lord" he would probably have been well known among Jewish Christians of the first century—the environment in which this letter arose (Cantinat, 286-87; Rowston 1975, 559-60). On the other hand, the fact that the letter uses the self-description "servant* of Jesus Christ" rather than "brother of Jesus Christ"—the description by which Jude would have been known in that environment—militates against the pseudepigraphic designation (Bauckham 1990, 176).

The evidence for the hypothesis of pseudepigraphy does not bear the weight placed upon it. The character and language of the letter is best explained as having come from the pen of Jude.

5. Date.

Scholarly opinion for the date of Jude varies widely, from the 50s and 60s (e.g., Ellis, 232-35; Bauckham 1983, 13; Green, 56), to the latter part of the first century (e.g., Schelkle 1980, 138; Fuchs and Reymond, 152); through the early second century (e.g., Leaney, 82; Sidebottom, 77) and even into the latter part of that century (e.g., Barns, 391-93; for a complete survey of dates, see Bauckham 1990, 168-69 n. 237; Fuchs and Reymond, 151 n. 1). The question of date is tied to a number of issues already discussed. If the letter is read as an early-catholic, post-apostolic document, then the later dates are more appropriate. But if, as discussed above, the letter is rather to be characterized by Jewish-Christian apocalypticism, then the door is open to considering an earlier date (though this characterization would not require an earlier date). The type of opponents (see 4 above) are not dissimilar to some that Paul faced in Corinth during the 50s.

If the letter is pseudepigraphic, then a later date is more appropriate; but if, as argued above, the letter was written by Jude, the brother of Jesus, then Jude's death provides a terminus ad quem. Unfortunately nothing is known about Jude's death, though Eusebius cites Hegesippus referring to grandsons of Jude who lived during the reign of Emperor Domitian (A.D. 81—96; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.19.1—3.20.7). The citation begins, "Now there still survived of the family of the Lord grandsons of Judas, who was said to have been his brother according to the flesh" (Hist. Eccl. 3.20.1), which may imply that Jude himself was dead at this time. Since Jude was probably one of the youngest of the brothers (falling near the bottom of the list of names (Mk 6:3 par. Mt 13:55), he could have lived well into Domitian's reign, and an estimate of some date shortly before 90 for his death is reasonable (Mayor 1978 [1907], cxlviii). Paul alludes to the brothers of the Lord engaged in missionary* activity (1 Cor 9:5). If this includes Jude and is current with Paul's writing 1 Corinthians, then it would place Jude as engaged in ministry during the 50s. The tone of Jude's letter and Jude 3 in particular indicates that Jude is actively engaged in ministry, and this suggests a date earlier in his life rather than at its end.

If, as discussed above, Jude 17-18 does not support a post-apostolic date but is instead an allusion to the readers' initial reception of the gospel and the establishment of their church, then these verses imply that the readers are still the first-generation Christians who were part of the church's founding.

This meager evidence suggests a date for Jude's letter between the 50s and the 80s, with the earlier half of this spectrum being more probable.

6. Recipients/Destination.

Little real evidence exists to address the questions of the recipients and destination of this letter. Given the pervasive use of Jewish traditions it is plausible to suggest the readers are Jewish Christians* and Jude expects his readers to appreciate his allusions. But this evidence tells us more about the author than the recipients. On the other hand, problems with antinomianism as evidenced in this letter were more common among Gentiles* than Jews (but not unknown among Jews; cf. Bauckham 1983, 16). Yet this tells us more about the opponents who have come from outside than the recipients themselves. Given Jude's knowledge of his readers (Jude 3) it would appear that he is personally acquainted with them and pastorally concerned for them. If they are within the sphere of his pastoral ministry, then the weight of probability is that they are predominantly Jewish Christians, but their problems arose because the context in which they lived may have been dominated by Hellenistic values.

Destinations proposed for this letter include Palestine (e.g., Kelly, 234), Syria (e.g., Koester, 2.247), Egypt (e.g., Gunther 1984) or simply unknown (e.g., Fuchs and Reymond, 144). All destinations could meet the suggestion made above that the readers were Jewish Christians living in a Hellenistic environment. One indirect piece of evidence is that Jude was accepted as canonical in Alexandria* by the time of Clement,* but the Syriac* church did not accept it as canonical until the sixth century (Bauckham 1983, 16-17; See Canon).

7. Message.

In light of the preceding discussion (especially on literary structure and form), the message of the letter may now be more fully understood (cf. Martin, 81-86).

Jude writes to address a specific situation facing his readers. He encourages them "to fight for the faith" (Jude 3) because false teachers "have infiltrated" them with a message and lifestyle, the implications of which Jude understands to be a perversion of God's grace and a denial of Christ's lordship (Jude 4). Jude's opponents, the false teachers, would not, of course, state matters in such blatant anti-Christian terms (if they had, they would probably not have been able to infiltrate this Christian community successfully). So before Jude can instruct them how to fight for the faith, he must convince his readers of the dangers of the opponents' teaching and lifestyle and of the certain divine judgment* awaiting them (Webb 1996).

Jude accomplishes this latter task by means of four sets of examples or texts which he applies to his opponents. Each of these sets have some point of commonality between them and the false teachers. Consequently, Jude can then point to the theme of judgment found in all four sets and conclude that divine judgment is the fate awaiting "these" (Greek, houtoi, Jude 7, 8, 10, 12, 14, 16, 19) false teachers. The first two sets are collections of examples from the past—OT narratives which were expanded in later Jewish traditions (see 3.2 above). In the first set the sins by and judgment of Israel in the wilderness, the disenfranchised angels,* and Sodom and Gomorrah (Jude 5-7) are then applied to Jude's opponents (Jude 8-10). Similarly in the second set the examples of Cain, Balaam, and Korah (Jude 11) are applied to the false teachers (Jude 12-14). The third and fourth sets are quotations from authoritative sources which are applied in similar fashion as the first two sets. In the third set a prophecy of divine judgment from 1 Enoch 1:9 is quoted (Jude 14-15) and then applied (Jude 16), and in the fourth set a quotation from early Christian apostolic tradition is cited (Jude 17-18) and applied (Jude 19).

Having denounced the errors of the false teachers and announced their certain judgment, Jude returns to the purpose at hand in Jude 20-23, namely to instruct the readers how "to fight for the faith" (Jude 3). Their first concern must be to guard their own relationship with God (Jude 21; the verb "keep," tēreō, in Jude 21 is also used in Jude 1, 6 [2x], 13), which entails fulfilling certain responsibilities (Jude 20) as well as maintaining an eschatologically oriented outlook (Jude 21). Their second concern is to assist those who have become tainted with this false teaching (Jude 22-23), while being careful not to be tainted with it themselves (Jude 23).

Jude's pastoral concern does not end with his advice in Jude 20-23 but concludes instead with a doxology (Jude 24-25) in which he returns to themes he alluded to in the letter's opening (Jude 1-2). As an expression of prayerful confidence, the doxology reassures the readers that God is able to preserve them not only through this situation but unto the Parousia, at which time they will be able to stand and rejoice in God's* presence.

See also ADVERSARIES; APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; EARLY CATHOLICISM; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; NONCANONICAL WRITINGS, CITATIONS OF; 2 PETER; RELATIVES OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco: Word, 1983); C. Bigg, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude (ICC 41; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1901); J. Calvin, Commentaries on the Catholic Epistles (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979 [1551]); J. Cantinat, Les épîtres de Saint Jacques et de Saint Jude (SB; Paris: Gabalda, 1973); J. Chaine, Les épîtres catholiques: La seconde épître de saint Pierre, les épîtres de saint Jean, l'épître de saint Jude (2d ed.; EB; Paris: Gabalda, 1939); C. E. B. Cranfield, I & II Peter and Jude (TBC; London: SCM, 1960); E. Fuchs and P. Reymond, La deuxième épître de saint Pierre: L'épître de saint Jude (2d ed.; CNT 13b; Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1988); M. Green, The Second Epistle General of Peter and the General Epistle of Jude (2d ed.; TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); D. E. Hiebert, Second Peter and Jude: An Expositional Commentary (Greenville, SC: Unusual Publications, 1989); N. Hillyer, 1 and 2 Peter, Jude (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1992); J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and of Jude (BNTC; London: A. & C. Black, 1969); S. J. Kistemaker, Exposition of the Epistles of Peter and of the Epistle of Jude (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987); A. R. C. Leaney, The Letters of Peter and Jude (CBC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967); R. Leconte, Les épîtres catholiques (2d ed.; SBJ; Paris: Cerf, 1961); R. C. H. Lenski, The Interpretation of 1 and 2 Epistles of Peter, the Three Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1966); M. Luther, "Sermons on the Epistle of St. Jude" in The Catholic Epistles, ed. J. Pelikan and W. A. Hansen (LW 30; St Louis: Concordia, 1967 [1523]) 203-15; J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter (Minneapolis: Klock & Klock, 1978 [1907]); J. Moffatt, The General Epistles: James, Peter, and Judas (MNTC; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1928); J. H. Neyrey, 2 Peter, Jude (AB; New York: Doubleday, 1993); H. Paulsen, Der Zweite Petrusbrief und der Judasbrief (MeyerK 12.2; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992); P. Perkins, First and Second Peter, James, and Jude. Interpretation (Louisville: John Knox, 1995); B. Reicke, The Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964); K. H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe, Der Judasbrief (5th ed.; HTKNT 13.2; Freiburg: Herder, 1980); E. M. Sidebottom, James, Jude, 2 Peter (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1967); H. Windisch, Die katholischen Briefe (3d ed. rev. H. Preisker; HNT 15; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1951). Studies: T. Barns, "The Epistle of Jude: A Study in the Marcosian Heresy," JTS 6 (1905) 391-411; R. J. Bauckham, "James, 1 and 2 Peter, Jude" in It is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture: Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, SSF, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 303-13; idem, "The Letter of Jude: An Account of Research," ANRW 2.25.5 (1988) 3791-826; idem, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990); idem, "Jude, Epistle of," ABD (1992) 3:1098-103; M. Black, "The Maranatha Invocation and Jude 14, 15 (1 Enoch 1:9)" in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973) 189-96; J. D. Charles, " 'Those' and 'These': The Use of the Old Testament in the Epistle of Jude," JSNT 38 (1990) 109-24; idem, "Jude's Use of Pseudepigraphical Source Material as Part of a Literary Strategy," NTS 37 (1991) 130-45; idem, "Literary Artifice in the Epistle of Jude," ZNW 82 (1991) 106-24; idem, Literary Strategy in the Epistle of Jude (London/Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1993); E. Cothenet, "La tradition selon Jude et 2 Pierre," NTS 35 (1989) 407-20; C. Daniel, "La mention des Esséniens dans la texte grec de l'Épître de S. Jude," Mus 81 (1968) 503-21; M. Desjardins, "The Portrayal of the Dissidents in 2 Peter and Jude: Does It Tell Us More about the 'Godly' than the 'Ungodly'?," JSNT 30 (1987) 89-102; O.

J. du Plessis, "The Authorship of the Epistle of Jude" in Biblical Essays 1966: Proceedings of the Ninth Meeting of 'Die Ou-Testamentiese Werkgemeenskap in Suid-Afrika,' and Proceedings of the Second Meeting of 'Die NuweTestamentiese Werkgemeenskam van Suid-Afrika' (Potchefstroom, S. Africa: Potchefstroom Herald (Edms.) Beperk, 1966) 191-99; E. E. Ellis, "Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Jude" in Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 220-36; T. Fornberg, An Early Church in a Pluralistic Society: A Study of 2 Peter (ConB 9; Lund: Gleerup, 1977); J. Fossum, "Kyrios Jesus as the Angel of the Lord in Jude 5-7," NTS 33 (1987) 226-43; R. H. Fuller, A Critical Introduction to the New Testament (2d ed.; London: Duckworth, 1971); T. F. Glasson, Greek Influence in Jewish Eschatology (London: SPCK, 1961); J. J. Gunther, "The Meaning and Origin of the Name 'Judas Thomas,' " Mus 93 (1980) 113-48; idem, "The Alexandrian Epistle of Jude," NTS 30 (1984) 549-62; H. Harm, "Logic Line in Jude: The Search for Syllogisms in a Hortatory Text," OPTAT 3-4 (1987) 147-72; R. Heiligenthal, "Der Judasbrief: Aspekte der Forschung in den letzten Jahrzenten," TRu 51 (1986) 117-29; S. J. Joubert, "Language, Ideology and the Social Context of the Letter of Jude," Neot 24 (1990) 335-49; J. Kahmann, "The Second Letter of Peter and the Letter of Jude: Their Mutual Relationship" in The New Testament in Early Christianity: La réception des écrits néotestamentaires dans le christianisme primitif, ed. J.-M. Sevrin (BETL 86; Louvain: Leuven University Press, 1989) 105-21; G. A. Kennedy, New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984); A. F. J. Klijn, "John xiv 22 and the Name Judas Thomas" in Studies in John: Presented to Professor Dr. J. N. Sevenster on the Occasion of His Seventieth Birthday (NovTSup 24; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970) 88-96; idem, "Jude 5 to 7" in The New Testament Age: Essays in Honor of Bo Reicke, ed. W. C. Weinrich (Macon: Mercer University Press, 1984) 1.237-44; H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament, 2: History and Literature of Early Christianity (FF; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); M. A. Kruger, "ΤΟΥΤΟΙΣ in Jude 7," Neot 27 (1993) 119-32; S. Kubo, "Jude 22-3: Two-Division Form or Three?" in New Testament Textual Criticism: Its Significance for Exegesis: Essays in Honor of Bruce M. Metzger, ed. E. J. Epp and G. D. Fee (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981) 239-53; J. I. H. McDonald, Kerygma and Didache: The Articulation and Structure of the Earliest Christian Message (SNTSMS 37; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980); B. L. Mack, Rhetoric and the New Testament (GBS: NT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); R. P. Martin, "The Theology of Jude, 1 Peter, and 2 Peter" in The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude, ed. A. Chester and R. P. Martin, (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994) 63-163; J. B. Mayor, "The Epistle of St Jude and the Marcosian Heresy," JTS 6 (1905) 569-77; J. H. Neyrey, "The Form and Background of the Polemic in 2 Peter" (Yale University: unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, 1977); J. P. Oleson, "An Echo of Hesiod's Theogony vv. 190-2 in Jude 13," NTS 25 (1978-79) 492-503; C. D. Osburn, "The Christological Use of 1 Enoch 1:9 in Jude 14, 15," NTS 23 (1977) 334-41; idem, "Discourse Analysis and Jewish Apocalyptic in the Epistle of Jude" in Linguistics and New Testament Interpretation: Essays on Discourse Analysis, ed. D. A. Black, K. Barnwell and S. Levinsohn (Nashville: Broadman, 1992) 287-319; B. A. Pearson, "James, 1-2 Peter, Jude" in The New Testament and its Modern Interpreters, ed. E. Epp and G. MacRae (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1989) 371-406; J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); D. J. Rowston, "The Setting of the Letter of Jude," (Southern Baptist Theological Seminary: unpublished Ph.D dissertation, 1971); idem, "The Most Neglected Book in the New Testament," NTS 21 (1975) 554-63; K. H. Schelkle, "Der Judasbrief bie den Kirchenvätern" in Abraham unser Vater; Juden und Christen im Gespräch über die Bibel: Festschrift für O. Michel, ed. O. Betz, M. Hengel, and P. Schmidt (AGJU 5; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963) 405-16; idem, "Spätapostolische Briefe als frühkatholisches Zeugnis" in Neutestamentliche Aufstäze: Festschrift für Josef Schmid zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. J. Blinzler, O. Kuss and F. Muner (Regensburg: Pustet, 1963) 225-32; G. Sellin, "Die Häretiker des Judasbriefes," ZNW 77 (1986) 206-25; M. L. Soards, "1 Peter, 2 Peter, and Jude as Evidence for a Petrine School," ANRW 2.25.5 (1988) 3827-49; D. F. Watson, Invention, Arrangement, and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS 104; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); R. L. Webb, "Epistles, Catholic," ABD (1992) 2:569-70; idem, "The Eschatology of the Epistle of Jude and its Rhetorical and Social Functions," BBR 6 (1996) 139-51; H. Werdermann, Die Irrle- hrer des Judas- und 2. Petrusbriefes (BFCT 17.6; Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1913); J. L. White, The Form and Function of the Body of the Greek Letter: A Study of the Letter-Body in the Non-Literary Papyri and in Paul the Apostle (SBLDS 2; Missoula: Scholars Press, 1972); S. C. Winter, "Jude 22-23: A Note on the Text and Translation," HTR 87 (1994) 215-22; F. Wisse, "The Epistle of Jude in the History of Heresiology" in Essays on the Nag Hammadi Texts in Honour of Alexander Böhlig, ed. M. Krause (NHS 3; Leiden: Brill, 1972) 133-43; T. R. Wolthuis, "Jude and Jewish Traditions," CTJ 22 (1987) 21-41. R. L. Webb

JUDGMENT

The NT expectation of a final judgment is derived from biblical tradition and therefore is based on God's right as Creator to execute justice in the earth. The "day of the Lord," in which righteous judgment will take place, is not a matter of calculation but of patient hope, faith and obedience. The coming day of judgment is integral to the gospel, and to the comfort, warning and call to perseverance which proceeds from it. Christ himself shall judge each one according to his or her deeds. The eternal destiny of each person shall be determined in this judgment.

1. The Background of the New Testament Understanding
2. The Day of Judgment in Acts, the Non-Pauline Letters and Revelation
3. The Context and Function of the Theme of Judgment in the Earliest Church
4. The Early Christian Conception of Judgment

1. The Background of the New Testament Understanding.

Early Christian belief in a final divine judgment represents a development of biblical faith* in the one God* of Israel,* the judge and ruler of all the earth (e.g., Gen 18:25). The Psalms celebrate Yahweh as the righteous king who punishes the wicked and intervenes on behalf of the downtrodden (e.g., Ps 72:1-4). He has the sovereign right to determine justice and execute judgment (e.g., Ps 96—99). The prophets announce that divine visitation will bring punishment not only to the nations that oppose God but first and foremost to the disobedient within Israel (e.g., Is 1:1-31). The covenant renders Israel, the object of divine favor, more and not less liable to judgment (e.g., Amos 3:2). Wisdom literature anticipates that deeds, whether good or evil, will receive recompense (Prov, passim). Ultimately the hope grew for a revelation of divine glory* at the end of human history, including a judgment at which all human beings would be brought to account (e.g., Dan 12:2-3; 1 Enoch 1:1-9; 4 Ezra 7:70-74).

This understanding of final judgment characterized the message of Jesus. The Gospels record numerous instances in which Jesus warned of future punishment and—subject to the paradox of grace*—promised reward* for the faithful (e.g., Mt 19:27—20:16). His proclamation of coming judgment represented not a new teaching but a reassertion of the biblical tradition. Before him, John the Baptist had announced that the impending wrath* of God demanded repentance* from all and insisted, like the classical prophets, that membership in the covenant nation was insufficient for deliverance from judgment (Mt 3:7-10). In continuity with John, Jesus issued a call to repentance* in anticipation of the coming judgment with his announcement of the kingdom (Mk 1:15; 9:42-48; Mt 11:20-24; see DJG, Kingdom of God).

The authors of the NT writings and other early Christian literature likewise shared the conviction of many of their Jewish contemporaries that a final divine judgment was coming upon the world. Continuity with the biblical tradition, in which God the Creator and his claim upon his creatures is central, sets the NT understanding of final judgment apart from Egyptian and Greco-Roman conceptions of the afterlife (see in this regard m. 'Abot 4:22). Particularly in the latter, the torments of the wicked are of primary interest, a tradition to which Dante's Inferno was an heir. Some early extrabiblical writings from the first through fifth centuries, both Jewish and Christian, show such influence (although they are not simple developments of Greek ideas; see Himmelfarb) and stand at a distance from the NT materials (e.g., Apoc. Zeph., Apoc. Peter, Apoc. Paul; with time attention shifted from future to postmortem punishment [Bauckham]). In contrast even the NT Apocalypse of John (Revelation), which vividly depicts the outpouring of wrath, focuses not on the experience of perdition but on the wickedness of humanity and on the certainty and justice of divine judgment.

2. The Day of Judgment in Acts, the Non-Pauline Letters and Revelation.
In the Hebrew Scriptures the predominant expression for the time at which God visits judgment on the earth is "the day of the Lord."* The NT writers take up this term, give nuance to the basic phrase with varying forms and use it to signify the final judgment at the end of the present age (e.g., "the Day," Heb 10:25; "the day of visitation," 1 Pet 2:12; "the day of the Lord," 2 Pet 3:10; "the day of judgment," 1 Jn 4:17; "the great day," Jude 6; "the great day of wrath," Rev 6:16-17).

There is little basis in the NT for the thesis that a crisis resulted from the so-called delay of the Parousia,* i.e., the supposed disappointment of the first generation of believers who are thought to have believed that Christ's coming (Parousia) would certainly occur within their lifetime (see inter alia Moore). In 2 Peter,* where the delay of the day of the Lord is treated explicitly as a theological problem, the challenge to Christian faith arises not from a failure of Christ* to appear immediately but from a teaching that denied biblical faith more broadly considered (2 Pet 3:1-10). "Scoffers" have used the apparent continuity of the world from the time of the ancestors to advance what seems to have been a monistic, materialist view of the world (see Creation, Cosmology). Such philosophy, the author declares, ignores the biblical witness to creation ex nihilo, the patriarchal deluge and the divine word that has determined a fiery end to the present order (2 Pet 3:5-7).

The tenor of the NT anticipation of the day of the Lord reflects that of numerous passages in the Hebrew Scriptures, particularly the Psalms, in which the faith of the righteous* is proved in their patiently waiting in hope* for God to act on their behalf (e.g., Ps 25; 27; 31; 37—39). The NT writings are distinct in their sense of imminence, but for them the nearness of the Parousia is not subject to calculation. As with their biblical precedents, it is rather a matter of faith and obedience.* Christ has appeared, in whom God's saving purposes have culminated (e.g., Acts 10:43; 1 Pet 1:20). With him the last days have arrived (e.g., Acts 2:17; Heb 1:2; Jas 5:3). Judgment now impends since no saving event will intervene before the end (e.g., Heb 10:26-27; 1 Pet 4:5, 6). The "day" will come unexpectedly upon the unbelieving and disobedient (e.g., 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 3:3; 16:15). Those who belong to Christ are to be prepared by their faith and upright behavior (e.g., Heb 10:35-39; 1 Pet 4:7; 1 Jn 2:28-29).

3. The Context and Function of the Theme of Judgment in the Earliest Church.
The expectation of a final judgment not only motivated the apostolic mission* and witness* of the earliest church but is basic to all instruction, exhortation and comfort in the NT. The NT authors invariably address threats to the life and faith of Christians that bear the potential of bringing condemnation on them. Often such threats prompt the composition and sending of the letters, as is the case with Hebrews,* 2 Peter* and Jude,* 1 John* and Revelation.* It is crucial to remember that the proclamation of the gospel* included a call to repentance coupled with the warning of coming judgment (e.g., Acts 2:38-40; 3:19; 10:42; 11:18; 17:30-31; 26:19-20; cf. Rom 2:4; Rev 9:20-21; 16:9) and that new converts were instructed on the final judgment (Heb 6:1-2; cf. Acts 24:24-25). Frequently the prospect of facing divine judgment is joined to specific admonitions (e.g., Heb 6:10-12; 13:4; Jas 1:12; 2:12-13; 5:9). Christian leaders and teachers are singled out as being especially accountable to God (Heb 13:17; Jas 3:1; cf. 1 Pet 5:1-4). Strikingly, three NT letters conclude with encouragement to restore the disobedient in view of their perilous state (Jas 5:19-20; 1 Jn 5:14-17; Jude 22-23; see also 1 Pet 4:8).

It is equally clear, however, that the expectation of a final judgment alone does not adequately describe the NT writings. They bear as their central message the conviction that God through Christ has provided forgiveness* and salvation* at the final judgment (e.g., Acts 20:32; Heb 7:23-28; Jas 1:18; 1 Jn 4:17-21). Between these two beliefs there exists an inescapable tension (see 4 below). Here it is important to note that the NT writers regarded the judgment to come not merely as a basis for warning but as an offer of hope, comfort and encouragement. The author of Hebrews, for example, reminds his readers that God is not unjust. He will not forget the labor and love* of believers (Heb 6:10). James* assures his audience that those who endure trial will receive the crown of life that God has promised to those who love him (Jas 1:12; cf. Rev 2:10). The hope of divine deliverance underlies the Apocalypse of John (e.g., Rev 6:9-11; 7:13-17; 11:16-19; 19:1-4).

Of fundamental significance for Christian theology and ethics* is the broadly attested stance of the NT writers that judgment and retribution belong to God alone and that believers consequently are not to take vengeance themselves or to condemn one another (Mt 7:1; Rom 12:19-21; 14:10-12; Jas 2:4, 12-13; 5:9; cf. 1 Cor 5:1-13: church discipline* is not thereby excluded). To assume such authority* is to trespass upon the divine role itself, an act of hubris that even the angels* of God do not dare (Jas 4:11-12; 2 Pet 2:11; Jude 9). Following the pattern of Christ, Christians are to entrust their rights to "the one who judges righteously" (1 Pet 2:21-23, 4:19; Jas 5:7-11; Rev 6:9-11).

4. The Early Christian Conception of Judgment. A prominent and distinctive aspect of NT and early Christian teaching is the prospect that Christ himself will judge all humanity at his Parousia.* The formulaic description of Christ as the "one who is to judge the living and the dead" provides an indication of the centrality of this belief to early Christian thought (Acts 10:42; 2 Tim 4:1; 1 Pet 4:5; Barn. 7.2; Pol. Phil. 2.1). Judgment hinges upon one's response to Jesus (Acts 13:40-41; 13:46; 18:6). Disobedience to the word that God has spoken in his Son brings a more severe punishment than rejection of Moses* (Heb 4:12-13; 6:7-8; 10:26-31; 12:25). The book of Revelation stresses that it is supremely right that Jesus, who suffered innocently and thereby secured salvation, should be the agent of divine judgment (e.g., Rev 1:4-7; 5:9-10). Jesus' resurrection* and ascension* signify God's vindication of his messianic claims and place him in a role that otherwise was reserved for God alone (Acts 10:42; 17:30-31; see the christologically significant 2 Clem. 1.1). To some extent parallels may be found within some circles of early Judaism* in which the Messiah was expected to act as judge, yet in these instances no historical figure is in view (1 Enoch 62:1-16; 4 Ezra 13:1-58).

No less prominent is the theme of individual judgment according to works* (Heb 9:27-28; Rev 1:7; 2:7; 2:23). Each one will be called to give an account for his or her deeds (Heb 4:13; 13:17; 1 Pet 4:5-6). The NT authors are careful to apply the prospect of judgment to Christians themselves. As the judge of all, God will render his verdict impartially. Believers, although they name God as "Father," must not presume upon grace (1 Pet 1:17-19; Heb 10:30; cf. Jas 2:9). Frequently the authors bring reminders that punishment will be meted out to those who practice immorality, greed and similar vices (Heb 13:4; see Purity).

NT exhortations are frequently based upon final recompense for obedience and hardly make sense apart from this prospect. Moreover, the NT writers regularly depict final punishment as corresponding to deeds done in this life, underscoring the manifest justice of the final divine verdict (lex talionis, Jas 2:13; 5:1-3; Jude 6; cf. Rev 2:10; 3:10). Measure-for-measure retribution is not unique to the biblical writings and appears with particular prominence in early Jewish and Christian "tours of hell." Yet since the biblical materials lack detailed descriptions of torment, they give greater prominence to the divine verdict, implicitly emphasizing the justice of God. The "tours of hell" instead portray a correspondence between deeds and gruesome destinies, suggesting an inherent connection between deed and outcome (cf. Himmelfarb).

The NT describes reward* as intrinsically related to God and Christ, the object of hope and trust. Those who love Christ and consequently serve him now will be rewarded by seeing him in his glory. Moreover, such reward always paradoxically issues in glory to Christ, who has worked the believer's salvation. Nevertheless the NT writers do not regard retribution as mere divine confirmation of human decision. Punishment and reward are actively imposed by God from without upon the human being (contra Travis; see, e.g., Heb 10:26-31; Jas 5:1; 2 Pet 2:6).

If the cross* has worked a right standing with God for the believer, how is it that the believer must yet face judgment? Between this prospect and the proclamation of forgiveness in Christ stands an irreducible paradox. Yet to a certain extent lines of convergence can be traced. In the first place, as we have noted, the NT writers anticipate that Christ himself will judge humanity. Faith in him is a moral act, the fundamental obedience that God requires of human beings (e.g., Heb 3:12-19; 1 Pet 1:3-9; 1 Jn 2:22-25). Furthermore, the NT writings display a deep confidence in the power of God to effect salvation for those who have received the forgiveness offered in Christ (e.g., Acts 20:32; Jas 1:9; 2 Pet 2:9; Jude 24). That is not to say that all uncertainty is removed from the visible community of Christians; otherwise the warnings of judgment would hardly make sense. The church on earth yet remains under testing. Nevertheless, where saving realities are present they manifest themselves in persevering faith and obedience, which secure the believer in the final judgment (e.g., Heb 10:39; 1 Jn 2:29-3:3; Rev 1:9).

Paul's understanding of the gospel therefore does not stand at odds with the rest of the NT. While there are distinctions which cannot be ignored, there is no final contradiction between Paul and James. James speaks of a final justification by faith with works (not by faith and works; Jas 2:22-24) and therefore thinks of works which proceed from faith. When Paul affirms that a person is justified by faith and not by "works of the law," he rejects the saving value of deeds of obedience apart from faith, which are always incomplete and proceed from the self-seeking heart of the fallen human being. Any claim to righteousness is thereby ruled out, and the whole of justification is located in the atoning work of the cross, which is grasped by faith alone. Paul thereby in no way diminishes James's demand for deeds of obedience. In fact he too expects a judgment according to deeds (2 Cor 5:10). James speaks of the justification at the final judgment (Jas 2:14-26), while Paul speaks of a final justification worked already by the cross (e.g., Rom 3:21-26). The two loci stand in tension but not in contradiction. There is evidence in James's letter that he would embrace Paul's interpretation of the cross. He views the gospel as the source of life, one the basis of unconditioned divine mercy (Jas 1:18; 2:12-13). Both Paul and James share the expectation that acceptance of the gospel will issue in new obedience (Jas 1:21, "the word [i.e., gospel] implanted, which has the power to save"; Rom 6:19).

An immediate postmortem judgment, which is implicit in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31; but cf. Acts 10:42), is likewise suggested in a few NT passages such as the vision* of the righteous martyrs (Rev 6:9-11; cf. Jas 3:6) and occasionally in both Jewish and Christian sources (e.g., 4 Ezra 7:78-80; cf. 7:104-5; 1 Clem. 20.5; 2 Clem. 19.4). This expectation does not eliminate the judgment of the last day, upon which the focus is set.

Understandably, judgment imagery similar to some of that employed in the NT may be found in the Greco-Roman world, including Egypt. Sometimes borrowing is evident (e.g., the imprisonment of angels in Tartarus, 2 Pet 2:4), but similarities do not necessarily constitute parallels or influence (contra Griffiths). The NT writers generally appeal more directly to biblical tradition, as do early Jewish writings. Probably the image of the opening of books in which deeds have been recorded derives from Daniel (Dan 7:10; e.g., Rev 20:12; Jub. 30:22; 1 Enoch 98:8; 2 Bar 24:1; m. 'Abot 2.1). The juxtaposed "book (of life)," which paradoxically contains the names of the elect,* appears here as well (Dan 12:1; cf. Ps 69:28; Phil 4:3; Rev 3:5; 20:12; 20:15; cf. Jub. 30:23). Divine judgments in the past serve as patterns for what is yet to come, especially the deliverance of the righteous and the destruction of the wicked. The salvation of Noah through the flood prefigured baptism,* by which believers lay claim to forgiveness (cf., 1 Enoch 54). Here baptism itself entails a self-judgment in anticipation of the eschaton* (1 Pet 3:20-22; cf. 2 Pet 2:5; Heb 11:7). The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire serves as an example of what is coming on the ungodly (2 Pet 2:6; Jude 7; cf. Lk 17:29; Rev 14:9-11), just as the divine rescue of Lot prefigures the rescue of the righteous (2 Pet 2:7; cf. Lk 17:28-32).

In some passages of the NT the punishment of unbelievers is described as enduring eternally. There has been some recent debate over this matter, naturally involving the interpretation of various occurrences of the Greek word aiōn, which may signify "eon" or "forever," and the corresponding adjective, aiōnios. Nevertheless, it is sufficiently clear that the adjective is regularly used in the sense of everlasting (see Sasse; Heb 5:9; 6:2; 9:12; 9:14; 9:15; 13:20; 2 Pet 1:11). Various references in which the noun is employed envision an everlasting punishment (Rev 14:9-12; 19:1-3; 20:10-15). Moreover, the anticipation of everlasting punishment is attested outside the NT (e.g., 1 Enoch 91:12-16; Pss. Sol. 3:11-12). Explicit teaching of eternal punishment appears only occasionally in the NT, probably because it was an uncontested part of elementary Christian instruction (Heb 6:1-2). There is no indication that the NT writers derived the belief that punishment would be eternal from the presupposition that the soul is naturally immortal. They rather regard it as an expression of the justice of God (e.g., Rev 19:1-4).

See also APOCALYPTIC; DAY OF THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY; HELL, ABYSS, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; REWARDS; UNIVERSALISM; WRATH, DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, "Early Jewish Visions of Hell," JTS 41 (1990) 355-85; A. E. Bernstein, The Formation of Hell: Death and Retribution in the Ancient and Early Christian Worlds (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993); S. G. F. Brandon, The Judgment of the Dead: An Historical and Comparative Study of the Idea of Post-Mortem Judgment in the Major Religions (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1967); D. Cohn-Sherbok, "Rabbinic Judaism and the Doctrine of Hell" in Rabbinic Perspectives on the New Testament (SBEC 28; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1990) 1-18; J. G. Griffiths, The Divine Verdict: A Study of Divine Judgment in the Ancient Religions (Studies in the History of Religions 52; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1991); M. Himmelfarb, Tours of Hell: An Apocalyptic Form in Jewish and Christian Literature (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1983); A. L. Moore, The Parousia in the New Testament (NovTSupp 13; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1966); L. Morris, The Biblical Doctrine of Judgment (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960); C. F. D. Moule, "The Judgment Theme in the Sacraments" in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956) 464-81; idem, "Punishment and Retribution" in Essays in New Testament Interpretation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982) 235-49; H. Sasse, "αἰών, αἰώνιος," TDNT 1:197-209; P. Toon, Heaven and Hell: A Biblical and Theological Overview (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1986); S. H. Travis, Christ and the Judgment of God: Divine Retribution in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1987); G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Black, "The Last Judgment" in The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.—A.D. 135) (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1979) 2:544-47. M. A. Seifrid

JUSTIFICATION. See RIGHTEOUSNESS.

K

KERYGMA AND DIDACHE

The nature of the early Christian preaching of the gospel has been a central issue in mid-twentieth-century NT scholarship. In particular debate has focused on the question and content of the kerygma. Related to the Greek verb kēryssō, which means "to herald," "kerygma" refers to either the matter that is heralded or the act of heralding itself. The gospel about Christ stood at the center of the preaching, but the issue turns on the main emphasis that was given to the theme. The verbal usages generally always have an object, a content for the preaching, whether it is Christ Jesus (2 Cor 1:19; 4:5) or the "crucified Christ" (1 Cor 1:23), the "Word" (2 Tim. 4:2) or the "word of faith" (Rom 10:8), the Messiah (Acts 8:5) or "Jesus as Son of God" (Acts 9:20), or "the kingdom of God" (Acts 20:25; 28:31).

Sometimes the content of the preaching is something other than the gospel about Christ. It can be John the Baptist's message of repentance (Acts 10:37), the law* of Moses* (Acts 15:21) or even the judaizing message that circumcision* is necessary for salvation (Gal 5:11). Of fundamental importance has been the question whether there ever existed a type of preaching that had no passion story, as in the so-called Q tradition, a corpus of Jesus' teaching found in Luke and Matthew, or whether the apocryphal* and Gnostic* gospels like *The Gospel of Thomas should be appealed to as evidence of Christian communities that cherished the person of Jesus as a sage delivering wise oracles (the logoi sophōn) but with no mission to redeem from sins by his death and resurrection.

1. Early Reconstructions of the Kerygma
2. Multiple Kerygmas
3. The Didactic Element in the Kerygma

1. Early Reconstructions of the Kerygma. Historically M. Dibelius believed that most of the gospel tradition was passed on in the preaching of the apostles* as recorded in Acts.* He proposed that the early Christian preaching is found partially preserved in the speeches of Acts and contains three main elements: the basic kerygma of salvation* in Christ,* scriptural proofs and an exhortation to repentance* (Dibelius, 17). C. H. Dodd also maintained that the kerygma had this content. Like Dibelius, he believed that the kerygma, or gospel message of the early church, could be reconstructed from the speeches in Acts. His reconstruction included six main elements (Dodd, 21-23). First, the kerygma proclaimed that the age of fulfillment of the OT prophecies* about the Messiah had come. Second, this was seen to have come through the ministry,* death and resurrection* of Christ (see Death of Christ). Third, as a result of his resurrection, Christ has been exalted* to the right hand of God. Fourth, the presence of the Holy Spirit* in the church* is the guarantee of Christ's living presence. Fifth, the return of Christ will bring the messianic age to its consummation. Sixth, the listeners were exhorted to repent of their sins, be baptized* and enter the community of Christ, receiving the gift of the Spirit.

Dodd insisted that this kerygma of the church was totally distinct from its didache, which was its ethical* teaching and was taught subsequent to the believer's response to the basic kerygmatic or gospel message (Dodd, 7). Further, Dodd argued, the basic points of the kerygma provided the outline for the Gospel of Mark, and this Markan kerygmatic outline was later expanded with didache (Jesus' teachings) by Matthew and Luke.

Initially Dodd's work met with acceptance of his basic thesis of a recoverable early Christian message. Recent investigation into the nature of early Christianity, however, is apt to conclude that patterns of diversity corresponding to geographical location, cultural ethos and theological challenges were in evidence (see Dunn), thus making the idea of a monolithic kerygma less likely (see Worship). Thus Dodd's thesis has been challenged at some points and refined at others. In particular, his kerygmatic outline has been shown to be too rigid (Evans, Nineham) and limited, and his elimination of didache from kerygma has been challenged (Worley).

2. Multiple Kerygmas.

On a broader front Dodd's reconstruction of the kerygma is open to challenge. The speeches in Acts do not support the basic six points of Dodd's outline. His synopsis of the kerygma is assembled only by piecing it together from the various speeches, primarily from three (Peter's speeches in Acts 2; 3; 10). In fact the emphasis on Jesus' ministry is found mainly in Peter's speech at Cornelius's* home (Acts 10:37-39), though there are data in Peter's speech at Pentecost* (Acts 2), and yet this is the main foundation for his argument that the kerygma provided the outline for Mark's Gospel.

Dodd claimed that his reconstructed kerygma was that only of the Jerusalem* church. This was a wise restriction, for the extensive OT proofs found in it would have been more appropriate for the immediate audience. Does Acts depict other kerygmas more pertinent to Gentiles*? The speeches at Lystra (Acts 14:15-17) and on the Areopagus at Athens (Acts 17:22-31) seem to provide a basic kergymatic message for Gentiles, a kerygma that is not based on OT proofs and that begins with a basic monotheistic appeal. Perhaps the best summary of this Gentile kerygma appears in 1 Thessalonians 1:9-10 (see Kemmler, Munck). It consists of four main points, and it is striking to note how closely these correspond with the emphases of the speech on the Areopagus: turning from idols to God (cf. Acts 17:29), serving the one living and true God (cf. Acts 17:23-27), waiting for his Son* from heaven,* whom he raised from the dead (cf. Acts 17:31), and being delivered by Jesus from the wrath* to come (cf. the emphasis on judgment* in Acts 17:31). As with all gospel appeals, there must also have been a call for the Gentiles to repent (as in Acts 17:30).

Noting the problems in Dodd's treatment, a number of scholars have suggested different reconstructions but with no consensus among themselves (e.g., Reicke, 139; Mounce, 77). Perhaps the most promising avenues for future research on the kerygma are the recent attempts to recover the kerygma on the basis of the NT creedal, hymnic and confessional passages (Sloan, 573), with the basic work in E. Stauffer, O. Cullmann and V. H. Neufeld (see Creeds; Hymns). The most significant of these creedal statements is in 1 Corinthians 15:1-8, where Paul rehearses his debt to an earlier credo that he both inherited from his predecessors (in Antioch* or Jerusalem?) and in turn passed on to the Corinthians. All the marks of a confessional formulary are present (e.g., verbs of traditioning, recitative use of "that," an appeal to OT testimonies).

Yet the important items are the way the death of Christ for sins and the resurrection in fulfillment of the divine purpose form a central part of God's Heilsplan for human salvation (1 Cor 15:1, 2). This piece of evidence, obviously pre-Pauline and preformed before its use in Paul's letter points back to the earliest kerygma that centered in the cross* and resurrection. There is no substantial evidence to indicate any Christian community in which these saving events were not central, just as the Lord's Supper* meal (1 Cor 11:17-34) focused on the sacrificial* death of Christ and was integral to Christian community from the beginning.

The witness of early "hymns to Christ" (see Hengel) tells a similar story in the pre-Pauline period and was continued in the later NT books that draw on these liturgical elements (see Liturgical Elements; Worship). The centrality of Christ's cross and victory is seen in documents as diverse as 1 Peter* (1 Pet 2:21-24; 3:18-22), 1 Timothy (1 Tim 3:16) and Revelation (Rev 5:9-14; see Revelation, Book of), with these texts all credibly regarded as hymnic praise formulas in celebration of cosmic redemption in turn centered on the cross and triumph of Christ the Lord* of the universe.

3. The Didactic Element in the Kerygma.

Dodd was wrong in his sharp distinction between kerygma and didache. The lexical evidence of the NT is sufficient witness against such a dichotomy. Regularly the terms teaching and preaching are used together or are regarded as interchangeable (Paul's ministry in Acts is so regarded). Nonetheless, we should mark the distinct emphasis that belongs to each word group, as kerygmatic preaching is aimed at converting outsiders and didactic preaching serves to build up the congregations. The words tend to be used together in the later Christian writings. Hermas, for example, speaks of "teachers of the son of God who preached" (Herm. Sim. 9.16.5).

So it is natural that the kerygmatic terminology is used with a didactic content, as when Paul speaks of the content of his message (1 Cor 15:1-8). The word preaching continued to be used with a didactic application in the later Christian writings. Ignatius,* for example, reminded the Philadelphians of the Spirit's "preaching," which had for its content loving unity and keeping one's body untainted (Ign. Phld. 7.2).

More common, however, is the use of teaching terminology in what is clearly an evangelistic, missionary context, a context in which preaching would be called for. This is the dominant use in Acts, both for the verb didaskō ("to teach") and for the noun didachē ("teaching"). "Teaching" and "evangelizing" are used together (Acts 5:42; 15:35). Teaching in Acts includes an evangelistic endeavor, preaching to non-Christians, whether they are Jews (Acts 4:2, 18; 5:21, 28) or Gentiles (Acts 13:12; 17:19; 18:11).

Early Christian preaching almost certainly contained a didactic element. The exact nature of the teaching emphasis would differ from context to context. For example, among the Jews, teaching from the OT prophecies would be an essential element in the preaching of Christ as Messiah (Lk 24:44-47; Acts 17:2-3, 11-12). For Gentiles, turning from idolatry* and the immorality of pagan lifestyles would be a basic part of the appeal to place one's faith in the only true God.

A major area for contemporary investigation is the study of the various types of early Christian teachings. These have left their mark on the literature in a variety of forms. The Pastoral Letters hold up the "deposit" (parathēkē) as important for the pastor to maintain and teach (1 Tim 4:11-16; 6:20) and cite confessional materials that seem to have a setting in baptismal and/or martyr contexts (2 Tim 2:11-13). There are the more lengthy doctrinal statements seen in Hebrews,* as the readers are encouraged to be teachers (Heb 5:11-14), as a warning against being led astray (Heb 13:9), or the use of catechetical form of elementary Christian instruction known as household codes,* or station codes, represented in the Pastorals and 1 Peter. Sometimes entire letters (e.g., Jude, 2 Clement) or substantial portions of epistolary correspondence are given over to exhortation based on didactic preaching (1 John) and conform to rhetorical* patterns of deliberative persuasion (Hebrews, 2 Peter; see Watson).

The *Didache (or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) gives us some idea of the various categories of teaching in the early church of the late first or early second century. Of its sixteen chapters the first six deal with ethical instruction (paraenesis). Didache 7—15 deal with church practice and consist of teaching in proper practice (catechesis) and tradition (paradosis). Didache 16 deals with eschatology* and belongs to a more prophetic type of teaching. The hymnic and creedal portions of the NT, as we have observed, provide a further area for research into the development of Christian theology from the early didache of the church.

It is highly unlikely that preaching and teaching were ever entirely separated in early Christianity. Kerygma and didache belong together. To set one over against the other would be a loss for the church and an abandonment of the NT pattern (see Glen, Smart).

See also CREDS, CONFESSIONAL FORMS; EVANGELISM IN THE EARLY CHURCH; GOSPEL; NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY; TEACHING, PARAENESIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. Cullmann, "The Tradition" in The Early Church, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1956) 55-99; M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (New York: Scribners, 1965); C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936); J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); C. F. Evans, "The Kerygma," JTS (n.s.) 7 (1956) 25-41; G. Friedrich, "κῆρυξ κτλ," TDNT 3:683-719; T. F. Glasson, "The Kerygma: Is Our Version Correct?" Hibbert Journal 51 (1953) 129-32; J. S. Glen, The Recovery of the Teaching Ministry (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1960); M. Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1995); D. W. Kemmler, Faith and Human Reason: A Study of Paul's Method of Preaching as Illustrated by 1-2 Thessalonians and Acts 17:2-4 (NovTSup 40; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975); J. I. H. McDonald, Kerygma and Didache (SNTSMS 37; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980); R. H. Mounce, The Essential Nature of New Testa- ment Preaching (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960); J. Munck, "1 Thessalonians 1:9-10 and the Missionary Preaching of Paul," NTS 9 (1962-63) 95-110; D. E. Nineham, "Eyewitness Testimony and the Gospel Tradition," JTS (n.s.) 9.1 (1958) 13-25; 9.2 (1958) 243-52; 11.2 (1960) 253-64; B. Reicke, "A Synopsis of Early Christian Preaching" in The Root of the Vine, ed. A. Fridrichsen et al. (London: Dacre, 1953) 128-60; K. H. Rengstorf, "διδάσκω κτλ," TDNT 2:135-65; R. B. Sloan, "Canonical Theology of the New Testament" in Foundations for Biblical Interpretation, ed. D. H. Dockery et al. (Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1994) 565-94; J. D. Smart, The Teaching Ministry of the Church (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1954); K. Stendahl, "Kerygma und Kerygmatisch: Von Zweideutigen Ausdruechen der Predigt der Urkirche—und Unserer," TLZ 12 (1952) 715-20; J. J. Vincent, "Didactic Kerygma in the Synoptic Gospels," SJT 10 (1957) 262-73; D. F. Watson, Invention, Arrangement and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS 104; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); R. C. Worley, Preaching and Teaching in the Earliest Church (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1967).

J. B. Polhill

KINGDOM OF GOD

Most of the writings under discussion show that the kingdom of God continued to be a vital theme in the preaching of the church. They maintain several characteristics of Jesus' conception of the kingdom of God, although sometimes they express them in new ways in adjustment to their new salvation-historical and missionary situations.

1. Acts
2. Hebrews
3. General Epistles
4. Revelation
5. Apostolic Fathers
6. Gospel of Thomas

1. Acts.

1.1. The Kingdom of God as the Central Theme of Acts. In the introduction to the book of Acts,* the second volume of his two-volume work, Luke summarizes the teaching* that the risen Jesus imparted to his apostles* during the forty days before his ascension* as having been about "the kingdom of God" (Acts 1:3). Luke concludes the volume with Paul's preaching* of the "kingdom of God" and "about the Lord Jesus Christ" in the heart of the Roman Empire* (Acts 28:31; see also Acts 28:23). With this inclusio, linking the beginning of the book's message with its ending, Luke appears to indicate that his central theme in the second volume is the kingdom of God in continuation with that in his first volume, the Gospel of Luke. This is confirmed by his summaries of the messages of Philip* and Paul in terms of the kingdom of God in the main body of Acts (Acts 8:12; 19:8; 20:25; see also Acts 14:22; 17:7).

Yet Luke's combination of "the kingdom of God" with "the name of Jesus Christ" and with "the Lord Jesus Christ" as the gospel of Philip (Acts 8:12) and of Paul (Acts 28:23, 31) suggests a shift: in the Gospel of Luke the gospel of Jesus was about "the kingdom of God," but in Acts the gospel of the apostles includes the Lord* Jesus Christ along with the kingdom of God. In his summaries of the apostolic preaching, Luke has as the object of the verb euangelizomai not only the kingdom of God (Acts 8:12) but also the Lord Jesus Christ (Acts 5:42; 8:35; 10:36; 11:20; 17:18; cf. Acts 15:35). Using the verb keryssō to summarize the apostolic preaching, he likewise specifies as the object of the verb Jesus the Christ* or the Son of God (Acts 8:5; 9:20; 19:13; see also Acts 17:3, 7; see Son of God) as well as the kingdom of God (Acts 20:25; 28:31). These phenomena, especially those in the various summaries of Philip's gospel (Acts 8:5, 12, 35), suggest that the preaching of the kingdom of God was in effect the preaching of Christ Jesus. As is well known, Jesus' gospel of the kingdom of God in the Synoptic Gospels is generally replaced with the apostolic gospel of Christ in the rest of the NT, and the preacher Jesus in the former becomes the preached Christ in the latter. In Acts Luke also reflects this general change and in his own way shows how and why this has taken place.

1.2. The Future Kingdom of God. The final coming of the kingdom of God is expected to be an event in the future, but we are not to be anxious to know its "times or dates the Father has set in his authority" (Acts 1:6-7). It will be the "times of refreshing" or the "times of restoration of all things," and it will take place with the second coming of Christ (see Parousia) when all Israel* repent (Acts 3:19-21). So the kingdom of God represents the consummation of salvation,* and we must maintain faith* and bear sufferings* patiently "to enter the kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22).

1.3. The Lord Jesus Christ, the Present Regent and Savior. However, Luke is more concerned with the reign of God* in the present. God's reign takes place in the present through the exalted Christ and the Holy Spirit.* In his earthly existence Jesus was the agent through whom God did miracles, wonders and signs (see Signs and Wonders) or displayed his saving reign (Acts 2:22-23). God has raised this Jesus from the dead and exalted him to his right hand to be his viceroy in fulfillment of the promise of Psalm 110:1 (Acts 2:32-35; 5:31). So "God has made this Jesus . . . both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). In Acts the title Lord (Kyrios) is applied to Jesus as well as to God, with the implication that Jesus Christ now exercises God's lordship on his behalf. This is the reason the apostolic preaching of the kingdom of God regularly involves preaching Jesus' messianic kingship or lordship or occasionally is replaced by the latter.

In the OT it is Yahweh as the Kyrios who forgives the sins of his people and saves them, but now it is Jesus the Kyrios who exercises this divine prerogative. In the OT it was by calling on the name* of Yahweh the Lord that one was saved (e.g., Joel 3:5 cited in Acts 2:21), but now this Lord is none other than Jesus Christ, so it is through the name of "Jesus Christ who is Lord of all" (Acts 10:36), "the judge of the living and the dead" (Acts 10:42), that forgiveness* of sins or salvation is obtained (Acts 10:43; see also Acts 3:16; 4:12, 30; 16:18; 22:16).

The exalted Lord Jesus Christ's exercise of divine kingship or lordship is manifested in his direction of the church's* mission.* As the Son of Man or the Lord standing at the right hand of God, he receives the spirit of his martyr Stephen* (Acts 7:56, 59). He arrests Saul/Paul near Damascus and calls him to be his apostle to the Gentiles* (Acts 9:1-19; 22:3-16; 26:9-18), assures Paul of his protection (Acts 18:9), redirects his mission (Acts 22:17-21) and leads him to Rome* (Acts 23:11). The Lord Jesus Christ opens Lydia's heart to appropriate Paul's gospel (Acts 16:14-15), makes Christian mission in Antioch* successful and leads a great number of people to turn to himself by faith (Acts 11:21). In his exercise of divine lordship, Jesus Christ uses the agency and power of the Holy Spirit and the ministry* of his apostles.

1.4. Through the Agency and Power of the Spirit. God's exaltation of Jesus at his right hand involved not only mandating him with his lordship but also giving him his Holy Spirit and making him the dispenser of the divine Spirit: "Exalted to the right hand of God, [the Lord Jesus Christ] has received from the Father the promised Holy Spirit and has poured [the Spirit] out" (Acts 2:33). So, if through his exaltation God the Father made Jesus his vicegerent to exercise his kingship or lordship on his behalf, at Pentecost* the Lord Jesus Christ poured out the Holy Spirit to be his agent and execute his kingship or lordship on his behalf. While the Lord Jesus Christ remains at the right hand of God in heaven* until his second coming for "the restoration of all things" or the consummation of the kingdom of God (Acts 3:19-21), on earth the Holy Spirit exercises his lordship on his behalf. Thus there is a trinitarian structure in the present manifestation of the kingdom of God: God the Father reigns through his Son* (Acts 9:20) Jesus Christ, who in turn reigns through the Holy Spirit. Hence the direction of the church and the mighty saving acts that are ascribed to the Lord Jesus Christ are also ascribed to the Spirit. They are the Lord Jesus Christ's exercise of God's reign through the agency of the Holy Spirit. Therefore they may be ascribed to the Spirit as well as to the Lord Jesus Christ.

So the Lord Jesus Christ's direction of the church is through the agency and power of the Spirit. Before his ascension he gave instructions to his apostles through the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:2). But after his ascension the apostles received the Holy Spirit given by the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit empowered and directed their mission (Acts 1:5, 8; 2:33). While there are references to the Lord Jesus Christ's directing and empowering the apostles' mission, there are parallel references to the Spirit's directing and empowering the apostles' mission: Acts 8:29; 10:19; 11:12, 28; 13:2, 4; 15:28; 16:6, 7; 19:21; 20:22, 23; 21:4, 11. That the two kinds of statements refer to the same reality is suggested in Acts 16:6-7: the Holy Spirit who directed Paul to leave Asia for Macedonia is explicitly identified as "the Spirit of Jesus." Paul concludes from this experience "that God had called [him] to preach the gospel" to the Macedonians (Acts 16:10). Thus Acts 16:6-10 implies the trinitarian structure of divine lordship exercised in regard to the church's mission.

During his earthly existence Jesus actualized

God's saving reign through his exorcism and healing* ministry that he wrought through the power of the Holy Spirit (Lk 11:20 par. Mt 12:28; Acts 2:22; 10:38). Now, as the exalted Lord, he has poured out the Holy Spirit to his church (Acts 2:33). Those who believe in him and are baptized in his name are given the Spirit (Acts 2:38; 9:17-18; 10:43-44; 11:16-17; 19:5-6; see Baptism) and thus are made to enjoy the blessings* of the eschatological* power of God in the sphere of Jesus Christ's lordship.

Further, the exalted Lord Jesus' dispensing the Holy Spirit to his apostles had the purpose of empowering them (Acts 1:8) to preach the gospel effectively and to perform many exorcisms and healing miracles* as demonstrations of the eschatological salvation. Such "signs and wonders" are often said to have been performed by the apostles "in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 3:6, 16; 4:30; 8:6-12; 16:16-18; cf. Acts 19:13-20) or are attributed directly to God (Acts 15:12; 19:11-12) or to the Lord (Jesus?) (Acts 14:3). However, not only from Acts 1:8 and Acts 2:33 but also from Acts 4:29-31, Acts 6:8 and Acts 8:5-19 the clear implication is that the apostles performed the healing miracles through the power of the Holy Spirit given by the Lord Jesus Christ. So the Holy Spirit is the agent who actualizes the Lord Jesus Christ's saving reign, which is in reality God's saving reign. We are to respond affirmatively to the rhetorical question of J. D. G. Dunn: "If the Kingdom's presence in Jesus was determined by the coming of the Spirit upon Jesus at Jordan, then may we, indeed must we not say that the Kingdom became present in the disciples by the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost in the same way?" (Dunn, 40).

1.5. The Lord Jesus and His Apostles. Along with the Holy Spirit, the church, especially the twelve apostles, is also the agent that actualizes the kingdom of God or Christ in the present, or to be more precise, the church led and empowered by the Holy Spirit fulfills this role. In his Farewell Discourse, the earthly Jesus promised to vest by way of a covenant* (diatithemai) the kingdom to the Twelve,* just as the Father had vested it by way of a covenant (dietheto) to him, so that they might participate in Christ's kingdom and become rulers and judges over Israel (Lk 22:29-30). Through his death, which was the sacrifice* for establishing the new covenant (Lk 22:20), Jesus fulfilled this promise* and created a new people of God with the Twelve as the nucleus, in typological correspondence to Israel with the twelve tribes. Thus by way of a covenant he constituted a new people of God, a new people under God's kingship. Then the risen Christ taught them about the kingdom of God (Acts 1:3), empowered them with the Holy Spirit and commissioned them to bear witness* to the kingdom of God or Christ (Acts 1:8; 2:1-36).

The twelve apostles, represented by Peter, and others like Stephen, Philip, Paul and Barnabas go to Judea, Samaria* and the Gentile world as far as Rome, proclaiming the kingdom of God or the lordship of Christ and demonstrating the salvation of the kingdom ("signs and wonders" of exorcism and healing) through the power of the Holy Spirit. Those who respond to their gospel by repentance* and faith are incorporated into the sphere under the lordship of Jesus Christ (i.e., the kingdom of God) by being baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and they receive the blessings of the kingdom, the forgiveness of their sins and the eschatological power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; 19:5-6; 22:16). Thus through the mission of the church the kingdom of God or Christ is extended.

1.6. The Messiah, the Kingdom of David or Israel, and the Twelve. Along with the title Kyrios, the "Christ" (= Messiah) is used to designate Jesus as the regent in the kingdom of God: God has exalted the crucified Jesus to his right hand and made him both Lord and Christ (Acts 2:33, 38). This exaltation* as the Messiah means Jesus' enthronement on the throne of David in fulfillment of God's promise to David (Acts 2:30; 13:23, 32-39; cf. 2 Sam 7:12-14). As such it represents the restoration of "David's fallen tent" (Acts 15:16), and "the remnant" of the Jews who "seek the Lord" and "all the Gentiles who bear [Christ's] name" are the eschatological people of God, the restored kingdom of David or Israel, over which Jesus the Davidic Messiah reigns (Acts 15:17). The twelve apostles are set as his representatives so that they may rule and judge them in his name (Lk 22:30). However, this restored kingdom of David, or Israel, is not to be thought of in terms of a Jewish nationalistic political system, as it was in some of the contemporary Jewish parties (Acts 1:6), but rather in terms of a community of the Jews and the Gentiles who call on the name of the Lord (i.e., submit to the kingship of Jesus the Messiah, who represents the kingship of Yahweh [Acts 2:21]).

1.7. Conclusion. In Acts Luke records the salvation history of God's exaltation of Jesus at his right hand to execute his lordship and kingship, of the Lord Jesus Christ's execution of God's kingship or lordship through the Holy Spirit and his church and of the Jewish and Gentile believers being brought into the kingdom of God or Christ for salvation. Luke concentrates on the present manifestation of the kingdom but views it as a process toward the consummation, "the restoration of all things," at the Parousia of Christ.

2. Hebrews.

2.1. The Kingdom of God. In Hebrews* there is only one explicit reference to the kingdom of God: "Since we are receiving an unshakable kingdom, let us be thankful and so worship God acceptably with reverence and awe" (Heb 12:28). Here "kingdom" does not seem to refer to God's kingly reign, and the verse does not seem to have in view either our submitting to it or our sharing in it.

Throughout the epistle there is little teaching about God's kingly rule. Rather, "kingdom" seems to be used as a synonym for "the city of God" (Heb 11:10, 16; 12:22), "the city that is to come" (Heb 13:14), "Mount Zion" or "the heavenly Jerusalem"* (Heb 12:22) and the "fatherland" (Heb 11:14). Like these terms, "kingdom" seems to denote the place where God reigns and the believers are to obtain the blissful rest (katapausis, Heb 3:11, 18; 4:1, 3, 5, 10-11; sabbatismos, Heb 4:9), the consummation of their salvation.

To be sure, God's heavenly "throne" is referred to (Heb 4:16; 8:1; 12:2). In the formulation "the throne of the Majesty" (megalōsynēs) in heaven (Heb 8:1) there may be a connotation of divine power or sovereignty, and from the contrast between the cross* Jesus endured and the divine throne Jesus eventually obtained (Heb 12:2) we may discern a similar connotation of the divine throne. However, in both cases the connotation cannot be said to be strong. In Hebrews 8:1 as well as in Hebrews 4:16 the cultic meaning of the divine throne is much more prominent than is its political meaning.

2.2. Jesus Christ Exalted to the Right Hand of God's Throne. A similar phenomenon takes place with reference to Jesus Christ. It belongs to the central theme of Hebrews that Jesus Christ was exalted to sit at the right hand of God or his throne in fulfillment of Psalm 110:1 (Heb 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2). Besides the fact that in several books of the NT Psalm 110:1 functions prominently to substantiate the lordship or kingship that the exalted Jesus Christ has come to exercise on God's behalf, several factors in Hebrews point to a political connotation of the theme. (1) It is accompanied by references to God's appointment of Jesus as his Son, his "heir of all things" in fulfillment of Psalm 2:7-8 (Heb 1:2, 5; 5:5; 7:28) and 2 Samuel 7:14 (Heb 1:5), which were interpreted as prophecies* for the messianic king in Judaism* and in the early church. (2) Psalm 45:6-7 and Psalm 8:4-6 are applied to Christ respectively in Hebrews 1:8-9 and Hebrews 2:6-8 to emphasize his exaltation to universal kingship or lordship. Note especially the language of the former:

> Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever, and righteousness will be the scepter of your kingdom.
>
> You have loved righteousness and hated wickedness; therefore God, your God, has set you above your companions by anointing you with the oil of joy.

(3) Christ is said to be "faithful as a son over God's house," in contrast to Moses,* who was faithful as a servant (Heb 3:5-6). (4) The name Melchizedek is interpreted in terms of "king of Salem [or peace]" and "king of righteousness" (Heb 7:1-3), in whose order Christ is supposed to have been appointed the high priest (Heb 5:6; 7:13-28). These factors clearly indicate that in Hebrews there is an understanding of Jesus Christ as the messianic king who exercises divine kingship on God's behalf. Here may be involved something more than a simple reflection of the primitive church's common kerygma. The statement in Hebrews 2:3-4 appears to reflect Jesus' ministry of kingdom preaching and healing (e.g., Mt 12:28 par. Lk 11:20), and further it is possible that the presentation of the consummation of salvation in terms of the sabbath rest in this epistle (Heb 4:9) reflects Jesus' ministry of healing on the sabbath as a proleptic actualization of the sabbath perfection or the restored creation in the kingdom of God.

However, it can hardly be said that the theme of Jesus' messianic kingship is expounded in the epistle. As little is said about the reign of the exalted Lord Jesus Christ over his people or the world* as is said about God's reign. Since his exaltation to the right hand of God, Christ waits for his enemies to be made his footstool (Heb 10:13; cf. Ps 110:1). Beyond affirming his exaltation to universal kingship, this is all that is said about the exalted Christ's current political activity. Instead the exaltation of Christ to the right hand of God is expounded almost exclusively in terms of his ministry as the high priest (cf. Davies, 388-89), just as God's throne in the heavenly sanctuary is almost exclusively interpreted in its cultic significance. Having entered the holy of holies once for all by his own blood, obtaining eternal redemption* for us (Heb 9:12) and mediating the new covenant (Heb 8:6-13; 9:15-22), Christ now serves in the heavenly sanctuary as the high priest, interceding for us (Heb 2:17-18; 4:14-16; 7:25; 8:1-2; 9:24; 10:19-22).

2.3. Based on the Jesus Tradition? Hebrews's exposition of God's throne in the heavenly sanctuary and of Christ's exaltation to the right hand of it chiefly in terms of their cultic significance, while retaining their political significance in the background, is based on the common conception of the temple* both as the sanctuary where God is worshiped and as the palace from which God reigns (cf. Hengel and Schwemer). Jesus also combined the concept of the kingdom of God and the temple: he sometimes pictured the former in terms of the latter (cf. Aalen) and concluded his kingdom preaching with a sign-act for God's impending destruction of the Jerusalem temple and for his building a new temple (Mk 11:15 par.; Mk 14:58 par.).

Even if cheiropoiētos ("made with hands") or acheiropoiētos ("not made with hands") in Mark 14:58 should be inauthentic, the appearance of the vocabulary in Acts 7:48 and Hebrews 9:11, 24 as well as Mark 14:58 suggests that it was part of a common early church tradition to express with the vocabulary a contrast between the Jerusalem temple and the new cult made possible by Jesus Christ. Then it appears that the idea of Christ's entering "the greater and more perfect tabernacle that is not made with hands" (Heb 9:11), the heavenly reality of which the Jerusalem temple or its predecessor (the wilderness tabernacle*) "made with hands" was only a copy and a shadow (Heb 8:2, 5; 9:24), reflects this common tradition.

Since Hebrews shows some awareness of the Jesus tradition* (e.g., Heb 2:3-4; 5:7-8; 13:12), it is possible that beyond the common tradition the author was aware of Jesus' negative attitude to the Jerusalem temple and his claim to build a new temple as part of his kingdom preaching. Thus the genius of the author may lie in his systematic exposition of the cultic element at least secondarily present in Jesus' kingdom preaching (cf. Gaston, 65-243) in the light of Psalm 110:1, 4. If so, his gospel is also based ultimately on Jesus' gospel of the kingdom of God.

2.4. Already But Not Yet. The believers are to receive "an unshakable kingdom" (Heb 12:28), that is, "the heavenly Jerusalem," "the city of God." In the "kingdom," "city" (e.g., Heb 11:10) or sanctuary (Heb 6:19-20) of God there is to be the sabbath rest (Heb 4:9) and the festival that God's people celebrate with myriads of angels.* They are at present on pilgrimage toward it, and they must press forward by faith and with perseverance, following Jesus Christ, "the pioneer and perfecter of our faith" (Heb 12:2; see Endurance). Yet by appropriating Christ's atonement and new covenant, in a real sense they "have [already] come to Mount Zion, to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" to celebrate the sabbath in the festal gathering of angels and saints (Heb 12:22-23). Besides the tension between the "already" and the "not yet," a tension that is characteristic of NT eschatology as a whole, we may observe that this imagery is not far from Jesus' favorite picture of a feast for the kingdom of God and from his actualization of the salvation of the kingdom of God through his healing ministry on the sabbath.

3. General Epistles.

In the rest of the General Epistles, the term "the kingdom [of God]" appears only in James 2:5 and 2 Peter 1:11; related concepts are found in 1 Peter 2:4-10.

In 2 Peter 1:11 the readers are exhorted to cultivate Christian virtues* so that they may be "provided with an entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." It is possible that in 1 Peter 2 the ideas of the church as the "spiritual house"* or the temple founded on the cornerstone or a foundation stone* (1 Pet 2:4-8) and as "a chosen race, a royal house, a priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's possession" (1 Pet 2:9; Exod 19:6) reflect what Jesus aimed at in his kingdom preaching and temple saying: to create a new, eschatological people of God or to build a new "temple."

Reminding the readers that God has chosen the poor "to be rich in faith and to inherit the kingdom he promised to those who love him" (Jas 2:5), James* urges them to keep "the royal law" (nomos basilikos), "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Jas 2:8). He also warns them with a contrasting picture of the rich: they are those who exploit others and slander the name of God (Jas 2:6-7). Here Jesus' language is clearly echoed in the idioms "the poor" (Lk 4:18; Mt 5:3 par. Lk 6:20) and "to inherit the kingdom" (e.g., Mt 5:5; 25:34).

Jesus' teaching is also clearly reflected: Jesus gave as the law of the kingdom the double command of love*: love your God with your whole being and your neighbor as yourself (Mt 22:34-40 par.) and concretized it (e.g., in the Sermon on the Mount or Plain [Mt 5—7 par. Lk 6:20-49]). The rich violate this law of the kingdom, or "the royal law": instead of loving God, they slander the name of God and love rather the idol Mammon (cf. Mt 6:24 par. Lk 16:13) and so inevitably exploit their neighbors. In consequence they are excluded from the kingdom of God. In contrast "the poor" are rich in faith: they rely on God and love him, and so they love their neighbors too. Thus they prove themselves to be people of the kingdom of God, and they are to "inherit the kingdom" when it comes in its consummation. The contrast between the poor and the rich echoes closely the Beatitudes in the Lukan form (Lk 6:20-26). The poor will inherit the kingdom, it is implied, when the Lord comes as the judge, and so they are to wait patiently, as "the Lord's Parousia is at hand" (Jas 5:7-9).

4. Revelation.

"The kingdom of God" is the theme of Revelation, and so to study it is to survey the whole content of the book (see Revelation, Book of).

4.1. The Kingdom of God in Heaven. God, as "the Alpha and the Omega" and "the First and the Last," is the Creator and goal of all things and, as the pantokratōr ("all-sovereign" or "almighty"), is the sovereign Lord of the whole universe. He is "the One who sits on the throne" in heaven, and from there he directs the course of history. This fact is dramatically presented to the seer John in a vision* described in Revelation 4.

In the vision John sees God sitting on the heavenly throne and receiving the worship* of the "four living creatures" and the "twenty-four elders." In the heavenly throne room, the prototype of the holy of holies in the earthly temple, the four living creatures appearing respectively like a lion, an ox, a human being and an eagle, as representatives of all creatures worship God on the throne. In their hymn* the holiness* of the eternal and sovereign God is highlighted. God the Creator and Ruler of the whole universe is properly hallowed (Rev 4:8). The "twenty-four elders," the angelic beings who make up the heavenly council and rule the heavenly sphere on God's behalf, also worship God, acknowledging the sovereign will and power of the Creator (Rev 4:11). So John sees that in heaven God's name is hallowed, he reigns, and his will is done (cf. Mt 6:9-10).

4.2. The Kingdom of Satan. However, on earth Satan* (the dragon or serpent), the primeval adversary* of God and the supernatural source of all evils, reigns, misleading all the nations with falsehood to worship him instead of the true God (Rev 12). John sees this reign of Satan taking a concrete form in the tyrannical and exploitative Roman Empire: the Roman imperial power incorporated in the emperor* is the beast* or sea monster that rules the world on behalf of the dragon (Rev 13; 17). The dragon, the beast and the second beast or land monster that persuades nations to worship the beast are a parody of the triune God, the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. The satanic trinity forces the nations to submit to the imperial cult by deceiving them with the wine of the harlot of Babylon* (i.e., the ideology of pax romana, Rev 17), as well as by overwhelming them with the apparently invincible power of the Roman Empire (Rev 13).

Thus on earth the Roman emperor masquerades as god, and so the name of the true God is not hallowed, his reign is usurped, and his will is not done.

4.3. The Kingdom of God on Earth: The Christ Event (Already).

God, "who is and who was," "is to come" to earth in order to establish his rightful kingship, destroying the satanic forces. This is the main message of Revelation. John is sure of this because he saw in a vision the heavenly reality of God's triumph through Jesus Christ, which is to be unfolded on earth (Rev 5). In a real sense

God has already come and triumphed in Jesus Christ. As the one who bears his names ("the First and the Last," "the Alpha and the Omega" and "the Beginning and the End") and shares his throne, Christ is the agent of God who establishes God's kingship on earth. He is the one who turns "the kingdom of the world" into "the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ" (Rev 11:15). Christ is completely identified with God, so that God's future coming for salvation and judgment* is none other than Christ's (Rev 22:12, 20).

This Christ has already come and conquered the satanic forces and is now enthroned in heaven (Rev 3:21). For Christ's conflict with the satanic forces and his redemption of humankind, John uses two metaphors: the messianic war and the exodus. Jesus is the Messiah, "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David" (Rev 5:5; 22:16) and has overcome the rebellious nations (cf. Ps 2:8-9) with a sharp two-edged sword issuing from his mouth (cf. Is 49:2; Rev 1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:11, 15, 21). Jesus is the Passover Lamb* (Rev 5:6, 9-11) who by his blood has ransomed a people from all the nations of the world and "made them a kingdom and priests to serve God" (Rev 5:9-10; cf. Exod 19:5-6).

Jesus Christ has conquered the satanic forces by bearing a faithful witness to God and then by his death (see Death of Christ). Jesus Christ was "the faithful and true witness" to God even unto his death (Rev 3:14; cf. Rev 1:5; 12:17; 19:10). This must refer to Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God during his earthly life. But the decisive victory was by his death. This is made clear in the vision of Revelation 5 (Bauckham): in Revelation 5:5 it is declared that Jesus as the Davidic Messiah has triumphed, but in the subsequent verses this triumphant Messiah appears as a Lamb slaughtered, standing in the center of the divine throne and receiving the worship of the four living creatures and the twenty-four elders. Then a myriad of angels and eventually all creatures in the universe are seen joining in their worship and praising him for his triumph won through his sacrificial death. In Revelation 12:5-12 Christ's decisive victory over Satan through his death is depicted in two vivid pictures: Christ is enthroned in heaven while Satan is driven out of heaven and cast down to the earth.

This is in complete agreement with Jesus or the Gospels: Jesus Christ has triumphed over the satanic forces through his preaching of the kingdom of God and his sacrificial death on the cross. Again in full agreement with Jesus' own teaching or the testimonies of the Gospels, the result of Jesus' victory over the satanic forces is the creation of the people of God, a people he has ransomed from the kingdom of Satan and made "a kingdom and priests to serve God" (Rev 5:10). They are the people over whom God reigns as King, or they are the kingdom of God that has already come into being. In this way Jesus Christ has already brought about the kingdom of God.

Thus Jesus has fulfilled the OT or Jewish expectation of the Davidic Messiah. However, again in agreement with Jesus or the Gospels, John also reinterprets messiahship: Jesus' messianic victory was a victory over the evil forces of Satan (Rev 12:7-9) rather than the Gentile nations as such; the means of his victory was his witness to truth or to the true God and his sacrificial death rather than military conquest; and the people gathered into the kingdom of God to share in God's reign was not the Jewish nation but a new people of God who would hold faithfully to "the testimony of Jesus" or faithfully adhere to the kingdom of God that Jesus proclaimed (Rev 12:17; 17:6; 19:10).

By describing the vision of God enthroned in heaven and of Jesus Christ as the Lamb slain to establish his kingdom on earth (Rev 4—5), John presents an image of God who rules in self-giving love and righteousness* over against the satanic forces, who rule by self-assertion and oppression. Because God reigns in love, his kingship means salvation for humankind, and the message of his coming to establish his kingship is the gospel. Thus the message of John is the same as the gospel of Jesus, the Evangelists and Paul.

4.4. The Kingdom of God in or Through the Church (Now). The church or the people of God ransomed from the kingdom of Satan through Christ's sacrificial death is the kingdom of God present on earth (Rev 1:6; 5:10). The Christians make Christ's triumph over the satanic forces effective on earth. In parallel to the work of Christ, this role of the church is pictured in terms of the messianic war. The dragon, which has been conquered at Christ's death and cast down from heaven, now tyrannizes the world through the sea beast and the land beast. With Satan's authority and at his behest, the emperors and the local rulers of the Roman Empire make war against the church (Rev 12:13—13:18). The church is the army of the Messiah (numbering 144,000) drawn from the twelve tribes of Israel (Rev 7:4-8; i.e., 12 x 12 x 1,000—all symbolic ciphers). The risen Christ, the victorious Lamb, is present with his church (Rev 1:13; 2:1) and leads it as his army (Rev 14:1, 4; 17:14) into the battle against the satanic trinity, empowering the church with the Holy Spirit, which is his power operating in the world (Rev 3:1; 5:6).

Again in parallel to the work of Christ, the church's holy war against the satanic forces is cast in terms not of a military conquest but a witness to the kingship of God or Christ and Jesus' sacrificial death (Rev 11:1-13; 12:11). The Christians are an army, but an army of the Lamb slain (Rev 14:1-5). As such they participate in the Lamb's victory over the satanic forces through their martyrdom,* which is their participation in the Lamb's sacrificial death (Rev 7:14). Their holy war consists in continuing the "testimony of Jesus" to the kingship of the true God (Rev 12:17; 19:10) and resisting the idolatry* of the false god, the beast.

The persecution of the beast (the Roman imperial power) is fierce, and the deception of the harlot of Babylon (the ideology of pax romana) is seductive. Yet the church is empowered by the Spirit of prophecy (Rev 11:3-6; 19:10), and its faithful witness to the kingship of the true God and the Lamb unto death among all the nations brings about the conversion of the nations from idolatry to the worship of the true God (Rev 11:13; 15:2-4). Thus God's kingship is made effective over the nations at present through the church's witness.

4.5. The Consummation of the Kingdom at the Parousia of Christ (Future). However, there remain those who neither heed God's warning judgments (the two series of judgments: Rev 6:1-17; 8:1, 3-5; 8:2, 6-11; 11:14-19) nor accept the church's witness. They continue to be under the rule of the satanic trinity so long as the latter exist, blaspheming against God and coercing and deluding nations into their worship. The saints continue to suffer under their tyranny, and even the souls of those who have already been martyred must wait for the consummation of their salvation and the judgment of the wicked (Rev 6:9-11).

The consummation of salvation and judgment is to take place with the Parousia of Christ. Christ will come as "King of kings and Lord of lords" (Rev 17:14; 19:16) and finish off the holy war against the satanic forces. There will be the final judgment (Rev 15:1, 5—16:21), in which Babylon, the satanic regime, will fall (Rev 16:16—18:24), the rulers of the world allied with it will be destroyed (Rev 19:17-21) and the wicked will be condemned (Rev 14:17-20; 17:12-14; 19:15). The satanic trinity of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet themselves will be destroyed (Rev 19:19—20:10). But the saints will be harvested into Christ's kingdom (Rev 14:15-16).

John depicts the destruction of the dragon, Satan, in two stages and accordingly the consummation of the salvation of the saints also in two stages. The dragon is first to be captured and locked in the abyss* for a thousand years, and during that period only the martyrs are to be resurrected to participate in Christ's reign. Then Satan is to be released to muster Gog and Magog (from Ezek) for the final battle against God's people, only to be cast into the lake of fire forever. Together with Satan, death and hades are to be destroyed. This results in the general resurrection* and the last judgment of all the dead (Rev 20:1-10). It is disputed whether this picture of the millennial kingdom of Christ should be interpreted in such a way as to be identified with any objective period in the eschaton (e.g., premillennialism and postmillennialism), beyond making the theological point that unlike the paradise of the Urzeit, the universe restored under God's kingship at the Endzeit is no longer vulnerable to Satan (Bauckham).

Then John depicts the consummation of the kingdom of God in terms of a new creation, "a new heaven and a new earth" and "the Holy City, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God" (Rev 21:1—22:5). The new creation is more than just a restoration of the original creation. In it there will be "no longer any sea" (Rev 21:1), whereas in the first creation the "sea," the primeval source of evil (cf. Rev 13:1), remained as the potential threat to the cosmos (Gen 1:2; 7:11).

Filled with God's presence, the new creation will be the city of God, the new Jerusalem, and also the temple where God and the Lamb will be enthroned. There God will dwell with his people, and those who "conquer" by faith in Christ will be his people and will dwell with God. There will be no more death but only the fullness of life, as the "river of the water of life" will flow from the throne of God and the Lamb and the fruits of "the tree of life" will be available. There will be no more darkness (see Light), but the glory* of God and the Lamb will enlighten the whole city. There will be no more satanic deception and impurity (Rev 21:27), but God's Word and his truth* will prevail (Rev 19:11, 13). God's people as his children will inherit all these blessings and participate in God's reign, and the nations will come with their treasures to worship God and walk by his light, in fulfillment of the prophecies of the OT prophets and Jesus. So will the kingdom of God be consummated and God's intent in his creation and covenant be fulfilled.

4.6. Conclusion. Revelation presents a faithful interpretation of Jesus' gospel of the kingdom of God in the light of Christ's death, resurrection and exaltation and a creative contextualization of it to the latter half of the first century in which the Roman Empire appeared as the incarnation of the satanic kingdom.

5. Apostolic Fathers.

According to H. M. Herrick, in the apostolic fathers* there are fifty-two references to the kingdom, of which ten are quotations from the NT; the full phrase "kingdom of God" occurs twenty-seven times. These references maintain several features of Jesus' and his apostles' preachings as well as beginning to enunciate some new features.

5.1. The Coming Kingdom of God. The main emphasis is put on the eschatological or futuristic nature of the kingdom of God. Having been commissioned by the risen Lord Jesus Christ, "the apostles went forth in the assurance of the Holy Spirit and preached the gospel that the kingdom of God was about to come" (1 Clem. 42.3). In contrast to the mean and brief life in this world, "the promise of Christ, namely, the rest of the coming kingdom and of eternal life, is great and wonderful" (2 Clem. 5.5). We must "await anytime the kingdom of God in love and righteousness, since we know not the day of God's appearing" (2 Clem. 12.1). With regard to the kingdom of God that is coming, the NT language of entering into the kingdom of God (e.g., 2 Clem. 9.6) and inheriting the kingdom of God (e.g., Ign. Eph. 16.1; Ign. Phld. 3.3; Pol. Phil. 5.3) is also used.

We cannot enter into the kingdom of God by ourselves but only "by God's ability" (Diogn. 9.1). God loved humankind and sent his only Son to them, and he promised them the kingdom in heaven and will give it to them (Diogn. 10.2). The Son of God is "the rock and the gate" of the kingdom of God; the entrance into the kingdom is only through him or by receiving his name (Herm. Sim. 9.12-15). Yet in order to enter or inherit the kingdom we must live a life of love and righteousness (2 Clem. 6.9; 9.6; 11.7; 12.1; Barn. 21.1) and avoid sins (Pol. Phil. 5.3).

5.2. The Kingdom of Christ Future and Present. Sometimes the coming kingdom of God is identified as the kingdom of Christ: the righteous dead "shall be manifested at the visitation of the kingdom of Christ" (1 Clem. 50.3). The Lord Jesus will come to redeem the believers and condemn the unbelievers, who will regret bitterly seeing Christ having the sovereignty over the world (2 Clem. 17.4-7). Those who desire to attain to his kingdom must receive him through suffering (Barn. 7.11).

Yet the kingdom of Christ is already a present reality. "The kingdom of Jesus is on the cross," and "in his kingdom there shall be evil days, in which we shall be saved" (Barn. 8.5-6). These sentences seem to express the tension of "already but not yet." It is implied that we have been redeemed out of the kingdom of Satan and transferred into the kingdom of Christ when we are exhorted not to slumber over our sins, lest "the prince of evil should gain power over us [again] and thrust us out of the kingdom of the Lord" (Barn. 4.13; cf. Ign. Eph. 19.3). So Christ is the king who reigns forever (Mart. Pol. 9.3; 17.3; 21.2). Further, Martyrdom of Polycarp 22.1, 4 may indicate the beginning of the doctrine of the kingdom of Christ as the present reality in heaven into which the believers enter at death.

5.3. The Kingdom and the Church. In Didache 9.4 and Didache 10.5-6 there are prayers* for the Lord to gather the church from the four corners of the earth into his kingdom. So the kingdom of God is distinguished from the church. However, in the Shepherd of Hermas we begin to see a close association of the church and the kingdom, which is achieved apparently with the help of the conceptions of the temple in Jesus, Paul (1 Cor 3) and 1 Peter 2:4-8: Christ is the rock upon which is built "the building of the tower" (i.e., the church; Herm. Vis. 3.3; Herm. Sim. 9.13) or "the house of God" (Herm. Sim. 9.14). Christians are stones for the building (Herm. Vis. 2.4). They enter into the building through its gate, which is Christ, and entrance into it is entrance into the kingdom of God (Herm. Sim. 9).

5.4. The Millennial Kingdom. Papias is said to have thought of Christ's millennial kingdom to be set up on earth after the resurrection (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39; Jerome Vir 18).

6. Gospel of Thomas.

There are twenty-two references to the kingdom of God or heaven in this Gnostic* apocryphon. Some of them have parallels in the canonical Synoptics: logion 20 (mustard seed); 22 (entrance as children); 46 (one in the kingdom is superior to John the Baptist); 97 (leaven); 99 (those who do the will of God are Jesus' brothers and mother and will enter the kingdom of God); 107 (a shepherd* seeking one lost sheep); see also 113. The others are quite disparate, but all the kingdom sayings in the Gospel of Thomas tend to emphasize the wisdom* motif, minimize the apocalyptic* motif and understand the kingdom in terms of the community of Thomas.

See also CREATION, COSMOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; EXALTATION, ENTHRONEMENT; GLORY; GOD; HEAVEN, NEW HEAVEN; LAND IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY; LORD; MILLENNIUM; PAROUSIA.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Aalen, "'Reign' and 'House' in the Gospels," NTS 8 (1961-62) 215-40; R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); P. H. Davids, Commentary on James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); J. H. Davies, "The Heavenly Work of Christ in Hebrews," StEv 4 (1968) 384-89; J. D. G. Dunn, "Spirit and Kingdom," ExpT 82 (1970-71) 36-40; P. Ellingworth, Commentary on Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); E. Ferguson, "The Kingdom of God in Early Patristic Literature" in The Kingdom of God in 20th-Century Interpretation, ed. W. Willis (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1987) 191-208; L. Gaston, No Stone on Another (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970); M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer, eds., Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991); H. M. Herrick, The Kingdom of God in the Writings of the Fathers (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1903); K. King, "Kingdom in the Gospel of Thomas" in Foundations and Facets Forum 3 (1987) 48-97; H. Koester and T. O. Lambdin, "The Gospel of Thomas" in The Nag Hammadi Library in English, ed. J. M. Robinson (San Francisco: Harper, 1988) 124-138; W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations of Their Writings, ed. and rev. Michael W. Holmes (2d ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992); I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian (Exeter: Paternoster, 1970); K. Wengst, Schriften des Urchristentums 2: Didache (Apostellehre), Barnabasbrief, Zweiter Klemensbrief, Schrift an Diognet (Darmstadt: Wissenschaft Buchgesellschaft, 1984). S. Kim Knowledge, according to the OT and NT, is attained through a personal relationship between the subject and the object to be known, rather than the Greek idea of theoretical pursuit through observation.

KNOWLEDGE

1. Terminology
2. Knowledge in the Old Testament
3. Knowledge in the Later New Testament
4. Knowledge in the Apostolic Fathers
5. Knowledge and Ethics

1. Terminology.

The OT uses the verb yāḏa' ("to know") and its various cognate forms to express knowledge through experience or learning. The predominant words in the NT include ginōskō, ("to know," "to understand," 222 times) and gnōsis ("knowledge," 29 times). Other forms that appear include the compounds epignōsis and epiginōskō, as well as gnōstos ("the knowable," "that which is known"). Another word, oida (318 times, primarily by John), is used synonymously with ginōskō (see Seesemann).

2. Knowledge in the Old Testament.

The meaning and use of yāḏa' implies a type of knowledge that is personal, experiential, emotional and relational. Thus it is not so much propositional knowledge about something based upon scientific or intellectual comprehension but knowledge discovered through a personal relationship between the subject and object. Spouses, for example, "know" each other through the sexual intimacy they experience (Gen 4:1, 17, 25; 1 Sam 1:19; cf. Mt 1:25 where ginōskō is used for marital relations).

Israel's* knowledge of God* comes from a covenantal* relationship in which God reveals himself through certain historical events (Lev 23:43; Deut 4:32-39, 11:2-7; Ps 9:10; Is 1:2-3, 41:20; Hos 2:19-23), and from which he expects obedience. "Israel's lack of knowledge," notes O. Piper, "is not theoretical ignorance, but rather failure to practice the filial relationship in which they stand with God" (3:43).

3. Knowledge in the Later New Testament.

3.1. General Observations. For the Greeks knowledge is rational, theoretical and speculative. They were more concerned with the essence of things than a relationship between subject and object that carried certain moral obligations. In the mystery religions* gnōsis is used as a technical term for secret and esoteric knowledge obtained through visions* and special illumination. The Gnostics* also believed that gnōsis was the key to their salvation.* Much of what Paul and John write about knowledge is a corrective to gnosticizing ideas that were threatening the church* in the first century.

The NT continues the OT understanding of knowledge as a relationship (for a detailed analysis and supporting Scripture of the various uses of ginōskō see articles in BAGD, EDNT and NIDNTT). John explains that believers know the Father through the Son (Jn 1:14; 14:7-10; 17:7-8, 25-26; cf. Mt 11:25-27) and continues to describe the importance of the covenantal bond between Jesus and his disciples with the metaphor of sheep and shepherd (Jn 10:14-15). For Paul knowledge of God comes to those who hear the gospel* and are possessed by the Spirit of God (Rom 1:14-17; 10:17; 1 Cor 2:11-14; 8; Eph 3:4-5; Col 1:6; 1 Thess 4:9; see Holy Spirit).

3.2. Knowledge in John. Much of the Johannine literature is written to counteract the teachings of Gnosticism and Docetism* (the verb ginōskō appears 87 times; oida, 127 times). The absence of the noun, gnōsis, may be a deliberate attempt on John's part to extricate the term from the Gnostics and replace it with other metaphors for knowing.

John will not tolerate any gnostic concepts that deny the reality of the Incarnation (1 Jn 1:1-4). He sees Jesus as the one whom God sent into the world to reveal the Father (Jn 1:1-14; 14:7-10; 17:7-8, 25-26). One comes to know God through the earthy ministry of Jesus and the signs* (sēmeion) that he performs. In distinction from the Gnostics, "John uses ginōskō in a theological sense parallel to 'believe' or 'love God' or 'see God,' thereby giving the Gnostics' term an OT and Christian sense" (Schmithals, 1:250). In other words, those who do not believe, see or love* God cannot claim to know God.

3.3. Knowledge in Other New Testament Letters and Revelation. The problem that Paul had with some form of incipient Gnosticism in Corinth became more acute after his death (esp. 1 Cor 1:18—2:16; for further discussion on Paul, see DPL, Gnosticism). In the Pastorals, for example, the readers are warned to avoid "profane myths and old wives' tales" (1 Tim 4:7) and "the profane chatter and contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge [gnōsis]" (1 Tim 6:20). In order to avoid any confusion between Gnostic and Christian knowledge, it appears the author deliberately changes words, using epignōsis instead of gnōsis to talk about true knowledge, that is, "knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim 2:4; 2 Tim 2:25, 3:7; Tit 1:1).

The same word is used in Hebrews 10:26 and several places in 2 Peter that emphasize knowledge of God and/or the Lord Jesus Christ* (2 Pet 1:2, 3, 8; 2:20). In Colossians epignōsis is used in passages that deliberately distinguish knowledge of God from human knowledge and traditions (Col 1:9, 10; 2:2; 3:10). This appears to confirm W. Hackenberg's observation that although epignōsis is used in a general and nontheological way, in a number of places it specifies Christian truth (doctrine) and conduct—"an almost technical sense for the call to the Christian faith" (Hackenberg, 24-25; but note 2 Pet 3:18: "knowledge [gnōsis] of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ"). In 2 Peter 3:3 it clearly refers to understanding the character of the last days (see Eschaton). It is probably knowledge of God and his will as expressed in the paraenetic tradition that is referred to in the virtue* list in 2 Peter 1:5-6.

A final ethical* use of knowledge is the instruction to husbands in 1 Peter 3:7 to live with their wives "according to knowledge" (NRSV: "show consideration for your wives"). This is probably a recognition of their "weak" social status and physical strength in comparison with their husbands and of their equality with their husbands as "fellow heirs of the gift of life." Failure in this area, for example, by taking advantage of their wives' vulnerability, will hinder the husbands' prayers.*

Revelation 2:4 has what is probably an ironic use of "knowledge." The knowledge that "Jezebel" probably presented as deep prophetic insight into divine truth is referred to by John as knowledge of the "deep things of Satan," which may or may not have had gnosticizing elements.

4. Knowledge in the Apostolic Fathers.

Both gnōsis and epignōsis appear in the early fathers in a general, nonreligious sense as knowing someone or something (Barn. 2.3; 9.8; Diogn. 12.2; 12.4; 1 Clem. 41.4; 48.5; Barn. 13.7; Ign. Rom. 10.2). Far more frequent and important, however, are the number of times the Fathers use these terms while addressing moral and religious concerns. Clement* (1 Clem. 1.2; 36.2; 59.2; 2 Clem. 3.1), Barnabas* (6.9; 11.4; 21.5), Ignatius* (Ign. Eph. 17.2), Justin (Justin Dial. Tryph. 14.1) and Tatian (Tatian Or. Graec. 42.1), for example, speak about the knowledge of God* and Jesus (see also Herm. Sim. 9.18.1; Diogn. 10.1; Did. 9.3; 10.2). In other cases there are specific references to "the truth"*—i.e., true doctrine (Barn. 18.1; Tatian Or. Graec. 13.1; Justin Apol. II 2.2; Justin Dial. Tryph. 27.4; 39.5; 69.1; Ign. Phld. 1.2).

5. Knowledge and Ethics.

The preceding discussion revealed a consistent relationship between knowledge and ethics. To know something is to act upon that knowledge. In the OT those who know God and are known by him through a covenant relationship are summoned to obedience.* In Paul, those who know God through Christ continue in the faith* (2 Cor 4:6; Gal 4:9), serve God (Phil 1:9; 1 Thess 1:9), live by the Spirit and value love as the highest gift (1 Cor). True knowledge for John also expresses itself in action. To know God is to abide in him, obey the truth, keep his commandments* and love their family members (e.g., Jn 15; 1 Jn 2:3-5, 29; 3:16, 19, 24; 4:7-21; Barn. 5.4; 19.1). A similar focus is observable in later documents and some of the Fathers (Col 1:9-10; 3:10; 2 Pet 1:8; 2:20-21; Barn. 5.4; 19.1; 2 Clem. 3.1).

See also GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; REVEAL, REVELATION; TRUTH; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Bergman and G. Botterwick, "ידע" TDOT 5:448-81; R. Bultmann, "γινώσκω," TDNT 4:689-719; E. E. Ellis, "Wisdom and Knowledge in 1 Corinthians," TynB 25 (1974) 82-98; W. Hackenberg, "ἐπιγνώσκω" "ἐπίγνωσις," EDNT 2:24-25; O. Piper, "Knowledge," IDB 3:42-48; K. Rudolph, Gnosis (San Francisco: Harper, 1983); W. Schmithals, "γινώσκω," EDNT 1:248-51; idem, Gnosticism in Corinth (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); idem, Paul and the Gnostics (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); E. Schmitz, "Knowledge," NIDNTT 2:393-406; H. Seesemann, "οἶδα," TDNT 5:116-19.

A. G. Patzia

KOINONIA. See FELLOWSHIP.

L

LAMB

Jesus appears as God's lamb at significant points in early Christian texts. This article surveys the uses in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), Acts* and 1 Peter,* giving special attention to Revelation (which calls Jesus the Lamb* more than twenty-five times, making "lamb" one of the book's primary christological* titles).

1. The Lamb in Johannine Texts
2. 1 Peter 1:19
3. Acts 8:32
4. Conclusion

1. The Lamb in Johannine Texts.

1.1. The Lamb in the Fourth Gospel. Because many scholars concede that the Fourth Gospel and Revelation issued from the same community, discussions concerning the term lamb in one Johannine document may be relevant to the other. Scholars have proposed various backgrounds for the Johannine lamb (sometimes separate ones for Jn 1:29 and Rev 5:6): apocalyptic* lambs, the lamb of Isaiah 53:7, and Passover and sacrificial* lambs. Dodd (230-38) and Barrett (218) compare John's lamb to the eschatological* horned lambs of the messianic era in 1 Enoch 89-90 (Morris, 146, sees this as relevant for Revelation but not for the Fourth Gospel).

But 1 Enoch's apocalyptic lambs bear no specific function more relevant to Jesus than most of 1 Enoch's other numerous symbols; indeed, some other Jewish texts speak of horned lambs without eschatological significance (e.g., paschal lambs in t. Pesaḥ 6.7). The image of a lamb conveyed more general nuances in literature widely read in this period (Wis 19:9; cf. Lk 10:3). The earliest supposedly non-Christian use of "lamb" for the Messiah himself is a Christian interpolation in Testament of Joseph 19:8, so one cannot appeal to a messianic lamb to support the theory of an eschatological lamb.

Many find in John 1:29 the language of Isaiah's Suffering Servant (e.g., Taylor, 138-39; Schnackenburg, 1:300). As common as this image became in early Christianity, however, more dominant lamb imagery overshadows the isolated mention of the Servant as a lamb in Isaiah 53:7 (e.g., 1 Clem. 16.7). The Fourth Gospel portrays Jesus' death in terms of the Passover lamb (Jn 18:28; 19:36) and reports John the Baptist proclaiming Jesus as a lamb (Jn 1:29) in the context of a new exodus and a new redemption* (Jn 1:23) expected by Judaism* (regardless of how John the Baptist may have meant it; Barrett, 218). The primary background of the Johannine lamb must be that of the sacrificial Passover lamb, whatever other elements may also appear (e.g., Schnackenburg, 1:299-300). (Early Judaism apparently attached the nuances of sacrifice to Passover; cf. Josephus Ant. 2.312.)

1.2. The Paschal Lamb in Revelation. The image of the paschal lamb that fits the Fourth Gospel also seems to fit Revelation and the reference in 1 Peter (Rev. 5:6; 7:14; 1 Pet 1:19; cf. 1 Cor 5:7; Minear, 102-3). In Revelation 5, the "lamb having been slaughtered" is the Passover lamb (with possible additional allusions to Isaiah 53:7; Taylor, 36; Hillyer) whose blood delivers God's people from the coming plagues (Rev 7:3). But this passage also portrays the lamb in union with the martyrs,* for Revelation 6:9 identifies the martyrs as sacrifices:* they appear beneath the altar, where the blood of sacrifices was poured (Beasley-Murray, 135; Ladd 1978, 39). (This interpretation seems secure; 4 Macc 9:24 also portrays martyrs as sacrifices, and early Christian texts often used similar imagery: Phil 2:17; 2 Tim 4:6; Ign. Eph. 8.1; Mart. Pol. 14.2; cf. Ign. Rom. 4.1.)

Commentators often find in the seven horns a symbol of strength and power* borrowed from apocalyptic texts (Ford, 86; Beasley-Murray, 125); this being the case, the most significant feature of the text is that the power appears in weakness. The great lion (Rev 5:5) turns out to be a slain lamb (Rev 5:6). That the lamb's eyes derive from God's eyes in Zechariah 4:10 also underscores Revelation's divine christology (see Bruce, 335). Legal documents typically had seven seals: seven witnesses imprinted their signet rings in hot wax to seal the seven threads surrounding the document, thus ensuring that no one tampered with it until it was opened under official circumstances. Some commentators have suggested that a specific legal document, namely, a will, is in view here (Ladd 1974, 623). In this case the book may be the inheritance in the Lamb's book of life, the validity of its contents attested by the judgments* of the seven seals (see Scrolls). Significantly, however, wills could not be opened until the death of the one who made the will (so Heb 9:16). Thus only when the sacrificed Lamb took the throne could the book begin to be opened.

2. 1 Peter 1:19.

Commentators have suggested that the redemptive blood is the counterpart to the sacrifice at Jewish proselytes' conversion (Reicke, 85), an interpretation that makes sense if Peter's audience represent Gentile* converts who rejected their former idolatry.* Because texts addressing conversion primarily stress circumcision and baptism,* however, so narrow an allusion might have been obscure to ancient hearers (especially Gentiles). That the allusion is to Passover is far more likely (e.g., Selwyn, 146), especially given probable contextual allusions like "girding one's mind up" (1 Pet 1:13; see Ex 12:11; Kelly, 65; Reicke, 83; contrast Best, 84).

3. Acts 8:32.

Some think the emphasis of this quotation from Isaiah 53 is waiting on God* while suffering persecution,* rather than Jesus' vicarious death (e.g., Decock; see Death of Christ). But Luke often assumes his readers' knowledge of the rest of a text (e.g., Lk 4:18-19) as Jewish teachers generally did (e.g., y. Qidd. 4:1, §2), and the widespread use of Isaiah 53 in early Christianity suggests that the citation would recall the whole passage to many hearers' memories.

4. Conclusion.

The primary background for the image of Jesus as a lamb in early Christianity was the Passover lamb, combined with allusions to sacrificial lambs; the secondary background was probably the image of the Suffering Servant as a lamb in Isaiah 53:7, a passage to which early Christians devoted much attention. In the person of Jesus early Christians found both paschal lamb and Suffering Servant; hence, they often may have failed to draw a significant distinction between the two roles.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; REVELATION, BOOK OF; SHEPHERD, FLOCK.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, "The Lamb of God," NTS 1 (1955) 210-18; G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (NCB; Greenwood, SC: Attic, 1974); E. Best, 1 Peter (NCB; Greenwood, SC: Attic, 1971); F. F. Bruce, "The Spirit in the Apocalypse" in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973) 333-44; P. B. Decock, "The Understanding of Isaiah 53:7-8 in Acts 8:32-33," Neot 14 (1981) 111-33; C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965); J. M. Ford, Revelation (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); N. Hillyer, " 'The Lamb' in the Apocalypse," EvQ 39 no. 4 (1967) 228-36; J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); G. E. Ladd, The Last Things (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); idem, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); P. S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1960); L. Morris, The Gospel According to John: The English Text with Introduction, Exposition and Notes (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971); B. Reicke, The Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964); R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to St. John, (3 vols.; New York: Herder & Herder, 1968) vol. 1; E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes and Essays (2d ed.; New York: Macmillan, 1947); V. Taylor, The Atonement in New Testament Teaching (London: Epworth, 1945). C. S. Keener

LAND IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY

The land of Israel belonged to Judaism's understanding of itself. Early Christianity's identity, however, was not closely tied to the land, and the NT focuses not on the holiness* of a place but the holiness of a person, Jesus Christ; in Christian literature christology* displaces territorial theology. The land, nonetheless, retained significance (if sometimes perhaps only symbolic) for Christian eschatology.*

1. Jewish Background
2. Earliest Christianity
3. Acts of the Apostles
4. Revelation
5. Conclusion

1. Jewish Background.

The importance of and veneration for the land appear from a number of legends about Palestine: it was protected during Noah's flood and remained dry (Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 7.4; b. Zebah. 113a); it lies at the center of the earth (Jub. 8:19; Sib. Or. 5:250); it is holier than any other land (m. Kelim 1:6-9); to leave it for a foreign country is to lose the merits of the fathers (b. B. Bat. 91a); in the great tribulation at the end of time those within its borders will be spared affliction (2 Apoc. Bar. 29:2; 40:2; 71:1; cf. Joel 2:32); at the resurrection of the dead the just outside the land will roll through underground tunnels until they emerge from a cleft Mount of Olives, in the middle of—to use a term found already in Zechariah 2:12—"the holy land" (b. Ketub. 111a [which also records the opinion that those who die outside the land will not rise from the dead]; Tg. Cant 8.5; Gen. Rab. 96:5). This glorification of the land is especially strong in the rabbinic sources. b. Berakot. 15a asserts that God gave Israel three precious gifts: "the Torah, the land of Israel, the world to come."

1.1. The Old Testament. In Genesis 15:18-21 God promises the land of Israel to Abraham's* descendants (cf. Gen 17:8). This promise is central to the Hexateuch, whose major events revolve around the land: the Hebrew ancestors enter the land; famine later moves them to leave the land and enter Egypt, where their descendants become enslaved—until Moses* intervenes to free them and lead them back to the promised land; when Moses dies without having achieved his goal, Joshua becomes his successor and leads the conquest of Canaan. Israel's foundational narrative then is largely about the land, which is given to Abraham's offspring by divine authority—it belongs to God (Lev 25:23; Josh 22:19)—and for the obtaining of which God works many miracles.

1.2. The Land in Eschatology. In the OT prophets there are not only predictions of doom against the land (as in Jer 6:8; 25:38; Joel 2:3) but also many prophecies of its restoration (Is 2:2-4; Amos 9:11-15; etc.). In later times such prophecies were read as properly eschatological: a regathered Israel will forever live in a renewed land. As Psalms of Solomon 17:28 puts it, in the latter days God will distribute the tribes of Israel "upon the land according to their tribes." This belief was widespread.

2. Earliest Christianity.

2.1. The Jesus Tradition. There is surprisingly little about the land in the sayings attributed to Jesus. Matthew 5:5 does refer to inheriting the land (gēn; cf. Ps 36:11 LXX), and Matthew 8:11 par. Luke 13:29 may presuppose that Jerusalem or Palestine is the goal of the eschatological pilgrimage of either Gentiles* (so most interpreters) or (more likely) diaspora Jews. But Matthew 19:28 speaks of a "new world" (palingenesia) in which the Twelve will rule over the twelve tribes; and while this could refer to a literal messianic kingdom centered in Israel, it more probably refers to a new or renewed earth. This raises the possibility that for Jesus, as already for some Jews, restoration to the land had become a symbol of some transhistorical reality (cf. m. Sanh. 10:1 and b. Sanh. 110b, where inheriting the land is equated with life in the world to come). In any case the paucity of material shows that Jesus neither offered details on future cosmological states nor spoke much about the land.

2.2. The Primitive Community. It is plausible that some of Jesus' Galilean followers remained in Jerusalem*—the quintessence of the land—in part because they thought it would be the center of eschatological events; that is, they hoped that the Messiah would return to the Mount of Olives and establish in the capital an earthly kingdom. According to Acts 1:6, some wondered whether Jesus might not "restore the kingdom to Israel" in the near future; and Acts 1:11 has been taken to mean that when Jesus returns from heaven for his Second Coming he will descend to the Mount of Olives.

3. Acts of the Apostles.

In Luke-Acts, which retells the story of God's promise of the land to Abraham (Acts 7:2-8), a mystique surrounds the land and its capital. Jesus' story begins and ends in the holy city (Lk

1—2; 24); the church has its birth there (Acts 1—9); and even the apostle to the Gentiles feels bound to return to Israel (Acts 20—23). There is also, however, simultaneously a demoting of Jerusalem (and so necessarily the land): the capital rejects Jesus and the prophets (Acts 7:52). Especially noteworthy is Stephen's* speech in Acts 7. It implicitly rejects the sort of territorial theology later found in rabbinic sources such as Mekilta on Exodus 12:1, where divine revelation given outside Israel is a stumbling block. According to Stephen, God revealed himself to Abraham not in Israel but in Mesopotamia (Acts 7:2); Joseph received divine assistance when he was outside the land (Acts 7:9-10); Israel's deliverer, Moses, was raised in a foreign court, spent years in Midian, and stood on "holy ground" outside Israel (Acts 7:20-43); the exile to Babylon was God's will (Acts 7:43); and the Jerusalem temple does not contain God, whose throne is heaven, whose footstool is earth (Acts 7:44-50). There appears to be in all this an emphasis upon God's extra-territorial activity—an emphasis consistent with a book which tells of God's Spirit falling upon people regardless of their location or ethnic identity. Still, Acts contains very little explicit teaching, positive or negative, on the land of Israel. As in the Gospels, the land is a vital presence whose significance is assumed rather than discussed; and it is overshadowed by other things.

4. Revelation.

The Apocalypse not only seems to assume that certain eschatological events will take place in the land of Israel (Rev 11:1-13; 14:1), it also may teach a millennial kingdom (see Millennium): Jesus will return and reign for a thousand years (Rev 20:1-10). But if so, nothing is said about the territorial aspects of that kingdom. (Contrast Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 80: the saints will live a thousand years in Jerusalem.) We do not, for instance, read that it is to be centered in Jerusalem or located in Palestine (cf. Papias in Irenaeus Adv. haer. 5.33.3; there too the dramatic fertility of the earth during the messianic kingdom is not localized). Perhaps the location of events in Palestine is assumed by the text, but there is certainly no plain statement to that effect. Once more, then, we see that despite the influence of Jewish eschatological expectation there is no focus upon the land as such. This is characteristic of early Christianity in general.

5. Conclusion.

There is a dearth of explicit reflection upon the Jewish doctrine of the land in Acts and other early Christian writings. The silence is surprising given the large amount of reflection on the other central symbols of Jewish theology—the one God who acts in history, the Torah, the people of God. Whatever be the explanation for this—lack of interest on the part of the Jesus tradition, a similar lack of concern among Gentiles, religious experience outside the land, the spiritualization of territory (already attested in Jewish sources: Philo and T. Job 33:5-7)—the theological point is clear: holy space is where Jesus Christ is (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2); and because as risen Lord he is free to move where he wills, there can be no sacred as opposed to profane territory, no genuine "holy land." Christ's ubiquity as a spiritual presence universalizes the notion of holy space and so inescapably relativizes the sanctity and significance of the land promised to Abraham's descendants.

See also ABRAHAM; CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM; CREATION, COSMOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; MILLENNIUM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brueggemann, The Land (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine (Berkeley: University of California, 1974); idem, The Territorial Dimension of Judaism (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991).

D. C. Allison Jr.

LAST DAYS. See ESCHATOLOGY.

LAW

The relationship between Christians and the Mosaic Torah was one of the most disputed and complex issues in the early church.* The law* comes to the forefront in the Pauline writings (see DPL, Law) and receives considerable attention in the Synoptics and the Gospel of John (see DJG, Law). In the literature under consideration in this volume, the Mosaic law is not as prominent. For instance, the Mosaic law is not the subject of discussion in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of), 1 and 2 Peter,* Jude* and 3 John (see John, Letters of). In 2 John 4-6 it is treated in a glancing way when the author commends keeping the commandments,* but the relationship of commandments to the Mosaic law here is disputed. More promising, although frustratingly brief and ambiguous, are texts relating to the law in James* and 1 John. The law crops up in Acts* on a number of occasions and is prominent in the letter to the Hebrews.*

1. James
2. 1 John
3. Hebrews
4. Acts of the Apostles
5. Apostolic Fathers

1. James.

James describes the law as "the perfect law of liberty" (Jas 1:25), "the royal law" (Jas 2:8) and "the law of liberty" (Jas 2:12). To what does the word law (nomos) refer here? Scholars have often remarked that James hails from conservative Jewish Christian circles (see Jewish Christianity), and thus one might think that the entire OT law is intended. For instance, the early Christian sect called the Ebionites* demanded the observance of circumcision.* But it is doubtful that the reference is to whole OT law, for James nowhere commands believers to keep any part of the ceremonial law. For instance, he never says anything about circumcision, food laws* and sabbath. And his letter would be a fitting place to address these matters, for he probably corrects a false understanding of Paul's view of justification. So too the letter would be an appropriate place to counter the Pauline teaching on circumcision. His silence on this issue is likely to be an indication that he agreed with Paul that circumcision was unnecessary. Indeed, Acts 15:13-21 and Galatians 2:1-10 confirm that James did not believe circumcision should be required of Gentile* converts. We may conclude then that James 2:10, "For whoever keeps the whole law, but stumbles in one matter, has become guilty of all," does not require adherence to the ceremonial law.

