b) In Num. 32:11-12 (cf. Num. 14:24; Deut. 1:36; Josh. 14:8-9, 14; I Kings 11:6), Caleb and Joshua, in contrast to the disobedient Israelites, are described as having "filled after" God (מלאו אחרי יהוה; LXX συνεπηκολούθησαν)—i.e., "wholly followed" him (so RSV). If this is the meaning, it is partly paralleled in the NT by Rev. 3:2: "I have not found your works perfect [lit., 'filled'] in the sight of my God" (cf. the use of τελειόω, in connection with implementing by action, in Jas. 2:22; I John 2:5; 4:12, 17-18).

So in Col. 4:17, Archippus is bidden: "See that you fulfil the ministry"—i.e., carry it through to completion, do it thoroughly (cf. Rom. 15:19: "I have fully preached the gospel," and so Col. 1:25; and Acts 12:25; 13:25; 14:26; but in Acts 19:21 the phrase merely means when this was finished—i.e., "after these events"). So, too, in II Thess. 1:11 the prayer is that God may "fulfil every good resolve"—i.e., enable them to put their good resolves into effect (cf. II Cor. 10:6, of obedience). "Completing by action," "implementing," and so "doing wholeheartedly" seem to be the connotations of such uses.

On the other hand, it is just possible that in the passages cited above, Num. 32:11-12, etc., the Hebrew phrase "fill after" means "corroborate." This may be suggested by I Kings 1:14, where Nathan instructs Bathsheba to speak to David, and then, says Nathan: "I will come in after you and will fill your words"—i.e., "confirm your words" (so RSV). But it is to be noted that "I will come in after you and fill" is not strictly analogous to "they filled after God," and it may be that the two idioms are distinct. Possibly the meaning here may even be "tell the whole story."

c) Very important is the famous passage Col. 1:24: "Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and in my flesh I complete [ἀνταναπληρῶ] what is lacking [τὰ ὑστερήματα] in Christ's afflictions for the sake of his body, that is, the church." For details of the long debate over these words, see the Commentaries.

For the present purpose it is sufficient to note that it is possible that one of the ideas entering into the word "complete" may be that which appears under a above—viz., of a destined tale of sufferings to be entered into by those who are persecuted, just as a destined tale of sins is ironically allotted to the persecutors. In any case, it is clear that the message of the NT as a whole keeps inviolate the completeness and efficacy of the cross of Christ, while at the same time closely associating the apostles, and the whole church, with the implementing and the entering into what God has thus done in Christ. In a sense, but only in this qualified sense, the work of Christ is "incomplete" until thus "completed." For the idea of Christians' being brought to completeness (Eph. 3:19; Col. 2:10), see PLEROMA.

d) The verb is used to describe God as "filling" heaven and earth, in Jer. 23:24 (cf. Isa. 6:3[?]; Wisd. Sol. 1:7: "The Spirit of the Lord has filled the world"; and in Eph. 4:10 "that he might fill all things" is said of Christ). For the relation of this thought to the idea of the divine immanence and to Greek philosophic concepts, and for its relevance to the interpretation of "Pleroma," see PLEROMA.

But it is most obviously in relation to the "fulfilment" of the Old Dispensation in the New that the verb calls for notice in the NT.

Here it may make for clarity if certain aspects of the meaning and use of "fulfil" are defined, before the data are examined.

a) "Fulfil" can be related, both in Greek and in Semitic languages, to the Law and to the Prophets alike. It can signify the observing or meeting of the full requirements of the law (cf., of human requirements, Phil. 4:19: "My God will supply [lit., 'fill'] every need of yours"; and see b above); and it can also signify the bringing about of something which had been predicted (in which sense it is not far from the sense "confirm," "corroborate," discussed above). Note that τελεῖν and τελειοῦν, as well as πληροῦν, are used in both these senses (e.g., John 4:34; 19:28).

It will at once be evident that Jesus marks the confluence of these two senses. Insofar as the Law bears witness to the will of God as an ideal yet to be achieved, and the Prophets hold out hope of a time coming when it shall be fulfilled, one who perfectly fulfils the will of God confirms also the predictions of prophecy.

b) Sentences in the NT containing the verb range from the simple indicative statement (Matt. 2:17: "then was fulfilled what was spoken by the prophet") to the apparently predestinarian phrases such as: "All this took place to fulfil what the Lord had spoken by the prophet" (Matt. 1:22).

The Semitic mind is notoriously prone to blur the distinction (which to the Western mind seems to exist) between final and consecutive clauses. It would be rash, in reading the NT, always to press a Greek final clause to mean what it might mean if it were unaffected by Semitic thought. But it is probably something more than idiom or way of thought that is involved here. In the last resort, a phrase like "all this took place to fulfil" bears witness to the paradox that the Incarnation is the meeting place of free will and predestination. That "the Son of man must [δεῖ] suffer" is not contradicted, but rather complemented, by the declaration: "I lay down my life . . . . No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord" (John 10:17-18). In negative form, Acts 13:27 (if the sentence is not corrupt) expresses the tragic irony of the religious authorities' failing to recognize either who Jesus was or what the Prophets meant, and thus fulfilling the Prophets by condemning Jesus. All this, however, is not to deny that one side of the paradox is more clearly visible in some passages and the other in others: the balance is not always evenly held.

With these preliminary observations, the data may be examined more closely.

a) Matt. 5:17 ff may be an instance of the convergence of the two senses of "fulfilment," as applied respectively to Law and Prophets: "Think not that I have come to abolish the law and the prophets; I have come not to abolish them but to fulfil them. For truly, I say to you, till heaven and earth pass away, not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the law until all is accomplished." On the face of it, the saying appears to be at the extreme "legalistic" end of the traditions about Jesus. If some traditions show him to have been a revolutionary, challenging the Mosaic law in the name of a higher authority, this saying, by contrast, seems to place an almost rabbinic emphasis on the importance of the meticulous observance of the law. "Whoever then," it continues, "relaxes one of the least of these commandments and teaches men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven; but he who does them and teaches them shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I tell you, unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven." It seems plausible, certainly, to attribute such words to the distorting influence of a strongly Judaic type of Christian community, traces of which are to be found elsewhere also. On this showing, it is simply a biased form of some saying of Jesus, the original form of which is lost. On the other hand, is it not conceivable that it represents fairly faithfully an "extreme" saying of the Lord himself, designed in so emphatic a form precisely in order to correct a misapprehension that the way of life he taught and showed was morally less exacting than that of the rabbis? On this showing, it would mean that Jesus' way of life—even if in detail it proved to involve breaches of the letter of the law (such as sabbath rules)—would in essence prove to be an "establishing" or "corroborating" of the law. And (as has already been said) if it was by "fulfilling" the prophecies of the coming of the kingdom of God that Jesus thus, in a new and deeper sense, "fulfilled" also the law, it is possible to recognize here a widely inclusive saying, combining the two senses of "fulfil"—namely, that of accomplishing a command and that of bringing true a prediction.

This leads on to "until all is accomplished" (vs. 18). Does this mean that all the requirements of the law (every dot of an "i," every cross of a "t") are going to be "fulfilled" (in literal obedience to every smallest item)? Or does it mean that the Mosaic law will remain in force until all Christ's ministry is accomplished, and will then be superseded and rendered obsolete (cf. Heb. 10:9-10, where στήσῃ, "establish," is similar to πληροῦν)? The former seems by far the more natural sense (and cf. vs. 19). But, if so, must it not be interpreted to mean that Christ's new "law" fulfils the old law by for the first time fully accepting and performing God's will, rather than by literally carrying out its detailed observances? At any rate, to be considered side by side with this saying is Matt. 3:15 (Christ to the Baptist, who demurs to baptizing him): "Let it be so now; for thus it is fitting for us to fulfil all righteousness." Christ's obedience in humbly accepting baptism is a way of fulfilling all God's just requirements—again, perfect obedience is seen as including within it all that was expressed in the minutiae of the law. For illustration of this description of total obedience in terms of the fulfilling of the (spirit and intention of the) Mosaic law, cf. Rom. 8:4 ("in order that the just requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh but according to the Spirit"); 13:8 ("he who loves his neighbor has fulfilled the law"; cf. vss. 9-10; and see PLEROMA); Gal. 5:14 ("The whole law is fulfilled in one word, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself' ").

b) Extreme instances of the "predestinarian" presentation of the fulfilment of prophecy include the already cited Matt. 1:22 ("to fulfil")—a recurrent formula in Matthew (see 2:15, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; cf. 26:56)—and John 19:24 ("This was to fulfil the scripture"), 28 ("Jesus, knowing that all was now finished, said [to fulfil the scripture], 'I thirst' "). Also, the theme of the blindness of unbelievers is viewed as the fulfilment of what was predicted and had to be (Mark 4:11-12; John 12:37-43). In the above instances, and in others like them, the level at which the fulfilment of the OT is seen varies considerably, from the superficial and merely verbal (e.g., Matt. 13:35, a play by the evangelist on the word "parable") to the profoundest principles of the relation of one personality to another (Matt. 12:17 ff).

But this "predestinarian" presentation is (as has been shown) balanced by a clear stress on the freedom of Christ's own will and the responsibility of his hearers; and an impressive pointer to the truth underlying both extremes is to be found in such a phrase as "his departure [ἔξοδος], which he was to accomplish [πληροῦν] at Jerusalem" (Luke 9:31). Here is the new Moses, who, by "departing" from this life voluntarily, in the pursuit of God's will, was to achieve the Exodus, the destined rescue of the people of God, of which the exodus of the old Moses was a foreshadowing. So in Luke 22:16 he looks forward to the fruition of the real Passover, when the kingdom of God has been fully brought into being.

In short, the essence of prophecy is the interpretation of the will of God. And when he comes who perfectly, and not only by external conformity but also with his whole soul, achieves that will, he necessarily acts in such a way as to fulfil the predictions on their deepest level. Jesus, and the Cross and the Resurrection, are "about Isa. 53" even more than Isa. 53 is "about Jesus"; for the Crucifixion is the achievement of God's will in that redemptive suffering which the prophet had been granted to adumbrate. Accordingly, the two formulas "Then was fulfilled" and "All this took place to fulfil" coincide here, and here supremely. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev. 19:10).

c) The fulfilment of time is viewed in the NT in the light of the Incarnation as an aspect of the fulfilling of the Old Dispensation in the New. When Jesus first appeared publicly at the beginning of his ministry, his message was: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand" (Mark 1:15; cf. Gal. 4:4; Eph. 1:10). Thus, within the ministry itself, Jesus is shown in the Fourth Gospel as working to a divine plan, and refusing to act until the right moment has come (John 2:4; 7:30; 13:1). Further, beyond the ministry there is also seen a "divine timetable," related always to the Incarnation as the central point of history, and working itself out in terms of the fulfilling of God's purposes: there is a certain period for the Gentile domination, a destined quota of messianic woes, and a proper time for the ultimate consummation (Luke 21:24; Eph. 1:10; II Thess. 2:6; I Tim. 6:15; I Pet. 1:5; Rev. 6:11; 10:7; 11:18; 15:1, 8; 20:3; 22:10); cf. Col. 1:24 above. One of the most pregnant phrases in this connection is in Eph. 1:9-10, relating the Incarnation both to the full time and to the inclusive fulfilment of all God's purposes in Christ: "For he has made known to us in all wisdom and insight the mystery of his will, according to his purpose which he set forth in Christ as a plan for the fulness of time, to unite [ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι] all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth." See the Commentaries, especially on ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι. See also SEASONS; TIME. For the meaning of the phrase ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι τὰς ἡμέρας (τὴν ἡμέραν), in Luke 9:51: "When the days drew near," and in Acts 2:1: "When the day . . . had come," see the Commentaries.

Bibliography. J. Dupont, Gnosis (1949), ch. 7; H. Ljungman, Das Gesetz erfüllen (1954); W. D. Davies, Mélanges bibliques

(in honor of A. Robert; 1957); G. le Grelle, S.J., Nouvelle Revue Théologique, 81.3 (Mar., 1959), pp. 232 ff.

C. F. D. MOULE

FULLER [כובס; LXX and NT γναφεύς, from root to card]. One who thickens and shrinks newly shorn wool and newly woven cloth, after cleansing it of natural oils. The word is sometimes used also for one who cleans or dyes the cloth or the garment. Perhaps he also traded in textiles.

The Hebrew כבס (Akkadian kabašu), "to tread," indicates the basic method of washing cloth (Exod. 19:10; II Sam. 19:24; etc.). The cloth was also beaten for cleansing purposes. Bleaching by the sun was the final stage. Such was the use of the fuller's field (II Kings 18:17). In Roman times the fuller was also the cleaner. There was a tax on his work. In Pompeii there is mention of a fullers' guild.

Soap was not used in OT times, but borith or the ashes of borith were used as an alkaline cleanser, just as among Assyrians and Hittites (Mal. 3:2). Water was necessary, so the fuller located his plant near a water supply (Isa. 36:2, etc.). Because of its unwelcome odors the fuller's plant was usually outside the city gates.

In OT times the concept of a fuller's cleansing is used metaphorically of persons who are cleansed of evil (Ps. 51:7; Jer. 2:22; 4:14). White garments were used for religious festivals, and they required special cleansing (Zech. 3:3; Rev. 4:4; etc.). The Messenger of the Lord is a refiner or a fuller (Mal. 3:2). In the NT the garments of the transfigured Christ are whiter than any fuller could make them (Mark 9:3; cf. Matt. 17:2).

See also DYEING; LYE.

C. U. WOLF

FULLER'S FIELD [שדה כובס]. In suburban Jerusalem, a place accessible by means of a road which passed near the canal of the Upper Pool. It is mentioned in connection with the interview of Isaiah and Ahaz (Isa. 7:3), and the meeting of the officers of Hezekiah with the commander of Sennacherib's army (II Kings 18:17; Isa. 36:2). The location of the Fuller's Field is linked with that of the Upper Pool, which was part of the network of canals and reservoirs drawing their water from Gihon (see GIHON [SPRING]; POOL; SILOAM). Accordingly, the Fuller's Field has been tentatively identified with the area adjoining the Bir Ayyub (see EN-ROGEL), or with an area below the S end of the city of David, close to an ancient fuller's plant (see FULLER). Josephus' "Monument of the Fuller" (War V.147) might suggest for the Fuller's Field a location outside the N wall of Jerusalem under the monarchy, which is improbable for contextual reasons. See JERUSALEM § 6*c*.

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I (1907), 105; II (1908), 127. J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 334 ff. H. Vincent, Jérusalem de l'Ancien Testament, II (1956), 645.

G. A. BARROIS

FULNESS. See PLEROMA.

FULNESS OF TIME. A phrase used to translate πλήρωμα τῶν καιρῶν in Eph. 1:10, and πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου in Gal. 4:4 KJV. In both passages reference is being made to the final fruition of God's purposes for men and history. The RSV translates the phrase in Gal. 4:4: "When the time had fully come" (i.e., the time appointed by God for the fulfilment of his purposes).

See also ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT; PLEROMA.

J. KNOX

FUNERAL. This is not a biblical term. For discussion of customs and beliefs relating to last rites, see BIER; BURIAL; EMBALMING; IMMORTALITY; MOURNING; RESURRECTION; DEAD, ABODE OF THE; TOMBS.

FURLONG. The measure of distance used consistently in the KJV to translate στάδιον (II Macc. 12:9-10; Luke 24:13; John 6:19; 11:18; Rev. 14:20; 21:16). In II Maccabees and Revelation, the RSV has the plural "stadia." Elsewhere it interprets in terms of miles. A stadion was 215.5 yards; a furlong is 220 yards. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § D4*e*.

O. R. SELLERS

FURNACE. Furnaces in the biblical period were made of brick or stone and varied considerably in size and plan, from the small types used in domestic industries to large commercial smelters such as those of Solomon at Ezion-geber (see § 3 below).* The necessary parts of a furnace are a fire box or chamber, flue (for natural or forced draft), area or chambers for the material to be fired, and an opening to give access to the interior. The primary uses of the furnace were: (a) smelting or reducing ore (see REFINER); (b) melting ore for casting or heating it for forging (see METALLURGY); (c) firing pottery and other ceramic objects (see POTTERY); (d) firing bricks (see BRICKKILN; BRICK); (e) making LIME. Fig. MET 43.

1. Terminology. While absolute distinctions are difficult to make, a clarification of biblical terminology will be helpful. The smelting and the melting or heating furnace seem to be indicated by the Hebrew word כור (Deut. 4:20; I Kings 8:51; Prov. 17:3; 27:21; Isa. 48:10; Jer. 11:4; Ezek. 22:18, 20, 22); kilns are indicated by כבשן (Gen. 19:28; Exod. 9:8, 10; 19:18) or possibly מלבן (see BRICKKILN). The Aramaic אתון (Dan. 3:6-26—G 3:6-93) probably corresponds to כור. All these terms are embraced by the Greek word κάμινος, which always translates them in the LXX except in I Kings 8:51, where כור is rendered by a special term χωνευτήριον, a furnace for smelting metal.

To be distinguished from the preceding class is the תנור (κλίβανος, an OVEN made of pottery which was used in BAKING. תנור is translated by "furnace" four times in the KJV (Gen. 15:17; Neh. 3:11; 12:38; Isa. 31:9); in the RSV it is changed to "fire pot" in Gen. 15:17 and "oven" in Neh. 3:11; 12:38, but elsewhere left as "furnace." In Neh. 3:11; 12:38 one of the designated towers of Jerusalem's walls is designated מגדל תנורים, "Tower of the Ovens." See OVENS, TOWER OF THE.

Also translated by "furnace" is עליל (Ps. 12:6—H 12:7), the meaning of which is uncertain. The translation "furnace" for מוקד (Ps. 102:3—H 102:4) is arbitrary (cf. Isa. 33:14, where it is rendered "burnings").

The distinction between κάμινος, "furnace" (Matt. 13:42, 50; Rev. 1:15; 9:2), and κλίβανος, "oven"

(Matt. 6:30; Luke 12:28), is preserved in the NT.

2. The figurative sense. "Furnace" and related figures such as "crucible," "refining," along with various metals and combustible materials and "fire," appear in a variety of contexts meaning generally "to prove, try, test." The Egyptian captivity is spoken of as an "iron furnace" (Deut. 4:20; I Kings 8:51; cf. Jer. 11:4), "iron" here referring to the quality of the ordeal. Yahweh refines his people in the "furnace of affliction"—i.e., in the Captivity (Isa. 48:10; cf. Prov. 17:3; 27:21; Ecclus. 2:5). The figure is developed at length in Jer. 6:27-30. Ezekiel depicts the wrath of God as the hot blast of the smelter's furnace (22:17-22). The testing of the smith's products consists in tempering and forging them (Ecclus. 31:26 Amer. Trans.; cf. 38:28) and the proving of the potter's vessels in their firing (27:5). On the other hand, the promises of Yahweh are sure because they are refined like silver (Ps. 12:6—H 12:7).

The persecutions of Maccabean times are symbolized in the fiery ordeal of the three young men in Dan: 3:8-30 (cf. IV Macc. 16:21; Jos. Antiq. X.x.5; I Clem. 45:7), which has its Christian counterpart in the martyrdom of Polycarp (Martyrdom of Polycarp 15:2). This figure is readily applied to the trial which prepares for life after death (Wisd. Sol. 3:6; Jas. 1:12; I Pet. 1:7) or eschatological judgment (Matt. 13:42, 50; cf. I Cor. 3:10-15; Rev. 14:10-11; 16:8-9).

3. Archaeological evidence. The discovery of the huge smelters of King Solomon at Tell el-Kheleifeh (Ezion-geber) and smaller refineries to the N in the Wadi Arabah provide good patterns for the type of industrial furnace in use in the Iron Age. A smaller furnace was found at Tell Qasile near Tell Aviv. For a description of the Arabah, Ezion-geber, and Tell Qasile furnaces, see METALLURGY §§ 4-6.

Three wishbone-shaped kilns were discovered at Megiddo. The draft in this case entered under the door, blew through both arms of the furnace, and escaped in a double flue at the rear. Pottery was found stacked in two of these kilns as though packed for firing. In size the Megiddo kilns are nearly ten by eight feet over-all. Kilns have also been found at Gaza and Tell en-Nasbeh (Mizpah?) which differ slightly in plan from those mentioned above.

It is entirely possible that furnaces such as those at Tell Qasile, Megiddo, and Tell en-Nasbeh were used for both metalwork and firing ceramics and brick. Lime kilns were less elaborate, to judge from one found at Beth-zur; it still contained a mound of calcined rocks.

Bibliography. F. Petrie, Ancient Gaza, vol. I (1931), p. 6, pls. 6:5, 52:1. P. L. O. Guy, Megiddo Tombs (1938), pp. 75-78, figs. 84, 89. N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan (1940), chs. 3-4. W. F. Albright, Tell Beit Mirsim, vol. II (AASOR, vol. XVII [1936-37], pl. 40:7-8 (cf. pl. 31:7); III (AASOR, vols. XXI-XXII [1941-43]), 110. C. C. McCown, Tell en-Nasbeh (1947), p. 258, pl. 100, figs. 52B, 60. C. Singer et al., eds. A History of Technology (1954), pp. 391-97, 577. G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 132-35. R. W. FUNK

FURNACES, TOWER OF THE. See OVENS, TOWER OF THE.

FURNITURE. 1. כלי, "utensil, implement." This term refers to the total of the furnishings of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:9; 40:9), the tent of meeting (Exod. 31:7 KJV [RSV "furnishings"]; 39:33 KJV [RSV "utensils"]; I Chr. 9:29 [KJV "vessels"]), or a house (Neh. 13:8; KJV "stuff"). The KJV translates the term as "furniture" also (RSV "utensils") when it refers to the utensils of the table in the tabernacle (Exod. 31:8), of the lampstand (31:8; 35:14), and of the altar of burnt offering (31:9). The phrase כלי חמדה (Nah. 2:9—H 2:10), "precious thing," is translated "pleasant furniture" by the KJV.

2. KJV translation of כר (RSV SADDLE) in Gen. 31:34. E. M. GOOD

FURROW. The translation of גדוד (Ps. 65:10—H 65:11), מענה (I Sam. 14:14; Ps. 129:3), and תלם (Job 31:38; 39:10; Hos. 12:11). Two words are incorrectly translated "furrow" in the KJV: עונה (Hos. 10:10) is better "iniquity" (so RSV), and ערוגה (Ezek. 17:7, 10) is better "branch" or "bed" (so RSV). See ACRE; PLOW. O. R. SELLERS

G

GAAL gā′əl [געל]. Son of Ebed (Obed?). He incited the city of Shechem to revolt against its king Abimelech in premonarchical Israel (Judg. 9:26-41). Abimelech, son of Jerubbaal (Gideon) and a Shechemite woman, slew his seventy brothers in a bold coup d'état and established himself as king of Shechem, installing Zebul as his resident prefect, while he himself dwelt at Arumah. When Gaal and his kinsmen, who appear to have been Canaanites, moved to Shechem, Gaal incited the citizens to overthrow the half-Israelite Abimelech and to restore a native Canaanite ruler. Informed by Zebul of the plot and instructed how best to marshal his forces, Abimelech ambushed the city during the night and routed Gaal and his followers in an encounter the next morning. Gaal fled for safety within the walls of Shechem, but he and his clansmen were promptly expelled by Zebul. E. R. DALGLISH

GAASH gā′ăsh [געש]. 1. Mount Gaash (Josh. 24:30). The tomb of Joshua was at TIMNATH-SERAH in the hill country of Ephraim and N of Mount Gaash. From its association with Timnath-serah Mount Gaash is to be sought ca. twenty miles SW of Shechem.

2. The brooks of Gaash (נחלי געש), the home of one of David's warriors (II Sam. 23:30; I Chr. 11:32). Probably the reference is to a region of valleys in the vicinity of Mount Gaash. W. L. REED

GABA. KJV alternate form of GEBA.

GABAEL găb′ī əl [Γαβαήλ; Vulg. Gabelus]. 1. One of the ancestors of Tobit (Tob. 1:1).

2. The brother or son of Gabrias, and the man with whom Tobias had left the deposit of money which Tobias set out to recover (Tob. 1:14; 4:20; 10:2). Invited by Raphael, he brought the money bags, with their seals unbroken, to the marriage feast of Tobias and Sarah (9:2-6). J. C. SWAIM

GABAON găb′ī ən. Douay Version form of GIBEON.

GABATHA găb′ə thə [Γαβαθα] (Add. Esth. 12:1). One of two eunuchs of Ahasuerus whose conspiracy against him was discovered and revealed by Mordecai. See BIGTHAN.

GABBAI găb′ī [גבי] (Neh. 11:8). A Benjaminite dwelling in Jerusalem after the Exile. The text, however, is probably corrupt and possibly should be emended in accordance with vs. 14 to read גברי חיל, "mighty men of valor." M. NEWMAN

GABBATHA găb′ə thə [Γαββαθά or (TR) Γαββαθᾶ, indeclinable; transliteration of uncertain Aramaic term, perhaps גבחתא, open space, or גבתא, height; given as the "Hebrew" (i.e., Aramaic) of λιθόστρωτον, paved area, which in the LXX translated רצפה or רצפה]. The paved court before the palace of Herod in Jerusalem, where the governor held court seated upon the high bema.

The term appears only once in the Bible, in John 19:13, although its Greek equivalent appears a few times. In the gospel, Gabbatha is the setting for the public trial of Jesus before the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate. It obviously lay outside the governor's residence (praetorium), the site of which has not been certainly identified. Since the Middle Ages some have held that Gabbatha is to be located near the present citadel where Herod the Great had built a castle, inside the W wall. No paved court has yet been discovered there. The site now favored is that adjacent to Herod's Tower of ANTONIA, called by Theodosius (A.D. 530) the "house of Pilate." This identification is all the more inviting because of the ancient pavement to be seen in the basement of the Convent of Our Lady of Zion. An extensive lithostroton, or paved court, whose central area measures about 2,500 square yards, has been excavated here.* Each paving stone is more than a yard square and a foot thick; some are marked for gaming and others are cut for drainage. The court extends eastward, beneath the Convent of the Flagellation. In the time of Jesus this paved court lay outside the N city wall. The later walls of Herod Agrippa I and Hadrian enclosed this pavement NW of the Antonia. It may have been in the latter reign also that a triple triumphal arch was built in this "Gabbatha" area, now known anachronistically as the Ecce Homo Arch (cf. John 19:5). Its large central arch now spans the traditional Via Dolorosa. Its N arch forms the choir of the Ecce Homo Church built about 1870 in the Convent of Our Lady of Zion. It is necessary to gain admission to this convent in order to see the lithostroton, plausibly the Gabbatha of John 19:13. Fig. ANT 36.

Bibliography. M. Burrows, BA, I (1938), 17-19; C. C. Torrey, ZAW, 65 (1953), 232-33; L. H. Vincent, Jérusalem de l'AT (1954), pp. 216-21. K. W. CLARK

GABDES. KJV Apoc. form of GEBA.

GABRIAS gā′brĭ əs [Γαβρίας=גבריא]. Brother (Tob. 1:14) or father (4:20) of Gabael, with whom Tobit had left the money Tobias went to recover.

J. C. SWAIM

GABRIEL gā′brĭ əl [גבריאל, from גבר, man or strong, plus אל, God, hence man of God, or God has shown himself mighty; Γαβριήλ]. A celestial being, first appearing in a vision as a man (אדם; Dan. 8:16) and called "the man [האיש] Gabriel" (9:21; see ANGEL). He functions to reveal that which is to come in the Day of Judgment, to make known a vision (8:17), and to give understanding (שבל) and wisdom (בין; 9:22).

In the pseudepigraphical literature he receives great attention. His title and position become more explicit. He is one of the four presences (I Enoch 40: 3) who look down from heaven (9:1). He is one of the Lord's glorious ones (II Enoch 21:3), one of the holy angels (I Enoch 20:7). He sits at the left hand of God (II Enoch 24:1) and is set over all powers (I Enoch 40:9).

His function is also defined. He is no longer only the revealer, as in Daniel, but is the primary intercessor (I Enoch 9:1; 40:6; II Enoch 21:3). His work is of a less partisan nature than that of MICHAEL; but his work includes an element of severity: He must destroy the wicked (I Enoch 9:9-10) and cast the wicked into the furnace that God may be avenged (54:6).

The NT references show him to be both revealer and bringer of reassurance. In Luke 1:11-20 he appears to announce the birth of John (cf. Judg. 13:3). In Luke 1:26-38 he announces the birth of a son to Mary. He is one who stands in the presence of God (1:19), and can therefore reassure: "Do not be afraid, . . . for your prayer is heard" (vs. 13); "Do not be afraid, Mary, for you have found favor with God" (vs. 30). An allusion is made to Gabriel in Rev. 8:2, though not by name, as one of those who stand before God.

The Targ. magnifies the importance of Gabriel; he is introduced into narratives of a much earlier period. He leads Joseph to his brothers (Gen. 37:15), with Michael he participates in the burial of Moses (Deut. 34:6), and he is sent by the Lord to destroy the armies of Sennacherib (II Chr. 32:21).

In a characteristically Hebraic sense, where the messenger is, there God is fully present. Gabriel acts as a messenger (מלאך) before he is understood as an angel, revealing the graciousness and powerful purpose of the One who sends him.

W. BRUEGGEMANN

GAD găd [גד, to penetrate; actually the name of a deity of fortune (cf. Isa. 65:11); according to others, originally the name of a person, a shortened verbal form (perfect tense)]; GADITE găd'ĭt [גדי]. The seventh son of Jacob, and the heros eponymos of the tribe of Gad. Born of Leah's personal maid Zilpah (Gen. 30:11), Gad was the older full brother of Asher; this fact is always evident in the enumeration of the sons together, wherein the precedence is given to Gad (Gen. 35:26; 46:16; Exod. 1:4; I Chr. 2:2).

Gad is occasionally confused with the geographical name Gilead, which is itself ambiguous. Why the tribe was considered of inferior rank is beyond our cognizance; perhaps the situation of the colonial land compelled it to make all kinds of concessions to the native population. The connection with the Leah group, indicated in the descent from Zilpah, is attested by the joint settlement with Reuben. Like Reuben, Gad crossed over the Jordan from the W (for the general proof for this theory of colonization, see MANASSEH). That Gad originally attempted at one time to gain a foothold in the land W of the Jordan is probably indicated by the Judean place name Migdal-gad in the district of Lachish (Josh. 15:37)—an additional indication, moreover, of the genetic relationship with the Leah group. Gad crossed the Jordan with the remnants of Reuben, perhaps, if the latter did not follow later. In any case, it is noteworthy that Num. 32 grants precedence to the Gadites ahead of the Reubenites almost throughout, while Josh. 13 re-establishes the traditional sequence; however, the sequence may be geographically or numerically determined. Of more significance is the observation that the lists presented in the two chapters (twice, indeed, in Num. 32: vs. 3 and vss. 34-38) divide the places differently between the two tribes. In so doing the greater originality belongs once more to Num. 32, since Josh. 13 divides the settlement territory of the two tribes quite schematically into a S half for Reuben and a N for Gad. That this is an artificial division is shown by the designation of Dibon (Dhiban) as Dibon-gad in Num. 33:45 ff. This designation agrees best with the information in 32:34, according to which the Gadites rebuilt Dibon, and also Aroer, which, since it is not more specifically designated, everyone must have identified with the well-known place on the Arnon. The redactor of Josh. 13:25 only secondarily has made Aroer a place "across from" or even "east of" Rabbah (=Rabbath-ammon, 'Amman). So also Gadite Ataroth, mentioned between Dibon and Aroer in Num. 32:34, is unanimously identified with Khirbet 'Attarus, nine miles S of Baal-meon (Ma'in), the most southerly Reubenite village. Actually the settlements of Gad and Reuben are manifestly to be thought of as mingled together, and even the arrangement in Num. 32 may be only approximately correct. In any case, the old description of the Gad border, dating from the period before the kings and preserved in Josh. 13:16, 26-27*b*, along with the more recent list of places (town list), appears also to outline only a single territory which, presumably, was designated as Gad, a potiori. Substantiating this point of view is the fact that in the time of Omri and Ahab, King Mesha of Moab (see Mesha Inscription, line 10) knew nothing else than that "since primitive times the people of Gad resided in the land of Ataroth." He does not mention Reuben at all; the Israelites E of the Dead Sea are simply Gadites to him. As a matter of fact, according to the list of places in Num. 32:34-36, the territory of Gad extends from Dibon and Aroer in the S to Jogbehah (Khirbet Jubeihah) in the NE and Beth-nimrah (Tell Bleibil) in the NW and thus includes the Reubenite sites of vss. 37-38.

There can scarcely be any doubt that Gad's original possession turned out poorly. Obviously it involved, at first, only the W edge of the land E of the Jordan, the wooded slope of the plateau of Belka, in which there were few cities which might be able to halt them. The slope did, however, afford sufficient opportunities for the cattle herders coming up out of the valley of the Jordan. The task which Gad set for itself, as well as for Reuben, whose fate was bound up with its own in the later course of its history, was to gain a place also on the Moabite-

Ammonite plateau. At first the conditions of living were rather meager. The Jephthah tradition throws a significant light on it. Jephthah had to earn his living abroad. His fellow tribesmen called him back from there when they could use him in their oppression by the little Ammonite people. Jephthah came from "Gilead" (Judg. 12:7), which might, in a narrower sense, mean the region around present-day Khirbet Jel'ad, S of the Jabbok, if the name is not, as in the Song of Deborah, a direct alternate for the tribal name Gad. The region belonged to the greater Gadite territory, and the altercation with the Ammonites shows that the latter were not inclined to permit their property rights on the plateau proper to be reduced by the intruders. The oldest poetry further clarifies the situation. The Song of Deborah uses the name Gilead at a spot where Gad is to be expected and reproves the tribe for quietly staying on the other side of the Jordan; Gad had other troubles at this time which caused both it and Reuben to neglect the interests of the amphictyony, although the tribe could not have refused its assistance otherwise, when, e.g., Gideon with the army of the amphictyony was able to pursue the Midianites into the region of Nobah and Jogbehah (Judg. 8:11). In the Blessing of Moses the statement about Gad (Deut. 33:20) begins with praise for him "who enlarges Gad." In spite of everything said about the military excellence of Gad, it becomes clear that the tribe needed space. At the end Gad's intervention for the amphictyony is praised. In the Blessing of Jacob the purport is similar, perhaps somewhat more confident:

> Raiders shall raid [lit., "Raiders raid"] Gad, > but he shall raid [lit., "raids"] at their heels
> (Gen. 49:19).

Thus Gad finds itself in a contested situation, but masters it; the story of Jephthah provides an example of this.

The song in Num. 21:27*b*-30 probably leads into the period when the tribes Gad and Reuben fought for the extension of their settlement out into the Moabite Plateau. However, it can no longer be determined whether the song should be dated before or after the rise of the Israelite kingdom. That precisely David's time gave impetus to the advance of Israelite settlement is to be accepted. We hear previously that at the time of Saul many Israelites sought refuge from the Philistines in the "land of Gad and Gilead" (I Sam. 13:7). Even early in the time of David the Gadite Bani, who was subsequently reckoned among the "Thirty," found his way to him (II Sam. 23:36). David's census began at Aroer on the Arnon with the enrollment of the tribe of Gad, to whose territory Jazer (cf. Num. 32:35), probably in the headwaters of the Wadi Kefrein, is surely to be reckoned, but, apparently, no longer "Gilead," which then, in a broader sense, signified also the country N of the Jabbok (II Sam. 24:5-6). Under Solomon the same territory belonged to the "district of Gad" (I Kings 4:19 LXX), while Mahanaim (Tell Hejjaj, immediately to the S of the Jabbok) was already the residence of the governor of the neighboring district to the N (I Kings 4:14). That, later on, the Gadite property rights especially on the plateau E of the Dead Sea varied greatly, according to the weakness or the strength of the government of Israel, is shown by the Mesha Inscription. According to line 7, Omri had taken possession of the land of Medeba, which, according to the boundary description in Josh. 13:16, once had been Israelite (if the boundary was not merely an ideal at that time). Dibon, Mesha's royal city, had been lost to Gad a long time. Now Mesha reconquered Medeba, likewise Baal-meon and Ataroth (where, according to line 10, "the people of Gad had resided since primitive times"). These were all places on the plateau, but he retook also Nebo (Khirbet el-Mekhaiyet) close to the edge of the plateau and even Kiriathon, which was, according to Eusebius, ten Roman miles westward from Medeba, and therefore on the slope to the Valley of the Jordan. In effect, Mesha extended his kingdom to the latitude of the N end of the Dead Sea; the Gadites had to flee or submit to his rule. That the remnant of the Gadites had to suffer under Hazael's invasion soon thereafter and came under the dominion of Damascus is not to be doubted, even if the name of Gad, in a traditional enumeration (with the out-of-date territorial designation "from Aroer on"), came into the account only secondarily (II Kings 10:33). Jeroboam II re-established the holdings as far as the "Sea of the Arabah" (or should, in II Kings 14:25, we read "Brook of the Willows" [Wadi el-Hesa], as in Isa. 15:7?), and thus apparently was forced to respect the Moabite border at the N end of the Dead Sea. Constant troubles caused by the neighbors made the Israelites, who lived in the land E of the Jordan, politically active in the last years of the existence of the N Israelite state. After Shallum of Jabesh in N Gilead the Gadite Menahem (גדי, RSV "Gadi," is not a proper name) mounted the throne for a decade (II Kings 15:14, 17). Scarcely a decade later the remaining territory of his tribe belonged to the Assyrian province of Gilead. The final report on the story of the sufferings of this remnant is to be found in Jer. 49:1-6, which probably dates from the period of the Exile. According to this, Milcom succeeded Gad, and his people—i.e., the Ammonites—established themselves in his cities.

The later literature mentions the tribe of Gad in lists, for the most part. In so doing the Priestly Code generally moves Gad away from Asher and into proximity with Reuben (Num. 1:24-25; 26:15-18; also 2:14; 7:42; 10:20); in the list of the scouts Gad stands at the end, separated from Asher by Naphtali (13:15); only in the list of the heads of tribes does Gad stand with Asher—but after him (1:14); in the commission for the distribution of the W land Gad is missing, but is mentioned before that along with Reuben and the half-tribe of Manasseh (34:14). In the Deuteronomic historical work Gad appears—outside the sources—always in contexts which concern the three E Jordanian tribes, usually after Reuben as the first (Deut. 3:12, 16; 4:43; 29:7; Josh. 1:12; 4:12; 12:6; 13:8, 24, 28; 20:8; 22:1). In Deut. 27:13, Gad is between Reuben and Asher among those who speak the curse. In the lists of the Levite cities Gad's place is along with Reuben in the last group of three, once ahead of and once after Zebulun (Josh. 21:7; I Chr. 6:63—H 6:48; and Josh. 21:36; I Chr. 6:80—H 6:65 respectively). In Ezek. 48:27, Gad receives the last, most southerly strip of the land W of the Jordan, if one compares the situation of Reuben between Ephraim and Judah, a late confirmation of the fact that, not Reuben's, but Gad's territory in the E once extended to the most southerly point on the Arnon; in Ezek. 48:34 the first W gate is named for Gad—ahead of Asher. In the lists of Chronicles, Gad appears once with Reuben and the half-tribe of Manasseh in the traditional sequence among the E Jordanian followers (I Chr. 12:37—H 12:38); the next time Gad is missing completely (27:16 ff), as is Asher. What the Chronicler produces about Gad otherwise is—except for the usual genealogy (5:11-17), which ranks Gad in the traditional sequence between Reuben and the half-tribe of Manasseh, but after Judah and Simeon—unverifiable reports concerning Gadites who went over to David (12:8, 14—H 12:9, 15), concerning an appointment of Levite officials (26:32), concerning an abduction by Tiglath-pileser (5:26) and above all a report put in the time of Saul, on a war of the three E Jordanian tribes with the Hagrites in which an altercation of a later period with the Arab Bedouins who were pressing forward from the E is presumably reflected (5:18-22; cf. vs. 10).

In the NT, Gad appears with Asher after Judah and Reuben in the list of the sealed (Rev. 7:5).

For the territory of Gad, see TRIBES, TERRITORIES OF, § D8*a*. See the bibliography under ASHER.

K. ELLIGER

GAD (DEITY). A deity or genius of good luck worshiped by Jewish apostates, probably in the postexilic period, together with "Destiny" (מני, MENI; Isa. 65:11). The nature of the deity is clear from an Aramaic-Greek bilingual inscription from Palmyra, where he is identified with τύχη, "Fortune." His cult was particularly popular in the Hauran. The reference in Isaiah may be connected with Edomite or Arab penetration of Palestine after the Exile.

Bibliography. G. A. Cooke, A Textbook of North Semitic Inscriptions (1903), pp. 267-69. J. GRAY

GAD (SEER) [גד, a divine name; cf. Phoen. גדעזיו, fortunate]. A seer associated with David. To him is attributed a history of David's reign. His name may indicate an association with the tribe of Gad (cf. I Chr. 12:8). He called upon the fugitive David to depart from the land of Moab (I Sam. 22:3-5) and was Yahweh's spokesman in the account of David's census of the people. At his command David purchased the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite (II Sam. 24; I Chr. 21), the site of Solomon's temple (I Chr. 22:1). Gad is said to have had a share in the origin of the temple Levites (II Chr. 29:25).

The "Chronicles of Gad the seer" (I Chr. 29:29) appear to have been part of the "Commentary on the Book of Kings" (II Chr. 24:27), utilized by the Chronicler in compiling his history (cf. 20:34). Perhaps collections of stories concerning the words and deeds of the prophets were compiled by scribal civil servants connected with the court at Jerusalem.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 126-27; S. Yeiven, "Social, Religious and Cultural Trends in Jerusalem Under the Davidic Dynasty," VT, III (1953), 149-65; W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Introduction to the Books of the OT (1958), p. 114.

R. W. CORNEY

GAD, VALLEY TOWARD [הנחל הגד]. A place connected with the beginning of David's census (II Sam. 24:5). The RSV translates: "from the city that is in the middle of the valley, toward Gad . . .," probably meaning the Arnon Valley. The KJV phrases differently and translates "the river of Gad."

E. D. GROHMAN

GADARA găd'ə rə [Γαδαρά]; GADARENES —rēnz. A city of the DECAPOLIS. The only biblical references are in the gospel accounts of the healing of the demoniac. The Gadarenes are mentioned in Matt. 8:28 in the RSV and the best MSS and in Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26, 37, in the RSV mg. and inferior MSS. In all these passages variant readings are "Gerasenes" and "Gergesenes," indicating the confused condition of the text. See GERASA.

Although Gadara was ca. five miles SE of the Sea of Galilee, its territory included the hot springs of el Hamme, N of the Yarmuk. Moreover, coins indicate its shipping interests, so that the "country of the

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

1. Country of the Gadarenes as viewed from the Sea of Galilee

Gadarenes" may well have extended to the shore of the lake. Fig. GAD 1.

Ancient Gadara is the modern Um Qeis, built on a headland along the E edge of the Jordan Valley. The site has not been excavated, but the visible remains indicate that it was a city two miles in circumference. It was predominantly Greek in population (Jos. Antiq. XVII.xi.4; War II.vi.3) and was equipped with structures typical of a Greek city, including two theaters, a basilica, a colonnaded street, and baths.

Bibliography. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 145, 176, 323; E. G. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 382-83; D. Baly, Geography of the Bible (1957), pp. 198, 229, 230. D. C. PELLETT

GADDI găd'ī [גדי, fortune(?); Vulg. Gaddis; Apoc. Γαδδι]; KJV Apoc. GADDIS kăd'ĭs. 1. One of the spies sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan; son of Susi, from the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 13:11).

2. The name of John (KJV Johanan), eldest brother of Judas Maccabeus, leader of the struggle for Jewish independence in the second century B.C. (I Macc. 2:2).

GADDIEL găd'ĭ əl [גדיאל, Gad is God(?), or God is my fortune(?)] (Num. 13:10). A member of the tribe of Zebulun sent to spy out the land of Canaan; son of Sodi. His name is probably the full form of the name GAD.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 126-27, 140. R. F. JOHNSON

GADFLY [קרץ, nipper; Akkad. qarasu, nip off; Arab. qāriṣ, mosquito, from qaraṣa, pinch; Ethio. qērṣe; Ugar. qrṣ] (Jer. 46:20); KJV DESTRUCTION. A nipping or stinging insect. Both horseflies (Tabanidae) and botflies (Oestridae) are called gadflies. Jeremiah uses the term figuratively of Nebuchadrezzar, who invaded Egypt (568-567 B.C.). Gadflies approach with a loud hum and inflict painful wounds. The fleeing of the heifer in Jer. 46:20 suggests a more formidable foe than the mosquito.

See bibliography under ANT. W. W. FRERICHS

GADI gā'dī [גדי, my fortune, perhaps an abbreviation of גדיאל (GADDIEL), God is my fortune] (II Kings 15:14). The father of King Menahem.

GADITES găd'īts [גדי]. Members of the tribe of Gad.

GAHAM gā'hăm [גחם, flame, or burning brightly] (Gen. 22:24). The second son of Nahor and his concubine Reumah.

GAHAR gā'här [גחר]. Head of a family of temple servants who returned from the Exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49). See NETHINIM.

GAI gī, gā'ī [גיא, valley]. A locality in Philistia near Ekron, according to I Sam. 17:52 MT (RSV mg.). The KJV translation, "the valley," is improbable, since the MT lacks the article. The LXX (Codex Vaticanus) reads "Gath," and this is followed by the ASV mg., the RSV text, and most modern interpreters. W. F. STINESPRING

GAIUS gā'yəs [Γάϊος; Lat. Gaius] 1. A Christian man at Corinth, mentioned in I Cor. 1:14 as one of the two men in that church who were baptized by Paul himself. He is almost certainly the same as the Gaius of Rom. 16:23, which letter was written at Corinth. In the latter passage he appears as a man who was prominent enough to be host to Paul while he was writing the letter, and also to the whole church. He has been identified with the Titius Justus of Acts 18:7 (see bibliography).

2. A Macedonian Christian, traveling companion of Paul, one of the two who were seized with him at Ephesus in the disturbance caused by Demetrius the silversmith (Acts 19:29).

3. A Christian of Derbe, who accompanied Paul on a journey from Ephesus to Macedonia (Acts 20:4). It is possible that Gaius § 2 and § 3, who are mentioned within a short space of each other, both times in connection with Aristarchus, may be the same man. The variant Δουβήριος in MS D would make him a Macedonian from the town of Doberus.

4. The Christian leader to whom III John is addressed (III John 1).

Bibliography. J. Chapman, JTS, 5 (1904), 366; E. J. Goodspeed, "Gaius Titius Justus," JBL, 69 (1950), 382-83, in which 1 above is identified with the Titius Justus of Acts 18:7. F. W. GINGRICH GALAAD gāl'ĭ əd. KJV Apoc. and Douay Version form of GILEAD.

GALAL gā'lăl [גלל, perhaps tortoise; cf. Syr. גללא and NH גל]. 1. Son of Jeduthun, and an ancestor of one of those who returned from Babylon (I Chr. 9:16; Neh. 11:17).

2. A Levite among those returned from Babylon (I Chr. 9:15).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 230. B. T. DAHLBERG

GALATIA gə lā'shə [Γαλατία]. A region and Roman province in Central Asia Minor, named after the Celtic tribe of the Galatians (Acts 16:6; 18:23; I Cor. 16:1; Gal. 1:2; II Tim. 4:10; I Pet. 1:1).

1. The people of Galatia
2. Hellenistic Galatia
3. Roman Galatia
4. The archaeology of Galatia
5. The N and S Galatian theories

Bibliography

1. The people of Galatia. The inhabitants after whom Galatia was called, the Γαλάται, were a branch of the Indo-European tribe of the Celts or Galli (Gauls). The group which settled in Asia Minor came to be referred to as Galatians rather than Celts, although etymologically the names are identical.

The wanderings of the Celts in Europe in the first millennium B.C. took one group to the Danubian region and into Greece, where they raided Delphi in 279 B.C. A branch of this movement was invited to cross the Bosporus by King Nicomedes I of BITHYNIA, who was in need of auxiliaries in a war against his brother (278). The Bithynian king thus officially encouraged an invasion which proved disastrous to Asia Minor. Ca. twenty thousand Galatians, including warriors and their families, are reported to have crossed the Bosporus. Larger numbers followed, and when the more immediate purpose of Nicomedes had been achieved, the Galatians began to raid in Western Asia Minor on their own.

Their tactics were to lay siege to cities and to terrorize the countryside, plundering farms and sanctuaries. The danger was first countered by the Seleucid king Antiochus I, who defeated the Galatians in battle, with the aid of elephants (ca. 275 B.C.). Perhaps as a result of an arrangement by Antiochus, the Galatians were assigned a territory in the interior of Western Asia Minor which was to become known as Galatia.

The pattern of invasion and raids by Indo-European hordes had been an ancient one in Anatolia, but the Galatians are the first group to appear in the clear light of history. Three different tribes were involved: the Tolistobogii, who raided Aeolis and Ionia; the Trocmi, who raided in the region of the Hellespont; and the Tectosages, whose raids were in Central Asia Minor. Their tribal organization is described by Strabo, presumably in an accurate rendering of institutions in existence before his time (XII.567). Each of the three tribes was divided into four clans called "tetrarchies" by the Greeks, each tetrarchy having its separate tetrarch, judge, war leader, and two lieutenants. The twelve tetrarchies had one council of three hundred members, which met at a place called Drynemetum.

The military prowess of the Galatian tribesmen made them desirable as mercenaries, but a continuous menace as potential enemies of the Hellenistic powers in Asia Minor.

2. Hellenistic Galatia. The land occupied by the Galatians after their initial defeat by Antiochus was part of the central plateau of Asia Minor around the upper Sangarius and the middle course of the Halys River, bounded on the N by the kingdoms of Bithynia and Pontus. The new Galatia was a region which had become Phrygian after the downfall of the Hittite Empire. Even under Persian rule the Phrygian element had remained predominant. Greek colonization had not penetrated beyond the coastal regions, and Greek cultural influence was weak. The leading Phrygian cities were Pessinus, the ancient cult center of the Mother of the Gods; Gordium, the old Phrygian capital; and Ancyra.* These cities managed to maintain their Phrygian character in the Hellenistic period, especially Pessinus, which was still under its own dynasty of priests in the first century B.C. The Galatians did not become urbanized and lived in open sites, retreating to mountain fortresses in time of military danger. The men of the tribes were far from sedentary. Bands of warriors were constantly out raiding neighboring territory and made it a practice to exact ransom from their intended victims. Fig. GAL 2.

Courtesy of F. K. Doerner

2. The plain of Ancyra (modern Ankara), capital of ancient Galatia, as viewed from the citadel

The threat was especially felt at Pergamum, whose kings became the champions of the Greeks in Asia Minor against the barbarian Galatians. A celebrated victory was gained by Attalus I ca. 240 B.C., but his successors often found the Galatians siding with their enemies. In one of the major battles for the division of power in Asia Minor, Galatian infantry and cavalry fought for Antiochus III against Rome and its allies Pergamum and Rhodes (190 B.C., at Magnesia). This prompted the Romans to send Consul Manlius Vulso on a military campaign into Galatia in 189. The Galatians were thoroughly defeated and plundered by the Roman army, but continued to menace the Attalids. The Romans failed to punish the Galatians again and instead granted them independence (166).

Galatian relations with the kings of Pontus were better than those with Pergamum, until Mithradates V in his first war against Rome massacred several of the Galatian leaders and their families (86 B.C.). This was meant to facilitate the reorganization of Galatia, but the remnants of the Galatian princes revolted and supported the Roman cause, especially the leader of the Tolistobogii, Deiotarus.

After the defeat of Mithradates, Pompey reduced the number of Galatian tetrarchs from twelve to three. Deiotarus was given the title of king of Galatia and made ruler over a larger area than his ancestors had controlled. A stretch of the Pontic coast and regions to the S and the E, including a part of Lesser Armenia, were added to his domains. After many vicissitudes in the civil war Deiotarus emerged as king of all Galatia in 42 B.C., but he died soon afterward (40). His secretary Amyntas in 37-36 received the kingdom of Galatia and several other possessions in Southern Asia Minor. Augustus confirmed his rule. Amyntas was killed in an expedition against the tribes of the Pisidian Mountains in 25. This meant the end of the kingdom of Galatia.

3. Roman Galatia. After the death of Amyntas the Romans created the Galatian province. This included Galatia proper (the region from Pessinus in the W to Tavium in the E) with major extensions: Lycaonia, Isauria, and Pisidia, including such cities as ICONIUM; LYSTRA; DERBE; and in Pisidia, Apollonia; ANTIOCH; Sagalassus; and Selge. This irregularly shaped territory bordered on the kingdom of Cappadocia in the E, was enclosed by the Paphlagonian Mountains to the N and the Taurus to the S, and had the more civilized province of Asia as its W neighbor. A variety of native peoples, partly Hellenized and Romanized, were thus added to the Galatian tribes living in the core of the province.

The Galatian city of Ancyra was selected as the capital of the new administrative unit. A cult of Roma and Augustus was established in this city and a temple constructed in the Hellenistic building tradition of Asia Minor. The Greek and Latin versions of Augustus' inscription of his deeds (the Monumentum Ancyranum) were carved on its walls.

Ancyra, originally the center of the tribe of the Tectosages, thus developed into the chief city of Galatia. It lay on important roads which probably continued pre-Galatian communication systems. Its Galatian counterparts remained Tavium to the E, chief town of the Trocmi, and Pessinus to the W; both were sites of prominent sanctuaries and now developing into market towns for the countryside.

Even this large new province was to be extended soon by new annexations. In 6-5 B.C. E Paphlagonia and some land E of the Halys were added to Galatia, and three years later Amasia in Pontus followed. Pontus proper was annexed under Nero in A.D. 64, extending the Galatian province as far as Trapezus. Vespasian added Cappadocia and Lesser Armenia in A.D. 72, thus enlarging the province of Galatia to a size and a geographical importance approaching that of the former Hittite Empire.

This "greater Galatia" soon began to be subdivided again. Trajan separated the provinces of Galatia and Cappadocia, leaving Galatia approximately the size it had after 25 B.C.: the core of original Galatia with S Paphlagonia, Lycaonia, and N Pisidia.

All these changes in the size of the Roman province did not abolish the difference between the land originally held by the three Galatian tribes and the peripheral districts. Linguistically the difference must have been obvious, in spite of Hellenization and Romanization. The descendants of the Galatian invaders maintained their Celtic language, as is attested by Jerome and other sources, until the end of the fifth century. In Lycaonia the peasants spoke their own Lycaonian language (Acts 14:11), while the Phrygians retained their idiom; and various other Anatolian dialects must have continued in use in the secluded areas of the mountains.

The peculiar tribal organization of the Galatians, although gradually turning into political designations accompanied by imperial titles, was kept alive, and is referred to on coins until at least the end of the second century A.D.

4. The archaeology of Galatia. Explorations of the district of the Galatians have mostly been concerned with collections of surface material, inscriptions, and the tracing of Roman roads. The location of the three chief cities is known. Pessinus, modern Balhissar, is a badly plundered site which has furnished much building material to the modern town of Sivrihissar, ten miles to the N. Apart from the cavea of the theater and tombstones in the necropolis, little can be seen of ancient Pessinus.

Gordium, once capital of the Phrygians, never became prominent as a Galatian site. After Manlius' campaign of 189 B.C. it seems to have survived as an unimportant settlement. Its successor, Ancyra (now Ankara, the capital of modern Turkey), has been extensively rebuilt. It has considerable Phrygian remains, but its major monuments date from Roman times: the temple of Augustus and Roma, Roman baths, a column of Julian, and numerous architectural fragments built into the citadel.

Tavium has been identified in the ruins of Büyük Nefezköy, some twenty miles W of Yozgat. The settlement here too is pre-Galatian and goes back at least to the third millennium B.C. No excavation has taken place here, but recent discoveries of Roman milestones have helped to prove the identification of the site and to furnish evidence of the Roman roads which crossed at Tavium.

In general it is difficult as yet to identify material remains of this district as Galatian. The Phrygian cast of much of the Hellenistic and Roman material is unmistakable, and the Galatian way of living was hardly conducive to the establishment of a characteristic style in major or minor arts.

5. The N and S Galatian theories. Since no archaeological evidence is available for the history of early churches in Galatia, the churches in I Cor. 16:1; Gal. 1:2 can only tentatively be interpreted as belonging to Galatia proper or to the enlarged province of Galatia. A strictly historical point of view would be slightly in favor of the N Galatian theory, especially in the interpretation of Gal. 3:1: "O foolish Galatians." The name of Galatians would hardly be an appropriate designation for all inhabitants of the Roman province, but rather would evoke special memories of the history of the tribe. The use of "Galatia" in a wider sense in I Pet. 1:1 does not solve the difficulties of the NT Galatians.

Bibliography. A. H. M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Empire (1937), pp. 111-23; K. Bittel, Kleinasiatische Studien (1942), pp. 1-38; D. Magie, Roman Rule in Asia Minor (1950), pp. 453-67, 1303-29; I. W. MacPherson, "Roman Roads and Milestones in Galatia," Anatolian Studies, IV (1954), 111-20; K. Bittel, "Funde im östlichen Galatien," Istanbuler Mitteilungen, VI (1955), 22-41. M. J. MELLINK

*GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE gə lā'shənz [Γαλάται, see GALATIA]. A letter written by the apostle Paul to "the churches of Galatia" and now found as the ninth book of the NT canon. In it he defends his gospel of salvation by faith rather than by works of the law. It is one of the most significant of early Christian documents, not only because of the light it throws upon Paul and the primitive churches, but also because of the influence it has exerted in subsequent history. Although a short letter, it has always ranked with the much longer Roman and Corinthian epistles in importance. A polemical document itself, it has figured prominently in every struggle of the church to maintain freedom of the Spirit against legalism of any kind.

1. Authorship
2. Purpose
   a. The main issue
   b. The other extreme
   c. Synthesis
3. Contents
   a. Personal section
   b. Doctrinal section
   c. Ethical section
4. Destination
5. Date
6. Canonicity
7. Text

Bibliography

1. Authorship. There can be no serious question about the authorship of this letter. The testimony of the ancient church uniformly ascribes it to Paul with no hint of doubt or difference of opinion. Possible reminiscences of its language can be found in Christian writing even before the end of the first century, and it was unmistakably known and used as Paul's by the end of the second (as by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and the Muratorian Canon). The letter itself not only claims Paul as its author but contains nothing which is in the slightest degree inconsistent with that claim. The style and vocabulary, the views expressed, the personal characteristics manifested, are in all significant respects those found in Romans, I and II Corinthians, and other letters. If Paul wrote any of these letters, he undoubtedly wrote this one too. During the entire history of criticism this has very rarely been denied and today is universally acknowledged.

2. Purpose. At first sight, at least, the purpose of the letter seems equally clear. Paul had during the course of his missionary labors established a number of churches in the province of Galatia (as to just where, see below § 4). At some later time (see § 5) word reached him that his Galatian churches were in grave danger of falling away from the truth of Christ as Paul understood it and as his converts had first learned it, and of embracing a "different gospel"—which from Paul's point of view was not a gospel at all. The preachers of the "new" gospel in Galatia, who were presumably visiting teachers, were also seeking to cast doubt on the authenticity of Paul's own apostleship and the authority of his teaching, insisting apparently upon the higher authority of certain apostles at Jerusalem. Paul wrote this letter in the first flush of his indignation and distress at hearing this news.

a. The main issue. We are left in no doubt whatever as to the main issue between Paul and his critics. It was the same issue as threatened to divide, and in a measure did divide, the whole church at the middle of the first century—the issue of the relation of the Christian to the Jewish law (see LAW; also, for further detail of Paul's view, see JUSTIFICATION; FAITH). Although it may be argued that Paul was not always consistent, it was certainly his characteristic position that to be in Christ meant being free from the legal requirements of Judaism. The believer is justified by faith alone. Non-Jews, therefore, might become full members of the body of Christ on the sole basis of faith in Christ, without assuming any of the obligations imposed by the legal code. Paul's opponents denied that any such freedom was possible. They held that the gospel fulfilled, but did not displace, the law. The Christian, as well as the Jew, was subject to its provisions.

These "Judaizing" teachers, as they are usually called, have been referred to above as "visiting teachers," and this seems likely in view of the way Paul distinguishes between them and the congregations he is addressing (e.g., in 1:9; 4:17; 5:10, 12; 6:13). It is well to remember, however, that he nowhere identifies them as "outsiders" and that there is no overruling reason why we should not think of them as being Galatians themselves. Nor can we be absolutely sure they were Jews. One would naturally assume they were, and the great majority of scholars have always so regarded them. Others, however, point to the present tense of the participle in 6:13—"Even those who receive circumsion [i.e., are being circumcised] do not themselves keep the law, but they desire to have you circumcised that they may glory in your flesh"—and urge that these Judaizers were Gentile Christians who had accepted circumcision and all that it involved and were now seeking to bring Paul's Galatian converts to the same position.

Although it is clear that the threat of large-scale apostasy is very real and Paul feels he is fighting for the very life of his churches in Galatia, one gathers he does not despair of countering the efforts of his opponents and of winning back to his "gospel" and to himself as an apostle of Christ the loyalty of his troubled and wavering congregations. Both his alarm and his hope appear in the vigorous defense of the integrity and independence of his own apostleship, in the impassioned argument for his position that salvation depends on faith alone (not on works of the law), and in the repeated and equally passionate allusions to the close personal and affectionate relations in which he has stood to the Galatians.

b. The other extreme. The issue raised by the Judaizers was, all agree, the principal occasion for the letter. Some scholars have urged, however, that it is not the sole occasion—or a sufficient occasion for this particular letter. They point to the section beginning with 5:13 and running almost to the end—a section primarily concerned with saying, "You were called to freedom, brethren; only do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh. . . . If we live by the Spirit, let us also walk by the Spirit"—and urge that there were two distinctive parties in the Galatian churches. Over against the Judaizing party stood another, also hostile to Paul, which advocated, or at least allowed, moral license. Paul was, it is argued, defending his position on two fronts—against legalists who accused him of being too radical and against antinomians who called him too conservative.

As further evidence of the existence of such an antinomian party these scholars refer to 5:11: "If I, brethren, still preach circumcision, why am I still persecuted?"—a statement exceedingly perplexing and difficult on any view, but which is held to imply, at the very least, that Paul was being charged in Galatia with preaching circumcision. But who would have brought such an accusation? Certainly not the Judaizers. Such a charge could have been brought only by enemies at the opposite extreme.

These scholars also point to a certain ambiguity in the first two chapters of the letter, where Paul is describing and defending his own apostleship. On the one hand he seems to want to assert his independence of the older apostles at Jerusalem, to whom presumably the Judaizers are appealing; but on the other he seems equally eager to establish the fact that he not only consulted with them, but also sought and secured their approval of his message and his work among the Gentiles. In affirming his independence of the Jerusalem apostles, it may be argued, he is answering charges of obsequiousness made by the antinomians; in emphasizing their approval of his work he is denying the contentions of the Judaizers that he was an unaccredited "apostle" without the support of the pillars of the church.

c. Synthesis. The presence of these somewhat contradictory data cannot be denied, but most scholars would say that they do not need to be interpreted as implying an antinomian "party" in Galatia—although it must be conceded that they will prevent our defining Paul's purpose as simply as we might otherwise do. As for the admonitions against the misuse of freedom in which chs. 5 and 6 abound, they may very naturally be understood as a kind of corollary of Paul's vigorous insistence on the freedom itself. He stands for freedom from the law, but he wants to make clear that he does not stand for moral license. Obviously he would recognize that his position needed to be guarded against this misinterpretation, and he may have had some reason for believing that some of his supporters in Galatia were actually understanding him in this mistaken way. But one does not need to assume a hostile "party." Indeed, Paul appears to be dealing with a moral failure, or a possible moral failure, rather than with a theological error; and, as a matter of fact, it is more probable that he is trying to correct those who think of themselves as advocates of his own position than that he is seeking to refute the arguments of opponents.

As for the other evidences of ambiguity, again one can acknowledge them without having to resort to the theory of two hostile parties. For one thing, we may recognize that Paul was concerned, not only with the freedom of the Gentiles from the requirements of the Jewish law, but also with the unity of the church. The freedom of the Gentiles must be maintained, but it must not divide the body of Christ. This concern for unity will perhaps help explain the ambivalences in Paul's discussion of his relations with the apostles at Jerusalem; he wants to establish both his independence of them and the fact of their cordial support of his work.

It may also be suggested, by way of further explanation of some of the contradictory data, that Paul may be facing two kinds of Judaizers. Some of them, truly understanding Paul at the vital point, recognized him as an enemy; other Judaizers, misunderstanding him, were claiming him as a friend. Some truly recognized that Paul was preaching freedom from the law and denied that he had any authority to do so. Others, seeking to defend him from the Judaizers' own point of view, denied that he took so radical a position and pointed to his close relations with the apostles at Jerusalem. It would be to Judaizers of this latter kind that Paul says, "If I am still preaching circumcision. . . ." He would be as much opposed to his "friends" as to his "enemies"; and the fact that he must answer both would explain some of the peculiar ambiguities of the letter.

If it is contended that Paul's position on this issue of the law could hardly have been so misunderstood by his friends as this last suggestion implies, the answer is that we have in the book of Acts, which is certainly friendly to Paul, a document which actually misunderstands him in much the same way. Although Acts itself belongs to a later generation, it rests upon older sources, and it is not improbable that some, at least, of these older sources represented Paul as much less radical than his own letters show him to have been. These sources, like Acts later, must have been defenders of Paul, but defenders on grounds which Paul would vigorously repudiate. It is because Paul is, in this sense, "fighting on two fronts" that in this letter he seems as eager to establish that he does actually and consistently preach freedom from the law as to justify his position in doing so.

This complexity of the polemical situation and the necessity of answering contradictory claims and charges will help explain a certain frustration which one cannot help sensing in Paul's attitude. As he says, he hardly knows which way to turn (4:20). He is being attacked and being defended by persons who only partly understand him, and in certain respects deeply misunderstand him. His own conceptions of the meaning of the gospel and of his own apostleship are being misrepresented by some and rejected by others. He turns now in one direction, trying to make clear his position against those who are claiming him as a legalist, and now in the other, defending his position against those who are attacking him as a radical. But all are legalists or are in danger of becoming such, and one does not need to postulate a radical or antinomian "party." Paul is appealing with desperate, almost frantic, earnestness to the body of the Galatian Christians against legalists who, as he sees it, either unfairly attack or falsely defend him and, even more important, are tempting the church to reject the truth of Christ.

3. Contents. The letter may be summarily outlined as follows:

I. Salutation and introduction, 1:1-5
II. Personal defense, 1:6-2:21
III. Defense of the gospel, 3:1-4:31
IV. Ethical implications of the gospel, 5:1-6:10
V. Conclusion, 6:11-18

It begins very abruptly, the salutation itself containing both a defense of Paul's apostleship and a statement of his gospel: "Paul an apostle—not from men nor through man, but through Jesus Christ and God the Father, who raised him from the dead—and all the brethren who are with me, to the churches of Galatia: Grace to you and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave himself for our sins to deliver us from the present evil age, according to the will of our God and Father; to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen." Paul's eagerness and haste to get to the business of the letter also appear in the omission of the paragraph of thanksgiving and felicitation which in every other letter immediately follows the salutation. As a matter of fact, Paul was in this moment not in the mood for compliment or thanksgiving, preoccupied as he was with the distressing news of the threat of apostasy in Galatia, which, we may assume, has just reached him. His letter reflects the first shock of his surprise and disappointment, and his immediate impulse to fight back.

a. Personal section. Paul is astonished, he declares, at hearing that the Galatians are so quickly turning away from the gospel which he had preached to them to accept "a different gospel," which is not a gospel at all. He refers to the way he had received the gospel message which he had brought to them. It was not a human affair, but had come to him through a revelation of Christ. He reminds them of his previous zeal as a Jew and of his opposition to the church. Far from learning anything from other Christians in this period, he had been fanatically persecuting them. It was God who had revealed his Son to him—suddenly and without previous preparation—that Paul might be Christ's apostle to the Gentiles.

Even after this transforming experience, he did not go to Jerusalem to see those who were already apostles, but remained in the neighborhood of Damascus, where the revelation had occurred. Apparently his enemies (or "friends") were saying that he had left Damascus for Jerusalem. Paul acknowledges leaving Damascus but insists that it was for the purpose of a visit to Arabia (the territory just to the east of Damascus), and that when his business there was completed he returned directly to Damascus. He did not go to Jerusalem until three years (or perhaps in the third year) afterward, and then he saw only Peter and James. (His oath to the truth of this statement suggests that it was being said that he saw others, perhaps some official council such as we read about in Acts 15.) Fourteen years later he went up to the city again—this time to lay before the leaders there (James, Peter, and John) the gospel (involving freedom from the law) which he was preaching to the Gentiles. These "pillars," after listening to him and his associate Barnabas, gave him the right hand of fellowship, the understanding being that he would work among the Gentiles and they among the Jews. The only stipulation was that the Gentile Christians should contribute to "the poor" of the Jerusalem church. This condition Paul readily accepted.

After describing (2:11-14) an incident in Antioch which revealed that although James and others, representing the more conservative "Jewish" point of view, had been willing for Paul to release the Gentiles from the requirement of circumcision, they were not willing to admit them to full fellowship in the church, Paul moves gradually into the more doctrinal middle section of the letter, which is well under way at the beginning of the third chapter.

b. Doctrinal section. This section does not exhibit a systematic or even an altogether coherent structure. Paul is now defending not so much himself as the soundness of his position, and he makes his points as they occur to him in the heat of discussion. His arguments tumble over one another.

He begins by appealing to the experience of the Galatians. Had they not received the Spirit simply upon believing the gospel, and without works of the law of any kind? He then appeals to the example of Abraham, who, we may suppose, figured largely in the arguments of his opponents. Abraham, Paul affirms, was a man of faith, receiving the promise of God's blessing centuries before the law was given. The later law cannot be thought of as abrogating God's original promise. Its purpose was the temporary one of revealing man's plight as the slave of sin in order that, in despair of himself, he might be moved to throw himself upon God's mercy in Christ, who had taken the law's "curse" upon himself and opened to us the possibility of freedom both from the penalty of the law and from the law itself. A child until he becomes of age is under the care of guardians or trustees, but at the appropriate time he becomes free—no longer a slave subject to the regulation of others, but a son. Christ has thus set us free. We have become sons and heirs of God. How, then, can the Galatians bear to think of turning back to slavery again?

Paul finds a final argument in the scriptural story of Sarah and Hagar, which he understands allegorically—Hagar standing for the present Jerusalem and the law system and bearing children who are slaves, and Sarah standing for the order of grace and for the "Jerusalem above" whose children are free.

c. Ethical section. The last section, constituting roughly the fifth and sixth chapters of the letter, begins with a strong appeal that the readers stand firm in the freedom with which Christ has set them free. They must resist and repudiate those who are unsettling them. But it is just as important that they not make their freedom an excuse for licentiousness or for pride. If they live by the Spirit, they should walk by the Spirit. And the fruit of the Spirit is never immorality, quarreling, party spirit, and the like, but rather "love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control." The letter closes with a personal appeal: "Far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world. For neither circumcision counts for anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation. . . . Henceforth let no man trouble me; for I bear on my body the marks of Jesus."

4. Destination. Reference has already been made to some uncertainty as to the location of the churches to which Paul is writing. The uncertainty arises out of the ambiguity of the place name "Galatia." As is explained elsewhere (see GALATIA), in Paul's period this name belonged to a large province of the Roman Empire, but had been given the province only because of its earlier use to designate a region in the northern part of the province inhabited by an ethnic group who were still known as Galatians in a special, and more precise, sense. Are Paul's readers Galatians in that sense, or may the churches he is addressing be thought of as Galatian in the broader meaning of the term? This question cannot be answered with certainty, since Paul does not identify the churches more exactly; but the fact that he seems generally to have used geographical terms in the Roman sense creates the strong presumption that by "the churches of Galatia" he means churches which might have been located anywhere in the province. Certainly when he mentions "the churches of Asia" (I Cor. 16:19) he is speaking in provincial terms. In the same way he alludes to "the churches of Macedonia" (II Cor. 8:1), and similarly to "Achaia" (II Cor. 9:2).

This question has had a certain interest because the book of Acts describes an evangelistic tour of Paul's through the southern part of the province in the course of which churches were established in Lystra, Derbe, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch; and if "Galatia" can be interpreted in the more inclusive sense, it is possible to suppose that it is these churches to which Paul is writing. This is the "South Galatia" theory. If the narrower sense is correct—the "North Galatia" hypothesis—we must locate the churches in the northern region where the race of Galatians lived, and can only guess where the churches were or how they came to be established. Acts does not describe any visit of Paul into that region, although the possibility of such a visit is certainly not ruled out. Indeed, many scholars understand Acts 16:6 to refer to "North Galatia."

The fact that Paul probably used the term "Galatia" in the wider sense must not be taken to imply that the churches addressed were necessarily the churches of which we happen to hear in Acts. Those churches may have been located anywhere in a large region, north or south. Still, the Acts account of Paul's activities in the southern part of the province gives a certain weight to the "South Galatia" hypothesis. This whole issue, for the time being at least, is of minor importance because, even if we could surely identify the churches with those in South Galatia, we know so little about these churches from Acts or other sources that the information would be of negligible value in the interpretation of the letter itself.

5. Date. The question of the date of the epistle is both more controversial and more significant. It is also one of the most complicated problems in NT introduction (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT; PAUL). According to one view, Galatians is the earliest of Paul's letters and was written from Antioch in Syria after his return from the "first missionary journey" recorded in Acts 13–14 and before his departure for the "apostolic council" described in Acts 15 (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM). The principal argument for this view runs somewhat as follows: When Paul wrote Galatians, he had made two visits to Jerusalem since his conversion at Damascus, and only two. We can be sure of this because he speaks of only two visits in Gal. 1:18–2:10; and the nature of the argument he is making there would require that he mention other visits if they had occurred. The "council" visit in Acts 15 is the third visit of Paul to Jerusalem of which Acts tells us. Therefore the letter must have been written before it. But the letter presupposes the existence of Galatian churches; and, according to Acts, these churches were established just before the "council" (Acts 13–14). Therefore the letter was written between the events of Acts 14 and 15, or just after Paul's return from his first visit to Galatia and just before his third, the "council," visit to Jerusalem. This dating of the letter is supported by various minor considerations—e.g., Paul's saying in 1:6, "I am astonished that you are so quickly deserting . . ." But the really decisive argument is the chronological one.

If we could trust entirely the accuracy of the Acts account of Paul's visits to Jerusalem, the case for the early dating would be unassailable. The great majority of scholars, however, do not find this case convincing. The major obstacle in the way of dating Galatians before the "apostolic council" of Acts 15 is the fact that in Gal. 2:1-10 Paul seems to be describing that same incident in retrospect. Acts 15 tells of a conference in Jerusalem participated in by James, Peter, Paul, Barnabas, and others and concerned with the problem of the status of Gentiles in the church. Paul in Gal. 2 tells of a conference involving the same principals and concerned with the same issue. To be sure, there are some striking differences—notably the more formal or official character of the Acts conference—but the differences can for the most part be explained by the development of the tradition and by the special interests of the author of Acts.

Those who date Galatians early must maintain that there were two conferences on the Jewish issue. The one described by Paul in Galatians took place on the occasion of Paul's visit to Jerusalem as recorded in Acts 11:29-30, which was made primarily for another purpose. The author of Acts, it is argued, does not mention this conference in this connection because he did not know of it; Paul himself tells us that it was a private affair (Gal. 2:2). The formal council described in Acts 15 was another and quite a different conference, held later and as a result of just such developments in the missionary field as the Letter to the Galatians exhibits.

But plausible as such contentions can be made, the majority of scholars are unconvinced. They are inclined to regard the Galatians and Acts narratives as accounts of the same conference, which means that the letter must have been written after the events of Acts 15. Various ways are resorted to of explaining the Acts error in calling this visit of Paul to Jerusalem the third visit rather than the second. The most popular of these is that an actual visit with two purposes was understood by the writer of Acts to be two visits. But such theories lie outside the scope of the present article. See CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT.

Once Acts 15 ceases to establish the latest possible date for Galatians, there is no reason why the letter should not be placed as late as the period of Romans and the Corinthian letters, with which it has close affinities in content; and it is usually so dated. It has been variously placed before Corinthians, between I and II Corinthians, and between II Corinthians and Romans—in any case, during the last few years of Paul's active career.

Yet a third possible date needs to be considered. It is usually taken for granted that this letter was written during a period when Paul was at liberty, but the possibility that it is one of the "imprisonment epistles" cannot be excluded. It is true that in Galatians Paul does not refer to his "bonds" as he does in the other letters of this category, but in view of the passionate earnestness of this particular letter and its intense preoccupation with its subject this silence cannot be regarded as significant. Moreover, if it is true that he nowhere refers to his imprisonment, it can also be said that he nowhere speaks of any prospective travel. One might have expected some reference to a later visit when Paul would personally confront his opponents (cf. II Cor. 10:2; 12: 14; 13:10; etc.). Indeed, in view of the desperate importance of the issue in Galatia, one cannot help wondering why Paul is not going instead of writing. He says, "I could wish to be present with you now" (4:20). Why can he not be? One might expect him at least to promise, or threaten, a visit. It may also be pointed out that the words in the salutation, "all the brethren who are with me," may be considered strange if Paul was settled in or near one of his churches. Of course he may have been on a journey —but it is also possible that he was in prison.

If Galatians was written from prison, it was almost certainly written after Romans and was one of Paul's latest letters. This dating of Galatians after Romans, rather than shortly before it, has the advantage of making more intelligible Paul's being able to say with such complacency in Rom. 15:23: "Now, since I no longer have any room for work in these regions," etc. Such a remark is hard to understand almost immediately after the serious situation which the Letter to the Galatians reveals. But in view of how little we know about Paul's life, an argument of this kind cannot be pressed. It has been often argued that a comparison of parallel sections of Galatians and Romans (there are a number of striking examples) indicates the priority of Galatians. But this is far from certain. Despite the authority of some great names to the contrary, it is not clear that the Galatians parallels do not represent reminiscences, rather than anticipations, of the language of the longer letter. Romans was written in a relatively quiet and reflective mood; Galatians, in the heat of battle. The longer, more careful, statement does not need to be the later.

6. Canonicity. The Letter to the Galatians has a very interesting and important place in the early history of the CANON OF THE NT. The first definite event in that history was undoubtedly the collection of Paul's letters. This collection was made, probably at Ephesus and even more probably during the last decade of the first century, and was the work of some individual or church, or of some group of individuals or churches, who knew some of Paul's letters, knew of or suspected the existence of others, and believed that what he had written deserved to be much more widely known. The letters were sought out, assembled, and published as a single work for the use of the churches.

There is good reason to believe that the several letters were arranged in order of length, the Corinthian and the Thessalonian letters being taken together in each case, and Philemon being closely associated with Colossians. Whether this is true or not, however, the letter which we know as Ephesians, but which at first had no local address (see EPHESIANS), stood almost certainly at the opening of the book as the first epistle—a general letter to the churches serving as a preface to the particular church letters which followed and as a symbol that they too had something to say to the whole church. This collection of letters (identical with the Pauline corpus in our canon with the exception of the letters to Timothy and Titus, which were later added) was known apparently to the author of I Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp, and may be supposed to have been widely distributed among the churches in the opening years of the second century.

It became even more important, however, when the heretical teacher MARCION at some time before the middle of that century adopted (and adapted) the collection as a major part of a new "Bible" for his followers. The Marcionites rejected the Jewish scriptures (which up to this time had been and for a while continued to be the sole scriptures for "orthodox" Christians) and put in their place the "Gospel and Apostle"—the "Gospel" being a document, shorter than, but very similar to, our Luke, and the "Apostle" being the collected letters of Paul. Apparently, however, Marcion did not leave the latter in their original order but replaced Ephesians in first place with Galatians. His reasons for giving Galatians the place of honor are clear enough. The emphasis with which Paul in this letter set gospel against law must have commended it especially to Marcion, who saw in it a great manifesto of that freedom of Christianity from Judaism, the new from the old, which he was most concerned to declare. This early issue between Ephesians and Galatians as regards their order in the Pauline letter corpus is perhaps reflected in the fact that even now the only exception to the order of length among the letters of Paul involves these two letters.

7. Text. The text of the letter is as surely established as that of any NT document. At many points of detail there must be some uncertainty since the MS evidence is ambiguous. But they are not important points, and even at most of these the agreement of the better witnesses establishes the text with reasonable probability. There is no evidence that the text of the letter has suffered any major derangement or revision in the course of its transmission.

Bibliography. Commentaries: J. B. Lightfoot (1892); E. D. Burton, ICC (1920), much the most adequate; H. Lietzmann, Handbuch zum NT (2nd ed., 1923); G. S. Duncan, Moffatt NT Commentary (1934); R. T. Stamm, IB, vol. X (1953). See also introductions to literature of the NT by Goodspeed, Moffatt, Jülicher, Barnett, etc.

Important special studies, especially regarding purpose: J. H. Ropes, The Singular Problem of the Epistle to the Galatians (1929); J. Munck, Paulus und die Heilsgeschichte (1954), ch. IV.

J. KNOX

GALBANUM găl'bə nəm [חֶלְבְּנָה, helbᵉnâ; χαλβάνη]. The aromatic, resinous gum from a plant, probably Ferula galbaniflua Boiss. and Buhse or related species of giant fennel, imported from Persia or India. Identification of the ancient source of galbanum is still somewhat uncertain. According to Exod. 30:34, it was a "sweet spice" used as an ingredient of the holy incense burned in the tabernacle. In Ecclus. 24:15 the same list of spices appears in a metaphor in praise of Wisdom.

See also FLORA § A7*h;* INCENSE; SPICE.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), p. 102. J. C. TREVER

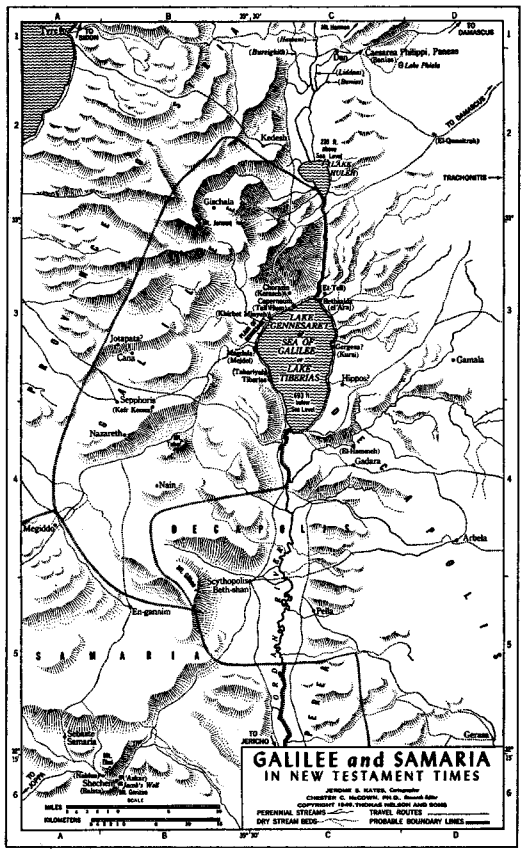
GALEED găl'ĭ əd [גלעד, witness heap]. A pile of stones heaped up by Laban and Jacob as a sign of their covenant and a boundary mark for their respective countries (Gen. 31:46-54). It is intended to furnish an etymology for the name Gilead; for the other name given the heap, see MIZPAH. A similar explanation is given in Josh. 22:10-34, where in the original story the altar built by the E tribes to symbolize their unity with the other Israelites must have been called Galeed, or possibly Ed (vs. 34); but the words were deleted by harmonistic editors. See WITNESS. S. COHEN

GALGAL găl'găl. Douay Version form of GILGAL.

GALGALA. KJV Apoc. form of GILGAL.

GALILEANS găl'ə lē'ənz. Inhabitants of GALILEE, including Jews, pagans, and, from the first century A.D., Christians. The Galileans may have been distinctive in their religious views.

1. Question of a Jewish party. The second-century Christian writers Hegesippus (quoted in Euseb. Hist. IV.22.7) and Justin Martyr (Dial. 80:4) mention Galileans among the religious parties of Judaism along with Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, and some more obscure groups. There is rabbinic evidence that in the first century A.D. customs prevailed in Galilee which were not current in other parts of Palestine. E.g., in Galilee a newly married pair were permitted to be alone on their wedding night; there were differences in the rights of a widow and with regard to the Day of Atonement; in Galilee no work was done on the day before Passover, and the festival may actually have been observed a day earlier; the Pharisees considered Galilean olive oil ritually impure; and the Galileans refused to accept the Pharisaic rule (an extension of Exod. 23:19; Deut. 14:21) that meat might not be eaten with dairy products. The Pharisees considered the men of Galilee as boorish, uncultivated, and pugnacious. It is not quite certain, however, that they constituted a self-conscious religious party or sect comparable to the Pharisees or Essenes. The variations in custom might be accounted for by their being 'ammê hā-'âreṣ—i.e., unlettered, conservative agrarians who followed none of the parties then existing, and who were perhaps not deeply religious. On the other hand, some of the Galilean customs suggest the more conservative Pharisaic school of Shammai, in contrast to the school of Hillel, whose rulings later became dominant. Perhaps within Galilee itself more than one type of thought influenced local custom. There is no evidence that Jesus adhered to a Galilean religious party.



2. Galilean Christianity. Attempts have been made to analyze the type of Christianity current in Galilee in the first two centuries A.D. Of all the gospel material, that contained in Mark seems closest to the Galilean background. Most of Jesus' ministry is laid in this region. Mark includes two separate cycles of teaching material, one dealing with the kingdom of God and the other with the Son of man, both of which may be Galilean and which have counterparts in Q. The kingdom-of-God sayings are all placed in the setting of the Galilean ministry. Mark is the gospel which, of all four, has fewest parallels to the teaching of the Qumran Scrolls, which come from S Judea. The ending of the gospel looks forward to the Resurrection (or perhaps the manifestation of the Son of man) in Galilee, and in this Matthew follows Mark. By contrast, Luke and John show a greater interest in Jesus' activity in Samaria and Judea.

The later history of Galilean Christianity is obscure. James the brother of the Lord must have come from Galilee, but Acts and other sources picture him as head of the church of Jerusalem, and he may represent the type of Christian faith current there. Hegesippus (in Euseb. Hist. III.20.1-5) knows of grandsons of Jude the brother of the Lord who in Domitian's time lived in Palestine and owned their own farm. After they were questioned by the emperor and released, they "ruled the churches"; but, while this was probably in Galilee, it is not certain. Other members of Jesus' family such as Symeon the son of Clopas, seem to have been bishops in Palestine after the First Jewish Revolt. It is sometimes thought that the letters of James and Jude exemplify Galilean Christianity, but this rests principally on the names traditionally attached to these documents. James may, of course, reflect the thought of a conservative Jewish Christian church somewhere in Palestine.

Bibliography. E. Lohmeyer, Galiläa und Jerusalem (1936); L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees (1938), I, 43-60; R. H. Lightfoot, Locality and Doctrine in the Gospels (1938); L. E. Elliott-Binns, Galilean Christianity (1956); S. E. Johnson, Jesus in His Homeland (1957), pp. 7-9, 17-22. S. E. JOHNSON

GALILEE găl'ə lē [Γαλιλαία, Γαλειλαία; גליל, גלילה, also Aram. גלילא; lit. ring, circle, and so district, region; referred to as of the Gentiles, foreigners, τῶν ἐθνῶν (Isa. 9:1 in Matt. 4:15) and τῶν ἀλλοφύλων (I Macc. 5:15), הגוים]. A small region in N Palestine, earlier of vague and variable boundary; later a fixed administrative area under the Romans.

1. The region. After the separation of Solomon's kingdom (936 B.C.), the region later to be known as Galilee was the most northerly part of the N kingdom of ISRAEL. In 734 it was absorbed in the Assyrian Empire by TIGLATH-PILESER, and the record in II Kings 15:29 refers to that conquered area of Naphtali as the galil. Through the next six centuries the region passed in turn to Babylonia, Persia, Macedonia, Egypt, and Syria, while constantly experiencing infiltration and migration. The genuine Israelite population in the Persian period was but a minority among the dominant Gentiles, and when Judea issued a summons (attributed to Hezekiah) to gather at Jerusalem for worship in the temple, the response from the galil was meager (II Chr. 30:10-11). As late as Maccabean times the Jewish element was small, and was reduced still further when Simon's expedition to the N resulted in the defeat of the Gentile forces of Galilee and the evacuation of many Jews to Judea, for security (I Macc. 5:21-23). The region was not governed by Jews any time after 734 B.C. until 80 B.C., when Alexander Janneus subdued this Gentile region and attempted to Judaize the population.

In 63 B.C. the whole of Palestine came under Roman rule, although a large degree of autonomy was granted the Jewish government, whether established in Jerusalem, Sepphoris, or Tiberias. When the kingdom of Herod the Great was split into three parts in 4 B.C., Sepphoris became the capital of Galilee until replaced by Tiberias ca. A.D. 25. In A.D. 44, Herod Agrippa I, the last Jewish ruler of Palestine, died after a six-year reign over Galilee, and all Palestine was then formed into a province and governed by procurators. The revolts of A.D. 66-73 and 132-35 brought death to thousands of Jews and destruction to the Jewish state, and after the fall of Jerusalem surviving Palestinian Jews converged upon Galilee. The cities of Tiberias and Sepphoris became Jewish, and the Diaspora came to look upon Galilee as its center. Tiberias became the chief school of Jewish learning in the West, where the Palestinian Talmud and the Tiberian system of vowel pointing were developed. In the meantime, Christianity in the fourth century was established as the dominant religion in the Empire, and in A.D. 451 the Council of Chalcedon set up the Patriarchate of Jerusalem for the governing of the church in Palestine. Galilee was placed in diocese II, under the patriarch Juvenal. In the seventh century Muslim rule over Galilee began, to be broken only by the twelfth-century interlude of the Crusades and the World War of 1918. The modern state of Israel, established in 1948, has included all of Galilee.

The term "Galilee of the Gentiles" or "of the nations" first occurs in the prophecy of Isaiah (ca. 705 B.C.), referring to the territory of Zebulun and Naphtali as occupied by a mixed population. Other contemporary references apply the name to the neighboring territory of Asher (I Kings 9:10-13), or of Issachar, or of Naphtali almost alone (II Kings 15: 29). The name reflects a popular reputation for racial variety and mixture in and around these N frontier districts, rather than any formal political unit of administration.

In the Maccabean era Galilee assumed more definite boundaries, as later described by Josephus (War III.iii.1). Between it and Samaria to the S, the "Great Plain" Esdraelon (Plain of Megiddo, Valley of Jezreel) provided a natural boundary from Mount Carmel to Beth-shan (later Scythopolis). Bordering on Tyre to the N, Galilee reached to Lake Huleh, about fifteen miles S of Dan, which marks the more ancient border along the gorge of the River Litani. The Jordan rift made a natural E boundary, but the W boundary remains uncertain except that it bordered upon Syrian Phoenicia. Roman Galilee extended about twenty-five miles E and W, and about thirty-five miles N and S (about one sixth of the area of W Palestine). Galilee was itself divided into Upper and Lower by the Plain of Ramah on a line between Capernaum and Ptolemaïs. In altitude Lower Galilee ranged from 696 feet below sea level at the Sea of Galilee to ca. 500 feet above sea level, except for mountains in the SE reaching up to Mount Tabor (1,843 feet). Upper Galilee included the S ranges of the Lebanon Mountains, true "hill country" from ca. 1,500 to 3,963 feet high (Mount Jermak, the highest peak in Palestine).

The basic rock is limestone, in which natural caves abound. There is also volcanic rock, especially to the E and bordering upon the Jordan rift, where a lava cap still covers the limestone in places. The Horns of Hattin are a double volcanic peak 2,000 feet high, standing between Nazareth and the Sea of Galilee. The disintegration of this basaltic rock has produced a rich alluvial soil in the plains and valleys and terraces. Although the craters have long been extinct, there are many hot springs such as have made Tiberias a popular spa even to modern times. This area has left a record of many earthquakes in its archaeological ruins. The most striking natural phenomenon is the great Ghor, the deep cut of the Jordan Valley all along the E boundary. In the ten miles between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee the river descends 926 feet in a rapid and ceaseless flow.

At intervals there were fords, later bridges, for E-W traffic across the Jordan, which led to the natural roadways through valley and plain. The "way of the sea" from Damascus (cf. Isa. 9:1) may have crossed the Bridge of the Daughters of Jacob (Jisr Benat Yakub), two miles below Lake Huleh, whence a road continued either W over the mountains via Safed or S through the Plain of Hazor to Capernaum and across the Plain of Gennesaret; then W through the Valley of Asochis (N of Sepphoris).

Once out on the open Plain of Esdraelon, caravans might deploy, some to nearby coastal destinations such as the port at Acco (Ptolemaïs) and others to far-off Egypt via a pass over the Carmel range, N of Megiddo. A shorter route to Egypt struck SW from the Plain of Gennesaret and passed N of Mount Tabor and near Nazareth, thence across the Plain of Esdraelon to Megiddo and down the coastal road. Another E-W road farther N passed through the Plain of Ramah, another passed by way of Sepphoris, and still another from Tiberias to Cana and near Nazareth via the Plain of Tor'an. Travelers on this route may have entered Galilee from the Decapolis at the Bridge of the Place of Assembly (Jisr el Mujami), about seven miles S of the Sea of Galilee. As far again to the S was another crossing, now known as the Bridge of Sheikh Hussein, between Pella and Beth-shan (Scythopolis), bringing travelers from the Decapolis (perhaps from Arabia) into the Plain of Esdraelon and to Acco. All these routes were more than local roads; rather, they were international highways which brought "Galilee of the Gentiles" into relationship with world trade and culture.

2. Its life. Life in Galilee was determined chiefly by the Lebanon Mountains, which gathered the beneficent moisture in the form of dew and snow and springs and literally poured it over the land. From as far as Mount Hermon, streams converged in the gorge of the Jordan, to the benefit of crops and cattle and the fishing industry around the Sea of Galilee. Terraced farms and orchards dotted even the N mountains, and grain and grass were abundant in the plains. With normal rainfall, crops were especially luxuriant in the valleys and plains of Lower Galilee, most of all in the Plain of Esdraelon. Simple but substantial industries developed, in processing the chief product such as olives and grapes and cattle. Oil, wine, fish, and grain were common exports. Another important source of income was the toll collected on the international trade routes. The taxes of Herodian Galilee supported an extensive building program under Herod the Great and Herod Antipas. Impressive public buildings were erected reflecting Hellenistic culture—such as baths, gymnasiums, theaters, and hippodromes, as well as entire new cities. The data on population are fragmentary and intricate, but a reasonable estimate for the first century would find about 350,000 Galileans, including a large slave element and about 100,000 Jews largely Hellenized. The primary language at this time was the universal Greek Koine, although many Jews spoke Aramaic, some with a local accent (Matt. 26:73). Herodian coins were inscribed solely in Greek.

The chief city of the old Galilee district was KEDESH-NAPHTALI, NW of Lake Huleh. It was often the scene of international conflict on the N border. The Persian conqueror designated it the capital of the satrapy of Galilee; Jonathan Maccabeus here won a battle against Demetrius of Syria; yet in the first century it fell to Tyre as the boundary of Galilee was pushed farther S to exclude it. Sepphoris was originally an influential agricultural town, situated almost in the middle of Galilee. In 55 B.C. the proconsul Gabinius of Syria chose it as administrative center for the district. Here the tetrarch Herod Antipas built up his capital after 4 B.C. In the revolt of A.D. 6 upon the death of the ethnarch Archelaus in Judea, Sepphoris was destroyed by Varus, proconsul of Syria, but was promptly rebuilt by Antipas and became the largest city of Galilee, with perhaps forty thousand residents. It lay only four miles N of Nazareth, and near a major E-W trade route. Safed was the highest town of importance in Galilee, standing 2,750 feet high in the NE mountains as they rise to the peak at Mount Jermak. However, it was not isolated, for one road from the Bridge of the Daughters of Jacob to Acco passed this way. The town was really part of the Galilee lake region and received daily supplies of fish in abundance. The moisture of the mountains permitted luxuriant vineyards and citrus groves. It later became one of the four largest cities, and one of the two sacred Jewish cities, in Galilee. It is not reported that Jesus ever visited this territory, nor is the city named in the Bible.

Some of Galilee's most important cities were around the shore of the Sea of Galilee, the NW quadrant of which was more Jewish. CAPERNAUM, at the N end, W of the Jordan mouth, was a lively and prosperous fishing town as well as a Roman military post. CHINNEROTH (3) was one of the oldest towns and lay on the NW coast on the edge of the Plain of Chinneroth, through which several streams flowed into the Sea of Galilee. This small and rich valley was known also as the Land of Gennesaret (modern el-Ghuweir). Tarichaea (MAGDALA), at the W-center of the lake, was a busy center for the processing of fish for export. TIBERIAS was a new city on the W shore, built ca. A.D. 25 by Herod Antipas as his capital to replace Sepphoris, and named to honor the emperor. Although this city was at first avoided by Jews because of a necropolis on the site, it later became the chief center of rabbinic learning and leadership, and one of two sacred cities in Galilee. The names Chinneroth, Gennesaret, and Tiberias, all were applied to the great lake also. Although the E half lay outside Galilee, it was often referred to as a part of Galilean life.

The religious worship in this northerly Gentile region was related to the many popular cults which had spread around the Mediterranean. Archaeological remains attest to the presence of these cults in Samaria, Phoenicia, Syria, and Transjordan. Shrines to numerous deities must have existed in the larger cities of Gentile Galilee, especially in a Roman town like Tiberias, and would have been found even in the more Jewish towns. They represented the normal and traditional worship of the Gentile majority in Galilee. The difficulties encountered in the religious relationship between Gentiles and Jews may be symbolized by one requirement—that Jews refrain from business dealings with Gentiles for three days before a Gentile religious festival. Synagogues likewise were to be found throughout Galilee, not only in towns primarily Jewish, like Capernaum, but also in towns primarily Gentile, like Sepphoris. A score of ancient synagogue structures have been discovered in Galilean towns, built ca. A.D. 200-600. The most impressive among these is the white limestone synagogue at Capernaum which was erected near the lake in the third century.

3. Jesus of Nazareth. In the light of history, Galilee's most significant period was the thirty-year span of the life of Jesus of Nazareth, and especially the short "active ministry" during which he proclaimed his gospel of salvation. This remarkable event has had far greater effect upon mankind than the concentration of national conflicts in this little "galil of the nations." Almost the entire career of Jesus of Nazareth lay within the borders of this tiny region. It is reported that he traveled once with his disciples to Caesarea Philippi, E of the Jordan and about thirty miles N from his home in Capernaum (Matt. 16:13; Mark 8:27). The same evangelists report another journey of about the same distance to the "border of Tyre" (Mark 7:24, Nestle), or to the "district of Tyre and Sidon" (Matt. 15:21), where he met the Syrophoenician woman whose daughter he cured. Upon occasion, Jesus entered the Greek territory E of the Jordan (Mark 7:31; 5:1 and parallels), especially the fishing town of Bethsaida (Mark 6:45; 8:22; Luke 9:10). He may have traveled to Jerusalem through the E district of Perea, although such a journey through Samaria is much more certain.

The gospel record does not encourage a conclusion that Jesus regularly attended the major festivals in Jerusalem. Galilean Jews were lax in the matter of personal attendance at the temple—this attitude was symbolic of the modified orthodoxy of Jews in the galil of the Gentiles. Much of the teaching of Jesus was not acceptable to orthodox interpreters; indeed, he gained a reputation for unusual and controversial interpretation. Although he was aware of the traditional and habitual understanding of the Torah, which pressed for acceptance more especially in Judea, he manifested a freshness and independence of mind as to the meaning and application of the Law, consonant with the religious spirit of the galil.

After his baptism by John, Jesus apparently withdrew from his family in Nazareth and adopted Capernaum as his home, quite possibly staying, when in town, at the home of Peter. Here on the shore of the lake he secured his first disciples, from among the fishermen. All the Galilean episodes recorded in the gospels are related to the Sea of Galilee, with but few exceptions. He may have made one later visit to Nazareth, where he appeared in the synagogue (Matt. 13:54; Mark 6:1-2). There is reported an episode in the town of Nain, six miles S of Nazareth (Luke 7:11); also, the wedding in Cana, NE from Nazareth (John 2:1). Mention has been made of a visit to Caesarea Philippi. All the rest of the gospel account, prior to the passion narrative, is in the setting of the Sea of Galilee. Even here, not many different towns are visited. Jesus preached mainly at the N end of the lake, most of all near Capernaum and repeatedly in Bethsaida. He speaks of his activity in Chorazin also and deplores the poor response in all three of these cities (Matt. 11:21-23; Luke 10:13-15). There is no gospel report of his going farther S, to Magdala or Tiberias.

He seems to have shared neither the revolutionary spirit of his fellows in Sepphoris nor the pro-Roman attitude of the residents of Tiberias. He preached the gospel of salvation mainly to the Jews, but also to Samaritans and Gentiles (including Romans). He would have encountered Pharisees and scribes in Galilean cities, but rarely a Sadducee or a priest. The controversies reported in the gospels in the Galilean setting deal with interpretation of the law and its observance, rather than with the ritual or conduct of temple worship. Although Jesus held many debates with scribes in Galilee, it was his defiance of the hierarchy in Jerusalem that resulted in his crucifixion.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, II (1867), 330-449; E. W. G. Masterman, Studies in Galilee (1909); W. F. Albright, "Among the Canaanite Mounds of Eastern Galilee," BASOR, no. 29 (Feb., 1928), pp. 1-8; N. Glueck, The River Jordan (1946). K. W. CLARK

GALILEE, SEA OF [ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας]. The larger lake in N Palestine, the chief feature of the Jordan waterway and of Galilean life.

1. Name. This ancient basin has been called by several names during the period of Hebrew history. The earliest of these was Chinnereth (see CHINNEROTH 1), from as early as the fifteenth century B.C. This was the name of a walled town referred to in Josh. 11:2; 19:35, identified with modern Tell el 'Oreimeh on the NW coast of the lake (see bibliography). The name may mean "harp," and the observation has been made that the tell is so shaped. The name has been applied to the adjacent hill, to the plain (I Kings 15:20), and to the lake (Num. 34: 11; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 12:3; 13:27). Some have described the lake as harp-shaped, but the logic of this connection would lead to the conclusion that the name was first assigned to the lake. This is a priori less likely, and it is furthermore to be doubted that the earth-bound ancients would have recognized the silhouette of the lake, even from the surrounding heights. A later name for the lake was Gennesar (see GENNESARET), used in Maccabean and NT times (I Macc. 11:67; Luke 5:1). This name also is understood to belong to the town called Chinnereth and to the district of the plain (Matt. 14:34; Mark 6:53).

In the second century the lake was called Tiberias (John 6:1; 21:1), clearly derived from the city built by Antipas. It is this name that persists in the modern Arabic name, Tabariyeh. At about the same time, Pliny writes that the Lake of Gennesaret is by some called Tarichaea, from the name of the town (Nat. Hist. V.15.71). But the name by which the lake is best known is GALILEE, an old name for the region to the W. Although the name means "ring, circle," it is not likely that this is the reason it was applied to the lake; it is more plausible that the name was first given to the district, in recognition of the circle of Gentile nations which had infiltrated the region. In fact, the name as applied to the lake does not appear until the gospels use it.

The Greek name in the gospels was originally translated into English as "sea of Galilee," although this body of water is actually a fresh-water inland lake. The explanation for this is quite simple: the NT term θάλασσα is in the Greek ambiguous and may mean (in our usage) either a sea or a large lake. This is true also of the underlying Semitic term, ים. Wyclif and Tyndale chose the word "sea," which has been retained in most other translations. Luke, however, wrote λίμνη, and so also did his contemporary Josephus. Pliny chose the term lacus. These latter terms are properly translated as "lake" (so the RSV in Luke 5:1; 8:22, 33). In I Macc. 11:67 the simple term ὕδωρ is properly translated "water" of Gennesaret.

2. Formation. The shape of the Lake of Galilee is most like a great heart (more so than like a harp or a pear, as some have suggested). It is ca. thirteen miles long (N-S) and at its greatest width ca. eight miles, between el-Mejdel (Tarichaea) and Khersa (Gergesa). Its waters vary from green to blue, encircled by a ring of yellow or green—depending upon the season. The high mountains around it fall off sharply, especially on the E side, and thus indicate a conformation which reaches a considerable depth—around two hundred feet below the surface, which is itself almost seven hundred feet below sea level. Almost surrounded by mountains of considerable height, the lake is a vast bowl with an extended lip on the NW (the Plain of Gennesaret) and open at the N and S ends. As a natural phenomenon, the lake and the Jordan rift are of great age, the result of volcanic activity in the Cenozoic era. Around the lake, the action of basaltic intrusions and cappings have modified the limestone mass of the mountains.

On the E the cliffs of the Jaulan Plateau present a steep face to the lake, overhanging a plain less than a mile wide. On this side may be identified the ancient Gergesa (modern Gerga or Khersa), the setting for the stampede of swine that rushed down the cliff and were drowned (Mark 5:1 and parallels; although the texts have differing names, the episode requires a lakeside locale). On the W side of the lake the mountains form an amphitheater, leaving a narrow plain along the lake on which several important towns were situated. Toward the S, sulphuric hot springs are found which heat up at times, even creating hot streams under water. Directly W of the lake the distinctive Horns of Hattin rise to two thousand feet, capped by the flow of an extinct volcano. The highest neighboring mountains, although at a greater distance, lie to the NW where the town of Safed looks down from 2,750 feet over the lake.

The Galilee waters drain from as far N as Mount Hermon, and at one time formed a single long lake throughout the entire course to the Dead Sea. The lake has long been restricted to its present area, and the streams from the N first collect in a large, reedy marsh 230 feet above sea level, now called Lake Huleh (Semechonitis in Jos. War III.x.7; IV.i.1). The lake itself is ca. 3½ miles long and 3 miles wide, and teems with fish and birds. A notable patch of papyrus grows here, extending for miles across the lake and marsh. From Lake Huleh the waters rush rapidly down through a single narrow gorge of 10 miles to pour into the greater lake at the N end 930 feet lower. Nearing the lake, the land opens out eastward into a marsh where numerous additional but shorter streams flow directly into the lake. Moving around to the NW, one finds another open plain (el-Ghuweir) bordering for ca. 3 miles along the lake and reaching back into the hills for ca. 2 miles. This is the fertile Plain of Gennesaret (Chinnereth), the most productive and populous area along the coast. Through it several streams flow into the lake, chief of which is the "waters of Merom" (Josh. 11:5). The outlet of the lake is at the SW point in the area of hot springs, and there the lowland fans out to the E in a triangle between the Jordan and Yarmuk rivers.

3. Settlements. The lake was an active center of Galilean life, and to it or near it most of the roads of Galilee passed. Although the E cliffs did not invite traffic, travelers from the E crossed the Jordan rift both above and below the lake, which might then be approached along the N and W coast. Other roads fanned out from the lake, westward to Acco (Ptolemaïs), southwestward to Caesarea and along the coast, and southward to Judea. Local roads to Kedesh, Ramah, and Sepphoris followed the plains. Travelers and merchants converged about the lake in the course of their activities. Fish from the lake region were transported in all directions locally, as well as to Damascus, to Jerusalem, and even to Spain.

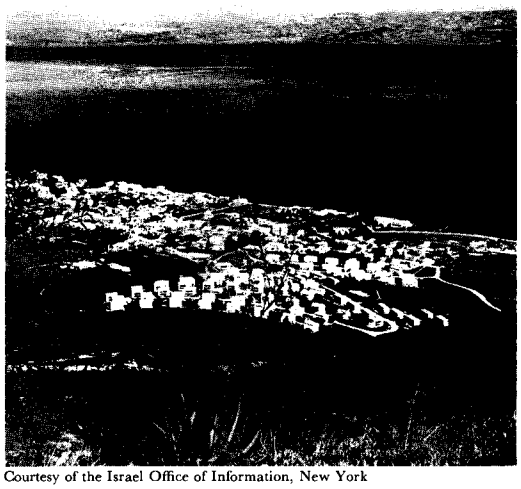
Jesus of Nazareth, an artisan from a small town in the highlands, made a major change when he took up life in the city of CAPERNAUM in a center of the fishing industry and in the subtropical climate of the lake (Matt. 4:13; Mark 2:1). This city stood at the N end of the lake, three miles W of the Jordan and on the N edge of the Plain of Gennesaret. It was chiefly Jewish but a cosmopolitan center to which Galileans gravitated, like Nathanael from Cana, and Mary from Magdala, and Philip and the brothers Andrew and Peter from Bethsaida on the other side of the Jordan. Among the early acquaintances of Jesus in Capernaum were the associates in a large fishing partnership, including Zebedee and his sons (James and John) with the brothers Simon and Andrew (Mark 1:16; Luke 5:2-10), besides their employed assistants. This group owned at least two fishing boats; and it was they who had the marvelous catch, on the occasion when Jesus first encountered them (Luke 5:2-7). The Roman centurion whose servant Jesus healed (Matt. 8:5; Luke 7:2) is a reminder that Capernaum was a Roman military and customs post on the international highway. This Gentile official had contributed to the building of the synagogue in which Jesus taught.

Next to Capernaum, BETHSAIDA, meaning "the fishing place," drew the attention of Jesus. Three of his followers had been born there, and occasional trips across the lake were made to it (Mark 6:45; 8:22). It lay at the N end of the lake, in the delta E of the mouth of the Jordan, not far from Capernaum. It was in the Hellenistic territory ruled by the tetrarch Philip, who built it up to the grandeur of a city ca. 3 B.C., and named it Julias for the daughter of Augustus (Jos. Antiq. XVIII.ii.1). It is reported that Jesus retreated here from the Galilean authority of Antipas (Matt. 14:13; Luke 9:10). Some distance from Bethsaida, in an isolated place, was the setting for the episode of feeding a crowd that gathered to hear Jesus teach (Matt. 14:13; Mark 6:32). This was a boat journey away from Bethsaida (Mark 6:45), probably on the E shore and a considerable distance from Bethsaida (Matt. 14:24; Mark 6:48). This was one of the occasions when a characteristic squall struck the lake (Matt. 14:24; John 6:18); another occasion was the longer sail to the E side at Gergesa (Mark 5:1 and parallels). Galilean fishermen have held respect and caution for these treacherous storms (especially after noontime), caused by cold winds from the W, or from Mount Hermon channeled down the gorge, which create a sudden tempest in the warm air covering the low-lying waters.

Another lake town of importance was CHORAZIN, lying away from the shore ca. two miles N of Capernaum and on the international highway. The gospels record no episode here, although it is stated that Chorazin and Bethsaida and Capernaum have failed to respond to the extensive activity of Jesus in all these cities. Once in the gospels, following the feeding of the crowd, it is mentioned that Jesus and his disciples landed on the shore of the Plain of Gennesaret, where at once people gathered about him to be healed. It is not at once clear whence these people might have come, for there is not known to be any town nearer than Capernaum and Magdala. The ancient town of Chinnereth, once so important, had long since fallen into ruin. The N part of the lake constituted the entire gospel setting for the activity of Jesus, from Capernaum around to Bethsaida—adding the single visit to Gergesa, where Jesus met only the demoniac. No preaching is recorded S of the Plain of Gennesaret, an area known to be Gentile.



On the S edge of this plain was the town of MAGDALA, which Pliny and Josephus call Tarichaea (Nat. Hist. V.15; Antiq. XX.viii.4; War II.xiii.2; III.x.1). Tarichaea is a late Greek name which means "preserving," and it describes the chief industry of the town, whose exports of salted fish were sent throughout the Roman world. Along with Tiberias, it was a focus of revolt and one of the last places in Galilee to yield to Vespasian. Probably the most important city on the lake was Antipas' capital, TIBERIAS. In the time of Jesus the city had no Jewish residents to whom he might have preached, because Jews deliberately avoided ritual contamination from the necropolis there. It was wholly a Gentile city, with Hellenistic architecture and customs and religion—in the heart of Roman Galilee. Although the coastal plain was narrow at this point, the city was crowned with a guardian acropolis on the dark basaltic rock where Antipas located his palace above the town. Its greatest attraction was its medicinal springs, which even won over the Jews in later years when Jerusalem gave way to the pagan Aelia Capitolina. The Sanhedrin was moved from Sephoris to Tiberias, where was developed the chief center of Jewish learning in the West. Fig. TIB 62.

There are several lesser towns around the S portion of the lake, none of which is mentioned in the NT. A mile S of Tiberias is Hammam (see HAMMATH 2), characterized by its many splendid bath-

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

3. Hills surrounding the Sea of Galilee

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

4. The Sea of Galilee, with modern Tiberias in the foreground houses, for here is the central area of the medicinal springs. It was suburban to the capital and attracted visitors in large numbers. Sennabris, Philoteria, and Semakh lie closer to the outlet of the lake, the last being E of that point. Hippos stands back on the E cliff, and farther N on the coast lies Gamala.

Excavations around the Lake of Galilee have uncovered the synagogues in some of its cities. Most famous is the white limestone structure of Capernaum, built ca. A.D. 200. In contrast stands the black basalt synagogue of Chorazin, which was perhaps a hundred years old when the town was destroyed ca. 350. The synagogue discovered in Arbela (two miles SW of Magdala-Tarichaea) may have been built in the second century by R. Nitai, while the one in Hammath (SE near Gadara) was built ca. 400 and destroyed by fire ca. 550. The last Jewish king to rule over any part of Galilee (or, in history) was Agrippa II (A.D. 56-100). His puppet kingdom was actually E of the Jordan, while Galilee proper was ruled by a Roman procurator. But Nero gave to Agrippa the Galilean lakeside cities of Tiberias and Magdala-Tarichaea, as well as Bethsaida-Julias with fourteen surrounding villages. When Agrippa died, these were all incorporated into the Roman province of Syria.

Figs. GAL 3-4.

Bibliography. E. W. G. Masterman, Studies in Galilee (1909); E. Huntington, Palestine and Its Transformation (1911), pp. 180-98; W. F. Albright, "Among the Canaanite Mounds of Eastern Galilee," BASOR, no. 29 (Feb., 1928), pp. 1-8; G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1931), pp. 439-63; N. Glueck, The Jordan River (1946), pp. 1-59.

K. W. CLARK

GALL (HERB) [ראש, rôš; χολή]. A bitter and poisonous herb; its juice, perhaps Conium maculatum L., is commonly thought to be the "hemlock" poison which Socrates drank. ראש is usually mentioned with WORMWOOD (Deut. 29:18—H 29:17; Jer. 9:15 KJV; 23:15 KJV; Lam. 3:19; "hemlock" in Amos 6:12 KJV), implying bitterness and tragedy. The KJV uses "gall" in these places and also in Ps. 69:21—H 69:22; Jer. 8:14; Lam. 3:5. The RSV translates ראש as "gall" only in Lam. 3:19. Elsewhere, in the light of the context, it translates more generally as "POISON" or as something poisonous—i.e., "poisonous fruit" (Deut. 29:18), "poisoned water" (Jer. 8:14; 9:15; 23:15; lit., "water of poison"), "poisonous weeds" (Hos. 10:4), "poison" (Deut. 32:32; Ps. 69:21; Amos 6:12); also "bitterness" (Lam. 3:5).

"Wine . . . mingled with gall" (χολή) was offered to Jesus on the Cross (Matt. 27:34; cf. Ps. 69:21; Mark 15:23). The word has a symbolic meaning in Acts 8:23.

See also FLORA § A14*a*.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 78-80.

J. C. TREVER

GALL (OF LIVER) [מררה, from מרר, to be bitter]. This word represented originally simply the abstract concept "bitterness" (Job 13:26: "bitter things"). It then came to be applied specifically to the gall bladder (Job 20:25) and, in a slightly different grammatical form, to the bile (16:13). In Tob. 6:8 there is mention of the use of the gall of a fish for medicinal purposes.

R. C. DENTAN

GALLERY. The translation of:

a) אתיק (Ezek. 42:3, 5). An architectural feature of Ezekiel's temple complex of uncertain meaning. The reference is apparently to walkways along the side of the rooms of two secondary buildings. In the description of the main building the MT and KJV include this same word twice (41:15, 16), but the RSV emends to "walls" and "recessed frames."

b) רהט (Song of S. 7:5 KJV). The meaning is unknown, but the context suggests "tresses."

GALLEY [אני, 'oni, ship; cf. Akkad. anâtu, anûtu, etc., implements, furniture, tackle] (Isa. 33:21). A low and rather narrow seagoing vessel, propelled mainly by oars and used principally as a warship.

In Isa. 33:21 the phrase אני שיט, "ship of rowing," is translated "galley with oars" (KJV-RSV). If, as some maintain, Isa. 33 is of late date, the author may be thinking of the war navies of the Hellenistic kings. The only other allusions in the OT to rowed ships are to Tyrian vessels (Ezek. 27:6, 8, 26, 29). See SHIPS AND SAILING.

Bibliography. On the development of the galley in ancient times, see C. Singer, E. J. Holmyard, and A. R. Hall, eds., A History of Technology, I (1954), 741-43; II (1956; C. Singer, E. J. Holmyard, A. R. Hall, and T. I. Williams, eds.), 563-73.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

GALLIM găl'ĭm [גלים, heaps]. 1. The native city of Palti son of Laish, to whom Saul gave his daughter Michal as wife after his quarrel with her husband, David (I Sam. 25:44); possibly the same as 2 below.

2. A town of Benjamin on the route which Isaiah describes the Assyrian army as taking on its march to Jerusalem (Isa. 10:30). Albright, rearranging this passage on a metrical basis, places Gallim after Gibeah of Saul and locates it at Khirbet Kakul, half a mile W of Anata.

S. COHEN

GALLIO găl'ĭ ō. L. Junius Gallio Annaeus, mentioned in Acts 18:12-17 as PROCONSUL of Achaea, with headquarters at Corinth. He was son of the rhetorician M. Annaeus Seneca, and brother of Seneca the philosopher, millionaire, and tutor of Nero. He assumed the name Gallio when adopted by a wealthy friend and introduced to a political career. An inscription from Delphi clearly shows that he was proconsul of Achaea after the twenty-sixth acclamation of Claudius as imperator (see EMPEROR); this acclamation was given within a year after January 25, A.D. 52. Therefore Gallio was almost certainly proconsul either in 51-52 or in 52-53. This point is very important for the chronology of Paul's journeys.

While Gallio was in office, Jews at Corinth brought Paul before his judgment seat (which has been found in recent times) on the charge that the religion he advocated was contrary to law (Acts 18:13). Gallio refused to let Paul defend himself, and he dismissed the case on the ground that it involved Jewish law; in such matters he was unwilling to be a judge (vss. 15-16). Presumably his accusers were aware that Paul was protected by Roman law in a Roman COLONY and hoped for an administrative decision from the proconsul.

According to Gallio's own diagnosis, the climate of Achaea made him ill (Seneca Epistle CIV.1), and he was probably glad to return to Rome, where he became consul suffectus early in Nero's reign (Pliny Nat. Hist. XXXI.62). Involved in the conspiracy against Nero in which his brother lost his life, he won a temporary pardon but finally had to commit suicide (Dio Cassius History LXII.25; Suetonius Rhetoric).

Bibliography. F. J. Foakes-Jackson and H. J. Cadbury, The Beginnings of Christianity, IV (1933), 226-27; V (1933), 460-64 (K. Lake). H. J. Cadbury, The Book of Acts in History (1955), p. 44, with note 25. R. M. GRANT

GALLON. In John 2:6, μετρητάς δύο ἢ τρεῖς is translated "twenty or thirty gallons." (The KJV translates "two or three firkins." A firkin contains a little less than nine gallons.) See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § C4*o*.

GALLOWS. See HANGING.

GAMAD, MEN OF gā'măd [גמדים] (Ezek. 27:11); KJV GAMMADIMS găm'ə dĭmz. Men from a place in Syria (a seaside town near Arvad?), possibly to be identified with Kumidi, mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna Letters. Some scholars read "Gomerim," and equate it with Ugaritic gmrm. Men of Gamad were in the army of Tyre, according to Ezekiel's oracle against that city. H. G. MAY GAMAEL găm'ĭ əl. Apoc. alternate name for DANIEL.

GAMALIEL gə mā'lĭ əl [Γαμαλιήλ=גמליאל, recompense of God]. 1. An honored Pharisaic member of the Sanhedrin, who counseled moderation in the treatment of Peter and other apostles (Acts 5:34-39) and is said to have been Paul's teacher (Acts 22:3).

This Gamaliel (I, "the Elder") was the grandson of the famous Rabbi Hillel and the grandfather of Gamaliel II. He was the first to bear the title "Rabban" ("our Master, our Great One"), rather than the ordinary "Rabbi" ("my Master"). During the second third of the first century his learning and generous spirit greatly enhanced the prestige of liberal Pharisaism and effected its dominance after the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70. His general outlook is indicated by his liberalizing the amount of movement permitted certain groups on the sabbath (R.H. 2.5), and his forbidding husbands to annul divorce proceedings without their wives' knowledge (Git. 4.2).

Jewish tradition erroneously regarded him as president of the Sanhedrin (a position held by the high priest while the temple was standing), and expressed his importance by saying, "When Rabban Gamaliel the Elder died, the glory of the Law ceased and purity and abstinence died" (Soṭ. 9.15).

His caution concerning extreme measures against the apostles may have been due (a) to his characteristically tolerant and generous spirit, (b) to a wish to protect Pharisaic Judaism—in so many respects at one with the teaching of the apostles (e.g., on the resurrection of the dead)—from the mounting hostility of the Sadducean hierarchy, and (c) to a true piety which divined in the events he had witnessed the purpose and power of God at work.

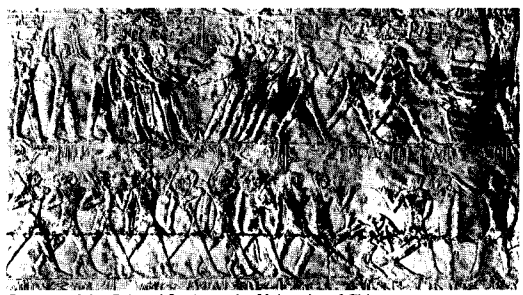
The reference in Gamaliel's speech to Theudas as prior to Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:36-37) and the assertion that Paul was Gamaliel's pupil (22:3) have caused scholars much difficulty. The only Theudas known to us, an insurrectionist of the time of the procurator Fadus (A.D. 44 ff), was beheaded by the Romans (Jos. Antiq. XX.v.1 ff). Judas' rebellion occurred in A.D. 6. Was there an earlier Theudas? Is Gamaliel's speech a confused construction by the author of Acts, possibly based on an inaccurate reading of Josephus or of one of his sources? Should the incident be placed later in the Acts sequence, perhaps in Acts 12, where a persecution of the church is described?

Was Gamaliel actually Paul's teacher? Why then the persecuting activities of the pupil, the lack of mention of Gamaliel in Paul's letters, the seemingly nonrabbinic (nonhalachic) character of Paul's exegesis, and the completely different attitude toward the law? Answers have been given, but not wholly satisfactory ones.

2. The leader of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54, 59; 10:23).

Bibliography. H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch, II (1924), 636-40; M. S. Enslin, "Paul and Gamaliel," JR, 7 (1927), 360-75; J. W. Swain, "Gamaliel's Speech and Caligula's Statue," HTR, 37 (1944), 341-49; J. Knox, Chapters in a Life of Paul (1950), pp. 34-40; F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles (2nd ed., 1952), 146-49, 400. E. P. BLAIR

GAME [ציד, צידה]; KJV VENISON. Game in biblical times consisted chiefly of "harts, gazelles, roebucks, and fatted fowl" (I Kings 4:23—H 5:3, in the list of Solomon's provisions). ESAU was Isaac's favorite because he provided him with game (Gen. 25:28); Jacob was thus able to disguise himself as his brother by bringing the same (ch. 27).



See also COOKING AND COOKING UTENSILS; FOOD § 1*a;* HUNTING. J. F. ROSS GAMES, OT. Of games and play the OT gives only scattered indications. But undoubtedly the Hebrew people had their games, for on occasion they were lighthearted; they had a sense of humor and enjoyed song and dance. See MUSIC; DANCE.

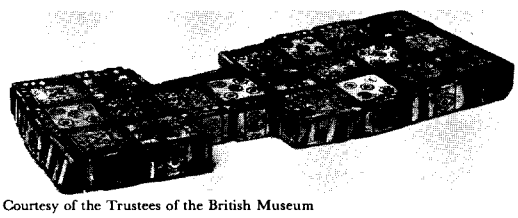
A contest was associated with the seven-day wedding feast in Judg. 14:12; Samson propounded a riddle involving a forfeit to be paid to the winner of the guessing contest.

Another contest is described in II Sam. 2:12-17. In this instance while waiting for the battle to be joined, twelve men were chosen from each side to engage in a contest of skill. It may have been boxing or WRESTLING,* for both are depicted in the art of the Near East. But it was more likely similar to fencing, since the result was fatal for both sides. Fig. WRE 27.

In Zech. 8:5 the prophet envisages the inhabitants of the restored city, the aged enjoying days of leisure and the boys and girls playing in the streets. Of the nature of their games there is no hint, but perhaps a suggestion is to be found in reliefs from Egypt which show girls dancing or playing a singing game and boys playing tug-of-war* and other games. Some archaeologists suggest that some of the molded clay figures may have been children's dolls. Job (21:11-12) also makes reference to carefree children engaged in singing and dancing. Fig. GAM 5.



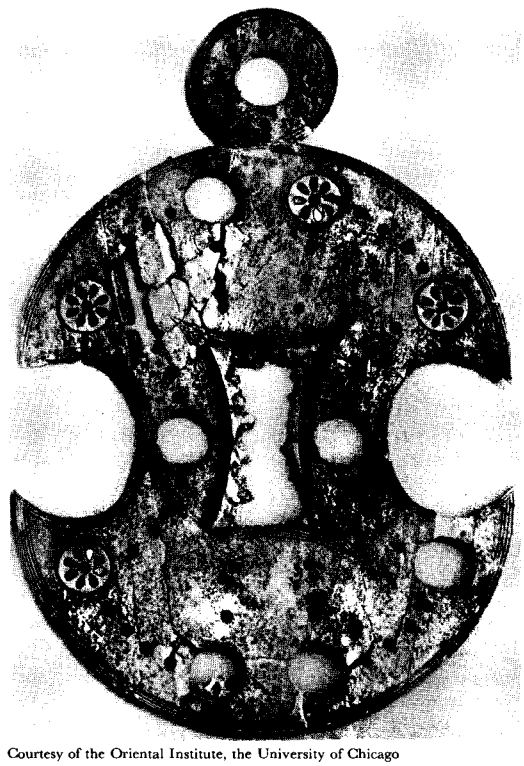
Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

5. Relief from a Sixth Dynasty tomb of Mereru-ka at Saqqarah, showing boys playing games (including a tug of war, on the top panel); Sixth Dynasty (ca. 2350-2200 B.C.)

In the Hellenistic period the Jews readily adopted the Greek games, and the gymnasium and the theater became popular, much to the disgust of the orthodox. Wrestling, discus throwing, chariot racing, and the more brutal contests of men and beasts in the arena are specifically mentioned (II Macc. 4:7-17; Jos. Antiq. XV.viii.1).

Archaeology has added much to our knowledge of games in OT times. Most interesting among the discoveries are the game boards and their accompanying playing pieces. In Palestine itself these have been found in a number of sites, among them Kiriath-sepher, Tell el-'Ajjul, Beth-shemesh, and Gezer. They were apparently introduced from Mesopotamia, where they were used as early as the twenty-sixth century B.C., and found in the Royal cemetery of Ur.* They were also common in Egypt.* The Palestinian game boards date from the sixteenth century B.C. in the Middle Bronze Age. Figs. GAM 6-7.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum



6. Inlaid game board, from Ur; Early Dynasty III (ca. 2500 B.C.)

7. An Egyptian wooden gaming box, from the time of Tut-ankh-Amon (1361-1352 B.C.)

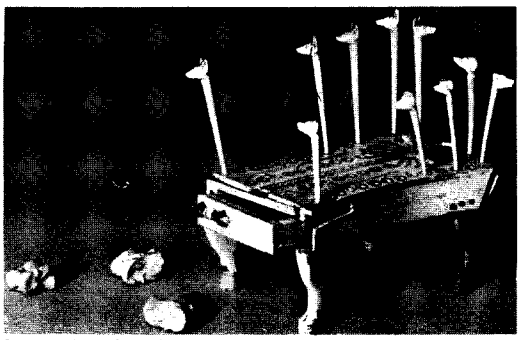
In craftsmanship the boards are often quite elaborate and ornate, some being inlaid with ivory, ebony, shell, gold, and blue paste. In shape the boards vary, but the most common is rectangular, divided into twenty or thirty squares (ca. 4/5 inch to the side) on which the playing pieces were moved. Some boards have a series of holes, and the playing pieces are pegs, similar to a cribbage board and pegs. One such game board from Megiddo has fifty-eight holes (Fig. GAM 8). At the promontory of Umm el-Biyara, a strategic lookout post and stronghold



Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

8. An ivory game board for the game of fifty-eight holes; from Megiddo (ca. 1350-1150 B.C.)

guarding the city of Petra (Nabatean period), game boards, as at Mizpah, were carved in the living rock. The boards consist of three boxlike outlines, roughly rectangular in shape, within which are to be found double parallel rows of nine, ten, and eleven small rectangles respectively. In modern times the mancala game board is still etched on the rock or sand.

Playing pieces took various forms. One set, associated with a Twelfth Dynasty Egyptian game board, consisted of ten pegs of ivory, five with heads of dogs, five with heads of jackals, so that the game has been referred to as "hounds and jackals."* An

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art; gift of Edward S. Harkness, 1926

9. Game of "Hounds and Jackals," played with ivory pieces on a board of ivory and veneer; to the left are three astragali (knuckle-bones); from the tomb of Renseneb, Thebes; Twelfth Dynasty (ca. 1990-1780 B.C.)

Courtesy of the Palestine Archaeological Museum, Jerusalem, Jordan

10. A limestone game board, with ten faïence playing pieces; in the lower right an ivory teetotum; from Debir (Tell Beit Mirsim), ca. 1800-1550 B.C.

earlier Egyptian set of playing pieces, fourteen in number, are roundels, seven of black shale inlaid with five white shell spots, seven of shell inlaid with five lapis spots. A set of ten pieces from Kiriath-sepher (Tell Beit Mirsim) is of blue faïence; five pieces are cone-shaped, five tetrahedrons. Figs. GAM 9-10.

With this latter set there was also an ivory teetotum, similar to a die, but in the form of a truncated pyramid. This was "pierced on four sides with varying numbers of holes, ranging from one to four." The movement of the players was thus determined by the cast or spin of the teetotum. In the game of "hounds and jackals" the movement of the pegs was determined by the cast of knucklebones.

Unfortunately we have no knowledge of the rules of play for these games. But there is ample evidence from archaeology that games were common.

Pl. XXIV.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "A Set of Egyptian Playing Pieces and Dice from Palestine," Mizraim, vol. I (1933), pp. 130-34, pl. XIV; J. D. Whiting "Petra, Ancient Caravan Stronghold," National Geographic Magazine, LXVII (1935), 139; W. F. Albright, The Excavation of Tell Beit Mirsim, vol. II: The Bronze Age, AASOR, vol. XVII (1936-37), pp. 48-49, pls. 21, 37; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANEP (1954), figs. 212-19; E. W. Heaton, Everyday Life in OT Times (1956), pp. 91-92; W. H. Morton, "Umm el-Biyara," BA, XIX (1956), 33-34.

R. F. SCHNELL

GAMES, NT. The word "game" is not found in the NT, but there are many references to various kinds of games and sports. See GAMES, OT.

Jesus referred to the games of the children, as they played weddings and funerals (Matt. 11:17; Luke 7:32). The soldiers cast lots for the garments of Jesus, probably using dice of some form (Matt. 27:35). The Greeks and Romans were great lovers of games and sports, and through their influence the Jews became acquainted with them. In I Macc. 1:14; II Macc. 4:9 we see Greek games introduced to the Jews as a part of the Hellenizing program of the Seleucids. Josephus often mentions the efforts of the Herodian family to force the Greco-Roman games upon the Jews. Many of the more pious Jews resisted these games for various reasons. They came from Gentile, pagan sources. They were often connected with the worship of pagan deities. Athletes would often appear completely naked. And often there were much brutality and bloodshed, especially in the gladiatorial games of the Romans.

The most important of the Greek games were the Olympic at Olympia, the Pythian at Delphi, the Nemean at Argos, and the Isthmian on the Isthmus of Corinth. Competitions were held in foot races of various distances, chariot races, horse races, boxing, wrestling, hurling the discus and javelin, etc. The competitors went through a long, severe period of training under very specific rules. The rules of the games themselves were carefully observed. Those who were winners were given only crowns of leaves, olive, pine, laurel, or parsley, but they were held in very high honor by their fellow citizens.

It is easy to see how lessons could be drawn from these games. In I Cor. 9:24-27, Paul urges the Corinthians to play the game so as to win the prize, to keep themselves fit by exercising self-control, and to fight with a definite purpose rather than beating the air. Heb. 12:1-2 urges the running of a good race in the presence of the great crowd of heroes of former days, and of Jesus himself, the greatest of them all. Gal. 2:2 speaks of running a race in vain; 5:7, of running well. In Phil. 2:16, Paul speaks again of running in vain; and in 3:14 he uses the figure of pressing toward the goal to win the prize. In II Tim. 2:5 the young minister is urged to faithfulness in living up to the rules of the Christian life, as he is reminded that athletes do not win their prizes unless they compete in accordance with the rules of their games. Other, briefer references are made to games throughout the NT. S. A. CARTLEDGE

GAMMADIMS. KJV form of "men of Gamad." See GAMAD, MEN OF.

GAMUL gā'məl [גמול, possibly weaned or benefited] (I Chr. 24:17). A chief of the Levites.

GANGRENE. See CANKER.

GAR. KJV form of GAS.

GARDEN [גן, גנה, enclosure; גנן, surround, defend; κῆπος]. A fenced plot of ground used for various purposes. The fence might be a stone or mud brick wall or a hedge. See ORCHARD; EDEN, GARDEN OF.

In some parts of the Near East the garden might be extensive, adjoining the residence of some wealthy and influential person. It was often irrigated (Isa. 58:11) and might have a shelter built in it. The king's residence probably included an elaborate garden or private park (II Kings 25:4).

Gardens were used in many different ways. With trees planted in them, they were valuable for shade, and one might go walking or hold a banquet in his garden. With a pool installed, the garden might be used for bathing (Sus. 1:5-7). In addition to such recreational uses, gardens were places where flowers, herbs, or vegetables were cultivated (Song of S. 5:1; 6:2). Fruit and olive trees, as well as grape vines, were planted in gardens, and in the latter two cases there might be a press (see GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE). Gardens may have been used for worship (Matt. 26: 36) and for observing idolatrous rites (Isa. 65:3). They were also used as burial places (II Kings 21: 18; John 19:41) H. N. RICHARDSON

GAREB gâr'ĕb [גרב]. 1. An Ithrite or, more probably, a Jattirite, who was one of the mighty men of David known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:38; I Chr. 11:40). If one follows the reading of the MT, Gareb will then be an Ithrite—i.e., a member of the Ithrite family from Kiriath-jearim (I Chr. 2:53); but if the text is repointed on the basis of sound textual evidence (LXX: B^{ab}, A; Syr.), Gareb will then be from the city of Jattir, located SW of Hebron.

E. R. DALGLISH

2. A quarter of Jerusalem, presumably located on the SW hill; mentioned in the prophecy of Jer. 31:39 on the restoration of the city.

GARIZIM. KJV Apoc. form of GERIZIM.

GARLAND. The translation of three words:

a) לויה (Prov. 1:9; 4:9; with emendation, 14:24; KJV ORNAMENT OF GRACE), "something twisted, a wreath."

b) פאר (Isa. 61:3, 10; KJV BEAUTY; ORNAMENTS), an object worn as a sign of joy—e.g., by a bridegroom. See HEADDRESS; TURBAN 1.

c) Στέμμα (Acts 14:13), a wreath or chaplet wound around a priest's staff or worn on his head. Garlands were among the offerings for sacrifice brought by the priest of Zeus in honor of Paul and Barnabas at Lystra. See CROWN; HEADBAND; HEADDRESS.

J. M. MYERS

GARLIC [שומים, šûmîm; Aram. תומא, tûmâ; Arab. thûm; Akkad. šûmu]. A bulbous vegetable of the lily family, Allium sativum L., noted for its pungent odor. The Hebrews in the wilderness at Taberah (i.e., "burning") craved garlic and other foods they had had in Egypt (Num. 11:5). Herodotus (II.125) tells of an inscription on the great Pyramid of Cheops which listed garlic as one of the vegetables supplied in great quantities to the builders.

See also AGRICULTURE; FLORA § A3*b;* FOOD.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), p. 32. J. C. TREVER

GARMENT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS; FESTAL GARMENT; LINEN GARMENT.

GARMITE gär'mīt [גרמי, gentilic of גרם, Gerem (bone)] (I Chr. 4:19). Designation of Keilah in the list of Judah.

GARNER. GRANARY, a barn, a store. The noun "garner" is now nearly obsolete, and "granary" is commonly used instead, except, perhaps, in rhetorical language. "Garners" is the translation of מזו in Ps. 144:13. The KJV uses "garner(s)" also to translate אוצרות in Joel 1:17 (RSV STOREHOUSES; elsewhere אוצר=TREASURE; TREASURY; STORE; STOREHOUSE) and ἀποθήκη in Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17 (RSV GRANARY; elsewhere KJV-RSV BARN).

In Isa. 62:9 a participial form of the verb "gather" or "remove" (אסף) is rendered "those who garner" (KJV "they that have gathered"). In this sense the verb means "to store" crops, in a granary—i.e., to gather them for preservation. H. F. BECK GARRISON [מצב; מצבה, maṣṣābhâ; נציב; KJV מצבה, maṣṣēbhâ (Ezek. 26:11; RSV correctly PILLAR); all from נצב, to take a stand, be stationed]. A body of troops stationed for defense, usually on a frontier post.

In the tenth century B.C. the Philistines had garrisons placed deep in Judean territory: at Gibeath-elohim (I Sam. 10:5; see GIBEAH), at GEBA (I Sam. 13:3), and at Bethlehem (II Sam. 23:14; I Chr. 11: 16). After their subjugation by David, the latter extended his own kingdom in turn and was able to place Israelite garrisons in Aram of Damascus (II Sam. 8:6) and in Edom (II Sam. 8:14; I Chr. 18:13). According to the Chronicler (II Chr. 17:2), Jehoshaphat placed garrisons not only in Judah but also in certain cities of Ephraim which his father, Asa, had taken from Baasha. Elsewhere, however, Asa is portrayed as more or less at the mercy of the N kingdom (cf. I Kings 15:16-24). J. W. WEVERS GAS găs [Γάς] (I Esd. 5:34); KJV GAR gär. Ancestor of some among the sons of Solomon's servants. The name is omitted in the parallel Ezra 2:57.

C. T. FRITSCH

GASH [גדד]; KJV CUT. To inflict incisions on the person as a sign of mourning or in the ecstatic worship of pagan deities (Jer. 41:5; 47:5; 48:37; cf. Hos. 7:14, where the RSV follows the LXX in reading גדד in place of גרר). See also MUTILATION.

GASHMU. See GESHEM.

GASPAR găs'pər. In late tradition a king of India and one of the three Magi. See MELKON.

GATAM gā'təm [געתן]. An Edomite clan chief (אלוף געתם, perhaps "clan chief of Gatam"]; son of ELIPHAZ 1 (Gen. 36:11, 16; I Chr. 1:36).

GATE [שער, cleft, opening; πύλη, πυλών, θύρα]. The doors (דלת), beams (קורה), bolts (מנעול), and bars (בריח) are often mentioned (cf. Neh. 3:3, 14). The leaves (דלת), the opening (פתח, "entrance"), often by synecdoche stand for it and are translated "gate."

The gate of the city served for defense and as a "civic center." In II Sam. 18–19 details of a doubtlessly typical gate appear. There were two gates (two sets of piers?), a chamber above the gate over the double piers, and a roof above that which served as a lookout. The gate was the news center; David had but to appear there for the army and his supporters to recover their morale, which had been shattered by rumors of his grief over Absalom.

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

11. Damascus Gate, the principal gateway to the old walled city of Jerusalem

"Within your gates" may mean "within your towns" (so RSV; Deut. 12:12, 15, 17, 21, etc.). The gate (i.e., the space inside the gate) might be the place of market (II Kings 7:1, 18) or the place where the elders and judges or king might sit officially (Deut. 21:19; 22:15; Ruth 4:1, 11; II Sam. 18:24; Isa. 29:21), and so might be synonymous with the court of judgment (Amos 5:12, 15). For the gates of the Jerusalem temple, see especially Ezek. 40–47. Cf. also the gates of the tabernacle (Exod. 27:16; 35:17; etc.).

See also CITY; TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, §§ B2*b-c*.

Fig. GAT 11. C. C. MCCOWN

GATE BETWEEN THE TWO WALLS [שער בין החמתים]; KJV GATE BETWIXT THE TWO WALLS in Jer. 39:4. A city gate to the SE of Jerusalem (II Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7); perhaps identical with the FOUNTAIN GATE.

GATEKEEPERS. See DOORKEEPER; PRIESTS AND LEVITES § C3.

GATH găth [גת, wine press; Akkad. Gimtu, Ginti]; GITTITE gĭt'īt. One of the five principal cities of the PHILISTINES. It lay inland considerably S of Ekron, being farther E and nearer to Judah than any of its sister cities. Because of its position it changed hands from time to time, now and again coming under the control of Judah. Hence it is mentioned some forty times in the OT, though in a few instances other places of similar name may have been intended (see below).

Like other Philistine cities, Gath was considered by the Israelites an old city of Canaanite times, once inhabited by the Anakim, a race of giants (Josh. 11:22; see ANAK). A reference in the Amarna Letters (see TELL EL-AMARNA) confirms its antiquity (No. 290, line 9: Gimti). There are traces of early conflict with the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin (I Chr. 7:21; 8:13, possibly referring to another place farther N). Joshua did not take it, and it became Philistine (Josh. 11:22; 13:3). When the captured ark (see ARK OF THE COVENANT) proved troublesome in Ashdod, it was then taken to Gath, where it again proved troublesome and was sent on to Ekron (I Sam. 5:6-10; 6:17). A late tradition implies that Gath and Ekron were taken by Israel in the time of Samuel (see Commentaries on I Sam. 7:14). However, these places remained Philistine at this time. Goliath, the huge Philistine champion, was a Gittite—i.e., a man from Gath (I Sam. 17:4, 23; II Sam. 21:19)—carrying on the tradition of the Anakim as to size. Other giant Philistine warriors also came from Gath (II Sam. 21:20-22; I Chr. 20:5-8). When the Philistines were defeated by Israel, they were able to flee for safety to Gath and Ekron, their two nearest cities (I Sam. 17:52).

David, in flight from Saul, attempted to take refuge with Achish, king of Gath, but was not well received, according to one tradition (I Sam. 21:10-15; Ps. 56:1). According to another tradition, David was welcomed, and actually entered the service of Achish, being willing to fight against the Israelites if necessary (I Sam. 27:1–28:2; 29). In his lament over Saul and Jonathan, the Philistine character of the city is made obvious (II Sam. 1:20). When David wished to delay bringing the ark to Jerusalem, he entrusted it for safekeeping to "Obed-edom the Gittite" for three months (II Sam. 6:10-11; I Chr. 13:13). It is not certain that this man came from the Philistine Gath (see OBED-EDOM 1). I Chr. 18:1 states that David took Gath in his final wars with the Philistines, but the parallel in II Sam. 8:1 reads METHEGH-AMMAH. In any case, whether through conquest or through friendships formed during his service under Achish, David was able throughout his later career to command the services of a Philistine bodyguard, a band of most loyal supporters, under the command of Ittai the Gittite, who finally rose to be one of David's three top commanders (II Sam. 15:18-22; 18:2, 5).

During the time of Solomon there seems to have been easy communication between Jerusalem and Gath, either because of friendship or because of political control by Solomon. The Gittite king was still Achish by name, possibly the same man who had befriended David long before (I Kings 2:39-42). According to II Chr. 11:8-10, Rehoboam fortified Gath, it being considered one of the cities of Judah (ca. 922 B.C.). Perhaps this explains why Hazael of Aram (Syria) felt it necessary to take Gath in a campaign against Jerusalem in the time of Jehoash of Judah (ca. 837-800 B.C.—II Kings 12:17, if the Philistine Gath is meant; again, a place farther N would seem more fitting). At this time the city apparently reverted to the Philistines, for shortly thereafter Uzziah of Judah (ca. 783-742) attacked it in a campaign against the Philistines and partially destroyed it (II Chr. 26:6). Sargon II speaks of conquering and despoiling Gath and other rebellious cities of the area in connection with his campaign of 711 B.C. Thereafter it seems to disappear from history. Amos 6:2 probably refers to it as an example of a destroyed city. "Tell it not in Gath" (II Sam. 1:20; Mic. 1:10) had perhaps become proverbial as a phrase of disaster; it is also just possible that Micah was actually warning of the impending invasion of 711 (see IB on Mic. 1:10-16). Lists of Philistine cities in the prophetic writings noticeably omit Gath (Amos 1:6-8; Zeph. 2:4; Jer. 25:20; Zech. 9:5; cf. Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 6:17). It does not appear in the Apoc., the NT, or in Josephus in relation to events after 750 B.C. It is mentioned briefly in Euseb. Onom. and in Jerome's commentary on Mic. 1:10.

Because of the obscurity of the place since the eighth century B.C., it is not strange that a number of sites have been proposed from time to time as the location of Gath. The two best proposals seem to be Tell es-Safi, ca. twelve miles E of Ashdod, and Tell Sheikh Ahmed el-'Areini, near 'Araq el-Menshiyeh, ca. fifteen miles E of Ashkelon and some seven miles S of Tell es-Safi. Those who accept the latter identification generally place Libnah at Tell es-Safi.

Wine presses were common in ancient Palestine; hence there were various places named Gath, usually with some qualification. See GATH-HEPHER; GATH-RIMMON; MORESHETH-GATH; GITTAIM.

Bibliography. F. J. Bliss and R. A. S. Macalister, Excavations in Palestine During the Years 1898-1900 (1902), pp. 63-66, favors Tell es-Safi. W. F. Albright, "The Sites of Ekron, Gath, and Libnah," AASOR, II-III (1923), 7-12, strongly favors Tell Sheikh Ahmed el-'Areini. See also: G. Beyer, "Gath," ZDPV, LIV (1931), 135-45. K. Elliger, "Die Lage von Gath," ZDPV, LVII (1934), 148-52. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 325-26. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 286, 425, 489. B. Mazar (Maisler), "Gath and Gittaim," IEJ, IV (1954), 227-35, equates several references with Gittaim, to the N, near Lod; "Tell Gath," IEJ, VI (1956), 258-59, is a brief report on excavations at Tell Sheikh el-'Areini.

W. F. STINESPRING

GATH-HEPHER găth hē'fər [גת החפר]; KJV GITTAH-HEPHER gĭt'ə hē'fər [גתה חפר] in Josh. 19:13. A border town in the territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13); the home of the prophet Jonah, a contemporary of Jeroboam II of Israel (II Kings 14:25). It is probably to be identified with Khirbet ez-Zurra', a fairly extensive site located ca. three miles NE of Nazareth. Surface explorations have shown that it was occupied in Iron I and II (i.e., ca. 1200-600), and so in the period of Jonah, and probably in the Late Bronze period (ca. 1550-1200) also. A short distance to the N of the remains is the village Meshhed, the traditional site of the tomb of Jonah.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "New Israelite and Pre-Israelite Sites: The Spring Trip of 1929," BASOR, 35 (1929), 8.

G. W. VAN BEEK

GATH-RIMMON găth rĭm'ən [גת רמון, Gath (wine press) by the pomegranate]. 1. A Danite city (Josh. 19:45) assigned to the Kohathite clan of the Levites (Josh. 21:24; I Chr. 6:69—H 6:54); probably to be identified with Tell ej-Jerisheh on the S bank of the River Yarkon (Nahr el-'Auja) near the mouth of the Wadi Musrara. It may also be the Gath (k n t), no. 63 of the list of Thut-mose III (1490-1436). Typical early Hyksos fortifications were found at Tell ej-Jerisheh.

2. A Levitical city in Manasseh (Josh. 21:25); one should probably read "Ibleam" (BILEAM) here with I Chr. 6:70—H 6:55 and the LXX.

Bibliography. B. Maisler, "The Excavations at Tell Qasile," IEJ, no. 1 (1950), p. 63, note 4, and the references noted there; Y. Yadin, "Hyksos Fortifications and the Battering Ram," BASOR, 137 (1955), 26.

V. R. GOLD

GAULANITIS gôl'ə nī'tĭs [גולן, see below; Γαυλανῖτις]. That portion of the Transjordan Plateau immediately E of Galilee.

Gaulanitis extended from the cliffs which rise steeply along the Jordan Valley to an indefinite boundary on the E with TRACHONITIS and Batanea. On the S the border was the Yarmuk, and on the N the districts of Ulatha and Paneas.

Although not mentioned in the Bible, Gaulanitis was apparently named for a city in the OT, "Golan [גולן] in Bashan" (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8). The city was still in existence in the time of Josephus (War I.iv.4, 8). As part of the kingdom of Herod the Great, he willed Gaulanitis to his son Philip in 4 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. XVII.viii.1). After Philip's death in A.D. 34 it was added to the Roman province of Syria (Jos. Antiq. XVIII.iv.6), but later it was given to Herod Agrippa I by the Emperor Caligula (Jos. Antiq. XVIII.vi.10). It formed part of the kingdom of Herod Agrippa II when it took part in the Jewish revolt against Rome in A.D. 66-70 (Jos. War IV.i.1; Life 37).

Like the BASHAN of the OT, Gaulanitis was famed in NT times for its rich crops. Apparently it was more thickly populated then than it is now, although it is still fertile. The modern name for the same territory is Jaulan, which still preserves a form of the "Golan" of the OT, for which it was named.

Bibliography. G. Schumacher, The Jaulan (1888); F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1933), 155, 158.

D. C. PELLETT

GAULS gôlz [Γαλάται, see GALATIA]. A people, often called Celts by ancient writers, who were found chiefly in what is now France and North Italy; but they invaded Macedonia, Achaia, Thrace, and even Asia Minor, where many settled and became known as Galatians. I Macc. 8:2 reports that the Romans had defeated the Gauls, perhaps in Asia Minor but probably in Western Europe (so RSV). II Macc. 8: 20 tells of the (unauthenticated) defeat of Gallic mercenaries (from Asia Minor?) by a determined army of Jewish soldiers. Possibly Crescens went to Gaul for missionary work (II Tim. 4:10); the reading εἰς Γαλλίαν, fairly well attested, would certainly mean "to Gaul"; the somewhat better attested reading, εἰς Γαλατίαν, could refer to Gaul as "Galatia" but more probably means "to Galatia" in Asia Minor.

Bibliography. W. M. Ramsay, A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (1900), pp. 45-52; W. Lock, The Pastoral Epistles (1924), p. 117; A. H. M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces (1937), ch. 4. F. V. FILSON

GAUZE, GARMENTS OF [גלּיון]; KJV GLASSES. An item of finery of the daughters of Zion (Isa. 3: 23). Besides filmy shawls (from the root meaning "uncover" or "reveal") and mirrors, the word has also been interpreted as referring to glittering little plates of metal. The same word is used in Isa. 8:1 of something to write on (see TABLET). H. G. MAY

GAZA gā′zə, gä′zə [עזה, 'azzâ; Egyp. Gadatu, Gedjet; Akkad. Ḫazzatu, Azzati; Γάζα; modern Arab. Ghazzeh]; KJV AZZAH ăz′ə in Deut. 2:23; I Kings 4:24; Jer. 25:20; GAZITES gā′zīts; KJV GAZATHITES gā′zə thīts. A city in SW Palestine, best known from the Bible as the southernmost of the five principal cities (pentapolis) of the PHILISTINES; located ca. three miles from the seacoast, on the road to Egypt.

The first pronunciation given above is the standard English pronunciation of the biblical place name; the second is applied to the modern city by travelers, diplomats, commentators, etc., under the influence of the Arabic form of the name.

The city had a long history and was usually regarded as a place of importance, being mentioned about twenty times in the Bible and often in other literature. It was not a seaport (the nearby coast afforded no safe harbor), but rather was the land gateway between Egypt and Asia for caravan and military traffic. There is even evidence for trade with S Arabia.

Biblical tradition regards Gaza as ancient, going back into Canaanite times (Gen. 10:19; Deut. 2:23). This is borne out by the earliest Egyptian reference (Annals of Thut-mose III), mentioning Gaza as an important Egyptian-held town at which Thut-mose stopped near the beginning of his first campaign into Asia, ca. the year 1468 B.C. (see also Taanach Letter No. 6, BASOR, XCIV [1944], 24-27). The TELL EL-AMARNA Letters show the town still loyal to Egypt but in grave danger, like the rest of Palestine, from the incoming HABIRU (late Eighteenth Dynasty, ca. 1360 B.C.). The Nineteenth Dynasty restored Egyptian power; later Egypt weakened again (ca. 1200 B.C.). The Israelites were at first able to get a foothold in the region (Josh. 10:41; 11:22; 15:47; Judg. 1:18; 6:4), but the incoming Philistines soon took over the S coastal territory, and Gaza became identified with them (Deut. 2:23; Josh. 13:3; Judg. 16:1-2, 21; I Sam. 6:17). The territory of Solomon reached near Gaza but did not include it (I Kings 4:24).

Amos 1:6-7 condemns the city for its slave trade with Edom. This attests very active business enterprise, not always of the most ethical kind. We may compare the Minean (S Arabian) inscription telling of the importation of a female temple slave from Gaza. The prophetic oracle, if actually from Amos, would be dated about the middle of the eighth century B.C. Shortly after this, Tiglath-Pileser III (744-727), in his campaign against Damascus and Israel (733-732), also attacked and captured Gaza. Its king, Hanno, perhaps a leader in the anti-Assyrian conspiracy, fled to Egypt. However, he was soon able to return and resume his plotting, for ca. 721-720 his forces, in alliance with the Egyptians, fought a battle with Sargon II S of Gaza. This time he was captured and deported to Assyria, to be heard of no more. The city was now loyal to Assyria, so that Hezekiah, king of Judah, attacked it in his anti-Assyrian revolt (II Kings 18:8). This eventually brought down Sennacherib, who took away considerable territory from Judah, dividing it between Sillibel, the new pro-Assyrian king of Gaza, and other Philistine rulers (701). A king of the same name (the same man or a successor) paid tribute to Esarhaddon (680-669), the conqueror of Egypt, and to Ashurbanipal (668-633), the last strong king of Assyria. It is perhaps to this period, when the Philistines were holding Judean territory with the help of Assyria, that we can assign the bitter oracle against Gaza and the Philistines found in Zeph. 2 (note vss. 4-7, 13-14).

When Pharaoh Neco went N ca. 609 to support crumbling Assyria against the rising Chaldeans, he probably took Gaza into protective custody (Jer. 47: 1; Herodotus History II.159). Jeremiah predicted that the Chaldeans would overwhelm Gaza, along with Judah, the rest of Philistia, and other surrounding nations (25:20; 47:5). Inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar (605-562) show us the kings of Gaza, Judah, and other nearby principalities in captivity at Babylon.

Gaza and the Philistines continued into postexilic times, still being disliked by the Jews (Zech. 9:5). The city was incorporated into the Persian Empire at the time of Cambyses (525), though it remained virtually independent. It resisted Alexander for two months (332). The Philistines had disappeared by this time, and the population was made up of Persians and Arabs. Many of these were massacred, and the city was badly damaged. It was restored and became a center of Hellenism. In Maccabean times it yielded to Jonathan (I Macc. 11:61-62), but later plotted against the Jews and was virtually destroyed by Alexander Janneus (96 B.C.), so that certain Greek writers referred to it as ἔρημος, "desert(ed)." It was ordered rebuilt by the Roman general Gabinius (57 B.C.)—according to some, on a new site a short distance away—so that for a while there were two Gazas, though the original site eventually reasserted itself. This may have a bearing on the exegetical problem in connection with the last biblical reference to Gaza, Acts 8:26. Authorities are sharply divided as to whether the word ἔρημος, "desert," in this verse refers to the road or to the old, nearly abandoned city (see the Commentaries).

In Roman times Gaza was a flourishing seat of pagan culture, and Christianity was established only after a long and sometimes bloody struggle (ca. A.D.

400). It was taken ca. 635 by the Muslims, and, except for a brief interlude during the Crusades, has remained strongly Muslim to the present day.

The reference in I Chr. 7:28 KJV should read AYYAH. In I Macc. 13:43 GAZARA should be read. Because of the presence of the modern city on the old site, and other difficulties, no significant archaeological work has been undertaken here. The excavated site of Tell el-'Ajjul can hardly be considered one of the former locations of Gaza; it is rather to be identified as BETH-EGLAIM. During Hellenistic and Roman times there was a small seaport on the coast, bearing the name Maioumas, later changed to Constantia when it went over to Christianity. Another similar place just to the N was called Anthedon or Agrippias. The suggested derivation of the word "gauze" from Gaza is uncertain (cf. "damask" from Damascus, which is certain).

Bibliography. In addition to dictionaries and encyclopedias in English, consult F. Vigouroux, ed., Dictionnaire de la Bible, III (1903), 118-23, the best treatment of the classical and patristic sources. M. A. Meyer, History of the City of Gaza (1907), a dissertation, with good bibliographies. W. J. Phythian-Adams, "Reports on Soundings at Gaza, Etc.," PEQ (1923), pp. 11-36. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), Index of Names, pp. 529, 543. E. G. Kraeling, Rand-McNally Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 417-18, the latest attempt to deal with the exegetical problem in Acts 8:26.

Among the more interesting Greek sources are: Arrian Anabasis of Alexander II.25-27; Plutarch Lives, Alexander XXV; Polybius Histories XVI.22*a;* Jos. Antiq. XIII.xii-xiii.

W. F. STINESPRING

GAZARA. Apoc. form of GEZER.

GAZATHITES. See GAZA.

GAZELLE [צבי; feminine צביה in Song of S. 4:5; 7:3—H 7:4, plural צבאים in I Chr. 12:8—H 12:9; צבאות (Song of S. 2:7; 3:5); cf. Akkad. ṣabītu, gazelle; Arab. ẓaby, gazelle; δορκάς (a proper name, Dorcas, in Acts 9:36, 39), probably the clear-eyed one, from δέρκομαι, to see clearly]; KJV ROE, ROEBUCK. A species of small ANTELOPE, with recurved horns (the subfamily Antilopinae among the Bovidae contains the gazelles), and one of the most graceful members of the antelope group. Two varieties may have been known in biblical Palestine: gazella dorcas, pale fawn in color, height at the withers twenty-one to twenty-two inches; and gazella arabica, dark smoky fawn in color, height ca. twenty-four to twenty-five inches (for Bodenheimer's views, see FAUNA § A2*f*ii). In biblical times the gazelle was probably the most abundant of the larger game animals (Tristram NHB 127-31).

Although not used for sacrificial purposes, the gazelle was a clean animal and could be eaten as food (Deut. 12:15, 22; 14:5; 15:22), and it is said to have graced Solomon's table (I Kings 4:23—H 5:3). Gazelles had to be hunted (which gives the author of Isa. 13:14 a figure for the fugitive Babylonians; cf. Prov. 6:5), but they were not easy to bag, for their speed of movement was proverbial (II Sam. 2:18; I Chr. 12:8—H 12:9). Their simple beauty and elegant form explain the gazelle similes applied both to the beloved and to the maiden in Song of S. 2:9, 17; 4:5; 7:3—H 7:4; 8:14. The oath in Song of S. 2:7; 3:5 ("by the gazelles or hinds of the field") is more difficult to understand. Possibly it was felt that the name of God should be left out of an adjuration concerned with human love, and there may have been some popular association of the gazelle and the hind with love-making which encouraged their use in this context. See bibliography.

Courtesy of the Cairo Museum; photo courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art

12. Tut-ankh-Amon (ca. 1361-1352 B.C.) shooting gazelles with a bow; from an Egyptian wall painting in Thebes

Fig. GAZ 12.

Bibliography. R. Gordis, The Song of Songs (1954), pp. 26-28.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

GAZER. KJV alternate form of GEZER.

GAZEZ gā'zĭz [גזז, sheep shearing(?)]. Apparently a Calebite family (I Chr. 2:46). The name is mentioned twice, both as a son and as a brother of Haran, but the verse is obscure and probably an addition.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 240.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

GAZITES. See GAZA.

GAZZAM găz'əm [גזם, some kind of bird or insect] (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:51). Alternately: GAZZAN găz'ən [Γαζηρα] (I Esd. 5:31); KJV GAZERA gə zē'rə. A family of NETHINIM.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 230.

GEAR [σκεῦος, vessel, implement, thing] (Acts 27:17); KJV SAIL. Equipment or apparatus.

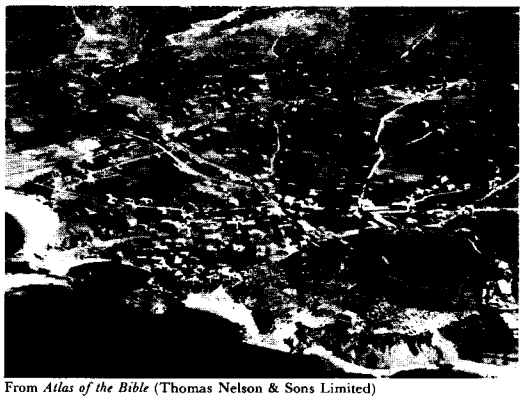
The context of Acts 27:17 indicates that this word is a nautical term, but the precise meaning is uncertain. Among the possibilities are: (a) "sail"; the phrase would then mean either "they lowered the sail" (cf. KJV) or "they shortened the sail"; this interpretation is supported by some minor MSS (including the Syr.) which read: τὰ ἱστία ("the sails"); (b) "ship's gear" (cf. RSV), such as ropes, sails, yards, pulleys; on being lowered they would be made fast on deck or stowed below; (c) "anchor," which would be let out to retard the progress of the vessel. See SHIPS AND SAILING.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

GEBA gē′bə [גבע, hill, height]; KJV GABA gā′bə in Josh. 18:24; Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30; KJV Apoc. GABDES gāb′dĭz. One of the cities given to the Levites (Josh. 21:17; I Chr. 6:60) out of the inheritance allotted to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24; I Chr. 8:6). This site represented the traditional N limits of the kingdom of Judah (II Kings 23:8; Zech. 14:10; cf. Neh. 11:31) and was the S guardian of the head of the Michmash Pass. It was situated E of Ramah and six miles N-NE of Jerusalem; both the ancient name and the site are preserved in the modern village of Jeba.

Because of its strategic situation, the site played an important role in the battles of Saul, Jonathan, and David with the Philistines (I Sam. 13:3, 16; 14:5; II Sam. 5:25; cf. I Chr. 14:16). In these and in related passages care must be exercised to distinguish the site from Gibeah and Gibeon, both of which are situated nearby and which are, at times, apparently confused with Geba in the Hebrew text (e.g., cf. II Sam. 5:25; I Chr. 14:16). Because of its strategic position, also, Geba was fortified by Asa with stones removed from Ramah (I Kings 15:22; II Chr. 16:6) and is listed by Isaiah as an important station in his visionary portrayal of the advance of a hostile army on Jerusalem from the N (Isa. 10:29). Subsequent to the Exile the site and its surroundings were repopulated by returnees from Babylon—many of whom were of Benjaminite extraction (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30; 11:31; 12:29). W. H. MORTON

GEBAL gē′bəl [גבל; Ugar. Gbl; Egyp. Kubni; Akkad. Gublu; Amarna Gubla; Βυβλος]; GEBALITES gē′bə-līts; KJV GIBLITES gĭb′līts. 1. A Phoenician city between Tripolis and Beirut; modern Jebeil. Figs. GEB 13-14.



The ancient Gebal was situated on a slope on the Phoenician coast, N of Berytus (Beirut). It was a center of trade and shipbuilding. The famous cedars of Lebanon, unsurpassed as material for shipbuilders, were found in the neighborhood and made Gebal an important city for all nations and kings who needed ships. It was situated sufficiently far from the Egyptian, Amorite, and Assyrian centers to evade complete domination by the great powers, but at the same time it was a convenient meeting place for trade and culture.

Gebal is one of the most ancient cities in the Near East, and its history can be traced far back. At the bottom of the tell, close to virgin soil, objects have been found together with human bones, indicating that a Mediterranean race was living in Gebal in Neolithic times. Members of this race were rather small and delicately built. They lived in circular huts or in houses with rounded angles. Their dead were buried in large earthen pots. What language they spoke is not known. Toward the end of the fourth millennium B.C., however, this civilization vanished rather suddenly.

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

13. Excavations at Gebal showing Roman columns and Middle Bronze Age foundations

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

14. Aerial view of Gebal

At the same time traces of a new civilization are found, not only in Byblos, but in all Phoenicia and Canaan.* They represent an urban form of life, and in Byblos a new style of architecture was used. Temples and houses were built, and the new city was guarded by a wall. New technical inventions are found—i.e., the wheel, sailing ships, the potter's wheel. Above all a new metal, bronze, was important. It was introduced by people coming into Phoenicia from the N. They were not the only ones to invade the country; Semites had also mixed with the former population. These different peoples mixed to form a new people, called Phoenicians by the Greeks, and one of their most important cities at the end of the fourth millennium was Gebal. Fig. PHO 53.

Objects which have been dug out in the ruins of the temples in Gebal are witnesses that the Egyptian influence in this Phoenician city was very great at a time which goes far back in history. A cylinder from the Thinite epoch (ca. 3000 B.C.) has been found, and also vases with the names of different Pharaohs, Mycerinus (twenty-seventh century B.C.), Unis and Pepi (twenty-fifth and twenty-fourth centuries B.C.), and others.

The Egyptian interest in Gebal was certainly not only of a religious character. Gebal exported jars with oil, spices, wine, leather, and other products. The Egyptians also needed ships, and to build ships they must have cedars and spruce from Lebanon. In the annals of Snefru (Fourth Dynasty, twenty-sixth century B.C.) there is an account of "bringing 40 ships filled with cedar logs" from Gebal.

At the end of the third millennium B.C., Gebal was destroyed and burned. A new city was built, and the names of the kings in the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries B.C. indicate that the rulers were Semites and most probably Amorites. But even if the leading classes were Amorites, the population was still mixed, now also with Hittites and Hurrians (Horites), who brought their bronze weapons and their ceramics from the N. There was also a certain cultural influence from the Aegean islands.

Toward the middle of the second millennium B.C., Hurrians, Hittites, and Mitannians for a short time ruled in Gebal, but then the names of the kings were again Semitic, now with the Aramaeans as the dominating element. The TELL EL-AMARNA Letters reveal that in the fourteenth century B.C., King Rib-Addi of Gebal was one of the few kings in these countries who remained faithful to the Egyptian Pharaoh. In the following centuries this situation changed. While Si-nuhe in his tale from the twentieth century B.C. tells that he was magnificently received in Phoenicia, Wen-Amon must report ca. 1100 B.C., that he met difficulties in Gebal and other Phoenician cities when he ordered lumber for Egypt.

Inscriptions written in a linear alphabetic system have been found, dating from around this time. The most important one is the Ahiram sarcophagus inscription from ca. 1000 B.C., found in Byblos in 1923.

Figs. GEB 15; MOU 72.

Courtesy of the National Museum, Beirut

15. Stone sarcophagus of Ahiram, king of Gebal (Byblos), with dedicatory inscription on the lid; relief on this side shows Ahiram on a "cherub" throne before an offering table and faced by seven figures (ca. 1000 B.C.)

In these centuries Gebal also took part in the great Phoenician expansion in trade and shipping. In the Bible the men from Gebal (Byblos) are mentioned as able seamen and master builders (I Kings 5:18—H 5:32; Ezek. 27:9; in Josh. 13:5 the land of the Gebalites is mentioned as not conquered).

Gebal shared the fate of the rest of Phoenicia, being conquered by the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans. Today the dominating ruins are from Greek and Roman times, together with the great castle built by the Crusaders in the eleventh century A.D.

Bibliography. M. Dunand, Fouilles de Byblos, vol. 1 (1937-39); M. Dunand, Byblia grammata (1945); W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine (1949), pp. 188-94.

2. A territory in the mountains S of the Dead Sea, near Petra; called Γεβαλήνη by the Greeks; today Gibal. It is mentioned in Ps. 83:7—H 83:8 along with other places in the S. A. S. KAPELRUD

GEBER gē′bər [גבר, (vigorous) man]. Son of Uri; one of the twelve commissariat prefects of Solomon. He had as his district the land of Gilead (I Kings 4:19). See BEN-GEBER.

GEBIM gē′bĭm [גבים, trenches]. A city of Benjamin, located on the route taken by the Assyrian army, according to Isaiah, in its march on Jerusalem (Isa. 10:31). On a metrical analysis of the passage Gebim is placed after Ai and Michmash; hence it was probably near the latter places, although the exact site cannot be identified. S. COHEN

GECKO gĕk′ō [אנקה (Lev. 11:30), possibly groan or groaner, from אנק, to cry, groan; LXX μυγαλῆ, shrewmouse; Syr. 'omaqtā, lizard; Targ. ילא, hedgehog]; KJV FERRET. A small, four-legged reptile of the family Geckonidae, of which there are ca. forty-nine genera. The ferret (KJV identification) is a member of the weasel family, allied to the polecat, bred chiefly for rabbit- and rat-hunting.

As the ancient versions indicate, the meaning of אנקה ('ᵃnāqâ) is uncertain, though its place in Lev. 11 points to a reptile, as the Syr. surmised. If its name is derived from a characteristic cry, the gecko suggests itself, for it utters a rapid chirping or clucking sound, and several varieties are found in Palestine (Tristram NHB 265-66). See bibliography.

See also FAUNA § A2*fv*.

Bibliography. In support of the translation "gecko," see I. Aharoni, RB, 48 (1939), 554-56. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

GEDALIAH gĕd′ə lī′ə [גדליה, Yahu is great]. 1. A musician, supposedly of David's time, to whom one of the postexilic Levitical families traced its line (I Chr. 25:3, 9).

2. Grandson of Hezekiah (perhaps thought by the writer to be the king of that name), and grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

3. Son of Pashur; one of the Jerusalemite princes that counseled Jeremiah's death (Jer. 38:1-6).

4. Exilic governor of Judah under Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:22-26; Jer. 40:6–41:18). The contemporary seal of "Gedaliah who is over the house" was discovered at LACHISH. Gedaliah's father had protected Jeremiah (Jer. 26:24), and the son probably shared the prophet's moderate political views, thus winning Nebuchadnezzar's confidence. Jewish nationalist fanatics, led by Ishmael of the exiled royal house, murdered him while they were guests in his official residence in Mizpah. Figs. GED 16; SEA 35, no. 24.

By permission of the Trustees of the late Sir Henry S. Wellcome

16. Seal of Gedaliah with the inscription: "(belonging) to Gedaliah, who is over the house"

5. One of the priests who put away their alien wives (Ezra 10:18; I Esd. 9:22). J. M. WARD

GEDDUR gĕd′ər. KJV Apoc. form of GAHAR.

GEDEON gĕd′ĭ ən. Douay Version form of GIDEON; also KJV form in Heb. 11:32; Jth. 8:1.

GEDER gē′dər [גדר, fence] (Josh. 12:13); GEDERITE —īt (I Chr. 27:28). A city of the Canaanites, conquered by Joshua. Since it is mentioned next to Debir, it was probably in the lowland (Shephelah) of Judah. It is not mentioned in the list of the cities of that tribe, and may have been abandoned; perhaps, however, it is the same as BETH-GADER.

S. COHEN

GEDERAH gĭ dĭr′ə [גדרה, wall, enclosure]. 1. One of the towns of the Shephelah in the allotment to Judah (Josh. 15:36). Certain descendants of Judah, engaged in the service of the king, are listed as dwelling here and in the city of Netaim (I Chr. 4:23). Probably Gederah is to be identified with modern Jedireh, ca. ten miles SE of Lod.

2. A city of Benjamin from which came Jozabad, one of David's Mighty Men, skilful in warfare, who joined his band at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:4). Perhaps it is to be identified with a Jedireh near Gibeon.

W. H. MORTON

GEDEROTH gĭ dĭr′ŏth [גדרות, sheepfolds]. A city of Judah in the Shephelah district of Lachish (Josh. 15:41); possibly to be located in the region of el-Mansurah. During the reign of Ahaz (ca. 735-715) the Philistines detached Gederoth from Ahaz' realm (II Chr. 28:18).

It has been identified with KEDRON (Κεδρών), fortified by Cendebeus and scene of the latter's defeat by John son of Simon Maccabeus (I Macc. 15:39; 16:9). V. R. GOLD GEDEROTHAIM gĭ dĭr′ə thā′ĭm [גדרתים, two sheepfolds]. A village of Judah in the Shephelah district of Zorah-Azekah (Josh. 15:36). The site is unknown.

It is the general consensus of scholarly opinion that וגדרתים ("and Gederothaim") should be read וגדרתיה ("and her sheepfolds") with the LXX (καὶ αἱ ἐπαύλεις αὐτῆς). This correction of what is probably a scribal error would also reduce the number of places listed for this province from fifteen to fourteen, as the MT total (vs. 36) suggests. V. R. GOLD

GEDOR gē′dôr [גדור, wall(?), or pock-marked גדר; הגדור; cf. Arab. gadara]. 1. A person or family of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:31; 9:37).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

2. A city of Judah, mentioned after Beth-zur (Josh. 15:58). The mention of Penuel as the father of Gedor (I Chr. 4:4) may mean that he was its founder.

3. A Calebite city in Judah, mentioned with Soco and Zanoah; the founder was Jered (I Chr. 4:18). Two of David's followers, Joelah and Zebadiah, came from a Gedor (I Chr. 12:7), but it is not certain which city is meant.

4. A city mentioned as the limit of the conquests of the Simeonites (I Chr. 4:39); this should be emended to GERAR. S. COHEN

GE-HARASHIM gĭ hăr′ə shĭm [גיא חרשים, valley of craftsmen] (I Chr. 4:14); KJV VALLEY OF CHARASHIM kə rā′shĭm. Alternately: VALLEY OF CRAFTSMEN [גי החשים] (Neh. 11:35). A community of craftsmen named from a valley in the vicinity of Lod and Ono, on the S border of the Plain of Sharon. It is perhaps the modern Wadi esh-Shellal, the broad valley between Lod and Ono, on the main road between Joppa and Jerusalem. Alternately, the Sarafand el-Kharab, in a valley slightly farther to the SW, has been suggested.

Joab of Judah and of the lineage of Kenaz is represented as the "father" or founder of this community of craftsmen (I Chr. 4:14). Following the restoration from exile, the Valley of Craftsmen was resettled by Benjaminites (Neh. 11:35).

The origin of the name is uncertain, but it may preserve a memory of a Philistine iron monopoly when Israel's lack of smiths required the services of Philistine craftsmen for the sharpening of their various implements (I Sam. 13:19-20).

W. H. MORTON

GEHAZI gĭ hā′zī [גיחזי, גחזי, valley of vision(?)]. The servant (lit., "boy") of the prophet Elisha (II Kings 4:12; 5:20; 8:4). In the story of the Shunammite woman (4:8-37) Gehazi suggested to Elisha the gift of a son to the childless woman and her husband as a reward for her extended hospitality to them. He later bore the prophet's life-giving staff to the body of the boy when he had died of a head ailment (vs. 31). In the sequel (8:1-6) Gehazi is relating Elisha's wonders to the king when the Shunammite appears to ask, successfully, a boon of the latter. Gehazi is primarily known, however, for his dispassionate rudeness to the woman on the occasion of her appeal to Elisha on behalf of her dead son (4:27) and for the greedy cunning by which he attempted to claim for himself the reward which Elisha had refused from Naaman the Syrian, whom the prophet had cured of leprosy (5:19-27). Upon discovery of his servant's treachery Elisha cursed him with the disease of which Naaman had been cured. J. M. WARD

GEHENNA gĭ hĕn′ə [γέεννα]. Fiery hell. Gehenna is the Greek and Latin form of גיא הנם, "Valley of Hinnom" (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF), the name of a ravine S of Jerusalem, which, during the days of the monarchy, was the scene of an idolatrous cult involving the passing of children through fire (II Kings 23:10; II Chr. 28:3; 33:6; Jer. 7:31; 32:35; see MOLECH; TOPHET). In the first century B.C., this name came to be used in a metaphorical sense, to denote the place of fiery torment believed to be reserved for the wicked either immediately after death or ultimately after the Last Judgment.

The general idea of a punitive conflagration appears, to be sure, in earlier portions of the OT (e.g., Deut. 32:22; Isa. 33:14), but it is only in the Greco-Roman period of Jewish history that the quite distinct concept of a blazing hell—a lake, or abyss, of fire—begins to emerge (cf. Dan. 7:10; Enoch 18:11-16; 27:1-3; 90:26; Jth. 16:17; II Esd. 7:36; Asmp. Moses 10:10; 1QS III.4, 13; 1QH III.29; etc.). The concept was doubtless influenced by the infiltration of Iranian ideas, for the articulation of it is clearly patterned on the Avestan doctrine of the ultimate judgment of the wicked in a stream of molten metal (aya khšusta; cf. Yasna 31.3; 51.9; etc.). Nowhere in the Apoc., however (except in the very late passage II Esd. 2:39), is this place actually called Gehenna. The application to it of the ancient biblical toponym —inspired, no doubt, by Jeremiah's dire prophecy against the notorious valley (19:2-10)—first appears in the NT (Matt. 5:22, 29-30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5; Jas 3:6), though a foregleam of it may be recognized in Enoch 27:2-3, where reference is made to "the accursed valley" of the eternally damned.

Gehenna is clearly conceived by the NT writers as identical with the "lake of fire" into which Hades (i.e., Sheol, the general abode of the dead) will itself ultimately be cast (Rev. 20:14). The conception seems, however, to have been somewhat fluid, for sundry rabbinic statements dating from the first and second centuries A.D. declare that Jews, by and large, will be delivered from it, and that none of them will remain there permanently except certain historic reprobates, the adulterer, and he who shames or vilifies his fellow man (R.H. 16*b*-17*a;* B.M. 58*b*). Moreover, while Rabbi Akiba affirms expressly that the torment of Gehenna lasts only for twelve months (M. 'Edūyôth 2.10), Philo states just as explicitly that wicked Jews will indeed be condemned to Tartarus (On Execrations 6) and that their punishment will be eternal (On Cherubim 1); and in the pseudepigraphic Ascension of Isaiah (3:13-4:32) the fiery depths are the final abode of the vanquished Beliar (i.e., Belial). Lastly, the association with the Valley of Hinnom is by no means constant, the flaming hell being alternatively located (Ascension of Isaiah 4:14; II Enoch 40:12; 41:2) in the third heaven!

The typological use of the name Gehenna reflects a tendency, which developed during the Hellenistic period, to gear visions of the last days to the names of persons and places mentioned in the OT. Analogous are the use of Armageddon, in Rev. 16:16, to denote the site of the final battle against evil (cf. Zech. 12:11); of "the wilderness of Damascus," in the Dead Sea Scrolls, to designate the place whither the faithful would go into exile before the coming of the Messiah (cf. Amos 5:27); and of the terms "the new Jerusalem" and "Tophet" in eschatological contexts. Comparable, too, is the antithetical use of "Garden of Eden" (גן עדן) to signify the celestial paradise (cf. especially II Esd. 7:36: "The furnace [i.e., tŏpheth?] of Gehenna shall be disclosed, and opposite it the paradise of delight [i.e., גן עדן]"). This tendency, which helped at the same time to Judaize ideas adopted from foreign sources, has not yet received the attention which it deserves, but it is cardinal for an understanding of Jewish and Christian apocalyptic literature and, in general, of how the Scriptures were popularly interpreted during the crucial intertestamental period.

Gehinnom (the Hebrew form) is likewise employed in an extended, metaphorical sense in several passages of the Mishnah (Ḳid. 4.14; 'Edūyôth 2.10; Ab. 1.5; 5.19-20); and this usage passed subsequently into common Hebrew parlance, and is also to be found in the Koran (e.g., Sura 19.69). It may be added that the opprobrious expression "child of Gehenna [RSV 'hell']," applied in Matt. 23:15 to the scribes and Pharisees, is likewise applied in the Talmud (R.H. 17*a;* Keth. 65*a*) to the dissolute inhabitants of Mahoza, on the Tigris.

See also DEAD, ABODE OF THE.

Bibliography. On the general fluidity of the concept of a fiery hell, see I. Lévi, "Les morts et l'avènement de l'ère messianique," REJ, LXIX (1919), 125-26.

T. H. GASTER

GELBOE gĕl bō'ə. Douay Version form of GILBOA.

GELILOTH gĭ lī'lŏth [גלילות] (Josh. 18:17). See GILGAL 5.

GEM. See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

GEMALLI gĭ măl'ī [גמלי, camel owner(?)] (Num. 13:12). The father of Ammiel, who was sent from the tribe of Dan to spy out the land of Canaan. The name Gemalli may originally have derived from גמל, "to finish" or "to do someone good."

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 182.

R. F. JOHNSON

GEMARA gə mä'rə [גמרא]. The specific term for the discussions carried on in the rabbinic academies in ancient Palestine and Babylon on the Mishna, and which together with the Mishna constitute the TALMUD. The term is derived either (a) from an Aramaic root meaning "to repeat" and referring to that intellectual activity characteristic of the rabbinic schools of old which expressed itself in learning for learning's sake; or (b) from a Hebrew root meaning "to complete," for insofar as the discussion embodied in the Gemara take the form of a running commentary on the Mishna, they serve to supplement the Mishna and complete it. The Gemara also contains a vast amount of material which has little direct connection with the Mishna: legal reports, ethical maxims, homilies, historical information, and legendary lore. There are two Gemaras: the Palestinian, which originated mainly in Tiberias, in the third and fourth centuries; and the Babylonian, which grew out of Babylonian academies of Sura, Pumbeditha, and Nehardea during the period extending from the beginning of the third to the end of the fifth century.

I. EPSTEIN

GEMARIAH gĕm'ə rī'ə [גמריהו, Yahu has accomplished]. 1. An emissary from Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar who carried Jeremiah's letter to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:3). His father, Hilkiah, was probably neither Josiah's chief priest (II Kings 22:4) nor Jeremiah's father (Jer. 1:1).

2. Son of Shaphan the secretary, in whose temple chamber Baruch read Jeremiah's scroll (Jer. 36:10-12, 25). His son Micaiah heard, and reported to the palace. When, upon having the scroll read to him, Jehoiakim wished to destroy it, Gemariah was one of the princes who opposed.

3. Lachish Ostracon I (see LACHISH) mentions a "Gemariah son of Hissilyahu" (ca. 589 B.C.).

J. M. WARD

GENEALOGY. A biblical genealogy is an orderly list of names purporting to record either the pedigrees of individuals or the assumed relationships of such groups as families, clans, tribes, or nations. Lineage is traced through the male, with females mentioned only in comparatively rare instances—chiefly where they are of historical significance (Gen. 11:29; 22:23; Num. 26:33; 27:1-11). Arrangement of genealogies may be either by ascending scale (individual to ancestor; e.g., Ezra 7:1-5) or by descending scale (ancestor to individual; e.g., Ruth 4:18-23).

1. Hebrew terms
2. Motives for compilation
3. Nonpersonal genealogies
4. Personal genealogies
5. Reconstruction of genealogies
   a. Determination of interval
   b. Traditions
   c. Supplementary names
6. Postexilic genealogies
7. Difficulties in use of genealogies

Bibliography

1. Hebrew terms. The noun "generations" (תולדות), often used to introduce the late lists, signifies descent by birth and family relationship. Sometimes it is generalized to indicate simply "origin," as in the reference to the "generations of the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 2:4). Later Hebrew and Aramaic derive a verb "to register by families" (cf. I Chr. 4:33; 5:1, 7; etc.) from a noun "family register" (יחש; Neh. 7:5). The basic implication of the latter is legitimacy or nobility of birth.

2. Motives for compilation. Among the motives responsible for the compilation of the genealogies are: (a) individual identification for such legal purposes as inheritance, etc.; (b) establishment of rights to such social positions as nobility, kinship, and priesthood and to the rights and privileges thereto pertaining (cf. Ezra 2:59-63); (c) proof of racial purity; (d) prideful demonstration of relationship to an eminent worthy of the past; (e) strengthening of position or authority by tracing its origin back to an important ancestral appointment to that post.

Scarcely any personal genealogical data are found in the historical books Judges, Samuel, and Kings, nor any trace of officials responsible for assembling or preserving such records. In agreement with general Near Eastern usage, including that of the Arab Bedouins, whose kinsmen are reckoned only to the third generation with but a vague knowledge or complete ignorance of earlier kinsmen, early Hebrew family records (cf. Exod. 35:30) reach only to the "third and the fourth generation" (Exod. 20:5). As late as the Persian period, only once in the Jewish Aramaic papyri does identification of a witness reach the fourth generation.

3. Nonpersonal genealogies. Hebrew history is traced back to Adam, the ancestor of all (Gen. 5:1 ff), and even the early pre-exilic narratives contain "genealogical" lists going back to Adam. But the "genealogies" found in the earliest documents of the Pentateuch (J and E) are not individual pedigrees. Rather, they are supposed origins and recognized relationships of nations, cities, and people known to the author, set into the form of personal genealogical tables. While the early Hebrews may have believed the names represented individual progenitors of the groups named, the device of genealogical table, used also by the Greeks, Romans, and others for recording early "history" in a compact form, is a valuable didactic and mnemonic aid.

The antediluvian lists (Gen. 4:17-26; 5:3-31) are probably dependent upon Babylonian traditions. The descendants of Noah, set into the pre-exilic narrative (Gen. 10:8-19, 21, 24-30) and expanded by the priestly writer in the postexilic period, contain, not personal names, but those of peoples or tribes (Sheba, Dedan); countries (Media [Madai], Egypt [Miṣraim]); and even cities (Sidon). Sometimes the name form is gentilic (Jebusite, Hivite, Amorite) and even plural (Ludim). Since neither Elam nor Lydia is Semitic in origin nor are Hittites descendants of Canaanites, it is clear that the basis of relationship is not that of blood but is cultural and historical. The postdiluvian link between Shem and Abraham (Gen. 11:12-24) has likewise been shown to be geographical, representing place names in NW Mesopotamia, in the region associated with Abraham and his kinsmen.

Near kinsmen of the Hebrews are introduced into the historical narrative as tiny genealogical bits reflecting independent traditions. Moab and Ammon (Gen. 19:37-38) are related to Abraham through his nephew Lot. Of the Aramean kinsmen of Abraham (Gen. 22:20-24), at least Uz, Buz, Hazo, and Chesed are found elsewhere as place names, homes of Arameans in the Syrian desert (Job 1:1; 32:2, 6; Jer. 25:20, 23). Tebah and Maacah, less directly related to the Hebrews, appear as place names in the Bible (II Sam. 10:6, 8; cf. I Chr. 19:6-7). The Arabs (Gen. 25:1-4), introduced as descendants of Abraham, include such familiar place names as Midian, Sheba, and Dedan.

Thus the early "genealogies" are largely geographical and ethnic lists rather than individual pedigrees. A still unresolved problem is the point at which the genealogies become personal and individual. Some scholars believe that the lists have group significance through the whole tribal period, that the names that appear as persons are actually but eponyms, that concubines in contrast to wives indicate subordinate or mixed groups, that marriages represent consolidation of groups, etc. Others are inclined to recognize personal genealogies from the time of Abraham onward.

4. Personal genealogies. Extended personal genealogies do not develop until late. Most of them are incorporated in the work of the postexilic priestly writers and in that of the Chronicler. Not until the acceptance of the Deuteronomic law stressing the purity of the congregation (Deut. 23:2-8) was need felt for complete family records. Possible references to such data are found in Jer. 22:30; Ezek. 13:9. When the Deuteronomic reforms gave prestige to the Levites, they had a motive for constructing genealogies that showed their relationship to the great priests and religious leaders of the past. When there was danger that Hebrew minorities in exile might lose their identity, stress on racial purity increased, and individual and family pedigrees were constructed. From Babylon came Nehemiah and Ezra, insisting on racial purity and the purging of their people (Ezra 2:59-63; 10:9-44; Neh. 13:23-28). Then written proof of purity of descent was essential, and the construction of pedigrees increased.

5. Reconstruction of genealogies. The assembling of genealogies extending back from the Persian period (sixth-fourth centuries B.C.) to the patriarchal age (ca. 1900 B.C.), from the vague traditions and fragmentary family records which may have survived was a difficult task. The situation was analogous to that of the time of Caliph 'Omar I (A.D. 634-44), when the prescription that spoil taken from "infidels" was to be distributed among pensioners on the basis of kinship with Mohammed and participation in his early struggles, stimulated the interest in genealogy that was already current in pre-Islamic times. Men sought to prove the essential relationships. The late Arab pedigrees then assembled greatly resemble those of the Bible, and the means of their construction seem to have been quite similar. Earlier scant and incomplete family records and traditions were supplemented by additional names, often sheer inventions, to fill the embarrassing gaps.

a. Determination of interval. Before the proper number of generations can be assembled, a genealogist must have some estimation of the interval to be covered by the list and of the average extent of a generation. It is impossible to determine exactly the duration of a generation, since the figure varied from period to period, from a hundred years (Gen. 15:13, 16; Exod. 12:40) to as little as ten years (Bar. 6 [Letter of Jeremiah]:3). A generation should be from thirty to forty years (cf. Job 42:16). The term is once used for an actual thirty-eight years (Deut. 1:35; 2:14), for which the figure 40 would be used in ready calculation, and this figure seems to be the base used in genealogical calculation (cf. Ps. 95:10).

Some Jewish writers were ingenious, if not accurate, in producing chronological schemes which, by their symmetrical patterns, can be recognized as artificial. The interval between the Exodus and the founding of Solomon's temple was determined as 480 years (I Kings 6:1), and that between the founding of Solomon's temple and the founding of Zerubbabel's temple was believed to be equal to it. The genealogies of Christ in the gospels exhibit similar schemes, for the intervals involved are all based on multiples of seven names. Matt. 1:1-17 estimates the interval between Abraham and Jesus as forty-two generations symmetrically divided into three groups of fourteen generations each, even though some names must be used more than once to achieve such a result. Luke 3:23-38 has four series of names in multiples of seven, usually twenty-one to the series. For the period of David to the Exile, Matthew has fourteen generations (two times seven), while Luke gives twenty-one (three times seven), and similar figures are found for the period of the Exile to Jesus. Thus for the interval of David to Jesus, Matthew has twenty-eight generations, while Luke has forty-two —too great a difference to be reconciled. Not all the chronological schemes in the genealogies are as apparent as those in the gospels.

b. Traditions. Within the interval to be covered, approximately the correct number of names must be placed. Such data are of diverse origins. Some traditions about tribal affiliations persisted long after that tribalism was abandoned (cf. Luke 2:36; Rom. 11:1); and some brief, early lists (cf. Num. 26:58; Ezra 2:40; 3:9; Neh. 9:4) and possibly even some longer ones (cf. I Chr. 8:33-38) certainly were available. The Chronicler himself had some authentic extrabiblical information about earlier times. But, although the Chronicler insists that "all Israel was enrolled by genealogies; and these are written in the Book of the Kings of Israel" (I Chr. 9:1), it is doubtful that much genealogical data had survived in written form. Many old bits had never been recorded and were forgotten. Patriarchal tribal structure was lost in the monarchy, and war and exile doubtless took their toll on such family records as once existed. More complete and trustworthy are the postexilic records contemporary with the genealogists. Great gaps in pedigrees confronted the students of genealogy. Although they made sincere efforts to place the data, some of their sources were faulty, conflicting, and even spurious. Limited human judgment and copyist errors contributed to error in the result.

c. Supplementary names. Additional names, needed to fill the gaps in the genealogies, could be drawn from other lists of names, whether or not they were genealogies. Thus sixteen of the twenty-four priests and Levites assigned temple tasks by David (I Chr. 24) bear names characteristic in the postexilic period. Familiar Benjaminite names (Kish, Shimei, etc.) are introduced into the pedigree of Mordecai (Esth. 2:5), and even Machir and Mephibosheth are added in the Second Targum of Esther. At other times names in the same list are repeated, as in I Chr. 6:34-35*a* (cf. vs. 25); I Chr. 6:36-37 (cf. vs. 23). Clan and geographical names are often personified as "fathers" and "sons" (cf. I Chr. 2:18-24; 42-54). Some proper names are but corruptions of Hebrew words. Shuppim (I Chr. 26:16) is a distortion of "storehouses" (אספים; cf. I Chr. 26:15), and ישבי לחם (I Chr. 4:22 mg.) is a corrupt transcription of "they returned (to Beth)lehem." The very unusual "names" of the sons of Heman (I Chr. 25:4) are the Hebrew words of a fragment of a psalm: "Be gracious unto me, O Lord! Be gracious unto me! Thou art my God."

Differences in origin are responsible for many conflicts and discrepancies. Er appears as both brother (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:19-20) and son (I Chr. 4:21) of Shelah. Sheshan had no son (I Chr. 2:34), but Ahlai is credited to him (I Chr. 2:31). Zerubbabel's father is Pedaiah (I Chr. 3:19) or the latter's brother, Shealtiel (Ezra 5:2; Hag. 2:2; Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27).

6. Postexilic genealogies. Theoretically it should have been possible in the postexilic period for any Hebrew to prove his origin by tracing his line to his remote tribal connections. Actually, this was impossible, because only a few lines are fully developed, and collateral lines are dropped. By a process of gradual narrowing of interest, attention is drawn to the lines of important ancestors. The Chronicler, who gives the most complete lists, omits any genealogy for Dan, and he shows special interest in the tribes of Levi, Judah, and Benjamin, which contributed the bulk of the postexilic community. These tribes contain the pedigrees of the religious leaders, as well as those of the royal houses of Saul and David, to which many Jews proudly traced their ancestry.

7. Difficulties in use of genealogies. Frustrating difficulties confront the student of biblical genealogies: (a) Family terms ("father," "son," etc.) may be used in a wider sense than that of blood relationship. "Son" can mean "apprentice" or "guild member," with no reference to family connection. Treaties make men "brothers" even without a common ancestor (e.g., Israel and Tyre [Amos 1:9]). Even when kinship is involved, "son" is sometimes best rendered as "descendant." Similar diversity is found with "father," "daughter," etc. (b) Lack of surname intensifies the importance of the father's name. Fashions in Hebrew names existed, but some common names cause confusion when paternity is not given. It is then virtually impossible to determine whether duplicate names refer to the same person. (c) Repetition of names in the same list may be natural, since in some later periods a name may be a family tradition, often shared by grandfather and grandson (cf. Ecclus. Prologue, vs. 1) or father and son (Luke 1:59). Repetition of names, however, is also a means for padding a list to extend it (I Chr. 6). (d) The same person may be known by several names (e.g., Elihu/Eliab/Eliel [I Sam. 1:1; I Chr. 6:27, 34]; Tohu/Nahath/Toah [I Sam. 1:1; I Chr. 6:26, 34]). As king, Mattaniah became Zedekiah (II Kings 24:17). For religious reasons Merib-baal (I Chr. 8:34) was altered to Mephibosheth (II Sam. 4:4). (e) Personal names and geographical or group names are mingled in some genealogies. This may sometimes occur because of supplementing lists with names drawn from other lists not recognized as geographical. At other times a group may be designated by its location or personalized under the name of its chieftain or leader. (f) Omissions can be demonstrated in some genealogies. Some may be due to faulty copying, but others are deliberate. A father's name may be dropped and the individual related to a more remote ancestor (e.g., Zechariah [Zech. 1:1; cf. Ezra 5:1]; Achan [Josh. 7:1, 24]), or an important group may be dropped to make the names conform to a symmetrical pattern (e.g., three generations of kings of Judah are omitted in Matt. 1:7-11). Irregular numbers of generations frequently occur. Apparently the important element was the indication of general connections rather than intermediate steps. (g) Because of the possibility of the omission of necessary links and uncertainty about the length of the generation, genealogies offer comparatively little certain chronological assistance. The interest of the genealogist is historical and biographical rather than chronological. (h) There are other means than birth for relationship to a group. Non-Israelite Calebites and Jerahmeelites are incorporated in the tribe of Judah (cf. I Chr. 2:9, 25 ff, 36-42) because of service to the tribe (Num. 13:30; Josh. 14:6-14) or loyalty to David (I Sam. 27:10; 30:29). Genealogical connections must then be invented. (i) It cannot always be determined whether "personal" names refer to individuals or to groups. While the historical or sociological interpretation of genealogies lacks confirmation, it seems plausible in many instances, and it has analogies in Arab usage. (j) Lists of names suffer greatly in transmission, since it is a matter of copying with no means of checking connections. We should not be surprised to find many divergences in spelling, variation in order, or omissions.

Valuable and authentic bits of genealogical data are doubtless incorporated in the biblical genealogies, but they can be recovered only with great difficulty and with little certainty. The Talmud indicates that the study of the genealogies in Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah was thought to be particularly difficult. The enormous number of different interpretations led Mar Zutra to proclaim that there were four hundred camel loads of exegetical interpretations of the material between the name Azel in I Chr. 8:38 and the Azel in I Chr. 9:44 (Pes. 62*b*). One must be cautious about being dogmatic regarding solutions to genealogical problems.

Bibliography. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia (1885), pp. 6 ff, 10-12. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names (1896), pp. 2 ff. E. Kraeling, Aram and Israel (1918), pp. 18, 41, 44-45. W. F. Albright, JBL, XLIII (1924), 385-93. J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture (1926), I, 257. W. O. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel (1932), I, 51-52, 58 ff. S. Mowinckel, The Two Sources of the Predeuteronomic Primeval History (JE) in Genesis 1–11 (1937). W. F. Albright, JBL, LVII (1938), 230-31; LVIII (1939), 95-97. L. Waterman, "Some Repercussions from Late Levitical Genealogical Accretions in P and the Chronicler," AJSL, LVIII (1941), 50. W. F. Albright, Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands (1955), pp. 76-77. B. Maisler, "The Campaign of Pharaoh Shishak to Palestine," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement IV (1957), p. 66. R. A. BOWMAN

GENEALOGY (CHRIST). The genealogy of Christ is found in Matt. 1:1-16; Luke 3:23-38. As the two lists are somewhat different, they will first be considered separately.

1. Matthew. In Matthew, Jesus' genealogy is traced back through the kings of Judah, through David to Abraham. It is made clear in advance, in vs. 1, that the high points in the genealogy are David and Abraham. It was a common, though not universal, belief of the Jews that the Messiah would be a descendant of David (cf. Pss. Sol. 17:23); and the promises were made "to Abraham and to his offspring" (Gal. 3:16; cf. Gen. 12:7; 22:18).

Matthew begins his genealogy with Abraham, and his list of names may be divided into three groups, the first two containing fourteen names each and the third having thirteen, making forty-one names in all. The divisions are: (a) Abraham to David; (b) Solomon to Jechoniah and the Exile; (c) Shealtiel to Jesus. The number fourteen represents seven times two. It may also be a symbol for David (דוד), as the Hebrew daleth (ד) has the value of four and the vau (ו) of six.

The names from Perez to David (Matt. 1:3-6*a*) are taken almost verbatim from the LXX of Ruth 4:18-22, and agree with I Chr. 2:5-15. The list from Solomon to Jechoniah agrees with I Chr. 3:10-15 except that Matthew has omitted Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah between Joram and Uzziah (Azariah); and he has Jechoniah (Jehoiachin) for Jehoiakim. In the third division Zerubbabel is called the son of Shealtiel, as in Luke 3:27; Ezra; Nehemiah; Haggai; but in I Chr. 3:19 he is a son of Pedaiah and nephew of Shealtiel. Several of the names among these last thirteen occur only here in the Bible, and a period of almost five hundred years is covered by ten names from Zerubbabel to Joseph. It is clear that these are not enough names for the years they represent, and that some names have dropped out or been eliminated. The name of Jesus' grandfather is given as Jacob.

2. Luke. Luke traces his genealogy, not down to Jesus from Abraham, but backward from Jesus, all the way to Adam—and past Adam to God. Luke lists seventy-seven names (seventy-eight including God), in contrast to Matthew's forty-one. Seventeen names occur in both genealogies. Luke's list (reading from the end of the list back to the beginning) from Adam to Abraham is the same as that in Gen. 5; 11: 10-27; I Chr. 1:1-4, 24-26, with the exception of the addition of Cainan as the son of Arphaxad (as in the LXX of Gen. 10:24; 11:12, and A of I Chr. 1:18). The list from Abraham to David is the same as Matthew's except for the addition in Luke of Arni and Admin; and the textual variations in connection with these names are numerous. The only other names appearing in both genealogies are Shealtiel, Zerubbabel, and Joseph. It is possible, however, that Matthat (Luke 3:24) is the same as Matthan (Matt. 1: 15) and that Joda (Luke 3:26) represents a shortened form of Abiud (Matt. 1:13). Rhesa, whom Luke names as son of Zerubbabel, may not have been a person at all, but may have been a title, meaning "prince," which belonged to Zerubbabel. Thus "Zerubbabel Rhesa" meaning "Zerubbabel the Prince" became "Zerubbabel [begat] Rhesa." Finally, Luke's Joanan ('Ιωανάν)—listed as son of Rhesa—may be the Hananiah ('Ανανιά) of I Chr. 3:19, who is listed there as a son of Zerubbabel. If Rhesa was originally a title, then originally in the genealogy used by Luke, Joanan appeared as Zerubbabel's son.

The dissimilarity in the genealogies of Matthew and Luke from David on is due to the fact that Matthew traces Jesus' lineage through Solomon, while Luke traces it through Nathan, another of David's sons also born of Bathsheba (II Sam. 5:14; I Chr. 3: 5; 14:4). The men referred to in Luke's list between Nathan and Shealtiel and between Zerubbabel and Joseph (thirty-seven in all) are all unknown. It may be that Luke's genealogy was influenced by Jeremiah's curse on Jehoiakim and his son Jehoiachin (Jechoniah). Cf. Jer. 22:18-19, 28, 30; 36:30-31. In Matthew's genealogy Shealtiel is listed as the son of Jechoniah (as in I Chr. 3:17); but Luke lists Shealtiel as the son of Neri.

Luke's list, as has been noted, includes seventy-seven names (seven times eleven) from Jesus to Adam. As in Matthew, these names may be subdivided; but here they fall into four groups: (a) from Jesus to Zerubbabel, twenty-one names (seven times three); (b) from Shealtiel to Nathan, twenty-one names; (c) from David to Isaac, fourteen names (seven times two); and (d) from Abraham to Adam, twenty-one names. Zerubbabel, David, and Abraham are the crucial names in the genealogy.

3. Explanations of discrepancies. The differences between the genealogies in Matthew and Luke have caused difficulties from early days. From a letter written by Julius Africanus (ca. A.D. 220) to a certain Aristides, we learn that some considered the genealogies to be symbolic in character—that Matthew's represented Christ's royal character (the genealogy being traced through the kings of Judah) and that Luke's represented Christ's priestly role. Africanus himself (Euseb. Hist. I.7; VI.31) believed that the law of Levirate marriage explained the major discrepancy in the genealogies from David to Joseph. According to this law a widow, if she had no son, was to marry her deceased husband's brother; and if she had a son by him, he was to take the name of his mother's deceased, first husband, "that his name may not be blotted out of Israel" (Deut. 25:5 ff). Thus, it was said, Joseph was really the son of Heli (as in Luke), but he took the name of Heli's deceased brother (Mary's first husband) Jacob (as in Matthew). Heli and Jacob were, therefore, brothers; but they were uterine brothers, born of the same mother but of different fathers. Heli traced his ancestry back through his father to David, through Nathan (Luke); and Jacob traced his ancestry back also to David, but through Solomon (Matthew). This is an ingenious explanation, but perhaps a bit too neat.

Annius of Viterbo (ca. 1490) suggested that Matthew gave Joseph's genealogy, and Luke Mary's; and Lagrange shows that this interpretation of Luke's genealogy goes back to the fifth century. In more recent times B. Weiss defended this view.

In conclusion it may be said that the genealogies were probably drawn up independently, quite early, by different Jewish Christians in the interest, primarily, of substantiating Jesus' messiahship. On the questions of the text of Matt. 1:16, and of the relation of these genealogies to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, see VIRGIN BIRTH.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

GENERAL [שׂר; στρατηγός; χιλίαρχος]. The chief officer of an army. Sisera (Judg. 4:7), Joab (I Chr. 27:34 KJV), and Jonathan the son of Mattathias (I Macc. 10:65) are so titled; and the term is used in an indefinite sense of persons of high rank in Rev. 6:15. The same words are also translated "CAPTAIN," "commander," "chief," "GOVERNOR," "MAGISTRATE," "PRINCE," "TRIBUNE." J. A. SANDERS GENERATION. 1. Frequently in the OT, a circle (דור, "circle" or "assemblage"; Aramaic דר; cf. Ugaritic) of life—i.e., the period from a man's birth to that of his son—and collectively the people who live in that period (Pss. 14:5 [=53:6]; 24:6; 49:20; 73:15; 84:11; 112:2; Jer. 2:31). In the NT, γενεά generally corresponds to this meaning.

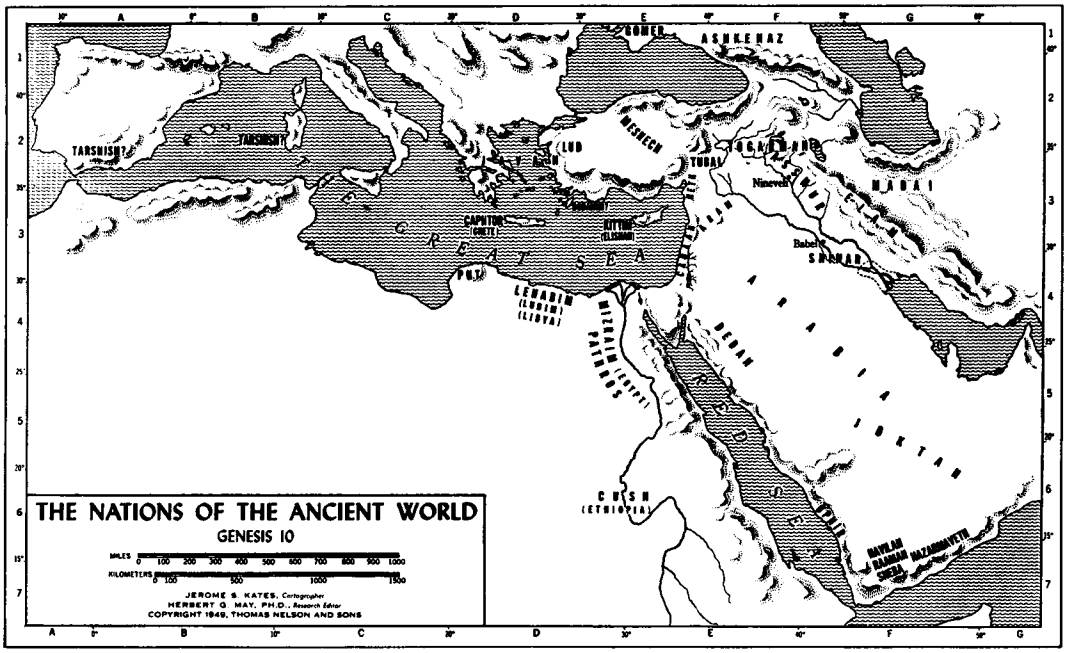
2. In the plural, a list of successive births of family history (תולדות; Gen. 2:4; 5:1; generally "families," "descendants," "genealogies"). The word γένεσις has this meaning and is translated "generation" in Matt. 1:1 KJV (RSV rightly "genealogy").



3. KJV translation of γέννημα in Matt. 3:7; 12:34; 23:33; Luke 3:7 (RSV "brood").

4. KJV translation of γένος in I Pet. 2:9 (RSV "race").

Bibliography. F. J. Neuberg, "An Unrecognized Meaning of Hebrew DÔR," JNES, 9 (1950), 215-17.

S. J. DE VRIES

GENESIS jĕn'ə sĭs [בראשית; γένεσις]. The first of the five books of Moses. The development of Genesis, which is followed by Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, coincides in large measure with that of the larger unit to which it belongs—namely, the PENTATEUCH. Thus the treatment of Genesis must also consider the Pentateuch as a whole from time to time. On the other hand, Genesis exhibits, in contrast to the remaining books of the Pentateuch, a greatness of a special type, which justifies its separate treatment. Since the manifold difficult questions which are occasioned by the Pentateuch can, for the most part, be more easily answered in the case of Genesis than in the case of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, it is advisable to discuss the Genesis problems by themselves and, in so doing, to consider the other books of the Pentateuch only insofar as is absolutely required. Moreover, one can disregard completely here the fifth book of Moses, Deuteronomy, which presents a code of law mounted in a relatively meager narrative framework, continues the narrative from Genesis to Numbers only at the end (in parts of chs. 31–34), and can, therefore, in no case be considered to be as important as the threads J, E, and P or L, JE, and P (see §§ B1*c-f below*), which are basic to the narrative. In discussing attempts to explain Genesis and the Pentateuch in general as a compilation, be it of three or of four parallel narrative threads, and in the use of the concepts "three-source theory" and "four-source theory" in this connection, it should be remembered that Deuteronomy is not taken into consideration and is not included in this treatment.

A. Name, division, and content
B. Composition
  1. Literary analysis
    a. Fragment, completion, and documentary hypotheses
    b. Three-source theory and its difficulties
    c. Four-source theory
    d. Narrative thread L
    e. Narrative thread P
    f. Narrative threads J and E
  2. Time of origin
    a. Terminus a quo
    b. L
    c. J and E
    d. P
  3. Place of origin
    a. Difficulties
    b. L, J, and E
    c. P
  4. Compilation
    a. Reason for the rise of new narrative threads
    b. Decisive motives for blending
C. Prehistory of narrative threads
  1. Scope and type of the materials
  2. Literary genres
    a. Lists
    b. Songs and proverbs
    c. Cosmological-anthropological myths
    d. Legends connected with foreign lands
    e. Local legends of Canaan
    f. Cult legends
    g. Folk-historical notes within saga narratives
    h. Fairy tales and novelle
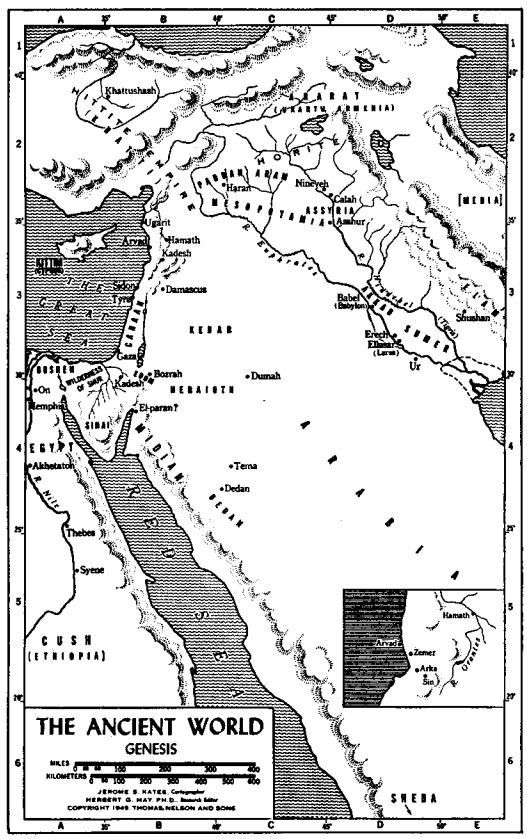
D. Historicity
  1. Transhistorical materials
  2. Secular history
  3. Religious history
E. Religious-ethical significance
Bibliography

A. NAME, DIVISION, AND CONTENT. The first of the five books of Moses is named by the Jews after its first word, בראשית, "in the beginning"; by the ancient church after the inscription in the LXX translation, which reads: Αὕτη ἡ βίβλος γενέσεως οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς, ὅτε ἐγένετο under 1:1–2:3: γένεσις κόσμου, "genesis of the world," or simply γένεσις,



"genesis." Like other books of the OT, Genesis was also divided from early times into "sections" (parashoth). As the MSS from the first or second centuries B.C. which have been discovered in the desert of Judah show, the parashoth arrangement of the Hebraic books of the OT was already customary at that time. However, this division does not coincide with the chapter numbering to which we are accustomed. The division of the books of the OT into chapters occurs rather for the first time in its Latin translation, in the Vulg., and passed from it into the Hebraic MSS during the fourteenth century A.D.

The first unit of the fifty chapters of Genesis is the primitive history 1:1–11:9, which extends from the creation of the world to the cessation of the building of the tower and the dispersion of mankind, which had until that time formed a unit. The remaining units (11:10–50:26) contain the story of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as well as of Jacob's sons, among whom Joseph plays an especially important role. Without being able to draw sharp boundaries, one may subdivide 11:10–50:26 thus: 11:10–25:11 (Abraham); 25:12–26:35 (Isaac); chs. 27–36 (Jacob and Esau, Jacob and Laban, the twelve sons of Jacob); chs. 37–50 (Joseph and his brothers).

In the form in which these fifty chapters are known to us they afford a continuous narrative of happenings extending over ca. 2,400 years, from the Creation, reckoned as the year 1, until 1656—according to 5:3, 6, 9, 12, 15, 18, 21, 28, 32; 7:6—the year of the Flood, and until the death of Jacob (47:28) and of Joseph (50:22). But the fifty chapters do not represent a complete whole meaningfully fashioned according to a unified plan. On the contrary, the marks of several hands and the signs of various times are to be observed everywhere. Thus the view, attested by the OT and the NT and sanctioned by Jewish and Christian tradition, that the Pentateuch and with it also Genesis were written by Moses, cannot in any case be true, and there can only be argument as to how the origin of the Pentateuch, in general, and of Genesis, in particular, can then actually be explained.

B. COMPOSITION. 1. Literary analysis. a. Fragment, completion, and documentary hypotheses. In attempting to determine the actual development of Genesis it is expedient to disregard, for the time being, the question of the age of the individual component parts which show up in the analysis and to confine oneself to a formal literary examination of the facts, to seek an explanation for the manifold literary obstacles and inequalities which the book presents: repetitions, contradictions, gaps, and seams, as they strike the eye of every even partially observant reader and have been observed again and again for more than a millennium and a half and have led to the most varied attempts at explanation. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM, HISTORY OF.

If these are combined in groups, disregarding variations in details, these three main groups may be formed: the fragment hypothesis, the completion hypothesis, and the documentary hypothesis. The fragment hypothesis reckons with a greater or lesser number of independent literary units—narratives, lists, maxims, poems, and the like—which were compiled later by an editor, perhaps by Ezra, but which until that time had had no connection of any kind. The completion hypothesis assumes that our Genesis is based on a continuous narrative thread and that this was completed by means of previously disconnected fragments of many varieties. According to the documentary hypothesis, on the other hand, the form of Genesis which we know is to be explained as the compilation of several parallel narrative threads. Of these three hypotheses the last, which originated with Jean Astruc (died 1766) and Johann Gottfried Eichhorn (died 1827) and has remained authoritative in the two centuries since that time, in spite of all the modifications and reverses which it has encountered, can, without doubt, most easily claim the most plausible explanation of the manifold literary problems of Genesis such as the change in the name of God—Elohim to Yahweh—the appearance of the same stories more than once, the lack of unity and the overcrowding of the narratives, and the like. However, this hypothesis is, to be sure, no panacea. On the contrary, Genesis exhibits many phenomena which are to be explained more easily according to the completion hypothesis or the fragment theory. Thus ch. 14, the campaign of the four kings from the East against five kings of Canaanite cities, is with good reason generally considered to be a secondary fragment attached to the otherwise complete Genesis; and the confusion of the lists in ch. 36, which are about Esau-Edom and are hard to unravel, may most plausibly be understood as an editorial compilation of several elements which until then had been isolated—i.e., of "fragments."

b. Three-source theory and its difficulties. The form of the documentary theory which, insofar as Genesis comes into consideration, can claim the widest circulation and acceptance is the three-source theory—i.e., the conception of Genesis as a compilation of three parallel narrative threads. One of these uses the name "Yahweh" for God and is therefore designated as Yahwist (J), while both the others say "Elohim" instead. Therefore one of them has been given the name "Elohist" (E) and the other, to differentiate it and out of consideration for its predilection for priesthood and ritual, the designation "Priestly Code" (P). Of these three narrative threads, J and P begin with the Creation (P, 1:1–2:4*a;* J, 2:4*b*–3:24). E, on the other hand, begins only in ch. 15 with Abraham and has thus no prehistory. Chs. 1–13 are, accordingly, subdivided by the three-source theory into J and P, in that 2:4*b*–3:24; 5:29; 6:1-4; 9:18-27; 11:1-9, 28-30; 12:1-4*a,* 6–13:5, 7-11*a,* 12*b,* 18, are assigned to J, and 1:1–2:4*a;* 5:1-28, 30-33; 9:28-29; 12:4*b*-5; 13:6, 11*b*-12*ab,* to P. 6:5–9:17, as well as 10; 11:10-32, however, are considered compilations from J and P, while the Cain and Abel story (4:2-16) and the boastful speech of Lamech (4:23-24) represent, perhaps, secondary additions to the J content and, therefore, are not to be regarded as belonging to any narrative thread originally.

This division of chs. 1–13 into three threads is not satisfying, because many a fragment must be ascribed to J which disturbs the course of its narrative and looks more like a secondary addition than a part which belonged originally. Such fragments are: (a) the genealogy of Cain (4:1, 19-24), which is impossible alongside the complete Seth genealogy of 5:1-28, 30-33 (certainly derived from P), and also alongside the remnants of a second Seth genealogy preserved in 4:25; 5:29 and ascribed to J and which, moreover, is not compatible with the J narrative of the Flood because it derives cattle raisers, musicians, and smiths who exist on earth in the presence of the narrator from Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal(-cain), and thus, obviously, does not recognize an interruption in the line descended from these three such as the Flood would have signified; (b) the incomplete story of the marriages of the sons of God with the daughters of men and the giants resulting from this union (6:1-4), which, since it presupposes the existence of the race of giants until the time of the narrator, likewise does not agree with the J narrative of the Flood; (c) the story of the blessing of his two elder sons, Shem and Japheth, and the cursing of his youngest son, Canaan, by Noah (9:20-27), which knows, not Shem, Japheth, and Ham as the sons of Noah, as does the J portion of the genealogy of ch. 10, but rather Shem, Japheth, and Canaan, and, moreover, obviously exhibits a substantially narrower geographical-political horizon than the genealogy (see § B2*b below*); (d) the story of the building of the tower (11:1-9), which produces an explanation for the diversity of peoples and languages quite different from J in ch. 10; (e) the story of the parting of Abraham and Lot (12:4*b,* 6-9; 13:2, 5-18), which does not belong to P and which manifestly conflicts with the story of the endangering of Sarai in Egypt (12:10–13:1), which is inserted in the middle of it.

Indeed, the phenomenon that the material allotted by the three-source theory to J is inconsistent in itself and contains fragments which are actually impossible alongside one another, is by no means restricted to chs. 1–13, but may also be observed further on in Genesis. Thus the story of the valid sale of his birthright by Esau to Jacob (25:29-34) can scarcely be brought into harmony with the story of the betrayal of Esau by Jacob (25:27-28; 27:1-45), which is admittedly compiled from J and E; and the assignment of the story of the endangering of Rebekah (26:7-11) to J would require the surely difficult assumption that the same author—namely, J—had presented the theme of the endangering of the ancestress twice, once about Sarai (12:10-13) and the second time about Rebekah (26:7-11). All kinds of inequalities are also exhibited by the stories assigned to J from chs. 29–33 about Jacob's wives and children, about his flight from Laban and his encounter with Esau. But it is admittedly particularly clear in the J material from chs. 34–50, in that here the main narrative is interrupted by fragments which, on the one hand, are differentiated from it by form and content and, on the other hand, appear to be connected among themselves. These are the stories of Simeon and Levi's violent measures against Shechem (ch. 34), of Reuben's relations with Bilhah (35:21-22*a*), of Judah's intercourse with his daughter-in-law, Tamar, and the twins resulting from this union (ch. 38), as well as the beginning of the so-called blessing of Jacob, obviously referring to 34; 35:21-22*a,* which at first (49:3-7) conveys, not blessings, but curses—that is to say, proclaims the punishment for that which Reuben, as well as Simeon and Levi, has done, according to 34; 35:21-22*a*.