If nomos does not refer to the ceremonial law, to what does James refer? James 2:8-12 is the central text for answering this question. The "royal law" is in accord with the OT command to love one's neighbor as oneself (Lev 19:18). It seems, therefore, that the "royal law" is from the OT. James 2:11 substantiates this interpretation, for there the law is explained in terms of the prohibitions against murder and adultery (Ex 20:13-14; Deut 5:17-18). The "law" in James, therefore, seems to refer to the moral norms of the OT law, and love* is the apex and heart of the law's requirement.

It is also instructive to note that James establishes a connection between "law" (nomos) and "word" (logos) in James 1:21-25. The readers are commanded to "receive the implanted word which is able to save your souls" (Jas 1:21) and to be "doers of the word" and not just hearers of it (Jas 1:22-23). In James 1:25 the doing of the word is explained in other terms, i.e., abiding "in the perfect law of liberty." We conclude that doing the "word" and keeping the "law" are synonymous for James. The idea that the word is "implanted" and "saves" most likely reflects Jeremiah 31:31-34, a passage in which Jeremiah promises that the law will be written on the heart and that people will be enabled to keep God's commands when the new covenant* is fulfilled. This is probably why James says the law is one of "liberty" (Jas 1:25; 2:12), for the implanting of the law indicates God has provided the strength to keep the law and that doing the word is a freeing and liberating experience, not a burden.

The reference to the "word" and the "law" in this text must also be explained in terms of the gospel* of Jesus Christ, for it is this gospel which saves. Many scholars have rightly argued that the letter to James depends on the teaching* of Jesus, especially the Sermon on the Mount (the *Didache also witnesses to the tradition shared by Matthew and James, Did. 1.2-5). The "law of liberty" and "the royal law," therefore, cannot be separated from the message of the gospel and the teaching of Jesus. The moral norms of the OT law and the call to love are realized to their fullest extent in the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth and reflected in the teaching of James. It seems fair to conclude that the OT law is interpreted by James in the light of the Christ event, and it would even be fitting to say that the "law of Christ" is the authoritative standard for believers and that this law contains the moral norms of the OT law.

2. 1 John.

John often emphasizes that believers should keep God's commandments (1 Jn 2:3, 4, 7, 8; 3:22, 23, 24; 4:21; 5:2-3; 2 Jn 4, 5, 6). The content of the commandments is not specified in detail, except the command to love one another and to believe in Jesus as Messiah (1 Jn 3:22-24; 4:21; 5:2; 2 Jn 4-6). The love commandment is presumably what John has in mind when he refers to the "old" command that is "new" in him (1 Jn 2:7-11). Jesus' call to love one another as he has loved the disciples (Jn 13:34-35) is likely the "old" command. John probably calls it old to emphasize that the message he imparts does not deviate from the truth they have always known (cf. 1 Jn 2:18-27). But love has now become a reality because of the coming of Jesus Christ, who has begun to dispel the darkness of the old age by introducing the light of the new age. John seems to be saying that the ability to love one another is a gift of the new age inaugurated by Jesus.

R. E. Brown has remarked that there is a close connection between "word" (logos) and "commandment" (entolē) in Johannine writings. This is borne out by 1 John 2:3-6, where knowing God is described in terms of keeping "his commandments" (1 Jn 2:3-4) and also as "keeping his word" (1 Jn 2:5; cf. 2:7). The "commandments" and the "word" probably hearken back to the "ten words" (Ex 34:28) Moses inscribed upon the stone tablets. Thereby John suggests that those who believe Jesus is the Christ and love their brothers and sisters fulfill the OT law, which is itself summed up in the Ten Commandments. John does not envision keeping the commandments in one's own strength. Those who do so "have been born of God" (1 Jn 5:1), signifying that his seed provides the power.* And "the victory which overcomes the world is our faith" (1 Jn 5:4), indicating that our trust in God's power is the foundation of our obedience.*

3. Hebrews.

The letter to the Hebrews contains an elegant argument for the supersession of the Mosaic law, in particular the obsolescence of the Aaronic priesthood* and the OT sacrifices.* The author's thesis is that Jesus is the Melchizedekean priest predicted in the OT (Ps 110:4). The fact that a new priesthood was anticipated demonstrates that the Aaronic priesthood was not intended to be permanent (Heb 7:11). And if a new priest has arisen, a new law must be enacted, "for when the priesthood is changed, of necessity there is a change of law also" (Heb 7:12).

The inferiority of the old priesthood is impressed upon the reader with a series of stunning contrasts: Aaronic priests served without an oath while Jesus received an oath (Heb 7:21-22); there were many priests in the old order because death prevented them from continuing to serve as priests, but Jesus abides as a priest forever since he always lives to make effective intercession for his people (Heb 7:23-25); Aaronic priests had to offer sacrifices for their own sins* as fallible and flawed human beings, whereas the sinless Son offered up one effective sacrifice for the sins of all human beings (Heb 7:26-28). Aaronic priests stand daily since their work of atoning for sins is never finished (Heb 10:11), but the Son sits triumphantly at the right hand of God since his one sacrifice was definitive and effective (Heb 10:12-14). Similarly the sacrifice of Jesus is infinitely superior to the sacrifices offered under the old covenant. Animal sacrifices have to be repeated since they do not cleanse the conscience* from sin (Heb 10:1-2, 11), but Christ through one sacrifice has cleansed the conscience from sin forever (Heb 9:25-28; 10:12-14). Animals are brute victims whose blood is spilled, but they have no conception of the significance of their sacrifice (Heb 10:3-4); the Son as a human being offered himself voluntarily for the salvation* of others (Heb 10:5-10).

When the author refers to the "weakness and uselessness" of the "former commandment" (Heb 7:18) and claims that "the law made nothing perfect," he is reflecting on its inability to effect forgiveness of sins and to bring believers into God's* presence. This is evident in Hebrews 7:19, for the work of Christ on the cross* was effective because through it "we draw near to God." It is here that the author finds fault with the old covenant; it could not accomplish forgiveness* of sins (Heb 8:7-13; 10:16-18). The very promise that a new covenant would commence signals that the old is inadequate and doomed to obsolescence.

The author of Hebrews does not deny the historical validity of the old covenant, nor does he allegorize the laws of the OT so that they are robbed of their literal meaning, nor does he dismiss OT practices as absurd and irrational (see the discussion in 5 below by way of contrast). He has a sense of salvation history that is remarkably lacking in the *Epistle of Barnabas and the Epistle to Diognetus. The OT priesthood, sacrifices and covenant are inferior to the new covenant according to Hebrews, but they played a positive role in redemptive history. The priests, sacrifices and tabernacle (Heb 8:1—9:28) functioned as types or patterns of the work of Christ. The content of OT revelation* is not denigrated as in Barnabas but is ascribed a particular place in the history of salvation. OT sacrifices and priests played a proper role in their era, pointing to the fulfillment that would be enacted when the true priest and sacrifice arrived. Now that the fulfillment of the old covenant has arrived returning to the old way deserves judgment, but the old way was instituted by God himself as a prelude and pointer to the salvation to come. For instance, the entrance into the land under Joshua anticipates the heavenly rest available for God's people (Heb 3:7—4:13). Similarly, resting on the sabbath anticipates the eschatological* sabbath rest (Heb 4:3-11).

4. Acts of the Apostles.

The Lukan view of the law may be discerned from both Luke's Gospel and Acts, but here we shall confine ourselves to Acts (see DJG, Law, for a discussion of the Gospel of Luke). The Lukan theology of the law is a matter of debate. For instance, J. Jervell thinks that Luke's view is the most conservative in the NT, while S. G. Wilson argues that Luke is ambiguous on the question. One can understand why Luke would be designated as conservative, for the church in Acts seems to abide by the Torah. They worship* in the temple (Acts 3:1-10), the charge that Stephen violates the law is false (Acts 6:11-14), and Stephen says the law contains "living words" (Acts 7:38; cf. Acts 7:53). Paul is portrayed as a law-abiding Jew: he accepts the apostolic decree (Acts 15:22-29), circumcises Timothy (Acts 16:3), takes a Nazirite vow (Acts 21:21-26; cf. 18:18) and insists that he has never transgressed the law (Acts 24:14-16; 25:8; 28:17).

C. L. Blomberg and M. A. Seifrid (see also Turner) have convincingly argued that the most satisfying perspective from which to understand Luke's theology of the law is salvation history. The OT prophecies are fulfilled in the ministry, death and resurrection of Jesus (Acts 2:16-36; 3:11-26; 4:11; 8:32-35; 13:16-41; 15:13-21; 24:13-14; 26:22-23, 27; see Death of Christ). The Mosaic law was provisional but has been displaced now that the fulfillment of the law has come, Jesus the Messiah. Thus Paul proclaims in Acts 13:38-39 that forgiveness and justification are now available through Jesus Christ and that the law of Moses did not provide forgiveness or justification. Similarly in Acts 15:10-11 Peter argues that the law was a yoke that the Jews could not bear. J. Nolland has rightly argued that the intention of the verse is not to say that the Mosaic law is an oppressive burden. Instead the purpose is to say that no one could keep the law. Thus Peter concludes in Acts 15:11 that salvation is through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ rather than through the Mosaic law.

The salvation-historical dimension of the law is also apparent in Acts 10:1—11:18 and Acts 15:1-29. In the former text Peter is enjoined in a vision* to eat unclean foods. Peter is puzzled as to why he is commanded to violate the OT law that specifically prohibits consuming the foods that were represented in the vision (Lev 11:1-45; Deut 14:3-21), but the rationale for the vision dawns upon him as the story unfolds. Immediately after this ecstatic experience he was summoned to the house of Cornelius.* As Gentiles Cornelius and his friends were considered to be "unclean," and thus Jews could eat with them only if purity laws were observed. While Peter was explaining the gospel of Jesus Christ, God poured out his Spirit (see Holy Spirit) upon Cornelius and his friends to indicate that Gentiles could be part of the people of God without the imposition of the Mosaic law.

The relationship of Jews and Gentiles in the church came to a head in the apostolic council of Acts 15. The successful missionary tour of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13—14) led to an influx of Gentiles into the church. Some Jewish Christians from the pharisaic wing of the church were concerned that the OT law and the distinctive place of the Jews were being abandoned since Gentiles were streaming into the church without being circumcised. They argued that circumcision was necessary for salvation (Acts 15:1, 5). A meeting of the church was called in Jerusalem* to discuss this matter, and it was determined that Gentiles could be members of the church without being circumcised. The gift of the Holy Spirit to Cornelius and his friends played a decisive role in the debate (Acts 15:7-11), for if God gave the Spirit apart from circumcision, then it must not be required for entrance into the church. James argued that the OT Sriptures themselves anticipated the inclusion of Gentiles apart from the imposition of the law (Acts 15:13-21). Both Acts 10:1—11:18 and Acts 15:1-29 demonstrate that Luke should hardly be characterized as the most conservative writer in the NT with reference to the law, for the OT law required circumcision and the observance of food laws. Luke sees these as passé now that the fulfillment of the OT law has arrived and the promise to Abraham* that all nations should be blessed is becoming a reality.

The addition of the four requirements of the apostolic decree (see DPL, Jerusalem §4.2.3), namely, abstention from immorality (porneia; see Purity), blood, food contaminated by idols, and that which was strangled, seems puzzling. Has Luke introduced other requirements of the law after circumcision has been dismissed as necessary? The complexity of the apostolic decree warrants more discussion than is possible here, but these four requirements were probably retained as a means of facilitating fellowship* between Jews and Gentiles. The church emphatically rejected the notion that Gentiles must observe the law (i.e., circumcision) in order to obtain salvation, but they were not opposed to the temporary observance of parts of the law as a way of preserving fellowship between Jews and Gentiles. Jewish sensibilities received some consideration at the apostolic council, while the idea that circumcision should be required for salvation was rejected.

It is probable that not all Jewish Christians concurred with or abided by the decision of the council (see Jewish Christianity). This seems confirmed by second-century evidence, for the Jewish Christian sect called the Ebionites* (lit. "the poor") demanded the observance of the OT law and circumcision. Most of our information about the Ebionites derives from the early church fathers, but the sources are fragmentary and thus our understanding of Ebionism is partial and cannot be harmonized into a coherent unity. They rejected Paul's view of the law. Most Ebionites denied the Virgin Birth and all seem to have rejected the preexistence* of Christ. Scholars debate whether the Pseudo-Clementines derive from the Ebionites, especially the Kerygmata Petrou (Sermons of Peter). Certainty eludes us since the literary history and composition of the Clementine literature are complex. One interesting feature is that the Pauline view of the law is fiercely rejected by Peter in this literature. The Pseudo-Clementines may also reflect in places the views of the sect called the Elkesaites, for the latter required circumcision and sabbath observance, although they rejected OT sacrifices. Some scholars have suggested that the Ebionites are derived from the Elkesaites, but again this is hypothetical and cannot be established. The relationship of the Ebionites to the Gospel of the Nazoraeans has also been intensely studied, but unfortunately no firm conclusions may be drawn.

The law-abiding Paul of Acts has stimulated much discussion. Many scholars contend that the circumcision of Timothy by Paul (Acts 16:3) and his taking of a Nazirite vow (Acts 21:21-26) are historically incredible and betray Lukan theology rather than Pauline history. Several things should be said briefly in response to this. Lukan history and theology need not and should not be pitted against each other. Modern scholarship rightly stresses that Luke is a theologian, but theology and history are not mutually exclusive. Nor are the Pauline accommodations to the law in Acts foreign to the spirit of the Pauline letters. 1 Corinthians 9:19-23 indicates that Paul adopted a flexible stance on the law in order to advance his mission. Paul invariably resisted the imposition of the law on Gentiles for salvation, but he was not averse to some observance of the law by Gentiles to accommodate Jewish culture. The narrative of Acts 15—16 underscores this very point: circumcision is not required to be part of the people of God, yet Paul accedes to the circumcision of Timothy (Acts 16:3) in order to advance his mission.

5. Apostolic Fathers.

The writer of the Epistle of Barnabas moves in the direction of Marcion,* although he does not dispense with the OT as Marcion did. He not only argues that the "new law" of Jesus Christ is in force (Barn. 2.6) but also strenuously argues against submission to the Mosaic law (Barn. 3.6) by suggesting that the Mosaic covenant was flawed from the outset. He declares that God did not even command the sacrifices enjoined in the OT (Barn. 2.4-10). Food laws, circumcision, the sabbath and the temple* are stripped of their literal meaning even in the OT and are understood to refer to spiritual realities: the food laws are understood to refer to moral commands, circumcision is spiritual and anticipates the cross of Christ, the sabbath anticipates the eschatological rest that is celebrated in advance on the Lord's day, and the church is the Lord's true temple (Barn. 9.1—10.12; 15.1—16.10). The writer of Barnabas apparently expected the Jews to understand that the OT law from its inception pointed to Christ and rebuked them for observing the law literally. Indeed, the covenant with the Jews was abolished from the time that Moses broke the tablets (Barn. 4.6-8; 14.1-4). The author also suggests (Barn. 9.4) that physical circumcision was instituted at the behest of an evil angel,* criticizes the Jews because they understood the food laws literally (Barn. 10.9) and contends that the temple was never a special place for God's residence (Barn. 16.1).

Another instructive comparison is with the Epistle to Diognetus. The author rejects circumcision, fasting, sabbath, food laws and the observance of days because these things are ridiculous and irrational (Diogn. 4.1-6). OT sacrifices are virtually equivalent to idolatrous offerings since they imply God needed our offerings (Diogn. 3.1-5; see Idolatry).

Interestingly Ignatius* in The Letter to the Magnesians 9.1 says Christians should observe the Lord's day (called the eighth day in memory of the resurrection*) rather than the sabbath. No sustained explanation for this exhortation is supplied, but elsewhere Ignatius categorically rejects Judaism* because it is not according to grace* and it deters one from centering on Christ (Ign. Phld. 6.1; Ign. Magn. 8.1; 10.2-3). Ignatius's critique of Judaism is frustratingly brief, and further details are lacking to supplement the picture. His fundamental objection appears to be that devotion to Judaism detracts from Jesus Christ. We have already noted that the new law of Jesus Christ is authoritative for Barnabas (Barn. 2.6). The *Shepherd of Hermas does not provide a treatise on the law, but he does define God's law as the gospel of his Son that is proclaimed throughout the world (Herm. Sim. 69.2).

See also CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; CIRCUMCISION; COMMANDMENTS; FOOD, FOOD LAWS, TABLE FELLOWSHIP; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY; OLD TESTAMENT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Attridge, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); C. L. Blomberg, "The Law in Luke-Acts," JSNT 22 (1984) 53-80; R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); H. Frankemölle, "Gesetz im Jakobusbrief. Zur Tradition, kontextuellen Verwendung und Rezeption eines belaseten Begriffes" in Das Gesetz im Neuen Testament, ed. K. Kertelge (QD 108; Freiburg: Herder, 1986) 175-221; C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (WUNT 49; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1988); M. Hengel, "Der Jakobusbrief als antipaulinische Polemik" in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament: Essays in Honor of E. E. Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne and O. Betz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987) 248-65; J. Jervell, Luke and the People of God: A New Look at Luke-Acts (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1972); L. T. Johnson, "The Use of Leviticus 19 in the Letter of James," JBL 101 (1982) 391-401; M. Klinghardt, Gesetz und Volk Gottes (WUNT 32; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1988); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); D. J. Moo, The Letter of James (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); J. Nolland, "A Fresh Look at Acts 15:10," NTS 27 (1980) 105-15; K. Salo, Luke's Treatment of the Law: A Redaction-Critical Investigation (DHL 57; Helsinki: Annales Academiae Scientiarum Fennicae, 1991); O. F. J. Seitz, "James and the Law," SE 2 (1964) 472-86; M. A. Seifrid, "Jesus and the Law in Acts," JSNT 30 (1987) 39-57; M. M. B. Turner, "The Sabbath, Sunday and the Law in Luke/Acts" in From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical and Theological Investigation, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982) 100-157; S. G. Wilson, Luke and the Law (SNTSMS 50; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983).

T. R. Schreiner

LAWLESSNESS. See OBEDIENCE AND LAWLESSNESS.

LETTER OF PETER TO PHILIP. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS.

LETTER, LETTER FORM

The early church relied upon the letter because of the necessity of communicating important matters of the gospel and the Christian community over long distances. There were several factors peculiar to the early church that influenced how these letters were written. Among many others, these factors included the understanding of relationships among Christians in terms of family ties, the unique authority of apostles and their successors, the desire persuasively to present the gospel and its consequences for practical living and the influence of liturgical language. Early Christian letter writers, whose works are found both within and without the NT, adapted the epistolary and rhetorical forms of the Greco-Roman world to create sophisticated, literary creations.

1. Classification of Early Christian Letters
2. The Form of Early Christian Letters
3. The Letter Form of Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation
4. The Letter Form of the Works of the Apostolic Fathers

1. Classification of Early Christian Letters. Earlier in the twentieth century Adolf Deissmann made the questionable distinction between nonliterary or documentary letters (situational, private) and literary epistles (for posterity, public, rhetorically sophisticated), a distinction that persists. He classified the letters of the NT as documentary, but rhetorical analysis of NT letters has demonstrated that they fall between his categories, being situational yet possessing rhetorical sophistication.

Ancient letters are of various types, depending on the contexts from which they arose and the purposes they served. The relationships of friendship, family and client-patron generated the bulk of ancient letters. Ancient epistolary handbooks classify letters into their many types, including friendship, family, praise and blame, and exhortation and advice. These are ideal types that can be elaborated and mixed with other types.

Ancient letters contemporary with those of the NT were influenced by rhetorical conventions. These letters can be classified according to the three species of rhetoric*: judicial (accusation and defense), deliberative (persuasion and dissuasion) and epideictic (praise and blame). For example, accusing and apologetic letters are judicial, letters of advice and exhortation are deliberative, and letters of recommendation and praise are epideictic.

The more early Christian letters are compared with literary letters rather than with documentary letters (as has been the case in the past) the more their rhetorical sophistication is noted. Early Christian letters exhibit patterns of argumentation and arrangement as well as many stylistic features of Greco-Roman rhetorical convention used in literary letters. Rhetorical analysis has been helpful in determining the structure of the elusive body of the letter, which was least bound by letter conventions.

Early Christian letters generally are a mix of the ideal types of letters and rhetorical classifications and often are not adequately classified with any one letter type or rhetorical species. Hebrews* and the General Epistles are usually classified as letters of exhortation and advice, but they show characteristics of other letter types as well. They have been classified in part or whole according to all three species of rhetoric. Determination of letter and rhetorical classification are interdependent, since letters were influenced by rhetorical conventions at various points.

2. The Form of Early Christian Letters. Christian letters followed the conventions of Greek letters with some modifications attributable to Christian experience. Greek letters, especially the opening and closing, are governed by convention. They begin with the letter opening, or prescript, composed of this formula: sender (superscriptio) to recipient (adscriptio), greetings (salutatio). Christian letters typically expand the prescript by describing the sender and recipient in relation to God (e.g., "apostle," "chosen by God"). The Greek letter greeting uses a verb of greeting (chairō) and a wish for the recipient's health (hygiainō), but in Christian letters these become "grace" (charis) and "peace" (eirēnē) respectively, often presented in the form of a benediction ("may grace and peace be yours").

The Greek letter greeting is usually followed by the sender's wish for the health of the recipient (hygianō), an expression of joy* at the receipt of the letter from the recipients (chairō), a thanksgiving for good health and deliverance from disaster (eucharisteō, "to rejoice"), a report of a prayer* for the addressees (proskynēma) and/or a mention that the sender remembers the recipients (mneia). In Christian letters these are often subsumed into the thanksgiving or a benediction, which introduces the key topics of the letter.

The body of Greek and Christian letters has three parts: the body-opening, body-middle and body-closing. The body-opening establishes the common ground between the sender and recipient by alluding to shared information or by disclosing new information. It provides the principal occasion or purpose of the letter that prompts the sender to write and introduces the main points the letter will develop. The purpose of the letter can be expressed in one of three ways: (1) a full disclosure formula giving the sender's wish or command that the recipients know something ("I want you to know that"), consisting of a verb of disclosure (thelō, boulomai) and a verb of knowing (ginōskō), (2) a motivation for writing (graphō) or (3) a petition that the audience take some course of action, composed of a verb of petition (parakaleō, erōtaō and the reason for the petition.

The body-middle both develops the subject(s) introduced in the body-opening and introduces new material. It often begins with a disclosure formula that conveys that the sender desires or commands that the recipients know something. The body-closing accentuates and reiterates the principal motivation for writing and establishes bridges to further communication. It often begins with the imperative form of the disclosure formula using the verb ginōskō ("to know") followed by responsibility statements urging the recipients to be attentive to the content of the letter and to respond as desired. It may notify the recipients of the sender's intention to visit, which is motivated by a desire to talk face to face rather than to use pen and ink. It may also contain recommendation of a third party who will deliver the letter.

The letter closing or postscript maintains contact between sender and recipient and enhances their friendship. This is accomplished by using greetings (aspazomai), a health wish and/or words of farewell. In Christian letters a doxology or benediction (see Liturgical Elements) can replace the last two.

3. The Letter Form of Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation.

The degree to which the books of Hebrews, the General Epistles and Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) conform to the conventions of the Greek and early Christian letter forms varies according to purpose and associated genres.

3.1. Hebrews. Hebrews has been identified as a Jewish-Hellenistic and early Christian homily or sermon influenced by classical rhetoric. More recently it has been classified as a written speech of encomium. It does not conform to the letter form; it does not even possess a formal letter prescript. It does have a postscript incorporating a benediction (Heb 13:20-21), a formal petition functioning as a responsibility statement (parakaleō, Heb 13:22), an announcement of the sender's plan to visit (Heb 13:23), greetings from the sender and secondary greetings from those with him (aspazomai, Heb 13:24) and a second benediction (Heb 13:25). The appeal to obey the exhortation given (Heb 13:22) indicates that seeking such obedience* was the main reason for writing.

3.2. James. James* is protreptic literature in letter form. It tries to persuade the recipients to live a particular life of virtue.* It begins with a prescript that includes sender, recipients and greeting (chairō, Jas 1:1). The prescript indicates that James is a circular letter meant to be distributed to numerous churches ("twelve tribes of the Dispersion"). James does not exhibit a clear body-opening, middle or closing, nor does it have a postscript. However, James 1:2-27 acts like a body-opening in introducing topics that are developed in James 2:1—5:12, and James 5:13-20 acts like a body-closing in recapitulating some of those same topics. Also included in its letter form are diatribal elements (dialogue and question and answer in pursuit of truth*), paraenesis (moral instruction) and three examples of a complete elaboration of an argument according to Greco-Roman rhetoric (Jas 2:1-13; 2:14-26; 3:1-12).

3.3. 1 Peter. 1 Peter* conforms only partially to the ancient letter form. It begins with a prescript (1 Pet 1:1-2) containing a reference to the sender (Peter) and the recipients (exiles of the Diaspora*), each with a theological description (1 Pet 1:1-2), and a greeting in the form of a benediction (1 Pet 1:2). The prescript is followed by a benediction substituting for the health wish or thanksgiving (1 Pet 1:3-9). The body of the letter (1 Pet 1:13—5:12) is not easily divided into body-opening, middle and closing. The body-opening begins with a petition in the form of a command to "set all your hope on the grace that Jesus Christ will bring you when he is revealed" (1 Pet 1:13). An imperatival petition often begins the body-opening. It gives the sender's main reason for writing which the body of the letter will elaborate. The body-closing contains a motivation-for-writing formula and a responsibility statement which echoes the petition which begins the body-opening: "Stand fast in it [the true grace of God]" (1 Pet 5:12). The postscript (1 Pet 5:13-14) is comprised of greetings from a third party and the sender (aspazomai; 1 Pet 5:13-14) and a benediction (1 Pet 5:14).

First Peter has been identified as a diaspora letter modeled on those in the OT sent from Jews in Jerusalem* to those in exile (cf. 1 Pet

1:1), but the diaspora letter is not a specific genre. 1 Peter is better identified as a circular letter sent to several congregations. Among other traditional materials, it incorporates a household code* that describes the role of members of the household* in relation to one another (1 Pet 2:18—3:7). Although it has been surmised that a catechism or a baptismal* liturgy underlies the body of the letter, these features can be attributed to shared early Christian tradition.

3.4. 2 Peter. In a Jewish or Christian farewell speech or testament a dying community leader announces his death and exhorts the community to be faithful to its traditions after his death. The sender of 2 Peter* creates the unusual combination of a testament in letter form. This allows the sender in the postapostolic era to portray the apostle Peter as communicating over time to the recipients.

2 Peter begins with the typical prescript referring to sender and recipients and a benediction (2 Pet 1:1-2). The letter prescript is followed by elements borrowed from the testament genre: the rehearsal of the traditions central to the community (2 Pet 1:3-11) and an announcement of Peter's death (2 Pet 1:12-15). This announcement functions as the body-opening of the letter (2 Pet 1:12-15). Reminding the recipients of the traditional teachings works like a full disclosure formula ("I wish you to know that") and a motivation for writing. The body-middle of 2 Peter (2 Pet 1:16—3:13) develops the motif of the coming of false teachers, so common to a testament, by refuting their main doctrines (see Adversaries). The body-closing (2 Pet 3:14-18) is indicated by the vocative beloved and a responsibility statement (2 Pet 3:14). A doxology serves as the postscript (2 Pet 3:18).

3.5. 1 John. 1 John (see John, Letters of) does not exhibit the typical letter opening conventions needed to classify a document as a letter. The opening (1 Jn 1:1-4) is modeled on the prologue of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1:1-18) and introduces topics to be developed in the remainder of the work. The closing of 1 John 5:13-21 reiterates main topics but does not contain letter closing conventions. The reason for writing (1 Jn 1:4, 5:13) is the only true letter convention to be noted.

3.6. 2 John. In contrast to 1 John, 2 John conforms to letter conventions. It begins with a prescript (2 Jn 1-3) referring to the sender (the elder) and the recipients (the elect lady), accompanied by theological description of the latter (2 Jn 1-2). A benediction replaces the greeting (2 Jn 3). Although it is not formally a thanksgiving, 2 John 4 functions as one as it rejoices in the recipient's welfare. The body-opening (2 Jn 4-5) begins with an expression of joy (echarēn lian), alludes to subject matter shared by both parties so as to provide a common basis for matters of the letter body (the commandment*) and presents a petition. The petition is standard: 2 John 4 providing the background ("walking in the truth") and 2 John 5 providing the petition itself (erōtaō, "Let us love one another"; i.e., to continue to walk in the truth).

The body-middle (2 Jn 6-11) develops the concerns presented in the body-opening and introduces other concerns of equal importance. It is indicated by the presence of responsibility statements (2 Jn 8, 10) and the concluding short paraenetic section common to Christian letters (2 Jn 11). The body-closing (2 Jn 12) reiterates and accentuates what has been said. It presents the motivation for writing ("much to write"), forms a bridge to further communication and notifies the recipients of the sender's coming visit to discuss further issues. The letter closing sends traditional greetings from a third party (aspazomai, 2 Jn 13).

3.7. 3 John. 3 John also follows letter conventions. The prescript refers to sender (the elder) and recipient (Gaius) but lacks the typical greeting (3 Jn 1). Although 3 John 2 contains a conventional health wish (hygianō) within a report of a prayer for the recipients, both of which are typical of the prescript, the initial vocative, beloved, of 3 John 2 marks the transition to the body-opening (3 Jn 2-6). The body-opening contains an expression of joy over the welfare of the recipient (echarēn lian, 3 Jn 3-4) and a petition that expresses its purpose (3 Jn 5-6). The petition contains the petition proper ("you will do well," kalōs poiēseis, 3 Jn 6) and its background, beginning with the formula "you do faithfully" (piston poiēseis, 3 Jn 5-6), a variation of "you will do well" (kalōs poiēseis). The body-middle (3 Jn 7-12) contains responsibility statements (3 Jn 8, 11) and a recommendation of a third party carrying the letter (Demetrius, 3 Jn 12). The body-closing (3 Jn 13-14) presents a reference to writing and notifies the recipients of the sender's upcoming visit, techniques that enable the body-closing to form a bridge to further communication. The postscript consists of a benediction and greetings from the sender and a third party (aspazomai, 3 Jn 15).

3.8. Jude. It has been suggested that Jude* is a homily in letter form or that it incorporates a midrash in Jude 5-19. At least it can be said that elements of these genres have been incorporated into a rhetorically complex letter that tries to prove that the opponents are the ungodly of whom the prophets spoke. Jude begins with a prescript containing reference to sender (Jude) and recipients, described in their relationship to God (Jude 1), and a benediction (Jude 2). The letter body (Jude 3-23) is divided into the body-opening (Jude 3-4), body-middle (Jude 5-16) and body-closing (Jude 17-23), all beginning with the transitional vocative beloved. The body-opening (Jude 3-4) begins with a reference to "the salvation we share," providing the common ground for the letter. It supplies the occasion for the letter as a petition (parakaleō, Jude 3) and its background (Jude 4). The body-middle (Jude 5-16) provides further background for the petition, beginning with a full disclosure formula that employs the idea of wishing (boulomai) the recipients know (oida) something. The body-closing (Jude 17-23) begins with the imperative form of the disclosure formula ("remember," mnēsethēte) and contains many responsibility statements in the form of exhortation. The postscript is a doxology (Jude 24-25).

3.9. Revelation. Revelation can be classified as several genres, including letter, prophecy and apocalyptic.* It exhibits few features of the Greek letter tradition. After a brief prologue (Rev 1:1-3) there is a letter opening referring to sender (John) and recipients (seven churches of Asia) (Rev 1:4), a benediction (Rev 1:4-5) and a doxology (Rev 1:6). After an epilogue (Rev 22:6-20) the letter closes with a benediction (Rev 22:21). The remainder of the book is dominated by the forms of the prophetic and apocalyptic genre.

Mention must be made of the letters to the seven churches in Revelation 2—3. These seven letters each have some forms of ancient letters, including reference to recipients (one of seven churches) and sender (Christ) in the prescript and a reference to knowing (oida), which often begins the body-opening. However, David Aune's careful analysis shows that the seven letters are to be classified as ancient royal or imperial edicts or proclamations, with the mode used being the paraenetic salvation*-judgment* oracles of early Christian prophecy.

4. The Letter Form of the Works of the Apostolic Fathers.

Several works of the apostolic fathers* are genuine letters, one takes on the guise of a letter, and some are not letters at all. Works that are not letters include 2 Clement, a homily or sermon calling itself an appeal (enteuxis, 2 Clem. 19.1); the *Didache, a manual of church instruction; the Shepherd of Hermas, a Christian apocalypse (see Hermas, Shepherd of); and the Epistle to Diognetus, which in spite of its title is an apology for Christianity. Although it is a polemical tractate, the Epistle of Barnabas (see Barnabas, Epistle of) takes on the guise of a letter. The genuine letters of the apostolic fathers are 1 Clement, the seven letters of Ignatius,* the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians and the Martyrdom of Polycarp (see Polycarp). They are modeled after the letters of Paul (cf. Ign. Trall. inscr.) and use other facets of Hellenistic epistolography.

4.1. The Epistle of Barnabas. The letter opening refers to the recipients as "sons and daughters" but does not refer to the sender. A greeting (chairete) and a wish for peace (eirēnē, Barn. 1.1) are followed by an expression of joy concerning the audience (Barn. 1.2-3). The body-opening gives the motivation for writing as perfecting the knowledge* of the recipients (cf. the disclosure formula; Barn. 1.5) followed by the main points to be addressed (Barn. 1.6-8). The body-closing is composed of exhortation (Barn. 21.1-9), a command to remember the sender (mnēmoneuō), a reference to writing, a responsibility statement and a benediction (Barn. 21.7-9).

4.2. 1 Clement. 1 Clement begins with a prescript referring to sender and recipients and their relationship to God and the modified greeting "grace and peace" (charis kai eirēnē) in the form of a benediction. The body begins with an introduction of the occasion of the letter, a schism caused by youth illegimately taking authority from elders (1 Clem. 1—3; see Church Order), followed by an exposition of the nature of the Christian life (1 Clem. 4—39) and proposed solutions for the schism (1 Clem. 40—61). The letter ends with a summary of the letter's contents (1 Clem. 62), a recommendation of the letter bearers and responsibility statements (1 Clem. 63), a benediction and doxology (1 Clem. 64) and a request that the messengers be sent back speedily, as well as a final blessing and doxology (1 Clem. 65).

4.3. The Seven Letters of Ignatius. The seven letters of Ignatius warn of false teachers, uphold the organization of the church (especially the office of bishop) and acknowledge Ignatius's impending death. Like Paul, Ignatius Christianizes the standard opening and closing letter formulae, but he does so in a non-Pauline way. The letters typically begin with a prescript referring to sender and recipient and their relationship to God and an initial greeting (aspazomai and/or pleista chairein, "abundant greeting"). The first chapter usually praises the spiritual life of the recipients in a fashion akin to a joy expression. There are appeals (parakaleō) throughout the body of the letters (e.g., Ign. Trall. 6.1). The letters usually conclude with a call to remember certain churches and Ignatius in prayer* (mnēmoneuō), final greetings from Ignatius and third parties (aspazontai) and a farewell (hrōnnymi).

4.4. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians. the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians begins with a letter prescript, referring to sender and recipients and their relationship to God, and the benediction "mercy and peace . . . be multiplied" (eleos hymin kai eirēnē . . . plēthyntheiē). This is followed by an extended expression of joy concerning the spiritual well-being of the Philippians (Pol. Phil. 1). The body of the letter contains the reason for writing (Pol. Phil. 3.1-3) and closes with a benediction and an exhortation (Pol. Phil. 12.1-3) and a recommendation of the letter carrier (Pol. Phil. 13.1—14.1). A farewell comprises the letter closing (Pol. Phil. 14.1).

4.5. The Martyrdom of Polycarp. The Martyrdom of Polycarp is a letter sent from the church of Smyrna to the church of Philomelium. The letter opening refers to sender and recipient without theological description followed by the benediction "mercy, peace and love . . . be multiplied." The body of the letter opens with the reason for writing—to inform the recipients about the martyrdom of Polycarp (Mart. Pol. 1.1)—and closes with an exhortation to send the letter to others, a doxology and greetings from the church (Mart. Pol. 20.1-2), followed by a date and doxology (Mart. Pol. 21.1).

See also HERMENEUTICS; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; PSEUDEPIGRAPHY; RHETORIC, RHETORICAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. Andresen, "Zum Formular frühchristlicher Gemeindebriefe," ZNW 56 (1965) 233-59; D. E. Aune, "The Form and Function of the Proclamations to the Seven Churches (Revelation 2-3)," NTS 36 (1990) 182-204; K. Berger, "Apostelbrief und apostolische Rede/Zum Formular frühchristlicher Briefe," ZNW 65 (1974) 190-231; R. E. Brown, "Appendix V: General Observations on Epistolary Format" in The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982) 788-95 (deals with 2 and 3 John; see 86-92 on 1 John); J. D. Charles, Literary Strategy in the Epistle of Jude (Scranton: University of Scranton Press, 1993) 20-64; A. Deissmann, Bible Studies (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1901) 3-59; idem, Light from the Ancient East, (New York: Doran, 1927) 146-251; W. G. Doty, Letters in Primitive Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); J. A. du Rand, "Structure and Message of 2 John," Neot 13 (1979) 101-20; idem, "The Structure of 3 John," Neot 13 (1979) 121-31; F. O. Francis, "The Form and Function of the Opening and Closing Paragraphs of James and 1 John," ZNW 61 (1970) 110-26; R. W. Funk, "The Form and Structure of II and III John," JBL 86 (1967) 424-30; J. Lieu, The Second and Third Epistles of John: History and Background, ed. J. Riches (SNTW; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986) 37-51; T. W. Martin, Metaphor and Composition in 1 Peter (SBLDS 131; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992) 41-79; E. Peterson, "Das Praescriptum des 1.Clemens-Briefes" in Pro Regno Pro Sanctuario (Nijkerk: G.F. Callenbach, 1950) 351-57; X. Roiron, "Les plus anciens prologues épistolaires chrétiens," RSR (1913) 382-96; F. Schnider and W. Stenger, Studien zum neutestamentlichen Briefformular (NTTS 11; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1987); H. J. Sieben, "Die Ignatianen als Briefe: Einige formkritische Bermerkungen," VC 32 (1978) 1-18; S. K. Stowers, Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (LEC 5; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); L. Thurén, The Rhetorical Strategy of 1 Peter: With Special Regard to Ambiguous Expressions (Åbo: Åbo Academy Press, 1990) 84-88; D. F. Watson, Invention, Arrangement, and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS 104; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988) passim; idem, "A Rhetorical Analysis of 2 John According to Greco-Roman Convention," NTS 35 (1989) 104-30; idem, "A Rhetorical Analysis of 3 John: A Study in Epistolary Rhetoric," CBQ 51 (1989) 479-501; J. L. White, "Ancient Greek Letters" in Greco-Roman Literature and the New Testament, ed. D. E. Aune (SBLSBS 21; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988) 85-105; idem, The Body of the Greek Letter (SBLDS 2; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1972); idem, Light from Ancient Letters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, "New Testament Epistolary Literature in the Framework of Ancient Epistolography," ANRW 2.25.2 (1984) 1730-56; idem, "Saint Paul and the Apostolic Letter Tradition," CBQ 45 (1983) 433-44.

D. F. Watson

LIBERTY. See FREEDOM, LIBERTY.

LIFE AND DEATH

God* is the "living God" (Heb 3:12) and the Creator, and thus he has the power to give life. Human beings live or die at God's sufferance, and they may be divided into "the living and dead" (Acts 10:42; 1 Pet 4:5; 2 Clem. 1.1; Barn. 7.2).

1. Background
2. Acts
3. Hebrews and General Epistles
4. Revelation
5. Later Developments

1. Background.

1.1. Terminology. The words for life are mainly cognates of zōē, while death is expressed by nekros or thanatos and their cognates. Also psychē at times means "living person" or "life" (1 Pet 3:20; 1 Jn 3:16). Bios means "life" in the apostolic fathers*; its cognate verb bioō ("to live") occurs in the scope of our canonical literature only in 1 Peter 4:2.

1.2. Concepts. The world of the early church offered a variety of opinions on the nature of life and death. The Epicureans thought that human existence begins at birth and ends at death, while the Platonists thought of life as the soul's temporary sojourn in a mortal body.

Christians countered that God gives life to human beings, and life consists of body and soul. Death came only as a consequence of sin. While human existence is possible out of the body, God's plan for humanity is the rolling back and defeat of death in resurrection.*

2. Acts.

The church testified to the Gentiles* that the one true God lives and that other deities do not (Acts 14:15). Paul adapted a remark by the Stoic poet Aratus (Phaen. 5), claiming that in the one true God "we live and move and exist" (Acts 17:28).

Central to the apostolic kerygma are the death and resurrection of Christ* (Acts 2:23-24, etc.; see Death of Christ). The resurrected Jesus is the "originator" or "prince" of life (Acts 3:15). Through the apostles* he even restored life to Tabitha and to Eutyches (Acts 9:40-41; 20:10).

People may forfeit their lives because of flagrant sin (Acts 1:16-18; 5:5, 10; 12:23). In Acts,* however, many more people presumably die or risk death for the sake of their faith* than for any other cause (Acts 5:33; 7:57—8:1; 9:1). Still the Christian experience is properly labeled "life" (Acts 5:20).

3. Hebrews and General Epistles.

3.1. Hebrews. Despite his own revulsion at what was to come (Heb 5:7), Jesus died to free humanity from the numbing terror of death (Heb 2:15) and to destroy the devil (see Satan), who held the power of death (Heb 2:14). The new covenant* could not be activated until the death of the testator (Heb 9:16-17). God raised Jesus and made him the living high priest* for all time (Heb 7:3, 16, 20, 23-25).

Christians likewise must persist even to the point of death (Heb 11:13). They will be resurrected, but in the meantime their spirits will go to be with Christ in heaven* (Heb 12:22).

3.2. James. Death is the result of sin, not nature (Jas 1:15; 5:20). It will cut short all human plans (Jas 1:11; 4:14-15), but those who persevere with God will receive the "crown of life" (Jas 1:12; cf. 1 Pet 5:4; Rev 2:10; Mart. Pol. 17.1; 19.2; 2 Clem. 20.2).

If a person professes faith and does not display it with loving actions, that faith is "dead," just like a body without a spirit (Jas 2:17, 26; cf. 2 Pet 1:14; Diogn. 6.3, 8). James's* interest here is illustration, not explaining the afterlife (Martin, 98).

3.3. 1 Peter. God gives "life" or a "living hope" (1 Pet 1:3; 1:23; 3:7, based on the resurrection of Jesus, 1 Pet 1:21), and the Christians have rejected the old way of life (1 Pet 1:18; 4:2-4). They have died to sin already in order to live to righteousness* (1 Pet 2:24; cf. Michaels, 148-49).

In 1 Peter 4:6 it is said that the gospel was preached "even to the dead" (Michaels, 235-41; Reicke). Perhaps these are the spiritually dead, but it is more natural that they are literally dead, as in 1 Peter 4:5. In that case 1 Peter* may teach to Jesus' descent into the realm of the dead; more likely its reference is to people who were alive when they heard the gospel and are 'now dead' (NIV).

3.4. 2 Peter and Jude. If 1 Peter is about hope in the midst of trial, 2 Peter* and Jude* are about gloom for those apostates* who flourish in this age. Jude 12 calls them the "twice dead," perhaps an allusion to the "second death" of Gehenna (Bauckham, 88). And true Christians must remember that they are equipped to live godly lives in the world (2 Pet 1:3-4).

3.5. Johannine Epistles. Life and death are presented as parallel courses: "We know that we have crossed over from death into life, because we love one another. The one who loves not remains in death" (1 Jn 3:14; Strecker, 202-8; see John, Letters of). Just as Jesus laid down his life for us, so "we should lay down our lives for one another" (1 Jn 3:16). The grasping after satisfaction and glory consisting in mere possessions is the sin of the "pride of life." Rejecting that worldly value, the Christian will live forever (1 Jn 2:15-17).

1 John 5:16-17 mentions a class of sins that lead to death. What constitutes so grievous a sin is not delineated. "Death" may be physical demise (as in 1 Cor 11:30; perhaps Jas 5:20) or damnation (as in Jude 22-23; see Smalley, 297-301).

4. Revelation.

History is driven by the predetermined triumph of Jesus (Rev 1:5) over the beast* who mimics his death and resurrection in order to deceive the world (Rev 13:3). The book (see Revelation, Book of) answers two troubling questions: If Christians are rejected by the world, is their God really in control? And how should Christians react to a government that usurps divine prerogatives? The Christian must decide between acquiescence to the "mark of the beast" and "overcoming" through martyrdom* (Rev 2:10-11; Boring, 21-23). The first resurrection is the hope of all faithful martyrs (Rev 20:4, 6).

Meanwhile, the inhabitants of the earth will be plagued by the pale horse of death and hades (Rev 6:8). Although the slaughter is great, the survivors will envy the dead (Rev 9:6). Still death is not the end for the enemies of God. They will rise in the second resurrection to judgment* (Rev 20:12-13). With all humanity resurrected, death and Hades will also be thrown into the lake of fire (Rev 20:14).

Revelation uses several traditional symbols for life, notably the water of life and the tree of life (Rev 22:1-2) and the book of life (Rev 20:12; cf. Dan 12:1; Jub. 30.22). The "second death" is also known from the Jewish targums and is the counterpart to entering the life to come (Abrahams, 41-49). Philo* likewise speaks of the "undying death" to which God subjects the wicked after they pass through physical death (Philo Praem. Poen. 69-70).

5. Later Developments.

Postapostolic Christians esteemed the Jewish tradition of the Two Ways, so we read: "There are two ways: one of life and another of death, and there is a great difference between the two ways" (Did. 1.1; cf. Barn. 18—20; Herm. Sim. 8.6-11). In Hermas Similitude 9.16.3-5 baptism* is the passing over from life to death.

Christ is the true life of the Christian (2 Clem. 20.5; Ign. Eph. 7.2; Ign. Magn. 9.2; Diogn. 9.6). He has secured the "abolition of death" (Ign. Eph. 19.3). Ignatius* was particularly concerned that the Docetists* were denying the true humanity of Christ and thereby his death and resurrection (Ign. Trall. 9—10; Ign. Magn. 11.1; Ign. Smyrn. 2-7).

The times being what they were, Christians wrote about the proper response to death threats. The faithful should rejoice as if they are being made alive (Ign. Rom. 6.1-3; Diogn. 5.12, 16). Diognetus 10.7 even went as far as remarking that physical death is not really death; eternal death is the menace (Diogn. 1). All true Christians should be prepared to die after the example of Christ (Ign. Magn. 5.1-2). Although Polycarp* had spent eighty-six years serving Christ (Mart. Pol. 9.3), he willingly gave up his life to find immortality in heaven (Mart. Pol. 17.1; 19.2; cf. 2 Clem. 19.4). After the veneration of martyrs became a feature of Christian worship, the date of their death was observed as their "birthday" into heavenly life (the earliest reference is Mart. Pol. 18.2).

2 Clement, which speaks often of "life" and "eternal life," underscored the finality of death: "Thus let us too, while we are in the world, repent with our whole heart of the things that we do in the flesh, so that we may be saved by the Lord, while we have opportunity for repentance. For after we depart from the world, we can no longer make confession nor any longer repent" (2 Clem. 8.2-3; cf. Heb 9:27; see Repentance).

The early Christians generally agreed that the soul is conscious after death, either in torment or in heavenly bliss. It does not transmigrate to another body (Justin Martyr Apol. I 18). The orthodox view ran counter to that of the Gnostics,* who adopted the docetic christology* that had earlier rankled Ignatius. For them death was not a consequence of sin but the result of the creator god's attempt to fuse immortal spirit with mortal flesh. Death was the undoing of that awkward combination, freeing the Gnostic initiate to ascend back to the spirit world. The church understood that this idea rejected not only God's work of creation* but also any gospel based on the death and resurrection of the Logos.*

See also ESCHATOLOGY; HELL, ABYSS, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; MARTYRDOM; MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. I. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels (LBS; 2d series; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1924); R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); M. E. Boring, Revelation (IntC; Louisville, KY: John Knox, 1989); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); B. Reicke, The Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism (Copenhagen: Munksgaard, 1946); W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); G. Strecker, The Johannine Letters (Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996). G. S. Shogren

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

In Jewish thought "light" (Heb 'ôr; Gk phōs) is not merely a philosophical term or a poetical term but rather it "becomes a fundamental religious reality" (Spicq, 3:474-75). In the beginning God* created light (Gen 1:3), and it was deemed "good" (Gen 1:4). Light provides understanding (Ps 119:130) and engenders life (Ps 36:9). "Darkness" (Heb ḥōšeḵ; Gk skotia), comprised of chaos (Gen 1:2) and evil, is the antithesis of God's light (Is 5:20); but merely to juxtapose light and darkness, as if they represent a cosmic dualism, is misleading: darkness is subservient to God, its Creator (Is 45:7). The OT understanding of light and darkness informs the understanding and gives content to the same in the NT and apostolic fathers* (see esp. Achtemeier, 439). Others scholars find significant parallels to the NT (esp. the Johannine) concept of light and darkness in the Corpus Hermeticum, the Mandean Literature and the Dead Sea Scrolls.

1. Imagery of Light and Darkness
2. Light as Epiphany
3. Related Words: "Day" and "Night"
4. Summary

1. Imagery of Light and Darkness.

The third account of Paul's conversion in Acts* (Acts 26:12-18) relates a typically Jewish understanding of light and darkness, and it is this same figurative dichotomy created between light and darkness (i.e., "good" and "evil") that runs through the General Epistles and into the apostolic fathers. In Acts 26:18 the conjunction kai ("and"), when it is epexegetically understood (when it is translated "that is" or "namely"; see BDF, §442.9), equates darkness with the power of Satan* and light with God (Marshall, 396-97; cf. Col 1:12-13).

1.1. Light and Darkness and the Moral Spheres of Good and Evil. Most often in the NT, light and darkness illustrate the moral sphere of good and evil (cf. Lk 11:34-35; Jn 8:12; 12:35, 46); thus in the Johannine epistles (see John, Letters of), those who "walk in darkness" speak lies concerning their fellowship* with God,* whereas those who "walk in light" are cleansed from their sins by the blood of Jesus (1 Jn 1:6-7). Those who "hate their brother or sister" are still "in darkness" (1 Jn 2:9), but those who "love their brother or sister abide in the light" (1 Jn 2:10; see Neufeld, 84-86). Morality counts because God is "light, and in him is no darkness whatsoever" (1 Jn 1:5; cf. 1 Tim 6:15-16; Diogn. 9.6; Justin Apol. I 6). Thus the author of 1 John "is not interested in any metaphysical implications of the idea that God is light, but in its ethical implications" (Dodd, 19). In the *Epistle of Barnabas this moral sphere is represented by the Two Ways, one of light and one of darkness. "The way of light" (Barn. 18.1—19.12; or "the way of righteousness," Barn. 5.4) consists of commands, both positive and negative, whereas

"the way of darkness" (Barn. 18.1; or "the way of the Black One," Barn. 20.1-2), consists essentially of one long vice list (cf. Did. 5; see Virtues).

1.2. Light and the Saints. In the book of Hebrews* and the writings of Ignatius* of Antioch* and Justin Martyr, saints are those who have been "enlightened" or "illumined" (Heb 6:4; 10:32; Ign. Rom. presc.; Justin Dial. Tryph. 122; cf. Justin Dial. Tryph. 7). This enlightenment arguably refers to the catechumenate's moment of baptism* (see esp. Spicq, 3:487, 491, who cites Justin Apol. I 61: "and this washing is called illumination," as well as the v.l. in Acts Thom. 25: ebaptisen/ephōtisen; cf. Conzelmann, 9:355-58). In 1 Peter,* as well as in the thought of Clement of Rome (see Clement of Rome), Christians have been "called out of darkness into God's glorious light" (1 Pet 2:9; 1 Clem. 59.2; cf. Barn. 14.5-7) and have light "graciously given" to them (2 Clem. 1.4; cf. Ps 118:27). Again, in Ignatius, saints are "children of light" (Ign. Phld. 2.1; cf. Jas 1:17); yet in some sense they still await the "pure light" (Ign. Rom. 6.2).

1.3. Darkness and the Sinners. We may note Luke's contrast between Paul and the false prophet, Bar-Jesus (Acts 13:6-12). The latter was blinded not by a light from heaven* but in judgment* was covered by a "mist and darkness" and, unlike Paul, had to search for someone to lead him about by the hand (Acts 13:11; cf. Deut 28:29; 1 Jn 2:11). In 2 Clement darkness and mist is not a punishment for individuals but a preexistent condition in all of humankind (2 Clem. 1.6; cf. Mt 23:16, 24; Lk 6:39; 1 Clem. 36.2; Barn. 8.7; Justin Resurrec. 4). Still, it should be noted, even believers can be darkened in their understanding (2 Clem. 19.2; quoting Eph 4:18). On a broader scale, in Revelation 16:10 darkness is a judgment on the kingdom of the beast* (see also Rev 8:12; 9:2; 18:23; cf. Exod 10:22; Is 8:19-22; Amos 5:18, 20; Zeph 1:15). Ultimately, eternal darkness has been reserved for the wicked (2 Pet 2:17; Jude 13; see Bauckham, 90-91; cf. Mt 8:12; 22:13; 25:30).

1.4. "Proclaiming Light" and "Publishing Darkness." In what appears to be an odd metaphor and one unique to the NT (but see Aeschylus Pers. 300), Paul states that Christ,* specifically in his resurrection,* "proclaims light" to Jews and Gentiles* (Acts 26:23). Perhaps a similar point is made in 2 Timothy 1:10: "Christ Jesus did away with death, bringing immortal life to light via the gospel" (cf. 1 Tim 6.16). In both passages "light" is bound up with resurrection. Likewise Clement of Rome metaphorically links "day" and "night" to resurrection (1 Clem. 24.3). In one instance in the General Epistles, not wholly unrelated to the metaphor in Acts 26:23, the prophetic word is likened to "a lamp shining in a dark place" (2 Pet 1:19; cf. Ps 119:105). In the writings of Justin Martyr, Jews do not proclaim light; rather they relish each opportunity to "publish dark and unjust things against the . . . righteous Light sent by God" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 17).

2. Light as Epiphany.

Six of the ten occurrences of the word light in Acts refer to the intense light that arrested and blinded Paul on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:3; 22:6, 9, 11; 26:13, 18; cf. Mt 17:2). That Luke narrates the events surrounding Paul's conversion in such significant detail and then retells them twice more through Paul, once for the crowds in Jerusalem* (Acts 22:1-21) and once for Agrippa (Acts 26:2-23), demonstrates their significance for his story (see further Haenchen, 327-29). Paul, blinded by the epiphanic light, would later see his ministry* in terms of bringing light to the Gentiles (Acts 13:47; quoting Is 49:6; cf. Barn. 14.8) and thereby "opening blind eyes" (Is 42:7; see esp. Acts 26:18; cf. Barn. 14.7).

3. Related Words: "Day" and "Night."

The related words day (hēmera) and night (nyx) should be discussed. In the literature considered here, the word day serves little purpose more than as a chronological indicator of time (Heb 11:30; Did. 11.5; passim; in contrast see 1 Thess 5:5). Still, several times "day" is coupled with "night" for the sake of intensification and/or symmetry (Acts 9:24; 20:31; Rev 4:8; 7:15; 1 Clem. 2.4; Ign. Rom. 5.1; Did. 4.1; Mart. Pol. 5.1; Justin Dial. Tryph. 1; cf. Lk 2:37; 18:7). On one occasion, however, "day" is used to illustrate the absolute depravity of humankind, who typically prefer darkness to light because their works are wicked (Jn 3:19) but in some cases become so "insatiable for sin" (2 Pet 2:14 RSV) that "they count it a pleasure to revel in the daytime" (2 Pet 2:13 RSV).

The word night not only functions as a chronological indicator of time but also serves a purpose in the following two kinds of scenes. (1) Dramatic escapes by Christians occur at night (Acts 5:19; 9:23-25; 12:6-11; 17:10; 23:23-31; cf. Mt 2:14; but see Mart. Pol. 5.1), as do (2) heavenly visions* (Acts 16:9; 18:9; 23:11; 27:23; Herm. Vis. 2.4.1; 3.1.2; 10.7; cf. Lk 2:8); but note the emphasis laid on Cornelius's* and Peter's respective daytime visions (Acts 10:3, 9, 30).

While even now "darkness continues to pass away and the true light already shines" (1 Jn 2:8), in Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) "night" is finally abolished forever in the heavenly city (Rev 21:25; 22:5; cf. Zech 14:7). Doubtless this is due to night's associations with darkness and evil (Jn 3:19), but more importantly it is abolished because the "glory of God" will be the city's light and the Lamb* its lamp (Rev 21:23; see Glory).

4. Summary.

Light in Acts is normally to be understood literally, regardless of whether it is epiphanic or utilitarian. In the General Epistles and the apostolic fathers it should normally be understood figuratively. Light serves the positive function of dispelling the darkness of the mind and heart. Further, it is emblematic of both godliness and truth. Darkness should normally be understood figuratively; it represents all that is evil and morally corrupt; note also, however, even the literal use of "darkness" (as in Acts 13:11; cf. Jn 6:17) is often not without symbolic import and drama.

See also APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; GLORY; GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; QUMRAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. R. Achtemeier, "Jesus Christ, the Light of the World: The Biblical Understanding of Light and Darkness," Int 17 (1963) 439-49; R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1983); R. Bultmann, "Zur Geschichte der Lichtsymbolik im Altertum," Exegetica (1967) 323-55; H. Conzelmann, "σκότος κτλ," TDNT 7:423-45; idem, "φῶς κτλ," TDNT 9:310-58; G. Delling, "νύξ," TDNT 4:1123-26; C. H. Dodd, Johannine Epistles (MNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1946); W. Hackenberg, "σκότος," EDNT 3:255-56; E. Haenchen, Acts (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); I. H. Marshall, Acts (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); P. G. Müller, "νύξ," EDNT 2:481-83; D. Neufeld, Reconceiving Texts as Speech Acts: An Analysis of 1 John (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); H. Ritt, "φῶς," EDNT 3:447-48; C. Spicq, "φῶς κτλ," TLNT 3:470-91; M. Winter, "φωτίζω," EDNT 3:449-50. S. A. Hunt

LITURGICAL ELEMENTS

The notion that "the New Testament was, in a sense, a liturgical book" (Cabaniss 1989, 44-45) is a growing trend among NT interpreters. This suggestion is based on the observations that the letters or books of the NT were first read during public worship* (1 Thess 5:27; Col 4:16) and that liturgical elements are richly embedded in these writings. Some scholars have even proposed that certain NT letters are essentially liturgical documents written for religious rites such as the baptismal* service or the Eucharist (Cabaniss 1989, 44). Frequent allusions to liturgical elements, however, may not imply that being "a liturgical book" was the original intent for their composition (Bradshaw, 30-37). Especially when one recalls how the presence of the Holy Spirit* had enacted a new dimension in Christian worship (cf. 1 Cor 14:26; van Unnik 1959, 294), it is unconvincing to conclude that Christian worship had already developed fixed liturgical forms with fixed sequences in the early decades when the NT letters were written (Delling, 76; Cullmann, 27, 32; Williams, 451).

In fact most of these documents or letters were responses to various needs within scattered Christian communities (e.g., 1 Pet, Jude and Heb). A close examination of the Pauline corpus shows that although liturgical elements (e.g., creedal confessions, benedictions, doxologies, hymnic fragments and prayer acclamations such as "amen," "Abba," "maranatha") appear in many letters, they are not always uniform in expression or placed in locations in line with the order of worship. Rather, liturgical elements are often tailored to highlight relevant contents and placed in strategic contexts to clarify or underscore the writer's messages to his readers (see DPL, Liturgical Elements). In this study of the liturgical elements found in the later canonical writings and in the writings of the early apostolic fathers we further explore what types of liturgical elements are alluded to most often, whether they are uniform in expression and why are they mentioned in their contexts.

1. Liturgical Elements in the Later Canonical Writings
2. Liturgical Elements in the Apostolic Fathers
3. Conclusions

1. Liturgical Elements in the Later Canonical Writings.

As in the Pauline corpus, liturgical elements such as benedictions, doxologies, hymnic fragments (see Hymns), creedal* confessions and some acclamations such as amen, Ter Sanctus, hallelujah and maranatha are incorporated in Acts,* Hebrews,* the General Epistles and the Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of) by different writers in their addresses to different groups of readers at scattered locations.

1.1. Benedictions. The inclusion of benedictions in a letter to express the writer's wish-prayers for the readers may have been derived from Jewish worship, in which benediction was a common practice. In the Pauline corpus each letter commenced and ended with a benediction. In the group of writings we are considering, however, there are some distinctive features: not every letter includes a benediction (e.g., Jas and 1 Jn) and, except for 1 Peter,* each letter includes only one benediction, either at the beginning (1 Pet 1:2; 2 Pet 1:2; 2 Jn 3; Jude 2; Rev 1:4) or at the end (Heb 13:20-21, 25; 1 Pet 5:14; 3 Jn 15; Rev 22:21). Even though benediction is frequently included in a letter, it is not a necessary element. The Johannine epistles provide strong evidence: there is no benediction in 1 John, one introductory benediction in 2 John and only a brief closing benediction in 3 John (see John, Letters of). Here the same writer does not follow a stereotyped format in his letters.

Benedictions are essentially wishes of grace* and/or peace*: "Grace be with you [all]" (Heb 13:25; Rev 22:21) or "Peace be with [or to] you" (1 Pet 5:14; 3 Jn 15). In some letters benedictions are elaborated with additional features such as mercy* (2 Jn 3) or love* (Jude 2) or with a closing "Amen" (Heb 13:25; Rev 22:21). In Hebrews 13:20-21 and Revelation 1:4, both letters include lengthy introductions about God,* the source of the benefaction, with epithets that coincide with the major motifs of the letters (Lane, 560). The Pauline formula "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you" and the so-called Dominus Vobiscum ("The Lord be with you"; see Lk 1:28; van Unnik 1959), are not shared by these writings. Thus we see the contents of benedictions are also subject to modification by each writer according to personal choice or the needs of the recipients (Delling, 76).

1.2. Doxologies. Out of gratitude for God's redeeming grace, early Christians were constantly offering praise (see Acts 2:46; 4:24). Just as in the Pauline letters, two doxological formulae are found in this group of writings. One is expressed by the formula "Blessed [be] God" (also known as the Berakhah, or Eulogy; 1 Pet 1:3; cf. 2 Cor 1:3; Eph 1:3), which is a common expression in OT worship and also resembles the Shemoneh Esreh, the Eighteen Benedictions used in the synagogue.* The other is expressed by the phrase "to him be glory [and dominion] for ever and ever," which is less formal in structure but more commonly used (e.g., Heb 13:21b; 1 Pet 4:11; 5:11; 2 Pet 3:18; Jude 24-25; Rev 1:6; 5:13; 7:12). The former type often occurs at the beginning of a letter and the latter at the end of a letter or a section (e.g., 1 Pet 4:11), sometimes with a liturgical "amen" attached to it. But exceptions are also found in the Apocalypse, where doxological expressions are placed in various contexts to maximize the tone of worship. Some follow the common formula "to God be glory for ever and ever" (Rev 1:6; 5:13; 7:12), and some begin with the expression axios ei/estin ("worthy art thou"/"is he"; Rev 4:11; 5:9, 11).

Although most of the doxologies in this group of writings follow the formulaic expressions, they may also be modified with motifs that bring out meanings relevant to the readers (Lane, 565). For example, the doxology in Jude* has been considered as one of the most fulsome doxologies in the NT (Martin, 66). It contains a declarative praise for God's specific deeds ("to keep you from falling and to present you without blemish," Jude 24) and a descriptive praise for who God is ("the only God, our Savior," Jude 25; in Westermann's definitions, 31), and it is expressed with motifs evidently tailored to meet the subjective needs of the readers whose faith* was endangered by the false teachings* of the intruders (Martin, 80-81). Many doxologies in the Apocalypse are also more elaborate in content (cf. Rev 4:11; 5:12, 13). Some of them are directed to Christ (Rev 5:9, 12, 13) with similar wordings as those directed to God (cf. Rev 4:11; 7:12). The purpose is to emphasize his deity, thereby comforting the suffering* readers during the imperial persecution.* Doxologies are not confined to a limited range of thought or stereotyped expression (Delling, 65; cf. Piper, 17).

1.3. Creedal Confessions. Creed, in its modern sense as an article of the Christian faith, is not discernible in the NT (see DPL, Creed). Yet fragments of creedal confessions are traceable. Among this group of writings, Acts provides us with a window on one of the earliest forms of creedal confessions in the Christian communities, namely, "Jesus is the Lord [and/or Christ]" (Acts 2:36; 8:35-38 [the Western text]; 10:36; 16:31; cf. Rom 10:9; Phil 2:11, where homologeō, "confess," is directly connected with the formulaic expression). This is possibly a baptismal confession, for it is consistently connected with baptism in various geographical locations: Jerusalem,* Samaria,* Caesarea and Philippi. And since the document is written partly with a polemic objective, it is probably the writer's intention to show his recipients (Theophilus and eventually the Romans) that Christian communities as outlined in Acts 1:8 are founded on the same faith, "Jesus is the Lord/Christ." They are not political rebels against the Roman government (see Hymns, for similar usage of hymnic materials in Acts; see Civil Authority; Roman Empire). The creedal confessions found in 1 John such as "Jesus is the Christ" (1 Jn 2:22), "Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (1 Jn 4:2) and "Jesus Christ is the Son of God" (1 Jn 4:15; cf. Heb 4:14), however, are mentioned as criteria for discerning one's faith and are most likely introduced for apologetic purposes.

In Hebrews the writer refers to the homologia three times (Heb 3:1; 4:14; 10:23; also the verb form in Heb 11:13; 13:15) and exhorts his readers to hold fast to it. This repeated allusion has been generally acknowledged (e.g., Bornkamm; Michel; and more recently Lane, with some modifications; contra Delling, 79-80) as evidence for the existence of certain fixed forms of creedal confession in the latter part of the first century (see 1 Tim 3:16; 4:6; 6:20; 2 Tim 1:13, 14; 2:11-13; 4:3; Tit 1:9, 13; Jude 3; "the faith," "the deposit" and "sound teaching/doctrine" all clearly support this notion). In the case of Hebrews, Christ's sonship* (Heb 4:14) and high priesthood* (Heb 3:1) are the key confessions acknowledged by the members of the community. The reason for exhortation is also directly related to the urgent needs of the readers. Being Jewish converts in the Diaspora,* the readers have been attracted by a form of heretical and gnosticizing* Judaism* and are at the stage of returning to their former beliefs. Thus the writer's allusions to the homologia that spells out the supremacy of Christ are intended to serve as powerful reminders to the readers of the belief they once confessed (Lane, 103-4). They should "hold fast" to it and not fall back (Heb 10:39). Creedal confessions in early Christian communities are all christocentric* and are designed for the presentation, identification and defense of this new faith.

1.4. Prayer Acclamations. The most familiar prayer acclamation found in this group of writings is "āmēn," a transliteration of the Hebrew word 'amen, meaning "firmness, certainty." This word is frequently used in the OT and the intertestamental period as a vocal expression signifying a person's agreement to or endorsement or affirmation of another person's words or prayers (e.g., 1 Chron 16:36; Neh 8:6; Ps 41:13; Tob 8:8; 1 Esdr 9:47). In the Jewish synagogue, "amen" became a liturgical term attached to various forms of prayer. When early Christians began their worship they readily adopted this usage. Evidences are found in the General Epistles, where "amen" is consistently added to the end of doxologies (Heb 13:21; 1 Pet 4:11; 5:11; 2 Pet 3:18; Jude 25) and benediction (Heb 12:25). This is not done perfunctorily by the writers. By adding an "amen" at the end of doxologies, the readers are given an opportunity to make the message of praise their own (Delling, 64) as well as to unite with one another through their simultaneous utterance of this liturgical acclamation. The unified "amen" is a means for promoting the corporate spirit of worship (MacDonald, 109).

In the Apocalypse, however, "amen" has richer connotations besides being added to the end of various doxologies (Rev 1:6; 7:12b) and the final benediction (Rev 22:21). It is seen as an expression of affirmation of another person's prayer* (Rev 5:14; 19:4) or serves as an emphatic yes (Rev 1:7; 7:12a; 22:20). But a more significant use of "amen" is found in Revelation 3:14. There it is identified as a christological title, and the meaning of "amen" is clearly spelled out in the following phrase, "the faithful and true witness" (RSV), serving as a double emphasis of Christ's faithfulness. It must be noted that the choice of epithets for Christ in this context, just as in Revelation 2:1, 8, 12, 18; 3:1, 7, is directly related to the specific needs of the church. In the case of the Laodicean church (Rev 3:15), believers have failed to follow the One who was faithful in carrying out God's promise of salvation* and made it possible for them to utter the "amen" together in corporate worship. Here we see another example of using "amen" as a christological title to convey the writer's message to his readers (cf. Paul's similar use of "amen" in 2 Cor 1:20 for underlining his argument; see DPL, Liturgical Elements, §5.1). The use of "amen" may be more than just a formal consent or endorsement.

There are two other liturgical acclamations in the Apocalypse: Ter Sanctus (the "Thrice Holy." Rev 4:8) and "hallelujah" (Rev 19:1, 3, 4, 6). Both acclamations are also found in the OT (Is 6:3; Pss 104-06, 111-13, 115-17, 135, 146-50, the so-called Alleluia Psalms) and are not alluded to in other parts of the NT.

The origin of Ter Sanctus is a song of praise sung by celestial beings, the seraphim, in the presence of God (Is 6:1-3; there, probably the triune God or Yahweh, in contrast to Brock's view, which suggests that Ter Sanctus is directed to Christ), proclaiming his holiness* and his sovereignty, which eventually led Isaiah to an awareness of his own unworthiness (Brock, 32). Although this acclamation is not found elsewhere in the NT, its presence in Revelation 4:8 indicates its continual usage in Jewish worship (possibly as a liturgical element used in the Jewish synagogue; see Spinks, 46-54, 194, cf. van Unnik 1951, 213). It was adopted by Jewish Christians* in the Diaspora to be cited on occasions such as the Eucharist (Brock, 31-32; van Unnik, 205; contra Moule, 64). Notably the Ter Sanctus is the first song of praise that commences the heavenly worship in the book of Revelation.

Since Revelation 4:8 is the only place in the NT where Ter Sanctus is mentioned, the writer's purpose must not be overlooked. As in Isaiah 6:3, Ter Sanctus is also sung by celestial beings, the four living creatures, in the presence of God (Rev 4:6-8). The similarities between these two passages strongly suggest that the writer's intention is to stress the holiness of God. The writer uses this acclamation to highlight God's holiness as the foundation of universal worship. The acclamation is followed by the description of God as one "who was, who is and who is to come" (Rev 4:8)—a theme repeated throughout the book (Rev 1:4, 8, 14, 17, 18; 2:8). God's eternal character implies his sovereign control in human history. This twofold message of God's holiness and sovereignty, laid out side by side through the acclamation Ter Sanctus in a worship setting, helps to remind as well as comfort the suffering readers who were undergoing persecution.

The other acclamation, "hallelujah," is a Greek transliteration from the Hebrew word hal'lûâh, meaning "praise [ye] the Lord." In the OT it is found frequently in the Psalter (e.g., Ps 104—6, 111—13, 115—17, 135, 146—50). The plural imperative form of the verb indicates that the term was a directive to the worshiping congregation in the temple* and was meant to evoke a response. In the course of time it became an independent exclamation of joy,* so that the Greek-speaking Jews simply transliterated it (see LXX) instead of translating it (Cabaniss 1970, 116). Although it is not found in other NT writings, its presence in Revelation 19 testifies to its continual usage in the Jewish communities and its adoption by Jewish Christians in the Diaspora as a joyful chant. Since "hallelujah" is mentioned only here, the writer's intention is also evident. In Revelation 19 "hallelujah" is placed at the last song of praise, shared by both celestial and human beings in exuberant response to God's sovereign judgment* upon the evil (Rev 19:1, 3, 4) and his final victory (Rev 19:6). Just as the Hebrew Psalter closes with God's chosen people singing "hallelujah" (Ps 150 ends with this word), the Apocalypse also closes with the "hallelujah chorus," inviting the readers to join. The book closes on a high note. While reminding his readers to focus on God's power and sovereignty, the writer skillfully incorporates the familiar acclamation hallelujah to achieve his goal more effectively.

The frequent references to liturgical language in Revelation do not make it a liturgical book, as some have overstated (e.g., Shepherd, Cabaniss, Piper, Vanni). Prayer acclamations (Ter Sanctus and hallelujah) are selected and incorporated in strategic locations to bring out a cohesive picture of victory and hope* for the comfort and encouragement of the readers as they are reminded of God's holiness and sovereignty. Their presence in the book goes far beyond serving merely liturgical purposes.

2. Liturgical Elements in the Apostolic Fathers. Around the turn of the first century of the Christian era, liturgical elements were still a common literary element in letters.* For example, benedictions were found either at the beginning of a letter (1 Clem. 1; Pol. Phil.; Ign.

Trall.; Ign. Rom.) or at the close of a letter (1 Clem. 58, 59; Barn. 21; Ign. Eph. 21; Ign. Pol.; Ign. Smyrn. 12). The expression of benediction as a wish-prayer for readers, however, is very flexible in wording (esp. in Ignatius's* letters) and in length (e.g., 1 Clem. 58). Doxology is a more fixed expression (mostly following the popular formula "to God be glory for ever and ever, amen"; Diogn. 12; 1 Clem. 20, 32, 38; [except in Ign. Eph. 1, where the formula "blessed be God" is employed]) and less restricted in location (e.g., 1 Clem.; doxologies are found throughout the letter: 20, 32, 38, 43, 45, 50, 58 and 59). Therefore, while fixed formats provide guidelines for expression, flexibility in wordings and usages is always allowed and accepted.

Besides benediction and doxology, prayer acclamations such as "amen," Ter Sanctus, "hosanna" and "maranatha" are also attested in some of the early fathers' writings, indicating a continual usage of these acclamations in the later and postapostolic era. The acclamation amen is always attached to the end of a doxology (1 Clem. 20, 32, 38, 58, 59) or a letter (see Ign. Eph.; Ign. Pol.; also Ignatius's letters to St. John and the Virgin Mary) as a symbol of confirmation of the blessing uttered. In Didache 10.6 and Justin Martyr's Apology I 65, "amen" is explicitly an acclamation of consent to the leader's prayer at the eucharist. In other words, the liturgical usage of "amen" is quite fixed by the end of the first century. The second acclamation, Ter Sanctus, is found in 1 Clement 34 and is considered a loose quotation of Isaiah 6:3 (van Unnik 1951, 247), warning the readers against laziness and calling them to follow the example of angels* in submitting to God's will. The emphasis there evidently is not directly related to God's holiness as in Revelation 4:8. Nevertheless, its allusion may reflect its regular usage in early church worship (van Unnik 1951, 248).

A more significant use of prayer acclamations is found in *Didache 10.6:

> Let grace come and let this world pass away
> Hosanna to the God of David
> If any man is holy, let him come
> If any be not, let him repent
> Maranatha
> Amen

The Sitz im Leben of this paragraph is generally acknowledged to be the Eucharist (Audet, Jungmann, Cabaniss). It was recited antiphonally by the leaders and the congregation. Apparently these three words were already familiar liturgical acclamations employed in early church worship; thus no translation is deemed necessary. "Hosanna" derives from two Hebrew elements: hôsha' and nā', meaning "save, please" and thus signifying a cry for help (Ps 118:25). In the NT this word is only found in the Gospels in the context of the triumphal entry (Mt 21:9; Mk 11:9, 10; Jn 12:13). Although the original meaning of this word may have been familiar to the Jewish people in the Christian era, it seems more likely that this acclamation had developed into an expression of exuberant joy (Hart, Hawthorne, Brown, contra Werner, Pope), as indicated by the occasion and the manner in which this cry was expressed (also see Luke's use of doxa in place of "hosanna" in Lk 19:38). In Didache 10.6 the utterance of "hosanna" in connection with God as the God of David (similar to the expression directed to Jesus at his triumphal entry) also supports the idea that it was understood by Jews and Gentiles* in the Christian era to be an expression of joy rather than a call for help or deliverance.

"Maranatha" is a Greek transliteration of an Aramaic word, marana' ta', probably denoting an imperative cry ("Our Lord, come!") rather than a statement ("Our Lord has come"; see DPL, Liturgical Elements, §5.3). It is most likely the earliest Christian prayer (Cullmann, 13) and originated among Jewish Christians in Palestine or Syria* as a plea for the fulfillment of Christ's eschatological Parousia* (cf. Rev 22:20) as well as for his immediate presence at the Lord's table. This prayer is quickly and widely adopted by Gentile Christians in the Diaspora (1 Cor 16:22) as a part of the eucharistic liturgy. In Didache 10.6 "maranatha" is placed at the end of the antiphonal recitation followed by the close of the eucharistic meal. It represents the congregation's climactic hope. And by adding the liturgical "amen" to it, the congregation is provided an opportunity to adopt the prayer to themselves. Thus the order of arrangement of these three words in Didache 10.6 reflects the beliefs and practices of early Christians in their worship.

3. Conclusions.

The above study provides us some clearer understandings of the forms and functions of liturgical elements in later canonical writings and the writings of early apostolic fathers.

The presence of some liturgical elements in various NT writings and the allusion to prayer acclamations such as "amen," "hallelujah," Ter Sanctus and "hosanna" without translation or explanation testifies to the existence of certain fixed expressions and worship formats (e.g., to commence a letter with introductory benediction and/or doxology and to close with benediction and/or doxology) that had already been adopted by scattered Christian communities in their corporate worship.

The inclusion of these liturgical elements, however, is selective according to the genre of the letters and/or the themes of the writers. The absence of "Abba" in this group of writings does not mean that "Abba" is not used or known outside the Pauline communities (Delling, 71). Similarly the inclusion of Ter Sanctus and "hallelujah" in the Apocalypse (Rev 4:8; 19:1, 3, 6) does not imply that these are elements unique to the Johannine circles.

In the light of diverse motifs or themes that were often added to the somewhat fixed formulas, it is also clear that liturgical elements were still in the stage of development. Doxologies and benedictions, while generally following similar formats, are occasionally tailored to motifs in order to meet the specific needs of the readers or to coincide with the overall message of the writers (see Jude 24-25 versus 2 Pet 3:18; Heb 13:20-21 versus 1 Pet 1:2). In this respect there is a solidarity between Paul and other NT writers in their use of liturgical elements.

Liturgical language is still employed by early apostolic fathers in their writings as a literary style and occasionally for didactic or polemic purpose. Nevertheless, the forms and usages are comparatively fixed despite the fact that varieties are still attested.

NT writers' use of liturgical elements witnesses to a blend of form and freedom in early church worship as well as literary works. Freedom* must operate within the accepted framework to ensure orderliness, whereas formality must also allow flexibility of expression to guarantee meaningful practice—this is the essence of NT worship.

See also BAPTISM; HYMNS, SONGS; LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J.-P. Audet, La Didaché: Instructions des Apôtres (Paris: Gabalda, 1958); G. Bornkamm, "Das Bekenntnis im Hebräerbrief," TBl 21 (1942) 56-66; P. F. Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992); S. P. Brock, "The Thrice-holy Hymn in the Liturgy," Sobornost 7 (1985) 24-34; R. E. Brown, The Gospel of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1970); A. Cabaniss, "Alleluia: A Word and Its Effect" in Liturgy and Literature (Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 1970) 114-21; idem, "A Note on the Liturgy of the Apocalypse," Int 7 (1953) 78-85; idem, Pattern in Early Christian Worship (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1989); J. D. Charles, Literary Strategy in the Epistle of Jude (London: Associated University Presses, 1993); A. Chester and R. P. Martin, The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship (London: SCM, 1953); G. Delling, Worship in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962); P. Fiedler, "Neues Testament und Liturgie," Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 25 (1983) 207-32; H. Hart, "Hosanna in the Highest," SJT 45 (1992) 283-301; G. F. Hawthorne, "Hosanna," ISBE 2:761; J. A. Jungmann, The Mass (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1976); W. Lane, Hebrews (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); H. Lietzmann, Mass and Lord's Supper: A Study in the History of the Liturgy (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1979); A. MacDonald, Christian Worship in the Primitive Church (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1934); O. Michel, "f," TDNT 5:199-220; C. F. D. Moule, Worship in the New Testament (London: Lutterworth, 1961); O. A. Piper, "The Apocalypse of John and the Liturgy of the Ancient Church," CH 20 (1951) 10-22; M. H. Pope, "Hosanna: What It Really Means," Bible Review (1988) 16-25; J. M. Ross, "Amen," ExpT 102 (1991) 166-71; B. D. Spinks, The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); S. Schulz, "Maranatha und Kyrios Jesus," ZNW 53 (1962) 138; D. E. Smith and N. H. Tauffig, Many Tables: The Eucharist in New Testament and Liturgy Today (London: SCM, 1990); K. Trudinger, "Amen, Rev. 3:14 . . . ," NovT 14 (1972) 277-79; W. C. van Unnik, "1 Clement and the 'Sanctus,' " VC 5 (1951): 204-48; idem, "Dominus Vobiscum: The Background of A Liturgical Formula" in New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1959) 270-305; U. Vanni, "Liturgical Dialogue as a Literary Form in the Book of Revelation," NTS 37 (1991) 348-72; G. Wainwright, "The Praise of God in the Theological Reflection of the Church," Int 39 (1985) 34-45; N. Walker, "The Origin of the 'Thrice-holy'," NTS 5 (1958-59) 132-33; E. Werner, "'Hosanna' in the Gospels," JBL 65 (1946) 97-122; C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); R. B. Williams, "Liturgy and the New Testament," Worship 42 (1968) 450-65. J. L. Wu

LITURGY. See WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

LOGOS CHRISTOLOGY

Logos christology* is the use by a Christian writer of the popular Hellenistic religio-philosophical term logos ("word") as a title or predicate of Christ to express Christ's preincarnate existence; his role as the mediator and sustainer of creation*; the universality of his revelatory activity; or his personal distinction from and subordination to God* while sharing God's essence. The term "Logos christology" became common in NT scholarship in the middle of the twentieth century, when a spate of studies appeared on NT titles of Christ. Among these, Logos is most closely related to certain wisdom* motifs in Alexandrian* Judaism* (Wis; see Philo*). Within the NT the high-water mark of Logos christology is John 1:1, 14. (On Logos in the wider environment and in the Fourth Gospel, see DJG, Logos.) The present article covers echoes of Logos christology in other NT writings and sketches its development in early Christianity to the time of Justin.

1. Later New Testament Documents
2. Ignatius and Preaching of Peter
3. Early Apologists
4. Jewish Mysticism and Gnosticism

1. Later New Testament Documents.

1.1. Hebrews. A current debate about whether Hebrews* presents a Logos christology is epitomized by R. Williamson's recent abandonment of the overly cautious line he took in his dissertation (1970). A weighty christological passage at Hebrews 1:3 draws upon language used formerly at Alexandria to describe Wisdom: God's Son is the "shining" (apaugasma) of God's glory and the "representation" (charaktēr) of his substance, even as Wisdom is the "shining" of eternal light and the "representation" (eikōn) of its goodness (Wis 7:26). The Christian author may well have read the Jewish work. Besides sharing a rare term (apaugasma) and synonyms, both texts say the transcendent divine essence is known to humanity by some agency. In Hebrews the Son is the agent of God's final revelation* (Heb 1:1-2) and the medium of God's creative act (Heb 1:2; cf. Heb 1:10-12), which in turn implies the Son's pretemporal existence (cf. Heb 7:3; 13:8). The Son is also honored as "God" (Heb 1:8, quoting Ps 45:6). So Hebrews 1:3 ranks with John 1:1, 14; 1 Corinthians 8:6; and Colossians 2:9 in preparing for binitarian developments of the early patristic era. Elsewhere in Hebrews, some of Philo's characteristic titles for the Logos are applied to Christ: e.g., "firstborn" (prōtogonos, Philo Conf. Ling. 146; cf. prōtotokos, Heb 1:6) or "high priest" (Philo Gig. 52; cf. Heb 7:26). What prevents our concluding that Hebrews has a full-blown Logos doctrine is the lack of the word logos itself.

Recently a few scholars have tried to revive the traditional exegesis of Hebrews 4:12-13 in terms of the personal Logos. More likely, however, the word of God described in Hebrews 4:12 is the "living" and "discerning" address of God (Heb 4:13) through the recorded words of Psalm 95:7-11 (cf. Heb 3:7-11) as pressed home by this author (Heb 3:7—4:11). In the last phrase in Hebrews 4:13 logos is well translated "an account" (NRSV).

1.2. 1 John. In 1 John (see John, Letters of) the Logos occurs but once (1 Jn 1:1). Like the opening of the prologue to the Fourth Gospel ("In the beginning"), this passage affirms the Word's existence "from the [absolute] beginning." "Word of life" denotes the Logos as the source of life (cf. Jn 1:4, 12-13). His presence revealed an eternal life that has its natural abode with the Father (1 Jn 1:2; cf. Jn 1:1-2), identified as God's Son, Jesus Christ (1 Jn 1:3; cf. Jn 1:14-17). All the elements of a classical doctrine of the Incarnation of the Logos are here. The new touch is an emphasis on the apostolic circle's direct experience of the Logos: "what we heard, saw [thrice—1 Jn 1:1, 2, 3], beheld and handled." Their report must be limited to "what" they learned "concerning" (peri) the Word's unfathomable reality. The claim remains that this privileged group encountered the Logos in the realm of sense, making a dualism of matter and spirit unacceptable. Probably the paragraph opposes a contemporary Cerinthian-Gnostic* teaching that the Christ was a pure spirit-being who descended on Jesus only from baptism* (1 Jn 5:6; cf. Irenaeus Haer. 1.7.2; 1.26.1; 3.3.4; 3.11.1).

An interpolation at 1 John 5:7 (the Comma Johanneum) applies the term logos to the second member of the Trinity, but it is first documented in the fourth-century Liber apologeticus 4.

1.3. Revelation. An apocalyptic* description of Christ names him "the Word of God" (Rev 19:13), perhaps because the judgment* he executes fulfills God's promises (cf. Rev 19:11, 13 with Rev 21:5; 22:6). Since the passage does not treat of his personal relation to God or of his cosmological functions, its contribution to Logos christology proper is peripheral.

2. Ignatius and Preaching of Peter.

2.1. Ignatius (c. A.D. 110; Syria). Elaborate theories have sometimes been built upon Ignatius's* simple statement, "There is one God, who revealed himself through Jesus Christ his son, who is his Word coming forth from silence" (Ign. Magn. 8.2). This sentence paraphrases John 1:18; need it mean more than that Christ expresses what can be known of the divine mystery? We might compare phrases elsewhere in Ignatius that call Christ "the will (gnōmē) of the Father" (Ign. Eph. 3.2) or "the mouth without falsehood, by which the Father speaks truly" (Ign. Rom. 8.2). Ignatius adds little to the biblical Logos christology.

2.2. The Preaching of Peter (c. A.D. 80-140; Egypt). A phrase, the exact wording of which is now lost, in the Preaching of Peter, no longer extant, denoted Christ as both Torah and Logos (Clement of Alexandria Strom. 1.29.182; 2.15.68; Clement of Alexandria Ecl. Proph. 58). If the phrase comes from Isaiah 2:3, it presents Christ as the eschatological* revelation of God for all nations. Some rabbis speculated that the Torah existed before the world and was God's instrument for creation: "God consulted the Torah and created the world" (Gen. Rab. 1). A profound Logos christology may be hidden here, but with such scant data we cannot be sure.

3. Early Apologists.

3.1. The Epistle to Diognetus (c. A.D. 130-50). The most signal evidence for Logos christology in this anonymous work has often been overlooked. The invisible God "himself, from heaven, set among humans the truth and the holy and incomprehensible Word," by sending not a servant* or an angel* or a ruler but "the workman (technitēs) and demiurge (dēmiourgos) of the universe himself, by whom he created the sky." As a king sends a son, so God sent him as king: "he sent him as God" (Diogn. 7.2, 4). Here the Logos is distinct from God but is also God's Son and representative, superior to the celestial retinue; his cosmological functions, as well as the universality of the revelation he brings from God, are clear. This exposition, addressed to a high-ranking aristocrat (Diogn. 1), couches it in terms of the Platonic demiurge known to popular philosophies of the day and so marks a concerted attempt to persuade the educated elite.

The Logos also made possible God's recent act of revelation (Diogn. 11.2-8; 12.9). The Word who appeared and was rejected by the Jews "was from the beginning," at once new and old (Diogn. 11.3-4). He is "the eternal one", God's Son, who continues to unfold grace* in the church* (Diogn. 11.5) through those he chooses (Diogn. 11.7).

3.2. Justin Martyr (mid-second century). Justin, a philosopher converted to Christianity, deepened and refined the church's Logos christology. Salient are his points that the Logos disclosed fragments of truth through Greek and barbarian philosophers (Justin Apol. I 5; 46; Justin Apol. II 10; 13); that it was the actual subject of the OT theophanies (Justin Dial. Tryph. 56-60; 126-27); and that it constituted a "second god," distinct from God in number but not in essence, sharing God's essence without diminishing it (Justin Dial. Tryph. 55-56; 61-62; 127-28). Some suppose Justin to be the first witness* to a liturgical tradition that invoked the descent of the Logos upon the eucharistic elements (Srawley, 32-34). Many have expounded Justin's important contribution (see Barnard; Kelly; Price).

4. Jewish Mysticism and Gnosticism.

The subject of Logos christology is potentially vast, for historians of religion find no empirical boundary between first- and second-century ideas that came to be recognized as orthodox and others later ruled out as heretical, whether by rabbinic academies or by ecclesiastical councils. Taking up the scriptural figure of the angel of the Lord (e.g., Ex 23:20-21; Josh 5:13-15), named Michael in late texts (Dan 10:13, 21; 12:1; 1QM 9.15-16; 17:6-7), Jewish authors at Alexandria identified him with the Logos (Wis 18:15-16) and made the Logos the principal archangel (Philo Conf. Ling. 146; Migr. Abr. 174; Rer. Div. Her. 205-6).

For several centuries Jewish Christianity* used the concept of the Logos-archangel to describe Christ, meaning not that he was a created being but that he was sent by God. This tradition may inform the book of Revelation (cf. Dan 10:6 with Rev 1:12-16; Wis 18:15-16 with Rev 19:11-13; see Revelation, Book of). Its exegetical conclusions underlie Justin's dialogue with Trypho, where Justin lists "Word" and "Angel" as OT titles of Christ (Justin Dial. Tryph. 126-28). The christology of *Shepherd of Hermas is angelomorphic (cf. Herm. Sim. 8.1.2; 8.3.3; 9.6.1-6; 9.7.1-2), putting Christ in charge of six archangels (Herm. Sim. 9.12.7-8). Various Gnostic* sects speculated further on seven archons who created the universe (e.g., Irenaeus Haer. 1.30.4-5); some placed the Logos in an aboriginal Ogdoad (Irenaeus Haer. 1.1.1; 1.8.5; 1.15.3). Related Jewish mystical revelations about God's principal angel, whether known as Yaoel ("Yahweh-El": Apoc. Abr. 10:3, 8; 3 Enoch 48D:1(1)) or as Metatron, the "lesser Yahweh" (b. Sanh. 38b; 3 Enoch 12:5; 48C:7; 48D:1(90)), also provided matter for the gnostic science of God's chariot-throne (Orig. World 105.1-12; Hyp. Arch. 95.27-29). The best approach to the whole knotty field is through specialized monographs (Daniélou; Segal; Fossum; Hurtado).

See also CHRISTOLOGY; PREEXISTENCE; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. W. Barnard, Justin Martyr: His Life and Thought (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967) 85-100; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity: A History of Early Christian Doctrine Before the Council of Nicaea 1 (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1964) 117-46; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making: A New Testament Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation (London: SCM, 1980) 213-50; J. E. Fossum, The Name of God and the Angel of the Lord: Samaritan and Jewish Concepts of Intermediation and the Origin of Gnosticism (WUNT 36; Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1985); R. Holte, "Logos Spermatikos: Christianity and Ancient Philosophy According to St. Justin's Apologies," ST 12 (1958) 109-68; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (5th ed.; London: Adam & Charles Black, 1977) 90-101; R. M. Price, "'Hellenization' and Logos Doctrine in Justin Martyr," VC 42 (1988) 18-23; W. Rodorf, "Christus als Logos und Nomos: Das Kerygma Petrou in seinem Verhältnis zu Justin" in Kerygma und Logos: Beiträge zu den geistesgeschichtlichen Beziehungen zwischen Antike und Christentum, ed. A. M. Ritter (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979) 424-34; A. F. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven: Early Rabbinic Reports About Christianity and Gnosticism (SJLA 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977) 182-233; W. Schneemelcher, ed., "The Kerygma Petri," in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. W. Schneemelcher (2d ed.; 2 vols.; Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1990-92) 2:34-41; W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch, ed. H. Koester (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. H. Srawley, The Early History of the Liturgy (2d ed.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1947); J. Swetnam, "Jesus as Logos in Hebrews 4, 12-13," Bib 62 (1981) 214-24; M. Theobald, Die Fleischwerdung des Logos: Studien zum Verhältnis des Johannesprologs zum Corpus des Evangeliums und zu 1 Joh (NTAbh n.s. 20; Münster: Aschendorff, 1988); R. Williamson, "The Incarnation of the Logos in Hebrews," ExpT 95 (1983) 4-8.

P. A. Rainbow

LORD

Any survey of the NT literature, particularly Paul's letters,* will show the importance of the term kyrios for the early church* (see DPL, Lord). The faith* of the early church involved confessing that Jesus is the risen and exalted* kyrios (1 Cor 9:1; 12:3; Rom 10:9; Phil 2:9-11). That this confession* was largely based on what was true about Jesus after his death (see Death of Christ) is shown by the fact that the term kyrios, when it is found in the dialogue portions of the Gospels as a mode of address to Jesus, almost without exception means "master" or "respected sir," not "divine being" (but cf. Mk 12:35-37 and Witherington 1990).

Kyrios, like its Aramaic equivalent marē, normally conveyed the idea of a human being who was superior to or over another human being or group of people. Kyrios tells us something about a person's position in relationship to other things or persons. This is shown by the fact that in social contexts kyrios is often paired with the term doulos, "slave" or "servant." The former is lord of and lord over the latter. It is not surprising that early Christians appropriated this terminology to speak of the risen Jesus; it was commonly used in the Greco-Roman world to refer to exalted beings, including gods and demigods (cf. 1 Cor 8:5), and early Christians felt that their relationship to the risen Jesus was like that of the relationship of a doulos to a kyrios (cf. Rom 1:1 to 2 Pet 1:1). With this background we are prepared to consider the use of the term kyrios outside the Gospels and the Pauline literature.

The term kyrios is used in a variety of ways outside of the Gospels and the Pauline portions of the NT. In some cases it seems to have a simple functional connotation, indicating a role that Jesus or God plays, but in other contexts it seems also to imply something about who Jesus is, namely, one who can be placed on the Creator side of the Creator/creature distinction. This sort of distinction, however, has its limitations. A review of the relevant passages shows how kyrios can be used almost interchangeably of God and Jesus by early Christians. We will review the data beginning with the book of Acts,* then turning to Hebrews,* James* and Jude,* the Petrine epistles (see 1 Peter; 2 Peter), the Johannine letters (see John, Letters of) and the Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of), concluding with a sampling of the use of kyrios in the early Christian literature outside the canon.*

1. The Acts of the Apostles
2. Hebrews
3. James and Jude
4. 1 Peter and 2 Peter
5. The Johannine Epistles and the Apocalypse
6. The Apostolic Fathers
7. Summary

1. The Acts of the Apostles.

The term kyrios appears 104 times in Acts, with at least eighteen of these occurrences referring to God, forty-seven referring to Jesus, four referring to secular masters, owners or rulers, and the remainder referring to either Jesus or God, though in these instances it is not clear who is meant (cf. Kee, 19). Luke is familiar with the use of the term, even with the article, to refer to a secular ruler (Acts 25:26, of Nero) or to an owner or a master of a slave* (Acts 16:16, 19), but his interest lies elsewhere.

We can be certain that kyrios refers to Jesus in some texts because the term is combined either with the name* Jesus (Acts 1:21; 4:33; 8:16; 15:11; 16:31; 19:5, 13, 17; 20:24, 35; 21:13) or with the combined referent Jesus Christ (Acts 11:17; 15:26; 28:31). In other cases the context makes evident that Jesus is meant (e.g., Acts 9:5, 10, 11). In some instances, primarily in quotations of the OT that have the combination of kyrios with theos, it is evident that God and not Jesus is meant (Acts 2:39; 3:22; see Old Testament in Acts). Some of the confusion could be resolved if we could know that Luke does not draw on the concept of the preexistent* Son of God,* but texts like Acts 2:25 may suggest he knows of such an idea.

The remarkable quotation from Psalm 110:1 in Acts 2:34, in which both God and Jesus are referred to as kyrios, shows how flexible Luke was prepared to be in his use of the term. It would be wrong, however, to conclude from such a text that Luke saw Jesus as merely the believers' Lord, for in Acts 10:36 he is called the Lord of all (pantōn kyrios). It was not merely the use of the term kyrios of Jesus that caused the parting of the ways between Christianity and early Judaism (see Christianity and Judaism; Judaism). Christians also wished to appropriate the term and the OT texts in which kyrios had the more exalted sense of divine Lord (referring to Yahweh) and to apply those texts and their attendant concepts to Jesus (cf. Dunn 1991).

In general when an OT phrase or concept such as the "Day of the Lord" (Acts 2:20; see Day of the Lord), "the angel of the Lord" (Acts 5:19; 12:11, 23), "the fear of the Lord" (Acts 9:31) or "the hand of the Lord" (Acts 13:11) appears in the text it is likely that "Lord" means "God" in such texts. The phrase "the Word of the Lord," especially if one takes it as an objective genitive (the Word about the Lord), appears to refer to Jesus (Acts 8:25; 13:44, 49; 15:35, 36; 19:20), as is likely the case with the phrase "the way of the Lord" (Acts 18:25). Further, the phrase "the name of the Lord" (Acts 9:28) likely refers to Jesus, especially in view of the clearer texts such as Acts 19:5, 13 and 17.

One of the keys to understanding Luke's use of kyrios in Acts is to recognize the narrative framework, which includes a historical component, in which he views all christological* matters (on theology in a narrative framework see Witherington, Narrative 1994). The references to kyrios in Acts must be compared and contrasted to the material in Luke's Gospel, but what Luke says about Jesus depends on what point in the trajectory of his career Luke is discussing. One must ask whether Luke is referring to Jesus during his historical ministry* or to what Luke's believes to be true about Jesus after the resurrection* and ascension.*

For example, it is widely recognized that Luke uses the term kyrios in the narrative framework and in the editorial comments in his Gospel in a way the other Synoptic writers do not, while at the same time no character in the Gospel narrative calls Jesus kyrios unless it is under inspiration (Lk 1:43, 76), involves an angel* (Lk 2:11) or involves Jesus obliquely alluding to himself (Lk 19:31, 34; cf. Fitzmyer 1981). However, as soon as the narrative gets beyond Easter various human beings can and do use kyrios of Jesus (cf. Lk 24:34; Acts 10:36-38; Moule). This may be explained in part as an example of Luke's desire to avoid historical anachronisms, but it also shows that he does not wish to violate the internal logic of the narrative and so have characters get ahead of what they ought to be saying at a particular juncture in the story.

The assertion that Luke is adoptionist in his christological thinking is based on texts like Acts 2:36—"God has made this Jesus whom you crucified both kyrios and Christ." The problem with this conclusion is that here, as elsewhere in Acts, Luke uses his christological language in a way that suits his narrative. From Luke's point of view Jesus did not in any full sense assume the roles of Lord* and Messiah over all until after the resurrection and ascension. It was not that Jesus became someone different from who he was before but that he entered a new stage in his career or assumed new roles after the ascension (cf. Dunn 1980). Only as an exalted one could Jesus take on the tasks of Lord over all and universal Messiah.

Luke's basic interest is in the story of Jesus from his birth until he assumes and begins to exercise the role of Lord from heaven,* though a text like Acts 2:25 may imply that Luke knew of the concept of the preexistent Lord (cf. Acts 2:24 and Craddock). It is the narrative about Jesus and its progress that affects how the terminology is used, not a concern to settle a later debate about functional over against ontological christology. Furthermore, nice distinctions between being and doing would probably have seemed inappropriate to Luke. The Lord Jesus is able to do what he does because he is who he is. The roles he assumes are roles that are appropriate in Luke's mind for the exalted Jesus to assume. Jesus' lordship is viewed not as a mere honorary title but as a description of his status and activity since at least the resurrection.

The term kyrios is the most frequently used christological title in all of Luke-Acts, used almost twice as frequently as the term *Christ. Of 717 occurrences of kyrios in the NT the vast majority are to be found either in Luke-Acts (210) or in the Pauline letters (275) (Bietenhard, 2:513). This emphasis in Luke-Acts comports with Luke's basic stress on God's sovereignty over and in history as it is expressed in the form of God's plan of salvation* for the world that comes to fruition through Jesus (cf. Squires). Jesus is the one who expresses and in a sense executes this salvation plan both by his acts in space and time and also by his acts as the exalted Lord sending the Holy Spirit* to work on earth in his behalf and place. It becomes clear that the basic connotation for Luke of the term kyrios is one who exercises dominion over the world and in particular over human lives and events.

It is important not to underestimate the significance of the transfer of the term kyrios from Yahweh to Christ at various points in Acts. As J. A. Fitzmyer says, "In using kurios of both Yahweh and Jesus in his writings Luke continues the sense of the title already being used in the early Christian community, which in some sense regarded Jesus as on a level with Yahweh" (Fitzmyer 1981, 203).

Acts indicates, as the Pauline epistles also suggest, that the basic confession of the early church was that Jesus is the risen Lord (cf. Acts 10:46; 11:16; 16:31; 20:21). It is Jesus the risen and exalted Lord whom people are called upon to turn to and believe in (Acts 5:14; 9:35; 11:17). This risen Lord confronts Saul on Damascus road (Acts 9:10-17; 18:9), and to him believers must remain faithful (Acts 20:19). It is the Lord Jesus with whom the original disciples traveled (Acts 1:21), whose teaching* Paul can quote (Acts 20:35) and who commissions people for ministry (Acts 20:24). In these texts the name Jesus seems to be appended to kyrios to make clear the identity of this Lord. The continuity of the Lord's identity before and after Easter makes it possible for Luke to refer to Jesus' earthly activity and teaching using the term kyrios, even though he knows that Jesus does not fully or truly assume the roles of exalted Lord until after Easter.

In other texts where the Lord God and not Jesus is meant by kyrios (Acts 2:39; 3:19, 22; 4:26; 7:31; 10:4, 33), these references are found either in the first few chapters of Acts or on the lips of Jews or apparent proselytes to Judaism. The further one gets into Acts and the more Christians speak for themselves, it is almost always Jesus who is referred to as the Lord. After the crucial apostolic council and decree (Acts 15), there is only one text in which kyrios seems clearly to refer to God and not Jesus: in the apologetic speech of Paul before the Areopagus (Acts 17:24). That is, in almost half of Acts, where Luke himself may have drawn on his own knowledge and travel accounts beginning in Acts 16, references to God as kyrios are strikingly lacking.

In some passages one could debate whether Jesus or God is the referent. For example, in Acts 2:47 "the Lord" is probably God (cf. Acts 2:34), but in a text like Acts 21:14 kyrios could refer to either Jesus or God (cf. Acts 21:13). In Acts 12:11, 17 (cf. Acts 12:5) the "Lord" seems to refer to God, as is more clearly the case in Acts 12:23. But in Acts 7:60, Acts 13:2 and Acts 16:14-15 it appears that Jesus who is prayed to, worshiped and believed in (cf. Kee, 20). This sort of ambiguity does not trouble Luke because in his view the terminology is equally appropriate when used of either God or Jesus, not least because he viewed Jesus as a proper object of worship* and petitionary prayer.*

2. Hebrews.

Of the sixteen references to kyrios in Hebrews only three refer to Jesus (Heb 2:3; 7:14; 13:20); the remainder refer to God. Of these thirteen references to God all but one (Heb 8:2) are found in quotations or paraphrases of several OT texts that are important to the writer's argument: Psalm 102:26 cited in Hebrews 1:10; Psalm 110:4 cited in Hebrews 7:21; Jeremiah 31:31-34 cited in Hebrews 8:8-11 and Jeremiah 31:33 cited in Hebrews 10:16; Proverbs 3:11-12 cited in Hebrews 12:5-6; and Psalm 118:6 cited in Hebrews 13:6. That the author does not see an allusion to Jesus as Lord in any OT texts is surprising, since the prologue (Heb 1:1-4) speaks of a role the preexistent Son of God played in the acts of creation* (cf. Witherington, Sage 1994; see Old Testament in Hebrews). This may in part be explained by the fact that the author does not indulge in midrashic contemporizing of the OT so much as he uses it for typology (cf. G. Hughes).

The author of Hebrews feels free to refer to the earthly Jesus who announced salvation to his first followers as "Lord" (Heb 2:3), and even more tellingly he speaks of Jesus' ancestry as the ancestry of "our Lord." The closing benediction in Hebrews 13:20 refers to God bringing back from the dead "our Lord Jesus." Nothing here suggests an adoptionist christology, but equally clearly there is no stress on Christ's cosmic roles as Lord of the universe. The author rather focuses on the fact that Jesus is "our Lord," and wherever "Lord" refers to Jesus in Hebrews the subject is his historical roles and experiences (e.g., birth, proclamation, death and resurrection). One reason the author feels free to use the term kyrios of Jesus during his earthly ministry may be that he sees him as a perfect human being, without sin, and thus above all other mortals (cf. Hoekema).

3. James and Jude.

The usage of kyrios in James is easier to analyze than in some NT books. In thirteen instances kyrios is used, and in all but four it seems certain that the reference is to God, not Jesus. The references to the Lord Jesus Christ in James 1:1 and James 2:1 provide almost the only clear evidence that this homiletical document is a Christian one, if one did not recognize the echoes of the Sermon on the Mount in various portions of James (see Witherington, Sage 1994). In the context of a Christian document James 5:7-8 is also likely a reference to Christ's Second Coming (see Parousia). As for the other ten instances of kyrios, none reflect any theological meanings, insights or nuances that are specifically Christian in character or that could not be found in general in early Jewish sapiential literature. Thus it is God the Lord to whom one prays (Jas 1:5-7; 5:4—the "Lord Sabaoth" or "almighty") and whom one worships (Jas 3:9). The odd phrase "the Lord and Father" in James 3:9 is surely a reference to one person in view of the single article. It is to God the Lord that one submits or humbles oneself (cf. Jas 4:7 and Jas 4:10) and whose will determines the length of one's life (Jas 4:15).

The prophets spoke in the name of the Lord

God (Jas 5:10), and it was the Lord who finally had compassion on Job (Jas 5:11). The final references to "Lord" (Jas 5:14-15) are ambiguous. Is it in the name of the Lord Jesus that one is to anoint* the sick and to expect the Lord to raise them up (see Healing), or is this also a reference to the Lord God who responds to prayers and various forms of petition, as was seen in James 1:5-7 and James 5:4? The latter seems likely. The term Lord in James then normally refers to the One who is and has always been sovereign over all the universe and has always been the object of prayer. The references to Jesus as Lord at James 1:1, James 2:1 and probably James 5:7-8 all refer to roles he assumed or will assume after the resurrection, hence the apt qualifier at James 2:1 ("our glorious Lord Jesus"). This way of putting the matter may refer to Jesus as risen in glory* or Jesus as exalted to God's right hand or both. The writer of this document seems to reflect the earliest period of Christian thinking about Jesus, including the early fervency and hope* for his imminent return.

The preceding makes for a striking contrast in terms of emphasis with the use of kyrios in another early Jewish Christian document—Jude. Here, with the probable exception of the reference to the Lord God in Jude 9, five other references to kyrios in this book apply to Jesus. It is textually uncertain as to whether "Lord" or "Jesus" should be read in Jude 5, but "Jesus" or perhaps "Joshua" is the better attested reference (cf. Metzger, 726). In Jude 4 Jesus is called "our sovereign [despotēn] and Lord." His Second Coming with the holy ones (angels?) is referred to in Jude 14, and he is three times called "our Lord Jesus Christ" (Jude 17, 21, 25). He is the one who not only is coming but also will bring the gift of eternal life to the believers (Jude 21). Jude 25 suggests that he is the one through whom one relates to and petitions the only God. Finally the Lord's apostles or sent ones are referred to in Jude 17, the sole reference where "Lord" may be predicated of Jesus during his earthly ministry (cf. Bauckham).

4. 1 Peter and 2 Peter.

Of the eight references to kyrios in 1 Peter, one is an example of the mundane use of the term to refer to a human master (what Sarah called Abraham*—1 Pet 3:6), and most of the remaining examples involve an allusion to or quotation of an OT text (see Old Testament in the General Epistles). For example, Psalm 34 is alluded to several times. At 1 Peter 2:3, Psalm 34:8 is quoted; and at 1 Peter 3:12, Psalm 34:15-16 is cited, accounting for two further examples of kyrios. While in the latter citation it seems clear that the Lord God is meant, at 1 Peter 2:3 the reference could be to Christ, whom the audience has now experienced and found good. More clearly 1 Peter 3:15 is an appeal to acknowledge Christ as the holy Lord, a text that may include a possible allusion to Isaiah 8:13. If so, this provides us with another example in which OT texts are used homiletically to affirm what is true about Jesus (cf. Davies).

In 1 Peter 1:25 kyrios seems a clear reference to God, in view of the parallel "word of God" in 1 Peter 1:23. Again an OT text, Isaiah 40:6-8, is being quoted. In the initial thanksgiving at 1 Peter 1:3 we find a clear distinction between God who is Father and "our Lord Jesus Christ." The text says that the one praised is both the God and Father of Jesus. What is less evident in 1 Peter is any connection of the kyrios references to a subtext of the story about the various stages in Jesus' career (see Intertextuality), though hints in this direction can probably be seen in 1 Peter 1:20 (preexistence) and 1 Peter 3:18-22 (suffering* and atonement). When Christ is the subject, however, the focus is on what Christ now is and should be confessed to be. When God is the subject, kyrios is usually introduced because the author is citing the OT. Nevertheless the writer is apparently not shy about using the OT to describe the exalted qualities of Christ as heavenly Lord—he is both holy and good and as such is to be acknowledged and experienced (Krafft).

Of the fourteen references to kyrios in 2 Peter, none clearly quote an OT text, but 2 Peter 2:9 and 2 Peter 2:11 are part of a recitation of the stories of God's judgments* by flood and fire (Gen 6—8; 18—19), and in this context it is not surprising that kyrios refers to the Lord God. It appears too that when the author reflected on the day of the Lord, he thought of it in terms of the yôm Yahweh ("Day of the LORD") spoken of in the OT, and thus it is likely that kyrios in 2 Peter 3:8, 9, 10 and 15 refers to God (cf. 2 Pet 3:12 and Witherington 1992 on the yôm Yahweh).