These fragments cannot in any case be derived from the same narrator as their surroundings—i.e., the Joseph story of chs. 37; 39-48; 50. Thus they have been declared to be "erratic blocks," which have got into their present context more or less by chance. Upon closer inspection, however, one soon recognizes that here it is by no means a question of blocks standing isolated; rather, these fragments form a continuity—i.e., they are to demonstrate how it happened that the oldest sons of Jacob—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah—lost their birthright and it had to fall to the next oldest, to Joseph: Reuben, Simeon, and Levi were expressly denied the birthright by their father; the fourth lost it through his own folly in that he, as is narrated in ch. 38, gave up the association with his brothers; and it can well be that originally a decree followed 49:3-7 which explicitly stated this. The negative declarations of Jacob concerning Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah must have a positive one as counterpart, and this cannot have been anything but the awarding of the birthright to Joseph. 34; 35:21-22*a;* 38; 49:3-7; and the judgments on Judah and Joseph which originally followed 49:3-7 but were broken away or reshaped (cf. § C2*b below*) in the expansion of the last words of Jacob—originally restricted to Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, and Joseph—to a series of decrees including all his sons, represent, thus, a parallel to the Joseph story contained in chs. 37; 39-48; 50 and attempt, like it, to explain Joseph's surpassing his brothers.

c. Four-source theory. The same fact which can be observed in 34; 35:21-22*a;* 38; 49:3-7—namely, that these fragments which interrupt the main J narrative form a continuity among themselves—is also true elsewhere in Genesis, especially clearly in the prehistory—i.e., in 1:1-11:9. Here the fragments which were spoken of above as interrupting the main narrative of J—one of the two stories of paradise which are combined in 2:4*b*-3:24; the Cain genealogy (4:1, 19-24); the marriages of the sons of God (6:1-4); Noah as the father of Shem, Japheth, and Canaan (9:20-27); and the building of the tower (11:1-9)—are bound together into a meaningful whole for which a consciously shaping author must be postulated. Under these circumstances one must give up the conception of the stories which do not fit properly into the main J narrative as isolated fragments which had, for no longer obvious reasons, been included in it, in favor of the assumption that they constitute, on the contrary, components of an independent narrative thread which runs parallel to the J material and which remains after these fragments have been withdrawn; that is to say, one must replace the three-source theory by a four-source theory. The newly established narrative thread must then, however, also be designated by a special symbol. The symbols J^1 and J^2, which were probably suggested for what are now taken to be two J threads, are not suitable, because it is customary to designate the secondary amplifications of the source in question by an exponent added to the source symbol—to use P^1, P^2, P^3, etc., e.g., for the succession of amplifications of the original material of P. Thus only those signs come into consideration for the two Yahwist threads which are similar in type to E and P—namely, which represent Roman capital letters. Under these circumstances J is appropriately reserved for the narrator to whom belongs the main block of the stories in Genesis which use the divine name Yahweh. The thread which encompasses the remaining Yahwist fragments, however, may be designated as the "lay source" (L) out of consideration for the fact that it—by its outspokenness for the world of the profane, the world of the "laity"—forms a sort of counterpole to P's preference for ritual and priesthood.

d. Narrative thread L. The main mass of the material in Genesis which is to be assigned to L has already been pointed out. Among the particularly characteristic elements chs. 18-19 (the story of Sodom); 25:21-26 (the story of the birth of Esau and Jacob); 32:24-33 (the story of the wrestling match between Jacob and El) should probably be added.

e. Narrative thread P. Although observations of many kinds suggest that the Genesis narratives which use Yahweh as the designation for God be divided into two parallel threads, the resulting four-source theory has not, at least at the present time, succeeded in establishing itself. If, therefore, no unanimity prevails among the experts in the analysis of the Yahwist content of Genesis, such unanimity is all the greater in the case of the designation of the material belonging to P, in that these pieces are very generally considered as P: the creation of heaven and earth, extending into the consecration of the sabbath (1:1-2:4*a*); the descendants of Seth up to Noah and his sons (5:1-28, 30-32); the story of the Flood (6:9-9:19), including the directions to Noah and closing with the establishment of the rainbow as a covenant; one of the two genealogies combined in ch. 10; the list of the descendants of Shem up to Terah and his sons, Abraham, Nahor, and Haran (11:20-26); Terah's move from Ur-Kasdim to Haran (11:27, 31-32); the departure of Abraham, Sarai his wife, and his nephew Lot for Canaan, the departure of Lot into the Plain of Jordan, and his rescue from the catastrophe which occurred there (12:4*b*-5; 13:6, 11*b*, 12*a;* 19:29); the birth of Ishmael (16:1*a*, 3, 15-16); the circumcision of Abraham, Ishmael, and the men of his house (ch. 17); the birth and circumcision of Isaac (21:2*b*-5); Sarah's burial in the cave of Mach-pelah acquired by Abraham (ch. 23); Abraham's burial in the cave of Mach-pelah (25:7-10); the descendants of Ishmael (25:12-17); Isaac's marriage to Rebekah (25:19-20); the birth of Esau and Jacob (25:26*b*); Esau's marriage to the Hittite women (26:34-35); Isaac's charge to Jacob to take a wife from Paddan-aram (27:46-28:9); Jacob's wives (29:24, 28*b*-29; 30:4*a*-9*b*); Jacob's departure from Paddan-aram and arrival in Canaan (31:18*b;* 33:18*a*); the revelation of God to Jacob in Bethel (35:6*a*, 9-13, 15); Jacob's sons (35:22*b*-26); the death of Isaac (35:27-29); Esau's departure to Mount Seir (36:1-2*a*, 6-8); Jacob's dwelling in Canaan (37:1); the removal of Joseph, as well as of his father and his brothers, to Egypt (37:2; 41:46*a;* 46:6-7; 47:5-11); the adoption of Ephraim and Manasseh by Jacob (47:27-28; 48:3-6); Jacob's blessing of his sons, Jacob's directions concerning his death and his burial (49:1*a*, 28*b*-33); the burial of Jacob in the Mach-pelah cave (50:12-13).

P becomes more detailed, then, only where the story turns to ritual and legal observances, as in the case of the Creation, the Flood, and the acquisition of the Mach-pelah cave. Otherwise P contents itself with the presentation of brief genealogical notes. Since, as we have seen, quite a number of chronological dates are to be found among them, P still retains, in spite of its brevity, the character of a connected narrative thread, which in addition derives its special stamp from the fact that the points at which the presentation forsakes the broader sphere treated previously and turns to a more restricted one, to conclude finally in the most restricted sphere, the history of the people of Israel, are all set off by the heading "These are the generations of . . .": 2:4*a* (inscription under 1:1–2:3); 5:1 ("This is the book of the generations of Adam"); 6:9; 10:1; 11:10, 27; 25:12, 19; 36:1 (9); 37:2.

f. Narrative threads J and E. What remains after the separation of the L material, specified in § B1*d above,* and the P content, which has just been presented, belongs to J and E—with the exception of the comparatively few secondary separate additions which are present in Genesis—and therefore need not be analyzed more closely. This would be difficult, too, or even impossible, because—apart from the remarkable discrepancy that J begins its statement with the creation of man and beast, while E does not begin until Abraham—the two threads are so similar that they may, indeed, be recognized without difficulty wherever the stories common to both have been placed side by side untouched by editing; but in the numerous cases where they have been compiled, they can be sorted out of the compilation only here and there with any certainty. One must then in these cases be satisfied with the designation of the material as JE content. Bound by such limitations, the singling out of J and E or JE from Genesis looks like this: the endangering of Sarai (12:10–13:1, in Egypt by the Pharaoh [J]; ch. 20, in Gerar by Abimelech, king of the Philistines [E]); the promise of land and descendants to Abraham (ch. 15 [JE]); the expulsion of Hagar (16:1-14, of the pregnant Hagar, who gives birth to Ishmael at Beer-lahai-roi [J]; 21:8-21, of Hagar and her son Ishmael born in Abraham's house [E]); the birth of Isaac (21:1-2, 6-7 [JE]); the covenant of Abraham with Abimelech in Beer-sheba (21:22-34 [JE]); the sacrifice of Isaac (22: 1-19 [JE]); the wooing of Rebekah (ch. 24 [JE]); the stealing of the birthright by Jacob (25:27-28; 27:1-45 [JE]); the revelation of God to Jacob in Bethel (28: 10-22 [JE]); Jacob's wives and children (chs. 29–30 [JE]); Jacob's flight from Laban, and the treaty between them (31:1–32:1 [JE]); the encounter of Jacob and Esau (32:2-24; 33:1-16 [JE]); the building of the altar in Bethel by Jacob (35:1-4, 6*b*-7 [E]); the death and burial of Deborah (35:8, 14 [E]); the birth of Benjamin, and the death and burial of Rachel (35:16-20 [E]); Joseph in Egypt (chs. 37; 39–41 [JE]); the first and second encounters of Joseph with his brothers in Egypt (chs. 42–43 [JE]); the hidden cup (ch. 44 [J]); Joseph's revelation of himself to his brothers (ch. 45 [JE]); the move of Jacob and his family to Egypt (46:1-5, 28-34; 47:1-6, 12 [JE]); Joseph's acquisition of the fields of Egypt for the Pharaoh (47:13-26 [J]); Jacob's stipulations about his burial, his blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh or of Joseph (47:27-31; 48:1-2, 8-22 [JE]); Jacob's death and burial, Joseph's magnanimous behavior toward his brothers, his stipulations concerning his burial, and his death (50:1-11, 14-26 [JE]).

2. Time of origin. a. Terminus a quo. Now it is a question of fixing the four parallel threads which have just been sifted from Genesis as it is available to us in terms of time. This is made extraordinarily difficult by the fact that unequivocal references to events which can be precisely determined chronologically do not exist in any of the threads and that one is almost exclusively dependent here on literary, cultural, intellectual, and religious historical criteria which are to a considerable extent ambiguous and, therefore, scarcely permit an entirely clear decision. Nevertheless, it is clear that all threads presuppose the conclusion of the seizure of the land of Canaan and its settlement from the time of the judges and the kings—namely, from ca. 1200 B.C. This territory had Edom and the Ishmaelite Bedouin tribes as S neighbors, Moab and Ammon and the Arameans as E neighbors, and the Philistines and Phoenicians as W neighbors. This means that they can scarcely have originated in their present form before the formation of the Israelite empire by David—in any case, not before the twelfth century B.C. Furthermore, the stories of Jacob and Esau, which appear in all four threads, obviously all look back on the subjugation of Edom by David; and if the blessing which Isaac can finally still give to his elder son, Esau, who has been robbed of his birthright, includes—along with the hardly comforting assertion that Esau will have to serve his brother—a suggestion of the possibility of shaking off this yoke (27:39-40 [E]); then, in all probability, this presupposes at least the first attempt of Edom to free itself from the rule of Israel (I Kings 11:14-22), and is therefore scarcely conceivable before the middle of the tenth century B.C. The date thus established may be considered the terminus a quo for all four Genesis narrative threads. None of them is older, and the only question is how much later they originated and how they are related to one another with respect to age.

b. L. In many respects the elements allotted to L make an especially archaic impression. First of all, it is clear that in the case of the L stories—such as those of the expulsion of the sons of Keturah by Abraham (25:1-6), or of the misdeeds of Reuben (35: 21-22*a*) and Simeon and Levi (ch. 34) and Jacob's curses punishing them (49:3-7), or of the peculiar fate of Judah (ch. 38)—it is a question of poetic, sagalike novelistic clothing of the events of tribal history, which permits these events to stand out quite clearly as such, which is itself quite thin, and which includes only as many motifs as are absolutely essential to make possible a story intended as a family-type proceeding. To recognize the enormous difference, one need only compare the Keturah story with the two Hagar stories of J (16:4-14) and E (21:8-21), and the stories concerning Reuben, Simeon and Levi, and also Judah (34; 35:21-23*a;* 38; 49:3-7), with the Joseph story (chs. 37; 39–48; 50). There the tribal background remains discernible, and the lines of the narrative serve only to make it understandable. Here the story, as such, is not only unusually expanded; but this expansion has almost completely concealed the tribal-history content and gives rise to the impression that one is concerned, not with tribes and peoples limited by time and space, but rather with human beings in general—as they appear in all times and in all places: with a mother who finds herself in the distress of pregnancy or is fearing her child's death of thirst; with a father who has been all too indulgent toward his youngest or next-to-youngest son; with a nestling son who has grown overconfident because of such favoritism and with brothers who hate him because of it and want to kill him.

It is obvious that these detailed narratives, which turn the specifically Israelitic into the universally human, are younger than those accounts of situations in tribal history which have been clothed in a scanty novelistic garb (see § B2*d below*). Furthermore, the story of Noah's blessing of his two elder sons, Shem and Japheth, and his cursing of his youngest son, Canaan (9:20-27), is in all probability older than the genealogical table (ch. 10: cf. § B1*b above*). For there, where Shem probably represents the Israelites, Japheth the Philistines, and Canaan the Canaanites subjected by the Israelites and the Philistines, the geographic-political horizon is narrower and more archaic than in the genealogical table, where under Shem, Japheth, and Ham all the people of the then known world are to be understood. Finally, many of the stories belonging to L, particularly its portion of the story of paradise and the Fall (2:4*b*–3:24), the story of the union of the sons of God with the daughters of men and the giants which resulted from this union (6:1-4), and the story of the building of the tower (11:1-9), bear witness to the nature of Yahweh as jealously guarding his divinity and determinedly warding off all attempts by human creatures to appropriate any of it, and thus manifest a very ancient conception of God, unknown to the other threads. According to all this, no serious obstacle stands in the way of establishing L in the reign of David or Solomon.

c. J and E. Of the remaining three narrative threads, J and E are so similar in their structure (cf. § B1*f above*) that it stands to reason that they belong to approximately the same period. However, there is no lack of phenomena which at least permit the conclusion that E must be younger than J. First of all, the conception of God represented by J is more anthropomorphic than that manifested in the case of E; and this difference is especially noticeable in a few of the stories which are retained entirely or almost entirely by J and E and which, although they resemble each other otherwise, go their own ways in this respect. In the Hagar story of J (16:4-14) Yahweh or Yahweh's messenger stands on earth and talks with Hagar; while the Hagar story of E has God or the messenger of God make his disclosures to her from heaven. The situation is similar in the two stories of Yahweh's or God's revelation to Jacob in Bethel, which are combined in 28:10-22 but can be clearly distinguished from each other. According to J, Yahweh stands before Jacob on the ground and talks to him; according to E, a ladder, on which the messengers of God climb up and down, serves as a connection between Jacob's resting place and heaven. If the conception of God is less anthropomorphic here than in J, then the E version of the endangering of Sarah (ch. 20) shows a refinement of ethical feeling as opposed to the J version of it (12:10–13:1), insofar as it attempts to soften the untrue statement of Abraham that Sarah is his sister by making Sarah his half sister. That the assumption that E was younger than J would make such differences between the two understandable is obvious. But the variation could also be caused by the fact that J and E stem from different contemporary groups; and, in any case, even though one were to believe in a lapse of time between J and E, it still remains uncertain how great one should imagine it to be.

For the absolute chronological dating of J and E, the criterion has often been considered decisive that the influence of the Prophets was to be felt in both, and indeed, in E even more strongly than in J, and that since such effects of propheticism would be unlikely before Amos and Hosea—i.e., before the middle of the eighth century B.C.—approximately that period must be regarded as the terminus a quo for both. Thus J has often been dated approximately 750 B.C.; and E, approximately 700 B.C. In so doing, a decisive argument for the dating of E approximately 700 B.C., an argument which lies beyond the framework of Genesis but which cannot be overlooked here, was the assumption that the story of the making and destruction of the golden calf in Exod. 32, which was assigned to E, looks back to the downfall —in the year 722 B.C.—of the N state of Israel, which had indulged in the worship of the golden calf, and was thus a vaticinium ex eventu. In reality, the gloomy threat with which Exod. 32 closes: "In the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them," can be and probably is a threat uttered before the catastrophe, as, indeed, the prophet Hosea, in any case, hurled his embittered threats against the cult of the golden calf decades before the decline of the N state and found a reason for them in the practice of this cult. Also unnecessary and improbable is the assumption that one cannot reckon with the effects of prophecy on the writing of Israelite history before ca. 750 B.C. and that wherever such exist in Genesis or in the Pentateuch in general, the sections in question could not have been dated before this period. The proclamation of the prophetic literature, which begins for us with Amos and Hosea, really represents nothing entirely new, but takes up ideas that are centuries older and develops them. Thus the dating of J at ca. the middle of the ninth century and of E at ca. 800 or 750 B.C. can be completely justified.

d. P. The fourth of the Pentateuchal narrative threads, the Priestly Code (P), which up until the middle of the nineteenth century was quite generally regarded as the oldest and was on this account also designated as the "basic text," is now practically unanimously considered the most recent source and believed to be derived from the exilic or the post-exilic period—i.e., from the sixth or the fifth century B.C. This dating is probably also correct. The decisive arguments for it are, to be sure, scarcely or only indirectly taken from the P material which belongs to Genesis, but are supported particularly by the P portion of the books from Exodus to Numbers—i.e., by the ritual regulations which are presented here by P.

The older histories—i.e., the books from Joshua to Kings—do not yet take these into consideration, while the more recent historical work, which originated in the fourth century B.C. and comprises Chronicles, as well as Ezra and Nehemiah, presents the history as though the law of P had been valid since Moses and thereby clearly presupposes the existence of P. This necessitates the assumption that P originated ca. 500 B.C. This conclusion, drawn from the nature of the P material in other books of the Pentateuch, is now substantiated by the P portion of Genesis insofar as this represents to a considerable extent an anticipation of the proclamation of the ritual laws which took place later on Sinai. This is true particularly of the account of the Creation (1:1–2:4*a*), which contains precise directions as to the food suitable for men and animals according to God's own will—that is to say, wants only vegetables included as such—and which ends with the institution of the sabbath; and also of the story of the Flood (6:5–9:17), which brings a change in the commandments about food given at the time of the Creation—namely, permits men and animals the enjoyment of meat and thereby grants to both the right to destroy life, limiting this, to be sure, so that the life of human beings is to remain inviolable under all circumstances and man is forbidden to eat flesh with the blood; and it is also true of the directions for circumcision, bound up with the promise of descendants and land property, as they were given to Abraham by God in ch. 17.

If observations of this type place the dating of P in the sixth or fifth century B.C. on a rather sound foundation, then the widely held opinion that his genealogical tables, which seem to be compendium-like summaries of detailed stories told by the older narratives are a sure sign of a late period, proves false. Genealogical tables clothed in scanty novelistic garb like those of the lists of the descendants of Nahor (22:20-24) or the enumeration of the sons born to Abraham by Keturah (25:1-5) are obviously very old, as we have already seen (§ B2*b above; cf.* § C2*f below*), in part even older than the J and E narratives which developed from them. If—and this is probably actually the case—P has further shortened the older Genesis narratives then known to bare genealogical tables, it has accomplished nothing new in so doing, but has carried on an old literary type. One might express it thus: In this respect P returns to L; but what was naïve in the case of L has now become "considered."

3. Place of origin. a. Difficulties. While the time of origin of the four narrative threads combined in Genesis can be decided with at least some certainty, it is impossible to get much beyond conjecture with regard to their place of origin. It is, to be sure, an established fact that we are indebted for the preservation of the parts of the OT which originated in the N state of Israel and dated from the period before its downfall in the year 722 B.C., to the S state of Judah, which existed for another century and a half, as well as to those who inherited the country and stayed on in it or to the Judeans exiled to Babylon. But the separation of this material which, in the last analysis, stems from the N state from the complete composite of the OT is very difficult; and, thus, also in the case of the narrative threads of the Pentateuch one can hardly give a completely definite answer to the question as to whether some of them are native to the N state. The possibility that this is the case surely exists, according to the aforesaid. Thus, of itself, there would be no objection to the widely supported assumption of the adherents to the three-source theory that, of the two older sources, J originated in the S state and E in the N state, and that J and E were then ambiguous and might be interpreted, not only as "Yahwist" and "Elohist," but also as "Judaic" and "Ephraimistic"—even more so, since the reason marshaled for it, the favoring of Judaic figures and interests in the case of J and of Israelitic-Ephraimistic in the case of E, already has some claim to consideration.

But these arguments are still not unequivocal and decisive. Disregarding entirely the fact that substitution of the four-source theory for the three-source theory—hence the division of the Yahwistic material into two parallel threads, L and J—severely distorts the basic analysis of the derivation of J from Judah and of E from Israel, it is very questionable whether the actual or apparent preponderance of Judaic elements in J and of Israelitic elements in E really permits a conclusion as to the home of the two threads or whether we have not rather to reckon with a national-religious and literary tradition common to both states in spite of their political separation, a tradition concerning the prehistory of Israel long before the separation of the kingdoms, which is, to be sure, taken into consideration only by Genesis. Thus, if, indeed, the accounts of the death and burial of Deborah and Rachel (35:8, 14, 16-20), which are conveyed by E but not by J, are connected with places in the N state, they can, nevertheless, have originated with some Judaic storyteller who was above the state boundaries in this respect.

Similarly, the fact that in the Joseph story of J it is Judah who attempts to rescue Joseph (37:26) and later charges his father (43:3) with the necessity for sending Benjamin along with the brothers who were going to Egypt for the second time, while according to E it is Reuben who goes into action both times, does not necessitate the assumption that the "singling out" of Judah could be expected only from a Judaic writer, while the mention of Reuben must be ascribed to an Israelite author, who probably consciously substituted Reuben for Judah, or who, if no controversy against J or a narrative similar to its Joseph story is to be assumed, of his own accord, by overlooking Judah, made the oldest of the sons of Jacob—Reuben—the spokesman for his brothers. On the contrary, E, without any consideration of possible relationship to the N or the S state, may simply have entrusted this role to Reuben as the oldest of the sons of Jacob; likewise, conversely too, the mention of Judah in J need not be political, but may be explained by the recollection, attested to 34; 35:21-22*a;* 49:3-7, that Reuben, Simeon, and Levi moved into the background fairly early and thereby made room for the next oldest brother, Judah.

b. L, J, and E. Thus there is a possibility, probably, that one of the three older threads of the Pentateuch—namely, E—had as its home the N state, but in view of the fact that the border between N and S obviously did not exist for the intellectual traditions of Israel and that they were cherished with the same zeal and the same love on both sides of the border, it also does not matter much where L, J, and E originated, whether in the S or the N state.

c. P. If, in the light of the above, the answer to the question as to the home of L, J, and E must remain undecided, and if it can be said with only some degree of probability that L and J stem from Judah and E originates in N Israel, then only two spots come into consideration as the home of P: either the exile community residing in Babylon and remaining here also after the repatriation of large numbers, or the land of Judah, which was by no means entirely depopulated during the Exile. There is probably more to support the first possibility than the second; first of all, P, at least in many respects, is similar to Ezekiel's vision (chs. 40–48) of the new temple, and like it seeks to provide a working plan for the re-establishment of the Jewish national and religious community hoped for in the future.

4. Compilation. a. Reason for the rise of new narrative threads. The four narrative threads L, J, E, and P exist for us in Genesis, as in the Pentateuch in general, as a compilation, similar to the way in which Tatian's Diatessaron has been built up out of the four gospels. But in contrast to this work, where it is well established that the compilation of the individual gospels to form the gospel harmony took place in one redactional act, it is impossible to make definite statements as to the manner in which the four narrative threads of the Pentateuch were combined, and it can only be conjectured. In all probability, however, there can be no serious consideration of redaction in one act—i.e., of the possibility that the narrative threads, which had existed independently up until that time—the time of the origin of the most recent thread of P—were combined by one redactor, such as Ezra, of whom many have thought. On the contrary, one must think of a series of redactions, must picture the course of events as if, first of all, the second-oldest thread had been combined with the oldest; and then the third oldest; and, finally, the most recent had been combined with the compilation of the three older threads. It must remain uncertain, however, whether the course of events was really so uniform and whether, perhaps, J and E, which we have seen are very closely related, were not already combined before they were combined with L.

b. Decisive motives for blending. The motives which, on the one hand, led to the creation of new narrative threads and, on the other, to the blending of the new creations with the older works are more clearly recognizable. The changes in outward circumstances and in intellectual conceptions brought about by the course of events caused the older presentation of the prehistory of Israel to seem out of date sometime after its composition and made a new draft necessary. Insofar as the new thread was mindful of the old one, which it was to replace, it was, on the one hand, dependent upon it; on the other, in opposition to it. But the observation of this at the same time positive and negative relationship of the new to the old thread is not sufficient for the understanding of its nature. On the contrary, the new draft exhibits, in spite of all dependence on its predecessor, an independent quality, in that it, as is also true of the most recent thread P, produces new materials, which have not been considered by the older threads, and in addition presents a literary creation of an individual quality. The fact, in itself very remarkable, that in each instance the new creation failed to achieve its goal of taking the place of the respective older work and equalling it—that, on the contrary, the more recent were always blended with the older and insofar contributed to their preservation—is explained by the continuity of the course of history to which all these creations belong and to which they are dedicated. In each instance the older presentation was just too solidly rooted in the consciousness of the Israelitic-Jewish national and religious community to be supplanted completely. To be sure, the new creation is always considered authoritative, as is naturally understandable; and thus the old which had been retained and combined with the new moved automatically into the light of the new, so that, finally, the whole thing was understood from the point of view of P. Basically this is the same process which repeated itself half a millennium later in the coalescence of the NT with the OT. The possibility, in itself natural and even to be expected, that pre-Christendom would reject the sacred book of Judaism, which, after all, was hostile to it, did not come to pass. Rather, the NT was combined with the OT, and, indeed, in such a manner that the old book was understood in the light of the new.

C. PREHISTORY OF NARRATIVE THREADS.

1. Scope and type of the materials. It is obvious that the Pentateuchal narrative threads all have a history and presuppose materials of various types, already fixed in writing or merely transmitted orally. Beyond that, the possibility of even taking into consideration the existence of a thread still earlier than the oldest of the threads preserved for us deserves at least to be weighed. Proceeding from the three-source theory, and thus operating in Genesis with only J, E, and P, one was tempted to assume a common "groundwork," G, for J and E in view of their great similarity (see § B1*c above*). If the four-source theory is correct, then the assumption of a groundwork existing before J and E and used by them in common, which would have to be considered the oldest Pentateuchal thread, falls to pieces or could only be retained in a form in which between L, on the one hand, and J and E, on the other, one shoved in still another thread not preserved for us, which served J and E as a model. But this is not necessary or even merely plausible. On the contrary, L probably represents, in reality, the first attempt to write a history of Israel connected with the creation of the world and the history of the first human beings and extending up to the occupation of Canaan or perhaps even further. However, if L represents to this extent a new beginning, there can be no doubt that the materials it worked over are, to a great extent, older and much older than it is and, in large measure, actually go back to the time about which they want to tell. Moreover, these materials certainly existed for L, in part, at least, as separate stories; but, at the same time, there were probably also already collections of stories in small and middle-sized units, "cycles of sagas," perhaps the stories revolving around Jacob and Esau, on the one hand, and those dealing with Jacob and Laban on the other, which are not yet reconciled with each other in L—as they are in J and E—but form independent "cycles." Nothing more exact can any longer be determined concerning the prehistory of the materials used in the narrative threads of Genesis. One can scarcely go beyond a characterization of the materials found by the authors of these threads.

2. Literary genres. a. Lists. Along with the genealogical notes which give Genesis its essential character and which—as has already been mentioned (§§ B2*b, d, above*) and is later to be more precisely explained (§ C2*g below*)—were at first provided with only scanty narrative features but were later enlarged to detailed stories, the four narrative threads and the secondary passages added to them include many different kinds of material. Thus there are occasional real lists, mere enumerations of nations, tribes, or men, devoid of every narrative motif, like the list of the "kings who reigned in the land of Edom, before any king reigned over the Israelites" (36:31-39), which—no matter to whom it is to be ascribed, to one of the narrative threads or to the hand of the author of a supplement—must, in any case, be regarded as old and reliable and probably derived from the first half of the tenth century B.C.

b. Songs and proverbs. In addition, songs and maxims are to be found here and there in Genesis, many of which, at least, represent, not creations of the source authors, but something found by them and incorporated into their narrative. Even if a definite separation between the two groups is, unfortunately, not possible, they can, nevertheless, be separated with some probability. The oracle issued to Rebekah concerning the fruit of her womb (25:23), the benedictions which Isaac gives to his sons Esau and Jacob (27:27-29, 39-40), and the curses which Jacob pronounces upon Reuben, Simeon, and Levi (49:3-7) are so interlaced with their narrative context and exhibit so little independence that one must derive them from the authors of the narrative threads to which they belong. The situation is different in the case of the boastful speech of Lamech (4:23-24), of the solemn utterance concerning the atonement for the shedding of human blood (9:6), and of the blessings of Judah, Zebulun, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Naphtali, Joseph, and Benjamin (49:8-27). In contrast to 49:3-7, they have no close connection with the narrative context in which they are now inserted and probably owe their present position only to the desire to fashion the utterances concerning Reuben, Simeon, and Levi—which originally must have been followed, as we saw in § B1*b above*, by still other utterances concerning Judah and Joseph but not by the existing ones of 49:8-12, 22-25—into a complete series of utterances taking all of Jacob's sons into consideration.

c. Cosmological-anthropological myths. Among the narratives a special group is formed by those which are not, as are most of the sagas of Genesis, concerned with Israel and its neighbors, but are rather of a cosmological-anthropological nature; thus, the two or—since 2:4*b*–3:24, after all, probably represents a compilation of two parallel narratives—the three stories of the Creation (1:1–2:4*a;* 2:4*b*–3:24), the torsolike story of the marriage of the sons of God with the daughters of men and the resulting giants (6:1-4), and the two stories of the Flood combined in 6:5-19. These narratives also have the following in common: that they are of a mythological nature, that they show a strong resemblance to Sumerian-Akkadian writings or motifs, and that—and this is true, in any case, of the first story of the Creation and of the two flood stories—they are probably directly dependent on Sumerian-Akkadian prototypes, either in that these were already spread abroad in the Canaan of the second millennium B.C. and thus must have become known at once to the Israelites who invaded here or that the ancestors of the Israelites, who according to our tradition came from Mesopotamia to Canaan, brought these materials along.

The two series of "fathers," which, on the one hand, connect Noah with the Creation and, on the other hand, connect Terah or Abraham with Noah (4:17*b*, 25-26; 5; 11:10-32), are probably also copied from a Babylonian prototype. The Babylonian tradition starts the long list of kings with kings before the Flood, on the one hand, and kings after the Flood, on the other; and it would certainly be conceivable that Israel, where the monarchical principle arose rather late, transformed the kings of the Babylonian tradition into forefathers and the unbelievably long reigns of those kings into less high figures for years of life, which, nevertheless, far surpass the usual span. Since, however, the list of the descendants of Cain (4:1, 17-22), which ends in three parts with Jabal, the father of the nomadic or seminomadic cattle owners, Jubal, the father of the musicians, and Tubal(-Cain), the father of the smiths, apparently seeks to explain thereby the formation of the social groups existing in the nomadic or seminomadic society of that time, the possibility may well be considered that such lists of fathers arose of their own accord in Israel or with Israel's ancestors, as such things are to be found everywhere in the world, and especially the mention of the three ancestors at the end is particularly widespread.

d. Legends connected with foreign lands. To be distinguished from these materials, which, at least for the most part, are borrowed from abroad and have a mythological character, are those which, to be sure, also have foreign—especially, Babylonian and Egyptian—events as their subject but tend to tell about curious institutions and customs of foreign countries rather than to explain cosmological-anthropological phenomena mythologically. The story of the failure of the tower-building project has, of course, mythological vestiges, takes place in Babylon, and wants to show the reason for the fact—felt to be extraordinary—that mankind does not form a united community speaking the same language, but, rather, falls apart into many peoples speaking different languages. However, it differs from the stories of the Creation and the Flood in that it begins with the historic city of Babylon, with its unfinished temple tower and the confusion of languages unintelligible to the strangers entering it; and to this extent it may be compared with what Herodotus can tell his readers about the great and mysterious city of Babylon. The comparison with Herodotus' tales of foreign lands and peoples is still more justified in the case of the one portion of the narrative constituting the Joseph story, about how Joseph made the Egyptians with their fields slaves of the Pharaoh (47:13-26), a story, which, without being able to grasp clearly and definitely establish the basic socio-economic phenomenon, surely had in mind a historical phenomenon shocking to non-Egyptians.

The stories of Ishmael and of Jacob and Esau, which, to a great extent, play in the steppes stretching out in front of the land of the Palestinian culture to the E and S and in Mesopotamia, convey the local color of their setting outside Palestine; and, finally, the portions of the Joseph story which relate the experiences of Joseph, his brothers, and his father in Egypt—namely, chs. 39-48; 50—reproduce Egyptian conditions in a manner true to fact. However, the non-Israelitic element here is made subservient throughout to the narrative centering around Israel and its ancestors and thus incorporated into the Israelitic tribal tradition.

e. Local legends of Canaan. Not a few of the Genesis stories are connected with the land of Canaan and seek to explain peculiarities to be found there. Nature stories—i.e., such stories as are connected with natural occurrences—play a rather slight role among them. Disregarding individual etiological features such as explanations of geographical names —of Galeed, perhaps, as "witness heap" (31:46-48) or of Penuel as "the face of El" (32:31) or of Succoth as "booths" (33:17)—actually only the story of the downfall of Sodom (19:1-27) can be called a nature story. It is immaterial whether it refers to actual occurrences or represents an independent creative attempt to explain the bleak state of things which the Dead Sea and its environs cause and caused four millenniums ago; it is immaterial, too, whether it attempts to say that the Dead Sea did not exist before the catastrophe but originated only because of it; or whether it imagines that divine judgment touched only the—up until that time—fruitful surroundings of the sea: it is certain that we are concerned here with a saga connected with that region, taken over by Israel with its capture of the land, and woven into its own primitive history. A motif referring to a remarkable phenomenon which existed in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea is also to be found in the strange story, to be evaluated somewhat more precisely later (see § D1 below), of the campaign of the four Eastern kings against the five petty kings who resided in that region (ch. 14)—namely, the motif of the two of these Canaanite kings, the king of Sodom and the king of Gomorrha, who fell into bitumen pits while fleeing.

f. Cult legends. In contrast to the scarcity of nature stories, there is in Genesis a rather great abundance of cult legends—i.e., of legends which seek to give the origin of certain places and customs of worship. Like the nature stories, these cult legends are certainly also, at least in a great measure, originally Canaanite and were probably taken over then by the Israelites in their conquest of the land, along with the places and practices to which they refer. Nevertheless, this in no wise means, as must be more precisely shown (see § D3 below), that our tradition which speaks of a connection of the patriarchs with these religious places before Israel's capture of the land did not at the same time hold fast to pertinent memories. If one disregards the shorter references of cult-legend-like nature, as well as the P narratives which have already been considered (§§ B1*e*, 2*d*, above), which lead to the establishment of ritual-religious observances, one finds in Genesis these cult legends: Abraham's meeting with Melchizedek, king of Salem and priest of El Elyon, and the acknowledgment of this god by him (14:18-24); the revelation of El Roi to Hagar in Beer-lahai-roi (ch. 16) from J and the story from E which is parallel to it (21:8-21), which, although its scene of action is not named, probably is to be thought of as taking place there; the command of God to Abraham to sacrifice Isaac at a certain spot—no longer to be surely identified—and the accomplishment of a substitute sacrifice (22:1-19); God's revelation to Jacob in Bethel (28; 35:9-13, 15); the wrestling of Jacob with the El of Penuel and his blessing by him (32:24-32); the burial of the images of unknown gods by Jacob in Shechem and the building of an altar by him in Bethel (35:1-4, 6*b*-7).

Although detailed legends about them are not extant, the cults of Beer-sheba and Hebron have, nevertheless, left such clear marks on our narratives that one must surely trace the latter back to more detailed traditions about them which were once available. Even what is related (21:22-32; 26:12-33) about Beer-sheba as the scene of a covenant between Abraham or Isaac, on the one side, and Abimelech, the king of Gerar, on the other, gives an inkling of the religious significance of Beer-sheba. This stands out more clearly in the fact that the blessing bestowed on Abraham is ceremoniously repeated in Beer-sheba for Isaac (26:3*b*-5, 24-25*a*) and also for Jacob (46:1-4). This repetition—attached to Beer-sheba—of the blessing of Abraham suggests the assumption that the story of God's covenant with Abraham and the great promise made to him in it (ch. 15), which is now set in no definite location, took place in Beer-sheba, and the statement that Abraham "planted a tamarisk tree in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the LORD, the Everlasting God," which scarcely fits in its present location 21:33, originally stood at the end of ch. 15 and strongly emphasized here the significance of the preceding action and the dignity of its setting.

The religious significance of certain locations in or near Hebron, which surely extends back into the pre-Israelitic period, is attested, indeed, even by the story in ch. 18, according to which three heavenly beings were entertained there under a tree by Abraham. Even more clearly is this shown afterward by the fact—not expressly proved, but to be inferred with confidence—that the instructions for and the performance of the circumcision, about which ch. 17 tells, certainly took place in Hebron and that God on this occasion for the first time solemnly made known his name "El Shaddai"—that, in other words, El Shaddai was established in Hebron as El Olam was in Beer-sheba (see GOD, NAMES OF). Finally, it does not happen by chance, but is rather to be explained by the sacred character of the region, that, according to ch. 23, Abraham acquires a burial place here for Sarah, a tomb, in which, at least according to P, also he himself, as well as Isaac and Jacob, found a resting place (25:9-10; 35:27-29; 50: 12-13). All these cult legends, however, just like the portions of other literary genres taken over into Genesis, have been coupled with the history of the ancestors of Israel or, more correctly, the history of the leading of these ancestors of Israel by their God, the Creator of heaven and of earth; and, to this extent, they are made subservient to the tribal and national sagas, which, indeed, form the real essence of Genesis.

g. Folk-historical notes within saga narratives. These tribal and folk sagas, which, as has been mentioned several times (see § B2*d above*), have their roots in genealogical lists of nations, tribes, and races—as well as other societies related by blood only in imagination—proceed from the assumption, or perhaps even from the fiction, that each of these groups is descended from its own forefather and give these fathers wives, who then bear the members of the groups regarded as their sons. In doing this, special attention is paid to the seniority of the sons, and the first-born is set off by name, in order thus to underline and explain the differences in the importance of the individual groups. The establishment of the differences in rank inside a group going back to the same ancestor can also be undertaken in the following manner: the father is given two wives, one fully authorized, the other recognized to a lesser degree; and, accordingly, the sons born by the first take precedence over their half brothers.

Examples of such genealogical lists animated by the mere introduction of a woman as mother of the sons of the ancestral father are given in 22:20-24, where the twelve sons of Nahor are divided between two women, a head wife and a concubine, as the first bears eight, the second four; and in 25:1-6, where six sons born to Abraham by his concubine Keturah are enumerated and the additional comment made that Abraham made his son Isaac, born by the head wife Sarah, his real heir and also gave portions to the descendants of Keturah, but still sent them "away from his son Isaac, eastward to the east country"—i.e., guaranteed the possession of the land of Canaan for Isaac. What appears in 22:20-24; 25:1-6 as a thin, skeletonlike sketch has been expanded in the story of Jacob's marriages and the birth of his children, on the other hand, and in the two Hagar stories, on the other, into full, exciting stories. The sentence which stands at the end of the note about the Keturah descendants, that Abraham sent them away, has undergone so thorough a revision in the two Hagar stories, that the tribal-historical motif—similar to 25:1-6—which is also basic to them, is almost hidden; and the same is true of the stories about Jacob's wives and children in chs. 29–30, in which the substitution of two head wives and two concubines for the single head wife and the single concubine in the simple arrangement of 22:20-24 made possible an exciting action quite impossible there.

Somewhat more detailed than 22:20-24; 25:1-6 are the stories of Jacob's vain attempt to precede his twin brother at birth (25:21-26) and of the similar, but successful, undertaking of Perez, the son of Judah and his daughter-in-law Tamar (38:27-30), although the fundamental basis of folk or tribal history remains clearly recognizable here. This foundation is more obscured, to be sure, in the story of the sale of his birthright by Esau to Jacob (25:29-34), inasmuch as the impression is given here that it is a question of the contrast of two brothers of very different types, of the good-natured, stupid older brother and the sly, capable younger brother. The same is true of the Cain and Abel story (4:2-16), which until well into the nineteenth century was quite generally understood to deal with the first murder in the history of mankind, a fratricide, and to describe the wickedness of human beings which even surpassed the Fall of ch. 3 and brought on the judgment of the Flood—and is frequently thus understood, even today; while the tribal-history content, as described below, was first recognized in the last third of the nineteenth century. The motif of the amazing outstripping of the elder brother or elder brothers by the younger experienced its most imaginative development—a development associated with almost complete dissipation of the background of tribal history, however—in the stories of the crafty usurpation of the birthright by Jacob (25:27-28; 27) and of Joseph's advance over his brothers (chs. 37; 39–48; 50).

The obscuring of the tribal and folk-historical background has, to be sure, not reached the same stage—by far—in the story of the rape of Dinah by Shechem, the son of Hamor, and the terrible judgment carried out by Dinah's brothers Simeon and Levi against Shechem and his companions (ch. 34), that it reached in the Joseph stories; on the contrary, it allows the historical events, which gave the impetus for its creation—namely, the conclusion of a treaty for trade and friendship between two groups of peoples and then its breaking with bloodshed—to be clearly recognized. But, on the other hand, Shechem, who is in love with Dinah; the brothers Simeon and Levi, who are shocked by the disgrace of their sister and thus of themselves; and their father, Jacob, who fears evil consequences, are so realistically depicted as men of flesh and blood that, at least at first, one has the impression that it is really a question here of the fates of individual men and not of friendly negotiations and bloody disputes between two tribal groups.

h. Fairy tales and* novelle. Contributing substantially to the obscuring of the tribal and folk-historical background is the fact that in the shaping of the Joseph story and other stories, numerous and varied literary motifs have been utilized. Thus the Joseph story has been expanded by novelistic and fictitious materials—in addition to the very loosely attached report of the pledging of the Egyptian landed properties, which has already been discussed (§ C2*d above*)—materials which probably had their home in Egypt or, in any case, came to our narrator from there—e.g., by the account of the temptation and defamation of Joseph by the wife of his Egyptian master (ch. 39) or that of the dreams of Pharaoh and Joseph's advancement (ch. 41). The marriage notice, very short in the case of Abraham and Nahor (11:29), has been replaced, in the case of Isaac and Jacob, by stories of courtship which are detailed and full of feeling, in that there the wooing of Rebekah (ch. 24), entrusted by Abraham to his major-domo, and here the meeting of Jacob with Rachel and his services rendered for many years to Laban willingly for her sake, are movingly and excitingly depicted (ch. 29). Also the material from 22:1-19, which we have seen (§ C2*f above*) was originally of a cult-legendary nature, is made subservient to a literary and at the same time religious goal—namely, to introduce a moment, exciting and retarding the suspense of the hearers and readers as much as possible and tying in with it a religious motif moving them as deeply as possible, since the story in its present form and in its present context seeks to show two things: first, that God's promise can, to be sure, at least apparently, be questioned but never made invalid, and then, that Abraham withstood with exemplary obedience the unbelievably difficult test of faith imposed on him by his God. In the case of the motif of the endangering of the ancestress, which appears three times, twice applied to Sarah (12:10–13:1; 20) and once to Rebekah (26:6-11), some have considered a folk- or tribal-historical interpretation; i.e., they have sought to relate these stories, or at least the first two of them, which have as their subject the menacing of and the protection of Sarah in Egypt, to the oppression of the Israelites and their deliverance from this distress, to consider them, consequently, as a parallel to Exod. 1–15. It is more probably a question here of a purely narrative motif, in that the danger threatening the wife of the one who received the promise, by whom the birth of the next bearer of the promise is to be expected, seems to call into question the promise itself; and here, bound up once more with the poetic motif, is a religious theological concern—namely, to show that God, in spite of all reverses, is still able to attain his goal.

D. HISTORICITY. 1. Transhistorical materials. The cosmological-anthropological-mythological narratives of 1:1–2:4*a;* 2:4*b*–3:24; 6:1-4; 6:5–9:19, may be withdrawn at once from the series of narratives which give cause and reason to the attempt to determine their historical content. For, great as the religious content of the stories of the Creation and the Flood is, they are, by their very nature, no more able to give information about the origin of the world than about the time and extent of the flood catastrophe, which—probably to be thought of as limited to S Babylonia—may have given rise to our narratives of the Flood, which have cosmic proportions. The same is true of the Sodom story (ch. 19). Furthermore, it is obvious that the stories which are purely poetic shapings of tribal- and folk-historical elements, like that of the wooing of Rebekah (ch. 24), likewise have little to offer the historian. Ch. 14 is a case of a very special type. The story told here of the victory of Abraham over the four Eastern kings under the leadership of Chedorlaomer of Elam—they were drawn up against the kings of five SE Canaanite city states who had become rebellious toward them—and of his meeting with Melchizedek, the king of Salem (i.e., probably Jerusalem), gives a very divided impression, of course. On the one hand, there are in it, so it seems, recollections of figures who played a role in the Near East around the middle of the second millennium B.C., even though in very distorted form; on the other hand, with the introduction of Canaanite kings of cities, which, at least in part, never existed but belonged entirely to legend, it enters upon the way of fanciful combinations, such as are characteristic of the late Jewish midrash. One may rather, as will be shown (§ D3 below), give credence to what the narrative can say about Abraham's relations with the El Elyon of Jerusalem.

2. Secular history. Historically valuable content is preserved, really in only two kinds of narratives contained in Genesis: the tribal- or folk-historical accounts and the cult legends. In the case of the former, which (see § D3 below) imagines all societies to be derived from one ancestral father, the names of the "fathers" and the "sons" are, in general, historical to the extent that these great men once actually existed—for the most part, to be sure, not as individuals, but as groups. Caution is in order in many cases with regard to the dating which has been imposed upon these great people. Thus, there is no kind of guarantee given that the fathers named in the Cain and Seth genealogical trees of chs. 4–5 (see § C2*g above*), who, at least for the most part, represented historically authenticated peoples or tribes, really belong in the early period in which they now appear. The same is true of the Cain and Abel story (4:2-16) and of the Noah-Canaan story (9:20-27). The first reflects, in all probability, the amazement, combined with a kind of horror, of Israel, having become settled in Canaan, that the tribe of Cain, which was, after all, related and closely connected, had not also established itself in Canaan, but had clung to the nomadic life (cf. § C2*g above*); and the second, in which, as has been observed (§§ B1*b*, 2*b*, above), under Shem the Israelites, under Japheth the Philistines, and under Canaan the Canaanites conquered by the Israelites and the Philistines, are to be understood, also assumes Israel's settlement in Canaan. The correct place for the two narratives, as far as time is concerned, is thus really not Genesis but the book of Joshua. That they are to be found in Genesis, and, indeed, quite early in it, can be explained by the fact that the forefathers assumed that the historical communities belong to a period having an almost mythical character; they are thus, to this extent, timeless, and can be put into any period desired. The time sequence of the Genesis stories is, in view of all this, not to be trusted without further ado.

A further curtailment of the historical value of the Genesis narratives is indicated by the fact—in part related to what has just been mentioned—that, in spots, they reflect very clearly conditions of the period of the judges or even of the kings and represent, thus, to this extent "retrojections" of later conditions into the time in which they claim to take place. This is true, as has been shown (§ B2*a above*), of Isaac's blessings on Jacob and Esau and, likewise, of Jacob's blessings on Judah, Zebulun, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Joseph, and Benjamin, which clearly assume that the tribes represented by these sons of Jacob have their residence in the places known to us from the time of judges and kings (see §§ B1*b*, C2*b*, above). These phenomena make it understandable that the narratives under consideration here have frequently been interpreted as mere reflection of later conditions and have been thought to yield nothing for the time about which they claim to speak, consequently nothing for the time before Moses. However, such mistrust overshoots the mark by far.

The features coinciding with the time of judges and kings, such as are very obviously exhibited by many a Genesis narrative, are not actually projected on an imaginary screen, but have been blended with traditions which have clung to reliable memories of figures, conditions, and events of the segment of history or prehistory of Israel before Moses. Thus it proves true—to proceed at once to the main point—that before the time when Egypt, Midian, and the desert of Sinai had become important for Israel or for certain ancestors of groups which were later absorbed by Israel, other, older ancestors of this people had had connections with Mesopotamia. The tradition that Abraham came from Haran to Canaan in the period before Moses is, thus, probably correct; and even the report—in other respects very questionable—that Abraham's father had sojourned in Ur-Kasdim could have preserved correctly the recollection that for a time this place or its surrounding territory was the home of groups of nomads or seminomads related to Abraham.

To go much further is, to be sure, scarcely permissible. Thus, in the case of Abraham it probably is actually a question of a single individual, a nomadic or seminomadic sheik with many followers. However, it is very questionable whether this is also true for Isaac and Jacob and whether these names should not rather be interpreted as personifications of tribes. The genealogical association into which our tradition brought the three, in that it made Isaac the son of Abraham and Jacob the son of Isaac, is probably just as definitely nonhistorical as the derivation of the twelve tribes of Israel from the twelve sons of Jacob having the same names. On the other hand, the occurrence reflected in the story of the assault on Shechem by Simeon and Levi (ch. 34) can and probably does actually belong to the pre-Mosaic period (cf. § C2*g above*), since the reports relative to the final conquest of the land of Israel, as they are given in the last chapters of Numbers, in Joshua, and in Judg. 1–2, no longer give any indication of a temporary sojourn by Simeon and Levi in central Palestine. Consequently, ch. 34 is correctly placed in Genesis. The exact date of the events related there, of course, remains undefinable.

In a similar way the stories of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob make it plausible, indeed, that in pre-Mosaic times the former spent some time as a guest in S Palestine and the other two, probably not single individuals like Abraham, but tribes, dwelt in Canaan in the same capacity, Isaac in the extreme S of the country, Jacob in the land E of the Jordan and in central Palestine; but they do not permit a more exact placing of these figures as far as time is concerned. Under these circumstances it is justified and understandable that people have repeatedly examined the non-OT accounts which are at our disposal for the history of Palestine and of the Near East in general from the centuries of the second millennium B.C. which are being considered here: the Egyptian proscription texts belonging to the beginning of this millennium; the accounts of the Hyksos episode of the seventeenth and sixteenth centuries B.C.; the Mari Texts, which are roughly contemporary with them; and the Amarna Tablets, which are about three centuries younger, to see whether it would not be possible to establish some connection between one or another of the statements to be found here and this or that Genesis story, and in this manner to fix in time the figures or events appearing in the story in question. However, such investigations have not led to results in any way guaranteed or even probable.

The situation is similar in the case of the Joseph stories. The attempts to determine their historical content and the time of the persons and places here mentioned more exactly by comparison with accounts outside the OT—in this case, primarily the Amarna Letters—have also been unsuccessful in this instance. If, however, one probes our Joseph story itself for the historical elements it contains, one might discover from it that perhaps one or two centuries before the conquest of the land of Israel, ancestors of parts of the later Israel, apparently of Joseph and Levi, had gone to Egypt out of concern for food and had stayed there for several decades at least.

3. Religious history. If the tradition that ancestors of later Israel came to Canaan from Mesopotamia and later other groups of them, after a temporary residence in Egypt, penetrated across the Peninsula of Sinai into the land of Canaan is to be trusted at least in its general outlines, this is completely true of the reports at our disposal concerning the forms of worship of these two movements. In spite of the obliteration of the historical facts of the case caused by the conception of their God's absolutism, which was a matter of course for the authors of our Pentateuch threads, it remains clearly to be seen that the groups which penetrated Canaan from the S in the Mosaic period worshiped another god, different from the one worshiped by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The former brought along the Yahweh cult: for the latter El was the authoritative God, the El about which sources newly accessible to us, above all the Ugaritic texts which belong to the fourteenth century B.C., have shown that he enjoyed the greatest respect among the Canaanites of that time and occupied an almost monarchical position in their pantheon. It is told of all three patriarchs—of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob—that they worshiped this god. And the names appearing in the respective narratives—El Elyon (14:18-24), El Olam (15?; 21:33; 26:3-5, 24-25; 46:2-5), El Roi (16:13), El Shaddai (17:1; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; 49:25), El Bethel (28:10-22; 31:13; 35:1-7), and El of Penuel (32:24-32)—signify this one El; that is to say, they are to be understood as hypostases of him. That the patriarchs, or at least their followers, also worshiped other, apparently lower gods, brought along to Canaan from abroad, is not concealed by our tradition (31:53; 35:1-4; cf. Josh. 24:2); but, at the same time, it permits no doubt to arise about the fact that El and El alone is the god to whom respect is due. We may believe these accounts and consider it a historical fact that the ancestors of later Israel who came to Canaan as guests in the pre-Mosaic period were worshipers of El. This is also confirmed by the fact that the names of people and places formed with "Yahweh" as the theophoric element were preceded by other names which contained "El." See GOD, NAMES OF.

E. RELIGIOUS-ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE. As an account of the prehistory of the people of Israel

beginning with the creation of heaven and earth and the destiny of primitive mankind, Genesis contains a whole series of features which are of a national rather than a religious nature, or—since at that time the national and the religious formed a unit—are at least so judged by us. Among these, e.g., are the stories of the outwitting of Esau and Laban by Jacob. Also the blessings given by the patriarchs to their departing sons by no means have in view only the religious welfare but are aimed at the same time, often even principally, at the possession of economic and political power. This is true even of the blessing which, according to 12:1-4, God gives to Abraham as he departs on his travels abroad. For, just as surely as it aims at religious salvation, just so clear it is, at the same time, that the saying: "By you all the families of the earth will bless themselves" at least aims primarily, or surely in addition, at the earthly success of Abraham and his descendants, therefore of the people of Israel, and represents this as sought after and desired by the other peoples. One should, without hesitation, admit that those portions of Genesis which give more or less strong expression to national sentiments in this manner possess their own characters and, as a matter of principle, desist from the attempt to understand them as expressions of pure religiosity or even to put into them Christian values. Genesis is rich enough in purely religious values, even so.

To begin with, the stories of the Creation which are at the beginning of Genesis give powerful expression to the joyous certainty with which Luther begins his explanation of the first Christian article of faith: "I believe, that God created me and all creatures." The stories of the Fall and the Flood have this to say about it then, that, because of man's guilt, man and the world did not remain as God had desired them and created them. But even so, the world and man are not forsaken by God. On the contrary, God seeks out a man who, bound to him in inviolable religious communion, is to become the father of a people who are blessed and who are destined to be a blessing for mankind. Even if obstacles appear again and again in his way and that of the bearers of the promise who follow him, obstacles which threaten the fulfilment of the promise, God can overcome them all and bring the story to the conclusion he intended and wants to have. Joseph replies to his brothers when they express concern to him after the death of their father, lest he might take revenge on them now for that which they had once done to him: "You meant evil against me; but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive, as they are today" (50:20). The view of the world and of history which is expressed here stands at the very pinnacle of Christianity.

Just as the religious content of Genesis has lasting meaning, so, too, does the ethical content. This is true, above all, of the stories considered in § C2*g above*, which, representing expansions of tribal- or folk-historical notes, have lifted the figures of their prototypes, which were bound to time or place, into the eternal (or supratemporal) and universally human and now cause human beings to appear before our eyes as members of families—father, mother, children, brothers—as they have always existed and always will. These figures are presented without any embellishment; but precisely because this is the case, they make an irresistible impression on hearers and readers all over the world—particularly on the children among them—even today, and radiate to them educational forces such as can scarcely be found elsewhere.

Bibliography. Commentaries: H. Gunkel, Genesis, HKAT (3rd ed., 1910); O. Procksch, Genesis, KAT (2nd-3rd eds., 1924); J. Skinner, ICC (3rd ed., 1930); S. R. Driver, Genesis, WC (15th ed., 1948); G. von Rad, "Der Erste Buch Mose," Das AT Deutsch (1949-53); C. A. Simpson and W. R. Bowie, "Genesis," IB (1952); R. de Vaux, La Genèse, La Bible de Jérusalem (2nd ed., 1956).

Studies on Genesis in general: E. Meyer, Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme (1906); A. Alt, Der Gott der Väter, BWANT, III, 12 (1929); C. A. Simpson, The Early Traditions of Israel (1944); O Eissfeldt, "Die ältesten Traditionen Israels," BZAW, vol. 71 (1950); A. Alt, Kleine Schriften I (1953), pp. 1-78; J. Steinmann, Les plus anciennes traditions du Pentateuque (1954); O. Eissfeldt, "El and Yahweh," Journal of Semitic Studies, 1 (1956), 25-37; B. Gemser et al., Studies on the Book of Genesis, Oudtestamentische Studien, 12 (1958).

On Gen. 1-11: S. Mowinckel and W. F. Albright, "The Babylonian Matter in the Predeuteronomic Primeval History (JE) in Gen. 1-11," JBL, 58 (1939), 87-103; W. Zimmerli, "1. Mose 1-11," Die Urgeschichte (1947), pp. 116-37; S. Kramer, Biblical Parallels from Sumerian Literature (1954); V. Maag, "Alttestamentliche Anthropologie in ihrem Verhältnis zur altorientalischen Mythologie, Asiatische Studien," Études Asiatiques, I-IV (1955), 15-44; S. Kramer, From the Tablets of Sumer (1956); G. Castellino, "Les origines de la civilisation selon les textes bibliques et les textes cunéiformes," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement IV (1957), pp. 116-37.

On Gen. 12-26: P. Dhorme, "Abraham dans le cadre de l'histoire," RB, 37 (1928), 367-85, 481-511; 40 (1931), 364-74, 503-18; J. H. Kroeze, Genesis Veertien, een exegetisch-historische Studie (1937); R. de Vaux, "Les Patriarches Hébreux et les découvertes modernes," RB, 53 (1946), 321-48; 55 (1948), 321-47; 56 (1949), 5-36; P. Dhorme, Recueil Ed. Dhorme (1951), pp. 191-272.

On Gen. 27-36: H. Gressmann, "Sage und Geschichte in den Patriarchenerzählungen," ZAW, 30 (1910), 1-34; H. Gunkel, "Jakob," Preussische Jahrbücher, Band 176 (1919), pp. 339-62; O. Eissfeldt, "Stammessage und Novelle von Jakob und von seinen Söhnen," Eucharisterion Hermann Gunkel, I (1923), 56-77; H. Eising, Formgeschichtliche Untersuchung zur Jakobserzählung der Genesis (1940).

On Gen. 37-50: H. Gunkel, "Die Komposition der Joseph-Geschichten," ZDMG, 76 (1922), 55-71; H. Gressmann, "Ursprung und Entwicklung der Joseph-Sage," Eucharisterion Hermann Gunkel, I (1923), 1-55; G. von Rad, "Josephsgeschichte und ältere Chokma," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement I (1953), pp. 120-27; C. T. Fritsch, "God Was with Him," Interpretation, 9 (1955), 21-34: a theological study of the Joseph narrative; J. M. A. Janssen, "Egyptological Remarks on the Story of Joseph in Genesis," Jaarbericht Ex Oriente Lux, 14 (1955-56), 63-72; G. von Rad, Die Josephsgeschichte (1956); J. Vergote, Joseph en Egypte, Orientalia et Biblica Lovanensia III (1959).

O. EISSFELDT

GENEVA BIBLE jə nē′və. An English translation produced at Geneva. The NT was published in 1557, the OT in 1560. Edited by William Whittingham, it combined a thoroughgoing revision of the OT on the basis of the Hebrew text and essentially Tyndale's version of the NT. It was divided into chapters, with Robert Estienne's verse divisions, and made use of chapter summaries and marginal notes. It was very popular and the best translation available in its day. See VERSIONS, ENGLISH § 4*b*.

J. R. BRANTON

GENIZAH gə nēt'sə [גניזה, a storeroom, from Heb.-Aram. גנז, hide, store up]. A place, usually an unused room in a synagogue, to which Jews consigned sacred texts no longer fit for use, or heretical texts. These writings, handwritten or printed—indeed, anything that contained the name of God—were thus preserved from profanation.

The most famous of all genizahs is the one in Cairo, from which at the end of the nineteenth century there were brought forth about a quarter of a million biblical, liturgical, rabbinic, exegetical, and other fragments, chiefly in Hebrew, Aramaic, Arabic, Samaritan, and Greek.

Bibliography. E. Adler, Jewish Encyclopedia, V (1907), 612-13; S. Schechter, Studies in Judaism, Second Series (1908), pp. 1-30; A. Marx, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, IV (1941), 531-33; P. E. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza (1947), pp. 1 ff; A. I. Katsh, Ginze Russiyah (1958), Introduction, pp. iv-xi (contains facsimiles of Genizah MSS). H. M. ORLINSKY

GENNAEUS gə nē'əs [Γενναίος; Vulg. Gennaei] (II Macc. 12:2); KJV GENNEUS. Father of Apollonius, who was governor (στρατηγός) of a district in Palestine in the time of Antiochus V. J. C. SWAIM GENNESARET gĕ nĕs'ə rət [Γεννησαρέτ, LXX Γεννησάρ; Targ. גנסר]; KJV Apoc. GENNESAR gĕ nē'sär. 1. An early name for the Sea of Galilee (see GALILEE, SEA OF), employed with ὕδωρ ("water of") or λίμνη ("lake of").

2. The well-watered and fruitful valley NW of the Sea of Galilee. See GALILEE, SEA OF. Fig. MAG 4.

K. W. CLARK

GENNEUS. KJV form of GENNAEUS.

GENTILES jĕn'tīlz. See NATIONS.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. A designation of the outer portion of the temple area in the time of Herod, the part which—as has been inferred from the warning slab at the middle wall of partition—was accessible to non-Jews. There is no evidence of the expression itself in the sources, but the scene in Mark 11:15 ff is set in the Court of the Gentiles.

K. GALLING

GENUBATH gĭ nōō'băth [גנבת] (I Kings 11:20). The son of Hadad, the exiled scion of the royal house of Edom, and the sister of Tahpenes, the Egyptian queen. Genubath appears to have been adopted (Hebrew "weaned" seems preferable to LXX "reared") by Tahpenes as one of the royal sons. E. R. DALGLISH GEOGRAPHY. See by countries or areas—e.g., ARABIA; ASIA MINOR; ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA; CANAAN; EGYPT; MESOPOTAMIA; SUMER; SYRIA (ARAM). See especially PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF.

GEOLOGY. See by countries or areas. See especially PALESTINE, GEOLOGY OF.

GEON gē'ŏn. KJV Apoc. form of GIHON.

GEORGIAN VERSION. A translation of the Bible prepared for Christians in Caucasian Georgia, dating from ca. the fourth century A.D. See VERSIONS, ANCIENT, § 8.

GER gûr [גר, sojourner; Arab. jār, one who turns aside]. A person living in mutually responsible association with a community not originally his own, or in a place not inherently his own. The further meanings gēr acquires extend this basic connotation. See SOJOURNER.

GERA gĭr'ə [גרא, shortened form of a compound word based on גר, sojourner(?)]. 1. A son of Benjamin; actually the eponym of a Benjaminite clan (Gen. 46:21). Though called a grandson of Benjamin, the Gera of 2 below must be the same clan, and the LXX brings Gen. 46:21 into agreement with I Chr. 8:3, 5. 3 and 4 below probably refer to this same Benjaminite clan.

2. A grandson of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:3, 5; see 1 above). Gera is listed as a son of Ehud in I Chr. 8:7, probably because of dittography from 8:5, where in turn, because of a corrupt text, the name is unnecessarily repeated from 8:3.

3. The father of Ehud (Judg. 3:15). See 1 above.

4. The father of the Shimei who cursed David as he fled Jerusalem at Absalom's revolt (II Sam. 16:5; 19:16, 18; I Kings 2:8). See 1 above.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 148; W. F. Albright, The Vocalization of the Egyptian Syllabic Orthography (1934), p. 14. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

GERAH gĭr'ə [גרה]. A twentieth of a shekel. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § B4*g*.

GERAR gĭr'ăr [גרר; Apoc. τῶν Γερρηνῶν, A. Γενηρῶν]; KJV Apoc. GERRHENIANS gə rē'nĭ ənz. An important city and district near the Mediterranean Sea S and SW of the S border of Canaan. It was ruled by a king with whom, after some difficulties, both Abraham and Isaac made a treaty of friendship (Gen. 20; 26); in both cases this king is named Abimelech, and if he is not the same man, this may be a royal title. The use of the term "Philistine" in reference to the people of Gerar is anachronistic, as it was not until some centuries later that the Philistines occupied the territory. Gerar is not mentioned in any of the Egyptian records, so the city was evidently not close to the seacoast route which the Egyptians followed in their campaigns. The only other mention of Gerar in the Bible is in II Chr. 14:13-14, where it is given as the limit of Asa's pursuit of the defeated Ethiopians. However, it is probable that the LXX reading Gerar for MT Gedor in I Chr. 4:39-40 is correct, as the statements that the region was a former residence of the sons of Ham (cf. Gen. 10:19) and that it was a fertile pasture land apply well to this territory.

During the Israelite period Gerar came under the dominion of the Philistines and later of Judah, and in postexilic times there was a considerable Greek settlement in the area. It is spoken of as Gerarike in the Talmud and as Geraritike or Geraritikon Salton in Christian sources. Later on, Orda in that region became the site of a bishopric; it is located on the Medeba map as a large city, on a straight line between Seana (Khirbet Sihan) and Photis (Khirbet

Courtesy of the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel

17. Map of Gerar: 1=Canaanite and Israelite sites; 2=Roman and Byzantine sites; 3=modern towns Futeis), while Gerar is indicated as a small city to the N of Orda and W of Beer-sheba.

From these sources the site of Gerar can be identified as Tell Abu Hureirah on the N side of the Wadi esh-Sheri'ah, ca. fifteen miles NW of Beer-sheba. Excavations there have revealed a long period of settlement, beginning at least as early as the Chalcolithic period, the sherds being especially numerous from the latter half of the Middle Bronze period (1800-1600), which includes the age of the patriarchs.* The top of the tell seems to have been surrounded by a wall of rammed earth, which was precisely the construction favored at the time, and the actual city extended far southward and eastward toward the wadi, having the unusually large area of approximately 150,000 square meters. Tell Jemmeh, formerly a favored location for Gerar, is too near the coast and is probably the Yursa of the Egyptian lists and the Tell el-Amarna Letters. Fig. SIC 56.

Fig. GER 17.

Bibliography. Y. Aharoni, "The Land of Gerar," Israel Exploration Journal, VI (1956), 26-32. Contrast F. Petrie, Gerar (1928). S. COHEN

GERASA gĕr'ə sə [Γερασηνοί, Γεργεσηνοί]; GERASENES gĕr'ə sēnz; KJV GERGESENES gûr'gə sēnz. These names refer to two different cities: the Roman Gerasa (Jerash), twenty-six miles N of Amman in Jordan, and an unnamed Greek town on the E coast of the Sea of Galilee.

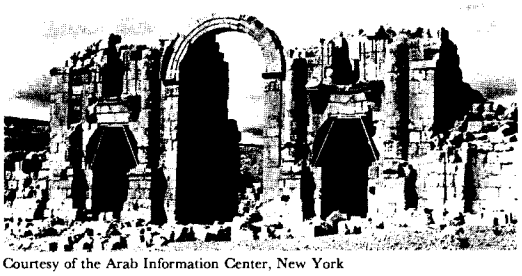
1. Identification. The name Gerasa does not appear in the Bible, although such a city name may be implied in Luke 8:26-27. The terms "Gerasenes" (KJV "Gergesenes") and "Gadarenes" (Gadara does not appear in the Bible) appear interchangeably in the same gospel episode of an exorcism by Jesus (Matt. 8:28; Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26, 37). In this story the scribes have confused these three names, as is seen by the fact that, from the fourth century on, MSS attest to all three terms for each of the three gospels. The KJV recorded Mark and Luke as referring to Gadarenes, and Matthew as referring to Gergesenes. But superior MS witness is now reflected in the RSV, which sets forth that Mark and Luke originally wrote "Gerasenes," and Matthew originally wrote "Gadarenes."

This reduces the problem to a simple inquiry as to the proper terms for the people involved. The gospels clearly locate the story somewhere on the E coast of Galilee. There the modern ruins of Khersa and Gerga suggest that either Gerasa or Gergesa could be an original form (unless the Arabic names merely reflect Christian tradition). In the early third century, Origen preferred Gergesa, not only because of the ruined cliff town with a similar name, but also because he knew of a Gadara and a Gerasa which might have caused confusion, both lying at some distance from the lake.

However, the locale of the story is the general area to which the people named belonged. Gerasa was forty miles SE, and Gadara was thirteen miles S, of the approximate gospel site, whereas the ruins of Gerga and Khersa suggest an ancient city on the E coast of the lake. "The city" (Luke 8:27) from which the demoniac emerged may have been Gergesa or another Gerasa, in Gadara, and within the larger district of Gerasa of the DECAPOLIS. In conclusion, it may be said that archaeology offers two ruined towns on the coast whose people might have been Gerasenes or Gergesenes. But the gospels speak only of the country district rather than of a city, which fact favors the terms "Gadarenes" and "Gerasenes." Finally, the MS evidence indicates that originally Mark (followed by Luke) referred to the "country of the Gerasenes," while Matthew independently called it the "country of the Gadarenes."

The gospel story is the only source which refers to this lakeside city (πόλις). It does not name the city, nor is it said that the people were in this instance being called by the name of the particular city. Yet the existence of modern ruins called Gerga and Khersa suggests that "Gergesenes" or "Gerasenes" might have been so derived. The gospel episode is explicitly located at some point on the E coast. Luke states that when the disciples and Jesus disembarked upon the beach, they were met by a demoniac "from the city"—which must have stood upon the cliff. All three gospels say that the demoniac was accustomed to live in the caves (in the cliff side, probably). The Matthean account, which shows independence in several points, reports two demoniacs, who nevertheless speak and act as one. Of course, the presence of a herd of swine is a clear indication that this E district is Gentile. The herd stampede down a steep bank into the sea and are drowned. This describes a spot at least partially elevated above the beach, and at a point where the rock reaches out to the shore. At the end, the cured man reports the event in the city (Luke 8:39), or in the Decapolis (Mark 5:20). Now the Decapolis lay SE of the lake and included both GADARA and Gerasa (see § 2 below).

2. Gerasa (Jerash). Although this city is not mentioned in the Bible, we are dealing with a known site whose splendid ruins have never disappeared from view.* The silent city stands 2,000 feet high on the Transjordan plateau, ca. twenty miles E of the Jordan and twenty-six miles N of Amman. It lies in the valley of the Chrysorrhoas, a N tributary of the Jabbok River, and at the E base of a majestic peak



Courtesy of Herbert G. May

18. General view of Gerasa (Jerash), the street of the columns leading to the forum, and Hadrian's arch, the temple of Zeus, and the theater beyond of 3,930 feet. Its origins go back to the Early Iron Age, when it must have been a simple Ammonite village. The Ptolemies of Egypt possessed it in the third century, after which Antiochus IV of Syria refounded it and honored it with the name of Antioch on the Chrysorrhoas. When the Maccabean kingdom of the Jews adopted an expansionist policy, Alexander Janneus seized Gerasa ca. 82 B.C. (Jos. War I.iv.8). Finally, it was taken by the Romans in 63 B.C. in the campaign of Pompey, and was one of the cities organized as the Decapolis. It was really a city-state, for its authority extended over a larger district: westward ca. fifteen miles, almost to the Jordan; southward ca. five miles to the Jabbok; and an uncertain distance into the E desert. To the N, it may have extended ca. fifteen miles, on a line with Scythopolis; or so it did, at least, in Byzantine times. The city's sphere of influence may have reached to the Sea of Galilee (Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26). Fig. GER 18.

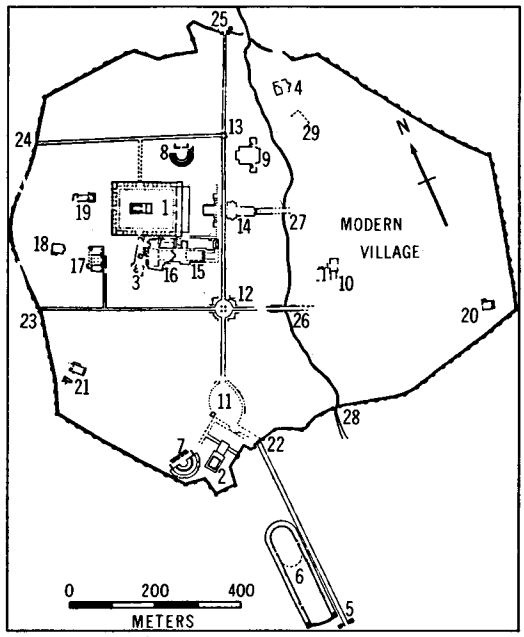
Under the Pax Romana the increase of trade with distant Petra and Palmyra and even the Orient brought new wealth to Gerasa. When the Nabatean kingdom was conquered by Trajan (98-117), the Decapolis region was merged with it to form the province of Arabia, and Gerasa became one of its three chief cities. Its prosperity and importance are attested by the visit of the Emperor Hadrian in 129, which was commemorated by the erection of a great triumphal arch (which still stands).* Gerasa reached its zenith in the second century, toward the end of which there was constructed in the heart of the city the magnificent temple of Artemis. Fig. GER 19.

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

19. The Triumphal Arch, built at Gerasa in A.D. 129 to celebrate the visit of Emperor Hadrian



Gerasa had become a strong Christian center by the fourth century, when worship in the pagan temples had ceased. But not long after, the Muslim conquest engulfed Gerasa (635). Its fading glory was completely ended by a disastrous earthquake, perhaps in 746. Gerasa became a ghost city, and yet its buildings and monuments survived so well that nineteenth-century travelers readily perceived its former splendor; so that after a thousand years of neglect, its ruins have now received the attention of the archaeologist. Fig. GER 20.

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

20. The street of columns at Gerasa runs the entire length of the city from the forum to the N gate.

A decade of excavation began in 1925, and the work has clearly demonstrated that Gerasa must be considered, along with Baalbek and Palmyra, among the most magnificent of ancient cities.* The ten-foot-thick walls of imperial Gerasa roughly described a two-mile circle, with a diameter of 3,500 feet. Indeed, its transverse diameters were clearly marked by the N-S Via Antoniniana and an E-W street, whose intersection was arched by a monumental tetrapylon. Just E of the Via Antoniniana, and almost parallel, flowed the spring-fed Chrysorrhoas, for the city straddled the river, and its walls followed the slopes on E and W. The approach from the S

From Chester C. McCown, The Ladder of Progress in Palestine

21. Plan of the city of Gerasa: (1) temple of Artemis; (2) temple of Zeus; (3) temple "C"; (4) temple replaced by Church of the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs; (5) arch of Hadrian; (6) hippodrome; (7) S theater; (8) N theater; (9) W baths; (10) E baths; (11) forum; (12) S tetrapylon; (13) N tetrapylon; (14) propylaea plaza replaced by church; (15) temple replaced by church (Marianos); (16) Church of St. Theodore; (17) churches of Sts. Cosmas, John, and George; (18) Church of Genesius; (19) synagogue replaced by church; (20) Church of Procopius; (21) Church of Sts. Peter and Paul; (22) S gate; (23) SW gate; (24) NW gate; (25) N gate; (26-27) bridges; (28) waterfall; (29) 'Ain Kerawan was through the great triumphal arch (see above) and along the length of the hippodrome (holding fifteen thousand spectators). Fig. GER 21.

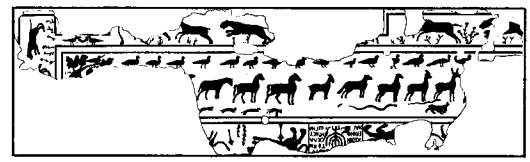
Inside the triple south gate, on a hill to the W stood the temple of Zeus and beside it a theater seating three thousand patrons.* Continuing from the forum northward along the columned Via, and through the central tetrapylon, one arrives at the temple of Artemis (cf. Acts 19:34) situated in the NW quadrant. Artemis was the protectress of the city, and her glorious temple extended for fifteen hundred feet E and W, including its approaches. The worshiper would approach by a broad avenue E of the river, cross the wide bridge, pass through a triple gateway and along a porticoed street, into the court of the propylaea. He must cross the colonnaded boulevard, and again mount majestic steps sixty-five feet wide, pass under the high-columned portico, and through the door into the central court. This area is ca. 300 by 425 feet, and near its center is the sacred shrine, with steps and porticoed forecourt and ultimately the holy place of the goddess. Several temples to other deities, and additional theaters and baths, make up the public buildings of this magnificent E outpost. But the most delightful area of



Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

22. The forum at Gerasa, enclosed within fifty-six towering columns the city is the circular first-century forum,* many of whose columns have remained in place throughout the centuries. Figs. DEC 23; GER 22.

Though there is evidence that Christians were found here by the end of the second century, the Gerasene churches were all built in the period between the fourth and the sixth century. The pagan cults were then superseded, and their temples were adapted or replaced for Christian worship. Eleven Gerasene churches have been discovered, the most impressive being those just S of the temple of Artemis—the Cathedral of Saint Marianos and the Basilica of Saint Theodore. Of great interest is the synagogue-church, a Christian adaptation ca. A.D. 530 of a Jewish synagogue constructed ca. 300.* This was the only synagogue discovered in the city, and its location at the rear of the temple of Artemis suggests that the Jewish minority occupied an inconspicuous place in the city. Fig. GER 23.

From Sukenik, Ancient Synagogues in Palestine and Greece (The British Academy, Schweich Lectures, 1930); courtesy of the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel

23. Mosaic floor in the vestibule of the Gerasa synagogue

Bibliography. J. W. Crowfoot, Churches at Jerash (1931); R. Fink, "Jerash in the First Century A.D.," Journal of Roman Studies (1933), pp. 109-24; C. H. Kraeling, Gerasa, City of the Decapolis (1938); C. C. McCown, The Ladder of Progress in Palestine (1943), pp. 309-25.

K. W. CLARK

GERIZIM, MOUNT gĕr'ə zĭm [גרזים]. A mountain (modern Jebel et-Tor) directly S of Mount Ebal, with which it forms the sides of an important E-W pass. Shechem lies at the E entrance and modern Nablus in the narrow valley between the two mountains. Mount Gerizim stands ca. 2,900 feet above the Mediterranean and ca. 700 feet above the narrow valley between it and Mount Ebal;* it is formed of Eocene limestone, which gives it a somewhat gray and forbidding appearance on its upper slopes. From a military and commercial viewpoint it had a location of strategic importance. The only important E-W highway through the mountains of Ephraim in this region passed through the valley at its base. An important N-S highway from Jerusalem to the Galilee area crosses the other highway at the E entrance to the valley in the vicinity of Shechem. The mountains, standing like two sentinels, could be fortified and assure control of the roads in the vicinity. These factors, plus the presence of a reliable supply of water (cf. Jacob's well; John 4:6), combined to attract people to the area from a very early period. Fig. EBA 2.

Although Gerizim was very early in history a well-known religious site and remains so to the small community of Samaritans who celebrate the Passover on its summit, there are only four references to it by name in the Hebrew OT (Deut. 11:29; 27:12; Josh. 8:33; Judg. 9:7); it is referred to only as "this mountain" in the NT (John 4:20-21). In view of the fact that the area was visited by Abraham (Gen. 12:6), by Jacob (Gen. 33:18-20), and by Joshua (Josh. 8:33), a religious ceremony being reported in each case, it is surprising that Gerizim is mentioned so infrequently. The probable explanation is that its early place of importance was lost when David established the capital in Jerusalem. It has been suggested that the Judean writers and editors intentionally minimized the importance of Gerizim by failing to mention its name in connection with the patriarchs and in later history.

Moses charged the people to stand upon Mount Gerizim to pronounce the blessing (Deut. 27:12 names six tribes: Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph, and Benjamin; the other six tribes were to stand opposite them on Mount Ebal for the curse). Preparation for the same ceremony is referred to in Deut. 11:29; and its completion is reported in Josh. 8:30-35, where half the people, including both sojourner and home-born, stood in front of Mount Gerizim and half of them in front of Mount Ebal, with the ark of the covenant between them. According to Josh. 8:30 (cf. Deut. 27:4, where the Samaritan Pentateuch reads "Gerizim" instead of "Ebal"), Mount Ebal, rather than Mount Gerizim, was the place where Joshua erected an altar and wrote a copy of the law on stones. Whether or not a temple was erected on either of the mountains in this early period is uncertain, although according to Samaritan tradition the sanctuary of the Lord, mentioned in connection with Joshua's final oration and covenant (Josh. 24:26), had reference to a temple on Gerizim. Except for the statement that Jotham's parable was spoken from the top of Mount Gerizim (probably from its slopes) to the men of Shechem (Judg. 9:7), a veil of silence drops over the place.

A temple was built on Gerizim by Sanballat, according to Josephus (Antiq. XI.viii.2, 4), at the time of the schism between the Jews and the Samaritans. Josephus places the event in the period of Alexander the Great; it probably should be dated more than a century earlier, in the time of Nehemiah. Josephus is also the source of the tradition that the Samaritan temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus (Antiq. XIII.ix.1; War I.ii.6). During a period of intense rivalry between the Samaritans and the Christians in the fifth and six centuries A.D. a church was constructed on Mount Gerizim by Zeno and one later by Justinian.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

24. Mount Gerizim, with the traditional tomb of Joseph in the foreground

The archaeological picture is incomplete, although a Canaanite villa from ca. 1600 B.C. has been reported at the foot of the mountain, and the extensive remains on the summit are attributed to the time of Justinian.

See also EBAL, MOUNT; SAMARITANS; SHECHEM; PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF.

Fig. GER 24.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, II (1856), 275-80; M. Gaster, The Samaritans, The Schweich Lectures, 1923 (1925; see Index); W. F. Albright, Archaeology of Palestine (1954), p. 92; D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible (1957), pp. 20, 178, 180.

W. L. REED

GERON gĭr′ŏn. RSV mg. translation in II Macc. 6:1. The text interprets γέροντα as "an Athenian senator," but transliteration as a personal name, Γέρων ("old man"), is possible; it appears in Greek inscriptions as a name. See SENATOR.

J. C. SWAIM

GERRHENIANS. See GERAR.

GERSHOM gûr′shəm [גרשם, גרשום, sojourner (גר) there (שם), according to the popular etymology in Exod. 2:22; 18:3(?); bell, according to Arab. ğaraśun(?)]; GERSHOMITES —shə mīts; KJV GERSON —sən [Γηρσών] in I Esd. 8:29. 1. The elder son of Moses and Zipporah; born in Midian (Exod. 2:22; 18:3). He is named as the father of Jonathan, who officiated as priest to the Danites, as did his descendants until the Captivity (Judg. 18:30; the MT reads "Gershom, son of Manasseh"; Möhlenbrink favors "Gershom, son of Levi"; see the work of G. F. Moore in the bibliography). In ascription to David of arrangements existing in the postexilic time, fathers' houses derived from him and other sons of Moses are reckoned among the Levites in contradistinction to the Aaronites who were priests (I Chr. 23:13-16). A postexilic Levitical functionary of the house of Gershom was Shebuel, "chief officer in charge of the treasuries" (I Chr. 23:16; 26:24).

2. Same as GERSHON; a son of Levi (I Chr. 6:1, 16-17, 20, 43; 23:6-7). His descendants are called Gershomites, or the "sons of Gershom," in I Chr. 6:62, 71; 15:7.

3. A descendant of Phinehas (the priest, grandson of Aaron). He was the head of a father's house which returned with Ezra from Babylonia (Ezra 8:2; I Esd. 8:29).

Bibliography. G. F. Moore, Judges, ICC (1903), pp. 400-402; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 223; K. Möhlenbrink, "Die levitischen Überlieferungen des ATs," ZAW, LII (1934), 223. T. M. MAUCH

GERSHON gûr'shən [גרשון, bell according to Arab. ğarasun(?)]; GERSHONITES —shə nīts [הגרשני (Num. 3:21, 23-24; 4:24, 27-28; 26:57; Josh. 21:33; II Chr. 29:12); הגרשני, the Gershonite (I Chr. 26:21; 29:8); בני גרשון, the sons of Gershon (Num. 3:25; Josh. 21:6, 27); בני הגרשני, the sons of the Gershonites (I Chr. 26:21)]. Alternately: GERSHOM 2. One of the three sons of Levi (Exod. 6:16; Num. 3: 17; I Chr. 6:1, 16, 43; 23:6), born before Jacob and his family migrated to Egypt (Gen. 46:11). Gershon had two sons, Libni (Ladan in I Chr. 23:7; 26:21) and Shimei (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:18; I Chr. 6:17, 20).

The data concerning Gershon and those reckoned as descended from him (Gershonites) appear in P, Chronicles, and revision in P and Chronicles. The data show variations occurring in the arrangement of Levitical groups to one another and in the alignment of Levites vis-à-vis priests (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES). Three variations may be noted in the way the Gershonites were regarded:

a) In a tenth-century list of the allotment of Levitical cities (a list incorporated by P and expanded), the Kohathites, the Gershonites, and the Merarites were the three great groups of Levites; they are presented, not as concentrated around a sanctuary, but as separated by geographical location. Thirteen cities and their pasture lands in the extreme N and NE tribes of Palestine were assigned to the Gershonites (Josh. 21:6, 27-33; see I Chr. 6:62, 71-76).

b) Some texts in P and Chronicles indicate that the Gershonites at some time were the dominant group among the functionally interrelated Levitical groups. Gershon, Kohath, and Merari are named in that order (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16; Num. 3:17; 26: 57; I Chr. 6:1, 16; 23:6). Gershonites are mentioned first in a census notation (Num. 26:57) and named first in postexilic lists of singers (I Chr. 6:16-30) and Levitical functionaries in the temple (23:7-11). Significant persons and groups were reckoned in the Gershonite line: the musical guild Asaph (6:39, 43), the administrators of temple treasuries Ladan (23:7-9; 26:21) and Jehiel (29:8).

c) Some texts in P and in the revision in Chronicles show, not the Gershonites, but the Kohathites (the Levitical family to which Aaron belonged; see KOHATH) as the dominant Levitical group. Both the incorporated original text and the expansion in Josh. 21 list the Gershonites second and peripherally located, and the Kohathites as descendants of Aaron first and centrally located. In the wilderness encampment the location assigned the Gershonites (subdivided into the families of the Libnites and the Shimeites; Num. 3:21) was "behind the tabernacle on the west" (vs. 23); they were to care for and transport the external properties of the tabernacle (vss. 25-26; 4:24-26; 10:17); in this they were supervised by Aaron and his sons (4:27; Ithamar in vs. 28); for this task they were assigned two wagons and four oxen (7:7); they numbered 7,500 (3:22). In all these respects the Kohathites were pre-eminent. In a census of the Levites the Gershonites were numbered second (4:34-49). The Chronicler's account of the bringing of the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem by David listed the Gershonites third and the Kohathites first, and later revision distinguished between the Aaronites and the Kohathites (I Chr. 15:4-7). The reviser in Chronicles used genealogies of Levi for the classification of the ordinary Levites but does not mention the Gershonites (ch. 24). In an account of the cleansing of the temple by Hezekiah, the Gershonites are mentioned last (II Chr. 29:12). They do not appear in accounts of temple repairs by Josiah (34:12) and a victory by Jehoshaphat (20:19).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 223; K. Möhlenbrink, "Die levitischen Überlieferungen des ATs," ZAW, LII (1934), 184-231; A. Welch, The Work of the Chronicler (1939), pp. 65 n., 82-85, 89, 95; J. Bright, Exegesis of Joshua, IB, II (1953), 651.

T. M. MAUCH

GERSON. KJV Apoc. form of GERSHOM 3.

GERUTH CHIMHAM gĭr'o͝oth kĭm'hăm [גרות כמוהם, lodging place of Chimham] (Jer. 41:17); KJV HABITATION OF CHIMHAM. An unidentified place near Bethlehem, perhaps a khan, at which Ishmael and his fellow assassins stopped during their flight to Egypt. See CHIMHAM.

GESEM gē'səm. KJV Apoc. form of GOSHEN 3.

GESHAN gĕsh'ən [גישן] (I Chr. 2:47); KJV GESHAM —əm. Listed as a descendant of Caleb; otherwise unknown.

GESHEM gĕsh'əm [גשם, rain]. Alternately: GASHMU găsh'mū [גשמו] (Neh. 6:6 KJV; RSV mg.). An "Arab" who joined with Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the Ammonite in opposing the reconstruction of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah. Their opposition consisted of ridicule (Neh. 2:19-20), an attempted plot to trap Nehemiah (6:1-3), and the threat to send a letter to the Persian king charging him with sedition (vss. 5-9), all of which failed. His title "the Arab" was an administrative term which indicates that he was the highest official of the province to the S of Judah, formerly Edom. Some think that he can be identified with an official of the same name on a Lihyanite Arabian inscription. Fig. KED 2.

Bibliography. F. W. Winnett, A Study of the Lihyanite and Thamudic Inscriptions (1937), pp. 14, 16, 50-51; H. Grimme, "Beziehungen zwischen dem Staate der Lihjān und dem Archämenidenreiche," Orientalische Literaturzeitung, XLIV (1941), 343. M. NEWMAN

GESHUR gĕsh'er [גשור]; GESHURITES —ə rīts. A small kingdom located to the N of Bashan and S of Syria. It served as a buffer state between Israel and Aram. David was on friendly terms with it when he was still king of Judah only and sealed the alliance by marrying Maacah, the daughter of its king, Talmai; she became the mother of Absalom (II Sam. 3:3). The latter fled to his grandfather after the assassination of his half brother Amnon and remained three years until it was safe to return (II Sam. 13:37–14:24). Subsequently Geshur must have been a vassal state of Israel, but after the division of the kingdom it joined in alliance with Aram and raided Bashan (I Chr. 2:23). Eventually it seems to have been incorporated into the expanding kingdom of Damascus and to have shared the fate of the latter.

S. COHEN

GESHURITES gĕsh'ə rīts [גשורים]. 1. The inhabitants of GESHUR, a kingdom in the NE of Palestine (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 12:5; 13:11, 13).

2. A people dwelling in the Negeb, near the territory of the Philistines (Josh. 13:2). They are mentioned as one of the peoples against whom David made raids while he was at Ziklag (I Sam. 27:8), and they were probably wiped out as the tribes of Judah and Simeon pushed farther S in the time of the kings (cf. I Chr. 4:39-43). S. COHEN

GESSEN gĕs'ən. Douay Version form of GOSHEN 3.

GESTAS gĕs'təs. A name given the unrepentant thief in the stories prompted by Luke 23:39-43. Among other forms of the name are Gistas, Gesmas, Stegmas, Dumachus. He is regularly contrasted with DYSMAS.

GETHER gē'thər [גתר]. According to Gen. 10:23, one of the sons of Aram (cf. I Chr. 1:17); hence an Aramean town and kingdom.

GETHSEMANE gĕth sĕm'ə nĭ [Γεθσημανεί, indeclinable; Aram. גת שמני, oil vat; a variant form, GESAMANI, Γησαμανεί, was explained by Jerome as derived from גיא שמני, fat valleys (Isa. 28:1), but this form is more plausibly explained as a Greek corruption of the original name, into γῆ σαμανεί, oil plot]. The site on the Mount of Olives where Jesus agonized in prayer before his betrayal there by Judas.

The story is told in each of the four gospels, although only Mark and Matthew report the site as Gethsemane. They speak of it as "a field" (χωρίον), and only its name, the "oil vat," suggests a grove of olive trees (Matt. 26:36; Mark 14:32). Luke calls it simply "the place," somewhere on the Mount of Olives—an accustomed region with Jesus (Luke 22: 39-40). John locates it "across the winter stream [χειμάρρου] of the Kidron," and calls it a κῆπος or "garden," and from this citation alone is derived the traditional name, Garden of Gethsemane (John 18:1).

To ascertain the site of this episode seems impossible today, both because the gospels afford scant data and because the ancient olive groves were destroyed when Titus besieged Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Clearly it was not far from the city gate, and lay E of the Kidron and somewhere upon the Mount of Olives. One early tradition placed it outside the E gate and E of the valley floor (E of the modern paved road, where the Tomb of the Virgin is now located). Here as early as the fifth century a shrine was built, and the seventh-century pilgrim Arculf describes a rock here with the imprint of the knees of Jesus. On this site today the Franciscans maintain the Grotto of the Agony.

Another early identification, sometimes attributed to the fourth century, located Gethsemane higher

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

25. Within the Garden of Gethsemane, showing the ancient olive trees on the slope. The Armenian, Greek, Latin (Franciscan), and Russian churches possess adjacent properties here, lying between the Russian Church of Magdalene and the Franciscan Basilica of the Agony (the Church of All Nations), both modern structures. The latter is built over fourth-century ruins, and within is a traditional Rock of the Agony. E of this church lies an olive grove walled in by the Franciscans, with gnarled trees up to nine hundred years old. An adjacent enclosure is that of the Greeks.

From the language of John, some have deduced that Gethsemane was walled in, because Jesus "entered" and "went out"; further, that it was restricted private property whose owner granted Jesus access to it. However, the two verbs do not require or support such conjectures. Without doubt the olive grove was privately owned, for the production of oil was a chief industry. This grove may well have had its olive vat, like many another. The term "vat" does not indicate how the oil was extracted, whether by treading, pounding, pressing, or grinding, although the first of these was primitive and by the first century antiquated. Luke's reference to the "custom" of Jesus might mean no more than that each day he traveled past this grove between Jerusalem and Bethany. But the statement in John is more explicit —that Judas knew this grove from the disciples' repeatedly gathering here with Jesus. The Synoptic accounts (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) suggest that it was an extensive area within which members of the party could separate at a distance from one another.

Figs. GET 25; OLI 9; Pl. XIII*b*.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, I (1867), 233-35; E. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), p. 404.

K. W. CLARK

GEUEL gū′əl [גְּאוּאֵל, majesty of God(?); cf. LXX Γουδιηλ, probably for גְּאוּל־אֵל, ransomed by God(?)] (Num 13:15). A member of the tribe of Gad sent to spy out the land of Canaan; son of Machi.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 240. R. F. JOHNSON

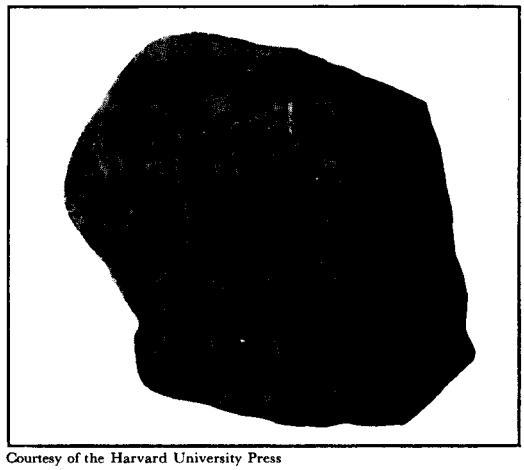
GEZER gē′zər [גֶּזֶר]; KJV GAZER gā′zər in II Sam. 5:25; I Chr. 14:16. Alternately: GAZARA gə zā′rə [Γάζηρα, Γάζαρα] (I Macc. 4:15; 13:43; etc.; Jos. Antiq. XIII.ix.2; etc.); KJV GAZERA gə zē′rə in I Macc. 4:15; KJV GAZA gā′zə in I Macc. 13:43. A city in the plain of Palestine midway between Jerusalem and Joppa.



1. Name and identification. The name of Gezer can be recognized in hieroglyphic and Akkadian renderings (spelled respectively Qdr and Gazri), as well as in the Hebrew and Greek forms given above. The identity of these ancient names with that of the mound called in Arabic Tell el-Jazar (or Tell el-Jazari), near the village of Abu Shusheh, was first noted in 1871 by Clermont-Ganneau, who clinched the identification of the site in 1874 by finding the first of a series of engraved rock inscriptions, in which the words "boundary of Gezer" in Hebrew letters were combined with the Greek name Alkias. The inscriptions traced a rough arc encircling Tell el-Jazar at distances between one half and one mile on the S and E sides.

2. Exploration and history. Tell el-Jazar was partly excavated by R. A. S. Macalister on behalf of the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1902-5 and 1907-9, and again in 1934 by A. Rowe; those excavations have enabled the history of Gezer to be extended in time considerably beyond the range of literary records.

The site lay at the inner edge of the coastal plain at a spot well supplied with water from different springs, of which the nearest is 'Ain el-Yerdeh. It commanded the plain to the N and the W, where it overlooked both the coastal road approaching Lydda and Aphek (Tell Ras el-'Ain) from Gaza, and also the route which descended from Jerusalem. A watch-tower, half an hour's distance to the SE, gave the Gezerites a view of the road to Egypt for many miles southward. Gezer was settled by Lower Chalcolithic times, ca. 4000 B.C. The first inhabitants mostly lived in natural caves which they roughly adapted. Such caves, pitting the native limestone rock, continued to serve as dwellings or as cisterns for as long as Gezer remained an inhabited place. Subsequent domestic architecture was of the usual Palestinian village standard, using walls of small rubble with mud mortar. Three defensive walls were built at different times round the city, enclosing a narrow oblong, with two summits, lying E and W. Stratigraphic evidence is lacking for dating the defenses; but Macalister recorded some facts which prove that the second wall had already fallen into disrepair by the reign of Amen-hotep III; that wall might have been built in the Middle Bronze Age. It contained two gates, one on the N and one on the S side of the city. The latest wall, which is also the outermost, and which could be traced almost continuously round the tell, is presumably that which existed in the Maccabean Wars; it had been reinforced with towers and revetments at least twice in its history, and its first construction must go back many centuries. See below.

At all times of Egyptian imperial expansion Gezer was sure to attract the notice of the Pharaohs, and its first historical appearance in Egyptian monuments, a granite statuette found on the site and inscribed in hieroglyphics by one Heqab, is from not later than the Twelfth Dynasty. A fragment of an inscribed funerary statue has been attributed to the Thirteenth Dynasty. Commercial relations with Egypt under the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties are revealed by many imported objects, especially alabaster vases.

Perhaps stimulated by such contacts, Canaanite townsmen had in the meantime been working out a more convenient script than hieroglyphics for writing their own language; and a possible trace of their earliest essay has survived in a stray potsherd of the late Middle Bronze Age on which three probably alphabetic signs have been scratched in the clay before firing. Fig. GEZ 26.

Courtesy of the Harvard University Press

26. Inscribed potsherd from Gezer with early alphabetic inscription

Thut-mose III included Gezer among the captured Canaanite cities enumerated on the walls of the temple at Karnak after his Megiddo campaign (ca. 1468 B.C.). At least nine of the Tell el-Amarna Letters refer to Gezer, four of them written by the "Man of Gezer" himself. An obsequious servant of the king, Yapahu, writes to seek help for Gezer against the menace of the SA-GAZ and Sutu. Nevertheless, the "Handmaid of the King" was plundered and had to buy off the raiders with gifts of food and oil.

No signs of these troubles appear in the excavations, nor of Mer-ne-Ptah, the "Binder of Gezer," who boasted: "Ashkelon is taken; Gezer is captured; Yanoam is made as that which does not exist" (Israel Stela, ca. 1230 B.C.). Macalister, however, found an ivory pectoral engraved with Mer-ne-Ptah's cartouches and with a scene of adoration to Thoth.

The Canaanites were early concerned with safeguarding their water supply, and their most impressive monument was a rock-cut shaft and passage which descended by steps from a point in the W half of the city to a subterranean cavern containing a spring (see WATER WORKS). At a later date, probably, a great reservoir was excavated near the center of the city, presumably to store rain water. Neither of these works can be exactly dated; but the tunnel went out of use toward the end of the Bronze Age (1400-1200 B.C.). The reservoir might have been dug then to replace it, or possibly in the Solomonic age. It remained open long enough for the debris which filled it to contain Maccabean pottery.

Another impressive relic of Canaanite Gezer was a row of eight standing monoliths, which were found aligned N and S at a point inside the N wall of the city, about halfway along it. The tallest of the monoliths stood over ten feet high, and the shortest over five. Their majestic size and careful alignment strongly suggested a religious purpose; and Macalister found confirmation of this in the discovery of ten infant burials, in jars of Middle Bronze Age form, in the close vicinity. A massive stone pedestal socket, cup marks in the rock, a rock cavern with two interconnected chambers, two paved circular enclosures, and a cistern containing human and animal bones—all these grouped together led Macalister to interpret the assemblage as a Canaanite high place. However, since no sacrificial altar was found, no platform of offerings, and no traces of burning, the identification is open to question. W. F. Albright has suggested that the monoliths are to be explained as funeral stelae.

Mer-ne-Ptah cannot have destroyed Gezer, for the Israelites, who were active at about the same time and are mentioned in the same stela, failed to capture the town (Judg. 1:29), although they defeated and killed King Horam of Gezer (Josh. 10:33; 12:12). In the partition of Canaan, Gezer lay on the boundary of Ephraim between Lower Beth-Horon and the sea (Josh. 16:3). Allotted to the Levitical tribe of Kohath (21:21), it remained a Canaanite city (Judg. 1:29), having presumably maintained itself equally against the Philistines, whose territory it confronted toward the S.

Pharaoh Shishak (ca. 945-924 B.C.) took Gezer from the Canaanites and gave it as a dowry to Solomon's Egyptian wife (I Kings 9:16). Whether the Canaanites were all evicted at that time may be doubted; but Solomon fortified the city, and it must be assumed that Israelites formed the garrison. To Solomon may probably be attributed a series of towers of mixed ashlar and rubble construction which Macalister found inserted secondarily in the outer city way. The build of these towers and the build and planning of a gateway in the S side of the same wall are closely paralleled by structures which have been discovered and ascribed to King Solomon at Megiddo and Hazor, two cities fortified by him simultaneously with Gezer (I Kings 9:15). This outer wall line was initially of poor and hasty construction. We can only guess that it was laid out at some time in the Late Bronze or Early Iron Age before Shishak's invasion.

To the earliest Israelite period belongs the "Gezer Calendar," a doggerel list of agricultural operations for twelve months, inscribed in early Hebrew characters on a clay pendant. See CALENDAR.

Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria left an inscribed relief in Calah showing an Assyrian army storming the town of Gazru (cf. II Kings 15:29; 16:7); and when Sargon destroyed the N kingdom (721 B.C.), Gezer must have passed under Assyrian control. Two clay tablets bearing contracts for land transactions in Assyrian cuneiform are relics of this period. Nothing more is heard of Gezer until the Wars of the Maccabees, when its situation within sight of Modin gave it importance to the Greeks. On two occasions (I Macc. 4:15; 7:45) it marked the end of Judas' victorious pursuit of the enemy—once in flight from Nicopolis, once from Adasa. It was fortified in 161 B.C. by Bacchides, and vexed the Jews (I Macc. 9:50-52) until, in 143 B.C., Simon besieged and captured it (13:43-48). The town was then settled with Jews (14:34), and Simon himself built a residence there.

A barely legible graffito in Greek letters on a building stone found near the gate of the town has been read as follows: Πάμπρα(ς) Σίμωνος κατοπάζῃ πῦρ βασίλειον—a mock-epic hexameter which may be translated: "(Says) Pampras, to blazes with Simon's palace." It was at Gazara that Jonathan the son of Simon resided when his father put him in command of his forces (I Macc. 13:53). The rock-cut boundary inscriptions imply some allocation of land at about this period, Alkias being the presiding official.

Bibliography. R. A. Macalister, The Excavation of Gezer, 1902-5 and 1907-9, vols. I-III (1912); A. Rowe, PEQ (1935), pp. 19-33; Y. Yadin, IEJ, VIII (1958), 80-86 (on the Solomonic gate). R. W. HAMILTON

GEZRITES. KJV form of GIRZITES.

GHOST [אוֹב (Isa. 29:4; KJV FAMILIAR SPIRIT); φάντασμα (Matt. 14:26; KJV SPIRIT)]. The apparition of a deceased person. See SHADES.

GHOST, HOLY. See HOLY SPIRIT.

GIAH gī′ə [גִּיחַ, bubble or burst forth as a bubbling spring(?)] (II Sam. 2:24). An unidentified site along Abner's path of flight from Gibeon toward the wilderness descent to the Arabah. The text of II Sam. 2:24 is probably corrupt; both the LXX and the Vulg. read as though based upon the Hebrew word for "ravine," and "Gibeon" can be associated with no identifiable wilderness. In place of "Gibeon," the similar "Geba" should perhaps be read, which was, indeed, on the threshold of the wilderness descent to the Jordan. W. H. MORTON

GIANT. In common with other peoples the early Hebrews believed in a race of giants. Neither archaeology nor paleontology gives supporting evidence to the existence of a race or tribe of giant stock. Biologists accept the position that giants are deviates from the norm, as are dwarfs. Like dwarfs, giants are usually sterile.

Two circumstances undoubtedly led to belief in giants. First, the Hebrews knew of the existence of individuals of giant proportions. Several are listed in the Bible, most famous of whom is Goliath, the Philistine champion slain by David (I Sam. 17:23-54). Note also the Philistine giants (רפא, רפה) in II Sam. 21:16-22; I Chr. 20:4, 6, 8. Job accuses God of attacking him like a "warrior" (גבור, KJV "giant"; Job 16:14). Second, the Hebrews found in Palestine many Megolithic structures for whose erection they assumed the strength of giants.

Giants had two major classifications. First, there were those thought to be the result of a union of a divine father and a human mother. Such a story appears in Gen. 6:1-4 (נפילים; RSV NEPHILIM). Second, there were human giants associated with certain tribes and nations. There is no evidence that the Hebrews believed that all giants were originally of divine-human origin. It should be observed that physical size, as well as length of years, was thought to have spiritual significance.

The KJV translates רפאים (a people inhabiting early Canaan) as "giants" in Deut. 2:11, 20; 3:11, 13; Josh. 12:4; 13:12; 17:15 (RSV REPHAIM). For the KJV "Valley of the Giants," see REPHAIM, VALLEY OF.

W. G. WILLIAMS

GIANTS, VALLEY OF THE. See REPHAIM, VALLEY OF.

GIBBAR gĭb′är [Aram. גבר, mighty man] (Ezra 2: 20). The head of a family that returned to Palestine after the Exile. In the corresponding list of Nehemiah (7:25) the place name Gibeon (גבעון) appears. This and the fact that place names occur in Ezra 2:21 ff suggest that "Gibbar" might be a corruption of "Gibeon."

M. NEWMAN

GIBBETHON gĭb′ə thŏn [גבתון, mound or height(?)]. A town in W central Palestine assigned to the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:44) before that tribe migrated to the N. It was also supposed to be a Levitical city of the clan of Kohath (21:23). In actual fact, it fell into the hands of the Philistines. At least two kings of Israel attempted to recapture it, but apparently without success (I Kings 15:27; 16:15, 17).

The site is tentatively identified with Tell el-Melat, a few miles W of Gezer.

Bibliography. G. von Rad, "Das Reich Israel und die Philister," Palästinajahrbuch (1933), pp. 30-42; W. Caspari, "Agbatana-Gibbeton," ZDPV, LVIII (1935), 160-84 (an exhaustive topographical study); E. G. Kraeling, Rand-McNally Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 272-73.

W. F. STINESPRING

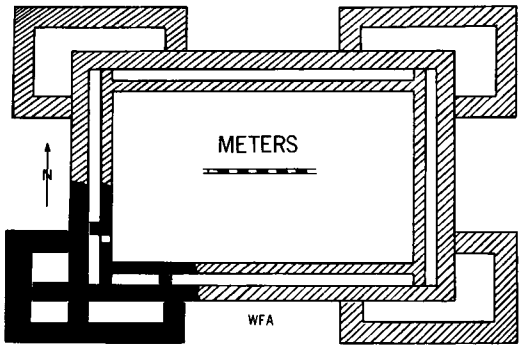
GIBEA gĭb′ĭ ə [גבעא, a hill] (I Chr. 2:49). A grandson of Caleb, in the lineage of Judah. The geographical associations of Judah's descendants through Caleb, however, suggest a town in the hill country S of Hebron (cf. Josh. 15:57).

W. H. MORTON

GIBEAH gĭb′ĭ ə [גבעה, hill]; KJV GIBEATH gĭb′ĭ ăth in Josh. 18:28. The Hebrew word commonly designates a hill or "height," as distinguished from a mountain. In several instances in the OT, however, it is employed as a place name.

1. A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15: 57; cf. I Chr. 2:49). Modern el-Jeba', 7½ miles SW of Bethlehem, has been suggested as a possible identification. However, the site is listed in company with a group of cities belonging to a geographical district of Judah situated SE of Hebron. It should probably be sought, therefore, on the pastoral plateau of which Ziph, Carmel, and Maon are a part.

* 2. A city of Benjamin variously designated as "Gibeah, which [or 'that'] belongs to Benjamin" (Judg. 19:14; 20:4), "Gibeah of Benjamin" (Judg. 20:10; I Sam. 13:2, 15; 14:16), "Gibeah of the Benjaminites" (II Sam. 23:29; I Chr. 11:31), "Gibeah of Saul" (I Sam. 11:4; 15:34; Isa. 10:29. ["Gabath Saul" in NT times]), "Gibeath" (Josh. 18: 28 KJV), and "Gibeath-elohim" (I Sam. 10:5; KJV "hill of God").



The city first enters upon the scene of Hebrew history for its inhospitable treatment of a journeying Ephraimite and the fatal ravishing of his concubine. Since both the city and the tribe identified themselves with the crime by refusing to deliver the culprits to justice, Gibeah became the focal point of Israel's punitive war against Benjamin, resulting in the destruction of the city and the near annihilation of the tribe (Judg. 19–20). Gibeah was the home of Saul (I Sam. 10:26); here he prophesied with a band of prophets, according to the prediction of Samuel, and therein received a third authenticating sign of his divine selection as the first king of Israel (vss. 1, 5, 10). It remained his home and became his provincial capital after he was acclaimed king at Mizpah (10: 26; 15:34; 22:6; 23:19). As such, it played an important role in his struggles with the Philistines (13: 2; 14:2, 16). Here came messengers from the beleaguered city of JABESH-GILEAD seeking aid against the oppressing Ammonites (11:4), and from here Saul issued his unique summons that Israel go to their relief (vs. 7). Here, also, he received a company of Ziphites seeking to betray the whereabouts of David (23:19; cf. 26:1). From Gibeah came three Mighty Men of David who helped him in war: Ittai son of Ribai (II Sam. 23:29; cf. I Chr. 11:31), and two sons of Shemaah, Ahiezer and Joash (I Chr. 12: 2-3). From here, also, came Micaiah, mother of Abijah, king of Judah (II Chr. 13:2).

The city occupied a place of prominence in eighth-century-B.C. prophetic thinking, for Isaiah envisions it standing in the fearful path of an Assyrian advance on Jerusalem from the N (Isa. 10:29), and to Hosea its early history symbolized the continuing waywardness of Israel in his own day (Hos. 9:9; 10: 9; cf. 5:8).

From the OT it is clear that Gibeah lay N of Jerusalem, between Jerusalem and Ramah, and near the main N-S road through the central hill country of Benjamin (Judg. 19:11-15; cf. Isa. 10:28-32). Josephus contributes the further knowledge that it was about thirty furlongs distant from Jerusalem (Jos. War V.ii.1). The site upon which this information comes to focus is Tell el-Ful (the "mound of beans") ca. 3½ miles N of Jerusalem and occupying one of the most elevated positions on the central mountain ridge. Its location commanded a fine outlook in all directions, making it an important watchtower over the hill towns of S Benjamin (cf. I Sam. 14:16).

Excavations conducted at Tell el-Ful in 1922-23 and again in 1933 by the American School of Oriental Research indicated a happy correlation between the archaeology of the site and the history of Gibeah of Saul. The first Hebrew settlement on the site, a small pleasant village of the twelfth century B.C., was found to have been destroyed by fire—possibly in the internecine struggle described in Judg. 19–20. The village which followed had a late-eleventh-century fortress of massive, rough-hewn masonry, whose surviving corner tower and casemate wall are thought to represent the citadel of Saul and to constitute the oldest datable Israelite fortification of the Early Iron Age.* This rustic "palace" of Israel's first king seems to have had a second story. The unpretentiousness of its structure and the simplicity of its furnishings, however, are suggested by the smallness of its rooms and the common quality of its artifacts. Ca. 1000 B.C. a second fortress of less massive masonry quickly rose on the destruction of the first, only to be abandoned after Jerusalem was made capital of the kingdom. Thereafter the site served as sentinel and outpost for Jerusalem on the N, experiencing intermittent periods of prosperity and decline. Scarcely a challenge could now be found to its identity with the Gibeah of Saul. Fig. GIB 27.

Courtesy of the American Schools of Oriental Research

27. Plan of Saul's citadel at Gibeah

3. A town in the hill country of Ephraim which had been given to Phinehas, son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron, and which was the burial place of Eleazar (Josh. 24:33; Jos. Antiq. V.i.29). Here, too, according to an addition in the LXX, Phinehas himself was subsequently buried with his father. The OT makes no mention of the specific location of the site, and its identification remains uncertain. Eusebius perhaps offers a clue by referring to a Geba five miles N of Gophna (modern Jifna) which, in view of the similarity and frequent confusion of the names Geba and Gibeah, could possibly be identical with the town of Phinehas. Suggested modern identifications include Jibia, 4 miles NW of Jifna; Nebi Saleh, 2½ miles farther in the same direction; and et-Tell, NE of Jifna and to the S of Sinjil. Late Samaritan tradition locates the tombs of Eleazar and Phinehas at Awertah, 4 miles SE of Nablus.

4. A hill at Kiriath-jearim where the ark of the Lord was lodged in the house of Abinadab from the time of its return by the Philistines until David's first attempt to take it into Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:3-4 KJV; cf. I Sam. 7:1-2). The term should not be translated here as a place name, but, with the RSV (and I Sam. 7:1 KJV), simply "hill."

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, AASOR, IV (1924), 1-89; BASOR, 52 (1933), 6-12. C. C. McCown, The Ladder of Progress in Palestine (1943), pp. 205-9. W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine (1949), pp. 120-22. E. G. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 143, 178. D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible (1957), p. 164. W. H. MORTON

GIBEATH-ELOHIM gĭb′ĭ ăth ĕl′ō hĭm, —ī lō′hĭm [גבעת האלהים, hill of God; Gibeah of God] (I Sam. 10:5); KJV HILL OF GOD. A site where Saul, in accordance with the prediction of Samuel, prophesied with a band of prophets and therein experienced the third authenticating sign of his divine selection as king of Israel.

The site, called simply GIBEAH (2) in I Sam. 10:10, was distinguished as the one having both a high place and a symbol of Philistine hegemony; whether this symbol was in the nature of a garrison, a pillar, or a prefect is difficult to determine, with the last of the three possibilities perhaps to be preferred. In any case, the presence of this symbol would seem to equate Gibeath-elohim with the Gibeah of I Sam. 13: 2-3 ("Geba" in vs. 3 should be "Gibeah," as in vs. 2), which is there identified as Gibeah of Benjamin—i.e., Saul's own city. The same conclusion is suggested both by the itinerary of Saul (10:2-5) and by the recognition of him among the inhabitants of the city (vss. 11-16). The site is to be located, therefore, at modern Tell el-Ful, three miles N of Jerusalem.

Bibliography. S. R. Driver, Notes on the Hebrew Text and the Topography of the Books of Samuel (1913), p. 80; E. G. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 178-80. W. H. MORTON

GIBEATH-HA-ARALOTH gĭb′ĭ ăth hā ăr′ə lŏth [גבעת הערלות, the hill of the foreskins] (Josh. 5:3); KJV HILL OF THE FORESKINS. A location in the vicinity of Gilgal, between Jericho and the Jordan, commemorating the circumcision of the Israelites following their entry into Canaan.

GIBEON gĭb′ĭ ən [גבעון, from גבע, hill]; GIBEONITES —ə nīts. A city of the tribe of Benjamin, now identified with the town of el-Jib, six miles NW of Jerusalem. Archaeological excavations were made at the site in 1956-57.

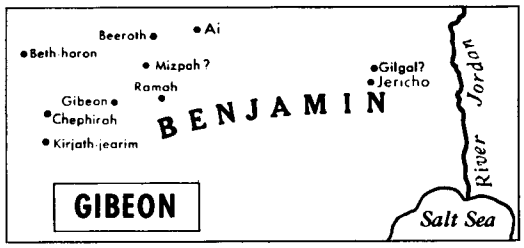

Fig. GIB 28.

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

28. Gibeon: the modern village (el-Jib) at the right, and the ancient tell at the left

1. Biblical history. The earliest occurrence of the name of Gibeon is in connection with the conquest of central Palestine by Joshua (Josh. 9). After the destruction of the cities of Jericho and Ai, the men of Gibeon, fearing that their town also might be attacked by Joshua, secured through a ruse a covenant of peace, which the Israelites felt obliged to keep even after the discovery of the misrepresentation of the Gibeonites. Five Amorite kings in the S, on hearing of the collaboration of the strong warriors of Gibeon with the invaders, besieged the town until they were routed by Joshua, who in a surprise attack after an all-night march from Gilgal put to flight the Amorite confederacy (Josh. 10:1-11). This was the occasion on which the sun is said to have stood still for a day and stones from the sky to have fallen on the fleeing Amorites.

Gibeon is mentioned in Josh. 9:17 along with three other cities, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kiriath-jearim, and its people are spoken of as Hivites in Josh. 9:7; 11:19. Mizpeh and Ramah, as well as Chephirah and Beeroth, are listed with Gibeon in Josh. 18:25-26, which consists of a list of the cities of Benjamin.

For a century and a half after the Conquest, Gibeon does not figure in events. At ca. 1000 B.C. the site is the setting for a spectacular contest between the forces of David and those of the rival house of Saul. David's captain Joab met with Abner, captain for Saul's son Ishbosheth, at the pool of Gibeon (II Sam. 2:12-17), where twelve men from each side transfixed their twelve opponents with swords. The place of this gruesome contest was named HELKATH-HAZZURIM, or the "field of sword-edges" (see RSV mg.). Another bloody episode, the slaughter of Amasa by Joab, is credited to have taken place at the "great stone which is in Gibeon" (II Sam. 20:8).

A tradition preserved in II Sam. 21:1-9 attributes the hanging of the seven sons of Saul to the Gibeonites; this was a privilege afforded them by David in order that they might have revenge on the house of Saul for an earlier attack which Saul is said to have made on Gibeon. At the beginning of the reign of Solomon, David's successor, Gibeon was the place of sacrifice, equipped with a great high place and an altar (I Kings 3:4), and it was here that Solomon had his famous dream (I Kings 3:4-15).

After four centuries the name of Gibeon comes to the fore in an account of the events of the year 586 B.C., in connection with the remnant from Jerusalem after the attack and destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. The false prophet Hananiah, who opposed Jeremiah, was from Gibeon (Jer. 28:1). Jer. 41:12 KJV mentions a place at the "great waters that are in Gibeon" (RSV "great pool"). The men of Gibeon were among those who helped rebuild the wall of Jerusalem in the fifth century B.C. (Neh. 3:7).

2. Extrabiblical references. In a list of the Egyptian king Sheshonk I (biblical SHISHAK), Gibeon is mentioned as one of the cities he either visited or took (ANET 242). According to Josephus, during October of A.D. 66 Cestius, "ascending through Bethhoron, pitched his camp at a place called Gabao [OT Gibeon], fifty furlongs distant from Jerusalem" (Jos. War II.xix.1).

3. Results of excavations. The site of el-Jib was excavated in 1956 and 1957 by the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania and the Church Divinity School of the Pacific under the direction of J. B. Pritchard. El-Jib was suggested as the site of ancient Gibeon as early as 1838 by Edward Robinson, who saw in the Arabic Jîb the remnant of the ancient Hebrew Gibeon. Although his judgment has prevailed generally since, it has been challenged by A. Alt (see bibliography) and others.

The hill on which el-Jib stands rises some two hundred feet above the plain and is watered by eight springs which flow from the base. One of these is the spring of the village, the principal water supply today. Leading up from the spring into the hill is a rock-cut tunnel which was partly entered as early as 1889. The area of the top of the south hill, the site of the ancient settlement, is approximately sixteen acres.

a. Periods of occupation. As a result of soundings made to bedrock on three different areas of the site, the occupational history of el-Jib was tentatively established. The earliest settlement was in the Early Bronze Period (ca. 2800 B.C.), from which there was abundant evidence of pottery jars and brick walls. In the Middle Bronze Period (ca. 1800 B.C.) the NW portion of the tell was inhabited. At the time of the Hebrew monarchy (Iron I Period) buildings covered the NW part of the mound. The major and most extensive settlement appears to have been during the Iron II Period (900-600 B.C.), when a city wall ca. ten feet thick, enlarged to a width of twenty-six feet in places, surrounded the entire area of the top of the hill. In the first century B.C. (a stratum dated by coins from the time of Alexander Janneus) there was an extensive settlement, evidenced by houses and plastered, stepped cisterns.

b. Water system. At the N side of the site was a round, rock-cut pool, which measured thirty-seven feet in diameter.* It was equipped with a circular stairway which leads downward around the edge of the pool. Seventy-nine rock-cut steps were uncovered. The pool is eighty-two feet deep. This pool may well have been the distinguishing mark, the "pool of Gibeon," * mentioned in II Sam. 2:13. A tunnel, which extends from inside the Iron II Age city wall for a distance of 167 feet through solid rock to the spring of the village below, was used as a means of reaching the vital water supply of the city when it was under siege by an enemy. This tunnel, with its ninety-three steps, is similar in purpose to those found in Jerusalem, Gezer, Megiddo, and Ibleam. See WATER WORKS. Figs. WAT 8; GIB 29; STA 77.

Courtesy of James B. Pritchard

29. The pool at Gibeon, showing part of the seventy-nine rock-cut steps

c. Identification. In the debris which had washed down into the rock-cut pool from the hill to the S there were found fifty-six jar handles, many of them inscribed with the name Gibeon.* In addition to gb'n, there appeared the word gdr, possibly "the walled vineyard of," and the names Hananiah, Azariah, and Amariah. The finding of the name Gibeon at a site which, because of the Arabic name of the present-day settlement and the general geographical situation, had long been thought to be Gibeon, seems to make certain the identification. Fig. GIB 30.

Courtesy of James B. Pritchard

30. Jar handle with inscription gb'n (Gibeon) gdr, found in the debris of the "pool" at Gibeon

Courtesy of James B. Pritchard

31. Entrances to wine vats (x) at Gibeon (ca. 900-600 B.C.)

d. Winery. The excavations of 1959 and 1960 have disclosed sixty-six bell-shaped vats, cut from the solid rock of the hill, which had been used in the Iron II period as wine cellars. Fermenting vats, wine presses, and channels were found cut in the rock of the winery area. After the wine was pressed from the grapes, it was placed in large jars and lowered into the cellars, where a constant temperature of 65° could be maintained. Fig. GIB 31.

e. Necropolis. Twelve shaft tombs were discovered on the W side of the hill during the 1960 season. Although the tombs had been cut during the Middle Bronze period, two of them had been reused in the Late Bronze period. The pottery from these two Late Bronze tombs provides the first evidence for occupation of Gibeon during the period immediately before the time of Joshua.

Bibliography. A. Alt, ZDPV, LXIX (1953), 1 ff. ILN (Oct. 27, 1956), pp. 695-97. J. B. Pritchard, "The Water System at Gibeon," BA, XIX (Dec., 1956), 66-75; "Discovery of the Biblical Gibeon," Bulletin of the University Museum (Mar., 1957). ILN (Mar. 29, 1958), pp. 505-7; (Sept. 10, 1960), pp. 433-35; (Sept. 24, 1960), pp. 518-19. J. B. Pritchard, Hebrew Inscriptions and Stamps from Gibeon, University Museum Monographs (1959). J. B. PRITCHARD

GIBLITES. KJV form of GEBALITES. See GEBAL.

GIDDALTI gĭ dăl'tī [גדלתי, see below] (I Chr. 25:4, 29). A son of Heman; one of those designated by King David to prophesy with music in the sanctuary. By itself the name would appear to mean "I have magnified [God]," but the name is part of a list that has long been recognized as a liturgical prayer in its origin.

Bibliography. For various interpretations of the name list in I Chr. 25:4, see W. R. Smith, The OT in the Jewish Church (rev. ed., 1892), p. 143; E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), p. 278; W. A. L. Elmslie, I Chronicles, IB, III (1954), 426. Cf. R. Kittel, ed., Biblia Hebraica. B. T. DAHLBERG

GIDDEL gĭd'əl [גדל, perhaps for גדול, big; see bibliography; 'Ισδαήλ]; KJV Apoc. ISDAEL ĭz'dĭ əl. 1. Ancestor of one of the families of temple servants among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49). The name is lacking in I Esd. 5:30, where CATHUA stands in its stead.

2. Ancestor of one of the families of the "sons of Solomon's servants" among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58; I Esd. 5:33).

Bibliography. R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Ezra, IB, III (1954), 584-85. B. T. DAHLBERG

GIDEON gĭd'ĭ ən [גדעון, hewer, slasher, (one who) cuts off (the hand); Γεδεών (Heb. 11:32; Jth. 8:1; KJV GEDEON)]; also JERUBBAAL. Son of Joash of the clan of Abiezer of the tribe of Manasseh; one of the chief "judges"—although the term "judge" is not specifically used of him—he was distinguished by unusual signs from Yahweh and by his completely delivering Israel from annual Midianite raids (Judg. 6:11–8:35).

The circumstances calling forth Gideon's heroic adventures were the regular forays of Bedouin bands from across the Jordan at harvesttime, seizing the hard-earned products of the W Jordan Israelites' labor (Judg. 6:2-6). Before these invaders, whose coming was like a plague of locusts (6:5; 7:12)—a stock Near Eastern simile for "overwhelming multitudes"—the harassed farmers fled into caves and mountain hideouts. The desperate situation was illustrated by Gideon's threshing his wheat, not as customarily with oxen on an open hilltop, but by hand in the cramped quarters and secrecy of a wine press (Judg. 6:11).

This perennial problem of the settled farmer adjacent to the desert was made in this case peculiarly terrifying because these were the first raids of camel riders known to Near Eastern history. By the use of camels the Midianite raiders could come from their home two hundred miles away to the SE and return again unscathed (see MIDIAN). Apparently they crossed the Jordan to harass both the region of the Valley of Jezreel, where at the edge of the territory of Manasseh Gideon's community of OPHRAH was probably located, and, farther S, the territory of Ephraim opposite the mouth of the River Jabbok. But while Manasseh and Ephraim were thus the tribes directly involved, the Midianites are said to have penetrated even to the southernmost coastal city of Gaza. Gideon's ridding the land of these invaders may be associated with the war with Midian in perhaps the second quarter of the eleventh century B.C., fought by Edomite King HADAD (Gen. 36: 35).

The story of Gideon is clearly a composite of at least two sources, the earlier of which may have been an extension of the J source of the Hexateuch, and the later an extension of E, although there is no scholarly agreement on the details of their literary analysis.

The call of Gideon to his task came when, according to the earlier narrative in perhaps its original form (Judg. 6:11-24), like Abraham (Gen. 18) he entertained God or his angel unawares. Gideon's mood changed when the huge meal became a sacrifice, as the messenger who had sat under the sacred tree suddenly brought divine fire from the rock (cf. Elijah in I Kings 18). Unlike the similar story of an angelic appearance to the parents of SAMSON (Judg. 13), this narrative accounts for the name of a commemorative altar promising welfare: "Yahweh (is) peace," still standing in the writer's day and regarded as belonging to Gideon's community and his clan.

In the second, and probably later, story of Gideon's call (6:25-32, 36-40) his loyalty to Yahweh was shown by his breaking down his family's and community's Baal altar and its sacred pole or ASHERAH and thus receiving the name Jerubbaal; and his call was verified by the sign of the wet and dry fleece. The name JERUBBAAL and its relation to Gideon have received divergent interpretations:

a) The name came from the earlier period of cultural syncretism when "baal," meaning "lord" or "master," was a title given to Yahweh. Therefore Jerubbaal was the name given Gideon at birth by his father, himself a Yahweh-worshiper as indicated by his own name, JOASH (cf. ISHBAAL; MERIBAAL). The name Gideon was perhaps an honorific title meaning "hewer" or "grim warrior." The view that Jerubbaal was Gideon's real name may be corroborated by the fact that it, not Gideon, is used in the later story of his son Abimelech (Judg. 9:1-2, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, 57). In the genealogy of the apocryphal heroine Judith, whose husband is named Manasseh, she is the seventh-generation descendant from a Gideon, son of Raphaim and grandson of Elijah, of the line of Israel (Jth. 8:1). Since this genealogy is probably fictitious (and Gideon is omitted in Codex Vaticanus), it throws light only on the tenacity of the name Gideon in tradition.

b) Jerubbaal and Gideon were actually two different heroes, their identification being the deliberate purpose of this narrative (6:25-32). This view is somewhat supported by the fact that the two names are independently used successively in 8:29-30, 32, and that in 7:1; 8:35 the editor finds it necessary to explain that Jerubbaal is Gideon.

c) Whatever the validity of either of the above two views, the point of the story is the reality of the conflict between Yahwism and Baalism. The clever answer of Gideon's father—that if Baal were really a god, he could fight his own battles—suggested the popular meaning for the name Jerubbaal: "Let Baal contend against him." For the root meaning of the name, see JERUBBAAL.

Gideon's sign of the fleece remaining dry while the hard threshing floor was wet—the more miraculous of the alternatives—is a test which may be compared with the cloth vanishing and reappearing at the word of Marduk in Tablet IV, lines 20-28, of the Babylonian Epic of Creation.

The story of Gideon's rout of the Midianite camp by a surprise attack just after the change of the guard at perhaps 10 P.M. is apparently a composite of both early and late narratives whose intertwined details can now scarcely be unraveled (7:1-23). Apparently in the early story the Midianites were aroused to self-slaughter by the sudden torchlight and the sounds of breaking pitchers and shouts of victory. In the later account the fear already in the Midianites' hearts, as revealed in the dream overheard by Gideon and his servant, turned to panic at the sound of trumpets and the sight of flashing swords.

That Gideon's own Abiezrite clansmen, some three hundred in number, were the fighting force both here and in the E Jordan pursuit (8:4) is emphasized to show the marvelous deeds of God-empowered men. Explanations of the water-drinking test by which the three hundred were selected have varied from that of God's deliberately choosing the least fit, suggested by Josephus, to its having no meaning or some veiled reference to the tribe of Caleb, "doglike." Perhaps the essential point was the attitude of alertness; at least the question of psychological fitness for battle had lain back of previously excusing the 22,000. The excellence of Gideon's strategy in planning, reconnaisance, timing, and use of personnel has been praised by military tacticians.

Stung by their defeat at the foot of Mount Gilboa at the edge of the Plain of Jezreel (6:33; 7:1), the Midianite fugitives headed for the highlands beyond the Jordan. Two traditions record Gideon's pursuit. According to the earlier (8:4-27), with his 300, although failing to get help from E Jordan kinsmen, Gideon valiantly pursued the 15,000 survivors of the one-time 135,000 Midianite raiders to their camp at Karkor many miles E of the Dead Sea, captured and later killed their two kings Zebah and Zalmunna, and out of the jewelry these raiders and their camels were wearing he made an EPHOD, perhaps an image overlaid with gold, as permanent memorial for his community. For further interpretation of this story, see ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA.

According to the probably later account of the outcome (7:24–8:3), the leaders of the Midianite fugitives were not two kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, but two princes, Oreb ("Raven") and Zeeb ("Wolf"; see OREB AND ZEEB). These two princes, apparently bearing the names of their totem animals, fled, not E across the Jordan, but S into Ephraimite territory, where, at sites known to the writer as commemorating the deed, they were beheaded by the Ephraimites. Jealous of their prerogatives as proud masters of central Palestine, the Ephraimites were incensed at not having been called into the fray sooner than simply guarding the Jordan River fords against fleeing Midianites (cf. their attitude toward JEPHTHAH in Judg. 12:1). Gideon appeased them by praise and clever quotation of an old proverb modestly disparaging his own clan's significance (8:2). See also HAROD; MOREH 2; BETH-SHITTAH; ZERERAH; ABEL-MEHOLAH; TABBATH; BETH-BARAH; SUCCOTH 1; PENUEL 3; NOBAH 2; JOGBEHAH; TABOR.

Historically very significant was Gideon's ridding the Israelites, apparently permanently, of the Midianite camel raids. In fact, the "day of Midian" became a phrase designating true Israelite victory (Isa. 9:4—H 9:3; cf. Ps. 83:11—H 83:12; Isa. 10:26).

Politically and religiously significant was Gideon's refusal to inaugurate a hereditary monarchy (Judg. 8:22-23). Although he was wealthy enough to have a large harem and was doubtless a local potentate over his own clan, he refused the offer of kingship made by the people to their hero in the true Hebrew tradition of primitive popular democracy. Not only would he not be king over tribes, but at his death his own authority over his clan would be dissipated among his numerous sons. This was the complaint of his half-Canaanite son Abimelech which persuaded the citizens of Shechem to refuse to "deal well with Jerubbaal and his house." The language of Gideon's refusal—Israel is a theocracy; God alone is ruler—is that of the eighth-century or later antimonarchic strand in I Samuel, inspired perhaps by Hosea (cf. I Sam. 8:7; 10:19; 12:12; Hos. 9:9; 10:9; 13:10); but its reflection of Gideon's own self-effacing position is genuine. For further discussion of the role of kingship in this period, see ABIMELECH; JOTHAM.

Religiously significant was the charismatic nature of Gideon's judgeship. In the quaint language of Judg. 6:34: "The Spirit of the LORD clothed itself with [RSV 'took possession of'] Gideon." He was peculiarly Yahweh's man, favored with special divine revelations and unusual power; hence his success against impossible odds—300 against 135,000! According probably to the Deuteronomic editor of the Gideon stories, during his own day Gideon gave the land rest for a full generation. It was only after his death that his ephod, a true Yahweh symbol for him, "became a snare"—probably a religious explanation of Abimelech's unfortunate career—and the people "made Baal-berith their god" and "did not show kindness to [Gideon's] family."

Thus in unchronological order Gideon appears as the first of the heroes of faith whom the author of the Letter to the Hebrews would have told about if time had permitted his going on to discuss the conquest of Palestine (Heb. 11:32).

Bibliography. L. Desnoyers, Histoire du peuple hébreu (1922), I, 153-71; S. Tolkowsky, "Gideon's 300," JPOS, V (1925), 69-74; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 227-28; J. Garstang, The Foundations of Bible History: Joshua, Judges (1931), pp. 316-25; W. A. Irwin, The OT: Keystone of Human Culture (1952), pp. 212-15; F. Zimmermann, "Reconstructions in Judg. 7:25–8:25," JBL, LXXI (1952), 111-14; A. Malamat, "The War of Gideon and Midian: A Military Approach," PEQ (1953), pp. 61-65; E. Kutsch, "Gideons Berufung und Altarbau Jdc 6:11-24," TLZ, LXXXI (1956), 75-84; C. A. Simpson, Composition of the Book of Judges (1957), pp. 25-44, 96-99, 106-11, 125-28, 141-44, 147; C. F. Whitley, "The Sources of the Gideon Stories," Vetus Testamentum, VII (1957), 157-64. C. F. KRAFT GIDEONI gĭd'ĭ ō'nī [גדעוני, feller (of trees), or with wounded hand(?)]. The father of Abidan, who was the leader of Benjamin in the wilderness (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 7:60, 65; 10:24).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 227-28. R. F. JOHNSON

GIDOM gī'dəm [גדעם, a cutting off, desolation] (Judg. 20:45). A site in Benjamin, near the Rock Rimmon in the wilderness E of Gibeah, which marks the terminus of Israel's pursuit of Benjamin in the decisive engagement of their civil war.

GIER EAGLE jĭr ē'gəl. KJV translation of רחם (Lev. 11:18; RSV VULTURE) and רחמה (Deut. 14:17; RSV CARRION VULTURE).

GIEZI gī ē'zī. Douay Version form of GEHAZI.

GIFT, GIVING [נתן, מתן, מנחה, תרומה; δίδωμι, δόμα, δόσις; δωρέω, δῶρον, δώρημα; χάρισμα]. There are three types of gifts in the Bible.

1. From men to men. A "gift" may be a euphemism for "tribute," as in Judg. 3:15 ff; II Sam. 8:2, 6 (מנחה); II Kings 18:31 = Isa. 36:16 (ברכה, "blessing"); for "bribes," as in Prov. 18:16 (מתן); or for "extortion," as in Prov. 29:4 (תרומה). Some gifts from men to men are also gifts from God, like the "spiritual gift" which Paul desired to impart to the Roman Christians (Rom. 1:11), or to God, like the gift which the Philippian Christians sent to Paul, a "sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God" (Phil. 4:18).

2. From God to men. "Every good endowment [δόσις] and every perfect gift [δώρημα] is from above" (Jas. 1:17)—this sentence incorporates an almost complete hexameter verse. God's crowning gift to men is his Son (John 3:16; Rom. 8:32; II Cor. 9:15). Among things called "gifts of God" are the satisfaction gained from honest labor (Eccl. 3:13; 5:19), salvation (Rom. 5:15, 17; Eph. 2:8), eternal life (John 4:10; Rom. 6:23), and the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; 8:20; 10:45; 11:17; cf. also Matt. 7:11 = Luke 11:13). In Eph. 4:8, "He gave gifts [δόματα] to men" is a quotation from Ps. 68:18 in a version conforming neither to the MT nor to the LXX (which speak of "receiving gifts among men") but to one represented in the Syr. and the Targ., followed here for its suitability to the picture of the triumphant Christ bestowing largess on his people in the form of SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

3. From men to God. Various sacrificial offerings are called "gifts" (e.g., Matt. 5:23-24, on offering one's gift at the altar; cf. Matt. 23:18-19). The gift to be presented by the healed leper in Matt. 8:4 (cf. Mark 1:44) is prescribed in Lev. 14:10 ff. The gifts of Luke 21:1-4 are freewill offerings for the temple treasury. The "offerings" (ἀναθήματα) of vs. 5 are votive. Abel's "gifts" (Heb. 11:4) were his offering (מנחה) of Gen. 4:4 (cf. Heb. 5:1; 8:3-4; 9:9).

For the gift of Matt. 15:5=Mark 7:11, see CORBAN. See also SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS. F. F. BRUCE

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

GIHON (RIVER) gī'hŏn [ויחון]. One of the four rivers of Paradise (Gen. 2:13). See EDEN.

GIHON (SPRING) [גיחון, גחון, from גיח, to gush forth]. A spring in the Kidron (see KIDRON, BROOK), beneath the City of David. Its identification with the spring of Umm ed-daradj, inappropriately called Fountain of the Virgin, is certain. It is mentioned in connection with the anointing of Solomon (I Kings 1:33, 38, 45) and with Hezekiah's program of defense, when he diverted its waters to the W side of the City of David (II Chr. 32:30). Manasseh, Hezekiah's successor, completed the fortifications of the city by building an outer wall W of Gihon—i.e., between the former outlet of the spring and the rampart on the crest of the hill (II Chr. 33:14).

The spring gushes forth intermittently from a natural cave, once or twice a day at the end of the dry season, four to five times a day after a rainy winter. The etymology of "Gihon" may refer to this phenomenon. The pre-Israelite inhabitants of Jerusalem had dug an underground passage which permitted them to draw the water of Gihon without being exposed to an eventual enemy in case of a siege (see WATERWORKS). After the conquest by David, this passage went out of use, and the water was collected in a reservoir, from which an aqueduct with lateral openings ensured a more efficient irrigation of the valley. The surplus flowed into a second pool toward the junction of the Tyropoeon with the Kidron. The Assyrian threat prompted Hezekiah to block the spring and the aqueduct, and to make a tunnel which branched off from the cave and led the water to new reservoirs in the Tyropoeon, within the fortified perimeter of the city (see POOL; SHELAH, POOL OF; SILOAM). Whereas the tunnel is still in use, the gradual filling of the Kidron Valley has altered the surroundings of the spring, which is now reached from outside by two successive flights of steps. See map under SILOAM. See also JERUSALEM § 6*c*.

Fig. GIH 32.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

32. The Spring Gihon in the Kidron Valley

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I (1907), 87-91; H. Vincent, Jérusalem Antique (1912), pp. 135-36; G. Dalman, Jerusalem und sein Gelände (1930), pp. 168-73; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 163-64; H. Vincent, Jérusalem de l'Ancien Testament, I (1954), 260-64. G. A. BARROIS

GILALAI gĭ lā'lī [גללי] (Neh. 12:36). A musician who took part in the great procession at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem in the sixth century B.C.

GILBOA, MOUNT gĭl bō'ə [גלבע]. Modern Jebel Fuqu'ah, a ridge of limestone hills reaching an elevation of 1,737 feet above the Mediterranean and located S of the Hill of Moreh at the E end of the Valley of Jezreel ca. six miles W of Beth-shean. The name of the modern village of Jelbun on the S slope preserves the ancient name.

Gilboa is best known as the place where Saul was slain in a battle with the Philistines. Because of its location near one of the two valleys leading into the Plain of Jezreel from the Jordan Valley, it was frequently the scene of military strife. Although not mentioned by name, it was probably the place of Gideon's camp when the Midianites were located on the N side of the valley (Judg. 7:1).

In I Sam. 28:4; II Sam. 21:12, "Gilboa" appears without the word "mount"; this may indicate that there was a village nearby from which the mountain took its name.

In choosing to defend Gilboa against the Philistines, Saul was taking advantage of the heights offered by the mountain where the superior equipment of the enemy would be less effective. Saul and his sons, including Jonathan, were slain on Mount Gilboa (I Sam. 31:1, 8). One tradition credits a young Amalekite with having been at the scene of battle and having killed the wounded Saul (II Sam. 1:6, 8).

The famous lament of David over Saul and Jonathan seems to contain a curse on the scene of their death:

> Ye mountains of Gilboa, > let there be no dew or rain upon you,
> nor upsurging of the deep!
> (II Sam. 1:21).

The poetic parallelism of the verse and a similar

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

33. The Valley of Jezreel, with Mount Gilboa in the background phrase found in one of the Ras Shamra Tablets (The Tale of Aqhat C, i, 47) favor the RSV emendation "upsurging of the deep" for the MT "fields of offering."

Fig. GIL 33. W. L. Reed

GILEAD gĭl'ĭ əd [גלעד, monument of stones(?)]; GILEADITES —ə dīts. 1. Son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh; eponym of the tribe or territory of Gilead (Num. 26:29-30; 27:1; 36:1; Josh. 17:1, 3; Judg 5:17; I Chr. 2:21, 23; 7:14, 17). It is often difficult to tell whether a given occurrence of the name refers to a person, a tribe, or a place. In 2 and 3 below it is probably actually this eponym which is being used. See 4 below.

2. The father of Jephthah (Judg. 11:1-2). See 1 above.

3. A clan or family of the territory of Gad (I Chr. 5:14), in Gilead. See 1 above. H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

4. The name of a territory, a tribe, and possibly a city situated in the region to the E of the Jordan. The name is explained in the Bible as coming from Galeed, but this is folk etymology, and the true meaning of "Gilead" is probably "rugged country," in contrast to the fertile plain of Bashan, adjacent to it.

Gilead is mentioned as a "city of evildoers" (Hos. 6:8); but as the prophets and poets occasionally shortened names for the sake of rhythm (cf. Shittim for Abel-shittim in Mic. 6:5), it may stand for such a city as Jabesh-gilead or Ramoth-gilead. The same may be the case in Judg. 10:17, for elsewhere in the same story "Gilead" is always used in a wider significance. In the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:17), however, Gilead is evidently a tribe, parallel to Reuben and Dan and equivalent to Gad. Elsewhere in the Bible and the Apoc. (which has the Greek form Galaad), Gilead is always used for a stretch of territory, and its inhabitants, which may be of more than one tribe, as Gileadites.

a. Description. The term "Gilead" is used somewhat loosely in the Bible. In its narrowest sense it refers to the area bounded by the Arnon on the S, the Jordan Valley on the W, the S-N part of the Jabbok and the desert to the E, and the limit of Bashan, a few miles S of the Yarmuk, on the N. In a broader sense, it extended farther N into Bashan and even beyond the Yarmuk. As a result of this vagueness the territory of Manasseh is sometimes mentioned as overlapping into Gilead, and in others it is only the tribes of Reuben and Gad who were settled there. The principal cities of the area were Ramoth-gilead, Jabesh-gilead, Mahanaim, Mizpah, and Succoth, and the later Greek cities of Pella and Gerasa.

Gilead is in general a highland region, rising from the valley of the Jordan, at least 700 feet below sea level, to heights of more than 3,300 feet, which are intersected by valleys and particularly by the river Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerqa), which flows from E to W across its entire width. There is no single "Mount Gilead," as one might suppose from the KJV translation of the Hebrew הר הגלעד (Gen. 31:21, 23, 25; the occurrence in the MT of Judg. 7:3 is a textual error); the RSV rendering "hill country" is more exact. These hills and valleys were well watered, making the region a well-forested one, with good facilities for growing grapes and olives, while the "balm of Gilead" was proverbial (Jer. 8:22; 46:11).

b. History. The N part of Gilead, like Bashan, had a permanent settlement from the twenty-third century B.C.; but the S part, below the Jabbok, had the same period of relative lack of popula: · from the twentieth to the thirteenth century as is found in the regions to the S. Not long before the entrance of the Israelites it was occupied by the Amorites and the Moabites; and Sihon, the Amorite king, extended his sway over Moabite territory as far S as the river Arnon. The Israelites under Moses dispossessed the Amorites, and the region was given to the E tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (Num. 21). After the conquest of Canaan, the tribes E of the Jordan remained in comparative security and even refused to come to the help of their compatriots in the W who fought against Sisera (Judg. 5:16-17). Soon, however, they in turn were assailed by enemies from the E. The Midianites, with their Amalekite allies, overran the entire country; and it was only by the martial progress of Gideon, from W Manasseh, that the invaders were driven back (Judg. 6–7). About half a century later, the Ammonites took possession of the area, and the elders of Gilead had to summon Jephthah from his banishment to deliver them from this oppressive rule (Judg. 10–11).

Despite the victory of Jephthah, the Ammonites remained a constant menace. The first exploit of Saul after he was made king was to rescue the city of Jabesh-gilead from Nahash, king of the Ammonites (I Sam. 11); this brought Gilead a measure of security, so that, after Saul was decisively defeated and slain by the Philistines, Abner could set up a kingdom for Ishbaal in Gilead (II Sam. 2:8-9), from which, as the Philistines withdrew from the territories that they occupied, he could extend his reign over the greater part of Palestine. David, who succeeded to the kingdom, had to fight once more against the Ammonites (II Sam. 8:12; 10:1-17); Gilead again became a place of refuge for him when he was fleeing from the rebellion of Absalom, and it was in Gilead that the decisive battle was fought that restored him to the throne (II Sam. 15–19).

During the ninth and eighth centuries B.C. a new menace arose in the Syrian (Aramean) kingdom of Damascus, which "threshed Gilead with threshing sledges of iron" (Amos 1:3). The territory became the scene of battles in which first Syria and then Israel prevailed. Ramoth-gilead was fiercely contested for; under the dynasty of Jehu the entire region was overrun by the Syrians and later recovered by Jehoash and Jeroboam II. As a result of this devastation and because of the rising power of Assyria, a faction seems to have arisen in Gilead which preferred an alliance with Syria to fight against the empire of the E. Shallum, the son of Jabesh (i.e., an inhabitant of Jabesh-gilead), overthrew the dynasty of Jehu, but after a month was in turn slain by the pro-Assyrian Menahem (II Kings 15:10-14). A more serious contender was Pekah, the son of Remaliah. The twenty years assigned to his reign (II Kings 15:27) cannot be fitted in any chronological scheme and can only be explained by the supposition that as early as ca. 750 B.C., in the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam II, he set up an independent kingdom in Gilead, where he ruled until 735, when he killed his predecessor with the aid of his Gileadites (II Kings 15:25) and attempted to unite all the surrounding regions against Assyria. The result was that the Assyrians carried away all the Israelite population of Gilead (II Kings 15:29) and that from that time on it was no longer part of the kingdom. During the postexilic period there were so few Jews in Gilead that Judas Maccabeus had to rescue them from the attacks of the Greeks and the Ammonites (I Macc. 5:9-54).

For the subsequent history of the region, see PERAEA.

Bibliography. D. Baly, Geography of the Bible (1957), pp. 226-31; N. Glueck, "Exploration in Eastern Palestine, III, IV," AASOR, XVIII-XIX (1939), XXV-XXVIII (1951).

S. COHEN

GILEAD, BALM OF. An aromatic resin reputed in antiquity for its medicinal properties. It probably received its name by being exported from Gilead to Egypt and Phoenicia (Gen. 37:25; Ezek. 27:17), since it is not native to Gilead. An antiseptic, counter-irritant, and general medicament, it is variously identified with Balsamodendron opobalsamum, Pistacia lentiscus, and Balanites aegyptiaca(l) Delile. See BALM.

R. K. HARRISON

GILGAL gĭl'găl [גלגל; Γαλγαλ (singular), Γαλγαλα (plural)]. The word means "circle of stones"; such "circles" are still to be found in E Palestine. The name was applied to many towns, but always with the article (הגלגל) except in Josh. 5:9; 12:23. At least three such localities may be recognized in the OT.

1. Gilgal near Jericho (Josh. 4:19-20; 5:9-10; 9:6; 10:6-7, 9, 15, 43; 14:6; Judg. 2:1; 3:19; I Sam. 7:16; 10:8; 11:14-15; 13:4, 7-8, 12, 15; 15:12, 21, 33; II Sam. 19:15, 40—H 19:16, 41; Hos. 4:15; 9:15; 12:11—H 12:12; Amos 4:4; 5:5; Mic. 6:5). This was a city of the tribe of Benjamin, of special importance in the period of the Conquest and the Early Monarchy as a political, military, and religious center.

The chief contender for the locale of Gilgal has been Khirbet en-Nitleh, ca. 2 1/3 miles to the E of modern Jericho. The identification has been supported by the majority of scholars. The terrain about the famous tamarisk, Shejeret en-Nitleh, is strewn with Byzantine remains, and some have therefore concluded that Byzantine Galgala may have been located there. More recently, especially since 1931, Khirbet Mefjir, a mound ca. 1 1/4 miles from ancient Jericho (Tell es-Sultan) and bearing the magnificent remains of the palace of the Umayyad caliph Hisham (A.D. 724-43), has received the support of some scholars. The clearest topographical reference in the OT is Josh. 4:19, where Gilgal is said to be "on the east border of Jericho" (בקצה מזרח יריחו). Josephus (Antiq. V.vi.4) gives the distance from the place where the Israelites crossed the Jordan to Gilgal as 50 stadia (5 8/10 miles) and from Gilgal to Jericho as 10 stadia. In the Onomasticon Eusebius locates Gilgal "at about the second milestone from Jericho." These measurements suit Khirbet Mefjir much more precisely than Khirbet en-Nitleh. Moreover, an examination of the records of pilgrims supports this conclusion. A small sounding in the spring of 1954 in the region immediately to the N of Khirbet Mefjir unearthed remains from the Early Iron and Middle Iron periods (ca. 1200-600 B.C.); this is also the period of Gilgal's floruit. It seems probable, therefore, that Gilgal lay in this region.

The first encampment after the crossing of the Jordan was at Gilgal (Josh. 3–4; Mic. 6:5). There the Israelites erected the twelve memorial stones taken from the bed of the Jordan (Josh. 4:20-24). Gilgal was thus the first foothold on Palestinian soil, and it became the base for military operations, as well as a great sanctuary, originally, perhaps, only for the tribe of Benjamin. The earliest stories, in the main sanctuary reports, tell of the circumcision of the people—an etiological narrative explaining the origin of Gilgal from the verb "to roll away" (גלל); the celebration of the Passover; and the extraordinary theophany to Joshua (5:2-9, 10-12, 13-15). At Gilgal, too, Joshua made a treaty with the Gibeonites (9:3-15) and launched his campaign against the five Amorite kings (10:6-43). In Judg. 21:5, as in the early strata of Josh. 1–9, the rallying point for Israel is Gilgal, and with this the early traditions of Saul connect very well. It is clear that Gilgal was an amphictyonic center; the tradition of the twelve memorial stones doubtless dates from this period. Gilgal was one of the towns the prophet Samuel visited on his yearly circuit (I Sam. 7:16). It was there that Saul was made king (11:14-15), but there too that he was rejected (13:4-15*a;* 15:17-31). It was notably a place for sacrificial offering (10:8; 11:15*b;* 13:8-10; 15:21). It is probably to this Gilgal that we must assign the references in the eighth-century prophets; there the sanctuary and its sacrificial cult are bitterly denounced, as is the institution of the kingdom (Hos. 4:15; 9:15; 12:11; Amos 4:4; 5:5). But in the great controversy of Mic. 6:1-8 Yahweh reminds Israel of "what happened from Shittim to Gilgal" (vs. 5; cf. Josh. 4–5).

2. Gilgal of Elijah and Elisha (II Kings 2:1; 4:38). The Onomasticon (67.6) describes the location as follows: Sed et iuxta Bethel quidam aliam Galgalam suspicantur. In the biblical account of Elijah's translation into heaven, Elijah and Elisha are proceeding from Gilgal to Bethel to Jericho. While some have supposed that the reference is to Gilgal near Jericho, the majority of scholars have identified the place with Jiljulieh, situated on the top of a high hill of the central range, some seven miles N of Bethel, not far from Tell 'Alyata. It was from here that the prophets went their way to the Jordan River, where Elijah was taken up to heaven. The miracle of the healing of the unsavory pottage by Elisha is also associated with this Gilgal.

3. The MT contains a reference to a Gilgal in the list of Canaanite kings in Josh. 12:23: גוים לגלגל מלך, "king of the nations at Gilgal" (RSV "king of Goiim in Galilee"). This may be compared with the Harosheth-ha-goiim of Judg. 4:2, with which it is sometimes identified. Noth places it in the mountains of Samaria; Abel five kilometers N of Ras el-'Ain on the border of the Plain of Sharon; F. J. Bliss at the modern village of Jiljulieh, thirty miles S-SE of Tantura, which he identifies with ancient Dor. But the text may be corrupt. The LXX reads βασιλεία Γεὶ τῆς Γαλιλαίας (cf. RSV).

4. The reference to Gilgal in Deut. 11:30 is difficult: "Are they not beyond the Jordan, west of the road, toward the going down of the sun, in the land of the Canaanites who live in the Arabah, over against Gilgal, beside the oak of Moreh?" The context would lead us to expect a reference to Gilgal near Jericho, but the language seems to suggest a region near Shechem, between Gerizim and Ebal. See IB, II, 408.

5. In the description of the boundary line of Judah in Josh. 15:7 there is still another reference to Gilgal, "which is opposite the ascent of Adummim" (Tal'at ed-Damm, on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem). But in the parallel passage of Josh. 18:17 we read for Gilgal "Geliloth," which has some versional support (B Γαλιαωθ; A Αγαλλιλωθ; Syr. Geliloth).

Bibliography. Brief comments will be given in the atlases of G. E. Wright and F. V. Filson (Westminster), E. G. Kraeling, and L. H. Grollenberg. Many valuable articles are to be found in PJ, BASOR, and ZDPV. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine (1933), gives a succinct statement of the various Gilgals. The following represent some of the more recent treatments: A. M. Schneider, "Das byzantinische Gilgal (chirbet mefjir)," ZDPV, 54 (1931), 50-59; A. Alt, "Josua," Werden und Wesen des alten Testaments (1935), pp. 13-20; K. Galling, ZDPV, 36 (1945), 34-43; J. Kraus, "Gilgal: Ein Beitrag zur Kulturgeschichte Israels," Vetus Testamentum, I (1951), 181-91; M. Noth, Josua, HAT, 7 (1953), passim; J. Muilenburg, "The Site of Ancient Gilgal," BASOR, 140 (Dec., 1955), 11-27.

J. MUILENBURG

GILOH gī'lō [גלה] (Josh. 15:51); GILO in II Sam. 23:34; GILONITE —lə nīt. A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Debir; usually identified with Khirbet Jala, five miles N-NW of Hebron. If correct, geographically Giloh would be more properly a part of the district of Beth-zur (Josh. 15:58 ff).

V. R. GOLD

GIMEL gĭm'əl [ג, g]. The third letter of the Hebrew ALPHABET as placed in the KJV at the head of the third section of the acrostic psalm, Ps. 119, where each verse of this section of the psalm begins with this letter.

GIMZO gĭm'zō [גמזו, abounding in sycamores(?)] (II Chr. 28:18). A city of Judah in the Shephelah; identified with modern Jimzu, ca. three miles SE of Lod (Lydda) and ca. four miles E of er-Ramleh. Gimzo, with its dependent villages, was captured by the Philistines during the reign of Ahaz (ca. 735-715) and was the home of a noted rabbi named Nahum.

V. R. GOLD

GIN. KJV translation of מוקש (RSV "snare" in Pss. 140:5—H 140:6; 141:9; "trap" in Amos 3:5) and פח (RSV "trap"; Job 18:9; Isa. 8:14). The word is a contracted form of "engine," now obsolete but formerly used of a mechanical device employed as a trap.

GINATH gī'năth [גינת] (I Kings 16:21-22). The father of Tibni the pretender to the Israelite throne.

GINNETHOI gĭn'ə thoi [גנתוי] (Neh. 12:4); KJV GINNETHO —thō. A corruption of GINNETHON.

GINNETHON gĭn'ə thŏn [גנתון]. 1. A priest who witnessed the covenant renewal under Ezra (Neh. 10:6).

2. Head of a family of priests in the period of Joiakim (Neh. 12:16). If the names in the lists of Neh. 10; 12 are ancestral rather than individual, as is frequently supposed, there may be only one Ginnethon.

3. See GINNETHOI.

J. M. WARD

GIRDLE. The translation of the following words:

a) אבנט (from Egyptian bnd; Exod. 28:4, 39-40; 29:9; 39:29; Lev. 8:7, 13; 16:4; Isa. 22:21), the linen sash of a priest or official.

b) חגור, חגורה (I Sam. 18:4; II Sam. 18:11; 20:8; I Kings 2:5; Prov. 31:24; Isa. 3:24; "apron" in Gen. 3:7; "armor" in II Kings 3:21), usually an article of clothing, though frequently with the specialized meaning of a soldier's belt (I Sam. 18:4; II Sam. 18:11; 20:8; II Kings 3:21). Fig. DRE 38.

c) Ζώνη (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6; Acts 21:11; Rev. 1:13; 15:6; alternately BELT 5), originally the lower of two girdles worn by women; in the NT, sometimes an article of clothing worn by men, as by John the Baptist.

d) KJV and alternately RSV אזור. See WAISTCLOTH; BELT 1.

e) KJV חשב (RSV BAND).

J. M. MYERS

GIRGASHITE gûr'gə shīt [גרגשי]. A Canaanite tribe named seven times (Gen. 10:16; 15:21; Deut. 7:1; Josh. 3:10; 24:11; Neh. 9:8; I Chr. 1:14) in OT lists of peoples dispossessed by the Israelites, without indication of locality. They have been identified with the Qaraqisha of Hittite records. It is suggested that the name is theophorous, meaning "client of Gesh," a Sumerian god of light introduced to Palestine and Phoenicia ca. 2000 B.C.

In the NT (Matt. 8:28; Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26) what may be the same name appears as "Gerasenes," "Gadarenes," or "Gergesenes." See GERASA.

Bibliography. B. Maisler, "Zur Götterwelt des alten Palästina," ZAW, L (1932), 86-87; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, I (1933), 325; W. F. Albright, review of Abel's Géographie de la Palestine, JPOS, XV (1935), 189.

R. F. SCHNELL

GIRZITES gûr'zīts [Kethibh גרזי, Qere גזרי] (I Sam. 27:8); KJV GEZRITES gĕz'rīts; KJV mg. GERZITES gûr'zīts. An otherwise unknown people probably living between the Philistines and Egypt. They, like the Geshurites (Josh. 13:2; I Sam. 27:8) and the Amalekites, were the victims of raids by David during his sojourn at Ziklag. The LXX may support the omission of "Girzites" as a doublet of "Geshur-ites." The LXX reads only the one name Gezrites (and this is the Qere reading in the MT), which would mean the inhabitants of Gezer, but Gezer is too far N to fit the context. R. F. SCHNELL

GISHPA gĭsh'pə [גשפא] (Neh. 11:21); KJV GISPA gĭs'pə. One of the NETHINIM. The name may be a corruption of Hasupha (cf. Ezra 2:43).

GITTAH-HEPHER. KJV form of GATH-HEPHER in Josh. 19:13.

GITTAIM gĭt'ī əm [גתים, two wine presses]. The village to which the Amorite inhabitants of Beeroth fled for refuge, perhaps from the cruel persecution of an overly zealous Saul (II Sam. 4:3; cf. Josh. 9:17). Subsequent to the Exile, returning Benjaminites settled at the site (Neh. 11:33).

A location in the vicinity of modern Ramleh is most probable. Suggested identifications include Qdtm of the Shishak List (no. 25) and Gamteti of the Tell el-Amarna Letters. W. H. MORTON

GITTITE. See GATH.

GITTITH gĭt'ĭth. See MUSIC.

GIZONITE gī'zə nīt [גזוני]. A gentilic name predicated of HASHEM, whose name appears in the catalogue of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (I Chr. 11:34). Since Gizon/Gizo is elsewhere unknown, some scholars have read with some support from the Greek, "the Gunite" (cf. I Chr. 5:15; 7:13); others emend to read "from Gimzo" (cf. II Chr. 28:18). E. R. DALGLISH

GLAD TIDINGS. The phrase "to show, declare, or bring glad tidings" occurs in the KJV four times (Luke 1:19; 8:1; Acts 13:32; Rom. 10:15), in all instances rendering the Greek verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, which in other passages in both the OT and the NT is rendered "to bring good tidings." No distinction is made between religious and secular usage. The phrase was introduced into the English Bible by Tyndale, who had it in Luke 1:19; Rom. 10:15, whereas Wyclif consistently used "to preach," "to evangelize," or "to shew." The phrase obviously gained currency with the early Protestants, for the KJV adopted it without precedent for Luke 8:1; Acts 13:32. The ERV-ASV added I Thess. 3:6. The RSV, however, replaced "tidings" with "news" in all the NT passages, while retaining "tidings" in II Sam. 18:27; Isa. 40:9; 41:27; 52:7; 61:1; and throughout the adjective "good" was substituted for "glad." Tyndale's usage indicates that in the Middle Ages the term "good news" was the common, popular designation of the GOSPEL. The usage still survives in our "noel," which originally designated the chant on Christmas Eve, in which the message of the angels (Luke 2:10) is repeated. (The derivation of "noel" from natalis is untenable, for etymological and historical reasons. Rather, it is the French nouvelle, still preserved in the bonne nouvelle—i.e., "gospel"—in the French Bible.) To English Protestants the term "glad tidings" appeared to be the most appropriate expression for the whole Christian message, characterizing it as coming from God and being destined to exhilarate man and to drive out anxiety and despair (cf. Luke 2:10 KJV: "good tidings of great joy"). According to the church fathers, the glad tidings were announced first to Eve in the so-called protevangelion (Gen. 3:14-15) and were continued in the divine promises scattered over the whole OT. O. A. PIPER

GLASS. 1. The well-known transparent or translucent substance (זכוכית; ὕαλος; KJV CRYSTAL in Job 28:17). Glass was considered by the Hebrews as a precious substance, and is mentioned chiefly in poetic similitudes (Job 28:17; Rev. 4:6; 15:2; 21:18, 21).

Because of defective industrial processes no sizable glass containers, such as bottles or decanters, were manufactured prior to the Roman period. Pieces of glass sticks of various colors, reheated and welded together, were fashioned as pearls and elements of necklaces or other trinkets. These are commonly found in tombs together with miscellaneous jewelry. Small vases for perfumes and unguents were obtained by welding sticks of glass around a core of sand and clay built around a bar of metal; core and bar were subsequently removed. Such vessels, often of many colors, are always opaque. The above technique was common in ancient Egypt. Greek traditions, however, locate the origin of glass industry in Phoenicia, where, indeed, numerous objects showing a similar technique were found, together with articles of transparent glass which have often become iridescent because of oxidation. The latter seldom antedate the Hellenistic era.

The glass beads and vases found in Palestine cannot be distinguished from Egyptian and Phoenician articles. They are probably imports; at any rate, there is no evidence of a local glass industry in biblical Palestine. Some of the smallest vials discovered in tombs have been designated as lachrymatories. In the measure in which this term refers, not to the shape of the vials, but to tear water being actually collected into them, it is wholly unfounded.

See also GLAZING.

Bibliography. G. Contenau, La Civilisation Phénicienne (1925), pp. 217-19; K. Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon (1937), cols. 198-200; G. A. Barrois, Manuel d'Archéologie Biblique, I (1939), 456-58.

2. KJV form of MIRROR. This translation is an archaeological anachronism. Ancient mirrors were made of polished metal, and glass mirrors were not invented until late Roman times.

The translation of the Hebrew גליונים in Isa. 3:23 KJV by "glasses," in the sense of "mirrors," is also to be rejected. This term may refer to trinkets of glassware. The RSV, however, interprets it "garments of gauze," which is highly hypothetical. The etymology suggests something shiny or transparent, without further precision. G. A. BARROIS

GLAZING. The potter's glazing (τὸ χρῖσμα), mentioned in Ecclus. 38:30, probably refers to the process of smearing with paint, after which the smeared vessel was polished. In the light of evidence from the Ugaritic texts, the RSV renders the first two Hebrew words of Prov. 26:23 (כסף סיגים) "like the glaze." The Hebrew means, literally, "silver of dross," and is mis-translated "silver dross" by the KJV; but the Ugaritic texts justify combining these two Hebrew words and translating them "like the glaze."

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

GLEANING [לקט; Arab. laqaṭa, pick up]. The practice of gathering or picking up what was left in the field after reaping. It also applied to grapes left under the vine or olives in the orchard. Technically, "gleaning" also applied to reaping what was left standing in the corners of the field. Hebrew law prohibited an owner from cleaning up his own field, vineyard, or orchard, so that there would be provision for the poor, the orphan, the widow, and the alien resident (Lev. 19:9 ff; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-21; cf. Judg. 8:2; Ruth 2:2 ff).

H. N. RICHARDSON

GLEDE glēd. KJV translation of ראה (Deut. 14:13; RSV BUZZARD). The term "glede" or "glead" is properly applied only to the red KITE (Milvus milvus milvus).

GLORY. No fewer than twenty-five Hebrew words are rendered by δόξα in the LXX, though the four most important are כבוד, תפארת, הוד, and הדר. The English "glory" likewise renders many Hebrew words, but principally the same four, plus the Aramaic יקרא. The verb "glory" renders התהלל, "boast," and verbal forms of כבד and פאר lie behind "glorify" or "be glorified." Even for the RSV the linguistic equivalents are too complicated and too inconsistent to be set forth in detail, and the concordances and commentaries must be consulted.

1. In the OT
   a. Human glory
   b. Divine glory
   c. Eschatological glory
2. In the NT
   a. In the Synoptic gospels
   b. In the Fourth Gospel
   c. In Acts
   d. In the Pauline letters
   e. In Hebrews
   f. In the Petrine letters
   g. In Revelation

Bibliography

1. In the OT. a. Human glory. The word כבוד means basically "weight, importance, consideration," and the things that display men as possessing glory. This glory is seen in riches (Ps. 49:16; Isa. 61:6; Hag. 2:7 KJV), in the army of Assyria (Isa. 8:7; 17:3-4; 21:16), in the trees of Lebanon (Isa. 60:13; cf. 10:18), in royal figures alive (Esth. 1:4; Ps. 45:3; Dan. 11:20) or dead (Isa. 14:18). It is manifest also in reputation (Job 29:20; Pss. 4:2 KJV; 49:17), in spiritual status (Ps. 8:5), in priestly garments (Exod. 28:2, 40; cf. Ps. 45:13) in the first (I Chr. 22:5) and in the second temple (Hag. 2:3). The glory of Israel is the king (Mic. 1:15, unless nobility is meant), the ark (I Sam. 4:22), or Yahweh himself (Ps. 106:20; Jer. 2:11; Hos. 4:7[?]; cf. Pss. 3:3; 62:7). The Hebrew word also probably describes the self (Pss. 16:9; 108:1; etc.), unless "liver" is the right reading (cf. Gen. 49:6 LXX). Though clearly "glory" often expresses an external manifestation, it is also indicative of inner qualities and of the spiritual endowment of man's inner nature. This is clearly shown in the translation of the word in such passages as Gen. 49:6 ("spirit"); Pss. 7:5—H 7:6 ("soul"); 16:9 ("soul"); 30:12—H 30:13 ("soul"); 57:8 ("soul").

b. Divine glory. Much is made of the accounts of the divine glory in Isaiah, Ezekiel, the P document, and the Psalms, and theories of the development of the conception have arisen out of the chronological order of the material. Thus early conceptions of the glory descriptive of Yahweh's acts and might achieved deeper significance in Isaiah, and later a more physical interpretation in the visions of Ezekiel, from whom P developed the visible, fiery glory so characteristic of his writings. But, as so often, this chronological account ignores the significance and influence of the cult in the development of the conception. The association of glory with the ARK OF THE COVENANT is clear and belongs to the days of the Early Monarchy (I Sam. 4:21-22; Pss. 24:7-10; 63:2; 78:61). It is generally acknowledged that Ps. 29 is a very early poem, perhaps with a Canaanite base, and in it "glory" appears as an ascription of praise (vss. 2-3; cf. I Chr. 16:28; 29:9, 11; Pss. 66:2; 96:8; 115:1). Perhaps the word referred to the character of the Deity as it was manifested in the storm (Ps. 29:3; cf. 19:1), or it may have pointed to some liturgical act performed in the temple cultus, such as the appearance of the ark or of the king or of some cultic official (29:9; cf. Exod. 19:16-24). The two occurrences of the "glory" in Isaiah (3:8; 6:3) are also connected with the temple, and suggest underlying cultic conceptions. The question thus arises whether the accounts of the glory in Ezekiel and P are not also derived from the same source. Ezekiel sees in vision the divine glory as the appearance of brightness, FIRE, and rainbow in audible motion (Ezek. 1:28; 9:3; 10:4, 18-19), both moving from Jerusalem (11:23) and returning to it (43:2 ff; cf. Isa. 40:3-11). The visions of Ezekiel and the poems of the Second Isaiah may allude to the processional exit and entry of the ark in the Davidic cultus.

In the priestly writings the glory appears as a fiery presence associated with Sinai (Exod. 14:4, 17-18; 24:16-18; 34:29-35). Almost always, the glory in P is associated with the TABERNACLE (Exod. 16:7, 10; 29:43; 40:34-35; Lev. 9:6, 23; Num. 14:10; 16:19, 42; 20:6), sometimes as a manifestation of favor, but more frequently as a sign of divine wrath. The association of "glory" with the cloud on the tabernacle shows the connection with the cultus (cf. I Kings 8:11 = II Chr. 5:14; 7:1, 3). The verb שכן, "to dwell," is sometimes used in connection with the glory and the tabernacle (Exod. 24:16; Ps. 26:8); the glory is said to fill the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34-35) or temple (I Kings 8:11, etc.) and the whole earth (Ps. 72:19; Isa. 6:3; cf. Ps. 57:5 = 108:5; 113:4; etc.). Cultic glory may have its roots in the Canaanite worship of El Elyon (Deut. 32:8), and was perhaps adopted in Jerusalem at the time of David (Pss. 72 [cf. vs. 19]; 89:17; etc.). But it can also be the justification of God by the admission of guilt (Num. 14:21; Josh. 7:19; I Sam. 6:5), and such occasions belong in part to the altar or shrine.

Since the idea of glory is closely connected with the cultus, it also belongs to the revelation of God in history and in nature (Ps. 148:13), which in turn is symbolized in various elements of the temple institutions (cf. Num. 14:22; I Chr. 16:24; Ps. 96:3). It is from the glory of the tabernacling PRESENCE that the various emphases of Isaiah, of the P document, and of Ezekiel are probably derived. How close is the connection glory-Presence-God is shown in the fact that "glory" and "God" occasionally become synonymous (cf. Exod. 33:22 ["my glory" = "I"]; Lev. 9:4, 6, 23; Ps. 113:4; Zech. 2:8; etc.).

c. Eschatological glory. The same features are repeated in the various descriptions of the eschatological glory. The glory that belongs to Lebanon shall become the possession of desert areas (Isa. 35:2), and of the temple to which the glory (i.e., wealth) of the nations shall come (Isa. 60:13; 66:12; cf. 60:11). The New Jerusalem will possess an abundant glory (66:11; Zech. 12:7), which will be seen and proclaimed among the peoples of the world (Isa. 66:18-19). This glory (40:5) will be universally feared (59:19) and known (Hab. 2:14), and will be manifested in Israel (Isa. 24:23), where it is, in fact, the self-disclosure of God himself (4:5; 43:7; 58:8; 60:1-2, 19; Zech. 2:5). Thus Israel will become Yahweh's glory (Isa. 4:2; 46:13). From these passages it will be seen that the glory is understood as national-cultic as relating to Jerusalem, and personal as relating to Israel and to God himself.

2. In the NT. a. In the Synoptic gospels. The first three gospels use δόξα in a variety of ways. The word means Solomon's glory (Matt. 6:29, etc.) and the glory of the world's kingdoms seen in the temptation story (4:8, etc.). It is a description of the divine presence as a luminous manifestation (Luke 2:9; cf. Matt. 16:27; Mark 8:38), and an ascription of praise (Matt. 5:16 [verb]; 6:13 RSV mg.; Luke 2:14; 19:38; etc.). The word is also applied to the specific quality of the appearance of Jesus in his transfiguration (Luke 9:31-32), and to his second coming (Matt. 25:31; Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27; 24:26). Noteworthy in Simeon's benediction is the identification of God's salvation, a "light of revelation to the Gentiles, and for glory to thy people Israel," with the infant Jesus (Luke 2:29-32).

b. In the Fourth Gospel. The glory of God's Word was uniquely manifested in Jesus (John 1:14), and it is a saving and ethical glory. It is demonstrated in his miracles (2:11; 11:4, 40); and so this glory, not sought by Jesus for himself (8:50, 54), as men seek glory for themselves (5:41, 44), is that glory which belonged to Jesus before the creation of the world (17:5), and to which he is to return (17:22, 24). This glory thus belongs to him because he seeks God's glory (5:41; 7:18). Indeed, God seeks his Son's glory (8:50), and glorifies him (8:54 [verb]). This glory is God's glory, once seen by Isaiah (John 12:41) and now manifested in Jesus (1:15). Of peculiar significance is John 13:31-38, where the theme of Jesus' glorification is prominent. His glorification is seen in his complete obedience, contrasted with the impending denial of Peter, which issues in his death and departure. The theme is further emphasized by the title "Son of man," which before the NT was a title of glory (e.g., Dan. 7:13; Enoch). His departure issues in the Resurrection, Ascension, and appearance at the end of the world (13:32). The "glory" terminology does not appear in the Johannine letters.

c. In Acts. Twice in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:2, 55) the expression "God of glory" is a pious formula possibly reminiscent of the Psalms (24:8 ff). In Acts 12:23 not to give God his glory is not to confess one's sins, a usage parallel to that mentioned above in the OT passages.

d. In the Pauline letters. The RSV still uses the word "glory" in certain passages where "boast" or the like would have better represented the sense of the Greek (e.g., Gal. 6:13-14; Phil. 1:26; 3:3; but cf. "glory" in 3:19). The cosmic sense of the word "glory" appears in such references as I Cor. 15:40-41, where the glory of the celestial is distinguished from the glory of the terrestrial, and where the glory of the sun is contrasted with the glory of the moon and that of the stars. Then again the word appears in the sense of a man's glory, his fame, honor, and reputation. Thus Paul claims he did not seek glory—i.e., the recognition of his position or rights—from the Thessalonians (I Thess. 2:6); rather, it is ever his aim to promote the glory of God (Rom. 15:6-7; I Cor. 10:31; II Cor. 4:15; 8:19). He uses the concept of glory to describe and define human relationships. He begins, as always, theocentrically, with the thought that a man is the image and glory of God, and then it follows that woman is the glory of man (I Cor. 11:7), and the word "for" in the next verse shows that Paul means that woman is to promote the glory of man, and that a man is to promote the glory of God. Hence certain directions about veiling. In the same way the Christians at Thessalonica are Paul's joy and glory (I Thess. 2:20), and the cause of his praise. The churches, too, are the glory of Christ, for they both reflect and promote the glory of their Lord (II Cor. 8:23). Paul's sufferings are an honor to the churches for whose sake he is suffering (Eph. 3:13).

It is therefore inevitable that "glory" should also appear in Paul many times as an ascription of praise (Rom. 4:20; II Cor. 1:20; Phil. 1:11; 2:11). Glory to God is, of course, particularly prominent in the doxologies (Rom. 11:36; 16:27; Gal. 1:5; Eph. 3:21; Phil. 4:20; I Tim. 1:17). Even as some of these passages either suggest or show, glory is for Paul something that properly belongs to God, even if the idea can be employed to illumine human relationships. God is the Source and Lord of glory, for glory belongs to him (Eph. 3:16) and is proper to him, as the doxologies show. He is the Father of glory (Eph. 1:17), and Jesus is the Lord of glory (I Cor. 2:8; cf. II Cor. 4:4). In II Cor. 4:4 the glory of God is given in the face of Jesus Christ, so that God's glory has become visible in a person and on that person's face (cf. Phil. 4:19). As God's glory used to be manifest in Israel in the tabernacling Presence (Rom. 4:9), so now it is manifest in Christ (II Cor. 4:6). In Eph. 1:12, 14, "praise of his glory" is a Christian circumlocution for "God," and elsewhere "glory" is a description for the manifest perfection of God in all his complete goodness and saving grace (Rom. 1:23; 3:7, 23; etc.) or power (Rom. 6:4; cf. John 11:40).

There is glory in God in Christ and in Christians, and the glory in Christians is Christ in them, and this in turn is the hope of glory (Col. 1:27). Christ's glory is given and will be fully given at the end of the world. Glory is thus in Paul an eschatological experience—i.e., it is a partly fulfilled reality, although it is also a future expectation, into which we enter by degrees (II Cor. 3:18; cf. Rom. 9:23; II Thess. 2:14). There are many passages which speak of the heavenly estate in terms of "glory" (Rom. 5:2; 8:18; II Cor. 4:17; Col. 3:4; I Thess. 2:12; II Thess. 1:9; cf. I Tim. 3:16; Tit. 2:13).

All these references show that for Paul "glory" is an attribute of nature, of men and women in their natural and Christian estate, of the churches, and especially of God and Christ in their activity in the world and in the church, and in the Second Advent and in heaven.

e. In Hebrews. The word appears in several meanings. It describes man's glory in a quotation from Ps. 8. Men, though lower than the divine nature, are crowned with glory and honor, where glory is the essential dignity and honor, the outward manifestation reflecting the old Hebrew phrase "for glory and for beauty" (e.g., Exod. 28:2). In the same way Jesus, who also for a time condescended to be lower than the angels, is now himself crowned with glory and honor (Heb. 2:9). He has thus become the object of praise (3:3; 13:21), for Christ reflects, or is the revelation or effulgence of, the divine glory (1:3). The theocentric aspect of the word is also seen in 9:5, where the cherubim of glory are not simply glorious cherubim, but as flanking the Presence are part of the media of the revealed glory. The eschatological reference is seen in 2:10.

f. In the Petrine letters. In a quotation from Isa. 40, I Pet. 1:24 speaks of the fading glory or beauty of mortal flesh, but otherwise the references are eschatological and theocentric. Present trials will receive the reward of glory (I Pet. 1:7), an "unfading crown of glory" (5:4). God is the source and giver of glory, for he is the "Majestic Glory" (II Pet. 1:17; cf. Jude 25), who gave glory to the transfigured Jesus (II Pet. 1:17) and to the resurrected Jesus (I Pet. 1:21; cf. vs. 11). God's eternal glory is in Christ (I Pet. 5:10). Likewise Christians will receive a revelation of the glory (I Pet. 4:13; 5:1), but this, indeed, already rests upon them (4:14). As in glory then and expecting glory, they are to ascribe glory to the God of glory (I Pet. 4:11; II Pet. 3:18; cf. Jude 25).

g. In Revelation. In 18:1 "splendor" translates the Greek "glory" of an angel illumining the earth. There are also some references to "giving glory to God" in the OT sense of justifying God and recognizing his right in the circumstances of the first woe (11:13; 14:7; cf. 16:9 [refusing to do so]). The remaining references are theocentric and relative to worship. Doxologies to Christ (1:6) or to the Lamb (5:12-13) are given, and there are ascriptions of glory to God. The four beasts around the throne lead the heavenly worship (4:9) and are followed by the twenty-four elders (4:11). The angels share in the ascription of glory (7:12), and so does the great company of heaven (19:1), in recognition of God's judgment, and then for the marriage of the Lamb (19:7). God is thus the glorious center of heaven and attracts glory from all classes of the assembled company. There is a unity of worship to match the central glory, which actually filled the heavenly temple with smoke (15:8), so that no one could enter. But the heavenly glory is also gracious, for it is the center not only of heaven but also of the New Jerusalem. In that holy city which descended from heaven, the glory of God is its sun, its light (21:23), for the distinction of that city is the tabernacling glory of God (21:11; cf. vs. 3). By the light of that city the nations shall walk, and through the ever open gates of that city the wealth and honor of the nations shall be brought (21:24, 26). In Revelation, as in the rest of the NT, the fact of the Incarnation has given an irrevocable stamp to the image of the glory of God.

Bibliography. A. von Gall, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes (1900). J. Morgenstern, "Biblical Theophanies," ZA, XXV (1911), 139-93; XXVIII (1914), 15-60. I. Abrahams, The Glory of God (1925). A. H. Forster, "The Meaning of δόξα in the Greek Bible," ATR, XII (1929/30), 311-16. G. Kittel, Die Religionsgeschichte und das Urchristentum (1931), pp. 82-85. J. Schneider, Doxa, eine bedeutungsgeschichtliche Studie (1932). H. Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes (1934). G. R. Berry, "The Glory of Jahweh and the Temple," JBL, LVI (1937), 115-17. H. G. May, "The Departure of the Glory of Yahweh," JBL, LVI (1937), 309-21. B. Stein, Der Begriff Kebod Yahweh und seine Bedeutung für die alttestamentliche Gotteserkenntnis (1939). L. H. Brockington, "The Presence of God, a Study of the Use of the Term 'Glory of Yahweh,'" ET, LVII (Oct., 1945), 21-25. A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ (1949). J. Duplacy, "L'espérance de la gloire de Dieu dans l'AT," Bible et Vie Chrétienne, VIII (1954). N. Hugedé, La métaphore du miroir dans les Épîtres de saint Paul aux Corinthiens (1957). E. Jacob, Theology of the OT (1958), pp. 79-82. A Richardson, An Introduction to the Theology of the NT (1958), pp. 64-67, 182-84. G. HENTON DAVIES

GLOSSOLALIA. See TONGUES, GIFT OF.

GLUTTONY. Though the word "gluttony" is not used in the RSV, "glutton" is the translation of the following: זולל, active participle of זלל, "to be light, worthless" (Deut. 21:20; Prov. 23:21; 28:7); φάγος (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34; cf. Tit. 1:12).

In NT usage the word is intended as a term of general opprobrium. A glutton may therefore be one who is voracious or one who proves to be a rascal or a scoundrel because of an inordinate fondness for some specified object or pursuit. The term was probably used in both senses in attempts to vilify Jesus (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34). The rich man, Dives, is portrayed in the Vulg. as a glutton (Luke 16:19-31; dives epulo, in the Vulg. heading). H. F. BECK

GNASHING. See TOOTH.

GNAT [כִּן, plural כנים, abstract plural כנם (KJV LICE; cf. Isa. 51:6 KJV); κώνωψ]. It is uncertain whether the gnat, the mosquito, or yet another insect is meant. Perhaps it is: (a) the Harvester Gnat, the Barghaš of the Arabs, a small midge (Chironomidae) which enters eyes, ears, and nose of fieldworkers during harvest (see FLY [ערוב]); (b) the Anopheles Mosquito, the transmitter of malaria; (c) the sand fly (Psychodidae), carrier of dengue fever and intruder into sleeping rooms of Egypt. Any of these three would satisfy the conditions of the third of the PLAGUES OF EGYPT (Exod. 8; Ps. 105).

כֵּן (Isa. 51:6), elsewhere "thus," might here be the singular of כנים, "gnats," since כמו alone means "in like manner."

"Strain at" (Matt. 23:24 KJV) is a typographical error for "strain out." Straining out a gnat, the smallest unclean animal, is compared to the meticulous observance of self-imposed ceremonial trifles. Neglecting one's chief duties is compared to swallowing a CAMEL.

See also FAUNA § F7*b*.

See bibliography under FLY. W. W. FRERICHS

*GNOSTICISM nŏs'tə sĭz əm. A modern term used to indicate a constellation of religious phenomena found during the second century and later. These phenomena include beliefs in the innate immortality of a divine spark, differentiated from both body and soul; the necessity for the escape of this element to its source, an unknown god; the control of the visible universe by evil spirits; and the bringing of knowledge (gnosis) about the unknown god and the divine element by a redeemer who descends to earth and returns above, having effected redemption by providing this knowledge to those who "by origin" are related to him. Some Gnostics also had rites which prepared the living or the dying for their ascent to the realms above.

The earliest testimonies we possess for the existence of Gnosticism as thus defined come from the second century, and from heretical groups rather loosely related to the Christian church. These groups made use of the Pauline letters and of the Gospel of John, and for this reason it is difficult (if not impossible) to determine whether Gnostic terminology is used by Paul and John. Many scholars, especially in Germany, have claimed that Gnostic ideas are to be found in both, in Paul's case especially in Colossians and Ephesians, the authenticity of which they often doubt. On the other hand, British and American scholars have usually claimed that Gnosticism is a second-century phenomenon, strongly influenced both by heterodox Judaism and by Christianity. The discovery of a kind of proto-Gnostic dualism in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, as in APOCALYPTICISM generally, shows that there was an environment out of which certain Pauline and Johannine doctrines could have arisen apart from Gnosticism. And recent finds of Gnostic documents at Nag-Hammadi in Egypt reveal the presence of a kind of Jewish speculation within Gnostic thought itself.

1. Approach and method
2. Gnostic systems
   a. Syrian Gnosis
   b. Marcion
   c. Valentinus
   d. Basilides
   e. Later systems
3. Future study
Bibliography

1. Approach and method. The problem of the approach to Gnosticism has aroused considerable discussion. Some scholars have argued that the starting point should be sought by taking late systems in which various elements are combined, working out the interrelations of various themes, and then showing that aspects of these themes are to be found earlier. This method disregards chronology, but it has the advantage of presenting what early Gnostics may well have thought. At the opposite extreme stand those scholars who insist upon a fairly rigid chronological analysis and refuse to admit that later developments can explain what earlier writers had in mind. They argue that there was a development within Gnostic thought comparable to that within Christian theology, and that just as one cannot use Origen to explain the apostolic fathers, so one cannot use seventh-century Mandaeism (the religion of a baptist sect in Persia) to illustrate the thought of Gnostics five centuries earlier. It seems likely that both methods will continue to be employed.

Other controversies have concerned the sources of Gnostic thought, which have been found in Iranian and Egyptian religion, in Judaism, in Christianity, and in Hellenistic philosophy and astrology. In view of the extremely synthetic nature of Gnosticism, it is likely that all these elements contributed to it, although some of them (especially Judaism and Christianity) were more important than others.

A further question arises in relation to the role of mythology in Gnosticism. Did their myths arise before philosophical interpretations were given them? Or were the myths simply poetic ways of expressing philosophical or theological doctrines? This question is hard to answer on the basis of available materials, but it seems probable that different systems arose in different ways. Most Gnostics thought of themselves, not as Gnostics, but as Simonians, Valentinians, Sethians, Ophites, etc.

In dealing with Gnosticism it is therefore necessary to examine the various systems which flourished in the second century, a time when a real threat was presented to the Christian church and when many theologians, beginning with Justin and Irenaeus and later including Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius, wrote refutations of Gnostic doctrines. The earliest detailed discussion of these systems is provided by Irenaeus, who wrote Against Heresies ca. 180, relying in part on a lost work of Justin (ca. 150) and in part on oral and written testimony from the Gnostics themselves, including a work called the Apocryphon of John, known from several Coptic versions of the fourth and fifth centuries.

2. Gnostic systems. a. Syrian Gnosis. The first system Irenaeus describes is that ascribed to SIMON MAGUS. We need not discuss this system in any detail, except to suggest that at least in the form in which Irenaeus knew it, it was clearly related to Christian doctrine. Simon is said to have regarded himself as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; and his followers were saved by his grace, not by works of law (presumably an allusion to Eph. 2:8-9). Simon's descent from above through several heavens is related (as source, offshoot, or parallel) to what many second-century Christians believed about Jesus. A disciple of Simon, Menander, soon produced his own doctrine, believing that he himself was the Savior who had been sent from above and adding a magical(?) baptism which would provide perpetual youth (Irenaeus may have misunderstood this point). The passage of time proved that Menander was wrong. He may well have been providing an alternative to Christian doctrine known to him at Antioch, where Ignatius was bishop at this time.

Another Antiochene system is quite different. This is the doctrine of Saturninus, who held like Menander that the supreme deity was completely unknown, but who spoke of Christ rather than himself as the Savior. The supreme power made spiritual beings, who made the world. They saw a "luminous image" which came from above, and they tried to copy it (an explanation of Gen. 1:26). Their attempt was only partly successful until a "spark of life" came down to animate their product. This spark, present in good men, is the element which is saved. Christ came to destroy all the spiritual beings, and men, hostile to the supreme being. Since ordinary human life, including marriage, procreation, and eating meat, is evil, he merely seemed to be a man (he may have been the luminous image which had appeared before). As in the Simonian system, the law was given by the inferior spiritual beings; Saturninus added that the prophets also were inspired by them, and included among these beings both Satan and the God of the Jews.

In the systems of Simon and Menander there is a female principle, the Thought of God, perhaps derived from the Wisdom of such books as Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus. The ethical ideas of these systems are antinomian and libertarian. On the other hand, for Saturninus there is no female principle, and he advocates extreme asceticism. He doubtless agreed with the apocryphal Gospel of the Egyptians that the Savior "came to destroy the works of the female."

In these two classes of Syrian Gnosis we find foreshadowed most of the later Gnostic developments. There is a supreme and unknown god revealed either by himself (Simonianism) or by a redeemer who has come to liberate men from the bondage of a wicked world. Redemption is produced by knowledge of this liberation rather than by ordinary moral behavior; the followers of Simon live in freedom in the world, while those of Saturninus live in freedom from the world. Both kinds of systems hold that the world and worldly morality are the products of hostile powers and that victory is to come by means of escape.

b. Marcion. The notion that the supreme god was completely unknown apart from his revelation in Jesus, and that the prophets were inspired by an inferior being, was taken over and developed by the famous heretic Marcion (see MARCION, GOSPEL OF), who was a member of the Roman church between 137 and 144. In his view there were two gods, one the good Father of Jesus, the other the Creator known through the OT. The gospel of Jesus and Paul was corrupted by those apostles who could recognize only the Creator. It looks as if Marcion was attempting to free Roman Christianity of its Jewish heritage (see HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF) at a time just after the disastrous Jewish revolt of 132-35. He himself was expelled by the Roman church.

c. Valentinus. Ca. the same time another Gnostic teacher, Valentinus, came to Rome and set forth a doctrine revealed to us in 1956 with the publication of his Gospel of Truth, discovered at Nag-Hammadi. This book is so much simpler, poetic, Jewish, and Christian than what Irenaeus tells us of his doctrine that scholars have argued that it represents an earlier stage of his teaching. There is little emphasis on the heavenly "aeons," and the supreme God is not separated from the Creator. But it can also be argued that this gospel represents Valentinus' teaching in a form intended to appeal to Jewish Christian readers. It could be either early or late. In Irenaeus we find a complicated mythological picture of the emanation of the "aeons" from the supreme being. The twelfth and lowest of these "aeons" was the female Sophia. Her instability led her to fall into the outer darkness, where she conceived spontaneously and brought forth a premature infant who was the creator of the universe we know. He used materials which were the solidification of her emotions; thus her grief resulted in tears, hence water. This creator, called Ialdabaoth (a parody of Yahweh Elohe Sabaoth?) in similar systems, regarded himself as the only god there was; he constantly struggled with his mother, Sophia, for control over mankind, since she had inserted a divine spark or spirit into men. In order to redeem both her and mankind, Jesus was sent down to collect the scattered spiritual seeds and to restore them to the "pleroma" (cf. Col. 1:19, etc.; see PLEROMA) of spiritual being, the "aeons" above. For Valentinians, human marriage was a symbolic imitation of the unions in the spiritual world, and we are not surprised to learn that for some of them a sacred marriage formed part of their ritual.

The Valentinian system is dualistic, but it is less dualistic than that of Saturninus or the Apocryphon of John, with which it has points of contact. In the Apocryphon there is a fuller description of the struggle between Ialdabaoth and Christ. Ialdabaoth made paradise and gave man a wife in order to chain him to the material world; Christ, however, persuaded man to eat from the tree of knowledge (gnosis). In the course of this struggle Christ came again and gave his true teaching (the content of the myth) to his disciple John—hence the title, the "secret doctrine" of John. The emphasis on John in this document and on the Gospel of John among the Valentinians is significant. It suggests that Gnostics recognized proto-Gnostic ideas in the traditional portrait of John's thought and developed these to suit themselves.

In the Valentinian group there was considerable variety. Ptolemaeus was their greatest systematizer, and we also know his Letter to Flora, perhaps addressed to the Roman church, in which he presented his doctrine in a manner intended to win the confidence of unsuspecting but orthodox Christians. The letter explains that there are different levels of law in the OT and, in a veiled way, relates these levels to the three classes of men which the Valentinians recognized (material or fleshly—pagans; animate or psychic—Christians; spiritual—themselves).

In order to deal with the spiritual nature of revelation the Valentinians had to provide allegorical exegesis, not only of the parables of Jesus (where three different items could often be found), but also of events in his life. Ptolemeus wrote an allegorical explanation of the opening verses of John, claiming that the "aeons" were symbolized there. Another Valentinian, Heracleon, prepared exegetical notes on at least the first eight chapters of John; these were later used by Origen in his Commentary.

d. Basilides. Quite a different type of Gnostic thought is represented by an older contemporary of Valentinus, Basilides. He taught that originally there was absolutely nothing. A nonexistent god then produced a nonexistent seed out of nothing, and from this seed there proceeded various kinds of existent things, including a "threefold Sonship" whose goal was to return to the nonexistent god. This return is also the goal of history. When the spiritual elements have all gone back above, oblivion will come over the earth, and there will be no further salvation. Perhaps because of his nihilistic emphasis, Basilides did not attract so many followers as Valentinus did; indeed, the church fathers tell us of only one, his son Isidore, who wrote treatises on ethics and on the allegorical interpretation of Greek and oriental literature.

e. Later systems. Later Gnostic systems essentially represent permutations and combinations of the elements found earlier. In the third and fourth centuries Gnostics made efforts to find their systems prefigured in Greek and oriental religious history, philosophy, and mythology, but much early Gnosticism was supplanted by the rise of the more radically dualistic MANICHEISM, which spread from Persia to the Roman Empire, in spite of official condemnation and Christian opposition. The church father Augustine was at one time a Manichee.

Christians felt threatened by both Gnosticism and Manicheism partly because both were mythological. These opponents knew an elaborate mythological cosmology toward which Christianity was either agnostic or openly hostile. Again, the Gnostic, like the Manichee, knew that he was essentially a part of God, a divine spark, and that nothing he did in the evil world made much difference. Moreover, Gnostic use of the allegorical method meant that Gnostics could claim to have the true explanations of difficult passages in the Christians' Bible. Only when Christian theology had developed to the point where it was able to beat the Gnostics on their own speculative ground did the threat come to an end. Suppression of Gnosticism by the state was a very effective factor.

3. Future study. What has been said above about Gnosticism is subject to some revision as the rest of the forty-four Gnostic works found in the large jar at Nag-Hammadi are published, but what has already appeared does not greatly alter the picture already available from the writings of the church fathers. It encourages a fairly conservative attitude toward their truthfulness. Proto-Gnostic influence on NT writings remains fairly probable, but it has never been shown that before the second century there was a figure of a Gnostic redeemer. The closest one might come would be by working backward from Simonianism, with what seems to be a revised version of Jesus, to the apocalyptic personages of late Judaism. It is likely, however, that the crystallization of Gnostic doctrine is due to the influence of Christian interpretations of Jesus, in cosmic terms different from those employed by Christians.

Finally, it is fairly clear that much of the debate over the question whether Gnosticism is to be found in the NT is a matter of definition. In itself, the term gnosis (found, e.g., in I Cor. 8:1, 7) means nothing more than "knowledge." While Paul prefers to speak of being known by God rather than knowing him (Gal. 4:9), the Fourth Evangelist is willing to say that "this is eternal life, that they know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent" (John 17:3). Is such an expression Gnostic, proto-Gnostic, or neither? While on the one hand the Dead Sea Scrolls have suggested that there was a form of sectarian Judaism out of which such a doctrinal framework as that of John could arise, on the other hand the discovery of the Gospel of Truth makes equally clear the development of Valentinian Gnosticism out of heterodox Judaism. The Gospel of John is close to both.

It seems likely that the study of Gnosticism will be concerned with the ways in which it developed out of the wreckage of apocalyptic Judaism (in which Iranian elements were already present) and will trace the manner in which the failure of the apocalyptic hope, already faced to some extent in such writings as II Esdras and II Baruch, may have led to a transfer of the hope from this world to a realm of pure spirit. Gnosticism seems to have arisen in an environment where men had abandoned an expectation of God's immediate action on their behalf. The Gnostics almost universally rejected the OT as an authentic interpretation of human existence; instead, they held that it contained a secret revelation of a god who had not created the world. And it is significant that we seem to encounter two waves of Gnostic teaching, the first after the fall of Jerusalem in the year 70, the second after the bloody defeat of the Jews in 135. Gnosticism may be a reaction from apocalyptic Judaism, which led its proponents toward their almost universal hostility toward the God of the Jews. In this sense some Christian writers could be described as at least proto-Gnostic, even though they would certainly have rejected the full implications of the Gnostic world view.

Bibliography. W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis (1907); H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis (1924); F. C. Burkitt, Church and Gnosis (1932); W. Till, Die gnostischen Schriften des koptischen Papyrus Berolinensis 8502 (1955); M. Malinine, H. C. Puech, and G. Quispel, Evangelium Veritatis (1956); H. Jonas, Gnosis und spätantiker Geist (1934-54; English ed., 1958); R. M. Grant, Reader in Gnosticism (1961). On Manicheism, see H. C. Puech, Le manichéisme (1949). R. M. GRANT

GOAD [מלמד, from למד, to learn; דרבנה (Eccl. 12:11); κέντρον (Acts 26:14; KJV PRICKS)]. A pointed stick used for driving or guiding cattle, especially oxen when plowing. Sometimes it was tipped with iron (I Sam. 13:21). It was used incidentally to clean mud and clay from the plowshare. Shamgar slew six hundred Philistines with the oxgoad (Judg. 3:31). Yet the Philistines held the monopoly on iron until the time of David.

"Goad" is also used metaphorically: The words of the wise are as goads urging men on to better works (Eccl. 12:11). Paul finds it useless to kick against the goads, the urging which God gives to his recalcitrant creatures (Acts 26:14).

Fig. MET 44, no. 21. C. U. WOLF

GOAH gō'ə [געה]; KJV GOATH gō'ăth. A quarter, or suburb, of Jerusalem, mentioned after the hill of GAREB, presumably to the E or SE of it, in the prophecy of Jer. 31:39 on the restoration of the city.

GOAL. See GAMES, NT.

GOAT [עז, female goat, cf. Akkad. enzu, she-goat, Arab. 'anz, she-goat, and 'anaza, to turn aside; עתוד, male goat, cf. Akkad. atûdu, he-goat; צפיר, male goat, from Aram. צפיר (Ezra 6:17), cf. Syr. ṣiphrayâ, kid; שעיר, male goat, hairy one; שעירה; תיש, male goat, cf. Arab. tais, he-goat, Akkad. daššu, buck of gazelle; ἔριφος, kid; ἐρίφιον, diminutive of ἔριφος; τράγος, male goat, probably chewer]. A hollow-horned ruminant mammal allied to the sheep but of lighter build. Long before Israel's story began, possibly as early as the Neolithic Age, the goat, like the sheep, had been tamed; this was one of man's earliest successes in the domestication of animals. The goat of biblical Palestine was probably the Syrian or Mamber variety (Capra hircus mambrica), commonly black in color. See FAUNA § B1*c*.

1. Secular use. Goats were the principal source of the milk used in Israel (Deut. 32:14; Prov. 27:27); their flesh served as meat (Lev. 7:23; Deut. 14:4), their hair as raw material for a fabric used for tents and various domestic purposes (Exod. 25:4; 26:7; 36:14; I Sam. 19:13, 16), their tanned skins as leather (the word translated "goatskin" in Num. 4:6, etc., is uncertain; cf. Heb. 11:37), and their whole hides as skin bottles (cf. Gen. 21:14; Josh. 9:4; I Sam. 1:24; Matt. 9:17; etc.). Goats were a recognized form of wealth, and the size of the flocks, which consisted of sheep and goats, indicated the owner's status in the community (cf. Gen. 30:32, 43; I Sam. 25:2). Like the other domestic animals, goats were subject to the law of firstlings (Num. 18:15-17). For the he-goat as leader of the flock, see Jer. 50:8; for his stately gait, see Prov. 30:31. A gift of 7,700 he-goats to Jehoshaphat is recorded in II Chr. 17:11. According to Ezek. 27:21, much of Tyre's trade with Arabia was in sheep and goats.

2. As a sacrificial animal. A goat had to be at least eight days old before it could be offered to Yahweh (Lev. 22:27). A year-old male is specified for the Passover in Exod. 12:5, and a three-year-old female in God's covenant with Abram in Gen. 15:9. The use of goats as sacrifices (without further qualification) is referred to in Pss. 50:9, 13; 66:15; Isa. 1:11.

Most allusions to goats as offerings relate to specific kinds of sacrifice or to particular occasions, and in the majority of cases a male goat is required: as a burnt offering (Lev. 1:10; 22:19); as a peace offering (Lev. 3:6, 12; 17:3; Num. 7:17; etc.); as a guilt offering (Lev. 5:18); as a sin offering (Lev. 4:23; Num. 7:16; II Chr. 29:21; Ezek. 43:22, 25; 45:23), though in Lev. 4:28; 5:6 a she-goat is prescribed. The most striking use of goats in the Jerusalem cultus was on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16; see AZAZEL). An early Christian view of these sin-offering procedures is expressed in Heb. 9:12-13, 19; 10:4.

3. In figurative and symbolic usage. A flock of goats serves as a simile for a woman's hair in Song of S. 4:1; 6:5, and for the relatively small size of Israel's army in I Kings 20:27. The he-goat typifies various human leaders in Isa. 14:9; Ezek. 34:17; Zech. 10:3, and the king of Greece (Alexander the Great) in Dan. 8:5-8. In Matt. 25:31-46, sheep and "kids" represent the righteous and the wicked (vss. 32-33; cf. Ezek. 34:17-22). W. S. McCULLOUGH

GOATH. KJV form of GOAH.

GOATSKIN [תחש (KJV BADGERS' SKIN[S]), see below; αἴγειον δέρμα (Heb. 11:37), from αἴγειος, of a goat, from αἴξ, goat, plus δέρμα, skin, from δέρω, to skin]. Alternately: LEATHER (Ezek. 16:10). The skin of a goat, presumably tanned.

1. In the OT. In Ezek. 16:10 תחש is a leather from which a woman's shoes are made. Elsewhere (except Num. 4:25) it is preceded by עור or עורות, "skin" ("skins"); and the phrase "skin(s) of תחש" appears to mean a kind of leather, used as a covering for the tabernacle (Exod. 26:14; 36:19; 39:34) and for the ark and various other sacred objects (Num. 4:6-14). We may therefore infer that תחש is an animal.

There is no satisfactory etymology for תחש. Whatever meaning the word may once have had, it was unknown to the LXX (e.g., "hyacinth-colored skins" in Exod. 25:5), to Josephus (Antiq. III.vi.1), and to the Talmudic tradition. Arabic tuḥas (or duḥs), "dolphin," has often been cited as a possible cognate. This Arabic term may conceivably refer also to the dugong, found in the Red Sea. It seems unlikely, however, that either a dolphin or a dugong would be considered "clean" for the sacred purposes described in Exodus and Numbers, or that their leather would be readily available in a small inland community, as Exod. 25:5; 26:14; 35:7, 23, seem to presuppose. To take תחש as "badger" (KJV) appears to be insupportable: there is no philological justification for it; the "rock badger" (שפן; Lev. 11:5) is an unclean animal; it is doubtful if badger skin was ever as plentiful in Israel as the biblical references to תחש demand.

2. In the NT. As part of the destitution which the saintly men and women of the past endured, the author of Hebrews cites (11:37) their wearing of sheep and goat skins. W. S. McCULLOUGH

GOB gŏb [גוב; cf. גב, Aram. גובא, pit, cistern] (II Sam. 21:18-19). A place of unknown location at which two battles were fought with the Philistines by David (presumably) and his men. In the parallel story (I Chr. 20:4), Gezer, rather than Gob, is given as the locale of the battle. The text of II Samuel may be corrupt at this point. V. R. GOLD GOBLETS [כלים, vessels] (Esth. 1:7); KJV VESSELS. At the banquet of Ahasuerus drinks were served in golden goblets (vessels) of different kinds.

GOD, CHILDREN OF. See CHILDREN OF GOD.

GOD, NAMES OF. The name (שם; ὄνομα) of God is the key to understanding the biblical doctrine of God. In biblical terms the religious question is not: Does God exist? but: Who is our God? Just as an introduction to a person involves a disclosure of his personal name, so God's self-revelation in history is accompanied by the giving of his personal name, by which his people may worship and address him as "Thou." Thus God's name signifies the personal relation between God and people, which is the supreme characteristic of biblical faith (see GOD, OT VIEW OF). For Israel, God's personal name is Yahweh (see JEHOVAH). Other divine appellations that now appear in the OT, many of them borrowed from ancient religious usage, have been redefined in the light of Yahweh's historical revelation.

A. The relation of the name to the person
B. The covenant name, Yahweh
1. Pentateuchal traditions
2. The origin of the name
3. Definition
a. The present meaning
b. The causative meaning
C. Appellations appropriated by Israel
1. El
2. Combinations of El
a. El Shaddai
b. El Elyon
c. El Olam
d. El Bethel
e. El Roi
f. El Berith
g. El Elohe-Israel
3. Elohim
4. Eloah
5. Baal
6. Adon
D. Other appellations
1. Rock (Zur)
2. Father, Brother, Kinsman
3. King, Judge, Shepherd
4. Descriptive expressions
a. The Living God
b. The First and the Last
c. The Ancient of Days
Bibliography

A. THE RELATION OF THE NAME TO THE PERSON. In the episode of the "burning bush" (Exod. 3) Moses hesitated to accept the commission from the "God of the fathers," for back in Egypt his countrymen would ask: "What is his name?" and he would have to identify the God who had spoken to him. This story presupposes a popular background of polytheism. In the ancient world, where man's life was surrounded by many divine powers, it was important to know what kind of god men were dealing with. For unless the god's name were known, it was impossible to enter into relationship with him and invoke him in worship. As late as the prophetic period it was believed that each people walks and acts in the name of its god, just as Israel walks in the name of its God (Mic. 4:5).

But more is involved here than polytheism. To understand Moses' question, we must consider the psychological significance of a personal name in antiquity (see NAME, PROPER). In modern usage, names are convenient labels by which we differentiate one thing from another, one person from another. But in the ancient world Shakespeare's question: "What's in a name?" would have been taken very seriously. For a person's self was expressed and contained in his name. Of Nabal (lit., "fool") it was said sarcastically: "As his name is, so is he" (I Sam. 25:25), but it could also be said soberly of anyone that his name is his very self. Thus when a radical change in a person's character took place so that he became a new man, he was given a new name. Abram's name was changed to Abraham when the blessing was given to him (Gen. 17), and Jacob's name was changed to Israel after his struggle with the divine being at the Jabbok (Gen. 32).

Analogously, God's self, his real person, is concentrated in his name. When the promise was given that a guardian angel would lead Israel in its journey, this was given special force by Yahweh's assurance that "my name is in him" (Exod. 23:20-21)—i.e., Yahweh himself would go with them (see GOD, OT VIEW OF, § C2*b*). The statement that Yahweh's name is Jealous (Exod. 34:14) indicates that Israel's God is jealous by nature (see GOD, OT VIEW OF, § D2). Moses' request for a theophany was granted when Yahweh appeared to him and "proclaimed the name of Yahweh" (Exod. 34:5; cf. 33:19)—i.e., the personal character of God was revealed (cf. vss. 6-7).

Because the divine name discloses God's nature, it is laden with the authority, power, and holiness of God himself. This accounts for the great reverence for the name which is one of the distinctive features of Israel's faith. According to the Decalogue, Yahweh's name must not be taken in vain (Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11). Prophets are inspired with divine authority when they speak in his name (Deut. 18:19; Jer. 26:20; 44:16), blessings and curses given in his name are potent (Num. 23–24), oaths taken in his name are binding (Deut. 6:13), and battles in his name are victorious (Pss. 20:7—H 20:8; 44:5—H 44:6). In the cultus men "call on the name of Yahweh" (Gen. 12:8; I Kings 18:24; etc.), confident that his name is the basis of the most personal access to God (Ps. 27:4) and his nearness and saving power (Ps. 54:1—H 54:3). The priest, in giving the Aaronic benediction (Num. 6:24-26), is to "put [Yahweh's] name upon the people of Israel" (vs. 27). The people are warned against defiling or blaspheming the name (Lev. 18:21; 24:11; etc.) and are exhorted to praise and sanctify the holy name of God (cf. the Lord's Prayer).

God's name, being filled with his very self, is active and powerful, for it is the sign of his real presence in the midst of his people (see GOD, OT VIEW OF, § C2*e*). Other peoples, it is said, will fear Israel, not because it is a powerful nation, but because it is called by Yahweh's name (Deut. 28:10). He delivers "for his name's sake" (Pss. 23:3; 25:11; 143:11; etc.), and his name is mighty among the nations (Jer. 10:6-7). Indeed, Yahweh's name is glorious in all the earth (Pss. 8:1—H 8:2; 48:10—H 48:11), not just in the sense of his world-renown, but in the deeper sense that he is sovereign.

The disclosure of God's name, then, is the index to understanding biblical faith. Israel's view of God does not find expression in a vague God-consciousness or in metaphysical abstraction, but in God's revelation in person. Those who "know the name of God" (Pss. 9:10—H 9:11; 91:14) know his identity and personal character and therefore, in contrast to the heathen (Ps. 79:6; Jer. 10:25), trust and hope in him. The Christian faith stands in line with this historical revelation, for it affirms that God's name—his real person—was manifested pre-eminently in Jesus Christ (see INCARNATION). Thus when Jesus is represented as saying: "I have manifested thy name" (John 17:6, 26), the meaning is that his mission was to reveal the very character and purpose of God.

B. THE COVENANT NAME, YAHWEH. The disclosure of God's name is inseparable from the historical experiences in which the divine presence and purpose were revealed to Israel. According to the tradition, the personal name, Yahweh, was introduced by Moses at the time of the Exodus. Through this decisive event Israel knows who God is: he is the One who rescued his people from Egyptian bondage (Exod. 20:2; Hos. 11:1; 12:9—H 12:10; 13:4; cf. Ezek. 20:5; Amos 2:10; 3:1-2). The new religious perspective which was mediated by Moses to his people cannot be adequately explained on the basis of a genetic development out of previously held religious views. Israel's faith represented a radically new kind of response to divine reality, a response which found expression in a unique covenant community with its distinctive worship, historical understanding, and sense of ethical responsibility. It is therefore highly significant that God's new revelation was tied closely to the disclosure of a new name, Yahweh, the full form of which came to be Yahweh, God of Hosts. See LORD OF HOSTS.

1. Pentateuchal traditions. The decisive new beginning in the Mosaic period is obscured by the present Pentateuchal narratives, which have been revised in the light of the exodus faith. The Yahwist narrative (see PENTATEUCH) traces the worship of Yahweh far back beyond the period of Moses and affirms that in the time of Enosh, the grandson of Adam, men first began to invoke the name of Yahweh (Gen. 4:26). This narrator's consistent use of the name from the story of Creation onward represents a theological attempt to view the whole of human history in the light of the covenant faith and to demonstrate that Yahweh is not just the God of Israel but of all mankind (Enosh means "man"). However, the latest Pentateuchal tradition, the priestly writing (P), gives a completely different view in Exod. 6:2-3: "And God said to Moses, 'I am Yahweh. I appeared to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, as God Almighty [El Shaddāy], but by my name Yahweh I did not make myself known to them' " (cf. Gen. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; 49:25). Since it would have accorded with P's schematic plan to use the cultic name from the very first, it seems that in this instance P is bound by an old and reliable tradition. This conjecture is confirmed by a third Pentateuchal tradition, E, which avoids using Yahweh in the book of Genesis and affirms that the sacred name was first disclosed in the time of Moses (Exod. 3:1, 4*b*, 6, 9-14). All these traditions agree that Moses was not introduced to a new god. Yahweh was not born in the Mosaic period. The God who spoke to Moses was none other than the God who had led the patriarchs in their wanderings (the "God of the fathers"), the God who had been known previously as El Shaddāy or by some other name (see § C2 below). But the E and P traditions are undoubtedly correct in stressing the break between the patriarchal and Mosaic periods—a break signified by the disclosure of the name by which Israel was to worship God thenceforth. As indicated above, the knowledge of God, signified by this name, was based on Moses' prophetic interpretation of the meaning of the Exodus.

2. The origin of the name. Although the name was given new currency in Mosaic circles, the J account (Gen. 4:26) may preserve a dim recollection that it was known in the pre-Mosaic period. Thus the question of its original meaning is of some historical interest, although this type of investigation throws little light on OT theology.

In the earliest Hebrew the sacred name appeared as a four-letter word or tetragrammaton: YHWH (יהוה), without any vowel signs. Since the vowels were added very late, at the time of the fixing of the MT (see JEHOVAH), the OT itself gives no clue to its original pronunciation. Some help, however, is given by the early church fathers. Theodoret of Cyrus (fourth century A.D.) testifies that the Samaritans, who shared the Pentateuchal scripture with the Jews, pronounced the name 'Ιαβέ, and Clement of Alexandria (early third century A.D.) transliterated the "name of four letters" as 'Ιαουέ. Moreover, Egyptian Magic Papyri from the end of the third century A.D. attest to the patristic spelling, especially that of Theodoret. Following these hints, modern scholars believe the approximate pronunciation was "Yahweh."

It is not certain, however, that "Yahweh" was the oldest form of the name. A short form, "Yah" (יה), appears 25 times in the OT (e.g., Exod. 15:2; and the cultic cry "hallelu-yah"="praise Yah"). Sometimes the short form appears as "Yahu" (יהו) or "Yo" (יו), as in proper names like Joel ("Yo is God") or Isaiah ("Yah [or Yahu] is salvation"). The short form is found on jar-handle inscriptions of the post-exilic period and in the Elephantine Papyri of the fifth century B.C. Some scholars believe that "Yahu" is the more original form. But since the four-letter word is found in some of the oldest OT texts (e.g., the Song of Deborah [Judg. 5]), as well as extra-biblical documents like the Moabite Stone (ninth century) or the Lachish Letters (ca. 589 B.C.), it is probable that the original cultic form of the name was "Yahweh" (occurs ca. 6,800 times in the OT) and that the other forms are abbreviations.

It is not impossible that the sacred name was known before the time of Moses, but so far attempts to demonstrate this (e.g., on the basis of Akkadian personal names like Ya'um-ilu or the alleged occurrence of "Yo" [yw] in the Ras Shamra Texts of the fourteenth century B.C.) have not yielded conclusive results. More persuasive is the Kenite hypothesis, according to which Moses became acquainted with the name through his association with the family of Jethro (also called Hobab), the priest of Midian. Fleeing from Egypt, Moses married Jethro's daughter (Exod. 2:15-22) and allegedly was initiated into the Midianite cult of the god Yahweh. Sinai (or Horeb) was a sacred spot in Midianite territory, and it was while Moses was tending Jethro's flocks in the vicinity of this mountain that Yahweh was revealed to him (Exod. 3). To this "holy ground" Moses led the Hebrews after the Exodus, and Yahweh's theophany was thenceforth connected in a special way with Sinai, as in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:4) or the Elijah narrative (I Kings 19:8-18). Advocates of this hypothesis draw attention to the fact that Jethro, rather than Moses, officiated at a sacrifice to Yahweh (Exod. 18:10-12) and suggested to Moses how he could facilitate the burden of his religious office (vss. 13-26). The supposition that the Kenites (a Midianite clan) and the Mosaic Hebrews (later known as Israelites) were bound by common devotion to Yahweh helps to explain why the former were allies of Israel during the invasion of Canaan (Judg. 1:16; cf. 4:11; 5:24). Although this hypothesis has much in its favor, it is based on a series of inferences from the biblical text and at best gives only a possible explanation of the source from which Moses drew the sacred name.

In any case, whether the name is traced to Midianites or to the region of Syria or Mesopotamia, the important question is the new content which the name acquired through Moses' interpretation.

3. Definition. Since, with the exception of Exod. 3:14, the OT itself makes no attempt to explain the meaning of the Tetragrammaton, it is not surprising that scholars have been unable to reach agreement on its linguistic meaning (see bibliography). Of the various hypotheses, the following may be mentioned.

According to one view, the effort to ascertain the basic meaning of the word is fruitless, because originally the name, perhaps in the short form "Yah" or "Yahu," was only an emotional ejaculation or solemn cultic cry. One scholar proposes, e.g., that the original form of the interjection was yâ hûwâ, meaning "O He, O That One." The majority view, however, is that we are dealing with a word, patterned according to the imperfect of a finite verb, which once described the God of Israel. Differences arise over two major questions: Is the stem of the verb simple (Qal) or causative (Hiph'il)? And what is the basic meaning of the root הוה (or היה)?

Some commentators who advocate the imperfect of the simple stem find in this usage of the verb "to be" the conception of Israel's God as "the One who is" —namely, the absolute and unchangeable God. Recent interpreters, however, have sought to do greater justice to the dynamic, activistic character of Israel's historical faith. It has been proposed, e.g., that the Tetragrammaton is derived from Arabic HWY in its allegedly basic meaning of showing passionate love (hawā, "passion") and therefore that it means "he who acts passionately, the Passionate." According to another view, the name comes from a verb "to speak" (Ugaritic HWT, from HWY, "word"), thus meaning "he who speaks," a view which has the merit of stressing the revelatory function of Israel's God.

Many scholars, however, defend the causative interpretation, though disagreeing on the basic meaning of the verb. One theory is that the verb means "cause to fall, fell," referring either to rain or lightning or to the destruction of foes. More persuasively, it is argued that the derivation is from Arabic HWY, "to blow," thus indicating that Yahweh was originally a storm-god. The Arabic origin of "Yahweh," it is held, accords with OT traditions which link him with the Negeb and with S sanctuaries like Sinai-Horeb and Kadesh. An unusual variation of the causative interpretation appears in the hypothesis that YHWH is a causative participle, after the analogy of a form appearing in the recently discovered Phoenician inscription from Karapte in S Anatolia. As an epithet for the God of Israel, it is alleged to mean "Sustainer, Maintainer, Establisher."

The theory which perhaps has aroused the greatest interest is one which derives the Tetragrammaton from הוה (later form היה) in the sense of "come to pass, come into being, be" (see below). Yahweh is the one who causes to be what comes to pass. It is held that the name echoes old liturgical formulas, found especially in Egypt, in which the deity was recognized as the one who continually brings about all that is—namely, the Creator and Sustainer of all. Having become acquainted with this idea while in Egypt, Moses rallied his people to follow and worship this God who revealed himself uniquely to him.

The divine name is explained on the basis of the Hebrew verb היה in Exod. 3:14, but the etymology is rather opaque. When Moses asked the name of the deity who had commissioned him, he received the strange answer: "I am who [or what] I am" (אהיה אשר אהיה). After the manner of popular etymologies found elsewhere in the Pentateuch (cf. Gen. 17:5; 27:36; 29:31-35), the divine name is interpreted on the basis of a wordplay on the verb הוה or היה, an alliteration which is more obvious in Hebrew than in English (YHWH [יהוה]: 'eHYeH [אהיה]). Two interpretations of this etymology have been advanced.

a. The present meaning. One interpretation takes the verb in the simple (Qal) stem. "I am" means that "I am here, really present, ready to help." Thus Yahweh's being is not passive and abstract, but is his being present. The second half of the statement ("that I am," אשר אהיה), according to this view, means that Yahweh makes himself present as he wills. He acts according to his sovereign freedom (cf. Exod. 33:19). The Tetragrammaton, then, means: "He is present."

b. The causative meaning. Another interpretation, which has much to commend it, takes the verb in the causative (Hiph'il) stem, which is precisely the grammatical form of the word "Yahweh." On this view, instead of "I am" we should read "I cause to be." When the whole enigmatic formula is changed into the causative, it means: "I cause to be what comes into existence." It is conjectured that behind this was an older formulation in the third person: "He causes to be what comes into existence" (Yahweh 'asher yihweh)—i.e., He is the Creator of all. This interpretation has the merit of putting the accent on Yahweh's dynamic lordship: He is the One who causes to be what is (or what happens)—i.e., historical events and natural happenings have their origin in his sovereign will.

In either case, Exod. 3:14 does not give a philosophical definition of God in terms of eternal, changeless, passive Being, as implied in the LXX translation εἰμί ὁ ὤν. Such metaphysical speculation would have been foreign to Israel's faith. The context of the passage sets forth the conviction that Yahweh is the active God, whose lordship is manifest in historical affairs (3:7-10). Having summoned Moses to be his agent, he overrules his protest about his inadequacy with the promise: "I will be with you" (vs. 12), and he sends him to Egypt to assure the Hebrews that the God of the fathers is powerful to deliver. Here divine reality is experienced in the voluntaristic terms of leadership and lordship. Yahweh is the God who manifests himself as Israel's redeemer, whose power humiliates the mightiest ruler of the day, and who calls the forces of nature into the service of his historical purpose.

It is rather striking, however, that the Yahweh etymology is not mentioned again in the exodus story, nor is it referred to explicitly anywhere else in the OT. It gives the impression of being an aside to Moses only. Moses was not instructed to give the explanation of the name to his countrymen in Egypt, but was merely to say that "Yahweh the God of your fathers . . . has sent me to you" (vs. 15). The narrative is concerned primarily with Yahweh's action and Moses' task. Hence some scholars have argued, not convincingly, that vss. 13-14 represent a parenthetical etymology added later to the tradition. Others, however, argue more plausibly that the passage is intentionally evasive and cryptic, and that it can best be understood in the light of the intimate relation between the name and the person of the bearer (see § A above). Knowledge of the name, it was feared, would give men power over the deity, because his person was contained in his name. Thus Jacob's request of the divine being at the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22-32): "Tell me, I pray, your name," was met with refusal, probably because such knowledge would give him magical power over his assailant. Similarly Manoah sought in vain to know the name of the angelic visitor who came to foretell the birth of Samson (Judg. 13:17-18). The same kind of reticence may be reflected in the indirect and evasive answer to Moses' query. He had asked to know the divine name in the belief that such knowledge would enable him to exercise influence over the deity. Instead, he was rebuked with a cryptic reply, summoned to serve the God who is free to act as he will, and promised that he would know who God is by the mighty acts that he would perform on behalf of his people.

The important feature of the name is not its linguistic value, but its historical associations. Whatever it meant once, it acquired concrete content through the historical experiences of Israel, beginning with the Exodus. Probably the Israelites soon forgot, if they ever knew, the literal meaning of the name. But Israel did not forget the connotation of the name which was given in the Mosaic period: "I am Yahweh who brought you up out of the land of Egypt." The witness of Israel's faith is not based on the cryptic etymology of Exod. 3:14 but on the historical evidence that Yahweh reveals his name (i.e., his personal character) through his mighty deeds.

C. APPELLATIONS APPROPRIATED BY ISRAEL. That the Sinai revelation marked a new beginning under the aegis of a special divine name is indicated by evidence concerning theophorous names —i.e., personal names compounded with "Yahweh." While these names began to appear from the time of Moses on, the biblical tradition indicates that they were lacking in the pre-Mosaic period.

It is difficult to reconstruct the religion of the patriarchal period, for the traditions have been reworked in the light of the Yahweh faith. The religion designated by the expression "the God of the fathers" (cf. Exod. 3:6) was undoubtedly polytheistic, as Josh. 24:2 explicitly states, and in many respects was part and parcel of the El-worship of the ancient Semites (see below). This is implied by P's statement that in the pre-Mosaic period Yahweh made himself known as El Shaddai, and perhaps also by the E practice of using the Semitic name Elohim (see § C3 below) in the narratives covering the period from Abraham through Joseph (Gen. 12–50). Probably the religion of the fathers provided a special preparation for the Sinai revelation. But the ancestors of Israel also transmitted general Semitic divine names which once had polytheistic associations and which later were reinterpreted by being identified with the one name, Yahweh.