All the other references in this letter refer to Christ, as is made evident by the coupling of kyrios with either "Jesus" (2 Pet 1:2), "Jesus Christ" (2 Pet 1:8, 11, 14, 16; 3:18) or sōtēr (2 Pet 3:2). This writer has a penchant for coupling the term kyrios with the term savior (2 Pet 1:11; 2:20; 3:2, 18). In neither of the Petrine letters is there any major focus on the cosmic dimensions of Christ's lordship (but cf. 1 Pet 3:21-22). Rather, as the qualifier our shows, the focus is on Christ's rule and dominion over the Christian community and individual Christian life (esp. 2 Pet, but see also 1 Pet 1:3). 2 Peter does not reflect the ambiguity we have seen in some of the other NT documents in the use of kyrios. In each instance it is clear when Christ is and is not meant. This author does not show the subtlety of use of the OT to speak about lordship that the author of 1 Peter does.

5. The Johannine Epistles and the Apocalypse. In view of the use of kyrios in the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse and considering the high christology one finds in 1 John, it comes as a surprise that there are no references to either God or Christ as kyrios in the Johannine epistles nor any more mundane uses of the term. Accordingly we must turn our attention to the Apocalypse.

There are twenty-one uses of kyrios in the Revelation; in this book, which is a pastiche of OT allusions and images with few direct quotations (see Old Testament in Revelation), the use of kyrios, particularly in the first half of the book, is like that found in the OT (cf. Black). Besides Revelation 7:14, where the vocative kyrie is little more than a term of respect meaning something like "sir," all the references prior to Revelation 11:8 seem clearly to refer to God and not to Jesus as Lord. John likes to use the phrase "the Lord God" (kyrios ho theos; Rev 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7; 18:8; 19:6; 21:22; 22:5-6), and especially in a text like Revelation 21:22, where the term is used to distinguish God from the Lamb,* it becomes clear that this phrase does not refer to Jesus, with only one possible exception (see below). This phrase comes up particularly in contexts in which prayer or praise is being offered up to God, and it is sometimes combined with the term pantokratōr ("almighty"; Rev 15:3; 19:6; 21:22) to indicate the magnitude of God's sovereignty.

The first clear reference to Jesus as kyrios comes at Revelation 11:8, and this is made clear in two ways: by reference to the crucifixion and by the modifier their attached to "Lord." It is unclear with a text like Revelation 14:13 whether dying in the Lord refers to dying for Jesus, but in view of Revelation 14:12 this seems likely. Twice Jesus is acclaimed as King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev 17:14; 19:16) in a context where Christ's eschatological* role of subduing the opposition at the end of history is stressed. He is not merely sovereign over the church but also will exercise his sovereignty over the nations of the world on behalf of the faithful. The more familiar early Christian usage "Lord Jesus" (see above) occurs twice at the end of the document, where Christ's Second Coming and a benediction in Christ's name is invoked (Rev 22:20-21; see Liturgical Elements).

One of the most debatable issues in this book is whether at its beginning it is God or Jesus who is called the Lord and the Alpha and Omega (Rev 1:8), especially since the terminology comes up again in Revelation 21:6 and Revelation 22:7, and in the lattermost example it seems rather certain the reference is to the returning Lord Jesus (see Christology). However, everywhere else the phrase "the Lord God," especially when qualified by the term Almighty, does not refer to Jesus; most scholars think this is also likely the case in Revelation 1:8. Revelation 1:17 may suggest the opposite conclusion, however (cf. Rowland). The point of mentioning this ambiguity is that John, especially in a doxological context, is willing to predicate of Jesus what he predicates of the Lord God, because he sees them as on the same level, being divine and proper objects of worship unlike the angels (cf. Rev 19:10). Jesus, like God's Spirit, is part of John's vision* of what the Godhead is, without at the same time denying the oneness of God. In such circumstances it is understandable that some of the references to kyrios in this book could refer to either the Lord Jesus or the Lord God.

6. The Apostolic Fathers.
The use of kyrios in the early Christian noncanonical literature, besides reflecting the Christian tendency to use the term of both the Lord God and the Lord Jesus, also reveals some new trends to which we will pay particular attention as we survey the data from the Epistle of Barnabas, * the letters of Clement of Rome* to the Corinthians, the epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, the Didache, * the Shepherd of Hermas and the letters of Ignatius of Antioch.

6.1. The Epistle of Barnabas. One of the more Jewish and eschatological of the early Christian noncanonical books is the Epistle of Barnabas. At Barnabas 15.4 we find the speculation that the Lord will make an end of human history in six thousand years, since Genesis 2:2 talks about God finishing his work in six days and since one day is as a thousand years for the Lord. Also, the "day of the Lord" is said to last one thousand years (see Day of the Lord). As in the other places in this work where the OT is the basis of the discussion (see Old Testament in the Apostolic Fathers), "Lord" seems to mean God, not Jesus.

This is the case at Barnabas 2.6, where a quote from Isaiah 1:1-13 is introduced with "says the Lord" (so also at Barn. 4.8, introducing Ex 32:16; Barn. 6.14, introducing Ezek 11:19; 36:26; Barn. 9.1, which uses Jer 4:4), or at Barnabas 2.10, where Psalm 51:19 is quoted about "sacrifice for the Lord." The same phenomenon can be seen at Barnabas 3.1, which uses Isaiah 58:4-5; Barnabas 3.3, which borrows from Isaiah 58:6-10; or Barnabas 4.7, where Exodus 34:28 is quoted about the finger and covenant* of the Lord. One may also note the use of Isaiah 1:2 and Isaiah 1:10 at Barnabas 9.3 or the use of Jeremiah 9:25-26 at Barnabas 9.5. The reference to the commandments* of the Lord after the citation of the Mosaic law* (Lev 11:3; Deut 14:6) suggests that "Lord" means "God" in this text. And the reference to the Lord foretelling the cross* and the baptism* at Barnabas 11.1 is likely also a reference to God, not Jesus.

The phrase "Lord God" (kyrios ho theos) is found in a quote of Isaiah 45:2-3 at Barnabas 11.4, and immediately thereafter we hear of the fear of the Lord (Barn. 11.5). The conglomerate citations (Ex 24:18; 31:18; 32:7-19; Deut 9:12-17) in Barnabas 14.1-5 all involve reference to the Lord God. The quote of Isaiah 42:6-7 ("I the Lord thy God") at Barnabas 14.7-8 is followed by the juxtaposition kyrios... theos (Barn 14.8). This Lord speaks in Scripture (cf. Barn. 16.2), gives the OT commandments (Barn. 19.2) and is the one whose name must not be taken in vain (Barn. 19.5, quoting Deut 5:11). He is the Lord from eternity to eternity (Barn. 18.2). Yet it may be we should distinguish him from "the Lord of glory" referred to in the closing benediction (Barn. 21.9). Other ambiguous references could refer to Christ or God, such as the mention of the kingdom* of the Lord at Barnabas 4.13 (cf. Barn. 1.1, 4, 6).

Yet the term Lord can also be used of Jesus, even during the course of his earthly ministry. Thus at Barnabas 5.1 we hear of the Lord delivering his flesh* up to corruption, or at Barnabas 7.2 we hear of the Son of God who was the Lord and suffered to make us alive. Yet at Barnabas 7.3 "the Lord" seems to refer to Yahweh as the one who commanded what is recorded in Leviticus 23:29. Again at Barnabas 2.6 the phrase "Lord Jesus Christ" (who gives the new law) is used for the only time in this document.

Perhaps the most important clue about the use of kyrios comes at Barnabas 12.10, where the familiar citation of Psalm 110:1 ("the Lord speaking to my Lord") is used. The author makes clear that the "my Lord" is Christ, while "the Lord" is God. Since this verse was widely used in early Christianity and perhaps even by Jesus himself (see Witherington 1990, 189-91), it may be that this verse and its influence guided early Christians in distinguishing between God as Lord and Jesus as Lord, namely, that the use of the possessive with kyrios would signal Christ, while the phrase "the Lord" would normally refer to the Father unless further contextual data were added to clarify the meaning. In tone, use of the OT and christological character, Barnabas seems most like Jude and as such likely reflects the first- or at latest early-second-century milieu of Jewish Christianity (see Jewish Christianity).

6.2. The Letters of Clement. The first letter of Clement to the Corinthians is in some respects the noncanonical letter most like the canonical Pauline ones, with various allusions to Paul's Corinthian correspondence and possibly also to Hebrews (cf. Goodspeed). We might expect from this that there would be a similar christological use of the term Lord in both contexts. For instance, at 1 Clement 12.7 we hear about the blood of the Lord and at 1 Clement 21.6 about the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. Even more clearly we find the quotation that Paul uses several times about boasting in the Lord (cf. 1 Clem. 13.1 with 1 Cor 1:31; 2 Cor 10:17). We also find the mention of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the first fruits from the dead (1 Clem. 24.1; 42.3; cf. 1 Cor 15:20). The Lord Jesus Christ is said to be the elect* or chosen one at 1 Clement 64.1 (cf. 1 Cor 1:2), and he concludes at 1 Clement 65.2 with the Pauline benediction "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." It is the Lord Jesus Christ who now lives as God lives (in heaven), according to 1 Clement 58.2. Finally we are told that the apostles knew that later there would be strife over the title of bishop through our Lord Jesus Christ.

It is also true that when Clement uses the OT in this letter, "Lord" seems to refer only to the Lord God. Thus the reference to Isaiah 1:16-20 at 1 Clement 8.4 is followed with the familiar "says the Lord." In the discourse on Isaiah 53:1-12 at 1 Clement 16 "Lord" means God not only in the quotation of the text but also after it when Clement refers to the fact that "the Lord delivered him [i.e., Christ] up for our sins." The quotation of Proverbs 20:27 about "the Spirit of the Lord" is of a similar nature, as is the reference to the fear of the Lord at 1 Clement 22.1, where Psalm 34:11-17 is alluded to. One may also note the conglomerate citation of texts from Deuteronomy and Numbers at 1 Clement 29.2-3, where the subject is the portion of the Lord. The Genesis creation* story is cited as proof that the Lord God adorned the divine self with good works, and the believer is urged to do likewise at 1 Clement 33.4-8. Exodus 31 and Exodus 32 are used to speak of the pardoning of sins* by the Lord God (1 Clem. 53.4), and Job 5:17-26 is used to stress the Lord's chastening and reproving of his people (1 Clem. 56.3-6).

The use of the OT in 1 Clement shows that this author stands in some contact with the earliest Jewish Christian reflections on Jesus (see 1, 2 above) and writes before the overly christological reading of the OT has become dominant (cf. Hanson and Hagner).

2 Clement deserves a separate treatment, not least because it was not likely written by Clement but is a later document. This document, unlike 1 Clement, is full of allusions to sayings of Jesus rather than those of Paul and also has some OT quotes or allusions in which "Lord" means "God." For examples of the former phenomenon we may examine 2 Clement 4.1-2, where Matthew 7:21 is quoted and the author refers to the fact that lip service to the Lord will not save a person. At 2 Clement 6.1 the phrase "the Lord says" introduces a quote of Matthew 6:24/Luke 16:13, and at 2 Clement 8.5 it prefaces a partial quote from Luke 16:10-12. This text is said to be part of the commandments of the Lord (2 Clem. 8.4). At 2 Clement 9.11 the phrase "the Lord said" prefaces a paraphrase of Mark 3:35 and its parallels. A saying, sometimes attributed to the apocryphal* Gospel of the Egyptians, is attributed to the Lord (Jesus) at 2 Clement 4.5: "If you are gathered together into my bosom and do not do my commandments, I will cast you out." There seems to be a partial quotation from 1 Corinthians 2:9 at 2 Clement 14.5 speaking about "what the Lord has prepared" for his elect. The preceding suggests that by the time the author of 2 Clement was writing, the Gospels and Paul's writings were being treated as sacred texts, equally useful as the OT to be used in saying something authoritative about God and "the Lord Jesus."

The author of 2 Clement seems to go further than the other authors we have surveyed in saying that Christ the Lord "saved us, though he was originally spirit, became flesh and so called us" (2 Clem. 9.5). In other words he speaks of a preexistent Lord (cf. Craddock).

OT quotations are not frequent in this document, but where we find them and the term kyrios it seems to refer to God simpliciter. For example, the quote of Isaiah 52:5 is introduced by "For the Lord says"; Isaiah 66:24 is quoted at 2 Clement 17:4, and in both instances "Lord" refers to God. The reference to the will of the Lord in the first part of 2 Clement 14.1 is followed by the quote of Jeremiah 7:11 and seems to refer to God, since in the first part of 2 Clement 14.1 the phrase "the will of the Father" is found.

6.3. The Letter of Polycarp to the Philippians. Polycarp's Letter to the Philippians is a brief work in which we find various explicitly Christian uses of the term kyrios. Thus we find the phrase "the Lord Jesus Christ" repeatedly (Pol. Phil. 1.1-2; 2.1; 12.2; 14.1). There appear to be no examples in this letter where "Lord" does not mean Jesus. Lord and God are clearly distinguished in the interesting image of standing before the eyes of the Lord and of God (Pol. Phil. 6.2). At the same time the author speaks of "our Lord and God Jesus Christ" (Pol. Phil. 12.2, in the Latin portion of the manuscript). This phrase is followed immediately by the comment that God raised this Lord and God from the dead (see also Pol. Phil. 2.1, which speaks about the raising of the Lord).

Various references are less explicitly christological. Thus we hear about what the Lord taught, with a quote of Matthew 7:1-2 (Pol. Phil. 2.3; see 6.2 above on 2 Clement), about walking in the commandment of the Lord at 4:1 (Pol. Phil. 4.1; see 6.5 below) or about the oracles of the Lord (Pol. Phil. 7.1; see Jesus Traditions). We hear about the truth of the Lord who was servant of all, a clear reference to his earthly ministry (Pol. Phil. 5.2), and Polycarp speaks about "those who had known the Lord," by which he means those who had known the historical Jesus (Pol. Phil. 11.3; cf. Pol. Phil. 13.2). As we shall see with the letters of Ignatius, this letter also focuses on Christ as Lord and makes no distinction between the Jesus of history and the risen Lord, using the latter terminology even of the earthly Jesus. While the Lord Jesus may be called God in this document, God the Father is not called the Lord.

6.4. The Didache. The Didache uses as its most consistent term for Jesus Christ kyrios, beginning in the prescript with a reference to the Lord that unmistakably refers to Christ (the "Lord's teaching to the heathen by the twelve apostles"). At Didache 8.2 we have a clear reference to Christ as Lord who commanded his disciples to pray the Lord's Prayer. A saying of Jesus is quoted at Didache 9.5 (cf. Mt 7:6) as a saying of the Lord, and this is immediately preceded by a reference to baptism in the Lord's name. There is a good deal of discussion in this work about honoring and receiving those who come and speak in the name of the Lord as if it were the Lord who had come in person (Did. 4.1; 11.2, 4; 12.1), for they bring the knowledge* of the Lord. The Jewish concept of agency ("a man's agent [šālîaḥ/apostolos] is as himself"; cf. Hurtado 1988) seems evident in such cases. The test of whether a prophet speaks in the name of Christ is whether "he has the behavior of the Lord" (tous tropous kyriou, Did. 11.8). Probably the reference to bearing the yoke of the Lord is an allusion to Jesus' yoke (Mt 11:29-30). Even clearer is the reference to the gospel* of the Lord at Didache 15.4 or the Lord coming on the clouds at Didache 16.8 (cf. Did. 16.1).

There are also various uses of kyrios referring to God, especially when an OT passage is cited or alluded to (Did. 4.12-13, quoting Deut 4:2; Did. 14.3, alluding to Mal 1:11, 14). In general when the Gospel material is quoted or alluded to, "Lord" means Jesus, while when the OT is used God is meant. Like James, the Didache arises out of a Jewish Christian milieu that is in close contact with the Matthean form of Jesus' sayings (cf. Witherington, Sage 1994; see Matthean Community; Worship).

At Didache 14.1 we have the redundant expression "on the Lord's day of the Lord" (kyriakēn de kyriou), which suggests that by the time this document was written the phrase "Lord's day"* was conventional. The idea of a Lord's day is found in Revelation 1:10, but there it is not specified as a day of Christian worship or identified as being the first day of the week. There is, however, a contrast between the Lord's day and the Jewish sabbath in Ignatius's writings (Ign. Magn. 9.1), where it is said that Christians no longer live for the sabbath (on Ignatius see 6.6 below). We may conclude from these various hints that a Lord's day was set apart and special for various early Christians (Rom 14:5-6), but there was probably not a uniform practice in this matter in early Christianity.

One may also point out the use of marana tha in Didache 10.6, in a context similar to what one finds in 1 Corinthians 16:22. In both cases the Aramaic phrase is not translated and occurs just before the close of a section of the document. In both cases the phrase probably should be seen as a prayer formula, especially in view of the similarity to Revelation 22:20, and should be translated as "Come, Lord" (marana tha rather than maran atha, which would probably be translated "the Lord [has] come"; cf. Witherington 1995).

The author of the Didache uses the term kyrios in some of the same diverse ways we find in the canonical texts. He shows no hesitancy to refer to the earthly Jesus as already the Lord, who gave various teachings and did various things. There is no hint of adoptionism in this work.

6.5. The Shepherd of Hermas. In the lengthy Jewish Christian work commonly called the Shepherd of Hermas the term kyrios appears dozens of times, and almost without any possible exception the term refers to God, not to Jesus. The author prefers to use the term "the Son" to refer to Jesus and uses the term "the Lord" in its OT manner, including the use of such familiar OT phrases or concepts as "the fear of the Lord" (Herm. Man. 7.1; 10.1.6, paralleling "the fear of God"), "knowing the Lord" (Herm. Vis. 3.3.1), the angel of the Lord (Herm. Sim. 8.1.2; 8.2.1), "the commandment(s) of the Lord" (Herm. Vis. 3.5.3; 3.8.2; Herm. Sim. 5.2.4; 8.3.8; 8.7.6), "sinning against the Lord" (Herm. Vis. 1.3.4; 3.1.5-6), blaspheming the Lord (Herm. Vis. 2.2.2; Herm. Sim. 6.2.4), serving the Lord (Herm. Man. 5.1.3; Herm. Sim. 7.6; 9.27.3; in Herm. Sim. 1.7; 4.5 appropriately using douleuontes tō kyriō) and praying to or petitioning of the Lord (cf. Herm. Vis. 1.1.3; 2.2.1; 3.1.2; 3.9.6; 3.10.6; Herm. Sim. 5.3.7; 5.4.3).

The vocative kyrie is used repeatedly in direct address to God and others with no particular nuances about the divinity of the one addressed (cf. Herm. Sim. 3.1; 4.1; 5.1; 6.5.5; 7.1 and passim). Kyrios also appears to refer to a human ruler of a country (Herm. Sim. 1.1.4).

Some debate could be offered as to whether Christ might be alluded to in the references to suffering in the name of the Lord (Herm. Vis. 3.5.2; cf. Herm. Sim. 8.1.1), but the author does not make clear that such is the case. A christological reference is more probable when the author speaks of those who had the name of the Lord called over them (presumably at baptism; Herm. Sim. 8.6.4, apparently a quote of Jas 2:7; see also Herm. Sim. 9.26.6). The use of kyrios with the possessive their may suggest that Jesus is meant (Herm. Vis. 3.6.5), but the author does not say so explicitly. It seems clear that some later Christian scribes felt frustrated with lack of clear reference to Christ, for there are places in some manuscripts where the possessive our is added to "Lord" in a way that suggests a christological reference (Herm. Vis. 3.9.10 and the textual variants). Whenever the OT is quoted or alluded to with a reference to "the Lord," a theological rather than christological reference seems clear (Herm. Vis. 3.11.3, quoting Ps 55:22; Herm. Vis. 4.2.4, where "God" parallels "Lord"; Herm. Man. 4.2.2, using a phrase similar to that found in Judg 2:11; 3:12; Herm. Man. 9.6 cf. with Prov 3:5).

A reference to the indwelling Lord (Herm. Man. 3.1.1) seems to be further identified as the spirit (pneuma) that dwells within "this flesh." The one who has the Lord in his heart is contrasted with the one who has the Lord only on his lips (Herm. Man. 12.4.3-5). One finds the phrase "put on the faith of the Lord" (endysai tēn pistin tou kyriou, Herm. Sim. 6.1.2; also at Herm. Sim. 6.3.6), which may mean faith in the Lord but could equally well mean the faith that the Lord had and modeled for believers to follow (cf. Witherington, Narrative 1994) In either case, but especially if we are dealing with a subjective genitive, we likely have a christological reference. A christological reference seems even more probable in Similtudes 5.4.3, in which we hear about the "sayings of the Lord" (ta rhēmata tou kyriou; also at Herm. Sim. 9.11.8).

Toward the end of the work, in the section of parables, christological references to the Son* become more prevalent, and we also find the remarkable reference to "the glorious man and Lord of all the tower" (i.e., the church; Herm. Sim. 9.7.1). The first two major sections of the document have little if any christology, but this is not the case as the third section of the book draws to a close. Yet at places in this third division of the work a clear distinction is made between "the Lord" and the Son, the former referring to the Father. For example, the Son is the only gate or entrance to the Lord (Herm. Sim. 9.11.6); we also we find the phrase "those who believe on the Lord through his Son" (Herm. Sim. 9.13.5). Even as late as Similitudes 9.19.1 we find "Lord" paralleling and alluding to God, not Christ. Similitudes 9.23.4 says, "God and our Lord who [singular] rules over all . . . bears no malice"; "God" and "Lord" refer to one person, and the verb that follows is also in the singular (mnesikakei).

All these permutations and combinations bear witness to a Jewish person who has become a Christian, and while he is familiar with the language of the Hebrew Scriptures, he has made some adjustments in his language to include God's Son, who on some occasions he alludes to as the Lord. This document may reflect the sort of ethos that existed among Jewish Christians in Rome.* It was so highly valued that various Christian writers in the second and third centuries regarded it as Scripture (cf. Duffy, 437.)

6.6 The Letters of Ignatius. The letters of Ignatius of Antioch display a plethora of uses of kyrios, and some uses are of special interest as they show how ideas developed after the canonical period.

In these letters kyrios seems always to refer to Christ. The phrase "the Lord Jesus Christ" is frequently coupled with "God the Father" in initial greetings (Ign. Pol. Ign. Phld.; also at Phil 1:2) or closing remarks as the one who rewards the faithful (Ign. Smyrn. 11.2), or it is used when Ignatius speaks of the cross (Ign. Smyrn. 1.1). This comports with his other references to the flesh of the Lord (Ign. Trall. 8.1) or the passion of the Lord (Ign. Phld. presc.). He can even use the phrase the "flesh of the Lord Jesus Christ" to refer to what one is united with in partaking of the Eucharist (Ign. Phil. 4.1). This phrase is also used when he refers to the coming of the Savior "our Lord Jesus Christ" (Ign. Phld. 9.2).

Ignatius is influenced by Paul's letters, and so he speaks about being imitators of the Lord (cf. Ign. Eph. 3.2 with 1 Cor 11:1 and Trakatellis). He also closes a letter using a Pauline phrase, en kyriō (Ign. Pol. 8.3). It is the Lord about whom Ignatius gives testimony (Ign. Trall. 10.1), and he stresses that bishops should be regarded as the Lord himself (Ign. Eph. 6.1). The Lord is the one who forgives those who repent (Ign. Phld. 8.1; see Forgiveness; Repentance), who receives believers (Ign. Smyrn. 11.1) and who knows the secrets of the heart (Ign. Eph. 15.3). It is the Lord Jesus who came and acted upon the earth (Ign. Smyrn. 4.2). As D. Trakatellis stresses, Ignatius did not invent the idea of applying God language to Jesus, but he, more than any other figure in the literature surveyed, reflects the theology of the church that was to become orthodoxy through the councils of Nicea and Chalcedon. In particular he reflects the idea of the Incarnation and the full lordship of Christ even before his earthly ministry.

In insistence and emphasis, though not in substance, Ignatius breaks new christological ground. "What Ignatius did was to interpret the Johannine and Pauline christological traditions or formulas in a way that could serve the immediate and pressing needs of the church. . . . One of the results of his interpretation is his fascinating God language" (Trakatellis, 430). It is probable that the influence of Docetists* on some of Ignatius's flock pressured him in this direction.

6.7. Justin Martyr. Of the material that has been generally accepted as coming from the hand of Justin Martyr (Apology I, Apology II and the Dialogue with Trypho) only a little needs to be said. When Justin quotes the OT, kyrios tends to refer to God the Father rather than Christ (cf. Justin Apol. I 37 with Dial. Tryph. 27), but there are exceptions: he appears to quote some form of Psalm 96, referring to "the Lord has reigned from the tree," or he quotes Lamentations 4:20 (LXX) as speaking of "the breath before our face is the Lord Christ." On the basis of texts like Psalm 110:1, Justin argues that David calls Jesus both "Christ and God" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 126). In a striking manner Justin speaks of the Lord who rained fire from heaven and the other Lord who descended to behold the cry of Sodom, thus following the tradition of the christological interpretation of the OT (Justin Dial. Tryph. 129).

Justin regularly uses the phrase "God the Father and Lord of all" (e.g., Justin Apol. I 36, 44; Dial. Tryph. 7), but he can speak of "the Lord or his Father" immediately after speaking of "God the Lord and Father" (Justin Apol. I 36). Again Justin says, "I will mention to you other words also spoken by the blessed David, from which you will perceive that the Lord is called the Christ . . . and that the Lord, the Father of all, has brought him again from the earth setting him at his own right hand until He makes his enemies his footstool . . . from the time that our Lord Jesus Christ ascended to heaven" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 32). This and other texts show that Justin, like other early Christian writers, stresses that Christ is especially "our Lord" (cf. Justin Dial. Tryph. 133). It becomes clear that for Justin the term kyrios is not used simply to refer to what has become true of Christ since the resurrection. Because of the christological interpretation of the OT, Christ is seen to be referred to as Lord not only in Jewish prophecy about the future but also in the narratives. The Son at various points is the Lord who is involved in events that transpired long before the Incarnation. The clarity and frequency of these sorts of references show a development beyond what we find in the NT, but it is in a direction already seen or hinted at in the canon.

7. Summary.

In all these documents we have seen both certain repeated patterns and a considerable variety in the use of the term kyrios. It is noticeable that only some of the canonical texts (e.g., Acts) seem to reflect an attempt to use the term kyrios in a way that reflects the narrative subtext about Jesus' earthly and heavenly career.

It is also noticeable that the more a document is influenced by the OT and Jewish ideas, the more the term kyrios, if it stands alone, is likely to refer to the Lord God, not the Lord Jesus. Yet this is only a trend, not a universal pattern. This lack of clear and universal patterns suggests it is well not to exaggerate the image of Jewish Christian communities developing their own theologies apart from Gentile* Christians and their communities. Rather, one must think in terms of cross-fertilization; all early Jewish Christians were at least somewhat Hellenized, though a particular author will normally reflect his primary background and influences most of the time.

All this material suggests that Jewish ways of thinking about Jesus and God persisted well into the second century and that the high christology one finds in Ignatius of Antioch had precedents in earlier Christian documents that came to be seen as canonical, particularly the Pauline and Johannine ones. The old, neat dichotomies between early and primitive Jewish christologies versus later, higher and more Hellenistic christologies are too simplistic when one studies the material carefully, especially in view of the enormous importance of sapiential ways of thinking about Jesus from the beginnings of early Christianity (cf. Witherington, Sage 1994).

See also CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; DOCETISM; LAMB; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; LOGOS CHRISTOLOGY; LORD'S DAY; PREEXISTENCE; SHEPHERD, FLOCK; SON OF GOD; STONE, CORNERSTONE; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); H. Bietenhard, "Lord," NIDNTT 2:510-20; M. Black, "The Christological Use of the Old Testament in the New Testament," NTS 18 (1971-72) 1-14; F. B. Craddock, The Preexistence of Christ in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959); P. E. Davies, "Primitive Christology in 1 Peter" in Festschrift to Honor F. W. Gingrich, ed. E. H. Barth and R. E. Cocroft (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 115-22; S. H. Duffy, "The Early Church Fathers and the Great Councils: The Emergence of Classical Christianity" in Jesus One and Many: The Christological Concept of New Testament Authors, ed. E. Richard (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1988) 435-86; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); idem, The Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991); J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke 1-9 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981) 143-270; idem, "The Semitic Background of the New Testament Kyrios-Title" in A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979) 115-42; W. Foerster, "κύριος κτλ," TDNT 3:1039-98; E. J. Goodspeed, "First Clement Called Forth by Hebrews," JBL 30 (1911) 157-60; D. A. Hagner, The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus: An Analysis and Critique of the Modern Jewish Study of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1984); A. T. Hanson, Jesus Christ in the Old Testament (London: SPCK, 1965); M. Hengel, Between Jesus and Paul (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, "Christological Titles in Early Christianity" in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 425-48; A. A. Hoekema, "The Perfection of Christ in Hebrews," CTJ 9 (1974) 31-37; G. Hughes, Hebrews and Hermeneutics: The Epistle to the Hebrews as a New Testament Example of Biblical Interpretation (SNTSMS 36; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); P. E. Hughes, "The Christology of Hebrews," SWJT 28 (1985) 19-27; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); D. L. Jones, "The Title kyrios in Luke-Acts" in SBLSP (1974) 2:85-101; H. C. Kee, Good News to the Ends of the Earth: The Theology of Acts (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); H. Krafft, "Christologie und Eschatologie im 1. Petrusbrief," ExT 10 (1950-51) 120-26; R. N. Longenecker, The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity (SBT 2d series 17; Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1970); B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament (New York: United Bible Societies, 1971); C. F. D. Moule, "The Christology of Acts" in Studies in Luke-Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (Nashville: Abingdon, 1966) 159-85; R. C. Nevius, "Kyrios and Iēsous in St. Luke," ATR 48 (1966) 75-77; C. Rowland, "The Vision of Christ in Rev. 113ff. The Debt of an Early Christology to an Aspect of Jewish Angelology," JTS 31 (1980) 1-11; J. T. Squires, The Plan of God in Luke-Acts (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); D. Trakatellis, "God Language in Ignatius of Antioch" in The Future of Early Christianity: Essays in Honor of Helmut Koester, ed. B. Pearson et al. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 422-30; B. Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); idem, ed., History, Literature and Society in the Book of Acts (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); idem, Jesus, Paul and the End of the World (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992); idem, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); idem, Paul's Narrative Thought World: The Tapestry of Tragedy and Triumph (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1994).

B. Witherington III

LORD'S DAY

Lord's day observance in weekly commemoration of Jesus' resurrection* on "the first day of the week" began at an early point in the apostolic age and in the post-apostolic age involved transfer of Mosaic law* to new covenant* structures and norms.

1. Introduction
2. Linguistic Considerations
3. Historical Considerations
4. Theological Considerations

1. Introduction.

Discussion of the Lord's day treats the development leading to second-century and later Sunday worship* in relation to the Jewish sabbath. Was there a transfer during the apostolic age wherein a creation ordinance, involving the principle of one day in seven, was shifted along with the fourth "word" of the Decalogue to the Lord's day (e.g., Beckwith and Stott; Murray)? Or did a shift from sabbath to Sunday begin only in the second century in the context of increasing anti-Judaism in the church* and in direct contravention of the practice and teaching of the Lord* and his apostles,* who had upheld sabbath observance (Bacchiocchi; Strand)? Or did Lord's day observance arise during the apostolic age alongside sabbath observance and essentially independently from it, while the Mosaic sabbath was seen to find its fulfillment in the work of Christ* broadly conceived (Carson)? The discussion thus involves the interrelationship of both historical and theological issues. Recent study has tended to highlight the sparsity and ambiguity of the earlier historical evidence, and this article will devote most of its space to that side of the question, followed by a briefer treatment of related theological issues.

2. Linguistic Considerations.

The adjective kyriakos first appears in Greek literature in 1 Corinthians 11:20 and elsewhere in the NT only in Revelation 1:10. Nor is it used in non-Christian Jewish literature. In secular Greek, where the word begins to appear A.D. 68, after but independent of Paul's usage, it almost always refers to the emperor* and has the sense of "belonging to the emperor" or "imperial."

Among second-century Christian writers the phrase kyriakē hēmera or kyriakē alone means "the Lord's day" in the following passages: Didache 14.1; Ignatius Magnesians 9.1; Gospel of Peter 35, 50; Dionysius of Corinth (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.23.11 [PG 20.388C]); Epistula Apostolorum 18 (Coptic); Acts of Peter (Actus Vercellenses 29-30); Acts of Paul; Melito of Sardis (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.26.2 [PG 20.389A]); Irenaeus Fragment 7 (PG 7.1233); and Valentinian (Clement of Alexandria Excerpts from Theodotus 63 [PG 9.689B]). In Clement of Alexandria the phrase kyriakē hēmera occurs twice: Stromateis 5.14 (PG 9.161A) and 7.12 (PG 9.504C). In addition kyriakos is used several times in other connections. For further linguistic considerations see LSJ 1013; MM 364; BAGD 458; PGL 785-86; Louw-Nida, 1:139; Bietenhard, 518; Fitzmyer, 331; Foerster; Spicq; Stott NIDNTT 3:411-12.

Examination of usage leads to the conclusion that "in meaning the word kyriakos is simply synonymous with (tou) kyriou in all cases where (tou) kyriou is used adjectivally with a noun, with the exception of the objective genitive" (Bauckham, 224); kyriakos and (tou) kyriou seem to be interchangeable. The sparse usage of the adjective in the NT (twice) corresponds to contemporary usage in general and is probably not due to any special meaning. The expression "Lord's day" was not likely in use when 1 Corinthians and Acts* were written, so that its absence in those works does not count as evidence against any custom. The use of the adjective kyriakos in this particular expression does become relatively common, however, probably due to the fact that hēmera (tou) kyriou was already a technical expression for the eschatological* Day of the Lord (see Day of the Lord). There is also no linguistic support for the thesis (Rordorf 1968) that the use of the same adjective in 1 Corinthians 11:20 and Revelation 1:10 indicates that the Lord's day grew out of the Lord's Supper.* The terminological correlation could have been noted already in the first century, but the thesis that the name of the day grew out of the name of the meal is unproven (Bauckham, 226-27, 233-36).

3. Historical Considerations.

It will be taken for granted that many Christians would have kept sabbath throughout the apostolic period and beyond (e.g., Bacchiocchi, 132-64); Jesus himself had done so, and Easter was observed annually in connection with the Passover (Jeremias, 900-904). The question is not whether Christianity created a rival "feast" but whether there is any evidence for a practice, within the apostolic period, of meeting to "break bread" on the first day of each week due to the fact that the Messiah's resurrection had occurred on that day.

3.1. 1 Corinthians 16:2. At a fairly early date Paul directs the Corinthians to provide for his collection campaign by following a rule that he had also established for the churches in Galatia, that is, to lay up an amount of money weekly, specifically on "the first day of the week" (1 Cor 16:2). The traditional approach to the passage has been to assume that the last detail has no rationale unless Paul is assuming that this day was already a special occasion for the church. The chief objection to this interpretation has been that Paul directs the Corinthians to lay up funds privately. No regular gathering or common coffer (cf. Acts 4:34—5:2) in connection with an assembly is mentioned, let alone commanded.

This point can nonetheless be made to prove too much if it is made to suggest that the church did not meet on that day. The fact remains that Paul specifies "the first day of the week" and takes for granted that the choice of this particular day would have made sense to the Corinthians (as it also had to the churches in Galatia). Did Paul pick that day at random, simply wanting to encourage regular giving? Possibly Did he select it due to budgetary principles? Perhaps, though the argument is at best conjecture and possibly special pleading (nor is there evidence that the first day was pay day). If we have not excluded on dogmatic grounds the possibility of a regular assembly on the day in question, then some such custom remains the most likely explanation.

First, it should not be overlooked that the phrase "the first day of the week" occurs in the NT outside of 1 Corinthians 16:2 and Acts 20:7 only in the resurrection narratives (Mk 16:2; Mt 28:1; Lk 24:1; Jn 20:1,19; in the LXX only the title to Ps 23 [24]) and that in spite of the passion prediction concerning the "third day." Given that the planetary week was in general use at the time (Bacchiocchi, 238-51), it is reasonable to expect that Paul's casual usage of the Jewish name of the day with a predominantly Gentile audience has behind it some further explanation. We may assume what is probable (1 Cor 11:23-26; 15:1-8, though Paul alludes to the "third day"), namely, that this church has in some fashion been exposed to the narrative traditions that would later with one voice identify the day of the resurrection and appearances as the "first day of the week" (and John does so emphatically; see 3.4 below). We may also note the usage (and nonusage) of the expression in the literary remains of apostolic Christianity and observe the contextual proximity of 1 Corinthians 16:1-4 to the discussion of the resurrection in the previous chapter (although no thematic link is demanded). In view of the absence of any other explanation for the selection of this day, it is no matter of eisegesis to find hints of "resurrection day" in Paul's use of the expression in 1 Corinthians 16:2.

Second, Paul invested this collection with far-reaching theological significance (e.g., Rom 15:27). Such a diakonia tēs leitourgias (ministry of service; 2 Cor 9:12; cf. Rom 15:27) and a gathering for celebration of the Eucharist would presumably be mutually augmentative and fittingly joined on the day of the resurrection, even if they did not transpire at the same time on that day. Even if the church met other days as well it remains suggestive that Paul singled out this day for the purposes of personal participation (weekly) in a profoundly spiritual act. It therefore seems better to conclude that Christians did customarily meet on the "first day of the week" and to infer that there is a good reason for the private nature of the collection than to assume that the private nature of the collection excludes any meeting. Even so, at best the text only assumes a custom of meeting on the first day, and the directions regarding the collection would seem to highlight that day's observance; there is no imperative stated or assumed.

3.2. Luke 24:1. In his account of the resurrection Luke records the appearance of Jesus to two disciples on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24:13-35), noting that this took place on the same day as the resurrection (Lk 24:13), that is, "on the first day of the week" (Lk 24:1). Upon arriving at the village, Luke reports, Jesus took bread, blessed and broke it, and gave it to them (Lk 24:30). The wording is quite similar to that of Luke 22:19, and we may with some confidence take this as an allusion to the Last Supper. Whether we have here an account of the founding of first-day observance cannot be demonstrated. Yet from the standpoint of Luke's Gospel we have a celebration of the Lord's Supper on the day of the resurrection (the two are not unrelated), specifically, "on the first day of the week." No custom is indicated, nor is there any basis for finding here details of eucharistic liturgy. But the memory of Lord's Supper observance on that particular "first day of the week" is fixed in tradition.

3.3. Acts 20:7. This text contains a remarkable convergence of three suggestive ideas: the expression "the first day of the week"; a "gathering" for the purpose of "breaking bread"; a story revolving around a resurrection. In view of the fact that the Jewish expression "the first day of the week" is used by the Gentile author and that it is used only in Luke 24:1 and Acts 20:7 (concerning a Gentile* church), both times associated with the breaking of bread, there might be yet more justification for sensing here an allusion to Jesus' resurrection in the use of this expression. This is all the more likely in view of a key motif of the story for which Paul's discourse and the burning lamps are stage props: the "resurrection" of the sleepy lad. The expression "to break bread" is not a typical Jewish expression for a meal (versus "to eat bread") but is more likely a peculiar way of referring to the Lord's Supper, in this case probably combined with an actual meal. This likelihood is increased by the combination of "to break bread" with "gathering" (cf. 1 Cor 11:20, 24; Did. 14.1; Ign. Eph. 20.2). We have to do, then, with a formal gathering of the church on the first day of the week, the stated purpose of which is to celebrate the Lord's Supper rather than to say farewell to Paul.

Though it is no longer clear whether the evening in question would have fallen on Saturday (after sabbath, by Jewish reckoning) or Sunday (by Roman reckoning), the issue is immaterial since practice may have varied; from Luke's point of view the meeting took place on "the first day of the week." A journey on Sunday would have given no offense since it was not a Christian sabbath, but a Roman reckoning is more likely (see Acts 3:1; further Turner, 129-30), and the delay of the meal until early Monday morning in spite of the stated purpose (Acts 20:7) is a merely circumstantial delay.

All of this does not establish that there was a weekly pattern of holding a special meeting on Sunday. In favor of such a custom it can be noted that as Luke phrases it the gathering is not for the purpose of giving Paul an opportunity to speak but for the purpose of "breaking bread." Though the timing of the meeting could have been occasioned by Paul's imminent departure, Luke does not say that. Rather, he mentions that Paul was going to be leaving the next day by way of explaining the discourse, especially its length (its content is of no interest). It is also improbable that Luke mentions which day of the week it was merely by way of indicating chronology, as in that case he leaves too many gaps. Without any other satisfactory explanation either for mentioning that it was the first day of the week (beyond the resurrection of the lad, which is itself suggestive of a particular regard for that day) or for stating what the purpose of the gathering was, we are left with the likelihood that the clause ("we gathered together to break bread") is the natural accompaniment to the prepositional phrase ("on the first day of the week"); in other words there is an assumed and close relationship between them. The suggestion is strong that this type of gathering was customary on that particular day.

Again there is no imperative, nor does this look like this is intended to be a normative model. We cannot say how representative this account is of what was practiced at the time by other churches in other areas. It does indicate, however, the existence of a custom in Troas and presumably among Luke's intended readers (see Worship).

3.4. John 20:1, 19. Twice John underlines the day of the week on which Christ arose and appeared ("the first day of the week"; Jn 20:1, 19). John 20:19, in which Jesus appears to his gathered disciples, is especially emphatic insofar as the phrase "the first day of the week" follows a demonstrative pronoun pointing back to John 20:1. Is it merely coincidental that the next appearance of Jesus in the midst of his gathered disciples is exactly one week later (Jn 20:26), that is, on the first day of the week? This must be phrased as a question, for the matter is left unclear, but the suggestion is very strong. We need only suppose that "the first day of the week" had already come to carry a special meaning in the gatherings of the John's churches to appreciate how this passage would have resonated with them.

3.5. Revelation 1:10. The cause of our uncertainty in this passage, as it will be in the early postapostolic period, is that the writers take for granted that the readers know what the referent is while the form of the statement requires only the idea of a specified day. A day does not, however, need to be twenty-four hours long, and it can be specified in different ways: by calendar (weekly, monthly, etc.) or some other established reference point (e.g., an expected event). The adjective in Revelation 1:10 narrows the options, but only to a point. The three primary alternatives (leaving aside the sabbath) are the eschatological Day of the Lord, Easter, and the weekly meeting on the first day of the week, or Sunday.

The difficulty that any argument runs into is that the relevant passages from the first through the early second century must be treated as mutually corroborative precisely because of their ambiguity. The thesis that Revelation 1:10 refers to Easter gains its force from arguing that the NT evidence we have already surveyed does not indicate the existence of first-day observance prior to Revelation 1:10 and that the early- second-century evidence (esp. Did. 14.1 and Ign. Magn. 9.1) refers to an annual observance. On the contrary, we have shown it is likely that weekly observance was already a custom before Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) was written. The general argument that Easter observance preceded and precipitated Sunday observance is problematic, and Didache and Ignatius probably also refer not to Easter but to Sunday (Bauckham, 227-31). This means that only a short while before Ignatius makes mention of weekly observance under the name "Lord's day" and in the same geographical area (the province of Asia), John uses the same expression in Revelation 1:10.

Might not John's reference be to the Day of the Lord? G. W. H. Lampe cites one instance in which the adjective refers to the "last day" (Origen Comm. Joh. 10.35), but it may not be an equivalent expression for "the Day of the Lord" (Stott 1965, 71) and is in any event the exception that proves the rule. There are many ways of referring to the Day of the Lord, and Revelation 1:10 may be one more. But given that the semantic content of the phrase would be the same, whether it is formed with the adjective or the genitive, there is no apparent reason for John to depart from the standard form. This manner of expression would become all the more confusing if the same form of words had already come into use in Asia as a name for the first day, as Didache and Ignatius might indicate. It is also to be observed that the content of Revelation is not concerned exclusively with the Day of the Lord (Rev 1:1—3:22; Rev 21—22), and the standpoint of the vision* does not appear to be consistently from that "day." Thus neither the word or phrase nor the context of Revelation would indicate to the reader that the Day of the Lord is in view.

There may be no exegesis without presuppositions, but a prima facie reading of Revelation 1:9-10 suggests that we are being told the historical where and when of John's vision regarding the seven churches. Patmos does not appear to be a metaphor for an eschatological reality, and we do not expect the Lord's day to be mentioned in that connection either. Given the considerations already raised against the other alternatives, particularly in view of the probable preexistence of first-day observance (possibly even under the name of "Lord's day"), a reference to the first day of the week is most likely.

Why did the day come to be called the "Lord's day"? The thesis that the name of the day stemmed from the name of the Eucharist (Rordorf 1968) is possible but unproven. The suggestion that the name was chosen in conscious contrast to the use of sebastē as a name for the monthly "emperor's day" and that the regular (weekly) observance of the day was due to the same (Deissmann, 357-61; Charles, 1:22-23) is plausible but essentially conjectural. That the adjective was chosen because the alternative phrasing (genitive of the noun, kyrios) was already a technical expression when used with "day" is likely but leaves unexplained why this day should be characterized as "the Lord's." A general allusion to the decisive victory won by the Lord of lords on the first day of the week with a view to its eschatological and final achievement is most probable in the context of Revelation and is suggestive as a setting for the reception of the vision. Outside of that context there are any number of possible connotations.

3.6. Postapostolic Literature.

3.6.1. Didache 14.1. The Didache is notoriously difficult to date, not least because it seems to have grown over time, and Didache 14.1-3 appears to some scholars to be an intrusion into the flow of community instructions. Most, however, are probably inclined to date some form of the document around or just before the turn of the century and to locate it in Syria or Syro-Palestine. The expression used in Didache 14.1 is difficult: kata kyriakēn de kyriou (according to the Lord's [?] of the Lord). It has been taken as equivalent to the Jewish "Sabbath of the Lord" (Clemens, 708), as the Lord's teaching, as Easter and as the Lord's day (i.e., Sunday). Elsewhere when the noun is implied it is "day," and this is how the Apostolic Constitutions (7.30.1; c. 380) interprets Didache. There are serious problems with the argument for an Easter allusion (Bauckham, 230-31), and the context does not indicate that these are anything other than ordinary meetings centering in the breaking of bread. "Lord's day" is the likely alternative of choice. There is no hint of sabbath theology here.

3.6.2. Ignatius Magnesians 9.1 (c. 100-110). The expression used (following the Latin text with most: mēketi sabbatizontes alla kata kyriakēn zōntes; "no longer sabbatizing but living according to the Lord's [day]") is again opaque, and it is not clear whether it is a comment on OT prophets* or Jewish Christians (Schoedel, 123, favors the latter; see Jewish Christianity). The concern is with ways of life (kata) so that it is not possible to be sure, but an allusion to weekly Lord's day observance gets the nod over annual observance in view of the parallel with what is probably centered in weekly sabbath observance (Bauckham, 228-29). This would be confirmed if it could be shown that the choice of the verb (aneteilen; "arose"), more often associated with the rising of the sun than with the resurrection, was a play on the name Sunday. The text may oppose and so give evidence of Gentile sabbath observance, but it is also possible that the sabbath is introduced simply to make a point. It is also possible that Ignatius knew and was partially dependent on Didache 14.1 (Jefford). If so this would confirm not only an earlier date for Didache 14.1 but also that the two passages have the same idea in mind. It should be noted that observance of the day is connected to the resurrection. Again there is no trace of transfer theology, and in this case sabbath observance seems to be universally excluded.

As for the remaining usages of kyriakos noted above, Gospel of Peter 35 and 50 (Syria; mid-second century) cannot be definitely construed as allusions to Sunday observance, and the title to Melito* of Sardis's work provides little information, but the other instances are clearer in their reference to Sunday. To these can be added Pliny's letter to Trajan (c. 112; Bithynia in Asia Minor), which refers to meetings of Christians on an appointed day (stato die) in both morning and evening (Pliny Ep. 10.96). Pliny gives no reference point by which we can fix the "appointed day" (it need not have been the same day each week), but taken together with the other evidence of regular meetings in that geographical area it is reasonable to suppose that the reference is to Sunday. Certainly Barnabas 15.9 (c. 130-35, possibly earlier; provenance uncertain) uses the phrase "eighth day" to refer to Sunday. His comment grounds the significance of the day in the resurrection and seems to assume that the day's observance is a longstanding custom. Like Ignatius, Barnabas desires to exclude sabbath observance entirely, yet without transferring the sabbath to Sunday. Finally Justin Martyr (c. 100-165) not only makes definite mention of Sunday but also provides details of the day's activities (Apol. I 67; see Worship).

3.7. Conclusions and Further Observations. The evidence for or against a weekly commemoration of the resurrection in the apostolic age is ambiguous, especially when each passage is examined in isolation. Yet one hypothesis does fit comfortably over all the data and for that reason is to be favored. From a very early point, at least some believers recognized the "first day of the week" as a special day for the celebration of the Eucharist. The resurrection of Messiah, the Son* of God, does not happen often and would itself be sufficient cause for the establishment of a novel, Jewish custom. In a Jewish setting a weekly rhythm is natural, all the more so among believers who may not have anticipated a long delay before their Lord's return.

We cannot say that within the apostolic period this practice was universally recognized or that it was uniform with respect to how the day was reckoned, by Jewish or Roman calculation. It did not necessarily exclude gatherings on other days of the week and it existed peacefully alongside sabbath observance for many Christians (see the analogous practice of Acts 2:46). There is no indication in the NT evidence that the day displaced or rivaled the sabbath, that it was a day of rest, that it had anything to do with the Fourth Commandment or that it involved any sort of transfer theology. If the NT evidence for it gives any explanation for the fact of the day's observance and of its significance, it is in the resurrection.

By the turn of the first century it can be taken for granted not only that the weekly observance of Jesus' resurrection is customary but even that it can be referred to intelligibly in shorthand fashion (adjective only) as the Lord's (day). The early postapostolic literature also confirms that the absence of evidence for a transfer theology in the NT is not accidental. There is not only a lack of evidence for connecting the Lord's day to the OT sabbath command, but also there is evidence against it (e.g., in the fact that the Lord's day was not a day of rest; see below). The tendency visible in Ignatius and Barnabas to oppose the Jewish and Christian days has been put in its proper perspective when viewed as a facet of the "partings of the ways" of Judaism and Christianity (Bacchiocchi; see Christianity and Judaism), but it must be stressed that there is no evidence for an anti-Judaism motive behind Lord's day observance in the NT itself, and it would be a serious mistake to read that type of opposition into the apostolic period. In any event the Fathers' polemic leaves no room for the thesis that they construed Sunday as the Christian sabbath.

As to how the day was observed, we have nothing solid to go on in the NT beyond the rather sure point that the celebration of the Eucharist was central. Acts 20:7-36, with its evening meeting, is no sure guide to what was universally customary (nor is it clear whether in that case it was the evening following sabbath or Sunday evening), and the resurrection narratives do not clearly point to an evening meeting. During the second century, however, the picture gains detail. The Didache alludes to a (public?) rite of confession preceding the Eucharist. Pliny's letter indicates that in his area (c. 112) believers met before dawn, probably on Sunday, to sing a hymn and take an oath and then come together again in the evening for a meal. Following Trajan's edict outlawing dinners of unlicensed clubs the evening meeting was eliminated. Justin Martyr's account (Apol. I 65-67) supplies further details of the service, including (in this order) reading of Scripture, instruction and exhortation, rising for prayer* (versus remaining seated as on other days; cf. Tertullian De Orat. 23; canon 20 of the Council of Nicea), celebration of the Eucharist and a collection for the needy. Tertullian (c. 160-225) is the first on record to suggest that business be deferred so as to enhance worship (De Orat. 23), but otherwise Sunday was a work day, and cessation from other activities on that day was not widespread until about the third century (Cyprian Ep. 64.4). Even then there is no connection with the fourth Commandment (on the Fourth Commandment and the sabbath rest in postapostolic Christianity see Bauckham, 252-87), and the point is to clear more time for worship. Only with Constantine's edict in 321 does Sunday, the "venerable day of the sun," becomes an official day of rest (at least partially). Ambrose (Ps. 47) and Chrysostom (Gen. Hom. 10.7) firmly attached the rest of Sunday to the Fourth commandment (versus the imperial edict), and following the fourth century there is a steady move toward identifying the sabbath with Sunday.

The different names of the day—first day of the week; Lord's day; eighth day (e.g., Barn. 15.8-9; Justin Martyr Dial. Tryph. 41.4; 138.1; Origen Selec. Ps. 118.164 [PG 12.1624] Ambrose Exp. Ev. Luc. 5.49 [PL 15.1735]; Abr. 2.11 [PL 14.494]); Sunday—are briefly discussed by Rordorf (1982).

4. Theological Considerations.

Thorough treatment of this matter is beyond the scope of this summary article. A few words are in order, however, if only as an indication of a necessary part of the discussion of our topic.

In three passages Paul makes specific comments that transfer Mosaic sabbath observance from the realm of law to that of adiaphora ("matters of indifference") that positively oppose the legal imposition of the sabbath on believers of any ethnic background and that by extension also oppose investing Lord's day observance with normative force. The meaning of these passages is debated, and they must be discussed in the broader context of the law-gospel discussion, but we will only mention them. The upshot of Galatians 4:8-11 in its context is that sabbath observance is not to be imposed on any believer in the name of the Mosaic law, nor is it to be taken up on legal grounds as a promise of anything beyond that which already belongs to believers in Christ. To violate this rule is in Paul's argument to make Christ's death purposeless (Gal 2:21). Romans 14:5-6 gives passing notice to the sabbath issue but makes evident that observance of days, sabbath and Lord's day included, is now a matter of conscience* rather than law. Nor is it possible to reconcile a one-in-seven principle with Romans 14:5-6, at least when it is grounded in law. Legal imposition of sabbath observance as a condition of spirituality is likewise assumed to be inappropriate in Colossians 2:16, for the sabbath was properly a shadow of the eschatological reality that is Christ (cf. Dunn, 171-87, 23-35).

None of these comments proscribes observance of days, and such observance can be a manifestation of either "weak" or "strong" faith. Yet it is not possible against that background to find any grounds for treating the Mosaic sabbath as a continuing legal requirement for Christians. Taken together with the historical evidence, it is difficult to find any basis for transferring the legal force and theological content of the sabbath to the Lord's day. There is certainly no positive evidence for such a transfer or even for a new holy day as such. At the same time these comments of Paul comport with both the historical decline of the sabbath and the initially low profile of Lord's day observance.

Does the NT indicate, then, that the sabbath, of so much theological import in the OT, was only a cul-de-sac? That, robbed of its covenantal-legal force, it was destined merely to come to a close, having been effectively replaced by something unrelated to it? To the contrary, the NT indicates that the sabbath followed its own channel and found its goal in Christ's redemptive work. Here is where John 5:17 should be discussed (cf. also Jn 7:23), as also Colossians 2:16, to which we have already referred, and Matthew 11:28—12:14. It is less evident that controversy over sabbath observance gave any impetus to that treatment of the topic in Hebrews 3:7—4:11 (Laansma), yet there at least we are pointed to the ultimate goal of the creation sabbath (here an exclusively future Heilsgut) and are thus reminded that the sabbath was by no means a cul-de-sac.

It is true to the NT to say that the Mosaic sabbath as a legal and weekly matter was a temporary symbol of a more fundamental and comprehensive salvation, epitomized by and grounded in God's own creation sabbath, and brought to fulfillment (in already-not yet fashion) in Christ's redemptive work. Believers are indeed to "keep sabbath," no longer by observance of a day of the week but now by the upholding of that to which it pointed: the gospel of the cross.* Along independent lines the Lord's day emerges as a nonmandatory but increasingly revered custom by which the central import of the cross is commemorated and its final realization anticipated. It thus augments that which was ordained, the Lord's Supper.

The label used in Revelation 1:10 suggests an underlying, profound regard for what that day of the week symbolically represented and what it would presently come to represent. That in itself, to the extent that it was appreciated, would fill that day with significance and lift it above the others in the hearts of many believers. Yet that this label suggested that the day as such had been claimed by the Lord for religious observance is probably outside of Revelation's horizons.

See also LORD; LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST; RESURRECTION; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Bacchiocchi, From Sabbath to Sunday (Rome: The Pontifical Gregorian University Press, 1977); R. J. Bauckham, "The Lord's Day" in From Sabbath to Lord's Day, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982) 221-50; idem, "Sabbath and Sunday in the Postapostolic Church" in From Sabbath to Lord's Day, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982) 251-98; R. T. Beckwith and W. Stott, This Is the Day (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1978); H. Bietenhard, "Lord, Master," NIDNTT, 2:508-20; D. A. Carson, ed., From Sabbath to Lord's Day (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982); R. H. Charles, Revelation of St. John (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1920); J. S. Clemens, "Lord's Day" in Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, ed. J. Hastings (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1915) 1:707-10; A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1965, repr.); J. D. G. Dunn, The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); T. C. Eskenazi et al., eds., The Sabbath in Jewish and Christian Traditions (New York: Crossroad, 1991); J. A. Fitzmyer, "κύριος, κυριακός," EDNT 2:331; W. Foerster, "κυριακός," TDNT 3:1095-96; C. N. Jefford, "Did Ignatius of Antioch Know the Didache?" in The Didache in Context, ed. C. N. Jefford (NovTSup 77; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995), 330-51; J. Jeremias, "πάσχα," TDNT 5:896-904; P. K. Jewett, The Lord's Day (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971); J. Laansma, " 'I Will Give You Rest': The Background and Significance of the Rest Motif in the New Testament with Special Reference to Mt 11 and Heb 3—4" (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Aberdeen, 1995; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, forthcoming);

J. Murray, "Romans 14:5 and the Weekly Sabbath" in Epistle to the Romans (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959, 1965) 257-59; W. Rordorf, Sabbat und Sonntag in der Alten Kirche (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1972) [texts of primary sources]; idem, Sunday (London: SCM, 1968); idem, "Sunday: The Fullness of Christian Liturgical Time," StudLit 14 (1982) 90-96; W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); C. Spicq, "κυριακός" in Theological Lexicon of the New Testament (3 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994) 2:338-40; W. Stott, "A Note on the Word KYPIAKH in Rev. 1:10," NTS 12 (1965) 70-75; idem, "Sabbath, Lord's Day," NIDNTT 3:405-15; K. A. Strand, ed., The Sabbath in Scripture and History (Washington, DC: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1982); M. M. B. Turner, "The Sabbath, Sunday and the Law in Luke-Acts" in From Sabbath to Lord's Day, ed. D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1982) 99-157.

J. C. Laansma

LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST

The term Lord's Supper, kyriakon deipnon, occurs in the NT only at 1 Corinthians 11:20 (see DPL, Lord's Supper). When the Corinthian Christians gather "as a church [en ekklēsia]" (1 Cor 11:18), their assembly includes a meal to which belong the eating of that bread and the drinking of that cup which "proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor 11:26). It is not clear whether that bread and that cup framed the full meal, bread at the beginning and cup at the end (as would be the case if the Corinthian practice took the same pattern as the apostle Paul's account of Jesus' Last Supper, 1 Cor 11:23-25); or whether that bread and that cup both rather came together after people had otherwise eaten and drunk. It is certain that by their abusive behavior—"each goes ahead with his own meal, and one is hungry and another drunk" (1 Cor 11:21)—the Corinthians are, in the judgment of the apostle Paul and apparently of God also (1 Cor 11:27-34), denaturing "the Lord's Supper." Scholars generally agree that conduct such as that found at Corinth was the likely reason for an eventual separation between the agapē, or love-feast (a designation full of irony in such circumstances), and the sacrament (to speak anachronistically for the apostolic period). In treating the NT and the early postapostolic writings, it will be necessary to speak of the agapē and the Eucharist together; as the second century progresses, a clearer distinction emerges between the love-feast and the Holy Communion.

The Synoptic Gospels and Paul all report the institution by Jesus, at the Last Supper, of a rite with bread and wine as his own memorial (Mt 26:26-29; Mk 14:22-25; Lk 22:17-20, 29-30; 1 Cor 11:23-26; see DJG, Last Supper). The Acts of the Apostles mentions the meals at which the memorial actions probably took place in the primitive Church. A few other echoes of the ritual meal are found elsewhere in the later NT writings. The most important evidence for developments in the second century is provided by the Didache,* the letters of Ignatius* of Antioch, and the Apologies of Justin Martyr and of Tertullian.

1. The Breaking of Bread in Acts
2. The Non-Pauline Epistles and Revelation
3. The Early Postapostolic Period
4. Agape and Eucharist Distinguished
5. Conclusion

1. The Breaking of Bread in Acts.

By noun or by verb Luke speaks five times in Acts* of "the breaking of bread": Acts 2:42 and 46, as part of a description of the life of the Jerusalem* church directly after the outpouring of the Spirit* at Pentecost*; Acts 20:7 and 11, in the narrative of Paul's visit to the assembly at Troas; Acts 27:35, in telling how Paul encouraged the ship's company to take food when in danger of shipwreck. The matter of "tables" in Acts 6:1-6 is also relevant.

In Jewish practice, bread was broken when God was blessed at the start of a meal. In primitive Christianity, the breaking of bread bore the special imprint it had acquired from its significant usage by Jesus. In the Gospel of Luke (in whose light Acts has particularly to be read), Jesus broke the loaves when he fed the five thousand (Lk 9:16); the Savior broke the bread when he gave it to his disciples at the Last Supper, saying, "This is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me" (Lk 22:19); and the risen Lord broke the bread at Emmaus (Lk 24:30) and was known to his two companions "in the breaking of the bread" (Lk 24:35). Around those highly significant occasions cluster then all the multiple words and deeds of Jesus involving food and drink that also give weight and texture to the observance which the church of Acts called by metonymy "the breaking of bread."

Jesus had pictured God's coming reign as a feast: "People will come from east and west, and from north and south, and sit at table in the kingdom of God" (Lk 13:29). Apart from the messianic act of already feeding the multitudes in anticipation of the kingdom, Jesus had been notorious also for eating and drinking with publicans and sinners (Lk 7:34; 15:1-2; see DJG, Table Fellowship); he thereby invited them to repentance (Lk 5:30-32), for the mere eating and drinking in his presence was no guarantee of salvation (Lk 13:22-30). At the Last Supper he spoke of himself as being among his disciples "as one who serves" (Lk 22:27), yet he was also able to promise them a place at his table in the kingdom which his Father had given him (Lk 22:28-30). After his resurrection, his appearance at Emmaus was not the only one in which he shared in a meal with his followers: he ate with the others in Jerusalem (Lk 24:36-43), and in Acts Luke gives Peter the summary statement that "God raised Jesus on the third day and made him manifest . . . to us who were chosen by God as witnesses, who ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead" (Acts 10:40-41). (Acts 1:4 implies the same, if synalizomenos is to be associated with hals, salt, and then understood as a reference to the risen Jesus' eating with the apostles, as in fact the Latin, Syriac and Coptic versions translate.) These, then, are the associations which accompany the meal assemblies perpetuated by the primitive church after the Lord's exaltation.

1.1. Acts 2:41-46. According to Acts 2:41-42, those who at Pentecost repented and were baptized were added to the company of those who "devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and fellowship* [koinōnia], to the breaking of bread and the prayers." It is hard to determine the precise relationship among the elements in this foursome, chiefly because of the difficulty in specifying the meaning of the somewhat elastic word koinōnia. It has been suggested that the four items constitute a service, in liturgical sequence, of preaching, agapē, Eucharist and prayers* (see Worship). Another suggestion is that koinōnia designates a collection (of money or goods), so that "the breaking of bread" might then stand for either an agapē or the Eucharist or both. In any case, the context indicates that the believers shared several things together: not only apostolic instruction, the "breaking of bread" and prayers, but also attendance at the temple (Acts 2:46) and the distribution of material goods as need arose (Acts 2:44-45). Thus the breaking of bread is associated with a common faith, the common worship of God and a common life of mutual service; the "breaking" is for the purpose of "sharing," as Léon-Dufour insists (le partage du pain), and so brings to expression the unity of the community in Christ. The breaking of bread took place in the homes of believers and in conjunction with a meal of which they partook "with glad and generous hearts" (Acts 2:46; cf. du Toit).

The joy* which characterized these meals has led some scholars (notably Lietzmann) to postulate an original "Jerusalem-type" Lord's Supper in distinction from a Pauline type, where the apostle, perhaps in dependence on Hellenistic memorial meals, would have shifted the theme to the Lord's death. While different emphases may have marked the Christian meal at different times and in different places, it is unwise and unnecessary to exaggerate the difference between Jerusalem and Paul in this matter. According to Luke, the Jerusalem church was well aware that the redemption* in which it rejoiced had been bought at the price of the Lord's crucifixion (Acts 2:23), while Paul himself may, in his reminder that the Supper proclaimed the Lord's *death until he comes, have been correcting an overenthusiastic Corinthian supposition that the divine kingdom was already here. The joy (agalliasis) that marked the meals of the Jerusalem church was experienced by the Philippian jailer (ēgalliasato, Acts 16:34), who "set a table" (parethēken trapezan) for Paul and Silas after his baptism.

1.2. Acts 6:1-6. "Tables" had been an issue between the Greek-speakers ("Hellenists") and the Aramaic-speakers ("Hebrews") in the Christian community at Jerusalem (Acts 6:1-6). The primitive church inherited a Jewish tradition of provision for the poor and needy at festive meals, which would be extended to all the needy sisters and brothers in their regular gatherings (Reicke 1948). The Hellenists complained that their widows were not treated fairly in the distribution of food. The daily dole had apparently taken place under the general oversight, though not detailed supervision, of the apostles ("It is not right that we should give up preaching the word of God to serve tables"). The apostles proposed that seven other men be elected to the duty. Seven people with Greek names were chosen, and the apostles prayed and laid their hands upon them. Traditionally this event has been seen as the origin of the diaconate as an order of ministry. The apostles could now devote themselves "to prayer and to the ministry of the word." Some have regretted the divergence between a preaching and a diaconal ministry. It is in any case sad that, as would be the case at Corinth, the sharing of food should be a divisive issue among Christians. Table-fellowship—this time explicitly as a matter of theological principle between Jewish and Gentile Christians—would emerge as a question again in Acts 10—11, where the episode concerning the apostle Peter* and the centurion Cornelius* would be settled by the recognition that "to the Gentiles also God has granted repentance unto life" (Acts 11:18).

1.3. Acts 20:7-12. The next occurrence of "the breaking of bread" in the narrative of Acts falls during the apostle Paul's visit to Troas (Acts 20:7-12). The Christians "gathered together to break bread" on "the first day of the week." The assembly took place (the verb synagō is used) during the evening and night.

Whether it was the evening and night of our Saturday/Sunday or of our Sunday/Monday is uncertain. If Luke is using the Roman system of reckoning, which begins the day in the morning, then the meeting started on Sunday evening. If he is using the Jewish liturgical reckoning, however, the assembly would have started on the evening of Saturday, the beginning of "the first day of the week." It has been suggested that the Christian Sunday originated as a prolongation of the Jewish Sabbath: Christians kept the Sabbath by attending Jewish worship and then, because the Sabbath no longer sufficed since it has been fulfilled by Jesus, they assembled in houses for specifically Christian worship as soon as the Sabbath was over (Riesenfeld; see Lord's Day). If such a Jewish-Christian influence affected the church at Troas, then the assembly of Acts 20:7-12 would have taken place on Saturday/Sunday. On the other hand, Sunday evening may have imposed itself on the earliest church, as the time for the main weekly assembly, on account of the memory of the meals which the risen Lord had shared with his disciples on the first Easter Sunday.

In any case, we find that Paul "prolonged his speech until midnight"; and only then, after incidentally reviving the hapless Eutychus, did the apostle "break bread and eat." This pattern of preaching and meal—recalling the risen Lord's exposition of the Scriptures to the two on the road to Emmaus and his being made known to them in the breaking of the bread (Lk 24:27-35)—may already show a regular practice of "word and table" in the main weekly assembly of the Christians.

1.4. Acts 27:33-38. The most intriguing case of "breaking bread" in Acts occurs during the story of Paul's shipwreck. Acts 27:33-38 reads:

> As day was about to dawn, Paul urged them all to take some food, saying 'Today is the fourteenth day that you have continued in suspense and without food, having taken nothing. Therefore I urge you to take some food; it will give you strength [literally: "this will be for your salvation"], since not a hair is to perish from the head of any of you.' And when he had said this, he took bread, and giving thanks to God in the presence of all he broke it and began to eat. Then they all were encouraged and ate some food themselves. (We were in all two hundred and seventy-six persons in the ship.) And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, throwing out the wheat into the sea.

Strikingly, Paul's actions with the bread mirror those of Jesus at the Last Supper and presage what modern scholarship has called "the 'four-action' shape of the eucharist" (G. Dix): the apostle "took bread" (the "offertory"), he gave thanks (the "eucharistic prayer"), he broke the bread (the "fraction"), he ate (the "communion"). Because Paul was in this way presiding over a meal shared by a whole boatload of presumably heathen sailors and passengers (for there is no indication of two separate meals, one for Paul, Aristarchus and "the travel-diarist," and another for the heathen), it is usually said that this cannot have been a Eucharist but was rather a case simply of Paul observing the Jewish custom of grace before food.

One modern exegete has tried to do more justice to the "eucharistic" tone of Acts 27:35: B. Reicke argued that Acts 27:33-38 is a further stylized account of an incident upon which Paul himself had already put a quasi-eucharistic stamp at the time of its happening; Paul had let the people on board participate in "a prefiguration of the Christian Eucharist as a potential preparation for later discipleship," and the author of Acts, understanding the episode in the same way, had used the story of what happened on the voyage to open up also the prospect of the work that Paul would do in the wider context of the mission when he reached Rome (cf. Acts 28:28-30). It may be wondered whether even this interpretation goes far enough. Those on board a ship running on the rocks (Acts 27:29) were confronted by "the last things": it was a matter of life and death, both physically and, for the heathen, spiritually. The possibility should not be excluded that when the apostle proposed they should all take food, telling them "This will be the saving of you" (Acts 27:34) and having already announced to them that their destiny was in the hands of his God whose will it was that there should be no loss of life among them (Acts 27:21-26), he then celebrated for them the very meal which is life to all who will choose life. Certainly this episode provides the clearest instance of what J. Wanke sees as a eucharistic motif characteristic of Lukan meal stories: the Lord is present to protect and preserve his people.

2. The Non-Pauline Epistles and Revelation.

2.1. Jude 12. This verse may represent the only use in the NT of agapē in the sense of love-feast (the regular meaning of agapē is simply "love"). (In the closely related passage of 2 Peter 2, the manuscripts are divided in verse 13 between agapais ("love-feasts") and apatais ("pleasures," "dissipations"); and I. H. Marshall suggests that the former reading may result from a later scribe's ironing out of a deliberate pun.) In any case, the fiery epistle of Jude* declares that the Christian assembly has been infiltrated by "ungodly persons who pervert the grace of our God into licentiousness and deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ." They are said to be "blemishes on your love-feasts, as they boldly carouse together, looking after themselves."

2.2. Hebrews. It has been argued that "there is little or no evidence in Hebrews* of involvement, on the part of the author or of the community of Christians to which the epistle was addressed, in eucharistic faith and practice" and indeed suggested that, for the writer, "the sacrifice of Christ was of a kind that rendered obsolete every form of cultus that placed a material means of sacramental communion between God and the worshiper" (Williamson). Other exegetes see the Letter to the Hebrews as shot through with allusions to the Eucharist. It is certain that Hebrews contains language that the later Christian tradition has associated with the Eucharist.

Two verses are of particular interest: "Through [Jesus Christ] let us continually offer up a sacrifice* of praise to God, that is, the fruit of lips that acknowledge his name. Do not neglect to do good and to share what you have, for such sacrifices are pleasing to God" (Heb 13:15-16). The "sacrifice of praise (and thanksgiving)" became a designation for the Eucharist; and John Chrysostom, in expounding the gospel story of the healed leper, commented that we offer thanks to God not because God has need of anything but in order to bring us closer to God (Hom. Mt. 25, Migne, PG 57.331). In the Hebrews passage the sacrifice is not limited to verbal confession of God's name but includes also sharing (koinōnia) and good works.

More generally, the Letter to the Hebrews has been considered important in the Christian liturgical tradition for its description of Christ's continuing intercession after his entrance from Calvary into the Holy of Holies: the Eucharist is traditionally seen to represent in ritual mode the high-priestly work of Christ before the face of the Father. Moreover, Hebrews' references to "the blood of the covenant*" resonate with the cup-word at the Eucharist, and in particular Hebrews 13:20 finds an echo in the words of consecration at the Roman Mass: "This is the cup of my blood, the blood of the new and everlasting covenant."

2.3. 1 Peter 2:3. The phrase from Psalm 34:8 echoed in 1 Peter 2:3 about "tasting the goodness of the Lord" has been used as a communion verse in traditional liturgies of the Eucharist. In the Petrine context it comes close to the notion of Christians as "a spiritual house," "a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet 2:5).

2.4. Revelation. At the beginning of Revelation,* the seer says that he "was in the Spirit on the Lord's day" (Rev 1:10). Modern scholarship has suggested that the Apocalypse reflects the church's worship in which John found inspiration, either the Sunday assembly of the congregation or the annual Easter liturgy (depending on the sense of "Lord's Day"). In traditional Christian rites for the Lord's Supper, participants have been summoned by the Sursum Corda ("Lift up your hearts") to join in the heavenly worship and add their voices to the angelic company in singing the Sanctus: "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty" (Rev 4:8; see Liturgical Elements). Besides the praise of God, life in the city of God includes the messianic feast, "the marriage supper of the Lamb." In the Roman Catholic Mass, the invitation to communion borrows from Revelation 19:9: "This is the Lamb of God. . . . Happy are those who are called to his supper." The Jesus of the Apocalypse extends the invitation: "Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any one hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in to him and eat with him, and he with me" (Rev 3:20).

3. The Early Postapostolic Period.

3.1. Didache. The earliest nonscriptural material related to Lord's Supper and love-feast probably comes from the *Didache, or "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," which may belong around the turn of the first century (although scholarly dating of this text, rediscovered in 1875, varies between A.D. 60 and 200). Opinion is divided concerning the Jewish-style table prayers given in chapters 9 and 10, as to whether they belong to an agapē or to the Eucharist (see Worship). The text reads as follows:

> About the thanksgiving, give thanks thus. First about the cup: "We give thanks to you, our Father, for the holy vine of your child (pais) David, which you made known to us through your child (pais) Jesus; glory to you for evermore." And about the broken bread: "We give thanks to you, for the life and knowledge which you made known to us through your child Jesus; glory to you for evermore. As this broken bread was scattered over the mountains, and when brought together became one, so let your church be brought together from the ends of the earth into your kingdom; for yours are the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for evermore." But let no one eat or drink of your thanksgiving but those who have been baptized in the name of the Lord. For about this also the Lord has said, "Do not give what is holy to the dogs."
>
> And after you have had your fill, give thanks thus: "We give thanks to you, holy Father, for your holy name which you have enshrined in our hearts, and for the knowledge and faith and immortality which you have made known to us through your child Jesus; glory to you for evermore. You, almighty Master, created all things for the sake of your name, and gave food and drink to human beings for their enjoyment, that they might give you thanks; but to us you have granted spiritual food and drink and eternal life through your child Jesus. Above all we give you thanks because you are mighty; glory to you for evermore. May grace come, and may this world pass away. Hosanna to the God of David." If any is holy, let him come; if any is not, let him repent. Maranatha. Amen.

Although the introductory word is about "the thanksgiving" (eucharistia), it is likely that the first two prayers, over the cup and over the bread, belong to an agapē (the order of cup before bread is perhaps to be found at the communal meal in the later church order reconstituted by modern scholarship and identified with The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, although the text is very confused around chapter 25/26; cf. also perhaps 1 Cor 10:16-17). All food over which thanks have been said is sanctified (cf. 1 Tim 4:4-5), and so the application of the Lord's word from Matthew 7:6 ("Do not give what is holy to the dogs") does not necessarily imply a sacramental Eucharist. The rubric "after you have had your fill" implies that a meal has occurred before the next prayer. However, that prayer itself has a more "redemptive" cast than the previous ones, bringing it closer to the themes of the Eucharist proper; and the fourth-century compiler of Apostolic Constitutions VII was easily able to make it unmistakably sacramental in his adaptation of the text (and in fact obviously understood all the prayers in the Didache in a sacramental sense).

Whatever may be the case with chapters 9 and 10 of the Didache, scholars are agreed that chapter 14 refers to what would be called "the Eucharist." The text reads:

> On the Lord's day of the Lord, come together, break bread and give thanks, having first confessed your transgressions, that your sacrifice may be pure. But let none who has a quarrel with his companion join with you until they have been reconciled, that your sacrifice may not be defiled. For this is that which was spoken by the Lord, "In every place, and at every time, offer me a pure > sacrifice; for I am a great king, says the Lord, and my name is wonderful among the nations."

The timing is for Sunday (although some have wanted to make the rather strange turn of phrase refer only to Easter). The requirement for prior confession of sin may derive from Leviticus 5:5-6, while the requirement for reconciliation within the fellowship certainly comes from the saying of Jesus recorded at Matthew 5:23-24 (a text frequently evoked later in connection with the Eucharist, e.g. by Irenaeus Haer. 4.18.1, and by Cyril of Jerusalem Myst. Cat. 5.3). The application of Malachi 1:11 concerning the "pure sacrifice" will be repeated in Justin (Dial. Tryph. 41; cf. 117) and Irenaeus (Haer. 4.17.5), and it will become a commonplace that the Eucharist is to be offered "always and everywhere" (semper et ubique).

3.2. Pliny's Letter. From the early years of the second century comes both external and internal evidence, of a fragmentary kind, concerning the ritual meal practice of the Christians in Asia Minor. The imperial official Pliny reports to the emperor Trajan on his investigations into the group (Pliny Ep. 10.96).

> On a fixed day [presumably Sunday], [the Christians were] accustomed to meet before dawn, and to recite a hymn antiphonally to Christ, as to a god, and to bind themselves by an oath [sacramentum]. . . . After the conclusion of this ceremony it was their custom to depart and meet again to take food; but it was ordinary and harmless food; and they had ceased this practice after my edict in which, in accordance with your orders, I had forbidden secret societies.

Some have seen in the early morning meeting a garbled reference to the Eucharist, while the later gathering would have been for an agapē. The suspicion that Christians engaged in cannibalism recurred throughout antiquity, doubtless provoked by reference to communion in the body and blood of the Lord.

3.3. Ignatius of Antioch. The letters of Ignatius,* bishop of Antioch (martyred about A.D. 110), contain several references to agapē and Eucharist. A passage in the Letter to the Smyrnaeans suggests that the Eucharist was held in conjunction with an agapē.

> Let that be regarded as a valid Eucharist which is under the bishop or someone appointed by him. Where the bishop is present, there let the congregation gather, just as where Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church. Without the bishop it is not lawful either to baptize or to hold a love-feast. (Ign. Smyrn. 8.1-2)

The writer's main concern here, in any case, is for the unity of the congregation, which is grounded christologically, sacramentally and ministerially:

> Take care to observe a single Eucharist, for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ and one cup to unite us with his blood, and one altar, as there is one bishop with the presbytery and the deacons, my fellow servants, in order that what you do, you do according to God. (Ign. Phld. 4.1)

The sacramental reality corresponds to the reality of the Incarnation:

> [The Docetists] abstain from the Eucharist and prayer because they do not confess that the Eucharist is the flesh of our Savior Jesus Christ which suffered for our sins and which the Father in his goodness raised. (Ign. Smyrn. 7.1)

Ignatius speaks of "breaking the one bread," which is "a medicine of immortality, and an antidote against dying, but rather that one may live in Jesus Christ for ever" (Ign. Eph. 20.2).

4. Agapē and Eucharist Distinguished.

4.1. Justin Martyr. By the middle of the second century Justin Martyr describes the church in Rome as holding a regular Sunday service of word and table, where the reading and exposition of the Scriptures are followed by prayers and the Eucharist of the Lord's body and blood. The description in chapter 67 of Justin's First Apology runs as follows:

> And on the day called Sunday an assembly is held in one place of all who live in town or country, and the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read as time allows. Then, when the reader has finished, the president in a discourse admonishes and exhorts us to imitate these good things. Then we all stand up together and send up prayers; and as we said before, when we have finished praying, bread and wine and water are brought up, and the president likewise sends up prayers and thanksgivings to the best of his ability, and the people assent, saying the Amen; and the elements over which thanks have been given are distributed, and everyone partakes; and they are sent through the deacons to those who are not present.

And the wealthy who so desire give what they wish, as each chooses; and what is collected is deposited with the president. He helps orphans and widows, and those who through sickness or any other cause are in need, and those in prison, and strangers sojourning among us; in a word, he takes care of all those who are in need.

And we all assemble together on Sunday, because it is the first day, on which God transformed darkness and matter, and made the world; and Jesus Christ our Savior rose from the dead on that day; for they crucified him the day before Saturday; and the day after Saturday, which is Sunday, he appeared to his apostles and disciples, and taught them these things which we have presented to you also for your consideration. (Justin Apol. I 67)

Several points are noteworthy, some of them capable of supplementation from other passages in Justin, particularly his description of the Eucharist celebrated after baptisms* (Apology I 65):

(1) Sunday is the chosen day of the liturgical assembly as a commemoration and celebration of creation and of Christ's resurrection,* the day marked by the risen Lord's appearances to his followers.

(2) The service includes reading from what became the NT ("the memoirs [apomnēmoneumata] of the apostles") as well as the OT ("the writings of the prophets"), and these Scriptures are expounded in a homily by the presider.

(3) The presider is not further identified; but if the practice follows that stipulated by Ignatius, it will be the bishop or someone appointed by him.

(4) Bread and wine are the food and drink, the wine probably being mixed with water (the word krama, "mixture," is used in Apol. I 65).

(5) The presider improvises the eucharistic prayer ("to the best of his ability"), though probably according to certain guidelines. He "sends up praise and glory to the Father of all in the name of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Apol. I 65). The people's assent ("Amen") is significant enough to be mentioned in both chapters.

(6) Only the baptized may participate in the Eucharist: "We call this food 'thanksgiving'; and no one may partake of it unless he is convinced of the truth of our teaching, and has been cleansed with the washing for forgiveness of sins and regeneration, and lives as Christ handed down" (Apol. I 66). But it is important that Christians enjoy their privilege: "Everyone partakes, and [the bread and wine] are sent through deacons to those who are not present" (presumably the sick and the imprisoned are in mind).

(7) The reason for the restriction of communion to baptized believers and the purpose of their participation are spelled out in Apology I 66:

> For we do not receive these things as common bread or common drink; but just as our Savior Jesus Christ, being incarnate through the word of God, took flesh and blood for our salvation, so too we have been taught that the food over which thanks have been given by a word of prayer which is from him, (the food) from which our flesh and blood are fed by transformation, is both the flesh and blood of that incarnate Jesus. For the apostles in the records composed by them which are called Gospels, have handed down thus what was commended of them: that Jesus took bread, gave thanks, and said, 'Do this for the remembrance of me; this is my body'; and likewise he took the cup, gave thanks, and said, 'This is my blood'; and gave to them alone.

(8) The material care for the needy recalls the situation in Acts 2:42-47. No agapē is mentioned by Justin; but later writers envisage that for some time the church continued a practice they saw as apostolic: "When the assembly [synaxis] was over, after the communion of the mysteries, they all went to a common banquet [euōchia], the rich bringing their provisions with them, and the poor and destitute being invited by them, and all feasting in common. But afterwards this custom also became corrupt" (John Chrysostom Homily 27 on 1 Corinthians; Migne, PG 61.223-24).

4.2. Tertullian. In the late second century, Tertullian gives some account of the purposes for which Christians assemble ("The scriptures are read, psalms are sung, sermons are given, prayers are offered"; De Anim. 9); and to prayers, Scriptures and exhortations he adds, in the Apologeticus, the making of modest and voluntary contributions to the needy (Apol. 39.5-6). The fuller description contained in this latter writing includes also, by name, a love-feast:

> Our supper (coena) explains itself by its name, which is the Greek word for love [i.e., agapē]. Whatever it costs, our outlay in the name of piety is gain, for it is the needy that we benefit by that banquet [refrigerio isto]. . . . We taste first of prayer to God before we recline to food; we eat only what suffices hunger, and drink only what befits such as are chaste. We satisfy appetite as those who remember that even during the night they have to worship God. We converse as those who know that they are in the hearing of their Lord. After water for washing the hands, and the lights have been brought in, everyone is called forward to sing praises to God, either from the Holy Scriptures or of his own composing. And this is a proof of the measure of the drinking. As we began, so the feast is concluded with prayer. We depart not like a pack of ruffians, nor in gangs of vagabonds, nor to break out into licentiousness, but with as much regard for our modesty and chastity as if we had been taking in a moral lesson rather than a supper. (Tertullian Apol. 39.16-19)

Here there is nothing specifically "eucharistic," but in other writings Tertullian makes reference to what can only be the sacramental Eucharist: for example, "the sacrament of the Eucharist [eucharistiae sacramentum]" (De Cor. 3; Marc. 4.34); "the sacrament of the bread and the cup [panis et calicis sacramentum]" (Marc. 5.8); "the body of the Lord [corpus domini]" (De Idol. 7; De Orat. 19). There is no clear indication as to how this Eucharist was liturgically or ritually related to the assemblies in which the Scriptures, psalms, prayers, collection and agapē took place. His terms convivium dominicum (in Ad Ux. 2.4) and coena Dei (in De Spect. 13) could apply either to an agapē or to the Eucharist or to both.

5. Conclusion.

In the anonymous Epistle to Diognetus, dating perhaps from the middle of the second century, the author's description of the life of the Christians states: "They spread a common board [trapezan koinēn paratithentai], though not a common bed [reading koitēn]" (Diogn. 5.7). Pictorial testimony to the importance of the common meal is borne by the frequency of table scenes in the mural paintings of the Christian catacombs, where loaves and fishes are also a recurrent motif. It is impossible to know whether the reference is to agapē or to Eucharist. In NT times the behavior of the participants at the meals varies from the idyllic to the problematic to the reprehensible. In the second and third centuries, apologists defend the community against accusations of debauchery and cannibalism by explaining the charitable nature of the love-feast and the sacramental character of the memorial of the Lord under bread and wine. By the late fourth century we find Augustine and other African bishops and synods prohibiting the agapē on account of revelry (e.g., Augustine Ep. 22, to Aurelius; Migne, PL 33.90-92). At the same time, under the imperial establishment of Christianity, there sets in the decline from that regular participation in eucharistic communion which had been, according to Ignatius of Antioch and Justin Martyr, a hallmark of membership in the church.

See also BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES; DEATH OF CHRIST; FOOD, FOOD LAWS, TABLE FELLOWSHIP; LITURGICAL ELEMENTS; LORD'S DAY; SACRIFICE, OFFERINGS, GIFTS; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Bouley, From Freedom to Formula: The Evolution of the Eucharistic Prayer from Oral Improvisation to Written Texts (Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America, 1981); O. Cullmann, "The Meaning of the Lord's Supper in Primitive Christianity" in Essays on the Lord's Supper, ed. O. Cullmann and F. J. Leenhardt, (ESW 1; Richmond, Virginia: John Knox, 1958); G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy (London: Dacre Press/A. & C. Black, 1945); A. B. du Toit, Der Aspekt der Freude im urchristlichen Abendmahl (Winterthur: Keller, 1965); P. F. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts (SNTSMS 57; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); J. L. Espinel Marcos, La Eucaristia del Nuevo Testamento (Salamanca: San Esteban, 1980); A. J. B. Higgins, The Lord's Supper in the New Testament (SBT 6; London: SCM, 1952); R. C. D. Jasper and G. J. Cuming, Prayers of the Eucharist: Early and Reformed (3d ed.; New York: Pueblo, 1987); J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (New York: Scribner's, 1966); A. A. Just, The Ongoing Feast: Table Fellowship and Eschatology at Emmaus (Collegeville, MN.: Liturgical Press, 1993); J. F. Keating, The Agapé and the Eucharist in the Early Church (London: Methuen, 1901); H.-J. Klauck, Herrenmahl und hellenistischer Kult (Münster: Aschendorff, 1982); J. Kodell, The Eucharist in the New Testament (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1988); X. Léon-Dufour, Sharing the Eucharistic Bread: The Witness of the New Testament (Mahwah, NJ: Paulist, 1987); H. Lietzmann, Mass and Lord's Supper (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1953, 1979); I. H. Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); P. H. Menoud, "Les Actes des apôtres et l'eucharistie" in Jésus-Christ et la foi (Neuchâtel: Delachaux & Niestlé, 1975) 63-76; B. Reicke, Diakonie, Festfreude und Zelos in Verbindung mit der altchristlichen Agapenfeier (Uppsala: Lundequistska Bokhandeln, 1948); idem, "Die Mahlzeit mit Paulus auf den Wellen des Mittelmeeres Act. 27, 33-38," TZ 4 (1948) 401-10; J. Reumann, The Supper of the Lord: The New Testament, Ecumenical Dialogues, and Faith and Order on Eucharist (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); H. Riesenfeld, "Sabbat et jour du Seigneur" in New Testament Essays, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1959) 210-17; W. Rordorf et al., The Eucharist of the Early Christians (New York: Pueblo, 1978); M. H. Shepherd, The Pascal Liturgy and the Apocalypse (ESW 6; Richmond, Virginia: John Knox, 1960); G. Wainwright, Eucharist and Eschatology (London: Epworth, 1971; New York: Oxford University Press, 1981); J. Wanke, Beobachtungen zum Eucharistieverständnis des Lukas auf Grund der lukanischen Mahlberichte (ETS 8; Leipzig: St. Benno-Verlag, 1973); L. Wehr, Arznei der Unsterblichkeit: Die Eucharistie bei Ignatius von Antiochien und im Johannesevangelium (NTAbh n.s. 18; Münster: Aschendorff, 1987); R. Williamson, "The Eucharist and the Epistle to the Hebrews," NTS 21 (1975) 300-12.

G. Wainwright

LOT. See ANCESTORS.

LOVE

"This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins" (1 Jn 4:10). These words point to the revolutionary new understanding of love the Christians brought into the world. They learned from the love of God for the unworthy and they came to love not because they found people worthy to be loved but because they had become loving people. They loved now not because of the attractiveness they discerned in other people but because they themselves had become loving people. The love of God in Christ had transformed them; they had been reborn into a life in which they had become loving people. They loved God, they loved one another and they loved people outside their fellowship.

1. The Love of God
2. Love for God
3. Love of Fellow Believers
4. Love for Non-Christians
5. Love in the Postapostolic Church

1. The Love of God.

The love God* has for his people is the primary truth.* It is this love that undergirds all Scripture: were it not that God loves the people he has made, there would have been no revelation* to record. And especially it is due to the love of the heavenly Father that he sent his Son* into the world* to bring salvation* to repentant sinners. That love of God for the people he has made is fundamental. Sometimes the love of Christ* is referred to (Rev 1:5), sometimes that of God (Heb 12:6). Either way the priority of the divine love is insisted upon (1 Jn 4:19).

The writer to the Hebrews* includes a series of quotations from the OT that he applies to "the Son" (Heb 1:6, 8-13). Mostly these are concerned with the greatness of the Son, but one of them concerns love, namely, "you loved righteousness and hated lawlessness" (Heb 1:9, the quotation is from Ps 45:7; [see Old Testament in Hebrews]). The love for what is right runs through the whole of Scripture, and it is one of the important things about God. Here we find that the Son, who shares the divine nature of the Father, shares also the Father's love of what is right.

The Seer tells his readers that Jesus "loves us and has loosed us from our sins in his blood and made us a kingdom, priests to his God and Father" (Rev 1:5-6). "Loves" is in the present tense: the writer is pointing to a love that never ceases, while "loosed" in the aorist refers to an action based on that love but occurring at a point in time. It indicates that Jesus has set us free from the bondage of sins, and the reference to "his blood" makes it clear that John is referring to Jesus' saving death (see Death of Christ). He is drawing attention to that great offering made in love when Jesus died on the cross* and to its effects in dealing comprehensively with all the sins of all who come to him. Here we have the thought, emphasized by Paul, that salvation proceeds from the love of God so strikingly shown on the cross (most clearly in 1 Jn 4:7-12). Throughout the NT this important truth undergirds the whole Christian way.

"Keep yourselves in God's love" writes Jude* (Jude 21), bringing out the importance of the love of the heavenly Father and also the dreadful truth that in some way believers can minimize its effect. "Without obedience to God's will, fellowship with God can be forfeited" (Bauckham, 114). Believers are reminded that the love of God demands a response.

Another part of the Christian life comes before us when the writer to the Hebrews quotes Proverbs 3:11-12: "For whom the Lord loves he chastens, and he scourges every son whom he receives" (Heb 12:5-6). W. Bauer's lexicon gives the meaning of the verb (paideuō) in this passage (translated "chastens") as "discipline with punishment." There is the thought of chastisement, and the writer is reminding his readers that the Christian way is not all roses and joy. Even the best of Christians sometimes do things that ought not to be done or fail to do things that ought to be done. Hebrews is telling us that some of the pain we feel as we go through life is in fact divine discipline, helping us become better people. It is to be welcomed accordingly, and we are to heed the lessons God is teaching us.

The same passage from Proverbs (Prov 3:11-12) is behind the rebuke to the church* of Laodicea (Rev 3:19), where the message from God includes the words, "As many as I love I rebuke and discipline." In this most unsatisfactory of the seven churches, one in which there is nothing to praise and much to condemn, there is this message of love and a reminder of the divine purpose in the suffering* that would come upon the little group. R. H. Charles comments, "It is a touching and unexpected manifestation of love to those who deserve it least among the Seven Churches" (Charles, 1:99). And it is of continuing importance that believers are to discern the loving hand of God in the chastisements that are part of life as well as in their happy days.

The love of Christ is seen in the message to another of the seven churches, the church in Philadelphia, one of the two out of the seven that receive no blame. This church had evidently suffered at the hand of some Jews whom John calls "the synagogue of Satan," but they are assured that these persecutors will in due course come to give honor to the church and will know that Christ has loved those believers (Rev 3:9).

2. Love for God.

Love for God is equally important. It is everywhere assumed in the NT, though it does not often come to expression. One such passage, however, is that in which James* assures his readers of the blessing* that comes to the person who "endures temptation" (Jas 1:12). Such a person, being approved, "will receive the crown of life that he [God] promised to those who love him." James does not spell out what "the crown of life" means (cf. Rev 2:10), but clearly it points to a royal blessing, the life of the age to come. Temptation* is part of life as we know it, and James is making it clear to his readers that God expects that those who love him will resist temptation and do what is right. When this happens, James assures us, the believer will not lack divine recognition. For those who love him, there is a promise* of God. And nothing could be more reliable than such a promise.

It is in this spirit that Peter can write of Christ, "whom not having seen, you love," and he goes on to speak of the blessings that come to those who love in this way. Though they do not see Christ, they believe and rejoice with unspeakable joy* that is full of glory*; they receive the salvation of their souls (1 Pet 1:8-9). Another significant passage is that in which James refers to the poor people in this world whom God has chosen and who are "rich in faith." They are thus the possessors of spiritual riches that contrast with their temporal poverty (Jas 2:5). And that is not all. James goes on to speak of these poor people as "heirs of the kingdom that God promised to those who love him." Our love for God is important now as we make our way through this world's problems, and it means incredible spiritual riches in the life to come. James does not wish those who are poor in this world to be depressed at their experience of financial stringency. Riches in faith* now and the promises of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) to come mean that such poor people are not to be despised.

Thus both Peter and James speak of love for God, one for God the Father and the other for God the Son. Both assure the reader of the wonderful blessing that is the inevitable consequence of such love.

3. Love of Fellow Believers.

Again and again the writers of the later NT books insist that the saving work of Christ means that believers must live in love to one another. This was a virtue widely insisted on in antiquity, but the Christians seem to have had a special interest in it. There are many exhortations to familial love in the NT, and we must understand this not of love toward the human race in general but of love for those who have entered the fellowship* of the church, those who have been remade by the saving work of Christ. It is true that the early Christians were to take a benevolent interest in people at large, but "brotherly love" (Heb 13:1 NRSV, "let mutual love continue") meant for them love in a special sense for fellow believers.

Thus Peter exhorts his readers: "Above everything keep your love for one another at full strength" (1 Pet 4:8; J. N. D. Kelly's trans.); believers are to work at making their love for others in the household* of faith stronger day by day. They are not to think that brotherly love automatically goes on and on. While in many respects it is self-sustaining, it must also be supported by the exercise of the will. Believers must not take it for granted that they will continue in love for other believers. It is the case that some of those with whom we share membership in the household of faith are difficult people. So Peter is saying that we must take it as a high priority ("above all") to keep our love for others in the church at full strength, even for people who do not naturally appeal to us. Those who have been saved by Christ must not live selfishly. Christian love must not be seen as an option for those who like that sort of thing. It is an imperative laid on all those who have experienced the salvation of Christ brought about at Calvary.

Peter goes on in this passage to point out that "love covers a multitude of sins" (1 Pet 4:8; a quotation from Prov 10:12, "love covers all wrongs"). Some exegetes hold that this refers to the sins of the coverer, but it seems much more likely that it is the sins of other people that are in mind. Peter is surely saying that believers must not dwell on other people's sins but "cover" them. Love "is ready to forgive again and again. It finds a way to shelter the wrongdoer from exposure and condemnation. This is how God has treated us. This, therefore, is how we ought to treat one another" (Stibbs, 154).

Peter comes back to the importance of family love when he lists some desirable qualities in believers, beginning with "be all of you of one mind, sympathetic, loving the brothers, compassionate" (1 Pet 3:8). The exhortation to be of one mind seems to reflect the situation of the early church where the many foes outside made it imperative that there be unity within the fold. And it is natural in such circumstances for the exhortation to include sympathy and genuine love for one another. Such bonds meant that the house church would not easily be split asunder.

The writer to the Hebrews evidently was satisfied with the way his readers were behaving, but love is so important that he could say, "Let brotherly love continue" (Heb 13:1). It cannot be taken for granted, but believers must work at it. J. Calvin comments on this verse, "We can only be Christians if we are brethren." James gives an example when he exhorts his readers as "my beloved brothers and sisters" (Jas 2:5 NRSV).

With so many exhortations to love in the literature of the early church, there must have been the temptation for people who linked themselves to the church without being really committed people to pretend to be more loving than they were. So Peter can look for "genuine mutual love" and proceed, "love one another deeply from the heart" (1 Pet 1:22 NRSV). Such an exhortation seems to indicate that there were some whose profession of love was insincere.

But such insincerity was unavailing, for God knows the love his people show to one another and the service they render (Heb 6:10). The writer to the Hebrews can argue that believers are to spur one another on to love and to good works (Heb 10:24). When people come to believe in Jesus and to become members of the church they are to love all the other members. Life in the Christian community is meant, among other things, to introduce new believers to a community of love, a community in which the members strive to build one another up and to do this in love; believers help one another in love.

And love is so much part of community life in the early Christian church that Jude can begin his letter by addressing its members as people "beloved in God the father," after which he goes on to a prayer* that mercy,* peace* "and love" be multiplied among them (Jude 1-2). Peter similarly can urge believers to greet one another with "a kiss of love" (1 Pet 5:14). The first thing Christians do when they meet is give evidence of their love.

In the social setting of the early church it was of first importance that the members of the church should stand by one another. There are quite a few exhortations to them to love one another. It was not enough for them to refrain from in-fighting: in a hostile world it mattered that believers saw one another as brothers and sisters and acted accordingly. It is clear that some people who fell far short of the Christian ideal found their way into church membership and that this presented problems that come to the surface from time to time in the NT. The causes of disunity may have been trivial, but the writers of the later NT books saw it as most important that such disunity be overcome. Believers were brothers and sisters in Christ, and it mattered immensely that they behave as family in Christ.

It is not surprising accordingly that the NT contains exhortations to believers to behave toward one another with love. Thus we read of certain converts who had "purified their souls in obedience to the truth" with the result that they now had "genuine mutual love." They are exhorted to "love one another deeply from the heart" (1 Pet 1:22 NRSV). The writer agrees that these converts had come to love their new family when they became Christians. But he does not want there to be any doubt as to the importance of going on in the faith and of continuing to live in love toward their brothers and sisters. It was love that held the church together. There was no law compelling people to belong to it. Its members could leave at any time.

But if they remained as church members it was of the utmost importance that they loved other church members. This does not mean that they were to pretend that others in the church were faultless. They were not to love them because they were perfect, for they were not perfect. They were to love them because the salvation they themselves had received in Christ made them loving people. They were to love other church members not because they had many excellent qualities (though doubtless some of them did). They were to love them because they themselves were now loving people. Love makes allowances. Love tries to help. Love looks at the good people do in preference to dwelling on their defects. "Love for the brothers" was of the utmost importance in the life of the early church.

Later in his letter* Peter comes back to the theme. "Honor all people," he writes, "love the brotherhood, fear God, honor the king" (1 Pet 2:17). It is interesting that when the writer is exhorting his readers to give honor to people at large, to fear God and to honor the ruler he should think it suitable to tell them to love the brotherhood of believers. Religion is not one department of life, tucked away from all other things we do. Loving the Christian family is of the first importance for those who seek to live out their lives as the servants of God in a troubled and all too often evil world.

Jude has a warning against false teachers who were "rocks in your love feasts" (Jude 12; see commentaries for translation). This glimpse of the early church at worship* shows that the Holy Communion was called a "love feast," a name that is found in Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria and others. It is perhaps worth reflecting that this is not a name for the service that would spontaneously occur to modern Christians. It may be that later generations have lost something that the early believers valued.

The expression shows us that the communion service was a full repast and not a token meal as commonly in modern times. And, however we understand the word translated as "rocks," it was a meal that gave some opportunity to false teachers to disrupt the life of the church in some way instead of preserving the unity the service suggests.

4. Love for Non-Christians.

Christians are required to love other Christians, but they are also required to live lives of love where non-Christians are concerned. Perhaps the clearest indication of this is 2 Peter's* injunction that his readers should "add to piety love of the brothers, and to love of the brothers, love" (2 Pet 1:7). The point is that believers are bound to one another with the special tie that they have all been saved through Christ's atoning death. But Peter is clear that they should not reason that their attitude to nonbelievers does not matter. They are to be loving people, and their attitude to those who do not believe is to be one of love.

Similarly James can tell his readers to obey "the royal law, according to the Scripture, 'you shall love your neighbor as yourself'" (Jas 2:8).

There is a problem in the words to the church in Ephesus, "you have forsaken your first love" (Rev 2:4), where "love" might mean love for Christ (GNB) or "love for one another" (Moffatt) or even love for people in general. Perhaps all three are included. There is a similar problem with the love of the church in Thyatira, where John says simply, "I know your works and love and faith" (Rev 2:19). What is clear in such passages is that believers are expected to be loving people.

Sometimes people love what is wrong, and we find the permanent consequence of this in a passage in Revelation. After speaking of the blessedness of those who go into "the city," John writes, "Outside are the dogs and the magicians and the fornicators and the murderers and the idolaters and everyone who loves and practices falsehood" (Rev 22:15). The linking of loving and lying points to an unreliable way of life. It is clear that lying is more than the telling of a little fib, which modern people sometimes see as of no great consequence. As in Revelation 21:8, lying comes last with emphasis.

Some passages do not fit into our classification, for they do not refer to love for people. This is the case with 1 Peter 3:10, where the writer quotes from Psalm 34:12-16: "For he who wills to love life and to see good days" (in LXX "love" refers to seeing the good days, rather than to life). It is unusual to find a reference to loving life rather than to loving people, but it directs attention to an important part of the service* of God. There are people who are depressed by the burdens of life, and this must have been a temptation to first-century Christians, harassed as they were by officialdom and without redress for the mistreatment they might expect and sometimes experienced. Peter is quoting Scripture to point them to the truth that life is a good gift from God and it is to be loved as such. To live in the service of the God who loves with the love we see on Calvary is to live a life we may well love to live. Our wills are to be set on this love.

In 2 Peter we have a reference to another kind of love, one with which we are not unfamiliar, namely, the love of money. The writer is making a reference to Balaam the son of Beor who, he tells us, "loved the wages of unrighteousness" (2 Pet 2:15). His fate is a reminder to Peter's readers that they are called to a very different kind of love.

The last book of the Bible has some memorable passages about the contest God's people have with evil, and in one of them we read of Michael and his angels doing battle with Satan* and his angels.* Victory went to the forces of good and it is said of the martyrs, "they did not love their life unto death" (Rev 12:11). They gave their all in the struggle against evil, and that is their commendation.

5. Love in the Postapostolic Church.

Christians have always found it difficult to live up to all that is taught them in the NT, and this goes for the early church as well as for the later periods. We do not have a complete picture of life in the early church but the writings that survive show that the NT teaching on love was held to be of great importance. And, when we consider what we know of life in general at that time, it was put into practice to a remarkable extent.

In the letter known as 1 Clement, after the opening greeting in the first sentence, the readers are addressed as "beloved" (an address that recurs in other parts of the letter), and the writer speaks of the church in Corinth as "worthy of all people's love" (1 Clem. 1.1). He says that God wills "to give to all his beloved repentance" (1 Clem. 8.5), so that it is the love of God that brings the church into existence.

Clement (see Clement of Rome) can speak of the church of Corinth as striving "on behalf of all the brothers and sisters" (adelphotētos, 1 Clem. 2.4); it is significant that he sees believers everywhere as brothers and sisters. Clement looks for the strong to care for the weak and for the rich to help the poor, duties that are part of the outworking of love (1 Clem. 38.2). The loving person is to carry out the commandments* of Christ (1 Clem. 99.1), so that obedience* is necessary for the believer as well as love. It is in love that all God's elect[s] were perfected, and without love nothing pleases God (1 Clem. 49.5). And Clement reminds his readers that it was in love that Christ "gave his blood" for us (1 Clem. 49.6). He sees love as "great and marvelous" and urges his readers to "pray and ask" for it. He further says that it is to be found only where God gives it (1 Clem. 50.1-2); it is not to be seen as a human achievement. He selects Moses,* Judith and Esther as examples of people who showed great love (1 Clem. 53.4-5; 55:4-6).

The writer of 2 Clement does not have as many references to love as does the author of 1 Clement, but he clearly sees love as a most important part of living out the Christian faith. He cites the words in Matthew 7:21 that not all those who say "Lord, Lord" are saved and goes on, "So then, brothers, let us confess him in works, in loving each other" (2 Clem. 4.1-3). We are to "await God's kingdom in love and righteousness" (2 Clem. 12.1). If Christians do not love other people, and specifically other believers, outsiders "laugh us to scorn" with the result that "the name is blasphemed" (2 Clem. 13.4). Anyone who "speaks and hears" should "speak and hear with faith and love" (2 Clem. 15.2). The writer quotes from 1 Peter 4:8, "love covers a multitude of sins," and he sees this as surpassing almsgiving, fasting and prayer (2 Clem. 16.4).

Ignatius* comes before us as a bishop of the church, sentenced to death by the authorities and on his way to Rome* to be thrown to wild beasts. He writes a number of letters, mostly to churches, and consistently urges people to do nothing to hinder his martyrdom.* He is perhaps more fanatical than loving, but he has some wonderful things to say about love. Even this fiery spirit was touched by the love of God and saw love as the most important part of Christian service. He commends bishop Onesimus of Ephesus as "a man of inexpressible love" and urges the Ephesians to return that love (Ign. Eph. 1.3). Faith and love are "the beginning of life and its end" (Ign. Eph. 14.1). He speaks of love "which is the blood of Jesus Christ" (Ign. Trall. 8.1). He can give directions to the Trallians introduced with "yet not I but the love of Jesus Christ" (Ign. Trall. 6.1). He was sure of what Christ would say in love in the situation in which the Trallians found themselves.

Ignatius was convinced of the love of the Roman Christians. He speaks of them as "preeminent in love" (Ign. Rom. presc.). He also says, "I fear your love, lest it do me wrong" (Ign. Rom. 1.2). He was keen on being martyred, and he evidently was afraid that the Roman Christians would somehow influence the authorities to spare his life. He could say, "If you are silent about me, I am a word of God, but if you love my flesh, then I shall be only a voice." He looks for the Roman church to be "a chorus in love" while he is offered on the altar (Ign. Rom. 2.1-2).

Ignatius tells the Philadelphians that the Spirit was saying to him, among other things, "love unity" (Ign. Phld. 7.2). The bishop later says that "where there is division and anger God does not dwell" (Ign. Phld. 8.1). He also remarks that all things are good "if you believe in love" (Ign. Phld. 9.2).

There is a letter of Polycarp* to the Philippians in which it is said that "he who has love is distant from all sin" (Pol. Phil. 3.3). Wives are exhorted to remain in the faith and "in love and purity, loving their own husbands in all truth and loving all people equally" (Pol. Phil. 4.2). The letter calls for love of the brotherhood (Pol. Phil. 10.1). There is a call to prayer for those who persecute them (Pol. Phil. 12.3). The letter carries repeated warnings against love of money (Pol. Phil. 4.3; 5.2; 6.1), so evidently this form of love was prevalent. There is an account of the martyrdom of this good man from which we learn that "it belongs to true and steadfast love not only to wish to be saved oneself but all the brothers and sisters also" (Pol. Phil. 1.2).

The *Didache explains the way of life: "The way of life is this: First you shall love the God who made you; secondly, your neighbor as yourself. And whatsoever you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another" (Did. 1.2).

Throughout the literature that comes down to us from the early church, it is clear that there was emphasis on the importance of believers showing love in such ways as helping the poor (a practice insisted upon even when there is no specific mention of love). There are also rebukes for the hypocritical, which show both that it was expected that those who had this world's goods would show their love for their fellows by helping the less fortunate and also that all too often this was outward show that lacked genuine love (1 Jn 3:11-17; 4:20; cf. Jam 2:1-16). But the impression that is left is that the early church on the whole took seriously the fact that its members had been saved by the love of God and that this demanded that those members live in love to one another.

See also ETHICS; FAITH, FAITHFULNESS; GRACE; HOPE; MERCY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, 2 Peter, Jude (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); R. H. Charles, The Revelation of St. John (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1920); A. Chester and R. P. Martin, The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter and Jude (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); M. C. D'Arcy, The Mind and Heart of Love (2d ed.; London: Faber & Faber, 1954); R. H.

Fuller, ed., Essays on the Love Command (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); V. P. Furnish, The Love Command in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); L. E. Keck, "On the Ethos of Early Christians," JAAR 42 (1974) 435-52; J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (HNTC; New York: Harper & Row, 1969); L. L. Morris, Testaments of Love: A Study of Love in the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1929); A. Nygren, Agape and Eros (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1953); J. Piper, "Love Your Enemies": Jesus' Love Command in the Synoptic Gospels and the Early Christian Paraenesis (SNTSMS 38; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); C. Spicq, Agape in the New Testament (3 vols.; London: Herder, 1963-66); idem, Agapé: Prolégomènes à une étude de théologie néotestamentaire (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1955); A. M. Stibbs (with A. F. Walls), 1 Peter (TNTC; London: Tyndale, 1959); O. Wischmeyer, Der höchste Weg: Das 13 Kapitl des 1. Korintherbriefes (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlaghaus, 1981).

L. L. Morris

LOVE FEAST. See LORD'S SUPPER, LOVE FEAST.

LUKE-ACTS. See ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

LUST. See MARRIAGE, DIVORCE AND ADULTERY.

M

MAGIC AND ASTROLOGY

In the ancient world magic was a method of harnessing supernatural power to gain protection from evil spirits or to obtain what one desired (see DPL, Magic). The practice of astrology was based on a belief that there is an inextricable link between the movements of the sun, moon and stars and what happens to people in the courses of their lives. Popular astrology conceived of the heavenly bodies as governed by spirits, gods or angels.* Thus astrology and magic became linked as people attempted to use incantations and rituals to thwart the astral spirits and alter their fate. An understanding of the presuppositions and beliefs of magic and astrology are essential to appreciating the worldview of the mass of people—both Gentile* and Jew—in the Roman world. This awareness is, in turn, helpful to students of the NT in understanding what kind of shifts in worldview were necessary for people in becoming Christians.

1. Nature and Characteristics
2. Magic and the Demonic in Acts
3. Magic and the Apocalypse
4. Anti-Magic Polemic in the Apostolic Fathers
5. Astrology and Early Christianity
6. Magic and Astrology in the Rise of Gnosis

1. Nature and Characteristics.

Magic presupposed the existence of thousands of spirits—good and evil—involved in the affairs of day-to-day life. These spirits were thought of as gods and goddesses (e.g., Apollo and Artemis), divine mediators (e.g., Hermes, angeloi, paredroi), spirits of the untimely dead (biaiothanatoi), astral spirits, underworld spirits or various kinds of chthonic, or terrestrial spirits (see Religions). The practice of magic also assumed a system of inner connections between physical objects in the universe. An action performed on one object was thought to have a corresponding impact on another (the principle of sympathy and antipathy).

Those who engaged in the ancient art of magic sought to solicit the help of various gods and spirits or to utilize the system of correspondences throughout the universe. This was achieved through various acts of ritual power.* Through many literary texts and especially now through the numerous recently discovered papyrus texts (see Betz), lead curse tablets (see Gager), amulets and various other magical paraphernalia, we have a good idea of how much of this procedure was carried out.

Magical conjurations typically consisted of three parts: an incantation, a ritual and a command. The naming of various spirits and gods was the key part of the incantation (e.g., "I entrust this binding-charm to you gods of the underworld: Pluto and Kore-Persephone, Ereschigal, Adonis also called Barbaritha, Hermes Katachthonios-Thoth . . . I conjure all daimones in this place to assist this daimon Antinoos" [New Documents, no. 8, lines 1-3]). Often various kinds of power rituals, sometimes involving the principle of sympathy and antipathy, accompanied the incantation. For example, one magical formula for attaining great success in business calls for the performance of the following rite:

> Take beeswax . . . and fashion a man having his right hand in the position of begging and having in his left a bag and a staff. Let there be around the staff a coiled snake, and let him be dressed in a girdle and standing on a sphere that has a coiled snake, like Isis. . . . Fashion him during the new moon and consecrate it in a celebrating mood, and read aloud the spell over his members. (PGM IV.2379-91)

Finally, after invoking the deities or spirits and performing the requisite rights, the person could make his demands of the attendant spirit. Many of the papyrus texts and most of the amulets are calls for protection (apotropaic magic for "warding off" harmful spirits), deliverance or help. People also frequently used magic simply to get something they wanted—victory in a race, a sexual liaison, influence over another person or healing. The darkest dimensions of magic are the various maledictions, or curses. Most prominent among these are the lead curse tablets (defixiones) in which a "fix," or "binding," is placed on another person by the spirits conjured (see Gager).

Although magic in the Roman world was an identifiable phenomenon with objective characteristics and with specialists who identified themselves as magicians, the terms magic and magician could also be used as pejorative labels for deviant religious behavior in the context of a cult. Early Christians, however, tended to interpret magic in terms of its source of power, Satan and his demons. Thus in its own self-understanding, Christianity could not be a type of magic because it relied on the power* of God* and the Lord* Jesus Christ.*

Like magic, astrological beliefs and practices permeated the Mediterranean world. Because of the belief in an inextricable link between the position and movements of the stars over time and the events of a person's life, mathematikoi or Chaldaei (astrologers) could cast a horoscope and predict certain outcomes in the life of an individual. While Stoics resigned themselves to destiny, many thought that the horrors of a foul fate could be altered. Since it was widely believed that deities and spirits animated the heavenly bodies, fate could be altered through ritual acts of power that would compel the spirit to a different course of action. Thus magic and astrology became intertwined in popular belief.

In our literature, "magic" figures prominently in Acts and Revelation, but it is not at all in the foreground in James, Hebrews, 1 and 2 Peter, 1—3 John and Jude. Nevertheless, keeping in mind the fact that many of the readers of these letters were people who had been involved in the magical arts and astrology to some degree prior to their conversions may help to understand some of the theological accents in these works. In the apostolic fathers, however, there is a strong anti-magic and anti-astrology polemic that characterizes many passages.

2. Magic and the Demonic in Acts.

The book of Acts* narrates three dramatic and important accounts involving the practice of magic. In each of these magic is cast in a bad light and is seen as the tool of Satan to keep people from the gospel of Christ and a true dependence upon him.

As the gospel* spread from Jerusalem* to Samaria* through Philip's* preaching, a wonder worker named Simon became enamored with the means by which the Spirit of God came upon people after the Apostles laid their hands upon them (Acts 8:9-25). The text explicitly says that Simon practiced magic (mageuōn) in the city (Acts 8:9) and that he had amassed a significant following because people were amazed with his magic (mageia, Acts 8:11). They had in fact hailed him as "the Great Power" (Acts 8:10). In spite of Simon's ostensive conversion ("he believed and was baptized"), Peter rebuked him in the severest of terms because Simon sought power rather than Jesus Christ. In fact, Peter discerned bitterness in his heart and an abiding bondage (syndesmon) to sin (Acts 8:23).

The theme of conflict with magic and the demonic surfaces once again in Luke's narration of Paul's confrontation with Elymas, or Bar Jesus, on the island of Cyprus (Lk 13:4-12). Elymas is twice termed a "magician" (magos) by Luke. What makes the account even more intriguing is that he is a Jewish magician. Many Jews in antiquity were deeply involved in the magical arts, exorcising demons, making protective amulets, and creating various magical spells (see Alexander). Luke saw Elymas as a satanically inspired opponent of the gospel of Jesus Christ, hindering the proconsul of the island from positively responding to the truth. God's power proved greater than the diabolic power of Elymas (see Signs and Wonders). The hand of the Lord was against this 'son of the devil," and he was struck blind. The proconsul then heard the teaching about the Lord and believed. S. Garrett aptly notes, "Paul's victory over Satan's servant demonstrates again the reliability of Jesus' promise that Christians will have authority to trample on 'snakes and scorpions,' and over all the power of the Enemy" (Garrett, 86).

The final account explicitly mentioning magic is the story of the burning of the magical papyri in Ephesus (Acts 19:8-20). Magical practices flourished at Ephesus, thus giving it the reputation of being something of a center for magic (see Arnold, 14-20). The catalyst for this mass renunciation of occultic practices was the quickly spreading news of the foiled attempt of Sceva and his sons to cast demons out of a man. The Jewish exorcists had attempted to use the name of Jesus in their incantational repertoire of names—without success. In fact, they were physically assaulted and hurt in the encounter. As a result of this, fear gripped people living in the city, even those in the new Christian community. The surprising twist in the story is that many Christians became convicted of their continued involvement in magical practices, openly renounced it and burned their scrolls (Acts 19:18-19). There was a strong temptation for Christians to continue wearing amulets, consulting magicians and using incantations and formulas. Not all Christians in the Mediterranean world, however, renounced their occult practices. Many individuals syncretized their Christianity with magic (see Syncretism). This is well illustrated in the published corpus of Christian magical texts (see Meyer and Smith).

3. Magic and the Apocalypse.
The Apocalypse contains some very strong and explicit polemic against magic (see Revelation, Book of). The harshest appears in Revelation 21:8 where sorcerers (pharmakoi) are doomed to the lake of fire and the second death.* Similarly, magicians (pharmakoi) are consigned to a place outside the new heavenly city (Rev 22:15). The reason for this is partly explained in Revelation 18:23 where the personified Babylon* is upbraided for leading all the nations astray by her magical spells (pharmakeiai). Practicing magic is placed on the same level as worshiping demons, stealing, committing murder and engaging in sexual immorality (Rev 9:21).

In denouncing magic the Apocalypse consistently uses pharmakeia and its cognates (cf. Paul's use of pharmakeia as a deed of the flesh in Gal 5:19). Although the term pharmakos could be used in referring to poison and drugs, it was also widely used as a way of generally speaking of magic and did not necessarily entail the use of potions or drugs in the magic ritual. Thus pharmakeia and mageia could be used interchangeably.

The practice of magic in Rome is well-attested in the literature (e.g., Sib. Or. 5.165) and by the discovery of numerous curse tablets (Gager). As in the book of Acts, the indictment of the magical arts in the Apocalypse is that it is a tool of Satan* to lead people away from a true knowledge* of God (cf. Rev 18:23).

D. Aune has demonstrated that the author of the Apocalypse actually incorporates certain images from the conceptual world of magic (Aune 1987). He points in particular to the expressions "I have the keys to Death and Hades" (Rev 1:18), "I am coming quickly" (e.g., Rev 22:20) and "I am the Alpha and the Omega" (e.g., Rev 1:8). After noting the uniqueness of these expressions in early Christian literature, Aune illustrates each with striking parallels from the language of magical revelation. Aune then argues that the Apocalypse presents Jesus as a counter to many of the assumptions of Greco-Roman revelatory magic. In effect, the language represents "an extensive and creative anti-magical polemic the purpose of which is to nullify the revelatory claims of the pagan competitors of Christian prophets" (Aune 1987, 494).

4. Anti-Magic Polemic in the Apostolic Fathers.
The early patristic literature leaves no option to new Christians other than giving up and renouncing their magical arts, including astrology. The *Didache unequivocally asserts, "my child, do not be an auger (oionoskopos), since it leads to idolatry. Do not be an enchanter (epaoidos) or an astrologer (mathematikos) or a magician (perikathairōn), or even desire to see them, for all these things breed idolatry" (Did. 3.4; cf. also Did. 2.2). The practice of magic is listed with idolatry and other evils as part of the way of death (Did. 5.1).

Second-century orthodox Christians saw magic as a constituent part of "the ancient kingdom"—the domain of Satan which Christ had come to destroy (Ign. Eph. 19.3). The *Epistle of Barnabas speaks of sorcery and magic (pharmakeia and mageia) as part of the way of "the Black One" (Satan) that destroys people's souls and leads to punishment and eternal death (Barn. 20.1). Diognetus also speaks of "the illusion and deceit of the magicians" (Diogn. 8.4). Again, the real reason for the rejection of the popular amulets, incantations and spells has to do with the source for the power. It is connected with Satan and his evil demons, not with God and his redemptive and relational purposes through the Lord Jesus Christ. As an antidote to the spiritually fatal effects of magic, Ignatius prescribes the Eucharist, which he characterizes as Pharmakon athanasias, "medecine of immortality (Ign. Eph. 20.2). This accompanies the confession of Jesus as Son of Man and Son of God, fellowship with the people of God and submission to the leadership of the church.

In contrast, some scholars have seen *Hermas as influenced by a magical worldview evidenced by the terms and concepts from ancient magic found in his revelatory visions. This borrowing was primarily formal, however, and the worldview assumptions in Hermas stand at a significant distance from the magical practices of ancient Rome. Furthermore, Hermas makes a number of unfavorable comments about magic and sorcery (Herm. Vis. 3.9.7; Herm. Man. 11.2).

5. Astrology and Early Christianity.
With the exception of Didache 3.4, there is no overt anti-astrology polemic in our literature. One can certainly assume, however, that astrology was frowned upon by leaders in the church. As the early church appropriated much of the OT tradition regarding idolatry, it would also have taken over the negative perspective on astrology. The Torah expressly prohibited Israel from worshiping the stars (Deut 4:19). One may also assume that the anti-magic polemic of Acts, the Apocalypse and the apostolic fathers includes an anti-astrology stance.

Nevertheless, astral imagery holds a prominent place in the book of Revelation.* Jesus is introduced as holding "seven stars" in his right hand (Rev 1:16). These stars are subsequently identified as angels associated with the seven churches (Rev 1:20). In fact, Jesus is termed "the bright Morning Star" at the end of the book (Rev 22:16). In a more negative vein, stars/angels are involved in the outpouring of wrath.* A star called "Wormwood" turns all of the waters bitter (Rev 8:10-12) and another star is given the key to the Abyss (Rev 9:1). Many interpreters have seen the third of the stars swept out of the sky by the tail of the dragon as an allusion to the fall of Satan and his angels* (Rev 12:4; cf. 12:7). The astral imagery, here and elsewhere, would have communicated powerfully to people who came into the church steeped in a background of astrological practices. One message that comes out strongly is Jesus' supremacy and sovereignty over all the stars.

Astrology and astral phenomena are quite rare in the apostolic fathers. In *Clement the stars are represented as purely physical objects that circle unerringly in their courses at the direction of God (1 Clem. 20.3). Yet in Ignatius the personified sun, moon and stars join in a chorus around the star of Bethlehem at the birth of Christ (Ign. Eph. 19.2; see Worship). This imagery, as in Revelation, points to the superiority of the Son.*

6. Magic and Astrology in the Rise of Gnosis.
Magic and astrology ultimately fed into the grand amalgam of teachings commonly called Gnosticism.* Individual Gnostic teachers incorporated magical incantations, rituals of power, and astrological beliefs and symbols into their various systems of thought. Magical passwords and seals, for instance, are given in the two books of Jeu to assist the individual Gnostic in the treacherous heavenly ascent through the demonically controlled planetary spheres after death (see Rudolph, 172-75). Thus the phenomena of magic and astrology—so popular with the masses—found a companion in Gnosticism, but continued to be opposed by the mainstream church.

See also GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM; MIRACLES IN ACTS; POWER; RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN; SATAN, DEVIL; SIGNS AND WONDERS; SPIRITS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, "Incantations and Books of Magic" in The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, rev. and ed. G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Goodman (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986) 3.1.342-79; C. E. Arnold, Ephesians: Power and Magic (SNTSMS 63; Cambridge: University Press, 1989; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992 repr.); D. Aune, "The Apocalypse of John and Graeco-Roman Revelatory Magic," NTS 33 (1987) 481-501; idem, "Magic in Early Christianity," ANRW 2.23.2 (1980) 1507-57; idem, "Magic," ISBE 3.213-19; H. D. Betz, ed. The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation, 1: Text (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986); idem, "Magic and Mystery in the Greek Magical Papyri" in Hellenismus und Urchristentum. Gesammelte Aufsätze I (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990) 209-29; F. Cumont, Astrology and Religion Among the Greeks and Romans (New York & London: G. P. Putnam's, 1912); idem, The Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism (New York/London: Dover, 1956 [1911]); C. A. Faraone and D. Obbink, eds., Magika Hiera: Ancient Greek Magic and Religion (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); E. Ferguson, Backgrounds of Early Christianity (2d. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); J. G. Gager, Curse Tablets and Binding Spells from the Ancient World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992); S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, 2: The Archaeological Evidence from the Diaspora (BS 37; New York: Bollingen Foundation, 1953); H. G. Gundel, Weltbild und Astrologie in den griechischen Zauberpapyri (MBPAR 53; München: Beck, 1968); W. Gundel, Dekane und Dekansternbilder: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Sternbilder der Kulturvölker (2d ed.; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1969); T. Hopfner, Griechisch-Ägyptischer Offenbarungszauber (SPP 21; Amsterdam: Adolf M. Hakkert, 1974 [= Leipzig: Haessel, 1921]); G. H. R. Horsley, New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity. A Review of Greek Inscriptions and Papyri Published in 1976 (North Ryde: Macquarie University, 1981); G. Luck, Arcana Mundi (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1985); R. Merkelbach and M. Totti, Abraxas. Ausgewählte Papyri Religiösen und Magischen Inhalts (3 Vols.; ARWAW: Sonderreihe, Papyrological Coloniensia 17.1, 17.2, 17.3; Opladen: Estdeutscher Verlag, 1990, 1991, 1992); M. W. Meyer and P. Mirecki, Ancient Magic and Ritual Power (RGRW 129; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); M. W. Meyer and R. Smith, Ancient Christian Magic: Coptic Texts of Ritual Power (San Francisco: Harper, 1994); A. Segal, "Hellenistic Magic: Some Questions of Definition" in The Other Judaisms of Late Antiquity (BJS 127; Atlanta: Scholar's Press, 1987) 79-108; E. M. Yamauchi, "Magic in the Biblical World," TB 34 (1983) 169-200.

C. E. Arnold

MAN. See WOMAN AND MAN.

MANDATES OF HERMAS. See HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF.

MARANATHA. See LITURGICAL ELEMENTS.

MARCION

Marcion (c. 80-c. 155) was the most influential heretical Christian of the second century. He rejected Judaism* and the OT and with them the God* of the OT. Preaching a gospel of love, Marcion focused on what he implied was a second, higher and better God of the NT. He established the earliest closed canon* and the first independent Christian organization to rival successfully the mainstream church.

1. Career
2. Teaching and Works
3. Marcionism
4. Marcion and the New Testament
5. Legacy

1. Career.

Marcion was a native of Sinope, a Hellenistic city in the province of Pontus in Asia Minor and a center of commerce on the shore of the Black Sea. Marcion was a wealthy ship owner whose father, we are told, was a bishop. He was supposedly excommunicated for "seducing a virgin." This is no doubt a false report, since it hardly fits with our knowledge of Marcion's character and is found in only one source. It may be a garbled memory of his leading astray some local Christians with false teaching (cf. 2 Cor 11:2-4). Marcion appears to have moved to other ports in Asia Minor, scattering his gospel everywhere. There is some evidence that he taught in Ephesus and was rejected there. It is possible that Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians (c. 125) was written against Marcionite teachings and indicates some of the early spreading of his ideas.

Like most thinkers who wished to influence the empire, Marcion made his way to Rome and gave the church a handsome gift of 200,000 sesterces (see Roman Empire). In Rome he came under the influence of Cerdo, a Christian philosopher from Syria.* In 144 (the one firm date we have for his life) Marcion was excommunicated by the council of presbyters in Rome, and his money was returned to him. Marcion then organized his own church, which grew rapidly. He solidified his teachings, created an abbreviated and closed canon of Scripture and stayed in Rome until his death sometime after 150.

2. Teaching and Works.

In the second century there were no written standards by which heresy was identified and no fixed list of canonical books for the NT. Only the universal rejection of Marcion by the orthodox and his mutilation of Christian documents identify him as a heretic. Marcion himself no doubt sincerely believed that he was restoring the true gospel* of Jesus from the corrupting influence of Judaizers and pseudoapostles (see Apostle).

2.1. Theology. Scholars continue to debate the central concern of Marcion, the key points of departure that lead to his aberrant theology, his short canon of Scripture and his establishment of a separate church organization. This debate is greatly complicated by the lack of Marcionite documents. As with most heretics, we know of Marcion only through the writings of his Christian opponents. We are fortunate, however, to have Tertullian's five books against Marcion, from which (along with other patristic sources) we can reconstruct his ideas and writings.

The key to understanding Marcion's thought is his anti-Judaism. From this center we can explain the rest of his work (contra Hoffmann, 226-34). It is important to remember that Marcion had philosophical and religious problems with Judaism but was not anti-Semitic in the modern sense. No doubt the anti-Judiac character of Marcion's thought derives from the general conflict between synagogue* and church following the bloody suppression of Jewish revolt in Palestine (A.D. 66-70 and 116-17). We know there was a large Jewish population in Pontus. It is suggestive of conflict between Jews and Christians in Pontus that Aquila (not the NT Aquila) was likewise a native of Sinope. Aquila was a re-convert to Judaism from Christianity who produced a literal Greek translation of the OT to replace the Septuagint, which the church used. The motive for this translation is clearly polemical and anti-Christian. If Marcion's father was a bishop, his family may have been involved in this conflict.

Marcion accepted a literal interpretation of the OT, rejecting the widespread use of typology and allegory among Christians. He distinguished, however, between the inferior Creator God (or Demiurge) of the OT and the God of the NT. The OT God gave the law* and was just but also incompetent. He was responsible for the creation of matter and for allowing Adam and Eve to fall into sin.* A second and superior God, the "unknown" God (cf. Acts 17:23) who is alien to this world, is the true author of salvation* and Father of Jesus Christ. This God was unknown prior to the ministry of Christ and is a God of light and love, the true savior of humanity. Only the NT God is worthy of worship* and adoration. The God of the Jews Marcion rejected. This dualism also provided a simple answer to the problem of evil, which no doubt added to the popularity of Marcionism.

Because of this theological dualism and rejection of matter, early writers like Irenaeus identified Marcion as a Gnostic.* While Marcion was no doubt influenced by Gnosticism, he differed from it in too many ways to be called a Gnostic. A more probable influence upon Marcion was the dualism and world-denying asceticism of several popular Hellenistic religions and philosophies, such as Cynic philosophy and Mithraism, in his native Pontus (see Religions). This suggests that Marcion developed his anti-Judaism in a thorough and consistent manner, using the intellectual tools that he found at hand. On this basis he was able to affirm the savior Jesus while relegating the God, the future Messiah (not Jesus) and the Bible of the Jews to second-class status. Marcion was consistent in his rejection of the material world* and the flesh.* Christ did not assume a physical body, and his work consisted of announcing the forgiveness* of the God of love and goodness. To join the Marcionites one renounced sex and could not be married (see Marriage). One also avoided wine and meat but was allowed fish. After death only the soul is raised to eternal life (see Resurrection).

*2.2. Writings. Some scholars (Harnack, Hoffmann) have understood Marcion to be an extremist follower of Paul, merely a biblical theologian. This interpretation ignores the influence of anti-Judaism, dualism and asceticism on his thought. Such an interpretation is a good antidote to the traditional hypothesis but founders on the fact that the letters of Paul do not of themselves lead to Marcionism and in fact have elements in them that contradict it. Marcion himself knew better than modern critics how true this is, since he had to cut out the offending elements in Paul's letters. But there can be no doubt of Marcion's attachment to the apostle to the Gentiles. Paul alone among the apostles and evangelists understood the true gospel, the others being deluded by Jewish influence.

Marcion's canon included only an edited version of Luke and ten letters of Paul (excluding the Pastorals). The OT was completely rejected as an inferior Bible. To be consistent, Marcion removed from Paul's writings all quotations from the OT and most positive references to the Jews (e.g., the word first in Rom 1:16). To be fair to him, Marcion based this mutilation of NT documents on the theory that judaizing false apostles had corrupted the works of Paul and the gospel stories of Jesus. Careful work, therefore, was needed to restore the true, uncorrupted text. The edited version of Paul he called the Apostolicon.

Marcion's Gospel, the first part of his canon, was an edited version of Luke "restored" according to the same method. No doubt the tradition associating Luke with Paul was one reason Marcion preferred this Gospel to the others. Portions of Luke that did not fit the "true" (Marcionite) gospel were removed from the text, being interpolations by the false (Jewish) apostles. Marcion removed such elements as the Jewish genealogy of Jesus and the infancy narratives. Some have suggested that Marcion had a shorter text, a kind of proto-Luke, to work from. The evidence for this is necessarily scant, since Marcion's Gospel does not exist. It seems unlikely, however, given the late date of Marcion's work, relative to Luke-Acts. Furthermore, Marcion was willing to cut out offending portions even from the letters of his beloved Paul. How much more was he willing to edit the work of a mere follower, such as Luke? Marcion also wrote the Antitheses, which sets forth the contradictions between the teachings of Jesus and Paul and the OT. This functioned as a "key to the Scriptures" in the Marcionite churches and established Marcion as the first radical NT critic in church history.

3. Marcionism.

Marcion broke away from the catholic churches and established his own organization. This was successful and soon spread throughout the empire, "to every nation" wrote Justin Martyr, c. 150 (Justin Apol. I 26). Tertullian devoted his longest work to a refutation of Marcion. Numerous other orthodox writers in the Middle East, Africa and Europe felt compelled to condemn his work. These developments demonstrate the strength of the Marcionite church. Besides its own doctrine and canon of Scripture, the Marcionite church had its own bishops, presbyters, catechumenate and liturgy. Marcionite churches could be found in cities throughout the Roman Empire and in fact were so similar to the mainstream church that orthodox pastors warned new converts not to enter a Marcionite church by mistake. The oldest inscription (A.D. 318-19) we have from any Christian house of worship is Marcionite: "Place of worship [synagōgē] of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ of the Marcionites in the village of Lebabon" (Harnack 1924, 342). This indicates that Marcionites used the name of their founder to identify themselves and their buildings. Like other Christians, Marcionites faced martyrdom* at the hands of their Roman leaders, until the age of Constantine. The Marcionite church was absorbed, for the most part, into Manichaeism by the end of the second century but survived in the East (especially Syria) until the middle of the fifth century.

The popularity of Marcionism can be explained by many factors. Not least among them is the widespread anti-Judaism among Christians and pagans alike (Gager 1983). The dualism and asceticism of the Marcionites must have fit well into the popular mindset of late antiquity. His simple solution to the problem of evil, to the multiplicity of gospels and to the difficulty of an Incarnation must likewise have been attractive.

4. Marcion and the New Testament.

Some scholars (Bauer, Knox, Hoffmann) have argued that anti-Marcionite sentiments may lie behind some portions of the NT itself. In particular they find anti-Marcionite elements in Luke-Acts and the Pastoral Letters (1 and 2 Tim; Tit). This is most unlikely, given the probable dates for Marcion's Bible and for the NT documents (see DJG, Luke, Gospel of and DPL, Pastoral Letters). Even if Marcion was teaching heresy in the East prior to 144, there is no evidence of his Bible until Irenaeus (c. 190). There was no reason to publish his Gospel and Apostolicon until he had founded a new church after his expulsion from the Roman one.

Even leaving aside the issue of dating, the hypothesis collapses on careful consideration of the evidence. The heresy that prompted the writing of the Pastorals is best understood as a kind of Jewish proto-Gnosticism. All the evidence for anti-Marcionism can be explained with this far more likely theory. In addition the proto-Gnostic theory fits the fact that these false teachers devoted themselves to endless myths and genealogies (1 Tim 1:4) and wished to be teachers of the law (1 Tim 1:7)—such cannot have been Marcionite. Even the word antitheseis (contradictions, 1 Tim 6:20) need not point to Marcion. The word is a common one in Hellenistic rhetoric, which both 1 Timothy and Marcion used independently (cf. Esther 3:16; Job 32:3 LXX). The notion that Luke-Acts was written in part against Marcion (Knox, Hoffmann) is even more unlikely. The minimal evidence for such a bias can easily be explained by internal conflicts in the first-century church, a theory that fits much better with the date and purpose of Acts.*

4.1 Marcion and the Canon of the New Testament. Marcion's influence on the canon of the NT, as opposed to the NT itself, is beyond doubt. While the early church would have eventually created a list of authorized books in any case, the work of Marcion gave a sharp impetus to the creation of a catholic canon. He was the first to create a closed list of books, and the larger church was bound to respond with its own list. Even the shape of our NT (Gospels and Epistles) is due to Marcion's two-part canon. In terms of the Pauline corpus, Marcion gives us a ten-letter list without Hebrews or the Pastorals. The earliest papyrus of the Pauline letters (P^{46}) also does not include the Pastorals (but does include Hebrews). This may indicate an early, shorter Pauline corpus. It is certainly striking that brief, ancient prologues to Paul's letters seem to have been written in Marcionite circles in Rome. These prologues eventually made their way into many manuscripts of the Vulgate. At the same time, short prologues to the four Gospels in early Latin manuscripts seem to be anti-Marcionite. Marcion thus made a definite impact upon the canonical process, and this may be his most enduring legacy.

4.2 Marcion and the Text of the New Testament. Marcion's editorial cuts have also influenced the textual history of NT manuscripts (Blackman, 128-71). For example, some manuscripts of Romans 1:16 omit the word "first." But the extent of Marcion's influence upon the textual tradition in Paul and Luke is slight. Since Marcion's Gospel has to be reconstructed, we owe citations from his text to other sources. For many of the nontheological changes Marcion made, it is difficult to tell whether the alteration is due to Marcion himself or to a variant textual tradition that Marcion (or his critic) is quoting. For example, at 1 Corinthians 6:20 Marcion's text, along with many Latin texts, reads "Glorify and bear God in your body" (rather than "therefore, glorify God in your body.") It appears that this is a common variant (mis)reading rather than one that Marcion introduced into the textual traditions of the NT.

5. Legacy.
Marcion's canon and separate church forced the mainstream of Christianity to clarify its own NT canon. He also helped the mainstream church affirm its relationship to Judaism and the OT. Marcionism led early Christian thinkers to recognize the OT roots of their religion and the Jewish element in any true Christian faith. These were valuable lessons for Christianity. Given the unfortunate anti-Semitic tradition in Christian history, one can only wish they had been better learned.

See also CANON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Balas, "Marcion Revisited" in Texts and Testaments, ed. W. E. March (San Antonio, TX: Trinity University Press, 1980) 95-108; W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (ET; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); E. C. Blackman, Marcion and His Influence (London: SPCK, 1948); J. J. Clabeaux, A Lost Edition of the Letters of Paul (CBQMS 21; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association, 1989); H. J. W. Drijvers, "Marcionism in Syria," SecCent 6 (1987-88) 152-72; J. G. Gager, "Marcion and Philosophy," VC 26 (1972) 53-59; idem, The Origins of Anti-Semitism (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983); A. von Harnack, Marcion: Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott (TU 45; 2d ed.; Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1924), partial ET, Marcion: The Gospel of the Alien God (Durham, NC: Labyrinth, 1990); R. J. Hoffmann, Marcion: On the Restitution of Christianity (AARAS 46; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1984); J. Knox, Marcion and the New Testament (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1942); G. May, "Marcion in Contemporary Views," SecCent 6 (1987-88) 129-51; B. M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987); R. S. Wilson, Marcion: A Study of a Second-Century Heretic (London: Clarke, 1933). A. G. Padgett

MARK, SECRET GOSPEL OF

The Secret Gospel of Mark is a title given to a version of Mark's Gospel mentioned and briefly cited in a fragment of a letter "to Theodore," attributed to "the most holy Clement, the author of the Stromateis" (Theod. 1.1; i.e., Clement of Alexandria [c. 150-215]). Since its discovery, the Secret Gospel of Mark has remained of interest especially among scholars who have sought source material beyond the limits of the canonical Gospels for a reconstruction of the life and teaching of the historical Jesus (e.g., Smith 1978; cf. Crossan 1991) or the history of the Gospel traditions (e.g., Koester).

1. Text and Context
2. The Question of Authenticity
3. Secret Gospel of Mark and Canonical Mark
4. Conclusion

1. Text and Context.

The only extant manuscript of the Letter to Theodore, discovered in 1958 by Morton Smith (published in Smith 1973, reprinted in Stählin and Treu) at the Orthodox monastery at Mar Saba, southwest of Jerusalem, is a fragmentary copy. This copy was written on the last page (both sides) and the inside back cover of a volume of Isaac Voss's edition of the letters of Ignatius,* published in 1646, in what Smith and nine other scholars, relying on Smith's photographs, have judged to be an eighteenth-century hand (for the full text of the Letter to Theodore in translation, see Bruce, Cameron, Smith 1973, 1982; for the fragments of the Secret Gospel of Mark see also Merkel 1991 and Elliott). Since all scholarly judgments on the authenticity of the Letter to Theodore, and thus the value of the brief citation from the Secret Gospel that it contains, have been dependent to date on Smith's uncorroborated published photographs and report of his discovery (but cf. Talley), they must remain tentative (cf. Quesnell).

The Letter to Theodore is a warning against the teaching of the Carpocratians, an Alexandrian Gnostic* sect known for its libertine practices of "carnal and bodily sins" (Theod. 1.4; cf. Chadwick, Daniélou, Rudolf, Hultgren and Haggmark; Letter to Theodore draws allusively on polemical phrases from Prov 26:5; Eccl 2:14; Mt 5:13 par. Lk 14:34; Mt 25:29 par. Lk 19:26; Lk 1:78 [?]; 2 Cor 3:17; 1 Thess 5:5; Tit 1:15; Jude 13; Rev 2:24).

In particular the Letter to Theodore accuses the Carpocratians of misinterpreting and falsifying "the divinely inspired Gospel according to Mark" (Theod. 1.11-12), which is known in Alexandria* in two editions. According to the Letter to Theodore, Mark composed the first edition of his Gospel during Peter's stay in Rome for use in the instruction of catechumens. After Peter's death, the Letter to Theodore relates, Mark came to Alexandria, where he composed a "more spiritual Gospel" (Theod. 1.21-22), expanding his first edition with additional acts and sayings of Jesus from his memoirs and those of Peter (but excluding the "hierophantic teaching of the Lord" [Theod. 1.23-24]) to produce a "secret Gospel" (Theod. 2.6, 12; hence the title Secret Gospel of Mark) for use by those who were being perfected in knowledge through initiation into the "great mysteries" (Theod. 2.2).

The Letter to Theodore alleges, however, that Carpocrates deceitfully obtained a copy of the "most carefully guarded" (Theod. 2.1) Secret Gospel and polluted it with "shameless lies" (Theod. 2.8-9), making it the basis of his "blasphemous and carnal opinion" (Theod. 2.7). Carpocrates had so corrupted the Secret Gospel that the Letter to Theodore advises Theodore, when confronted by Carpocratian teaching, to deny "with an oath" that it is by Mark (Theod. 2.12).

To aid in the refutation of Carpocratian falsifications, the Letter to Theodore cites about eighteen lines of Greek text from the Secret Gospel. The first citation of about fifteen lines (Theod. 2.23—3.11) is identified as being located between Mark 10:32-34 and Mark 10:35. This citation relates an account of Jesus' raising of a rich "young man" in Bethany whose sister has prostrated herself before Jesus (an apparent variant of the Johannine story of the raising of Lazarus [John 11]). The account concludes with Jesus staying in the young man's house and after six days teaching him "the mystery of the kingdom of God" during a nocturnal session in which the young man is clothed with "a linen robe thrown over his naked body." The second citation of about three lines (Theod. 3.14-16) is located after Mark 10:46 and recounts Jesus' failure to receive "the sister of the young man whom Jesus loved and his mother and Salome." A further alleged citation, the cryptic phrase "naked to naked" (Theod. 3.13), is regarded by the Letter to Theodore to be spurious.

2. The Question of Authenticity.

Smith has copiously and vigorously argued for the authenticity of the Letter to Theodore, dating it between 175 and 200. He notes that letters of Clement, though no longer extant, are cited in the Sacra Parallela, attributed to John of Damascus (c. 675-749), who spent some time at Mar Saba, and it is possible that the fragment of the Letter to Theodore found at Mar Saba may have been preserved from the destruction of a fire in the eighteenth century documented by the monastery's historian.

With the aid of detailed indices in the critical edition of Clement's works by O. Stählin, Smith demonstrates the similarities between the Letter to Theodore and the extant works of Clement with reference to vocabulary, style, use of Scripture (including a preference for the Western textual tradition) and classical writers, and theological and ethical perspective. Parallels with the works of Clement that specially favor the authenticity of the Letter to Theodore are knowledge of Mark's relationship with Peter (cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.15.1-2; 6.14.5-7 [see also Mullins]) and Mark's founding of churches in Alexandria on the basis of his Gospel (perhaps implied by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.16.1; 2.24 [see also Pearson; denied by Bauer]); the polemic against the libertinism of the Carpocratians (Clement Strom. 3; cf. Irenaeus Haer. 1.25.1-6; 1.28.2); and the promotion of a higher knowledge for those seeking perfection beyond catechetical instruction (Clement Strom. 5.10), which may be based on an oral tradition from the risen Lord* (Clement Excerpta 66; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.1.4-5). Smith also finds a possible corroboration for the Carpocratian use of Mark in Irenaeus's reference to unnamed heretics "who separate Jesus from Christ, alleging that Christ remained impassible, but that it was Jesus who suffered, preferring the Gospel by Mark" (Irenaeus Haer. 3.11.7; cf. Irenaeus Haer. 1.25.5).

Smith's case for the authenticity of the Letter to Theodore, though accepted by many scholars, is diminished by some discrepancies from the known writings of Clement. Eusebius reports that Clement regarded the Gospel of John as the "spiritual Gospel" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.7), and although Clement cites the apocryphal* Gospel of the Egyptians (Clement Strom. 3.6.45; 3.9.63, 64, 66; 3.13.92-93) in his major polemic against the Carpocratians (Clement Strom. 3), he traces the source of their libertinism to their interpretation of Matthew 5:42 (par. Luke 6:30; Clement Strom. 3.4.27; 3.6.54) and another unidentified apocryphal writing (Clement Strom. 3.4.29), with no mention of the Secret Gospel.

Likewise no reference to the Secret Gospel is made in Clement's lengthy homily on the rich man in Mark 10:17-31 (Quis Div.), which presumably would have been enhanced by the story of a rich man who became a disciple of Jesus (the fragment of the Secret Gospel in Theod. 2.23—3.10, placed after Mark 10:34). Furthermore, the Letter to Theodore's advocacy of deception regarding the existence of the Secret Gospel because of Carpocratian corruption and misuse (Theod. 2.11-19) seems contrary to Clement's teaching regarding truthfulness and the taking of oaths (Clement Strom. 7.8-9 [pace Smith]) and may betray a forger's "seal of authenticity" (C. E. Murgia in Wuellner; cf. Musurillo).

The Letter to Theodore's argumentative strategy also appears inauthentic, "since for Clement true gnosis is not attained by acquaintance with hidden documents but by faith and love as learned through interpretation of public apostolic writings," and his polemic against the Carpocratians is argued elsewhere "on ethical grounds" (Osborn, 224; cf. Clement Strom. 3.4.39; 3.5.42; 3.18.109-10; cf. Clement Quis Div. 5, 11, 17, 27-30, 36-37).

Finally, although the Carpocratians were notoriously sexually promiscuous (Clement Strom. 3.2.5, 10; cf. Irenaeus Haer. 1.28.2), there is no clear evidence that this involved homosexual relations (with the exception of stereotyped lists of vices [Clement Strom. 3.4.36; 3.18.109]), as Smith infers from the phrase "naked to naked" in Letter to Theodore 3.13 (cf. Grant; the texts adduced by Smith to interpret this phrase as implying a homosexual union also can be disputed [Plato Symp. 175c-e; Plutarch Iside 17, Mor. 357d; Iside 19, Mor. 358e; Aelian De Nat. Anim. 16.28; Philostratus Vit. Ap. 6.16 (cf. Clement Strom. 3.7.60); Hippolytus Apos. Trad. 21.5, 11; Clement Excerpta 66]).

3. Secret Gospel of Mark and Canonical Mark. Smith has developed a complex hypothesis defending the antiquity of the Secret Gospel, arguing, with some divergence from the testimony of the Letter to Theodore, that the Secret Gospel, although it was compiled after the canonical Gospel of Mark in an imitation of Mark's Greek style, preserves an Aramaic source that antedates canonical Mark and thus provides a window to the historical Jesus. As evidence for this hypothesis, Smith adduces the form of the miracle story in the Secret Gospel (Theod. 2.23—3.6), which appears more primitive than the story in John 11 and exhibits some Semitisms (additional form-critical arguments are offered by R. H. Fuller in Wuellner); the similarity between the geographical outlines of Mark 6:32—16:8 and John 6:1—20:2 when the material from the Secret Gospel is added to Mark; a liturgy for Easter baptism* that can be discerned in Mark 10:13-45 with the addition of the Secret Gospel (see also Richardson); the apparent dependence of Matthew and the Western textual tradition on the Secret Gospel; and the resolution of an aporia in Mark 10:46, explained as the result of later censorship of the Secret Gospel material cited in Letter to Theodore 3.14-16, and the enigma of Mark 14:51-52, interpreted in light of the Secret Gospel as another nocturnal baptism (see also Scroggs and Groff). (Similarly Koester, Crossan, Schenke, Meyer, and Munro, with various arguments, find canonical Mark to be an abridgment of the Secret Gospel. Cf. also Levin's analysis of the value of the Secret Gospel for interpreting canonical Mark.)

Ranging widely through the nooks and crannies of early Jewish, pagan and Christian literature and armed with an unrelenting hermeneutic of suspicion, Smith ferrets out evidence of a secret but pervasive libertine mysticism in the ancient world. From this background Smith interprets the Secret Gospel as proof that the historical Jesus was part of this libertine movement and engaged in magical practices possibly involving homosexual acts (a thesis defended further in Jesus the Magician).

Smith's hypothesis, and others like it, concerning the priority of the Secret Gospel in relation to canonical Mark, is even less compelling than his case for the authenticity of the Letter to Theodore. The Secret Gospel is "too much like Mark," according to E. Best (204), using criteria for determining Markan style developed by E. J. Pryke, and is much more easily explained as a secondary "pastiche of phrases from Mark" (Bruce, 306), demonstrably dependent on the stories of Nicodemus and Lazarus in John (John 3; 11; cf. Brown) and the "young man" stories in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 19:20, 22; Mk 14:51; 16:5; Lk 7:14; cf. Neirynck).

The phraseology of the Secret Gospel betrays the harmonizing tendency of a hand familiar with all the canonical Gospels (see the tabular surveys in Brown, Merkel, Wink), perhaps through Tatian's Diatessaron, which frequently follows the Western textual tradition (cf. D. Schmidt in Wuellner). The secondary character of the Secret Gospel is also confirmed by the way it spoils a carefully constructed Markan climax to Jesus' deliberate journey "on the way" from Caesarea Philippi to Jerusalem (Mk 8:27—10:52) by introducing a superfluous visit to Bethany, acclamation of Jesus as "Son of David" and return to the other side of the Jordan (Theod. 2.23—3.11) before blind Bartimaeus hails Jesus as the "Son of David" and follows him "on the way . . . drawing near to Jerusalem, to Bethphage and Bethany" (Mk 10:52—11:1), where he will be exalted as the Davidic king (Mk 11:9-10). As a pastiche or cento, the Secret Gospel bears a strong resemblance to other apocryphal Gospels from the second century (e.g., Gospel of the Ebionites [cited in Epiphanius Haer 30.13.2-3], Papyrus Egerton 2; cf. Brown, Merkel, Neirynck).

4. Conclusion.

It is difficult to assess the historical value of documents as problematic as the Letter to Theodore and Secret Gospel. If the Letter to Theodore is authentic, it confirms Clement's belief in a higher knowledge for Christians who were being perfected and reveals another apocryphal Gospel, the Secret Gospel, used by his church (cf. Clement's use of Preaching of Peter [Clement Strom. 2.15.68; 6.5.39; etc.], Apocalypse of Peter [cited in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.1], Gospel of the Hebrews [Clement Strom. 2.9.45; 5.14.96] and Gospel of the Egyptians [Clement Strom. 3.6.45; 3.9.63; 3.13.99]; cf. Bruce). It also shows that the Secret Gospel was another source of contention in the debate with the Carpocratians. It can be doubted, however, that the portion of the Secret Gospel cited in the Letter to Theodore was the basis of a baptismal rite in Clement's church since there is no explicit reference to baptism (cf. Merkel; Best 1986 "Mark 10:13-16"), and the rich young man with "a linen robe thrown over his naked body" may be demonstrating his renunciation of wealth (cf. Mk 10:21; 15:46), an ideal of poverty that Clement later rejects (cf. Quis Diu 11; so Gundry). Because the Secret Gospel is likely a secondary apocryphal work, it probably offers no value for source and tradition criticism of the Gospel of Mark (cf. Neirynck, Gundry; against Koester, Crossan, Schenke, Meyer) or for insight into the life and teaching of the historical Jesus (cf. Merkel against Smith), including the role of women among his followers (against Munro).

See also APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHICAL WRITINGS; PETER, GOSPEL OF; THOMAS, GOSPEL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); E. Best, "Mark 10:13-16: The Child as Model Recipient" in Disciples and Discipleship (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986) 80-97; idem, "Uncanonical Mark" in Disciples and Discipleship (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986) 197-205; R. E. Brown, "The Relation of 'The Secret Gospel of Mark' to the Fourth Gospel," CBQ 36 (1974) 466-85; F. F. Bruce, "The 'Secret' Gospel of Mark" in The Canon of Scripture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988 [1974]) 298-315; R. Cameron, The Other Gospels (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982); H. Chadwick, "Clement of Alexandria: General Introduction" in Alexandrian Christianity, ed. J. E. L. Oulton and H. Chadwick (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1954) 15-39; J. D. Crossan, Four Other Gospels (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1992 [1985]); idem, The Historical Jesus (San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1991); idem, "Thoughts on Two Extracanonical Gospels," Semeia 49 (1990) 155-68; J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); J. K. Elliott, The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993); R. M. Grant, "Morton Smith's Two Books," ATR 56 (1974) 58-64; R. H. Gundry, "Excursus on the Secret Gospel of Mark" in Mark (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993) 603-23; A. J. Hultgren and S. J. Haggmark, eds., The Earliest Christian Heretics (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); idem, "History and Development of Mark's Gospel: From Mark to Secret Mark and 'Canonical' Mark" in Colloquy on New Testament Studies, ed. B. C. Corley (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1983) 35-58; S. Levin, "The Early History of Christianity in the Light of the 'Secret Gospel' of Mark," ANRW 2.25.6 (1988) 4270-92; H. Merkel, "Appendix: The 'Secret Gospel' of Mark" in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. W. Schneemelcher (2 vols.; rev. ed.; Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1991) 1:106-9; idem, "Auf den Spuren des Urmarkus? Ein neuer Fund und seine Beurteilung," ZTK 71 (1974) 123-44; M. W. Meyer, "The Youth in the Secret Gospel of Mark," Semeia 49 (1990) 129-53; T. Y. Mullins, "Papias and Clement and Mark's Two Gospels," VC 30 (1976) 189-92; W. Munro, "Women Disciples: Light from Secret Mark," JFSR 8 (1992) 47-64; H. Musurillo, "Morton Smith's Secret Gospel," Thought 48 (1973) 327-31; F. Neirynck, "The Apocryphal Gospels and the Gospel of Mark" in The New Testament in Early Christianity (BETL 86; Louvain: Leuven University/Peeters, 1989) 125-75; E. Osborn, "Clement of Alexandria: A Review of Research, 1958-82," SecCent 3 (1983) 219-44; B. A. Pearson, "Earliest Christianity in Egypt: Some Observations" in The Roots of Egyptian Christianity, ed. B. A. Pearson and J. E. Goehring (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 137-45; Q. Quesnell, "The Mar Saba Clementine: A Question of Evidence," CBQ 37 (1975) 48-67; C. C. Richardson, "Review of Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark and The Secret Gospel, by Morton Smith," TS 35 (1974) 571-77; K. Rudolf, Gnosis (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983); H.-M. Schenke, "The Mystery of the Gospel of Mark," SecCent 4 (1984) 65-82; R. Scroggs and K. I. Groff, "Baptism in Mark: Dying and Rising with Christ," JBL 92 (1973) 531-48; M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); idem, "Clement of Alexandria and Secret Mark: The Score at the End of the First Decade," HTR 75 (1982) 449-61; idem, Jesus the Magician (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978); idem, The Secret Gospel (Clearlake, CA: Dawn Horse, 1982 [1973]); O. Stählin and L. Treu, eds., Clemens Alexandrinus (2d ed.; GCS; Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1980) vol. 4.1; T. J. Talley, "Liturgical Time in the Ancient Church: The State of Research," StudLit 14 (1982) 34-51; W. Wink, "Jesus as Magician," USQR 30 (1974) 3-14; W. Wuellner, ed., Protocol of the Eighteenth Colloquy, 7 December 1975, The Center for Hermeneutical Studies in Hellenistic and Modern Culture (Berkeley, CA: The Center for Hermeneutical Studies in Hellenistic and Modern Culture, 1976).

L. A. Losie

MARRIAGE, DIVORCE AND ADULTERY

This article addresses the development of early Christian conceptions of marriage, divorce and adultery in post-Pauline Gentile Christianity. (For questions of roles in marriage relationships see Woman and Man.) The focus is primarily the sanctity and inviolability of the marriage union as expressed negatively in early Christian sanctions against divorce and marital unfaithfulness (see DJG, Divorce; DPL, Marriage and Divorce, Adultery and Incest).

1. Marriage and Divorce
2. Lust and Adultery
3. Conclusion

1. Marriage and Divorce.

1.1. Marriage and Divorce in Jesus' Teachings. Although scholars disagree widely about the precise implications of Jesus' teachings on divorce, these teachings clearly impacted the later church.* Divorce was common in the Roman world (Carcopino, 95-100), Roman law dissolved a marriage at the request of either partner (Cary and Haarhoff, 144), and Jewish law* dissolved a marriage at the request of the man (Harrell, 64). Although the School of Shammai accepted only unfaithfulness as valid grounds for divorce—a standard charge in the dissolution of marriages—they nevertheless accepted as valid divorces for other reasons (see Keener 1991, 39-40.)

Jesus introduced a stricter ethic based not on the biblical law of divorce (Deut 24:1-4) but on the biblical principle of marriage (Gen 2:24)—that is, he opposed divorce because the permanence of marital harmony is God's* ideal. By implication he also opposed disharmony in marriage. Although scholars differ on the precise background and use of Jesus' divorce saying in the earliest church (for one redactional study see Collins), it seems most likely that Jesus offered a general prohibition of divorce in a graphic, hyperbolic saying that portrayed all divorce as invalid and remarriage as adulterous (Mk 10:11; Lk 16:18). Given the context of Jesus' Jewish teaching style, Matthew and Paul are undoubtedly correct to allow exceptions for the innocent party whose marriage is broken against his or her will (for infidelity and abandonment, respectively—Mt 5:32; 19:9; 1 Cor 7:15; see Stein; Keener 1991). That Paul never needs to address the dissolution of second or third marriages in his congregations in a divorce-ridden society also indicates that the earliest Christians regarded repentance* as a sufficient response to past errors, without regarding the divorcing partner as still literally married to the first spouse. In the context of rising sexual asceticism and strict legal applications of Jesus' teachings in the increasingly Gentile second-century church, however, Jesus' Jewish teachings were pressed to produce a harsher ethic than Jesus seems to have intended, one that restricted the victim as well as the perpetrator of a unilateral dissolution rather than simply upheld the sanctity of marriage.

1.2. Marriage and Celibacy in Ignatius. The second century witnessed a gradually increasing tendency toward sexual asceticism, reflecting not merely earlier Jewish chastity but a broader climate of growing asceticism in late antiquity (cf., e.g., Wimbush on antecedents; on the second- and third-century church, e.g., Brown). One might detect some hints of the tendency as early as Ignatius's* mention of "the virgins who are called widows" (Ign. Smyrn. 13.1), whether this refers to widows who had pledged not to remarry (cf. 1 Tim 5:11-12) or to virgins who had chosen to maintain their singleness as in a particular ideal of widowhood from the Republic (see Keener 1991, 92-94). As early as 1 Timothy 4:3 and possibly 1 Corinthians 7:1, some schismatics within the church counseled abstention from marriage; by the time of Ignatius such celibacy appears as a noble calling, but Ignatius warns that one who boasts in this calling is "lost" (Ign. Pol. 5.2). Both celibates and couples seeking marriage needed to seek counsel from the bishop, the latter lest they marry for reasons of lust rather than for the Lord (Ign. Pol. 5.2). This may suggest the somewhat popular philosophical view that one should avoid lust even in marriage (e.g., Muson. Ruf. Sexual Indulgence Frag. 12).

1.3. Marriage and Divorce in Hermas. The mild hints of sexual asceticism in the church world Ignatius knew increased in subsequent decades, however. Among early Christian writings the *Shepherd of Hermas may have been especially responsible for popularizing the tendency in the mainstream churches; unfortunately, if any ancient document is genuinely amenable to Freudian interpretation, it is the Shepherd of Hermas. Whereas biblical visions* and dreams typically involved angels,* departed (or sometimes living human) spirits frequently appeared in extrabiblical dreams (e.g., Plutarch Mul. Vir., Mor. 252F; Chariton Chaer. 2.9.6; Apuleius Met. 8.8; 9.31; cf. 'Abot R. Nat. 40A; 46, §§128-29B; y. Hag. 2:2, §5; y. Sanh. 6.6, §2; Pesiq. Rab Kah. 11:23). The initial visions of Hermas involve women, and though they may symbolize the church (Herm. Vis. 2.8.1) his visions also include rebuke for the unexpressed lust of a woman whose slave he was and whom he had seen undressed (Herm. Vis. 1.1.1-2). Although he claimed to love her only as a sister and to think nothing impure (Herm. Vis. 1.1.1-2), her image appeared to condemn him for desiring her subconsciously (Herm. Vis. 1.1.7-8) and to warn him to repent lest he perish (Herm. Vis. 1.1.9). If one asks why Hermas had to repress such a sin,* one should keep in mind that he felt that this meant his salvation* was in danger (Herm. Vis. 1.2.1); such fear could naturally lead either to denial of sin or to the introspective conscience* of traditional Western theology.

But another visionary woman allows Hermas to project his guilt against those with whom he was already frustrated; as it turns out God was angry at Hermas not because he once lusted (as the first woman had indicated, Herm. Vis. 1.1.9) but because he had not made his family follow his Christian convictions (Herm. Vis. 1.3.1; Herm. Sim. 7.66.1-3). One may suspect that Hermas hoped these visions would scare his children (cf. Herm. Vis. 2.6.2) and wife (Herm. Vis. 2.6.3) into obedience*; as a Roman paterfamilias he was responsible for the behavior of his family (Keener 1991, 98), and as the head of the house he had to suffer for their misdeeds first (Herm. Sim. 7.66.3; see Household, Family).

Hermas indicates a deeper sexual asceticism than had prevailed previously. He threatens to become celibate if his wife does not stop her ungodly speech (Herm. Vis. 2.6.3). Although widowers or widows who remarried did not sin (cf. 1 Cor 7:27-28, where the parallel use of "freed" must apply also to those divorced), Hermas indicates a definite preference for remaining single after widowhood (Herm. Man. 4.32.1-2). This preference for people remaining single after the death of a spouse gained prominence in the church, picking up some streams of popular culture but reacting against the earlier ideals of the Augustan era (see Keener 1991, 68-72). Caring for widows remained part of the church's obligation (Herm. Man. 8.38.10).

His "shepherd," apparently a combination of the Jewish guardian angel and the Roman genius, instructs him that the man who learns that his wife is in adultery must divorce her; should the man remarry, however, he himself commits adultery (Herm. Man. 4.29.7). This statement represents the first recorded instance in history where remarriage was considered adulterous in the case of a valid divorce (all those citations thoroughly collected in Heth and Wenham that clearly prohibit remarriage—others may be intended as generally as Jesus' original prohibition—follow Hermas and hence cannot confirm earlier Christian views). Although this statement misinterprets the likely sense of Jesus' teaching in its Palestinian context, this view became the prevailing one in the increasing climate of sexual asceticism (despite Hermas's somewhat defective christology,* e.g., Herm Sim. 5.58.2; 9.78.1; perhaps 9.89.2). But one should note the shepherd's reason for this instruction: the husband is to remain single so that if the wife repents, he may take her back (Herm. Man. 4.29.10). Yet if he takes her back and she sins after her repentance, the shepherd's reason would no longer be valid, for the shepherd allows her only one repentance (Herm. Man. 4.29.8). (The doctrine of only one permissible repentance—cf. e.g., Herm. Man. 4.31.2; Herm. Sim. 9.96—would aid church discipline but could compound problems for the church in following centuries, when some Roman officials waited for deathbed baptisms to avoid the danger of postbaptismal sin—e.g., Chadwick, 127.) Hermas was likewise strict on the necessity of penance (e.g., Herm. Man. 4.30.2); even wholehearted repentance was not adequate for the forgiveness* of sins until the person had suffered sufficiently (Herm. Sim. 7.66.4).

1.4. Marriage in Second-Century Christian Values. Especially in its earliest and mildest forms, early Christian opposition to divorce stemmed from the high honor early Christians bestowed on marriage and family relations. Because marriage makes one flesh, jealousy between spouses is harmful in a marriage (1 Clem. 6.3; 1 Clem. 3—6 focuses largely on jealousy over church offices; 1 Clem. 43—44). Husbands should love their wives as Christ loves the church (Ign. Pol. 5.1; cf. Eph 5:25). Because marriage was in part an economic contract, the church felt a special need to care for unmarried, hence economically deprived, older women. (Younger women could easily enough find husbands, given the relative shortage of women compared to men in Greek and Roman society—1 Tim 5:14; Gardner, 82; on probable female infanticide, see Lewis, 54-55.) Ignatius felt that bishops were to look after the widows in their congregations (Ign. Pol. 4.1).

2. Lust and Adultery.

2.1. Lust and Adultery in Antiquity. Whereas most Greek society rarely objected to sexual desire if it were not acted out toward other men's wives (Diogenes Laertius Vit. 6.2.4.6; Clit. 1.4-6; Ach. Tat.; Grk. Anth 5.267), some Greek and more Jewish teachers did object to it (e.g., Epictetus Disc. 2.18.15-18; Sir 9:8; 1 Enoch 67:8; b. Nid. 13b; b. Šabb. 64ab). Jesus actively condemned it as adultery of the heart, using the Septuagint's language from the Tenth Commandment about coveting one's neighbor's wife (Mt 5:28; Ex 20:17). Mediterranean societies universally condemned adultery, however; a wife was viewed as her husband's sexual property and hence any other man's use of that property was viewed as wife-stealing (Pseud.-Phoc. 3; Sib. Or. 1.178; 3.38). Under various circumstances this offense could be punished by banishment or worse (Seneca Ben. 6.32.1; Quintilian Inst. Orat. 7.1.7; Richlin, 228); law mandated that a husband who learned of his wife's affair divorce her immediately (Gardner, 89; Safrai, 762) or risk himself being prosecuted for the offense of lenocinium—pimping (Gardner, 131-32; Richlin, 227).

2.2. Marriage and Adultery in Hebrews 13:4. Whether Hebrews 13 was appended later or is, as we think, an original part of the letter-essay as a whole, it provides a list of moral exhortations in typical Greek paraenetic style. The exhortation in Hebrews 13:4 reflects especially Jewish marriage values. Sanctity of the "bed" was a common expression for sexual fidelity in marriage (Wis 3:13, 16; cf. Juvenal Sat. 4.21; Moffatt, 227) and could also depict fidelity in advance (Jos. and As. 2:9, 16; 15:14); other ancient writers also acknowledged that extramarital sex defiled it (Lane, 516). Here both sexual immorality (see Purity) in general and adultery in particular invite God's judgment (see also 1 Cor 6:9; 1 Thess 4:6) and are dishonorable (see also 1 Thess 4:4).

2.3. Lust and Adultery in 2 Peter. Early Christians understood that lust frequently characterized false teachers. Many of their contemporaries mistrusted the motives of traveling charlatans, who found it easier to convert women than men to their followings (Lucian Alex. 6; Liefeld, 239; cf. Juvenal Sat. 1.38-39; 6.540-50; Pesiq. Rab Kah. 24:15); the Christians, too, suspected the sexual activity of false teachers who particularly or nearly exclusively sought women converts (cf. 2 Tim 3:6; Irenaeus Haer. 1.13). Like clergy who abuse positions of influence to molest members of their congregations, false teachers had "eyes full of adultery" (2 Pet 2:14; cf. 1QS 1.6-7; CD 2.16), seeking to exploit others sexually (for the expression, see Bauckham, 266; for "ensnare" as deceptively exploiting the naive, see Kelly, 342).

These teachers' secret desires reflect their enslavement to their corrupt fleshly passions (2 Pet 2:10), and they interpret believers' daylight love feasts as an occasion for sexually immoral revelry (2 Pet 2:13; for night as the time for revelry, see, e.g., Rom 13:12-13; Horace Sat. 1.3.17-18; Seneca Ep. Lucil. 47.7; Juvenal Sat. 8.9-12); such behavior was typically viewed as pagan (1 Pet. 4:3; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.195; Pesiq. R. 52:1; Gen. Rab. 39:8; Lev. Rab. 5:3). Peter borrows a common philosophic description of those who follow their passions as beasts (2 Pet 2:12; 4 Macc. 12:13; Epictetus Disc. 1.3.7, 9; 2.9.3; 4.1.127; 5.21; Plutarch Bride 7; Mor. 139B; Praec. Ger. Reipub. 5, Mor. 802E; Reply to Colotes 2; Mor. 1108D; Marcus Aurelius Med. 3.16; 4.28; Diogn. 28; in a legal text, Gardner, 36).

Peter's language and image of "greed" (2 Pet 2:14-15) may apply to sexual covetousness or to literal financial covetousness, as with Balaam (2 Pet 2:3; Num 22:17; Bib. Ant. 18:13), or may link the two, as in other ancient texts (see Moffatt, 228). This sexual sin is conjoined with their rejection of proper authorities, including angelic ones (2 Pet 2:10-12; cf. 1 Enoch 46:7 but perhaps especially Gen 19:5, 12-14). Thus Peter compares them with Balaam (2 Pet 2:15), who urged harlotry. While respecting his prophetic (e.g., Josephus Ant. 4.104; Philo Vit. Mos. 1.264-65; Sipre Deut. 343.6.1; 357.18.1-2) or philosophic (Gen. Rab. 65:20; Pesiq. Rab Kah. 15:5) skill, Jewish tradition regularly condemned Balaam as foolish (e.g., Philo Cher. 32; Qoh. Rab. 2:15, §2) and evil (e.g., Philo Vit. Mos. 1; b. 'Abod. Zar. 4a). Balaam had led Israel into sexual immorality and hence divine judgment (Num 25:1-3; 31:15-17; Rev 2:14; see Philo Vit. Mos. 1.300-301) but also paid for his sin with his life (Num 31:8). Jewish tradition naturally extended his punishment to damnation (e.g., m. 'Abot 5:19; y. Sanh. 10:2, §8), as these false teachers would also be damned (2 Pet 2:4-9, 19-22); a tradition of uncertain date even declares that Balaam ignored the impending day of judgment (Pesiq. R. 41:3).

Peter indicates that Balaam's donkey was wiser than Balaam (2 Pet 2:16; cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 1.272; Gen. Rab. 93:10), again implying the bestial character of these slaves of passion (2 Pet 2:12). The sensuality and fleshly desires of these who have barely escaped (2 Pet 2:18) contrast starkly with those who partake of the divine nature, who have escaped the corruption that is in the world by desire (2 Pet 1:4; cf. 1:9; 2:20; 3:3; cf. Bauckham, 180-82; unlike Jews many Greeks associated "corruption" with physicality—see, e.g., Plutarch Iside 78, Mor. 382F). These false teachers acted thus because, in keeping with their Hellenized perspective, they neglected or rejected a future day of judgment* (2 Pet 3:3-14; cf. 2:1, 3-6, 9, 12-13; we accept the third chapter as an integral part of the letter—cf., e.g., Kelly, 352-53).

2.4. Lust and Sexual Immorality in Jude. 2 Peter draws heavily on Jude* for its materials. Although some commentators may go too far in regarding Jude's opponents as full-blown Gnostics,* it seems likely that he was combating a sort of antinomian heresy and that the false teachers were exploiting this heresy of false grace* as an excuse for sexual immorality (Jude 4). Thus Jude condemns the behavior of the fallen angels who wanted to have intercourse with women (Jude 6, following a common Jewish reading of Gen 6:1-4 in his day—e.g., see documentation in Keener 1992, 40, 61-63). He likewise provides as an example Sodom and Gomorrah; the men who wanted to rape Lot's guests again provide an example of sexual perversion (either because they sought intercourse with angels or because they sought it with those they thought were men—see Bauckham, 54, for the former). The false teachers followed evil passions (Jude 16, 18); the people of the Spirit* could resist this behavior by Spirit-inspired prayer* and perseverance* (Jude 20-21; cf. Jude 24).

2.5. Spiritual Adultery in James and Revelation. The OT often speaks of spiritual adultery, especially in the context of Israel's* unfaithfulness to God (e.g., Lev 17:7; Is 1:21; Jer 3:1-14), but occasionally other people's also (Is 26:16-18; Nahum 3:4). James* addresses an audience experiencing economic oppression, some of whom are tempted to favor the growing resistance against Rome (see Martin). He warns his audience that God's wisdom* is gentle and peaceful* in contrast to the selfish and striving wisdom of the world* and the devil (Jas 3:13-18). Those who seek violent solutions to their situation, while claiming to follow God (Jas 4:1-2), pursue their own desires rather than God's will (Jas 4:3) and hence are spiritual "adulteresses" (Jas 4:4). James undoubtedly alludes to the common image of Israel's harlotry here (Davids, 160), not to a narrower allusion like Proverbs 30:20 (pace Schmitt). James offers a solution to this adultery: instead of trying to follow both God's values and those of the world, they should submit to God and resist the devil (Jas 4:7-10), seeking peace with their neighbors (cf. Jas 4:11-12).

Scholars are divided as to whether the condemnation of immorality in Revelation 2:14, 20-23 refers to literal or spiritual prostitution. Balaam (Rev 2:14) led Israel to literal immorality and idol food; Revelation 9:20 may refer to literal immorality. Yet especially if Jezebel may be linked with influence from a Thyatiran Sibyl (for divergent views see Hemer, 119; Ramsay, 337-38) and/or more likely strategic compromises with the imperial cult (for imperial cult meals, e.g., CIL 3:550; see Emperor), spiritual immorality is more likely (Caird, 39, 44; cf. 2 Kings 9:22, where Jezebel's immorality is probably figurative). The figurative use of the term continued in contemporary usage (4Q169 Frags. 3-4, 2:7; perhaps Wis 14:12), and probably the prostitute Jezebel provides a prototype for the vision of the great spiritual prostitute Babylon* (Rev 17—18).

2.6. Lust and Adultery in Early Second-Century Christian Writers. Lust was dangerous because it could lead to fornication or adultery (Did. 3.3); according to the thought-world of Hermas, where sexual dangers abounded on every side, the mere thought of another woman was a mortal sin, and the best protection was to focus one's mind on one's own wife (Herm. Man. 4.29.1-2). Adultery was damnable but often appears in vice lists as one damnable sin among many—e.g., deceit, theft and slander (1 Clem. 35.8, quoting Ps 50:18-20); deceit and love for money (2 Clem. 6.4); drunkenness, luxury and slander (Herm. Man. 8.38.3), or drunkenness, slander and lying (Herm. Sim. 6.65.5). According to Hermas, a man who finds his wife in adultery must divorce her or he becomes a participant in her adultery (Herm. Man. 4.29.5-6); in this, Hermas echoes the charge in Roman law: a man who failed to divorce his adulterous wife would be charged with lenocinium ("pimping," 2.1 above). Christian writers could employ the phrase "corrupting households" (normally a depiction of adultery) as a metaphor for distorting the faith with false teaching (Ign. Eph. 16.1).

3. Conclusion.

Following the lead of Jesus and biblical Judaism, early Christians restricted all expressions of sexuality to marriage. To some extent, however, especially on remarriage and later on first marriages for clergy, later Christians began to adopt the values of sexual asceticism that began to flourish in some circles in late antiquity.

See also SEXUALITY, SEXUAL ETHICS; WOMAN AND MAN; WOMEN IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity (New York: Columbia University Press, 1988); G. B. Caird, A Commentary on the Revelation of Saint John the Divine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1966); J. Carcopino, Daily Life in Ancient Rome: The People and the City at the Height of the Empire, ed. H. T. Rowell, (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1940); M. Cary and T. J. Haarhoff, Life and Thought in the Greek and Roman World (4th ed.; London: Methuen, 1946); H. Chadwick, The Early Church (Baltimore: Penguin, 1967); E. A. Clark, Women in the Early Church (MFC 13; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1983); R. F. Collins, Divorce in the New Testament (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1992); P. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); J. F. Gardner, Women in Roman Law & Society (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University, 1986); P. E. Harrell, Divorce and Remarriage in the Early Church: A History of Divorce & Remarriage in the Ante-Nicene Church (Austin, TX: Sweet, 1967); C. J. Hemer, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia in Their Local Setting (JSNTSup 11; Sheffield: University of Sheffield, 1986); W. A. Heth and G. J. Wenham, Jesus and Divorce: The Problem with the Evangelical Consensus (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1984); C. S. Keener, And Marries Another: Divorce and Remarriage in the Teaching of the New Testament (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); idem, Paul, Women & Wives (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1992); J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981 [1969]; W. L. Lane, Hebrews (WBC; 2 vols.; Dallas: Word, 1991); N. Lewis, Life in Egypt Under Roman Rule (Oxford: Clarendon, 1983); W. L. Liefeld, "The Wandering Preacher As a Social Figure in the Roman Empire" (unpublished Ph.D. Dissertation, Columbia University, 1967); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); J. Moffatt, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1924); W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1904; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979); A. Richlin, "Approaches to the Sources on Adultery at Rome," Women's Studies 8 (1981) 225-50; S. Safrai, "Home and Family" in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, ed. S. Safrai and M. Stern with D. Flusser and W. C. van Unnik (2 vols.; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1974; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976) 728-92; J. J. Schmitt, "You Adulteresses! The Image in James 4:4," NovT 28 (1986) 327-37; V. L. Wimbush, "Renunciation towards Social Engineering, An Apologia for the Study of Asceticism in Greco-Roman Antiquity," Occasional Papers of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity 8 (Claremont, CA: Claremont Graduate School, 1986). C. S. Keener

MARTYRDOM

In the NT the Greek term martys ("martyr") means "witness" in a legal sense, often having to do with testimony related to Jesus Christ,* and may include the opposite concept of false witness. Of the thirty-four NT uses of martys, twenty-one are found in Acts, the non-Pauline epistles and Revelation; eighteen of the twenty-one references occur in Acts, which documents Christians' efforts to fulfill the Great Commission and the Apocalypse. Such uses frequently include the idea of faithful witness* for Jesus, even in the face of intense suffering* or death.

The latter nuance is most evident in the biblical text in Revelation, where the concept of faithful witness connects with the climactic phase of the Great Commission (see 4 below). However, martyrdom as death becomes the common understanding only in the writings of some of the apostolic fathers, notably Ignatius. For those Fathers, martyrdom became an active choice in completing the Christian witness.

1. Judaism and Hellenism
2. Acts of the Apostles
3. Non-Pauline Letters
4. Book of Revelation
5. Postapostolic Period

1. Judaism and Hellenism.

Both Jewish and Greco-Roman ideas about martyrdom likely influenced the understanding of the NT writers and the apostolic fathers. The familiarity of the NT writers with the OT, which is apparent through its extensive and striking usage in Hebrews (see Old Testament in Hebrews), James,* 1 Peter, 2 Peter,* Jude* and Revelation, strongly implies such an influence.

Jewish law* required two or more witnesses to verify accusations (Deut 17:6-7; 19:15), a principle often appealed to in the NT (Mt 18:16; Heb 10:28). In the OT both reliable witnesses (Ruth 4:9-11; Is 8:2) and false witnesses (Ex 23:1; Prov 6:19) are common.

In Daniel 7—12 there is developed a concept of the suffering of God's "holy ones," some even unto death, before their sharing in the future kingdom (see Kingdom of God). In Daniel 7:18, 22, for example, these sufferers are called "the saints [LXX hagioi] of the Highest One," apocalyptic* terminology that seems to inform the concept of witness in the book of Revelation (see 4 below). Perhaps partly due to the influence of the book of Daniel, some Jewish intertestamental writers (see 1-2 Macc) reflect a fairly developed concept of martyrdom (Tabor).

Alongside the examples of witnesses in the OT are the accounts of faithful ones among the people of God* who died, starting with Abel (Gen 4:8). This point was underscored by Jesus (Mt 23:35), Stephen (Acts 7:52) and the writer of Hebrews (Heb 11:35, 37). There is also an emphasis in the NT on the death of the OT prophets,* those who proclaimed and witnessed to the Word of God (Mt 23:35; Acts 7:52).

There also existed a contemporary Greco-Roman understanding of martyrdom (see Seeley). In some strands of the Roman thought, martyrdom was considered to be a particularly noble way to die (Tabor). This may be observed in writers such as Seneca, Epictetus and Plutarch (see Seeley, 113-41).

2. Acts of the Apostles.

From the beginning of the book of Acts,* the thirteen uses of martys occur primarily in the context of the Christian mission.* Martys is conceived as a solemn legal witness regarding Jesus, a witness that focused on his resurrection* and also emphasized his unjust but voluntary death (Acts 1:22; 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 10:39-41). This witness provided the kind of legally recognized testimony needed to substantiate the preaching* of the gospel (Gk euangelizō; Acts 13:31-32), which began in Jerusalem* and continued to the remotest part of the earth (Acts 1:8).

When the apostle Paul recounts his conversion on the Damascus road and its aftermath (Acts 9:1-19), he refers to his apostolic* calling as being a "witness" to all people (Acts 22:15). That included both the Jews and the Gentiles* (Acts 26:16), though his primary emphasis would be on the witness to the Gentiles (Acts 22:21). Paul's witness made available to this diverse audience spiritual enlightenment, release from the power of Satan* and forgiveness* of sins to those who responded by faith* in Jesus (Acts 26:16-18).

There also were false witnesses in the infant church* (Acts 6:13). They played a decisive role in the first recorded death by martyrdom in the church, that of Stephen* (Acts 7), even as false witnesses had strategically testified against Jesus (Mt 26:60). Jesus had spoken of the stoning of those sent by God to Jerusalem and her leaders (i.e., as witnesses; Mt 23:37), and Stephen died (Acts 7:57-60) as a faithful witness (Acts 22:20). Paul was able to provide an eyewitness (Acts 7:58; 8:1) account of Stephen's death as a "martyr" (Acts 22:20, NIV).

Though the term martyr is not found in the context, the death of James the apostle (Acts 12:1-2), the brother of John, at the hands of King Herod Agrippa I is another example of martyrdom. Soon thereafter Peter also was arrested but was miraculously released and perhaps spared from martyrdom (Acts 12:3-11). Paul almost died a martyr's death in Lystra (Acts 14:19-20) while he was preaching the gospel (Gk euangelizō; Acts 14:15).

3. Non-Pauline Letters.

In the non-Pauline letters* there are only two uses of martys in Hebrews (Heb 10:28; 12:1) and one in 1 Peter (1 Pet 5:1). Hebrews 10:28 refers to the necessity of "two or three witnesses" for a just death sentence under the law of Moses.* The other instance refers to witness related to the past, with suffering as the backdrop. In 1 Peter 5:1 martys applies to suffering but distinctively so: "the sufferings of Christ."

Up to the time that Hebrews* was written, no one in the community had suffered death as witness for their faith (Heb 10:32-39), though there had been suffering and persecution* (Heb 10:32-34). But the possibility of a martyr's death continued to exist (Heb 12:4).

The mention in Hebrews 11 of those who died in faith, such as Abel (Heb 11:4) and the unnamed believers performing the faithful acts described in Hebrews 11:35, 37, prepares for the usage of martyr in Hebrews 12:1. The "great cloud of witnesses" (Heb 12:1 NIV) includes a substantial number of martyrs (Heb 11:4, 35, 37). Their persevering witness serves to motivate the recipients of the epistle to focus on Jesus, even if witness and endurance* mean bloodshed and martyrdom (Heb 12:1-4).

The lone use of martyr in 1 Peter 5:1 may seem to provide little evidence that Peter's idea of witness might include death. It initially appears that Peter merely describes himself as a legally valid eyewitness to Jesus' suffering, perhaps at the hands of the authorities, at the time of his denial of Christ (Mt 26:58, 69-75). Yet 1 Peter* presents an extensive theology of suffering, and each of the extended passages dealing with suffering (1 Pet 2:19-24, 3:14-18, 4:12-13) also refers to the sufferings of Jesus. Those sufferings include Christ's death (i.e., martyrdom) on the cross* (1 Pet 2:24; 3:18; see Death of Christ).

In 1 Peter 5:8-9 the devil is portrayed as a "roaring lion" who causes suffering in the lives of God's people (see Satan). 1 Peter 5:10 then provides the readers assurance* that their experience of suffering in the spiritual warfare will last only "a little while" before God brings them to the point of spiritual completeness. Though this is not stated explicitly, it is possible to infer that martyrdom completes this process. Scripture (2 Pet 1:14-15) and extrabiblical tradition combine to testify that Peter himself suffered and died as a martyr (1 Clem. 5; see Cullmann).

4. Book of Revelation.

The five uses of martys in the Apocalypse are spread through the book (see Revelation, Book of). One reference appears in the introductory portion (Rev 1:5), two in the letters to the churches in Asia Minor (Rev 2:13; 3:14) and two in the visions* that form the body of the Apocalypse (Rev 11:3; 17:6). Two of the five uses refer to Jesus as the ultimate or foundational faithful "witness" (Rev 1:5; 3:14). The other three describe those who die as witnesses for the faith (Rev 2:13; 11:3; 17:6), either in the setting in which the Apocalypse was written (Rev 2:13) or in the apocalyptic setting its visions portray (Rev 11:3; 17:6).

In several works R. J. Bauckham has examined how the Apocalypse utilizes numerous OT passages and intertestamental ideas in reflecting the conversion of the nations, although Bauckham has not adequately linked this latter, overarching theme, which he views as taking place in the apocalyptic setting in Revelation, to the worldwide preaching of the "gospel of the kingdom" just before "the end" (to telos) comes (Mt 24:14). Both conversion and fulfillment take place in the context of persecution and death (Mt 24:9).

Revelation's portrayal of the proclamation of "the eternal gospel" (euangelion aiōnion) to "every nation (pan ethnos), tribe, language and people" (Rev 14:6) does parallel the Matthean wording. Further, the reference to "all the nations" (pasin tois ethnesin) as the target audience in Matthew 24:14, as well as in the Matthean and Lukan versions of the Great Commission (Mt 28:19; Lk 24:47), and the closing mention of "the end of the age" (heōs tēs synteleias tou aiōnos) in Matthew 28:20 seem to establish that the conversion of the nations (see esp. Rev 7:9, "all nations" [pantos ethnous]), in the midst of great suffering and martyrdom, echoes the Synoptics as much as prior Jewish thought and expectation.

Further, in Revelation apocalyptic terminology resembles that of the book of Daniel (see 1 above). It is likely that the suffering of the saints, depicted in the visions in Daniel 7—12, is a scriptural basis for the "prayers of the saints" (Rev 5:8; 8:2-4), the temporary conquest of the saints by the beast* (Rev 13:5-7), the need for patient endurance* by the saints (Rev 13:10) and the shedding of the blood of the martyred saints (Rev 16:6; 17:6).

Foundational in this apocalyptic drama is the loud cry from the heavenly altar of "those who had been slain because of the word of God and the testimony (martyrian) they had maintained" (Rev 6:9 NIV). Their impassioned prayer demands, "How long, Sovereign Lord, holy and true, until you judge the inhabitants of the earth and avenge our blood?" (Rev 6:10 NIV). The answer seems to sum up the remaining scenes in Revelation: "they were told to wait a little longer, until the full number of their fellow servants and brothers who were to be killed as they had been was completed" (Rev 6:11 NIV). Echoes of this prayer and its divine answer, chillingly describing a "full number" (plērōthōsin) of future martyrs, reverberate through the Apocalypse to the Parousia* (Rev 18:20, 24; 19:1-2).

Unlike the single passage in 1 Peter 5, the Apocalypse develops another aspect of martyrdom: its satanic origin. The intense though limited persecution of the contemporary churches at Smyrna and Pergamum (Rev 2:10, 13) is attributed directly to Satan. There had already been a death for the faith in Pergamum, that of Antipas, "my faithful witness" (Rev 2:13 NIV; ho martys mou ho pistos mou), wording that echoes the initial description of Jesus in Revelation 1:5 (ho martys ho pistos) and the closely parallel description in Revelation 3:14. Other martyrdoms may follow soon after the writing of the letter to Smyrna (Rev 2:10).

In the apocalyptic visions, the death of the two witnesses (dysin martysin, Rev 11:3) at the hand of the beast (Rev 11:7) is empowered by Satan (Rev 13:1-2). The deaths of many faithful martyrs also are attributed to the fury of the devil (Rev 12:11-12), though the counterpoint is made clear. Such deaths are victories in God's plan, even as was the shedding of the "blood of the Lamb" (Rev 12:11; see Lamb). That victory celebration is vividly described in Revelation 15:2.

Since the unbelieving world* follows and worships the beast (Rev 13:2-4), they worship and follow the great dragon (Rev 13:4), who is Satan (Rev 12:9), in opposing God and in rejoicing over the demise of God's faithful witnesses (Rev 11:9-10). The beast's evil consort, the pseudo-queenly Babylon* the Great, drunk with the blood of the martyrs (Rev 17:6), is ultimately exposed as "a home for demons and a haunt for every evil spirit" (Rev 18:2 NIV).

It should not be assumed, however, that all who are faithful witnesses for "the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" die as a result. John, the writer, was alive in spite of persecution that saw him exiled to the island of Patmos (Rev 1:9). Only a relatively few believers in Revelation 2—3 would die (Rev 2:10, 13). Even the "great multitude" standing before the heavenly throne in Revelation 7:9, 14 are not all or necessarily martyrs. The comment about making their robes "white in the blood of the Lamb" may refer not to martyrdom but to Christ's redemptive death.

While there is a special beatitude for those who persevere and die in the Lord* (Rev 14:12-13), especially for those who take a fatal stand against the beast (Rev 20:4), they are not the only witnesses who are divinely blessed.* Other than the descriptions in Revelation 12:11 and Revelation 15:2, all the promises* for overcoming (Rev 2—3; 21:7), which includes faithful witness (Rev 2:10-11), are offered to all believers, as is the promised destiny of those purchased with Christ's blood: to be a kingdom and God's priests* who will also reign (Rev 5:9-10).

5. Postapostolic Period.

With increased persecution came increased martyrdom. Tertullian is credited with saying: "The blood of the martyrs is indeed the seed of the church. Dying we conquer." Thus he held that the witness of the church was furthered decisively by the martyrdom of the faithful. But the popular perception of thousands of early Christians being fed to the beasts in the arena is a distortion. In W. H. C. Frend's estimation, the total number of early Christian martyrs should probably be measured in "hundreds, not thousands" (Frend, 413).

The apostolic fathers* wrote during a time of transition. They look back on the developing NT usage of martys as well as provide insight on the perspectives of early centuries of church history. The most striking attitude toward martyrdom is found in the voices of those who fully embraced it. The strongest expression is found in Ignatius,* who regarded martyrdom as the highest expression of discipleship to Jesus Christ (Ign. Rom. 4.2), a true act of following in his passion (Ign. Rom. 6.3). Ignatius wrote his letters as he was transported under Roman escort from Antioch to Rome* (probably during the first two decades of the second century; see Ignatius). His letter to the Romans reflects his eagerness to suffer and die (Ign. Rom. 7.2), and his determination that the Roman Christians not interfere with the process (Ign. Rom. 2; 4.1). Martyrdom offered the opportunity for the highest form of spiritual attainment (Ign. Rom. 4), for it was the pathway to God (Ign. Rom. 7.2). As Ignatius memorably phrased it:

> Allow me to be eaten by the beasts, through whom I can attain to God. I am God's wheat, and I am ground by the teeth of wild beasts that I may be found to be pure bread of Christ. (Ign. Rom. 4.1)

Or again he writes, "I long for the beasts that are prepared for me. And I pray that they may be found prompt for me" (Ign. Rom. 5.2). This attitude of Ignatius toward martyrdom was not the norm, but it does point out that for some the rewards of martyrdom far outweighed its costs (see Stark, 163-89). It was not driven by an irrationalism or masochism, as some modern interpreters have supposed.

The earliest example of martyrological literature is The Martyrdom of Polycarp, a letter written from the church at Smyrna to the church at Philomelium shortly after Polycarp's death in c. 155-160. The aged Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, does not seek martyrdom but, refusing to take an oath to Caesar, he accepts his execution with steadfast courage and saintliness: "For eighty-six years I have been his servant, and he has done me no wrong. How can I blaspheme my king who saved me?" (Mart. Pol. 9.3). The honor of martyrdom is maintained (Mart. Pol. 2.1-2), but those who "give themselves up" willingly are not commended (Mart. Pol. 4.1). Those who die the martyr's death are imitators of the Lord (Mart. Pol. 1.2; 19.1) and partakers of Christ (Mart. Pol. 6.2). As he faces the flames, Polycarp prays that he might be "a rich and acceptable sacrifice" (Mart. Pol. 14.2). After his death his fellow Christians collect Polycarp's burnt bones and preserve them as precious artifacts, with the intention of celebrating "the birthday of his martyrdom" (Mart. Pol. 18.3).

Several accounts from beyond our time period are worth mentioning. Eusebius quotes in his Ecclesiastical History a Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (Hist. Eccl. 5.1.3-63), which gives an account of the persecution of the church at Lyons in c. 177 or 178. The letter presents a moving account the sufferings and deaths of the martyrs and employs the motif of Christ suffering in the martyrs, and the martyrs as athletes engaged in a contest, with the victors receiving the crown of immortality (Hist. Eccl. 5.1.23, 36, 42). The Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas is the account of the martyrdom in 202 at Carthage of a young woman, Perpetua, and her slave Felicitas, and three catechumens, Saturus, Saturninus and Revocatus. The document is particularly valuable for its preservation of Perpetua's prison diary, which occupies eight of the twenty-one chapters. Another category of martyrological literature is the "acts of the martyrs" (acta, or gesta martyrum), which purport to contain official court proceedings. Acts of first-century martyrs are The Acts of Justin and His Companions (Justin Martyr, martyred c. 165 in Rome) and The Acts of the Martyrs of Scilli in Africa (martyred c. 180 in North Africa). Tertullian's To the Martyrs (Ad Martyras, c. 200) is addressed as an encouragement to fellow Christians held in prison and awaiting their inevitable martyrdom.

See also ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; PERSECUTION; SUFFERING; WITNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); idem, "The Martyrdom of Enoch and Elijah: Jewish or Christian?" JBL 95 (1976) 447-58; idem, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); H. von Campenhausen, Die Idee des Martyriums in der alten Kirche (2d ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1964); A. Y. Collins, "Persecution and Vengeance in the Book of Revelation" in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983) 729-49; O. Cullmann, Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1953); B. Dehandschutter, "The Meaning of Witness in the Apocalypse" in L'Apocalypse johannique et l'Apocalyptique dans le Nouveau Testament, ed. J. Lambrecht (Louvain: Louvain University Press, 1980) 283-88; S. de Dietrich, " 'You are My Witnesses'—A Study of the Church's Witness," Int 8 (1954) 273-79; G. Dragas, "Martyrdom and Orthodoxy in the New Testament Era," Greek Orthodox Theological Review 30 (1985) 287-96; A. Droge and J. Tabor, A Noble Death: Suicide and Martyrdom Among Ancient Jews, Christians, Greeks, and Romans (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1989); W. H. C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981); A. B. Luter Jr., "End Times and Mission," Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions, ed. S. Moreau (Grand Rapids: Baker, forthcoming); idem, "Great Commission," ABD 2:1090-91; M. G. Reddish, "Martyr Christology in the Apocalypse," JSNT 33 (1988) 85-95; W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); D. Seeley, The Noble Death: Greco-Roman Martyrology and Paul's Concept of Salvation (JSNTSup 28; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); R. Stark, The Rise of Christianity (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996); H. Strathman, "μάρτυς κτλ," TDNT 4:474-514; J. P. M. Sweet, "Maintaining the Testimony of Jesus: The Suffering of Christians in the Revelation of John" in Suffering and Martyrdom in the New Testament, ed. W. Horbury and B. McNeil (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981) 101-17; R. Tabor, "Martyr, Martyrdom," ABD 4:574-79; C. H. Talbert, The Apocalypse: A Reading of the Revelation of John (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); A. A. Trites, "Μάρτυς" and Martyrdom in the Apocalypse: A Semantic Study," NovT 15 (1973) 72-80; idem, The New Testament Concept of Witness (SNTSMS 31; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); A. A. Trites and L. Coenen, "Witness," NIDNTT 3:1038-51; M. J. Wilkins, Following the Master: Discipleship in the Footsteps of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); H. B. Workman, Persecution in the Early Church (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980 [1906]).

A. B. Luter Jr.

MARTYRDOM OF POLYCARP. See POLYCARP OF SMYRNA.

MARY

Apart from the four Gospels, the NT documents provide scanty information concerning the life or role of Mary in the early Christian era. There is no reference to her in the General Epistles, and even in Paul's several references to Christ's birth or biological origin (Gal 4:4; Rom 1:3; 9:5), Mary's name is consistently withheld. Why is the person who was once closely related to Jesus thus ignored by early Christian writers? What is her role after the ascension of Jesus? How is she understood by Christian leaders before the end of the second century?

1. Biographical Data
2. Literary Analysis
3. Theological Development
4. Conclusion

1. Biographical Data.

John, the last composed or compiled canonical Gospel at the turn of the century, reveals that Mary was committed by Jesus to the care of his beloved disciple at the foot of the cross (Jn 19:26-27; Beasley-Murray, 350). Apparently this disciple had a place or a family of his own in Jerusalem (eis ta idia, Jn 19:27), and Mary went to reside with him at that time (Tenney, 182-83). After the ascension* of Jesus she was listed among the first group of disciples who gathered to pray (Acts 1:14) and probably experienced the coming of the Holy Spirit* at Pentecost* (Acts 2:1-4). Beyond this point no canonical record or writing of the early apostolic fathers* refers to the events of her later years.

According to church tradition it is possible that Mary also went to Ephesus with John when he migrated there in the 60s (see Eusebius Hist. Eccl.. 3.1, 23, 28, 31; 5.20; Irenaeus Haer. 3.1). A record of Jesus' word of commission from the cross to Mary and the beloved disciple (Jn 19:26-27) seems to suggest that the writer was explaining to the Christians at Ephesus about Mary's residence there. The apocryphal* Protevangelium of James, a product of the second century, provides a detailed description of Mary's life: her parents, family background (Protev. Jas. 1.1—5.1), birth and childhood (Protev. Jas. 5.2—8.1), betrothal to Joseph (Protev. Jas. 8.2—10.2) and her conception and delivery of Jesus (Protev. Jas. 11—20). The entire record aims at exalting Mary as a pure and perfect figure whose conception was miraculous and whose marriage* to Joseph was without physical contact. Although this document was soon widely accepted by the Eastern church (Gaventa, 122) and became a foundational document for the full development of Mariology in the fourth century, its historical value has always been questioned on the basis of its second-century origin. Besides, its information on Mary has never been confirmed in any previous writings. Other apocryphal literature, such as the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of the Nazareans, also provide glimpses of Mary's character and activities; these too represent a gnostic* variation on the canonical records.

2. Literary Analysis.

Besides the queries about who Mary was and in what manner she was being portrayed in the canonical accounts, it is important to explore the reason(s) why Mary's place is recorded as such in the NT. From the literary perspective the Gospel writers are believed to have selected and tailored their sources according to the purpose of their presentations and need of their audiences. Thus Mary's role as it appears in Jesus' birth narratives is not identical in Matthew's and Luke's accounts (see Gaventa, Brown 1993), and the seemingly harsh portrayal of Mary in Mark's Gospel (Mk 3:21, 31-33) has also to be explained as a critique of the holy family as representing Jewish Christianity* (Jelly, 33-37, Trocmé, 132-37).

In the Fourth Gospel Mary is mentioned twice, in the beginning (Jn 2:1-11, the feast of Cana) and at the end (Jn 19:25-27, the foot of the cross) of Jesus' public ministry. The writer's intention in these two instances is meant to underscore the humanity of Jesus, "whose earthly father and mother and brothers and geographical origin are known" (Gaventa, 80, 95-97; see Relatives of Jesus). But perhaps it is more likely that the inclusion and arrangement of these two events found only in John are meant to provide a powerful witness to Jesus' role as the Son of God* (Jn 20:31). Mary, like many other figures recorded in the Fourth Gospel, is called to provide eyewitness testimony. Despite her unique relationship to Jesus (see Jn 2:1, 3, 5, 12; 19:25-26, where the writer does not hesitate to introduce her repeatedly as the mother of Jesus), Jesus is not her son but the Son of God. The two addresses of "woman" (gynai, Jn 2:4; 19:26) by Jesus to Mary strongly support this.

The brief reference to Mary as one who gathered and prayed with other disciples in Acts 1:14 is to reinforce the notion that Mary is an obedient disciple of Jesus—an image repeatedly portrayed by the same writer in his Gospel (cf. Lk 1:38; 2:19, 51).

The silence about Mary in Paul's letters and the General Epistles is noteworthy, since the later documents view Christ's person from the postresurrection perspective. In the Gospels Jesus' earthly life was the focus, and his birth and family background are natural means of introducing him. The other NT writings, however, are characteristically christocentric and soteriocentric. Jesus' biological origin was soon superseded by his divine origin and redemptive work after the dawn of the church age (cf. 2 Cor 5:16).

Ignatius* (c. A.D. 112) also alluded to Mary (Ign. Trall. 9; 10; Ign. Eph. 18.1) and her virginity (Ign. Eph. 19.1; Ign. Smyrn. 1) in his letters. He stressed the reality of Mary's childbearing and that Jesus was by God's design to be carried in Mary's womb, all for the purpose of arguing against the docetic teachings of his day (Kelly, 492). The mention of Mary serves to support his assertion of Jesus' true humanity.

3. Theological Development.

The Synoptic Gospels provide glimpses of Mary's biographical information. Some scholars have suggested that the records of Mary in John are more theologically oriented. Jesus' word from the cross to Mary and the beloved disciple (Jn 19:25-27) is an evidence that Mary was commissioned as the mother of all disciples, or Christians, by Jesus. Although this view has generally been adopted by the Roman Catholic church (Jelly, 67; Brown 1978, 215-16), the issue remains disputed among NT interpreters. This estimate would cover the use of Revelation 12 to refer to Mary as "the woman clothed with the sun" (see Prigent).

A more certain theological emphasis of Mary is seen in Ignatius's letters, in which Mary is consistently described as a virgin (Ign. Eph. 18.1; 19.1; Ign. Trall. 9; 10; Ign. Smyrn. 1). Evidently Mary's virginity in the birth of Christ, though hidden from the prince of this world (in the Song of the Star, Ign. Eph. 19.1), was a familiar concept among Christians at that time, since Ignatius can allude to it without additional explanation. By the middle of the second century Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryph. 100.5) first made an explicit comparison between Mary and Eve,

> For Eve, who was a virgin and undefiled, having conceived the word of the serpent, brought forth disobedience and death. But the virgin Mary received faith and joy, when the angel Gabriel announced the good tidings to her . . . , by whom God destroys both the serpent and those angels and men that became like it.

This identification of Mary the virgin who gives birth to the Redeemer as "the second Eve," just as Christ is "the second Adam" (Rom 5:12-17; 1 Cor 15:22), was adopted and further developed by Irenaeus (c. A.D. 185) in the West (Lyons) and Tertullian (c. A.D. 200) in the East (Alexandria*). Irenaeus applied the principle recircumlatio to Christ and Adam as well as to Mary and Eve (Irenaeus Haer. 3.22.3-4; 5.19.1). With him Mariology became accepted (Jelly, 71).

4. Conclusion.

After Jesus' ascension Mary evidently was recognized as one of the disciples of the risen Lord* (Acts 1:14; Bauckham, 52). Early Christians, awaiting for Christ's imminent Parousia,* devoted their energies to proclaiming Christ and his cross* (cf. 1 Cor 1:17-18; 2:2). Mary's life, like Jesus' earthly life, was no longer a matter of concern in primitive Christianity, both in Jewish and Gentile* circles. Her natural family relationship with Jesus was replaced by the eschatological* family relationship (Brown 1978). Thus, despite her unique role in the early life of Christ, Mary is essentially acknowledged as one of God's instruments (like the apostles*) in carrying out his plan of salvation.* It is in this light that she was remembered by early Christians. The identification of Mary as an exalted figure in the church belongs to a later development.

See also RELATIVES OF JESUS; WOMEN IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990); G. R. Beasley-Murray, John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); D. D. C. Braine, "The Place of the Virgin Mary in Dogmatics," STJ 37 (1984) 145-62; G. W. Bromiley, "Mary the Mother of Jesus," ISBE 3:269-73; G. J. Brooke, ed., Women in the Biblical Tradition (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1992); R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah (rev. ed.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1993); R. E. Brown et al., eds., Mary in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); B. R. Gaventa, Mary, Glimpses of the Mother of Jesus (Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1995); F. M. Jelly, Madonna: Mary in the Catholic Tradition (Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1986); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (5th ed.; New York: Harper & Row, 1978); J. McHugh, The Mother of Jesus in the New Testament (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); H. A. Oberman, The Virgin Mary in Evangelical Perspective (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); P. Prigent, Apocalypse 12: Histoire de l'exégèse (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1959); R. Russell, "The Blessed Virgin Mary in the Bible" in Mary's Place in Christian Dialogue, ed. A. Stacpoole (Wilton, CT: Morehouse-Barlow, 1983) 45-50; M. C. Tenney, The Gospel of John (EBC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1981); E. Trocmé, The Formation of the Gospel According to Mark (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); M. Warner, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and the Cult of the Virgin Mary (rev. ed.; London: Picador, 1990). J. L. Wu

MATTHEAN COMMUNITY

Inferring from the Gospel of Matthew that the community for which this Evangelist wrote is reflected in the pages of the First Gospel, scholars today have attempted to reconstruct the church life and social conditions in which Matthew was written (see DJG, Matthew, Gospel of). Not infrequently scholars contend that various bits of information in the First Gospel are a "transparency" of the Matthean community and show little connection with the life of Jesus (Luz). Others are more cautious in their judgments and contend that inferences about a community are limited more or less to major trends and themes (e.g., Hagner). In general, however, most specialists would agree that some things can be known, by way of inference and confirmation from other evidence, about the community for which the First Gospel was intended. Furthermore, a fundamental issue for appreciating this debate and the evidence of Matthew is the complex relationship of Matthew's kind of Christianity to the evolving, diversifying world of Judaism, with its wide range of toleration and differences. This development was highly complex and chaotic; it was further exacerbated by the complex and changing place Judaism had within the Roman legal world (Dunn, Goodman).

1. Scholarship
2. Methodology
3. Suggestions for Reconstructing a Matthean Community

1. Scholarship.

There are two broad trends in studies regarding Matthew's community: some argue that Matthew's community was within Judaism* (intra muros) while others argue that Matthew's community was outside of Judaism (extra muros). (For an early survey of scholarship, see Stanton 1984, 1910-21.) Within each of these trends there are significant differences. Alongside this issue of the relationship of Matthew's community to Judaism there is also the placement of Matthew's community within the broader, developing Christian movement (Dunn, Stanton 1984, 1908-10; see Christianity and Judaism). A consensus seems to have emerged that Matthew is not opposing Pauline Christianity (Davies, 316-66) or opposing any specific set of antinomians (Strecker). In addition the majority would argue that Matthew's community is Jewish and is seeking to bring together its historical covenant with Abraham,* Moses and David with its newly discovered faith* and obedience* to Jesus the Messiah, along with the stresses this new faith generates (e.g., Hagner 1993, Overman, Saldarini).

The debate today concerns the relationship of Matthew's supposed community to its parent religion, Judaism. On the one end of the spectrum are those who contend that Matthew's community sees itself as true Israel,* even part of Judaism, even if there are tensions created by the community's faith in Jesus as the Messiah (Saldarini, Dunn, Kilpatrick). For this view Matthew's community defines itself over against the Gentile* world and over against nonmessianic Judaism but does not identify itself as a new religion. It is the true Israel, the remnant of the end times, that has found God's promises fulfilled in Jesus Messiah. Its mission* is still to the Jews (Mt 10:5-6; 15:24), it pays the Jewish tax (Mt 17:24-27), and its acerbic attacks against the Pharisees (e.g., Mt 23) reflect actual debates between the true Israel and the others within Judaism over the Law* (Hummel; Dunn, 98-102, 151-56), the rightful leaders (the apostles* or the Pharisees; see Mt 9:35—11:1; 21:43; 23:1-3) and who ought to be in "their synagogues" (e.g., Mt 4:23). W. D. Davies went so far as to specify that Matthew, especially Matthew 5—7, was a response to the contemporary events of the reorganization of Judaism at Jamnia. (Scholars have become much more cautious about inferences about Jamnia due to the paucity of evidence; see Hagner 1993, lxviii-lxix.) The opponents of Matthew's community and its leaders were the Pharisees. They may well have seen this particular brand of Judaism as sectarian or even heretical (if such a term can be appropriately used for this period in light of the diversity of Judaism), but such a categorization is a natural reaction to an upstart movement of this sort (Saldarini; Dunn, 156).

Basing their arguments on the Gentile emphasis (Mt 1:1-17; 2:1-12; 4:12-16; 8:5-13; 15:21-28; 28:16-20), the use of the phrase "their synagogues" (Mt 4:23) and the heated debate with the Pharisees (e.g., Mt 23), a number of scholars now argue that Matthew's community was already separated from Judaism and is to be understood as the church,* a new religion of faith in Jesus, and some have proposed that the author of the First Gospel was a Gentile (Strecker, Trilling). Arguing from the basis of a careful delineation of how Matthew depicts salvation history, R. Walker argues that the time of Israel is in a distant past and that Matthew's present is one concerned with the Gentile mission. The work of G. Strecker on salvation history and of W. Trilling on Matthew 21:43 support the same view: Matthew's community is no longer a part of Judaism; this community is largely Gentile and sees the debate with Judaism as a chapter in its history. J. P. Meier contends that the First Gospel was written by a Gentile and that it mirrors the historical evolution of the church of Syrian Antioch*.

Somewhere between these two trends, other scholars have argued that the Matthean community has made the break with Judaism but has made this move reluctantly because it still defines itself within Judaism and over against nonmessianic Judaism (Stanton 1984, 1992; Hagner). They are, in effect, in "no man's land" (Hagner, lxx). As proposed by Hagner, Matthew's community is a reflection of several polar-opposite spectrums, but this is seen most clearly in the tension between universalism (Mt 2:1-12; 4:12-16; 8:5-13; 21:43; 28:16-20) and particularism (Mt 1:21; 10:5-6, 23; 15:24). This Gospel contains references to "their synagogues" (Mt 10:17) and to the privilege of Jews (Mt 5:17-48; 6:1-18; 13:16-17; 19:28). "In short, Jews are naturally put on the defensive by their non-Christian Jewish community, and probably more so if they have insisted on preservation of their Jewishness and have resisted assimilation, thus making at least the implicit claim of being the true Israel" (Hagner 1993, lxix). The First Gospel, then, is a reflection of this difficult position: a combination of the desire to anchor one's faith in the traditions of Israel (particularism; true Israel) and, because of the new faith in Jesus Messiah, the desire to anchor one's hope* for the future in a totally inclusive people of God (universalism; new Israel). This is why Matthew adds "so both are preserved" to the parable of new and old wine (Mt 9:17).

2. Methodology.

The discussion above is loaded with methodological issues. It must be asked how modern scholars can discern what the "community" of Matthew was like. Questions must be raised about how much can be known and whether it is even reasonable to talk about the profile of this community. It must be admitted that too often scholars have speculated far too much and have drawn heavy inferences from scanty informtation. When scholars propose a full-scale profile of Matthew's community, to the point of knowing what titles their leaders preferred, what kind of catechism they preferred and the demographic makeup of that community, we must exercise caution. Some scholars "know too much," meaning they know much more than the data permit. The assumption of a "transparency." or of Matthew's text being a window onto his community, is at times gratuitous and without support (Kingsbury 1991, 259-63).

It is reasonable to argue, however, that a document such as the First Gospel will in some measure reflect its community's concerns and its author's general orientations that correspond to the reality of that community. At times the text is transparent (Luz, Segal) and a fairly clean window onto Matthew's community. Few scholars would counter this methodological point: the First Gospel spoke to the community to which it was addressed because it addressed concerns of that community. And if it did speak to that community's concerns, we ought to be able to infer some things about that community. No one would imagine that this Gospel is simply a theoretical "life" of Jesus that has no relationship to the community to whom it was given.

But how do we reconstruct this community? Several suggestions are worthy of following up with a patient investigation of the evidence of Matthew. First, the redactional emphases of Matthew will be the most natural place to begin for a reconstruction of the Matthean community. Two points immediately emerge: Matthew's penchant for contrasting "their synagogues" (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54), "their scribes" (Mt 7:29) and "your synagogues" (Mt 23:34); and Matthew's unrelenting attack on Pharisees and, in a broader sense, the leaders of Israel (Mt 23). These two traits, and there are other such emphases, illustrate the kind of evidence that ought to be used to reconstruct a profile of Matthew's community (Overman).

Second, the evidence so discovered ought to be discussed in the context of the Judaism that emerged alongside early Christian development. Thus the emphasis Matthew gives to the Pharisees probably also reflects contemporary Judaism. This is where J. A. Overman's work advances beyond that of the majority of scholars on Matthew (see also Stanton 1992, Saldarini, Segal).

Third, the contours that begin to take shape in light of these kind of procedures need to be set within the context of the development of early Christianity. A reconstruction of Matthew's community, in other words, ought to bear resemblance to some kind of known Christianity in the first century, whether we date Matthew early or late. This is the advantage of the approach taken by J. P. Meier in seeking to locate Matthew's redactional interests, along with the tradition-critical historical development of the Gospel itself, into the development of the church at Syrian Antioch (see Meier and Brown). Here Meier places Matthew's theological and social interests in a believable construction of early Christianity. Even if one does not go the whole way with Meier, one has to admire the sweep of his argument and its contextually sensitive nature. The same can be said of J. D. G. Dunn's reconstruction of the "partings of the ways": Matthew's theology and concerns, especially as they touch on the law and the temple,* are placed into a broader, believable portrait of the growing separation of Christianity and Judaism (see Christianity and Judaism).

Fourth, informed judgments can be gleaned at times from sociological theories and models. If one can assume that humans of the first century behave similarly to humans of modern cultures, then one can infer general behavioral and cultural patterns (esp. White; Overman, who borrows heavily from the sociology of knowledge theory of Berger and Luckmann). Overman, for instance, argues fairly persuasively that Matthew's Gospel fits the pattern of sectarian argument and legitimation characteristic of formative Judaism in the post-A.D. 70 period.

Fifth, J. D. Kingsbury has proposed what amounts to a "narrative approach" to constructing the Matthean community. He tries to construct what he calls the "intended readers" or the "implied reader." This approach infers from the text of Matthew a correspondence to the actual readers (the community), and this approach allows Kingsbury to avoid the logically difficult issues of the redactional approach mentioned above. At the same time he carefully seeks to construct a historically believable community. He infers that Matthew's community was set in Antioch of Syria, late in the first century, and Greek was its language. It was urban rather than rural; it had neighbors who were both Jewish and Gentile. The atmosphere was characterized by conflict, both from without and within. The community had already made its break with Judaism and defined itself in terms of a fellowship* under the leadership of the exalted Son of God, with the important corollary that hierarchy was to be avoided. While this approach is reasonable, it fails to distinguish the various levels of Matthew and how those various levels relate to the communities they addressed. It is hard to believe that all of Matthew reflects Matthew's community.

Sixth, cautions need to be raised at every juncture. No matter how solid a redactional conclusion might seem, it is nonetheless rooted in a theory about the source relations of Matthew to previous traditions, and that theory is not certain. No matter how close an observation about Matthew's community might be to contemporary Judaism or Christianity, that observation is still an inference drawn and not a certain piece of evidence. No matter how confident we might be about our conclusions, we are still faced with the fact that the words of Matthew purport to be words from Jesus (and not about Matthew's community). Thus we are forced to admit that we are sometimes arguing that words in the mouth of Jesus are being suggested to be words that are more reflective of Matthew's community than of Jesus. These decisions, while they may be defensible at some general methodological level, are always open to dispute and difference of opinion.

It has, for instance, been argued over and over that Matthew 22:7 reflects a post-A.D. 70 vaticinium ex eventu. Therefore, it is inferred, Matthew's Gospel was written after A.D. 70 and probably not by the apostle Matthew, and therefore the parable reflects the time of Matthew's community. This is all reasonable historical speculation. But, as others have argued, it was a topos of ancient Jewish literature to describe destructions of big cities in terms of burning. Therefore this piece of evidence does not necessarily mean Matthew's Gospel was written after A.D. 70, and it could have been written by the apostle, and it could reflect a much earlier setting, even one during the time of Jesus. Nearly every argument advanced in this debate suffers from this kind of reasoning and counterarguments.

Finally, one ought not deny the impress of the author, and one ought to recognize that what was important to an author may not have been as important to a community and may not have any relationship to that community. Maybe, one might argue, the author of the First Gospel had had a decisively bad experience with pharisaic Judaism and the author alone was responsible for this heated polemic. While this argument may not be provable, it is not beyond the scope of our reasoning, and it is a factor that ought to be considered by anyone speculating on the nature of Matthew's community. An author's stamp on a book, unless that author is merely a representative of that community (which is exceedingly difficult to prove for NT books), may be distinct from the community's stamp and its concerns. Maybe, then, it was only Matthew who had conflict with the Pharisees over the law.

3. Suggestions for Reconstructing a Matthean Community.

Though cautions are in order, it is not beyond our capacities to infer some things for a profile of Matthew's community. What is presented here is in part a consensus of current Matthean scholarship (see Kingsbury 1991, 264-65).

3.1. Date, Provenance and Authorship of Matthew. In spite of traditional scholarship's insistence that Matthew the apostle wrote the First Gospel, the case has not been proven. It probably will never be proven because the evidence for this kind of argument is unavailable (McKnight 1992, 528). If our knowledge of the author is far from certain, the date is even more uncertain. While some have argued that Matthew 22:7 clearly proves that the First Gospel was not given its final shape until after the destruction of Jerusalem,* others have argued convincingly that this piece of evidence is best explained as a Jewish topos. Thus the evidence is unclear. And even if a considerable number of scholars today think Matthew originated in Syrian Antioch, numbers are not definitive proof: the data for this conclusion are not unambiguous, and a number of other scholars are arguing for other provenances (Kingsbury 1991, 264). Because the Gospel was written in Greek, however, it seems fair to argue that Matthew was not written in the land of Israel; rather, it was composed where the vast majority of his readers would have been at home in Greek. The redactional interest of Matthew in cities may indicate Matthew's community was at home in an urban environment (Kingsbury 1988, 152-53).

3.2. A Jewish Community. If there is any consensus about Matthew's community it is that it was mostly Jewish. This best explains the interest in OT fulfillment, in the Pharisees and in the Jewish flavor of the Gospel (Dunn, Stanton 1992, Hagner, Overman, Kingsbury). But this Jewish community is probably in the Diaspora,* since the language of communication is Greek. It is possible that a Greek-speaking community in the land of Israel is the home of this Gospel, (see Galilean Christianity), even a Greek-speaking synagogue* in Jerusalem, but these are much less likely than a Diaspora home.

3.3. The Community as the True Israel. The constant appeal to the OT, as well as passages like Matthew 1:21 and 19:28, clearly evince a case for Matthew's community seeing itself as the true people of God who are in direct continuity with Israel's biblical heritage (McKnight 1993, Hagner, Stanton). The persistent haggling with the Pharisees demonstrates that Matthew's community was defining itself in the context of such a debate. Whether or not the community of Matthew was perceived as Jewish or whether they were accepted as "members" of a local synagogue is unclear from the side of the opponents, but "sectarian" would seem to apply (see Saldarini, Overman). However, it seems clear to most scholars that Matthew's community thought they were true and even new Israel (Stanton).

3.4. Conflict with the Pharisees. Matthew's answers were not, however, acceptable to the pharisaic leadership. Matthew contends that the apostles of Jesus are the true leaders of Israel (Mt 9:35—11:1; see McKnight 1986) and have in fact replaced the Pharisees (Mt 21:43). He further contends that the destruction of Jerusalem took place as God's judgment* on the Pharisees for leading the people astray (McKnight 1993). Thus one of Matthew's major themes is that the followers of Jesus must abandon the leadership of the Pharisees (Mt 15:13-14; 23:1-7). We cannot know much about the leadership of Matthew: whether Matthew 23:8-12 implies the absence of hierarchy is less clear than his desire not to see them fighting for power*. It is probably the case that there were some prophets* (Mt 7:15-27; 10:41; 23:34), but it less clear that there was a group of "righteous ones" who were teachers (Mt 10:41). The leaders of this community seem to be, somewhat indirectly, the apostles. It is precisely here that we probably see history rather than transparency: the leaders of Matthew's community are not as visible through some title as they might be had the author used other titles.