1. El (אֵל). This is the generic Semitic name for "God" or "deity." It appears in Akkadian in the form ilu, and is found likewise in other Semitic languages, such as Phoenician and South Arabic. Although the derivation of the word is uncertain, apparently its root meaning is "power," a meaning which is preserved in idiomatic expressions like "the mountains of El" (i.e., "mighty mountains"; cf. Ps. 36:6 KJV—H 36:7), "the cedars of El" ("mighty cedars"; cf. Ps. 80:10—H 80:11), or "the El of my hand" (usually translated "the power of my hand"; Gen. 31:29; Deut. 28:32). Basically the word designates the numinous divine power that fills men with awe and dread. An echo of this meaning is preserved in the story of Jacob, who awoke from a dream and, realizing that he had been sleeping in a sacred place, was filled with great dread (Gen. 28:17). In the present form of the story the El is identified with Yahweh (vs. 16); this is an indication of how the old Canaanite tradition associated with the Bethel sanctuary has been reworked by Israel.

It must not be supposed, however, that El religion moved at the level of primitive animism—i.e., the impersonal supernatural power known as mana. Admittedly there were animistic holdovers from ancient times, but during the patriarchal period (middle of second millennium B.C.) El was worshiped as a high God. In the Ras Shamra literature he is extolled as the chief god of the Canaanite pantheon, the father of the gods and the lord of heaven. The element "El" is found in biblical names such as Me-thusha-el (Gen. 4:18) and Ishmael (the ancestor of the Arabs; Gen. 16:11), and probably was once compounded with Jacob, Isaac, and Joseph (e.g., the form Ya'qōbh-'el, "May El Protect," appears in extrabiblical documents of the second millennium). The fact that the preponderance of theophorous names in the book of Genesis contain the element "El," and none the element "Yahweh," is strong evidence of the dependence of Israel's faith upon a Semitic heritage as transmitted through Canaanite cult centers.

After the time of Moses, the name El continued in use within Israelite circles, especially in poetic literature which preserves ancient linguistic usage. The use of the name in the book of Job probably reflects the sage's concern for God's relation to man as man, rather than for the particular historical revelation associated with the name Yahweh. There are other instances, too (e.g., Ps. 104:21), where the more general term for "deity" may have been intentionally employed. But for the most part, "El" is used as a synonym for "Yahweh." In the present form of the oracles of Balaam, El is none other than Yahweh who brought his people out of Egypt (Num. 23:8, 19, 22-23; 24:4, 8, 16, 23), and there are numerous other instances where "El" is used in parallelism with "Yahweh" (Ps. 85:8—H 85:9; Isa. 42:5) or clearly has the same meaning (Pss. 16:1; 17:6; Isa. 40:18).

2. Combinations of El. In the early tradition "El" does not always refer to the Canaanite father of the gods, but may refer indefinitely to deity. In this sense, it often appears in combinations which identify the god.

a. El Shaddai (אל שדי). This probably meant "God, the one of the mountain(s)" (KJV-RSV "God Almighty"). As noted in § B1 above, El Shaddai was worshiped in the patriarchal period, according to the P tradition. This tradition is probably authentic, as attested in old personal names containing the element "Shaddai" (Zurishaddai [Num. 1:6]; Ammishaddai [vs. 12]; cf. Shedeur [vs. 5]), as well as occurrences of the divine name in ancient poetry (Gen. 49:25; Num. 24:4, 16). The chief El of the patriarchs was Shaddai, probably the "god of the mountain(s)." The name apparently refers to this El's localization in a mountainous region or to his theophany in mountain storm (cf. the "earthquake, wind, and fire" associated with the Sinai theophany [Exod. 19; I Kings 19]). In the time of Abraham the deity was identified with the heavenly storm-god, Hadad, who was often known as Baal among the Canaanites. Thus the name attests to the NW Mesopotamian (Amorite) background of the patriarchs.

However, the nature religion implied in the worship of the mountain god was modified in the cult of the "God of the fathers." Patriarchal religion was based on a close personal, contractual relationship between the leader of a family and the God (El) who manifested himself in a special theophany. Tradition mentions the "God of Abraham" (Gen. 31:53), the "Kinsman [RSV 'fear'] of Isaac" (31:42), and the "Mighty One of Jacob" (49:24; cf. Isa. 1:24). The patriarchal god was not bound to a holy place, but to a family whose leader had chosen him in response to a special visitation. The god manifested his power, not in the sphere of nature primarily, but by protecting the family, upholding its social life, and guiding its historical pilgrimage. Undoubtedly this conception of the "God of the wanderers" provided the background and preparation for the Mosaic revelation, as the exodus story testifies.

After the patriarchal period, the original meaning of "Shaddai" was eclipsed, and the name occasionally was used as a synonym for "Yahweh" (Ruth 1:20-21; Pss. 68:14—H 68:15; 91:1; Ezek. 1:24; 10:5). Excluding the book of Genesis and Exod. 6:2-3, the name occurs elsewhere in the OT thirty-five times, twenty-nine of which are in the book of Job. The author of Job favored this name, for evidently to him it was free from the specifically Israelite connotations of "Yahweh" and expressed the majesty and omnipotence of deity. The LXX renders "Shaddai" in the book of Job as κύριος ("Lord") or παντοκράτωρ ("Almighty"), the latter influencing subsequent translations (so KJV and RSV). Aside from the quotation in II Cor. 6:18, παντοκράτωρ occurs only in the book of Revelation (e.g., 1:8; 4:8; 21:22).

b. El Elyon (אל עליון). This name, or simply Elyon (עליון, "Exalted One," "Most High"), in Canaanite usage was a title for the Exalted One, the highest god of the pantheon, El. The Canaanite background of the title is illustrated by the story in Gen. 14 which reflects the Jerusalem cultus in pre-Israelite times. Melchizedek, priest of El Elyon, blesses Abr(ah)am in the name of this God, whom he praises as "maker [or possessor] of heaven and earth" (vss. 18-20). The polytheistic associations of the name have been refined from the biblical story, for Abraham hastens to identify El Elyon with Yahweh (vs. 22). Likewise in the oracles of Balaam three Canaanite words for "deity"—"El," "Shaddai," and "Elyon"—are grouped together (Num. 24:16). In these and other instances "Elyon" changed its meaning by becoming a synonym for "Yahweh" (Deut. 32:8-9; II Sam. 22:14; Pss. 7:17—H 7:18; 9:2—H 9:3; 21:7—H 21:8; 46:4—H 46:5; 91:1, 9; etc.). At times there seems to be a faint echo of the old polytheistic meaning (cf. Ps. 97:9), but in Israel's faith this language referred to the heavenly council, within which Yahweh rules over the divine beings (the בני־אלהים; cf. Pss. 29:1; 82:1, 6; 89:6—H 89:7) who serve him. See HOSTS.

During the major part of the OT period, however, the name Elyon fell into disuse, surviving only in the poetic and liturgical passages referred to above. But in the late postexilic period, when there was a strong tendency to stress the exalted and transcendent majesty of God, it enjoyed new favor. In its Aramaic form (אלהא עליא) it appears a number of times in the Aramaic section of Daniel (e.g., Dan. 3:26; 4:2—A 3:32; 4:24, 32, 34—A 4:21, 29, 31). It occurs frequently in the apocryphal books I Esdras and the Wisdom of Sirach, and quite often in the pseudepigraphical books Enoch, Jubilees, and IV Ezra. In the Greek form ὕψιστος it appears a few times in the NT (Mark 5:7=Luke 8:28; Acts 7:48; 16:17; Heb. 7:1).

c. El Olam (אל עולם). This means "God the Everlasting One," "God of Eternity." As Elyon was associated originally with pre-Israelite Jerusalem, so El Olam was connected with the ancient Canaanite sanctuary of Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:33). The word עולם means "everlasting time," "time whose boundaries are hidden from view." As applied to El, presumably the meaning is that his sovereignty continues through the ages, unaffected by the passing of time.

When the Beer-sheba shrine was taken over by Israel, the title El Olam was applied to Yahweh, who was known as the "Living God" (see § D4 below). Yahweh's exaltation over the course of the ages is based on the proclamation that he is the "everlasting God" (אלהי עולם; Isa. 40:28), as expressed in the psalmist's affirmation: "From everlasting to everlasting thou art God" (Ps. 90:1-2; cf. 93:2; Isa. 26:4).

d. El Bethel (אל בת־אל). On the analogy of El Shaddai, El Olam, and El Elyon, perhaps the word "Bethel" is a name of God (Gen. 35:7), as suggested in Gen. 31:13, where the definite article is used—viz., "the El Bethel" (האל בת־אל). Support for this view is found in the Elephantine Papyri of the fifth century B.C., where the God Bethel is definitely mentioned. On the other hand, some versions of Gen. 35:7 (Samar., LXX, Vulg.) interpret the words to mean the "El of Bethel"—i.e., the God revealed in the shrine named Bethel.

e. El Roi (אל ראי). This expression, perhaps meaning the "God who sees me," occurs in Gen. 16:13 as the name of the deity of the spring Beer-lahai-roi, who protected Hagar in the desert. It has been suggested that the name may mean "God of Vision or Divining," in which case this God would have a special relationship to the diviner or seer (ראה).

f. El Berith (אל ברית). This name, "God of the Covenant," appears in Judg. 9:46, and alternatively in the form "Baal-berith" (Judg. 8:33; 9:4), as the God of the Shechem covenant alliance. The remains of the ancient Canaanite temple to this deity (9:4), excavated by archaeologists, can be seen to this day. Presumably the Shechem covenant tradition antedates the covenant alliance which Joshua made at the place (Josh. 24), and goes back at least to the Amarna period (end of fifteenth and first two thirds of fourteenth century B.C.), when Lab'ayu, Canaanite ruler of the city, made a league with the 'Apiru (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF). The tradition is attested, not only by the name of the El or Baal who watched over the covenant, but also by the ascendancy of the "men of Hamor" (Judg. 9:28; cf. Gen. 33:19; 34), for the word חמור (lit., "ass") reflects the ancient practice of making a covenant by the ritual slaughter of an ass, as known from the Mari Letters. The Shechem tradition, then, is eloquent witness to the incorporation of earlier Canaanite religious conceptions into the Israelite faith at the time of the formation of the Israelite covenant confederacy.

g. El Elohe-Israel (אל אלהי ישראל). This name, "El the God of Israel," is also connected with the Shechem covenant tradition. According to Gen. 33:19-20, Jacob purchased a plot of land by the city of Shechem and there built an altar to the El (God) identified as the "God of Israel." The expression seems to indicate that the Jacob tradition has been revised in the light of later experiences, for Israel as a people came into being with the formation of the twelve-tribe confederacy in the time of Joshua. The full title of the God of the confederacy was "El the God of Israel," and from the time of Joshua on, El was identified with Yahweh (cf. Josh. 8:30).

In summary, these El names were originally pre-Israelite in their meaning. With the exception of El Shaddai, they generally appear in connection with particular Canaanite shrines and reflect ancient Semitic religion. When the Israelites came into Canaan, they took over these shrines, together with the religious traditions associated with them, and rededicated them to the worship of Yahweh. The religious revolution brought about by this reinterpretation can be seen clearly from Joshua's demand that Israel must put away the "gods which your fathers served [in the region] beyond the River [Euphrates], . . . or the gods of the Amorites [Canaanites] in whose land you dwell" (Josh. 24:14-15), for Yahweh is a "jealous El" (vs. 19) who will not tolerate the worship of other gods. See GOD, OT VIEW OF, § D2.

3. Elohim (אלהים). This word appears frequently in the OT as a name for deity ("God," "gods"). Being plural in form, it echoes ancient polytheism, like the name El, to which it is closely related. In a few instances the plural sense is clearly expressed, as in Jotham's fable (Judg. 9:13) or Jethro's declaration that Yahweh is greater than the other אלהים (Exod. 18:11; cf. Exod. 12:12; 20:3; Deut. 10:17; I Sam. 4:8; II Sam. 7:23; Ps. 86:8).

In the great majority of instances, however, "Elohim" is used in a singular sense, even when, as a concession to the plural form of the word, the accompanying verb is in the plural (e.g., Gen. 1:26; 20:13; 35:7; Exod. 22:9—H 22:8). This use is often called the "plural of majesty" or pluralis amplitudinis —i.e., Elohim includes all gods; the fulness of deity is comprehended in him. Thus the word is equivalent to "deity" or "Godhead." In this sense it is used in the priestly account of Creation: "Then Elohim said, 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness' " (Gen. 1:26). The passage presupposes the conception of the heavenly council (see HOSTS) ruled over by God (I Kings 22:19; Job 1:6; Pss. 82:1; 89:7; Isa. 6:8). This circle of heavenly beings or "sons of God" (בני אלהים) is referred to in the plural verb "let us" and the pronoun "our." Despite this court imagery, the priestly view is clearly monotheistic, for Elohim embraces the divine plurality in unity, and elsewhere in the priestly account the divine name is accompanied by verbs in the singular.

The "plural of majesty" did not arise first in Israelite tradition as a result of the identification of Elohim with Yahweh or the gradual development from polytheism to monotheism. On the contrary, this is an ancient pre-Israelite expression which was employed in Babylonia and Canaan even with a singular verb. Thus in Akkadian the plural word ilanu ("gods") could be used in homage to a particular god, like the moon-god Sin, to express the worshiper's view that he is the highest God, in whom the whole pantheon is represented. In the Amarna Letters, Canaanite vassals addressed the deified pharaoh as ilania ("my gods"), thus saying that the fulness of deity is concentrated in him.

In the singular sense "Elohim" is sometimes applied in the OT to the god of another people, as to Chemosh the god of the Ammonites (Judg. 11:24), Ashtoreth (Ishtar) goddess of Sidon (I Kings 11:5), or Baal-zebub of Ekron (II Kings 1:2). But in the majority of cases "Elohim" refers to the God known and worshiped in Israel. For Israel, Yahweh is not one El among many; he is God absolutely, the Lord of history and nature, who demands the exclusive homage of his people. This comes to emphatic expression in the challenge presented by Elijah (whose name means "My El is Yahweh") to the people in the time when the worship of the Phoenician Baal Melkart was being advocated: "If Yahweh is God [האלהים], follow him; but if Baal, then follow him" (I Kings 18:21; cf. vss. 37, 39). Elijah mocks the claim of the Baal to be God (vs. 27) and demonstrates dramatically that only Yahweh has the power that belongs to deity (see GOD, OT VIEW OF, § D6). The conviction that Yahweh is Elohim, God in the absolute sense, is emphasized in the Elohistic (E) narratives of the Pentateuch, so designated because the narrator prefers to use the divine name Elohim, especially for the period before the Mosaic revelation.

The use of Elohim in the priestly creation story, as noted above, is explained not only by the writer's avoidance of the special name Yahweh before the Mosaic period (Exod. 6:2-3), but especially by the attempt to avoid any taint of polytheism, such as was characteristic of ancient mythologies of CREATION. The name Elohim stresses the fact that God, the Creator, is the absolute Lord over his creation and the sovereign of history. Since the priestly scheme articulates history into several dispensations (Creation to Noah, Noah to Abraham, Abraham to Moses), each having its special blessing and commandment, and all leading up to the climactic revelation of Sinai, it is apparent that in Gen. 1 Elohim is none other than the God whose personal name, Yahweh, was later disclosed. Thus the priestly redactors of the Pentateuch in Gen. 2–3 placed Elohim in apposition to Yahweh in the expression "Yahweh Elohim" ("the LORD God"; e.g., 2:4*b*, 5, 7), the intention being to affirm that Yahweh is Elohim, the God of all times.

In the LXX the usual practice is to translate "El," "Elohim," and "Eloah" (see below) with θεός and to render "Yahweh" with κύριος. The word θεός, of course, had its own history and associations in Greek culture. In the NT, however, where this word is used as the basic word for "God," its meaning is not defined primarily out of the Greek thought-world but out of the sacred history of which the OT is the witness (Heb. 1:2).

4. Eloah (אלוה). This is thought by some to be a singular vocative form related to the plural form "Elohim." It occurs forty-two times in the book of Job and only fifteen times elsewhere (e.g., Deut. 32:15, 17; Ps. 18:31—H 18:32; Prov. 30:5; Isa. 44:8; Hab. 1:11). In the latter cases it is usually synonymous in meaning with "Elohim" (Ps. 50:22-23) or with "Yahweh" (Ps. 139:19; cf. 114:7). The name is apparently favored in Job because it is not necessarily laden with the historical connotations of the "God of Israel." The word seems to appear with greatest frequency in the exilic and postexilic periods, as shown by some of the above citations, as well as II Chr. 32:15; Neh. 9:17; Dan. 11:37-39.

5. Baal (בעל). Although this word, meaning "lord, owner," could be used of human leaders (Num. 21:28; Judg. 9:6; Isa. 16:8) or of the owner of cattle (Isa. 1:3), it is primarily a designation of the Canaanite god of storm and fertility (see BAAL). In ancient religious usage, the names Baal and El could be used alternatively, as at Shechem, where men invoked the covenant God as either El-berith or Baal-berith (Judg. 8:33; 9:4, 46). This fact leads one to expect that Baal, like El, would have been appropriated by Israel and identified with Yahweh. Undeniably, there were tendencies in this direction, as illustrated by the fact that in the early period of the settlement parents named children after the land-god Baal, apparently with no thought of abandoning Yahweh. Two ardent devotees of Yahweh, Saul and David, named children in this manner—e.g., Saul's son Ish-baal (II Sam. 4:1, 5; I Chr. 8:33) and grandson Mephibaal (II Sam. 4:4) or Merib-baal (I Chr. 8:34), and David's daughter Beeliada (I Chr. 14:7). However, the worship of Baal was based on a religious outlook basically incompatible with the Yahweh faith, and the rise of the prophetic movement, especially with Elijah, brought the issue to an either-or decision. The prophet Hosea, who emphasized the folly and sin of Israel's resorting to the Canaanite nature religion, declared that the time would come when Israelites no longer would call Yahweh "my Baal" (Jer. 2:8; 7:9; Hos. 2:16—H 2:18; cf. 2:8, 13, 17—H 2:10, 15, 19; etc.). So deep was the revulsion toward the name Baal, as a result of the victorious prophetic struggle, that later editors substituted for it the word בשת, "shame," in the proper names of the books of Samuel and Kings (e.g., Ish-bosheth, Mephibosheth).

6. Adon (אדון). This title ("lord"; Greek Adonis) is closely related in meaning to "Baal" and is also of foreign origin, as indicated by its appearance in Canaanite names like Adoni-zedek (Josh. 10:3). But while "Baal" is primarily a divine name, "Adon" is basically an honorific title. In ordinary speech etiquette, it was customarily used as a title of courtesy and respect in addressing a superior, just as we would say "sir," "your honor," "my lord." It was appropriately used by a subject when speaking to the king (I Sam. 24:8—H 24:9; 26:17; Jer. 22:18; cf. Gen. 44:18), by a wife to her husband (Gen. 18:12), by a daughter or son to the father (Gen. 31:35), by a slave to his master (Gen. 24:12; Exod. 21:5; cf. Mal. 1:6), or by a subordinate to his leader (Num. 11:28). Thus the title refers to one's position of authority and prestige (Gen. 23:6; 45:8), and in this sense could be used as a title in addressing God, to whom, in the highest sense, honor and dominion belong.

In Israel's faith the title belongs pre-eminently to Yahweh, for he alone is the "Lord of all the earth" (Josh. 3:11, 13; Ps. 97:5; Mic. 4:13; Zech. 4:14; 6:5). Therefore the title is frequently used in apposition to Yahweh (Exod. 23:17; 34:23; Isa. 1:24; 3:15; 10:16; Amos 8:1; and frequently in Ezekiel) or as a substitute (Pss. 90:1; 114:7; Isa. 6:1, 8, 11; Mal. 3:1).

In the postexilic period increasing reverence for the name of God made it expedient to safeguard the religious use of "Adon," lest men should address God as they would human superiors. Therefore, the title, when used in apposition to or in place of "Yahweh," was written in a distinctive way. First of all, the sacred title was spelled with the pronominal suffix ending (אדון+י). This ending "my" (י), however, merely became a part of the word, as in the case of "rabbi" (lit., "my great one") or "milady." In the second place, the divine title Adonai was vocalized in a slightly different manner from the similar form אדני, the secular word meaning "my lords" (Gen. 19:2) or, plural of "majesty," "my lordship." The difference was very slight—the short "a" in the diphthong (ai) of the latter word was merely lengthened to a long "a"; but the small difference was sufficient to mark Adonai as a distinctively religious term.

Fear of profaning the name of God led LXX translators to translate YHWH as κύριος ("Lord") and Masoretes to vocalize the Tetragrammaton with the vowels of Adonai (see JEHOVAH). The reflex of this reverence was also felt in certain parts of the OT, especially the prophetic books, where Adonai was often substituted for Yahweh. A probable example is Isa. 6:1, which now reads: "I saw אדני sitting upon a throne" (in vss. 1, 8, many MSS read יהוה). Textual changes of this kind were undoubtedly dictated by the attempt to avoid the divine name in a context where it seemed irreverent to use it (cf. Gen. 18:3, 27, 31, where Adonai is also used). Thus in the late postexilic period, when Jewish religion emphasized the transcendence and holiness of God, Adonai came to be, not just a title of honor and respect, but an expression of God's absolute lordship. See LORD.

D. OTHER APPELLATIONS. Israel also drew from the cultural milieu and from her own historical experience a number of epithets and metaphors in order to express faith in Yahweh.

1. Rock (Zur, צור). The meaning of this term is "rock." It has been suggested that, as it sometimes appears in parallel with סלע ("cliff," "crag"), the word was a figure of speech drawn from Palestinian scenery to portray divine strength and permanence. No doubt these local associations favored the continued usage of the word (cf. Isa. 32:2), but it is quite probable that the primary meaning was given in the pre-Mosaic period when the patriarchal deity, Shaddai, was invested with mountain imagery (see § C2*a above*). In Akkadian prayers the deity was often addressed as "great mountain," and throughout the West men worshiped the great storm-god, Hadad, usually known as Baal among the Canaanites. Thus the mountain or rock imagery suggested by צור has its source in the NW Mesopotamian locale with which the patriarchs are connected. Support for this view is found in some of the early personal names like Elizur ("My God is a Rock"), who was the son of Shedeur or, probably more accurately spelled, Shaddāy-'ôr ("The Mountain One Shines [shows favor on me?]"; Num. 1:5). Another early name was Pedahzur ("May the Rock Redeem"; Num. 1:10).

Israel affirmed that Yahweh is the Rock of Israel (Isa. 30:29; cf. Gen. 49:24). The name often appears in poetic literature (e.g., Pss. 18:2—H 18:3; parallel with סלע: 18:31—H 18:32; 18:46—H 18:47; 19:14—H 19:15; 28:1; 78:35; 89:26—H 89:27; Isa. 17:10; 44:8; Hab. 1:12). An important passage in this connection is the so-called Song of Moses (Deut. 32), where it is affirmed that Yahweh is the Rock who has given birth to his people (vs. 18) and whose stability and steadfastness are their sole refuge (vss. 4, 15, 30-31). In Isa. 26:4 Yahweh is called an "everlasting rock." The KJV marginal translation "Rock of Ages" became the basis of A. M. Toplady's famous hymn by this title.

The reference to Yahweh as the "Rock of Israel" provided the basis for the rabbinic haggadah that the Rock followed the people during their wilderness wanderings, and this in turn prompted Paul to say that the Rock (πέτρα) of Israel was none other than Christ (I Cor. 10:4). In the NT, God is not called "Rock," perhaps because the LXX had rendered צור by "God" or some other term, although the associations of constancy, strength, unvarying mercy, etc., were carried over into the vocabulary of the Christian revelation.

2. Father, Brother, Kinsman. A cluster of names, such as אב, "father"; אח, "brother"; עם, "kinsman," were used in antiquity to express the very close family relation between the deity and his worshipers. We have already noticed that patriarchal religion was of this type, as illustrated in the divine name "Kinsman [פחד] of Isaac" (RSV "fear of Isaac"; see § C2*a above*). The conception of family kinship with the deity is reflected in personal names like Eliab, "My God is Father" (Num. 1:9; I Sam. 16:6); Ahiezer, "My [divine] Brother is help" (Num. 1:12); or Ammishaddai, "[The god of] my Kindred is Shaddai" (Num. 1:12). The ancient Semitic background of these divine names is the view that the god was actually a blood relative of the clan or family, whose members were by the same token sons, brothers, and kinsmen of the god.

In this connection it is noteworthy that the conception of God as Father is much older than the NT or rabbinic period. It is found in the hymns of ancient Babylonia in which worshipers addressed the deity as "Father of the Land" and in the Canaanite worship of El as the all-father. It is also reflected in numerous names in the OT which contain the element אב, such as Abraham, Abimelech, Abishua, Absalom, and Abijah. However, during the period of the monarchy father-son imagery was avoided, evidently because it suggested the pagan notion of an actual physical or natural relationship between the god and his people (Jer. 2:27; cf. 3:19). When used, it was redefined to mean sonship by adoption, as in Yahweh's gracious election of Israel (Exod. 4:22-23; Hos. 11:1-4), or his adoption of the king as his son (II Sam. 7:14-15; Ps. 2:7). After the idea of divine fatherhood was freed from its pagan associations, the term אב was used with increasing frequency (cf. Isa. 63:16; 64:8—H 64:7; Mal. 1:6) in the Jewish and Christian vocabulary of worship. See GOD, NT.

3. King, Judge, Shepherd. Out of a political ideology came the related terms מלך, "king"; שפט, "judge"; רעה, "shepherd." In the ancient Semitic world it was a widespread practice to address the deity as King, as indicated by the many personal names containing the element מלך (e.g., Abimelech). This political anthropomorphism provided metaphorical language to express the relation between Yahweh, the Lord who had manifested his beneficence to his enslaved people, and Israel, whose responsibility within the covenant was that of servants who obey their sovereign (see COVENANT). Early attempts to make Israel a monarchy "like the nations" were resisted under the conviction that Yahweh alone is Israel's King (Judg. 8:23; I Sam. 8). Some scholars believe that during the monarchy an annual throne-ascension ceremony was held at the turn of the year, when the reigning king participated in rituals which dramatized Yahweh's ascension to his throne, his victory over all enemies, and his sovereign control of his people's destiny. However this may be, Yahweh was praised by the worshiping community as the "King of glory" (Ps. 24), and the idea of divine kingship appears frequently in the Psalms (5:2—H 5:3; 29:10; 44:4—H 44:5; 47:6-8—H 47:7-9; 48:2—H 48:3; 68:24—H 68:25; 74:12; 84:3—H 84:4; 95:3; 97:1; 99:4; 146:10). In his inaugural vision Isaiah beheld Yahweh as the King par excellence (Isa. 6:1, 5), and this theme is emphasized especially in the message of Second Isaiah, who announces that Yahweh, Israel's King (Isa. 41:21; 43:15; 44:6; 52:7) and the King of the world (52:10), is coming to inaugurate his eschatological kingdom. Thus the title provides the key to the understanding of the OT doctrine of the KINGDOM OF GOD.

The title "Judge," like "King," refers to the function of the ruler. In a passage from the fourteenth-century Ras Shamra Tablets the two terms are used of the deity in poetic parallelism: "Our king is Triumphant Baal, our judge, above whom there is no one!" Moreover, the word "judge" was used for the early leaders of the Israelite confederacy, whose task was not just to arbitrate legal disputes (as in our restricted meaning of the term), but to get justice for Israel by acting in military crises when the confederacy was threatened (see the book of Judges). In the highest sense, Yahweh is Judge (Gen. 18:25), for his actions in history set things right (see GOD, OT VIEW OF, § D5; RIGHTEOUSNESS IN THE OT), by humbling the oppressor and exalting the oppressed. Thus Israel could say:

> Yahweh is our judge, Yahweh is our ruler,
> Yahweh is our king; he will save us
> (Isa. 33:22).

The psalmist appeals to Yahweh to judge him (Ps. 7:8—H 7:9) or to come to judge the earth (Ps. 96:13).

The title "Shepherd" is also related to the office of kingship. In the ancient Orient the king was often styled as the shepherd of his people, as, e.g., in the prologue to the Code of Hammurabi, and the court language was also applied to deities whose role was to lead and protect the people. Divested of its ancient polytheistic associations, the term was applied to Yahweh throughout the OT period, and was particularly appropriate for expressing the personal relation between God and his people in the covenant. Israel is Yahweh's "flock" or the "sheep of his pasture" (Pss. 79:13; 95:7; 100:3), and Yahweh is the Shepherd (Gen. 49:24; Ps. 80:1—H 80:2) who leads (lit., "shepherds") and enfolds his people with goodness and concern, as expressed classically in the Twenty-third Psalm. The notion of Yahweh as King and Shepherd is illustrated beautifully in Isa. 40:11 (cf. Ezek. 34). In the NT the same thought appears in the parable of the shepherd (Luke 15:4-7) or the Johannine portrayal of Christ as the Good Shepherd (John 10:1-18).

4. Descriptive expressions. Besides the titles and epithets used along with the special name Yahweh, there are a number of descriptive expressions which point up particular traits of God as known within the covenant. Some of these, like the affirmation that Yahweh "sits enthroned upon the cherubim" (Ps. 99:1), reflect mythological motifs known throughout the ancient Near East. A particularly interesting example is "Cloud Rider," an expression that was once applied to Baal in the Ras Shamra literature and which was appropriated to express Yahweh's eternal sovereignty (Deut. 33:26; Ps. 68:4, 33—H 68:5, 34; cf. Isa. 19:1).

a. The living God (אל חי, אלהים חיים, אלהים חי). This is a characteristic description of Yahweh. It implies a contrast between Yahweh and other gods, who are powerless to save (I Sam. 17:26, 36; II Kings 19:4, 16; Jer. 10:10; cf. I Thess. 1:9), but in a more positive sense it expresses the life-giving power and directing presence of Yahweh in Israel's historical experience. Unlike the gods whose existence is bound up with the pattern of life and death in nature, Yahweh is the living Lord of history and nature, who made himself known at Sinai (Deut. 5:26), led his people triumphantly into the Promised Land (Josh. 3:10), spoke by the true prophet (Jer. 23:36), and made himself accessible to his worshiping people (Pss. 42:2—H 42:3; 84:2—H 84:3; cf. Matt. 26:63; Heb. 3:12; 9:14; 10:31; 12:22). At the time of the fulfilment of covenant history, Israel will be known as "sons of the living God" (Hos. 1:10—H 2:1; cf. Matt. 16:16). The same implication of Yahweh's inexhaustible vitality and life-giving power is expressed in the frequently employed oath formula, used either by a human being ("As Yahweh lives") or by God himself ("As I live, says Yahweh"). Indeed, because Yahweh lives, men may expect to receive from him the life which is equivalent to welfare and salvation (cf. Deut. 30:20). So the psalmist prays:

> Yahweh lives; and blessed be my rock, > and exalted be the God of my salvation
> (Ps. 18:46—H 18:47).

In a metaphorical sense Yahweh is called the "fountain of living waters" (Jer. 2:13; 17:13; cf. John 4:14) or the "fountain of life" (Ps. 36:9—H 36:10). See §§ 4*b-c below; see also* LIFE.

b. The First and the Last. This is an expression used by Second Isaiah to convey the idea of Yahweh's eternal sovereignty over the whole sweep of time from beginning to end (Isa. 44:6; 48:12; cf. 41:4). The prophet does not speak of eternity in abstract and nonhistorical terms, but presses temporal language to its utter limits by saying concretely:

> Before me no god was formed, > nor shall there be any after me > (43:10).

The word עולם, "everlasting" (see § C2*c above*), which this prophet applies to Yahweh (40:28), does not imply any devaluation of time and history, as in the philosophies and mysticisms of Greece and India. It means a long duration of time, whether extending remotely into the past (antiquity) or indefinitely into the future (futurity), and thus suggests everlasting time, time whose boundaries are hidden from man's view (see TIME). Yahweh's everlasting sovereignty, then, is hidden within the shadow of the first and the last. The prophet is not concerned with metaphysical speculations, but with historical meaning. The sense of eternity is occasioned by the realization that Yahweh, unlike the idols, is not bounded by the limitations of man's finite life or by the changing cycles of nature. He is the everlasting God who acts within history to accomplish his purpose, and therefore men may rely upon him in faith, confident that his power does not fail. Thus the expression "the First and the Last" is a vivid way of saying that the whole sweep of human history from beginning to end is under the sway of the God who is Creator and Lord, and whose directing presence is known in history (46:10; cf. 45:21). This same note is accented in the NT under the conviction that God's sovereign lordship is manifest in Jesus Christ, the Alpha and the Omega (Rev. 1:8, 17; 2:8; 22:13).

c. The Ancient of Days. A similar idea is vividly expressed in the apocalyptic picture of "one that was ancient of days," whose appearance was that of an old man who had lived many years (Dan. 7:9, 13, 22; cf. Enoch 46:1-2; 47:3). Since the chapter is filled with symbolic imagery, it is clear that the writer does not suggest a literal portrait of God, for such anthropomorphic touches have another function in the theological syntax of biblical language (see GOD, OT VIEW OF, § C4; ANCIENT OF DAYS). The language is reminiscent of Ras Shamra texts in which El is called "king, father of years." The author of Daniel affirms that Israel's God is the living God—i.e., he "lives for ever" (Dan. 12:7), and his kingdom is everlasting (6:26—A 6:27; cf. Jer. 10:10). His sovereignty extends over all the ages, and before the Lord of history men and nations must stand for final judgment. The greatness of God is beyond man's comprehension, for, says the author of Job, "the number of his years is unsearchable" (Job. 36:26).

Thus the OT refines and deepens the theological implications of the expression "the living God." Unlike other ancient religions and philosophies, which either saw eternity and time in mutual opposition or affirmed that the gods were bound within the processes of nature, Israel affirmed that Yahweh, the everlasting God, is dynamically active in the temporal sphere, giving to history its meaning and direction. His eternity includes and transcends all the years of man's earthly experience, and Hebraic language finally presses to its very limits in the affirmation that "from everlasting to everlasting" he is God (Ps. 90:2; cf. 93:2; 145:13). See GOD, OT VIEW OF, § C2.

Bibliography. On the meaning of the divine name: J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, I–II (1926), 248 ff. O. Grether, Name und Wort Gottes im AT, BZAW, LXIV (1934), especially 1-58. G. von Rad, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1957), pp. 181-88.

On Yahweh: W. F. Albright, "The Name Yahweh," JBL, XLIII (1924), 370-78; XLIV (1925), 158-62; XLVI (1927), 175-78; LXVII (1948), 379-80. G. R. Driver, "The Original Form of the Name Yahweh: Evidences and Conclusions," ZAW, XLVI (1928), 7-25. O. Eissfeldt, "Neue Zeugnisse für die Aussprache des Tetragamms als Jahwe," ZAW, LIII (1935), 59-76. R. A. Bowman, "Yahweh the Speaker," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, III (1944), 1-8. N. Walker, The Tetragrammaton (1948). J. Obermann, "The Divine Name YHWH in the Light of Recent Discoveries," JBL, LXVIII (1949), 301-23. T. C. Vriezen, "Ehyeh asher ehyeh," Festschrift A. Bertholet (1950), pp. 498-512. A. M. Dubarle, "La signification du nom de Yahweh," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, XXXV (1951), 3-21. A. Murtonen, A Philological and Literary Treatise on the OT Divine Names (1952): includes Murtonen's essay "The Appearance of the Name YHWH Outside Israel," from Studia Orientalia, vol. XVI, no. 3 (1951). E. Dhorme, "Le nom du Dieu d'Israel," RHR, CXLI (1952), 1-18. E. Auerbach, Moses (1953), pp. 44-49. J. Gray, "The God YW in the Religion of Canaan," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, XII (1953), 278-83. G. R. Driver, "The Interpretation of YHWH as a Participle Form," JBL, LXXIII (1954), 125-31. E. Schild, "On Exodus iii 14: 'I am that I am,'" Vetus Testamentum, IV (1954), 296-302. S. D. Goitein, "YHWH the Passionate: The Monotheistic Meaning and Origin of the Name YHWH," Vetus Testamentum, VI (1956), 1-9. W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed., 1957), pp. 258-61. R. Mayer, "Der Gottesname Jahwe im Lichte der neuesten Forschung," BZ, N.F., Jahrgang 2, Heft 1 (1958), pp. 26-53.

Other divine names and titles: O. Eissfeldt, "Jahwe als König," ZAW, XLVI (1928), 81-105. A. Alt, Der Gott der Väter (1929). W. F. Albright, "The Names Shaddai and Abram," JBL, LIV (1935), 173-204. E. Leslie, OT Religion in the Light of Its Canaanite Background (1936), pp. 54-69. O. Eissfeldt, "Baalshamem und Yahwe," ZAW, LVII (1939), 1-31. H. G. May, "The Patriarchal Idea of God," JBL, LX (1941), 113-28; "The God of My Father—A Study of Patriarchal Religion," JBR, IX (1941), 155-58. G. L. Della Vida, "El Elyon in Genesis 14:18-20," JBL, LXIII (1944), 1-29. W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, I (1948), 81-96. O. Eissfeldt, El im ugaritischen Pantheon (1950). T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (rev. ed., 1950), pp. 82-118. J. P. Hyatt, "YHWH as the God of My Father," Vetus Testamentum (1955), pp. 130-36. M. H. Pope, El in the Ugaritic Texts (1955). W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed., 1957), pp. 209-36, 243-49. E. Jacob, Theology of the OT (1958), pp. 43-64.

B. W. ANDERSON

GOD, OT VIEW OF. The God of the OT is not the object of man's thought but is the Subject, the living God, who wills to be the Lord of all man's thinking and living. Therefore, in a peculiar manner practically all of the OT is theology—i.e., thinking in relation to the God who has revealed himself in dramatic deeds of history and has entered into relationship with his people. It is only by abstraction that the subject of God can be singled out as one to be studied alongside many others. Israel's historians knew that to write history is to proclaim the deeds of God rather than to write the chronicles of men. In the OT the world is not regarded as a sphere which operates according to its own rational or moral laws, but as the creation of God in which everything serves his purpose. Man is not an autonomous being, but a creature whose very manhood rests on the fact that God visits him and cares for him. Ethics is not based on a scheme of moral principles or human values, but upon obedience to him whose deeds of justice and mercy have shown men what is good. Thus to explore the subject of theology in the OT is to enter a dynamic realm of life where all things and relationships find their meaning in the God who has chosen to reveal himself through the historical experiences of Israel, beginning with the call of Abraham and, in the Christian view, culminating in the career of Jesus Christ.

A. Israel's knowledge of God
B. The revelation of God
  1. The hiddenness of God
  2. The unknown Lord of mankind
  3. The God of Israel
C. The presence of God with his people
  1. Theophanies
  2. Concrete manifestations of God's presence
    a. Ark and tent of meeting
    b. The angel of Yahweh
    c. The face of Yahweh
    d. The glory of Yahweh
    e. The name of Yahweh
  3. Word, Spirit, Wisdom
  4. Anthropomorphism
D. The traits of Yahweh
  1. Holiness
  2. Jealousy
  3. Beneficence
  4. Wrath and love
  5. Righteousness
  6. The only and unique Lord
E. The purpose of God
  1. Incipient eschatology
  2. God's will for Israel: community
  3. The salvation of Israel and mankind
Bibliography

A. ISRAEL'S KNOWLEDGE OF GOD. In the OT the reality of God is the unquestioned presupposition of experience and thought. The question: Does God exist? is not only nonbiblical, but would not have made sense in the ancient world, where polytheism, rather than atheism, was the human concern. The biblical question is, rather: Who is our God?—i.e., What is his name? (See GOD, NAMES OF, § A). OT faith finds expression in the testimony that the Lord of history and creation revealed himself personally to Israel in the concrete episodes of their history and laid his covenant claim upon them. Within the community of faith there was ample room for religious doubt. The patriarchs were subjected to the despairing experiences that God would not, or could not, fulfil his promises. During the wilderness testing, the Israelites cried out: "Is the LORD among us or not?" (Exod. 17:7). Jeremiah likened God to a deceitful wadi whose waters fail in the dry season (Jer. 15:18). Job was tormented by the remoteness and absence of God and longed for some reconciliation with the Sovereign of the universe. Doubts of this kind were intense at times precisely because they were based upon a sense of the sovereignty of God. Only the "fool" says in his heart that there is no God (Pss. 10:4; 14:1; 53:1—H 53:2). This, however, is the practical atheism of the person who supposes that he can live as though God does not have to be reckoned with, who supposes in his heart that > God has forgotten, > he has hidden his face, he will never see it > (Ps. 10:11; cf. Jer. 5:12).

The OT has no systematic doctrine of God, for God is not an idea to be incorporated into a logical system or into a spiritual thought-world. It is therefore wrong to expect an answer to the question of the nature of God, if this means an abstract analysis of what God is in himself—i.e., the attributes of his being. Just as persons are known in the context of relationship, so God's self is revealed in his historical relations with his people. He is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, not the God of speculative thought. He is known by what he has done, is doing, and will do—i.e., in the events of history. As the psalmist affirms:

> He made known his ways to Moses, > his acts to the people of Israel
> (Ps. 103:7).

OT theology, then, is fundamentally historical theology. It is profoundly and radically historical, for it rests upon the witness that God's revelation takes the form of a history. Just as the power of poetry is lost when translated into prose, so the vitality of Israel's faith is lost when the dramatic story of God's actions and men's responses is converted into abstractions.

The faith of Israel stands in contrast, not only to speculative thought, but also to the nature religions of antiquity. Although these religions took varying forms in the Fertile Crescent, they were all based upon a numinous awareness of divine powers operative in nature. Men believed that their lives were existentially dependent upon these powers for the successful cultivation of the soil, fertility of womb and flock, and the blessings of long life and well-being. In modern scientific culture these powers have been demythologized—i.e., emptied of divinity and reduced to impersonal forces or processes; but in antiquity nature's powers were personified as male and female deities and organized into a hierarchy or pantheon, within which each deity and his female counterpart performed an assigned function. Since the seasonal cycles of nature did not move by natural law but by the actions of the nature gods, man's religious task was to swing into the natural rhythm, thereby finding harmony, security, and salvation. He felt in the wrong if he was at odds with the natural powers, and he felt right if, through the practices of the cultus, he was integrated into the natural harmony and could even ensure that the balance of powers would not be upset. The seductive temptation of this type of religion is evidenced by Israel's history from the moment the people set foot on the soil of Canaan, where BAAL and his female counterpart (Ashtart) were worshiped by farmers.

The incompatibility of this religious outlook with Israel's historical faith is indicated by the vehement protest against Baalism, a protest which made it impossible for the divine name Baal to be accepted as a synonym for Israel's God (see GOD, NAMES OF, § C5). Israel dared to affirm, in disagreement with all her cultural neighbors, that divine reality is not encountered in the sphere of nature but in the sphere of historical experience. To be sure, the God of Israel was also the Lord of nature, for nothing lay outside the range of his sovereignty; Israel should look to him, not to the Baal, for the gifts of agriculture (Hos. 2:8-9—H 2:10-11). But first and foremost Israel's God was the Lord of history—the God who rescued Israel from Egyptian bondage, led his people through the wilderness and on to the Land of the Promise, raised up David as king and the prophets as his spokesmen, and acted in the great international crises to accomplish his sovereign purpose. Thus, in contrast to nature religion's emphasis upon the harmonious integration of man's life into the rhythms of nature, Israel's faith is characterized by a strong voluntarism: God makes known his will in historical events and lays his claim upon his people's will, calling them to decision, faithfulness, and responsible action. It is highly significant that the central motif of the OT is the COVENANT, a relational term that was drawn from the historical experience of jurisprudence and politics.

The OT, with its great diversity, is a literary deposit of Israel's historical experiences during a period of more than a millennium. This history, however, is not secular history, like that of any other nation, although it is obviously enmeshed with historical developments of the Fertile Crescent. In its inward dimension, Israel's history is theological history (Heilsgeschichte or sacred history)—a history of God in action to lead his people toward the fulfilment of his purpose for them and all mankind. From time to time history was narrated with new accents—e.g., by the Yahwist, the Deuteronomist, the Chronicler—but always for the sake of declaring God's dealings with his people. A succession of prophets arose to interpret the meaning of their contemporary situation in the light of what God had done, was doing, and would do. Ethical appeals were set within the remembrance of the "saving acts of the LORD" (Mic. 6:5). Israel's worship, as reflected in the book of Psalms, was an elevated praise of God for his majestic power to deliver, protect, and lead his people. And even where the historical emphasis seems to be most absent, as in the books of Job and Ecclesiastes, the religious questions are precisely those which were evoked by man's cry to understand the ways of God.

The presence of so much history in the OT is not to be explained as only a context for the emergence of theological ideas. Rather, this history is essentially theological in character, for it is the medium of God's self-revelation. For Israel to remember, to write, to recite, and to live history was a confession of faith.

B. THE REVELATION OF GOD. That God reveals himself is the consistent theme of the Bible from Gen. 1:1 on. The OT does not purport to be the record of human initiative in seeking for and discovering God, for—as the author of Job realized—God would elude men's search completely unless God on his own initiative were to reveal himself and speak his word. Men are enjoined to "seek the LORD" only because in his grace he has drawn near (Isa. 55:6-7). Very often the prophets give the impression that men are more disposed to turn away from God and hide from him than to seek him with their whole heart. Insofar as "revelation" means God's disclosure of himself, rather than data which men may discover by investigation, it testifies to God's overture, God's initiative. Often revelation takes men completely by surprise and arouses the deepest sense of dread. Moreover, in the book of Deuteronomy curious probing into what is hidden is condemned as presumptuous, for God has revealed in his Torah all that is needful for man's salvation (Deut. 29:29—H 29:28).

1. The hiddenness of God. The presupposition of REVELATION is that God is hidden from man's sight. Revelation, therefore, is God's unveiling or uncovering of himself and his purposes, as the verb גלה indicates (Deut. 29:29—H 29:28; I Sam. 3:21; Isa. 22:14; 40:5; 53:1).

In part, the hiddenness of God is the expression of his transcendence. God is prior to and exalted above man's world and the whole universe. In the OT divine transcendence is often expressed in terms of the ancient cosmological view of the universe: God's true dwelling place is not on earth but in heaven (Eccl. 5:2—H 5:1). From his lofty and remote dwelling place, he "comes down" to visit men and to take part in historical affairs (Gen. 11:7; Exod. 3:8; 19:11; 24:9-10; etc.). He sits "above the circle of the earth," as Second Isaiah puts it (Isa. 40:22), but nevertheless advances along a royal highway to rescue his people (40:3). Thus by using cosmological imagery in a religious rather than a scientific sense, Israel affirms that God is not a phenomenon of man's historical world, to be observed in the same way we see human beings or objects, or to be used for the service of human interests. God is invisible to man. This conviction is underscored by the Mosaic prohibition against making an image of him (Exod. 20:4) or by the ancient belief that ordinarily no man could behold him directly and live (Exod. 33:20; cf. Gen. 32:30—H 32:31; Exod. 19:21; 24:11; Judg. 6:22-23; Isa. 6:5). He is the exalted One, who dwells in the high and lofty place (Isa. 57:15; cf. 33:5). The OT is aware of the great contrast between the deity of God and the humanity of man, a contrast that is sensed even when boldly anthropomorphic language is used (see § C4 below). The great theophany of Job (chs. 38–41) conveys an overwhelming sense of the transcendent majesty and power of God the Creator.

The hiddenness of God, however, is not just due to God's exaltation far above man's world; it is also a characteristic of his presence in the world. The paradise story (Gen. 2–3) portrays God in a visible, human form dealing directly with man, but this story pertains to prehistory, not to the ordinary historical situation which prevails as a result of "paradise lost." In other parts of the OT it is said that God "appears" directly to individuals, or "lets himself be seen" (as the reflexive of the verb ראה suggests), but usually with a divine reserve or holding back. He appears in a dream (Gen. 28), in the form of an angel (ch. 18), or in a radiant envelope of glory (see § C4 below). This divine reserve is expressed in a passage which tells of Moses' request to be shown God's ways (Exod. 33:12-23). Protected in a cave from the blinding glory, Moses was enabled to see the Lord's back and not his face (vss. 22-23). Although the passage is highly anthropomorphic, it indicates that even in God's self-disclosure he remains partially hidden from human sight.

Prophetic teaching deepened the notion of God's hiddenness by connecting it with the blindness of sin. Though God is actually near, he is remote when his people forsake him and break his covenant. Having a rebellious heart, man hears but does not understand, sees but does not perceive (Isa. 6:9). Therefore, in a faithless generation God "hides his face," leaving men in despair about his absence from their world (Deut. 31:16-18) or about the "strange work" of judgment which he performs (Isa. 28:21). In the circle of faith men wait and hope for the time when he will show his face again to Israel (Isa. 8:17; 40:27; Jer. 14:7-9). It is perhaps against this background that we should understand the eschatological promise that the "pure in heart" shall see God (Matt. 5:8).

2. The unknown Lord of mankind. In the OT no limitations are placed on the sovereignty of the God of Israel. With increasing clarity and profundity men came to realize that the God who had revealed himself in their historical experience was actually the Creator and Lord of all mankind. His name is glorious in all the earth (Ps. 8:1—H 8:2), and powerful among the nations (Jer. 10:6-7). The question arises, then, as to whether the OT provides a basis for a conception of general revelation as distinct from God's special revelation to Israel.

The OT does not face this question as directly as does the NT (cf. John 1:1-18; Rom. 1:18-25). Although the J and P stories found in Gen. 1–11 testify that man as man (rather than man as an Israelite) may know God, the central concern of these narrators is to testify out of Israel's historical experience how God has chosen to reveal himself in order that all men may know him. These passages are written in the light of God's personal revelation to Israel, and they are firmly anchored to Israel's sacred history as a kind of historical prologue to the call of Abraham and the later revelation in the Mosaic period.

Nature, like the handiwork of an artist, proclaims the power and majesty of God and the creaturely status of man (Job 12:7-9; 38–41; Pss. 8; 19:1-6; 29; 104; Jer. 5:22). But it is doubtful whether the so-called nature psalms mean to say that nature reveals God clearly to all reasonable men. Addison's well-known hymn derives from the Nineteenth Psalm the notion that "reason's ear" can hear the music of the spheres, and that the order and beauty of nature testify to the hand of the divine Maker. But this interpretation is possible only when the psalmist's testimony is taken out of its true context. Israel knew that "nature" does not in itself clearly and unambiguously reveal God but deludes men into worshiping the nature gods of storm and fertility (cf. Rom. 1:21-25). The God of Israel spoke in the accents of historical events and demonstrated his power to use the forces of nature to bless or judge his people and to accomplish his historical purpose (see SIGNS AND WONDERS). Only from the standpoint of this historical revelation could Israel affirm that the Lord of Israel's history is actually the Creator of the ends of the earth and that to the ear of faith the heavens sing an inaudible anthem of praise to God.

If, then, God's primary sphere of revelation, according to the OT, is history rather than nature, the question arises as to whether he reveals himself in the histories of other peoples. At first Israel's faith was not primarily concerned with the broad question of the place of the nations in the divine purpose (see § E3 below), but rested upon the confessional recital of what God had done for Israel (see the old cultic credo in Deut. 26:5-10). Only with the broadening of Israel's historical horizons was it realized that the God of Israel is the Sovereign and Savior of the nations. The Yahwist, writing in the time of the early monarchy, understands the call of Israel (Gen. 12:1-3) within the context of an all-embracing divine sovereignty (see J). Amos insists that Israel's God had not only brought up Israel from Egypt, but also the Philistines and the Syrians from their places of origin (Amos 9:7). But although this prophet insists that God's activity was not confined to Israel, it is doubtful whether he meant to say that God (Yahweh) had actually made himself known to these nations in their historical experience. Instead, he insists strongly that Yahweh had known (i.e., entered into personal relationship with) Israel only (3:2; cf. 2:9-11), and that, since Israel could not plead ignorance of his historical revelation, as could other nations, a great burden of responsibility was placed upon this people. Second Isaiah perceived in the events of his time the activity of God, who was leading Israel back to her homeland and revealing his glory to all flesh (Isa. 40:5). But even this prophet, whose historical horizons are most spacious, understands that divine revelation is mediated to the nations through Israel. In 45:15 the nations apparently confess that the God who hides himself from them in a veil of mystery has revealed himself in what he is doing for Israel and that the meaning of all human history is bound up with Israel's unique history. Other OT passages indicate that God reveals himself to the nations primarily through his dealings with Israel (Exod. 7:5; Deut. 4:6-8; 29:22-28—H 29:21-27; Isa. 52:7-10; Jer. 33:9; Ezek. 37:27-28; 38:16, 23). The goal of history, it is said, will be realized when the nations go up to Jerusalem in order that they may learn the Torah of the God of Israel, and thus know him as he has revealed himself to Israel (Isa. 2:2-4; Mic. 4:1-4). Then they will know his name—i.e., they will know who is truly God (Ps. 79:6; Jer. 10:25).

3. The God of Israel. Thus the OT testifies that the revelation of God is bound up inextricably with a special history—the history of the people Israel. This conviction is underscored by the theological significance of the special name of God, Yahweh, the introduction of which in the Mosaic period marked a radically new beginning. From the pre-Mosaic period Israel inherited many religious conceptions which once belonged in the context of polytheistic nature religion. But these views were purged and transformed by being brought into the context of Israel's historical faith. Ancient divine names were given a new meaning by being identified with the one special name, Yahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF.

The name of God signifies the personal relationship between God and his people. Yahweh is the God of Israel, and Israel is the people of God. This twofold affirmation, which is expressed in the oldest poem of any length in the OT, the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:3, 5, 11, 13), is the persistent motif of Israel's faith. The God whose sovereignty is hidden in nature and in general human experience had graciously revealed himself personally and concretely to one people, binding them to himself in a special relationship. The covenant formula: "I will be your God, and you shall be my people" (cf. Exod. 6:7; Jer. 31:33; Ezek. 37:27; Hos. 2:23—H 2:25; cf. Isa. 40:1: "my people . . . your God"), is the axis of Israel's life and thought.

In a profound sense, the doctrine of Israel's ELECTION lies at the heart of Israel's faith. Admittedly, throughout the generations it was open to popular misunderstanding and nationalistic distortion. The people were prone to believe that Yahweh was merely a national god, like Chemosh of Moab (Judg. 11:24; cf. II Kings 3:27 and the Moabite Stone), whose sovereignty was contingent upon the fortunes of Israel and who could be mobilized to serve national interests. Against this view the prophets raised a mighty protest. They insisted that Israel belonged to Yahweh, not vice versa. He had laid his personal claim upon them by his mighty and benevolent deeds, and had called them to fulfil their historical and social responsibility within his purpose. Far from being tied to his people, Yahweh could cast them off and, in so doing, could demonstrate his sovereignty. Why Yahweh chose to set his affection upon Israel is left unexplained. Certainly it is not accounted for in the OT by saying that Israel was religiously or culturally superior to other peoples (cf. Deut. 7:7-10). In Israel's deepest moments of faith, the consciousness of election was not the occasion for boasting, but for wonder, gratitude, and faith. Election, like revelation, stresses God's initiative in making himself known within the history of a particular people.

The meaning of Yahweh's choice of Israel is expressed by means of an analogy drawn from political experience, that of the covenant. It has been suggested that the covenant form was influenced by suzerainty treaties of the ancient Near East as known, e.g., among the Hittites. On the basis of his benevolent deeds, the suzerain establishes a covenant with his vassal, promising him protection and security. And the vassal, grateful for his sovereign's benevolence, promises obedience to the stipulations of the suzerainty treaty. Analogously, the covenant with Israel is a covenant of grace. The story of the covenant making (Exod. 19–24) is preceded by the story of what Yahweh had done for his people by delivering them from the pharaoh's yoke (Exod. 1–15). Even the concise summary of Israel's covenant responsibilities found in the Decalogue is preceded by a historical prologue which proclaims Yahweh's mighty act of deliverance (Exod. 20:2). Thus Israel's legal responsibility was motivated by gratitude for what Yahweh, their Lord, had done on their behalf (Exod. 19:3-6). Israel's ancient kerygma or proclamation of Yahweh's saving deeds, found in an old cultic credo now embedded in the book of Deuteronomy (26:5-10; cf. Josh. 24:1-13), became the theological nucleus around which the traditions of the Pentateuch were organized. See J.

The covenant, being a term of relationship, provides the basis for the knowledge of God to which the OT bears witness. Primarily this is not intellectual knowledge, for God is not an idea of the mind or an object in man's world. Rather, it is personal knowledge given within an I-and-Thou relation. Yahweh has "known" Israel, says Amos (3:2). Here the verb "know" (ידע) signifies Yahweh's redemptive choice of Israel as manifested in the Exodus and other events of Israel's history (cf. Amos 2:9-10). It expresses the meaning of the verb "choose" (בחר) or, in a more general sense, the meaning of the covenant relationship initiated by God. Israel, in turn, knows God by name. This knowledge of God, as Hosea emphasizes, involves trust, loyalty, and faithfulness—in other words, everything implied in Israel's covenant responsibility (Hos. 4:1, 6). The prophets deal with the problem of Israel's broken relationship with God, and they look beyond the present to the time when, in the relationship of a new covenant, men will "know" Yahweh in true faithfulness (Jer. 31:31-34; Hos. 2:14-23—H 2:16-25).

C. THE PRESENCE OF YAHWEH WITH HIS PEOPLE. Israel's history, as we have seen, is primarily covenant history—i.e., it is a history with Yahweh. To tell the story adequately, one would have to review the whole pilgrimage of Israel, beginning especially with the Exodus, and to study the various ways in which prophets, priests, and narrators interpreted the divine action in the unfolding sacred history.

Throughout the years, when the ancient tradition was being reinterpreted and supplemented with new insights into God's continuing activity, one conviction remained constant. It is summed up in the affirmation: "Yahweh is with us" (Isa. 7:14; Hos. 11:9; Amos 5:14; cf. Joel 2:27; Zech. 8:23). In manifold ways the OT bears witness to the belief in the real presence of Yahweh in the midst of his people. He "comes down" to rescue his people from Egyptian oppression and to summon Moses as a leader; he appears in a storm at the Battle of Megiddo to continue his "righteous acts" (RSV "triumphs") on behalf of his embattled people (Judg. 5:11; cf. Mic. 6:5); he promises Joshua that he will go with him during the invasion of Canaan (Josh. 1:9); he performs the SIGNS AND WONDERS which give assurance that he is immediately present. According to Israel, Yahweh is not removed from the historical world. He is here—not as a mystical presence, but as the Leader who goes before his people and teaches them the way wherein they should walk. "For what great nation is there that has a god so near to it as the LORD our God is to us, whenever we call upon him?" (Deut. 4:7.)

1. Theophanies. The sense of the immediate nearness of Yahweh finds expression in various theophanies (see THEOPHANY). Chief of these is the theophany associated with the giving of the law at Sinai (Exod. 19; 20:18-22). The traditional storm imagery (earthquake, wind, and fire; cf. I Kings 19:11-12) serves to emphasize the holiness and majesty of Yahweh's appearing, a theme which is recapitulated in the Deuteronomic address (Deut. 4:11-14). The nearness of God excites the greatest wonder and dread, for in the time of his visitation men realize that he is the holy God who comes from another sphere and whose presence poses a threat to man's ordinary world (see § D1 below). When he draws near, men realize that he is not just a God at hand, who can be localized and confined, but he is a God afar off (Jer. 23:23) whose judgments cannot be escaped by anyone (Ps. 139; Amos 9:1-4).

Thus Israel's faith expresses a religious polarity: on the one hand, Yahweh is above and beyond man's historical world of time and space; and on the other, he visits men and makes his personal presence known. Some circles, like the priestly school that produced Gen. 1, emphasize the transcendence and separation of God from his world, while others, like the Yahwist, stress—sometimes with naïve anthropomorphism—his immediate presence and direct appearance to individuals. In Israel's faith, however, these two emphases are not contradictory or mutually exclusive, but both are experiential elements in man's knowledge of God.

2. Concrete manifestations of God's presence. Yahweh's presence with his people during their historical pilgrimage was, so to speak, objectified or given concrete expression in various traditional ways.

a. Ark and tent of meeting. Early traditions gathered around the ARK OF THE COVENANT, a wooden chest which apparently was regarded as the throne on which Yahweh was seated invisibly "above the cherubim" (I Sam. 4:4; II Kings 19:15). As long as the ark was in Israel's camp, the people had an objective, visible sign of Yahweh's presence in their midst (cf. I Sam. 4:3-9). Enthroned upon the ark, he acted as their guide during the wilderness wandering (Num. 10:33), their protagonist in warfare (Num. 10:35-36), and their ever-present leader during the invasion of Canaan (Josh. 3–6). When the ark was captured during the Philistine wars, this was a dismal crisis, for it was believed that "the glory has departed from Israel" (I Sam. 4:21-22); and when it was brought by David to Jerusalem, the occasion was one of ecstatic rejoicing (I Sam. 6:13, 19; II Sam. 6; cf. I Sam. 6:13).

According to a different type of tradition, Yahweh came down from heaven now and then in a cloud to the tent of meeting (see TABERNACLE) in order to meet Moses and to speak with him "face to face, as a man speaks to his friend" (Exod. 33:7-11; cf. Num. 11:16, 24-26; 12:4; Deut. 31:14-15). Thus the portable tent shrine was a place of rendezvous perhaps for tribal assembly but primarily for revelation to Moses. While the ark signified God's abiding presence, the tent symbolized his holy distance from his people (Exod. 33:7). Priestly tradition combines both views by saying that the ark was housed in the tabernacle.

b. The angel of Yahweh. The notion that Yahweh is surrounded by a council of heavenly beings who do his bidding (see HOSTS) is found throughout the OT. In the late OT period this view developed into an elaborate angelology (see ANGEL). In the early tradition, however, the expression מלאך (lit., "messenger") did not necessarily mean a heavenly intermediary between God and man, for Israel's faith found expression in the conviction that Yahweh himself was actively present in the world. Of particular interest are a number of passages which identify the messenger with Yahweh himself. The narrator speaks alternately of the angel and of Yahweh (Gen. 21:17; 22:11, 15-16; 31:11-13; Exod. 3:2-5; Judg. 6:11-24; etc.), and in one instance affirms that Yahweh's name or very self (see GOD, NAMES OF, § A) is in the guiding angel (Exod. 23:20-21). In these cases the angel is the form of Yahweh's appearance in a specific situation. He appears in human guise, but not in a genuine incarnation. In this way the tradition attempts to express both Yahweh's heavenly lordship and his personal presence in the world.

c. The face of Yahweh. The ultimate background of the conception of God's FACE is the practice of beholding the statue of a deity in the temple. Although Israelite religion strictly prohibited such images, the expression "to see the face of God" came to mean in a general sense appearing at the sanctuary or having communion with God (Exod. 23:15, 17; 34:20, 23-24; Pss. 24:6; 42:2—H 42:3; Isa. 1:12). In a further metaphorical refinement Yahweh's face signified his gracious help and presence (Pss. 11:7; 17:15). But in one interesting passage (Exod. 33:14-15), Moses is promised that Yahweh's face (RSV "presence") will accompany the people in their wilderness sojourn; this promise is perhaps to be associated with the ark (cf. Num. 10:33). Though Yahweh's heavenly lordship is maintained, his face or presence leads and saves his people (cf. Deut. 4:37; Isa. 63:9).

d. The glory of Yahweh. In priestly circles the GLORY of Yahweh is a characteristic theme. Yahweh's glory (כבוד) is not only his honor and majesty as disclosed particularly in his mighty deeds and kingly rule (Ps. 29:9; Isa. 6:3; 42:8; Ezek. 28:22); it is, especially in Ezekiel and P, a fiery envelope of light which shields him from sight when he appears in the world (Exod. 24:15-17; Ezek. 1; cf. Ps. 97). Yahweh's glory settles down over the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34-38) or fills the Jerusalem temple (I Kings 8:10-11; Ezek. 8:4; 9:3; 10:4, 18-19; 43:1-5), thus assuring Israel that God truly makes himself present to his people.

e. The name of Yahweh. In Deuteronomic circles the ancient notion of Yahweh's enthronement upon the ark was replaced by the theology of the name. Yahweh himself dwells in heaven, but he causes his name to dwell in his sanctuary (Deut. 12:5, 11, 21; 14:23-24; 26:2; I Kings 11:36; 14:21; etc.). Since, according to ancient psychology, the name was the bearer of a person's self, this was tantamount to saying that Yahweh himself, without being localized or limited to a particular space, was truly present with his people. See GOD, NAMES OF, § A.

3. Word, Spirit, Wisdom. The revelation of God in the world is expressed in other ways which came to have more decisive theological significance. Yahweh acts in the world through his WORD. In ancient psychology, the spoken word was not a mere disturbance of sound waves: it was an outgoing expression of the person of the speaker, a kind of extension of his self. Thus the "word of the Lord" came to the prophets with the authority and power of Yahweh himself. Yahweh's word is powerful in history, to destroy and to build (Jer. 1:9-10). When Yahweh speaks, his word does not return empty, but accomplishes the purpose for which he sent it forth (Isa. 55:10-11; cf. 45:23). His word stands forever (Isa. 40:8). Moreover, God's word is not only the expression of his personal presence in the world, bringing judgment and salvation to the people (Pss. 107:20; 130:5; Isa. 5:24), it is also the agency of his creation (as in the P creation story in Gen. 1; cf. Ps. 33:6; John 1:1-5), and of his continuing providential activity (Ps. 147:12-20).

The SPIRIT is not identical with God but is the agency of his historical activity in the world. The Hebrew word רוח also means "wind," and suggests the idea of power, movement, activity. The divine רוח empowers men to perform the tasks to which God calls them, whether the charismatic heroes of old (Judg. 6:34; 14:6, 19), the prophets (Num. 11:24-29; I Sam. 10:10; Mic. 3:8; cf. Joel 2:28—H 3:1), the messianic king (Isa. 11:2), or the Servant of the Lord (Isa. 42:1; cf. 61:1). Yahweh's holy Spirit has been the saving power within Israel's history from the first (Isa. 63:11), it is the sign of his presence from which no man can escape (Ps. 139:7; cf. 51:11—H 51:13), and it is the dynamic which moves history toward the goal of a new age and a new creation (Isa. 44:3; Ezek. 36:26-27; 37; Joel 2:28—H 3:1).

WISDOM has its major source in the ancient traditions of the East. By the time of Jeremiah, however, it was recognized that the sage, along with the prophet and the priest, was an agent of Yahweh (Jer. 18:18). Israel's sages came to emphasize the cosmic status of wisdom, and to personify it as the agent of God's creation and the providential ordering of the world (Job 28; Prov. 8:22-31). In the period of late Judaism, it was identified with the Torah (Ecclus. 24). Thus, by being related to the revealing word and action of Yahweh in Israel's history, it provided a preparation for the NT doctrine of the incarnate Logos (John 1).

In all these ways Israel's faith attempts to reckon with Yahweh's heavenly lordship and his active presence in the world. The OT stands opposed to any religious or philosophical view which excludes the involvement of deity in the change and contingency of earthly affairs. Since the earth is the Lord's (Ps. 24:1), it is the historical stage on which he visits men, acts to accomplish his purpose, and makes known his holy presence. Although the OT has no systematic formation in philosophical terms equivalent to transcendence and immanence, the central conviction of Israel's faith is that the eternal, supramundane God enters into and acts in the temporal sphere of human existence.

4. Anthropomorphism. As we have seen in the above discussion, Israel's faith in various ways sought to avoid the extremes of either removing God from the world into a heavenly sphere, or making him so much a part of the world that his deity is limited. The latter extreme provided a great temptation to Israel, for other religions, such as that of Egypt, boldly portrayed deities in human and animal form and advocated image-worship. Thus the gods were not only humanized, but animalized and materialized. Israel's faith, however, raised a strict prohibition against making any material, graven image of Yahweh or conceiving him in the likeness of anything in the realm of creation (Exod. 20:4). Deuteronomic tradition amplified the second commandment of the Decalogue by saying that at Sinai the people heard only Yahweh's voice, but saw no form (Deut. 4:12, 15-18), even though he spoke with them "face to face" (5:4). That Yahweh cannot be likened to anyone or anthing, but is incomparable in majesty, wisdom, and power, is the proclamation of Second Isaiah (Isa. 40:12-26; see § D6 below).

Despite these protests, the doctrine of the spirituality of God has no place in the OT. The one apparent exception is Isa. 31:3:

> The Egyptians are men, and not God;
> and their horses are flesh, and not spirit.

Even here, however, the issue is not the spirituality of God in opposition to anything material, but that of his vitality as opposed to the creaturely weakness upon which an alliance with Egypt rests (cf. vs. 1). Yahweh is not pure spirit, for his Spirit, like his Word, is the agency of his activity (see § C3 above). He is invisible and incomparable; he is exalted above all that is earthly; but Israel's theological thinking does not allow speaking of him in the abstract. With characteristic concreteness and historical interest, Israel speaks of Yahweh in highly personal terms, attributing to him human form (anthropomorphism) and human feelings (anthropopathism).

It is true that some parts of the OT are more naïvely anthropomorphic than others. The Yahwist, e.g., delights in bold anthropomorphisms: Yahweh walks in the garden of Eden, closes the door of the ark, smells the fragrance of Noah's sacrifice, comes down from heaven to see what men are doing at the tower of Babel, clogs the wheels of the Egyptian chariots, chases Moses in the wilderness, etc. Doubtless many of these features were inherited from the ancient popular tradition which the Yahwist received and incorporated into his over-all scheme of historical interpretation (see J). In any case, this picturesque language—e.g., in Gen. 2–3—is infused with a sense of divine sovereignty which far exceeds human limitations. The Elohist tends to avoid bold anthropomorphism by putting Yahweh (or Elohim) in touch with men through dreams and visions (Gen. 15:1; 20:3, 6; 28:12; Num. 12:6) or through angelic visitors (Gen. 21:17; 22:11, 15). This theological reserve undoubtedly is motivated in part by the attempt to place Moses in a special class; for "with him I speak mouth to mouth, clearly, and not in dark speech; and he beholds the form of Yahweh" (Num. 12:6-8; cf. Deut. 34:10). In priestly circles, out of which came the P material of the Pentateuch and the Chronicler's history, there is a more consistent and self-conscious effort to stress the unapproachable majesty and transcendence of God. In the P creation story, e.g. (Gen. 1), Creation is accomplished solely by the Word of the God who is absolutely holy and sovereign. But not even the priestly theologians could escape anthropomorphism, as indicated in the conception of God ruling as King over his heavenly council (Gen. 1:26; see HOSTS) and the notion of man's being made in God's image (5:1-3; see IMAGE OF GOD). Ezekiel, a priestly prophet, cautiously described the appearance of Yahweh—veiled within the blinding radiance of his glory—as a "likeness as it were of a human form" (Ezek. 1:26-28; cf. 8:2; Dan. 7:9-10).

To some degree or other, then, anthropomorphism appears in all circles and periods of OT tradition. Many anthropomorphisms undoubtedly have only a metaphorical meaning—e.g., the references to God's hands, ears, mouth, eyes, finger, feet, etc. But something more than metaphor is involved; for the OT, without engaging in metaphysical speculation, unhesitantly and consistently views Yahweh as a distinct person. (He is always spoken of as a man; but sexual characteristics are excluded, for he has no female counterpart.) Admittedly this concrete, human language is qualified, for

> God is not man, that he should lie, > or a son of man, that he should repent > (Num. 23:19; cf. I Sam. 15:29; > Mal. 3:6)—

i.e., he is faithful to his word and brings it to pass. Since he is God and not man (Hos. 11:9), his thoughts and ways surpass human understanding (Isa. 55:8-9). Nevertheless, anthropomorphism is indigenous to a faith which views God in terms of historical actions and relationships rather than in terms of natural power or impersonal being. Indeed, Israel broke with the theriomorphism (representation of deity in animal form) of ancient religion and insisted that language drawn from personal relationships was most adequate for expressing faith in Yahweh. To him are ascribed the characteristics of personality: wisdom, will, purpose, love, anger, anguish, patience, hatred, jealousy, joy, etc. His covenant relationship with his people is described in images drawn from political life (king, judge, shepherd) or from family life (father, husband, kinsman; see GOD, NAMES OF, § D2). According to Second Isaiah, Yahweh is Israel's Redeemer; this term is derived from ancient family law, in which the kinsman had the obligation to vindicate the right of another member of the family (Isa. 41:14; 44:24; 47:4; cf. Job 19:25). See REDEEM.

In the OT anthropomorphism finds its finest expression in Hosea's description of Yahweh's heartbroken fatherly anguish over his prodigal son Israel (Hos. 11) or in the portrayal of the compassionate longing of a husband to be reconciled with his fickle wife (chs. 1–3). And this is an anticipation of the supreme anthropomorphism of the Christian faith, which declares that God has revealed himself in the form of a person (John 1; Phil. 2:1-11). Any attempt to depersonalize God would be a violation of the biblical message, which, with various accents, affirms that he is the divine Thou who enters into fellowship with man and deals with him personally in the affairs of his history.

D. THE TRAITS OF YAHWEH. The OT does not purport to give information about what God is in himself, for the central concern is God's relation to man and man's relation to God—in a word, the covenant. A Jewish philosopher has observed that the Bible is not man's theology, but God's anthropology —i.e., instead of dealing with the nature of God (his attributes or being-in-himself), it enables man to know himself and what is required of him in the light of God's dealings. Nevertheless, just as the self, in its relation with other persons, discloses certain traits or characteristics, so God's relations with his people provide the basis for theological understanding of who God is and of his character as known within the covenant.

1. Holiness. The experience of the holy (see HOLINESS) was not peculiar to Israel's faith, but was deeply rooted in ancient religion. The holy is the numinous, the wholly other, not just in the sense of an overwhelming mystery that evokes awe but in the sense of divine power, impersonal and amoral in character, which threatens man's existence and excites dread. What is holy (persons, objects, places) must be carefully quarantined from the ordinary, profane sphere, lest its power break forth and destroy men (cf. Exod. 19:12, 21-23).

Ancient taboo conceptions clung to Sinai-Horeb, the ark (II Sam. 6:6-10), cultic vessels (Num. 16:36-40—H 17:1-5), the altar (Exod. 29:37), laws regarding what was clean or unclean, and mixture of seeds (Deut. 22:9). It was even supposed that holiness, like a contagion, could be transferred (Lev. 6:18, 27—H 6:11, 20; Ezek. 44:19; Hag. 2:12-13). Holiness, then, is fundamentally a mysterious energy which fills men with fear, rather than confidence, precisely because it is otherworldly—i.e., beyond anything known or conceivable in the ordinary world. The ancient cultus was based upon the necessity of separating the holy realm from the profane in order that, by the observance of the proper rites, man might be able to deal with and even control the holy.

In Israel's experience, however, the holy was identified with the dynamic will of Yahweh. He is preeminently the "holy God" (Josh. 24:19), whose sovereign will arouses fear and reverence, and at times he seems even to have a demonic aspect (Exod. 4:24-26). Ancient popular conception persisted, but no longer was holiness regarded as an impersonal force which could arbitrarily destroy or bless men. It is Yahweh, the divine Thou, who is holy (Isa. 8: 12-13). Especially when contemplating his marvelous acts in history, men think of him as the God who is terrible (נורא; Deut. 7:21; 10:17; Ps. 76:12—H 76: 13).

> Who is like thee, majestic in holiness, > terrible in glorious deeds, doing wonders?
> (Exod. 15:11.)

See FEAR.

In priestly theology, holiness is the essential deity of God, which distinguishes him infinitely from creaturely and sinful man, making it necessary for cultic propriety, lest one offend the divine majesty (Lev. 10:1-3; Num. 1:48-53; 16). But it is also emphasized that God, through his act of revelation, has made Israel holy by separating her unto himself from the nations (cf. Exod. 19:6) and by establishing the cultus to sanctify the people. Israel's holiness, then, is based on her relation to the Holy God, rather than on any intrinsic qualities of her life. Not only does Yahweh claim a people for himself; he also claims objects, institutions, seasons, places, and special persons for himself, thus making them holy. Yahweh's sovereignty over Israel infuses things and relationships with holiness. Indeed, the meaning of Israel's cultus is expressed in the formula: "You shall be holy; for I Yahweh your God am holy" (Lev. 19:2).

The ethical dimension of holiness, to which the Holiness Code (Lev. 17–26) attests more than much priestly teaching, was given special prominence by the prophets, sometimes with such radical fervor that apparently the whole existing cultus stood under condemnation. Access to God is not on the basis of cultic performance, but on the basis of concern for the social responsibilities of the covenant community (Isa. 1:12-17; Jer. 7; Amos 5:21-24; Hos. 6:6). Both Isaiah and Second Isaiah call Yahweh the "Holy One of Israel" (Isa. 1:4; 5:19, 24; 10:17; 40:25; 41: 14, 20; etc.). For Isaiah, holiness is not just the measure of the infinite gulf between the sublimity of God and the creatureliness of man; it is the awesome contrast between God's purity and man's sin (Isa. 6:1-5; cf. Pss. 15; 24:3-6; Hab. 1:12-13). For

> Yahweh of hosts is exalted in justice,
> and the Holy God shows himself holy in righteousness
> (Isa. 5:16).

Thus holiness is the divine power which breaks forth in wrath (see § D4 below) against Israel like a consuming fire (10:17), threatening the future of Israel. Yet the prophet knows, out of his own experience of the purging fire of forgiveness (6:6-7), that the divine purpose is to cleanse and refine in order that Israel may become a holy people (1:24-26).

Yahweh's activity in history is a manifestation of his holiness (Ezek. 20:41; 28:22, 25). The remembrance of Yahweh's mighty deed at the time of the Exodus prompts a poet to exclaim that he is "majestic in holiness" (Exod. 15:11). Confidence in his power to deliver leads Israel to say that "there is none holy like Yahweh" (I Sam. 2:2). In the last analysis, the holiness which distinguishes the divine from the human is manifest in God's power to deliver, a gracious power which surpasses all human strength and understanding. This is the thought that stirs Second Isaiah to poetic praise. Israel's God, incomparable in majesty and power (Isa. 40:25; 45:9-13), manifests his holiness in the redemption of Israel and the world (Isa. 41:14, 20; 43:3, 14-15; 47:4).

2. Jealousy. Yahweh's holiness and his JEALOUSY are so closely related that the latter is only the expression of the former (Josh. 24:19). Israel's God is known characteristically as the "jealous God" (Exod. 20:5; 34:14). The Hebrew word קנאה can be translated both by "jealousy" and by "zeal" (note the use of the word in Isa. 9:7—H 9:6). It is significant that the two words used in English translation are derived from the same Greek root. The term refers to the ardor with which Yahweh maintains his sovereignty and upholds the covenant welfare of his people.

Divine jealousy is frequently associated with the first commandment of the Decalogue. Yahweh wills to be Lord alone; the covenant requires that for Israel there shall be no other God. Any deviation from this central loyalty in order to serve "other gods" is a violation of Yahweh's holiness, in consequence of which his zeal breaks forth to punish the offenders (Exod. 34:12-16; Deut. 4:23-24; 6:14-15; Josh. 24:19-20). Thus jealousy or zeal overlaps in meaning with wrath, both being expressions of divine holiness (Deut. 32:16).

Like other traits of Yahweh to be considered below, "jealousy" is an analogical term based on human personality (see § C4 above). In the most intensively personal terms it expresses Yahweh's dealings with Israel. Israel did not have to reckon with an impersonal force or a vague numinous reality, but with the energetic, personal will of the God who had revealed himself in her history by benevolent deeds. He had set his affection upon Israel, and, in grateful response, Israel was under the obligation to serve him with heart, soul, and strength. His jealousy was the expression of his zealous will to be Lord and to uphold the covenant, lest Israel sink into the paganism of surrounding culture. In times of crisis, when the community was being weakened from within or without, men like Elijah rose up to display a corresponding zeal for Yahweh's covenant (I Kings 19:10; cf. II Kings 10:16).

It is erroneous to suppose that jealousy is a primitive idea which was gradually sloughed off in the refinement of Israel's faith. In a time when the easy-going tolerance of other religions threatened to corrode or absorb Israel's faith, prophets insisted upon unswerving fidelity to the God of the covenant. This passionate exclusivism, based upon Yahweh's claim to be the Lord alone, was the dynamic that led from a practical monotheism in the early period to a full-blown affirmation of Yahweh's sovereignty over all history and creation. See § D6 below.

3. Beneficence. Within the covenant community Yahweh was known as the God of חסד, a word which is often translated "lovingkindness" (KJV) or "steadfast love" (RSV; see LOVE). In an old liturgical passage, found in Exod. 34:6-7 and summarized in numerous other contexts (Num. 14:18; Neh. 9:17, 31; Pss. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2), it is proclaimed that Yahweh's name or self (see GOD, NAMES OF, § A) is distinguished by this trait above all. Many voices in the OT affirm that Yahweh is worthy of the highest praise for his wonderful deeds of חסד (Pss. 17:7; 25:10; 103:17-18; 106:7, 45; 107:8, 15, 21, 31; 136; etc.).

When applied to Yahweh, חסד refers especially to his beneficent action on behalf of the weak and helpless. The God of Israel was known and worshiped as the gracious benefactor of his people. In their time of greatest distress, when they were slaves in Egypt, he intervened to deliver. The Sinai covenant, like the suzerainty treaties of the ancient world, was based on the sovereign's deeds of benevolence which evoked the people's gratitude and sense of obligation (Exod. 20:2; 24). The people pledged themselves to obedience in response to the gracious initiative and saving power of their deliverer. Because the covenant presupposes God's power on behalf of the powerless, it is understandable that in some passages of the OT חסד and "covenant" (ברית) are used in close association (Deut. 7:9, 12; I Kings 8:23; Ps. 89:28—H 89:29; Isa. 54:10).

Since Yahweh's חסד is a demonstration of marvelous beneficence, Israel confessed that only upon him could the people rely for strength and welfare. Again and again Israel, or individuals within the community, appealed to Yahweh to "show חסד" or to render assistance "according to thy חסד" (Gen. 24:12; II Sam. 2:6; I Kings 3:6-9; Ps. 51:1—H 51:3; etc.). The parallelism with such words as "faithfulness" or "truth" (Gen. 24:27; 32:10—H 32:11; Pss. 25:10; 40:10-11—H 40:11-12; 61:7—H 61:8; 85:10—H 85:11) testifies that Yahweh's power is not governed by caprice, but by a fundamental and never-failing constancy and trustworthiness. His is a love that is steadfast. Devotees of other ancient religions found it necessary to use magical, cultic means to propitiate the favor of the deity or to secure protection from an arbitrary exercise of divine power; but Yahweh's inner disposition, as manifest in his great historical deeds, was one of favor toward his people. His will, therefore, could be trusted, even when it was difficult to understand. Confident that man's times are in God's hand, the righteous man could live in dark days by faithfulness (Hab. 2:4). To be sure, Yahweh's חסד was not an indulgent affection, for his jealousy, as we have seen, demanded exclusive worship; and, though he was slow to anger, his wrath visited judgment upon the people's sins (Exod. 34:6-7). But his beneficent disposition toward his people was steady and consistent, instead of being subject to variableness or whim. Israel, therefore, could say thankfully that > his חסד endures for ever > (Pss. 100:5; 106:1; > 107:1; Jer. 33:11).

> Yahweh is good;

In doing חסד, Yahweh is not bound by a legal responsibility (although the unconditional covenant with David seems to introduce this idea; II Sam. 7:15; 22:51; I Kings 3:6); rather, the inner incentive lies hidden within his holiness and freedom. From a strictly legal point of view, the sin of Israel should have been requited with total destruction; but Yahweh's actions disclose that he is long-suffering, patient, merciful, ready to forgive. Hosea's statement:

> I am God and not man,
> the Holy One in your midst > (11:9),

is based on the conviction that Yahweh's חסד is greater and deeper than Israel's fickle infidelity. It is somewhat irrational, in that it exceeds what men have a right to expect or claim. Although Hosea's message is infused with a sense of Yahweh's holy love (see below), it is also based upon the ancient conception of חסד as a beneficent action, unilateral in character, which is directed toward one in need regardless of condition or merit. In the New Covenant, according to Hosea, Yahweh will betroth Israel to himself in חסד and mercy (Hos. 2:19-20—H 2:21-22; cf. Isa. 54:7-8; Jer. 16:5). חסד thus approaches the NT conception of χάρις or GRACE. By universalizing what was known through Israel's covenant history, psalmists affirmed that Yahweh's חסד fills the whole earth (Pss. 33:5; 36:5-6—H 36:6-7; 145:9) and that creation itself is the work of his חסד (Ps. 136:1-9).

4. Wrath and love. Just as anger and love are closely related psychologically, so theologically the two must be considered together (see WRATH OF GOD; LOVE IN THE OT). The pertinent Hebrew words refer to strong spontaneous feelings of a human personality and are used analogously to express the personal relation between Yahweh and his people. This anthropopathism must be understood within the I-and-thou relation of the covenant. See § C4 above.

The wrath of God is not a naïve way of saying that men bring inexorable disaster upon themselves when they break a system of laws or defy an impersonal fate. In the OT men are related personally to God himself, rather than to a structure of moral laws or principles. His wrath, therefore, is the energetic manifestation of his will toward his people. The human counterpart of God's wrath is the experience of guilt in consequence of a personal offense against the divine will (Ps. 51:3-4—H 51:5-6). Although this guilt may be brought to consciousness by the catastrophes of history, as prophetically interpreted, it may also be occasioned by a sense of the absence of God—i.e., the despairing realization that God is hiding his face (Deut. 31:17-18; see § B1 above) and, without intervention, is leaving men to suffer the consequences of their own folly.

Wrath is not the basic disposition of God toward his people. The tradition affirms that Yahweh is "slow to anger." With complete freedom, he can restrain his anger for the time being or can "repent" —i.e., alter his proposed action in the light of a changed human situation (Jer. 18:7-10; Amos 7:1-6). His anger is not a wild outbreak of rage, or a demonic impulse of his being; it is, rather, a temporary reaction evoked by specific violations of covenant responsibilities.

Furthermore, divine wrath, like jealousy-zeal (see above), with which it is often associated (Num. 25:11; Deut. 4:24; 6:15; Josh. 24:19-20), is directed toward upholding the welfare of the covenant community. It is, so to speak, embraced within and limited by the redemptive intention of God. The prophets believed that the contemporary sins of Israel were so grave that God in his wrath would bring upon them a terrible day of judgment; but they also perceived that this judgment had a positive meaning insofar as it was the prelude to the purification and renewal of the people. Thus Second Isaiah affirms that Yahweh's wrath was but for "a moment," while his compassion is based on "everlasting חסד" (Isa. 54:7-8). חסד is a constant, while wrath is a passing, characteristic of Yahweh's relation to his people.

Especially under the influence of Hosea, Israel came to realize that the deepest dimension of God's wrath is love. As the prophet reflects on these apparently paradoxical traits, fierce anger and ardent love seem to struggle within the mystery of the divine personality (Hos. 11). Yahweh's love is a holy love, surpassing all human understanding or analogy. Like a father's dealing with his wayward son, or like a husband's gracious dealings with his unfaithful wife, Yahweh's wrath is only the expression of a deep and holy love which ardently seeks to correct, discipline, and ultimately make possible a new relationship. Although the prophet seems unable to fathom the depth of the divine mystery in the present, he is confident that the power of Yahweh's love will triumph eschatologically. Thus the day of wrath, under whose dark shadow the prophets saw their contemporary situation, would be superseded by a time when God in love would make all things new—a vision which fires the poetic imagination of Second Isaiah (Isa. 40:2; 49:14-15).

5. Righteousness. To understand the righteousness (צדק, צדקה) of God (see RIGHTEOUSNESS IN THE OT), we must lay aside forensic notions of legal principles or ideal norms which have become associated with the English word which is used in translation. Righteousness is a characteristic of Yahweh's activity on behalf of his people, and therefore overlaps in meaning with other terms which describe his saving activity, especially חסד (Ps. 40:10—H 40:11; Hos. 2:19—H 2:21; 10:12).

In the book of Judges, the judge (שופט) is a man of action. His role is to obtain justice (משפט) for Israel in times of crisis and perhaps also, in some instances, to help individuals to receive justice in specific cases. Analogously, Yahweh is Israel's שופט, who by his power maintains the covenant community (see GOD, NAMES OF, § D3). The giving of the law at Sinai was the sign of his salvation—i.e., his upholding of the community's welfare by bringing all relationships and regulations under the governance of his personal will. Moreover, his acts in history are called his righteous (i.e., saving) deeds (Judg. 5:11; I Sam. 12:7; Ps. 103:6; Mic. 6:5).

The term "righteousness," then, has a dynamic, personal meaning within the covenant community. It is primarily a social or relational concept which presupposes, not relation to an absolute norm, but relation to another person or persons. Not all of life's relationships are the same, of course. The king stands in relation to his subject (and vice versa), a father to his son, and the sojourner in relation to native residents. If each party fulfils the requirements of a particular relationship, righteousness ensues; if not, the life of the community is impaired, it lacks welfare (שלום). Righteousness is the characteristic of one who re-establishes a man in his rightful place within the community, or vindicates and upholds the community when it is threatened by outside powers.

Israel turns to Yahweh for vindication, for righteousness belongs to him. As the prophets emphasized, Yahweh is the guardian of the social rights of the poor, the oppressed, and the legally helpless. He demands that righteousness characterize all the relationships of the community (Amos 5:24), and, when men fail, he intervenes to upset the oppressive order and set things right (cf. I Kings 21). In the Psalms we hear the voices of people who appeal to Yahweh's righteousness (Pss. 4:1—H 4:2; 143:1), confident that he can justify them—i.e., restore them to their proper place within the community (7; 10; 26; 35; 43). When the poor and the needy have no helper, they turn to him for deliverance (72:12), for he comes to judge the peoples (96:13; 98:9). And Israel relies upon Yahweh for help against her foes, for to Yahweh belongs "vengeance"—i.e., the power of vindication (Deut. 32:35-36; Isa. 34:8; 35:4). See VENGEANCE.

In a manner consistent with the meaning of the word from ancient times, Second Isaiah announces that Yahweh's righteousness is equivalent to his salvation or deliverance (Isa. 45:8, 13; 46:13; 51:5-6, 8). He is "a righteous God and a Savior" (45:21). He is the Redeemer (see REDEEM), whose task, as in family law, is to restore the justice of his people (43:1; 49:7, 26; cf. 60:16). Moreover, his saving activity, revealed in the Righteous One, the SERVANT, is not only on behalf of Israel but extends also to the nations (49:5-6). The issue of the Servant's suffering is that many are acquitted or accounted righteous. Through his life and witness the nations are restored to a new relationship to God (53:11; cf. vs. 5), and justice is established in the earth (42:4).

6. The only and unique Lord. Israel's ancient confession of faith was made in a polytheistic setting. Admittedly the religions of the Fertile Crescent, by the time of Moses, had moved far beyond primitive polydemonism toward an ordered, monarchic polytheism, and at times, as in the case of Akh-en-Aton's reform in Egypt (ca. 1370-1353 B.C.), seemed to tend toward explicit monotheism. Despite these developments, however, nature religion is basically polytheistic, for the powers of nature are manifold. Israel's faith, however, is based upon the worship of the one Lord, who is not a natural power, but whose sovereign will is revealed historically—pre-eminently in the one event, the Exodus. The question arises, then, as to whether Israel's faith unlike nature religions, was essentially monotheistic.

We have already seen that the jealousy of Yahweh, a unique doctrine in the tolerant atmosphere of polytheism, provided the dynamic which eventually embraced all of life, history, and the universe within the sovereignty of the God of Israel (see § D2 above). Since Yahweh had demonstrated his saving power by beneficently rescuing his people from Egyptian oppression, Israel was beholden to him alone. The first commandment of the Decalogue, which follows immediately upon the "good news" of Yahweh's saving deeds, is a stern reminder that Israel is to have "no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3). This commandment, which is paralleled in other ancient legislation (Exod. 22:20—H 20:19; 23:13), clearly means that within the cultic community of Israel, Yahweh wills to be the only God. He will share Israel's worship with no other god, and no idols or images of him are to be made. Unlike the gods of other peoples, he has no female partner; this fact is underscored strikingly by the absence of a word for "goddess" in the Hebrew language.

It is highly doubtful, however, whether Israel's faith in the Mosaic period should be called monotheistic in the usual sense of the word. The question about the name of God (Exod. 3:13) presupposes a polytheistic context, although, as we have seen, the disclosure of the special name, Yahweh, has deeper religious implications (see GOD, NAMES OF). The Mosaic affirmation: "There is no other God besides Yahweh," was at first a confessional declaration made by the community in thanksgiving for Yahweh's mighty deed of deliverance in the Exodus. It represents the language of worship and should not be construed as a reflective judgment that there are no other gods at all. From the very first it was realized that Yahweh is unique, in the sense that his historical power is incomparable to any other god (see Exod. 15:11).

The power of "other gods" to seduce Israel from the covenant loyalty was demonstrated from the time of the entrance into Canaan. Indeed, much of the OT, explicitly or implicitly, bears witness to the violence of the struggle waged under the banner of the first commandment of the Decalogue. In the course of time, as Israel stepped upon a larger historical stage, the implications of Yahweh's jealous claim to be the Lord of the whole of life were seen in wider and deeper perspective. During the early monarchy, perhaps in the reign of Solomon, when Israel's political and cultural horizons had vastly enlarged, a prophetic writer (designated by scholars as the Yahwist; see PENTATEUCH) interpreted the whole of human history, beginning with the Creation, as being under the sovereign control and purpose of Yahweh, the God who had revealed himself in Israel's sacred history. In the ninth century, when expansion of Phoenician culture brought the accompanying temptation to worship the Phoenician Baal-Melkart, Elijah threw down the challenge in a manner reminiscent of Joshua's "Choose this day whom you will serve" (cf. Josh. 24:15). Elijah's question: Who is God—Baal or Yahweh? was not raised abstractly, but in terms of sovereignty, of power to act. Measured by this standard, the Baal was laughed into meaningless unreality (I Kings 18:17-46). In the eighth century Amos maintained an eloquent silence about other gods, while insisting strenuously that Yahweh's sovereignty controls the affairs of nations other than Israel (Amos 1:1-2:3; 9:7). A few years later, Isaiah scorned the gods (אלהים) of the nations as worthless idols (אלילים, "nothings") in comparison with the power and majesty of Yahweh (Isa. 2:8, 18; 10:10; 19:3). And a century later Jeremiah denounced the gods as "vapor" (Jer. 2:5; 10:8; 14:22) or "no gods" (2:11; 5:7).

Beginning with the time of Jeremiah, Israel's faith seems to have become more self-consciously monotheistic. The great confession of Judaism, the Shema ("Hear, O Israel"; Deut. 6:4-9), probably dates from about the time of Josiah's reform (621 B.C.), although it surely rests on a much older religious tradition. Unfortunately, the meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain. It is possible to translate: "Yahweh, our God, is one Yahweh"—in which case the Shema affirms that Yahweh cannot be divided into several Yahweh manifestations (poly-Yahwism), like the Baals of different sanctuaries. Or we may translate: "Yahweh is our God, Yahweh alone"—in which case the Shema affirms that Yahweh is the only and the unique God. The latter interpretation is supported by other Deuteronomic passages, which affirm, on the basis of the incomparable power and majesty of Yahweh's historical revelation, that "Yahweh is God; there is no other besides him" (Deut. 4:32-39; see especially vs. 35).

Israelite monotheism comes to its finest expression in the prophecy of Second Isaiah. The downfall of the Israelite nation, far from spelling the death of Israel's God, brought the opportunity for faith to perceive Yahweh's sovereignty in the widest possible dimensions. Yahweh is God alone, unique and incomparable in wisdom, majesty, and power, the Lord of all human history and the Creator of heaven and earth (Isa. 41:28-29; 42:17; 43:10-11; 44:7-8; 45:5-6, 14-17, 21-22; 46:1-2, 8-11; etc.). It is noteworthy, however, that this prophet does not reach this conclusion along a pathway of reflective monism, but by expounding a historical monotheism. He perceives that the divine will behind and within all history is precisely that of the God who chose to reveal himself historically to Israel. The God who called Abraham from the East, who delivered his people from Egypt, who was on the verge of accomplishing a new exodus from Babylonian exile, is the sovereign who alone controls the destinies of the nations. The prophet ridicules the gods of the nations as man-made constructs because they have no power to act. They are historically dumb, for they cannot announce in advance a historical purpose and bring it to fulfilment. They are as pitifully weak as man, for they too are at the mercy of the changes and fortunes of the passing years. But Israel's God is God alone, the "first and the last," for his eternal majesty spans history from beginning to end (see GOD, NAMES OF, § D4*b*). His inexhaustible power not only supports the whole creation but is mighty to deliver Israel from despair and guilt and to bring all mankind into the sphere of his redeeming work. Second Isaiah's theology of world history requires a historical monotheism.

Thus Israel, during the period between Moses and Second Isaiah, came to a clearer and deeper awareness of Yahweh's sovereignty. But the issue of monotheism should not be overemphasized. For, defined merely in terms of intellectual belief in one God, monotheism is not the heart of Israel's faith. Job's problem, e.g., was not that of belief in one God (on this matter he could readily have agreed with his friends), but was that of his relation to God and God's relation to him. His wild protests were not silenced until, in faith, he came to know that the Sovereign of the universe spoke to him with compassion and concern. The poem of Job is a forceful reminder that biblical faith is not equivalent to a rationally unified structure of thought, such as the word "monotheism" often suggests. In the modern period reconstructions of Israel's religious history have been based too much upon the notion of an ascending intellectual development from crude levels of Mosaic faith to the heights of monotheism in Second Isaiah.

There is a vast qualitative difference between the monotheism of, e.g., Akh-en-aton of Egypt and the "practical monotheism" of the Mosaic period. As we have seen, the axis of Israel's faith, from the time of Moses on, was the covenant assurance: "I am Yahweh, your God," and the covenant claim: "You are my people." The emphasis falls, not upon Yahweh's existence, but upon his action in Israel's history. Thus the typical argument against other "gods" was that they have no meaning within Israel's sacred history—they have not been "known" by the people or their fathers (Deut. 13:1, 6-11; 28:64; Jer. 16:13; 19:4). The only God Israel knows is the God who had "known" them by bringing them out of Egypt (Deut. 13:1-5; Amos 3:2). He wills to be absolutely sovereign over their lives, and through Israel to manifest his sovereignty over the whole of human history from beginning to end. The goal of history will be realized, according to a well-known prophecy, when the nations come to Jerusalem in order that they may know the God who has spoken through Israel's sacred history (Isa. 2:1-4; Mic. 4:1-4; see § B2 above).

E. THE PURPOSE OF GOD. Modern views of history (progressive, Marxist) are profoundly indebted to the biblical understanding of the dynamic and purposeful character of what we call the human drama. Against oriental religions or philosophies which affirm that existence is illusion (maya) or which assert that history turns in ever-repeating circles after the manner of the cycles of nature, Israel's faith affirms that man's historical life is a dramatic story which presses toward the fulfilment of purpose. This teleological emphasis, however, cannot be reduced to secular terms, as though the activity of God were not essential to the story. For the basic conviction of the biblical view is that God himself is present in the historical struggle, directing the course of human affairs toward his own end.

1. Incipient eschatology. The doctrine of the eschata or "last things" (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT) was elaborated during the postexilic period into a vision of the final resolution of the historical conflict and the consummation of all things in the purpose of God. Although this doctrine, under the influence of Zoroastrian thought, found special expression in APOCALYPTICISM, its source lay far back at the very spring of Israel's faith. From the first, Israel knew Yahweh as the God who was actively leading his people into the future. Since his will was the determining factor in historical affairs, as in the contest with the pharaoh (Exod. 1-15), the conquest of Canaan (Joshua), or the battle with Canaanite forces at Megiddo (Judg. 5), history was the narration of his actions—the rehearsal of his "righteous deeds" (Judg. 5:11; RSV "triumphs"). Therefore events, as interpreted prophetically, had a holy character, for in them Yahweh disclosed his energetic zeal to be worshiped as Lord and to fulfil his purpose for Israel.

An early expression of the voluntaristic character of Yahweh's historical revelation was the theme of the divine PROMISE. This theme may have been inherited from the religion of "the fathers" in the pre-Mosaic period. In any case, it was one of the fundamental convictions which governed the exposition of the Mosaic faith in the early period of oral tradition, and eventually it came to be the leading theme of the historical epic of the Yahwist (see J). Thus in Gen. 12:1-3, Israel's sacred history opens with the call of Abraham (the ancestor and representative of the Israelite community) and Yahweh's threefold promise to him. The careers of the patriarchs, according to this view, were not an aimless seminomadic wandering, but a pilgrimage under the sign of the promise, Yahweh himself being the leader and guide. It may be that the Yahwist, writing in the dazzling light of the achievements of David and Solomon, thought that this promise was on the verge of being realized. But subsequent prophets affirmed that Yahweh intended something more for his people than the mere possession of Canaan or the prestige of being a great nation. The Day of Yahweh was not "light" (prosperity, national victory, prestige), but darkness (Amos 5:18-20); only by going through the shadowy valley of suffering and death could Yahweh's people inherit the promise which he held before them (Hos. 2:14-23—H 2:16-25).

2. God's will for Israel: community. In many ways the OT testifies that Yahweh's will is that Israel should be a "people"—not a people like the rest of the nations, but a special or peculiar people bound together by covenant loyalty to their God and to one another (Num. 23:9). "I will be their God and they will be my people"—this covenant declaration summarizes the divine intention which underlies the Israelite community and its history. For this purpose, according to the exodus tradition, he rescued them from Egyptian slavery and led them through the wilderness to the mount of the covenant (Exod. 19–24). For this purpose, he performed his "righteous acts" in the historical struggle when Israel's very existence was imperiled (Judg. 5). And for this purpose he raised up prophets to instruct them in the obligations involved in being Israel, the "people of God." The covenant implies that God wills to enter into relationship with his people and that he wills for his people to live in fellowship with him.

The prophets saw that the community was impaired by Israel's sins. Instead of remembering gratefully Yahweh's gracious deeds and living in a faithful relation to him and in a responsible relation to other members of the community (Mic. 6:1-8), the people preferred to go their own way, serving the attractive gods of the world and following the devices and desires of their hearts. Israel was not "whole" (תמים) with Yahweh (cf. Deut. 18:13); righteousness and justice were lacking (Isa. 5:1-7); and the "peace" (שלום) or welfare of the community was destroyed. Yahweh's zeal to uphold the covenant expressed itself in wrath (see § D4 above), as the pre-exilic prophets testified in the historical crises of their day. But his purpose for his people was SALVATION. He willed the restoration of the health, wholeness, and welfare of the community in order that "Not my people" might become "My people" in a new covenant relationship (Hos. 2:23—H 2:25). His saving purpose would be realized in the new covenant (Jer. 31:31-34; cf. the "covenant of peace" [Ezek. 34:25; 37:26; cf. Isa. 55:3; 61:8]) and in the new age which he would introduce (Isa. 40–55). The full implications of the doctrine of the new Israel were developed in the NT doctrine of the church. See CHURCH, IDEA OF.

The action of God, then, was directed toward RECONCILIATION. This motif was developed by priestly circles in terms of the meaning of SACRIFICE. In its deepest meaning, sacrifice was not a way to placate God and thereby change his disposition toward his people, but a means of expiation which God himself had provided in order that the health and holiness of the community might be preserved. The doctrine of sacrificial atonement reaches its high point in the OT in the portrait of the Suffering Servant, whose vicarious suffering, humiliation, and death are interpreted as God's means of reconciling his people to himself and thereby restoring them to welfare (שלום) and health (Isa. 53:5, 11).

3. The salvation of Israel and mankind. At the deepest levels of prophecy it was understood that Yahweh's saving purpose was not confined to Israel, but that it included all mankind. Indeed, God's will for man is community, for "it is not good that the man should be alone" (Gen. 2:18). Man, as God's creature, is a social being, whose selfhood is given to him in his relation to God and to his fellow man. One of the implications of the doctrine of CREATION is that God wills to enter into relationship with man, just as he wills that man should acknowledge his dependence upon his Creator. Although man in history (Gen. 4–11) attempts to live in such a way as to frustrate or deny God's intention, his restlessness and confusion testify to the truth that he cannot find true life outside community: fellowship with God and his fellow man in the bond of the covenant.

Thus the deepest insight into Israel's ELECTION or special calling is that God has chosen Israel to be the historical agent of world-wide blessing. The promise given to Abraham, according to the Yahwist (Gen. 12:1-3), includes the announcement that in Yahweh's purpose Abraham's people will be a blessing for all the families of the earth. This teaching about Israel's election is transposed into a richer key by Second Isaiah, who announces that God's redeeming activity is not confined to his people, even though it begins there, but his salvation reaches to the ends of the earth. The mysterious figure of the Servant of the Lord is the agent of God's purpose to bring light to the nations and to bring all men within the orbit of Yahweh's saving activity, which Israel had come to know through her sacred history (Isa. 42:6; 49:8; 53).

Admittedly, Israel did not always understand her calling in this universal perspective. In some eschatological literature, which is infused with nationalism, the nations are brought under such severe divine judgment that seemingly they have no place in God's purpose. But the more authentic strain of prophecy stresses that Yahweh is the saving Lord of the nations. In the last days the nations will learn peace by going to Jerusalem in order to acknowledge his sovereignty (Isa. 2:1-4). People of the nations will take hold of the robe of a Jew and ask to go with him, for "we have heard that God is with you" (Zech. 8:23; cf. 2:11—H 2:15; 14:16). The books of Ruth and Jonah were released as warnings against a narrow interpretation which limited the boundaries of the elect community. The proselytizing zeal of Judaism in the late OT period shows a recognition that Gentiles could be included within the covenant (Matt. 23:15).

Still, the OT was never able to remove completely the taint of nationalism. The messianic HOPE came to be colored with a passionate longing for the restoration of the national kingdom of David. The NT, however, draws heavily upon the message of Second Isaiah, identifying Jesus with the Suffering Servant, by whose sacrifice the doors of the kingdom have been thrown open to all men (Acts 8:26-35). The Christian faith rests upon the proclamation that God has brought Israel's sacred history to climax and fulfilment in Jesus Christ (Heb. 1:1-2), and the NT expounds the universal implications of the promise made to Abraham (Acts 3:25; Gal. 3:8).

Bibliography. G. Quell, in TWNT, vol. III (1938): "El und Elohim im AT," pp. 79-90; "Der alttestamentliche Gottesname," pp. 1056-80. W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, vols. I–III (1933, 1935, 1939). P. Heinisch, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1940). M. Burrows, An Outline of Biblical Theology (1946), ch. 3. H. W. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the OT (1946), pp. 1-159. O. J. Baab, The Theology of the OT (1949). M. Buber, The Prophetic Faith (1949). O. Procksch, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1950). H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (1950). G. E. Wright, God Who Acts: Biblical Theology as Recital, Studies in Biblical Theology, no. 8 (1952); "The Faith of Israel," IB, I (1952), 349-89. L. Köhler, OT Theology (1953). G. von Rad, Theologie des Alten Testaments, vol. I (1957). E. Jacob, Theology of the OT (1958). T. C. Vriezen, An Outline of OT Theology (1958). G. A. F. Knight, A Christian Theology of the OT (1959).

B. W. ANDERSON

GOD, NT. The NT, recognizing in the Incarnation the supreme revelation of God, concentrates on Jesus Christ, and therefore is less explicit than the OT about the great, basic characteristics of God himself. These are regarded as axiomatic and are assumed. This, however, is not for a moment to suggest that Christ is worshiped instead of God; rather, God is worshiped through Jesus Christ. Moreover, there can be culled from the NT a number of great affirmations about the unity and transcendence of God, his creatorhood, his supremacy over nature, and his revelation within it. But almost always, impersonal terms are avoided in favor of personal, and an active, dynamic conception of God pervades the NT. Most important of all, he is designated as Father. This conception, although not itself new, was evidently enormously deepened and enriched by the life and words of Jesus, and the idea of the fatherhood of God has ever since dominated Christian thinking. Not that this deepened intimacy reduces man's reverence and awe before God. On the contrary, it enhances them. The judgeship, the majesty, and the holiness of God are among the axioms of NT thought, though this, be it noted, does not alter the good news that the Judge is himself the one who takes the initiative in the work of reconciliation. The fatherhood of God, potentially universal, is an actuality in the lives of those who, in and through Christ, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, are able to cry, "Abba, Father."

The doctrine of the Trinity is not explicit in the NT, but its seeds are discernible. The fact of Christ and the experience of the Holy Spirit are already making it impossible to interpret the unity of God in terms of a "dead," undifferentiated monad. Particularly striking is the NT evidence for the conception of a God who achieves his limitless designs by a self-limitation: his omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience, are all treated, not as abstract ideas but as expressed in terms of personality—i.e., in terms which, in that sense, are limiting. Most clearly of all, God is self-limited in the Incarnation—the "scandal of particularity"—the sharp focal point to which God, submitting himself to the Cross, contracts the beam of his light, so as ultimately to diffuse it without limit. In keeping with this conception of God as essentially not less than personal and as distinct from his creation, the NT conceives of man's contact with God, not in terms of deification (apotheosis), or of mystical identification or absorption, nor even (in this life) in terms of vision, but in terms rather of personal relationship, fellowship, communion. In a word, it is summed up in "Abba! Father!"

1. Terminology of God in the NT
2. God revealed in Jesus Christ
3. Unity and transcendence
4. Impersonal terms avoided, in favor of personal
5. God as Father
   a. In the life and teaching of Jesus
   b. In the life and words of Christians
   c. Only potentially universal
   d. Linguistic data
6. Trinity
7. Self-limitation
8. Man's contact with God

Bibliography

1. Terminology of God in the NT. (ὁ) θεός (which is the commonest LXX translation for אלהים or אל) almost always in the NT denotes the one God of monotheistic faith. Of the many gods of paganism, this title is used either in the reported words of pagans, or by Christians in order to be repudiated (Acts 12:22; 14:11; 17:23; 19:26-27 [θεά, "goddess"], 37; 28:6; I Cor. 8:5; Gal. 4:8; II Thess. 2:4). In II Cor. 4:4 ("the god of this world") it means, presumably, the devil, the spirit of "worldliness"; and in Phil. 3:19 ("their god is the belly") it is used in reference to sensuality taking the place of an object of worship.

The use or nonuse of the definite article is not necessarily an index of meaning; stylistic and syntactical considerations may often be in the main determinative. Cf., e.g., II Cor. 11:11 (ὁ θεὸς οἶδεν) with I Thess. 2:5 (θεὸς μάρτυς); Rom. 8:31 (εἰ ὁ θεὸς ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν) with Rom. 8:33 (ἐκλεκτῶν θεοῦ; θεὸς ὁ δικαιῶν).

For the application of (ὁ) θεός to Christ, see CHRIST; DIVINITY OF CHRIST. Once, in John 10:34-35 (=Ps. 82:6), it is applied (at least in the NT context) to human beings.

There are several words compounded with θεός, which require here no detailed treatment: ἄθεος, "without God" (Eph. 2:12); θεοδίδακτος, "taught by God" (I Thess. 4:9); θεομαχεῖν, "fight against God" (Acts 23:9 KJV); θεομάχος, "opposing God" (Acts 5:39); θεόπνευστος, "inspired by God" (II Tim. 3:16 [see INSPIRATION AND REVELATION]); θεοσέβεια, "religion" (I Tim. 2:10); θεοσεβής, "a worshiper of God" (John 9:31); θεοστυγής, "hater of God" (Rom. 1:30 [see 5*b below*]); φιλόθεος, "lover of God" (II Tim. 3:4).

For other designations of God ("Almighty," "Lord," etc.), see especially § 3 below.

2. God revealed in Jesus Christ.

> How shall I sing that majesty
> Which angels do admire?
> Let dust in dust and silence lie;
> Sing, sing, ye heavenly choir.

Yet, if a mortal must try to find words for an infinite theme, the writer on the NT conception of God has at least this advantage: though "no one has ever seen God," yet "the only Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has made him known" (John 1:18). That is to say, the NT definition of God is to be found in Jesus Christ, who "is the image of the invisible God" (Col. 1:15; cf. II Cor. 4:4), who "reflects the glory of God and bears the very stamp of his nature" (Heb. 1:3), who is Emmanuel, God with us (Matt. 1:23). In fact, the NT makes little attempt to describe God except in terms of Christ: "He who has seen me has seen the Father" (John 14:9); and the word "Lord" (κύριος), which commonly stands in the LXX for the proper name of God, is in the NT more often applied to Jesus, except in OT quotations. (For good OT usage, outside direct quotations, however, see Luke 1:16; 2:9.)

It needs to be said at once that in no way does this emphasis on Christ as the supreme revelation of God involve the NT writers in worship of Christ instead of God; the regular formula is "God through Christ" or "in Christ" or even "and Christ" (cf. Rev. 22:13, "the Alpha and the Omega," of Christ, with 1:8, of God). Although the work of Christ is recognized as identical with the work of God himself, expressions of worship, adoration, and prayer are generally offered through him to God (Rom. 16:27; Jude 25; but contrast II Pet. 3:18); and divine blessings are usually spoken of as from God and from the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:7; II Cor. 13:14; etc.; though "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ," without further addition, often appears in farewell formulas: I Cor. 16:23, etc.).

The vision in Rev. 4 (cf. 20:11; 21:5) represents the only attempt in the NT to portray God (see THEOPHANY); and even here it is by means of hint, allusion, and symbol (cf. Isa. 6; Ezek. 1). The richest "definition" of God is as the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 15:6; cf. II Cor. 11:31; Eph. 1:3, 17; Col. 1:3; I Pet. 1:3; see JESUS CHRIST). But since the NT assumes, while modifying and enriching, the OT conception of God, see also GOD, OT VIEW OF.

3. Unity and transcendence. That God is one is alluded to as an established assumption (Mark 12:29 ff; John 17:3; Rom. 3:30; 16:27; I Cor. 8:4-6; Gal. 3:20; Eph. 4:6; I Tim. 1:17; 2:5; Jas. 2:19; Jude 25). So are his unique goodness, truth, and wisdom (Mark 10:18; Rom. 3:4; 16:27), and his supremacy and ineluctable purpose. Heaven is his throne; he is eternally to be blessed; he controls all earthly powers (Matt. 5:34; 23:22; Rom. 9:5, 14 ff; 13:1; etc.). He is recognized as Creator, exercising vigilant care over all CREATION; he dresses the flowers and feeds the birds, and not a sparrow falls without his knowledge (Matt. 6:30; 10:29; 19:4; Mark 13:19; Luke 12:24; Acts 4:24; 17:24; Rom. 1:18 ff; Eph. 3:9; I Tim. 4:3; I Pet. 4:19; Rev. 4:11). As Creator, he is expressly distinguished from his creation (Rom. 1:25), although he is also immanent in all (Eph. 4:6), and (though this is less typical of the NT) all are in him (Acts 17:28). Everything has been created by him and through him and for him (Rom. 11:36; cf. I Cor. 8:6). Ultimately, according to I Cor. 15:28, he will be (revealed to be) himself "everything" (πάντα). But so "pantheistic" a phrase, if it is to be pressed at all (which is doubtful), is at any rate reserved for the final consummation. References to the revelation of God through "nature" occur in Acts 14:17; Rom. 1:20, but are notoriously rare, the whole weight being thrown on his revelation in his dealings with man, and, most of all, in the Incarnation.

The transcendence of God is explicitly alluded to. The term common to Jews and Gentiles, "Most High," is used; and there are famous phrases such as: "the King of ages, immortal, invisible, the only God" (I Tim. 1:17); "the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality and dwells in unapproachable light, whom no man has ever seen or can see. To him be honor and eternal dominion. Amen" (I Tim. 6:15-16; cf. Rom. 1:20-23; 9:5; Rev. 4:8). The Jewish reverential periphrases for God are sometimes used (though among them is not "the Name," absolutely) —e.g.: "the Blessed," "Power" (Mark 14:61-62), "heaven" (Luke 15:18; cf. the frequent Matthean phrase "the kingdom of heaven"), "the Wisdom of God" (Luke 11:49), "the Majestic Glory" (II Pet. 1:17); and in a passive verb there may sometimes be detected the Jewish reverential avoidance of explicitly naming God as the subject of an active verb (e.g., Mark 4:11: "To you has been given" may be a circumlocution for "God has given you"). The "Almighty" (παντοκράτωρ; see LORD OF HOSTS) occurs not only in direct OT quotations but also, in Revelation, is adopted into the seer's own vocabulary, where also God is the "Alpha and the Omega, . . . who is and who was and who is to come" (Rev. 1:8, etc.; yet cf. 22:13, the "Alpha and the Omega" of Christ).

God is the one who wields absolute authority, as a potter does over his clay (Rom. 9:19 ff; cf. Matt. 10:28; Luke 12:5—or is this the devil? see AUTHORITY; PREDESTINATION); and the very conception of the KINGDOM OF GOD implies his supremacy and ultimate victory (cf. Rom. 14:11: "Every tongue shall give praise to God"). He is called Savior in Luke 1:47; I Tim. 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Tit. 1:3; 2:10; 3:4; Jude 25; and is associated with salvation (Luke 1:69 ff; 3:6 [quotation from Isa. 40]; II Thess. 2:13; Rev. 7:10; 12:10; 19:1), and with the vindication of his people (Luke 1:68; 7:16; 18:7; Rom. 8:33; 11:26 [quotation from Isa. 59]). But "Savior" (like "Lord"; see § 2 above) is more often applied to Jesus. See SALVATION.

But these affirmations of the supremacy of God are not so made that the evil rampant in the world is minimized and ignored. On the contrary, it is described in very definite, personal, demonic terms. Nor is God represented as a dictator, riding to his goal roughshod over human will. "Despotic" terms are rarely used in the NT, and then sometimes merely in a conscious slave-master metaphor (Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24; II Tim. 2:21; Rev. 6:10—all δεσπότης, though variously rendered in the RSV; this term is applied also to Jesus in II Peter and Jude). In general, God is described in terms of personality: at the very least, he is not less than personal—and personality is the highest category known to men; and in keeping with this is the very frequent reference to his GRACE, a word describing his gracious personal relationship with us. Correspondingly, his archenemy is portrayed in terms of personal disobedience—i.e., of the rejection of his grace and of reaction against perfect personality (see DEMON; SATAN). The conquest of evil by God is assured: it is no evenly balanced conflict, as in dualism, between a god of good and a god of evil (Rom. 16:20); yet neither is it achieved by subpersonal means (see Matt. 4:8-10—the temptation to Christ to use methods other than God's). It is achieved by reconciliation (II Cor. 5:19; Col. 1:20); and this means redemptive suffering. See ATONEMENT.

4. Impersonal terms avoided, in favor of personal. The NT, like the OT, tends to avoid metaphysical definitions and abstract terms. Only once is God called "the Deity" (τὸ θεῖον [Acts 17:29], in an address to a more or less philosophical audience; the term, used by Philo and Josephus, does not occur in the LXX). Only once each are abstract words for "deity" found (θειότης [Rom. 1:20]; θεότης [Col. 2:9]). Twice God is equated with what seem, at first, to be great impersonal ideas: "God is light," "God is love" (I John 1:5; 4:8). But it soon becomes clear that the words "light" and "love" are used here, as in the Fourth Gospel, not impersonally, but to denote character and activity. "God is light" means that God, being the very source of light (cf. Jas. 1:17), may be relied upon to act with absolute consistency and dazzling integrity, and that he cannot tolerate falsehood in any shape or form (I John passim; Rev. 22:15). "God is love" is expanded into: "In this the love of God was made manifest among us, that God sent his only Son into the world, so that we might live through him" (I John 4:9; cf. John 3:16); and: "We love, because he first loved us" (I John 4:19). Even the love for God, which is man's proper function (Luke 10:27, etc.), is itself God's own gift to man. Thus "God is love" is an essentially active and dynamic statement—anything but abstract or static. "God is spirit" (John 4:24) seems to mean simply that God is not material, and therefore not localized in any one shrine or tied to externals. Similarly, the frequent phrase "the glory of God," except where it describes God's glorious plan for men, or an action done "to God's honor," mostly means (in keeping with its OT antecedents): "God manifesting himself among men" (e.g., John 11:40; Acts 7:2; Rom. 6:4; Eph. 3:16; Heb. 1:3; see GLORY, OT AND NT). Thus, these apparently abstract words, "light," "love," "spirit," "glory," are no real exception to the rule that the NT doctrine of God tends to avoid impersonal terms.

Indeed, if we compare with the language of the NT the great absolutes habitually applied by religion to God, the results are striking. Any theist would agree that God, by definition, must be almighty, omnipresent, omniscient. But (as is shown in § 7 below), the NT interprets all these in the light of God's self-limitation in the Incarnation. Moreover, if God is acknowledged as inscrutable (Rom. 11:33), yet the via negativa—namely, to define God by what he is not—is, in general, alien to the NT. Generally in the NT he is described anthropomorphically. He is the God whose character is revealed in human history (e.g., Revelation passim), and, most of all, in the Incarnation. The mighty deeds of Jesus are the "finger of God" at work (Luke 11:20). Just as, to the Hebrews, he was the God who brought them up out of Egypt and made a nation of them, so, to Christians, he is the God "who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus" and made an eternal covenant with his people (Heb. 13:20; cf. Acts 3:25). God's "oath," his promise, is a recurrent theme (Acts 2:30; 7:17; 26:6; Rom. 11:29; II Cor. 1:20; Heb. 6:17). The irreversibility of God's promise, this "oath" by which scripture picturesquely describes him as binding himself, and which the Christian sees as taking shape in Christ (II Cor. 1:20—Christ the affirmation of all God's promises; see AMEN), is the basis of the Christian hope for final victory for the kingdom of God.

In keeping with this active conception of God in both Hebrew and Christian thought is the designation of him, in contrast to the dead, dumb idols, as the living God and the God who speaks—through creation, through history, and, most clearly, through Christ (Acts 14:15, 17; Rom. 1:20; I Cor. 12:2; I Thess. 1:9; I Tim. 6:17; Heb. 1:1-2). God, himself essentially alive, gives life to all (Mark 12:27; Acts 17:25; Rom. 4:17; 6:23; I Tim. 3:15). His aliveness judges whatever of death is in us: "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. 10:31). Again, in contrast to the unreality of idols (I Cor. 8:4), he is the one who is "real" or true (I John 5:20—though this is possibly of Christ; cf. John 7:28), and his reality judges all pretense, lying, and hypocrisy (I John 5:21; Rev. 22:15; etc.).

5. God as Father. a. In the life and teaching of Jesus. Jesus himself, to judge by the reflection of his teaching and attitude in the NT, gave a new depth to the conception of God as Father (see TEACHING OF JESUS). Adumbrated in the OT and extended to early Judaism, the conception itself was nothing new. Indeed, outside Judaism also, the idea was common enough, whether in polytheistic mythology (Homer's "Father Zeus") or in philosophical thought (Plato's "Maker and Father of this universe" [Timaeus 28C]). For generations the Jews, at any rate, had declared, not, indeed, that they were in some sense physically descended from God (in the manner of pagan mythology), but that, spiritually and morally and by his choice of them to be his people, he had become their Father (so John 8:41, 54). But Jesus appears not only to have been sparing with the use of designations other than "Father," but also to have exhibited, through his life as well as through his words, a new attitude of sonship. It is true that other designations are found in his reported words: Simply "God," or (in OT quotation) "the Lord your God," is fairly frequent, but never in address to God (except in the cry from Ps. 22). "Lord" (κύριος) occurs at Mark 5:19 ("how much the Lord has done for you"); 13:20 ("if the Lord had not shortened the days"); and at Matt. 11.25; Luke 10:21 ("Lord of heaven and earth," but preceded by "Father"); but otherwise only in direct quotations from the OT. "The Most High" (ὕψιστος) occurs at Luke 6:35 (otherwise only on the lips of others, including an angel and a demoniac). "Power" (Mark 14:62) and "the power of God" (Luke 22:69), at the trial of Jesus, evidently represent an ordinary Jewish circumlocution. And there is the cry from Ps. 22: "My God, my God" (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34). Further, Jesus teaches constantly about the kingdom (or kingship) of God; but he who exercises this kingly sway is referred to, not as king (except, perhaps, in Matt. 5:35—Jerusalem is the "city of the great King"; cf. Gabriel's "stand in the presence of God," as in a king's court [Luke 1:19]), but as Father.

This being said, it must not be supposed, however, that the name "Father" as used by Jesus is attested by all the gospel traditions in such frequency as it appears in Matthew and John. These (together with the Johannine letters) are the writings which have familiarized the name to Christian readers. Nonetheless, the designation "Father" on the lips of Jesus is found in all the gospel traditions—Mark, the common ground of Matthew and Luke, and the peculiarly Lukan material, as well as that peculiar to Matthew and to John; and it is clearly implied by some of the parables or analogies (e.g., Luke 15:11-32). But, more than this, the baptism of Jesus marked him as Son of God in a special sense, his experience of God as Father is reflected in his way of life, and it appears that he used a form of the Aramaic word for "Father" which contemporary Jews seldom or never applied to God. ABBA in the gospels occurs only at Mark 14:36; but since the same Aramaic word is echoed by Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6, there is no need to doubt that it is a genuine word of Jesus; and, representing a form of address to human fathers, it reflects in Jesus an unprecedented simplicity and directness of approach to God.

b. In the life and words of Christians. But did Jesus teach his disciples to share precisely the same approach to God as his own? It is sometimes said that he deliberately distinguished between his own unique closeness to the Father and their secondary relationship. But, while it is true that the NT shows no shadow of doubt as to the uniqueness of Christ's status (see CHRIST)—he "called God his Father, making himself equal with God" (John 5:18; cf. 19:7)—yet it may be questioned whether he did teach his disciples to use a different mode of address to God from that which he himself adopted. It is true that he is sometimes represented, in all three Synoptists, as speaking to the disciples of "your (thy) Father," and that he is not recorded in any of them as using "our Father" in such a way as to include himself. (For the question whether the phrase "our Father" is original even in the Lord's Prayer, see LORD'S PRAYER.) Yet the only instance of a fully explicit contrast between Christ's use for himself and his intention as to his disciples' use, seems to emphasize the transmission to them of his own intimacy: John 20:17, "my Father and your Father, . . . my God and your God," may imply that, while there is indeed a distinction, yet the disciples are to receive from the unique Son a derived sonship ("my Father who is also your Father," as though the Greek were τὸν καὶ). In any case, Paul uses precisely the same "Abba" (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6), and, incidentally, uses "my God" (Phil. 1:3; 4:19: this, not in the vocative as in Ps. 22, etc., but in reference to God, is paralleled only by John 20:17).

It is true, however, that only Jesus is represented in the NT as using the phrase "my Father" not only in vocative address but also in reference to God. This does not occur in Mark, but four times in Luke and many times in Matthew and John (cf. Rev. 2:27; 3:5, 21). Nevertheless, this does not alter the conclusion that the mission of Jesus seems to have been so to reveal and impart his sonship that—although in a most important sense unique—it might nevertheless be entered into and shared: Matt. 11:27; Luke 10:22 ("No one knows . . . who the Father is except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him"); Rom. 8:29 (he is the "firstborn among many brethren"); Heb. 2:11 ("He is not ashamed to call them brethren"). Moreover, if the "SON OF MAN" is a collective, or even a representative, concept, then the relationship is intended to be shared by the "saints of the Most High" (Dan. 7:18, etc.). It is the spirit of sonship which links Jesus and his own in the common cry "Abba." In Rev. 21:7, the famous messianic phrase from II Sam. 7:14: "I will be his father, and he shall be my son" (cf. Ps. 89:26-27), becomes, in an adapted form, a promise for anyone who conquers: "I will be his God, and he shall be my son." It must be emphasized, however, that, whatever is implied by the new intimacy given by Christ to the name Father, it is an intimacy which deepens, rather than detracts from, the sense of God's majesty. The Lord's Prayer is a model of reverence coupled with simple trust. Whether or not the characteristically, though not exclusively, Matthean phrase "heavenly Father" (or "your Father who is in heaven") is original, it well represents this combination (cf. Heb. 12:9: "the Father of spirits," contrasted with "earthly fathers"). So do the phrases "Holy Father" and "O righteous Father" of John 17:11, 25.

The HOLINESS of God is not so frequently alluded to in the NT as in the OT (see GOD, OT), but the idea is assumed as axiomatic. See II Cor. 7:1; Heb. 12:10; I Pet. 1:15 ff ("As he who called you is holy, be holy yourselves in all your conduct; since it is written, 'You shall be holy, for I am holy' [Lev. 11:44, etc.]. And if you invoke as Father him who judges each one impartially according to his deeds, conduct yourselves with fear"); Rev. 6:10; and, more particularly, Rev. 4:8, where the great "thrice holy" of the SERAPHIM in Isa. 6:3 is repeated by the four living creatures in or around the throne of God. This "thrice holy" (trishagion; ter sanctus) came to be a constant element in the Eucharistic worship of the Christian church. Once again, it may be that Christ's acceptance of the role of the Son of man implied this sense of adoration combined with intimacy toward the Almighty (Dan. 7:9, etc.).

The cry "Abba," then, is first and foremost a profession of absolute obedience, a recognition of the absolute authority of God; and this new intimacy positively deepens the sense of awe (cf. I Pet. 1:17). This is further illustrated by the content of the temptation which followed Christ's designation as "Son"; for here Jesus is tempted to abuse his sonship, and his reply is: " 'You shall not tempt the Lord your God.'. . .

> 'You shall worship the Lord your God > and him only shall you serve' " > (Matt. 4:7, 10;

cf. Luke 4:8, 12; see TEMPT; TEMPTATION OF JESUS). In short, fatherhood, as applied to God, epitomizes his sovereignty as voluntarily acknowledged, and only adds to the awe of his judgments. For he is the Judge of all (Rom. 14:10-12; Heb. 12:23; see DAY OF JUDGMENT); and his wrath (see WRATH OF GOD; FEAR) is the more terrible because it is, not anger in the commonly accepted sense, but the fierce indignation against evil and the verdict upon it of one who, as Father, himself suffers in his own judgments. There is nothing "soft" about this fatherhood; there is an astringent quality in it (Rom. 11:22: "the kindness and the severity of God").

It is not despite, but because of, this severity that he is also the God of mercy, the God of hope, of peace, of comfort, of graciousness, the Father of mercies, able to forgive (Mark 2:7; Rom. 15:5, 13, 33; 16:20; II Cor. 1:3; 7:6; 13:11; Phil. 4:7, 9; I Thess. 5:23; Heb. 13:20; I Pet. 5:10; II John 3; etc.). He cannot be "bribed" or "propitiated" (see PROPITIATION; Luke 18:13; Acts 10:4, 31, can hardly be invoked as serious evidence to the contrary); but he voluntarily accepts, as Father, the cost of reconciliation. There are very few passages in the NT where it is not clear that the estrangement between man and God is on man's side, not God's. At most, it is possible to find two or three formal exceptions to this rule. The compound θεοστυγεῖς (Rom. 1:30), though translated "haters of God" in the RSV, might mean "hated by God"; and ἐχθροί (Rom. 11:28), translated "enemies of God" in the RSV, might imply enmity on the part of God. So, too, that Jesus offered himself as a sacrifice to God (Eph. 5:2; cf. Heb. 9:14) and intercedes with God for men (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25) could be made to point in the same direction, were these passages to be read in isolation. But so constantly does the NT stress the initiative of God himself in reconciling (Rom. 5:8; II Cor. 5:19; etc.) that such an interpretation is excluded. And whatever is implied by the WRATH OF GOD it does not mean what is meant by "anger" in ordinary parlance. It is the white heat of a love which cares too much for the sinner to treat his sin as indifferent. It is a part, not a contradiction, of the love of God. We have yet to find a word which conveys, in our language, such a suffering-and-redemptive anger. This is not to ignore the problem of such apparently "vengeful" passages as Rom. 2:8-9; II Thess. 1:6-10; Revelation passim. It is only to say that they must be viewed in the light of the evidence just alluded to.

In Eph. 3:14-15 occurs the phrase "the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named." "Family" (πατριά) is not the same as "fatherhood" (πατριότης), and the ERV-ASV mg. "Gr. fatherhood" is not justified as a translation. But if the meaning is that, wherever a family (patria) is found, it derives its name from the supreme Father (Pater), the ultimate result is much the same: God is the origin of "paternity" and of family life everywhere. It may be that, in this particular passage, the meaning is even wider: that, just as Greek philosophy and Stoicism called God the Father of the universe, so here he is seen as the origin of all the "families" of beings, not only human but supra- or subhuman. But still the play on words, and the essential meaning, remain. Similarly Matt. 23:9: "Call no man your father on earth, for you have one Father, who is in heaven," points to God as the source of real fatherhood. In keeping with this, the NT sometimes uses "the Father," absolutely, in reference to God (as distinct from the vocative, in address to him), in the way which was to become familiar in the trinitarian formula. This use on the lips of Jesus himself is found in Mark 13:32 (=Matt. 24:36); otherwise only in Matt. 11:27 (=Luke 10:22); 28:19 (trinitarian formula); Luke 9:26; Acts 1:4, 7 (the risen Christ speaks); and frequently in John. Otherwise than on the lips of Jesus, it is found (with or without God) in John 1:14, 18; Acts 2:33; Rom. 6:4; I Cor. 8:6; 15:24; Gal. 1:1, 3; Eph. 2:18; 3:14; 5:20; 6:23; Phil. 2:11; Col. 1:12; 3:17; I Thess. 1:1; II Tim. 1:2; Tit. 1:4; Jas. 1:27; 3:9; I Pet. 1:2; II Pet. 1:17; I John 1:2-3; 2:1, 13, 15-16, 22-24; 3:1; 4:14; II John 3-4, 9; Jude 1.

*c. Only potentially universal. But is God, then, the Father of all mankind indiscriminately? The NT answer seems to be: Potentially, yes; in actuality, not yet (see ADOPTION; CHILDREN OF GOD). Potentially, no doubt, all men are sons of God: "For we are indeed his offspring" (Acts 17:28; cf. Luke 3:38: "Adam, the son of God"—though neither passage is typical of the NT). But they are not such actually, until they become such by adoption (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). Just as, in the OT, God is universal Creator, but is a Father in a special sense to Israel (Exod. 4:22; Jer. 31:9; Hos. 11:1; cf. John 8:41-44, 54-55), so, in the NT, "children of God" is a term for Christians, not for all men as such: "No one comes to the Father, but by me" (John 14:6). Yet, precisely because the relationship is thus defined as moral and religious, not racial or national, it has the potentiality of becoming universal. If man's response to the fatherhood of God is limited, God's redemptive seeking after man knows no bounds. It is the same principle as comes most clearly into focus in the Incarnation itself—God's unique Son, born into a particular race and family at a given date in such a way as to be God's universal and all-time salvation (see § 7 below). And perhaps it is significant in the same sense, that redemption is, in the NT, closely associated with creation, suggesting the universal scope of the one as of the other: in Jas. 1:18 there is some doubt as to which creation is intended—whether the "first" creation (of the universe), or the "new" creation (of the redeemed humanity). For the association of the two, see II Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15; Col. 1:16-20.

*d. Linguistic data. The combination of the words "God" and "Father" in the NT presents considerable variety, according to the use or omission of the definite article and of the copula: "God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," "the God and Father," etc.; and there is usually a good deal of textual variation at each occurrence. It is probably in a large measure a matter more of rhythm and of syntactical propriety than of essential meaning, although, no doubt, there is a discernible difference in force between "God who is also the Father of our Lord" and "he who is the God and Father of our Lord."

6. Trinity. In keeping with the conception of God as Father, and with the emphasis on his personality, is the discovery that his unity is not a simple, "dead," and undifferentiated unity. The love of God is the activity of Jesus (Rom. 5:8); the Son "is in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18); Father and Son are reciprocal (Matt. 11:27; Luke 10:22; John 17:21; etc.). Moreover, after the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, the HOLY SPIRIT becomes in a new way available and intelligible as the presence of God among his people through Jesus Christ and as the character of Jesus Christ within and among them (John 7:39; Acts 2:33; II Cor. 3:4-18; etc.). And thus, although a strictly trinitarian formula occurs in the NT only at Matt. 28:19 (at I John 5:7 it is notoriously an interpolation and only in a very late text), and although a doctrine of the Trinity is nowhere in the NT made explicit, the seeds of a trinitarian understanding of God are undoubtedly sown; and it is indicative of the direction in which the wind of NT thought is already blowing that there are several impressive instances of threefold (if not of technically trinitarian) expressions rising spontaneously to the lips of the Christian: I Cor. 12:4-6; II Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:4-6;

II Thess. 2:13-14; I Pet. 1:1-2. The striking and unique statement (I Cor. 15:28) that ultimately the Son shall be subject to God, who will then be "everything" (πάντα), does not, in view of the whole trend of Pauline thought, permit of interpretation as the heresy of an "economic" Trinity in later times, so as to imply that God is manifest only successively as "Son" and "Father." See TRINITY.

7. Self-limitation. One of the most striking consequences arising from the conception of God thus far outlined is his voluntary self-limitation. This has already been alluded to in general terms above (§ 4). Pursuing it a little further, it is clear now that the key to its understanding is the fatherhood of God as interpreted by and in Jesus Christ. Thus, God's omnipotence is indeed asserted and assumed (Rom. 9; Rev. 1:8; Mark 10:27; Luke 1:37); but it is delimited by such phrases as "he remains faithful—for he cannot deny himself" (II Tim. 2:13—perhaps of Christ, but equally applicable to God; cf. Tit. 1:2). God is self-limited, that is to say, by his own consistency of character. The strongest human characters are those of whom we say: "He could not lie, he could not do a mean thing." So, the faithfulness of God implies his inability to be inconsistent or faithless. Similarly, his omnipresence, less explicit in the NT than, e.g., in Ps. 139, is known to the Christian chiefly in terms of God's Holy Spirit—his essentially personal presence (I Cor. 3:16 ff; II Cor. 3:17; 6:16; Eph. 2:22), from which only sin can exclude: "He is not far from each one of us" (Acts 17:27), though the rebellious "shall suffer the punishment of . . . exclusion from the presence of the Lord" (II Thess. 1:9; cf. John 9:31: "God does not listen to sinners"). Correspondingly, too, his omniscience is expressed mostly in terms of character, personality, and active dealing with persons. Undeniably, God is the God who knows the hearts of all men (Acts 1:24; 15:8; cf. I Sam. 16:7; Luke 16:15; Rom. 2:16; I Cor. 4:5); "your Father knows what you need before you ask him" (Matt. 6:8); he "sees in secret" (Matt. 6:4, etc.); "before him no creature is hidden, but all are open and laid bare to the eyes of him with whom we have to do" (Heb. 4:13); he has no favorites (Acts 10:34; Rom. 2:11; 14:12; Gal. 2:6; Col. 3:25). And yet, in another sense, his "knowledge" is specialized: he "foreknew" his own (Rom. 8:29; cf. Eph. 1:4; see FOREKNOWLEDGE), choosing them, in Christ, with a view to bringing the whole creation within the ambit of his purpose (cf. Luke 7:30; Acts 2:23; Rom. 9:11; Eph. 2:10; etc.). See ELECTION.

The NT, in other words, constantly represents God as content to achieve his purposes by self-limitation, by specialization, by selection, by contraction in order to expand. The idea of the chosen people, familiar in the OT and continued into the NT (God is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob [Acts 3:13; 7; etc.]), is among the most obvious examples. That God should thus select might seem to contradict his impartiality, were it not for the missionary purpose for which the selection is made (a Jonah for Nineveh, a Paul for the Gentiles). The very meaning of HOLINESS is affirmed in the NT as no segregating, but as an inclusive, redemptive quality. Thus in II Cor. 6:16 the OT promise to Israel:

> I will live in them and move among them, > and I will be their God, is applied to the Christian church as a whole—Jewish and Gentile alike. And the very climax of this purpose is the Incarnation itself—a colossal reculer pour mieux sauter. In one man, of a given race, at a certain time in history, at a particular spot on this planet, the eternal Word of God became flesh. No election or specialization could be more drastic: it is what has been called the "scandal of particularity." But it is in order to save the whole world that God thus limits himself: "I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself" (John 12:32); "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (II Cor. 5:19), and he "desires all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (I Tim. 2:4). God's almighty power and wisdom express themselves most characteristically in the acceptance of what the world calls weakness or foolishness (I Cor. 1:25 ff; 3:19; cf. II Cor. 13:4).

It is probable that in Acts 20:28 the correct reading is "the Lord" (i.e., Jesus; cf. Rev. 5:9), and that the verse is wrongly interpreted to mean that God obtained the church "with his own blood." The "blood of God," startling enough in Ignatius (Eph. 1.1), is hard to credit in the NT. But, even so, a God who himself enters into the sufferings caused by sin is certainly implied (whether or not deducible from this verse) by the close association of the Father with the Son throughout NT thought. A God "who justifies the ungodly" (Rom. 4:5) and yet remains "true though every man be false" (Rom. 3:4) can only be a God who himself enters into the cost of redemption (see JUSTIFICATION). "Patripassianism," as a heresy, is the failure to distinguish Father and Son, not the affirmation that the Father suffers in the Son. The Cross is God's own act (John 13:31-32; 17:1-5), and in it he himself enters into redemptive suffering. This all means that the classic idea of God's impassibility requires to be qualified in the light of the NT. Impassibility is, in fact, never there asserted of him. The nearest approach is: "God cannot be tempted with evil" (Jas. 1:13)—and it is perhaps significant that even this is a moral, rather than a metaphysical, matter. As for a Lucretian aloofness and freedom from suffering, this is precisely what the Incarnation denies. Thus, the great absolutes of philosophical thought about God run up, in the NT, into a picture of God as perfect personality, wielding in an absolute degree those qualities which we recognize as best in human character, and which are seen, perfectly exemplified on an individual scale, in Jesus; and the apparent limitations turn out to be, after all, precisely the universalizing of God's kingly rule. It is thus, and only thus, that God will ultimately be vindicated as himself the sum of things, absolutely all-embracing (I Cor. 15:28).

8. Man's contact with God. In keeping with the biblical distinction between the Creator and his creation, the NT never presents man's true end in terms of deification (apotheosis), but rather as perfect fellowship with God. The nearest approach to the apotheosis idea anywhere in the NT is the unique phrase: "that . . . you may . . . become partakers of the divine nature" (II Pet. 1:4); and even this, it is to be noted, is in terms, not of some magical change of substance, but of character: "that . . . you may escape from the corruption that is in the world because of passion." In other words, as with Paul, so with this writer, eternal life is not an endowment independent of character, but is the realization of a true relationship with the good God. Moreover, this true relationship is so described as to safeguard the individuality of the believer. The NT offers no room for a mysticism of absorption or merging in God—loss of individuality in identification with him; it speaks rather of communion, participation, fellowship. The relationship is—to use a popular term—of the "I-thou" type, not a merging such as to lose the personality. This does not preclude terms of incorporation. Paul uses "in Christ" (ἐν χριστῷ), etc., and, though rarely, "in God" (ἐν θεῷ); and the Johannine writings freely use ἐν θεῷ (John 3:21; I John 4:16; etc.). The believer "dwells," "acts," or "is" in God. But that this is still a matter of a fully personal relationship is made clear by the fact that the condition for it is obedience: it is a conscious relationship of manhood responding to the divine love with willing obedience; and it is perfectly summed up in the sonship of Jesus. Exactly as his subordination to the Father (John 14:28; I Cor. 15:28) constitutes his unity with him (John 10:30; 14:9), so for man the right relationship is on the same pattern of filial obedience (Rom. 8:15-16). To see God is, in the OT, a terrifying, perhaps a fatal, experience (Judg. 13:22, etc.). In the NT: "No one has ever seen God; the only Son . . . has made him known" (John 1:18; cf. 14:9: "He who has seen me has seen the Father"). In any other sense, the vision of God is reserved for the future (Rev. 22:4; perhaps even Matt. 5:8). To "know" God means to respond to his "knowledge" of or approach to us (Gal. 4:8-9). The last word, as the first, is Christ himself. It is "in Christ," and by virtue of the same Spirit which dwelt in him, that the Christian is enabled, by adoption, to utter that same cry, "Abba! Father!" which epitomizes the relation on earth between the unique Son and his Father. See also ACCESS.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus (English trans., 1909); J. K. Mozley, The Doctrine of God (1928); W. R. Matthews, God in Christian Thought and Experience (1930), especially chs. 3-4; T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (1935); J. Burnaby, The Belief of Christendom (1959). See also works on the theology of the NT (e.g., F. C. Grant, R. Bultmann, E. Stauffer, P. Feine).

On "Abba," besides Kittel (TWNT) and Dalman, see: G. Kittel, Lexicographia Sacra (Theol. occasional papers; 1938), pp. 15-16; S. V. McCasland, JBL, LXXII (1953), 79 ff.

On the fatherhood of God more generally, see: F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, eds., The Beginnings of Christianity, I (1920), 401-2; H. F. D. Sparks, "The Doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood in the Gospels," in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels (1955); H. W. Montefiore, JNTS, vol. 3, no. 1 (Nov., 1956), pp. 31 ff. C. F. D. MOULE

GOD, SON OF. See SON OF GOD.

GODLESS. The translation of several pejorative terms.

1. In the OT. Commonly the word so translated is חנף, chiefly in Job (8:13; 13:16; 15:34; 17:8; 20:5; 27:8; 34:30; 36:13), but also in Prov. 11:9; Isa. 9:17; 10:6; 33:14. Cognates occur in other Semitic languages, with the connotations of "ruthless," "perverse," and "deceitful." The expression חנפי לב of Job 36:13 has a parallel in Ugaritic ḫnp lb, applied to the ruthless goddess Anath. The KJV regularly translated this word as "hypocrite(s)," "hypocritical." Other words rendered "godless" in the OT are: זדים, "proud ones" (Pss. 119:51, 69, 78, 85, 122; KJV "the proud"); בליעל, "worthlessness" (II Sam. 23:6; KJV "sons of Belial," "worthless" [KJV "ungodly"] in Prov. 16:27; 19:28); אונים, "powerful ones" (Prov. 11:7; KJV "unjust men"); לא חסיד, "ungodly" (Ps. 43:1); עויל, "ungodly" (Job 16:11; 18:21; KJV "wicked" in Job 18:21); KJV רשע, "ungodly" (II Chr. 19:2; Pss. 1:1, 4-6; 3:7; 73:12; RSV "wicked"). חנף in Isa. 32:6 and חנפה in Jer. 23:15 are translated "ungodliness" (KJV "hypocrisy," "profaneness"). In II Sam. 22:5; Ps. 18:4 the KJV translates the phrase נחלי בליעל by "floods of ungodly men" (RSV "torrents of perdition").

2. In the NT. Βέβηλος (KJV "profane") is rendered "godless" by the RSV (I Tim. 4:7; 6:20; II Tim. 2:16) except in I Tim. 1:9, where it agrees with the KJV. Ἀσεβής (Rom. 4:5; 5:6; I Tim. 1:9; I Pet. 4:18 KJV [RSV "impious"]; II Pet. 2:5; 3:7; Jude 4, 15) is rendered "ungodly" and ἀσέβεια (Rom. 1:18; 11:26; II Tim. 2:16) "ungodliness," except in Tit. 2:12 ("irreligion"). The verb ἀσεβέω, "be irreverent, act irreverently" (II Pet. 2:6; Jude 15), is defined by "ungodly."

See also BELIAL; EVIL; FOLLY. M. H. POPE

GODLY. The translation of a number of terms in the Bible. The common OT term for "godly," "loyal," "pious," is חסיד (alternately "saints," "faithful [ones]," "holy," "good man"). Once (Mal. 2:15) אלהים ('aelôhîm), "God," used attributively, is translated "godly." Similarly, in the NT, τοῦ θεοῦ (II Cor. 1:12) and κατὰ θεόν (7:9-11) are rendered "godly." Other words rendered "godly" and "godliness" in the NT are the adjective εὐσεβής (II Pet. 2:9), the adverb εὐσεβῶς (II Tim. 3:12; Tit. 2:12), and the noun εὐσέβεια (I Tim. 2:2; 4:7-8; 6:3, 5-6, 11; Tit. 1:1; II Pet. 1:3, 6-7; 3:11). In III John 6, where the KJV translates ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ "after a godly sort," the RSV has "as befits God's service." In I Tim. 1:4 for the KJV "godly edifying" (οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ) the RSV has "divine training." For θεοσέβεια in I Tim. 2:10 the RSV has "religion" instead of the KJV "godliness."

See also FEAR; GODLESS; HASIDIM; SAINT; WORSHIP IN THE NT. M. H. POPE

GOEL gō'ĕl (Heb. gō'ēl'). See REDEEM § 1*b*.

GOG gŏg [גוג; Akkad. gagu, precious golden object] (I Chr. 5:4). Eponym of a Reubenite family.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 223.

GOG AND MAGOG gŏg, mā'gŏg [מגוג, גוג; Γώγ, Μαγώγ]. Gog, chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, came from the land of Magog; in Ezek. 38–39 he leads the evil forces which rise up to war against Yahweh in a climactic battle. In Rev. 20:8, however, Magog, by some strange process, is no longer a country but a fellow culprit with Gog in the Battle of Armageddon.

Ezek. 38–39 is developed as follows:

I. Prophecy that Gog will be destroyed, ch. 38
  A. Destruction foretold, vss. 1-6
  B. Attack on Israel predicted, vss. 7-13
  C. God will triumph, vss. 14-23
II. Overthrow of Gog, ch. 39
  A. Military defeat, vss. 1-6
  B. Weapons burned, vss. 7-10
  C. Burial of destroyed army, vss. 11-16
  D. Sacrifice of the mighty, vss. 16-20
  E. Glory of Yahweh, vss. 21-24
  F. Return from captivity, vss. 25-29

Many have attempted to identify Gog with some historical monarch or military figure, but no certainty on this point has been attained. Gyges, the king of Lydia who is the Gûgû in the records of Ashurbanipal, has been suggested, but with no more reason than phonetic resemblance between the two names. Some have sought the answer in mythology, where the person Gog might represent evil darkness set in array against the light of God.

Whatever the origins of the names, we may be sure that the picture portrays the "ends of the earth" as contemporaries understood them, rising against Yahweh. These included Persia, Cush, Put, Gomer, Togarmah, Sheba, Dedan, and Tarshish. They were the kingdoms of the world which would rise against the kingdom of God, as epitomized in restored Israel, but the attack was doomed to failure. One would expect such an attack to originate in the N, from which so many invasions had come in the past. This, then, was not meant to be understood as a reference to past or future literal history but involves rather the profound insight that ultimately the tension between good and evil must be resolved.

Much misunderstanding has clustered around the Gog-Magog cycle, especially among people who look always to the future for the meaning of religion and who seek exact fulfilment for every prophecy. The Hebrew word ראש, which is used in the adjectival sense meaning "chief" (Ezek. 39:1), has no relationship to Russia, nor does Meshech refer to Moscow, as has been alleged.

C. G. Howie

GOIIM goi'ĭm [גוים]. 1. A people (the word may be translated "nations" or "Gentiles") who, led by King Tidal, along with three Eastern kings, attacked the Cities of the Valley (Gen. 14:1, 9). They may have been non-Semitic tribes who lived to the N. They have been identified with the Hittites because of the resemblance of the name Tidal to the royal Hittite name Tudhaliash, and less reasonably to the Guti (in NE Mesopotamia).

2. A people mentioned in Josh. 12:23, where a king of Goiim in Galilee(?) was among those defeated by Joshua. Perhaps this was a migrating group, possibly related to the Philistines. "Galilee" (RSV) is with the LXX; the MT has "Gilgal"; but the reference may be to Gilgal (Jiljulich) N of Aphek, although it has also been identified with Haroshethha-goiim of Judg. 4:2.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, BASOR, 11 (1923), 8. Cambridge Ancient History, II (1924), 375; cf. L. H. Grollenberg, Atlas of the Bible (1956), Index, p. 164. H. R. Hall, The Ancient History of the Near East (1935), pp. 194-95.

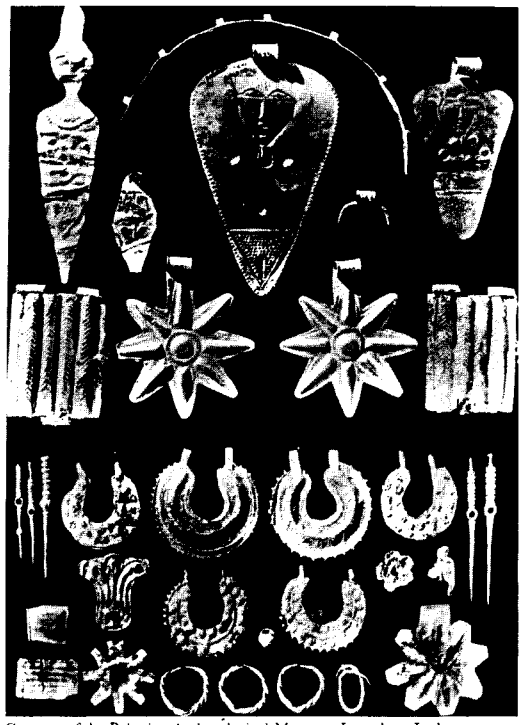
J. P. Harland

GOLAN gō'lən [גולן]. A city of Manasseh in Bashan, and a district of the same name. Golan was selected by Moses as one of the three cities of refuge E of the Jordan (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8) and was one of the Levitical cities (Josh. 21:27; I Chr. 6:71—H 6:56). Josephus speaks of a division of the former Bashan called Gaulanitis, for the most part a flat and fertile tableland and in his time densely populated; it is apparently the same as the modern Jaulan, which is bounded by the Jordan on the W, the Yarmuk on the S, and Mount Hermon to the NE. Eusebius refers to Gaulan or Golan as a very large settlement in his time. It may be Sahem el-Jolan, which lies on the E bank of the River el-'Allan.

S. Cohen

GOLD. Probably the first metal known to man, because it is found in nature in a pure state and thus does not require metallurgical processes except refining. Gold occurs in the Bible hundreds of times,

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago



34. Goldworking: weighing and recording, melting for casting (upper scenes); preparing the finished objects (lower scenes); from the tomb of Mereru-ka, Saqqarah, reign of Teti, Sixth Dynasty (2350-2200 B.C.)

and both in the OT and NT more frequently than any other metal. It is often mentioned together with silver, and it is noteworthy that in the majority of cases silver comes first, reflecting the memory of the oldest period, when gold was less valued than silver. Fig. GOL 34.

Besides the common זהב, there are several other words for "gold" in the OT—viz., בצר, חרוץ, כתם, סגור, פז. The different names must represent varieties depending on the degree of purity and color, but the exact meanings are unknown to us, and they are often rendered "pure gold," "fine gold," "choice gold," etc.

In the NT "gold" (χρυσιόν, χρυσός; cf. χρυσέος, "golden") was among the gifts offered by the Wise Men (Matt. 2:11). The Twelve sent out by Jesus were instructed to take no gold, silver, or copper (i.e., coins) in their belts (Matt. 10:9; cf. Acts 3:6; 20:33). For gold adornments, see I Tim. 2:9; I Pet. 3:3; Rev. 1:13; 18:16; etc. The city of the New Jerusalem was made of gold (Rev. 21:18, 21).

The traditional source of gold is the Land of Ophir (I Kings 9:28; 10:11; Job 22:24; etc.), although

Courtesy of the Palestine Archaeological Museum, Jerusalem, Jordan

35. Gold work from Tell el-'Ajjul (ca. fourteenth-thirteenth centuries B.C.)

Havilah and Parvaim (Gen. 2:11-12; II Chr. 3:6) are mentioned too. That Ophir was actually a source of supply was recently confirmed by the find of a pottery fragment of the eighth century B.C. near Jaffa-Tel Aviv with an incised inscription in Hebrew: "Gold of Ophir to Beth Horon, 40 Sheqel" (Fig. OPH 11). A large quantity of gold must have come via Egypt from Nubia (modern Sudan), the name of which means "gold" in ancient Egyptian.

Although the Bible mentions a great variety of gold objects, sometimes large ones, they must have been molten down anciently for their value. In excavations, mainly small objects such as earrings, finger rings, beads, etc., are being found. From Beth-shan and Tell el-'Ajjul came several pendants with figures of female deities incised upon them.* A unique sample, of unknown provenance, is a golden signet ring with a seal inscribed with the Hebrew name Shaphat, still in the bezel. Fig. GOL 35.

See also METALLURGY.

Bibliography. W. M. F. Petrie, Ancient Gaza (1934), vol. IV, pl. XIII. B. Maisler, "Two Hebrew Ostraca from Tell Qasile," JNES, X (1951), 265-67, pl. XI B. See also various excavation reports. I. BEN-DOR

GOLDEN CALF. See CALF, GOLDEN.

GOLDEN RULE, THE. A modern designation for Jesus' command to do to others as you wish them to do to you (Matt. 7:12; Luke 6:31). The origin of this title is obscure. The rule is cited as early as 1674 as the "Golden Law." "Golden" signifies an inestimable value and utility. "Rule" refers not to a legal regulation but to an ideal moral principle.

In both Matthew and Luke the saying appears in a discourse by Jesus in a summarizing position, but in different contexts. Matthew climaxes some of Jesus' commands about prayer with the rule and adds: "This is the law and the prophets." Luke places the rule at the conclusion of Jesus' teachings about love of enemies and about gifts, but without reference to the law and the prophets.

Jesus' formulation of the Golden Rule is his own original wording of older Jewish precepts. He exalts the one who does rather than the one who receives. The greatness of this rule is matched only by its difficulty in practice. Its universal scope covers all dealings with others. Its simplicity pierces the dark complexities of human relationships with a clear guiding light. Its meaning for followers of Jesus must be correlated with the rest of his teaching and with his own example in conduct. It cannot properly be taken alone as an adequate guide for Christian living. Its truth, creatively and imaginatively applied in all human situations, moves men to a mutual good beyond all calculation.

Christians prefer the positive form and Jews the negative form of the rule. Arguments about which is superior are useless. Both religions give the Golden Rule in either form as God's will. In Jewish literature, prior to or near the time of Jesus, the negative form of the rule appears in various places: in Tob. 4:15: "What you hate, do not do to anyone"; in Aristeas 207, where it approaches an affirmative form; in Hillel's answer (Shab. 31*a*) to a heathen inquirer who wanted to be taught the whole law quickly (Hillel also declared the command to be the "whole law"); in the Palestinian Targum (Jerusalem I) at the end of Lev. 19:18 as an explanation of loving one's neighbor; in Philo (cited by Euseb. Preparation VIII.7.6). This love of neighbor and regard for his honor and property, "dear to thee as thine own" (Ab. 2.10, 12; cf. Ecclus. 31:15), indicate that positive aspects of the rule were also taught. In early Christian writings the negative form of the rule probably underlies Paul's statement that love does no wrong to a neighbor (Rom. 13:10); it is stated negatively in Did. 1:2, where it is part of the "Way of Life" which requires love of God and neighbor; it likewise appears in the Western text (Codex D) of Acts 15:20, 29. Numerous quotations of the positive form of the rule are quoted from the gospels by various church fathers.

Though Jesus gave his own wording to the Golden Rule, the thought in it is widespread in ethical and religious teachings of many peoples. Confucius taught the negative form. Ideals of conduct somewhat similar to the rule are known in the literature of the early Greeks and Romans and in the tenets of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam.

Bibliography. I. Abraham, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospel, First Series (1917), pp. 18-29; G. B. King, "The 'Negative' Golden Rule," JR, VIII (1928), 268-79; L. J. Philippides, Die "Goldene Regel," religionsgeschichtlich untersucht (1929). D. M. BECK

GOLDSMITH [צוֹרֵף, the refiner]. Goldsmiths are referred to frequently in the OT. They seem to have formed guilds (Neh. 3:8, 31-32). They made jewelry, idols, etc., either of solid gold or of beaten gold. For the goldsmith engaged in idol manufacture, see Isa. 40:19; 41:7; 46:6; Jer. 10:9, 14; 51:17.

The art of the goldsmith was very high during the Middle Bronze Age, when a special technique "granulation" was developed, consisting of tiny globules of gold arranged in patterns and soldered onto a gold surface.

Bibliography. C. R. Williams, Gold and Silver Jewelry (1924); W. M. F. Petrie, Ancient Gaza (1934), vol. IV, pls. XIII-XX.

I. BEN-DOR

GOLGOTHA gŏl'gə thə [Γολγοθά, skull; transliteration of Aram. גלגלתא, Heb. גלגלת; also translated κρανίον (cf. Luke 23:33; Judg. 9:53 LXX; II Kings 9:35); Lat. calvaria (Vulg.)]. The Jerusalem site of the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth and two others condemned under the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate.

The term appears twice in the OT, in the literal sense, referring to the skull of SISERA (Judg. 9:53) and the skull of JEZEBEL (II Kings 9:35). It appears in the NT only in the story of the Crucifixion (Matt. 27:33; Mark 15:22; John 19:17). In all these places the proper Greek equivalent is the single word κρανίον, which in Luke 23:33 is given as the name of the site without mention of the Semitic form "Golgotha." The proper Vulg. form everywhere is calvaria, which may be transliterated into the English term "Calvary," or translated as "skull." Hence, an English version may give the name of the site as Golgotha, Cranium, Calvary, or Skull.

It is not known why the place was so called. The simplest conjecture is that the skull symbolized death as meted out in this place of execution. Jerome (Commentary on Matt. 27:33) suggested that here skulls lay about unburied; and yet such was not the custom in Jerusalem. Again, there was an early Christian tradition that the skull of Adam was buried under the cross (Origen on Matt. 27:33), as is commonly pictured in medieval art; yet this is clearly a theological development from the name rather than an explanation of its origin. Still another suggestion was first made in the nineteenth century, that a certain hill in Jerusalem (from a particular angle) had the form of a skull; but this belated recognition of a profile demands imagination and an easy credulity.

Where was Golgotha? All that can be said with confidence is that the execution would have occurred outside the city wall; this is assumed also in John 19:20; Heb. 13:12. Some propose that it was on a hill, because it could be observed from a distance (Mark 15:40 and parallels). It is said to be near a road, because there were passers-by (Mark 15:29). Only John 19:41 states that the tomb was near, in a garden. Yet all these suggestions, even if they were considered to be cogent, do not inform us as to the site. Eusebius (Onom.) places Golgotha N of Mount Zion, a direction in accord with two sites now pointed out to travelers: "Calvary," now within the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, and "Gordon's Calvary."

Prior to the fourth century, Christians showed no interest in identifying the place of the Crucifixion. Ca. 325, Eusebius wrote that the Emperor Constantine directed Bishop Macarius to ascertain the sites of the Crucifixion and of the entombment and the Resurrection, which were presumed to lie together. A century later it was explained that the bishop was guided to the true sites through a vision of the Queen Mother Helena. After removing a Hadrianic temple of Aphrodite, Constantine erected there the two churches: Golgotha and Anastasis, where stands today the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, inside the present walls.

As one enters its door, one observes stairs on the right which mount to a balcony with altars. This rise of about fifteen feet is actually natural rock, and is the site which Constantine accepted as Golgotha and originally enclosed within an open court. A short distance to the W, beyond a hollow, he erected the Church of the Anastasis on the site identified as the tomb. Although the Holy Sepulcher complex has been destroyed and rebuilt many times, these two neighboring sites have remained fixed since the fourth century. The earliest reports of Constantine's two churches come to us from the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) and Eusebius (335), the latter of whom attended the dedication ceremony. To any other doubts of an authentic site must be added the further problem that archaeologists have not yet succeeded in establishing the course of the first-century Second North Wall, outside which Golgotha lay (cf. Jos. War V.iv.2).

In 1842 Otto Thenius of Dresden proposed that a rocky hill 250 yards NE of the Damascus Gate was Golgotha. He argued that it was the Jewish place of stoning, lay outside the city, and showed the form of a skull. In 1885, General Charles ("Chinese") Gordon also accepted this site, declaring that it formed the head of a long skeletal rock formation. Colonel Condor has also agreed to this identification, but the site is generally known as "Gordon's Calvary." Additional confirmation is claimed from the existence of the "garden tomb" nearby, involved in a joint claim of authenticity. This garden tomb lies in an area of Byzantine burial caves, and was discovered and exploited within the last century (see HOLY SEPULCHRE). No other proposed sites have been taken seriously.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways (1935), pp. 346-81; J. W. Crowfoot, Early Churches in Palestine (1941), pp. 9-21; J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (1946), pp. 433-38.

K. W. CLARK

GOLIATH gə lī'əth [גלית]. The Philistine champion who was slain in combat by David in the Valley of Elah* (I Sam. 17). Goliath is included among the descendants of the giants (רפאים), who, probably as foreign mercenaries serving with the Philistines, took up their residence in Gath (II Sam. 21:22; I Chr. 20:8). His enormous stature and herculean armor struck terror into the army of Saul during the forty days he defiantly challenged it to provide a champion for a trial by combat, whose outcome would determine the fate of the war (cf. II Sam. 2:14 ff; see bibliography). Fig. ELA 21.

The youthful David arrived with provisions from home for his brothers at the theater of war in time to hear Goliath hurl his defiant challenge. However motivated, whether by the opportunity for an unknown youth to gain sudden fame—and a royal princess—or, more probably, by the deep religious resentment for the stinging reproaches of a foreigner, David offered himself as a combatant. After each disdained his opponent, David slung a stone that felled the giant, and quickly decapitated the champion of the Philistines, who now fled panic-stricken from the battle. Fig. SLI 68.

The armor of Goliath was dedicated by David to Yahweh (I Sam. 21:9; cf. I Sam. 17:54 [?]); Ahimelech the priest later returned the sword of Goliath to David in his flight from Saul. Although some sources credit David with the slaying of Goliath (I Sam. 17; 21:9; 22:10; cf. Ps. 151 LXX), this feat is elsewhere attributed to ELHANAN 1 (II Sam. 21:19; cf. I Chr. 20:5).

Bibliography. Livy Historia I. 24-25; S. N. Kramer, Enmerkar and the Lord of Aratta (1925), 11, 458-62, 476-78; J. B. Pritchard, ed., "The Tale of Si-nuhe," ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 20, ll. 109-45. E. R. DALGLISH

GOMER gō′mər [גמר]. 1. Eldest son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2-3; I Chr. 1:5-6), and father of a people (Ezek. 38:6), whose name is to be equated with Assyrian Gi-mir-ra-a, Greek Κιμμέριοι. In the eighth century B.C. the Cimmerians, Indo-European nomads, invaded Asia Minor via the Caucasus under pressure of the SCYTHIANS (see ASHKENAZ). Greek, Assyrian, and archaeological sources are available for the reconstruction of their migrations and raids.

During the reign of Sargon (722-705) the Cimmerians attacked Urartu (see ARARAT) and also invaded Tabal (see TUBAL), where Sargon interfered. They were averted to the W of Asia Minor, where the Phrygian kingdom (see MESHECH) was destroyed by their raids. Its capital, Gordion, was burned and ransacked, and the Phrygian king Midas-Mita committed suicide (ca. 695 B.C.). Esarhaddon (681-669) again had to cope with the Cimmerians, whose king Teushpa he defeated. The Cimmerian threat was still serious during the reign of Ashurbanipal (669-626), when Assyrian support was sought by the peoples of Asia Minor (e.g., Tabal and LYDIA). One of the Cimmerian leaders, Tugdamme-Lygdamis, was defeated in Cilicia. The final expulsion of the Cimmerians was brought about by Alyattes of Lydia (ca. 605-560).

No settlements or fortresses have been identified as Cimmerian in character. Herodotus' characterization of their wars as raids has so far been borne out by archaeological evidence.

Bibliography. P. Naster, L'Asie Mineure et l'Assyrie aux VIIIe et VIIe siècles avant Jésus-Christ (1938), pp. 90-100; K. Bittel, Kleinasiatische Studien (1942), pp. 54-66. M. J. MELLINK

2. The wife of the prophet HOSEA; daughter of Diblaim (Hos. 1:3). Her unfaithfulness in marriage was used by the prophet as a dramatic parable of Israel's unfaithfulness to God.

GOMORRAH gə môr′ə —mŏr′— [עמרה]. One of the "cities of the Valley," which was destroyed by the Lord in his wrath over its wickedness (Gen. 13:10; 19:24-28; Deut. 29:23; Isa. 13:19; Jer. 49:18; 50:40; Amos 4:11). Gomorrah is first mentioned in defining the territory of the Canaanites (Gen. 10:19). Birsha king of Gomorrah, along with the kings of the other four cities, was attacked by, and later joined battle with, Chedorlaomer and his three Eastern allies in the Valley of Siddim (Gen. 14:2, 8). The depravity and consequent destruction of Gomorrah are held up as an example or warning (Deut. 29:23; 32:32; Isa. 1:9-10; 13:19; Jer. 23:14; 49:18; 50:40; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9; Matt. 10:15; Rom. 9:29; II Pet. 2:6; Jude 7).

Usually Gomorrah is mentioned along with Sodom alone (seven times), but twice with all the cities of the Valley (Gen. 14:2, 8) and once with three, Zoar being omitted (Deut. 29:23). Gomorrah, though not mentioned, is included in the Pentapolis, or "Five Cities" (Wisd. Sol. 10:16), and in references to the destruction of the cities of the Valley (Gen. 19:25, 29).

Gomorrah is probably to be located under the waters of the S part of the Dead Sea, which area may once have been the fertile Valley of Siddim. Possibly Gomorrah may have been the northernmost of the five cities and situated by the stream Seil 'Esal.

See map and bibliography under SODOM.

J. P. HARLAND

GONG [χαλκός, copper] (I Cor. 13:1); KJV BRASS. A percussion instrument making a loud noise, probably used in the temple worship (see MUSIC § C). The reference may be to a form of cymbals. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS § B1*b*.

GOOD [טוב]. As shown already by the ancient translations, a word with a very wide extent of meanings. The LXX renders it mainly by ἀγαθός ("good"); e.g., Exod. 3:8: "a good and broad land"; II Sam. 18:27: "a good man, [bringing] good tidings") or by καλός ("beautiful"; e.g., Gen. 1:4: "The light was good"; Josh. 23:15: Yahweh's "good words"). In the same way (but not always in the same places) the Vulg. varies between bonus (e.g., Gen. 1:4; Exod. 3:8) and pulcher (e.g., Gen. 6:2: "The daughters of men were fair").

In Hebrew, טוב means that a person or a thing is in accordance with the acknowledged practical, moral or religious standards. Rebekah and the Persian queens are good-looking (Gen. 24:16; Esth. 1:11; 2:2). It is not good for a man to stay alone, but a good thing to find a wife, and even better is the love of a kissing friend (Gen. 2:8; Prov. 18:22; Song of S. 1:2). A good wine goes down smoothly, a good fig or a good honey is sweet, and it is good to eat honey but not good to eat too much of it (Song of S. 7:9; Judg. 9:11; Prov. 24:13; 25:16). A good age is a long life and a living dog better than a dead lion, but it is best not to be born at all (Judg. 8:32; Eccl. 9:4; 4:3; cf. 6:3). At least it is better to live in the corner of a housetop than to share the house with a contentious woman (Prov. 21:9; 25:24; cf. 21:19).

These standards are based on the joyful or hard happenings of daily life without moral or religious reflections, but these experiences themselves may include moral factors. To exhibit them is a main concern of the old oriental and Israelite WISDOM literature moralizing the good. The personified Wisdom gives good precepts, and it is better to get her than to get silver or gold, better to listen to the rebuke of a wise man than to the song of fools (Prov. 4:2; 3:14; cf. 8:19; 16:16; Eccl. 7:5). It is better to be slow to anger than to take a city (Prov. 16:32; cf. Eccl. 7:8; 9:16). It is not good to show partiality or to be without knowledge and to make haste (Prov. 19:2; 21:5). A crooked-minded man will not have the good time which he who keeps understanding will find (Prov. 19:8). For the Israelite wisdom, such knowledge and understanding includes the precepts of Yahweh delivered by Moses and the prophets (e.g., Neh. 9:13; Mic. 6:8; cf. Ps. 119:39; 1QS I.2-6). They have to be learned by every grown-up member of the Israelite nation able to discern good and evil (cf. Deut. 1:39; Isa. 7:15). Yahweh's precepts are good because he himself is good (e.g., Ps. 136:1)—indeed, the only one who is "good" (Matt. 19:17; Mark 10:18; Luke 18:19). By revealing his commands he set before the people life and good, death and evil (Deut. 30:15), and it was the utmost earnest of his judgment when his people's sin obliged him to give them statutes that were not good, "by which they could not have life" (Ezek. 20:25). Yahweh has shown his goodness in Israel's history—e.g., in the sending of Ezra (Ezra 7:9)—and it is the duty of the Levites and of the congregation to confess that he is good (I Chr. 16:34; doxology). His goodness being mainly his grace and care for the humble-minded and the poor, to seek him and to seek good, to hate evil and to love good (Amos 5:6, 14-15), becomes synonymous with seeking justice, correcting oppression, defending the fatherless, and pleading for the widow (Isa. 1:12-17). As a reward for such an attitude God gives to his people the good land, victory, and other goods, to the single Israelite good health, richness, and long life. But the pious has the experience that all these goods are nothing in comparison with God himself, apart from whom he has no good and whose nearness is good for him even in the greatest needs and sorrows (Pss. 16:2; 73:28).

The same extension from a purely practical sense, via moralization, to a religious feeling may be shown for the opposite idea. There are bad things in the hereabouts—illness, poverty, and untimely death. There are foolish men who act against the counsels of Wisdom and so destroy their lives (e.g., Prov. 6:32). But worst of all is the "wicked" man (רשע) who forgets God's ordinances, God's goodness, and God himself (e.g., Jer. 2:19). On account of the wide extent of both terms the totality of life may be described by the antithesis of "knowledge of good and evil" (e.g., Gen. 3:5), perhaps especially in the sexual field. It is man's tragedy that he learns what is good by contrast, by acting EVIL—i.e., against God's commandment.

Bibliography. J. Hempel, Das Ethos des Alten Testaments (1938); W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, III (1939), 44 ff; N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the OT (4th ed., 1950), pp. 51 ff; H. J. Stoebe, "Gut und Böse in der Jahwistischen Quelle des Pentateuch," ZAW, 65 (1953), 188-204; G. W. Buchanan, "The OT Meaning of the Knowledge of Good and Evil," JBL, 75 (1956), 114-20; H. H. Rowley, The Faith of Israel (1956), pp. 124 ff (the "good life"); P. van Imschoot, Théologie de l'AT, II (1956); R. Gordis, "The Knowledge of Good and Evil in the OT and the Qumran Scrolls," JBL, 76 (1957), 123-38; T. C. Vriezen, Theologie des AT in Grundzügen (1957), pp. 271 ff; N. Krieger, "Zu Gen 1 und Gen 2-3," ZAW, 70 (1958), 265-69. J. HEMPEL

GOODMAN. KJV archaism used to translate אישׁ (Prov. 7:19; RSV HUSBAND) and οἰκοδεσπότης. See HOUSEHOLDER.

GOPHER WOOD [עצי גפר, ʿaṣê gōpher]. The material from which Noah was instructed to make the ark (see ARK OF NOAH). The phrase appears only in Gen. 6:14 (P), and no cognates have been found. Some link עצי גפר with the last word in the verse, כפר (kōpher), "pitch," thus suggesting a resinous wood, like the conifers. Others have associated it with the Mesopotamian kufa boat, made of twigs and palm leaves sealed with bitumen (cf. Exod. 2:3: lit., "ark of reeds"). Regardless of the etymology of the word, it seems likely that the Priestly writer had in mind conifers (or perhaps more specifically cypresses—Cupressus sempervirens var. horizontalis Mill., Gord.) commonly used in shipbuilding. Every suggestion, however, appears to be gratuitous.

See also FLORA § A8*b;* CYPRESS.

Bibliography. Jewish Encyclopedia (1904), VI, 45-46.

J. C. TREVER

GORGIAS gôr'jəs [Γοργιάς]. One of the generals who, with Ptolemy and Nicanor, was a friend of the king, appointed by Lysias to lead the campaign against JUDAS MACCABEUS. In I Macc. 4:1 ff, Gorgias was the actual commander, and in II Macc. 8:9 he is noted as a "general and a man of great experience in military service." Becoming governor of the district of Jamnia, he maintained mercenary troops and kept up a continuous warfare against the Jews at every opportunity. Judas was victorious over Nicanor and Gorgias in the Plains of Judea.

Gorgias marched with his army at night, expecting to smite Judas' army suddenly. But Judas heard of it and left camp to attack the Syrian army in EMMAUS. Gorgias entered Judas' camp at night, and, finding it empty, surmised that the Jews were fleeing. At daybreak Gorgias realized that he had been trapped. Judas pursued his army, defeating it near Jamnia.

Two generals of the Hasmoneans, Joseph and Azariah, who disobeyed Judas' instructions, were defeated by Gorgias (I Macc. 5:61). They imagined that they could perform some heroic deed, but they were not of the Hasmonean family, through whom deliverance was given to Israel. S. B. HOENIG

GORTYNA gôr tī'nə [Γόρτυνα]. Alternately: GORTYN [Γορτύν]. A city located in a plain on the River Letheus in S central Crete. It was several miles from the sea; Metallum and Lebena were its ports. In classical times it was of Cretan cities second only to Cnossus in size and importance, and had temples to Apollo Pythius, Artemis, and Zeus. Though Cnossus and Gortyna joined in a league to control Crete, they spent much of their time in hostility to each other. Under the Romans, Gortyna became the metropolis of the island. In 1884, near Hagii Deka, the so-called Gortyna Law Code, a Greek inscription, was found on a wall twenty-seven feet long and five feet high. It dates ca. 450 B.C. and gives revisions and additions to earlier codes; it deals mainly with laws concerning family relations, family property, inheritance, and slaves. I Macc. 15:23 lists Gortyna alone of Cretan cities among the places to which the Romans ca. 139 B.C. sent letters on behalf of the Jews. This letter to Gortyna shows that there were Jews living there at that time.

Bibliography. I. Köhler and E. Ziebarth, Das Stadtrecht von Gortyn und seine Beziehung zum gemeingriechischen Recht (1912); E. Kirsten and W. Kraiker, Griechenlandkunde (1955), ch. 11, especially pp. 288-91.

F. V. FILSON

GOSHEN gō'shən [גֹּשֶׁן; LXX Γεσεμ].

1. A place name in the phrase "land of Goshen," which appears in the general description of territory occupied by Joshua's forces (cf. Josh. 10:41; 11:16). It apparently refers to the hill-country region between Hebron and the Negeb, perhaps named after a city of the region.

2. A city of Judah located in the hill-country district of Debir (Josh. 15:51), and possibly once the chief city of a region bearing the same name (cf. 1 above). It is sometimes identified with modern Zahariyeh, ca. twelve miles SW of Hebron.

V. R. GOLD

3. The area of Egypt, probably in the NE part of the Delta, occupied by the Israelites from the time of Joseph to the Exodus.

That Goshen designated a region in the E part of the Nile Delta is more or less certain from the notice given in Gen. 46:28 that Goshen was to be the intermediate meeting point for Joseph and his father, Israel, the former going up from his Egyptian residence, the latter coming down from Canaan. We are further informed by various references in the narrative of Gen. 46–47 that (a) Goshen was reckoned as a part of Egypt and not merely bordering on it, and (b) it was an area specifically for grazing. Twice (47:6, 11) Goshen is described as the "best of the land," and in the latter passage is equated with the "land of Rameses," which appears to be a definite geographical designation.

Little information further can be gleaned from the MT without entering upon the vexing question of the route of the Exodus (see EXODUS, ROUTE OF). The first lap of that journey was from RAMESES to SUCCOTH; if we assume that Rameses refers to the Delta residence of the pharaoh and that Succoth is to be identified with Tell el-Maskhutah in the Wadi Tumeilat, we may then conclude that Goshen refers to the land around Rameses, in agreement with the association mentioned above. In such a case, precise localization of Goshen depends on the identification of Rameses, itself not a simple task, for Egyptologists are far from unanimous in their localization of the Delta residence of Rameses—if, indeed, this is what is meant by OT "Rameses." Great caution is necessary in making such an identification, since literally dozens of places in the Delta bore names containing the element "Rameses." The insistence, without further textual and topological evidence, that a particular one of these is the biblical city would elicit little scholarly support.

In two places (Gen. 45:10; 46:34) the MT "Goshen" is replaced in the LXX by the phrase Γεσεμ Αραβιας, the Arabian "Gesem." Until recently this has been interpreted as a reference to a Gesem in the Egyptian nome Arabia, whose capital, according to the classical geographer Ptolemeus, was Phacussa, modern Faqus. A prolonged effort to find mention of an Egyptian town or region named Gesem (or Goshen) in this general area has led to no positive results, since the supposed Egyptian forms Gsm, Qsm, so often quoted in this connection, rest on very questionable philological grounds. It may be taken as fairly certain that the name Goshen is not of Egyptian origin, but, like Succoth, Baal-zephon, Migdol, and Zilu (Sillo), is Semitic and attests, like them, to a long Semitic occupation of the E Delta before the New Kingdom; such a contention is supported by the existence of a town of the same name in Judah (e.g., Josh. 10:41). Quite recently a very interesting suggestion has been made concerning the Γεσεμ Αραβιας of the LXX: that such a change on the part of the LXX translators resulted from a remembrance of Gesem (GESHEM; Neh. 2:19; 6:1-2, 6), the Arabian king, foe of Nehemiah, whose name has been found on silver bowls discovered in the vicinity of Tell el-Maskhutah. If his kingdom extended, as is suggested, from Judah in the N to Dedan (al-'Ula) in the S and westward into the E Delta, it most probably included the area traditionally identified as Goshen. Because Goshen is not Gesem, however, one must assume that the LXX is an interpretation on the part of the translators, for whom the term "Goshen" was no longer current.

Bibliography. A. H. Gardiner, "The Supposed Egyptian Equivalent of the Name of Goshen," JEA, 5 (1918), 218-23; P. Mallon, "Les hebreux en Egypte," Orientalia, 3 (1921), 91-101; A. H. Gardiner, "The Geography of the Exodus: An Answer to Professor Naville and Others," JEA, 10 (1924), 94-95; E. Naville, "The Geography of the Exodus," JEA, 10 (1924), 18-39; W. F. Albright, "New Light on Early Recensions of the Hebrew Bible," BASOR, 140 (1955), 30-31.

T. O. LAMBDIN

GOSPEL (MESSAGE).

1. The term
   a. Etymology
   b. Usage
   c. Synonyms
   d. Development
2. Formal characteristics
   a. Proclamation of facts
   b. Purpose
   c. Author
   d. Gospel as process
3. The message
   a. General characteristics
   b. Eschatological character
   c. The divine food
   d. Holy history

Bibliography

1. The term. a. Etymology. "Gospel" is the modern form of the Anglo-Saxon word "god-spell," a story from or about a god, and is a rendering of the Latin evangelium. The term was, however, understood popularly as meaning "good tidings" (e.g., Isa. 40:9; 52:7; Luke 2:10) or "glad tidings" (Rom. 10:15), where the RSV usually translates "good news," and has been used in this sense in the Protestant translations of the Bible since Tyndale. The Latin term goes back to the Greek word εὐαγγέλιον, which is found in the NT only. The LXX has only the verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, which in the older translations is rendered "to preach," "to tell," or "to publish," except for Isa. 40:9; 52:7; 61:1, where the KJV has "to bring [or to publish] good tidings." In Isa. 40:9 the RSV translates "herald of good tidings."

The Greek verb, in turn, is a rendition of the Hebrew בשר. As many Hebrew verbs, it has an ambivalent meaning, designating the public announcement of something wrought by God—e.g., a defeat (I Sam. 4:17) or a deliverance (Ps. 96:2)—that is of special importance to the group or collectivity which receives the news. It seems that particularly through Deutero-Isaiah the verb became a specific term of the theology of salvation. In his prophecies, the participle מבשר designates the messenger of God who announces the arrival of divine blessings. In intertestamental Judaism the verb regularly has a supernatural agent. Hence the Greek verb εὐαγγελίζειν or εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, meaning "to act as the bringer of good news," offered itself to the LXX for the rendering of בשר, particularly since the Greek verb also usually had a numinous connotation, referring to the operation of good luck (τύχη). The verb could, therefore, easily be adopted by the NT writers as a technical term. Luke (twenty-five times) and Paul (twenty-one times) make frequent use of it. Matthew has it only once, in a reference to Isaiah (Matt. 11:5); it is completely absent from Mark, James, and John, except for Revelation (two times).

b. Usage. It is obvious that the popularity of the verb in some NT writers is dependent upon their appreciation of the LXX, and especially of Isaiah. Different is the history of the noun εὐαγγέλιον, which is found eight times in Mark, four times in Matthew, sixty times in Paul's letters, including the Pastorals (four times), yet is absent not only from John, Hebrews, and James, but also from Luke. In the secular usage of classical and koine Greek, εὐαγγέλιον denotes the reward for good news, given either to the messenger or to the gods, who have wrought the felicitous event, while εὐαγγελία designates good news. Like μαρτύριον and μαρτυρία, the noun in -ιον designates the activity, and the noun in -ία the subject matter with which the action is concerned. The anomalous usage, by which εὐαγγέλιον was employed as designating "good news," hardly goes back to the Hebrew. For while בשרה may mean both good news and the reward of good news, it is, unlike the corresponding verb, never used in a religious sense. In the Greek inscriptions of Priene of 9 B.C., the birthday of Caesar Augustus is hailed as being "for the world the beginning of good news." A similar usage can be found in other Hellenistic documents. The Semitic idea that the king's ascension to the throne brings blessing to his people has obviously been coupled with the Hellenistic usage of εὐαγγέλιον as the public announcement of this event.

This origin of the religious use and new meaning of εὐαγγέλιον makes it appear improbable that Jesus himself should have used the noun or its Semitic equivalent. It is remarkable that neither Luke nor John uses the noun at all; that in the two instances in which, according to Mark (8:35; 10:29), Jesus speaks of losing one's life "for my sake and the gospel," the Synoptic parallels omit the reference to the gospel; and that the phrase "to preach the gospel" in Mark 13:10; 14:9 (and 16:15) presupposes the verb בשר rather than the noun.

c. Synonyms. Our surmise that Jesus did not use the noun is supported by the fact that in the NT a frequent synonym of εὐαγγέλιον is "word" (λόγος, ῥῆμα), and that all the verbs used in connection with "gospel" are also applied to "word" (e.g., "proclaim," "obey," "announce," "hear," "confirm," "speak," "have," "give," "come"). Certain of these verbs, when used absolutely, are obviously employed as synonyms of εὐαγγελίζεσθαι—e.g., κηρύσσειν, καταγγέλειν—and should be rendered accordingly. Similarly, when John's Gospel refers to Jesus' λαλεῖν, it means a qualified speaking—viz., the proclamation of the gospel. A full understanding of the nature and meaning of the gospel has, therefore, to include whatever is said in the Bible concerning the WORD of God and its proclamation.

"Word" (דבר) in the OT goes back to a root which means "back" or "background," and thus differs from the sensory perception of an object by the fact that it brings to light what "stands behind" it—i.e., what makes it to be what it is. With reference to a person, the word he speaks, or his speeches, express his purpose or intention. Furthermore, "word" in biblical parlance is always a communication from will to will; it is not merely descriptive of the essence of a thing. To the Greek mind, word and thinking go together, whereas for the Hebraic mind, the word is a mode of action. It is, therefore, primarily a spoken word, and even when written down, it still serves to express the speaker's intention. Accordingly, the gospel, too, is a divine word that manifests (φανερόω, ἀποκαλύπτω) God's ultimate purpose, and it is, therefore, a call to action or response.

The specific mode of communication implied in εὐαγγελίζεσθαι is best brought to light by the two synonyms κηρύσσειν and καταγγέλειν, and by the interchangeable use of κήρυγμα ("proclamation") and "gospel." The person who proclaims the good news does not act on his own authority. He is a herald (κῆρυξ) of the superior who sends him—i.e., of God, or his messenger—and announces what he has been commissioned to say. What he proclaims, however, is God's word, which in the Bible is not a manifestation of the "background" or the "secret" of things other than God, but invariably an expression of God's will or purpose. It is, therefore, addressed to the hearer's very self, not to his understanding or aspirations only, and thus concerns him in his personal totality of body and mind.

God's speaking is, therefore, the first act in the realization of a divine plan. Consequently, its truthfulness cannot be checked by the hearer by means of criteria which he has at his disposal, as is the case with scientific or philosophical notions and ideas. Rather, God's word authenticates itself by bringing about the things about whose realization it speaks (e.g., Isa. 55:10-13). This is not done by a miraculous power which the herald or the evangelizer possesses, nor by a kind of mana inherent in the words of a prophecy, but rather by the fact that, by speaking the word, God indicates that he is about to carry out the intention intimated in his word. Accordingly, the divine work promised can be considered as completed, once the revealing word has been spoken, though a wide temporal interval separates its inception from the ultimate goal.

d. Development. The historical development seems to have taken the following course: Jesus used the verb בשר or its Aramaic equivalent with reference to the saving message which he proclaimed, and which he called "the word" or "the word of God." The Greek-speaking church, guided by the verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, introduced the term εὐαγγέλιον, provided by the religious language of the age, into the vocabulary of nascent Christianity, endowing it with the characteristics of "the word." The term "gospel" was originally linked to the saving message of Jesus. Matthew, e.g., differentiates between Jesus' teaching and healing, on the one hand, and his proclaiming the gospel, on the other (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; cf. Luke 9:2; perhaps also Luke 20:21). The beginning of Mark's Gospel seems to indicate, however, that at the time of its writing, "gospel" was used in certain circles also as a designation of the whole public ministry of Jesus, not of the message brought by him only. One can easily see how, from Mark's usage, the term would develop in the second century into designating a book in which that gospel was described, though the church was anxious to insist on the oneness of the good news. The books were called "The Good News [singular] According to [κατά] Matthew," etc.

2. Formal characteristics. a. Proclamation of facts. The gospel is not the statement of a propositional truth that is being taught, but rather the proclamation of a fact that is announced by God (κηρύσσειν, ἀπαγγέλλειν). It is not to be identified with what C. H. Dodd (The Apostolic Preaching), on the basis of I Cor. 15:1-7 and similar passages, has termed the "kerygma"—viz., an enumeration of certain events in the life of Jesus. They are enumerated there as evidences of the truthfulness of the gospel. The gospel itself, as the NT writers understood it, is the divine proclamation of the realization of the final stage of God's plan of salvation, announced to the whole of mankind. What God himself had promised, and what people had hoped and waited for, is now becoming real. In the divinely wrought event, the scripture of the OT is fulfilled (cf., e.g., "in accordance with the scriptures" in I Cor. 15:3-4 and the many references to OT prophecies in the gospels and in Acts).

This redemptive activity is a novel event in the history of mankind, although it has long been foretold (e.g., Acts 8:35; 13:32-33; Rom. 1:2; 16:26; I Pet. 1:11-12; cf. I Cor. 10:4), and thus the gospel itself is something new. A new age has started (e.g., Rom. 3:21; II Cor. 5:17; Eph. 2:13; 3:10), and people are now living in eschatological time. Its good could not be attained at an earlier moment (e.g., I Pet. 1:11-12), yet it is equally true that with its proclamation people must not hope for another salvation (I Cor. 3:11-12). Its universal goal makes it necessary to announce it to all mankind (e.g., Matt. 24:14; 28:19; Mark 13:10; Rom. 1:16; 10:17; Col. 1:28), and hence Paul is so insistent on proclaiming it to the Gentiles also, and not to the Jews only (e.g., Acts 14:7; 15:21; 16:10; 17:18; Rom. 15:20; I Cor. 15:1-2; II Cor. 10:16; 11:7; Gal. 1:8, 11; 4:13; etc.).

Its newness does not exhaust itself in the fact that a hitherto unknown activity of God now comes to light. Rather, the gospel itself is part of a new activity of God, and thus confronts people with new possibilities and opportunities, as well as with new demands. While good things are announced to Israel in the OT (e.g., I Kings 1:42; Ps. 40:10; Isa. 52:7), we can speak only in an indirect way of the gospel in the OT (e.g., Rev. 10:7), for ontologically there is a world of difference between the promise of a reality and that reality itself. This explains the fact that when the gospel was announced to the Jews, they were perplexed and amazed (Mark 1:27 = Luke 4:36; Matt. 22:22 = Mark 12:17 = Luke 20:26; Acts 2:7; 4:13; cf. also Matt. 8:27 = Luke 8:25), and many of them remained outside that reality (Mark 4:11; I Cor. 5:12-13; Col. 4:5; I Thess. 4:12; Rev. 22:15).

b. Purpose. The purpose of the divine communication is not to enrich man's mind with new notions, but rather to announce to him salvation (σωτηρία; Acts 4:12; 13:26; Rom. 1:16; 13:11; II Cor. 6:2; Eph. 1:13; Phil. 2:12; II Thess. 2:13; etc.)—i.e., a condition by which his life will be made by God what it has not been previously, a true life. The gospel is always spoken of as a divine activity performed for the benefit of men. For this reason it is called εὐαγγέλιον, which signifies good or glad news, and "joy" is therefore a key word of the gospel (e.g., Luke 2:10; Acts 13:52; Rom. 14:17; I Thess. 1:6; Phil. 3:1; 4:4; etc.). The reason for this joy is the fact that the gospel is not a human discovery of what God is doing, but rather a fact which God brings to the knowledge of man. Man is not only able to know it, but also destined to be aware of it, and this is brought about in such a manner that the individual can realize that God is doing so for his benefit. The Lord makes it plain thereby that he has a people here on earth, for whose sake the final act of redemption is performed. Already in the provisional gospel of the OT, the prophet speaks of God's flock (Isa. 40:11) and reminds the cities of Judah that God is "your God" (Isa. 40:9). Bultmann is right, therefore, when he underlines the "existential" character of the gospel. He errs, however, by interpreting it in individualistic terms, and by substituting the timeless encounter with God for the experience of God's redemptive activity in eschatological time. The purpose of the gospel is to lead people away from the worthless things to the only true good (Acts 14:15). It is somewhat misleading, however, to emphasize the polemical element in the proclamation of the primitive church. While its message implies the rejection of both Judaism and paganism, it is nevertheless primarily positive—i.e., the assurance of God's final redemptive work. It is true, however, that the gospel is not always and by all received as good news. The goal toward which it points and the way to that goal are so contrary to man's expectations and wishes that it gives him offense (σκάνδαλον; e.g., I Cor. 1:23; cf. Rom. 1:16; II Tim. 1:8). Immediate acceptance is the exception rather than the rule (Matt. 11:5-6 = Luke 7:22-23; Matt. 13:21 = Mark 4:17; Matt. 13:57 = Mark 6:3; Matt. 15:12; 24:10; 26:21 = Mark 14:27; John 16:1; Rom. 9:33), and only by a radical fight against one's nature can one succeed in overcoming the offense (Matt. 5:29-30; 18:8-9).

In the NT the gospel is called the "word of God" (forty times), the "word of the Lord" (eight times), or simply the "word" (forty times), over against seventy-three occurrences of the term εὐαγγέλιον. The statistical evidence shows that for the primitive church's understanding of the gospel the emphasis fell upon the fact that it was a divine communication. It is not, however, for this reason, thought of as a verbal statement primarily, but rather as an event which manifests its divine purpose. John, therefore, will say that the "word of life" is something "which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and touched with our hands" (I John 1:1). The gospel is not a human theory concerning salvation, but rather a divine work. This fact, in turn, explains why the NT writers can say so confidently that the gospel is truthful or the word of truth (II Cor. 6:7; Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5; Jas. 1:18) or that the word is reliable (I Tim. 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; II Tim. 2:11; Tit. 3:8). From the many words which God has spoken under the Old Covenant, the gospel differs by being his final and decisive word (Heb. 1:2). There are different ways of presenting it, but the basic facts proclaimed therein do not differ (e.g., Gal. 1:6-9; I Cor. 3:5-9). The starting point of its proclamation is not what people want to receive, but rather what goods God is offering to them.

But being the disclosure of the μυστήριον—i.e., the divine purpose of salvation—the gospel cannot be measured by the criteria of philosophy and science (I Cor. 1:17-31), because it speaks of the realization of a goal which not only has been completely unknown thus far (Rom. 16:25-26; Col. 1:26; 4:3; cf. Tit. 1:2-3; Rev. 10:7), but also utterly transcends the goods which can be realized by means of earthly factors (Rom. 11:33-36). The "messianic secret" is, therefore, an essential element of the gospel. Jesus was anxious to guard it lest his redemptive role should be mistaken as that of a miracle-worker.

c. Author. Though the gospel enters the human mind only through earthly media, it has, nevertheless, its origin in God himself (e.g., I Thess. 2:13). It is the "gospel of God" (Mark 1:14; Rom. 1:1; I Thess. 2:2, 9)—i.e., the good that God himself proclaims (e.g., Acts 10:36; 13:26; Rom. 1:1; Tit. 1:3; Rev. 10:7). Through it he calls people to himself (II Thess. 2:14). No man has, therefore, the right to fetter it (II Cor. 4:2)—i.e., to make it subservient to his cause or interests—or to use it as a source of income (II Cor. 2:17). The divine origin manifests itself in the fact that God himself chooses the people who are to proclaim it (e.g., Rom. 1:1; Gal. 2:8), and entrusts it to them (Gal. 2:7; I Thess. 2:4; cf. I Tim. 1:11; Tit. 1:3). They are thereby taken into the service of God, and are his servants (Luke 1:2; Acts 6:4; II Cor. 4:1) or slaves (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:23; II Pet. 1:1; cf. Jer. 25:4; Dan. 9:10; Amos 3:7). These people are so filled with the sense of mission that they would feel miserable if they did not engage in their ministry or if they withheld part of the message (e.g., I Cor. 9:16; cf. Jer. 1:17).

In turn, nobody can make himself a messenger of the gospel. He has to be sent into his work. In the NT, the phrase "to be sent," absolutely used, means to be commissioned as a messenger of the gospel (e.g., Matt. 10:5; Mark 6:7, with reference to the Twelve; John 3:17, with reference to the Son). This also is signified by the title APOSTLE. This term, designating in Jewish Greek a person sent on an official errand on behalf of the chosen people, characterizes in NT parlance their office as that of proclaiming the gospel. Their "boldness" in proclaiming the good news is evidence of their vocation (I Thess. 1:5). Whether the term "evangelist," which is found only three times in the NT (Acts 21:8; Eph. 4:11; II Tim. 4:5), is to be identified with "apostle" is doubtful. The verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, "to proclaim good news," from which the noun "evangelist" is derived, is used in a broader sense in the NT than the activity implied in the term "apostle." The apostle is a person who, on account of his call, is enabled to bear witness to the divine origin of the gospel (e.g., Acts 8:25; I Thess. 2:4; cf. Luke 1:2; Acts 1:8), whereas others who are sent out by the apostles simply proclaim what they have heard from them. The "evangelists" who are mentioned in the NT are probably people who had special gifts of giving the gospel its literary form, first in the period of oral tradition and then in its written form.

In the proclamation of the gospel, Jesus occupies the central place. The gospel is εὐαγγέλιον Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ (Mark 1:1) or simply τοῦ χριστοῦ (e.g., Rom. 15:19; I Cor. 9:12; II Cor. 2:12; 4:4; Gal. 1:7; Phil. 1:27)—i.e., the divine message that Jesus is the Christ. It is he to whom it was given first and in its entirety (Matt. 11:27). He is, according to Acts 10:36; Eph. 2:17, the messenger announced in Isa. 52:7. Matthew and Mark, therefore, characterize his whole ministry occasionally as one of proclaiming the good news (Matt. 4:17; Mark 1:14-15), and the Lukan story of Jesus in the synagogue of Nazareth (Luke 4:16-30) has probably the same programmatic function. But Jesus, too, knows himself as sent (e.g., Matt. 15:24; Mark 9:37; Luke 9:48; John 4:34), and therefore cannot but proclaim the Father's will and message (e.g., John 1:18; 8:28). In view of the intimate relationship in which he stands to the Father, he can emphasize that whatever aspect of the gospel he proclaims is the truth (cf. the phrase "Truly, I say to you"—e.g., Matt. 6:2, 5; 8:10; 13:17; Mark 3:28; 9:1; 11:23; Luke 4:24; 18:17; 21:32; and frequently in John). The proclamation with which he commissions the apostles consists, therefore, in all that he had authoritatively communicated to them (Matt. 28:20).

In view of this commission, it seems at first sight strange that Paul should speak in a number of instances of "my gospel" (Rom. 2:16; 16:25; II Tim. 2:8) or "our gospel" (II Cor. 4:3; I Thess. 1:5; II Thess. 2:14; cf. I Cor. 15:1; Gal. 1:11; 2:2; etc.). The expression cannot mean "my personal interpretation of the gospel," for Paul states clearly that he is bound by the gospel (e.g., Col. 4:4) and cannot take liberties with it. As his own view, it would lack the authority that he claims for himself as an apostle. Rather, the phrase indicates the firm band by which he is tied to the gospel. The gospel is one, and no special gospel has been revealed to him. But he, with his individuality, his special gifts, insights, and experiences, has been made a part of the gospel, so that he has a particular function in its proclamation. He has a special message for the Gentiles (Gal. 2:7).

But Jesus is more than the first recipient and the propagator of the good news. In his ministry, he is himself the good announced. He is God's power and wisdom (I Cor. 1:24); our peace (Eph. 2:14); the end of the law (Rom. 10:4); our righteousness, consecration, and redemption (I Cor. 1:30). The great "I am" statements in John (6:35; 8:12; 10:7, 11; 14:6; 15:1) have the same function. In his whole ministry, Jesus is himself the gospel.

d. Gospel as process. This fact leads to the realization that both the term "gospel" and the term "word of God" are not confined to designating a message. Rather, it is a process in which the messenger and his activity, as well as the result of his proclamation —viz., the faith of the believers—are integral parts. This fact is more obvious in the Greek texts. In the English versions the noun εὐαγγέλιον is several times rendered by the phrase "preaching" or "proclaiming the gospel" (e.g., II Cor. 2:12, where the Greek text has "I came for the sake of the gospel"). The word of God that runs and triumphs in this world (II Thess. 3:1) is identical with the missionary activity of the church (Mark 8:35; 10:29; Acts 14:3; 20:32; cf. Rom. 15:19; I Cor. 9:14, 18; I Thess. 1:5; 4:15). Whatever happens to the apostles happens to the gospel (Phil. 1; 2:22). Paul has been singled out "for the gospel"—i.e., for its propagation (Rom. 1:1)—and he is not ashamed of this activity (Rom. 1:16), because through it God is powerfully at work to save people (e.g., I Thess. 2:13; cf. I Cor. 4:15). Inasmuch as it is through Jesus that the gospel has been authoritatively announced, the missionary activity—i.e., the gospel—is the word of the risen Christ (e.g., Rom. 10:17; Col. 3:16), not the teaching of Jesus only, as has sometimes been surmised. Not by repeating the words of Jesus, but by proclaiming the gospel, do the apostles enable people to hear the Lord (Luke 10:16). This fact explains the relative freedom with which the early church handled the text of Jesus' sayings. The divine authorship is also the reason why, in Rev. 14:6, the gospel is called "everlasting" (not "eternal")—i.e., surviving the vicissitudes of history (Mark 13:31; I Pet. 1:25, quoting Isa. 40:8).

The missionary proclamation, however, does not automatically bring the assurance of divine salvation to people. While the gospel has a universal appeal, it is the word of God for those only who "listen" to it—i.e., take it seriously as a divine message (e.g., Mark 4:3, 9, 12, 15-16, 20, 23-24, and parallels)—and who "do the truth" (I John 1:6; cf. Jas. 1:22-23). People must walk worthy of it (I Thess. 2:12; Phil. 1:27; cf. Col. 1:10). The gospel demands acceptance (e.g., Acts 8:14; 11:1; 17:11; I Thess. 1:6; 2:13; Jas. 1:21), "obedience" (e.g., Rom. 6:17; 10:16; Phil. 2:12; II Thess. 1:8; 3:14; Heb. 5:9; I Pet. 2:8; 3:1), and appropriation; it has "to be eaten" (Jer. 15:16; Rev. 10:9-10; cf. John 6:51).

3. The message. a. General characteristics. What is it that the NT writers proclaim? It is the divinely wrought realization of a good which is of decisive significance for all men. Man is a slave of the cosmic forces. But the gospel announces that now through God's redemptive work he has been delivered from the bondage which made it impossible for him to lead a true life (e.g., Luke 21:28; John 8:32, 36; Rom. 3:24; 6:18, 22; 8:23; I Cor. 7:22; Gal. 5:1; Eph. 1:7; I Pet. 1:19). The Synoptists and the Apocalyptist call that goal "God's kingdom" (e.g., Matt. 3:2; 4:17; 13:11; Mark 1:15; 4:11; Luke 8:10; Rev. 1:6, 9; 5:10; 19:16); John speaks of regeneration and spiritual or everlasting life (e.g., John 3:3, 15; 20:31), and he is followed therein by I Peter (e.g., 1:3; 2:2). In Hebrews it is described as the establishment of the new people of God (e.g., 12:22; 13:20), whereas Paul most frequently characterizes it as the coming of "salvation," σωτηρία (e.g., Rom. 1:16; 10:10; 13:11; I Cor. 9:22; Eph. 1:13; Phil. 1:28; I Thess. 5:9; I Tim. 1:15; cf. Rom. 8:24; I Cor. 1:18; 9:22).

These differences of terminology reflect the diversity of the spiritual background of the writers or the groups to which they belonged. They all, however, have two features in common. First, the term "kingdom of God" makes clear that God is not in the first place concerned with man, but rather with the vindication of his glory (e.g., Matt. 19:28; 24:30; 25:31 and parallels; John 11:4; 17:5; Rom. 3:7; I Cor. 2:8; II Cor. 4:6; Eph. 1:12; I Thess. 2:12) in a world which is in rebellion against him (e.g., Rom. 1:23; 2:8; 10:21). That the process in which he establishes his kingly rule should bring salvation to mankind is, therefore, good news for mankind, because it is an evidence of God's grace (Acts 14:3; 20:32; I Pet. 1:13). Secondly, all of them proclaim in the name of God that this good will certainly be presented to the believers, because God has already taken the first step toward its realization. In other words, the gospel is not a doctrine of divine properties—e.g., his love, fatherhood, or grace—but rather the proclamation of a divine activity in history. For Mark, the saving process starts with the appearance of the Baptist; the other evangelists and Paul see it in the birth of Jesus (e.g., Matt. 1:21; Luke 2:10-11; John 1:14; Rom. 1:3; Gal. 4:4). They are unanimously agreed, however, that the process has reached its most important stage in the public ministry of Jesus. For in that fact the divine purpose has been publicly proclaimed (e.g., Rom. 16:25; Eph. 6:19; cf. Isa. 52:7; Luke 4:21).

The center of the gospel is not the idea of "ultimate reality" underlying all existence (Tillich), nor the myth of the descent of the heavenly Redeemer (Bultmann), but rather a historical fact which is essential for the working out of God's redemptive purpose. The significance which the life and ministry of Jesus have for the salvation of mankind is interpreted in various ways in the NT—e.g., as atoning sacrifice, ransom, service, vicarious suffering, representative penalty, or as the origin of new life. But there is agreement throughout the NT that the public ministry of Jesus is not by itself the goal of God's plan, but rather the indispensable means for its accomplishment. In the course of the second century, however, and as a result of increasing Hellenization, the gospel lost its eschatological character, and the Incarnation or the Cross was interpreted as completing, rather than starting, salvation.

b. Eschatological character. In the NT proclamation, the KINGDOM OF GOD approaches (Matt. 4:17; 10:7; Mark 1:15; Luke 10:9); i.e., the kingly rule of God is being established in this world, but this process will not be completed until the final victory of Christ (Rev. 11:15; cf. Acts 1:6). The Christians are not yet "saved"—i.e., brought to a full life in the strict sense of the word; they are σωζόμενοι (I Cor. 1:18; cf. 15:2)—i.e., rendered ready for that condition. God has begun his good work in them but not yet completed it (e.g., Phil. 1:6; Col. 1:23). While God has sealed his gospel with the death of Christ and the gift of the Spirit (e.g., Rom. 8:23; II Cor. 1:22), the believers have not yet reached their destination, and they may slide back (e.g., Col. 1:22-23; Heb. 8:12; cf. II Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:27). Hence, it is natural that the gospel should include warnings to be watchful (e.g., Matt. 24:42-43; 25:13; Mark 13:33, 35, 37; Luke 12:37-38; I Cor. 16:13; Eph. 6:18; I Thess. 5:6; I Pet. 4:7; Rev. 3:3; cf. Matt. 22:11-13). The DAY OF THE LORD or of the SON OF MAN (e.g., Matt. 7:22; 10:15; 11:22; 24:36, 42; Mark 13:32; Luke 17:21), which is the clinching event in the work of redemption, still lies ahead (John 6:39-40, 44, 54; 12:48; Rom. 2:16; I Cor. 1:8; 3:13; 5:5; Eph. 4:30; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2:16; I Thess. 5:2, 4; II Thess. 1:10), or, according to another terminology, not until the coming in glory of the Son of man (e.g., Matt. 24:30, 42; 26:64; Mark 13:26; 14:62; Luke 21:27; I Cor. 11:26; Eph. 5:6; Heb. 10:37; cf. Rev. 1:4, 8; 4:8; 22:17 [ὁ ἐρχόμενος]) or the PAROUSIA (e.g., Matt. 24:3, 27, 37, 39; I Cor. 15:23; 16:17; I Thess. 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; II Thess. 2:8; Jas. 5:7-8; II Pet. 1:16; 3:4, 12; I John 2:28) will the full restoration of the universe take place (Matt. 17:11; Mark 9:12; Acts 1:6; 3:21; cf. Rom. 8:19-20). All that God in his grace does for the believers is but a preliminary work "that in the coming ages he might show the immeasurable riches of his grace in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:7). The glory of Jesus as God's chosen instrument of redemption has not yet been revealed (ἀποκαλύπτω; Luke 17:30; Rom. 8:18; I Cor. 1:7; II Thess. 1:7; I Pet. 1:5, 7, 13; 4:13; 5:1) or manifested (φανερόω; John 7:4; Col. 3:4; I John 2:28; 3:2).

That closing event will not be a blessing for all. For it is also a day of judgment (II Pet. 2:9; 3:7; I John 4:17) or of wrath (Rom. 2:5) and visitation (I Pet. 2:12), to which all men will be subjected (II Cor. 5:10; cf. Eph. 5:12-13). The coming of Christ offers an opportunity to escape condemnation (Rom. 8:1; cf. John 5:24), but only to those who keep his word. As in the OT, the judgment of doom is the inescapable alternative to salvation (Matt. 7:19; 24:37-39; Luke 17:28 ff; 21:34-35; II Cor. 1:18 ff; I Pet. 4:17), and it is from this final judgment that the gospel offers escape (e.g., Matt. 3:7; Luke 3:7; John 3:36; Rom. 1:18; 4:15; 5:9; Eph. 2:3; Col. 3:6; Rev. 6:16; 16:19). Moreover, the life everlasting is not a matter of experience yet for the believer. It is only by faith (Eph. 2:8) and hope (Rom. 8:24) that we anticipate our salvation.

*c. The divine good. God's ultimate goal is described in the gospel both negatively and positively. It is a removal of all that renders human life worthless, such as poverty, lack of freedom, invalidity, oppression (Luke 4:18=Isa. 61:1), in a physical as well as a spiritual sense; furthermore, sorrow, want, persecution (Matt. 5:4, 6, 10), pain, anguish, and death (e.g., Rev. 21:4; cf. I Cor. 15:55-56), and above all sin (e.g., Matt. 26:28; Luke 24:47; Rom. 3:25; Heb. 9:26). Positively, God's goal is life everlasting (e.g., John 20:31)—i.e., righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit (Rom. 14:17)—which results from Christ's victory over all the cosmic forces (e.g., Rom. 8:28, 35-39; I Cor. 15:24; Phil. 2:10). The Christian life is not described as a gradual approach or development toward this goal—though there are degrees of spiritual life (e.g., Matt. 25:14-30; Luke 19:11-27)—but rather as an existence in which, despite difficulties, dangers, and shortcomings, we can be sure of eventually obtaining the goods of salvation, because God has destined the believers for them. They are called a divine inheritance (e.g., Acts 20:32; 26:18; Rom. 8:17; Eph. 1:11, 14, 18; Col. 1:12; 3:24; Heb. 9:15; I Pet. 1:4), a safe heavenly deposit (e.g., Col. 1:5; cf. I Tim. 1:12; II Tim. 4:8), or a heavenly treasure (Mark 10:21; Luke 12:33; 18:22; cf. II Cor. 4:7). We can rightly consider them as belonging to us, but we will not be able to use and enjoy them fully until the DAY OF THE LORD.

The divine good offered in the gospel is realized in history but not by history. It consists of participation in the kingdom of heaven or of God, and the kingdom is the manifestation of a divine purpose in history. Its operation becomes visible, above all, in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ. He, however, is not a mere revelation of God's purpose, for that would mean that God operated in everything and everywhere in a saving manner, which manifestly he does not. Rather, Jesus is described as the actual realization of God's plan of redemption (οἰκονομία; Eph. 1:10; 3:2, 9; Col. 1:25; or θέλημα; e.g., Matt. 6:10; 26:42; Luke 22:42; John 4:34; 5:30; 6:38; Rom. 1:10; I Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:4; Eph. 1:9; Heb. 10:7; I Pet. 2:15; I John 5:14; cf. Acts 13:46). Over against God's redemptive work under the Old Covenant or the dispensation of the law, God's way of dealing with men through Jesus is an entirely new one. Jesus is, therefore, contrasted with the Law of Moses (e.g., John 1:17; 6:32; 7:19; Rom. 10:5; cf. Rom. 5:20; Gal. 3:17) and the priestly system of the OT (e.g., Heb. 7:23–10:18).

The primitive church expressed the fact that Jesus starts the actualization of God's redemptive plan by calling him, in conformity with OT prophecies, the Messiah or Christ—i.e., the Anointed One; and Jesus saw in the fact that Peter could confess him so an evidence of a divine revelation given to his disciples (Matt. 16:17; there is no ground for considering this passage spurious), and that his saving work was progressing. Jesus called himself the Son (Matt. 11:27; 21:37-38; Luke 10:22; John 3:35; 5:19), meaning thereby Son of God (Matt. 26:64 and parallels; cf. Matt. 4:1-11; Luke 4:1-13), and expressed thereby the fact that what he did in his public ministry was effective because it was not an isolated historical event, but rather the supreme manifestation of the life-giving activity of God. The primitive church adopted the two titles and added that of Lord, indicating thereby that Jesus had successfully overcome the opposition of the powers of evil in this world. His resurrection was evidence of his lordship. The adoption of these OT titles shows that, notwithstanding the historical contrast between the work of Jesus and the Old Covenant, both are stages of redemptive history. The ministry of Jesus is the fulfilment of the OT predictions (e.g., Luke 24:27; Acts 3:22) and the antitype of the OT types (e.g., John 3:14; I Cor. 10:2; Rev. 15:3; and the Transfiguration, Matt. 17:1-8 and parallels). See CHRIST.

Jesus' life makes manifest that the goal pursued by God is the same intimate fellowship of children with their father (Matt. 5:9, 45; Luke 6:35; Rom. 8:16, 21; Gal. 3:26; Eph. 1:5; 5:1; I John 3:1, 10) that Jesus had with God (e.g., John 10:38; 14:11). This goal is reached through belief in Christ. In the believers, the Savior calls forth what had characterized him as the Son of God—viz., knowledge of God's redemptive plan (e.g., Matt. 11:27; John 10:15; 17:25), willingness to do his will (e.g., Matt. 26:42; Luke 22:42; John 4:34; 5:30; cf. Matt. 5:18), and power to overcome the forces of evil in this world (e.g., Matt. 10:1; Mark 6:7; Luke 9:1). His strength is that of the messianic age (cf. Mark 1:7), and his miracles are, therefore, anticipations of the world to come, from which all antidivine powers will be excluded. But the secret of the messianic power consists in not opposing evil (Matt. 5:39; Rom. 12:21), and this will result in suffering. However, suffering which springs from a strictly positive and constructive life —i.e., from love—eventually triumphs over evil. Thereby the glory of the perfection of God's life is revealed (Matt. 5:48; II Cor. 4:4). Accordingly, the believers are not only healed, delivered from demoniac possession, comforted, and forgiven, but also born again—i.e., made capable of a life in harmony with God's saving plan (e.g., Matt. 18:3; John 3:3; 5:24; I Cor. 4:15; Eph. 2:1, 5; 6:15; II Tim. 2:10; Jas. 1:18; I Pet. 1:3, 23; I John 3:14)—and reconciled with God and the world (e.g., Rom. 5:10; II Cor. 5:18-20; cf. Rom. 5:1; Eph. 6:5). Their very conversion is the work of Christ (Rom. 1:16-17; Phil. 1:27). Their faith and their love result from the fact that he changes them into his likeness (Rom. 8:29; II Cor. 3:18; Phil. 3:21; I John 3:2; cf. Col. 1:4), and from faith and love results the comprehension (ἐπίγνωσις) of God's redemptive work (e.g., I Cor. 13:12; Eph. 1:17; 4:13; Col. 1:6, 9-10; 2:2; I Tim. 2:4; II Pet. 1:2-3). Thus the believers are established (e.g., Rom. 1:11; II Cor. 1:21; Eph. 6:13; I Thess. 3:2; II Pet. 1:12)—i.e., enabled to look steadfastly toward their goal in a world of flux, uncertainty, and confusion. Through the gospel (I Cor. 9:23)—i.e., through belief in Jesus—his followers not only receive all they need to be true men (e.g., Matt. 6:8; 7:7, 11; Luke 22:35; Phil. 4:11; Jas. 1:5; I John 2:27), but are also enabled to do everything that is required of them (II Cor. 12:9-10; Eph. 6:10-11, 13; Phil. 2:18; 4:13; Col. 1:11; II Tim. 4:17). Though there will be sufferings and afflictions in their Christian life, these too result from the fact that the life of Christ is reproduced in them (Rom. 8:17; II Cor. 4:10; Gal. 6:17; Eph. 3:13; Phil. 1:20, 29; 4:13; I Thess. 1:6; 2:14).

d. Holy history. Thus, not only the ministry of Jesus, but also the church, is proclaimed in the gospel. The story of the ministry of Jesus, taken by itself, would reveal the superiority and divinity of Jesus only, but would not cogently imply his saving significance. The way, however, in which the gospel is spread under the guidance of Christ, especially the discovery of a non-Jewish way of faith, but also the love which the Christians show for all people, reveals the universal goal of the gospel (e.g., Col. 1:5-6, 23, 28; I Thess. 1:7; II Thess. 3:1). Its power (Rom. 1:16) is brought to light in the signs and miracles performed by those who proclaim it (e.g., Matt. 10:1; Mark 6:7; 16:17; Luke 9:1; Acts 14:3; I Cor. 2:4; I Thess. 1:5), in the numerical growth of the church (e.g., Acts 19:20; cf. I Cor. 1:18; II Cor. 6:7), in the fruits it bears, especially faith and love (e.g., Matt. 13:23 and parallels; John 15:1-16; Rom. 6:22; II Cor. 4:4; Eph. 5:9; Col. 1:4-6; I Thess. 2:8), for which reason it is also called a gospel of peace (Eph. 6:15). In turn, when their conduct is evil, it is not they but the word of God that is disparaged and scoffed at (Tit. 2:5). As the word of truth (e.g., II Cor. 6:7; Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5; Jas. 1:18), the gospel authenticates itself in the congregation by so completely taking control of the lives of people (II Cor. 2:14) that in their being and actions they become its witnesses (Matt. 10:18; 24:14; Mark 13:9; Acts 1:8; 3:15; 13:31-32; 22:15; I Cor. 15:15; Gal. 5:3; Eph. 4:17; cf. I Pet. 2:12); i.e., they are ready to make a stand for it and to identify themselves with Christ's cause, no matter what the consequences will be (e.g., Rom. 16:25; I Cor. 15:1; Eph. 6:14; Phil. 1:12-14). The calm and steadfastness of believers in times of persecution and oppression brings out the truthfulness of the gospel (e.g., Phil. 1:7, 16). Finally, in the ongoing character of these manifestations, the NT recognizes the gospel as the "living and abiding word of God" (I Pet. 1:23). The first converts, e.g., are the first fruits presaging a rich crop (Rom. 16:5; I Cor. 16:15; Rev. 14:4) or mighty wells of living water (John 4:14) to quell the spiritual thirst of many.

Thus in the fact that their life is the realization of the gospel—i.e., the light (Eph. 5:13)—the believers experience it as the gospel of grace (I Pet. 1:13; cf. Acts 14:3; 20:32) and the love of Christ (Eph. 3:19), which comes to them and seeks them despite their sinfulness (Eph. 2:1-4). In their serving the gospel, it is the heavenly Christ or the grace of God in them who is active (I Cor. 15:10; II Cor. 6:7; Eph. 1:13; 3:17), and the life of the church is, therefore, the "gospel of the glory of Christ" (II Cor. 4:4, 10-11; cf. Phil. 1:20).

Bibliography. O. Cone, The Gospel and Its Earliest Interpretations (1893); W. P. DuBose, The Gospel in the Gospels (1906); M. Burrows, "The Origin of the Term 'Gospel,'" JBL, XLIV (1925), 21-33; O. A. Petty, Did the Christian Use of the Term τὸ εὐαγγέλιον Originate with Paul? (1925); G. A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (1927), pp. 370-72; J. Schniewind, Evangelion, Ursprung und erste Gestalt des Begriffs Evangelium (1927); M. J. Lagrange, L'Évangile de Jésus-Christ (2nd ed., 1928); M. Dibelius, The Message of Jesus (English trans.; 1933); W. H. P. Hatch, "The Primitive Christian Message," JBL, LVIII (1934), 1-13; E. Molland, Das paulinische Evangelium (1934); C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development (1936); R. Asting, Die Verkündigung im Urchristentum (1939); E. Percy, Die Botschaft Jesu (1953); B. Reicke, "A Synopsis of Early Christian Preaching," in A. J. Fridrichsen, ed., The Root and the Vine (1953); H. A. Blair, A Creed Before the Creeds (1955); L. Cerfaux, La voix vivante de l'Évangile au début de l'Église (1956). O. A. PIPER

GOSPEL, APOCRYPHAL ə pŏk'rə fəl. A form of composition suggested by the canonical gospels. The apocryphal gospels fall into three classes: (a) early gospels, presumably superficially similar in outward form to the canonical gospels, and known to us solely from occasional references and quotations in the fathers; (b) infancy gospels; (c) passion gospels. For further description and a list of those to which separate articles are devoted herein, see APOCRYPHA, NT. M. S. ENSLIN

GOSPELS. The sole literary form that is peculiar to Christianity. The oldest exemplar of this form available to us is the writing which the church has long called the Gospel According to Mark (see MARK, GOSPEL OF). It probably is also the first ever written, in spite of the "many" predecessors mentioned in Luke 1:1 who had "undertaken to compile a diegesis" ("treatise, account," not "gospel"!) of related content. We cannot know with certainty just how rhetorical this "many" may be, but similar prologues from Hellenistic literature indicate that this word was conventional in such a passage (it may well be the most "literary" sentence in the whole NT) and suggest that it may mean only "more than one": Mark itself and perhaps the hypothetical Q, which, though not a "gospel," was an "account." See Q.