This debate with Pharisaism was undoubtedly over the place of Jesus and over the proper interpretation of the law of Moses. Thus the early chapters of Matthew seek to show that Jesus is the fulfillment of OT patterns and promises*: whatever happened to Israel has happened to Jesus (Mt 4:1-11). Jesus is in every sense Jewish, but he is also more than his Jewish patterns (e.g., Mt 12:1-8). Further, it is to Jesus that the community of Matthew looks for the proper interpretation of the Law (Mt 5:17-48). Jesus is not against the Law or the Prophets: he fulfills the Law and the Prophets by bringing them to their fullest expression in both his person and teaching* (Mt 5:17-20). It seems reasonable to think that the debates preserved in the First Gospel are the debates Matthew's community had with Pharisaism: thus they fought over at least the issues of the sabbath (Mt 12:1-8), of table purity (Mt 9:9-13; see Food Laws) and of taxation (Mt 17:24-27).

3.5. The Community's Meeting Place. Whatever we make of the acerbic nature of Matthew's polemic with the Pharisees (Mt 23), the use of the expression "their synagogues" seems to suggest that Matthew's community was no longer meeting in the synagogue. This, however, does not mean that the community was extra muros, since this separation would be only a physical one. The real issue is religious, and Matthew's Gospel does not indicate that the followers of Jesus are a different religion. They may be the church (Mt 16:18; 18:17), but "church" here probably means only a newly defined group that fulfills the OT concept of remnant. Thus the best model is seeing Matthew's community meeting across the street from the synagogue (separated) but contending that they are the rightful members of that synagogue from which they have been expelled (intra muros). They did not leave; they were forced out. But in being forced out, they continued to think of themselves as Jews, as true Jews, as the fulfilled Judaism, the Judaism that brought into reality the dreams of their prophets.

See also GALILEAN CHRISTIANITY; JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Balch, ed., Social History of the Matthean Community: Cross-Disciplinary Approaches (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); W. D. Davies, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1966); J. D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways: Between Christianity and Judaism and their Significance for the Character of Christianity (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991);

M. Goodman, "Nerva, the fiscus Judaicus and Jewish Identity," JRS 79 (1989) 40-44; D. A. Hagner, Matthew 1-13 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1993), lxv-lxxi; idem, "The Sitz im Leben of the Gospel of Matthew," in SBLSP (1985) 243-69; R. Hummel, Die Auseinandersetzung zwischen Kirche und Judentum im Matthäusevangelium (BET 33; Munich: Christian Kaiser, 1963); G. D. Kilpatrick, The Origins of the Gospel According to St. Matthew (Oxford: Clarendon, 1946), esp. 101-23, 124-34; J. D. Kingsbury, "Conclusion: Analysis of a Conversation" in Social History, ed. Balch, 259-69; idem, Matthew as Story (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) 147-60; U. Luz, "The Disciples in the Gospel According to Matthew" in The Interpretation of Matthew, ed. G. N. Stanton (IRT 3; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 98-128; S. McKnight, "A Loyal Critic: Matthew's Polemic with Judaism in Theological Perspective" in The New Testament and Anti-Semitism, ed. C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 55-79; idem, "New Shepherds for Israel: A Historical and Critical Study of Matthew 9:35-11:1" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Nottingham, 1986); J. P. Meier, "Matthew, Gospel of," ABD 4:622-41; J. P. Meier and R. E. Brown, Antioch and Rome: NT Cradles of Catholic Christianity (New York: Paulist, 1983); J. A. Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of the Matthean Community (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); A. J. Saldarini, Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (CSHJ; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); A. F. Segal, "Matthew's Jewish Voice" in Social History, ed. Balch, 3-37; G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); idem, "The Origin and Purpose of Matthew's Gospel: Matthean Scholarship from 1945 to 1980," ANRW 2.25.3 (1984) 1889-1951; G. Strecker, Der Weg der Gerechtigkeit (FRLANT 82; 3d ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1971); W. Trilling, Das wahre Israel: Studien zur Theologie des Matthäus Evangeliums (SANT 10; 3d ed.; Munich: Kösel Verlag, 1964); R. Walker, Die Heilsgeschichte im ersten Evangelium (FRLANT 91; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967); L. M. White, "Crisis Management and Boundary Maintenance: The Social Location of the Matthean Community" in Social History, ed. Balch, 211-47.

S. McKnight

MELCHIZEDEK

Melchizedek is an enigmatic figure who appears only briefly in Genesis and is thereafter named only once in the OT. But he became the subject of much speculation in Judaism, as the Dead Sea Scrolls in particular prove; and Hebrews pays considerable attention to him in developing its distinctive christology.

1. The Old Testament
2. The Dead Sea Scrolls
3. 2 Enoch
4. Hebrews

1. The Old Testament.

1.1. Genesis. In Genesis 14:17-20, after Abraham* defeats Chedorlaomer, the patriarch is met by the king of Sodom and (heretofore unmentioned) Melchizedek, king of Salem (= Jerusalem; cf. Ps 76:2). The latter, "a priest of God Most High," brings out bread and wine and utters a blessing, after which Abraham gives Melchizedek "a tenth of everything"—or vice versa: the Hebrew simply reads, "and he gave him." Melchizedek then disappears from the narrative as suddenly as he appeared.

1.2. Psalm 110. Melchizedek is named only one other time in the OT, in Ps 110:4. Here, in what appears to be a royal psalm of coronation, the Davidic king in Jerusalem is said to be "a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek." In other words, because Melchizedek was a king and priest in Jerusalem, the Jewish king, who also has priestly functions, can be likened to Melchizedek. The Psalm came to read as properly messianic (as in the NT and the targum).

2. The Dead Sea Scrolls.

Although 1QapGen 22:14-17 retells the story of Melchizedek without elaboration, in 11QMelchizedek (a fragmentary eschatological midrash from the first century A.D. or B.C.) Melchizedek ceases to be an earthly figure. He rather becomes an angel* called "the heavenly one" ('lōhîm, cf. Ps 82:1), and he is a central figure in the eschatological drama. At the end of days he proclaims release to the captives (11QMelch. 2:6; cf. Lev 15:10), exacts "the vengeance of the judgements of God" (11QMelch 2:13) and delivers the sons of light from Belial (11QMelch 2:13).

Although the text is fragmentary, Melchizedek seems also to be named in 4QNAmram^{b} frag. 3:2: "[My] three names [are Michael, Prince of Light, and Melchizedek]." The speaker is the "watcher" who rules over all the light and "all that is of God," including the saints. His opponent is Belial, the prince of darkness, whose other name is Melchireša'. If the text cited is correctly restored, then Melchizedek is here identified with the archangel Michael as in the Zohar and other medieval Jewish sources. (According to Jerome Ep. 73.2, already Origen and Didymus thought Melchizedek to be an angel.) The identification is consistent with the significant resemblances between the two: they are both angelic beings and priests (for Michael see, e.g., 'Abot R. Nat. 34; b. Ḥag. 12b; b. Zebah. 62a) who protect Israel (cf. Dan 10:13, 21; 1 En. 20:5), play eschatological roles (cf. Dan 12:1-3), head angelic forces (cf. 1QM 17:7), war against demonic foes (cf. Rev 12:7-9) and defeat Belial (cf. 1QM 17:5-8). Moreover, if in 1QM 17:5-8 the eschatological war establishes the reign of Michael, in 11QMelch Melchizedek reigns in the latter days.

It is also likely that Melchizedek is referred to in 4Q401 11 3 and 4Q401 22 3, both fragments of 4QShirot 'Olat Ha-Shabbat. The former refers to "[Melchi]zedek, priest in the assemb[ly]." The line alludes to Psalm 82:1, which in 11QMelch 2:10 is applied to Melchizedek. We likely have here the identification of Melchizedek (= Michael) with the highest archangel in charge of the heavenly priesthood. As in 11QMelchizedek, he is elevated over the angelic court.

The sources of Melchizedek's exaltation are unclear. One guesses that the enigmatic appearance in Genesis of a priest without a genealogy (cf. Heb 7:3) stimulated reflection; so too the circumstance that Abraham, the ancestor of the Levites, offered him a tithe: this might suggest the superiority of Melchizedek's priestly order over that of the Levites (cf. Heb 7:4-10). But Psalm 110:4 especially must have provoked thought. At least it is plain that some eventually came to understand "priest of the Most High" to mean that Melchizedek serves in the heavenly temple. It is also probable that "priest forever" was taken to imply Melchizedek's immortality, and so his being something other than a man. And once he was thought of as a heavenly figure, his status as king (Gen 14:18) could further lead to speculation about an eschatological role.

3. 2 Enoch.

The Dead Sea Scrolls are not the only evidence that Melchizedek was the subject of speculation in early Judaism. The Jewish prayers preserved in Apostolic Constitutions 7.39.3; 8.5.3; and 8.12.23 name Melchizedek alongside OT worthies such as Abraham, David and Job. Plainly these prayers presuppose traditions beyond those in Genesis; and the sometime rabbinic animosity toward Melchizedek is likewise telling (cf. b. Ned. 32b and the probable excision of the Melchizedek story from Jub. 13:25). Also revealing are the closing chapters of 2 Enoch; these relate the story of Melchizedek's birth. Sothonim, the wife of Nir, grandson of Methuselah and brother of Noah, is found to be pregnant in her old age. (This is not a virginal conception.) She has not slept with her husband, who therefore shuns her—until it is revealed to him that her conception has a supernatural cause. When the time for birth comes, Sothonim dies; but the baby emerges from her dead body fully clothed—with "the badge of priesthood on his chest"—and fully developed physically. He even speaks and blesses the Lord. Later he is carried away by an angel to paradise so that he will not be destroyed by Noah's flood.

Although 2 Enoch 68—73 appears to be an integral part of the original work, unfortunately the date and place of the writing as a whole are unknown: we may or may not be dealing with pre-Christian tradition. There is seemingly in any case no other trace of the strange story in old Jewish or Christian literature, so it would be hazardous to base much upon it.

4. Hebrews.

Unless the Gnostic* book named "Melchizedek" be dated to the first half of the second century, before Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryph. 33; 118) the only Christian work of our period to name Melchizedek is Hebrews.* The book several times refers to Jesus as "a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb 5:6, 10; 6:20; 7:17). And Hebrews 7 is largely an exposition of this line from Ps 110:4, which is taken to establish the existence of a non-Aaronic priesthood in contrast to a mortal levitical priesthood.

Melchizedek is the king of righteousness* and king of peace* and a priest* without beginning or end. In all this he resembles Jesus, his antitype. With such resemblance established, three main arguments follow, designed to show the superiority of Jesus' priesthood, gained by the power of an indestructible life (Heb 7:6), to that of Aaron. Melchizedek's lack of genealogy (this suggests immortality), his reception of tithes (the inferior pays tithes to the superior) and his blessing of Abraham (the inferior is blessed by the superior) all prove Melchizedek to be greater than the Levites, the descendants of Abraham; and because Jesus belongs not to the Levitical priesthood but to the order of Melchizedek (cf. Psalm 110), he too must be superior to the Levites.

Although Hebrews 7:1-2 simply summarizes Genesis 14:17-20, the argument is informed by postbiblical tradition. The translation of Melchizedek's name by "king of righteousness" (Heb 7:2; cf. Josephus Ant. 1.10.2 §180 and the targums on Gen 14:18), his status as "king of peace" (Heb 7:2; cf. Philo Leg. All. 3.79) and his reception of tithes from Abraham (rather than vice versa: Heb 7:4; cf. 1QapGen 22:17; Josephus Ant. 1.10.2 §181) reflect extrabiblical tradition. It may also be that, even if Hebrews 7:2-3 does not (as has been thought) borrow from a non-Christian source, the words depend upon pre-Christian tradition about Melchizedek. "Without father or mother or genealogy" might in fact refer to Melchizedek's status as a heavenly being (cf. the Dead Sea Scrolls). So too his continuing as a priest "forever." The view (still held by Horton) that Hebrews derives Melchizedek's eternal priesthood from Psalm 110:4 and the failure of Genesis to narrate the priest's death (according to the principle that what is not in the Torah is not in the world) is now problematic. We have pre-Christian sources in which Melchizedek is an angelic being without beginning or end of days, and this raises the strong possibility that the argument in Hebrews presupposes the identification of Melchizedek with a heavenly high priest (so Kobelski). There is to be sure no evidence of direct dependence upon the Qumran materials. But the Scrolls and Hebrews both appear to be heirs to related Jewish speculation about the enigmatic Melchizedek.

See. also ANGELS, HEAVENLY BEINGS, ANGEL CHRISTOLOGY; HEBREWS; PRIEST, HIGH PRIEST; QUMRAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. A. Fitzmyer, "Further Light on Melchizedek from Qumran Cave 11"; " 'Now this Melchizedek . . .' (Heb 7:1)" in Essays on the Semitic Background of the New Testament (SBLSBS 5; Missoula: Scholars Press, 1974) 187-204; 221-43; F. L. Horton, Jr., The Melchizedek Tradition (SNTSMS 30; Cambridge: University Press, 1976); M. de Jonge and A. S. van der Woude, "11QMelchizedek and the New Testament," NTS 12 (1966) 301-26; P. J. Kobelski, Melchizedek and Melchireša' (CBQMS 10; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association, 1981); J. T. Milik, "Milkî-ṣedeq et Milkî-rešd dans les ancients écrits juifs et chrétiens," JJS 23 (1972) 95-144; A. S. van der Woude, "Melchizedek als himmlische Erlösergestalt in den neugefundenen eschatologischen Midraschim aus Qumran-Höhle XI," OTS 14 (1965) 354-73. D. C. Allison Jr

MELITO OF SARDIS

Melito was bishop of Sardis, a prominent city of Asia Minor, during the second half of the second century A.D. He was a theologian, an eloquent preacher and a prolific writer (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 4.26.1-3), yet only fragments of his works have been preserved.

1. The Paschal Homily
2. Rhetorical Context
3. Christology

1. The Paschal Homily.

An incomplete manuscript of Melito's Paschal Homily (Peri Pascha), the oldest Christian Easter sermon, came to light in 1940 (Bonner). In 1960 another manuscript of this sermon, one that was almost complete and in excellent condition, was discovered and published (Testuz). Since then additional fragments of Peri Pascha have surfaced, written in Coptic, Georgian, Latin, Syriac and Greek. Consequently all lacunae have been filled, and the homily has been reconstructed (Blank, Hall, Hawthorne, Perler).

This sermon of Melito may have been part of the ancient Easter service of the Asian church, a service that likely began with a vigil that included a homily, a baptismal* service, a love* feast and the celebration of the Eucharist that took place in the early hours of Easter morning (cf. Ep. Apos. 15). It is reasonable to believe that sermons in the Easter vigil were based on the OT Passover text. As the Jews annually recounted the events of the exodus and pondered the significance of the lamb* and the redemption* it effected, so Christian pastors also read from Exodus and preached about a redemption greater than the redemption from Egypt and about the true Passover lamb, Jesus Christ.

Melito's homily begins, "The Scripture about the Hebrew Exodus has been read . . . but I will clearly set forth the significance of the words of this Scripture" (Peri Pascha 1, 11). Later he writes, "For this one [Jesus Christ], who was led away as a lamb, and who was sacrificed as a sheep, by himself delivered us from servitude to the world as from the land of Egypt, and released us from bondage to the devil as from the hand of Pharaoh, and sealed our souls by his own spirit, and the members of our bodies by his own blood" (Peri Pascha 68).

2. Rhetorical Context.

When Christianity came to Asia Minor it came to that part of the Roman Empire where education was widespread and intellectual culture was well developed. Education and culture were dominated by grammarians and rhetoricians; rhetorical schools flourished, each with its own distinctive style. This style was shaped by those who appreciated an oratory rich in metaphor, figures of speech, poetic elements and staccato-like rhythms.

Not until the second century and later did the popular rhetoric of the day begin to influence Christian preaching,* and even then it was slow in taking hold. The oldest Christian sermon in postapostolic literature, the second letter of Clement of Rome* (c. A.D. 120-170), displays simplicity in its composition.

For years scholars considered that Hippolytus (d. A.D. 235) was the first Christian preacher to introduce secular rhetoric into the church. The discovery of Melito's Paschal Homily, however, makes it clear that Hippolytus was not the first Christian writer or preacher who attempted to put the Christian message in a form that would be appreciated and welcomed by its hearers. By examining the features of Melito's homily it becomes clear that Melito was influenced by his environment and in harmony with his culture. He was also familiar with the Bible, the form of Jewish Passover Haggadah, and philosophy and oratory. Peri Pascha may have been the first serious attempt to employ contemporary communication techniques as a tool for spreading the gospel* (see Hawthorne 1969, 36, 37, 188-255).

The homily shows Melito to have possessed a large vocabulary that he employed to stir the emotions of his hearers or readers. His grammar was nearly flawless; his short, rhythmic sentences were intended to create a sense of urgency; his use of figures of speech was designed to hold an audience. In addition he shows a flair for typological exegesis.

3. Christology.

Scholars have scrutinized the homily in an attempt to determine Melito's motivation for writing, concluding that his motivation was multifaceted (Norris). Yet Melito appears to have focused all his education, training and oratorical ability upon one clearly defined goal: exalting Jesus Christ, the central person in the universe and in Melito's own life and thought (see Christology; Exaltation).

The centrality of Jesus lay in the fact that he was more than a human being. Melito was among the first of the church fathers (see Apostolic Fathers) clearly to articulate the doctrine that Jesus shared two natures. He wrote, "For the one [i.e. Jesus Christ] who was born as Son, and led to slaughter as a lamb, and sacrificed as a sheep, and buried as a man, rose up from the dead as God, since he is by nature both God and man" (Peri Pascha 8). He alludes further to this dual nature by saying:

> When the Lord had clothed himself with humanity,
> And had suffered for the sake of the sufferer,
> And had been bound for the sake of the imprisoned,
> And had been judged for the sake of the condemned,
> And buried for the sake of the one who was buried,
> He rose up from the dead, and cried aloud with this voice:
> Who is he who contends with me?
> Let him stand in opposition to me.
> I set the condemned man free.
> I gave the dead life.
> I raised up the one who had been entombed.
> Who is my opponent?
> I, he says, am the one who destroyed death,
> And triumphed over the enemy,
> And trampled Hades under foot,
> And bound the strong one,
> And carried off mankind to the heights of heaven.
> I, he says, am the Christ.
> (Peri Pascha 100-102)

The salvation* of the human race, which sin* made necessary and which Jesus Christ had achieved, inspired Melito to attribute to the resurrected* and triumphant Christ this dramatic cry:

> Come to me all families of the earth!
> You who have been defiled with sins.
> Come and receive forgiveness for your sins.
> I am your forgiveness.
> I am your ransom.
> I am your light.
> I am your savior. I am your resurrection. . . .
> I am the one who leads you up to the heights of heaven.
> I am the one who will show you the eternal Father. (Peri Pascha 103)

Clearly Melito believed in Christ as the Person of cosmic significance, the Savior of the world, and he crafted this sermon to proclaim Christ's worth and work. Peri Pascha has the power to arrest even the attention of a modern audience and make savingly clear to those who hear it the essence of the gospel.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; HYMNS; WORSHIP AND LITURGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Blank, Meliton von Sardes, Vom Passa (Freiburg: Lambertus Verlag, 1963); C. Bonner, Melito of Sardis: The Homily on the Passion and Some Fragments of Ezekiel (Studies and Documents 12; Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1940); S. G. Hall, Melito of Sardis, On Pascha and Fragments: Texts and Translations (Oxford: Clarendon, 1979); G. F. Hawthorne, "Melito of Sardis: His Rhetoric and Theology" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Chicago, 1969); idem, "A New English Translation of Melito's Paschal Homily" in Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation, ed. G. F. Hawthorne (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975) 147-75; B. Lohse, Die Passa-Homilie des Bischofs Meliton von Sardes (Textus Minores 24; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1958); F. W. Norris, "Melito's Motivation," ATR 68 (1986) 16-24; O. Perler, Méliton de Sardes, Sur la Pâque et Fragments (Paris: Editions du Cerf, 1966); J. S. Sibinga, "Melito of Sardis, the Artist and His Text," VC 24 (1970) 81-104; M. Testuz, Papyrus Bodmer XIII: Méliton de Sardes Homélie sur la Pâque (Geneva: Bibliotheca Bodmeriana, 1960). G. F. Hawthorne

MERCY

The early Christian understanding of mercy has its roots in the Old Testament, but it is also shaped by the teaching and example of Jesus (see DJG, Mercy). In the later NT and apostolic fathers, as in Jesus and Paul (see DPL, Mercy), the primary accent is on God's* mercy toward sinners, from which human mercy toward others is derived.

1. Background of Meaning.
2. Hebrews
3. James
4. 1 Peter, 2 John, Jude
5. Apostolic Fathers

1. Background of Meaning.

In the NT and apostolic fathers, eleos, the Greek word frequently translated into English as "mercy," is primarily used in the sense of compassion, pity, sympathy or clemency (BAGD, 250; Esser, 594). The word occurs mainly in the context of ethical exhortation. In addition, since ethics is related to relationships, eleos appears especially where person-to-person relationships are involved, whether it is God having compassion or pity on a person, or individuals having compassion toward one another (Mt 9:13; 12:7). The background of this NT use of eleos seems to lie primarily in the OT idea of ḥesed (eleos is frequently used for ḥesed in the LXX), which, depending on its context, can be translated as "mercy," "kindness," "faithfulness" or "steadfast love" (see Sakenfeld; see DJG, Mercy §1).

The OT idea of ḥesed (Bultmann, 479) is to be understood in the context of a covenantal agreement between two parties, a greater with a lesser party, usually God and Israel. Given the likelihood of covenantal default, the stronger party, showing ḥesed, provides resources to the weaker party for the sake of preserving the covenant. Fidelity to the covenantal partner becomes more important than the debt itself. Thus the Hebrew notion of divine, covenant ḥesed very likely stands behind this canonical and apostolic idea of eleos, "mercy." This OT tradition shows how ḥesed/eleos acts as a balance to divine judgment,* as that which restrains the wrath of God. It also acts as grace.* It can mean unmerited forgiveness.* Sometimes it appears as deliverance. It is always related to God's unsolicited love and nurturing care of Israel. For example, in Psalm 136:1 God's mercy delivers, it reaches down to the poor, it is compassionate grace, and it elicits thanksgiving from those who are blessed. In short, the canonical and apostolic roots of eleos are primarily found in the OT, but we should not rule out or ignore the understanding of mercy in Greek and Roman thought.

In its classical Greek background, eleos could carry the sense of an emotion and its related action aroused by observing the affliction of another (Bultmann, 477; cf. Mart. Pol. 2.2). But the idea of a god or goddess being merciful, or showing clemency (Lat. clementia), though not unheard of, was not developed in any notable manner in popular pagan theology or by the philosophers (see Harris for evidence). "The most common picture was of gods who were more to be feared than loved, more malevolent than beneficent. . . . The gods must be propitiated, won over, persuaded to be more kindly, and the fear of them which lay behind many rituals accorded ill with ideas of divine mercy" (Harris, 102-3). While an emperor might display mercy, or clemency, this was not because he had received divine mercy but because he, like the gods, was in the position to dispense his beneficence, and clemency would solidify and perpetuate his power among those who received it (see Harris, 98-99, on Seneca De Clem.). As E. A. Judge writes of classical antiquity, "the cry of the undeserving for mercy remained unanswered, whether it arose from guilt in the inner man, or from the evil of society at large" (Judge, 107).

2. Hebrews.

Although the term eleos occurs only once in Hebrews,* where the author speaks of the community receiving mercy (Heb 4:16), within the context of the letter's discourse various facets of this divine and priestly* mercy are suggested. In the immediate context mercy is closely linked with grace.* It issues from the "throne of grace," and both mercy and grace are set in parallel formation as gifts received "in the time of need." In the broader context of Hebrews, mercy appears as that divine ability to forgive and to set aside wrath.* In this context mercy is also an ethical incentive to hold fast the faith* (Heb 4:14). Mercy is made available by a heavenly high priest (Heb 9:11), who being taken from among humans (Heb 4:15—5:1), is able to sympathize (sympathēsai) with their weaknesses and be merciful to them (Heb 4:15).

The pastoral problem of apostasy* is addressed by ethical exhortation in Hebrews. The author makes it clear that choosing Christ, as opposed to returning to the old religion, was a pivotal decision. Rejecting Christ would incur judgment "without mercy" (chōris oiktirmōn, Heb 10:28, where oiktirmos carries a sense very close to eleos), pity or reprieve, as under the Mosaic covenant. The threat of mercy withheld could be seen as both a deterrent to apostasy and a threat of actual judgment.

In Hebrews the continuity between the OT and the NT ideas of mercy is apparent. The new way of life flows out of the same God who showed his mercy to Israel.

3. James.

For James* Christian faith goes beyond "saying" (Jas 2:18) that one has faith: Faith is made perfect by (1) works of mercy (Jas 2:15); (2) justice to the poor (Jas 2:6; 5:1-6); and (3) the systematic dismantling of economic (Jas 2:2), cultural (Jas 2:3) and even racial prejudice (Jas 2:6, 8, 9). As James uses it, eleos has an OT prophetic ring. In contrast with Paul's interpretation of Abraham* in Galatians 3 and Romans 4, James views Abraham as the father of works, not "faith only" (Jas 2:21-26). It is in this context of practical Christianity that eleos appears four times in James. Once in James we find the negative form, aneleos, "without mercy" (Jas 2:13, its only occurrence in the NT, but cf. Heb 10:13).

Ethical exhortation frames the context of the use of eleos in James. James 2:6 and 13 show that judgment, the absence of mercy, awaits those who despise the poor. Mercy must be a characteristic of the Christian life, and in order to receive mercy, one must demonstrate mercy to others. The Lord's own exhortation, "Do not judge, so that you may not be judged" (Mt 7:1; Lk 6:36-38, NRSV), finds its echo in James 2:13: "For judgment will be without mercy to anyone who has shown no mercy; mercy triumphs over judgment" (NRSV). As a characteristic of the Christian life, mercy comes from above as wisdom* (Jas 3:17) from God. This special wisdom is a life of faith, full of works of human mercy: (1) caring for the fatherless (Jas 1:27); (2) helping the widow (Jas 1:27); (3) respecting the poor (Jas 2:1-8); (4) feeding the hungry and clothing the naked (Jas 2:1-16). In this practical, ethical context, mercy is seen as compassion for others.

4. 1 Peter, 2 John, Jude.

In 1 Peter the idea of mercy comes into immediate ethical focus. The mercy referred to in 1 Peter 1:3 is no ordinary mercy. This is "great mercy" from God, especially related to resurrection* power (1 Pet 1:3), for a holy* life (1 Pet 1:15), for self-control (1 Pet 1:13), for imitating* Christ (1 Pet 2:21). This "great mercy" (a phrase used only here in the entire NT) is the ethical basis for the Christian life. Thus the idea of "great mercy" is here to be understood in terms of empowerment for righteousness,* and in this sense it may be seen as grace. It is a great and encouraging mercy to Christians scattered throughout the eastern Mediterranean world who perhaps face some form of proportionally "great" persecution.*

The verb eleaō appears twice in 1 Peter 2:10: "once you had not received mercy, but now you have received mercy" (NRSV; based on Hosea 1:6, 9; 2:1, 23). The divine mercy which in 1 Peter 1:3 has given birth to a new humanity now calls this humanity to a new way of life (1 Pet 2:9). Rather than being the object of wrath, this new humanity, because of mercy, is now "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people of [God's] own" (1 Pet 2:9). The ethical context of mercy calls this new people to "good works," since mercy is the basis for obedience.* The imperative is based on the indicative: what believers must do is based on what God has already done (cf. Rom 12:1; Betz).

In 2 John 3 and Jude 2 we find eleos used in a customary Christian epistolary greeting. In Jude 21 the readers are urged to "look forward to the mercy [eleos] of our Lord Jesus Christ that leads to eternal life" (NRSV). It is notable that Jesus, rather than God, is said to be the dispenser of mercy. The verb eleaō appears in Jude 22 and 23, though the textual evidence is problematic for both verses, with some texts reading elegchete ("convince") instead of eleeite ("have mercy"). Nevertheless, a good case can be made for eleaō being the original reading (see commentaries). Those who await the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ are to have mercy on those who are wavering or are even engulfed in the flames of destruction.

5. Apostolic Fathers.

For Clement* eleos can mean something like divine favor. It is almost as if an errant slave is on his knees entreating or begging for a king's forgiveness, when suddenly the great monarch turns with open arms toward the slave. Such is the face of mercy in 1 Clement 9.1: "Let us be obedient, then, to that sovereign and glorious will. Let us entreat his mercy and goodness, casting ourselves upon his compassion" (cf. 1 Clem. 22.8, citing Ps 32:10, where eleos = ḥesed; Hermas Vis. 3.9.8). For Barnabas,* however, the new dispensation transcends the old (see Old Testament in Apostolic Fathers). The OT promise* that God would reward* with mercy Israel's keeping of the Sabbath (Barn. 15.2; cf. Jer 17:24-25) is transcended in Christ. True Sabbath keeping will only be possible when "all things have been made new by the Lord" (Barn. 15.7).

Mercy has an ethical thrust in 1 Clement when the Corinthians are reminded that obedient faith renounces arrogance and embraces humility and mercy toward others. Echoes of the Lord's own words on mercy (Mt 5:7; 7:1) and forgiveness are heard in Clement and Polycarp's exhortations: "Be merciful . . . that you may obtain mercy" (1 Clem. 13.2; Pol. Phil. 2.3). In other words, humility and obedience in human relations are required in order to receive forgiveness and mercy from God. Ethical exhortation also forms the context as both the Didache and Barnabas, in charting the doctrine of the "Two Ways," include being "unmerciful toward the poor" among their lists of vices (Did. 5.2; Barn. 20.2; see Virtues and Vices). By way of contrast, Didache 3.8 mentions being "merciful" (eleēmōn) in a list of virtues (echoing Mt 5:7).

Clement can point to a story of humility rewarded by divine mercy in the humble king David whom God anointed with eternal mercy (en eleei aiōniō echrisa auton, 1 Clem. 18.1). David obtained the divine favor of the King of the Universe. And instead of becoming arrogant about his status as favored, David himself begged God for mercy: "Have mercy upon me [Eleēson me], O God, according to your great mercy [kata to mega eleos sou]" (Ps 51:1). Elsewhere Clement entreats God in prayer for mercy on behalf of the lowly (1 Clem. 59.4).

Mercy is used in 1 Clement 28.1 in a manner consistent with the canonical literature: believers should "leave off foul desires of evil deeds" that they may be "sheltered by his mercy from the judgments to come." Mercy restrains God's wrath. Repentance from sin in the shadow of divine wrath is again the background for mercy in 1 Clement 48.1.

In a twist on the theme of mercy, a stream of early Christian tradition sees divine chastening and even martyrdom* as occasions of severe mercy. The righteous person who is reproved is corrected in mercy (1 Clem. 56.4-5). In this view of mercy Clement follows the apostolic tradition reflected in a passage such as Hebrews 12:6: "Do not lose heart when he rebukes you, because the Lord disciplines those he loves." As discipline is divine love in Hebrews, so martyrdom is an affirmation of divine mercy in Ignatius's Letter to the Romans, for it is the means by which Ignatius attains to God (Ign. Rom. 9.2; cf. 8.3). In a powerfully moving phrase, Ignatius reflects this understanding of martyrdom's mercy: "I am God's wheat, ground up by the teeth of wild beasts, so that I might be the pure bread of Christ" (Ign. Rom. 4.1). Ironically, however, in writing to the Ephesians Ignatius contrasts his own state of danger and condemnation with that of his readers who have "obtained mercy" in their physical safety and freedom (Ign. Eph. 12.1).

Finally, mercy occurs in the apostolic fathers in introductory letter greetings (e.g., Ign. Rom.; Ign. Phld.; Pol. Phil.) or conclusion (Ign. Smyrn. 12.1). In these contexts, as in the canonical epistles, mercy is part of a formulaic wish for God's blessings.*

In conclusion the canonical and apostolic literature complement each other in their uses of mercy. In both bodies of literature the term largely appears in ethical contexts as divine encouragement to ethical action and as discouraging disobedience. It also refers to the grace of martyrdom as mercy from God. But whether it is compassion from God or person-to-person pity, mercy has its roots in the OT idea of the infinite love of God for a helpless and needy covenantal partner.

See also FORGIVENESS; GRACE; LOVE; VIRTUES AND VICES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. I. Andersen, "Yahweh, the Kind and Sensitive God" in God Who Is Rich in Mercy, ed. P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson (Sydney: Lancer, 1986) 41-48; H. D. Betz, "The Foundations of Christian Ethics According to Romans 12:1-2" in Witness and Existence, ed. P. E. Devenish and G. L. Goodwin (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989) 55-72; R. Bultmann, "ἔλεος κτλ," TDNT 2:477-87; idem, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribner's, 1951, 1955); H.-H. Esser, "Mercy, Compassion," NIDNTT 2:593-601; B. F. Harris, "The Idea of Mercy and Its Graeco-Roman Context" in God Who Is Rich in Mercy, ed. P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson (Sydney: Lancer, 1986) 89-105; E. A. Judge, "The Quest for Mercy in Late Antiquity" in God Who Is Rich in Mercy, ed. P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson (Sydney: Lancer, 1986) 107-21; G. W. H. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976); K. D. Sakenfeld, "Love (OT)," ABD 4:375-81; idem, The Meaning of Hesed in the Hebrew Bible: A New Inquiry (HSM 17; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament (London: Epworth, 1944); F. Staudinger, "ἔλεος κτλ," EDNT 1:429-31. I. Canales

MESSIAH. See CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; KINGDOM OF GOD.

MIDRASH. See JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70.

MILK, SOLID FOOD

The contrasting designations "milk" and "solid food" are metaphorical expressions used to describe spiritual nourishment. They naturally indicate accompanying stages of spiritual growth in Christians who have experienced a spiritual new birth.*

1. Terminology
2. Background
3. Necessity of Milk
4. From Milk to Solid Food
5. Milk and Solid Food in the Apostolic Fathers

1. Terminology.

The term milk occurs forty-eight times in the Bible, but the NT term for milk, gala, occurs five times (1 Cor 3:2; 9:7; Heb 5:12, 13; 1 Pet 2:2). Only in 1 Corinthians 9:7 is gala used of literal milk. The other four times it is used metaphorically. The term occurs only in the Epistle of Barnabas in the apostolic fathers, four times citing the OT expression for the promised land as "the land flowing with milk and honey" (Barn. 6.8, 10, 13, 17), which becomes the basis for discussing milk as a metaphor for Christian spiritual nourishment (Barn. 6.17).

Two primary terms, brōma (brōsis) and trophē, are used to designate "food" in the NT. Brōma occurs fifteen times, three of which are metaphorical uses (Jn 4:34; 1 Cor 3:2; 10:3—"spiritually typical" might be a better designation for the latter), while trophē occurs sixteen times, two of which are metaphorical (Heb 5:12, 14). The adjective stereos ("firm, solid") occurs four times in the NT (2 Tim 2:19; Heb 5:12, 14; 1 Pet 5:9). Two of those four are linked with trophē to give us the metaphorical expression "solid food" (hē sterea trophē), which contrasts with "milk" (gala, Heb 5:12, 14).

These terms for food are also used by the apostolic fathers: brōma occurs only three times but is used both literally (Ign. Trall. 2.3; Barn. 10.9-10) and metaphorically (Barn. 10.9), while trophē occurs twelve times, ten times referring to literal food (1 Clem. 20.4; Ign. Rom. 7.3; Did. 10.3; 13.1-2; Barn. 10.4, 11; Herm. Vis. 3.9.3; Diogn. 9.6) and twice referring to metaphorical food (Ign. Trall. 6.1; Did. 10.3).

2. Background.

While the metaphors "milk" and "solid food" are found abundantly in the Greek ethical* tradition (e.g., the Stoics), the pedagogical emphasis appears to draw more upon an OT usage (contra Williamson). "Food" and "drink" are important metaphors in both the OT and NT. Isaiah rebukes those who spend their money on what cannot satisfy. The wine and milk and bread of which he speaks will delight one's soul; hence, "seek the Lord while he may be found" (Is 55:1-6). The godly thirst for God* (Ps 42:2; 63:1; 143:6) and thirst after wisdom (Sir 51:24-25).

Jesus' allusion to himself as the bread of life (Jn 6) draws upon one of the chief metaphorical uses of food in Scripture. Israel ate manna in the wilderness, to which Paul refers as "spiritual food" (pneumatikon brōma, 1 Cor 10:3; cf. Deut 8:3; Mt 4:4 par. Lk 4:4), quite likely a typological reference to the Lord's Supper* (Fee, 446-47). Jesus gave his body and blood as the necessary sacrifice* so that those who eat his flesh and drink his blood would have eternal life* and never want again (Jn 6:25-59).

Jesus also said, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me and to complete his work" (Jn 4:34). Jesus is not disparaging material food but rather is emphasizing that even as literal food sustains and satisfies one's physical mission in life, so the greatest sustenance and satisfaction of the spiritual life is to carry out God's will and work in this world.

3. Necessity of Milk.

Peter introduced the concept of spiritual new birth with the compound verb anagennan ("to give new birth," "to be born anew"; (1 Pet 1:3, 23). He continues that theme with the metaphor "newborn babies" (artigennēta brephē) in 1 Peter 2:2 and expands the metaphor by emphasizing that "pure, spiritual milk" is a necessary nourishment for the spiritually newborn baby. A primary characteristic of a healthy new baby is its yearning for its mother's milk. Peter draws not on the smallness or innocence of the baby but on this strong and instinctive longing. Continuous nourishment from "spiritual milk" causes the newborn to grow up in its spiritual salvation* (1 Pet 2:2). Here "milk" is not set in opposition to "food" but is itself the necessary nourishment for Christians. "Pure, spiritual milk" becomes a symbol of imperishable life and divine mercy* in contrast to the perishable evil desires in which the readers had lived in ignorance (1 Pet 1:14). All Christians are to have a longing for spiritual nourishment similar to the longing of a baby for its mother's milk. The medium by which this milk is received is the proclaimed message of the gospel (1 Pet 1:25), but the milk "itself is more appropriately interpreted as the sustaining life of God given in mercy to his children" (Michaels, 88-89).

4. From Milk to Solid Food.

The author of Hebrews* has a slightly different approach to the issue of metaphorical "milk" from that of Peter. The author has expected better things of his readers than they display. They should have made more progress in the Christian life than they have. The author is disturbed by their immaturity. Enough time has transpired in their spiritual lives that by now they should qualify to be teachers. Instead they need instruction.

Milk is necessary and adequate for infants. No baby is criticized for taking milk. But when a baby grows into an adult it is absurd to envision it still feeding only on milk. Milk is insufficient for the needs of an adult. With a twist of irony, the author rebukes these believers for such an absurdity: they have had enough time in the faith to be adults feeding on solid food; instead they are still feeding on milk.

Here "milk" refers to "the basic elements of the oracles of God," which any newborn Christian is able to understand (Heb 5:12; 1 Cor 3:2). It takes no advanced spiritual skill to acquire this nourishment. Possibly a preliminary and insufficient teaching based upon the OT is meant (Lane, 140), or the entire Jewish system. In the light of the similar phrase "the basic word about Christ" (Heb 6:1), however, it more likely refers generally to the basics of Christianity, especially the fulfillment in Jesus Christ of all that God has spoken (Hughes, 190). Changing the metaphors, the author suggests that spiritual milk is necessary when the "foundation" of the Christian life is laid, the "foundation of repentance from dead works and faith toward God" (Heb 6:1; see Repentance), which is in apposition to the accompanying items of catechetical instruction concerning cleansing rites, laying on of hands, the resurrection* of the dead and eternal judgment.* This foundational teaching or milk develops a distinctively Christian perspective in the beginning stages of the Christian life (Heb 6:1-2).

The author is not demeaning milk. Rather, milk is insufficient for those who should be mature. The readers should have progressed to the point in their growth where they desire solid food. This is similar to the way in which Paul told the Corinthian Christians that they still could not be treated as "spiritual persons" ready for "solid food" since they still acted like "carnal" or "fleshly persons" (1 Cor 3:1-3). Solid food (brōma) in the Corinthian context is the hidden wisdom* of God, which is imparted by the Spirit to those who possess the mind of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 2:6-7; 12-16). Solid food (hē sterea trophē) in Hebrews points to the priesthood* of Christ, which is likened to the priesthood of Melchizedek* (cf. Heb 5:4-10 with the connective in Heb 5:11) and the instruction of the high-priestly office of Christ that will be provided in Hebrews 7:1—10:18 (Bruce, 108-9; Lane, 138-39). The mature person is acquainted, experienced or skilled with the "word of righteousness" (Heb 5:13), which is linked with training to distinguish between good and evil (Heb 5:14) an ethical or moral maturity.

The teaching of elementary Christian truth is described as "milk." Milk is the first teaching given to newborn Christians who had been converted through the missionary message (cf. 1 Cor 3:2). This milk was appropriate for newborn Christians (1 Pet 2:1-2). Newborn Christians are not ready for solid spiritual food, because they would not be able to handle its acquisition (chewing) or its digestion. However, there comes a point in the natural maturing process when the Christian needs solid spiritual food for full health. This solid food is advanced teaching on Christ and his sacrificial death, the full teaching of the wisdom of God and exercise of ethical discernment (Heb 5:12—6:3).

5. Milk and Solid Food in the Apostolic Fathers. The metaphorical use of "milk" and "solid food" is similar yet somewhat different in the apostolic fathers. In the Epistle of Barnabas we find a use of "milk" similar to that in 1 Peter 2. The author draws upon the OT expression "land of milk and honey" to make metaphorical reference to the wisdom and understanding of the secrets of Jesus Christ, which are now the nourishment of those newly created in Christ (Barn. 6.8-17).

In an interesting variation Ignatius writes to the Trallians, who are mere babes, that he does not want to give them nourishment that might choke them, since they are not ready for advanced spiritual teaching (Ign. Trall. 5.1-2). Hence he admonishes them to take only "Christian food" (christianē trophē), as opposed to "every strange plant, which is heresy" (Ign. Trall. 6.1-2). "Food" is used to indicate nourishment for spiritual babes.

In an important passage on the practice of the Eucharist in the early church,* the author of the *Didache gives thanks for the "spiritual food and drink" (pneumatikēn trophēn kai poton) that God has given for spiritual nourishment (Did. 10.3). This is similar to Paul's expression in 1 Corinthians 10:3 (pneumatikon brōma; cf. 1 Cor 10:16-18).

See also TEACHING, PARAENESIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Bauder and H. Dropatschek, "Hunger, Thirst, Food," NIDNTT 2:264-73; J. Behm, "βρῶμα, βρῶσις," TDNT 1:642-45; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964); G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); P. E. Hughes, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); W. L. Lane, Hebrews 1—8 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); J. P. Lewis, "Food," ZPEB 2:581-87; J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); H. Schlier, "γάλα," TDNT 1:645-47; R. Williamson, Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews (ALGHJ 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970). M. J. Wilkins

MILLENNIUM

Millennium refers to a thousand-year period expected by some Christian and Jewish eschatological texts as the coming, intermediate phase before the full reestablishment of God's kingdom. In the NT it is explicitly mentioned only in Revelation 20, but it may be referred to in the earlier text of 1 Corinthians 15:23-28 and the later text of 2 Peter 3:8. The millennium functions as a reward* for the servants of God* who remain faithful amid persecution,* "those who are steadfast to the end," in the words of a refrain of Revelation. Furthermore, the millennium in Revelation establishes a double contrast: between the evil one's impotence and Christ's authority* and between the evil one's destiny and the reward awaiting the saints. Interpretation of the millennium is crucial for eschatology*; the elusiveness of consensus on the meaning of the millennium is reflected in the diverse eschatological conceptions that abound.

1. Millennium in the New Testament
2. Millennium in Jewish Apocalyptic and Early Patristic Thought
3. Contemporary Interpretations of the Millennium

1. Millennium in the New Testament.

1.1. Revelation 20. Revelation 20 contains the only explicit references in the NT to a temporary, thousand-year (chilia etē) reign of Christ.* Revelation 20:4-6 is one of the most difficult passages in the book (see Revelation, Book of), but it is clear that the function of the millennium is to reward the servants of God who remain faithful through the trials of their faith.*

There are several things to note about the millennial period as it is described in Revelation 20. First, the devil is "bound" and "thrown into the pit," which is then sealed to keep him from further "deceiving the nations" during this interval (Rev 20:2-3). Second, Christ reigns throughout this era, attested by the silence and absence of the evil one's activity. Though Paul does not mention the thousand-year period, some scholars infer from 1 Corinthians 15:23-28 that he too believes in an intermediate period in which Christ "must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet" (1 Cor 15:25).

A third thing to note about the thousand years of Revelation is that those who were martyred for their confession of Jesus reign with him during this time (Rev 20:4, 6; see Martyrdom). The text identifies those who reign with Christ as martyrs, but some interpreters take this as synonymous with "all Christians" (e.g., Sweet). This in turn affects our understanding of who are "the rest of the dead" (Rev 20:5). Are they non-Christians? Or should we take the more straightforward reading that "the rest of the dead" are nonmartyrs, both Christian and non-Christian?

A fourth observation is that there is no mention of the relationship of this millennium to the time of the Second Coming of Christ (see Parousia). Does Christ return before or after the millennium? This question is not explicitly answered by Revelation 20.

A fifth thing to note is that the thousand years does not signify the permanent establishment of Christ's kingdom but is portrayed as a temporary government, an interregnum before the end. After this thousand-year hiatus, the devil will "be let out for a little while" (Rev 20:3, 7; cf. Rev 12:12), Christians who were not martyred for their faith will be resurrected (Rev 20:5) and ultimately the dead will be judged (Rev 20:12) and death destroyed (Rev 20:14). After that comes the eternal kingdom of God: "Then I saw a new heaven and new earth" (Rev 21:1; see Heaven; Judgment; Kingdom of God; Satan).

1.2. 2 Peter 3:8. In 2 Peter 3:8 there may be an implicit reference to a millennial kingdom: "But do not ignore this one fact, beloved, that with the Lord one day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years are like one day." The context suggests that 2 Peter* reflects an eschatology like that of Revelation, since here we find the readers facing doubts about Christ's second coming because they do not perceive any changes in the fabric of history (2 Pet 3:4). The author reminds them of the unpredictability of the Day of the Lord,* which comes like a bandit (2 Pet 3:10). As in Revelation, what follows is a "new heavens and a new earth, where justice dwells" (2 Pet 3:13).

Even so it appears that 2 Peter 3:8 is more likely an echo of Psalm 90:4 than of Revelation's eschatology. The emphasis in 2 Peter 3 is not on a human perception or symbol of the length of Christ's intermediate reign (as in Rev 20) but on how the vast human time line appears so brief to God. In the words of the psalmist, "For a thousand years in your sight are like yesterday when it is past, or like a watch in the night" (Ps 90:4 NRSV).

2. Millennium in Jewish Apocalyptic and Early Patristic Thought.

2.1. Millennium in Jewish Apocalyptic. Revelation 20 draws on traditional eschatological themes but construes them in a unique way. The Jewish apocalypses of this period are diverse both in themes and in literary forms (cf. 1 Enoch 91:12-17; 4 Ezra 7:26-30; 12:31-34; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29—30; see Apocalyptic). Revelation is distinctive yet indebted to its Jewish background for literary forms, theological ideas, symbolic images and the way it interprets OT texts. The relationship of Revelation to these other apocalypses is not one of literary dependence but rather a reliance on a common tradition that takes different forms in the different sources they utilize. Revelation is as similar to and different from Jewish apocalypses as they are from each other, and the differences are pronounced when we factor in the Christian orientation of Revelation. That is, the reign of the martyrs with Christ during the thousand years resembles nothing else in Jewish apocalyptic (Gourgues). John's Revelation stands distinct because of its particularity as a pastoral word to the Christian churches of Asia Minor near the end of the first Christian century (Bauckham 1993).

Similar elements of the millennial expectation of Revelation are evident in a Jewish Christian contemporaneous work. The Ascension of Isaiah is a Palestinian Christian addition to the Jewish Martyrdom of Isaiah. There the expectation of a resurgence like that of the antichrist* before the end is described. Beliar, "a king of iniquity, a murderer of his mother," will domineer and deceive just before the end of the evil age (Asc. Isa. 4.1-13). Then God tosses Beliar and his servants into gehenna, "and he will give rest to the pious whom he finds in the body in this world" (Asc. Isa. 4.15). The offer of rest turns out to be a significant characteristic of the millennial period. As in Revelation 20, the promise of the millennium is the offer of reprieve from persecution.

2.2. Resistance to and Acceptance of the Millennium in Early Patristic Thought. Papias is the first patristic thinker to espouse belief in the millennium (Irenaeus Haer. 5.33.4; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39). He explicitly taught that the thousand years is not to be taken in an allegorical sense. His witness is crucial, since he claimed to be a "hearer" of John.

Millennial teaching was not universally accepted in the early church. Justin Martyr had to address the Greco-Roman audience that held that there is no resurrection* but rather an immediate ascent of the soul to heaven. Justin made it a matter of orthodox belief that there will be a millennium and a resurrection body, and he detailed the scene of the millennium as the restored Jerusalem* prophesied of old (Justin Dial. Tryph. 80—81). He concedes that not all Christians are of this mind, but he exhorts that "right-minded Christians" agree with him. Origen (c. 185-254) was the first orthodox patristic writer to attempt to discredit a millennial interpretation of Revelation 20:4-6.

From the *Epistle of Barnabas onward, including almost all of the early church fathers, the millennial expectation was of a thousand-year period of rest within the framework of a universal week of seven thousand years. History was broken down into seven thousand-year periods paralleling the seven days of the creation story. The final period of time, the millennium, was to be a period of rest like the seventh day of creation when "God finished the work that he had done, and he rested on the seventh day" (Gen 2:2). Naturally 2 Peter 3:8 and Revelation 20 were read as a part of this dispensationalist understanding of history (e.g., Barn. 15.3-9). According to Barnabas, the millennial sabbath is followed by the "eighth day" of the new creation* (Barn. 15.8; cf. Irenaeus Haer. 5.32-39).

3. Contemporary Interpretations of the Millennium.

3.1. History of Interpretation. Since the literalism of the early church period there have been three main phases in interpreting the millennium. (1) The allegorical or spiritual interpretation of the thousand-year reign was adopted by the most influential exegetes from the fourth to the eighteenth centuries. (2) In the last century the majority view suggests that the author is not overly concerned with creating a fully consistent eschatological scheme. When there are apparent inconsistencies these are attributed to the disparate traditional eschatological materials the author has drawn together in his apocalyptic mosaic (e.g., Court). (3) A recent trend in interpretation is to disregard chronological concerns in favor of discerning the theological freight of the text. This approach suggests that Revelation uses a traditional picture of the future messianic age in order to communicate an essentially theological message and therefore not one about time (e.g., Mealy).

3.2 Premillennial, Postmillennial and Amillennial Interpretations. Current interpretations tend to fall into one of three groups, premillennialist, postmillennialist and amillennialist. Those who take Revelation's mention of one thousand years as an actual period that stretches over one thousand rotations of the earth around the sun are usually premillennialists. The label refers to their belief about when the return of Christ (1 Thess 4:17) will happen in relation to the millennial rule of Christ. Premillennialists believe Christ's return mentioned in 1 Thessalonians 4 happens before the millennial kingdom.

Some postmillennialists also believe in a literal, thousand-year reign of Christ, which is then followed by the Second Coming of Christ. Other postmillennialists believe that the one thousand years stand for the current effectiveness of the gospel in the present age, after which Christ returns. Neither premillennialism nor postmillennialism is explicitly supported by Revelation 20, since it makes no mention of the return of Christ.

Amillennialists do not believe "one thousand years" refers to a literal time frame. It is a symbol for the whole period of time between Jesus' first and second comings. This interpretation was first championed by Augustine of Hippo. Augustine read Revelation through a Pauline lens. Colossians 3:1 and Ephesians 2:6 declare that we already are "raised with Christ" and "enthroned with Christ in heavenly places," and this must mean that the reign of saints with Christ (Rev 20:4-6) must describe the present reign of Christians (Augustine Civ. D. 20.6-20). The difficulty of this line of interpretation is that it must overlook the current experience of evil in the world, which the author of Revelation conveys is due to the evil one's awareness of the shortage of time left to covort and corrupt (Rev 12:12). A variation on this view is to take the millennium to represent not the entire church age but only the periods of reprieve from persecution.

3.3. Concluding Comments. The search for a cosmic calendar that plots out the future days and weeks according to the book of Revelation is misguided. The book's message is not in its details but in its impact on a beleaguered church. Those Christians needed to hear what Revelation had to offer, that suffering* is temporary but a necessary experience of those who profess Christ in a corrupt age; that Christ and the church ultimately prevail over this present evil; that believers should hold on to faith even through suffering; and that God's justice and peace* will ultimately prevail, even if it is not yet evident to us. This is the message of Revelation to the church militant in every age: the church, like Christ, will soon be triumphant. Patience and faithfulness are required, but we will soon join "all the saints, who from their labors rest."

See also APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; CREATION, COSMOLOGY; ESCHATOLOGY; KINGDOM OF GOD; REVELATION, BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); idem, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); H. Bietenhard, "The Millennial Hope in the Early Church," SJT 6 (1953) 12-30; R. G. Clouse, ed., The Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1977); J. M. Court, Myth and History in the Book of Revelation (London: SPCK, 1979); M. Gourgues, "The Thousand-Year Reign (Rev 20:1-6): Terrestrial or Celestial?" CBQ 47 (1985) 676-81; J. M. Ford, "Millennium," ABD 4:832-34; J. W. Mealy, After the Thousand Years: Resurrection and Judgment in Revelation 20 (JSNTSup 70; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); J. P. M. Sweet, Revelation (WPC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1979).

B. J. Dodd

MIND. See PSYCHOLOGY.

MINISTRY

The ministry and leadership of the church* is variously depicted in the literature covered by this dictionary. The roles of the Twelve, Paul and his colleagues, other apostles,* prophets,* bishops, elders, teachers and deacons, as well as the empowering of the Holy Spirit,* are all mentioned. At one end of the spectrum there is an emphasis upon the work of the Spirit in all believers, and at the other submission to the bishop and elders is stressed. Throughout the literature leadership of some kind in the Christian community is assumed.

1. The Acts of the Apostles
2. Hebrews to Revelation
3. Apostolic Fathers

1. The Acts of the Apostles.

1.1. Fundamentals: Jesus and the Spirit. In Acts* Jesus begins to fulfill what John the Baptist prophesied about him, i.e., that he would baptize* his people with the Spirit (Acts 1:4-5; 2:1-4, cf. Lk 3:16). By virtue of his resurrection* Jesus entered a new relationship with the Spirit. He who was anointed* with the Spirit at his baptism to become the end-time prophet, liberator and Messiah now became the one who baptizes his people with the Spirit. Jesus' new relationship with the Spirit forms a bridge between his ministry as the historical Jesus and the ministry that he continues as the exalted Christ through the church (Acts 1:1; see Exaltation). It is no surprise, then, that Acts presents the ministry of the early church as something initiated and empowered by the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:8; 2:4; 4:8, 31; 5:32; 6:3, 10; 7:55; 8:15, 18, 29, 39; 9:17, 31; 10:19, 44-47; 11:12, 15, 16, 24, 28; 13:2, 4, 9, 52; 15:8, 28; 16:6, 7; 19:6, 21; 20:22, 23, 28; 21:4, 11).

1.2. The Apostles. The designation apostles is applied to two groups only in Acts: the Twelve and Paul and Barnabas. The Twelve, reconstituted by the selection of Matthias after the suicide of Judas, included men who had accompanied Jesus from the time of John's baptism to the time when Jesus was taken up (Acts 1:21-22). The Twelve constitute a second bridge between the ministry of the historical Jesus and that of the early church.

Jesus said the Twelve would sit on twelve thrones judging the tribes of Israel* (Lk 22:30), so they stand as a sign of God's* continued purposes for Israel. They also played an important role in legitimizing the expansion of the church among Samaritans (see Samaria) and Gentiles* (Acts 8:14-17; 11:1-18; 15:1-35). Their actual ministry involved preaching* and bearing witness* to the resurrection of Christ (Acts 1:22; 4:33), teaching* (Acts 2:42) and prayer* (Acts 6:2-4). Their preaching was often accompanied by signs and wonders* (Acts 2:43; 5:12) and was directed mainly but not exclusively to Jews.

Because all the references to apostles in Acts except Acts 14:4, 14 refer to the Twelve, some scholars argue that the term apostle applied to Paul and Barnabas in these texts means something else (e.g., missionaries rather than apostles), or reflects the tradition Luke was using at this point and therefore not his own view of apostleship, or is a later gloss. However, the account of the ministry of Paul and his colleagues in Acts replicates in many ways that of the Twelve, especially that of Peter: their ministry also involved preaching the gospel* (Acts 9:15; 19:8-10; 22:14-15; 26:15-18) and teaching and encouraging new Christian communities (Acts 14:21-22; 18:11; 20:25-26). It too was accompanied by signs and wonders (Acts 13:8-12; 14:3, 8-9; 16:16-18; 19:11-12; 20:7-12). While Paul and his companions had not accompanied Jesus from his baptism to the ascension and so could not be regarded as apostles in exactly the same way as the Twelve were, nevertheless it is apparent that their apostolic ministry was very much the same. The one real difference was that the ministry of Paul and his colleagues was directed mainly but not exclusively to Gentiles. The pattern of Paul's itinerant ministry was to preach first in Jewish synagogues,* where he could speak to Jews, proselytes and God-fearers, and afterward to the wider Gentile community (Acts 13:46-48; 18:5-8; 19:8-10). The ministry of apostles, whether of members of the Twelve or of Paul and his colleagues, was marked by the involvement of the exalted Christ through the Spirit (Acts 1:1, 5, 8; 2:4; 4:8; 5:32; 8:14-17; 9:17; 10:19, 44-48; 11:12-17, 24; 13:1-4; 16:6-7; 19:6; 20:22-23).

1.3. The Seven. Because of the rapid growth of the early Jerusalem* church and problems that arose in it, the Twelve were unable to cope with the daily distribution to the needy as well as their own ministry of the word of God and prayer. It was to resolve this problem that the Twelve gathered all the disciples together and asked them to choose seven men, full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom, to take over responsibility for the daily distribution (Acts 6:1-6). This incident probably provided the model for the later institution of the office of deacon. However, the word deacon (diakonos) is not used in Acts 6. The work of the Seven is described as a "ministry" (diakonia), as is the work of the Twelve (Acts 6:1, 4). However, it is the function rather than any office that is depicted here. The task the Seven were appointed to carry out (Acts 6:1-3) appears to have been taken over by the elders shortly afterward (Acts 11:27-30).

In later chapters of Acts the activities of two members of the Seven are highlighted. Stephen* and Philip* carry out a powerful preaching ministry that is accompanied by miraculous signs (Acts 6:8-10; 8:4-8). Stephen's ministry brought him into opposition with members of the Synagogue of the Freedmen, and this led to his arraignment before the Sanhedrin and subsequent martyrdom* (Acts 6:8-12, 54-60). Philip's ministry resulted in a turning to Christ on the part of many Samaritans and the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:4-13, 26-39). This shows that, while the Seven might have been made responsible (temporarily) for the daily distribution to the needy, their ministry, as people filled with the Holy Spirit, was not limited to that.

1.4. Ordinary Believers. While members of the Seven and the Twelve were responsible for the initial evangelization of Samaritans (Acts 8) and Gentiles (Acts 10) respectively, it was ordinary believers, scattered by persecution,* who carried the gospel far and wide. They spoke to Gentiles as well as Jews, and because God's hand was with them, they were responsible for a remarkable turning to Christ among Gentiles (Acts 8:4; 11:19-21).

1.5. Elders. In the earliest days the Twelve took the lead in the Jerusalem church, but it was not long before they were joined by a group called "the elders." It was to the elders that Paul and Barnabas brought aid from the church in Antioch (Acts 11:27-30). It was to the apostles and elders in Jerusalem that they were sent to discuss the demands for circumcision being placed upon Gentile converts in Antioch, and it was in the name of the apostles and elders that the decision about this matter was communicated to the Gentile churches (Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22-23; 16:4). It was the elders, together with James, the brother of the Lord (see Relatives of Jesus), whom Paul and his company greeted when they returned to Jerusalem at the end of the third missionary journey, and it was they who urged Paul to take specific action to neutralize rumors that he was teaching the Jews of the Diaspora* to turn away from the law* of Moses (Acts 21:18-26). From all this it appears that the Jerusalem elders were a group distinct from the Twelve and did not include James. There is no information in Acts concerning their selection and appointment or what qualifications they had to have. Their function, as far as we can tell, was to work alongside the Twelve and then James in the leadership of the church. This involved receiving (and distributing) aid and handling controversial issues as they arose.

Paul and Barnabas appointed elders for the churches they founded (Acts 14:23). Some hints about their appointment and responsibilities are found in Paul's address to the Ephesian elders. The elders, or at least some of them, were made overseers (episkopoi) of the flock (see Phil 1:1) by the Holy Spirit and were responsible for guarding it against those who sought to lead people astray. They were to shepherd the church of God, bought with his own blood (Acts 20:28-31).

1.6. Women in Ministry. There are a number of references to the ministry of women in Acts. The women, including Mary the mother of Jesus, joined in constant prayer along with the men when all the disciples met in the upper room (Acts 1:13-14). Peter, quoting from the prophet Joel, explained the phenomena of the day of Pentecost in terms of the pouring out of the Spirit on all people, both men and women, so that both would prophesy (Acts 2:17-18). Dorcas's ministry of doing good and helping the poor was praised, and it moved the apostle Peter to pray for her restoration to life (Acts 9:36-44). Mary, the mother of John Mark, hosted the gathering of the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:12). Priscilla and her husband, Aquila, provided hospitality* for Paul in Corinth (Acts 18:1-3), accompanied him on his journey to Ephesus (Acts 18:18-19) and provided hospitality for Apollos and instructed him in the way of God (Acts 18:26). The four unmarried daughters of Philip the Evangelist prophesied (Acts 21:8-9).

*1.7. Prophets. Acts mentions the ministry of various Christian prophets. There were prophets who came down from Jerusalem to Antioch, including one named Agabus who predicted a severe famine during the reign of Claudius (Acts 11:27-28). Later Agabus predicted Paul's arrest in Jerusalem (Acts 21:10-11). In Antioch there were prophets and teachers, and it was to these that the Holy Spirit gave directions to set apart Barnabas and Paul for their missionary work (Acts 13:1-3). Judas and Silas, who were part of the delegation from Jerusalem that conveyed the Jerusalem decrees to the Gentile churches, are described as prophets who exhorted and strengthened the disciples (Acts 15:30-32), and the four unmarried daughters of Philip the Evangelist used to prophesy (Acts 21:8-9). The ministry of the prophets in Acts included prediction, receiving specific directions, exhortation and encouragement.

2. Hebrews to Revelation.

2.1. Hebrews and James. Hebrews* exhorts its readers to respect their leaders who spoke the word of God to them, whose lives provided an example to be followed and who kept watch over them as those who must give an account of their ministry (Heb 13:7, 17). James* speaks of the heavy responsibility of teachers; they will be judged more strictly (Jas 3:1). He also refers to the role of elders in praying for and anointing the sick (Jas 5:15).

2.2. 1 and 2 Peter and Jude. In 1 Peter* believers are depicted as stones* that are built into a spiritual temple,* to function as a holy priesthood* offering spiritual sacrifices* and declaring the praises of God who called them out of darkness into his glorious light* (1 Pet 2:4-10; see Glory). All believers are urged to use whatever gifts they have, whether gifts of speaking or of serving (1 Pet 4:10-11; see Service). Elders are urged to carry out the role of shepherds, caring for God's flock, not in a domineering way, but providing an example of godly living (1 Pet 5:1-4). In 2 Peter and Jude,* the readers are reminded of what the apostles of Christ commanded (2 Pet 3:2) and foretold (Jude 17) and in particular of the teaching of Paul found in his letters (2 Pet 3:15-16).

2.3. 1, 2 and 3 John and Revelation. The letters of John (see John, Letters of) reflect a situation in which itinerant preachers, both orthodox and heretical, had gone out and were moving around the (Johannine) churches (1 Jn 2:18-19, 26; 3:7; 2 Jn 7; 3 Jn 5-10). The orthodox itinerants are described as those who went out "for the sake of the Name" and therefore deserved to receive hospitality (3 Jn 7-8). The elder who in 2 John and 3 John exhorts his readers to provide hospitality to the orthodox and withhold it from the heretical expects his readers to heed his exhortation, though it was rejected by one Diotrephes who wanted preeminence (3 Jn 9-10). The author of 1 John acknowledges that his readers need no one (especially not the false teachers) to instruct them, because they have an anointing from God (1 Jn 2:20-21, 26-27). Nevertheless he provides them with quite explicit teaching about assessing the claims of false teachers. The book of Revelation (see Revelation, Book of) speaks of the twelve apostles of the Lamb as the twelve foundations of the wall of the new Jerusalem (Rev 21:14).

3. Apostolic Fathers.

3.1. Clement. This letter is addressed to a church that had, on account of one or two persons, dismissed from office its presbyters (1 Clem. 47.6). Clement* wrote to urge the church, which previously had a reputation of obedience* to its rulers (1 Clem. 1.3), to respect those who ruled over them (1 Clem. 21.6). In the process he asserts that the apostles' practice of appointing bishops and deacons from among their first converts was in accordance with the Scriptures (1 Clem. 42.4-5; cf. Is 60:17). And because the apostles had foreknowledge of the strife that would arise concerning the episcopate, they added the codicil that, if those appointed by them died, other approved men should succeed to their ministry (1 Clem. 44.1-2). Clement insists that it is no small sin* to remove from the episcopate those appointed by the apostles or those appointed by other eminent men with the consent of the whole church (1 Clem. 44.3-4).

Applying all this to the situation in Corinth, Clement stresses that it is shameful that the Corinthians are being disloyal to their presbyters (1 Clem. 47.6) and urges those who instigated the sedition to repent* and submit themselves to the presbyters (1 Clem. 54.1-2; 57.1). From all this it emerges that, as far as Clement was concerned, the apostles had inaugurated the ministry of bishops and deacons by appointing people to this task and had provided for its continuance following the death of those whom they appointed. Clement appears to use the terms bishop and presbyter synonymously. Perhaps the reason for this is, as H. O. Maier suggests, that some of the elders of a larger presbyteral body acted as bishops in the Roman church (see Rome).

3.2. The Didache. In the *Didache the readers are urged to honor those who teach them the Word of God as they would the Lord himself, because when they teach about the Lord's nature, the Lord is present (Did. 4.1). The readers are instructed to allow prophets to hold eucharists (or give thanks) as they will (Did. 10.7) and to receive itinerant apostles as the Lord* (Did. 11.1-3). Normally they are not to test prophets when they are speaking "in a spirit" (Did. 11.7). However, sometimes this will be necessary. Prophets who order a meal "in a spirit" to eat of it themselves are false prophets, as are those who do not practice what they teach (Did. 11.9-10). Apostles or prophets who want hospitality for more than two days or ask for money may be regarded as false (Did. 11.3-6, 12). Yet instructions are given to support genuine prophets and teachers who take up residence. They are to be given the first fruits of the readers' produce (Did. 13.1-7). The Didache makes no mention of the apostles appointing bishops and deacons; rather, the readers are told to appoint for themselves worthy men as bishops and deacons. Once appointed they are not to be despised, because they minister to the people the ministry of prophets and teachers (Did. 15.1-2). The Didache reflects a situation similar to that reflected in 1, 2 and 3 John when it speaks of itinerant preachers and teachers, both orthodox and heterodox, who were moving about among the churches.

3.3. The Epistles of Ignatius. In his letters* Ignatius* is at pains to bring the Christians of Asia under the authority of their leaders. His letters include many clear references to the three orders of ministry: bishops, presbyters and deacons. Some of each are mentioned by name (Ign. Eph. 1.3; 2.1; Ign. Magn. 2.1; 15.1; Ign. Trall. 1.1; Ign. Phld. 11.1; Ign. Smyrn. 10.1). The bishop appears as the leader of the Christian community in a given city (Ign. Magn. 15.1; Ign. Trall. int.; 1.1; Ign. Phld. presc.; 1.1). Believers are exhorted to live in harmony with their bishops and presbyters (Ign. Eph. 4.1; Ign. Magn. 6.1-2; 7.1), who provide an example for them to follow (Ign. Eph. 1.3; Ign. Magn. 6.2). Believers must, with their bishop, come to the unity of the church (Ign. Phld. 3.1; 8.1). They are to be subject to the bishop as to God and to the presbyters as to the apostles, for the bishop presides in the place of God and the presbyters in the place of the council of the apostles (Ign. Eph. 2.2; 6.1; 20.3; Ign. Magn. 2.1; 3.1; 6.1-2; 13.2; Ign. Trall. 2.1-2; 3.1; 13.2; Ign. Phld. 7.1; Ign. Smyrn. 8.1; Ign. Pol. 6.1). Believers are to remain loyal to the bishop and "do nothing" without him and the presbyters and deacons (Ign. Magn. 7.1; Ign. Trall. 7.1-2; Ign. Phld. 7.2; Ign. Smyrn. 9.1).

When a bishop is youthful people should not take advantage of that but submit to him, yet not to him but to the Father of Jesus Christ who is the bishop of all (Ign. Magn. 3.1). Those who honor the bishop are honored by God (Ign. Smyrn. 9.1). The prayer of the bishop and the whole church (in the eucharist) is powerful (Ign. Eph. 5.2). In each church there was one bishop with the presbytery and the deacons (Ign. Phld. 4.1). Deacons must be in every way pleasing to all, for they are not only ministers of food and drink but servants of the church of God (Ign. Trall. 2.3). They are entrusted with the service of Jesus Christ (Ign. Magn. 6.1), and they must be respected as Jesus Christ (Ign. Trall. 3.1) and as the command of God (Ign. Smyrn. 8.1). Deacons could be sent as ambassadors from one church to another (Ign. Phld. 10.1).

3.4. Polycarp. Polycarp* wrote the Philippians a letter of exhortation in which he urged the deacons to be blameless in their conduct (Pol. Phil. 5.2) and believers to be subject to the presbyters and deacons as to God and Christ (Pol. Phil. 5.3). Presbyters were exhorted to be compassionate to all, restoring those who wander and caring for the weak, in particular widows and orphans (Pol. Phil. 6.1).

3.6. The Shepherd of Hermas. This document, commonly understood to be primarily concerned with postbaptismal sin and repentance, has in recent times been seen to be concerned more with the preservation of the purity* of the Christian community. This it seeks to do by inculcating proper attitudes toward the use of wealth (Maier). Corrupt deacons who receive goods to assist widows and orphans and devour them themselves are given warnings (Herm. Sim. 9.26.2). Contrasted are bishops who ceaselessly shelter the destitute and receive the servants of God into their houses gladly (Herm. Sim. 9.27.2).

The *Shepherd of Hermas contains numerous other references to Christian leaders. Hermas saw in a vision a building with square white stones representing apostles, bishops, teachers and deacons, all of whom agreed among themselves and some of whom had died (Herm. Vis. 3.5.1). In the ninth similitude forty stones represent the prophets and teachers of the preaching of the Son of God (Herm. Sim. 9.15.4) and apostles and teachers who, having preached the name of the Son of God, fell asleep and then preached to those who had fallen asleep before them (Herm. Sim. 9.16.5; cf. Herm. Sim. 9.25.2). The eleventh mandate reflects a time when the charismatic ministry of genuine prophets was highly regarded. The Shepherd instructs Hermas how to distinguish between genuine and false prophets: genuine prophets are godly in behavior and give no answers to those who ask but speak only when God wishes them to speak: when they are filled with the Holy Spirit. False prophets are shameless and talkative, live in luxury and prophesy only if paid to do so, something genuine prophets do not do. When genuine prophets enter assemblies of righteous men who make intercession, they are filled with the Holy Spirit and speak to the congregations as the Lord wills. But when false prophets enter such assemblies and intercession is made, they become dumb and have nothing to say (Herm. Man. 11.7-15).

See also APOSTLE, APOSTLESHIP; AUTHORITY; CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE; PASTORAL THEOLOGY; PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS; SERVANT, SERVICE; TEACHING, PARAENESIS; WOMEN IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Bartlett, Ministry in the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (London: A. & C. Black, 1969); J. N. Collins, Diakonia: Reinterpreting the Ancient Sources (New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990); E. E. Ellis, "The Role of the Christian Prophet in Acts" in Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays, ed. W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (Exeter: Paternoster, 1970) 55-67; K. Giles, Patterns of Ministry Among the First Christians (Melbourne: Collins Dove, 1989); A. T. Hanson, The Pioneer Ministry (London: SCM, 1961); A. E. Harvey, "Elders," JTS 25 (1974) 318-32; A. Lemaire, "From Services to Ministries: Diakonia in the First Two Centuries," Concilium 10 (1972) 35-49; idem, "The Ministries in the New Testament: Recent Research," BTB 3 (1973) 133-66; idem, Ministry in the Church (London: SPCK, 1977); J. B. Lightfoot, "The Christian Ministry" in Saint Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (London: MacMillan, 1898) 181-269; H. O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University, 1991); R. P. Martin, The Family and the Fellowship: New Testament Images of the Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979); E. Schillebeeckx, Ministry: A Case for Change (London: SCM, 1981); W. Schmithals, The Office of Apostle in the Early Church (London: SPCK, 1971); E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1961); C. Trevett, "The Much-maligned Ignatius," ExpT 93 (1981) 299-302. C. G. Kruse

MIRACLES IN ACTS

Miracles, or divine interventions in the observed order of human events, are part of most biblical narratives. Acts* contains twenty to twenty-five miracle stories, the latter figure including five summary statements referring to the working of multiple miracles. These stories serve to point to divine activity and to authenticate the teaching and mission of the divinely authorized agent. While the healing miracles are in continuity with the miracles of Jesus in the Gospel, they reflect an independent tradition; there are also a number of miracles unique to Acts, such as miraculous releases from prison, transportation and especially judgment.*

1. Miracle Story Evidence
2. Critical Assessment of the Miracle Stories
3. Paul as a Miracle Worker
4. Judgment Miracles
5. Function of Miracle Stories

1. Miracle Story Evidence.

The miracles in Acts continue the miracle narratives in Luke. However, along with the similarities there are significant differences. Healing miracles are more prominent in Luke, while protection or deliverance miracles are more prominent in Acts. Yet both works have miracles in each of the categories described below (see 1.2-4 below), which makes Luke-Acts different from the other Gospels (i.e., none of the others have judgment miracles, except the cursing of the fig tree, while John is the only other Gospel with clear miracles of deliverance or protection).

When we examine the miracles in Acts we will divide them into four groups, combining exorcism and raising of the dead with healing miracles (Neirynck, 170-71, uses seven groups; Hardon, 303-5, uses five groups). To this we could add a fifth type of miracle, that of the ascension* (Acts 1:9-11; so also Hardon), which is presented as a significant event of salvation history and is thus in a class apart from the other miracles.

1.1. Miracles of Inspiration. The most prominent miracle of inspiration is Pentecost* (Acts 2:1-13), although one could group with this other references to glossolalia or prophecy* (Acts 10; 19) as well as references to Peter, Paul or others laying hands on people and the Holy Spirit* coming upon them (which appears to include some experiential component) and to guidance by visions,* angels* or God's* Spirit. Many writers would not count any of these experiences among the miracles in Acts in that no physical phenomena are involved (e.g., Gen, 4, 6), while others would count Pentecost since it involved observable phenomena but not the miracles of guidance (e.g., Praeder, 108). Yet surely these distinctions are modern, not those of the author of Acts. For him all of these events are part of his evidence that God through his Spirit was directing and empowering the mission of the church* (Stronstad, 49-74).

1.2. Miracles of Healing. The healing miracles (including the summary statements) are common enough that they can be best presented in a table:

Reference	Miracle	Agent	Result
Acts 2:43	Summary	Apostles	evangelization (in context)
Acts 3:1-10	Lame man healed	Peter (and John)	evangelization
Acts 5:12-16	Summary	Apostles/ Peter	evangelization/high regard
Acts 6:8	Summary	Stephen	hostility
Acts 8:4-8	Summary	Philip	evangelization
Acts 9:10-19/ Acts 22:12-16	Blind receives sight	Ananias	evangelization
Acts 9:32-35	Paralytic healed	Peter	evangelization
Acts 9:36-43	Dead woman raised	Peter	evangelization
Acts 14:3	Summary	Paul and Barnabas	evangelization/division
Acts 14:8-18	Lame man healed	Paul	high regard
Acts 15:12	Summary	Paul and Barnabas	context of evangelistic report
Acts 16:16-24	Spirit exorcised	Paul	hostile attack
Acts 19:11-12	Summary	Paul	evangelization/high regard
Acts 20:7-12	Dead man raised	Paul	comfort
Acts 28:7-10	Man with fever healed	Paul	high regard

What one notes is that these miracles, dealing with diseases stemming from both spiritual and nonspiritual causes, concern a variety of anatomical regions (although not as wide a variety as in Luke, possibly indicating real if limited results of redemption*; Pilch), and these miracles are normally connected to an evangelistic result or at least a rise in the status of the miracle workers (Praeder, 113-14).

1.3. Miracles of Protection or Deliverance. Each of the miracles of protection or deliverance in some way extricates a person from danger or difficulty, allowing him to get on with the work of evangelization. While many scholars do not count Paul's deliverance from the shipwreck as a miracle, Acts announces it as divine deliverance (Acts 27:23-24), and so it appears miraculous from Luke's perspective. Furthermore, the survival of Paul from stoning could also be grouped with healing miracles (similar to the raising of Eutychus); what it shares with the protection or deliverance miracles is the absence of a named agent.

Reference	Miracle	Subject	Result
Acts 5:17-21 (26)	release from prison	Apostles	preaching
Acts 8:39	man transported	Philip	preaching
Acts 12:1-19	release from prison	Peter	fear ?
Acts 14:19-20	Paul survives stoning	Paul	continues mission
Acts 16:16-24	release from prison	Paul and Silas	evangelization
Acts 27:13-44	deliverance from shipwreck	Paul	effect on sailors
Acts 28:1-6	deliverance from snakebite	Paul	high regard

1.4. Miracles of Judgment. The miracles of judgment are the most unusual miracles in Acts. These appear to be the opposite of the salvation or healing miracles. There is some question as to whether to include among these miracles Paul's being blinded on the Damascus Road (see 4 below).

Reference	Miracle	Agent	Result
Acts 5:1-11	Couple dies	Peter	fear
Acts 9:1-9/ Acts 22:6-11	Paul blinded?	Jesus	conversion/call
Acts 12:19-24	Herod dies	Angel of the Lord	Word of God increases
Acts 13:6-12	Bar-Jesus blinded	Paul	evangelization

2. Critical Assessment of the Miracle Stories. The modern criticism of the miracle stories in Acts began with the Tendenzkritik of the past century pointing out that in Acts, Peter and Paul work similar miracles. This led to F. C. Baur's assertion that Luke had deliberately modeled Paul on Peter to equate the two. In a related development B. Bauer, building on the work of others, argued that miracle stories about Jesus were the original out of which both Peter's and Paul's miracles were built. The significance of this issue of the Jesus-Peter-Paul parallelism became a much discussed topic in further critical works.

A second approach to the miracles, developing in the nineteenth century, was that of source criticism. Scholars such as E. Zeller and A. von Harnack viewed the miracles not as Luke's creation but as stemming from his sources. Usually the sources included a Petrine source for Peter's miracles (often viewed as legendary) and the "we" source for Paul's (sometimes viewed as historical). Without the controls found in Synoptic source criticism, no firm conclusions have resulted from this research.

With the coming of the twentieth century, Martin Dibelius and Rudolf Bultmann pioneered the form-critical approach to the miracles in Acts, classifying them similarly to the Gospel pericopae (Conzelmann, 25; see DJG, Form Criticism). However, more recent criticism (J. Roloff and S. H. Kanda) has pointed to the differences between the miracles in Acts and the miracles of Jesus, particularly in the use of prayer* and the divine name,* and thus views them as similar to Jewish miracles (Neirynck, 172-202). The most recent research has focused on the function of miracles in the Lukan redaction (see 5 below).

The present critical consensus is that the miracles in Acts are rarely if ever directly built upon the miracles in Luke's Gospel (although this does not deny influence) but instead stem from independent tradition available to Luke (Praeder, 120; Schreiber, 140-43; Conzelmann, 25, 76, 164). There are in fact few verbal or structural parallels with Gospel miracles other than the essential terms needed to describe a given type of healing.* The historical validity of the underlying tradition is variously evaluated, as is the degree to which Luke may have embellished it for theological reasons. What is clear is that the miracle summaries are Lukan, although they too may indicate his knowledge of a tradition of miracle working by Peter, Paul, Stephen* and others.

3. Paul as a Miracle Worker.

The critical discussion of the miracle stories in Acts pointed out as a major issue the portrait of Paul. There is no question that Paul in Acts is said to work miracles. Five miracle narratives (including one judgment miracle) and three summary statements present Paul as a charismatic wonderworker. Does not this picture of Paul stand at odds with Paul's self-presentation as "weak"? Could it be that this picture of Paul is a deliberate attempt to parallel Paul to Peter? Or is Paul being presented as a theios anēr (divine man)?

Five observations have been made about this issue. First, given that there was no unified "divine man" ideal in the ancient world, the use of the term theios anēr is itself problematic. Furthermore, the evidence usually cited points to persons who were viewed as having power in themselves and thus as revealing their own status through their wonders. Paul's miracles are normally connected to his message, and this message is about someone other than he, that is, Jesus or God, who is said to be the real power working the wonder (Adams, 247-52).

Second, while Paul is undoubtedly a miracle worker in Acts, his miracles are spread thinly over his ministry. Two are at the beginning of his first missionary journey (including the judgment miracle), one in the second missionary journey and one in the third. The final miracle is an incidental event after the final shipwreck. One can hardly say that the miracle stories are a major part of the picture of Paul. Only the miracle summaries give that impression.

Third, there is no reference to the miracles in the speeches of Paul, which is not true of the speeches of Peter (miracles form the basis for at least three of them). Thus miracles function differently in relation to Paul than they do in relation to Peter. With Peter they initiate evangelism* and are a theme of his preaching while with Paul they only accompany evangelism.

Fourth, Paul's letters also refer to Paul as a miracle worker. Twice he uses the vocabulary of the Lukan summaries and notes that "signs and wonders"* were worked through him, which he identifies as the "signs of an apostle" (2 Cor 12:12; Rom 15:19). Elsewhere he makes passing reference to miracles having accompanied his ministry (1 Cor 2:4; 1 Thess 1:5; Gal 3:1-4). Therefore the Lukan summaries do not differ significantly from Paul's self-presentation of the presence of the role of the miraculous in his ministry.

Fifth, Acts does have a suffering Paul. He is chased from Damascus and Jerusalem* (the former of which incidents he viewed as showing "weakness," 2 Cor 11:30-33). Later he was forced out of the various cities of his first missionary journey, being stoned in one of them. Much the same could be said for his second missionary journey. His third journey ends with Paul imprisoned for two years. On his way to Rome* he experiences a storm at sea and a shipwreck. Acts ends with Paul still a prisoner. What becomes clear in Acts is that while there are miracles of deliverance, the miracles are not about Paul. They are about the gospel. Nothing stops Paul (or Peter) from presenting the gospel, flight and rejection serving to continue its spread. And even when the doors of the prison are shaken open, the main result is evangelization, for it is by political means rather than the miracle that Paul eventually leaves the prison. Luke's triumph is a triumph of God, not of Paul.

Given that the Pauline letters* are occasional letters and thus do not discuss the whole of Paul's theology and given the preceding data, it is arguable that Paul's self-presentation is compatible with Luke's perspective on the triumph of the gospel through Paul (so Jervell, Praeder).

4. Judgment Miracles.

Acts reports at least three and possibly five judgment miracles. The deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, the death of Herod and the blinding of Bar-Jesus clearly fall in this category. There is debate as to whether the blinding of Paul is an act of judgment. Some interpreters view this as a judgment on Paul, while others view it as a natural result of the encounter with a divine epiphany. If it is judgment, we have a fourth judgment miracle; if it is not then we have a healing after an "accident." The fifth possible judgment miracle is the storm at sea culminating in the shipwreck, which Luke presents as the result of not heeding Paul's advice (Acts 27:9-10, 21-26); however, in this case divine intervention is indicated only as the cause of deliverance, not as the cause of the storm.

Judgment miracles are not unique to Acts, since one, the muting of Zechariah, is included in Luke (Lk 1:19-22, 62-65). However, this is the only judgment miracle in the Gospels (other than the cursing of the fig tree, which concerns an object rather than a person). Thus we can conclude that judgment miracles are part of Lukan theology, continuing OT precedents. For instance, F. F. Bruce (102) has noted that the judgment of Ananias and Sapphira functions similarly to the judgment on Achan in Joshua in that the community is warned against ignoring the presence of God in their midst. In all of the judgment stories someone is ignoring or opposing the activity of God. The results may be temporary (Zechariah, Paul, Bar-Jesus) or permanent (Ananias and Sapphira, Herod), but in each case God intervenes to stop the opposition and demonstrate his presence.

The function of judgment miracles, therefore, is similar to the function of healing miracles. Each of them results in either fear (i.e., awe in the face of God's action) or evangelization (conversion of Paul, spread of the Word, conversion of Sergius Paulus). Thus God is attributed a higher status (fear) or more people submit to him. His presence and his teaching have been authenticated, even though the process was a negative one (Gen). They also prefigure the final judgment, which Acts warns about on more than one occasion (Acts 2:40; 10:42; 17:30-31).

A function of one of the judgment miracles (Acts 13:6-12) is to differentiate miracle from magic.* It is clear that historically magic was a polemic term that identified the person or activity so designated as socially or religiously unacceptable (Garrett 1989, 11-17, 31-32). Ethnographically, however, magic indicates the attempt to manipulate the world through the use of divine powers.* This manipulation may take place through the use of a term of power or an incantation or other means at the disposal of the magician (Adams, 241-44).

Both of these types of definitions reveal aspects of Luke's methodology. Elymas Bar-Jesus and Simon Magus are both pictured as magicians, thus individuals with a source of power other than God in Jesus. Both meet their match in Paul and Peter, with a shaming of the alternative powers through a judgment miracle (the blinding of Elymas) and a miracle of inspiration (the giving of the Holy Spirit through Peter) respectively. This contest with magic is carried out most fully by Paul in Acts 19, where he exhibits "extraordinary" power, while Jewish exorcists get only shame in trying to usurp that power. The result is that the Ephesian believers forsake magic (burning their books; Fiorenza, 8-16; Conzelmann, 163). This contrast with magic is a subtheme of the contrast between the God and pagan deities found in several places in Acts (e.g., Acts 14; 17; 19).

In that all of the miracles are referred to God's power rather than to power resident in the miracle worker and in that technique goes almost unmentioned (other than in the references to Paul's "handkerchiefs," Tobin, 278); there is also a deliberate, unannounced contrast between magic and miracle (although clear to anyone involved in magic). Miracle is not about technique or influencing God but about God's sovereign activity in spreading the gospel. Thus when Simon Magus wants to purchase Peter's "secret" he is rebuked, for his magical mindset is inimical to what Peter is about.

The contrast with magic is most clearly seen in the miracles of protection or deliverance, for none of them are brought about by the person they benefit. The various apostles* appear surprised upon being released from prison. And when Paul is stoned or bitten by a snake we do not learn of anything that he does to heal himself. In the shipwreck incident, far from being in control, he appears to need encouragement himself. When combined with the fact that Stephen and James are not delivered, these miracles reveal a power of God that is not under the control of God's agents but that sometimes works through those agents.

5. Function of Miracle Stories.

We have already mentioned the function of the miracle stories in Acts as part of the Christian apologetic that contrasted the divine miracles of Jesus and the apostles with the magic of the Jewish and Hellenistic worlds (Fiorenza). Beyond this function, the miracles also serve as indicators of divine intervention in the world. There are two types of direct statements concerning divine intervention in Acts: statements concerning God's intervention in creation,* Israel's* history, the life of Jesus and (more rarely) the eschatological* future, all of which have miraculous aspects but are outside the narrative context, and statements concerning God's intervention in the narrative, both in terms of miracles of inspiration and in terms of signs and wonders (Mowery). In other words, it is through the miraculous, including the advent of the Spirit (which is often said to be the force behind the miracles), that God becomes the most important actor in Acts. Peter and Paul are visible on the stage but only as agents for God, Jesus or the Spirit.

This is Luke's reason why the gospel advances as it does. The various messengers are sent out by the Holy Spirit and directed by the Spirit as they are under way. When the gospel encounters obstacles, God overcomes them so that it is not stopped. This is the message behind the judgment miracles: someone has opposed God, and God will not be stopped. In these miracles God may act without a human agent (as in the case of Herod) or speak through a human agent (as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, where divine revelation of the deceit comes through Peter), yet whatever the means God is more to the fore than in the healing miracles. This is also the message behind the nondeliverance of Stephen (indeed, his vision—that is, divine intervention—triggers his death) and James and the deliverance of the apostles Peter and Paul on other occasions. Stephen dies, and the gospel spreads as the church scatters. Paul is sent on mission, and chasing him out of town only spreads the gospel further. Even stoning the messenger cannot stop the progress of the gospel. Put him in prison and the power of God converts the jailer. A storm at sea only serves to move him further toward Rome, for it was God who said that Paul would go to Rome. While the church does pray for Peter (we are not told if it was for his deliverance), in none of these cases are we told that a miracle is requested. God appears to decide whether to spread the gospel through a martyrdom* or a miracle. Thus again the most important actor in Acts is God (Barrett, 277).

Related to God's central role is the function of miracles to authenticate the gospel message. According to Acts, Jesus was attested by signs and wonders (Acts 2:22), so it is no surprise when the apostles ask God to stretch out his hand to attest to their message through signs and wonders "through the name of your holy servant Jesus" (Acts 4:30). As the charts demonstrate (see 1.2-4 above), the various miraculous events are connected to evangelization either through a rise in the status of the messenger or through direct evangelistic effect. Peter's first miracle (and the one reported in the most detail) is accomplished not by Peter's skill (magic) but through faith in Jesus, for God has chosen to glorify Jesus (Acts 3:13,16; 4:10). The miracle is the evidence that the message about the resurrected Jesus is true. Without the message, the miracle is at best an equivocal communication. In Acts 14 a miracle is misinterpreted (even though "faith to be healed" was present), and it is only with difficulty that the apostles can communicate enough of the truth to prevent pagan sacrifice.* The miracle then is God's authentication of the message and the messenger.

Another function of the miracles stories in Acts is to advance the Lukan theology of salvation.* In Acts 3:1-10 the healing of the lame man parallels the offer of salvation in the following two speeches. Thus at the time of prayer the lame man outside the temple* is healed ("saved"; the verb sōzō is used) through the power of Jesus mediated through the apostles. The man then enters and leaps about in the temple illustrating the fulfillment of salvation-historical hope (cf. Is 35:6). Along with the formerly lame man, the offer of salvation comes through the apostles to the people in the temple, presenting to them the fulfillment of salvation history in Jesus (Hamm, without endorsing everything he sees in the text). This serves as a grid through which to read the other miracles in Acts as limited outward demonstrations of eschatological salvation.

Finally, miracles serve to tie NT and OT salvation history together. We have already mentioned that the story of Ananias and Sapphira reminds one of the story of Achan in Joshua. That parallel (judgment among the people of God as they are taking a new promised land* [the whole world]) shows the salvation-historical continuity Luke demonstrates other ways. In the healing of the two mobility-challenged men, the salvation-historical hope of Isaiah 35:4 comes to the fore. Thus the OT and its hope is mirrored in the Lukan context. Salvation history is also seen in the parallels with Jesus. As Jesus drove out demons, so the disciples in Acts continue his conflict with Satan,* driving out demons. As Jesus healed, so the disciples healed. They advance the new eon begun in Jesus. Yet they do not act exactly like Jesus, for Luke is conscious of his uniqueness. Jesus acted sovereignly, while the disciples act in his name or through the power of the Spirit he promised. In other words their miracles point back to the Lord (and at times to the promise of his eschatological return), for it is Jesus who is and remains the real miracle worker even in Acts.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; HEALING, ILLNESS; SIGNS AND WONDERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. M. Adams, "The Role of Miracles in the Structure of Luke-Acts" in Hermes and Athena: Biblical Exegesis and Philosophical Theology, ed. E. Stump and T. P. Flint (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame, 1993) 235-72; C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); H. Conzemann, Acts of the Apostles (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); J. C. Fenton, "The Order of the Miracles Performed by Peter and Paul in Acts," ExpT 77 (1966) 381-83; E. Schüssler Fiorenza, "Miracles, Mission and Apologetics: An Introduction" in Aspects of Religious Propaganda in Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. E. S. Fiorenza (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame, 1976) 1-25; J. M. Ford, "The Social and Political Implications of the Miraculous in Acts" in Faces of Renewal: Studies in Honor of Stanley M. Horton Presented on his Seventieth Birthday, ed. P. Elbert (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988) 137-60; S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); idem, "Light on a Dark Subject and Vice Versa: Magic and Magicians in the New Testament" in Religion, Science and Magic: In Concert and in Conflict, ed. J. Neusner (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992 [1989]) 142-65; R. M. Gen, "The Phenomena of Miracles and Divine Infliction in Luke-Acts: Their Theological Significance," Pneuma 11 (1989) 3-19; D. Hamm, "Acts 3:1-10: The Healing of the Temple Beggar as Lukan Theology," Bib 67.3 (1986) 305-19; J. A. Hardon, "Miracle Narratives in the Acts of the Apostles," CBQ 16 (1954) 303-18; P. W. van der Horst, "Peter's Shadow," NTS 23 (1977) 204-12; J. Jervell, "The Signs of an Apostle: Paul's Miracles" in The Unknown Paul: Essays on Luke-Acts and Early Christian History (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984) 77-95; R. L. Mowery, "Direct Statements Concerning God's Activity in Acts" in SBLSP 29 (1990) 196-211; F. Neirynck, "The Miracle Stories in the Acts of the Apostles: An Introduction" in Les Actes des Apôtres, ed. J. Kremer (Gembloux: J. Duculot, 1979) 169-213; L. O'Reilly, Word and Sign in the Acts of the Apostles:

A Study in Lukan Theology (Analecta Gregoriana 243.82; Rome: Editrice Pontificia Universita Gregoriana, 1987); J. J. Pilch, "Sickness and Healing in Luke-Acts" in The Social World of Luke-Acts, ed. J. H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 181-209; S. M. Praeder, "Miracle Worker and Missionary: Paul in the Acts of the Apostles" in SBLSP 22 (1983) 107-29; R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistische Wundererzählungen (3d ed.; Stuttgart: B. G. Teubner, 1974); S. Schreiber, Paulus als Wundertäter (BZNW 79; Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1996); R. Stronstad, The Charismatic Theology of St. Luke (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1984); T. H. Tobin, "Miracles, Magic and Modernity: Comments on the Paper of Marilyn McCord Adams" in Hermes and Athena: Biblical Exegesis and Philosophical Theology, ed. E. Stump and T. P. Flint (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame, 1993) 275-81; M. Turner, "The Spirit and the Power of Jesus' Miracles in the Lukan Conception," NovT 33 (1991) 124-52. P. H. Davids

MISHNAH. See JUDAISM, POST-A.D. 70.

MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE

On the morning of Pentecost in the year A.D. 30, seven weeks after Jesus' death and resurrection, we read of 120 followers of Jesus constituting the first community of believers (Acts 1:15). There also may have been sympathizers meeting in small communities in Galilee (cf. perhaps 1 Cor 15:6). We do not know the number of Christians in the Roman Empire at the time the "evangelists" wrote the canonical Gospels and John wrote Revelation. Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia-Pontus (c. A.D. 110), complains to Trajan about the aggressive expansion of the repulsive "superstition" to which the crucifixion had given rise as people of every age and social standing were affected by it, even in villages and the countryside (Pliny Ep. 10.96.8-10; cf. Hengel 1983, 48). How was it possible that religious convictions inseparably linked with the Jewish faith came to be accepted by increasing numbers of non-Jews? (See DJG, Gentiles; DPL, Mission.)

1. The Early Christian Mission and Jesus
2. Vision, Strategy and Methods
3. Mission in Acts
4. Mission in the Letter to the Hebrews
5. Mission in the General Epistles
6. Mission in the Revelation
7. Mission in the Early Noncanonical Writings

1. The Early Christian Mission and Jesus. The early Christian mission cannot be understood without the person, the ministry, the death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection,* and the commission of Jesus. If the early Christians had not believed Jesus to be the Messiah, they would have had no reason whatsoever to talk about Jesus' death and resurrection as the event by which evil was once for all defeated, or to believe that the fate of their Galilean teacher should be of significance for pagans.

1.1. The Call to Be Fishers of People. The apostles* (Lk 6:14-16; Acts 1:13) had been called by Jesus to be "fishers of people" (Mk 1:17 par. Mt 4:19; cf. Lk 5:10), that is, to participate in his mission of rescuing the lost by devoting their entire energies ("leaving their nets") to get people to repent and recognize the presence of God's* reign. The aspects of the verbs in Mark 1:17 and its parallels imply a promise and prediction: the vocation of the Servant of Yahweh to be the light of the world, realized in his redemptive suffering* (Is 40—55), would come true in his own ministry, climaxing in his death on the cross (Mk 8:31-18 par. Mt 16:21-27 par. Lk 9:22-26), and then in the ministry of his followers, who would regroup after his vindication (Wright, 610). The Twelve, symbolizing the reconstitution of the people of God (redefined in terms of allegiance to Jesus rather than to the old national symbols of Israel), were called and prepared by Jesus for their future missionary task (see DJG, Gentiles).

1.2. The Mission to Jews. The observation of Jesus' own ministry of proclamation and healing* among his Jewish contemporaries prepared his followers for an initial itinerant ministry in Galilee with the injunction to work among the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6), as well as for the later commission (Acts 1:8) to a worldwide mission starting in Jerusalem* (Acts 2—7) and continuing in Judea and Samaria* (Acts 8—9). The praxis of the apostle Paul demonstrates that even the most prominent missionary to the Gentiles* went first to the Jews and then to the non-Jews (cf. Rom 1:16; Acts 9:15) on account of the special applicability of God's promise* to his chosen people. The first Christian missionaries were Jews, the first churches* were Jewish Christian communities (Jerusalem, Damascus, Antioch*). Most if not all the churches that were established in Asia Minor, Greece and Italy started with Jews being converted to faith* in Jesus. As the followers of Jesus accomplished the task of proclaiming the Good News, they could not exclude their fellow Jews.

1.3. The Mission to Gentiles. The early Christian mission to non-Jews was not an innovation introduced by Paul from Tarsus (thus Hengel 1979, 93-98; 1995, 36). The "Gentile factor" has its roots in the teaching and ministry of Jesus (see DJG, Gentiles §2; Schnabel). Jesus' proclamation of the fulfillment of time and the appearance of God's kingdom (Mk 1:14-15; Mt 4:17; see Kingdom of God), an announcement that belongs to Jesus' commission to the disciples as well (Mt 10:7 par. Lk 10:9), was bound to encompass the world on the basis of promises and expectations such as Isaiah 2:2-5 (= Mic 4:1-5), Isaiah 49:1-6 and Zechariah 8:20-23. Thus he challenged the true Israel to be light of the world and salt of the earth (Mt 5:13-16).

In his praxis Jesus ministered occasionally to Gentiles who sought him out (Mk 5:1-20; 7:24-30; Mt 8:5-13; Jn 12:20-22; cf. Jn 4:1-42). He announced that Gentiles would share in the blessings* of the kingdom (Mt 8:11-12 par. Lk 13:28-29) and that the consummation would not occur until the gospel of the kingdom had been preached in the entire oikoumenē ("inhabited world") to "all nations" (Mt 24:14), thereby predicting the necessity of worldwide evangelism* (Mk 13:10). After his victory on the cross and his vindication in the resurrection, he commanded the eleven disciples to go to the "end of the earth" (Acts 1:8) and make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:19; cf. the commission to Paul, Acts 9:15; 26:15-18).

The following observations confirm the view that the apostolic Gentile mission has its roots in Jesus' word and praxis. (1) If Jesus foresaw his rejection at the hands of the Jewish leaders ensconced in the temple,* it is not impossible to assume that he replaced the OT expectation of the nations streaming to the temple with a mission that would actively take the messianic salvation* to the nations. (2) If Jesus expected to die and then be raised from the dead, it would be natural for him to leave his messianic mission to his disciples. (3) Jesus' teaching suggests both that God's rule has taken effect among his disciples and that it has not yet taken full effect in the world at large, thus implying a period of worldwide evangelism. (4) There was no debate in the early church over the Gentile mission as such, only a discussion about the status of the converted Gentiles and their relations to the converted Jews, and there was no discussion whether they should wait for the nations to stream to Jerusalem at the consummation.

As the followers of Jesus proclaim the Good News, they cannot limit themselves to Israel; as the eschatological* messianic salvation has dawned, the nations worldwide are now invited into the kingdom of God.

1.4. Reaching Both Villages and Cities. References to Jesus' geographical movement in Mark 6:6 (periēgen . . . kyklō), 9, 35 and Luke 4:43 might be taken to indicate that he planned his travels in an organized manner. As the early church engaged in mission it would have been challenged by the example of Jesus to reach all people of a region whether they lived in cities, in villages or in small hamlets.

1.5. Reaching All Kinds of People. As Jesus proclaimed his message to the simple and the sophisticated, to powerless Galileans and to influential leaders of the Jerusalem establishment, to people with bad reputations and to the pious, comparing the arriving kingdom of God with a dragnet in which fish "of all kinds" get caught (Mt 13:47), the early Christian missionaries who had practiced "following Jesus" were confronted with the task of reaching everybody prepared to listen to them, irrespective of traditional, social or religious barriers.

2. Vision, Strategy and Methods.

As Jesus' announcement of the arrival of God's kingdom was accompanied by a redefinition of what the kingdom meant, with the symbols of Israel's identity either missing (circumcision, sabbath, food) or transformed (nation, land, Torah, Temple; Wright 1996, 369-442,467-72), the traditional vision of nations coming to Jerusalem (Is 2:2-5 par. Mic 4:1-5; Zech 8:20-23) was replaced by the reality of Christian missionaries going to the nations. The anticipated movement from the periphery to the center is redirected to a mission from the center (Jerusalem, where Jesus had died and was raised from the dead) toward the periphery (the ends of the earth). An essentially stationary model of communication—God reveals himself on Zion, Gentiles are attracted to Israel and become proselytes, nations flock to Jerusalem—is transformed into a fundamentally mobile pattern of communication: Christians carry their convictions from Jerusalem to Damascus and Antioch, to Athens and Corinth, to Ephesus and Rome.*

The basic missionary strategy was to win as many people as possible for Christ* before his expected return and to do this "in the whole world" (en panti tō kosmō, Col 1:6).

2.1. Reaching All Nations. If the Twelve were indeed commanded by the risen Lord* to reach all nations (panta ta ethnē, Mt 28:19) even unto the "end of the earth" (heōs eschatou tēs gēs, Acts 1:8) with the good news of God's salvific revelation* in Jesus the Messiah and invite them to become his followers, and if they took this commission seriously, the question arises as to how they might have perceived their task.

The apostles could have thought of the "nations" (ethnē) of the world, including Israel (cf. LXX), in terms of "all the nations" in distinction from the nation Israel (cf. Pss. Sol. 9:9) or in terms of the individual "Gentiles" or non-Jews (cf. 4 Bar. 6:19). A messianic mission to "all the nations" would remind the apostles, in terms of geography and ethnography, of the table of nations in Genesis 10 and its continuing significance as the "Jewish" description of the world (cf. Scott 1994, 492-522; Scott 1995, 5-56). That their geographical horizon was not limited to the Roman Empire* is demonstrated by the evidence in Acts* that mentions regions independent of Rome: Parthia (Acts 2:9) in the east and Ethiopia (Acts 8:27) in the south. As regards a feasible policy to fulfill the Great Commission, the apostles would have thought in terms of specific nations or "tribes" or, from a political perspective, in terms of Roman provinces (cf. Rom 16:4 with Gal 1:2; 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Cor 8:1; Gal 1:22).

An exclusively biblical-Jewish outlook might interpret the phrase "end of the earth" in terms of the extent of the Jewish Diaspora (cf. Acts 2:9-11), whereas a wider perspective would extend the geographical horizons to the furthest points on the edge of the inhabited world: the Indians in the east (or even the Seres, the "silk people" further east, as the Periplous Maris Erythraei of the first century A.D. reflects existing commercial contacts with China?), the Scythians in the north, the Germani at the Atlantic in the west (or Britannia, known to the Mediterranean world from at least the third century B.C. and annexed by Claudius in A.D. 43?) and the Ethiopians in the south (Homer Odys. 1.23 calls the "distant Ethiopians" "people at the edge [of the earth]"; cf. Herodotus 3.25.114). The singular eschatos (tēs gēs) in Acts 1:8 should not be understood in terms of a single goal of the disciples' mission (pace Ellis, who thinks of Spain); it affirms that there is no spatial limit to their mission.

It appears that the early Christians had the broader perspective: for the Scythians see Colossians 3:11 (Michel, 7:449-50, seems to assume a converted Scythian in the Colossian church); for Spain see Romans 15:24, 28; for Ethiopia see Acts 8:27-39. India is not mentioned in the NT (but is referred to in Esther 1:1 [LXX] passim; 1 Macc 6:38). Would such a perspective mean that the apostles planned to travel to all territories known at that time? Considering the audacious courage of at least some of the apostles, this possibility should not be discarded. Intriguing are the later traditions that speak of missions to India, Scythia and Ethiopia (see 2.8 below).

J. M. Scott has advanced the thesis that according to the evidence in Acts and in Paul's letters the early Christians had a missionary policy based on the table of nations. The apostles seem to have decided on territorial jurisdictions in their respective missions drawn along the lines of the sons of Noah (which Luke supposedly adopts in the literary structure of Acts): Peter was responsible for the mission to "Shem" (Acts 2:1—8:25), Philip* is involved in the mission to "Ham" (Acts 8:26-40), Paul is responsible for the mission to "Japheth" (Acts 9:1—28:31; Scott 1994, 522-44; 1995, 135-80). This proposal seems convincing from a tradition-historical point of view, and it illuminates various aspects of Paul's travels, although it is impossible to verify whether Paul consulted the table of nations tradition when making tactical decisions. His responsiveness to divine guidance seems to point to a high degree of flexibility, and Scott's view that an infringement of Peter and the "men of James" on Japhetite territory (Gal 2:11-14) caused Paul's strong reaction is doubtful. The dispute was not about territorial jurisdiction but about proper relations between converted pagans and messianic Jews.

R. Riesner suggested a different OT background for Paul's mission strategy. As Paul regarded himself part of the eschatological missionary enterprise to the nations portrayed in Isaiah, it is perhaps no coincidence that the movement in Isaiah 66:19, beginning in Tarshish (Tarsus) and turning in a northwest semicircle to Javan (Greece) and the "distant islands," corresponds to Romans 15:19 and thus to Paul's mission, explaining at the same time why Paul evidently did not plan a mission in the provinces between Rome and Spain, especially Gaul (Riesner, 216-25). A problem with this view is the fact that Isaiah 66:19 does not mention the two geographical limits of Paul's mission (Rom 15:19) and that Put is more naturally linked with Libya than with Cilicia.

2.2. The Feasibility of the Missionary Commission. As the early Christians believed that the eschatological age had arrived with the ministry of Jesus Christ and that the consummation may arrive soon, praying for the Parousia* of the Lord (1 Cor 16:22; Rev 22:20), one might conclude that the early missionaries would not have been interested in strategy and planning. However, the eschatological factor must not be seen as the most important motivation of the early Christian movement. Paul's extended periods of missionary work at Corinth and Ephesus, his repeated visits to the churches in south Galatia, Macedonia and Achaia, and the dispatch of coworkers and letters demonstrate that the early Christian mission was not attempting to preach to a maximum number of people over brief spells of evangelism in as many areas as possible. Rather, they evidently saw from the beginning the need of consolidating their missionary efforts notwithstanding their eschatological convictions.

However, the belief that Christ may return soon must have shaped their view of the feasibility of their task of proclaiming the gospel to all nations. They would not have thought in terms of presenting the Good News to every individual in all regions of the earth. Paul said that he had "fulfilled the message of good news" between Jerusalem and Illyricum (Rom 15:19) and thus had to go to Spain in order to be able to do pioneer missionary work. He seems to have been satisfied that he had completed all the preaching of the gospel that must have happened before the Parousia (Mk 13:10) when he had preached to a representative number of people in a given province (or Japhetite nation).

2.3. Human Planning and Divine Guidance. Is it conceivable that the Twelve had left the practical realization of the missionary task entrusted to them by the risen Lord to more or less accidental developments? This is the impression that Luke's depiction of the earliest Christian mission in Acts seems to convey. (1) The first missionary sermon, preached by Peter on the day of Pentecost,* seems to be a spontaneous statement (Acts 2:12-14, 37-38) explaining to a bewildered crowd the significance of the outpouring of the Spirit of God. (2) The apostles appear to have stayed in Jerusalem after Pentecost (Acts 8:1), as there is no hint at missionary travels of the Twelve. (3) The first journeys Luke mentions are the flight of some Christians of the Jerusalem church to Judea and Samaria after the martyrdom* of Stephen,* and Luke specifically points out that the apostles were spared this initial persecution (Acts 8:1). (4) The first major expansion of the Jerusalem church into Samaria is related, as regards initiative and quantitative success, to one of the leaders of the Hellenist house churches rather than to an apostle, and it appears as a spontaneous event in the midst of a persecution* rather than as a planned undertaking. Hence some scholars regard the leaders of the Jerusalem church as a conservative body that was never responsible for new ventures.

Several observations indicate, however, that this is not the whole picture. The apostles were clearly aware of their responsibility for an active missionary outreach, even to the Gentiles. (1) We must not forget that Luke portrays in a highly selective manner the ministry of only one of the Twelve, that of Peter. Otherwise he mentions only John, always in connection with Peter (he prays in Acts 3:1, looks at a crippled man in Acts 3:4, is arrested in Acts 4:3, defends himself before the Sanhedrin in Acts 4:19, ministers with Peter in Samaria in Acts 8:14-25) and his brother James (who is executed in Acts 12:2). If Luke has given a limited picture of Paul's mission, without however misrepresenting him (Marshall, 91-98), it should come as no surprise that his sketch of the mission of the Twelve is fragmentary.

(2) This is all the more remarkable since Luke begins his treatise on the history of the early Christians and their expansion from Jerusalem to "the end of the earth" after having narrated Jesus' renewed instructions about his disciples' vocation and Jesus' departure (Acts

1:1-12; see Ascension) with a list of the eleven remaining disciples (Acts 1:13) and a comparatively long section on the replacement of Judas as the twelfth apostle (Acts 1:15-26).