The anonymous compiler of Mark unwittingly invented a new genre of literature—unwittingly because he shows himself an unliterary man unacquainted with high literature, either Semitic or Greek, and ambitious for no literary glory but only to record the message of salvation. Unintentionally he also contributed the eventual name of this new form, which was derived from, but not identical with, the title he gave his book. The present title, "Gospel According to Mark," uniform with the titles of the other three gospels, is a by-product of the compiling of the NT into one collection. This title did not replace the original one; the latter remained, but now as the first sentence of the text itself: "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." "Gospel" here, however, is not this or any book, but the evangel, the Christian good news (see GOSPEL). Many commentators consider John the Baptist to be meant by the word "beginning"; if so, this title belongs only to the small section 1:2-11. But it is more likely that ἀρχή ("beginning") has here its not uncommon meaning "origin." In that case the original title named the whole book quite appropriately: Origin of the Jesus-Christ-Son-of-God Evangel. Just when this title was abbreviated to the single word "gospel" ("evangel") to denote any book of the same type as Mark, there is no way of knowing. The first sure testimony to such usage is the occurrence of the plural ("the memoirs . . . which are called Gospels") in Just. Apol. I.66, written probably A.D. 150-60 (cf. Diogn. 11.6).

To ask what a gospel is, is really to ask what Mark is. Mark is the folk book of the folk called Christian. As such, it is primarily a mirror of the life of this folk during the two generations until the book was written down. This mirror reflects the community's recent origin, but reflects only so much of its origin and of him who was its impetus and continuing guide as was relevant to the ongoing life of the community.

But this was a sacral community, the church. Therefore, one must speak more precisely of Mark—i.e., ecclesiologically: Mark, as the folk book of the church, is its cult legend. In it the church is assuring itself of its own existence, its possibility of existing, its reason for existing, and its ways of existing (proclamation, sacraments, prayer, exorcism, eschatological expectation, incipient polity), and particularly of its relation to deeds and words of Jesus of Nazareth, above all to his death and resurrection.

The writer, who never speaks in the first person or addresses his readers in the second person, is more editor-compiler than author. Having at his disposal, not by research but by participating in the life of the church, some ninety mostly unconnected anecdotes, he puts them together almost at random, sometimes grouping them by resemblance in content (it may be a single word), sometimes arbitrarily juxtaposing them with a meaningless "and then" or "in those days." (Only rarely is a geographical or chronological datum inherently anchored in the very substance of a tradition; then the preceding generalization does not hold.) Just as it makes no difference for preaching today when Jesus healed the blind man but only that he did so, neither did it matter to preaching before Mark—nor does it really matter in Mark; it only seems to do so, because a written document, unlike living memory, cannot contain all things at once but only seriatim.

Matthew (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF) has been aptly called an expanded edition of Mark. Luke (see LUKE, GOSPEL OF) shows some will toward a more literary and more historical product, but that will was largely frustrated by the very nature of the source materials inherited from Mark and Q; Luke undoubtedly has more polish than Mark, but its character is basically predetermined by Mark. Within the canon only John shows a decided development beyond the type established in Mark. Its author—the only really tangible author-personality among the evangelists—has well-nigh converted the unconscious folk art of Mark into a new art form of the high arts, something akin to drama: a personal confession of faith which deals in sovereign freedom with the traditional materials. If we possessed more than we do of the early Jewish apocryphal gospel(s) and the main body of the Gospel of Peter, we could better say to what extent they are rectilinear developments of the canonical gospels. The INFANCY GOSPELS have more in common with the Hellenistic novel than with the canonical gospels.

The gospels have no literary ancestors. They do have analogies. The best analogy would have to have three qualifications: (a) ultimate provenience in folk tradition; (b) a numinous character associated with continuing religious use; (c) a content of both words and deeds. In varying proportions these qualifications are filled by the Apophthegmata Patrum (a corpus of stories known in Greek, Latin, and Sahidic about the piety of the anchorites in the Sketic Desert —long read for the edification of monks), by the various folk anthologies concerning Francis of Assisi, and by the traditions concerning the Great Maggid (the successor and chief disciple of the eighteenth-century founder of Chassidism; both men were soon accorded great veneration). The first collection lacks any single, unifying, central figure; the other two had less official approval than the first. In any case, they are only analogies to the gospels.

Canonization inhibited the further development of the form, but some consider the lives of Jesus, which flourished in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, as a modern mutation of the gospel form. See also JESUS CHRIST; SYNOPTIC PROBLEM. K. GROBEL

GOSSIP. The conversation or light talk (tittle-tattle) of a newsmonger and a tattler (Ezek. 36:3; II Cor. 12:20); or an intentional slanderer (Jer. 9:4—H 9:3) and a hater of God (Rom. 1:29). Several terms are used to denote "gossip," "gossiping," or "one who gossips." In the OT, דבה (Ezek. 36:3) is translated "evil gossip" (KJV "an infamy"); רכיל is translated "he who goes about gossiping" in Prov. 20:19 (KJV "he that goeth about as a talebearer"), but elsewhere this term is variously rendered as "whisperer," "slanderer," "he who goes about as a talebearer." In the NT, ψιθυριστής (Rom. 1:29; KJV "whisperers") and φλύαρος (I Tim. 5:13; KJV "tattlers") are translated "gossips," and ψιθυρισμός (II Cor. 12:20) is translated "gossip" (KJV "whisperings").

According to Prov. 20:19, he who goes about gossiping unavoidably reveals secrets. Gossips are likely to be idlers, according to I Tim. 5:13—i.e., either lazy or careless in their use of time and energy. In his Second Letter to the Corinthians, Paul attempted to move them to repentance (12:19-21); as a part of this attempt he listed certain sins which he feared he would find, were he to visit them. In this list he ranked gossip with quarreling, jealousy, anger, selfishness, slander, conceit, and disorder. An even sharper condemnation of gossips is implicit in Rom. 1:29-30.

H. F. BECK

GOTHIC VERSION. A translation made by Bishop Ulfilas ca. A.D. 365. This version is the oldest surviving literary remains of a Teutonic dialect. See VERSIONS, ANCIENT, § 6.

GOTHOLIAH gŏth'ə lī'ə [Γοθολίας]; KJV GOTHOLIAS —əs. Apoc. form of ATHALIAH 3.

GOTHONIEL gō thŏn'ĭ əl [Γοθονιήλ=עתניאל] (Jth. 6:15). The father of Chabris, one of the elders of Judith's city of Bethulia.

GOUGING EYES. The verb נקר, "bore, pick, dig, hollow out," is often used with "eye" as the accusative. In Judg. 16:21; I Sam. 11:2—H 11:3 this verb is translated "gouge" (cf. Num. 16:14; Job 30:17, where the accusative should be noted; Prov. 30:17; Isa. 51:1).

According to I Sam. 11:1-4, the men of Jabesh sued Nahash the Ammonite for peace after he had besieged their lands; the Ammonite king accepted their request on condition that the right eyes of all the men of Jabesh be gouged out. This attempt to make the men of Jabesh the laughingstock of the surrounding peoples was influential in arousing Saul to a position of military leadership in Israel. The Ammonite king probably intended no more than an insult, though some interpreters suggest that he meant to render the men of Jabesh unfit for war.

The custom of gouging out the eyes of captives was widespread. The Assyrians commonly blinded their captives with sharp instruments and are pictured doing so on their own monuments. The Philistines put out Samson's eyes before carrying him off to the prison at Gaza (Judg. 16:21). When the Babylonians captured Jerusalem in 586, they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and then they put out his eyes and carried him into captivity (II Kings 25:7).

H. F. BECK

GOURD. The KJV identification of the PLANT (קיקיון, qîqāyôn) in Jonah 4:6-7, 9-10 (cf. vs. 5!). The RSV avoids identifying this plant. The LXX uses κολοκύνθη, "gourd"; the Vulg. hederam, "ivy." The KJV and the ERV-ASV translate "gourd," with "Palma Christi" (also "palmcrist," the castor bean, Ricinus communis L.) in the margin. The Cucurbita lagenaria L., the "bottle-gourd" (also called Lagenaria leucantha [Duch.] Rusby), often used for booths and trellises in the Near East, fits the context and is claimed by some scholars to be the plant intended; thus the translation "gourd." The castor bean has been the usual identification. The Egyptian name, kiki, for the castor bean, and other linguistic arguments have led to this conclusion. The evidence is inconclusive.

See also FLORA § A16*a;* JONAH. For other references to gourds, see GOURDS, WILD.

Bibliography. I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden, I:2 (1928), 608-11; H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 203-4.

J. C. TREVER

GOURDS, WILD [פקעות, paqqū'ôth; פקעים, p'qā'îm; root in cognate languages means to crack, burst]. Wild vines with a poisonous fruit, probably Citrullus colocynthis (L.) Schrad.* Paqqū'ôth (feminine plural) appears only in II Kings 4:39 (LXX τολύπη, "gourd"), described as a wild vine (lit., "vine of the field"). One of the "sons of the prophets" at Gilgal, during a famine, gathered the fruit from these vines for food. The men were made ill, and they appealed to Elisha for help. "VINE OF SODOM" (Deut. 32:32) probably refers to the same plant. Fig. GOU 36.

36. Wild gourd (Citrullus colocynthis)

P'qā'îm (masculine plural) is used to describe the shape of the carved decorations on the cedar paneling of the nave of Solomon's temple (I Kings 6:18; KJV "knops") and of the two rows of bronze decorations directly beneath the rim of the "molten sea" (I Kings 7:24). The exact significance of these decorations is not clear. Elsewhere they consist of "cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers" (I Kings 6:29, 32, 35). In II Chr. 4:3 the decorations under the rim of the "molten sea" are said to be "oxen" (KJV; Hebrew bᵉqārîm), apparently an error (cf. "oxen" in the next verse, referring to the pedestals) for "gourds" (so RSV, following I Kings 7:24).

See also FLORA § A14*d;* SEA, MOLTEN.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 78-80. J. C. TREVER

GOVERNMENT. Biblical data on the various forms and procedures of Israelite-Jewish government and political administration are incidental to, yet integrally part of, the writers' and editors' presentation of the historical experience of their people, an experience extending over a period of some fifteen hundred years. Although we may distinguish between the biblical writers' and editors' interpretation of Israel's history and the empirical facts of that history, the latter no less than the former bear the stamp of a revolutionary conviction that harks back to the period of Israel's earliest consciousness of its peoplehood: the belief that man stands apart from nature in a special relationship with the sole creative source of all reality—namely, with God. Since this theory of the divine-human relationship marked Israel off from the other cultures and civilizations of the ancient Near East, constituted the ordering principle of their society, and is ultimately responsible for the existence of the Bible itself, it must be regarded as fundamental and formative for the Bible's account of Israelite-Jewish political norms and institutions (see COVENANT; ELECTION). The same master conviction defines the biblical counterparts of the psychological and sociological prepossessions which generally determine, or at least help to constitute, a people's choice and development of its political forms and institutions: conceptions of human personality, interpersonal relationships (particularly, in the present connection, the reciprocal relationship between leaders and followers), and modes of social structuring and stratification (see SOUL; TRIBE; FAMILY; etc.). While Israel inherited, shared, absorbed, or was influenced by the conceptions of these matters which appear elsewhere in the cultures and civilizations of the ancient Near East, they confront us in the Bible under the "sign of the covenant," hence transformed, transvalued, or otherwise modified.

A. Nomadic Israel
  1. "Primitive democracy"
  2. Social and political affiliation
  3. Political authority and administration
B. Israel as a tribal confederacy in Canaan
  1. Political organization and action
  2. The judges
  3. The emergence of kingship
C. The Israelite monarchies
  1. The king
  2. The functioning of the kingship
    a. Civil administration
    b. War and diplomacy
D. Israel and Judah under oriental imperialism
  1. Assyrian and Chaldean domination
  2. Persian rule
E. Jewish political institutions in Hellenistic and Roman times
  1. The independent Hasmonean commonwealth
  2. Roman rule
Bibliography

A. NOMADIC ISRAEL. The Israelites' own traditions of their remotest origins and of their history before they established themselves in Canaan exhibit familiar acquaintance with the two main modes of life in the ancient Near East and the social, economic, and political institutions of each: that of the nomad or seminomad keeper of flocks and herds in the desert steppe (see NOMADISM), and that of the town-dwelling cultivator of crops in the sown land. While these traditions only later assumed the form in which they are now before us in the Pentateuch, they were already circulating when at least some of the Israelite tribes were nomads in the desert steppes. Brought into Canaan from the desert, they still occasionally reflect the early Israelite nomad's aversion to the urban life of the sown. This motif, e.g., appears in the tradition which makes of Cain, the first murderer, a "tiller of the ground" (Gen. 4:2) and the first builder of a city (Gen. 4:17); it can be glimpsed again in the narratives about Lot (Gen. 14; 19) and the misfortunes which beset him when he quit the nomadic life and took up settled residence in the city of Sodom. In pointed contrast with Lot (Gen. 13), the prospering eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews, Abram, is represented as having left the Mesopotamian cities of Ur and Haran, or their environs, to wander with flocks and herds in the Canaanite steppelands (Gen. 11:31; 12:5-6).

Such steppe-born criticism of life in the sown persisted beyond the conquest and settlement of Canaan to influence all later Israelite social and political thought and institutions. The attitudes reflected in and engendered by this criticism are those to which Samuel appealed in his famous excoriation of monarchy (I Sam. 8:11-18)—and which, parenthetically, make it unnecessary to assume that such a speech could not have been uttered in the premonarchic period. These same attitudes underlie, reinforce, even make possible, the prophets' denunciations of various manifestations of the syncretizing Canaanite-Israelite culture (e.g., Hosea). The nomad's abhorrence of urban life in the sown so far persisted in one postconquest Israelite group—the Rechabites—that they raised it to the level of a sacred, defining principle (Jer. 35:2-10). See RECHAB.

1. "Primitive democracy." Among both the town-dwelling peasants of ancient Mesopotamia, Syria, and Canaan and the pastoral nomads of the abutting steppelands, the earliest forms of political life were democratic. Autocratic institutions, including monarchical rule, were developed in the cities of the sown as responses to needs which an earlier "primitive democracy" could not successfully meet, while democratic forms persisted among the wandering tribes of the desert steppe. Ultimate sovereign power, in this "primitive democracy" or "primitive theocratic socialism," was vested in an assembly of all free men, though most public business was in the hands of a group of elders consisting of the heads of families and other leading personalities (see ELDER). Important decisions of legislative or judicial character were arrived at by consensus. Executive authority, normally left to the elders, was in time of war or other emergency delegated to the man or men deemed most capable of achieving a favorable outcome.

The changes whereby such a democracy gave way to a centralized monarchic system have been successfully traced in Sumerian and Old Assyrian records of the third pre-Christian millennium. The process was one in which the earlier democracy's provision for delegated, short-term executive authority in times of crisis was extended and permanently institutionalized, while the authority of the popular assembly and of the elders was completely subordinated to that of the executive.

Allowing for certain differences in the Syrian-Canaanite sector of the Fertile Crescent, such as rulership based on kinship and the lack of a genuinely indigenous civilization capable of imposing its norms on those entering it from without, the institutions of various nomad invaders, including those of Israel, passed through a parallel process. In the case of Israel, however, the covenant-consciousness of her people constituted a further decisive difference which prevented her monarchical institutions from functioning as they did in Mesopotamia or even among the kindred Syrian-Canaanite peoples; and it is the covenant-stamped "primitive democracy" of Israel which enabled her to survive the destruction of her monarchies.

2. Social and political affiliation. As with many other nomadic peoples, common descent, rather than common residence within a specific geographical area, naturally constituted the primary criterion of affiliation in preconquest Israel and the basis of her political organization. Even after the conquest of Canaan, this genealogical principle was never fully transcended, but, having been used to determine and to name the various tribal areas of settlement, later managed to survive the monarchy which it never ceased to plague (e.g., II Sam. 20:1; I Kings 12:16) and which sought to annul or to neutralize it (e.g., I Kings 4:7-19). The Israelite was born into a "household" (בית) or "father's house" (בית אב) which was part of a "clan" or "family" (משפחה, אלף) belonging to a "tribe" (מטה, שבט); all these together comprised the "people" (עם) of Israel (Num. 2:34; Josh. 7:14) or "sons of Israel" (בני ישראל). In early Israelite consciousness these terms were not nearly so mathematically graded as such passages as those just cited might seem to indicate. Dan, e.g., generally called a tribe, is sometimes referred to as a clan (Judg. 18:2); so, too, is Judah (Judg. 17:7). Similarly, the household or father's house is not always clearly differentiated from the family or clan; the paschal lamb, e.g., which the Israelites are told to "take . . . according to their fathers' houses, a lamb for a household" (Exod. 12:3), was to be slaughtered "according to your families" (vs. 21). If the terms overlap and merge into one another, this is because all basically refer to kinship circles radiating out from the "father" as a center, a "soul" which included everything that pertained to him and in which whatever larger whole of which he was a part was felt to be present. As biblical usage amply demonstrates, however, all these terms go beyond a mechanically applied notion of consanguinity; even the narrowest in point of kinship, the "house," could be used to designate the Rechabites, meaning all who chose to follow the nomadic ideal as promulgated by Jonadab son of Rechab (Jer. 35:18) and not merely the latter's own offspring. Thus the terms refer to collectivities or communities which are homogeneous in point of one or more characteristics shared by their members, characteristics which might be not only those of a shared germ plasm, but also religious, moral, social, economic, and political. Just as "son of a prophet" did not necessarily mean a person whose father was a prophet, so a "son of Israel" did not necessarily mean one whose father was literally a carrier of the genes of the patriarchs, but one who shared the characteristics—history, way of life, and destiny—that constituted the "people" of Israel.

3. Political authority and administration. Politically speaking, the most important of these focuses of affiliation were the tribe and the people as a whole. For Israel's nomadic period our sources exhibit the tribes as united through the Sinaitic covenant and under a charismatic leader; the political institutions described are therefore those of the people as a whole, but there can be little doubt that the same, or very similar, institutions prevailed in the individual tribe. As between the political functioning of a single tribe and of a group of tribes, the most important difference would seem to lie in the altered responsibilities of the tribal chief (cf. Num. 1:4, 16; 13:2), many of whose leadership functions would now pass to the charismatic leader of the whole people; while other duties, the necessity to discharge which would arise out of the linking of the tribes, would be assigned to him by the supreme leader (see, e.g., Num. 1:1-16; see also below).

The primary political institution of nomadic Israel was, as already indicated, the public ASSEMBLY, called the קהל and the עדה, generally translated as CONGREGATION. Both these terms, which are practically synonymous, mean all the adult males (Num. 26:2) of the people as convoked and gathered (=קהל), or as convened and assembled at stated times (=עדה), for public-welfare purposes; of the two, עדה is probably the more specifically technical in this sense. This assembly was the prime source of all authority over the people and the effective guarantor of all policy. Its most important members, achieving the dignity by seniority and experience, were the "elders" (זקנים); it was they, e.g., who accepted the leadership of Moses and of Aaron while Israel was yet in Egypt (Exod. 3:16; 4:29-31). They were neither a separate body, like a senate, nor, in any formal political sense, the official representatives of the assembly; rather, they were the assembly itself, in the ancient Hebrew manner of regarding a whole as completely present in its most characteristic parts. Whenever, therefore, the assembly was required for some action or decision, yet could not all be present, the elders would act as the entire body (see, e.g., Exod. 18:12; 24:1-2; Num. 11:16; Deut. 31:28, 30).

Besides the elders, mention is made of the "leaders of the congregation" (נשיאי העדה; Exod. 16:22; Num. 16:2; 32:2), the "summoned (ones) of the assembly" (קריאי העדה; Num. 1:16; 26:9), those "summoned to the assembly meeting" (קריאי מועד; Num. 16:2): the able and influential men whose presence was considered indispensable, but who might not, unless specially summoned, heed the trumpet call signaling the assembly's convocation (Num. 16:7).

The assembly functioned both deliberatively and judicially; an example of the former is the consideration of the report of the ten spies (Num. 13:26–14:4); of the latter, the hearing of the grievance of the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 27:1-4); and, as in the case of the sabbath violator, its members might execute capital offenders (Num. 15:32-36). They naturally figured largely in the cult system (e.g., Lev. 4:13-21; 8:3; 9:5; Num. 8:9-10; 15:22-26), in war and the division of booty (Num. 22:3-4 [קהל= "horde"]; 31:26), and in the allocation of conquered territory (Num. 32:2-5; Josh. 18–19). They participated in the making of covenants, human (Josh. 9: 15) and divine (Exod. 19:7-8; 24:1-4); were the immediate addressees of such far-reaching legislation as that declaring the equality of the alien and the native Israelite (Num. 15:15; הקהל should be translated "O assembly"); and were the natural audience of important compositions, like Moses' Song (Deut. 31:30–32:43).

The assembly's role in the initiation and execution of policies and laws was essentially passive, being consultative, corroboratory, and permissive, while the active role was in the hands of a supreme leader and those to whom he either delegated his powers or chose for the performance of specific functions. But the acceptance and confirmation of a leader, even if divinely commissioned, was, as mentioned above, the assembly's prerogative; and they had the power to depose him and to appoint another in his stead (Num. 14:1-4). This democratic motif was sufficiently strong to survive the transformation of Israel's political institutions in Canaan and to reassert itself at various junctures in her history under the monarchies (e.g., I Kings 12:3, 20; II Chr. 23:3). How strong it was in Israel's nomadic period, how well aware Israel was of the difference between a democratically sanctioned and limited leadership and monarchic despotism, is clearly seen in the taunt, hurled by Dathan and Abiram, that Moses was aspiring to royal authority (Num. 16:13). Regarded politically, indeed, each of the numerous "murmurings" of the people reported in the narratives of the Pentateuch (e.g., Exod. 14:10-12; 15:24-25; 16:2-3; 17:2-3; Num. 14:1-5; 16:1-11; etc.) was a threat to depose Moses from the leadership if the condition which caused the complaint were not abated. Although commissioned to the leadership by God—rather, precisely because he was believed to be so commissioned—he could be secure in it only so long as success and prosperity, the manifestations of the divine favor and sanction, attended his efforts and those of his appointees. Lack of prosperity, the losing of a battle (e.g., Josh. 7:2-9), or any kind of failure was attributable to a withdrawal of the divine power from the leader, and unless rectified or otherwise explained (e.g., Josh. 7:10-12), would have resulted in appointment of another leader. Failure of a succession of such leaders would inevitably have meant dissolution of the tribal confederacy, with its several components free to go their separate ways.

To aid him in the carrying out of his responsibilities, which, of course, were not merely political but extended over every aspect of the people's life, a supreme leader like Moses could and did delegate his authority to others. Such appointments might be for ad hoc purposes, such as for a census (Num. 1:1-16), for the construction of the tabernacle and the ark (Exod. 35:30 ff), or for a scouting mission (Num. 13); or they might be of a more permanent character, such as the institution of a judiciary (Exod. 18:13-26) or of a military organization (Num. 31:3-6, 14, 48-49, 52-54; Deut. 1:15). The tribal chiefs (נשיאי מטות אבותם [Num. 1:16; 7]; ראשי שבטיכם [Deut. 1:15]) were the most likely and politically tactful candidates for such offices, particularly that of JUDGE (שופט; see Num. 25:5) and of military commander (קצין; שר [Josh. 10:24]). Also at the leader's disposal were the people's own officers (שוטרים; Exod. 5:6-19 [RSV "foremen"]; Deut. 1:15; 20:5-9; Josh. 1:10; 3:2; 8: 33, see OFFICER), at least some of whom were elders (Num. 11:16), men who saw to it that the people did what was expected of them. It was in his capacity as supreme leader that Moses installed Aaron and his sons in the priesthood (Exod. 28:1; Lev. 8; Num. 3: 3-4) and assigned the Levites to specialized cult service (Num. 8:5-26). Perhaps not the least tribute to Moses' skill as the supreme political leader of nomadic Israel's turbulent and unstable tribal confederacy was the fact that he was able to ordain his own war adjutant, Joshua (Exod. 17:9), as his successor (Num. 27:15-23).

B. ISRAEL AS A TRIBAL CONFEDERACY IN CANAAN. Only as a covenanted tribal confederacy under skilful and experienced leadership could Israel have planned (e.g., Josh. 10) and carried out the military operations which, in the latter part of the thirteenth century B.C., weakened the Canaanite city-state feudalisms enough to permit a precarious grasp on portions of Transjordan and the central Palestinian hill country. During the next two centuries, a period of near-anarchy, the Israelite tribes had to fight to maintain these positions against the encroachments of other nomadic groups (e.g., the Midianites [Judg. 6]) and of neighboring peoples (e.g., the Moabite-Ammonite-Amalekite coalition [Judg. 3:12-30]; the recently arrived Philistines [Judg. 3:31; 13–16; I Sam. 4; etc.]), and to avoid extermination or reduction to slavery at the hands of the indigenous Canaanites (e.g., Judg. 4–5). In and from these positions they accomplished the transition to sedentary life in towns and villages, settling by clans and "fathers' houses" in territories allotted to and named after the tribes (Josh. 14–17; cf. Judg. 1); a tribe or clan which could not settle in, or lost, a territory originally allotted to it, "spied out" and took another as its "inheritance" (so Dan: Josh. 19: 40-48; Judg. 1:34; 18). Such of the native population as the Israelite tribes were unable or found it inexpedient to drive out continued to "dwell among them," subjected to forced labor (Judg. 1:30) or peaceably sharing a town (vs. 29); in other cases, Israelite tribes "dwelt among the Canaanites" (vss. 31-33).

The passage to sedentary life in the sown, had it been at the outset a haphazard process of infiltration instead of the deliberately intended enterprise of a covenanted confederacy of tribes under strong charismatic leadership, would much sooner have shown a far greater degree of assimilation to Canaanite political institutions than both the biblical and the available extrabiblical evidence permit us to trace. In sharp contrast to the feudal city-kingdoms of Canaan; the centralized monarchies of Edom, Moab, and Ammon; and the warrior-caste "tyrannies" of the Philistines, Israel's political organization at this time continued to be that of a loosely articulated tribal confederation, whose main principle of cohesion was the "covenant" with their God into which they had entered under the guidance of Moses; this cohesion had palpable representation in the "ark of the covenant," enshrined first at Gilgal and later at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1). The terms of the covenant (cf. Josh. 24:25), marking as they did a revolutionary break with the mythopoeic thought and nature-centered cults of the surrounding cultures, provided a rationale of the Israelite tribes' steppe-derived and genealogy-based political institutions which enabled these, with some modifications, to withstand fundamental revisions until the time of David, nearly two hundred years thence.

Early Israelite thinking, however, could not create a democracy functioning on the national level; the settlement of the tribes in different parts of the land, and the failure to provide for a permanent supreme leadership of the sort for which a precedent was at hand in Joshua's succession to Moses (see above), meant rather a refocusing and scaling down of the characteristic older political forms for use on the local and regional levels. The covenant outlook was itself inevitably corroded by the tendencies to syncretism latent in the historical circumstances. When, therefore, necessity later compelled the Israelites again to unite their forces under a supreme political leadership, the form of the latter could only be influenced, not fundamentally determined, by their covenant-derived ideas. Kingship (see KING), when it came, was essentially foreign, naturalized in Israel but not native to her.

1. Political organization and action. As Israel settled down in the areas which bore the tribal names, the tribes themselves retained importance as territorially grouped aggregates of the towns and villages in which the clans and "houses" lived; but it was the urban communities which now constituted the basic political units. Our sources, to be sure, are replete with accounts of tribal, intertribal, and joint tribal actions of political and military character; until the eve of the monarchy, defense against foreign enemies was left to the several tribes rather than to the whole confederacy. Within these accounts, however, tribal terms are ambiguous, not merely in the sense of territorial versus human-group reference (e.g., Judg. 5:14, 17-18; cf. the Hebrew usage which permits a noun like "house" to signify the people of the house), but also as regards the political organization implied. When, e.g., we read (Judg. 11:8) that the "elders of Gilead" asked Jephtha to become "head over all the inhabitants of Gilead," we do not know whether these elders were acting as part of Gilead's public assembly, as a duly constituted body composed of one elder from each village and town of Gilead, or simply as a random group who felt sure enough of their prestige to be able to make such an offer (Judg. 10:17-18). Moreover, only one action making specific mention of the public assembly of all Israel is recorded before the time of Samuel, the king-maker: that in which the Benjaminites were requited for the "wanton crime" committed by the men of Benjaminite Gibeah whom their fellow tribesmen refused to hand over for justice (Judg. 20–21). This was a case which outraged Israel's covenant conscience and probed the essential principle upon which the confederacy rested.

Every Israelite now lived in an urban community and was at least theoretically a member of its public assembly, which met daily "at the gate" (e.g., Ruth 3:11 [Hebrew "all the gate of my people"=RSV "all my fellow townsmen"]; 4:1, 9-10). Here all the public business of the community was transacted, messages requiring publication were received (Judg. 6: 34-35; 19:29-30), and political issues were debated and decided (Judg. 9:1-3). Actually, it was the elders, the heads of households and scions of important clans, who made the decisions; they were the mighty men of worth and valor (גבורי החיל; e.g., Judg. 6:12; of Boaz, in Ruth 2:1, RSV "man of wealth"), the nuclei of communal life and its authoritative upholders. One of these men might gain such prestige that the rest would generally defer to him. Such a man is depicted in Job 29:7-25, a classical description of an urban public assembly and the manner in which it carried on its business; the terms שרים ("princes"; vs. 9) and נגידים ("nobles"; vs. 10) of this passage, and others like נדיבים ("nobles"; Job 34:18) and נשיאים ("chiefs"; Josh. 22:14), are practically synonyms for these powerful elders, each emphasizing a particular nuance of the same basic conception (see PRINCE; NOBLES). In many cases the ruling elders all derived from a single, dominant family or clan; thus Ophrah, Gideon's city, belonged to the Abiezrites (Judg. 6:24), while the Gileadite villages "called Havvoth-jair" were in the hands of the thirty sons of Jair (Judg. 10:3); the Shechemites voluntarily accepted the dominance of Gaal son of Ebed and his clan, though they were but newcomers to the city, in order to rid themselves of Abimelech, whom they had previously accepted as their king, and of his deputy, Zebul (Judg. 9:26-41; Zebul is designated פקיד in vs. 28 and שר־העיר in vs. 30).

The elder-controlled city briefly outlined above remained the central core of Israelite political life to the exilic period; the law administered at the gates of such communities is still to be discerned in the book of Deuteronomy and in the Book of the Covenant. See COVENANT, BOOK OF THE.

Jealous of their independent sovereignty though they were, the communities of the several tribal territories and the tribes themselves recognized the need or desirability of concerted action for certain purposes and in certain circumstances. Of these, the most obvious was that of defense against foreign aggression; only less obvious was the need to protect the confederacy's own principle of cohesion, as demonstrated in the measures taken against the Benjaminites. On the positive side, if not quite so urgent, there was the common need to determine what ought and what ought not to be done in Israel (II Sam. 13: 12), especially "every great matter" and "hard cases"

(Exod. 18:22, 26). Thus, there were joint undertakings and interests which the clans and tribes felt duty-bound to share; loss of honor and reproach were the usual penalties for failure to participate (e.g., Judg. 5:15-17), though harsher sanctions might be imposed (Judg. 21:8-12); conversely, an unsummoned tribe, aggrieved by the implied aspersion of their honor and fearing the insecurity of exclusion from Israel, might resent to the point of hostility an omitted invitation (Judg. 8:1-3; 12:1-3). A message circulated through the communities of each tribal territory called out the clans (Judg. 6:34-35; a trumpet call sufficed to summon the Abiezrites, Gideon's own kinsmen); as the decision to participate rested with the clans, the message itself had to be effectively persuasive, and extraordinary means were occasionally used to make it so (Judg. 19:29-30; I Sam. 11:7). The senders of these messages were usually acknowledged leaders (e.g., Barak [Judg. 4:10]) or elders (I Sam. 11:3), but they might also be individuals with a case of transcendent importance (e.g., the Levite of Judg. 19:29).

2. The judges. The conditioned anarchy (cf. Judg. 17:6; 21:25) of the Israelite tribal confederacy depicted above could neither brook nor produce a supreme leadership such as that earlier exemplified by Moses and Joshua. The unbroken series of successes which would have been demanded of this sort of leadership as the guaranty of its divine sanction was simply not possible in the historical circumstances. The Israelites' traditions and covenant-consciousness, however, could and did combine with the political necessities of their circumstances to produce a more limited type of leadership—limited temporally to the surmounting of crises, and limited functionally to the rendering of judicial decisions in the spirit of Israel's unique attitude to life.

Hence emerged the figures whom we, not quite correctly, call the judges (see JUDGE). All of them were regarded as endowed with a special God-given strength and favor—a "charism," to adapt a Greek term—which, joined with their own powers, enabled them to perform the tasks they undertook on Israel's behalf (Judg. 6:14). Their charism, while not that of a Moses, was thought of as differing from the latter's only in degree. The accession of this divine endowment is frequently, though variously, described in the scriptural accounts: through prophecy (Barak [Judg. 4:6-9]); mediated by an angel or directly bestowed (Gideon [Judg. 6:12-24]); through military victory (Jephthah [Judg. 11:9]); through birth-annunciation and Naziriteship (Samson [Judg. 13:2-5]); etc. In other cases—e.g., the so-called "minor judges" (Judg. 10:1-5; 12:8-15)—such details are not recounted; but since to the Hebrew mind any outstanding human achievement indicates an accretion of strength derived from God, these must also be regarded as charismatic leaders.

Depending, as we are told of such leaders, that they (a) "delivered," (b) "delivered and judged," or (c) simply "judged" Israel, we may distinguish their several main types. Examples of the "deliverer" are Ehud (Judg. 3:15), Shamgar (Judg. 3:31), and Gideon (Judg. 6:14, 36); of the "deliverer-judge," Othniel (Judg. 3:9-10), Tola (Judg. 10:1-2), Jephtha (Judg. 11:33; 12:7), and Samson (Judg. 13:5; 15:18, 20); and of the "judge" only, Jair (Judg. 10:3-5), Ibzan (Judg. 12:8-10), Elon (Judg. 12:11-12), and Abdon (Judg. 12:13-15). (Of this list, Samson should probably be reckoned a "deliverer" rather than a "deliverer-judge," but the evidence seems to oppose the like reclassification of Jephtha suggested by some scholars.) We are also told of the prophetess Deborah (Judg. 4:4-5) and of the prophet Samuel (I Sam. 7:15-17), as well as of the priest Eli (I Sam. 4:18; probably, however, a redactional addition), that they "judged Israel"—references whose contexts make it clear that the function of the premonarchical "judge" (שופט) was juridical rather than gubernatorial. The "deliverer" (מושיע), as the passages cited above show, was primarily a military leader; in Hebrew, the term means one who not merely liberates others from some threatened disaster, but who opens to them the possibility of continuous self-development to the utmost of their capacities (the root meaning of ישע is "to be wide, capacious"), the sine qua non of שלום ("peace, well-being"). It is the "deliverer" in this latter, positive sense who most readily appropriates the rulership function in premonarchical Israel. As such a deliverer Gideon was offered the rulership of Israel (Judg. 8:22; the Hebrew term used here is exact: משל־בנו, "rule over us," not, as at 9:14, מלך־עלינו, "be king over us"; rulership, not kingship, was offered to Gideon and his house, but only to the third generation; every king is, of course, a ruler, but not every ruler is a king). Jephtha's ability to "deliver," not his ability to "judge," caused the people of Gilead to make "him head and leader over them" (Judg. 11:8-11; the Hebrew word for "leader" here, קצין, probably means "military commander," though it is derived from a root which means "to decide" and is related to the Arabic qâḍiⁿ, "judge"); there was nothing, it should be added, to preclude a "deliverer," any more than a prophet or prophetess, from also functioning as a "judge."

3. The emergence of kingship. For some two hundred years the Israelite tribal confederacy sought, through temporary charismatic leaders, to meet the obvious need of a central political authority. It was only when experience had proved temporary devices to be completely inadequate, and when, in addition, Philistine victories (I Sam. 4:1-10) posed the threat of extinction to the confederacy and of enslavement to its population (cf. I Sam. 11), that Israel at long last instituted a monarchy (ca. 1020 B.C.). The delay has its ultimate explanation in the fundamental character of a society whose cohesion centered in a divine covenant and whose major units were jealous of their covenant-sanctioned autonomy. Strictly speaking, such a society could not adopt a monarchy on the Canaanite city-state pattern without fundamental subversion of the principle of its identity; the attempt of Abimelech to create a monarchy of this kind ended, as it was bound to do, in complete failure (Judg. 9).

A charismatic leadership that was temporary, on the other hand, was not inconsistent with Israel's basic constitution, but was not always available when needed and could not be depended upon to outlast the crisis which evoked it. The offer to make Gideon, his son, and his grandson (but not beyond) in turn "ruler" (Judg. 8:22) must be understood as an effort to solve the leadership problem on Israelite premises through an extension of the charism's temporal limits; Gideon's refusal of the offer (vs. 23) represents, in its insistence upon the theocratic principle, a conservative Israelite's denial that any change was necessary.

The attempt of SAMUEL to solve the problem through a continuing (possibly hereditary) judiciary, in addition to foundering on the moral unfitness of his own sons (I Sam. 8:1-5), failed to provide for the sustained military leadership and executive authority required to contain the Philistine threat. As Samuel's own effort shows, he was not opposed to introduction of a permanent centralization of political authority as such, but only to setting up the "deliverer," the military leader, rather than the "judge," as the supreme political officer in Israel. The disadvantages of a monarch who was primarily a military leader were graphically pointed out by Samuel (I Sam. 8: 11-18), but the people's insistence upon a king who could fight their battles (I Sam. 8:20) was not to be denied. Accordingly, SAUL son of Kish, having been designated by Samuel, the priest-prophet-judge who was the prime representative of Israel's sacred covenant tradition (I Sam. 10:1), having been accepted and acclaimed by all save "some worthless fellows" (vs. 27) at a public assembly held at Mizpah (vss. 17, 24), and having proved his charism by a victory over the Ammonites (I Sam. 11), was made Israel's first king by the people "before the LORD in Gilgal" (vs. 15).

Saul's kingship was still far more an Israelite charismatic leadership than a genuine monarchy. All that we are told of the leadership of a Gideon or a Jephthah is paralleled by what we are told of Saul's, only with some magnification of scope. Keeping his residence at Benjaminite Gibeah among his own kinsmen (I Sam. 15:34), he made no real effort to reign over Israel beyond constituting an entourage (14:47-52). Chief among the entourage were his near kinsman and army commander, Abner (vs. 50); his son Jonathan; his armor-bearer, David of Judean Bethlehem (16:21); and even a foreigner, Doeg the Edomite (21:7—H 21:8; 22:9, 18).

Nevertheless, Saul's leadership brought at least two new features into Israel's political life. First, he bore a title, "king" (מלך), which Israel had encountered among the Canaanites and other neighboring peoples but which she had never willingly conferred upon any native leader; the foreignness both of the concept and of the title is clearly stated in our sources (I Sam. 8:5, 19-20). Secondly, he was "anointed" king (10:1)—a ceremony hitherto reserved in Israel only for persons and objects functioning within the cultus (cf. Gen. 31:13; Exod. 40:9-15; Num. 3:3; etc.), but not used for the investment of a leader whose responsibility extended beyond the cultus (cf. Num. 27:15-23). That the anointment of a king was a Canaanite usage is attested by a letter found at Tell el-Amarna; as naturalized in Israel, it signified public recognition and acknowledgment that the anointed one was divinely designated and charismatically endowed (cf. II Kings 11:12); while a priest (I Kings 1:39) or a prophet (I Kings 19:16) might perform the act of anointing, this could be done by the people themselves without such mediation (e.g., II Sam. 2:4), and "to anoint" came to mean simply "to make king."

C. THE ISRAELITE MONARCHIES. Saul lacked the political skill necessary to mitigate, much less to resolve, the inherent contradiction between the monarchy and the covenant-centered institutions of the confederacy; this was the basic cause of his quarrel with Samuel, the kernel of fact in the narratives of the rupture (I Sam. 13:8-14; 15). The true founder of a united Israelite kingdom was DAVID of Judean Bethlehem, Saul's armor-bearer, a superb military leader and a consummate politician. It may be doubted that Samuel anointed David before the latter joined Saul's entourage (I Sam. 16:1-13; the account seems a secondary recasting of 9:15-17 combined with 10:20-21), but David's exploits, in addition to being a sufficient attestation of the charismatic character of his leadership, soon earned him Saul's jealous enmity as a contender for the kingship (I Sam. 18:5-16). Even as a fugitive from Saul's murderous wrath David astutely managed to add a dimension to the kingship which he felt would sooner or later be his: he proclaimed the inviolability of the anointed king's person as integral to Israel's sacred covenant tradition (I Sam. 24:6; 26:8-11); thus, at a stroke, he both gave increased stability to the throne and soothed the tradition-derived criticism of the monarchic institution. The same combination of military ability and political sagacity enabled David to create a Palestinian-Syrian empire, a tremendous personal achievement even when allowance is made for the contemporary weakness of the Egyptian and Mesopotamian powers. Before his career was over, he had become king over Judah (II Sam. 2:4), Israel and Benjamin (5:3), Jerusalem (5:6-10; cf. 24:18-20), and Ammon (12:30); ruled the Arameans of Damascus and the Edomites, in whose territories he installed garrisons (8:6, 14); reduced Moab to vassalage (8:2); and subdued the Philistines, the Amalekites, and the kingdom of Zobah (8:11-12).

This empire, however, was united only in David's own person; even its Judean-Israelite core was not an indivisible unity, but two kingdoms separated geographically by a third, David's personal city-kingdom of Jerusalem. As David had become king over Judah and over N Israel in virtue of two distinct political actions, the older confederacy could no longer develop into a genuinely amalgamated monarchic state. The opportunity presented by the successful repression of Absalom's rebellion to blur the division, if not to obliterate it, was lost in a quarrel between the Judeans and the Israelites over the king's restoration (II Sam. 19:41-43). The attendant rebellion led by the Benjaminite, Sheba son of Bichri (20:1-2), though it too was put down, contributed to the maintenance of a separateness which the administrative measures of SOLOMON, David's successor (I Kings 4:7-19), could not efface, and which at Solomon's death resulted in the establishment of N Israel as an independent kingdom (I Kings 12).

Thereafter the two kingdoms (Jerusalem having remained united with Judah) went their separate ways, now fighting each other (I Kings 14:30; 15:6), now acting in concert (I Kings 22:2-4; II Kings 9: 16), until each came to a sorry end—Israel, the N state, being destroyed by the Assyrians (722-721 B.C.; II Kings 17:6), and Judah by the Neo-Babylonian Chaldeans (587 B.C.; II Kings 25:1-7). Each conformed to the monarchic pattern created by David and developed administratively by Solomon.

The chief constitutional difference between the two kingdoms lay in their respective succession principles. In Judah, which had anointed the Judean tribesman David as their king (II Sam. 2:4), where David had bequeathed the monarchy to his son Solomon (I Kings 1:30, 35), and which, at the disruption, remained loyal to Solomon's son REHOBOAM (I Kings 12:21), the principle of hereditary succession became firmly entrenched. Even when, as not infrequently happened, assassination removed one Davidide from the Judean throne, none but another Davidide could succeed him (e.g., II Kings 12:19-21—H 12:20-22; 14:18-21).

In N Israel, on the other hand, hereditary succession had gained no real foothold in the brief and unhappy reign of ISHBAAL (Ish-bosheth), Saul's son, whose kingdom passed to David (II Sam. 2:8-10; 4:5–5:3); the ending of Saul's "dynasty" with the death of Ishbaal could thus be paralleled by the ending of David's upon the death of Solomon. At the disruption, a public assembly made JEROBOAM (1) son of Nebat "king over all Israel" (I Kings 12:20); the precedent followed in this act was that of Saul: just as the latter had been designated to the kingship by the prophet Samuel, so Jeroboam had been chosen by the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite (I Kings 11:29-31). The custom of prophetic designation continued until the time of Jehu; while attended by execution of the reigning king and his heirs (e.g., Baasha [I Kings 15:27-29; 16:2]; Jehu [II Kings 9]), it was at least preferable to the outright violence which was the sole succession principle during the last twenty years of the kingdom's existence (II Kings 15:10, 14, 25, 30). The importance of prophetic designation is illustrated by the case of Zimri (I Kings 16:8-20), who, having usurped power without such sanction, could rule only for seven days before being succeeded by Omri. The latter, whose kingship was legitimized by the Israelite militia and corroborated by victory over a similarly legitimized rival (I Kings 16:16, 21-22), was able to pass the throne on to three of his descendants over a period of some thirty years; but the prophetically designated Jehu was the founder of a dynasty that lasted for about a century. A prophetic divine word thus characterizes the bloody succession which followed the downfall of Jehu's dynasty:

> They made kings, but not through me.
> They set up princes, but without my knowledge > (Hos. 8:4).

1. The king. In Judah and N Israel the king was neither himself a god, like the Egyptian Pharaoh, nor, as in Mesopotamia, a divinely chosen means of integrating human life with that of the gods. The Israelite and Judean kings were primarily human, secular figures whose cult functions differed from those of every other nonpriestly and non-Levitic Israelite merely in degree, but not in kind. Only secondarily, in virtue of the fact that they were heir to the priest-kingship of Jerusalem (Gen. 14:18; Ps. 110:4), could the Davidides be regarded as priests (II Sam. 8:18) or occasionally exercise priestly prerogatives (II Sam. 24:25; I Kings 3:3-4, 15). It was a typically astute political maneuver on David's part to take advantage of his Jerusalem priest-kingship in order to bring the ark of the covenant, the sacred symbol of the cohesion of the old Israelite tribal confederacy, up to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6); the inherited priest-kingship also permitted Solomon to build the temple and the royal palace (I Kings 6–7) in immediate proximity to each other (cf. II Kings 11:4-16). Royal sacerdotalism, however, had its critics (e.g., the reason alleged for the rejection of Saul [I Sam. 13:8-14]; cf. Uzziah [II Chr. 26:16-21; 27:2]), and in Ezekiel's ideal reconstruction of Jerusalem the contiguity of palace and temple was expressly proscribed (Ezek. 43:7-8). Despite the influence exerted by population fusion and cultural syncretism, despite the outright paganism of many N Israelite and Judean kings, the religious character of Israel's human kingship was basically and essentially that of the earlier charismatic leader; "divine-king" conceptions, insofar as they came into Israel's culture from without, never became fully integral to the human institution, but were ultimately absorbed into the Hebrew-Jewish conception of God.

The king's duties and responsibilities were those of the charismatic "deliverer-judge"; his powers and privileges were modeled upon those common to the royal absolutisms of the ancient Near East, but they were limited by vested local and regional interests and were conditioned by a criticism based on the values of the covenant tradition. Like the deliverer-judge, the king succored his people; even individuals might appeal to him for aid (II Sam. 14:4; II Kings 6:26), or come before him for justice (II Sam. 15:1-6; I Kings 3:16-28). What the monarch meant to his people is eloquently stated in a lament over the fall of Judah:

> The breath of our nostrils, the LORD's anointed, > was taken in their pits,
> he of whom we said, "Under his shadow > we shall live among the nations" > (Lam. 4:20).

Unlike the older charismatic leader, however, who as primus inter pares was a rallying point and personalized center for the forces of the entire community, the king was elevated to a position above the people. Surrounded by an army of professional soldiers (e.g., II Sam. 8:18; 15:18-22; 20:7; I Kings 1:38; II Kings 11:4), his harem (II Sam. 3:2-5; 5:13-16; I Kings 11:1-3), his high officials (e.g., I Kings 4:2-6), and a host of other retainers (e.g., II Sam. 16:16; II Kings 25:19; Isa. 3:2-3), the king was supervened upon Israelite society and isolated from the people as a whole. His entire entourage was merely an extension of the king's own person; strictly speaking, the monarchy was not a state, but a man doing everything possible to enhance his personal greatness and glory.

There were limits, however, to a king's arbitrary self-glorification. David's purchase of Araunah's threshing floor at full price (II Sam. 24:24) shows his respect for the covenant tradition and for family-property law; limited by Israelite tradition, AHAB (2) did not himself dare to force expropriation of Naboth's vineyard but allowed his Phoenician queen, who was significantly not thus inhibited, to obtain the property for him through having Naboth judicially murdered (I Kings 21:1-16). Arbitrary extensions of the royal prerogative evoked sharp criticism from prophetic upholders of the covenant tradition (e.g., Isa. 5:8; Hos. 5:10; Mic. 2:1-2), a criticism echoed in Ezekiel's ideal reconstruction which stresses the importance of restricting the extent of the king's domain (Ezek. 45:7-9). The Deuteronomic "law of the king" (Deut. 17:14-20), together with its insistence that the king identify himself completely with the covenant tradition, voices some typical grievances which historic experience with the monarchy produced among covenant-loyal Israelites. The reform of JOSIAH is a prime example, though by no means the only one, of the effect which such criticism might produce upon a king (II Kings 22:8–23:25). But within the bounds imposed by Israel's age-and-covenant-sanctioned custom (משפט) and idea of right (צדקה)—sometimes, indeed, outside these bounds—the king did as he thought best with and for a people whose destiny was scarcely distinguishable from his own either in their consciousness or in his.

2. The functioning of the kingship. The relationship between the king and the people was, on a larger scale, that which earlier obtained between a charismatic leader and those who recognized his chieftainship. The king's responsibility was great: for good and for ill, his actions were believed to involve not only himself and his house, but the entire people (e.g., II Sam. 24:17). This relationship, however, was personal and psychological, expressed in the covenant between king and people (e.g., II Sam. 3:21; 5:1-3; II Kings 23:3; Jer. 34:8-10); it was not a relationship that expressed itself in a stable series of impersonal political and administrative forms. King and people encountered and mutually affected each other, but the monarchy could never organize this encounter into an all-embracing and coherent administrative system. The king's administrative devices served only his own purposes; while they might help him fulfil the responsibilities undertaken by him on the people's behalf, they were instituted primarily as the instrumentalities of his demands upon the people rather than to promote the general welfare.

Local government under the monarchy, therefore, was not much different from what it had been under the tribal confederacy. As before, authority was in the hands of the public assembly with its elders and other leading men (e.g., I Kings 21:8; II Kings 10:1). Now, however, in some of the larger towns there was also a royal deputy, a שר, who acted on the king's behalf and protected his interests ("governor"; I Kings 22:26; II Kings 23:8); Ahab had deputies in the "districts" (מדינות; probably the older Solomonic tax districts, discussed below; see DISTRICT) of N Israel (I Kings 20:15), but whether these are to be distinguished from the town שרים is not clear. Relations between the deputy and the elders may not always have been smooth, as an instance during Abimelech's much earlier and abortive kingship of Shechem allows us to infer (Judg. 9). Still, so long as the king's requirements were fulfilled, there would be little occasion for interference by a deputy in a town's internal affairs. The king himself, on the other hand, might be guided by the counsel of the elders of a town or area in a matter which directly concerned its people (e.g., Ahab and the "elders of the land" [I Kings 20:7-9]). The most important effect of the monarchy upon the local communities was social rather than political. The king's service created a small army of officials who, while in many cases recruited from the old leading families, in effect constituted a new quasi-feudal aristocracy (cf. Samuel's warning [I Sam. 8:14-15]); a special and limited ruling class, in Judah and Jerusalem they were distinguished from "the people" as "princes" (Jer. 26:11-12; 34:10, 19).

a. Civil administration. The king "reigned . . . and . . . administered justice and equity to all his people" (II Sam. 8:15); these functions he either carried out directly himself or delegated to his "servants" (עבדים). The latter is the commonest generic designation (e.g., II Sam. 13:24) of men employed by a king in various official capacities (e.g., military [II Sam. 2:12-13]; diplomatic and intelligence [10:2-3]; member of royal investigating commission [II Kings 22:12-13]; merchant marine [I Kings 9:26-28]; etc.); the seals of several such officials are among archaeologically recovered artifacts of the period of the monarchies: "Shema, servant of Jeroboam" (probably Jeroboam II); "Obadiah, servant of the king" (probably later than the Obadiah of I Kings 18:1-3, "who was over the household" of Ahab); "Abijah, servant of Uzziah," and "Shebaniah, servant of Uzziah"; "Ushna, servant of Ahaz"; "Jaazaniah, servant of the king" (cf. II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8). From the reigns of David and Solomon, however, most departments of the king's business were staffed by officers whose functions are specifically or technically termed in our sources (see, e.g., the lists of David's high officials given at II Sam. 8:16-18 [repeated at I Chr. 18:15-17 with characteristic substitution of "chief officials" for "priests" in the allusion to David's sons]; II Sam. 20:23-26; and of Solomon's at I Kings 4:2-6). For internal affairs—civil and domestic administration—the most important officerships were the following:

a) The "one who is over the house" (אשר על־הבית; I Kings 4:6; 18:3, 6; II Kings 18:18, 37; 19:2; Isa. 22:15, 20-22): this office, apparently instituted by Solomon, subsequently became next in importance to that of the king himself; the person holding it was not merely a palace major-domo or STEWARD, but the king's vizier or prime minister. Isa. 22:20-22 is an admirable description of the importance and dignity of the position. The "Shebna" whom Isaiah threatened with deprivation of this authority (vss. 15-19) has been conjecturally restored as the (effaced) name in a recently deciphered tomb inscription, now in the British Museum, which specifically mentions the "one who is over the house." Similar epigraphic validation of the scriptural references to this high office is furnished by a clay seal impression of Jeremiah's day, found at Lachish, which reads: "Belonging-to-Gedaliah [w]ho is over the hou[se]." If, as is commonly accepted, the seal's owner was the Gedaliah son of Ahikam whom Nebuchadnezzar appointed as his commissioner in Judea (see § D1 below), it is probably merely fortuitous that no scriptural text records him to have been "over the house" in the last days of the Judean monarchy.

b) The RECORDER (המזכיר; II Sam. 8:16 [I Chr. 18:15]; 20:24; I Kings 4:3; II Kings 18:18, 37; II Chr. 34:8): it has recently been suggested that this official was an Israelite analogue of the Egyptian royal herald. As such, his duties would include: the reporting of news to the king, announcement and interpretation to others of the sovereign's will, regulation of royal audiences and of court protocol, and supervision of the monarch's travel arrangements. Hezekiah's recorder was one of the three-man delegation sent to learn the Assyrian demands when Sennacherib invaded the country (II Kings 18:17-36); and Josiah's was a member of the commission sent by the king to arrange for the repair of the temple (II Chr. 34:8-14; cf. II Kings 22:3-7).

c) The secretary (סופר; II Sam. 8:17 [I Chr. 18:16]; 20:25; I Kings 4:3; II Kings 12:10; 22:3, 8-14; 25:19; Jer. 36:10, 12; 37:15, 20; etc.; see SCRIBES): wherever writing, recording, or tabulation of an official character had to be done, the task was entrusted to the trained professional known by this title. The royal or chief secretary doubtless had a corps of such "scribes" at his disposal; in Jeremiah's day, the "secretary's chamber" was apparently a hall large enough to hold a considerable number of people (Jer. 36:10, 12), while the former "house of Jonathan the secretary" was converted into a multi-celled prison (37:15-16). Solomon had two chief secretaries, sons of a father who held the same office under David; the name of the father appears variantly in the several lists, but seems to have been Egyptian, and he may have been imported by David to install a royal secretariat on Egyptian lines to serve the needs of the vastly expanded kingdom.

d) The "one in charge of forced labor" (אשר על־המס; II Sam. 20:24; I Kings 4:6; 5:14—H 5:28; 11:28; 12:18): the superintendent of the corvée, the man who raised and organized the compulsory labor gangs (consisting primarily of war captives and the remaining Canaanite population [I Kings 9:20-21] but also apparently of Israelites [I Kings 5:13—H 5:27]) employed on the king's heavy work projects. This official too must have had many subordinates; one such was Jeroboam, who later became king of N Israel (I Kings 11:28). Jeroboam's ability must have been extraordinary for his previous experience not to have barred him from the kingship. The "one in charge of forced labor" could hardly be a popular figure, and it is not surprising to read that Rehoboam's corvée superintendent was stoned to death (I Kings 12:18).

e) The "(one) over the district officers" (על־הנצבים; I Kings 4:5, 7, 27—H 5:7; cf. 22:47—H 22:48 ["deputy"]): this was the king's chief collector of internal revenue. Solomon divided N Israel into twelve administrative districts; in each there was an "officer," responsible to the chief collector, who was required to supply the king and his household with enough food for one month of the year, to administer the king's own properties, and to collect other imports and taxes (I Kings 4:7-28); David had presumably earlier inaugurated a similar system in Judah. With the king's deputies in the larger towns (see above), the district officials, and the chief revenue officer at court, the tax system was the best-organized administrative device of the monarchic period. The Samarian Ostraca of the early eighth century furnish archaeological documentation of continuation of the revenue system in the Northern Kingdom, while for Judah there is attestation to the same effect in the numerous jar handles stamped למלך—i.e., "belonging to the king." The productivity of his revenue system was a main factor in Solomon's extraordinarily successful foreign trade (I Kings 5:10-11—H 5:24-25), conducted through his overland "traders" (I Kings 10:28-29), and the "servants" of his merchant fleet (I Kings 9:26-28; cf. Jehoshaphat's unsuccessful venture in sea-borne commerce [I Kings 22:48-49—H 22:49-50]).

f) "Judges and officers" (שופטים ושוטרים; Deut. 16:18-20; 17:8-13; I Chr. 23:4; 26:29; II Chr. 19:5-8; etc.; see JUDGE; OFFICER): constituting an officially recognized judiciary, these appeared in the towns during the monarchic period and began to replace the earlier, rather freer methods of obtaining and dispensing justice. Exactly when and how the change was effected is uncertain, although for Judea tradition ascribes it to Jehoshaphat (874-849 B.C.; II Chr. 19:5-8); in the Northern Kingdom, as the Naboth case shows, the judicial process was still in the hands of the "elders and the nobles" during Ahab's reign (874-853 B.C.; I Kings 21:8-14). The town judge's function (Deut. 16:18-20), like that of the king himself in dispensing justice (e.g., II Sam. 14:4-11; 15:2-4; I Kings 3:16-28), grew out of the older Israelite custom whereby the weak sought the help of the strong in vindication of their covenant-sanctioned right and claims. The judicial "officer," as the term's usage in nonjudicial contexts implies (cf. Deut. 20:5, 8-9; Josh. 1:10-11; etc.; see § A3 above), marshaled and directed the people of the community whenever they had any role to play in a juridical matter—e.g., in the execution of a sentence. Since the Babylonian cognate (šaṭâru) of the term's Hebrew root means "to write," it is frequently asserted that the שוטר was a scribe or notary public, but this is dubious.

g) The COUNSELOR (יועץ; II Sam. 15:12; 16:20-23; I Kings 12:6-10; I Chr. 27:32; II Chr. 22:3-4; 25:16; Prov. 24:6; Isa. 1:26; 3:3; etc.): this person may not always have had official status, but his function was filled during every reign. The king's greatest requirement, if he was successfully to carry out the responsibilities of ruling and of administering justice, was an "understanding mind to . . . discern between good and evil" (I Kings 3:9; cf. II Sam. 14:17). To achieve this, he availed himself of counsel, both superhuman—not only through prophet and priest, but through the "diviner . . . , the skilful magician and the expert in charms" (Isa. 3:3)—and human: the counselor. The royal counselor par excellence was David's, AHITHOPHEL, whose "counsel . . . was as if one consulted the oracle of God" (II Sam. 16:23).

b. War and diplomacy. The king's army was at once his means of fulfilling his function as a "deliverer" (II Kings 13:5; 14:27) and the foundation of his power (e.g., II Kings 9:4-13). Despite full realization of the risks involved (II Sam. 18:3; 21:15-17), nearly every king participated in warfare, and some, like Ahab (I Kings 22:34-37) and Josiah (II Kings 23:29), died in battle. Identified with and dependent upon the army as he was, the king did his utmost to maintain it at maximum possible efficiency.

Thus David, while not disdaining the tribal militia (II Sam. 10:17; 24:1-9), professionalized the army (the "Mighty Men" [גבורים; II Sam. 10:7; 23:8-39]; "picked men of Israel" [בחורי ישראל, Qere; II Sam. 10:9]; "servants of David" [עבדי דוד; II Sam. 11:17]), and employed foreign mercenaries (the "Cherethites and Pelethites" [II Sam. 8:18]; the "Gittites" from the Philistine city of Gath [II Sam. 15:18]; cf. the "Carite" or Carian mercenaries of II Kings 11:4, 19). Though David seems to have cared little for chariots and horsemen (II Sam. 8:4), Solomon introduced them on a grand scale (I Kings 9:19; 10:26; cf. Deut. 17:16); the N Israelite kings made extensive use of them in their almost constant fighting against the Arameans ("Syrians"; e.g., I Kings 20:26; II Kings 13:7). These armed forces were staffed by officers, commonly designated "commanders" (שרים), of various degrees and kinds of authority. Under the king himself, the highest military post was that of "commander of the army": Abner held this office under Saul (I Sam. 14:50; 17:55; II Sam. 2:8); Joab under David (II Sam. 8:16; 20:23); Benaiah, David's commander of mercenaries (II Sam. 8:18; 20:23), under Solomon (I Kings 4:4); and Omri under Elah (I Kings 16:16). Mercenary troops were under the direct orders of their own commanders (II Sam. 15:18-22; II Kings 11:4), although these, as the example of Benaiah shows, might be responsible to an Israelite general. The chariotry constituted a separately organized and officered component of the army (I Kings 9:22; 16:8 [which indicates a bipartite subdivision of this force]). The infantry had the "commanders of thousands . . . hundreds . . . and fifties," if not also of "tens," given as the standard table of organization of the whole people at Exod. 18:21, 25; Deut. 1:15 (I Sam. 18:13; II Sam. 18:1; II Kings 1:9-14; etc.). Among the infantry, there probably were separately commanded special contingents, such as the archers and חלוצי צבא ("men armed for war": light-armed troops? shock troops?) of II Chr. 17:18-19.

Diplomacy, always closely associated with war, was another chief preoccupation of the Israelite and Judean kings. It was employed by them in circumstances of belligerency for such purposes as the following: (a) to effect coalitions (e.g., II Kings 3:6-8); (b) to avert or procure relief from attack (I Kings 15:18-19; II Kings 12:17-18; 16:7-9: 18:14); (c) to negotiate the terms of cessation of hostilities (I Kings 20:1-12, 31-35); (d) to provoke hostilities (II Kings 14:8-10); and (e) to establish covenants and peace (II Sam. 3:12-16; 10:19). Less bellicose uses and occasions of diplomacy were: (a) the arrangement of royal marriages (I Kings 3:1 [dowry, 9:16]; 11:1-3; 16:31); (b) the negotiation of trade-and-service agreements (II Sam. 5:11; I Kings 5:1-12—H 5:15-26; 9:27-28; 20:34); (c) to exchange felicitations and condolences (II Sam. 8:9-10; 10:1-2); (d) in the reception of visiting royalties or their envoys (I Kings 9:10-14; 10; II Kings 20:12-13); and (e) during royal visits abroad (II Kings 16:10). Such negotiations might be carried on at personal high-level meetings by the royal heads of state, who would address or refer to one another as "brother" (I Kings 9:12-13; 20:32-34). More often, however, they were handled by ambassadors (ציורים; Ethiopian [Isa. 18:2]; "envoy" [Prov. 13:17]; "messenger" [25:13]; "servants" [e.g., II Sam. 10:2]; see AMBASSADOR), or specially designated delegations comprised of the king's highest officials (II Kings 18:18); but most frequently foreign affairs were negotiated through oral or written diplomatic correspondence conveyed by "messengers" (מלאכים; e.g., I Kings 20:2, 5, 9-12; II Kings 14:8-10).

D. ISRAEL AND JUDAH UNDER ORIENTAL IMPERIALISM. From the reign of the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B.C.) to the defeat inflicted by Alexander the Great upon Darius III Codomannus at the Battle of Issus (333 B.C.), the Near East was dominated in turn by the Assyrian (to 609), Neo-Babylonian (to 539), and Persian empires. The Assyrians extinguished the N Israelite state (721) and made vassals of the Judean kings. Judah, destroyed as a kingdom by the Babylonians (587), was permitted under Persian hegemony to become the seat of a province where, toward the end of the fifth century, semi-autonomous political authority passed into the hands of the high priests of the restored temple at Jerusalem.

1. Assyrian and Chaldean domination. The Assyrian policy of exchanging the ruling classes of territories incorporated into their empire resulted in the transfer of many N Israelites to Mesopotamia and Media (II Kings 15:29; 17:6; 18:11) and their replacement by a considerable body of foreigners, including Babylonians and Syrians (II Kings 17:24). The former Israelite kingdom, according to our rather scanty information, was reorganized into the four Assyrian provinces of Megiddo, Dor, Gilead, and Samaria ("Samerina"), each under an Assyrian governor (bêl paḥâti); the title of a subordinate official, "head of cities" (rab alâni), which occurs in a cuneiform document found at Samaria, suggests an Assyrian provincial counterpart of the Solomonic chief revenue officer (see § C2*a above*). Judea, on the other hand, was not incorporated into the Assyrian provincial organization but was ruled through such puppet kings as Manasseh (ca. 687-642 B.C.; II Kings 21). This policy, successful enough while Assyrian power was at full tide, could not be made to work once that tide had turned; Josiah (ca. 640-609; II Kings 22-23) asserted his independence of a weakened Assyrian control and could even dream of a reunited Israelite kingdom. But what was possible during Assyrian decline could not be achieved against the rising might of their Chaldean heirs, the masters of the Neo-Babylonian Empire; and the attempts of Jehoiakim (ca. 609-597; II Kings 24:1) and Zedekiah (597-587; II Kings 24:20) to follow Josiah's example only succeeded in convincing the Chaldeans that a vassal king in Judea was altogether too dangerous to tolerate. Accordingly, they broke down the walls of Jerusalem (II Kings 25:10), thus rendering it incapable of defense, and abolished the kingship and installed Gedaliah son of Ahikam (cf. II Kings 22:12, 14; Jer. 26:24) as their commissioner (פקיד; RSV "governor") at Mizpah (II Kings 25:22; Jer. 40:5). In this way Judea was added to the provincial organization which the Chaldeans had taken over from their Assyrian predecessors; administratively, it was probably merely a district attached to the province of Samaria, since the Judean territory was now in Edomite hands while the W portions were absorbed in the Philistine province of Ashdod. Unlike the Assyrians, however, the Chaldeans did not replace the people whom they deported to Babylon with colonists from other parts of their empire, and it is possible that the commissionership was entrusted to other Judeans after the assassination of Gedaliah (II Kings 25:25).

2. Persian rule. With the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses in 525, the Persian imperial power became the greatest yet seen in the ancient world. Its rulers sought to preserve their empire by fostering the religious and cultural traditions of the subject peoples, even allowing them a measure of autonomy, while maintaining a firm grip on the real political and military power. For the Jews, both in Judea and in the Diaspora (see DISPERSION) of Egypt (cf. Jer. 42:15–43:7 and the Elephantine Papyri) and of Mesopotamia-Media, this policy had important consequences. Cyrus decreed (538) the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem (Ezra 6:3-5), entrusting the task to "one whose name was SHESH-BAZZAR" (Ezra 5: 14-16), who is frequently, though not certainly, identified with the Shenazzar listed among the sons of the Judean king Jehoiachin at I Chr. 3:18. But the disturbed condition of Judea, to which the prophet Haggai alludes in his rebuke that "you busy yourself each with his own house" (Hag. 1:9), allowed Shesh-bazzar scarcely to commence the laying of the temple's foundations before the work was halted. By the time it could be resumed, a Davidide, ZERUBBABEL, in whom both Haggai and Zechariah thought they saw the messianic inaugurator of the prophetically foretold, earthly kingdom of God (Hag. 2:20-23; Zech. 4:6-10; 6:9-14 [with restoration of "Zerubbabel" for "Joshua" in 6:11?]), was "governor of Judah" (פחת יהודה; Hag. 1:1, 14; 2:2, 21). Whether or not Zerubbabel lost his governorship (or deputy governorship) because of his participation in this episode of eschatological excitement is unknown. He is not expressly named as governor in the official correspondence about resumption of work on the sanctuary, which passed between the satrap of Beyond the River (פחת עבר-נהרא; the satrapy included most of Syria and Palestine), in association with his provincial governors (אפרסכיא), and Darius I (Ezra 5:6–6:12), in which Darius confirmed Cyrus' decree. Instead, both the satrap and the king mention the "elders of the Jews" (Ezra 5:9; 6:7) as those in charge at Jerusalem, with additional allusion in the king's letter to the "governor of the Jews" (פחת יהודיא; 6:7). At any rate, according to Ezra 6:14-18, it was the "elders of the Jews," rather than a governor, who presided over the completion and dedication of the "house of God" in the spring of 515 B.C., and thus gave a heart to their little satrapal province as well as a symbol of cohesion to the scattered Jewish communities of the world.

How and by whom Judean affairs were administered for the next fifty years is unknown. Shortly after the middle of the fifth century, however, NEHEMIAH the son of Hacaliah, a descendant of Babylonian exiles who had become cupbearer to the Persian king, was appointed GOVERNOR of the province of Judah (Neh. 5:14) and officially permitted to rebuild Jerusalem, including the renewal of its walls (Neh. 2:4-8; cf. Ezra 4:7-22). Judah thus became a province in its own right, apart from Samaria, if indeed it did not already have this status. Despite the opposition of his jealous fellow provincial governors, Sanballat of Samaria and Tobiah of Ammon, and of Geshem, the powerful and influential king of the Qedarite Arabs (as we now know from an Aramaic votive inscription on a silver vessel recently acquired by the Brooklyn Museum), Nehemiah succeeded in making Jerusalem the capital of a flourishing province. He had already found the province (מדינה; Neh. 1:3; 7:6) divided into districts (פלך; Neh. 3:9, 12, 14-18) or half-districts (חצי־פלך; 3:16-18), with a שר ("ruler") over each; he instituted a security system, to the command of which he appointed a "captain [RSV 'governor'] of the castle" (שר הבירה; Neh. 7:2-3), made provision for a genealogical registry (7:5), corrected various economic (5: 1-15) and religious abuses (7:61-65; 13:4-28), and recovenanted the people "to walk in God's law" (ch. 10).

In addition to the governor, who might himself be of Persian extraction—in 408 B.C., as we are informed by an Aramaic papyrus from Elephantine (Cowley, no. 30), one Bagoas (Bagohi) was "governor of Judea" (בגוה פחת יהוד)—and the Zadokite high priest of the temple, a third official achieved great importance under Persian imperial rule: the SCRIBE (הסופר; Aramaic ספרא). Since it was Persian policy to encourage subject peoples to live by their own religious traditions and laws, the need arose for trained experts who could interpret and transmit such materials. In Judea this function was discharged by scribes who were either themselves priests, like Ezra (the "priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven" [Ezra 7:21]), or Levites (cf. II Chr. 34: 13). The "scribe skilled in the Torah [law] of Moses which the LORD the God of Israel had given . . . set his heart to search [RSV 'study'] . . . and to do it, and to teach his statutes and ordinances in Israel" (Ezra 7:6, 10). Whether a Nehemiah or a Bagoas, it was the governor's duty to place this "law" into effect in the province of Judea, as it was the high priest's duty to preside over the temple cultus prescribed by that same law.

E. JEWISH POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS IN HELLENISTIC AND ROMAN TIMES. The basic structure of the religion-centered commonwealth which came into being on Judean soil under Persian rule persisted, though with marked modification of its characteristic features, to the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70. The high priesthood might be merged with the governorship (as under the Ptolemies and Seleucids) and even with an independent kingship (as with the Hasmoneans), or it might be altogether deprived of political authority (as in Herodian and Roman times), but the office endured so long as the temple was in existence. The scribe (Ecclus. 38: 24–39:11) retained his importance as adviser to foreign potentates and as the custodian, exegete, and teacher of the Torah-based Jewish tradition: out of his office evolved not only the "lawyer" and the "scribe" of NT times (e.g., Matt. 13:52; 22:35; 23: 1-3; Luke 11:45-46), but the "teacher" and "rabbi" (Matt. 23:8; Acts 5:34) as well. Local government by town assembly, "rulers," and "elders" went on much as before (e.g., Jth. 7:23), while the districts—extended, contracted, or revised according to shifting political circumstances—seem to have constituted the territorial units of the various taxation systems (e.g., I Macc. 11:28; Jos. Antiq. XII.iv.1) until the reorganizations of Pompey and Gabinius (Antiq. XIV.iv.4, v.4).

1. The independent Hasmonean commonwealth. The attempt, by ruling high priests, during the reign of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV (175-163 B.C.), to Hellenize Jewish religious and political institutions —including the transformation of Jerusalem into a Greek polis—met the fierce resistance of loyalist Jews and ended in failure. At a "great assembly [142 B.C.] of the priests and the people and the rulers of the nation and the elders of the country, . . . Simon the son of Mattathias, a priest of the sons of Joarib" was elected "leader and high priest for ever, until a trustworthy prophet should arise" (i.e., until the soon-expected eschatological consummation; I Macc. 14:28-29, 41). Within this recovenanted commonwealth (חבר; the term occurs both on the Maccabean coinage and in the "Damascus" Fragments) arose the later parties of the Sadducees, Pharisees, and Essenes, who differed among themselves on questions of religious law, doctrine, and national policy. To the scandal of the Pharisees and Essenes, the successors of Simon's son, John Hyrcanus (134-104 B.C.), added the title "king" to that of high priest. Backed by mercenary troops, the Hasmoneans' exercise of despotic authority was nevertheless inhibited by the Pharisees, who, in the reign of Alexander Janneus (103-76 B.C.), led the people in rebellion; and their tyranny was further tempered by the "senate," or body of elders and leading men, which had come down from earlier times (γερουσία; cf. I Macc. 12:6; Jos. Antiq. XIII.xvi.5).

2. Roman rule. The independent Hasmonean commonwealth was ended in 63 B.C. by the Romans, who thereafter ruled Judea through such client-kings as the Herodians or more directly through their own legates and procurators. The one significant, natively Jewish, political institution of this time was the Sanhedrin (συνέδριον=סנהדרין; Matt. 26:59; Acts 5:21; cf. the Mishna tractate of the same name), which, as a national council, represented the interests of the Jewish population before their Herodian or Roman rulers. Whether this Sanhedrin is identical with the institution described in Tannaitic sources, which was a supreme judicial tribunal (בית דין) and which claimed legislative and executive authority as well, is not clear. In any case, neither the Herodians nor the Sanhedrin had any more real authority during NT times than the Romans, for their own imperial purposes, might allow: the devices of effective government in Judea and Palestine were essentially the counterparts of those employed in provincial administration elsewhere in the Empire. See AGRIPPA; ETHNARCH; HEROD; HERODIANS; PILATE; PROCURATOR; ROMAN EMPIRE; SANHEDRIN; TETRARCH.

Bibliography. J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, I–II (1926), 12-60; III–IV (1940), 1-106 and passim. H. Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods (1948), passim, and especially pp. 337-44. R. Gordis, "Democratic Origins in Ancient Israel—the Biblical 'Ēdāh," Alexander Marx Jubilee Volume (1950), pp. 369-88. A. Alt, "Das Königtum in den Reichen Israel und Juda," VT, I (1951), 2-22. S. W. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, I (1952), 32-62, 212-49. M. Weber, Ancient Judaism (1952), 3-146, 267-335. A. G. Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique, II (1953), 38-86. B. Mazar (Maisler), under אנציקלופדיה מקראית, ארץ ישראל ("דברי הימים"), I (1955), 679-741. S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (1956), pp. 21-95. G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 69-97, 120-79, 199-210. M. Noth, "Gott, König, Volk im AT," Gesammelte Studien zum AT (1957), pp. 188-229; The History of Israel (1958), pp. 53-108 and passim. R. de Vaux, Les institutions de l'AT, vol. I: Le nomadisme et ses survivances (1958).

I. RABINOWITZ

GOVERNMENTS [κυβερνήσεις] (I Cor. 12:28). The KJV translation of a term used by Paul to denote one of God's charismata, or spiritual gifts given to the church (RSV "administrators"). It is not a synonym for a specific office or order of ministry. Its close association with HELPS has led some critics to see in these terms an allusion to the ministries performed by bishops, elders, and deacons, or the "leaders" (cf. Rom. 12:8; I Thess. 5:12). The metaphor contained in the Greek word recalls a "helmsman" of a ship. In the LXX the word occurs in Prov. 1:5; 11:14; 24:6, to describe the "counsels of the wise."

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

GOVERNOR. The ruler set up by kings to be over a specific territory or province. He governs the area by authority of the supreme monarch, not in his own right. Joseph was a governor in Egypt under Pharaoh (שליט; cf. the Arabic title "sultan"; Gen. 42:6; cf. Eccl. 7:19; 10:5; cf. Gen. 45:26 with Acts 7:10). Gedaliah was appointed governor by the king of Babylon (Jer. 40:5). Daniel was governor of the wise men in Babylon (Dan. 2:48). Persian governors mentioned in the Bible include Tattenai, Shesh-bazzar, Zerubbabel, Nehemiah (Ezra 5:3, 14; Neh. 5:14; Hag. 1:1), who were over Judah. The Hebrew משל, used in Jer. 30:21, is for any ruler and could include an absolute ruler (Josh. 12:2; Ps. 105:20). The legates and procurators were governors under Rome (Luke 2:2; 3:1; Acts 23:24; 24:27). See PROCURATOR.

The "governor" (KJV) of the temple was the chief officer, who had authority over the temple environs (see OVERSEER). One such officer, Pashhur, put Jeremiah in stocks (Jer. 20:1). The RSV "officer" is a better translation of פקיד. The Hiph'il of this root is translated "made governor" in reference to the appointment of Gedaliah (Jer. 40:5; 41:2; cf. II Kings 25:22).

The "governor" (KJV) of the army was the "commander" (RSV) of a unit. However, חקק has in its root a concept of "decree," and so in the book of Judges includes the judges or the rulers themselves (Judg. 5:9, 14; cf. Gen. 49:10). So it is even used of God (Isa. 33:22).

In II Chr. 28:7, נגיד is "governor" of the palace, according to the KJV, but "commander" in the RSV (cf. II Chr. 32:21). This is the ruler or prince, even at times the king himself (II Sam. 5:2; I Chr. 29:22). The RSV uses "governor" in II Chr. 19:11. Similarly the נשיא is the chief prince in each tribe, or the "leader" in Solomon's kingdom (II Chr. 1:2). Perhaps this is comparable to the modern Bedouin sheik.

The leading prince (שר) of a city was sometimes called the "governor"—e.g., Amon (I Kings 22:26), Joshua (II Kings 23:8), and Ma-aseiah (II Chr. 34:

8). Occasionally this term is used as the governor of the temple (I Chr. 24:5 KJV). The prince of a district is called a governor in the RSV (I Kings 20:14). It is probable that שר is also used in the general sense of "ruler of the people" (II Chr. 23:20; Jer. 30:21). God is such a ruler (Ps. 22:28).

The most popular Hebrew term for "governor" is פחה. This is a loan word from the Akkadian bêl paḫâti, "lord of a district." It is sometimes translated "ruler" in the RSV. These officers are usually less than the king, as suggested in I Kings 20:24, but seem to have military power. They may have been captains in Assyria (II Kings 18:24). They were governors of Babylon (Jer. 51:23), of Medea (Jer. 51:28). The Persian governors in Palestine are so indicated (Neh. 2:7; cf. Hag. 1:1; Mal. 1:8). These were, of course, appointed by the king (Ezra 5:14). The Aramaic form occurs in Ezra 5:3, etc., for Tattenai, the SATRAP. The satrap in the story of Esther seems to be a civil governor or a deputy of the king (Esth. 3:12, etc.). The word is rarely used for the governors under Solomon (I Kings 10:15; II Chr. 9:14).

The governor of a captured city is sometimes called in Akkadian šaknu. In Hebrew and Aramaic, סגנים are rulers or "prefects." Only in Daniel does the translation "governor" occur (Dan. 2:48; 3:2; 6:7; etc.). See DEPUTY.

A title of honor became "governor" (KJV) in the Persian period. The RSV prefers "governor" for the Persian loan word תרשתא in Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65; 8:9; etc. The titles in Ezra 4:9 are confused, but APHARSACHITES seem to be a minor official and not a gentilic name.

In Zech. 9:7; 12:5-6, the KJV has "governor" for אלף (LXX χιλίαρχος). However, both the context and the poetic form favor the simple RSV translation, "clan." See CHIEF.

In the Apoc. "governor" is used to translate general terms for leadership, such as ἄρχων, δεσπότης, στρατηγός, etc.

In the NT the word ἡγεμών appears for the Roman legates and procurators and the proconsuls. These officials were administrators of a territory or province for the Roman emperor (I Pet. 2:14). Some had the Roman legion under them, while others were dependent on a general for army support. The system of appointment varied greatly. Tenure was generally one year, but many reappointments occurred. These governors administered the law and had power of life and death (Matt. 10:18; Mark 13:9; Luke 21:12). Quirinius was a proconsul (Luke 2:2) who may have had two terms of office under Tiberius. Pontius Pilate (Luke 3:1, etc.), Felix (Acts 23:24, etc.), and Festus (Acts 24:27, etc.) were procurators. The verb is used of Joseph, who was viceroy under Pharaoh (Acts 7:10). So the prophecy of Micah sees the Messiah as such a ruler under God (Matt. 2:6; cf. Mic. 5:1-2).

Similarly, one who is less than a king, but who serves as his deputy, is the ETHNARCH (ἐθνάρχης). Simon Maccabeus is called an ethnarch (I Macc. 14:47; Jos. Antiq. XIII.vi.6). In Damascus, Paul was apprehended by the governor ruling for King Aretas (II Cor. 11:32).

The ruler or governor of the feast (ἀρχιτρίκλινος) perhaps could be considered the deputy of the householder. He was the steward of the couch, the table master, or dining-room supervisor (John 2:8-9). He may also have served as master of the feast and regulated the drinking (Ecclus. 32:1).

The tutor or steward (οἰκονόμος) who acted as a "guardian" (RSV) to a child is called "governor" in the KJV (Gal. 4:2; cf. Luke 12:42; I Cor. 4:2). Likewise the "pilot" (RSV) of a ship is a "governor" (Jas. 3:4 KJV). See STEWARD.

C. U. WOLF

GOZAN gō′zăn [גוזן; Akkad. Guzana]. A city and district (on or near the Euphrates), through which the Habor River flowed. The place had been conquered by kings of Assyria prior to Sennacherib's invasion (701 B.C.) of Judah, according to II Kings 19:12 = Isa. 37:12. In the ninth year of Hosea king of Israel, the Assyrian monarch Shalmaneser exiled some Israelites to Assyrian territory, including the region of the Habor, which is called the "River of Gozan" (II Kings 17:6; 18:11). In I Chr. 5:26, however, we find "Habor, Hara, and the river [of] Gozan"). Gozan is apparently the same as Gausanitis (Γαυζανῖτις), mentioned by Ptolemy (V.18).

C. H. GORDON

GRABA. KJV Apoc. form of HAGABAH.

GRACE. In the specifically Christian sense of the word, God's unmerited free, spontaneous love for sinful man, revealed and made effective in Jesus Christ. As such it lies at the very heart of the Christian gospel, and is one of its most distinctive features.

Some anticipations of this meaning of the word occur in the OT, but it is in the NT that its fullest significance is to be found. Nor is this found equally in all parts of the NT. In some books the use of the word hardly differs from that already familiar in secular Greek and in the Greek of the LXX. It is to Paul above all others that we owe the special significance the word has come to bear in the vocabulary of Christian faith. We do not know that it was he who first endowed it with this meaning, but it is certainly he more than any other who by his letters established it in the language of the church.

The Greek word which is normally translated in our English versions as "grace" is χάρις, and it is primarily the uses of this word which must here be examined. It must be borne in mind, however, that the truth conveyed by this word is very often present in the Bible in contexts where the word itself is not precisely used.

1. The meaning of χάρις
   a. In secular Greek
   b. In the LXX
2. "Grace" in the Pauline letters
   a. The grace of God
   b. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ
   c. Grace in relation to human need
   d. The quality of grace
   e. With the meaning of "greeting" and "thanks"
3. Note on its use in the Pastoral letters
4. Grace in the non-Pauline writings of the NT
   a. The gospels
   b. Acts
   c. Hebrews

d. James
e. I Peter
f. II Peter
g. Jude
h. Revelation
5. The idea of grace apart from the use of the word "grace"
6. Conclusion
Bibliography

1. The meaning of χάρις. a. In secular Greek. One common meaning of the word is "pleasantness" or "attractiveness." An instance of this within the NT may be found in Luke 4:22, where it is used to describe the impression which the words of Jesus made on his hearers: "All . . . wondered at the words of grace" (ERV-ASV). Perhaps, too, this is the significance in Col. 4:6: "Let your speech be always with grace" (ERV-ASV).

The word may also mean a kindly attitude, and so approval or favor. This too finds its place in the NT. In Luke 1:30 Mary has "found favor with God," and in Luke 2:52 Jesus increased "in favor with God and man." It is similarly used in Acts 2:47; 7:10.

The word could also mean appreciation of a favor or a kindness, and so came to mean "thanks." In I Cor. 10:30, e.g., the Greek word χάριτι is rendered in the RSV as "with thankfulness." The common phrase χάριν ἔχω, which one would expect to mean "I receive a favor," is normally translated as "I am thankful" or "I thank" (as in Luke 17:9).

In the papyri and elsewhere the common phrase for "Thanks be to the gods" is χάρις τοῖς θεοῖς. In the NT it is modified for the use of Christians into χάρις τῷ θεῷ ("Thanks be to God"; Rom. 6:17; I Cor. 15:57; II Cor. 8:16).

b. In the LXX. Χάρις is the usual translation of the Hebrew word חן, which means "favor," as in the phrase "find favor in his eyes" (and so corresponds to the second meaning of χάρις, as noted above, in secular Greek). It can be used of men in their relationship to one another. A man, e.g., finds "favor" with one whom he regards as a superior, or from whom he seeks a concession (cf. Ruth 2:2). It is also used of man in his relationship to God. Usually it is the righteous man or one prepared to become righteous who thus "finds favor" with God. It is, however, always God who confers the favor on man. It would be quite inappropriate to speak of man's conferring favor on God.

The Hebrew word חן is therefore an equivalent of the Greek word χάρις only in this very limited sense. It falls far short of the fuller meaning which χάρις came to bear in the NT. Indeed, if this fuller meaning is to be represented at all by a Hebrew word, it is the word חסד (ḥêsêd) to which we should turn. This word is, however, usually translated in the LXX by the Greek word ἔλεος ("mercy"). For further discussion of the use of חסד in the OT, see § 5 below.

The word χάρις is used also in the Apoc., though not so frequently as to make it a characteristic word. It occurs seventy-five times in all, and of these occurrences twenty-nine are to be found in Ecclesiasticus.

2. "Grace" in the Pauline letters. The meanings attached to the word χάρις in the Greek version of the OT and in the Apoc. are not notably different from those already familiar in secular Greek, though, understandably enough, the word is used far more frequently in relation to God. These same usages of the word are found also in several parts of the NT. There is, however, a distinctive use of the word in the NT, and it is this which we usually have in mind when we speak of "grace" in its Christian significance. This sense of the word occurs predominantly in the Pauline writings, but not exclusively so. It is this distinctive NT meaning of the word which must now be examined.

It becomes clear merely from a count of the occurrences of χάρις in the different books of the NT how predominantly it is a Pauline word. It is not used at all in Matthew, Mark, I John, III John, and Jude. In II John it occurs once only, and in James, II Peter, and Revelation twice each; 3 times in the Fourth Gospel (all in the Prologue), 6 in Luke, 8 in Hebrews, 10 in I Peter, and 17 in Acts. In all these non-Pauline books the word appears only 51 times, and of these occurrences 27 are in Acts and I Peter, which on other grounds have been thought to have close links with Pauline teaching. In contrast with this, 101 instances of it occur in the Pauline corpus of letters, twice as many as in all the rest of the NT together, and in much smaller compass. The 101 instances in the Pauline writings occur in 156 pages, and the 51 instances in the rest of the NT in 512 pages.

The numbers alone prove that χάρις must be regarded as a characteristic word of Pauline writing. But over and above the significance of the numbers, the word comes to bear a special meaning in these letters. It is made the vehicle of a profoundly important element in Paul's understanding and proclamation of the gospel.

a. The grace of God. The Pauline phrase about grace which is most familiar to us is that which occurs in the commonly used benediction, derived from II Cor. 13:13: "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." It is misleading, however, to assume from this that in Paul's writings grace is associated with Christ rather than with God. In fact, the phrases "the grace of God" and "grace from God" occur even more frequently than "the grace of Christ." Almost every letter opens with the greeting: "Grace and peace from God," and grace is frequently spoken of as a gift bestowed by God, both upon Paul himself (I Cor. 15:10; Eph. 3:7) and upon others (II Cor. 6:1; 8:1; 9:14).

It is true that the means by which the grace of God is mediated to men is pre-eminently Jesus Christ —his incarnation, death, and resurrection. What God has done and still does for men in Jesus Christ, his Son, is God's outstanding act of grace. The grace of Jesus Christ, therefore, is not to be thought of as other than the grace of God, but rather as an expression of it. Indeed, Paul speaks in one continuous phrase of the "grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ" (II Thess. 1:12; cf. Rom. 5:15; I Cor. 1:3).

God is the source from which grace comes to man. Jesus Christ is the God-ordained means by which this grace most effectively reaches man in his need.

b. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the believer, therefore, the grace of God is actualized and made effective for human need in Jesus Christ. Paul speaks of the "grace of God and the free gift in the grace of . . . Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:15).

The context where the "grace of Christ" most frequently occurs is the closing benediction of the letters, once in the familiar threefold benediction of II Cor. 13:13, but usually as a complete blessing in itself (Rom. 16:20; I Cor. 16:23; Gal. 6:18; Phil. 4: 23; I Thess. 5:28; II Thess. 3:18).

The context, however, which gives the surest clue to its meaning for Paul is II Cor. 8:9, where it is used to interpret the significance of the incarnation: "You know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sake he became poor, so that by his poverty you might become rich." The grace of God is first and foremost evidenced in the incredibly generous and utterly unexpected action he took in coming in Christ to this world of sinful men. The grace of Christ is seen in his obedient fulfilment of his Father's gracious purpose, first by becoming man at all, by the humble courtesy of his lowly birth, by the compassion and dauntless courage of his life and ministry, by the steadfast faithfulness which led him to the Cross, and by the mighty power of his resurrection and ascension—and all accomplished "for our sake," though there was nothing in man that was even faintly worthy of it.

c. Grace in relation to human need. Grace is offered by God to man with the special purpose of accomplishing for man good things which he cannot achieve for himself. It is quite the reverse of a reward for good conduct; it is rather a means of rescuing him from his own deep failure and from his helplessness to overcome it.

In Paul's teaching it is particularly related to justification—i.e., God's acceptance of man as "righteous" and free from guilt. By the grace of God sinful man may be forgiven, and, in spite of his obvious and, indeed, acknowledged wrongdoing, treated by God as if he were innocent. See JUSTIFICATION.

In contemporary Judaism it was normally believed that a man gained acceptance with God (i.e., was justified) by sustained obedience to his commands. Paul, however, had proved the futility of this. Man could not by his own endeavors fulfil the whole, perfect will of God, especially when that will was applied to inward desire and motive as well as to outward act. Moreover, even if present obedience were possible, how could one atone for the sins of the past? For Paul the Jew, the guilt of past sin had become an unendurable, and yet an irremovable, burden. Part of the utter wonder of what Christ did for him was this, that when he yielded himself to Christ in trust and willingness to be commanded, this deep misery of guilt, this aching hopelessness of moral failure, was banished. Its removal was not due to anything that he or any other man had done or could do. It was all God's doing through Christ. Why had God so acted? Only because it must be his nature so to act. He was incredibly generous and compassionate, far beyond what man could have ever dreamed possible. This is what Paul tries to express when he speaks of the "grace of God in Christ." We are "justified by his [God's] grace as a gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24).

All that God had done for man in Christ was, for Paul, brought to a sharp focus in Christ's death upon the cross. The grace of God is more than ever evident there. So Paul is able to speak of our being justified "by his blood" (Rom. 5:9), as well as by his grace.

In Ephesians the blessing which God confers on man through Christ is called "salvation," rather than justification (either by Paul himself, or by a disciple of his most skilfully expounding his master's message). But with even greater emphasis salvation is ascribed solely to the action of God's grace: "By grace you have been saved" (Eph. 2:5). And three verses later the same affirmation is repeated, this time in direct relation to faith: "By grace you have been saved through faith." Thus we have a comprehensive summary of the separate truths expressed in Rom. 3:24 ("justified by grace"); Rom. 5:1 ("justified by faith").

Election also is ascribed to the grace of God. In Rom. 11:5-6 God's choice of the people of Israel, and also of the faithful remnant among them, is the act of his grace, since it was based not at all on any merit in them.

Since man's acceptance with God is all God's doing (II Cor. 5:18)—i.e., it is all of grace—it is only to be expected that in Paul's letters "grace" is sharply contrasted with words which were commonly used to describe man's own endeavors to achieve status with God.

It is, e.g., the antithesis of law (Rom. 6:14-15), since a devout Jew was accustomed to assume that it was through obedience to the law that he could gain acceptance with God. To be "under the law" means to base one's life on this assumption. Paul, however, declares that it is the believer's privilege to be "under grace"—i.e., his acceptance with God is not something he must try to achieve by his own merits, but accept as a gracious, undeserved gift from God.

Successful obedience to the commands of the law came to be known as "works" (achievements), and these too are put in contrast to "grace" (Rom. 11:6).

What makes man unacceptable with God is his disobedience to God's will, his sin. Since grace makes a man acceptable to God in spite of his sin, and thereby brings him his one hope of conquering sin, through the strength and joy which comes from his restored relationship to God, grace and sin are also set in sharp contrast with each other (Rom. 6:1).

The grace of God in Christ not only brings salvation to sinful man, but also assigns to those who are saved special tasks in the service of God. It was by the grace of God that Paul was appointed an apostle, and commissioned to carry the gospel to the Gentiles. There was nothing in him, he knew, which made him suitable for it or deserving of it. It was a commission of which he felt utterly unworthy. But the spiritual and moral equipment which he needed for the fulfilment of the task was supplied to him as the gift of God's grace. God had chosen him, commanded and equipped him. "His grace was bestowed upon me," writes the apostle (I Cor. 15:9-10 ERV-ASV; cf. Rom. 1:5; I Cor. 3:10; Gal. 2:9; Eph. 3:7).

"My grace is sufficient for you," is the promise he received from the Lord (II Cor. 12:9).

It is not only the high rank of apostleship which is bestowed by the grace of God. All the various endowments which believers are enabled to bring to the corporate life of the church are called χαρίσματα ("gifts of grace"). They include prophecy, service, exhortation, teaching, etc. (Rom. 12:6-8), and also "miracles, healings, helps, governments, tongues" (I Cor. 12:28-31 ERV-ASV). The gifts "differ according to the grace given to us." And the greatest of all these χαρίσματα, far outstripping more spectacular gifts such as tongues, is "love."

In Rom. 5:2 Paul speaks of "this grace in which we stand" as though the whole status of a Christian, in his utter dependence on God in Christ, may be described as "grace" (cf. I Pet. 3:7; 5:12; Acts 13:43).

d. The quality of grace. Grace is, first, a free gift. It is never man's due, nor is it conferred as a reward (Rom. 4:4). In Eph. 2:8 it is called a "gift" (δῶρον), but more usually in this connection the stronger word δωρέα ("free gift") is used (Rom. 5:15; II Cor. 9:15; Eph. 3:7; 4:7). The phrase "the grace which was given to me" recurs constantly.

Grace is abundant. In connection with grace there often occur words which emphasize the unlimited extent of the gift. It "abounds" (περισσεύω; Rom. 5:15; II Cor. 4:15). It is multiplied (πλεονάζω; II Cor. 4:15). It exceeds expectation (Eph. 2:7). This overflowing abundance is suggested also in the phrase "the riches of his grace" (Eph. 1:7; 2:7).

It is through faith. Grace is frequently associated with faith, that response in man which accepts the offer of God's grace (Eph. 2:8). Theologians differ about the extent to which faith is a response of the will, for which the man concerned may be held responsible, and how far even faith itself is the gift of God's grace, as Phil. 1:29 suggests (cf. also Acts 18:27). Something of a paradox marks Christian experience at this point. The believer is utterly sure that "it is all God's doing," but he also knows that at some point he has had to say "yes" when he might have said "no."

Paul's writings confirm this paradox of belief. There is much in his letters to emphasize how from beginning to end the Christian life is the work of God's grace. There are, however, significant warnings, which make it clear that he knows that there is that in man which can accept and which can refuse and withstand God's proffered grace.

The former emphasis has led to the doctrines of "irresistible grace" and of predestination. These find support in the suggestion that God determines the destiny of individuals before their birth (Rom. 9, especially vss. 10-13), and in Rom. 10–11, with the special reference to grace in 11:5-6. Against this, however, must be set the words in which Paul explicitly acknowledges that grace may be resisted and thwarted by man. E.g., he writes in Gal. 2:21 of "making void" (ERV-ASV; RSV "nullify") the grace of God; and in Gal. 5:4 he chides his readers because they have "fallen away" from grace. He pleads too with the Corinthians that they do not "accept the grace of God in vain" (II Cor. 6:1).

Grace, therefore, does not override man's will and violate his responsibility; and that in man which enables grace to be effective in his life is what Paul calls "faith."

Finally, the grace of God is an active and effective power from God, bringing merciful aid to man. It is not a theoretical characteristic of the divine nature. It signifies rather the energetic initiative which God has taken and still takes in Christ to heal the breach between man and God, and repair the ruins in man's soul. Indeed, there are passages where grace is almost equated with power: "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (II Cor. 12:9; cf. also I Cor. 15:10).

Indeed, it is probably an error to think of grace (or righteousness) as some separate entity, belonging to God and able to be dispensed by God. The "grace of God" means "God in his graciousness," and is a mode of speech, describing God himself, in his personal and gracious approach to man.

Grace is also a quality of Christian character. For Paul, "grace" usually means the grace of God as bestowed on man in Christ. More than this, however, it is one of those divine activities which can reproduce itself in the human lives of those who receive it. Certainly it is never used of man in his attitude to God, but it may be used of a Christian man in his relationship to his fellows. In this respect it is like love (ἀγάπη), which is fundamentally God's love for man, but the word can also be used of the Christian man's love for his fellow men. So too "grace" is primarily the characteristic of God's dealings with man, but can also be used of the relationship of man to man (as in Eph. 4:29; Col. 4:6).

In a further sense, derived from this, it is applied to the generous contribution which Christians make for the relief of their less fortunate fellows (I Cor. 16:3; cf. II Cor. 1:15; 8:4, 6, 19). In this last context Paul links together very closely the grace of God in Christ toward man (II Cor. 8:9) and the generosity toward his fellows which this should awaken in man (vss. 4, 6, 19).

e. "Greetings" and "thanks." In addition, Paul uses χάρις as the normal greeting with which he begins his letters ("grace and peace to you"), and "grace be with you" is his farewell greeting. Paul, indeed, may have been the originator of this use of χάρις as a Christian greeting. Certainly he used it regularly. In origin it was an adaptation for Christian purposes of the ordinary greeting of secular letters, familiar to us from the papyri: χαῖρε or χαίρετε ("rejoice"). The similarity of the verbal form χαίρω to the noun χάρις made the change easy and understandable. Superficially it is a slight change; in significance it is an enormous one.

Besides these rather particular uses of χάρις, Paul also avails himself occasionally of the current secular uses. The phrase χάρις τῷ θεῷ, e.g., occurs frequently in the ordinary sense of "thanks be to God" (as in II Cor. 8:16).

3. "Grace" in the Pastoral letters. Not many modern scholars regard these letters as coming direct from the apostle's hand, though it is probable that some portions of genuine letters have been included in them. It is appropriate, therefore, that a note on their use of "grace" should be added separately.

In these three letters "grace" occurs thirteen times. Six of these occurrences are found in the normal

Pauline greetings at the beginning and the end of the three letters. Two others appear in the common idiom χάριν ἔχω ("I thank"). The other five uses (I Tim. 1:14; II Tim. 1:9; 2:1; Tit. 2:11; 3:7) have a distinctively Pauline flavor about them. None of them occurs in a passage which is generally regarded as Pauline; yet they sound Pauline: grace abounds, and the writer speaks of being saved, justified, called, strengthened, by grace. But it may well be that the similarities to the Pauline phraseology come from a close imitation of his vocabulary.

4. Grace in the non-Pauline writings of the NT.

a. The gospels. The word is not used at all in Matthew and Mark. In Luke there are six instances of it, but it is used in each case as in secular Greek, with the meaning of "pleasantness," "kindliness," "favor," or "thanks." There is no case of a recognizably Pauline usage, though it is possible that something of a deeper meaning may lie behind the characterization of the words of Jesus as "words of grace" (4:22 ERV-ASV).

In John the word occurs only four times, all four within the space of four verses in the Prologue (1:14-17). Here "grace" is combined with "truth," as if they are being presented as complementary to each other, together comprehending the totality of the gospel message (in a way somewhat similar to that in which Paul combines the "kindness and the severity" of God in Rom. 11:22). In the same context grace is contrasted with law, as with a lower level of religious life. It seems probable that something of the more developed meaning of the word, which we found in the Pauline writings, is to be recognized here.

b. Acts. Here the LXX (and secular) use of the word, meaning "favor," appears frequently, as in 2:47; 7:10, 46. In some other contexts, however, the word carries something of the Pauline emphasis. E.g., salvation is through grace (15:11), and so, indeed, even is "faith" (18:27). The grace of God is both the content of the gospel message (20:24, 32; 14:3) and the explanation of missionary success among the Gentiles (11:23). As in Rom. 5:2, it may be used to describe the status of the believer in his dependence on God (13:43); and in greetings of farewell, friends are committed to the grace of God or of Christ (14:26; 15:40).

c. Hebrews. The characteristic Pauline use of "grace" is not clearly present in this letter, though there are some contexts where the meaning clearly transcends its normal significance in the LXX.

The reading in 2:9 is uncertain, but the more commonly accepted one speaks of Christ's tasting death for everyone "by the grace of God." To associate grace with the self-giving of Christ on the cross "for everyone" is a Pauline emphasis.

In 13:25 we meet the benediction: "Grace be with all of you," which is familiar in the Pauline writings. In 12:28 (ERV-ASV) and perhaps 12:15, the grace of God is that which provides power for man to obey God, and in 13:9 it is that by which the "heart is strengthened." The "Spirit of grace" in 10:29 is the Holy Spirit, and the "throne of grace" is probably a periphrasis for God himself, from whom grace comes to our aid in times of need (4:16).

Here, therefore, grace is descriptive of God's loving concern and readiness to aid all who turn to him in need; but it is not specifically related to God's giving of himself to man in Christ and in the bestowal of salvation.

d. James. In this letter "grace" is used twice, and both times in connection with a quotation from the LXX (Prov. 3:34). We cannot be sure, therefore, that there is any distinctively Christian meaning in James's use of the word (4:6).

e. I Peter. In this letter "grace" is used more frequently, in proportion to its length, than in any other non-Pauline writing. In some respects it approaches Paul's usage. In the initial greeting, e.g., "grace" is combined with "peace." It is named the "grace of God," but it is related to God's action in Christ (1:10, 13; 5:10). It is also used to describe the privileged status of a believer in relation to God in 5:12; 3:7, where it is called the "grace of life" (cf. Acts 13:43; Rom. 5:2). In 2:19-20 it is applied to a gracious act or bearing which gains God's approval. In 4:10 grace is bestowed on believers in order to equip them with a "gracious gift" (χάρισμα) for the sake of others, and such gifts vary because grace itself is varied (ποικίλη). In 5:5 the word occurs in the same quotation from Prov. 3:34 as that found in James. See § 4*d above*.

Along with Acts, I Peter comes nearer in its use of "grace" to the distinctive Pauline meaning of the word than the other books of the NT.

f. II Peter. Apart from the initial greeting (1:2), which is like that in I Pet. 1:2, the only use of "grace" is at 3:18, where it occurs in the familiar phrase "grow in grace," which has been commonly interpreted to mean "grow in Christian character and goodness." It may be, however, that the phrase should be related closely to the name of Jesus, which follows: "grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

g. Jude. In vs. 4 certain men are condemned because they "pervert the grace of our God into licentiousness," presuming on God's forgiveness in order to persist in sin. It is the same abuse of grace which is denounced by Paul in Rom. 6:1.

h. Revelation. There is no use of "grace" in this book except in the opening and closing greetings, which correspond closely to those used by Paul.

5. The idea of grace apart from the use of the word "grace." So far we have confined ourselves largely to the use of the word "grace" in the NT and the Greek version of the OT. The truth about God, which the word "grace" is intended to represent, is, however, far more widespread in the Bible than the use of the word itself.

In the OT, e.g., we examined mainly the uses of חֵן, the Hebrew word translated in the LXX as χάρις. In many respects, however, the developed Christian meaning of grace is more akin to the Hebrew חֶסֶד, although this in the LXX is most commonly rendered by ἔλεος ("mercy"). חסד has, therefore, usually been translated into English as "mercy." The committee which translated the RSV found this single word inadequate, since חסד means a "loyal devotion grounded in love which goes beyond legal obligation and can be depended on to the utmost." This clearly has much in common with what Paul meant by "grace." The RSV translates it as "steadfast love." It is true that this "steadfast love" is normally directed toward God's chosen people, bound to him by the covenant and living in obedience to it ("such as keep his covenant"), but there are a few striking instances where חסד is shown by God to sinful and undeserving people. E.g., God promises to David that his חסד will not depart from his offspring, even if they "commit iniquity" (II Sam. 7:15); and in Isa. 54:8 God's חסד is offered to disobedient people (cf. also Ps. 103: 10-11). These are, however, only rare exceptions, but they do indicate a certain anticipation of NT teaching.

Apart, however, from the use of any particular word, we find sometimes in the OT a wondering awareness of God's willingness to forgive those who are utterly undeserving of it. It is present, e.g., in Pss. 32; 51; 130; 143. God's love for sinners also shines through the passages known as the "Servant Songs" in Isaiah. Ezekiel hears God proclaiming to his faithless people: "You shall be clean from all your uncleannesses, and from all your idols I will cleanse you" (36:25-29). In the book of Jonah, moreover, God is revealed as one who has mercy even upon the sinful heathen. Further, the fact that God chose Israel to be his own people must be attributed entirely to his "grace." It was not based on any merit in them. So too his deliverance of them out of Egypt was another act of grace, and not at all a reward for their good conduct.

In the gospels the word "grace" hardly appears at all in the full Pauline sense, but God's gracious dealings with his children are the theme of the gospels. It is human need, not merit, which brings Christ to this earth. The whole ministry of Jesus is an act of grace. His loving concern for the outcasts of society earns for him the scornful title "friend of sinners." He himself declares that he came not to call the righteous but sinners.

His teaching also expounds what his life illustrates. The father who welcomes home a worthless son with a generosity which bears no relation to the boy's merits is not unworthy to reflect a truth about God himself (Luke 15:11-24). The heartbroken tax collector, with nothing to plead before God but his own desperate need and penitence, is accepted ("justified") rather than the law-abiding Pharisee whose good conduct is made the ground of his self-assurance (Luke 18:14). In the parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt. 20:1-15) the master's treatment of the workers far exceeds the requirements of justice. It is their need and his most unusual generosity which determine his action, not their achievements. Similarly God's dealings with men, says Jesus, are not based on a niggardly calculation of what each one deserves, but handed out in almost reckless extravagance, "good measure, pressed down, shaken together, running over" (Luke 6:38).

For Paul everything about Jesus speaks of the grace of God. His coming to earth at all is a supreme act of "grace" (II Cor. 8:9). Phil. 2:5-8 also proclaims this same act of grace, though the word is not applied to it; here, however, it is not only the Incarnation which is the proof of God's astonishing mercy, but also the death of Jesus. Rom. 5:6-11 presses home the same truth ("While we were yet helpless, . . . Christ died for the ungodly"). Nor is it only what Christ did for us, but what he still does through his risen presence and the gift of the Spirit, which proclaims his grace. It has been claimed, e.g., for Rom. 8 that the whole chapter is just an exposition of grace, though the word itself is not named. The same is true of Rom. 6:23; II Cor. 5:14-21; and many other passages.

6. Conclusion. The current uses of "grace" in secular Greek find their place within the NT, but the meaning of "favor" (an undeserved kindness) predominates. This meaning of the word readily lent itself to the deeper Christian significance which came to be attached to it. In Paul's letters it is applied particularly to God's uncovenanted, undeserved mercy toward man in Jesus, both in his incarnation and death and in his risen life. From this grace come to man the blessing of forgiveness, peace with God, salvation, strength for obedience to God, and gifts for service in his church.

Bibliography. G. P. Wetter, Charis (1913). J. Moffatt, Grace in the NT (1931). W. Manson, "Grace in the NT," in W. T. Whitley, ed., The Doctrine of Grace (1932), pp. 33-60. R. Bultmann, The Theology of the NT (1952), I, 288-92; II, 210-11. C. R. Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Grace (1956).

C. L. MITTON

GRACIOUS. See GRACE.

GRAFT; KJV GRAFF. The verb used in Rom. 11: 17-24 to translate ἐγκεντρίζω. A slip of a cultivated plant is inserted (grafted) into the stock of a common one. Paul used the figure to illustrate how Gentile believers had been grafted into the stock of faithless Israel, but he warned that the new branch could be cut away if it proved fruitless.

S. A. CARTLEDGE

GRAIN [בר, bar; דגן, dāghān; שבר, šebher; Ugar. dgn; κόκκος; σῖτος]. The edible seeds of certain cultivated grasses which provide a staple food for man, especially BARLEY; WHEAT. Many Hebrew and Greek words are associated with the above specific references to grain. The KJV usually uses the Old English "corn" to translate these words, but the almost exclusive use of "corn" for Indian maize in America has necessitated a change in the American versions.

Other words used for various kinds of grain are: גרש (gereś), "crushed grain" (Lev. 2:14, 16); כרמל (karmel), "fresh ears" (Lev. 2:14; 23:14; II Kings 4: 42); מלילה (mᵉlîlâ), "ear" (of grain; Deut. 23:25—H 23:26); ערמה (ʿărēmâ), "heap of grain" (Ruth 3:7; Neh. 13:15; Jer. 50:26; cf. II Chr. 31:6-9; Song of S. 7:2—H 7:3); קלי (qālî), "parched grain" (Lev. 23:14; Ruth 2:14; I Sam. 17:17; 25:18; II Sam. 17:28); קמה (qāmâ), σπόριμα, "standing grain" (Exod. 22:6—H 22:5; Deut. 16:9; 23:25—H 23:26; Matt. 12:1; Mark 2:23; Luke 6:1); קמח (qemaḥ), "flour" or "meal" (Gen. 18:6; Num. 5:15; Judg. 6:19; Isa. 47:2; Hos. 8:7; etc.; see FLOUR); ריפות (rîphôth), "crushed grain" (II Sam. 17:19; Prov. 27:22); שבלת (šibbōleth), στάχυς, "ear" (of grain; Gen. 41:5-6; Ruth 2:2; Job 24:24; Isa. 17:5 [cf. Judg. 12:6]; Matt. 12:1; Mark 2:23; Luke 6:1).

The KJV uses "corn" occasionally for several other related Hebrew words: בליל (bālîl; Job 24:6; RSV "fodder"; cf. Job 6:5; Isa. 30:24); בן (ben; Isa. 21:10; lit., "son of [a threshing floor]"); גדיש (gādhîš; Exod. 22:6—H 22:5; RSV "stacked grain"; cf.

Judg. 15:5); גרן (gōren; Deut. 16:13; RSV "threshing floor"); and עבור ('ābhûr; Josh. 5:11-12; RSV "produce").

The principal kinds of grain used for food in biblical times were: דחן (dōḥan, MILLET; Ezek. 4:9); חטה (ḥiṭṭâ, WHEAT; Gen. 30:14; etc.); כסמת (kussemeth, emmer [or SPELT?]; Exod. 9:32; etc.); שערה (śe'ōrâ, BARLEY; Exod. 9:31; etc.). The KJV mentions also RYE; FITCHES, but these were mistranslations for "spelt" (or "emmer"?).

The broad Plain of Esdraelon is the "breadbasket" of Israel today, much as it was in biblical times. Many of the broad valleys in Galilee provide fertile fields for grain. The ancient Philistine Plain along the S coast, much of the Plain of Sharon, and the valleys of Sorek and Elah in the Shephelah are still main grain-producing areas in Israel. Every available valley in the rough hill country of W Jordan is used for grain, even among the myriad olive trees. Many a rocky hillside or terrace produces its small plot of grain. The high W plateau of Transjordan has always been an important grain-producing area. For discussion of the implements used in biblical times, see AGRICULTURE § 4.

Grain-growing supplied frequent metaphors for prophet and apostle, as the above references show. Jesus' inimitable parables of the sower (Matt. 13:3-23; Mark 4:3-20), the weeds among the wheat (Matt. 13:24-30), the growth of the seed (Mark 4:26-29), the rich man and his barns (Luke 12:16-21), and other references to grain are still forceful vehicles of his message (see also I Cor. 15:35-38). See AGRICULTURE § 8.

The vital importance of grain crops to the people of the ancient Near East led to elaborate FERTILITY CULTS, worship designed to gain the favor of the goddess of fertility. Such goddesses are depicted on ancient cylinder seals, identified by stalks of grain projecting from their shoulders or garments. The adoption of these cults from the Canaanites by the Hebrew peasants brought forth the invective of the OT prophets, who viewed such practices as rebellion against Yahweh.

Several excavations of biblical cities have yielded remains of grain (mostly carbonized) and storage jars. The limestone plaque found in 1908 in the ruins of ancient Gezer is a late-tenth-century-B.C. agricultural calendar which mentions "grain-planting" and "barley harvest," and implies the wheat harvest (see INSCRIPTIONS). The Feast of Weeks (PENTECOST; Lev. 23:15-22; Deut. 16:9-12) was celebrated seven weeks (fifty days) after the beginning of the barley harvest, when the wheat harvest had been completed. See WEEKS, FEAST OF.

See also AGRICULTURE; CALENDAR; FLORA § A1; WINNOWING. J. C. TREVER

GRANARY. A storage place for winnowed grain, ranging from large jars to large pits.

Hebrew vocabulary abounds in terms for storage places, but not all clearly refer to granaries. מגורה occurs twice—Hag. 2:19 (RSV "barn"); Joel 1:17—in contexts which indicate granaries. אסם may refer to granaries in Deut. 28:8 (RSV "barn"; KJV "storehouse"); Prov. 3:10 ("barn"). In the RSV, מאבוס is translated "granary" in Jer. 50:26.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

37. Large grain storage pit at Megiddo, with pair of winding stairs; Stratum III (ca. 780-650 B.C.)

In Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17, ἀποθήκην is used for a place to store grain.

Excavations of Palestinian sites have revealed various methods of storing grain.* In 1953 at Tell es-Sultan (Jericho) a room was cleared containing twelve or more Middle Bronze storage jars, many with charred grain remaining in them. At Tell Jemmeh a large number of grain pits, some as large as twenty-five feet in diameter, were excavated. At Beisan was found a silo made of bricks, more than twelve feet in diameter and nearly as deep. In addition to these methods of storage, caves and dry cisterns may have been used. It was probably in the Late Bronze and Early Iron ages that large central granaries first became widespread in Palestine. See also STORE CITIES. Fig. GRA 37.

Bibliography. A. G. Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique, I (1939), 315-17. H. N. RICHARDSON

GRAPE, GRAPES. See VINE, VINEYARD, §§ 3*e*, 5*a*.

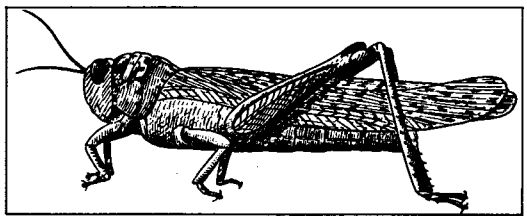
GRASS [דשא, חציר, ירק, עשב; χόρτος]. It is unlikely that the Hebrew distinguished carefully between the various grasses and grasslike herbs. The most general term in the OT for "grass" is עשב, which is used both of fodder for beasts (Deut. 11:15) and of food for men (Gen. 1:29; "plant," as frequently elsewhere; KJV "herb"). חציר is more strictly "grass." It is used of fodder, but not of human food (Ps. 104:14); of the growth on housetops (Ps. 129:6); etc. דשא (Aramaic דתא) refers to newly grown forage plants (II Sam. 23:4; Job 6:5). ירק (Num. 22:4) literally means "green," and is used by metonymy for "grass."



The short-lived character of grass is used to symbolize the temporary nature of man's life (Ps. 90:5); its profusion signifies fruitfulness and prosperity (Isa. 66:14). God's provision of grass for men and animals is one example of his providential care (Ps. 104:14), its failure in time of drought a sign of his displeasure (Jer. 14:5).

In the NT, "grass" (χόρτος) is likewise used to illustrate both God's providential care (Matt. 6:30) and man's transitoriness (Jas. 1:10-11).

R. W. CORNEY

GRASSHOPPER [ארבה (Nah. 3:15, 17; KJV in Judg. 6:5; 7:12; Job 39:20; Jer. 46:23), crowd, swarm, Akkad. aribu, Ugar. irby, Amharic anbētā, usually LOCUST; חגב, cf. Arab. ḥajab, hide, cover (alternately LOCUST); KJV גוב, גובי, swarm, multitude, from גבה, collect (RSV LOCUST)]. Even today "grasshopper" and "locust" are often used interchangeably, but "locust" is more correctly used to designate only the gregarious phase of certain short-horned grasshoppers (Acridiidae). The true grasshopper, then, is either a member of the long-horned family (Tettigoniidae), or is a solitary (non-migratory) phase of a short-horned species. Both families belong to the order Orthoptera. Actually, only a few species of Acridids produce swarms of the gregarious phase and can be called locusts. All the rest are grasshoppers. Figs. GRA 38; LOC 33-35.

From Bodenheimer, Animals of the Bible (Tel Aviv: The Dvir Company Ltd.)

38. Short-horned grasshopper (Anacridium aegyptium)

In all stages of its life, the grasshopper destroys vegetation (Judg. 6:5; II Chr. 7:13; Eccl. 12:5[?]; Amos 7:1-2; Nah. 3:15). It is also used in various metaphors: The inhabitants of the earth are as insignificant as grasshoppers (Isa. 40:22), and so are Israel's spies (Num. 13:33). War horses on the offensive are like grasshoppers (Job 39:20). Israel's enemies, like grasshoppers, lay waste her land (Judg. 6:5; Jer. 46:23; Amos 7:1; Nah. 3:15). Nineveh's destroyers, like grasshoppers, left as suddenly as they came (Nah. 3:16-17). They, like the sand and the stars, are countless (Judg. 6:5; 7:12; Jer. 46:23; Nah. 3:15-17).

The חגב is one of four orthopterous insects listed as clean (Lev. 11:22; see BALD LOCUST). Only the thorax, either dried or broiled, minus head, viscera, wings, and legs, was thus eaten.

See also FAUNA § E2.

Bibliography. S. H. Skaife, African Insect Life (1953); C. B. Williams, Insect Migration (1958). See also bibliography under BALD LOCUST.

W. W. FRERICHS

GRATING [מכבר, lattice-work]; KJV GRATE. A bronze network or lattice (רשת) on the altar of burnt offering before the tabernacle (Exod. 27:4; 35:16; 38:4-5, 30; 39:39). The grating was to be placed under (תחת) a ledge of the altar, halfway down the side. The meaning is obscure, and the ledge is not otherwise described. The grating was to have rings at each of its four corners, through which carrying poles were inserted; this suggests that it might have formed a "collar" around the ALTAR, perhaps under a projection (the "ledge") like those on horned altars found at Megiddo and elsewhere.

E. M. GOOD

GRATITUDE. No motif more adequately reveals the nature of biblical faith than does gratitude or thanksgiving. With three unimportant exceptions (Luke 17:9; Acts 24:3; Rom. 16:4), thanks is always rendered unto God. It occurs only within the context of the covenant relationship. And it is always prompted by a concrete act of the covenant God within history.

In the OT, ידה is the verb "to give thanks," תודה the noun "thanksgiving." In the NT, εὐχαριστέω is most frequently employed verbally, while ἐξομολογέομαι (Matt. 11:25 = Luke 10:21) and ἀνθομολογέομαι (Luke 2:38) appear infrequently. Εὐχαριστία, "thankfulness," and χάρις, "thanks," are the nouns, εὐχάριστος the adjective "thankful."

1. In the OT. In the OT, thanksgiving forms the special note of the Psalter. Yet Israel's gratitude rings throughout her history. We are told that King David appointed certain Levites "to invoke, to thank, and to praise the LORD" (I Chr. 16:4; cf. vss. 7, 41; 23:30; 25:3; Neh. 12:46); this practice was continued by Solomon (II Chr. 5:13; 7:6), by Hezekiah (II Chr. 31:2), and by the returned exiles (Neh. 11:17; 12:24, 27, 31, 38, 40).

Thanksgiving played an integral part in Israel's cult. Festival processions on the way to Zion filled the air with "glad shouts and songs of thanksgiving" (Ps. 42:4). Entrance into the temple was with thanksgiving (Pss. 95:2; 100:4), and the service of worship contained melodies of gratitude (Ps. 147:7). Sacrifices, given as payment of a vow, were accompanied by thanks (Ps. 54:6; cf. Jonah 2:9), which sometimes took the place of the burnt offering (Ps. 69:30). "Judgments" before the altar of Yahweh were made with thanksgiving (Ps. 26:7). And all the tribes of Israel went up to Jerusalem to give thanks to the name of the Lord (Ps. 122:4).

Always Israel's gratitude was motivated by faith:

> O give thanks to the LORD, for he is good, > for his steadfast love endures for ever!

(Pss. 106:1; 107:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1 [cf. vss. 3, 26]; I Chr. 16:4, 34, 41; cf. II Chr. 7:3; Ezra 3:11; Jer. 33:11).

Israel thanked Yahweh because he remained ever faithful to his covenant with her (Pss. 100:4; 107:8; 118:19; 138:2; 57:9). His faithfulness was manifested in many ways: in his protection of the nation and the individual from their enemies (Pss. 7:17; 28:7; 35:18; 44:8; 54:6; 79:13; 118:21; 138:1); in his deliverance of the needy from judgment (Ps. 109:30), from prison (Ps. 142:7), and from death (Pss. 30:12; 86:12; Isa. 38:18-19; cf. Ps. 138:2); in his righteous judgment, which put down the wicked and exalted the godly (Pss. 52:9; 75:1; 92:1; 140:13); in his forgiveness of his sinful people (Ps. 30:4; Isa. 12:1); in his wonderful provision for his chosen nation (Pss. 111:1; 145:10). These were Yahweh's mighty works of righteousness, of faithfulness to his covenant, and Israel's response was one of gratitude for his covenant love. Indeed, such gratitude was, on Israel's part, the condition for the proper fulfilment of her covenantal duties, for out of such gratitude was born the willingness to obey the laws of the covenant. Only in the power of the gospel could Israel truly come to fulfilment of the law.

2. In the NT. The NT differs little from the OT. Perhaps because Jesus often prayed alone (Mark 6:46), few of his thanksgivings are preserved in the tradition (Mark 8:6 = Matt. 15:36 = John 6:11, 23; Mark 14:23 = Matt. 26:27 = Luke 22:17; I Cor. 11:24; Matt. 11:25 = Luke 10:21; John 11:41). However, the angels' exclamation of Rev. 7:12 finds echo throughout the NT: "Blessing and glory and wisdom and thanksgiving and honor and power and might be to our God for ever and ever! Amen." Those who knew Jesus in the flesh thanked God for his work (Luke 17:16) and for his person (Luke 2:38). Those following after, and especially the apostle Paul, thanked God continually for that which was wrought by his power (Rom. 1:8; 7:25): for Jesus Christ (II Cor. 9:15), for a share in the coming kingdom (Col. 1:12; cf. II Thess. 2:13), for strength to proclaim the gospel (I Tim. 1:12), for special spiritual gifts (I Cor. 14:18; cf. Rom. 14:6), for physical sustenance (Acts 27:35; Rom. 14:6; I Cor. 10:30), for earthly joys (I Tim. 4:3), for the spread of the faith (II Cor. 2:14), for the love and the faith of the brethren (Rom. 6:17; I Cor. 1:4; II Cor. 8:16; Eph. 1:16; Phil. 1:3; Col. 1:3; I Thess. 1:2; 2:13; 3:9; II Thess. 1:3; Philem. 4), for the guidance of God (I Cor. 1:14). These were not just pious prayers set down by the writers. They were heartfelt thanksgivings poured out to God for that which God, through Christ and his Spirit, was accomplishing in the early church. The authors' gratitude was response to the concrete action of God within history.

Hence the NT writers urged their fellow Christians to be also thus grateful (Eph. 5:4; Col. 3:15). It would seem a strange exhortation, for gratitude cannot be commanded, but must spring spontaneously from the heart. As it stands in the NT, it forms simply another call to faith—a call to recognize that which God has done, to receive the benefits of his actions, to nurture such benefits in the soul, and to witness to them to the world. Only where gratitude was present was there true faith (cf. Rom. 1:21), for gratitude was the only faithful response possible to God's gift in Christ (cf. I Cor. 15:57). Indeed, the power to give thanks was itself given "in Christ," and thanksgivings were to be rendered through his power (Col. 3:17) and in his name (Eph. 5:20). The Christian was, then, to abound in thanksgiving (Col. 2:7), to pray with thanksgiving (Col. 4:2; Phil. 4:6; I Tim. 2:1), to witness to the gospel by being intelligibly thankful (I Cor. 14:16-17). This was the will of God for him (I Thess. 5:18). As he so responded, and as he served his faith rightly, the power of the gospel would spread to produce new thanksgivings (II Cor. 9:11-12; 1:11), all to the glory of God (II Cor. 4:15).

Gratitude lay at the heart of biblical faith because it formed the only proper response to that which had happened in history—namely, God's salvation of his people. E. R. ACHTEMEIER

GRAVE [קבורה, קבר (alternately TOMB), שאול (alternately SHEOL); τάφος (Rom. 3:13; KJV SEPULCHRE); KJV בעי (Job 30:24; cf. RSV), שחת (Job 33:22; RSV PIT); KJV ἅδης (RSV DEATH)]. An excavated place for the burial of the deceased. Context of biblical passages seldom makes clear whether the place was a trench in the soil or a cave cut in stone. The former may be intended in II Kings 13:21; Ps. 49:14; Tob. 8:9, 18. Artificial or natural caves shaped for the purpose were common (see TOMB). W. L. REED GRAVEL [חצץ; KJV מעה, see below]. The word is used figuratively with reference to the consequences of deceitfulness (Prov. 20:17), and also in reference to the suffering which Zion receives at the hand of the Lord (Lam. 3:16; KJV GRAVEL STONES).

In Isa. 48:19 KJV, מעה is rendered "gravel"; the RSV "GRAINS [of sand]" supports the parallelism of the verse more adequately. H. F. BECK GRAVEN IMAGE [פסל, פסילים]. An image carved from stone, metal, or wood, mentioned in the OT (e.g., Deut. 27:15; Judg. 17:3-4; II Chr. 34:3; Nah. 1:14) with the molten image (מסכה) as an idol forbidden to the Hebrews. The graven image differed from the molten in that the latter was cast in a mold, whereas the former was sculptured.

Graven images were widely used in the ancient Near East for the purpose of representing the various deities. They are not mentioned in Genesis or in connection with the patriarchs and their travels in the land of Canaan; but according to Deut. 7:5; 12:3, they were used by the Canaanites. The making of the graven image was expressly forbidden to the Hebrews in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:4; Deut. 5:8), where it is implied that such images were made in the forms of animals, birds, and the human figure (cf. Deut. 4:16). They are also condemned elsewhere in the Pentateuch (Lev. 26:1; Deut. 4:23, 25; 27:15), and by certain prophets (e.g., Isa. 10:10; 21:9; 30:22; Jer. 8:19; 10:14; 51:47; Hos. 11:2; Mic. 1:7; 5:13; Nah. 1:14; Hab. 2:18). According to Judg. 17:1-4, a graven image of silver was made by a silversmith for the family of Micah, who lived in the hill country of Ephraim, and it was used in the worship of Yahweh. That they were also made of wood and could be burned, is implied in Deut. 7:5. Manasseh is condemned for having made graven images (II Chr. 33:19; cf. II Kings 21:7), and they were destroyed during the reformation of Josiah (II Chr. 34:4).

W. L. REED

GRAVING TOOL [חרט]. A cutting implement with which the sculptor shaped his statue from the rough cast form. With this tool Aaron formed the golden calf (Exod. 32:4; see ART; CALF, GOLDEN). The same Hebrew word is used for a style of writing in Isa. 8:1.

L. E. TOOMBS

GRAY. A translation of the Hebrew verb שיב and more frequently the noun שיבה, suggesting "old age" in terms of gray hairs or gray head (Gen. 42:38; 44:29, 31; Deut. 32:25; I Sam. 12:2; Job 15:10; Ps. 71:18; Prov. 20:29; Isa. 46:4; Hos. 7:9). The three Greek words γῆρας, πολιαί, and πρεσβύτης, all denoting "old age," are employed in the LXX.

See also COLORS. C. L. WICKWIRE

GREAT [μέγας, μεγάλη]. A title which, along with "Power" (Acts 8:9-10), should probably be interpreted against the background of the SIMON MAGUS legend, according to which he claimed the title as one who possessed divine power. He said "that he himself was somebody great." The people said of him: "This man is that power of God which is called Great." A century later, Justin (Apol. I.26) said that during the reign of Claudius, Simon Magus had gone to Rome, where he had been honored as a god; and that all the Samaritans, and some persons of other nations, regarded him as the first god (πρῶτον θεόν).

The nearest linguistic parallel to the title "Great" is the inscription of Saïttaï in Lydia: "One god in heaven, heavenly Moon, great power of the immortal God." Also he quotes from Aelius Aristides 37, 28 K: "Athena as the power of Zeus."

The NT is familiar with δύναμις, "power," as an angelic or demonic being (Rom. 8:38; I Cor. 15:24; Eph. 1:21; I Pet. 3:22). Ign. Eph. 13.1 has "the powers of Satan." The Martyrdom of Polycarp (14.1) has "God of angels and powers." Mark 14:62 uses "Power" as a metonym for God: "sitting at the right hand of Power." Not satisfied with the simple metonym, Luke expands it in 22:69 to "power of God."

There are thus at least four distinct ways of interpreting "Power" and "Great" with reference to Simon. He might consider himself like Athena as the power of God; like the moon as the great power of God; as an angel or demon; or as God himself. If we could rely on the legend of Justin's time, we would say that Simon claimed to be God. This is what his later followers asserted he was. But in view of the uncertain quality of the sources, one can safely venture no more than to point out the possibilities.

Bibliography. W. Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the NT and Other Early Christian Literature (1957): μέγας, p. 499, and δύναμις, p. 207, where the literature is cited.

S. V. McCasland

39. The title page of the Great Bible (A.D. 1539)

GREAT BIBLE, THE. The first authorized version of the English Bible, edited by Miles Coverdale at Cromwell's request in 1539. Because of its size it was called the Great Bible. It was essentially Tyndale's translation without his marginal notes. It is sometimes called the Cranmer Bible because Archbishop Cranmer wrote a preface to the second edition.

Aided by competent scholars in Hebrew and Greek, Coverdale accomplished his task of preparing the text but had to go to Paris to secure a press capable of publishing the large Bible he had planned. The Inquisition authorities interfered, and the project was transferred to London, where the work was completed. See Versions, English, § 4.

Fig. GRE 39. J. R. Branton

GREAT LIZARD [צב; cf. Syr. 'abhā, lizard; Arab. ḍabb, lizard]; KJV TORTOISE. It is probable, from its context in Lev. 11:29 and in view of the cognates cited above, that צב (ṣābh) designates a kind of lizard, and this supposition is supported by the Targ., the Peshitta, and the LXX (which uses "land crocodile"; cf. Herodotus IV.192). Tristram follows Bochart in identifying the lizard in question with Uromastix spinipes (of the family Agamidae), which is ca. eighteen inches long and is called ḍabb by the Arabs.

See also Fauna § D; Lizard.

W. S. McCullough

GREAT OWL [ינשוף (yanshûph in Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16; yanshôph in Isa. 34:11), possibly blower, from נשף, to blow; cf. נשף, twilight; LXX-Vulg. ibis (Lev. 11:17; Isa. 34:11), swan (Deut. 14:16); Targ. (Onq.) קיפופא, owl]. Alternately: OWL (Isa. 34:11); IBIS (Lev. 11:17). The term often applied to the great horned or eagle owls, the largest and most powerful of all the owls, the species in Egypt being the Bubo bubo ascalaphus (of the subfamily Bubonidae).

Tristram noted the presence of the Great Owl in Palestine in the nineteenth century, but whether it can be identified with ינשוף is quite uncertain. G. R. Driver (see bibliography) favors the screech owl, Tyto alba erlangeri. The translation "ibis" (Lev. 11:17) is not correct, for according to Isa. 34:11, the ינשוף is found in Edomite ruins, which would not be the normal habitat of a wading bird.

Bibliography. G. R. Driver, PEQ (April, 1955), p. 15.

W. S. McCullough

GREAT SEA [הים הגדול]. The name by which the Mediterranean Sea was known by the peoples of the Near East. Its divisions included the Levant (Phoenician), the Aegean, the Adriatic, the Ionian, and the Tyrrhenian seas.

The Hebrews doubtless referred to the Mediterranean as the Great Sea (Num. 34:6; Josh. 1:4; Ezek. 47:10; etc.) because it was larger than the other seas (see Sea) with which they were acquainted. It was also referred to as the "western sea" (הים האחרון; Deut. 11:24; 34:2; Joel 2:20; Zech. 14:8). To the ancient Hebrews the great sea lay behind them when they faced E to determine the cardinal directions. The Mediterranean Sea is also intended by the term ים יפו (Ezra 3:7; RSV "sea, to Joppa"; KJV "sea of Joppa"). In Exod. 23:31 it is referred to as the "sea of the Philistines." As can be judged by the context of the passages involved, the Mediterranean Sea is often designated in the OT simply as "the sea" (ים; Josh. 16:8; I Kings 5:9; 18:43; Jer. 46:18; Jonah 1:4), and similarly in the NT (θάλασσα, "seaside"; Acts 10:6, 32).

The Mediterranean is an inland ocean extending about 2,200 miles from Gibraltar to the Lebanon coast, and varying in width from ca. one hundred to six hundred miles. Geological studies have determined that the sea was formed during the Tertiary period from a larger ocean, called the Tethys. The movement of continental blocks between Europe and North Africa resulted in the formation of several basins of considerable variation in depth, and the mountains near the shores of the sea.

Unlike their neighbors the Phoenicians, who were famous for their fleets which sailed to many Mediterranean lands, the Hebrews were not a seafaring people. In the time of Solomon a fleet of ships was built on the Red Sea at EZION-GEBER and operated with the assistance of the Phoenicians (I Kings 9:26-27). Jehoshaphat was less successful, for his ships were wrecked in the same harbor (I Kings 22:47-49).

There is no record of similar ventures on the Mediterrean undertaken by the Hebrew people. This has been explained in part as being due to the desert origin of the people, which caused them to fear the sea. However, in view of the use of the Red Sea, which offered a reasonably good harbor at Ezion-geber, and the fact that the Phoenicians were successful sailors, although some of their ancestors were desert Semites, the Hebrew attitude toward the Mediterranean is probably to be explained by the absence of good harbors.

The Palestinian coast line of less than one hundred miles between Phoenicia and Philistia had no natural harbors from which fleets might operate. Ships could stop in fair weather at some of the Hebrew coastal towns (see DOR; JOPPA; ACCO); and some coastal shipping was possible, as in the time of Solomon, when timber from Lebanon was brought in rafts to Joppa (II Chr. 2:16). As an agricultural people, whose roads, rather than seas, were the important lanes of commerce, the Hebrews tended to look inland rather than to the sea in the development of their culture.

When the Hebrews described the territory of Canaan, they referred to the Great Sea as its W border (Num. 34:6; Josh. 9:1). According to Josh. 15:12, for the territory of Judah, "the west boundary was the Great Sea with its coast-line." In a similar way the records of the military exploits of such Assyrian and Babylonian kings as Ashurnasirpal II, Shalmaneser III, and Nebuchadnezzar refer to advances that were made to the Great Sea or the "upper sea" (Mediterranean).

Although the Hebrews often referred to Yahweh's power over the RED SEA, they do not mention or imply very frequently a similar power over the Mediterranean Sea. Yet from the instances where it is reported that Yahweh causes a storm on the sea (Jonah 1:4), rules the raging of the sea (Ps. 89:9), and extends his power over the sea (Isa. 23:11), it is evident that Yahweh was thought of as having jurisdiction over the seas.

The extensive use of the Mediterranean by the Phoenicians and the Greeks was continued by the Romans, who referred to it as "Our Sea." Following the conquest of Palestine by Pompey in 63 B.C., traffic on the Mediterranean increased as merchants, envoys, soldiers, and teachers made their way back and forth from Rome to the Near East. Ships from Alexandria, loaded with grain, sailed for Italy, and when their captains failed to take account of the dangers from the winter storms for which the sea is noted, shipwreck was the prospect (Acts 27:6, 11). The development of traffic on the Mediterranean during NT times helped to make possible the missionary activity of Paul, Silas, Barnabas, and others.

W. L. REED

GREAT SYNAGOGUE. See SYNAGOGUE.

GREAVES [מצחה]. A protective covering about the shank of the leg. The only occurrence of the word is at I Sam. 17:6, where the armor of Goliath is described as including מצחת נחשת, which almost certainly should be plural, as in the Versions, to read: מצחות נחשת, "greaves of bronze." J. W. WEVERS

GRECIANS. See HELLENISTS.

GREECE ['Ελλάς]; GREEKS ["Ελληνες].

1. Biblical usage
2. Settlement of the homeland
3. Era of colonization
4. Early culture and religion
5. Age of kings and nobles
6. Rise of democracy
7. Crisis of the fifth century
8. Climax of Greek culture
9. Age of Hellenism

Bibliography

1. Biblical usage. In the OT a number of obscure geographical and ethnographical references have been interpreted to mean Greece or the Greeks, especially Javan, the fourth son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2, 4; I Chr. 1:5, 7; Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:13), and perhaps also Dodanim; Gog and Magog (Lydia?); the Philistines (see below); the "isles" (Cyprus, Crete, the islands of the Aegean?); and the "kingdom of the North" (the Seleucid Empire). The name Greece occurs explicitly in Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2; Zech. 9:13; and Greeks are mentioned in Joel 3:6. In the NT, the KJV "Grecians" is now usually interpreted as HELLENISTS in Acts 6:1; 9:29, and as Greeks in Acts 11:20; elsewhere the KJV "Greeks" is retained (e.g., John 12:20; Acts 14:1; 16:1, 3, and elsewhere in Acts; Rom. 1:14, 16; 10:12; I Cor. 1:22, 24; Gal. 2:3; 3:28). John 19:20; Acts 21:37; Rev. 9:11 refer to the Greek language, which is, indeed, the language of the NT itself; while Acts 17:12 refers to Greek women in Thessalonica. The usage in Mark 7:26 ("the woman was a Greek, a Syrophoenician by birth" [RSV 1952; "race" in RSV 1946]), is not unusual, since in the first century "Greek" was a cultural term, not ethnographic, and meant anyone who spoke the language, somewhat as in Lower Canada "English" simply means non-French.

The obscurity of the earlier OT references suggests the wide gulf which separated the two civilizations, Semitic and Indo-European, the one occupying the S "grassland," the other the N—a cleavage which continued throughout ancient history and reached all levels of culture, especially intellectual, artistic, and religious. It gave the point to Tertullian's "What has Jerusalem to do with Athens?"—i.e., the church with Greek culture (Presc. Her. 7). Yet in the end both contributed to the civilization which followed, and to the rise of the Christian religion. Many modern scholars believe that their contributions were of equal importance.

2. Settlement of the homeland. The ancient Greek homeland comprised the S end of the Balkan peninsula, between the thirty-sixth and fortieth parallels (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, is also on the fortieth), and between twenty degrees and twenty-five degrees in E longitude. But in reality the ancient Greek world included three main areas: the S part of the Balkan Peninsula, W Asia Minor and the islands of the Aegean Sea, and South Italy and Sicily; even in the sixth century the Greek settlements in South Italy were called "Great Hellas" (Magna Graecia). As with most other ancient peoples about the Mediterranean, the settlement of the Greeks was the result of invasions which began in prehistoric times, and then later of expansion due to colonization. The original population of the Aegean basin was already settled there by 3000 B.C. These were the "Aegeans," for their civilization was an island culture; but they also occupied the mainland to the E and the W. Into this area came the Greeks, a branch of the Indo-Europeans. Their four main stocks, in their order of immigration, were: (a) the Achaeans, who came down overland from the N and the E ca. 2000-1900 B.C. and settled chiefly in the central Peloponnesus (Arcadia) and in Thessaly, Boeotia, and the NE Aegean (the Aeolians in Lesbos and on the mainland N of Smyrna); (b) the Dorians ca. 1500-1200 B.C., who settled the E Peloponnesus and the Isthmus (Argolis, Laconia), Crete, the islands of the S Aegean from Cythera to Rhodes, and the SW corner of Asia Minor; (c) the Ionians, who occupied Attica, Euboea, the islands of the middle Aegean, and the mainland of W Asia Minor from Phocaea to Miletus; and (d) the Aetolians, who occupied W central Greece, the N Peloponnese, Elis, Aetolia, and the islands offshore. The records of these migrations were the unwritten legends and traditions, some of them embedded in popular myth; and it is possible that in the confusion of the early period some stocks occupied areas from which they were later dislodged; the division of territory just outlined is that of the ultimate settlement, in historical times. It goes far to explain the political disunity and rivalry which characterized later Greek history and prevented the establishment of a Greek empire, like those of Egypt, Assyria, Persia, and Rome. It is not yet certain in which order the invaders came, though the one just given is most probable, in view of the ultimate location of the various groups.

Another as-yet-unsolved problem is the relation of the invading Greeks to the older inhabitants (traditionally called the "Pelasgians") and, especially, to the Minoans in Crete. The decipherment of the Minoan script now indicates that its latest form was Greek—the earlier form had close affinities with Akkadian. But the character of the people, their customs, standards of living, sports, and art reflect a stage of development far beyond that of the invaders from the N, and have ties—or at least afford parallels—not only with Egypt and the East but also with Anatolia. Further, the relation between the Minoans of Crete and the Mycenaeans on the mainland (in Argos, Tiryns, Mycenae, and even early Athens) is still uncertain. Were these originally Minoan settlements? Or did the proto-Greek mainlanders, who settled in Greece during some earlier invasion than the Achaean, cross over to Crete and there establish a powerful thalassocracy (the "sea kings" of Crete, ca. 2000 B.C.) and develop a luxurious civilization comparable only to that of the oriental empires? Life about the Mediterranean was hazardous in those days (see Thucydides, bk. I), and the invading hosts from the N were desperate, urged on by the dual pangs of hunger for food and for land. Like the swarming Celts of later centuries, or still later the barbarian Vandals and Goths who swept down from Central and Northern Europe in the third to fifth centuries of our era, these early Greeks destroyed, absorbed, salvaged, or transformed whatever stood in their way. What survived was in many cases only a name; in others, architectural ruins, primitive religious rites, a mingling of racial strains, or surviving political institutions—e.g., city kingship, or the helots in S Greece.

Ca. 1200-1100 B.C. a Greek expedition conquered and destroyed the prosperous city of Ilium, or Troy, near the entrance to the Dardanelles or Hellespont, on the NW coast of Asia Minor. Earlier still, ca. 1400 B.C., the Greek invaders had sacked and destroyed Cnossus in Crete, the center of the Minoan civilization; the survivors were scattered all over the E Mediterranean, some of them eventually, in the thirteenth century, settling on a strip of seacoast in S Palestine—the people known as the Philistines, who in time gave their name to that whole country. Still another wave of Indo-European invaders, ca. 1200 B.C., swept down the original route, then finding the Greek Peninsula already occupied, crossed over and destroyed the Hittite Empire in central and E Asia Minor. The story of this chaotic period is told in moving scenes depicted on the Egyptian monuments (see J. H. Breasted, Ancient Times, figs. 152, 153, 233), where the Egyptian troops, aided by mercenaries from Sardinia, drive back the northern invaders. It may be that it was during this period that the Etruscans were forced out of Lydia in SW Asia Minor and settled in Italy, N of the Tiber.

3. Era of colonization. Eventually the Greeks settled down, built cities, cultivated the land, absorbed the survivors of the earlier cultures on the mainland and in the islands, and made the Greek language, though still—and always—spoken in a variety of dialects, the common tongue of the entire Hellenic world. The earliest Greeks were not a maritime people, but it was not long before the necessities of their new situation—the two mainlands E and W, Ionia and Greece, being divided and yet at the same time united by the Aegean Sea, studded with islands like giant steppingstones—compelled them to become seafarers. In time they became the best sailors in the ancient world. Another factor which turned them to the sea was their own increasing population (which may, of course, have led to the original migrations) and the demand for a greater food supply; this supply was to be had from the sea—the Aegean abounded in fish. But even a greater amount of food could not wholly meet the requirements, and so by the eighth century a tide of colonization was in full course. The distant coasts of the Black Sea, all the shores of Sicily, S Italy (from the "heel" southward and westward around the "toe" and northward as far as Naples—i.e., Neapolis or "new city"), Corsica, S Gaul (chiefly Marseilles = Massilia), even E and S Spain, North Africa (Cyrene), and the delta of the Nile—all these far-flung locations and areas were settled during the two centuries between 750 and 550 B.C. In every case the dialect, religion, customs, and institutions of the founding city and its ancestral stock were maintained. No colony was permitted to infringe upon the political or economic rights of the mother city. This led in time to great friction, as in the pretexts with which the Peloponnesian Wars began (in 459-446 and 431-404 B.C.), and perpetuated the disunity which prevented the Greeks from making a common stand against Carthage (in Sicily) and Rome (in Magna Graecia), with the result that the vast enterprise of Greek colonization came eventually to nothing, politically. On the other hand, the social, religious, intellectual, and cultural consequences of this vast expansion were of untold benefit throughout all later European and Western history.

4. Early culture and religion. The earliest social structure was the nomadic tribe with its council of elders, but this gave place to the city king, like the Mycenaean (even in Homer), with its inevitable consequence, the "city-state," the most characteristic of Greek political institutions. This was an area of land with a group of towns dominated by one outstanding city which laid claim to them and administered the territory as a separate state. The age of the kings (ca. 1000-750 B.C.) was a period of slow development of the arts and of commerce. At first the Phoenicians dominated the maritime trade of the E Mediterranean, even of the Aegean, but the Greeks soon learned from them the building and navigation of ships, the manufacture of potteries and fabrics, and—most important of all—the alphabet, which was the foundation of a written language and eventually of a literature. The Greeks perfected the Semitic alphabet by adding vowels—a vast improvement. This early Phoenician trade probably accounts for the traces of "orientalism" in the earliest Greek art—e.g., the winged sphinx, the Assyrian tree of life, the palm, the lion motif. The same influence, with similar results, may be traced in ancient Etruscan art.

The "literature" of the age was—like that of its later parallel, the heroic age in Northern Europe—the oral tradition of ballads and popular epics of wars, battles, horsemanship, adventure at sea and in distant lands. These provided the subject matter of the Iliad and the Odyssey, which were given final form by Homer (ca. 800-700 B.C.), as the tale of the last days of the conquest of Troy and the story of Odysseus' oft-delayed and far-wandering journey homeward to Ithaca.

Woven into the texture of these epics, and of the Homeric hymns and "epic cycle" that followed them, are the still surviving ideas, religious and social, of the "age of chivalry" which now lay far back in the past. Homer's gods are personal beings, very human in character—far too human, the later Greek philosophers and the early Christian fathers agreed in saying—but certainly a long way removed from the fetishes, numina, or vague spirits of a "primitive" age of animism. Supreme among the gods, who now dwelt on Olympus, was Zeus, the "god of the bright blue sky," who was at the same time the thunderer, the rain-bringer, the avenging god whose lightning stroke could blast and destroy. The ancient earth-mother, Gē, or the Great Mother (Magna Mater, as the Latins called her—originally she was their Terra Mater) of the ancient Aegeans and Anatolians, was also retained; she was the one who made the crops grow and rendered the soil fertile, bringing forth food for men and beasts—the goddess Demeter (or Gē Mētēr) was the patroness of the earliest grain-growing in Attica; her cultus lay at the heart of the world-famous Eleusinian mysteries, which later gathered to themselves high and noble ideas and ideals of ethics and the hope of a blissful life to come. Apollo, already the sun-god, the deadly archer; his sister, Artemis, the huntress, the swift and painless slayer of women, and eventually the guardian of mothers giving birth to children; Athena, the patroness of the arts of peace, the inventress of the carding, spinning, and weaving of wool, of pottery-making, and of the cultivation of the olive; Dionysus, originally a tree god, now patron of the vine; Hermes, the messenger of the gods; Aphrodite, goddess of love; Ares, god of war; Poseidon, the "earth-shaker," ruler of the seas; Hera, the wife of Zeus; Hades, god of the underworld (also called Pluto, the "wealthy" one); and Hephaestus, the Vulcan of ancient Greece—these were the chief denizens of Olympus, some of them native pre-Greek deities, some of them purely Greek, and some of them imported from the area of Anatolia or Cyprus.

The influence of Homer, whose poems, along with those of Hesiod, became virtually the "Bible of the Greeks," was far-reaching and long-lasting. To the very end of classical antiquity and even to some extent afterward, the conception of these "shining ones" enshrined in Homer's verse remained the norm for the Greek idea of deity and for all thought about the gods. To this epical panorama of divinity Hesiod added (ca. 700) the standard genealogy of the gods, in his Theogony—i.e., his account of their origin, birth, and relations to one another. As Herodotus said (II.53), it was Homer and Hesiod who invented the "theology" of the Greeks. What they really did was only arrange and systematize a body of traditional religious lore.

5. Age of kings and nobles. Following the age of the kings came that of the nobles, who, like the Italian nobility of the Renaissance, were too full of energy to live quiet lives as landowners, magistrates, or priests. The land of Greece, like that of Scotland or Switzerland, was broken up geographically into many glens or cantons, which tended more and more to preserve and cultivate their own dialectic, economic, and religious peculiarities. The mountains of Greece, and also the Aegean Sea with its many islands and archipelagoes, prevented the establishment of any lasting political unity or even any complete and permanent cultural solidarity. The four main divisions, from early times, were Argos and Sparta in the Peloponnese, Athens and Thebes in the N. Nothing like the great empires of the East, or even the limited empire of the Hittites (also in a mountainous region), was ever achieved, except for the brief Athenian sea empire following the repulse of the Persians early in the fifth century.

This geographical handicap is the background of the rise of the nobles (i.e., the well-born) and their unhindered advance in power, taking the place of the earlier kings (cf. the social parallel in Rome, after the expulsion of the Etruscan kings ca. 500 B.C.). These noblemen enjoyed their wealth and luxury, their vast lands and overseas trade, their occasional ventures in piracy (like certain European noblemen in the seventeenth century)—all at the expense of the poverty and misery of the peasants. Hesiod's poems also echo the cry of the oppressed poor, and the demand (like an ancient Piers Plowman) for justice and equality of opportunity, if not of inheritance. This period, like the classical period of the OT history, set the background and norm for all later religion in the Greek world: hence its importance for any true appraisal of the place of Greek religious thought in the "preparation for the gospel."

By 650 B.C. kingship had become unknown; by 600 B.C. the nobles also were on the wane—their place was taken by local tyrants, "new" men, without birth or background (like those in Cicero's day or in nineteenth-century England or America), who by sheer force of arms, strategy, cleverness, or terrorism seized power in the cities and administered them for their own benefit. The vast overseas expansion of the Greek colonies and the great increase in Greek manufacture and commerce, the continuing overpopulation and resulting restlessness of city-dwellers and peasants alike, in the Greek homeland —these factors gave the tyrants their opportunity. They promised all good things to the landless and hungry, freedom to the oppressed, restoration to the exiled; but, once securely in power, they forgot all these earlier commitments. However, in spite of tyranny and oppression, trade continued to increase and wealth to accumulate. Metal coinage had been adopted in the early seventh century, and within a hundred years a capitalist class was in evidence—men whose wealth was in money, not merely lands and goods, slaves, factories, or mines, and who were in a position to lend their capital at a high rate of interest—eighteen per cent was usual! As the poet Alcaeus remarked: "Money [not manners, as in a later age!] maketh man" (Fragment 81 Edmonds).

6. Rise of democracy. It was against this background of commercial middle-class capitalism, of rural poverty, of irresponsible government by the local nobility, and especially, during the sixth century, the rule of the tyrants—who were ancient "dictators" or "leaders"—that the democratic movement got under way. Laws were passed to check the power of individuals, but often without success. Some of the tyrants, e.g., were ostracized and sent into exile, only to organize a following and return to seize their lost position of control. However, the irresistible drive and energy of the Hellene surmounted all obstacles, political and economic, and the advancement of Greek culture went steadily forward, hand in hand with the demand for democratic self-rule.

The great lyric poets set forth the varying moods and longings, beliefs and standards, of their age: Pindar, the popular celebrant of athletic prowess in the games; Sappho, whose haunting love poetry still moves us deeply; Tyrtaeus, the Spartan soldiers' poet who sang of arms and the battle for liberty. Architecture and sculpture were developing rapidly in new directions, away from the earthbound, flat-roofed Egyptian temple to the more ethereal Greek style, with fluted columns, sloping roof, and decorated frieze; the crude painted wooden statues of gods and men were supplanted by majestic, permanent works in marble, also painted. The rise of Greek law was paralleled by nobler religious conceptions, with purer and higher ethical ideas which were applied not only to human relations but also to the gods, and also by the notion of a righteous judgment to take place after death in the court of Minos and Rhadamanthus. Gods could no longer do evil and be excused for it —like the wayward and capricious nobles they imitated; even the gods must do justly, if they are to deserve to be called gods. This principle, strongly affirmed a century later by the dramatist Euripides, was anticipated even in the sixth century, with its cry for social justice and agrarian reform. There was also a marked development in physical science, philosophy, music, mathematics, and geography. All this took place in the age of the tyrants, which ended ca. 500 B.C., the date which, as we have seen, marked the expulsion of the kings from Rome and the establishment of the republic.

7. Crisis of the fifth century. Scarcely had democracy gained its first permanent foothold in Greece than it was called to face its most crucial trial. Ever since 549 B.C., when Cyrus became king of Media, the Persian Empire had been pressing steadily westward. By 546 Sardes, the capital of Lydia in W Asia Minor, had fallen, and Croesus, its famous king, had become a prisoner. All the Near East was soon in the hands of Cyrus, the "Great King" (the later title of the Persian emperors); in 525 his son Cambyses overran Egypt, so that the Persians now controlled all of Western Asia as far as the Aegean Sea and the Hellespont, and Northeast Africa as well. On the European mainland, Thrace, including the W shore of the Black Sea and the N coast of the Aegean, was soon added, as was also Cyrenaica, W of Egypt. This meant that they now held a third of the Greek world (Ionia, the W end of Asia Minor), and it looked as if the whole Balkan Peninsula, whose S part was the Greek homeland, would soon be overwhelmed. The countless armies of the Persians, supplemented by mercenary troops and levies from all the nations of "the West" (i.e., W of the Euphrates) seemed irresistible. In 490 B.C. a huge fleet under Darius I crossed the Aegean from Samos, sailed into the straits between Euboea and Attica, and landed at the Bay of Marathon. Their guide was the exiled tyrant Hippias, son of Peisistratus, who hoped thus to regain control of Athens. The landing of the Persians sent a shock of horror throughout Greece. The Athenians hastily sent messengers to ask Sparta for aid in the defense, and mustered their comparatively small citizen army under Callimachus —approximately ten thousand Greeks to face twenty thousand to twenty-five thousand Persians. The Greek general Miltiades, who knew Persian strategy at first hand, counseled attack as the best defense (a strategy now identified with the French general Foch), and led the Greeks to bar the Persian advance upon Athens. A thousand Greeks arrived from Plataea to augment the force of the defenders, and when the Persians finally advanced, the Greeks fell upon their flank and by a tactic of "encirclement" crushed their two wings and made effective the close-drawn line of Greek spears, against which Persian arrows were useless. The Persian defeat was complete. The Greeks had lost two hundred men, the Persians six thousand.

But the Persian threat to Greek freedom was not removed, and the Greeks, now fully roused, decided to adopt a policy of preparedness. Themistocles advocated a strong navy, in order to fend off any further attack by sea. In fact, the next Persian ruler, Xerxes, was fully determined to do this very thing, by the use of Phoenician ships and seamen. He also induced the Carthaginians, it is thought, to attack Sicily. Thus the whole Semitic world was poising an avalanche which was to descend upon all that remained of the world of Greek civilization. By heroic measures of persistence and persuasion, Themistocles induced the Athenians to prepare a fleet. Although all of Greece was asked to combine for the defense, only Athens and Sparta made preparations. The blow fell in the summer of 480 B.C., ten years after the first attack, and the Persian forces advanced both overland across the Hellespont and then southward along the coast, and also by sea, likewise along the coast. Against the horde of Persian infantry, the Spartan king Leonidas with five thousand men undertook to check them at the Pass of Thermopylae near the Gulf of Malia, ca. ninety miles NW of Athens. His allies promptly dispersed, leaving only three hundred Spartans to hold the pass.

But the Persians were not to be checked at one point. Led by a Greek traitor, some of their troops crossed the mountains and attacked Leonidas from the rear, wiping out this valiant and immortal band, and also sending two hundred ships around Euboea to attack the Athenian fleet from their rear. But a storm destroyed this Persian task force, and the Greek fleet withdrew to the Bay of Salamis, just W of Athens. Meanwhile the Persian land forces moved southward and soon set fire to the city of Athens; the roads of Attica were dark with the multitudes of dusky warriors from the East, as the Greek refugees looked back and saw their homes and the homes of their gods devoured by the flames—a scene as horrible as the burning of Troy or of Sardes. Themistocles now sent out a false report that the Greek fleet was intending to slip away and flee; but the Persians were determined to hold the Greeks in the trap—their main fleet now controlled both exits of the bay—and so Xerxes seated himself on a high throne overlooking the scene, prepared to enjoy it. Penned in, and desperate, the Greeks once more followed the strategy of offensive defense and attacked. Their smaller numbers and their more maneuverable ships had a decided advantage, while the huge mass of the Persian fleet, crowded together in a confused huddle and almost unable to maneuver at all, was soon at a decided disadvantage. The battle lasted all day, and at the end the Persian fleet was a total wreck, and Greece was saved. Fearing now that the Greek fleet would cut off his return via the Hellespont, Xerxes retreated northward.

If only the strategy of Themistocles had prevailed, the Persians would never have escaped—and all later history would have been quite different! As it was, Xerxes recrossed the Hellespont and returned to Persia, leaving fifty thousand men in Thessaly under Mardonius, who attacked again the following spring. But his easy victory in Attica was turned to swift defeat when the Spartans under Pausanias crossed the Isthmus and threatened his rear. He withdrew to Plataea, where once more the Greek spear proved superior, at close quarters, to the Persian arrow, and only the Persian cavalry saved the army from extinction. Mardonius himself was slain. The feelings aroused in this great crisis are forever enshrined in Aeschylus' drama The Persians.

8. Climax of Greek culture. The tragic element in human history is nowhere more evident than in the history of Greece during the following decades. The heroic stand of Athens and Sparta against overwhelming odds, and the surprising victory—some said the gods and the ancient heroes, e.g., Agamemnon and Ajax, had joined the struggle—should have led to several centuries of peace and unity; alas, the Doric strain and the Ionic were too inharmonious. Athens loved freedom, Sparta order; Athens culture, Sparta discipline; Athens creative talent, Sparta concentrated political power. Which was the better choice should be obvious: Athens is still a great city; a plain covered with olive groves hides the spot where Sparta once stood.

In the years following the Persian invasions Athens determined to follow an independent policy, not bound to that of Sparta. In spite of Spartan objection, Themistocles rebuilt the walls of Athens and fortified its port, Piraeus. The Athenian fleet was soon dominant everywhere in the Aegean. A democratic "empire" arose, centered in the Delian League—its headquarters were the island of Delos, sacred to Apollo. The triumphant citizenry of Athens soon got out of hand; the old struggle of the people versus the nobles was revived; the ancient courts (e.g., the Areopagus) were restricted in range and authority; the highest offices of the state were opened to all classes; and the citizen jury, with six thousand members, undertook to try all cases. Chaos threatened; but again a leader came forward—the brilliant Pericles, under whom Athens soon regained her ancient glory, and even far surpassed it. The buildings on the Acropolis, especially the Parthenon, dedicated to Athena, the presiding and protecting goddess of the city, are the permanent record of the achievements of this era. But alas, the administration of Pericles saw the outbreak of war between Athens and Sparta—the long struggle, in two phases (459-446, 431-404 B.C.), which ended with both contestants crippled and exhausted, and no match for the fresh crises which arose in the following century.

But it was the glorious age of Athens' greatest splendor. Wealth and power, partly derived from contributions by the allies in the Delian League —now in reality the Athenian Sea Empire—and an abundance of slaves, artisans, foreign traders and craftsmen, artists, poets, philosophers, teachers (including the sophists), actors, athletes, military and naval experts, scientists, physicians, historians, religious teachers—these characterized and filled the Athens of this period. It was now the heart, soul, and mind of all Greece, indeed of the whole Hellenic world. Even peoples outside—e.g., the Romans—undertook to learn from Greece, at first only by way of imitation and translation, in later centuries by wholesale adoption and importation.

The greatest writers of Greece belong to this period—i.e., the fifth century and the early decades of the fourth: the dramatists Aeschylus and Sophocles, with their profound interpretations of the traditional religion and history of Greece, the ancient myths and legends, their deep reading of the meaning of human life in the light of this interpreted tradition; Euripides, with his criticism of every strain of falsity and pretense, whether in religion or in the standards of society, in politics or in the everyday behavior of men; Aristophanes, with his uproarious critique of his contemporaries in the kaleidoscopic comédie humaine; Menander, with his penetrating, Shakespearian insight into the inmost recesses of the human heart and mind; Socrates, with his endless questioning, determined to force men, especially young men, to find some surer standing ground of conviction than the fluctuating mass of opinion handed down by their ancestors, or the views of the majority, or the prejudices of their class (the well-to-do, for the most part); Plato, with his profound reinterpretation of Socrates as the prophet of a world of eternal reality, expressed in the "ideas" of things rather than in their material embodiment—i.e., in mathematical relations and ratios, in musical harmony, and in all the truth, beauty, and goodness in the world; and Aristotle, the first "universal" mind, a scientist, a philosopher, a logician, a teacher, an encyclopedist who took all knowledge for his field of interest and research, and placed all posterity in his debt by his organized investigations and analyses.

A little later these were followed by Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus, the great leaders of the early STOICS, who taught men to live, free and brave, in a world which threatened to crush all independent thought and action; by Epicurus, who taught men to find happiness in spite of misery (he himself suffered from kidney stone all his life), and to live quietly amid the turmoil of political chaos (see EPICUREANS). Much earlier had come the historians—Herodotus, the "father of history," who for all his objective and fascinating journalism took a psychological, even a theological, view of events, and studied the conflict between East and West, from the Trojan War to the Persian, as the inevitable struggle between two opposing and utterly different types of mind; Thucydides, a participant in the great conflict between Athens and Sparta as an officer in the Athenian army, whose clear, cool portrayal and analysis of facts set the standard of first-rate historical writing for all time; Xenophon, whose historical works enable us to see how the world looked—especially the Eastern world (in his Anabasis and Education of Cyrus)—to a Greek farmer and soldier of the fourth century. All these men and many more—not even mentioning the orators—were creative minds of the highest order; they belonged to these two centuries, the fifth and the fourth, and they show how little the political and social conditions of an age determine the manifestations of genius. How little, and yet how much: for surely no other city-state—certainly not Sparta, certainly no non-Greek city in that age—produced anything like this galaxy of genius, whatever its outward conditions of prosperity or adversity, war or peace, luxury or hunger. But it was produced in spite of the handicaps of political disunity, confusion, and eventually chaos.

In the W the course of events ran parallel to those in the homeland. The Carthaginian attack on Sicily failed; it is said that the Greek victory at Himera took place on the same day as the battle of Salamis. But the exposed position of Sicily and South Italy imperiled the Greek foothold in the W, and even after the defeat of the Sicilian Expedition sent by Athens against Syracuse in 413, the peril continued. It was not many decades before the W Greeks were caught between the contending powers of Rome and Carthage, with the result that from 264 B.C. all of South Italy, and from 241 B.C. all of Sicily, became Roman territory. See GREEK RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY; RHETORIC AND ORATORY.

9. Age of Hellenism. In the East, the weakened state of both N and S Greece, as a result of the long Peloponnesian War, led to continued efforts by outside powers to overwhelm the Greek homeland. The Persians, twice defeated, undertook no further invasion; but what they had failed to accomplish by force of arms, they still hoped to achieve by intrigue. In this they were likewise unsuccessful, especially after Philip of Macedon defeated the Greeks at Chaeronea in 338 B.C. and made himself the champion of Greek interests everywhere. In 334 his son Alexander, who had been educated by Aristotle and was fully conversant with Greek thought, political as well as philosophical, and also with Greek literature (his favorite author was Homer), undertook a war of revenge against Persia—revenge for the conquest of the Ionian cities on the E coast of the Aegean and also for the assassination of his father in 336. The story of Alexander's conquest of Asia Minor, the Syrian and Palestinian coast, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Babylon, Media, Parthia, Bactria—in brief, of the whole Near and Middle East as far as the territories lying immediately beyond the Indus River—is one of the chief epics in military history. Darius III was defeated at Issus in 333 B.C. and again at Arbela in 331, after which Alexander became his successor as "Great King" of the East. His further conquests carried the Greek language, Greek traditions, Greek art, and Greek ideas to the borders of India.

Although Alexander himself died soon after his return to Babylon (in 323 B.C.), his decade of conquest had opened the whole East to the infiltration of Western ideas; the next three hundred years are known as the Hellenistic—or even the Alexandrine—age. Thus, stricken and defeated Greece, after only a century and a half of democracy (in Athens from ca. 500 B.C. to 338), passed on the torch of Western civilization and culture to new hands, which carried it to the farthest reaches of the ancient world. Alexander was followed by his generals and their successors, and his new-won empire soon fell apart, chiefly into three main divisions: Egypt, ruled by the Ptolemies; Asia Minor, Syria, and the East, ruled by the Seleucids; Macedonia, ruled by the Antigonids. In the early third century (282 B.C.) the kingdom of Pergamum freed itself, and in the East the Parthians and Persians broke away. By 198 Macedonia had fallen before the advancing Roman power, and in 146 it became a Roman province. In the same year Corinth was captured and destroyed by Lucius Mummius, and Greece became the Roman province of Achaia. It is thus known in the NT (e.g., Acts 18:12).

But the story of ancient Greece, tragic as it is in its later stages and in its end—i.e., politically and socially—was far from finished as far as its real meaning for mankind was concerned, and especially for the history of the Christian religion. "Captive Greece captivated her conqueror" (Horace Epistles II.1.156), and Rome eagerly absorbed all it could from Greek culture. Greek art and literature, Greek sculpture and architecture, were not only imitated in Rome and elsewhere in the West but actually transported there. Such Roman generals as Sulla and Lucullus took with them shiploads of artistic treasures. Even whole temples were taken down and shipped to Italy. (One of Sulla's ships was driven by storm to the coast of North Africa and sank in shallow water, where the stones of a Greek temple have been discovered lying on the bottom.) The Greek language and literature, Greek philosophy, and Greek religious thought and terminology, permeated the whole East, especially Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor. As a result, the world was prepared, as the Greek church fathers insisted, for the coming of Christ and the preaching of the gospel. In Alexandria (founded by and named for Alexander in 331 B.C.), where the whole NE central quarter of the city was occupied by Jews, the Hebrew Bible was translated into Greek, and schools were established for the cultivation of Greek learning by Jews. Even Greek tragedies, epics, and books of philosophy were written there by Greco-Jewish authors. Such a work as the Wisdom of Solomon, written ca. 50 B.C., is an example of this process of cultural and religious cross-fertilization. Out of it all arose a whole religious vocabulary, centered in the SEPTUAGINT (the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible together with additional books used in Alexandria), which the early Christians took over and used. Not only is the NT a Greek book, but all Christian literature down to the early third century, even in Rome and the West, and to this day in the East, is in Greek. What our grandfathers, using Baron Bunsen's term, called "the hand of God in history," is obvious, not only from the history of the Hebrews and of Judaism but also from the history of Greek civilization and culture. Both stories were tragic; but both Hellenism and Hebraism "died to live" and to pass on to the future the best they had achieved in the moral, intellectual, and spiritual adventure of ancient man.

Bibliography. W. S. Ferguson, Hellenistic Athens (1911); Greek Imperialism (1913). G. Murray, History of Ancient Greek Literature (3rd ed., 1917). R. W. Livingstone, ed., The Legacy of Greece (1921); The Pageant of Greece (1923). G. W. Botsford and E. G. Sihler, Hellenic Civilization (1924); The Cambridge Ancient History, vols. II–VII (1924 ff). M. I. Rostovtzeff, History of the Ancient World, vol. I (1926). L. Whibley, ed., Companion to Greek Studies (1906; 4th ed., 1931). A. E. Zimmern, The Greek Commonwealth (1911; 5th ed., 1931). J. H. Breasted, Ancient Times: A History of the Early World (1916; new rev. ed., 1935). C. N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture (1940). M. I. Rostovtzeff, Social and Economic History of the Hellenistic World (3 vols.; 1941). H. Bengston, Griechische Geschichte (1950). W. W. Tarn, Hellenistic Civilization (1927; 5th ed., 1952). F. C. Grant, Hellenistic Religions (1953). F. C. GRANT

GREED [בצע, COVETOUSNESS; GAIN; DISHONEST GAIN; EVIL GAIN; UNJUST GAIN; also used participially (Ps. 10:3; Prov. 15:27; Jer. 6:13; 8:10; cf. אוה and חמד)]. Various other Hebrew words are rendered "greed," "greediness," and "greedily" (I Sam. 2:29; Job 20:20; Ps. 57:4; Prov. 28:25; Ezek. 16:27; Hos. 4:8; Hab. 2:5).

In the NT, πλεονεξία (alternately COVETING; COVETOUSNESS) may be translated "greed," "greediness," or "greedy" (Eph. 4:19; I Thess. 2:5; II Pet. 2:3, 14; cf. I Cor. 5:10-11; 6:10; II Cor. 9:5).

Greediness often signifies an excessive longing for food and drink or avidity in the consumption of them. Such craving, whether for wealth or for food and drink, goes beyond reason and is an evidence of a crass sort of selfishness. It is regarded as a serious sin in both the OT and the NT. Greed is intolerable in the Israelitic priesthood (I Sam. 2:29), and in a Christian bishop or churchman (I Cor. 5:11; 6:9-10; Tit. 1:7). Unbridled greed leads to apostasy (Ps. 10:3), and to strife (Prov. 28:25). Jeremiah regarded the greediness of his people as a principal cause of their decline and impending subjugation to Babylon (6:13; 8:10; 22:17). Jesus warned against the danger of greediness (Luke 12:15), and Paul recognized it as a major sin (Rom. 1:29; Eph. 5:3). According to II Pet. 2:3, 14, greediness is one of the identifying characteristics of those false teachers who would mislead the members of the Christian community. H. F. BECK

GREEK LANGUAGE, THE. The student of the Bible is, for reasons which will appear, primarily interested in the Greek of the Hellenistic times, and therefore this article will be concerned almost entirely with that period.

A. Lack of unity
B. Hellenistic Greek
  1. Origins
  2. Characteristics
    a. Literary Greek
    b. Nonliterary or Koine Greek
C. Sources for Koine Greek
  1. The Greek Bible
  2. Nonbiblical sources
  3. The writings of Epictetus
  4. Noncanonical Christian documents
  5. Pagan authors
D. The Greek Bible
  1. The Greek OT
  2. The Greek NT
E. The discovery of the Koine
Bibliography

A. LACK OF UNITY. The Greek language is not one language but many. It has been a "living" language—i.e., a spoken language—for more than three thousand years. Like all other living languages, Greek has experienced constant change. Therefore, the multiplicity is partly temporal, and it is possible to classify the Greek language in terms of periods of time. A useful—though very general—classification on this basis is:

Classical Greek	Before 300 B.C.
Hellenistic Greek	300 B.C.-A.D. 550
Byzantine Greek	A.D. 550-A.D. 1453
Modern Greek (or New Greek)	After A.D. 1453

The Indo-European family of languages, which includes Greek, has the common characteristic of reducing the number of forms as the centuries pass. In the early period the Greeks said, "I have been called up for service throughout the war," in only three words. This was done by adding prefixes, suffixes, and infixes to the stem of the words. This formation of words by putting parts together is called synthesis. In later periods they said this sentence with a series of words—as in the example given, where subject and tense and voice and purpose and duration have been separated from the stem and are expressed by helping words. This form of expression is called analysis. The Greek language has moved, through the four periods listed above, from synthesis to analysis. We are familiar with this movement in the history of our own language, which has moved from the synthesis of Anglo-Saxon, where the pronoun "that" had twenty-three forms in the singular number, to the analysis of modern English, where it has but one form.

However, the student of Greek must be constantly on his guard against the assumption that this trend is everywhere present in the same degree at the same time or that the change takes place at a fixed rate of speed in all generations. Language does not exist apart from individual human beings who use it. Some welcome change; some resist it. Moreover, historical events of a nonlinguistic nature have advanced or retarded change. In periods of political tumult —long-continued war, conquest and occupation by a foreign power, revolution, etc.—linguistic change proceeds apace. In periods of peace and prosperity with continued dominance by the same class or dynasty, linguistic change occurs but slowly. Solidly established schools (or, at least, established teachers) slow up change in usage. Thus schoolteachers today retard—though they cannot prevent—the extension of the use of "It's me!"

This leads easily to the assertion that diversity in the Greek language springs from diversity in cultural levels. There is a Greek literary language and a popular Greek language. In some periods these are close together; in others, far apart. In the classical period, Attic prose was not far from the spoken language of the day; but poetry was quite a distance from the language of conversation. In modern Greek, poetry early identified itself with the popular language, while prose strained after a purified form of the language. This tension between bookish language and talk has been variously resolved at different times and in different places.

Still a third diversity existed in the Greek language—particularly in the classical period. The Greek people spoke and wrote a number of local dialects. The spoken dialects were not easily understood by Greeks to whom they were not native. Yet strong forces drove the Greeks toward a common dialect. These forces, in an ascending order of importance, were commerce, literature, and empire. An instance of the commercial influence is reported by Quintilian (A.D. 35-95), who says that a mixture of Attic, Ionic, Doric, and Aeolic was called Sardismos—probably from Sardis. The Ionic dialect was for a time a common language of literature, including scientific literature. But the political pre-eminence of Athens gradually made the Attic dialect the literary language of Greece.

B. HELLENISTIC GREEK. 1. Origins. Scholars have suggested various hypotheses as to the sources of the Hellenistic Greek language, but more and more agreement has been reached in favor of the Attic dialect as its major source. Some scholars posit the existence of a business Greek language in the fifth century B.C. which was based on the Attic dialect with many non-Attic elements in it. The fifth century B.C. in Greece saw two common languages—one, Ionic; the other, Attic. The Ionic was essentially a literary language, but it had no empire to sustain or advance it. Since Ionia was related to the Attic Empire and since the Attic dialect itself was influenced by earlier literature, the resultant mixture of these two into a common language characterizes what we call the Hellenistic Koine.

2. Characteristics of Hellenistic Greek. Hellenistic Greek itself was not a single language. It contains two major divisions: literary Greek, which tended to be artificial in the sense that it was separated from the spoken language; and what is usually called Koine, or common Greek, which was close to the spoken language.

a. Literary Greek. Hellenistic literary prose was an artificial language to a marked degree. Every author used "learned" materials, both in vocabulary and in grammar, although the amount of use varied widely from author to author. From the first century B.C. on, the imitation of the Greek of the classical period, the Golden Age, is a definite and recognizable movement in Greek literature. This movement is called Atticism, and it consists essentially of the use of archaisms and obsolete or obsolescent forms. Atticism is due to the impact of classical literature and of the rhetorician's emphasis on style. If all our contemporary authors regarded Elizabethan literature as the norm in vocabulary, grammar, and syntax, we would have something analogous to the role played by Atticism in the Greek of the Hellenistic period.

No one can succeed in complete imitation of the language of a previous age. Among authors in the Hellenistic period the range of achievement in the imitation of classical Greek usage is very wide. This variation in the amount of imitation can be seen on a reduced scale within the pages of the Greek NT. The NT has less of this literary character than any other piece of literature that comes to us out of the Hellenistic age. Yet in the NT, Luke ranks highest in approximation of Attic usage; Revelation ranks lowest. Even within the limited extent of the NT, it is not possible to speak of Atticism as if it were a single thing constant in degree.

The attempt of literary and educated people to keep a language close to the standards of a day that is gone is always hazardous, but it was especially so in the Hellenistic period. This period was ushered in with the collapse of Greek independence and the establishment of the empire of Alexander the Great. Alexander's conquests carried the Greek language rapidly over large areas of the Mediterranean world. Alexander's championship of Greek culture was itself a potent force toward linguistic change, and this championship was one thing that all his heirs agreed in carrying on. The result was that in the early part of the Hellenistic period enormous numbers of people learned the Greek language in adulthood as a second language. For most of these people a limited knowledge of the spoken language was the maximum achievement, with the inevitable result of the loss of dialectical peculiarities and literary refinements.

A further factor that contributed to the simplification of the language was the political turmoil that characterized the centuries preceding Augustus. In the wars of succession and conquest, a stable, dominant, cultured class devoted to carrying on a high literary tradition was an impossibility, and in this social confusion free from restraints and barriers imposed by schoolteachers, linguistic change went on at a very rapid pace indeed.

b. Nonliterary or Koine Greek. The nonliterary Hellenistic Greek is usually called the Koine. This Greek word is actually an adjective modifying the word "language" or "dialect," and means the "common language" in a double sense.

The Koine is a common language in the first place in that it is the language of the common people who are not schooled men or littérateurs, but it should be admitted at once that the degree of commonness in this sense varies widely from individual to individual. There was no standard Koine. There was nothing like Luther's Bible in its unifying influence on the new German language. There was no one document produced in this period which was used everywhere and exercised a dominant formative influence.

This makes it exceedingly difficult to define the Koine in the sense of popular functioning. It cannot mean that the most illiterate production is the best Koine. There are documents among the Greek papyri in which practically all rules of Greek grammar are violated. Are we to characterize the Koine on the basis of such documents as a popular language that puts the subject of the verb in the accusative case? This is a ridiculous extreme.

To avoid this extreme, we must recognize that a grammar is not possible for the Koine as it is possible for Attic Greek in the classical period. In the popular Koine each author's grammar must be written. The best that a Koine grammar can do is to indicate the direction in which development is moving and what forces are at work.

This assertion is based on a definition of the Koine as "that popular Greek language of the Hellenistic period which shows life and development in comparison with the usage of the past." This implies clearly that he who would know the Koine must know earlier Greek as well. Otherwise, he lacks the base line from which the definition of the Koine moves. For this reason, students of Koine Greek and of the Greek Bible need a knowledge of classical Greek if they are to carry their studies beyond the elementary level or into areas broader than a very specific problem may delimit.

There is another definition of the Koine that is somewhat, but not much, broader: that it is the sum total of the development of the Greek of common and commercial speech from the time of Alexander the Great to the close of ancient history. This definition is broad enough to include Koine Greek with some literary quality—such as the writings of Polybius, Josephus, and the Wisdom of Solomon in the Greek OT.

But Koine in its meaning of "common" also connotes "widespread," "not restricted in area of usage." The Koine Greek is the common language of the Mediterranean world in the sense that it is not a dialect, restricted to a geographical area. No one has yet succeeded in writing a dialectology of the Koine. Attempts have been made to establish regional usages, but these have not been widely accepted by scholarship. The Koine has remained a common language.

Yet the original, native non-Greek languages continued to be used throughout the Hellenistic period. The Koine Greek was the bridge between these alien islands of language. It was in no sense the "King's English"; it was not even the language of the capital of the empire. Thus, it rested upon its practical usefulness rather than upon the universally accepted tradition of great literature or the imperial power of its homeland. This meant that it was open to modification to a very unusual degree but that most of these modifications went in the direction of clarity and intelligibility and simplification and adaptation to the spoken speech.

This nonliterary Greek was vigorous, alive, and fresh with the tang of everyday living. (See the discussion of the Koine in Colwell and Mantey, A Hellenistic Greek Reader [1939], pp. 5-7, from which the following paragraphs have heavily drawn.) Radermacher coins a great phrase when he says: "The Hellenistic Period loved the living expressions." This is the common element of all vernaculars. In the Koine it meant the use of the historical present in narration, the use of the vivid present tense for the future, the use of the perfect in a present sense, a preference for superlatives over comparatives and for direct rather than indirect discourse. There is a constant overstriving for emphasis characteristic of any naïve, unschooled author. The college freshman underlines at least one word in a sentence for emphasis; his narratives fall inevitably into the historical present. False emphases like "the very same," "each and every," "very unique," "one of the most," garnish his compositions; and they had their counterparts in the nonliterary Koine of the NT period.

The vernacular strives as hard for clarity as it does for emphasis. This leads to that overfulness of expression characteristic of the modern newspaper as of the Greek Koine. Pronouns are used as subjects for verbs that do not need them; they are sprinkled lavishly through each clause. Parenthetical glosses distend the body of innumerable sentences. Prepositions and adverbs pile up before and after verbs; compound verbs are preferred to the simple forms; prepositional phrases replace the simple case, etc.

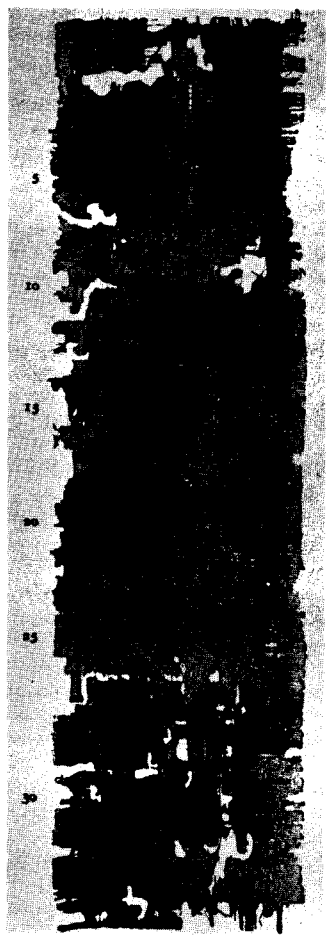
The heavy emphasis and redundancy of the Koine is offset by its simplicity. Insofar as it is a language of the people, it lacks or ignores those subtleties of expression which delighted the great minds of the Golden Age of Greek literature. The loss of the dual and the optative is due not only to the general "tendency" of the Greek language to abandon inflection but also to the limitations of low-brow thinking. The simplicity of much of the Koine is due to the lack of subtlety and sophistication in its authors. That glory of Attic prose, a wealth of connectives adequate to express the most minute differences in the relationship of clauses, is one of the last elements of the language to be mastered by the modern schoolboy. In the ancient world the use of all these conjunctions was beyond the powers of the Egyptian merchant and the Roman soldier—not only beyond his ability but also outside his needs. Therefore the Koine knows few conjunctions. Its favorite is "and," and the paratactic style of the six-year-old describing a visit to the zoo frequently occurs. Co-ordinate clauses far outnumber subordinate in this as in many other vernaculars. If the Koine resembles Hebrew in this area, it does so in the same way that it resembles Anglo-Saxon.

Uneducated people simplify their language by selecting one of the many linguistic formulas available to them for a particular purpose. Take, e.g., the expression of purpose itself. In classical Greek there were at least half a dozen ways of expressing purpose. Two of these were the use of the infinitive to express purpose and the use of a conjunction, ὅπως or ἵνα, with the subjunctive mood to express purpose. In the nonliterary Koine the people chose ἵνα with the subjunctive as their favorite method of expressing purpose.

Interestingly enough, the use of the infinitive in the Hellenistic period shows contrasting trends. The infinitive was an ambiguous element in syntax—partaking of the nature of the noun but also definitely sharing some of the functions of the verb. The users of the literary Greek language in the Hellenistic period increased its use of the infinitive as a noun and maintained, to some extent, the use of the infinitive to express purpose. But on the other hand, the nonliterary Koine rapidly substituted dependent clauses for the infinitive. In the popular language in the modern period, the infinitive has almost completely vanished.

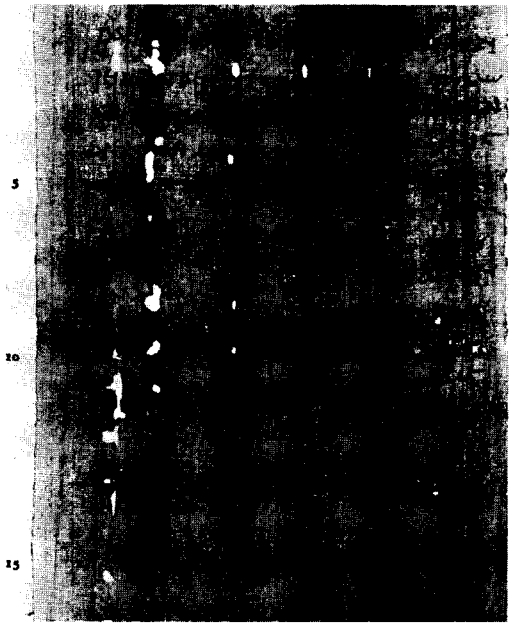
One of the common processes for simplifying language is the creation of new forms by analogy with the old. Thus in Hellenistic Greek an unusual form like the accusative χαριν was regularized into χαριτα, and so with many other forms.



Another cause of simplification was changes in pronunciation. By the second century A.D. such changes from the classical period were extensive. At least five vowels shared the pronunciation of the long iota: iota, omicron-iota, epsilon-iota, upsilon, and eta. The iota adscript lost significance in pronunciation. Alpha-iota became confused with epsilon. Omicron and omega lost their distinction, and in general quantities of vowels were ignored. The accent had changed into a stressed accent.

One result of these changes in pronunciation was the confusion in pronunciation of forms spelled differently. This led in time to the adoption of one of these forms to the exclusion of the others.

But the language of the people is not all simple and bare. Where a more sophisticated writer (at least in the Golden Age) would avoid the poetic and learned word in writing simple prose, the Koine author often belongs to a class that welcomes the most garish style with the reverent sigh, "He talks just like a book!" There is often a bookish flavor in the Koine; poetic phrases, archaic words, learned tags, are used to give it color.



This ancient Greek vernacular is beyond description except in paradox. Its language was robust but limited, vulgar but exalted by simplicity, bare but colorful; it was so varied as to make all generalities inaccurate when applied to it.

C. SOURCES FOR KOINE GREEK. 1. The Greek Bible. Any list of sources for the study of the Greek of the Hellenistic period is determined by the purpose of a particular study. For the purposes of this article, the most influential literature produced in Greek in this period is the Greek Bible. Within this body of literature the NT has the greater value as

Courtesy of Hodder & Stoughton Ltd.

40. Letter from Demophon, a wealthy Egyptian, to Ptolemeus, a police official; a papyrus from Hibeh (ca. 245 B.C.)

Courtesy of Hodder & Stoughton Ltd.

41. Letter from Hilarion, an Egyptian laborer, to Alis his wife; a papyrus written at Alexandria, June 17, 1 B.C.

being written originally in Greek, whereas the Greek OT is a translation. Since the Greek NT language is much closer to the nonliterary Koine than to the learned Greek of the period, this document itself becomes a primary source for the study of the language and, in turn, determines the selection of related documents from other writings of the period.

But before turning to the list of documents, a general word of caution against editors must be given. All the early printings of the documents from this period are suspect, for their editors were educated in the strictest grammar of classical Greek and in many instances changed the wordings of the MS sources to bring them into conformity with the Greek standards which they had been taught in the schoolroom. In the study of any of these documents, the student must look for a so-called "critical edition" produced in recent times with a frank report of linguistic peculiarities as they appear in the MS sources. In the case of the NT itself, this means the use of a text no earlier than Tischendorf or Westcott and Hort (see TEXT, NT), supplemented by the study of a critical apparatus that gives the variations in particular MSS. The first printings of the Greek NT are not dependable witnesses to spelling and syntax of the original Greek NT. In the church fathers the same thing is true. Migne's Patrologia graeca is untrustworthy, and critical editions of the church fathers—such as the series of the Berlin Academy, Die Griechische Christliche Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderten—are to be employed. Similarly, in the early editions of the non-Christian writers, care must be taken not to be misled by the editor's "corrections" of the readings of his source.

2. Nonbiblical sources. Since the Greek Bible is of major importance in terms of current interest for the study of Koine Greek, a full discussion of the Greek Bible is postponed at this point. Here we turn to those nonbiblical sources which contribute to our understanding of the Greek of the Hellenistic period: Greek papyri, ostraca, and inscriptions. This is a grouping of documents according to the materials* upon which they are written. Papyri are documents written upon sheets of ancient paper, for the most part Egyptian. The ostraca are documents written on pieces of broken pottery, and the inscriptions are usually inscribed on stone. Figs. GRE 40-41.

There are, of course, literary documents written on ancient paper. The literature of the classical Greek period and the Greek Bible were at times written on papyrus, but we here eliminate all these literary papyri from consideration. Here our concern is with the so-called "nonliterary" papyri.

Among these documents we find, not only nonliterary material, but also almost illiterate material. Some of these documents are written by individuals who had little spelling and less grammar. These extremely "uneducated" documents must, of course, be used with the greatest care in generalizations about the Greek language in this period, but the number of documents is so great and the types of documents so numerous that these extreme cases can be ignored and still leave a tremendous body of material for study.

At least fifty thousand documents have been published in this field. There are personal documents, business documents, legal documents, official documents. There are family letters, love letters, orders to a tenant farmer, tax receipts, bills of sale, marriage contracts, divorce contracts, adoptions, wills, business contracts of all kinds—from a contract hiring an orchestra and dancers to a contract placing a boy as apprentice to a weaver; accounts from business of every type and from households, from temples, from government monopolies. There are records of lawsuits; there are court proceedings and judgments. In a word, these documents cover the range of documents in a complex society. For a list of publications that give an adequate sampling of these materials see bibliography.

Along with the variety in content goes the variety in cultural level. But generally speaking, these documents are closer to the spoken language of the people than they are to the Atticizing literary language of the period. One says this without denying that business documents are written with business formulas and that legal documents have their own legal formulas, and that in each you find the technical vocabulary appropriate to the content. Still the generalization remains: the nonliterary papyri are a valuable and extensive source for a knowledge of the nonliterary language and usage of the Hellenistic period.

In the case of the ostraca, the range of content is much narrower. These bits of pottery are the poor man's writing material, and they are used for accounts and tax receipts, particularly the latter, but not for very much else. Thus, while they have a contribution to make to the study of the Greek language, it is much more limited in scope than the contribution of the nonliterary papyri.

In the opposite direction, the same thing is true of the inscriptions. The inscriptions have a wider range than the ostraca and a much more limited range than the papyri. They are dominated by sepulchral and official inscriptions. They are usually formularized to a high degree. But there are exceptions to all these statements, and important linguistic material has been found in the inscriptions of this period.

Scholars have studied this material extensively for the light it may shed on our knowledge of the Greek language. There has been extensive grammatical study of the papyri written in the pre-Christian period. Grammars and lexicons have been developed with primary attention to the materials found here, but much still remains to be done in the writing of a grammar of the papyri in the Roman period.

3. The writings of Epictetus. Many students of Hellenistic Greek list Epictetus as the primary source for a knowledge of the nonliterary Koine. Epictetus was a Stoic philosopher born ca. A.D. 60, whose diatribes or sermons were recorded by his pupil Arrian. They are extensive in number, and they provide us with fine examples of the style of a popular lecturer at the turn of the first century A.D. There are striking parallels between Epictetus and some of Paul's writings, even in matters of style. Beyond this, in vocabulary, grammar, and syntax, these diatribes are a rich source of information for the nonliterary Koine.

4. Noncanonical Christian documents. The writings of some of the earliest Christian fathers have been formed by accident of publication into a collection called "THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS." These writings contain much of value for the student of the Greek of this period. They are available in a variety of editions.

The books that are often referred to as NT Apocrypha (see APOCRYPHA, NT) should be used in this study. The noncanonical gospels, acts, epistles, and apocalypses, particularly the acts that were produced in the late second and early third centuries, contain linguistic material of a high value. Much of this apocryphal literature comes out of popular Christianity, and it is closer to the language of everyday life than it is to the language of the schoolmen. The Acts of Paul, for example, contains much that is relevant.

It may be added that even the writings of the more sophisticated Greek fathers after the year 200 have something to contribute to our knowledge of the Koine.

5. Pagan authors. Beyond Epictetus, there are other writers of the period whose language, while not as colloquial as his, still contains many elements characteristic of the Koine.

Philo of Byzantium, from as early as the second century B.C., shows evidences of developing Koine in inflection and syntax and vocabulary. Radermacher, in his essay on the Koine, lists several dozen linguistic items of agreement with the nonliterary Koine. In some cases Philo changes from Attic usage to Koine usage; in some matters he stays with the Attic against the Koine.

Apollodorus the Mythographer is another writer of this period. Whether or not he is to be identified with the historian of the same name, his writings are to be dated not far from the beginning of the Christian era. He writes in the Koine—in inflection, in vocabulary, in spelling, and in syntax. In comparison with the language of Philo of Byzantium, the language of Apollodorus shows a decided descent to the vulgar speech.

The term "vulgar" applied to the Koine should not mislead us, for many writers of considerable culture and skill have "vulgar" linguistic elements. There are many writers whose works fall between the peaks of literary excellence and the valleys of vulgar speech. The writings of Artemidorus and the historian Diodorus are somewhat between Philo and Apollodorus on the one hand and Strabo the Geographer or Plutarch on the other. Nicolaus of Damascus, the historian, and Josephus should probably be ranked somewhere near Diodorus and Apollodorus.

It is clear that the available sources for an extensive knowledge of nonliterary Greek of this period are numerous, and that they range in value for this purpose along a continuum that reaches all the way to the writings of even such an Atticist as Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

D. THE GREEK BIBLE. The Greek Bible is today the most important book written in the Koine. Within that linguistic mélange, it is hard to locate it accurately. It is less common (in the vulgar sense) than the papyri; it is less literary than the writings of the Atticists. Generally speaking, Atticism has touched it but little, yet it has an "Atticism" of its own. Most of the OT is translation Greek, and for that large part the Semitic original was a sacred language to be changed as little as possible in translation. For the NT writers the Greek OT itself had a position of prestige analogous to that held by Attic in the esteem of cultured Greeks. Semitic elements entered through this detour, as well as through the primitive Aramaic elements in the authentic tradition of Jesus' teaching. Linguistically this volume, the Greek Bible, is a worthy representative of the variety of the Koine. Its individual books run the gamut from slavish translation to free composition, from the vulgar Greek of Revelation to the cultured Greek of the Wisdom of Solomon. In this as in many other aspects it gives a reliable picture of the contemporary Koine.

1. The Greek OT. The Greek OT is the most extensive work written in the Koine and the most varied in quality. There is more than one Greek OT. The best known is the translation known as the SEPTUAGINT—so called from the tradition that it was made by seventy (or seventy-two) translators. But there were several other translations with which the student should gain some acquaintance. The best known of these is Theodotion's translation (see THEODOTION), at the end of the second century A.D.—a revision of a Greek translation by the Hebrew text—which is well known because Theodotion's Daniel replaced the LXX Daniel in most MSS. Earlier than Theod., but more fragmentary, are two other Greek Old Testaments: the first, a slavishly literal version made about A.D. 130 by a Jewish proselyte named Aquila (see AQUILA'S VERSION); the second, which aimed at accuracy and at being good Greek, was made ca. A.D. 170 by SYMMACHUS, an Ebionite Christian.

Wurthwein unhesitatingly characterizes the language of the LXX as the "Koine, the common Greek language of the Hellenistic period." The number of Hebraisms and Aramaisms is relatively small. In general, the translation is not slavishly literal. Subordination frequently replaces the constant Hebrew co-ordination, either through the use of the Greek participle or through the use of subordinate clauses. As many as twelve different translations of a single Hebrew word can be found. Moreover, the translators occasionally Hellenized the concepts, and thus the language, of their Hebrew original. "The hand of Yahweh" became δύναμις τοῦ κυρίου (Josh. 4:24). Therefore, the student of the LXX cannot always find the clue to the understanding of the Greek in the Hebrew text—it may lie in Egyptian usages contemporary with the translators. But the closeness in translation varies from book to book and from section to section, as does the style and linguistic quality of the Greek. An objective and expert judgment of this diversity in style and idiom is the linguistic classification of H. St. John Thackeray in his Grammar of the OT in Greek. This is a rough classification into groups from the point of view of style. If the point of view were excellence as translation, the grouping would change considerably. A summary of this classification follows:

Translations

Good Koine Greek: the Pentateuch; Joshua (part); Isaiah; I Maccabees.

Indifferent Greek: Jer. 1–28; Ezekiel (except 36:24–38); the minor prophets, I and II Chronicles (except the last few chapters of II Chronicles), I Kingdoms, II Kingdoms 1:1–11:1; III Kingdoms 2:1–21:43; Psalms; Ecclesiasticus; Judith.

Literal or unintelligent versions (style akin to that of Theod. in many books): Jer. 29–51 with Bar. 1:1–3:8; Judges (in the text of Codex Vaticanus) with Ruth; II Kingdoms 11:2–III Kingdoms 2:11; III Kingdoms 22; IV Kingdoms; Song of Solomon; Lamentations; Daniel (in the version of Theod.); II Esdras (in the version of Aq.); Ecclesiastes (in the version of Aq.).

Paraphrases and Free Renderings

Literary: I Esdras with Daniel (in the LXX—in part); Esther; Job; Proverbs.

Free Greek—Works Composed in Greek

Literary and Atticistic: Wisdom of Solomon; Epistle of Jeremiah; Bar. 3:9 on; II, III, and IV Maccabees.

Vernacular: Tobit (in both forms of the text). Thackeray suggests that Tobit should perhaps be placed under paraphrases; he leaves open the question of whether or not Tobit had a Hebrew original.

The first part of the OT to be translated into Greek was the Pentateuch, the translation of which was begun about the middle of the third century B.C. The rest of the books of the Hebrew canon were translated from time to time, and it is probable that most, if not all, of them existed in Greek by the beginning of the Christian era. In the study of some of the Dead Sea Scrolls, F. M. Cross has found a Hebrew text of the LXX. This confirmation of the accuracy of our later copies of the LXX increases its importance for the study of the Koine, for it places it very early in the Hellenistic period, where the number of sources is not large.

2. The Greek NT. The Greek of the NT is the Koine of the first two centuries A.D. It is now generally agreed by NT scholars that the books as we have them were written in Greek. As was the case in the LXX, the quality of the language varies for two reasons: the strength of the Semitic element and the extent of the author's culture.

No one denies the presence of a Semitic element in the Greek NT. Its extent is vigorously debated. At the minimum, it must be admitted that all authentic sayings of Jesus in the Greek gospels are translations of an Aramaic original; that in the NT extensive quotations from the OT were usually made from the LXX; and also that the Semitic elements of the Greek OT were a Semitizing influence on the authors of the NT books. At the maximum this Semitic element has been claimed to include all four gospels and much of Acts, since a few extremists claim that these are translations of Semitic originals. Aramaisms or Semitisms can usually be paralleled in original Koine Greek, although a small number cannot. But frequency of usage of some of these surpasses their frequency in Koine usage. The general opinion as to the maximum extent of Semitic influence traces it back either to Semitic originals of a few sources or to the authors' habit of thinking in Aramaic while writing in Greek.

The variation in the cultural level of the various books is not as wide in the NT as in the Greek OT. No NT book is as Atticistic as the Wisdom of Solomon, although Revelation is as "common" in quality as anything in the OT. Revelation is certainly the least cultured of the NT books in language. Yet even it stands definitely above large numbers of the papyri. Matthew and Mark correspond roughly to what Thackeray calls the "indifferent" Greek of the OT. Linguistically John is not very far above the vernacular; but Luke, Acts, and Hebrews reveal a more advanced knowledge of the language. The identity of Paul's style with that of the contemporary Stoic preachers is now recognized, and James also has linguistic affinities with these popular preachers.

Radermacher's characterization of the Greek of the NT is illuminating. After emphasizing the uniformity of the Koine vis-à-vis geographical dialects, he claims that the lower degree of uniformity in the Greek NT is due to the strongly marked personalities of the authors. Yet their common theological interest was a unifying factor unknown to pagan writers in general. In declensions, verb inflection, and use of the article with names, the NT stands on comparatively high ground. But it is part of the nonliterary Koine in the extension in use of the infinitive with τοῦ, the extensive replacement of the infinitive by ἵνα (which does not occur in Hebrews, James, or the Petrine letters). In the use of prepositions the NT (especially John, Hebrews, I and II Peter, and Revelation) agrees with Epictetus.

The place of the Greek NT within the Koine is defined also by comparison with the Greek OT. This comparison is especially valuable if one's interest lies in the Semitic element in NT Greek. In general, the NT is living Greek to a much higher degree. The historical present is rare in the OT, but common in the gospels.

In the area of vocabulary, Radermacher claims that little is to be expected from comparing the NT and learned authors. But the establishment of the meaning of words in the NT must be sought in contemporary nonliterary Koine writings, in the papyri, and in the inscriptions. Older Greek sources can be used only with caution, since changes in meaning have now been established for many words. Later Greek usage in grammar and syntax often supports the NT. The wealth of comparable material is so great that a NT word's meaning is not to be accepted without some support in nonbiblical Greek.

In the discussion of the nonliterary Koine attention was called to some of the outstanding characteristics of the popular Greek language in the NT period. Practically every one of the characteristics listed there for the Koine is valid also as a characteristic of the Greek NT. In addition to these, attention may be called to the following usages in the NT: The comparative degree often serves for the superlative, and the superlative is frequently used in the sense of "very." The dual number is gone, and the optative mood is vanishing. Prepositions are more fluid in meaning and, as compared with the classical usage, are often confused in use. The future tense shrinks outside the indicative mood. Periphrastic verb forms have increased in frequency. Diminutive forms (always popular in vernaculars) are very common. The middle voice has lost ground to the passive and to the active plus pronoun. Rare inflectional forms tend to conform to the alternative dominant pattern. The accusative case has gained at the expense of the dative.

E. THE DISCOVERY OF THE KOINE. After the Christian movement had acquired educated leaders and entered the learned tradition of the Empire, it studied its Greek scriptures against the background of classical Greek literature and language. The constant and careful comparison of the Greek NT, for example, with these classical sources uncovered a long list of divergences in vocabulary, inflections, and syntax. In vocabulary, Thayer's revision and translation of Grimm's lexicon—Greek-English Lexicon of the NT, published in 1866—lists 450 words which occur only in the NT and have no parallel elsewhere. This list is a little longer than it should be, since Thayer's own lexicon includes parallels for a few of these words. These peculiarities were explained in one of two ways. In the first place, they were identified as "Hebraisms" due to the Semitic background of the Scriptures. In the second place, they were explained by the sacredness of its content. Thus, for example, in the matter of syntax a German scholar explained the peculiarities of NT usage as due to the influence of the Holy Spirit, so that NT Greek could be called the "language of the Holy Ghost." This scholar argued that the Holy Spirit changed the language of any people who received a divine revelation and that this adequately explained deviations in NT Greek from the usage of the classical period.

One man is to be given the credit for the discovery of the Koine—a German pastor named Adolf Deissmann. Even though one or two perceptive scholars had noted the true character of NT Greek as early as the middle of the nineteenth century, their statements made no impression on general opinion. Deissmann, on a visit to a friend in Marburg, found a volume of Greek papyri from Egypt, and leafing through this publication, he was struck by the similarity to the Greek of the NT. He followed up this observation with continued study, and his publications of his findings finally led to general acceptance of the position that the peculiarities of the Greek NT were, for the most part, to be explained by reference to the nonliterary Greek, the popular colloquial language of the period. He first published his results in two volumes of Bible Studies (1895, 1897) and later on in the justly popular Light from the Ancient East (1908).

His work influenced the brilliant British grammarian, James Hope Moulton, who championed the same position in his very influential writing and publishing, and also influenced grammarians in Germany, notably Radermacher and Debrunner. Many other scholars carried on the study of the Koine in the fields of grammar and lexicography. In NT lexicography Walter Bauer's work is still producing results. In his Introduction to his Fourth Edition (published in the Arndt-Gingrich Greek-English Lexicon) he lists twenty words which were not included in the Fourth Edition but which he has found in non-Christian Greek literature. He lists also twenty-seven items which appeared in the Fourth Edition as "Jewish peculiarities" but which have now been found in pagan sources. These most recent extensions of Deissmann's efforts are further tribute to his insight. Seldom in the history of scholarship has the work of one man been more influential in rewriting an entire chapter in the book of knowledge.

Bibliography. The OT text: A. E. Brooke and N. McLean, The OT in Greek According to the Text of Codex Vaticanus (1906—): this larger Cambridge edition repeats and improves in details the text made familiar to students for some years in the manual edition of H. B. Swete; in this larger work, the text is supplemented by the evidence of a valuable selected apparatus, which includes all the uncials, all early versions, much important patristic evidence, and a small group of minuscules. E. Wurthwein, Der Text Des Alten Testaments (1952), is a fine brief summary of current scholarly information on the study of the Greek OT.

The NT text and studies: C. Tischendorf, Novum Testamentum Graece . . . editio critica octava maior (1869-72)—a critical text with a good apparatus, now antiquated by subsequent discoveries; the text is, in general, similar to that of Westcott and Hort. B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort, The NT in the Original Greek (vol. I: The Text; vol. II: Introduction and Appendix; 1882), has practically become the standard text of the Greek NT in England and, to a lesser degree, in America; the text itself has no critical apparatus, but the second volume gives a classic discussion of methods and principles of textual criticism; the lexicon by Hickie, which is often bound with the text, is not recommended. H. von Soden, Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments in ihrer ältesten erreichbaren Textgestalt (vol. I, 1902-10; vol. II, 1913): Von Soden's theory of the history of the text has been severely criticized and generally repudiated by scholarship; as a result, his text has not been accepted for scholarly study, but his work is an invaluable introduction to the study of the medieval MSS of the NT. A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta (1935), appears in a two-volume student edition and a one-volume de luxe edition; the text is based on the three older MSS as a primary source, but much additional evidence is given in the apparatus; the volumes of this work as they are published by the Göttingen LXX Society are the result of the most thorough study of the text of the LXX. E. Nestle, Novum Testamentum Graece cum apparatu critico curavit (22nd ed. by Erwin Nestle, 1956), is the best edition for classroom use. It gives variant readings in a critical apparatus which is periodically revised. It contains the evidence of the Beatty and other papyri and Codex Koridethi. Cross references are given in the margins, OT sources being identified. Verse divisions are plainly indicated. Most of the equipment of the medieval Greek MSS is reproduced. The text is derived from those of Weiss, Tischendorf, and Hort; it is quite close to that of Westcott and Hort. A. Debrunner, Friedrich Blass' Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch (7th ed., 1943), is the best of the formal grammars of the Greek NT; the same author's Geschichte der Griechischen Sprache. II Grundfragen und Grundzüge des Nachklassischen Griechisch (1954) is brief but valuable, and contains good bibliographies. L. Radermacher, Koine (1947); Neutestamentliche Grammatik: Das Griechisch des Neuen Testaments im Zusammenhang mit der Volkssprache (2nd ed., 1925)—the latter is not a formal grammar but a most interesting discussion in essay form, which integrates NT usage in the popular language of its period. J. H. Moulton, A Grammar of NT Greek, vol. I: Prolegomena (1908), is still the most valuable general discussion of NT Greek in English; his Introduction to the Study of NT Greek (5th ed., rev. H. G. Meecham, 1955), is the best of the Introductions; with this is bound "A First Reader in NT Greek." C. F. D. Moule, An Idiom Book of NT Greek (1953), is a worthy supplement to J. H. Moulton's work.

Good lexicons are: H. G. Liddell and R. Scott, A Greek-English Lexicon (ed. H. S. Jones and R. McKenzie; 1940), the standard lexicon for the study of Greek of the classical period. J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-Literary Sources (1942), contains extensive quotation of parallels to NT usage. A Greek-English Lexicon of the NT and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. and ed. by W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich from W. Bauer's Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der übrigen Urchristlichen Literatur (1957), the best lexicon for students of the Greek NT.

A brief general discussion of the language of the NT by B. M. Metzger appears in IB, VII (1951), 43-59.

E. C. Colwell

GREEK RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY. This article deals chiefly with the new forms of religious life and the new lines of philosophical speculation and ethical theory which developed in the Greek world following the conquests of Alexander the Great (died 323 B.C.), through the last three centuries before Christ and the first centuries of the Christian era.

1. Introduction
2. The old gods and the old cults
3. Personal religion: private associations
4. Oriental religions in the Greek world
   a. Egyptian cults
   b. Anatolian cults
   c. Syrian cults
   d. Persian cults
5. The mystery religions
6. Ruler-worship and deification
7. Fortune and Fate; astral religion and astrology; magic
8. The philosophical schools
   a. Decline of the older schools; Skepticism in the Academy
   b. The Cynics
   c. The Stoics
   d. The Epicureans
   e. Theosophy and Gnosis

Bibliography

1. Introduction. The rise of Macedon put an end to the independence of the Greek city-states; after the Battle of Chaeronea (338 B.C.), which left Philip of Macedon undisputed master of the whole Greek Peninsula, they were nothing more than municipalities within an empire governed by a military autocrat.

But the loss of political independence did not carry with it the extinction of Greek civilization. On the contrary, the Macedonians, victorious in the struggle for the mastery of Greece, made themselves the standard-bearers of the culture which the city-states, especially Athens, had brought to incomparable peaks of glory. Alexander the Great had his imagination fired by the exploits of the Homeric warriors, and thought of himself as a new Achilles, destined to lead the Greeks to victory over an infinitely greater Troy. The Greek philosopher Aristotle was Alexander's tutor. Every movement of his armies was preceded and followed by sacrifices to the Greek gods. In the realm of the spirit, Macedon was a province of conquered Greece. By the middle of the third century, the Macedonian dialect had given way to the Common Greek, now an international language, as completely as any of the regional dialects of the peninsula and the islands. New cities, largely peopled with Greeks and Macedonians, partly colonies of veterans, partly settlers from the homeland, were founded all over the East. Thousands upon thousands of Greeks proved ready to emigrate to the new foundations, to take advantage of the glowing opportunities offered to the tradesman, the artisan, the architect, the musician, the sculptor, and the administrator. Settlers of other nations also came, but were quickly assimilated to the Greeks, adopting the Greek language and giving their children a Greek education. Even the Jews, who could not be wholly assimilated, so far forgot their native language that translations of their scriptures had to be made into Greek for their benefit.

The effects of Hellenization made themselves felt as far E as Bactria and India, and extended ultimately to China and Japan; but it was in Western Asia and in Egypt that the process was carried on most intensively. In these regions, Macedonian rulers maintained their power for from two to three centuries. Alexandria in Egypt, the greatest of the new foundations, rose to the commercial and scientific leadership of the whole Greek world. New Greek cities in Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia—the Antiochs, the Seleucias, the Attaleias, the Stratoniceias, the Philadelphias—became flourishing centers of Greek cultural, as well as commercial, activity. The incorporation of these regions into the Roman Empire brought no break in the continuity of culture, for Greek continued to be the official language in Rome's eastern provinces, and the civil service was almost wholly manned by Greeks.

The movement of traffic did not flow always in the one direction. For nearly two centuries, indeed, the brilliant culture of Greece seemed to win an easy dominance, promoted as it was by the policy of the kings and supported by the technical superiority of the Greeks in almost every field that required skill and ingenuity. But the kingdoms of the Ptolemies and the Seleucids were the heirs of cultures more ancient than the Greek, and the latent resources of the Orient were not long in coming into play. By the middle of the second century B.C., the native forces of Syria, Babylonia, Persia, and Egypt were making themselves felt with ever-increasing force.

Even before the time of Alexander, oriental cults had begun to secure a following in the Greek homeland, and they now began both to revive in their own regions and to expand westward, not only into Greece but also to Rome and ultimately to Rome's western provinces as well.

The result was a wide and deep fusion of Greek and oriental elements to form a mixed culture, which we call "Hellenistic" or sometimes "Greco-Roman" —inaccurately, for it is really Greco-oriental—in which the oriental becomes more and more dominant, even though the language which carries it continues to be Greek. In religion, the great characteristic of the period is syncretism, the fusion of cults and the identification of the gods of one nation with those of another, with the corresponding growth of a tendency toward monotheism, often taking the form of a solar pantheism, and the doctrine that all the gods of the nations are variant manifestations of the one divine power that rules the universe. The astral religion of Babylonia wins a wide adherence, and in its wake comes astrology, with its dead weight of fatalism, inevitably promoting recourse to magic to break the chains of fate, or to mystery initiations to deliver from its power. In philosophy, the dominant school is Stoicism, first taught by the Phoenician Zeno, and always far more Semitic than Greek in spirit. All the schools are characterized by individualism and its complementary universalism; they are essentially philosophies of conduct, based on despair of the world as it is, concerned to teach man how to live as an individual in the cosmos, a citizen of a world-state which never existed and never could exist. And in the later stages, culminating in Neoplatonism, they tend more and more to detach man altogether from mundane things and to bid him seek his fulfilment in another world, the world of pure spirit, in ecstatic union with the divine.

2. The old gods and the old cults. The emergence of significant new forms of religious expression in the Greek world and the growth of personal religion must not blind us to the solid fact of the continued vitality and even resurgence of the traditional religion during the same period. The sense that all nature was instinct with divinity showed no signs of fading; the ancient tokens of reverence were still paid to the manifold spirits of wood and stream, fountain and cavern, sea and hill; the primeval rites of the family and of the farm—of birth, puberty, marriage, and death, of seedtime and harvest—were maintained unchanged. The civic religion was likewise observed in most of its forms. Though undermined by the criticisms of the philosophers and sophists, and shaken by the fall of the states which had looked to them for protection, the old gods continued to receive on a grand scale the public worship of the Greek communities.

Every effort to restore the fabric of the city-states was accompanied by at least as much care for the renewal of the public religion as for the restoration of the finances and the limited rebuilding of the armed forces that was permitted. Every city continued to provide for the regular sacrifices to its tutelary deities and for the priesthoods which offered them. Zeus Polieus and Athena Polias, warders of the city, are not abandoned by their worshipers simply because they have failed to protect them from their enemies; or at least, the loss of faith is not reflected in any diminution of the public cult. In the old cities, indeed, little energy is shown in the building of new temples; the temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens, begun ca. 300 B.C., was not completed until the Emperor Hadrian took it in hand more than four hundred years later. But Greek architects and masons were busy with the construction of new temples to the Greek gods in all the new foundations of Alexander and of the Macedonian dynasts who followed him. The immense altar of Zeus at Pergamum (the "Satan's throne" of Rev. 2:13), built by Attalus I to commemorate his victories over the Gauls, exceeded in magnificence any Greek altar of earlier times. In Syria, the Seleucid kings adored Apollo as the patron of the dynasty and honored him with statues, temples, and groves. In Egypt, it was Dionysus who received special honors from the ruling dynasty, and one of them (Ptolemy IV Philopator) was prepared to resort to persecution to advance his policy of identifying Dionysus with the high gods of his subjects, including the God of Israel. The Greeks who settled abroad were ready enough to worship the local divinities, but they did not for that abandon their own ancestral gods.

Zeus especially attained a matchless renown. In philosophy, his name became the symbol for the very idea of divinity; and in cult he was identified with the high god of every nation—with Sabazios in Phrygia, with Hadad in Syria (Zeus-Adados), with Amon-Re in Egypt, with the Hittite deity Teshub at Doliche in Commagene (Zeus Dolichenos), and with a host of lesser divinities. It was the attempt to establish him in the temple of Jerusalem as Zeus Ouranios (Baal-Shamem), by identification with the God of Israel, which precipitated the revolt of the Maccabees.

In all parts of the Greek world, festivals flourished. Athens continued to observe the Panathenaea and the Greater and Lesser Dionysia, and revived in greater splendor the quadrennial Delia. Toward 200 B.C., Magnesia on the Meander consecrated its territories to its gods, restored its main temples, and established new annual and quadrennial festivals, with games and sacrifices, to which all the Greek cities were invited to send participants. The same kind of thing was happening everywhere; a list of the new festivals would fill a column.

The old Greek religion had suffered severe blows, but it was far from ready to die. If other proof of its vitality were needed, it would be seen in the fact that after displacing the ancient Phoenician religion at Carthage in the fourth century, it transformed the whole structure of Roman religion from the middle of the third century onward. Jupiter is recast in the image of Zeus;* Minerva becomes a Roman Pallas; the unimportant Roman water numen Neptune takes on the stature of the mighty Poseidon; and so through the whole pantheon. Images of the Roman gods are created on the Greek models, and Greek rites previously unknown to the staid practices of ancient Rome are introduced on a grand scale. In the first Christian century, Paul traveled through cities filled with images and altars; and a hundred years after him, Pausanias describes a Greek world which in the outward aspects of religion, at least, showed no sign of decay of its old cults. Fig. ZEU 2.

3. Personal religion: private associations. There is evidence, nonetheless, that the religious needs of the time could no longer be wholly satisfied within the compass of the old cults of city, phratry, and tribe. Before the time of Alexander, it had been a risky business for a citizen to profess a private religion; the authorities looked upon such a thing as outright sedition. In the Hellenistic period, on the other hand, we observe a remarkable growth of private religious associations which stand apart from the organized structure of the civic religion. These cult groups (θίασοι, ἔρανοι) were of various kinds. Some of them were almost of the nature of guilds—of merchants, of artists, of musicians, of old schoolfellows; and in these the religious interest was generally subordinate to the social, though each group had its temple and altar and paid its devotions to the god of its choice. There were many, however, which were formed for no other purpose than to worship the particular god to whom they were consecrated. Sometimes they would choose one of the old Greek gods as the object of their devotion—Athena, Apollo, Hermes, Poseidon; more frequently Aphrodite; and most frequently of all, Dionysus, whose cult offered an ecstatic escape from the ugliness and despair of the times in the abandonment of the mystic. But even more significant is the number of associations that were formed for the worship of an alien god. A thiasos of the Egyptian Ammon is found at the Piraeus early in the third century; fifty years later, we hear of an association of worshipers of Serapis; within the next generation Serapis is joined by Isis and Anubis, and in the following century by Harpocrates (Horus the Child). The Phoenician Adonis and the Great Mother from Phrygia have each a thiasos which worships them under their native rites. The islands of Delos and Rhodes were as hospitable as Athens. The Egyptian gods were worshiped there by their thiasoi in the third century; and the Syrian goddess Atargatis, identified by the Greeks with Aphrodite, probably was introduced into Delos long before the building of the temple which was dedicated to her in 128 B.C. Serapis and Isis had their groups of devotees in almost all the islands of the Aegean; and the deities of Syria and of Asia Minor were scarcely less popular.

Some of the cities, notably Athens, passed legislation from time to time to regulate the activities of these cult associations, but it was seldom that they were taken under the control of the community and made part of the official religion. Membership in them was always voluntary, and consequently involved a more personal relationship to the god and a more active participation in the rites of worship than could be found in the state cults. They afforded an avenue of religious expression and a measure of satisfaction of religious aspirations and needs which the established cults could not provide. In some cases they overcame the barriers of tribe and family, of race and social status. Thracians and Libyans, Phrygians and Syrians, could be members of thiasoi which were largely made up of Greeks; and some associations admitted slaves. The common worship of the patron divinity created a new tie of brotherhood and a sense of fellowship which was no longer felt in attachment to the city or the tribe, and which was open to men who had abandoned these attachments by migrating abroad. In many of them, the bond was sealed and maintained by sacramental rites. In the long perspective of history, their chief significance lies in the fact that they were the channels by which the oriental religions found entrance into the Greek homeland and so began their momentous penetration of the Western world.

4. Oriental religions in the Greek world. The victorious expansion of the oriental religions is one of the most conspicuous features of the age. The first place among them belongs to the cult of Serapis, with whom is associated the ancient Egyptian goddess Isis, who gathers to herself the cults of numerous mother goddesses of Greece and Asia and becomes the prototype of the Christian Madonna. Next come the Syrian and Babylonian religions, manifold in form and character, which carry the worship of the sun and the heavenly bodies and the deadly superstitions of astrology over the whole Mediterranean world. A number of Anatolian cults—of Sabazios, of Men-Tyrannos, of the Great Mother, of the Ephesian Artemis—also win devotees abroad. Iranian elements are contributed to the vast amalgam from an early period, but the great advances of Mithraism belong to a later time.

a. Egyptian cults. The god Serapis is from the beginning a compound deity, partly Egyptian and partly Greek. His cult was introduced in Egypt by the first Ptolemy in the later years of the fourth century. According to legend, Ptolemy was commanded in a dream to fetch the god—that is, his image—from Sinope in Pontus, where he was worshiped as a god of the underworld by all the coastal peoples of the Euxine. At Memphis he was identified with Osiris, the Egyptian lord of the realm of the departed, and associated with the cult of the Apis-bull; his name, which is found early at Memphis in the form "Oserapis," is clearly a Greek transliteration of the Egyptian Oser-Hapi (Osiris-Apis). A magnificent cult statue was designed for him by the Greek sculptor Bryaxis, who drew upon the classical types of Zeus, Hades (Pluto), and Asclepius, and set on his head as a crown the modius, a round corn measure. He is thus from the beginning conceived as a universal god, lord of the underworld as of the heavens, healer of diseases and giver of corn and wine, and able to offer his worshipers a blessed life beyond the grave. Later we find him identified with the sun-god, and bearing such compound titles as Zeus Helios Great Serapis. In the ordering of his cult, the Eumolpid Timotheus, one of the hereditary guardians of the Eleusinian mysteries of Demeter, was brought from Eleusis to be associated with the Egyptian priest Manetho; this would suggest that elements of the Eleusinian ritual were incorporated into the liturgy, which in the main appears to have been translated from the Egyptian formulas of the Osiris cult. The great Serapeum constructed at Alexandria by Ptolemy was built on the Egyptian pattern, and the priesthood was at first purely Egyptian, of sacerdotal race; but the devotees were nearly all Greeks, Macedonians, and other foreigners. Among them, the new cult had immediate and enduring success. The first hymns to Serapis are said to have been composed by the scholar-statesman Demetrius of Phalerum, who had been cured of blindness by the god. The court poets joined in his praises, and a vast literature quickly grew up, telling of his "philanthropia."