(3) When Luke reports that the Jerusalem apostles had enormous courage and were prepared to challenge with great boldness a political institution that may call for their execution, refusing to stop their public proclamation and their private teaching of Jesus Christ (Acts 4:18-20; 5:28-29), this seems to speak against the view that they were timid leaders unwilling to initiate new ventures. This is supported by the content of the long prayer of the Jerusalem church after the release of Peter and John, who had been arrested. Even in view of "raging nations" they ask for strength and boldness to carry on their task of preaching* God's word (Acts 4:29). Further, if Paul was prepared (without "Christian" preparation) to respond quickly to the divine call to evangelize the Gentiles by traveling to the nearby territory of the Nabatean Arabs (Gal 1:17; 2 Cor 11:32-33; see DPL, Paul in Acts and Letters, §2.5), it is not unreasonable to expect that the apostles were not only willing to face martyrdom (as Jesus had predicted they would) but also responsive to the commission of missionary outreach (as Jesus had predicted, exemplified and commanded).

(4) The Sanhedrin was concerned that the messianic movement linked with Jesus of Nazareth would spread to new territories (Acts 4:17; Barrett), thus witnessing to the dynamic vitality and drive toward expansion of the Jerusalem church and its leaders. The Sanhedrin became increasingly apprehensive as the apostles had "filled Jerusalem" with their teaching* (Acts 5:28), underscoring the impressive impact of their preaching.

(5) The fact that the Twelve are at first permanently based in Jerusalem reflects Luke's Jerusalem-centered perspective, which is congruent not only with the Jewish conceptions of world geography (Scott 1994, 492-522) but also with the prophecies of exiled Jews returning to Jerusalem from all four points of the compass and Gentile nations coming from all directions to Jerusalem as well (Is 2:2-3; 11:12; 43:5-6; 49:12; 60:3-16; Zech 8:20-23; Tob 13:11-13). In this context it would be natural for the leaders of the first Christian community, which saw itself as the messianic temple, to locate the foundation of the new temple in Jerusalem rather than in Galilee* and to see themselves as responsible for the oversight of the active missionary movement.

(6) As the prophecies regarding the nations describe not only a movement to Jerusalem but also a prior movement of the word of the Lord out from Jerusalem (Is 2:3), it is possible that in the earliest period of the Jerusalem church the expectation was that through the proclamation of the gospel in Jerusalem (cf. Is 40:9) its sound would reach to the ends of the earth, through the constant stream of pilgrims to Jerusalem and back into the countries where they lived. "In that case, Luke provides us, in his portrayal of the first preaching of the gospel in Jerusalem to a crowd drawn from all nations under heaven (Acts 2:5-11), with a programmatic account of the earliest mission strategy of the Jerusalem church" (Bauckham 1995, 426).

(7) The narrative in Acts indicates that the Jerusalem apostles acted in accordance with their call to missionary outreach. They send Peter and John to Samaria when they hear of converts there (Acts 8:14; there is no hint that the apostles might have found the news from Samaria to be surprising; Dunn). They liaise with Paul and hear not only of his conversion but also of his work as a missionary in Damascus (Acts 9:27). Peter appears to be involved in a missionary journey through all the cities and villages of Judea, Galilee and Samaria (Acts 9:32 with 9:31; 8:25; a link offered by Barrett as a possibility, regarding it unlikely that dia pantōn anticipates "the saints") and the coastal areas (Acts 9:35). Peter also plays a pioneering role in the first breakthrough to the Gentiles in Caesarea (Acts 10:1—11:18). The Jerusalem church feels responsible for the missionary outreach to Gentiles in Antioch (Acts 11:19-24); all the early coworkers in Paul's mission to the Gentiles came from Jerusalem: Barnabas, John Mark and Silas.

(8) R. J. Bauckham has argued convincingly that up to Acts 11:1 the apostles (the "Twelve"; cf. Acts 1:13, 25-26) were the leaders of the Jerusalem church, Peter being the preeminent figure, and they remained so even after the persecution following the martyrdom of Stephen caused the permanent dispersion of many prominent members of the Jerusalem church (Acts 8:1, which does not say that the apostles escaped persecution). This period comes to a close after about twelve years as a result of the persecution under Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 41-44) that led to the martyrdom of one of the Twelve, James the brother of John (A.D. 41/42) and to the imprisonment and eventual escape of Peter (Acts 12:1-17).

Evidently this persecution put an end to the leadership of the apostles in Jerusalem. When Barnabas and Paul deliver the famine relief, they are sent by the church in Antioch to the "elders" of the Jerusalem church (Acts 11:30), who appear as the group that replaced the Twelve as leaders in Jerusalem, with James the brother of Jesus being the new preeminent figure (Acts 12:17; 15:13-21; 21:18; see Relatives of Jesus). Peter's leading role in Jerusalem and in the outreach from Jerusalem with the breakthrough to the Gentiles passes to James (Acts 12:17) in Jerusalem and to Paul (Acts 13:2) in the outreach to the Gentiles (Bauckham 1995, 427-41).

If it is correct that in Acts 12 Luke's narrative "has reached the point where leadership at the center in Jerusalem can no longer be combined with personal leadership in the missionary movement out from the center" (Bauckham 1995, 436), we may conclude that the necessity to leave Jerusalem did not lead to Peter's retirement; his role may have become even more important as a traveling missionary (cf. 1 Cor 9:5) among both Jews and Gentiles (see 2.8 below). This scenario coincides with later patristic evidence in which the disciples are said to have stayed in Jerusalem for twelve years before moving out into the world. See Apollonius (in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.18.14); Acts of Peter 5; Kerygma Petrou 3 (Clement of Alexandria Strom. 6.5.43, regarded as historical by Harnack; but cf. Bauer in Hennecke and Schneemelcher, 2:45).

(9) Paul's statement of missionary policy in Romans 15:20, which includes the principle "not to build on another's foundation," does not establish him as the only pioneer missionary to Gentiles (so evidently most commentaries) but indicates that others were actively involved in the mission to the Gentiles. This is also implied by 1 Corinthians 9:5 and 1 Corinthians 15:10 (see DPL, Paul in Acts and Letters §3.2). Even the judaizers wanted to win Gentiles (Gal 6:13).

Apart from strategic planning of missionary outreach the often spontaneous guidance by the Lord or the Holy Spirit* or by supernatural factors were an important factor. Consider Philip's mission to an Ethiopian official (Acts 8:26), Peter's mission in Caesarea (Acts 10), the mission of Christians from Jerusalem in Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch (Acts 11:19) or Paul's mission to south Galatia (Gal 4:13: "because of an illness") and to Europe (Acts 16:6-10). Circumstances also determined the planning of missionary travels (cf. Paul's plans to visit Rome, Rom 1:10-11, 13).

2.4. Geographical Expansion. Within forty years the Christian missionaries had planted churches in the Roman provinces of Syria-Cilicia, Cyprus, Galatia, Asia, Mysia, Macedonia, Achaia, Cappadocia and Pontus-Bithynia; in Italy and in Rome; in Dalmatia; on Crete; perhaps in Illyricum; perhaps in Egypt (apart from the record in Acts see Gal 1:1, 21; 1 Thess 1:7; Rom 15:19; Tit 1:5; 2 Tim 4:10; 1 Pet 1:1; Rev 1:11; for Egypt see Acts 18:24-25).

An important factor of the early Christian mission was the planting of churches in the main urban centers of the Roman Empire. After the rapid quantitative growth of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 2:41; 4:4; cf. Acts 21:20), churches were planted in Damascus (by A.D. 31/32), Caesarea (A.D. 31-33), Antioch (A.D. 35?), Rome (before A.D. 49), Corinth (A.D. 50), Alexandria* (before A.D. 52? cf. Acts 18:24-25) and Ephesus (A.D. 52). The history of the church in Colosse indicates that churches in large centers such as Ephesus served as bases for regional outreach through other missionaries (cf. Col 1:7; 4:12). Local and regional expansion is the result of the preaching in the congregational services (1 Cor 14:23-25; cf. 1 Cor. 11:26; Rom 10:9), of individual Christians responding to questions about the faith (1 Pet 3:15; cf. Lk 12:11) and of the proclamation ministry of evangelists (euangelistēs, Acts 21:8; cf. Acts 8:14-17, where the term is used for the missionary Philip; 2 Tim 4:5 for the church leader Timothy; Eph 4:11 for members of local churches engaged in mission; cf. 1 Thess 1:8; Phil 1:14).

Some Christian communities were established by Christians who traveled for other than missionary purposes. The church in Rome may have been established by Roman Jews who were converted during their pilgrimage to Jerusalem around Pentecost in A.D. 30, by Jewish Christian traders such as Aquila from Pontus (Lampe, 3-4) or by Jewish Christian associates of Stephen whose ancestors were Roman liberti (cf. Acts 6:9) and who returned to their Roman relatives when they were persecuted in Jerusalem (Lampe, 53). Similar assumptions may explain the foundation of the churches in the north Anatolian provinces of Pontus-Bithynia and Cappadocia (1 Pet 1:1; Michaels, 9, refers to Paul's refusal to enter Bithynia in Acts 16:7 and the possible links with Paul's policy of not doing missionary work where others had already been pioneers).

Apart from the churches in the urban centers, which have already been mentioned, there were churches in as many as fifty other towns: Samaria—villages (Acts 9:25); coastal plain—Azotus (Acts 8:40), Lydda (Acts 9:32), Sharon (Acts 9:35), Joppa (Acts 9:36), Ptolemais (Acts 21:7); Syria—Tyre (Acts 21:3-4), Sidon (Acts 27:3), Pella* in the Decapolis (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.5.3, referring to A.D. 66/67), possibly in towns in Arabia (Nabatea, Gal 1:18) and presumably in towns in Syria-Cilicia (Acts 15:23, 41; Gal 1:21-23), presumably Tarsus (Acts 9:30; 11:25); Cyprus—Salamis and Paphos (Acts 13:5, 6; 15:39, cf. Acts 11:19); Pamphylia—Perge (Acts 14:25); Pisidia—Antioch (Acts 13:14-52), Iconium (Acts 14:1-7), Lystra (14:8-19), Derbe (14:20-21); Phrygia—Laodicea (Acts 2:1), Hierapolis (Acts 4:13), Smyrna, Pergamum, Sardis and Philadelphia (Rev 1:11); Lydia—Thyatira (Rev 1:11); Asia—Colosse (Col 1:2); Mysia—Troas (Acts 20:5-12; 2 Cor 2:12); Cappadocia—several towns (1 Pet 1:1); Pontus/Bithynia—presumably Amisus (1 Pet 1:1; Pliny Ep. 10.96); Macedonia—Philippi (Acts 16:12-40; Phil 1:1), Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-4; 1 Thess 1:1), Berea (Acts 17:10-12); Epirus—Nicopolis (Tit 3:12); Achaia—perhaps Athens (Acts 17:32-34; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.4.10), Cenchreae (Acts 18:18; Rom 16:1).

Other churches existed in Italy—Puteoli (Acts 28:13-14); Dalmatia (south Illyria, 2 Tim 4:10)—perhaps Scodra or Salonae; possibly in Spain (cf. Rom 15:24, 28; 1 Clem. 5.5-7; Muratorian fragment lines 38-39); and possibly even in Gaul (in 2 Tim 4:10 "Galatian" may refer to Gaul; cf. the usage of Polybius; the v.l. in ℵ C and others that read Gallian, "to Gaul," perhaps intends to dissipate the terminological confusion; cf. Spicq, 811-13, who wants to think of Lugdunum [Lyons], Vienna [Vienne] and Massilia [Marseille]).

According to later sources there were further churches by A.D. 180 in as many as sixty other towns in Syria: several towns near Antioch; Edessa; Parthia: Zabdiene, Adiabene; Cappadocia; Caesarea, Melitene; Isauria; Laranda; Pisidia: Philomelium; Mysia: Patium; Bithynia: Nicomedia; Asia: Magnesia, Tralles, towns near Smyrna and other towns; Phrygia: Apamea, Cumane, Eumanea, Hieropolis, Otrus, Pepuza, Synnada, Tymion; Galatia: Ancyra, Sinope; Pontus: Amastris; Thrace: Anchialus, Deultum; Thessaly: Lacedaemon, Larissa; Crete: Cnossus, Gortyn; Cephallene: Same; Egypt: several towns; Sicily: Syracuse; Italy: Neapolis; Gallia: Lugdunum, Vienne and among the Celts; Germania: in several places; Spain: in several towns; Africa: Carthage; Numidia: Madaura, Scilium (Harnack 1924, 626-28; cf. Harnack 1908, 2:94-96).

As regards the postapostolic expansion of the church, we have no information of the beginnings of the church in Egypt. We do not know where Apollos (Acts 18:24-25) was converted; the Western addition to Acts 18:25 (D) says that Apollos had been instructed "in his own country," implying that the gospel had reached Alexandria around A.D. 50, which some scholars accept as historical fact, whether the addition is based upon personal knowledge or on inference (Metzger, 413). According to Eusebius (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.16), it was John Mark who preached the gospel "which he had written down" in Egypt and was the first to plant churches in Alexandria. When the rebellion of the Jews from the Cyrenaica to Egypt was ruthlessly quelled in A.D. 116, thousands of Jews were massacred; if the Jewish Christian churches ceased to exist as a result, this may explain the silence of the sources (Hengel 1979).

The early Christians evidently were not too interested in precise figures of quantitative growth. The only figures from the NT period are given by Luke as rounded figures (hōs[ei]), and only for the growth of the Jerusalem church, which numbers "about three thousand" (Acts 2:41), then five thousand (Acts 4:4; myriades, "thousands," in Acts 21:20 is more general and seems to include at least all Jewish Christians in Palestine). These figures can be shown to be reliable (Reinhardt). In view of the fact that Luke, in writing Acts, used biblical language and models and surely knew the historical books of the OT where not only approximate but often precise numbers are given (particularly in connection with the exodus and the return from the exile, although the tradition of exile and return is not prominent in Luke-Acts), it is astonishing that he does not give more precise figures, repeated censuses of members of individual churches and sum totals of the number of churches and/or the number of Christians. Paul never mentions statistics with regard to the churches he has founded or he writes to.

We have only one statistic about the numbers of Christians before Constantine: 154 ministers of varying rank (including 46 presbyters and 7 deacons) and "more than 1,500 widows and poor people" who are said to be supported by the Christians in Rome in 251 (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.43.11-12). How these figures can be used to arrive at a total figure (between ten thousand and thirty thousand Christians?) remains precarious (cf. Lampe, 116).

2.5. Means of Communication. Language is the basic constituent of communication, and thus we notice that the NT and the early Christian documents contain hints of various local languages being spoken besides Greek. On the day of Pentecost, Diaspora Jews (see Diaspora Judaism) from Parthia, Media, Elam, Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia, Egypt, Libya, Rome, Judea, Crete and Arabia (Nabatea) hear the apostles speak the great deeds of God in their own languages (idios dialektos, Acts 2:11). The people of Malta are designated barbaroi (Acts 28:2, 4), a term that denotes that they had retained their Phoenician dialect and did not speak Greek well. The inhabitants of Lystra spoke Lycaonian (Acts 14:11), corresponding to the fact that there is evidence from inscriptions that most of the ethnic Phrygians, Paphlagonians, Pisidians, Lycaonians and Celts (Galatians in Asia Minor, Gauls) had maintained their own languages; however, they presumably knew enough Greek to understand what the Christian missionaries said to them.

In Philippi and in Corinth the official language seems to have been Latin, but Greek was also used. The dividing line between Latin or Greek being used as official language was the border between Macedonia/Thrace and Dalmatia/Moesia (apart from colonies as languages enclaves). With regard to Thomas's alleged mission in India, Acts of Thomas 1.8 states that the Indians "did not understand what he said" since he spoke in Hebrew. As the first Christian missionaries were bilingual Jews, speaking Hebrew and/or Aramaic and Greek, the translation of important news was a normal practice.

There is no evidence from the NT period that the earliest Christian missionaries used any languages other than Hebrew/Aramaic and Greek. Since the Gospels are attested about A.D. 180 in Latin and Syriac, Christian teaching in these languages must have been older; there is no evidence that other translations of the Bible were promoted by church leaders. This need not indicate a lack of missionary interest. Anyone who could read or write was likely to know Greek or Latin; many of the spoken dialects (e.g., in Asia Minor) lacked any literary history and often any alphabet; and in and around the towns there is evidence of an easy bilingualism. When Irenaeus of Lyons refers (c. A.D. 180) to his "exertions" in barbarian dialect (Irenaeus Haer. presc. 1.3), this should probably be seen not as a reference to the use of Celtic or Latin but as a literary disclaimer. But we do not know what missionaries and preachers in small townships in Pontus, Persia, Egypt or Africa may have tried. We should not rule out exceptional Christian missionaries like Ulfilas, whose Cappadocian parents had been taken captive by the Goths and who invented a Gothic alphabet in the 350s and taught the Goths the Scripture in their own language (Lane Fox, 284-87).

The fulfillment of Jesus' mission charge required travel. Overland journeys could be undertaken by camels, donkeys, mules, horses or wheeled conveyances—or by foot, the means of transport of the early Christians missionaries, covering twenty to thirty kilometers per day. On the highways and byways of the empire, traffic was heavy, as "the people of the Roman empire traveled more extensively and more easily than had anyone before them—or would again until the nineteenth century" (Meeks, 17). The missionaries would have encountered imperial officials, judges, soldiers on the march, municipal magistrates, traders, letter carriers, pilgrims, tourists, poets, actors, doctors, artisans, conjurers, transients and philosophers. The wayside inns where ordinary travelers would put up were run-down and unclean facilities; the NT encouragements to hospitality* (Rom 12:13; 1 Tim 3:2; Tit 1:8; 3:13; Heb 13:2; 1 Pet 4:9; cf. Did. 11—13; 1 Clem. 10—12) and the recognition of those with whom traveling missionaries stayed (3 Jn 5-8; cf. Acts 16:15, 34; 21:7-8, 17; 28:14) have to be understood in the context of the churches' involvement in spreading the gospel. The dangers involved in land and sea travel are mentioned in 2 Corinthians 11:26-27.

The means for the dissemination of news that could potentially be used by the early church were speeches, conversations, messengers carrying letters, graffiti and the "grapevine" (Reck, 106-51). For internal communication the churches used messengers and letters. For missionary purposes only public speeches and personal conversations were viable and reliable options; persuasion, in the sense of changing convictions of others, happens primarily through personal relationships; and the other means of mass communication were either unreliable or, in the case of the government communication network (postal service, gazette, edicts), not accessible. Personal contacts in the street were possible only on the horizontal level; contacts in the house allow vertical relationships of a personal nature. Thus the early churches meeting in houses—mixed communities of everyday life, of work, trade and business—had definite advantages for communicating the gospel as widely as possible (cf. 1 Cor 14:22-25; see Households).

The early Christian missionaries, on entering a new town, arrived as strangers. Thus they could either stay at inns and attempt to reach people in the marketplace and in the streets; or, and more naturally, they could find immigrants and temporary residents from their own country or ethnos and practitioners of their own trade who tended to gather in the same areas of the town (Meeks, 29). This is precisely what Acts reports concerning the mission of Paul: being a Jew he first contacted other Jews and started to preach to them; being a tentmaker he got in contact with such workshops, presumably using them as another locus of his preaching ministry (see DPL, Tentmaking).

For conversions to happen the missionaries must have been seen by the later converts to possess high initial credibility. This included (1) their competence, that is, their knowledge of their message about God's revelation in Jesus' person and work (as witnesses of Jesus' resurrection or as disciples of the apostles, having spiritual authority), as well as their ability to perform miracles* (with regard to the second century see Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.37.3); (2) their character (i.e., their trustworthiness); and (3) their composure, that is, their exemplary and courageous behavior in stressful situations (Acts 20:18-21; 1 Thess 2:1-12; 1 Pet 5:1; 2 Pet 1:12-21; 3:2; 1 Jn 1:1-3; Jude 3, 17).

2.6. Challenges for Missionary Outreach. A first challenge for international missionary outreach—which tried to convince people to change their religious convictions, to alter patterns of behavior in everyday life and to switch loyalty from family, city or country to a new community—was the lack of relevant models. There was neither an organized active mission of Jews to Gentiles (McKnight) nor much evidence of any organized or conscious missionary outreach of pagan cults (see Religions, Greco-Roman). There is no sign of any pagan god whose cult required active evangelism; not even the emperor* cult tried to change anyone's religion (MacMullen 1981, 97-105). The expansion of oriental cults was evidently not the result of successful recruitment of new converts but a function of mobility: the relocation of families from the east (MacMullen 1981, 116-17). The military conquests of Alexander the Great or the expansion of Greek culture or of Roman administration were hardly patterns that "fishers of men" could emulate.

The "herald" (kēryx) of secular society was not regarded as a generally suitable model either, presumably since it designated subordinate officials and was associated with institutions, although the designation was useful in underlining the effective act of proclamation (cf. 1 Tim 2:7; 2 Tim 1:11). The contact between the Jewish Diaspora communities and the religious center in Jerusalem by šᵉlûḥîm ("messengers," i.e., Gk apostoloi) may be regarded as a personal and relational model for global communication (Reck, 157) but could hardly serve as a model for the universal Christian mission that wanted to reach Jews and Gentiles and that aimed at more than maintaining existing contacts as it focused on winning "people of different faiths" for Christ.

A second challenge to easy communication of the gospel was the dissimilarity of basic beliefs and values, with the vitality of pagan faiths continuously introducing and adapting new forms and rites of worship (MacMullen 1981, 106; cf. Acts 14:11-15; 17:19-23) and with the gospel message that spoke about a Jewish Messiah who died on the cross and was raised from the dead being deeply incompatible with traditional Jewish and pagan conceptions of God and of salvation (cf. 1 Cor 1—2). In this context Acts relates the direction and the success of the early Christian mission to the power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 4:8, 31; 5:32; 6:5; 7:55; 8:29, 39; 10:10-20, 47; 13:4, 9; cf. 1 Thess 1:4-6; 1 Cor 2:5).

A third challenge to the early Christian mission was social and cultural barriers. The first cultural barrier was between Jewish Christians (see Jewish Christianity) and Jews, occasioned by the different views on the land and the temple, on sacrifices* and on salvation, on circumcision,* and on food. The early missionaries, even Paul the apostle to the Gentiles (cf. Acts 16:3; 18:18; 21:20-26), sought to care for some Jewish susceptibilities.

A second cultural barrier was that between Jewish Christians and Gentiles, with many Jews' basic inclination toward segregation (cf. Ep. Arist. 139.142), and with potential hostility of pagans against Jews (cf. Cicero Pro Flacco 28.67). The former was solved, at least on a theological level, rather early in connection with Peter's encounter with a Roman military commander, Cornelius* (Acts 10:1—11:18), in which the leader of the apostles learns that he must not regard anybody as unclean (Acts 10:28). The latter was addressed by admonishing the Christians to be good citizens and live in accordance with cultural conventions (1 Cor 10:32-33; Col 4:5; 1 Tim 3:7; 1 Thess 4:12; 1 Pet 2:12-14), not to give legitimate cause for action by the Roman state (cf. Acts 16:35-39; 18:12-17; 19:21-41; 21—28), not to try to impose Christian behavior on pagans (1 Pet 4:15), not to retaliate, to pray, and to be willing to suffer. Paul preaches to "Jews and Greeks" (i.e., to the entire population of the Hellenistic cities; Acts 11:19-20; 14:1; 18:4; 19:17; cf. Rom 1:16; 10:12).

A third cultural barrier existed between educated Jewish or Gentile Christians in the towns and cities and the non-Hellenized barbarians and between poor Christian missionaries and the well-to-do (among them houseowners as patrons and/or potential hosts of churches). Awareness of such social distinctions is reflected in Romans 1:14. A similar barrier, for potential converts from the upper class or even the urban artisans, constituted the presence of poor freedmen and dispossessed slaves.

There also was always potential conflict between missionaries subject to the jurisdiction of hostile Jewish authorities or as noncitizen residents (metoikoi) subject to local magistrates. The Christian missionaries are portrayed as being unimpressed by threats and willing to go to prison (cf. Acts 4:1-31; 5:17-42). When the option existed, they defended themselves on legal grounds (cf. Acts 18:12-17; 2—26); when the situation became too explosive they evacuated the city (cf. Acts 17:5-10; 20:1).

A fourth challenge to missionary outreach may have been psychological barriers, such as the high self-esteem of officials of synagogues* and towns; skepticism with respect to the central place of the resurrection of Jesus and of his death on the cross in Christian evangelistic preaching; apprehension of pagans concerning to the prospect of joining a new Jewish-related sect; apparent similarities between the practices of wandering philosophers (sometimes regarded as charlatans) and the Christian missionaries (cf. 1 Thess 2:1-12?). Many scholars have tried to explain the appeal of Christianity in psychosocial terms, implying that potential converts feel some kind of conflict in their present social state, including a sense of anxiety (F. Cumont), and gravitate naturally toward a message of appeasement. Since we must reckon with a vast variety of economic and personal situations and since this model hardly explains the conversion of people of higher social standing, this approach does not answer all questions concerning the motives for conversions (cf. White, 123).

Fifth, for a pagan to switch allegiance to the worship of one God while denying the existence of all the other gods would incur the charge of atheism, which (as in the case of the Jews) might lead to vilification and slander or (as happened in the second century) to outright persecution involving charges of treason or disloyalty, since the Christian faith could not claim to be an old and venerable religion and could not point to a protracted period of official patronage as could the Jewish faith. The fact that the Christians met in house churches could be interpreted as secret gatherings where, it was alleged, mysterious and immoral things happened (Lane Fox, 419-34).

Sixth, there were structural and organizational issues such as finance, with the option of being supported by an existing church that sends gifts (cf. Phil 4:10-18) or by manual work of the missionaries who thus support themselves

(cf. 1 Thess 2:9; 2 Thess 3:8; 1 Cor 4:12; Acts 18:3; 20:33-34); headquarters, with great flexibility (e.g., Paul's move from Damascus to Tarsus, from Antioch to Corinth and to Ephesus and the expected move to Rome in order to establish a base for a planned mission to Spain); the lack or scarcity of social networks capable of providing patronage and benefaction that would ensure social acceptance in the community, which seems to have been a major factor in the expansion of oriental cults (although Corinth may have been an exception in this regard); coworkers (cf. DPL, Coworkers, Paul and His) and their availability; the need to evangelize as quickly as possible on account of the expected Parousia and to see others as firmly as possible established in a committed Christian position (cf. Jas 5:19-20; 2 Pet 3:17).

Seventh, there were potential personal obstacles: family members who came along on missionary journeys (1 Cor 9:5) and their needs; cramped urban living conditions, with an average population density in cities approaching two hundred per acre (corresponding to conditions in industrial slums in Western cities); the hardships and dangers of travel; and the demands of contacts with a formidable variety of people.

2.7. Words and Deeds. In accordance with Jesus' own example and his previous injunction to preach and to heal (Mt 10:7-8), to teach and to make new disciples among the pagans (Mt 28:19-20), as witnesses of the crucified and risen Jesus (Acts 1:3, 8) the early Christian missionaries are portrayed as preaching the gospel, occasionally healing people and helping the Christians to form caring communities characterized by selfless love.*

The message that the apostles preached concentrated on the atoning death of Jesus the Messiah who was raised from the dead and who, as living Lord, commands both Jews and pagans to repent—the Jews over the misunderstanding that occasioned Jesus' death, the pagans of their idolatry*—and to commit themselves to God's new and conclusive revelation as the exclusive source of salvation that the prophets* looked forward to (cf. 1 Cor 15:3-5; 2 Cor 5:21; Rom 4:25; Acts 2:36; 5:30-31; 10:34-43; 13:25-41; 17:30).

According to the evidence in Acts, the missionary preaching of the apostles interacted with the religious views of the audiences (in Acts 14:8-20 with popular superstition, in Acts 17:16-34 with the natural theology of the Stoics and Epicureans), resisting accommodation to popular piety in spite of Roman imperial religious policy. When Paul discusses the appropriate Christian interaction with the religious pluralism of contemporary society (1 Cor 8—10), both in public and in private situations, he aims to help the church to find a response that would not only help to fulfill its social obligations to society but also enhance its evangelistic task (cf. Winter).

The "deed" accompanying the "word" of the missionaries (cf. Rom 15:18) would include their irreproachable conduct, miraculous events such as healings, loving concern and personal involvement with individual people for their spiritual welfare and steadfast endurance* amid suffering (cf. 1 Thess 2:1-12; 2 Cor 12:12; Acts 20:18-21, 31).

The message of the Christian missionaries and the life of the Christian communities caused the separation of church and synagogue (see Christianity and Judaism). The cause was not principally the Gentile mission of Paul (cf. Martin) but the public preaching about Jesus and the missionary success of the Jerusalem church, leading to opposition and hostile actions by the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:1-21; 5:12-33; 6:8-15; 7:54-60; 8:1-3) and by Herod Antipas (Acts 12:1-4) that culminated in the killing of Stephen and James and a large-scale persecution. Whether there was an official excommunication of the Christians from the synagogue or not, the record of Acts shows its reality, or confirms, if the evidence of the Gospels regarding vehement opposition to Jesus is included, that Jewish antagonism against the followers of Jesus existed from the beginning and quickly included institutional consequences (cf. Acts 6:1, the need to care for widows).

2.8. The Missionaries. Terms used for missionaries include apostolos ("apostle"), first of all the Twelve as witnesses* of all that Jesus did in Judea and in Jerusalem, including his death and resurrection (Acts 1:21-22; 10:39-41); then Paul as the "last" of the apostles (1 Cor 15:8; cf. 1 Cor 1:1; Acts 14:4, 14); finally other commissioned missionaries (1 Cor 9:5; 12:28; 2 Cor 11:13; Eph 4:11) such as Barnabas (Acts 14:4, 14) and the husband-and-wife ministry teams of Aquila and Prisca (Rom 16:3), and Andronicus and Junia (Rom 16:7).

Martys ("witness") designates those who were personally present when Jesus ministered and when he had been raised from the dead, who interpret the person and work of Jesus and who stand up for the gospel message (Acts 1:8, 22; 2:32; thirteen times in Acts).

Halieus anthrōpōn ("fisher of people"), used only by Jesus in the initial calling of his disciples (Mk 1:17; Mt 4:19; cf. Lk 5:10), defines the missionary commission as "catching" human beings, that is, getting them to repent, leading them to faith in the good news of the kingdom and joining the new community. The context implies the call to a full-time itinerant life of ministry.

Euangelistēs ("evangelist," a person who announces good news), is used for Philip in Caesarea (Acts 21:8), who was a missionary in Samaria (Acts 8:4-40); for Timothy in Ephesus (2 Tim 4:5), designating part of the work of a church leader; and for ministers of the church "between" the itinerant apostles and the stationary pastors (Eph 4:11).

Hypēretēs ("servant") is used by Luke for the disciples as eyewitnesses (Lk 1:2) and for Paul as divinely called missionary (Acts 26:16; cf. 1 Cor 4:1); the term emphasizes the centrality of the gospel message and implies both the authority* of God's revealing Word, which is the person and work of Jesus, and the unreserved nature of their dedication to Jesus' cause.

Kēryx ("preacher," a "herald" or "proclaimer" of new or important information) is used for Paul (1 Tim 2:7; 2 Tim 1:11).

Synergos ("fellow worker") is used for missionaries generally as they participate in God's work (1 Cor 3:9; 1 Thess 3:2), specifically for the members of a missionary team who shared in the ministry of evangelization, such as Prisca and Aquila, Urbanus, Timothy, Titus, Epaphroditus or Clement (Rom 16:3, 9, 21; 1 Thess 3:2; 2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25; 4:3).

Ergatēs ("worker"), characterizing the activity of the ministry as one of labor, is used for Timothy (2 Tim 2:15; in a negative setting 2 Cor 11:13; Phil 3:2).

Koinōnos ("partner"), used for Titus as Paul's associate in mission (2 Cor 8:23), describes personal relationship, with a nuance of confidence and joy in service (Ollrogg, 77).

The NT refers to the activity of at least thirty-two (not counting the ten of the Twelve mentioned only in lists) and possibly forty-two missionaries, by far the largest group of Christian ministers for whom personal names are given in the NT period. Of the Twelve, only the ministry of Peter and of John is referred to. Peter was primarily involved in the mission to the Jewish people (Gal 2:9; cf. Acts 2—12); he joins the missionary outreach to the Samaritans (Acts 8:14-25) and is instrumental in inaugurating the mission to the Gentiles (Acts 10:1—11:18). We do not know why he came to Syrian Antioch (Gal 2:11) and how long he stayed; the tradition of the third century that Peter was the first bishop of Antioch (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.22.36; Origen Homily on Luke 6.100) is historically suspect in view of Acts 11:19-26 and Ignatius's* letters.

The tradition that Peter left Jerusalem after twelve years (i.e., in A.D. 41/42) and went to Rome (Acts of Peter 5.22) to become the original missionary who founded the church in the capital of the empire and was its first bishop, implying that the "other place" (Acts 12:17) to which Peter went after leaving Jerusalem was Rome (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.14.6; 2.17.1; 15.2; Chronicon 261F [ed. Helm 179]; Jerome Vir. 5.8) is held by some to be reliable (Thiede, 153-56), while others regard this claim as erroneous (Brown and Meier, 98.102-3) or remain undecided (Riesner, 106). Peter may have been involved in missionary work among both Jews and Gentiles (cf. the evidence of 1 Peter*) in the territories in Asia Minor north and west of the Taurus Mountains (1 Pet 1:1) sometime after he left Jerusalem (Acts 12:17) until his martyrdom in Rome around A.D. 64 (Davids 1990, 8).

The only other member of the circle of the Twelve mentioned as a missionary in the NT is John, who appears besides Peter as commissioned with outreach to the Jewish people (Gal 2:9); in Acts 8:14-25 he appears with Peter as evangelizing among the Samaritans.

Paul as the "last" of the apostles (1 Cor 15:8), commissioned primarily to outreach among the Gentiles (Gal 2:9; Acts 9:15; 26:17-18) but determined to reach "the Jews first" (Acts 13:14; 14:1; 17:1-2; 18:1-4, 19; 19:18), evangelized in Nabatea (Arabia), Syria-Cilicia, Cyprus, south Galatia, Asia, Mysia, Macedonia, Achaia, in Rome, probably in Crete (Tit 1:5) and also possibly in Spain.

James, the brother of Jesus and leader of the Jerusalem church, appears beside Peter and John as charged with the mission to the Jewish people (Gal 2:9). If he is the author of the epistle of James,* he seems to appear as exercising ecclesial authority over Jewish Christians outside of Palestine, probably in Syria* and Asia Minor (Davids 1982, 64). His authority over the mission to Diaspora Jews is referred to in Gospel of Thomas 12 (the saying probably dates from James's lifetime and reflects the outlook of the early Jewish Christian mission to east Syria; cf. Bauckham 1995, 451).

Some scholars posit a mission to the Gentiles—independent of Paul's mission—by ultraconservative Jewish Christians from Jerusalem who insisted on full observance of the Torah, including circumcision (Martyn; Dunn 1993, 10-12). This inference is based on Paul's insistence on the independence of his own apostolic commissioning (Gal 1:1, 11-24); this does not prove, however, that the opponents of Paul in Galatia (and Greece?; cf. 2 Cor 11—12; Phil 3) could claim the authorization of leaders of the Jerusalem church such as James and were thus part of an official mission from Jerusalem. There is no evidence for such an ultraconservative Jewish Christian mission to Gentiles independent of Paul's letters or outside the churches established by him. The fact that such people traveled to Galatia and perhaps other areas in order to correct, improve and "complete" Paul's gospel does not make them missionaries; it is best to call them "teachers" (Martyn), and many interpreters find it reasonable to argue that they were the "false brothers" of Jerusalem who "belonged to the party of the Pharisees" and were not supported by the Jerusalem apostles (Acts 15:5; see DPL, Opponents of Paul §3), though they may have claimed the support of the mother church (2 Cor 10—13).

Stephen, a converted Diaspora Jew living in Jerusalem and one of the Seven (Acts 6:5), is portrayed as a spokesman for God (Acts 6:8) whose preaching in Jerusalem provoked vehement opposition as it replaced the continuity of God's revelation in Israel centering in the temple with his revelation in Jesus (Acts 7). His friends and followers opened up the next phase in the early Christian mission (Acts 8:1-4). Philip, the second of the Seven (Acts 6:5), emerges in this context as missionary in Samaria (Acts 8:5-13), as evangelist to an Ethiopian (Acts 8:26-39) and as evangelist in "all the cities" between Azotus/Ashdod and Caesarea, the official capital of Judea and the official seat of the procurator, where he eventually had his base (Acts 11:19; 21:8).

Barnabas (Joseph), a Cypriot Jew (Acts 4:36) living in Jerusalem, becomes involved in the mission to Syrian Antioch (Acts 11:22-26), is a partner of Paul in the mission to Cyprus and south Galatia (Acts 13—14) and then concentrates on Cyprus (Acts 15:39). If Acts 13:1 may be linked with Acts 11:20, we have further names of leaders of the early Jewish Christian mission to Syria, particularly Antioch: Simeon called Niger (no inference about his race seems possible; cf. Barrett, 603), Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, who had court connections with Herod Antipas.

Timothy, son of a Jewish mother living in Lystra and a convert of Paul (1 Cor 4:17), was drafted as a missionary worker into Paul's team (Acts 16:1). He participated in Paul's Gentile mission to Macedonia and Achaia (Acts 17—18), with special responsibilities for Thessalonica (1 Thess 3:1-6), and to Ephesus (cf. Acts 19:22), with special responsibilities for Corinth (1 Cor 16:10-11) and later for Ephesus (1 Tim 1:3).

Silas (Silvanus), a leading member of the Jerusalem church (Acts 15:22) and perhaps a Roman citizen like Paul (Acts 16:37-38), belonged to Paul's missionary team when it worked in Macedonia and Achaia (Acts 15:40; 16:19; 17:4, 10; 2 Cor 1:19), with special responsibilities in Berea (Acts 17:15). Luke, a physician (Col 4:14) originating probably from Antioch (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.4.6), was one of Paul's "coworkers" (Philem 24). According to long-established tradition he was the companion of Paul in his mission to Macedonia, possibly with particular responsibilities in Philippi between A.D. 50 and 57 (cf. the "we" passages in Acts).

Prisca (Priscilla) and Aquila, a Jewish Christian couple from Rome, who later resided in Corinth and in Ephesus before returning to Rome, were business people who provided Paul with the opportunity to earn money. They worked as a husband-and-wife-team in Ephesus and provided the meeting point for a house church in Rome (Rom 16:4).

Titus, a Greek Christian, perhaps a convert of Paul (Tit 1:4) who (presumably) remained uncircumcised (Gal 2:3), was Paul's partner and fellow worker (2 Cor 8:23). He undertook assignments in Corinth (2 Cor 7:6-7, 13-15; 8:6) and presumably accompanied Paul to Crete, where he became responsible for further missionary work (Tit 1:5). He may have been involved in a mission to Dalmatia (2 Tim 4:10) and is reported to have returned to Crete (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.4.5). Another close associate was Tychicus, of the province of Asia (Acts 20:4), whom Paul calls "a faithful servant and fellow slave in the Lord" (Col 4:7); we see him on missions to Colosse, Ephesus and Crete (Col 4:7-9; Eph 6:21; 2 Tim 4:12; Tit 3:12).

Other fellow workers mentioned by Paul are John Mark (Philem 24), a member of the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:12, 25; 13:13) and a companion of Paul during the mission to Cyprus, where he continued to work with Barnabas (Acts 13; 15:37-39), later becoming a member of Paul's most intimate circle (cf. Col 4:10-11; 2 Tim 4:11) and an associate of Peter (1 Pet 5:13; cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15).

Apollos of Alexandria (Acts 18:24) served in Achaia (Acts 18:27), particularly in Corinth (1 Cor 3:5-6, 9), later perhaps in Ephesus (1 Cor 16:12) and on Crete (Tit 3:13). Epaphroditus of Philippi, presumably a Gentile convert, labored at Paul's side when the latter was in prison (Phil 2:25-30). Euodia and Syntyche, two women who were highly valued coworkers, had energetically participated in Paul's mission, perhaps in Philippi (Phil 4:3); Clement, presumably a Philippian Christian, was another coworker (Phil 4:3). Aristarchus, presumably of Thessalonica (Acts 19:29; 20:4; 27:2), belonged to the group that accompanied Paul on his final journey to Jerusalem and thence to Rome (Col 4:10-11; Philem 24). Epaphras of Colosse, presumably converted during Paul's mission to Ephesus (Acts 19:8-10), led the mission to the Lycus valley and evangelized in Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col 1:7; 4:12; Philem 23).

Jesus Justus was a coworker of Jewish birth (Col 4:11); and Demas, a coworker of Gentile birth (Col 4:14; Philem 24), later deserted Paul (2 Tim 4:10). Perhaps the (released?) slave Onesimus (Philem 13) was a "helper in the work of mission" (Ollrogg, 104). Philemon may have founded the church at Laodicea, Philip and his daughters (Acts 21:8) the church at Hierapolis (cf. Papias, in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.39.9).

We hear further of the husband-and-wife ministry team of Andronicus and Junia, Jewish Christians presumably of the Hellenistic circle in Jerusalem who were "apostles" (Rom 16:7; i.e., traveling missionaries); of Urbanus, a Christian worker known to Paul (Rom 16:9); of Crescens, who went to Galatia or perhaps to Gaul (2 Tim 4:10). Perhaps other Christians mentioned by Paul could be seen as coworkers: Tertius, who helped Paul write the letter to the Romans (Rom 16:22); Erastus of Corinth (Rom 16:23); Quartus (Rom 16:23); Phoebe in Cenchreae (Rom 16:1); Mary, who "worked hard" among the Christians of Rome (Rom 16:6); Tryphena and Tryphosa (twin sisters?), who are "workers in the Lord" (Rom 16:12); Persis, who "labored much in the Lord" (Rom 16:12); perhaps also Onesiphorus (2 Tim 1:16-18; 4:19); and Zenas the lawyer (Tit 3:13).

In early patristic sources we are given further evidence for early Christian missionaries. The apostle Thomas is said to have become missionary in India; the apocryphal Acts of Thomas describe his ministry to the Indian king Gundophar, who ruled A.D. 20-40 at Taxila in the Punjab, which belonged to the Indo-Parthian empire (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.1.1 [Origen?] and Pseud.-Clem. Recog. 9.29 link the apostle Thomas with Parthia), and the oral tradition of the church in south India speaks of a ministry of Thomas in Kerala. Some scholars credit this twofold tradition as being derived from a historical core and assume that Thomas was a missionary in the Punjab before traveling to south India (Farquhar), while others regard the tradition as legendary and deriving from the mission of the Syrian church in the Parthian empire in north India about 200 (Dihle). Proof for Christians in India dates to the third century.

As Indian products were readily available in Palestinian markets (Lott, ABD 3:410) and since the routes for merchant shipping between Egypt, Arabia and south India were well established since the first century B.C. (cf. Periplous Maris Erythraei, written A.D. 40-70 on the basis of oral tradition), it is not unlikely that the apostle Thomas might have traveled to India. He displays in John's Gospel a strange but understandable mixture of pessimism and impulsiveness and appears in John 11:16 as a leading disciple who seems courageously prepared to follow Jesus into death (Collins, ABD 6:528-27). According to another tradition, the apostle Bartholomew was involved in a mission to India as well (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.10.3; Gelasius), as was Pantaenus of Alexandria (c. A.D. 190; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.10.2-3; Lane Fox, 278, regards this tradition as largely true).

The apostle Andrew is said to have led a mission to Scythia (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.1.1; cf. Acts of Andrew and Matthias of the sixth century). The apostle Matthew went to Ethiopia (cf. Rufinus Hist. Eccl. 1.9-10), where the converted official of Acts 8:26-39, according to Irenaeus (Irenaeus Adu Haer 3.12.8), had already been active as a missionary proclaiming "the message which he had believed." Thaddeus, one of the seventy disciples of Jesus, evangelized in Edessa in the empire of Abgar V Ukhama (A.D. 9-46) east of the Euphrates, commissioned by the apostle Thomas (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.13.4, 11). Another source mentions Addai as the pioneer missionary to Edessa and to Adiabene in Mesopotamia (1 Apoc. Jas. 36.15-24; cf. the later Doctrina Addai, Chronicle of Arbela; see Syria, Syrian Christianity). Mark is said to have been the first missionary to Alexandria (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.16; see 2.6 above).

While the historical value of the apocryphal acts of various apostles (see Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal Writings)—a genre that became established after the third quarter of the second century—is generally regarded as negligible, apart from some of the earlier ones, it is difficult to assess the reliability of other early Christian traditions. Although details of some of the accounts are obviously fictitious, one should often reckon with a historical core; however, in most cases it is impossible to attain certainty. Thus A. Harnack (1924, 679-70) and L. W. Barnard accept the historicity of Addai and the beginnings of Christianity in Edessa in the first century, while others (cf. Lane Fox, 279-80) regard the relevant traditions as legends of the third century while accepting the presence of Christians in Edessa in the second century.

3. Mission in Acts.

The life and faith of the Christians and the churches portrayed in Acts are characterized by missionary witness from beginning to end (Acts 1:8; 28:30-31).

3.1. A Theology of Mission. A survey of the relevant vocabulary shows that "mission" (apostolē, [ex]apostellō, [ek]pempō) refers in Acts primarily to the work of God in sending Jesus the Messiah to the Jews and to the Gentiles through the word of his witnesses and that "witness" (martys, martyreō, martyria, martyrion) refers to the activity of the twelve apostles and Paul (Bolt).

The following elements are relevant to a theology of mission of Acts:

(1) The missionary outreach of the church is directed by God at crucial stages (by the Spirit: Acts 8:29, 39; 10:19; 13:2; 15:28; 16:6; by angels*: Acts 8:26; by the Lord himself: Acts 18:9; 23:11); the apostolic mission is carried out by God himself (Acts 15:4).

(2) According to God's will (Acts 10:1—11:18) and Jesus' commission (Acts 1:8; 9:15) the preaching of the gospel moves from Jewish and Samaritan audiences to pagan Gentiles.

(3) The story of the early Christian mission is a story of geographical expansion from Jerusalem and Judea to Samaria and the coastal plain, to Antioch in Syria, to Asia Minor and to Greece and finally to Rome.

(4) The mission of the church is Israel's mission to the nations and therefore an essential aspect of Israel's restoration (Acts 1:6-8; 2:39; 3:17-26; 15:14-18; 26:22-23; 28:23).

(5) Jesus' status means that he can impart forgiveness,* rescue from God's judgment,* the gift of the Spirit and salvation (cf. Acts 2:38; 10:43; 17:31; 22:16).

(6) The Twelve, who had witnessed the main events in the life of Jesus, particularly his death and resurrection, are the primary witnesses to the fact that God has fulfilled his earlier promises.

(7) The personal experience of the living power of Jesus Christ entitles other Christians to be regarded as witnesses as well.

(8) The proclamation of the Word is a decisive factor in the passing on of the message of salvation; the witness of the apostles and other missionaries, delivered in the form of speeches that were intended as a medium of persuasion, includes elements of reasoned argument.

(9) In the encounters with Jews the decisive point is whether Jesus is the Messiah whose life and death correspond with the plan of God and whose status as kyrios ("Lord") accords him an authoritative position similar to that of God.

(10) In the encounters with pagans the proclamation centers on biblical conceptions of God, who demands repentance* and has designated Jesus as Lord and future judge.

(11) Jesus' position enables the apostles to do the same kind of mighty works as Jesus had done.

(12) The success of the mission is dependent on and enabled by the Holy Spirit (Acts 4:8, 31), as the crucial factor in conversion is the gift of the Spirit (Acts 2:38; 8:14-17; 9:17; 10:44-48; 11:15-18); the missionaries are inspired to speak with an effectiveness that often transcends their native ability (Acts 4:13).

(13) In the conversion of individual people several factors come together (cf. Acts 10:1—11:18): God's initiative, human instruments of God's purpose, points of contact with the religious and ethical disposition of the hearers, the reception of salvation as gracious gift.

(14) The church needs to be open for new challenges and new developments (Acts 6:1-7; 10:1—11:18).

(15) The Christian mission involves progress despite opposition: missionaries are threatened by the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, they are brought before magistrates of Greek or Roman cities; some are killed, others are maltreated, some escape by a miracle; despite the opposition, the word of God continues its triumphal progress (cf. Marshall, 56-76; Dunn 1996, xix-xx).

3.2. The Vision of Acts 1:8 and Paul. The vision of Acts 1:8 is a worldwide mission of the apostles. What Luke then narrates is the Judean and Samaritan mission of the Jerusalem apostles (Acts 1—12) and Paul's mission from Jerusalem to Rome (Acts 13—28). As Rome is not "the ends of the earth," Luke does not report the fulfillment of Acts 1:8 but rather the most significant events leading to this goal (Hengel 1995, 35-36). This may help explain why the area depicted by the list in Acts 2:9-11 stops short of the traditional "ends of the earth" in each direction: India, Scythia, Spain and Ethiopia. As Luke had assumed a Roman view of the world in his Gospel, presenting Augustus as the ruler of the whole oikoumenē (Lk 2:1), he presents in the Jewish, Jerusalem-centered geographical perspective (at the beginning of Acts) how the good news of Jesus was carried from Jerusalem toward the ends of the earth. Luke presents Paul's mission as representative of the entire worldwide mission of the church: it took him to only the northwest part of the world as defined by the Jewish Diaspora, with the ends of the earth lying beyond the extent of the Diaspora. But Luke knows that there are other stories besides Paul's: when the converted eunuch continued his journey to Ethiopia (presumably to Meroe, the capital of Ethiopia/Nubia) he was "on his way" (Acts 8:39) to one of the "ends of the earth" (Bauckham 1995, 422).

3.3. Missionary Speeches and Mission Reports. The attempt to extract from the missionary speeches in Acts (Acts 2:14-39; 3:12-26; 4:9-12; 5:30-32; 10:34-43; 13:16-38; 14:15-17; 17:22-31) a common standard pattern (Wilckens, 81-91, who also analyzes 1 Thess 1:9-10 and Heb 6:1-2) has been criticized on account of basic differences between the various passages (Holtz, 55).

Luke regularly includes reports that missionaries give to churches (Acts 14:27; 15:3, 12; 21:19; cf. Acts 11:5-17; 12:17).

4. Mission in the Letter to the Hebrews. Without showing evidence of an interest in the Gentile mission, the author's theology has been seen as grounded in the theology of the early Hellenist Christians of Jerusalem, represented by Stephen and Philip, which fostered world mission whose biblical support was a reinterpretation of Israel's redemptive history (Manson, 25-46; cf. Lane, cxlvi-cl).

4.1. Preaching as the Work of God. The Christians to whom this letter was addressed had come to faith in response to the preaching of people who had heard Jesus teach (Heb 2:3; see Hebrews). The witness of these preachers had been made effective through visible signs that confirmed that God continued to speak and act through the missionaries (Heb 2:4; cf. Lane, 1:39-40). The reminder of elementary instruction in Hebrews 6:1-2 should probably not be interpreted in terms of missionary preaching or in terms of a rule for accepting new believers into the church; it is more generally a reflection of catechesis in a Jewish Christian environment.

4.2. The Preaching of the Missionaries. The reference to the "leaders" (hēgoumenoi) in Hebrews 13:7 may refer to the founders of the local Christian community the writer addresses; that is, to the missionaries whose preaching of the word of God and its effects in leading people to faith in Jesus Christ made them leaders (Lane). Their daily behavior was such that they remained faithful to the end and is therefore a model for the faith of the community. In the context of Hebrews 13:7, the statement in Hebrews 13:8 asserts that although the missionaries and preachers change, the preaching must remain the same. In the context of Hebrews 13:9, the acclamation of Hebrews 13:8 implies that to the extent that Jesus Christ was presented authoritatively in the preaching of the missionary leaders, they continue to have authority in the local Christian community, even after their deaths (Lane, 528-29).

5. Mission in the General Epistles.
The General Epistles do not discourse on the task of mission; several references to the commission of spreading the gospel indicate, however, that the active participation in mission was regarded as a matter of course.

5.1. James. The letter of James* does not contain evidence for missionary concern or activity (Davids 1982, 18). The comment on the believer who "turns back a sinner from the error of his way" (Jas 5:20) relates to members of the church who have deliberately forsaken the "way of truth." When a fellow believer turns a brother or a sister back from the error of wrong behavior, the "wandering" Christian is saved from destruction and freed of his or her sins through repentance. However, the notion of a concern for missionary involvement among pagan sinners must be regarded as a logical extension of the passage.

5.2. Jude. The athletic metaphor of the "fight for the faith" (Jude 3) does not suggest primarily the negative task of opposing the false teachers but refers, as in Paul, to the offensive contest of promoting the advance and victory of the gospel (see Jude). Resisting the influence of the false teachers and their denial of the moral implications of the gospel is part of the struggle for the gospel. The people who are to be "snatched from the fire" (Jude 22) are not unbelievers who should be introduced to faith in Jesus Christ but church members who indulged in sinful behavior and were thus in imminent danger of judgment at the Parousia (Jude 14-15).

5.3. The Letters of Peter. At the end of the opening thanksgiving (1 Pet 1:3-12) Peter describes the present as the culmination of salvation history (1 Pet 1:10-12): the salvation that the prophets spoke about belongs to the Christians living in Asia Minor scattered as homeless among the Gentiles (1 Pet 1:1), presently suffering affliction (1 Pet 1:6). They received God's "saving grace" (1 Pet 1:10) as a result of the preaching of missionaries who announced the good news (1 Pet 1:12: hoi euangelisamenoi). These "evangelizers" remain anonymous. According to Peter, their "success" is the work of God himself: the missionary proclamation of the gospel is accompanied by the power of "the Holy Spirit sent from heaven." Thus the evangelistic mission of the church, carried out in the present where God finally fulfills the promises given to the prophets and where the righteous* suffer the affliction of the messianic end time, is seen as the decisive world-historical and eschatological process by which the promised and long-hidden salvation is being revealed and imparted (see 1 Peter).

Although Peter is hardly positive about the culture and its lifestyle that the Christians face (cf. 1 Pet 1:14; 2:25; 4:3-4), he does not advocate withdrawal, as this is impossible and "because he shares the early church's sense of evangelistic mission" (Davids 1990, 21). One of the purposes of the privileged position of the Christian community as the chosen and holy people of God (1 Pet 2:9) is to "announce the praiseworthy deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light" (1 Pet 2:9; see Light). This has been interpreted as defining the outer-directed priestly* ministry of the church in terms of proclaiming to the world the mighty acts of God; this interpretation too narrowly highlights a single title in the list. The interpretation that concludes from the use of exangellō in the Septuagint that 1 Peter 2:9 refers to proclamation directed to God in worship* rather than to missionary preaching (cf. Michaels, 110) is dubious on semantic grounds. There seems to be no reason why one should view the interpretation in terms of worship and in terms of missionary preaching as alternatives, particularly in view of 1 Peter 1:10-12 and 1 Peter 3:1, 15.

In 1 Peter 3:1 Peter speaks to Christian women of the hope that their unbelieving husbands "who are disobedient to the word" (i.e., who did not respond to the preaching of the gospel by faith) might be "won" (kerdainō) by their devoted and commendable lifestyle (anastrophē) "without word" (aneu logou). Where preaching did not lead to conversions, an exemplary lifestyle might save unbelieving spouses (see Household Codes; Marriage; Woman and Man). More generally, as believers live among unbelievers and as pagan acquaintances might inquire after the reasons for their Christian faith and for their changed behavior (cf. 1 Pet 3:13), they are called upon to "always be ready" to give an "accounting" (apologia) to anyone who questions them (1 Pet 3:15).

The twofold effort of maintaining the Christian identity (of the church corporately and of one's life personally) in the context of pagan society without discarding social responsibilities (1 Pet 2:13—3:12) and of missionary outreach to non-Christians (1 Pet 3:15) had both positive results in that one could expect that people would be converted (cf. 1 Pet 3:1) and negative effects in that nonconformity might lead to self-isolation, rejection and even persecution (cf. 1 Pet 4:1-4). If allotriepiskopos in 1 Peter 4:15 is understood in the sense of "busybody in other people's affairs," Peter seeks to calm Christians who, in their zeal for the gospel, behave in culturally unacceptable forms as guardians of morality (cf. Michaels, 267). Although this interpretation fits the early Christian missionary situation (cf. the polemic against Christians in the second and third centuries by Celsus and Pophyry), it does not seem to fit the context in 1 Peter 4:14-16: Peter's exhortation would amount to dissuading the believers from missionary efforts, which is not possible in view of 1 Peter 1:12; 3:15. The assumption that he warns of importunate, overzealous practices of missionary involvement on account of which Christians became a nuisance is too harmless: consistent Christian mission will always bring disturbance and irritation into families and communities of people, and the term allotriepiskopos in 1 Peter 4:15 should more plausibly be interpreted in a criminal sense, perhaps as "embezzlement" as the vice typical of traders and brokers.

In 2 Peter 1:16 the charge of the false teachers is refuted that the teaching about the Parousia of Jesus Christ is a "myth," a fairy story fabricated with an unworthy motive. Peter stresses that the common apostolic teaching about the Parousia is based on eyewitness testimony and implies that the missionary preaching that led to the establishment of the churches addressed included the expectation of the Parousia (see 2 Peter).

5.4. The Letters of John. Harnack visualized a large-scale mission led by John the presbyter who, based in Ephesus, worked in the Pauline churches of Asia Minor, sent out traveling missionaries and maintained oversight over the churches by itinerant emissaries, an oversight which some churches sought to throw off (Harnack 1908, 1:81-82; see John, Letters of). This view is not usually held today. According to another reconstruction, the presbyter tells the Christians who are faithful to him to refuse hospitality to secessionist missionaries by not even talking to them (2 Jn 10-11). Diotrephes, the host of a house church, took this policy further and refused hospitality to all missionaries in order to save the church from contamination (3 Jn 9-10); as a result the presbyter requests Gaius to offer hospitality to traveling Johannine missionaries (3 Jn 5-8), which is the main concern of 3 John.

Whatever the situation of the Christian communities to which the epistles of John belong and their relationship to other churches in Asia Minor was, the missionaries of whom 3 John 5-8 gives evidence (the "brothers" in 3 Jn 5 are clearly missionaries, as is shown by the urgency of the demand) are characterized in the following ways.

(1) They have "gone out" (exerchesthai), that is, they have left their homes in order to embark on missionary travels (cf. Acts 14:20; 15:40). (2) They travel "for the sake of [hyper] the Name"; that is, they went out in the service of Christ and also to make him known, proclaiming the divine name given to Jesus (proclaiming Jesus as God's presence in the flesh; see Name). (3) They have been "accepting nothing from the pagans" (ethnikoi, "unbelievers"); they carry out their missionary work without either expecting or begging for support, presumably in order to avoid being confused with itinerant Cynic philosophers. (4) The church is "bound to support" such men, as they are "brothers." Such support (hypolambanein, 3 Jn 7) includes a hospitable welcome, protection and the provision of practical help and supplies that would enable them to journey to the next stop (propempein, 3 Jn 6). (5) Christians who thus support missionaries prove themselves to be "coworkers (synergoi) in the cause of the truth"; that is, they have a share in the ministry of the missionaries who proclaim the truth,* the reality of God as it has been revealed in the gospel.

6. Mission in the Revelation.

6.1. A Vision for the World. The last book of the NT canon* begins and ends with the theme of "witness" (Rev 1:2, 5; 22:20), and it most frequently refers to the whole world ("the inhabitants of the earth," ten times), indicating the universal worship of the beast,* or to "[all] the nations" (fifteen times); seven times we find the phrase "every tribe and language and people and nation" (Rev 5:9; 7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6; 17:16). One of the main themes of Revelation is that of witness (Bauckham 1993 Theology, 72-73). Jesus is "the faithful and true witness" (Rev 3:14; cf. Rev 1:5), referring to the verbal witness to the truth of God (cf. Rev 1:2, 9; 6:9; 20:4), as are his followers (Rev 2:13; 17:6) who hold "the witness of Jesus" (Rev 12:17; 19:10), which is their own witness (Rev 6:9; 12:11), the witness "to the true God and his righteousness, which exposes the falsehood of idolatry and the evil of those who worship the beast." In the judicial contest that is carried out in the courtroom of the world in order to decide who is the true God, Jesus and his followers bear witness to the truth.

6.2. Encouraging Faithful Witness. In the oracle to the church in Philadelphia, which received unqualified commendation from Christ who holds the "key of David" (Rev 3:7), Christ assures the believers that he has set before them an "open door which nobody is able to shut" (Rev 3:8). Unless this statement refers to free entrance into the messianic kingdom (after having been excommunicated from the local synagogue, Rev 3:9), it may mean that Christ opens up a good opportunity for missionary activity (cf. 1 Cor 16:9) even though the church has "little power" and has to endure conflict, perhaps referring to the strategic location at the juncture of trade routes leading to Mysia, Lydia and Phrygia. The two interpretations are not mutually exclusive (Hemer 1989, 162-63).

6.3. The Missionary Nature of the Church. Unless the vision of the measuring of the temple and of the two witnesses (Rev 11:1-13) is a prediction of a return of Moses and Elijah seeking to restore the nation of Israel to its land, it is best interpreted as a parable that depicts in dramatic language the nature of the church's witness: the two witnesses symbolize the church (cf. Rev 11:14 with Rev 1:12, 20), the eschatological temple of Ezekiel 40—48 (cf. the presence of worshipers in Rev 11:1), in its role of witness (two martyres) to the nations to which it is called even in the midst of persecution and martyrdom.

Bauckham links the content of the scroll* of Revelation 5:1-9 that is unsealed in Revelation 10:1-10 with the missionary witness and death of faithful Christians depicted in Revelation 11:1-13, pointing to John's central prophetic concern about the coming of God's kingdom on earth. The sacrificial death of the Lamb* and the ministry of his followers, who have been redeemed "from all the nations" (Rev 5:9) to bear prophetic witness "to all the nations" (cf. Rev 11:3-13), are God's strategy for winning all the peoples of the world (cf. Rev 14:14-16; 15:3-4) from the dominion of the beast to his own kingdom (Bauckham 1993 Theology, 84-108; cf. Bauckham 1993 Climax, 238-337). This interpretation in terms of a universalistic missionary vision must be balanced by pointing out that John does not predict the degree of success that the witness of the faithful Christians will have; that John not only depicts the eschatological fulfillment of the history of God's covenant* people redeemed from all the nations in the full inclusion of all the nations but also pictures the unrepentant in their persistent adherence to the beast so that they will be condemned in final judgment; that John does not predict the salvation of each and every human being: unrepentant sinners have no place in the new Jerusalem (Rev 21:8, 27; 22:15; cf. Bauckham 1993 Theology, 103, 139).

7. Mission in the Early Noncanonical Writings. Noncanonical and patristic texts of the second century (see Apostolic Fathers) still reflect awareness of the worldwide missionary program of the church that we see in the Gospels (Mk 13:10; 14:9; 16:15; Mt 28 19; Lk 24, 47) and in Acts (Acts 1:8); for Rome around 150 see generally Justin Martyr (Justin Apol. I 6.2; 10.5; 12.11; 14.3; 16.3-4; 18.2; 23.2).

7.1. Mission as Ongoing Perspective. In Barnabas 16.10 we find an echo of the apostolic conviction that God himself speaks in the preaching of missionaries. The Kerygma Petrou (c. 90-140) incorporated assumed discourses of Peter with the proclamation of the one God, repudiation of polytheism and Jewish worship and exposition of the death and resurrection of Jesus. The text is not to be regarded as simply apologetic but as accentuating certain elements in early Christian missionary preaching (Schneemelcher in Hennecke and Schneemelcher, 2:97). In recounting the "Martyrdom of Christians in Vienna and Lugdunum" (cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.1.3-63; 5.2.2-7; the events took place in 177/178) we hear of a certain Alexander, a doctor from Phrygia, who was known for his love for God and his parrēsia tou logou ("boldness in preaching," described as an apostolic gift) and who had traveled throughout Gaul (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.1.49), evidently preaching the gospel.

The apocryphal acts of individual apostles contain descriptions of the missionary work of the apostles in different regions and the effects of their preaching, but the particular apostle and the description of his character is usually given such prominence "that we can no longer describe them in terms of missionary history, conceived as the history of the Word of God and its publication throughout the world" (Schneemelcher in Hennecke and Schneemelcher, 2:173). Thus the miracle stories, which often describe fantastic and bizarre effects, are included not to describe the mission of the church as the work of God but rather to glorify the apostles as miracle workers, with the consequence that the apocryphal acts are more entertaining than edificatory.

The Acts of Andrew (c. 150-190) mention a journey of the apostle from Pontus to Achaia via Amasea, Sinope, Nicea, Nicomedia, Byzantium, across Thracia to Perinthus, to Philippi and Thessalonica in Macedonia, and finally to Patrae in Achaia (cf. Hornschuh in Hennecke and Schneemelcher, 2:397-98). In Acts of John 33—36 (c. 150-180, possibly of written in Egypt) we are given a missionary speech of John in Ephesus: the pagans are addressed as depraved people as in a catalog of vices; they are called upon to change their ways in order to escape eternal doom; the "mercy and goodness" of Jesus Christ are briefly mentioned (Acts of John 33.8-9).

7.2. Lack of Missionary Strategy? However, the evidence of the apocryphal gospels, the apocryphal acts of individual apostles and other patristic texts (evidence that has not been newly assessed on a large scale since Harnack, but see Lane Fox) indicates that the church(es) of the second and third centuries did not seem to have had an operative program of world mission.

N. Brox (194-215) gives four reasons. First was the conviction that world mission was the task of the twelve apostles given by the risen Christ (Mt 28:16-20; Acts 1:8), linked with the implication that they fulfilled this task, dividing up the world. Acts of Thomas 1 begins with a list of the twelve apostles who were "all in Jerusalem" and then "divided the regions of the world, that each one of us might go to the region which fell to his lot, and to the nation to which the Lord sent him." Hermas Similitudes 9.17.1-2 refers to the twelve nations (ethnē) that inhabit the earth and among whom the apostles exclusively preached "the Son of God" (cf. Herm. Sim. 9.25.2). Syriac Didascalia 43.12-17 states the universality of Jesus' missionary commission: "Jesus Christ sent out us, the twelve, to teach the (chosen) people and the Gentile peoples" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.1; cf. Maiburg). Thus Irenaeus describes the church as having spread over the entire world to the ends of the earth—as the work of the apostles (Irenaeus Haer. 1.10.1-2; 3.11.8; 5.20.1; cf. Tertullian Adv. Jud. 7.3—6.9; Origen Peri Arch. 4.1.2-5). Rather than reflecting on the permanent task of world mission, the postapostolic teachers reflected on the success of the worldwide mission of the apostles.

Second was the certainty that conversion of people is the sovereign work of God. A third reason was the conviction that as a result of the mission of the apostles the gospel is presently offered everywhere; that is, the missionary commission of the Lord has been fulfilled in the geographically universal distribution of Christians. Therefore, the fact that not all people are Christians does not necessitate geographical expansion (i.e., mission) but refers to the coming Parousia and God's judgment of the world (cf. later Augustine Ep. 199.48).

A fourth reason was the attitude that the primary task of the churches was their appearance before the world, that is, their holiness.* There are only eight instances of prayer* for "mission" or for the conversion of people in pre-Constantine literature: 1 Clement 59.4; Ignatius Ephesians 10.1; Aristides Apology 17.3; Justin Martyr Dialogue with Trypho 35.8; 108.3; Syriac Didascalia 2.56; Cyprian De Dominica Oratione 17; Apostolic Constitutions 8.10.16-17. Tertullian's prayer for the delay of the Parousia (Tertullian Apol. 30.7; 39.2) may be motivated by a missionary interest.

Even though the postapostolic church retained a missionary vision with universal claims (cf. Herm. Sim. 8.3.2; Justin Dial. Tryph. 53.5), it seems that there were no professional missionaries, no missionary schools or a systematic missionary strategy until the fifth century (Frohnes and Knorr, 3-67). In the post-NT period up to the age of Constantine we have unambiguous reports about only two active Christian missionaries: the Alexandrian Pantaenus, who went to India about 110 (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.10) and the heretical Mani (216-276) from southern Mesopotamia, the founder of Manichaeism (Lane Fox, 282, 561-62); another missionary of the second century was perhaps Addai in Edessa (see 2.8 above) and, later, Gregory the Wonderworker around Neocaesarea in Pontus (third century). The lack of great missionary personalities is sometimes explained by the loss of Jerusalem as the center of the church after A.D. 70: apparently neither Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus nor Rome took up the apostolic task of sending missionaries to foreign lands.

*7.3. Missionary Methods. When Pliny deplores the fact that the abominable "superstition" of the Christians has reached people of every age and social standing and has spread even to the villages and the countryside (Pliny Ep. 10.96.8-10) this testifies that the numbers of Christians and of churches had increased considerably during the second century. One should not explain the astonishing growth of the churches only by referring to Harnack's dictum that the "church exerted a missionary influence in virtue of her very existence" (Harnack 1908, 2:511). The geographical expansion of the church cannot thus be accounted for.

Eusebius writes that disciples of the apostles "whose hearts had been ravished by the divine Word" gave up their possessions and "set out on long journeys, doing the work of evangelists, eagerly striving to preach Christ to those who had never heard the word of faith," appointing others as pastors of the newly found churches while they themselves proceeded "to other countries and other peoples." He says that it is not possible to mention by name all the men who served as pastors or evangelists in the generation that followed the apostles (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 3.37.1-4). With respect to the second century he asserts that "there were still many evangelists of the Word eager to use their inspired zeal after the example of the apostles for the increase and building up of the divine Word" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.10.2; cf. Origen Cont. Cels. 3.9).

Even though the names of the early Christian missionaries are lost, it appears that the gospel was spread by traveling Christians (cf. Did. 11—13, referring to wandering preachers, apostles and prophets whom the churches are to support), by the exemplary behavior of Christian traders (cf. Justin Apol. I 16.4), by Christians being scattered as a result of persecution (initiated by hostile pagans or by fellow Christians who would not tolerate differing beliefs) or as captives of wars, and mainly through conversations with neighbors in apartment houses (Justin Apol. I 6.4; Justin Apol. II 1.2) and with family members in private houses (cf. Justin Apol. II 1.2). Many conversions are due to the witness and testimony of Christian women to husbands and slaves,* particularly in the higher strata of society (Grech, 92); Christian slaves witness to women and children (thus Celsus; cf. Origen Cont. Cels. 3.55). Some of the teachers, such as Justin Martyr and others, were missionaries in the sense that pagans entered their schools and listened to their teaching. Conversions in church services were presumably rare, since the originally unrestricted admission was increasingly limited to baptized* Christians and approved catechumens due to the danger of denunciation (cf. Lampe, 81-82; MacMullen 1984, 111; Lane Fox, 280-81).

Marcion's* activities, which reached all Roman provinces after he had left Rome in 144 (cf. Justin Apol. I 26; 58), are usually not interpreted in terms of missionary outreach (the two hundred thousand sesterces that the church of Rome gave him back would go a long way toward financing the extensive travels).

*7.4. Explaining the Spread of Christianity. Several factors that a former generation of scholarship saw as having facilitated the spread of Christianity are either rejected or seen in a more nuanced manner today (cf. Praet):

(1) The critique of polytheism by Platonist and Stoic philosophers, for this never had any practical consequences for participation in pagan cults.

(2) The disintegration of the Greek city states (poleis) discrediting the gods, an explanation that focuses too much on Greece.

(3) Religious syncretism with its tolerance and its occasional dissolution of several gods into a single one; syncretism did not lead to monotheism.

(4) The Hellenistic ruler cult implying the possibility of a god-man, a parallel that does not encourage or explain faith in a crucified Messiah.

(5) Pagan religiosity saw a steady decline climaxing in the third century; this crisis theory has been abandoned or heavily modified, as it does not fit either chronologically or geographically and is selective in its appeal to the extant data, and there is much evidence for the confident spirit of paganism.

(6) Status inconsistency among independent women, wealthy Jews in pagan cities, well-to-do freedmen stigmatized by their origin, embracing "substitute careers" as Christian converts (cf. Meeks, 191); an explanation that does not fit the facts or reckon with the complex way in which people view their own status (cf. Lane Fox, 319-22).

(7) The material and moral insecurity, leading to anxiety and a yearning for salvation in the second and especially third centuries; the evidence for optimism and firm belief in the pagans gods more than neutralizes the anxieties of some intellectuals of the time (Lane Fox, 65-66).

(8) The Christian exclusiveness, refusing all compromises and explicit forms of syncretism, as attractive features; however, pagans did not complain about the numerous options, and polytheism also had its advantages (Lane Fox, 575).

(9) The anonymity and loneliness of life in the cities made the Christian communities with their sense of belonging attractive; this sociopsychological explanation, although not entirely without value, seems to be in tune with more modern feelings: apart from Rome and Alexandria, the Mediterranean towns were small and remained connected with the countryside, and their populations consisted of identifiable social groups that maintained the traditional social controls.

The three most popular explanations for the success of the early Christian mission before Constantine are (1) miracles and exorcisms (for MacMullen the most important, if not the only, reason for conversion to Christianity during this time; cf. MacMullen 1981, 49-112; MacMullen 1984, 17-42); however, pagan gods were also believed to produce miracles, or differing explanations for miracles could be offered, and excitement about miracles wrought by Christians does not necessarily lead to acceptance of Christian exclusivism (cf. Lane Fox, 329-30). (2) The courage of the martyrs, impressing spectators with the evident inspiration of a powerful God and the value of a faith worth dying for (cf. Justin Apol. II 12; Tertullian Apol. 50.13-15); however, pagans like Epictetus offered less flattering explanations for Christian martyrdoms, and inquiry by spectators would not by necessity lead to acceptance of the Christian faith. (3) The ideal and practice of Christian love and charity impressed many (cf. Tertullian Apol. 39.7 and the statement by the emperor Julian reported by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 9.8.11-14); however, pagan heartlessness could be exaggerated, and Christian intolerance and even hatred directed against fellow Christians who had different persuasions did not go unnoticed.

Occasionally other factors are mentioned: (4) The Christian view of life after death, with the offer of resurrection and eternal bliss; however, the idea of bodily resurrection remained unacceptable to many pagans (cf. Origen Cont. Cels. 5.14), and the message about a second coming of Jesus initiating the end of the world was not easy to believe either. (5) The historical nature of the Christian faith, including the unique personality of its founder, contrast with elaborate mythologies of numerous pagan gods; however, pagans countered by asking why the Christian savior came so late, leaving generations of people without salvation, and what he accomplished for his faithful other than persecution (thus Celsus; cf. Origen Cont. Cels. 4.7; 8.69). (6) The Christian inclusiveness, transcending national and ethnic ties, social and financial barriers, geographical boundaries, being open to both men and women; however, depending on one's personal situation such advantages might be disadvantages, and there is no evidence of pagans deciding for the Christian faith on the basis of an evaluation of these features.

Whether the Christian faith needed the conversion of Constantine in 312 (or slightly earlier) and the ensuing political support to become a world religion, having been a minority religion before then (MacMullen, Lane Fox, Praet), or whether the decisive period was the third century with a rapid numerical expansion and a growing respectability (W. H. C. Frend, P. Brown), is still disputed by historians. As none of the factors mentioned (7.4) and no combination of factors sufficiently explains the astonishing spread of Christianity, it may be more than Christian bias if we see the growth of the church as the work of divine providence.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; CENTERS OF CHRISTIANITY; EVANGELISM IN THE EARLY CHURCH; GENTILES; PENTECOST; SOCIAL SETTING OF EARLY NON-PAULINE CHRISTIANITY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. W. Barnard, "The Origins and Emergence of the Church in Edessa During the First Two Centuries," VC 22 (1968) 161-75; C. K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); idem, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); idem, "James and the Jerusalem Church" in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. J. Bauckham (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 415-80; P. G. Bolt, "Mission and Witness" in The Book of Acts in Its Theological Setting, ed. I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome: New Testament Cradles of Catholic Christianity (New York: Paulist, 1983); N. Brox, "Zur christlichen Mission in der Spätantike" in Mission im Neuen Testament, ed. K. Kertelge (QD 93; Freiburg: Herder, 1982) 190-237; R. F. Collins, "Thomas," ABD 6:528-29; P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); idem, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); A. Dihle, "Neues zur Thomas-Tradition," JAC 6 (1963) 54-70; J. D. G. Dunn, The Acts of the Apostles (London: Epworth, 1996); idem, The Theology of Paul's Letter to the Galatians (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); E. E. Ellis, "'The End of the Earth' (Acts 1:8)," BBR 1 (1991) 123-32; J. N. Farquhar, "The Apostle Thomas in North/South India," BJRL 10 (1926) 80-111; ibid., 11 (1927) 20-50; H. Frohnes and U. W. Knorr, eds., Kirchengeschichte als Missionsgeschichte, 1: Die Alte Kirche (Munich: Kaiser, 1974); P. Grech, "The Daily Life of Second Century Christians," MTh 41 (1990) 87-96; F. Hahn, Mission in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1981); A. von Harnack, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (4th ed.; Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1924); idem, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (2d ed.; 2 vols.; New York: Putnam, 1908); M. Hengel, Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); idem, Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the Earliest History of Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, "The Geography of Palestine in Acts" in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. J. Bauckham (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 27-78; E. Hennecke and W. Schneemelcher, New Testament Apocrypha (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963, 1965); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History, ed. C. Gempf (WUNT 49; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989 [1986]; T. Holtz, Der erste Brief an die Thessalonicher (EKK; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1986); P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten: Untersuchungen zur Sozialgeschichte (WUNT 2.18; 2d ed.; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989); W. L. Lane, Hebrews (2 vols.; WBC; Dallas: Word, 1991); R. Lane Fox, Pagans and Christians in the Mediterranean World from the Second Century A.D. to the Conversion of Constantine (2d ed.; London: Penguin, 1988); J. K. Lott, "India," ABD 3:410; S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); R. MacMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire (A.D. 100-400) (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1984); idem, Paganism in the Roman Empire (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981); U. Maiburg, "Und bis an die Grenzen der Erde . . . Die Ausbreitung des Christentums in den Länderlisten und deren Verwendung in Antike und Christentum," JAC 26 (1983) 38-53; W. Manson, The Epistle to the Hebrews: A Historical and Theological Reconsideration (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1951); I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles (NTG; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); V. Martin, A House Divided: The Parting of the Ways Between Synagogue and Church (New York: Paulist, 1995); J. L. Martyn, "A Law-Observant Mission to Gentiles: The Background of Galatians," SJT 38 (1985) 307-24; W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christian: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983); B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament (2d ed.; Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1994); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); O. Michel, "Σκύθης," TDNT 7:449-50; J. Murphy-O'Connor, Paul: A Critical Life (Oxford: Clarendon, 1996); W.-H. Ollrogg, Paulus und seine Mitarbeiter (WMANT 50; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1979); D. Praet, "Explaining the Christianization of the Roman Empire: Older Theories and Recent Developments," Sacris Erudiri 33 (1992-93) 5-11; R. Reck, Kommunikation und Gemeindeaufbau: Eine Studie zu Entstehung, Leben und Wachstum paulinischer Gemeinden in den Kommunikationsstrukturen der Antike (SBS 22; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1991); W. Reinhardt, "The Population Size of Jerusalem and the Numerical Growth of the Jerusalem Church" in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. J. Bauckham (BAFCS 4; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 237-65; R. Riesner, Die Frühzeit des Apostels Paulus: Studien zur Chronologie, Missionsstrategie und Theologie (WUNT 71; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1994); E. J. Schnabel, "Jesus and the Beginnings of the Mission to the Gentiles" in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 37-58; J. M. Scott, "Luke's Geographical Horizon" in The Book of Acts in Its Greco-Roman Setting, ed. D. W. J. Gill and C. Gempf (BAFCS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 483-544; idem, Paul and the Nations (WUNT 84; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1995); C. Spicq, Les Épîtres pastorales (4th ed.; Paris: Gabalda, 1969); C. P. Thiede, Simon Peter: From Galilee to Rome (Exeter: Paternoster, 1986); L. M. White, "Adolf Harnack and the 'Expansion' of Early Christianity: A Reappraisal of Social History," SecCent 5 (1985-86) 97-127; U. Wilckens, Die Missionsreden der Apostelgeschichte: Form- und traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen (WMANT 5; 3d ed.; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukir-chener Verlag, 1974); B. W. Winter, "In Public and in Private: Early Christian Interactions with Religious Pluralism" in One God, One Lord in a World of Religious Pluralism, ed. B. W. Winter and A. D. Clarke (Cambridge: Tyndale House, 1991) 112-34; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996). E. J. Schnabel

MONARCHICAL BISHOP. See CHURCH ORDER, GOVERNMENT.

MONOTHEISM. See CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: PARTINGS OF THE WAYS; GOD.

MONTANISM. See PROPHECY, PROPHETS, FALSE PROPHETS.

MORALITY. See ETHICS.

MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY

Human beings are mortal, that is, subject to bodily death. God* is immortal (Rev 4:8-10; 10:6), but he bestows immortality as a grace.

1. Background
2. Acts
3. Hebrews and General Epistles
4. Revelation
5. Postapostolic Developments

1. Background.

1.1. Vocabulary. The distinctive vocabulary is rare in our canonical material but regular in the apostolic fathers.* Aphtharsia ("immortality") and its cognates phthartos and aphthartos ("mortal," "immortal") appear there. Words from another etymology, athanatos and athanasia ("immortal" and "immortality") and thnētos ("mortal"), appear in the Fathers; the last is used also in 1 Peter.* Human beings are designated "mortals" in 1 Clement 39.2 and the Epistle to Diognetus 9.2.

1.2. Concepts. The church's growing interest in immortality is understandable, given its expansion into Hellenistic territory. In the pagan mind the gods were held to be immortal (see Acts 28:6), but there the certainty ended. For Epicureans such as Lucretius (On the Nature of Things) death was the end of human existence. Others believed that the soul would be reincarnated or would exist eternally apart from a body. The Platonists taught that the soul was preexistent and immortal, its connection with a body only temporary. That shaped the thinking of some Hellenistic Jews (Wis 2:23; 8:19-20; Philo Sacr. 5-7). But in Second Temple Judaism* it was more conventional to suppose that the soul was conscious after death and would be reunited with the body at the resurrection* (e.g., 1 Enoch 51; 4 Ezra 8:53). According to contemporary witnesses, the Pharisees believed in resurrection, while their opponents, the Sadducees, denied any survival after death (Josephus J. W. 2.8.14 §165; Acts 23:6-8). The Essenes meanwhile taught either the soul's natural immortality (Jub. 23:30-31; Josephus J. W. 2.8.11 §154-55; perhaps 1QH 6:34) or immortality as the result of resurrection (Hippolytus Refut. 9.22).

Christians tried to steer a course amid the competing views. They were uncomfortable at first with calling the soul immortal by nature. Nevertheless they affirmed the soul's survival of death and above all the resurrection hope. In addition there was the predictable tension between the reception of immortality in the age to come and the realization of some of its spiritual benefits in this life.

2. Acts.

As Stephen* died, he cried out "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" (Acts 7:59, recalling Lk 23:46). Left unstated is the implication that Stephen would go to be consciously present with Christ* (who rises to greet him, a unique description) after death, in the manner of Luke 23:43 (cf. Lk 16:22-26).

The resurrection of Christ was of course central to the apostolic kerygma. They took Psalm 16:8-11 as a proof-text in Acts 2:25-32: God "would not allow your holy one to see corruption," but Jesus had to be that holy one. He, not David, rose with immortal body, no longer to see the corruption of mortal existence (cf. Acts 13:34-37). It was this aspect of the gospel that so riled the Sadducees (Acts 4:2; 23:6) and amused the Athenian Epicureans and Stoics (Acts 17:32), all of whom scoffed at the suggestion of personal immortality.

3. Hebrews and General Epistles.

The author of Hebrews urges believers to cling to Christ because they have approached the heavenly city, in which are "the spirits of righteous ones made perfect" (Heb 12:23), an allusion to Christians who have died and gone to heaven* (see Ellingworth, 680-81). Unique to Hebrews* is the argument for Christ's superior priesthood* based on his immortality. The Aaronic priests kept dying and needed replacements. Jesus is not only human, but also he lives forever (Heb 7:23-25) to make perpetual intercession for his church.* In Christ people are set free from death's terrors.

For James mortality cannot be given a naturalistic explanation. Rather, it results from the flowering of sin (Jas 1:15). Those who persevere will receive the crown of life (Jas 1:12). 1 Peter draws a contrast between the perishable things of earth, such as gold and silver, and the imperishable gospel that leads to new life* (1 Pet 1:3, 8-19; 1:23; cf. Did. 4.8). According to a difficult passage, the gospel was preached to the dead (1 Pet 4:6), an event that according to one reading implies conscious existence after death (see Michaels, 235-41). In Jude we read that it is Jesus who brings the Christians to eternal life (Jude 21), apparently in the future. In 2 Peter 1:4, 11 it is unclear whether the faithful participate in the divine nature and enter the eternal kingdom of Christ upon death or at the resurrection, although possibly Peter will enter it when he "departs" (2 Pet 1:14-15). Some interpreters have read 2 Peter 1:4 as either a Hellenization of the Christian hope or more likely a recasting of the traditional message in Hellenistic terms (Bauckham, 183-84).

As in the Gospel of John, in 1 John eternal life is the possession of the Christians alone (1 Jn 2:25; 3:14; 5:11-13, 20). Still there is a reservation of immortality until the future (1 Jn 3:2), since only at Christ's appearance will Christians be fully "like him."

4. Revelation.

Jesus has brought about resurrection life by his own victory over death (Rev 1:5, 18; 2:8). In the kingdom his people will partake in resurrection existence and will be able to drink from the water of life (Rev 22:1-2) and eat from the tree of life (Rev 2:7; 22:2).

The reader is invited to escape the second death that is the lake of fire (Rev 2:11; 20:6, 14; 21:8). The most natural reading of Revelation is that people in the lake of fire will experience conscious torment forever (Rev 14:11) after they have been resurrected (Rev 20:13; cf. Dan 12:2), although the beast* and the false prophet* will be cast "alive" into the fire (Rev 19:20).

There is also some indication that human souls are conscious between death and resurrection. In Revelation 6:9-11 martyred Christians are able to speak and ask questions and can wear robes. The "great multitude" of Revelation 7:9-17 seems likewise to comprise deceased saints.

5. Postapostolic Developments.

The issue that pressed upon the church was how to proclaim the gospel to an audience that denied an afterlife or held that immortality was theirs by natural endowment. Their usual formulation was that only God the Creator is immortal in himself (Aristides Apol. 7, Syriac recension). Human beings are mortal (1 Clem. 39.2), but they may find immortality as a supernatural grace in Christ (1 Clem. 35.1-2; 36.2; 2 Clem. 6—7; 14.5; Herm. Sim. 9.23.4), a gift that will reveal itself in resurrection existence but in a lesser manner in conscious fellowship* with Christ between death and the Parousia.* When modern readers pick up these writings, they must remember that those Christians could deny the soul's immortality in one breath but in the next talk of going to be with Christ at death (compare 1 Clem. 39.2 with 1 Clem. 5.4, 7).

There were exceptions. The *Epistle to Diognetus resembles James 2:26 in a superficial way, but it seems to have been influenced, albeit unevenly, by Hellenistic thought: "the soul dwells in the body, nevertheless it is not of the body. . . . The immortal soul dwells in a mortal vessel" (Diogn. 6.3, 8; parallels with Wisdom of Solomon are evident). But even this author returned to traditional categories in Diognetus 9.2-6.

Ignatius* emphasized that Christ had to take on mortality in order to bring the church to immortality (Ign. Eph. 7.2; 20.1; Ign. Phld. 9.2; Ign. Pol. 3.2). It is no wonder, said Ignatius, that the Docetists* refrained from the Eucharist (Ign. Smyrn. 6.2), since without a real incarnation there can be no "bread of life." In a memorable turn of phrase communion became for Ignatius the "medicine of immortality" (see Lord's Supper; Worship). It was an antidote not, apparently, due to its inherent powers but because it placed the communicant within the catholic church (cf. Ign. Eph. 20.1; Ign. Rom. 7.3; and the comments by Schoedel, 97-99). The eucharistic prayer in Didache 10.2 may indicate a traditional association between communion and immortality: "We thank you . . . for the knowledge and faith and immortality that you have made known to us through your child Jesus."

Hermas suspected that Platonist notions might lead to Christians to think they could defile the flesh with impunity (Herm. Sim. 5.7.3). Similarly the preacher of 2 Clement 14.5 predicted that a person may expect life and immortality in the next life but only if the Holy Spirit* is manifestly joined with the flesh in this life. In 2 Clement 9.1-2, likewise: "And let none of you say, 'This flesh is not judged nor will it rise.' Realize this: in what you were saved? In what did you receive your sight, if not in fleshly existence?"

The Martyrdom of Polycarp took a new direction: immediately upon death the bishop of Smyrna was to receive the crown of immortality (ton tēs aptharsias stephanon, Mart. Pol. 17.1; 19.2; cf. the "prize" of immortality in Heb 2:9; Jas 1:12; 2 Clem. 6—7; Ign. Pol. 2.3). That is the same impression given by Ignatius's embracing of the martyrs' sufferings*: "The pangs of birth are upon me! Share my understanding, brothers. Do not hinder me from living! Do not wish my death!" (Ign. Rom. 6.1-2). Polycarp* also stated his hope that he would go immediately to heaven to be with the apostles* and martyrs* and that he would that day be granted a portion in the resurrection of both soul and body (Mart. Pol. 14.2; cf. 4 Ezra 7.96-98), an event that earlier he had linked with Christ's return (Pol. Phil. 2.2).

The Hellenized Jewish-Christian Odes of Solomon (early second century?) are similar to the Johannine viewpoint of eternal life as a present possession, but now immortality appears without reference to the future resurrection (Odes Sol. 10.2; 15.10).

In the second century the Gnostics* took a view of the soul that echoed Platonism. For them a human being is composed of a preexisting spirit or spark (Gos. Thom. 4; cf. the late second-century Gnostic Treatise on Resurrection) that was put into a mortal body by a dull-witted creator god. It will be freed from the body upon death, and should it possess the "gnosis" or knowledge* of its true nature, it will return to its home in the spiritual realm.

Whether responding to Hellenism or Judaism or Gnosticism, most Christians trod a careful path, denying (Origen being a later exception) the soul's preexistence and affirming that the soul is conscious after death but insisting that immortality be connected with bodily resurrection at Christ's return. These themes would receive full expression in the writings of Justin Martyr in the mid-second century (see Justin Martyr Resurrec. 10; Dial. Tryph. 69; 117; 130).

See also ESCHATOLOGY; HELL, ABYSS, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; JUDGMENT; MARTYRDOM; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul and Life Everlasting: Biblical Anthropology and the Monism-Dualism Debate (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); P. Ellingworth, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); M. J. Harris, From Grave to Glory: Resurrection in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); G. J. Riley, Resurrection Reconsidered: Thomas and John in Controversy (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); E. Rohde, Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality Among the Greeks (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1925); W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch: A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

G. S. Shogren

MOSES

Moses, Judaism's most important and imposing figure, plays a prominent role in early Christian literature. The prominence is inevitable, for Christians claimed to be the authentic heirs of Israel's* history, and in first-century Judaism that meant they had to show themselves to be the rightful children of Moses.

1. The Life of Moses
2. The Death of Moses
3. The Return of Moses
4. Moses as Prophet
5. Moses as Type of Christ
6. Moses as Lawgiver
7. Moses as Moral Model
8. The Generation of Moses
9. Jesus as Greater than Moses

1. The Life of Moses.

1.1. Acts. Stephen's* speech in Acts 7 contains an overview of the life of Moses. The primary purpose is to show that, although God worked through Moses to save Israel, the people "did not understand" (Acts 7:25), they "refused" to accept Moses as ruler and judge (Acts 7:35), and they disobeyed the "living oracles" received by him and instead offered sacrifice to an idol of their own making (Acts 7:39-41)—wherefore God judged them (Acts 7:42-43). The implicit lesson is that in the story of Jesus history is repeating itself (see 8.1 below).

Although most of Luke's biographical facts can be found in the OT, postbiblical traditions are also followed. For it is not the OT but extrabiblical sources which tell us that Moses was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts 7:22; cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 1.21-24), that he decided to "visit" his people (Acts 7:23; cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 1.40-44), and that he was forty years old when he went into exile (Acts 7:23; cf. Sipre Deut. §357).

1.2. Hebrews. Hebrews 11:23-28, part of a catalogue of figures of faith,* briefly recounts the life of Moses. Four incidents are mentioned—his birth, his decision to join Israel rather than be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, his leaving Egypt (probably a reference to Ex 2:15, not the exodus), and his keeping of the Passover and sprinkling with blood. Several elements go beyond Exodus. One is the assertion that Moses willingly chose to share ill-treatment with his own people rather than a royal life. The same thought appears in Philo (Vit. Mos. 1.149) and Josephus (Ant. 4.3.2 §42). Also extra biblical is the association of Moses' flight from Egypt with faith (if the reference is to Ex 2:15). For in Exodus Moses flees in fear (cf. Acts 7:29). But in postbiblical sources this is toned down and his motives are made more noble (e.g., Philo Leg. All. 3.14). Finally, the statement that Moses considered "opprobrium" (oneidismon; cf. Ps 68; 88:51-52 LXX) suffered "for the Christ" greater wealth than the treasures of Egypt is plainly Christian interpretation. It is often explained in terms of the solidarity (in Christ) of the people of God throughout history. But a literal interpretation—Moses the visionary foresaw the sufferings of Jesus Christ—is equally possible (cf. Lk 24:26-27, 44); for the visionary powers of Moses are, in Jewish sources at least, almost unbounded (cf. Jub. 1:1-4; 4 Ezra 4:5; Sipre Deut §357; Tg. Ps.-Jn. on Deut 34:1; Philo Vit. Mos.).

2. The Death of Moses.

According to Deuteronomy 34:6 (MT) Moses died in the land of Moab and no one knows the place of his burial "until this day." The text—which Josephus and others took to be autobiographical and therefore prophetic—also says that "he buried him" (so MT; the LXX, like the Samaritan Pentateuch, has "they buried him"). This was commonly taken to mean that God himself buried the lawgiver (Bib. Ant. 19:16; m. Soṭa 1:9; b. Soṭa 14a; Memar Marqah 2:12). But there also developed the tradition that Moses never died (b. Soṭa 13b; Sipre Deut. §357; this may be implicit in Josephus Ant. 4.8.48 §326).

2.1. Jude. Jude 8-10, in discussing the topic of slander, cites the example of the archangel Michael: when he buried Moses—Moses' physical death is assumed—there was a debate with the devil in which Michael did not presume to condemn him for slander but simply said, "May the Lord rebuke you!" This obviously is not a retelling of the OT's story of Moses' burial, Deuteronomy 34:1-6. But, as noted, Deuteronomy 34:6 was commonly taken to mean that God buried Moses; and this in turn developed into the tradition that the deed was done by Michael, God's instrument, or perhaps by several angels* (so Philo Vit. Mos. 2.291; cf. the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch?). There also developed the notion (based in part upon Zech 3:1-5) that when Michael went for Moses' body, the devil—Michael's traditional antagonist (cf. Rev 12:7)—met him and demanded, on the ground that Moses had sinned, that he be allowed to dispose of the body (he wanted to give it to Israel as an idolatrous object of worship).

While Jude only alludes to this story, it appears in fuller form in later sources. These include the Palaea Historica (a collection of Byzantine legends), the Slavonic Life of Moses and Severus of Antioch. These sources in turn seem to have drawn upon the lost ending of the ancient Assumption of Moses. The correlation between Jude 9 and that document is confirmed by patristic sources (the earliest being Clement of Alexandria, Frag. in Ep. Jude).

3. The Return of Moses.

Many have identified Moses with one of the two witnesses of Revelation 11:1-13. The two eschatological figures resemble Moses and Elijah respectively, for they are able to call down fire from heaven (cf. 2 Kings 1:10-16: Elijah prays and God sends fire from heaven), shut the sky so that no rain falls (cf. 1 Kings 17:1: Elijah successfully prays that there be no rain), turn the waters into blood (cf. Ex 7:14-24: at Moses' command the Nile turns to blood) and smite the earth with every plague (cf. Ex 7—13: Moses smites Egypt with ten plagues).

These parallels make the common identification with Moses and Elijah more likely than other proposals—identification with Enoch and Elijah (the dominant patristic tradition) or Peter and Paul (J. Munck). If so, we should detect the influence not only of Malachi 4:5 ("I will send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the Lord comes") but also of the Jewish expectation of the eschatological return of Moses himself—an expectation attested in Lives of the Prophets: Jeremiah 14; Fragmentary Targum on Ex 12:42; and Deuteronomy Rabbah 3:17, but not otherwise in the earliest Christian writings.

4. Moses as Prophet.

While moderns do not always think of Moses as a prophet, it was otherwise with the ancients. In the Pentateuch Moses has the Spirit of God (Num 11:17), receives a divine calling (Ex 2—3) and speaks God's word, and he is explicitly called a prophet in Deuteronomy 18:15, 18; 34:10; Hosea 12:13; Sirach 46:1; and Wisdom 11:1. In fact, Deuteronomy 34:10 makes Moses the greatest of Israel's prophets: "and there has not arisen a prophet since in Israel like Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face." That Moses continued to be regarded as a prophet appears from numerous sources (cf. T. Mos. 1:5; Asc.Isa. 3:18; m. Soṭa 1:9; etc.). Particularly impressive for those who assumed Moses' authorship of the Pentateuch was his ability to narrate his own death and burial (cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 2.291).

4.1. Acts. Early Christians also thought of Moses as a prophet (cf. 1 Clem. 43:6), and in Acts the conviction comes to clear expression twice. Acts 3:22-23 and 7:37 cite Deuteronomy 18:15(18) and proclaim fulfillment of the oracle in Jesus: "Moses said, 'The Lord God will raise up for you a prophet from your brethren as he raised me up. You shall listen to him in whatever he tells you.'" This text, which also probably lies behind the "listen to him" of Mark 9:7 par., was, as 4QTestimonia suggests, the source of lively speculation in the first two Christian centuries. Several "messianic" figures attempted to perform wonders reminiscent of Moses because an eschatological Mosaic prophet was expected (see, e.g., Josephus Ant. 20.5.1 §§97-99; J.W. 2.13.5 §§261-63).

4.2. Epistle of Barnabas. The appellation "prophet" is used of Moses three times (Barn. 6:8; 12:8; 14:2). Moreover, in Barnabas 12 several deeds of Moses are interpreted as prophetic of Jesus. When Moses stretched forth his hands to gain victory in battle (Ex 17:8-13) he became a type of the suffering Christ on the cross (cf. Justin, Dial. Tryph. 97; 111; 112; Sib. Or. 8:251-4). When Moses set a bronze serpent upon a pole so that those who looked upon it might live (Num 21:9), he prefigured the intercession of Jesus (cf. Jn 3:14). And when Moses commissioned Joshua (= Jesus) that all the people might hearken (akousē) to him alone, the revelation of the Father in Jesus was intimated. This last, which cites Numbers 13:16-17, also appears to allude to Deuteronomy 18:15, 18 (cf. Acts 3:22; 7:37) and, if so, offers the same interpretation found later in Clement of Alexandria's Paedagogus 1.70: Moses "said, 'God will raise up for you a prophet from among your brethren like me,' meaning Joshua, son of Nun, but implying Jesus, the Son of God."

5. Moses as Type of Christ.

Many Jewish and Christian sources offer Moses typologies (see Allison). In the Hexateuch Joshua is a new Moses. In Judges it is Gideon. In Kings Elijah is like the lawgiver. In 4 Ezra events from the life of Moses are moved to the life of Ezra. In Matthew Jesus is a new Moses. In Eusebius Constantine is Moses' antitype. And in Gregory of Nyssa Basil the Great lives a life which constantly reminds one of items in Exodus. Moses was a well-used type because he was so many different things—saint, preeminent prophet, ideal king, suffering servant, paradigmatic deliverer, giver of the law.* Further, comparison with Moses served to exalt a man: to be like Moses was the highest praise one could give or receive.

5.1. Acts. Both Acts 3 and 7, when read in the light of the rest of Luke-Acts, offer a Moses typology: Jesus is like the lawgiver. Both "visited" Israel (Acts 7:23; Lk 7:16; cf. Lk 1:68). Both gained "wisdom" (Acts 7:22; Lk 2:40, 52). Both were "sent" by God (Acts 7:34-35; Lk 10:16). Both did "signs and wonders"* (Acts 7:36; Lk 2:22; 4:30). Both were "denied" by their own people (Acts 3:13-14; 7:35). Moses was the "redeemer" (Acts 7:35) while Jesus came to "redeem"* Israel (Lk 24:21). Moses was archōn and dikastēs (Acts 7:27, 35) while Jesus was dikaios and archēgos (Acts 3:14, 15). And whereas Moses was "mighty in his words and deeds" (Acts 7:22), Jesus was "mighty in deed and word before God" (Lk 24:19).

The Moses typology of Acts has two main functions. The first is to characterize Jesus as the prophet like Moses. According to Deuteronomy 18:15-18, which is cited in both Acts 3 and 7, Moses foretold that God would raise up for Israel a prophet like himself. Early Christians saw this prophecy as fulfilled in Jesus and so naturally found Mosaic features in Jesus. Thus the quotation of Deuteronomy 18:15-18 supports the Moses typology and the Moses typology supports the quotation. Secondly, the parallelism between Jesus and Moses extends beyond them as individuals to encompass their unfaithful generations and so becomes a warning to Israel and an explanation for the unbelief of so many: just as Moses found opposition within Israel, so too Jesus (see 8.1 below).

5.2. Hebrews. Hebrews 3:2 likens Jesus to Moses: the lawgiver was "faithful to him who appointed him, just as Moses was also faithful in God's house." The text, however, goes on not to compare the two figures but to contrast them (see 9.1 below). Yet in Hebrews 9:15-22 a second likening of Jesus to Moses appears. Here the surpassing self-sacrifice of Jesus is compared with the sprinkling of blood told of in Exodus 24:6-8. Moreover, the formulation of Hebrews 9:20 ("This is the blood of the covenant which . . .") shows assimilation to the tradition of the Lord's Supper (cf. Mk 14:22, 24; 1 Cor 11:24-5). The implication is that Jesus' mediation of a new covenant* at the Last Supper is comparable with Moses' mediation of the first covenant: the last redeemer is as the first.

5.3. Revelation. Moses is mentioned only one time in the Apocalypse, in Revelation 15:3. Here reference is made to "the song of Moses," sung by victorious martyrs in heaven. This harks back to Exodus 15 and is part of a larger exodus typology. Revelation refers to the sacrifice of the Lamb* (Rev 13:8, etc.) and to the twelve tribes (Rev 7:4-8); there are trumpets* (Rev 8:7) and thunders and lightnings (Rev 8:5)—the signs of Sinai (Ex 19:16); and the plagues of Egypt recur—hail falls (Rev 8:7), the sea is turned into blood (Rev 8:8; 16:3), darkness descends (Rev 8:12; 16:10), locusts swarm (Rev 9:3). Clearly Revelation depicts the eschatological redemption as analogous to the redemption from Egypt.

6. Moses as Lawgiver.

For Judaism Moses was above all the lawgiver (Jn 1:17); and occasionally in early Christianity Jesus becomes a second lawgiver (cf. Matthew's Moses typology). But because Christianity came to reject so much of the Mosaic legislation as obsolete, Christians generally did not esteem Moses primarily as lawgiver. It is natural then that the giving of the law receives only brief notice in the review of Moses' career in Acts 7 and that Hebrews 11:23-28 can pass over it altogether (contrast the review in Sir 45:1-5). Where the topic does receive some treatment, in Barnabas, the author argues that Judaism has totally misunderstood the Mosaic law, which was intended from the beginning to be symbolic; and further that Moses threw the two tables from his hands because the people were not worthy. For Barnabas Moses ceases to be the lawgiver of Israel and becomes instead the mystical prophet of Jesus.

7. Moses as Moral Model.

Already the Pentateuch praises Moses as most meek among all on the face of the earth (Num 12:3). This acclaim of Moses' virtue only grew as time passed, and in writers such as Philo (cf. Vit. Mos. 1.66; 2.9-10) and Josephus (cf. Ant.

4.7.49 §§328-29) Moses becomes the moral model par excellence (cf. 4 Macc 2:17). Hebrews 11:23-28 reflects this tradition, which later found a permanent home in the monastic tradition, where Moses became both saint and ascetic (cf. already Clement of Alexandria Strom. 3.7.57).

7.1. Hebrews. The primary function of Hebrews 11:23-28 is to present Moses as an exemplar of faith. "By faith Moses/he," a phrase which appears four times altogether, introduces concrete illustrations of faith in action. Moses chose to share ill-treatment rather than "to enjoy [as the son of Pharaoh's daughter] the fleeting pleasures of sin." He determined to suffer abuse for the Christ rather than enjoy the treasures of Egypt, for he looked forward to another reward. And in leaving Egypt "he endured as seeing him who is invisible." All this recalls the martyr* tradition of Jewish Hellenism, for which "choice" (haireō), "fleeting" (proskairon), "pleasure" (apolausis) and "endure" (kartereō) were key words (D'Angelo). Further, the description of Moses' trials strongly recalls Hebrews 10:32-39, where the former afflictions of the addressees are recounted. In this way Moses becomes a model of Christian discipleship.

7.2. 1 Clement. This epistle nowhere likens Jesus to Moses, and there is no Moses christology.* Rather Moses appears solely as a moral model. In 1 Clement 17 (which cites Num 12:7) he is an example of humility. (Moses' meekness or humility was proverbial: Num 12:3; Sir 45:4; Philo Vit. Mos. 1.26; b. Ned. 38a; etc.) In 1 Clement 43—44 he is the faithful servant in God's house* (cf. again Num 12:7) who serves as a model for Christian leaders. And in 1 Clement 53—54 Moses is an exemplar of compassion and love* (cf. Apoc. Sed. 1:18).

8. The Generation of Moses.

In the OT the generation in the wilderness is called "faithless," "evil," "sinful," "perverse" and "crooked" (e.g., Deut 1:35; 32:5, 20). In the rabbis this particular generation came to be seen, along with the generation of the flood, as especially corrupt (cf. m. Sanh. 10:3; Mek. on Ex 15:1). Given this, and the polemic against "this generation" in the Jesus tradition (Mt 12:39; 16:4; etc.), it was natural for early Christians to liken their generation to that of Moses.

8.1. Acts. The review of Moses' life in Acts 7:20-44 (see 1.1 above) is almost as much about Moses' contemporaries as Moses himself. They did not understand his killing of the Egyptian (Acts 7:23-25). Two of them, instead of listening to Moses' council for reconciliation, rebuked him and caused him to leave Egypt (Acts 7:26-29). Upon his return Israel refused to obey him, thrust him aside, turned back to Egypt, made a golden calf, worshipped idols and did not keep the law (Acts 7:39-43, 53). This negative salvation-history is part of a speech which ends with Stephen's rebuke: "You stiff-necked people . . . you always resist the Holy Spirit" (Acts 7:51). Here Moses' generation serves as a type for the generation of Jesus and Christian missionaries and so helps make more explicable the rejection of the gospel.

8.2. Hebrews. The comparison and contrast between Jesus and Moses in Hebrews 3:1-6 is immediately followed by an exhortation based on the sad fate of the wilderness generation. Psalm 95:7-11 is quoted to illustrate what happened to those who "left Egypt under the leadership of Moses," namely, their bodies fell in the wilderness and they did not enter into rest, that is, the promised land. Hebrews here warns that the situation that once obtained with those who followed Moses can likewise obtain with those who now follow Jesus: they too can, through disobedience, miss the promise given them (cf. Heb 4:1-13). Here then the theme of the faithless generation is no longer applied to Jews who have rejected Jesus (as in Acts) but to Christians (who in the author's eyes were running the risk of losing their salvation).

8.3. Epistle of Barnabas. In Barnabas 4 and 14, Moses is the wise lawgiver and servant who, after meeting God "face to face on Mount Sinai" (cf. Ex 33:11; Deut 34:9-12), broke the tablets of the law because Israel had turned to idols. Israel was unworthy to receive the law (which she wrongly understood literally) and the covenant. The church, however, has so far proven worthy. But her favor is not irrevocable: she must remain on guard (Barn. 4.9-14). As in Hebrews, the generation of the wilderness is not a type of unbelieving Jews but a warning to Christian believers.

9. Jesus as Greater than Moses.

In early Christianity the parallelism between Jesus and Moses did not, of itself, communicate the subordination of the latter to the former, and the traditions in Acts 3 and 7, the typology in Luke-Acts, the proclamation of the Pseudo-Clementines, and many of the incidental comparisons found in patristic literature betray little or no anxiety about Jesus' status over against Moses. But it is otherwise in John (see esp. Jn 1:17-18 and 6:32-33); so too in Hebrews.

9.1. Hebrews. Hebrews 3:1-6 exalts Jesus above Moses. The former has been counted worthy of much more glory* than the latter; and whereas Moses was faithful in all God's house as a servant (cf. 1 Clem. 17.5; 43.1), Christ was faithful over God's house as a Son.* Whatever the precise meaning of these remarks (see D'Angelo), they gain force against the exaltation of Moses in Judaism. The Epistle of Aristeas affirms that Moses understood "all things" (Ep. Arist. 139). Philo more than once calls him "god" (theos; see, e.g., Vit. Mos. 1.158). Artapanus (in Eusebius Praep. Ev. 9.27.6) says he was worthy of "godlike honor." Ezekiel the Tragedian has a scene in which Moses sits on God's throne (Eusebius Praep. Ev. 9.29.4-6). Ezekiel also tells us that Moses counted the stars and saw all "things present, past, and future." Deuteronomy Rabbah 11.4 refers to Moses as half man, half divine. Given such traditions as these, one understands why it might have been necessary to make explicit Jesus' superiority over Moses. Those traditions also help us appreciate how significant the exaltation of Jesus over Moses could be. It is striking that Hebrews argues for Jesus' superiority over Moses the man after already proving Jesus' superiority over the angels.* The implication seems to be that one could be greater than the angels and still not greater than Moses (cf. the judgment of R. Jose in Sipre on Num 12:7).

See also CHRISTOLOGY; COVENANT AND NEW COVENANT; HEBREWS; LAW; OLD TESTAMENT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison, Jr., The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); M. R. D'Angelo, Moses in the Letter to the Hebrews (SBLDS 42; Missoula: Society of Biblical Literature, 1979); Moïse: L'Homme de L'Alliance (Paris: Desclée, 1955); R. F. Zehnle, Peter's Pentecost Discourse (SBLMS 15; Nashville: Abingdon, 1971). D. C. Allison Jr.

MYSTERY

G. Bornkamm begins his article on mystērion by noting that the etymology of the word itself is "a mystery" (803). Some authors suggest that the term originated from the Greek myein, meaning "to close the mouth or lips," thus indicating that something is to be kept silent or secret. This may account for its use as a technical term of initiation (mye) into the mystery religions* that were popular in the ancient world from the seventh century B.C. to the fourth century A.D. (see Wis 12:5; 14:23; 3 Macc 2:30). Those initiated into the mysteries were required to keep the nature of their initiation rites secret. As a result we know very little about the content and process of initiation (see DPL, Religions, Greco-Roman, §4.4). Other uses of the word mystērion need to be determined from the context in which it appears.