The cult of Serapis was carried into the Greek homeland in the first instance by Greeks returning from Egypt. In the islands of the Aegean and in Asia Minor, it may have been promoted by the Ptolemies in support of their imperial aims; but most of the early sanctuaries are surprisingly modest constructions, and it is more than likely that the cult owed its rapid spread mainly to the zeal of its followers, organized in the private associations mentioned above. In the course of the third century B.C., Serapis has his worshipers in nearly all the Greek coastal cities and in Boeotia, in many parts of Asia Minor and on the shores of the Euxine. In the second century, he makes his way eastward into Babylonia and even to India, and westward to S Italy and so to Rome. In the face of prolonged and determined opposition from the Roman authorities, the cult continued to win adherents in the capital and in all Italy, until at last the Flavian emperors and after them the Antonines and the Severi were glad to lend it the countenance of the court and even to walk in its processions.

Once established in Greek and Roman territories, Serapis opened the way for the goddess Isis, who proved to have a far greater popular appeal. In the old Egyptian religion she was the sister and wife of Osiris, faithful and true, who sought and gathered together the fragments of his corpse, dismembered by his enemy Set (Typho), and by her magic powers restored it to life; and by him she conceived and bore Horus, who overcame Set and avenged his father. Among the Greeks, she became the great goddess of the sea, the kindly and powerful protector of sailors; and she somehow gathered to herself all the female deities of the eastern Mediterranean. In the aretalogies she is identified with Artemis, Aphrodite, Demeter, Hecate, Hera, Hestia, Astarte, Nanai, the Great Mother, and many lesser divinities. She is hailed as the mistress of every land, the queen of heaven, the star of the sea, the diadem of life, and by many other epithets; she is Health, Fortune, Righteousness; she is "Isis of ten thousand names" (μυριώνυμος). It is she who has established among men all the arts and crafts, all the institutions of social life, the rites of religion, and the principles of morality; she is the perpetual helper of the human race; and she has power over Destiny (Heimarmenê)—her worshiper is set free from the bondage of fate, and she can even prolong his life beyond the appointed limits.

The Isis cult offered gaudy public ceremonies to attract devotees and impressive secret rites to bind them to the service of the goddess. The two great festivals of the year were the Heuresis (εὕρεσις; Latin inventio), the Finding of Osiris, in the autumn; and the Launching of the Ship (πλοιαφέσια; Latin navigium Isidis) in the spring, at the opening of navigation. At the Heuresis, the worshipers witnessed and participated in the dramatic re-enactment of the death of Osiris at the hands of Set, the sorrowful search of Isis for the members of her husband, and her joy in finding him and restoring him to life. The action ends with the proclamation of the priest: "Be of good cheer, O Mystae! now that the god has been saved; for there shall be salvation for you out of your distresses" (Firmicus Maternus De Errore Profanarum Religionum 22). At the Launching, a carnival-like procession with flowers, lamps and torches, flute players and choirs of singers, devotees clad in linen and carrying sistra, priests bearing the insignia of the goddess, with images and sacred animals, made its way through the streets to the harbor and committed the sacred bark of Isis to the sea. It then returned to the temple, where the scribe read prayers for ships and seafarers, for the state and its rulers. After that, all kissed the feet of the goddess and so went home. Throughout the year, sacrifices were offered to the goddess daily, and private offerings could be presented at any time. Her temples were open for prayer and meditation, and—unique in the ancient world—benches were arranged before the images for the use of her adorers.

The public cult was supplemented by private disciplines resembling a penitential cure of souls. The Roman satirist Juvenal, bitterly hostile to all oriental influences in Italy, speaks with scorn of proud Roman ladies who would drag themselves on their knees over the frozen ground of the Campus Martius at the behest of the priest of Isis. The candidate for initiation must submit to long fasts and vigils in the temple, and must surrender much of his wealth, as well as his person, to the goddess. She rewards him with the affection of a mother and with her divine protection against all the baleful influences of the world.

b. Anatolian cults. Of the Anatolian cults, the oldest and most widespread was that of the Great Mother, called Ma or Cybele or Agdistis (under the latter name, a bisexual deity) and several other names. By the Greeks she was identified with Rhea, the mother of the Olympian gods; with Demeter (Δημήτηρ, "Mother Earth"); and with ARTEMIS. In most forms of her cult, her son and consort, Attis, is associated with her. Her temples were organized as powerful landholding corporations, owning thousands of slaves and served by multitudes of eunuchs and sacred prostitutes, ministers of the fertility cult. These temples were states within the state, and their powers were only partially curbed by the Hellenistic rulers. The cult had received accretions from many sources over the centuries—Phrygian and Hittite, Syrian and Persian—so that in Hellenistic times it presents a complex and confusing picture. In some centers, the male god has acquired the major role and is identified with Zeus; elsewhere the Mother has taken on the traits of the Persian Anahita (Anaitis) and adopted the Persian fire worship into her cult. Her temple-state at Ephesus had long maintained close relations with the Greek city, which revered her as the Artemis of the Ephesians and marked its coinage with her symbol, the bee, until the end of the fourth century B.C., when Lysimachus brought the temple under civil control. Elsewhere in Asia Minor, the Mother had many Greek worshipers; she and Attis are mentioned in Asian inscriptions of the Hellenistic period more frequently than all the Greek gods together. Private associations which worshiped her under the name of Meter (Μήτηρ, "Mother") are found in Athens from the fourth century on, and occasionally in other parts of the Greek world; and there were some few groups of worshipers of Attis. The great foreign conquests of the goddess were not in the Greek world, which probably found her cult too unrestrainedly orgiastic; it is in Rome and the Latin West that she makes her deepest impress, at a later period.

The moon-god Men also held vast temple-states in all the regions of Asia Minor, ruled by his priests and owning thousands of slaves. Under the cult name of Men-Tyrannos he is worshiped by an association of slaves at Cape Sunium in Attica; he and the sun-god Helios share a sanctuary at Delos; and in the first century B.C., his name is linked with Pan and the Nymphs at Athens in supplications for rain. Rites of purification and expiation are prescribed for all who approach him. He seems to have gathered to himself all the sparse remnants of moon cults which survived in ancient Greece; but he never became a major deity outside Anatolia. In his homeland, he continued high in honor among natives and Greek settlers alike. He is the guardian of the graves, and his image commonly appears on gravestones. One of his altars bears the inscription "One God in the heavens, Men Tyrannos, Great Power of the Immortal God."

Of much greater importance is the Phrygian deity Sabazios, identified by the Greeks now with Zeus, now with Dionysus; the mystic formula "Bull begets Snake and Snake begets Bull" recalls crude myths of the birth of Persephone from Demeter and of Dionysus-Zagreus from Persephone, both begotten by Zeus, first as Bull, then as Snake. The peculiar identification with the God of Israel may have been suggested by the similarity of the name to Sabaoth (Lord "of hosts"), or to the cult title Sabbatistes ("Sabbath-God"); and by the epithet Hypsistos ("Most High"), often given to Sabazios and widely used by the Jews in Greek synagogue inscriptions and other references to their own deity. The most striking feature of the initiation ritual of this cult was the drawing of a snake through the bosom of the candidate, who thus drew into himself the powers of the god and was brought into mystical union with him. Rites of purification have an important place in the preparation for admission to the mysteries; they hold before men the hope of vindication in a judgment after death, and of a joyous immortality. The mysteries of Sabazios were celebrated at Athens before the end of the fifth century, apparently without the secrecy which was required by other such cults; the wider extension to the limits of the Roman Empire awaits the second century of our era and appears to accompany the cult of the Great Mother. The insignia of the god are numerous and varied—bull, ram, snake, toad, lizard, pine cone and palm tree, barley ears, agricultural tools, often a goblet; on the later monuments, solar and astral symbols abound, as Sabazios is identified with Helios. A distinctive cult object is the bronze hand, used as a votive offering or an amulet. It is always found in the form of the "Latin benediction"—the thumb and the first two fingers stretched out, the third and fourth fingers closed against the palm, the whole surmounted front and back with a profusion of the god's insignia and often with tiny heads, male and female. The name of the god is probably derived from sabaia (σάβαια, "beer"), and it may well be that in his cult beer took the place of the wine in the cult of Dionysus in promoting ecstasy by intoxication; but this feature is overlaid with a fantastic abundance of elements from the most diverse sources. The syncretism of the period here receives its most ample expression.

c. Syrian cults. The success of the Syrian gods in winning devotees abroad is relatively limited. The great sky-god Hadad is identified with Zeus and receives a cult at Delos and elsewhere under the name of Zeus-Adados. His consort ATARGATIS, or Derceto, is more widely worshiped. To the Greeks, and also to the Romans, she is pre-eminently the "Syrian goddess," and is regarded as a form of Aphrodite (Venus). Like the Artemis of the Ephesians, she is a form of the Great Mother of Anatolia. A number of local bels were identified with Zeus, and the cults of some few of them grew to a more than local significance; for instance, the bel of Mount Kasios, enshrined in the form of a conical stone, is worshiped by the Greeks of the nearby Seleucia in Pieria under the cult title of Zeus Kasios, and his cult is carried into Egypt and to Delos, to Epidaurus, and to Corcyra. And the black stone of Emesa became still more famous in later times (A.D. 218), when it was carried to Rome by an emperor who himself took its name, Elagabalus, and made it the principal symbol of Sol Invictus, the "Unconquered Sun." Under Aurelian (A.D. 272) it was the bel of Palmyra who was accorded the same honor. The hammer-wielding god of Dolichê in neighboring Commagene, originally a Hittite deity dear to the wandering tribe of iron-workers called the Chalybes, became first Zeus Dolichenos and then under the Romans received the resounding titles of Jupiter Optimus Maximus Dolichenus Sol Invictus and was borne to all parts of the Empire, even as far as Hadrian's Wall, in the camps of the legions. The dominant sun worship of the later Empire owed much to the sun cults of Syria.

But Syria plays its greatest role in the history of Hellenistic religion as the intermediary by which the astral religion of Babylonia passed into the Western world and entered into its long association with Greek science and philosophy in the formation of the imposing structure of astrology, which took shape in Egypt in the second century B.C. and exercised an extraordinary dominance over the minds of men until modern times. See § 7 below.

d. Persian cults. The influence of Mazdaism, the pure and lofty religion taught by Zoroaster, was inestimably great in the realm of religious thought. To the later Judaism it contributed cardinal elements of its eschatological doctrine, of resurrection and judgment to come, of angels and demons, of a prince of demonic powers almost rivaling the supreme god —no inconsiderable part of the general framework of thought which was inherited by early Christianity. In the Greek world there is no evidence of such significant acceptance of Zoroastrian ideas, except insofar as they contribute to the radical dualism of the Gnostic schools. The Persian cults that win adherents in the Hellenistic kingdoms belong rather to the older strata of pre-Zoroastrian Persia. Ahura Mazda, the "Wise Lord" exalted by Zoroaster as the One God, is hardly ever encountered; in the kingdom of Com-magene, whose kings boasted of a mingled Greek and Persian ancestry, he is identified with Zeus and is represented in the vast monument of Nimrud Dagh by a colossal statue bearing the compounded name of Zeus Oromasdes. The Persian sun-god Mithras is represented in the same monument under the composite title Apollo Mithras Helios Hermes; in the kingdom of Pontus he is the patron deity of the royal house, and kings are called Mithradates in his honor; he is worshiped also by the pirates of the Cilician coast, the most deadly sea rovers of antiquity. In and after the second century A.D. he becomes the favorite god of the Roman legionaries, who make grottoes and erect altars for him in their garrison posts all over the Empire; with the growth of solar religion in the later Empire, he is identified with Sol Invictus. The goddess Anahita sometimes appears as his consort. More frequently she has her own temples and worshipers, in company with or in identification with the Great Mother, sometimes with the Artemis of the Ephesians; the fire cult is practiced on her altars and from them is adopted into other cults of Anatolia. In Pontus and in Armenia she was long the principal female deity. None of the Persian cults has left any important traces in the Greek peninsula itself or in the Aegean islands.

5. The mysteries. In earlier times, two main types of mystery cult were practiced in the Greek world: the mysteries of Demeter at Eleusis in Attica, and the mysteries of Dionysus in many different places, wherever groups of Bacchants were formed to celebrate them. In Hellenistic times, the thiasoi of Dionysus multiplied in the Greek world, especially in the Hellenized regions of the East; new mysteries of the Eleusinian type were founded in other cities, and Eleusinian priests were called to aid in the institution or in the reorganization of cults in Asia and in Egypt. At the same time, most of the oriental religions which were invading the Greek world came in the form of mystery cults with initiations and sacraments, with the promise of immortality and the ecstasy of participation in the life of the divinity.

The Eleusinian mysteries were celebrated under the direction of their hereditary custodians, the family of Eumolpides—one of the few professional priesthoods known to Greek religion. Admission was obtained individually through ceremonies of initiation, which were open to all of Hellenic race, including women and even, on occasion, slaves; yet they were administered by the Athenian state as part of the official religion, and the whole population of Attica participated in the rites. In its origins, undoubtedly pre-Hellenic, the worship of Eleusis was an agrarian fertility cult, meant to ensure that Earth would bring forth her increase. Two pairs of divinities are involved: Demeter (Mother Earth) and her Daughter (Kore—the Maiden), and Pluto (Wealth) with his consort, Persephone. But Kore has long since become identified with Persephone, and Pluto with Hades the lord of the underworld; so that the Maiden is at once the daughter of Earth and the queen of the world of the dead. The myth in the earliest form in which it has come down to us (the Homeric Hymn to Demeter—seventh century B.C.) is already composite. The rape of Persephone by Hades-Pluto, the barren fields, the quest of Demeter for her lost daughter, the return of the Maiden from the underworld, and the restoration of verdure—this in itself is a clear enough representation of the seasonal crop cycle, and lends itself readily to the promise of a new life for man beyond the grave. With this is combined a story of Demeter's care for the royal child of Eleusis, on whom she would have bestowed immortality by a bath of fire, had she not been interrupted by the ill-timed intrusion of the terrified parents. The goddess herself establishes the rites by which she is to be worshiped and appoints her own priesthood. To those who are initiated, she promises a blessed immortality and a participation in the divine nature. "Happy is that man who has seen these things," the Hymn proclaims, "but he who has had no part in the rites shall never have an equal lot in the dark realms of death." The atmosphere of this cult was not frenzied or ecstatic, but quietly joyful; and it appears to have made in the main for the elevation of the religious spirit in Greece.

The mysteries of Dionysus are of an entirely different character, though they lead to the same goal of participation in the divine nature and the consequent immortality. They are marked in their beginnings by a wildness and frenzy amounting to madness, which they never wholly lose, though they are greatly tamed and disciplined in the mature culture of the Greek cities. Dionysus himself is not a native deity of the Greeks or of the land before them; he is of Thracian origin, and when he first invades the Greek world, he provokes a mingling of attraction and repulsion and wins his way against bitter opposition. His devotees are mastered by a religious intoxication, by a sacred madness. They wear the hides or horns of animals, and course wildly over the mountain trails and pastures by night to the sound of flutes and the shouts of "Evoe." Springs of water and of wine break out beside them, and honey drops from the woven myrtle wands (thyrsoi) which they bear. Demeter is the goddess of the grain, and of nature in its cultivated aspects; Dionysus is the god of the vine, and of nature in her wildness, her untamed savagery. His "Maenads" (mad women) come upon a flock of sheep or goats, slay them, tear them to pieces with their hands, and devour them raw; sometimes it is an unhappy man, spying on their revels in a spirit hostile to the god and to the Bacchic rites, who is thus encountered and slain and devoured. In all this savagery, it is the spirit of the god himself that possesses the devotees; and it is he himself, incarnate in the beast or the man who is devoured, on whom the worshipers feed and whom they take into themselves.

The night revels on the mountains, the devouring of raw flesh, the savage frenzies of which the older stories tell, had ceased to be practiced by the Greeks long before the Alexandrian age. The mysteries are celebrated by private brotherhoods which are often companies of artists, musicians, or craftsmen, and sometimes, especially in Pythagorean circles in Western Hellas (Sicily and S Italy), schools of philosophers and statesmen. It is held among them that the rites and doctrines have been laid down in ancient times by Orpheus. Of most significance is the "Orphic" doctrine of the soul as the divine element in man, buried in the body as in a tomb and attaining its full freedom and purity only when it is delivered from the sepulchre of the body. The crude and savage myth of Dionysus-Zagreus is related both to the wild frenzies of the early cult and to the developed doctrine of the soul. Dionysus, child of Zeus by Semele, is torn to pieces and devoured by the Titans; the Titans are blasted by the lightning of Zeus, and out of their ashes is created man, who thus possesses a dual nature—part divine and part titanic, mutually hostile. The soul, the divine part that derives from Dionysus, can be set free from its unnatural union with the titanic nature only as it is liberated from the body; but it can be progressively purified of its defilements by ascetic disciplines, especially by abstinence from flesh, by ritual purifications, and by sacramental rites, often of a magical character. It can pass through a cycle of existences and experience reincarnation in various forms; there is a Purgatory in which the last defilements can be removed; and the soul can finally proclaim that it has escaped from the "sorrowful weary wheel," that it is of the "blessed race" of the gods, and that it has entered into immortality. This doctrine appealed to some of the noblest of the Greeks. Pythagoras was its greatest convert, and his disciples were organized as Orphic thiasoi. It profoundly influenced Pindar, in whose poetry it has found moving expression; and it underlies the doctrine of the soul which is set forth by Plato in the Phaedo and the Phaedrus. Indirectly also it has played a great part in the historical development of Christian ideas of the soul.

6. Ruler cults and deification. The practice of according divine honors to sovereigns is one of the most conspicuous features of public religion in the period. In part this was a device of statecraft, a political scheme for giving the support of religious sanctions to a naked military dictatorship; and in part it was facilitated by oriental ideas of the divinity of kings, especially the Egyptian recognition of the Pharaoh as the "living Horus," the son of Osiris, a veritable incarnation of the divine powers. But these were secondary and subsidiary factors. From the earliest times the Greeks themselves had accorded divine honors to men who had distinguished themselves by outstanding services to their fellows or by exceptional exploits in war. Such honors were not, indeed, rendered to their rulers; but it was a general custom for the founders of cities or of colonies to be honored with a public cult after death. These, as a rule, remained local observances, but as manifestations of religion they are not essentially different from the cult accorded to mythical or semimythical "heroes" such as Theseus at Athens or Bellerophon at Corinth; and closely related to these are cults of wide appeal such as those of Herakles and of Asclepius, the deified physician. In all of them is reflected the feeling that the nature of man is akin to the nature of the gods, that a kind of concentration of divine virtue is manifested in the exceptional man; and the not ignoble thought that the nature of the divine is most truly revealed in the nature of man at its highest and best. Something of this feeling appears again in the legend that Plato was conceived in the womb of his mother through a visitation of Apollo, in the veneration of his image by his disciples of the first generation, and in the dedication of an altar to him by Aristotle. Moreover, the political theories of both Plato and Aristotle had envisaged the ideal ruler as a man whose gifts lifted him above the common human stature, above the restraints of the law which applied to others, a man who walked among mortals as a god.

These hero cults were not rendered in the Greek world to living men, but to the mighty dead who were held to have attained immortality. Lysander alone, victor in the decisive battle of Aegospotami (406 B.C.), which ended the maritime supremacy of Athens, was accorded honors akin to those of the heroes. The Spartans set up his statue among a group of gods at Delphi, in the memorial which they dedicated after the victory; several cities erected altars to him; games and festivals were instituted in his honor. In 336, Philip of Macedon had his own statue carried in procession with those of the twelve gods of Olympus. It remained for Alexander to claim in full measure for himself the status of a god among men. He traced his descent from Zeus through Herakles and Achilles; at the Oasis of Ammon in the Western Desert, he had himself formally recognized as son of the supreme Egyptian deity, whom the Greeks identified with Zeus; at Susa, he received from his Persian subjects the reverence (προσκύνησις) which they were accustomed to offer to their own sovereigns, but sought in vain to extort the same servile homage from Macedonians and Greeks. Nonetheless, a certain recognition of his divinity was made by the Greek cities when they gave the title of theoroi to the envoys whom they sent to his court, for this was reserved for officials charged with religious functions such as inquiries of the Delphic oracle. After his death his corpse was carried to Memphis by Ptolemy, then satrap of Egypt; and he was given a cult and a priesthood, which were in the next reign transferred to Alexandria.

The earliest Ptolemies do not seem to have received divine honors in their lifetime, but were honored after death as the "Savior Gods, Brother Gods, Manifest Gods." By the fifth generation they have come to terms with the Egyptian priesthoods and have been admitted to the traditional place of the Pharaohs in the state religion. The first Seleucids were likewise deified after death—Seleucus I as Zeus the Victor (Nicator) and Antiochus I as Apollo the Savior. But Antiochus II styles himself Theos (God), and Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) regards himself and receives worship as the manifest form of a deity (Apollo or Zeus). Most remarkable of all, perhaps, violet-crowned Athens herself votes divine honors to Demetrius Poliorcetes ("the Besieger"), the greatest sea captain of the age, in gratitude and admiration for his prowess in freeing the city from the rule of Demetrius of Phalerum and the Macedonian pretender Cassander (307 B.C.). By a decree of the Athenian assembly, Demetrius and his father Antigonus are hailed as "savior gods"; their arrival is likened to the coming of Demeter and Dionysus; an altar to Demetrius Kataibates ("the Alighter") is erected on the spot where he descended from his chariot; pictures of him and his father are woven into the Peplos, the great Robe of Athena, among the likenesses of the gods. In a hymn composed for him in 290, he is lauded as the only god, the son of Poseidon and Aphrodite; while the other gods are far away or have no ears to hear or take no thought for Athens, Demetrius is beheld in his living presence, not in wood or stone; and to him they pray: "Give us peace, Beloved."

When Rome began to extend her conquests into the kingdoms of the Eastern Mediterranean, she was still a republic without any permanent head. Altars and temples were now dedicated by the Hellenistic cities to Rome, the city-goddess, the personification of the Roman state or people. And even in republican times governors were given priesthoods, and cultic observances were ordained in their honor. The ruler cult was transferred to the great proconsuls. The successive war lords of the first century B.C.—Sulla, Pompey, Julius Caesar, Antony—were flattered in the same ways. Caesar is addressed by the cities of Asia as the "God Manifest, sprung from Ares and Aphrodite, the common Savior of the life of men." It was a matter of course that, once the civil wars were ended, the victor should be accorded no lesser honors. Cities were eager for the privilege of building temples to Augustus; and he is given the highest titles of divinity—God and Savior, Zeus Eleutherios, Apollo Eleutherios, the Lord. Games were instituted in his honor, and sacrifices offered on his altars.

7. Fortune and Fate; astral religion and astrology; magic. The ruler cult was the religion of success, the deification of power and will in the men who shaped events and determined the course of history. Such titles as "Savior" and "Benefactor" (Soter, Euergetes) were given partly in flattery, partly in hope; though in part, especially in the case of Augustus, they expressed the gratitude of war-weary peoples to the man who had brought at long last an era of peace. But to many men of those disordered times, it seemed as if success and failure were apportioned by impersonal cosmic forces, mightier far than the war lords, and making sport of the farsighted schemes of statesmen. To some it appeared that chance ruled the world; the supreme deity was Tyche (Τύχη, "Fortune"). The cities of Greece had begun to institute cults of Tyche early in the fourth century, and in Hellenistic times she becomes the city-goddess almost everywhere, in place of the older patron deities such as Athena Polias. She is represented in sculpture under a form created by Eutychides for the Tyche of Antioch ca. 300 B.C. Fortune was a capricious goddess, lifting a man to the heights today and dashing his pride tomorrow. There was no security for the wise in his wisdom, for the rich in his wealth, for the righteous man in his integrity, or for the mighty in his strength; all alike were at the mercy of Fortune. On the other side, the defeated could hope that the turn of her wheel might bring him victory, the destitute that he would lay hands on a windfall, and the man of low degree that he might be lifted to eminence. "Speak no more of Mind," writes Menander (ca. 300 B.C.), "for the human mind is nothing, while that of Tyche—whether this be a divine breath [πνεῦμα] or a mind—this it is that directs the course of all things and causes every turn and saves all things; but mortal forethought is vapor and vanity" (Fragment 482).

To others the ruling power was Fate ('Ανάγκη, "Necessity"; or 'Ειμαρμένη, "Destiny"), governing all things with the iron rod of determinism. Fate might be conceived as an all-wise Providence, or even personified as the will of Zeus; but man was still left with the sense of helplessness and frustration, subject to the decrees of a power that no supplication could move and no wisdom circumvent.

This conviction of the all-embracing rule of Fate received strong support from the star worship which was introduced into the Greek world in the fourth century; and still more from the concomitant progress of astrology, which made significant advances over the Greek world in the third century, and by 150 B.C. had become one of the chief preoccupations of scientists and philosophers. The notion that the heavenly bodies are divine is by no means unknown to the Greeks of earlier times; it was reckoned to Anaxagoras for gross impiety that he held the sun and the moon to be mere stone and earth; but this belief did not find expression in cultic observances, apart from some rites of the sun and the moon (Helios and Selene) of minor importance. Plato (or one of his immediate disciples) in the Epinomis recognizes that the knowledge of the astral deities has been borrowed by the Greeks from non-Greeks, but is confident that "the Greeks will learn to worship them in a truly nobler and more righteous fashion," and holds that they "must be named first as the visible gods, and the greatest, most worshipful, and clear-sighted of them all" (secs. 988A, 984D). The home of the astral religion was Babylonia, where the worship of the "host of heaven" had been practiced from a remote antiquity. From Babylonia, star worship spread into Syria and Egypt, and so over the whole of the Greek and Roman world. Chaldean astrologers, often charlatans playing on the credulity of the masses, but sometimes prophets of the astral religion, won followers in all lands; and astrology took captive the highest thought of mankind.

The Greek mind had been prepared for the invasion of astralism by the speculations of the Pythagoreans, of Plato in his later years, and of Aristotle. In the unchanging regularity of the courses of the heavenly bodies they perceived evidences of true divinity. In the fourth century, the astronomer Eudoxus of Cnidus and the botanist Theophrastus speak with skeptical wonder of the Chaldean horoscopes, by which they profess to foretell not only the weather but also the future of individuals and of nations. Ca. 280, the Babylonian Berossus opened a school of astrology on the island of Cos, and published a treatise on its doctrines. In the second century, astrology became one of the main preoccupations of Greek philosophy and science. Carneades the Skeptic exposed its weaknesses, and Panaetius, the greatest Stoic teacher of the time, rejected it; but Stoicism generally treated it as an integral part of its doctrine of Providence. Hipparchus of Nicaea, the unrivaled master of mathematics and astronomy, gave it his unqualified support, and indeed assured its future triumph by refuting the heliocentric theory of Aristarchus of Samos, which would have cut away its roots. The basic textbooks of the system were brought out in Egypt around the middle of the second century under the names of Nechepso-Petosiris and of Hermes Trismegistus, the name given by the Greeks to the Egyptian deity Thoth, the scribe of the gods and the revealer of the sciences and arts and of all occult wisdom. Posidonius of Apamea, disciple and successor of Panaetius and teacher of Cicero, the guiding and representative genius of the first century B.C., incorporated astrology into his system of Platonized Stoicism and made it the queen of the sciences. The dominion thus secured was to endure for centuries.

Astrology combined the appeal of science with that of religion. The casting of horoscopes was an exacting scientific task, requiring an advanced proficiency in astronomy and mathematics; the professional practitioners were not unjustifiably known as "mathematicians." Once their presuppositions were granted, their methods were rigorously scientific; and the utmost confidence was placed in their predictions. If they were falsified by the event, the mistake could always be attributed to the dishonesty of the astrologer, to an error in computation, or to a failure to take into account all the complex factors; the validity of the method was not called in question, any more than the science of medicine is discredited today by errors in diagnosis. The exact science which could predict with infallible accuracy the eclipses of the sun and the moon lent its authority to the prediction of events in human life.

In its Hellenized form, astrology was based upon the doctrine of universal "sympathy" (συμπάθεια τῶν ὅλων). The heavens and the earth are so bound together in a unity of all life that whatever comes to pass in the higher world is exactly reproduced in the lower. But as the heavenly bodies are divinities, it is their movements that determine the events of earth. Influences emanating from the stars flow continually upon men, shaping the character and destiny of every individual and the fate of every nation. The horoscope that shows the configuration of the heavens at the moment of a man's birth can be interpreted to reveal the exact number of days that he is destined to live, and the fortunes that will attend him. Thus astrology carries with it an absolute fatalism, inflexible as the courses of the stars.

Within this system, the planets are the governing powers. Among them are reckoned the sun and the moon, as well as the five true planets known to ancient astronomy—Ares, Hermes, Zeus, Aphrodite, and Cronos (or, to give them their more familiar Latin names—Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn). Each planet is so identified with the god whose name it bears as to share his mythological personality and impart it to the individual born while it is in the ascendant. Thus Ares-Mars imparts martial qualities; Zeus-Jupiter (Jove) makes a man jovial; the irresistible influences of Venus provide an excuse for amorous adventures; the moon makes for lunacy; and so forth. The seven-day planetary week was established in this age; each planet had its day in turn, to which it gave its name—the names which we still employ in their Teutonic equivalents. Time itself becomes a god (Aeon), and all its subdivisions are deified—the Months and the Seasons, the Hours and the Days. More and more the Sun came to be regarded as the leader of the heavenly host, the supreme and dominant Intelligence of the cosmos. In its highest form, this doctrine teaches that the Sun is the visible symbol of the supreme Mind, the glorious image of the invisible fiery essence that is the spirit of the universe. The syncretistic and monotheistic tendencies in ancient religion lead under the direction of astrology toward a solar pantheism.

The astral religion had profound effects in the whole domain of religious thought. It changed the very conception of deity, and it promoted a new conception of the origin and destiny of the human soul. The divine stars might be given the names of the traditional gods, but they were not burdened with the traditional anthropomorphism and the immorality of the myths. The unceasing regularity of their movements was a token of the perfect order, harmony, and intelligence which reigned among them. And they were eternal. The traditional gods were indeed immortal (ἀθάνατοι, "deathless"), but they had their beginnings and were the descendants of an older race which had held the supremacy before them. The stars were the same yesterday and today and forever, eternal and unchanging. And the human soul was a fragment of the same fiery essence. Driven by some compulsion, it had descended from its ethereal home to be entombed for a time in an earthly body and to contract the defilements of earth. Its high destiny was to return to its starry abode, purging itself of its defilements by stages as it passed through the seven spheres ruled by the seven planets, till it attained the unmingled light of the heaven of heavens. The life to come is no longer conceived as that of strengthless shades in a gloomy underworld, but as that of pure spirits liberated from every burden to enjoy the bliss of an astral paradise. And for many, the contemplation of the stars seemed to give foretastes of this eternal joy. A mystic ecstasy possessed them as they felt themselves rapt in a sublime communion with the divinities in the heavens, and knew that in their inmost selves they were akin to the gods.

Despite these brighter aspects, astrology was, broadly speaking, a burden to the mind of man, by reason of its overpowering fatalism. The Stoic might hold it the part of a wise man to see in the decrees of Fate the wisdom of an all-ruling Providence, and to learn submission, even to find joy and freedom in submission, to make his will one with the universal will which could in no case be deflected. But mankind generally sought escape from the iron clasp of Destiny. Some hoped to win release through the mysteries, by dedication to some god who was mightier even than Fate. And far more had recourse to magic. Amulets and incantations, rites and spells, invocations of gods of outlandish names—these could always be provided by the practitioners of the magic arts to ward off a baneful influence of one's evil star, or even to prolong one's days beyond the appointed term. The great numbers of magical papyri that have been found and published, and the countless amulets and charms, show clearly enough the prevalence of the resort to magic by all classes of the population, and prepare us for the statement of the first Christian historian that when the practitioners of Ephesus brought their books of magic to burn them publicly at the preaching of Paul, the value of them was calculated at fifty thousand pieces of silver (Acts 19:19).

8. The philosophical schools. The primary feature of the post-Aristotelian philosophy is that it is no longer concerned with the city-state and with the life of man within the community of his city, but with man as an individual in the mighty cosmos, the one eternal city common to gods and men, of which any earthly state could be only a shadow. The city-state was in decline even when Plato and Aristotle were elaborating political systems which viewed the life of man wholly in terms of his place in the corporate life of the city. With the clearest realization of the faults, weaknesses, and limitations of every city known to them (and Aristotle is said to have studied the constitutions of over one hundred), they still thought of man as a ζῶον πολιτικόν (Aristotle's phrase)—a "living being formed for the life of the city"; and they inquired into the ends of his life in relation to the manifold scope for every kind of activity afforded by the city, and sought in their political theory to frame the constitution of a city in which man might live life to the full. The events of the fourth century shattered the ancient pattern of the autonomous city beyond repair, and at the same time brought men into an incomparably vaster political structure, which in the time of Alexander included all the cities of Greece and the sprawling empires of Western and Central Asia, stretching from the Adriatic Sea to the frontiers of India and seeming to embrace the whole of mankind. Neither this undigested and unstable empire of Alexander nor the vast imperial states which succeeded it could in any sense replace the city as the focus of man's loyalties and the theater of his moral and spiritual life. The philosophers of Hellenistic times could make nothing of limited loyalties of nation or of class, nor could they profitably point man toward the fulfilment of life in relation to a corporate system within which he had no longer any real significance. These military autocracies administered by permanent officials could not be envisaged as the locus of man's highest life. The task now was to establish the significance of the individual in himself, apart from any social nexus, and to point out a way of attaining the good life without the supports and opportunities of a social order. The main concern of thought is the theory and practice of ethics, and that, the ethics of the autonomous individual.

a. Decline of the older schools; Skepticism in the Academy. As in religion the old cults survived, so in philosophy the great schools which Plato and Aristotle had founded, the Academy and the Lyceum respectively, continued their activity, but with diminishing vitality and with slight influence upon the general mind. The Peripatetics, as the members of the Lyceum were called, devoted themselves mainly to descriptive work in the natural sciences, to the accumulation and study of flora and fauna from the conquered regions of the East, to the making of libraries, and to encyclopedic work of various kinds. Theophrastus, the greatest botanist of antiquity, and Demetrius of Phalerum, who founded the great library of Alexandria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, were both Peripatetics. The Academy devoted its energies chiefly to dialectic, and became little more than a parasite on other schools, content to expose the logical fallacies and absurdities of Epicurean and Stoic doctrine and to profess an ultimate skepticism about the very possibility of knowledge. Their criticisms were acute and penetrating, especially those of Carneades, the great master of the Middle Academy (ca. 150 B.C.); but as they had nothing constructive to offer, they went largely unheeded, except insofar as they forced some modifications in Stoic theory. The influence of Plato, always very great, was not exercised through his successors in the Academy, but through his own writings, which continued to be widely read.

b. The Cynics. The Cynic philosophers never formed an organized school like the Academy or the Lyceum, but were rather a succession of solitary prophets, preaching the pursuit of individual freedom by the disregard of everything but wisdom and virtue, challenging all the conventions of society and all the superstitions of religion, and calling upon men to follow no law but that of nature. Antisthenes, the first of the line, a disciple of Socrates and a contemporary of Plato, struck out the lines of conduct and the ruling theories that were to characterize the Cynic teachers. An ascetic frugality satisfied with the barest necessities of existence; a complete disregard for pain; scorn of every kind of luxury and ostentation; and mordant criticism of human follies, weaknesses, and vanities marked his daily life. All the conventions of society, even its graces and manners, came under his lash. He held that wisdom and virtue were the only things to be desired, and thought of himself as a Herakles, wrestling incessantly and enduring endless labors in the pursuit of virtue. He felt that he had a mission, under a divine compulsion, to tear away the shams of life and to expose every kind of hypocrisy and humbug. His searing rebukes he compared to the bitter remedies which a physician prescribes for the healing of his patients; and he anticipates an element of the gospel story in his reply to those who criticized him for keeping company with evil men. "Physicians too are with the sick," he said, "but they do not catch the fever."

But the name of Antisthenes has been almost forgotten in the greater fame of his disciple Diogenes, who, with his home in a tub, his lantern, his staff and his beggar's wallet, and his biting retorts to great and small, became a legend in his own lifetime. The name Cynic (κυνικός, from κύων, "dog") was applied first to him in revulsion against his practice of performing his natural functions in public, like a dog, wherever he happened to be. This and other grotesque and offensive behavior was to him the consistent application of the maxim that virtue consists in living according to nature; such actions did not keep the Athenians from esteeming him highly, or detract from his power of winning men by his discourse. His challenging way of life seemed to offer a kind of armor against Fortune; caring nothing for the gifts that Fortune could bring, he cared nothing for the reverses that she might have in store. The name of "dog" he would not reject; when Alexander introduced himself as "Alexander the great King," Diogenes replied: "And I am Diogenes the Dog." But he thought of himself as the hound of Zeus, commissioned to rebuke the faults of mankind and to turn men's hearts to virtue—the true virtue which wisdom teaches, not the sham virtue of current convention.

The Cynics, like Socrates, would not leave men alone. Theirs was no cloistered philosophy, but an aggressive missionary appeal which preached in the market place and the crossroads, using every means to compel men to listen. In the long run, their influence on the world was mediated chiefly through Stoicism, a philosophy at once more comprehensive and more humane, equally insistent on virtue as the only good, but less stringent in its demands on human nature. And for their street preaching, they developed the form known as the diatribe, which was inherited by the early Christian preachers of the gospel, especially for moral exhortation.

c. The Stoics. The Stoic philosophy derives its name from the Painted Stoa ("porch," or more properly "colonnade") in the agora of Athens, where the founder of the school, the Cypriot Zeno, lectured to his disciples from ca. 304 B.C. to his death in 263. Under a succession of able exponents, continuing over a period of five hundred years, it became far and away the most influential of all philosophies of the time, and for the majority of cultivated men it virtually occupied the whole sphere of religion.

Zeno began his philosophical work as a disciple of the Cynic Crates, but in his developed system he found a means of relating the unbridled individualism of the Cynic to universal principles. He continued to build on the principle that virtue is the highest—indeed, the only—good; and that virtuous living consists in living in conformity with nature; but he combined with this the doctrine that the essential nature of the individual is one with the essential nature of the universe. The individual who would live in accordance with his own nature must therefore live in accordance with that right reason (Logos) which is the governing principle of all things, and may be called Zeus, or Providence, or Destiny. Zeno is as radical as any Cynic in his criticism of conventional morality, of social sham, and of standards of conduct that are accepted merely because they are traditional. All things must be brought to the test of Reason, but Reason is a universal principle, at once the soul of the world and the soul of man, a general law to which all things are subject. Freedom for man is not, therefore, the arbitrary rejection of every restraint, but the voluntary acceptance of the universal will which must be obeyed by all whether they will it or not. So we have a famous prayer of Cleanthes, the disciple and successor of Zeno: "Lead me, O Zeus, and thou, O Destiny, whithersoever I am appointed by you to go; for I will follow you without delay. And though I be unwilling to go, because I have fallen into wrongdoing—I will follow, nonetheless." To this the Roman Seneca added the line which became a proverb: "The Fates lead him who is willing; they constrain him who is unwilling."

Accepting Destiny as the rule of a wise and beneficent Providence, the Stoic has no concern for changes in his outward circumstances. Reverses of fortune are matters of indifference to him, for they are determined by the creative reason which rules all things and is one with the reason enthroned in his own heart; and they do not impair the integrity of his inward self. By a rigorous self-discipline, he has cultivated an apathy (ἀπάθεια) which renders him insensitive to pain and pleasure, success and misfortune. He has learned, in whatsoever state he is, to be self-sufficient (αὐτάρκης).

The Stoic could speak of man, in Aristotle's phrase, as a ζῶον πολιτικόν—a "living being formed for the life of the city"; but the true city of his habitation was nothing less than the universe itself, the "City of God" (of Zeus), the "home common to gods and men, of which both are citizens." Zeno may himself have been directly influenced by Alexander the Great's noble vision of Concord (ὁμόνοια), of a union of hearts which should transcend the ancient prejudices of race. More probably, king and philosopher alike grasped something which was in the very air of the times, which corresponded to the realities of the age. At all events, the Stoic conception of Reason as the determining principle in man abstracted from the individual everything that belonged to race or social status (and, indeed, everything that characterized him as an individual), to fix wholly upon that which he shared in some measure with every other man and with the universe itself. The one distinction that matters is the distinction of wisdom and folly—of virtuous living in keeping with the right reason (ὀρθός λόγος) which governs all things, and of senseless rebellion which issues in wickedness. It is a Stoic inspiration that prompts the words of Menander: "No man is an alien to me, if he be a good man; Nature is one in all men, and it is character that establishes kinship" (Fragment 602). Such a philosophy, it may be remarked, was admirably suited —was, indeed, imperatively demanded—to meet the needs of vast empires, which could not found a lasting system of government upon the superiority of one race. Stoic philosophers became the confidants and advisers of kings and emperors; and in the second century A.D. a Stoic philosopher, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, himself ascended the imperial throne.

The Stoic conception of deity owed nothing to the popular religion of Greece. The divine is a material substance which permeates the whole of things. It may be described as spirit (πνεῦμα), but in this terminology spirit is itself a material substance—air or breath—moving through all things and holding them in unity by a certain power of tension (τονικὴ δύναμις). It is the germinative reason (σπερματικὸς λόγος), the general law, the providence (πρόνοια) or destiny (εἱμαρμένη) which governs all things with wisdom and goodness. The Stoic deity is essentially pantheistic and impersonal, even though the language (especially in Cleanthes and Epictetus) is often charged with the fervor of deep personal devotion. The name of Zeus may be used as a symbol, and the gods of the nations may be regarded as symbols of different aspects or activities of the one universal Power; and the myths may be interpreted as allegories of the divine nature; Stoicism thus accommodates itself to the popular religion rather than attacking it. Still more readily it accommodates itself to astrology, for it finds its own doctrine of Destiny or Providence confirmed by the unvarying regularity of the stars in their courses. If all things are predetermined, it is no long step to hold that they can be predicted, and the way is open for divination of every kind. But there is no thought of a personal deity who can aid man or comfort him. There is nothing greater than the spark of divinity within himself, a fragment of the fiery substance which is the soul of the world. "You are primary; you are a particle [ἀπόσπασμα] of God; you have within you something which is a part of him" (Epictetus Discourses II.8.10). See also STOICS.

d. The Epicureans. Epicurus, the founder of this school, settled in Athens in 306 B.C. after a few years of teaching philosophy in other cities, and there he remained for the rest of his life (died 270), in the company of the friends who gathered around him in his famous Garden. His school is often called the Garden, as that of Zeno is called the Porch (Stoa). For him, the one end of human life was happiness, or sweetness (ἡδονή), and he taught that this was to be found through knowledge of the true nature of things, which would deliver men from fear (fear of the gods and fear of death), the destroyer of all happiness; through withdrawal from public activity of every kind into a life of quiet obscurity (λάθε βίωσας, "live unnoticed"); through the cultivation of an inward calm that nothing can shake (ἀταραξία, "tranquillity," or better, "imperturbability"); and through friendship (φιλία).

The interests and aims of Epicurus were wholly practical, not in the least speculative. Holding that "pleasure is the beginning and the end of living the blessed life" (Epicurus to Menoeceus 128), he framed all his doctrines with a view to teaching men how to live pleasurably. Virtue is not itself the end, for even virtue is not pursued for its own sake, but for the sake of happiness, as medicines are taken not for their own sake but to promote health. At times, this line of thought leads him to view justice as nothing more than expediency, and even to hold that "injustice is not evil in itself, but only in the fear that it arouses out of the notion that it will be discovered by the avengers appointed to deal with such matters" (Kyriai Doxai 34). Yet he also teaches that the only happy life is the life of virtue. "Prudence teaches that it is not possible to live pleasurably without living prudently, nobly, and justly; nor to live prudently, nobly, and justly without living pleasurably; for the virtues are organically united with the life of pleasure, and the life of pleasure is inseparable from them" (Epicurus to Menoeceus 132; cf. Kyriai Doxai 5).

The pleasure he sets as the end of life is not ignobly conceived. It is not to be found in endless revelry, love-making, feasting on the best foods, or other self-indulgence, but in "sober reasoning, searching out the causes of every choice and every rejection, and banishing the notions through which the greatest tumult possesses the souls of men" (Epicurus to Menoeceus 132). He and his circle lived frugally and despised luxury and extravagance.

Among the notions that must be banished as the cause of tumults in the soul, the first place belongs to the common beliefs about the gods. Epicurus would make no terms with the popular religion. Gods indeed there are, but they are not such as the multitudes believe. They dwell far off in the spaces between the worlds and take no thought for mankind; they live the life of undisturbed tranquillity, which is the perfection of happiness and the goal of the wise man's aspiration. Such beings, blessed and incorruptible, have no troubles in themselves and bring no troubles on others. They are not to be dreaded, as if they were maleficent, nor is there any need to placate them with sacrifices and offerings; the worship of the wise man will be wholly adoration. The astral deities have no more to be said for them than the gods of the popular religion; the stars are not divine beings, but masses of fire. The Stoic conception of Destiny as the supreme divinity is absurd; the wise man "laughs to scorn the Destiny which is introduced by some as the mistress of all things." No conscious wisdom moves and directs the world; everything is sufficiently explained through mechanical causation.

The physical theories of Epicurus, largely based upon the atomism of Democritus, are elaborated for the sole purpose of showing that no divine intervention need be postulated to account for the world or the heavens or for anything that takes place within them. He is not interested in natural science for its own sake; he affirms that if men had never been affected with fear at such things as storms, eclipses, falling stars, etc., there would never have been any need to study natural science. He offers a variety of physical explanations of natural phenomena, but one contents him as much as another. He wants only to dispel the notion that these things take place at the command or by the design and will of any divinity. The movement of the atoms accounts for everything, even for the invariable recurrences of the courses of the stars.

The fear of death is removed by the doctrine that death is extinction. The soul, like the body, is composed of atoms; and with the death of the body, the soul disintegrates into the atoms of which it is composed. Death is the end of sentient existence; the terrors of the afterlife vanish as unreal. And with the fear of death, most of the fears that haunt men in life are banished also. "There is nothing to be dreaded in life by him who has truly grasped that there is nothing to be dreaded in ceasing to live" (Epicurus to Menoeceus 125). The hope of immortality is gladly abandoned for the sake of abolishing all dread of what may follow death; and it is even suggested that the sweetness of life is prized all the more highly, when "men seek the fruits not of the longest but of the sweetest time" (ibid. 126). See also EPICUREANS.

e. Theosophy and Gnosis. From about the beginning of the first century B.C., rationalism enters upon a long decline in the Greek world. There is evidence of a spreading disillusionment with philosophy as an avenue to apprehension of the truth, combined with a growing demand for authority, for a revelation. Along with this comes a new concern for the soul, and the truth that is sought is the truth that will enable the soul to attain its high destiny. Since the time of Plato and even earlier, many Greeks had come to think of the soul as something distinct from the body, belonging to a higher order of existence, endowed with powers of reason and insight which are impaired and held in check by the association with the body. In the later Hellenistic times, there is a growing conviction that the soul is a divine essence which has somehow fallen into an evil condition; as this belief becomes widely dominant, it has profound effects on philosophy and religion, determining the objectives of both. The interest in ethics, which had been the chief concern of Zeno and Epicurus and indeed of all the schools, is subordinated to the quest for the salvation of the soul, and this salvation is conceived in terms of the freeing of the soul from the bondage of the body and its ascent to the realm of pure divine being, its true home.

The dialogues of Plato contributed in no small measure to this development. In the Phaedo (64B-67D), philosophy is described as a "practice of dying" (μελέτη θανάτου), on the ground that it seeks the release, or loosing, or separation, of the soul from the body (ἀπαλλαγή, λῦσις, χωρισμὸς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ σώματος); and again in the Theaetetus, in a digression on the contemplative life (172C-176C), the aim of the philosopher is seen as a "flight" (φυγή) from mortality and an assimilation to God insofar as this is possible (ὁμοίωσις τῷ θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν). In this later period, the Academy shakes itself loose from its long alliance with Skepticism, and turning to the mystical element in Plato, sets out on the long road to Plotinus and the Neoplatonic mysticism which was to make inestimable contributions to the mystical theology of the church through the following centuries. In this school, Reason never wholly lost her rightful throne, though after Plotinus she is forced into an uneasy coupling with mediumistic divination and the strangely enticing techniques of theurgy, which is nothing else than the direction of magical practices toward religious ends.

Neo-Pythagoreanism has a widening vogue. Less a philosophical school than an association of religious communities, it presents Pythagoras as a divinely inspired sage, even as a divinity—Apollo himself. His wisdom is transmitted orally as an esoteric doctrine, guarded in the circles of his disciples; every discussion is ended with his ipse dixit (αὐτὸς ἔφα). Even Plato, it is alleged, was a disciple of Pythagoras, and his philosophical doctrines rest, not upon the cogency of his dialectic, but upon the authority of the prophetic word of Pythagoras. This school makes much of a mysticism of numbers, imposes a strict vegetarianism, teaches a doctrine of transmigration, and holds that in this life the body is the prison house in which the soul is confined to do penance for faults committed in a former existence.

But in the general estimation the sages of Greece were held to be far inferior to the wise men of the Orient; it was widely supposed that Egypt, Chaldea, Persia, India, were depositories of an ancient wisdom and that the wisest of the Greeks were mere children beside the priests of Re, the Magi, the "Gymnosophists" of India; for some, Judea too was a home of wisdom. Pythagoras, Democritus, Plato—all the teachers of Greece were now imagined to have sat at the feet of Eastern teachers. Babylonian and Persian sages—Ostanes and Zoroaster—were now given as the authors of theosophical treaties. Hermes Trismegistus (the Egyptian deity Thoth in his Greek dress), already the source of astrological lore, is now presented as the revealer of saving truth in a theosophical literature which ranges from the loftiest and purest mystical philosophy to alchemy and magic. The sacred book, venerated and accorded authority in proportion to its antiquity, is the vehicle of all these Eastern revelations. In such an atmosphere, Jewish and Christian apologists make much of the supposed antiquity of the OT scriptures. Moses was centuries older than Plato, hence far more authoritative; indeed, Plato learned from his writings, and the Platonic philosophy is already to be found in the book of Genesis. A Neo-Pythagorean of the second century A.D. (Numenius) is willing to admit that Plato is nothing else than an "Atticizing Moses."

All the theosophies of these manifold schools may be called "gnostic" in the sense that they teach that knowledge (gnosis)—i.e., knowledge of the revealed doctrine of God, World, and Soul—is itself salvation. The materials employed in the construction are drawn from many quarters; they exhibit again the syncretism which characterizes all the religious thought and activity of the period. Oriental elements from various sources—Iranian, Egyptian, Syrian, Babylonian—are inextricably mingled with the Greek substratum of religious thought, which is itself compounded of Platonic idealism, shamanistic notions of the soul, and some tenets of the Stoic philosophy. Astrology usually enters largely into the mixture. The redemption of the soul is pictured in terms of an ascent through the spheres, guarded as they are by the mighty divinities enthroned in—rather, embodied in—the planets. In a number of the systems—most of them hardly deserve such a name—the planet-divinities are hostile powers who seek to resist the ascent of the soul; the true deity is high above them all, wholly transcendental, invisible, unknowable except insofar as he chooses to make himself known. It is sometimes taught that the soul cannot escape from this material world except through the intervention of a redeemer who descends through the spheres and returns victorious over the planets who control them—"the world Rulers of this present darkness" (Eph. 6:12).

The Gnostic systems which constituted a great danger to Christianity throughout the second century belong within this general climate of religious thought; in another sense, the same might be said of Catholic Christianity as well, though the differences are radical. The Christian (heretical) Gnostics turned Christ into a mythological figure, making him one of the emanations which they conceived as mediators between the supreme God, essentially incapable of contact with the material universe, and the human soul, essentially one with the divine, but imprisoned in a material body as the consequence of some accident within the divine pleroma. Paul is evidently dealing with some incipient form of such Gnosticism when he affirms that Christ is the "image of the invisible God," and that "in him all the fulness [pleroma] of God was pleased to dwell" (Col. 1:15, 19). And the church never failed to hold to the essential unity of the spiritual and the material—things visible and things invisible are alike the creation of the one God, the Father Almighty; and all his creation is good.

Bibliography. Sources: The sources include practically all the extant literature of the period, together with many thousands of inscriptions and papyri and masses of archaeological material from the excavations of sacred sites all over the Near East. Pausanias' Description of Greece (trans. with extensive annotations by J. G. Frazer; 6 vols.; 1890) is a mine of information about the religious antiquities of the second century A.D.; Strabo's Geography adds much local detail from a century earlier. Excellent selections of epigraphic material are found in W. Dittenberger, Orientis Graecae Inscriptiones Selectae (2 vols.; 1903-5); Sylloge Inscriptionum Graecarum (4 vols.; 3rd ed., 1915-24); and in C. Michel, Recueil d'Inscriptions Grecques (1900; Suppléments, 1912, 1927). A representative selection of papyri with English translations is available in A. S. Hunt and C. C. Edgar, eds., Select Papyri (2 vols.; 1932-34). For a wider range of documents in English translation, see E. Bevan, Later Greek Religion (1927); F. C. Grant, Hellenistic Religions (1953); E. Barker, From Alexander to Constantine (1956). For illustration, see J. Leipoldt, Die Religionen in der Umwelt des Urchristentums (1926), in H. Haas, ed., Bilderatlas zur Religionsgeschichte.

General works: L. Gernet and A. Boulanger, Le Genie Grec dans la Religion (1932), pt. III. M. Nilsson, Geschichte der Griechischen Religion, vol. II: "Die hellenistische und römische Zeit" (1950), is incomparable in scope and quality. On the general history and culture, see: P. Wendland, Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur in ihren Beziehungen zu Judentum und Christentum (2nd and 3rd eds., 1912); J. Kaerst, Geschichte des Hellenismus, vol. II (1926); P. Jouguet, Macedonian Imperialism and the Hellenization of the Orient (trans. M. R. Dobie; 1928); M. W. Rostovtzeff, Social and Economic History of the Hellenistic World (3 vols.; 1941); W. W. Tarn, Hellenistic Civilization (3rd ed., rev. G. T. Griffith, 1952).

On the old gods and the old cults (§ 2 above): L. R. Farnell, Cults of the Greek States (5 vols.; 1896-1909); W. K. C. Guthrie, The Greeks and Their Gods (1937); A. B. Cook, Zeus (3 vols.; 1914-40).

On personal religion and on oriental religions in the Greek world (§§ 3-4 above): Apuleius The Golden Ass, especially bk. 11; Plutarch Concerning Isis and Osiris; Sallustius Concerning the Gods and the Universe; R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistische Mysterienreligionen (3rd ed., 1926); F. Cumont, Les Religions Orientales dans le Paganisme Romain (4th ed., 1929; English trans. of 2nd ed., 1911); A. D. Nock, Conversion (1933); K. Prümm, "Mystères," in L. Pirot, A. Robert, and H. Cazelle, eds., Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible, vol. VI, fasc. XXX (1957), cols. 1-225.

On the mystery religions (§ 5 above): See bibliography for §§ 3-4 above; also Euripides The Bacchae; the Homeric Hymn to Demeter; N. Turchi, Fontes historiae mysteriorum aevi hellenistici (1930).

On ruler-worship and deification (§ 6 above): L. R. Farnell, Greek Hero Cults and Ideas of Immortality (1921); M. Nilsson, Geschichte der Griechischen Religion (1950), pp. 125-275; E. Barker, From Alexander to Constantine (1956), Index under "Deification."

On Fortune and Fate, astral religion and astrology, and magic (§ 7 above): F. Cumont, Astrology and Religion Among the Greeks and Romans (1912); F. Boll, Sternglaube und Sterndeutung (4th ed., rev. W. Gundel, 1931); O. Neugebauer, "The History of Ancient Astronomy: Problems and Methods," JNES, IV (1945), 1 ff. Current bibliography in Isis.

On the philosophical schools (§ 8 above): E. Zeller, The Stoics, Epicureans and Sceptics (trans. O. J. Reichel; 1880); E. Caird, The Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers, vol. II (1904); J. Geffcken, Der Ausgang des griechisch-römischen Heidentums (1920); A. M. J. Festugière, La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste (4 vols.; 1944-49); E. R. Dodds, The Greeks and the Irrational (1951); G. Quispel, Gnosis als Weltreligion (1951); H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis (3rd ed., 1955); R. M. Grant, Gnosticism and Early Christianity (1959). See also the bibliographies under EPICUREANS; STOICS.

On the relation of Greek cults and philosophies to Judaism and Christianity: T. R. Glover, The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire (1909); P. Wendland, Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur in ihren Beziehungen zu Judentum und Christentum (2nd and 3rd eds., 1912); A. Deissmann, Licht vom Osten (4th ed. rev., 1923); W. R. Halliday, The Pagan Background of Early Christianity (1925); S. Angus, The Religious Quests of the Graeco-Roman World (1929); R. Bultmann, Primitive Christianity in Its Contemporary Setting (trans. R. H. Fuller; 1956); and nearly all the articles in the Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum.

F. W. BEARE

GREEK VERSIONS. The most important ancient version of the OT is the SEPTUAGINT, which, according to tradition, was made in the third century B.C. by seventy translators at the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus (see VERSIONS, ANCIENT, § 2*a*). Modern Greek translations of both OT and NT (see VERSIONS, MEDIEVAL AND MODERN, § 4) began to appear in the eleventh century. B. M. METZGER

GREEN. The translation of several words, most frequently of ירק. This word generally refers to vegetation (Gen. 1:30; 9:3; Exod. 10:15; Job 39:8; Ps. 37:2). Its derivative ירקרק identifies the yellow-green of gold (Ps. 68:13) or plague spots (Lev. 13:49; 14:37).

The adjective רענן (from the verb רען), which appears occasionally in allusions to places of idolatrous practices (cf. Deut. 12:2; I Kings 14:23; etc.) and is rendered "green," refers primarily to the luxuriance of trees. Elsewhere in the OT, רענן, translated as "green," denotes that which is luxuriant or flourishing and healthy.

Although the terms חי, דשא, לח, אב, and רטב are sometimes construed as "green," their basic reference is to that which is living, growing, fresh, and new, rather than to color.

In the NT, χλωρός is employed to designate the green of vegetation (cf. Mark 6:39; Rev. 8:7; etc.). See also COLORS. C. L. WICKWIRE GREETING. See SALUTATION.

GREYHOUND. KJV translation of זרזיר מתנים (Prov. 30:31; RSV STRUTTING COCK). See COCK; FAUNA § B6*c*.

GRIDDLE [מחבת] (Lev. 2:5). A thick pottery plate with small depressions like a waffle iron. After David's day, when iron became common, this metal was also used for griddles (cf. Ezek. 4:3).

GRIEF. See SUFFERING.

GRINDING. The process by which grain was made into flour by being rubbed between two rough stones, sometimes especially prepared for the purpose, and operated by hand or turned by an animal. See MILL.

GRISLED. KJV archaism used to translate the plural adjective ברדים. See DAPPLED; COLORS.

GROVE. KJV translation of אשרה (RSV ASHERAH) and אשל (Gen. 21:33; RSV TAMARISK).

GUARD [טבח, משמעת, משמר, רץ; κουστωδία (KJV WATCH), σπεκουλάτωρ (Mark 6:27; KJV EXECUTIONER), σωματοφύλαξ; KJV στρατοπεδάρχης (Acts 28:16; cf. RSV)]. A man or body of troops assigned to protect a person or thing.

The word טבח, "guard" (Gen. 37:36; 39:1; 40:3 ff; II Kings 25:8 ff; Jer. 39:9 ff), is derived from the root טבח, "to slaughter," and designates the special troops of an Egyptian or Babylonian king; the connection of meaning is uncertain, though it has been plausibly conjectured that the royal guard originally also prepared the sacrificial food for the king. The Israelite royal guard was called רצים (lit., "runners"—i.e., the outrunners or royal escort). They kept watch at the palace doors, had charge over the guardroom in which the king's treasures were kept (cf. I Kings 14:27-28), and accompanied the royal chariot (I Kings

1:5). The משמעת (from שמע, "to hear, obey"; hence, those who obeyed the personal orders of the king) was the bodyguard; David is mentioned as the captain of Saul's bodyguard (I Sam. 22:14); and Benaiah, of David's (II Sam. 23:23; I Chr. 11:25). The word משמר denotes chiefly the place of confinement and only later came to mean "those who keep watch" (Neh. 4:22-23; Ezek. 38:7).

The Greek word σωματοφύλαξ is a word which literally means "bodyguard." Darius had three young men in his personal bodyguard (I Esd. 3:4); a bodyguard is also attested for Holofernes (Jth. 12:7) and for Ptolemy IV Philopator (III Macc. 2:23).

The word "guard" is seldom found in the NT. The Greek κουστωδία is a Latin borrowing (custodia) used of the Roman guard set over Jesus' grave (Matt. 27: 65-66; 28:11), whereas σπεκουλάτωρ, also of Latin origin (speculator), occurs but once (Mark 6:27). In Imperial Rome the speculatores were the bodyguard attached to the emperor's person. In the Mark passage the meaning is extended to members of Herod Antipas' guard (not "executioner" as in the KJV).

See also FOOTMAN; PRAETORIAN GUARD.

Bibliography. J. Kromayer and G. Veith, Heerwesen und Kriegführung der Griechen und Römer (Handbuch des Altertumswissenschaft IV, 3.2; 1928), pp. 392, 489-90.

J. W. WEVERS

GUARD, COURT OF THE [חצר המטרה] (Jer. 32:8, 12; 33:1; 37:21; 38:6, 13, 28; 39:14-15); KJV COURT OF THE PRISON. Apparently an open court in the palace complex which was reserved for detention of prisoners, at least during the time of the siege of Jerusalem. Here Jeremiah was confined, but he could continue his prophesying and even carry on necessary business transactions with the aid of his secretary. H. G. MAY

GUARD, GATE OF THE [שער המטרה] (Neh. 12: 39); KJV PRISON GATE. Possibly a gate of the palace compound in Jerusalem, although the context would favor its identification with the city gate HAMMIPHKAD, or MUSTER GATE; see map under NEHEMIAH. See also JERUSALEM § 7*b*. G. A. BARROIS

GUARDIAN [ἐπίτροπος]; KJV PROTECTOR (II Macc. 11:1; etc.); TUTOR (Gal. 4:2). The adult legally responsible for the person and property of a minor. In a general sense the Greek word means "manager" ("steward" in Matt. 20:8; Luke 8:3) or "governor" (a verbal form is used of Pilate in Luke 3:1 in some MSS); but in specific legal usage it is the regular term for the guardian of a minor, and in this sense it is found in rabbinic literature as a loan word. In the Apoc., Lysias is called the guardian of the young Syrian king Antiochus Eupator (II Macc. 11:1; 13:2; 14:2; cf. I Macc. 3:32-33; 6:15-17). The sole NT occurrence of the word in this sense is in Gal. 4:2, where Paul is presenting his argument that the Jewish law was an instrument of temporary validity until the appearance of Christ.

The RSV uses the English word in II Kings 10:1, 5: "guardians of the sons of Ahab." The Hebrew here (אמן) has the general sense of "support," "nourish," "confirm," etc.

See also CUSTODIAN.

Bibliography. S. Eger, "Rechtswörter und Rechtsbilder in den Paulinischen Briefen," ZNW, 18 (1918), 105-8, gives references to papyri; E. D. Burton, Galatians, ICC (1920), pp. 211-15; S. Belkin, "The Problem of Paul's Background," JBL, LIV (1935), 52-55, gives references to Philo and rabbinic literature.

A. WIKGREN

GUDGODAH. See HOR-HAGGIDGAD.

GUEST [קראים, lit. called; ἀνακείμενος, lit. reclining; καταλύω, lit. relax; ξενίζω, receive as a guest, entertain]. One invited to a feast or the like (I Kings 1:41, 49; Prov. 9:18; Zeph. 1:7; Matt. 22:10-11), or provided with lodging (Luke 19:7). The "guest room" of Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11 and the "inn" of Luke 2:7 represent the same Greek word (κατάλυμα). See HOSPITALITY; MEALS.

S. A. CARTLEDGE

GUEST ROOM [κατάλυμα]; KJV GUEST CHAMBER. The room in which Jesus and the disciples celebrated the Last Supper (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11). The word occurs as "inn" in Luke 2:7.

The guest room would be a single room where travelers could sleep. As used here, it is the room, borrowed or rented specifically for the eating of the Passover meal, by pilgrims to the Passover. It is therefore a temporary lodging place. E. M. GOOD

GUIDEPOSTS [תמרורים; cf. תמר, post (RSV scarecrows; Jer. 10:5); תימרה, column (Joel 2:30—H 3:3; Song of S. 3:6); Arab. 'amār, sign; 'amar, heap of stones]; KJV HIGH HEAPS. A word which occurs only in Jer. 31:21, where it appears to be a synonym for WAYMARK. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

GUILE [מרמה (Gen. 27:35; DECEIT in Ps. 34:13—H 34:14; FRAUD in Ps. 55:11); שקר (Ps. 119:78; more commonly FALSE); משאון (Prov. 26:26); δόλος]. Crafty or deceitful cunning; treachery; duplicity; deceit. To beguile someone is to deceive him. Suitable antonyms of "guile" are "honesty" and "sincerity." The use of "guile" with reference to a stratagem or a trick or wile is now obsolete but nonetheless suggestive. In Rom. 16:19 Paul urges the Roman Christians to be "wise as to what is good and guileless (ἀκέραιος) as to what is evil." Presumably his hope was that sincere and honest Christians should learn to distinguish between right and wrong and thus maintain their moral integrity. According to John 1:47, Jesus commended Nathanael because there was no guile in him. Jesus is commended to the readers of I Peter (2:22) as one who committed no sin and whose lips were free of guile. According to the same letter (3:10):

> He that would love life > and see good days, > let him keep his tongue from evil > and his lips from speaking guile.

According to Gen. 27:35, Isaac readily admitted to Esau that Jacob had come with guile in order to steal his brother's birthright (cf. Ps. 119:78; Prov. 26:26).

H. F. BECK

GUILT. See SIN.

GUILT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS § A4*b*.

GULF. See CHASM.

GULL. See SEA GULL.

GUM [נכאת, nᵉkhôth; Arab. naka'at; LXX θυμίαμα, incense]. A product of trade gathered from the resin of an herb or shrub, possibly the Astragalus gummifer Lab. or Astragalus tragacantha L. It was carried down to Egypt by Ishmaelites from Gilead, along with balm and myrrh (Gen. 37:25; KJV "spicery"); and it was sent by Jacob to Joseph in Egypt as one of the "choice fruits of the land," along with balm, honey, myrrh, pistachio nuts, and almonds (Gen. 43:11; KJV "spices"). Many plants in the Near East exude resins which became important items of ancient trade.

See also BALM; FLORA §§ A7*b, i-j, l;* MASTIC; MYRRH; SPICES; STACTE.

Bibliography. I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden, II (1924), 419-24; G. E. Post, Flora of Syria, Palestine and Sinai, I (1932), 373-408. J. C. TREVER

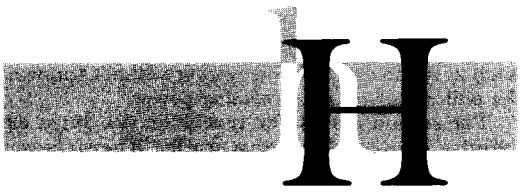
GUNI gū'nī [גוני, cf. Arab. ǧūnun]; GUNITES —nīts. 1. The second son of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48; I Chr. 7:13); ancestral head of the Gunites (Num. 26:48).

2. A Gadite (I Chr. 5:15).

See also LXX variants in II Sam. 23:32; I Chr. 11:34.

GUR gûr [גור] (II Kings 9:27). An ascent near Ibleam where Jehu's men wounded Ahaziah king of Judah.



GURBAAL gûr'bāl [גור בעל] (II Chr. 26:7). A city occupied by Arabs, possibly in the neighborhood of Edom. Uzziah numbered it among his conquests, and perhaps changed its name to the more pleasing one of JAGUR. The LXX translation, "rock of Baal," points to a reading that was either ṣûr-ba'al (Hebrew) or ṭûr-ba'al (Aramaic). On the other hand, Egyptian lists mention a town called Kr-b'r, which may be Gurbaal. S. COHEN

GUTTER. KJV translation of רהטים (RSV RUNNEL) in Gen. 30:38, 41, and of צנור (RSV WATER SHAFT) in II Sam. 5:8. See WATER WORKS; JERUSALEM § 5*a*.

GYMNASIUM [γυμνάσιον]. A place of physical exercise for Greek youths; a school of training, sometimes used in a wider sense—e.g., of a philosophical school. Great resentment was felt by many of the Jews at the attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to introduce the Greek way of life among them (see ANTIOCHUS § 4). He established a gymnasium in Jerusalem (I Macc. 1:14; II Macc. 4:12). For the Greek the gymnasium, no less than the assembly and the theater, was an essential part of life; it trained the body in harmony and beauty and provided a social club for the youth who banded themselves into guilds of epheboi which had their headquarters at the gymnasium.

Paul and the Christians in general do not appear to have felt such keen resentment against the activities of the gymnasium, and the apostle goes so far as to use them as metaphors illustrating the Christian life (I Cor. 9:24-27; Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 1:30; 2:16). Γυμνασία (exercise in the gymnasium) is mentioned in I Tim. 4:8 in order to point out, after the manner of Paul, that bodily exercises have a legitimate, though limited, place in life, and in order to compare the spiritual training of the Christian.

But two centuries before this, it was the gymnasium and the practices associated with it that angered the pious Jews, the HASIDIM, and that were the cause of the Maccabean Revolt (see MACCABEES). One cause of offense was that on stripping naked for the exercises the young Jew made his circumcision obvious to all, and therefore became reluctant to have his own baby boys circumcised. Moreover, the cult of the body seemed almost like idolatry to the more conservative-minded Jews; certainly it was closely associated with a nation of idolaters. In addition to this, those who met in the gymnasium attended in Greek clothes, and part of the dress of the ephebos was the broad-brimmed felt hat called the petasus, which was objectionable because it was associated with the god Hermes. See DISCUS. N. TURNER

H. The abbreviation for "Holiness Code," which designates a legal section of P material consisting of Lev. 17–26. Its compilation is usually assigned to the seventh-sixth century B.C. Close affinities with Ezekiel are apparent, but priority is disputed. See PENTATEUCH.

D. N. FREEDMAN

HAAHASHTARI hā'ə hăsh'tə rī [האחשתרי, the Ahashtarites] (I Chr. 4:6). A family of the tribe of Judah.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 236.

HABAIAH hə bā'yə [חביה, Yahu has hidden (i.e., protected)]; KJV OBDIA ŏb dī'ə [Codex A 'Οβδιά] in I Esd. 5:38. Alternately: HOBAIAH hō bā'yə (Neh. 7:63). Eponym of one of the families of returned exiles claiming priestly descent, but unable to document their claim, and therefore denied the rights of the priesthood, at least temporarily (Ezra 2:61; cf. vss. 62-63; Neh. 7:63; I Esd. 5:38).

B. T. DAHLBERG

HABACUC hăb'ə kək. Douay Version form of HABAKKUK.

HABAKKUK hə băk'ək [חבקוק; LXX 'Αμβακοὺμ; Vulg. Habacuc]. A cultic prophet of Judah who lived during the last days of Josiah (640-609 B.C.) and under the reign of Jehoiakim (609-598 B.C.). The book which bears his name is eighth among the minor prophets in the OT canon. See map "Palestine: Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah," under ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF.

1. Name
2. Nature of the book
3. The lamentation and prayer liturgy
   a. Title and opening lament
   b. The oracle of Yahweh
   c. The prophet's protest
   d. The watchtower
   e. The five woes
4. The Dead Sea Scroll commentary
5. The psalm
6. Religious teachings
Bibliography

1. Name. The origin of the name Habakkuk is uncertain. Nöldeke derives it from the Arabic hibhkatun, "dwarf." Noth derives it from an Akkadian plant name, ḫambaḳûḳu, which is more probable. Mowinckel calls attention to the legend in the LXX of Bel and the Dragon, in the title of which the prophet is called "Habakkuk, son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi" (vs. 1). If that tradition is correct, Habakkuk was linked definitely to the priesthood.

2. Nature of the book. Many scholars consider the book to constitute a unity, possibly a liturgy for a day of penitence. The Dead Sea Scroll of Habakkuk, however, does not include ch. 3—a theophanic hymn—and this omission suggests to some critics that only chs. 1–2 are authentic.

Direct divine utterance, spoken through the mouth of an official and authorized mediator or cultic prophet, had its place within the liturgy of any particular day in the cultus of ancient Israel. Many psalms show that such a liturgy had poetic and musical form. From the beginning the word of divine revelation in Israel was clothed in poetic, rhythmical, metrical form. The same must have been the case as regards the words of revelation in the liturgy of the temple. The psalms are not always the expression of one mood or one voice. In many of them are expressed various moods and motifs, and in the actual rendering they are compositions of a cultic-liturgical nature.

It fell to the temple prophets in the cultus of Judah to attend to the position of the temple singers. Songs sung in the name of the congregation were undoubtedly sung by such singers. One would not be in error to assume that the cultic songs of the individual which were sung in connection with such rites of purification as are associated with the rituals of lamentation, while sung in the name of the congregation, would actually be rendered by professionals, the temple singers.

As Mowinckel has shown, not many of the common people were at home in the appropriate ritual details which were particularly fitting for the psalm's rendition. The songs were not sung with music books before them, but from memory. It is likely that most of the songs came from the hearts and minds of the men who belonged to the profession of temple singers.

If the prophet Habakkuk was such a prophet, he was very familiar with cultic compositions. The first two chapters of his book are in the form of a lamentation and prayer liturgy.

3. The lamentation and prayer liturgy (chs. 1-2). a. Title and opening lament (1:1-4). Following the title (1:1), which introduces the book as the "oracle of God," comes the prophetic lament. The date is approximately 598 B.C. The first destructive blow of the Babylonians' (Chaldeans') might has fallen upon Judah. That which the prophet Jeremiah had clearly foreseen as certain has happened. Here is a note frequently to be sounded in Judah, and it is destined to continue for some time—the note of national lamentation: "O LORD, how long?" It is a cry for help, but God does not seem to hear. Habakkuk sees, taking place before his very eyes, and seemingly ignored by God, destruction and violence on a vast scale. Law has surrendered to force, so that righteousness has no opportunity. The wicked are strong enough to throttle the power of justice. According to some scholars, he who utters these words is confronted by the Chaldeans, a "bitter and hasty nation" (vs. 6), whose standard of justice has in it no social concern for the rights of other nations, and whose plans of ruthless conquest embrace the then-known inhabited world. Other critics, however, maintain that the lament reflects the domestic situation in Judah before the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.).

b. The oracle of Yahweh (1:5-11). What is taking place in history has meaning. The prophet discerns that it is the mighty God who, at this very moment, is using the powerful Chaldean nation set on world conquest. The emergence of this ruthless and cruel world power in the Near East began in 612 B.C., when Nabopolassar came into power, and Nineveh—famed capital of Assyria, and for centuries the terror of small powers such as Judah—fell before his superior might. No unillumined eye could see anything good for Judah or for the entire Near East in what was being done by the Chaldeans, that ruthless nation which knew no right but might (1:11).

c. The prophet's protest (1:12-17). One is not surprised at Habakkuk's protest to God, whom he addresses as "from everlasting," "my Holy One," the sole deity of his own worship. He is convinced that God's purpose in contemporary history is that the Chaldeans express upon Judah the Lord's judgment and his chastisement (vs. 12). But how can this be? How can the pure eyes of God endure to look on with equanimity while he sees a pitiless nation like the Chaldeans swallowing up a people more righteous than itself (vs. 13)? How can he let the Judeans be taken on the Chaldean hook, and dragged out with the Chaldean seine? How can he permit the Chaldeans to sap Judah's strength, then make it possible for them to deal just as mercilessly with peoples other than Judah and just as helpless as Judah is over against such pagan power (vss. 14-17)?

d. The watchtower (2:1-5). It was one of the great and insistent questions which have never been adequately answered. Habakkuk evidently had a high retreat to which he was accustomed to go, where he might brood over his problems and await, in receptivity, God's message in such an hour when he desperately needed light. He designated his retreat as "the tower"; it was his "watch," his "lookout," to which he went to await in eager spiritual receptivity Yahweh's word. His purpose was to "look forth to see what he [Yahweh] will say to me," in answer to the question he had posed in 1:17. Is the Chaldean nation to be permitted by God to keep on mastering nation after nation, "to bring all of them up with a hook," to "drag them out with his net," to pull them along with his seine, and thus dominate and absorb people after people with impunity?

There came to him that day a vision experience in which the holy God mediated to him on behalf of his nation one of the greatest messages of OT religion. The message was of such importance that he felt a divine impulse to write it succinctly and plainly upon tablets such as were used for the writing down of prophetic messages. The message was to be written in large characters so that even a runner could see it and read it without stopping (2:2). The content of it was to be an abiding truth which one must wait for in spiritual sensitivity and with hushed eagerness of expectation (vs. 3). The truth may seem to be slow in coming, but the prophet is patiently to "wait for it." Then comes the reply.

To this simple but profound revelation which the prophet is about to receive, there are two parts. "He whose soul is not upright in him shall fail" (vs. 4*a*). I.e., the nation or person that proceeds upon a policy that is not erect, upright, honest, just, or morally straight, shall fail. Despotism, ruthless domination on the part of nation or man, is bound to fail. The present Chaldean policy of cruel dealing with peoples such as it can and does overpower will not triumph Its pitiless power is but seeming power.

The second part of the revelation (vs. 4*b*) is the positive putting of the great truth: "The righteous [be it nation or person] shall live by his faith." The Hebrew word for "FAITH" is אֱמוּנָה, from the verbal root אָמַן, meaning "confirm, support" (cf. AMEN).

In 2:5 the Dead Sea Scroll of Habakkuk reads, instead of "Wine is treacherous," "Wealth is treacherous," which in the context most likely gives a more correct reading.

e. The five woes (2:6-19). Habakkuk lifted up against the figure of the arrogant, wealthy oppressor (the Chaldeans) a taunt song, in a series of five woes. While the meaning was perforce veiled, every loyal Judean saw clearly what he meant, and found utterance for his own passionate and bottled-up indignation against the Chaldean nation.

a) The first woe (vss. 6*b*-8) deals with Nebuchadrezzar's lust for tribute from the nations he conquered. The prophet viewed him as a merciless creditor, exacting from his conquered peoples heavy impost.

b) The second woe (vs. 9) lifts into the open the purpose of the Chaldean pillage and plunder—to make the empire so strong materially that no nation would dare challenge it.

c) The third woe (vss. 12-13) focuses upon the cruelty of the Chaldean oppressor, for Nebuchadrezzar used the naked human strength of his captives to erect the cities which he built or rebuilt, so that no national power could challenge his dominance. Vs. 14 is an almost word-for-word quotation from Isa. 11:9*b*, and the thought of it is appropriate in the present context.

d) The fourth woe (vss. 15-16*c*) solemnly teaches that the Chaldean dealings toward his neighbors in merciless power will rebound upon the Chaldean nation itself. The primeval dragons of Chaos and Disorder—the "beasts" of vs. 17, Leviathan and Behemoth—in the hour of judgment will bring upon the proud Chaldeans shattering destruction.

e) The fifth and last woe (vs. 19) is a rebuke to the Chaldean worship of their gods, Bel, Shamash, and Marduk, whose cult was performed at the Babylonian temples with elegance, pomp, and brilliancy. The concluding verse (20) brings a vivid contrast between the man-made idols, brilliantly overlaid with gold and silver yet utterly lifeless (vs. 19), and the invisible but potently present Lord in his holy temple, before whose majestic face the entire earth is summoned to awed silence.

4. The Dead Sea Scroll commentary. Scholars have discovered in the Dead Sea Scroll on Hab. 1–2 about fifty readings which vary from the received MT of the OT, a few of which seem reasonably conclusive. The oft-debated reading "Chaldeans" in 1:6 is confirmed. For Hab. 1:11 Elliger rightly accepts the scroll's rendering: "And he makes his might his God." The Habakkuk Commentary on 1:17 omits the interrogative particle so as to read: "Therefore he bares his sword continually slaying nations and has no pity," thus suggesting merciless slaughter.

5. The psalm (ch. 3). The fact that the Dead Sea Scroll of the Habakkuk Commentary neither contains nor refers to ch. 3 supports the long-held view of many scholars that this chapter was not part of the original book of Habakkuk. G. B. Gray views it as having been derived from some psalm collection. S. R. Driver calls attention to the nature of its content, viewing it as a lyric ode, sublime in poetic conception and splendid in diction, and he ranks it along with the finest Hebrew poetry in the OT. In the form of a vision experience, the poet describes Yahweh's decisive struggle with his enemies, issuing in their ultimate and final defeat. Not unlike an ancient "dithyrambic" Greek hymn, it has a wild and frantic nature for it is written in an ardent vein.

After an opening title (vs. 1), in which a final editor designates ch. 3 as a "prayer of Habakkuk the prophet," comes a majestic poem on Yahweh's advent (vss. 2-15). There are echoes in it of the earlier theophanies of Deut. 33; Judg. 5 (cf. also Ps. 77).

The poet remembers Yahweh's work (vs. 2), and he pictures the holy God coming from Teman in Edom, marching across Paran, which lies between Sinai and Kadesh-Barnea (vss. 3-4). God's destructive power is pictured in mythological terms (vss. 5-7). Yahweh has battled with the powerful forces of primeval chaos (vss. 8-11). Now it is with the destructive Chaldeans that the mighty God is angry, as he goes forth to save his people (vss. 12-15).

The poet is greatly stirred by his vision and is left trembling, almost consumed, with deep feeling (vs. 16 ab). But now he turns from fearful awe to calm trust in Yahweh's ultimate intervention, in judgment upon the Chaldean (vs. 16*c*).

The prophetic liturgy and the psalm now conclude in triumph (vss. 17-19). It is a heartfelt cry of trust in God, a magnificent expression of the victory of faith over all misfortune and loss.

6. Religious teachings. The little book of Habakkuk is filled with truths which stand at the core of Hebrew religion: History has meaning if one takes the long view and judges events from the perspective of faith. Uprightness in the soul is necessary for individuals and nations alike. The righteous shall live by his faith. Wealth is treacherous as a basis of human dependence for security. Ruthless dealings rebound upon the doer. God can overrule an evil nation for his righteous purpose. Evil is bound to fail in the end, even though it may seem victorious. There is no might but right. Trust in God is the only sure basis of strength, regardless of external situations. The ultimate of faith is joy in communion with God.

Bibliography. S. R. Driver, ed., The Minor Prophets, New Century Bible, vol. II (1906). O. Procksch, Die kleinen prophetischen Schriften vor dem Exil (1910). J. M. P. Smith et al., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Obadiah, and Joel, ICC (1911). A. B. Davidson, The Books of Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah, Cambridge Bible (1920). G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets (1929). G. W. Wade and G. G. Stonehouse, The Books of the Prophets Zephaniah, Nahum and Habakkuk, WC (1929). E. Sellin, Das Zwölfprophetenbuch (1930). J. Lachmann, Das Buch Habakuk (1932). H. Junker, Die zwölf kleinen Propheten (1938). W. Lüthi, Habakuk rechtet mit Gott (1946). M. Wittenburg, Habakuk (1949). J. Coppens, Les douze Petits Prophètes: Bréviaire du prophétisme (1950). K. Elliger, Das Buch der zwölf kleinen Propheten, vol. II (1950). M. Schumpp, Das Buch der zwölf Propheten (1950). F. Horst, Die zwölf kleinen Propheten (1954). P. Trinquet, Joel, Abdias, Habacuc (1954). C. L. Taylor, Jr., Introduction and Exegesis of Habakkuk, IB, VI (1956), 973-1003. W. Vischer, Der Prophet Habakuk (1958).

Special studies: A. F. Kirkpatrick, The Doctrine of the Prophets (1932). W. Staerk, "Zu Hab. 1:5-11; Geschichte oder Mythos?" ZAW, LI (1933), 1-28. G. R. Driver, "Linguistic and Textual Problems: Minor Prophets III, Habakkuk," JTS, XXXIX (1938), 394-98. E. A. Leslie, The Prophets Tell Their Own Story (1939). P. Humbert, Problèmes du livre d'Habacuc (1944). A. T. Pearson, The Problem of Unity and Date in Habakkuk (1948). H. Schmidt, "Ein Psalm im Buche Habakkuk," ZAW, LXII (1949), 52-63 (on Hab. 1:2-4, 12-13; 3:18-19). M. Stenzel, "Hab. 2:1-4, 5*a*," Bibl., XXXIII (1952), 506-10. D. M. Lloyd-Jones, From Fear to Faith; Studies in the Book of Habakkuk (1953). E. Osswald, "Zur Hermeneutik des Habakuk-Kommentars," ZAW, 68 (1956), 243-56.

Studies on Hab. 3: F. C. Burkitt, "The Psalm of Habakkuk," JTS (1915), pp. 62-85. F. J. Stephens, "The Babylonian Dragon Myth in Hab. 3," JBL, XLIII (1924), 290-93. H. Bévenot, "Le Cantique Habacuc," RB, XLII (1933), 499-525. T. H. Gaster, "The Battle of the Rain and the Sea," Iraq, IV (1937), 21-32. W. A. Irwin, "The Mythological Background of Hab. 3," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, I (1942), 10-40. W. F. Albright, "The Interpretation of Hab. 3:4," in H. H. Rowley, ed., Studies in OT Prophecy (1950), pp. 1-18. M. Delcor, "La geste de Yahvé au temps de l'Exode et l'espérance du psalmiste en Hab. iii," Miscellanea biblica B. Ubach (1953), pp. 287-302. S. Mowinckel, "Zum Psalm des Habakuk," Theologische Zeitschrift, IX (1953), 1-22. P. Béguerie, "Le psaume d'Habacuc," Études sur les Prophètes d'Israël (1954), pp. 53-84. "Psalm Criticism Between 1900 and 1935," Vetus Testamentum, 5 (1955), 13-33.

Studies on the Qumran Commentary on Hab. 1-2: W. H. Brownlee, "The Jerusalem Habakkuk Scroll," BASOR, CXII (1948), 8-18; "Further Light on Habakkuk," BASOR, CXIV (1949), 9-10. M. Delcor, Les manuscrits de la Mer Morte; essai sur le Midrasch d'Habacuc (1951). H. E. Del Medico, Deux manuscrits hébreux de la Mer Morte (1951). W. H. Brownlee, "The Historical Allusions of the DS Habakkuk Midrash," BASOR, CXXVI (1952), 10-20. M. Delcor, "Où en est le problème du Midrash d'Habacuc?" RHR, CXLII (1952), 129-46. H. H. Rowley, The Zadokite Fragments and the Dead Sea Scrolls (1952). K. Elliger, Studien zum Habakuk-Kommentar vom Toten Meer (1953). C. Detaye, Le cadre historique du Midrash d'Habacuc (1954). F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts (1956). H. H. Rowley, "The Teacher of Righteousness and the Dead Sea Scrolls," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, vol. L (1957).

E. A. LESLIE

HABAZZINIAH hăb′ə zĭ nī′ə [חבצניה] (Jer. 35:3); KJV HABAZINIAH. Grandfather of the Rechabites who were tested by Jeremiah.

HABBACUC hăb′ə kək. KJV Apoc. form of HABAKKUK.

HABERGEON hăb′ər jən. KJV translation of שריון (II Chr. 26:14; Neh. 4:16—H 4:10; COAT OF MAIL); שריה (Job 41:26—H 41:18; JAVELIN); תחרא (Exod. 28:32; 39:23; GARMENT). Armor, originally for the neck and shoulders but later reaching the thighs and even below the knees. See WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

W. S. McCULLOUGH

HABIRU, HAPIRU hă'bĭ rōō, —pĭ— [Akkad. ḫabiru, ḫapiru; Ugar. 'prm; Egyp. 'apir]. The name of a group of people. Whether ḫabiru or ḫapiru should be considered the correct reading cannot be decided with certainty; both readings seem to be possible. As to this question, it should perhaps be kept in mind that b and p are interchangeable in some cases. Thus, e.g., a b in Hebrew may sometimes correspond to a p in Ugaritic. In Akkadian signs exist which may be read with a b or a p. Accordingly, the two forms ḫabiru and ḫapiru may be local varieties. This may be so in Akkadian, and, provided that Ugaritic 'prm and Hebrew 'brm are etymologically related, we have the same interchange there. Ḫabiru is most likely of West Semitic origin, which is apparent from the first consonant, ', in Hebrew, Ugaritic, and Egyptian. The word seems originally to have been, not an ethnic term, but rather the denotation of a social class, though this is very uncertain. The problem of the Habiru was exhaustingly discussed at the fourth international Conference of Assyriologists. The volume published by J. Bottéro containing the material (see bibliography) shows how completely scholarly opinion diverges on practically every point, also on the question of etymology. Nor can the Sumerian ideogram SA.GAZ (with several variants—e.g., SAG.GAZ) be explained. One Akkadian word or another may be adduced for comparison; but since the word, as has been mentioned, is undoubtedly of West Semitic origin, an Akkadian correspondent does not necessarily occur in the material known.

The earliest occurrence of the Habiru is found in texts dating from the Third Dynasty of Ur (roughly ca. 2050 B.C.). From that time on, they are mentioned in texts from all important archives in the Near East and thus appear in the second millennium spread over a wide area. They occur, e.g., in Mesopotamia in the reigns of Warad-Sin and Rim-Sin of Larsa and in the reign of Hammurabi of Babylon. They are mentioned in texts from Mari in the reigns of Yasmaḫ-Addu and Zimri-Lim, who were contemporaries of Hammurabi; in texts from Alalaḫ, Nuzi, Boghazköy; and, finally, in the Amarna Letters. In texts from Ras Shamra we find the corresponding word 'prm.

As to their social position, the Habiru often appear in the service of one king or another, and more particularly, in many cases as soldiers. As to their names, some Habiru people have West Semitic names, but there are also Habiru who have Akkadian and even non-Semitic names. The same is true of the 'prm of the Ras Shamra Texts, who seem to be of a heterogeneous ethnic character having only their social position in common. Such facts have led scholars to believe that Habiru is not an ethnic term but rather denotes some kind of social group. This is particularly clear in lists from Boghazköy (KUB IX, 34; IX, 4; HT, 6; KUB VII, 42). There Habiru are mentioned in lists of social classes. It is important to note that they are mentioned in the second part of the list, the lower classes. They seem to occupy a position between the free citizens and the slaves and may accordingly be some kind of clients. In some texts the gods of the Habiru are mentioned; this indicates that they were a real class of the society.

On the other hand, there are texts where "Habiru" seems to be more of a gentilic term. This is so, e.g., in texts from Mari, where Habiru operate in bands as seminomads in the region from the Ḫabur to the Baliḫ and the Euphrates. Also in texts from Alalaḫ, Habiru seems to be an ethnic group: King Idrimi dwelt for seven years among the Habiru soldiers. They lived in groups together and seem to have been a special class of the population, though the term may also have had the special denotation of "soldier" or "officer." In the Amarna Letters the Habiru people appear as a separate ethnic group having West Semitic names.

From these few examples it is evident that the Habiru sometimes seem to be a social class, while in other cases they are most likely an ethnic group. The word may originally have been an appellative which developed into an ethnic term. In that case we may compare "Habiru" with "Canaanite," which also originally may have denoted a social class (merchant; see CANAAN), and "Amorite," for in Mesopotamia the Amorites were also apparently a social group. In Gen. 14, where (ca. 1700 B.C.) Abraham is called העברי, "the Hebrew," there is no indication of the meaning of the word "Hebrew." It may denote an ethnic group, but also a social class. But generally the term "Hebrew" in the OT is an ethnic term. It seems probable that Habiru is an Akkadian form related to Hebrew עברי, and, in all probability, the Hebrews were a branch of the Habiru.

Bibliography. J. Bottéro, Le problème des Habiru à la 4e rencontre assyriologique internationale, Cahiers de la Société asiatique, vol. XII (1954); M. Greenberg, The Ḫab/piru (1955). These two volumes contain all the material and many valuable comments on the relevant texts and problems.

A. HALDAR

HABOR hā'bôr [חבור]. A tributary of the Euphrates, flowing into the latter from the NE. The Habor (Assyrian "Khabur") watered a heavily settled valley

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

1. The Habor River, a tributary of the Euphrates in antiquity, as the many mounds of buried cities attest. Some of the Israelites were exiled to the banks of the Habor by Shalmaneser in King Hosea's ninth year (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; I Chr. 5:26).

Fig. HAB 1.

C. H. GORDON

HACALIAH hăk'ə lī'ə [חכליה] (Neh. 1:1; 10:1); KJV HACHALIAH. The father of Nehemiah. The frequently proposed interpretation of the name as "Wait for Yahu" is unlikely, since such a verb form in a name is unprecedented in the OT.

HACHILAH hə kī'lə, hăk'ī lə [חכילה]. A hill in the neighborhood of Ziph where David took refuge when pursued by Saul (I Sam. 23:19; 26:1). It is described as being near the wilderness of Jeshimon, which would place it in the neighborhood of Hebron, but the site has not been identified. S. COHEN

HACHMONI hăk'mō nī [חכמוני, from a place name(?)]; HACHMONITE —nīt. 1. The family of Jashobeam, one of David's Mighty Men (I Chr. 11:11). Jashobeam is called a Tachemonite in II Sam. 23:8, probably because of a textual error.

2. The family of Jehiel, a servant of David (I Chr. 27:32, where the word should be rendered "Hachmonite" as in 11:11, since both are the same in Hebrew).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 232. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HADAD hā'dăd [הדד, אדד, thunderer(?); Akkad. Adad, Addu, Haddu; Ugar. Hd]; KJV HADAR —där in Gen. 25:15. Alternately: HADAR [הדר] (Gen. 36:39). 1. The eighth son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chr. 1:30).

2. A king of Edom (Gen. 36:35-36; I Chr. 1:46-47).

3. Another king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; I Chr. 1:50-51). Gen. 36:39 should, with some forty Hebrew MSS, as well as with other witnesses to the text, be read "Hadad" instead of "Hadar."

4. A member of the royal house of EDOM who escaped to Egypt when David conquered Edom, and then later return to his homeland to revolt against Solomon (I Kings 11:14, 17, 19, 21, 25). The Hebrew actually reads "Adad" for the first "Hadad" in I Kings 11:17, and it has been conjectured that I Kings 11:14 ff combines two accounts, one of Hadad the Edomite and the other of Adad the Midianite. Convincing reasons have been given (see bibliography) for identifying this Hadad with 3 above.

Bibliography. A. M. Honeyman, "The Evidence for Regnal Names Among the Hebrews," JBL, LXVII (1948), pp. 13-25; W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (3rd ed., 1953), pp. 73 ff.

Courtesy of the Pierpont Morgan Library

2. Offering being made to the storm-god Hadad, with one foot on the mountain and holding a saw in his hand; from the First Babylonian Dynasty

5. The ancient Semitic storm-god who as the great Baal of the Ugaritic pantheon figured in the struggle of the religion of Israel against Canaanite religion. See BAAL (DEITY); UGARIT.

Fig. HAD 2. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HADADEZER hăd'ə dē'zər [הדדעזר; Akkad. Adad-idri, Hadad is help]; KJV HADAREZER hā'dər ē'zər [הדרעזר] in II Sam. 10:16, 19; I Chr. 18:3, 5, 7-10; 19:16, 19. A king of Zobah, defeated by David. The most powerful Aramean ruler of his day, Hadadezer extended his control as far as the Upper Euphrates, seizing territory formerly held by Assyria. The weak Ashurrabi II (1012-972 B.C.) was unable to check him. The conflict between Zobah and Israel had begun in the reign of Saul.

The OT preserves three accounts of campaigns by David which involved Hadadezer: (a) II Sam. 10:6-14, where a coalition of Aramean rulers who had come to the relief of the besieged city of Rabbah of the Ammonites were defeated by Joab (see HANUN 1); (b) 10:15-18, which describes a battle at HELAM between David and a new army of Hadadezer under his commander Shobach. Again the Arameans were defeated, and "all the kings who were servants of Hadadezer . . . made peace with Israel"; and (c) 8:3-8, which tells of a defeat inflicted on Hadadezer "as he went to restore his power at the river Euphrates." A second battle defeated the troops of Damascus who were coming to Hadadezer's aid. Some critics maintain that each account describes a different campaign; others feel that (b) and (c) deal with the same series of events.

The final result of the Aramean wars was that David garrisoned Damascus and exacted a tribute from Hadadezer. This gave him virtual control of the Transjordan trade as well as the rich copper deposits of the biqa'.

Bibliography. T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel, I (1951), 201, 237-38; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), p. 124; M. Noth, The History of Israel (1958), pp. 194-96. Contrast E. G. H. Kraeling, Aram and Israel (1918), pp. 42-44; M. F. Unger, Israel and the Arameans of Damascus (1957), pp. 42-48. R. W. CORNEY

HADADRIMMON hā'dăd rĭm'ən [הדדרמון, from Hadad (probably thunder; cf. Arab. hadda, thunder) plus Rimmon (probably RIMMON 3)]. A deity for whom public mourning was made in the great central plain of Palestine by Megiddo (Zech. 12:11).

Hadad is known from the Ras Shamra Texts as the proper name of BAAL (DEITY), the Amorite storm-god, also identified with the vegetation he stimulated. The mourning mentioned in Zech. 12:11 was probably a rite which had its mythical counterpart in the mourning for the dead Baal by his sister, the goddess Anat. See also UGARIT. Fig. HAD 2.

Bibliography. M. Jastrow, The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria (1898), pp. 156-61. For further bibliography, see BAAL (DEITY). J. GRAY

HADAR hā'där. 1. KJV form of HADAD 1 in Gen. 25:15.

2. Variant of HADAD 3 in Gen. 36:39.

HADAREZER. KJV alternate form of HADADEZER.

HADASHAH hə dăsh'ə [חדשה, new] (Josh. 15:37). A village of Judah in the Shephelah district of Lachish. It was located in the vicinity of MORESHETH-GATH, but precise identification remains uncertain.

HADASSAH hə dăs'ə [Aram. הדסה=הדס, myrtle; or Akkad. ḫadaššatu, bride] (Esth. 2:7). Either the original Hebrew name of ESTHER or a title given to her. If the latter, Hadassah would be the Akkadian "bride," a title used for Ishtar.

HADATTAH. See HAZOR-HADATTAH.

HADES hā'dēz. See DEAD, ABODE OF THE; GEHENNA.

HADID hā'dĭd [חדיד, sharp; Αδιδα]. A town of Benjamin overlooking the coastal plain at the NW extremity of the Shephelah. It was one of a cluster of towns situated near the mouth of the Valley of Aijalon, and with Lod (Lydda) and Ono it constituted the ancestral homeland of more than 720 exiles who returned from the Babylonian exile (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:34).

All OT references to the site are postexilic; but, in addition to the implication of the OT references, its early date is indicated by its inclusion on the Karnak list of Thut-mose III and its description in the Mishna as a walled city since the days of Joshua ('Arak. 9.6).

It is probably to be identified with modern el-Haditheh, between three and four miles NE of Lydda, and with Adida (I Macc. 12:38; 13:13; Josephus). The site was fortified by Simon Maccabeus before he met Trypho (Jos. Antiq. XIII.vi.5; I Macc. 12:38), and by Vespasian before he went against Jerusalem (Jos. War IV.ix.1). It was near this site, also, that the Nabatean Aretas III defeated Alexander Janneus (Jos. Antiq. XIII.xv.2).

W. H. MORTON

HADLAI hăd'lī [חדלי; Arab. ḫadlun, fat] (II Chr. 28:12). An Ephraimite person or family.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 226.

HADORAM hə dôr'əm [הדורם, Haddu (Hadad) is exalted]. 1. An Arabian tribe, called the first-born of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; I Chr. 1:21) and possibly located in Yemen. See also UZAL.

2. Son of Tou the king of Hamath (I Chr. 18:10). The parallel passage in II Sam. 8:10 reads "Joram," which should probably be emended to "Hadoram."

3. An official of Rehoboam who was in charge of the forced labor (II Chr. 10:18); the same as Adoram (I Kings 12:18) and Adoniram (4:6). S. COHEN

HADRACH hăd'răk [חדרך, Aram. חזרך, the inscription of king Ẓkr; Akkad. Ḫatarikka]. A town in the NW part of Lebanon.

HA-ELEPH hā ē'lĭf [האלף] (Josh. 18:28); KJV ELEPH. A city in Benjamin. The name is probably to be read with the preceding word, "Zela," as "Zela-ha-eleph," and is perhaps modern Salah, between Jerusalem and Gibeon. See ZELAH.

HAG, NIGHT. See NIGHT HAG.

HAGAB hā'găb [חגב, grasshopper, locust]; KJV Apoc. AGABA ăg'ə bə. Head of a family of NETHINIM among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:46; I Esd. 5:30). The name is lacking in the parallel Neh. 7:48.

HAGABAH hăg'ə bə [חגבה, grasshopper, locust] (Ezra 2:45; I Esd. 5:29); KJV Apoc. GRABA grā'bə [Codex A, Γαβά]. Alternately: HAGABA [חגבא] (Neh. 7:48). Head of a family of NETHINIM among the returned exiles; evidently to be distinguished from HAGAB (Ezra 2:46; I Esd. 5:30; but note the absence of Hagab in Neh. 7:48).

HAGAR hā'gär [הגר; Αγαρ]; KJV NT AGAR ā'gär. The maid whom Sarah gave as a concubine to Abraham and who became the mother of Ishmael.

The Hagar stories have been preserved primarily by J (Gen. 16:1*b*-2, 4-14) and E (21:8-21), with a few verses from P (16:1*a*, 3, 15-16). Most scholars think that the J and E traditions were originally parallel, both depicting the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael from the family of Abraham. The insertion of vs. 9 in ch. 16 provided the connecting link between the two.

In the first story (16:1-16) Hagar is identified as the Egyptian handmaid of the barren Sarai. Since Yahweh's promise to Abram (12:1 ff) was endangered by her barrenness, Sarai gave Hagar to him for children—a custom paralleled elsewhere in Genesis (Rachel and Leah in 30:3, 9), as well as in the NUZI texts. When Hagar became pregnant, she assumed an arrogant attitude that infuriated her mistress. With Abram's permission, Sarai treated Hagar so harshly that she fled defiantly into the Wilderness of Shur, an area between Beer-sheba and Egypt. At a spring the angel of Yahweh appeared to announce that she was to bear a son from whom would come a multitude of descendants and whose name was to be Ishmael ("God has heard"), because "God had heard" her in her affliction. Ishmael would be a real Bedouin, a "wild ass of a man," fierce and warlike. Because of this theophany, she named the well BEER-LAHAI-ROI, the "well of one who sees and lives."

The second story (21:8-21) presumably occurred several years after the birth of Ishmael. At a feast Sarah saw Ishmael playing with her recently weaned child, Isaac, and was seized by the fear that Hagar's boy might become an heir alongside her own. She demanded of a reluctant Abraham the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael. Weak and pathetic, Hagar fled to the dry Wilderness of Beer-sheba, where death for her child seemed certain until the angel of God showed her a well. He assured her that "God had heard" the voice of the crying Ishmael, who would not die but would become a great nation. And Ishmael grew up to live in the Wilderness of Paran, to become an expert with the bow, and to marry an Egyptian woman.

The Hagar traditions reflect the belief of the Hebrews that they were related to the wild, warlike Bedouin peoples to the S of Palestine, whose eponymous ancestor was ISHMAEL. Like the Hebrews, they too had Abraham as their father, but their ancestral mother, of course, was the inferior concubine Hagar. Whether there is a relation between the Hagrites (see HAGRITE) of I Chr. 5:10, 19-20; Ps. 83:6—H 83:7 and Hagar is not certain, but it is likely, since two of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15) are Hagrites (I Chr. 5:19).

In the NT, Paul makes allegorical use of the Hagar story (Gal. 4:21-31). Hagar and her son stand for the slavery of the old covenant, in contrast to the freedom of the new covenant typified by Isaac, the son of the free woman. M. NEWMAN

HAGARENE. KJV alternate form of HAGRITE.

HAGGADAH hə gä′də [הגדה, narration]. All scriptural interpretation which is nonlegal or narrative in character, and which aims at the development of inner piety and religious devotion. As such, Haggadah supplements HALACHAH as a source of Jewish teaching, the latter telling the son of Israel what duty is, the former stirring in him the will to an eager performance of this duty. The Haggadic method of instruction is by means of story, saga, legend, parable, homily, maxim, proverbs, and wise sayings. The same method and often also the same material are employed by the NT in imparting its teachings; nevertheless, insofar as the NT is not a work of scriptural interpretation and is not associated with the Halachah, it cannot be said to contain any Haggadah in the strictly technical sense of the term.

Bibliography. R. T. Herford, Talmud and Apocrypha (1933); I. Epstein, Judaism (rev. ed., 1945). I. EPSTEIN

HAGGAI hăg′ī ī, hăg′ī [חגי; LXX Ἀγγαῖος]; KJV Apoc. AGGEUS ă gē′əs. The tenth in the series of twelve short prophetic books which forms the final section of the OT. See map "Palestine: Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi," under ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.

A. The prophet
B. The book
1. Historical background
2. The four prophecies
a. Ch. 1
b. 2:1-9
c. 2:10-19
d. 2:20-23
C. The significance of Haggai
Bibliography

A. THE PROPHET. The name Haggai is derived from the word for "a festival," which would suggest that the prophet was born on some feast day. Little or nothing is known of his background. He is referred to simply as "the prophet" (1:1, etc.; Ezra 5:1; 6:14), and no ancestry is given. He would appear, however, from this description, to have been a conspicuous figure, and Jewish tradition has it that he was known as a prophet in Babylon during the Exile.

On the evidence of 1:1 he was active in Jerusalem in 520 B.C.; this may suggest that he had made his way there sometime before this date. He does not appear to have been of the priestly caste, since he asks the priests' guidance on a matter of Levitical practice (2:11-13). If 2:3 implies that he had seen the temple before its destruction in 586, he was a very old man when he became one of the prime movers for its restoration in 520. In association with ZECHARIAH (Ezra 4:24–5:1; 6:14; Zech. 1:16) he rouses the people of Jerusalem and their leaders ZERUBBABEL and JOSHUA (3) to undertake this task; and it would appear to be largely because of his energy and enthusiasm, as indicated in his oracles, that the work of restoration was begun almost immediately after his first appeal, and completed within four years (Ezra 6:15).

In later Talmudic tradition Haggai was associated with Zechariah and Malachi as joint founder of the "Great Synagogue," and it was considered that with the death of these, the last of the prophets, the Holy Spirit departed from Israel. A number of psalms are attributed to Haggai and Zechariah in the LXX, Vulg., and Peshitta (e.g., Pss. 138; 146–149); this may account for the Christian, as opposed to the Jewish, tradition that the prophet was of priestly descent.

B. THE BOOK. Haggai is the first of the collection of prophecies dating from the postexilic period; the others are Zechariah and Malachi. Haggai is the shortest of the three, comprising merely two chapters totaling thirty-eight verses. These are made up of four utterances delivered within the space of four months in the second year of the reign of Darius I Hystaspis, king of Persia (522-486)—i.e., in 520. The form of the book would suggest that these oracles were collected by someone other than the prophet himself. Haggai is referred to throughout in the third person and is described impersonally as "the prophet." Moreover, the book serves as a record of the effect of the prophet's words, as well as a collection of his utterances. It is, of course, possible that Haggai himself compiled the book and chose to refer to himself in the third person, but the general view is that the compilation was done by some unknown disciple not long after the time at which the oracles were first delivered.

1. Historical background. Despite the Chronicler's impressive account of the return of the Jews to Jerusalem from exile as being the main result of the conquest of Babylon by CYRUS in 539 and, indeed, as being the chief motive behind Cyrus' campaigns, both the return and its sequel appear to have been much more prosaic than the narrative of Ezra 1–3 would suggest. According to the text of the Cylinder of Cyrus, when the victorious Persian king had taken possession of the territories of Babylon, he gave general permission to racial minorities exiled there to return to their own countries if they wished to do so.

Contrary to the Chronicler's rosy picture of a mass return of the exiled Jews to Palestine and the immediate undertaking of the rebuilding of the temple, it seems more probable that only some of the Jews availed themselves of this opportunity, and that their first task was to eke out some kind of existence in a land that had suffered much ever since its capital city had been destroyed fifty years earlier.

Under the leadership of Shesh-bazzar, who is described as the "prince of Judah" (Ezra 1:8) and "governor" (5:14), which presumably means that he was the first ruler of what was now the Persian province of Judah, it is possible that in 537 (i.e., the second year after the return; cf. Ezra 3:8-13) the repatriated exiles laid the foundations of a new temple amid the ruins of Jerusalem, as indicated in Ezra 5:16. If they did so, there is no indication in the books of Haggai and Zechariah that they had proceeded any further with its building.

It is more probable that the Chronicler, writing his narrative over two centuries later, has given an idealized account of what actually happened. In his desire to credit the returning exiles with a religious zeal to fulfil the hopes of Second Isaiah and Ezekiel, he has invested the early days of the return with a fervor to which the more sober contemporary evidence of Haggai and Zechariah lends no support. The impression conveyed by both these writings would tend to confirm the view that it was not until the emergence of Haggai as an inspired leader that any serious steps were taken to restore the dilapidated temple at all, and that the rebuilding did not, in fact, start until 520 (i.e., the second year of Darius I), under the governorship of Zerubbabel (ch. 1).

Many Jews had preferred to remain in Babylon (Jos. Antiq. XI.iii), including those who had established themselves most successfully. Those who returned not only were presumably not possessed of abundant means, but also whatever zeal they had for the restoration of the house of the Lord was tempered by finding themselves among people who had become reconciled to the sight of the ruined sanctuary.

The destruction of the temple in 586 by the army of Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:9) would mean the breaching of the walls and the disappearance of the shrine and adjacent buildings, but the whole area with its courts would still be available as a sacred place for those who were minded to worship. An altar for burnt offerings was no difficult matter to erect, if, indeed, the old one had been destroyed, and there is evidence that this was in use (Jer. 41:5; cf. Hag. 2:14) and that priests were in attendance (Lam. 1:4). There are more somber indications in both Jeremiah and Ezekiel (e.g., Jer. 7:17-19; Ezek. 8:9-18) that pagan cults, including the worship of Ishtar, Tammuz, and the sun, had established themselves side by side with the worship of Yahweh. Even if these were conditions which obtained before the fall of Jerusalem, it would be more than likely that they persisted after the visible reminders of the superiority of Yahweh-worship had vanished.

Economic conditions, too, must further have lowered the morale of those who were left among the fragments of the Jewish state. The devastation of the Babylonian conquest was heightened both by harrying tactics on the part of the petty kingdoms which surrounded Judah, and later by the marauding Persian army under Cambyses on its way to invade Egypt in 525. When in addition to this we remember the gloomy picture drawn by the book of Haggai of a people crippled by a succession of bad harvests, with subsequent poverty, it is difficult to think that the period between the return and the emergence of Haggai as a leader can have been anything other than a dispiriting struggle for existence, far less one of religious enthusiasm. Concern for the rebuilding of the temple must have been the least of the anxieties of the sorely tried people of Jerusalem.

But outside Palestine big events were afoot. When Darius I succeeded Cambyses as ruler of the Persian Empire in 522, revolts broke out throughout the subject provinces. The supremacy of the Gentile masters of the world was threatened. To a prophetic mind such as that of Haggai, accustomed to look for the leading of Yahweh in the signs of the times, this must have suggested the prelude to the end event of history, the final destruction of the power of the Gentiles and the establishment of the messianic kingdom. With Zerubbabel, a scion of the house of David (I Chr. 3:17-19), installed as governor of Judah, and assuming in the prophet's mind messianic status, the time appeared to be ripe for the rehabilitation of the house of the Lord, so that Yahweh might return to his people, as Ezekiel and Second Isaiah had foretold, to establish his throne in Zion (Isa. 52:7-10; Ezek. 43:4-5). It was in such a situation that Haggai uttered the oracles which are contained in this book.

2. The four prophecies. a. Ch. 1. In August-September, 520, Haggai appeals to Zerubbabel and Joshua, the high priest, to rally the people to the rebuilding of the shattered temple. He accuses the people of Jerusalem who were in a position to help of being more concerned about their own comforts than that the house of the Lord should be restored. The disasters of drought and bad harvests from which they have suffered are nothing but God's punishment for their impious neglect. The prophet's words have an immediate effect, and, within three weeks, work on the temple commences.

b. 2:1-9. A month later Haggai has to appeal again. Apparently the builders had lost heart. They felt that the new temple could never compare with the glories of its predecessor. Haggai encourages them with the promise of the speedy advent of the messianic kingdom and the downfall of the Gentiles. Their treasures will flow to Jerusalem to enrich the new house of the Lord (cf. Zech. 2:8-9).

c. 2:10-19. The meaning of the third oracle, delivered two months later still (i.e., November-December, 520), is rather obscure. Some commentators prefer to rearrange the order. But, taken as it stands, it suggests that the prophet secures a decision from the priests to the effect that ritual uncleanness is more contagious than ritual holiness, and applies this to the rebuilding of the temple. He may mean that the previous unwillingness of the people to rebuild the temple had tainted their service of Yahweh, with consequent disaster to themselves; but that now that the work had started, their prosperity was assured. On the other hand, "this people" (vs. 14) may refer to the Samaritans (cf. Ezra 4:1-5), in which case Haggai is recommending that their offer of help should be rejected on the grounds that they are undesirable associates—presumably, at this pre-Nehemiah-Ezra stage, on political rather than religious grounds.

d. 2:20-23. In the last oracle, uttered on the same day as the preceding one, Haggai proclaims the impending end of Gentile domination in the Day of the Lord, and declares Zerubbabel to be the messianic king.

C. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF HAGGAI. The value of the book is historical rather than religious. The prophecies may originally have been connected with the cultic rites of the New Year Festival, but they represent a sad decline from the ethical vigor and conviction of those of the pre-exilic prophets. Haggai's chief concern is the re-establishment of the cultus, the shell rather than the kernel. While it may be true that without the shell the kernel withers, there are lacking here the profound insights into the nature of worship which we find in Amos or Jeremiah. Haggai takes the superficial view that material prosperity is assured provided the mechanics of worship are guaranteed.

Yet on a long-term view it must be said that, without the temple and the Judaism which centered on it, the legacy of the great prophets would have been quickly dissipated, and Christianity would have had no foundations on which to build. Haggai deserves to be remembered for his contribution to this. Zerubbabel was not the Messiah, as Haggai imagined, and the messianic age when it came did not bring about the downfall of the Gentiles and the enrichment of the temple, as the prophet expected; but the hope and encouragement which Haggai's message brought to the dejected community of Judah at that time was, in the providence of God, a significant milestone in the Praeparatio Evangelica.

From a historical point of view the value of the book is, of course, that together with the book of Zechariah it forms a corrective to the inaccuracies of the Chronicler and sheds welcome light on the obscure period between the fall of Jerusalem and the achievements of Nehemiah. See TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

Bibliography. Commentaries: S. R. Driver, Century Bible (1906); H. G. Mitchell, ICC (1912); W. E. Barnes, Cambridge Bible (1917); G. A. Smith, EB (1928); E. Sellin, KAT (1929); F. Horst, HAT (1954); D. Winton Thomas, IB, vol. VI (1956). See also Introductions to the literature of the OT by Driver, Pfeiffer, Bentzen, etc.

For background see L. E. Browne, Early Judaism (1920).

Special study: P. F. Bloomhardt, "The Poems of Haggai," HUCA, V (1928) 153-95. W. NEIL

HAGGEDOLIM hăg'ə dō'lĭm [הגדולים, the great ones, or the high priests] (Neh. 11:14); KJV ONE OF THE GREAT MEN. The father of Zabdiel, a priest. Either the KJV is correct in translating the word (cf. LXX), or the text is corrupt.

HAGGERI. KJV form of HAGRI.

HAGGI hăg'ī [חגי, born on a feast day; cf. personal names חגי (HAGGAI), חגית, חגיה]; HAGGITES hăg'ītes. The second son of Gad; ancestral head of the "family of the Haggites" (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

HAGGIAH hă gī'ə [חגיה, festal (i.e., born on a festival day)]. A Levite; descendant of Merari (I Chr. 6:30—H 6:15). The last element of this name is not theophorous but hypocoristic.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 222. B. T. DAHLBERG

HAGGITES. See HAGGI.

HAGGITH hăg'ĭth [חגית, born on the feast day; cf. personal names Haggai, Haggi]. A wife of David; mother of Adonijah, who later claimed the throne (II Sam. 3:4; I Kings 1:5, 11; 2:13; I Chr. 3:2).

HAGIA. KJV Apoc. form of HATTIL.

HAGIOGRAPHA hăg'ī ŏg'rə fə, hā'jĭ— [כתובים, writings; ἁγιογραφα, holy writings]. The term (transliterated from Greek) used for the third division of the Hebrew Bible, the Writings. In contrast to the other two (the Law and the Prophets), it is a miscellaneous collection of eleven (in Hebrew) varied books which achieved canonization separately (see CANON OF THE OT). Printed Hebrew texts, following German and French MSS, place these books in the following order: (a) three large poetical books (Psalms, Proverbs, Job); (b) the five scrolls (Megilloth) which came to be read in the synagogues at five great feasts (Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther); (c) a book of late prophecy (Daniel); and (d) two books of postexilic history (Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles). English Bibles follow the Greek and consequently arrange these books in a different order. F. T. SCHUMACHER

HAGRI hăg'rī [הגרי] (I Chr. 11:38); KJV HAGGERI hăg'ə rī. Father of Mibhar, one of the Mighty Men in David's army. Instead of "Mibhar the son of Hagri" the parallel passage in II Sam. 23:36 has "Bani the Gadite," and this is preferred by commentators. R. F. SCHNELL

HAGRITE hăg'rīt [הגרי, descendant of Hagar(?)] (I Chr. 27:30—H 27:31); KJV HAGERITE hăg'ə-rīt. HAGRITES [הגרים, הגראים, הגריאים] (I Chr. 5:10, 19-20: Ps. 83:6—H 83:7); KJV HAGARITES [הגריאים, הגראים] in I Chr. 5:10, 19-20; KJV HAGARENES hăg'ə rēnz [הגרים] in Ps. 83:6—H 83:7. A pastoral Bedouin tribe living in the region E of Gilead. They are named with Moab, Edom, Ishmaelites, and other enemies of Israel who dwelt in the Transjordan (Ps. 83:6—H 83:7). They are likely the same people as the Ἀγραῖοι referred to by the Greek geographers Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny.

In the time of Saul the tribe of Reuben, perhaps with the assistance of the other Transjordan tribes, extended its territory to the edge of the desert by conquering the Hagrites (I Chr. 5:10, 19-22). When David organized his kingdom, Jaziz the Hagrite was given oversight of the flocks (I Chr. 27:30). The ethnological relationship of the Hagrites with Hagar the mother of Ishmael (Gen. 16) is uncertain.

"Sons of Hagar" (οἱ υἱοὶ Ἀγαρ; KJV "Agarenes") are mentioned in connection with Teman in Bar. 3:23. Their identification here is not significant. The passage is reminiscent of the tradition of the wisdom of the East, mentioned also in I Kings 4:30—H 5:10; Jer. 49:7; Obad. 8.

Bibliography. E. Meyer, Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme (1906), p. 328. R. F. SCHNELL

HAHIROTH. See PI-HAHIROTH.

HAI. KJV alternate form of AI.

HAIL, HAILSTONES [ברד, אלגביש; χάλαζα]. Hail occurs only as the result of violent turbulence in fully developed cumulo-nimbus clouds, and frequently accompanies severe thunderstorms. Raindrops within the cloud are carried to great heights where the temperature is below 0° F; the ice pellets grow in size as they are carried up and down. When they eventually fall to earth, they may be hailstones ½-1 inch in diameter, capable of damaging field crops and even of injuring men and animals. In exceptional conditions they may be even larger; hailstones weighing 10 ounces have been recorded in England and some weighing 24 ounces in Nebraska. In October, 1937, in the coastal plain near Tel Aviv, roof tiles were broken by hailstones.

Hailstorms are recorded in the Bible as ruining crops (Exod. 9:18-34; Hag. 2:17) and striking down men and animals in the open (Exod. 9:25; Josh. 10:11), and as accompanied by lightning (Exod. 9:23; Ps. 18:12-13—H 18:13-14; Rev. 11:19), storm winds (Ezek. 13:11), driving rain (Isa. 28:17), and snow (Job 38:22). The hailstones which killed the Amorites at Gibeon must have come from an exceptionally heavy cumulo-nimbus behind which "the sun stood still [remained] . . . until the nation took vengeance on their enemies" (Josh. 10:11-13). See PALESTINE, CLIMATE OF.

Bibliography. D. Ashbel, Introduction to Meteorology (1940), pp. 246-47 (in Hebrew); G. Kimble and R. Bush, The Weather (1946), pp. 112-14. R. B. Y. SCOTT

HAIR [שער, שערה; θρίξ, κόμη]. The hair's capacity for constant growth has always made it seem an important seat of life and, therefore, religiously significant. The most notable example of this in the Bible is in the case of the NAZIRITE vow (Num. 6:1-21; Judg. 13:5; 16:17; I Sam. 1:11), one aspect of which was to allow the hair to grow long so that it might be presented to God as an offering (Num. 6:18; Acts 18:18; 21:23-24). Samson's hair, in the final form of the story (Judg. 13:5), appears to have been left long in fulfilment of such a vow, although originally it had a more primitive significance as the repository of his strength (Judg. 16:19, 22). The shaving of the head in mourning (Job 1:20; Isa. 15:2; Jer. 41:5; 47:5; 48:37; Ezek. 7:18) and the offering of the hair to the dead were part of ancient religious practice, but forbidden to the Hebrews (Deut. 14:1). Indeed, the complete shaving of the head was forbidden to them for any purpose (Lev. 19:27; cf. Jer. 9:26; Ezek. 44:20).

In the OT, long hair on men was greatly admired (II Sam. 14:25-26; cf. Song of S. 5:2, 11), but in the NT it is frowned upon as contrary to nature (I Cor. 11:14). Although women wore their hair long (I Cor. 11:15), the biblical writers deplore the excessive ornamentation of it (Isa. 3:24; I Pet. 3:3).

The hair is a symbol of the fine (Judg. 20:16), the small (Luke 21:18), and the numerous (Matt. 10:30).

Fig. COS 49. R. C. DENTAN

HAIRCLOTH [בעל שער]. A term used in II Kings 1:8 ("He wore a garment of haircloth"), where the KJV translates: "He was a hairy man." The versions support the KJV meaning, but the RSV translation is obviously right in view of the phraseology in Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6.

See also HAIR; DRESS AND ORNAMENTS.

J. M. MYERS

HAKKATAN hăk'ə tăn [הקטן, the small one; Apoc. Ακαταν]; KJV Apoc. ACATAN ăk'—. A member of the family of Azgad; the father of a certain Johanan, who returned to Jerusalem from the Babylonian exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:12; I Esd. 8:38).

HAKKOZ hăk'ŏz [הקוץ, the thorn; Apoc. Ακκώς]; KJV KOZ kŏz in Ezra 2:61; Neh. 3:4, 21; 7:63; KJV ACCOZ ăk'ŏz in I Esd. 5:38. Alternately: ACCOS ăk'ŏs (I Macc. 8:17).

The eponym of a family of priests in David's time (I Chr. 24:10). Members of this family were among those unable to document their claim to priestly rank after the Exile and so were suspended from sacerdotal office (Ezra 2:61; cf. Neh. 7:63; I Esd. 5:38). It is perhaps this family that is represented by the Uriah who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 21). Presumably the Eupolemus sent by Judas Maccabeus as member of an embassy to Rome was a scion of this house (I Macc. 8:17).

See also KOZ. B. T. DAHLBERG

HAKUPHA hə kū'fə [חקופא, crooked; Apoc. Ακουφά, Ακειφά, Αχειφά]; KJV Apoc. ACIPHA ə sī'fə. Head of a family of postexilic temple servants of lower rank (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53). See NETHINIM.

HALACHAH hä'lä kä' [הלכה, from root to walk, with reference to Exod. 18:20]. The authoritative Jewish way of life as expressed in moral law and ritual precept. It embraces the whole body of Jewish teaching, legislation, and practices which have proceeded from the interpretation and reinterpretation of the laws of the Bible through an unbroken succession of generations of Jewish teachers from Ezra onward; it also includes adaptations or modifications from time to time made applicable to changed conditions of life —economic, domestic, political, social—by spiritual leaders. Although legalistic in content, the Halachah is designed to bring all human occupations into relation with the service of God and to establish the supremacy of the divine will as the measure of all directions and strivings of human life.

See also TALMUD. I. EPSTEIN

HALAH hā'lə [חלח]. A city or district in the Assyrian Empire, to which Shalmaneser exiled some of the Israelites in the ninth year of King Hosea (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; see I Chr. 5:26 for Pul or Tiglath-pileser's exiling of Israelites to Halah). The RSV makes a common conjectural emendation in Obad. 20, reading "the exiles in Halah" for "the exile of this host" (cf. KJV). C. H. GORDON

HALAK, MOUNT hā'lăk [ההר החלק, bald mountain]. A mountain mentioned as the S limit of the conquest of Joshua (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). It is described as being "on the way leading up to Seir" (cf. RSV "that rises toward Seir"), the wooded slopes E of the Arabah. The name and site are preserved in the Jebel Halaq on the NW side of the Wadi Marra, N of 'Abdeh. S. COHEN

HALAKAH. A variant spelling of HALACHAH.

HALF-SHEKEL TAX [δίδραχμον]. The temple tax (see Matt. 17:24) required annually of every Jew. A half-shekel was worth approximately two Attic drachmas, or about thirty-six cents. See TAXES.

HALF-TRIBE [חצי שבט]. A term used chiefly in Joshua and I Chronicles (elsewhere only in Numbers and Deuteronomy), always with reference to MANASSEH. After Moses and his troops had defeated Sihon of Heshbon and Og of Bashan, half the tribe of Manasseh, like Reuben and Gad, requested permission to settle E of the Jordan River. Permission was granted on condition that they lead the military invasion of Canaan and help in the establishment of settlements W of the Jordan (Num. 32, especially vss. 33-42; Deut. 3:12-13; 29:8; Josh. 12:4-6; 18:7). When these conditions had been met, the half-tribe of Manasseh returned with Reuben and Gad to the E of the Jordan (Josh. 1:12-18; 4:12). The half-tribe of Manasseh which settled E of the Jordan was given a part of the territory of Gilead and all of Bashan (Deut. 3:13-15; Josh. 13:29-33); the other half-tribe settled in central Palestine, in a region bounded by Ephraim on the S, Issachar on the NE, and Asher on the NW (Josh. 17:5-10); however, boundary lines among these tribes do not seem to have been clearly established (see Josh. 16:9; 17:11).

See also TRIBE.

H. F. BECK

HALHUL hăl'hŭl [חלחול] (Josh. 15:58). A city of Judah in the hill-country district of Beth-zur; identified with Halhul, four miles N of Hebron. In NT times Alulos (Halhul) was near the S border of the territory of Aelia Capitolina (Jerusalem).

V. R. GOLD

HALI hā'lī [חלי] (Josh. 19:25). A border town in the territory of Asher. According to the context, it must be near Helkath, but its exact location is unknown.

HALICARNASSUS hăl'ə kär năs'əs ['Αλικαρνασσός]. A Greek city founded as a Dorian colony in Caria of Asia Minor. It was located on the NW shore of the Ceramic Gulf and had an excellent harbor. Heights at the site permitted unusually strong fortifications. Before Alexander the Great destroyed the city in reprisal for its support of the Persians, it was the largest and strongest city in CARIA. After this destruction in 334 B.C. it never regained its former greatness, but it continued to be important in commerce and cultural life. It was noted as the location of the tomb of King Mausolus (377-353 B.C.). Erected by his sister and wife, Artemisia, this monument was included among the seven wonders of the ancient world, and the noun "mausoleum" derives from it. Among the noted writers of Halicarnassus were the historians Herodotus and Dionysius. A modern village, Bodrum, occupies a portion of the ancient city site.

Halicarnassus was Greek in its life and culture. Because of its wide commercial and cultural ties, however, its population was of mixed origin. There is clear evidence from the last two centuries B.C. that numbers of Jews lived there. I Macc. 15:23 states that ca. 139 B.C. the Romans sent letters to the city to urge that the Jews there be protected in their life and worship. Josephus (Antiq. XIV.x.23) quotes a decree which the people of the city passed, probably in the middle of the first century B.C., stating "that those Jewish men and women who so wish may observe their Sabbaths and perform their sacred rites in accordance with the Jewish laws, and may build places of prayer near the sea, in accordance with their native custom."

Bibliography. Strabo Geography XIV.2.16-17; C. T. Newton, Travels and Discoveries in the Levant, II (1865), 58-146; D. Magie, Roman Rule in Asia Minor (1950), especially pp. 86-87, 909-11.

F. V. FILSON

HALL. 1. A hall or room (לשכה; KJV "parlor") connected with the sanctuary, in which the sacrificial meal was eaten, and to which Saul and his servant were invited by Samuel (I Sam. 9:22). Some scholars emend the present corrupt Hebrew text of I Sam. 1:9 to read "in the hall" instead of "in Shiloh," because of its reference to eating the sacrificial meal. The same word apparently underlies the LXX translation of I Sam. 1:18: "Then the woman went her way and entered the hall and ate and drank with her husband." לשכה is also used of the chambers of various officials in the temple at Jerusalem (II Kings 23:11; Jer. 35:2, 4; 36:10; Ezek. 40:17, 38) and of a scribe's room in the palace (Jer. 36:12, 20-21).

2. The Hall of Pillars (אולם העמודים; KJV "porch of pillars"; I Kings 7:6), part of King Solomon's PALACE buildings. Some scholars take this hall to be a pillared porch at the entrance of the House of the Forest of Lebanon, with the Hall of Judgment (see 3 below) at the other end. Others see it as a separate building, possibly an entrance hall to the whole palace complex. Such a pillared entrance hall has been found in the palace and temple complex at Tell Tainat in Syria, dating from the eighth century B.C. Figs. HAL 3; TEM 20.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

3. Excavation which shows the three drum bases on the porch of a palace at Tell Tainat, built in the eighth century B.C.

3. The Hall of the Throne (אולם הכסא; KJV "porch for the throne"), or Hall of Judgment (אולם המשפט; KJV "porch of judgment"; I Kings 7:7), another of Solomon's buildings.* In it was the royal throne, and here the kings gave their legal judgments. The dimensions of this hall are not given, but its splendor is suggested by the cedar paneling from floor to rafters. Its position in relation to the other buildings must be conjectured. Some have made it a chamber at one end of the House of the Forest of Lebanon, with that building and its pillared porch providing an impressive entranceway to it. Others have made it an audience chamber at the entrance to the royal residence itself. The latter seems to have been the relation of judgment hall to palace in the royal buildings of Darius at Persepolis four hundred years later. Figs. HOU 32-33; PER 33.

4. The king's hall (בית המלך; KJV "king's house"), the audience chamber of the Persian king Ahasuerus (Xerxes) at Susa (Esth. 5:1). That this passage refers to a specific hall within the palace, rather than to the palace as a whole (as in Esth. 2:8-9, 13; 4:13), seems evident from the wording of 5:1. The ruins of the royal audience chamber of Darius and Xerxes at Susa (called "Apadana," lit. "hall of pillars") have been excavated. It was a great room 193 feet square with six rows of pillars, six pillars in each row, supporting the roof. The pillars were 7 feet around and 65 feet high, with capitals formed of the forequarters of two bulls facing outward. On three sides of the hall were porches, each with two rows of these same fine columns. In this room was the throne of King Xerxes, where he sat in audience and in judgment. See PALACE § 1.

5. The banqueting hall (Aramaic בית משתיא; KJV "banquet house") of King Belshazzar, the scene of the feast and the handwriting on the wall (Dan. 5:10). The corresponding Hebrew words (בית משתה) are used in Esth. 7:8; Eccl. 7:2; Jer. 16:8, to describe rooms of a more private nature. In this case, however, it is a great audience chamber. The throne room of the kings of Babylon has been excavated. It was a rectangular room ca. 50 feet by 160 feet and probably had a great vaulted roof. The floors were paved with brick, and the plastered walls were decorated with colorful scenes in tile. A doubly recessed niche in the S wall faced the main entrance, and, from his throne in this niche, the king commanded the attention of all those in the hall and could be seen also by people in the paved court outside. This hall was very likely the scene of Belshazzar's feast.

6. The KJV translation of ἀυλή in Luke 22:55 (RSV "courtyard"; cf. Matt. 26:58, 69; Mark 14:54, 66; John 18:15; in all of which the KJV has "palace" and the RSV "court" or "courtyard"). It usually means an enclosed but unroofed space. In the LXX of Exod. 27:9 and in Rev. 11:2 it designates the courtyard of the tabernacle or temple.

7. The KJV translation of ἀυλή and πραιτώριον, in reference to the official residence of the governor. In Jerusalem this was Pilate's quarters in the fortress of Antonia (Mark 15:16; KJV "the hall [ἀυλή], called Praetorium"; RSV "the palace [that is, the praetorium]"). In Caesarea it was Herod's headquarters (Acts 23:35). Here, and in Matt. 27:27; John 18:28, 33; 19:9, the KJV has "judgment hall" but the RSV, more literally, "praetorium."

Bibliography. R. Koldewey, Excavations at Babylon (1914), pp. 103 ff; A. T. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire (1948), pp. 280 ff; J. A. Montgomery and H. S. Gehman, Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Kings, ICC (1951), pp. 164-65; A. Parrot, Temple of Jerusalem (1957), pp. 19-21.

S. V. FAWCETT

HALLEL hăl'əl, Heb. hə lāl' [הלל, praise thou (the Lord); cf. HALLELUJAH)]. A song of praise to the Lord. To praise the Lord was one of the duties of the Levites (II Chr. 7:6; Ezra 3:11) and of the daily morning prayer (Pss. 145–50).

The "Egyptian" Hallel (Pss. 113–18; cf. 114:1), according to a tradition of the first century A.D., was composed by Moses. It was recited in the homes at the Passover meal (Matt. 26:30), in the temple and in the synagogues at the great annual festivals and at the day of the New Moon. It celebrates God's great deeds from the Exodus till the messianic time.

The "Great" Hallel (Pss. 120–36, or 135–36, or even 136 only) praises God for having given rain (135:1) and food to all flesh (136:25).

Bibliography. H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch, I (1922), 845 ff; I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst (2nd ed., 1924), pp. 494 ff.

J. HEMPEL

HALLELUJAH hăl'ə lōō'yə [הללויה, הללוי־ה, praise (ye) the Lord]. The form of doxology used in the fifth book of Psalms and in the work of the Chronicler.

1. Philological questions
2. Cultic use
   a. In the Psalms
   b. Outside the Jerusalem cult
   c. In the Christian churches
Bibliography

1. Philological questions. The intensive stem of the root הלל (pi'el: "to praise"; pu'al: "to be praised"; hithpa'el: "to praise oneself") is used in both a secular and a religious sense. The servants of Pharaoh praise Sarah for her beauty (Gen. 12:15; cf. II Sam. 14:25 [Absalom]; contrast Ecclus. 11:2). The virgins are praised on their wedding day (Ps. 78:63), or Tyre for the power of the town (Ezek. 26:17). The king may praise himself for his weapons (I Kings 20:11; cf. Prov. 27:2; Jer. 9:22-23) as the people praise their king (II Chr. 23:12). In the same way the Philistines praise their god Dagon (Judg. 16:24) and the Israelites Yahweh (e.g., I Chr. 23:5; Jer. 20:13), his word (Ps. 56:4—H 56:5), or his name (e.g., Ps. 113:1; Isa. 62:9 in 1QIs^a). He is praised by them (e.g., I Chr. 16:25) as by the fathers in the Jerusalem temple before the Exile (Isa. 64:10). The heathen praise themselves by their idols (Ps. 97:7), as the Israelites do by Yahweh (e.g., I Chr. 16:10; Isa. 44:6; 45:25).

This use is the reason for the Jewish interpretation of the cultic exclamation "Hallelujah" as an imperative: "Praise!" with "Yah" (abbreviation of "Yahweh," as, e.g., in Pss. 68:18—H 68:19; 77:11—H 77:12) as its object. According to this understanding it may be followed by הללו את־יהוה ("Praise Yahweh") and הללוהו ("Praise him"; Ps. 148:1) or by הללו אל ("Praise God"; Ps. 150:3). But there is a Jewish tradition that this interpretation is secondary and "Hallelujah" a very ancient enthusiastic cultic shout not containing the divine name. It is indeed astonishing that there is no clear example of the use of the verb הלל with "Yahweh" as its object before Deutero-Isaiah and that "Hallelujah" is to be found only even later. Side by side with AMEN it closes the fourth book of Psalms (Ps. 106:48). It appears in the MT at the opening (Pss. 106:1; 111:1; 112:1) or at the end of some psalms (104:35; 105:45; 115–117; see HALLEL), or in both places (113; 135; 146–150). It may be that the verb הלל had before the Exile a profane and "heathenish" sense, making it not worthy to be used for the God of Israel. In any case, there is no reason to see in "Hallelujah" the root of the Israelite hymns. The custom of starting songs of praise with an imperative is older than the Israelite literature or the "Hallelujah" in the Psalms.

The LXX, followed by the Vulg. and most of the modern translations, does not translate "Hallelujah." The η of their ἀλληλουια is still unexplained. Theod. uses αἰνεῖτε τὸν ὄν ("Praise the One").

2. Cultic use. a. In the Psalms. The psalms containing "Hallelujah" praise the Lord for his power and his wisdom in the creation of the world (Ps. 104) or in the history of Israel, especially in the liberation from Egypt (105; 106; 135). His mighty blessings are far stronger than those of the idols (115), so that the heathen too shall sing it (117). In the life of the single pious man God's life-giving strength is no less visible and adorable (116). The group of the so-called "Hallelujah psalms" (146–150) combines all these motives in a general praise of all that God did, does, and will do. The work of the Chronicler shows the manner of its use, especially in the Jerusalem cult. "Hallelujah" is sung as an antiphony by the different choirs (Ps. 135:19 ff; cf. I Chr. 16:25) or by the congregation (I Chr. 16:36; 29:8 ff); this singing is the main duty of the Levites according to the rule believed to be instituted by David (e.g., I Chr. 23:5; Neh. 12:24). During a certain period "Hallelujah" was repeated after every verse of the Hallel.

b. Outside the Jerusalem cult. "Hallelujah" appears in III Macc. 7:13; the Egyptian Jews, saved from the king's elephants, sang it going home in Alexandria. In the Last Days the streets of the redeemed Jerusalem will sing it (Tob. 13:18), and Rev. 19:1 ff waits for the great choir of the angels, the twenty-four elders, and the four living creatures, who will celebrate by this acclamation the salvation and glory and power of God and the marriage of the Lamb. The Christian-Gnostic Odes of Solomon have "Hallelujah" at the end of each poem.

c. In the Christian churches. The use of "Hallelujah" in the Christian churches varies. In the Eastern churches it has a long and living tradition with a great musical richness. In Bethlehem, Jerome found it sung by the congregation after the lessons, and he persuaded Pope Damasus to introduce it in Rome into the service at Easter. This custom extended more and more, until Gregory I introduced it into all services. To avoid some abuses arising with the custom of singing the final syllable, "jah," at great length with many tones, he connected it with a short verse (e.g., Pss. 5:2; 7:12; 85:8; 95:1; 98:1; 147:12). During the Middle Ages the custom arose of combining the melody of this final syllable with some words in Latin or the vernacular languages. These so-called "sequences" are perhaps the most important root for the religious popular songs and canticles from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century and of the Protestant chorals. Luther accepted (1523) the "Hallelujah" after the lessons as "eternal voice of the church, no less eternal than the memory of his passion and his victory," but banished it (without remaining success) in 1526. The Missale Romanum and the Protestant liturgies retaining its general outlines have a double "Hallelujah" between Easter and Pentecost, but do not sing it during the fasting times.

Bibliography. M. Jastrow, Jr., "The Origin of the Form יה for the Divine Name," ZAW, 16 (1896), 1-16; P. Wagner and F. Cabrol in Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, I (1907), 1226-46; T. J. O'Mahony in Catholic Encyclopedia, I (1907), 319-20; L. Petit in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, I (1909), 836-39; T. Nöldeke, "Halleluja," BZAW, 33 (1918), 376-80; I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung (2nd ed., 1924); J. Beckmann in Leiturgia, II (1955), 71-75; M. Reisel, The Mysterious Name of Y.H.W.H. (1957); E. Lohse, RGG, III (1959), 38. J. HEMPEL

HALLOHESH hă lō'hĕsh [הלוחש, the whisperer—evidently the professional title of a charmer]. The father of Shallum, who, with his daughters, helped repair the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:12). The name also appears among those who sealed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:24—H 10:25).

M. NEWMAN

HALLOW. See HOLINESS.

HALT. KJV alternate translation of χωλός. See LAME.

HAM hăm [חם, perhaps hypocoristicon with West Semitic Ḥammu; cf. personal name חמואל; Χαμ; Vulg. Cham; identifications with Egyp. km and Coptic kême are no longer favored]. 1. The second of Noah's three sons (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; I Chr. 1:4). With his wife, Ham joined his married brothers and his father in the ark. After the Flood he shared in the divine blessing and covenant (Gen. 9:1-17). See NOAH § 1.

However, the early J story tells that when Noah awoke from his drunken sleep and "knew what his youngest son had done to him," he cursed Canaan—not Ham—and condemned him to the service of Shem and Japheth, his brothers (Gen. 9:20-27). It seems best, form-critically, to separate this story from the flood tradition and to infer that the original order of Noah's sons was: Shem, Japheth, Canaan. To harmonize the two accounts, an editor identified Ham as the father of Canaan in vss. 18, 22. See SHEM § 2; CANAAN 1.

The sons of Ham are listed in Gen. 10:6; I Chr. 1:8 as Cush, Egypt, Put, and Canaan. For "Hamites," see MAN, ETHNIC DIVISIONS OF. L. HICKS

2. The name used in Pss. 78:51; 105:23, 27; 106:22 as a poetical synonym of Miṣráyim (Egypt), since he is the eponymous father of the Hamites, of whom Egypt is a member nation (Gen. 10).

HAM (CITY) [חם]. A city of the Zuzim in the region E of the Jordan, which was smitten by Chedorlaomer and his allies in the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:5). The city is mentioned again as Huma, no. 118 in the list of Thut-mose III. The name is preserved in the modern village of Ham on the Wadi er-Rejeileh (also called Wadi Ham), ca. four miles S of Irbid. The tell (Tell Ham) nearby, which marks the site of the ancient city, shows evidence of a settlement in the Bronze and Iron ages and the remains of a triple wall built of very large stones.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, AASOR, XXV–XXVIII (1951), 165-66. S. COHEN

HAMAN hā'mən [המן]. The prime minister of the Persian king Ahasuerus and an enemy of the Jews in the book of ESTHER.

The son of Hammedatha (Esth. 3:1, etc.), Haman is also called an Agagite in 3:1, 10; 8:3, 5; 9:24. This designation is probably intended to relate him to Agag, the Amalekite enemy of Saul of Kish in I Sam. 15.

Because Mordecai, a Jew of the line of Kish and the uncle of Esther, refused to bow before him, Haman contrived a plot to destroy all the Jews in the dominion of Ahasuerus. He specially prepared a gallows on which to hang Mordecai. But through the intervention of Esther, who was also the wife of Ahasuerus, Haman's plot was revealed, and he met the fate he had planned for Mordecai. In the subsequent purge by the Jews of their enemies, Haman's ten sons were killed too (9:6-10).

Some scholars view the story of Esther as reflecting a mythological struggle between the gods of Babylon and Elam, with Haman identified as the Elamite god Humman. Others regard it as romantic fiction created in connection with the Feast of Purim. Still others believe it records a genuine event of the fifth century B.C. in which the Jews in Persia survived a threatened persecution. In this case, Haman was probably a historical figure. M. NEWMAN

HAMATH hā'măth [חמת, חמת רבה; Akkad. Amātu(m); Aram. חמת; Egypt. Ḥmtu; Ημαθι; Arab. Ḥamāt]; KJV HEMATH hē'— in I Chr. 13:5; Amos 6:14; KJV Apoc. AMATHIS ăm'ə thĭs; HAMATHITE hā'mə thīt. 1. An important town on the Orontes in Syria; modern Nahr el-'Asi. It is in the valley on both sides of the river at the railway between Aleppo and Damascus, a little S of 35° latitude. At this spot the valley is on a level of 1,015 feet above the sea. Hamath was during long periods the center of an independent kingdom, the S frontier of which was the N frontier of the Israelite kingdom (cf. Num. 13:21; Josh. 13:5; Judg. 3:3). This was probably also the case during the reign of King David (cf. II Sam. 8; 10; 12:26-31).

The history of Hamath is fairly well known, thanks to a Danish excavation conducted by H. Ingholt (see bibliography). The earliest period of settlement known goes back to Neolithic times, and the excavator was able to uncover twelve layers. Level H seems to correspond to the Old Babylonian period. From the Hyksos period there are no findings, a fact which may indicate military devastation. In the Amarna age the town was the center of an Amorite kingdom (see AMORITES), but it seems to have been conquered by the famous Abdi-Ashirta, who played a political role and subdued a large territory in Syria, trying to be on friendly terms both with Egyptians and with Hittites.

Hamath is one of the important centers of the findings of Hittite hieroglyphic inscriptions. In the time of David, Hamath was the capital of an important kingdom, with which David collaborated. The latter conquered King Hadadezer of Zobah and perhaps this was possible through the help of Toi king of Hamath, whereas the king of Zobah was allied with Damascus (cf. II Sam. 8:3-12). Jeroboam II seems to have re-established the frontiers of the Israelite kingdom, so that the S frontier of Hamath again became the N frontier of the Israelite kingdom (cf. II Kings 14:25 ff; however, a textual error is not excluded). This would mean that Jeroboam recaptured the regions which had previously been taken by Damascus and Hamath. The power of the kingdom of Hamath is recognizable in Assyrian royal inscriptions. The inscription of Zakir king of Hamath and L'sh, is also an important testimony. The latter inscription is furthermore of essential import for our knowledge of the language of that time. Shalmaneser II says he conquered several towns in Syria, among others Hamath and Damascus. Still more decisive was the victory of Sargon II. At that time an Assyrian type of cult was practiced at Hamath. See bibliography.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

4. Hamath on the Orontes River

In the Hellenistic age Hamath was still of importance. In the reign of Antiochus IV its name was changed into Epiphania (Ἐπιφάνεια). During the Maccabean War, Hamath became the theater of war, when, according to I Macc. 12:24-25, the centurions of Demetrius stationed their armies in its territory.

In the Islamic age Hamath preserved its importance as a center of Christians. The Arab historian Dimashqi tells us about the Christian Easter (cf. Dimashqi, translated by Mehren, p. 408).

Today Hamath offers picturesque views to the tourist—e.g., its famous water wheels. But it is also an important commercial and industrial town (textiles in the first place).

Fig. HAM 4.

Bibliography. R. Dussaud, Topographie historique de la Syrie antique et médiévale (1927); H. Ingholt, Rapport préliminaire sur sept campagnes de fouilles à Hama en Syrie, 1932-38 (1940); P. Hitti, History of Syria (1951); J. Læssøe, "A Prayer to Ea, Shamash, and Marduk, from Hama," Iraq, vol. XVIII, no. 1 (1956).

2. A town which was also called Hamath-Zobah (II Chr. 8:3), or ZOBAH, situated S of 1 above (cf. II Sam. 8:9; II Chr. 8:3-4). This town is perhaps also mentioned in Ezek. 47:17, and it is probably the same town as Zobah. A. HALDAR

HAMATH, ENTRANCE OF [לבא חמת, lᵉbhô ḥᵃmāth]. The N border of the ideal limits of the Promised Land (Num. 34:8), and of the possession of the tribes of Israel in the New Age (Ezek. 47:15; 48:1). Solomon's kingdom extended from the Brook of Egypt (Wadi el-'Arish) to the entrance of Hamath (I Kings 8:65), and the kingdom of Israel at the time of Jeroboam reached northward to the entrance of Hamath (II Kings 14:25; see also Amos 6:14).

It was somewhere in the Valley of On (el-Biqa') between the Lebanon and Anti-lebanon Mountains. Some would place it in the lower part of this valley, between Mount Hermon and Mount Lebanon; in

Num. 13:21 it is mentioned with Rehob (Beth-rehob) near Dan. However, the association with Zedad (modern Sadad) and Hazar-enan (modern Qaryatein?), SE of Kadesh on the Orontes, suggests it should be placed in the territory of Riblah. It would have marked the S border of the territory controlled by Hamath.

It is not improbable, as some have suggested, that "entrance to Hamath" is to be rendered rather "Labo-hamath," the name of a town, to be identified with modern Lebweh on the Orontes below Riblah, commanding the watershed between the Orontes and the Leontes rivers. H. G. MAY HAMATH-ZOBAH hā'măth zō'bə [חמת צובה]. A designation of the town of ZOBAH in II Chr. 8:3.

HAMITES hăm'īts. See MAN, ETHNIC DIVISIONS.

HAMMATH hăm'ăth [חמת, hot spring]; KJV HEMATH hē'măth in I Chr. 2:55; 1. The "father" of Rechab (I Chr. 2:55), or the home of the Kenites of the family of Rechab. Considered as a place, this was probably in Judah, the Negeb, or farther S.

2. A fortified town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). It is located at Hammam Tabariyeh, a hot springs just S of Tiberias on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee. Hammath is almost certainly the same as the Levitical town known as Hammon in I Chr. 6:76—H 6:61 and Hammoth-dor in Josh. 21:32.

Bibliography. L. H. Vincent, "Les Fouilles Juives in d'el-Ḥamman, a Tibériade," RB, 31 (1922), 115-22.
G. W. VAN BEEK

HAMMEDATHA hăm'ə dā'thə [המדתא, perhaps from Pers. mah-data, given by the moon]; KJV AMADATHA ăm'—. The father of Haman, archenemy of the Jews in the book of Esther (3:1, 10; 8:5; 9:10, 24).

HAMMELECH hăm'ə lĕk. KJV translation of המלך ("the king") in Jer. 36:26; 38:6. Instead of "the son of Hammelech," the RSV translates "the king's son." This phrase may refer to any member of the royal household.

HAMMER. The hammer stone, a smooth or shaped stone held in the hand, was employed from earliest times down through the biblical period. Beginning in the Bronze Age, the stone was sometimes perforated for better grip or to receive a handle. Mallets of bone or wood were used in all periods but are rarely preserved for the excavator. The hafted hammer with a metal head is rare in Palestine, perhaps because of the paucity of metal and the fact that stone was a satisfactory substitute, whereas tools and weapons with a cutting edge required metal.

The term מקבה, "hammer," is used of the tool of the stonemason (I Kings 6:7) and of the smith (Isa. 44:12), and of the mallet for driving pegs (Judg. 4: 21; cf. 5:26, where the RSV "MALLET" is more accurate than the KJV "hammer" for הלמות). What distinction there is, if any, between this tool and the פטיש (hammer of the smith; Isa. 41:7; cf. Jer. 50:23) is not known. The פטיש of Jer. 23:29 is a stonemason's tool. The Greek equivalent of this word is σφῦρα, which means any type of hammer or mallet and is connected with forging in Ecclus. 38:28. כילפות, "hammers" (a loan word from Akkadian kalapati; Ps. 74:6), has also been thought to refer to axes or hatchets or to iron-tipped beams; the context refers to weapons of destruction used on wood. In Jer. 51:20 "hammer" (KJV BATTLE AX) translates מפץ (from נפץ, "to shatter"); this context and Ezek. 9:2, where the same root appears, favor the translation "battle ax" or "war club."

See also WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

Bibliography. R. A. S. Macalister, Gezer II (1912), p. 245; W. M. F. Petrie, Tools and Weapons (1917), pp. 40-41, plates XLV-XLVI, LXXVIII; G. Loud, Megiddo II (1948), vol. II, plate 289:1; C. Singer et al., eds., A History of Technology (1954), pp. 129-32, 608-9. R. W. FUNK

HAMMOLECHETH hă mŏl'ə kĕth [המלכת, she who reigns] (I Chr. 7:18); KJV HAMMOLEKETH. An eponym; probably originally a divine title; sister of Gilead and ancestor of several tribal families of Manasseh.

Bibliography. G. B. Gray, Hebrew Proper Names (1896), pp. 115-16; E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), p. 152.
B. T. DAHLBERG

HAMMON hăm'ən [חמון, hot spring(?)]. 1. A border town in Asher (Josh. 19:28). It is perhaps to be identified with Umm el-'Awamid, a site located near the coast approximately five miles NE of Ras en-Naqurah.

2. A Levitical town in Naphtali (I Chr. 6:76—H 6:61). See HAMMATH 2. G. W. VAN BEEK

HAMMOTH-DOR hăm'əth dôr' [חמת דאר] (Josh. 21:32). A Levitical town in Naphtali. See HAMMATH 2.

HAMMUEL hăm'yōō əl [חמואל; cf. Arab. al-ḥumam]; KJV HAMUEL. A family or clan of the tribe of Simeon (I Chr. 4:26).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 79; G. Ryckmans, Les noms propres sud-sémitiques (1934-35), II, 60. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HAMMURABI hăm'ə rä'bĭ. The sixth king of the First Dynasty of Babylon (1792-1750 B.C.); son of Sin-muballit, and father of Samsu-iluna.

The history of the reign of King Hammurabi is known only in its outlines, although we have more and better evidence for his reign than for that of any other king of his dynasty. Apart from royal inscriptions (stelae, foundation tablets, bricks, and a clay cone), there are a large number of political and administrative letters and—more important still—the official names given to the forty-two years during which Hammurabi ruled over Babylon. These names refer to all kinds of royal activities, such as the building of city walls, the dedication of votive offerings, the erecting of statues in temples, other pious works, and, of course, wars. It is the nature of this evidence that it offers only a small selection of "historical facts," which often have to be interpreted in order to be usable. The historical section of the preamble to the Code of Hammurabi* presents more evidence as to the maximum extent of his kingdom than any other inscription, though its tenor is clearly hymnic and not historical and factual. It mentions all the major cities ruled by Hammurabi, at the same time extolling the pious deeds and social acts performed in these places by him. There exist two more stone inscriptions referring to Hammurabi; but they are, curiously enough, of poetic content, which is extremely rare for texts on this type of writing material. The first is on a very broken basalt stela found in Ur. Here Hammurabi himself speaks in a bilingual (Sumerian and Akkadian) inscription of his achievements. He mentions his conquest of the distant mountain regions of Gutium, Subartu, and Tukrish, "whose language is confused." The second is an inscription on a broken statue, which addresses the king in Sumerian and Akkadian, in hymnic terms. The building inscriptions refer to the repairing of temples, among them those of Babylon, Borsippa, Larsa, and Zabalam, and to the construction of city walls, especially that of Sippar. Some are written in Sumerian and some in Akkadian. The correspondence of Hammurabi consists mainly of letters he sent to various high administrative officials touching mostly on legal and administrative matters. They amount to ca. 140 letters, and their style bespeaks a well-established bureaucratic tradition. Hammurabi's political letters come from the archive in Mari; there are three letters addressed by him to court officials and one directly to Zimri-Lim, king of Mari. In the same archive has been found the copy of a letter sent by Zimri-Lim to Hammurabi and fifteen more letters, containing references to Hammurabi, written by political emissaries of Mari stationed at the court of Hammurabi in Babylon. Figs. HAM 5; LAW 18.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

5. Stele containing the Code of Hammurabi; at the top the sun-god Shamash extends the ring and rod to Hammurabi, who stands as a worshiper before him; from Susa (eighteenth century B.C.)

In the history of Mesopotamia, Hammurabi and his period represent a crucial phase in the development of Babylonian civilization as well as in the history of the city of Babylon. Under the five kings who sat on the throne of Babylon in the hundred years before him, the city had led an inconspicuous existence. These rulers repeatedly conquered and lost the neighboring city of Kish, and made some ineffective campaigns along and beyond the Tigris. We shall never know to what extent Babylon was politically independent during that period, since we cannot expect its kings to have reported such matters, but it can safely be assumed that the political status of Babylon repeatedly shifted from independence to more or less effective control by Isin or Larsa. Since in the date formulas of Sin-muballit, the father of Hammurabi, more cities are mentioned than in those of any of his predecessors, it seems that Babylon's rise to power started at that time. Still, Sin-muballit had to confine his warlike acts to the S (a victory over Ur, a conquest of Isin), because Shamshi-Adad I of Assyria was then an important power in the N. When Hammurabi "entered the house of his father"—this peculiar expression is used only with respect to Hammurabi and his two predecessors—this danger had passed and Hammurabi took the opportunity to embark on what seems to have been a policy of military expansion. From his seventh to his eleventh year he conquered Uruk and—in an alliance with Rim-Sin of Larsa—Isin; he destroyed Malgûm, crossed the Tigris into Emutbal, and went upstream along the Euphrates as far as Rāpiqu. The following years up to the twenty-ninth have names that do not refer to war, and this seems to indicate a period of consolidation and organization of the realm. Therefore it is somewhat astonishing to find Hammurabi from his thirtieth year to the end of his reign engaged in nearly uninterrupted warfare. The very first of these year names strikes what seems an ominous note: "(year in which) the leader, beloved of Marduk, after having defeated the army which Elam—(coming) from the frontier of Marhashi, together with Subartu, Gutium, Eshnunna and Malgi—had raised in masses, organized through the power of the great gods (the empire of) Sumer and Akkad." Most of the names of the war years refer to such coalitions, such as the year 32 (to Eshnunna, Subartu, and Gutium), the year 37 (Sutium, Turukku, Kakmu, and Subartu), and the year 39 (Subartu); while the year 31 mentions the victory over Rim-Sin, the year 35 the dismantling of Mari and Malgium, and the year 38 a defeat inflicted on Eshnunna. It seems that these continual "victories" mostly against the peoples to the N and the NW present at best an offensive defensive of Hammurabi against the pressure of invading mountaineers or peoples set in motion by such events. The second period of wars seems to have reduced rather than extended his realm, to which he now likes to refer as "Sumer and Akkad," as none of his predecessors in Babylon could do. In fact, the last years of Hammurabi are named after clearly defensive measures to which he resorted in the N of the country: walls along the Tigris and the Euphrates (year 42) and the fortification of Sippar by means of a wall of piled-up earth (year 43). This was either an emergency measure or a technique made necessary by special circumstances. We do not know anything about the military situation at the time of the death of Hammurabi, but a letter exists which sheds an interesting light on the circumstances accompanying the accession to the throne of his son Samsu-iluna. The letter is badly damaged. In it the new king writes to a high official of the realm: "The king, my father, is s[ick] and I sat myself on the throne in order to [. . .] the country." In the balance of the tablet, Samsu-iluna announces his first act as king, which concerns the remission of the debts of certain social classes, an act to which the Old Babylonian kings had to resort periodically to remedy the economic pressure upon the lower classes of the population. Even if Samsu-iluna succeeded in stabilizing the political and military situation, it remains uncertain how much of Babylonia, apart from the capital, was held by the five kings of the dynasty who followed Hammurabi and ruled for 150 years more, each ascending the throne of his father. One thing, however, remains as the enduring success of the rule of Hammurabi: all later kings of Babylonia resided in Babylon, the other cities becoming provincial from then on; and this new situation was recognized throughout the entire country, with the exception of the region around the mouths of the two rivers, where inaccessible marshes and poor communications created a refuge for separatist and unorthodox groups for many millenniums. The "Sea Country," which rose with the decline of power of Babylon, is only the first of the political organizations which grew up in that region. See CHALDEA.

During the peaceful period between the twelfth and the thirtieth year, Babylonia seems to have become not only prosperous and politically important but also a center of learning. Hammurabi was the first king of his dynasty to leave us royal inscriptions correctly styled in Sumerian. It is possible that the fall of Larsa led to the migration of scribes to the new capital, but nothing of the Old Babylonian text material possibly kept in the Babylon of the First Babylonian Dynasty is accessible, since the water table of the region has risen and excavation cannot touch these levels. The centuries which followed the reign of Hammurabi became something like the golden age to which the numerous Old Babylonian literary texts bear eloquent witness. This was even realized a millennium later in Assyria. We have a letter found in Nineveh (Harper, Assyrian and Babylonian Letters, no. 255), in which a Neo-Assyrian scholar writes to his king, most likely Ashurbanipal, that he has brought from Babylon some originals from the time of "Ammurapi the king." Intimately connected with the name of Hammurabi is, of course, the law code which bears his name, a copy of which was found in the library of Ashurbanipal. Other copies are extant.

The name Hammurabi belongs to those Semitic but not Akkadian personal names which begin to appear in cuneiform texts quite early (end of the third millennium and Akkad period) and can be found during the reign of the Dynasty of Hammurabi all over Mesopotamia and as far W as the coast of the Mediterranean. The language of the people who bear these names—as far as it can be reconstructed from these names, which are mostly theophoric—is referred to in the scholarly literature as "Eastern Canaanite," "West Semitic," or "Amorite," but the provenience of this people and their role in Mesopotamian history are still subjects of discussion. Apart from some rulers of Larsa (ruling at the time of the first kings of the Hammurabi Dynasty), Hammurabi is the first king to have such a name, and it should be pointed out that Hammurabi's father and two more kings before him had truly Akkadian personal names. The name Hammurabi itself appears in the texts of Mari as a royal name, twice in a dynasty ruling in Aleppo and once as the name of the king of a country called Kurda (reading and location uncertain). This tellingly illustrates the role and political importance of the ethnic and social group which bore such names. According to the spelling of the name Hammurabi in the cuneiform alphabetic system of writing of Ugarit, it should be transcribed Hammu-rapi (note the variants with Ammu- and -rapi'). The meaning of the name is still a moot question: the first element is doubtless theophoric, and the second refers to healing, but a reliable translation cannot be given. It should be mentioned that the biblical king name Amraphel (Gen. 14:1, 9) has been connected with Hammurabi ever since the early days of Assyriology.

Bibliography. F. M. T. Boehl, Hammurabi, King of Babylon, in the Setting of His Time (1946). A. L. OPPENHEIM

HAMONAH hə mō′nə [המונה, multitude] (Ezek. 39:16). A city where Gog hordes are to be destroyed after the unsuccessful attack on Israel by this force of evil, according to the prophecy of Ezekiel.

HAMON-GOG hā′mən gŏg′ [המון גוג, multitude of Gog] (Ezek. 39:11, 15). A valley in Transjordan where the multitude of dead from the armies of Gog are to be buried, according to the prophecy of Ezekiel.

HAMOR hā′môr [חמור, he-ass; Ἐμμώρ]; KJV NT EMMOR ĕm′ôr. The father of Shechem, killed with him in revenge by Simeon and Levi (Gen. 34; cf. Judg. 9:28; see SHECHEM 1). From the sons of Hamor, Jacob purchased land upon which he erected an altar (Gen. 33:19) and wherein Joseph was later buried (Josh. 24:32). However, Stephen confused Shechem with Mach-pelah (Acts 7:16; cf. Gen. 23; 48:22; 50:13, 25). See also SHECHEM 4. L. HICKS

HAMRAN hăm′răn [חמרן] (I Chr. 1:41); KJV AMRAM ăm′răm. The first son of clan chief Dishon. The name used in Gen. 36:26 is Hemdan.

HAMSTRING [עקר]. A verb meaning "to cut the muscle tendon of the thigh." In the Bible the reference is to oxen (Gen. 49:6) and horses (Josh. 11:6, 9; II Sam. 8:4; I Chr. 18:4), hence to the great tendon at the back of the hock of the hind leg. To hamstring an animal completely disables or lames it.

J. A. SANDERS

HAMUEL. KJV form of HAMMUEL.

HAMUL hā′məl [חמול, spared; Samar. חמואל; LXX Ἐμουήλ, Ἰαμουήλ]; HAMULITES —mə līts. Grandson of Judah, and younger son of Perez (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21 [LXX B Ἰαμούν]; I Chr. 2:5); ancestral head of the Hamulites (Num. 26:21).

HAMUTAL hə mū′təl [Qere חמוטל, Kethibh חמיטל, חם plus טל, probably father-in-law is protection; cf. bibliography]. Wife of Josiah; mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (II Kings 23:31; 24:18; cf. Jer. 52:1).

Bibliography. H. Bauer, ZAW, XLVIII (1930), 80.
D. Harvey

HANAMEL hăn′ə měl [חנמאל, possibly from חנן אל, God is gracious]; KJV HANAMEEL —mēl. Son of Shallum, Jeremiah's uncle (Jer. 32:7-9), from whom the prophet purchased a field at Anathoth during the siege of Jerusalem.

HANAN hā′nən [חנן, evidently a shortened form of חנניה or אלחנן, Yahu has been gracious]. 1. A descendant of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:23).

2. A Benjaminite who was an ancestor of Saul (I Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

3. One of David's Mighty Men (I Chr. 11:43).

4. The head of a prophetic guild that occupied a chamber in the temple (Jer. 35:4).

5. The head of a family of Nethinim (temple servants) that returned to Palestine after the Exile (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49; cf. I Esd. 5:30).

6. An assistant to the temple treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (Neh. 13:13).

7. A Levite who helped to interpret the law at the assembly of Ezra (Neh. 8:7) and also sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:10—H 10:11).

8. Another man who sealed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:22—H 10:23).

9. Yet another who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:26—H 10:27).
M. Newman

HANANEL, TOWER OF hăn′ə nĕl [מגדל חננאל] (Neh. 3:1; 12:39; Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10); KJV HANANEEL —nēl. A tower of the N rampart of Jerusalem. The person for whom it was named is not known. Covering the approach to the temple, it was replaced by the βᾶρις mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. XV.xi.2), and by the Antonia Tower (see Antonia, Tower of). See map under Nehemiah.
See also Jerusalem §§ 6*e*, 7*b*.
G. A. Barrois

HANANI hə nā′nĭ [חנני, short form of Hananiah; Ἀνανίας]; KJV Apoc. ANANIAS ăn′ə nī′əs. 1. The father of the prophet Jehu (I Kings 16:1, 7; II Chr. 19:2; 20:34). In a story invented by the Chronicler, "Hanani the seer" is probably meant to be the same person (II Chr. 16:7).

2. A postexilic family of Levitical singers of the Heman group (I Chr. 25:4, 25). See Heman 3; Music.

3. A priest who divorced his foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:20; I Esd. 9:21).

4. A brother or kinsman of Nehemiah whose tidings of conditions in Judah prompted Nehemiah's work and who later was one of those put in charge of Jerusalem (Neh. 1:2; 7:2). See Hananiah 11.

5. A musician at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36); he may be connected with 3 above.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 187.
H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

HANANIAH hăn′ə nī′ə [חנניהו, חנניה, Yahu has been gracious]; KJV Apoc. ANANIAS ăn′ə nī′əs; CHANNUNEUS kăn′ə nē′əs. 1. An officer in the army of Uzziah (II Chr. 26:11).

2. The father of a "prince" (administrative official) in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:12).

3. A prophet who, in opposition to Jeremiah, predicted the early fall of Nebuchadnezzar and the early return of those exiled from Judah in 597 (Jer. 28:1, 5, 10-17). The account in Jer. 28 is interesting as an example of the problem of false prophets and of the role of symbolic actions in prophetism. See Prophet.

4. Grandfather or family of a sentry who arrested Jeremiah on the charge of deserting to the Babylonians (Jer. 37:13).

5. A postexilic descendant of David; son of Zerubbabel (I Chr. 3:19, 21).

6. A postexilic person or family of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:24).

7. A postexilic family of singers of the Heman group (I Chr. 25:4, 23). See Heman 3; Music.

8. One of those who divorced their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:28; I Esd. 9:29). See 10 below.

9. A "perfumer," or ointment maker, who helped restore the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:8). See 10 below.

10. A repairer of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:30); he may be the same as 9 above, though the confusion of the lists makes it difficult to tell. Actually 8, 9, and 12 could all refer to the same person.

11. The "governor of the castle"; one of those whom Nehemiah put in charge of Jerusalem (Neh. 7:2). The Hebrew of the verse could mean "my brother Hanani—that is, Hananiah the governor of the castle." "Hanani," in Hebrew, is a shortened form of "Hananiah." See Hanani 4.

12. A "chief of the people" who signed the pledge of reform (Neh. 10:23). See 10 above.

13. A priest, one of the trumpeters at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:12, 41).

14. Ancestor of a family of Levites returning with Ezra (I Esd. 8:48; cf. Ezra 8:19).

15. One of the three youths who figure in the stories in the book of Daniel and its apocryphal additions (Dan. 1:6-7, 11, 19). See Shadrach; Song of the Three Young Men.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 187; D. Diringer, Le Iscrizione Antico-Ebraiche Palestinesi (1934), p. 351.
H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

HAND [יד; χείρ]. Besides the numerous passages in which the Bible uses "hand" simply to designate a part of the body, there are many others in which the word has a metaphorical sense. Most numerous are those in which it occurs as a picturesque symbol of "power" (Ps. 78:42 KJV; Heb. 10:31); the phrase "(to deliver) into, or out of, the hand" is a very common example (Exod. 3:8; Judg. 4:2). In many passages of the original Hebrew the word יד appears in this sense where the English translations make use of a different word: e.g., Exod. 14:31 ("work"); Lev. 5:7 ("afford"; lit., "if his hand does not reach"); Josh. 8:20 ("power"). Sometimes the idea of "power" is weakened to "possession" (Gen. 35:4 KJV).

The word can also be used, like the words for many other parts of the human body, by metonymy, for "person" or in place of a personal pronoun (Isa. 35:3). Note the phrases "at your hand" (Isa. 1:12 KJV), meaning merely "from you"; and "by the hand of" (Lev. 8:36 KJV), meaning merely "by" (cf. RSV).

There are many references to the "hand" (i.e., the "power") of God (Isa. 41:20; Luke 1:66). Notable are such phrases as "outstretched hand" (Jer. 21:5); "strong hand" (Exod. 6:1); "strength of hand" (Exod. 13:3); and the expression "The hand of the LORD was upon him," meaning "He was seized by the prophetic ecstasy" (Ezek. 1:3).

In Hebrew the word "hand" can sometimes mean "side" (II Sam. 15:2 MT), as in the English phrase "right, or left, hand." Peculiar to Hebrew is the use of יד in the sense of "monument" (II Sam. 18:18)—perhaps recalling a type of Phoenician monument on which a hand was engraved—and also, possibly, "phallus" (Isa. 57:8; RSV "nakedness").

R. C. DENTAN

HANDBAG. See BAG § 1.

HANDBREADTH [טפח]. A measure based on the width of the hand at the base of the fingers; ca. three inches. Six handbreadths were equal to the common cubit, and Ezekiel's cubit (Ezek. 40:5) had an extra handbreadth. This unit was a standard measure in Egypt. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES §§ D1, 4*c*.

O. R. SELLERS

HANDKERCHIEF. The word used in Acts 19:12 to translate σουδάριον, which is really a Latin word from the root meaning "sweat." It may refer to a piece of cloth like our handkerchiefs, used to wipe away sweat, or to a towel-like head dressing, such as the kaffiyeh still used by the Arabs. The same Greek word is used in Luke 19:20; John 11:44; 20:7, where the KJV translates "napkin" and the RSV either "napkin" or "cloth." In Acts the "handkerchief" was used to bring power from Paul for the healing of the sick. The same term designates in Luke 19:20 the wrapping for the pound to be buried in the earth, and in John the cloth with which the face of the dead was covered. S. A. CARTLEDGE

HANDMAID. See MAID.

HANDPIKE [מקל יד, a staff (or rod) of the hand] (Ezek. 39:9); KJV HANDSTAVE. A long wooden staff with a pointed metal head; used as a weapon by foot soldiers.

It is clear from Ezek. 39:9-10 that the "staff of the hand" is a weapon and that at least part of it is of wood, but nothing else is certain. It may have been a quarterstaff, a thrusting spear or pike, a javelin, or a battle-ax.

See WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

Bibliography. For photographs of Egyptian battle axes, see W. C. Hayes, The Scepter of Egypt (1953), p. 282.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HANDS, LAYING ON OF. A ceremony occurring in both the OT and the NT in various contexts and meanings:

a) In the burnt offerings and sin offerings of the OT sacrificial cultus, the offerers were directed to lay their hands on the victims before they were slain (Exod. 29:10; Lev. 1:4; 4:4, 24, 29, 33; 8:14; Num. 8:10, 12; II Chr. 29:23). It has sometimes been held that this act signified a transference of guilt from the offerer to the victim. But the OT speaks of such a transference of guilt only in the case of the laying on of hands upon the scapegoat (Lev. 16:21). In the case of the sin offerings, the ceremony may have meant nothing more than a setting apart of the victim in consecration to its sacred purpose. This is suggested by the ceremony described in Lev. 24:14, where a blasphemer has hands laid upon him by all who heard his cursing, before he is taken out to be stoned. Certainly there was no transference of guilt in this case, though it might involve a transfer of ritual defilement. Philo (On the Special Laws I.203-4) understood the laying on of hands upon the victim as a sign of the offerer's pure intention and blameless life.

b) Laying on of hands was also used to impart a blessing. So Jacob blessed the children of Joseph (Gen. 48:14), and Jesus blessed the little children (Matt. 19:15; Mark 10:13, 16). Related to this was the "lifting up" of outstretched hands to invoke a blessing upon a group, such as the priestly benediction (Lev. 9:22), or Jesus' parting blessing to his disciples at his ascension (Luke 24:50). Possibly in the same range of ideas was Jesus' use at times of laying on of hands in healing the sick (Mark 5:23; 6:5; 16:18; Luke 4:40; 13:13). Here the underlying idea seems to be a transference of spiritual wholeness and physical vitality. Likewise, Ananias laid hands on Paul that Paul might regain his sight (Acts 9:12, 17); and Paul so healed the father of Publius in Malta (Acts 28:8). Cf. also Acts 5:12, where the hands of the apostles work signs and wonders, chiefly in acts of healing.

Another type of blessing was the conveyance of the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands, in such passages as Acts 8:18-19; 19:6—often taken, with the reference in Heb. 6:2, as the basis of the church's rite of confirmation following upon baptism. But in Acts this gift of the Spirit is more particularly linked with outward, visible manifestations of the Spirit's activity, as in "speaking with tongues."

c) A special type of blessing through laying on of hands occurs in rites of ordination. So Moses ordained Joshua as his successor (Num. 27:18, 23; Deut. 34:9)—a ceremony adopted in later times for ordination to the rabbinate, which may well have been the source of Christian rites of ordination. It should be noted, however, that Moses conveyed to Joshua a commission; he did not convey thereby the "spirit of wisdom," for Joshua already possessed this. The ordination was an outward sign of recognition of Joshua's spiritual qualifications, and gave him authority to exercise an office of leadership in the congregation of God's people.

In the NT ordination has the same sense. The SEVEN, selected on the basis of their spiritual gifts already evident, were ordained by the TWELVE by prayer and the laying on of hands (Acts 6:6); and Paul and Barnabas were likewise commissioned and dismissed for their missionary journey by the prophets and teachers at Antioch (Acts 13:3). In the Pastorals, however, the laying on of hands in ordination is associated with the imparting of a spiritual gift (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6). But in I Tim. 5:22, the ceremony probably refers, not to ordination, but to the reconciliation of penitents. Thus in later church usage, one finds a variety of associations of the ceremony: confirmation, ordination, healing, reconciling penitents, and the imparting of blessings upon both persons and objects.

Bibliography. J. Behm, Die Handauflegung im Urchristentum (1911). H. P. Smith, "The Laying on of Hands," AJT, XVII (1913), 47-62. B. S. Easton, "Jewish and Early Christian Ordination," ATR, V (1922-23), 308-19; VI (1923-24), 285-95; abridged in Early Christianity. The Purpose of Acts and Other Papers (1955), pp. 135-43. J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains et les rites connexes dans le NT et dans l'Eglise ancienne (1925). S. New, "The Name, Baptism, and the Laying on of Hands," in F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, V (1933), 121-40. J. Newman, Semikhah (1950). N. Adler, Taufe und Handauflegung (1951). A. Ehrhardt, "Jewish and Christian Ordination," Journal of Ecclesiastical History, V (1954), 125-38. M. H. Shepherd, Jr.

HANDSTAVE. KJV form of Handpike.

HANES hā′nĭz [חנס] (Isa. 30:4). The late name of the capital of the twentieth Upper Egyptian nome. The Greeks, identifying the local deity Herishef with Hercules, renamed the city Heracleopolis, the epithet Magna being added to distinguish it from the similarly named city of Lower Egypt. The native Egyptian name reflected in the Hebrew was Ḥwt-nn-nsw, "the house of the royal child"; a Late Assyrian transcription Ḫininši is also attested.

T. O. Lambdin

HANGING [תלה; LXX κρεμάννυμι]. After having been put to death, public enemies and criminals might be hanged as a further degradation or a public warning (Gen. 40:19; Josh. 8:29; 10:26; II Sam. 4:12). Biblical law does not recognize hanging as a form of execution, but permits it afterward on condition that the corpse be taken down and buried the selfsame day (Deut. 21:22-23). A hanged man is considered polluting and an "insult to God" (קללת אלהים; LXX κεκατηραμένος ὑπὸ Θεοῦ, "accursed of God" [cf. Gal. 3:13]; for the NT application of the Deuteronomy passage to crucified persons [Acts 5:30; 10:39; Gal. 3:13] cf. 4Qp Nah. 7–8; but Tosef. Sanh. 9.6 understands "insult to God" in the sense that man is God's image). Josh. 8:29; 10:27 record that the corpses of the Canaanite kings were taken down and buried at sundown on the day they were hanged; contrast the prolonged exposure by the Egyptians (Gen. 40:19), the Philistines (I Sam. 31:10), and David (II Sam. 21:10-14).

According to Jos. Antiq. IV.viii.24, all executed criminals were afterward hanged. The Mishna (Sanh. 6.4) prescribes hanging only for those put to death by stoning—according to one opinion, only for blasphemers and idolaters.

The gallows (עץ; LXX ξύλον) is described in the Mishna as a gibbet; the dead man's hands were tied together and slung over the arm. Since impaling was practiced in Persia (Herodotus III.125, 159), this may be meant by תלה in Esth. 2:23; 5:14; 7:9 (LXX σταυρόω, "impale"), 10; 9:13-14.

Hanging oneself (ἀπάγχω, "strangle," LXX for נחנק) is referred to twice (II Sam. 17:23; Matt. 27:5).

The meaning of תוקיע, "hang" (Num. 25:4; II Sam. 21:6, 9, 13), is obscure. It may be gathered only that some religious significance (cf. "for/before YHWH") is involved. In II Sam. 21 the bodies of the victims are subjected to a prolonged exposure before burial.

Bibliography. For the 4Qp Nahum passage, see JBL, LXXV (1956), 91. On תוקיע, see S. R. Driver, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Samuel (2nd ed., 1913), p. 351.

M. Greenberg

HANGINGS [קלעים; תכלת, blue material (Esth. 1:6); בתים, probably woven garments, from Arab. batt; KJV מסך (RSV SCREEN)]. Drapes. The hangings which surrounded the court of the tabernacle (Exod. 27:9-18; 35:17; 38:9-18; 39:40) were made of fine twined linen and were hung from pillars 5 cubits (ca. 7.5 feet) high (Exod. 27:18). On the N and S sides of the tabernacle court, the hangings extended for 100 cubits (ca. 150 feet) and on the E and W sides of the court for 50 cubits (ca. 75 feet). There were also hangings on each side of the gate to the court, 15 cubits (ca. 22.5 feet) in length. The hangings were to be carried, according to the priestly writers, by the Levitical family of Gershon (Num. 3:26; 4:26). See Tabernacle.

Before the gate of the tabernacle court were hangings (KJV; RSV Screen) of richly colored material and fine twined linen (Exod. 27:16), on which was embroidery. This screen hung from four pillars and measured 20 by 5 cubits (ca. 7.5 feet; Exod. 38:18). A similarly constructed screen, 25 cubits in length, hung at the door of the tent of meeting (Exod. 26:36-37). Both these screens or sets of hangings were carried by the family of Gershon (Num. 3:25-26).

The hangings mentioned in Esth. 1:6 were of blue material, and nothing more can be known of them. The hangings the women wove for the Asherah (II Kings 23:7) were probably cultic garments (cf. etymology above).

E. M. Good

HANIEL. KJV form of Hanniel in I Chr. 7:39.

HANNAH hăn′ə [חנה, from חן, grace]. 1. Wife of Elkanah the Ephraimite; mother of Samuel (I Sam. 1:2-20). For many years she was barren. Finally, during the family's annual visit to the sanctuary at Shiloh, she made a vow that if granted a son, she would dedicate the child to God (1:11). After this the child Samuel was born. As soon as possible, Hannah dedicated him to the service of God in the sanctuary of Shiloh, saying that "as long as he lives, he is lent to the Lord" (vs. 28). Hannah subsequently had other sons and daughters (2:21). The psalm attributed to her (2:1-10) seems to have been introduced from some other context.

2. KJV Apoc. form of Anna 2.

D. Harvey

HANNATHON hăn′ə thŏn [חנתן] (Josh. 19:14). A border town in Zebulun. It is mentioned twice in the Amarna Tablets (EA, nos. 8, 245, where it is spelled Ḫinnatuni and Ḫinatuna respectively) of the fourteenth century B.C., and once in the annals of Tiglath-pileser III.

Hannathon is perhaps located at Tell el-Bedeiwiyeh, a site occupied in the Middle Bronze, Late Bronze, Iron I (i.e., ca. 2000-900), and Islamic periods, approximately six miles N of Nazareth; strong arguments have also been advanced for identifying it with el-Harbaj at the S end of the Plain of Acco.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "Some Archaeological and Topographical Results of a Trip Through Palestine," BASOR, 11 (1923), 11; "Contributions to the Historical Geography of Palestine," AASOR, 2-3 (1923), 23-24. G. W. Van Beek HANNIEL hăn'ĭ əl [חניאל, God has been gracious]; KJV HANIEL in I Chr. 7:39. 1. A Manassite leader, son of Ephod (Num. 34:23). He was one of those appointed, under the oversight of Eleazar and Joshua, to superintend the distribution of the W Jordanian territory among the ten tribes to be settled in that area of Canaan. The meaning of the name Hanniel and of other names in this account underscores Israel's dependence upon God for the new life in Canaan.

2. A leader or warrior of Asher; a son of Ulla (I Chr. 7:39).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 35, 92, 187. R. F. Johnson

HANOCH hā'nŏk [חנוך, חנך, wise(?), or follower(?)]; KJV HENOCH hē'nŏk in I Chr. 1:33; HANOCHITES —īts. 1. Eponym of a Midianite clan whose ancestry is traced to Abraham through Keturah (Gen. 25:4; I Chr. 1:33).

2. Eponym of a Reubenite clan (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:5; I Chr. 5:3).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228; W. F. Albright, "The Babylonian Material in the Predeuteronomic Primeval History," JBL, LVIII (1939), 96. H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

HANUKKAH hä'nə kə [חנוכה, consecration, dedication]. The Feast of Rededication. After Judas Maccabeus had cleansed the temple from the pollution of pagan worship (165 B.C.), the twenty-fifth of Chislev (December) was kept annually in memory of this.

See also Dedication, Feast of. N. Turner

HANUN hā'nən [חנון, gracious, an abbreviation of Hananiah(?) or Hananiel(?), Yahu (or El) has been gracious]. 1. King of the Ammonites. His insult to the ambassadors of David caused Israel to besiege Rabbah. Hanun called on Hadadezer for aid, and the siege was apparently postponed until the end of the Aramean wars (II Sam. 10:1-14). Then, despite stiff resistance by Hanun, the city was captured and the inhabitants reduced to slavery (11:1; 12:26-31). David appointed Hanun's brother Shobi in his place (17:27).

2. An inhabitant of Zanoah who helped repair two sections of the Jerusalem wall under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:13, 30). In the latter passage he is called the "sixth son of Zalaph," a phrase without parallel in the genealogical lists. Perhaps it is a corruption of "inhabitants of Zanoah." R. W. Corney HAPHARAIM hăf'ə rā'əm [חפרים] (Josh. 19:19); KJV HAPHRAIM hăf rā'əm. A town in Issachar. Hapharaim (spelled ḥprm, no. 18) also appears in the Shishak list of conquered Palestinian towns (ca. 918 B.C.). It is probably located at et-Taiyibeh, approximately nine miles NW of Beth-shan.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Jordan Valley in the Bronze Age," AASOR, VI (1926), 35; "The Topography of the Tribe of Issachar," ZAW (1926), 227-28.

G. W. Van Beek

HAPPINESS. Usually the human condition of well-being which comes with God's blessing or as divine reward for righteousness. Happiness is expressed in Hebrew idiomatically by אשרי, "Happy is . . . ," and in the LXX and the NT by μακάριος. The English versions appear to render the Hebrew term indiscriminately with "happy" or "blessed," and the preferred translation in the NT is "blessed."

The word "blessed" is appropriate, since man's happiness is recognized either as the fruit of God's freely given blessing or as a divinely granted reward for human merit. Both testaments contain examples of happiness as a gift: "Blessed is he whom thou dost choose and bring near" (Ps. 65:4—H 65:5); "Blessed are those who are invited to the marriage supper" (Rev. 19:9); and both contain examples of happiness as the reward for merit: "Blessed is he who considers the poor!" (Ps. 41:1—H 41:2); "Happy is he who is kind to the poor" (Prov. 14:21); "When you give a feast, invite the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and you will be blessed, because they cannot repay you. You will be repaid at the resurrection of the just" (Luke 14:13-14).

The end of this last passage, in Luke, suggests an area, however, in which the NT adds a feature absent in the OT. It concerns the nature of this happiness. In the NT as well as the OT happiness is health and success, life and offspring, security and plenty (Deut. 33:29; Pss. 1:1-3; 41:2—H 41:3; 128:2; Prov. 8:34-36; 16:20; Isa. 32:20, but also Matt. 24:46-47; Luke 1:42; Jas. 1:12; Ps. 127:5, which is tragically reversed in Luke 23:29). The new note, particularly evident in the beatitudes, is the prospective nature of happiness there: "Your reward is great in heaven" (Luke 6:23; cf. Matt. 5:3-12; Rev. 14:13). See also Joy. S. H. Blank HAPPIZZEZ hăp'ə zĕz [הפצץ, tribal name (cf. Bethpazzez)] (I Chr. 24:15); KJV APHSES ăf'sēz. A descendant of Aaron (cf. I Chr. 24:1-6, 19); the eponym of one of the courses of temple priests under King David.

HARA hâr'ə [הרא, the mountain or the highland; LXX L Αρραν; omitted in LXX AB and Syr.]. The place to which the king of Assyria exiled the Hebrew tribes Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh, according to I Chr. 5:26. Since it is listed with places in N Mesopotamia, in the vicinity of Gozan (Ptolemy's Gausanitis, modern Tell Halaf), some have regarded Hara as the local designation of the mountainous region N of Gozan-Guzana (the classical Mons Masius and modern Karja Baghlar).

Because I Chr. 5:26 appears to be a faulty rendition of II Kings 17:6; 18:11, where instead of "Hara" the Hebrew text has "the cities of Media" and the LXX has "the mountains of Media," some have regarded Hara as a corruption of the latter. It would then designate the mountainous district E of the Tigris River Valley. The Arabs subsequently called those highlands El Gebal ("the Mountain"). Less likely is the suggestion that "Hara" is a corruption of the name Harhar (חרחר), a Median city conquered by King Sargon of Assyria and colonized by him with captives from other countries. Tobit, an exile to Assyria, communicated with fellow Jews who had been transported to Media (Tob. 1:14-15).

R. A. BOWMAN

HARADAH hə rā'də [חרדה] (Num. 33:24-25). A stopping place in the journey of the Israelites from Sinai. The location is unknown.

HARAN hâr'ən [הרן, earlier mountaineer, but perhaps sanctuary; חרן (in 2 below)]. 1. Son of Terah; brother of Abram (Abraham) and Nahor; father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. Haran died in Ur while his father was still alive (Gen. 11:26-31).

2. A Judahite; son of Caleb and his concubine Ephah (I Chr. 2:46).

3. A Levite; son of Gershonite Shimei (I Chr. 23:9).

L. HICKS

HARAN (PLACE) [חרן; Akkad. Ḫarrânu; Χαρράν]; KJV NT CHARRAN kăr'ən. A city of N Mesopotamia (now Turkey) where Abraham lived (Gen. 11:31; see also Acts 7:2, 4); where his father, Terah, died (Gen. 11:32); and whence Abraham migrated to Canaan (12:4-5). The kinsmen of the patriarchs continued to dwell as Arameans in Haran; Rebekah, daughter of Bethuel, was brought from there by Eliezer as bride for Isaac (Gen. 24); and later Jacob fled there (27:43; 28:10; 29:4) to dwell with Laban. Jacob married Laban's daughters, Leah and Rachel, in Haran, and all his children (the eponymous ancestors of the tribes) except Benjamin were born there, according to the OT tradition (Gen. 29:32–30:24).

The devotion of Haran to the moon cult of Babylonia indicates that the city was founded by the Third Dynasty of Ur, perhaps ca. 2000 B.C. That the Haran neighborhood was the scene of commercial colonies from the S is clear from recently discovered cuneiform tablets. Ezek. 27:23 lists Haran among the famous commercial cities. II Kings 19:12 (=Isa. 37:12) states that the ancestors of Sennacherib had devastated Haran along with other cities.

Current excavations in Haran (Harran) have revealed a long and continuous history from Assyro-Babylonian through Islamic times. Deep into the Christian period, Haran remained a stronghold of lunar paganism.

Fig. HAR 6.

C. H. GORDON

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

6. Modern Harran, the biblical Haran, the chief tell to the left, with characteristic small houses of N Syria in the foreground HARARITE hâr'ə rīt [הררי(ה), הררי, ארי(ה)]. A gentilic adjective of an unidentified tribe, predicated of the fathers of three members of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty": Agee (II Sam. 23:11), father of Shammah; Shammah (II Sam. 23:33; Shagee in I Chr. 11:34), father of Jonathan; and Sharar (II Sam. 23:33; Sachar in I Chr. 11:35), father of Ahiam.

E. R. DALGLISH

HARBONA här bō'nə [חרבונא, חרבונה, perhaps from Pers. kherban, donkey-driver]. One of the seven eunuchs who served as chamberlains for Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10). He suggested that Haman be hanged upon the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai (7:9).

M. NEWMAN

HARBOR [λιμήν] (Acts 27:12); KJV HAVEN. The word is used in the account of Paul's voyage to Rome with reference to FAIR HAVENS near Lasea in Crete, and PHOENIX, a port of Crete.

HARDEN THE HEART. A phrase, used to translate various verbs, expressing a firm set of mind, stubbornness, indifference, callousness, insensibility, inability to understand (cf. חצק, "make strong, unyielding" [Exod. 4:21; 14:4, 17; Josh. 11:20]; קשה, "make sharp, hard" [Exod. 7:3; Ps. 95:8]; קשח, "make firm, stubborn" [Isa. 63:17]; אמץ, "be bold, make obstinate" [Deut. 15:7]; כבד, "be heavy, insensible" [Exod. 8:15, 32; 9:7, 34; I Sam. 6:6]; φωρόω, "be callous" [Mark 6:52; cf. 8:17; John 12:40]; σκληρύνω, "be dry, hard" [Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7]). In describing events from the standpoint of the divine purpose and redemptive activity, the biblical writers speak of God's hardening men's hearts (Exod. 4:21; 7:3; 14:4, 17; Deut. 2:30; Josh. 11:20; Isa. 63:17). At the same time they avow men harden their own hearts (Exod. 8:32; 9:34-35; Deut. 15:7; I Sam. 6:6; II Chr. 36:13). They found no apparent inconsistency in ascribing this activity both to God and to men. For men, by acting in accordance with their own self-will, were carrying out the divine purpose. This mind-set was characterized as Israel's sin, manifesting a lack of faith and a rebellious spirit (cf. Ps. 95:8; John 12:40; Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7). The NT writers give it as the reason the disciples did not understand Jesus' actions (Mark 6:52; cf. 8:17).

Bibliography. J. Skinner, Isaiah, I, Century Bible (1915), 50; S. R. Driver, Exodus, CB (1918), pp. 53-54.

V. H. KOOY

HARE [ארנבת; cf. Ugar. anhb; Akkad. annabu; Arab. 'arnab; Syr. 'arnbâ]. Any of several herbivorous rodents of the family Leporidae. Bodenheimer speaks of the common hare of Palestine as Lepus europaeus judaeus, which is somewhat smaller than the average hare, whereas Tristram mentions the Lepus syriacus as the common hare of the N regions, this being the size and color of the English hare. Other species are occasionally encountered. The hare's close relative, the rabbit (Lepus cuniculus), has never existed in the lands of the Bible.

The OT (Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7) refers to the hare only to indicate that it is an unclean animal, but its assertion that the hare is a ruminant is contrary to fact. Probably, as in the case of the hyrax (see ROCK BADGER), some movements of the mouth and jaws have been erroneously interpreted as cud-chewing.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HAREL. See Ariel.

HAREPH hâr'ĕf [חרף, autumn, or sharp] (I Chr. 2:51). The founder of Beth-Gader.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228; D. Diringer, Le Inscrizioni Antico-Ebraiche Palestinesi (1934), p. 196. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HARETH. KJV form of HERETH.

HARHAIAH här hā'yə [חרחיה, or חרחיה] (Neh. 3:8). The father of Uzziel, who helped repair the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah—i.e., unless the passage is to be emended עזיאל בן־חבר הצורפים "Uzziel a member of the guild of goldsmiths." M. NEWMAN

HARHAS här'hăs [חרחס] (II Kings 22:14). Alternately: HASRAH hăz'rə [חסרה] (II Chr. 34:22). Grandfather of Shallum, husband of Huldah, the prophetess consulted about Josiah's book of the law.

HAR-HERES här hĭr'ĭz [הר חרס, mountain of the sun] (Judg. 1:35); KJV MOUNT HERES. A mountain near Aijalon; probably identical with the border fortress of BETH-SHEMESH (Josh. 15:10; 21:16) and IR-SHEMESH (Josh. 19:41). Har, no. 77 of the list of Thut-mose III (ca. 1490-1436), is perhaps Har-heres.

V. R. GOLD

HARHUR här'hûr [חרחור, possibly raven]. Eponym of a family of temple servants listed among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53). The name is replaced by two others in I Esd. 5:31.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 230. B. T. DAHLBERG

HARIM hâr'ĭm [חרם, dedicated (to God); Χαρμή]; KJV Apoc. CARME kär'mĭ (I Esd. 5:25). 1. A descendant of Aaron; eponym of a priestly house in the reign of King David (I Chr. 24:8); mentioned also among the exiles returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:39; Neh. 7:42; I Esd. 5:25; cf. Neh. 12:15; see also REHUM).

2. Eponym of a nonpriestly family among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:32; Neh. 7:35; lacking in I Esd. 5:22), some of whom also had to divorce their foreign wives later under Ezra (Ezra 10:31). The name is lacking in I Esd. 9:32.

3. A priest who signed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:5).

4. One of the chiefs of the people, signatory to Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:27).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 136-37, 216. B. T. DAHLBERG

HARIPH hâr'ĭf [חריף, either sharp or autumn]. Head of a family that resided in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 7:24; cf. I Esd. 5:16), and also one of those who sealed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:19—H 10:20). In Ezra 2:18 the corresponding name is Jorah (יורה, "autumn rain"), which is perhaps the equivalent of Hariph. M. NEWMAN

HARLOT. See PROSTITUTION.

HARMON här'mən [ההרמונה] (Amos 4:3); KJV THE PALACE. The text where this hapax legomenon occurs is unfortunately corrupt. The name Harmon appears nowhere else in the Bible, and no place by this name is known. Many of the older versions have presupposed, not a proper noun, but a common noun (ארמון), meaning "palace" (see KJV), though there is by no means any consistency among the ancient versions or commentaries. The Targ. to Amos 4:3 interprets the expression as "beyond the mountains of Armenia." The LXX reads "the mountain of Romman." Ibn Ezra understands the meaning as "behind the wall of Samaria."

On the basis of the LXX the reference might be to a hill E of Bethel called Rimmon (רמון; Judg. 20: 45, 47; cf. Josh. 15:32; 19:13).

Scholars have made many suggestions, among which are the readings "naked" (ערמות), "devoted to destruction" (החרמתנה), and "Harmon."

J. A. SANDERS

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS. The gospels arranged in parallel columns for careful comparison. The name "harmony" was borrowed from music by A. Osiander (1537) in allusion to the pleasant accord of a four-tone chord. From Osiander to Griesbach (1774), harmonies characteristically included all four gospels; Griesbach initiated the special type of harmony (named by him "synopsis") which includes only the first three gospels. Today most scholars agree that a four-gospel harmony does justice neither to the Gospel of John nor to the Synoptics, but that a three-gospel harmony (or synopsis) is indispensable. The order of Mark now prevails.

Forerunners of the (post-Reformation) harmony were: (a) the second-century Diatessaron of Tatian (a composite gospel woven together from strands of all four, and perhaps a fifth), which is lost but is mainly recoverable from medieval adaptations of it; (b) the third-century Diatessaron of Ammonius of Alexandria, completely lost, which used Matthew as backbone; (c) the ten Canons of Eusebius, ingenious tables of parallel references, easily accessible today in the inner margin of Nestle's Novum Testamentum Graece.

Bibliography. The most useful current harmonies are: Huck-Lietzmann, Synopse der drei ersten Evangelien (Greek); Gospel Parallels (Huck's arrangement, using RSV text; English).

K. GROBEL

HARNEPHER här'nə fər [חרנפר; Egyp. ḥr-nfr, Horus is merciful]. A place or family in Asher (I Chr. 7:36).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 63-64.

HARNESS. KJV form of BREASTPLATE in I Kings 22:34; II Chr. 18:33 and of MYRRH in II Chr. 9:24.

HAROD hâr'ŏd [חרד, trembling(?)]; HARODITE —ə dīt; HARORITE —rīt. 1. A spring, the site of Gideon's encampment while preparing for battle with the Midianites (Judg. 7:1), and possibly the unnamed fountain where Saul made camp against the Philistines (I Sam. 29:1). It is generally identified with 'Ain Jalud, a spring located on a NW spur of Mount Gilboa. G. W. VAN BEEK

2. The home of two of David's men, Shammah and Elika. The KJV translates חרדי, חרורי, "Harodite" in II Sam. 23:25; "Harorite" in I Chr. 11:27. Similarity between Hebrew "r" and "d" probably accounts for the confusion in spelling, and "Harod" is doubtless correct in both places. O. R. SELLERS

HAROEH hə rō'ə [הראה, the seer] (I Chr. 2:52). Son of Shobal; probably the same as Reaiah in I Chr. 4:2.

HARORITE. See HAROD 2.

HAROSHETH-HAGOIIM hə rō'shĕth hə goi'ĭm [חרשת הגוים] (Judg. 4:2, 13, 16); KJV HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES. A Canaanite town; the home of Sisera, who was defeated by Israel under Barak and Deborah. Its location remains unknown, although attempts have been made to identify it with Tell 'Amr or Tell el-Harbaj. Archaeological soundings conducted at Tell 'Amr have shown that it was probably not occupied before the tenth century B.C., more than a century after the historic battle with Sisera was fought. Tell el-Harbaj, on the other hand, is perhaps better suited to the topographical requirements of Helkath. It is possible that Harosheth-hagoiim is the Muḫrashti of the Amarna Letters (EA no. 335:17); if this is the case, it should probably be sought in the Plain of Sharon.
G. W. VAN BEEK

HARP [κιθάρα] (I Macc. 4:54); KJV CITHERN sĭth'ərn. A Greek stringed instrument listed with lutes and cymbals as used in the celebration at the time of the rededication of the temple on the twenty-fifth of Chislev, 165 B.C. (cf. I Macc. 13:51, and the Aramaic transliteration in Dan. 3:5, 7); it was pictured on Jewish coins of the Rebellion. Perhaps of Semitic origin (Hebrew כנור), the cithara or cithern was an elaborate lyre with eleven or twelve strings of equal length strung over a wooden sound box and fastened to tuning pegs on a crossbar, plucked with either the left or the right hand. It was used independently or with other instruments and also to accompany voices in singing.

The KJV uses "harp" to translate κινύρα (RSV "lute") in I Macc. 4:54. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS § B1*d*.

For "harp" in the OT, see MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS § B4*c*.

Bibliography. C. Sachs, The History of Musical Instruments (1940); O. R. Sellers, "Musical Instruments of Israel," BA, IV (1941), 36-38. E. W. SAUNDERS

HARPOON [שכה, cf. Akkad. šakāku, be pointed, šikkatu, nail, point] (Job 41:7—H 40:31); KJV BARBED IRON. Mentioned in parallelism with fishing spears (צלצל דגים), as an inadequate weapon for catching the sea monster Leviathan. See FISHER.

HARROW [שדד]. The harrow as a special tool is not known in ancient Egypt and probably did not exist in ancient Palestine. However, Job 39:10; Isa. 28:24; Hos. 10:11 clearly refer to some process other than plowing. The meaning of the verb שדד in these passages is not clear, and authorities differ on the sense of it, taking it to mean either cross plowing (doubtful), making of border furrows, or the dragging of branches to smooth the soil over the seed (probable). H. N. RICHARDSON

HARSHA här'shə [חרשא, mute, or taciturn]. Alternately: CHAREA kăr'ī ə [Χαρεά] (I Esd. 5:32). Eponym of family of temple servants listed among the returning exiles (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228. B. T. DAHLBERG

HART [איל; cf. Ugar. 'yl, deer, buck; Arab. 'ayyil, hart, mountain goat; Akkad. ajalu, hart]. Alternately: STAG. The adult male of the Red Deer (Cervus elaphus). The Red Deer is one of the most typical members of the DEER family, as well as one of the most widely distributed. The general color of the pelage varies slightly with the season, but it tends toward a reddish brown. The height of a mature specimen is ca. four feet at the shoulder.

Various OT references (Deut. 12:15, 22; 14:5; 15:22; I Kings 4:23—H 5:3) indicate that the איל was an available, as well as an edible, game animal, that it was a ruminant, and probably that it was a deer. It can only be described as a reasonable hypothesis that the deer thus designated was the Red Deer. Other biblical references allude to the hart's leaping (Isa. 35:6), and to its need for water and food (Ps. 42:1—H 42:2; Lam. 1:6). In Song of S. 2:9, 17; 8:14 the hart's strength and agility, doubtless often observed, account for the simile applied to the beloved.
W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HARUM hâr'əm [הרום] (I Chr. 4:8). Eponym of a family of the tribe of Judah.

HARUMAPH hə rōō'măf [חרומף, probably mutilated nose, from חרם plus אף; cf. Lev. 21:18] (Neh. 3:10). The father of Jedaiah, who helped repair the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah.

HARUPHITE hə rōō'fīt [Kethibh חריפי, Qere חרופי, from חרף, sharp or autumn(?)] (I Chr. 12:5—H 12:6). The gentilic designation of Shephatiah, one of the Benjaminite warriors who joined David at Ziklag. It is possible that there is some relation between this designation and the Calebite Hareph (חרף) of I Chr. 2:51 or the Hariph (חריף) family of Neh. 7:24; 10:19—H 10:20, but the context suggests an unknown place name, Hareph or Hariph. M. NEWMAN

HARUZ hâr'ŭz [חרוץ, gold(?), or eager(?)] (II Kings 21:19). Maternal grandfather of Amon. His name is probably Arabic, and his place of origin Jotbah.

HARVEST. The gathering of the crops. The Gezer Calendar provides a clue to the harvest seasons in ancient Israel. Olives were harvested at the beginning of the year—i.e., the middle of September to the middle of November (see CALENDAR), by beating the trees with long sticks (Deut. 24:20; Isa. 17:6). In March-April flax was harvested by cutting it off near the ground, then laying the stalks out to dry (Josh. 2:6).* The harvesting of barley (see BARLEY HARVEST) took place in April or early May, while the wheat harvest occurred in May-June (see REAPING). During August-September the summer fruits—figs, grapes, and pomegranates—were harvested. Fig. HAR 7.

Courtesy of Staatliche Museen, Berlin

7. Scene of the harvesting of flax, from a bas relief of a tomb of Pa-heri at el-Kab; Eighteenth Dynasty (1550-1350 B.C.)

Bibliography. G. H. Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte, V (1937), 23 ff; W. F. Albright, BASOR, 92 (1943), 16 ff; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 180 ff.

H. N. RICHARDSON

HASADIAH hăs'ə dī'ə [חסדיה, Yahu has been faithful; 'Ασαδαίος; Vulg. Sedei]; KJV Apoc. ASADIAS ăs'ə dī'əs. 1. One of Zerubbabel's sons (I Chr. 3:20).

2. Son of Hilkiah, and ancestor of Baruch (Bar. 1:1).

HASENUAH. KJV form of HASSENUAH in I Chr. 9:7.

HASHABIAH hăsh'ə bī'ə [חשביה, חשביהו, Yahu has taken account (i.e., of childlessness and has given a child)]; ASIBIAS ăs'ə bī'əs in I Esd. 9:26; KJV MALCHIJAH măl kī'jə in Ezra 10:25; KJV Apoc. ASEBIA ăs'ə bī'ə; ASSABIAS —əs; ASSANIAS —nī'əs. 1. A Levite listed as ancestor of a musician of the sanctuary (I Chr. 6:45—H 6:30).

2. A Levite, ancestor of Shemaiah, a returned exile (I Chr. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

3. A Levite, son of Jeduthun; listed among the musicians set apart by David to prophesy with music in the sanctuary (I Chr. 25:3, 19).

4. A Hebronite, mentioned as a royal deputy under King David for the area W of the Jordan River (I Chr. 26:30).

5. A chief officer of the Levites under King David (I Chr. 27:17).

6. A chief of the Levites under King Josiah (II Chr. 35:9; I Esd. 1:9).

7. A Merarite Levite among those who joined Ezra's company at the River Ahava and who were entrusted with the temple treasures being brought to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:19, 24; cf. I Esd. 8:48, 54); perhaps to be identified with a Levite among those signing Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:11), perhaps also with a temple musician (Neh. 12:24).

8. One of the laymen among those persuaded by Ezra to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25, where read with RSV "Hashabiah" instead of MT-KJV "Malchijah"; corresponding to Asibias in I Esd. 9:26 ['Ασιβίας=חשביה]).

9. A builder of Nehemiah's wall (Neh. 3:17).

10. A Levite, descendant of Asaph (Neh. 11:22).

11. A priest of the house of Hilkiah in the time of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. 12:21).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 21, 189.

B. T. DAHLBERG

HASHABNAH hə shăb'nə [חשבנה, perhaps a corruption of חשביה, Yahu has considered, but more probably a shortened form of חשבניה, Yahu has considered me] (Neh. 10:25—H 10:26). One of those who sealed Ezra's covenant.

HASHABNEIAH hăsh'əb nē'yə [חשבניה, perhaps a corruption of חשביה, Yahu has considered, but more probably a shortened form of חשבניה, Yahu has considered me]. 1. The father of Hattush, who helped repair the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:10).

2. A Levite who participated in a liturgical blessing of Yahweh in the time of Ezra (Neh. 9:5). The Syr. reading, חשביה, suggests that he might be identical with the Levite Hashabiah of Ezra 8:19, 24; Neh. 10:11—H 10:12; 11:22; 12:24.

M. NEWMAN

HASHBADDANAH hăsh băd'ə nə [חשבדנה, possibly a corruption of חשביה, Yahu has considered, as the Syr. suggests, or of חשבניה, Yahu has considered me]. One of the men, possibly a Levite (see HASHABNEIAH 2), who stood on Ezra's left hand when the Law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4).

M. NEWMAN

HASHEM hā'shĕm [חשם]. A Gizonite who was a member of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (I Chr. 11:34). See JASHEN.

HASHMONAH hăsh mō'nə [חשמנה] (Num. 33:29-30). A stopping place along the route of Israel's journey from Sinai.

HASHUB. KJV alternate form of HASSHUB.

HASHUBAH hə shōō'bə [חשבה, perhaps consideration; since a feminine passive participle is not appropriate for a male, it possibly should be vocalized either ḥᵃshābhâ as a shortened form of ḥᵃshabhyâ, Yahu has considered, with the hypocoristic ending, or simply as ḥᵃshubh, considered (of Yahu)] (I Chr. 3:20). A son of Zerubbabel.

M. NEWMAN

HASHUM hā′shəm [חשם; Arab. ḥaṭimun, broad-nosed; Ασομ]; KJV Apoc. ASOM ā′səm. Eponym or head of one of the families that returned from exile (Ezra 2:19; 10:33; Neh. 7:22; 8:4; 10:18; I Esd. 9:33). I Esd. 9:44, which parallels Neh. 8:4, has the name Lothasubus in place of Hashum.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 227.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HASHUPHA. KJV form of HASUPHA.

HASIDEANS hăs′ə dē′ənz [Ασιδαίοι = חסידים, ḥᵃsîdhîm]. A militant religious community which participated in the Maccabean Revolt. They were zealous for the law, but their origins, organization, and ultimate purposes are unknown. See MACCABEES.

1. OT background. Ḥᵃsîdhîm (generally translated "saints") are mentioned in several psalms as faithful Israelites who fear, trust, and depend upon the Lord. Ps. 149 is particularly important:

> Sing to the LORD a new song, > his praise in the assembly of the ḥᵃsîdhîm!
> . . . . . .
> Let the high praises of God be in their throats > and two-eged swords in their hands, > to wreak vengeance on the nations > and chastisement on the peoples,
> . . . . . .
> to execute on them the judgment written!
> This is glory for all his ḥᵃsîdhîm.

2. In the Maccabean period. The Hasideans are referred to in I Macc. 2:42; 7:13; II Macc. 14:6. They are not mentioned as a newly formed party, and it is probable that they existed in the pre-Maccabean period. Soon after the Maccabees revolted, "there united with them a company of Hasideans, mighty warriors of Israel, every one who offered himself willingly for the law" (I Macc. 2:42).

There is no sound basis for the widely held notion that the Hasideans were interested only in religious reform and not in national independence. There was an occasion in the early years of the war when certain scribes of the Hasideans sued for peace. During the parley their negotiators were perfidiously seized and killed (I Macc. 7:12-16). The folly of trusting the enemy was thus made clear, and the main body of Hasideans presumably continued to support Judas (cf. II Macc. 14:6).

After the war, during the struggle for power in the newly established revolutionary state, party conflict seems to have developed between the Hasideans and the Maccabeans over the question of the legitimacy of the Maccabean claims to the high priesthood. This conflict can be dated as early as the composition of I Maccabees; for its author, a court historian of the later Maccabees, disparages the legal interpretations of the Hasidean scribes of his time by drawing attention to the rueful mistake of those Hasidean scribes who during the revolution had misplaced their trust in a priestly family which, though legitimate from their point of view, had turned out to be neither trustworthy nor just (7:12-18).

The later PHARISEES and ESSENES probably developed out of rival wings of this postrevolutionary Hasidean party.

Bibliography. V. Aptowitzer, Parteipolitik der Hasmonäerzeit im rabbinischen und pseude-epigraphischen Schrifttum (1927); J. C. Dancy, A Commentary on I Maccabees (1954).

W. R. FARMER

HASIDIM hăs′ə dĭm [חסידים, ḥᵃsîdhîm], masculine plural of HASID hă′sĭd [חסיד, ḥāsîdh]. The term hasid applies to one who practices hesed (חסד, ḥésedh). These cognate words have been the subject of much study and discussion in recent decades. The word hesed is frequently associated with "covenant" (ברית, bᵉrîth), and the two terms comprehend to a large extent the same obligations, as indicated by the expression "to keep covenant and hesed" (Deut. 7:9). The covenant is established by rites, but hesed is the quality which results from the maintenance and implementation of the covenant. In the broadest sense, hesed denotes the joint liability, the mutual obligation, of persons who are involved in social, economic, or political relationships, or who belong together in any way. It has been succinctly defined as the "virtue that knits together society." The term is applied to the angels' rescue of Lot (Gen. 19:19); the loyalty of wife to husband, son to father, daughter-in-law to mother-in-law (Gen. 20:13; 47:29; Ruth 1:8); the rewarding of a spy (Judg. 1:24); the friendship between David and Jonathan (I Sam. 20:8; II Sam. 9:1); the loyalty of a subject to the king (II Sam. 3:8; II Chr. 24:22); leniency of victor to vanquished (I Kings 20:31); the ideals which the good wife and mother seeks to inculcate in the members of her household (Prov. 31:26). Translators have found the word difficult to render adequately. The LXX and the Vulg. generally rendered ἔλεος and misericordia, and the older English versions have for the most part "mercy," but sometimes "kindness" or "loving kindness." The basic meaning of the word, however, appears to be "loyalty," and so the RSV renders it in some instances where the reference is to human relations (I Sam. 20:15; II Sam. 2:5; 3:8; 16:17; I Kings 2:7; Ps. 101:1; Prov. 3:3; 14:22; 16:6; 19:22; 20:6, 8; Jonah 2:8), or "loyally" in the idiom "to do hesed with (someone)" (עשה חסד עם; Gen. 21:23; 24:49; 47:29; II Sam. 10:2; I Kings 2:7; I Chr. 19:2); but in other instances the word is rendered "kindness" or "kindly." The plural of the word (ḥᵃsādhîm), as applied to the proofs of loyalty shown in the good life, is translated "good deeds" (II Chr. 32:32; 35:26; Neh. 13:14). However, where hesed applies to God's dealings with man, the RSV chooses "steadfast love" as the regular rendering of the word. Once the expression "the hesed of the Lord," in reference to the covenant of friendship between David and Jonathan (I Sam. 20:14), is rendered "the loyal love of the LORD." In Job 37:13 the word is translated "love," without qualification.

A hasid is a person characterized by hesed, a man of hesed (איש חסד, 'îš ḥesedh; Prov. 11:17; Isa. 57:1). The form hasid applies almost exclusively to man; apart from Ps. 145:17; Jer. 3:12, it is never used of God in the OT, the Talmud, or later Jewish literature. As applied to man, it denotes man's ideal loyalty to God within the community of the faithful. Accordingly, the English versions generally render hasidim as "saints," and the RSV retains this rendering in thirteen cases (Pss. 16:3; 30:4; 31:23; 37:28; 79:2; 85:8; 97:10; 116:15; 132:9, 16; 145:10; 148:14; Prov. 2:8). In a few passages the RSV has changed the KJV "saints" to "faithful (ones)" (I Sam. 2:9; Pss. 50:5; 89:19; 149:1, 5, 9), and the KJV "holy" to "godly" (Deut. 33:8; Pss. 16:10; 86:2), "good man" to "godly man" (Mic. 7:2); "godly" is retained in Pss. 4:3; 12:1; 32:6. In Ps. 18:26 (=II Sam. 22:26) the RSV has substituted "loyal" for KJV "merciful."

In the passages noted above in which the RSV has retained the rendering "saints," the word has in each case a possessive suffix referring to the Lord; thus the term is used as a collective designation of Israel as a religious community, "the saints of the Lord" (note especially Pss. 85:8; 148:14; 149:1). There was, doubtless, a stage in which the mere fact of belonging to the chosen people was title to the designation hasid, but with the development of ethical monotheism the term came to have moral and spiritual implications. This is especially clear in Pss. 37:28-29; 97:10-11, where the word stands in synonymous parallelism with "the righteous" (צדיקים, ṣaddîqîm), as contrasted with "the wicked." The versions attempted to convey the ethical and spiritual connotations of the term. Aq. and Symm. translate ὅσιος "saintly." The LXX and Origen render εὐσεβής or εὐλαβής, "reverent." The Targ. mostly retains the Hebrew word, but in a few places substitutes "righteous" (צדיק, ṣaddîq) or "pure" (זכא, zākhâ). Syr. generally renders "righteous" (זדיקא, zaddîqâ), but also "holy" (חסיא, ḥāsyâ), "pure" (גבא, gābhâ).

Bibliography. N. Glueck, Das Wort hesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch, BZAW, vol. 47 (1927); W. F. Lofthouse, "Chen and Chesed in the OT," ZAW, 20 (1933), 29-35; N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the OT (1944); H. J. Stoebe, "Die Bedeutung des Wortes häsäd im AT," Vetus Testamentum, 2 (1952), 244-54; R. Sorg, Hesed and Hasid in the Psalms (1953); W. L. Reed, "Some Implications of ḥēn for OT Religion," JBL, 73 (1954), 36-41; A. R. Johnson, "Hesed and Hasid," Interpretationes ad Vetus Testamentum Pertinentes Sigmundo Mowinckel Septuagenario Missae (1955), pp. 100-112.

M. H. POPE

HASMONEANS hăz'mə nē'ənz [חשמונאי; 'Ασαμωναῖος]. The family name of the dynasty of Jewish high priests and kings who ruled from 142 to 63 B.C. The early members form the theme of I Maccabees, the book which seeks to portray them as the family divinely ordained to save Israel (see especially 5:62). The very earliest members are sometimes known as the MACCABEES. This, however, is a name which strictly should only be applied to one of their number, Judas Maccabeus, a son of Mattathias (see MATTATHIAS 1), and the founder of this illustrious family (see JUDAS 10). The ascendancy of this family procured for the Jewish people a sixty-five-year period of peace and freedom, between periods of Greek and Roman supremacy.

1. Hasmoneus
2. The rise of the family
3. The rule of the Hasmoneans (142-63 B.C.)
   a. Simon
   b. John Hyrcanus
   c. Judas Aristobulus I
   d. Alexander Janneus
   e. Alexandra
   f. Aristobulus II
4. The end of the Hasmoneans (63-7 B.C.)
5. Achievement of the Hasmoneans
Bibliography

1. Hasmoneus. The family derives its name from 'Ασαμωναῖος, the great-grandfather of Mattathias, according to Josephus (Antiq. XVI.vii.1). We know almost nothing of this person. It may even have been a name borne by Mattathias himself. In any case, the name itself probably ultimately derives from a place name—HESHMON or HASHMONAH—though it has been variously interpreted as meaning "fruitfulness," "temperer of steel," and "wealthy."

2. The rise of the family. The name Hasmonean does not occur in the books of Maccabees, but is drawn from Josephus (Antiq. XX.viii.11; xx.10), who refers to the "sons of Asmoneus," to the "Asmoneans," and to the "Asmonean family." Moreover, we have one instance in the Mishna (see TALMUD) where Judas Maccabeus and his brother are called "Hasmoneans" (Middōth 1.6), and one or two similar references in later Jewish literature. The family first steps into the pages of history in 167 B.C., when the brave priest at MODIN resists the Seleucid king's demand for sacrifice to the heathen gods and slays the king's officer and a Jew who was complying. This entailed for Mattathias a flight to the mountains, whence he and his five sons and many loyal Jews who followed him descended from time to time to pull down altars, forcibly circumcise children, and put apostates to death. When, after a short time, the old man died, his son Judas Maccabeus assumed the leadership of the rebellion. Living up to his reputation of a "lion in his deeds, like a lion's cub roaring for prey" (I Macc. 3:4), Judas excelled in guerrilla warfare, and after defeating at Emmaus the three Syrian generals who were sent against him, Judas had to meet the Syrian regent himself, Lysias (see LYSIAS [SYRIAN]). As a result, peace was made, which gave the Jews complete freedom of worship, and Judas completely cleared the temple of idolatry and instituted the Rededication Feast in 165 (see DEDICATION, FEAST OF).

But the Maccabees did not rest; they found that minorities of Jews were maltreated in some places, and they did not like the fortified citadel which Lysias had built in Jerusalem and which housed Syrian troops (see JERUSALEM § 9); and, besides, Judea was not free. Judas therefore continued the fight until his valiant death at Elasa in 161 (I Macc. 9:1-22). His brother Jonathan (see MACCABEES) then became military leader of the Maccabees and continued the struggle with spasmodic attacks upon the Syrian army, and resisted the spread of Hellenization. As time went on, the Seleucid dynasty in Antioch was weakening, was often glad of Jonathan's help, and could not afford to support Hellenizing high priests in Jerusalem against popular disapproval. This increased the prestige of the Hasmonean house and their adherents. The Hasmonean dynasty can be said to have had its beginnings when Jonathan, ten years before the Jews gained complete independence, prudently allowed himself to be appointed high priest by the upstart Syrian king or pretender, Alexander Balas (see ALEXANDER 2), in whose negligent reign the Jews were left to their own devices.

As Balas was too preoccupied with his personal struggles, the Hasmoneans thrived unmolested, and in the next reign the Seleucid power conceded to Jonathan a good deal of territory in Samaria and almost complete freedom from taxation. Jonathan now became a powerful influence in the struggles for the throne by various Seleucid claimants. His army was capable of waging successful battles on behalf of any claimant, but he was tricked into being captured in 143, and then killed by a Syrian pretender. He was succeeded by his brother SIMON MACCABEUS as captain and as high priest, with the nation behind him. Simon continued with the fortifications which Jonathan had commenced in Jerusalem, and was granted one concession after another from Antioch. His final victory was to overcome the Syrian citadel in Jerusalem, the Acra, and to demand of Demetrius II that at last the Jewish people might be free of their overlords and the yoke of the heathen removed (I Macc. 13:33-52). The last of Mattathias' sons had demonstrated that the blood of the Maccabees had not been shed in vain.