1. Background
2. The New Testament
3. The Postapostolic Fathers

1. Background.

1.1. Greek. The concept of mystērion/ta mystēria appears in nonculbic settings as well. In ancient philosophy it retains the idea of an initiation of individuals who advance through stages of philosophical inquiry and who eventually are able to comprehend the ultimate realities of truth*. One can therefore speak of "the initiatory rites of philosophy" (see Harvey's analysis, 322-23, of several philosophers, including Philo,* where mystery terminology is used as a metaphor for initiation into philosophical knowledge).

1.2. Semitic. The Greek idea of mystērion mystrion as something hidden, obscure or secret is expressed by the Hebrew word sôd and the Aramaic word rāz. Several occurrences of sôd in the OT simply convey the idea of human secrets (Ps 64:2; Prov 11:13; 20:19; 25:9); some prophets* specify a heavenly council to which they had access and from which God's* secrets were revealed (Jer 23:18; 23:22; Amos 3:7). In no case, however, is sôd translated as mystērion in the Septuagint, although it does occur several times in the Qumran* literature.

The word rāz, thought to be a Persian loan word, first appears in the Aramaic of Daniel where it is translated as "mystery" or "mysteries" (Dan 2:18, 19, 27, 28, 29, 30, 47; 4:9). Including Daniel, rāz occurs twenty-one times in the Septuagint as mystērion (see Tob 12:7; Jdt 2:2; Sir 22:22; 27:16; Wis 2:22; 6:22; 14:15). All of these occurrences refer to eschatological* and cosmic mysteries that once were hidden but now have been revealed by God to the apocalyptic* seer. The Qumran literature refers to the revelation* of divine mysteries about God, creation,* providence and evil (e.g., 1QM 3:9; 14:14; 1QS 3:15, 21-23; 4:18; 9:18; 1QH 1:9; 4:27; 9:23; 1QpHab 2:1-3; 7:4, 8, 13-14).

2. The New Testament.

2.1. The Revelation to John. In Revelation 1:20; 17:5, 7 (see Revelation, Book of) "mystery" connotes secret and symbolic meaning in the form of "the seven stars," the name Babylon and a "woman" who is known only to God and/or the seer. Revelation 10:7, however, has no symbolic meaning but refers to the fact that the entire "mystery of God" has been made known to the prophets and will publicly be revealed after the seventh angel blows his trumpet.* This idea is comparable to the Synoptics, where mystērion (Mk 4:11) and ta mystēria (Mt 13:11; Lk 8:10) refer to God's rule ("the secrets of the kingdom of God") made known through the person and teaching* of Jesus.

2.2. Pauline Literature.

2.2.1. Origin. Most of the references to mystērion in the NT occur in the literature attributed to Paul. Attempts by the history of religion school (Religionsgeschichtliche Schule) to explain the origin and use of mystērion mystrion from the Greek mystery cults have not been convincing even though we recognize that these cults were contemporaneous with Christianity during the first four centuries of the Christian era. Similarities between the two can be explained by their common religious, social and cultural contexts.

2.2.2. Mystery as a Disclosure of God's Saving Activity. The largest number of references to mystery in Paul deal directly with the salvation* of the Gentiles* and his apostolic* role as a revealer of this mystery. This hidden wisdom* of God is now being revealed through the proclamation of the gospel* (see Rom 16:25) and stands in sharp contrast to the wisdom (gnōsis) cherished by the Corinthians (1 Cor 2:1, 2, 7 [cf. 2:10]; 4:1; for further discussion see DPL, Mystery).

The two references in 1 Timothy appear as fixed formulae in the context of warnings against false teachings in the Christian community. The "mystery of faith" (1 Tim 3:9) is that which is believed as truth, while "the mystery of our religion" (1 Tim 3:16) includes those elements of the faith* mentioned in this brief confessional or hymn* (see Liturgical Elements).

2.2.3. Colossians and Ephesians. Both of these epistles contain the early Pauline idea of mystery as something revealed that formerly was hidden (see Rom 16:25; 1 Cor 2:7). In Colossians this revelation is to "the saints" (Col 1:26-7; 2:2). In Ephesians, although the mystery is revealed to the church* (Eph 1:9) and God's holy apostles and prophets (Eph 3:5), the main focus is on the revelation given to Paul (esp. Eph 3:3, 4, 7, 8).

There is considerable development and clarification of mystērion mystrion in these two epistles, and their general dating as either late in Paul's career or as post-Pauline pseudepigrapha* makes their discussion pertinent in a review of the later apostolic and postapostolic period. Colossians, in response to the false teaching in the church that apparently relegated Christ to a minor role, deliberately emphasizes that the mystery that was hidden "throughout the ages and generations" (Col 1:26) and "is now revealed to all the saints" (Col 1:27) is Christ himself (Col 1:27; 2:2; 4:3). Thus the Colossians need not seek beyond Christ because he is "first place in everything" (Col 1:18) and in him are hidden "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col 2:3).

Ephesians likewise equates mystery and gospel (Eph 6:19) but goes farther than Paul and Colossians by defining it as God's ultimate plan of reconstituting the entire cosmos (see Creation; World) under Christ's rule (Eph 1:9-10; 3:9-10). In Ephesians 3:1-11, the longest treatment of mystery in the NT, Paul clarifies the mystērion mystrion as the good news of salvation to the Gentiles, including their incorporation into the body of Christ, the church (specifically Eph 3:3-5, 9). This focus on ecclesiology is unique to Ephesians and is taken up again in Ephesians 5:32, which refers to the intimate—hence mysterious—union between Christ and the church (see further Lincoln, 380-81).

3. The Apostolic Fathers.

There are a significant number of references to mystery terminology in the early church fathers. Justin Martyr (Justin Apol. I 66.4; Justin Dial. Tryph. 70.1), Tertullian (Tertullian De Praesc. 40) and Clement of Alexandria (Clement Protr. 12.120), for example, view the mystery religions, particularly Mithraism, as demonic imitations of Christianity. Others refer to such salvific events as Christ's Incarnation,* suffering,* death (see Death of Christ) and resurrection* as "mysteries" of the Christian faith (Justin Dial. Tryph. 40.1; 44.2: 74.3; 134.5; 138.2; Ign. Eph. 19.1; Ign. Magn. 9:1-2; Diogn. 4.6; 7.1; 8.10-11; 10.7; 11.2, 5).

The meaning of mystērion in The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (an early secondcentury document commonly called the *Didache) at Didache 11.11 is difficult to determine. The Greek phrase poiōn eis mystērion kosmikon ekklēsias could be translated as "symbolizing the mystery of the church," "enacting a worldly mystery," "symbolizing the church in an earthly manner," "[a prophet] who in his action has in view the earthly mystery of the church" or "though he [a prophet] enact a worldly mystery of the church." The meaning, however, in this document is uncertain and may refer to some type of prophetic symbolism.

This verse falls within the context (Did. 11-13) that gives some criteria whereby the Christian community may or may not judge whether certain prophets and teachers are true or false. It appears that some early Christian prophets entered into sexual or marriage* relationships similar to that of the prophet Hosea and Gomer and that this was meant to symbolize, in some "mysterious" earthly way, the heavenly union between Christ and his church (see Eph 5:25-33; for further discussion see Lincoln, 362).

According to this passage such marriages by early Christian prophets are not subject to the judgment* of the community. Certain Gnostic* teachers may have participated in such marriages as well ("the mystery of conjunction," Irenaeus Haer. 1.6.4.).

The Greek word mystērion usually was translated in Latin as sacramentum and by the fourth century A.D. became a fixed term for baptism* and the Lord's Supper*—two sacraments of the church.

See also APOCALYPTIC, APOCALYPTICISM; KNOWLEDGE; REVEAL, REVELATION; VISIONS, ECSTATIC EXPERIENCE

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. W. Barker, "Mystery," ISBE 3:451-55; M. Bockmuehl, Revelation and Mystery in Ancient Judaism and Pauline Christianity (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990); G. Bornkamm, "μυστήριον," TDNT 4:802-27; R. E. Brown, The Semitic Background of the Term "Mystery" in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); C. C. Caragounis, The Ephesian Mysterion (Lund: Gleerup, 1977); J. Coppens, " 'Mystery' in the Theology of Saint Paul and Its Parallels at Qumran" in Paul and Qumran, ed. J. Murphy-O'Connor (Chicago: Priory Press, 1968) 132-58; G. Finkenrath, "Mystery," NIDNTT 2:501-6; A. E. Harvey, "The Use of Mystery Language in the Bible," JTS n.s. 31 (1980) 320-36; H. Krämer, "μυστήριον," EDNT 2:446-49; A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1990).

A. G. Patzia

MYSTERY RELIGIONS. See RELIGIONS, GRECO-ROMAN.

N

NAG HAMMADI TEXTS. See GNOSIS, GNOSTICISM.

NAME

Of 331 NT uses of the noun name (onoma), 112 occur in the later NT (60 of these in Acts alone). The verb form (onomazō) occurs 10 times in the NT and only once in the later NT (Acts 19:13).

1. Name and Persons
2. Name and Christ
3. Name in the Apostolic Fathers

1. Name and Persons.

In the NT, when "name" is used of persons it is used in the sense of "reputation." Thus in Revelation 3:5 the angel* (or "messenger") of the church in Sardis says that they "have a reputation" for being spiritually alive (lit., they "have a name" that they live), although in fact they are not spiritually alive. Individuals are to be greeted "by name" (3 John 15). In three places "name" is used as a synonym for "person" (as in Acts 1:15— the group consisted of about 120 persons [see also Rev 3:4; 11:3]).

2. Name and Christ.

In our literature "name," when it is used in connection with Christ,* is theologically significant.

2.1. Names of Christ. The belief, widespread in the ancient world, that to know a person's or a deity's name is to know something fundamental about him or her, helps one to understand the significance of some occurrences of the term name. In Hebrews 1:4 the ascended Christ is said to have "become as much superior to angels as the name he has obtained is more excellent than theirs." To say that Christ has a superior name is to say that he is superior to all others, but what is the specific name to which the author of Hebrews* refers? The immediate context points towards its being "Son" (Heb 1:5, "You are my Son, today I have begotten you"), a term that refers not only to Christ's relationship to God* but also to his role as God's chosen Messiah.

In Revelation 19:11-16 we see a typical NT phenomenon: what the OT applies to God, the NT unabashedly applies to Christ. Christ, appearing in apocalyptic* glory,* is called "faithful and true" (cf. Ps 96:13), and Revelation 19:13 calls him "The Word of God" (cf. Gen 1:3, 7, 9). "Faithful and true" words that echo the OT, recall how God acts with respect to his people and all humanity. As the God of the OT was faithful and true, so also is Christ to the new people of God. The latter term is reminiscent of Genesis, where God speaks and worlds spring into being. Here Christ, the Word of God, will create a world* in which his church* will live in the grandeur of his triumph over evil.

There are also clear echoes of Deuteronomy 10:17 (a text that emphasizes God's sovereignty by calling him "God of gods and Lord of lords") in Revelation 19:16, where the warrior Christ is seen to be worthy of the titles "King of kings and Lord of lords" (cf. Rev 17:14).

2.2. Belief in Christ's Name. 1 John 3:23 insists that it is God's will for all to "believe in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ," and in 1 John 5:13 he refers to those who "believe in (eis) the name of the son of God" (see Son of God; Sonship). In both places this belief involves more than mere mental assent to what has been said about or by Christ. It means fidelity to Christ, and it is to enter into a relationship with him signified in baptism* (according to Acts 2:38; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5; 22:16) and characterized by a certain lifestyle.

2.3. Suffering for the Name. According to 1 Peter 4:14-16, those who have the honor of bearing the name of Christ can expect to suffer for it, which means they will be rejected by society at large (see Persecution). This is not a condition that is to be considered unusual but is rather to be expected. Those who suffer for the name of Christ should consider it a privilege. In Revelation 2:3 the risen Christ praises the endurance* of the Ephesian believers, saying that they have borne suffering "for my name's sake." To do a thing for "the sake of the name" is to do it for the sake of the nameholder. Thus "holding fast" to a name (Rev 2:13) is a way of saying that someone is being true to the nameholder. In Revelation 2:13 the Lord* commends the Christians in Pergamum for holding fast to "my name," which is to say that they have been faithful to him. Revelation, with its view of a future in which God finally defeats the enemies of the church, encourages the persecuted with the promise* that those who suffer for Christ will be rewarded (see Revelation, Book of).

2.4. Forgiveness for Christ's Sake. In 1 John 2:12 and Revelation 2:3 we encounter onoma as the object of the preposition dia. The prepositional phrase, meaning "for the sake of his [Christ's] name," is causative; thus in 1 John 2:12 believers are said to be forgiven not because of their response to the message (though that is presupposed) but rather "for his name's sake." Forgiveness* therefore is predicated primarily on what Christ has done (cf. 1 John 1:7), although a human response is necessary.

2.5. Invocation of Christ's Name. Acts* uses the OT expression of "calling upon the name of the Lord" but applies it to Christ (Acts 2:21; 9:14, 21; 22:16). In Acts, by calling upon the name of Jesus one becomes a believer and then belongs to God himself. In the act of calling upon God, a person gives up the right to control his or her life and acknowledges that Christ is Lord.

In Acts 4:12 we read that there is no other name given by which humanity might be saved. For Luke (and Peter) salvation* is summed up in the name Jesus (see also Acts 3:6; 8:12). In Acts 10:43 we read that it is "through [Christ's] name" that forgiveness of sins is obtained. Because of such claims for the name, the religious authorities are said to have forbidden the apostles* to preach "in this name." However, the fledgling church believed that Christ was God's agent of salvation and thus they had to preach salvation in his name. It should be noted, however, that from the perspective of Acts, invoking Christ's name does not mean that one is automatically saved; faith* is also required.

James 2:7 indicates that to mistreat a person over whom the name of Christ has been invoked is to mistreat Christ. The verb translated "invoke" (epikaleō) refers to the act of calling the name of one over another to indicate that the former owns the latter (cf. in the LXX Deut 28:10; Is 43:7; Jer 14:9). Thus James 2:7 claims that the rich who treat less fortunate believers badly "blaspheme" the "good name" that was invoked (probably in baptism) over these poor. To mistreat the poor is mistreat those who belong to God, a serious sin indeed.

In James 5:14 the author encourages the sick to call for the elders to pray, "anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." The elders are to act in the name of the Lord, and in doing so they call upon God's power. It is important to note that James is not speaking about magic*—to invoke God's name is not to use a formula in order to manipulate supernatural forces. Rather, invoking "the name of the Lord" implies a relationship with him. It means that one can ask God to heal (see Anointing; Healing), and it is his power that will heal the person, not the act itself. To do something "in the name of the Lord" is to do something according to his will, and as such it represents a bending of the human will, not the divine. It is this that is misunderstood by the unbelievers who attempt to use the name of Jesus to cast out evil spirits (Acts 19:13-16).

3. Name in the Apostolic Fathers.

Despite the belief that a name reveals something fundamental about its owner, Justin Martyr makes the claim that although people are baptized in the name the Father, Son and Spirit, no name can express God's true nature (Justin Apol. I 61.11). Names may reveal something about God, but for the most part he is unknowable. In the apostolic fathers* we also see that the practice of invoking God's name in baptism continues, although Athanasius does not believe that one can merely repeat divine names and thereby count oneself as a Christian. They are not magic; one must live a Christian life and believe rightly or baptism avails nothing (Athanasius Ar. 2.43). As Hermas says, no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he takes the name of God's Son (Herm. Sim. 9.12.4). For Hermas that means that one must have faith in God's Son who is, as Hermas puts, the gate into the kingdom (see Kingdom of God). Finally it is worth noting that in a world populated with demons and spirits, Christ's name was believed to protect those who believe against evil, since "even the demons fear the power of his name" (Justin Dial. Tryph. 30.3). This for Justin was proof of the superiority of the Christian faith.

See also AUTHORITY; BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES; CHRISTOLOGY; MAGIC AND ASTROLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles (2 vols; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994-); H. Bietenhard, "Name," NIDNTT 2:648-55; idem, "ὄνομα κτλ," TDNT 5:242-83; P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); idem, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); P. Ellingworth, The Epistle to the Hebrews (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); L. Hartmann, "ὄνομα," EDNT 2:519-22; R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984). B. Eastman

NARRATIVE CRITICISM

Narrative critics analyze the complex ways in which stories are told in biblical books written in narrative form. Their hybrid method concentrates on the plot, points of view, character development, dialogue, settings, repetitions, gaps in the story line, uses of irony and the effects on readers of these and other literary features that distinguish a particular biblical text from a letter,* treatise, speech or collection of unrelated stories. During the 1970s scholars of the Bible created this new method by drawing on various analytical methods that had been developed recently by literary critics in their study of modern novels, short stories and films (see Booth, Chatman), referred to collectively as "narratology" (see Bal). These biblical scholars developed their own narrative criticism as a tool for analyzing the final, canonical forms of biblical narratives as coherent, integrated wholes rather than as composites of various sources. Scholars of various perspectives have been persuaded of the value of this approach, making narrative criticism the most widely employed variety of the new literary criticism now used in investigations of biblical narrative texts (see Spencer).

1. The Development of This Method
2. The Applications of This Method

1. The Development of This Method.

1.1. Origins. Biblical scholars invented the phrase "narrative criticism" to parallel the established designations of text, source, form, redaction and composition criticism (see Rhoads and Michie). This new approach to understanding biblical texts was rooted in composition criticism, which under the influence of general literary theories about narrative ("narratology") developed into a hybrid method in which at least three such theories for analyzing the final form of the text have been integrated: as communication between an author and reader through a set of intermediate voices (see the chart in 2.1 below); as the presentation of an autonomous story world whose basic elements are characters, plot and settings; and as the combination of rhetorical techniques (see Rhetoric) that the author chose in order to transmit the story in just the way it is.

This newly synthesized method was nurtured by members of the Markan Seminar of the Society of Biblical Literature, who were eager to explore the ways in which this approach might break through the limits set by historical criticism. The initial focus on Mark's Gospel, made widely known by D. Rhoads and D. Michie, was followed in the 1980s by major narrative studies of Matthew by J. D. Kingsbury, of John by R. A. Culpepper and of Luke-Acts by R. C. Tannehill, each of whom drew on general literary theories in his own way.

In the 1990s narrative critics of Acts* have continued to treat Luke and Acts as one extended narrative; the method has been further refined in book-length treatments by R. L. Brawley, D. B. Gowler, J. A. Darr and W. S. Kurz (see Powell, 308-24 for an extensive bibliography on Luke-Acts to date). In contrast, work on the remaining canonical narrative, the Revelation to John (see Revelation, Book of), seems just to have begun; and narrative analyses of such second-century narratives as the *Shepherd of Hermas, the Martyrdom of Polycarp (see Polycarp) and the apocryphal* Acts will surely appear soon.

1.2. Assumptions. While those scholars who practice narrative criticism have demonstrated various ways of applying this method, they share at least three basic assumptions:

Biblical narrative texts are to be analyzed as internally interactive unities in their finished, canonical forms, not as composites of various sources.

Biblical narratives are to be read with the goal of grasping and entering the story world created by the text and not first of all for reconstructing their historical context or their relation to reality outside of the world presented in the text.

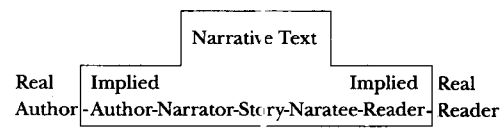
Biblical narratives display significant literary artistry that can be appreciated by close attention to the way the narrator tells these stories: that is, to how characters are presented; to how the plot is developed (including creation and resolution of conflicts); to foreshadowing; to gaps in the story line; to repetition of words, scenes, themes and literary patterns; to points of view; to temporal, spatial and social settings; to relative duration of focus on each scene; to uses of implicit commentary (such as irony, misunderstandings and symbolism); and to other rhetorical strategies for persuading readers to enter the world and agree with the story created by the narrator.



1.3. Relation to Previous Methods. Narrative critics are convinced that a biblical book in narrative form should be analyzed on its own terms before it is studied as evidence of something else outside of the text. This approach seems to be a logical development of the methods used by redaction and composition criticism. Philosophically, however, narrative criticism is based on theories about communication applied to the text as an end in itself rather than on any methods of historical analysis in which texts are treated as means to the end of reconstructing the events and the traditioning process that resulted in the finished text.

Yet in contrast to the narratologists' chief interest in analyzing texts to develop theories about narrative, narrative critics draw on literary theories in various ways to exegete their texts. And while composition critics sought the primary meaning of the biblical text in the text's theological or ideational content, which is separate in principle from the narrative form, narrative critics seek the primary meaning in the details of the text's structure: what the text says, its story, may not be separated from the way it is said, its discourse or rhetoric (see Moore, 41-45). By no means does this approach entail a rejection of theological interest as such; rather it introduces a distinct shift in focus that holds significant theological promise (see Osborne, 153-73 and Powell, 85-105).

The functional difference between the methods of historical criticism and narrative criticism is aptly compared to that between a window and a painting. Historical criticism seeks to look through the text in order to see the events, circumstances and motivations that led to the production of the text. Literary criticism, including narrative criticism, looks at the text in order to discern there the inner workings of the story world presented by the text. In other words, while historical criticism focuses on the degree to which a narrative refers to the real world (its referential function), narrative criticism deals directly with the contributions the various literary features of the text make to the telling of the story itself (its poetic function). Narrative critics do not deny the values of referential inquiry, but they leave this work to others and concentrate on the text as literature, with the goal of describing what and how the author communicates to the narrative's readers.

2. The Applications of This Method.

2.1. The Communication Model. Many narrative critics operate explicitly with adaptations of the narrative communication model proposed by S. Chatman (6, 151). As the diagram seeks to clarify, the real (historical, flesh and blood) author communicates with the real reader (the one reading the text today) through the creation of an implied author (see Booth, 70-76) who advances the story by speaking through a narrator, who may or may not be the voice of one of the characters. The narratee is the person or persons directly addressed by the narrator. And the implied reader is the real reader's image of the original reader who is presupposed by or produced by the text.

Since the real author stands outside the text as such, the only author available to the real reader is the implied author, a complex image of the real author as a selecting and structuring intelligence that is gradually inferred by the real reader while reading. The real author's creation of this textual persona, as in Luke 1:1-4, is the profound rhetorical move that begins the communication. And with the famous "we" narrator of Acts (who first appears in Acts 16:10-17 and then in Acts 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1—28:16) and the narrator of the Revelation to John, the respective authors have created narrators who participate as characters in their stories.

Much more frequently in biblical texts it is impossible to distinguish between the implied author and the narrator as the invisible speaker, whose voice may be most obvious in editorial comments. This is especially the case if the real reader regards the narrator as fully reliable. Early in Acts, for example, the narrator appears frequently to inform the reader about the wonderful success of the Holy Spirit's* work through the church* despite the opposition endured from without and the problems faced from within (see Acts 2:43-47; 6:7; 9:31; 12:24); and the implied reader does not doubt the truth of these claims. A reliable narrator's authoritative voice expresses the point of view (ideology) that the implied author seeks, in the face of possible opposition, to establish as the implied reader's own norm for evaluating both what happens in the story and the veracity of the characters (see Powell, 23-25). Alert real readers are thus influenced to perceive the error in Simon Magus's judgment (Acts 8:18) that Peter controlled the giving of the power of the Holy Spirit (see Tannehill 1990, 106).

The text does not give today's real readers access to the original readers of the biblical narratives, but the text does bid real readers to read from the standpoint of the text's implied readers; that is, to identify with the issues they faced and the relevance of the text's message to their situation. The narratee is the literary figure to whom the author explicitly directs the text, such as Theophilus in Luke 1:3 and Acts 1:1. In most biblical narratives the implied reader and the narratee are functionally indistinguishable, which is the case for the relation between Theophilus, the narratee, and the Christians Luke wanted to influence, the implied readers. For the narrator clearly addresses summaries and explanations to both (see Kurz, 9-16).

The goal of narrative criticism is to enable a real reader to read the text from the perspective of the implied reader. This aim requires a real reader to obtain such knowledge as the text assumes was known by the implied reader and to "forget" everything that the text does not assume such a reader would know. To be sure, the goal of reading as if one were in the shoes of the hypothetical implied reader may be fully unattainable, but narrative critics are persuaded that this aim sets important criteria for interpretation. "With regard to any proposed reading, the question may be asked, Is there anything in the text that indicates the reader is expected to respond in this way?" (Powell, 21).

2.2. The Narrative Analysis of the Text.

2.2.1. Plotting, Gaps and Repetitions. Narrative critics seek to explicate the characteristics of narrative that distinguish it from a recorded series of discrete incidents. The primary feature that they analyze is the text's plot, a interrelated succession of actions ordered to present a beginning, a middle and an end. An author has a large range of freedom regarding where to begin (compare the openings of Mark and Luke) as well as how to end (compare the endings of Matthew and Luke). And for the middle an author can choose, for example, to follow one or another character, to include or omit events (compare the middle sections of Mark and Luke), to flash back (note Luke's placement of Jesus' genealogy), to foreshadow (note how Simeon's prophecies* in Luke 2:29-35 anticipate the main plot turn of Acts) or to proceed in chronological order (see Kurz, 17-36). The choice of the ending may be the most critical expression of an author's freedom, for the end sheds much light on the entire narrative since it appears to be the goal toward which the plot has been moving. Thus the ending of Acts has generated enormous controversy.

In Acts the author's process of selecting and structuring has resulted in emphasizing some events (e.g., Saul/Paul's call/conversion) while deemphasizing or omitting others (such as Peter's activities after Acts 12:17-19), thus leaving gaps to be filled by the reader's imagination. Whether an author has intended an omission to trigger such reflection can be debated (see Sternberg, 235-37), but the gaps in the plot line of Luke and Acts have generated discussion at least from the time of John Chrysostom. Perhaps the most striking and problematic gaps occur at the end of each text. Mikeal C. Parsons has used narrative criticism to illuminate the ways in which the end of Luke and the beginning of Acts both overlap and conflict with each other. And the open-ended character of Acts provokes the reader both to wonder about what happened to Paul after "two whole years" under house arrest and to remain uncertain about the implied author's anticipation regarding further reception of "this salvation of God" by Jews (see Tannehill 1990, 347-48). Yet as the result of artful plotting, the reader's attention is drawn away from Paul's fate to the concluding emphasis on his "proclaiming the rule of God and teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ with great boldness and without restriction" (Acts 28:31).

While historical critics have usually regarded both gaps in the plot line and repetitions as evidence for an author's use of multiple sources, narrative critics observe that these features appear frequently in narratives and that they can be effective literary devices for communicating the author's message. M. Sternberg (365-440) detects five forms of repetition and variation that may be employed singly or in combination: change of order, substitution, grammatical transformation, addition or expansion and ellipsis or truncation. A narrator may use these strategies to communicate emphasis, contrast, climax, correspondence or irony. Such repetition is common to classical literature as well as to folklore and is one of the most ancient methods of conveying information.

Perhaps the most striking example of repetition in early Christian documents is the thrice-told story of Saul/Paul's conversion/call in Acts 9, 22 and 26 (see Witherup 1992). The reader first hears the story from the authoritative, third-person point of view of the narrator. Saul the aggressive persecutor is reduced to blind helplessness and must be led by the hand for three days before the divine restoration of his sight, mediated by a certain Ananias. The truth of the story is then confirmed by two subsequent tellings that are presented from a subjective, first-person point of view with variations that highlight additional aspects and implications. In Acts 22 Paul uses insider language (Aramaic) to tell an expanded version of the story of his dramatic conversion in the form of a defense to a Judean audience in Jerusalem.* In this apologia the reader learns more about Saul's zeal as a Judean and his own responsibility as a former persecutor of those he has joined, that Paul was more aggressive than portrayed in Acts 9 in his questioning the source of his visions* and that he received his call to witness to Gentiles* directly from the risen Jesus in a vision in the Jerusalem temple* (Acts 22:17-21), rather than earlier in Damascus.

The context of the third recounting, with Paul now speaking Greek, is a hearing before civil authorities in Caesarea (see Civil Authority). In this version of Paul's apologia, Luke displays the rhetorical features of a classical defense speech, by which the reader should be persuaded not only that Paul was not helpless but also that he had become an orator of some stature. In Acts 26 the narrator continues the trend begun in Acts 22 to intensify the descriptions both of Saul's activities as a persecutor (who ironically is now being persecuted by those who are like his former self) and of his experience of the light in the vision. And in a further expansion the risen Lord* expounds at length on his sending Paul to the Gentiles. There is also truncation of the narrative: Paul's blindness, his having been led into Damascus, and Ananias are not mentioned. The narrative bypasses these events and substitutes Paul's summary: "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision" (Acts 26:19-20).

Such modified repetitions have helped lead narrative critics to two important conclusions. First, the reader should pay close attention to how the placement of any element in a developing narrative affects that material's function. Expectations created or implied early in a narrative may be reversed later. Thus it is not appropriate to derive a biblical writer's view of a particular subject by collecting and summarizing relevant internal references without regard to their functions in the whole narrative. Second, the reader is led to build an image of the central characters as relevant information is revealed in an unfolding narrative.

2.2.2. Characterization. "Characterization refers to the process by which characters are formulated, depicted, and developed," and a character is defined as any figure or group presented in a literary work (Darr, 173). As Darr points out, "Some of the most vivid, enduring, and effectual characters in all of Western literature appear in Luke-Acts." Until the rise of narrative criticism, however, scholars' awareness of just how these characters are employed by the narrator to advance the story line has been quite limited.

Darr has summarized the questions that narrative critics should use in uncovering the author's techniques of characterization as follows: "What roles do characters play and how are such roles recognized by the reader?" "What devices give a personage depth and individuality?" "Are figures illustrative (typed/symbolic) or more realistic?" "What contemporary literary stereotypes and social conventions are evoked?" "How is distance (the level of identification between reader and character) controlled?" (11). Darr emphasizes that readers build their images of characters in a narrative in response to the author's presentations of figures within "a web of interrelationships that develops among all of the figures in the story world. . . . Characters are delineated in terms of each other, just as we are defined by our relationships in real life" (41). It follows then that God also must be regarded as such a character whose image in the reader's mind is built up as divine intervention is presented (see Brawley).

2.2.3. Setting. Chatman observes that authors provide social, historical, geographical and temporal settings for their stories. The implied author of Luke and Acts presents more details than does any other NT author about the historical, physical and institutional settings of the activities of Jesus and his early followers. The function of this detail is often not simply to provide interesting local color but to emphasize significant aspects of the implied author's message. For example, the beginnings and endings of Luke and Acts present contrasting physical settings and economic systems for the activity of the people of God. The Gospel opens with Zechariah, Simeon, Anna and then the young Jesus in the temple in Jerusalem; the narrator closes this book by describing the postresurrection disciples as "continually in the temple blessing God." Acts emphatically changes the setting by opening with the disciples waiting for the power of the Holy Spirit in an "upstairs room" of a household; it closes with Paul teaching boldly and without hindrance in a household setting. Along the way the narrator provides many clues that God intends for the household* and its economy of mutual sharing to replace the temple and its unjust economy of exploitive redistribution (see Elliott).

2.2.4. Implicit Commentary. An author's narrative techniques may include expressions of irony, misunderstanding and symbolism to guide the implied reader into an advanced understanding of the narrator's point of view. With these rhetorical devices the implied author encourages the rejection of certain interpretations as well as the exploration of alternative ones. In symbolic communication the reader recognizes that something means more than it initially seems to mean; the narrative critic seeks to uncover the "more" that would have been sensed by the implied reader. And awareness of the use of irony leads to the conclusion that the true interpretation must be contrary to the apparent meaning. In Acts, for example, the reader becomes aware of a major, extended irony: those who attempt to oppose God and repress evangelization unwittingly facilitate the actualization of God's will and the spreading of the "word of the Lord" (see Kurz, 144-47).

The misunderstanding motif that the implied author used effectively in the Gospel of Luke (e.g., Lk 4:22/4:34; 22:36-38) appears early in Acts (Acts 1:6-7). When the disciples ask the risen Jesus whether he is now going to restore the kingdom of Israel, the readers of the Gospel have superior insight that the narrator already conveyed to them in Luke's passion narrative. Following many other uses of this motif in Acts, the narrator returns to it emphatically in Acts 28:26-28, now taken to its ultimate: spiritual blindness. Suddenly the narrator presents Paul gravely citing the famous passage from Isaiah 6:9-10 ("you shall indeed hear but not understand") to leaders of the Judeans living in Rome.* In light of the narrator's report in the same context of a mixed response from Roman Jews to Paul's message (Acts 28:24), whether the implied author intended to convey a tragic sense of the final rejection of the gospel by the Jews (with implicit encouragement of the implied reader to reject non-Christian Jews) remains one of the most vexing questions in Lukan scholarship (see Tannehill 1990, 344-57).

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; HERMENEUTICS; RHETORIC, RHETORICAL CRITICISM; STRUCTURALISM AND DISCOURSE ANALYSIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Bal, Narratology (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985); W. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (2d ed.; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983); R. L. Brawley, Centering on God: Method and Message in Luke-Acts (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1990); S. Chatman, Story and Discourse: Narrative Structure in Fiction and Film (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1978); J. A. Darr, On Character Building: The Reader and the Rhetoric of Characterization in Luke-Acts (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1992); J. H. Elliott, "Temple versus Household in Luke-Acts: A Contrast in Social Institutions" in The Social World of Luke-

Acts: Models for Interpretation, ed. J. H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 211-40; D. B. Gowler, Host, Guest, Enemy and Friend: Portraits of the Pharisees in Luke and Acts (ESEC 2; New York: Peter Lang, 1991); W. S. Kurz, Reading Luke-Acts: Dynamics of Biblical Narrative (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1993); D. L. Matson, Household Conversion Narratives in Acts: Pattern and Interpretation (JSNTSS 123; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); S. D. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989); G. R. Osborne, The Hermeneutical Spiral (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1991) 153-73; M. C. Parsons, The Departure of Jesus in Luke-Acts: The Ascension Narratives in Context (JSNTSS 21; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); M. A. Powell, What Is Narrative Criticism? (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); M. A. Powell, C. G. Gray and M. C. Curtis, eds., The Bible and Modern Literary Criticism: A Critical Assessment and Annotated Bibliography (New York: Greenwood, 1992); D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); F. S. Spencer, "Acts and Modern Literary Approaches" in The Book of Acts in Its Ancient Literary Setting, ed. B. W. Winter and A. D. Clarke (BAFCS 1; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993) 381-414; M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1988); R. C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts (2 vols.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1986, 1990); R. Witherup, "Cornelius Over and Over and Over Again: 'Functional Redundancy' in the Acts of the Apostles," JSNT 49 (1993) 44-66; idem, 'Functional Redundancy in the Acts of the Apostles: A Case Study," JSNT 48 (1992) 67-86.

S. S. Bartchy

NATIONS. See GENTILES, GENTILE MISSION; MISSION, EARLY NON-PAULINE.

NAZOREANS. See JEWISH CHRISTIANITY.

NEW BIRTH

The NT witnesses to a radical change in the life of those who have placed their faith* in Jesus Christ. Among the many terms that mark the initiation of a changed relationship with God* (e.g., justification, redemption,* reconciliation), "new birth" especially points to a change in the life of the believer that initiates a process of growth and development into a new person in Christ.*

1. Terminology
2. Background
3. James: Born to Be Firstfruits
4. Petrine Epistles: Born by Resurrection and the Word
5. Johannine Epistles: Born with Characteristics of a New Family
6. Apostolic Fathers: New Birth and the Church

1. Terminology.

A variety of terms lie behind the NT concept of new birth. The term palingenesia ("regeneration") is found only in Matthew 19:28 and Titus 3:5. The former refers to the end-time renewal of all things, while the latter is linked with anakainōsis ("renewal") to refer to the initiation of new life* in the believer. The production of new life in the believer is expressed by ktizein ("to create"; Eph 2:10), resulting in a kainē ktisis, a "new creation" (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15), or a kainos anthrōpos, a "new person" (Eph 4:24). The related term anakainoun ("to renew") and its cognates occur most frequently in the Pauline letters (Rom 12:2; 2 Cor 4:16; Eph 4:23; Col 3:10; Tit 3:5; cf. Heb 6:6).

The concept of new birth is expressed especially in the later NT by the verb gennaō ("to give birth," "to be born"; e.g., 1 Jn 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18; cf. Jn 1:13; 3:3-8) and the compound verb anagennaō ("to give new birth," "to be born anew"). The latter occurs in the NT only in 1 Peter 1:3, 23 and not at all in the Septuagint (except as a variant in Sir prol. 28). Other terms and expressions round out the concept of new birth, including apokueō ("to bring forth, give birth to," only in James 1:15, 18 in the NT) and ek tou theou estin: the one doing good "is from God" (3 Jn 11).

2. Background.

The older history of religions school sought to find the derivation of the notion "new birth" in the mystery religions of the Hellenistic world, where initiates passed from death into life by being brought into a mysterious intimacy with the deity (e.g., Bultmann, 45-46; see Greco-Roman Religions). But in the light of the scarcity of early "new birth" terminology such as anagennaō in the mystery religions, recent scholarship has sought an origin of the concept elsewhere (Büchsel, 673-75; Nash, 174-79).

A more likely origin has been found in the OT and Judaism. While the Jews did not describe themselves or others as possessing new life, they hoped for a new life for the world and themselves. This hope was expressed especially in the prophecies of a new covenant, whereby God would give Israel a new heart and put a new spirit in them and restore to them new life* (cf. Ezek 11:19-20; 36:25-27; 37:1-14; Jer 31:31-34). Jesus' words of institution at the Last Supper indicate that the covenant is initiated through his blood (Mk 14:22-25), and Peter's proclamation after the resurrection* and Pentecost* indicates that the pouring out of the Holy Spirit* upon all believers is the fulfillment at least in part of the OT expectations (Acts 2:16-41; 3:17-26). New life is now the possession of Christians as a present reality because of the new birth (cf. Toon, 55-61).

3. James: Born to Be Firstfruits.

We gain an important understanding of new birth in the context of James's* apologetic for God's innocence with regard to temptation.* James denies that God is the author of temptation, because God acts constructively. The result of yielding to temptation moves from evil desire to sin, and full-grown sin gives birth (apokyei) to death. But God's purpose is different. "He chose to give us birth (apekyēsen) by the word of truth, so that we would become a kind of firstfruits of all he created" (Jas 1:18). This "birth" could be the birth of humanity in the creation (Gen 1:26-27; 2:7), the birth of Israel, God's chosen people (Deut 32:18), or the birth of Christians. The last appears to be the most likely interpretation. Those who have been chosen by God for salvation* in Christ are the firstfruits of a redeemed creation* (cf. 2 Thess 2:13; Rev 14:4; Rom 8:19-23). James appeals to the spiritual new birth of Christians as an illustration of the good things that God gives. God accomplishes this new, spiritual birth through the "word of truth," a reference to the divine action upon the life of the believer. Christians therefore stand as the first installment ("firstfruits") in the universal redemptive plan of God (Moo, 76-77; Johnson, 197-98).

4. Petrine Epistles: Born by Resurrection and the Word.

Peter (see 1 Peter; 2 Peter) alone among NT authors uses the compound verb anagennaō ("to give new birth," "to be born anew"; 1 Pet 1:3, 23). The event denoted by the term is neither a natural nor a magical process, nor is it something that a person can take up and dispose of at will. Peter tells his readers that they have been born anew into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ (1 Pet 1:3). God has made believers his children (see Son) by raising Jesus from the dead; resurrection means life and makes life possible (cf. Jn 11:25; Michaels, 19). And that life points to the future, because the goal of regeneration is "a living hope." "Birth, while wonderful, does not exist for itself but rather to start a child on its way to maturity and adult life" (Davids, 52).

Peter returns to the new birth motif in 1 Peter 1:23 to say that it is effected by the creative agency of imperishable seed, through the living and enduring word of God (1 Pet 1:23). The term for seed, spora, occurs only here in the NT (the more common word for seed, sperma, is also used in conjunction with the new birth in 1 Jn 3:9). Both spora and sperma can be used either of producing plants or of biological procreation. The former is suggested when Peter metaphorically equates humanity and grass (1 Pet 1:24), but the latter is suggested by the metaphor "newborn babies" (artigennēta brephē) in 1 Peter 2:2. The new birth is effected by the seed of the word of God (cf. Jesus' parable, Lk 8:11; Mk 4:14), which will never perish (1 Pet 1:24). Peter draws not on the smallness or innocence of a baby but on its strong and instinctive longing for mother's milk. Continuous nourishment from "spiritual milk" causes the newborn to grow up in its salvation (1 Pet 2:2).

Through the preaching of the gospel (1 Pet 1:25) of Jesus, the divine seed has sprouted in believers' souls by the power of the Spirit and has produced Jesus' resurrection life in newborn babies who will grow by feeding on pure, spiritual milk.*

5. Johannine Epistles: Born with Characteristics of a New Family.

The Johannine idiom gennēthēnai ek theou ("to be born of God") is a description of the origin of the believer (1 Jn 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 7, 18; cf. 3 Jn 11; Jn 1:13; 3:3-21) whose true existence begins and ends in God through Jesus Christ, and the idiom is used as a description of Jesus himself (1 Jn 5:18; cf. Heb 1:5; 5:5). John uses the idiom to point to characteristics of the new life that have resulted from being born of God (see John, Letters of).

5.1. New Life and Righteousness (1 Jn 2:29). John declares that everyone who does what is right has been born of God (1 Jn 2:29). The metaphor indicates that Christians have received new life from God by a creative act comparable with physical birth. Righteous conduct is not a condition for obtaining rebirth but rather is both a consequence and an evidence that a person has truly been born of God. This kind of righteousness* was displayed by Jesus and is therefore truly possible only for those who have been born of God. Righteousness is a family characteristic shared by the Father and the Son and the children of God. The new life given to those born of God is both transforming and enabling: it makes the believer righteous and enables the believer to live life rightly.

5.2. New Life, Sin and the Seed of God (1 Jn 3:9; 5:18). John continues the thought of 1 John 2:29—the person born of God does what is right—by making the same point negatively: a person who is born of God does not sin. The divine birth explains the Christian's moral character. The Christian does not continue in sin because God's seed (sperma, the more common word for seed than spora in 1 Pet 1:23) remains in him or her. The Christian shares something of the nature of God (cf. 2 Pet 1:4) through the new birth, which ultimately will result in the believer being conformed to the image of Christ (Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18). This is a principle of life in which the word of God operates in the heart of the believer by the inward power of the Spirit and the indwelling presence of Christ (cf. Eph 3:14-19) to produce a godly life. This new life is characteristic of God's own life and will enable the believer to resist sin and live a godly life (cf. Smalley, 171-75).

John expands this thought in 1 John 5 by drawing on a parallel between the believer and Jesus: "We know that those who are born of God do not sin, but the one who was born of God protects them, and the evil one does not touch them" (1 Jn 5:18). The expression "the one who was born of God" is most probably a reference to Jesus Christ (Marshall, 252; Smalley, 303), not the believer (Brown, 620-22). This corresponds to Jesus' divine sonship, which the author of Hebrews* unfolds when citing the messianic prophecy of Psalm 2:7, a text that likewise describes Jesus as born of God (Heb 1:5; 5:5; cf. Acts 13:33). This divine begetting of the believer and the Son joins them in participating in divine life. Once again we see that the new birth for believers results in a family trait. The children of God now are protected from the evil one by the Son of God.* Children of the devil (see Satan) naturally sin (Jn 8:38-47; cf. 1 Jn 5:19), but children of God now are kept from sin by their own new life and also by the protection of the Son of God (cf. Jn 17:12).

5.3. New Life and Love (1 Jn 4:7; 5:1). John begins an extended discussion of love* as the third family characteristic of the new life that results from being born of God by stating, "Beloved, let us love one another, because love is from God; everyone who loves is born of God and knows God" (1 Jn 4:7; cf. 1 Jn 5:1-12). As believers receive God's love they experience a transformation of heart by which they are now able and impelled to love each other with God's love. This was the emphasis of Jesus' new command to the disciples at the Last Supper (Jn 13:34-35).

Not only do regenerate persons have a new heart that will love, but also they have an endless supply of love from God by which the new heart can continually pour forth love (esp. 1 Jn 4:12-16, 19-21). If people do not love, they show that they do not know God. God's love brought life, and it is his love that guarantees that believers will love one another.

5.4. New Life and Faith (1 Jn 5:1, 4). John continues the emphasis upon love in 1 John 5 but additionally gives a final family characteristic of new life: victorious faith. "Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ has been born of God . . . for everything born of God conquers the world. And this is the victory that conquers the world, our faith" (1 Jn 5:1, 4). In 1 John 5:1 we can see that the continuing exercise of faith (pisteuōn, present tense) is the result of having been born of God (gegēsanta, perfect tense). This kind of faith takes God at his word by delighting in the will of God and thereby conquering the presence and power of Satan in the world. Whoever is born of God has the kind of faith that also triumphs over the trials and troubles that arise whenever one seeks to do what is right in a sinful world (Toon, 35).

6. Apostolic Fathers: New Birth and the Church. While the terminology of new birth is scarce in the apostolic fathers,* we do find the concept developing from the NT teachings.

6.1. Inward Transformation. The apostolic fathers continue to emphasize the inward change that occurs in the new birth. Ignatius* of Antioch describes the transformation as moving from death to life, and the new life is like bearing inwardly "the stamp of God the Father in love through Jesus Christ" (Ign. Magn. 5.2). This irreversible stamp of God's ownership also produces the power of Christ's life within one's experience. Ignatius elsewhere refers to fellow believers as "God-bearers, temple-bearers, Christ-bearers, bearers of holy things" (Ign. Eph. 9.2), emphasizing the separation of the Christian community from the profane world through the indwelling of individual believers (Schoedel, 67).

The *Epistle of Barnabas likewise speaks of inward transformation, so that believers "became new, created again from the beginning; therefore God truly dwells in us" (Barn. 16.8; cf. 6.11). He goes on to emphasize that the indwelling God speaks through the believer to witness to unbelievers (Barn. 16.9-10).

6.2. Baptism and the New Birth. Most of the discussion by the apostolic fathers of the new birth is in the context of the rite of baptism.* It was beginning to be taken for granted that Jesus' expression "born of water and Spirit" (Jn 3:5) and Paul's reference to "the washing of regeneration and renewing by the Holy Spirit" (Tit 3:5) refer to the outward act of baptism and the inward act of regeneration. While this connection arguably does not imply that baptism produces regeneration (Downing, 112), without the caution Peter inserts in 1 Peter 3:21 it may have set the direction for such a doctrine in the later fathers.

The Epistle of Barnabas contends that the cross* and baptism are vitally connected, so that "while we descend into the water laden with sins and dirt, we rise up bearing fruit in our heart and with fear and hope in Jesus in our spirits" (Barn. 11.11). In the *Shepherd of Hermas we find the declaration concerning believers that it was necessary "for them to come up through water in order to be made alive, for otherwise they could not enter the kingdom of God" (Herm. Sim. 9.16.2; cf. Herm. Man. 4.3.1). The water is the seal by which deadness is laid aside and through which believers come up alive (Herm. Sim. 9.16.4; 9.31.1, 4). 2 Clement likewise speaks of the seal of baptism as the confidence that believers will enter into the kingdom of God (2 Clem. 6.9; 7:6; see Clement of Rome). However, the author of 1 Clement is careful to declare that believers are justified not by piety or works but through faith in God who justifies (1 Clem. 32.4).

6.3. New Birth and Community. In an intriguing passage the author of 1 Clement apparently harks back to Peter's discussion of Noah and says, "Noah . . . proclaimed a regeneration (palingenesia) to the world, and through him the Master saved the living creatures that entered into the ark in harmony" (1 Clem. 9.4). The analogy suggests that spiritual rebirth can take place only within the community of the church. While this was taken too far in later centuries, it presents a NT understanding of the new birth taking place within the corporate life of the community of faith (Downing, 105-6).

See also BAPTISM, BAPTISMAL RITES; FORGIVENESS; HOLY SPIRIT; LIFE AND DEATH; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John: Translated with Introduction, Notes, and Commentary (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); F. Büchsel, "γεννάω κτλ," TDNT 1:665-75; R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); V. K. Downing, "The Doctrine of Regeneration in the Second Century," Evangelical Review of Theology 14.2 (April-June 1990) 99-112; L. T. Johnson, The Letter of James: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1995); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1988); J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); D. J. Moo, The Letter of James: An Introduction and Commentary (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); R. Nash, The Gospel and the Greeks (Dallas: Word, 1992); F. Porsch, "ἀναγεννάω," EDNT 1:76-77; A. Ringwald, "γεννάω," NIDNTT 1:176-180; W. R. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch (Herm; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985): S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); P. Toon, Born Again: A Biblical and Theological Study of Regeneration (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987).

M. J. Wilkins

NEW COVENANT. See COVENANT, NEW COVENANT.

NEW HEAVENS. See HEAVEN, NEW HEAVENS.

NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY

If theology is discourse about God, then there has been NT theology, i.e., discourse about God that is based on the NT documents, as long as those documents have existed. But so expansive an approach proves unhelpful: no serious reflection on the NT throughout the entire history of the church could be excluded. NT theology is best thought of as a subset of biblical theology and restricted to movements that adopt that label.

1. Biblical Theology and New Testament Theology
2. Historical Criticism and New Testament Theology
3. Some Responses to the Historicist Impulse
4. Recent Visions of the Nature of New Testament Theology
5. Roman Catholic Contributions
6. New Testament Theology: 1985-95
7. Other Influences That Shape New Testament Theology
8. Controlling or Defining Elements of New Testament Theology
9. Focal Issues

1. Biblical Theology and New Testament Theology.

The first known use of "biblical theology" was by W. J. Christmann in 1607, in the title of his book (no longer extant) Teutsche biblische Theologie. It was a compilation of dicta probantia, proof-texts drawn from the Bible to support Protestant systematic theology. This usage enjoyed long life: a century and a half later, G. T. Zachariae published his four-volume Biblische Theologie oder Untersuchung des biblischen Grundes der vornehmsten theologischen Lehren (1771-75). This was an exegetically rigorous and detailed version of the same approach, prepared within the framework of traditional views of inspiration well established from the time of the magisterial Reformation yet reflecting very little consciousness of historical development within the canon.*

A rather different usage is found in P. J. Spener and the Pietists he influenced. In his Pia Desideria (1675) Spener distinguished theologia biblica (i.e., his own theology) from theologia scholastica, the prevailing Protestant orthodoxy that had returned to the Aristotelianism Luther had rejected. Thus "biblical theology" took on an aura of protest, of being "more biblical" than the prevailing dogmatics.

In the second half of the eighteenth century, under the impact of English Deism and the German Aufklärung, a handful of biblical theologians protested against the prevailing dogmatics, not in favor of Pietism but in favor of rationalism. The aim of several of these works was to extract from the Bible timeless truths in accord with reason, truths that were still largely, if sometimes uneasily, acceptable to the confessional stance of the ecclesiastical establishment. The most influential by far was J. P. Gabler, whose inaugural lecture at the University of Altdorf captured the rising mood and precipitated the next step: "An Oration on the Proper Distinction Between Biblical and Dogmatic Theology and the Specific Objectives of Each" (Gabler 1787). Gabler charged that dogmatic theology is too far removed from Scripture, constantly changing, perpetually disputed. Biblical theology, by which Gabler seems to mean a largely inductive study of the biblical text, has much more likelihood of gaining widespread agreement among learned, godly and cautious theologians. The fruit of such study may then serve as the basis on which dogmatic theology may be constructed. Thus Gabler's primary appeal was not that the Bible must first be read historically or that the documents be set out in historical sequence (though a little of this is implicit in what he said) but that biblical theologians may properly go about their task without being directly bound by doctrinal aims—an epoch-making suggestion at the time and one that has earned him the sobriquet "father of biblical theology."

The first part of Gabler's proposal, the rupturing of the link between biblical study and confessional application, was soon widely adopted, but the second part, that the results of such biblical theology should then be deployed in the construction of dogmatics, was largely ignored. Moreover, the more that scholars worked at a merely descriptive level, with decreasing concern or responsibility to synthesize and prescribe what is normative, the more the diversities in the biblical material achieved prominence. Encouraged to think through the biblical text inductively without reference to confessional constraints, G. L. Bauer produced not a biblical theology but an OT theology (1796), followed by a two-volume NT theology (1800-1802). Biblical theologies (i.e., of the entire Christian canon) continued to be written for the next century and beyond, the most influential being that of J. C. K. von Hofmann (1886), whose contribution to A. Schlatter's thought was significant. Moreover, some biblical theologians accepted the mandate to produce distinctive OT and NT theologies while still trying to spell out what bearing their work had for dogmatics (e.g., de Wette, 1813—although his push toward the unified was a synthesis of faith and aesthetics, or faith and feeling, attempting to isolate the timeless and the general while the particular data of the NT could be peeled away as the particular phenomena of one phase or other of the history of religions). But the drift of biblical theology was toward the increasingly atomistic, cut off from any obligation to traditional dogmatics.

2. Historical Criticism and New Testament Theology.

The long-standing ferment over the historical worth of the Bible, traceable in no small measure to Spinoza and Richard Simon generations earlier, erupted in the 1830s and the 1840s in D. F. Strauss's Das Leben Jesu (1835; ET 1972) and in the impact of F. C. Baur's historical reconstruction of how the Pauline epistles, the book of Acts* and the Gospels came to be written. The influence of the Tübingen School was far wider than the law/grace, Peter/Paul dichotomies at the heart of their historical criticism. The posthumous publication of Baur's NT theology (1864) marked the beginning of a passionate commitment by many biblical theologians to a developmental view of critically reconstructed history. Moreover, Baur's fairly radical naturalism meant that the NT documents could not properly be thought of as revelatory in any sense, still less theologically binding. They merely provided information about the first century.

Although few who followed him during the next half-century indulged in his degree of skepticism, Baur's insistence on the primacy of developmental history in the interpretation of NT documents shaped the leaders in the field—not only the best of the liberal biblical theologians (e.g., Holtzmann 1897, 1911) but the best of the conservative ones as well (e.g., Weiss 1868, 1903; ET, 2 vols., 1882-83). The focus on smaller and smaller parts of the Bible and the turn-of-the-century interest in a naturalism-inclined history of religions prompted many to doubt that one could meaningfully speak of NT theology: one must speak rather of NT theologies. And since the discipline of NT theology was disappearing into the wasteland of naturalistic histories of early Christianity, what need was there for the discipline? Hence the cheeky title of W. Wrede's work, written at least in part as a critique of Holtzmann: Über Aufgabe und Methode der sogenannten neutestamentliche Theologie (1897; lit. Concerning the Task and Method of So-Called New Testament Theology). Wrede argued that to treat each book of the NT separately was absurd, since each book provided too little information to enable an interpreter to reconstruct the entire "theology" of its author. The only responsible way forward was to construct "the history of early Christian religion and theology." Any unified NT theology, let alone biblical theology, is a chimera. This emphasis on the developmental-historical and on the descriptive remains a driving influence on not a few works dubbed NT theology today.

3. Some Responses to the Historicist Impulse.

The liberal track from these developments tended to produce works that were inherently unstable. Reconstructions of the historical Jesus, for instance, produced a Jesus who was acceptable to the current climate. Further historical work overthrew the construction. Three related but quite different developments responded to the growing crisis in the discipline.

The first was the impact of K. Barth. His commentary on Romans (1919, 1921) reflected a theological approach to the text that had been progressively eroded in the name of history. In part Barth was building on the outstanding conservative historical scholarship of T. Zahn, J. B. Lightfoot, and others. Thus in his 1922 debate with R. Bultmann, Barth was unwilling to allow a place for Sachkritik, a criticism of the content of the biblical texts on the basis of what is perceived to be the gospel* the text intends to articulate (Morgan). Barth had persuaded Bultmann to abandon classic religious liberalism; he could not persuade him to abandon the formation he had received in historical criticism of a skeptical variety (a background that Barth himself sometimes held on to in tension with his own theology of the Word). Thus Barth diminished the importance of historical research for the understanding of the Bible, underscoring instead the importance of theological interpretation. For many this was an oasis in a parched land; for others this was escapism that could not long be sustained unless the underlying historical and hermeneutical questions were firmly addressed, not summarily dismissed.

The second was the tack taken by Bultmann. Attentive to Barth's insistence that merely historical description is arid but not to his call to abandon classic liberal historical criticism, Bultmann, in a series of articles and books and finally in his Theology of the NT (1948-53 ET 1952-55), developed a new path. The naturalism and historical approaches of Wrede dominate the work at one level, but instead of eschewing theological formulation or dogmatic synthesis, Bultmann "demythologizes" what he thinks "modern man" can no longer believe and seeks to isolate the real, unchanging nature of the gospel in terms that can still be believed. At one level his historical reconstructions are heavily indebted to the turn-of-the-century history of religions school, worked out on a Procrustean bed of source criticism now largely abandoned and on an assumption that early and well-developed Gnosticism* shaped many features of nascent Christianity—a reconstruction that finds fewer and fewer adherents because evidence for well-formed pre-Christian Gnosticism is distinctly lacking.

At another level, in his effort to make the text speak today Bultmann abandons the historicism of Wrede. His hermeneutical program enables him to find, especially in Paul and John, a kernel of kerygma* that is remarkably akin to Heideggerian existentialism. Along the way revelation,* God,* faith* and much else become redefined. Bultmann advocates using the ancient vocabulary because lay people who belong to the old ways will hear the words and be comforted by the repetition of the ancient mythologies, while the cognoscenti will understand them in an existentialist framework. More importantly this theological content is cast in such a way that it is independent of the historical reconstructions, so that changing historical fashions cannot by themselves challenge his theological construction.

Despite the enormous influence wielded by Bultmann's work, however, very few hold it up as a suitable model today. Scholars with a historical bent find little merit in reading late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century existentialism into the first century. Scholars with a higher view of revelation insist that history and faith cannot properly be driven into disjunctive camps. Many complain how profoundly unfaithful to the NT documents is the resulting theological synthesis: faith whose object is not tied to historical revelation; a Jesus about whom little can be said except for a raw Dass, a thatness of his existence; a resurrection* whose significance lies not in its reality but in the psychological faith of the community, and so forth.

The third development was the rise of the biblical theology movement. Influenced in part by Barth and in part by Hofmann's work in the nineteenth century, hungry to be theologically and pastorally relevant in a world rent by two world wars, the Great Depression and the cold war, exponents of the movement developed various emphases in Britain and the continent during the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s and in America during the 1940s and 1950s. Perhaps the movement's most influential theologian was O. Cullmann, whose insistence on salvation history (Heilsgeschichte) attempted not only to bring together two components that had been flying apart in the disputes over biblical theology at the turn of the century but who wrote in a style calculated to be edifying. His insistence that salvation history is the theme that unites both Testaments has not gained wide acceptance even though only a few would deny that he has rightly emphasized one important unifying theme. In the English-speaking world A. Richardson's more popular writings, culminating in his own NT theology (1958), exerted wide influence. But the biblical theology movement had many facets. R. Morgan (ABD 6:479) includes within its scope G. Kittel's Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (1933-74; ET 1964-74), which was, after all, dedicated to Schlatter.

But the biblical theology movement as such could not last. In the hands of some of its exponents, the locus of revelation was in God's mighty acts, but the connection these acts enjoyed with the biblical text was less than clear. In the hands of others, entire theological structures were being made to depend on word studies of doubtful linguistic probity (a criticism leveled by J. Barr). Heilsgeschichte underwent several semantic metamorphoses. Hesitations about the movement climaxed in B. Childs's critique (1970).

4. Recent Visions of the Nature of New Testament Theology.

The contemporary scene is flooded with diversity as to what is understood by NT theology, though most kinds betray threads drawn from one strand or another of the twisted historical skein briefly untangled here. It may be helpful to classify some of the NT theologies of the past hundred years, especially those of the last half-century.

One strand follows a pattern of generally conservative historical judgments, a commitment to describe the theological content of the NT books and an assumption that such content is of authoritative (see Authority) and religious significance. In succession to the substantive work of Weiss and Schlatter is the shorter but robust NT theology of Zahn (1928), who conceived of NT theology not as a scientific system or ordered religion, in the history of religions model, but as a presentation of the theology of the Bible in its historical development. Zahn begins with John the Baptist as the one who opens the final epoch of redemptive history; only occasionally does he make connections with the OT.

Along somewhat similar lines in the English-speaking world is G. B. Stevens (1901, 1906), most of whose historical judgments are conservative (e.g., he places Acts, James,* 1 Peter,* Jude* and 2 Peter in the section on "The Primitive Apostolic Preaching," before the section on Paul) but whose theology is sometimes cast in the artificial optimism of turn-of-the-century pious liberalism. R. E. Knudsen's subtitle (1964), A Basis for Christian Faith, displays his theological interest, but his structure of thought owes more to systematics than to inductive description of the NT corpora.

More recently the more substantial works of G. E. Ladd (1974, 1993), D. Guthrie (1981) and, at a slightly more popular level, L. Morris (1986) more faithfully honor the tradition from Hofmann and Weiss. Ladd and Morris interpret the NT corpus by corpus, working inductively from the text and generally following a developmental approach whose structure is built on generally conservative historical judgments. On some themes Ladd draws important links to the OT (e.g., kingdom*); neither Ladd nor Morris attempts to integrate his findings into a synthetic NT theology, let alone a "whole-Bible" biblical theology (cf. Oeming). Guthrie's massive volume addresses the demand for synthesis by choosing themes and tracing them through the various NT corpora. By and large the themes are dictated by the material; occasionally they have been dictated by the categories of systematic theology. The gain achieved by placing side by side treatments of how the various NT corpora treat selected themes (e.g., Son of Man) is somewhat mitigated by the loss in clearly seeing how the individual corpora are put together, how they tie together their own themes. In any case there is no attempt at integration of biblical or NT thought.

Although Hofmann's emphasis on what is now called salvation history helped shape both Cullmann and Ladd, his influence is felt in slightly different ways in E. Stauffer (1941; ET 1955) and especially in L. Goppelt's posthumous work (2 vols., 1975-76; ET 1981-82). Stauffer does not follow the chronological order of the NT books but opts for a christocentric theology of history (his approach to salvation history), running from Judaism* to post-NT times. At one level he follows Wrede in denying the need of a canon but not for the same reason: Stauffer holds that a canon is unnecessary for the writing of NT theology since it is the christocentric theology of history that runs in a straight line from "the old biblical tradition" (Stauffer 51) to the subapostolic fathers (see Apostolic Fathers).

By contrast Goppelt, in his far more rigorous work, builds on Hofmann but wants to distance himself from any association of salvation history with universal history. In Goppelt's hands salvation history is more narrowly tied to the notions of promise* and fulfillment and must not be abstracted from regular history. Moreover, however important the theme is to him, he tries to avoid elevating it to exclusive importance and accepts many standard historical-critical conclusions. He eschews mere description, arguing that modern human beings must be brought into "critical dialogue" with the NT writers. His first volume explores the theological meaning of Jesus' activity. NT theology is grounded in the reporting of the earthly ministry of Jesus. If we do not have direct access to this historical Jesus, we do have access to Jesus as he showed himself to his followers, and study of this Jesus is as necessary as the study of the post-Easter developments (reserved for the second volume).

Certain works are so individualistic that they cannot easily be identified with a particular stream of the heritage of NT theologies. One thinks in particular of M. Albertz, who studied under both Zahn and A. von Harnack and who follows neither. The first two of his four volumes (1946-57) recast NT introduction along form-critical lines, and the next two unfold the NT's message. Against Bultmann he argues that it is improper to demythologize the NT writings since these documents contain no myths (but he distorts what Bultmann means by "myth"); against Baur he argues that naturalist ("philosophical") historical approaches fail to treat the NT on its own terms; against Weiss, von Harnack, Bultmann, Stauffer and others, he argues that NT theology is far too entrenched in a modern worldview and must return to the NT itself. His attempt to unfold the NT message he ties to the formula found in 2 Corinthians 13:13. But as G. Hasel (1978, 69) comments, it is far from clear how Albertz "can hold on to form criticism which is also influenced by the Zeitgeist and disclaim the validity of other branches of research which also reflect the Zeitgeist."

H. Conzelmann (1968, 1987; ET 1969) is the only student of Bultmann to write an entire NT theology, and in many ways his work is indebted to his master. But his work eclipses Bultmann at several points. Whereas for Bultmann the historical Jesus was a presupposition for NT theology rather than a part of NT theology, for Conzelmann the historical Jesus is not a necessary presupposition. The basic problem of NT theology, according to Conzelmann, is why the church maintained "the identity of the Exalted One with Jesus of Nazareth after the resurrection appearances" (xviii). Even Bultmann's Dass disappears. (By contrast many other post-Bultmannians embarked on the so-called new quest for the historical Jesus [e.g., E. Käsemann, as early as 1954].) In line with his own commitment to redaction-critical study, Conzelmann supplements Bultmann with a section on the Synoptic kerygma. Further, taking up a suggestion from H. Schlier, who thinks of theology as the interpretation of early creedal formulations, Conzelmann seeks to trace out the trajectories that lead back to the earliest Christian creeds.* But once he has reconstructed them to his satisfaction, he regards them as no more than the objectification of early Christian self-understanding. As a true disciple of Bultmann, for him (and especially for H. Braun, ET 1965) theology is finally nothing more than anthropology. Even his fellow post-Bultmannians have roundly criticized him for the speculative nature of his creedal reconstructions.

Also reacting against Bultmann but in the center of the stream of discussion stand several NT theologies that survey the content of the NT corpora and adopt historical stances that are more or less conservative but are invariably more conservative than that of Bultmann and Conzelmann. These offer useful exegeses and theological insights but break little new methodological ground. Most of them offer descriptive sections to each of the various NT corpora. Included here are W. G. Kümmel (1969), J. Jeremias (1971), E. Lohse (1974) and J. Gnilka (1989). Kümmel's first chapter reconstructs the proclamation of Jesus, and his fourth section compares and contrasts Jesus and Paul, noting not only their commonalities and differences but also their different salvation-historical situations. Thus he is far removed from Bultmann, Braun and Conzelmann. Only Jeremias's first volume, on the proclamation of Jesus, appeared in print. He felt it was possible to reconstruct with a fair degree of certainty what Jesus had taught. But because so much of his historical work is based on a fairly doctrinaire form of redaction criticism, he has been criticized from many parts of the theological spectrum, even while those who are convinced that Christian theology must be grounded in responsible history are grateful for the antidote he provides against Bultmann.

At a somewhat more popular level Lohse similarly incorporates the proclamation of Jesus into NT theology. Lohse's "postulate of non-derivability" (Unableitbarkeitsthese, 21)—i.e., his confident affirmation that some sayings attributed to Jesus must be accepted as authentic because they could not reasonably have been derived from the early church—makes this stance possible and places him in the mainstream of his time. In any case the debate has moved on: the more liberal scholars discover little that they cannot assign to the creativity of the church, while the more conservative find odd any criterion that confuses the eccentric with the historical. (In what other field of historical research would the most influential sayings of an extraordinarily influential individual be denied authenticity on the ground that because they were believed and repeated by the individual's followers they could not have been authentic?) The rest of Lohse's work follows roughly the chronological development of the NT, with a closing chapter devoted to its unity. This unity rests, Lohse asserts, on the fact that although the various NT corpora develop a variety of theological syntheses, all of these syntheses are based on the same kerygma of the crucified and risen Christ.

In the English-speaking world a handful of works plot roughly the same course. The volume by M. Burrows (1946) selects themes drawn from the categories of systematic theology and tracks them across the NT corpora. F. C. Grant's large volume (1950) disavows that it is a NT theology, but it is indistinguishable from some strands of the discipline. Grant strongly emphasizes the importance of historical anchoring (he is not far from Wrede in this regard and far removed from Bultmann) and emphasizes the differences he detects among the various "theologies" of the NT, which as a whole is not more than "a theology in process" (Grant, 60). The rest of the book treats an array of "doctrines" (e.g., doctrine of God, doctrine of man, doctrine of Christ, doctrine of miracles*), considering each in turn as it appears in the NT but refusing to trace any chronological development. By contrast F. Stagg (1962) seeks to highlight the unity within the diversity, as does the influential work of S. Neill (1974) and the more popular work of A. M. Hunter (1957). The contributions of C. C. Ryrie (1959) and C. R. Lehman (1974) are aimed at a popular readership. They primarily serve their respective theological constituencies without significantly engaging with the broader discipline.

5. Roman Catholic Contributions.

Roman Catholic scholars have come late to the discipline. Despite the popular, confessional works of A. Lemonnyer (1928; ET 1930) and O. Küss (1936), it has been the years since the publication of Divino Afflante (1943) that have increasingly displayed among Catholics the diversity of approaches that characterizes Protestant scholars.

M. Meinertz (1950) works inductively with the separate NT writings but attempts no assessment of their chronological or historical development. J. Bonsirven (1951) is much the same, but a gentle piety pervades his work as he sees his task as providing a responsible basis for Christian dogmatics. His historical judgments are almost always conservative: for example, he reconstructs the life of Jesus from the Synoptics and John. The later NT writings he denotes as "Works of Christian Maturity," thereby refusing to tarnish them with the pejorative adjective late, much loved by scholars whose NT theology is a historical discipline but little else.

R. Schnackenburg (1962) deals first with the kerygma and theology of the primitive church, reconstructs the teaching* of Jesus according to the Synoptics, summarizes the contributions of the individual Synoptists and follows with treatments of Paul, John and the rest of the NT writings. What is distinctive about his work is the space at the end that Schnackenburg devotes to some central topics that recur thematically in the sequence. The four-volume work by K. H. Schelkle (1968-76; ET 1971-78) is structured on traditional dogmatic categories: creation,* world-time-history (vol. 1); revelation,* redemption* and salvation* (vol. 2); ethos (vol. 3); completion (vol. 4/1); disciple, congregation and church* (vol. 4/2). But within each category Schelkle traces, in continuous dialogue with dogmatics, the diachronic development of the movement from the OT through Judaism to the NT.

The contribution of Goppelt has already been described. W. Thüsing (1981) identifies the unity of the NT in two kinds of criteria: the structures of the life and works and teaching of Jesus, as Thüsing reconstructs them, and the structures of christology* and soteriology in the post-Easter period. Gnilka adopts the now traditional form of NT theology that treats the various authors or corpora of the NT separately, with the caveat that James and 2 Thessalonians are treated in excursuses. Gnilka begins with the seven Pauline epistles whose authenticity is least disputed, glancing back at the same time to the generation before Paul. He then moves on to the Gospels, pausing to consider Q and his reconstruction of a primitive passion narrative. John is treated with the Johannine Epistles (see John, Letters of). Gnilka goes on to the so-called deutero-Paulines, the rest of the letters and the Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of). In each case he organizes his material by focusing on humanity, salvation, community and the sacraments (though he admits other themes as they crop up). His concluding chapter probes for unity and concludes that, whatever the extraordinary diversity, salvation is always through Jesus Christ, and the response of faith is always mandated. As with Lohse, what holds this together is the kerygma of the death and resurrection of Jesus (see Death of Christ).

6. New Testament Theology: 1985-95.

If one focuses on the most recent NT theologies, those published in the approximate decade of 1985-95, despite the fact that H. Räisänen (1990) has pronounced that the discipline is fundamentally impossible, the diversity of approaches is staggering.

Although much of his writing focuses on the OT side of biblical theology, H. Gese, who represents one wing of the so-called new Tübingen school, has left a plethora of studies that have a bearing on NT theology. (For English readers he is most easily approached through his 1981 volume.) Gese argues that in the time of Jesus and of the writers of the NT there was still no closed OT canon (a thesis increasingly questioned), and therefore biblical theology must be understood to deal with the process of tradition viewed as a whole—not with earlier and later forms or canonical forms but with the entire process.

Somewhat similarly P. Stuhlmacher, using the law* as a sample topic appropriate to this notion of biblical theology, traces developing and quite differing concepts of law through both Testaments (Stuhlmacher 1986). But his more recent work is nuanced and complex. After an extensive introduction to the aims and structure of the discipline, the first volume of his NT theology begins with the rise and distinctiveness of NT proclamation: first the preaching of Jesus, followed by a much shorter section on the preaching of the primitive church (i.e., the period between the resurrection and Paul) and concluded by a section on the preaching of Paul. The subtitle of this volume is critical: The Foundation: From Jesus to Paul. Here is neither massive historical skepticism nor a Bultmannian trench between theology and history.

In the second edition of his book on NT hermeneutics (1986) one detects a rapprochement between Stuhlmacher and G. Maier (Stuhlmacher 1986, 33-34), whom he no longer places in the fundamentalist camp because of the latter's commitment to take the text and history seriously, even if his judgments are sometimes more conservative than those of Stuhlmacher and his criticism of the historical-critical method more scathing (Maier, who had earlier proclaimed the "end of the historical-critical method," prefers "historical-biblical method"). Among the luminaries of German scholarship, however, Stuhlmacher, O. Hofius, M. Hengel and one or two others stand alone in the seriousness with which they treat the historical dimensions of the NT text.

H. Hübner has completed his three-volume NT theology (1990-95). The first raises questions about the extent and nature of the canon, evaluates canon criticism and explores what is meant by covenant* and revelation. The chapters devoted to the NT expression of revelation treat Romans 1:16-17 and Romans 3:21 (the self-revealing righteousness of God), the parables of Jesus, the focus on Jesus as the revealer of God in the Fourth Gospel and the Parousia* as the revelation still to come, concluding with some reflections from systematic theology on these chapters. This sets up Hübner for a chapter on the one God and both Testaments and an epilogue on Jewish and NT methods of exegesis. The second volume treats Pauline theology, both the theology of the "undisputed" Paulines and of "Pauline theology" as it works itself out in other NT epistles, including James and 1 and 2 Peter. The final volume considers Hebrews,* the four Gospels and the Apocalypse. It concludes with a lengthy section on the "interval" (Zeit-Raum) of grace* that harks back to the "being and time" categories of the existentialist theology of the first half of this century. Despite valiant efforts to identify points of continuity between the Testaments, the last chapter lays much more stress on discontinuity: the NT takeover (in novo receptum) of the Old demands this assessment.

The brief work by E. Schweizer (1989) is of mixed genre, simultaneously a NT introduction and a NT theology. The former component offers common critical judgments with sovereign disregard for alternative views. The NT theology component restricts itself to the NT canon. There is no separate treatment of the historical Jesus. Schweizer emphasizes diversity, with a typical scheme for the development of eschatology,* christology,* ecclesiology (see Church) and the like: the diversity is in the canon, not in history. The brevity of the book ensures there is no reflection on the aims or methods of NT theology.

The contribution of W. Schmithals (1994) is in some respects not a NT theology but an independent reconstruction of early Christianity into which the NT is squeezed. Schmithals asks why the traditions* about the historical Jesus should ever have been attached to the post-Easter kerygma and its related confessions. He argues that such passages as 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 suggest a link between the theme of the kingdom of God in the teaching of Jesus and Paul's theology. From this base Schmithals develops a fundamental polarity (methodologically akin to Baur's reductionism a century and a half earlier) between Antioch* theology and Damascus theology. Antioch theology was apocalyptic,* focused on the righteousness* of God and on salvation and had gnostic overtones. The theology of Damascus, where Paul was converted and molded, had by that time abandoned distinctions between Jews and Gentiles,* enjoyed a christology that affirmed preexistence* and Incarnation, taught a radical view of sin* and espoused a realized eschatology. From this polarity Schmithals proceeds to trace a number of subjects through the NT and into the apostolic fathers.

K. Berger's large, recent volume (1994) similarly traces the history of NT thought, but the picture is quite different. His book develops the metaphor of a tree: NT thought is like a large tree with roots in Jerusalem,* but the primary branching takes place in Antioch. The first Christians were charismatic, nurtured by the OT, and saw themselves as the new Israel.* Those more influenced by Hellenism moved to Antioch. The Jerusalem group shaped the early Roman church and the epistle of James. The more influential streams flowing from Antioch became the Pauline and the Johannine branches. A secondary node in the large Antioch branch generates the Gospels, including Mark, Q and John (in Berger's thought John antedates Matthew and Luke). All this material is laid out before Berger begins his systematic examination of the NT books. These are then studied to see how they fit into this grid, and Berger believes he can detect how the various branches repeatedly cross and influence one another. Berger traces his pattern beyond the NT into the second century. Although all of this generates many novel ways of looking at things, sometimes the speculation is palpable. More importantly for our purposes, there is no significant attempt to seek out what is unifying in NT thought or to wrestle with questions of revelation, theological normativity or canon.

Quite different is the posthumously published work of G. B. Caird (1994). Caird candidly assesses and criticizes previous approaches to NT theology—what he calls the dogmatic approach, the chronological approach, the kerygmatic approach and the author-by-author approach—and proffers another, the conference-table approach. "The presupposition of our study is simply stated: to write a New Testament theology is to preside at a conference of faith and order. Around the table sit the authors of the New Testament, and it is the presider's task to engage them in a colloquium about theological matters which they themselves have placed on the agenda" (Caird, 18). Caird sets forth his answers to possible objections, e.g., How many conferees are around the table? What is the presider's role? What about the troubling fact that the conferees are all dead? The latter leads into an important discussion on how and to what extent things from the past may be known.

Caird then works through various central concepts (e.g., predestination, sin,* ethics,* eschatology,* christology*), which are "discussed" by the participants (including Caird, the presider), the discussion moving on to a presentation of the theology of Jesus himself. The epilogue on dialogue, meaning and authority offers a brief, trenchant critique of both postmodernist readings of the NT and their antithesis in the denial of all development but mere reliance on original intention. In the latter case, he writes, "the infallibility of Scripture becomes a cypher for the infallibility of the interpreter" (Caird, 424). As for the postmodernist option of endlessly polyvalent meanings, these are "Gadarene precipitations into the Dark Ages. . . . Language is in essence a medium of communication. If the hearer takes words in a sense not intended by the speaker, that is not an enlargement of meaning but a breakdown of communication. This claim applies to all uses of language, but it is especially apposite where a claim of revelation is involved" (Caird, 423).

The creativity, exegetical sanity and fresh writing of much of Caird's work makes this volume one of the most useful and suggestive in the field of NT theology. But methodologically his approach is closer to Guthrie (whom he dismisses) than he thinks, though frequently with slightly less conservative results: much of Caird's book, talk of the conference-table approach aside, is an exploration of selected themes as they are developed by the various writers of the NT canon. There is only sporadic reflection on how these themes relate to the OT. Moreover, for all its strengths Caird's approach proves less able than some other approaches to provide a portrait of the overall structure of thought of a major NT writer (e.g., Paul), precisely because of the vertical trenches that are cutting across the corpora.

7. Other Influences That Shape New Testament Theology.

Eight further influences can be seen to be shaping what is meant in some circles by NT theology.

1. Some scholars have not yet produced anything like a NT theology but have in their writings given a lot of thought to certain dimensions of it. One thinks, for example, of some of the work of J. D. G. Dunn, who argues that the fundamental christological unity in the NT is the conviction that the predeath Jesus is to be identified with the postresurrection Christ. Whereas this is decidedly more conservative than, say, Conzelmann, the thesis is surprisingly minimalistic. Other instances of embryonic NT theology include th work of N. T. Wright (1991, 1992) and of R. B. Hays (1989).

2. Countless volumes have been written on the theology of particular NT books or corpora or on major themes within them. Such treatments are to NT theology what NT theology is to biblical theology.

3. A smaller but nevertheless substantial number of books and essays explore a chosen theme across the NT or across the entire Christian canon and refer to themselves respectively as NT theology or as biblical theology (e.g., Moberly).

4. The rise of canon criticism in its two dominant forms cannot be excluded from the discussion. By this expression J. A. Sanders (1972, 1987, 1995) refers to the canonical process begun at the first recitation of oral tradition and continuing beyond closure to our own (and future) adaptations and interpretations developed in living communities. Sanders does not mean to devalue the authority of what was originally said or written, so far as it can be reconstructed, but to elevate the later appropriations. By contrast, for Childs (1992), who disavows the expression "canon criticism" (though it is frequently applied to his work), the final form of the text and thus the closure of the canon is critical: the challenge is to understand the texts as they have been handed down in final form by the church. Childs never abandons historical criticism and rarely steps outside the bounds of "mainstream" critical judgments, but their hermeneutical and theological value is relatively small.

At the risk of simplistic judgments, one can say that it is not clear how Sanders can avoid sliding into an open-ended form of postmodernism, despite his mild interest in the original utterance; this at a time in which a number of biblical theologians are displaying a rising interest in discovering some form of enduring or authoritative theological message in Scripture (Hasel 1994). Conversely, despite his many useful suggestions as to how the Bible can be read as one canonical book, it is not clear how Childs's leap of faith to accept the church's canonical judgments, divorced from Childs's historical-critical judgments, will prove more epistemologically enduring than Barth's theology of the Word. Theologically Childs reaches conclusions that are very close to those of, say, Stuhlmacher. But the latter arrives at his destination by means of historical-critical judgments that leave his thought world a unified whole, while the former reaches them by consciously refusing to make much of a tie between his theology and his history.

5. More broadly the rising pressures from postmodernism are generating readings of biblical text that are distanced from what the texts originally meant. The most rigorous postmodernists deny that the notion of what a text "originally meant" is coherent. Inevitably these new "biblical theologies" or NT theologies use the text to support some current agenda. Some forms (certainly not all) of liberation theology fall into this camp, as do some forms of feminist reading (on the latter see Fiorenza 1994). There is now a plethora of literature that celebrates whatever is novel in a reading, a literature that roundly denounces the very possibility of any "right" reading of a text.

6. Overlapping other developments (e.g., postmodern readings, Childs's form of canon criticism) but differentiable from them is the rising interest in narrative theology and related literary-critical readings of the NT and of the Bible. The results are extraordinarily variable. Although some scholars see these new tools as nothing more than an extension of the historical-critical method, itself the offspring of the Enlightenment, increasingly these tools are viewed rightly as the product of Romanticism, itself often in conflict with an Enlightenment view of the world. The results may often be seen as a branch of aesthetics: plot, implied author, characterization and the like are carefully laid out with no concern for historical claims in the text or with how the absence of such concerns may itself decisively shape one's understanding of the text (e.g., the choice of the nineteenth-century novel as a model to unpack the Fourth Gospel: Culpepper). Such works abound in insight at the level of details but substantially distort the whole.

7. Similarly, because meanings in language are inevitably tied to a social system, the current interest in the social structure or the social history that is presupposed in biblical books is sometimes useful in understanding the texts themselves. In the hands of some scholars, sociological analysis of past bodies is undertaken with a sovereign disregard for other branches of history and exegesis, usually with the aim of gaining biblical warrant for present fads in behavior. On the positive side one thinks (to choose a few at random) of the contributions to our understanding of the text of the NT and thus of NT theology by W. Meeks (1983), C. Hemer (1989) and M. Hengel (1991), whose work is less interested in imposing modern sociological categories on the NT documents than on delineating the social history behind those documents.

8. Especially in Britain and sometimes in Germany, "theology" can function as a generic term describing the study of anything to do with Christianity. In that framework NT theology may refer to collections of studies on the NT that have only accidental connection with NT theology in any sense that deals with the entire NT, any corpus within it or any theme running through it. For example, see the titles of books by I. H. Marshall (1990), J. Blank (1992) and W. Thüsing (1995).

8. Controlling or Defining Elements of New Testament Theology.

The controlling elements have been alluded to and occasionally evaluated in the historical recital, but they demand separate reflection.

Morgan's analysis of NT theology (ABD 6:473-83) turns on the interplay of three elements: the biblicist, the historical and the hermeneutical; Corley's (1994) on three lines: the purely historical, the existential and the salvation-historical. Others proffer somewhat different categories (e.g., Ladd, ISBE 1:498-509; Via, 369-88). Whatever the breakdown, none of the elements or lines or categories can be evaluated in isolation. One's conception of the discipline of NT theology and of its present state turns on what one makes of the peculiar interplay of the defining categories.

8.1. Theology. NT theology is above all theology: i.e., it is discourse about God. For Christians this means it is discourse about the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, about his character, nature, self-disclosure; about his acts of creation, providence and redemption; about his people, their origin, circumstances, salvation, destination. It is thus not to be reduced to the history of the Jews or the early history of Christians. NT theology is theology, not religion. It follows that the track worked out from Baur is profoundly mistaken not in this or that peculiar historical judgment but in its increasing collapse of the discipline into nothing but history.

But the interplay of theology with other elements must not be overlooked. Because this theology is our discourse about God (however much it is based on his self-disclosure), hermeneutical considerations must not be forgotten. To overlook them is not to escape them; it is to foster the illusion, characteristic of a great deal of modernity, that the latest opinion is the truly objective and culture-transcending one. Because this theology is grounded in God's revelation in history and because God's self-revelation in history "has often caught up elements from the religous [sic] milieu and incorporated them in Heilsgeschichte" (Ladd, ISBE 1:505), theology's relationship with history is exceedingly complex. It is not always antagonistic, nor is the experience of the people of God set antithetically to all others in every respect. Israel was not the only group that practiced circumcision, the church did not invent elders out of whole cloth and "house-tables" of duties were well known in the pagan world before Christianized forms were incorporated into the NT (see Household Codes; Household, Family). Thus theology cannot be abstracted from historical questions.

8.2. Supernaturalism and Revelation. In Morgan's view (ABD 6:474) the biblicist element in NT theology "is the tendency (more or less extreme) to attach greater weight to these writings than would be rational for non-Christians. It is necessary because Scripture is indispensable for knowing God in Jesus Christ, and that is central to Christianity. . . . But actually identifying Scripture with revelation is irrational biblicism."

Morgan is correct to insist that the biblicist element is necessary to NT theology. But if by this he means no more than that apart from the NT documents we have few other early sources regarding Jesus and the early church and that these are the earliest witnesses,* such that if Christianity is to survive at all we are necessarily forced to draw on them, he has conceded too little. The God of the Bible not only acts providentially in history but sometimes chooses to reveal himself openly in history, thus perpetually threatening all merely naturalistic readings of history. More importantly he is a talking God, and the very witnesses to which Morgan points insist that not only has this God talked with human beings in concrete historical situations in the past but that he has not left himself without verbal witness, choosing to use the words of mortals to convey something of himself. To fail to see that this is a recurring presupposition of the biblical writers is to assign too great a veto power to non-Christian perspectives.

It is true that an emphasis on supernaturalism without careful consideration of the other dimensions of Scripture can treat the Bible as a magic book and produce NT theology that is bizarre. It is true that focusing on revelation without perceiving that God has commonly disclosed himself in the "accidents" of history with all their "secondary causalities" may end up denying providence, hunting for a mysterious God-of-the-gaps. It is true that espousing revelatory authority without grasping that God's self-disclosure has commonly been through means, progressive in nature, and as often through institutions (temple*), rites (sacrificial system; see Sacrifice) and dynasties (the Davidic) as through words is to tumble into reductionism. It is true that the words of Scripture perform many functions in addition to conveying truth*: they bear witness to Christ, evoke worship,* call to repentance* and so forth, and these various speech-acts must not be overlooked. But it is never a responsible solution to meet one reductionism by another.

8.3. Canon. NT theology properly presupposes a NT canon. Many in the name of historical objectivity refuse any distinction between the canonical and the noncanonical (e.g., Wrede), and others (e.g. Morgan, ABD 6:481) argue that the notion of canon has no place in historical research and no place in demarcating books that are different in kind from other books (e.g., possessing some revelatory quality). For Morgan the notion of canon can be preserved only to mark out books that enjoy, for whatever historical reasons, a "special use" among Christians.

It is warranted to insist that the NT books are not different in every way from other books written about the same time. But to recognize a canon of books based purely on historical accident means that the discipline of NT theology improperly looks for any unity: at best it can describe the individual contributions of this accidental canon inductively and historically (where "historically" presupposes naturalism). But if the canonical books are bound up with the self-revealing God and are identified not with the totality of that revelation but as one crucial component of it, then the concern of many NT theologians not only to identify differences among the NT books but to work out what holds them together becomes a possible, even a praiseworthy, task. Because of the historical elements in NT theology, it is appropriate to make connections between the NT and the apostolic fathers. But that is not itself NT theology. R. B. Sloan (1994) is partly right to point out that a theological core helped to precipitate the books that came to make up what we call the NT canon and that this core can in large part be inferred by exegesis and historical analysis from those books themselves. But that reconstructed core must not be thought of as canon (a canon to which we have no agreed or direct access): that would be to confuse the means by which canonical distinctions were made with the canon itself.

The point to underline is that the note of authority that most biblical theologians want to recover, namely, the connection between NT theology and the NT documents, has to be found in the text itself. It cannot be found behind the text, in realities to which the text points or in parts of the text. It cannot be found in the theology that apparently precipitates the text, in the lowest common denominator of the assembled NT texts or in the communities to which the text bears witness.

In much the same way a tighter connection between text and reality is necessary to make epistemologically viable Childs's approach to canonical (including NT) theology. To some extent the later works of Childs depend on H. Frei (1974), who argues that the triumph of rationalism in the historical-critical method during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries abandoned reading the narratives of the Bible as narratives. These rationalists, discounting the supernatural, tried incessantly to make the meaning of the text turn on what happened (as the critics reconstructed it), which was then read back into the text in circular fashion and found there. Reacting against this, conservatives stressed the historicity of the biblical accounts, thus making meaning depend on the history while failing to return to a narrative conception of meaning.

To some extent this analysis is astute. But what it fails to address directly is the relationship between ostensibly historical narrative and the historicity of the ostensible events. If while insisting on the primacy of a narrative conception of meaning one perpetually fails to address that question, one is inviting a faith based on a story line, regardless of the relationship (if any) between that story line and extratextual reality. Neither Judaism nor Christianity is Buddhism: we are not invited to an atemporal system of thought whose authority turns on the credibility and aesthetics of an abstract philosophical system. We are instead invited to the personal-transcendent Creator-God who deigns to address his rebellious imagebearers in "the scandal of [historical] particularity." "Were the biblical narratives written or read as fiction, then God would turn from the lord of history into a creature of the imagination with the most disastrous results. . . . Hence the Bible's determination to sanctify and compel literal belief in the past" (Sternberg, 32). One way of reading Childs is to see that the leap of faith that Frei seem to be advocating at the level of individual narratives, Childs seems ready to take at the level of the entire canon.

If the notion of the NT canon briefly articulated here is extended to the entire canon, then by similar reasoning one is driven to the importance of trying to discover "a whole Bible theology" (eine gesamtbiblische Theologie). At issue is not simply whether the OT provides the most important matrix out of which to understand the NT but whether there is a continuous story line around which the canonical books are clustered and to which each book makes its own contribution. Granted the degree of specialization and the bias of naturalistic biblical scholarship against such a move, the task is daunting. Some envisage intensive cooperation between OT and NT specialists (e.g., Ebeling, 96); others anticipate that a specialist in one area might branch out into the canonical framework (as Childs 1992 and Seebass 1982 have done). But even those who do not feel confident to undertake the writing of canonically framed biblical theology may discipline themselves to careful exegesis that never loses sight of the canonical horizon. "A biblical-theology-orientated exegesis is the only way, in the field of Old Testament and New Testament studies, that a first step can be taken, and a first thrust ventured. Thus, we will not only ask for a 'theology of the Old Testament' or a 'Pauline theology,' but also, in these limited areas, keep the wider context constantly in sight" (Harrington, 373).

8.4. History. However much we eschew all reduction of NT theology to the study of the history of religions, a proper emphasis on history is essential to NT theology. "Biblical Theology is that branch of exegetical theology which deals with the process of the self-revelation of God deposited in the Bible" (Vos 1948, 5); or again, "Biblical Theology . . . is nothing else than the exhibition of the organic process of supernatural revelation in its historic continuity and multiformity" (Vos 1980, 15). The critical expressions are progress, process, and historical continuity and multiformity. Several factors need examination, in each case tied to other elements in this list.

First, one must insist that the historical narratives refer to objective (i.e., extratextual) reality. "If there is anything that distinguishes Christianity from all other religions and philosophies it is this: Christianity in the first instance is neither a set of doctrines nor a way of life, but a gospel; and a gospel means news about historical events, attested by reliable witnesses, and having at its centre a historical person" (Caird, 422, emphasis his). Adequately formulated NT theology will not permit a retreat to the study of texts as if they were naked art forms and nothing else.

Second, although the God of the Bible commonly works in the context of history that could reductionistically be explained in naturalistic terms, he sometimes enters this order with deeds and words that cannot possibly be explained in such terms. They may be explained away or discounted or relegated to the category of faith on the dubious ground that they are outside the historian's domain. But such a view of history is imprisoned by naturalistic presuppositions. We have returned to supernaturalism and revelation by another route. At no point in the discipline of NT theology are these issues more important than in assessing the place of Jesus the Christ (cf. Hasel 1978, 133-35). The resurrection of Jesus, for instance, cannot be historical according to the canons of a form of historical criticism committed to naturalism; it is difficult to see why historical criticism that is not committed to naturalism yet that is interested in determining what actually took place in the space/time continuum should not come out with a positive assessment (cf. Ladd, ISBE 1:507).

Third, although for the Christian salvation history is thus part of real history (i.e., it did take place), no one should think this represents all of what took place or that it is unbiased or uncommitted. We thus encroach on questions of hermeneutics and postmodernism (see 8.7 below).

Fourth, precisely because God's self-disclosure has taken place over time, NT theology, as part of the larger discipline of biblical theology, is committed to understanding the constitutive documents within that temporal framework. In this respect NT theology differs widely in emphasis from systematic theology, which tends to ask atemporal questions of the biblical texts, thereby eliciting atemporal answers.

8.5. Literature. However anchored in history, the NT documents, like the documents of the entire biblical canon, are cast in an extraordinary array of literary genres that demand both historical knowledge and literary sensitivity on the part of the interpreter. There are several entailments, which again lap onto the domains of other elements in this list.

First, NT theology is committed to inductive study of the texts. The texts are not first and foremost a quarry for abstract doctrines or the source of answers to questions they are at best only marginally interested in addressing but are texts that demand study on their own terms (cf. Schlier, 1-25; Harrington, 363-64). Thus at its best biblical theology has the potential for reforming dogmatics.

Second, NT theology will not on this ground treat the texts as literary forms to be studied on their own terms but, precisely because they are the sorts of texts they are, perceive the extratextual realities to which they point. This is powerfully elucidated by R. J. Bauckham in a review (BI 2 [1994] 246-50) of Childs (1992). In his laudable insistence on the theological integrity of the texts and in his focus on the historical reconstruction of the development of the text, Childs "seems to treat as insignificant for biblical theology any relationship of the theological witness of the texts to the concrete historical circumstances in which that witness originated" (Bauckham, 249). There is no attempt to illuminate Paul's thought by trying to understand what it was like to live in first-century Corinth, for instance. Real depth in a text is not found by most readers in a knowledge of the text's prehistory, any more than a reader will perceive Hamlet to be shallow until he or she knows about Shakespeare's sources, successive drafts and the ostensible contributions of later editors. Thus a careful reading of Gospels and Epistles will not endorse either a literary isolationism or a retreat to the most sterile forms of historical criticism. Depth will be found in a rich appreciation of their historical rootedness, their profound truth, their astonishing interconnections and their powerful vitality.

Third, such inductive and historical study cannot be set over against canonical considerations. "The work of New Testament theology is still not complete when the theology of the individual books or groups of writings is presented. The task is done only when we have succeeded in showing the unity of the different 'theologies'; and this underlying theological unity must be brought out as explicitly as possible" (Harrington, 365; see 9 below). Given the occasional nature and literary quality of so many of the biblical writings, there is plenty of scope for cautious integration and synthesis instead of the penchant for finding closed and mutually conflicting systems of thought in each of the various NT documents.

8.6. Existential Bite. Ideally NT theology will have existential bite, a profoundly religious dimension (a point emphasized by Terrien, though regrettably at the expense of other factors). Gabler's success in abstracting biblical theology from dogmatic theology fostered an unhealthy independence: biblical theology is soon also abstracted from reverence, from commitment, from faith. In the name of objectivity that was in fact too often infected by naturalism, anything corresponding to doxological study in NT theology was viewed with suspicion.

Given the spiritual vibrancy and fervor of the early witnesses, it would have been unthinkable for them to have pleaded their cause with dispassionate neutrality. So it is equally unthinkable that modern Christians would engage in NT theology with aloof detachment. This is what Schlatter (1905) dismissed as "atheistic method," writing elsewhere, "As soon as the historian sets aside or brackets the question of faith, he is making his concern with the New Testament and his presentation of it into a radical and total polemic against it" (in Morgan 1973, 152; see also the comments of Ladd, ISBE 1:509).

8.7. Hermeneutics and Postmodernism. If, from Gabler on, classic modernism was too confident of its ability to produce timeless and culture-transcending biblical theology, postmodernism is too confident of its ability to say nothing that is true beyond what the individual or interpretive community perceives to be true. Postmodernism has released us from the hubris of a pretended omniscience only to introduce us to the no less dogmatic hubris of epistemologically determined relativism. Thus in his analysis of NT theology Via (380-81) follows L. Montrose's chiasm as a proper poststructuralist orientation to history: historical study is reciprocally concerned with the historicity of texts and the textuality of history (Montrose, 20). The historicity of texts insists that all texts "are embedded in a specific social and cultural setting"; the textuality of history means that "we have no access to a lived, material past that is unmediated by textual traces and that these traces are subject to further textualization (figuration), when the historian uses them in constructing a narrative." Although Via affirms "the possibility of some degree of knowledge about the real past" (Via, 384), in fact historical knowledge "is knowledge acquired by making interpretive meaning" and "history is about the creation of meaning" (Via, 384).

Via's views are now commonplace among many NT scholars. The element of truth in such postmodern epistemology is that no finite and fallen mortal perceives anything from the vantage of omniscience. All of our knowledge is in certain respects an approximation. But the antithesis that is then often assumed—either one enjoys absolute knowledge or all our knowing is utterly relative—is unnecessary. Various models suggest that one can enjoy true knowledge without absolute knowledge (e.g., the fusion of horizons; the hermeneutical spiral; the asymptotic approach: see Carson 1995b; see Hermeneutics). Although no interpreter can entirely escape his or her own culture and heritage and flee into another that is removed by millennia and distanced by language barriers, by patient distanciation and careful reading and rereading it is possible to have authentic contact with another mind through what that mind has written. Most texts are not as autonomous as many postmoderns assume, and the meaning of texts does not reside primarily in the interpreter. Poststructuralists do not like reviewers to misread their books: apparently they are prepared to invest their own texts with authorial intent. Why cannot they accord the same courtesy to Paul or for that matter to God, if he is a God who discloses himself through verbal revelation?

Reflections on postmodernism thus take us back to both questions regarding the nature of history and the issues of supernaturalism and revelation, for epistemological questions take on a different hue if there is an omniscient "God who speaks" and has chosen to disclose some things. Granted our finiteness and fallenness, God himself cannot disclose everything to us. But it is difficult to see why he cannot disclose true things even if he cannot exhaustively disclose all their relationships.

The bearing of these reflections on the writing of NT theology is obvious. The leading intellectual movements of the day often foster the illusion that NT theology as a discipline that moves toward canonical synthesis is impossible and certainly disreputable. Those who configure the elements of NT theology and of biblical theology in a different way, lightly sketched here, must get on with the task.

9. Focal Issues.

To accept the configuration of NT theology just articulated does not mean that all the issues have been resolved. Among the most important challenges are three.

First, many of the fundamental questions pertaining to how NT theology should be constructed remain. The most pressing of these is how simultaneously to expound the unity of NT theology (and of the larger canon of which it is a part) while doing justice to the manifest diversity; or, to put it the other way, how simultaneously to trace the diversity and peculiar emphases and historical developments inherent in the various NT (and biblical) books while doing justice to their unifying thrusts. Methodologically it may be necessary to do something of both (Dunn 1977) or to invoke a creative device (Caird). But the tension will continue.

In addition to such large-scale strategic questions there are countless procedural issues. Those who write NT theology should ideally become intimately acquainted with the text of the NT, develop a profound grasp of the historical (including social and cultural) frameworks in which the NT books were written, maintain and sharpen the horizon provided by the entire canon, foster literary skills that permit varied genres to speak for themselves, spot literary devices and correctly interpret them, learn to fire imagination and creativity in a disciplined way and acknowledge and seek to accommodate and correct their own cultural and theological biases. All of these elements must be maintained in appropriate balance, nurtured by love for God and fear of God and growing hunger to serve his people.

Second, the issue of the unity and the diversity of the NT documents is not only a matter of presentation but of substance (cf. Hasel 1978, 140-70). The quest for the center of NT theology has three challenges (see DPL, Center). (1) What does "center" mean, and how might it be discovered? Does it refer to the most common theme, determined by statistical count, or to the controlling theme or to the fundamental theological presuppositions of the NT writers, so far as they may be discerned? Precisely how does one determine what a "controlling theme" is? Is pursuit of the "center" legitimate in literature that all sides admit is largely occasional? (2) How does one avoid mere generalities? One might say that the center of NT theology is Jesus Christ, but although at one level that is saying everything at another level it is saying almost nothing. Or one might say (with Dunn) that the fundamental tenet of NT christology is the belief that the predeath Jesus is to be identified with the postresurrection Jesus—but this too is anemic. (3) How shall one avoid the tendency to elevate one book or corpus of the NT and domesticate the rest, putting them on a leash held by the themes of the one, usually the book or corpus on which the biblical theologian has invested most scholarly energy?

There are no comprehensive answers. But we shall not go far astray if we adopt some such prescriptions as the following.

1. The pursuit of the center is chimerical. NT theology is so interwoven that one can move from any one topic to any other topic. We will make better progress by pursuing clusters of broadly common themes, which may not be common to all NT books. For example, we might examine how the temple functions and develops in the OT and, in terms of NT theology, observe how it is variously treated by the Synoptists (both Jesus' observance of temple ritual and his cleansing of the temple), note such features as the rending of the veil at the time of Jesus' death (Mt 27:51), study the peculiar Johannine emphases (including Jesus' self-identification with the temple destroyed—Jn 2), chart the tensions and changing role of the temple in Luke-Acts as the church increasingly becomes defined by Christ and not by any of the traditional Judaisms, examine the varied metaphorical uses of temple in Paul's writings, study the complex links between various aspects of temple ritual and Christ's work according to the epistle to the Hebrews and plot the development of the temple theme in the Apocalypse, which ultimately celebrates the absence of any temple in the new Jerusalem, because the Lord God and the Lamb* are its temple (Rev 21—22). In this last step there is no further need for mediation as the people of God are ushered into the unshielded glory* of the consummat-ing new heaven and new earth. Out of such material it is possible simultaneously to treat the contributions to this theme made by individual books, entirely within the framework of thought provided by those books, and to reflect on the significance of the pattern that develops to so glorious a consummation. This sort of endeavor can be undertaken with scores of themes.

2. Clearly it is essential to treat each theme or passage within the framework of each book or corpus before treating it as part of the larger NT horizon. The comprehensiveness of such work will go a long way toward warding off falling victim to an arbitrary canon within the canon.

3. In particular it is imperative that relatively light themes in a particular book or corpus be teased out first within the context of the major themes of that book or corpus. For example, studies on discipleship in Mark that fail to work out how that theme plugs into Mark's story line that takes Jesus to the cross* and beyond will prove fundamentally flawed. Not infrequently the points of connection from corpus to corpus must be delineated through these major themes. Thus although it seems wise to avoid committing oneself to one disputable center, inevitably the texts themselves will force a hierarchializing of unifying themes.

4. It is essential to avoid the dogmatic antitheses that have afflicted so much of the discipline, antitheses that spot distinctive treatments while dismissing both complementarity and sweeping development.

5. Careful literary and historical examination of certain biblical themes may foster renewed ability to see that the shape of the theme in a particular corpus (e.g., temple and related matters in Hebrews) is tightly tied to the social, ecclesiastical and theological situation the writer is addressing. Such examination therefore encourages insight not only into the way that separate NT treatments may be complementary but also into the way that such themes should properly function pastorally.

6. Time invested in the history of interpretation will not only enlarge the horizons of the interpreter but also tend to foster appropriate distanciation and thus a degree of proper objectivity in exegesis and creation of NT theology.

Third, the most difficult question by far is the relation of the NT to the OT and in particular the use of the OT in the NT. The most recent collection of essays on biblical theology (Pedersen) reflects how strongly most biblical theologians struggle to avoid saying that the NT interpretation of the OT is the only correct one. The reasons vary from interpreter to interpreter but are reducible to three: (1) some think the NT interpretation of the Old so implausible that it should not be given such status; (2) others are so committed to the canons of postmodernism that any claimed hegemony in the field of interpretation must be dismissed with an anathema; (3) others, moved not least by the Holocaust, refuse to be a party to what some label "cultural genocide" even while they recognize that the writers of the NT themselves betray little doubt about the rightness of their reading of the OT.

Those are the large issues that help to determine the outcome when the countless little issues weigh in: what constitutes a quotation and what an allusion; the text form of quotations; the form and function of introductory formulae; the appropriation techniques deployed by the NT writers and their relationship to Jewish middoth; the hermeneutical axioms that govern many NT citations of the OT; the many forms of typology; how various NT uses of the OT fit into larger questions regarding the relations between the covenants*; ethical uses of antecedent Scripture; the place of Torah in Matthew or Paul; the meaning of "fulfillment" language; the symbol-laden, imagination-firing associational uses common in the Apocalypse; the assumption of various societal givens (e.g., God/family/society); and much more of the same. Such considerations are the stuff of studies on the use of the OT in the NT, and clearly no responsible NT theology, insofar as it sees itself part of a broader biblical theology, can proceed very far without taking them into account.

See also CANON; CHRISTOLOGY; CHURCH; COVENANT, NEW COVENANT; DEATH OF CHRIST; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS; GOD; HERMENEUTICS; HOLY SPIRIT; KINGDOM OF GOD; OLD TESTAMENT; PASTORAL THEOLOGY; REVEAL, REVELATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Articles from Standard Reference Works: J. Barr, "Biblical Theology," IDBSup 104-11; M. Dibelius, "Biblische Theologie und biblische Religionsgeschichte," RGG^{2} 1:1091-94; G. E. Ladd, "Biblical Theology, History of," ISBE 1:498-509; O. Merk, TRE 6:455-77; R. Morgan, "Theology (NT)," ABD 6:473-83; H. G. Reventlow, "Theology (Biblical), History of," ABD 6:483-505; H. Riesenfeld, "Biblische Theologie und biblische Religionsgeschichte," RGG^{3} 1:1261-61; K. Stendahl, "Biblical Theology, Contemporary," IDB 1:418-32; A. Vögtle, "New Testament Theology," SM 4:216-20. Works Treating the Methods and Problems of NT Theology: H. R. Balz, Methodische Probleme der neutestamentlichen Christologie (Neukirchen: Neukirchener Verlag, 1967); K. Berger, Exegese und Philosophie (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1986); idem, Hermeneutik des Neuen Testaments (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Gerd Mohn, 1988); H. Boers, What Is New Testament Theology? The Rise of Criticism and the Problem of a Theology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); H. Braun, "The Problematics of a New Testament Theology," JTC 1 (1965) 169-83; idem, "The Sense of New Testament Christology," JTC 5 (1968) 89-127; G. Bray, Biblical Interpretation: Past & Present (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1996); R. Bultmann, "The Problem of a Theological Exegesis of the New Testament" in The Beginnings of Dialectical Theology, ed. J. M. Robinson (Richmond, VA: John Knox, 1968) 47-72; D. A. Carson, "Current Issues in Biblical Theology: A New Testament Perspective," BBR 5 (1995) 17-41; idem, The Gagging of God: Christianity Confronts Pluralism (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); B. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970); B. Corley, "Biblical Theology of the New Testament" in Foundations for Biblical Interpretation, ed. D. Dockery, K. A. Mathews and R. B. Sloan (Nashville: Broadman and Holman, 1994) 545-64; R. A. Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); G. Ebeling, "The Meaning of 'Biblical Theology'," JTS 6 (1955) 210-25; idem, Word and Faith (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1963); E. S. Fiorenza, In Memory of Her (London: SCM, 1983); H. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1974); E. Fuchs, Studies of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1964); K. Haacker et al., Biblische Theologie heute (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1977); W. J. Harrington, The Path of Biblical Theology (Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1973); G. F. Hasel, "The Nature of Biblical Theology: Recent Trends and Issues," AUSS 32 (1994) 203-15; idem, New Testament Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); C. J. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History, ed., C. H. Gempf (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1989); M. Hengel, The Pre-Christian Paul (Philadelphia: Trinity, 1991); E. Käsemann, ed., Das Neuen Testament als Kanon (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970); idem, "Das Problem des historischen Jesus," ZTK 51 (1954) 125-53; H.-J. Kraus, Die biblische Theologie: Ihre Geschichte und Problematik (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1970); E. E. Lemcio, "The Unifying Kerygma of the New Testament," JSNT 33 (1988) 3-17; idem, "The Unifying Kerygma of the New Testament," JSNT 38 (1990) 3-11; G. Maier, Biblische Hermeneutik (Wuppertal: R. Brockhaus, 1990); W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983); O. Merk, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments in ihrer Anfangszeit (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 1972); J. Moltmann, "Zur neutestamentlichen Theologie," EvT 51 (1991) 307-95; L. Montrose, "Professing the Renaissance: The Poetics and Politics of Culture" in The New Historicism, ed. H. A. Veeser (New York: Routledge, 1989) 15-36; R. Morgan, "The Historical Jesus and the Theology of the New Testament" in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament, ed. L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987) 187-206; idem, The Nature of New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1973); C. F. D. Moule, The Birth of the New Testament (3d ed.; New York: Harper & Row, 1982); M. Oeming, Gesamtbiblische Theologie der Gegenwart (2d ed.; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1987); J. Pelikan, ed., Twentieth Century Theology in the Making, 1: Themes of Biblical Theology (New York: Harper & Row, 1970); P. Pokorný, "The Problem of Biblical Theology," Horizons 15 (1993) 83-94; H. Räisänen, Beyond New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1990); H. G. Reventlow, Problems of Biblical Theology in the Twentieth Century (London: SCM, 1986); J. A. Sanders, "Scripture as Canon for Postmodern Times," BTB 25 (1995) 56-63; A. Schlatter, "Atheistische Methoden in der Theologie" [1905], in Zur Theologie des Neuen Testaments und zur Dogmatik, Kleine Schriften, ed. U. Luck (Munich: Christian Kaiser, 1969) 134-50; H. Schlier, The Relevance of the New Testament (New York: Herder & Herder, 1968); R. Schnackenburg, New Testament Theology Today (London: SCM, 1963); C. H. H. Scobie, "The Challenge of Biblical Theology," TynB 42 (1991) 3-30; idem,

"The Structure of Biblical Theology," TynB 42 (1991) 163-94; R. B. Sloan, "Canonical Theology of the New Testament" in Foundations for Biblical Interpretation, ed. D. Dockery, K. A. Mathews and R. B. Sloan (Nashville: Broadman and Holman, 1994) 565-95; J. Smart, The Past, Present, and Future of Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1979); M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1985); D. F. Strauss, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972 [1835]); G. Strecker, ed., Das Problem der Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1975); D. O. Via, "New Testament Theology: Historical Event, Literary Text, and the Locus of Revelation," PRS 19 (1992) 369-88; G. Vos, "The Idea of Biblical Theology as a Science and as a Theological Discipline" in Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of Geerhardus Vos, ed. R. E. Gaffin (Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1980) 3-24. Works on NT Theology (with Some Biblical Theology): M. Albertz, Botschaft des Neuen Testaments (Zollikon/Zürich: Evangelischer Verlag, 1946-57); J. Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961); F. C. Baur, Vorlesungen ber Neutestamentlichen Theologie (Leipzig: Fues's Verlag [L. W. Reisland], 1864); G. L. Bauer, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (2 vols.; Leipzig: Weygand, 1800-1802); idem, Theologie des Alten Testaments (Leipzig: Weygand, 1796); K. Berger, Theologiegeschichte des Urchristentums (Tübingen: Francke, 1994); J. Blank, Studien zur biblischen Theologie (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1992); J. Bonsirven, Theology of the New Testament (London: Burns and Oates, 1963 [1951]); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; London: SCM, 1952-55 [1948-53]); M.Burrows, An Outline of Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1946); G. B. Caird, New Testament Theology, ed. L. D. Hurst (Oxford: Clarendon, 1994); B. S. Childs, Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments: Theological Reflection on the Christian Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1969 [1968, 1987]); O. Cullmann, Salvation in History (New York: Harper & Row, 1967); J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); idem, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); E. S. Fiorenza, Jesus, Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet: Critical Issues in Feminist Christology (New York: Continuum, 1994); D. P. Fuller, The Unity of the Bible: Unfolding God's Plan for Humanity (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); J. P. Gabler, "Oratio de iusto discrimine theologiae biblicae et dogmaticae regundisque recte utriusque finibus" in Kleinere theologische Schriften, ed. T. A. Gabler and J. G. Gabler (2 vols.; Ulm: Verlag des Stettinischen Buchhandlung, 1831) 2:179-98 [available in English in J. Sandys-Wunsch and L. Eldredge, "J. P. Gabler and the Distinction Between Biblical and Dogmatic Theology: Translation, Commentary and Discussion of His Originality," SJT 33 (1980) 133-58]; H. Gese, Essays on Biblical Theology (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1981); J. Gnilka, Neutestamentliche Theologie: Ein Überblick (Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 1989); idem, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Freiburg: Herder, 1994); L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981-82 [1975-76]); F. C. Grant, An Introduction to New Testament Thought (New York: Abingdon, 1950); D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1981); J. C. K. von Hofmann, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Nördlingen: Beck, 1886); H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der neutestamentlichen Theologie (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1897, 1911); H. Hübner, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1990-95); A. M. Hunter, Introducing New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1957); J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Scribner's, 1971 [1971]); R. E. Knudsen, Theology in the New Testament: A Basis for Christian Faith (Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1964); W. G. Kümmel, The Theology of the New Testament According to Its Major Witnesses (London: SCM, 1974 [1969]); O. Küss, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments: Eine Einführung (Regensburg: Pustet, 1936); G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974 [rev. ed. 1993]); C. R. Lehman, Biblical Theology, 2: New Testament (Scottdale, PA: Herald, 1974); A. Lemonnyer, La Théologie du Nouveau Testament (Paris: Bloud & Gay, 1928; ET 1930); E. Lohse, Grundriss der neutestamentlichen Theologie (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1974); I. H. Marshall, Jesus the Savior: Studies in New Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990); M. Meinertz, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (2 vols.; Bonn: P. Hanstein, 1950); R. W. L. Moberly, From Eden to Golgotha: Essays in Biblical Theology (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); L. Morris, New Testament Theology (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1986); S. Neill, Jesus Through Many Eyes: Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); S. Pedersen, ed., New Directions in Biblical Theology (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); A. Richardson, An Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1958); C. C. Ryrie, Biblical Theology of the New Testament (Chicago: Moody, 1959); J. A. Sanders, From Sacred Story to Sacred Text (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1987); idem, Torah and Canon (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); K. H. Schelkle, Theology of the New Testament (4 vols.; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1971-78 [1968-76]); A. Schlatter, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments (2 vols.; Stuttgart: Verlag der Vereinsbuchhandlung, 1909, 1910 [ET of the first volume of the 2d ed., 1923, forthcoming from Baker]); W. Schmithals, Theologiegeschichte des Urchristentums (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1994); R. Schnackenburg, The Moral Teaching of the New Testament (London: Burns and Oates, 1965 [1954, 1962]); E. Schweizer, Theologische Einleitung in das Neuen Testament (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989 [ET 1991]); H. Seebass, Der Gott der ganzen Bibel: Biblische Theologie zur Orientierung im Glauben (Freiburg: Herder, 1982); F. Stagg, New Testament Theology (Nashville: Broadman, 1962); E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1955 [1941]); G. B. Stevens, The Theology of the New Testament (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1901, 1906); P. Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments. 1: Grundlegung: Von Jesus zu Paulus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992); idem, "The Law as a Topic of Biblical Theology," in Reconciliation, Law and Righteousness (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 110-33; idem, Vom Verstehen des Neuen Testaments (2d ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1986); S. Terrien, The Elusive Presence: The Heart of Biblical Theology (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978); W. Thüsing, Die neutestamentlichen Theologien und Jesus Christus, Band 1: Kriterien auf Grund der Rückfrage nach Jesus und des Glaubens an seine Auferweckung (Düsseldorf: Patmos, 1981); idem, Studien zur neutestamentlichen Theologie (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1995); G. Vos, Biblical Theology: Old and New Testaments (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1948); B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1882-83 [1868, 1903]); W. M. L. de Wette, Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmatik in ihrer historischen Entwicklung dargestellt. Erster Teil. Die biblische Dogmatik, enthaltend Biblische Dogmatik Alten und Neuen Testaments. Oder kritischer Darstellung der Religionslehre des Hebraismus, des Judenthums, und Urchristentums (3d ed.; Berlin: G. Reimer, 1831 [1st ed. 1813]); W. Wrede, Über Aufgabe und Methode der sogenannte neutestamentliche Theologie (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1897) [trans. into English by R. Morgan as "The Task and Methods of 'New Testament Theology'" in The Nature of New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1973) 68-116]; N. T. Wright, The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1991); idem, The New Testament and the People of God (London: SPCK, 1992); G. T. Zachariae, Biblische Theologie, oder Untersuchung des biblischen Grundes der dolfvornehmsten theologischen Lehren (5 vols.; Tübingen: Frank & Schramm, 1771-86); T. Zahn, Grundriss der neutestamentlichen Theologie (Leipzig: A. Deichertische Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1928).

D. A. Carson

NOAH. See ANCESTORS.

NONCANONICAL WRITINGS, CITATIONS IN THE GENERAL EPISTLES

The General Epistles—James,* 1 Peter* and Jude* in particular—reflect a conspicuous debt to Jewish exegetical tradition. In their use of both the Hebrew Scriptures and noncanonical tradition material, they mirror a Jewish religiocultural matrix by which their message as well as mode of literary expression are shaped.

The arguments set forth in James, 1 Peter and Jude, for example, betray the hand of a skilled haggadist, exercised in the application of Jewish midrash for didactic purposes, not unlike what one finds in rabbinic literature. Jude and 2 Peter contain instances of prophetic typology that are applied to the Christian community for the purpose of condemning the apostate and exhorting the faithful. James unfolds as a collection of loosely knit paraenetic sayings cast in the form of a diatribe. Both Jude and 2 Peter offer a targumic assessment of OT characters while simultaneously making use of pagan proverbs or legends that underscore the reality of divine truth.* In Jude and 1 Peter we encounter christologized allusions to apocalyptic* writings of sectarian Judaism.* And 1 John in its theological dualism shows conceptual resemblance to the literature of Qumran.*

The significance of noncanonical sources for biblical exegesis lies in their ability to clarify theological concepts, inform us of Jewish religious history, elucidate Jewish attitudes toward the Scriptures and illuminate the first-century Jewish-Christian context of which the General Epistles are a part.

1. Jewish Hermeneutical Tendencies and the General Epistles
2. Jewish Exegetical Practice in the General Epistles

1. Jewish Hermeneutical Tendencies and the General Epistles.

The General Epistles present the reader with a remarkably clear window through which to observe the scope and variety of first-century Jewish-Christian hermeneutics. To observe exegetical method is to gain understanding into the religiocultural milieu from whence it derives. While biblical scholarship in the main has categorized first-century Jewish hermeneutical practice according to three broad types—literalist (found in rabbinic literature), allegorical (as practiced by Philo*) and midrashic (as practiced both by mainstream and sectarian Judaism)—it is the latter, haggadic midrash, that is of primary interest in our consideration of the General Epistles.

The volumes by H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck have long been the primary source for observing parallels between rabbinic literature and the NT. While midrash (from the Hebrew verb dāraš "to search out," "to seek") has historically and generically designated rabbinic commentary on the OT Scriptures, it is also understood in the sense of a procedure or hermeneutical activity. Accordingly, midrashic interpretations of the Bible have as their goal the contemporary application of the Scriptures for later generations. Jewish midrash can either be halakic (i.e., prescriptive) or haggadic (i.e., moralistic and historical) in its teaching emphasis. The latter category occurs with relative frequency in the General Epistles, where in the form of moral typology it serves to interpret or reinterpret the Scriptures according to present pastoral need.

2. Jewish Exegetical Practice in the General Epistles.

2.1. James. NT scholarship has largely held James to be an expression of Palestinian Jewish-Christian thought, in spite of evidences of Hellenistic rhetorical influence in the document and its use of the Septuagint in citing the OT. James draws from a wide assortment of Jewish tradition material—the OT legal corpus (Ex 20; Lev 19; Deut 5), Jesus' sayings and wisdom literature (Prov, Sir, Wis).

Among the General Epistles and aside from Jude, James cites OT characters most frequently. Following the letter's greeting, Abraham* and Rahab (Jas 2), Job, the prophets* and Elijah (Jas 5) are cited as models of validating faith* and patience in the face of adversity. What sets these figures apart, however, is the manner in which the author employs them. As paradigms they frequently emit a greater correspondence to current Jewish notions of righteousness* than to the OT narratives themselves. While the meaning, derived from the letter's broader thematic flow, is clear, the exegetical process is not always readily apparent to the reader.

James 1:12-15 is illustrative, containing striking parallels from Jewish wisdom tradition—notably the wisdom of Sirach (second century B.C.). In Sirach 15:11-20 the writer argues that in the context of testing God* does not cause sin*; rather, sin proceeds from human desire. God is depicted as omniscient, wise, all-powerful; he watches those who fear him. Humans, by contrast, will face temptation; indeed, testing is inevitable. The faithful are exhorted in Sirach to prepare their souls for testing (Sir 2:1), in much the same way that James admonishes his audience (Jas 1:2, 12). Yet one can choose to obey and resist sin. Observing the law* and keeping the commandments* while one endures trial are praised in Sirach.

James 1:22-25 also suggests reliance on extracanonical tradition material. The "mirror of remembrance" as a teaching device appears to have achieved fairly wide currency both in Jewish and Hellenistic circles. For both Plutarch and Epictetus (late first century) self-examination was understood to be the moral equivalent of gazing into a mirror. In The Education of Children Plutarch applies the mirror imagery in the context of moral education. Significantly this includes control of the tongue (cf. Jas 1:26; 3:1-12) and control of one's anger (cf. Jas 1:19-20). Wisdom literature also incorporates this theme. The mirror is a "reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of divine working" (Wis 7:26). Such wisdom* cannot be produced, however; it is granted by God (Wis 8:19-21; cf. Jas 1:17; 3:13). Moreover, those who live by this wisdom are "friends of God" (Wis 7:27; cf. Jas 4:4).

Contemporary midrashic parallels are particularly helpful in probing James 2:14-26. While James 2:21-23 shows notable similarity to Genesis 22 and 15:6, less obvious is the connection between pistis and erga, a connection the author seems to presuppose. In rabbinic literature (e.g., m. Soṭa 5:5; m. 'Abot 5:19; 6:10) Job and Abraham are paradigms for the "God-fearing" and "God-loving" individual. Other Jewish sources confirm this portrait of Abraham. In Philo, for example, the idea of Abraham's love* for God is developed more extensively (T. Abr. 10, 32, 167). In Testament of Abraham [A] 17:7 the patriarch is noted both for his righteous deeds and for the greatness of his love toward God. In 1 Maccabees 2:52 Abraham is found faithful in trial. Contemporary Jews viewed Abraham as righteous based on his works (Jub. 17:16; 18:11, 16), the culmination of which was his willingness to offer Isaac (4 Macc 16:20; Jub. 17:17; 19:8; m. Ta'an. 2:4,5; m. 'Abot 5:6; see Faith and Works).

It is noteworthy that allusion to Rahab immediately follows James's use of Abraham as a model. In Jewish lore both Abraham and Rahab are paradigms of hospitality* (e.g., T. Abr. [A] 17:7; Gen. Rab. 49:4; 56:5; t. Soṭa 10a-b); both express genuine faith through deeds. While the idea of faith being validated by works is implicit in the OT, in later Jewish tradition this attestation is magnified (e.g., Midr. Ruth 2:126). James's argument is that true faith will evidence itself.

James 5:17-18, an allusion to the prophet Elijah, finds a close parallel in the pseudepigraphic 4 Ezra 7:39 (109) and Lives of the Prophets 21:5. The context of 4 Ezra is especially illuminating. The writer lists Israel's mighty who had prayed with authority*—Abraham for Sodom, Moses* for the fathers in the wilderness, Joshua for Israel in the days of Achan, David for the plague, Solomon in the sanctuary and Elijah for rain. The lesson is stated flatly: "If therefore the righteous have prayed for the ungodly now, when corruption has increased and unrighteousness has multiplied, why will it not be so then as well?" (4 Ezra 7:45 [115]). In contrast to contemporary Jewish notions of Elijah, which tended to stress the supernatural (e.g., m. Soṭa 9:15; m. Šeqal. 2:5; cf. Mal 4:5-6; Mt 17:3-4; Mk 9:4, 5; Lk 9:30; Jn 1:21), James attempts to humanize the prophet. His method of doing so is to depict him as an intercessor, a role that accords both with biblical and extrabiblical tradition (see also y. Sanh. 10; b. Sanh. 113; m. Ta'an. 2:4).

Paraenetic sayings on patience in trial both open (Jas 1:2-18) and conclude (Jas 5:7-12) the epistle, thus forming something of an inclusio. As a model of patience in suffering* James cites the prophets and Job (Jas 5:10-11). The OT depicts Job foremost as upright before the Lord; his patience is less clear. In extracanonical Jewish tradition, however, the patience of Job is explicit and well-developed, achieving proverbial status (e.g., T. Job 4:5-6; 27:3-10; 39:11-13; m. 'Ed. 2:10). Whether written or oral this tradition is apparently familiar to James's readers.

Other traces of Jewish tradition material in the letter appear in James 1:1 (reference to those "serving" God in the "diaspora," as in 2 Macc 1:27); James 1:3-4 (emphasizing the virtue of endurance, e.g., 4 Macc 1:11); James 1:5 (God granting wisdom liberally and not upbraiding as a fool upbraids, Sir 18:18; 20:15; 41:22); James 1:12 (a crown of glory* promised to those who persevere, 2 Apoc. Bar. 15:8; Apoc. Elijah 1:8); James 1:8 (the double-minded person over against the perfect, undivided heart, as in Sir 2:12-14; T. Benj. 6:5; Tg. Neof. Gen 22:14; Tg. Neof. Ex 19:8); James 1:19 (the admonition to be quick to hear, slow to speak and slow to become angry, Sir 5:13 and m. 'Abot 5:12); James 2:1-7 (rabbinic texts such as Deut. Rab. 5:6 and b. Šebu. 31a making reference to the dichotomy between rich and poor in judicial proceedings); James 2:10 (contradicting the law* in small or in great measure, e.g., 4 Macc 5:20); James 3:2, 6, 10 (the person not sinning with the mouth as blessed, Sir 5:13 and 14:1); James 3:13-17 (the true wisdom, as described in Sir 19:18-22); James 3:13—4:10 (paraenesis on envy, strife and murder that resembles allusions to "the envious eye" in 1 Macc 8:16 and Tob 4:4, 16, and envy and murder in T. Sim. 2:6-14); James 4:4-6 (a probable midrash on Noah, illustrated in Sir 15:11-20); James 5:10 (the prophets being persecuted, e.g., in T. Levi 16:2 and Asc. Isa. 1—5); James 5:16 (confession of sin and pardon in Jewish liturgy, resembling texts such as m. Sanh.

6:2 and Tg. Ps.-J. Ex 33:7).

2.2. 1 Peter. In our consideration of the literary strategy at work in 1 Peter, it becomes self-evident that a significant part of this strategy entails the author's lavish use of OT material. Less apparent, however, is the extent to which noncanonical tradition-material is utilized. Several examples of the use of tradition material deserve comment.

One trace of noncanonical allusion occurs in 1 Peter 1:12, where the author observes parenthetically that the angels* yearn to look into the things of salvation* brought from heaven* through Christ. No explanation of or direct parallel to this phenomenon is to be found in the OT. A Jewish apocalyptic reference to angelic activity and a targumic expansion on Jacob's ladder, however, are suggestive. In the text of 1 Enoch 9:1, the angels are said to observe carefully from the heavens the events on earth. The verb that describes the angels' activity, parakyptein, is the same verb used in 1 Peter 1:12. In Targum Neofiti Genesis 28:12 one finds a description of the angels ascending and descending in order to observe Jacob. According to the text they "earnestly desired" to see this righteous man. It is possible that in his allusion to the angelic aspect of divine mystery* Peter is making use of imagery and language associated with a midrashic tradition.

One instance of the use of tradition material in 1 Peter to which much literature is devoted is 1 Peter 2:4-17, a midrash employing a christologized metaphor of a stone.* 1 Peter 2:4-10 would appear to combine OT references with contemporary Jewish notions of God's people. While a clear link to the metaphor in Isaiah 28:16 and Psalm 118:22 is evident, its reinterpretation as it is applied to the community bears some resemblance to Qumran exegesis. In 1QS 8:7 the community is depicted as a stone. In the same context it is also described as a holy house* (1QS 8:5; see also 1QS 5:5-6; 1QH 6:25-26). The reinterpretation, moreover, is reminiscent of Isaiah 44:28, which correlates Israel's return with the building of the temple.* Whereas in the OT the stone is the king, in later Jewish tradition it is the actual people of God. Christologization of the image in 1 Peter is in keeping with this theological development.

After employing the metaphor of the stone, the writer summarizes in 1 Peter 2:9 by combining several images that are reminiscent of both OT paschal narratives as well as Qumran terminology. A priesthood,* a holy nation, the chosen of God and the dualism of darkness and light* find parallels in both canonical and noncanonical Jewish texts. (On light and darkness see 1 John.)

The readers are subsequently admonished to behavior that is honorable in the sight of surrounding pagan culture (1 Pet 2:11-12). The result is that though they may be maligned as "evildoers," others will "see your honorable deeds and glorify God on the day of visitation." The linkage of glorifying God and commendation through good deeds occurs with relative frequency in Jewish tradition. As evidenced by 1QH 6:8-12, the covenanters of Qumran understand the effects of holiness* as leading to the revelation* of God's mighty acts and the Gentiles seeing God's glory (see also 1QH 10:17-21). The link between good works, honor and glorifying God (cf. Mt 5:16) is also found in the pseudepigraphal Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (second century B.C.): "If you achieve good, my children, men and angels will bless you, and God will be glorified through you among the Gentiles" (T. Naph. 8:4).

1 Peter 3:6, part of a Petrine paraenesis on Christian ethics* in a secular world, would appear to be a reference to Genesis 18. However, in the OT narrative Sarah's obedience* to Abraham is not the principal theme. The text of 1 Peter reads: "Thus Sarah obeyed Abraham and called him lord." While this accent is absent from Genesis, it appears with great frequency in the Testament of Abraham (first century). In this pseudepigraphal work Sarah's submissiveness is a virtual subtheme, illustrated by the abundant use of the title "my lord Abraham" (e.g., T. Abr. [A] 5:12; 6:2, 5, 8; 15:4). Peter is less concerned to recount the Genesis narrative than he is intent on identifying a point of correspondence between Sarah and Christian women.* From an exegetical standpoint, more important than citing the OT is the establishment of a moral paradigm for the sake of Christian ethics.

In one of the more enigmatic texts of the NT, 1 Peter 3:18-20, the writer in a rather cryptic way expands his discussion of suffering and baptism.* Christ also suffered, his readers are reminded; thereby a point of identification is made. Yet this suffering and subsequent rising entailed more than meets the eye. Part of this great redemptive act included "proclamation to the spirits in prison who in former times did not obey."

The preaching to the spirits is best explained in light of the prepositional phrase en phylakē (in prison). In the genre of apocalyptic literature, prison is not the location of human souls but of punishment, as evidenced by the language of the NT Apocalypse (e.g., Rev 18:2; 20:7; see Revelation, Book of). In Jewish apocalyptic literature "imprisoned spirits" figure quite prominently. 1 Enoch is exemplary and casts helpful light on the cryptic allusion found in 1 Peter. Christ's descent is not unlike that depicted in Enoch's commission to go and preach to the fallen angels (1 Enoch 12). Given the attention to fallen angels in first-century apocalyptic, Peter may well be portraying Christ as the end-time Enoch who proclaims judgment* on the fallen spirits, having disarmed the principalities and powers and triumphed over them (cf. Col 2:15). In 1 Peter 3 angelic typology serves an important pastoral function. The readers pass from Christ's sufferings to Christ's triumph with the reminder that just as the fallen angels are reserved for judgment, those who persecute Christians and refuse to believe also "will give account to him who will judge the living and the dead" (1 Pet 4:4).

A final cluster of exhortations, relating to oversight of the flock of God (1 Pet 5:1-11), finds a parallel in the Qumran literature. In the community's Manual of Discipline leaders are warned not to be domineering ("The sons of Aaron should only rule in justice and with appropriate authority") and to avoid reaching decisions independently that refract detrimentally on others (1QS 9:7). Peter's admonition is strikingly similar: the elders are to shepherd God's flock not out of compulsion but willingly before God. Moreover, they are not to lord it over the flock but serve as typoi or examples (1 Pet 5:2-3). In so doing they will receive a crown of great glory that will never fade (5:4; cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 15:8).

2.3. Jude and 2 Peter. The epistle of Jude may be assumed to mirror a distinctly Jewish-Christian audience. The abundant use of triplets, apocalyptic imagery and midrashic typology that borrows heavily from Jewish tradition material are together indicative of a markedly Jewish-Christian social matrix. 2 Peter, by contrast, strongly suggests an audience that finds itself in a pagan Gentile* environment. The writer, accordingly, appropriates the language of philosophical mysticism, a catalog of Stoic virtues, a reference to Tartarus, two common secular proverbs and flood-fire typology directed against moral relativists.

Lists of historical paradigms depicting hardheartedness appear in intertestamental literature with relative frequency. Among the most commonly cited in these lists are apostate Israel, Sodomites, the fallen angels, Assyria, the giants, the generation of the flood, Korah and the Canaanites. Such lists are employed as a teaching device in the Apocrypha, in the pseudepigrapha and in rabbinic literature (e.g., 3 Macc 3:7; Sir 16:5-15; 1 Enoch 1—36, T. Naph. 2:8—4:3; Jub. 20:2-7; CD 2.14—3.12; m. Sanh. 10:3). Both Jude and 2 Peter enlist the use of paradigms for typological purposes.

In order to magnify the irrationality of his opponents, Jude casts the apostates as polar opposites of Michael the archangel, who though possessing greater authority remains within his bounds. The tradition according to which the conflict between Michael and the devil reputedly derives, the Assumption of Moses, is apocryphal in origin, perhaps circulating in oral form during the first century and having numerous parallels in Qumran literature. The Assumption, which admits of no apparent connection to Deuteronomy 34 but incorporates imagery from Zechariah 3, is known to us through several subapostolic sources, initially through Origen (De Princ. 3.2.1).

Jude's description of the judgment of the ungodly includes a near-verbatim citation of 1 Enoch 1:9, a pseudepigraphal expansion of theophanic statements that occur with frequency throughout the OT, most notably Deuteronomy 33. In Jude, as in 1 Enoch, theophany and judgment merge in response to the apostate. The fate of the wicked is certain. Further borrowing of Jewish apocalyptic imagery appears in the same contextual flow—Jude 12-13 (cf. 1 Enoch 67:5-7; 80:2-8)—where Jude's opponents are cast as "wandering stars."

Because Jude's citation of 1 Enoch is direct and because he states that Enoch "prophesied," commentators assume that Jude regarded Enochic literature as authoritative and on the level of the Hebrew Scriptures. However, if Jude's literary strategy may have called for exploiting a work that was highly esteemed not so much by himself as by his audience, it is plausible that in this case Enoch can be said to "prophesy" in much the same way as a Cretan poet is said to be a "prophet" by the apostle Paul (Tit 1:12). Thus Jude's citation of 1 Enoch may derive less from his personal elevation of Enochic literature than from that of his readers.

Lacking the distinctly Palestinian flavor that is manifest in Jude, 2 Peter incorporates extrabiblical tradition material with a pagan social context in view. To the list of characteristic Stoic virtues such as moral excellence, knowledge,* endurance and self-control are added the Christian virtues of faith, brotherly love and agape (2 Pet 1:5-7). The present situation, in which the writer seeks to counter a faith weak in ethical fiber, calls for a rhetorical response that is immediately perceptible. Furthermore, the general structure of 2 Peter, with its use of paraenesis (2 Pet 1), moral typology (2 Pet 2) and caricature of the moral skeptic (2 Pet 3), suggests a pervasively pagan social location in which unrestricted human autonomy stands in denial of moral accountability.

The profile of apostasy* in 2 Peter 2 shows the greatest degree of literary relationship to Jude. Whereas the historical paradigms in the latter underscore irrevocable judgment, in the former they highlight both certain judgment on evildoers as well as deliverance of a righteous remnant. That the situation behind 2 Peter calls for a unique response is shown by the presence of Noah and Lot as midrashic types of God's merciful deliverance (see Mercy). Contrary to the emphasis of most commentaries, Lot is not a "model of righteous suffering." He is "righteous" not by personal example but by comparison; Lot illustrates the mercy of God. In Wisdom 10:4-10, significantly, Lot appears alongside Noah, Abraham, Jacob and Joseph as a "virtuous" man.

Taken together the paradigms in 2 Peter are reminiscent of one notable OT character—Balaam, "who loved the wages of evil" (2 Pet 2:15). Balaam is notorious in standardized Jewish tradition. Allusions to this OT character are evidence of a Jewish mindset fascinated with the prophet who led Israel into idolatry* (Philo Vit. Mos. 1.295-99; Josephus Ant. 4.6.6; cf. Num 31:16) and thus had no place in the life to come (m. Sanh. 10:2-4). In rabbinic literature Balaam is the antithesis of Abraham (e.g., m. 'Abot 5:19). Curiously absent from 2 Peter are Cain and Korah as paradigms (cf. t. Soṭa 4:9, where Cain, Balaam and Korah appear together in a list), the former serving as "type and teacher" of ungodliness in Jewish tradition (Philo Poster. C. 38), the latter being arguably the most arresting case of insubordination in the OT in that he opposed Moses, the man who talked with God. With Balaam as their spiritual mentor, the apostate are vividly depicted by means of a double metaphor—a dog returning to its vomit and a pig returning to the mud from whence it was washed. While the metaphor of the dog finds a parallel in the book of Proverbs (Prov 26:11), the metaphor of the pig finds its analogue in the Egyptian Story of Ahiqar: "My son, you were to me like a pig which had been in a hot bath. . . . And when it was out and saw a filthy pool went down and wallowed in it" (APOT 2:772).

2.4. 1 John. The form of expression in 1 John, both in style and substance, is strikingly similar to that of Qumran literature. Principal among the parallels to be noted is a theological dualism—e.g., sons or children (see Sonship, Children) of light and truth versus sons or children of darkness, deceit and the devil (see Satan); spirits* of truth and light versus spirits of deceit and darkness; angels of truth versus angels of darkness (1 Jn 3:10, 13, 24, 25; 4:5, 6, 17; 3:18-21, 24; 5:10; cf. 1QS 1:9, 10; 2:2, 5).

Several thematic links are also to be detected: angels, spirits and the devil (1 Jn 3:8-10; 4:1-6; cf. 1QS 3:13-14, 20-22; 5:20-21, 24; 9:14); love, community and koinōnia (1 Jn 1:3-7; 2:9-11; 3:10; 4:7-12; cf. 1QS 1:1, 12, 16; 2:22; 3:12; 5:1; 8:1, 5); knowledge (in 1 Jn, oida is used eleven times and ginōskō fourteen times; cf. 1QS 4:26; 1QH 12:11; 13:18, 19; 14:12, 13, 25; 16:2-7); cleansing from and confession of sin and lies (1 Jn 1:6-10; 2:13; cf. 1QS 1:23-26; 4:20-22; 11:9-10; 1QH 1:21-26; 3:23-25; 17:18-19); and hatred of the world (1 Jn 3:13; cf. 1QH 2:12-17, 23-25; 3:6-8; 4:7-27; 5:1-32).

From this comparison 1 John is not to be regarded as a theological development of Qumran theology, despite the many similarities. Rather, the parallels are useful insofar as they help elucidate the first-century Palestinian and Jewish mindset. We are once more reminded that the writers of the NT did not express themselves in a cultural vacuum but were in conversation with contemporary religious ideas and language.

See also JAMES; JUDE; OLD TESTAMENT IN GENERAL EPISTLES; 1 PETER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bauckham, "James, 1 and 2 Peter, Jude" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture. Essays in Honour of B. Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 303-17; R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church and Its Background in Early Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); J. D. Charles, Literary Strategy in the Epistle of Jude (Scranton, PA: University of Scranton; London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1993); idem, "The Use of Tradition-Material in the Epistle of Jude," BBR 4 (1994) 1-14; J. H. Charlesworth, The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha and the New Testament (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985); A. Chester and R. P. Martin, The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter and Jude (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); P. Davids, "Tradition and Citation in the Epistle of James" in Scripture, Tradition and Interpretation, ed. W. W. Gasque and W. S. LaSor (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 113-26; E. E. Ellis, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity (WUNT 18; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1978); C. A. Evans, Noncanonical Writings and New Testament Interpretation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1992); J. T. Forestell, Targumic Traditions and the New Testament: An Annotated Bibliography with a New Testament Index (SBLAS 4; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1979); M. Gertner, "Midrashim in the New Testament," JSS 7 (1962) 267-92; T. A. Hoffman, "1 John and the Qumran Scrolls," BTB 8 (1978) 117-25; R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); M. McNamara, Targum and Testament: Aramaic Paraphrases of the Hebrew Bible: A Light on the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); J. H. Neyrey, "The Form and Background of the Polemic in 2 Peter," JBL 99 (1980) 407-31; W. L. Schutter, Hermeneutic and Composition in 1 Peter (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1989); H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch (4 vols.; Munich: Beck, 1922-28). J. D. Charles

O

OBEDIENCE AND LAWLESSNESS

The particular words obedience (hypakōē) and lawlessness (anomia) do not occur much in the General Epistles and Revelation (see Revelation, Book of). In fact the noun obedience is found only in 1 Peter* (1 Pet 1:2, 14, 22), and the verb is restricted to Hebrews 5:9; 11:8 and 1 Peter 3:6. The word lawlessness and its cognates appears only in Hebrews 1:9; 10:17; 2 Peter 2:8 and 1 John 3:4. From this evidence we could easily come to the mistaken conclusion that the concepts of obedience and lawlessness are of little significance in our literature. Drawing such an inference highlights the danger of relying upon word studies to establish the theology of biblical writers, for a careful examination of the contents of the General Epistles and Revelation reveals that the concepts of obedience and lawlessness are central to the thinking of virtually every piece of literature in this corpus. Since the necessity of obedience is woven so consistently throughout the literature, we can only touch upon the theme in a cursory way here.

1. Hebrews
2. James
3. 1 Peter
4. 2 Peter and Jude
5. 1 John
6. Revelation
7. Apostolic Fathers

1. Hebrews.

The letter to the Hebrews* is best characterized as an epistolary exhortation (Heb 13:22) in which the author warns his readers against forsaking the new covenant* established through Jesus Christ by returning to the Jewish cult. The letter is punctuated by exhortations (Heb 2:1-4; 3:7—4:11; 5:11—6:8; 10:26-39; 12:25-29) that warn the readers against the danger of apostasy.* Warnings permeate the letter because of the specific situation that called forth the letter: the readers were apparently tempted to tone down the distinctiveness of their Christian faith* and to compromise with Judaism*. S. McKnight has rightly argued that these warnings are addressed to the Christian community and that the punishment threatened for apostasy is eternal destruction, although his conclusion that genuine believers may forsake and abandon their salvation* is more controversial (see Grudem for a different view).

The cruciality of obedience, therefore, can scarcely be exaggerated. One of the consistent themes in the warning texts is that if God punished sin* under the Sinai covenant, then the punishment will be even stricter in the covenant inaugurated by Jesus Christ. The theological argumentation contained in Hebrews—in which the superiority of the new covenant over the old is featured—is designed to motivate the believers to continue in obedience. The obedience to which the readers are summoned should not be severed from faith, for Hebrews 10:35—12:3 demonstrates that obedience is rooted in faith. For instance, Abraham's* obedience in leaving his homeland stems from his faith. Faith for the author of Hebrews is in God's promises* and includes the conviction that God rewards "those who seek him" (Heb 11:6). Thus Abraham left his homeland because God promised him a better city and country (Heb 11:10, 13-16). Moses* suffered the indignity of identifying himself with the people of God* because of the promised reward (Heb 11:23-26), and even Jesus obeyed the call to suffer* on the cross* "for the joy set before him" (Heb 12:2).

2. James.

Even though James* does not contain the words obedience and lawlessness, there is no doubt that his paramount concern is that his readers live out their faith in a concrete and practical manner. Apparently the churches addressed were becoming complacent in their Christian faith, perhaps because they wanted to curry favor with the rich and were experiencing economic hardship in the Christian community (see Jas 1:9-11; 2:1-13; 4:13—5:6). James emphasizes that genuine Christian faith is inseparable from obedience (see Faith and Works). To demonstrate this in detail would require a survey of virtually the entire letter. In any case a sampling of themes reveals that his primary concern is ethical*: enduring trials (Jas 1:2-18); avoiding partiality, which is a sin tantamount to transgression of the law* (Jas 2:1-13, esp. Jas 2:9); proper use of the tongue (Jas 3:1-12); the danger of riches (Jas 1:9-11; 2:2-7; 4:13-17; 5:1-6). The purpose of James could be summarized in his terms, for he emphasizes that people must "do the word" and not just hear it (Jas 1:22-25). Wisdom,* according to James, does not pertain to intellectual ability but is manifested in righteous behavior (Jas 3:13-18). So too, as James says in his most famous passage, faith cannot be separated from works* (Jas 2:14-26). Those who claim to have faith but are lacking in works are deceived. Genuine faith inevitably displays itself in a transformed life. If works are not present, then the only prospect is judgment.* Here James and the author of Hebrews concur on the cruciality of obedience.

3. 1 Peter.

1 Peter* is addressed to churches encountering suffering.* The suffering was probably not a sustained and empire-wide persecution* directed from Rome (see Roman Empire) but sporadic persecution in the provinces. Peter appears to use the term obedience in reference to conversion. Obedience is the result (eis) of the sanctifying work of the Spirit* and the electing and foreknowing work of God the Father (1 Pet 1:1-2; see Election). Believers are characterized as "obedient children" (1 Pet 1:14; see Sonship, Children), and this obedience is traced back to the initial reception of the truth* (1 Pet 1:22). Nonetheless, Peter summons his readers to a holy lifestyle throughout the letter (see Holiness). His particular concern is that the readers manifest righteousness* in the midst of suffering, and thus he appeals to the example of Christ (1 Pet 2:21-25; 3:18-22). The imperative of obedience is also grounded in the promise of the heavenly inheritance that awaits them (1 Pet 1:3-9). The certainty of this inheritance should motivate the churches to endure the persecutions arising in the social order, which was hostile to the Christian faith (1 Pet 4:4, 12-19).

4. 2 Peter and Jude.

Both 2 Peter and Jude* were written to counteract adversaries* influencing the church. A comparison of Jude and 2 Peter 2 reveals that the issues facing the two writers were remarkably similar but not identical. In both cases the opponents are severely criticized for their licentious and morally loose behavior (see Purity), and such behavior indicates that they will face future judgment (2 Pet 2:20-22; Jude 14-15). Discussion has often centered on whether the opponents were Gnostics,* but the description of the false teachers is too vague to draw any firm conclusion about their identity. The adversaries in 2 Peter can be distinguished from those in Jude in that the former denied the Parousia* (2 Pet 3:3-7).

The readers in both letters are warned about the danger of presuming on God's grace,* for he judged angels* who overreached their appointed station, the world* at the time of Noah, Israel* after saving them from Egypt, and Sodom and Gomorrah (Jude 5-7; 2 Pet 2:4-9). Apostasy warrants eternal judgment, and believers will face the same if they adopt the morally loose lifestyle of the false teachers. Thus Jude commands his readers to "keep themselves in the love of God" (Jude 21), and this cannot be a reality without obedience. 2 Peter summons his readers to practice Christian virtues* (2 Pet 1:5-11), teaching them that this is necessary in order to enter into the kingdom* of Jesus Christ. His coming should motivate believers to holiness and godliness (2 Pet 3:11-18). The absolute necessity of human obedience for eternal reward does not nullify God's grace, for Jude says that it is God "who is able to keep you from stumbling" (Jude 24), which means that he keeps believers from apostasy. Nonetheless, this does not rule out the need for believers to obey, for the word of promise* cannot be used to nullify the threat of judgment.

5. 1 John.

1 John also underscores the importance of obedience in response to the threat of proto-Gnostics who were indifferent to moral issues (1 Jn 1:8) and adopted a docetic* christology* (1 Jn 2:22; 4:3; cf. 2 Jn 7). Those who genuinely know

God keep his commandments* and live the same way Jesus did (1 Jn 2:3-6; 5:2-3). John specifically defines sin as lawlessness in 1 John 3:4, and he goes on to argue that those who are born of God do not practice sin (see 1 Jn 3:4-10; 5:18). This does not mean that believers are sinless (1 Jn 1:6-10) The purpose of Christ's coming was to do away with sin (1 Jn 2:1; 3:5), and sin is no longer the dominating force in the life of the believer since the old age of darkness is passing away and the true light* is now shining (1 Jn 2:8).

6. Revelation.

The book of Revelation contains a theme similar to that of the other writings we have examined, even if the social and theological setting is different. Revelation is likely addressed to churches that were tempted to compromise in order to escape persecution. The persecution involved loss of life for some believers (Rev. 2:13; 17:6: 18:24; 19:2; cf. Rev 16:6; 20:4), although it is doubtful that the persecution was prosecuted and enforced with equal rigor in every part of the empire. Nonetheless it was quite intense, since it threatened believers with loss of life* and imprisonment (cf. Rev 1:9; 2:10). John insists that only those who overcome will obtain the promised reward (Rev 2:7, 11, 17, 26; 3:5, 12, 21). An analysis of these texts indicates that the reward promised refers to eternal life, for those who overcome are promised a tree of life and victory over the second death. Revelation 20:14 demonstrates that the second death is synonymous with the lake of fire, and thus John teaches that obtaining the heavenly inheritance is conditioned upon overcoming. This theme coheres with the purpose of Revelation as a whole, for the readers are called upon to endure even though "Babylon" is implacably opposed to their faith. Those who capitulate will face God's wrath* and torment, but those who endure will enjoy the triumph realized when the new heavens (see Heaven) and new earth become a reality (Rev 14:10-12; 21:1—22:5).

7. Apostolic Fathers.

One of the most remarkable passages about the "lawless" is in the *Epistle to Diognetus. The lawless and ungodly are declared to be justified in the Son of God, and the author speaks of the "sweet exchange" (Diogn. 9.4-5) whereby sinners are justified through the Son. The text is extraordinary because the apostolic fathers typically emphasize that obedience is necessary for eternal life. The "Two Ways" section in both the *Didache and the *Epistle of Barnabas stress that obedience is the path of life (Did. 1.1—6.2; Barn. 18.1—21.1). So too, the *Shepherd of Hermas says that the lawless will not be saved (Herm. Vis. 14.1; 73.6; cf. Herm. Sim. 96.1). The author of 1 Clement offers forgiveness for the lawless if they repent (1 Clem. 8.3; 35.4-9; 60.1; cf. Barn. 14.5; see Clement of Rome). The Shepherd also held out hope for the repentant, although he is famous for his teaching that such repentance* is available only once after baptism.* The Didache, in dependence on the apocalyptic* discourse in the Gospels (Mk 13 par.), predicts that lawlessness will increase immediately before the coming of the Lord (Did. 16.4; see Second Coming).

See also APOSTASY; COMMANDMENTS; DISCIPLINE; ENDURANCE, PERSEVERANCE; FAITH AND WORKS; FORGIVENESS; JUDGMENT; LAW; REWARDS; SIN, WICKEDNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Bauckham, Jude, 2 Peter (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John (AB; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982); P. H. Davids, The Epistle of James (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982); W. Grudem, "Perseverance of the Saints: A Case Study from Hebrews 6:4-6 and the Other Warning Passages in Hebrews" in The Grace of God, The Bondage of the Will. 1: Biblical and Practical Perspectives on Calvinism, ed. T. R. Schreiner and B. A. Ware (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995) 133-82; P. E. Hughes, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977); S. McKnight, "The Warning Passages in Hebrews," TJ 13 (1992) 21-59; R. P. Martin, James (WBC; Waco, TX: Word, 1988); D. J. Moo, The Letter of James (TNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977).

T. R. Schreiner

ODES OF SOLOMAN. See APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WRITINGS; HYMNS, SONGS; SYRIA, SYRIAN CHRISTIANITY.

OFFERINGS. See SACRIFICE, OFFERINGS, GIFTS.

OLD TESTAMENT IN ACTS

Use of the OT in the NT is one of the most debated aspects of NT study outside of the Gospels. When we refer to the OT, we use the term anachronistically. In the time of Jesus what we know as the OT often was simply called "the Scripture." The term described the venerated writings of Israel. There is much agreement on the nature of the OT text appearing in Acts,* on the forms some passages reflect and even on the topics that such citations address. However, there is much debate about the Lukan hermeneutics. This article examines the text of the citations, the topics covered, the forms of OT use and the nature of Luke's hermeneutic.

1. The Text of Old Testament Citations in Acts
2. The Topics of Old Testament Use
3. The Forms of Old Testament Use
4. The Type of Hermeneutics

1. The Text of Old Testament Citations in Acts. There is considerable consensus that in most cases Luke has used an OT text much like the manuscript A text of the Septuagint. This consensus ranges from studies done early in the twentieth century (Clarke) to those done much later (Holtz). T. Holtz's detailed study saw Luke as so consistent in using a Septuagint text that any significant deviation was automatically evidence for the use of traditional material. Such a source is clearest in the Twelve Prophets and in Isaiah. The only place where one is less certain is with regard to the Pentateuch, while the use of the Psalms exhibit a greater degree of variation than do other books.

2. The Topics of Old Testament Use. C. K. Barrett has argued that three topics dominate OT discussion: preaching* (Acts 2:17-21, 25-28, 34-35; 3:22-23, 25; 7:3, 5-7, 18, 27-28, 32-35, 37, 40, 42-43; 8:32-33; 13:22, 33-35, 41), prayer* (Acts 4:25-26) and direction for the church's* life (Acts 1:16, 20; 13:47; 15:16-18; 23:5; 28:26-27). These are good general categories, but more detail is possible (Evans).

In fact most texts are christological,* emphasizing Jesus as the fulfillment of messianic and Davidic hope* or highlighting how he fulfills promises* associated with the end-time activity of God* or a righteous sufferer (see Righteousness; Suffering Servant). The Psalter, Isaiah, Joel and Amos are keys to this portrait (Ps 2:7 in Acts 13:33; Ps 16:10 in Acts 2:25-28, 13:35; Ps 110:1 in Acts 2:34-35; Ps 118:22 in Acts 4:11; Ps 132:11 in Acts 2:30; Is 53:7-8 in Acts 8:32-33; Is 55:3 in Acts 13:34; Amos 9:11-12 in Acts 15:15-17; Joel 2:28-32 in Acts 2:17-21). In addition Acts 3:18-21 highlights the general promises of Scripture in indicating that, as Israel's Messiah, all that Jesus did not fulfill in his first coming, he will realize in his return.

Drawing on themes already raised in Luke 1:76-79; 2:30-32; 3:3-6; and 4:18-20, Luke uses the image of light* to declare that the church's message is to go out to all nations (Is 49:6 in Acts 13:47; see Gentiles). In this text (Acts 13:47) Paul and Barnabas use the servant imagery to refer to their own ministry* rather than that of Jesus, as does Luke's Gospel, though undoubtedly this use of the imagery connects their ministry to him.

Other texts serve to explain how Israelite unbelief should not be a surprise but reflects a divine pattern of either Israel's or humanity's response to God (Ps 2:1-2 in Acts 4:25-26; Is 6:9-10 in Acts 28:25-28; the various allusions in Acts 7, where the theme is stated in Acts 7:51-53). According to Stephen* (Acts 7), Israel's misunderstanding of the role of the tabernacle* or temple* reflects such a pattern.

Some texts warn of the danger of unbelief and urge response to the gospel* as a result (Deut 18:19 in Acts 3:23; Lev 23:29 in Acts 3:23; Hab 1:5 in Acts 13:41). It is a dangerous thing to scoff at God's work. Judgment* and separation from God loom for those who do not accept the gospel.

A few texts indicate how those who hear the speeches should not respond (Amos 5:25-27 in Acts 7:42-43; Is 66:1-2 in Acts 7:49-50). The point is to learn from history and not make the same error. Israel is the predominant audience for such points. The use of Isaiah 6 in Acts 28:25-28 seems to fit here also.

Peter's appeal to Scripture serves as a guide to the replacement of an enemy from within, namely, Judas (Acts 1:19-20 citing Ps 69:26 and 109:8, possibly also an allusion to Ps 41:10). A lack of surprise at opposition emerges when one reflects on Psalm 2:1-2, as the prayer of Acts 4:25-26 indicates. To be opposed is to stand in God's will. One need only be bold. This latter text shows that some passages can perform two functions at one, since this text also is used to explain opposition. James's advice to leave the Gentiles alone when it comes to circumcision is fueled by his appeal to Amos 9:11-12 as evidence that God would include the Gentiles when the authority* of the Davidic house was restored. The use of Exodus 22:7 appears to argue for the showing of respect to those Jewish leaders who persecute* believers.

The Scripture is put to a wide array of use in Acts, though most uses concentrate on describing who Jesus is and the reactions to him among various groups. Our survey has concentrated on citations. Luke loves to cite the OT in summary as well, speaking of what the OT or what the prophets* since Samuel have taught (e.g., Acts 3:24; 26:22). Such general appeals and allusions usually accompany texts making christological points (Acts 10:42-43; 17:30-31).

3. The Forms of Old Testament Use.

Two speeches are singled out here for treatment. Acts 13:16-41 is seen as the early Christian equivalent to the synagogue* proem homily (Bowker, Bruce). The proem is a type of bridge text that linked together the Torah reading and the reading from the Prophets during the synagogue service. This third text served to expound the theme raised by the two other passages and make their point clear. 1 Samuel 13:14, cited in its targumic form, is seen as the bridge text for connecting Deuteronomy 4:25-46 and 2 Samuel 7:6-16 in Acts 13. This speech then is an exposition of Israel's history in light of God's promise to David and its initial fulfillment in Jesus, though we are less than certain what the base texts were.

A second form is sometimes mentioned in association with Acts 15 and James's remarks. Some appeal here to the yelamedenu ("let the [rabbi] teach") speech form, in which a teacher tackles a practical problem scripturally and comes to a conclusion. In Acts 15 the problem concerns what to do about the Gentiles. James reasons his way to not requiring circumcision of them though his appeal to Amos 9:11-15. The possible evidence of remnants of these forms may well suggest the age and ancient quality of the traditions they represent.

In addition one should note the use of link words to bind the argument of passages together. This happens frequently throughout Luke-Acts, but three speeches give significant use of the technique. The first, Acts 2:16-40, has several such links between texts or between texts and exposition. The term "pour out" appears in Acts 2:17 and Acts 2:33. The title Lord appears in Acts 2:21 and Acts 2:36. The term Hades links Acts 2:27 with Acts 2:31. The concept of being seated or set on a throne ties together Acts 2:30 and Acts 2:34, linking an allusion to Psalm 132:11 to Psalm 110:1. The concept of "at the right hand" links Acts 2:33 and Acts 2:34. The combination of links argues that the initial fulfillment of the promise of the Spirit's (see Holy Spirit) distribution is evidence of Jesus' ascension to authority in fulfillment of ancient promises made to David. Acts 13, the second speech, has similar links, as the concept of "holy things" (Is 55:3) and "holy one" (Ps 16:10) unite Acts 13:34-35 to make a similar point about Jesus fulfilling Davidic hope. The third example is Acts 15, in which "Gentiles" ties together Acts 15:17 and Acts 15:19. Again the realization of Davidic hope is in view, since the nations are included as a result of rebuilding the Davidic dwelling. These texts evidence basic Jewish technique in expounding the Scripture. The promises of old are fulfilled in Christ.

4. The Type of Hermeneutics.

There are two major schools of thought about the hermeneutics of Luke. Some have argued that Luke took his view of events and used the language of Scripture as a hermeneutical tool to explain current events without appeal to straight-line promise and fulfillment (Rese, Soards). Some have argued in addition that Luke told his story, framing it in language where Scripture is imitated (Brodie). This latter variant argues that Luke rewrote and retold the OT story through the event associated with Jesus.

Others have argued that Luke used Scripture as one of the major means of explaining how the plan of God works and in doing so appealed to fulfillment through prophecy* and the historic pattern (or typology) of God's activity (Schubert, Bock; Evans and Sanders speak of "prophetic critique" in many of Luke's uses of the text). This approach recognizes that Luke's use of the text is often reflective, so that the events frequently triggered the awareness of fulfillment. It also argues that the texts used were already being used in Judaism* as texts that expected fulfillment with the arrival of promised salvation.* The events surrounding Jesus are told in the language and idiom of Scripture, but it is the story of Jesus, not that of the OT, that is being told in these terms. The repetition serves to reveal the presence of the pattern of God's activity, which itself points to fulfillment. This latter approach is more satisfactory in understanding Luke's appeal to Scripture, especially as he seeks to validate Christianity's claim to be God's way in the face of debate over the nature of the OT hope.

A key issue in this debate is whether typology, being a comparative category, is seen as a prophetic category. C. H. Talbert has argued that it is not a prophetic category. But the question is a complicated one. Are comparisons made because after the fact one matches event to Scripture and so the exercise is fundamentally retrospective? Or do texts have an interpretation in Judaism that creates an expectation of certain kinds of events that come with fulfillment, so that when the event comes it is associated with the hope of the text? Many of the texts Luke uses fall into this latter category (e.g., Deut 18; Joel 2, Is 61; Ps 2, 110, 118, 132). This would seem to indicate that such texts were read in the first century as describing a prophetic fulfillment. Other texts, where the Christian reading appears to be unique, also seem to parallel such Jewish expectations, though it does seem likely that events became a catalyst to their recognition (Is 53, though the idea of a representative death did exist in Judaism [Wis 2—5]). Other texts appeal to the repetitions of certain patterns of activity in history (Amos 5; Is 66). They prove nothing either way.

Luke's juxtaposition of the plan of God with Scripture is an appeal to design and expectation that one should appreciate upon reflection on the events. Prophecy to be prophetic need not always be anticipatory, since sometimes God reveals himself through the saving event itself which causes one to see better how his plan holds together. Thus the prospective-retrospective test for defining a prophetic presence is not a good one. It is better to see how Luke frames his texts by how he appeals to God's activity being defined as present and anticipated through what God had previously said. Prophecy or pattern fulfillment need not be a straight-line interpretive approach to be present. If we listen to him carefully, we will see the design in what God planned to do and did in Jesus.

See also ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; INTERTEXTUALITY IN EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, "Luke/Acts" in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture: Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 231-44; D. L. Bock, "Framing the Account: Alleviating Confusion in the Lukan Portrait of Jesus" in SBLSP (1994) 612-26; idem, Proclamation from Prophecy and Pattern: Lukan Old Testament Christology (JSNTS 12; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1987); J. Bowker, "Speeches in Acts: A Study in Proem and Yelammedenu Form," NTS 14 (1967-68) 96-111; T. L. Brodie, Luke the Literary Interpreter: Luke-Acts as a Systematic Rewriting and Updating of the Elisha-Elijah Narrative (Rome: Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas, 1987); F. F. Bruce, "Paul's Use of the Old Testament in Acts" in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament: Essays in Honor of E. E. Ellis, ed. G. F. Hawthorne with O. Betz (Grand Rapids; Eerdmans, 1987) 71-79; W. K. L. Clarke, "The Use of the Septuagint in Acts" in The Beginnings of Christianity, 1: The Acts of the Apostles, ed. F. J. F. Jackson and K. Lake (5 vols.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979 [1922]) 2:66-105; C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders, Luke and Scripture (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); T. Holtz, Untersuchungen über die alttestamentlichen Zitate bei Lukas (TU 104; Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1968); M. Rese, Alttestamentliche Motive in der Christologie des Lukas (SNT 1; Gerd Mohn: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1969); P. Schubert, "The Structure and Significance of Luke 24" in Neutestamentliche Studien für Rudolf Bultmann zu seinem siebzigsten Geburtstag am 20. August 1954, ed. W. Eltester (BZNW 21; Berlin: Alfred Töpelmann, 1954); M. Soards, The Speeches of Acts: Their Contents, Context and Concerns (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); C. H. Talbert, "Promise and Fulfillment in Lukan Theology" in Luke-Acts: New Perspectives from the Society of Biblical Literature, ed. C. H. Talbert (New York: Crossroad, 1984).

D. L. Bock

OLD TESTAMENT IN APOSTOLIC FATHERS

Apostolic fathers is an artificial category, both historically and literarily, for the noncanonical but orthodox Christian writings nearest in time to the NT. Although diverse in purpose, geographical location and type of literature, they exhibit a substantial agreement about the OT as the Word of God,* inspired by God's Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and constituting the Scriptures of the church. In common with other early Christian literature but unlike Jewish literature, they make greater use of the Prophets (especially Isaiah) and the Writings (especially the Psalms) than the Law. The two writings that make the most extensive use of the OT, 1 Clement and Barnabas, permit conclusions to be drawn about the authority* of the OT and its interpretation.

1. Didache
2. Barnabas
3. 1 Clement
4. 2 Clement
5. The Shepherd of Hermas
6. Polycarp
7. Ignatius
8. Alternatives and Relationships

1. Didache.

The manual of church life and order known as the Didache ("The Teaching of the Lord Through the Twelve Apostles to the Nations") is saturated with the Jewish environment, from the moral instruction of the "Two Ways" at the beginning of the work to the apocalyptic picture in the last chapter. The language of the OT, especially the Wisdom Literature, is readily used as part of that Jewish context but with little explicit quotation.

1.1. Quotations. The Didache contains three formula quotations, introduced by "It was [or, has been] spoken" rather than "written." Two of these are from the prophets*—Malachi 1:11, 14 cited as "spoken by the Lord" (Did. 14.3) and Zechariah 14:5 (Did. 16.7)—and one is from an unknown source (Did. 1.6, "Let your alms sweat in your hands until you know to whom you give"—cf. Sir 12:1; 7:22). The "Two Ways" (Did. 1.2) begins with a quotation of the two commandments* to love* God (Deut 6:5) and to love your neighbor (Lev 19:18) as refracted through Jesus' teaching.* The language of the two ways of life* and death itself is taken from the OT (Jer 21:8; cf. Deut 30:15-20). The content of the "Two Ways" (Did. 2-5) is an expansion of the Ten Commandments (Ex 20; Deut 5).

1.2. Phrases and Allusions. The Didache draws on imagery from Judaism*—"yoke of the Lord" (Did. 6.2); "holy vine of David your servant" (Did. 9.2)—and refers to institutions and practices in Judaism—fasting (Did. 8); first fruits (Did. 13); sacrifices* (Did. 14.1); priests* (Did. 13.3). In addition phrases from the OT are often picked up: "the snare of death" (Prov 14:27; 21:6 in Did. 2.4); "fearing [my] words" (Is 66:2; Did. 3.8); "judge righteously" (Deut 1:16, 17; Prov 31:9; Did. 4.3); "neither adding to nor taking away" (Deut 4:2; 12:32 [13:1 LXX]; Did. 4.13); "loving vanity" (Ps 4:3; Did. 5.2); and "pursuing a reward" (Is 1:23; Did. 5.2). Such phrases may have been in common use so that a specific biblical allusion was not in mind. Where the same phrase is in the OT and the NT we cannot determine the immediate source, especially since these are in Matthew, with which the Didache has closest affinities: "for the meek shall inherit the earth" (Ps 37:11 [36:11 LXX]; Mt 5:5; Did. 3.7); "four winds" (Zech 2:6 [2:10 LXX]; Mt 24:31; Did. 10.5); "who comes in the name of the Lord" (Ps 118:26 [117:26 LXX]; Mt 21:9; Did. 12.1).

Several phrases come from the wisdom books of the Apocrypha*: "love . . . your Creator" (Sir 7:30; Did. 1.2); "Do not be one who extends his hands to receive but closes his fist to give" (paraphrased—Sir 4:31; Did. 4.5); "do not turn away from the needy" (Sir 4:5; Did. 4.8); "murderers of children" (Wis 12:5; Did. 5.2). Where a phrase is frequent in Jewish and Christian sources, as "He created all things" (Wis 1:14; Sir 18:1; 24:8; cf. Rev 4:11; Did. 10.3), it may have been a common expression (especially in worship*) that was not drawn immediately from a written source.

From these quotations and allusions it is impossible to determine the limits of the Didachist's canon, for he not only appropriates but also lives in the whole world of the Jewish heritage, and in this work he was not concerned to make an explicit differentiation between canonical and noncanonical.

2. Barnabas.

2.1. Relation to Judaism. The *Epistle of Barnabas, like the Didache, contains the teaching of the "Two Ways," but instead of the biblical language of "the way of life and way of death" (Jer 21:8) the author speaks of "the ways of light and darkness" (Barn. 18.1, as at Qumran*—1QS 3.18-25; 1QM). Both documents breathe the atmosphere of Judaism, but Barnabas, unlike the Didache, has a strong sense of a break with Judaism. Barnabas represents an extreme form of the claim that only Christians correctly understand the OT (Barn. 8.7; 10.12). In Barnabas's community Jews and Christians struggled over who were the people of God: Whose was the covenant* and to whom did the Scriptures belong? Barnabas's argument is that the Jews had misunderstood the Scriptures from the start.

Claiming a special insight into the meaning of Scripture (Barn. 1.4-8; 5.3), the author takes the position otherwise unknown in early Christianity that God did not intend the literal observance of the law,* charging that the Jews had fashioned their own religious observances contrary to the will of God. His is perhaps the strongest assertion in this literature that the OT is a Christian book. He discusses the principal institutions and religious practices of Judaism: God does not need sacrifices (Barn. 2), and the true atonement is the death of Christ (Barn. 7—8; see Death of Christ); the acceptable fast is good deeds (Barn. 3); circumcision is of the heart and the hearing (Barn. 9); the food laws* prohibit association with immoral persons (Barn. 10; see Purity); the true washing is baptism* (Barn. 11); there is only one covenant, given to Christians and not to Jews (Barn. 13-14); the sabbath is really the eschatological* rest (hence, Christians keep the "eighth day," Barn. 15); the true temple* is the heart and the believing community (Barn. 16). All is buttressed with scriptural quotations.

*2.2. Quotations. The argument of Barnabas has to do with the OT. There are approximately 100 explicit quotations of Scripture. The most frequently quoted books are Isaiah (about one-fourth), the Pentateuch (especially Genesis) and Psalms. These were also favorite books in the NT and other Christian literature. "Scripture says" introduces quotations from the three parts of the Hebrew Bible: Law (Barn. 4.7; Ex 34:28; 31:18), Prophets (Barn. 4.11; Is 5:21) and Writings (Barn. 5.4; Prov 1:7). Two quotations are from outside the Hebrew canon: "Another prophet says," introducing 4 Ezra 4:33; 5:5 (Barn. 12.1) and "Scripture says," referring to 1 Enoch 89:56, 66, 67 (Barn. 16.5). The use of Sirach 4:31 (Barn. 19.9) may be due to its earlier presence in the "Two Ways." Two other quotations are unknown (Barn. 6.13, introduced by "The Lord says," and Barn. 7.8, perhaps a commentary on Lev 16:21-22). An example of a quotation in an expanded, interpreted form comes from Exodus 20:8, "Sanctify the sabbath of the Lord with pure hands and a pure heart" (Barn. 15.1, 6).

In the introductory formulas the author prefers verbs of speaking over writing (so for other authors in this literature) and prefers the present tense, emphasizing that the word is addressing people in the present.

Although the formula quotations show respect for the OT as the Word of God, there are arbitrary uses of the Scriptures. Some are intentional changes in the wording of texts. In Barnabas 5.12 Zechariah 13:6-7 is quoted, "When they smite their shepherd, then the sheep of the flock will perish," stressing the responsibility of the Jews ("their") for Christ's death and making the verse say that the Jews themselves will be destroyed. In Barnabas 11.2 Jeremiah 2:12-13 is quoted as "this people" rather than "my people" to avoid saying that Israel* was God's people. In Barnabas 13.4-6 Genesis 48:14-15 is quoted so as to have Jacob bless only Ephraim, the younger son, and not Ephraim and Manasseh. Barnabas furthermore ignores certain facts, as the giving of a second set of the tablets of stone and so a renewing of the covenant with Israel (Ex 34:1-10; Barn. 4.6-8).

*2.3. Authority and Interpretation. Scripture for the author of Barnabas is clearly authoritative, giving both revelation* (e.g., Barn. 1.7; 2.4; 3.6; 5.3; 7.1) and commands (e.g., Barn. 6.1; 7.3, 6; 8.1; 9.5; 10.2; 12.6; 14.6; 21.1). God speaks through Scripture (Barn. 1.7; 2.4, 9). The divine origin is indicated by the frequency with which the speaker is said to be the Lord* (Barn. 4.8; 6.16; 9.1 [twice]; 14.3; 16.2) or God (Barn. 5.5, 12), but sometimes the human author is specified—Moses* (e.g., Barn. 10.1), David (e.g., Barn. 10.10), Isaiah (Barn. 12.11) or Daniel (Barn. 4.5). All of Scripture is seen as prophetic* (Barn. 6.4, 6, 7, 8, 13; 12.10; 13.4). The Holy Spirit is the Spirit who prophesies (Barn. 9.2). Scripture speaks of Christ: "The prophets who received grace from him prophesied of him" (Barn. 5.6) "because all things are in him and for him" (Barn. 12.7). Moreover, Christ himself speaks in Scripture: The "Lord" in Barnabas 6.16 and Barnabas 7.2-3 is Christ.

In some texts Barnabas finds his prophetic message in the literal meaning of the text (Barn. 2—3; 4.7-8; 6.18). The author sometimes follows the usual Christian reading of the OT prophecies about Christ and his sufferings* (Barn. 5.1—6.7). Perhaps most characteristic of Barnabas is his typological* reading of the OT story: typos ("type") is a favorite word (Barn. 7.3, 7, 10, 11; 8.1-2; 12.2; 12.5-6; 12.10; 13.5). Although he understands the events to have occurred, they had no historical significance except as prophetic types; the history happened in order to be a prophecy. Instances of allegory in the strict sense are not as numerous as usually assumed. Most often noted are the interpretations of the forbidden foods as types of persons whom one is to avoid (Barn. 10) and of the 318 servants of Abraham as referring to Christ and him crucified (Barn. 9). Unlike most allegorical interpretations, for Barnabas there were not multiple meanings in the text, not an obvious plus a deeper meaning; for him there was only one meaning, the spiritual sense. More than claiming that the ordinances of Israel had been abrogated (Barn. 2.6; 9.4; 16.2), Barnabas presents the spiritualizing interpretation as the real, intended meaning of the text from the beginning (Barn. 2.7-8; 9.4; 16.6). Moses "legislated well," but he did so "spiritually," "as the Lord intended" (Barn. 10.2, 9, 12).

The context of discussion with the Jews is made evident in the way Barnabas distributes the texts between the "two peoples" (see Barn. 13.2): "For what has been written . . . relates in part to Israel and in part to us" (Barn. 5.2). The literal or negative words are those addressed "to them," the Jews (Barn. 2.7; 3.1; 5.2; 6.8; 9.5; 10.2; 12.7); the positive, spiritual words are addressed "to us," the Christians (Barn. 2.4; 2.10; 3.3; 5.2; 6.13; 9.1-3). Barnabas distances himself from "their law" (3.6) but claims the covenant for Christians (Barn. 4.6-7). Instead of a new covenant he speaks of a "new people" (Barn. 5.7; 7.5).

3. 1 Clement.

3.1. Quotations and Allusions. OT quotations or allusions pervade the letter of the church at Rome* to the church at Corinth known as 1 Clement (see Clement of Rome). The approximately seventy direct quotations constitute about one-fourth of this long epistle, making it second only to Barnabas among the apostolic fathers in the frequency of quotation from the OT. Allusions and examples drawn from the OT and Apocrypha would increase this percentage considerably. For instance, the prayer* in 1 Clement 59—61 may be described as a pastiche of phrases from the Septuagint. Some of the quotations are lengthy. Psalms, Isaiah, Job, Genesis and Proverbs, in this order, are the most frequently cited. The heavy use of Job and Proverbs is unusual in comparison with the NT and Christian literature generally in the early period. Nearly all the quotations have introductory phrases; these include "It is written" and various forms of "It says."

Although some of the quotations vary widely from the Septuagint, thirty-nine are essentially verbatim and nine moderately variant. 1 Clement four times quotes documents we do not know: 1 Clement 8.3 (following a quotation from Ezek 33:11, so this may be a paraphrase of Ezek 33:11-27, an interpolated version or an Ezekiel Apocryphon); 1 Clement 17.6 (ascribed to Moses); 1 Clement 23.3-4 (also found in 2 Clem. 11.2-4, which has an additional sentence); 1 Clement 46.2.

No conflict with Judaism is in evidence in 1 Clement. Sometimes the author derives doctrinal lessons from the OT: for example, 1 Clement 26 supports the resurrection by a catena of references (Ps 27:7; 3:6; 22:4 LXX; Job 19:26) given an overly literal interpretation in the fashion of some rabbinic interpretations. The regulations of the OT priesthood serve as a model for the Christian ministry* (1 Clem. 41). The author primarily uses the OT for moral and practical purposes.

3.2. Arrangement of Materials. For each of the attitudes or qualities that the author of 1 Clement considers the Corinthians to need, he cites biblical passages and gives examples. Although the examples include Gentiles* (1 Clem. 55) and Christian figures (1 Clem. 5—6), the great majority come from the OT. In the treatment of the topics in 1 Clement we can likely observe the method of preaching* and teaching that Clement employed in church.

1 Clement 4 cites seven instances in their biblical order where jealousy enters the story—Cain and Abel; Jacob and Esau; Joseph and his brothers; Moses, Aaron and Miriam; Dathan and Abiram; David and Saul (1 Clem. 4)—followed by seven statements of what jealousy had caused, citing both pagan and Christian examples (1 Clem. 5—6). The treatment of repentance* (1 Clem. 7—8) cites two examples of OT preachers of repentance, Noah and Jonah (1 Clem. 7.6-7), and quotes two texts, a paraphrase of Ezekiel 33:11-27 and Ezekiel 18:32 (or an Ezekiel Apocryphon) joined with Isaiah 1:16-20 (1 Clem. 8.3-4). 1 Clement 9—12 brings together obedience,* faith* and hospitality* as interrelated qualities. Seven examples are given: Enoch (1 Clem. 9.3), Noah (1 Clem. 9.4), Abraham* three times (1 Clem. 10.1; 10.2; 10.7), Lot (1 Clem. 11.1-2) and Rahab (1 Clem. 12.1-7).

Humility is taught in 1 Clement 13—15 by a combination of OT texts (Jer 9:23-24; Is 66:2; Prov 2:21-22 [cf. Ps 36:9, 38]; Ps 36:35-37; Is 29:13; Ps 61:5; 77:36-37; 30:19; 11:4-6 LXX) with sayings of Jesus (1 Clem. 13.2) and in 1 Clement 16—18 by the examples of Christ (Is 53 quoted in entirety as an indication of Christ's humility), three prophets (Elijah, Elisha and Ezekiel) and four others (Abraham, Job, Moses and David). The pattern followed is to state why the hero may be regarded as approved by God and then to cite passages that give evidence of his humility: Abraham (Is 41:8 contrasted with Gen 18:27), Job (Job 1:1 contrasted with Job 14:4-5), Moses (Num 12:7 contrasted with Ex 3:11; 4:10 and an unknown source); David (1 Sam 13:14; Ps 88:21 contrasted with Ps 50:3-19 LXX). Scriptures on confession of sin* and praying for forgiveness* are brought together in 1 Clement 52—53 (Ps 68:31-33; 49:14-15; 50:19 LXX; Ex 32:7-10, 31-32; Deut 9:12-14).

3.3. Doctrine of Scripture. Of the apostolic fathers 1 Clement offers the fullest doctrine of Scripture. The sacred and authoritative character of the OT books is affirmed both by introductory formulas ("The Holy Spirit says," 1 Clem. 13.1, quoting Jer 9:23-24; 1 Clem. 16.2, quoting Is 53:1-12) and by descriptions ("the holy word," 1 Clem. 13.3, introducing Is 66:2, and 1 Clem. 56.3, introducing Ps 117:18 LXX; and "sacred Scriptures . . . and oracles of God," 1 Clem. 53.1). A particularly strong statement occurs in 1 Clement 45.2-3: "You searched deeply into the sacred Scriptures, which are true and given by the Holy Spirit. You know that nothing unjust or counterfeit is written in them."

Christ is of supreme importance for Clement (1 Clem. 13.1-2). The OT speaks of Christ (e.g., Is 53 in 1 Clem. 16.2; cf. 1 Clem. 17.1 of other prophets and the passages quoted in 1 Clem. 36); and Christ himself speaks in the OT, especially the Psalms (1 Clem. 16.15-16, quoting Ps 21:7-9; and 1 Clem. 22.1, "He himself through the Holy Spirit exhorted us," followed by Ps 33:12-18 and 31:10 LXX). His words are quoted alongside the words of the OT as something to be remembered (1 Clem. 13.2; 46.7-8).

1 Clement, in warning against opposition to the righteous, appeals in sequence to "the sacred Scriptures" (the OT, 1 Clem. 45.2), "the words of Jesus our Lord" (1 Clem. 46.7) and "the epistle of the blessed Paul the apostle" (1 Clem. 47.1). The order may not be important, but it corresponds to the triad of prophets, Lord and apostles* frequently found in works of the early writers. Clement makes a twofold summary of the OT when he refers to what "Moses signified in the sacred books, whom the other prophets followed, testifying to the laws laid down by him" (1 Clem. 43.1). He seems to refer to the third division of the Hebrew Scriptures (the Writings) when he identifies Psalm 138:7-10 (LXX) as found in the "Writing" (1 Clem. 28.2-3). Clement's references include some of the Apocrypha: Judith (the person given as an example along with Esther, 1 Clem. 55.4-6) and Wisdom of Solomon (1 Clem. 3.4; 27.5 citing Wis 2:24; 12:12 respectively without introductory formula).

1 Clement offers some interpretations that can be classified as allegorical and typological. As instances of the former, one may refer to the interpretation of the scarlet cord of Rahab (Josh 2:18) as a prophecy of redemption* through the blood of Christ (1 Clem. 12.7) and the interpretation of the "gate" through which the righteous enter (Ps 117:19-20) as Christ (1 Clem. 48.2-4). These interpretations are part of the early church's general christological* reading of the OT. As instances of typology* may be cited the parallels to the situation in the church at Corinth drawn from Deuteronomy 32:15 (1 Clem. 3.1); Isaiah 3:3-4 (1 Clem. 3.5); and Numbers 17 (1 Clem. 43). These latter agree with Clement's predominantly paraenetic use of the OT for moral and ecclesiological lessons.

Clement can make a direct application of the OT to the church because for him Israel merges into the church* (see Church as Israel) The contrast of his situation and his use of the OT with Barnabas may be seen in the different ways they treated the incident in which Moses broke the tablets of the Ten Commandments (Ex 32:7-19; Deut 9:12-17). 1 Clement 53 refers to the incident in order to prepare for the appeal to the troublemakers at Corinth to depart for the good of the congregation by recalling Moses' willingness to be killed himself in order that the people may be spared. Barnabas 4.6-8 sees in the incident the breaking of the covenant between God and Israel so that the covenant of Jesus might be given to Christians.

4. 2 Clement.

The sermon known as 2 Clement shows less explicit indebtedness to Christianity's Jewish roots in general and the OT in particular. There are several quotations from the OT, but the striking thing is that nearly all of these are also found in the NT.

4.1. Quotations from the Old Testament also in the New Testament. The formula quotations in 2 Clement are introduced "[He (or, it)] says [or, said]," but several citations have no introductory formula. The following list notes the use of the same passage in the NT or other early Christian literature: 2 Clement 2.1 = Isaiah 54:1 (Gal 4:27); 2 Clement 3.4 = Deuteronomy 6:5 (Mk 12:30 par.); 2 Clement 3.5 quotes Isaiah 29:13 by name (but closer to Mt 15:8 and Mk 7:6 and identical to 1 Clem. 15.2); 2 Clement 7.6 and 2 Clement 17.5 = Isaiah 66:24 (Mk 9:48, but 2 Clem. quotes more than Mk does); 2 Clement 8.2 uses the example of the potter, as does Jeremiah 18:4-6 (Rom 9:19-21); 2 Clement 13.2 = Isaiah 52:5, including the latter's introductory words, "The Lord says" (close to Ign. Trall. 8.2; since the quotation is combined in 2 Clem. with an unknown quotation, the author has received the quotation from a source other than Isaiah); 2 Clement 14.1 quotes Jeremiah 7:11 as "Scripture" (Mt 21:13); 2 Clement 14.2 quotes Genesis 1:27 as "Scripture" (Mk 10:6; the preceding reference in 2 Clem. to Eph 1:22 makes it possible that Eph 5:31 has pointed the author to the Genesis account). The frequent use 2 Clement makes of gospel* tradition* adds support to the possibility that the author may have received much of his knowledge of the OT by way of Christian materials.

4.2. Other Quotations. 2 Clement, however, does have citations from the OT that do not have a parallel use in the NT: 2 Clement 15.3 = Isaiah 58:9, introduced "God says"; 2 Clement 16.3 = Malachi 4:1 (Mal 3:19 LXX); 2 Clement 17.4-5 = Isaiah 66:18 (cf. Dan 3:7) and Isaiah 66:24. The phrase in 2 Clement 17.4, "each according to his works," is in Psalm 61:13 and Proverbs 24:12; 2 Clement 10.2 is a possible allusion to Psalm 33:15 but is not close, and 2 Clement 19.3 may allude to Hosea 10:12. 2 Clement 6.9 may show a familiarity with 4 Ezra 7:102-6, and 2 Clement 16.4 alludes to Tobit 12:8-9. Some quotations are problematic: 2 Clement 4.5 is a quotation of unknown origin (it contains a phrase from Is 40:11), but it may derive from a Christian source; 2 Clement 6.8 quotes Ezekiel 14:14, 20 as Scripture but in a different order and with changed wording, suggesting indirect appropriation or a summary reference; 2 Clement 11.2 quotes an unidentified "prophetic word" that is also cited but not as extensively in 1 Clement 23.3-4 (this could be from a Christian prophet; if it is not from a Christian source, a Christian source may have pointed to the passage).

The author of 2 Clement often cites as authority "the Lord," referring to the teachings of Jesus (2 Clem. 3.2; 4.2; 5.2; 6.1; 8.5; 9.11; 12.2). The phrase in 2 Clement 14.2, "the books and the apostles," refers to two other sources of authoritative teaching, the Jewish Scriptures and the Christian apostles. This phrase anticipates the two-part Christian canon.* For the most part the author is dependent on Christian material, which included OT quotations; but 2 Clement's own independent use of the OT may have been limited.

5. The Shepherd of Hermas.

This work is ascribed to Hermas (see Shepherd of Hermas) and in spite of theories of composite authorship may be accepted as the work of one person, perhaps written over a period of two or three decades. The work—containing Visions, Commandments (or Mandates) and Parables (or Similitudes)—is an apocalypse in literary form, although it lacks the usual content of apocalyptic literature.

The only quotation by Hermas attributed to its source is to a lost work: "'The Lord is near to those who turn to him,' as it is written in Eldad and Modat, who prophesied to the people in the wilderness" (Herm. Vis. 2.3.4 = 7.4 [references will give both the old and the new form of division of the text]). A rare quotation introduced by a formula cites Ecclesiastes 12:13 as "he says" (Herm. Man. 7.1 = 37.1). Many phrases, however, are drawn ultimately from the OT: A recent edition cites forty-five. Some occur more than once: "glorify his name" (Ps 85:9, 12 LXX; Is 24:15; 66:5; Herm. Vis. 2.1.1 = 5.2; 3.4.3 = 12.3; 4.1.3 = 22.3; Herm. Sim. 9.18.5 = 95.5); "cast your cares on the Lord" (Ps 54:23 LXX; 1 Pet 5:7; Herm. Vis. 3.11.3 = 19.3; 4.2.4 = 23.4; 4.2.5 = 23.5); "work righteousness" (Ps 14:2 LXX; Acts 10:35; Heb 11:33; Herm. Vis. 2.2.7 = 6.7; 2.3.3 = 7.3; Herm. Man. 12.3.1 = 46.1; 12.6.2 = 49.2; Herm. Sim. 9.13.7 = 90.7).

These and many other phrases sound formulaic and may have come to Hermas through use in liturgy*: "God who dwells in heaven" (Ps 2:4; 122:1 LXX; Herm. Vis. 1.1.6 = 1.6); "God of powers" (common in Ps—e.g., 58:6; 79:5; 83:9 LXX; Herm. Vis. 1.3.4 = 3.4); "the great King" (Ps 46:3 LXX; Herm. Vis. 3.9.8 = 17.8); "trusting in the Lord" (Ps 2:12 and often; Herm. Man. 9.6 = 39.6); "fear of the Lord" (Ps 110:10 LXX; Prov 1:7, etc.; Herm. Man. 10.6 = 40.6); "sacrifice acceptable to God" (Is 56:7; cf. Sir 35:6; Phil 4:18; Herm. Sim. 5.3.8 = 56.8); "righteous Judge" (Ps 7:12 LXX; Herm. Sim. 6.3.6 = 63.6); "pure heart" (Ps 50:12 LXX; Herm. Sim. 6.3.6 = 63.6).

Some of the ideas that may go back to the OT were proverbial: "tried by fire" (Job 23:10; Prov 17:3; Sir 2:5; 1 Pet 1:7; Herm. Vis. 4.3.4 = 24.4); "each according to his deeds" (Ps 61:13 LXX; 2 Cor 5:10; Herm. Sim. 6.3.6 = 63.6); "fruit of righteousness" (Prov 3:9; 11:30; frequent in the NT; Herm. Sim. 9.19.2 = 96.2).

Understandably, in terms of Hermas's theme, many of his biblical phrases relate to repentance and forgiveness: "he shall heal your sins" (Deut 30:3; cf. Jer 3:22; Herm. Vis. 1.1.9 = 1.9); "he has done wickedly before the Lord" (Judg 2:11 and frequently; Herm. Man. 4.2.2 = 30.2); "turn to the Lord with your whole heart" (Jer 24:7; Joel 2:12; Herm. Man. 6.1.5 = 35.5; 9.2 = 39.2; 12.6.2 = 49.2); "remembering his commandments" (Ps 102:18 LXX; Herm. Sim. 1.7 = 50.7).

Even this incomplete listing from Hermas illustrates the extent to which the language of the OT became a part of common Christian speech.

6. Polycarp.

The bishop of Smyrna, Polycarp,* wrote to the church at Philippi a letter that is saturated with the language of the letters of Paul, Peter and John. Making the maximum allowance for Polycarp's dependence on the OT still results in only meager use. Such infrequency would not be surprising in a relatively short letter; it becomes noteworthy when compared with the heavy adoption of language from the NT.

If something is to be made of Polycarp's allusions to the OT, they fit the pattern of other early Christian writings in being mainly dependent on the Prophets, Psalms and Wisdom Literature. Occasional OT phrases are picked up: "serve God with fear" (Ps 2:11; Pol. Phil. 2.1 and 6.3; cf. Heb 12:28); "all breath" (Ps 150:6; Pol. Phil. 2.1); "his blood is required" (Gen 42:22; Pol. Phil. 2.1); "iniquitous things" (Job 27:6; Pol. Phil. 5.3); "before God and men" (Prov 3:4; Pol. Phil. 6.1); "swift judgment" (Wis 6:5; Pol. Phil. 6.1); "do not know the judgment of the Lord" (Jer 5:4; Pol. Phil. 11.2); "be angry and do not sin" (Ps 4:5; Pol. Phil. 12.1; Eph 4:26). The clearest and fullest use of a passage from the old Scriptures by Polycarp is Tobit 4:10 and Tobit 12:9 in the discussion of almsgiving in Philippians 10.2.

The employment of the same brief phrase does not necessarily indicate direct use. Isaiah 52:5 ("name blasphemed"), for instance (Pol. Phil. 10.2-3), seemingly had become something of a commonplace (see on 2 Clem. 13.2 in 4.1 above).

Significant for Polycarp's perspective is the application of Psalm 2:11 ("serve him with fear and all reverence") to Christ and the further expansion, "As he himself commanded, and also the apostles who preached the gospel to us, and the prophets who foretold the coming of our Lord" (Pol. Phil. 6.3). This kind of statement is common in the second century of Christians' threefold source of authority: the Lord, the prophets and the apostles. This three-part "canon" centers in the Lord who also spoke through the apostles and prophets. In Polycarp's letter to the Philippians the Jewish heritage and the OT virtually disappear into the Christian message.

7. Ignatius.

Ignatius,* bishop of Antioch,* while a prisoner on his way to martyrdom* in Rome, wrote letters to six churches and one individual (Polycarp). Although he had assistance in the preparation of his correspondence, the circumstances were not conducive to bookish correspondence, so we should not expect careful quotation by Ignatius. His letters are full of NT allusions and parallels, but there are few to the OT.

7.1. Quotations and Allusions to the OT. Ignatius has two quotations introduced "It is written," both to Proverbs (Prov 3:34; Jas 4:6; 1 Pet 5:15; Ign. Eph. 5.3; Prov 18:17, Ign. Magn. 12.1) and both likely proverbial apart their written source. The clearest allusions to the OT were similarly common tags: "He spoke and it came to be," introduced by reference to the "one Teacher" (Ps 32:9; 148:5 LXX: Jdt 16:4, all with reference to God's creation, Ign. Eph. 15.1); "my name is blasphemed" (Is 52:5; cf. Pol. Phil. 10.2; Ign. Trall. 8.2); "loose every bond" (Is 58:6; Ign. Phld. 8.1); "set up an ensign" (Is 5:6; Ign. Smyrn. 1.2). "Living water" (Ign. Rom. 7.2) more likely comes from John (Jn 4:10; 7:38); at least there is no compelling reason to think Ignatius took this phrase from Zechariah 14:8. Some language of the OT came into the church from its early days and was used in worship and teaching without direct reference to the OT; that could be the case with these quotations and allusions.

*7.2. The Prophets. Ignatius conducts a strong polemic against judaizing teachers in the church (Ign. Phld. 6) and against Docetists* with a christology that denied the reality of Christ's human flesh,* "whom neither the prophecies nor the law of Moses and not even so far the gospel did persuade" (Ign. Smyrn. 5.1). Against these teachers Ignatius claimed the prophets as servants* of Christ and as belonging to the Christians. To live according to Judaism is to confess that one has not received grace,* "For the most divine prophets lived according to Jesus Christ" (Ign. Magn. 8.2), and "Even the prophets" were his "disciples in the Spirit" (Ign. Magn. 9.2). "We love [or, let us love] the prophets because they announced the gospel, hoped in him, and waited for him, in whom they also having believed in him were saved, being united with Jesus Christ" (Ign. Phld. 5.2). Although Ignatius refers to the prophets as persons, he knew them because of their writings and so treats them as a group.

*7.3. Authority. As these passages about the prophets indicate, the prophets derived their authority from Christ, and their message was subordinated to him. Ignatius felt that it was "improper" (or "absurd") "to speak of Jesus Christ and to practice Judaism, for Christianity did not base its faith on Judaism but Judaism on Christianity" (Ign. Magn. 10.3). Thus he strongly affirms the superiority of the new dispensation over the old. "The priests are noble, but the High Priest [Christ] is better." Christ is the door to the Father for the ancestors,* prophets, apostles and the church: "The gospel has a certain preeminence. . . . The beloved prophets pointed to Christ, but the gospel is the completion of immortality" (Ign. Phld. 9.1-2). Hence Ignatius exhorts "to give heed to the prophets and especially to the gospel" (Ign. Smyrn. 7.2). "In order to prosper in whatever you do [Ps 1:3], give diligence to be confirmed in the ordinances of the Lord and the apostles" (Ign. Magn. 13.1).

These passages indicate that for Ignatius, as for Polycarp, the authority is the Lord Jesus Christ, and his message may be found in the prophets when interpreted with reference to him but especially in the gospel preached by the apostles (see Ign. Phld. 5.1-2 on the apostles and prophets as preaching the gospel of Christ—another indication of the triad of the Lord, prophets and apostles). Another passage may further indicate Ignatius's subordination of the OT to Christ: "For I heard some say, 'If I do not find [it] in the archives, I do not believe [it to be] in the gospel.' And when I said, 'It is written,' they answered me, 'that is just the question.' But for me the archives are Jesus Christ, the inviolable archives are his cross and death and his resurrection and faith through him" (Ign. Phld. 8.2, trans. Schoedel). "Archives" would be the OT, and the debate between Ignatius and his opponents concerned whether certain Christian teachings were in the OT. Ignatius appeals to Christ as superior authority. The translation of "archives" as OT may not be certain, but it fits the perspective of Ignatius that the OT has its meaning and value in relation to Christ.

8. Alternatives and Relationships.

The common conviction that the OT is the church's book allowed for a variety of ways in which it might be used. Jewish Christians* continued to live in the atmosphere of the OT, although making various modifications in its institutions and ordinances, an approach reflected in the Didache, whoever the author might have been. Gentile Christians might largely leave it in the background (2 Clem., Herm.) or subordinate it to the teachings of Christ (Polycarp). Others took the OT seriously but came to terms with it in differing ways. Barnabas, in comparison to other early Christian writings, has a singular viewpoint on the OT, but his spiritualizing interpretation may be seen as anticipating the Alexandrian* allegorization that found Christian teaching under the letter of the old law, especially in matters of the spiritual life. 1 Clement anticipates the Western church's appropriation of the OT as a guidebook whose instructions could be transferred from the OT institutions to their NT equivalents, especially in the moral and organizational life of the church. Ignatius appears to anticipate the view of Justin Martyr and Irenaeus that the OT was valid for a time but has now been superseded by the revelation through Christ.

See also BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF; CLEMENT OF ROME; DIDACHE; HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF; IGNATIUS; POLYCARP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. D. M. Derrett, "Scripture and Norms in the Apostolic Fathers," ANRW 2.27.1 (1993) 649-99; K. P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974) 49-97; E. Ferguson, "Christian Use of the Old Testament" in The World and Literature of the Old Testament, ed. J. T. Willis (Austin: Sweet, 1979) 346-57; E. Flesseman-van Leer, Tradition and Scripture in the Early Church (Assen: van Gorcum, 1954); R. M. Grant, The Apostolic Fathers: A Translation and Commentary, 1: An Introduction (New York: Thomas Nelson, 1964) 35-86; D. A. Hagner, The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973) 21-132; R. Hvalvik, The Struggle for Scripture and Covenant: The Purpose of the Epistle of Barnabas and Jewish-Christian Competition in the Second Century (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1995) 109-44, 349-57; J. Reed, "The Hebrew Epic and the Didache" in The Didache in Context: Essays on Its Text, History, and Transmission, ed. C. N. Jefford (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995) 213-25; W. R. Schoedel, "Ignatius and the Archives," HTR 71 (1978) 97-106.

E. Ferguson

OLD TESTAMENT IN GENERAL EPISTLES

Rich in their appropriation of characters, events and imagery associated with Israel's history, the General Epistles reflect a conspicuous debt to the OT and to contemporary Jewish exegesis of the OT. The literary tendency of the General Epistles is to display their relationship to the OT through indirect allusions rather than direct citations (see Intertextuality). This is frequently found in the context of moral and hortatory instruction.

More so than the Pauline epistles (see DPL, Old Testament in Paul), many of which are formulated in explicitly theological or doctrinal terms, the General Epistles mirror the practical dimensions of moral tensions arising from the church's contact with surrounding culture. And unlike the Gospel narratives (see DPL, Old Testament in the Gospels), whose apologetic aim is to demonstrate that Jesus Christ fulfills the Law, the Prophets and the Writings, the General Epistles are paraenetic, alluding to the OT for the sake of ethical illustration. Where a Palestinian Jewish Christian substratum is evident, these epistles exhibit a stronger indebtedness to OT and Jewish tradition. By comparison, where a more Gentile social environment is suggested, the literary strategy of the writer calls for more numerous touch points with pagan culture.

Recent scholarship, stimulated by interest in Christian origins, Jewish apocalyptic* and the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Qumran), has devoted itself to the question of the NT writers' exegetical technique. Creative and penetrating interpretations can thus be seen to arise from the awareness that the writers of the NT are in conversation with Jewish contemporaries. Elucidating the extent to which the language and thought-world of both the OT and contemporary Judaism* pervade the General Epistles is the aim of the discussion that follows.

1. Literary Strategy and Exegetical Technique in the General Epistles
2. The Role of Typology in the General Epistles
3. The Old Testament in the General Epistles

1. Literary Strategy and Exegetical Technique in the General Epistles.

An investigation of NT dependence on the OT is no cut-and-dried matter. Intertextual* relationships are complex and often defy neat categorization. Even determining whether we are dealing with a quotation or an allusion is at times problematic. Moreover, the citation or allusion may be unidentified. Thus proof of literary borrowing can be elusive. The main lines of recent research have followed the question of exegetical method, particularly in tracing current Jewish exegetical practice in Pauline literature, Acts* and the Gospels (e.g., in the use of formula quotations, collections of OT texts [testimonia] and the role of the LXX in citation).

More recent attempts (e.g., Ellis and Bauckham) have been made to uncover the midrashic structure of passages in the General Epistles. Midrashic or paraphrastic use of the OT is typically applied to current events, with a scriptural allusion serving as a means of illustration or reapplication. Certain phenomena in the General Epistles are best understood in light of contemporary midrashic techniques and not merely the OT passage from which the tradition derives. A comparison of extrabiblical Jewish writings that are roughly contemporary to the NT documents offers material parallels.

NT writers refer to the OT in a diversity of ways and for a variety of reasons. For the purposes of the present discussion, several general categories of usage may be assigned.

The OT may be cited in a direct, literal-historical fashion, an illustration of which is James 2:11, a citation from the Decalogue. In this context the author reminds his readers of the Mosaic covenant's* ethical* imperatives that are still binding in the Jewish-Christian community. The historical connection is essential to this category of OT allusion. A similar instance may be found in 1 Peter 1:16, a reaffirmation of a Pentateuchal exhortation to holy conduct. In this sense the OT is not superseded by Christian revelation; it is presupposed as an abiding foundation. What was ethically prescribed by Yahweh is literally and fully binding.

Another category of appropriating the OT is typological. This genus of usage is primarily illustrative, without any necessary historical or organic correspondence. The General Epistles abound with such examples that become a part of the writer's pastoral theology and form the basis for a Christian ethical or paraenetic tradition.

A typological exegetical approach grows out of the conviction that contained within Israel's history are all the principal forms of divine activity that point to the ultimate purposes of God.* The theological center of this is the life, death and resurrection* of Jesus Christ (see Death of Christ). Beyond christological* or theological typology, however, lies moral typology. OT characters and events project themselves in ways that allow them to serve as paradigms in the Christian paraenetic tradition. The abundance of this category makes the General Epistles a rich and distinct contribution to the NT canon.

Much of the illustrative material in James, for example, consists of moral exhortation to endure as the people of God. With no direct or discernible OT passages in support, Abraham, Rahab, the prophets, Job and Elijah are cited as exemplars. (Extrabiblical Jewish traditions frequently fill in the gap in explaining the context of those particular references.) In 1 Peter, Sarah is the model wife, submissive to her husband's authority (1 Pet 3:6), while Noah is a paradigm of divine patience (1 Pet 3:20). In Jude and 2 Peter, the fallen angels, Sodom and Gomorrah, and Balaam function in the context of evocative warnings to the readers. Noah and Lot illustrate in 2 Peter the need for perseverance amid pagan surroundings, while unbelieving Israel, Cain, Korah and Michael the archangel are added to the catalog of paradigms in Jude. Most if not all of these are meaningful as they find reinterpretation and reapplication in extrabiblical Jewish literature (see Noncanonical Writings). The use of these paradigms in the General Epistles frequently has more in common with contemporary exegetical practice than they have with any OT passages to which they might be traced.

The moral and spiritual health of the community surfaces as a primary theme in the General Epistles. Admonitions to good works (James), patient endurance* (1 Peter), faithfulness (Jude), virtuous living (2 Peter) and undivided commitments (1 John) are the didactic trajectory of these epistles.

In addition to citations and allusions to OT material, the stylistic influence of the Hebrew Scriptures on Christian literary composition is extensive. Terms, phrases, literary forms and conventions all are reflected in the writings of the NT, even when the modern reader or the apostolic writer may not be consciously aware of their presence. This is particularly true of the General Epistles. James's use of the Septuagint in citing the OT, for example, may reflect both his immersion in the OT and his ability to adapt himself to Hellenistic cultural influences. The metaphor of the stone (1 Peter) intertwines OT imagery with more contemporary Jewish exegesis in the letter's commentary on the people of God. Furthermore, as "exiles of the Diaspora," Peter's audience struggles with the challenges of persecution* for the name* of Christ. And because the readers are exiles in the world,* continuity is established between the OT and Christian community. Jude and 2 Peter are written in a style and vocabulary that bespeak both an OT prophet as well as a literary master. The fiery imagination normally associated with prophetic judgment speeches in the OT engages the reader. Waterless clouds driven by the winds, fruitless trees, waves of the sea, wandering stars, slaves of corruption—the apostates are thus branded and stand under the irrevocable threat of divine judgment.* This judgment accords with a day of reckoning prophesied by the prophetic messengers of old, even when subtle linguistic nuances on the part of the writer suggest slightly different literary strategies at work in each epistle.

Of the General Epistles, only 2 John and 3 John fail to show strong evidence of dependency on the OT.

2. The Role of Typology in the General Epistles. Given the illustrative use of the OT in the General Epistles and the fact that these letters* have not received the attention accorded other NT books, we may appeal to two test cases for viewing the paraenetic use of typology.

2.1. 1 Peter. The first case involves a use of double typology in 1 Peter.* Throughout the epistle the readers are admonished that suffering* is a normative experience in the Christian journey. The literary strategy calls for marshaling evidence to support the thesis that patient endurance of suffering has a precedent and suffering is not an end in itself. To illustrate, Christ suffered on our behalf in order to bring us to God (1 Pet 3:18). However, while Christ suffered and was put to death, he also was made alive by the Spirit of God. Injected parenthetically into the writer's exhortation is a cryptic but rhetorically decisive pronouncement. Christ is portrayed as an end-time Enoch who was commissioned by God to preach to "the spirits in prison" (i.e., the enemies of God in the unseen world who became subject to Christ's conquest [1 Pet 3:19]). These enemies—"angels, authorities and powers"—are in the plan of God "subjected to" Christ the Lord, who reigns "at the right hand of God" (1 Pet 3:22). This awareness is critical for the readers, since they are presently suffering because of Christ's name. Yet their enemies, like the fallen angels, are subject to the same effects of Christ's work that brought his enemies under his feet. Suffering brought about unqualified victory.

Sandwiched within this literary context is a second use of typology. In this connection the writer employs a type from an earlier epoch in history to illustrate that "baptism now saves you" (1 Pet 3:21). Just as Noah and his family endured much persecution and abuse for their faithfulness in an unbelieving generation, so the Christian community is to be cognizant that perseverance leads to God's salvation.* In this way baptism* separates the church from the world. The generation of the first-century Christians is compared to the generation of Noah, both of which move to their appointed end. Just as few from the whole human race were rescued, so relatively few are to be saved from the current generation. The typology, however, relates the flood not to final judgment but to baptism. The water is symbolic: it serves as "the antitype which now saves you through baptism" (ho kai hymas antitypon nyn sōzei baptisma, 1 Pet 3:21; see Hymns). Baptism now saves, much as deliverance from slavery* lies in the past (1 Pet 1:18).

2.2. Jude. Literary strategy in Jude* calls for a rhetorically sophisticated use of triplets to illustrate the fate of the ungodly. After citing unbelieving Israel (Jude 5), the disenfranchised angels (Jude 6), and Sodom and Gomorrah (Jude 7) as types of apostasy* upon whom divine judgment fell, Jude introduces a second triplet of OT paradigms (Jude 11). These are objects of a woe cry or prophetic denunciation. Having blasphemed and rejected authority (Jude 8), the opponents, in contrast to Michael (Jude 9), have brought themselves under divine curse.

The text of Genesis 4 describes Cain bringing the "fruits" of the earth as an offering to the Lord (Gen 4:3), while his brother Abel is said to have brought the "firstborn" from his flock (Gen 4:4). The Lord subsequently looked with favor upon Abel but not Cain (Gen 4:5). To the Jewish mind Cain represents the epitome of wickedness. He is the first man in the Hebrew Scriptures to defy God and despise another person; hence he is prototypical, the "type and teacher" (Philo*) of ungodliness. Although there exists in the OT collectively a mixed review of Balaam, son of Beor, he is portrayed in the main as a negative memorial, having hired himself out to curse Israel. Greedy and self-serving, Balaam led Israel into idolatry* and immorality at Baal-Peor (Num 31:16). As a type Balaam "loved the wages of wickedness" (cf. 2 Pet 2:15). The third of this triad, Korah, is arguably the most arresting illustration of insubordination in all the OT. It is he who challenged the authority of Moses,* the man who talked with God. Moreover, siding with him were 250 among Israel's leaders (Num 16:17, 35). Korah's rebellion (antilogia) is symbolic of strife and contention. In its effect Korah's fate is commensurate with his deed.

For Jude's purposes this trio foreshadows the fate of those who blaspheme and demonstrate irreverence in the face of spiritual authority.* At first they depart, but ultimately they perish. With the cry of condemnation and the threat of divine vengeance hanging over their heads, Jude's opponents await the execution of certain judgment (see also 3.3 below).

3. The Use of the Old Testament in the General Epistles.

The extent to which the General Epistles exhibit a Semitic cast and literary relationship to the OT can be demonstrated by noting examples of the writers' exegesis. Although similarities in their use of the OT are evident, notable differences can be detected as well.

3.1. James. James's* discussion of the law* requires citing the OT (mē moicheusēs . . . mē phoneusēs, "do not commit adultery . . . do not murder," Jas 2:11) for two principal reasons—underscoring the unity of the law as well as one's final moral accountability to the lawgiver. Neglecting or breaking any part of the law is tantamount to disregarding the whole law. Why, in James's treatment of the law, does he quote central commandments?* His preceding discussion of partiality provides a clue (love* of one's neighbor), while the exhortations to good works that immediately follow intensify the emphasis on moral accountability for one's actions. Social conditions existing among James's audience may be such that the temptation to envy, hatred and murder are real. In sum, James is contending that the ethical foundations of Mosaic law are in no way set aside; rather they retain their full force in the life of the Christian community.

One feature of Jewish midrashic practice is alternating summary allusions to scriptural texts and related commentary (Longenecker, 36-37). James 2:23 appears to fit this pattern. Abraham,* as a moral paradigm, serves to illustrate a different point for James than he does for Paul (cf. Rom 4:3). In Pauline teaching belief in and of itself deserves God's commendation. For James faith validating itself through works is meritorious (see Faith and Works). Thus in the writer's mind the fulfillment of Scripture by Abraham ("Abram believed the Lord, and he credited it to him as righteousness," Gen 15:6) is the patriarch's works that lead ultimately to the binding of Isaac. This understanding, though it is not in opposition to the OT narrative, nevertheless shares with contemporary Judaism an interpretive shift. In addition, Abraham as the "friend of God," an idea that finds striking parallels in the Jewish apocrypha, can be deduced from 2 Chronicles 20:7 and Isaiah 41:8.

The rhetorical question framed in James 4:5-6 ("Or do you suppose that it is for nought that the Scripture says, 'God yearns jealously for the spirit that he has made to dwell in us'?") is reminiscent of Moses' response to Joshua in Numbers 11:29: "Are you jealous for my sake? I wish that all the Lord's people were prophets and that the Lord would put his Spirit on them!" The emphasis in Numbers is the manifestation of the Spirit's power; in James there is something of an interpretive shift. In a more generic sense, jealousy connotes friendship with God over against friendship with the world. A second midrashic citation of the OT follows, deriving from Proverbs 3:34: "The Lord resists the proud but gives grace to the humble." Mindful of the reality of judgment for sins not purged, the writer expresses with different words what was stressed earlier: mercy triumphs over judgment in the act of human repentance* and embrace of God's mercy* (cf. Jas 2:13; 5:1-8).

The words kai kalypsei plēthos hamartiōn ("will cover a multitude of sins") in James 5:20 are more a reminiscence than a citation of the OT (cf. Prov 10:12). Moreover, James has altered the subject of "to cover," while the sense in which the phrase is used is not immediately transparent. The context in which it occurs has to do with regulations in the congregation (e.g., Jas 2:1; 3:1; 4:11; much of Jas 5). Sins covered is meant to be the counterpoint to sins provoked—for example, those manifest through the tongue, hatred or partiality. In the author's line of reasoning, the restoration of the neighbor, an act that "covers sins," is the pastoral calling of the church and hence a vital service that it should render.

In addition there are numerous scattered resemblances or reminiscences to the OT in James. Among these are the language of humility and exaltation (Jas 1:9; cf. Job 5:11, 12; Prov 29:23); the imagery of the sun and heat in relation to riches (Jas 1:10-11; cf. Job 14:2; 24:24-25; 27:21; Ps 37:2, 14; 73:12; 78:18-20; 113:7-8; Is 40:6-7; Ezek 21:31); the language of testing (Jas 1:12; cf. Job 5:17); the sphere of riches (Jas

2:6; 5:1-2, 5; cf. Job 14:20-21; 20:22; 24:4-12); the language of sin and lust (Jas 1:5; cf. Ps 7:15); the world of the tongue (Jas 1:26; 3:5-6,8; cf. Ps 39:1; 82:14-15; 139:4; 141:3); speaking and listening (Jas 1:19; cf. Prov 11:12; 29:20); anger (Jas 1:19; cf. Prov 14:29; 16:32; 29:22); tomorrow's uncertainty (Jas 4:13-15; cf. Prov 27:1); partiality (Jas 2:9; cf. Prov 28:21); dishonoring the poor (Jas 2:6; cf. Prov 14:21); the association of a crown with endurance (Jas 1:12; cf. Zech 6:14); orphans and widows (Jas 1:27; cf. Is 1:17; Mal 3:5); the relationship of poverty of the world and faith (Jas 2:5; cf. Is 29:19); the triumph of mercy (Jas 2:13; cf. Mic 6:8; Jer 9:23); Abraham as the friend of God (Jas 2:23; cf. 2 Chron 20:7; Is 41:8); drawing near to God (Jas 4:5; cf. Zech 1:3); and the call to mourn (Jas 4:9; cf. Amos 8:10).

3.2. 1 Peter. 1 Peter 1:16, a citation of Leviticus 11:44 ("You shall be holy, for I am holy"), expresses the essence of Israel's identity as a nation and continued to have the same literal force in the early church (cf. Mt 5:48). Holiness* is required because it was commanded in the law of Moses. The ethical foundation for the Christian life is nothing less than that of the OT. The significance of the law transcends theonomic Israel.

The relationship of 1 Peter 1:24-25 to the OT (Is 40:6-8) is also evident. The citation "All flesh is like grass . . . the grass withers, the flower fades, but the word of the Lord endures forever" indicates that the writer is quoting from the Septuagint rather than the Hebrew text. The context of Isaiah 40 is the enduring purposes of God--the sure word of the Lord in the midst of changing and at times calamitous events in Israel's history. In 1 Peter the accent is similar. The author wishes to assert the efficacy of the word of God in contrast to all that changes and perishes.

A catena of OT citations and allusions accompanies the depiction of the people of God in 1 Peter 2. This includes references to Exodus 19:6; Isaiah 8:14, Isaiah 28:16 and Isaiah 43:20-21; Psalm 118:22; Hosea 1:9-10 and Hosea 2:23. The initial quotation about the cornerstone, with minor alterations, derives from Isaiah 28:16. Additional citations from Psalm 118:22 and Isaiah 8:14 incorporate the metaphor of the stone while midrashically supporting the broader theme of persecution and rejection. The stumbling and rejection are due to an unwillingness, not an inability, to believe. The rejected stone as the capstone (Ps 118:22) is applied by Jesus to himself (Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:17; see Stone, Cornerstone). Furthermore, all three of the citations in 1 Peter 2:6-8 are found elsewhere in the NT (Mt 21:42; Acts 4:11; Rom 9:33), while the christological application of the metaphor occurs also in Pauline literature (1 Cor 3:11; Eph 2:20). The reference at this point to "Zion" (1 Pet 2:6) is fitting, given that the writer has just described the temple* as made of "living stones." Its multiple use in the NT, including its Petrine application, indicates that the metaphor was fairly widespread in first-century Jewish exegesis.

The concept of the believing community as a building, although having noteworthy parallels in Qumran* literature, also has numerous traces in the OT: the "house"* of Israel (Ex 16:31; Lev 10:6; Num 20:29; Ruth 4:11; 2 Sam 1:12; 12:8; 16:3; Ps 98:3; 115:12; 135:19; Is 5:7; 46:3; Jer 2:26; 5:15; 9:26; Ezek 2:5; 3:1; cf. Mt 10:6) and the Lord's "house" (Num 12:7). The prophets utilize the imagery of a building or a house in denouncing Israel and Judah during times of corporate apostasy.

The notion of Israel as a nation of priests,* suggested in Exodus and Isaiah, is carried over and applied to spiritual Israel as well. All of Israel's history constitutes a loud proclamation that its people are "chosen" (cf. Exod 19:6; Deut 7:6; 14:2; 25:18; Is 43:20-21; Mal 3:17). In 1 Peter 2:5 we encounter not a citation but rather imagery called forth by an amalgam of OT allusions. Although the precise form of the OT reference is not reproduced in 1 Peter 2:4-10, the substance is. The final OT allusion in this exhortation to be the people of God derives from Hosea. In one sense the saints are the fulfillment of the prophetic promise.

In connection with the metaphor of priesthood, the idea of "spiritual sacrifices," prominent in Qumran, also surfaces in the OT: in Psalm 50:13, 14, 23, Psalm 51:17 and Psalm 141:2; Isaiah 1:11-17; Hosea 6:6; and Micah 6:6-8.

Turning to the broader theme of suffering (1 Pet 2:18-25), Peter quotes (1 Pet 2:22) from Isaiah 53:9: "He committed no sin, neither was there found any deceit in his mouth." In the Suffering Servant of Isaiah the writer finds a type of the suffering Christ, the "lamb without spot or blemish" (1 Pet 1:19; cf. Is 53:7): "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example [hypogrammos], so that you follow in his steps." The metaphor of the righteous sufferer is extended in 1 Peter 2:24, borrowing further from Isaiah 53:4, 11-12. In targumic fashion the writer supports allusion to one text with another to underscore the fact that suffering is redemptive in nature. In 1 Peter, Christ's example functions as an ethical paradigm; it is meant to yield an increase in righteous living (see Righteousness).

Extending the theme of suffering, in 1 Peter 3:10-12 the writer cites Psalm 34:13-17, reproducing the text of the Septuagint with the exception of a stylistic alteration: he changes the imperatives from second to third person. This quotation is meant to support the preceding admonition concerning well-doing (1 Pet 3:8-9). Material such as is cited almost verbatim from Psalm 34 was probably catechetical for the early Christian community. The admonition, moreover, is reminiscent of the Jewish-Christian wisdom* tradition that laces much of the epistle of James. Divine blessing* ultimately prevails upon those who control their speech and who do good.

Unlike the OT allusions in 1 Peter 2:22 and 1 Peter 3:10-12, 1 Peter 3:14 reflects little correspondence to Isaiah 8:12-13, from which it borrows. "Do not fear what they fear, and do not be afraid" in the mouth of the prophet is directed toward the people of Israel as they wilt before the threat of Assyria and its minions. In the prophet's eye the Lord Almighty is the one whom Israel should dread. The context in 1 Peter relates to the saints who are suffering for good. In Isaiah the oracle is delivered in the midst of prophetic rebuke; in 1 Peter the words are intended to convey blessing and encouragement for those being persecuted. What both passages have in common is the exhortation not to lean on human resources. The object of trust in Isaiah is the Lord Almighty; in 1 Peter it is Christ the Lord. Reverencing Christ the Lord has an apologetic thrust. It prepares the individual to "be ready at all times to give an answer [apologia] to anyone who inquires as to the reason for the hope within you" (1 Pet 3:15).

The final OT allusion in the epistle occurs in 1 Peter 4:8. Whereas in James 5:20 similar words constitute a reminiscence, here we have a citation ("Love covers a multitude of sins"). Peter has in mind the community of Christians, who are to be "good stewards of the manifold grace of God, serving one another." Love covers everything, that is, sins and wrongs in the community (see the parallel in 1 Cor 13). The proverbial statement rings forever true.

In sum, 1 Peter is replete with prophetic interpretation and paraenetic application, even when, as R. J. Bauckham (309) notes, the two are not always distinct from one another.

3.3. 2 Peter and Jude. Although OT allusions in 2 Peter* are not as numerous as they are in James, 1 Peter or Jude, they are noteworthy. Particularly important is the use of typology. The flood is frequently represented by Jewish literature as a prototype of eschatological judgment. Hence in 2 Peter, Noah and Lot become types of faithful Christians who are to expect deliverance. Noah's generation is prototypical of a faithless generation in Jesus' teaching as well (Mt 24:37-39; Lk 17:26-28). In Luke's Gospel, Noah's and Lot's generations appear side by side. Both are united by a common thread: life proceeding as normal in spite of pending judgment. While Noah is a herald of righteousness* in Jewish tradition, Lot is by no means a righteous model in the OT. Lot's "righteousness" (thrice he is depicted as dikaios, "righteous," in 2 Pet 2:4-10) is developed more in Jewish intertestamental literature, although it can be indirectly attributed to Abraham's pleading with God (Gen 18:16-33).

The double proverb in 2 Peter 2:22 consists of one part OT and one part extrabiblical tradition (the Egyptian Story of Ahiqar). The OT source is Proverbs 26:11: "As a dog returns to its vomit, so a fool repeats his folly." Although only the first clause is quoted, the readers are familiar with the saying and will appreciate its appropriateness to the situation. More important than citing from Jewish tradition material per se, in 2 Peter is the use of sources in general that will resonate with the audience. The epistle mirrors a pagan social environment; thus, in contrast to Jude, Jewish sources would be less effective in the development of a literary strategy.

While not a single explicit citation from the OT is found in Jude, the brief epistle is nevertheless replete with examples of prophetic typology. No fewer than nine subjects—unbelieving Israel, the fallen angels, Sodom and Gomorrah, Michael the archangel, Moses, Cain, Balaam, Korah and Enoch—are employed by the writer in a polemic against ungodly antitypes who through stealth have infiltrated the community. These ungodly persons are the focus of Jude's invective.