3. The rule of the Hasmoneans (142-63 B.C.)

a. Simon (141-135). In 141, by his own people, Simon was given the title of ethnarch or governor, and the right of hereditary succession was granted to his heirs (I Macc. 14:41-49). All this was inscribed on a tablet which was placed in the temple. A new age was seen to have dawned, and documents were dated from it. Coins were struck. An independent treaty was concluded with Rome and Sparta. A period of peace did much to strengthen the prosperity of Judea and to prove the administrative gifts, priestly integrity, and meticulous justice of Simon. He was perhaps the best ruler the Jews ever had in the post-exilic period, though he was not their king. He promoted literature and the arts, trade and farming. Unfortunately, tragedy marred the end of his rule, and in his old age Judea was treacherously invaded by the king of Syria, Antiochus VII (see ANTIOCHUS 7). The two sons, Judas and John, to whom Simon entrusted the campaign, inflicted a decisive defeat on the Syrian general near Modin. All went peacefully and prosperously for two more years, until in 135 Simon and two of his sons perished at DOK at the hand of his son-in-law and chief rival for power, Ptolemy son of Abub. One son escaped and assumed his father's offices of governor and high priest before his rival could reach Jerusalem. He was John, commonly known as Hyrcanus, who had been in charge of the fortress Gazara.

b. John Hyrcanus (135-105). His long regime began somewhat unfortunately, because he agreed to the demand of the Seleucid king Antiochus VII Sidetes, after Jerusalem had been besieged for a whole year and the wall broken down, to disarm his troops and to pay a heavy indemnity. However, there was soon a turn in the tide of fortune, and John Hyrcanus quickly ended his temporary humiliation. He seized the opportunity afforded by the death of Antiochus in 128 and the disputes about the succession which followed, to cease paying the indemnity and to extend the borders of Jewish territory: E of the Jordan, and northward to include Shechem and the Samaritans, whose rival temple on Mount Gerizim he destroyed (see GERIZIM, MOUNT) ca. 109, and southward to include IDUMEA (the old Edom). He compelled the Idumeans to become Jews and observe the whole law. In spite of this, however, the Jews themselves for the future never regarded the Idumeans as anything but Edomites and semi-heathen. The savage revenge which Hyrcanus took upon the Samaritans must, in part at least, have been dictated by the irritating aloofness of the SAMARITANS during the Maccabean struggles; they had always been bitterly hostile to the Judeans and had resisted both Maccabean influence on the one hand and Hellenization on the other. John Hyrcanus had then a double reason for paying off old scores.

He considerably strengthened the defenses of his country by building fortresses and concluding a useful treaty with Rome. His prestige increased: men looked upon him as a prophet as well as a high-priestly prince; his name began to appear inscribed on the Judean coinage; he hired foreign mercenaries to help fight his campaigns.

One very important development took place during the high priesthood of John Hyrcanus—the transfer of his sympathies from the popular Pharisaic to the noble Sadducean party. The Pharisees openly resented the hint that Hyrcanus, who had hitherto been much under their influence, might venture to assume royal status; they looked upon the house of David alone as the true royal family. The earlier Hasmoneans had been predominantly pious and zealous for the law after the fashion of the later Pharisees. Both parties were by now becoming powerful, religiously and politically, and more and more mutually antagonistic, but it is not certain beyond all doubt that they were known as yet by the names of Pharisee and Sadducee. Josephus reports that Hyrcanus was overtly condemned as a usurper by a member of the popular party and challenged to surrender the high priesthood because he had no claim to it (Jos. Antiq. XIII.x.5-6). The story is repeated in the Talmud, but it looks like a Pharisaic invention with the motive of ascribing opposition to the Hasmonean claims as early as possible.

Hyrcanus' move toward the more politically minded and aristocratic party had the greater significance and importance in that it set the direction for future development in the Hasmonean dynasty. John Hyrcanus undoubtedly set the precedent by developing Hellenistic sympathies, and departing from the simpler ideals of the earlier members of his family. The names of his three young sons were changed from Judas, Mattathias, and Jonathan (glorious names!) to Aristobulus, Antigonus, and Alexander Janneus.

Politically it was a very successful period for the Jews, great strides being made toward the full restoration of the royal Davidic throne of Judah and the complete safety and independence of the state. We know too little about his latter years, but Aristobulus and Antigonus proved themselves valiant soldiers when their father left them in charge of the siege of the city of Samaria. This Greek colony appealed to Syria, to Antiochus Cyzicenus (see ANTI-OCHUS 9), who came only to be ignominiously defeated by the two brothers. Samaria eventually fell, and was utterly destroyed. News of these victories delighted the heart of the old priest in Jerusalem, Hyrcanus. But they also saddened the hearts of many of the more pious Pharisees, who thought that the high priesthood was in danger of being profaned by worldly ambition.

Coins from this regime have been found in the ruins of the Qumran community (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), and the sect which resided there may well have originated at this period, perhaps as a protest against the prevailing Hasmonean worldliness. Messianic psalms were written at this time, with John Hyrcanus as the probable hero, and it was largely because of the greatness and glory of his period of priesthood and governorship that second-century conceptions of the Messiah often centered round the hope of a priestly ruler, descended from Levi like the Hasmoneans.

It has been held, but not by most investigators, that Hyrcanus was the first of the Hasmonean rulers to take the title of king; it is more likely that this was true of his eldest son, Judas Aristobulus I (see § 3*c below*). With John Hyrcanus the Hasmonean rulers passed forever their highest peak of nobility and religious devotion. The rest of them aimed at being little more than secular monarchs, and few achieved anything better than the average in moral character. The difference between the second- and first-century Hasmoneans is in this way particularly marked. In consequence, the messianic hopes of the best minds in the nation tended to turn away from the Priest idea to that of the SON OF MAN—a supernatural figure far removed from this world, and not in the slightest modeled on the Hasmonean priest-kings!

c. Judas Aristobulus I (104). Before he died, Hyrcanus had decided that his widow should retain the civil power at his death, while his eldest son, Aristobulus, should assume the high priesthood. But Aristobulus was anything but pious; all his ambitions were political, and after ruthlessly imprisoning (according to Josephus) all the family except his brother Antigonus, and allowing his mother to die of hunger in prison, he not only seized the civil power, but also proclaimed himself as Aristobulus, King of the Jews. He was, however, careful that foreign nations should be more aware of this than the Jews themselves. On his coins he appears only as Judas, his Jewish name, and merely as high priest, not king.

He continued his father's work of strengthening the nation. He extended its boundaries northward, beyond Samaria and Scythopolis, by conquering those Itureans who inhabited "Galilee of the Gentiles," as it came to be called, in a very short reign of only one year. The Galilee in which Jesus was brought up was really the creation of Aristobulus, who forcibly proselytized a race which was essentially or largely Gentile, making them accept circumcision and all the beliefs and customs of the Jews. The family of which Mary came belonged, of course, to Judea, but it is likely that some of the apostles of Jesus, chosen by the Sea of Galilee and near to Capernaum, were of mixed Syrian and Greek descent, whose forebears were forced into Judaism by the sword of the Hasmonean kings.

Aristobulus moved much further than his father away from the ideals of the Maccabees. Whether or not he called himself Philhellene ("friend of the Greek"), he behaved accordingly. It is the more remarkable, therefore, that in common with other Hasmoneans he should have displayed so conspicuously the proselytizing spirit.

Out of jealousy and suspicion, and urged on by his queen, Salome Alexandra (see ALEXANDRA; see also § 3*e below*), he had unwittingly caused Antigonus, for whom he had some affection, to be murdered by his bodyguard. It is said to the credit of Aristobulus that his painful death was hastened by his remorse for the crime against his brother.

d. Alexander Janneus (104–78). Aristobulus was succeeded by a brother whom he had imprisoned and who was now released by his sister-in-law. His name, Jonathan, or Jannai, was Hellenized into Janneus, and in addition he took the Greek name Alexander. This does not mean that he favored Greek culture in any way, as Aristobulus had done. Like his brother, however, he was ambitious to complete his father's work of conquering and Judaizing all Coele-Syria (N Palestine), and he did finally succeed in Gaza in the S (ca. 96 B.C.) and all the towns except Ascalon on the W coast S of Mount Carmel, and in extending the kingdom to Gadara and other cities E of Jordan.

In him the Hasmonean dynasty really reached its height territorially. But the subjugation of so many cultured Greek cities had a demoralizing effect on the civilization of Coele-Syria: prosperity declined in field and city, and everywhere the scars from the wars from which his reign was scarcely ever free were visible. In the words of Ps. 2, which may have been composed in this reign, it was his warlike aim to receive the heathen for his inheritance, the utmost parts of earth for his possession, and to bruise them with an iron rod, breaking them in pieces like a potter's vessel. It was seldom indeed that any foe, even Egypt or Syria, was able to thwart his designs for very long.

Unfortunately for him, he was considerably hindered by troubles nearer home, and these very largely centered around the enmity of the Pharisees, to whom he appeared thoroughly disreputable. Their opposition might have remained harmless enough, but in overcoming it Alexander Janneus stooped to every kind of savagery. The Pharisees probably owed their origin to the HASIDEANS, the "pious ones," in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. Sometimes they had assisted the Maccabees in the struggle for independence, but at other times they had remained aloof, especially after Judas Maccabeus had begun to display merely political ambitions. All their zeal had been for the law and in support of characteristically Jewish institutions against Hellenistic ones, and they did not desire war and glory for their own sake. They became less and less sympathetic toward the Hasmonean house and increasingly critical of the legality of its claims to the high priesthood and royal status. The Hasmonean house, in its turn, though it had risen to power in the first place through the pious zeal of the Hasideans and their successors, was now finding itself more in line with the other powerful and rich families of Judea. And these were Sadducees. Sympathies and antipathies reached a critically acute stage in the days of Alexander Janneus. Of course, although Josephus himself is not prejudiced against the Sadducean king, we can never be sure how far the report which the Jewish historian gives of the king's atrocities has been previously colored by Pharisaic bitterness against him. This record of Janneus in his home affairs is one of the most disgraceful in the annals of dictatorship. Briefly it is as follows:

During a celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, he was officiating in the temple as high priest when disapproval of an immoral, drunken, bloodthirsty scoundrel in such a place impelled the people to hurl at him, not only insulting words, but also the citron fruit which they carried at the feast. Another important detail is gleaned from the Talmud tractate Sukkah: instead of pouring the water libation on the altar, as he should have done according to Pharisaic opinion, he had poured it over his own feet. It may well be that Janneus was in this way declaring himself publicly on the side of the Sadducees, sharing their contempt for this Pharisaic ritual of pouring water, the origin of which is said to have been the need for rain at that time of year to fill the cisterns in Jerusalem. The Sadducees were mainly the country aristocracy, not concerned with the filling of cisterns in the city, whereas the Pharisees were largely city dwellers without easy access to the countryman's wells and streams. The Sadducees regarded the libation as a layman's invention, unnecessary and rather slighting to the priesthood, as it came but five days after the impressive prayers of the Day of Atonement. Alexander Janneus would then be risking his life, and certainly his popularity, thus to mock the people's prayer for rain at the end of the festival; and he was at least declaring his sincere adherence to Sadducean beliefs and the dignity of the priesthood.

Whether this was a dangerous rising or not, Janneus did not prevent his wild Asian mercenaries from falling upon the outraged crowds with some savagery, and killing six thousand, if Josephus is right. Jerusalem was nearly always in a ferment after this, and when Janneus returned ignominiously from an engagement with the Nabatean king beyond the Jordan, and entered Jerusalem with practically no army, it was the signal for a determined revolt sponsored by the Pharisees in 94 B.C. After six years of civil war (ca. 88 B.C.), they and the people called to their aid a Seleucid king Demetrius III Eucerus (see DEMETRIUS 4)—ironically enough, a descendant of the Antiochus Epiphanes against whom their ancestors had risen under the brave leadership of Janneus' forebears!

Janneus and his mercenaries were decisively crushed at Shechem, and then an acute problem arose. Were the Jews to return to Seleucid domination? According to a commentary on Nahum, discovered at Qumran, it looks as if Demetrius was expecting to march into Jerusalem. Many were horrified at the idea and, as the lesser of the evils, returned to support the Hasmonean, who had fled to the mountains. It was a tragic step, because according to this grim account Janneus soon captured the remaining leaders of the revolt. He then lay drinking among his concubines (so Josephus tells us), looking down upon a ghastly scene: eight hundred crosses with men upon them, and by many a cross the dying man's wife and children, cut to death before his eyes.

The spirit of the Pharisees was at a low ebb after this. There was no more thought of active resistance, and thousands fled from the wicked man's dominion. The Pharisees had hope of a life to come, where God rewards and requites, but they left Jerusalem with much bitterness in their hearts, despising the rich and influential Sadducees more than before. Their cry must have been something like this: "Woe to you mighty, who oppress the righteous. The day of your destruction will come!" (I Enoch 96:8 orig. tr.). The noble families had done nothing to restrain the tyrant from his lawless deeds.

It has been pointed out that disposal of political enemies by crucifixion is attributed to a figure called the Lion of Wrath in one of the biblical commentaries (on Nahum) which were discovered at Qumran near the Dead Sea (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). It is therefore suggested that the Lion is no other than Alexander Janneus, and that the Qumran community in whose library the scrolls were found consisted of a group of pious Judeans and their priests who escaped from Janneus and settled in the desert with a rival high priest. The community had its own leader, as we gather from the Commentary on Habakkuk, one of the Qumran scrolls, who was named the Teacher of Righteousness. He was persecuted by another figure called the Wicked Priest. The latter may be identical with the Lion of Wrath (in the Nahum Commentary). It cannot be proved that the Teacher was actually crucified, but this has been surmised in view of the reputation of Alexander Janneus as gleaned from Josephus. But there is as yet no evidence for the existence of any rival high priest, much less that the Teacher was such. There is a great deal to be said for the view that the Wicked Priest and the Lion of Wrath are intended to be Alexander Janneus, and that the Qumran community began with the persecuted Pharisees and others who fled from Jerusalem during his reign. Coins of the reigns of Hyrcanus and his sons were found in the ruins of the first building at Qumran, proving that the community did already exist at this time. The prominent Pharisee, Simon ben Shetach, may even be the Teacher of Righteousness and leader of this community; at least he sought to hide himself from his brother-in-law, as we gather from rabbinical stories. Moreover, Janneus was reputed to be the son of a captive slave girl, and one of the Dead Sea Scrolls does, indeed, breathe a pious sigh for the time when bastards and sons of strangers will be debarred from the restored temple. On the other hand, this same calumny was hurled by the Pharisees, according to some evidence (see § 3*b above*), at Janneus' father. Again, little can be made of the fact that both the Lion and Alexander Janneus may have been fond of crucifying opponents.

A warrior all his life, Janneus waged several more campaigns against Syria, Arabia, and other neighbors, and died while fighting on the other side of Jordan in 78 B.C.

He bequeathed his throne to Alexandra, the widow of his brother and apparently his own wife too, and the high priesthood to his son. Whether or not he himself urged Alexandra to make peace with the Pharisees, as Josephus describes, this is certainly what she did. It is not impossible that the aged and tired villain, wracked by the pains which were the penalty of an impure life, had already read the vengeance written upon the faces of those men of the people whom he had savagely oppressed.

e. Alexandra (78-69). Salome—to give her her Hebrew name—ruled wisely and piously during nine years of unwonted peace, allowing the Pharisees a wide measure of control over internal affairs but retaining foreign policy in her own control. There were two sons: Hyrcanus the high priest, who was of little moment, and his younger brother, Aristobulus, who was a man of much greater competence and initiative, and in consequence was not allowed any say in affairs of state. Aristobulus had never sympathized with his father's enemies, nor with the apparent desire of his mother to placate them. He saw that the Pharisees were recalling the banished, releasing prisoners, and planning a revenge against those who had counseled his father to execute the eight hundred rebels. Several of them in their turn suffered crucifixion. Not unnaturally, the noble Sadducean houses, despising Alexandra for the change of front for which she was responsible, looked to the younger son for leadership and helped him to stir up trouble against his mother. This they were able to do, because they were of the military class and had the fortresses under their control. His mother was bound to relent and do her best to curb the excesses of the Pharisees. However, when the aged lady became ill and was desirous of leaving her throne to the eldest son, the meek Hyrcanus, Aristobulus was determined to obtain it for himself, and to this end he gained control of some of the strongest fortresses in the country. He raised an army of his own; and because the Queen had given orders that he must be resisted, he was preparing to attack Jerusalem when his mother died.

f. Aristobulus II (69-63). At Alexandra's death, against her own wishes Hyrcanus had to make way for his younger brother, after a battle at Jericho, and he retired into private life. He was an indolent and peace-loving man. If an unscrupulous intriguer had not worked upon the elder brother's unmanly fears, no danger would have appeared from that quarter. An Idumean named Antipater, whose son was to become Herod the Great, persuaded Hyrcanus that he needed protection against his ruthless brother and induced him to seek this protection in Petra at the hands of the Nabatean Aretas III, king of Arabia. See NABATEANS.

Antipater, whose father had been governor of Idumea, and who himself was now an influential person in Jerusalem, was seeking only his own advantage by standing behind the effeminate Hyrcanus. He had against him both the determined Aristobulus and most of the old aristocratic families, but he played his hand well.

Aretas promised to support Hyrcanus and to help him to regain the throne of Judea and the high priesthood from Aristobulus, but in return he demanded Hyrcanus' promise to restore the twelve cities which their father had captured from the Arabians. The plan was put into execution and worked well. The younger brother had to flee when he was defeated and his troops had deserted him. The Pharisees were not sympathetic toward him, for he had shown during his mother's reign that he hated them, and they willingly helped the Arabians lay siege to him and the priests on the temple mount in Jerusalem in 65 B.C. A period of bitter civil strife then began. During the siege, according to Josephus, a man named Onias, whose prayers for rain in drought had previously been wondrously answered, was brought forward by the followers of Hyrcanus, who required him to curse Aristobulus. But instead of this, Onias impressively asked God to listen to the prayers of neither side; and for this he was stoned to death. It has been suggested that he was the Teacher of Righteousness who was persecuted by the Wicked Priest, according to the Habakkuk Commentary among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, and it is suggested that the Wicked Priest is either Aristobulus II or Hyrcanus or both; although there are some points which seem to favor the identification, most of the detailed evidence is hardly impressive enough to bear this conclusion to the exclusion of other possibilities.

All might have gone well for the fortunes of Hyrcanus, had not both the Hasmonean princes separately appealed to Rome to assist them, for Rome had now taken over the collapsed Syrian power and under Pompey was extending her sway to the Euphrates. Marcus Scaurus, Pompey's legate in Syria, had already departed for Jerusalem to make capital out of the quarrel. He gave his verdict in favor of Aristobulus, having been promised large sums of money from both brothers, and ordered the king of Arabia to withdraw on pain of being declared an enemy of Rome. The Idumean Antipater and other supporters of Hyrcanus had no intention of abandoning the struggle for power, and they sent an embassage personally to the Roman commander-in-chief, Pompey, at Damascus in 63. Aristobulus himself did the same thing! Moreover, there was a third and popular deputation received by Pompey, probably from the Pharisees, to which the great man was far more likely to listen, which advocated that Rome should favor neither prince but rather that he should assume the political government himself, abolishing the monarchy altogether and allowing only the theocratic rule of the priests.

While Pompey was slowly making up his mind, Aristobulus became discontented and occupied the fortress of Alexandrium. Pompey received this as a threat and marched against him. Surrendering the stronghold, Aristobulus retired into Jerusalem and awaited attack. Even then, when Pompey advanced, Aristobulus went to him and sought peace, offering to open the gates and pay a price, but his followers in Jerusalem kept the gates shut when Gabinius was sent for the money. Pompey imprisoned Aristobulus for this and succeeded in entering the city, because the party of Hyrcanus and Antipater, now swollen in numbers by many who were alarmed by the proximity of Roman troops, opened the gates. But Aristobulus' party, though bereft of their king, retreated to the fortified temple mount, which had a precipice almost all round it, and defended themselves. There was a siege of three months. The walls of the mount were finally breached by Pompey's battering rams, the temple was entered, the priests were cut down as they ministered at the altar, and twelve thousand Jews were slaughtered by Pompey's men (63 B.C.). The Roman commander now proceeded to profane the temple still more by entering the Holy of holies, to see what riches were there, but he took nothing away and afterward ordered that the place should be rehallowed and the worship continue as usual. He took away much of the territory of Judea and did not depart from Jerusalem without leaving there a Roman garrison. The horrors of these dreadful months live again for us in the pious songs of the period: the PSALMS OF SOLOMON.

This was the end of the reign of Aristobulus II. He and his family were carried off by Pompey, and in 61 he was led captive through the streets of Rome, fortunate not to have been executed as so many of his supporters were. Hyrcanus, the elder brother, was allowed to function as high priest and ethnarch, without the title of king, although he is generally known as Hyrcanus II. It was therefore the end of the Hasmonean dynasty in any real sense of the word. Tribute must now be paid to Rome, and Judea was to come under the supervision of the Roman proconsul of Syria. The downfall largely came about through the stupid folly, to which this house was prone, of so eagerly calling for the assistance of foreign powers in internal strife. At the same time, it has to be granted that it is doubtful whether even in the most fortunate circumstances the wisest of Jewish rulers could have maintained the independence of his people once the Romans had entered upon the ruins of the Syrian Empire.

4. The end of the Hasmoneans (63-7 B.C.). But we must follow the life of Aristobulus II a little further to its sad end. The Idumean Antipater had prudently shown himself well disposed toward the Romans, and he wielded considerable power for the moment. He might have been overthrown by the repeated attempts of Aristobulus' branch of the Hasmonean family to regain power and unite Coele-Syria, which was divided by Gabinius into five administrative districts; but the Romans invariably came to the Idumean's help. In 57, Alexander, the son of Aristobulus II, who had escaped before reaching Rome, rose against Antipater but was defeated and captured; the next year it was Aristobulus himself and his other son, Antigonus, who had escaped captivity; the next year again, it was Alexander who led the rebellion. Gabinius crushed each of these risings. In 53 there seemed to be an opportunity for the Jews when Gabinius' successor, Crassus, had been defeated by the Parthians at Carrhae, but the Jewish rebellion under Pitholaus was crushed by the next proconsul, Cassius (51), who sold many thousands of Jews as slaves. However, Aristobulus was released by Julius Caesar after he had seized the power in Rome in 49, and the intention was to send him with an army against Antipater and the party of Pompey in Syria, but before setting out, Aristobulus was poisoned by the supporters of Pompey. In the same year, 49, his son Alexander was beheaded by order of Pompey himself in Antioch.

At the ascendancy of Julius Caesar, after Pompey's assassination in 48, Antipater artfully placed himself on the winning side once more. He became Caesar's devoted friend and gave him considerable assistance during his Egyptian campaign. In return, the five divisions made by Gabinius were happily abolished and Judea was united under the high priest Hyrcanus, who once again enjoyed the hereditary political functions which Gabinius and Pompey had taken away; and Hyrcanus was called "ethnarch," while Antipater served Rome as procurator (47 B.C.). No taxation need now be paid to Rome, and the laws and customs of the Jews were thoroughly respected. They were exempt from military service with the Roman legions, which were now withdrawn from Judea. Territories which had been seized were restored, including the valuable seaport of Joppa. Julius Caesar proved himself kindly disposed toward the Jews, both in Judea and in Alexandria. Caesar was murdered in 44; but although Antipater was quick enough to transfer his allegiance to the new power of Cassius, his brilliant career was suddenly cut short by the poisoning hand of a Jewish rival for power in 43. Because he was an Idumean, he was never popular with the Jewish people. Antipater had, however, procured for his eldest son, Phasael, appointment as governor of Jerusalem: and for his second son, Herod (see HEROD [FAMILY]), appointment as governor of Galilee. The Idumean brothers, after Caesar's assassination and the victory of Antony and Octavian over Brutus and Cassius in 42, were able to gain the ear of Mark Antony and to silence all the accusations of the Sadducean nobility against them. Once again Hyrcanus was reduced to being no more than high priest, while Herod and his brother were granted powers of government with the title of "tetrarch."

But at this point Antigonus (whose Hebrew name, Mattathias, appears on his coins), the surviving son of Aristobulus II, who had already pleaded his cause unsuccessfully before Julius Caesar, made one last determined attempt to regain his father's kingdom in 40 B.C. Herod defeated him in battle, but the Hasmonean won the support of the fierce invading Parthians who had temporarily broken the Roman power in Syria and who proclaimed him king. It was the last brief glory of the Hasmonean house. Both Phasael and Hyrcanus were captured by the Parthians, and Phasael committed suicide. His young brother Herod fled to his friends at Rome. The high priest Hyrcanus was carried off and barbarously treated. The Roman senate then declared that Herod was king of Judea, and the next year (39) he landed at Ptolemaïs and declared war on Antigonus, Mark Antony's soldiers having dealt with the Parthian menace. Although this war lasted for more than two difficult years, Herod was finally successful. He took Jerusalem at last, with the assistance of Antony's legate Sosius and of the Roman legions, and he slaughtered all his opponents among the Sadducean aristocracy. King Antigonus II was captured, and was beheaded in Antioch—the first king to suffer thus at the hands of Rome. With him the Hasmonean story really closes, for Herod was now firmly on the throne of Judea (37 B.C.).

And yet this noble house and lineage does not quite pass into oblivion, for Herod had already married Mariamne, the Hasmonean princess. She was granddaughter of Aristobulus II through her father, Alexander, and also granddaughter of Hyrcanus II, through her mother, Alexandra. In her person, therefore, were united those two branches of the Hasmonean house which were so bitterly at feud. Her brother Aristobulus, hardly more than a boy, was high priest. During the first few years of the reign of Mariamne's husband, that extraordinary king in fits of jealous suspicion murdered in turn the young high priest Aristobulus III in 35, the aged grandfather Hyrcanus II in 30, Mariamne herself in 29, and her mother, Alexandra, in 28.

After these ruthless crimes there remained but two males who might be termed Hasmoneans: Herod's own children by the Hasmonean Mariamne. They were Alexander and Aristobulus. Their father ordered these two strangled to death in 7 B.C., at the very place where he had married their mother, and so he freed himself at last from any possible fear of Hasmonean rivalry or any sentimental attachment, on the part of his people, to a noble house.

5. Achievement of the Hasmoneans. The achievement of the Hasmoneans, during the century of their ascendancy, was distinguished and permanent. They were the means by which Judaism and the Jewish state became a force to be reckoned with, even by the Romans, marked out conspicuously from neighboring religions and cultures, the object as well as the subject of many bitter feelings—particularly on the part of its nearest neighbors, the Samaritans. They had brought some other nations too under their rule and, not content with simple conquest, had impressed them beneath a religious yoke. This outthrust of empire was all lost under the Herodians, who failed to see as clearly as the Hasmoneans that the first essential was to preserve the Jewish state in the face of hostile heathen neighbors, however bloodthirsty the tactics by which this end was achieved. Only so, it seemed to the Hasmoneans, could the worship of God and the wholesome teaching of the Law and the Prophets be preserved forevermore. In any case, the Herodians did not feel that such a destiny was worth so great a sacrifice.

Within the state, alongside the continuance of the temple and its sacrifices, the increased study and reading of the Law, which had been fostered under Hasmonean rule, resulted in a great impetus being given to scribal activity in the way of copying, studying, and teaching the Bible (see SCRIBE). It was the most permanent legacy of their rule, even more than the growth of the great parties, Pharisaic and Sadducean, and the bitter antipathy between them, which was so obvious a feature of the period. See PHARISEES; SADDUCEES.

Together with reverence for the Scriptures went the belief in doctrines which owed their origin to the experiences of Hasmonean days: RESURRECTION of the dead and the hope of a future life after death.

In conclusion, it would not be wide of the mark to suggest that all the foundation stones of modern Jewry were well and truly laid during the period of Hasmonean rule.

Bibliography. Jos. Antiq. XII.v ff; War I.ii ff. F. W. Madden, Coins of the Jews (1881). E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People (English trans., 1891), I, 212-399. E. Bevan, Jerusalem Under the High Priests (1904). J. Juster, Les Juifs dans l'empire romain (1914). V. Aptowitzer, Parteipolitik der Hasmonäerzeit . . . (1927). Cambridge Ancient History, vol. IX (1932); vol. X (1934). W. O. E. Oesterley, The Jews and Judaism During the Greek Period (1941). R. Marcus, Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, 16 (1946-47), 97-181; "Selected Bibliography (1920-45) of the Jews in the Hellenistic-Roman Period." F.-M. Abel, Les Livres des Maccabées (1949), especially pp. 3-4 and bibliography on pp. lx ff. W. R. Farmer, Maccabees, Zealots and Josephus (1956).

On Alexander Janneus, see: H. Loewe in Judaism and Christianity (1937), I, 123-30. J. M. Allegro, The Dead Sea Scrolls (1956), pp. 94-100. N. TURNER

Relationship of Important Hasmoneans

HASRAH hăz'rə [חסרה]; KJV Apoc. AZARA ăz'ə rə. 1. Chronicles form of HARHAS.

2. Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (I Esd. 5:31). The name is omitted in the parallels Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51. See NETHINIM.

HASSENAAH. Alternate form of SENAAH.

HASSENUAH hăs'ə nōō'ə [חסנאה, חסנואה, the hated women]; KJV HASENUAH in I Chr. 9:7; KJV SENUAH sə nōō'ə in Neh. 11:9. A postexilic Benjaminite family name (I Chr. 9:7; Neh. 11:9). "Hodaviah" in I Chr. 9:7 could be a corruption of "Judah," in which case both references would be to the same person. "SENAAH" is probably a variant of "Hassenuah." H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HASSHUB hăsh'əb [חשוב, possibly considerate, but more probably a shortened form of חשביה, Yahu has considered]; KJV usually HASHUB hā'shŭb. 1. A member of the Merari clan of the tribe of Levi, and the father of a certain Shemaiah who settled in Jerusalem after the Exile (I Chr. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

2. Either one man who had two assignments in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah, or two builders with the same name (Neh. 3:11, 23).

3. One of those who sealed the covenant in the time of Ezra (Neh. 10:23—H 10:24).

M. NEWMAN

HASSOPHERETH. See SOPHERETH.

HASUPHA hə sōō'fə [חשופא (Ezra 2:43), חשפא (Neh. 7:46), swift; cf. Arab. ḥašūfun; Apoc. Ασιφά]; KJV HASHUPHA hə shōō'fə in Neh. 7:46; KJV ASIPHA ə sĭf'ə in I Esd. 5:29. Eponym of a family of temple servants among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46; I Esd. 5:29).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 226. B. T. DAHLBERG

HAT [Aram. כרבלה; cf. Akkad. karballatu, helmet, cap]. One of the articles of clothing with which the three Hebrews were cast into the furnace (Dan. 3:21).

HATACH. KJV form of HATHACH.

HATCHET [כשיל] (Ps. 74:6); KJV AX. One of the instruments used in breaking down the carved wood of the sanctuary; perhaps the axe of a woodcutter.

HATE, HATRED [שנא; μισεῖν]. Dislike, antipathy, aversion, between persons, in a variety of human relationships (cf. Gen. 26:27; 29:31,33; Judg. 11:7; 14:16; II Sam. 13:15).

1. In the OT. In the OT the concept derives its peculiar religious meaning from the notion that God hates. The troublesome passage: "Yet I have loved Jacob but I have hated Esau" (Mal. 1:2-3) provides a clue to understanding. God's hatred is the counterpart of his ELECTION love. Jacob he loves in his election; ESAU he hates in his rejection. And so God's enemies are Israel's enemies and vice versa; they are those who hate God (Num. 10:35; Deut. 7:15; 33:11). God hates evil, and so Israel must hate evil (Exod. 18:21; Ps. 97:10; Amos 5:15). In the Psalms the enemies of God and Israel are frequently portrayed (Pss. 34:21; 35:19; 38:19; 83:1-8), and God is petitioned for help against the enemies who hate him and his people (Pss. 68:1-2; 83; 139:19-22). God hates idolatry and false worship (Deut. 12:31; 16:22; Jer. 44:4 ff). Israel's worship can become the object of God's hatred when there is lack of obedience to his commandments (Hos. 9:15; Amos 5:21; Mal. 2:13-16).

It is important to recognize that while in the concrete historical situations the term "hate" could have had an emotional connotation, as a concept it is based essentially upon the religious commitment to reject and turn away from those who deny God and his laws. There is no sharp distinction between the power of evil and the actor; nor is there, in general, any explicit emphasis on overcoming hate with love. In the OT the one clear prohibition of hatred is in the case of the brother (Lev. 19:17; Deut. 19:11). In the eschatological dualism of the Qumran writings there is a new emphasis on God's hatred of the spirit of darkness, which holds dominion over the wicked (1QS 3.26–4.1). But, as in the canonical Psalms, the Qumran sectarians are called to separate themselves from the wicked and hate them, though they are under rigorous obligation to love their fellow sectarians.

2. In the NT. In the teachings of Jesus there is no holy hate against men. Rather, he admonishes his disciples to love all men, even their enemies (Luke 6:27). Nevertheless, the disciples are not removed from the hatred of the world (Matt. 10:37; Luke 14:26), and increasing hatred is one of the signs of the approaching consummation of the kingdom (Matt. 10:22; 24:9; Mark 13:13; Luke 21:17). The difficult passage enjoining hatred of family and self (Luke 14:26; cf. Matt. 10:37), one of Jesus' most paradoxical utterances, is intended to stress the unconditional character of discipleship. All that the disciple should love most, including himself (see LOVE IN THE NT), must not stand between him and his Master. "Hatred" is used here almost synonymously with "denying the self" (Mark 8:34: ἀπαρνησάσθω ἑαυτόν; cf. Luke 9:23). Discipleship may involve leaving home and family—even death.

The NT in general reflects the principles in Jesus' teaching (Luke 6:27). While life in the old age was characterized by hate (Tit. 3:3), life in the new age is characterized by love (Rom. 13:8 ff; I John 2:9, 11; 3:14; 4:20), which overcomes evil and hatred. Evil deeds are hated, but not persons (Jude 23; Rev. 2:6). Renunciation or hatred of wickedness is motivated by God's love for sinners, revealed in Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:8), and it moves the disciple toward love for man held captive by wickedness.

Especially in the Gospel and Letters of John the sharp antithesis between the life of love and of hate is drawn. Hatred, though intensely personal, assumes almost cosmic dimensions in its demonic opposition to God's love. It is the basis of unbelief, evil deeds (John 3:20), and murder (I John 3:15). Only through the infinite love of God actively revealed in Jesus Christ is such hatred overcome (John 3:16-17). The mission of the church is to reveal this love to the world, which continues in hate (John 17:14, 20-26).

F. W. YOUNG

HATHACH hā'thăk [התך, perhaps from Pers. hataka, good] (Esth. 4:5-6, 9-10); KJV HATACH hăt'ək. A eunuch of Ahasuerus appointed to attend Queen Esther. It was through him that she learned from Mordecai about Haman's plot against the Jews.

M. NEWMAN

HATHATH hā'thăth [התת, weakness(?)]. A Calebite family (I Chr. 4:13).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 227.

HATIPHA hə tī′fə [חטיפא, seized (e.g., as a captive in childhood) Ατιφά] KJV Apoc. ATIPHA ə—. Eponym of a family of temple servants among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56; cf. I Esd. 5:32).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 232. B. T. DAHLBERG

HATITA hə tī′tə [חטיטא; Apoc. Ατητα]; KJV Apoc. TETA tē′tə. A family of gatekeepers (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45; I Esd. 5:28).

HATTIL hăt′əl [חטיל; Arab. ḥaṭila, talkative; Apoc. Αγια]; KJV Apoc. HAGIA hā′gĭ ə. A family of "sons of Solomon's servants" (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59; I Esd. 5:34). See NETHINIM.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 229. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HATTUSH hăt′ŭsh [חטוש; Αττους]; KJV Apoc. LETTUS lĕt′əs. 1. A postexilic descendant of David who returned to Judah with Ezra (I Chr. 3:22; Ezra 8:2; I Esd. 8:29); called the grandson of Shecaniah in I Chronicles, but his son in Ezra.

2. A repairer of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:10); some identify him with 1 above.

3. A postexilic priest who signed the pledge of reform (Neh. 10:4; 12:2). The name is probably missing from Neh. 12:14 through an error in transmission. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HAUGHTINESS. See PRIDE.

HAURAN hôr′ən [חורן]. A district E of the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee, and N of the Yarmuk River. The name appears only in Ezek. 47:16, 18, where it marks the NE limit of Ezekiel's ideal land of Israel. The name, however, is old, for it is mentioned in Egyptian texts of the Nineteenth Dynasty as Huruna. It was occupied apparently by the kings of Damascus after the division of the Israelite kingdom and is mentioned as Ḥaurânu in the inscriptions of Shalmaneser III of Assyria, who devastated it in 842 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III overran it in 732 and founded two districts there with centers at Metuna and Karnaim; Ashurbanipal crushed a revolt there. Despite these destructive wars the district flourished because of the fertility of its lava soil, and during the Greco-Roman period, when it was known as Auranities, it served as the granary of Palestine.

Both Jews and Greeks were settled there in large numbers in the fourth century B.C. and after, and the region was coveted by the Nabateans and so changed hands frequently. It was conquered by the Maccabeans in the second century, but came under Nabatean control in 90 B.C., when the Nabateans won a victory over Alexander Janneus. Pompey in turn annexed it to the DECAPOLIS, but Augustus returned it to Herod the Great, who settled numerous Jews from Babylonia there. After the death of Herod, this territory fell to his son Herod Philip (cf. Luke 3:1); in A.D. 37 Caligula bestowed it, with the rest of the tetrarchy of Philip, upon his favorite Herod Agrippa I, and it was ruled by the latter's son, Agrippa II, until the great war against Rome (66-73). Hauran was again under Nabatean control from 85 to 106, when Trajan finally added it to the Roman province of Syria. The region still bears the name of el-Hauran. S. COHEN HAVEN [חוף (twice in Gen. 49:13; once SHORE); בוא (KJV ENTERING IN), coming in, entrance; KJV λιμήν (RSV HARBOR)]; THEIR DESIRED HAVEN [מחוז חפצם (Ps. 107:30), lit., the city (Akkad. maḫāzu) of their desire]. Used primarily in the nautical sense, as a place which offers safe anchorage and station for ships. See HARBOR.

H. F. BECK

HAVILAH hăv′ə lə [חוילה, perhaps a diminutive of חול, sand, and so a stretch of sand]. A land mentioned in the story of the Garden of Eden as producing excellent gold, bdellium gum, and the shoham ("onyx") stone, and as being surrounded by the River Pishon (Gen. 2:11-12). The name occurs also in the genealogies, first as a son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; I Chr. 1:9), and next as a son of Joktan (Gen. 10:29; I Chr. 1:23). The Ishmaelites are also said to have lived in the territory from Havilah to Shur (Gen. 25:18). However, the passage (I Sam. 15:7) which states that Saul pursued the Amalekites from Havilah to Shur cannot be correct, since the first locality is obviously in the S of Judah; hence it is probably to be emended to Hachilah, a hill mentioned elsewhere (I Sam. 23:19; 26:1, 3).

Opinions as to the location of Havilah have differed widely. Most of them considered the Havilah of Arabia and that of the Garden of Eden story as two different localities. The former is sometimes placed on the Persian Gulf, but the most widely accepted location is on the W coast of Arabia, N of Yemen, where a region named Haulan is known from a Sabean inscription. The latter is placed variously in India, under the assumption that the Pishon is the Indus or the Ganges, or in Somaliland, where there was a town called Avalis (modern Zeila). Glaser, on the other hand, argues that all the passages refer to the same country and that it is to be located in the Yemama in the region around Riyadh; the Pishon is identified by him with the Wadi el-Dawasir. The products of Havilah reported in Gen. 2 give the impression of a real Arabian country, as gold and fragrant gums were found in many parts of Arabia, and the shoham stone, the sâmtu of the Assyrians, was probably malachite.

Bibliography. E. Glaser, Skizze der Geschichte und Geographie Arabiens, II (1890), 319-26; J. A. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible (1934), pp. 38-40. S. COHEN

HAVVOTH-JAIR hăv′ŏth jā′ər [חות יאיר, villages of Jair]; KJV usually HAVOTH-JAIR hā′vŏth—; BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR bā′shən— in Deut. 3:14. A group of villages located in Bashan in Gilead, sixty according to Deut. 3:4, but only thirty according to Judg. 10:4. There are no fewer than three accounts in the Scriptures of how these villages received their name. According to Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14, these cities were in Bashan and were taken by "Jair the son of Manasseh"—i.e., the Jair clan of the Manasseh group. In the latter passage the KJV gives the name as Bashan-havoth-jair; but the words 'eth habbāshān make no sense in the context and are probably a marginal gloss to the word "Argob" above, which is given as the exact site of the villages. In I Chr. 2:21-24 there is mention of a connection between the clans of Manasseh and those of Judah: Hezron, the grandson of Judah, was married to the daughter of Machir of Gilead and had a son named Segub. Segub's son Jair is said to have made extensive conquests, including Geshur and Aram, which in other passages are regarded as independent; Kenath, which is elsewhere said to have been taken by Nobah (Num. 32:42); and these villages, which are given his name. Finally, in Judg. 10:3-4, there is mention of a judge, Jair the Gileadite, who had thirty sons who ruled over thirty cities which were named after their father.

These three explanations of the name Havvoth-jair represent various traditions that arose to explain the name. The account in Chronicles is obviously a Judean attempt to claim a relationship with Manasseh and assert a claim to rule over the territory of Gilead. The account of Jair the judge is suspicious; his entire story looks like a late endeavor to bring the number of judges up to twelve (see JUDGES, BOOK OF). The first account, assuming that the conquest was made by a clan rather than an individual, appears most likely to be historical. S. COHEN

HAWK [נץ; קאת (Isa. 34:11; alternately PELICAN; VULTURE)]. Any of several small to medium-sized diurnal birds of prey of the suborder Falcones, of which the sparrow hawks, goshawks, and harriers comprise the subfamily Accipitrinae. There are over twenty species of sparrow hawk alone, the commonest being Accipter nisus. This latter bird, as well as the marsh harrier (Circus aeruginosus) and the hen harrier (Circus cyaneus), was fairly common in Palestine in Tristram's time. It is a reasonable assumption that נץ (nēṣ) designates this group of birds (cf. "according to its kind" in Lev. 11:16), which are declared to be unclean. The reference in Job 39:26 may be to the migratory habits of some members of the hawk family.

See also FAUNA § B1. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HAY [χόρτος (I Cor. 3:12); KJV חציר (RSV GRASS)]. Hay is not usually used in the Near East. See GRASS.

HAZAEL hā'zĭ əl [חזהאל, חזאל; Akkad. Ḫaza'ilu, God sees]. King of Damascus ca. 841–ca. 798 B.C.

A usurper, whom the Assyrians called a "son of a nobody," a person without royal antecedents, Hazael was a servant of Ben-Hadad I of Damascus. When informed by the prophet Elisha that he was to be king of Damascus, and anointed by him (I Kings 19:15-16), Hazael murdered his master (II Kings 8:13-15) and seized the throne of Damascus (ca. 841 B.C.)

At once Hazael attacked Ramoth-gilead, which Joram of Israel had recaptured, and he seriously wounded King Joram in the battle (II Kings 8:28-29). In 841 B.C. only Hazael resisted the Assyrian Shalmaneser III in Syria. Damascus was besieged, and its environs were destroyed, but Hazael was not taken. After another unsuccessful assault on Damascus in 837 B.C., Shalmaneser III left Hazael to his own devices in the W.

Hazael menaced the kingdoms of both Israel and Judah (II Kings 13:22) throughout the reigns of Jehu (841-813) and Jehoahaz (813-798). From Jehu he took all Israelite lands E of the Jordan River (II Kings 10:32-33; Amos 1:3); and through constant attack and oppression during the reign of Jehoahaz, Hazael humbled Israel and seriously reduced its military force (II Kings 13:1-3, 7, 22). He conquered all Philistia S of Aphek (LXX L of II Kings 13:22) and captured the city of Gath (12:17), thereby dominating the Arabian caravan routes which reached the Mediterranean Sea in Philistia. When Hazael threatened to approach Jerusalem, King Joash of Judah bribed him with rich treasure stripped from his palace and temple at Jerusalem to stay away from Jerusalem (II Kings 12:17-18; cf. II Chr. 24:23-24).

When the Assyrian Adad-nirari III came to Syria (ca. 804 B.C.), he received submission and rich tribute from a king of Damascus whom he called ma-ri' (Aramaic "lord"). De Vaux perhaps rightly identifies Hazael with mari', although some are inclined to consider Hazael's successor, his less successful son, Ben-hadad II, as that king of Damascus. A label found with the remains of an "ivory couch" at modern Arslan Tash, the ancient Assyrian provincial capital, Ḫadâtu, marks the bed as "belonging to our lord Hazael." It may well have been part of the booty taken by Adad-nirari III from Mari'.

A mighty warrior and perhaps the greatest king of Damascus, Hazael was also a builder who adorned his capital. As late as the time of Josephus (A.D. 37-100), Hazael and Ben-hadad were worshiped at Damascus because of their benefactions to the city (Jos. Antiq. IX.iv.6). At some time toward the end of the reign of Jehoahaz of Israel (died 798 B.C.) or at the beginning of the reign of Jehoash (798-782), Hazael died and was succeeded by his son Ben-hadad II, as both the Bible (II Kings 13:24) and the Aramaic Zakir Inscription (lines 4-5) inform us.

Bibliography. E. Kraeling, Aram and Israel (1918); R. de Vaux, "La chronologie de Hazael et de Benhadad III, Rois de Damas," RB, XLIII (1934), 512-18; F. Rosenthal, "Zakir Inscription," in J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 501-2; M. F. Unger, Israel and the Aramaeans of Damascus (1957), pp. 75-82, 160-63. R. A. BOWMAN HAZAIAH hə zā'yə [חזיה, Yahu has seen] (Neh. 11:5). An ancestor of a certain Maaseiah, who was a Jewish lay leader living in postexilic Jerusalem.

HAZAR-ADDAR hā'zər ăd'ər [חצר אדר] (Num. 34:4). See HEZRON 2; ADDAR.

HAZAR-ENAN hā'zər ē'nən [חצר עינן, חצר עינן; LXX Ασερναειμ, Ασερναιν, etc.]. Alternately: HAZAR-ENON (Ezek. 47:17-18; 48:1). According to Num. 34:7-10, a city on the frontier between Palestine and Hamath (cf. Ezek. 47:16-17). It is identified with modern Hadr at the foot of Mount Hermon.

HAZAR-GADDAH hā'zər găd'ə [חצר גדה] (Josh. 15:27). A city in the S part of Judah, mentioned between Moladah and Heshmon. The element "Gaddah" in the name suggests that it may have been a shrine of Gad, the god of fortune. The site is unknown.

HAZAR-HATTICON. KJV form of HAZER-HATTICON.

HAZARMAVETH hā'zər mā'vĭth [חצרמות]. A Semitic people descended from Shem through Joktan (Gen. 10:26; I Chr. 1:20), who settled in the Wadi Hadhramaut in S Arabia. This valley, which parallels the coast for ca. two hundred miles, became the center of a flourishing state with its capital at Shabwa. The economy of Hadhramaut was based on its control of the frankincense groves of Dhofar in certain periods; of the caravan route westward to Qataban, Saba, and Ma'in; and of Cana, the major frankincense port in Arabia.

The history of this state is little known. It appears to have enjoyed two periods of great power, in the fifth century B.C. and again in the first and second centuries A.D. There have been two archaeological excavations in this area—one at Hureidha, which brought to light a small temple belonging to the fifth-second centuries B.C.; and a sounding at Shabwa, which revealed a mausoleum of ca. the first century A.D. or slightly later.

Bibliography. R. A. B. Hamilton, "Six Weeks in Shabwa," Geographical Journal, 100 (1942), 107-23; G. Caton Thompson, The Tombs and Moon Temple of Hureidha (Hadhramaut; 1944); H. von Wissmann and M. Höfner, Beiträge zur historischen Geographie des vorislamischen Südarabien (1952), passim; W. F. Albright, "The Chronology of the Minaean Kings of Arabia," BASOR, 129 (1953), 22; W. L. Brown and A. F. L. Beeston, "Sculptures and Inscriptions from Shabwa," JRAS (1954), pp. 43-62. G. W. VAN BEEK

HAZAR-SHUAL hā'zər shōō'əl [חצר שועל, jackal court]. A town of Simeon in the extreme S of Judah, always mentioned in close relationship with Beer-sheba (Josh. 15:28; 19:3; I Chr. 4:28). It was occupied by the Jews after the Exile (Neh. 11:27). The name suggests that it was originally occupied by a Canaanite clan with a jackal as its totem.

S. COHEN

HAZAR-SUSAH hā'zər sōō'sə [חצר סוסה, horse court] (Josh. 19:5); HAZAR-SUSIM —sōō'sĭm [חצר סוסים] (I Chr. 4:31). A city of Simeon in the SW part of Judah. As the name indicates, it was a sort of stables where Solomon kept the horses he imported from Egypt and sold to the Hittites and Syrians (I Kings 4:26; 9:19; 10:29; cf. also the mention of cities of horsemen in II Chr. 8:6). Its site is probably Sbalat Abu Susein in the plain E of the Wadi Far'ah.

See also SOLOMON § 5. S. COHEN

HAZAZON-TAMAR hăz'ə zŏn tā'mər [חצצן תמר] (Gen. 14:7; II Chr. 20:2); KJV HAZEZON-TAMAR in Gen. 14:7. A city of the Amorites which was conquered by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen. 14:7). It was apparently not far from Sodom and the other cities of the plain; in II Chr. 20:2 it is identified with EN-GEDI on the W side of the Dead Sea. It may be the same as the TAMAR fortified by Solomon (I Kings 9:18) and located by Ezekiel in the SE corner of the land of Israel (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). The name is preserved in the Wadi Hasasa NW of 'Ain-jidi.

See also ZIZ, ASCENT OF. S. COHEN

HAZEL. KJV translation of לוז (RSV correctly ALMOND) in Gen. 30:37.

HAZELELPONI. KJV form of HAZZELELPONI.

HAZER-HATTICON hā'zər hăt'ə kŏn [חצר התיכון, middle court] (Ezek. 47:16); KJV HAZAR-HATTICON. A place mentioned by Ezekiel as the NE corner of his ideal boundary of Israel. The form is peculiar and is probably a scribal error for "Hazar-enon."

HAZERIM hə zĭr'ĭm. KJV transliteration of חצרים ("unwalled permanent settlements") in Deut. 2:23. The RSV translates "villages," as in Gen. 25:16; Josh. 13:23; etc., rather than interpreting as a place name.

HAZEROTH hə zĭr'ŏth [חצרות, enclosure, settlement]. A camping place of the Israelites after Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. 33:17-18; 11:35; 12:16; Deut. 1:1). Here Miriam and Aaron disputed with Moses over his marriage with a Cushite woman, and over his unique position as the sole mediator between God and his people (cf. Num. 12:2). Perhaps the place is to be identified with 'Ain Khadra, NE of the traditional Mount Sinai, on the way to 'Aqabah.

Bibliography. W. M. F. Petrie, Researches in Sinai (1906), p. 262; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 214, 344. J. L. MIHELIC

HAZEZON-TAMAR. KJV form of HAZAZON-TAMAR in Gen. 14:7.

HAZIEL hā'zĭ əl [חזיאל, vision of God] (I Chr. 23:9). A Gershonite Levite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 198.

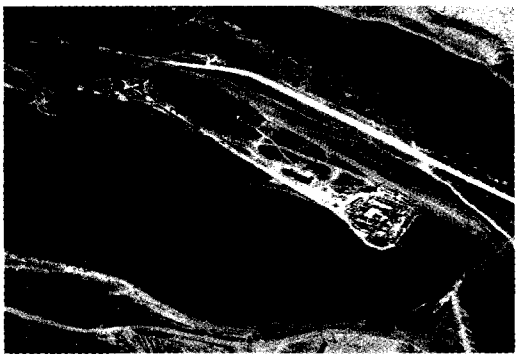
HAZO hā'zō [חזו] (Gen. 22:22). The fifth son of Nahor and Milcah; probably to be identified with the mountainous, uninviting region of Hazu in N Arabia, which is mentioned in Esarhaddon's Arabian campaign. See BUZ.

HAZOR hā'zôr [חצור, an enclosure]. 1. Tell el-Qedah* on the Wadi Waqqas, five miles SW of Lake Huleh, ten miles N of the Sea of Galilee. The huge tell dominates the Plain of Huleh and the ancient Via Maris, a trade route from Egypt to the N and the E. Figs. HAZ 8-9.



Hazor is named in the nineteenth-century Execration Texts from Egypt, the Mari Letters (eighteenth century), lists of conquered Palestinian cities (Thutmose III, Amen-hotep II, Sethos I), and in the Amarna Letters, as well as in the Bible.

Hazor was a Canaanite royal city whose king, Jabin, headed the N Canaanite coalition against Joshua. The alliance was defeated, and Hazor was sacked (Josh. 11:1-15; 12:19). Ca. a century later, Deborah and Barak led a revolt against another Jabin (a dynastic name?), who ruled N Israel. The

Courtesy of the Magnes Press, the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel

8. Tell el-Qedah (Hazor), air view looking N. The "Lower City" lay on the larger rectangular plateau to the N of the tell proper.

Courtesy of the Magnes Press, the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel

9. Air view of Tell el-Qedah (Hazor), looking SE issue was decided in Israel's favor at the Battle of Taanach (ca. 1125), when Jabin's forces under Sisera were routed (Judg. 4–5). To protect the Plain of Huleh, Solomon rebuilt and fortified Hazor. Some two hundred years later, in 732, Tiglath-pileser III captured Hazor (II Kings 15:29). Jonathan successfully fought the forces of the Seleucid king Demetrius II, in the Plain of Hazor in 147 (I Macc. 11:67; Jos. Antiq. XIII.v.7).

John Garstang made a trial dig in 1928, but systematic excavation of Hazor began with Yigael Yadin's work in 1955-56.* Within the huge rectangular enclosure, protected by a typical Hyksos terre pisée wall, were discovered cities from the Hyksos, Amarna, and post-Amarna periods, the last one possibly destroyed by Joshua. This part of Hazor, the "Lower City," was not rebuilt after the destruction of the second Late Bronze Age city. A discovery of great interest in this area was a series of four superimposed Canaanite temples, the latest of which had a plan which broadly resembled that of Solomon's temple. See TEMPLES § 2*a*. Figs. HAZ 10; TEM 44; ALT 21.

On the tell itself, twenty-one strata have been excavated, the last stratum dating back to 2750-2500 B.C. Hazor's most flourishing period was during the period when the "Lower City" was built (see above). After Joshua's conquest in the late thirteenth century B.C., two cities, presumably Israelite and much poorer than the last Canaanite city, preceded Solomon's extensive rebuilding of Hazor as a garrison

Courtesy of the American Schools of Oriental Research

10. Aerial view of the excavations at Hazor city (cf. I Kings 9:15). Stratum X has provided a well-constructed casemate wall, typical for the period, and another Solomonic city gate like those found at Megiddo and Gezer. The following city suffered perhaps from the depredations of Ben-hadad of Damascus (cf. II Chr. 16:4) early in the ninth century.

Over this city, Ahab (ca. 869-850) rebuilt the city, erecting a large public building (a storehouse?) which was reused by his successors (Stratum IV) and a heavily fortified citadel on the W tip of the mound. In the buildings of the next city, belonging to wealthy merchants of the time of Jeroboam II (786-746), were found the first Hebrew inscriptions in Galilee from the period of the monarchy. Above this were the ruins of the city which Tiglath-pileser III destroyed in 732. The three-foot layer of ashes in the citadel testifies to the violence of the destruction. The city was rebuilt but abandoned in the early seventh century. The Persians used the citadel in the fifth and fourth centuries. The final stage of the citadel was Hellenistic.

2. A city of Judah in the Negeb (Josh. 15:23). It should probably be read with "Ithnan"—"Hazor-ithnan" (cf. "Hazor-hadattah"; LXX B Ασοσιωναιν); it may be identified with el-Jebariyeh, on the Wadi Umm Ethnan, near Bir Hafir, ca. 8¾ miles SE of el-'Auja.

3. A city of Judah in the Negeb (KJV). It should be read with the following word as HAZOR-HADATTAH (so RSV).

4. Same as KERIOTH-HEZRON (Josh. 15:25).

5. A city N of Jerusalem reoccupied by Benjaminites after the Exile (Neh. 11:33). The name is preserved in Khirbet Hazzur, W of Beit Hanina; the ancient site is probably nearby el-Burj.

6. A still unknown place in the Arabian Desert E of Palestine which Nebuchadrezzar despoiled in 598 B.C., providing the theme of one of Jeremiah's oracles (Jer. 49:28-33). Whether it refers to a single place or to a group of tribes remains unclear. Berossus (ca. 330-250), quoted by Josephus (Apion I.xix), mentions the capture of Arabia by Nebuchadrezzar.

Bibliography. Y. Yadin et al., Hazor I. An Account of the First Season of Excavations (1958). Y. Yadin, Archaeology, 10 (1957), 83-92; IEJ, 6 (1956), 120-27; 7 (1957), 118-23; 8 (1958), 1-14; 9 (1959), 75-88; BA, 19 (1956), 2-11; 20 (1957), 34-47; 21 (1958), 30-47; 22 (1959), 2-20. V. R. GOLD

HAZOR-HADATTAH hā'zôr hə dăt'ə [חצר חדתה, new Hazor, if the second word is Aram.; cf. Euseb. Onom. Ασως τὴν καίνην] (Josh. 15:25); KJV HAZOR, HADATTAH. A village of Judah in the Negeb district of Beer-sheba. It is possibly to be located at el-Hudeira, a region SW of Tuwani toward the Dead Sea. V. R. GOLD HAZZELELPONI hăz'ə lĕl pō'nī [הצללפוני; text corrupt]; KJV HAZELELPONI hā'—. A sister of certain descendants of Judah mentioned in I Chr. 4:3.

HE hē (Heb. hā) [ה, h (Hê)]. The fifth letter of the Hebrew ALPHABET as placed in the KJV at the head of the fifth section of the acrostic psalm, Ps. 119, where each verse of this section of the psalm begins with this letter.

HEAD [ראש; κεφαλή]. A term used both literally and metaphorically in the Bible. The basic meaning of "head" is the uppermost part of the body, either of men (Gen. 48:14) or of animals (Exod. 12:9). In an extended sense it is an appropriate name for the topmost part of anything—i.e., a tower (Gen. 11:4), a lampstand (Zech. 4:2), mountains (Isa. 2:2), or trees (II Sam. 5:24); in all these instances the English versions translate by some such word as "top." It may also be used in the sense of "point of beginning" —e.g., of rivers (Gen. 2:10 KJV), streets (Ezek. 16: 25), or periods of time (Exod. 12:2; Judg. 7:19; Ezek. 40:1; the English versions translate "beginning"). In some passages it is the equivalent of the English word "sum" (as in Num. 1:2 KJV; ראש). The phrase "head stone of the corner" in Ps. 118:22 KJV and in the passages in the NT in which it is quoted (e.g., Matt. 21:42) has the meaning of "cornerstone."

The word "head" in the Bible is never connected with the intelligence. The ancient Hebrews were unaware of the function of the brain and, indeed, had no name for it; the intellectual powers were believed to be situated in the HEART.

A characteristic biblical usage, apparently unknown to secular Greek, is that of the term "head" for the leading member of a family (Exod. 6:14) or community (Deut. 33:5). Consequently it can be used to mean simply "source of authority," as in depicting the superiority of man to woman in marriage (Eph. 5:23).

The most distinctive theological use of the word "head" occurs in Ephesians and Colossians, where it describes the relationship of Christ to the church (Eph. 4:15; 5:23; Col. 1:18; 2:19) and the created universe (Eph. 1:22; Col. 2:10). While the starting point of this image may well be the OT use of the word "head" for the leading person of a community, it is developed and elaborated to an extent which has no biblical precedent and is perhaps influenced to some extent by Gnostic or quasi-Gnostic conceptions. R. C. DENTAN

HEADBAND. 1. שבים (Isa. 3:18); KJV CAUL. Probably a head ornament of gold or silver.

2. KJV translation of קשרים in Isa. 3:20. See SASH.

HEADDRESS [פאר, from Egyp. pyr] (Isa. 3:20); KJV BONNET. A head-covering for women, ornamental in character. It was wound about the head (cf. Ezek. 24:17) without any under cover. The Hebrew word is also used of the GARLAND of the bridegroom (Isa. 61:10; cf. vs. 3); the TURBAN worn by men (Ezek. 24:17, 23); and the priest's linen CAP (Ezek. 44:18). J. M. MYERS

HEALING, HEALTH. Healing may be described in terms of the curing or restoring to health of a sick person, whether by promoting the closure of wounds, repairing the results of accidents or surgical disease, or administering effective treatment for specific pathological conditions of the body or mind. Health is frequently given the minimum definition of the absence of disease, but a state of clinical health involves definite positive considerations also. A person may be described as healthy when he exhibits that state of body and mind in which all the functions are being discharged harmoniously. It is not necessary for all parts of the body to be absolutely free from disease for a person to be in a state of clinical health, since the normal degeneration of aging tissues may render the harmony of body and mind in a minor key. The Hebrew shālēm ("healthy, whole") is a cognate of shālôm ("peace").

1. Health and longevity in the Bible
2. Health and environment
3. Prophylactic nature of the Mosaic code
   a. The sabbath
   b. Laws regarding edible foods
   c. Circumcision
   d. Sexual relationships
   e. Sexual hygiene
   f. Cleanliness
   g. Sanitation
4. Health and healing in the OT
5. The approach of Jesus to health and healing
6. Health and healing in the NT
7. Materia medica of the Bible
Bibliography

1. Health and longevity in the Bible. In antiquity, as in all ages, health was a highly prized possession among the Near Eastern peoples. The Hebrews tended to think of health primarily in terms of physical strength and well-being. Mental or emotional disturbances were generally related to some specific organ of the body (see DISEASE). The pastoral and agricultural pursuits of the Hebrews made a robust physique desirable, and even when urban centers developed during the monarchy, their inhabitants continued to cherish the ideal of bodily vigor and health. The weakling and the invalid constituted an object of contempt among the ancient Hebrews, and despite the legislation which was designed to protect such categories as the maimed, halt, and blind, the structure of society contrived to make life very difficult indeed for anyone who was not in full possession of his faculties. A brief summary of the qualities the ideally healthy Hebrew enshrined in his person are found in reference to David, who was "skilful in playing, a man of valor, a man of war, prudent in speech, and a man of good presence; and the LORD is with him" (I Sam. 16:18). In Ecclus. 30:14, health was regarded as the greatest of all earthly benedictions.

Whenever blessings were invoked, length of days was invariably one of the benefits most frequently enjoined. However, if the life of the individual was prolonged beyond the ideal of threescore and ten years (Ps. 90:10), hardship and sorrow were only to be expected as the logical outcome. In actual fact, the general life expectancy was nearer sixty than seventy years, and it was only the exceptional individual who attained to the traditional age of Moses (cf. Gen. 6:3). In ancient Egypt it was customary to recognize a long and prosperous life by saying that a man lived to be a hundred and ten years old, and this age was ascribed to Joseph (Gen. 50:26). The advanced years of the antediluvians are modestly estimated when compared with those of analogous personages in early Babylonian mythology. There are many problems attached to the numerology of the Semitic writings generally, and it is probable that the advanced ages ascribed to Seth, Enoch, and others are symbolical or eponymous, and not primarily literal. Eccl. 12:1-8 furnishes in allegorical language a gloomy description of advanced old age.

2. Health and environment. The land of Palestine does not appear to have been the seat of endemic infection in antiquity, as were Mesopotamia and Egypt. The river valleys and wadis did not normally afford a breeding ground for mosquitoes, while the incidence of imported diseases was probably considerably less than in countries with flourishing trade connections. The open-air life of the patriarchal nomads and the agricultural pursuits of the sedentary farmers of the monarchy contributed to the health and well-being of the populace. Even with the rise of an urban proletariat in the eighth century B.C., the over-all situation was not appreciably affected, and it was only at a comparatively late period of OT history that the cities became overcrowded.

It is very difficult to say whether the ancient Hebrews enjoyed better health than their modern counterparts. Considerations of living conditions then and now make a comparison odious in a great many respects. Again, some diseases which were scourges in the ancient world have now largely disappeared, while others which were unknown in antiquity have become very common. Furthermore, it is only within recent years that many of the diseases which have been prevalent for countless centuries of human existence have been described at all carefully. However, it is possible to speak with certainty upon one point. There can be no question that infant mortality was extremely heavy in antiquity. One estimate has claimed that in Egypt only three out of every ten children born into a family could expect to survive to adulthood. A comparable state of affairs doubtless existed in ancient Canaan, and was produced in part by lack of hygiene, environmental considerations, and neglect of elementary precautions for safeguarding public health.

In earlier phases of Hebrew thought, disease was regarded as a divine visitation consequent upon disobedience or sin, and this penal theory persisted in the popular mind throughout the entire biblical period. But other etiological factors were also envisaged, including the work of the adversary (Job 2:7) under divine permission, spirits of deafness or dumbness (Mark 9:17), and parental sin (John 9:2). There appears to have been comparatively little awareness of the fact that the principle of cause and effect enshrined in the dictum about a person's reaping what he sowed might also apply to disease on the natural level (cf. Ecclus. 37:30-31). Because of the consistent spiritualizing of pathological phenomena, the general biblical view of the incidence of disease related it more or less directly to divine interposition. Since God was the physician of his people, it followed that healing constituted a manifest token of his forgiveness. Health itself could be maintained by a punctilious observance of the divine commands throughout life, and if this discipline of the spirit was undertaken consistently, the blessing of material prosperity would be added to physical and mental health (cf. Exod. 15:26). See DISEASE.

3. Prophylactic nature of the Mosaic code. An important legislative step to counteract the effects of ignorance in matters of personal and communal hygiene was taken in the enactment of the sanitary sections of the Mosaic code. These portions of the Law are obviously of great antiquity, and represent a considerable advance upon the medical concepts of other ancient Near Eastern peoples. They legislated for the time when the Hebrews would be a sedentary people occupying their promised land, and they furnished the basis for all subsequent formulation of public-health enactments. The Mosaic law was notable for its complete repudiation of the authority and use of magic. Whereas contemporary civilizations uniformly regarded the incidence of disease as the result of demonic activity, the ancient Hebrews held that everything, good and evil alike, ultimately proceeded from the omnipotent Lord of the universe. By establishing Yahweh's moral supremacy they obviated the need for magical mediation, and placed the entire disease situation on a spiritual footing whereby the personal relationship which existed between the individual and his God was the determinative factor.

This did not exempt the righteous from sickness any more than it condemned the wicked to lifelong affliction. What it did, however, was to make clear that disease was conditioned largely by factors of a moral and spiritual, rather than a primarily physical, nature.

In view of the commonly accepted theory regarding the incidence of disease in antiquity, the moral concepts of holiness contained in the law indicated a new approach to the problem of sickness. The emphasis was now laid on the prevention of disease rather than its cure. If a man pursued a life of spiritual fellowship with God, he was entertaining the most valuable safeguard possible against sickness. But if, when disease arose, he attempted to cure it, he was trespassing upon the prerogatives of the Great Physician and interfering with functions which lay solely within the operation of divine discretion. Thus the primary emphasis of the law in this respect was prophylaxis, and because of this unique therapeutic emphasis Moses may well be spoken of as the father of preventive medicine. In the medical enactments of the Pentateuch, social hygiene was elevated to the level of a science, and the precepts of the Mosaic era survive to the present as a model of sanitary and hygienic insight.

The medical code received its most comprehensive expression in Leviticus. This is, in effect, a priestly handbook. Such a procedure accords fully with the practice, consistently found in antiquity, which committed to the priesthood the responsibility of instructing the people in all branches of knowledge. The medical clauses of Leviticus are thus seen to be extremely old compilations, and probably antedate other source material for the book. Upon examination it will be seen that the Mosaic prophylactic sanitary code comprises seven basic principles, as follows:

a. The sabbath. The custom of observing certain days during each month on which normal business or professional activity was suspended had its roots in the religion of the Old Akkadian period (ca. 2360-2180 B.C.) of Mesopotamian history—if, indeed, it did not originate at a still earlier period (see SABBATH). The earliest Mesopotamian calendars were based on lunar phases, and when the ancient Babylonians incorporated Sumerian calendars into their own culture, they interpreted the lunar phases in the light of the activities of superhuman beings as they might be related to human society. Each day of the month was dedicated to one or more deities of the Babylonian pantheon, and a type of horoscope was drawn up which stated whether or not the particular day was propitious, and what kind of activity might be pursued without fear of divine reprisal.

In the older Babylonian calendars there were nine principal days upon which virtually all activity ceased, while lesser restrictions were imposed upon other days of the month. A revision of this procedure was adopted during the reign of Ashurbanipal, in which the phases of the moon were represented by the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days respectively. Thus the month was divided into four periods of seven days each, and the first week of each month commenced with the new moon. The day which followed the fourteenth of each month was known as shapattu or shabattu, which in the business life of Sumeria and Babylonia indicated the middle of the month, when work was interrupted for a short time. Ashurbanipal's calendar forbade work on days which fell in the series of seven mentioned above. On these days of restricted activity the people were counseled to refrain from work, and to propitiate the deities. It is important to notice, however, that the days themselves were not called by the name shapattu, this term being reserved for the day of the full moon.

While the Hebrew sabbath was perhaps associated with the new moon at an earlier period, it was essentially an expression of cultic life from the Mosaic period onward. The legislation in Exod. 31:13-17 specifically mentions physical rest as an important element of sabbath observance in conjunction with the worship of the Deity. Even domesticated animals were furnished with the opportunity for physical rest under the provisions of sabbath law (Exod. 23:12). The aim of the enactments concerning the sabbath may thus be said to be twofold: (a) The religious aspect of the observance was intended to furnish men with an opportunity for mental and spiritual re-creation. (b) The relaxation of physical effort at properly regulated intervals appears to have been enjoined for the purpose of maintaining physical vigor at a consistent level of functional efficiency.

For reasons which are difficult to determine, the principle of one rest day in seven is most adequately suited to the normal operating capacity of the human body. Different ratios such as one in six or one in eight have been tried, but have failed to achieve the success encountered with the ratio of one in seven. The sensitive nature of physical mechanisms is such that the body requires regular periods of rest and cessation from normal occupational activities; otherwise a breakdown will occur. Just as the degree of physical and mental restoration obtained from sleep determines to a considerable extent the subsequent performance of the body, so the re-creation of physical and mental states by the proper observance of a sabbath will govern the degree of well-being which the individual can normally expect. The idea of the sabbath thus emerges as a prophylactic and therapeutic principle of fundamental significance for the physical and spiritual health of the individual and the community alike.

The Mosaic law extended the concept of the sabbath to the land itself, as a safeguard against the depletion of its mineral reserves. Every seventh year after the harvest had been gathered in, the law (Lev. 25:2-7) stipulated that the land should be left fallow for a year, to ensure the continued fertility of the ground.

b. Laws regarding edible foods. If the prophylactic concepts enshrined in sabbath observance were intended to promote individual and social well-being, the legislation concerning the varieties of food which could be eaten beneficially was evidently enacted to serve as a guide for maintaining health and vigor. The dietary rules of the Pentateuch are by far the most scientific of their kind to be found in the ancient Near East, for, in the main, other nations adjusted their diets to the dictates of tradition, without respect to specific formulations of law. Accordingly, potential foodstuffs were regarded as either "clean" or "unclean," although careful delineation of these two categories appears to have been avoided except for Hebrew religious practice. While the rationale of this principle is unknown, its antiquity cannot be questioned, for it was recognized as a long-established procedure at the time of the Flood (Gen. 7:2).

Some scholars have suggested that this classification took its rise in the system of primitive taboos, or that it was connected with totemism in early times. While some of the forbidden animals and birds did, in fact, constitute nome-emblems in ancient Egypt and were associated with the fetishistic worship of that land, it is impossible to argue toward such origins as far as Mesopotamian religion is concerned, since it did not pass through a totemistic stage. In ancient Egypt, those animals and birds which were considered sacred through their being associated with particular deities were forbidden for food. While the Hebrew enactments concerning clean and unclean categories may have been in part a reaction against the cult worship of Egypt or a protest against fetishism, it would appear that principles of a vastly different order from the magical were in view when the food laws were promulgated.

These enactments may be summarized by saying that vegetarianism was not restricted in any way except that the fruit of newly planted trees was for-bidden for food. An elementary rule was provided so as to leave no doubt as to the limits of clean and unclean categories of animals. Only those which chewed the cud and parted the hoof were suitable for food, since they were exclusively vegetarian (Lev. 11:3-8; Deut. 14:4-8). All blood was to be drained from the tissues before the flesh was regarded as suitable for cooking and eating. Under no circumstances was the flesh of an animal which had died from natural causes to be eaten (Deut. 14:21). The fat which surrounded the kidneys and abdominal viscera was also excluded by law from the Hebrew diet. Of the aquatic creatures, those which had fins and scales were considered clean, while the unclean fowls included the rapacious, aquatic, and predatory species (Lev. 11:13-19). All insects were prohibited for food except locusts.

That these rules were designed specifically to protect the individual and communal health of the Hebrews is evident from the following considerations. There is far less probability of contracting food poisoning from the flesh of vegetarian animals under subtropical climatic conditions than would be the case if the Carnivora were eaten. The flesh of the pig is particularly dangerous in this respect, being the intermediate host for several parasitic organisms of differing degrees of severity. The organism Trichinella spiritis occurs in partially or improperly cooked pork, and if ingested, its larvae mature in the intestine. The parasitic worm thus produced propagates great numbers of larvae, which migrate to the muscles, where they become encapsuled. Symptoms of this disease (trichiniasis or trichinosis) include malaise, fever, edema of the face and legs. One of the diagnostic features is an increase in the quantity of eosinophiles (normally three per cent) in the blood.

Tapeworm infestation as a result of eating pork is considerably more common than trichinosis. The pig is the intermediate host for a parasitic worm known as Taenia solium, which in a developed form is often as much as ten feet in length. In man, the definitive host, the worm develops from the Cysticercus cellulosae parasite present in measly, raw, or improperly cooked pork. Occasionally this infestation leads to the formation of nodules in the brain or the skeletal muscles (somatic taeniasis), with resultant epileptiform symptoms.

Along with some other animals, the pig is also the intermediate host for the parasitic Echinococcus granulosus (a species of small tapeworm), which in its larval stage in man is the cause of hydatid (cystic) tumors in the liver, lungs, and other parts of the body. A further disease, conveyed in particular by pigs and rodents, is toxoplasmosis. Animals can derive the disease through eating the flesh of other animals which have become infected, while in man, those who already have trichinosis generally exhibit a proportionally greater susceptibility to toxoplasmosis than those who are uninfected with the Trichinella organism. The protozoan Toxoplasma is found in the form of a cyst, known as the pseudocyst, and this structure enables the parasite to resist the action of gastric juices or the uneven heat resulting from inadequate cooking of the meat.

While the flesh of the pig has always been one of the chief sources of tapeworm infestation, it must be remembered that the ruminants proper are not themselves wholly free from parasitic organisms. Bovine flesh is occasionally the intermediate host for the beef tapeworm Taenia saginata, and man, the definitive host, acquires the parasite through ingesting the organism Cysticercus bovis in the improperly cooked flesh of an infected animal. The developed intestinal worm is almost twice the size of the Taenia solium parasite mentioned above.

It is quite probable that the strictures against eating the flesh of all animals, birds, and rodents without discrimination was also intended to safeguard the Hebrews against the incidence of tularemia. This disease is normally transmitted to man through the bite of a fly known as Chrysops discalis, as well as through other insects. It can also be acquired by the casual handling of an animal carcass which has previously been infected in this way, or as the result of a bite by an infected animal. The symptoms resemble those of undulant fever and bubonic plague, and have a general debilitating effect upon the victim.

The Hebrews shared the traditions of the ancient Near East generally in restricting their dietary attention to those aquatic creatures which had fins and scales. The exclusion of all edible Crustacea from the diet of the Hebrews removed one possible source of epidemic disease. Many of these organisms live on sewage and putrefying substances, and are not infrequently the cause of typhoid and the paratyphoid fevers. However, even certain varieties of clean fish can convey tularemia, while fish may also be the intermediate host for the huge parasitic worm Diphyllobothrium latum, which often grows to about thirty feet in length.

The risk of infection by the parasitic organisms dealt with above is by no means as far removed from modern occidental society as some writers are inclined to think, despite the stringent nature of most contemporary food laws. If this is the case, similar threats to individual and communal health among the ancient Hebrews were infinitely greater. The preservation of animal flesh for any length of time under subtropical climatic conditions is virtually impossible without proper refrigeration. Even if meat was comparatively fresh when it was consumed by the ancient Hebrews, their methods of cooking would seldom ensure that any parasitic organisms which might be lurking in the tissues would be consistently destroyed. Under such conditions the prophylactic approach is the best method of ensuring comparative freedom from infestation by parasitic worms, or from poisoning through contact with contaminated foodstuffs.

This concern for public health also expressed itself in the emphasis placed on the protection of food and water from pollution by unclean objects (Lev. 11:31-38). Prophylactic considerations were basic to this legislation, which when followed would go far toward preventing the incidence of food-borne polioencephalitis, the enteric fevers, food poisoning, and the parasitic worms. Insistence on the safeguarding of a clean supply of water was the most effective means of forestalling the rise and dissemination of diseases such as amoebiasis, the fevers of the enteric group, cholera, bilharziasis, and spirochetal jaundice. These prophylactic measures, which constitute a fundamental part of any system of public health, were of particular importance for the welfare of a nation living under primitive conditions in a subtropical region of the earth.

c. Circumcision. In the ancient world, CIRCUMCISION was not only a quasi-religious rite, but also the mark of initiation into a tribe or the sign of acquired manhood. The Egyptians regarded it as the hallmark of a cultured people, and also associated hygienic considerations with it. Among the Jews, however, it claimed an overriding religious significance through its association with the Covenant. It was the only form of physical mutilation which the law sanctioned, all the others being regarded as heathen in nature and origin. In antiquity the practice of circumcision was thought to have certain positive hygienic values, and was widely believed to prevent venereal disease and carbuncles. Fecundity was also thought to result from resection of the prepuce, although on what grounds it is difficult to determine. Modern medicine recommends circumcision as a means of preventing cancer of the penis. As a purely hygienic procedure there is much to be said for circumcision in instances where a constricted opening of the prepuce (phimosis) causes irritation of the glans penis by confining an accumulation of smegma proximate to the corona glandis. If the prepuce is particularly small in circumference, it may interfere to some extent with micturition.

d. Sexual relationships. The laws governing sexual union were based on the concept of the family as a social unit, and precluded intermarriage, polygamy, polyandry, and marriage of the matriarchal variety (the latter was extremely common in ancient Egypt). Even the union between a man and his paternal half sister, a not infrequent occurrence in the patriarchal period (cf. Gen. 20:12), was forbidden by Levitical law. Endogamy was prescribed for the Hebrew people, partly as a safeguard against contact with neighboring heathen races. But because of the dangers implicit in endogamy, the Mosaic law (Lev. 18:6-18) made it clear that marriage was forbidden within certain prescribed degrees of blood relationship, and thereby branded as incestuous many of the unions which were common in nations other than Israel. Into the category of prohibited degrees came uterine sisters and half sisters, stepdaughters, daughters of a stepson or a stepdaughter, and the sister of a living wife. If a man entered into marital union with any of the foregoing, he had transgressed the limits established by the law.

The purpose of this legislation, the most elaborate of its kind in antiquity, may be understood from religious, sociological, and biological standpoints. The moral nature of the Covenant demanded morality in the "chosen people," and thus precluded abhorrent sexual practices such as incest. In view of the widespread sexual deviations associated with religion in the ancient Near East, the regulating of sexual function for the Hebrews was a matter of paramount importance if they were to witness creditably to the morality of their Deity.

Sociologically, a lack of restraint in marriage with close relatives would have the effect of subordinating the rights and privileges of society as a whole to the dictates of a few dominant families. If the latter centralized and monopolized land and wealth through intermarriage, the welfare of the nation would be in jeopardy, while the families themselves would inevitably be plagued with jealousy and intrigue.

Biologically, the alleged detriments resulting from union within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity are held to include diminution in fecundity and deterioration of physical and mental vigor. In actual fact, there is no adequate physiological reason for regarding consanguineous unions as particularly dangerous for the body and mind.

e. Sexual hygiene. The provisions for individual sexual hygiene form an important part of the Levitical prophylactic approach to health. The act of coition was associated with concepts of uncleanness, as is the case among certain primitive peoples, and after sexual congress the participants were required to wash in water (Lev. 15:16-18). It is probable that the feelings of uncleanness which the law attached to coition were intended to serve as a form of control over sexual activity, and as a safeguard against the promiscuity of the Canaanites or other contemporary nations. The religious sanctions which the law thus imposed would invest the entire matter of sexual relations with a specifically moral character consonant with the covenant relationship.

The presence of blood, forbidden in all forms to the Hebrews, meant that menstruation was a particularly defiling occurrence, involving seven days of uncleanness (Lev. 15:19-24). The diffusive nature of the ceremonial defilement was such that any object of contact with a woman during the period of the menses was considered unclean. Levitical law took cognizance of the possibility of intercourse during menstruation, a practice which apparently was not uncommon in contemporary society, and legislated against it vigorously. In Lev. 15:24 any man who came into physical contact with the menstrual discharge was considered ceremonially unclean for seven days, but in Lev. 20:18 the deliberate practice of coition during the catamenia was forbidden. It would appear from this legislation that sexual activity was specifically designated as the means of procreation and not as an end in itself. Coitus interruptus was held to be an improper use of natural instinct and function (cf. Gen. 38:9). On purely medical grounds, abstinence from sexual intercourse during menstruation is held to prevent the incidence of nonspecific urethritis, which may arise through such a practice.

In instances of menostaxis (unduly prolonged menstruation) or menorrhagia (profuse menstruation), the woman was regarded as unclean throughout the period of discharge and for seven further days, after which appropriate ceremonies were prescribed for cleansing (Lev. 15:25-30). The fact that bleeding occurred during parturition meant that childbirth was surrounded with certain degrees of defilement, although the baby itself was always considered to be ceremonially clean. The defiling influence of the lochia subsequent to the birth of a female child was regarded as more diffusive than that for male offspring, and the period of uncleanness was extended accordingly (Lev. 12:2-5). Under normal circumstances the parents did not cohabit again after parturition until the baby had been weaned, a period which was not infrequently as long as two years.

Defilement also occurred from seminal emissions, and could be removed by washing when a prescribed period of time had elapsed. Deviations of sexual practice such as homosexuality (Lev. 18:22) and bestiality (Lev. 18:23) were rigidly condemned in the Mosaic code.

These laws employed religious sanctions to enforce specific restrictions upon human sexual behavior, and at the same time they laid considerable stress on the importance of personal hygiene during a stage in the development of the Hebrew nation when such matters were wont to be regarded with varying degrees of indifference. The prescribing of a period of isolation prior to the renewal of ceremonial cleanliness was an important aspect of the prophylactic approach implicit in this legislation.

f. Cleanliness. Among the Hebrews great emphasis was placed upon the washing of the body, despite the frequent shortages of water which occurred at different times each year. Under normal circumstances, ceremonial defilement could be removed by washing, after an appropriate period of isolation. When lepers were declared ceremonially clean, the washing of the clothes and the body constituted an important part of the purification ritual (Lev. 14:2-32). Ablutions were also prominent in the exercise of the priestly office (Exod. 30:18-21), and in a general religious sense were symbolic of the removal of sin or moral defilement.

From the standpoint of prophylaxis and general hygiene, the stress laid on the cleansing of anything which might be suspected of defilement was of fundamental importance. By this means the risk of communicating disease through contagion or fomites would be reduced appreciably, while the isolation of potential carriers of disease for a specified period of time would also help to control the incidence of disease. See DISEASE; LEPROSY.

g. Sanitation. The nomadic tribes of antiquity paid scant attention to sanitary practices, and this indifference was doubtless one of the major reasons for the rise and spread of epidemic disease. Mosaic legislation laid down carefully regulated sanitary procedures for the Israelites. Armies in the field were required to dispose of all excreta by burial (Deut. 23:12-13), a practice which provided for effective control of feces, urine, and fly-infestation. In general, sanitary rules were strictly enjoined for military forces, and the description of the precautions adopted after a battle with the Midianites (Num. 31:7-24) shows that isolation of victor and vanquished was required, prior to ceremonial ablutions.

The significance of the sanitary regulations is out of all proportion to the amount of space which they occupied in the Mosaic prophylactic legislation as a whole. A measure of control over air-borne and fly-borne plagues was afforded; this was of immeasurable importance for individual and communal health in preventing the outbreak of devastating epidemics. Thus an advanced degree of protection from infectious disease was afforded if the prescribed rules for sanitation, isolation, and hygiene were followed. The prophylactic approach was the special contribution of the Hebrews to medical theory, and the principles enshrined in the Pentateuch are in harmony with the basic precepts of contemporary preventive medicine.

4. Health and healing in the OT. In the light of earlier observations (see § 3 above) it will appear that health was a divine gift, and along with material prosperity was confidently expected by the faithful in Israel. When disease occurred, however, the sufferer could only look to God, the Physician of his people, for healing and recovery. To postexilic Judaism, recourse to human aid was precluded on the ground that such a procedure would usurp divine prerogatives in this respect; only the exceptional individual such as Asa (II Chr. 16:12) consulted physicians. The prophets occasionally gave advice concerning treatment to those who were sick, and also furnished prognoses from time to time (see MEDICINE). But because sickness was a spiritual matter, in the last analysis, healing could only properly be expected to follow a revival or revitalizing of the relationship between the individual and God. Thus, apart from a few folk remedies, there is no outline of medical treatment for disease as such in the OT, because such systematized therapeutics simply did not exist among the ancient Hebrews.

5. The approach of Jesus to health and healing. While Jesus Christ did not attempt to explain disease, his attitude toward its presence in the lives of individuals marked a considerable advance in thought on the consensus of OT opinion regarding sickness and disease. Instead of manifesting an attitude of contempt toward the weak and the sick, Jesus showed in his first recorded sermon that his earthly ministry was closely bound up with the frail and feeble of body and soul.

In the first instance, Jesus was firmly convinced of his Father's purpose for human wholeness and salvation (John 3:16; 10:10), and never once supported the OT concept of disease as a punishment sent by God. Instead, he frequently envisaged the incidence of disease as the result of evil producing an imbalance within the personality. Jesus viewed the individual as an essential unity of body and mind. This holistic emphasis was as far removed from the Greek concept of the body as a prison house for the soul as it was from the outlook of Descartes in a later period. Cartesian philosophy divided the personality into physical (substantia extensa) and mental (substantia cogitans) categories, considering the latter alone to be the proper sphere of operation of the church.

Because the view which Jesus took contemplated the individual as an integer, he was able to envisage more clearly than his predecessors the influence of body and mind upon each other. While he was always concerned to heal the sick in body, he invariably paid close attention to the mind and spirit of the sufferer. Insofar as they are recorded in any detail, his interviews with sick people seem to have had as one of their aims the uncovering of evidence pointing to a deficient relationship between the sufferer and his environment. His encounter with the Samaritan woman (John 4) transformed what might have been a casual conversation into a powerful therapeutic analysis which penetrated her outward poise, revealed the chaos and conflict in her emotional life, and confronted her with the person of the living Christ as the answer to her deepest needs. This interview is a superb example of nondirective counseling, and could serve as a model for psychotherapists.

Any knowledge of Jesus' approach to healing must rest largely upon inference, since his curative acts were a spontaneous expression of his sympathy and a sign of the kingdom of God, and did not constitute clinical demonstrations of therapeutic techniques. Nevertheless, certain principles appear consistently in the approach he adopted toward disease and healing. He disavowed entirely the idea that sickness was sent by God as a punitive measure, nor did he encourage the belief that the sufferer ought to remain ill in order to acquire courage or learn patience. On the one occasion where the sufferer raised the possibility that it might not, after all, be the will of Christ for healing to take place (Matt. 8:2-3; Mark 1:40; Luke 5:12-13), Jesus was at pains to banish the implied suggestion immediately, and proceeded to heal the leper forthwith.

Fundamental to all his healing activity was his conviction that disease was not an established part of the divine order of things. In some instances he actually attributed the incidence of illness to the operation of evil in human life (cf. Luke 13:16). Since his avowed mission was to destroy the works of the Devil, it followed that he would make every effort to heal the sick and diseased. Consequently, he responded to the disease situation by healing the sufferer whenever he was confronted with sickness. The circumstances of the case largely determined the mechanisms or techniques he employed, but these were generally secondary to his persistent desire to grapple with the sin which so frequently lay behind the specific ailment.

His ministry, therefore, was as much to the mind as to the body. His precepts in the Sermon on the Mount and elsewhere dealing with human motives and the deep workings of the mind show by implication that he was acutely aware of the place emotional conflict, resentment, fear, anxiety, hatred, and the like had in the genesis of disease. So much is this the case that it has been said in recent years that the most assured findings of modern psychiatry constitute but one small part of the distilled wisdom contained in the Sermon on the Mount.

Jesus was cognizant of the fact that the presence of a bias toward evil in the human personality provided ample opportunity for the functioning of sin in the individual life. Consequently, his analysis of specific situations was directed at resolving the state of spiritual turmoil and conflict, thereby severing the roots of psychogenic disease. Modern psychiatric investigation has shown that this conflict takes place in the unconscious mind, a largely uncharted area of the human personality in which such dynamics as faith, hope, the will to live, fear, and other emotional states are held to be rooted. It was to this realm, where so many of the disorders which afflict mind and body have their beginning, that the healing influence and spiritual authority of Christ penetrated. Such anticipation of certain contemporary psychotherapeutic techniques occurs in the gospel record of some miracles of healing in which suggestion and other psychological mechanisms were employed. It is interesting to note that the techniques were modified for differing individuals, indicating that Jesus had diagnosed the patient's ailment accurately and was aware of the factors which had contributed to its incidence.

There are good reasons for believing that in his healing activity Jesus was endeavoring to raise the sufferers whom he encountered to a more advanced degree of spirituality. It was his desire that men should be won for the divine kingdom, and share in the powers and energies which were manifested in the relationship existing between him and his Father, for this ultimately constituted his mission to humanity (cf. Luke 7:21-22). Entrance to this realm of the spirit presupposed the operation of divine love on the one hand, and on the other a degree of faith manifested either by the sick person or by someone connected with him. This faith was to be distinguished from credulity, suggestibility, and the like, for the dynamic nature of the emotional response involved a measure of conscious intelligent commitment of the person to the will of God in Christ. Though the degree of participation in faith varied with different individuals, the gospel narratives make it clear that some measure of faith was normally evoked by Jesus as a condition of healing (cf. Matt. 9:29; Luke 17:19; 18:42). Certain healings took place without specific mention of faith being present (cf. Matt. 9:1-8; 12:9-13), but it is obviously implicit in the sufferer's response to the words of Jesus. In other healings there is no mention of the attitude of the sick person in this respect (cf. Luke 13:11-13; 14:4; 22:51), which may in part be because the miracles of healing were incidental to other considerations.

In any assessment of such an approach to health and healing it must always be remembered that the therapeutic activity of Jesus included significant spiritual, as well as psychological, considerations, directed at the restoration of the entire personality. These healings cannot be explained satisfactorily on the simple assumption that he was a shrewd psychologist who dismissed a wide variety of psychoneurotic conditions by means of adroit techniques which were in advance of contemporary practice. While psychological theories can throw much light on the healing work of Jesus, they cannot of themselves explain it fully.

Matthew (8:17) envisaged Christ's healing ministry as a fulfilment of the statement in Isa. 53:4 concerning the work of the divinely appointed Servant. In this respect the evangelist interpreted the prophetic oracle more accurately than many modern English versions, which speak of the Servant's bearing "griefs" and "sorrows." The Hebrew text of this verse employs the simple words for "diseases" and "pains" (so RSV mg.), which relates the healing of sickness directly to the work of the servant. If the Christian church is correct in its traditional interpretation of the Isaiah Servant passages in terms of the atonement on Calvary, it would appear that the incarnate Lord dealt also with disease and sickness on the cross as well as with human sin—i.e., his atonement avails for the whole personality, body as well as soul. On this basis, therefore, it is theoretically justifiable to appeal to the finished work of Jesus for physical healing as well as for spiritual restoration.

6. Healing and health in the NT. The restoration of the sick formed part of subsequent apostolic practice, in conformity with the expressed will of Christ. In the days immediately after Pentecost many healings took place at the hands of the apostles (Acts 2:

43; 5:12; 8:7), and the pathology dealt with was as varied as that which had confronted Jesus. In the main, however, the healings were achieved by a powerful degree of suggestion linked to the faith of the sufferer, and do not appear to reflect consistently that variety of approach or that depth of spiritual perception which Jesus had manifested in his miracles. As time passed, the treatment of disease became more uniform, employing the formula of the name or the power of Christ in response to the expectant trust of the sufferer. It would also appear that particular techniques such as anointing and prayer (Jas. 5:14-15) were employed by the senior Christians in the community as a means of healing disease. From the experience of Paul with Trophimus at Miletus (II Tim. 4:20) it may be concluded that the healing power given to the apostles diminished with the passing of time. Whatever the explanation of the illness of Trophimus, it is clear that he would not have remained sick had Jesus been present. For discussion of the general pathology of the NT, see DISEASE.

7. Materia medica of the Bible. There is little mention of galenicals and empirical materia medica in biblical literature, despite the abundance of herbs and other therapeutic substances in Palestine. Consequently, there are no pharmacopoeias or formularies extant such as have survived from Mesopotamian and Egyptian cultures.* However, certain substances were used in a general therapeutic sense, and can be classified in terms of their use as fumigants, culinary herbs, or specifically curative substances. Fig. HEA 11.

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

11. A Sumerian "medical" tablet from Nippur (late third millennium B.C.)

INCENSE was the most important member of the first class, and consisted of a mixture of aromatic substances (Exod. 30:34-36). While its primary function was to honor God in the worship of the sanctuary, it probably served as a fumigant and deodorant also. The use of aromatic oils and perfumes for personal hygiene was dictated by climatic and other considerations. Myrtle, saffron, aloes, cassia, myrrh, spikenard, and cinnamon also came within this category. The symbolic anointing of a host or guest was an indication of respect (Ruth 3:3; II Sam. 12:20), while discontinuance of anointing indicated personal grief (Deut. 28:40).

Therapeutic substances in use among the Hebrews included the renowned balm of Gilead (see GILEAD, BALM OF) as an unguent preparation. A number of herbs were employed as gastric stimulants, tonics, rubefacients, and carminatives. Of these the more commonly found were fennel, dill, spelt, cumin, anise, and the caper berry. Carbonate of soda was often boiled with olive oil to make soap, or alternatively certain plants of the saltwort and glasswort families were used as an alkali instead of the carbonate of soda (natron). Olive oil was frequently administered internally and externally, sometimes being mixed with wine to furnish astringent and antiseptic qualities.

Herbs of a culinary nature played a prominent part in Hebrew diet. In addition to dill, fennel, cumin, anise, and spelt, the labiate herbs such as marjoram, thyme, mint, and sage were widely used. Anise seeds were popular as a condiment in cookery, as was cinnamon. The "bitter herbs" (Exod. 12:8) probably consisted of lettuce, endive, chicory, and water cress. Although there were many poisonous plants in Palestine, they do not appear to have been employed for criminal purposes.

Bibliography. H. P. Newsholme, Health, Disease and Integration (1929); C. R. Smith, A Physician Examines the Bible (1950); H. W. Frost, Miraculous Healing (1951); R. K. Harrison, "Medicine of the Bible," Canadian Association of Medical Students and Internes Journal, vol. X, no. 1 (1951), pp. 17-20; H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952); A. R. Short, The Bible and Modern Medicine (1953), pp. 27-46.

R. K. HARRISON

HEALING, GIFTS OF. Primitive Christianity possessed miraculous powers, including the power to heal (Acts 2:22; 3:16; 4:30). Paul mentions gifts of healing in his list of spiritual gifts (I Cor. 12:9, 28).

1. The healing ministry of Jesus. From the beginning of his ministry Jesus performed healing miracles (Mark 1:29-32, 40-45). "The power of the Lord," says Luke, "was with him to heal" (5:17). His enemies attributed this power to Satan (Mark 3:22); Jesus said it was of God (Matt. 12:28; Luke 11:20). In the power of the Spirit he began his ministry (Mark 1:10; Luke 4:18-19), proclaiming the kingdom (Mark 1:14-15), and affirming that healing was a sign, among others, that the rule of God, the "acceptable year of the Lord," had been inaugurated (Matt. 11:5; Luke 4:19; 7:22), the predicted character of the new age realized (Isa. 35:5-6; 61:1-2). He sent forth his disciples with authority "to heal every disease and every infirmity" (Matt. 10:1). Mark reports their success (6:13), and Luke sees this success as evidence of the kingdom's nearness (10:9).

2. The healing ministry of the church. The healing activity of Jesus and his disciples explains the place of healing in the primitive church. The gift is conferred by the Spirit (I Cor. 12:10, 28); the Spirit is given by the exalted Christ (Acts 2:33); the mighty works, including healing, are signs of the messianic age (Acts 2:16-21; Joel 2:28-31); believers have been "transferred" into the "kingdom of [God's] beloved Son" (Col. 1:13); the "powers of the age to come" have entered the present (Heb. 6:5), and Christ's power has been delegated to all who believe on him. People are astonished at the healing work of Peter and Paul and Philip (Acts 3:11; 5:15; 8:9-13; 14:8-10). Faith "in the name [person] of Jesus" (Acts 3:6, 16; cf. Matt. 9:27-31; Mark 5:34; 9:14-27), prayer and anointing with oil (Jas. 5:14-15; cf. Mark 6:13), and the "laying on of hands" (Acts 9:12, 17; 28:8; cf. Matt. 9:18; Mark 5:23), all belong to the healing process. Healing and the forgiveness of sins also go together (Jas. 5:16; cf. Mark 2:3-12; Ps. 103:3).

The NT gifts of healing are an integral part of the mission and message of Jesus, and of the early church's consciousness of their fulfilment, and must not be confused with psychiatry, or faith healing, however impressive the parallels, or however significant the light modern therapeutic practices may throw upon them.

Bibliography. A. Richardson, The Miracle-Stories of the Gospels (1941); S. V. McCasland, By the Finger of God (1951); L. D. Weatherhead, Psychology, Religion and Healing (rev. ed., 1954). E. Andrews

HEAP OF STONES [גל אבנים]; HEAP [גל]. A symbol used in several different ways. A heap of stones raised over a slain person served as a reminder of his shameful conduct and, probably, as a warning that the place was tainted (see Stoning). A heap of stones was raised over the body of Achan after he and his family had been stoned and burned (Josh. 7:26). A similar heap was raised over the body of the king of Ai after he had been hanged by Joshua (8:29). A heap was also raised over the pit where Joab and his men threw the body of Absalom (II Sam. 18:17).

A heap of stones was made as a witness to the compact which was drawn up between Jacob and Laban (Gen. 31:46-52; see Galeed).

Such phrases as "heap of ruins" and "stone heap" occur as variant translations of the Hebrew phrase and often bear a distinct connotation: A place which has become a heap of ruins (i.e., the stones of the destroyed buildings) is a reminder of the fate which God has in store for the sinful (Isa. 25:2). To warn that a city or house or an altar will become a stone heap is to announce impending destruction (Job 15:28; Isa. 37:26; Jer. 9:11—H 9:10; 51:37; Hos. 12:11—H 12:12). The ancient Israelite, as the modern Arab peasant, thought that such heaps of stones were inhabited by evil or dangerous spirits (see Isa. 13:21; 34:14; cf. Job 8:17). H. F. Beck HEART. In biblical psychology, the central and unifying organ of personal life. Like all primitive peoples, the ancient Hebrews did not make a sharp distinction between physical and psychic powers and tended to attribute psychological functions to certain organs of the body. Of all such organs the heart was the chief; it was the innermost spring of individual life, the ultimate source of all its physical, intellectual, emotional, and volitional energies, and consequently the part of man through which he normally achieved contact with the divine. In the recesses of the heart dwelt the thoughts, plans, attitudes, fears, and hopes which determined the character of an individual; here also God (and, in the NT, the power of evil) could work in secret to transform that character by implanting new thoughts and feelings.

There are three Hebrew words for "heart": לב, לבב, and לבה (the latter used only eight times), but there is no distinction in meaning. All are normally translated in the LXX by καρδία (occasionally νοῦς or διάνοια), which is also the word used in the NT. The conception of heart in the NT is identical with that in the OT.

1. A part of the physical body
2. The seat of psychic life
   a. The seat of the emotions
   b. The seat of the intellect
   c. The seat of the volition and the moral life
3. The point of contact with God
4. The equivalent of the personality

Bibliography

1. A part of the physical body. The word "heart" is only rarely used in a purely physical sense, as in I Sam. 25:37; II Kings 9:24.

That the Hebrews thought of the heart as the center of physical vitality is shown by occasional references to strengthening it by food (Judg. 19:5) and making it glad with wine (Ps. 104:15), although it is obvious that in this usage the word carries psychological overtones also.

A rare idiom uses the word "heart" to designate the inner part of the sea (Exod. 15:8) or of the earth (Matt. 12:40).

2. The seat of psychic life. Ordinarily the term "heart" means only incidentally the physical organ and denotes primarily the psyche at its deepest level. In this sense it is sometimes equivalent to רוח (Spirit; Pss. 51:10; 143:4) or קרב (RSV "inward mind"; Ps. 64:6).

a. The seat of the emotions. All the emotions of which a person is capable may be attributed to the heart. The heart can be glad (Prov. 27:11; Acts 14:17), sad (Neh. 2:2), troubled (II Kings 6:11 KJV), courageous (II Sam. 17:10), discouraged (Num. 32:7), fearful (Isa. 35:4), envious (Prov. 23:17), trustful (Prov. 31:11), generous (II Chr. 29:31), moved by hatred (Lev. 19:17) or love (Deut. 13:3). The emotions of the heart are sometimes pictured vividly and concretely: it is said to fail (Gen. 42:28), to faint (Gen. 45:26), to melt (Ps. 22:14), to tremble (I Sam. 28:5), to throb (Ps. 38:10), to flutter (Isa. 21:4 ASV), to grow hot (Deut. 19:6 KJV; Luke 24:32), to be sick (Prov. 13:12), to be broken (Ps. 69:20). The heart is also the seat of the appetites and desires (Ps. 37:4), both bad (Rom. 1:24) and good (Rom. 10:1).

b. The seat of the intellect. More distinctively Hebrew than the thought of the heart as the seat of the emotions is the conception that it is the center of intellectual life. The process of cogitation takes place in the heart (Judg. 5:16; Mark 2:6); thoughts belong there (I Chr. 29:18); and there one meditates on the deep things of life (Ps. 4:4; Luke 2:19). Because of its concrete character, the Hebrew language can hardly express the idea "to think" except by the phrase "to say in the heart" (Gen. 27:41 KJV; Ps. 10:6 KJV). With the heart man makes his plans (Prov. 16:9 KJV) and seeks knowledge and understanding (Eccl. 8:16 KJV). The heart is the storehouse of memory (Prov. 3:3; Luke 1:66). So intimate is the connection of heart and thought that the English versions (especially the RSV) sometimes render לב or לבב by "UNDERSTANDING" (Job 12:3) or "MIND" (Jer. 7:31). "To steal the heart" means "to deceive the mind" (II Sam. 15:6). WISDOM, in the sense of "skill," is a quality of the heart (Exod. 31:6 KJV), as is wisdom in the wider sense (I Kings 10:24 KJV).

c. The seat of the volition and the moral life. From the idea that the heart is the center of the intellectual life it is a natural step to the thought that it is the center of the will and hence of the moral life. The heart can plan wicked deeds (Prov. 6:18) and may become basically perverted (Prov. 11:20 KJV; Heb. 3:12); as such it can be a spring pouring forth wickedness (Matt. 15:19). It may be lifted up with pride (Deut. 8:14); it may become hardened (Zech. 7:12; Matt. 19:8: σκληροκαρδία), fat (Ps. 119:70), stubborn (Jer. 3:17), godless (Job 36:13), or turned away from God (I Kings 11:2). The hard or stubborn heart is sometimes described as "uncircumcised" (Jer. 9:26; Acts 7:51). One may depend too much on his own heart (Num. 15:39) or have a deceived heart (Isa. 44:20 KJV) or a hypocritical, "double" heart (Ps. 12:2). What is to be desired in man is that he have a "tender," not a hardened, heart (II Kings 22:19 KJV: רך). The good heart is one that is perfect (I Kings 8:61 KJV: שלם) or blameless (Ps. 119:80: תמים), clean (Ps. 51:10: טהור), upright (Ps. 32:11: ישר), honest and good (Luke 8:15), pure (Matt. 5:8), single (Eph. 6:5), circumcised (Jer. 4:4; Rom. 2:29), or broken (Ps. 34:18). The idea of "perfection" or "wholeness," the most comprehensive of the terms, is also conveyed by the phrase "with all the heart" (Deut. 6:5; בכל לבב). Man can, if he will, cleanse (Ps. 73:13) or renew (Ezek. 18:31 KJV) his heart. The heart is capable of education; one can set his heart to seek God (II Chr. 12:14) or the law (Ezra 7:10), apply it to the search for understanding (Prov. 2:2), or guide it in the right way (Prov. 23:19 KJV). But the human heart in general is corrupt (Jer. 17:9), undependable (Prov. 28:26 KJV), and full of evil (Gen. 8:21; Eccl. 9:3).

3. The point of contact with God. The heart, as the innermost spring of the human personality, is directly open to God and subject to his influence. The heart speaks to God (Ps. 27:8) and trusts him (Ps. 28:7); the word of God dwells in it (Deut. 30:14), and there faith takes its rise (Rom. 10:10). God looks upon the heart (I Sam. 16:7), knows its secrets (Ps. 44:21; Acts 1:24: καρδιογνώστης), and can test its moral quality (Ps. 17:3). For his mysterious purposes he can harden it (Exod. 4:21), but can also turn it to good (Ezra 6:22). He can put his fear into it (Jer. 32:40) or inspire it with new purposes (Neh. 2:12; Rev. 17:17). In the NT the devil has a similar power (John 13:2; Acts 5:3). God can give man an understanding heart (I Kings 3:9 KJV) or take all understanding (לב) away (Job 12:24). Even the hearts of kings are subject to God's control (Prov. 21:1); he fashions the hearts of all (Ps. 33:15).

Since the heart naturally inclines to evil, hope for its betterment must lie rather in God's transforming grace than in any educational activity on the part of man. Sometime in the future, it was believed, God would write his law in men's hearts (Jer. 31:33). The same God who could change the heart of a man into the heart of an animal (Dan. 4:16 KJV) was able to create for man a new heart (Ps. 51:10); one day he would take away the old, hardened heart of Israel and put a new, receptive heart in its place (Ezek. 36:26). In the NT, God is said to have shone (II Cor. 4:6), to have given the down payment of the Spirit (II Cor. 1:22), and to have poured forth his love in men's hearts (Rom. 5:5); there Christ could dwell (Eph. 3:17), and the peace of Christ might reign (Col. 3:15).

4. The equivalent of the personality. Since the term "heart" can mean the totality of the feelings, thoughts, and desires of a man, traced back to their deepest source in his inner life, it sometimes has almost the value of the modern psychological term "personality."

Occasionally it is connected with the reins (KIDNEYS) as an almost equivalent term (Jer. 11:20 KJV: כליות ולב). This usage shows how dangerous it would be to attribute to Hebrew psychology too precise an allocation of psychic functions to particular physical organs. For the Hebrews the personality was diffused through the whole of the body, and the assignment of special functions to particular organs was loose and often inconsistent.

In many cases the word "heart" is used in a weakened, nonspecific sense in which it may quite properly be replaced by a word simply designating the person; e.g., "My heart shall not fear" (Ps. 27:3) means little more than "I shall not fear." Often the word "self" can be used as a precise synonym for it; e.g., "Abraham . . . said in his heart" (Gen. 17:17) means only ". . . said to himself" (cf. KJV and RSV).

Bibliography. E. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek (1889), pp. 94 ff; C. A. Briggs, "A Study of the Use of לב and לבב in the OT," Semitic Studies in Memory of A. Kohut (1897); P. Joüon, "Locutions hébraïques avec la préposition על devant לב, לבב," Bibl., 5 (1924), 49-53; A. R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel (1949); F. H. von Meyenfeldt, Het Hart (Leb, Lebab) in Het Oude Testament (with English summary; 1950); R. Bultmann, Theology of the NT (trans. K. Grobel; 1954), I, 220-27.

R. C. DENTAN

HEARTH [מוקדה, יקוד (KJV BURNING); KJV אח (RSV BRAZIER), כיור (RSV BLAZING POT; see POT), מוקד (RSV FURNACE), הראל and אריאל (see below)]. In biblical times the hearth was a depression in the floor for the cooking of food.

In Ezek. 43, הראל, har'ēl (vs. 15), and אריאל, 'ᵃrî'ēl (vs. 16), are translated "altar hearth" (KJV "altar"). This was the uppermost stage or ledge of the altar of burnt offering, upon which the sacrifice was laid. Cf. Lev. 6:9.

See also ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE; ARIEL; ALTAR.

O. R. SELLERS

HEAT AND COLD. Extremes of atmospheric temperature, annual and daily (Gen. 8:22). General terms for "heat" are חם (Gen. 18:1; Job 24:19; Jer. 17:8) and καῦμα (Rev. 7:16; 16:9); for "cold," קרה (Job 24:7; 37:9; Ps. 147:17; Prov. 25:20), קר (Gen. 8:22), and ψῦχος (John 18:18; Acts 28:2; II Cor. 11:27). As causing extreme discomfort, the preferred terms are חרב (lit., "dessicating heat"; Gen. 31:40; Isa. 25:4; etc.); חרבון, "heat" (Ps. 32:4); καῦσων, "scorching heat" (Matt. 20:12; Luke 12:55; cf. Jas. 1:11); קרח, "cold" (Gen. 31:40) or "frost" (Jer. 36:30); and קרה, "cold" (Prov. 25:20). The direct heat of the sun is חמה (Ps. 19:6—H 19:7), or καύσων (Jas. 1:11). In the LXX, καύσων sometimes translates קדים (e.g., Hos. 12:1—H 12:2), the hot, dry EAST WIND; and this may be intended in Luke 12:55. The emotional heat of anger is חמה (cf. Gen. 27:44; II Kings 22:13; Isa. 42:25; etc.) or חרון (cf. Deut. 13:18; Josh. 7:26; Nah. 1:6; etc.).

See also PALESTINE, CLIMATE OF; SUMMER AND WINTER. R. B. Y. SCOTT

HEATH. KJV translation of ערער, 'ar'ār, in Jer. 17:6 (RSV SHRUB); 48:6 (RSV WILD ASS). The true heath, Erica vagans L. (and other species), rarely is found in Bible lands and does not fit the geographical associations of the passages. The most widely accepted identification is the JUNIPER.

See also FLORA § A9*g*. J. C. TREVER

HEATHEN [גוים; ἔθνη]. See NATIONS.

HEAVE OFFERING. KJV translation of תרומה (RSV HOLY THINGS), the portions of sacrifices and offerings which were set apart, removed, or taken up ("heaved") for Yahweh and the priests. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS § C3-4.

HEAVEN [שמים; οὐρανός]. The word "heaven" is used in the Bible in two senses: (a) In the larger sense, it denotes the upper part of the cosmic ocean, which envelops the earth. It is therefore conceived as made of water; indeed, in Akkadian and Arabic the cognate words are used by metonymy to mean "rain." (b) In the narrower sense—with which we are here primarily concerned—"heaven" denotes the immediate ceiling or canopy of the earth—i.e., the sky, pictured as a septum stretched across the cosmic ocean to prevent its water from overflowing. This septum is variously portrayed.

1. Heaven as a metal strip
2. Heaven as a curtain
3. Heaven as a garment
4. The windows of heaven
5. The bottles of heaven
6. The promptuaries of heaven
7. The stages of heaven
8. The pillars of heaven
Bibliography

1. Heaven as a metal strip. The standard Hebrew term for the celestial septum is רקיע (Gen. 1:6-8; Pss. 19:1; 150:1; Dan. 12:3). This is usually rendered "firmament," after LXX στερέωμα and Vulg. firmamentum. But the word denotes properly a strip of hammered metal; and this picture is, in fact, elaborated in Job 26:13, where God is said to polish it by breathing upon it with his wind, even as a man might breathe on a mirror for the same purpose (cf. 37:18). The conception finds a perfect parallel in the "brazen heaven" of Homer (Iliad V.425, 504; Odyssey III.2) and Pindar (Pyth., X.22; Nem., VI.13); while, somewhat similarly, heaven is described both in ancient Egyptian sources and occasionally by Homer as made of iron. In the same vein, too, the pavement of heaven—i.e., the firmament—is described in Exod. 24:10 as, literally, "of the appearance of lapis lazuli [ספיר; LXX σαπφειρος]"—a concept which recurs in Mesopotamian sources and which is repeated in the apocalyptic visions of Enoch (14:9-10; 71:5) and in later rabbinic literature (e.g., Genesis Rabbah 4.12). See bibliography § 1.

2. Heaven as a curtain. Alternatively, the expanse is portrayed as a strip of gauze or muslin (דק) stretched like a tent (Isa. 40:22) or spread like a curtain (Ps. 104:2). This, too, has interesting parallels. In the Rig Veda (VIII.6.5), heaven is said to be stretched out like a hide. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead (ch. 85), it is described as a "skin" (šet); and in the Finnish Kalevala as an embroidered cloth; and the same imagery is frequent in German popular riddles. See bibliography § 2.

3. Heaven as a garment. Lastly, heaven is regarded as a garment. This concept, however, develops in two ways. On the one hand, the garment is pictured as an outspread blanket, even as an Arab spreads his cloak to sleep on it. On the other hand, it is portrayed as a mantle or wrap in which God enfolds himself. This latter idea is especially well attested in other cultures. Thus—to cite but a few examples—in the Iranian Zend Avesta (Yasht 13.3; Yasna 30.5), the supreme god, Mazda, is said to wear the heavens as an embroidered robe; while in Teutonic mythology Odin wears an azure mantle, representing the sky; and among the Ewe-speaking Negroes of Africa, the azure sky is the veil with which Morwa, the supreme god, covers his face. It is especially the star-spangled night sky that lends itself to this imagery. The Mesopotamians often describe it as a "variegated garment" (burummu; cf. ברומים in Ezek. 27:24), and the moon in particular is said to be attired in the "robe of heaven" (nalbaš šamê). See bibliography § 3.

The picture of heaven as a garment is arrestingly developed in the LXX version of Job 14:12:

> So man lies down and rises not again;
> till the heavens are no more he will not awake, where, by different vocalization of the consonantal text (viz., BeLôTH, "wear out," for MT BiLTî, "are no more"), the ultimate dissolution of the heavens is portrayed as "becoming unstitched" (οὐ μὴ συρραφῇ).

4. The windows of heaven. The firmament, or celestial dam, was believed to be punctuated at intervals by grilles or sluices (ארבות [Gen. 7:11; 8:2; II Kings 7:2, 19; Isa. 24:18; Mal. 3:10], "windows of heaven"; but cf. LXX καταρράκται [Isa. 24:18 θυρίδες]; Vulg. cataractae), through which the rain was released in due measure. In the Ras Shamra Texts these are termed more neutrally "cracks" or "fissures" (bdqt; בדק in II Chr. 34:10; Ecclus. 50:1), and this has inspired the attractive suggestion that the same word should be recognized also (for MT very similar ברקים) in Ps. 135:7; Jer. 10:13; 51:16, thus yielding the sense: "He maketh fissures [instead of 'lightnings'] for the rain." These sluices have their counterparts in the "springs" or "fountains" (מעינות תהום; Gen. 7:11; cf. Prov. 8:24, 28) through which the waters of the nether ocean were made to issue.

5. The bottles of heaven. The celestial waters were also conceived as being stored in skins or bottles (i.e., clouds), which were tilted and emptied by God at his good pleasure (Job 38:37). This concept, too, is not unparalleled elsewhere. A common Turkish expression for "It rains" is, "The bottles are emptied," while in the Rig Veda (V.83.7-8), the rain-god Parjanya is invoked to "draw downward thine opened water-skin." In the same way, too, the Peruvians believed in a rain-goddess who sat in the clouds emptying a pitcher; and similar ideas are entertained in Teutonic mythology. Moreover, in the Ugaritic Poem of Baal (I*AB, vi, 7), that god of rainfall is instructed to take "thy clouds, thy buckets [mdlk], thy rains." See bibliography § 4.

6. The promptuaries of heaven. In the heavens were located the storehouses or promptuaries (אוצרות) of the winds (Ps. 135:7; Jer. 10:13; 51:16; Enoch 18:1; II Esd. 4:5), the hail (Job 38:22), and darkness (Isa. 45:3)—a notion developed in considerable and fantastic detail in the visions of Enoch (17:3; 18:1; 41:4; 60:12-24; 69:23; 71:4, 9).

7. The stages of heaven. The concept of successive stages or strata of heaven is nowhere explicitly articulated in the OT, for the expression "heaven of heavens" (Deut. 10:14; cf. I Kings 8:27; Ps. 48:4) is probably no more than an ordinary Hebrew superlative. In the Pseudep., however (e.g., Test. Levi 3; Slavonic Enoch), we do indeed encounter that notion of the seven heavens which was later to become a commonplace of Jewish and Arabic folklore (cf. Talmud, Ḥag. 12*a;* Koran, Sura 22.4), and which likewise obtains in many other cultures—e.g., Hindu, Siberian, Turkish, Sumatran. In the NT, on the other hand, only three strata appear to be recognized (II Cor. 12:2). This alternative likewise appears in rabbinic sources, while in the ancient Mesopotamian myth of Etana there are similarly only three stages, in the uppermost of which dwells the supreme god, Anu.

8. The pillars of heaven. Heaven was thought to rest upon pillars (Job 26:11; cf. Milton, Paradise Regained, book IV, line 455: "the pillar's frame of heaven"; Comus, line 597: "the pillar'd firmament"). This conception, too, is common to many other peoples, and was entertained in antiquity by the Egyptians, the Iranians, and the Greeks. The number of the pillars is not stated in the OT, but the common view in other cultures was that there were four of them, situated at each of the cardinal points. See bibliography § 5.

For theological aspects of heaven, see KINGDOM OF GOD, OF HEAVEN; ANGELS.

Bibliography. 1. On heaven made of iron, Egyptian: Devirea, Mélanges d'archéologie égyptienne et assyrienne, I (1873), 9. Greek: Odyssey XV.329; XVIII.565. On heaven of lapis lazuli: B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, II (1920), 108.

2. On heaven as a curtain: H. Güntert, Von der Sprache der Götter und Geister (1921), p. 142. For the notion in German popular riddles: L. Strackerjan, Sagen aus dem Herzogtum Oldenburg (2nd ed., 1909), II, 108.

3. On heaven as a garment: R. Eisler, Weltenmantel und Himmelszelt (1910). T. H. Gaster, Thespis (1950), p. 186. On Akkadian nalbaš šamê: S. Langdon, JRAS (1925), pp. 717-18. E. Weidner, Archiv für Orientforschung, VII (1931), 115-16. On burummu: P. Jensen, Kosmologie der Babylonier (1890), pp. 6-7.

4. On the bottles of heaven: G. de la Vega, Commentarios reales (trans. C. R. Markham; 1867-71), II, 27. J. Grimm, Teutonic Mythology (trans. F. Stalybrass; 1880), p. 593. G. Jacob, Altarabische Parallelen sum AT (1897), p. 20.

5. On the pillars of heaven, Egyptian: G. Maspero, Revue archéologique, N.S. XXIV (1877), 322. Iranian: I. Scheftelowitz, Die altpersische Religion und das Judenthum (1920), p. 106. Greek: O. Gruppe, Griechische Mythologie (1906), p. 382.

T. H. GASTER

HEAVEN, HOST OF. See HOSTS, HOST OF HEAVEN.

HEBER hē'bər [חבר, comrade]; HEBERITES —bə rīts. 1. Eponym of an important clan of the tribe of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; I Chr. 7:31-32); sometimes connected with the HABIRU.

2. A Kenite; the husband of Jael, the woman who killed Sisera (Judg. 4:11, 17, 21; 5:24). Considerations of meter make it probable that "the wife of Heber the Kenite" was inserted into Judg. 5:24 under the influence of Judg. 4.

3. A man or family of the tribe of Judah, founder of Soco (I Chr. 4:18).

4. A family of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:17); probably to be identified with Eber in I Chr. 8:12.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 222. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HEBREW hē'brōō [עברי; LXX generally Ἑβραῖος, ὁ περάτης in Gen. 14:13]. The name of the ancestor Eber is probably a construction from the name of the people. A definitive etymology cannot be given. עברי is a term denoting the Israelites and is often used by foreigners (Gen. 39:14; Exod. 1:16; etc.). The word is also used by the Hebrews as a name for themselves (Exod. 1:19, etc.). In such a case "Hebrew" and "Israelite" would be interchangeable. According to other passages, the Hebrews are a separate ethnic group in Canaan, though closely related to the Israelites (see ISRAEL, NAMES AND ASSOCIATIONS OF). In Num. 24:23 ff the Hebrews appear as an important nation comparable to Assur. On the possible connection between עברי and Ḫabiru, see HABIRU.

According to the genealogical table (Gen. 10:21 ff), the ancestor of the Hebrews is called Eber, son of Shem, and several people are included in his descendants. Of these Abraham, Nahor, and Lot deserve particular mention. According to the OT, Abraham is the ancestor of the Hebrews, Nahor the ancestor of the Arameans, and Lot the ancestor of the Moabites and the Ammonites. In order to illustrate the character of such genealogies, it may be remarked that in Mari texts Nahor occurs as a name of a town. The genealogies are accordingly constructions, and individuals appearing in them may reflect ancient ethnic groups, towns, or countries. In Gen. 14, Abraham is the Hebrew, and he is said to be an ally of the AMORITES having their center at Hebron. According to the traditions of Genesis, Abraham migrated from Ur in Mesopotamia, and these traditions undoubtedly reflect an early migration. Later invasions into Canaan are reflected in the traditions about the exodus from Egypt and the entrance into Canaan under Joshua. Perhaps this invasion from the S may be connected with various groups entering Canaan after the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt in the early sixteenth century. On this account several migrations probably took place during more than a century.

The Hebrew language is a branch of Canaanite and Amorite, or rather Canaanite and Amorite are ancestral dialects through the merging of which the growth of biblical Hebrew may be explained. Undoubtedly, non-Semitic languages also influenced the development of Hebrew (cf. the Amarna Letters). Some OT texts, moreover, are written in a language of a more ancient structure than others. Foremost among such texts are the poetic texts of the Psalms and parts of the prophetical books. The poetic structure is much the same as that of Ugaritic. Biblical Hebrew, the closest relative of which is Moabite (Mesha Inscription), is the result of the linguistic development which took place since the time when Ugaritic texts were written. Through the discovery of the MSS in the cave in Qumran NW of the Dead Sea, texts are now known which make it evident that the Hebrew of that time (ca. A.D. 100) showed a number of differences from the Hebrew of the MT.

Of linguistic differences between Hebrew and Ugaritic some examples may be mentioned. The following sounds have merged into each other: ḥ and ḫ, ʾ and ġ; furthermore, the sibilants show a number of differences. In Hebrew a definite article is used, though less consistently in poetical texts, which is an archaic feature. The case endings, still occurring in Ugaritic, have been dropped. The verbal system of Hebrew also shows a number of differences, and the use of the tense is a problem which cannot be said to be definitely settled. The fact that the problem of the tenses of Ugaritic has not yet been completely solved makes a brief survey rather unprofitable.

A. HALDAR

HEBREW LANGUAGE. With the exception of the small sections Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12-26; Jer. 10:11; Dan. 2:4*b*–7:28, which are in the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, and a number of odd words and names in a variety of languages, the canonical books of the OT are in the Hebrew language. Since the language of the Arameans is called Aramaic (ארמית), one might have expected the language of the Hebrews to be called Hebrew (עברית), but, instead, it is called the "language [lip] of Canaan" (Isa. 19:18), and Judean (יהודית) the "language of Judah" (Neh. 13:24; Isa. 36:11). In the NT, "in Hebrew" (Ἑβραϊστί, derived from the Aramaic ʿibhray; John 5:2; 19:13) and "in the Hebrew dialect" (τῇ Ἑβραίδι διαλέκτῳ; Acts 21:40) are used to designate both Hebrew and the locally spoken Aramaic, as is Josephus' "language of the Hebrews" (γλῶσσα τῶν Ἑβραίων). "Hebrew" (עברית) is used only in the later rabbinic literature, which even then often prefers to use the phrase "sacred tongue" to distinguish it from the "vulgar tongue." From Ἑβραῖος came the Latin Hebraeus, the source of our English word "Hebrew."

1. Hebrew among the Semitic languages
2. The early monuments of the language
3. The script
4. Phonetics of Hebrew
5. Grammar
   a. Historical
   b. Descriptive
   c. Syntax
6. Poetic forms
7. Loan words in Hebrew
8. Later Hebrew

Bibliography

1. Hebrew among the Semitic languages. Hebrew is one of the Semitic languages (see SEMITES) and shares the general characteristics of that language group in its preference for triliteral roots, the consonantal dominance in its stems, hesitancy to form compound words, and simplicity of sentence structure. More specifically it belongs to the Canaanitish branch of the NW Semitic group, so that its closest connections are with the other members of that branch—viz., Ugaritic, Phoenician, Moabitish, and Edomitish. These Canaanitish languages are doubtless that "tongue of the West land" mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, and of which we have evidence from names and words in Egyptian inscriptions as early as the nineteenth century B.C., in cuneiform inscriptions from the fifteenth century, and in actual texts from the people themselves in Byblian inscriptions dating perhaps from the eighteenth century B.C., the Ugaritic texts from Ras Shamra of the fourteenth century, and a number of fragmentary inscriptions as yet only partially understood, dating from between the eighteenth and twelfth centuries B.C. The indications are that this Canaanitish was not a homogeneous language, even in those early times, but that as there was an E Canaanitish, of which we have evidence from names in Akkadian, so in Canaan itself there was some difference between the dialects of N Canaanitish and what we may call S Canaanitish. Both the Byblian inscriptions and those of Serabit el-Khadem reveal the fact that Semitic-speaking people in this area were laboring to adapt Egyptian hieroglyphic signs to form a Semitic alphabet, and the Ugaritic texts use an alphabet based on cuneiform signs, so it is certain that Canaanitish was being written long before the Hebrews entered the land.

There have been advocates of a fantastic theory that Hebrew was the autochthonous language of Canaan, but the number of non-Semitic place names, along with the presence of non-Semitic words in the Canaanitish languages, words which would seem to have been adopted from the tongues of the pre-Semitic inhabitants, are sufficient evidence that no Semitic-speaking group was autochthonous there. The biblical tradition is that the ancestors of the Hebrews were associated with the incoming Arameans, whose language belongs to the other branch of the NW Semitic group (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE). These early Hebrews entered the S area of Palestine, settled at first in the hilly districts, and only gradually expanded to the plains. As they settled, they adopted the local dialect of S Canaanitish, modifying it somewhat by their earlier Aramaic speech habits, and the resultant language developed into the Hebrew of historic times.

2. The early monuments of the language. The earliest monumental evidence of it is the Gezer Calendar of perhaps the tenth century B.C., but there are Samarian ostraca of the ninth (or maybe eighth) century, the Siloam Inscription of the eighth century, graffiti and seal and jar-handle inscriptions from the ninth to the sixth centuries, and the Lachish Letters from the sixth century. Some of the early songs and other passages embedded in the OT may have been composed as early as the tenth century B.C., though we have them only in the form in which they were transmitted by much later scribes. In view of the plentiful evidence for early use of writing in Palestine, there is no need to doubt that the Hebrews themselves could have been writing their language as early as the tenth century B.C. It is clear that in the early period there was no homogeneous language, for the Gezer Calendar shows a S dialect which differs somewhat from the N dialect in the ostraca from Samaria, while the story in Judg. 12:4-6 enshrines a memory that northerners could be recognized by details of their pronunciation. It was the Jerusalem dialect, as the dialect of the chief city, which gradually imposed itself as the standard literary dialect.

3. The script. The Byblian inscriptions use over a hundred characters for writing their language, but this is apparently because there are multiple forms for the same sign to indicate differences in pronunciation, just as in Ugaritic there are three signs for the א to indicate its pronunciation with "a" or "i" or "u." Ugaritic also, however, has variant forms for certain signs where no difference of pronunciation is to be assumed, and among its thirty-one signs are three which seem to represent foreign sounds in non-Semitic words. S Arabian uses twenty-nine signs and Arabic twenty-eight, though in Arabic several signs are distinguished from one another only by diacritical points. The earliest Hebrew writing so far known uses a form of the old Canaanitish alphabet of twenty-two characters, such as is used in the Phoenician and Zinjirli inscriptions. That the language had a wider range of sounds than these signs could express is clear from transcriptions in Egyptian, Greek, and Latin, where at times a distinction is kept between ḥ and ḫ, ʿ and ġ, ś and š, just as in Arabic script, though in the Hebrew script ח has to serve for both ḥ and ḫ, ע for both ʿ and ġ, and שׂ for both ś and š. Later the Masoretes used a dot to distinguish sh from s in the "square script," derived from an Aramaic development of the early Canaanitish script. Another group of consonants—viz., בגדכפת—had a double pronunciation, later indicated by the presence or absence of a dot, distinguishing b from bh, g from gh, d from dh, k from kh, p from ph, and t from th, some of which have separate signs in other Semitic scripts. Reduplicated consonants are not normally reduplicated in the writing. Some of the earlier fragmentary Palestinian inscriptions read downward in Chinese fashion. The Ugaritic inscriptions normally read from left to right, like Akkadian, though odd inscriptions in this script found in Palestine read from right to left. Some of the S Arabian inscriptions, like early Greek inscriptions, read boustrophedon (alternately right to left, left to right), but Hebrew, like the majority of Semitic languages, is written from right to left.

4. Phonetics of Hebrew. The four peculiar features of the consonantal system are: (a) the gutturals א, ʾ (for the glottal stop); ה, h; ח, for both ḥ and ḫ; ע, for both ʿ and ġ; (b) the emphatics, ט, ṭ, beside ת, t; ק, q, beside כ, k; צ, ṣ, beside ס, s; (c) the fact that בגדכפת have a double pronunciation according to whether they are or are not preceded by a vowel sound; (d) the profusion of sibilants: ס, s; ז, z; שׁ, š; שׂ, ś; and צ, ṣ. The consonantal system for the written language is shown in Table 1.

Table 1

	Bilabials	Labiodentals	Interdentals	Coronal-Alveolars	Emphatics	Palato-Alveolars	Palatals	Velars	Uvulars	Pharyngals	Glottals
Plosives	p פ; b ב			t ת; d ד	ṭ ט			k פ; g ג	q ק	h ה	ʾ א
Fricatives	w ו	ph פ; bh ב	th ת; dh ד				y י	kh כ; gh ג	ḫ ח; ġ ע	ḥ ח; ʿ ע
Sibilants				s ס; z ז	ṣ צ	š שׁ	ś שׂ
Liquids				l ל; r ר
Nasals	m מ			n נ

In the ancient form of writing, consonants alone were written, and there was no indication of the vocalization. A first step toward vocalization was the use of ו, י, and ה, and to a lesser extent א, to represent, at first finally and later medially also, the lengthened vowels. This appears at a relatively early date in the inscriptions, apparently as a borrowing from Aramaic, but its use was somewhat haphazard. The Old Greek translation of the OT (LXX) shows that they were not used consistently in the Hebrew text from which that was translated, or at least not distributed in the same way as they are in our printed text. Their use in the Dead Sea Scrolls, and indeed the variants in their use even in relatively late Hebrew MSS, indicate that they were always regarded as a secondary element in the text. Vocalization beyond this was not absolutely necessary when the language was a living language, and so books and newspapers in modern Hebrew, as in Arabic, are printed without vocalization. As Hebrew came to be less and less the language of common intercourse, however, it was needful to have some way of indicating more fully the vocalization, and this was done by the so-called "pointing"—i.e., providing the consonants with small signs, written above, within, or below them, to indicate the vowels with which they are to be pronounced. Three such systems of vocalization are known. The system ordinarily used in printed texts of the OT is the Tiberian system worked out by the Masoretes of the School of Tiberias. It is a predominantly infralinear system, with signs for a and ā, e and ē, i and ī, o and ō, u and ū, a sign to mark the vowelless consonant, signs for the helping vowel Šᵉwâ, and dots to distinguish š from ś, the "hard" as against the "soft" pronunciation of b, g, d, k, p, t, and reduplication. Two older systems, both supralinear, are the Babylonian and the Palestinian, which appear in certain groups of MSS, and demonstrate that these systems were introduced only gradually, for at first only ambiguous words were pointed—i.e., these helps to the pronunciation were inserted only where they were felt necessary.

All three systems are the work of the schools, and would seem to have appeared first in Mesopotamia, being based on the system of notation worked out there in the fifth century to mark the pronunciation of the Syr. Bible. Thus at best they represent only late tradition as to the pronunciation; the system of Tiberias reached its final form perhaps not much earlier than A.D. 800. Jerome in the fourth century complained of this lack of vocalization in the texts and tried to represent in Latin transcription the way he heard words pronounced by his Jewish teachers. From these transcriptions of Jerome, along with the even earlier transcriptions in the LXX and in the works of Origen, it is possible to work back to some understanding of an earlier pronunciation which proves to be nearer that of classical Arabic. The Tiberian system of signs is given in Table 2.

There was no punctuation in the early writing and often not even word division. In some inscriptions words are separated by a dot or a stroke, but the evidence of the LXX shows that its translators used Hebrew MSS where the writing, if not scriptio continua, was at least defective in word division. One attempt at minimizing some elements of confusion arising from this defective writing was the reserving of a special form of כמנפץ as final letters, but this came into use only gradually. The Masoretes who worked out the signs for vocalization also worked out another set of signs to serve as marks of punctuation, and yet further signs to guide readers to the proper cantillation of the text. These signs are of late date and are of two kinds, one for the poetical books of the OT and a somewhat different system for the prose books.

Table 2

5. Grammar. a. Historical. The early writers of Hebrew would have been as little conscious of grammar as were the pre-Islamic Arab poets. The various attempts at etymologizing in the OT writings are merely folk etymologies and are no evidence of linguistic interest. As any language, however, comes more and more into use as a literary medium, it tends to become "fixed." This is a gradual process, and in the case of Hebrew may be considered to have gained impetus when the Jerusalem dialect, perhaps as early as the United Kingdom under David and Solomon, came to be regarded as the standard form of the language. The body of inscriptional material in Hebrew is so small and fragmentary that any study of the grammatical forms must of necessity be based on the text of the OT. That text, however, has suffered so much at the hands of copyists, as we see not only from the deuterographs in the OT, but from the forms in the Dead Sea Isaiah Scroll (IQ Isa[a]), as well as at the hands of those devoted laborers on the text, the Masoretes, that it is doubtful if we can ever obtain any clear picture of this process of "fixing," since we are never sure which forms were written by the author and which are due to later hands. The great number of variants for certain grammatical forms recorded in our Hebrew grammars suggests there was a period of considerable uncertainty before a standard form imposed itself. It has been pointed out that in Ezek. 13:20-22 there are three different ways of forming the suffix for the second person plural, and in Isa. 32:9-11 there are different ways of forming the feminine plural of the imperative. It is possible that some of the anomalous grammatical forms, and some elements of vocabulary—e.g., the use of שפחה beside אמה for "handmaid," of צעיר beside קטן for "small," of מורה beside תער for "razor," etc.—may be dialectal, but this is not necessarily so, and no attempt has yet succeeded in distinguishing in detail dialectic strata in the text of the OT.

Historical development in the language is discernible. The language of the poetical books, e.g., is often more archaic, preserving older forms and constructions as well as older elements of vocabulary in Hebrew as it has in other languages. The fact that this poetical archaism may be affected does not detract from its value as evidence for historically older forms. Similarly the language of such books as Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles, the Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, and Esther reveals a later form of Hebrew, showing a development of certain grammatical forms, a use of particles foreign to the older language, an increase of Aramaisms, and a characteristic adoption of elements of vocabulary from surrounding cultures. The literature produced in the period after the close of the canon uses a language which shows even further development—so great, indeed, as to warrant distinguishing Mishnaic Hebrew from biblical Hebrew. Still further development in the post-Mishnaic period and the Middle Ages marks rabbinic Hebrew, while the revival of the language in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries has produced modern Hebrew.

There has been continuous cultivation of Hebrew as a literary language from the tenth century B.C. to modern times, but whether there was continuity as a spoken language is debatable. The incident in II Kings 18:26-36 is clear evidence that it was the spoken language in Jerusalem when Sennacherib was before the city in ca. 701 B.C., yet when Ezra after the "return" read the Law to the people, they needed interpreters to make the meaning plain (Neh. 8:2-8). That Hebrew continued to be written in the intertestamental period is evident both from the inscriptional material and from such works as Ecclesiasticus and the nonbiblical material from Qumran, but this gives the impression of being composition in a learned language, not in a vernacular. The language of the Mishna has been cited as evidence that Hebrew was still a spoken language, but even the fact that it uses good Hebrew words not to be found in the OT does not necessarily mean that they were drawn from living speech, for many words from the older language could have been preserved in literary sources, though they do not happen to occur in what has survived to us as the OT. It is not impossible that Hebrew may have continued to be spoken in limited circles of pious Jews on through the Middle Ages, but this would seem to have been in the way in which Latin continued to be spoken as an ecclesiastical language, rather than as a vernacular.

b. Descriptive. The grammatical characteristics of biblical Hebrew may be briefly summarized. All grammatical categories are, of course, merely abstractions invented for the purpose of describing the structure of any language, and the commonly used Latin terminology is unfortunately not very well adapted for the description of Semitic languages. In general Hebrew follows the common Semitic grammatical pattern. Words, which are combined in meaningful arrangements to form sentences, belong to three categories: nouns, which are names of realities, concrete or abstract; verbs, which indicate activities; and particles, which indicate varying types of relationship among nouns and verbs. Particles may suffer modification but not inflection. Nouns and verbs may be inflected by internal modification, or by the affixing of preformatives or afformatives or both. The triradical stem is the essential element for both form and meaning. Thus from the stem KTB, concerned with writing, Arabic, e.g., uses KaTaBa ("he wrote"), KaTaBtum ("ye wrote"), yaKTuBu ("he writes"), naKTuBu ("we write"), litaKTuBa ("that she may write"), 'uKTuBū ("write ye"), KaTiB ("a writer"), KiTāB ("a book"), KuTuB ("books"), maKTaB ("an office"—i.e., a place where writing is done), maKTaBah ("a library"), KuTTāB ("an elementary school"—where writing is taught), taKāTaBa ("he was in correspondence with"), KuTiBa ("it was written"), KuTuBī ("bookseller"), iKtiTāB ("to inscribe one's name in a register"), KiTāBah ("a deed or record"), etc., etc. Hebrew follows this general pattern. Two genders are recognized, masculine and feminine; three persons, the speaker, the one addressed, and the one absent; two numbers, singular and plural, though there are still some fragments of the dual remaining.

The noun includes pronouns, adjectives, and the numerals. There is a definite article ה־, derived, apparently, from an old demonstrative. It is prefixed with reduplication, actual or virtual, of the following consonant—e.g., sûs = "a horse," but hassûs = "the horse"; 'îr = "a city," but hā'îr (for ha''îr) = "the city." Personal pronouns have two forms, an independent form and an affixed form which may be used with nouns, verbs, and particles. E.g., 'ᵃnî is the independent pronoun for the first person singular in 'ᵃnî hammélekh ("I am the king"), but it is the suffix -nî in himlakhtánî ("thou hast made me king"), the suffix -î in malkî ("my king") or mālakh 'alāy ("he ruled over me"), and the prefix -'e in 'emlōkh ("I shall reign"). The interrogative and relative pronouns are particles. The personal pronouns of the third person serve also as demonstratives, but the other demonstratives are particles, though as demonstratives they may take the article. The indefinite pronouns are expressed by common nouns specialized in meaning for this pronominal service.

Nouns were probably at one time inflected for three cases, with the endings -u, -a, -i, in the singular, as in Ugaritic and Arabic, but these were early lost, though traces of them are probably to be seen in such words as Mᵉthūšā'ēl (cf. Akkadian mutu šā ili), layᵉlâ ("by night"), ṣāphônâ ("northward"), and Pᵉnî'ēl beside Pᵉnū'ēl. The possessive is indicated mostly by the construct state—i.e., a shortened form of the noun, where shortening is possible—before the pronominal suffixes or before the associated word; e.g., haddābhār = "the word," but dᵉbhārô = "his word"—the word of him—and dᵉbhār hammélekh = "the king's word." Feminines may be formed from masculines by the suffix -â, representing an older -ath which appears in the construct state—e.g., sûs ("horse"), sûsâ ("mare"), sûsath hazzāqēn ("the old man's mare"). Some feminines retain the -th ending —e.g., šelîšîth ("a third"), 'Ammônîth ("an Ammonitess"). A plural is formed for the masculine by the suffix -îm, which is shortened to -ê in the construct, and by changing -ath to -ôth for the feminine—e.g., sûsîm ("horses"), sûsê hazzāqēn ("the old man's horses"), sûsôth ("mares"). The dual ending -áyim (construct -ê) is for the most part limited to things which go in pairs, and may be added to either a masculine or a feminine form—e.g., qéren ("a horn"), qarnáyim ("two horns"), śāphâ ("a lip"), śᵉphātháyim ("two lips"), śiphthê hazzāqēn ("the two lips of the old man"). The object may be expressed by the pronominal suffix attached to the verb—e.g., yišmorkā ("he will keep thee"); or by the noun as object standing after the verb—e.g., tišmōr hammiṣwâ ("thou wilt keep the commandment"); or by the noun as object preceded by the particle ēth—e.g., nišmōr ēth hassétther ("we shall keep the secret").

Adjectives behave as do the nouns. Thus ṭôbh ("good") forms a feminine singular ṭôbhâ, a masculine plural ṭōbhîm, and a feminine plural ṭôbhôth. Adjectives may be either predicative or attributive—e.g., ṭôbh hammélekh ("the king is good"), or hammélekh haṭṭôbh ("the good king")—agreeing with their nouns in number and gender. There are no comparative or superlative forms. The comparative is expressed by using min ("from") in the sense of "than"—e.g., ṭôbh min zāhābh ("better than gold"); and the superlative is expressed by the article—e.g., sûsô haṭṭôbh ("his best horse"), bittî haqqeṭannâ ("my youngest daughter").

There are cardinal, ordinal, and multiplicative numerals. Of the cardinals, "one" is an adjective which follows its noun—e.g., pār 'eḥādh ("one ox"), pārâ 'eḥath ("one cow"). "Two" is a noun in the dual, masculine šenáyim, feminine šethâyim, and agrees in gender with the noun to which it stands in construct state—e.g., šenê pārîm ("two oxen"), šethê pārôth ("two cows"). "Three" to "ten" are nouns which disagree in gender with the nouns to which they stand in construct state—e.g., šešeth pārîm = "six oxen," but šeš pārôth = "six cows." The tens are the plurals of the units—e.g., šiššîm ("sixty")—except "twenty," which is the plural of "ten." They are the same for both masculine and feminine. There are special words for "hundred," "thousand," and "ten thousand." There are ordinals form "first" to "tenth" which are adjectives, but beyond "tenth" the cardinal numbers are used for the ordinals also. The multiplicatives are the feminine dual of each numeral—e.g., šibh'āthâyim ("sevenfold").

Nouns may be either original or derivative. זאב ("a wolf"), חול ("sand"), שמש ("sun"), are original nouns; but yābhāl ("a stream"), yabbéleth ("flowing"), yōbhēl ("a protracted sound"), yūbhāl ("a river"), yᵉbhûl and bûl ("produce of the field"), mabbûl ("inundation"), are all derivatives from a stem YBL ("to flow forth"). Thus the participles, infinitives, and gerundives of the verb are properly derived nouns.

The verb is inflected for number, person, and gender. Thus yikhtōbh ("he will write"), tikhtōbh ("she will write"), nikhtōbh ("we shall write"), tikhtᵉbhū ("ye [masculine] will write"), tikhtóbhnā ("ye [feminine] will write"). There are no true tenses, but there are three states—viz., perfect, imperfect, and imperative. Kāthábhtî means "I wrote," "I have written," "I did write"—i.e., the action is complete, finished, perfect. 'Ekhtōbh means "I write," "I am writing," "I shall write," "I may, might, or ought to write"—i.e., the action is unfinished, incomplete, imperfect. Kᵉthōbh means "write," the command to do the action. A distinction is marked between transitives and two types of intransitives (called statives), the one originally indicating a transient and the other a permanent state. There are certain modifications of the imperfect, a somewhat shortened form of the second and third persons (which, however, now for the most part coincides with the ordinary imperfect), for the jussive ("let him write," "may he write," "do not write"), a somewhat lengthened form for the first person for the cohortative ("O let me write"), and an emphatic or energetic form with a suffixed -n. This energetic form occurs also in the imperative, which has in addition a somewhat lengthened form for the emphatic imperative.

The characteristic feature of the verb, however, is its system of derived stems to represent aspects of the verbal action. Classical Arabic knows fifteen of these, of which ten are in common use, though neither in Arabic nor in Hebrew are all of them necessarily in use for every verb. Hebrew normally uses seven, all of them fully inflected for number, gender, and person, and forming infinitives and participles. The simple form is the Qal—e.g., כתב ("he wrote"). A prefixed n- makes the Niph'al נִכְתַּב, which is properly a reflexive of the Qal—e.g., טמא ("he was unclean"), נִטְמָא ("he defiled himself")—though sometimes it denotes reciprocal action—e.g., נִלְחֲמוּ ("they fought one another"); but most commonly it is used as a passive—e.g., נִשְׂגַּב ("he has been exalted"). A reduplicated middle radical gives the Pi'ēl, whose general sense is intensive of the Qal—e.g., שָׁבַר = "he broke," but שִׁבֵּר (shibbēr) = "he broke in pieces"; though it sometimes has a causative sense—e.g., לָמַד ("he learned"), לִמֵּד (limmēdh, "he taught"; i.e., he caused to learn). The Pu'al is properly the passive of the Pi'ēl—e.g., רום ("he rose"), in the Pi'ēl "he raised" and the Pu'al "he was raised." The prefix hith- makes the Hithpa'ēl, whose proper meaning is the reflexive of the Pi'ēl—e.g., הִתְרוֹמֵם ("he exalted himself"). At times, however, it signifies reciprocal action (e.g., רָאָה = "he saw," but תִּתְרָאוּ = "ye look on one another"); or to make a show of being (e.g., נביא = a "prophet," and הִתְנַבֵּא = "he pretended to be a prophet"); or to indicate the action of the verb on oneself (e.g., לקח = "he took," but הִתְלַקַּח = "he took hold on himself"). A prefixed hi- with internal -i- makes the Hiph'īl whose meaning is causative of the Qal (e.g., מלך = "he reigned"—i.e., he was king—but הִמְלִיךְ = "he made someone king"), though sometimes it is declaratory (e.g., צדק = "he was righteous," but הִצְדִּיק = "he justified"—i.e., he declared righteous). Prefixed ho- makes the Hoph'al which is the passive of the Hiph'īl—e.g., הָמְלַךְ ("he was made king"). There are also several rarer derived stems such as Po'ēl, Po'al, Hithpo'ēl, Pa'lēl, Pe'al'al, Pilpēl, Hithpalpēl, and some quadriliteral verbs.

Particles are of various kinds. There is an interrogative particle ה to introduce questions, also אַי ("where?"), which may be compounded—e.g., אַיֵּה ("where?"), מֵאַיִן ("whence?"), אֵיךְ ("how?"), אָנָּה ("whither?"). The interrogative pronouns are מִי ("who?") and מָה ("what?"). Some particles are merely connective. The commonest of these is ו ("and"), but there are אוֹ ("or"), גַּם ("also"), אוּלָם ("but"), כִּי ("because"), כֵּן ("thus, so"), פֶּן ("lest"). The negative particle is לֹא, and the prohibitive particle אַל. The conditional particles are אִם, לוּ, and לוּלֵי ("if"). Other particles are prepositional, some of them inseparable from their words—e.g., ל ("to, for"), ב ("in, at, by, with"), כ ("like"); whereas others are independent—e.g., מִן ("from"—which, however, may be prefixed), עַל ("upon"), אֶל ("unto"), אֵת ("with"), c. Syntax. With this limited grammatical apparatus, it cannot be expected that biblical Hebrew should have the flexibility and adaptability that classical Greek has as an instrument for the expression of thought. It is remarkable, however, with what skill the biblical writers have used the resources of the language. The syntax is comparatively simple, like that of all the older Semitic languages. Sentences are of two kinds, nominal and verbal. In such a sentence as אתם הֶמְעַט מִכֹּל הָעַמִּים ("Ye are the least of all peoples"), the verb "to be" is understood between the subject and the predicate. Where the verb is expressed, it commonly precedes its subject—e.g., ותוצא הארץ דשא ("And the earth brought forth herbage"); though this is but following the general tendency to give precedence to the predicate—e.g., צדיק יהוה ("Righteous is Yahweh")—except when the subject is to receive the emphasis—e.g., את העם העביר אתו ("The people, them did he make pass over"). Prepositional phrases commonly precede the verb—e.g., "In the beginning God created the heavens." Negative, interrogative, and other particles also commonly precede the verb, but the sentence order normally is predicate, subject, object, words denoting closer specification. The adjective when attributive generally follows its noun and agrees with it in number, gender, and in definiteness or indefiniteness.

עַד ("unto"). Another אֵת is used before nouns as the sign of the definite object. Other particles are ejaculatory—e.g., אֲהָהּ ("ah!"), אַהּ ("alas!"), אוֹי ("woe!"), הוֹי ("alas!"), הֶס ("hist!"), אֲלוֹ ("behold!"), הֵן ("lo!"). There are no real adverbs in Hebrew. Many nouns in special constructions serve to express what we would express by an adverb, and some of the particles have an adverbial sense—e.g., אָז ("then"), טֶרֶם ("not yet"), and the negative בַּל.

There is no verb "to have"; the possessive particles serve instead—e.g., "I shall have peace" is "It will be peaceful for me"; and "They had bitumen for mortar" is "And bitumen was to them for mortar." Hebrew also lacks that useful preposition "of," so common in Aramaic. Instead it sometimes uses the adjective—e.g., "the altar of bronze" is "the bronze altar"; sometimes the preposition מִן ("from")—e.g., וגם משרי ישראל ("and also some of the princes of Israel"). Most commonly, however, it is expressed by putting the two nouns in construct—e.g., סוסי המלך ("the-horses-of the king"). There may be several such nouns following one another in construct—e.g., "the-rest-of the-number-of the-bows-of the-warriors-of the-children-of Qedar"—but no attribute can break in between two nouns in construct, nor is it usual for more than one noun to be in construct to the same word. Thus "a great heap of stones" is "heap of stones a great one," and "to the prayer and supplication of thy servant" is "to the prayer of thy servant and to the supplication of him," though exceptionally there occurs "the knowledge and fear of Yahweh" (דעת ויראת יהוה). The great defect of this construction is that it is not possible by it to express the indefiniteness of one member and the definiteness of the other at the same time. מזמור דויד is "the psalm of David," but "a psalm of David" has to be מִזְמוֹר לְדָוִד (a psalm belonging to David). On the other hand, this construct state permits such expressions as "hill of my holiness" for "my holy hill," "man of the land" for "husbandman," etc., which add much to the variety and elegance of diction.

Sentence formation in early Hebrew was almost exclusively paratactic, whole strings of sentences being connected merely by "and," with very little use of subordinate sentences. The monotony, however, is relieved by skilful use of the possibilities inherent in the telic and atelic sense of the perfect and imperfect, and the variations of meaning suggestible by variations in the use of derived stems. Since the perfect is telic, it can be used for things conceptually finished and complete as well as for those actually so. Thus God says to Abraham: "To thy seed do I give this land," but as God's giving is something already fulfilled, it is: "To thy seed I have given this land." Similarly an abiding state of affairs may be considered as something already complete, so the psalmist says: "I have hated [i.e., I hate] those who seek after vanities." For this reason "I know" is commonly "I have known." Conditional sentences may be regarded as conceptually complete, and so they use the perfect—e.g., אם־לא הביאתיו ("if I do not bring him back"). There is also a characteristic use of the imperative to replace a conditional sentence, as when Joseph says: "This do and live," for "If you do this, you will live." Similarly the imperfect, since it is atelic, may be used for things which have not yet happened—e.g., for "and no herb of the field had as yet sprung up" the writer uses יצמח ("is springing up"); or for things which are conceptually incomplete, though they have happened—e.g., ואד יעלה מן הארץ ("and a mist came up from the earth"). Likewise it may be used for the frequentative—e.g., "and his mother makes [i.e., used to make] for him a little jacket"; and where we would use "ought"—e.g., מעשים אשר לא יעשו ("deeds that ought not to be done").

The most characteristic construction made possible by this telic and atelic sense, however, is that known as the waw-conversive construction, which is found also in other Canaanitish languages. In this, since the verb has properly nothing to do with time, but with completeness or incompleteness, it is customary, when a narrative passage begins with an imperfect, to have all the succeeding verbs in the perfect introduced by waw, or if it begins with a perfect, to have all the succeeding verbs in the imperfect introduced by waw. Thus Gen. 3:22 reads literally: "lest he put forth his hand and has taken also of the tree of life and has eaten and has lived for ever." I.e., the imperfect here denotes the emergent action, and all the other actions are regarded as conceptually complete as results of it. Further variety and ease of diction are given by idiomatic use of infinitives and participles—e.g., וכי ימות מת ("and should anyone die"), or ויצא יצוא ושוב ("and it went to and fro"), or המלך תמלך עלינו ("perhaps thou wouldst reign over us").

6. Poetic forms. Hebrew poetry, like the poetry of other languages, preserved many archaic forms and constructions, along with a definite poetic style and vocabulary. There is no regular rhyming, but there is a rhythmic structure dependent on the accent, and a characteristic feature of parallelism, such as seems to have been used in earlier Canaanitish literature. There is occasional strophic arrangement in poetry, and even some poetical pieces arranged in stanzas with a refrain, but all attempts to find generally applicable strophic schemes in biblical Hebrew have failed. For further details of poetic structure, see POETRY.

7. Loan words in Hebrew. There is a not inconsiderable body of borrowed vocabulary in biblical Hebrew—i.e., words which are not originally Hebrew but were borrowed from surrounding peoples, adopted into Hebrew, and used with as little sense of their foreign origin as there is when speakers of English use such words as "piano" or "solo," which were borrowed from Italian. Some of these borrowed words, such as תנור ("oven"), זית ("olive"), רמון ("pomegranate"), בדלח ("bdellium"), ארגון־ארגמן ("purple"), כנור ("harp"), for which no satisfactory etymology has yet been suggested, may be words which came from the pre-Semitic inhabitants of the land, or words borrowed from one or another of the non-Semitic peoples with whom the Hebrews were in contact but of whose languages we have no adequate record. Such words as סוס ("horse"), ברזל ("iron"), פלגש ("concubine"), may belong to this latter class, for it seems probable that שריון ("coat of mail") and ישפה ("jasper") may be of Hurrian origin, and כובע ("helmet") a word taken from Hittite. Other groups of words may be traced with some confidence to the sources from which they came. One group is from Akkadian, in some cases ultimately from Sumerian through Akkadian. Several Hebrew names of months are Akkadian. Words connected with governmental administration, such as מדה and אשכר ("tribute"); סגן and פחה as names for civil officials; תרתן, רב־מג, and רב־שקה for military officers; בלו and מכס ("tax"); שטר and מפסר ("scribe"); הלך ("feudal service"); גרה ("legal currency"); אגרת ("edict"); and the names of such social classes as מסכן ("poor man"), אמן ("artisan"), אכר ("farmer"), נקד ("sheep farmer"), מלח ("seafaring man"), פחר ("potter"), are further examples. Another group is of Egyptian origin. Such luxury articles as שש ("fine linen"), אבנט ("a scarf"), הבנים ("ebony"), טבעת ("a seal"), קסת ("a writer's palette"), כתם ("fine gold"), אח ("a brazier"), משי ("silken material"), צי ("a ship"), אחלמה ("amethyst"), לשם ("opal"), פח ("a metal plate"), are examples. One interesting word is שנהבים ("ivory"), where the שן is the ordinary Hebrew word for "tooth," but הבים represents the Egyptian word for "elephant." Words for other luxury articles seem to have come with the articles from India. Such words are פטדה ("topaz"), כרכם ("saffron"), תכי ("peacock"), אהלות ("aloes"), כרפס ("cotton fabric"), ספיר ("sapphire"). In writings from the Persian period we find words of Iranian origin, such as דת ("law"), פתגם ("edict"), גנזך ("treasury"), גזבר ("treasurer"), אחשדרפן ("satrap"), אדרכון ("a daric"), פרדס ("park, garden"), אחשתרן ("royal courtier"), פרתמים ("nobles"), פתבג ("food ration"), and many others. סרן ("city ruler") seems to be a Philistine word.

8. Later Hebrew. Already in the later books of the OT and in the Hebrew of Ecclesiasticus there is evidence that Hebrew is being written as a learned language (לשון החכמים) rather than as a living vernacular. In part this was because of the increasing spread of Aramaic as the language of common intercourse, but partly it was because the Hebrew which was still in use, and which Rabbi Meir pleads may be preserved as the speech of the pious, had itself undergone great changes. This later form of the language became Mishnaic Hebrew, technically the language of the Mishna which was codified ca. A.D. 200, but used for the language in the form it had from ca. 200 B.C. to ca. A.D. 500, and known mainly from the works of the Tannaim and the early Amoraim. It differs considerably from biblical Hebrew in vocabulary, grammar, style of diction, and even in pronunciation, for the constantly occurring confusion among the consonants—נתאלמלה beside נתארמלה, כאור beside כעור, אזהרה beside הזהרה, טעה beside תעה, קרסם beside כרסם, הפקר beside הבקר, etc. —can only mean that these sounds were no longer as carefully distinguished in pronunciation as they had been in the older language.

There are changes in the pronouns. אנו appears as the plural of אני. אתם is used for both masculine and feminine, while אתן, which nowhere occurs for the second feminine plural, is used at times for the second masculine plural, as הן is for the third masculine plural, while in the suffixed pronouns -n commonly occurs instead of -m for the third masculine plural. The relative אשר is replaced by the form ש, which occurs sporadically in biblical Hebrew, and this added to the particle ל is used as a new possessive pronoun which can even take pronominal suffixes—e.g., שלי ("mine"—that which is to me). As a demonstrative זו replaces זאת, and by prefixing אי a new interrogative איזה, איזו ("which?") is formed.

In the verb, not only are there many new verbs which are not found in biblical Hebrew, and new meanings given to others which are there, but there is considerable change in the use of the aspects in the derived stems, some verbs not occurring in stems in which they are used in biblical Hebrew, and others in stems in which they are not used there, while some of the stems, particularly the Pi'ēl, are greatly extended in range. Most important, however, is the development of new aspects in derived forms. The old Pu'al survives for the most part only in the participle, whereas the Hoph'al becomes extremely common, and new formations such as the Shaph'ēl, Pil'ēl, Pir'ēl, Pilpēl, Nithpa'ēl, hardly, if at all, represented in biblical Hebrew, are in frequent use. There is also a significant development of quadriliterals, and even quinqueliterals appear. Variations in the verbal inflections are but few, the most important being the dropping of any distinction between masculine and feminine plural in the endings of the imperfect and imperative. The waw-consecutive construction almost completely disappears, but, on the other hand, there is a great extension of the use of the verb "to be" (היה) with participles, and the use of participles with the infinitive, or the participle with attached pronouns, to express varieties of verbal action.

In the nouns there is considerable expansion in the matter of derived forms and in the use of diminutives. The -th feminine ending and the -īn plural ending, which occur occasionally in biblical Hebrew, are much more commonly used, and there is a somewhat fuller use of the dual. In particles, again, there is much extension of use, especially in combinations used to take the place of adverbs. Such common particles as כי, פן, גם, almost pass out of use, but new particles such as שמא, אלא, and an extended use of ש are noticeable. The את, which in biblical Hebrew indicated the definite object, has become a demonstrative and can take the suffixed pronouns.

The vocabulary was greatly enriched in this period by borrowings from Aramaic and from Greek and Latin, as well as by new formations from old roots. In part this was needed because of the very different nature of the documents that had to be written in Mishnaic Hebrew. To a large extent these were concerned with matters of everyday life in an environment culturally different from that of the biblical writers, and there were no biblical words for many of these matters. To some extent writers might draw on old Hebrew vocabulary not represented in our remains of biblical Hebrew, and at times they could use biblical words in new meanings, but often they were driven to form new words, or to borrow them from the surrounding cultures.

This Hebrew developed even further in the succeeding period to become rabbinical Hebrew, which, for the most part, was a literary medium among people who spoke many different vernaculars. In this period the language was greatly influenced by Arabic, under which influence its poetry even developed quantitative meters and used rhyme.

Bibliography. General: L. Metmann, Der hebräische Sprache; ihre Geschichte und lexikalische Entwicklung seit Abschluss des Kanons (1904). H. Torczyner, "Hebräische Sprache," Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. VII (1931), cols. 1,031-66. E. A. Speiser, "The Pronunciation of Hebrew Based Chiefly on Transliterations in the Hexapla," JQR, XVI (1926), 343-82; XXIII (1933), 233-65; XXIV (1933), 9-46. D. Diringer, Le iscrizioni antico-ebraiche palestinesi (1934). A. Sperber, "Hebrew Based upon Greek and Latin Transliterations," HUCA, XII-XIII (1937/38), 103-274. H. Torczyner, The Lachish Letters (1938). A. Goetze, Accent and Vocalism in Hebrew (1939). Z. S. Harris, Development of the Canaanite Dialects (1939). H. Torczyner, Te'udhoth Lakish (1940). A. Sperber, "Hebrew Based upon Biblical Passages in Parallel Transmission," HUCA, XIV (1939), 153-249; "Hebrew Phonology," HUCA, XVI (1941), 415-82. S. Moscati, L'Epigrafia ebraica antica (1951); Stato e problemi dell'epigrafia ebraica antica (1952). F. M. Cross and D. N. Freedman, Early Hebrew Orthography (1952).

Poetry: G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry (1915). A. Brung, Der Rhythmus der alttestamentlichen Dichtung (1930). T. H. Robinson, "Some Principles of Hebrew Metrics," ZAW, XIII (1936), 28-43.

Grammars: F. E. König, Historischkritisches Lehrgebäude der hebräischen Sprache (3 vols.; 1881-97). W. Gesenius, Hebräische Grammatik (1909; English trans. A. E. Cowley, 1910). Bauer and Leander, Historische Grammatik der hebräischen Sprache des Alten Testaments (1918-22). P. Joüon, Grammaire de l'hébreu biblique (1923). G. Bergsträsser, Hebräische Grammatik, I (1918); II (1929). A. Sperber, "Hebrew Grammar: A New Approach," JBL (1943), pp. 137-262. M. Lambert, Traité de grammaire hébraïque (1946). O. Grether, Hebräische Grammatik (2 vols.; 1951).

Grammatical problems: G. R. Driver, Problems of the Hebrew Verbal System (1936). M. Sekine, "Das Wesen des althebräischen Verbalausdrucks," ZAW, LVIII (1940/41), 133-41. E. Brønno, Studien über hebräische Morphologie (1943). F. R. Blake, A Resurvey of Hebrew Tenses (1951). V. Christian, Untersuchungen zur Laut- und Formenlehre des Hebräischen (1953).

Syntax: S. R. Driver, A Treatise on the Use of the Tenses in Hebrew (1881). A. Müller, Outlines of Hebrew Syntax (1882). C. Brockelmann, Hebräische Syntax (1956).

Lexicons: F. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the OT (1906). G. Dalman, Aramäisch-neuhebräisches Handwörterbuch zu Targum, Talmud und Midrasch (1938). F. Buhl, Wilhelm Gesenius' hebräisches und aramäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament (1949). E. Ben Yehuda, Thesaurus totius Hebraitatis et veteris et recentioris (15 vols.; 1908-53). Koehler and Baumgartner, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti Libros (1953).

Concordances: G. Lisowsky, Concordantiae Veteris Testamenti (1955). S. Mandelkern, Biblorum sacrorum Concordantiae (1955).

Script: S. Yeivin, Tōledhōth hakkethābh ha'ibhrî (1938). G. R. Driver, Semitic Writing, from Pictograph to Alphabet (1954).

Mishnaic Hebrew: A. Geiger, Lehr-und Lesebuch zur Sprache der Mischnah (1845). J. H. Weiss, Mishpat leshôn hammishnâ (1867). M. H. Segal, A Grammar of Mishnaic Hebrew (1927; Hebrew ed., 1936).

Modern Hebrew: E. M. Lipschutz, Vom lebendigen Hebräisch (1920). S. Spiegel, Hebrew Reborn (1930). Yardeni and Rabinowitz, The Grammar of Our Language (1943). Z. Har Zahav, Diqdûq hallāshôn ha'ibrîth (3 vols.; 1951—). A. JEFFERY

HEBREW RELIGION, HISTORY OF. The religion of Israel was a phenomenon unique in the ancient world. First appearing coincident with the emergence of the Israelite people in the thirteenth century B.C., it had a history of approximately a thousand years before issuing in the Judaism of the immediate pre-Christian centuries. Though this history brought a great development of ideas, and involved many changes, it did not constitute an evolution from lower forms of religion to higher, as it was once the custom to describe it. Israel's faith retained throughout the essential and distinctive character with which it began. For fuller discussion and other opinions, see bibliography; see also ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

A. The religion of the patriarchs
B. The formative period
   1. Sources of knowledge
   2. The covenant society
      a. The Exodus and the covenant at Sinai
      b. The covenant form
      c. The obligations of covenant
      d. Covenant and promise
   3. The God of early Israel
      a. Yahweh the God of Israel
      b. Yahweh alone is God
      c. The nature of Israel's God
   4. The institutions of early Israel
      a. The tribal league
      b. The central shrine and its clergy
      c. The cult
      d. Covenant law and its development
C. From the judges to the eighth century
   1. The rise of the monarchy and its significance
      a. Organization of life under the crown
      b. Cultural adaptation
      c. Social and economic changes
      d. The new religious center in Jerusalem
   2. Religion in the Divided Monarchy
      a. Religion and the state in Judah
      b. Religion and the state in Israel
      c. Paganizing tendencies in Israel
      d. Social disintegration
D. From the eighth century to the fall of Jerusalem
   1. The first of the classical prophets
      a. The earlier prophets
      b. Prophets of the eighth century in Israel
      c. Prophets of the eighth century in Judah
   2. The reform movement in Judah
      a. The reform of Hezekiah
      b. The reform of Josiah

3. The last days of Judah
a. The spiritual crisis of Judah
b. Prophets of the last days of Judah
E. The Exile and beyond
1. Israel in exile
a. The Exile and Israel's faith
b. Reinterpretation of Israel's faith: Second Isaiah
2. The rise of Judaism
a. The holy people: particularism vs. universalism
b. The idea of God
c. The future hope of Judaism
d. The place of the law in Judaism
Bibliography

A. THE RELIGION OF THE PATRIARCHS. Though Israel's distinctive religion began with Moses, it was prepared for by that of the PATRIARCHS. These were part of a seminomadic migration which brought new population to Palestine in the first half of the second millennium B.C. Their religion, as seen from evidence in Genesis and from extrabiblical texts both contemporary and later, was of a distinctive sort quite different from the official paganisms of the surrounding lands. Their God was the God of the clan, the personal God of the clan chief. This may be seen from certain archaic names for the Deity in Genesis —e.g., "the God [perhaps 'Shield,' as in 15:1] of Abraham" (e.g., 31:53); "the Fear [properly 'Kinsman'] of Isaac" (31:42); "the Mighty One [Champion] of Jacob" (49:24). It is also illustrated in early personal names such as Abiram, Ahiram, Abiezer, Ahiezer, Abimelech, Ahimelech, and the like, in which the God is spoken of as the "(divine) father/brother" of the worshiper. The patriarchal God was the unseen head of the clan, whom the clan father had undertaken to serve and to trust, and whose promises of the blessings of land and seed (e.g., Gen. 15) he had received. To this God, whose cult was simple and presided over by the clan father himself, the clan gave supreme, if not exclusive, devotion.

As the patriarchs entered Palestine, their cults were carried on at local shrines, and their gods no doubt identified with the gods worshiped there. The patriarchs worshiped God under the name El, which is the name of a Canaanite god but also a general word for "the god." Such names as El-Shaddai (Gen. 17:1; Exod. 6:3; etc.), El-Elyon (Gen. 14:18), El-Olam (Gen. 21:33), El-Ro'i (Gen. 16:13), are instanced (see GOD, NAMES OF). While these gods were worshiped locally, the patriarchal deity was no local numen but the patron deity of the clan over whose fortunes he watched. As the patriarchal stock passed into Israel, whether via Egypt or through later absorption, their gods were identified with Yahweh (cf. Exod. 6:3) and their traditions (see TRADITION, ORAL) normalized as those of all Israel. Their religion, especially with its sense of an intimate bond between God and people supported by covenant and promise, profoundly influenced the faith of Israel. The pattern of the patriarchal covenant, different from that of Sinai and no mere back-projection of it, also lived on. It is probable that much of Israel's legal tradition (see § B4*d below*), strikingly akin to that of Mesopotamia, came to her through her own patriarchal ancestors rather than through Canaanite mediation.

B. THE FORMATIVE PERIOD. Israel's religion began, as Israel did, in the events of the Exodus and Sinai. Its founder was MOSES. Though it adapted practices of pre-Mosaic origin, and borrowed others, its distinctive character is evident from the beginning.

1. Sources of knowledge. Since the Pentateuchal documents are all of later date (see BIBLICAL CRITICISM 1; PENTATEUCH), it is necessary to guard against anachronism in describing the religion of earliest Israel. Studies in shorter units of tradition have, however, revealed a considerable body of material apparently stemming from Israel's formative period (tenth century and before). This includes a number of cultic confessions (Deut. 6:20-25; 26:5-10*a;* Josh. 24:1-13) and poems (e.g., Gen. 49; Exod. 15:1-18; the poetry of Num. 23–24; Deut. 33; Judg. 5; Pss. 29; 68; etc.). Moreover, both the Decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS) in its original form and the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21–23; 34) go back to the early period, as does the basis of the laws of D and, in part, of H; and the parent of J and E, containing the major themes of both, was also in existence in the period of the Judges. (See PENTATEUCH.) From material of this sort a fair picture of Israel's religion in the formative period may be drawn. While one cannot always separate pre- from post-Conquest features, there is little reason to assume that Israel's faith fundamentally altered its character with that event.

2. The covenant society. Israel's religion did not center in an idea of God, but in the memory of a historical event as interpreted by faith, and in response to that event in covenant. This event was the exodus from Egypt.

a. The Exodus and the covenant at Sinai. Whatever the events in detail, there can be little doubt that a group of Hebrews, who had been held as state slaves in Egypt, were led thence by Moses at the behest of a "new" God, Yahweh, to the accompaniment of happenings so marvelous that they were never forgotten. This rescue was interpreted as an act of Yahweh's unmerited favor calling a people from bondage to himself. There is also no reason to doubt—again, whatever the details—that these Hebrews then moved to Sinai, where, in solemn ceremony, they made covenant with Yahweh to be his people. A new society was thus formed where none had been before, in which the basis of obligation was that covenant response to the favor of Yahweh already experienced. Israel's religion was founded upon belief in her ELECTION by Yahweh and her COVENANT with him. Though both notions were refined in course of time, both were basic from the beginning.

b. The covenant form. The covenant form, best seen in the Decalogue, is an ancient one which has its closest parallel in certain Hittite suzerainty treaties of a day slightly before that of Moses. In these the Great King addresses his vassals and, reminding them of his benevolent acts which obligate them to gratitude (cf. the preamble of the Decalogue), lays down the stipulations which he imposes and which they are to accept (cf. the body of the Decalogue). These typically include the prohibition of foreign relations save through the Great King, and of enmity with others of his vassals. Response to the call to arms is required (Judg. 5:13-18, 23; 21:8-12); and unlimited trust is to be reposed in the Great King.

Vassals are to appear before him annually with tribute (Deut. 26:5-10*a;* I Sam. 1:21) and are to submit all controversies with other vassals to him (Deut. 17:8-13[?]). A copy of the treaty is to be placed in the shrine and periodically read publicly (Deut. 10:5; 31:9-13). Sanctions are supplied by a series of BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS invoking the gods (Deut. 28). Such features as these illustrate both the antiquity of the covenant form and something of its meaning: Israel began as a federation of clans, bound to live in sacred truce with one another under the suzerainty of Yahweh.

c. The obligations of covenant. The covenant was no bargain between equals, but a vassal's acceptance of the overlord's terms. Early Israel was a primitive theocracy in which Yahweh was king. The symbols of her cult—e.g., the ARK OF THE COVENANT, which was Yahweh's throne (Num. 10:35-36); Moses' rod; the URIM AND THUMMIN—were the symbols of his rule. The notion of the kingship of Yahweh is thus, in its roots, quite old (e.g., Exod. 15:18; Num. 23:21; Judg. 8:22-23; Ps. 68:24). Israel had come into being through her covenant acceptance of Yahweh's favor and rule; covenant could, therefore, be maintained only so long as the Overlord's stipulations were met. The heart of these was (cf. the two parts of the Decalogue) that Israel honor Yahweh and have nothing to do with any other god, and that she strictly obey his law in all dealings with the covenant brother. These stipulations explain the direction of the later prophetic attack on the national sin, and also the importance of law in Israel at all periods of her history.

d. Covenant and promise. A note of HOPE and PROMISE is also primitive. This had been an original element in the religion of the patriarchs, from which background the nucleus of Israel had come. And Yahweh's call to Israel in Egypt had come precisely as one to a new future and to hope. Moreover, the covenant form itself, though laden with obligation, carried the implicit assurance that, obligation met, the Overlord's favor would be continued. The earliest poems (see § B1 above) reveal a robust confidence that Israel will be assured her land, given all material blessings, made a great people victorious over all her foes: who blesses her will be blessed, who curses her will be cursed (Num. 24:9; cf. Gen. 12:3). This is in no sense an eschatology (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT); but the seeds of it lie here.

3. The God of early Israel. Though Israel's religion did not center in a doctrine, her notion of God was nevertheless unique from the beginning (see GOD, OT).

a. Yahweh the God of Israel. The God of Israel was called Yahweh. Though there is no agreement as to the meaning of this name, it is probably best taken as a causative of the verb "to be," and part of a formula (cf. Exod. 3:14): "He Causes to Be What Comes into Existence," which has parallels in Egyptian texts. In the course of time the original meaning was lost, and Yahweh became merely a proper name; but the name shows that Israel's God was from the beginning no local nature deity, but a high God of cosmic domain. Whether or not a God called Yahweh was worshiped before Moses—say in Jethro's clan—is unknown. This is not impossible, but the evidence is indecisive; the name Yahweh is nowhere attested before Moses. But even if such a cult existed, a new character was imparted to it by Moses which made it a new thing. The religion of Yahweh, as we know it, began with him.

b. Yahweh alone is God. From the beginning Israel was forbidden to worship any god but Yahweh (e.g., Exod. 20:3; 22:20). Though she repeatedly did so, this was never excused or condoned: Yahweh is a jealous God who brooks no rival (Exod. 20:5). And, so marvelous were his acts, Israel did not conceive of him as having any rival. He created the universe quite alone (Gen. 2:4*b*-25); he has no pantheon, no consort (the Hebrew lacks a word for "goddess"), and no progeny. For this reason, Israel created no myth (see MYTH, MYTHOLOGY [OT]), nor borrowed any except to devitalize it. Her earliest poems (e.g., Exod. 15:1-18) show that she was emancipated from mythopoeic thought from the beginning. Yahweh was, of course, at all periods thought of as surrounded by his heavenly host (see HOST OF HEAVEN), his "holy ones" (e.g., Deut. 33:2; Ps. 29:1); and at times there was the temptation to accord these beings worship. But this was always censured. In Israel's faith there was place for but one God; even the gods of the patriarchs survived only in identification with Yahweh, not as subordinate deities.

To ask if this was monotheism is to pose a question foreign to the thought of ancient man. Early Israel did not explicitly deny that other gods existed; indeed, there are passages where their existence is naïvely assumed (e.g., Exod. 18:11; Judg. 11:24; I Sam. 26:19)—though this occurs in late passages as well (e.g., II Chr. 2:5) and may be in part an accommodation of language. Yet Israel's faith was not a mere monolatry or a henotheism, for, if the existence of other gods was not denied, neither was their status as gods tolerantly granted. To Israel only one God was God; the other gods, deprived of part in creation, function in the cosmos, power over events, and cult, were robbed of all that made them gods—in short, were rendered nonentities, were "undeified." Though the full implications of it were not drawn until much later, in this practical sense Israel's faith was monotheistic from the beginning.

c. The nature of Israel's God. Yahweh differed from the pagan gods of the ancient world in his essential nature. Though conceived of anthropomorphically, no image of him (see IDOL) could be made (Exod. 20:4). Nor was he identified with any heavenly body, or natural force or function. Though manifesting his power through nature (cf. the poems under § B1 above), no one aspect of nature was more characteristic of him than another. And, though he conferred the blessings of fertility (e.g., Gen. 49:25-26; Deut. 33:13-16), he was in no sense a fertility god. In Israel's faith nature, though not lifeless, was robbed of personality. It was not, in fact, primarily in the repeatable events of nature, but in unrepeatable historical events, that Yahweh manifested himself; and in these events, unlike the pagan gods, he acted purposively. These purposive acts of Yahweh were the basis of Israel's obligation to him. Israel's religion, therefore, offered no ritual technique for manipulating the unseen powers of nature for selfish ends. Her God was no pagan maintainer of status quo to be appeased by ritual, but one who had called her from bondage to a new future as his people, and who demanded of her obedience. Sacrifice, important as it was, could thus never properly be regarded as a mere technique. And, though it was popularly practiced, Israel had no place for magic (e.g., Exod. 20:7; 22:18; I Sam. 28:9; see DIVINATION; MAGIC).

4. The institutions of early Israel. Israel's faith expressed itself in certain tangible institutions. Chief among these was her tribal league, with its central shrine, its cult and sacred occasions, and, above all, its law.

a. The tribal league. Israel began her history as a league of twelve tribes (see TRIBE). It was an organization not unlike the amphictyony of a somewhat later period in Greece and Italy, or the league of Arab clans formed by Mohammed. Though reaching definitive form after the Conquest as new elements—some Canaanite, some of the stock of Israel's own ancestors—were absorbed (cf. Josh. 24), it was an expression of the covenant pattern of Sinai. Israel was a sacral league of clans united in covenant with Yahweh. There was no machinery of statehood whatever. The clans enjoyed complete independence, being obligated only to assist in the care of the central shrine and to respond to the call to arms. In times of danger there would arise a man endowed with the divine Spirit (e.g., Judg. 3:10; 11:29), a charismatic leader called a JUDGE, who would rally the clans against the foe. But the authority of the judge was not permanent, and in no case hereditary. He was in no sense a king. To early Israel the institution of kingship was foreign and repugnant (cf. Judg. 8:22-23; 9:7-15). The tribal league persisted for some two hundred years, and in it Israel's distinctive institutions gained normative form.

b. The central shrine and its clergy. The focal point of the league was the tent shrine (see TABERNACLE) housing the ark of the covenant. A heritage of the wilderness days, it came finally to rest in SHILOH, where it remained as long as the tribal league endured. There the clans would gather on feast days to seek the presence of Yahweh and renew their allegiance to him. Other shrines, many of ancient origin, existed and were tolerated; but Shiloh was the heart of the covenant league. Though a permanent structure may have been built there (I Sam. 1:9; 3:3), the tent tradition persisted (II Sam. 6:17; 7:6-7). This shrine had a clergy (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES) claiming Levitic lineage, which was apparently hereditary (I Sam. 1–3). Though the later theory that all cultic personnel must be of the clan Levi did not then obtain, Levites enjoyed a great prestige, no doubt because Moses himself was of that clan (cf. Judg. 17:7-13; 18:30). But since "Levite" could also refer to a class (i.e., one pledged by vow), men of various clans who were of this class came gradually to be reckoned to Levi (e.g., SAMUEL 1; cf. I Sam. 1:1; I Chr. 6:28).

c. The cult. As was true of all ancient religions, Israel's cult involved various kinds of sacrifice (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). Since our major source (Lev. 1–7) applied to the later temple, a precise description of early sacrificial ritual is impossible. In the wilderness it was certainly simple, and scarcely central, though it cannot be argued (e.g., from Jer. 7:21-23; Amos 5:21-27) that there was none. Since, as archaeology has shown, Hebrew sacrifice had many parallels with Canaanite practice, we may assume that as Israel entered Palestine and absorbed elements sedentary there, together with their shrines and cultic traditions, her worship was enriched by borrowing. Though this brought the danger that pagan rites, and a pagan theory of sacrifice, would creep in, borrowing was not indiscriminate (e.g., human sacrifice, fertility rites, the notion of sacrifice as food for the god or a thing opus operatum, were foreign to official Israelite theory), and what was borrowed was given the rationale of Yahwistic faith.

But at the heart of Israelite cultus was not sacrifice, but certain great annual feasts (Exod. 23:14-17; 34:18-24): PASSOVER; WEEKS; Ingathering (see BOOTHS, FEAST OF; see also FEASTS AND FASTS). All these were older than Israel and, except for Passover, of agricultural origin. But Israel gave them a new interpretation, making them no longer nature festivals but celebrations of Yahweh's historic acts in the Exodus. Though these feasts were probably celebrated locally as well as at Shiloh, there is evidence for a great annual feast at the central shrine at the New Year (Judg. 21:19; I Sam. 1:3, 21), when the tribesmen would bring their tribute to Yahweh. Probably in connection with this, perhaps every seven years (Deut. 31:9-13), there would be a ceremony of covenant renewal when Yahweh's acts were recited and his law read, and allegiance to him renewed. Israel's cult was thus no "history-less" maintainer of material well-being, but precisely a reminder of history. In connection with it, her sacred traditions (see TRADITION, ORAL) were repeated and given normative form.

d. Covenant law and its development. Since Israel's existence was based on her covenant with Yahweh, covenant law was a central factor in her life from the beginning (see LAW IN THE OT). Her legal tradition began with Moses and reached normative form in the earliest period; the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21–23; 34) represents the legal practice of the tribal league.

Laws fall into two general categories as regards form: casuistic ("if a man—," etc.) and apodictic ("thou shalt [not]"). The former have numerous parallels in the Mesopotamian law codes, while the latter—best seen in the Decalogue—are Israel's distinctive contribution and state the basic stipulations of covenant.

We may assume that as need arose to apply these stipulations to tangible situations, Israel drew upon the legal tradition of her environment. Most of this borrowing was done soon after the Conquest, and probably from elements of the same stock as her ancestors who had been absorbed by her, rather than from her Canaanite neighbors. But such borrowing was not indiscriminate; and the whole was made an expression of Israel's covenant faith.

Law was normally administered by the village elders in accordance with tradition. The priest had the duty of deciding hard cases (cf. Deut. 17:8-13), whether by oracle or by ordeal (Num. 5:11-31), or from superior knowledge of the law; he had also the duty of giving instruction on the basis of the law. The "minor judges" (Judg. 10:1-5; 12:8-15) may have been men chosen by the representatives of the clans to interpret the law as it concerned all Israel, and to adjudicate disputes between clans (see JUDGE).

C. FROM THE JUDGES TO THE EIGHTH CENTURY. This was a period of adjustment to new situations, of the disintegration of old patterns and the intrusion of new ones. Israel's religion was involved and, to some degree, its essential character threatened. Of the various forces in play, none was more significant than the supersession of the tribal league by the monarchy.

1. The rise of the monarchy and its significance. Israel was driven to set up a monarchy when the tribal league was destroyed by the Philistines late in the eleventh century (I Sam. 4). The change brought her material glory, but also an inner transformation of her society which affected her religion profoundly.

a. Organization of life under the crown. The monarchy brought the end of the old order. The first king, SAUL, a leader of the old type who was made king by popular acclamation (I Sam. 11), effected no essential change in Israel's structure. Because of his own instability, and his inability to overcome tribal independence and tensions between the old order and the new, he failed. But DAVID succeeded. First becoming king over Judah with Philistine consent and popular acclaim (II Sam. 2:1-4), he was later acclaimed king by the N tribes as well in solemn covenant (II Sam. 5:1-3); all Israel was thus united in the king's person. Seizing JERUSALEM, a city thitherto Canaanite, as his capital (II Sam. 5:6-10), he also conquered the other Canaanite cities of Palestine and incorporated them in the state, and subsequently won a sizable foreign empire. Since the state was created by David and centered in his person, it was necessary that a son succeed him—which SOLOMON did. The principle of charismatic leadership thus gave way to dynastic succession. As the state was progressively organized under the crown, the tribal system became of less practical importance, till finally (I Kings 4:7-19) it was replaced by twelve administrative districts. Though the tribal league lived on as a sacral tradition, the basis of social obligation was no longer Yahweh's covenant, but the state. A certain weakening of the covenant idea was inevitable.

b. Cultural adaptation. Adaptation had been going on since the Conquest first brought Israel into contact with the superior material culture of CANAAN. As she adopted the agrarian life, she was tempted to take up the practice of the fertility cult (see FERTILITY CULTS; BAAL [DEITY]), or to regard Yahweh as a god of fertility. This was especially so since she had absorbed into her structure peoples sedentary in the land, both Canaanites and others who were partly Canaanite in culture. Though these became worshipers of Yahweh, their local cults continued. There was thus always the danger that Israel's faith would assimilate beliefs and practices incompatible with it.

The monarchy speeded up the process. Jerusalem had been a Canaanite city with an ancient cultic tradition. Moreover, David and Solomon incorporated thousands of Canaanites into the state, most of whom became no more than nominal Yahwists, if that. As Solomon made treaties with surrounding lands, sealing them by marriage, the cults of his foreign wives were fostered in Jerusalem (I Kings 11:1-8). Most profitable of these treaties was that with TYRE, center of Canaanite culture. Solomon's TEMPLE, built by Canaanite architects (I Kings 7:13-14) on a Canaanite pattern, introduced in its symbolism many features thitherto foreign to Israel. Further, since Israel had no tradition of monarchy, she was forced to model the institutions of state in part on forms borrowed from outside, possibly via Canaanite mediation (see KING). Though these features were harmonized with the national religion, rites and concepts theretofore unknown were introduced. Withal, a reduction of stress on the events of the Exodus and Sinai as the foundations of faith and society was inevitable.

c. Social and economic changes. These were both sudden and drastic. Early Israel had been a nation of small farmers with little commerce and less industry. A clan society with none of the feudalism of the Canaanite states, she had no ruling class, no social distinctions or extremes of wealth and poverty. This was all changed. Solomon's commercial and industrial ventures, though state monopolies, raised the living standard of the nation and allowed some, especially by contrast, to grow rich. The court grew very rich. As royal projects drew people to the cities, urban population grew apace, with an attendant weakening of tribal ties and traditions. Moreover, the demands of state required a burden of taxation which bore heavily. Plagued by a chronic fiscal dilemma, Solomon ultimately drafted his subjects into forced labor for the state (I Kings 5:13-18)—a wholly "un-Israelite" measure. As life was regulated under the crown, and as Canaanites with a feudal background and no conception of the covenant order were absorbed, notions of aristocracy and class distinction began to intrude (I Kings 12:1-15). The solidarity of Israelite society was weakened.

d. The new religious center in Jerusalem. However great the break, David sought to link his state with the old order. By installing the ark (see ARK OF THE COVENANT) in Jerusalem (II Sam. 6), and by appointing ABIATHAR of the house of ELI as one of its two chief priests (II Sam. 20:25; cf. I Sam. 14:3; 22:20), he was able to advertise the state as the patron and protector of the national religious heritage. Solomon's temple added to its prestige. Although some (II Sam. 7:5-7) thought the temple a dangerous innovation, and although other shrines were freely tolerated, the link that was to bind the future of Israel's faith to Jerusalem had been forged. The temple was both the national shrine of the Israelite people and a royal installation, the dynastic shrine of the house of David. It was supported and controlled by the state (I Kings 2:26-27). While kingship in Israel did not follow patterns observable elsewhere in the ancient world, the KING played a central role in the cult (e.g., I Kings 8). An official state cult had begun. The dogma was developed that Yahweh had chosen Zion as his seat and promised to David an eternal dynasty (e.g., II Sam. 7:8-17; 23:1-7; I Kings 11:13, 32). This provided the monarchy with a sacral basis and harmonized it with Israel's ancestral faith.

The temple cult was early enriched as regards its SACRIFICES and FEASTS, and as regards MUSIC and psalmody (see POETRY [HEBREW]; PSALMS, BOOK OF; WORSHIP IN THE OT). Literary activity flourished as the traditions of the past were collected and written down. Works such as that of the Yahwist (see J) and the "Court History of David" (II Sam. 9–20: I Kings 1–2) were composed approximately in the reign of Solomon, while other tales of the heroic past were also given written form (see JUDGES, BOOK OF; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF).

2. Religion in the Divided Monarchy. Because of economic and sectional grievances, and because of tension between the old order and the new, the N tribes rebelled when Solomon died, and thereafter went their own way. Religious developments in the two states in some respects ran parallel, in others followed entirely different patterns.

a. Religion and the state in Judah. Throughout her history Judah remained loyal to the house of David. David, who had brought the nation to its Golden Age, in which the promise inherent in the national religion seemed all but fulfilled, made an unforgettable impression. Later generations idealized him and desired no future save in terms of a restoration of the glories of his rule.

The theological basis of the state was Yahweh's choice of Zion and David. Reaffirmed in the cult (e.g., Pss. 2; 72; 89; 110; 132), this became the national dogma. Each new KING was hailed at his accession as Yahweh's "son" (Ps. 2:7) whom Yahweh would defend. Though he was required to do justice (Ps. 72:1-4, 12-14) on pain of chastisement, the dynasty was eternal (Ps. 89:1-4, 19-37; II Sam. 7:12-16) and would triumph over all its foes (Pss. 2:10-11; 72:8-11; 110:5-6).

This dogma, plus the prestige of the temple with its Levitical tradition, gave to Judah a remarkable stability and helped to guard her from extremes of apostasy. Yet it meant a further shift from the ancient notion of covenant. The Davidic covenant was of a different type from that of Sinai, and in tension with it. In it—somewhat as in the patriarchal covenant—the relationship of God and nation was unconditional and based on promise. To suggest that the nation could fall was to suggest that Yahweh could break covenant. An obscuring of the reciprocal obligations of covenant was inevitable; stress shifted from obedience to covenant law to meticulous celebration of the ritual. As religion tended to become the maintainer of the national well-being, a subtle paganizing of Israel's faith entered in.

Yet it was in this official cult that hope and promise were given definitive form. The royal ideal, though cruelly frustrated by circumstance, was not surrendered but intensified. The hope persisted that a future king, perhaps the next one, would make the promises actual. As the element of promise indigenous to Israel's faith was shaped by the dynastic ideal, there were sown the seeds of the hope of the MESSIAH (see also ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT).

b. Religion and the state in Israel. The N state began without dynastic tradition or official cult. Nor was it ever permanently successful in establishing a dynasty; the notion of hereditary rule was in tension with the older tradition of the tribal league. Selection of kings by prophetic designation and popular acclamation (e.g., I Kings 11:26-40; 12:20), though increasingly a fiction, continued in principle at least till the days of Jehu (II Kings 9:1-13). The result of this was an extreme political instability. An official cult, however, was established. Both to counteract the prestige of Jerusalem and to provide his state with religious sanctions, JEROBOAM I designated (I Kings 12:26-33) BETHEL and DAN, both ancient cult places claiming a Levitical tradition, as official shrines. The former, at least, retained this status as long as Israel existed (Amos 7:10-13). At both, the invisible Yahweh was conceived as standing or enthroned on a bull (see CALF, GOLDEN). The bull, though conceptually a parallel of the cherubim (see CHERUB) of the Jerusalem temple (I Kings 8:6-7), had associations with the fertility cult and was thus an entering wedge for syncretistic tendencies. At Bethel, Jeroboam instituted an annual autumn festival to counteract the similar one held in Jerusalem. In all this Jeroboam probably built on ancient tradition and was able to pose as a reformer.

c. Paganizing tendencies in Israel. To these the N state was peculiarly liable. The greater part of the Canaanites absorbed by Israel was within her borders. And since the official shrines lacked the prestige of Jerusalem, other shrines, many with cults of pre-Mosaic origin, were equally popular. It was easy for pagan practices and notions to infiltrate the national religion. In many minds Yahweh and Baal differed but little. In the ninth century Israel was threatened with the official introduction of a foreign paganism when JEZEBEL, wife of AHAB 2, sought to make the cult of the Tyrian Baal the religion of the court. Many Israelites became overtly pagan, and those who resisted (see ELIJAH THE PROPHET; ELISHA) were persecuted. Though this threat was ended (II Kings 9–10) by the purge of JEHU 1, native varieties of paganism flourished unmolested. By the eighth century Israel, even her official cult, was shot through with pagan practices (cf. Hosea, passim). The notion of covenant had been so completely prostituted that the prophets could not appeal to it. Obligation was discharged by sacrifice and ritual (e.g., Amos 4:4-5; 5:21-24), and the promises—perhaps a survival of the patriarchal pattern of covenant—were regarded as unconditional. Israel hoped for the Day of Yahweh (see DAY OF THE LORD), when all the promises would be made actual (Amos 5:18-20); it was not believed that Yahweh could or would judge his people (Hos. 6:1-3).

d. Social disintegration. Society meanwhile progressively disintegrated. The trends begun with Solomon, though checked at times, were never reversed. As the tribal system became only a memory, as Canaanites of feudal background with no notion of covenant were absorbed, as the national religion was progressively paganized and its obligation satisfied by ritual, covenant law inevitably ceased to have meaning, and abuses ran wild. Though both Israel and Judah knew political and economic vicissitudes, in the mid-eighth century they were as well off as they had been since Solomon. But in Israel, at least, society was torn asunder (cf. Amos, passim). Wealthy landholders amassed property and dispossessed and enslaved the poor. The courts, disregarding covenant law, were instruments of injustice. Venality, dishonesty, personal immorality, and debauchery were the rule. Israel's society, uprooted from the pattern which had given it birth, was without moral standard. And though in Judah, where society was more homogeneous and less open to foreign influence, the schism was less severe, the same tendencies operated there also (cf. Isaiah and Micah, passim).

D. FROM THE EIGHTH CENTURY TO THE FALL OF JERUSALEM. Protest against these social trends was not slow in coming. About the middle of the eighth century there began the flowering of the prophetic movement in classical form. After the destruction of Israel and until the fall of Jerusalem in 587, this flowering continued, and there were several significant efforts at reform.

1. The first of the classical prophets. The prophets, though a new and creative phenomenon in the history of Israel's religion, are not to be described, as they so often have been, as the great spiritual pioneers who discovered ethical monotheism. On the contrary, they were heirs of a tradition centuries old who attacked abuses and pronounced judgment upon them in the light of the covenant faith of Israel's past (see PROPHET, PROPHETISM).

a. The earlier prophets. Prophets had been active in Israel since the days of Saul, when bands of them in ecstatic frenzy (I Sam. 10:5-6, 10-13) roused their fellows to fight the holy wars of Yahweh against the Philistine masters. Later we find them, at times on good terms with the state yet reserving the right to criticize it (e.g., II Sam. 7:1-17; 12:1-15; 24) in the light of a more ancient tradition (see NATHAN 2; GAD 1), at times taking direct action against it (e.g., I Kings 11:26-40). After the schism, they were active in both states, but especially in Israel, where the clan-league tradition was stronger. They knew a burst of activity during the Aramean wars of Ahab, when they both encouraged the king (I Kings 20:13-14, 28) and rebuked him (I Kings 20:35-42) in the light of the ancient tradition of the holy war. Jezebel's policy (see § C2*c above*) faced them with a crisis. As stout nationalists, they opposed it and met a persecution (I Kings 18:4) in the face of which some gave in. A schism thus arose in their ranks, with certain of them (see MICAIAH 3) obliged to oppose both the state and their fellow prophets as well (e.g., I Kings 22:1-28). Jehu's purge, which they backed (II Kings 9:1-10), probably satisfied most of them; making peace with the state, they placed their patriotic fervor at its disposal. As professional functionaries of court and shrine, many of them became venal, prostituting their office for reward (e.g., Mic. 3:5, 11). Though standing in the same ancient tradition, the classical prophets held these professionals in contempt, and broke with them (e.g., Amos 7:14-15; Mic. 3:5-8).

b. Prophets of the eighth century in Israel. The first two prophets, AMOS and HOSEA, addressed the N state in the generation before its fall. They attacked the national sin, Amos principally social injustice, Hosea principally syncretism and apostasy. They viewed this sin against the background of Yahweh's past gracious acts toward Israel (e.g., Amos 2:9-12; 3:1-2; Hos. 11:1-4; 13:4-6) and the obligations of covenant, the major stipulations of which idolatry and injustice had violated. Hosea classically described the covenant as Yahweh's marriage of Israel (e.g., 2:2-13), and her idolatry as unforgivable adultery. Rejecting the empty, paganized cult, and the notion that Yahweh's promises were unconditional (e.g., Amos 5:18-24), both preached a message of judgment. Though they called for penitence, they were sure that the nation was doomed. Yet, unlike their predecessors, neither they nor the prophets who followed them sought to overthrow the state by revolution: Yahweh, the divine Overlord, will execute sentence through foreign foes who are the agents of his judgment.

Yet, for all this, the note of promise was not given up. Though barely implicit in Amos, it is quite strong in Hosea, who told how Israel the faithless wife, disciplined in catastrophe, would again be betrothed to Yahweh (e.g., 2:14-23). Hope thus rested beyond calamity in a new gracious act of Yahweh like that of the Exodus.

c. Prophets of the eighth century in Judah. As Israel collapsed, the prophetic movement was carried forward in Judah by ISAIAH and MICAH. Their attack followed the pattern of Amos and Hosea, and likewise moved from an understanding of the reciprocal nature of Yahweh's covenant: all injustice, idolatrous practice, and rebellion against Yahweh was viewed as breaches of the covenant stipulations. Isaiah and Micah also attacked the external cult by which the nation hoped to satisfy God's demands (e.g., Isa. 1:10-20), and its corrupt clergy (e.g., Mic. 3:5-12). They preached a message of judgment, in the case of Micah (3:12)—and the young Isaiah, too (e.g., 5:1-7; 6:11-12)—as total as that of Amos.

But Isaiah, in particular, was influenced by the official theology of the Davidic covenant. His message was, in fact, a powerful reaffirmation of that theology, and a summons to the nation to trust in its promises. This explains his seemingly contradictory political advice: in 735/734 he begged AHAZ not to fear the coalition that sought to dethrone him, but to trust in his official theology and send no tribute to Assyria (7:1-9, 10-17; see IMMANUEL); in 714-711 he warned HEZEKIAH (1) not to rebel against Assyria, but to trust in Yahweh (e.g., 14:32; 18:1-6; 20); and, when rebellion was subsequently made (705-701), denounced it and the alliance with Egypt which supported it as rebellion against Yahweh (e.g., 28:14-22; 29:15; 30:1-17); and yet, when the Assyrians laid siege to Jerusalem, it was Isaiah who urged Hezekiah to hold out in reliance upon the promises to David (e.g., 37:21-29, 33-35). To Isaiah the sole hope of Judah was to trust in Yahweh (e.g., 30:15). And to this hope he gave a classical form. As in the Davidic covenant, sinful Judah will be disciplined, but not cast off utterly (e.g., 10:24-27, 28-34). The discipline will serve to purge her dross away, leaving a chastened and purified remnant (1:24-26; 10:20-21)—if no more than that (10:22-23). Isaiah's hope was positively expressed in terms of the dynastic ideal (9:2-7; 11:1-9), the promise of a just and victorious king of David's line who would establish Yahweh's eternal rule of peace. Here the hope of the Messiah, normative in later Judaism, took shape.

2. The reform movement in Judah. Judah had always oscillated between periods of religious laxity and efforts at reform. In the late eighth century, for a variety of reasons, the reform movement gained momentum.

a. The reform of Hezekiah. In submitting to Assyria, AHAZ had been forced to give official recognition to Assyria's gods (II Kings 16:5-20). Other pagan cults were also fostered (II Kings 16:2-4), and a time of religious laxity ensued. As the Assyrian cults were offensive not only to loyal Yahwists but to all patriotic citizens as well, Hezekiah's struggle for independence naturally led to their removal, and also awakened a nationalistic reaction against all religious features considered foreign. Prophetic threats of a fate for Jerusalem similar to that of Samaria (Mic. 3:12; cf. Jer. 26:16-19) also played a part. Pagan cults of all kinds were abolished (II Kings 18:1-7), and even (vs. 4) objects of ancient origin thitherto thought unobjectionable (see NEHUSHTAN). Effort was also made (cf. vss. 4, 22) to close outlying shrines of Yahweh where pagan practices had flourished. Further, moved by the dream of an Israel once more united under the throne of David, Hezekiah made an attempt—with indifferent success—to induce the N tribes to participate (II Chr. 30:1, 10-12). The Assyrian's reconstitution of the shrine of Bethel (II Kings 17:25-28) was quite likely a countermeasure to this. See HEZEKIAH 1.

Hezekiah's reform did not endure; the people were not ready for it. When MANASSEH (2) resumed loyalty to Assyria, the Assyrian cults were reinstated, and a period of general apostasy ensued (II Kings 21:1-16). All sorts of pagan rites, including those of the fertility cult, DIVINATION, MAGIC, and even human sacrifice (vs. 6), were fostered. The heavenly bodies (vs. 5) were apparently regarded as members of the pantheon and accorded worship (see HOST OF HEAVEN). Israel's religion was in danger of becoming a polytheism. Those who protested were apparently (vs. 16) repressed, and the reform movement driven underground.

b. The reform of Josiah. The collapse of Assyria during the reign of JOSIAH left Judah free, and this was the signal for the most sweeping reform of her history. Josiah's reform, like Hezekiah's, was in part a facet of resurgent nationalism aimed at purging the nation of everything foreign. It also had the support of such prophets as ZEPHANIAH (1) and JEREMIAH, both of whom pronounced judgment on the nation for its idolatry. It fed, too, on the uneasiness which world events had awakened, and which evoked in Judah as elsewhere a search for security in the surer things of the past. The reform had been in progress for some years (II Chr. 34:3, 8) when (in 622) it was given new impetus and direction by the discovery, in the course of the purification of the temple, of a "book of the law" (II Kings 22:3–23:3). This was almost certainly some form of the book of DEUTERONOMY, whose laws reach back ultimately to the legal tradition of the tribal league and which, apparently handed down in N Israel, had presumably been brought to Jerusalem after the fall of Samaria and re-edited there in the reign of Hezekiah or Manasseh. Reflecting faithfully the reciprocal nature of the Mosaic covenant, Deuteronomy declares that the national hope lies in keeping covenant, while idolatry and disobedience lead inevitably to ruin.

The reform was thus a rediscovery of the Mosaic covenant and an attempt to put it into practice. It issued (II Kings 23:4-14, 21-25) in a ruthless purge of all pagan cults and practices, both native and foreign. It also abolished shrines of Yahweh throughout Judah and centralized all worship in Jerusalem (vs. 8). As Josiah annexed the territory of the erstwhile N state, the reform was extended there also (II Kings 23:15-20; II Chr. 34:6-7). The ideal of a purified Israel united under the throne of David seemed in fair way to be realized. The reform had the good effect of ridding the land, if only temporarily, of pagan practices. And, since the demands of the law were moral, and since Josiah was himself a just man (Jer. 22:15-16), the worst social abuses were certainly checked. Centralization was, however, resisted and never accepted by many (II Kings 23:9), while in Jerusalem, whose clergy had gained an unhealthy monopoly, the reform tended to issue in purely cultic activity (e.g., Jer. 6:16-21; 7:21-23). The written law was elevated at the expense of the prophetic word (Jer. 8:8-9); and the confidence grew that, the demands of covenant law having been met by cultic reform and ritual, the national safety had been secured (Jer. 6:14; 8:11).

3. The last days of Judah. With Josiah's death in 609 (II Kings 23:29-30) Judah's independence ended. Subject first to Egypt, then to Babylon, she was destroyed by the latter in 587 after a prior deportation in 597. These events put Israel's faith to its severest test.

a. The spiritual crisis of Judah. Josiah's violent death and the end of independence seemed to many a contradiction of the Deuteronomic theology. Under JEHOIAKIM the reform, already wearing thin, was abandoned, and pagan cults returned in force. Yet clergy and people alike clung to the official dogma that the national safety was assured by the presence of Yahweh's temple (Jer. 7:4) and by his promises to David. To deny this was to accuse him of breaking covenant (Jer. 26:8-11). Down to the end a miraculous intervention was expected (Jer. 21:2) as in the days of Hezekiah (Isa. 37:36-37). The fall of the nation threw the truth of the national religion, as popularly understood, into question. Why has Yahweh not been faithful to his promises? Has he been defeated by mightier gods? Or is it that he is not just (Jer. 31:29; Lam. 5:7; Ezek. 18:2, 25, 29)? If the tragedy could not be interpreted in terms of Yahweh's power and justice, Israel's faith would perish.

b. Prophets of the last days of Judah. Israel's faith was saved in good part by prophets who addressed the nation in its darkest hour. In all of them (see JEREMIAH; EZEKIEL; HABAKKUK; LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF) the problem of the divine justice is to the fore. All, though in different ways, explained the calamity as Yahweh's righteous judgment on the national sin. This is almost the whole burden of Jeremiah, who, declaring that covenant had been broken, rejected the popular trust in the permanence of temple (7:1-15) and dynasty (21:12–22:30) utterly. He saw the Babylonians as the instruments of divine judgment (e.g., 4:5-8, 11-18; 5:10-17), and called Judah to accept their yoke (chs. 27–28); since she would not do this, he pronounced her doom. Ezekiel, too, declared (chs. 8–11) that Yahweh had quitted his temple and doomed the nation for its sins; the calamity was not only his doing, but positively his vindication of himself as righteous and sovereign Lord (14:21-23; 20:33-38). Explained thus, tragedy could not destroy Israel's faith.

The prophets prepared for the survival of faith in other ways. Jeremiah's rejection of the official cult and his insistence on a repentant heart (e.g., 4:4, 14; cf. Ezek. 18:31, etc.), prepared for the time when faith must go on without cult—a thing to the ancient mind impossible. Ezekiel's individualizing of the problem of the divine justice (ch. 18), mechanical though it seems, served to release men from a fatalistic burden of inherited guilt and from the despair into which they had fallen (33:10; 37:11). The summons of both to individual decision laid the foundation for a new community of faith, the old national-cultic community having been destroyed. And both assured their people that God had not forsaken them even in the land of their exile (e.g., Jer. 29:10-14; Ezek. 11:16). Both regarded the Exile as an interim, a purification, out of which Yahweh would call his people as once from Egypt (e.g., Jer. 24; Ezek. 20:33-38). Hope to both of them thus lay in a new act of divine grace, creating a new and purified people: to Jeremiah (31:31-34) the making of a new covenant, to Ezekiel (e.g., ch. 37) the resurrection of the dead nation by Yahweh's spirit and the establishment with it of an eternal COVENANT of peace. Exiled Israel was thus not left hopeless, but could look forward to the promise of a new future.

E. THE EXILE AND BEYOND. The EXILE was a watershed in the history of Israël's religion. While the postexilic community in no sense broke with the faith of old Israel, it nevertheless gave that faith a new form. In the Exile and beyond it, Judaism was born.

1. Israel in exile. In 587 Jewish life in Palestine was totally disrupted. Though Jews continued to live around about Jerusalem, they were few and poor. It was with the exiles in Babylon, though themselves not very numerous, that the future of faith rested.

a. The Exile and Israel's faith. Grievous emergency though the Exile was, Israel's faith persisted through it with an amazing tenacity. The legal, cultic, and historical traditions of the past were jealously guarded, handed down, and, in some cases, edited (e.g., the historical corpus, Deuteronomy through Kings) during the Exile. The sayings of the prophets were likewise preserved and their collection carried forward, for in these the exiles found both explanation of their plight, and hope. Yet, for all that, the danger to faith remained grave. Many still viewed the national disaster as proof of Yahweh's powerlessness, and these were acutely tempted to turn to the worship of the presumably mightier gods of Babylon (cf. Ezek. 20:32; Isa. 40–48, passim). Moreover, the Exile had uprooted Israel and opened before her vast new horizons. Her faith could no longer continue as a national cult with limited national perspective; it had to adapt itself, to understand its position with relation to the great nations and their gods as never before, if it was to survive.

b. Reinterpretation of Israel's faith: Second Isaiah. As Babylon was about to fall to Cyrus (539), the so-called Second Isaiah (see ISAIAH) supplied both the needed adaptation and the profoundest interpretation of the national suffering that had yet been given. With the comforting assurance that the penalty for sin had now been paid, he declared that the Exile was soon to end (e.g., 40:1-11). There had been no "divorce" between Yahweh and Israel (50:1; ch. 54); Yahweh would now for the sake of his honor and purpose forgive her and come to her rescue (42:18–43:7; 43:8–44:5; ch. 48). There would be a great new exodus (e.g., 43:14-21; 48:20-21), with Yahweh leading his flock in triumphal procession through the desert back to Zion, there to establish his kingly rule of peace (e.g., 52:1-12). Hebrew monotheism is here given clearest expression. The gods of the nations are not gods at all; none is God but Yahweh, who is creator, who alone has prepared a purpose in history and can bring it to fruition (chs. 40–48). Even Cyrus is the unknowing instrument of that purpose (44:24–45:8). Israel is Yahweh's chosen witness before the world that he is God (e.g., 43:8-13); it is his intention that all people will see his mighty acts and recognize him as such (e.g., 45:9-25). Yet Israel's role is not to be a passive one; she is to be Yahweh's servant to bring the light of his rule to the nations (e.g., 42:1-9; 49:1-6). The notes of promise and of obligation inherent in Israel's faith, as well as her exclusive recognition of Yahweh as God, were thus placed in world-wide perspective.

In the figure of the SERVANT OF THE LORD the prophet gave the national suffering and the national hope profound reinterpretation (especially 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13–53:12). Yahweh's purpose is to triumph through his Servant, who, persecuted and rejected, brings the light of his truth to the world, and who, having made himself a sin offering (53:10), is vindicated and victorious. Israel's hope was thus given an entirely novel pattern quite different from the popular one, and one richly played upon in the NT. While the Servant is more than a picture of suffering Israel, the calling of the Servant is nevertheless hers (e.g., 50:10); as she obeys this calling, her sufferings vicariously serve God's redemptive purpose.

2. The rise of Judaism. Having conquered Babylon, Cyrus allowed the Jews to re-establish their life in Palestine, and a number of them returned thither. After many difficulties the TEMPLE was rebuilt (520-516) and its cult resumed. But it was not until the coming of EZRA (3), approximately a century later, that the community was organized in stable form. In that community the beliefs and practices of Judaism developed.

a. The holy people: particularism vs. universalism. The postexilic community was a church rather than a nation. It understood itself as the remnant of Israel, called by God's grace out of bondage in the new exodus and summoned to live as his people under his law. This obligation it formally assumed in solemn covenant with Ezra as its representative (Neh. 8–10). It saw as its destiny, therefore, to realize in itself the covenant ideal of a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exod. 19:6). It was not a national unit or, strictly speaking, an ethnic one—there were foreigners and proselytes (e.g., Isa. 56:1-8) in its midst—but a community bounded by covenant and law. Since the Jews were surrounded by pagans on all sides, the danger of assimilation had to be combatted vigorously (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 13:15-31) lest they be swallowed up altogether. This led to a growing particularism and a tension with the universalism implicit in monotheistic faith. Jews tended to draw apart from GENTILES, from SAMARITANS, and even from those of their own number who did not keep the law. Proselytes (see PROSELYTE) were welcomed (e.g., Isa. 56:6-8; 66:18-21; Zech. 8:20-23) and accorded equality before the law (cf. Lev. 19:34; 24:22); and before NT times vast numbers of them had been made. Yet Judaism did not become an actively missionary religion; the tendency was to look down on the Gentiles and to wish as few dealings with them as possible—a tendency rebuked in the book of JONAH. This tension was one which continued unresolved in Judaism, and which carried over into the infant church.

b. The idea of God. In Judaism monotheism triumphed completely. While there were always Jews who readily yielded to foreign customs, the hard core of Judaism turned from paganism and idolatry resolutely. The tendency was to exalt GOD yet more and more. Although ANTHROPOMORPHISM in describing him could not be dispensed with, later OT literature shows a noticeable trend away from it. The divine name, Yahweh, came to be considered ineffable; various substitutes for it, and devices to guard one from pronouncing it, were developed. There was much reflection on God's acts of creation and providence, as seen, e.g., in the later PSALMS and WISDOM literature. There was a profound devotional piety, again illustrated in the later psalms, and an equally profound concern for the conduct of the good life, seen especially in the later wisdom literature. A tendency to find an almost mechanical relationship between one's deeds—specifically one's observance of the law—and one's fortunes, whether good or ill, evoked an early protest in the book of JOB, and later in a much more skeptical vein in ECCLESIASTES. Yet in all this Judaism had no doubt that her God alone was God, sovereign in all things and just in all his ways. See WORSHIP IN THE OT.

As God was exalted above his creation, great play was allowed for the role of angelic beings (Yahweh had always had his heavenly host) in carrying out his will (see ANGEL; HOST OF HEAVEN); at least by the Maccabean period (cf. Dan. 12:1) these had become distinct personalities. Partly from reflection on the problem of theodicy, partly owing to outside influence, the figure of SATAN, originally a member of Yahweh's court whose function it was to accuse evildoers (e.g., Job 1-2; Zech. 3:1-2), emerged as the great adversary of God who tempts men to evil (cf. II Sam. 24:1; I Chr. 21:1). By the immediate pre-Christian centuries (see APOCALYPTICISM; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; ESSENES) a dualistic tendency which viewed the world as a battleground of good and evil, light and darkness, had established itself. Yet no proper dualism emerged, for even here God remained the sovereign Lord in whose providence all things occur.

c. The future hope of Judaism. Hope for the future, always present in Israel's faith, continued; expressing itself partly in inherited forms, partly in new ones, it issued in a complex eschatology (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA). The old national hope of the messianic king early attached itself (Hag. 2:20-23; Zech. 6:9-14) to ZERUBBABEL, only to be bitterly disappointed. It seems thereafter to have been pushed somewhat into the background. Although it continued strong till NT times and after, it was divorced from the existing order and attached to the new order which God would establish at the end of history (on the notion of a messiah of Levi, or of Joseph, see MESSIAH; on the notion of new covenant as taken up by Jewish sects, see ESSENES; DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Later Hebrew prophecy turned almost entirely from present history to the last events of Yahweh's judgment and the establishment of his triumphant rule (e.g., Isa. 24-27; Ezek. 38-39; Joel [see JOEL, BOOK OF]; Zech. 9-14 [see ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF]). As prophecy died out, and as hope was shaped by concepts borrowed from outside, there issued the phenomenon of APOCALYPTICISM, a literature which is concerned to describe in cryptic language, usually under the device of pseudonymity, the final cosmic struggle between God and evil. First instanced in the second century B.C. (see DANIEL), it flourished through the first century A.D. (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA; REVELATION, BOOK OF). In this literature there appears the figure of the SON OF MAN, originally a corporate representation of the true Israel (Dan. 7:13-14), but later (see ENOCH, BOOK OF) a pre-existent heavenly deliverer who would come in glory at the end of days.

Probably in good part from reflection on the problem of justice, Judaism began to develop a belief in the RESURRECTION, a thing unknown in old Israel. The concept itself was a borrowed one, but it was adapted to the faith of Judaism. First appearing (Isa. 26:19) as a resurrection of the faithful, the notion of a resurrection both to eternal life and to eternal shame was developed (Dan. 12:2) and became popular in Judaism. But this was not yet unanimously accepted in NT times (e.g., Mark 12:18-27; Acts 23:6-10).

d. The place of the law in Judaism. The most characteristic feature of Judaism was its stress on keeping the law (see LAW [IN THE OT; IN FIRST-CENTURY JUDAISM]). In fact, to be a Jew was to keep the law. The obligations of covenant law had been a primitive feature in Israel's religion; in Judaism this received a logical but one-sided development. The prophets had explained the Exile as a result of breach of covenant law; and this naturally led men to take law more seriously, especially since, cult and nation having been destroyed, the law alone remained as the mark of a Jew. And the postexilic community had been constituted (Neh. 8-10) precisely in a covenant committing it to the observance of the (now written) law. As hope of the reconstitution of the old order was given up, and hope pushed to the end of history, the law was accorded absolute validity for regulating conduct in the present age. Not only was covenant obligation to be fulfilled and God's favor gained by the keeping of it; it became virtually the whole content of obligation. Though the temple cult was carried on—the law specified it!—it became of somewhat vestigial importance; the old Levitical function of teaching was far more central. Every village had its SYNAGOGUE, where the law was read and expounded. The law superseded both priestly lot and technical oracle, and prophetic word, as the giver of the divine will; prophecy ceased in Israel.

Judaism gradually developed a fixed, if unofficial, canon of scripture (see CANON OF THE OT). The PENTATEUCH had authoritative status from the time of Ezra or soon after; and to this were subsequently added the books of the prophets. By the second century B.C. most of the books of the OT as we know it were regarded as holy scripture. But the Pentateuch, as law par excellence, retained the pre-eminent position. Judaism became a religion of the Book, committed to the observance of written law; the highest virtue was the study and keeping of it (cf. Pss. 1; 19:7-14; 119; etc.). As effort was made to apply the law to tangible situations, there gradually arose a body of oral law aimed at further defining its meaning. There was also the desire to build a "fence" around the law lest it be broken inadvertently. As law grew more massive, there arose a class of scribes (see SCRIBE; RABBI)—in NT times mostly PHARISEES—who devoted themselves wholly to studying it and teaching it. Although the oral law grew apart from the priestly class (see SADDUCEES) in general, it became the hallmark of Judaism and was ultimately crystallized in the TALMUD. The law expressed the Jewish ideal of a people holy to God; it enabled Judaism to survive when its temple and cult were finally destroyed (A.D. 70). The NT, however, affirms that this whole history of faith found its conclusion in Christ, who is the fulfilment of its law and its hope, and who gave to his church, the Israel according to the Spirit, the awaited new covenant. See CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY; CHURCH, IDEA OF.

Bibliography. J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I–II (1926); III–IV (1940). M. Noth, Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels (1930); Die Gesetze im Pentateuch (1940; reprinted, Gesammelte Studien zum AT [1957], pp. 9-141). A. Alt, Der Gott der Väter (1921; reprinted, Kleine Schriften, I [1953], 1-78): fundamental for religion of the patriarchs; Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts (1934; reprinted, Kleine Schriften, I [1953], 278-332). H. W. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the OT (1946). G. E. Wright, The OT Against Its Environment (1950); "The Faith of Israel," IB, I (1952), 349-89. J. Muilenburg, "The History of the Religion of Israel," IB, I (1952), 292-348: a convenient treatment with further bibliography including older works. H. J. Kraus, Gottesdienst in Israel (1954). G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (1955): important for the covenant form and its history. S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (English trans.; 1956). H. H. Rowley, The Faith of Israel (1956). W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (3rd ed., 1953); From the Stone Age to Christianity (3rd ed., 1957): both of fundamental importance. B. W. Anderson, Understanding the OT (1957): an excellent popular treatment. W. Eichrodt, "Religionsgeschichte Israels," Historia Mundi, II (n.d.), 377-448; Theologie des ATs, I (5th ed., 1957); II–III (2nd ed., 1948). J. BRIGHT

HEBREWS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE. A lost Greek gospel current in the Decapolis and Egypt in the second century, probably to be identified with the Gospel of the Ebionites (see EBIONITES, GOSPEL OF), and quite distinct from the Aramaic targum of the Greek Matthew known as the Gospel of the Nazarenes. See NAZARENES, GOSPEL OF.

Eusebius refers to this writing several times. Among the books which some Christians reject was counted the "Gospel according to the Hebrews in which those of the Hebrews who have accepted Christ take special pleasure" (Hist. III.25.5). The Ebionites who "wholly rejected Paul and called him an apostate from the law . . . used only the gospel called According to the Hebrews and made little account of the rest" (Hist. III.27.4). That this writing was current in the second century is evidenced by the fact that Hegesippus made extracts from it (Euseb. Hist. IV.22.8). That it was known in Egypt is evidenced from citations from it by both Clement and Origen.

Owing in no small part to Jerome's mistaken claim to have "translated into Greek and Latin speech" the Gospel According to the Hebrews "which Origen often uses" (On Illustrious Men 2), and to the medley of citations which he appropriates, in part from those which Origen had made of this gospel, in part from those apparently made by Apollinaris from the totally distinct Gospel of the Nazarenes, the widest confusion as to the nature and content of the Gospel According to the Hebrews has prevailed. This confusion is heightened by Jerome's word: "In the gospel which the Nazarenes and Ebionites use, which I have lately translated into Greek from the Hebrew, and which is called by most people the original of Matthew" (On Matt. 12:13). Many have regarded it as parallel to, if not actually anterior to, our canonical gospels and a source of at least equal historical value. Few would so regard it today. That it, like the other apocryphal gospels, is subsequent to and heavily dependent upon the canonical four may be safely hazarded. The results of certain researches would seem to warrant extreme caution in any attempt to reconstruct its content from the citations by Jerome. Most of the latter may safely be ascribed to the Gospel of the Nazarenes; Jerome has taken these quotations from Apollinaris' commentaries.

Apparently this Greek Gospel According to the Hebrews, while heavily dependent upon Matthew, was a totally different book. According to the Stichometry of Nicephorus, it was approximately three hundred stichoi shorter than our Matthew. Dependence upon Luke-Acts is as marked as upon Matthew. Quotations from Hegesippus, Origen, and Eusebius indicate that the writing was the product of Jewish-Christian thought of the sort properly styled Ebionite. James was the central figure, presented in sharp and even hostile contrast to Paul, and clearly outranked Peter. It was to James, not to Peter, that Jesus made his first postresurrection appearance. Apparently Peter was not regarded as the chief of the Twelve. In the list of the Twelve, John's name is first, Simon's third.

While many of the citations from Jerome, which have commonly been regarded as from this gospel and which have tended to suggest its marked similarity to our Matthew, must be left aside when attempting to discover its content and nature, the quotations from soberer and more reliable writers are revealing. According to Eusebius (Theophany 4.2), it contained a variant tradition of the parable of the entrusted funds ("talents," "pounds"). Clearly dependent upon both the Matthean and Lukan forms of this parable, it shows the evidence of later reflection. Three servants are distinguished: one multiplied his money by trading; one hid it and returned it intact but without increase; one squandered it on harlots and flute girls. The second received a rebuke; it was to the third that the severer penalty was given. Eusebius also records (Hist. III.37.17) that this gospel contained the story of the woman taken in adultery, originally a part of none of our canonical gospels, but now standing in many MSS in John, in some in Luke. That the story was not unlike one told by Papias is remarked by Eusebius, but the conclusion reached by many scholars that Papias had drawn it from the Gospel According to the Hebrews is utterly unwarranted and highly improbable.

Origen twice cites from this gospel a word of Jesus: "Even now did my mother the Holy Spirit take me by one of my hairs and carried me away unto the great mountain Tabor . . ." (On John 2:12; On Jeremiah, homily 15.4). That this is but a bit of haggadic amplification of the story of the Temptation, suggested by the famed experiences of Ezekiel (Ezek. 8:3) and Habakkuk (Bel 33-39), would seem obvious. The saying, twice quoted by Clement but in slightly variant forms, is of interest, if not revelatory of the essential nature of this gospel: "He that wondereth shall reign, and he that reigneth shall rest" (Misc. I.9.45), and: "He shall not cease from seeking until he find, and having found he will be amazed, and having been amazed he will reign, and having reigned he will rest" (Misc. V.14.96). This saying is identical with one of the OXYRHYNCHUS SAYINGS OF JESUS and has suggested to many scholars the possibility that the latter sayings are essentially excerpts from this lost gospel.

The suggestion that the title "Gospel According to the Hebrews" was the one given it by its author, and the alternative proposal that it was an indication of its original language, are both equally unlikely. Rather, the title would seem to reflect the disparaging recognition on the part of those who knew and rejected this gospel, that it was the gospel belonging to the Jewish Christians and employed by them. Origen's cautious preface to quotations from it: "And if any accept the Gospel according to the Hebrews," or: "If any accept that saying," may well reflect his own awareness that while this writing was not heretical in the sense that many of the apocrypha were, it was yet far from akin to those commonly accepted by the orthodox. If the tone was as anti-Pauline as has been suggested, his caution is not surprising.

Bibliography. For a somewhat different appraisal, see M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 1-9 (which collects all the traditional quotations). Other rewarding studies are to be found in E. Hennecke, Handbuch zu den neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (1904); A. Schmidtke, Judenchristliche Evangelien (1911); B. W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (1930), especially pp. 478-95; J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums (1950).

M. S. ENSLIN

HEBREWS, HISTORY OF. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

HEBREWS, LETTER TO THE [πρὸς Ἑβραίους]. In most editions the nineteenth book of the NT canon, being placed between the thirteen letters of Paul and the Catholic letters. So it is located in the Latin MSS, but most of the Greek MSS have it between II Thessalonians and I Timothy. Although we call Hebrews a "letter," it has no author's name and no addressee, nor can we recognize any specific occasion or purpose. There is no prescript and the letter commences immediately with a theological treatise; but it ends with greetings. It was not written by Paul; style, form, and Christology speak against such authorship, and nothing speaks for it (see § 3 below).

The Western part of the early church refused until the end of the fourth century to acknowledge the canonicity of Hebrews because it was not written by Paul. Later the Western church accepted the Eastern theory of its Pauline origin. It was not before Augustine accepted the canon, which Athanasius had laid down in his Thirty-ninth Easter Letter (367), and Pope Innocent I (405) agreed upon all twenty-seven books, that Hebrews became a fully acknowledged part of the NT canon in East and West.

1. Composition and contents
2. Form and purpose
3. Authorship, destination, and date
4. Theological significance
   a. Eschatology
   b. Christology
   c. The admonitions
5. Historical setting
Bibliography

1. Composition and contents. It has been said that our letter presents in many respects the "riddle of the NT," that it is solitary among early Christian writings, "without father, without mother, and without genealogy."

At first sight we have an uncomplicated composition:

I. The superiority of the Son over angels and Moses, 1:1-4:13
II. Jesus the true High Priest, 4:14-6:20
III. Jesus and his sacrifice, 7:1-10:18
IV. Exhortations for steadfastness in faith, 10:19-12:29
V. Different exhortations and final salutation, ch. 13

Some scholars prefer another outline and try to find the rhetorical pattern of later Greek admonitory speeches: the "Prooimion" (chs. 1-4); the "Diegesis" (chs. 5-6); the "Parenesis" (chs. 7-10); the "Epilogos" (chs. 11-13). Yet there are only a few phrases in Hebrews which justify the rhetorical scheme as underlying the letter.

Though christological parts are regularly followed by parenetical (or hortatory) ones, the author does not fail to include admonitions even inside the dogmatical sections (2:1 ff; 3:7 ff; 5:11 ff). Indeed, it seems as if Christology is used as a means for the support of the exhortations. There is a constant rhythm between theology and moral appeal, which reminds one somewhat of passages in IV Maccabees and Philo. The whole thus can be called a "word of exhortation" (13:22), although the theological and christological parts are of special significance. An older tradition of confessional formulas is taken up and organically included (e.g., 1:3; 4:12-13; 7:3, 26; 13:14).

The integrity of the letter is not questionable, except the final verses (13:22-25), which have a noticeable Pauline touch not to be found anywhere else in the book. Yet this could be by chance, and the phrase "those who come from Italy" says nothing for or against the authenticity (for reasons against, see § 2 below).

2. Form and purpose. It is significant that neither the word "letter" (ἐπιστολή) nor the term "to write" (γράφειν) occurs. Instead, we find the terms "word," "speech," "proclamation" (λόγος). No specific references to the concrete situation of the original readers are present. The general remarks about the neglect of their meetings (10:25) and the enduring of persecutions (10:32-34) could probably be made about many of the larger congregations of the postapostolic age. The admonition about the singleness of penitence, beginning with 5:11, referring to the dullness of the hearers—"You need milk, not solid food" (vs. 12)—seems to have no concrete addressee, since in 6:9 the author asserts: "Yet in your case, beloved, we feel sure of better things that belong to salvation." Thus it may be said that Hebrews is a unique book in the NT canon, especially as regards its literary character. To use the categories of A. Deissmann, one is obliged to say it is not a real "letter," but an "epistle"—i.e., a literary piece of art meant for general reading (cf. CLEMENT, EPISTLE OF). The final salutation (13:22-25), alone speaking against such a literary evaluation, could be explained as the attempt to transform the "epistle" into a "letter." See LETTER.

The epistolary character does not exclude the possibility, and even probability, that a sermon or lecture has been used. The exceptionally good style and the acquaintance with the rhetorical forms of Hellenism, features which Hebrews has in common with Philo or the Wisdom of Solomon, suggest the teacher or preacher. The many changes from the "we" to the "you" and to the individual "I" point in the same direction. The assumption then would be that we have before us a written sermon, which in its form and style is akin to the Jewish-Hellenistic homily of the synagogue. This does not require that Hebrews was originally composed as one sermon—namely, on Pss. 94–110—to which the phrase (2:1) "to what we have heard" could refer. On the contrary, it is more probable that we have in this epistle several sermons combined and collected by the author himself.

The form is further characterized by an extensive use of the OT in the LXX, although the author does not stay with the verbal text (1:8 may have a corrupted text; passages from Deuteronomy in 1:6; 10:30; 12:15; 13:5 are not quoted according to the LXX). Out of thirty-two quotations ten are taken from Psalms. In addition there are many allusions. The method is primarily marked by a christological interpretation (see, e.g., 1:5 ff; 2:6 ff, 12 ff; 10:5 ff) which uses different exegetical approaches: the allegorical exegesis, following Philo, is often used (e.g., 7:2-3; 13:10-14; see also 3:6; 10:20; 12:22), but the typological exegesis is predominant. When Moses and Jesus are discussed together in 3:1-6, it is more a case of simple comparison; but the whole passage 7:1–10:18 is a typological section. In 8:6-13 the Old Covenant is the type for the New Covenant as antitype. And the motif of I Cor. 10:1-10 is repeated in Heb. 3:7–4:13—the Israel of the wilderness being presented as the typological figure of the Christian church. All this is not only a matter of form, but of theological significance, insofar as the author regards Christianity in the historical continuity with Israel and Judaism, despite his constant stress upon its superiority.

3. Authorship, destination, and date. There is common agreement today that Paul is not the author of Hebrews. A long history of assertions and hypotheses has led to this point. It is possible that Clement of Rome (although similarities between Clement and Hebrews can be explained by the use by both of traditional liturgical formulas), and the "Shepherd of Hermas" knew Hebrews; but Marcion, the Roman presbyter Gaius (Euseb. Hist. VI.20.3), and the Muratorian Fragment do not mention the epistle. The earliest witness is Clement of Alexandria (Euseb. Hist. VI.14.4), who mentions the title προς Ἑβραίους and tells that Paul wrote the letter in the Hebrew language, while Luke translated it into Greek. He further tries to explain why Paul did not mention his own name at the beginning, by asserting that in writing to Hebrews the apostle wished to avoid arousing in them a possible antagonism, especially since he was known as the Apostle to the Gentiles. Origen follows the same tradition, but obviously has his doubts. He differentiates: the ideas are Pauline; the expression and style come from somebody else. He concludes: "Who really wrote the letter is known to God alone" (Euseb. Hist. VI.25). Tertullian (De Pudicitia 20) brings up the name of Barnabas as the author of the Letter to the Hebrews—a theory which has had its advocates even up to present times. Luther suggested Apollos; Calvin either Clement of Rome or Luke. W. Manson has suggested that our letter could be rooted in a circle like the one reflected in the speech of Stephen in Acts.

Hebrews was taken as Pauline until the Reformation, when Erasmus vigorously fought for a change in this opinion. The Tridentinian Council (April 8, 1546) decided for the Pauline authorship; the Pontifical Bible Commission of Rome (June 24, 1914) added, however, that one is not obliged to assume that Paul gave to the letter its final form. Who then is the author? We do not have the sources any longer to make a clear decision, except that it is not Paul. All other theories are no more than possibilities. The question then arises, whether we can approximately determine the spiritual atmosphere out of which the author wrote (see § 4 below).

On the basis of the title "To the Hebrews" the first readers were understood to be Jewish Christians. Yet nothing can be derived from the title as such, which originally was outside the rolled papyrus letter and probably was never copied. It seems as if the present title is a mere hypothesis derived from the content of the letter. Special Jewish Christian features are missing. No references are made to circumcision or worship of the temple or ritual law in general. The general acquaintance with the OT was the same with Gentile Christians.

As places to which the epistle was sent, Alexandria, Rome, Palestine, and, more specifically, Jerusalem, have been mentioned. The considerations which speak against Jewish Christians speak also against Jerusalem. A Hellenistic milieu is more probable. For Alexandria no weighty arguments can be given, except perhaps that atmosphere and terminology point to a kinship with Philo's writing. But this would say nothing as to the original readers, although it might give a hint as to the spiritual home of the author.

For Rome as destination, more can be said. Not only has I Clement the earliest allusion to Hebrews, but it is also noteworthy that Rome always preserved a tradition that Paul was not the author. The salutation by "those who come from Italy" (13:24) goes better with the assumption that these were living outside Italy and sending their greetings homeward. (For the opposite thesis, see Codex A in its subscription: "written from Rome.") Some of the exhortations —they have endured and must still endure persecution (10:32 ff; 12:4); they stood in specific need of steadfastness; they must be loyal to the confessions, having patience in view of the nearness of the end—such admonitions, though reflecting the general situation of Christianity at the end of the first century, would support the Rome hypothesis. On the other hand, nothing is said explicitly about the Neronian persecution, nothing about Peter's and Paul's martyrdom (13:7 should not be used as a reference!). Although nothing can be said conclusively, Rome as the place of destination has the highest probability.

What can be said about the date? Some scholars have argued from silence that Peter and Paul were still alive, since Nero's persecution is not mentioned, and one should—Rome as destination being presupposed—go back to the time ca. A.D. 60. Other scholars have assumed that the Jewish cult was still going on and the temple not yet destroyed, since Hebrews refers to these in the present tense. But today it is agreed that the present tense was always demanded for the interpretation of the Jewish law, as can be seen with Josephus, Mishna, and Talmud. Further, it is apparent that the author has no personal knowledge of the cult in the temple.

The close relation of Hebrews to writings like I Clement and even the Revelation of John, and to ideas to be found in Luke, speak for the time at the end of the first century—i.e., the time of Domitian (81-96). The problems of the postapostolic era are the concern of the Letter to the Hebrews.

4. Theological significance. The constant discussion of the Jewish cult and the use throughout of the OT serve the purpose of proving the absolute superiority of God's revelation in Christ for a Hellenistic world. The theology of Hebrews is that of a Hellenistic Christianity of the postapostolic age. These points explain why two themes are very much in the center of our epistle—namely:

a. Eschatology. Hebrews stresses the coming of the end, assuming that the Christian church is endangered by its neglect of this truth (12:1 ff). In the opening verses of ch. 1 the present time is called "these last days"; 2:5 speaks of the "world to come." The forces of the coming aeon are already breaking in (6:5). The eschatology is not used for speculations—as with II Peter (see PETER, SECOND LETTER OF) or REVELATION—and is not the reaction to a general postponement idea, but is emphasized for a practical purpose —namely, to overcome the weariness and weakening of faith. A twofold aspect of eschatology can be seen —pointing on the one hand to a future action of God, to the coming of Christ Jesus, and pointing on the other to the present as the time of definite transition from an old to a new aeon. "Therefore do not throw away your confidence, which has a great reward. For you have need of endurance, so that you may do the will of God and receive what is promised.

> " 'For yet a little while, > and the coming one shall come and shall not tarry' " > (10:35-37).

When he comes, the Christians can expect an epoch of salvation, a period of "rest," an everlasting "sabbath." We are waiting for the "city which is to come" (13:14). Yet just because there is this certainty of a near-fulfilment of God's "promises," Christians should disassociate themselves from the world and live as strangers upon the earth (11:13). The accent of eschatological hope is laid upon the future, but in spite of its nearness it is not conceived as imminent in the way it is with Paul (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT). One cannot say that this eschatology is the typical apocalyptic one, although it contains some features of it. But while the anticipation of a future event is stressed, Christ is regarded as having "appeared once for all at the end of the age" (9:26). This affirmation of an eschatological present is rather Gnostic than Jewish.

Connected with the eschatology is the motif of pilgrimage (see especially 3:7–4:13). Thus Israel as the people wandering through the wilderness can be recognized as the prototype of Christianity. We have our gospel not as a possession, but as promise (εὐαγγέλιον as ἐπαγγελία), and therefore the danger of APOSTASY is at hand. Yet in this pilgrimage of God's people—meaning Christianity (4:9; 11:25; 13:12)—we have Christ as leader (2:10; see further 12:2). This motif is carried through the epistle (notice the verbs προσέρχεσθαι [10:22; 11:6; 12:18, 22]; ἐξέρχεσθαι [13:13]; ἀναστρέφεσθαι [10:33; 13:7]; or in 12:1: "Let us run . . . the race that is set before us"). Of course, this means practically that the present is a militant pilgrimage in which Christ is the forerunner and Christians are to follow in his steps, by suffering. It is the way to the heavenly Jerusalem, the "new and living way" (10:20).

This motif can be found also in Philo, where it is called the "kingly way" (cf. De Opif. Mundi 69; De Mutat. Nom. 179 ff, etc.). But since there is no direct dependence of Hebrews on Philo, one has to assume a common source. Ernst Käsemann discovered it in pre-Christian Gnostic writings—namely, Mandean literature, Hermetica, the Acts of Thomas, the Odes of Solomon. The Gnostic idea and mythology have been used, but the application of them to Christianity, and the necessary transformation involved, is the work of the author of Hebrews.

b. Christology. The Christology of Hebrews is immediately developed in the opening chapter (vss. 1-4). God "has spoken to us by a Son, whom he appointed the heir of all things, through whom also he created the world." After the redemption "he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high" and "obtained the name" of "Son." In the following quotations from the OT, Christ is even "God" (1:8-9) and "Lord" (1:10), later on "Son of God" (4:14). In the very center Christ is described as the "high priest" (7:1 ff). There is no possibility of differentiating between the sonship and the high priesthood of Christ; they are identified (cf. 5:5-6). When in 1:2; 5:7 Jesus in his earthly days seems to possess the sonship, we must recognize that it is used here proleptically, in anticipation. In fact, he was enthroned as Son after his ascension (the passages 1:5 ff give the enthronement; the term "first born" [πρωτότοκος] refers to the universal rulership). Yet he was preexistent and participated in God's creation (1:2). This means Jesus as Son during his historical lifetime was a Christus absconditus, a "hidden Christ." There is obviously a common line in Hebrews and Phil. 2:5-11 (see PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE; KENOSIS). They both use an earlier pattern, probably the Gnostic "Anthropos" myth. The gift of "the name" (ὄνομα) is the final glorification after suffering and crucifixion; in Hebrews it is the name "Son"; in Phil. 2:9 ff it is "Lord." Christ Jesus is seen as the decisive revelation of God. He is God's representative in the midst of this world and is our representative in heaven before God. In other words, he is the mediator (ὁ μεσίτης; Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24—in all three cases connected with διαθήκη). Although he is seen in the succession of preceding words of God, he is now the final one and has a cosmic power superior to angels, Moses, Aaron, Melchizedec, and this-worldly priests. Yet the ultimate victory will come when after the Parousia all angels and men will kneel before him and the rulership of his kingdom will be perfect.

There is no explicit mentioning of Christ's resurrection—an allusion may appear in 13:20—but it is presupposed whenever exaltation and enthronement in heaven are spoken of. The accent is upon his being in heaven. In the same way, the crucifixion is not explicitly referred to, but is everywhere presupposed. It is interpreted in two ways: as the purification of our sins (cf. 1:3) and as the victory over death. In winning the latter he had to be real man "of the same nature" (2:14) as we are. He had to suffer and to undergo temptations. Especially the point of being tempted is stressed (2:18: "Because he himself has suffered and been tempted, he is able to help those who are tempted"; cf. 4:15; see also 5:8), not so much in order to enrich the Christology, but to emphasize the soteriological aspect. In this connection Christ's being without sin (χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας; 4:15 [cf. 9:28]) is asserted. Thus he revealed himself as the very Messiah, the perfect one forever (5:9; 7:28). His death is seen as the consequence of his incarnation and as resulting primarily in the destruction of the power of death (2:14) for all who follow him in faith.

The concept of Christ as the high priest (ἀρχιερεύς) runs through the letter as a whole, just as that of his being the Son. In both instances Christ is the eschatological representation. The idea does not occur anywhere else in the NT canon (but cf. I Clem. 36: 1; 61:3; 64:1; Ign. Phila. 9:1; each time in liturgical context). The work of the high priest comprises earth and heaven. By his death he unlocks the door to the eternal sanctuary in heaven. He receives the initiation for the heavenly cult and enables all believers to follow him as the forerunner (6:20). His work means atonement for the sins of men. The soteriological aspect is explained in 7:1–10:18, yet has been assumed since 2:14. In 2:17 the title of high priest is used as if known to the readers. It may be that it was known from liturgical usage in the congregation. It is known that the "historical" high priest had to be a descendant of Aaron. In the DEAD SEA SCROLLS the one of the two mentioned messiahs—namely, the priestly one—is named as Messiah of Aaron. He is just the same as the high priest of Hebrews, who is identified with Jesus of Nazareth. With Philo the LOGOS is also the high priest. Hellenistic and Jewish traditions come together in this title and figure, which seems to be a well-known messianic metaphor, again going back to pre-Christian Gnostic conceptions that are connected with the terms of an ἀρχηγός and πρόδρομος.

In Heb. 5:1-4 it is said about the high priest: (a) that he is called by God, just as Aaron was (5:4); (b) that he is chosen from among men (5:1); (c) that he acts on behalf of men—i.e., he is priest (5:1); (d) that he can deal gently with men (5:2)—i.e., he has "compassion"; (e) that he himself is beset with weakness (5:2); (f) that he is bound to offer sacrifice for himself (5:3); (g) that he is bound to offer sacrifice for the sins of the people (5:3). These characteristics and functions of the high priest explain the work of Christ Jesus. Yet, the functions do not really correspond to the historical Christ Jesus. Therefore, we find the emphasis in 5:5-6 that he "did not exalt himself to be made a high priest, but was appointed" by God and called "Son" and nominated a "priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek."

The unique Melchizedek passages of Hebrews (cf. Philo On Abraham 235; yet Melchizedek is never called high priest with Philo, Josephus, or the LXX) go back to Ps. 110:4 and perhaps again to earliest liturgical traditions (see Heb. 3:1; 4:14; 10:23; see also above to 2:16). This tradition was taken up already in 5:10; 6:20; yet is unfolded in 7:1 ff. Who is Melchizedek? According to etymology "Ṣedeḳ is King" (מלכי־צדק; Gen. 14:18) or later with Heb. 7: 2: "by translation of his name, king of righteousness." Probably he is meant as the primeval man who returns as Messiah, like such figures as Moses, Elijah, or Metatron, Sem or Michael. He is held here in higher respect than in the OT. Since we have, with Philo, Melchizedek as "priest of God" and as Logos, one must assume a common tradition, which is Gnostic in its origin. For the christological theme the correspondence of type and antitype is significant, having in common the eternal priesthood: "Resembling the Son of God he continues a priest for ever" (7:3). The repetition of Melchizedek in Christ refers to his eschatological and concluding role as Messiah. The typological picture demonstrates how Jesus is interpreted in a cultic direction, according to Ps. 110, and yet without losing the identity of his historicity and exaltation.

The Christology of Hebrews is strictly connected with soteriology. The theme "Son" is connected with that of "the sons"—i.e., the believers (2:5–3:6). The point of departure was the citation of Ps. 8 and its reference to "man" and "the son of man." The interrelation is historical and sacramental as well as symbolic. The specific terms "faith" (πίστις) and "confession" (ὁμολογία) point to this. We have in 11:1 the famous verse: "Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen." Is this to be taken as a Christian definition? As it stands, it is more a phenomenological description than a theological definition. Yet other sayings of Hebrews can supplement 11:1. Remarkable is the strict connection of faith and hope (ἐλπίς or ὑπόστασις: cf. 6:11; 10:22). Hope, as well as faith, has as subject the promises of God (ἐπαγγελία). In other words, they are conditioned by the future. On the other hand, faith is (as with Paul) obedience toward the Word of God (3:7 ff)—to that word which God has finally spoken in Christ Jesus—and demands steadfastness (6:12) and patience (10:36; 12:1). This Word of God means God himself and his revelation in Christ Jesus. More than in other books of the NT canon, this "faith" becomes "faithfulness." And here enters the often used term "confession" (ὁμολογία; see 3:1; 4:14; 10:23), which seems to refer to a liturgical action and to the actualization of faith in the life of following Christ's example. The confession is man's response to God's action in Christ.

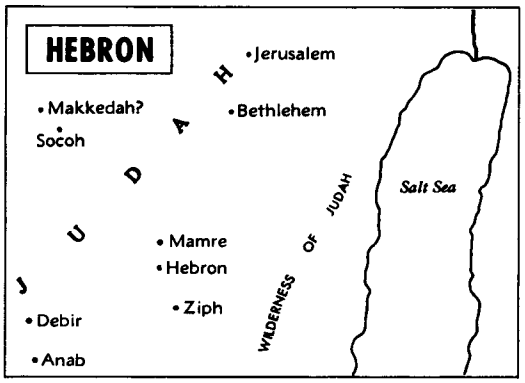
*c. The admonitions. The theological-christological intention of Hebrews leads to the primary point of the ethical admonitions. As in PAUL, who connects always the indicative of being with the imperative of becoming (cf. Rom. 6), we find in our epistle a consistent connection of Christology-soteriology and following parenesis, or exhortation (see § 2 above). Whenever Hebrews speaks of "Son and sons," of the first-born in the singular (1:6) and the plural (12:23), of the forerunner, of the Christian "pilgrimage," an ethical implication is given. Yet we do not find, as with Paul, concrete ethical demands. The admonitions are primarily concerned with the danger of APOSTASY or weariness and lack of hope. In order to strengthen their steadfastness, the author calls the repetition of repentance "impossible" (6:4-6). All this is also reflected when faith is perceived as faithfulness and sin more as the weakening of faithfulness than as disobedience or actual deed.

5. Historical setting. The previous section referred several times to Gnostic sources used by the author for his Christology and eschatology, especially for his motif of the Christian pilgrimage. This historical perspective seems to be more justified than that in which Hebrews is seen in the exclusive context of rabbinism. Even the general nearness to Philo is better explained by acknowledging a Jewish Gnosis. Yet our author makes use of this Gnostic material in his own independent way and does it throughout, consistently taking his Christology for the primary point of admonition. Future research has to elaborate further the historical setting of Hebrews.



Bibliography. Commentaries by J. Moffatt (1924); T. H. Robinson (1933); O. Michel (8th ed., 1949); C. Spicq (1952-53). E. F. Scott, The Epistle to the Hebrews (1922); W. Manson, The Epistle to the Hebrews (1951); E. Käsemann, Das wandernde Gottesvolk (2nd ed., 1957). E. DINKLER

HEBRON hē'brən [חברון, association, league]; HEBRONITES —brə nīts. 1. A Levite, third son of Kohath; named in P (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19) and Chronicles (I Chr. 6:2, 18; 23:12). From him were reckoned the Hebronites and "the sons of Hebron" (15:9; 23:19; 24:23).

2. Son of Mareshah in a Calebite genealogy; father of Korah, Tappuah, Rekem, and Shema. Possibly the reference is to the city of this name (I Chr. 2:42-43).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 222. T. M. MAUCH

HEBRON (CITY). 1. A city nineteen miles S of Jerusalem, 13½ miles S-SW of Bethlehem.* It lies on the E side of a valley and has an unusually abundant water supply (wells and springs). From its founding to the time of the Crusades, Hebron was built on the hill er-Rumeideh, just W of the modern city. On it are examples of pottery from the end of the Bronze Age on, and on its summit are remains of an ancient wall and other ruins (called Deir el-Arba'in). The modern city is built around the tombs of the patriarchs. Fig. HEB 12.

The present name of the city, el-Khalil (er-Rahman), "the friend [of the merciful one—i.e., God]" is reminiscent of an appellation for Abraham found, e.g., in II Chr. 20:7; Isa. 41:8; Jub. 19:9; Philo (in On Sobriety: ὁ θεοφιλής); Jas. 2:23. The mosque over the cave is called the Haram el-Khalil, the "sacred precinct of the friend [of the merciful one]." Fig. HEB 13.

Hebron was a Canaanite royal city in the hill country of Judah, founded seven years before the

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

12. Aerial view of the setting for the ancient city of Hebron

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

13. The town of Hebron

(re)building of Zoan (Tanis, earlier Avaris) in Egypt (Num. 13:22) or ca. the middle of the fourteenth century B.C. This tradition is supported by the patriarchal narrative in which the references are to Mamre, just N of Hebron, with the latter serving chiefly as a location point for the hearers (and readers) of a later date (cf. Gen. 13:18; 23:19; 35:27; 37:14). In Abraham's day, a time of considerable unrest in the region, there was at least one Hittite clan in the vicinity, as well as Amorites, for Abraham had to purchase the cave for a family sepulchre from a Hittite chieftain named Ephron (Gen. 23:8; cf. 14:13; see MACHPELAH).

At the time of its founding, it was called Kiriath-arba (Tetrapolis, or "fourfold" city) and later came to be called Hebron (Gen. 23:2; 35:27; Josh. 15:54; 20:7; 21:11; Neh. 11:25). The historical relationship between the two names is unclear. The biblical tradition relates the earlier name to one Arba, the great hero of the Anakim, "the giants," a people mentioned in the conquest narrative (Num. 13:22; Josh. 14:15; 15:13), and possibly in the twentieth-century Egyptian execration texts. The biblical tradition is probably etiological but may conceal within it a reference to a historical event which escapes us at present.

In the fourteenth century the Hebron region was ruled for a time by a local prince, Shuwardata, who appears in several of the Amarna Letters. In the first unsuccessful attempt at conquest, by approaching Canaan from the S, Moses' spies reconnoitered around Hebron and elsewhere to determine the strength of their prospective adversaries. Three clans of the Anakim (Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai) lived at Hebron at this time, early in the thirteenth century (Num. 13:22). After about a generation the successful attack against Canaan was launched from the E.

This time Hoham, king of Hebron, died at the hand of Joshua and his forces in the latter's victory over the S Canaanite coalition led by Adonizedek of Jerusalem in the Battle of Makkedah (Josh. 10:1-27). Hebron itself was destroyed and its population devoted to the sword along with Debir, Anab, and other hill-country cities (Josh. 10:36-37; 11:21-22). Archaeological evidence indicates immediate Israelite occupation of Debir (cf., however, Judg. 1:11-12), but Hebron seems to have been reoccupied by the three clans of the Anakim and was not effectively controlled by the Israelites until its recapture by Caleb's forces after Joshua's death (Josh. 14:13 ff; 15:13-14; Judg. 1:10, 19-20; cf. Josh. 10:36-39; 11:21-22). The biblical account is not entirely clear on this matter, however. The account of Caleb's capture of Hebron could simply be one phase of the campaign of occupation under Joshua's general leadership—or a continuation of it after Joshua's death. Hebron was designated a Levitical city and a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7; 21:10-13; I Chr. 6:57). In the royal administrative reorganization, it became a district capital (Josh. 15:54).

Hebron is prominent in the story of David's early career. It was one of the cities to receive a gift from David for services rendered him and his men; the gift was taken from the booty captured from the Amalekites after David's successful pursuit of them, in reprisal for their sack of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:31). He was anointed "king of Judah," and for the first 7½ years of his reign it was capital of the S kingdom; while Ishbosheth (Ishbaal), Saul's son, ruled the N from Mahanaim. Several of David's sons, including Absalom, were born at Hebron. As a result of a personal affront, Ishbosheth's general, Abner, defected and was in the process of bringing the N into David's camp when he was treacherously killed by Joab and his brother for Abner's slaying of their brother in the course of an engagement which had begun at the Pool of Gibeon. Abner was buried in Hebron. After Abner's death, two of Ishbosheth's captains assassinated him, decapitated him, and took his head to David at Hebron, hoping for a bounty. Instead, David had them killed for their treachery, and had Ishbosheth's head buried in Abner's grave. After Ishbosheth's death, the N was united with the S, and the capital moved to the newly captured Jerusalem, from which David ruled the remaining 33 years of his reign (II Sam. 2:1–5:5; I Kings 2:11; I Chr. 3:1-4; 29:27).

Hebron became the headquarters for Absalom's abortive revolt against his father, David (II Sam. 15:7-10). Rehoboam (ca. 922-915) had the fortifications of Hebron strengthened (II Chr. 11:5, 10). The tentative reading "field of Abram" in the list of Palestinian places captured by Shishak in ca. 918 B.C. may refer to Hebron, in which case it is the first extrabiblical association of Abraham and the region of Hebron. Hebron was probably occupied by Sennacherib in 701 and destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar in 587, though there is no specific biblical reference to either so far as Hebron is concerned. From the eighth-century jar handles found at various sites, on which the legend "belonging to the king: Hebron" (or Ziph or Soco or Memshath) appears, it seems that Hebron may have been a royal pottery during this period.

During the Exile the region of Hebron was occupied by the Idumeans (Edomites), in whose hands it remained until 164, when Judas Maccabeus captured and burned it, destroying the walls and towers which protected it (I Macc. 5:65; cf. Jos. Antiq. XII. viii.6). Except for its fortifications, apparently, it was rebuilt, and during the reign of Herod the Great pretentious buildings were erected over the site of the Cave of Machpelah and on the site of MAMRE; part of the former remains in the mosque now standing on the site. In A.D. 68, Simon, one of the Jewish revolutionaries, raided Hebron for supplies (Jos. War IV.ix.7); later that year, Cerealius, one of Vespasian's officers, captured and burned the city (Jos. War IV. ix.9). It is not mentioned in the NT, and references to it during the Byzantine period are concerned only with the tomb of the patriarchs there; it belonged to the Diocese of Eleutheropolis. During the Crusades the Praesidium Sancti Abrahae was erected nearby. In 1168 it became the seat of a bishopric, but it was returned to Muslim rule in 1187.

Bibliography. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, vol. II (1938); H. H. Rowley, From Joseph to Joshua (1950); R. de Vaux, "Macpélah," Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément, vol. V (1953), cols. 620-21; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957).

2. KJV translation in Josh. 19:28. The Hebrew is better rendered עברן, EBRON, in the RSV. However, it should be read עבדון, ABDON, with some Hebrew MSS; Josh. 21:30; I Chr. 6:74—H 6:59.

V. R. GOLD

HEDGE. Properly, the translation of the noun משוכה (alternately מסוכה), the verb שוך (alternately שכך), referring to a thorn hedge (see THISTLES), and the noun φραγμός, a fence of any kind. Occasionally, however, "hedge" has been used to render גדר (alternately גדרה), a stone WALL or FENCE. Hedges were constructed to protect vineyards (see VINE) from predators (Ps. 80:12-13—H 80:13-14; Isa. 5:5; Matt. 21:33; Mark 12:1). Indeed, the whole countryside could be regarded as consisting of either highways or hedges (Luke 14:23). Figuratively the verb "hedge (in or about)" is used to express both God's protection (Job 1:10) and his constraint (Job 3:23; Lam. 3:7; Hos. 2:6—H 2:8) of a person. Micah complains that even "the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge" (7:4 KJV).

J. F. ROSS

HEDGEHOG [קפוד, קפד, probably from קפד (Pi'el), to roll up; cf. Arab. qunfudh, hedgehog; Syr. qûfdâ, hedgehog, porcupine]; KJV BITTERN. Alternately: PORCUPINE (Isa. 34:11); KJV BITTERN (Isa. 14:23; Zeph. 2:14). Any of the genus Erinaceus, small insect-eating mammals, ca. ten to twelve inches long, covered with a coat of short spines and having the power to roll themselves up in self-protection into a ball-like form. Three species of hedgehog are reported by Bodenheimer as found in modern Palestine.

The three OT passages in which קפוד (qippôd) occurs describe inhabited areas which are to become desolate and the home of various wild creatures. The word probably means "hedgehog," but in Zeph. 2:14 this can be so only if it is assumed that the columns and capitals of Nineveh's buildings have fallen to the ground.

The "porcupine" of Isa. 34:11 is a rodent of the family Hystricidae, and although exclusively vegetable-eating and more than twice the size of a hedgehog it bears a superficial resemblance to the latter in having the protection of quills or spines. Porcupines are found in modern Palestine, where, Tristram records, they are "commonly believed by the natives to be a larger species of hedgehog."

See also FAUNA § A2*b*.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HEEL, LIFTED. The phrase הגדיל עלי עקב (lit., "made great the heel[?] against me") is translated "has lifted his heel against me" in Ps. 41:9 (cf. John 13:18). The expression refers to the cruel treachery of friends, who, in line with Semitic custom, have interpreted the sick man's distress as divine punishment, and have made him an object of social rejection. It may have no reference whatever to raising the heel to kick one, as a means of attack (cf. Hos. 12:3: עקב, "to attack at the heel," treated as the root of "Jacob" in Gen. 25:26; 27:36), or to the cunning of a wrestler (as πτέρναν would suggest in John 13: 18), and may simply mean "has turned his back on me," or "has turned his heel on me."

It is possible that the word עקב, translated "heel" (but also meaning "reward," or as an adverb "because"), is misplaced from the end of vs. 11, or is an early gloss. הגדיל is never used in the OT in the sense of "lift up" or "raise," but always "to act proudly," "to magnify oneself." The phrase הגדיל עלי occurs elsewhere (e.g., Job. 19:15; Pss. 35:26; 55:12). Moreover, the context of Ps. 41:9 suggests words rather than deeds (as "lifted his heel" would indicate). The LXX, however, had the full phrase (reading "has magnified his supplanting of me"). The NT (John 13:18) follows neither the MT nor the LXX but reads: "has lifted his heel against me." Jesus applies the words to the treachery of Judas, who, by turning on Jesus, brought fresh significance to these words. The NT phrase means "acted treacherously," and applies to deeds. But the emphasis would seem to be that one, with whom one was bound by a covenant of peace, who partook of one's bread, had violated the laws of hospitality, and had turned on his host.

Bibliography. G. H. A. Ewald, Commentary on the Psalms (trans. E. Johnson; 1880), I, 191-95; T. K. Cheyne, The Book of Psalms, I (1904), 183; R. Kittel, Die Psalmen (1922), p. 147.

V. H. KOOY

HEGAI hĕg'ī [הגי, הגא (Esth. 2:3), probably from Pers.; cf. Ηγίας, an officer of Xerxes (Herodotus 9.33; Ctesias Persians 24] (Esth. 2:3, 8, 15); KJV HEGE hĕg'ī in Esth. 2:3. A eunuch of Ahasuerus, in charge of the women.

HEGEMONIDES hĕj'ə mō'nə dēz [Ηγεμονίδης = ἡγεμών, guide(?)] (II Macc. 13:24); KJV PRINCIPAL. Syrian officer appointed by Antiochus as "governor from Ptolemais to Gerar" at the time Antiochus was compelled to withdraw to Antioch to deal with the revolt under Philip.

J. C. SWAIM

HEGLAM hĕg'ləm [הגלם, he carried them into exile] (I Chr. 8:7). Son of Ehud, and the father of Uzza and Ahihud; Heglam is given as an alternative for the hypocoristic name Gera.

The descent of Ehud is not specified in this section of the genealogical table. According to Judg. 3: 15, a Benjaminite by the name of Gera was the father of Ehud. Presumably the Gera of I Chr. 8:7 was a descendant of Benjamin, through Bela, though the relationship in this case is more remote than with the Gera of vs. 3, who was clearly identified as the son of Bela and the grandson of Benjamin. It is possible that this grandson of Benjamin is to be identified as the father of both Ehud and the Shimei who cursed David (II Sam. 16:5; 19:16-17, 19; I Kings 2:8), and therefore as the founder of the Benjaminite family or clan which bore the same name (Gen. 46: 21; contrast Num. 26:38-40). H. F. Beck

HEIFER [עגלה בקר; עגלת (correctly YOUNG COW in Isa. 7:21); פרה, see Cow; δάμαλις]. The heifer was used on the threshing floor (Hos. 10:11; cf. Deut. 25: 4) and presumably for other agricultural work. A three-year-old heifer was used in the Lord's covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15:9). Samuel sacrificed a heifer (I Sam. 16:2). The neck of a heifer was broken in expiating murder by an unknown assailant (Deut. 21:1-9; cf. M. Soṭ. 9.1-9; Ker. 6.2; Par. 1.1).

The term "heifer" is applied figuratively to his Philistine wife by Samson (Judg. 14:18), to Egypt (Jer. 46:20), to Babylon (Jer. 50:11), to Israel in her stubbornness (Hos. 4:16, where, however, the word is פרה, "cow"), and to a docile Ephraim (Hos. 10:11). The heifer at grass is a symbol of wantonness in Jer. 50:11.

The KJV "heifer of three years old" (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34) is taken by most commentators to be a place name, Eglath-shelishiyah (so RSV).

For the red heifer of Num. 19:1-10 (the word is פרה and should be translated "cow"; cf. δάμαλις in Heb. 9:13), see Red Heifer.

The "heifers" (עגלות) of Beth-aven (Bethel) in Hos. 10:5 should be read "calf" (עגל; cf. LXX, Syr.; so RSV). See Calf, Golden. W. S. McCullough HEIR [יורש, one who inherits; κληρονόμος]. The son of an owner of property. The heir, while still a child, was no better than a slave. Although the potential owner of the entire estate, he was under guardians and trustees until the date set by the father (Gal. 4:1-2).

Through Christ men cease to be slaves and become sons and heirs (Gal. 4:4-7). The Son has been appointed heir of all things, so that he reflects the glory of God (Heb. 1:2-3). Noah became an heir of the righteousness that faith produces (11:7), and Isaac and Jacob are also heirs of the promise that God made to Abraham (vs. 9). The poor, and men and women alike, are all "heirs of the grace of life" (I Pet. 3:7).

See also Inheritance. O. J. Baab

HELAH hē'lə [חלאה, necklace] (I Chr. 4:5, 7). One of the two wives of Ashhur, descendant of Judah and ancestor of Tekoa.

HELAM hē'ləm [חילם, חלאם]. A city near the N boundary of Gilead, where David defeated the Syrians (II Sam. 10:16-17). It was also read by the LXX in Ezek. 47:16 and located between Hamath and Damascus. It is the same as the Ḥl'm of the Egyptian Execration Texts (1850-1825 B.C.) and the Alema of I Macc. 5:26. S. Cohen

HELBAH hĕl'bə [חלבה] (Judg. 1:31). A town in Asher, from which the Israelites could not expel the Canaanite population. Helbah is generally considered to be the same as Ahlab, because of the similarity of their consonants; both are corrupt variants of Mahalab. G. W. Van Beek HELBON hĕl'bŏn [חלבון; Akkad. Ḫilbūnu; Arab. Ḥelbūn] (Ezek. 27:18). A town mentioned in the lamentation for Tyre; particularly famous for its wine. It is identified with modern Helbun, NW of Damascus in a region of Anti-lebanon where also today the cultivation of the vine is important.

A. Haldar

HELCHIAH. KJV Apoc. form of Hilkiah 6 in I Esd. 8:1.

HELDAI hĕl'dī [חלדי, mole (animal); חלם (Zech. 6:14)]. Alternately: HELED hē'lĕd [חלד, mole] (I Chr. 11:30); HELEB hē'lĕb [חלב] (II Sam. 23:29); KJV HELEM hē'lĕm in Zech. 6:14. 1. One of David's Mighty Men; a Netophathite (II Sam. 23: 29; I Chr. 11:30; 27:15). The name should be read either "Heldai" (I Chr. 27:15) or "Heled" (I Chr. 11:30), both of which are from the same root. "Heleb" (II Sam. 23:29) must be an error.

2. One of those who brought gold and silver with which the prophet Zechariah was to make a crown for Joshua the high priest (Zech. 6:10, 14). "Helem" in 6:14 (Hebrew and KJV) must be an error.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 230. H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

HELECH hē'lĕk [חילך] (Ezek. 27:11); KJV THINE ARMY. Possibly the name of the country of Cilicia, in SE Asia Minor.

Assyrian records refer to part of the region of Cilicia under the name of Hilakku. The earliest mention appears under Shalmaneser III (858-824 B.C.). Hilakku was presumably conquered by Sargon ca. 720 B.C. and given to a vassal prince. The country revolted against Sennacherib in 696 and again under Esarhaddon (680-669). It sent tribute to Ashurbanipal ca. 668/7, perhaps in fear of the Cimmerian invasions. See Gomer.

The reading of "Helech" among the mercenaries of Tyre is consistent with the warlike character of the Cilicians with their Phoenician contacts attested for the seventh century B.C. and later. It seems preferable to the KJV "thine army."

Bibliography. For Hilakku, see P. Naster, L'Asie Mineure et l'Assyrie aux VIII^e et VII^e siècles avant Jésus-Christ (1938). M. J. Mellink

HELED. An alternate form of Heldai.

HELEK hē'lĕk [חלק, portion, lot]; HELEKITES —lə kīts. A member of the tribe of Manasseh, of the family of the Helekites (Num. 26:30). He is listed as one of the male descendants of Manasseh the son of Joseph (Josh. 17:2; cf. vs. 1; also Num. 27:29, where Helek's lineage is traced back to Joseph through Gilead, Machir, and Manasseh). W. L. Reed HELEM hē'lĕm [חלם]. 1. A family of the tribe of Asher (I Chr. 7:35). This name should probably be Hotham (cf. I Chr. 7:32).

2. KJV form of Heldai 2.

HELEPH hē'lĕf [חלף] (Josh. 19:33). A border town in Naphtali. Khirbet 'Arbathah, located a short distance to the NE of Mount Tabor, has been suggested as a possible identification, but this is uncertain.

Bibliography. A. Saarisalo, The Boundary Between Issachar and Naphtali (1927), pp. 27-28, 122-24. G. W. Van Beek

HELER. Typographical error in early printings of RSV for HELEM 1.

HELEZ hē'lĕz [חלץ, he has saved (shortened form); cf. Phoen. חלצבעל, Baal has saved]. 1. One of David's MIGHTY MEN (II Sam. 23:26; I Chr. 11:27; 27:10). II Samuel calls him "the PALTITE"; I Chronicles "the PELONITE." Since LXX A reads "the Peolonite" in II Samuel and since I Chr. 27:10 says Helez is an Ephraimite, "the Pelonite" is probably correct.

2. A family of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 2:39).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 180. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

HELI hē'lī ['Ηλί=עלי, Eli]. 1. The father (according to some, the grandfather) of Joseph in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:23).

2. Douay Version form of ELI; also KJV form in II Esd. 1:2. F. W. GINGRICH

HELIAS. KJV Apoc. form of ELIJAH.

HELIODORUS hē'lĭ ə dôr'əs ['Ηλιόδωρος]. A high official in the court of the Seleucid king Seleucus IV Philopator, who was sent to confiscate temple moneys at Jerusalem for the royal treasury; he became the object of divine vengeance, according to a story told in II Macc. 3 and repeated with some differences in IV Macc. 3:19–4:14. A temple official named Simon falsely represented the situation with reference to deposits in the temple treasury to Apollonius, the governor of Coele Syria and Phoenicia; Apollonius then reported it to the king. When Heliodorus attempted to enter the treasury, he was attacked and dreadfully beaten by a horseman in golden armor and two youths who appeared miraculously. At the intervention of the high priest Onias III, the stricken man was saved and lived to tell how the power of God defended his dwelling place.

According to Appian (Syrian Wars 45), Heliodorus was a dear friend of Seleucus IV; an inscription found in the temple of Apollo at Delos suggests that Heliodorus was a prominent officer in the court. In 175 B.C. he attempted to usurp the throne by assassinating the king, only to be driven out by Eumenes and Attalus, who put Seleucus' brother Antiochus on the throne.

Bibliography. W. Otto in Pauly-Wissowa, Realencyklopädie, VIII (1913), 12-15; A. Bouché-Leclercq, Histoire des Séleucides (1913-14), pp. 239 ff; E. R. Bevan, Cambridge Ancient History, VIII (1930), 490 ff. E. W. SAUNDERS

HELIOPOLIS hē'lĭ ŏp'ə lĭs [בית שמש, house of the sun; LXX ἡλίου πόλεως] (Jer. 43:13); KJV BETH-SHEMESH bĕth shĕm'ĭsh. The capital of the Thirteenth Lower Egyptian nome, situated at the S vertex of the Nile Delta.

1. Name and references
2. Heliopolitan theology
3. A cult center
4. Archaeological finds
Bibliography

1. Name and references. Heliopolis, one of the most important cities of ancient Egypt, was situated near the site occupied today by the village of Matariyah, by Tell Hisn, just NE of modern Cairo. The Egyptian called the city iwnw (or inw), which is borrowed in Hebrew as 'Ôn (also Aven) and is found in cuneiform inscriptions as Anu (Middle Babylonian) and Unu (Late Assyrian). On is mentioned in Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20, where Potiphera is referred to as the priest of On. Elsewhere, other than in Jer. 43:13, Heliopolis is mentioned only obliquely, as in Isa. 19:18, where we should possibly read עיר החרס ('îr haḥeres), "City of the Sun." The latter passage has a textual problem in the relevant phrase: the MT has haheres, not haḥeres. The reading haḥeres, which is probably a reference to Heliopolis in view of the Egyptian context of the verse, is supported by several MSS, as well as by Symm. and the Vulg. It is noteworthy that outside the Genesis narrative none of the references to Heliopolis (if, indeed, this is the correct understanding of them) is direct—Aven, Beth-shemesh, and Ir-haheres.

2. Heliopolitan theology. Heliopolis is perhaps best known as the home of the Heliopolitan theology, which had assumed its basic form as early as the Third Dynasty. According to this system the chief deity was Atum, syncretized with Re into Atum-Re, the sun-god, who dominated the Great Ennead, consisting of Shu (atmosphere); Tefnut (moisture); Geb (earth); Nut (sky); ISIS; OSIRIS; Seth; and Nephthys. This ennead was adopted also by the Memphite theologians, who altered it by making Ptah the central figure, and, indeed, the emanation and manifestation of the ennead itself.

3. A cult center. Although Heliopolis played no important political role in Egyptian history, it remained one of its most outstanding cult centers until Saïte times. Among the numerous objects of veneration to be found in Heliopolis were (a) the steer-god Mnevis, (b) the stone fetish known as the benben (prototype of the OBELISK), (c) the phoenix, a symbol of the birth of Atum, and (d) the iwn pillar, presumably the fetish from which the city took its name. Note that Jer. 43:13 mentions Heliopolis specifically with reference to its function as a cult city and the site most commonly associated with the obelisk.

4. Archaeological finds. The present site is relatively poor in archaeological remains and, according to Petrie, shows no evidence of ancient occupation after the Saïte period (Twenty-sixth Dynasty). This would support the statement of Strabo (XVII.805-6) that the city was laid waste by Cambyses. Among the items of unusual archaeological interest is a curious enclosure surrounded by a ringwall with rounded corners. Though it was identified by Petrie as a Hyksos fort, further investigation by Ricke suggests that the "fort bank" was actually the retaining wall of a primitive mound of sand upon which stood the benben. This would symbolize, then, the primordial hillock on which Atum stood when he first emerged from the waters of Nun (chaos). Further noteworthy remains are the large temple area of Atum-Re-Harakhte and the still standing obelisk of Sesostris I (Twelfth Dynasty).

Bibliography. W. M. F. Petrie, Heliopolis, Kafr Ammar, and Shurafa (1915), pp. 1-7; H. Ricke, "Eine Inventartafel aus Heliopolis im Turiner Museum," ZÄ, 71 (1935), 111-33;

A. H. Gardiner, Ancient Egyptian Onomastica (Text), II (1947), 144-46; H. Bonnet, Reallexikon der ägyptischen Religionsgeschichte (1952), pp. 543-45. T. O. LAMBDIN

HELKAI hĕl'kī [חלקי, perhaps contracted from חלקיהו, my portion is Yahu] (Neh. 12:15). A priest, head of the house of Meraioth in the days of Joiakim the high priest.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 163-64. B. T. DAHLBERG

HELKATH hĕl'kăth [חלקת] (Josh. 19:25; 21:31). Alternately: HUKOK hōō'kŏk [חוקק] (I Chr. 6:75—H 6:60). A Levitical border town in Asher. The first historical mention of Helkath is in the Thut-mose III list of towns (Egyptian Ḥrgt).

Perhaps the town is to be identified with Tell el-Harbaj, a low mound of ca. six acres, located at the S end of the Plain of Acco and occupied in the Early Bronze (ca. 3000-2100), Late Bronze (ca. 1550-1200), and Iron I (ca. 1200-900) periods.

Bibliography. British School of Archaeology Jerusalem Bulletin 2 (1922), pp. 10-17; 4 (1924), 45-46. A. Alt, "Die Reise," PJ, 25 (1929), 38-39. G. W. VAN BEEK

HELKATH-HAZZURIM hĕl'kăth hăzh'ōō rĭm [חלקת הצרים, field of sharp rocks (flints) or swords(?), field of adversaries(?)] (II Sam. 2:16). An area, presumably near the Pool of Gibeon, so called as the scene of the "tournament of champions" in which twelve of Joab's men of war dueled with twelve from the ranks of Abner, each thrusting his sword into his opponent's side. Some scholars emend to חלקת הצדים "field of the sides" (see RSV mg.). W. H. MORTON

HELKIAS. KJV Apoc. form of HILKIAH.

HELL. See DEAD, ABODE OF THE; GEHENNA.

HELLENISM hĕl'ə nĭz əm. The Greek spirit, character, or civilization, especially the higher culture or humanism of the ancient Hellenes; in modern writers, an enthusiasm for or devotion to this culture. But among historians the term now means the civilization which spread over the Mediterranean world, including the Near East, as a result of Alexander's conquests in the decade 334-325 B.C.

Unfortunately, the aggressive actions of the philhellene party in Jerusalem, early in the second century B.C., led to a crisis under Antiochus IV (see MACCABEES, BOOKS OF) and the consequent long Maccabean war of independence. It also created internal tensions within Judaism, resulting in attitudes of exclusiveness and superiority which continued for centuries, and were overcome only in early Christianity (see Acts 15; Galatians). F. C. GRANT HELLENISTS hĕl'ə nĭsts; KJV GRECIANS grē'shənz. Greek-speaking Jews referred to in Acts 6:1; 9:29, and as a variant reading in 11:20. They are contrasted with the "Hebrews"—i.e., Jews who spoke Hebrew (or Aramaic). The tension between the two groups is reflected in Acts 6–7 and elsewhere, and doubtless intensified the problem of the admission of Gentiles to the church, reflected in Acts 15; Gal. 1–2. According to Acts 2:5-6, the foreign-born Jews living in Jerusalem spoke various languages. It may be assumed that in the first century they also spoke Greek, for it was commonly spoken throughout the lands of the Near and Middle East, of which the nations mentioned in Acts 2:9 ff are examples. It was probably these "foreigners" who were designated by the term "Hellenists," rather than Gentiles.

The theory that the term means "Greeks"—i.e., non-Jews—is improbable on several grounds: (a) The story itself and the material in Acts 1–5 presuppose the spread of the church among Jews, in Jerusalem; (b) the problem of the daily "distribution" implies a much larger group of complainants than a mere infiltration of "Greeks"; (c) Philo distinguished between the "Hebrews" and "us"—i.e., the Greek-speaking Jews (Confusion of Tongues 26); (d) Chrysostom, whose native tongue was Koine Greek, stated explicitly that "Hellenists" meant "Greek-speaking" (Homily XIV, on Acts 6:1); (e) the account of the conversion of Gentiles (Acts 10:45; 15:3) relates something new; (f) the whole later conflict over the admission of Gentiles—i.e., without circumcision and observance of the Jewish law—would have been impossible had Gentiles been present in the church from the beginning.

That the variant reading (perhaps an attempted "correction") in Acts 11:20 is erroneous (cf. the reverse variation in 9:29, Codex A) is obvious from the context: "To the Greeks also" marks a new stage in the spread of the gospel.

Bibliography. Among the commentaries, see especially E. Haenchen in the Meyer series (1956). H. J. Cadbury in Beginnings of Christianity (1920 ff), IV, 64; V, 59-74. E. Lohmeyer, "Das Abendmahl in der Urgemeinde," JBL, 56 (1937), 217-52. See further references in W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the NT (1957). F. C. GRANT HELMET [קובע, כובע; περικεφαλαία]. A defensive headgear worn in battle, ordinarily probably made of leather for soldiers (II Chr. 26:14; Jer. 46:4; Ezek. 23:24; 27:10; 38:5) but of bronze for royalty and heroes (I Sam. 17:5, 38). It probably consisted of a cap with a long flap to cover the cheek and ears—hence the correct rendering by the LXX as περικεφαλαία (cf. also Eph. 6:17; I Thess. 5:8). In contrast to the Syrian-Hittite helmet, that of the Assyrians and Babylonians was pointed.

In symbolic usage, the Lord is pictured wearing a helmet of salvation (Isa. 59:17). The "armor" of the Christian includes the helmet of salvation (Eph. 6:17), and his helmet is the hope of salvation (I Thess. 5:8). In Pss. 60:7—H 60:9; 108:8—H 108:9 God describes Ephraim as מעוז ראשי (KJV "the strength of mine head"), interpreted in the RSV as "my helmet." J. W. WEVERS

HELON hē'lŏn [חלון, if from חיל plus diminutive -ōn, strength, power; LXX Χαιλον] (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16). A Zebulunite; the father of Eliab.

HELPERS [ἀντιλήμψεις]; KJV HELPS. One of the charismata, or "gifts of the Spirit," named by Paul in I Cor. 12:28, among the several functions exercised by members of the church for the benefit of one another (cf. Rom. 12:7). It is not the title of an office or ministerial order, though it has often been identified with the ministry of deacons (see DEACON). In classical Greek and in the LXX, the word is common in the sense of "lend a hand" to help one in some work. The verb form occurs in Luke 10:40 as a synonym of Martha's household service. In the Pauline context, the word is suggestively placed between the gifts of healing and of administration.

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

*HEM. 1. A KJV alternate translation of שׁוּל. See SKIRT 2.

2. KJV translation of κράσπεδον in Matt. 9:20; 14:36. See FRINGE.

HEMAM hē′măm. KJV-MT translation of הֵימָם in Gen. 36:22. The word, probably related to הֵימָן (I Kings 5:11) as אוֹנָם (Gen. 36:23) is to אוֹנָן (Gen. 38:4), is incorrectly translated Heman by the RSV (LXX Αιμαν). Hemam was the second son of the clan chief Lotan, and an ancestor of a Horite subclan in Edom. The name is given in I Chr. 1:39 as HOMAM.

L. HICKS

HEMAN hē′mən [הֵימָן, faithful; הֵימָם, see HEMAM]. 1. A Horite (Gen. 36:22; MT-KJV HEMAM). See HOMAM.

2. A "wise man" of the "sons of Mahol" (guild of dancers in the days of Solomon; I Kings 4:31—H 5:11). In I Chr. 2:6 he is called a son of Zerah, a name which the Chronicler may have derived from "Ezrahite" (Ps. 88—H 88:1; see ETHAN). Both an Edomite and a Canaanite ancestry have been adduced for Heman. He is probably the same as 3 below.

3. A Kohathite, son of Joel; one of the leaders of the temple musicians under David and Solomon (I Chr. 6:33-47—H 6:18-32; 15:17, 19; 16:41; II Chr. 5:12; see ASAPH; ETHAN; JEDUTHUN). He is called a seer (I Chr. 25:5) and "prophesied" to musical instruments (vs. 1). Perhaps the guild of Heman was originally a guild of cultic prophets (cf. Jer. 35:4) which was later transformed into a musical guild.

Bibliography. J. A. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible (1934), pp. 169-74; contrast W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1956), pp. 126-27. See also: S. Mowinckel, Psalmenstudien, III (1923), 17-18. A. R. Johnson, "The Prophet in Israelite Worship," ET, XLVII (1935-36), 312-19. R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the OT (1948), pp. 621-22, 639.

R. W. CORNEY

HEMATH. See HAMATH 1; HAMMATH 1.

HEMDAN hĕm′dăn [חֶמְדָן, from חמד, desire, take pleasure in (?); cf. Old South Arab. proper names חמד and חמדן] (Gen. 36:26). The first son of clan chief Dishon; ancestor of a native Horite subclan in Edom. The name occurs in I Chr. 1:41 as חַמְרָן, HAMRAN.

L. HICKS

HEMLOCK. KJV translation of לַעֲנָה (RSV "wormwood") in Amos 6:12 and of רֹאשׁ (RSV "poisonous weeds") in Hos. 10:4. See FLORA § A14*a*; GALL; POISON; WORMWOOD.

HEMORRHAGE [ῥύσις]. Any bleeding or flow of blood, whether visible or concealed, profuse or sporadic. In the OT hemorrhage brought with it ceremonial defilement, thus imposing serious restrictions upon the individual's religious and social life. Blood was deemed sacred, and all contact with it was strictly prohibited.

The woman with hemorrhage (Matt. 9:20-22; Mark 5:25-34; Luke 8:43-48) probably had a uterine fibromyoma (fibroid). The "bloody flux" (Acts 28:8 KJV) was evidently the intestinal bleeding of dysentery (so RSV).

R. K. HARRISON

HEN (PERSON). KJV translation of חֵן ("favor") in Zech. 6:14. It is probable, however, that the original reading was "Josiah," as in the Syr. and vs. 10. See JOSIAH 2.

HEN [ὄρνις, bird, cock, hen] (Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34). The female of the domestic fowl and of various other birds. Ὄρνις can mean the female of any bird. For figures involving birds to describe God's relation to Israel, cf. Deut. 32:11; Pss. 17:8; 36:7—H 36:8; 91:4; Isa. 31:5; etc. The words of the Lord to Israel in II Esd. 1:30: "I gathered you as a hen gathers her brood under her wings," are thought to be part of a second-century Christian interpolation in this apocalypse.

See also COCK.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HENA hĕn′ə [הֲנַע; LXX Ανα, Αναγ, etc.]. A town mentioned in II Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13. Its location is not known. In II Kings 18:13-36 it is related that the Assyrian king Sennacherib, who then was out on an expedition against Jerusalem, sent his envoys from his headquarters at Lachish to persuade Hezekiah to give up his anti-Assyrian policy. The Assyrian envoys stated that Hezekiah would have no success. Other kings had tried the same but without result. To illustrate this statement, the fate of other cities, including Hena, was referred to.

A. HALDAR

HENADAD hĕn′ə dăd [חֲנַדָד, perhaps favor of Hadad (weather deity)]. The eponym for a Levitical house of priests mentioned in connection with the building of the temple under Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:9), the repair of the Jerusalem wall in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:18, 24), and the signing of Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:9).

B. T. DAHLBERG

HENNA [כֹּפֶר, kōpher; κύπρος]; KJV CAMPHIRE. A fragrant flowering shrub or tree, Lawsonia inermis L., which is common in the Middle East.

In Song of S. 1:14 the lover is likened to the fragrant cluster of the henna blossoms "in [from?] the vineyards of Engedi," where the tree has been found. In 4:13-14 the tree is listed with NARD; SAFFRON; CALAMUS; CINNAMON; and FRANKINCENSE in a metaphor in praise of the bride.

Kᵉphārîm in Song of S. 7:11—H 7:12, usually translated "villages," may also refer to "henna flowers" (cf. Amer. Trans.).

See also COSMETICS; FLORA § A7*d*.

Fig. HEN 14.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 124-25.

J. C. TREVER

14. Henna

HENOCH hē'nək. Douay Version form of ENOCH; KJV form of ENOCH 1 in I Chr. 1:3; KJV form of HANOCH in I Chr. 1:33.

HEPHER hē'fər [חפר, help(?)]; HEPHERITES —fə rīts. 1. Eponym of a clan of the tribe of Manasseh or of Gilead (Num. 26:32-33; 27:1; Josh. 17:2-3). See EPHER 3.

2. A man or family of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 4:6).

3. One of David's MIGHTY MEN (I Chr. 11:36); the text differs from that in II Sam. 23:34, and both may be corrupt.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 155. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

4. A Canaanite city whose king was defeated by Joshua (Josh. 12:17) and which later figures in the listing of Solomon's administrative districts. "All the land of Hepher" was under the jurisdiction of Ben-hesed, one of Solomon's officials; and, with ARUBBOTH and SOCO, it composed the third administrative district (I Kings 4:10). Hepher is listed, together with Arubboth, on an early-eighth-century ostracon; and both have been identified with the places mentioned above.

The exact location of Hepher is unknown; Hafireh, ca. two miles E of Arubboth, and Tell Ibshar have been suggested.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Administrative Divisions of Israel and Judah," JPOS, V (1925), 28-31.

W. L. REED

HEPHZIBAH hĕf'zī bə [חפצי־בה; חפץ plus ב, my delight is in her]. 1. The wife of King Hezekiah, and the mother of Manasseh (II Kings 21:1).

2. Symbolic name for the restored Jerusalem, when God's "delight" will again be in her (Isa. 62:4 KJV). The RSV translates: "My delight is in her."

D. HARVEY

HERALD. An officer making state or royal proclamations public, or bearing ceremonial messages between princes and powers. There is no evidence that he carried challenges (see AMBASSADOR; INTERPRETER). The word כרוזא in Dan. 3:4 translates a Greek loan word, κῆρυξ, which is also used in the NT for "one who proclaims" (I Tim. 2:7; II Tim. 1:11; II Pet. 2:5). In Daniel it has its original meaning. In the NT it is used metaphorically for the "preacher," and is so translated in Timothy. Peter applies the word to the warning of Noah. The term "herald" is used also in the phrase "herald of good tidings" to translate the participial phrase מבשרת (Isa. 40:9; 41:27; KJV "that bringest good tidings"). In this phrase is the OT gospel. The metaphor suggests the preacher is a herald in that he bears a message or proclamation given him by the heavenly King.

C. U. WOLF

HERB. Translation of several words, including:

a) ארה (II Kings 4:39). In Ugaritic 'ar is found parallel to šblt (שבלת, EAR OF GRAIN), indicating that a cereal or grain is meant here, rather than an herb. See SHIBBOLETH.

b) Λάχανον (Luke 11:42; KJV also in Matt. 13: 32 and parallels; Rom. 14:2), a cultivated, as opposed to a wild, plant.

See also BITTER HERBS; GRASS; VEGETABLES.

Bibliography. A. E. Rüthy, Die Pflanze und ihre Teile (1942), pp. 38-39. R. W. CORNEY

HERCULES hûr'kyə lēz ['Ηρακλῆς] (II Macc. 4: 19). Hercules, god of the Olympic games held in Tyre every five years, was substituted as king of the city for the old Phoenician god, Melkart, and honors were paid to Hercules in Tyre (cf. Strabo Geography 16.2.23). Jason sent ambassadors from Jerusalem to convey three thousand silver drachmas for the sacrifice to the god. But the escort thought it inappropriate that the money should be used for such pagan sacrifice. It was used instead for fitting out some ships. S. B. HOENIG

HERD. See SHEEP; CATTLE.

HERDSMAN [בוקר, רעה, βόσκων]; KJV HERDMAN. A keeper of domestic animals that go in herds. The word רעה (Gen. 13:7-8; 26:20; I Sam. 21:7) is more often translated "shepherd" (see SHEEP). בוקר in Amos 7:14 appears to be derived from a word meaning "oxen," and is considered by some a scribal error for נוקד, or נקד, used in Amos 1:1 ("shepherds") and of King Mesha of Moab (II Kings 3:4; "sheep breeder"). Amos' claim to be a בוקר or נקד rather than a prophet (נביא) is usually interpreted as evidence of his lay origin. However, recent study of similar Ugaritic and Akkadian words has led some of the Scandinavian school to suggest that נקד and בוקר may be official priestly titles, indicating that Amos held a cultic office.

See also AMOS; DRESSER OF SYCAMORE TREES.

Bibliography. Milos Bič, Vetus Testamentum, 1 (Oct., 1951), 293 ff. C. U. WOLF

HERES, ASCENT OF hĭr'ĭz [מעלה החרס, ascent of the sun]. A place where Gideon turned back from pursuing the Midianites (Judg. 8:13). The reading is doubtful; the KJV translates the words "before the sun was up" and Aq. and Symm. both read מלמעלה ההרים, "from up in the mountains." S. COHEN

HERES, CITY OF. See SUN, CITY OF THE.

HERES, MOUNT. KJV form of HAR-HERES. See also HERES, ASCENT OF.

HERESH hĭr′ĕsh [חרש, mute, or taciturn] (I Chr. 9:15). A Levite listed among the returned exiles. The name is lacking in the parallel Neh. 11:15-16.

HERESY [ἡ αἵρησις]. Originally, a school, sect, faction; later, the opposite of orthodoxy.

In Hellenistic Greece the term "heresy" meant a philosophical school with its special doctrine. The usage was similar in Judaism—e.g., the school or party of the PHARISEES; the SADDUCEES; the ESSENES; etc. The Hebraic-rabbinic equivalent of the word is גדבה or מיו, the latter of which refers usually to inner-Jewish factions.

The NT language is influenced by Hellenistic and Jewish terminology—e.g., Acts 24:5, where Paul's opponents call him a "ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes," thus designating Christianity as a sect (see NAZARENE) and using language similar to Josephus and the rabbinic sources (cf. Acts 5:17; 15:5; 26:5).

The new Christian usage of the term, with reference to inner-Christian factions, began as soon as a Christian church was established. Church and heresy became excluding entities—i.e., the Greek term was used in a bad sense (I Cor. 11:18-19; Gal. 5:20), yet without the technical meaning of "schism" (τὸ σχίσμα, "separation," "division"), which seems to refer to a dogmatic and organizational break. An exegetical difficulty exists with regard to I Cor. 11:18-19, where αἵρησις and σχίσμα appear side by side. The passage indicates that with "schism" the parties of I Cor. 1:10 ff are meant, while heretic factions seem to be understood as possible or even necessary before the end time. II Pet. 2:1 speaks of "false prophets" who "secretly bring in destructive heresies." The exegetical and theological question arises whether the church is able to tolerate "heresies," at the same time being forced to reject the possibility of "schisms." E. DINKLER

HERETH hĭr′ĕth [חרת] (I Sam. 22:5); KJV HARETH hâr′—. A forest between Adullam and Giloh in which David hid after his sojourn in Moab; possibly to be located around Kharas, a hamlet near Khirbet Qila (see KEILAH), ca. 6½ miles E of Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis). V. R. GOLD

HERITAGE. There is no clear distinction in the Hebrew Bible between the terms "INHERITANCE" and "heritage." The KJV generally uses "heritage" to designate those things, both spiritual and material, which come from God (Job 20:29). The RSV uses "inheritance" in material matters (Num. 27:7) and "heritage" in spiritual (Pss. 94:14; 136:22).

Land and territory were believed to come into possession of Hebrew families by heritage. They were theirs by divine gift, not by conquest (Num. 26:53). They then passed from generation to generation by inheritance (Num. 36:7). Spiritual qualities, relationships with God, even assured material prosperity, were accepted as part of the heritage (Ps. 16:5-6). W. G. WILLIAMS

HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF hûr′məs. An apocalyptic work by a Roman prophet Hermas, whom ecclesiastical tradition since Origen uncritically identified with the personage named in Rom. 16:14. The Muratorian Canon of the Roman church (ca. A.D. 200) states that the work was written when Hermas' brother, Pius, was bishop of Rome—i.e., ca. 140. This date may well mark the completion and publication of the Shepherd; but internal evidence, supported by the MS tradition, suggests that the first four Visions, at least, may be as early as the beginning of the second century. In Vision II.4.3, reference is made to Clement as one entrusted to send the book to other communities. It is possible that this Clement is the reputed third bishop of Rome and author of a letter of the Roman church to the Corinthians. See CLEMENT, EPISTLE OF.

The Shepherd has three principal divisions: five Visions, twelve Mandates or Commandments, and ten Similitudes or Parables (though these last are more allegorical in character than parabolic). Vision V serves as an introduction to the Mandates; and Mandate XII leads into the first Similitude. There are, however, Mandates scattered among the Visions and Similitudes; and Visions also occur in the Similitudes. Similitude IX, the lengthiest of its group, takes up and develops Vision III, and actually appears to be the beginning of a fourth major division, since Hermas introduces it by the statement: "After I had written the commandments and parables of the Shepherd."

In the first four Visions, the revealer is a woman named Rhoda, identified by Hermas as his onetime mistress when he was a slave. She is actually a Sibylline figure, who in successive transformations from an elderly lady to a young and beautiful woman is a symbolic representation of the church. With Vision V, a figure garbed as a shepherd and named the Angel of Penitence takes over the role of revealer; and from this personage the work derives its title.

The principal theme of Hermas' apocalypse is the revelation of a "second chance" of repentance to baptized Christians, in view of an impending persecution and the second coming of the Lord. This penitence will avail to save even those who have committed the most grievous sins, including apostasy. Hence Hermas' teaching has been understood as a significant modification of a rigoristic tradition in the church that refused reconciliation to Christians excommunicated for serious offenses committed after baptism (cf. Heb. 6:4-8; 10:26-29; 12:16-17). There is, however, no notion of a penitential system in Hermas, such as developed a generation later in the Catholic Church. The offer of respite is extraordinary, and linked to an imminent crisis. It is not possible to identify precisely the occasion of this crisis, although some critics have connected it with the tradition of a "new remission of sins preached in the third year of Trajan" (A.D. 100), mentioned in a book by a Jewish Christian heretic Elkesai (cf. Hippolytus Against Heresies IX.8).

The Shepherd is replete with moralistic instructions. In Vision III.8.3-8, a series of personified Christian virtues supports a "tower" that is symbolic of the church. The chief one is faith, defined as "that by which the elect of the Lord are saved." The other virtues (each one successively portrayed as a daughter of the preceding virtue) are: self-control, simplicity, knowledge, innocence, reverence, and love. "Whoever serves them and has strength to persevere in their works will have his dwelling in the tower with the saints of God." Salvation requires right doing no less than right believing; and remission of sins is made contingent upon keeping the commandments. Hermas is the first Christian moralist to promote the idea of works of supererogation over and beyond the commandments, for which the reward is a "more surpassing glory and esteem from God"—specific examples of which are the refraining of a widowed person from remarriage (Mandate IV.4), and the performing of a fast in order to provide food for the poor and needy (Similitude V.3).

The root of sin, in Hermas' view, is "double-mindedness" (cf. Jas. 1:8; 4:8). From it issue blasphemy, hypocrisy, jealousy, dishonesty, pride, lust, and contentiousness. He is vehement in denunciation of the rich, nor does he spare to reprimand the church's hierarchy for its factiousness (Vision III.9.7-9) and avarice (Similitude IX.26.2-3). No respecter of persons, Hermas remarks upon his own sins as a father and a man of business, and upon those of his shrewish wife and unruly, faithless children. His portrayal of ordinary Christian living in his time belies the idealistic notion that many have of the church in that age. It should be said, however, that many critics consider the autobiographical details in the Shepherd to be fictitious. Altogether Hermas pictures the church as a very mixed society on this earth, comparable to the conception in the Matthean parable of the wheat and the weeds.

Fundamentally, the source of Hermas' ethical principles is to be found in Hellenistic Jewish moral teaching, but slightly recast with Christian perspectives. In this respect his outlook is very similar to the ethical teaching of the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Two Ways material in the DIDACHE, and the Letter of James. Of special interest is his theory of two kinds of "spirits" or "angels" in man, both good and evil respectively, which has an interesting parallel in the instruction on the "two spirits" in the Essene Manual of Discipline (1QS III.13–IV.26). This theory is particularly developed in Mandates V-VIII.

Apart from his ecclesiology, there is little in Hermas to interest the student of doctrine. He believed that the apostles and teachers, after their death, preached to and baptized those who had died before them (Similitude IX.16.5)—an interesting extension of the doctrine of the descent into Hades. His Christology exhibits adoptionist tendencies as regards the Lord's manhood (Similitude V.6.1); and he distinctly identifies the Son of God with the Holy Spirit (Similitude IX.1.1), and, in another passage, with Michael, the chief of the angels (Similitude VIII.3.2-3).

Hermas' culture was very limited. His style is of mediocre quality, and betrays numerous Semitisms and Latinisms. He can be very confused in working out details of his allegories. Some of the scenario of his visions and similitudes shows striking resemblances to the Tabula of Pseudo-Cebes, and several critics have sought parallels to his themes and images in pagan erotic novels and in the Hermetic writings. He occasionally cites the OT, and he knows several apocrypha. The closest parallels to his apocalyptic are to be found in II Esdras. In one place (Vision II.3.4) he refers a citation to a Jewish book (otherwise unknown) of Eldad and Modat (for the names, cf. Num. 11:26).

To students of the history of the NT canon, Hermas is disappointing. He appears to have known Matthew and Mark, less probably Luke and John. He reflects some of Paul's letters, Hebrews, I Peter, and Revelation. The close parallels of outlook and vocabulary between Hermas and the Letter of James are insufficient to prove direct literary dependence one way or the other.

The Shepherd was highly esteemed by the ante-Nicene fathers, who considered it inspired. It was widely used for the moral instruction of catechumens. In Egypt, it enjoyed a quasi-canonical authority; and, with the pseudo-Epistle of Barnabas, it was included, after the books of the NT, in the Codex Sinaiticus (fourth century). No complete text of the original Greek is extant, for both Codex Sinaiticus and a fifteenth-century Codex Athensis are defective. Of the numerous fragments among Greek papyri, the most important by reason of age (second half of the third century) are the sixty-two leaves in the possession of the University of Michigan (edited by C. Bonner in 1934). Two Latin versions are extant—one of them almost contemporaneous with Hermas—and these are essential for reconstructing the text. There are also important Coptic fragments, a single fragment in Middle Persian, and a defective version in Ethiopic. Strangely, no relics of a Syriac version have come to light.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

Bibliography. Best critical texts: M. Whittaker, Die apostolischen Väter, I: Der Hirt des Hermas (1956; in the Corpus of the Berlin Academy). R. Joly, Hermas, Le Pasteur (Sources Chrétiennes, no. 53; 1958), with French translation, Introduction, and Notes.

The standard commentary is that of M. Dibelius in H. Lietzmann, Handbuch zum NT, Ergänzungsband (1923).

For extensive bibliography, see Joly's edition and J. Quasten, Patrology, I (1950), 97-105.

Special studies: K. Lake, "The Shepherd of Hermas and Christian Life in Rome in the Second Century," HTR, IV (1911), 25-46. O. D. Watkin, A History of Penance (1920), I, 47-72. W. J. Wilson, "The Career of the Prophet Hermas," HTR, XX (1927), 21-62. D. W. Riddle, "The Messages of the Shepherd of Hermas: A Study in Social Control," JR, VII (1927), 561-77. O. J. F. Seitz, "Relationship of the Shepherd of Hermas to the Epistle of James," JBL, LXIII (1944), 131-40. J. P. Audet, "Affinités littéraires et doctrinales du Manuel de Discipline," RB, LX (1953), 41-82. R. Joly, "La doctrine pénitentielle du Pasteur d'Hermas et l'exégèse récente," RHR, CXLVII (1955), 32-49. K. Rahner, "Die Busslehre im Hirten des Hermas," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie, LXXVII (1955), 385-431. P. Carrington, The Early Christian Church (1957), I, 391-409; II, 91-94. H. Chadwick, "The New Edition of Hermas," JTS, N.S. VIII (1957), 274-80.

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

HERMES hûr'mēz ['Ερμῆς, perhaps from ἕρμα, prop, rock, cairn, etc., but possibly non-Greek in origin]. 1. A Greek deity, son of Zeus and half brother of Apollo, whom he resembles without attaining his moral significance. He is the master thief and trickster, the god who brings good luck, honestly or dishonestly, hence the patron alike of thieves and of traders; he is the herald of the gods, and therefore carries the herald's staff, which often becomes a magic wand in his hands; and he is the god of eloquence. He seldom receives a public cult, but is widely worshiped in the religion of the family as a fertility-god. This is probably his primary and most primitive aspect, and is reflected in the pillar with phallus, surmounted with bust, which represented him at the house door. Under another serious aspect, he is Psychopompos, the Marshaler of souls, who guides the dead along the road to the realm of Hades. In the astral religion he is identified with the planet Mercury; and in the syncretism of Hellenistic times, he is identified with the Egyptian god Thoth and given the epithet Trismegistus, "thrice-great," and becomes the great revealer of the way to the attainment of immortality.

At Lystra the superstitious people took the apostles for gods in the likeness of men: "Barnabas they called Zeus, and Paul, because he was the chief speaker, they called Hermes" (Acts 14:12). It was Hermes in his character as god of eloquence and divine herald that they had in mind.

2. An individual greeted by Paul in Rom. 16:14, about whom nothing further is known.

F. W. Beare

HERMOGENES hər mŏj'ə nēz ['Ερμογένης, born of Hermes] (II Tim. 1:15). Someone mentioned with Phygelus and "all who are in Asia" as having deserted Paul—for theological reasons, and/or for fear of sharing Paul's fate in Rome. In the Acts of Paul (2:1, 4, 11-14) Hermogenes is described as a coppersmith and, with Demas, as "full of hypocrisy" (cf. also Jos. Apion I.xxiii; Suetonius Domitian 10).

B. H. Throckmorton, Jr.

HERMON, MOUNT hûr'mən [חרמון, from חרם, in the Hiph'il consecrate—i.e., a consecrated place, a sanctuary; LXX Αερμων]; HERMONITES —mə nīts. The mountain which forms the S spur of the Anti-lebanon Range. According to Deut. 3:9, its name varied in the various dialects of Syria and Palestine, its Amorite name being שניר, its Sidonian שריון (for this name cf. now also the Ras Shamra Texts). In Deut. 4:48 we find the name שיאון. In I Chr. 5:23 differentiation is made between Senīr, Hermon, and Baal-hermon, and in the Song of Songs between Shenir and Hermon. Perhaps Senir was the name of a N part of Anti-lebanon.

Mount Hermon reaches a height of ca. 9,100 feet above the sea and offers a majestic view from far distances. Its crown is to be seen from many places in Palestine. Because it is covered with snow during a great part of the year, the Arabs call it Jebel el-Sheikh, the "gray-haired mountain," or Jebel el-Thalj, the "mountain of the snow." From Mount Hermon the water comes which flows in the rivers of N Hauran; and furthermore, the sources of the Jordan are to be found on its slopes. Fig. JOR 26.

The impressive view of Mount Hermon has always fascinated the human mind, and since times immemorial it has been a sacred mountain. Its Hebrew name may perhaps be taken as an allusion to this fact. In Judg. 3:3 the name is Mount Baal-hermon, which indicates that a local Baal was worshiped there, as was the case in many other places (cf. I Chr. 5:23). In Ps. 133:3, Mount Hermon is associated with the dew, a well-known symbol of the vegetation-deities. In a treaty between the Hittites and the Amorites from ca. 1350 B.C., Mount Hermon is alluded to as a sacred mountain; this text may be the oldest known mentioning of that fact. Mount Hermon was used as a cult place also in later periods, as is shown by the fact that a Greek inscription has been found describing the local god of the mountain. It is also mentioned in I Enoch and by Eusebius. Jerome describes the cult place on the S peak called Qasr 'Antar.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

15. Mount Hermon from the E

Fig. HER 15.

A. Haldar

HEROD (FAMILY) hĕr'əd [הורדוס; 'Ηρῴδης]. The dynasty which under Rome ruled Jewish Palestine 37 B.C.–A.D. 70.

A. Family origins
B. Herod the Great
  1. Youth
  2. Governor of Galilee
  3. King
    a. Consolidation (37-25 B.C.)
    b. Prosperity (25-13 B.C.)
    c. Domestic troubles (13-4 B.C.)
  4. Assessment
C. Archelaus
D. Herod Philip
E. Herod Antipas
F. Agrippa I
G. Agrippa II
H. In the NT
  1. Agrippa I
  2. Agrippa II
  3. Herod Antipas
  4. Archelaus
  5. Aristobulus
  6. Drusilla
  7. Bernice
  8. Felix
  9. Herod the Great
  10. Herod Philip
  11. Herodians
  12. Herodias
  13. Philip
  14. Salome
  15. Summary
Bibliography

A. FAMILY ORIGINS. The family of Herod rose to significance in the reign of the Hasmonean queen Salome Alexandra.

She and Alexander Janneus (see JANNEUS, ALEXANDER) had two sons, the elder HYRCANUS II, the younger ARISTOBULUS. When Janneus died in 78 B.C., Salome retained the throne, but the high priesthood, for which only males were eligible (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES), went to Hyrcanus II, who was in line for the throne also. The younger Aristobulus attempted to seize the throne; Salome Alexandra's sudden death (69) saved her from being deposed by her own son.

Hyrcanus was crowned king; but Aristobulus, aided by mercenaries and Sadducees, arose in direct rebellion and defeated Hyrcanus. To Aristobulus went the crown and the high priesthood. The brothers made a public show of reconciliation in the temple at Jerusalem, so that an income from revenues of the high priesthood was assigned to Hyrcanus. That the reconciliation did not endure is ascribed by Josephus to Antipater, the father of Herod.

The grandfather of Herod had also borne the name ANTIPATER; Herod's father was known also by the shorter name Antipas. The first Antipater had been designated by Janneus and Alexandra as "general" (στρατηγός) of Idumea, of which land Antipater was a native. It seems clear from Josephus that the grandfather was already dead at the time of the controversy between Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus.

Josephus calls the second Antipater an "old and bitterly hated foe" of Aristobulus, but abstains from justifying the epithet. He pauses in his Jewish War merely to mention Antipater's Idumean background, and in Antiq. XIV.i.3 briefly to discuss it. He cites NICOLAS of Damascus, a Gentile historian, to the effect that Antipater was of a principal Jewish family of Babylonia which had come to Judea, but he charges Nicolas with the wish to flatter and incur favor with the family of Herod. The Idumean origin is referred to very often in Josephus and is alluded to in rabbinic literature (Sot. 7.8).

A later legend (in Just. Dial. 52; and Julius Africanus, cited in Euseb. Hist. I.7.11) makes Antipater the son of a temple slave of Apollo at Ashkelon in Philistia. Writers on Herod and his family, even in modern times, treat the dynasty more as novelists than as students of history. The frequent view depicts Antipater as a crafty self-seeker, devoid of worthy attributes. Josephus, though scarcely an admirer of Antipater, does allude (Antiq. XIV.vi.2-3; viii.1) to affirmative qualities possessed by Herod's father.

Antipater regarded himself as a Jew and was so regarded by his contemporaries. The portrait of Antipater in Josephus is itself not a consistent one; some (e.g., Schuerer) explain the inconsistencies as due to the different sources, favorable and unfavorable, which Josephus utilized without editing, while others (e.g., Laqueur) contend that Josephus grew in anti-Herodian feeling between the time of his first account of the dynasty in The Jewish War and the later occasion when he composed a parallel account in Antiquities. Any summary of Antipater is the more reliable as it adheres closely to what he did (as far as we can know it).

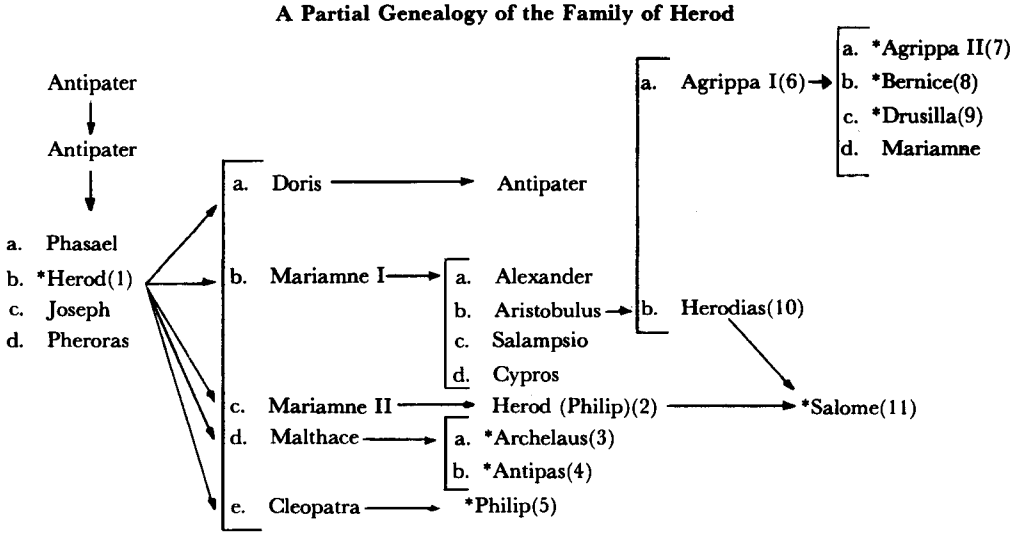
In the issue between Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus, Hyrcanus was content to accept the subordinate position accorded to him after the reconciliation. Hyrcanus' passive nature is stressed by Josephus (Antiq. XIII.xvi.1; XIV.i.3; War I.x.4; Laqueur doubts the authenticity of Josephus' report). The initiative to change matters, however, was supplied by Antipater, whose position, official or unofficial, remains unspecified.

Ultimately Antipater's pressure had an effect; Hyrcanus determined to flee to Aretas III, king of the neighboring Nabateans, for safety and help. Prior to the flight, Antipater had visited Aretas and received the latter's assurances of help.

Aretas defeated Aristobulus, who fled from the battle to Jerusalem; on Passover, troops of Aretas and Jews who had joined Hyrcanus besieged the temple.

At this juncture (65 B.C.), the Roman general Scaurus, who had been sent to Syria by Pompey, arrived in Judea. In 64, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus appeared before Pompey at Damascus to press their rival claims; so, too, did some Jews who asked that the brothers be rejected and that theocracy be restored. Josephus relates that Hyrcanus' statement of his case "was supported by more than a thousand of the most reputable Jews, whom Antipater had provided for that purpose" (Antiq. XIV.iii.2).

Pompey deferred his decision. When certain promises were broken by Aristobulus, Pompey moved against the Holy City, which, torn by internal strife, fell to the Romans (63). When Josephus summarizes the event as a calamity, he omits mention of Antipater, blaming rather Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus (Antiq. XIV.iv.5). Hyrcanus, "because in various ways he had been useful to" Pompey, was restored as high priest; Jerusalem was made tributary to the Romans and placed administratively under the legate of the province of Syria.



The Roman conquest began to extend southward beyond Palestine; Antipater was assigned by Hyrcanus and by Scaurus to tasks which he did well.

Aristobulus and his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, separately tried unsuccessful revolts (Alexander in 57; Aristobulus the same year; Antigonus in 56; Alexander in 55). Josephus next states (War I.viii.7) that "Gabinius [the Roman governor] then proceeded to Jerusalem, where he reorganized the government in accordance with Antipater's wishes." Gabinius "sent Antipater, who was a man of good sense, to the unruly elements, to see whether he could put a stop to their unruly behavior . . . but he could not restrain Alexander" (Antiq. XIV.vi.3).

Josephus relates the activities of C. Cassius Longinus (of Shakespeare's Julius Caesar) in 53-51, the chief incident of which was the slaying at Antipater's request of Peitholaus, a Jewish general who was carrying on the unextinguished revolt initiated by Aristobulus. At this point, Josephus (War I.viii.9; Antiq. XIV.vii.3) pauses to relate that Antipater had married a woman named Cypros, of an illustrious "Arabian" (probably Nabatean) family; and he lists their children as four sons, Phasael, Herod, Joseph, Pheroras, and a daughter, Salome.

After Julius Caesar became master of Rome (49), he released Aristobulus from a prison in Rome, and

A Partial Genealogy of the Family of Herod

*Mentioned in NT

(1) Herod had ten wives. Names of two are unknown. Three names, in addition to the five listed, are Pallas, Phaedra, and Elpis. (2) The first husband of Herodias and the father of Salome. Herodias later married Antipas. Salome married her uncle Philip, the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra. (3) King of Judea. (4) Tetrarch of Galilee. (5) Tetrarch of Ituraea. (6) King of Judea. (7) King of Judea. (8) Mistress of Titus. (9) Wife of Felix. (10) First the wife of (2), then of (4); the mother of (11) sent him to Syria to fight the Pompeyites; but Aristobulus was poisoned by friends of Pompey. Caesar, fighting in Egypt in 48-47, received help from Antipater, who received several wounds in combat. To please Antipater, Caesar made him a Roman citizen and confirmed Hyrcanus as high priest.

Caesar disregarded some charges brought by Antigonus, and upheld Antipater, now procurator (ἐπίτροπος) of Judea, and permitted Hyrcanus to rebuild Jerusalem and to be known as "ethnarch" as well as high priest (Antiq. XIV.viii.5; War I.x.2-3).

Antipater appealed to the restless Judean populace to be loyal to Hyrcanus; Josephus comments (War I.x.3; Antiq. XIV.ix.1) that "while he spoke in this strain, he took the country into his own hands, finding Hyrcanus indolent and without the energy necessary to a king." Antipater appointed his son Phasael governor of Jerusalem and his son Herod governor of Galilee.

Antipater "was courted by the nation as if he were king. . . . Notwithstanding this, his affection for Hyrcanus and loyalty to him underwent no change" (War I.x.5).

After the death of Caesar (44), Cassius took control of Syria and levied tribute on the Jews. Antipater arranged for his sons and others to help collect the money. Among these was one Malichus, whose life Antipater had previously saved. After Cassius departed from Syria, Malichus bribed a butler to poison Antipater (43); Herod killed Malichus by stabbing him (War I.xi.4; Antiq. XIV.xi.4); the former passage eulogizes Antipater as a "man of great energy in the conduct of affairs, whose crowning merit was that he recovered and preserved the kingdom for Hyrcanus"; the latter, "a man distinguished for piety, justice, and devotion to his country."

B. HEROD THE GREAT. 1. Youth. Herod was the second of Antipater's five children. On the premise that Herod was seventy at the time of his death (see War I.xxxiii.1; Antiq. XVII.viii.1), his birth may be set in 73 B.C. Josephus (Antiq. XIV.ix.2) incorrectly designates him as only fifteen in 47. In War I.xxi.13, Josephus speaks of his great physical constitution and precision in the use of the javelin and the bow. A passage (War I.x.7) speaks of Hyrcanus' love for him. The father's position undoubtedly was the lever that moved Herod into the governorship of Galilee.

2. Governor of Galilee. The title Herod bore was στρατηγός; its precise connotation is unknown. He quickly (47) aroused admiration among Galilean Jews and Roman officials in Syria at his promptness in capturing and executing a "brigand" Ezekias and some followers. In Hyrcanus' court, however, malicious people charged that Herod (and Phasael) were acting dictatorially; Herod was charged with having violated Jewish law in the execution of Ezekias and others. Hyrcanus ordered Herod to trial. The account in Antiq. XIV is more bitter toward Herod than that in War I.

The accounts of Herod's trial in The Jewish War and Antiquities contain glaring contradictions. They agree on little more than the fear of Hyrcanus and most of the Sanhedrin of condemning Herod, and of Hyrcanus' directing an acquittal. Herod emerged from the farce stronger than before. He even contemplated deposing Hyrcanus.

The Roman governor of Syria, Sextus Caesar, appointed Herod a Roman official as governor of Coele-Syria (and possibly Samaria). Now (46) Herod's career became intertwined in the affairs of Rome in Syria.

Sextus Caesar, a relative of Julius Caesar, was murdered by Bassus, a partisan of Julius' foe Pompey; Antipater, a friend of Julius, sent troops under his two sons against Bassus. This minor war dragged on indecisively for almost three years. After the murder of Caesar in 44, Cassius came to Syria; Herod, Phasael, and Malichus were among those designated to raise certain required taxes.

As the alignment of Octavius Caesar and Antony against Brutus and Cassius became crystallized, Cassius reappointed Herod as governor, or possibly "procurator"—the accounts diverge—of all Syria, promising to appoint him king of Judea when the war was concluded (War I.xi.3; Antiq. XIV.xi.2).

Herod quieted turbulent Samaria and then marched toward Jerusalem (43). Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, again raised troops to invade Judea. Herod defeated these (42) and was acclaimed in Jerusalem, where previously he had been regarded with hostility. By this time Herod had a wife, Doris, and, by her, a son, Antipater. Doris is described by Josephus as a native of Jerusalem (Thackeray errs in rendering "native" by "Jewess"; cf. Marcus; Otto asserts, beyond the evidence, that she was an Idumean). Herod became betrothed to Mariamne, the granddaughter of Hyrcanus II. However fraught it was to be with ultimate personal disaster, the latter betrothal won him an acceptance in Judean circles.

Jewish leaders came to Antony, who had taken up residence in Syria, to lay accusations against Herod and Phasael. The outcome was that Antony appointed Herod and Phasael "tetrarchs."

Two years later a Parthian prince, Pacorus, joined with Antigonus in the effort to place the latter on the throne held by Hyrcanus. Thereby began a complicated series of incidents, the end result of which was to bring the career of Herod to its first climax. The invaders besieged Jerusalem and were partly successful. Opposed to them were the forces of Phasael and Herod (War I.xiii.2 says, undoubtedly mistakenly, Phasael and Hyrcanus; Antiq. XIV.xiii.3, Phasael and Herod). It is evident that nothing less than civil war was under way. Daily skirmishes between the opposing forces took place.

But when Pentecost brought hosts of pilgrims to Jerusalem, a Parthian general, named like the prince Pacorus, proposed to Phasael that he negotiate a cessation of the war with the Parthian king Barzaphranes. Though Herod was suspicious of the good faith of the proposal, Phasael decided to go and to take Hyrcanus with him. They met the Parthian king in Galilee. After negotiations, Hyrcanus and Phasael were treacherously put in chains; simultaneously a Parthian detachment, left behind in Jerusalem, tried to induce Herod to accompany them outside the walls of Jerusalem. Learning about Phasael, Herod set off for Masada with his troops and close relatives. After some vicissitudes, Herod moved on to Petra (Sela), the capital of the Nabatean kingdom.

Back in Jerusalem, the Parthians began a pillage, which they extended into other parts of Judea. Antigonus was made king. To guard against the possible restoration of Hyrcanus, Antigonus mutilated him, permanently disqualifying Hyrcanus from the high priesthood (Lev. 21:17 ff). Phasael died, either through suicide or poisoning or in battle.

Instead of help from the Nabatean king, Herod found orders to leave Nabatea promptly. He went to Egypt and then to Rome, where he was received graciously by Antony and Octavius Caesar (probably in December, 40). The Romans had good reason to despise Antigonus for having joined up with their foes, the Parthians; accordingly, Antony and Octavius, with Senate confirmation, named Herod the king of Judea (confirmed outside Josephus by Strabo XVI. 765; Appian Civil Wars V.75; Tac. Hist. V.9). We now encounter Herod, no longer as a governor or tetrarch, but as a king, and in the ensuing contentions against Antigonus, the stake is no longer that of indirect control of Judea, but that of kingship itself.

In late 39, Herod sailed from Italy. He marched through Galilee, paused to capture Joppa, and then moved on to Masada, where his relatives were under attack. Next, supported by Roman forces, he encamped on the W side of Jerusalem. Instead of attacking immediately, he had a proclamation made of his willingness to forget the offenses committed against him by his enemies. To this propaganda campaign Antigonus replied (Antiq. XIV.xv.2; The Jewish War is silent) that Herod was a "commoner and an Idumean, that is, a half-Jew." (When Antiq. XIV.viii.1 and XX.viii.7 are joined to the passage quoted, and are regarded in light of the forced conversions of the Idumeans by John Hyrcanus [Antiq. XIII.ix.1], they refute adequately the tendency of some interpreters to regard Herod, not alone as a usurper—this he was—but also as a Gentile. This judgment is not affected by the statement in Antiq. XIX.vii.3 that Herod was more akin to the Greeks than to the Jews, for the issue here is his cultural interests, not his formal affiliations.)

Idumea, Samaria, and Galilee had come over to Herod, though garrisons of Antigonus remained to be reduced and rebellion in Galilee to be put down. Herod moved on to Jerusalem to resume the interrupted siege. Meanwhile he married his betrothed Mariamne. A long and bitter siege resulted in victory. Antigonus fell captive to Sossius, who departed to join Antony, taking Antigonus with him.

According to Antiq. XV.i.2, Herod gave Antony a large bribe to persuade the Romans to put Antigonus out of the way; War I.xviii.3 tells simply that Antigonus fell beneath the ax.

With the death of Antigonus and the end of the Hasmonean dynasty, Herod ceased to be the nominee for king; he became the king in reality (37).

3. King. Though some scholars divide Herod's reign slightly differently, it is convenient to divide his reign, 37-4 B.C., into three parts: consolidation (37-25); prosperity (25-13); domestic trouble (13-4). Antiquities gives much more detail of Herod's reign than does The Jewish War. Contradictions and inconsistencies exist between the two accounts; moreover, there are contradictions even within Antiquities, which is the basis for the ensuing paraphrase.

a. Consolidation (37-25 B.C.). Internal problems were an immediately pressing concern, such as the need (War I.xviii.2) to stop the foreign allies from profaning the temple and pillaging Jerusalem; Herod accomplished this by distributing rewards (i.e., bribes) to the Romans for their services.

As to the Jews, Herod conferred high honors on those closely allied to him, and exterminated the loyal followers of Antigonus. For those who were partisans of neither, Herod had to find a suitable solution. Two Pharisees, Sameas and Pollio, members of the Sanhedrin, Herod treated with deference, because Pollio had recommended that the gates of Jerusalem be opened to Herod at the time of his attack in 37. On other members of the Sanhedrin he took bitter vengeance. It is likely that Herod deprived the Sanhedrin of its civil powers, limiting it to religious affairs.

Historians have often wished to equate protagonists and opponents in these struggles with Sadducees and Pharisees, or with patriots and "assimilationists." The debated question of the emergence of the RABBI in this time has increased speculation. Rabbinic literature (e.g., Pirqe Aboth I) speaks of successions of Zugoth ("pairs") of luminaries, but is devoid of any firm chronology. It is difficult to weave this rabbinic material in with that provided by Josephus; Christian scholars have been guilty of ignoring it almost entirely, and some Jewish scholars of seeing more than is visible.

Two active Hasmoneans, Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus, were threats to Herod. Hyrcanus II, no longer eligible to the high priesthood, had gone to Babylon, there to be received with a warm welcome. Herod invited him to return to Judea, promising to share the throne with him. Initially he treated him with honor, calling him "father." But subsequently his treatment changed. Aristobulus was Herod's wife's brother. It might have been reasonable to designate Aristobulus the high priest, but Herod ignored Aristobulus and called Ananelus to the position.

The action incensed his mother-in-law, Alexandra. She wrote to Cleopatra to intercede with Antony, to appoint Aristobulus the high priest. (It will be recalled that Antony had supplanted Caesar in the affection of this queen of Egypt, and had thereby become virtually a slave to her.) Aristobulus was then only sixteen. Herod avoided the issue by unseating Ananelus and appointing Aristobulus high priest.

When Aristobulus officiated at the temple on Pentecost, the great public acclaim for the young Hasmonean sealed his fate. A little later, Herod, sojourning at Jericho, invited Aristobulus to visit him. The day was hot, and a bathing party took place. Herod playfully ducked Aristobulus under the water, till the young man drowned.

Alexandra believed the death was murder. She sent a report to Cleopatra, who persuaded Antony to summon Herod for an accounting; Herod was under obligation to go. But now more involved family affairs intrude. Herod's mother, Cypros, and his sister, Salome, commoners by birth and Idumeans by extraction, were treated to humiliations by Mariamne and Alexandra; Herod resented the slights. When he departed to see Antony, he put Mariamne and Alexandra under the surveillance of his uncle Joseph, who was also Salome's husband. Herod was aware that Antony could, and might, sentence him to death; he enjoined Joseph in strict secrecy that in that event Joseph should kill Mariamne, whose beauty was known to the lascivious Antony. Indeed, Cypros and Salome had told Herod that Mariamne had often committed adultery and that she had sent Antony a picture of herself, as though to exhibit that which might attract Antony's well-known lust.

Herod's eloquence, and his bribery, won over Antony. But on his return to Jerusalem, Herod heard from Salome an accusation that Mariamne and Joseph had committed adultery. Herod questioned Mariamne and was satisfied with her denial. However, she demanded to know why he had secretly instructed Joseph to kill her if he, Herod, were slain by Antony. Herod, suspicious, concluded that her knowledge of the secret could have come only if she and Joseph had really committed adultery. He had Joseph put to death; and he was torn, now as later, between love and murderous hatred of Mariamne (35 or 34).

Civil war broke out (32) between Antony and Octavius. Herod was assigned by Antony, at Cleopatra's instigation, to make war on the Nabateans, for Cleopatra hoped that when the two kingdoms had weakened each other, she could absorb both. Initially Herod was victorious over the Nabateans, but the tide of war was turned by troops of Cleopatra, who treacherously attacked Herod and defeated him. When a destructive earthquake added to Herod's predicament, he sent to Nabatea envoys to sue for peace, but the Nabateans slew them. Mustering his troops, Herod routed the foe and returned home.

Some few months later, Antony was defeated by Octavius at Actium (September, 31). Herod thought it necessary that Octavius (now Augustus) should regard him as the only possible ruler of Judea. This he accomplished by charging Hyrcanus II with plotting with the king of the Nabateans (Antiq. XV.vi.2), and thereupon having Hyrcanus killed. Other accounts do not bear out either indiscretion or treachery on Hyrcanus' part (Antiq. XV.vi.3-4).

On setting out to see Augustus, Herod considered it prudent to prevent Alexandra from stirring up revolt. He sent her and Mariamne to Alexandrium under two reliable custodians, Joseph and Soemus, with instructions that in the case of Herod's death they should kill the two women. (The similarity of circumstances between Herod's visit to Antony and this visit to Augustus raises questions debated by scholars. To discuss the problems here is impossible; note only that in The Jewish War, Herod is reported to have slain Mariamne and Joseph on returning from Antony in 35 or 34; in Antiquities he slew Mariamne and Soemus on returning from Augustus in 29). Herod won over Augustus and received confirmation of his royal rank.

Herod was never able to accept sanely the reality that Mariamne was dead. Alexandra, Mariamne's mother, was killed a year later. Three years later, Herod slew his brother-in-law Castobar, the man whom Salome had married after Herod had slain her first husband.

b. Prosperity (25-13 B.C.). Josephus begins the second period by specifying how Herod ruptured Jewish law. His violations include the introduction of quinquennial games in honor of Caesar and the building of a theater in Jerusalem and an amphitheater nearby. In 24 he erected a royal palace; he built or rebuilt a good many fortresses and Gentile temples; on the seacoast he built a harbor, a city which he named Caesarea, and many other buildings. See bibliography. Figs. CAE 1; PAL 3.

Such a period of prosperity rested on the confidence and good will reposed in Herod by Augustus. Antiq. XVII.ix.6 states that Herod was called "friend and confederate"—apparently a title conferrable upon a local king by the Romans. Considerable scholarly debate exists on this title; at stake is the question of the measure of autonomy Herod possessed. Herod, however obsequious he was to Rome, was no petty or insignificant ruler; he was an important king. Thus, his two sons by Mariamne he sent to Rome "to enjoy the company of Caesar." Augustus, visiting Syria in 20, received him graciously (Antiq. XV.x.3).

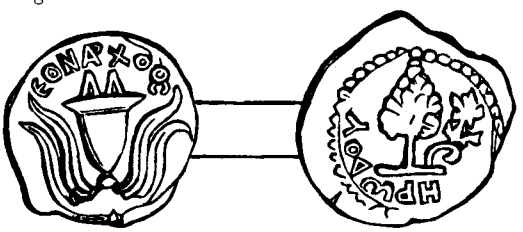
His infidelity to Judaism was not inconsistent with his rebuilding the temple in Jerusalem (ca. 20). Josephus (Antiq. XV.xi.1) calls it the most glorious of his actions; rabbinic literature (B.B. 4*a*) states that "one who has not seen Herod's temple has never seen a beautiful building." The rabbis suggest also that the edifice was his "atonement for having slain so many sages of Israel" (Numbers Rabba IV.14).

Herod married again another Mariamne, alluded to as Mariamne II. His wives totaled ten (Josephus is incorrect in War I.xxviii.4). We know of at least fifteen children, of whom ten were sons. A striving for power, for succession to the throne, or even usurpation of it, was inevitable. This struggle focuses initially on Antipater III, a son by Herod's first wife Doris. When Herod had married Mariamne I, he had pushed Doris and Antipater aside. Having slain Mariamne, he restored Doris to favor, centering his affection on Antipater. But he had two sons (three, but one died in infancy) by Mariamne I: Alexander and Aristobulus; these he sent to Rome to be educated.

Antipater III, Doris' son, regarded succession as his. But to Alexander and Aristobulus the real succession required Hasmonean blood, which they, through their mother, possessed, while Antipater did not. We need not make our way through the maze of machinations, plots, lies, and treacheries and artificial reconciliations used by the sons to discredit one another. Herod came to lack the ability to separate truth from lies. The very prosperity of the period, releasing him from obligations to external affairs, made him in these internal ones all the more involved and wavering. Not alone by his children, but also by the marital tribulations and excursions of his sister Salome and his brother Pheroras, was he unsettled.

c. Domestic troubles (13-4 B.C.). The rivalries between Antipater III and the sons of Mariamne I came into the open after 13. In 8, Herod took both Alexander and Aristobulus into custody on a charge of treason. At Caesar's instruction his sons were tried at Berytus (Beirut) by a court of Romans and of Herod's relatives. Both were condemned to death and executed in 7 or 6.

The family feuds were not over. Alexander had left two sons, and these Antipater regarded as a continuing threat. In 5, Antipater was brought to trial for instigating the poisoning of Pheroras and for plotting ventures against Herod.



In the midst of the trial proceedings a rebellion arose, directed largely at removing from the temple a golden eagle which Herod had had put over the main gate, in contravention of Jewish law. Herod's guard arrested those guilty of sedition. Fatally sick, Herod mustered strength to attend their trial and to denounce them.

Herod's physical strength was rapidly failing. He ordered the immediate execution of Antipater. Five days later Herod died.

4. Assessment. The murders, the violence, and the usurpation of the throne by Herod are acts not capable of being condoned. Historians frequently infer that Herod was completely a villain and his foes, so it would seem, heroes. A more just judgment would view him in his own context, where pretension to royalty, or its possession, carried with it the supposed obligation to the most ignoble conduct. The internecine struggles in Judea paralleled those in Rome itself, and duplicated those in the Roman provinces.

What can be said in greatest condemnation of Herod was not that he was worse than or different from other provincial kings, but that he was fully as bad as they were. Of adherence to Jewish ethics or fidelity to Jewish law or standards there is not one trace in Josephus' account; on the contrary, there are a number of passages which reflect his indifference and unconcern.

Herod was a Jew only by birth, the offspring of converts to Judaism. In his actions he was no more Jewish than were the petty Gentile monarchs with whom his offspring or relatives intermarried. He was the king of Judea, but never in any sense a Jewish king.

16. Copper coin of Herod the Great

Certainly his unadmirable career discloses qualities which, if addressed to worthy purposes, would have appeared admirable. His rise to power took place at a time of civil war and of internal upheavals. His skill in his maneuvers with Roman officials was matched by his military prowess. He carved a respected, relatively tranquil kingdom out of an important segment of the Roman Empire, and within that kingdom he bought, at a high price, a relatively high degree of order and peace.

Fig. HER 16.

C. ARCHELAUS. Archelaus (Ἀρχέλαος), son of Herod and Malthace, was named in his father's codicil as the principal successor—i.e., as king—while two brothers (see §§ D-E below) were named tetrarchs of limited territories.

Archelaus was aware of the broad hostility of the Jews to his family. He sought to avert difficulties by the double step of placating his own countrymen through kindliness and forbearance (thereby acting in sharp contrast to his father) and by the gesture of deferring his ascension to the throne until the kingship willed to him by his father could be confirmed by Rome.

His intent in the first case was frustrated by a revolt in 4 B.C. In the second case, he journeyed to Rome, accompanied by many members of his family; ostensibly they were to support him in his petition to receive Roman recognition. Herod had left a will (War I.xxxii.7), which named Antipas king, and the codicil (War I.xxxiii.7), which made Antipas only a tetrarch, and Archelaus king. Antipas also journeyed to Rome, to contest with his brother for the kingship. There ensued typical machinations.

Before a decision could be rendered, a third Jewish deputation was in Rome, to plead for autonomy and to bring charges against both the deceased Herod and Archelaus. By now, Philip, a third son of Herod, was also in Rome.

Augustus' decision divided the kingdom into halves. Over one half he named Archelaus as ethnarch, but deferred the title of king until Archelaus might show that he merited it. The other half Augustus split into two parts; Antipas became the tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and Philip the tetrarch of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and other small places. Archelaus became ethnarch of Judea, Idumea, and Samaria (War II.vi.3).

The brutal treatment by Archelaus of Jews and Samaritans led to the arrival in Rome of deputations from both to denounce him to Augustus. After a trial, Archelaus was banished to France, in A.D. 6. His territory was reduced to a province, under a PROCURATOR, Coponius (6-9). Archelaus died sometime after 18 (Strabo XVI.765).

D. HEROD PHILIP. The tetrarchy of Herod Philip, son of Herod and Cleopatra, included Batanea, Trachonitis, and nearby districts. Josephus tells us virtually nothing of his reign, though he mentions the founding of CAESAREA PHILIPPI (War II.ix.1), modern Banias. It is likely that Philip did not found the city, but rather renamed it on rebuilding and enlarging it. From the absence of details about Philip's reign, it is a frequent practice to summarize it, as does Josephus, as one of tranquillity and prosperity.

Confusion in Josephus is reflected in scholarly literature about Philip's marital life. A son of Herod, known in Josephus also as Herod, was married to HERODIAS (see § H12 below), granddaughter of Herod the Great and Mariamne I and daughter of Aristobulus and Bernice. Thereafter, Herodias married Herod Antipas (see § E below). It was this Herodias, when she was Antipas' wife, who was instrumental in the death of John the Baptist. But was her first husband Herod II, or was he the tetrarch Philip? The NT alludes to the first husband as Philip. Josephus records only one marriage of the tetrarch Philip, that to Salome, the daughter of Herodias. The solution is likely to be that Mark 6:17 errs in speaking of Herodias as the wife of Philip; the corrected reading would be Herod II. Philip's wife, then, was not Herodias, but rather her daughter, Salome, who had danced before Antipas.

When Philip died without issue in 34, his tetrarchy was for three years attached to Syria (Antiq. XVIII. iv.6), but in 37 it was assigned to Agrippa I (see § F below).

E. HEROD ANTIPAS. Herod Antipas (date of birth unknown) was a younger brother of Archelaus, and like him the son of Herod and Malthace. His contest for the kingship in 4 B.C. (see § C above) ended unsuccessfully. However, he was named tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. A builder like his father, he founded a city, Tiberias, named for the Roman emperor Tiberius. He chose for the site an ancient burial ground, with the result that Jews shunned the place as ritually unclean (cf. Num. 19:14); so Antipas had to import Gentiles in order to have a population.

His half brother, the tetrarch Philip (see § D above), was married to Salome, daughter of Herodias. (Herodias was the daughter of Aristobulus and granddaughter of Herod the Great.) Herodias, in turn, was married to another half brother, Herod II. Antipas met Herodias and became enamored of her. As he already had a wife, the daughter of the Nabatean king Aretas (her name is not given), Antipas divorced her, and she returned to her father. Then Antipas married Herodias.

John the Baptist was put to death by Antipas. Josephus gives as the reason Antipas' fear of rebellion; the gospels (Matt. 14:1-12; Mark 6:17-18; Luke 3: 19-20) give as the reason John's denunciation of Antipas' marital irregularity (the tetrarch is uniformly called Herod, not Antipas, in the NT).

War broke out in 36 between Antipas and Aretas, and Antipas' army was destroyed. Tiberius died, and Caligula became emperor; to Agrippa, the brother of Herodias, was given the territory previously held by the tetrarch Philip (who had died in 34), but Agrippa received the title of king (37). After Agrippa had come to Palestine (38-39), Herodias persuaded Antipas that they should go to Rome so that Antipas might also gain a more royal title. Agrippa, however, had in readiness some damning charges against Antipas, with the result that Antipas was banished to Lyons in France (39). Herodias accompanied him there. Antipas' tetrarchy was given to Agrippa. (The accounts in Antiq. XVIII.vii and War II are often in minor contradiction.)

F. AGRIPPA I. After the banishment of Archelaus in A.D. 6, his territory (primarily Judea) was administered by a Roman PROCURATOR.

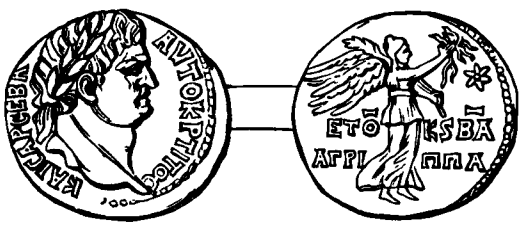
Agrippa, son of Herod the Great's son Aristobulus, had been taken to Rome (4 B.C.) by his mother when he was six years old. In A.D. 23 or 29 (the date is uncertain), financial need brought him to Palestine. Moody, he contemplated suicide. An appeal to his sister Herodias brought Agrippa an appointment from his brother-in-law, the tetrarch Herod Antipas, as the overseer of markets in Tiberias. But a quarrel with Antipas soon ended this employment. For a short while, Agrippa was with the Roman governor Flaccus, but his acceptance of bribes made him move on. He succeeded in borrowing money in Alexandria to move on to Rome (36). There he succeeded in becoming a protégé of the heir apparent, Caligula. When indiscreetly he expressed openly the wish that Caligula would soon succeed Tiberius, the latter cast Agrippa into jail.

Some six months later (37), Caligula acceded to the throne, granting to Agrippa the tetrarchy of Philip (see § D above) with the title of king, and also the tetrarchy in Syria of LYSANIUS.

A year later (38) Agrippa set out for Judea. His vessel stopped at Alexandria, and thereupon a bitter persecution of Alexandrian Jews broke out.

On arriving in Palestine, Agrippa incurred the jealousy of Herod Antipas (see § E above); thereafter Antipas lost his tetrarchy, which came to be added (40) to Agrippa's possession.

A year later, chancing to be in Rome when Caligula was murdered, Agrippa was helpful in the ascent of Claudius to the Roman throne; as a result Judea and Samaria, which had been under procurators, were added to his territories, so that Agrippa ruled over virtually the same land that his grandfather Herod had ruled over.



Agrippa reigned as king A.D. 41-44. He died at the age of fifty-four, survived by three daughters (Bernice, Mariamne, and Drusilla) and by a seventeen-year-old son (Antiq. XIX.ix.1) also named Agrippa. Because the younger Agrippa was still a minor, the kingdom was temporarily reduced to a province.

G. AGRIPPA II. Apparently Agrippa II was in Rome when his father died (44). Being a minor, hence unable to come to his father's throne, he used his influence on behalf of the Jews who were undergoing tribulations in Judea, especially under the procurators Ventidius Cumanus (48-52) and Felix (52-60).

At the age of twenty-three (probably in 56), Agrippa II succeeded an uncle and brother-in-law, Herod, to the throne of Chalcis in modern Lebanon (Antiq. XX.v.2; War II.xii.1). In 53, Agrippa II relinquished the throne of Chalcis and received instead a larger territory formerly within the tetrarchy of Philip (see § D above). A little later, possibly in 61, Nero, the Roman emperor, added to his territory portions of Galilee and Perea; thereby Agrippa was king over part of Judea. Agrippa had, and exercised, the right to appoint or remove the high priest.

Little is related about Agrippa II in subsequent times, and this little is most unfavorable. With his sister Bernice (the widow of his uncle Herod of Chalcis) he appears to have been involved in incest, both before and after she married one Polemon of Cilicia (Antiq. XX.vii.3; cf. Juvenal Satires VI.156-60).

When the rebellion against Rome broke out in 66, Agrippa's troops participated in the assault on Jerusalem by Cestius Gallus (War II.xvii.9). It is a fair summary to say that Agrippa was undeviatingly on the side of the Romans. He entertained the general Vespasian in 67; he went with Vespasian and Titus to Rome in 68 for the purpose of calling on the new emperor, Galba, who was murdered before Agrippa reached Rome (War IV.ix.2). Vespasian was now elected emperor; Agrippa returned to Palestine to take the oath to the new emperor. At the end of the war, in 70, Agrippa had additional territories added to his possessions (War VII.ii.1; v.1). Apparently he and Bernice moved to Rome ca. 75. There Bernice was the mistress of Titus, as she had been previously in Palestine (Tac. Hist. II.2). After 75 we know only this about Agrippa—that he corresponded with Josephus about the latter's book The Jewish War (see Jos. Life LXV; Apion I.9). Agrippa died apparently ca. 100. Josephus mentions neither wife nor children; it is often inferred from a passage in Suk. 27*a* that he had two wives. With the death of Agrippa II the Herodian dynasty came to an end.

17. Copper coin with profile of Herod Agrippa II

Fig. HER 17.

H. IN THE NT. Virtually all that is told in the NT about members of the family of Herod is lacking in Josephus; and where it is not lacking, it is usually at variance.

But, to anticipate what will emerge in detail below, the Herodian family was scarcely approached via archives or historical research by NT writers. Conservative Christians have expended considerable effort to justify what the NT tells about Herod and/or his family. Radical Christian scholars or secular historians have discounted the NT materials as both legendary and tendentious. See bibliography.

1. Agrippa I. Acts 12:1-23 relates that Agrippa (called only Herod in the text) persecuted the church, slaying James the son of Zebedee and arresting Peter. Peter was released from prison by an angel. Agrippa had the sentries put to death. Thereafter, angry with the people of Tyre and Sidon, he responded to their appeal with a speech. The people, obsequiously, "shouted, 'The voice of a god, and not of man.' Immediately an angel of the Lord smote him, because he did not give God the glory; and he was eaten by worms and died" (Acts 12:22-23).

In Jos. Antiq. XIX.viii.2, a lugubrious account of Agrippa's death relates that Agrippa at Caesarea, on seeing an owl (a bird of ill omen to him) sitting on the awning of the theater, was seized with abdominal pains, taken to his palace, and died there five days later. The contents of Acts 12:1-23 is totally absent from Josephus.

2. Agrippa II. After Paul has appealed to Caesar in the presence of Festus (Acts 25:1-12), it is related that when Agrippa (II) and (his sister) Bernice arrived at Caesarea, Festus laid Paul's case before the king. The next day Paul appeared before them in the audience hall (25:13-27). Agrippa gave Paul permission to speak, after which Paul asked (26:27-28): " 'King Agrippa, do you believe the prophets? I know that you believe.' And Agrippa said to Paul, 'In a short time you think to make me a Christian!' " Agrippa and Festus agreed that Paul had done nothing to deserve death or imprisonment. "Agrippa said to Festus, 'This man could have been set free if he had not appealed to Caesar' " (26:32). Though G. H. C. Macgregor will "admit perhaps the apologetic coloring in the narrative, without however questioning the substantial accuracy of the main facts," he states that "many critics have found the narrative . . . frankly incredible" (IB, IX, 318-19). Not one word of the narrative is found in Josephus.

3. Herod Antipas. The passage in Mark 6:14-29, with its rather full parallel in Matt. 14:1-12 and oblique parallels in Luke 3:19-20; 9:7-9, relates the circumstances of the death of JOHN THE BAPTIST. Mark 6:14 surprisingly calls Antipas "king"; Luke 3:1 properly designates him "tetrarch." "Antipas" does not appear as part of his name in the NT.

The account in Josephus of the death of John is bare; that in the gospels is embroidered by the well-known story of the dance of Salome (unnamed in the gospels), whose mother, Herodias, was Antipas' second wife. Antipas had divorced his first wife (a Nabatean princess whose name is unknown) and then taken Herodias away from his half brother Herod. Mark 6:17 names the brother as Philip, as do some, though not all, of the texts of Matt. 14:3. A half brother Philip is known to have married this Salome.

The NT knows nothing of the "seven veils" in which developing legend dressed Salome. Indeed, it is the view of most commentators that the passage, beyond verifying the statement of Josephus that Antipas put John to death, is merely legendary embellishment.

Antipas figures in a brief passage, Luke 13:31-33. It relates that Pharisees told Jesus that Herod wanted to kill him. Jesus replied: "Go and tell that fox, 'Behold, I cast out demons.' " (The fox represents destructiveness, rather than merely craftiness.) The context of the passage is strange, for J. M. Creed writes: "It appears out of place; Jesus is depicted as already on the way to Jerusalem. . . . It has been plausibly suggested that . . . some hostile activity on Herod's part . . . has disappeared from the present Gospel."

In a third passage, found only in Luke 23:6-12, Pilate, learning that Jesus was a Galilean, brought him to Antipas, who chanced to be in Jerusalem then. Jesus answered none of Antipas' questions. Herod and his soldiers "treated him with contempt and mocked him; then, arraying him in gorgeous apparel, he sent him back to Pilate. And Herod and Pilate became friends with each other that very day." The absence of a comparable passage in Mark, Matthew, and John suggests strongly that this passage is legendary. The passage is hearkened back to in Acts 4:25-26. The purpose of it may have been to transfer the mockery of Jesus from the Roman soldiers (Mark 15:16-17) to Antipas. Creed says: "Luke was perhaps glad to transfer the outrage from the soldiery of Rome to the soldiery of the local tetrarch. In the apocryphal Gospel of Peter, the responsibility of Antipas, rather than of Pilate, for the condemnation of Jesus, is magnified."

4. Archelaus. See § C above. Only Matthew mentions him (2:22), relating that when Joseph "heard that Archelaus reigned over Judea in place of his father Herod, he was afraid to go there."

5. Aristobulus. Paul in Rom. 16:10 sends greetings to the "family of Aristobulus." His identity is unknown. The conjecture that this Aristobulus was, indeed, the grandson of Herod the Great (Jos. War II.ii.6; Antiq. XX.i.2) is farfetched.

6. Drusilla. The third and youngest daughter of Agrippa I. She was married briefly at the age of fourteen to Azizus, King of Emessa, probably in 52. In 53 or 54 she married the Roman (and Gentile) procurator of Palestine, Felix (see § H8 below for the passing mention of her in Acts 24:24).

7. Bernice. The sister of Agrippa II. See §§ G, H2, above.

8. Felix. Not properly a Herodian himself, he can be listed here because one of his three wives, Drusilla, was a Herodian. Felix was procurator of Judea 52-60 (Acts 23:24–24:27).

9. Herod the Great. Luke 1:5 states laconically that the events described in the gospel began "in the days of Herod, king of Judea"; no other mention of Herod is made in Luke.

Matt. 2:1 relates that "Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the King." There follows the narrative of the wise men from the East, who have seen the star; of Herod's summoning and questioning the three; of their journey to Bethlehem and departure without fulfilling Herod's mandate to report to him about the Christ child; of the flight of Joseph to Egypt to save Jesus from the "slaughter of the innocents"; of Herod's death (2:1-19). The material is absent from Josephus.

Those who have assessed this material have expressed a range of judgment from full confidence in reliability through full skepticism. This latter judgment is to be preferred, though it falls short, in the case of Matthew, of indicating the extent to which the childhood of Moses seems repeated in the childhood of Jesus—namely, the narrow escape, while a baby, from death at the hands of a wicked king, and the call out of Egypt, this as part of a deliberate design in Matthew to depict Jesus as a new Moses.

Another difficulty rests in the datum supplied by Luke 2:2 of the census in the time of QUIRINIUS (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT § A1*b*). The price of skepticism as to the reliability of ascribing the birth of Jesus to the last year of the reign of Herod the Great is that the precise year of his birth becomes quite unknown. It is, however, the price which strict historical study demands.

The problem involved is in the character of NT data. The question is whether it is history or legend.

10. Herod Philip. The first husband of Herodias (she later married Herod Antipas); given in Mark 6:17 as Philip. See § H3 above.

11. Herodians. See HERODIANS.

12. Herodias. Mentioned in Mark 6:17-29 and its parallel, Matt. 14:3-12, and in an oblique parallel, Luke 3:19-20, she was the second wife of Herod Antipas, and he was her second husband. Her first husband was Antipas' half brother Herod. See § H3 above.

Herodias' father was Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great. Her mother was a niece of Herod the Great (Bernice, daughter of Herod's sister, Salome). Herodias had by her first husband a daughter named Salome.

13. Philip. Mentioned in Luke 3:1, he was a son of Herod the Great and of Cleopatra of Jerusalem (Antiq. XVII.i.3). His tetrarchy was E and NE of the Sea of Galilee. For these regions Luke gives the name of Ituraea and Trachonitis; Josephus differs on this (Antiq. XVII.viii.1; xi.4; War II.vi.3).

Philip plays no role in the gospel. The mention of him is in Luke's fixing of the chronology of the activities of JOHN THE BAPTIST. The city of CAESAREA PHILIPPI (Mark 8:27) was founded by him. Beth-saida (Luke 9:10) was also in his territory. Philip married Salome (see § H14 below), the daughter of Herodias (see § H12 above).

14. Salome. The daughter of Herodias (see § H12 above), Salome is known by name from Josephus; the daughter unnamed in the gospels (Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6:17-29; Luke 3:19-20) is unquestionably this Salome.

Salome danced before her stepfather, Herod Antipas, on his birthday. In gratitude he offered her whatever she wished; and she wished, and received on a platter, the head of JOHN THE BAPTIST. See § H3 above.

Josephus is silent on the incident. The student is often surprised at how relatively bare the NT account is. The weight of liberal scholarship regards it as legendary.

On the assumption of a historically reliable account, the problem of the age of Salome at the time of the incident is frequently raised. On the one hand, she appears as yet unbetrothed to Philip (see § H13 above); on the other hand, she had been born to Herodias when the latter was still married to Salome's father, Herod (see § H10 above). Philip, her husband, would appear to have been fifty at the time of the incident; it is argued by some that Salome could scarcely have been the young maiden at this time that Mark implies she was, if she married a man of fifty. Accordingly, some have supposed that if Salome danced at all, she must have been forty-five or fifty.

After the death of Salome's husband Philip in 34, she married a relative named Aristobulus, the prince of Chalcis, and bore him three children (Antiq. XVIII.v.4).

15. Summary. The judgment that the gospels are religious tracts rather than exercises in historical research is borne out by the examination of the passages which mention the members of the Herod family. The contents of these passages not only fail of mention in Josephus, but even are out of accord in significant details; they include materials inevitably to be classified as legendary; their total import is small, being only extensive enough to afford the evangelists sporadic opportunity for weaving into the accounts in the gospels or Acts materials which seek to relate Christianity to its Jewish background. Indeed, when Luke-Acts is separated from Mark and Matthew, the increased sparsity of the mention of the family of Herod becomes underlined. The old theory of Krenkel (Josephus and Lukas [1894]) that Luke utilized Josephus as a source, though carelessly, is not supported by the material on the family of Herod. This theory can be held only by attributing to Luke something more than mere carelessness—namely, tendentiousness and unrestrained imagination; for if what Luke-Acts tells us about the family of Herod is legendary, then Josephus is definitely not the source for the particular legends.

The NT material on Herod's family adds virtually nothing to knowledge of them. It increases the perplexities rather than illuminating dark places.

Bibliography. E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (English trans., 1872, from the 2nd German ed.), is antiquated in some of its bibliography but remains a standard work of reference. Schürer's detailed study of the problems of the NT references to the Herodian family should be consulted. The best study of Herod, marred by occasional excess of speculation, is W. Otto, Herodes (1913), published as an offprint from Pauly-Wissowa, Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaften; for the same Encyclopedia, Otto also wrote articles on the Herodians, Herodias, and Herod Agrippa, incomparably superior to any other writings on these persons. Josephus is the basic source of information, and hence the student might be alert to the Loeb Classical Library translations, especially the volumes of Antiquities prepared by R. Marcus, whose explanatory notes are virtually a commentary; H. St. J. Thackeray is quite good on The Jewish War. Ch. 5 of R. Laqueur, Der jüdische Historiker Flavius Josephus: Ein biographischer Versuch auf neuer quellenkritischer Grundlage, merits both attention and ultimate rejection. F.-M. Abel, Histoire de la Palestine (1952), vol. I, pt. 2, pp. 287-503, is an admirable work. On Herod's violations of Jewish law, see J. Juster, Les Juifs dans l'empire romain (1914), II, 128-29; L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees (2nd ed., 1940), II, 684-85. More recent works are admirably listed in R. Marcus, "A Selected Bibliography (1920-1945) of the Jews in the Hellenistic-Roman Period," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, XVI (1947), 98-181. S. SANDMEL HERODIANS hĭ rō′dĭ ənz [Ἡρῳδιανοί]. Literally, adherent of Herod, or of his dynasty. See HEROD (FAMILY).

In three unquestioned passages (Mark 3:6; 12:13= Matt. 22:16), the Herodians are mentioned as opponents of Jesus, along with the Pharisees. The term is never found in Luke or John. Matt. 12:14 (=Mark 3:6) omits Mark's mention of the Herodians, as does the parallel in Luke 6:11. Matt. 22:16 (=Mark 12:13) carries over the mention of them in Mark, but Luke 20:20 does not. Another passage, Mark 8:15, varies in the MSS, for a few (e.g., Chester Beatty Papyrus 45, W, and θ) read "leaven of the Herodians" rather than the usually accepted reading "leaven of Herod." The parallel to this passage, Matt. 16:6, does not read "Herod" or "Herodians," but rather "SADDUCEES," while Luke 12:1 warns only against the "leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy."

The problem, or series of problems, involved, includes: (a) an identification of "the Herodians" in a manner more specific than simply as adherents either of a Herod or of the Herodian dynasty; (b) an answer to the problem of Luke's apparent full avoidance of the term "Herodians" and Matthew's partial avoidance of it; (c) the identification, found among commentators, of the Herodians with Sadducees, this through bringing together Mark 8:15; Matt. 16:6.

Older literature states that the Herodians were the "adherents of the dynasty of Herod, who made common cause with the Pharisees against Jesus." Gould (1896) identifies them as "those among the Jews who, in more or less veiled opposition to the Roman procuratorship, desired the restoration of the national kingdom under one or other of the sons of Herod."

Modern scholarship, for the most part, lacks the sense of certainty found in these earlier interpreters. Thus Branscomb (see bibliography) states that "who these Herodians were is uncertain." Guignebert (see bibliography) says: "What the Gospels tell us of the evil intentions of the 'Herodians' . . . is very vague, and cannot be analyzed into facts." While Wilfred L. Knox (see bibliography) terms the Herodians a "body of Jewish opinion which seriously regarded the rule of the Herodian dynasty as the best solution of the Jewish problem," he declares that "it may indeed be doubted whether Mark really knew who they were."

Two explanations are cited, and rejected, by Jerome (in his commentary on Matt. 22:15), one from Origen and one from Pseudo-Tertullian. The first of these supposed that those willing to pay tribute to Caesar were called Herodians by their opponents; the second, that the Herodians were those who believed Herod to be the Christ. Again, Epiphanius (Panarion XX.1) mentions the Herodians as the twentieth in his list of heresies. E. Bickerman (see bibliography), after summarizing and dismissing various such theories, declares himself in favor of regarding the Herodians as followers of Herod Antipas (see HEROD [FAMILY] § E). If some specific identification of the Herodians must be made, Bickerman's is as convincing as any.

However, reverting to the problems listed above, several suggestions may be made: (a) Mark and Matthew can lay no claim to historical precision; and even if they could, the three allusions to the Herodians are so vague that the Herodians cannot truly be identified. (b) The avoidance of the term, in Matthew partially and in Luke completely, is probably the result of a deliberate correction of Mark, possibly out of a desire to reject improbable explanations of the type cited above from Origen and Epiphanius. (c) There is nothing in Matthew which actually identifies the Herodians with the Sadducees, for Matt. 16:6 merely substitutes the Sadducees for Mark's Herodians; while Luke 20:20, parallel to Mark 12:13 and to Matt. 22:16, omits the Herodians entirely, abstains from a specific substitution, and relates instead that the questioners of Jesus were "suborned spies" (Creed [see bibliography]). There is, then, no direct statement in the gospels which equates Herodians and Sadducees.

Bibliography. W. Otto, "Herodians," in Pauly-Wissowa, Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaften, Supplement II, p. 200—a superior article. B. W. Bacon, "Pharisees and Herodians in Mark," JBL, XXXIX (1920), 102-12; "The Leaven of the Pharisees," Studies in Matthew (1930), pp. 511-17. J. M. Creed, The Gospel According to St. Luke (1930), p. 247. C. A. H. Guignebert, Jesus (English trans., S. H. Hooke, 1935), p. 188. B. H. Branscomb, The Gospel of Mark (1937), p. 61. E. Bickerman, RB, XLVII (1938), 184-97. H. H. Rowley, "The Herodians in the Gospels," JTS, XLI (1940), 14-27. W. L. Knox, "Church and State in the NT," Journal of Roman Studies, XXXIX (1949), 23 ff; The Sources of the Synoptic Gospels, I: St. Mark (1953), 10.

S. SANDMEL

HERODIAS hĭ rō′dĭ əs [Ἡρῳδιάς]. A wife of Herod Antipas, and the daughter of Aristobulus and Bernice. Aristobulus was the son of Herod the Great; Bernice was Herod's niece, the daughter of his sister Salome (see HEROD [FAMILY] § H7). Herodias' exact dates are unknown beyond her belonging in the first half of the first century A.D.

Herodias was married initially to the half brother of her father. She bore this husband a daughter named Salome. The husband-uncle is known in Mark 6:17 as Philip, and so too in some of the texts of Matt. 14:3. It is more likely, however, that his true name was Herod, and not Philip, for there was still another brother who carried the name Philip.

Herod Antipas was a half brother of the first husband of Herodias. Antipas had divorced his first wife, a Nabatean princess, to make room for Herodias, and wooed her away from his half brother. An account in the gospels (Mark 6:17-29; Matt. 14:3-12; cf. Luke 3:19-20), lacking in Josephus, relates that JOHN THE BAPTIST had denounced this marital irregularity; the daughter, Salome, after a dance, in vengeance demanded and received John's head on a platter.

Josephus relates that when Agrippa I (see HEROD [FAMILY] § H1), her brother, came to the throne of Judea in A.D. 41, Herodias prevailed upon the reluctant Antipas to go to Rome to petition the Emperor Caligula to supplant Agrippa and to name Antipas the king (see CALIGULA). Instead, however, the emperor banished Antipas to Lyons, in Gaul, and Herodias accompanied him there.

Bibliography. Jos. Antiq. XVIII.v.1-2; vii.1-2; War I.xxix.1; II.ix.6. See also the bibliography under HEROD [FAMILY].

S. SANDMEL

HERODION hĭ rō′dĭ ən [Ἡρῳδίων]. A Christian man greeted in Rom. 16:11 by Paul, who called him a kinsman—i.e., fellow countryman (Jew; cf. Rom. 9:3).

F. W. GINGRICH

HERODIUM hĭ rō′dĭ əm [Ἡρώδειον]. A fortress-palace and tomb monument some four miles SE of Bethlehem. It was built and named by Herod the Great for himself. The conical-shaped, artificially heightened hill, on top of which the ruins of the Herodian citadel are still visible, gives a striking appearance from many points in S Judea. It is known in modern times as Jebel el-Fureidis ("hill of paradise") or Frank Mountain. Fig. TEK 7.

Herodium was both a desert retreat and part of a chain of fortresses Herod erected or rebuilt in the wilderness to protect his kingdom; among the latter were Alexandrium; Hyrcania; MASADA; and MACHAERUS. At the time Herod fled S before the Parthians in 40 B.C., he was attacked by hostile Jews; near the site where he was later to build Herodium, he inflicted on them a severe defeat, and so was able to make his way to Rome and claim his kingdom (Jos. War I.viii.8); Antiq. XIV.xiii.9). He subsequently erected a fortress called Herodium on the Idumean frontier, the location of which is unknown, and the luxurious palace by the same name near Bethlehem (Jos. War I.xxi.10). The latter, at his express request, was also to be his tomb; when he died at Jericho (4 B.C.), a grand funeral procession proceeded by way of Jerusalem to Herodium, where he was interred (Jos. War I.xxiii.9).

Under Roman administration Herodium was the capital of one of eleven toparchies (Jos. War III.iii.5). During the events of A.D. 68-69, Simon, a leader of a rebel band, sent Eleazar to request the capitulation of Herodium, but the move was unsuccessful (Jos. War IV.ix.5). As one of the three last strongholds of Jewish resistance (the other two being Machaerus and Masada), Herodium was reduced by Lucilius Bassus in A.D. 72 (Jos. War IV.ix.10). Thus ended its brief but illustrious existence.

The brief description given by Josephus (War

I.xxi.10), together with recent observations of the ruins, provides the essential details of the structure. Herod had artificially raised and crowned the hill with a ring of three concentric walls with round towers standing at the four cardinal directions. At the foot of the mountain he erected other palaces, buildings, pools, and terraces appropriate to a palatial retreat. A grand stairway of two hundred white marble steps mounted to the citadel. An aqueduct to bring in an abundant water supply was constructed at great expense.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, I (1874), 478-81; C. Schick, ZDPV, 3 (1880), 88-99 (with plan); E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People (English trans.; 1891), division I, vol. I, pp. 435-36, 467; F.-M. Abel, Géographie, II (1938), 348. R. W. Funk HERODOTUS hĭ rŏd′ə təs. A Greek historian of the fifth century B.C. He was called by Cicero the "father of history" (Laws I.1).

1. Life. We know little of his life other than what we learn indirectly from his History. Suidas gives his parents' names as Lyxis and Dryo (or Rhoio). He was born in Halicarnassus, probably ca. 484 B.C., where the prevailing dialect was Ionic. Later, sometime after 454, he lived in Athens, where he was probably acquainted with Pericles and Sophocles. In 445 or shortly thereafter, he went to Thurii, where he took part in the founding of the new colony initiated by Pericles. Suidas tells us that Herodotus was buried in the market place of Thurii; but there was another tradition that he died in Pella. We do not know where or when he died, but his death must have occurred ca. 424. In ca. 440 he may have returned to Athens from Thurii, where he lived until the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War in 431; but this is disputed. Some scholars believe he never left Thurii permanently. It was probably during this later period of his life that he did his more extensive traveling in Asia and Egypt and wrote his famous History.

2. Travels. Herodotus' History is based largely on the data he collected during his travels. The chronology of his journeys is a subject of dispute. Suffice it to say that he traveled widely and visited such places as the coasts of the Euxine, Babylonia, Phoenicia, Egypt, and probably Cyrene.

3. Herodotus' History. The main subject of the History is the relation between the Greeks and the oriental powers from the accession of Croesus to the end of the Persian Wars and the capture of Sestus in 479/78 B.C. His work is divided into nine books: the first three deal with the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses and the accession of Darius, and with the rise of Persian power. The second three deal with the reign of Darius, Persian failure in Scythia and at Marathon, and Greek failure in Ionia. The third triad describes the reign of Xerxes and the defeat of Persia by Greece.

Writing when the policy of Athens was being severely criticized, at the beginning of her conflict with Sparta, Herodotus emphasizes the contributions which Athens made to Greece.

Cicero, as mentioned above, called Herodotus the "father of history"; but the Israelites, not to mention others, produced earlier histories. Herodotus' history has an epic flavor; it is a Homeric account of the Persian Wars. It seeks to discover causes of great events, but the author's perspective in this regard is seriously limited.

4. Sources. Herodotus' sources include: (a) the testimony of eyewitnesses, on which he relies heavily and which is valuable for his recent history; (b) traditions: he is skeptical of marvels except ancient ones; (c) archaeological material; (d) written sources, which seem to lie behind his list of satrapies (III.89-97), his description of the Royal Road (V.52-53), and his list of the Persian army (VII.61-99).

B. H. Throckmorton, Jr.

HERON [אנפה (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18), cf. אנף, to be angry; Akkad. anpatu, an unidentified bird; Targ. (Onq.) אבו, vulture, kite; LXX χαραδριός, possibly a plover, see below; Vulg. charadrius]. Any of a family (Ardeidae) of wading birds with a long, thin neck and long legs, whose haunt is water of every kind and whose food is fish and other water animals. Tristram testifies that at least seven varieties of heron were common in the lake regions of Palestine in his day. We might therefore expect the heron to be mentioned in a list of OT birds.

The two biblical references to אנפה indicate an unclean bird, while the phrase "according to its kind" (Lev. 11:19) suggests a bird of which several species were known. Otherwise it cannot be identified. The LXX word, χαραδριός, is used by Aristotle to indicate a bird found at the seaside with gulls and nesting in cliffs (History of Animals 593*b,* 15; 615*a,* 1); and by Aristophanes for a river bird (Birds 1141).

If we suppose that water or wading birds are near the end of the two biblical lists, אנפה may be a species of heron (so Bodenheimer; see Fauna § B5; cf. LXX above); G. R. Driver (see bibliography), however, favors the cormorant.

Bibliography. G. R. Driver, PEQ (1955), pp. 17-18. W. S. McCullough

HESED hē′sĕd. KJV form. See Ben-hesed.

HESHBON hĕsh′bŏn [חשבון; Εσεβών]; KJV Apoc. ESEBON ĕs′ĭ bŏn. An important city in the N part of Greater Moab; it is the modern Hesban, located just S of the Wadi Hesban, ca. fifty miles due E of Jerusalem. It is frequently called the city of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who wrested the whole territory from the Moabites as far as the River Arnon (Wadi Mojib); he made it his capital, and the appellation may indicate that the city was built by him. After Sihon was defeated by the Israelites, Heshbon was rebuilt and populated by the tribe of Reuben and later by the Gadites (Num. 21; 32; Josh. 13:17, 26; 21:39; I Chr. 6:81). The region about it was bitterly contested between Moab and Israel; it was probably conquered by the former under Eglon (Judg. 3:12 ff) and won back by the latter through the efforts of the judges (I Sam. 12:9, 11). The territory then remained permanently Israelite until after the death of Ahab (853 B.C.), when Mesha of Moab reconquered it in his great campaign. From that time on, it remained in Moabite hands and is mentioned more than once in the oracles directed against Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:8-9; Jer. 48:2, 33-34). Ca. 600, Heshbon seems to have fallen into the hands of the Ammonites (Jer. 49:3), who had made some claims to the territory (Judg. 11:26). In the Hellenistic period it was part of the Nabatean kingdom; it was reconquered by Alexander Janneus (103-76), but was allowed full autonomy, including the right of striking its own coins (Jos. Antiq. XIII.xv.4). After the fall of the Jewish state, Heshbon was annexed to the Roman province of Syria.

Bibliography. A. Musil, Arabia Petraea I Moab (1907), pp. 383-88; N. Glueck, AASOR, XVIII–XIX (1939), 242-51.

S. COHEN

HESHMON hĕsh'mŏn [חשמון] (Josh. 15:27). A town in the SW part of Judah, near Beth-pelet. It may be the source of the adjective "Hasmonean," the Talmudic designation for the MACCABEES.

HÈTH hĕth [חת]. The eponym of the Hittites in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:15; I Chr. 1:13); the Hittites (KJV "sons of Heth") appear in the story of the acquisition of the cave of Machpelah by Abraham (Gen. 23; 25:10; 49:32); the marrying of the "Hittite women" (KJV "daughters of Heth"), or "Canaanite women" (KJV "daughters of Canaan"), by Jacob was discouraged by Rebekah and Isaac (cf. Gen. 27: 46; 28:1, 8).

I. J. GELB

HETHLON hĕth'lŏn [חתלן]. A place on the hypothetical N border of Israel, according to Ezekiel (47: 15; 48:1). Possibly it is identical with Heitela, E of Tripolis in Lebanon.

HEWERS OF WOOD [חטבי עצים]. One of the lowest classes of SERVANT. The Gibeonites preferred such SLAVERY to death (Josh. 9:21, 23, 27). These workers are to be distinguished from those who felled trees for building purposes (II Chr. 2:9-10; Jer. 46: 22) to be used by the CARPENTER or craftsmen (see CRAFTS). These are really the gatherers of firewood —an endless, dull task. The lowliness is clearly indicated in Deut. 29:11, where these hewers of wood are among the last in the listing of covenanting people (vs. 10).

See also DRAWERS OF WATER.

C. U. WOLF

HEXATEUCH hĕx'ə tōōk, —tūk. The modern scholarly designation of the first six books of the Bible (i.e., the Pentateuch plus Joshua). The identification of the Hexateuch as the basic literary unit in the larger history of Israel (Genesis–II Kings) was regarded as a major contribution of critical scholarship, and as the indispensable corollary of source analysis. It had been apparent to scholars for a long time that the PENTATEUCH, traditionally understood to be the work of Moses, was not only a composite of different strands, but the truncated section of a more extensive composition. It must have included the book of JOSHUA, at least, if there was to be a suitable conclusion to the story of Israel's beginnings. The theme of the Promised Land is paramount in the Pentateuch; it is firmly established in the book of Genesis, and reinforced in the narrative of the deliverance from Egypt and wanderings in the wilderness; it demands the fulfilment related in the story of the conquest and settlement found in Joshua. It is unthinkable that the narrative should have ended before relating these decisive events. Just as the recognition of the total literary pattern pointed to the inclusion of Joshua, source analysis located the familiar Pentateuchal sources in that book. The composite narrative was assigned to JE, while the boundary lists and other technical data were apparently the work of P. The whole book bore the unmistakable stamp of Deuteronomic redaction.

The relationship of Joshua to the following books, especially Judges, was also considered. It was thought by some that J, and possibly E, carried the narrative of Israel's settlement down through the period of the judges into the time of David (or Solomon), when the promise of the land was finally and totally achieved. J and E have been identified in Judges, and in the "two sources" of Samuel, but the evidence is by no means decisive. It was recognized that the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings had undergone the same sort of Deuteronomic editing as Joshua, but it was thought that this activity was undertaken by different members of a so-called Deuteronomic school, and did not necessarily signify an organic interrelationship. The clinching argument for the Hexateuch as an independent literary work rested upon the evidence for P. It was generally agreed that P was present in Joshua but did not extend beyond it. Since P provided the framework for the Pentateuch, this meant that the redactor (R_{JEDP}) must also have included Joshua in his compilation. That the structure of Joshua is essentially Deuteronomic rather than Priestly was a source of concern, but not sufficient to undermine the "Hexateuchal" solution. There the matter rested.

In recent scholarship the Hexateuchal reconstruction has come under suspicion, and the Hexateuch itself has disintegrated. It is by no means certain that the sources in Joshua are the same as those in the Pentateuch. Prominent scholars have argued that J and E are not to be found in Joshua, but end substantially in the book of Numbers; that the lists in Joshua may be P-type material but not necessarily P; and finally that Joshua in its present form is part of the great Deuteronomic history extending from Deuteronomy through II Kings, and does not therefore belong to a Pentateuchal complex. It is clear that the Hexateuch and the Deuteronomic history represent overlapping and conflicting reconstructions of the major units in the basic biblical narrative (Genesis–II Kings). In this larger work, Joshua is a middle term, with strong connections in both directions (i.e., as a suitable conclusion to the story of the occupation of the land, and as an indispensable link in the whole story of Israel from entry to exit). It would, nevertheless, appear that the principal division in the Genesis–Kings narrative comes between Numbers and Deuteronomy, which not only stands apart from the preceding books, but quite clearly constitutes a beginning, the introduction to the history (Joshua–Kings) which follows. The claims made for the essential integrity of the Deuteronomic history have more evidence to commend them than those of the Hexateuch. The main difficulty with this approach is that it leaves the so-called Tetrateuch (the first four books) as a mere torso. The original arguments about the truncation of the story at the end of the Pentateuch apply even more strongly to the Tetrateuch. It is difficult, if not impossible, to escape the conclusion that JE included an account of the conquest and settlement in the land. It is altogether possible that fragments of this narrative are embedded in the book of Joshua (and even Judges), although the evidence is scanty, since the book has been extensively revised and is now an integral part of the Deuteronomic history.

It may be best to postulate the existence of two major and slightly overlapping works covering the books from Genesis through Kings: (a) the JEP history, incorporating the JE narrative along with archival data of the Tetrateuch plus an account of the conquest and settlement in the Promised Land (parallel to and possibly including some materials in the book of Joshua); (b) the Deuteronomic history, beginning with Moses' farewell speeches (including a summary of preceding events) and coming down to the fall of Judah and the Exile. These two works were amalgamated by an editor who inserted the Deuteronomic history at the appropriate place in the JEP narrative (i.e., at the end of the wanderings). He either removed the last part of the JEP account or blended it into the present book of Joshua. Still later the present division at the end of the book of Deuteronomy into the Pentateuch and the Former Prophets was made, but on the basis of religious and not literary considerations. The term "Hexateuch" has proved useful in the history of criticism, and reflects an important era in biblical scholarship. But it is doubtful whether the literary composition it designated ever existed as an independent entity.

Bibliography. The classic presentation in English of the Hexateuchal analysis and its defense is J. E. Carpenter and G. Harford-Battersby, eds., The Hexateuch (2 vols.; 1900). See also the Introductions by S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the OT (9th ed., 1913); A. Bentzen, Introduction to the OT (2 vols.; 1948); R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the OT (2nd ed., 1949). The discussion in The OT and Modern Study (1951), chs. 3-4, is helpful. A later word is to be found in O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das AT (2nd ed., 1956). See also G. W. Anderson, A Critical Introduction to the OT (1959); Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel (1960).

D. N. FREEDMAN

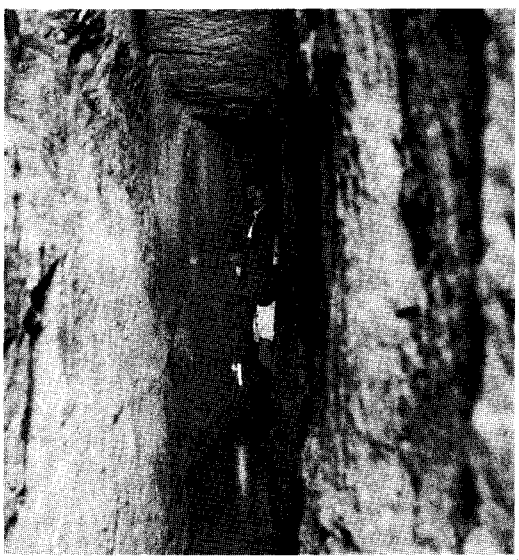
HEZEKI. KJV form of HIZKI.

HEZEKIAH hĕz′ə kī′ə [(ו)חזקיה, Yahu (is) my strength; Ἐζεκίας]; KJV alternately HIZKIAH hĭz kī′ə (Zeph. 1:1), HIZKIJAH —jə (Neh. 10:17), EZEKIAS ĕz′ə kī′əs (Matt. 1:9-10). 1. King of Judah ca. 715-687 B.C.; son and successor of Ahaz.

The full form of the name appears in the MT and has been found on a contemporary ostracon from Jerusalem. In Assyrian inscriptions the name is "vocalized" as Ha-za-qi-(i)a-ú.

Hezekiah came to the throne at the age of twenty-five and reigned twenty-nine years (II Kings 18:2; II Chr. 29:1). His mother was Abi the daughter of Zechariah (ABIJAH in II Chr. 29:1; Abi is a caritative of Abijah). The date of his accession seems to be fixed by Sennacherib's campaign in 701, which took place in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah (II Kings 18:13). The terminal date of his reign must be after the accession of Tirhakah (Taharqo), mentioned in II Kings 19:9. Egyptian sources indicate that Tirhakah became king ca. 689.

Hezekiah was remembered by later generations as an able and vigorous ruler and a pious king (II Kings 18:5; cf. 23:25). Another aspect of the reign is indicated by the reference, perhaps authentic, to the "proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied" (Prov. 25–29). Hezekiah came to the throne at a critical time in the history of Judah. Aram had fallen to Tiglath-pileser in 732, and had been made into four Assyrian provinces. A similar fate overtook Israel in 722-721 at the hands of Sargon II. Judah had been seriously weakened by the Syro-Ephraimitic War and by attacks on her territory by Edomites and Philistines during the reign of Ahaz. The annual payment of tribute to Assyria was an intolerable burden upon her resources. Further, religious conditions under Ahaz had become chaotic. The urgent demand of the time was for political and religious reform. The alternative was the fate of the surrounding nations—servitude to Assyria. Isaiah had pleaded with Ahaz to have faith in Yahweh, but to no avail. Now men were beginning to see that only the power of Yahweh could save them from the might of Assyria.



That a religious reform took place is unquestionable. Even during the reign of Ahaz a reform party was probably in existence in Judah. The prophetic words spoken by Amos and Hosea had come to terrible fulfilment in the destruction of the N kingdom. Was a like fate to befall Judah? The N disaster was powerfully used by the contemporary prophets Isaiah and Micah to point the moral of a return to the worship of Yahweh. It may be contended that Hezekiah's interests were largely political, and that he was influenced by political motives, but the line of distinction between religious enthusiasm and patriotism was not always sharply drawn in ancient Israel. In this regard the position and the influence of Isaiah are especially to be noted. Hezekiah removed the high places, broke down the pillars, and cut down the Asherah (II Kings 18:4). He even destroyed the brass serpent which had been preserved in the temple and was said to have been made by Moses. Such measures would not have the support of the whole people, and the inevitable reaction came during the reign of Hezekiah's son Manasseh.

The Chronicler has a long account of the religious reformation in II Chr. 29–31. The cleansing and sanctifying of the temple and the restoration of the temple cult (ch. 29) were followed by a great celebration of the Passover, in which certain people of the former N kingdom participated (ch. 30). Then the whole land, including Ephraim and Manasseh, was cleansed of idolatry (31:1). The rest of ch. 31 describes further reformation measures carried out by Hezekiah. To this religious reformation Kings has only one corresponding verse (II Kings 18:4). To what extent, then, can the information found in the Chronicles be regarded as historical? So much of it seems to reflect the Chronicler's own special viewpoint and interest.

The tendency has been to disregard in large measure the account of the Chronicler. Such a judgment, however, is unwarranted. The Chronicler has preserved material based on reliable traditions. It is true that Isaiah makes no specific reference to such a reformation. This is very surprising unless the prophet saw that the real motive was not a religious one at all. At the same time it must be noted that to the Assyrian Rabshakeh is attributed the reference to high places and altars removed by Hezekiah (II Kings 18:22). A religious reformation occurred which was only in part successful. This reform movement extended also to the former N kingdom. There is no reason to doubt the statement that Hezekiah's messengers met with little success in Ephraim and Manasseh, but won a limited response in Asher and Zebulun farther to the N (II Chr. 30:10-11). A reason for this may be suggested: Under the Assyrians, Bethel again became important as a cult center (II Kings 17:27-28). The Assyrians probably saw the importance of a rival place of worship to Jerusalem and so permitted the worship of Yahweh at Bethel. That the sending of messengers to the N by Hezekiah had political implications is certain.

Hezekiah's other concern was to strengthen Judah politically. He does not appear to have committed any act of open rebellion against Assyria for some years. During this period, however, it is probable that, with an eye to the future, he began to strengthen the defenses of Jerusalem. In particular, he cut through the solid rock in order to bring the water of the Gihon Spring into the city (II Kings 20:20; II Chr. 32:30).* This remarkable feat is recorded in the contemporary Siloam Inscription. In his inscriptions for his eleventh year—i.e., 711—Sargon records a victorious campaign against Aziru king of Ashdod, which he made into an Assyrian province. He also claims that Ashdod sought help from Judah and Egypt. Apparently Hezekiah did not join in this rebellion. But with Sargon's death in 705 and the accession of Sennacherib an entirely new situation developed, and there is evidence of widespread intrigue. To this time is to be attributed the embassy sent by Merodach-baladan king of Babylon to Hezekiah (II Kings 20:12-15; Isa. 39:1-4). He had established himself in S Mesopotamia and offered stubborn resistance to Assyrian attempts to overthrow him. To the same period belongs the re-emergence of Egypt on the world scene under a strong ruler, the Ethiopian Shabako (the Tirhakah of II Kings 19:9). The time seemed opportune for rebellion, and in all probability Hezekiah intrigued openly both with Babylon and with Egypt against Assyria. "He rebelled against the king of Assyria, and would not serve him"—i.e., he withheld tribute from him (II Kings 18:7*b*). "He [also] smote the Philistines as far as Gaza and its territory, from watchtower to fortified city" (vs. 8). This is probably to be interpreted as a purely local matter. During the reign of Ahaz the Philistines had raided the Shephelah and the Negeb, and seized some of the cities of Judah (II Chr. 28:18; cf. Isa. 14:28 ff). In the unsettled situation that prevailed at Sargon's death Hezekiah saw his opportunity to retaliate. It is possible, however, that he had a wider object in mind—to foment rebellion against Assyria. The prophet Isaiah seems to have opposed the rebellion. Fig. HEZ 18.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

18. The Siloam tunnel, erected in Jerusalem by Hezekiah king of Judah (715-687 B.C.)

After settling affairs, at least temporarily, in the E in two campaigns, Sennacherib turned to the W. This third campaign is very well documented in Assyrian sources* and can be supplemented by the biblical record (II Kings 18:13–19:37; II Chr. 32:1-22; Isa. 36–37). In 701 Sennacherib invaded Palestine and in an extensive campaign put down the rebellion. A large Egyptian and Ethiopian army had marched N to relieve Ekron, to which Sennacherib had laid siege, but it was defeated. Ekron was captured, and Padi its king, who had remained loyal to Assyria and as a result had been handed over to Hezekiah as a prisoner, was again set on the throne. Then Sennacherib turned against the fortified cities of Judah and seized them (II Kings 18:13). He claims to have conquered forty-six of them, together with the small villages around about. Among them were the exceedingly strong fortress city of Lachish (vs. 14) and Debir. Sennacherib's famous reliefs depict the siege of Lachish and the captives passing before the king. The exact sequence of events is not clear. While the siege of Lachish was still in progress, Hezekiah sent a message to Sennacherib, offering to surrender and promising to pay whatever tribute was imposed upon him (vs. 14*a*). Presumably most of the fortified cities of Judah had already fallen, and Hezekiah saw that further resistance was useless. He may also have wished to save the capital city from the same fate which had overtaken the others. The Assyrian king demanded an enormous tribute of three hundred talents of silver and thirty of gold (vs. 14*b*). The Assyrian records contain an even larger figure—eight hundred talents of silver. To obtain this sum, Hezekiah took all the silver from the temple and the royal treasuries. He also "stripped the gold from the doors of the temple of the LORD, and from the doorposts which Hezekiah king of Judah had overlaid and gave it to the king of Assyria" (vs. 16). This datum is of considerable interest, and indicates that the king had restored and adorned the temple. Not only this, but the Assyrian inscriptions give a picture of considerable wealth and luxury in Judah at this time (cf. II Chr. 32:27-29). They also reveal how thorough were the preparations which Hezekiah had made for rebellion, and advance a reason for his capitulation—the desertion of his mercenaries. Fig. INS 12.

II Kings 18:17–19:37 raises many difficult problems. Hezekiah had already submitted, but these verses tell of still further demands made by Sennacherib, calling for complete surrender. Further, they seem to consist of parallel accounts—18:17–19:7; 19:8-37. Their historicity is open to question. It is possible that during the siege of Lachish, which Sennacherib had difficulty in capturing, he sent part of his army under the Rabshakeh to Jerusalem in order to pin down Hezekiah's forces. The city was besieged but was not captured. After some time the Rabshakeh returned from Jerusalem—no reason is given for his return—and joined the king of Assyria, who was then fighting against Libnah (II Kings 19:8). Apparently Lachish had fallen by this time. The siege of Libnah was interrupted by the news of the approach of an Egyptian army under Tirhakah king of Ethiopia (vs. 9). But Tirhakah only became king of Egypt ca. 689. Sennacherib's Annals in regard to this campaign break off abruptly with the statement that he "laid waste the large district of Judah and made the overbearing and proud Hezekiah, its king, bow in submission." The probable explanation is that events at home demanded his return, and he withdrew (II Kings 19:7).

From the evidence available to us it is not possible to reconstruct the history of subsequent events. Kings records an Assyrian invasion which was remembered because of a plague which decimated the Assyrian army (II Kings 19:35). If this had any connection with Tirhakah, it presumably occurred after his accession ca. 689, unless it is assumed that he had not yet become king. As against the hypothesis of one campaign carried out by Sennacherib against Hezekiah, it seems preferable to adopt the hypothesis of two campaigns and to assume a second Assyrian invasion of Palestine between 689 and 686, the year of Hezekiah's death. The circumstances were again propitious. In 691 the Assyrians sustained a defeat at the hands of the Babylonians and the Elamites at Khalulê. Hezekiah revolted again, with the backing of Tirhakah. It would appear that considerable confusion arose regarding Sennacherib's activities in Palestine, and the accounts of two originally separate campaigns were telescoped into one.

Bibliography. R. P. Dougherty, "Sennacherib and the Walled Cities of Palestine," JBL, XLIX (1930), 160-71. E. G. Kraeling, "The Death of Sennacherib," JAOS, 53 (1933), 335 ff. W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel, I (2nd ed., 1934), 385 ff. H. H. Rowley, "Zadok and Nehushtan," JBL, LVIII (1939), 113 ff. J. A. Montgomery, The Books of Kings, ICC (1951), pp. 480-518. J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 207, 222 ff, 292 ff, 327 ff. A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II (1953), 242-49. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 287-88, 321. W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher (1955), pp. 293-315. W. F. Albright, "New Light from Egypt on the Chronology and History of Israel and Judah," BASOR, 130 (1953), 4-11 (especially 8-11); "Further Light on Synchronisms Between Egypt and Asia in the Period 935-685 B.C.," BASOR, 141 (1956), 23-27 (especially 23-26). M. Noth, Geschichte Israels (3rd ed., 1956), pp. 239 ff. G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 164-72.

2. One of the ancestors of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

3. Son of Neariah, descendant of the royal family of Judah (I Chr. 3:23).

4. Head of a family whose descendants returned with Nehemiah from the Babylonian exile (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21). The Babylonian name was Ater. Both names occur in Neh. 10:17 among the number of those who set their seal to the covenant.

H. B. MacLean

HEZION hē′zĭ ən [חזיון, from Arab. hadwa', one with pendulous ears] (I Kings 15:18). Grandfather of Ben-hadad I of Syria.

HEZIR hē′zər [חזיר, swine, boar]. 1. A descendant of Aaron; eponym of a priestly house in the reign of King David (I Chr. 24:15).

2. One of the chiefs of the people signatory to the covenant of Ezra (Neh. 10:20).

HEZRO hĕz′rō [חצרו] (II Sam. 23:35 Kethibh; I Chr. 11:37); KJV HEZRAI —rī [חצרי] in II Sam. 23:35 (Qere; LXX). A Carmelite who is numbered among the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty."

HEZRON hĕz′rən [חצרון, חצרן, from place name(?); Ἐσρωμ]; KJV NT ESROM ĕz′rəm; HEZRONITES hĕz′rə nīts. 1. Eponym of a clan of the tribe of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:6; I Chr. 5:3).

2. Eponym of a clan of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; Ruth 4:18-19; I Chr. 2:5, 9, 18, 21, 24-25; 4:1; Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33).

H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

3. A city on the S border of Canaan, between Kadesh-barnea and Addar (Josh. 15:3). In the parallel passage in Num. 34:4 it is combined with the latter as Hazar-addar. It is not the same as Kerioth-hezron, another city in the S of Judah. See Kerioth.

S. Cohen

HIDDAI hĭd′ī [הדי] (II Sam. 23:30). One of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty." He came from the brooks of Gaash in the hill country of Ephraim. In I Chr. 11:32 he is called Hurai (חורי).

HIDDEKEL hĭd′ə kĕl [חדקל, from Assyro-Babylonian Idiglat/Idignat, from Sumer. Idigna] (Gen. 2:14; Dan. 10:4 KJV). The Hebrew name of the River Tigris.

HIDE, HIDDEN. See Revelation.

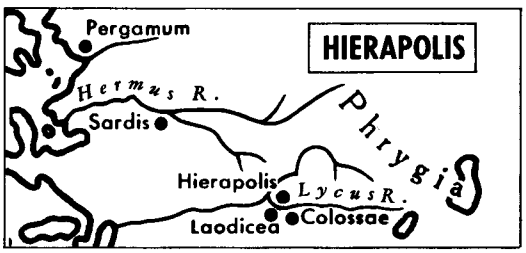
HIEL hī′əl [חיאל, God lives]. A Bethelite who rebuilt the city of Jericho in the days of Ahab, and the loss of whose sons is interpreted to be the fulfilment of an ancient curse uttered by Joshua. It is recorded that when Joshua destroyed the city of Jericho, he pronounced a grievous curse upon whoever should rebuild it and stipulated that



> At the cost of his first-born shall he lay its foundation,
> And at the cost of his youngest son shall he set up its gates (Josh. 6:26).

Centuries later, in the days of Ahab, Hiel undertook the hazardous task of rebuilding Jericho and thereby violated the curse. During the reconstruction Hiel suffered the loss of his eldest son, Abiram, and his youngest son, Segub. These deaths may have occurred through natural causes or by immolation as foundation sacrifices. The historian, however, attributes them to the nemesis of the curse of Joshua (Josh. 6:26 LXX; I Kings 16:34).

E. R. DALGLISH

HIERAPOLIS hī'ə răp'ə lĭs ['Ιεράπολις, 'Ιερὰ Πόλις, the holy city]. A town in the SW of Asia Minor.

Hierapolis is one of the important Hellenistic and Roman cities in the Lycus Valley in the extreme SW of Phrygia. It is situated on a terrace overlooking the N bank of this river, some six miles N of LAODICEA and ten miles W of COLOSSAE. The terrace of Hierapolis, nicknamed Pamukkale ("cotton castle") in modern times, is famous for its continuing geological transformation. Hot mineral springs issue from the rock in the city, and the waters streaming down the cliffs have deposited limestone in large formations, the surface of which is made of gleaming white "frozen cascades."

These hot springs were originally associated with another miraculous phenomenon—a cave filled with lethal vapors. Only eunuch priests were able to escape alive from this Plutonium or Charoneion, considered an entrance to the underworld (Strabo XII. 629). The cave was no longer there in the fourth century A.D., but in ancient times a local Phrygian cult seems to have been attached to the spot. This early sanctuary could have given the city its name of Hieropolis, "city of the hieron (sanctuary)," a form which preceded the later official name of Hierapolis, the "holy city."

The foundation of Hierapolis as a city seems to be due to Eumenes II of Pergamum (197-160 B.C.). From a cult center it became an active commercial competitor of its neighbors in the Lycus Valley. Here too the textile industries were particularly celebrated. The organization of the craftsmen into guilds is attested for such specialists as wool workers, carpet weavers, and purple dyers. The position of the city was strategic (its plateau rising some three hundred feet above the river valley), and of commercial advantage, as it lay on a branch road leading from the main E-W highway to the Hermus Valley and Sardis. Moreover, Hierapolis had its hot medicinal springs as an added attraction for visitors.

The city continued its prosperous existence under the Romans as part of the province of Asia. It suffered from the earthquakes which also affected Laodicea (Tacitus XIV.27), but apparently it was rebuilt on an extensive scale. The most interesting aspect of the religious history of Hierapolis is the transformation of the old and primitive cult site, with its cave and worship of the Great Goddess (who appears on local coins), into the center of Christianity (attested by Col. 4:13). Justinian made the city a metropolis, and its bishops often appear in Byzantine lists.

The ruins of Hierapolis have been explored but not excavated. The city plan follows the grid system. A colonnaded main street runs NW to SE, other streets cross it at right angles, and the public buildings follow the same orientation. Most noticeable are the ruins of Roman baths combined with a gymnasium,* in which some vaults are still standing. These baths must have been the center of residence for visitors who came to seek the cure of hot baths at Hierapolis. A large apsidal building stands E of the baths next to the main street, and another, similar one to the N of the N gate. Although there are several crosses cut into the arches, these two Roman buildings do not seem to have been designed as churches, although the S one may have been converted. A church of the fourth or fifth century A.D. has been recognized in a smaller building near the N gate. Fig. HIE 19.

Courtesy of Ahmet Dönmez

19. Ruins of baths at Hierapolis

The theater and the city wall are the only irregular elements in the city plan. The preservation of the theater is good and its location spectacular, overlooking the city and the Lycus Valley.

Much information regarding the inhabitants of Hierapolis was gathered from its cemeteries to the N and the E. Some 1,200 sarcophagi were counted, most of them of simple shape, but some prominent mausoleums serving as family graves.

Bibliography. W. M. Ramsay, The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, I (1895), 84-121; C. Humann et al., Altertümer von Hierapolis (Jahrbuch des deutschen archäologischen Instituts, Ergänzungsheft IV; 1898); D. Magie, Roman Rule in Asia Minor (1950), pp. 127-28. M. J. MELLINK

HIEREEL. KJV Apoc. form of JEHIEL.

HIEREMOTH. KJV Apoc. form of JEREMOTH.

HIERIELUS. KJV Apoc. form of JEHIEL.

HIERMAS. KJV Apoc. form of RAMIAH.

HIEROGLYPHS hī'rə glĭfs [ἱερός, sacred; γλυφή, carving]. The pictographic symbols used in the ancient Egyptian system of writing. Normally in use on stone inscriptions, hieroglyphs were occasionally written with a pen on papyrus. An abbreviated, cur-

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

20. Hieroglyphs on a limestone fragment from a tomb wall, Twenty-sixth Dynasty in Egypt (663-525 B.C.)

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

21. Hieroglyphs from the temple of Sesostris, built ca. 1950 B.C., and destroyed by Amenophis III in the fifteenth century and replaced by the hall of columns of Karnak sive form of this script was very early developed, known as hieratic, which was further simplified in the Persian period to become demotic. A different system of hieroglyphic script was developed by the Hittites to write one of their languages.

See also WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.

Figs. HIE 20-21. R. J. WILLIAMS

HIERONYMUS hī′ə rŏn′ə məs [Ἱερώνυμος]. One of the district governors (στρατηγοί) in Palestine under Antiochus V. He and his fellow governors, Timotheus, Apollonius, and Demophon, "would not let [the citizens] live quietly and in peace" (II Macc. 12:2). J. C. SWAIM

HIGGAYON hĭ gā′yŏn. See MUSIC.

HIGH PLACE, SANCTUARY. The religious place of sacrifice, worship, and festival. So largely does the place of worship figure in the Bible that about twenty terms or expressions are employed. "High place" is the rendering of "BAMAH"; "sanctuary" translates three Hebrew words: קדש, "holiness"; מקדש, "place of holiness"; and דביר, "oracle, inner sanctuary, the holy of holies" (containing ark, cherubim, and mercy seat). In the NT "sanctuary" appears but nine times to render ναός (Matt. 23:35), οἶκος (Luke 11:51), σκηνή (Heb. 8:2, 5; 9:1, 8), and ἅγια (Heb. 9:24; 10: 19; 13:11) in descriptions of both Herod's temple and the heavenly sanctuary.

High places were essentially Canaanite—apparently from as early as the second half of the third millennium—and then Israelite sanctuaries, situated on high hills and associated with green trees and leafy oaks. They could be open-air or roofed sanctuaries and were also frequently equipped with houses and halls or buildings of various kinds (I Kings 12:31; 13:32; II Kings 17:32; 23:9), including raised platforms as at Beth-shan and other places.* Equipped with altars of sacrifice, incense, stone pillars, trees and/or poles, and water, they were the objects of Yahweh's wrath (Lev. 26:30; Ps. 78:58). Israel was bidden to destroy them on entering Canaan (Num. 33:52; Deut. 33:29). They were partially removed by Asa (II Chr. 14:3, 5; but cf. 17:6), and destroyed by Hezekiah (II Kings 18:4) and Josiah (II Kings 23: 8, etc.). Many were built by Solomon (I Kings 11:7), Rehoboam (I Kings 14:23; II Chr. 21:11), and many kings of N Israel (II Kings 17:9). They are said not to have been removed by no fewer than six kings: Asa (I Kings 15:14), Jehoshaphat (I Kings 22:43), Jehoash (II Kings 12:3), Amaziah (II Kings 14:4), Azariah (II Kings 15:4), and Jotham (II Kings 15: 35); and to have been restored by Manasseh (II Kings 21:3; II Chr. 33:3; etc.). Figs. HIG 22-23.

The editors of Kings displayed a certain whitewashing tendency when they associated Solomon with the high place at Gibeon (I Kings 3:4), as did the Chronicler in mentioning in connection with the same shrine the tabernacle (I Chr. 16:39; 21:29) and the tent of meeting (II Chr. 1:3, 13). Yahweh was worshiped at high places (II Chr. 33:11, 17). On them sacrifices and incense were offered (I Sam. 9:12; I Kings 3:3; etc.) in Moab (Jer. 48:35) as in Israel (II Kings 16:4; II Chr. 28:4; Ezek. 6:3, 6; etc.). Worshipers ate (I Sam. 9:13), wept (Isa. 15:2), and prayed (Isa. 16:2; 56:7) at high places; prophets (I Sam. 10:5-13) and priests (II Kings 23:5, 9, 20, etc.) frequented them and resided at them. I-II Kings especially show that they were centers of very great activity for private devotion, official ceremonies, and annual festivals.

"Sanctuary," on the other hand, represents places of mainly Israelite and Yahwistic worship, and the

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

22. Great stepped altar in the Mekal temple of Thutmose III, fourteenth(?) century B.C.; from Beth-shan

Courtesy of Denis Baly

23. The high place at Petra word should be studied in connection with named sanctuaries like Gilgal near Jericho, Bethel, Shechem, Beer-sheba, Gibeon, and especially the amphictyonic shrine at Shiloh, and the temple at Jerusalem. The first word, קדש, is used frequently of the tabernacle in the desert and its component parts (Exodus; Leviticus; Numbers), of Solomon's temple (I Kings; Psalms), of Judah figuratively (Ps. 114:2), and of the New Jerusalem (Isa. 62:9), and some twenty-five times in the phrase "Shekel of the sanctuary" (Exodus; Leviticus; Numbers). The second word is מקדש, which has the same root as the first—viz., "holiness, separation"—but is distinguished by having "m" for its first letter, thereby indicating, as so often in Hebrew, "the place of," or where the holiness is to be found. This second word describes the TABERNACLE of the Exodus (Exodus; Leviticus; Numbers); the TEMPLE at Jerusalem (Exod. 15:17; I–II Chronicles; Neh. 10:39—H 10:40; Mal. 2:11; etc.); the New Jerusalem (Isa. 60:13; Ezek. 37:26, 28); and also sanctuaries at Shechem (Josh. 24:26), Bethel (Amos 7:13), and Moab (Isa. 16:12).

The sanctuary or temple is the constant and central feature of most of the OT and is implied in most parts of the NT. They often originate by divine designation through dream or theophanic visitation, as the stories of Abraham (Gen. 12:7), Jacob (Gen. 28:10-17), Moses (Exod. 3:12), Gideon (Judg. 6), or David (II Sam. 24) show. Otherwise they are founded by the patriarchs or heroes of Israel. It is a natural corollary of this that the pattern of the sanctuary is also revealed (Exod. 25:9, 40; Num. 8:4; I Chr. 28:19; Acts 7:44; Heb. 8:5), so that there is a presumption that the earthly sanctuary is a copy of the heavenly sanctuary (Isa. 14:13; Heb. 8:5; 9:23-24). This theory of the cosmic significance of the sanctuary—e.g., Solomon's temple—must be understood in the light of the Egyptian and Syrian structures which are partly the prototypes of Solomon's temple, and anticipate its symbolism; and also in the light of Sinai-Horeb, which is the prototype sanctuary of the Israelites, and which thus conveys a historical dimension to the purposes of the sanctuary and cult in Israel.

The narrative and prophetic works of the OT, not to mention the Psalms, show the importance of the sanctuary, but there is also the evidence of the laws. Thus the first positive law following the Decalogue is a law of the altar, and "altar" means a sanctuary, however rudimentary. The block of P law in Exod. 25–31 begins with the offering for the building of the sanctuary (cf. chs. 35–40). The Code of Holiness (Lev. 17–26) begins with a law, the aim of which is to establish the necessity and uniqueness of the one sanctuary, and the laws of Deuteronomy begin in ch. 12 with exactly the same aim. Likewise Ezekiel's law begins in ch. 40 with the sanctuary (cf. Zech. 1:16). The laws clearly show the priority of the sanctuary for Israel, and Hag. 1 points to the same theme. Small harvests and an inflationary economy (Hag. 1:6) occur because the people attend to their own homes and are not concerned to rebuild the temple (vs. 9). Sanctuaries mean prosperity because they are the centers of blessing. Though Solomon built his sanctuary as a royal chapel, as had many kings and emperors in the Fertile Crescent, yet it is intended as a medium for the blessing of Israel. At Ras Shamra the gods themselves help to erect Baal's temple and so create and maintain well-being (cf. Isa. 2:2 = Mic. 4:1; Isa. 60:13; Ezek. 37:26, 28; 47:1-12).

There is a very close connection between the Israelite sanctuary and the divine name. Where Yahweh records his name, there he visits and from there he blesses (Exod. 20:24; cf. I Chr. 22:19; II Chr. 20:8; Ps. 74:7). Note, too, the close connection in such passages as "defiling my sanctuary and profaning my holy name" (Lev. 20:3).

Sanctuaries were places of pilgrimage (Exod. 5:1, etc.; I Sam. 1:3; I Kings 12:26-27; Hos. 4:15; Amos 5:5), and as such meeting places for people (Ps. 29:2). The larger and more important shrines—e.g., the amphictyonic shrine of Judges and I Samuel—or the great high place at Gibeon would attract greater crowds. There thus inheres in the very idea of the sanctuary an aspect of centrality and unity. At these sanctuaries there were sights to be seen (Pss. 27:4; 63:2—63:3; 68:24; 84:7; etc.); oracles of advice, help, and answered prayer to be procured (I Sam. 1:17; Pss. 27:4; 85:8; etc.); sacrifices to be offered, incense to be burned, and all the manifold activities appropriate to ancient worship, instruction, and atonement for sin. Festival and fast alike belong to the sanctuary, as do light and truth and life.

It is inevitable that in Canaan, so prone to syncretism, the sanctuaries—Solomon's not excluded—should show signs of foreign features. Thus the ancient conceptions of the temple as, among other things, the bond or center of the land or lands is implied in several OT passages. The tabernacle of the desert is in the center of the camp (Exod. 25:8; Lev. 15:31; Num. 2:2). There are likewise a number of references to the midst of the earth (Ps. 74:12; Isa.

19:24), which, like Isa. 2; Mic. 4, imply the presence of the sanctuary. The same is true of the sanctuary planned by Ezekiel (Ezek. 37:28; 43:8-10, 15; 48:21; cf. Zech. 2:10-11; 8:3, 8). Some (sacred) places in the vicinity of Shechem (Judg. 9:37) and Jerusalem (Ezek. 38:12) are described by the word "navel"—center of land and earth respectively. Yet this geographical centrality of the sacred place is overshadowed in the Bible by that personal centrality which belongs to the great figures of the Bible, such as Abraham (Gen. 12:3); the Davidic king (Pss. 2; 89; etc.); the Suffering Servant of Isa. 53; Jesus on the cross (John 12:32). Yet this geographical and personal centrality become one in the figure of God himself as the sanctuary or asylum of Israel (cf. Exod. 21:14; I Kings 1:50; Ezek. 11:16; but not Isa. 8:14, where the text is unsound). Thus Jesus' word to the woman of Samaria that sanctuary worship will pass away anticipates the words: "I saw no temple in the city, for its temple is the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb" (Rev. 21:22; cf. vs. 24; 22:2). Sanctuaries of all kinds are thus temporary, in themselves plots of ground with buildings witnessing to the divine claim that the earth is the Lord's, and pointing to the day when earth like heaven will acknowledge the divine sovereignty. In that day sanctuaries will be no more, for all space, like time, property, and life, will be God's.

Bibliography. A. von Gall, Altisraelitische Kultstatten (1898); G. Westphal, Jahwes Wohnstätten (1908); P. Volz, Biblische Altertümer (1914), pp. 14-23; R. Storr, Die Frömmigkeit im Alten Israel (1928), pp. 192-93; T. Oestreicher, "Reichstempel und Ortsheiligtümer in Israel," Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie, vol. XXXIII, no. 3 (1930); E. König, "Zentralkultstätte und Kultuszentralisierung im alten Israel," Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie, vol. XXXIV, no. 3 (1931); F. Jeremias, "Das orientalische Heiligtum," ΑΓΓΕΛΟΣ Archiv für neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte und Kulturkunde, IV (1932), 56-69; W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942), pp. 103-7; G. E. Wright, "The Significance of the Temple in the Ancient Near East; Part III: The Temple in Palestine-Syria," BA, vol. VII, no. 4 (1944), pp. 65-77; R. Brinker, The Influence of Sanctuaries in Early Israel (1946)—very good; C. C. McCown, "Hebrew High Places and Cult Remains," JBL, LXIX (1950), 205-19; A. Schwarzenbach, Die geographische Terminologie im Hebräischen des ATs (1954), pp. 12-16; W. F. Albright, "The High Place in Ancient Palestine," Volume du Congrès, Strasbourg (Supplement to VT, IV; 1957), pp. 242-58; S. Iwry, "Maṣṣēbāh and Bāmāh in IQ Isaiah^{A} 6 13," JBL, LXXVI (1957), 225-32.

G. HENTON DAVIES

HIGH PRIEST. See CHIEF PRIEST; PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

HIGHER GATE. See UPPER GATE.

HIGHEST HEAVEN(S) [שמי השמים, heaven of heavens] (I Kings 8:27; II Chr. 2:6; 6:18); KJV HEAVEN OF HEAVENS. Since the word "heaven" (שמים) was also used by the Hebrews in the narrower sense of "firmament," or "ceiling of the earth," the "highest heaven" denoted the canopy believed to be in turn suspended over that expanse. In Mesopotamian and later Jewish folklore, the sky was conceived as consisting of several superimposed layers. The "highest heaven" might therefore also designate the uppermost of these. Called in Akkadian the "heaven of Anu" (šamê ša ^{d}Anim), it was there that the supreme god had his supernal dwelling. See HEAVEN; SKY.

In Deut. 10:14; Neh. 9:6, the RSV inconsistently retains the older rendering, "heaven of heavens."

T. H. GASTER

HIGHWAY [מסלה, a built-up road, from סלל, to cast up or build up (a highway), from Akkad. sulû, highway; מסלול, Akkad. mušlalu; דרך, way, road (KJV alternately WAY); KJV ארחה (RSV CARAVAN), חחץ (RSV STREET); KJV διεξόδους τῶν ὁδῶν (RSV THOROUGHFARE), ὁδός (RSV STREET; ROADSIDE)]. In addition to its literal usage, the term "highway" is occasionally used figuratively (Prov. 15:19; 16:17; Jer. 18:15; 31:21). In Isa. 11:16; 35:8; 40:3 (cf. 62:10), it designates the road of the returning exiles (see also Isa. 19:23).

See also KING'S HIGHWAY; ROAD; TRAVEL AND COMMUNICATION.

H. F. BECK

HILEN hī′lən [חילן]. A village in the hill country of Judah, assigned to the Levitical family of Kohath (I Chr. 6:58—H 6:43). Cf. HOLON 1.

HILKIAH hĭl kī′ə [חלקיהו, חלקיה, my portion is Yahu]; Χελκίας]; KJV Apoc. once HELKIAS hĕl kī′əs (I Esd. 1:8); once HELCHIAH hĕl kī′ə (I Esd. 8:1); also CHELCIAS kĕl′shĭ əs (Bar. 1:1, 7; Sus. 2, 29, 63). 1. A Merarite Levite antedating King David (I Chr. 6:45—H 6:30).

2. Another Merarite Levite, contemporary of David (I Chr. 26:11).

3. The father of Eliakim, an officer over King Hezekiah's household (II Kings 18:18, 26; Isa. 22:20; 36:3).

4. The father of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 1:1).

5. The father of Gemariah, an ambassador of King Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 29:3).

6. A high priest in the reign of King Josiah, who aided the latter's religious reforms and who found the Book of the Law in the temple (II Kings 22:4-14; I Chr. 6:13—H 5:39; II Chr. 34:9-22; 35:8; cf. I Esd. 1:8; see DEUTERONOMY; JOSIAH); an ancestor of Ezra, according to Ezra 7:1 (cf. I Esd. 8:1).

7. A chief of the priests among the returned exiles (Neh. 12:7); also a priestly house mentioned from the postexilic period (vs. 21), perhaps represented as well by earlier priests of this name (cf. 1, 2, 6, above).

8. One of those who stood beside Ezra at the public reading of the law; probably a layman (Neh. 8:4). I Esd. 9:43 reads "Hezekiah."

9. According to Bar. 1:1, 7, an ancestor of Baruch, Jeremiah's servant.

10. The father of Susanna (Sus. 2, 29, 63 [with Theod.]; also vs. 7 LXX).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 18, 163-64.

B. T. DAHLBERG

HILL, HILL COUNTRY. A land elevation such as those in the central ridge of Palestine (see PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF); usually, but not always, distinguished from a mountain in being lower or less distinct as a peak. See MOUNT.

The common Hebrew word for "hill" is גבעה; it is used in referring to elevated terrain in a general way (Gen. 49:26), to a specific elevation (Exod. 17: 9), and to natural elevations such as those on which the pagan rites of the Canaanites were conducted and adopted by some of the Israelites (Deut. 12:2; I Kings 14:23). Although the Hebrew word הר is often translated "mountain" (Gen. 31:54; Exod. 3:1; etc.), it is also rendered "hill" (Judg. 16:3; Pss. 2:6; 121:1; etc.). The term עפל is translated "hill" in II Kings 5:24 (KJV "tower"); Isa. 32:14 (KJV "fort"); Mic. 4: 8 (KJV "stronghold"). Although the meaning of עפל is uncertain (see OPHEL), it probably designated a natural hill rather than an artificial tower. In the NT βουνός is rendered "hill" (Luke 3:5; 23:30), as is also ὄρος (Matt. 5:14; Luke 4:29; KJV "hill" in Luke 9:37 [RSV "mountain"]).

In many passages where the KJV renders הר as "mountain" or "mount," most modern English translations, including the RSV, use "hill country" (Gen. 31:23; Num. 13:17; Deut. 1:7; Josh. 9:1; etc.). Because there is not a sharp distinction among "mountain," "hill," and "hill country," the choice of the proper English word is difficult and requires a knowledge of the geography of Palestine. In view of the fact that the elevations in the Palestine and E Jordan areas seldom rise above three thousand feet, it is preferable to refer to them as "hills" or "hill country" (cf. "hill country of Seir" in Gen. 36:8; "hill country of Gilead" in Deut. 3:12; "hill country of Judah and Israel" in Josh. 11:21; "hill country of Naphtali" in 20:7), especially when an area, rather than an isolated peak, is intended. W. L. REED

HILLEL (THE ELDER) hĭl′əl. A Talmudic sage and a leading scholar in the development of the oral law (ca. 60 B.C.–A.D. 20).

Although the Talmudic sources preserve a number of anecdotes about Hillel, and sayings, parables, and (two) enactments by him, the data for a full-length sketch are much too meager. Hillel was a native of Babylonia who came to Palestine in order to continue his studies in the advanced Palestinian academies, principally those of the great "expositors," Shemaiah and Abtalyon. The story about his diligence, despite poverty, later became a popular tale. His eminent abilities were recognized when he established his view on an important legal problem to the satisfaction of the halachic authorities of his time, the Bene Batyra: that the obligation to bring the paschal offering overrides sabbath prohibitions. As these halachic authorities may have been a special commission for temple ritual, Hillel's erudition and skill in the give-and-take with them would therefore be no small matter. The sources state that he was thereupon appointed Nasi, which has been said to mean head of that temple commission. Hillel's championing of the use of sophisticated hermeneutic principles was of special significance for the development of Talmudic method and study, and for both the expansion and the deepening of the concept of the oral Torah. The seven rules, whose application he urged in the interpretation of scripture, were later the basis and model of still additional principles of exegesis—e.g., the thirteen rules of Rabbi Ishmael.

In contrast to his colleague Shammai and Shammai's school, Hillel and the school over which he presided, Bet Hillel, were inclined most often to a liberal rather than conservative interpretation of the demands of the law; so, too, it was the Hillelite view that the opportunities for study ought to be made more liberal than the Shammaites were prepared to make them.

The sources delight in repeating a number of anecdotes, all of them contrasting the proverbial patience of Hillel with the impatience and irascibility of Shammai, the most famous anecdote being the one of the proselyte who wanted to learn the whole Torah while standing on one foot. After Shammai had rebuffed him, the proselyte came to Hillel. "What is hateful to thee do not do to thy fellowman," Hillel told him; "this is the whole Torah; all else is commentary. Now go learn that!"

Pirke Aboth quotes more sayings by Hillel than by any other single sage. Among the better known of these are: "Be of the disciples of Aaron, loving peace and pursuing peace, loving mankind and drawing them to the Torah." "If not I for myself, who then? And being for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?" Several maxims by Hillel occur also in other Talmudic sources.

Hillel was responsible for two major enactments which constitute far-reaching adaptations of biblical law: one (the prozbul) in regard to the cancellation of debts in the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:2), and one in connection with the sale of houses in fortified cities (Lev. 25:29-30). Descendants of Hillel inherited his position of Nasi, and one of these was Rabbi Judah the Prince (ca. A.D. 220), the redactor of the Mishna. In effect, the Hillelite emphasis proved to be dominant in Pharisaic and Talmudic Judaism, thus determining actually the direction taken by classical Judaism ever since.

Bibliography. A. Kaminka, "Hillel's Life and Work," JQR, XXX (1939-40), 107-22; J. Goldin, "Hillel the Elder," JR, XXVI (1946), 263-77; L. Finkelstein, Ha-Perushim ve-Anshe Keneset Ha-Gedolah (1950), pp. 1-16; N. N. Glatzer, Hillel the Elder: The Emergence of Classical Judaism (1956).

J. GOLDIN

HIN hĭn [הין]. A liquid measure of ca. an American gallon; one sixth of a bath. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § C4*g*.

HIND [אילה, feminine of איל, see HART; cf. Ugar. aylt, doe, hind]. The adult female of the Red Deer, especially after the third year. For the uncertainty about the precise meaning of the word translated "hind," see HART.

The OT references to the hind allude to her calving (Job 39:1; Jer. 14:5; possibly Gen. 49:21; Ps. 29:9), and to her surefootedness (II Sam. 22:34; Ps. 18:33—H 18:34; Hab. 3:19), though it should be noted that deer, generally speaking, live in wooded or grass country, not in rocky surroundings. The hind's grace and seeming gentleness explain the metaphor for one's wife in Prov. 5:19; the significance of the reference to Naphtali as a hind in Gen. 49:21 is obscured by the uncertain text. In the title of Ps. 22—H 22:1 the phrase "The Hind of the Dawn" is presumably a musical notation, referring possibly to a well-known melody. For the use of "hind" in the oath in Song of S. 2:7; 3:5, see GAZELLE.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HIND OF THE DAWN. See MUSIC.

HINGE [ציר; Akkad. ṣirru]. Probably a metal hinge pole piece or pivot attached to a door and fitted into a socket (Prov. 26:14); a sluggard turning on his bed is compared to a door turning on its pivot. פתות (I Kings 7:50) is translated "hinges" in the KJV, but the RSV uses "sockets." The meaning is uncertain.

See also DOOR; SOCKET. O. R. SELLERS

HINNOM, VALLEY OF THE SON OF hĭn′əm [גיא בן הנם, גי] (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; II Chr. 28:3; 33:6; Jer. 7:31-32; 19:2, 6; 32:35) [RSV VALLEY OF BEN-HINNOM]. Alternately: VALLEY OF THE SONS (KJV CHILDREN) OF HINNOM [גי בני הנם] (II Kings 23:10); VALLEY OF HINNOM [גיא הנם] (Neh. 11:30; KJV also Josh. 15:8; 18:16). A deep valley S of Jerusalem, which marked the limit between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah (Josh. 15:8; 18:16). According to Jeremiah 19:2, the Gate Harsith, or POTSHERD GATE, led from the city into this valley. It is commonly identified with the Wadi er-Rababi, which at first runs N-S beneath the W walls of the Old City, and then turns sharply to the E in the direction of the Kidron (see KIDRON, BROOK). There is little textual support for a hypothesis according to which the name of Hinnom applied originally to the ravine of the Tyropoeon E of the city of David, and that it would have been transferred to the Wadi er-Rababi in the time of the monarchy.

The books of Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah mention repeatedly the cults rendered to foreign gods and the sacrifices of children cremated in honor of Baal and Molech, toward the junction of the valley with the Kidron, at the place called TOPHETH (II Kings 23:10; II Chr. 28:3; 33:6; Jer. 32:35). Thus the Valley of Hinnom became so notorious that Jeremiah could dispense with pronouncing the name when he condemned the cults of "the valley" (Jer. 2:23), which would be called "Valley of Slaughter" in the Day of Vengeance (Jer. 7:31-32; 19:5-6). The memory of the rituals of cremation gave birth to the notion of the hell of fire, γέεννα τοῦ πυρός (Matt. 5:22), a transcription of the Hebrew גיא הנם (see GEHENNA). The Valley of Hinnom is given as the N limit of postexilic settlements scattered throughout the old territory of Judah and Simeon, as far S as Beersheba (Neh. 11:30).

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

24. The Valley of Hinnom

Jewish and early Christian tombs, ranging from the Roman to the Byzantine periods, are still visible on the steep cliffs on the S side of the valley, where a well-founded tradition places the Potter's Field, bought for the burial of paupers with Judas' silver. See AKELDAMA; JERUSALEM § 12. See map under JERUSALEM.

Fig. HIN 24.

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I (1907), 170-80; H. Vincent, Jérusalem Antique (1912), pp. 124-34; G. Dalman, Jerusalem und sein Gelände (1930), pp. 199-207; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, I (1933), 401-2; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 10-12, 52, note 2. G. A. BARROIS

HIPPOPOTAMUS [בהמות, plural of בהמה, beast, CATTLE] (Job 40:15 RSV mg.; KJV-RSV BEHEMOTH). A large, thick-skinned amphibious ungulate mammal of the family Hippopotamidae, with an enormous head, a bulky, hairless body, and short legs; now found only in the rivers of Africa.

The animal described in Job 40:15-24 has been variously identified, but the view that it is a hippopotamus (which Bodenheimer dismisses too lightly; see FAUNA § A2*e*ii), is less open to objection than any alternative. The plural of בהמה, bᵉhēmâ, to designate the hippopotamus is doubtless used with intensive force (a plural of "majesty"): this was probably the largest animal, with the possible exception of the elephant, known to the author. How well he was acquainted with the hippopotamus we do not know. Even though he may have seen the animal, in his poem he treats it freely, and he may even echo some popular beliefs (e.g., vs. 19*a*). His only serious zoological error is his reference to the tail; the short tail (ca. nine inches) of this animal hardly justifies what is said in vs. 17*a*.

Apart from any knowledge the author had of the Egyptian hippopotamus (cf. Herodotus II.71), he may have been familiar with a Palestinian species. There is now evidence from Tell Qasileh, near Tel Aviv, of hippopotamus remains on the coastal plain of Palestine dating from the twelfth to the fourth centuries B.C. Swamps in N Galilee and in the Jordan Valley may also have harbored the hippopotamus during the same period.

Bibliography. G. Haas, BASOR, 132 (Dec., 1953), 30-34. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HIRAH hī′rə [חירה; LXX Ιρας]. Judah's Adullamite associate (Gen. 38:1, 12, 20-23). In vs. 12 (cf. also vs. 20) the LXX and the Vulg. read "his shepherd" (rō·ʿēhû) for "his friend" (rēʿēhû).

HIRAM hī′rəm [חירם, חירום; an abbreviation of אחירם (Ahiram), the brother (God) is exalted, or brother of the exalted one]. Alternately: HURAM hyo͝or′əm [חורם] (Chronicles). 1. King of TYRE (986-935 B.C.); a contemporary of David and Solomon. In the tenth century there seems to have been a tremendous expansion of the Phoenician commercial empire, and by the middle of Hiram's reign the colonies of Gades and Tartessus (Tarshish) in Spain had been founded.

The historian Menander attributes to Hiram I an extensive building program, the institution of a new feast for the Tyrian deity Melcart, and the suppression of a revolt by the inhabitants of Utica or Citium (Jos. Antiq. VIII.v.3; cf. Herodotus II.44). Hiram's friendship with David and Solomon was probably based on a mutual need. Israel lacked the technical skills necessary for the advancement of her material culture; Phoenicia was deficient in agricultural production.

The OT implies that Hiram's first contact with Israel—the supplying of workmen and raw material for the palace of David (II Sam. 5:11)—took place shortly after the capture of Jerusalem, which happened before Hiram became king. Either the OT has mistakenly named Hiram instead of his father Abibaal (Jos. Antiq. VIII.v.3), or, as seems more likely, the OT has placed the contact with Hiram too early. Recognition from a ruler as well established as Hiram would be more likely to follow David's defeat of the Philistines, an event which doubtless called the attention of the surrounding nations to this new monarch.

Hiram likewise made a treaty with Solomon (I Kings 5:12—H 5:26), who seems to have married a Sidonian princess (I Kings 11:1; cf. Ps. 45:12—H 45:13[?]). Again Hiram supplied the Israelites with cedar and skilled labor for their building program, in return for wheat and olive oil (I Kings 5:1-11—H 5:15-25; II Chr. 2:1-16—H 1:18–2:15; cf. Jos. Antiq. VIII.ii.6-8, who assures his readers that the correspondence could still be found in the Tyrian archives). Official buildings dating from this period show many signs of Phoenician influence in design and execution. See MEGIDDO § 3*d*.

Hiram also aided Solomon in his commercial enterprises by supplying ships and seamen for the merchant fleet which operated out of the port of EZION-GEBER (I Kings 9:26-28; 10:11, 22; II Chr. 8:17-18; 9:10, 21). No doubt, Hiram received a share of the profits; perhaps he was given the right to base a fleet of his own in Solomon's port. The Chronicler's statement that Solomon traded with the Phoenician colony of Tarshish (II Chr. 9:21) is the result of his misunderstanding the term "ships of Tarshish" (I Kings 10:22). "Tarshish" refers to the class of the ships, not their destination. See SHIPS AND SAILING.

When Solomon's ambitious building program proved too great a strain on his treasury, he was forced to sell to Hiram twenty cities, apparently located on the coastal plain between Carmel and the Phoenician territory (see CABUL). Perhaps the ceded district included the port of ACCO, which is missing from the province list of Solomon (I Kings 4:8-19), though it lay within the boundaries of David's kingdom (II Sam. 24:5-7).

2. Same as HURAM 3.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Role of the Canaanites in the History of Civilization," Studies in the History of Culture (1942), pp. 37-46; M. Noth, The History of Israel (1958), pp. 210, 212.

R. W. CORNEY

HIRCANUS. KJV form of HYRCANUS.

HIRELING. A servant or other worker paid WAGES.

HISS [שׁרק]. A sound made by forcing the breath between the tongue and the teeth; used to express astonishment (I Kings 9:8; Jer. 18:16; 19:8; 49:17; 50:13) or derision (Lam. 2:15-16; Ezek. 27:36). It is often accompanied by wagging the head (Lam. 2:15), clapping the hands (Lam. 2:15), gnashing the teeth (Lam. 2:16), shaking the fist (Zeph. 2:15). One suspects at times it was used when passing ruins, as a protection from the demons of destruction (cf. II Chr. 29:8; Jer. 19:8; 25:9, 18; 29:18; 51:37; Mic. 6:16).

V. H. KOOY

HISTORY. A theological approach to history seeks to outline the biblical interpretation of history, conceived as a movement purposed and controlled by God, who is Lord of history, and further to ask whether this conception of history as a series of happenings "according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God" (Acts 2:23) is one to which Christians today can subscribe with undivided conscience. History is one thing; a theological interpretation of history may be quite another. The distinction may be expressed as that between history (Geschichte) and "sacred" or "salvation" history (Heilsgeschichte). The problems to be discussed are the relation of Heilsgeschichte to Geschichte, and whether the foundations of the Geschichte are sufficient to bear the superstructure of Heilsgeschichte which faith has built upon them.

A. "Event" and "fact"
B. Methods of historical writing
   1. Narrative
   2. Didactic
   3. Scientific
C. The OT interpretation of history
   1. The primeval history
   2. The sagas
   3. The prophets
      a. The past
      b. The present
      c. The future
D. The NT interpretation of the OT
E. Validity of the biblical interpretation
Bibliography

A. "EVENT" AND "FACT." The word "fact" is from Latin factum, "thing done," and a fact is generally taken to mean something that has really happened, as distinct from any conclusions that may be drawn from it. Yet it is now almost a commonplace to say that "there are no bare facts for the historian." This is because any two observers of even a single contemporary event can nearly always be relied upon to report it in ways that not only differ but may, in part at least, appear to contradict one another.

NT historical writing is, as historical writings go, near to, though not contemporary with, the events it records. In the accounts of the Resurrection, the First Gospel has it that "an angel of the Lord descended from heaven" (Matt. 28:2), the Second that "they saw a young man sitting" (Mark 16:5), the Third that "two men stood by them" (Luke 24:4), and the Fourth that Mary "saw two angels in white, sitting" (John 20:12). But whether or not we believe that the Resurrection took place, it would be unwarranted skepticism to base denial of it upon the "discrepancies" in the gospels. On the contrary, the unself-conscious independence of the narratives is some testimony to the essential veracity of the story.

OT history is of events often long past. And when the record is of a series of happenings over a long period of time—much more, the history of an entire people—it is often difficult to determine how much is fact and how much interpretation. If there are no longer any "bare facts" for the historian, it is convenient to define a fact of history as an event together with the (inevitable) interpretation that enters into the recollecting and recording of it. (German can make the distinction between Geschehen, "happening," and Historie.) Such a new "fact" can be a powerful motive force in the life of a people. Indeed, a nation's life and character can be even more powerfully influenced by what it believes to have been its history than it is by events long past, which anyhow are now only "remembered" as they are embodied in the national tradition. (This is not to say that the tradition is pure fabrication or to degrade belief into credulity.) E.g., the Hebrews escaped from Egypt and crossed the Red Sea. So much was event that can be reduced to physical terms. The Egyptians may have seen, and a modern reader may see, no more in it than that. But the Hebrews believed that they owed their "deliverance"—this was to introduce Heilsgeschichte as distinct from Geschehen or even Geschichte, "escape"—to Yahweh—Heilsgeschichte again. This faith was continually deepened with the passage of the years and the assurance that Yahweh was still with them, and it is not too much to say that the whole edifice of Jewish religion and morality rests upon it.

It is pertinent at this stage to say something about the issue that arises between those who hold strongly conservative views about Bible history and the so-called "critics." The former believe, often passionately, that every Bible narrative or statement is "fact" in the sense that things happened exactly as described. They make no distinction between event and fact as they have been defined here. Geschichte is Heilsgeschichte, and Heilsgeschichte, Geschichte. This means that duplicate stories which appear to contradict each other—e.g., the sister-wife stories in Gen. 12:10-20; 20; 26:1-11—must be made to agree by what is often forced and labored exegesis. The "critic" is not in this predicament. He finds many indications that history in OT times was not, and cannot be expected to have been, written in the manner of modern histories. It was not academic-scientific. Critics may, and do, differ among themselves about just how much OT historical writing may be labeled Geschichte. But so long as they are reasonably conservative in their treatment of the Geschichte—and most critics nowadays are—and so long as they share the Christian faith in the Heilsgeschichte—as almost all of them do—the differences between fundamentalist and critic may be less acute than they often are believed to be.

B. METHODS OF HISTORICAL WRITING. Historiography, which deals with methods of historical writing, has nothing directly to do with the interpretation of history, though a historian's method of dealing with his materials often gives the clue to his interpretation of history. There are three types of historical literature: (a) narrative or descriptive; (b) didactic or pragmatic; (c) scientific or genetic.

1. Narrative. The simplest form of narrative history consists of annals; but even annals, by what they record and by what they leave unrecorded, afford some key to the outlook of the annalist. It is probable that the "Book of the Chronicles [Hebrew "acts of the days"] of the kings of Israel [and Judah]," to which the books of Kings refer (I Kings 14:19, etc.), was mainly annals. Such unconnected statements in the account of Solomon's reign as that "then Solomon built a high place" (I Kings 11:7) may also have been excerpted from annals of the reign. But the finest piece of descriptive historical writing in the OT—or, indeed, anywhere before Herodotus—is the "court history" of David (II Sam. 9–I Kings 2). This reads as if it was written by at least a near contemporary. It is objective, it never moralizes, and yet it leaves the impression that the writer was fully aware that David's trouble with his sons was due to his own lack of self-discipline, though this is never said.

2. Didactic. Most OT historical writing is didactic, "history with a purpose." This applies particularly to the historical retrospects in Deuteronomy and to the books of Judges and Kings. Many scholars believe that the whole of Deuteronomy–II Kings was originally one work—the "Deuteronomic history"—which was later subdivided. Samuel is less moralizing than Kings, mainly because in three quarters of it the hero is David, who was, by Deuteronomic standards, the ideal king, and moralizing historians let themselves go more readily when there are evils to be denounced than when there is good to be commended. "Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of Yahweh more than all that were before him" (I Kings 16:30). This, with minor variations, is typical; only two kings, Hezekiah (II Kings 18:4-5) and Josiah (II Kings 22:2; 23:25), both of them kings of Judah, receive unqualified praise. The Deuteronomic historians were more concerned to point the moral for their contemporaries than to give an unbiased account of the past.

3. Scientific. A modern academic historian must write as well as he can, but he is more concerned to show how events are related to the economic-social and spiritual movements from which they derive, than to be entertaining or instructive. The last thing he will do is moralize, though he may, if his work is on a big canvas, attempt a "philosophy of history." Of this "genetic" type of history there is nothing in the OT, if only because the documentary sources to which a "scholar," had there been any such in OT times, could have access and from which he could develop a technique of research and writing, were meager in the extreme compared with the wealth of materials at the disposal of the historian today. OT prophets and historical writers were not concerned with pure history. And yet, paradoxically enough, they did attempt something which, if it cannot be called a philosophy of history, was nevertheless an interpretation of history viewed, as it were, sub specie aeternitatis. This interpretation of history is to be found, not so much in the Deuteronomic writings, which were largely moralizings on comparatively recent happenings viewed from the standpoint of the law of the one legitimate sanctuary, but in the sagas of the Pentateuch and in the prophetical writings.

C. THE OT INTERPRETATION OF HISTORY.

1. The primeval history. The first eleven chapters of Genesis are not quite like anything else in the OT. They describe the creation of the world and the beginnings of civilization down to approximately the time when writing began to be employed in Babylonia and something like historical records could be kept. Some of the stories, of the Creation and the Flood, have points of similarity to, and were almost certainly ultimately derived from, Babylonian mythology. (The word "mythology" is used in a variety of meanings. Mention of it here prompts the remark that Heilsgeschichte is not mythology in the sense the word generally bears in the current "demythologizing" controversy. To "demythologize" is to restate theological concepts in terms which are not at variance with scientific cosmology. The relation between Heilsgeschichte and Geschichte is not quite the same as that between prescientific mythological, and "demythologized" theological, concepts.)

The materials in the primeval history—again those relating to the Creation and the Flood—are in duplicate, of which some parts are commonly assigned to the P and other parts to the J strata of the PENTATEUCH. There are differences of presentation as between P and J, but in this short summary the differences may be neglected (as may also such sigla as J^1, J^2, L, and S), and Gen. 1–11 may be treated as a unit.

Briefly, the world had its origin in the creative will of God. Man's place in it is that of a creature, a creature superior, indeed, to all other creatures, in that he is created "in the image and likeness of God," but nevertheless a creature. His position in relation to God, who created him, on the one hand, and to the world in which he finds himself, on the other, differs from that of all other creatures. He is to have universal dominion, but he must not attempt to usurp the authority of the Creator. His disobedience to the divine injunction had disastrous consequences, culminating in the Flood, from which only Noah and his family were preserved. Immediately after the Flood, God is said to have established a covenant with Noah and his descendants and all living creatures, to the effect that never again should there be a flood to destroy the earth (Gen. 9:9-11). The story continues with the dispersal of Noah's descendants over the earth. The Japhethites are (roughly) the European peoples, the Hamites the African, and the descendants of Shem the Semites. Europe and Africa lay more or less beyond the geographical horizons of the genealogists of Gen. 10–11. The center of their world was occupied by the Semites, of whom Eber (עבר; Gen. 10:21; 11:14), the ancestor of the Hebrews (עברים), receives particular mention. Five generations after Eber comes Terah, the father of Abram, Nahor, and Haran (Gen. 11:16-27), and the stage is set for the call of Abram/Abraham.

2. The sagas. The sagas are those stories in Genesis–Numbers, and Joshua–Judges, which are generally assigned to the JE tradition. There is now less confidence than there was in labeling paragraphs, still less verses and parts of verses, as from the documents J and E; and sigla like J^1, J^2, E^1, E^2, are best treated as tentative. Nevertheless, the differences between JE and P are clearly recognizable and are admitted even by the "traditio-historical" school. For the present purpose it matters little whether stories come from J or from E. We may even give them no labels at all and still discern in them a definite interpretation of history. They bear the impress of a master mind, and they received very nearly their present shape (whether orally or in writing is little matter) fairly early in the period of the monarchy, probably between 1000 and 850 B.C. Later amplifications of the Deuteronomists (D) and the Priestly school (P) keep to the essential pattern of this archetypal interpretation.

The story begins with Yahweh's summons to Abram/Abraham to leave Ur of the Chaldeans and go "to the land that I will show you" (Gen. 12:1), a land which is to be given to his descendants (vs. 7). But already, together with concern for Abraham and his descendants, there is a note of universalism: "By you all the families of the earth will bless themselves" (vs. 3). The central arch of the whole edifice is the complex of stories in Exodus about the institution of the Passover, the Exodus itself, and the covenant ceremonies and giving of the law on Mount Sinai. The story reaches its conclusion in the triumphant conquest of the Promised Land.

This conclusion is reached only after a long series of contretemps. First, Abraham has no son. Sarah is taken for a time into the harem of Pharaoh (Gen. 12:10-20). As she continues to be barren, Abraham anticipates that one of his slaves must be his heir (15:3). When at length Ishmael is born, his mother is the Egyptian slave Hagar (Gen. 16). At long last Sarah bears Isaac, and Ishmael and the Arabs disappear from the story (25:1-18). When Isaac grows up, there is difficulty in finding a suitable wife for him (Gen. 24). For a time Rebekah also is barren, and of the twin boys she later bears, it is Jacob, the younger, who secures the birthright, by stratagems of dubious morality. Jacob in his turn must seek a wife among his Aramean kinsfolk and at the same time keep out of the way of the irate Esau, whose descendants also in due course disappear from the main thread of the story (Gen. 36). In his old age Jacob migrates to Egypt to escape famine in Canaan. There he and his family are provided for by Joseph, who, after being sold by his own brothers, had been given up as dead. After the death of Joseph the Israelites are slaves for a long time in Egypt. And so on.

Even after the Exodus, the Israelites for their persistent grumblings are condemned to wander for a generation in the wilderness before they may enter the Promised Land. The whole story is instinct with the faith that the purpose of God must finally be realized, despite all obstinacies of nature and of men. This faith may be summed up in the words of Joseph to his brothers: "So it was not you who sent me here, but God. . . . You meant evil against me; but God meant it for good" (Gen. 45:8; 50:20).

3. The prophets. a. The past. The pre-exilic prophets have surprisingly little to say about the patriarchal tradition. Abraham is not mentioned except in Mic. 7:20, probably a late passage. Hosea refers to Jacob (12:3-4—H 12:4-5), and there is an echo of this in Jer. 9:4—H 9:3: "Every brother will altogether overreach" (עקוב יעקב, "do the Jacob"). In Amos the names Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph are only appellations of the nation Israel. It is not until the Prophet of the Exile that the patriarchal tradition becomes prominent, with particular reference to Abraham (Isa. 41:8-9; 51:2; 63:16; cf. Ezek. 33:24).

The Exodus and the wilderness wanderings, on the other hand, are prominent in Amos (Amos 2:9-11; 3:1-2), and Hosea seems to say that Yahweh's first meeting with Israel dates from the Egyptian oppression and deliverance (Hos. 11:1; 12:9—H 12:10; 13:4; cf. Ezek. 20:5-6; Amos 3:1-2). Hosea (2:2-23—H 2:4-25; 9:10) and Jeremiah (2:2-3) picture the wilderness wanderings as a kind of honeymoon time in which Israel was married to Yahweh and entirely happy in him. If this seems at variance with the incident of the golden calf and the ungrateful complainings which are such a feature of the stories in Exodus and Numbers, it may be that the idealization of the wilderness period was intended to throw into greater relief the later apostasy of Israel, which is depicted in the darkest colors (Jer. 2:5-28; cf. Hos. 2; Amos 2:10-12). Ezekiel (20:5-8) even carries back the apostasy of Israel to the time of the Egyptian bondage. Apostasy is the theme, too, in the Deuteronomic framework of the stories in Judges.

Prominent in Deutero-Isaiah is the conception of the divine choice or "election" of Israel (Isa. 41:8-9; 44:1-2). It is a feature also of Deuteronomy (Deut. 4:37; 7:6-7), and although the verb "choose" is not used, the conception of election is implicit in the Genesis saga of Abraham.

b. The present. The prophets were not cloudy idealists, now rhapsodizing, now lamenting, over Israel's past. They were uncompromising realists. Yahweh was Lord of history, now as well as in the past. He was not concerned only with the domestic fortunes and morals of Israel. His judgments were universal in their reach. Amos asserted that Yahweh would call Moab to account for a cruelty perpetrated upon Edom (Amos 2:1-3). Isaiah has Yahweh apostrophize the Assyrians as the "rod of my anger," with which he will chastise his own people, Israel (Isa. 10:5-11). But if the Assyrians take matters into their own hands and with overweening pride exceed the bounds of their commission, Yahweh will not spare them either (Isa. 10:12-15). In Jeremiah, Yahweh speaks of "Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant" (Jer. 25:9). Nebuchadrezzar and his Babylonians are Yahweh's agents and as such are invincible until the divine purpose through them is accomplished (Jer. 27:8; 37:9-10). The political extinction of the Hebrew kingdoms and the deportations of their peoples were not, as the prophets saw it, the work of ruthless military powers free to treat small nations exactly as they pleased. They were judgments of the "Holy One of Israel." Toward the end of the Exile, Deutero-Isaiah hailed the rise of another non-Israelite agent of Yahweh—this time a deliverer, not a destroyer. He was Cyrus, who is dignified by Yahweh with the titles "my shepherd" (Isa. 44:28) and "anointed" (Hebrew messiah; Isa. 45:1).

c. The future. History, for the prophets, was not a meaningless succession of recurring cycles of events. It began with Creation (as distinct from emanation), it had all along been under the control of Yahweh, and it was moving toward a purposed end. In other words, the prophets were eschatological in their thinking. There are those who hesitate to use the word "eschatology" for any view of the future which is not conceived in terms of the dualistic conception of two worlds, one "on this side" and the other "on that side" of the time series. Such a contrast has no place in the minds of the prophets. The end is within the time series, and, speaking generally, is brought about on the plane of this world. (The general sense of the Hebrew word "eternity," עולם, is "long duration.") But it is convenient to use the word "eschatology" for OT visions of the future, so long as we are clear about the restricted sense in which we are using it.

Prophetic conceptions of the future may, in general, be summed up in the expression "the kingdom (or kingly rule) of God," although the expression does not always occur in any given "forward-looking" passage. In Isa. 40–55 there is expectation of the near-approaching advent of Yahweh, who is coming in propria persona and whose "glory" will be revealed for "all flesh" to see (Isa. 40:3-5). The details of this "new Exodus" are largely conceived in terms of the Exodus and wilderness wanderings of long ago (e.g., 41:17-20; 43:16-21). In Joel (2:28-29—H 3:1-2) there is promise of the "pouring out" of Yahweh's spirit "on all flesh." In Isa. 65:17-25 the ideal future is pictured in terms of a return to paradisal peace, the feeding together of Herbivora and Carnivora (cf. Isa. 11:6-9), and longevity and material abundance for mankind (cf. Isa. 25:6-8). Only in Isa. 26:19 and the apocalyptic Dan. 12:2-3 does the expectation of a blessed future life find unambiguous expression, and even then the expectation is of a resurrection to life upon this earth. In some descriptions of the kingdom of God, though not in all, there appears the figure of the messianic king, of the lineage of David (Isa. 11:1-9; Mic. 5:2-3—H 5:1-2; Zech. 9:9). In Isa. 52:13–53:12 and some related passages we read of the atoning death of a suffering SERVANT OF THE LORD. The religious insight and depth of these passages is so profound that their real significance was not perceived until Jesus interpreted them as referring to himself.

All in all, the OT makes upon us the impression of its incompleteness. It seems to look forward to a consummation that lies beyond itself. This is the more striking because there is no rigidity about its expectations of the future. It is as if it labors to express what so far was inexpressible.

D. THE NT INTERPRETATION OF THE OT. The OT ends, somewhat hesitantly, on a note of expectation. The NT begins, without any hesitancy at all, on the note of fulfilment. This NT fulfilment is everywhere related to the OT expectation. The two Testaments are a unity; neither is self-explanatory nor can be properly understood without the other. It is as if all the loose ends of the OT promises are gathered together, to find their culmination, and explanation, in a unique event of history, the coming of Christ, and all that followed upon that coming. The key fitted the lock perfectly, or so at least the writers of the NT believed. This is the testimony of Jesus himself (Luke 4:16-21; 24:25-27, 44-47), of the Synoptic gospels (Mark 1:1-8 and parallels), of the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel (John 1:1-17), of the speeches of Peter and Stephen in Acts (2:14-36;

7), of Paul (Rom. 9–11; Gal. 4:1-5), of I Peter (1:1-12), and of the Letter to the Hebrews (1:1 et passim). It is needless to multiply references; if we could succeed in unraveling this thread that runs through the NT, what would be left would be almost as colorless as the gospels would be without the miracles of Jesus.

E. VALIDITY OF THE BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION. It might be considered sufficient simply to outline, as objectively as possible, the biblical interpretation of history, and then leave the result to the dispassionate judgment of the reader. But this would seem lacking in courage, not to say wanting in candor. We are asked to believe that an assortment of writers, all of them (with the exception of Luke) Jews, none of them (not even Luke; see Luke 1:1-4) a scientific historian, on the basis of a series of happenings of minor political importance that took place almost before history, as we understand it, had got well under way, had already discerned the meaning and purpose of history. What they affirm can be summed up in the opening words of the Letter to the Hebrews: "In many and various ways God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets; but in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son, whom he appointed the heir of all things" (1:1-2). Even if "in these last days" (ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν τουτῶν) should mean no more than "recently," it is clear from I Cor. 10:11 (τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων) and I Pet. 1:20 (ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν χρόνων), and from much else in the NT, that the first Christians believed that the coming of Christ was the culmination of history. Obviously they were mistaken if they supposed they were living at the end of time. But they were not thinking in terms of time as measured by a celestial timepiece. The end, the τέλος, lay in the quality of finality of the revelation in Christ. Christ was for them the full, and final, revelation of God to man. And there seems no reason why the "final" revelation should not have been given to man as early in history as he was able to grasp something of its import. How otherwise should he have any light by which to steer his perilous course? This is not to say that there was no "revelation" of God to Athens and to Rome. It is only to say that for the knowledge of God, the Bible is normative for as long as time shall last. Heilsgeschichte is the standard by which Geschichte will be forever judged.

Another problem must be faced. For the pre-exilic prophets, as we have seen, Yahweh's relations with Israel appear to have begun with the Exodus, though they were presumably familiar with the patriarchal tradition, which was current at least a century earlier. This does not mean that the name Yahweh was unknown before the time of Moses. There is every reason to believe it was known. There is good reason to believe it was known to the Midianite-Kenites (see KENITES; MIDIAN; HEBREW RELIGION), but Exod. 6:2-3 says distinctly that it was not previously known to the Israelites. It is probable that the Genesis saga was prefixed, so to speak, to an Israelite Heilsgeschichte whose primary impulse was the Exodus, and that some of it was originally of Canaanite provenance. The testimony of archaeology is that the milieu of the patriarchal stories is that of the second millennium B.C., in which they are located, not that of the first millennium, in which the older critics supposed they were "written." Yet it is difficult to determine in any detail just what, or how much, Geschichte lies behind the Heilsgeschichte of Genesis. He would be a rash historian who denied the historicity of Abraham. It is probable, on the other hand, that Jacob and Joseph were originally gods (cf. the Ỻqb-'r and Ỻshp-'r of the Karnak pylons of Thut-mose III), although Jacob, as he is portrayed in Genesis, is a character psychologically convincing, a typical Israelite. Noah is the Utnapishtim of Babylonian mythology. Some of the figures in Genesis may be types, rather than individuals we may expect to meet in the afterlife. The sagaman whom we call "J" was in some sort like a biographer who researches into the antecedents of his hero. The modern biographer will set down nothing he cannot document accurately. J, on the other hand, when he would relate the antecedents of Israel, had to make do with folk traditions, part Israelite, part Canaanite, which he adapted with consummate skill to the Israelite Heilsgeschichte. It is little matter: the arch of the biblical interpretation of history is set firmly upon the two pillars of the Egyptian oppression and the Exodus in the OT, and the Cross and the Resurrection in the NT.

It remains to be asked whether the biblical interpretation of history is one to which an intelligent man can subscribe with an undivided conscience. Of course, if we start from the conclusion that we "should recognize in the development of human destinies [only] the play of the contingent and the unforeseen" (H. A. L. Fisher, Preface to A History of Europe), there is nothing further to be said. (The biblical interpretation of history by no means excludes the play of the contingent and the unforeseen.) But if we approach the question from the standpoint of Christian faith—and this is not to forfeit intellectual honesty and respectability—our conclusion may be that the biblical interpretation of history is, at least in broad outline, right.

We are to take the Geschichte as it is outlined in ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, and such articles on NT history as are relevant, and ask whether the interpretation we ourselves put upon it accords with the biblical Heilsgeschichte. This may seem a delicate tightrope exercise, the more so because Heilsgeschichte has a way of becoming an integral factor in history—the last words of Mattathias (I Macc. 2:49-68) illustrate this very clearly—and because it is probably as impossible completely to empty biblical history of Heilsgeschichte as it is completely to demythologize theology.

The Jews are an extraordinary people. Some part of their distinction in modern times may be due to their reactions to the harsh treatment meted out to them in the Middle Ages, but it is equally a heritage from OT times and from the OT Heilsgeschichte. They always were a gifted and "peculiar" people. Moses is their counterpart to Pericles; the Yahwist can vie with Homer, the prophets with the Greek tragedians. There was not the variety of genius in Israel that there was in Greece, but the testimony of Israel is the more striking and significant because it was so dominated by intense awareness of God. The NT is the record of events without parallel in history, and nothing since has been the same as it would have been if Christ had never come. The promise to Abraham, "by you all the families of the earth will bless themselves," may seem inadequately fulfilled if we judge it by the halfhearted attempts of the Jews in postexilic times to evangelize the Gentiles. But Christ was a Jew, and no exclusiveness of the Jews could hinder the fulfilment of their mission in him. The Geschichte which produced the Bible is, take it by and large, only explicable in terms of the biblical Heilsgeschichte. In short, biblical history is salvation history.

Bibliography. J. Skinner, I and II Kings (Century Bible), pp. 3-18, describes OT and modern methods of historical writing. The Kingdom of God and History, the Church, Community, and State Series, III (1938), contains essays on the meaning of history against the background preceding World War II, by H. G. Wood, C. H. Dodd, E. R. Bevan, C. Dawson, E. W. Lyman, P. J. Tillich, H. D. Wendland, and O. Piper; the essay by Dodd is especially relevant. C. H. Dodd, The Authority of the Bible (2nd ed., 1938). H. W. Robinson, Redemption and Revelation (1942), especially Introduction, pt. I, and pt. II, chs. 9-10; Inspiration and Revelation in the OT (1946), especially pt. III. E. Jacob, La tradition historique en Israël (1946). C. R. North, The OT Interpretation of History (1946). S. H. Hooke, In the Beginning, Clarendon Bible, OT, vol. VI (1947)—for the primeval history and sagas. M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (1948), is valuable for the early history but inclined to be "nihilistic." H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (1950). C. R. North, "Pentateuchal Criticism," in H. H. Rowley, ed., The OT and Modern Study (1951). G. E. Wright, God Who Acts: Biblical Theology (1952).

C. R. NORTH

HISTORY OF ABDIAS, APOSTOLIC. See ABDIAS, APOSTOLIC HISTORY OF.

HISTORY OF JOSEPH THE CARPENTER. See JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, HISTORY OF.

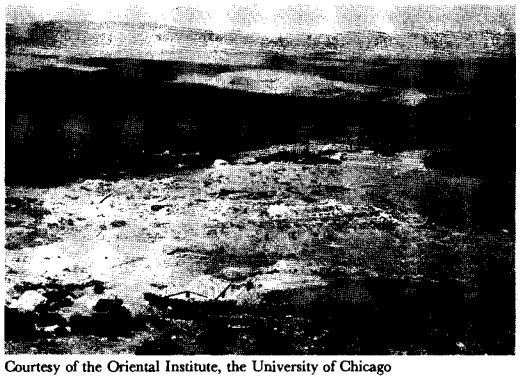
HITTITES hĭt'īts [singular חתי, חתית, plural חתים, חתית, from the form Hatti, attested in cuneiform sources]. A people of the ancient Near East. Parallel with this gentilic formation, the form "Heth" (the eponym of the Hittites), as well as forms standing for "sons of Heth" and "daughters of Heth," occur in the OT.

1. History of the Hittites
2. Hittite languages
3. Use of the term "Hittite"
4. Hittites in the OT

Bibliography



1. History of the Hittites. The original Hittites were a people who lived in central Anatolia and spoke a non-Indo-European language called Hattic or Proto-Hittite. This language is known to us only from scattered personal and geographical names in the Old Assyrian inscriptions from Cappadocia (ca. 2000 B.C.) and from a small number of inscriptions a few centuries later. With the invasion of Indo-European elements at the beginning of the second millennium B.C., the original Hittite state expanded into an empire covering vast territories in Anatolia and Syria. The farthest S expansion is marked by the ephemeral conquest of Babylon by the Hittite king Mursilis (ca. 1600 B.C.) on the one side, and by the mention of Hittites in the OT on the other. Ca. 1200 B.C., the Hittite Empire fell apart under the impact of the invasions of various peoples from across the Aegean, among whom the Phrygians, close relatives of the Balkan Thracians, must have played the leading role. For a few centuries the history of Anatolia is covered by an almost total darkness. Out of it no great state emerged comparable in size and power with the Hittite Empire. The whole area once occupied by the Hittites was thereupon divided into small kingdoms and principalities with the main centers around Kayseri, Tyana, and Malatya in Anatolia, and Carchemish, Aleppo, and Hamath in N Syria. These states soon came in contact with the Assyrians, whose conquering drive westward was continually threatening their very existence. One by one they fell prey to the expanding power of Assyria. The year 717 B.C., in which Carchemish was conquered by the Assyrian king Sargon II, marks the end of the independence of the last of the small Hittite states. Fig. HIT 25.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

25. Several inscriptions, found at Carchemish, in Hittite hieroglyphs

2. Hittite languages. One of the chief languages of the Hittite Empire was cuneiform Hittite, the decipherment of which, initiated in 1915 by the Czech scholar B. Hrozný, has progressed so far in the following years through the concerted efforts of E. Forrer, J. Friedrich, A. Goetze, F. Sommer, and E. H. Sturtevant—to name only the chief scholars—that the language is now considered fully deciphered. Cuneiform Hittite is an Indo-European language of the centum group, as best exemplified by the preservation of the velar in such words as kartis ("heart") or luk ("to kindle"), and of the labiovelar in such words as kwis ("who") or kwen ("to strike"). Although restricted in its spoken use to the area around Ḫattusas (modern Boghazköy),* the capital of the empire, cuneiform Hittite was the official language of the empire, as can be gathered from the fact that in this language were written the historical annals, proclamations, laws, and treaties with foreign states. The language is attested from ca. 1600-1200 B.C. The second most important language of the Hittite Empire was hieroglyphic Hittite, the decipherment of which was achieved during the last twenty years through the effective collaboration of five scholars of such diverse national origin as H. T. Bossert, E. Forrer, I. J. Gelb, B. Hrozný, and P. Meriggi.* Hieroglyphic Hittite is doubtless an Indo-European language and was spoken throughout the Hittite Empire from ca. 1600 to 700 B.C. Much less well known are Luwian and Palaic, two still different Indo-European languages. Figs. HIT 26; CAR 10; CAL 3.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

26. Ḫattusas (modern Boghazköy), capital of the ancient Hittite Kingdom

3. Use of the term "Hittite." In common usage the term "Hittite" has at least three different meanings, as it can stand for: (a) the native non-Indo-European Hittites, called "Hattians," who lived in central Anatolia; (b) the so-called "cuneiform Hittites," or Nesians—i.e., the people who originally lived around the capital Ḫattusas and used an Indo-European language preserved in a cuneiform writing borrowed from Mesopotamia; and (c) the so-called "hieroglyphic Hittites," who were originally at home in the S parts of the empire and used another Indo-European language preserved in a hieroglyphic form of writing of local origin. To the Assyrians and Hebrews, the term "Hittites" covered all the inhabitants of the original Hittite Empire plus its dependencies, irrespective of their linguistic or ethnic affiliation.

4. Hittites in the OT. In the consideration of Hittite history two main periods can be distinguished: the period before 1200 B.C. and the period after this date. In the first period the Hittite Empire, centered in inner Anatolia, extended southward toward the N reaches of Syria, but never as far S as Palestine. In the second period, small Hittite kingdoms and principalities covered vast areas in Anatolia and Syria, none of them extending S of the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. The appearance of Hittites in Palestine according to the OT is a historical enigma, for which only tentative interpretations can be offered.

Several names of individuals with a Hittite background are known from the OT. Ephron the Hittite sells a burial ground, Machpelah, situated before Mamre, near Hebron, to Abraham (Gen. 23:10; 25:9; 49:29-30; 50:13). Abraham calls himself a foreigner and a settler, while the Hittites are called native to the area. Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Basemath, the daughter of Elon the Hittite, are married to Esau, while he is staying in the area of Beer-sheba (Gen. 26:34; a different tradition, naming Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite, is found in Gen. 36:2). The custom of taking Hittite women as wives, discouraged by Rebekah and Isaac in the case of Jacob (cf. Gen. 27:46; 28:1), was followed in later times by Solomon (I Kings 11:1). Ahimelech the Hittite was a contemporary of David (I Sam. 26:6), as was also Uriah the Hittite, whose wife, Bathsheba the daughter of Eliam, was taken by David (II Sam. 11; 12:9-10; 23:39; I Kings 15:5; I Chr. 11:41). All the names of the Hittites listed above are Semitic, with the exception of the name of Uriah, for which a possible Hurrian etymology has been suggested. Thus it is clear that the Hittites living in Palestine, no matter what the memory or tradition of their ethnic background might have been, represented a group of people fully assimilated to the surrounding Semitic population.

The only exact indications concerning the geographical location of the Hittites in Palestine come from the stories dated to the time of Abraham and Esau, which place the Hittites in the area of Hebron and Beer-sheba in Judah. The reminder of Ezekiel to the city of Jerusalem that her father was an Amorite and her mother a Hittite (Ezek. 16:3, 45) again places the Hittites in the same general area. Not so clear are the implications of the story about an unnamed native of Luz (later renamed Bethel), who, after his life was spared when the Israelites took that city, went into the land of the Hittites and built another city Luz there (Judg. 1:26). The conclusion that a man settling in the land of the Hittites would likely be a Hittite himself, though plausible enough, cannot be proved at the present. If this is correct, then the story confirms the localization of the Hittites in S Palestine. Finally, we should recall the reference to the Hittites living in the hill country (Num. 13:29), apparently that of Judah and of some neighboring areas.

Nothing constructive on the localization of Hittites in Palestine can be obtained from the twenty-two references to Hittites listed among the people who were believed to represent the original inhabitants of Palestine before the coming of the Israelites. The lists are quite irregular in their structure; some list only two peoples and some as many as seven. Disregarding the lists of peoples mentioned in Gen. 15:19-21; Ezra 9:1 (where Kenites, Kenizzites, etc., are mentioned), the names of the seven peoples are: Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, Jebusites, and Girgashites. Indicative of the importance attached to the Hittites in these schematic lists is the fact that Hittites are mentioned six times in the first place and nine times in the second, overshadowed only by the Canaanites in the order of listing.

The table of nations lists Heth, along with Sidon, the Jebusites, the Amorites, the Girgashites, the Hivites, the Arkites, the Sinites, the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hamathites, as the sons of Canaan the son of Ham (Gen. 10:15-18; I Chr. 1:13-16). Hittites are here listed as Canaanites, together with the Phoenicians and the pre-Hebrew peoples of Palestine; the Indo-European background of the Hittites had long been forgotten by the author(s) of the table of nations.

The remaining five references to Hittites in the OT all pertain to areas outside Palestine proper. One reference, in the story of the unnamed man who founded the city Luz in the land of the Hittites (Judg. 1:26), has been discussed above. The promise given by Yahweh to the children of Israel: "From the wilderness and this Lebanon as far as the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites to the Great Sea toward the going down of the sun shall be your territory" (Josh. 1:4), is difficult to evaluate, since it covers not only Palestine but also vast territories beyond, up to the banks of the Euphrates. The area between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates was under some form of political control by the Hittites, but only in very ancient patriarchal times could it be imagined that some nomadic ancestors of the Hebrews lived or roamed in that faraway area N of Palestine. In its northernmost extension, David's empire reached Kadesh on the Orontes, if we can rely on the reconstruction of a damaged passage in II Sam. 24:6, which, in accordance with a LXX version, reads: "to the land of the Hittites, towards Kadesh."

Besides these three mentions of the land of the Hittites, the OT has two references to the kings of the Hittites, neither of which can be placed within an exact geographical frame. One passage refers to Solomon's buying chariots and horses and reselling them to the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Arameans (I Kings 10:29 and similarly in II Chr. 1:17); and the other names the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Egyptians as allies of Joram king of Israel against the Arameans (II Kings 7:6).

In résumé of the foregoing discussion, it can be said that the OT sources mentioning the Hittites can be divided into two classes: those referring to the non-Palestinian Hittites and those referring to the Hittites living in Palestine.

The OT sources in which the non-Palestinian Hittites are mentioned are very few in number—five at the most—and they all refer to the land of the Hittites and Hittite kings, to be located somewhere N of Palestine. The plural form of "kings" agrees well with the political situation of Greater Syria after 1200 B.C., during which time this whole vast area was subdivided into a large number of small kingdoms and principalities, all called "Hittite" in the Assyrian sources, irrespective of their ethnic background, whether Hittite, Hurrian, Aramaic, or Phoenician. The term "Hittite," used for the various Syrian states, goes back to a period before 1200 B.C., during which the Anatolian Hittites exercised full political control over large parts of Syria, especially those situated close to the Assyrian Empire.

All other OT sources mention Hittites as living peacefully in Palestine in the midst of the native populations, be they Hebrew or not. Although quantitatively they are much more numerous than the sources referring to the non-Palestinian Hittites, they are not explicit enough to allow general conclusions. As far as the sources show, the Hittites seem to be living in the hill country of Judah, they bear Semitic names corresponding to those of their neighbors, and, otherwise, they seem to be fully assimilated to the surrounding population.

Courtesy of Staatliche Museen, Berlin

27. Bas relief of seven Hittite prisoners, possibly from scene depicting the Battle of Kadesh; probably from time of Ramses II (1301-1234 B.C.)

Courtesy of Staatliche Museen, Berlin

28. Hittite prisoners, on faïence tile, probably from the time of Ramses III (ca. 1195-1164 B.C.)

The presence of Hittites in Palestine is a historical problem, for which several interpretations can be offered, none of them conclusive. According to one interpretation, the Hittites of Palestine are leftovers from a period in which the Hittites, originally Anatolian, controlled politically the whole of Greater Syria, including Palestine. This interpretation is not in accordance with the Assyrian sources, which generally locate the states called "Hittite" in an area situated N of Palestine. However, there is one exception to this, found in the Annals of Sargon II of Assyria and repeated in his "Display Inscription," wherein the population of the Palestinian Ashdod is called "Hittite." Some new evidence possibly bearing on the presence of Hittites in Palestine was discovered by Forrer (see bibliography) on a cuneiform Hittite tablet from the archives of Boghazköy. The interpretation of the tablet has its difficulties, but there is no doubt that it contains a reference to Hittites of the Anatolian city Kurustamma living in the "land of Mişri" at the time of the Hittite king Mursilis II (ca. 1330 B.C.). The "land of Mişri" may indicate generally the territories under Egyptian control, including Palestine. No constructive suggestions can be offered as to the reasons why these particular Hittites emigrated to Egyptian-occupied territories. An entirely different interpretation of the presence of Palestinian Hittites in the OT might be suggested if we replaced with "Horites" the name "Hittites" in many, if not most, of the OT passages. This would involve a change of only one consonant, namely ת to ר, in the Hebrew consonantal text, and this would be paleographically admissible. It has always appeared strange that the HORITES, or Hurrians, who played such an important role in the history of Syria and Palestine in the second millennium B.C., have received very scant mention in the OT, far out of proportion to their real importance. By replacing "Hittites," when the term designates people living in Palestine, with "Hurrians," we may obtain a picture which is fully compatible with our knowledge of Hurrian history.

Figs. HIT 27-28.

Bibliography. J. Garstang, The Hittite Empire (1930). E. O. Forrer, "The Hittites in Palestine," PEQ, LXVIII (1936), 190-209; LXIX (1937), 100-115. F. F. Bruce, The Hittites and the OT (1948)—a popular account. O. R. Gurney, The Hittites (1952), especially pp. 59-62. A. Goetze, Kleinasien (2nd ed., 1958).

I. J. GELB

HIVITE hīv'īt, hī'vīt [חוי, always with the article, and usually used collectively]. The Hivites were one of the nations prominent in Canaan before the Israelite settlement.

The term appears usually in the stereotyped list of nations expelled by the Israelites (Exod. 3:8, 17; 13:5; 23:23, 28; 33:2; 34:11; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 9:1; 11:3; 12:8; 24:11; Judg. 3:5; I Kings 9:20= II Chr. 8:7). But such instances tell us little about the people, and the same is true of the genealogical entry in Gen. 10:17 (=I Chr. 1:15).

The remaining notices of the Hivites, though few in number, supply better data. Gen. 34:2 applies the term to Hamor, father of Shechem. The inhabitants of Gibeon, to the N of Jerusalem, are identified as Hivites (Josh. 9:7; 11:19). Hivite cities are encountered on the way between Sidon and Beer-sheba (II Sam. 24:7), and Hivite settlements are placed in Mount Lebanon (Judg. 3:3) and even at the foot of Hermon (Josh. 11:3). Lastly, according to the LXX reading of a mutilated MT passage, the Israelite conquest left in its wake "deserted places of the Hivites and the Amorites" (Isa. 17:9). All this would seem to argue for the Hivites an original role of outstanding significance. Yet there is not a trace of such a people in any extrabiblical source.

Internal evidence may help to clear up this apparent mystery. In the consonantal writing of Hebrew the names for the Hivites (חוי), the HORITES (חרי), and the HITTITES (חתי) differ from one another by their respective middle letters alone. This was bound to lead to some textual confusion. Thus the MT itself speaks of "Zibeon the Hivite" in Gen. 36:2, but lists the same person as a Horite in vs. 20. Moreover, the LXX has "Horites" for the MT "Hivites" in Gen. 34:2; Josh. 9:7; and conversely, the "Hivites" of the LXX text at Isa. 17:9 reflects Hebrew ḥry, corrupted in the MT to ḥrš. Finally, the LXX speaks of Hittites in Josh. 11:3, whereas the MT refers to Horites.

The Horites in particular (see HURRIANS) would readily account for the prominence and the location that the MT assigns to the Hivites. Hurrian personal names are attested from Central Palestine, including Shechem (cf. Gen. 34:2), not to mention Lebanon and inland Syria. Furthermore, it is worth noting that in the stereotyped lists of nations the Hivites are mentioned usually before the Jebusites (see JEBUS), whose Hurrian affiliations are now well known; here, too, therefore, Hivites might well stand for "Horites." Why, then, were these names interchanged?

The assumption of a purely graphic confusion could account for some of the instances, but hardly for all of them. A plausible explanation must be sought elsewhere. We know that tradition identified the Horites with the pre-Edomite population of Seir, a region with which the Hurrians had apparently little, if anything, in common. On the other hand, the Hivites are located in Palestine precisely where the Hurrians were established. Since the name "Horites" came to be pre-empted for another group—perhaps because of etymological interference ("cave-dwellers"; see HORITES)—the designation "Hivites," which was probably secondary and limited at the start, came to be applied eventually to the Hurrians proper. The LXX, however, as well as some internal evidence in the MT (Gen. 34:2; Isa. 17:9), would still seem to point to actual conditions at an earlier time.

Bibliography. E. Meyer, Die Israeliten und deren Nachbarstämme (1906), pp. 328-45; E. A. Speiser, AASOR, XIII (1933), 26-31.

E. A. SPEISER

HIZKI hĭz'kī [חזקי, O my strength (invocation to deity)] (I Chr. 8:17); KJV HEZEKI həz'ə kī. A descendant of Benjamin.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 160.

HIZKIAH. Alternate form of HEZEKIAH.

HIZKIJAH. KJV alternate form of HEZEKIAH.

HOBAB hō'băb [חבב]. Father-in-law of Moses (Num. 10:29; Judg. 4:11). Conflicting traditions as to the name of Moses' father-in-law are preserved. In addition to Hobab, JETHRO priest of Midian (Exod. 3:1; 18:1) and Reuel (Exod. 2:18) are so named. There is also uncertainty in the identification of Hobab, since he is described as a Midianite in Num. 10:29, a Kenite in Judg. 4:11. "Hobab" may possibly once have stood in Exod. 2:18, "Reuel" then being a clan designation in that verse. Some LXX MS evidence indicates that Judg. 1:16 once read "Hobab the Kenite."

Moses urged Hobab to accompany the Israelites as guide through the wilderness; and although the account in Num. 10:29-31 leaves his decision in doubt, Judg. 1:16 would suggest that he did guide them.

R. F. JOHNSON

HOBAH hō'bə [חובה; Akkad. Abu(m); Amarna Ube, Abi]. A country the capital of which was Damascus.

According to Gen. 14:15, Hobah was situated "on the left hand of Damascus"—i.e., "north of Damascus" (so RSV). Various attempts have been made at the identification of Hobah; e.g., Qabun or Hobah, NW of Damascus. According to the letters from Tell el-Amarna, however, Ube seems to have been a territory, the capital of which was Damascus. Before the sixteenth century the name of Damascus is unknown, and probably another town was the center of the settlement of the Damascene. The mound Tell el-Salihiye, situated ca. ten miles E of Damascus, is the largest mound to be found in the region, which may favor the view that the capital was situated there in the early periods. Accordingly Hobah was probably the name of this place, which later lost its importance when Damascus became the capital of the territory. The mound of Tell el-Salihiye shows that there was a place of settlement since prehistoric times, and in the Old Babylonian period there was an important town which was fortified and may have been a defense against enemies coming from the E.

A. HALDAR

HOBAIAH. Alternate form of HABAIAH.

HOD hŏd [הוד, majesty (probably a shortened form)] (I Chr. 7:37). Eponym of a family in the tribe of Asher.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 146.

HODAVIAH hŏd'ə vī'ə [הודויה, הודויהו (in I Chr. 3:24 Kethibh הודויהו), give thanks to Yahu]; KJV HODAIAH hō dā'yə in I Chr. 3:24. Alternately: HODEVAH hō dē'və [הודוה, although Qere הודיה] (Neh. 7:43). 1. A descendant of King David (I Chr. 3:24).

2. One of the heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh (I Chr. 5:24).

3. A Benjaminite (I Chr. 9:7).

4. Ancestor of a family of Levites among the returned exiles (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43; lacking in I Esd. 5:26; cf. Ezra 3:9, where apparently this name is replaced by Judah, possibly in error).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 32, 194-95, 219. B. T. DAHLBERG

HODESH hō'dĕsh [חדש, new moon]. Wife of Shaharaim, a Benjaminite (I Chr. 8:9; but the text here is corrupt).

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 159-60.

HODEVAH. Alternate form of HODAVIAH 4.

HODIAH hō dī'ə [הודיה, Yahu is splendor; Apoc. Αὐταίας]; KJV HODIJAH hō dī'jə in Nehemiah; KJV Apoc. AUTEAS ô tē'əs. 1. Husband of a woman of Judah (I Chr. 4:19; KJV here renders the text incorrectly).

2. One of the Levites who interpreted the law to the people when Ezra read it publicly (Neh. 8:7; cf. I Esd. 9:48) and who helped lead the worship on the day of penitence (Neh. 9:5). Doubtless he was one of the two Levites signatory to the covenant of Ezra (Neh. 10:10 or 13).

3. Another Levite, signatory to Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:10 or 10:13).

4. A chief of the people, signatory to Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:18). B. T. DAHLBERG

HOE [מעדר, from עדר, to hoe] (Isa. 7:25 [KJV MATTOCK]; verbal form in Isa. 5:6; 7:25 [KJV DIG]). The hoe was used for loosening the soil and cutting out weeds around trees, bushes, and vines. See MATTOCK.

HOGLAH hŏg'lə [חגלה, partridge]. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad of Manasseh (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3 [all P]). It is probable that the names of the five daughters were originally the names of Canaanite towns (see BETH-HOGLAH). The name Hoglah appears in the eighth-century Samaria Ostraca. M. NEWMAN

HOHAM hō'hăm [חוהם] (Josh. 10:3). King of Hebron. He was one of five confederate kings in the Amorite coalition which attempted to halt Joshua's invasion of the territory SW of Jerusalem.

HOLIDAY [יום טוב, a good day]. A happy or festal day. The biblical reference is to the feast of PURIM celebrating deliverance from Israel's enemies (Esth. 8:17; 9:22; cf. I Sam. 25:8). It was a time of feasting and drinking (excess being permitted), giving of dainties to one another, and showing charity to the poor. This was the only secular holiday in the Jewish calendar for the expression of the lighter side of life. It was celebrated with feasting, games, merriment, playing of mummers, masquerading, noisemaking, etc.

In the postbiblical period the phrase "good day" refers to any holy day or festival day.

V. H. KOOY

HOLINESS. The "given" undergirding and pervading all religion; the distinctive mark and signature of the divine. More than any other term, "holiness" gives expression to the essential nature of the "sacred." It is therefore to be understood, not as one attribute among other attributes, but as the innermost reality to which all others are related. Even the sum of all the attributes and activities of "the holy" is insufficient to exhaust its meaning, for to the one who has experienced its presence there is always a plus, a "something more," which resists formulation or definition. Its connotations are as diverse as the cultures which seek to describe its mysterious nature, but common to all is an awareness of an undefined and uncanny energy, a sense of the numinous (cf. Latin numen), of the imponderable and incomprehensible, an inarticulate feeling of an inviolable potency outside and beyond, removed and distant, yet at the same time near and "fascinating," invading the everyday world of normal experience—what Rudolf Otto has described as the mysterium tremendum. Primitive societies seek to do justice to the maleficent and beneficent powers of "the holy" in such words as "mana" and "taboo," but these positive and negative forces are present wherever "the holy" is present. Holiness thus extends into every area of existence.

In the Bible "holiness" is related, e.g., to the world of nature and of history, to the realm of human experience and conduct, to the election-covenant life of Israel, to the psychophysical life of the individual, and even to the destiny of nations. There it is the revelation of the holy presence which gives rise to the impulse to worship; where the Holy One manifests himself in the hieros logos as in the theophanies, altars and sanctuaries are erected to bring the event and word to holy immediacy and realization. Wherever God's presence is felt, there men encounter the wonder and mystery of holiness. It is, therefore, the religious word κατ' ἐξοχήν. While it often denotes a state or condition, it is for ancient Israel primarily an activity and a speaking which eventuate in relationship.

A. In the OT
1. Etymology and usage
2. Associations of holiness
a. Holiness and fire
b. Holiness and jealousy
c. Holiness and wrath
d. Holiness and fear
e. Holiness and "remoteness"
f. Holiness and cleanness
g. Holiness and majesty
h. Holiness as unsearchable, incomprehensible, and incomparable
i. The holy as "wonderful"
j. The holy as "great"
k. The holy as exalted
l. The holiness of the living God
m. Summary
3. Holiness historically revealed
a. In the Yahwist and Elohist sources in Genesis
b. In J and E
c. In the book of Joshua
d. In the Prophets
e. The priestly development
B. In the NT
1. Etymology and usage
2. The NT understanding of holiness
a. The holiness of God
b. The holiness of Jesus Christ
c. The holiness of the church
Bibliography

A. IN THE OT. 1. Etymology and usage. The root qdš is found in several Semitic languages. It is present, e.g., in the Phoenician inscriptions, notably those of the twelfth-century Yehimilk and the later Eshmunazar sarcophagus, and also in the Ugaritic texts (qdš, "sanctuary" [Aqhat I.27, 45; II.16]; bn qdš, "sons of holiness" [137.21, 38]). Its provenance is probably Canaanite. But these passages cast no clear light on the etymology of the word. While many theories have been advanced as to its origin, only two need be considered here:

The first associates the root קדש with a hypothetical primitive root קד, whence קדקד, "crown of head," "hairy crown" (cf. Ugaritic qdqd), inferentially "cutting." According to this view, the root קדש is related to חדש, "to be new" ("cut off"; cf. קצב and חצב, קצף and חצף, קצר and חצר). In all these cases the meaning of "separation" is paramount. While the linguistic argument cannot be said by any means to be coercive, it must be admitted that the meaning suits the major associations of the word both in the history of religions (cf. τέμνειν and τέμενος; Latin sancire and sanctus; Polynesian tapu and tabu) and in the OT and NT.

The second theory connects the root with the Akkadian qadašu, "to be bright" or "to shine," synonymous with ellu^{m}, "clear," "bright." Semantically this satisfies a number of biblical contexts—above all, the not infrequent associations of קדש with FIRE and GLORY (כבוד).

Nevertheless, the more elemental meaning seems to lie with "separation." This is also confirmed by an examination of the more striking antonyms of קדש. Of these the most important is חל, "profane" or "common" (Lev. 10:10 P; I Sam. 21:5-6; Ezek. 22: 26; 44:23). The verbal root חלל ("to profane," "to pollute," etc.) expresses the antithesis even more forcefully than the noun חל. The prophet Ezekiel, with his profound sense of the divine holiness and of the sanctity of the temple and its cult, employs the word frequently in notable contexts (7:24; 20:9, 14, 22; 22:8; etc.) as does the writer of the Holiness Code (Lev. 21:9, 12; 22:2, 32). Where holiness is treated as though it belonged to the sphere of the secular or common, without fear and awe, there it is profaned. Another term relating to the same vocabulary is חרם, ḥérem (lit., "devoted" [to Yahweh], hence "set apart": "Every devoted thing is most holy to Yahweh": כל חרם קדש קדשים הוא ליהוה [Lev. 27: 28 P]). Especially in the holy war the ḥérem plays an important role, for all the spoil is Yahweh's; it must therefore be "devoted" to him by being destroyed. When Achan violates the ḥérem, he and his blood relatives are exterminated, and the Israelites must sanctify themselves (התקדשו) before they may again engage in holy encounter. Yahweh claims what belongs to him (Josh. 6:17-18; 7:1, 10-13).

Allied to the foregoing terms is the root נזר, "to dedicate," "to consecrate," "to separate" (Lev. 15: 31; 22:2; Ezek. 14:7; Hos. 9:10; Zech. 7:3). The Nazirite is one who is dedicated to God: "All the days of his separation [נזרו] he is holy to Yahweh" (קדש הוא ליהוה; Num. 6:8; cf. Judg. 13:5, 7).

In the LXX, קדש and its derived forms are almost invariably rendered by ἅγιος and its congeners, ἁγιότης, ἁγιωσύνη, ἁγιαζειν, ἁγιασμός, etc. While ἅγιος occurs in classical Greek as early as Herodotus, it appears more frequently in the Hellenistic period, probably because of oriental influence. Be that as it may, the linguistic usage of the NT seems to have been profoundly influenced by the LXX. The adjective קדוש is rendered by ἅγιος and κάθαρος (only Num. 5:17); the verb variously by καθαρὸν εἶναι (Isa. 65:5), δοξάζειν (Isa. 5:16), καθαρίζειν (Job. 1:5), etc.

2. Associations of holiness. A scrutiny of the terminology most frequently associated with "holiness" reveals not only its vast range and diversity of usage, but also the richness of its connotation and its peculiar imagery.

a. Holiness and fire. Most striking is the frequent association of holiness and fire. It is in fire that Yahweh manifests himself most characteristically, especially in the great theophanies from the time of Moses on (Exod. 3:2-3; 19:18; 24:17; Deut. 4:12, 24; 5:22-27; 9:3; Ps. 18:8-14 = II Sam. 22:9-15; Ezek. 1:4-28; Hab. 3:3-4); these and many other passages are often directly related to holiness. The divine manifestation in judgment, too, is characteristically in fire, especially on the Day of the Lord (Isa. 34: 8-10; Zeph. 1:18; cf. Isa. 9:18-19; Amos 1:3–2:16). Again, the practices of the cult are intimately and specifically connected with fire, and the emphasis upon holiness in all these contexts is noteworthy (Lev. 2:3, 9-10; 6:16-18; 7:3-5; 10:1-3: "unholy fire"; 16:27; 21:6-10; etc.). The substantives of fire imagery are frequent throughout the OT, often in passages where holiness is directly mentioned: "light," "heat," "smoke," "flame," "coals," "furnace," "caldron," "ashes," "brimstone." Similarly the verbs reflect this same symbolism: "scorch," "blaze," "consume," "burn," "kindle," "glow," "warm," "quench," etc. It is the seraphim, "the fiery ones" (cf. שרף, "to burn"), who sing, "Holy, holy, holy," before the throne of Yahweh, and one of them takes the glowing coal from the altar (cf. the cherubim in Ezek. 10:6-8). It will be observed that a number of the terms below which belong to the terminology of holiness reflect the same imagery of fire.

The NT perpetuates the same usage, especially, of course, in the language of judgment (Luke 12:49; Heb. 12:26-29: "Our God is a consuming fire"), in reference to the Holy Spirit (Matt. 3:11; Acts 2:1-4), and in allusions to the Mosaic or Sinaitic theophany (Acts 7:30), the visions of Isaiah and Ezekiel (Rev. 4:4-11), and the Day of the Lord (I Cor. 3:12-15).

b. Holiness and jealousy. Yahweh is a jealous God (אל קנא; see JEALOUSY). It belongs to his nature to maintain the uniqueness and integrity of his deity. The mysterium tremendum is revealed in the passionate zeal and drive of his holy being. "God is a devouring fire, a jealous God" (Deut. 4:24). Such a holy God demands exclusive worship (Josh. 24:19; Exod. 20: 3, 5: לא תשתחוה להם ולא תעבדם כי אנכי יהוה אלהיך אל קנא). The dynamistic and daemonic force of his holy jealousy is great, so much so that it seems at times almost identical with holiness itself. His very name is Jealous (Exod. 34:14 J; cf. Deut. 4:24; 6:15; Ezek. 39:25; also Exod. 4:24-26 J). His unpredictable "passionateness," the drive of the divine pathos, is intimately involved with his jealousy, and expresses the vitality and intense urgency of his holy activity. It is in this context that we must read passages which refer to Yahweh's "hate" (Ps. 11:5; Isa. 1:14; Hos. 9:15; Amos 5:21; Mal. 1:3); he cannot tolerate worship, the human response to his manifested holiness, that is in defiance of his essential and innermost nature. This is equally true of references to his vengeance or vindication (cf. Isa. 63:2-3; Ezekiel passim). It is important that verses like these always be understood in their contextual relations, where sometimes we read of Yahweh's "repenting" or relenting (Jer. 18:8; 26:3, 13, 19), which belongs to the same dynamic terminology as jealousy, vengeance, and wrath.

c. Holiness and wrath. Closely connected with the foregoing is Yahweh's manifestation of holy wrath (see WRATH OF GOD). Here again the association with heat and fire is prominent. Anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms are especially frequent in the descriptions of the divine punishment. When Nadab and Abihu offer "unholy fire," fire comes forth from Yahweh to consume them, for "I will show myself holy among those who are near me" (Lev. 10:1-3). Considering the major role that divine judgment plays in the Bible, it is not surprising that the terminology should be rich (חרון אף חמה קצף עבור זעם) and that the NT is quite as emphatic as the OT upon the ὄργη θεοῦ. The Day of Yahweh is a day of wrath (Ezek. 7:5-13; Zeph. 1:14-18). It is clear that in all the passages where Yahweh's wrath is mentioned we have to do with a holy manifestation, even when the word "holy" is not mentioned. Elsewhere the symbolic patterns are clear, as in Ezekiel's prophecy against Gog (chs. 38-39), particularly in 38:18-23, where the imagery of wrath and holiness is portrayed in almost unexampled concentration and vividness.

d. Holiness and fear. The biblical understanding of holiness includes the large and diversified sphere of dread, terror, awe, reverence, and FEAR. This elemental response to the holy is compounded of numerous and varied feelings. The terminology is therefore correspondingly rich and diverse. When Jacob awakens from his sleep, he is afraid and says: "How awesome [נורא] is this place! This is none other than the house of God." The motif of the "terrible" persists throughout the OT. Yahweh is "holy and terrible" (Pss. 89:7; 99:3; 111:9); holy in his terrible works (Exod. 15:11; II Sam. 7:23; Pss. 66:3, 5; 145:6; Isa. 64:3); holy above all in the Exodus (Exod. 15: 11, 15; Deut. 26:8; Ps. 106:22), the events of the covenant (Exod. 19 J and E; cf. 34:12), and the Conquest (Exod. 23:27; Josh. 5:1–11:9). For a proper grasp of this aspect of the divine holiness, it is essential to observe the contexts. The word "terrible" is characteristically associated with "great." Yahweh is a great and terrible God (Deut. 7:21); a great and terrible God who keeps covenant (Neh. 1:5); Israel praises his great and terrible name (Ps. 99:3); Yahweh is great and terrible above all that are around him (Ps. 89:7—H 89:8). Again, Yahweh is terrible in his sanctuary, but the words which follow give the word substance:

> The God of Israel,
> he gives power and strength to his people
> (Ps. 68:35—H 68:36).

It is clear that one moves in a spacious area of holiness here. The nuances of the word are with majesty, sublimity, awe, augustness, and reverence. God's terrible judgment is an assertion of his sovereignty, as often in Ezekiel: "that they may know that I am Yahweh." Before his coming the heavens and earth quake (Exod. 19; Ps. 68:7-8—H 68:8-9).

e. Holiness and "remoteness." The consciousness of the radical cleavage between the human and the divine is rooted in taboo, and is illustrated in the law of the ḥérem (חרם), in which man is forbidden to appropriate what belongs to God, and in the frequent prohibitions against profanation. The holy is unapproachable; man must not "come near" (קרב) to it. Thus Moses must not come near, for the place on which he stands is קדש (Exod. 3:5 J; cf. Josh. 5:15). When Yahweh is about to descend on Sinai, the whole mountain is placed out of bounds; whoever touches it will die (Exod. 19:12-13, 20-24 J). Whoever touches holy things will experience the same fate (Num. 18:3). No man may see God and live (Exod. 33:20 J); whoever gazes at Sinai when Yahweh comes down will perish (Exod. 19:21; cf. Judg. 13:

22). When the men of Bethshemesh violate the sanctity of the ark by looking into it, a great slaughter ensues, and in terror they cry out: "Who is able to stand before Yahweh, this holy God?" (I Sam. 6:20). When the ark falls into the hands of the Philistines, the consequences are appalling (II Sam. 6–7). As Hempel has shown, the piety of Israel is pervaded throughout by this sense of distance from the holy (Abstandsgefühl). God is God and man man (Pss. 8: 5; 9:20; Isa. 31:3; Hos. 11:9*b*).

f. Holiness and cleanness. The contrast between "holy" (קדש) and "profane" (חל) is sometimes paralleled by the contrast between "clean" (טהור) and "unclean" (טמא; Lev. 10:10; Ezek. 22:26; 44:23; see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). The relation between the two contrasts is so intimate as often to suggest identity of meaning. So reference is made to the cleansing and hallowing (or consecrating) of the altar (Lev. 16:19; Ezek. 43:26) or of the temple (II Chr. 29: 15-16) or of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:30). Nevertheless, the two are not synonymous; purity or cleanness is an aspect of holiness, though a major aspect, as is seen in the numerous cultic and ceremonial references, especially in the book of Leviticus (11:32; 13:6, 34, 58; 15:13, 28; cf. Ezek. 24:13; 36: 25). To be sure, there are notable passages in which the words move in the moral or ethical sphere, as in Job. 17:9; Hab. 1:13; in the striking description of the words of Yahweh in Ps. 12:6—H 12:7; and in the fervent petitions of Ps. 51:10—H 51:12: "Create [ברא] in me a clean heart [לב טהור], O God" (cf. I Sam. 20:26).

g. Holiness and majesty. Another complex of terms is related to the quality and character of holiness: "majesty," "splendor," "honor," "beauty," "glory," "spaciousness," etc. While each of these may be represented by a distinctive term in Hebrew, they tend to coalesce in their connotations, as is made clear by an examination of their renderings in the RSV. Yahweh is "majestic in holiness" (Exod. 15:11; בקדש נאדר). As Israel's holy King he is clothed in majesty—rex majestatis (Ps. 93:1; גאות)—in honor and majesty (Ps. 104:1; הוד והדר), with terrible majesty (Job 37:22; נורא הוד). Honor and majesty go before him (I Chr. 16:27; Pss. 96:6; 111:3); therefore Israel's holy choirs exult and hymn his praises (Pss. 104:31-35; 145:5; 148:13), and properly so, for in the sanctuary they contemplate the "beauty of Yahweh" (Ps. 27:4; נעם יהוה). His name is majestic (אדיר) in all the earth (Ps. 8:1); the glory of the Holy One (הודו) is above the heavens and earth (Ps. 148:13; Hab. 3:3). There are overtones of the aesthetic in these ascriptions; their nuances include "graciousness," "goodness," "pleasantness," but also "awe," "reverence," "power," and "honor." Majesty has other dimensions also, as we see in the ominous refrains of Isaiah's poem on the Day of Yahweh, where awfulness, terror, sublimity, and the tremendum are present (Ps. 114; Isa. 2:2, 10, 19, 21 [מהדר גאונו]; cf. Job 37:22).

h. Holiness as unsearchable, incomprehensible, and incomparable. Each of these terms has its own particular linguistic and literary associations, but they are grouped here for the sake of brevity. The deep things of God no man can fathom; the limits and mysteries of his ways are beyond all human wit and ken (Job 11:3-12). His knowledge is too wonderful for the psalmist; it is so high that none can reach up or out to it (Ps. 139:6). God's understanding is unsearchable, for no man can penetrate it with his designs and thoughts (Isa. 40:13-14; I Cor. 2:11). He is incomparable in his holiness. From the beginning Yahweh was Israel's invisible Lord, invisible yet sovereign; his holiness cannot be fashioned or bodied forth in anything man can see. There is none among the gods like him in his holiness (Exod. 15:11; I Sam. 2:2; Ps. 77:13—H 77:14; Isa. 40:18-20, 25-26). Yahweh's uniqueness is the uniqueness of his holiness. Therefore, all comparisons are futile, for to find an adequate image or figure would be somehow to dispose over him. God is in heaven and man on earth (Eccl. 5:2).

i. The holy as "wonderful." The ways of God are not man's ways (Isa. 55:8-9); they are beyond his calculation, grasp, or control, for they are holy (Ps. 77:13; see MIRACLE; SIGNS AND WONDERS). He appears when men least expect him; the element of "surprise" and amazement is therefore a concomitant of the theophanies (Gen. 28:17; Judg. 6:22-23; cf. Ezek. 1:28*b*). Nor must man inquire after his name, because it is "Wonderful" (Judg. 13:18; פלאי). The unconsumed burning bush is an extraordinary sight (Exod. 3:2). Before Yahweh performs wonders in Israel, the people must sanctify themselves to him (Josh. 3:5). Man may search out the "hidden things" of God (Job 13:24; Isa. 45:15; 48:6; Jer. 33:3), but he cannot find them out, for they are "too wonderful" (Job 42:3). Yet Israel never ceases to proclaim his wonderful deeds (Exod. 15:11; Deut. 26:8; Pss. 9:1; 105:2; 106:7; 107:8, 15, 21, 31); she rests upon his promise that he will yet perform marvelous acts, wonderful and marvelous (הפלא ופלא להפליא), and praises "him who alone does great wonders" (Ps. 136:4).

j. The holy as "great" (גדול). The adjective has connotations of extraordinary power; they suggest spaciousness, magnitude, and vastness, as in Ps. 104: 1: "O Yahweh my God, thou art very great!" or Ps. 95:3: "For Yahweh is a great God." The force of such passages is seen in the way they are related to the other key words we have been examining, as in the frequent association of "great" and "terrible" (see § A2*d above*). When the psalmist contemplates the holiness of Yahweh, he exclaims: "What god is great like our God?" (Ps. 77:13). In an awesome passage tense with deep feeling and striking imagery, Ezekiel reports the divine oracle: "So I will show my greatness and my holiness [והתקדשתי והתגדלתי] and make myself known [ונודעתי] in the eyes of many nations" (38:23). This motif of Yahweh's "greatness" is further illustrated by the large number of passages where the adjective "great" precedes the acts of God or the things that belong to him. Thus the Day of Yahweh is a great day (Zeph. 1:14).

k. The holy as exalted. The Holy One of Israel is "high and lifted up" (רם ונשא; Isa. 6:1); he is "exalted" (נשגב), for he dwells "on high" (מרום; Isa. 33:5). He is called Elyon (עליון), "Most High." Although this becomes a title for God (Pss. 7:17; 9:2; 50:14; 57:2—H 57:3; etc.), the original connotations of "exaltation," "supremacy," and "loftiness" are seldom lost (Pss. 47:4; 91:9; Dan. 4:2, 17, 25, 32;

5:18). He is exalted in strength and power (Job 36:22*a*; Ps. 21:13—H 21:14), among the nations and in the whole earth (Ps. 57:5, 11). On the Day of Yahweh he is against all the proud pretensions of civilization and culture, all those things that are proud and haughty and lifted up (Isa. 2:12-15): "Yahweh alone will be exalted in that day" (vss. 11, 17*c*). The locus classicus for the Holy One as exalted is Isa. 57:15:

> Thus says the high and lofty One > who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy:
> "I dwell in the high and holy place, > and also with him who is of a contrite and > humble spirit."

Again, it is to be observed that many of these contexts appear in the liturgies and celebrations of the cult, in the outbursts of adoration.

l. The holiness of the living God. The "life" of Yahweh and his holiness are closely joined. The divine oath: "As I live," and the human counterpart: "As Yahweh lives" (I Kings 17:12), belong to the same language as does holiness. The living God is a holy God; his "life" is holy life (Deut. 32:40; Josh. 3:10; Pss. 42:2; 84:2-4; Jer. 10:10). This is superbly illustrated in Deut. 5:23-26, where the holiness terminology and symbolism are extraordinarily rich. Here the major theme throughout is life and death. To "hear" the words of God and to "see" him should mean certain death, and yet—here is the wonder of Yahweh's holiness—man still lives, lives by his grace. This is the meaning too of the "Fear not" of the theophanies after the divine self-disclosure. A NT writer summarizes the OT awesomeness before the holy: "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. 10:31). Holiness means judgment and death, yet the Holy One consecrates men to his service, equips them with holy powers, in wrath remembers mercy, and calls men to life in his presence. See Deut. 30:15-20; Pss. 36:9; 99; 136; Jer. 1:5; 2:13; 10:6-10; 17:12-13.

m. Summary. The following observations emerge from the foregoing discussion:

a) Holiness cannot be simply equated with perfection or righteousness; this would be to defy the meaning of many passages. The connotations of the word are broader; moreover, some contexts, such as those concerning the ark, have little moral content.

b) The various ascriptions associated with holiness must be read in their total context. Again and again they coalesce, and it is only by discerning their full range that the meaning of holiness can be grasped.

c) Almost throughout, the symbolism of fire is employed, both in the contexts of fire imagery where holiness is not mentioned and in holiness contexts where fire is not mentioned, as well as where they are expressly associated.

d) The foregoing discussion of terminology is by no means exhaustive; other relationships are present also, as, e.g., with "power" and "might." The force of holiness is felt in every sphere of existence. It has been called the source of all other kinds of energy. It is this connection which explains holiness as an agency of judgment, redemption, and grace.

e) There is considerable theological diversity in the biblical understanding of holiness. We have to do with both old and new. The old sometimes belongs to the ideology of holiness among other peoples, as, e.g., in the localization of the holy at particular spots, or in the purificatory practices, or in the presence of sacred harlots in the sanctuaries, קדשות and קדשים; the new belongs to all that is distinctive of Yahweh as he reveals himself in the election-covenant events of the Mosaic age.

3. Holiness historically revealed. Definitions and descriptions are in themselves inadequate ways of portraying the reality of the divine holiness in the OT and the NT. It is rather as holiness is revealed in holy words and holy events that we encounter its power, the effects it produces upon those who experience its presence, and its concrete and diverse manifestations. It is the purpose of the following discussion, therefore, to call attention to the historical revelation of the holy God of Israel in several of the major periods of Israel's faith.

a. In the Yahwist and Elohist sources in Genesis. These do not contain the word "holy," but there are several contexts where its reality is felt, as in Abram's intercession in behalf of Sodom and Gomorrah: "Behold, I have taken upon myself to speak to the Lord, I who am but dust and ashes" (Gen. 18:27 J). Here the patriarch is overcome with a sense of creatureliness before the awesome mystery of Yahweh. Similarly in the vision at Bethel, Jacob feels the dread and darkness of holiness when he awakens. The best example, however, is Yahweh's covenant with Abram in ch. 15. Dread and great darkness fall upon the patriarch after the strange preparation for the sacrifice; "when the sun had gone down and it was dark, behold, a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch passed between these pieces." It is significant that the passage is sometimes thought to be proleptic of Sinai.

b. In J and E. In the early accounts of the revelation to Moses (J and E) holiness assumes a place of central importance. Here we have a personal holy encounter between Moses and Yahweh. Moses may not approach the bush because the land about it is קדש, but the voice which speaks from the bush is Yahweh's. It is a concrete historical experience with a personal holy God. Similarly in the revelation to Israel at the Mount the holy God speaks to the people out of the midst of the fire, engaging them in a particular relationship and calling them to decision. The Decalogue (Exod. 20:1-17) and the later Torah belong to the same context of holiness. The whole of Exod. 19 is a living narrative in which everything is holy, and Yahweh's promise that Israel will be a holy nation (גוי קדוש; vs. 6) is thus given its appropriate setting as are the extensive תורות which follow (20:1–23:33; cf. Exod. 24, another holy engagement also followed by תורות). Exod. 15 is later than the Mosaic age, but it preserves an authentic memory in its remarkable stress upon holiness and its major relationships and activities (vss. 11, 13, 16).

Yahweh's entrance into a holy compact with a people at Sinai is the fons et origo of the life of the holy people (עם קדוש) and the beginning of that movement which continued, albeit in often confused and broken ways, through the holy wars of the Conquest and the proclamation of the prophets, into the NT, where it was remembered, deepened, and granted fresh perspectives. Israel could confess:

"Yahweh our God is holy!" (Ps. 99:9) because Yahweh had made himself known as a holy God, spoken his holy name, required holy statutes, ordained holy times and seasons, and appointed to his service holy men whose mission it was to perform his holy will, fulfil his holy purpose, and live in holy obedience.

c. In the book of Joshua. Joshua repeats many Mosaic motifs, including the episode of the holy ground (5:13-15). In the account of the violation of the hérem (Josh. 7), the people must be "sanctified," and in the covenant at Shechem (Josh. 24) significantly the emphasis upon Yahweh as a holy and jealous God is preserved. While the book of Judges contains the root קדש but once (17:3) and that in a special source, we have vivid accounts of charismatic endowment in connection with the holy war. The Spirit of Yahweh (רוח יהוה) rushes upon or clothes the leaders and fills them with extraordinary powers. Yahweh as the איש מלחמה is in the midst of the camp and wreaks terrible havoc and confusion on the foe. War is a holy undertaking, and the participants are therefore holy. The stories of the ark (I Sam. 3:1–7:2) illustrate the supernatural powers of the sacred palladium and the deadly effects upon those who violate its sanctity. But whatever primitive aspects these stories possess—and they are many—it is well to be reminded that the ark was the throne on which Yahweh was seated invisibly as Israel's king. The tragic vicissitudes in the Philistine cities and Uzzah's fatal misadventure (II Sam. 6:6-9) reveal the terrible and impersonal force of the taboo; there is little here to suggest the influence of Mosaic and covenantal faith. Yet the account must also be read in its larger framework.

d. In the Prophets. The prophets of Israel were heirs of a holy tradition reaching back to the time of Moses, in which Yahweh's holy will and purpose were determinative for the existence and destiny of the holy people. The cultic songs and liturgies praised and exalted his holy activity (e.g., Exod. 15), and the cultic laws were Israel's response to the demands of the covenant relation (Exod. 19:5-6; 20:23–23:33). Both exercised a strong influence upon the prophets, upon their theology as well as upon the literary forms in which it found expression. The affirmation "Yahweh our God is holy" now becomes articulate in the identification of the nature of Yahweh with the holy. That Yahweh swears by his holiness (קדשו; Amos 4:2) is tantamount to his swearing by himself (נפשו; Amos 6:8).

Hosea accentuates the ancient motif of the holy presence "in your midst" (11:9; cf. Exod. 34:9; Num. 5:3; 14:14; Josh. 24:5) and gives to it a depth of meaning transcending the legal-institutional interpretations of the covenant bond. The personal inwardness of the holy relation, as well as the defiance of conventional structures, give him a place in Israel's holiness theology surpassed by no other. While full justice is given to the destructive and punitive activities of holiness, it now finds deeper expression in the conquering holy love rooted in the covenantal bond of grace:

> I am God and not man,
> the Holy One in your midst,
> and I will not come to destroy.

With Isaiah of Jerusalem the absoluteness of the divine holiness is carried to unprecedented heights: Yahweh is the "Holy One of Israel" (1:4; 5:19, 24; 10:20; 12:6; 17:7; 29:19, 23; 30:11-12, 15). He is King absolutely and Holy One absolutely, but holiness is primary. He is the sovereign Holy One. But what gives substance to Isaiah's theology of holiness is the way in which the traditional motifs associated with holiness (see § A2 above) receive fresh and powerful reformulation (cf., e.g., the fire symbolism in 10:16-17; 30:27-28; 31:9). It is clear that the cult has exercised a profound influence upon the prophet, just as he, in turn, was destined to influence both his prophetic successors, Habakkuk (1:12-13; 3:3—H 3:2), Ezekiel (5:11; 28:22, 25; 36:22-23), and Second Isaiah, and the priestly teachers and legislators (the Holiness Code and the P legislation).

Second Isaiah was just as radical in his reformulation of the contexts and dynamic qualities of the holy as was Isaiah. For here Yahweh is not only the Holy One absolutely (Isa. 40:25; 41:14-16; 43:3; 45:11; 47:4; 48:17; 49:7; 55:5), but more especially the Holy One in relation to his redemptive activity (41:14; 43:3, 14; 47:4; 48:17; 49:7; 54:5). Yet the Prophet of the Exile is not projecting anything new, for the holiness of Yahweh's redemption from slavery belonged to the traditions which he above all others appropriated, albeit in eschatological dimensions.

It is clear from the foregoing discussion that the prophets of Israel have oriented holiness to the major stream of biblical faith, which had its beginnings in the religion of Moses. Yet holiness has also been deepened and transformed by a more exclusive emphasis upon the personal: the holiness of God is personal holiness and is active in the whole realm of history as well as in the lives of his servants the prophets. It is against this background that we are to understand the "ethical" character of holiness. To understand Isaiah's conception of Yahweh's holiness, it is not sufficient to cite references; we must view them in their historical contexts. When in his vision the prophet hears the trisagion of the seraphim, he sees himself as he is before Yahweh's majestic and penetrating holiness. He is stricken (אוי לי "woe is me"), utterly undone or "destroyed" (נדמיתי), a man of unclean lips (כי איש טמא שפתים אנכי), dwelling among a people that is unclean. Only the atonement through holy fire from the altar can avail him. He has seen the King:

> Yahweh of hosts is exalted in justice
> [ויגבע במשפט],
> and the Holy God shows himself holy in righteousness
> [האל הקדוש נקדש בצדקה] (Isa. 5:16).

The distance between the holy and the profane appears in the contrast between man's sin and God's utter perfection. Yet holiness is not simply identified with moral categories; the transcendence, "otherness," and exalted majesty of Yahweh still remain after the moral categories are exhausted (cf. Isa. 31:1).

Again, the holiness of God is now understood more clearly as active, less as a condition or state of being or even supernatural energy and more as an expression of his will and purpose. It manifests itself in judgment and destruction, notably in Isaiah (1:4-9;

5:13-16; 30:8-14), especially on the Day of Yahweh (2:6-22), and in Ezekiel (28:22; 36:20-32; 38:17-23), but in the other prophets too (Amos 4:2-3; 6:8; cf. chs. 1–2; Mic. 1:2-4; cf., however, Hos. 11:9). It is active in mercy and grace, in redemption and salvation (Isa. 10:20-23; 12:6; 17:7-9; 29:19-21; see also Second Isaiah above).

Notable, too, is the divine self-manifestation. This is expressed in a variety of syntactical forms (e.g., pi'el, hithpa'el, but especially the niph'al) and the theologoumena of revelation: "glory" (כבוד), "honor" (הוד), "majesty" (חדר), and "name" (שם)—all, of course, in the immediate contexts of "holiness" (קדש). In the sight of all the nations God manifests his holiness (Ezek. 20:31; 28:25; 36:23; 38:23), for his holy name must not be profaned among them; therefore he acts for his name's sake only (למען שמי; Ezek. 20:44; 36:22-23; 39:25) that it may be vindicated (36:23: וקדשתי את שמי הגדולה) and no longer profaned. Ezekiel's awareness of the divine holiness is more awesome, more sublime and majestic, more cosmic and "tremendous," than that of his prophetic predecessors, precisely because he, more than any other, knows the horror of profanation. For him sin is, above all, a profaning of what is holy and of him who is holy. God shows his holiness, too, in his act of calling the prophets to his service, as we recognize particularly in Jeremiah (1:5; 23:9), the most subjective of the prophets, who therefore suffered most from the compulsions and restraints of his holy calling. From all this it can be seen that holiness is not confined solely to the sphere of the cult, but extends itself to the peoples of the world and to world history.

Holiness and GLORY (כבוד) are closely related. The latter is employed for the external manifestation of Yahweh. It is probable that both have their original phenomenological associations with fire, holiness stressing its heat and power and danger, and glory its light, radiance, glow, etc. Naturally they tend to coalesce at times, but together they form a vast and impressive, indeed central, theology of revelation.

e. The priestly development. In considering the place of holiness in priestly life and practice, it is essential to recognize that the relatively late sources, the Holiness and Priestly codes, often reflect attitudes and activities which are not only very early but also contemporary with the preaching ministries of the prophets. Again, it is important to keep in mind that a substantial portion of the OT belongs to the priestly stratum of Israel's faith. The modern tendency to exalt prophetic religion has often had the effect of obscuring a major and important part of Israel's religious life and actual religious practice. Thus the faith of Israel is viewed in a distorted perspective. Finally, it is precarious to draw a sharp line between prophet and priest. The two had much more in common than we are accustomed to think. Not only were they mutually indebted to each other, but both belonged to the same cult and both were therefore dedicated to the common life and work of holiness. Nevertheless, within this common world of faith there are movements and directions of which we must take account, more particularly in the exilic and postexilic period (after 587 B.C.).

a) The true Israelite must know what is holy and what is not, in order that he may worship his God properly and that he may protect himself from harm and defilement (Lev. 10; 16; 22:17-33). As the emphasis upon the cult grew, the distinctions between the holy and the profane, the clean and the unclean, were not only more sharply drawn than heretofore, but were subjected to elaborate casuistic development. Moreover, the conceptions of the holy tended to be increasingly limited to the realm of the cult and its objects: holy garments (Exod. 28:2, 4; 29:21; 31:10), holy offerings (Exod. 28:36; Lev. 19:8), holy priestly crown (Exod. 29:6; 39:30), holy flesh (Exod. 29:37), anointing oil (Exod. 30:31-37; Num. 35:25; Ps. 89:20); the tabernacle and its furnishings (Exod. 40:9), holy fruit (Lev. 19:24) and food (Lev. 22:14; Ezra 2:63). Laws of purification to ensure cultic purity became increasingly important (Lev. 21; Mal. 1:10-14). Holy times were also rigorously observed, holy days and holy seasons—the sabbath above all, for it was viewed as the very purpose of God's creation of the heavens and earth. The Priestly historian brings his account of creation to a culmination in its sanctification: "God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it [ויקדש]." Thus creation is drawn into the sphere of holiness, and the name of God is hallowed in the creation of men. The true order then becomes sanctification, creation, worship; thus God's holy purpose is realized.

b) Yet all this must not be construed to imply the exclusion of the ethical stress of the prophets. On the contrary, as we have seen, men like Isaiah and Ezekiel left their impress upon the theology and rituals of the cult. This is illustrated both in the songs, hymns, and prayers of the temple worship and in the legal formulations of the Holiness and Priestly codes. Such "Torah liturgies" as Pss. 15; 24:3-5; Isa. 33:14*b*-16; 56:1-8 describe the kind of Israelite who may enter into Yahweh's presence. Only he who is of pure heart (בר לבב) and real integrity (תמים) may "look on Yahweh's face." Lev. 19 is a superb example of the meaning of holiness in the life of the faithful son of the covenant. Here, as elsewhere in the Holiness Code, the solemn words "I am Yahweh your God" are repeated again and again, but it is the topic sentence which gives point and substance to this mighty self-asseveration: "You shall be holy; for I am holy, Yahweh your God" (vs. 2). These words are now applied to every facet of Israel's existence, but wherever men are involved with each other holiness means love—love to neighbor, to the resident alien, the blind, the deaf, and the slave. Significantly, the chapter comes to its climax by pointing out that this God to whom Israel owes its devotion is the one who revealed himself in the great act of redemption from slavery. See WORSHIP IN THE OT.

c) Holiness as the personal nature of Yahweh finds living expression in the worship and theology of the Name (השם). Where Yahweh causes his name to be remembered (זכיר), there worship takes place, for it is there that the sanctuary arises, the name is spoken, addressed, and called upon. Not a spatial image but a spoken word is central. This emphasis is particularly strong in Deuteronomy, but Ezekiel makes much of it in Yahweh's sanctification of his name and his acting "for his name's sake." Similarly, the Holiness and Priestly codes employ the term frequently, and it appears also in the hymnic literature (I Chr. 16: 10, 35; Pss. 33:21; 103:1), always as an expression of intensely personal relation to the personal Holy One.

B. IN THE NT. 1. Etymology and usage. Of the various terms employed by the ancient Greeks to express the idea of holiness—ἱερος, ὅσιος, σέμνος, ἅγιος, ἅγνος—the word ἅγιος is least frequent. On the other hand, in biblical usage it is precisely ἅγιος which receives the pre-eminence over all others. The other terms are also present, to be sure: e.g., ἱερος (II Tim. 3:15); ὅσιος (Acts 2:27; 13:34, quoted from Isa. 55:3; Heb. 7:26); σέμνος (I Tim. 3:8; Tit. 2:2); ἅγνος (II Cor. 6:6; 7:11; I Tim. 5:22); but it is ἅγιος and its derivatives which occur most frequently and in a great variety of syntactical and semantic associations. The reason is not far to seek. The Septuagintal translators sought to do justice to the OT usage of קדש and its cognates, to the historico-ethical meanings which were attached to it, and to the personal nature of the holy as was expressed, e.g., in its connection with compassion, love, and mercy. They employed the word ἅγιος, but gave to it a latitude and depth for which the Greeks possessed nothing remotely similar. For our understanding of the word, then, we are indebted to its Semitic background as it is found in the canonical writings of the Old Covenant.

In the Hellenistic period ἅγιος is employed as an epithet for the gods, especially the Egyptian and Syrian, like Isis, Serapis, and Baal; thence it is applied to the Greek divinities, above all in the mystery religions. Oriental influence is perceptible in this later usage, so that ἅγιος is close to the Hebrew קדש. In the apocryphal literature the canonical usage is perpetuated. Allusion is made to the holiness of Jerusalem (Tob. 13:9; I Macc. 2:7), of the temple (I Esd. 1:53; II Macc. 5:15), of the altar (Ecclus. 45:10), of the sabbath (Tob. 2:1; II Macc. 5:25), of the covenant (I Macc. 1:15, 63), also of the heavens (Wisd. Sol. 9:10), of the angels (Tob. 11:14; 12:15), of the Spirit (Wisd. Sol. 1:5; Ecclus. 48:12) and particularly of God (Tob. 12:12, 15; Ecclus. 23:9; II Macc. 14: 36). The authors or translators of these works render קדש in essentially the same manner. In rabbinical literature too the linguistic practice is by and large that of the OT. Among the most frequent appellations for the Deity is "the Holy One" (הקדוש). Since the holy name was too sacred to be pronounced, such titles became more and more common and impressive; indeed, "the Name" (השם) itself becomes a surrogate for "Yahweh." Allusions are made to the Holy Spirit also (רוח הקדש) in the texts of the third century. The Scriptures are regarded as holy, the Torah above all, and those who obey it are sometimes called holy.

2. The NT understanding of holiness. The OT, then, forms the firm basis upon which the NT understanding of holiness is built. There is variety, of course, as within the OT, and this is of two kinds: (a) difference in nuance according to the nature of the particular context and (b) a radical reorientation because of the faith that the Messiah had come in Jesus and that through him God had brought into existence a new age and a new creation. We encounter many of the same associations of ἅγιος with other terms, as in the OT: e.g., "fire" (Luke 3:16; Acts 2:3; I Cor. 3:13; Heb. 12:29; Rev. 4:5-6), "wrath" (Rom. 1:18; 2:5-10; 5:9; I Thess. 1:10; Heb. 4:3), "cleanness" and "purity" (Luke 11:37-41; Acts 21:28; II Cor. 7:1; Eph. 5:26; Heb. 9:13-14), "majesty" (Heb. 8:1-2; II Pet. 1:16-18), "exaltation" (Phil. 2:9; Heb. 7:26). The author of the Letter to the Hebrews, in describing Christ as the heavenly high priest, brings some of these ascriptions together (7:26): "holy" (ὅσιος), "blameless" (ἄκακος), "unstained" (ἀμίαντας), "separated from sinners" (κεχωρισμένος ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν), "exalted above the heavens" (ὑψηλότερος τῶν οὐρανῶν; cf. Col. 3:12-13). The prevailingly cultic usage of the terminology of holiness in the OT is found in the NT too, often in places where we do not suspect its presence. But what distinguishes the NT preoccupation with holiness from the OT more than aught else is its predication of holiness to the Spirit of God (see HOLY SPIRIT). The OT employs the expression "holy Spirit" only three times (Ps. 51:11—H 51:13; Isa. 63:10-11), whereas the NT has it more often than all other occurrences of the word "holy," about ninety times. Sanctification plays a correspondingly great role.

a. The holiness of God. The NT reaffirms the OT confession: "The Lord our God is holy," but it is surprising that it does so relatively seldom. It is obviously one of those major expressions of faith which were assumed. In the LORD'S PRAYER the first petition, "Hallowed be thy name" (Ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὀνομά σου; Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2), corresponds to contemporary Jewish usage, not only in its phraseology but also in its association with prayer for the coming of the kingdom. The subject here is God, not man. His name is his person, as in the OT (see § A3*d above;* also Ezek. 20:41; 38:16). The petition, like the whole prayer, is eschatologically oriented. What is more, the hallowing of the Name, with its opposite, the profanation of the Name, was "the most characteristic feature of Jewish ethics both as principle and as motive" (G. F. Moore [see bibliography]), yet the roots of this understanding lie deeply embedded in the OT. The apocalyptic seer places the trisagion of Isa. 6:3 in a sublime setting by combining it with Ezekiel's vision (Rev. 4:6*b*-10); the four living creatures round the throne sing ceaselessly:

> Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty > [ὁ παντοκράτωρ],
> who was and is and is to come!

and they "give glory [δόξα] and honor [τιμὴ] and thanks [εὐχαριστία] to him who is seated on the throne." Again, in another canticle of praise, the "song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb," a whole series of awesome ascriptions belonging to holiness terminology ("great," "wonderful," "almighty," "just," "true," "King of the ages," "fear," etc.) culminates: "For thou only art holy" (cf. Ps. 99 and especially Rev. 16:4-7). It is notable that in both the OT and the NT the theme of holiness is expressed in the ultimate lyricism of adoration. In I Peter, too, the holiness of God is affirmed, now in the impressive setting of the vocation of the people of God: "As he who called you is holy, be holy yourselves in all your conduct" (1:15; cf. Exod. 19:3*b*-8), and the admonition is enforced by the central words of the Holiness Code, Israel's election to holiness: "You shall be holy, for I am holy" (I Pet. 1:16). Significantly, the following verse speaks of God as Father and of his redemptive work through the precious blood of Christ. Finally, in the high-priestly prayer of John 17, in words of great intensity and solemnity, Jesus addresses God as Holy Father (πατὲρ ἅγιε). Here the tensions between the divine distance and nearness are resolved (cf. Isa. 57:15) and are reminiscent of the Lord's Prayer: "Father, may thy name be sanctified." It is in praise, holy calling, and prayer, then, that the holiness of God is celebrated by the early Christians as it was also in the exultation, vocation, and worship of the children of the old covenant.

b. The holiness of Jesus Christ. The ascription of holiness to Jesus appears only infrequently in the NT (Mark 1:24; Luke 1:35; 4:34; John 6:69; Acts 3:14; 4:27, 30; I John 2:20; Rev. 3:7). One reason for this may be the large place assumed by the activity of the Holy Spirit in the thought and worship of the early Christians; perhaps, too, other titles and appellations drawn from traditional messianic phraseology were felt to be more immediately apposite. At the same time, when Jesus is called "the Holy One" (cf. הקדוש), it is generally a messianic ascription. Thus he who came at the end of the age to destroy the world of demons is confessed by the demons to be "the Holy One of God" (ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ; Mark 1:24; Luke 4:34).

In Luke the holiness of Jesus is already related to his birth in words filled with awe and wonder. The angel addresses Mary:

> The Holy Spirit will come upon you, > and the power of the Most High will overshadow you;
> therefore the child to be born will be called holy,
> the Son of God (1:35; cf. Matt. 1:20).

In the Benedictus (Luke 1:68-79) and elsewhere the echoes of the holy-war terminology, now applied to Christ's mighty works of deliverance, are plainly heard.

The Fourth Gospel transforms the Petrine confession into a solemn declaration of faith: "We have believed [πεπιστεύκαμεν], and have come to know [ἐγνώκαμεν], that you are the Holy One of God [ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ]" (6:69).

In I John the reference is probably to Christ when the writer addresses his followers: "You have been anointed by the Holy One" (2:20).

Again in the high-priestly prayer we encounter the motif which is present mutatis mutandis in the OT, notably in Ezekiel in the divine self-sanctifying: "For their sake I consecrate myself [ἁγιάζω ἐμαυτόν], that they also may be consecrated [ἡγιασμένοι] in truth" (John 17:19).

The introduction to the letter to the church of Philadelphia (Rev. 3:7), as so often in Revelation, adds fresh nuances to the title: "The words of the holy one, the true one, who has the key of David."

The book of Acts follows its own course by identifying the Holy One with the Servant of the Lord of Second Isaiah. Thus Jesus is called God's servant (τὸν παῖδα αὐτοῦ), the Holy and Righteous One (ἅγιον καὶ δίκαιον) whom he has glorified (3:14; see Isa. 44:23; 49:3; 53:11; 55:5). Peter and John and their friends rejoice in the signs and wonders performed "through the name of thy holy servant Jesus" (τοῦ ἁγίου παιδός σου Ἰησοῦ; Acts 4:30). Whatever the original identification of the Servant may have been, here there is no question that it is understood messianically, that it is the Messiah who is holy, and that Jesus has fulfilled the "messianic" expectations.

The writer of the Letter to the Hebrews, while not ascribing the title of the Holy One to Christ, nevertheless has much to say of his sanctifying office (see SANCTIFICATION). Both as high priest (cf. Ps. 106:16: קדוש יהוה) and as sacrificial offering, Christ is the mediator of a new covenant, purifies the conscience from dead works (Heb. 9:13-15), abolishes the old sacrifices, so that "we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. 10:1, 10, 14; 13:12-13). It is clear that the mind of the writer has been thoroughly imbued with OT covenantal, sacerdotal, and sacrificial thought and that it serves him well for the elaboration of his theology of the mediatorial work of Christ (cf. Exod. 19:6; Leviticus; Jer. 31:31-34).

c. The holiness of the church. The NT church is successor to the worshiping community of the old covenant and sees its beginnings in its memories and expectations (see CHURCH, IDEA OF; CHURCH, LIFE AND ORGANIZATION OF; CHURCH, WORSHIP OF). In its appropriation of the sacred writings of Israel with their anticipation of the new age, the new covenant, the new creation, the new birth in water and in Spirit, the new heart, it possessed the categories and symbols out of which the new age was to be interpreted. The ancient accounts of the establishment of sanctuaries through the holy presence and the hieros logos; the remembering, celebrating, teaching, sacrificing, and confessing activities of the ongoing life of the cult; the sacred objects like the ark or the altar or the temple furnishings; the temple itself, with its elaborate paraphernalia and imagery; the cultic personnel; the life and worship of the synagogue; the liturgical development in hymns and prayers—to all these the church was heir. Where it did not appropriate the old forms and images, it was destined to enter into dialogue and encounter with the categories in the light of the emergence of the decisively new in the revelation and redemption of Jesus the Christ. Thus the idea of the holy people (עם קדוש) perpetuated itself in the early Christian worshiping community (Exod. 19:6; Heb. 9:15-22; 12:18-24; I Pet. 1:14-16; 2:9-10; see also Rom. 11:13-16; Eph. 2:12). Once the Gentiles were "separated" from the commonwealth of Israel (τῆς πολιτείας τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ), strangers to the covenants of promise, "without God in the world," but now they are "brought near" in the blood of Christ, who has reconciled them to God in one body through the Cross, so that they are no longer strangers but members of the household of God, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus being the chief cornerstone in whom the whole structure is joined together; and they have become a "holy temple in the Lord" (Eph. 2:11-22). They are called to a new life, called to be saints (κλητοῖς ἁγίοις; Rom. 1:7; I Cor. 1:2), yet they are Abraham's children if they "do what is right"

(I Pet. 3:15; see SAINT). The distinctively moral connotations of ἅγιος are by no means clear in Paul; the moral transformation wrought in the life of the Christian on which he lays great stress is not called holiness. But the writer of Ephesians is at great pains to describe the life of the ἅγιοι (5:2-20), as is the writer of Colossians (3:5-17), who, in addressing "God's chosen ones, holy and beloved," describes the nature of the new life in Christ and brings his admonitions to a great finale: "Whatever you do, in word or deed, do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him." If the vocabulary of holiness is not attributed to God and Christ as often as we should expect, it nevertheless permeates the whole NT as it does the OT, by the activity of the Holy Spirit, by the life and conduct of "the saints," by its intimate association with other central words like "elect," "beloved," "faithful," and by the allusions to "holy prophets" (Acts 3:21), "holy apostles" (Eph. 3:5), "holy calling" (II Tim. 1:9), "holy scriptures" (Rom. 1:2), "holy covenant" (Luke 1:72), "holy law" (Rom. 7:12; II Pet. 2:21), and by its constant dependence upon the OT scriptures.

Bibliography. W. W. Graf von Baudissin, Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. II (1878); H. Cremer and J. Kögel, Biblisch-theologisch Wörterbuch (11 Auflage, 1923), pp. 34-62. G. F. Moore, Judaism (2 vols.; 1927), II, 100-111. J. Begrich, "Heilig," Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Zweite Auflage, 1928), cols. 1714-21. R. Asting, Die Heiligkeit im Urchristentum (1930). J. Hänel, Die Religion der Heiligkeit (1931). J. Hempel, Gott und Mensch im AT (1936). R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy (trans. J. W. Harvey; 10th ed., 1946). J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture (2 vols.; 1926, 1947). O. Procksch, Theologie des alten Testaments (1950). W. Eichrodt, Theologie des alten Testaments, Teil I: "Gott und Volk" (5. neubearbeitete Auflage, 1957), pp. 176-85 and passim.

J. MUILENBURG

HOLINESS CODE. See PENTATEUCH.

HOLM TREE [תרזה, tirzâ(?); πρῖνον] (Isa. 44:14; KJV CYPRESS). A tree used both for firewood and for idol manufacture. Some botanists identify tirzâ with the holm oak, Quercus ilex L., a small, holly-like evergreen oak. Sus. 58 is a clear reference to this oak, where it is a tree in the garden of Joakim in Babylon.

The translation "holm tree" in Isa. 44:14 is confusing, since the true holm is a holly, Ilex aquifolium. The holm oak hardly suits the context. The root רזה, meaning "to be lean," might support the identification with the slender cypress, Cupressus sempervirens var. pyramidalis, so common in Bible lands. The context implies either a conifer or an oak.

See also CYPRESS; FIR; PLANE TREE.

J. C. TREVER

HOLOFERNES hŏl'ə fûr'nēz ['Ολοφέρνης; cf. 'ολοφρονέω, be crafty, deceitful]. The Assyrian general, commissioned by King Nebuchadnezzar to subdue the "whole west country" (Jth. 2:6), who met ultimate defeat at the hands of a woman.

Leading a well-equipped army of 120,000 foot soldiers and 12,000 cavalry, Holofernes established a reign of terror in Mediterranean lands, seeking everywhere to destroy all worship except that of Nebuchadnezzar. Threatening to invade Judea, he was warned by Achior the Ammonite that the people who dwelt there were under the protection of a god who was invincible. The swash-buckling General Holofernes brushed aside the advice of Achior and laid siege to Judea. In desperation, the Hebrews urged their leaders to surrender. The widowed Judith, obtaining permission to pass through the lines, beguiled the mighty warrior with her charms. When he was drunk, she cut off his head and won deliverance for her people.

He who had been second only in power to Nebuchadnezzar was disarmed by a woman's beauty. This has been a favorite theme of artists (using him as an example of defeated pride, Dante [Purgatorio XII.59] places him in the Circle of the Proud).

Under Artaxerxes III a general named Holofernes invaded Asia Minor (Diodorus Siculus History 31.19. 2-3).

J. C. SWAIM

HOLON hō'lŏn [חלון, חלון, sandy(?)]. 1. A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Debir (Josh. 15:51); designated a Kohathite Levitical city (Josh. 21:15; cf. I Chr. 6:58; HILEN). The usual identification with Khirbet 'Alin, near Jala, NW of Hebron, would place it more properly in the province of Beth-zur (Josh. 15:58-59) rather than that of Debir.

V. R. GOLD

2. A town in the tableland of Moab, mentioned with Jahzah, Mephaath, and others (Jer. 48:21). Its site is unknown.

HOLY ARRAY. See ARRAY, HOLY.

HOLY GHOST. See HOLY SPIRIT.

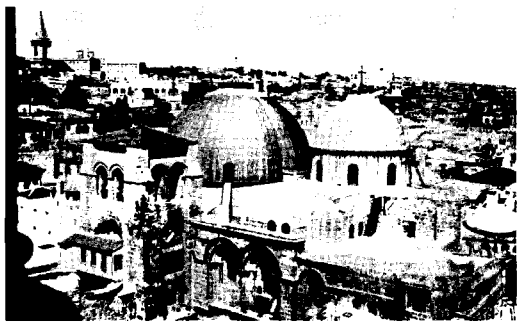
HOLY OF HOLIES ["Αγια 'Αγίων] (Heb. 9:3); KJV HOLIEST OF ALL. The inmost sanctuary of the temple. See MOST HOLY PLACE; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

HOLY ONE, THE [קדוש; ὁ ἅγιος]; THE HOLY ONE OF ISRAEL [קדוש ישראל]. In the OT, the title of Yahweh, Israel's God, especially in the prophecy of Isaiah (1:4; 5:19, 24; 10:17, 20) and of Second Isaiah (40:25; 41:14, 16, 20; 43:3, 14-15). In the NT the title is applied to the Messiah (Mark 1:24; Acts 3:14; cf. I John 2:20).

See GOD, OT VIEW OF, § 4*a*.

B. W. ANDERSON



HOLY PLACE [קדש, מקום קדש]. The TABERNACLE or tent of meeting; the courts, inner room, and outer room of the tabernacle; the TEMPLE and its precincts (cf. Exod. 26:33; 28:29; 29:31; 38:24; 40:9; Lev. 6:9, 19-20; 10:4, 17-18; etc.).

HOLY SEPULCHRE [קבר; τάφος or μνῆμα or μνημεῖον; Vulg. sepulcrum]. The Jerusalem cave where Jesus of Nazareth was entombed.

In the OT and NT there are numerous references to TOMBS, and in the NT there are three different Greek words for this term. The "holy sepulchre" refers to all those instances in the NT where the reference is to the tomb of Jesus, although it is nowhere described as "holy." Mark and Luke imply, and Matt. 27:60 specifies, that the tomb belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, and they state he had hewn it out himself. They say nothing about its location.

Mark does not state—though the three other gospels add it—that no burial had previously been made in this tomb. The account of John is quite different from the others, as it casually notes that there was a garden there with a new tomb in it, and because the Preparation Day was about to begin, they laid Jesus therein (implying that this was a tentative measure).

There is no record from the first three Christian centuries that any place had been marked as the holy sepulchre. Eusebius recounts that the Emperor Constantine directed Bishop Macarius to ascertain this site, and that divine guidance led him to locate the tomb despite the fact that it was buried and needed to be excavated. Constantine then erected over this tomb the Church of the Anastasis, a circular domed structure which replaced Hadrian's Temple of Aphrodite, which was at the same time demolished. This new church stood at the W end of a large court,

Courtesy of the Philosophical Library

29. Bell tower and dome of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre

Courtesy of the Philosophical Library

30. Court and façade of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre within which also he built the Church of Golgotha. Constantine's development of these holy sites was first attested by the Bordeaux Pilgrim and Eusebius, who were his contemporaries. The site thus chosen for the holy sepulchre is the one now marked by the Aedicule within the domed rotunda of the later and larger Church of the Holy Sepulchre, inside the present walls. Figs. HOL 29-30.

There is one other site which has been accepted by many as the holy sepulchre, generally known as the "garden tomb." It is a short distance N of the Damascus Gate, on the W side of "Gordon's Calvary" (see GOLGOTHA). It came to attention ca. 1867 and more recently has been cultivated into an attractive and quiet spot. Actually, this rock-cut tomb is one of many in the area, so that even the argument of the proximity to Golgotha lends no support for validity. The "garden tomb" and "Gordon's Calvary" may stand or fall together as authentic sites.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways (1935), pp. 346-81; C. W. Crowfoot, Early Churches in Palestine (1941), pp. 9-21; C. C. McCown, The Ladder of Progress in Palestine (1943), pp. 244-53; L. Farmer, We Saw the Holy City (rev. ed., 1953), pp. 146-63.

K. W. CLARK

HOLY SPIRIT [רוח קדש; πνεῦμα ἅγιον]. The mysterious power of God, conceived in the first place as the mode of God's activity, manifested especially in supernatural revelation to selected individuals and in their being possessed by a force which gave them marvelous strength, courage, wisdom, and the knowledge of God's will and his dealings with men; later identified with the personal presence of God, and regarded as the distinctive endowment of his people; and in the NT understood as the mode of God's operation in the church, made possible through the work of Christ and mediating the glorified Christ to his people and the church to its exalted Head.

1. OT conceptions of the Spirit
   a. As possessing Israel's heroes
   b. As inspiring rulers
   c. As transferred from ruler to ruler
   d. As inspiring the prophets
   e. As effecting sanctification and judgment
   f. As the presence of God with Israel
   g. In eschatological expectation
   h. In creation
   i. In relation to the being of God
2. Intertestamental developments
3. NT teachings
   a. The Spirit and John's mission
   b. In Christ's baptism
   c. In Mark and Matthew
   d. In the Third Gospel
   e. In Acts
   f. In Pauline theology
   g. In the Pastoral letters, Hebrews, I and II Peter, and Jude
   h. In Johannine theology

Bibliography

1. OT conceptions of the Spirit. a. As possessing Israel's heroes. The Spirit of the Lord is regarded as the source of the endowment of Israel's heroes with extraordinary physical strength (Judg. 14:6, 19; 15:14). It is a supernatural and unpredictable power, which takes possession of a man, and controls his actions like a tremendous inner force. In such contexts "spirit" retains something of its original meaning of "wind." As the wind seizes upon the dust of the ground and animates it, blowing it where it will, like a live object, so the divine Spirit animates the human personality. Occasionally the Spirit, conceived in this fashion as a quasi-physical force, lays hold of a man physically, so as to raise him up and set him on his feet (Ezek. 2:2; 3:12, 24) and even, apparently, to transport him from one place to another (11:24; cf. the action of the "angel of the Lord" in Bel 36). The action of the Spirit in taking possession of a person can be dramatically described as "clothing itself" with the human being, putting him on like an outward garment, so completely does the Spirit become the dynamic inner power which energizes the possessed person (Judg. 6:34; cf. ERV mg.).

b. As inspiring rulers. The Spirit, however, is principally thought of as the source of mental and spiritual perception and abilities, for it is the divine activity which inspires certain specially favored individuals and so heightens their natural powers by its supernatural energy as to bestow upon them all those qualities which they need in order to fulfil their calling successfully. It is by the action of the Spirit that kings and rulers receive the gifts necessary for leadership. The judges, in particular, are represented as Spirit-possessed men, gifted with qualities that enable them to govern Israel and save her from her oppressors; thus it is said of Othniel that "the Spirit of the LORD came upon him, and he judged Israel," and it was under the influence of the Spirit of the Lord that Gideon roused the tribes to repel the hostile Midianites and Jephthah advanced against the Ammonitish invaders (Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29). Saul was similarly empowered to lead Israel to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (I Sam. 11:6). Of more significance in the history of the OT belief in the working of the Spirit is the Spirit-possession of David after Samuel had anointed him (I Sam. 16:13). As the divinely chosen king of Israel, David was a Spirit-filled ruler, and it is significant that it was after his choice and anointing that the Spirit of the Lord is said to have departed from Saul.

Hence the expectations associated with the house of David point to the hope of a ruler pre-eminently endowed with the Spirit of God. The ideal figure of an inspired king, as it is portrayed by Isaiah (11:2), has the distinctive characteristic of Spirit-possession, through which he receives the sevenfold abundance of those gifts that are the special qualities of a wise and just ruler. This inward unction with the Spirit is evidently thought of as having an outward counterpart in the external rite of anointing (cf. Ps. 89:20-21). This link between the ideas of anointing and of Spirit-possession reappears in connection with the SERVANT OF THE LORD (Isa. 42:1) and the divinely sent prophet of Isa. 61:1, and in this respect associates these figures with that of the Israelite monarch. The primitive church's conception of the messiahship of Jesus owes much to the two last-named passages, no doubt because he had himself interpreted his mission in terms of the Servant and the prophet of Isa. 61 (if these can properly be separated).

In the OT, however, the conception of a messianic bearer of the Spirit plays little part. It appears more explicitly in the postcanonical literature, as, e.g., in an echo of Isaiah's prophecy: "The Lord of Spirits seated him on the throne of his glory, and the Spirit of righteousness was poured out upon him" (Enoch 62:2; cf. 49:3). The idea that the future Messiah (see MESSIAH [JEWISH]) would be the bearer of the Spirit became fused with the expectation of a universal outpouring of the Spirit at the end of the present age. The general blessings of the future are associated particularly with the resting of the Spirit upon the Messiah (Pss. Sol. 17:42), and the Testament of Levi, if it is to be reckoned as a pre-Christian document, affords evidence for the hope that as a consequence of the saving activity of the "high priest" the Spirit of the Lord will come upon his people (18).

The NT sees the fulfilment of the hope of a Spirit-possessed Messiah in the coming of the Spirit upon Jesus at his baptism (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:21; John 1:33), when "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power" (Acts 10:38). See CHRIST.

c. As transferred from ruler to ruler. The Spirit, as the proper endowment of the ruler of God's people, is sometimes thought of as being transferred from one Spirit-possessed individual to another when the latter is commissioned as his predecessor's representative or alter ego. Thus "Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom, for Moses had laid his hands upon him; so the people of Israel obeyed him" (Deut. 34:9; but cf. Num. 27:18-23, where Joshua is described as being already "a man in whom is the spirit" before his commissioning).

d. As inspiring the prophets. The primary manifestation of the activity of the Spirit in the OT is prophecy (see PROPHET). The dreams of Joseph were recognized by Pharaoh as inspired divination: Joseph was a man "in whom is the Spirit of God" (Gen. 41:38). Through David, as one who delivers inspired oracles, "the Spirit of the LORD speaks" (II Sam. 23:2); the false prophet Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah claims that the Spirit of the Lord is within him, so that if his adversary Micaiah is really a prophet, this must imply that the Spirit has left him and gone to Micaiah (I Kings 22:24). The true prophet may declare boldly:

> I am filled with power, > with the Spirit of the LORD, > and with justice and might,
> to declare to Jacob his transgression > and to Israel his sin (Mic. 3:8).

The parallel between Spirit and power is to be noted. In the "Second Isaiah" (see ISAIAH) the prophet's inspiration is said to come from "the Lord GOD . . . and his Spirit" (Isa. 48:16); in this passage the Spirit is conceived more personally, as virtually synonymous with the presence of God himself. The mission of the prophet of Isa. 61:1 is carried out under the inspiration and authentication of the Spirit with which he has been anointed by the Lord; and when the Spirit of the Lord "falls upon" Ezekiel, he is enabled to hear the message of doom which he is commissioned to declare to Israel (Ezek. 11:5). By his Spirit the Lord sent "the law and the words" through the prophets (Zech. 7:12), and it was by the Spirit that God sent his warnings to Israel through the prophets (Neh. 9:30). It is particularly as the Spirit of prophecy that Joel pictures the expected future outpouring of the Spirit on all flesh, so that prophesying, dreams, and visions will no longer be restricted to a few specially chosen individuals (Joel 2:28-29). Thus the prayer attributed to Moses (Num. 11:29) would be fulfilled, and all the Lord's people would become prophets through the action of the Lord in putting his Spirit upon them.

The outward manifestation of the spirit of prophecy is primarily to be seen in ecstatic phenomena. When the Lord takes of the Spirit which was upon Moses and distributes it to the seventy elders of Israel who are to become assistants to Moses in the government of the people, they prophesy for so long as the inspiration of the Spirit comes upon them. The fact that they are Spirit-possessed is immediately obvious, as it is in the case of Eldad and Medad, who "prophesied in the camp" (Num. 11:25-26). They are evidently recognizable by the entire community as ecstatics. Similarly, when Saul encounters the band of prophets descending from a high place with their music, he is immediately infected by their ecstatic enthusiasm; the Spirit of the Lord comes "mightily" upon him, he prophesies with them, and is "turned into another man" (I Sam. 10:6, 10), so that "when all who knew him before saw how he prophesied with the prophets, the people said to one another, 'What has come over the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?' " The infection of prophetic ecstasy is even stronger in the case of messengers of Saul, and finally of the king himself, when they see the company of prophets prophesying and Samuel standing as head over them (I Sam. 19:20-24); the Spirit passes over, as it were, to them against their will, so that the purpose of their mission is frustrated. On this occasion, we are given some indication of the more bizarre manifestations of the prophetic spirit; Saul "stripped off his clothes, and he too prophesied before Samuel, and lay naked all that day and all that night."

The Spirit-possessed prophet may move unexpectedly and mysteriously from place to place under the compelling power of the divine energy (I Kings 18:12), and where the Spirit may have caught up a prophet and "cast him upon some mountain or into some valley," it may well be useless to seek him (II Kings 2:16). It is the Spirit which seizes the prophet and enables him, in a trance and in visions, to see what is taking place at a great distance from where he stands. Ezekiel, closely identifying the "hand" and the "spirit" of the Lord, declares that "he put forth the form of a hand, and took me by a lock of my head; and the Spirit lifted me up between earth and heaven, and brought me in visions of God to Jerusalem" (Ezek. 8:3). Later, "the Spirit lifted me up and brought me in the vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea" (11:24), and under the influence of the Spirit he is brought into the temple to receive the vision of its renewed glory (43:5). The ecstatic prophet is pre-eminently the "man of the spirit" (Hos. 9:7).

In the case of the Hebrew prophets, however, the inspiration of the Spirit, with its accompanying outward manifestations, is a temporary and passing phenomenon. Only in respect of the greatest figures of the OT can it be said that the Spirit comes to possess a man permanently, so that his life is altogether controlled by its influence. This is indicated in the case of Moses, who was so completely a man of the Spirit that the Spirit which rested upon him could be extended by the divine action to embrace the elders, who thus became a kind of extension of his own Spirit-possessed personality (Num. 11:17, 25). It is also implied in the story of Elijah, a double portion of whose divine spirit is transferred to Elisha, so that the disciple is able to perform the same wonders as those of his master (II Kings 2:9, 15; cf. vss. 8, 14). The latter narrative is interesting in that the endowment of Elisha with the spirit of Elijah is consequent upon the ascension of Elijah into heaven, and is conditional upon the disciple's being enabled to witness his master's glorification. When these events have happened, Elisha becomes the Spirit-possessed successor, or rather alter ego, of the great prophet. It is obvious from the narrative of Acts 1–2 that the typology of the passage has profoundly influenced the Lukan account of the reception by his disciples of the Spirit which rested upon Jesus, as a consequence of his glorification, which they themselves were privileged to witness.

e. As effecting sanctification and judgment. The phenomena of ecstasy are not, however, the most important effects of Spirit-possession, nor are they a necessary proof of it. The Spirit is the source of all intellectual and spiritual gifts, whether they be the artistry of Bezalel (Exod. 31:2) or the understanding and wisdom with which Daniel interpreted dreams (Dan. 5:14 RSV mg.). It is the inspiration of the men of wisdom (Ecclus. 39:6) and so can be identified with the WISDOM of God (Wisd. Sol. 9:17). The effects of the operation of the Spirit are seen by the great prophets, not merely in the ecstatic ravings of the enthusiast, but in the permanent establishment of justice and righteousness among the people of God. This transformation of the world into a place of righteousness is expected in the days when "the Spirit is poured upon us from on high" (Isa. 32:15). It is the guarantee and sign of the covenant promises of God (Hag. 2:5), and of their fulfilment in the acts of God toward the restored community (Zech. 4:6). Above all, the Spirit is the activity of God in sanctification, both of the covenant people (Isa. 59:21), who will be enabled by their possession of the Spirit within them to observe the commandments of God (Ezek. 36:27; cf. 39:29), and of the individual, who may pray:

> Create in me a clean heart, O God, > and put a new and right spirit within me.
> Cast me not away from thy presence, > and take not thy holy Spirit from me > (Ps. 51:10-11).

f. As the presence of God with Israel. The divine Spirit is the mode of God's judgment on his people, and is thus associated by Isaiah with the cleansing of Jerusalem in the day of deliverance for the faithful remnant of the covenant people "by a spirit of judgment and by a spirit of burning" (Isa. 4:4). This prophecy has influenced the NT account of John the Baptist's expectation of the future baptism "with the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 3:11; Luke 3:16). Through the Spirit's action God's justice and righteousness are to be established in Israel in the age of fulfilment (Isa. 32:15-17). For Israel, as for the individual, the Spirit is the medium by which God teaches man to do his will, and leads him onward in the right way of life (Ps. 143:10). Its activity is associated especially with the establishment of God's covenant with Israel, and the deliverance of the Exodus. God "put in the midst of them his holy Spirit" and "caused his glorious arm to go at the right hand of Moses" (Isa. 63:11-12). Here the Spirit is equated with the "arm" of the Lord, and represents the active presence of God among his people, saving them from their enemies and constituting them the people of the covenant. The Spirit is "holy," as being the active mode of the operation on earth of the transcendent God, and is virtually identified with the being of God himself. The Spirit is personally conceived—no mere power or influence, but the object of a possible personal relationship. Israel's disloyalty to God is a rebellion against his Spirit:

> But they rebelled > and grieved his holy Spirit;
> therefore he turned to be their enemy, > and himself fought against them and the action of God in leading Israel in the exodus wanderings is equated with the personal activity of God himself: "The Spirit of the LORD gave them rest" (vs. 14).
> (Isa. 63:10);

As the personal power of God, effective in the moral and spiritual transformation of his people, the Spirit will be the inner principle of the life of the restored community. The bestowal by God of his Spirit will bring about a renewal of the covenant relationship between God and Israel, enabling the people to observe his laws and truly to belong to him (Ezek. 11:19-20). To receive the Spirit will be the decisive turning point in Israel's repentance (Ezek. 18:31, where the new human spirit of the restored community is the effect of the operation of the Spirit of God, as 36:26-27 makes clear). Through the divine Spirit there will be a transformation of the human character, so that a "heart of flesh" replaces the "heart of stone" of the days of Israel's transgression.

g. In eschatological expectation. As we have already seen, the prophetic hope of the coming of God's Spirit, conceived in this ethical fashion, upon the people of the covenant is part of, or rather one aspect of, the blessedness of the age of fulfilment. In the OT this possession of the Spirit by the whole people of God belongs to the sphere of eschatological expectation. As an object of hope, the Spirit-possession of Israel is associated with divine judgment (Isa. 4:4), the ideal ruler (Isa. 11:2), and, above all, with the renewal of Israel as the people of the covenant (Isa. 32:15; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26; Joel 3:1), and with their repentance in the last days (Zech. 12:10) and restoration. The Second Isaiah links this renewal through the Spirit with the role of Israel as the servant of God, and dramatically compares the working of the Spirit in the re-creation of the nation with the transformation of the desert by streams of water (Isa. 44:3). This metaphor of the new life brought about by the creative Spirit was to exert a powerful influence on the development of Christian imagery.

h. In creation. The Spirit, as the mode of God's re-creation of his chosen people, is re-enacting a part already assigned to it in the creation of all things. The "breath," "wind," or "Spirit" of God is the creative power which brings life to the formless chaos in the beginning of all things (Gen. 1:2), and, as equated with the "word" of God, is the agent by whom God made the heavens (Ps. 33:6). The "breath" or "Spirit" of God gives life to the animal creation, and when it is taken from them, they revert to dust (Ps. 104:29-30; cf. Gen. 2:7). In these last instances the thought is primarily of the "inbreathing" by God of the life principle or "soul" of living creatures, but although this life principle is not to be identified with the actual Spirit of God, it is represented by the Hebrew writers as an effect of its operation. A new creation of life through the Spirit's agency is described in Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones (Ezek. 37:9-14). A human person is therefore one whom God, by the action of his Spirit and "breath," has formed from the clay:

> The spirit of God has made me, > and the breath of the Almighty gives me life > (Job 33:4; cf. 34:14-15).

In the postcanonical literature the Spirit and the Word of God are still spoken of as the means whereby God has brought all things into being (Jth. 16:14), and in the Wisdom of Solomon (1:7) the divine Spirit is described, possibly under the influence of Stoic conceptions of the all-pervading pneuma, as "filling" the universe and holding all things together as a rational bond of cohesion.

i. In relation to the being of God. The thought of the OT is interested in the activity of God rather than in the metaphysical problem of his being; and it follows that little is said by Hebrew writers about the inner relationship of the Spirit to God. God's Spirit is apprehended in its operation, and this operation is recognized as the working of God himself. Nevertheless, it is occasionally implied that the Spirit of God is identical either with the being of God, so that what God is the Spirit is also, or with his personality. Thus Isaiah contrasts "flesh," in the sense of what is material and belonging solely to the order of the world, with what is "spirit"—i.e., partaking of the transcendent divine nature:

> The Egyptians are men, and not God;
> and their horses are flesh, and not spirit
> (Isa. 31:3).

He also sets in parallel the "mouth" and the "Spirit" of the Lord: the Spirit, like the "mouth" by which God utters his commands, is here the person of God in his relation to men (Isa. 34:16). God's Spirit is identified by the Second Isaiah with the personality, or mind, of the Lord (Isa. 40:13), and, as has been noted above, the Spirit is recognized in one passage as the personal presence of the Lord, whom his people grieve by their unfaithfulness (Isa. 63:10-14), being here equated with the "angel" of God (vs. 9), who is the Lord himself as present among the covenant people. See GOD, OT VIEW OF.

2. Intertestamental developments. There are few developments in the intertestamental period which radically affect the NT conception of the nature and work of the Holy Spirit. In the main, the Spirit continues to be thought of as being, pre-eminently, the Spirit of prophecy, manifested in the distant past in such great figures as Elijah (Ecclus. 48:12) or Isaiah (vs. 24), but which was now no longer present in Israel. Contemporary prophecy had fallen into discredit (cf. Zech. 13:2-6), and for the present the Spirit of prophecy was believed to lie dormant, as it were, even though special inspiration might be granted to an individual, such as Ezra, who prayed for the sending of the Holy Spirit to enable him to rewrite the books of the Law which had perished (II Esd. 14:22). In this instance, however, no fresh revelation was granted. Ezra's inspiration is that of the scribe, recording and expounding the written Word, rather than the prophetic spirit; and it was generally acknowledged that prophecy was not to be looked for in the present age (I Macc. 9:27). A "faithful prophet"—i.e., one truly inspired—remained a distant hope (I Macc. 4:46; 14:41). The eschatological expectation persisted of a future outpouring of the Spirit on Israel, associated at times with a coming deliverer of God's people (Pss. Sol. 17:37; 18:7; Test. Levi 18:7; Test. Judah 24:2).

3. NT teachings. a. The Spirit and John's mission. The long-awaited fulfilment of the hope of a general renewal of the prophetic Spirit was seen by JOHN THE BAPTIST to be approaching. Luke, indeed, seeks to show that the events which immediately preceded the work of Jesus and were, in a sense, themselves a part of the gospel were already taking place in the setting of a new upsurge of the long dormant Spirit of prophecy, prophecy being the inspired announcement of the coming fulfilment, of which the child John is to be the forerunner. Elizabeth and Zechariah are "filled with the Holy Spirit." Simeon is likewise inspired to recognize the Christ in Jesus and to proclaim his mission to bring light to the Gentiles (the role of the Servant) and glory to Israel (Luke 2:25-32). This emphasis on a renewal of the Spirit of prophecy as the prelude to the gospel is peculiar to Luke; but the synoptic tradition agrees in seeing John himself as a Spirit-possessed prophet (cf. Matt. 11:9; Mark 11:32), endowed with the Spirit from before his birth (Luke 1:15). His mission was to prepare a faithful remnant of Israel, by repentance associated with the outward sign of cleansing by baptism in the Jordan, to face the coming judgment; it was also a preparation for a future baptism with the Holy Spirit (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16), and at least in one aspect the symbolism of his baptism, recalling the metaphorical language in which the OT prophets had likened the action of the Spirit to that of water in the desert, fits this preparation.

John's baptism, however, was not in itself an effective sign of the fulfilment of the ancient hope of a general outpouring of the Spirit. This hope still lay in the future, though John himself believed it to be imminent. The last days had not yet dawned, and his mission was no more than a preparation for the fulfilment. The promised outpouring of the Spirit waited, according to the common testimony of the NT writers, until the saving work of the Messiah should have been completed. These events were, however, nearer at hand than John himself at first realized. The baptism with the Holy Spirit of which he had spoken actually took place, so far as one of his followers was concerned, when Jesus came to be baptized by him. From that decisive moment the age of hope already began to give place to the age of fulfilment. Hence when John had received from his messengers the news that the messianic signs were being visibly enacted, he receded from the scene, as the evangelists understood it, his work of preparation being done and the age of the new covenant having been ushered in by his prophetic call to Israel (Matt. 11:2-15; Luke 7:18-30; 16:16). In the light of the age of fulfilment, however, John's mission itself took on something of the character of the gospel, by anticipation (Mark 1:1; Luke 3:18).

b. In Christ's baptism. The great turning point in the biblical history is the BAPTISM of Jesus, when the Spirit descended upon him, anointing him (Acts 10:38) as the messianic Son of God, followed, after the completion of his saving work in death, resurrection, and ascension, by the general bestowal of the Spirit which had rested upon him to all his disciples at Pentecost. The baptism is therefore the first of the gospel events, after the prelude formed by the mission of John. It is the "anointing" of the Christ with the Spirit, and is accordingly given an important place in the summary of the apostolic preaching which Luke puts into the mouth of Peter (Acts 10:38). Implicit allusions to it occur elsewhere in Acts (4:27; 13:24-25). Whereas the people as a whole had been baptized by John as a remnant elected to await the dawning of the age of fulfilment, Jesus received in his own person the promised outpouring of the Spirit. With this was associated the proclamation from heaven of his divine sonship (Matt. 3:17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22). Sonship and Spirit-possession are, in fact, identical. The evangelists distinguish the "descent" or "remaining" (John 1:33) of the Spirit upon Jesus from the temporary and partial Spirit-possession of a prophetic enthusiast. It is not a mere possession by an impersonal force, but rather a state of personal union with God the Father, a continuous and enduring endowment with the authority and power (cf. Matt. 7:29; Mark 1:22; Luke 4:32, 36) which characterized his ministry and resulted from that union. This distinction is expressed in the imagery of the descent of the dove (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32). The Spirit is not a mere prophetic inspiration; it descends "in bodily form," as Luke pictures it (3:22), resting upon the Messiah with the fullest endowment of divine power. This does not imply that the permanent unction with the Spirit has not certain moments of particularly high exaltation (cf. Luke 10:21), but it asserts the completeness of this Spirit-possession which is identical with sonship. The actual symbolism of the dove is obscure. It may be that it is intended to recall Noah's dove, the harbinger of the first covenant between God and man; the Spirit comes upon Jesus as the Christ, and opens the way toward the new covenant in which all Israel will know the Lord through the indwelling of his Spirit.

c. In Mark and Matthew. The Synoptic gospels contain few references to the Holy Spirit, although it is to be noted that Luke, writing from a different standpoint from that of Mark, and with a larger perspective in view, embracing the gospel events from the birth of John to the proclamation of Christ in Rome, adds an emphasis of his own to the relatively meager sayings about the Spirit which he found in Mark and Q. This comparative lack of allusions to the Spirit is entirely natural, and is in accordance with the general theology of the NT as a whole; for the dispensation of the Spirit belongs to the age of the church, the time following the death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord, on which the coming of the Spirit upon God's people depended.

Mark, after telling his readers about the baptismal descent of the Spirit upon Jesus and the proclamation of his divine sonship by the heavenly voice, explains that it was under the compulsion of the Spirit that Jesus immediately retreated to the desert to grapple with the temptation by the devil (Mark 1:12). Mark does not tell us explicitly that the Spirit was the divine principle and energy of the ministry of Jesus and the proclamation of the kingdom of God; but the fact that this was so, as Luke explains less ambiguously, is implicit in the Markan saying about the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Mark 3:29). The direct and total opposition to Jesus' mission, which ascribed the signs of the kingdom (the casting out of demons) to the power of evil, is blasphemy against the Holy Spirit itself. Hence this is the ultimate sin, the final rejection of God as manifested in his active presence in the mighty works of Jesus. " 'Truly, I say to you, all sins will be forgiven the sons of men, and whatever blasphemies they utter; but whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit never has forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin'—for they had said, 'He has an unclean spirit' " (Mark 3:28-30).

A version of this saying which occurs in Luke 12:10, and is found alongside the Markan form in Matt. 12:31-32, contrasts the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, not with all other sin, but specifically with "speaking a word against the Son of man." Here the emphasis lies on the distinction between Jesus as he presented himself to the public view in his earthly ministry, disclosing his true character only to the eye of faith and only in signs and parables, with the Spirit itself as the inner motive and principle of his great works. The opposition of the scribes was deliberate and conscious, an ultimate rejection of the saving activity of God in the person of Jesus. Luke gives his own interpretation to this blasphemy, bringing the saying into direct relation with another Markan passage (Mark 13:11) in which the immediate inspiration of the Spirit is promised to those who confess Christ under stress of persecution.

Mark's allusion to the Spirit in this context represents an exception to his general rule of not alluding to the Spirit, the principle of the postresurrection life of Christians, in his account of the preresurrection ministry of Jesus except insofar as it was necessary for him to indicate the Spirit-possession of Jesus himself. In the so-called Little Apocalypse, Mark is describing Christ's prophecy of the postresurrection age when his followers would be subject to persecution. Hence he can properly lay emphasis on the inspiration of the Spirit which would be experienced by faithful confessors in that missionary and martyr situation. The Christian disciple is told not to be anxious how he is to make his defense of the faith when he is put on trial: "But say whatever is given you in that hour, for it is not you who speak, but the Holy Spirit." Luke reproduces this promise, in a different context (Luke 12:12), but immediately precedes it with a warning against apostasy: "He who denies me before men will be denied before the angels of God. And every one who speaks a word against the Son of man will be forgiven; but he who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven" (Luke 12:9-10). The blasphemy against the Spirit has thus been transferred in thought from the context of Christ's ministry to that of the situation of the missionary church. It has come to be identified with apostasy, the unforgivable sin, which stands over against the steadfast confession of the martyr, testifying to Christ under the direct inspiration of the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 7:55; Heb. 6:4-6; I John 5:16).

Matthew has reproduced the Markan statement that Jesus went into the wilderness under the compulsion of the Spirit, though both he and Luke speak of the Spirit as "leading" rather than "driving" Jesus (Matt. 4:1; cf. Mark 1:12; Luke 4:1). He has included the saying about the blasphemy against the Spirit (Matt. 12:31-32) both in the Markan form and in that which appears in Luke and may be considered to be the Q version. He also includes a saying (Matt. 12:28) which occurs in a slightly different form in Luke (11:20). This saying makes explicit the fact implied in Mark that it is by the operation of the Spirit in his ministry that Jesus performs the mighty works which are the sign of the approach of the KINGDOM OF GOD in his own person. The kingdom is already present by anticipation in the works which are done through the agency of the Spirit, and the chief sign of this is the defeat and destruction of the demonic powers of evil: "If it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you." Luke has the same saying (11:20) with the difference that "finger" replaces "Spirit." This is probably to be accounted for by a desire on the part of Luke to introduce a reminiscence of Exod. 8:19; in any case, the concept of the "finger," "hand," or "arm" of the Lord, as a symbol of the active presence of God, is very close in OT thought to that of the "Spirit" of the Lord. The works of Jesus betoken the present operation of the Spirit, bringing about an anticipation in the ministry of Jesus of the promised times of the end, the age of fulfilment for Israel. This saying is directly related to the blasphemy against the Spirit by which the opponents of Jesus attribute his works to the devil.

Matthew's explicit assertion that the Spirit is the energizing principle of the mighty works of Jesus is reinforced by his use of the Second Isaiah's description of the "Servant of the Lord" in order to present his readers with a picture of the Galilean ministry:

> Behold, my servant whom I have chosen, > my beloved with whom my soul is well pleased.
> I will put my Spirit upon him, > and he shall proclaim justice to the Gentiles > (Matt. 12:18, citing Isa. 42:1-2).

Jesus is the Servant, possessed of the Spirit of God for the execution of his saving mission.

Looking forward from the ministry of Jesus to the mission of the postresurrection church, Matthew reproduces the Markan promise of a direct inspiration of the Spirit for the confessor in times of persecution (Matt. 10:20), placing it in the setting of the instructions delivered by the Lord to the Twelve at the outset of their mission. In this gospel, too, there occurs the command of the risen Lord to his disciples to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 28:19). This is a passage which was to prove of immense significance in the later development of the doctrine of the Trinity and of the personality and divinity of the Holy Spirit. Indeed, in its liturgical use in connection with baptism, it may be regarded as a primary source of the theologically formulated doctrine of later centuries. There is no evidence to show that this text is not an authentic part of the Gospel of Matthew; and although the baptismal practice of the apostolic church, so far as we can infer it from the NT, does not appear to have included the use of the threefold name, it may well be that in certain quarters it was already so employed by the last decade or two of the first century. The association of the Holy Spirit in a personal manner with "God" and "the Lord Jesus Christ" is already attested for a considerably earlier date by Paul's concluding prayer in II Cor. 13:14, and the Matthean liturgical formula represents only a somewhat more consciously theological expression of the same belief. It is good evidence that the Spirit was being recognized as fully divine, and by implication as fully personal, in other circles besides the Johannine, at a relatively early date.

d. In the Third Gospel. In the Lukan writings there is considerably more emphasis on the operation of the Spirit than in the other Synoptics. Luke sees the Spirit as active in a great renewal of prophecy before the birth of John, and in John's own mission; the Spirit rests on Jesus, and in its power he carries out his mighty works; after the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, the same Spirit which rested upon him is bestowed upon the community of his followers, so that the work of the Spirit links together, and binds into a single operation of God, the whole series of events which began in the Jerusalem temple at the annunciation to Zechariah and reached a climax in the free proclamation of the kingdom of God in the capital city of the Gentile world by the leading apostle.

In the setting of renewed inspiration and prophecy, the birth of Jesus is announced to Mary. Just as the Spirit was the creative agency of God in the formation of the world, so the Spirit will come upon Mary and enable her to become miraculously the mother of the promised Messiah (Luke 1:35). Matthew, too, explains that Mary "was found to be with child of the Holy Spirit," and narrates the appearance of the angel to Joseph, telling him in a dream not to fear to take "Mary your wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 1:18, 20). In this Matthean account the birth of Jesus fulfils the prophecy of Isa. 7:14 (as the LXX version suggested its meaning to be) by being brought about through the supernatural action of the divine power of the Spirit, working the miracle of his virgin birth; but no more is told to the reader than the bare fact. In Luke, on the other hand, the nature of the Spirit's activity is more explicitly described: the Spirit is equated with the "power of the Most High," and it is said to "come upon" Mary and "overshadow" her. This recalls the operation of the Spirit in creation, and Luke's choice of the word "overshadow" is evidently also intended to point to the association of this action of the Spirit with the "overshadowing" of the cloud of the divine presence at the announcement of the sonship of Jesus to the disciples at the Transfiguration (Luke 9:35). The evangelist may possibly also wish his readers to see a parallel between the promise of the coming of the Spirit upon Mary and the promise of the coming of the Spirit upon the apostles after the Resurrection (cf. Luke 24:49; Acts 1:4, 8).

The opening of the ministry of Jesus is, in Luke's account, characterized by the working of the Spirit in him, after its descent at the Jordan. Luke adds to the Markan narrative of the compulsion of the Spirit, which took Jesus into the wilderness, the statement that it was like a prophet of old, "full of the Holy Spirit" (cf. Mic. 3:8), that Jesus returned from the Jordan, when he was "led by the Spirit for forty days in the wilderness" (Luke 4:1-2). After the temptations, Jesus "returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee" to begin his teaching in the synagogues (Luke 4:14). This added emphasis on the Spirit's role in the earthly ministry of Jesus is characteristic of Luke's editorial insertions and additional notes, and of the various slight but subtle alterations which he makes in his material, both Markan and non-Markan so far as the critic can judge of the latter.

One of the most important passages which exemplify such additions and alterations is the dramatic episode of the proclamation by Jesus of the purpose of his mission in the synagogue at Nazareth, a passage which is probably basically Markan and has been greatly enlarged and placed in a new context by Luke in order to serve as an introduction to the central theme of both the Third Gospel and Acts (Luke 4:16-30). Here Jesus declares himself to be the prophet announced in Isa. 61:1-2, a figure who would probably be identified both by himself and by his audience with the Servant of the Lord. He is the ideally Spirit-possessed prophet, sent out with the unction of the Spirit to proclaim good news (Luke 4:18). This is the key to the Lukan picture of Jesus, and of the church which was to carry on the same mission after his death and resurrection had made it possible for the Spirit with which he was anointed to be bestowed on his people in their turn.

It is possible that the reader is intended to be reminded occasionally at other points in Luke's narrative that Jesus was the great prophet of Isa. 61, identified with the "prophet like Moses" of Deut. 18:15 (cf. Acts 3:22; 7:37; and the implied parallel between Jesus and Moses in Luke 24:19; Acts 7:22). Thus Jesus is greeted as a "great prophet" after the raising of the widow's son (Luke 7:16), and Simon the Pharisee is already to consider the question whether or not Jesus is a prophet, or, according to a variant reading, "the prophet"—i.e., the prophet like Moses (Luke 7:39). Jesus may again be implicitly identified with the prophet of Isa. 61 at Acts 4:27. It is more important to notice that, according to Luke, the profound and exultant expression of complete personal union between Jesus and the Father, recorded on the occasion when the mission of the Seventy had demonstrated the power of the kingdom of God and the destruction of Satan, was a moment of rejoicing "in the Holy Spirit" (Luke 10:21). The inspiration of the Spirit mediates this most intimate personal bond. It is a relationship to God in which the disciples of Jesus will be enabled in some measure to share. Hence, for Luke the supreme object of Christian prayer is the gift of the Holy Spirit: "If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will the heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him?" (Luke 11:13). The Matthean version of this saying (Matt. 7:11) contains no reference to the Spirit, and it is probable that Luke has altered the form of the saying as he found it in Q. Along with this saying the variant reading in Luke 11:2 must be considered. This gives the petition: "May the Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us," in place of: "Thy kingdom come." Its MS attestation is very slight, but, besides being known to Gregory of Nyssa and Maximus the Confessor, it was also read by Marcion and stood, apparently, in his text of Luke instead of "Hallowed be thy name." It is at least possible that this reading is not due to Marcion himself but is original in Luke. It would certainly be in harmony with Luke's conception of the Spirit as the primary object of prayer.

The Lukan use of the sayings about the inspiration of the confessor and the blasphemy against the Spirit have already been discussed. This gospel ends with the announcement by the risen Lord that the divine promise is about to be fulfilled, when the disciples will be "clothed with power from on high" (Luke 24:49). The second volume of Luke's work describes how this came about, and presents a ministry of the church in the power of the Spirit, parallel with that of Jesus.

e. In Acts. This fulfilment waits upon the glorification of Jesus, completed in his ascension. Thereafter the Lord himself is in heaven, until the final consummation (Acts 3:21). He is no longer with his disciples (Luke 24:44); but the Spirit is the link between the ascended Lord and those to whom he has covenanted to administer it, like the servants in the parable of the pounds (Luke 19:11-27; cf. Luke 22:29-30; Acts 1:6-8). The Spirit is the same as that which rested upon Jesus, and it can even be called the "Spirit of Jesus" (Acts 16:7). Thus, although the risen Christ appears in Luke to be far removed from his people on earth, the Spirit supplies the personal link which makes it possible for the works of Jesus to be continued in his name by his followers.

The coming of the Spirit, as the result of the completion of the mission of Jesus, is the fulfilment of John's prophecy of a coming "baptism" with the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:5). That this is a participation in the same Spirit which operated in Jesus is emphasized in Luke's assertion that it was "through the Holy Spirit" that the risen Lord gave his final commandment to his apostles (vs. 2). This is the fulfilment of the promise of a general outpouring of the Spirit; the followers of Christ will participate in his own baptism with the Spirit. It is conceived by Luke in terms of the Spirit of prophecy, which is now the power and motive principle of the church's missionary witness to Christ throughout the world. The coming of the Spirit enables the apostles to receive power, and so to become witnesses to the end of the earth (vs. 8). Luke reminds us, in the speech ascribed to Peter (vs. 16), that the same Spirit had been the inspiration of the OT prophecies, so that there is a direct continuity between the activities of the prophet and those of the apostle. He then describes the coming of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, interpreting this as the fulfilment of Joel's prophecy of a universal outpouring of the Spirit of prophecy (Acts 2:16-21).

Since the Spirit is, in Luke's view, pre-eminently the inspiration and dynamic principle of the missionary enterprise, it is appropriate that he should depict the Pentecostal event as an onrush of divine power, like the wind or the ruach of the OT in its more concrete and physical manifestations, and that its coming should be symbolized in terms of tongues "as of fire," distributed and resting upon the apostles. The purpose of the Spirit's onrush is to bestow upon them the gifts most needed for the mission to the whole world, represented by the crowd drawn together in Jerusalem "from every nation under heaven" (Acts 2:2-5). This fulfilment of the words of Joel has been made possible by the resurrection and glorification of Jesus: "Being therefore exalted at the right hand of God, and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he has poured out this which you see and hear" (Acts 2:33).

The gift is not something confined to the original witnesses who were supernaturally empowered on the day of Pentecost. "The promise," said Peter in his speech to the Pentecost crowd, "is to you and to your children and to all that are far off" (Acts 2:39). It is to be received by those who, like the followers of John, repent and are baptized for the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38). The vitally important difference between John's baptism and the Christian baptism, which is an effective sign of the bestowal of the Spirit, is that the latter is "in the name of Jesus Messiah." It is as the people of the Christ, the renewed Israel, that those who repent now receive the fulfilment of what in John's preaching could only be a promise for the future. The quality of life evinced by this Spirit-possessed community is summed up by Luke in Acts 2:42-47, where the frequent association of the Spirit with joy and gladness is strikingly emphasized. Spirit-possession is also the mark of the apostolic witness who confesses Christ in times of danger. Peter is acting under the inspiration of the Spirit when he testifies to the assembled rulers of Israel (Acts 4:8), and the "boldness" of Peter and John (vs. 13) is a typical manifestation of this inspiration. Once again, this inspiration of the Christian missionaries is associated with a reminder that the work of the Spirit in testifying to the gospel is continuous with the inspiration of the OT prophets (vss. 25-26). The prayer of the assembled church (vss. 24-30) asks that God will grant them "to speak . . . with all boldness," and the prayer is answered by a renewed assurance that the Spirit is the power and inspiration of their mission; Pentecost is, as it were, confirmed in this new situation of danger and persecution: "The place in which they were gathered together was shaken; and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and spoke the word of God with boldness" (vs. 31). Thus the Spirit, indwelling the community of Christian believers and inspiring their mission, can be adduced as the chief testimony to the truth of the apostolic preaching: "We are witnesses to these things, and so is the Holy Spirit whom God has given to those who obey him" (5:32).

Certain outstanding leaders of the mission are described as being pre-eminently possessed by the Holy Spirit. Stephen, in particular, fulfils the Lord's promise that the confessor of the faith under persecution would be directly inspired. In his disputations with the members of the Hellenist synagogues in Jerusalem, Stephen's inspiration made him invincible: "They could not withstand the wisdom and the Spirit with which he spoke" (6:10); and it is especially in his witness as a martyr that his inspiration through the Spirit reaches its highest point. "Full of the Holy Spirit" (7:55), he is enabled to see the heavens opened and to receive a vision of the Son of man in glory. Paul is similarly "filled with the Holy Spirit" when he withstands the efforts of Bar-Jesus to oppose the proclamation of the gospel (13:9).

Other leaders are also specially marked out as being Spirit-possessed. This is true of the Seven (6:3, 5), of Barnabas (11:24), and of Paul after his conversion, when the touch of Ananias brings him healing for his blindness and participation in the Pentecostal gift which had been received by the earliest believers (9:17). There is no necessary contradiction between this special endowment and the general impression given by the early chapters of Acts that the whole church was the Spirit-possessed community of the new covenant. Luke's chief interest is in the work of the Spirit in the furtherance of the church's world-wide mission. He therefore concentrates his attention upon the specifically missionary gifts of the Spirit (see SPIRITUAL GIFTS). There are some who are endowed with peculiar powers of eloquence or the doing of mighty works, and are leaders of the mission in a special sense; there are also those who have special gifts of prophecy. In such cases the operation of the Spirit is manifested in "tongues" (see TONGUES, GIFT OF), prophesying, and other unusual phenomena. Thus the narrative of Acts includes the episodes of the Christian prophet Agabus, whose inspiration closely resembles that of the prophets of the OT, including the exercise of prophetic symbolism (11:28; 21:11); other prophets at Antioch (13:1); and the prophesying and speaking with tongues of the twelve disciples whom Paul met at Ephesus (19:6). On the other hand, the Spirit is also the life principle of the community as a whole, where its manifestations are to be seen rather in the common life, brotherhood, and joy. Its presence is expressed in the institution of common property, so that an offense against the unity of the whole body, motivated by dishonest self-interest, is a sin against the Holy Spirit (4:32-37; 5:3, 9). When the church in a particular area is at peace and is being consolidated, its way of life can be described as "walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit" (9:31). This life in the Spirit is especially characterized by joy (13:52).

Above all, in Luke's picture of the life of the primitive church, the Spirit is the guiding and controlling power of the world-wide mission. Through the inspiration of the Spirit, Philip is instructed to join the Ethiopian eunuch (8:29), and when his task is accomplished, Philip is removed to other spheres of activity by the agency of the Spirit (vs. 39). It is through the direct guidance of the Spirit that Peter is induced to meet the envoys of Cornelius and go with them to Caesarea (10:19; 11:12). The Spirit directs the church at Antioch to send out Barnabas and Saul as their missionaries to the Gentile countries of Asia Minor (13:2), and it is in the consciousness of the Spirit's guidance that they set out on their journey (13:4). The COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM sends its instructions to the Gentile brethren in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia in the confidence that its decision has been due to the direct guidance of the Spirit: "It has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us" (15:28). On the second missionary journey the Spirit dictates to Paul and Silas how the strategy of the mission is to be pursued. On this journey the province of Asia is not to be evangelized, nor are the apostle and his companion allowed to go into Bithynia; the Spirit's guidance brings them perforce to Troas, where the call will come to take the gospel overseas to Macedonia (16:6-7). Luke does not tell us how this guidance was mediated; but we should probably infer that it was received through prophetic insight, in the manner in which the Hebrew prophets had discerned the divine command to go to particular places and carry out particular tasks. We have already noticed that it is in connection with this guidance of the missionary preachers that the Spirit is specifically described as the "Spirit of Jesus." Paul's decision on his third journey to leave Asia and revisit Greece is similarly made under the compulsion of the Spirit: "Paul resolved in the Spirit to pass through Macedonia." The decision is his own rational resolve; but it is arrived at in the consciousness of the leading of the purposive divine power which is the driving force of the entire missionary enterprise (19:21).

As another instance of the Spirit's direction of the church's mission we may reckon the appointment of the ministry. The elders of the Ephesian congregation were made "guardians" or "overseers" in the church by the action of the Spirit (20:28). The allusion here is probably to the selection of these men by some person or persons gifted with prophetic insight, perhaps Paul himself, acting, as he believed, under inspiration.

In the course of Paul's last journey to Jerusalem, the prophetic Spirit is also active in warning him of the dangers and difficulties which await him (20:22-23). The narrative of his visit to Tyre and to Caesarea suggests that these warnings were conveyed through revelations to prophets, as well, perhaps, as to Paul himself directly.

The question how Luke conceives the Spirit to have been received by the ordinary members of the Christian society is notoriously difficult to answer. It is a central theme of Lukan theology that the age of fulfilment has dawned and that its characteristic mark is the outpouring of the Spirit in accordance with the ancient prophetic hope. The Spirit, therefore, with which Luke so constantly associates the idea of divine power (cf. Luke 1:17; 4:14; 5:17; 6:19; Acts 1:5, 8; 10:38), is now the possession of the community as a whole. Pentecost, with the descent of the Spirit upon the nucleus of the church, corresponds to the "anointing" of Jesus himself with the same Spirit (cf. Luke 4:16-30). It inaugurates the age of the church and its world-wide mission, and is represented as being an antitype of the proclamation of the Law at Sinai (cf. Jub. 6:17, 19; Philo On the Special Laws 2.189; On the Decalogue 33.35), and perhaps also of the episode of Babel (cf. Gen. 11:1-9). The promise is made by Peter in his speech to the Pentecost crowd that the gift of the Spirit will now be available to all who repent and are baptized in the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:38), and it is clear from the rest of the narrative that this promise was fulfilled and that the church is a Spirit-possessed body. Here it would appear that the rite of baptism has become, for the Christian, the effective sign of the reception of the Spirit, being the outward means by which he enters upon every aspect of his calling. This would be in line with the explicit teaching of Paul and the general implications of the NT as a whole.

On the other hand, in the case of Cornelius and his household, the Spirit "fell on" the converts as they were listening to Peter's preaching, as an immediate gift bestowed by God without human agency. Their baptism followed, and was a consequence of, their Spirit-possession, not the means by which they received it (10:44-48). This episode, however, is obviously exceptional. It is a turning point in the church's mission, at which the will of God that Gentiles should be received into the community and baptized is miraculously demonstrated in a way which overcomes and sets at rest all doubts and scruples. It is a Gentile Pentecost (cf. 11:15-17; 15:8-9), a fact to which attention is repeatedly drawn in the course of the controversy about the admission of Gentiles. Spirit-possession, too, means in this case participation in the prophetic gifts (speaking with tongues) which were given at Pentecost to the original leaders of the Christian mission. Though the relationship between the entire community's experience of the Spirit and special prophetic endowments is never unambiguously expressed in Luke's writings, it is clear that he implies a distinction between them.

The same ambiguity probably accounts for the apparent contradiction between Acts 2:38 and the narrative of the Samaritan converts who were baptized by Philip but whose reception of the Spirit was delayed until Peter and John had come from Jerusalem and laid their hands upon the new believers (8:12-17). Here, again, we find a major turning point in the missionary enterprise, the admission to the community of non-Jews, members of the odious Samaritan schismatic sect. Once again, Spirit-possession is being thought of in terms of prophetic inspiration. It appears from the narrative that it might have been expected that the Samaritan converts would have shown some manifestation of the Spirit, which must presumably have taken the form of ecstatic phenomena. This did not occur, and it took place only when the two chief leaders of the original Jerusalem church had come to Samaria and given converts a sign of their full acceptance into the hitherto Jewish society of the church. When Peter and John give them a token of "solidarity"—almost, indeed, of personal identification—they begin to manifest their possession by the Spirit in so obvious a manner that Simon the magician seeks to purchase the power of conferring so marvelous a gift (8:19). Two things make this incident highly exceptional: the great step forward is being taken of bringing the gospel to non-Jews and incorporating them into the church in fellowship with the Jews of Jerusalem, and the new nucleus of the mission in Samaria is granted exceptional and visibly manifest signs of the extension to it of the prophetic gifts of Pentecost. It is extremely unlikely that Luke intends the story of the preaching at Samaria to be regarded as typical of the church's normal missionary work, or that it would be right to infer from this story that a "Spirit baptism" was regularly conferred upon converts by the imposition of hands, baptism in water being only a preliminary rite in preparation for this.

In the case of Paul (9:17-18) it is not clear whether reception of the Spirit was mediated in his baptism or whether it preceded it, being associated with the act of Ananias in laying his hands on Paul for the restoration of his sight. The probability is that the imposition of hands was here a sign and means of healing, and that the promised gift of the Spirit came when he "rose and was baptized." If Luke's story is accurate, this interpretation of it would seem to be borne out by Paul's own teaching on baptism.

At Ephesus (19:2-6) Paul met disciples who had been baptized, not with the Christian baptism "in the name of the Lord Jesus," but only with "John's baptism" of preparation for the coming of Jesus. They had accordingly not received the Holy Spirit when they were converted (19:2), nor even heard that the Holy Spirit "is" (i.e., that the age of the Spirit has come and that the Spirit is available to all believers). The status of these men is obscure. They may have been followers of John, but their designation as "disciples" and the reference to their "believing," which means "conversion," suggests rather that they were converts made by Apollos whose original belief was apparently some form of acceptance of Jesus, which nevertheless stopped short of an understanding of the postresurrection, postascension, and postpentecostal situation (18:24-26). They were baptized by Paul "in the name of the Lord Jesus," and "when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Spirit came on them; and they spoke with tongues and prophesied" (19:6). These disciples form the nucleus of the church at Ephesus, the main center of Gentile Christianity in Paul's lifetime. The Pentecostal endowment of special gifts of the Spirit, in the form of "tongues" and prophesying, is extended to these particularly important disciples at the time of another notable moment in the progress of the universal mission. It is mediated by the sign of self-identification given to them by the chief apostle of the Gentile communities, himself pre-eminently possessed of the Spirit.

In harmony with the Spirit-guided and -empowered mission of the Christian preachers, the inspired prophets of the Old Covenant continue to give their witness. The resistance of the old Israel to the gospel, described as resistance to the Holy Spirit (7:51), was thus foreshadowed by the prophecy of Isaiah through which the Spirit gave warning of the opposition the mission would meet from the Jews (28:25).

The Lukan conception of the Spirit, though it can scarcely be said to include that of full personality, is nevertheless rich and varied. Attempts have been made to distinguish different shades of meaning corresponding to the instances of the use of "the Holy Spirit" (with the definite article) and "Holy Spirit" (without the article). The former occurs twenty times in Luke-Acts, the latter eighteen times. But no rigid distinction can be made here. It remains true that Luke shares the general NT theology of the Spirit as manifested in the baptism of Jesus and becoming the possession of the Christian community as a consequence of his saving work, but that he superimposes, as it were, on this common belief his own peculiar insistence on the Spirit as the guide and dynamic power of the world-wide mission, manifested in prophetic charismata ("gifts of the Spirit"), first in Jerusalem and then especially in the new churches of the Samaritan and Gentile worlds.

One peculiar passage remains to be mentioned. Apollos is described as "being fervent in spirit" (Acts 18:25), and as speaking and teaching the things concerning Jesus, speaking boldly in the synagogue. At that time he "knew only the baptism of John," and Acts 19:2-3 shows that this indicates a rudimentary stage of discipleship which did not include an understanding of the postpentecostal situation. In view of the general teaching of Luke-Acts it is hard to see how such a person could be a sharer in the Spirit, the inspiration of the church of the baptized, for which John's baptism had been merely a preparation; he could hardly be said to have entered with the more fully instructed Christians into the age of fulfilment. A possible explanation is that "spirit" here means his own spirit, and not the Spirit of God (so RSV). Yet the boldness of speech which is ascribed to him is usually a mark of the Spirit's activity. Perhaps, therefore, he is to be reckoned as a sharer, in an unusual manner, of the Spirit which possessed the missionary church, and, if this is so, his case warns us not to try to use the Lukan writings as a basis for working out any overrigid formulations concerning the work of the Spirit in the church. As in the episode of Cornelius, the operation of the Spirit is free and uncontrolled.

f. In Pauline theology. Paul says little about the relation of the Spirit to Jesus during his earthly life. According to Paul's "gospel," which no doubt reflects the primitive tradition which he had himself received, Jesus was "descended from David according to the flesh and designated the Son of God in power according to the Spirit of holiness by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:3-4). Here, in this virtual anticipation of a "two-natures" Christology, the "Spirit of holiness" or Holy Spirit is almost equivalent to the divine principle in Jesus. The operation of the power of God in him denotes his divine sonship, as his human descent marks him out as the Davidic Messiah; and this sonship is proved by the fact of the Resurrection (see RESURRECTION IN THE NT). More important, in the thought of Paul, is his conception of the Spirit as the mode of Christ's presence in and among his people. The Spirit, in the Lukan writings, is the link between the ascended Christ in heaven and his people on earth. In Paul the link is more intimate: Christ dwells in the believer and in the community; the believer is "in Christ," and the community is the "body of Christ." The mode by which this mutual indwelling takes place, and by which Christ is made the life principle of the church and the church is united to its head, is the Spirit, which is the Spirit of Christ himself.

The new life in which Christians share through grace, responded to by faith—i.e., the life of the resurrection anticipated in the present time—is a state of being "in the Spirit" (Rom. 8:9). This does not denote a condition of prophetic ecstasy. It includes the whole content of the Christian life, the deep personal union with Christ made possible by grace. It is a state in which the Spirit of God dwells in the believers. The "Spirit of God" is now recognized as the "Spirit of Christ" (8:9): "Any one who does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him." To "have the Spirit of Christ" is the same as experiencing Christ himself: "If Christ is in you, . . . your spirits are alive" (vs. 10). This again is equated with the indwelling of the "Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead" (vs. 11). The Spirit is not substantially identical with Christ; but the Spirit mediates Christ to the church and the church to Christ. The Spirit makes the risen and glorified Christ present to the individual Christian and to the church collectively; it is in the Spirit that the believer and the church are united to the Lord. Hence the Spirit and Christ may be spoken of interchangeably as the principle of the new life and the sphere of man's access by grace and faith to God the Father. The Spirit is the "Spirit of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:19). It is thus the decisive test of the authenticity of supposed prophetic inspiration to determine the relation of its content to the basic Christian faith in Christ as Lord. There can be no revelation of the Spirit which contradicts this; and, on the other hand, the confession of Christ as Lord is a sure indication of the working of the true Spirit of God. "No one speaking by the Spirit of God ever says 'Jesus be cursed!' and no one can say 'Jesus is Lord' except by the Holy Spirit" (I Cor. 12:3).

Since the Spirit is the mode of the Christian's apprehension of the risen Christ, it is possible for Paul to set together in his thought, in parallel as it were, "the Lord Jesus Christ," "God," and "the Holy Spirit" (II Cor. 13:14), and the necessary implication of this is that the Spirit has come to be understood as personal. Yet Paul's identification of the Spirit of God with the operation of the risen Christ in and among his people does not lead him to make a substantial identification of the Spirit as a divine "person" with Christ as a divine "person." His statement: "Now the Lord is the Spirit" (II Cor. 3:17) is not to be read in this sense. It is not an ontological statement about the Godhead. In its context Paul has been contrasting the dispensation of the Spirit with that of the law. Speaking of the glory of the former as compared with the lesser glory of the latter, he uses the passage in which the glory reflected in the face of Moses was described in Exodus (34:29-35). This leads him to consider the blindness of the Jews, who cannot discern the true meaning of the OT; they do not see that it leads to the new covenant of the Spirit, replacing the old dispensation of the law; their eyes are blindfolded. Yet, just as Moses laid aside the veil that covered his face, when he went in to commune with God (Exod. 34:34), so when the Jews similarly turn to the Lord, the veil will be removed from their minds and they will understand. In their case, the phrase "the Lord" means "the Spirit," the principle of the new life in Christ.

As the motive and principle of the new life "in Christ," the Spirit stands in sharp contrast to the Law (see LAW IN THE NT), the principle of man's relationship to God under the old dispensation. To return to the bondage of the law would mean separation from Christ and abandonment of the Christian hope, guaranteed by the indwelling of the Spirit (Gal. 5:5). The new covenant, brought into effect by Christ, is a relationship to God consisting in and depending upon the indwelling of God's Spirit, and not a legal relationship embodied in a written code. The latter cannot give life: "The written code kills, but the Spirit gives life" (II Cor. 3:6). The Spirit ("the LORD" of Exod. 34:34) effects a transformation into the likeness of Christ, "from one degree of glory to another" (II Cor. 3:18).

Release from the law and its condemnation means a discharge from servitude and an entry into the new life in which the Spirit is both the motive and principle of life in Christ and also the sphere in which that life is lived: "We serve not under the old written code but in the new life of the Spirit" (Rom. 7:6). This new principle may itself be termed a new law, the "law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus"; but it is of a totally different kind from the old law, which is the "law of sin and death" (Rom. 8:2). It is a principle of life which could never be attained through the performance of supposedly meritorious legal works; it is given only through "hearing" the gospel "with faith" (Gal. 3:2). It is significant that the Christian experience of life in the Spirit is so real and vivid that Paul can use it as a convincing argument to the Galatians who are being led back to legalism by false teachers: "Did you receive the Spirit by works of the law, or by hearing with faith?"

To abandon the gospel of grace and revert to legalism would be to exchange life in the Spirit for life "in the flesh" (cf. Gal. 3:3). The flesh (see FLESH [NT]) is man's human nature in its unredeemed state, as alienated from God. It is in itself incapable of responding to the Spirit, and it represents a principle which is wholly at enmity with the Spirit and is to be done to death or "crucified" by those who are united with Christ in his death and in his resurrection to the new life which is Spirit-controlled and Spirit-motivated. Those who are walking by the Spirit must contend against the hostile principle of the flesh, and Paul reminds his hearers of the contrast between the works of the flesh and the "fruit of the Spirit," which is seen in the qualities of the Christian life, beginning with love, joy, and peace (Gal. 5:16-25). Life in the flesh results in corruption; life in the Spirit is eternal life (Gal. 6:8). Christians are those who "walk not according to the flesh but according to the Spirit . . . set their minds on the things of the Spirit. To set the mind on the flesh is death, but to set the mind on the Spirit is life and peace" (Rom. 8:4-6). Those in whom the Spirit of God dwells are not in the flesh but in the Spirit (vs. 9), and by the Spirit they put to death the deeds of the body—i.e., in this case, the flesh (vs. 13). The promise of the Spirit was thus reserved for those who could receive it through faith, not for those who sought salvation in legal works; the covenant of the Spirit is therefore intended for the Gentiles (Gal. 3:14).

The Spirit is Christ's Spirit, the Spirit of the Son of God, and the Christian, indwelt by the Spirit, enters into a new relationship to God, that of a son to his Father. Through the Spirit, Christians are enabled to address God as Father, and the proof that they are sons of God is the indwelling Spirit, which cries out in them "Abba! Father!" (Gal. 4:6). The Spirit testifies to our spirit that we are sons of God, and fellow heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:14-17).

Through the Spirit, with its assurance of sonship toward God, the Christian has access to the Father and communion with him. Through Christ both Jew and Gentile "have access in one Spirit to the Father" (Eph. 2:18). In the Spirit man can speak to God, for the Spirit prays within him, interceding "for the saints according to the will of God." Although man cannot pray as he ought, the Spirit "intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words" (Rom. 8:26-27). Hence Paul exhorts his readers to "pray at all times in the Spirit, with all prayer and supplication" (Eph. 6:18). The indwelling of the Spirit gives man his peculiar rights and dignity (I Thess. 4:8). It is this indwelling which is the distinctive mark of the Christian life (Rom. 8:9). It is the mode of Christ's own indwelling (Eph. 3:16-17). "Participation in the Spirit" is the common experience of all Christians (Phil. 2:1), producing the fellowship of the Spirit which Paul mentions in II Cor. 13:14 (unless this should be rendered "participation in the Spirit" with the RSV mg.). The individual who is united to Christ enters into a union with him in one Spirit; he "becomes one spirit with him" (I Cor. 6:17). His physical body is therefore sacred, as a temple of the Spirit (I Cor. 6:19). Similarly, the community as a whole is a temple in which God's Spirit dwells. Strife and factions destroy the holy temple of the corporate body (I Cor. 3:16-17); and the church collectively is a structure into which its various members are built together as a "dwelling place of God in the Spirit" (Eph. 2:22).

The one Spirit is thus the ground of the church's unity as the one body of Christ in which all worldly or fleshly divisions are transcended (I Cor. 12:13; Eph. 2:18; 4:3-4). See CHURCH, IDEA OF.

Present possession of the Spirit is a guarantee and first installment of the total redemption which is to be entered into hereafter. It is the ground of Christian hope. It is the first fruits, the anticipation in part of the harvest which awaits Christians at the end (Rom. 8:23), the guarantee of the total redemption which will include the transformation of the body into a spiritual body (II Cor. 5:5). By his possession of the Spirit the believer is marked out as God's property, bearing his distinguishing mark or ownership, his "seal" by which the Christian is assured of final redemption (II Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30).

The supreme manifestation of the working of the Spirit is love (see LOVE IN THE NT). Through the gift of the Spirit, God's love is outpoured in the hearts of Christians (Rom. 5:5); and it is the source of the love which binds the Christian body together (Rom.

15:30; Col. 1:8). The panegyric on love in I Cor. 13 is intended to show that, of all the manifestations of the Spirit, love is the climax. Joy is also associated with the presence of the Spirit, even in defiance of earthly tribulations (I Thess. 1:6), and this is a mark or characteristic of the kingdom of God (Rom. 14:17). It springs from the power of the Spirit to inspire and maintain Christian hope (Rom. 15:13); for the Spirit reveals the true nature and meaning of the divine purpose (Eph. 3:5).

All Christians are thus partakers of the Spirit, who should "be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5:18) and "aglow with the Spirit" (Rom. 12:11). All have entered upon this state of life in the Spirit through acceptance of the gospel and baptism (cf. the baptismal context of Paul's teaching on the Spirit in Rom. 6–8, the baptismal allusion in I Cor. 6:11, and the explicit statement in I Cor. 12:13).

At the same time, the Spirit is manifested in certain special endowments for particular purposes. As in Luke's writings, the Spirit is the dynamic force and the guide inspiring the apostolic mission, attesting the gospel and commending it with power (Rom. 15:19; I Cor. 2:4; I Thess. 1:5), inspiring Paul himself (I Cor. 2:10) and enabling him to convey the gospel to those whom the same Spirit disposes to receive it (I Cor. 2:13-14). The Spirit characterizes his labors (II Cor. 6:6) and enables him to present his ministry to the Gentiles as a priestly offering to God (Rom. 15:16), for his converts are consecrated by the Spirit (II Thess. 2:13). It is in the consciousness of his inspiration, too, that Paul wrestles with the problem of Israel's rejection of his gospel (Rom. 9:1). The Spirit remains the Spirit of prophecy, manifested in prophesying, tongues, and ecstatic utterances (I Thess. 5:19; cf. Eph. 5:18-19). At Corinth these gifts were being cultivated in the community to excess, and in ways which led to pride and the self-righteousness of an elite of spiritually gifted persons. Hence, while Paul allows the value of prophetic and ecstatic gifts, he insists that not only these, but all forms of service in the church are equally the work of the Spirit, and that the greatest gift is love (I Cor. 12:4-31; 13). He also prefers prophecy, with its intelligible and rationally communicated utterance, to "tongues" which need a special gift of interpretation. In any case, church order is not to be disturbed by the exercise of ecstatic speech in the congregation (I Cor. 14:1-35, a passage which indicates that liturgical utterances [vss. 15-16] might be directly inspired).

g. In the Pastoral letters, Hebrews, I and II Peter, and Jude. The Pastoral letters add little to the teaching of the acknowledged Pauline letters. At I Tim. 3:16, a liturgical fragment, Christ's vindication "in the Spirit"—i.e., in respect of the operation in him of the Spirit of God—is contrasted with his manifestation in the flesh—i.e., in the conditions of his human life and death. By the Spirit prophetic guidance is available to the church (I Tim. 4:1), and the indwelling Spirit enables the truth of Christianity to be preserved inviolate (II Tim. 1:14). Regeneration and renewal in the Holy Spirit—that is to say, the new life in the Spirit—is effected for all Christians through the baptismal washing (Tit. 3:5).

The Letter to the Hebrews contains little on this subject. The Spirit speaks through the Scriptures (Heb. 3:7; 10:15), sometimes through typological interpretation of the OT (Heb. 9:8). It was through the Spirit that Christ carried out his self-offering to God (9:14); Christians become partakers of the Spirit through their baptism (6:4); apostasy is an outrage against the Spirit of grace (10:29); and the special gifts of the Spirit authenticate the church's preaching (2:4).

I Peter mentions the inspiration of the prophets to speak of Christ; they were possessed by the Spirit of Christ even under the old covenant (I Pet. 1:11). It also speaks of the sanctification of Christians by the Spirit to be the people of God (1:2). II Peter contributes a very definite affirmation of the inspiration of the OT prophecies by the Spirit: "Men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (II Pet. 1:21). Jude contrasts the worldly schismatics, who are devoid of the Spirit, with those who continue to pray in the Spirit (Jude 19-20).

h. In Johannine theology. The Johannine literature is far richer in its doctrine of the Spirit. Christ is uniquely possessed of the Spirit (John 1:32-33) as the Son and the envoy of God (cf. John 3:34). The Christian is one who experiences a new birth of the Spirit—i.e., a birth to a new life in the Spirit, contrasted with ordinary fleshly birth (3:5-8; cf. 1:13). It is a birth of water and the Spirit (3:5)—this phrase echoes the ancient imagery in which the prophets likened the action of the divine Spirit to life-giving water and which would be intended by the evangelist to indicate to his readers Christian baptism; and it denotes being born "anew," or possibly "from above" (3:3, 7), or perhaps both.

The new birth in the Spirit is not available until Christ's work is accomplished and he is glorified. The Fourth Gospel makes explicit the implication of the Synoptic narratives that "the Spirit had not been given" [lit., 'was not yet'], because Jesus was not yet glorified" (7:39). Before Christ's glorification in death and resurrection, his disciples are instructed about the coming of the Spirit, who is now spoken of in fully personal terms as the "Counselor" or "Paraclete" who is to dwell with and in them, as the Spirit of truth (14:17), mediating to them a full understanding of the meaning of Christ's person and work (14:26), and bearing witness to Christ in and through the witness of those who are Christ's followers, being sent by the glorified Christ from the Father (15:26-27). His coming, which waits upon the physical departure of Jesus, will effect judgment through declaring the vindication of Jesus, the defeat of the devil, and the exposure of those who have rejected Jesus (16:7-11). The Spirit is to be the guide into all the truth, for he will mediate Christ to believers (16:13-15). See PARACLETE.

When the Resurrection has taken place, the gift of the Spirit is bestowed on Christ's followers by his creative inbreathing (20:22), empowering them for their mission of forgiveness and judgment.

All Christians are anointed, as the people of the Spirit-possessed Messiah, with the unction of the Spirit (cf. I John 2:20). The Spirit is the assurance of Christ's indwelling presence (I John 3:24). The Spirit witnesses to the reality of Christ's incarnation, with the water and the blood of his death and of the Christian sacraments (I John 5:7-8); and the acknowledgment that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" is the criterion of the Spirit's inspiration in the church (I John 4:2). For further discussion of the Spirit in the Fourth Gospel, see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, § 4.

In Revelation the Spirit is once again the inspiration of the prophet, declaring a message through the prophet's utterances (Rev. 1:10; 2:7, etc.; 4:2; 14:13; 21:10), the prophetic Spirit being identified with the "testimony of Jesus" (19:10); and in the expectant cry of the church to its Lord, "Come," the Spirit itself is speaking (22:17).

Bibliography. H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT (1910); H. Leisegang, Pneuma Hagion (1922); E. F. Scott, The Spirit in the NT (1923); F. Buchsel, Der Geist Gottes im NT (1926); H. W. Robinson, The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (1928); F. C. Synge, "The Spirit in the Pauline Epistles," Church Quarterly Review, vol. 119, no. 237 (1934); N. H. Snaith, The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit (1937); C. Williams, The Descent of the Dove (1939); C. K. Barrett, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition (1947); G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit (1951); J. G. Davies, The Spirit, the Church and the Sacraments (1954). G. W. H. LAMPE

HOMAM hō'măm [חומם; LXX Αιμαν] (I Chr. 1: 39). A Horite in Edom. See HEMAM.

HOMER hō'mər [חמר]. A dry measure equal to ten ephahs (Ezek. 45:11), related to the Akkadian imeru, which means "ass" and is presumably the load that an ass should carry. Various estimates put its volume between 3.8 and 6.6 bushels. An equal measure was the cor.

See also WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § C4*a*.

O. R. SELLERS

HOMICIDE. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS § 3*b*.

HOMOSEXUALITY. That homosexual practices were widespread in the ancient Near East is clear from the biblical records. Sodom is notorious for its citizens' attempted homosexual assault on Lot's guests (Gen. 19:4-5; cf. Judg. 19:22; see also SODOMITE). In the legal codes homosexual relations are forbidden as an abomination worthy of death (Lev. 18: 22; 20:13). The statement that the "wages of a dog" may not be used in God's house to pay vows probably refers to sacred male PROSTITUTION (see § 3*b*). This practice in connection with foreign cults may have been one factor in the strong biblical repudiation of homosexuality. The houses of male prostitutes were destroyed by King Josiah (II Kings 23:7; cf. I Kings 14:24; 15:12; 22:46).

Homosexuals (μαλακός; KJV "effeminate") are among those condemned by Paul (I Cor. 6:9; cf. Rom. 1:27). The law is said to be laid down for the ungodly and sinners, including sodomites (I Tim. 1:10). Jude 7 recalls Sodom and Gomorrah's "unnatural lust" and its punishment. "Sex perversion, disorder in marriage, adultery" are some of the idolatrous evils denounced in Wisd. Sol. 14:26.

Bibliography. D. S. Bailey, Homosexuality and the Western Tradition (1955); W. G. Cole, Sex and Love in the Bible (1959). O. J. BAAB

HONEY [דבש, נפת; μέλι]. The honey of the Bible was of three kinds: (a) a thick grape syrup (Arabic dibs); (b) wild honey ("honey from [RSV 'out of'] the rock" [Deut. 32:13; Ps. 81:16—H 81:17]; cf. the honey found in a lion's carcass [Judg. 14:8], or in a forest [I Sam. 14:25]; cf. also the honey eaten by John the Baptist [Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6]); and (c) honey from domesticated bees (cited as a "produce of the field" in II Chr. 31:5).

Honey is called one of the necessities of life (Ecclus. 39:26) and is often mentioned in lists of foodstuffs or good things of the land (Gen. 43:11; Deut. 8:8; II Sam. 17:29; I Kings 14:3; cf. Ezek. 16:13, etc.; on the phrase "a land flowing with milk and honey," see MILK). Because honey fermented easily, it was prohibited in burnt offerings, along with leaven (Lev. 2:11); honey was widely used in sacrifices elsewhere in the ancient Near East, however.

The sweetness of honey is often used in metaphorical expressions (Judg. 14:18; Pss. 19:10—H 19: 11; 119:103; Prov. 5:3; 16:24; Ezek. 3:3; Rev. 10:9-10). For the "curds and honey" eaten by the child Immanuel (Isa. 7:15), see CURDS. See also BEE.

Bibliography. H. M. Ransome, The Sacred Bee (1937). J. F. ROSS

HONOR [usually כבוד (more often GLORY), from כבד; also גדולה, greatness, dignity; הדר and its derivatives, to prefer, to give the place of preference; הוד, weight, splendor, majesty; יקר, value; תפארת, beauty, glory; LXX δόξα; NT usually τιμάω and its derivatives; also δόξα (more often GLORY)]; PLACE OF HONOR [πρωτοκλισία]; WORTHY OF HONOR [σεμνός]; HONORABLE [καλός]. High respect, esteem, or reverence shown to, received from, or felt in regard to another person. Particularly in the OT, however, the term refers to a possession of a person, closely connected with his position in the community. The possession of valor, property, wealth, wisdom, or high position is an indication of a man's honor (Gen. 45: 13; "splendor").

Honor and GLORY are closely connected in the Bible, both terminologically and theologically. Also, in the RSV a number of instances may be noted in which "majesty," "splendor," and similar terms are used rather than "honor." Conversely, the RSV occasionally has "honor" where the KJV and other versions use other words (Gen. 30:20; I Sam. 2:8; etc.).

By far the majority of occurrences of the term "honor" in the OT refer to the honor of man. This is true largely because, as indicated above, the same words may be rendered "glory," "splendor," "majesty," etc. These latter terms have generally been selected by the translators when the reference is to God's glory or honor. Man's honor is clearly understood to be a gift of God (Pss. 8:5—H 8:6; 62:7—H 62:8; 71:21). It consists in all those gifts or blessings which extend and enhance the personality (i.e., the SOUL, נפש) of man: wealth, property, wisdom, valor. Man displays his honor through his readiness to give, to share honor with his fellows. His honor may be lost through misfortune or through disobedience to God. Those who build up honor for themselves are roundly denounced by the prophets (Isa. 1:23; Amos 5:11-12; 8:4-5; etc.). A man's honor must be employed in the maintenance of wholeness (שלום) within the life of the community. Thus honor is closely connected with justice, righteousness, and peace—key terms in the covenant vocabulary of the OT. Dishonor, accordingly, is equally closely connected with sin. Of particular importance in the OT is the honor due to father and mother (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16); this commandment also occurs six times in the NT.

The NT also uses the term "honor" primarily in reference to man. It contains numerous admonitions, however, against a person's seeking honor for himself: the place of honor at feasts (Luke 14:7-8; 20:46) or the honor one has in virtue of his office (Heb. 5:4). The Christian is urged to bestow honor freely and gladly upon those to whom honor is due (Rom. 12:10; Phil. 2:29; I Tim. 5:3; 6:1; etc.). Should he be required to suffer dishonor, this need not indicate either his faithlessness to his calling as a man or his infidelity to God. On the contrary, it may be a mark of his discipleship (II Cor. 6:8).

All glory and honor and dominion are to be conferred upon God, both because he is worthy of honor as God (I Tim. 1:17; 6:16; Rev. 4:9; 7:12) and because he is the source of all honor (II Pet. 1:17; Rev. 4:11). Jesus also has been "crowned with glory and honor because of the suffering of death" (Heb. 2:9); the Lamb who was slain is worthy "to receive power and wealth and wisdom and might and honor and glory and blessing" (Rev. 5:12-13). It is incumbent upon the Christian to "honor Christ in the body" (Phil. 1:20), to "give God the glory" (or "honor"; Acts 12:23), which apparently means to acknowledge the sovereignty and honor of the Deity (cf. Josh. 7:19). To withhold the honor due to God or to his Son is sin.

See also BLESSING; SHAME.

Bibliography. W. Caspari, Die Bedeutungen der Wortsippe כבד im Hebräischen (1908); J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I-II (1926), 213-44. W. HARRELSON

HOOK. The translation of several words:

a) וו, a gold (Exod. 26:32) or silver (27:10) hook attached to the pillars of the tabernacle. The various hangings of the tabernacle were suspended from these hooks.

b) חח, inserted in the nose (II Kings 19:28) or jaw (Ezek. 29:4) of animals (19:4-9) or captives (II Chr. 33:11). To it would be attached a rope by which the captor could lead his prisoner. In Exod. 35:22 the word refers to a type of jewelry, possibly a brooch.

c) חכה (Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15); צנה or צנ (Job 40:24; Amos 4:2); סיר דוגה (Amos 4:2): all fish hooks (see FISHING). In Job 40:24 the MT is בציניו, "with his eyes" (so KJV). The RSV reads בצנים, "with hooks."

d) שפתים (Ezek. 40:43), a word of doubtful meaning. The LXX reads "edges."

e) Ἄγκιστρον (Matt. 17:27), a fish hook. It is a general term for "hook" in classical Greek.

See also PRUNING HOOK.

Bibliography. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANEP (1954), figs. 447, 524. R. W. CORNEY

HOOPOE hōō'pōō [דוכיפת, dûkhîphath, possibly onomatopoeic; cf. דוך, to pound, beat, and cf. the hoopoe's habit of striking the ground with its beak; cf. Demotic qqpt, hoopoe; Syr. qaqûphâ, hoopoe; Vulg. upupa, hoopoe; LXX ἔποψ, hoopoe (Lev. 11:19); πορφυρίων, water hen (Deut. 14:18); Targ. (Onq.) woodcock]; KJV LAPWING. Any of a family (Upupidae) of Old World nonpasserine birds (Genus Upapa), having a head crest of erectile plumes and a long, slender, curved bill. In Tristram's time it was a summer visitor to Palestine and "tolerably common in all parts of the country." That דוכיפת designates this bird is reasonably certain. The hoopoe's search for grubs and small insects in such repulsive places as dunghills may account for its being classed among Israel's unclean birds. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HOPE. In English usage the word "hope" covers a wide range of meanings, and nowhere is this more apparent than in the Bible. In the OT "hope" is the translation of many Hebrew words, each with its own diverse associations. And in the English NT, although there are fewer Greek antecedents, these antecedents often convey an unsuspected wealth of meaning. In both OT and NT, therefore, the word "hope," whether as noun or as verb, points to ranges of experience and truth which are often missed in casual reading. To be sure, in both the OT and the NT the concept occurs in ordinary speech without significant overtones. But the predominant usage falls in theological contexts which give to the word many complex implications. In these contexts there is a high degree of continuity between the OT and the NT. The existence of hope springs from the covenants made by God with his people. Hope links together the two parties of the covenant: God is man's hope; therefore, man hopes in God. Hope is intricately involved in the total pattern of divine action and human response.

A. Hope in the OT
1. In common speech
2. In theological contexts
B. Hope in the NT
1. In common speech
2. In theological contexts
a. Paul
b. Luke-Acts
c. Hebrews
d. I Peter
e. Conclusion
Bibliography

A. HOPE IN THE OT. The words more frequently used to connote "hope" are בטח, חסה, יחל, קוה, and שבר. In the LXX these and some ten other Hebrew constructions are on occasion rendered by the Greek noun ἐλπίς and the verb ἐλπίζειν; but none of the Hebrew terms is translated exclusively thus. Other Greek renderings are πεποίθεναι ("to trust"), ὑπομένειν ("to endure"), and προσδοκᾶν ("to expect" and "to await"). In both Hebrew and Greek, the noun often accents the ground or the object of expectation, while the verb more often accents the human attitude of hoping.

1. In common speech. בטח in its various forms often bespeaks a present condition of security and prosperity, which produces a feeling of complacency and self-sufficiency. A man is at ease, fearing no threats and confident that the future will sustain his security (Judg. 18:7, 9-10, 27; Isa. 32:9-10; 47:10; Zeph. 2:15). קוה gives a stronger sense that man's fate is wholly dependent upon future contingency.

Even though a tree is cut down, it will sprout again; therefore, there is hope for it. But there is no hope for a man who dies (Job 14:7). When God cuts off a man, leaving him Sheol as his only home, man's hope is gone, because he has no future (Job 17:15; 19:10; 27:8). Conversely, so long as man has a future, he has hope (Prov. 23:18; 24:14). Very often hope indicates the confidence which one man vests in another (Judg. 9:26; Mic. 7:5), but there are men who have no hope and in whom it would be folly to trust (Prov. 26:12; 29:20). When man's confidence rests on ephemeral resources, his hopes are doomed to futility. This is true when he relies on armies and fortresses (Isa. 31:1-3; 36:4-9; Hos. 10:13), on riches (Job 31:24; Pss. 49:6-12; 52:7; Prov. 11:28), on houses (Job 18:14; Isa. 32:9-14), or on sorcery and idols (Ps. 115:4-8; Isa. 44:9-20; 47:9-15). The basic question is not whether hopes are good or bad, but whether they are futile or valid. A hope that is not firmly grounded ensures disappointment, shame, and disaster (Pss. 25:2, 20; 31:1; 71:1; Prov. 10:28; Isa. 32:9-14; Ezek. 37:11).

2. In theological contexts. The basis of ultimate confidence is therefore the chief issue facing man. Throughout the OT, God is recognized as the "hope of Israel" (Jer. 14:8). He alone makes men dwell in safety. He alone offers promises for the future which can be relied on, for his faithful and steadfast love guarantees the fulfilment of his word. By dread deeds he delivers all who take refuge in him, and thus becomes the hope (חסה) of all the ends of the earth (Pss. 65:5; 71:4-5). Many are the images which articulate this conviction that God alone provides at once the source and the object of man's trust. He is a rock which cannot be moved (Deut. 32:4, 15, 18; Pss. 18: 2, 31, 46; 62:2, 6-7; Isa. 26:4; 30:29). He is a refuge and fortress which offer ultimate security for the poor and the righteous in the midst of their affliction (Pss. 14:6; 61:3; 73:28; 91:9; 94:22; Prov. 14:26; Ezek. 34:27-28). Hope is defined, not so much by the distinct shape of specific desires and expectations, as by the fact that it springs from God's creative and sustaining power and that it moves toward a good which is congruent with that power.

With what attitudes do men respond to this God who is in himself their hope? These attitudes in their multiplicity and interdependence constitute hope as response. We may distinguish four attitudes: (a) a trust in God, through which one commits his cause to the Lord, holds fast to him, and lives in serenity and peace under his present protection (here בטח is the key word; cf. Job 11:18; Pss. 9:10; 22:8-9; 40:4; Prov. 22:19; Isa. 26:3; Jer. 17:7); (b) a ready eagerness to take refuge in him from one's foes, and to rely on him for speedy deliverance (here חסה is the key word; cf. Pss. 5:11; 7:1; 16:1; 17:7; 18:2, 30; 25:20; 36:7; 37:40); (c) the confident expectation of good, of future gladness which becomes the occasion for present rejoicing (Ps. 13:5; Prov. 10:28; 11:23); (d) a waiting in patience and courage for the Lord to bring his salvation. The recognition of delay in the promised help prompts endurance in the midst of present adversity (here יחל is the key word; cf. Pss. 31:24; 33:18-22; 38:15; 42:5, 11; 69:3; 71:12-14; 119:114-16; 130:6-8; Isa. 51:5).

Hope as a living, present bond between the God of hope and the hoping Israel thus becomes a major definition of the life of the righteous community. Because this hope cannot be reduced to specific objects of future desiring, it is not immediately destroyed by unexpected shifts in human fortunes. It frees men from anxiety, but not from the necessity for patient endurance. It is quite incompatible with the fear of human enemies, but entirely compatible with the fear of God, for this fear, too, is an expression of confidence in God as the only source of ultimate security. It gives to man's existence a future-orientation, without investing all reliance on a specific historical goal and without diminishing the source of confidence in God's mighty work in the past and the present.

B. HOPE IN THE NT. "Hope" (ἐλπίς, ἐλπίζειν) is a primary term in the NT vocabulary, appearing in all the major books, although rarely in the gospels and not at all in Revelation. (Absence of the word by no means indicates the absence of the reality.) The word appears only as a noun or verb, and never in adjectival or adverbial form, probably because the accent does not fall on subjective feelings (e.g., "hopeful," "hopefully") but on the objective alignment of forces determining the human situation. For the same reason, the noun does not invite adjectival modifiers—e.g., good or bad hopes.

1. In common speech. In fewer than one fourth of its occurrences in the NT, "hope" describes a human situation quite apart from any religious content. Here it denotes an expectation concerning the future which accords (usually) with a person's desire and serves as a basis for speech or action. In planting seed, the farmer desires and expects a harvest (I Cor. 9:10). In lending his money, the lender desires and expects a return (Luke 6:35). Paul wants and plans to send Timothy to Philippi (Phil. 2:19, 23), or he expects to visit a church soon (Rom. 15:24; cf. I Tim. 3:14; II John 12; III John 14). So strongly, however, does the accent fall on expectation rather than desire, that one can lose hope even when his desire remains (Acts 16:19; 27:20). Hope then stands or falls with the dependability of the expectation. The basis of expectation thus becomes the decisive constituent of hope. It is with this basis that the theological use of the word primarily deals.

2. In theological contexts. Here "hope" involves all facets of the manifold relationships of God and his people. God is the author and source of hope, its sustaining power, and its unseen yet certain object. Each of these relations is subject to multiple and varied articulation. But common to all is the conviction that because hope is God-grounded, God-sustained, and God-directed, hope is a reality within which men may dwell. Hope is simultaneously the response among his people to his activity among them. As a description of this response, hope is expectation expressed in faith, confidence, patience, endurance, and eagerness. Different writers stress different features of this complex but living structure.

a.* Paul. To Paul, God is the source and ground of hope, the "God of hope" (Rom. 15:13). One may correctly infer from the remarkable statement in Rom. 8:20 that it is God who in hope subjects creation to futility. Hope rests upon God's calling and upon his PROMISE (Rom. 4:17-21). This explains why there can be but one hope (Eph. 4:4). The gospel, which proclaims one promise and one calling, mediates hope (Col. 1:23). The hope which constitutes the ground of faith's expectancy is so objectively certain that it is virtually synonymous with the destiny promised by God, the inheritance to which God's people are called (Rom. 5:2; 12:12; Eph. 1:18; Col. 1:23; I Thess. 5:8).

The power to hope is conveyed from God to men through the Holy Spirit, which dwells in their hearts (Rom. 5:5; 15:13; Gal. 5:5). It is synonymous with the living, indwelling Christ, who is "in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). Just as the new life of believers is constituted simultaneously by their living in Christ and by Christ's living in them, so too their hope is in Christ, and their hope is Christ active in them. As the "first fruits" of the Spirit, hope is the assurance of the full harvest (Rom. 8:23-30; Eph. 1:13).

The object hoped for in Paul's thought is everywhere the continuation and completion of this work of Father, Son, and Spirit. This completion, although a single end, is capable of flexible description: "sharing the glory of God" (Rom. 5:2); the "glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. 8:21); the "redemption of our bodies" (Rom. 8:23); "righteousness" (Gal. 5:5); "being changed into his likeness" (II Cor. 3:12-18); acquiring possession of the inheritance (Eph. 1:14).

As a human response to God's activity, hope is for Paul closely associated with unshakable confidence (Rom. 4:18; 5:5), with rejoicing (Rom. 5:2; 12:12), with steadfast endurance (Rom. 5:4; 8:25; 12:12; I Thess. 1:3), with boldness (II Cor. 3:12; Phil. 1:20), with freedom (Rom. 8:21; Gal. 5:5), with peace (Rom. 5:1; 12:13; Eph. 2:13 ff), and with love (I Cor. 13:7). Noteworthy is the frequent appearance of the famous triad: faith, hope, love (Rom. 5:1-5; I Cor. 13; Eph. 4:1-6; I Thess. 1:3; 5:8), not as separate virtues, but as mutual, interacting gifts of the Spirit. Also noteworthy is the recognition of the mysterious, paradoxical, and "offensive" character of hope in Christ. Faith exhibits a confidence which is strengthened, not weakened, by the apparent impossibility of the promise (Rom. 4:16-25). Hope is conveyed only by the Spirit and deals with "what no eye has seen" (I Cor. 2:9-16). It thrives on trials, and on the experience of sufferings (Rom. 5:1-5; 8:17; 12:12; II Cor. 1:3-7). In hope, the church participates in the futility and bondage of the whole creation, where the sons of God are conspicuous by their weakness as well as by their patience (Rom. 8:18-27). Hope derives its inner structure from the victory over death wrought in the death-resurrection of Jesus Christ (I Cor. 15; I Thess. 4). Finally, it should be noted that hope is at once corporate and personal, both in its source in God and in its manifestation in men. It is coextensive with the covenant, the promise, the calling, by which the existence of God's people is sustained. The hope of Abraham has archetypal validity for all Abraham's true descendants. Gentiles who through Christ are united to the commonwealth of Israel receive the hope which is embodied in the "covenants of promise" (Eph. 2:12). In Christ as the new Adam, the "one man," God offers "acquittal and life" to all men and thus includes all creation within the scope of redemption (Rom. 5–8; I Cor. 15). Those who share the life of this new Man are bound together into one hope.

b. Luke-Acts. Luke uses "hope" in its theological context less frequently, and with a less complex and subtle cluster of associations. Hope is quite simply the desire and expectation of a Messiah who will redeem Israel (Luke 24:21). This expectation, so prominent in Israel, was the reason for the disciples' loyalty to Jesus, and consequently the reason for their despair at his death. Although the Cross seemed to demonstrate the frustration of this hope, visitation from the risen Lord brought the certainty of its fulfilment.

This fulfilment was not, however, realized apart from the work of the risen Lord in "opening the Scriptures" and in opening the disciples' eyes (Luke 24:31-32). For Luke, the ultimate ground of hope is God (Acts 24:15), whose promise to the fathers is fulfilled in the resurrection of Jesus Christ (Acts 26:6-7). Faith in this resurrection had given David assurance of a destiny which enabled him to "dwell in hope" (Acts 2:26). The apostle Paul was attacked by Jews and placed on trial before the Romans because of his confident proclamation that God's fulfilment of his promise in the resurrection of the dead is nothing less than the vindication of Israel's hope (Acts 24:15; 26:6-7). Paul's defense of this hope stands or falls with the credibility of God's exaltation of Jesus from the dead (Acts 26:8).

It is through the Resurrection and the Ascension that the promised Holy Spirit is given, and this Spirit enables men to see what prophets and kings had long hoped to see—the overcoming of death by life (Acts 2:16-36) through the coming of the Messiah. In Acts the link between the OT and the new era is constituted by the one promise and the one hope. The opposition between the apostles and the Jews (not Israel) developed over the resurrection of Jesus, which in fulfilment of the promise constitutes the "hope of Israel" (Acts 28:20).

c. Hebrews. It is characteristic of Hebrews to use an article with ἐλπίς, "the hope," and thus to stress, not the subjective manifestation, but the objective ground and goal. Here, as throughout the Bible, the hope is grounded firmly on the covenant promise and oath of God: "He who promised is faithful" (10:23; cf. 6:16-18; 7:20-21).

Also stressed is the conviction that because Jesus is its surety, this is a better promise and a better covenant. The covenant is now supported by the "power of an indestructible life," and hence the corresponding hope is a better one (7:16-19). The superiority is seen in the twin facts (a) that the Day is now drawing near (10:25) and (b) that today we can draw near to God.Those who now share the wilderness wandering can also enter today the promised rest (4:1-3). Those who now constitute the temple, and the house of God, now have access through the veil into the Holy of holies (6:19-20). The process of entering, however, is a continuous one—of moving toward the End as the pilgrim or the runner (11:1-12:3). "Things hoped for" are there now behind the veil to be manifested in the coming Day. They are unseen but nonetheless real. The substance of things hoped for is witnessed to by such faith as that of Abel, Enoch, Noah, and Abraham.

This faith (the subjective appropriation of the objective hope) is variously described and fully illustrated: the confident and obedient heart, the opposite of the hard hearts which induced the Israelites to reject Moses in the wilderness (3:6-19); the courageous and patient endurance, far removed from apathy and sluggishness, by which Abraham obtained the promise (6:11-18); the unwavering and untiring confession, supported by love and good works, which all pilgrims of faith have demonstrated (10:23–12:3). The hope which is set before men produces and vindicates the faith by which they seize it.

It is because Jesus is the surety of the promise that he is also pioneer and perfecter of faith (12:2). His faithful obedience unto death thus becomes the mediator of the new covenant and the supreme example of how to lay hold of the better hope. Because of his entrance as priest into the Holy of holies, our hope is located where he is. Being there, it serves as a perfect anchor of the soul (6:19). Men cannot see the anchor, but by faith they grasp it (11:1).

d. I Peter. "Hope" is a salient word in I Peter, which has rightly been called the letter of hope. The central motifs of NT thought here receive succinct and lucid explication. Hope is a mark of rebirth through God's mercy (1:3). The new life is participation in the resurrection of Jesus Christ; therefore, hope is the power of this life. Birth into hope is birth into an inheritance which comprises both the coming salvation and the present status as heirs. Hope is both present and future in the same sense that the revelation of God's glory is present and future (1:13, 21). It is the eschatological gift which now enables men to depend wholly on the coming glory (1:13, 20). The source and sustainer of this confident and patient expectancy is God (1:21). Hope is man's way of reverencing Christ as Lord (3:15). The Christian's hope not only marks the boundary between his former and his new life; it also marks the boundary with the world. Hope, in fact, is the issue at stake in persecution (cf. Acts; Hebrews). It is something to be confessed, defended, explained on the witness stand. The defense which best conforms to the hope employs gentleness, courage, forgiveness, and reverence (3:10-16). As in Paul, the prime corollaries of hope are faith, joy, and love (1:3-9). Hope is that expectation of the coming grace which is manifested by sober obedience and holiness.

e. Conclusion. As in the OT, so in the NT, no single word is sufficient for expressing the reality of hope. E.g., the word ἐλπίς rarely occurs in the Synoptic gospels, yet there is no diminution of hope. Here God's promise and gift of his kingdom is assumed to be the ground and object of man's expectation. The message and work of Jesus are described as the answer to man's longing for redemption (among the key words are προσδοκᾶν and προσδέχεσθαι; Matt. 11:3; Mark 15:43; Luke 2:25, 38; 3:15; 7:19-20; 12:36, 46; 23:51). Everywhere Jesus commands his disciples to seek first God's kingdom, surrendering all other desires and claims. He requires of them constant alertness (γρηγορεῖν; Mark 13:34-35; 14:34-38; Luke 12:37) and patient endurance (ὑπομένειν; Matt. 10:22; Luke 8:15; 21:19).

So, too, in the book of Revelation, the relationship of the Messiah to his people is full of hope, even though the word is absent. He is the ALPHA AND OMEGA, the victorious King, who promises to those who conquer full participation in his sovereignty. This promise elicits a loyalty which takes the form of keen expectancy, of continual wakefulness (Rev. 3:2-3; 16:15), and of unwearying patience (2:2, 19; 3:10). To share in Jesus and his kingdom is inseparable from accepting his affliction and endurance (1:9). Such endurance is an essential component of faith (13:10; 14:12). Thus throughout the Bible, the thought of hope fuses together the reality of God as the source and goal of expectation and the totality of faith's response: trust, eagerness, patient endurance, and joyful assurance.

Bibliography. A. Pott, Das Hoffen im NT (1915); M. A. C. Warren, Truth of Vision (1948); J. Daniélou, Advent (1950); J. A. T. Robinson, In the End, God (1950); J. Marsh, Fullness of Time (1952); C. F. D. Moule, Meaning of Hope (1953); Advisory Commission, World Council of Churches, Christ, Hope of the World (1954); E. Brunner, Eternal Hope (1954); J. E. Fison, Christian Hope (1954); P. S. Minear, Christian Hope and the Second Coming (1954); J. A. T. Robinson, Jesus and His Coming (1957).

P. S. MINEAR

HOPHNI AND PHINEHAS hŏf'nī, fĭn'ĭ əs [חפני, tadpole, from Egyp. ḥfn(r); פנחס, פינחס, the Negro, from Egyp. pə nḥśj]. The two sons of Eli who with him were priests of Yahweh at Shiloh (I Sam. 1:3). The narrative calls them "sons of Belial" (i.e., worthless, utterly depraved; see BELIAL) and tells how they "had no regard for the LORD" (2:12): they "treated the offering of the LORD with contempt" (vs. 17). They took meat as they liked for themselves before the sacrifice was offered to God; and whenever a man who was sacrificing protested, they threatened to carry through their wishes by force if necessary (vss. 13-16). A later hand accentuated their abuse of the priestly office by saying that they lay with women who served at the sanctuary (vs. 22*b*). They ignored Eli's rebuke, and Eli did not reform them (vss. 22-25; 3:13). Because of their unchecked sin the doom of the house of Eli was declared by an unidentified man of God (2:27-36, probably a late insertion to give divine sanction to the Zadokites as the only legitimate priests; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES) and by Samuel (3:11-18). Hophni and Phinehas accompanied the ARK OF THE COVENANT to the battlefield at Aphek (4:4) and were slain in the disastrous battle with the Philistines (vss. 11, 17). When the news came to Shiloh, Eli died (vs. 18), and the wife of Phinehas gave birth prematurely to Ichabod (vss. 19-22). The genealogy in 14:3 (which makes Phinehas the grandfather of the Ahijah who accompanied the ark in the reign of Saul) is intrusive, and connection by means of a brother is unusual in a genealogy. Like 2:27-36 and perhaps from the same hand, 14:3*a* probably is an interpolation designed to place all the priests of this period under the rejection of the house of Eli in favor of the Zadokites.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 63; G. Caird, Exegesis of I Samuel, IB, II (1953), 887, 950; L. Koehler and W. Baumgartner, eds., Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti Libros (1953), pp. 321, 759.

T. M. MAUCH

HOPHRA hŏf'rə [חפרע, from Egyp. w'ḥ-ib-r', the heart of (the sun-god) Ra endures; LXX Οὐαφρῆ;

Herodotus 'Απρίης]. A pharaoh (588-569 B.C.) of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty. Jeremiah (44:30) prophesied that he was to suffer the same fate at the hands of his enemies as Zedekiah had suffered at the hands of Nebuchadrezzar.

Hophra succeeded his father, Psammetichus, and ruled at Saïs in the Delta. Early in his reign he invaded Palestine and Phoenicia, and he incited Zedekiah to revolt against Babylon (Jer. 37:5). After this revolt failed and Nebuchadrezzar took Jerusalem, Hophra received a few Jewish refugees, including Jeremiah, into the Delta town of Tahpanhes, probably Daphnae (43:7). Hophra's rule was marked by the use of Greek mercenaries in unwise military expeditions. Finally a young relative, Amasis, was proclaimed king in opposition to Hophra in 569 B.C. Hophra tried to defeat Amasis in a campaign in 566, but was killed, in conformance with Jeremiah's prophecy.

Bibliography. Cambridge Ancient History, II (1925), 213-15, 301-3; 399-401; P. G. Elgood, The Later Dynasties of Egypt (1951), pp. 95-102. J. A. WILSON

HOPPING LOCUST; KJV CANKERWORM. See LOCUST § 1*d.*

HOR hôr [הר, hōr, mountain(?); always הר ההר, hōr hā-hār, Mount Hor—lit., Hor, the mountain]. 1. A mountain on the border of Edom where, according to one tradition, Aaron died and was buried (Num. 20:22; 21:4; 33:37; Deut. 32:50). On the other hand, Deut. 10:6, following another tradition, states that he died and was buried at Moserah.

Josephus identifies Mount Hor with one of the mountains in the vicinity of Petra (Antiq. IV.iv.7). Tradition has localized it on Jebel Harun, the mountain of Aaron, which is a 4,800-foot twin-topped sandstone mountain, the highest and the most rugged in Edom's mountain range.* On the summit of Jebel Harun is a tomb allegedly belonging to Aaron, the upper part of which is a Mohammedan mosque. The tomb, however, is probably a rebuilt Christian church from the period of Emperor Justinian (527-65). Fig. HOR 31.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

31. Traditional site of Mount Hor, Jebel Harun, the highest peak in Edom

This tradition, which places Hor in the midst of Edomite territory, and not on its border (Num. 20:22), is open to serious doubts. Since Edom denied Israel's request for permission to pass through its territory, and implemented this denial with a strong military border force (Num. 20:17-21; Deut. 2:8), Israel could not have reached Jebel Harun without crossing Edom. Jebel Madurah, a place ca. fifteen miles from Kadesh, has been suggested as the most likely site for Hor. Its topography is also such that the impressive ceremony of transferring the high-priestly office from father to son (Num. 20:22-29) could be performed "in the sight of all the congregation," while Jebel Harun is both too high and too inaccessible for people to witness what happened on its top. However, the data are insufficient to make the identification of Hor certain.

2. Another mountain peak called by the same name (Num. 34:7-8). It was to mark the N limit of Israel's inheritance. It was probably some prominent peak in the Lebanon Mountain Range. Both Mount Hermon and Jebel Akkar, a NE spur of Lebanon, have been suggested as the possible location for this second Mount Hor.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Researches in Palestine (1841), II, 651-53; E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus (1872), pp. 364-65; C. Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea (1884), pp. 127-39; H. Bauer, "Die hebräischen Eigennamen als sprachliche Erkenntnisquelle," ZAW, 48 (1930), 74; E. G. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 118-19. J. L. MIHELIC

HORAM hôr'ăm [הרם] (Josh. 10:33). A king of Gezer, defeated and slain when he tried to relieve the victorious siege of Lachish by Joshua.

HOREB, MOUNT. See SINAI, MOUNT.

HOREM hôr'ĕm [חרם, sacred] (Josh. 19:38). A fortified town in the territory of Naphtali. The context indicates that it was in the hill country of N Galilee, but the exact site is unknown.

HORESH hôr'ĕsh [חרש, forest] (I Sam. 23:15-19); KJV A (THE) WOOD. A place in the Wilderness of Ziph at which David hid from Saul for a time, and the scene of a compact between David and Jonathan; usually identified with Khirbet Khoreisa, ca. 1⅔ miles from Tell Ziph and ca. 6 miles S of Hebron. V. R. GOLD

HOR-HAGGIDGAD hôr'hə gĭd'găd [חר הגדגד, hole or cavern of Gidgad]; KJV HOR-HAGIDGAD. Alternately: GUDGODAH gŭd gō'də [גדגדה] (Deut. 10:7). A stopping place of the Israelites in the wilderness. In Num. 33:31-33 the order of travel is Moseroth, Bene-jaakan, Hor-haggidgad, Jotbathah; whereas in Deut. 10:6-7 it is Beeroth Bene-jaakan, Moserah, Gudgodah, Jotbathah.

It has been proposed, but is phonetically not probable, that the site might be identified with Wadi Ghadaghed, a stream which flows into Wadi Jerafeh, which in turn empties itself into Wadi el-Jeib in the region of Arabah. J. L. MIHELIC

HORI hôr'ī [חרי, LXX Χορρι (1 below); חורי, LXX Σουρι (2 below); see HORITES]. 1. The first son of Lotan; ancestor of a Horite subclan in Edom (Gen. 36:22; I Chr. 1:39).

2. The father of Shaphat, a Simeonite (Num. 13:5). L. HICKS

HORITE hôr'īt [חרי, plural חרים, with the article]. 1. In the MT, a name specialized for the early population of Seir, the country later occupied by the Edomites (Gen. 14:6; Deut. 2:12, 22). In one passage, moreover (Gen. 36:2), the MT reading "Hivite" is plainly a textual error for "Horite" (cf. vs. 20).

2. The LXX reads "Horites" for "HIVITES" in Gen. 34:2; Josh. 9:7; both these passages deal with inhabitants of Central Palestine, as distinct from the MT "Horites." Conversely, the LXX reads Ευαῖοι, "Hivites," in Isa. 17:9, where the MT has החרש, evidently a corruption of החרי, "the Horites." The land involved here is Palestine proper. It follows that these Horites-Hivites are not to be confused with the pre-Edomite Horites—a fact still apparent to the LXX, and not unknown to earlier Hebrew tradition. Such W Horites have to be connected with the extrabiblical HURRIANS. In local usage they were more commonly designated as Hivites.

There are two valid reasons for separating Horites 1 above from Hurrians: (a) Their personal names (Gen. 36:20-30) do not conform to Hurrian patterns, but are instead Semitic; (b) there is no archaeological evidence whatever for Hurrian settlements in Edom, or in Transjordan in general. Consequently, the dual use of the term "Horite" must be ascribed (just as in the case of Cush) to accidental similarity in sound. When referring to the Horites of the MT, the Hebrew term is Semitic in origin, probably "cave-dweller," as tradition has explained it all along. In its other use, the word goes back to Hurrian (stem ḫuru or ḫurw). The need for maintaining a distinction between the two usages led to gradual disuse of "Horite" in the sense of "Hurrian" and the eventual replacement of that doublet by "Hivite."

Bibliography. E. Meyer, Die Israeliten und deren Nachbarstämme (1906); E. A. Speiser, AASOR (1933), pp. 26-31. E. A. SPEISER

HORMAH hôr'mə [חרמה, devotion]. A city of Simeon in the S of Judah in the neighborhood of Ziklag (Josh. 15:30; 19:4; I Chr. 4:30). The meaning of the name is ambiguous, as it may mean "the greatest sanctity" or "complete destruction" as a burnt offering to a deity. According to one story the Israelites, after the return of the spies and the doom pronounced on their generation, made a desperate and futile attempt to invade the hill country and were beaten back as far as Hormah (Num. 14:45; Deut. 1:44). In these passages Hormah may be used anachronistically to indicate the exact place, or a Canaanite city of that name may have been in existence at the time. Another account, however, derives the name of the place from the fact that the Israelites, annoyed by the attacks of the king of Arad, turned and devastated the region and called it Hormah (Num. 21:3). Finally, there is a statement that the tribes of Judah and Simeon joined to destroy the city of ZEPHAT, which they renamed Hormah (Judg. 1:17). The city is also included in the list of kings conquered by Joshua (Josh. 12:14), but this list is a summation of all the Israelite conquests in W Canaan. It was one of the cities to which David sent some of the spoil from the defeat of the Amalekites, apparently because of hospitality to him while he was an outcast (I Sam. 30:30).

Opinions as to the probable location of Hormah vary according to the possible direction of the Israelite attack as related in Num. 21. If it came from the S, the most likely site would be Tell el-Milh, ca. seven miles E of Beer-sheba. If it came from the SW, the logical place would be Tell esh-Sheri'ah, ca. twelve miles NW of that city. S. COHEN

HORN. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

HORNET [צרעה, depression, discouragement; Arab. ḍar'a, be abased]. An insect of the order Hymenoptera; actually a WASP, but larger and more dangerous. The species most common in Palestine is the large, yellow, red-brown Vespa orientalis. Like the ant and the bee, the hornet is a social insect with specialized phases (male drones, queen, workers). The Vespa orientalis is the most important enemy of the honeybee, for whose workers it lies in ambush near the hives, and whose hives, if unprotected, it invades and destroys. Hornets of the tropical species are easily aroused and sting anyone disturbing them. A colony lives in a many-celled nest, usually suspended from a branch, and made of a kind of paper manufactured from bits of wood rasped off by the workers. By the end of the season as many as ten thousand hornets may inhabit such a nest.

The biblical passages which contain צרעה (Exod. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12) all refer to a divine intervention on Israel's behalf in driving out the inhabitants of Canaan. Koehler (Koehler-Baumgartner, Lexicon) does not recognize "hornet" as being a possible translation, accepting rather "depression" or "discouragement," from צרע, "be abased" (contrast FAUNA § F4*b*); but the fierce nature of this insect, as well as its habit of paralyzing its prey before sucking out its vital fluids, is well suited to the context. Interpreted as a metaphor, Yahweh's preparatory onslaught would so numb the Canaanites that they would be unable to defend themselves against the Hebrew tribes. It indicates that Yahweh played as much the decisive role in the conquest of Canaan as he had in the exodus from Egypt. W. W. FRERICHS

HORONAIM hôr'ə nā'əm [חרונים, חרנים, probably two caves, holes]. A town of Moab, mentioned with other Moabite cities in the oracles against Moab (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:3, 34). It was apparently at the foot of a descent (Jer. 48:5), but its exact location is uncertain. Mesha fought against Hauronen (חורנן; see MOABITE STONE) and took it. Alexander Janneus (103-76) took Oronain ('Ωρωναίν) with other cities from the Arabs, but Hyrcanus restored them to Aretas (Jos. Antiq. XIII.xv.4; XIV.i.4).

In II Sam. 13:34 the RSV translates "from the Horonaim road" for the Hebrew "from the road behind him." The reference is probably to Upper and

Lower BETH-HORON, "Horonaim" being understood as a dual form of Horon. E. D. GROHMAN

HORONITE hôr'ə nīt [החרני, citizen of Horonaim, or more probably of Beth-horon]. An epithet used with the name of Sanballat, who opposed Nehemiah in the restoration of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10, 19; 13:28).

HORSE. The horse played an increasing part in war, travel, and hunting in the Near East from the middle of the second millennium B.C. and in Israel from the time of Solomon.

1. Words for "horse"
2. Introduction in the Near East
3. Uses
   a. In war
   b. In transportation
   c. In hunting
   d. As food
   e. In threshing
   f. In the cult
4. Trade in horses
5. Care and equipment
6. Characteristics and actions
7. Comparisons and figurative references
8. Supernatural horses
   a. In the OT
   b. In the Apoc.
   c. In the NT

Bibliography

1. Words for "horse." Hebrew words meaning "horse" are:

a) סוס (138 times; e.g., Gen. 47:17); the feminine, סוסה, occurs in Song of S. 1:9 (RSV "mare"; KJV "horses").

b) פרש (Isa. 28:28 [text doubtful]; Joel 2:4 [RSV "horses"]; Ezek. 27:14 [RSV "war horses"]). In these cases the KJV translates "horsemen," the more common meaning. In II Sam. 1:6, בעלי הפרשים (lit. "possessors of horses") is translated "horsemen."

c) אביר (Judg. 5:22 [RSV "steeds"; KJV "mighty ones," the root meaning]; Jer. 8:16 [RSV "stallions"; KJV "strong ones"]; Jer. 47:3 [RSV "stallions"; KJV "bulls"]).

d) רכש (I Kings 4:28—H 5:8 [RSV "swift steeds"; KJV "dromedaries"]; Esth. 8:10, 14 [RSV "swift horses"; KJV "mules"]; Mic. 1:13 [RSV "steeds"; KJV "swift beast"]).

e) בני הרמכים (Esth. 8:10 [RSV "bred from the royal stud"; KJV "young dromedaries"]; lit. "the offspring of the swift mares").

The Greek word ἵππος, "horse," appears in Jas. 3:3 and 14 times in Revelation (e.g., 6:2).

2. Introduction in the Near East. The horse was probably first domesticated in the steppes of S Russia and Central Asia. The commonest Hebrew word for "horse," סוס, sûs, and its Akkadian and Egyptian cognates (sīsū and ssm.t, śśm.t) seem to be of Aryan origin. Horses are not included among the animals of the Hebrew patriarchs in the early second millennium B.C. Horses are mentioned in the Cappadocian Tablets (nineteenth century B.C.), but not so frequently as asses. The Aryan Mitanni introduced the two-wheeled battle chariot with war horses into N Mesopotamia in the eighteenth century B.C. About the same time the Kassites, using horses and chariots, gained control of Babylonia. During the Hyksos period (eighteenth-sixteenth centuries B.C.) the horse and the chariot came into Egypt. Amarna letters of the fourteenth century B.C. indicate that horses were then used in Palestine. Cavalry, introduced by the Medes and Cimmerians, was employed in Mesopotamia from the twelfth century B.C. onward. Fig. CAM 6.

3. Uses. In the ancient Near East the horse was used for war, for transportation and hunting by the wealthy, but not for agriculture and very little for bearing or pulling burdens.

a. In war. The majority of the biblical references to the horse are connected with war.

The Bible refers to the war horses with chariots of the Egyptians (Exod. 14:9), the Canaanites (Judg. 5:22), the Syrians (I Kings 20:1), the Assyrians (Isa. 5:28), the Chaldeans (Jer. 4:13), and the Medes and Chaldeans (Nah. 3:2). War horses were ridden by the Philistines (II Sam. 1:6), the Syrians (I Kings 20:20), the Medes and Persians (Jer. 50:42), the soldiers of Magog (Ezek. 38:4), and the Romans (Acts 23:23, 32). The enemies of God in the last times will use horses (Zech. 14:15; Rev. 19:18). The Egyptians and Assyrians have left many reliefs of their war horses and chariots. Figs. CAM 6; CHA 24-25; GAZ 12.

There was considerable opposition to the horse in Israel as a symbol of pagan luxury and dependence on physical power for defense. Moses (Deut. 17:16) and Samuel (I Sam. 8:11) warned Israel that a king might multiply horses for pleasure and for war like the pagans. Psalmists (Pss. 20:7—H 20:8; 33:17) and prophets (Isa. 31:1; Ezek. 17:15) condemned trusting in horses rather than in the Lord for victory. As a sign of the peacefulness of the messianic kingdom, the king comes riding on an ass, not a horse, and chariots and war horses are to be abolished (Zech. 9:9-10).

In the face of this opposition, it is not surprising that the introduction of the war horse in Israel was gradual. Following divine instructions, Joshua hamstrung the horses of the Canaanites (Josh. 11:6, 9). David hamstrung most of the horses captured from Zobah, but kept enough for a hundred chariots (II Sam. 8:4). Solomon is reported to have had variously forty thousand and four thousand stalls for his horses (I Kings 4:26; II Chr. 9:25; see STALLS). King Ahab's horses are mentioned in I Kings 18:5, and records of Shalmaneser III state that Ahab furnished two thousand chariots in the coalition against Assyria. Jehoshaphat of Judah also had war horses, presumably with chariots (I Kings 22:4; II Kings 3:7). With irony Rabshakeh, the Assyrian general, offered Hezekiah two thousand horses, if the latter could furnish riders, knowing that Judah did not have so many horsemen (II Kings 18:23). Sennacherib's annals list many horses among the booty taken from the cities of Judah, and this is illustrated by a relief, originally in Nineveh, showing a chariot and horses from Lachish.

b. In transportation. The horse furnished transportation for royalty, nobility, and the wealthy in the ancient Near East. As a sign of honor, Joseph rode in Pharaoh's second horse-drawn chariot (Gen. 41:43). Absalom made a display by riding in a horse-drawn chariot (II Sam. 15:1). Naaman traveled from Syria with horses and chariots to visit Elisha in Israel (II Kings 5:9). Horses were used to transport the body of Amaziah to Jerusalem (II Kings 14:20). Horses became so common in Jerusalem that the royal palace had a special horse gate (II Chr. 23:15), and a gate of the city was called the Horse Gate (Neh. 3:28; Jer. 31:40). Jer. 17:25; 22:4 promise that Davidic kings would continue riding in chariots and princes on horses, on condition of national obedience. Isa. 66:20 predicts that the exiles would return on horses, and the Jews returning under Zerubbabel had 736 horses (Ezra 2:66). A postexilic prophet sees even the horses of the messianic kingdom as holy to the Lord (Zech. 14:20). The important place of the horse in Persian society is illustrated by Mordecai's honor of riding the royal horse (Esth. 6:8-11).* Egyptian, Assyrian, and Persian reliefs show the king riding in a horse-drawn chariot on state occasions. Fig. OX 18.

c. In hunting. The only biblical mention of hunting by horse is Job 39:18, with reference to the ostrich. Hunting by kings in chariots (Egypt, Assyria) or on horseback (Assyria) was depicted in reliefs (Assyria) and paintings (Egypt).

d. As food. The eating of horse meat was forbidden by the principle of the Mosaic law in Lev. 11:4. II Kings 7:13 may imply that horses were eaten in Samaria during a siege.

e. In threshing. As it stands, Isa. 28:28 refers to the use of horses in threshing grain, but the text and interpretation of the verse are uncertain.

f. In the cult. Among the reforms of Josiah was the removal of the horses and chariots which his idolatrous predecessors had dedicated to the sun (II Kings 23:11). These may have been used in religious processions. With the Babylonian sun-god, Shamash, were associated a charioteer and presumably a chariot and horses. Helios, the Greek sun-god, was also represented in poem (Homeric Hymns III.69) and in sculpture (E pediment of the Parthenon) as riding in a chariot with horses.

4. Trade in horses. According to Gen. 47:17, Joseph gave the people of Egypt grain in exchange for their horses. One of Solomon's commercial ventures was the selling of horses from Egypt and from Kue—i.e., Cilicia (not KJV "linen yarn"), at the rate of 150 shekels of silver (I Kings 10:28). The Tyrians secured horses and war horses for trade from Beth-togarmah (Ezek. 27:14), in Armenia, also a source of horses for Mesopotamia.

5. Care and equipment. The words translated "bred from the royal stud" (Esth. 8:10) mean literally "offspring of swift mares" and may indicate breeding for speed. Solomon kept horses in stalls and fed them barley and straw (I Kings 4:26, 28—H 5:6, 8), the food of modern Arab horses. In MEGIDDO there have been found stalls and feeding troughs from Solomon's time sufficient for about 450 horses. A horse's harness (Jer. 46:4) might consist of a bridle (Ps. 32:9) and a bit (Jas. 3:3), and sometimes a saddlecloth was used (Ezek. 27:20). Bells were attached to the harness as decoration (Zech. 14:20). A whip was used to urge on a horse (Prov. 26:3).

6. Characteristics and actions. Some of the characteristics of the horse noted in the Bible are: swiftness (Jer. 4:13; Hab. 1:8); strength (Job 39:19; Ps. 147:10); neighing when excited by sexual urge (Jer. 5:8) or by battle (Jer. 8:16); stamping (Jer. 47:3); leaping (Job 39:20); sure-footedness (Isa. 63:13); hardness of hoof (Isa. 5:28); inability to run on rocks (Amos 6:12); need of a bridle for restraint (Ps. 32:9); and stubbornness when unbroken (Ecclus. 30:8). The Bible's most detailed and animated description of the horse is in Job 39:19-25.

7. Comparisons and figurative references. The characteristics of the horse are the basis for comparisons and figurative references to it in the poetical and prophetic books of the Bible. Men should not be like horses in need of the restraint of a bridle (Ps. 32:9). A damsel is compared in beauty to a mare of Pharaoh (Song of S. 1:9). The Israelites in the desert were like horses in not stumbling (Isa. 63:13). Evil men of Jerusalem lust for their neighbors' wives like neighing stallions (Jer. 5:8). The wicked go their way like a horse plunging into battle (Jer. 12:5). The rejoicing of the Chaldeans over plunder is like the neighing of stallions (Jer. 50:11; the number of references to the horse in Jeremiah is noteworthy). The sexuality of stallions is a picture of the evils of Egyptian idoltary (Ezek. 23:20). Locusts are compared to horses in appearance and in running (Joel 2:4). As it is unnatural for horses to run on rocks, so the people have perverted justice into poison (Amos 6:12). The Lord rides a chariot with horses, figures of power and majesty (Hab. 3:8, 15). God will make Judah like a triumphant war horse (Zech. 10:3). The supernatural locusts of judgment are compared to horses in appearance and to chariots with horses in sound (Rev. 9:7, 9).

8. Supernatural horses. a. In the OT. Elijah is taken up to heaven by a chariot and horses of fire (II Kings 2:11). The eyes of Elisha's servant are opened to see chariots and horses of fire around them (II Kings 6:17). In a vision Zechariah sees angelic horsemen on horses of different colors (red, sorrel, and white) who patrol the earth (Zech. 1:8). In Zech. 6:2-3, 6, the prophet sees four chariots with red, black, white, and dappled horses respectively. Here the colors of the horses seem to be associated with the four directions.

b. In the Apoc. According to II Macc. 3:25, the Seleucid chancellor Heliodorus, when about to rob the temple in Jerusalem, was attacked by a supernatural horseman. When Antiochus made his second attack on Egypt, heavenly horsemen are said to have been observed in the sky over Jerusalem (II Macc. 5:2-3). Five heavenly horsemen are said to have aided Judas in fighting against the Seleucids (II Macc. 10:29).

c. In the NT. In Rev. 6:2, 4-5, 8, the colors of the four horses are symbolic of the judgments inflicted on the earth by their riders: white = conquest, red = slaughter, black = famine, pale = death. Judgment is also executed by cavalry with supernatural horses with teeth like lions and serpentlike tails (Rev. 9:17, 19). Christ and his hosts ride to victory on white horses (Rev. 19:11, 14, 19, 21). See FAUNA § A1*a*.

Bibliography. B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, I (1920), 61, 87, 92-93, 218, 259, 295, 333. A. Erman and H. Ranke, Aegypten und aegyptisches Leben im Altertum (1923), pp. 583-86, 615. B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, II (1925), 318, 412, 427. S. Bodenheimer, Animal Life in Palestine (1935), pp. 126-28. M. Hilzheimer, "The Evolution of the Domestic Horse," Antiquity, IX (1935), 133-39. H. G. May, "Some Aspects of Solar Worship at Jerusalem," ZAW, XIV (1937), 269-81. A.-G. Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique, I (1939), 284-85, 337-38. E. D. Van Beuren, The Fauna of Ancient Mesopotamia as Represented in Art, Analecta Orientalia, XVIII (1939), 28-34. J. Wiesner, Fahren und Reiten in Alteuropa und im Alten Orient, Der Alte Orient, Band XXXVIII, Heft 2-4 (1939). W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942), pp. 139, 213. A.-G. Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique, II (1953), 89-91, 216, 229, 233, 290-91. K. Galling, "Der Ehrenname Elisas und die Entrückung Elias," ZThK, LIII (1956), 129-48 (wishes to increase the places where פרשים is translated "horses"). F. Hančar, Das Pferd in prähistorischer Zeit (1956).

J. A. THOMPSON

HORSE GATE [שער הסוסים]. A gate of Jerusalem, leading to the Kidron (see KIDRON, BROOK), toward the SE angle of the temple area, in the vicinity of the palace (Jer. 31:40). This gate was restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:28). See map under NEHEMIAH.

See also JERUSALEM.

G. A. BARROIS

HORSELEACH. KJV form of LEECH.

HORSEMAN [פרש; רכב סום; רכב, rider on a horse; ἱππεύς]; HORSEMEN [ἱππικόν; Rev. 9:16; RSV CAVALRY]. One who rides a horse, usually in battle. See CHARIOT; HORSE; WAR, METHODS OF.

HOSAH hō'zə [חסה, refuge]. 1. A Levite of the family of Merari; one of the gatekeepers of the tent David pitched for the ark when he brought it into Jerusalem (I Chr. 16:38). He and his thirteen sons and brethren were subsequently included in the expanded organization of the gatekeepers and were responsible for the posting of six guards for the W gate of Shallecheth (I Chr. 26:10-19; see JERUSALEM).

E. R. DALGLISH

2. A border town in the territory allotted to Asher (Josh. 19:29). According to the context, it was in the vicinity of Tyre, but no certain identification has been made.

HOSANNA. The Vulg. transliteration of הושיעה־נא, "Save us, we beseech thee" (Ps. 118:25; cf. II Sam. 14:4; Ps. 20:9—H 20:10), in Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:9; John 12:13.

In Ps. 118, which forms a part of the HALLEL, a pilgrim who was rejected like a worthless stone is now recognized to be a righteous man. He enters the temple to thank Yahweh for his goodness, and he is greeted by the priests as coming in the name of Yahweh. In vs. 25 he asks God for more help and greater success. This verse was sung in the liturgy of the Feast of Tabernacles (see BOOTHS, FEAST OF) once a day and seven times on the seventh day by the priests during their circuit(s) around the altar. When they did so, the congregation waved their lulab, consisting of branches of myrtle, willow, and a palm leaf (Jos. Antiq. III.x.4; cf. II Macc. 10:6-7). These branches themselves were sometimes called "Hosanna."

In Jewish postbiblical texts "Hosanna" is connected with messianic hopes; the man coming in the name of Yahweh is understood as the Messiah. But this interpretation seems to be much older. Together with the combination of the lulab and the "Hosanna," it would best explain the situation at Jesus' entry into Jerusalem. The people, wearing palm leaves, greet him as the Son of David, for whose coming they have asked God in the highest (as for the advent of the king in Ps. 20:9—H 20:10). Through him the kingdom of "our father David" is coming (only Mark); he is the king of Israel (only John).

In the Christian churches Matt. 21:9 got its place in connection with the threefold "Holy" preceding the consecration of the elements in the Holy Communion, seldom after the Eucharistic meal (cf. Did. 10:6): "The grace may come, this world may perish, Hosanna to the God of David"; Apostolic Constitutions 8:13).

Bibliography. F. C. Burkitt, JTS, 17 (1916), 139-49; I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung (2nd ed., 1924); J. Brinktrine, Römische Quartalschrift für Altertumskunde, 35 (1927), 303 ff; E. Werner, " 'Hosanna' in the Gospels," JBL, 65 (1946), 97-122; J. S. Kennard, Jr., " 'Hosanna' and the Purpose of Jesus," JBL, 67 (1948), 171-76; G. Rietschel, Lehrbuch der Liturgik, I (2nd ed., ed. P. Graff; 1951), 236 ff; W. Reindell, Leiturgia, II (1955), 454 ff; J. J. Petuchowski, "Hoshi'a na in Psalm CXVIII, 25—a prayer for rain," Vetus Testamentum, 5 (1955), 266-71.

J. HEMPEL

HOSEA (MAN AND BOOK) hō zā'ə [הושע]. The name of the first book of the twelve prophets in the OT canon—second, however, to Amos chronologically. The name is the same in Hebrew as that of the last king of Israel, Hoshea (II Kings 17:1) and the original name of Joshua (Num. 13:16; Deut. 32:44).

1. The prophet
2. Variant interpretations
3. Date and composition
4. Text and style
5. The theology of Hosea
Bibliography

1. The prophet. Hosea occupies a unique place among the prophets of the OT as the only one of the writing prophets who had his home in Israel. Men such as Elijah and Micaiah a century earlier had left behind them a great prophetic tradition in the Northern Kingdom, but by the middle of the eighth century B.C. it was largely forgotten. There were still prophets in the land, but they were of such a degenerate type that Amos, when he went N to deliver his oracles at Bethel, scorned to be counted one of them (Amos 7:14). Hosea was to accuse prophets and priests alike of complete irresponsibility in their office, and, in their ignorance of the true nature of God, of guiding the people into pagan practices rather than into a pure faith (4:4-6).

So different is Hosea from Amos in character, outlook, and style that it is difficult to find any sure trace of Amos' influence in his writings; yet it remains likely that there is a relation between Amos' brief but powerful ministry in the N and Hosea's appearance not more than a few years later as the one genuine prophetic voice that the eighth century was to produce in Israel. The followers of Amos were the first to preserve the oracles of a prophet. The followers of Hosea, in gathering together both his oracles and certain biographical matter concerning him, were thus continuing a recently established tradition, and we may assume a community of interest between the followers of the two prophets. Both books received editing in Judah. The fact that both prophets found themselves in bitter and irreconcilable conflict with the official priests and prophets adds to the likelihood that those who were spiritually awakened by them would make common cause.

The interpretation of the book of Hosea has been made extremely difficult by uncertainty about the meaning of certain references to the prophet's family life in chs. 1; 3. As sometimes happens in such instances, the basic uncertainty has led to wide variations of interpretation at this one point, and widely different conceptions of the prophet. Therefore, the collection of oracles in chs. 4–13, which are remarkably consistent in their character, should be taken as a basis for the understanding of Hosea and his ministry.

The book falls naturally into three divisions. Chs. 1–3 are distinguished by their references to Hosea's personal experience in marriage, his relation with his wife being interpreted as a parable of Yahweh's relation with Israel. All three of these chapters as they stand proclaim judgment but end on a hopeful note, envisaging a day of restoration for Israel beyond the inescapable day of judgment. Chs. 4–13 consist of brief oracles which expose the corruption of the nation, the irresponsibility of priests and prophets, the unfitness of kings and princes to rule, the spiritual degeneracy of the population, conditions which make it impossible for Israel to continue much longer as a nation. Such inner weaknesses invite destruction at the hands of an invader. Doom is certain, and in these chapters no word is spoken which points beyond the doom. Then in ch. 14 the darkness lifts and again the note of hope is sounded. One of the basic questions to which an answer must be found is whether the passages expressing hope for the more distant future are original to Hosea or have been added, as in some other prophetic books, by a later editor who knew that judgment was not God's final word to Israel.

The acceptance of chs. 4–13 as basic in understanding Hosea makes impossible the kind of erratic judgments concerning him which have been only too common, which build him up as the prophet of God's tender love in sharp contrast to Amos as the prophet of God's unquenchable wrath. For Hosea as for Amos, the wages of sin is death. His proclamations of God's judgment upon the sins of Israel are as severe as any to be found in the book of Amos. At no point in the entire book is there any suggestion that Israel can escape the coming disaster. Where hope is expressed in chs. 1–3; 14, it is not hope that the judgment may not come, but hope for a new beginning beyond the judgment.

2. Variant interpretations. Chs. 1–3 constitute a single unit, containing biographical and autobiographical material in chs. 1; 3 and a sermon to Israel in ch. 2, but bound together by the fact that all three use the marriage relationship as a likeness of God's relation to Israel and the disruption of the marriage relation by the adultery of the wife as a likeness of Israel's response to God. For centuries these chapters have furnished interpreters with major difficulties. It has seemed to dishonor God and to impeach his holiness to take literally the statement of 1:2 that God commanded Hosea to marry a harlot or the statement of 3:1 that God commanded him to reunite himself with the same harlot after she had disgraced his home.

Jewish interpreters in medieval times, such as Maimonides, Aben Ezra, and Kimchi, insisted that no such marriage ever actually took place. The whole transaction—command of God, marriage, birth of children, disruption of marriage, and later restoration—was the substance of a prophetic dream or vision, as when Ezekiel in a vision reported himself seized by the hair and transported to Jerusalem (Ezek. 8:3). Others understand Hosea's marriage as a prophetic allegory, from which they say we should no more deduce the character of the actual marriage than we should deduce the character of his (or Isaiah's) children from the names that are given them as signs to the nation. A variation of this is the view of Luther and Osiander that Gomer and her children were merely called adulterous for parabolic purposes but were actually not so. Thus chs. 1; 3 would be read allegorically in the same fashion as ch. 2. But this seems to overlook emphatic differences between ch. 2 and chs. 1; 3. The impression of biographical and autobiographical content is too strong to be completely suppressed.

At the opposite extreme is what may be termed the realistic interpretation, which insists that the biographical details of chs. 1; 3 are to be taken literally. Thus Gomer must be understood as already an acknowledged harlot at the time God commanded Hosea to marry her. Each step in Hosea's marriage relation was taken, not on any impulse of his own, but at the command of God. In short, his marriage, the birth of his children, the disruption of his home, and the restoration of Gomer to the home were acts performed in obedience to God in order to make his marriage the medium by which God might speak to Israel. The difficulty of this theory is twofold: it is grotesque to imagine a prophet's deliberately establishing a marriage with a harlot in order to act out a parable of God's relation with Israel, and Hosea pictures the marriage relation of God and Israel as having been true and idyllic in its earliest stage (2:15; 11:1).

Perhaps the most popular interpretation in recent years has been the romantic one which applies a considerable measure of imagination to the biographical material in chs. 1; 3, reconstructs the marriage experience of the prophet and finds in it the key to the prophet's message, his discovery of a redemptive love in his own relation with his wife becoming for him the revelation of God's redemptive love for Israel. Behind this theory lies the assumption that before the time of Hosea no one in Israel had had any comprehension of covenant love between God and Israel, that Israel's earlier religion was semipagan, with fear as its predominant characteristic. Thus Amos was seen as the discoverer of ethical monotheism and Hosea as the discoverer of the divine love. More recent scholarship has revised the picture of Israelite religion in the period from Moses to Amos and Hosea, validating a prophetic tradition in which the covenant relation between God and Israel was central and there was an understanding of God that prepared the way for Amos and Hosea, so that they can no longer be represented as such startling innovators. Nevertheless, the romantic theory persists in varying forms.

This interpretation is found as early as 1737, when Gebhard suggested that Gomer's disposition to harlotry was not manifest until sometime after the marriage. Some evidence of this was seen in the fact that in 1:2 she is called, not a harlot, but a woman "of harlotry." The theory was taken up and developed by an impressive array of major scholars. The marriage experience of Hosea was reconstructed somewhat as follows: Hosea entered upon marriage with Gomer with no suspicion of trouble and with the expectation of years of happiness before him. He named his first child Jezreel as a warning to the royal house that soon God's judgment must fall upon it for the butchery of Jezreel. Thus far there was no indication of trouble in the home. But upon the birth of a second child, a girl, Hosea realized that his wife had been unfaithful to him; so he named the child "Not pitied." A third child he disowned entirely, naming him "Not my people." So ends the biographical element in ch. 1. When ch. 3 opens, the wife is being offered for sale in a slave market. The intervening time, therefore, has to be bridged by assuming that Gomer, after the birth of her third child, left the home and became a common harlot, that misfortune eventually overtook her, and that she was on the point of being sold as a slave when Hosea sought her out once more. At God's command he bought her back but did not immediately restore her to the home, rather fixing for her a time of discipline and preparation that the marriage relation might be renewed on a new basis. Then, in contemplation of all that had happened, or perhaps at some point in the midst of the experience, Hosea recognized the parallel between his own marriage and that of God with Israel and leaped to the conclusion that there was in God's heart a love for Israel like his own passionate and persistent love for Gomer. Some carried this theory to great lengths. One scholar asserts that not only did Hosea's marriage experience give his life its decisive direction, but the passion of his nature which made him persist in his love for Gomer was later sublimated into a love for his children (11:1-3) and an inner sympathy even with animals (vss. 4-7).

This theory is subject to serious criticisms. Mention has already been made of the long tradition of God's covenant love for Israel. The severity of God's judgment in an Amos had behind it the intensity of God's love that would not let his people go without a struggle. Far from discovering God's love for Israel through his marriage experience, Hosea declared God's love to have been evident from the very beginning of the nation's life (11:1) and his own conduct in marriage to be a human reproduction and representation of the divine reality. A second difficulty is that in the text of chs. 1; 3 each act of Hosea is the prophetic act of a prophet with the purpose of conveying a specific message to the nation. It is very difficult to go behind these parabolic acts and reconstruct a personal history. The names of Hosea's children dare not be taken as indications of Gomer's conduct any more than deductions would be made concerning Isaiah's family life from the strange names he gave his children, "The spoil speeds, the prey hastes," and "A remnant shall return." Also it is plain that Hosea had long been a prophet, long enough for the birth of three children (most likely ca. six years in the East), before the events of ch. 3, and that the present record of the experiences would be written still later, so that chs. 1; 3 dare not be interpreted as describing the experiences that made him a prophet. The most that can be said is that Hosea seems to have been tragically unfortunate in his marriage, to have seen in it a human parable of God's relation with Israel, and to have acted out in relation to his wife a parable of God's redemptive love for Israel.

There are yet other theories of interpretation. Thomas Aquinas, followed by Sebastian Schmidt (1687), tried to avoid the offensiveness of the account by supposing that Hosea took Gomer, not as his wife, but as a concubine. It is hard to see that this is less offensive. A more widely held view was that the harlotry of Gomer, as of Israel, was meant to be understood, not as physical, but as spiritual harlotry. One scholar denies that the woman in ch. 3 is Gomer. The two chapters, he says, do not present a continuous story. Ch. 1 narrates Hosea's marriage to a woman who shares the religious apostasy of the nation and the naming of his children in such a way as to declare to the nation its approaching doom. Ch. 3 describes a purely symbolic act of the prophet which has nothing to do with his marriage: he buys a harlot in the market place in order to declare parabolically God's readiness to purchase a sinful nation out of its slavery. This theory is based almost entirely upon the supposition that Hosea would never have described his own wife merely as "a woman" (3:1). Others read ch. 3 as Hosea's own account of the same marriage that is described in ch. 1, although 3:1 speaks, not of "marrying," but of "loving." The total effect of the multiplicity of theories should be to make us exercise great restraint in imaginative reconstructions and careful to base our interpretation of the prophet, not on tentative hypotheses, but rather upon solid evidence of his mind.

3. Date and composition. The period of Hosea's ministry is described in 1:1 in somewhat puzzling terms. The hand of a Judean editor can be recognized in the naming first of four Judean kings, then of only one Israelite king, Jeroboam, in spite of the fact that Hosea's entire ministry was in Israel. For Hosea to have been active until the time of the fourth Judean king, Hezekiah (725-697), would have required an extremely long ministry, while the completion of his ministry during the reign of Jeroboam II (787-747) would have made it extremely short. The prophecy of the fall of the house of Jehu (1:4), which occurred with the death of Jeroboam's son, Zechariah, in 746, makes it likely that Hosea began his ministry in 747 shortly before Jeroboam's death. This is supported by the absence of references to any era of prosperity such as we find in Amos' oracles, delivered in the immediately preceding period. Rather, Hosea's words mirror a state of confusion and anarchy such as became characteristic of Israel after 746, when one king followed the other in quick succession and the land was full of violence (5:1; 7:3-7; 9:15; 13:10-11). The length of Hosea's ministry is uncertain. Absence of any reference to the Syro-Ephraimitish war of 734 makes it likely that it terminated before this date.

The development of Hosea's ministry and the process by which his book came into its present form are closely related problems. It is significant that the names given to the prophet's three children over a period of at least six years strike the same note of inescapable doom that is conveyed by the oracles in chs. 4–13, and also in 2:2-13. This suggests that in the first stage of Hosea's ministry he dinned into the ears of his people the certainty of judgment. But always in the background, ready to break through, was another, seemingly contradictory note, the plaintive note of God's heartbrokenness at the sin and ruin of his people. But even this injured love of God could not relieve the darkness of judgment.

Some scholars believe that only these oracles of doom are original to Hosea, and that, where hope breaks in, it is the product of a later editor (1:10-11; 2:14-23;14). But they must reckon with ch. 3, which comes from the hand of Hosea himself. Plainly there came a point in Hosea's ministry when he could no longer believe that judgment was God's last word. Beyond the judgment day he saw a new beginning for Israel with God and proclaimed it to the nation by his own redemption of his wayward Gomer. It was therefore Hosea himself who added vss. 1, 14-23, to the oracle of doom 2:2-13, transforming it into an oracle of redemption, and who wrote ch. 14 as a new conclusion to his collection of oracles to proclaim the possibility of redemption and restoration for a repentant people once they have been cleansed and humbled by the judgment. It would be at this same time that he set down his autobiographical note which is preserved in ch. 3.

The first sign of a hand other than Hosea's at work upon the book is in ch. 1, where the writer speaks of Hosea in the third person. Fortunately this editor identifies himself rather plainly. His Judean nationality is evident, not only in the superscription, in which Judean kings precede the king of Israel, but also in vs. 7, which refers to the deliverance of Judah from disaster, most likely that of 722, though it may have been that of 701. This writer, in telling of Hosea's marriage and the naming of his children, had before him chs. 2–3, and, following their lead, described Gomer as a woman of "harlotry." Also, under the influence of chs. 2–3 he added vss. 10-11 in ch. 1 in order to relieve the gloom of vss. 2-9, showing his identity again, however, in his concern that Judah should be united with Israel in the future day of redemption.

There are frequent references to Judah throughout the book, and these have sometimes been thought to be entirely later additions (e.g., K. Marti believed that Hosea never once spoke of Judah). No good reason, however, can be found for questioning the authenticity of many of them (e.g., 5:10, 12-14; 6:4; 8:14). To the prophets the two kingdoms constituted one people of God, and it was as natural for Hosea to include Judah in his oracles of judgment as it was for Amos to choose Bethel as the scene of his ministry. But when words of warning are addressed to Judah (e.g., 4:15; 6:11) or words of praise (e.g., 11:12) or words of hope for a united Davidic kingdom (e.g., 3:5), it is clearly the hand of a later Judean editor at work; how much later we cannot say. The final verse of ch. 14 is sharply distinguished from all that precedes, having the character of proverbial wisdom rather than that of a prophetic oracle. Its date is most likely very late.

Some scholars (see bibliography) assume that only those parts of Hosea are genuine that proclaim doom, and that all suggestions of hope are from the hands of later editors. As an antidote to sentimentalism, which has concealed the character of Hosea as a prophet of inescapable doom, these writings have value, but they are forced to do violence to the text in order to make it fit the theory. Batten (see bibliography) denies ch. 3 to Hosea, eliminates all reference to Gomer's character from ch. 1, and then announces triumphantly that Gomer has been cruelly slandered. Hosea's character as a prophet of doom may be maintained without resorting to such measures and while recognizing the essential integrity of the present text of the book.

4. Text and style. The text of Hosea confronts the interpreter with great and often insuperable obstacles because of its frequently confused and corrupt state. There may be wide differences in translation, as different interpreters make varying reconstructions of the text. The LXX is often of great help in recovering the original, not only of individual words, but even of whole sentences.

In style Hosea differs greatly from Amos. His oracles are brief and pointed and employ none of the devices for cumulative effect which make some of Amos' sermons so powerful. The sensitive, passionate nature of Hosea shows plainly in his ways of speech. Where Amos thunders, Hosea pleads. Where Amos gives the impression of iron strength and of a judgment that moves relentlessly down upon the nation, Hosea sounds like a man who is torn and bleeding within himself because of the harsh words of judgment which it is his duty to proclaim. In this he is similar to Jeremiah. His oracles are the brief outcries of a tortured soul, carrying passion in every word, too passionate for their form to show any careful calculation for effect. They are like staccato blows at the heart of the nation, with an evangelical passion that at times comes close to that of Second Isaiah.

5. The theology of Hosea. The entire book of Hosea has its focus in the relation of God to Israel. In this Hosea is distinguished from Amos, for whom the universal sovereignty of God forms the background of all his thinking. Hosea sets little emphasis upon God's sovereignty, and he has nothing to say about his care or concern for other nations. What God is to Israel and what Israel is to God engages his whole attention. Also within Israel, his approach to the sins of the nation is different from that of Amos. Amos' passionate concern is that the ordinary citizen in Israel is being trampled upon, cheated, and debased. It is the absence of common justice that shocks him. Hosea sees the same evils, the irresponsibility of the rulers, the corruption of priests and prophets, the degeneracy of the cult, but for him these are all merely signs of a deeper evil, the repudiation by Israel of its covenant relation with God. He does not exempt the people from responsibility but includes them with princes and priests in a common guilt. The nation has forsaken its husband, Yahweh, and has played the harlot by setting its trust upon the Baals, upon its own military forces and upon foreign alliances. Sin is not defined in any legalistic way by Hosea; for him the essence of sin for Israel is to rely upon anyone or anything other than God for the guidance and sustaining of its life. For this reason idolatry of any kind receives severe censure from Hosea.

Two key words in Hosea's theology are חסד, which may be translated "faithful love," and דעת אלהים, "knowledge of God." חסד denotes the loyalty and devotion that may be expected in a relationship of love, and therefore is used of God's attitude toward Israel, as well as of the response for which he hopes from Israel. It has a third dimension when it describes the attitude toward one another of Israelites who are bound together within the covenant. The same חסד which has determined God's dealings with them as a nation is meant to determine their dealings with one another. Here Hosea roots his ethics firmly in his theology. The conduct of Israelites is to be a reflection of the nature of God. At one point (6:6) Hosea seems almost to equate חסד with knowledge of God. They are two ways of describing the essence of the covenant relation. By knowledge of God he very clearly has in mind something far beyond intellectual apprehension. It is a knowledge which is possible only in a personal relation in which the entire existence of the knower is involved. To know God is to respond to him in faithful love and to have the whole of life determined by the understanding of oneself and one's fellow men that becomes possible in this relation. See LOVE IN THE OT.

